PUBLISHER'S PREFACE

(HOW TO USE THIS BOOK)

The Approach

THE Wycliffe Bible Commentary is an entirely new commentary on the whole Bible written and edited by a number of scholars representing a wide cross section of American Protestant Christianity. Within the limits of its more than a million and one-quarter words, it attempts to treat the entire text of the Old and New Testaments on a phrase by phrase basis. In addition, summaries of the major sections of each Biblical book generally appear in the text in connection with the main headings in the outline. Thus, the reader is permitted an overview and a detailed discussion of a passage of Scripture at the same time.

In the commentaries on the various books the writers present the results of their own careful, personal Bible study. But also they have preserved some of the best work of the older commentators and have utilized the insights of contemporary scholarship. While they infuse the whole with a fresh spirit, at the same time they manifest their unflinching belief in the divine inspiration of Holy Scripture.

Although the Biblical text used in the preparation of this commentary is that of the King James Version, several of the writers made their own translations of the books on which they worked. Occasionally they use phrases from their own translations in the text of the commentaries. For the convenience of the reader, all Biblical phraseology appears in bold face type, as do all the Biblical verse numbers. In this way numbers of verses are clearly distinguished from points in the outline. In cases in which the writer prefers to employ a reading from some version other than the King James, the source of such phraseology is identified. While the commentaries on the various books emphasize the interpretation of the actual words of Scripture, each is accompanied by a brief introductory discussion of authorship, date of composition, historical background, and the like. To provide the reader with further background information, a brief review of the inter-testamental period has been included.

To improve appearance of the printed page, pronouns referring to deity (which appear in large numbers) are not capitalized, except when capitalization is necessary for clarity of meaning. Also in the interest of typographical appearance, Lord and God, when they are translations of the Hebrew YHWH, are not printed in capitals as in the King James Version. Often the Hebrew YHWH is represented by the English Jehovah. But in some instances the contributors preferred the spelling of Yahweh, which is gaining favor among Biblical scholars.

The basic aim of this volume is to determine the meaning of the text of Scripture. It is therefore, strictly speaking, neither a devotional nor a technical exegetical treatment. It seeks to present the Biblical message in such a way that the serious Bible student will find extensive help within its pages.

The contributors to this commentary represent a total of more than fifteen denominational backgrounds. Among the forty-eight writers are professors in twenty-five schools of Christian higher education. With such a variety of backgrounds, it is to be expected that contributors will differ among themselves in some matters of interpretation. No editorial effort has been made to bring these differences into absolute conformity; writers have been given freedom of expression in such cases. The reader will discover, therefore, some differences in outlook in such instances as parallel passages in the Gospels and in the books of Kings and Chronicles.

Bibliography

Each of the books in this commentary is accompanied by a bibliography. Occasionally, when an author has treated related books (e.g., I, II Peter; I, II Thessalonians; Ezra, Nehemiah, Esther), he has chosen to place all of his bibliographies in one list. In such cases, the reader is directed to the full bibliographical listing.

The fact that a writer has included a given title does not mean that he recommends it as thoroughly conservative or thoroughly accurate. Writers have listed both works which they have referred to and those which will be of use to the reader. In the interests of standardization and economy of space, all annotations which might have classified books according to theological position and usefulness have been omitted.

Because many readers will be interested in knowing about conservative commentaries on the whole Bible or large sections of it, a few of the larger works are listed here. Old favorites are John Peter Lange's Commentary on the Holy Scriptures (24 vols.); C. J. Ellicott's Commentary on the Whole Bible (8 or 4 vols.); Matthew Henry's Commentary on the Whole Bible (6 vols. or 1 vol. abridgement); Jamieson, Fausset, and Brown's A Commentary Critical, Experimental, and Practical on the Old and New Testaments (6 vols. or 1 vol. abridgement); Matthew Henry, Thomas Scott, and others, A Devotional Commentary on the Entire Bible; and Alexander Maclaren's Expositions of Holy Scripture (25 vols.). A newer one-volume commentary that has enjoyed wide usefulness is The New Bible Commentary, edited by F. Davidson, A. M. Stibbs, and E. F. Kevan. While no attempt is made here to mention works on individual books of either Testament, it would be too bad to ignore C. H. Spurgeon's great classic on the Psalms, The Treasury of David (6 vols.).

More specialized commentaries on one or the other of the Testaments – commentaries which are not too heavily loaded with Hebrew and Greek for the serious student of the English Bible to find them of some use – include the following: C. F. Keil and F. Delitzsch, Biblical Commentary on the Old Testament (25 vols.); Marvin H. Vincent, Word Studies in the New Testament (4 vols.); A. T. Robertson, Word Pictures in the New Testament (6 vols.); and Henry Alford, The Greek Testament (4 vols.) or the one-volume New Testament for English Readers.

The student who is interested in questions of Biblical introduction, such as authorship, date, occasion for writing, and the like, will find the following four books helpful: Merrill F. Unger's Introductory Guide to the Old Testament; Henry C. Thiessen's New Testament Introduction; and D. Edmond Hiebert's Introduction to the Pauline Epistles and Introduction to the Non-Pauline Epistles. An especially useful conservative Bible atlas is Baker's Bible Atlas, prepared by Charles F. Pfeiffer; Unger's Bible Dictionary and the New Bible Dictionary provide information on special problems related to interpretation of Scripture.

THE OLD TESTAMENT

GENESIS

INTRODUCTION

Title. The word Genesis came into English by way of Latin from the Greek. In the Septuagint (LXX), it formed the superscription for the first book of the Bible. The word means "origin, source, or begetting." The Hebrew word b'r'ēshîth, translated "in [the] beginning," is the first word in the Hebrew Bible. It is frequently used to designate the book of Genesis.

Nature. Genesis is the book of origins. It gives a majestic account of the beginnings of all the Creator brought into being. It answers men's questions concerning the origin of the world, and of plant, animal, and human life. It tells of the establishment of the family, the origin of sin, the giving of the divine revelation, the growth and development of the race, and the inauguration of God's plan to bring about redemption through his chosen people. It presents and illustrates eternal truths, and it resolves enigmas, mysteries, and puzzling situations in the light of God's will for his people. In clear, meaningful language the writer sets forth God's revealed plans and purposes, and the marvels of his dealings with men.

Genesis takes the reader back to the all-important moment of creation when the omnipotent Creator spoke into being the matchless wonders of sun, moon, stars, planets, galaxies, plants, and moving creatures, and the one whom he made in his image. In these fifty chapters the inspired writer unfolds the drama of creation; he tells how sin came stealthily and relentlessly to bring ruin, disfigurement, and death; he reveals the tragic fruits of sin in our first parents' pathetic defeat; and he shows how, later, the accumulated wickednesses of men brought destruction and almost annihilation to human society. In the fresh beginning the writer traces the growth of the new race, and finally the exciting careers of Abraham, Isaac, Jacob, and Jacob's children. The book ends with the death of Joseph in the land of Egypt.

Genesis 1–11 presents the account of man from creation to the beginning of the life of Abraham. Genesis 12–50 recounts God's dealings with his chosen people—Abraham, Isaac, Jacob, Joseph, and their descendants. Throughout the narrative, the author's chief concern is to set forth Jehovah's purpose in creating and providentially guiding such an elect people. Not only Genesis, but the whole Bible shows that through the agency of this people, the Lord sought to reveal his nature and ways to the world, to establish his holy will in the earth, and to bring his "good news" of redemption to all men. Nations and individuals are mentioned and described in the book only as they fit into the Lord's sublime plan and purpose. Sumerians, Hittites, Babylonians, and Assyrians, whenever their history affects that of the chosen people, enter the picture briefly in order to demonstrate God's purpose for the world. At every step, the Spirit sought to make the revelation clear to men of all ages. In the rapidly moving drama, the plan of God was unfolding.

Authorship. It is safe to claim Moses as the responsible author of the book. It is the first book of the Pentateuch, which both Scripture and tradition attribute to Moses. It would be difficult to find a man in all the range of Israel's life who was better qualified to write this history. Trained in the "wisdom of the Egyptians" (Acts 7:22), Moses was providentially prepared to understand available records, manuscripts, and oral narratives. As a prophet to whom was granted the unusual privilege of unhurried hours of communion with God on Sinai, he was well equipped to record for all generations the Lord's portrayal of his activity through the ages. What other individual in all the centuries possessed such powers and such faith, and enjoyed such intimate fellowship with Jehovah?

The discovery in modern times of such ancient records as the Amarna Letters, the Ugaritic (or Ras Shamra) literature, and the clay tablets from Mesopotamia (Mari and Nuzu), has enabled scholars to reconstruct the historical and cultural background of the Biblical record, and to discover what life was like in Egypt, Palestine, and Mesopotamia during the Biblical epoch. Very likely many oral and written records, reaching far back into antiquity, were available to the distinguished Hebrew scholar, whose Egyptian schooling and whose graduate study in the region of Mount Sinai made him aware of significant world movements. According to Jewish tradition, when the great scribe Ezra came back from Babylonia to Jerusalem, bringing the Hebrew manuscripts of the Old Testament, he set to work with prodigious energy preserving, copying, and editing the old materials in his possession.

Genesis and Science. If a student expects to find in Genesis a scientific account of how the world came into existence, with all questions concerning primitive life answered in technical language familiar to the professor or student of science, he will be disappointed. Genesis is not an attempt to grapple with or answer such technical questions. It deals with matters far beyond the realm of science. The author seeks to bring us in touch with the eternal God and to reveal the sacred meaning of his being, his purpose, and his dealings with his creatures as he works out his holy will. This book, so remarkable for its profundity and moral exaltation, its dignity and grandeur, pictures the eternal God at work preparing a place where his beloved creatures can live and grow and reveal the divine glory.

COMMENTARY

I. The Early Beginnings. 1:1—11:32.

A. The Creation. 1:1—2:25. God is the Creator of all things. From the outset in the Book of Genesis, the focus of the strong light of revelation turns upon the Almighty. He is the Beginning, the Cause, the Source of all that is. He brought into being all the things and the persons that were to fit into his plan for the ages. All the matter necessary for his later working, he miraculously created.

1. In beginning (b^{e}r'ēshîth). The author takes the reader back before time, into the unfathomable reaches of eternity, though language fails him as he seeks to suggest the state of things before time was. He gives no hint of a tangible date for this beginning. His account reaches back into the time before the dating of events. God created. The sublime certainty of revelation is based on this one mighty assertion. God did it. Nothing more astounding could be declared. 'Elōhîm is the usual word for "God" in Hebrew, Aramaic, and Arabic. It is actually plural in form, but it is used with a verb in the singular. Perhaps the plural is best explained as indicating "plenitude of might" or exceptional dignity and unlimited greatness. In this One are united all the powers of eternity and infinity.

Created (bārā') is a verb used exclusively of God. Man could not reach up to the powers inherent in this word, for it describes full miracle. By the sovereign, originative power of God something absolutely new was brought into being. The heavens and the earth. Here the author focuses interest upon all the areas of the world above, around, and below. In this phrase he includes the completed universe as it was known (or might come to be known) by the Hebrews, and all the raw material needed to make suns, planets, stars, nebulae, galaxies, molecules, atoms, electrons, and all the specific things and beings on the earth.

Men of science reveal that our galaxy contains more than 100 billion stars, and that our sun is 150 trillion miles from the center of our galaxy. Our galaxy is one of a small cluster of 19 galaxies, the nearest of which is 30 million light years from us (150 million trillion miles). Our research scientists, by using powerful telescopes, have made reasonably sure that there are more than a billion galaxies. They estimate the number of stars in these galaxies as close to 100 quintillion. The candle power of one of the galaxies is equal to that of 400 million suns. As a man looks on this vast creation and compares what he sees with the inspired writer's account of its origin, his heart must be filled with awe. He recognizes the hand of God in the beauty and order of the solar system and in the power at the center of the atom. Whether he looks upon the sun (positively charged), holding the planets (negatively charged), or whether he examines the nucleus (positively charged) at the heart of the atom, holding each electron (negatively charged) in its sway, he senses the wisdom, power, and grandeur of God. In the light of all this, a reverent man bows before his Creator in awe and genuine dedication, and pours out worship, adoration, thanksgiving, and unrestrained praise. The sublime creation of the Lord is that being, greatly beloved, whom he chose to create in his own image.

2. The earth was without form, and void (tōhû wābōhû). The inspired author quickly turns his attention to the earth, for his story has to do with God's plans and provision for human life on this planet. He describes the earth in its unfinished state. There was plenty of material at hand for every work God planned to create, though in a chaotic state—waste, void, dark. Six full creative days were to make phenomenal changes. God's purpose could not be satisfied until his miraculous touch had made something of this chaos. Even darkness (often, in Scripture, associated with evil) was to be made subservient to his will. The Spirit of God was hovering (rûaḥ . . . mᵉrăḥepet). The words portray the energy-giving presence of God, swathing and caressing the chaos and unfinished earth as he prepared to complete his creation. Like a devoted mother bird, he moved about, lavishing his love on the newborn world.

3. Then said God, Let be light. The author presents God's first creative word. With unbelievable ease and deliberate consciousness, the omnipotent God brought light into existence. He uttered his word, and instantly his will was accomplished (Ps 33:6,9). Light was God's answer to the dominance of darkness. It was the Lord's first positive move toward completing the full program of creation. Without it, the other steps would have been meaningless. The Apostle John tells us that "God is light" (I Jn 1:5). 4. God saw . . . that it was good. When the Creator looked upon the product of his will, he found it perfectly complete and admirable; and he was pleased. Seven times this statement is made. Every one of God's creative acts was perfect, complete, pleasing, satisfying. It is good to remember that this was the same light man sees and enjoys today.

5. Evening and morning. In the book of Genesis evening always precedes morning. The creation of light ended the reign of darkness and brought on the first day. Since it was still some time before the creation of the sun and moon, it is incorrect to speak of actual twenty-four-hour days until after that point in the program of the Creator. The reference here is to a day of God, and not to an ordinary day bounded by minutes and hours. The beginning of each act of creation is called morning, and the close of that specific divine act is called evening.

6. A firmament (expanse) in the midst of the waters. The Hebrew word rāqîʿa represents something beaten out or pressed out so as to extend over a wide surface. The writer suggests here an expanse above the earth, holding vast reservoirs of water to be released for rain.

9. Let the dry land appear. At one stage, water covered everything. On the third day, however, the Lord made the land and the vegetable kingdom. By his divine power he caused the land to emerge from the great mass of waters, and formed the earth (cf. Ps 104:6-8; Job 38:8-11). From the soil, at the express command of God, living vegetation sprang forth, and soon clothed the earth with beauty and provided food for living creatures.

14. Let be lights. Hebrew mᵉʾōrōt describes the luminaries or instruments of light. By means of these luminaries, the earth received the light necessary for maintaining life. They were to rule over the day and the night (v. 16), to be for signs and seasons, and to give light upon the earth. The account makes it clear that God made them and then set them in place. According to the divine blueprint, the sun, moon, and stars were all brought into being to carry out his specific will.

20. Let the waters swarm with swarms of living creatures. This verse describes the sudden coming of hosts of winged things and fishes. They were designed to provide another visible demonstration of the Creator's power. With their appearance, there was life on the earth and also activity. And there was, furthermore, an endless succession of living creatures, all made by God's mighty hand. 21. Sea monsters (AV, great whales). Literally, stretched-out animals that creep, crawl, or glide upon the earth, in or out of the water, such as, serpents, eels, fish, and dragons. 22. The Lord breathed his blessing upon these and commanded them to be fruitful and multiply. The progress of God's creative activity was upward toward the creation of man.

26. Let us make man. The supreme moment of creation arrived as God created man. The narrative presents God as calling on the heavenly court, or the other two members of the Trinity, to center all attention on this event. Some commentators, however, interpret the plural as a "plural of majesty," indicating dignity and greatness. The plural form of the word for God, 'Elōhîm, can be explained in somewhat the same way. The Lord is represented as giving unusual deliberation to a matter fraught with much significance.

In our image (ṣelem), after our likeness (dᵉmût). Though these two synonyms have separate meanings, there is here seemingly no effort to present different aspects of God's being. It is clear that man, as God made him, was distinctly different from the animals already created. He stood on a much higher plateau, for God created him to be immortal, and made him a special image of His own eternity. Man was a creature with whom his Maker could visit and have fellowship and communion. On the other hand, the Lord could expect man to answer him and be responsible to him. Man was constituted to have the privilege of choice, even to the point of disobeying his Creator. He was to be God's responsible representative and steward on the earth, to work out his Creator's will and fulfill the divine purpose. World dominion was to be granted to this new creature (cf. Ps 8:5-7). He was commissioned to subdue (kābash, "tread upon") the earth, and to follow God's plan in filling it with people. This sublime creature, with his unbelievable privileges and heavy responsibilities, was to live and move in kingly fashion.

31. Very good (tôb mᵉōd). When the Lord looked upon the completed result of his creative acts, he expressed peculiar delight and extreme satisfaction. Everything in the universe, from the biggest star to the smallest blade of grass, brought joy to his heart. It was a beautiful symphony. The Creator's satisfaction is here expressed in terse yet vivid language.

2:1,2. Finished (kālâh) . . . . rested (shābāt) . . . . hallowed (kādăsh). When the Creator had pronounced his approval of everything he had made, including man, the crown of creation, he declared the work finished. For the present, he would undertake no further creation. However, he sanctified, or hallowed, a day of complete rest. The Hebrew word shābăt can be translated "desisted" or "ceased" or "cut off." During this time even God would rest from creative activity (cf. Ex 20:11; 31:17). 3. The seventh day was set apart to be hallowed and honored through the years as a reminder that God had appointed a season of rest, refreshment, and complete cessation of all ordinary work, toil, and struggle.

4. These are the generations (tôlᵉdôt). The Hebrew word comes from a verb meaning to beget or bear children. It could be translated "begettings." This statement may be a reference to Genesis 1. The LXX translates: This is the Book of the Genesis. Some would translate it, The history of the heavens and the earth. The offspring of heaven and earth were thus pictured.

Jehovah, the Lord God. For the first time, the name Yahweh, or Jehovah (cf. Ex 6:2,3) is presented. Jehovah is the personal covenant God of Israel, who is at the same time the God of heaven and earth. The name connotes the eternal self-existence of the Author of all existence. It is expressive of God's loving-kindness, his grace, his mercy, his lordship, and his eternal relationship to his own chosen ones who are created in his image. Jehovah's special relationship to Israel would be described more distinctly when he would appear at the burning bush near Sinai. Here the Author of life is identified with the divine Creator of Genesis 1.

6. A mist used to go up . . . and water. In order to prepare the ground to perform its appointed work, the Creator supplied moisture. The usual translation refers to a very slight drizzle of rain, or a mist. It is possible that the word translated mist in the AV ('ēd) could be translated "river" or "stream." The former is to be preferred. In any event, the mist was God's way of working out his will for the soil. Continuous action is expressed.

7. The Lord God formed (yāṣār) man of the dust of the ground. Again the two names for God are joined in anticipation of the epoch-making event. The word yāṣār is used to give the figure of a potter at work, molding with his hands the plastic material he holds (cf. Jer 18:3,4). The same verb is used to picture the shaping of a people or a nation. Man's body was fashioned from the dust of the ground, while his spirit came from the very "breath" of God. He is literally a creature of two worlds; both earth and heaven can claim him. Notice the three statements: Jehovah formed (yāṣār) man of the dust . . . Jehovah God breathed (nāpaḥ) into his nostrils the breath of life . . . man became (hāyāh) a living soul. The first step was exceedingly important, but the moistened dust was far from being a man until the second miracle was complete. God communicated his own life to that inert mass of substance he had previously created and molded into form. The divine breath permeated the material and transformed it into a living being. That strange combination of dust and deity produced a marvelous creation (cf. I Cor 15:47-49), made in God's own image. As a living being, man was destined to reveal the qualities of the Giver of life.

This language of Scripture does not suggest that man bore physical resemblance to God. Rather, he was made like God in spiritual powers. To him were given the powers to think and feel, to communicate with others, to discern and discriminate, and, to a certain extent, to determine his own character.

8. A garden (gan) . . . in Eden (b^{e} 'ēden). The author represents God as planting a beautiful garden for his new creatures. The word means an enclosure or a park. The LXX here uses a term that forms the basis for our word "paradise." Man's work in that garden was to exercise dominion while serving – a good combination. The duties probably were rigorous but enjoyable. Eden, or the land of Eden, probably lay in the lower part of the Babylonian valley. Though many rival claims for the location of Eden have been advanced, the evidence seems to point to the area between the Tigris and the Euphrates as the cradle of civilization. The Hebrew word Eden probably means "enchantment," "pleasure," or "delight." In this quiet place of indescribable beauty, man was to enjoy fellowship and companionship with the Creator, and to work in accord with the divine blueprint to perfect His will. Magnificent trees furnished sustaining food, but man had to work to care for them. Adequate water supply was ensured by a vast irrigation system, a network of rivers that flowed in and about the garden with its life-giving waters. In order to lead man to full moral and spiritual development, God gave him specific commands and a specific prohibition to govern his behavior. He also gave him the power of choice and set before him the privilege of growing in divine favor. Thus began the moral discipline of man.

18. An help meet for him ('ēzer k^{e}negdô). The inspired author indirectly reveals man's natural loneliness and lack of full satisfaction. Though much had been done for him, yet he was conscious of a lack. The Creator had not finished. He had plans for providing a companion who would satisfy the unfulfilled yearnings of man's heart. Created for fellowship and companionship, man could enter into the full life only as he might share love, trust, and devotion in the intimate circle of the family relationship. Jehovah made it possible for man to have an help meet for him. Literally, a help answering to him, or, one who answers. She was to be one who could share man's responsibilities, respond to his nature with understanding and love, and wholeheartedly co-operate with him in working out the plan of God.

21. Deep sleep (tardēmâ) . . . made her (bānâ). Today physicians use various anaesthetics to produce deep sleep. We do not know what means or method the Creator used to induce in Adam such deep sleep that he was unconscious of the events. That remains a mystery. Certainly divine mercy was displayed in this miracle. The Eternal was bringing into being not only another individual, but a new one, totally different, with another sex. Someone has said that "woman was taken not from man's head to rule over him, nor from his feet to be trampled upon, but from his side, under his arm, to be protected, and closest his heart, to be loved." She is also represented in the story of creation as wholly dependent upon her husband and not complete without him. Similarly, man is never fully complete without the woman. It is God's will that it should be so. Since woman was formed from man's side, she is bound to him and obligated to be a help to him. He is obligated to give her the full protection and devoted shielding of his arm. The two beings make up the completed whole, the crown of creation. The author of Genesis declares that God builded (bānâ) the rib which he had taken from man into a woman. The hand that had molded clay into the material for the body of man took a part of the living body of man and builded it into the woman.

22. Brought her unto the man. When God was ready with this new creation, he "gave her away" in marriage to her husband, thus establishing the eternally significant institution of marriage. As the Creator instituted marriage, it was a sacred relationship of man and woman, with deep mystery at its center proclaiming its divine origin. The loving heart of God doubtless rejoiced in the institution of a relationship that was to be high, clean, holy, and pleasant for mankind.

23. This is now . . . flesh of my flesh. The man recognized in this new creation a divinely created companion who was fashioned to provide all that his hungry heart would need to carry out God's holy will. Woman ('ishshâ) . . . man ('ish). These two Hebrew words are much alike, even in sound. The only difference between them is that the word for "woman" has a feminine ending. More recent lexicons declare that these words are not etymologically related. There is, however, no actual ground for rejecting the earlier view that the word for "woman" is derived from the word for "man."

24. Therefore doth a man . . . cleave (dābaq) unto his wife. The Creator had established the full basis for monogamous marriage. The great Hebrew commentator, Rashi, declares that these words are a specific comment by the Holy Spirit. The final commentary on the union of man and wife was given by our Lord, when he said: "For this cause shall a man leave his father and mother, and cleave to his wife; And they twain shall be one flesh: so then they are no more twain, but one flesh. What therefore God hath joined together, let not man put asunder" (Mk 10:7-9). God planned that the marriage bond should be forever indissoluble. Cleave (dābaq) means to "glue himself to" his wife (his own wife). The word for "wife" is singular. The man, who is stronger, is the one who is to cleave. The wife will be held when the husband exerts the kind of loving power described in this verse. Love is strong and enduring. "What God hath joined together, let not man put asunder." This is an old statement, but it is truly God's word for all our hearts today, and always.

How remarkable it is that a relationship so accurately described centuries ago by Moses should still be rooted in eternal truth and divine decree! The sacredness of marriage is founded in the very heart of the Scriptures, and eternally underlined as basic by the Holy Spirit. God willed that the beings he created in his image should be his chosen vessels to build a home pleasing to him. In the NT the Spirit reveals: the divinely ordained relationship of man and woman, based on the order of creation; the headship of the family resident in the husband; the eternal sacredness of the marriage vow; the kind of love that should unite husband and wife; and the purity that should characterize those who typify the Bride for whom Christ gave his life.

B. The Temptation and Fall. 3:1-24. The author of Genesis here lists the steps leading to the entrance of sin into the hearts of these divinely created individuals, who had started life with such clean hearts and so much promise. Disobedience and sin becloud the picture. Though these beings were morally upright, they had been given the power of choice; and they were subject to the power of the tempter at any moment. Hence the test was inevitable. The garden was an exquisite creation, filled with plenteous provisions. Man's environment left nothing to be desired. One prohibition, however, had been placed upon the man and woman. Every tree, shrub, and delicacy could be theirs, except the fruit of the "tree of the knowledge of good and evil." This prohibition seems to have produced the atmosphere in which human minds welcome the appeal of the tempter.

1. The serpent (nāḥāsh). The narrative presents the seducer as one of the animals, which was much more subtil than the others. The Hebrew word contains the idea of exceptional shrewdness. (Rabbinic legend has it that the serpent walked erect.) He had the power of speech and talked freely with his victim. He was wily, insidious, crafty. Later exegesis will identify the serpent with Satan or the devil. In the light of later Scripture truths, we are justified in concluding that the serpent was a specially chosen instrument of Satan for this test. In Rev 12:9 the tempter is called "the great dragon . . . that old serpent, called the Devil and Satan" (cf. Milton, Paradise Lost, Book IX). The word nāḥāsh, meaning to make a hissing sound, undoubtedly refers to the kind of being known to us as a serpent. Paul declares that Satan fashions himself into "an angel of light" (II Cor 11:14). He chose the craftiest, the most subtle, the most cautious of the animals and took full control of him for his disastrous work. Jesus said of Satan: "He is a liar, and the father thereof" (Jn 8:44, ASV; cf. Rom 16:20; II Cor 11:3; I Tim 2:14; Rev 20:2).

The method of deceit the serpent employed with Eve was to distort the meaning of God's prohibition and then hold it up to ridicule in its new form. The tempter feigned surprise that God should be guilty of issuing such a command. Then he sought to break down the woman's faith by sowing in her mind doubts, suspicions, and false pictures of the Almighty and his motives. It was a deliberate attempt to reflect on God. When faith fails, the sure foundation of moral conduct collapses. It is only a small step from unbelief to sin and disgrace.

2,3. The woman said. To parley with the tempter is always dangerous. Unconsciously, the woman was revealing a willingness to come to terms with the tempter. She did not have the advantage of Jesus' words in Mt 4:10 and James' admonition in Jas 4:7. She was innocent, guileless, and unsuspecting, and no match for the wily antagonist. She was unwilling to stand by and see God misrepresented, and so she courageously attempted to correct the serpent's statement. But she quoted God's prohibition inaccurately, adding the word touch.

5. Ye shall be as God (AV, gods). Now that Eve had entered into the conversation, the seducer advanced his more powerful argument. He quickly suggested that man's great desire to be on a par with and truly like God had been deliberately thwarted by divine command. He charged the Creator with selfishness and with a malicious falsehood, representing him as envious and unwilling for his creatures to have something that would make them like the omniscient One. (The word 'Elōhîm can be translated God or gods, since it is plural. The former is preferred.)

6. The woman saw . . . took . . . did eat . . . gave. The strong verbs tell the story vividly and clearly. Something happened in the thinking of the woman. Gradually the fruit took on new significance. It was attractive to the eye, desirable to the taste, and powerful to give new wisdom. She took a new step into the field of self-deception. She not only wanted food that was delicious and attractive, but she was desirous of power. She believed this fruit would satisfy all her desires. The next step was automatic and immediate. She took . . . and did eat. The tempter was not needed after that moment. Eve took up his work and presented the well-recommended fruit to her husband, and he did eat.

7. The eyes . . . were opened (pākaḥ) . . . they knew. The word pākaḥ pictures a sudden miracle. The promise of the tempter was fulfilled quickly; instant perception was given. They saw and knew. But what they saw was far different from the rosy picture painted by the serpent. Conscience was rudely awakened. They saw their nakedness, spiritual as well as physical. And then shame and fear were born. When Adam and Eve realized that they were out of touch with God, a terrible loneliness overwhelmed them. Remorse and its inevitable miseries followed. Their loss of faith had subjected them to all these attendant woes. They hastily made aprons or girdles to provide some measure of concealment as they sought a remedy for their bewilderment, loneliness, and guilt.

8. The voice of the Lord God . . . in the cool of the day. (Kol, "voice," is, lit., sound; l'rûah, "cool," is wind or breeze.) They might hide from God, but they could not escape him. The loving Creator could not overlook their disobedience, nor could he leave quivering sinners in their poignant need. They were his own. His holiness must come, clothed with love, to seek, find, and judge them. Ordinarily, the approach of God's footsteps brought them joy. Now, terror and dread paralyzed them, though the Lord did not approach in thunder nor call harshly. 9. It is easy to imagine the sweetness of the divine voice, as it sounded forth through the trees in the stillness of the evening, calling, "Where art thou?" Of course God knew where the man and woman were. But he was appealing to them, seeking through tenderness and love to win a favorable response. And he was seeking to lead the transgressors gently to a full conviction of their sin. Though Justice was dictating the procedure, Mercy was leading. The Judge would render the decision and pronounce the sentence.

12. The woman . . . gave me of the tree, and I ate. God's questions were direct and unusually specific. Instead of making full confession and pleading for mercy, Adam and Eve began to offer excuses and pass the responsibility on to another. The man somewhat recklessly threw a part of the blame back on God—whom thou gavest . . . me. 13. The woman, refusing to take responsibility, cast it all on the serpent. The serpent had no way of passing it on. Beguile[d] (hish-shîanî). The verb conveys the idea of deception (cf. Paul's use of this concept in II Cor 11:3; I Tim 2:14).

14. Cursed ('ārûr) art thou. The Lord singled out the originator and instigator of the temptation for special condemnation and degradation. From that moment he must crawl in the dust and even feed on it. He would slither his way along in disgrace, and hatred would be directed against him from all directions. Man would always regard him as a symbol of the degradation of the one who had slandered God (cf. Isa 65:25). He was to represent not merely the serpent race, but the power of the evil kingdom. As long as life continued, men would hate him and seek to destroy him.

15. I will put enmity. The word 'êbâ denotes the blood-feud that runs deepest in the heart of man (cf. Num 35:19,20; Ezk 25:15-17; 35:5,6). Thou shalt bruise (shûp). A prophecy of a continuing struggle between the descendants of woman and of the serpent to destroy each other. The verb shûp is rare (cf. Job 9:17; Ps 139:11). It is the same in both clauses. When translated crush, it seems appropriate to the reference concerning the head of the serpent, but not quite so accurate in describing the attack of the serpent on man's heel. It is also rendered lie in wait for, aim at, or (LXX) watch for. The Vulgate renders it conteret, "bruise," in the first instance and insidiaberis, "lie in wait," in the other clause. Thus, we have in this famous passage, called the protevangelium, "first gospel," the announcement of a prolonged struggle, perpetual antagonism, wounds on both sides, and eventual victory for the seed of woman. God's promise that the head of the serpent was to be crushed pointed forward to the coming of Messiah and guaranteed victory. This assurance fell upon the ears of God's earliest creatures as a blessed hope of redemption. An unfortunate translation in the Vulgate changes the pronoun his (v. 15c) from the masculine to the feminine, providing spurious support for unfounded claims concerning "the Blessed Virgin Mary."

16. Unto the woman he said. For the woman, God predicted subjection to the man, and suffering. Pregnancy and childbirth would be attended by pain. The word 'asvon pictures both mental and physical pain. Eve would realize her womanly longings and desires, but not without agony. In other words, as wife and mother, she was to be subject to the discipline of Jehovah. Woman's love and man's lordship are both presented in the vivid description. We cannot fully comprehend the nature of such judgments of the Lord.

17. Unto Adam he said. Physical hardship, painful toil, disappointing vexations, and hard struggle were appointed as the lot of the man, who was definitely adjudged a guilty sinner. Formerly the earth had yielded its produce easily and freely to man, in great abundance. Adam had only to "dress" the garden (2:15) in order to enjoy its luscious fruits. But now God pronounced a special curse on the ground. Henceforth it would yield its grains and fruits reluctantly. Man would have to work hard cultivating the soil to make it produce life's necessities. And he would have to wrestle with troublesome thorns and weeds not previously in evidence. Drudgery, difficulties, and weariness would be his daily lot. For Adam, as well as for Eve, sin exacted a heavy toll.

20. Eve (hawwâ). The Hebrew word has to do with life, and the verb to which it is related speaks of living. All life originated with the first woman. She was the mother of each person and, therefore, the mother of each clan and people. In accordance with the divine purpose, life must go on, even though the pronouncement of death had been spoken — unto the dust thou shalt return (v. 19).

22-24a. So he drove out (gārash) the man. A necessary and merciful act. The Lord could not allow rebellious man access to the tree of life. With loving care he kept Adam and Eve away from the fruit that would make them immortal and thus perpetuate the terrible condition into which sin had brought them. From the lovely garden he drove them out into an unfriendly wilderness.

24b. Cherubims, and a flaming sword (AV). The Hebrew interpreter, Rashi, claimed that these instruments were "angels of destruction," designed to destroy anyone who sought entrance. Hebrew kerubim indicates divinely formed figures that serve as bearers of the deity or as special guardians of sacred things. In one instance they are shown upholding the throne on which God sits. In another, they are used to describe the dread unapproachability of Jehovah. In general, their function seems to be to guard the sacred habitation of God from encroachment or defilement. The tree of life was perfectly safe with the cherubim standing guard at the gate. And sinful man was safe from the harm that could have come to him had he not had the majestic protector. 24c. The flame of a whirling sword (mithhapeket). The way back into Eden was guarded not only by the cherubim but also by a revolving sword-like flame. This gave further assurance that man would not make his way to the tree of life. Though man's paradise was closed to him because he had become a sinner, Jehovah did not forget his creatures. He had already made provision for their triumphant return.

C. The Two Brothers. 4:1-26.

1. Cain (Qayin). The word Cain is usually associated with the Hebrew word qānâ, "to acquire" or "to get." The derivation is based on the resemblance of sound, rather than on basic etymology. It might be called a play on words. The actual meaning of the word possibly came through the Arabic ("a lance" or "a smith"). Eve was overjoyed at the birth of her son. She exclaimed, "I have gotten a man." 2. Abel (Hebel). The name given to the second son indicates "a fleeting breath" or "a vapor." The cognate Accadian word aplu means son. Abel was the originator of pastoral life, while Cain followed his father in the pursuit of agriculture.

3,4. An offering (minḥâ). Each man brought a special present or gift to Jehovah. No mention is made of the altar or of the place of the religious observance. The minḥâ, as the ancients knew it, served to express gratitude, to effect reconciliation with the Lord, and to accompany worship. This account pictures the first act of worship recorded in human history. In each case the worshiper brought something of his own as an oblation to the Lord.

5a. The Lord had respect (shā'â). The gift brought by Cain was not received by the Lord. No reason is given here for the rejection. And the Scripture does not tell us how God indicated his disapproval. It may be that fire fell from heaven and consumed the accepted offering but left the other untouched. Some have thought that Cain's offering was rejected because Cain failed to perform the proper ritual. Others have advanced the idea that the nature of the gifts made the difference – the one being flesh and involving death and bloodshed, the other being vegetable, without bloodshed (cf. Heb 9:22). The author of the Epistle to the Hebrews gives us the inspired explanation of the difference between the offerings: "By faith Abel offered unto God a more excellent sacrifice than Cain . . . God bearing witness in respect of his gifts" (Heb 11:4). This explanation centers upon the difference in spirit manifested by the two men. Because Abel was a man of faith, he came in the right spirit and presented worship that pleased God. We have reason to believe that Abel had some realization of his need for substitutionary atonement. To all appearances both offerings expressed gratitude, thanksgiving, and devotion to God. But the man who lacked genuine faith in his heart could not please God even though the material gift was spotless. God did not look upon Cain because He had already looked at him and seen what was in his heart. Abel came to God in the right attitude of heart for worship and in the only way sinful men can approach a holy God. Cain did not.

5b. Cain's unbridled anger showed itself instantly. Furious wrath blazed out, revealing the spirit that was lodged within the heart. Cain became an enemy of God and hostile to his brother. Thus, wounded pride produced envy and a spirit of revenge. And these brought forth the burning hatred and violence that made murder possible. 6,7a. Countenance fallen . . . . a lifting up. The heat that blazed within him caused his countenance to "fall." It brought on brooding and an unlovely, morose spirit. Gently and patiently God dealt with Cain, seeking to save the rebellious sinner. He assured him that if he would sincerely repent, he might again lift up his face in happiness and reconciliation. Nāsā, "lift up," lends itself to the idea of forgiveness. The merciful Jehovah thus held out to Cain the hope of forgiveness and victory as he faced his momentous decision.

7b. Sin (ḥatt'at) coucheth (rābaṣ). Close upon that heartening promise, Jehovah uttered a stiff warning, urging the sinner to control his temper and beware lest a crouching beast (sin) spring upon him and devour him. The danger was real. The deadly beast was even at that moment ready to overpower him. God's word demanded instant action and strong effort to repulse the would-be conqueror. Cain must not let these boiling thoughts and impulses drive him to ruinous behavior. God made his strong appeal to Cain's will. The will had to be thrown into the struggle to make victory over sin (ḥatt'at) complete. It was up to Cain to conquer sin in himself, to control rather than be controlled. The moment of destiny was upon him. It was not too late for him to choose the way of God.

9. Where is Abel thy brother? Failing to gain the mastery over the savage monster, Cain soon found himself at the mercy of a force that controlled him completely. Almost immediately one son became a murderer and the other a martyr. Jehovah came quickly to confront the murderer with a question. Seemingly he hoped to elicit a confession of guilt that could prepare the way for mercy and full pardon. Though Cain had willfully sinned, he found himself pursued by a loving God, rich in grace. Am I my brother's keeper? (shōmēr) A shameful response to a question from a loving Father! Petulantly, defiantly, Cain made his reply. Sin already had him in the grip of a vise. He renounced the clamant rights of brotherhood. He rufused to show respect to the eternal God. He brazenly leaned back on his own selfish defiance and spoke that which no one should dare to utter.

10. The voice (qôl) of the bloods of thy brother are crying (sō'qîm) unto me from the ground. Blood spilled by a murderer, though covered by earth, was crying out to God. Jehovah could hear it, and he understood the meaning of the cry, for he knew of Cain's guilt. How plaintively those bloods were crying out for vengeance! The author of Hebrews refers to this experience in the phrase, "the blood of sprinkling that speaketh better things than that of Abel" (12:24).

12. A fugitive (nā') and a wanderer (nād). The curse pronounced on the murderer involved banishment from food-producing soil to the unproductive desert. The ground, God said, would be hostile to the murderer, so that he could not derive sustenance from tilling the soil. In his search for subsistence, he would become a Bedouin of the waste lands, wandering about in weariness and despair. Insecurity, restlessness, hard struggle, guilt, and fears, were to be his constant "companions." The word for fugitive carries the idea of tottering, staggering, stumbling uncertainly along in a fruitless search for satisfaction. It was a dismal, discouraging prospect.

13. My punishment ('ăwōn). Though Cain's life was spared, he trembled under the weight of his sin, his guilt, his punishment, and the unending consequences that loomed before him. The Hebrew word 'ăwōn literally refers to his iniquity, but it also contains the thought of the consequences of his sin. Cain was far more concerned with his sentence than with his sin. Greater than I can bear. His bitter cry to God called attention to the unbearable weight of his punishment. It was heavier than he could lift and carry. The Hebrew word nāsa carries the ideas of "taking away" (forgiveness) and "lifting up" (expiation). Again, it seems clear that the frightened murderer was thinking of the punishment about to come upon him.

14b. Every one . . . shall slay me. Dread and despondency began to overwhelm the sinful man as he thought of the perils of the desert. He imagined that cruel foes would delight to kill him. He could feel the hot breath of the avenger on his neck. His active conscience was already at work. In his fear, he was sure that certain destruction awaited him, for he felt that he would be completely outside the circle of God's care. 15. A sign ('ôt) for Cain. But Jehovah, in mercy, assured Cain of his continuing presence and unending protection. He set a sign on him—evidently a mark or designation to indicate that Cain belonged to the Lord God and must be spared bodily harm. There is no evidence that the 'mark of Cain' was a sign to announce to the world that he was a murderer. It was, rather, a special mark of loving care and protection. Cain would continue always in the safekeeping of the covenant God. Though a murderer, he was the recipient of God's favor.

16. Land of Nod (nôd). Literally, land of wandering or flight (cf. 4:12,14).

There is no way to locate this area geographically except to speak of it as being east of Eden. Cain was but fulfilling the prediction God made concerning his future existence. Pathetically and stoically he set out into the trackless wastes. The ideas of "flight" and "misery" are discernible in the Hebrew word for went out.

17. His wife ('ishtô). The Book of Genesis does not answer the oft-repeated question: Where did Cain get his wife? It does make it clear that many other sons and daughters were born to Adam and Eve. It also presents the lapse of many years (maybe hundreds of years) before Cain's marriage experience. Since all life came from the first divinely created human pair, it is necessary to conclude that at some time brothers and sisters were married to each other. By the time Cain was ready to set up a home, Adam and Eve had numerous descendants. It is not at all necessary to imagine another race of people already well established in the world. Cain's wife was one of the family of Adam and Eve.

25. Seth (Shēt). The divine narrative has preserved the name Seth as that of the third son in Adam's line. The Hebrew word shows marked similarity to the word shāt, translated "appointed" or "set." In reality, Seth became the one on whom God could depend as the foundation stone for His family. He was "set" or "appointed" to take up the work and mission of Abel. Cain had forfeited his right to carry forward God's sublime hope. Seth would take the burden and the privilege upon his shoulders. Through his line God would perfect His promises.

26. Began to call upon the name of Jehovah. It was a never-to-be-forgotten experience when, under the encouragement of Enosh (or Enos), men began to call upon (or with) the name of Jehovah, the covenant God. Enosh, who was prominent in the line of Seth, was the originator of public prayer and spiritual worship. In it, the ineffable name of the eternal God was used. There was hope for a better day through Seth's descendants.

D. Seth and His Descendants. 5:1-32.

22. Enoch (Ḥănôk) walked with God. Into a narrative of birth and dreary existence and eventual death, the author suddenly introduces a sublime character, Enoch, who pleased the Lord and lived in his immediate presence. In a deteriorating age, Enoch gave a remarkable demonstration of commendable piety. In thought, word, deed, and attitude he was in accord with the divine will; and he brought joy to the heart of his Maker. The LXX says regarding him: "Enoch was well-pleasing unto God." One striking statement reveals a hint of the beginning of Enoch's walk with God (cf. 22a). It may have been at the moment of the birth of his baby boy, doubtless a high moment in his life, that he set his heart on intimate communion with his God. His close association in such atmosphere brought him heavenly wisdom, which fitted him to understand and appreciate the rich things of God.

24. He was not; for God took him. On account of his genuine piety and his apprehension of divine wisdom, he was lifted from the earth to continue his walk in the sacred regions beyond. His disappearance was sudden and wholly unannounced, and death had nothing to do with it. The LXX says: He was not found, for God translated him. "By faith Enoch was translated," says the writer of Hebrews, "that he should not see death, and he was not found, because God had translated him" (Heb 11:5). A beautiful and meaningful miracle was wrought so that the one man who had learned to love God and walk with him might continue in that fellowship without interruption.

E. Sin and the Flood. 6:1 – 8:22.

6:2. The sons of God (bᵉnê 'Elōhîm) . . . daughters of men. Wickedness was increasing on every hand. Cain's descendants became exceedingly godless and pagan. A powerful race of giants, called "Nephilim," came into prominence. The verb nāpal, "to fall," has been considered the source of the noun, and so these gigantic creatures have been thought of as "fallen ones." The reference to the bᵉnê 'Elōhîm has occasioned marked differences of opinion among scholars. 'Elōhîm is plural in form. It is usually translated "God." But it can be translated "gods," as, for instance, when it refers to the gods of the heathen neighbors of Israel. It can, also, denote the heavenly circle of beings in close fellowship with Jehovah, residents of heaven, assigned specific duties as God's assistants (see Job 1:6). In some cases in Scripture "sons of God" may be identified with "angels" or "messengers." Jesus is the Son of God in a unique sense. Believers are called "sons of God" because of their relationship to him. In the OT, however, "sons of God" are a special class of beings that make up the heavenly court.

The reference to the marriages of bᵉnê 'Elōhîm to the daughters of men has been dealt with in many ways. To translate it literally would make the passage say that members of the heavenly company selected choice women from the earth and set up marriage relationships with them, literally and actually. This can be the only interpretation of Job 1:6. There, the bᵉnê 'Elōhîm were plainly the members of God's heavenly court. S. R. Driver maintains that this is the only legitimate and correct sense that can be accepted. Jesus' reply to the Sadducees, in Mt 22:30, seems to make this view untenable. He said that the angels "neither marry nor are given in marriage." The statement in Gen 6:2 makes it clear that permanent marriage is described. Women were chosen and forced to become parties to the unnatural relationship. Bible students who have rejected this solution have resorted to other explanations. Some have said that a union of Seth's godly line with Cain's godless descendants is described. Still others hold that these words refer to marriage between persons of the upper class of society and those of a lower or less worthy class. In the light of the facts and the accurate rendering of the words of the text, we conclude that some men of the heavenly group (angels or messengers) actually took wives of the earthly women. They used superior force to overpower them, to make the conquest complete. The "sons of God" were irresistible (cf. II Pet 2:4; Jude 6).

3. My spirit (rûaḥ) shall not always strive (yādôn) with (or act in) man. This Hebrew verb may be translated either strive with or abide in. The first translation would represent God as continually using force on rebellious man to hold him in line and to keep him from utter destruction as a result of his sinful behavior. The second view would represent God as determined to withdraw the vital breath of life from man, with the result, of course, that death would ensue. The Hebrew word dûn (or dîn) indicates life expressing itself in action or in evidences of power.

In the first interpretation, the spirit (rûaḥ) is considered an ethical principle used to restrain or to control the created one, the result being ethical behavior. In the other, the spirit (rûaḥ) is considered a vital principle given to the inanimate bit of clay to provide life, motivation, and power for living. When that rûaḥ is withdrawn by the divine hand, judgment is complete. This divine announcement came from Jehovah when he found his creatures dominated by sin. It is God's declaration that he must abandon man to the doom of death. Sin had set in motion that which would guarantee death.

5,6. Wickedness (rāʿāt) . . . repented (nāḥam) . . . grieved ('āṣāb). The depravity was widespread. And it was inward, continual, and habitual. Man was utterly corrupt, bad in heart and in conduct. There was no good in him. The whole bent of his thoughts and imaginations was completely out of line with the will of Jehovah. Flesh was on the throne. God was forgotten or openly defied. Nāḥam in the niphal form describes the love of God that has suffered heart-rending disappointment. Literally, it speaks of taking a deep breath in extreme pain. God's purposes and plans had failed to produce the precious fruit that he had anticipated, because sinful man had prevented their full fruition. 'Āṣāb in the hithpael form means to pierce oneself or to experience piercing. The statement says, then, that God experienced heart-piercing sorrow as he looked upon the tragic devastation sin had produced. His handiwork had been marred and ruined. Through it all, God's love shone clearly, even when the rumblings of divine judgment began to threaten the people of the earth.

7. Blot out (maḥâ; AV, destroy). The verb indicates a movement that wipes clean or blots out completely. The operation was designed to destroy every living thing that stood in the way. Full destruction was to be executed. Nothing was to be spared. 8. But Noah found grace (ḥēn). One man of all the countless multitudes then on the earth was fit to receive God's gift of grace. The word grace certainly means "favor" or "acceptance," at least, and probably has a much richer meaning. It was love and mercy in action. God's extending grace to Noah signified that there was new life and new hope for mankind in the days ahead.

9. Noah was a righteous man and perfect . . . and Noah walked with God. With these words the author describes three characteristics of a godly life—justice, purity, and holiness (cf. 6:8–he found grace in the eyes of the Lord).

The word righteous, from Hebrew ṣăddîq, describes Noah's character as it manifested itself in relation to other human beings. "Straightness" or "uprightness" was evident in his behavior. All his conduct revealed this moral and ethical righteousness (cf. Ezk 14:14,20). Hebrew tāmîm, perfect, describes the perfected product of a wise builder; it is full, complete, and flawless. Viewed objectively, the word blameless describes character. In the realm of ethics, the idea of "integrity" comes out as the derived meaning (cf. Job 1:1). The statement, he walked with God, opens another area of thought. In walking with God, Noah had displayed a spirit, an attitude, and a character that made him accepted and approved for the most intimate spiritual relationship. He manifested qualities of soul that endeared him to the Lord (cf. Gen 5:22; Mic 6:8; Mal 2:6).

14-16. An ark (tēbâ). The English word ark came down through the Latin arca, "a chest or coffer." The word for the "ark" of the covenant is a different word – 'ārôn. Tēbâ is probably of Egyptian origin. Noah's ark was very likely a kind of large covered raft built of light resinous wood. With its three floors, it reached up to a total of forty-five feet in height. It was four hundred and fifty feet long and seventy-five feet wide. (The cubit was equal to eighteen inches.) Cells, nests, or small rooms, were built along the sides of the three floors. To make the craft watertight, a powerful pitch, or bitumen, was used inside and outside, as a calking compound. The Hebrew word sōhar can best be translated a light or window. This was approximately eighteen inches in height and extended completely around the ark; it admitted light and air.

17-22. Flood (măbbûl). This word has no Hebrew etymology. It was used only of the deluge of Noah. It may have come from Assyrian nabalu, "to destroy." According to the author of Genesis, God's purpose was certainly to bring to an end the living things of his creation. During the 120 years while Noah was completing his work, he was preaching to the people in an urgent effort to cause them to repent. They saw the ark take shape before their eyes while the preacher delivered his sermons. Noah's immediate family, including his wife, his three sons, and their wives, accompanied him into the haven of safety. In obedience to God's command, they took with them representative pairs of all the animals of the earth.

7:11a,b. The fountains of the great deep [were] broken up (bāqa'). Enormous reservoirs of water were stored under the earth. This mighty collection of waters was called t'hôm, "the great deep" (cf. Gen 1:2). These subterranean waters, confined by creative power on the second day of creation, were unleashed to pour forth in volume and in violence defying description. It was not an ordinary flood, but a giant tidal wave that broke suddenly upon a startled populace. Bāqa' indicates a terrestrial convulsion that split asunder every restraining barrier that had existed. It was a tumultuous breaking loose of indescribable destruction. Man cannot imagine the fury and the destructive might of the eruption, nor the awfulness of the display of God's power to destroy sinful beings. The complete corruption of men was far worse than any of us can imagine. The destruction was necessary.

11c,12. The windows of the heavens were opened (pātaḥ). In addition to the terrific upheaval from below, the peoples of the earth witnessed the opening of the gates of the mighty reservoirs of waters above the earth. All the stored-up waters burst forth in torrents. Resistlessly and continuously for forty days and forty nights, the gigantic cloudburst poured down upon the earth. The effect of the deluge on men, women, children, animals, and plants, and the earth's surface cannot be completely imagined.

16-18. The Lord shut him in (sāgar) . . . . And the waters prevailed (gābar). In the midst of the raging storm and the flooding torrents, Jehovah, the covenant God, reached out a hand of mercy and shut the door of the ark to keep his people safe. But he poured forth torrents of water to destroy utterly the sinners on earth. The inhabitants of the floating house could ride the waters with a sense of security and safekeeping, for they trusted God. The divine hand that had broken up the deep and opened the windows of the heavens to pour out destruction had also demonstrated God's loving concern for those who were to be the nucleus for his new beginning.

While God's chosen ones nestled safely in the ark, the waters continued to increase and to take over the earth. The verb gābar indicates mastery, subjection, and prevailing power. Relentlessly the waters took control and continued to be in command until the high mountains were completely submerged. Again, the majesty, might, and compelling purpose of the Almighty became increasingly apparent. The divine purpose was being worked out in all the earth. God's will was being accomplished.

8:4. The mountains of Ararat. After 150 days, the ark came to rest upon one of the peaks of the high ranges in Armenia. Urartu, Accadian cognate of Ararat, is used in ancient documents to designate Armenia. The mountain now called Ararat towers to the height of 16, 916 feet.

The Babylonian flood story, a part of the Gilgamesh Epic, relates how its hero, like the Biblical Noah, built an ark, brought into it specimens of the animal kingdom, and, after the flood landed on Mount Nisir east of the Tigris River.

20. Noah builded an altar (mīzbēaḥ) to Jehovah. As Noah moved out into the bright new day, the most natural thing for him to do was to find a high spot of ground and build a mīzbēaḥ It was the first altar built on the cleansed earth. Noah recognized the end of the tragic judgment and the dawning of a new day of hope and promise. Building the altar was his move to pour out to Jehovah praise and thanksgiving.

He offered up burnt offerings ('ōlâ). The word for burnt offerings is derived from the verb 'ālāh, "to go up." The suggestion here is that, as the sacrifice was consumed, the fumes went upward to God, bearing, in a sense, the gratitude and worship of the offerer. It was a truly propitiatory sacrifice (cf. II Sam 24:25), offered in sincere worship, out of deep thankfulness. And so the eternal God was pleased. Noah had found favor in his eyes.

F. Noah's Later Life, and His Descendants. 9:1—10:32.

9:9-15. I established (mēqîm) my covenant . . . . I do set (nātan) my bow in the clouds. In solemn manner Jehovah confirmed the covenant promises he had already given. The forming of a covenant involves the solemn binding together of two parties, hitherto free from obligation to each other. God's binding himself to this one family group was a voluntary act of free grace. Noah and his family had done nothing to merit the covenant relation, and God was not obligated to them. Furthermore, this was a covenant with all mankind. By accepting the terms and becoming obedient, man bound himself to his Creator to keep the divine terms and to observe their inner spirit.

The covenant needed to have an outward and visible sign or token as a constant reminder of the sacred agreement. This sign ('ôt) would be a pledge of the inner spiritual bond, guaranteeing its unending reliability. The Hebrew perfect tense can be translated I have set, or I now at this moment do set. The bow in the cloud was to be the "sign." God could have created the rainbow at that moment and invested it with this meaning. It is probable, however, that he pointed to the bow already in the cloud and indicated that it would now take on new meaning, giving assurance of his mercy and grace; it would be a visible reminder of his love. He said: I will remember (v. 15).

18. Shem, Ham, Japheth. The author of Genesis makes it clear that these three sons of Noah became the fathers of the three great families of mankind. Shem is named first as occupying the place of leadership and prominence in God's plans for the peoples. The Semites (Shemites) were to be the spiritual leaders of men. God's chosen ones of that line would teach the religion of Jehovah to the world. We know that the Messiah was to come from Shem's descendants. Japheth was to be the father of one large branch of the Gentile world. His descendants would scatter far and wide in their search for material gain and power. They would be prosperous and exceedingly powerful. Ham was to be the father of the other branch of Gentiles, including Egyptians, Ethiopians, Abyssinians, and kindred groups. His son, Canaan, became the father of the groups called Canaanites, the inhabitants of the land of Canaan, later dispossessed by the Hebrews. The curse pronounced upon Canaan by Noah was not, in any sense, designed as a proof text in slavery or segregation discussions.

10:4. Tarshish. The famed city in Spain to which the Phoenician traders went. Centuries later the prophet Jonah boarded a ship bound for that distant city. The Greeks called it Tartessus. 6. Mizraim. The correct Hebrew word for Egypt, comprising the lower and the upper divisions of that land. The two capitals of Egypt were Memphis and Thebes. 8,9. Nimrod. Son of Cush. He founded the early Babylonian empire and built the city of Nineveh. He was a mighty hunter and a remarkable leader of armies. His power extended over the cities of Mesopotamia. 11,12. Nineveh. Known as early as 2800 B.C., it was the center of the powerful Assyrian kingdom, which attained its height under Sennacherib, Esarhaddon, and Ashurbanipal. It was situated on the Tigris River, about 250 miles from the city of Babylon. It was against this stronghold that Jonah and Nahum directed their prophecies.

14. The Philistines (cf. AV Philistim) are credited with having given their name to the land of "Palestine." Amos and Jeremiah refer to them as coming from Caphtor. Their five principal cities were Ashdod, Ashkelon, Gaza, Gath, and Ekron. The Philistines continued for centuries to be a thorn in the flesh of the Israelites. 15. Heth. Ancestor of the Hittites, whose great empire held sway from 1600–700 B.C. The principal cities of the Hittites were Carchemish on the Euphrates and Kadesh on the Orontes. These people settled in the vicinity of Hebron, and witnessed Abraham's purchase of the Cave of Machpelah from Ephron (23:8-10). Esau married into the tribe. The Hittites found their way into the Assyrian and Egyptian inscriptions. Archaeologists have found valuable remains of the civilization of that powerful empire.

21. The children of Eber comprised many different groups among the sons of Shem. The name Eber has been associated with the word Hebrew, the name by which the Israelites were known by other peoples. They were the ones who possessed the knowledge of the true God. The term "Hebrew" is racial, while "Israelite" is national. In later days, these words were used as synonyms.

22. Aram, or the Aramean or Syrian people, made up the group around and within Damascus. They figured prominently in the history of the people of Israel. The Aramaic language became the language of trade and diplomatic relations. It gradually displaced the Hebrew language until, at the time of our Lord, Aramaic was the language of conversation and writing.

28. Sheba is often mentioned in the OT to denote a wealthy group of people whose principal work was to furnish gold, perfumes, and precious stones for export to Palestine and to Egypt. They are identified with the Sabaeans, who held a prominent place in trade and in governmental achievement. So far as Bible students are concerned, the queen of Sheba was the most famous of the people of Sheba.

29. Ophir was famed for its fine gold. Solomon sent his men along with Hiram's to extract it and to transport it to Palestine. In addition to gold, they found precious metals and gems in great abundance. Soon Solomon's kingdom rivaled all the surrounding lands in wealth. Ophir was probably a seaport on the coast of Arabia. It has been located as far away as the mouth of the Indus. Much of the gold overlay of the Temple of Solomon came from Ophir.

G. The Tower of Babel. 11:1-32.

1,2. The whole earth was of one language. Genesis pictures Noah and his sons coming forth from the ark having one language and one set of words. As the descendants of Noah multiplied, they naturally continued with that same language, since it was sufficient. They lived in and about the Euphrates valley, the locality usually regarded as the cradle of civilization. Shinar. The Hebrews used the name Shinar, originally a region in northern Mesopotamia, to designate the whole region of Mesopotamia. Migrating nomads moved along the mountains of Ararat to the well-watered plains of Babylonia.

3,4. Let us build us a city . . . a tower . . . and . . . make us a name. When Noah's eastward-moving descendants had found a spot where they could begin permanent headquarters, they decided to build a city. They would construct a gigantic tower so high that its top would pierce the "vault" above them. This great structure would give them the place of vantage by which they could establish their importance in the eyes of men, and even in God's sight.

The purpose of the undertaking was twofold. First, they wanted to assure themselves of the strength that comes from unity. The city and the tower would tie them into a solid group, so that they might be powerful—even without God's help. They said: Lest we be scattered. On the other hand, they were determined to make themselves renowned—make for ourselves a name. The sins of self-sufficiency and pride predominated in their thinking. They wanted to make sure that they would not be forgotten. The tower would hold them together and secure their names from oblivion. They defied God and set out to prove their self-sufficiency. Their towering structure would be a monument to their energy, daring, genius, and resources. Many towering cities, such as, Babylon, Sodom, Gomorrah, Sidon, Tyre, and Rome, have proved anything but godly structures. When men spurn God's law and grace, and exalt themselves, catastrophe inevitably falls upon them.

7-9. Confound their language. Jehovah understood the spirit, the motive, and the selfish plans of the rebellious people. Immediately he set out to upset their foolish schemes. The very thing they had sought to avoid came suddenly upon them. God directly intervened to see to it that no one understood the words of the others about him. And he scattered them far and wide. Hebrew bālal, "confound," indicates that there was a distinct disturbance that left the people greatly confused. The word Babel is translated Babylon. The best Hebrew lexicographers claim that it could not have come from the Hebrew bālal, to "confuse" or "mix," but that it meant "gate of God." Through a play on words it came to mean "confusion." The Aramaic word balbel means "confusion." Alan Richardson reminds us that the bestowal of the gift of tongues at Pentecost (Acts 2:5-11) can be thought of as the reverse of the confusion of tongues at Babel. He says: "When men in their pride boast of their own achievements, there results nothing but division, confusion, and incomprehensibility; but when the wonderful works of God are proclaimed, then every man may hear the apostolic gospel in his own tongue" (Genesis 1–11, p. 126).

27. Terah. Son of Nahor (a descendant of Seth) and the father of Abram, Haran, and Nahor. His early home was in Ur of the Chaldees, but he spent the later years of his life in Haran, where he died.

28. Ur of the Chaldees. An ancient city of the early Sumerian kingdom, located about 125 miles from the present mouth of the Euphrates, 100 miles southeast of Babylon, 830 miles from Damascus, and 550 miles from Haran. It was the capital of Sumer. In Abram's day it was a thriving commercial city, with unusually high cultural standards. The buildings of the temple area were most elaborate. The inhabitants worshiped the moon-god, Sin. Archaeologists have unearthed fabulous treasures from this old city. The royal cemetery has given up art treasures dated as early as 2900 B.C. The Oriental Institute of Chicago has a plaque from Ur that dates back to 3000 B.C. It was in this ancient world that Abraham was born and grew into manhood. His was a rich heritage.

31. Haran (or Ḥarran). An important city in ancient Mesopotamia. It was situated about 550 miles northeast of Ur and 280 miles north of Damascus. Principal routes converged there. Highways to Nineveh, Babylon, and Damascus had their start from it. It was only 60 miles from the stronghold of Carchemish, the capital of the Hittite empire. Haran was one of the chief centers for the worship of Sin, the moon-god. Terah and his family moved to Haran, and the record states that Terah died there. Rebekah, the wife of Isaac, and Rachel, the wife of Jacob, grew up in Haran. It still survives as a small Arab village.

II. The Patriarchs. 12:1–50:26.

A. Abraham. 12:1–25:18. In the second principal division of the Book of Genesis, it is evident that in the new order of things God's chosen ones must recognize the direct communication and the direct leadership of the Lord. In chapters 12–50 four characters stand out as men who heard God's voice, understood his directions, and ordered their ways according to his will. The purpose of Jehovah was still to raise up a people who would carry out his will in the earth. In Noah he had made a new start. Shem was the one chosen to carry forward true religion. The Semites (descendants of Shem) were to become missionaries to the other peoples of the earth. In chapter 12 Abram begins to emerge from the line of Shem as Jehovah's chosen representative. On him Jehovah would place the full responsibility of receiving and passing on His revelation for all. From the pagan background of Ur and Haran came forth God's man for the strategic hour of early OT revelation.

1) The Call of Abram. 12:1-9.

1. And Jehovah said. Get thee out of thy country, and from thy kindred, and from thy father's house. The Biblical account makes it clear that before migrating to Palestine, Abram had two homes. He spent his early years in Ur and then a long season in Haran. Each community became his home. He had to leave friends, neighbors, and kindred behind him when he left Ur and still others when he departed from Haran. In each case, the threefold tie of land, people, and kindred was severed. Bishop Ryle says that Abram was commanded "(a) to renounce the certainties of the past, (b) to face the uncertainties of the future, (c) to look for and follow the direction of Jehovah's will" (Genesis in the Cambridge Bible, p. 155). It was a big demand (cf. Heb 11:8). Severe trials awaited him. This call must have come to him while he still lived in Ur (Acts 7:2). It was renewed many years later in Haran.

Unto the land that I will show thee. Jehovah did not name the land at this time nor describe it. Thus, Abram was to meet a new test of faith. The Lord had found the man for his purpose, one he could subject to heavy strains, a man who would regard the doing of God's will as the one important thing in his life.

2,3. Be thou a blessing (bᵉrākâ). The imperative form actually expresses a consequence—"so that thou shalt be a blessing." This distinguished traveler from polytheistic Mesopotamia had been divinely commissioned to go forth into the midst of utter strangers in some new land. He and his descendants would constitute a channel by which God would bless all the peoples of the world.

I will make of thee a great nation, and I will bless thee, and make thy name great. God strongly fortified Abram with covenant promises of prosperity, plenteous posterity, and greatness. The promise of divine blessing guaranteed Abram everything he could desire. His every need would be supplied. Even hostile neighbors would come to look upon him as the leader of God's people. Through him would come blessings to all the peoples of the earth. And his name would be honored and revered everywhere. Today, Abram is recognized and honored as a "father" by Christians, Jews, and Moslems. God chose Abram and his descendants to bear His Gospel to the world. From the line of Abram, Christ was to come, to fulfill God's purposes. And through "born-again" men and women, His ideals were to find fulfillment. The plan of God was taking shape.

5. The land of Canaan. Abram interpreted the call of God to involve immediate departure for Canaan. How he knew Canaan was his destination is not explained. But God had said: "Get thee out . . . unto a land that I will show thee." So he obeyed. Without hesitation he gathered together his family and set out on a major migration. Seemingly he had no fears, no doubts, no misgivings. He journeyed to Carchemish on the Euphrates and turned south through Hamath to Damascus of Syria. Josephus represents Abram during his stay in that capital city as acting in the capacity of a king over the people of Damascus. The land of Canaan is described in Scripture as comprising all the land from the Jordan to the Mediterranean and from Syria to Egypt. Moab and Edom bounded it on the southeast. In the Bible the word "Canaanites" usually refers to the earliest inhabitants of the land, including any group that lived there before the coming of the Hebrews.

6. Shechem. This ancient city was probably a shrine or sacred place. It was an important settlement at the junction of the main commercial highways. It was situated between Mount Gerizim and Mount Ebal, about forty-one miles north of Jerusalem. In later years, Jacob's well was in the immediate vicinity. In more recent times, Shechem has been called Nablus.

Abram made his way to the terebinth of Moreh. This was probably a sacred tree, under which a priest or teacher or soothsayer gave his instruction or teaching. Moreh is probably a participle of the verb yārâ, "to teach." The oak and the terebinth trees resembled each other. Shechem became Abram's first principal stop in Canaan. Here he received a special message of assurance and promise from the Lord. God gave the land to him as his possession, and promised that his descendants would possess it after him. With warlike tribes on every hand, Abram would find it difficult to establish his claims to the new land. He made a good beginning, however, by immediately setting up an altar and offering sacrifices to Jehovah. As his life in Palestine took shape, he declared his utter dependence upon the Lord and his whole-hearted dedication to him.

8. Bethel (Bēt-'ēl). This ancient sanctuary dates back to the twenty-first century B.C., and is mentioned more often in Scripture than any other city except Jerusalem. It is situated on the road to Shechem, about ten or eleven miles north of Jerusalem. By erecting an altar, the patriarch proclaimed his allegiance to Jehovah, and by pitching his tents, he publicly declared to all observers that he was taking permanent possession of the land. In these two symbolic acts, Abram revealed his resolute faith in the power of Jehovah of hosts to carry out all His promises. The word Bethel means, literally, house of God. A later narrative indicates that Jacob gave the place that name after his experience with Jehovah there (28:19). Abram called on the name of Jehovah. In his act of genuine worship, he used the name Jehovah in the invocation (cf. 4:26).

9. Abram journeyed (nāsā') going toward the Negeb. Nāsā' means to pluck or pull up tent pins. It refers to Abram's setting out for the south. He pulled up stakes and moved by easy stages. The Negeb, dry land, is a definite section of southern Palestine, between Kadesh-barnea and Beer-sheba. In the summer it was dry enough to be a desert, without water or vegetation. With all his flocks and herds, Abram found it necessary to have plenty of water and grass. The Negeb would be of little help to him.

2) The Patriarch in Egypt. 12:10-20.

10. And Abram went down into Egypt to sojourn there. Famines were frequent in Canaan. Nothing could be done to prevent them. The one remedy was to move into Egypt, where the Nile furnished water for cattle and crops. Abram and his large group made their way to Egypt. The Hebrew word gûr, sojourn, indicates that a temporary residence was anticipated. As soon as the famine had loosed its hold, Abram would be on his way back to Palestine. No evidence is given to help determine which Pharaoh was ruling in Egypt at that time.

11-16. Fear clutched at the heart of the patriarch when he came near to the palace of the monarch. He imagined that the Pharaoh would seek to kill him in order to take Sarai into his harem. Accordingly, Abram devised the plan of passing his wife off as his sister, quieting his conscience meanwhile with the thought that she was his half-sister. It was a shameful expedient to employ. As a result, the mother of future leaders of the Hebrew nation was taken into an Egyptian harem! 17-20. To settle the whole matter, the Pharaoh was afflicted with plagues until he realized that something was wrong, and drove the visitors from the land. Abram took Sarai, his followers, and his property—greatly increased by his sojourn in Egypt—and made his way back across the miles to the Negeb and on into Canaan. Such behavior as Abram's in Egypt was not at all worthy of the majestic soul of Jehovah's special ambassador to the nations. He would need to grow if he was to approximate the divine blueprint for his life. He needed to go back to Bethel and rebuild the altar of Jehovah.

3) The Parting with Lot. 13:1-18.

1-4. And Abram went up out of Egypt. When the renewal of his fellowship with God had been achieved, Abraham was ready for a new life. He was immensely rich. Cattle, gold, and silver were his in great abundance. His company of followers had increased until a serious problem confronted him. With so many cattle and sheep, he must be able to move quickly to secure sufficient water and grass. 5-8. Soon Lot's company had difficulty with Abram's band. Hebrew m'rîbâ, strife, indicates disputing, striving, and contentions. The righteous uncle could not allow such unbecoming conduct to continue. He said: We are brethren (v. 8). Behavior like that was unnecessary, unavailing, and wholly out of keeping with God's representatives.

9-13. In the interest of peace and harmony, Abram made the generous suggestion that Lot choose any section of the land he preferred and move in that direction, leaving the rest of the territory to Abram. The selfish and grasping nature of Lot manifested itself immediately; he chose the well-watered valley of the Jordan. There, tropical vegetation abounded under the life-giving waters of the river. The valley (kikēr) of the Jordan was large enough and sufficiently fertile to guarantee prosperity and plenty for all the days ahead. However, the cities of Sodom and Gomorrah were included in the area Lot chose, and they were extremely corrupt. How could spiritual religion grow among the thorns of selfishness and corruption in that place? Lot's choice proved to be a disastrous one. He pitched his tent toward Sodom (v. 12). At first he looked toward Sodom. Then he pitched his tent toward Sodom. Later he dwelt in Sodom. These are the steps by which the man and his family moved toward certain degeneration and destruction.

14-17. And the Lord said unto Abram . . . Lift up now thine eyes. In this remarkable communication, Lot and Abram are set in direct contrast. The weak, selfish, grasping sinner chose for himself that which he considered the more valuable possession. Jehovah chose for Abram. As a reward for his rare unselfishness, the patriarch received the land of Canaan. God gave him the title deed to the land and invited him to open wide his eyes and feast upon the treasures that stretched out before him in every direction. From the hill near Bethel, he could look upon wonderful panoramas of breath-taking beauty. They were all his! To make the gift more attractive, the Lord promised Abram many descendants, more numerous than the sands of the sea. This prophecy must have amazed the patriarch, who had no son. But he accepted it by faith.

18. Hebron. An ancient city in southern Judah, nineteen miles southwest of Jerusalem, at the junction of all the principal highways of the region. It stood out prominently on the landscape, 3,040 feet above sea level. Josephus speaks of it as being more ancient than the city of Memphis in Egypt. He also says that an old oak tree had been there since the creation of the world. Surrounding the city were olive trees, grapes, springs, and wells, and grazing ground. The cave of Machpelah, later bought by Abraham for a tomb for Sarah, was very near. It became the burial place not only of Sarah, but of Abraham, Isaac, Jacob, Rebekah, and Leah.

4) Abram, Lot, Melchizedek. 14:1-24. Instead of living in peace, prosperity, and happiness, Lot and Abram found themselves in the middle of a war. Powerful warring armies from the east invaded the land of Palestine, and wrought much havoc. Abram became deeply involved because of his love for Lot, and soon revealed himself as a warrior to be reckoned with when invaders sought plunder. Lot became a prisoner of war when his city, Sodom, and the neighboring kingdoms were defeated by the invaders. He had invited trouble by choosing to enjoy Sodom's ease and privilege, and by becoming one of the people of that wicked city. Now he found that he had to share the city's danger and tragedy. Abram quickly responded with his 318 men to effect a rescue, and establish himself as a powerful force for righteousness in the land.

1. Amraphel, the king of Shinar. One of the quartet composing the invading army. Shinar, located in northern Mesopotamia, gave its name to the entire area between the Tigris and Euphrates, including Babylonia. Lower Mesopotamia was the center of Sumerian civilization, dating back to about 3500 B.C. Amraphel was the king of that region. Until quite recently scholars identified him with Hammurabi, one of the earlier kings of Babylon. However, recent finds among clay tablets have tended to set Hammurabi's date nearer 1700 B.C. Amraphel was king much earlier. Arioch was king of Ellasar, Babylonian Larsa, and probably controlled a much larger region in the southern part of Babylonia.

Chedorlaomer. King of Elam, a well-known mountain region near the head of the Persian Gulf. He seemed to be the most powerful of the four kings who made up this expedition. He had established control over the other kings of Babylonia and Palestine. His name Kudur-Lagamer means "servant of Lagamer," one of Elam's gods. The capital of Elam was Susa. Tidal, the other confederate king, was called the king of Goiim, i.e., nations, or peoples. His title may indicate that he was in control of several individual kingdoms, or that he was at the head of a strong band of roving people who were in the business of making raids for plunder.

2. These kings, with their select troops, came from the region beyond Damascus, and swooped down upon the country east of the Jordan as far as the south end of the Sea of Salt. Then they turned northward and moved rapidly up the western side of the Jordan. The decisive battle was fought in the low country below the Dead Sea (the vale of Siddim, v. 3), with the five kings of that immediate region who had rebelled against their eastern overlords.

3. The salt sea (Dead Sea) is forty-six miles long and nine and one-half miles wide. Since the surface of the water is 1,292 feet below the level of the Mediterranean, and the water is 1,200 feet deep, this sea is the "lowest sheet of water in the world." Its water is five times stronger in saline content than ordinary sea water. Scholars affirm that the ruins of Sodom and Gomorrah lie beneath the waters of the south end of this sea. Admah and Zeboiim (cf. v. 2) were the other cities destroyed by the destructive blast from God's hand. The kings of the east brought decisive defeat upon the assembled fighters and took prisoners and plunder with them as they returned. Lot was among the captured ones.

6. And the Horites in their Mount Seir. Archaeology has contributed much to establish the basic historicity of these early narratives. These people, called Horites, are now well known as Hurrians, a non-Semitic group. Their records, uncovered at Nuzu by archaeologists, have thrown much light on patriarchal customs. William F. Albright believes that these Hurrians came into prominence as early as 2400 B.C., and became competitors of Hittites and Sumerians for the supremacy in culture and learning. They must have found their way to the region south of the Dead Sea quite early. They were displaced from the region of Mount Seir by Esau's descendants (Deut 2:22).

7. Kadesh (sanctuary). An ancient spot where water trickled from a rock, and judgment issued from a holy man who received divine revelation. It was on the border of Edom, about fifty miles south of Beer-Sheba, and seventy miles from Hebron. Here the Israelites spent a generation waiting for God's command to move forward into Palestine. Miriam was buried at Kadesh, an eleven-day journey from Sinai. Amalekites. Rough, predatory marauders who roamed the wilderness area of southern Palestine. They proved a constant menace to the Israelites all the days of the kingdom. In this instance the people of Canaan were severely beaten by the eastern invaders.

10. Bitumen pits (AV, slime pits). Pits from which liquid petroleum had been removed. The holes may still have been partially filled with the bubbling liquid. The fighting men, trying desperately to escape the fury of the enemy attack, fell into these holes and were destroyed. It was an hour of disaster for them. The eastern invaders escaped with much plunder and many captives, who would become their slaves.

13. Abram the Hebrew. Quickly the news of the battle reached Abram at Hebron. He had not been involved in the fighting, but since his nephew was a prisoner, he was doubly obligated to attempt a rescue. This is the first use in the Scriptures of the word Hebrew (hā'ibrî). The exact derivation of the name is still in dispute. It was used by foreigners in designating descendants of Abraham and the patriarchs. It probably means "a descendant of Eber," or "one from the other side" (of the river). This applies to Abram as one who had migrated from Mesopotamia. Some have identified the Hebrews with the Habiru, who came into prominence in archaeology through the Tell el Amarna letters found in Egypt and the Mesopotamian tablets of Nuzu and Mari. The character of these troublesome marauders would not have endeared them to the children of Abram.

14. Hebrew rîq (AV, armed) describes the rapid, thorough work done by Abram in getting every available man into action at once. It is translated, literally, drew out, as a sword from its scabbard. Not a man was left. Three hundred and eighteen men answered the call to follow their honored leader. For an establishment such as the patriarch maintained, it was necessary to have a strong force to count on. Besides these dependable, ready men, Abram took with him troops from the friendly confederates, Aner, Eshcol, and Mamre, who were loyal to their good friend in the hour of emergency. The fleeing invaders from the east made their way quickly to Dan at the northern boundary of Canaan. The city nestled at the foot of Mount Hermon, some distance northwest of Caesarea Philippi. At that time it bore the name of Leshem or Laish (cf. Jud 18:7). The Danites took it years later and called it Dan.

15. Hobah was a city less than fifty miles north of the ancient city of Damascus. After the attack began at Dan, Abram and his fighting men covered one hundred miles in the pursuit of the army of Chedorlaomer. In the surprise attack, they routed the enemy and succeeded in recovering all the booty and the prisoners. Lot was safe again in the keeping of his uncle. And Abram had established his power in Canaan, for surrounding peoples would stand in awe of one who could deliver such smashing blows.

17. Returning to his own district, Abram was met by the king of Sodom, who expressed heartfelt thanks for the notable deliverance. They met at a place called Shaveh, or the king's dale (AV). The word shaveh means "a plain." It was probably near Jerusalem.

18-20. Melchizedek, king of Salem. The name of this mysterious person means either "king of righteousness," or, "my king is righteousness," or, "my king is Zedek." Zedek is the Hebrew word for "righteousness," and also the name of a Canaanite deity. Melchizedek was the priest-king of Salem, which is a shortened form for Urusalim, "city of peace," identified with Jerusalem. The Tell el Amarna tablets identify Salem with Jerusalem as early as 1400 B.C. Shalom is the Hebrew word for "peace," and Shalem probably was the Canaanite god of peace.

This kindly priest-king, recognizing Abram's nobility and worth, supplied refreshment and sustenance for the weary warrior and his men. These gifts were tokens of friendship and hospitality. Melchizedek praised El Elyon, his God (AV, the most high God) for granting Abram the power to achieve victory. Abram recognized Melchizedek's 'El Elyon as Jehovah, the God he himself served. The name God most high was found in the Ras Shamra documents that date back to the fourteenth century B.C. Evidently Melchizedek had a firm grip on the doctrines of his faith, which were as true and basic as those brought from Babylonia by Abram. Each of these stalwarts had something to give and something to learn. (See Ps 110:4; Heb 5:9,10; 7:1-7 for the development of the concept of the ideal priesthood and the application of this in the Messianic doctrine.) The author of Hebrews declares that Christ was of a priestly order much more ancient than that of Aaron, and therefore his priesthood was superior to the Aaronic priesthood. In further recognition of Melchizedek's priestly standing, Abram brought tithes as a religious offering.

21-24. In dealing with the king of Sodom, the patriarch refused to accept for himself the booty gained in the battle. He had waged war not to enrich himself, but to secure the release of Lot. He would not profit in any manner, but would see to it that his allies had a reasonable amount to care for their expenses. Evidently there was nothing little, selfish, or grasping in his character.

5) Abram Promised an Heir. 15:1-21. Throughout his life Abram manifested a strong faith in God. It was easy to let this trust shine forth in hours of triumph. When he remembered God's wondrous promises to him, he took comfort from the declaration that their fulfillment was to be in and through his seed. But when he grew old and saw that the end of his days was near and that he was still childless, he was tempted to be discouraged. His faith in the promises wavered. How could God now fulfill his promises? When would he fulfill them? Abram needed assurance. And so God spoke to him.

1. Fear not . . . I am thy shield, and thy exceeding great reward. First, Abram must put away fear by trusting fully in the Lord. This figure of God as a shield was calculated to give hope, courage, and faith. But defense was not enough. Abram needed to have before his eyes the certainty of a reward that would bring the fullest joys. Perhaps the rendering, thy reward is to be exceeding great, is nearer the meaning derived from the text in its context. The two ways of translating these words leave us confused until we see that either way guarantees victory ahead.

2-7. The Lord assured Abram that he was not to look to Eliezer of Damascus as his heir, but that a true son of his own begetting would be born to bring a rich fulfillment to every prediction. In moments of peril or despair Abram was to believe in God's protection, God's fulfillment of his promises, and the unlimited number of his descendants. It was a challenge to sublime trust. And Abram was able to believe because he knew the One who had made the promises. He knew that Jehovah could be trusted. Even though no child was in the home, God would yet fill the earth with those who would look back to Abram as father. Trustful surrender to the will of God is the basic element in true religion. 6. He counted it to him for righteousness. The quality of being right with God is indescribably precious in the Lord's eyes. Abram was justified, i.e., counted righteous, on the basis of his faith.

8-21. Immediately Jehovah was ready to ratify the covenant with the man who had yielded himself to the divine will (cf. Gen 12:1-3). Hebrew b'rît is variously translated "covenant," "compact," "solemn agreement," "testament," "treaty." No one of these words brings over into English the full meaning of this solemn transaction. In ancient times men sometimes ratified an agreement or covenant by passing between the parts of a halved, sacrificial animal. This "cutting of the covenant" was not in itself a sacrifice. Rather, it was a sacred ceremony by which the men declared their solemn purpose to keep the agreement. Some Bible students have pointed out that in the instance recorded in Gen 15:8-21, only one symbolic representative of the contracting parties—the lamp of fire (AV marg.), or "flaming torch" (cf. Jud 7:16,20), symbol of Jehovah —passed between the halves of the animals. In other words, the covenant in this case was to be kept from the Godward side alone. Only the Lord himself could fulfill its promises. He would make Abram's descendants as numerous as the stars and give them a great land, stretching from the gates of Egypt to the mighty Euphrates.

6) Ishmael. 16:1-16.

1-3. Now Sarai . . . bear him no children. Abram and Sarai had been married for many years. No children had come to brighten the home and to fulfill the wonderful prophecies. Yet Jehovah had been specific in his promise of an heir (cf. 15:4). As the years rolled by, the discrepancy between the promise and the circumstances became more and more baffling. To be childless was a calamity and a disgrace for any Hebrew wife, and it was much worse for Sarai. Both husband and wife must have sought means to help God work out the fulfillment of his promise. They knew the direct teaching of Gen 2:24, and realized that husbands and wives must conform to that high standard. For a man to take a secondary wife or concubine was sinful. Yet, in attempting to provide a way for God to carry out his prediction, Sarai was willing to disregard the divine standard and give her female slave, Hagar, to Abram, in the hope that she might bear a son to the family. That I may be builded (Heb. bānâ, "built") by her (AV marg.), she said. When men and women allow their faith to break down, they resort to human contrivance. The Egyptian slave was brought into Abram's tent that the family might be built. But discord and heartache followed as tragic consequences.

4-6a. And he went in unto Hagar. Sarai was acting in thorough accord with the customs of other people in her day (cf. the Nuzu tablets). But Abram and Sarai were expected to hold themselves to a higher standard than that of the people around them. Abram, the friend of God, exercised a richer faith and was bound by a purer code. Nevertheless, he followed his wife's suggestion and took Hagar into his tent. Soon the slave began to despise her mistress. And Sarai became embittered against her maid. All three of the persons in the triangle suffered. Sarai blamed Abram for the whole trouble, but he had only carried out her suggestion. Jealousy changed the atmosphere completely, Peace, harmony, and happiness could not exist in that home. And the home was on the point of breaking up.

6b. Dealt hardly with her. Afflicted her. Hebrew 'ānâ means to "oppress, depress, afflict." In this case it may mean to "persecute or ill-treat." Sarai may have persecuted Hagar with heavy duties or bodily punishment. Whatever the persecution, it so angered, shamed, or embarrassed her as to drive her from her mistress' presence. Passionate jealousy and bitterness set the two women against each other. And Abram was not much help to either of them. Conditions grew worse by the moment.

7,8. And the angel of Jehovah found her. In desperation Hagar fled in the direction of her homeland, Egypt. She was still legally a slave and had no right to run away. Her situation, however, had become unbearable, and flight seemed to present the only relief. She probably thought she might find peace, rest, and life in her old home country. When she reached Shur (the wall), she paused before crossing the border. Here the Egyptians maintained a wall or strong line of forts to protect Egypt from invaders from the east. It is mentioned in Egyptian records as early as 2000 B.C.

In the quiet of the wilderness Hagar was confronted by the angel of Jehovah, who had come to bring her direction, hope, and peace of mind. This appearance is the first recorded visit of the angel of Jehovah to the earth. It was a moment of unusual significance. This "angel" was not a created being, but Jehovah himself, manifesting himself to Hagar. For other uses of this name, see Gen 32:30; Ex 23:20-23; 32:34; I Kgs 19:5,7; Isa 63:9. From these passages it is evident that the "angel" is Jehovah himself, present in time and place. He identifies himself with Jehovah; he speaks and acts with God's authority; he is spoken of as God, or as Jehovah.

9-12. The "angel's" heartening word to Hagar was that she should go back to the hard situation she had left, take up her burden, wait for the fulfillment of the divine plan, and look for the day when her son, Ishmael, should become the head of an important tribe. Ishmael (God heareth) was to be a "wild ass of a man," with strength and daring, and a ferocious disposition. He would live wild and unshackled, in the wilderness, without friends or loyalties. His descendants were destined to grow into a mighty horde of Bedouins, wild, free, treacherous, reckless men, roaming the open spaces of the desert.

13-16. Thou art a God that seeth. Hagar was overjoyed to recognize God in the experience, and to see him to be a gracious, kindly, thoughtful observer of a poor individual in dire need. She responded with reverent faith. The well or spring was named Beer-lahai-roi. This name has been variously translated and amended. Perhaps as good a rendering as any is The well of the living one who seeth me. Hagar was moved mightily by the realization that she had been in the very presence of the mighty God and that she was still alive. Perhaps the well was in the vicinity of Kadesh (cf. 16:14), about fifty miles south of Beer-sheba. The boy was born, and the name Ishmael was given to him by Abram, then eighty-six years old.

7) New Promises, and Abraham's Response. 17:1-27.

1. I am the Almighty God ('El Shadday). Thirteen years later God appeared to Abram with a reassurance, a challenge, and a richer promise. He changed Abram's name and that of his wife. He gave specific directions concerning the rite of circumcision. The divine name 'El Shadday, with its message that, "Nothing is impossible with God, who is all-powerful and all-sufficient," must have brought unusual encouragement to Abram. The word 'El Shadday evidently calls attention to both of these attributes of God. Early Jewish scholars claimed that it was derived from sh-da, meaning, "He who is sufficient." Some scholars derive it from the root shādad, "to destroy." Others relate it to the Assyrian word shādu, "mountain." The LXX gives us hikanos, "sufficient." Perhaps the translator should stay as near the meaning of "all-powerful" as possible, especially since the word 'El speaks of power. The One who has all power also has all resources to supply every need of his people.

Walk before me, and be thou perfect (AV). Such a God could make such demands. "Walking with God" is described in the narrative concerning Enoch. Now Abram was commanded to make his daily life (thoughts, words, deeds) before God thoroughly pleasing to the all-seeing eye. Hebrew tāmîn, perfect, carries the sense of "blameless," or "spotless." But it goes beyond that sense in suggesting a well-rounded whole, every area filled out to the full.

3-8. Humbly and reverently Abram fell to the ground to worship. God's patience had brought the patriarch to the right attitude of heart which would make it possible for him to have his name changed, the covenant renewed, and the promises repeated. Abram, his name from birth, is usually defined as exalted father. The name Abraham has no Hebrew meaning, but the new covenant associated with the new name emphasizes the patriarch's world-wide mission as God's representative to the peoples of the earth (cf. Rom 4:16,17). Higher privileges were to bring heavier responsibilities. God promised to give special guidance for each step of the new journey of faith and obedience.

9-14. Circumcised. As a symbol or token of the covenant, Abraham and his descendants were to adopt the rite of circumcision and carefully obey the regulations concerning it. Thus they would give neighboring peoples a perpetual reminder of their dedication and full commitment to Jehovah. Circumcision was not a new rite. Neither was it confined to the Hebrew people. It was widely practiced in many parts of the world, especially in Egypt and Canaan. Assyrians and Babylonians, however, refused to have any part in it. Note that David scornfully refers to Goliath as an "uncircumcised Philistine" (I Sam 17:26; cf. 14:6). God commanded Abraham to seal the covenant between them with the symbol or token of circumcision. Thus it would forever be the "outward and visible sign of an inward and invisible relationship." Every male child of Abraham's household was to experience this divinely commanded rite on his eighth day.

15,16. Sarah. The name Sarai had been borne by Abraham's wife for many years. Now God commanded that her name be changed to Sarah, Princess. It is the feminine form of sar, "prince." This new name emphasized the role Abraham's wife was to play in the future, as a mother of nations. Abraham is looked upon as "Father Abraham" by Jews, Mohammedans, and Christians. It would be well to remember that Sarah, too, played a vital part in the drama of the ages.

17-22. Again Abraham fell upon his face before the Lord. God had predicted that the long-awaited son would indeed be born to his wife. Although Sarah was ninety years of age, she was yet to have the joy of welcoming a son through whom God's covenant promises would be fulfilled. Abraham had come to look upon Ishmael as his heir and to believe that the golden promises must be fulfilled through him (cf. v. 18). Now he faced the sure word that Isaac would be born to be the child of promise. Abraham . . . laughed (v. 17). He was overwhelmed. There is no suggestion here of unbelief but rather evidence of wonder and great gladness. Abraham was hardly able to comprehend such an astounding announcement. Hebrew ṣhāḥăq means "to laugh." It is the root verb from which the word Isaac is derived.

Compare Sarah's reaction and her laughter in 18:12. There was a decided difference in the causes for laughter in the two instances.

23-27. Abraham was moved by faith and an obedient spirit to carry out the command of God. Immediately he instituted the rite of circumcision throughout his company. Ishmael was among those circumcised. Abraham was obeying God and making himself and his family eligible to fulfill the divine purposes. The Lord's plan to reach and bless all the nations was moving toward fulfillment.

8) Sodom and Gomorrah. 18:1–19:38.

18:1. The terebinths (AV, plains) of Mamre. The residence of Abraham was in the immediate vicinity of Hebron. Though the Hebrew word 'ēlôn can be translated "oak" or "terebinth," the latter is probably to be preferred. These trees were the sacred trees of the Canaanite sanctuary of Hebron. The cave of Machpelah was located in the same place. The patriarch was in close touch with the sacred places and hallowed spots. Through the centuries, ancient oaks or terebinths have been identified as dating back to patriarchal times. Jehovah appeared. Even though Abraham did not instantly recognize the celestial visitor as the Lord, it soon became clear to him that the chief visitor of the three messengers was Jehovah himself. He was "the angel of Jehovah," who appears several times in the earlier pages of Genesis.

2-5. He ran to meet them . . . and bowed himself toward the ground. Abraham proved extraordinarily hospitable. He did everything for his guests that Oriental hospitality could suggest. His manner was all that could be asked. He made ready to give these heavenly visitors a royal welcome. He invited them to rest (AV) or recline and comfort themselves while the meal was being prepared. Hebrew sā'ād, comfort, means "to strengthen" or "make strong." Both the rest and the food would give "comfort."

6-8. Make ready quickly three measures of fine meal. Abraham and Sarah and Ishmael (the lad) went quickly about the task of refreshing the guests. A measure, sē'â, was one third of an ephah, or about a peck and a half. Two Hebrew words, gĕm'âḥ and sōlĕt, are used to designate the exceptional character of the flour used in making the rolls for the meal. Ḥem'â, "curdled milk" mixed with fresh milk, was a refreshing drink served to tired travelers while the more substantial food was being prepared. The calf was a rare and added luxury provided for these distinguished visitors.

9-15. The Lord clearly and distinctly declared that a boy would be born to Sarah when the season comes to life again (AV, according to the time of life). The happy event was only a year away. God had not forgotten his promise but was working toward its miraculous fulfillment. Was listening (AV, heard). The Hebrew shōmaʿat indicates listening at that moment. Advanced in years (AV, well stricken in age). From the Hebrew idiom meaning "entered into days." Sarah laughed. Sarah laughed in sheer incredulity as she thought how impossible it was for her to bear a child. She here describes herself as bᵉlōtî, "worn out," "withered," "ready to fall apart, as a garment." She remembered that Abraham, too, was old and past the age of parenthood. The divine word assured Sarah and Abraham that nothing is too hard (lit., wonderful) for the Lord. Even if the thing to be done was unusual, extraordinary, or beyond natural behavior, Jehovah was capable of accomplishing it at any time and in any way he chose. "For with God nothing shall be impossible" (Lk 1:37). In the birth of Isaac, as in the birth of Jesus, it was necessary for God to work a miracle.

16-22. Sodom . . . Gomorrah. The two leading cities at the south end of the Dead Sea. The others – Admah, Zeboiim, and Zoar – were to be destroyed along with Sodom and Gomorrah in the conflagration that was to purge the cesspools of iniquity. (Ultimately God spared Zoar as a new home for Lot.) The Scripture clearly indicates that a divine visitation was to bring terrible judgment and doom upon the sinful inhabitants. The cities were about eighteen miles from Abraham's home at Hebron. It was possible for him to see the southern end of the Sea from the immediate vicinity of Hebron.

23-33. In his superb prayer of intercession for the few righteous men in Sodom, Abraham revealed the richer elements of his character – his generosity, sympathy, sensitivity, his concern for righteousness in God and man. He showed that he understood God's willingness to forgive and grant full pardon, and to deal with His creatures, though wicked, in accordance with revealed standards of justice and righteousness. He knew that Jehovah could be depended upon to act in keeping with his holy nature.

When Abraham left off interceding, he had God's promise that He would spare Sodom if as many as ten righteous persons could be found therein. But when the required number could not be found, nothing could avert the catastrophe. Intercessory prayer always brings out the best in men. Their unselfish concern for others shines like a beautiful jewel. In pleading with the Lord, Abraham clearly demonstrated genuine love and concern. And he experienced anew the friendship of God in His willingness to counsel with him and grant him a special revelation before the doom fell.

19:1-3. Lot sat in the gate of Sodom. Lot had achieved some prominence among his fellow citizens in the wicked city. Perhaps his sitting in the gate indicates that he helped mete out justice to the people. But to the heavenly visitors, weak, worldly, selfish Lot must have been a pathetic figure. He immediately volunteered to play the part of a lavish host to the two strangers.

4-22. The tragic experience with the men of the city, at Lot's house, demonstrated that the ugliest situation imaginable prevailed in Sodom. The angels, who had come under divine orders to discover the extent of human depravity there, needed no further disclosure. The vilest, most unspeakable brand of sin was practiced openly and brazenly. The messengers from God had only to pronounce official sentence, give due warning, and seek in every way possible to lead Lot and his reluctant family from the doomed city. Haste was necessary. Unqualified obedience was demanded. Lot sought frantically to warn and persuade those of his own family to leave. But, as the narrative tells us, he seemed unto his sons-in-law as one who mocked (jested, ASV).

Lot had acted selfishly and foolishly when he had chosen to become a part of Sodom, where his children would be soiled by the city's shame. Though he had attained some measure of prominence among the people, he had never influenced them toward righteous behavior; and so he failed to exert moral leadership in the hour of crisis. His own family, at the end, put no faith in his most urgent warnings. What a striking contrast between the depravity of Lot and the righteous life of Abraham! The members of Lot's family were all corrupt. Not one of them weighed an ounce in the scales of justice and righteousness. When Lot and his wife and two daughters stumbled out of the doomed city, God held back the impending destruction until his messengers could extricate them from the vile grip of Sodom.

23-25. Jehovah rained . . . brimstone and fire. It is well to take this account literally, as recording a definite judgment of the Lord upon people so corrupt that they had no right to live. It was within God's power to produce an earthquake that would open a fissure in the rocks to release stored up gas that would explode and throw immense supplies of petroleum into the air. When all the inflammable stuff was ignited, sheets of literal fire poured back to complete the destruction. Searing flames and black smoke must have covered every area of the city, smothering and consuming every living thing.

26. A pillar of salt. Lot's wife made some effort to escape the impending disaster. But she let her curiosity and her inordinate love for the things of Sodom (as well as for her family, probably) cause her to disobey orders and look back. It was a fatal act. The woman was fixed to the spot, and her body became a pillar of salt, covered and encrusted with deposits from the raining brimstone. There it stood for many years, a dreadful warning against disobedience to the specific command of God, and a mute reminder of the Lord's unchanging character. Someone has said: "She stood, a silent sentinel to sordid selfishness." Even to this day pillars and pinnacles of salt are visible in the area south of the Dead Sea. Jesus, seeking to remind his disciples of the tragic consequences of loving mere things, cautioned them to "remember Lot's wife" (Lk 17:32).

27,28. The smoke of the land went up as the smoke of a furnace. Abraham stood on the heights near Hebron and looked upon the inferno in the valley below. He had done all he could to spare Lot and his family. Now he watched the destruction of the four godless cities that had been so insolent in their behavior. Surely the wages of sin is death.

30-38. Two daughters. The closing chapter in the career of Lot is a pitiful one. It describes incestuous relations that we would prefer to forget. The two daughters, brought up in wicked Sodom, stooped low enough to engage in an act that is unspeakably revolting. The result of that deed was the birth of two boys, who became the progenitors of the Moabites and the Ammonites. Lot and his family failed miserably. Disaster, disgrace, despair, and death are written in their epitaph. "Be not deceived; God is not mocked: for whatsoever a man soweth, that shall he also reap" (Gal 6:7).

9) Abraham and Abimelech. 20:1-18. This regrettable episode adds another deplorable line to the picture of the patriarch. Why did he make the same mistake twice? (cf. 12:11-20) Why should God's choice representative err in such a way as to give a pagan king opportunity for a well-deserved rebuke? Through fear and temporary faithlessness, Abraham resorted to falsehood, deceit, and outright misrepresentation.

1. Abraham . . . sojourned in Gerar. Gerar was probably five or six miles south of Gaza, and therefore a part of the territory belonging to the Philistines. Some commentators, however, have located it about thirteen miles southwest of Kadesh. 4-6. Integrity of my heart . . . innocency of my hands. Abimelech, who ruled over the people of Gerar, was unusually honest, ethical, and fair. His claims to integrity, i.e., "perfectness" or "sincerity" and innocency set him out as a man of high standards. When warned in a dream by Jehovah, he met the difficulty squarely and manfully. He appeared in a better light than God's representative. 7. Here Abraham is called a prophet. As such, he stood in a peculiar relation to the Lord. He had access to God, was protected by divine power, received special revelation, and was obligated to speak for God the message he had received. 9-16. Abimelech rebuked Abraham, restored Sarah to him, and, in addition, bestowed upon him sheep, oxen, and slaves, and a special treasure (perhaps equal to nearly four hundred dollars); and he assured Abraham of a home in his kingdom. 17,18. In return, Abraham prayed for the king that the affliction God had sent upon him and his people might be removed. The patriarch departed from Abimelech a wiser, if a sadder, man. He was learning that Jehovah's hand was upon him to fulfill his destiny.

10) Isaac Born; Ishmael Driven Away. 21:1-21.

1-7. Visited. From pāqăd, "to visit," in the sense of "bringing a judgment or a blessing." In this case it was a treasured blessing God brought. Divine grace and power wrought the miracle. Sarah . . . bare Abraham a son in his old age. True to his promise, God gave a boy to Sarah and Abraham. Every covenant prediction was to have divine fulfillment through this son of Abraham. The father had the joy of naming the lad, and then the privilege of circumcising him when he was eight days old. When Sarah held the babe in her arms, her joy knew no bounds. For many months she had lived for that sacred moment. She said: God hath made me to laugh (ASV, prepared laughter for me); everyone that heareth will laugh with me. For the neighbors, it would be the laughter of good-natured surprise coupled with genuine delight and hearty felicitation. For Sarah, it was the joyous laughter of wondrous realization. She held in her arms God's gift to the world. It was an unforgettable moment of thanksgiving, joy, and sacred dedication.

8. And the child grew. The day for weaning young Isaac, probably when he was three years old, was a big event in the life of all the family. It was an occasion to be celebrated with rejoicing and feasting.

9-11. Soon, however, trouble arose. Sarah saw the son of Hagar . . . mocking (AV). Sarah had previously suffered because of Hagar and Ishmael. Now the conflict was renewed when Sarah saw Hagar's son involved in behavior that enraged her. The Hebrew word mᵉṣaḥēq is an intensive (piel) form of the verb on which the word Isaac is built. It has been translated "mocking," "sporting," "playing," and "making sport." There is no good reason here to introduce the idea of mocking. What Ishmael was doing does not matter so much as the fact that it infuriated Sarah. Perhaps she simply could not bear to see her son playing with Ishmael as with an equal. Or it may be that green-eyed jealousy took full control. Sarah may have feared that Abraham, out of love for Ishmael, would give the older lad the prominent place in the inheritance. At any rate, the family life could not go on as it was. Hagar and Ishmael had to go. To drive them out must have been exceedingly grievous to Abraham, for he loved the boy, and for years had considered him his heir.

12-14b. Jehovah saved the day for his friend by assuring him that each boy was to have an important place in the future. Abraham was to let Hagar and Ishmael go, as Sarah demanded. In time to come, Ishmael would be the father of a great nation. But Isaac was to be heir of the promises and bring blessing to all the world – in Isaac shall thy seed be called. Reluctantly Abraham sent Hagar and Ishmael away toward the wilderness, carrying a goatskin bottle filled with fresh water. It is not clear how old Ishmael was. Careful study of the Hebrew text leaves the student free to think of him as a young adolescent, perhaps about sixteen years of age.

14c-16. Beer-sheba, on the border of Egypt, was about fifty miles south of Jerusalem and twenty-seven miles south of Hebron. For those going southward, it was the last point of any significance in Palestine. In that dry wilderness area, these two travelers could not hope to exist many hours without experiencing extreme thirst. When the water gave out, exhaustion took hold of the boy; and his mother laid him down in the small shade of a shrub to die. But God, in his mercy and love, intervened to bring hope, life, and assurance. 17-19. God heard the voice of the lad. The Lord provided plenty of fresh, flowing water, and spared the life of the boy. For both mother and son a new day had dawned. 20,21. And God was with the lad. It was evident that God intended to fulfill his promise regarding this son of Abraham; he would make of him the great nation of Ishmaelites.

11) Abimelech and Abraham. 21:22-34.

When trouble arose (v. 25) between the men of Abraham and those of Abimelech, the two masters agreed to enter into a covenant with each other. First, they straightened out difficulties and rectified injustices. Then Abraham gave gifts to the king to ratify the treaty. In addition to other things, he presented seven ewe lambs to Abimelech. Thus they made a covenant at Beer-sheba (v. 32). The similarity of the Hebrew words sheba', "seven," and shāba', "swear," seems to indicate that there is a connection between them. Accordingly, Beer-sheba may mean "well of seven" or "well of swearing." The reflexive use of the word for "to swear" means "to seven oneself" or to pledge oneself by seven sacred things. In full commitment to the covenant, Abraham expressed gratitude to the everlasting God ('El 'ōlām, v. 33). The patriarch would soon march off the map of history, but his God, the unchangeable, Eternal One would remain. Evidently Abraham had made an indelible impression on the pagan king, Abimelech, for in his own way, the king acknowledged his allegiance to the God of Abraham.

12) Abraham and Isaac. 22:1-19. Abraham's supreme test of faith and obedience came after Ishmael had been sent away, when all hopes for the future were lodged in Isaac.

1. God did prove Abraham. Hebrew nissâ, prove (AV, tempt), signifies a testing that would reveal Abraham's faith as nothing else had done. He must give evidence of absolute obedience and unquestioning trust in Jehovah, must even obey blindly, proceeding step by step until the faith stood out as clearly as the noonday sun. Abraham passed through the fiercest fires, stood up under the mightiest pressure, and endured the most difficult strain, to emerge from the trial in complete triumph.

2. No test could have been more severe than the one God now imposed. And no obedience could have been more perfect than Abraham's. When God called, the patriarch responded promptly. Even when he knew what was ahead, he calmly spoke to his servants: "Abide ye here . . . I and the lad will go yonder and worship, and come again to you" (v. 5). His faith in the God who sees and "sees to it" assured him that all would be well. He trusted Jehovah to carry out his promises. "By faith Abraham, being tried, offered up Isaac: yea, he that had gladly received the promises was offering up his only begotten son; even he to whom it was said, In Isaac shall thy seed be called: accounting that God is able to raise up, even from the dead; from whence he did also in a figure receive him back" (Heb 11:17-19). Faith saw beyond the sacrifice and was willing to obey.

Moriah. The place of the sacrifice cannot be positively identified. II Chronicles 3:1 seems to locate it on the site of Solomon's Temple. Tradition has held to this view, and it would be difficult to find a more easily accepted spot. The journey on foot from Beer-sheba must have taken the greater part of three days. Offer him . . . for a burnt offering. The Hebrew word used here, 'ālâ, literally, lift him up, signifies the offering of the victim as a whole burnt offering in complete dedication. No reference is made to slaying the boy. The original intention of Jehovah, apparently, was to guarantee the complete offering, but to interfere before the victim was slain. God's purpose, in part, was to present an object lesson depicting his abhorrence of human sacrifice as it was openly practiced by the heathen on all sides.

7,8. As the two trudged along up the side of the mountain, the observant youth asked: Where is the lamb for a burnt offering? How pathetic! The answer of the father came without delay: God will provide himself a lamb for a burnt offering. The verb means "to see." Actually, Abraham was saying that Jehovah was able to see to that in his own way. He had within his heart a quiet assurance that God was able to care for such details. Abraham did not know that the boy would be spared the experience of death, but he had the faith to believe that the omnipotent One would provide whatever was necessary in his own way and time. Paul entered into the depths of this truth when he said: "He that spared not his own Son, but delivered him up for us all, how shall he not with him also freely give us all things" (Rom 8:32).

9,10. Everything was in place on the altar. The beloved lad of the promises was bound and prostrate upon the wood he had brought on his own shoulders. The fire was ready. Everything was still and quiet. The sharp knife was unsheathed and lifted high. 12,13. Suddenly the voice from heaven broke the stillness. God commanded Abraham to lay aside the knife, loose the boy from his thongs, and bring the ram from his place in the thicket. It was Abraham's highest hour. God had tried his heart and was satisfied. Isaac again stood by his father's side, a witness of the Lord's mercy, grace, and provision (cf. v. 14). It is not strange that Jesus should say: "Your father Abraham rejoiced to see my day: and he saw it, and was glad" (Jn 8:56). The man of God returned to Beer-sheba aglow with the sense of the presence of God. He would never be the same again. The great promises had been renewed, and he was assured that the covenant blessings would come upon him and his descendants.

13) Sarah's Death and Burial. 23:1-20.

1,2. Sarah died in . . . Hebron. At the age of 127 Sarah passed away, leaving Abraham bowed in grief. His love for her had been genuine and tender. She was to him "the princess." We may well imagine that during dark hours and happy ones, she had been a steadying prop for his faith and a source of strength in all the journey. They had moved from Beer-sheba to Hebron, a city eighteen miles south of Jerusalem. Isaac was now thirty-seven years old. In his sorrow Abraham revealed something of the dignity of soul that characterizes a strong man of God. Besides wailing and otherwise loudly manifesting his grief, he broke forth into weeping. The Hebrew words for mourn and weep carry both ideas.

3-20. In due time, however, he rose up (AV, stood up) from his mourner's place on the ground and went manfully about the business of procuring a burying place and arranging for the funeral. Instead of taking Sarah's body back to Haran or Ur, he chose to find a sepulchre in the land God had given him. He dealt with the native Hittites and bought, at considerable expense, the cave of Machpelah so that his family might own a choice burying place for all time to come. In trading with the owners, Ephron and the others, he called himself a sojourner and a settler in that part of the world, indicating that his origin was foreign and his period of stay in the land uncertain. The children of Heth (Hittites) called him a mighty prince (AV) or a prince of God (v. 6). They held him in high esteem. Machpelah, a double cave, became the burial place of Sarah, Abraham, Isaac, Rebekah, Jacob, and Leah. In later years it became a Moslem possession, and a mosque was built over it.

14) Eliezer, Isaac, and Rebekah. 24:1-67. The old patriarch was well advanced in years (Heb. entered into days). Isaac was still unmarried. Abraham was concerned that his heir find a wife from his own people, instead of from the Canaanites. He chose his trusted servant, Eliezer, to make the long journey to Mesopotamia to find Isaac's bride.

1-9. Abraham said unto his eldest servant . . . take a wife unto my son Isaac (AV). Before Eliezer left, Abraham gave him full directions and demanded from him a sacred vow. Putting a hand under another's thigh was a solemn way of signifying that if the oath were violated, the children, yet unborn, would avenge the act of disloyalty. By means of the oath, the servant would be bound more effectively to secure an acceptable wife for Isaac. Abraham assured him of God's help: He shall send his angel before thee, and thou shalt take a wife unto my son from thence (AV).

10-14. And the servant . . . arose, and went . . . unto the city of Nahor. The servant had been promised divine guidance, and he was anxious to be led. A devout man, who sought to know God's will, he prayed fervently and trustfully that minute directions might be given. A mistake, he felt, would be disastrous. Surely Eliezer was God's man for a highly important quest. The city of Nahor. Either the city of Haran or a city named Nahor in the vicinity of Haran. Mesopotamia is the translation of the Hebrew which might literally be rendered "Aram of the two rivers," i.e., the region of the Tigris and Euphrates river valleys. Bethuel was the father of Laban and Rebekah. His parents were Nahor and Milcah. Abraham was his uncle.

15-28. When the servant met Rebekah at the well, he was convinced that God had answered his prayer and had guided him directly to her. The girl was beautiful and intelligent, and answered precisely to every requirement he had stipulated. So Eliezer presented her with a few preliminary gifts—a ring for the nose and then two bracelets, all showy and extremely valuable. Other gifts were to follow when the family gathered in the tent of Rebekah's mother.

29-31. Laban . . . Eliezer . . . Rebekah. Laban betrayed his true character when, upon seeing the expensive ring and bracelets, he decided that nothing should be spared in holding on to Eliezer. He could not fail to be hospitable to a man who could make such gifts. The ornaments were but the beginning. Soon jewels of silver and jewels of gold, and beautiful clothes were bestowed upon Rebekah. And precious things (v. 53), special gifts, were presented to the mother and the brother of the bride. In a way these gifts made up for the loss of such a beloved member of the family. The custom of presenting valuable gifts to the members of the bride's family goes back at least as far as the time of Hammurabi (1728–1686 B.C.). Perhaps it came out of the time when the bride was actually purchased.

34-48. Eliezer narrated in some detail the striking fulfillment of his prayer for guidance and assurance. The godly man knew that the Lord had led him and that Rebekah was God's choice for his young master.

49-61. Without waiting for a conference with the selected bride, the other members of the family gave their definite commitment: Rebekah would be Isaac's bride. They were disposed to keep the girl for a while (perhaps for several months), but the maiden, when asked what she preferred, declared her willingness to begin the journey immediately. It was a momentous decision for a girl to make. Her new home was a long way off, and she would probably never see her family again. She was stepping out on faith, even as Abraham had done years before. New life in Canaan was to be her reward.

62-65. Isaac went out to meditate. Isaac was waiting for his bride near Beerlahai-roi, where Hagar had found hope and cheer and divine direction. Hebrew sûăḥ, usually translated meditate, has been rendered "walk about," "pray," "wail," "lament," or "moan." Verse 67 may throw some light on its meaning. Isaac needed comforting. It is possible that Sarah had passed away during the absence of Eliezer. The narrative describes Rebekah as literally leaping down from the camel in respect for Isaac and proper consideration for his importance. She quickly adjusted her veil, in keeping with accepted rules of etiquette. A betrothed woman remained veiled until the marriage had been consummated. Only then might her husband look upon her face.

66,67. Eliezer gave Isaac a full report of all that had happened on the long journey. Isaac saw that God had led the servant to choose Rebekah and recognized that His will in the matter was to be carried out. He installed Rebekah in Sarah's own tent, and thus she became the first lady of the land. Two verbs stand out in the closing verse of the chapter: Isaac . . . loved her: and . . . was comforted. Love came naturally, bringing comfort and joy to Isaac's heart. It was fitting that the lonely soul should find a woman who was lovely and lovable. Isaac's love engendered understanding, considerateness, and gentleness of soul. It was especially good that the young woman, so far from home, was blessed with a husband who truly loved her. The word "comfort" has even deeper overtones when considered in the light of heart and home and marriage. Isaac stood in desperate need of "comfort." Rebekah provided something that had been sadly lacking since the home-going of his mother. Hebrew nāḥam, "comfort," actually means to give strength or staying power (cf. Jer 10:4, where the idol builder is said to "comfort his idol with nails and with hammers"). The man of quiet, passive, timid faith was joined in marriage to a woman so bold, so adventurous, so ambitious, that she was destined to bring him grief in the years ahead. Yet God was leading, and would use even these imperfect individuals to work out his will for his people.

15) Closing Days of Abraham. 25:1-18.

1-6. Abraham took a wife . . . Keturah. In addition to Sarah and Hagar, Abraham took Keturah as a secondary wife or concubine (I Chr 1:32). This must have occurred many years before the death of Sarah, for several sons are listed. The sons and grandsons of Hagar and Keturah received gifts from the hand of Abraham, but all the property and authority and spiritual possessions went to Isaac, the patriarch's legal heir.

7-10. At the age of 175 Abraham came to the end of his earthly sojourn and expired. He gave up the ghost. The expression is derived from Hebrew gāwa', "to breathe out his breath," "to fail," "to sink." Immediately he was gathered to his father's kin (literally), and took up his residence in Sheol, the place of departed spirits. He died in a good old age . . . and full. A fitting epitaph for a great man of God. His life was truly finished and fully rounded out. He had lived adventurously. He had moved forward in faith along the way pointed out by God. Standing by the sepulchre at the cave of Machpelah were the two sons (v. 9) whom he had loved with unsurpassed affection. Isaac and Ishmael were united in a common grief and a common devotion to the one who had meant most to them. Doubtless Isaac was strengthened in his bereavement by the realization that he stood in the special favor of God and would not have to carry on alone. For he was to be the heir of the rich covenant blessings promised to and through Abraham.

B. Isaac. 25:19–26:35.

1) Isaac and His Family. 25:19-34.

19-23. Sarah, Rebekah, Rachel, and Hannah were all barren, and therefore childless until late in life. It was a tragic experience for each of them. Isaac entreated the Lord for Rebekah. The Hebrew verb 'ātar means "to pray as a suppliant," "to entreat." When it is used in the passive sense, it indicates that the subject has been prevailed upon by means of the praying, and has answered. Isaac prayed fervently for his barren wife, and Jehovah yielded to the entreaty. Rebekah ceased to be sterile, and conceived. Prevailing prayer had been honored by God.

24-34. There were twins in her womb (v. 24). Even before Esau and Jacob were born, they struggled with each other in their prenatal confinement. And they continued the conflict as they grew up. Today their many descendants are passionately striving to gain the advantage over each other in the Middle East. Esau became the hairy man of the field, with little appreciation of spiritual values. He plunged venturesomely along through life, only to find himself defrauded of the best things and checkmated by a cunning supplanter. Jacob derived his inspiration from Rebekah, who stopped at nothing to gain her ends. Isaac was too feeble to keep abreast of underhanded doings or to deal with the combination of Jacob and Rebekah. Esau seemed to be concerned with material matters only. To him, the birthright, which involved both material and spiritual blessings, seemed of little value until he had bargained it away. The birthright was the possession of the first-born. It guaranteed him a more honorable position than his brother's, the best of the estate, and the richest land, as well as the covenant blessings God had promised to Abraham and to his descendants. The birthright was Esau's because God had allowed him to be born first.

Neither Esau nor Jacob showed any commendable interest in spiritual treasures. Each was sordidly selfish and lacked understanding of what behavior would fit a man to be a prince of God. Jacob was ambitious to gather in for himself everything that would give him the pre-eminence. Rebekah supplied the spark and the scheming that secured advantages for her favorite son. He had a long way to go to become the spiritual leader of those who would worship Jehovah. But God was patient; he was not in a hurry; he would train his leader.

Esau made his home in the rocky hills of Edom. Years later his descendants, the people of the nation he founded, would reveal the same type of thinking he had shown and the same profane disregard for the eternal program of Jehovah of hosts. In spite of every discouraging incident, the kingdom of God would move forward toward the fuller realization of the divine purpose.

2) Isaac and Abimelech. 26:1-35.

1. And Isaac went unto Abimelech. Because there was a famine in Canaan, Isaac went to live temporarily in the land of the Philistines. This Abimelech, king of the Philistines, was not the Abimelech of Abraham's experiences. The name may have been a dynastic name of the rulers in Philistia. Gerar. A small settlement on the road to Egypt, about eleven miles southeast of Gaza.

2-5. Isaac was on the verge of deciding to move on to Egypt to seek more plentiful food and pasturage, when Jehovah appeared to him in a special theophany. The Lord warned Isaac not to go to Egypt, and encouraged him to sojourn in Philistia until he could go to dwell in the covenant land. I will be with thee, he said, and will bless thee (v. 3). At this time Jehovah definitely renewed the promises he had made to Abraham. He clearly explained that he was bestowing those blessings on Isaac because of his father's piety and faithfulness. Abraham had obeyed God's voice and kept his charges, commandments, statutes, and laws. Isaac could take hope and look with assurance for repeated fulfillments of God's promises along the way. And he could count on playing his part in God's plan, already outlined, for witnessing to all peoples.

6-11. She is my sister (v. 7). Isaac revealed something of his human weakness, in Gerar, when he let fear betray him into lying about his wife, Rebekah. Just as Abraham had done on two occasions, Isaac sought to pass his wife off as his sister. When Abimelech observed him indulging in conduct toward Rebekah that was more fitting for a husband than for a brother, he rebuked Isaac sharply for his deception. Again, one who was outside the covenant brought a stinging rebuke to one who should have been above reproach.

12-22. Following this disgraceful episode, Isaac settled down to the kind of prosperous farming that made him the envy of all the surrounding neighbors. Even Abimelech became envious and issued an order that Isaac must leave his territory. The wealthy property owner moved on a short distance to begin life afresh. He found that the natives had stopped up the wells that had been water-giving blessings since Abraham's days. Isaac had his servants reopen all these wells and also dig new ones. Whenever the men dug new wells, the Philistines made much trouble for them. The patriarch named his first new well 'Esek, contention, and the second Sitnāh, enmity. The third well, which was finished without strife, he called R'ḥōbôt, broad places.

23-33. Moving on to the vicinity of Beer-sheba, Isaac received a special communication from Jehovah assuring him of unusual and continued blessings—Fear not, for I . . . will bless thee (v. 24). Now that he was back again in hallowed territory, it was particularly appropriate that he build an altar to Jehovah and thereby announce to all that he was committed to the task set out for him. Isaac began to give evidence of a godly spirit that he had not hitherto revealed so clearly.

C. Jacob. 27:1–36:43.

1) Jacob and Esau. 27:1-46.

1-17. When Isaac was old . . . he called Esau. It is difficult to imagine all the pathos, agony, and cruel disappointment wrapped up in this colorful narrative. The old patriarch, with blinded eyes and a tottering frame, now made plans to give the sacred blessing to his first-born son. But the crafty Rebekah, who listened to his directions to Esau, immediately set about subverting and frustrating his plans. Her favorite son, Jacob, already had the birthright; she was determined that he should receive the oral blessing, too, from the lips of the Lord's representative, so that all would be well with the divine inheritance. She could not risk waiting for God to work out his plans in his own way. So she resorted to the most contemptible deceit to secure the blessing for her younger son.

18-29. And Jacob said . . . I am Esau thy firstborn. Coached by his mother, Jacob came before his old father with deception and lies. He even declared that Jehovah had helped him make his preparations with speed. After lying to his father, he planted a false kiss upon the old man's upturned face.

30-40. And Esau lifted up his voice, and wept (v. 38). The tragedy for Esau was that he was utterly ignorant of the sacredness of the blessing, and only desired the advantages it would give. His deep hurt that Jacob had outwitted him in securing the birthright, his bitter disappointment, his pathetic sobbing, and the burning shame that quickly kindled into intense hatred and desire for revenge are deeply moving.

41-46. Arise, flee thou to Laban. To save Jacob from his brother's revenge, Rebekah found a pretense for sending him away. Which of these three—Rebekah, Jacob, or Esau—was most to be pitied? Their family life was destroyed, and each had to bear lonely hours of separation, disillusionment, and regret. Rebekah would never see her favorite son again, and Jacob would have to face life without father, mother, or brother. And what about God's plans for the kingdom? How could they be worked out in the face of such selfishness, intrigue, and deceit? The Lord of hosts is not to be thwarted by men's opposition, failure, or lack of faith. He is able to make his will prevail in spite of all.

While Isaac moved a little closer to the hour of his death, and Rebekah mourned because of the distressing situation she had precipitated, and Esau thought of revenge, Jacob made his lonely way from Beer-sheba to Padan-aram.

2) Jacob, Laban, Leah, and Rachel. 28:1–30:43.

28:1-5. Isaac blessed him, and charged him . . . . go to Padan-aram (vv. 1,2). Isaac did not let Jacob go away without a blessing. He spoke in the tone of prophetic utterance, and in beautiful language that reveals his spiritual perception. Jacob was to seek a wife among his relatives in Haran, but he was to be most concerned with entering into the rich inheritance promised to Abraham. Isaac called on 'El Shadday, God Almighty (v. 3), to provide health, prosperity, and keen understanding to equip Jacob for spiritual leadership. He prophesied that if his son would commit his way to the Lord, the blessings God had promised to Abraham would all be his. Through Isaac, God gave Jacob a command, a challenge, an assurance, and direction for the journey.

6-9. Esau observed and listened, then went to Ishmael's house to get for himself a wife of the family line, who would please his parents. Evidently he wanted to make some effort in the right direction. But because he was basically worldly, his career in the land of Edom fell short of behavior that could please the Lord Jehovah.

10-17. Jacob made the journey from Beer-sheba to Luz, about twelve miles north of Jerusalem, where he spent the night. Bethel was in that immediate vicinity. In the night he was honored with a special communication from God, a vision or dream of angels ascending and descending a ladder that reached from earth to heaven. He became aware that there actually is communication between heaven and earth. He recognized in that place that God was by his side, promising him guidance through life, and future greatness. Jehovah said, I am with thee, and will keep thee . . . and will bring thee again into this land . . . I will not leave thee (v. 15). What a challenging message! No wonder Jacob exclaimed: The Lord is in this place . . . . How dreadful (awesome) is this place! (vv. 16,17) He was profoundly moved. Perhaps for the first time in his life he was conscious of the presence of God at his side. The voice, the words of hope, the actual presence of 'El Shadday brought him around to worship and awe and commitment.

18-22. He called the name of the place Beth-el, House of God, for God was there. To make this a never-to-be-forgotten experience, he set up a stone pillar to indicate that this was a holy spot, a sanctuary where intimate fellowship with God would always be possible (v. 18). Spiritually, he still had a long way to go, but he had made progress in this encounter with God. He also pledged the Lord his life and a tenth of all possessions that would become his along the way. But he made this promise conditional: If God would remain with him, keep him in the way, and bring him safely home again, he would carry out his part of the pledge. It was a long step forward. The stone (maṣṣēbâ) he erected would stand as a permanent reminder of the vow he had made (v. 22).

29:1-12. Then Jacob went on his journey (v. 1). The Hebrew idiom, lifted up his feet, tells of the young man's response to the divine encouragement. He was on his way to Padan-aram, seeking his mother's family near Haran. It was difficult to take such a long journey, but Jacob seemed to have no alternative. At last he stood at a well, in the midst of flocks of sheep, with their shepherds waiting for the big stone to be taken from the mouth of the well so that the sheep could be watered. Possibly it was the same well where Eliezer found Rebekah for the young Isaac. Though many years had passed, Laban still lived, as Jacob learned from the shepherds, and his daughter Rachel was the keeper of his flock (v. 6). When Rachel approached with Laban's flock, Jacob stepped forward to remove the big rock and to provide water for the thirsty sheep. Then he kissed his cousin and told her who he was. Deeply moved by all that had befallen him and by this first meeting with kinsfolk, Jacob lifted up his voice, and wept," while Rachel ran to tell Laban that his nephew had arrived.

13,14. Laban, brother of Rebekah, grandson of Nahor, was overjoyed to welcome one of his own bone and flesh. It had been a long time since his sister had ridden away to become Isaac's bride. He gladly received the son of Rebekah into his family circle. Perhaps he remembered the lavish display of wealth brought by Eliezer. Perhaps he was impressed by the strength of the young man, who might become a good shepherd. Almost certainly he considered the possibility of a husband for his daughters. Leah and Rachel were both eligible. Laban never missed an opportunity to drive a hard bargain. The young nephew from the hill country would learn to deal cautiously with him. In fact, Jacob would learn to outwit the chief trickster of all the "children of the East."

15-20. Rachel was unusually beautiful and attractive, and already Jacob was impressed by her. The Scripture says, Jacob loved Rachel (v. 18). Leah, the elder sister, was far from beautiful. Her eyes lacked the luster, sparkle, and attractiveness that men admire. Yet Leah was to be established so firmly in sacred history that succeeding generations would have to reckon with her. It would be one of her sons who would be chosen to take his place in the Messianic line. These four—Laban, Jacob, Leah, and Rachel—were to be significant figures in God's dealings with and through his chosen people.

21-30. After toiling seven years for the younger daughter, Jacob was deceived and tricked into marriage with Leah. After the wedding festivities for Leah, Jacob married her younger sister, Rachel, but had to work seven more years as payment for her. Thus he had two wives of equal standing. His burning love for Rachel made his relationship with Leah rather strange and disappointing. Leah must have suffered much from the realization that her husband did not love her. Yet she carried on in the hope that one day Jacob's heart would turn to her.

31-35. At first neither Rachel nor Leah bore Jacob children. In those days, to be barren was regarded as a pathetic situation. However, in time, Jehovah came to Leah's rescue and healed her barrenness, and she became a mother. One after another her sons came, until she had borne six of them. A daughter, Dinah, was added for extra measure. With heart-rending regularity, Leah held out a son with the words: Now my husband will love me. But no word of recognition or appreciation came from Jacob. The word for hatred (śānē) indicates "less affection," or "less devotion." It does not indicate positive hatred.

30:1-13. Rachel also suffered, for her sterile state did not improve, and she was not bearing sons for Jacob. Hebrew qānē', envied, has wrapped up within it the feeling of one who has borne about all she can stand. Envy, discontent, petulance marked her voice, her language, and her facial expression. Leah, Rachel, and Jacob were all unhappy. Their domestic trouble and heartache led to words and actions wholly unworthy, unnecessary, and unbecoming. Human attempts to remedy the situation proved unsatisfactory. The giving of Bilhah and Zilpah as secondary wives to help "build" the family only proved to be hurtful. Sons were born, but hearts were still out of tune and unhappy. Besides Leah's six sons and one daughter (at least), two sons were born to Bilhah and two to Zilpah.

14-24. Rachel sought to use mandrakes (dûdā'im) to induce fertility. These mandrakes were popularly called "love apples." Ryle says: "The mandrake is a tuberous plant, with yellow plum-like fruit. It was suposed to act as a love-charm. It ripens in May, which suits the mention (v. 14) of wheat harvest" (Cambridge Bible, in loco). Rachel remained barren in spite of the superstitious charms. The situation was in the hands of the Lord, and he could not honor human attempts to change it. Finally, God remembered Rachel, and God hearkened to her, and opened her womb. And she conceived, and bare a son . . . and she called him Joseph (vv. 22-24). In his own good time Jehovah gave his answer. He took away Rachel's reproach and filled her with joy and praise.

25-30. Jacob said unto Laban, Send me away, that I may go . . . to my country. When Joseph was born, Jacob had worked out in full his debt to Laban, and he was ready to return to Canaan. Had he gone at that time, he could have taken only his family; he did not own one particle of property. He requested his uncle to let him go home. Laban claimed to have received special knowledge (AV, learned by experience), by magic or divination or from his household gods, that he must keep Jacob around to guarantee success and prosperity.

31-36. He offered to let Jacob name his wages. Imagine his surprise when his nephew made him an offer that seemed overwhelmingly in his favor. In Syria the sheep were white and the goats were black, with very few exceptions. Jacob offered to start in business at once, accepting as his the sheep that were not white and the goats that were not black, and leaving the rest to Laban. Thus the two estates would be built up. Laban accepted the offer instantly. He began that day by removing to a safe distance every available "off-color" sheep and goat so that Jacob would have nothing with which to start. The separated animals he placed in the keeping of his sons. It was a low, dastardly trick. Laban believed that he had made it impossible for Jacob to win, because he had taken away all of Jacob's capital before the contest began.

37-42. But Jacob was not to be counted out so easily. He installed three devices to outwit his uncle. He set up streaked rods before the ewes at the watering places, that the coloring of the young might be subject to prenatal influence. It is an established fact, declares Delitzsch, that white lambs can be guaranteed by placing a multitude of white objects about the drinking troughs (New Commentary on Genesis, in loco). Jacob also separated the spotted and striped lambs and kids from the herd, but kept them in plain view of the ewes, that they might be influenced. His third device was to bring these predetermining influences to bear upon the stronger ewes so that his lambs and kids would be stronger and more virile than the others. Jacob was smart enough to resort to prenatal influence and selective breeding.

43. As a result of these schemes, in a few years Jacob became immensely rich in sheep and goats. Though he had used his head, he would have been the first to declare that the Lord intervened to give him the victory. Jehovah was making it possible for the patriarch to return to the promised land with substance, and become the prince of God, who would do the divine will.

3) Jacob's Return to Canaan. 31:1-55.

1-3. The countenance of Laban . . . was not toward him as before. Finally, the relations of uncle and nephew reached the breaking point. Jacob saw that Laban and his sons felt hostile toward him because of his success. Besides, he had gained enough wealth and possessions to satisfy him. So, when he received direct marching orders from the God of Bethel, he knew it was time to return home. Twenty years had passed, during which time his mother had died. Perhaps Laban would therefore become even more disagreeable. It was the hour for moving out. 4-13. Jacob explained his decision to his wives, telling them how the angel of God had spoken to him in a dream and encouraged him in his purpose. The "angel" had identified himself with the one who had appeared to Jacob at Bethel. He was actually Jehovah himself. 14-16. Leah and Rachel strongly endorsed Jacob's decision. They knew their father, and they had lost their love and respect for him. They remembered that he had collected fourteen years of work from Jacob without giving them the part that a bride could rightfully expect. Are we not counted of him strangers? they said. For he hath sold us, and hath quite devoured also our money (v. 15).

17-21. Jacob set his flocks, herds, children, and possessions in readiness for the long journey, and waited until Laban had gone away for a sheepshearing festival. Meanwhile Rachel made sure Jacob's claim to a good share of the birthright by taking the images or t'rāpîm (cf. Latin penates), actually "household gods," highly prized by Laban. Nuzu tablets from the fifteenth century B.C. indicate that possession of the t'rāpîm marked a man as the chief heir. Evidently Rachel had not learned to trust in Jehovah to provide for her needs. Jacob had failed to teach his family to trust and worship God with all their hearts. Soon Jacob and his company moved out from Haran, crossed the Euphrates, and journeyed as rapidly as they could toward Canaan. Their immediate goal was the hill country of Gilead on the eastern side of the Jordan River.

22-24. Laban . . . . pursued after him. After three days Laban learned of the flight. As soon as he could get his men organized for pursuit, he was on his way to overtake them. Even though it was a journey of three hundred miles, he was able to catch the fleeing group in the hill country of Gilead. On the way, Laban received a strange message from God, a command to abstain from bringing any pressure to bear on Jacob. He was not to speak either good or bad to him, i.e., he was not to say anything. (Opposites are frequently used in Scripture to indicate totality.)

25-35. Laban could not be deterred by divine visitations. He began his remonstrance by expressing his great distress over having his daughters and grandchildren dragged away without suitable farewells. Suddenly he followed with the question: Why hast thou stolen my gods? He referred to his t'rāpîm (v. 30; cf. 19). Evidently Laban was more concerned over losing his images than over losing Jacob's family. Search failed to discover these little "gods," for Rachel had hidden them in the wicker basket that formed a part of the saddle on which she sat. This camel's furniture (v. 34) gave an Eastern lady some comfort and privacy as she journeyed.

36-55. Doubtless Jacob found great relief of spirit in replying to Laban. The air was thoroughly cleared, and Laban lost the sting from his tongue. The two men made a covenant with each other, ratifying it and commemorating the event by raising a heap of stones on top of a hill. The heap formed what was called mizpah or "outlook point," where a watcher could see the entire country in both directions. It indicated suspicion and lack of trust. By raising such a heap the men signified that they invited Jehovah to sit in the lookout post to keep watch over two people who could not be trusted. God was to be a sentry to watch both Laban and Jacob, in the hope that strife might be avoided. Jacob was bound by the promise to treat Laban's daughters with kindness and consideration. Neither of the parties to the covenant must pass that point on the border to do violence to the other. Neither must ever move to do harm to the other, forever.

4) Jacob's Meeting with Esau. 32:1–33:17.

32:1-5. Jacob went on his way, and the angels of God met him. Both on the way out from Canaan and on the way back, these heavenly messengers came to Jacob to make him conscious of the heavenly presence and to assure him of divine protection. The word Mahanaim, two camps, describes an inner camp, made up of Jacob's group and an outer company, made up of the messengers of God, the outer company forming a marvelous circle of protection around the travelers. A beautiful picture of security and protection, and serenity of soul! (cf. II Kgs 6:15-17)

6-8. Esau was on his way from Edom, Jacob's couriers informed him, to meet the large company of people arriving from Padan-aram. Edom was the land south of the Dead Sea, which is often called Seir, or Mount Seir (v. 3) in the Bible. In New Testament times the people of Edom were called Idumaeans. Jacob had much fear in his heart as he remembered Esau's threats of years before and imagined that his brother was making plans to get his revenge. Four hundred men under the leadership of the wild man from Edom could be dangerous. Jacob adopted three definite moves to guarantee safety. First, he went to the Lord in humble prayer. Second, he sent lavish presents to Esau to secure his good will. Third, he arranged his families, his possessions, and his fighting men to the best possible advantage, and prepared to put up a good fight if it became necessary.

9-12. In his prayer Jacob reminded the Lord that He had summoned him to make the journey to Canaan and had promised him protection and victory. The prayer was sincere and humble, an earnest entreaty for safety, deliverance, and protection in the emergency that confronted him. Though no word of confession came forth from the petitioner's lips regarding the wrongs he had done to Esau and Isaac, Jacob humbly admitted that he was wholly unworthy of God's favor—literally, I am less than all (v. 10). He showed his fear of God and faith in him. He was literally casting himself on the arm of the Lord for victory and deliverance.

13-21a. The present (AV), or gift minḥâ was an elaborate one, consisting of at least 580 beasts from Jacob's choice herds and flocks. The minḥâ was the usual present given to a superior with the intent of securing favor and good will. Jacob said: I will appease (kipper) him (v. 20). The word is a significant one in its reference to atonement. Its literal sense is, I will cover. By means of the gift, Jacob hoped to "cover" Esau's face so that he would overlook the injury and dismiss his anger. His next word—so that he will accept me—is, literally, so that he will lift up my face. This is symbolic language, indicating full acceptance after forgiveness. Jacob was exceptionally humble, courteous, and conciliatory in his messages to Esau. He called Esau "my lord," and spoke of himself as "thy servant." He would leave no stone unturned to effect reconcilation.

21b-23. On the night before Esau's arrival, Jacob met the crucial test of his entire life. After seeing his wives and children safely across the Jabbok, he returned to the north bank to be alone in the darkness. The Jabbok was a tributary of the Jordan, which joined it about halfway between the Sea of Galilee and the Dead Sea. Today the Jabbok is known as the Zerka.

24-32. There wrestled a man with him until the breaking of the day. In the loneliness of the dark night Jacob was met by a man who wrestled with him. Hebrew 'abaq, to "twist," or "wrestle," has some connection with the word Jabbok. After a long struggle, the unknown visitor demanded that Jacob release him. This Jacob refused to do until the stranger blessed him. The "man" asked Jacob to tell his name, which means supplanter. Then the stranger declared that from then on he would have a new name with a new meaning. The word Israel can be translated he who striveth with God, or God striveth, or he who persevereth"; or, it may be associated with the word śar, "prince." The "man" declared: Thou hast striven with God . . . and hast prevailed. It was an assurance of victory in dealing with Esau, as well as assurance of triumphs all along the way. In the titanic struggle, Jacob came to realize his own weakness and the superiority of the mighty One who had touched him. At the moment of yielding, he became a new man, who could receive the blessings of God and assume his place in God's plan. The new name, Israel, suggests royalty and power and sovereignty among men. He was destined to be a God-governed man instead of an unscrupulous supplanter. He had come through defeat into power. All the rest of his life he would be crippled; yet his limp would be a reminder of his new royalty.

Peniel (or Penuel) means face of God. The i and the u are mere connecting vowels joining the substantives pen and el. It is probably to be located up the Jabbok Valley about seven or eight miles from the Jordan. Jacob had seen the face of God and still lived. He would never forget that incredible experience.

33:1-3. Jacob lifted up his eyes, and . . . behold, Esau came. Finally, the moment of meeting arrived. Esau, with his four hundred men, came in sight. With fear and trepidation, and yet with his most engaging manner, Jacob met his estranged brother and prostrated himself before him seven times. Thus, he indicated complete subservience. 4-11. Esau, in his response, revealed a generous and magnanimous spirit that was almost too good to be true. He had harbored hostility for Jacob, and he had brought four hundred strong men along with him as if he planned to carry out his old threat. But he did not. His heart was changed. God had turned his hatred into magnanimity. He came to meet Jacob with understanding and forgiveness. In the twenty years that had intervened, the controlling hand of God had wrought changes in both men. Now the one who had so recently been humbled before God found his way smoothed out for him.

12-17. Jacob's gift-giving and Esau's eager and affectionate welcome gave evidence that the days ahead could bring new victories for God's kingdom. These men would not fight and kill each other. Although Jacob did not accept Esau's generous offer of protection, nor his urgent invitation to come to Mount Seir, he greatly appreciated his brother's magnanimous spirit. Esau had shown that he could forgive and forget. The brothers parted in peace. At Succoth (booths) Jacob, with his company, found a home (v. 17). He actually built a house there. Succoth was a magnificent highland site on the eastern side of Jordan and north of the Jabbok.

5) Jacob and His Family at Shechem. 33:18—34:31. Evidence is not conclusive regarding the length of Jacob's stay in Succoth. It may have been a long time. After he had made peace with Esau, he had no occasion to hurry. Before crossing the Jordan, he probably spent several years in the well-watered region to the east of the river.

33:18-20. Crossing the river, he found himself in the vicinity of Shechem, where Abraham had paused on his first journey into the land of Canaan. Shechem was approximately forty-one miles north of Jerusalem, in the valley between Mount Ebal and Mount Gerizim. Jacob's well was there and Sychar was not far away. Jacob bought a parcel of ground in the vicinity of Shechem, and in this way established claim to property in Canaan. He had been commanded to go back to the land of his fathers and to his kindred, probably meaning the vicinity of Hebron. Certainly he should have gone at least as far as Bethel. He was to learn that the people of Shechem would not be a help to his family.

34:1-5. Dinah, a daughter of Jacob and Leah, made a disastrous visit to the near-by city of Shechem. The immature girl had no background of spiritual understanding to sustain her in her hour of need. Shechem, the young son of Hamor, fell desperately in love with her, and soon the tragic consequences were known in Jacob's family. Hebrew lāqaḥ, took (v. 2), indicates that an irresistible force was used. The word ānâ, defiled (AV), indicates dishonorable treatment. The poor girl was ruined. Immediately Shechem spoke to the heart (v. 3, marg.) of the distressed one he had wronged, seeking to console her. He loved her and wanted her for his wife.

6-12. The word nᵉbālâ, folly, indicates a shameful, vile, senseless deed that displays utter insensibility in moral behavior. To Jacob and his sons, Shechem's deed was an act of grave immorality, an outrage against decency and family honor. Hamor and Shechem sought to arrange a marriage, since Shechem loved the girl. Jacob was ready to make an agreement with them. The mōhar—present to the bride—would be good. The two groups would be bound together so that intermarriage would be legal. 13-24. However, the sons of Jacob were hotheaded, unyielding, and unscrupulous. Under the guise of requiring religious observance, they made the Shechemites agree to be circumcised. All the men of the tribe submitted to the rite. 25-29. Then Simeon and Levi led an attack on the city. Jacob's sons cut down all the men while they were incapacitated for fighting, and took away their families and possessions. In the history of the patriarch's family, it is a sordid chapter of passion, cruelty, and disgrace.

30,31. God's chosen people in his holy land had behaved like cruel pagans. Poor old Jacob was distressed. He reminded his sons that they had made it difficult for him to keep the good will of the neighboring peoples. His attitude was unworthy of a man of faith who was God's chosen representative to the peoples of the earth. Selfish fear seemed to be uppermost in his thinking. He did not rebuke his sons for their unspeakable cruelty, nor did he express sorrow because God's honor had been poorly represented. Jacob had spent twenty years in Laban's land, and now probably another ten years at Succoth and Shechem without doing anything noteworthy to prepare his family spiritually for the strong currents of life. He had been too busy building a material empire and gaining worldly advantage to attend to his children's ethical and spiritual foundations. He had yet to reach Bethel. Would it be too late for Dinah and Simeon and Levi and all the others? The story could make even a strong man weep.

6) The Return to Bethel. 35:1-29.

1. Jehovah uttered a solemn command to Jacob to move on to his goal: Arise, go up to Beth–el, and dwell there: and make there an altar. Bethel was 1,010 feet higher than Shechem and situated on the road that led to Jerusalem, Bethlehem, and Hebron. Jacob had tarried too long on his way to that holy place. He was now to build an altar there, as Abraham had done on his memorable journey into Palestine. Jacob had set up a maṣṣēbâ, i.e., a stone pillar, after his never-to-be-forgotten experience with Jehovah, when he fled toward Haran. This return visit to the holy place would involve a full commitment of his life to the Lord. He had neglected the altar of God. The spiritual emphasis had been absent from his thinking and living.

2-7. Immediately and obediently, Jacob made ready to journey to Bethel. First, he called on his semipagan family to purify themselves (v. 2), to put away all terāpîm and visible representations of foreign gods. Then the family of Jacob moved out on their holy pilgrimage to Bethel. The people of the places through which they passed were so awed by the terror of God that they did not molest the pilgrims (v. 5). When Jacob came to Luz, he knew he was about to walk on holy ground. He erected an altar to Jehovah and called the place El-beth-el, the God of the house of God.

9-15. Again God appeared to Jacob and assured him that his new name, Israel, would be a constant reminder of his new character, his new relation to Jehovah, and his kingly walk in the divine way of life. He was the heir of the promises made to Abraham. The covenant was still in full force, and it would continue to be binding upon him and his descendants. In speaking with Jacob, God used His name, God Almighty, 'El Shadday, "the all-sufficient One" (v. 11). Jacob could count on 'El Shadday to supply any and every need, and to give the grace for any emergency.

16-20. Now Rachel, who had provided the inspiration and the love Jacob needed, came to the end of her way. She died in giving birth to her second son, whom she named Ben-oni, son of my sorrow. But Jacob chose the name Benjamin, son of my right hand. Rachel must have been buried somewhere south of Bethel, on the road to Hebron (cf. 35:16,19). Bethel was ten miles north of Jerusalem, and Bethlehem was about six miles south of Jerusalem. It is usually concluded that Rachel was buried in the immediate vicinity of Bethlehem. The traditional site is still pointed out to visitors to that city.

27-29. Isaac continued to live until Jacob's return from Haran. From Beersheba he had moved to Mamre, very near the old city of Hebron. There Abraham had purchased the Cave of Machpelah for the burial place of Sarah. Now, at the age of 180 years, Isaac gave up the ghost, and died. The single Hebrew word gāwā' means to "fail," or to "sink down." In the hour of burial, Esau and Jacob stood together at the grave, to honor their father. The brothers were united in a common grief, as Ishmael and Isaac had been at the grave of Abraham.

7) Edom and Its People. 36:1-43. Before recounting the life story of Joseph, the writer of Genesis describes something of the land of Edom and its inhabitants. The original inhabitants of Mount Seir were called Horites or Hurrians. In the course of time, Esau and his descendants took over the territory. Esau became wealthy and possessed much cattle and sheep. The principal cities of the area were Sela, Bozrah, Petra, Teman, and Ezion-geber. The Edomites continued to be hostile to the Israelites throughout OT times (cf. Obadiah, especially vv. 10-15).

D. Joseph. 37:1–50:26.

1) Joseph's Early Experiences. 37:1-36.

1-11. Joseph, the older son of Rachel, was a favorite of his father Jacob. For this and other reasons he became exceedingly unpopular with his brothers. For one thing, he reacted strongly against their unethical and immoral behavior, and frankly reported on them, thus gaining for himself the name of talebearer. To make matters worse, his father made for him royal tunics, with long, flowing sleeves, which set him out from the group as the favored one. The natural inference was that Jacob had chosen Joseph to be the one through whom the divine blessings would flow. Furthermore, Joseph dreamed dreams that pointed to his future outstanding greatness, and he told his dreams to his brothers.

Jacob's sons were incensed to hear from Joseph's lips the announcement that he would rule over them. He, the young favored prince, evidently believed that he was to have the pre-eminence over his entire family. In his guileless talk, he stirred up all the fires of envy and murderous hatred. Yet God did have in mind some wondrous blessings for the lad, as time would reveal. Joseph should have been counseled about the proper way to deal with imperfect creatures who resented his manner and his air of superiority (as they thought). How he needed a wise counselor! Jacob apparently loved him so ardently and so blindly that he could not guide him wisely.

12-28. The brothers harbored malice in their hearts until they determined to get rid of Joseph. They had plenty of time to formulate a plot to accomplish their purpose. From Hebron, where they lived, to Shechem in the north, these men went to find pasture land for their flocks and herds. Jacob sent Joseph to Shechem to visit his other sons and bring him word of their welfare. On arriving in the vicinity of Shechem, Joseph learned that his brothers had moved on to Dothan, about fifteen miles farther north. When the brothers saw Joseph coming, they plotted to kill him, though Reuben sought to save the lad's life. Reuben talked the others into putting Joseph into a cistern, hoping to pull him out later. Judah subsequently convinced his brothers that it would be wise to take the boy out of the cistern and sell him to a caravan passing on the way to Egypt. Reuben had planned to take the boy home to his father. Judah planned to save him from starving. As it turned out, Joseph found himself a prisoner of a company of Ishmaelites (v. 25) or Midianites. Soon he would be a slave in some Egyptian family. Both Ishmaelites and Midianites were descendants of Abraham. Perhaps the band was made up of men from both these peoples.

29-35. Reuben, the first-born, was directly responsible for the lad to his father. Painfully he and the others faced Jacob with a bloodly coat and a deceitful tale that practically broke the heart of the old patriarch. He was convinced that his favorite son was dead. The one who, in his youth, had been a champion deceiver was now cruelly deceived. His grief knew no bounds. He wailed: I will go down to Sheol mourning for my son. Hebrew Sheol describes the underground abode of the dead, answering to Greek "Hades." There, according to tradition, disembodied spirits continue to exist in shadowy regions that have no exit and no communication with God or man. It is a mere half existence. Jacob realized that he would be going to Sheol soon, but he had no hope of seeing an end to his poignant sufferings until that hour.

36. The Ishmaelites sold Joseph to Potiphar, an official in the court of Pharaoh. Evidently Potiphar was the chief of the executioners (marg)) The word probably referred to the work of slaughtering animals for the royal kitchen or perhaps the animals used for sacrifice. The youthful Joseph was appointed steward of Potiphar's residence. He was a long way from home and, seemingly, even farther away from the realization of his heaven-sent dreams of pre-eminence. However, Joseph's God was still working out his purposes and plans. And he was about to use Potiphar and Pharaoh to advance his divine program.

2) Judah and Tamar. 38:1-30. In the midst of the narrative describing Joseph's career in Egypt, the writer of Genesis introduces the account of Judah's shameful involvement among the Canaanites. Judah was the leading member of Jacob's family, one destined to be the channel of all Jehovah's rich promises to and through Abraham to later generations and the world. Judah's name was to be prominent in the Messianic line. David would be one of his honored descendants.

2-11. Judah saw . . . a daughter of a certain Canaanite, whose name was Shuah; and he took her. This sidelight on family life in Canaan reveals to what depths of immorality some, at least, of the Chosen People had fallen. Judah married the daughter of Shuah, a pagan Canaanite, and thus started a chain of sinful events. Two sons, Er and Onan, died without leaving children. Judah promised Tamar, who had been the wife of the brothers, one after the other, that she should have his third son, Shelah, for a husband, when he came of the right age. The family line must not die out.

12-23. In time, when Tamar realized that her father-in-law was not keeping his promise, she took things into her own hands. Pretending to be one of the kedēshôt (religious prostitutes), she tricked Judah into having illicit relations with her. 24-26. When Judah learned that Tamar was with child, he declared her worthy of death, only to find that he was the guilty father of her child. He said: She hath been more righteous than I (AV). 27-30. The account of the birth of the twins, Perez and Zerah, closes the chapter. The contrast between Joseph and his elder brother would be more sharp when Joseph revealed his behavior in his hour of temptation. Judah needed to become a new man to be pleasing in the Lord's sight.

3) Joseph and the Wife of Potiphar. 39:1-23.

1-6b. And Joseph was brought down to Egypt. When Joseph took up his work at Potiphar's house, he was a slave and an alien. First, he became a personal attendant to the Egyptian officer. When Potiphar found him alert, quick, and trustworthy, and saw that the Lord was with him (v. 3), he set him over the entire establishment as his trusted overseer. In his new position Joseph was responsible for every detail of the management of the house, with one exception: As a foreigner, he could not see to the preparation of food (cf. 43:32).

6c. Joseph was unusually attractive. He was like his mother, Rachel, of whom it was said: "Rachel was beautiful and well favored," i.e., "fair in form" and "fair in looks" (cf. 29:17). In addition, Joseph radiated a sweet, clean godliness that made him even more appealing. 7-13. Potiphar's wife could not resist the temptation to make a conquest of Joseph. Apparently she had nothing to occupy her mind and no principles to undergird her in the hour of temptation. For Joseph, who lived constantly in communion with the holy God, to sin with the woman was utterly out of the question. It would have been sin against God, and unfair to the man who trusted him so implicitly. Even though the temptation came with subtle, sudden, strong appeal, Joseph's victory was assured.

14-20. Frustrated, the temptress became a slanderer. In a rage she went forth to accuse Joseph falsely of evil intent, hoping to stir up sympathy on the part of other servants, and to make her husband angry enough to kill the young man. The circumstantial evidence was strongly incriminating. Potiphar was enraged. However, in spite of the seriousness of the charge, he evidently had some question in his mind about Joseph's guilt, for he did not kill him. Instead, he hurried him off to the prison (the "Round House"). This prison was probably a famous round tower or dungeon where prisoners connected with official life were housed. The Hebrew sōhar, prison, may be an attempt to translate an Egyptian word.

In the Egyptian Tale of the Two Brothers, there is an interesting parallel to the experience of Joseph. In that story a man who was married lived in the same house with his brother. The wife of the first man accused the younger brother of improper advances. The husband, though enraged, sought to know the truth about the matter. On finding his wife guilty, the husband executed her. This story dates back to the days of Seti II, that is, to about 1180 B.C.

21-23. Life in prison was not desirable, but the narrative declares that the Lord was with Joseph. What a difference that made! He was enabled to enjoy comfort and strength.

4) Joseph's Prison Experiences. 40:1-23.

1-4. The butler . . . and . . . baker had offended their lord the king of Egypt . . . And Pharaoh . . . . put them in ward. Even in the prison Joseph could not be kept down. He was given supervision of the prisoners, and he ministered unto them. The old dungeon became a different place because of his presence. God was blessing others through Joseph's thoughtfulness and kindness. Potiphar had put him where his remarkable talents could still be felt. The butler (mashgēh), or drink-giver, was a valued member of Pharaoh's household. In Neh 1:11 the word is translated "cupbearer." Nehemiah, who bore that title, was a trusted official in the palace of the Persian monarch. the baker ('ōpeh) was the superintendent of the bakery, responsible for seeing to it that the monarch's food was safe and palatable. These two high officials in the royal household had offended Pharaoh. Pending investigation, they were confined in the same prison to which Joseph had been committed.

5-23. It was the duty of the young Hebrew to wait on these two prisoners. Finding them upset and disturbed, he inquired concerning their needs. They had dreamed dreams that they could not understand. And no official interpreter of dreams was available. Joseph reminded them that God could give the meaning. Then they told him their dreams, and he explained what they signified. The butler would have a pleasant surprise: Within three days he would be granted an official release from prison to go back to his work at the king's side. The baker would be released at the same time, but his head would be severed from his body and his carcass would be hung out in the open to become food for the birds. Joseph made one request of the butler: Have me in thy remembrance when it shall be well with thee, and shew kindness . . . . and make mention of me unto Pharaoh (v. 14). Joseph wanted to be free to live and help bring about the full will of God in his life.

5) Joseph and Pharaoh. 41:1-57.

1-8. At the end of two full years . . . Pharaoh dreamed: and, behold, he stood by the river. The king dreamed that he stood by the Nile (y'ōr), the giver of life and refreshment to the ground. (The country depended on the river to provide heaven-sent irrigation year after year.) And he saw seven well-fed cattle grazing in a meadow. Presently seven thin cattle came along and ate up the fatter ones. Again, he saw seven good ears of grain on one stalk, and seven poorer ones appeared and devoured them. These dreams deeply disturbed Pharaoh, especially when no man could be found to interpret them. The magicians (ḥartummîm) were the sacred scribes who had more knowledge of the occult than any of the other wise men in the realm. But even they were baffled and helpless this time. Their special training in the sacred mysteries proved inadequate for interpreting these dreams. What did it all mean? the king wondered. Who could tell him?

9-24. Suddenly the chief butler remembered Joseph, after having forgotten him for two years, and told Pharaoh of his ability to interpret dreams. Quickly the young Hebrew was summoned. In a brief time he appeared at the palace, shaved and immaculately dressed. Pharaoh said he had heard that Joseph could interpret dreams, but Joseph made it quite clear that the interpretation must come from the Lord: God shall give Pharaoh an answer of peace (AV, v. 16).

25-32. Without hesitation and with unusual clearness, the young man revealed to the king that his dreams foretold seven years of plenty, to be followed by seven years of devastating famine. The earlier period of seven years would be a season of fertility and bountiful harvests. The famine years would bring want and suffering and death.

33-36. Look out a man discreet and wise. Joseph went beyond mere interpretation and gave some down-to-earth advice. No time was to be lost. A wise man of superior ability must be found who could supervise agricultural production, gather tremendous stores of grain, and, in due time, make wise disposition of the amassed resources. The position would demand the best man the kingdom could afford.

37-42. Fortunately, Pharaoh was a wise man, for he recognized Joseph as a man in whom the spirit of God was (v. 38). He made him the food administrator of Egypt, and appointed him the grand vizier or prime minister. He set him in command over the entire kingdom, next to himself. He had his own signet ring placed on Joseph's hand, as a badge of authority, empowering him to issue official edicts. He had him clothed in special garments reserved for Egypt's mightiest men, and a special distinguished-service chain placed about his neck.

43. Joseph was to ride in a chariot and be regarded as second only to the king. A special official would call out to the people, "'Abrēk!" This probably meant, "Pay attention!" or Bow the knee. (AV), or something similar. It was to be made clear to all the people that an outstanding man of ability, character, and authority was before them. He was to be in complete control of affairs that meant life or death to multitudes. Privilege and responsibility vied with each other in that moment of recognition and investment. The challenging words of Mordecai to Esther might well have been spoken to Joseph: "Who knoweth whether thou art come to the kingdom for such a time as this?" (Est 4:4, AV).

45,46,50-52. Joseph was thirty years old when he stood before Pharaoh, having been in Egypt for twelve or thirteen years. From the prison to the palace in one day was a mighty step. God, who had been with the young man every minute of his life, had provided for this leap. Next, Pharaoh gave Joseph an Egyptian name — Zaphnath–paaʻneah (which, in the Coptic, according to some scholars, signifies "a revealer of secrets," or, "the man to whom secrets are revealed"; cf. AV marg.). He also gave him a wife named Asenath, who was from one of the priestly families, her father being "prince," or priest of On. On, a city of culture and religion situated about seven miles north of Cairo, was the center of sun worship. To Asenath and Joseph were born two sons, Manasseh and Ephraim. These boys, some years later, were publicly adopted into the tribe of Jacob, and became heads of two tribes of Israel.

6) The First Visit of the Brothers. 42:1-38.

1-8. And Joseph's ten brethren went down to buy corn in Egypt . . . . But Benjamin . . . Jacob sent not with his brethren . . . lest . . . mischief befall him. When famine became severe in Canaan, and starvation seemed inevitable, Jacob knew that food must be procured elsewhere. He sent his ten sons to Egypt to buy grain. Benjamin he kept at home to be a comfort to him. When the ten brothers presented themselves before the governor of Egypt to buy grain, they did not recognize him as their brother. Twelve or more years had elapsed. The slender youth they had sold had grown into a man. He stood before them now as the mightiest figure in the land of Egypt. His language, his dress, his official bearing, and his position did their part in disguising him. But Joseph recognized his brothers at once.

9-12. When he accused his brothers of being spies, he was but calling their attention to the most obvious explanation of their coming. Egyptians realized that their eastern border was especially vulnerable, and so they feared the Asiatic peoples. Joseph accused the ten men of coming to Egypt to discover the weak places in the border defenses in order to give the information to would-be invaders.

13-24. When the men told him of their father and young brother, he demanded proof of their honesty. One of them, he said, must go home to bring the youngest son to Egypt while the others remained in prison. After keeping the men in ward for three days, Joseph suggested the easier solution of holding one of them as a hostage while the other nine went home with the grain. Simeon was selected to remain in prison (v. 24). He was Jacob's second son, and tradition holds that he was the most cruel of all the brothers.

21-24. In the course of the conversation, Joseph saw that his brothers were greatly concerned and remorseful. He sensed their loyalty to Jacob and their solid family spirit. He . . . wept as he thought of the old days and the suffering the men had caused by their hostility and cruelty, and as he recognized their change of heart.

25-38. On the way back to Canaan, one of Jacob's sons made the disturbing discovery that his money was in the top of his grain sack. And when the group reached home and emptied their sacks they found every man's . . . money in his sack. They were puzzled and alarmed by the discovery. The mystery of the money, the detention of Simeon, and the news that the Egyptian governor was demanding to see Benjamin—all were too much for the aged Jacob. His grief and fear almost overwhelmed him. And he would not agree to let his youngest son go back with the others to Egypt.

7) Further Experiences with the Brothers. 43:1-34.

1-14. When they had eaten up the corn . . . their father said . . . Go again, buy us a little food (v. 2). The men assured their father that they dared not go to Egypt without Benjamin. Only when Judah offered himself as surety for Benjamin's safety, would Jacob let his youngest go. Judah said: Send the lad with me . . . . I will be surety for him. Judah actually pledged his own life to guarantee the safe return of Benjamin (cf. 44:32-34). Surely the sons of Jacob had learned much since the day they had sought to kill Benjamin's brother. When Jacob saw that Benjamin had to go, he directed his sons to prepare a bountiful minḥâ, present (v. 11), for the man—some of the best honey, the choicest fruits, the rarest nuts, and other of the best delicacies of the land. He also directed them to take back double the money they had found in their sacks. No doubt the second portion of money was to be used to pay for the grain they were to purchase this time. Before sending his sons away, Jacob prayed that God Almighty ('El Shadday) might keep them and supply every need (v. 14).

15-34. When they arrived in Egypt, they were startled to find that they were to go to the governor's house to dine. The news puzzled and alarmed them. They feared that some dreadful punishment was to be visited upon them, for they did not know what to expect from the grand vizier of Egypt. When the great man entered the room where they were, they bowed themselves to him to the earth in full homage (v. 26). Joseph treated them kindly and graciously, providing a banquet for them, at which he showered extra gifts on Benjamin. He found himself powerfully stirred as he had fellowship with them. It was an occasion the brothers could not forget. They feasted and drank largely. By the time the meal was over, Joseph knew the men much better; he knew that they had changed!

8) Judah's Sacrificial Proposal. 44:1-34. Joseph had one final test for his brothers, one calculated to give him a clear picture of their inner hearts.

1-5. He ordered his steward to prepare the bags of grain as before and place his silver goblet or bowl in the bag Benjamin would be carrying. Put every man's money in his sack's mouth. And put my cup . . . in the sack's mouth of the youngest. This goblet was a "divining cup" (cf. v. 5), a prized possession, used for receiving oracles or pictures of coming events. First, water was poured in. Then small fragments of gold, silver, or precious stones were thrown into the water. When the water was shaken slightly, the fragments formed a "picture" or pattern. Skilled users of the device claimed to be able to divine the unknown. It was a class of magic called "hydromancy."

6-13. Joseph had the brothers arrested as they set out on their journey toward Canaan. They protested their innocence and willingly accepted the decision that the guilty person should remain in Egypt as a slave for life. To their amazement, the goblet was found in Benjamin's sack! Brought before Joseph, they were speechless with fear and despair. What could any of them do? Reuben, Benjamin, and the others were silent.

14-34. Then Judah spoke for himself and his brothers in one of the sublime utterances of literature. He offered no excuse, made no denial, but simply pled with the mighty Egyptian official for the life and freedom of Benjamin. Sir Walter Scott called this plea "the most complete pattern of genuine natural eloquence extant in any language." The spirit of self-sacrifice, once so foreign to Judah, shone forth with rare beauty. Judah frankly confessed his own sins and the sins of his brothers. To be sure, they had not stolen the grain money nor the divining cup, but they had committed the black sin of selling their brother into slavery. They had caused Joseph and their father unspeakable grief and anguish. By his references to his father's suffering, Judah revealed himself as one now keenly aware of sacred values and relationships.

The older brother's willingness to become a substitute for Benjamin marks him as a great soul. He offered himself as Joseph's servant, and begged that Benjamin and his other brothers might be sent home to bless the heart of the old father. This was the climax of God's dealings with Judah. The Lord had created in him a spiritual champion to represent Him in working out the divine plan.

9) Joseph's Invitation to Jacob. 45:1-28.

1-8. Joseph could not refrain himself . . . . And he wept aloud . . . . And . . . said unto his brethren, I am Joseph. When Joseph could no longer restrain his feelings, he gave forth his voice in weeping (literally). In a moment he had disclosed his identity and opened his great heart to his brothers. They, in their confusion and fear, were speechless. But Joseph reassured them. He declared: God did send me before you to preserve life (v. 5). He quickly took from their shoulders all the blame for an ugly deed, as he sought to interpret to them the plan and purpose of God. It was his way of centering their attention on the one supreme consideration. The providential purpose was more significant than any minor act of mortal man. That purpose involved preserving alive a remnant who could be used to work out the Lord's will in the earth.

9-24. Joseph urged his brothers to bring their father and come to Egypt to live. He explained that the famine would last five more years, but that in Egypt he could provide a home and unlimited supplies for Jacob and the entire family group. They could settle in the land of Goshen, which was about forty miles from the site of present-day Cairo. Situated in the delta of the Nile, this section was the best of the land for herds and flocks. It was near On and also Memphis, where Joseph lived. When the brothers set out for home, he sent wagons along with them for the return trip to Egypt, and filled them with grain, presents, and supplies of all kinds.

25-28. As the old patriarch Jacob listened to his sons' report, his heart became numb (fainted, AV), for he could not believe the good news about his long-lost son (v. 26). But when he saw the wagons and presents, and heard Joseph's message to him, his spirit revived and he began to look forward to joining his son in Egypt. It was a day of comfort and rejoicing for one who had seen much grief.

10) The Migration to Egypt. 46:1-34.

1-4. Israel took his journey . . . and came to Beer-sheba. Jacob almost certainly was living at Hebron at this time. His first stop on his momentous journey to Egypt was at Beer-sheba. There he offered sacrifices, and there, in a night vision, God spoke to him, encouraging him in his move and assuring him of uncounted blessings. First, he renewed the promise that Jacob's descendants would become a great nation. He made it clear that Egypt was to be the land where this increase would take place. Second, he said: I will go down with thee, thus guaranteeing protection and security. Third, he said: I will . . . bring thee up. This prediction was destined to be fulfilled after Jacob's death, in the Exodus, when the mighty hand of God would deliver His chosen ones from the power of Egypt and bring them back to Canaan. The declaration that Joseph would put his hand upon Jacob's eyes was a prophecy that the illustrious son would perform the last rites at his father's death.

5-28. Encouraged by the message from the Lord, Jacob moved out, with his descendants, from Beer-sheba and proceeded on the long journey to the land of Goshen. He chose Judah to go forward in advance of the company (sent Judah before him . . . to direct his face unto Goshen, AV), to meet Joseph and complete the arrangements for their entrance into the land.

29,30. The meeting of Jacob and Joseph was a moment of great gladness. Both were too deeply moved to speak. They held each other in a strong embrace for a good while (v. 29). When the old patriarch could speak, he said: Now let me die, since I have seen thy face, that thou art yet alive (v. 30). He had experienced the topmost joy of life.

31-34. Before Joseph presented his family to Pharaoh, he gave them specific directions about how to reply to the ruler's questions. When asked about their calling, they were to represent themselves as shepherds. Then Pharaoh would likely assign them the land of Goshen as their dwelling place. Goshen would provide excellent grazing for their flocks and herds. They would be together, and therefore well protected from mixing with other peoples.

11) Jacob and Pharaoh. 47:1-12.

1-6. Then Joseph . . . told Pharaoh . . . My father and my brethren . . . are come. The meeting with Pharaoh was memorable. Five of the brothers, chosen for the purpose by Joseph, presented to the ruler their request that Goshen might be allotted to them, since they were shepherds. The king agreed that they should be settled in that area, where grazing was at its best. He also asked Joseph to name some of the best men among them, men of activity (v. 6), to be given places of responsibility among his cattlemen. Egypt spent much money and effort in breeding fine cattle.

7-10. The climax of the occasion was Joseph's presentation of his aged father to the king. Jacob blessed Pharaoh (v. 7). The word bārak, appearing twice, may be translated saluted, but the normal and strongly preferred meaning is blessed. At that moment the strong man of God stood before the great ruler with dignity and in the consciousness that he himself was the representative of the Almighty ('El Shadday). What could have been more natural for him than to bestow a heaven-sent blessing on the king of Egypt. He knew that he held a sublime position in God's program. With quiet dignity he spoke the holy blessing upon Pharaoh. Jacob was a special channel of divine blessings, and Pharaoh was the recipient.

When asked his age, the patriarch replied. The years of my sojourning (gûr) are an hundred and thirty years (v. 9). His life had been marked by a series of wanderings. It seemed short to him in comparison with the longer lives of Abraham and Isaac.

11,12. The land of Rameses was identical with the land of Goshen. The eastern part of the delta of the Nile comprised an area that included the place of the famous city built by Rameses in a later generation. Joseph nourished (yekalkēl) his father. The particular form of the verb kûl used here (the pilpel) may mean "to nourish," "to sustain," or "to protect." It is clear that Joseph did all of these things in providing lavish care and love for Jacob.

12) The Food Administrator. 47:13-27. As the famine conditions grew worse, the Egyptians fell into dire need. The Scripture says, There was no bread in all the land. The people came to Joseph seeking food for their families. When their money gave out, they traded their cattle for grain (v. 17). Finally, they had to pledge their lands and their bodies to Pharaoh in order to secure more food (v. 19). Thus, all the lands of the realm, except the holdings of the priests, passed into the hands of Pharaoh. A full-fledged feudal system came into being. The government furnished the people seed, and the people paid 20 per cent of their yield to the state (vv. 23b, 24). It was a distressing situation, but the people agreed to it in order to eat. They said to Joseph: Thou hast saved our lives . . . we will be Pharaoh's servants (v. 25). The extreme emergency had made drastic measures necessary. And so the people of Egypt became serfs, and their land became the property of the state.

13) Jacob and the Sons of Joseph. 47:28–48:22.

29,30. And the time drew nigh that Israel must die. Jacob lived his declining years in peace, plenty, and happiness. Before the end of his life he made Joseph promise to take his body back to Canaan for burial. His life had been a tumultuous one; he had wandered far. But he wanted his bones buried beside those of Abraham, Isaac, Sarah, Rebekah, and Leah. The burying place mentioned by Jacob was the cave of Machpelah purchased by Abraham at the time of Sarah's death (cf. Gen 23). The body of Jehovah's chosen representative would be laid to rest with those of the other patriarchs. According to the narrative (v. 31), Jacob turned over on his face and stretched out so that his head was at the head of the bed. Thus he humbly and reverently prostrated himself. The other rendering, bowed himself on the top of his staff, has nothing to commend it over the Masoretic text.

Before Jacob died, he adopted Joseph's two sons, Manasseh and Ephraim, and thus raised them to the level of his own sons. Therefore, when the promised land was allotted to the tribes many years later, Joseph was represented by two full shares. Thus Rachel became the mother of three tribes in the kingdom of Israel.

48:1-14. Joseph brought his two boys to his father to receive his benediction. He arranged his sons so that Jacob's right hand would rest upon Manasseh, the elder boy, and his left hand upon Ephraim. But though Jacob was old and almost blind, he deliberately corrected the positions by laying his right hand on the head of the younger and his left hand on Manasseh. He knew what he was doing. When Joseph sought to change his father's hands so that Manasseh would receive the chief blessing (according to custom), he was informed that Ephraim was destined to receive it (v. 19). The patriarch's solemn blessing spoken upon the sons of Joseph was as binding as a last will and testament. In it Jacob included a prediction of future prominence for each of the boys, but Ephraim's growth and effectiveness was to be far beyond Manasseh's.

15-22. When the aged man came to pronounce a special blessing upon Joseph, he referred to God in a threefold title: The God of our fathers, the God who shepherded me, and the Angel of deliverance. Thus, the ancestral, the personal, and the redemptive aspects of God were represented. Hebrew ro'eh (AV, fed) carries the idea of shepherding (cf. Ps 23:1). The Angel which redeemed me from all evil (AV, v. 16) identifies this One with the Angel of Jehovah who comforted Hagar (16:7; 21:17) and who warned Abraham of the imminent destruction of Sodom (Gen 18); in other words, this "Angel" was the Lord himself in his OT manifestation. Jacob said that Joseph was to possess the special 'shoulder' (sh'kem) or mountain slope of unusual value (AV, one portion above thy brethren). This probably refers to the property Jacob had acquired from Hamor, although Genesis 34 shows that Jacob repudiated the manner in which it was first taken. It was probably recaptured by Jacob later from the Amorites (cf. Jn 4:5).

14) The Solemn Blessing. 49:1-27.

1,2. Jacob called unto his sons, and said, Gather yourselves together . . . . and hear. In his farewell address to his sons, Jacob rose to the unusual stature of a prophet speaking in the poetic language of inspiration. He summoned each son in turn to his bedside to hear words of blessing, of censure, or of curse. In each case he singled out some striking trait of character as his appraisal of the man and his family group. Jacob's words constituted a prediction of future developments based on the father's knowledge of the character of each son. The men understood their father's solemn utterances to be significant and determinative predictions.

3,4. Reuben, the first-born of Leah, had enjoyed pre-eminence among his brothers. But he forfeited his natural rights. His place as the favored first-born was given to Joseph. His privileges as priest were to pass to the sons of Levi. His right to be the head of the tribes of Israel, i.e., his kingly right, would go to Judah. Thus Reuben, endowed with dignity, first-born rights, and natural excellencies, would forfeit every place of power and influence because of the instability of his character. His unspeakable sin with Bilhah gave evidence of moral weakness that spelled ruin. His uncontrolled passion (AV, unstable as water) is pictured in the Hebrew as "water without restraint pouring down in a foaming torrent" (v. 4). Though capable of dreams and plans and good intentions, he could not be counted on to carry them through to completion.

5-7. Simeon and Levi, Jacob's second and third sons by Leah, were brothers in violence. The old father could never forget their cruel massacre of the Shechemites. They revealed their true characters that day, for they violently attacked and destroyed men they had previously made helpless by strategy and deceit. At that time they were censured by their father. Now, as he lay on his death bed, they heard the biting words of his curse: I will divide them in Jacob and scatter them in Israel (v. 7b). They were not to have territory they could call their own, but would be dispersed among the other tribes. In Canaan this curse was fulfilled: the Simeonites were swallowed up into the tribe of Judah; the Levites had no territory assigned to them, but served as ministers of the sanctuary and teachers of Israel.

8-10. Judah, Jacob's fourth son by Leah, received the first unqualified praise from the old patriarch. He carried the hope of Israel upon his person. Having neither birthright nor exceptional dignity nor spiritual powers, he would emerge as the powerful leader of a people who could enthusiastically admire and praise him. (Judah means praise.) He would be feared by his enemies, for as a lion he would pursue them relentlessly until victory was his. Then, having completed his mission, he would retire to his mountain fastness to rest in the security of a stronghold that none could take. He would grasp in his hand the scepter or baton that would symbolize his mastery in the roles of warrior, king, and judge. Any nation could be happy, secure, and honored with Judah as its head and protector.

11,12. Peace, plenty and prosperity would prevail in Judah's land. The vines would be so flourishing and the grapes so abundant that the conquering rider could fasten his horse's reins to the large branches and enjoy the luscious fruit. The wine would be so plentiful that men could wash their clothes in it, if they chose. The choice grapes would provide the finest sustenance. Judah's eyes would not be red with excessive drinking (red with wine, v. 12, AV) but "bright with prosperity" (NBC), and his teeth would be "whiter than milk" (AV, white with milk). That is, Judah's land would be divinely blessed.

The phrase, until Shiloh come, was spoken by Jacob in the midst of his prophetic picture of Judah's place in the plan of God. For us, the unusual glow of his prediction is greatly enhanced by the fact that from ancient times it has been considered a Messianic message. The Hebrew may be rendered either, until Shiloh come, or till he comes whose it is. In either rendering the primary reference must be to Judah, but ultimately the Messiah is the true one who should come. In other words, the sovereignty would never depart from Judah until He came who had a right to reign. The prediction, until he come whose right it is, is repeated in Ezk 21:27. If this interpretation is correct, then Jacob's words here constitute one of the earliest appearances of the Messianic promise. That which Jacob was enabled to see was a clear picture of Judah's inheritance. But the full realization of God's purposes would not be enjoyed until the ideal ruler, the Messiah, demonstrated perfect sovereignty. Fortunately, the OT presents a distinct line of prophecies—beginning at Gen 3:15 and continuing through the Psalms and the Prophets—regarding Messiah's coming to reign as King of kings. Jacob saw Judah as the father of the royal tribe that would exert power and leadership over all the others. Through catastrophes and difficult times, God would see to it that the scepter would remain in the tribe of Judah until the ideal ruler, the Messiah, would come.

13. Zebulun, Jacob's sixth son by Leah, was to be situated in a place where commercial activity and prosperity would be possible. This may mean that territory along the seacoast was to be allotted to the tribe of Zebulun. Or, it may mean that prosperity would come to the descendants of Zebulun because of their proximity to the Phoenicians, who had unlimited access to the trade routes. Jacob mentions Sidon as being there. It is also possible that Jacob's prediction was not fully carried out when the final division of the land was made. In the song of Deborah (Jud 5) the people of Zebulun are warmly commended for their valorous stand against Sisera and his army.

14,15. Issachar, Jacob's fifth son by Leah, is represented as a strong, ox-like lover of rest and quiet. The word ḥămōr, literally, bony ass, does not refer to the wild, fleet, high-spirited animal that would catch the eye of the onlooker. On the contrary, it designates a powerful beast of burden that submits himself to the galling yoke without complaint in order that he may be free to lie quietly in ease and comfort. Thus Jacob was predicting that the tribe of Issachar would submit to the Canaanite invader, who would fasten the yoke upon them. Instead of fighting, the men of this tribe would submissively allow themselves to become slaves of the peoples of the land. They would prefer shame and slavery to courageous action.

16-18. Dan, the first son of Bilhah, would become a strong defender of his own people. He would plead their cause and defend and help them in their struggle for independence. The tribe would be small, but they would be greatly feared by neighbors who might seek to trample upon them. Jacob called Dan a horned snake in the path (AV a serpent by the way, v. 17), to cause terror and inflict quick, fatal wounds. Hebrew nāḥāsh signifies not only a snake in the grass, but a venomous reptile with deadly fangs. That is, Dan would be exceedingly dangerous to his foes. In later times members of the tribe of Dan fulfilled these words with remarkable accuracy. After a time in their original territory, the Danites moved to the north and occupied the northernmost point in Israel. These people were never distinguished for their spiritual attainments. In 931 B.C. Jeroboam set up a golden calf in Dan to provide opportunity for pagan worship.

19. Gad was the first son of Leah's handmaid, Zilpah. The aged patriarch recognized that the brave, warlike spirit of Gad would be a strong help to his people in the life in Canaan. Jacob predicted that Gad would need all his cunning, courage, and persistence in fighting, because he would be harassed by the continual attacks of desert tribes. Marauding bands would press down upon him. Jacob made use of a play on words—Gad meaning a troop—to indicate the ferocity and cruelty of the raiders from the desert. He foretold that Gad would be victorious and would be able to drive the enemy away. After the conquest of Palestine, the tribe of Gad was stationed east of the Jordan.

20. Asher, Zilpah's second son, carried a name meaning happy. Jacob pictured him in a fertile field, where wheat and wine and oil would be produced in plenteous measure. He would be prosperous and would gain riches. The delicacies he would produce would be fit for the table of a king. (Even the kings of Tyre and Sidon would desire them.) The tribe of Asher witnessed the fulfillment of that patriarchal prophecy.

21. Naphtali, the second son of Bilhah, would demonstrate a remarkable love of freedom; he was a hind let loose, Jacob said. The illustration describes a wild, swift, graceful animal that delights in the freedom provided by wooded hills and open valleys. Naphtali was to have the run of God's great outdoors. He giveth goodly words is, perhaps, a reference to the eloquent and helpful discourses that would proceed from the mouths of men of this tribe. Barak, because of his valor, became one of their prize exhibits. In Jud 5:18 we read: "Zebulun and Naphtali were a people that hazarded their lives unto the death."

22. Joseph, the first son of Rachel, received the highest praise of all the sons. A man of vision, of dreams, of moral and spiritual strength, he exemplified all that was best in the realm of OT living. In his several roles as son, brother, slave, and administrator, he demonstrated his superior character through his unwavering loyalty to his God. Jacob called Joseph a young fruit tree. Hebrew parâ (AV, fruitful bough) contains a play on the name "Ephraim." The reference is to a vigorously growing tree or vine, connoting vitality and youthfulness. As a result of being planted by a bubbling fountain (AV, well), it would continue to grow and bear fruit. In the dry country, water made the difference between sterility and fruitfulness. Moisture guaranteed fertility. A tree so strengthened could be expected to throw its branches or its tendrils over the wall in giving its plentiful fruit to the peoples of the earth.

23. As a result of this exceptional prosperity, Joseph could expect bitter jealousy and hostility. The archers would be busy in their furious attacks. This had been true in Joseph's earlier days, when his brothers, embittered by envy, sought to destroy him. Many years later, in the land of Canaan, the tribes of Ephraim and Manasseh would encounter opposition and persecution. They would have to have a living faith in Jehovah of hosts, who had proved himself the all-sufficient God. Joseph knew him and had leaned on him in every emergency. Sorely grieved . . . shot at . . . hated, translate three Hebrew words. Mārar, in the piel form, means to "provoke," "embitter," "harass." The use of this piel form, plus the word rābab adds to the intensity of the action and speaks of its repeated occurrence. The third word, sātam, carries the idea of deep-seated hatred, along with active persecution.

24,25. His bow abode in strength. In Joseph's victories there had been evidences of the firm bow and the agile hands, the special power given by the Lord. Jacob predicted that this same supernatural help could be expected on the hills of Palestine. The word translated firm or abode in strength, could well be rendered unmoved, enduring, or ever-flowing. Jacob used the titles, Mighty One of Jacob . . . the God of thy father, and the Almighty ('El Shadday), to portray the arm that would be so powerful, so dependable, so quick and agile that no foe could resist it. In simple faith he entrusted the tribe of Joseph into divine hands, and in confident faith he foretold certain victories over the enemies who awaited them. In addition to the special powers in dealing with foes, the descendants of Joseph were assured of bountiful blessings. From above, they would have abundant rain and dew. From beneath, the soil would be supplied with the ingredients that would make for food and harvests. By special divine gift, the fertility among men and animals would provide for the unending fruitfulness of the family.

26. In short, Joseph would always be considered a prince among his brothers (AV, separate from his brethren). Hebrew nezîr indicates "one set apart," or, "one who is separated or consecrated for high duties." The Nazarite was a man who had been given to God and by special vow was irrevocably committed to him. Ephraim, his son, was to have qualities that made for holy dedication to fulfill God's purpose for one who was chosen to put into action the principles so beautifully exemplified by Joseph. He was the prince among the tribes of Israel.

27. Benjamin, the younger son of Rachel, was characterized as a fierce, dangerous wolf that could do great damage. The wolf is keen and stealthy in his movements. At night he slips silently among the sheep and makes off with his prize. Hebrew tāraf means to tear into shreds. The old English word ravin means "to prey with rapacity." It speaks of fierce cruelty. The evening wolves could be as savage and destructive in the early morning. At any time they were ready for the fierce business of inhuman behavior. Ehud, Saul, and Jonathan were among the later descendants of Benjamin who gave evidence of their warlike powers. The men of this tribe became famous for their bowmen and their slingers (cf. Jud 5:14; 20:16).

15) Closing Days. 49:28–50:26.

28-33. When Jacob had finished his address of blessing, censure, and curse, he talked to his sons of his approaching death. In his final instructions, he directed his sons to take his body to Canaan for burial. Bury me with my fathers in the cave, he said, that is in the field of Ephron (v. 29). He reminded them that the family burial place already held the ashes of Abraham, Sarah, Isaac, Rebekah, and Leah. Rachel was buried in a tomb near Bethelehem (cf. 35:19,20). As soon as Jacob had finished his directions, he gathered up his feet into the bed and, without a struggle, yielded up his spirit (rûaḥ) and passed into the presence of those who had already gone into the other world (Sheol). The OT saints were far from the NT conception of life after death, but even in that early day they were aware of some unusual perceptions as they stood in the presence of the deceased members of the family. Sheol was the shadowy region where souls that had left the mortal body continued their existence.

50:1-3. Joseph revealed his strong affection for his father in continued emotional demonstration. The other sons, also, probably gave expression to their love. To make certain that Jacob's body was preserved from dissolution for the long journey to Hebron, Joseph called on his servants, the Egyptian physicians, to embalm it, and the physicians embalmed Israel (v. 2). The Egyptians were careful to preserve the body of a deceased person so that when the soul returned to take up residence again, the body would be ready for occupation. Egyptian mummies preserved for centuries bear silent witness to the remarkable efficiency of these embalmers. The word rāphā' means to "heal" or to "mend," by means of surgery or medicines. Physicians were plentiful in Egypt, and it is possible that they conducted the major part of the embalming. At any rate, Jacob's body was mummified for the journey, and must have been well preserved for the day of burial. The Egyptians mourned for him threescore and ten days (v. 3). Perhaps forty days were necessary for the embalming. Additional days were needed to complete the period of mourning, so that seventy days finally passed before the journey to Canaan began. The Egyptian nation, out of respect for Joseph, shared in the mourning.

4-6. In securing official permission to leave the kingdom, Joseph quoted his father's request that he be buried in my grave which I have digged. The Hebrew word kārâ may be translated dig or buy. In Deut 2:6 it seems to mean "buy," but in this passage digged appears the better translation. Abraham bought the plot of land from Ephron to be used as a burial place for Sarah. There is no reason to object to the idea that Jacob went into the cave and digged from the rock his own grave.

7-13. With unusual pomp and display the Egyptian procession moved out from Goshen to make the long journey to Hebron. Chariots and horsemen, along with officials of Pharaoh's court and all the sons of Jacob, made up the funeral company. The Egyptians wailed there with a very great and sore wailing (v. 10). The natives marveled at the sight of the large company of mourners; they had never seen anything like it. At the cave of Machpelah his sons . . . buried him. Israel had come to the end of his eventful career.

14-21. Joseph, with his brothers, returned to Egypt to take up life again. Immediately fear seized the older sons of Jacob. They thought Joseph might now turn upon them and exact full revenge for their crime of selling him into slavery. They fell down before his face (v. 18) in grief, repentance, and entreaty. They begged for forgiveness and mercy. Joseph lovingly reminded them that the hand of God had been in all that had happened, that the Lord had purposed it for good. He assured them of his continued love and promised to provide for their needs during the remaining days of the famine. True to his kindly nature, he spoke to their hearts (v. 21; AV, spake kindly).

22-26. So Joseph died . . . and he was put in a coffin in Egypt. At the age of one hundred and ten Joseph died, having lived to be Jehovah's representative in a difficult crisis in the life of His chosen people. He exacted a solemn pledge from his brothers that they would keep his body safe until their return to Canaan, and then carry it to his homeland for burial. Cf. Heb 11:22: "By faith Joseph, when his end was nigh, made mention of the departure of the children of Israel: and gave commandment concerning his bones." His body was mummified and placed in a coffin ('ārôn) to await the long journey of forty years to Shechem. At the time of the Exodus, that mummy case was kept in the camp as a reminder that God's controlling hand is working out the divine will in all of life's struggles (cf. Ex 13:19).

Genesis closes with the renewal of the Lord's holy promises to his chosen ones and the challenge to move to the fulfillment of divine purposes for Israel. Joseph had gone on. A Pharaoh "who knew not Joseph" would come upon the scene to change the happy relationships provided by Joseph's wisdom, but a Moses would arise to take up the burden of leadership. The eternal Lord would not forget nor fail His people. The rich purposes revealed to the patriarchs would find fulfillment in His own hour.

EXODUS

INTRODUCTION

Title. The name Exodus, a transliteration of the Septuagint (LXX) title Exodos, comes to us by way of the Latin Vulgate. The word in Greek means "departure" or "going out." The Hebrew name for the book is simply the first phrase, "These Are the Names," or more commonly, "Names." As a name descriptive of the whole book, Exodus is not satisfactory, for the actual departure from Egypt takes up less than half the volume.

Date and Authorship. The Scripture attributes the authorship of Exodus, with the other four books of the Pentateuch, to Moses. Higher criticism has made of these books a compilation of manuscripts, written by various authors from the ninth century to the fifth century B.C. The radical position that denied Moses any part at all in the writing of these books is no longer so widely held as it was a generation ago. Though many liberal scholars still question the Mosaic authorship of the Pentateuch, archaeological discoveries have given scholars of every theological background a higher respect for the historicity of the events it describes.

Historical Background. Exodus takes up the story of the Israelites where Genesis leaves off. The long period between Joseph and Moses is covered with two summary verses, 1:6,7, and then the entirely new situation of the descendants of Jacob is described. The favored guests of the Pharaoh and Joseph have become a nation of slaves, the objects of the fear and hatred of their rulers. As Pharaoh seeks by brutal oppression to control the Hebrews, God acts to deliver them. The deliverer, Moses, is first prepared, and then, in the power of God the great deliverance takes place. Redemption from the power of Egypt is more, however, than just a release from slavery. God has brought the Israelites out of Egypt that he may bring them, as his own prepared people, into the Promised Land. The great theme of Exodus, then, is not simply God's great redemptive act, but also his adoption and constitution of Israel as the people of God. E. E. Flack says, "Exodus is undoubtedly the most significant book dealing with the birth of a nation that has ever been compiled" ("Interpretation of Exodus," Interpretation, Jan., 1949). "All subsequent Hebrew history or philosophy of history as reflected in the prophets looked back to the Exodus as the creative act of God which constituted the Hebrews a nation" (Alleman and Flack, Old Testament Commentary, p. 207).

The date of the Exodus has been a problem to scholars for centuries, and with the discoveries of modern archaeology, the heat of discussion has increased, though the light of historical fact is still rather dim. The date has been set as early as 1580 B.C. and as late as 1230 B.C. Since the Scripture itself gives very little data for a chronology, it should be kept in mind that the date assigned to the Exodus is not a matter of doctrine, but simply of historical enlightenment. It is commonly thought that the Israelites came into Egypt when their Semitic cousins, the Hyksos, were ruling, possibly around 1700 B.C. If their sojourn in Egypt lasted 430 years (Ex 12:40), then the date of their departure must have been about 1270 B.C. Most of the archaeological evidence we have seems to point to a date some time in the thirteenth century. The builder of Pithom and Raamses (Ex 1:11), Rameses the Great, was ruling at that time. The date determined by excavation for the fall of numerous Canaanite cities, from Lachish to Hazor, is, again, the thirteenth century. The investigations of Nelson Glueck in Transjordan and the Negeb have established the fact that the nations of Moab, Ammon, Edom, and the Amorites were not settled there, ready to contest the advance of Israel, before the thirteenth century (cf. The Other Side of Jordan and Rivers in the Desert). The chief difficulty with dating the Exodus in the thirteenth century is found in I Kings 6:1. There we read that the Temple was started 480 years after the Exodus, in the fourth year of Solomon. Since the fourth year of Solomon was about 960 B.C., this seems to put the Exodus in the year 1440 B.C.; and this dating conflicts not only with the archaeological evidence but also with the dating gained from Exodus 12:40. A solution for the problem has been suggested by taking the years of I Kings 6 as meaning twelve generations, the actual time being no more than three hundred years. The fact that the exact date for the Exodus cannot be determined, however, does not detract from the historicity of the book nor from its great message of the redemption of God.

COMMENTARY

I. The Liberation of Israel. 1:1–18:27.

A. Introduction. 1:1-7. These few verses serve to connect Exodus with the narrative of Genesis. After listing those who came down into Egypt with Jacob, the passage quickly moves over many intervening years and resumes the thread of the story in verse 7.

B. Bondage in Egypt. 1:8-22. The period after Joseph died brought a complete change in the condition of the Israelites. From being the favored people of the Semitic Hyksos rulers, they became the feared bondslaves of a new dynasty of native Egyptian kings. Oppressed by their Egyptian masters, the Israelites reached a state of absolute helplessness and despair, when God, in faithfulness to his covenant, redeemed them with mighty power.

8. A new king. The Hyskos invaders controlled Egypt from about 1720 B.C. until 1570. They were driven from the land by Amosis I, the founder of the Eighteenth Dynasty, perhaps the most brilliant age in Egyptian history. After the expulsion of the hated foreign kings, the enmity of the Egyptians was turned against all who had been associated with them, particularly the Hebrews, who were related to the Hyksos both by race and by position. Through the generations that followed, the condition of the Hebrews steadily declined, until we reach the times described here, just before the redemption. 9. More and mightier. Too numerous and too strong (American Trans). 10. Let us deal wisely. Take precautions against them (American Trans.); or, handle them carefully (Moffatt). There was a very real danger that the Hebrews, dwelling in Goshen, on the northeast border of the land, might join any invaders that might attack Egypt.

11. Pithom and Raamses. These cities are now located with a considerable degree of assurance at Tell er-Retabeh and at Tanis, both in the Delta region. Tanis is also known in Scripture as Zoan (Num 13:22), and was called Avaris by the Hyksos. Rameses-Tanis, which had been the Hyksos capital, was abandoned after their expulsion. In the Nineteenth Dynasty (1310–1200 B.C.) it was restored, and again became the capital of Egypt. In the providence of God, the only times in the long history of Egypt when the capital was so near the border of the land were the times when Israel was to enter and to depart. 12. They were grieved. Better, in dread (RSV) or apprehensive (American Trans.). To the Egyptians there was an element of awe as well as loathing in the increase of the Hebrews, not only because of the danger mentioned in verse 10, but also because of the evidence of God's blessing in their greatly increased numbers.

15. Hebrew midwives. This may mean "Hebrew women" or "midwives of the Hebrew women," i.e., Egyptian women in charge of midwifery for the Hebrews. In either case they were probably the chief midwives, not the only ones. 16. Stools. Birth stools (ASV; lit., stones). These were two stones, bricks, or low stools upon which it was the custom for the women to kneel or sit during delivery. Daughter. Daughters were spared, since they could be taken and married to Egyptians, thus losing their national identity. This distinction was often made in OT times, not only by the Hebrews but by other nations as well. 19. The explanation given Pharaoh was only partly true. It is evident from God's rewarding blessing upon the midwives that they themselves took no precautions to prevent the preservation of males.

22. Every son that is born. The LXX, the Targums, and the RSV add the obvious explanatory words, "to the Hebrews."

C. Preparation of the Deliverer. 2:1–4:31. In the fullness of time, when the oppressor was doing his utmost to destroy Israel, God prepared the means of salvation.

1) The Birth and Preservation of Moses. 2:1-25. The exact date of Moses' birth, and the identification of the Pharaoh and his daughter are debatable, but the evidence of God's faithfulness is unmistakable. Upon the ground that there are vague parallels to this narrative in other ancient stories, the IB calls it "a legendary account." Upon this basis almost anything could be called unhistorical.

1. Man of the house of Levi. According to 6:20, this was Amram, who married his father's sister, Jochebed. 2. Goodly. Hebrews 11:23 attributes this act of Moses' parents to their faith—"because they saw he was a proper child." They took the robust, handsome appearance of the baby as evidence that God had given him for a great purpose.

3. Bulrushes. Probably the papyrus reeds so plentiful in the Nile. Slime and . . . pitch. Bitumen and pitch, or asphalt. By the river's brink. Very likely the child was placed where the mother knew that the king's daughter was accustomed to bathe (KD). The whole act, including placing the sister to watch, makes it evident that this was not simply abandoning the child to the mercy of the river in a faint hope that he would be rescued. 5. The bathing may have been an act of worship and the rescue may have been an act of piety rather than of mere pity (Alleman and Flack, op. cit.).

9. There was divine irony in this situation in which the destined deliverer was not only preserved but supported by those whom he would one day defeat.

10. Moses. The Hebrew means drawn out, or drawn forth. Many critics believe that the Hebrew for Moses (Mōsheh) is derived from the Egyptian mesi, meaning "to bear." In the process of being born, a child is drawn forth; in this instance the child was called Moses because he was drawn from the water. Some scholars, however, doubt that there is any connection with the Egyptian mesi.

11. Looked on. "Contemplated with sympathy" (Cambridge Bible). 12. By this act Moses irrevocably cast in his lot with his brethren (cf. Heb 11:24-26). 14. Moses had presented himself to his people as their champion, but they were not ready for the redemption, and neither was he. "It was by the staff and not by the sword—by the meekness and not by the wrath of Moses that God was to accomplish the great work of deliverance" (JFB). Acts 7:25 expresses the pathetic thought, "He supposed his brethren would have understood."

15. This thing. It was not so much the murder as the rebellion implicit in it that aroused the anger of Pharaoh (cf. Heb 11:27). Midian. The Midianites were a group of tribes descended from Keturah and Abraham (Gen 25:1-4). Although their home seems to have been on the east side of the Gulf of Aqaba, they were a nomadic people and wandered up into Palestine and down into the Negeb and the Sinai Peninsula. According to Ex 3:1, those Moses met must have been dwelling in the vicinity of Mount Sinai. The attempt to confine the Midianites to one area and locate Mount Sinai east of Aqaba (T. Meek, Hebrew Origins; et al.) does not agree with Scripture and seems quite unfounded.

16. Priest of Midian. The Scripture does not indicate what god he served. It may indeed have been Jehovah, as some claim, but the words of Jethro in Ex 18:11 sound more like the testimony of a convert. There is absolutely no reason to suppose, as some writers have done, that Moses learned of Jehovah from the Midianites (cf. Meek, et al.). 17. Compassion for the oppressed was a part of Moses' character. 18. Reuel. The name means friend of God. He is also called Jethro (3:1; 4:18). In Num 10:29 the AV translators inconsistently followed the LXX and transliterated the name Raguel.

22. Gershom. The name means a stranger here. A second son, Eliezer, God is my help, is named in 18:3.

23. Process of time. Course of those many days (ASV, RSV). According to Acts 7:30, the period was forty years, or one generation. If we take the thirteenth century date for the Exodus, then the king who died would have been Seti I (1319–1301), or possibly Rameses I, the founder of the Nineteenth Dynasty. The new king would have been Rameses II, one of the greatest of all Pharaohs (1301–1234). 24,25. God had waited long and been silent, but he had never forgotten nor abandoned his people. He heard . . . remembered . . . . looked and knew their condition (RSV).

2) The Call and Commission of Moses. 3:1–4:31. Trying to redeem Israel in his own way and at his own time, Moses failed. But in God's time he was called upon to deliver in God's way and by God's power.

1. Horeb. Horeb is called the mountain of God by anticipation. In the OT Horeb and Sinai are used as equivalent terms, although the former name may refer to the range of mountains and Sinai to a particular peak. It is impossible to know with certainty which of the many peaks, the highest rising to some 8,000 feet, is the place where Moses met God. The tradition, at least 1800 years old, that locates the mount as Jebel Musa, "Mount of Moses," must have some sort of foundation, and the peak called Horeb is surely in the vicinity of that "mount." The monastery of St. Catherine is supposed to be on the exact spot of the burning bush! (Cf. further on 19:1) 2. As Israel was not consumed in her furnace of affliction, so the thorn bush aflame was not consumed, for God was there. Angel of the Lord. This was not just an angel, but a manifestation of Jehovah himself (v. 4; cf. Gen 16:7; 22:11; 31:11-13; 48:15,16).

7,8. I have . . . seen . . . heard . . . know . . . . am come down to deliver. Not Moses but God was to be the Redeemer. Milk and honey. A proverbial expression for great fertility and abundance. The place of the Canaanites. God had waited more than four hundred years for a sign of repentance. Now the iniquity of the Amorite nations was full (cf. Gen 15:16).

11,12. Who am I. The confident, impulsive Moses had learned humility; now he had to learn faith. Each of Moses' difficulties was met by assurances from God. Who am I was not important, for I will be with thee.

14. I am that I am. Other translations of this difficult phrase include: I AM WHO I AM (RSV); I will be what I will be (Moffatt; Luther); I am the existing One (Catholic Commentary); I cause to be what comes to pass (Meek, op. cit., p. 107; and Wm. F. Albright, From the Stone Age to Christianity, p. 260). The name expresses "not abstract existence, but active manifestation of existence . . . not what God will be in Himself . . . but what He will approve Himself to others . . . . He will be to Moses and His people what He will be – something which is undefined, but which as His full nature is more completely unfolded, by the lessons of history and the teachings of the prophets, will prove to be more than words can express" (Cambridge Bible). A similar thought is expressed by Keil and Delitzsch: "The question [v. 13] . . . presupposed that the name expressed the nature and operations of God and that God would manifest in deeds the nature expressed in the name . . . [He] designated Himself by this name as the absolute God . . . acting with unfettered ability and self-dependence." Commenting on the name Jehovah in Gen 2:4, the same scholars say: "He is the personal God in His historical manifestation in which the fullness of the Divine Being unfolds itself to the world . . . the God of the history of salvation. This is not shown in the etymology of the name but in the historical expansion." God, then, revealed himself to Moses not as the Creator-God of power—Elohim, but as the personal God of Salvation, and all that "I am" contains shall be manifested through the ages to come, culminating in him whose "I am" lights the pages of the NT.

15. My memorial. By this I am to be remembered (RSV). 16,17. I have surely visited. The time for the fulfillment of Joseph's promise had come (Gen 50:25).

18. Met with us. Literally, lighted upon us in a sudden, unexpected way. Three days' journey. Probably a current expression for a considerable distance. "God knew the hard heart of Pharaoh, and therefore directed that no more should be asked at first than he must [either] grant or display the hardness of his heart . . . . It was an act of mercy to Pharaoh, therefore, that the entire departure of the Israelites was not demanded at the very first audience of Moses . . . for, had this been demanded, it would have been far more difficult for him to bend his heart in obedience to the divine will, than when the request presented was as trifling as it was reasonable. And if he had rendered obedience to the will of God in the smaller, God would have given him strength to be faithful in the greater" (KD). 19. No, not by a mighty hand. Unless compelled by a mighty hand (RSV).

22. Borrow. The command was not to borrow but to ask (ASV, RSV), a request which, under the circumstances, was a demand. Thus the Israelites received a recompense for their years of toil by 'spoiling' the Egyptians.

4:1. They will not believe me. Moses' third difficulty, like the others, was centered in himself. The signs provided by God would not only be a testimony to Israel and Egypt of God's presence with his messenger, but they would also assure and strengthen the faith of Moses. 2-4. The first sign. The shepherd's rod, surrendered to God, became a sign of power and victory over the enemy. 6,7 The second sign. The defiled, leprous hand of Moses symbolized Israel's own afflicted state, her need of God's cleansing power. 9. The third sign. River. Literally, the Nile. As the Nile, the life-stream of Egypt, was in the power of God's messengers, so also were Pharaoh and all his people in Moses' hand.

10. Moses' final difficulty. God makes no mistakes. He had formed Moses; He knew what he was capable of doing. 12. I will be with thy mouth. "Moses' stammering as God's faithful servant will be adequate enough" (IB). 13. Send, I pray, some other person (RSV). This last statement of Moses is not as direct a refusal as the RSV translation makes it appear, but it indicates what was behind all the objections. In the weakness of the flesh, Moses simply did not want to go back to Egypt. God stooped to this weakness and provided Aaron as Moses' "prophet." As the story progresses, however, it seems that Moses, with growing courage, more and more took his proper place as leader.

18-31. Moses' return to Egypt. 18. Since Moses was in the service of Jethro, he had to ask permission to leave. He could not tell his father-in-law the incredible story of the revelation and commission of God, but simply said he wished to go back to see how his brethren were. 20. The rod of God in his hand. Poor though his outward appearance may have been, he had in his hand the staff before which the pride and might of Pharaoh and all Egypt would bow.

21-23. This is the substance and culmination of God's dealings with Pharaoh.

The hardening of Pharaoh's heart was the divine judgment upon one who had already hardened his own heart against the Lord.

24-26. This passage, which is dismissed by many modern commentators as a curious relic of folklore and superstition, is in fact an illustration of a spiritual law that runs throughout Scripture and history: He who would proclaim God's will to others, must himself be obedient to the express will of God. The sign of circumcision, decreed by God (Gen 17:9-14) had been neglected by Moses until God forcibly reminded him of the obligation by this stroke. You are my bridegroom in blood by this circumcision (v. 26; Moffatt). This act of Zipporah, evidently repugnant to her and delayed until it almost cost her husband's life, may have decided Moses to leave her and the children in Midian. Nothing was to hinder his service for the Lord.

D. The Mission of Moses to Pharaoh. 5:1–7:7. Moses and Aaron appeared before Pharaoh to make known God's will. Their request was harshly refused, and the tribulation of Israel was increased by command of the king. Thus the Israelites were brought to their lowest state of helpless despair and suffering in order that the grace and power of God alone might be manifest in their redemption. The genealogies of Moses and Aaron are inserted in this passage to make clear their relationship to Israel as God's accredited leaders.

1) Moses' First Appearance Before Pharaoh. 5:1-23.

1. Hold a feast. This might better be translated, make a pilgrimage. The Hebrew ḥag, "feast," was accompanied by a pilgrimage (cf. 23:14-17). "The demand presented to Pharaoh on the part of the God of the Israelites . . . appears so natural and reasonable that Pharaoh could not have refused their request if there had been a single trace of the fear of God in his heart" (KD).

2. Who is the Lord? Pharaoh's sneering question was soon to be thoroughly and terribly answered. 4. Pharaoh considered Moses merely a crafty leader trying to get better working conditions for the Israelites. Mind your own business (American Trans.). 5. People of the land. That is, common workpeople.

6. Taskmasters . . . officers. Egyptian taskmasters dealt with Israelite officers, shōṭᵉrîm, perhaps scribes or timekeepers. 7. The use of chopped straw mixed with the clay increased more than three times the breaking strength of the brick, and Egyptian bricks were usually made this way (cf. BA, xiii, 2). 14. When the impossible task was not performed, the punishment fell most severely on the Hebrew officers.

16. The fault is in thine own people. "Thou sinnest against thine own people" (LXX). The exact translation and meaning of this text is uncertain, but the Hebrews were undoubtedly defending themselves by placing the blame for their failure where it belonged. 19. In evil case. The mission of the officers failed to get any relief for the people. 20. They met Moses. Literally, they stationed themselves to meet them. 21. Savour to be abhorred. "They call upon God to judge whilst by their very complaining they show that they have no confidence in God and His power to save" (KD).

22. Why. How incomprehensible it must have seemed to Moses that God, who had sent him to deliver Israel, had led him, instead, to be the cause of greater suffering.

2) The Renewed Promise and Command of Jehovah. 6:1-13. Critics take this as a parallel account, not a sequel, to the account in Exodus 3–6. Their assumption is quite uncalled for; the promise is affirmed quite differently, and the need for further assurance on the part of Moses is abundantly evident.

1. With a strong hand. He will be forced (Moffatt), compelled by God's mighty power. 3. God Almighty. Hebrew 'El Shaddāi. The derivation and meaning of Shaddāi is uncertain. Probably the translation God Almighty is as near as any to the thought contained in the name. It is possible that the name "Jehovah" was not known to the patriarchs, but that is not necessarily the significance of the statement here. God had not revealed himself in his character of "Jehovah" to Abraham as he was now about to do to Israel. As Jehovah, God was now going to redeem the people of Israel (v. 6), adopt them as his people (v. 7), and bring them into the Promised Land (v. 8). By this they would learn the nature of the God who said, I am Jehovah (v. 2, ASV).

4,5. The redemption of Israel was based upon the covenant with the fathers and was its fulfillment. Land of their pilgrimage. The land in which they settled as immigrants (Moffatt). 6. Redeem. The Hebrew word means "to reclaim, to vindicate the rights." 7. Ye shall know. One of the great reasons for the Lord's presenting the extraordinary demonstrations of his might, which were to come, was that he might sharply imprint upon the mind and conscience of Israel the fact that he, Jehovah, was God. 9. Anguish of spirit. Their suffering was too great to be relieved by mere words.

10-13. Moses was charged again to present to Pharaoh the request of the God of Israel. Before the carrying out of this charge is described, the genealogy of Moses and Aaron is given. Uncircumcised lips (v. 12). Lips covered as with a foreskin, so that they open and close with difficulty (cf. 4:10).

3) Genealogy of Moses and Aaron. 6:14-27.

14. Fathers' houses. The "house" or "family" descended from a single ancestor. "House" may denote a whole tribe, but usually it indicates the main subdivision or clan. Thus Hanoch, Pallu, Hezron, and Carmi were the ancestors, heads, of the four main clans of the tribe of Reuben. 18. Amram the son of Kohath was an earlier ancestor of Amram the father of Moses (v. 20). 27. Moses and Aaron. As the elder brother (cf. 7:7), Aaron appears first in the genealogy (v. 26); but as the appointed leader, Moses takes precedence when the narrative resumes.

4) Moses Sent Back to Pharaoh. 6:28–7:7. The narrative now resumes as the Lord gives specific directions to Moses concerning his mission.

7:1. Made thee a god. Better, made thee as God (ASV, RSV). Moses was given divine authority and power over Pharaoh, while Aaron was commissioned to serve as Moses' prophet or spokesman. This was to be no repetition of the first encounter with Pharaoh. 3. Harden. Make obstinate (American); or make stubborn (Moffatt). This is not the usual word for hardening; it is found also in Ps 95:8. 4. Mine armies, and my people. Better, my people in their hosts (Moffatt). 5. Egyptians shall know. The second great reason for God's display of mighty power. Israel was to know (6:7) by redemption, Egypt by judgment, that I am Jehovah. 6. This verse summarizes, and introduces the next major section.

E. God's Wonders in the Land of Egypt. 7:8–11:10. The plagues by which God manifested himself to Israel and Egypt are called by various terms in the Bible: maggēpâ, "a severe blow" (9:14), used in I Sam 4:17 for a great defeat in war; nega' "a heavy touch or stroke" (Ex 11:1), used in Leviticus, chapters 13 and 14, for the stroke of leprosy; negep (Ex 12:13), cognate with maggēpâ, "a severe blow," used only of the tenth plague, and usually of a calamity inflicted by God in judgment (Josh 22:17). By these awe-inspiring strokes from the hand of God, the people were to be made aware that "I am Jehovah."

The first nine plagues clearly fall into three groups of three each. Numbers one and two, four and five, seven and eight were announced to Pharaoh, beforehand, but three, six, and nine came without warning. The first three fell upon both Israel and Egypt, for both nations had lessons to learn. The last two groups fell upon the Egyptians only, that they might know that God who was caring for Israel was God also in Egypt (Ex 8:22) and greater than all other gods (9:14). The plagues were progressively more severe, the last three almost destroying the land (10:7). The tenth plague is discussed in the next division of the text. It is thus set apart from the others because it was not only the culmination of the judgment and the basis of the redemption, but also because it was a direct visitation from God, not a judgment through secondary causes. The first nine plagues were natural wonders, in the sense that they were intensifications of distresses such as were already known in the ordinary course of history. Their severity, and even more, their appearance and disappearance at the word of Moses marked them as miraculous. They had their effect upon the Egyptians not only physically and mentally, but also spiritually. Each plague was directed against some phenomenon of nature worshiped by the Egyptians as in some way related to the gods.

1) Divine Commission of Moses and Aaron Attested. 7:8-13.

9. Prove yourselves by working a miracle (RSV). 11. Wise men . . . sorcerers . . . magicians. These were not common tricksters, but the highly educated, priestly leaders of Egypt, men of vast influence and skill. Whether they performed their feat by some sort of trick with trained reptiles, or by a Satanically empowered "lying wonder" cannot be determined. In either case the supremacy of Jehovah was demonstrated when their serpents were swallowed up.

13. Hardened. Made strong, firm. Three words are used for the hardening of Pharaoh's heart: ḥāzaq, "to be or make strong" (7:13,22; 8:19); kābēd, "to be or make heavy, slow to move" (7:14; 8:15,32); and qāshâ, "to harden" (only in 7:3). The usual translations obscure the fact that it is always clearly stated when it was God who did the hardening (9:12; 10:1,20,27, et al.) and when it was Pharaoh who hardened his own heart. God hardens only "those who begin by hardening themselves. . . . the means by which God hardens a man is not necessarily by any extraordinary intervention on His part; it may be by the ordinary experiences of life, operating through the principles and character of human nature which are of His appointment" (Cambridge Bible).

2) The First Plague—The Nile Turned to Blood. 7:14-25.

15. He goeth out unto the water. An act of devotion? If the purpose of Pharaoh's visit was to worship, he would find his very god made loathsome by a greater power. 17. In this thou shalt know. Pharaoh was now to have the answer to his scornful, "Who is Jehovah?" (5:2). Turned to blood. Each year, toward the end of June, when the waters of the Nile begin to rise, they are colored a dark red by the silt carried down from the headwaters. This continues for three months, until the waters begin to abate, but the water, meanwhile, is wholesome and drinkable. The miracle of 7:17-21 involved three elements by which it differed from the accustomed phenomenon: the water was changed by the smiting of Moses' rod; the water became undrinkable; and the condition lasted just seven days (v. 25).

19. Streams. The Nile and its arms. Rivers (lit., their Niles). Nile canals, irrigation ditches. Ponds. Standing lakes formed by the flooding rivers. Pools (lit., every gathering). Cisterns and reservoirs. Vessels. Not a drop was taken up in these vessels that was not contaminated. The listing of all the sources of water makes it evident how completely Egypt was smitten by the plague. 22,23. Magicians . . . did so. By some means the magicians changed the appearance of some water into that of blood, and Pharaoh's heart remained hardened (American), or, did not heed even this (Moffatt).

25. Seven days. It has been thought that the first plague may have taken place near the time of the Nile inundation in June. Since the final plague occurred in the spring, it seems that the judgments on Egypt were spread out over most of a year.

3) The Second Plague—Frogs. 8:1-15. There have always been frogs filling the marshes along the Nile. At the word of Moses, however, they appeared in such numbers and so invaded every conceivable place that they became an unbearable nuisance.

7. Magicians did so. Though they did in some way produce more frogs, they were utterly helpless to remove any. 8. Pharaoh was so discomposed by this repulsive situation that he was ready to promise anything. He had already been forced to acknowledge the God whom he had disdained. 9. Glory over me. You may have the honor of saying (Moffatt). 15. Respite (lit., open space). "As soon as he 'got air' he hardened his heart" (KD).

4) The Third Plague—Lice. 8:16-19. Lice (ASV, AV), gnats (RSV), sand fleas (ERV), and mosquitoes (Moffatt) have all been suggested as the instruments of this plague. Although the exact meaning of the Hebrew word is not known, mosquitoes, which are well known in Egypt, seem to be peculiarly fitting. It is to be noticed that this again was the intensification of a natural experience. The plagues were also intensifying from an inconvenience to a painful affliction.

17. Dust of the earth. "Just as the fertilizing water of Egypt had twice become a plague, so through the power of Jehovah, the soil so richly blessed became a plague to the king and his people" (KD). 19. The finger of God. The helpless magicians acknowledged that this was supernatural. They did not attribute it to Jehovah, but confessed that it was beyond their mortal powers. The fact that they had duplicated somewhat the earlier plagues, makes their capitulation more striking. Since there is no time limit expressed for this plague, we may assume that it continued for some time.

5) The Fourth Plague—Swarms of Flies. 8:20-32. The second triad of plagues distinguished between Israel and the Egyptians. The confession of the magicians that "a god" had brought these disasters, was now to be enforced and the fact made clear that it was the God, Jehovah, that was the cause.

21. Flies. The word denotes some particularly irritating kind of insect, whether flies or gnats. The Hebrew word for "swarm" means a mixture and may signify the increase of all kinds of verminous scourges. 22. Sever. Set apart (ASV, RSV). By the fact that Israel would be protected from all the future plagues, it would be made clear whose God was in power. 23. Division (lit., redemption). The separation was a deliverance for Israel. 24. Corrupted. Destroyed (ASV marg.); ruined (RSV). The plagues were still increasing in severity; they were now not simply a nuisance, but a danger. The people suffered, the work was hindered, and the whole economy was dislocated.

26. Abomination of the Egyptians. Whether Moses referred to the manner of sacrifice or to the victim, held by the Egyptians to be sacred, the people of Egypt would have regarded the act "as a manifestation of contempt for themselves and their gods" (Calvin's Commentaries). 28. For the second time Pharaoh gave his permission for the Israelites to leave; but the removal of the plague, in spite of the warning of Moses (v. 29), banished his fear, and he denied the pledge.

6) The Fifth Plague—Murrain. 9:1-7.

3. Camels. This mention of camels has been called anachronistic; but there were camel caravans constantly coming into Egypt, and certainly some Egyptians must have had a vested interest in them. Murrain. Severe plague (RSV); deadly pest (Moffatt). What specific disease this was is not known, but it must have been a severe and deadly epidemic that attacked all kinds of livestock. 6. All the cattle. As often in Hebrew, the term all designates a great number. We say in English, "Everybody is sick," meaning only that sick folk are encountered everywhere. This plague was to come upon those cattle that were in the fields (v. 3).

7) The Sixth Plague—Boils. 9:8-12. Like the third plague this was not announced but simply came as Moses acted.

8. Ashes. Literally, soot from the kiln. The kiln was a symbol of the commercial and artistic wealth of Egypt. As disaster had come from the natural resources of the river and the land, so now industry provided the source of new trouble. 9. Boil breaking forth into sores (RSV). An inflamed painful boil or abscess, breaking into a running sore, exceedingly painful and wretched but not fatal. 10. Stood before Pharaoh. He took his place before the king so that there might be no question of the source of this new plague. 11. The magicians not only could not duplicate the plague, but they themselves were in helpless misery. 12. As the last triad of judgment was about to come, God hardened Pharaoh's heart lest out of sheer human weakness he should surrender before God had accomplished all His will.

8) The Seventh Plague—Hail. 9:13-35.

14. All my plagues upon thine heart. These last plagues would not fall simply as warnings and sufferings, as the others had done. They would "not only strike the head and the arms, but penetrate the very heart and inflict a mortal wound" (Calvin). 15. Cut off from the earth. Never again did Egypt rise to the height of power and glory reached in this dynasty. 16. For this cause . . . made thee to stand (ASV). Pharaoh was to experience the power and might of Jehovah, and in his experiences the whole world would learn about the Lord. "As both the rebellion of the natural man against the word and will of God and the hostility of the world power to the Lord and His people were concentrated in Pharaoh . . . (this) should be typical for all times and circumstances of the kingdom of God in conflict with the world" (KD).

17. Exaltest thou thyself. "A peculiar word found only here . . . raisest up thyself as a mound or obstacle against my people" (Cambridge Bible). 19. Opportunity was now given to those Egyptians who had come to believe in the word of Jehovah to distinguish themselves from those who had not.

23. Hail, thunder, and lightning are not unknown in Egypt, but the terrible fury of such a storm as this had never been known before in all Egypt's long history. 27. How often a great natural disaster causes even the most ungodly man to cry out in fear and helplessness! Such confessions are not the result of real heart conviction of sin but arise only from the terror of the circumstances. 29,30. Moses would again manifest Jehovah's supreme control, but he had no illusions concerning the steadfastness of Pharaoh's repentance. It was the terrible storm, not Jehovah, that Pharaoh feared.

31. Flax and . . . barley. Since these ripen in February, the season of year for this plague is fixed. 32. Wheat and . . . spelt (ASV). Spelt is an inferior kind of wheat; rye (AV) was not known in ancient Egypt. These grains ripen about a month after the flax and barley.

9) The Eighth Plague—Locusts. 10:1-20.

2. What things I have wrought. How I have mocked (ASV marg.). How I have made sport (RSV). God was not amusing himself, but there was divine irony in the fact that the antagonism of Pharaoh was simply leading to the greater manifestation of the glory of Jehovah. 4-6. That locusts were known and feared for their devastation only made this warning more fearful. Such locust plagues as the Egyptians suffered before would be nothing in comparison with this. 7. Do you not yet understand that Egypt is ruined? (RSV) Only Pharaoh seemed unaware of the extent of the damage, or insensible to it.

8. Who are they (lit., who and who). Who, exactly, shall go? 10. Pharaoh's answer to the demand that the whole nation depart was at first cynical: "May the Lord be with you if ever I let you go." He hoped, suggests the IB, "that the divine protection on the journey" might be "as non-existent as his permit to go." Then he accused them, "You have some evil purpose" (RSV). 11. Go then, ye men, for that is what you actually desire. If you are honest, you know that only men are required to sacrifice. Driven out. The prolonged interview concluded with this burst of Pharaoh's anger.

13. "The fact that the wind blew a day and a night before bringing the locusts, showed that they came from a great distance, and therefore proved to the Egyptians that the omnipotence of Jehovah reached far beyond the borders of Egypt and ruled over every land" (KD). 16. The shock of this visitation again brought Pharaoh to his knees, confessing sin and begging for the removal of the plague. 17. This death. The locusts had all but completely destroyed what was left of the vegetation of Egypt.

10) The Ninth Plague—Darkness. 10:21-29. The ninth plague followed the eighth with no introduction, request, or warning.

21. Darkness which may be felt. Most scholars agree that the darkness was probably caused by the ḥamsîn, the fierce sandstorm so dreaded in the East. The hot dry wind, like the blast of a furnace, fills the air with sand and dust, so that the sun is blotted out. The heat, the dust, and the static electricity make conditions almost unbearable physically. Added to this is the effect on mind and spirit of the thick and oppressive darkness. This plague concluded the manifestation of God's wonders and was a forbidding prelude to the final act of judgment. 23. Light in their dwellings. Miraculous and instructive was the sharp demarcation between Israel and Egypt.

24. Pharaoh almost capitulated. Only let your flocks . . . be stayed. Placed in deposit, as it were, as a guarantee of their return. 25. Give us also sacrifices. That is, you must give us the means of sacrificing, and therefore (v. 26) we must take all our cattle. 28. To let the whole nation go, with no assurance at all that they would return, was too much for Pharaoh. He terminated not only this interview but also all further interviews with Moses by a threat of death. 29. God had already informed Moses (11:1) that this was to be the last appeal to Pharaoh, and so Moses responded, Thou hast spoken well. Before the prophet departed, however, there was one last message he had to give (11:4-8).

11) Announcement of the Last Plague. 11:1-10. The critical approach to Scripture has made a great deal of unnecessary confusion in determining the proper sequence here. It seems clear that 11:1-3 refers to instructions given previously to Moses, while 11:4-8 is the parting warning to Pharaoh, following 10:29.

1. Thrust you out. The Egyptians would be so anxious for the Israelites to leave that, far from hindering them, they would urge them to go. 2. Ask. Cf. 3:22. 4. About midnight. Not midnight of the day in which he was speaking, but midnight of the day appointed byy God (cf. 12:6). 5. All the firstborn. "The first-born represented the whole race of which it was the strength and bloom" (KD). 7. Not even the barking of an unfriendly dog would hinder Israel's departure. 8. Get thee out. Moses' assurance was God's promise (v. 1).

9. Pharaoh shall not hearken. Had Pharaoh listened, even at this extremity, he would still have found a door of hope open; but he would not listen (cf. Mt 23:37).

F. The Passover, and the Departure of Israel. 12:1—15:21.

1) The Consecration of Israel. 12:1-28. "The deliverance of Israel from the bondage of Egypt was at hand; also their adoption as the nation of Jehovah (6:6,7). But for this a divine consecration was necessary that their outward severance from the land of Egypt might be accompanied by an inward severance from everything of an Egyptian or heathen source. This consecration was to be imparted by the Passover" (KD).

1. In the land of Egypt. The ordinance first given in Egypt would be repeated at Sinai (Lev 23) and on the plains of Moab (Deut 16). 2. This month. The Hebrew name of the month is Abib, meaning "green ears." It corresponds to March-April of our calendar. During the Exile the name Nisan, meaning "beginning, opening," came to be used instead. Beginning of months. Israel's beginning as the people of Jehovah was to be marked thus on their calendar. The civil year began, as it still does, in the autumn, with the Feast of Trumpets (Lev 23:24; Num 29:1), now called Rosh Hashanah, Head of the Year, or New Year. The religious or spiritual year was to begin with the month of Passover, the first month of Israel's new life as a redeemed people.

3. Lamb. A single head, either lamb or goat (cf. v. 5). 4. This was to be a family observance, unless the family was too small. According to rabbinical exegesis, too little meant fewer than ten. (Targum Jonathan). According to his eating. They were to compute how much each would eat and thus determine whether to unite with other families. 5. Of the first year. Hebrew, son of a year. Rabbis have interpreted this as meaning "as of the first year," i.e., from eight days old. Modern commentators generally take it as meaning a year old. From the sheep, or from the goats. Later custom restricted the Passover to lambs.

6. The whole assembly of the congregation, i.e., all at the same time. In the evening. Hebrew, between the evenings. From very early days opinions have differed as to the exact time of sacrifice. Abn Ezra, the Samaritans, and the Karaites construed it as the time between sunset and complete darkness. The Pharisees held to the traditional explanation that it was from the beginning of lengthening shadows to sunset, approximately 3:00 to 5:00 P.M., and with this the Talmud agrees (Pesahim 61a). This was the usual practice, according to Josephus (Wars of the Jews, VI. 9.3). Deuteronomy 16:6 simply says, "at sunset." 7. The blood was to be sprinkled "on side and lintel, where it might be looked to, not on the threshold to be trodden underfoot" (Jamieson, Fausset, and Brown). By this act both the house and those dwelling in it were to be expiated (by the use of blood and hyssop; cf. Lev 14:4-7; Num 19:1ff.) and consecrated unto God.

8. Roast. The whole animal was to be spitted and roasted over a fire. "Through the unity and integrity of the lamb given them to eat, the participants were to be joined into an undivided unity and fellowship with the Lord who provided them with the meal" (KD). Unleavened bread. A memorial of the haste with which they were to leave (v. 34), but also a symbol of their purification and freedom from the world's leaven. Bitter herbs. The Mishnah (Pesahim 2:6) mentions lettuce, endive, chicory, snakeroot, peppermint, and dandelion as satisfactory for bitter herbs. This was "to call to mind the bitterness of life experienced by Israel in Egypt, and this bitterness was to be overpowered by the sweet flesh of the lamb" (KD). 9. Sodden. Boiled (ASV, RSV). With the purtenance. The inner parts.

11. In haste. In trepidation, mingled hurry and alarm. Loins girded. Their long flowing garments were to be bound up so as not to impede progress. The Lord's passover. A passover (Heb. pesah, LXX pascha, and thus English "paschal") to Jehovah; appointed by and kept for him. The etymology of the word is uncertain, but the meaning is made plain by 12:13. God would "leap over," in his judgment, those who had evidenced their faith in him and taken refuge under the blood. 12. Against all the gods. The Egyptian gods were to be exposed as impotent to defend, and worthless. Moreover, the gods were worshiped in the forms of many of the animals and in the person of Pharaoh himself, and in these representatives the gods themselves were to be smitten.

15-20. Regulations for the Feast of Unleavened Bread. Although these instructions may have been given after the Exodus (cf. v. 17, "have I brought"), the close connection both in meaning and in time between this feast and the Passover explains the inclusion of the regulations here. The unleavened cakes were symbolical of the new life as cleansed from the leaven of a sinful nature. . . . For this reason the Israelites were to put away all the leaven of the Egyptian nature, the leaven of malice and wickedness, and by eating pure and holy bread and meeting for the worship of God to show that they were walking in newness of life. . . . To eat leavened bread at this feast would have been a denial of the divine act by which Israel was introduced into the new life of fellowship with Jehovah" (KD).

15. First day. Fifteenth day of Abib. Soul shall be cut off, i.e., outlawed or exiled from the community. 16. Convocation. Assembly (RSV); sacred gathering (Moffatt). Necessary work might be done; the day was not as strictly kept as the Sabbath. 17. Armies. Better, hosts (ASV).

18. On the fourteenth. Unleavened bread was to be eaten on Passover on the fourteenth; the Feast of Unleavened Bread started on the fifteenth. 19. Stranger. Sojourner (ASV, RSV); resident alien (Moffatt). One may dwell in the midst of God's people all of one's life and never be an integral part of the company (cf. v. 43).

21-28. Instructions given the elders. The regulations for the Passover, given to Moses by God, were passed on to the representatives of the people. 21. Draw out, i.e., out of the folds. 22. Hyssop. Though the identity of this plant is disputed, the general opinion is that it was a species of origanum, either marjoram or wild thyme. Bason. The vessel in which the blood was caught when the animal was slain. Since the leafy sprig of hyssop was used to sprinkle the blood of a sacrifice for purification, it came to be used figuratively for the purifying itself (cf. Ps 51:7). 23. The destroyer. Destroying angel (Moffatt). 28. By this act of obedience and faith, the people of Israel made it manifest that they had put their trust in Jehovah; and thus the act became their redemption.

2) The Tenth Plague—God's Judgment on Egypt. 12:29-36. Was this plague, like the others, a heightened and supernaturally directed natural epidemic, or was it more? The repeated stress on its being the work of the Lord (12:12,13,23, 27,29) seems to indicate that it was a direct act of God himself.

29. The firstborn. It is usually agreed that this means the eldest son who was not yet himself a father. Otherwise, the first-born of each generation would have died, including, probably, Pharaoh himself. 31. He called for Moses. Pharaoh in terror and grief ignored his own threat (10:28). 32. The capitulation was complete. Bless me. As you leave, pray for me and this stricken people.

34. Before it was leavened. This gives us the natural occasion for the spiritually significant Feast of Unleavened Bread. Kneadingtroughs. Literally, boards, i.e., shallow wooden bowls. In this case each family carried its kneading bowl bound up in the śimlâ, a large square outer garment, often used as a bag for carrying (cf. Ruth 3:15). 36. Lent unto them. The Hebrew word for lent means "granted, let them have." It does not mean "lend" in the usual sense any more than the Hebrew word in 12:35 means to "borrow" (cf. 3:22; 11:2).

3) The Exodus from Egypt. 12:37—15:21.

a) The Departure. 12:37-42. The exact line of march for the departure from Egypt is still in dispute, but most authorities agree on the identifications made in connection with the following verses. Having assembled the people at Succoth, Moses and Aaron had now to lead them past the barrier of marshes, lakes, and sea that is now the site of the Suez Canal. The way was further determined by the fact that God was to deliver one final blow to Egyptian pride and might.

37. Succoth. This is identified as Tell el-Maskhutah, ten miles east of Pithom. This means that after Moses left Pharaoh at Rameses, he came south to the very center of Goshen, there to assemble Israel for the march. Six hundred thousand. How to determine the exact number of those involved in the Exodus has long been a problem. It has been pointed out, for instance, that a host of 600,000 men could have overwhelmed Pharaoh's far smaller army by sheer numbers. The question is not whether God could have multiplied the seventy of Jacob's day to over two million, but whether he did. One solution is that the word 'elep, translated thousand, could be translated clan or family, as it is elsewhere (e.g., Jud 6:15). In that case the total number might well be fifty or sixty thousand individuals. Of one thing we can be sure: God redeemed a great host out of Egypt, miraculously cared for them through forty years in the wilderness, and brought them into the Promised Land. That we do not know the exact number of those involved does not diminish the miracle. 38. Mixed multitude. Egyptians and probably other nationalities who had married Hebrews, were seeking escape from bondage or were persuaded that there was some advantage to be gained by being on the side of so powerful a deity as Jehovah.

40. Four hundred and thirty years. Genesis 15:13 and Acts 7:6 give the round number, four hundred. Since we do not know the exact date of the entrance of Israel into Egypt, we can only conjecture the date of departure, but a date near 1300 B.C. seems most reasonable (cf. Introd.). Some conclude that the date was about 1440 on the basis of I Kgs 6:1. 41. Selfsame day. Cf. 12:17. This was The Day to Israel for generations to come, until a greater Day or a greater Salvation should come. 42. A night to be much observed unto the Lord. Various translations of this phrase have been offered: a preservation night of the Lord to bring them out (KD); a night of watching was it for Jehovah to bring them out (Cambridge Bible); this same night is a night of watching kept to the Lord by all the people of Israel throughout their generations (RSV). Perhaps both the ideas expressed in the several translations are implied: the night on which Jehovah watched over his own was to be a watch night for the people of Israel throughout their generations, as a memorial.

b) Further Regulations for Passover. 12:43-51. Such a passage as this is held by critics to be quite out of place here, yet, in fact, it seems most appropriate. It defined, at the very point of action, the exacting requirements that would make the ordinance spiritually significant as well as true to fact in the generations to come.

43-45. Stranger. . . . foreigner . . . hired servant. Only one who was identified with the people of God could have part in this ordinance. This was designed to repel not the foreigner but the unbeliever. Should the alien desire to identify himself in faith with Israel, he was as welcome as one "born in the land" (v. 48). 46. "In this meal Israel was to preserve and celebrate its unity and fellowship with the Lord" (KD). For this reason the ceremonial unity was not to be broken either by the inclusion of outsiders or by the dividing up of the meal itself. So also the unity of Christ is to be jealously guarded (cf. I Cor 1–3). 49. One law. Neither natural descent nor association was sufficient. No uncircumcised person shall eat of it (v. 48).

c) Sanctification of the First-born. 13:1-16. "If the Israelites completed their communion with Jehovah in the Passover, and celebrated the commencement of their divine standing in the feast of unleavened bread, they gave uninterrupted effect to their divine sonship in the sanctification of the firstborn" (KD). As Egypt was smitten by God in the persons of its first-born, so Israel was consecrated to God in its first-born.

2. Whatsoever openeth, i.e., first opens.

3-10. The law already given Moses (12:15-20) was now proclaimed to the people. 7. Thy quarters. Borders (ASV). 8. Dedication of the first-born was to be explained generation by generation, as was the Passover (12:26,27). 9. It shall be for a sign. As other races wore signs, even cuttings and tattoos, to remind them of their god, so this feast was to bring before Israel the remembrance of the redemption of Jehovah. "It was not by mnemonic slips upon the hand and forehead that a law was so placed in the mouth as to be talked of continually, but by the reception of it into the heart and its continued fulfillment" (KD).

11-16. The law of the first-born (cf. 22:29; Deut 15:21,22). 12. Thou shalt set apart (lit., cause to pass over unto the Lord). This is not the usual word for to set apart, but the word used to describe the heathen practice of sacrificing children to their gods (II Kgs 16:3; Ezk 20:31). It may be that the Lord purposely used this word to mark the distinction between this dedication and that of the heathen. 13. The ass was not a sacrificial animal, and so a lamb was to be substituted for it. The first-born of men were to be redeemed by silver, as the people were told later (Num 3:47; 18:16). The obligation for service having been transferred to the Levites as representatives, the people were asked only to acknowledge God's claim upon them. 15. In this way all that Israel was and all she possessed were continually to be presented to the Lord who had redeemed her.

16. Frontlets. Hebrew tôtapōt, the NT "phylacteries." Later Jews literally carried out this exhortation by tying on their foreheads and arms bands to which were attached small leather boxes containing Scripture verses written on parchment. It was God's purpose that the feast and the consecration, not little boxes, should serve as reminders for hand and heart.

d) Passage Through the Red Sea. 13:17—14:31. The description of the journey, started in 12:37, is now continued. There was a good road directly to Palestine, going up the seacoast past Gaza, but this would have taken them past Egyptian fortresses at intervals, and would have required them to do battle, for which they were unprepared both physically and psychologically. God in wise kindness led them up another way.

18. Wilderness of the Red sea. Hebrew, Sea of Suph, Reed Sea. The mistaken translation, Red sea, has given a totally erroneous view of the route of Israel. This is a quite different term from that which designates what we call the Red Sea or the Gulf of Suez. The Reed or Marsh Sea is mentioned in Egyptian writings of the thirteenth century B.C. as being near Rameses. Either Lake Timsah or the southern extension of the present Lake Menzaleh fits the description. These lakes are part of the chain once uniting the Gulf of Suez with the Mediterranean, and are now a part of the Canal. Lake Timsah is nearer Succoth. Harnessed. The precise meaning is uncertain. The ASV reads armed, and the RSV, equipped for battle. 19. The faith of Joseph was justified (Gen 50:25). 20. Etham. The location is unknown. 21,22. These were not two pillars but one, of cloud by day and of fire by night. The Scripture discountenances attempts to explain these guides by natural means (cf. Cambridge Bible). The pillar was a real sign of the real presence of Jehovah with his people.

14:1-31. The passage through the Red Sea. "The fact of the passage of the Red Sea can be questioned only by an extreme and baseless scepticism" (Cambridge Bible).

2. Turn. Turn back (ASV); wheel around (Moffatt). Pi-hahiroth and Migdol are mentioned in Egyptian inscriptions but are not yet identified with certainty. Baal-zephon. A Phoenician letter mentions "Baal-zephon and all the gods of Tahpanhes." Tahpanhes is Daphne, the modern Tel Dafneh, located near the southern extremity of Lake Menzaleh, half way between Succoth and Rameses. This explains the words "turn back." Instead of going directly east from Succoth, the Hebrews had turned north again and were now encamped by the marshy lake. This apparent uncertainty in their line of march must have encouraged Pharaoh to believe that the Israelites could find no way across the water barrier and were thus trapped, "wandering aimlessly" (American Trans.). 4. Honoured upon Pharaoh . . . that the Egyptians may know. The fact that there was one final lesson to be given Egypt explains why God led in this seemingly aimless fashion.

5. Whatever have we done (Moffatt). The departure of Israel was described to Pharaoh as a flight, not a pilgrimage to a place of sacrifice. 7. Captains. The exact meaning is unknown; some kind of superior officer. 8. With an high hand. "The high hand of Jehovah with the might which it displayed" (KD). 9. Horsemen. This is called anachronistic by some, as the Egyptians had no cavalry this early; but the word can just as well mean horsemen in chariots. This possibility is admitted in connection with 15:1 by those who deny it here (cf. Cambridge Bible).

12. Let us alone. Humanly speaking, they were faced with certain destruction. How characteristic of human nature is the cry, "Let us alone." We would rather lie supine in sinful bondage than, with the courage of faith, make the effort to follow God into newness of life. 13. Stand still. Better, stand firm (cf. I Cor 15:58 – "Be ye steadfast"). 14. You have only to stand still (cf. Isa 30:15; Ps 46:10). 15. Not a reproof but an admonition to act, "Go forward!" 19,20. Miraculously protected in the rear from the Egyptians by a thick cloud, they were at the same time given a floodlight from the Lord so that they might cross over.

21. The natural force used by God to perform this miracle was the east wind, whether in connection with a strong ebb tide, as some suppose, or not. It is sufficient for us to know that God, at precisely the right moment, caused the ford to be laid bare so that his people might cross; and at exactly the right time brought the waters back, so that the enemy was destroyed. 24. Troubled. Threw them into a panic (Moffatt). Morning watch, between 2:00 and 6:00 A.M. 25. Took off their chariot wheels. Clogging, binding (RSV, following LXX, Syriac, and Samaritan versions, rather than the Hebrew). The chariot wheels sank into the sand, which became more marshy by the moment. 27,28. The waters that had threatened the Israelites in their passage, and, except for God's restraining hand, would have destroyed them, now overwhelmed the Egyptians. "From this manifestation of Jehovah's omipotence, the Israelites were to discern not only the merciful Deliverer but also the holy Judge of the ungodly, that they might grow in the fear of God as well as in the faith which they had already shown" (KD). 31. Believed in. More than just believe (AV), it implies "laying firm hold morally on a person or thing" (Cambridge Bible).

e) The Song of Moses. 15:1-21. Although critics recognize this hymn of praise as "one of the finest products of Hebrew poetry" (Cambridge Bible), they usually relegate it to the time of the monarchy. They assume that such great poetry could not have been written as early as Moses! Scripture links this triumphal paean with the song of a greater redemption, as on the shores of the eternal sea, at the final and glorious triumph over all enemies, the redeemed sing "the song of Moses . . . and the song of the Lamb" (Rev 15:3).

1. The horse and his rider hath he thrown into the sea. "Thus briefly but completely is the ruin of the Pharaoh's army described" (Cambridge Bible). 2. I will prepare him an habitation. The AV follows the Targum. The clause is better rendered I will praise (ASV, RSV) or thank him. 3. Jehovah is his name. A taunt to Pharaoh, who had asked, "Who is Jehovah?" 7. Hast overthrown. The Hebrew is more forceful – "to break in pieces and throw in ruins upon the earth" (Cambridge Bible). 9. The enemy said, I will. How often the proud purpose of man is thwarted by the power of God (cf. Isa 14:13,14). Destroy. Literally, dispossess, root out. 10. "One breath of God was sufficient to sink the proud foe in the waves of the sea" (KD; cf. Ps 46:6). 11. Fearful in praises. Terrible in glorious deeds (RSV); awe-inspiring in renown (American).

13. Holy habitation. As a shepherd leads his flock to the fold, so God was leading Israel to His habitation, the Promised Land. 14. Palestina. Hebrew, Philistia. Ironically, the name of the Holy Land most frequently used by us is taken from the name of the bitter enemies of Israel and God. 16. Fear and dread. Until forty years had passed and Israel had entered the land, the fear of the Lord was upon the Canaanites (cf. Josh 5:1; 2:9,10). 17. The Sanctuary . . . which thy hands have established. This is the goal, not yet the accomplished fact.

20. Although Miriam was a sister to both, she is ranked with Aaron, not with Moses. Timbrel. A tambourine. Dancing was, and still is in the East, the language of religion. 21. Answered. They sang antiphonally, perhaps the verses of the song of Moses (vv. 1-19).

G. Israel in the Wilderness. 15:22–18:27.

Released from the bondage of Egypt, Israel was now led by the Lord to Mount Sinai. At this stage God's people were a disorganized, quarrelsome, faithless multitude. They had to be molded into a nation, capable of serving him. To this end, everything, including the march to Sinai, was to contribute to their training. The traditional line of march, down the western edge of the peninsula, is still the one most widely accepted by Bible scholars, and the reasonable one. Though the exact places mentioned in Scripture cannot be identified with certainty, the general locations are fairly well established. (For various other routes proposed, cf. Rand McNally Bible Atlas).

22. Wilderness of Shur. East of the Suez, in the northwest section of the peninsula. Shur means wall in Hebrew. In Num 33:8 the area is called "the wilderness of Etham," which is the same name in Egyptian. Possibly it was named for the line of fortifications erected there. Three days. In three days the water they carried with them would have been exhausted, even though they had probably gone no more than fifteen miles. 23. Marah. This is reasonably identified with Ain Hawarah, still a small spring of brackish, unpalatable water. 24. Murmured. This was the almost automatic reaction of Israel, as it has been the reaction of multitudes of God's people since, to any and every difficulty.

25,26. The search for a natural explanation of this miracle, for some sort of tree that makes bad water good, is quite useless. By this test of Jehovah and proof of his care and power, an ordinance was established for all time—that for the obedient, God would prove to be Jehovah Rōp'ekā, "Jehovah that healeth thee." 27. Elim. About six miles from Ain Hawarah is a beautiful large oasis with plentiful water, Wadi Gharandel, which corresponds to the description of Elim.

16:1. Wilderness of Sin. According to Num 33:10-12, the people of Israel traveled along the seashore, possibly by the regular route to the Sinai mines. They turned in to the Wilderness of Sin at Dophkah. If Dophkah can be identified with Serabit el-Khadem, then the Wilderness of Sin is the plain along the edge of the plateau, called Debbet er-Ramleh. The geographical directions are too slight to give much certainty. 2. The circumstances and God's provision again combined to prove the faith and obedience of Israel.

7. The glory of the Lord. The eye of faith sees the glory of the Lord in the bread and flesh that he provides. What are we. We do not count; why grumble against us? (Moffatt) 10. Behold, the glory.

The unmistakable evidence of God's presence in the fiery pillar authenticated the words of Moses and prepared the people for the more veiled glory of the miracle to come.

14. Small round thing. Fine flake-like thing (RSV). 15. It is manna. From mān-hû', "What is it?" The name manna may have arisen from the question, or the similarity in sound may have related the two words. 16. Omer. About two quarts. 23. Seethe. Boil. Sabbath. This indicates that although the Sabbath was already known, it was not observed in any special way.

31. Manna. There is a species of tamarisk that grows in the Peninsula from which there exudes, perhaps from the puncture of an insect, during summer nights, a liquid which forms small white grains. The Arabs gather this, boil it down, and use it like honey. It has a sweet, aromatic taste. It will keep a long time in a cool place but melts in the sun; it cannot be ground or made into cakes. This resembles but also distinctly differs from the manna of the Bible. The Scripture, not only in its description of the manna, but in its record of marvelous provision for forty years (v. 35) makes it clear that the manna was not a natural phenomenon but a special provision of the hand of the Lord. Coriander. A small, grayish-white seed, with a pleasant spicy flavor, used widely as a spice for cooking.

33,34. Before the Lord. . . before the Testimony. That is, before the tables of the Law in the ark. This direction must have been given later, perhaps as the time for the end of the manna drew near. 35. This need not be taken as meaning that the Israelites ate nothing but manna for forty years. During the stay at Sinai, they may very well have sowed and harvested crops, and they could also have obtained food from time to time from traders.

17:1-7. Water from the rock at Rephidim. From the plateau of the Wilderness of Sin, a series of valleys leads directly to Mount Sinai. One of these, the Wadi Refayid, some claim is the valley of Rephidim.

2. Did chide. Found fault (RSV). Tempt. Subject to trial. It was unbelief that led them to question the faithfulness of God (v. 7).

6. Horeb is used in Scripture as a term interchangeable with Sinai. It may have a wider reference, to the range of which Sinai is one peak. At Rephidim, then, Israel was close to her immediate journey's end. Smite the rock. A natural explanation of this miracle has been offered in that certain rock formations in this area are simply a thin limestone crust which a blow from a rod would break and permit water to come out. The Apostle Paul tells us that "the Rock was Christ" (I Cor 10:4). Whatever means God may have used, the important fact is that it was made manifest to the Israelites that their help came from the Lord. 7. Massah. Proving (AV, tempted), from the verb used in 17:2. Meribah. Strife, translated "chide" in verse 2.

8. Amalek was a tribe, or group of fierce, rapacious nomads, much like the Bedouins of today. Though descended from Esau (Gen 36:12), they were not a part of the nation of Edom. According to Deut 25:18, they had attacked Israel from the rear, making a cowardly assault upon the "faint and weary" stragglers. This explains the severe judgment of Ex 17:14. 9. This is the first appearance of Joshua, destined to be Moses' great successor. 10. Hur. Jewish tradition makes him Miriam's husband (Jos Antiq. III. 2.4).

11. Commentators, ancient and modern, almost unanimously consider this act of Moses an act of prayer. As such, it expressed an attitude of dependence upon God that determined the outcome of the battle, and it served to demonstrate the reality of this dependence to all the people. "The battle which Israel fought with this foe possessed a typical significance in relation to all the future history of Israel. It [Israel] could not conquer by the sword alone, but could only gain the victory by the power of God, coming down from on high and obtained through prayer" (KD). 13. Discomfited. Mowed down (RSV); disabled, prostrated.

15. Jehovah-nissi. Jehovah my banner. 16. The Lord hath sworn. Literally, a hand upon, or to, the throne of Jehovah. Some authorities read nēs, "banner," instead of kēs, "throne," and translate, a hand upon the banner of the Lord (RSV); or, We pledge loyalty to the Eternal's banner (Moffatt). The AV, ASV rendering hardly suits the context. This should be an oath sworn by Moses, and, as such, an admonition to the people of Israel to pledge themselves to fulfill God's purpose (v. 14).

18:1-27. The visit of Jethro and the appointment of judges. 2. After he had sent her back. Cf. 4:24-26. 3. Cf. 2:22. 5. Mount of God. The sequence of this passage has been questioned because it is not until chapter 19 that Israel is said to have arrived at Sinai. However, since even at Rephidim they could have been said to be at the mountain of God – Horeb (17:6), there seems to be no real problem in the order of the narrative here.

7. Did obeisance. Bowed down (Moffatt). The usual Eastern etiquette. 11. Jethro, in KD is called "the first fruits of the heathen who would hereafter seek the living God." This testimony of Jethro and the subsequent act of worship seem to indicate a conversion experience, and invalidate the theory that it was from Jethro and the Midianites that Moses learned of Jehovah.

15. Inquire of God. The decisions of Moses and the ordinances upon which they were based came ultimately from Jehovah. 18. Wear yourselves out (RSV). 21. Rulers of thousands. It is best to take this as meaning "thousands" of families rather than individuals, thus following the natural tribal divisions. Driver finds this plan impractical because a man would be subject to four different judges (Cambridge Bible). But it is assumed that these different categories would function as higher and lower courts. The majority of problems would be solved, as in our own system, by the lowest court, "the rulers of tens."

24. Moses hearkened. Moses has been criticized for this act. However, Jethro conditioned his advice with, "and God command thee so"; and it may be assumed that Moses did inquire of the Lord. Furthermore, there is no record of God's having rebuked Moses. In Deut 1:15 Moses explains how the judges were chosen from leaders, wise and well known, of the various tribes.

II. Israel at Sinai. 19:1–40:38.

The year of sojourn at Sinai accomplished two things: (1) Israel was given the Law of God and instructed in God's ways; and (2) the multitude that had escaped from Egypt was unified into the beginnings of a nation. This period is of the utmost importance for understanding the will and purpose of God as it is revealed in the rest of the OT. This is the heart of what is so frequently referred to throughout Scripture as "the Law." The record of the sojourn at Sinai and the Law given there occupies not only the remainder of Exodus but also the book of Leviticus and the first chapters of Numbers.

The Graf-Wellhausen hypothesis, promulgated in the nineteenth century, that denied even the existence of a Tabernacle, made of these laws simply the reflection of the customs of later centuries. The past half century has seen a reversal of this thinking, so that now practically all scholars are willing to admit that the framework and core of the Law are Mosaic. Critics still insist that the Law, as we now have it, has been modified from the original and edited considerably by later ages. While it is not impossible that later judgments and ordinances are included, those who hold the Law to be a revelation from God accept it in its present form as substantially that which Moses received. Even the critics who theoretically deny this, find it difficult to decide just which of the ordinances are the later ones.

A. Establishment of the Covenant at Sinai. 19:1–24:11. The history of the arrival at Sinai and God's presentation of his covenant is followed by the so-called Book of the Covenant (chs. 20–23), in which the basic code is set forth. Then follows the account of the ratification of the covenant by sacrifice and the sprinkling of blood.

1) Arrival at Sinai and Preparation for the Covenant. 19:1-25.

19:1. The same day. Jewish tradition holds that this was the day of Pentecost, and that the purpose of the Feast of Pentecost was to celebrate the giving of the Law. However, the expression is too general to indicate any particular day. Wilderness of Sinai. The southern range of mountains, situated in the wedge of the triangular peninsula, has three summits. The Arabs call the central summit Jebel Musa, the one to the south, Jebel Hum, and the third, Jebel Serbol. Each of these mounts has been claimed as the Sinai of Scripture, but since the fourth century A.D., at least, Jebel Musa has been most widely and consistently held. The desert or wilderness of Sinai must be a plain near the mountain (v. 2) large enough for Israel to encamp on it. Such a place has been found in er-Raha, to the north of Jebel Musa, or in Wadi es-Sebayeh, to the east. The former is about four hundred acres in extent, quite ample for any number of Hebrews. From er-Raha the Wadi ed-Deir, "Convent Valley," leads to a saddle between Jebel Musa and Jebel ed-Deir, where the famous monastery of St. Catherine is located. The monastery was built by Jus-tinian in 527 A.D. on a site already occupied by a small church identifying the spot where it was believed God had appeared to Moses in the burning bush. The Wadi es-Sebayeh is a long narrow valley, not so commodious as er-Raha, but with easier access to the mountain. It is difficult, if not impossible, to decide which of these peaks and valleys best fits the description given in Scripture.

3. House of Jacob. The name of Jacob recalls the depths from which God had raised them. 4. On eagles' wings. An allusion to the griffin-vulture, a large majestic bird abundant in Palestine.

5. The covenant was based upon the accomplished fact of the redemption from Egypt, a redemption which Israel had received by faith. "The theocracy established by the conclusion of the covenant was only the means adopted by Jehovah for making His chosen people a royal body of priests; and the maintenance of the covenant was the indispensable subjective condition upon which their attainment of this divinely appointed destiny and glory depended" (KD). We are also to remember that the Law did not disannul the covenant with Abraham (Gal 3:17). "The covenant of law raised itself on the ground of the previous covenant of grace and sought to carry this out to its legitimate consequence and proper fruits" (Patrick Fairbairn, The Typology of Scripture, II, 143). Peculiar treasure. My own prized possession (Moffatt). 6. Priests . . . holy nation. "As the priest is a mediator between God and man, so Israel is called to be the vehicle of the knowledge and salvation of God to the nations of the earth. . . . He chose Israel as His possession, to make it a holy nation, if it hearkened to His voice and kept His covenant" (KD).

8. All that the Lord hath spoken we will do. The people of Israel unquestionably did not realize all the implications of their vow. Neither does a Christian understand all that is entailed when he presents himself "a living sacrifice" unto God. In both cases there is a response by faith to the express will of God the Redeemer. 9. Believe thee for ever. The appearance of the Lord would impress the people and at the same time undergird the authority of Moses. 13. Touch it. Rather, touch him; a transgressor was not to be followed onto the mountain, but shot or stoned from a distance. Trumpet. Rather, ram's horn (Moffatt); this is not the same word as is used in verses 16,19.

16. The vain attempt to determine what kind of phenomenon is described here – earthquake, volcano, or storm – misses the point that whatever these were, they were simply a manifestation of the presence of the Lord. This was not a natural disturbance that convinced a superstitious people that God was near; it was God himself making his presence known.

21. Go down, charge. This is not a confusion of two accounts, but a re-emphasis of the command already given in 19:12. 22. Priests. Not the Levitical priests, who were not yet appointed, but those who had hitherto discharged the duties of the priestly office according to natural right and custom" (KD).

2) The Ten Commandments. 20:1-20. The Law was not given as a means of salvation. It was given to a people already saved (19:4; 20:2) in order to instruct them in the will of the Lord so that they might fulfill God's purpose for them as "a kingdom of priests and a holy nation" (19:6). The revelation was given "not to give but to guide life" (P. Fairbairn, The Revelation of Law in Scripture, p. 274).

The division of the Law into Moral, Social or Civil, and Ceremonial or Religious Laws, while convenient, is misleading. The Law is one, and the whole Law is spiritual, whether dealing with crops or criminals or worship. Calvin's commentary treats all subsequent laws under one or the other of the Ten Commandments. This is eminently justifiable and an excellent illustration of the unity and spirit of the Law. "What is called the ceremonial law, therefore, was in its more immediate and primary aspect an exhibition by means of symbolic rites and institutions of the righteousness enjoined in the Decalogue, and a discipline through which the heart might be wrought into some conformation to the righteousness itself" (Fairbairn, Typology, II, 157).

The Decalogue, or Ten Words (Deut 4:13) was given directly to all Israel by an audible and terrible voice, the voice of Jehovah, sounding like a trumpet over the multitude (Ex 19:16; 20:18). Overwhelmed by the experience, the people begged that God would speak no more directly, but through Moses. The rest of the Law was then given to Moses as a mediator, but the heart of the Law had already been delivered. The Commandments are repeated, with slight but immaterial variations in Deut 5:6-18. This provides critics with materials for an argument as to the relative age and authenticity of the two records. An attempt has also been made to find a "ritual decalogue" in Exodus 34, but it has not been widely accepted. Although some deny that Moses had anything to do with the Commandments or that they were known to David, Elijah, or even Jeremiah, most modern scholars have come to accept the Biblical statement and believe that the Commandments go back to the days of Moses.

There are different ways of dividing the Commandments. The Lutheran and Roman Catholic churches follow Augustine in making verses 2-6 the first commandment, and then dividing verse 17, on covetousness, into two. Modern Judaism makes verse 2 the first commandment and verses 3-6 the second. The earliest division, which can be traced back at least as far as Josephus, in the first century A.D., takes 20:3 as the first command and 20:4-6 as the second. This division was supported unanimously by the early church, and is held today by the Eastern Orthodox and most Protestant churches.

2. It is important to notice that the basis of God's commandments and the ground of the people's obligation was the fact that Jehovah was their Lord and God who had redeemed them. These injunctions are given to a saved people to teach them how to walk in God's way, but we observe that "nearly all the commandments are couched in the negative form of prohibition, because they presuppose the existence of sin and evil desires in the human heart" (KD).

3. The First Commandment. This is more than just a proclamation of monotheism. It prohibits worshiping or honoring anything before God, in thought or word or deed, "that in all things he might have the preeminence" (Col 1:18). 4-6. The Second Commandment. This prohibits the creation and use of graven images as objects of worship. But more essentially, it is a reminder that God is a Spirit, not to be conceived of as made in man's image or in that of any other created being. Visiting the iniquity (v. 5). The results of sin are seen to affect three or four generations, but God's mercy extends unto thousands. "He does not say He will be faithful or just toward the keepers of His law, but merciful" (Calvin). Them that love me (v. 6). "The fountain and origin of true righteousness is expressed, for the external observation of the law would be of no avail unless it flowed from hence" (Calvin). 7. The Third Commandment. This prohibits the use of God's name "in the service of unbelief and lying" (KD). To substantiate our falsehood by an appeal to God will bring certain judgment. Here also may be found force for the injunction to Christians to "walk worthy of the calling wherewith ye were called" (Eph 4:1), i.e., bear not the name of Christ in vain.

"The first commandment then guards the unity of God, the second His spirituality, and the third His deity or essence. In the first we are forbidden to make God one of many when He is the only One; in the second to liken Him to a corruptible image when He is the incorruptible Spirit; in the third to identify Him in any way with the creature when He is the Creator" (James Murphy, Commentary on Exodus, in loc.).

8-11. The Fourth Commandment. The word sabbath means, not rest or relaxation, but cessation from labor. The reason for the Sabbath is given objectively here as found in the fact that God ceased from the work of creation on the seventh day. Subjectively, in Deut 5:14,15, there is a reason given in the fact that men need rest. Also the Israelites were reminded thereby that God had redeemed them from the bondage of Egypt to enjoy his rest. The keeping of the seventh day of the week as the Sabbath is not abrogated in the NT, but the Sabbath of the New Creation is most naturally to be celebrated on that day when Christ, having ceased from his finished work, rose from the dead. The apostolic church celebrated both the first and the seventh days, but they soon discontinued the old Hebrew observance.

12. The Fifth Commandment. This command marks a division between the commandments that deal with man's relation to God and those that relate to his fellow man. A man is obligated to honor his parents as he does God, and to assume responsibility for them as he does for his fellow men. That thy days may be long. This may be understood as referring both to Israel's sojourn in the land of promise, and also to the life of the individual. Not only in Israel, but in all nations and individual lives, the destruction of the home marks the beginning of the end.

13. The Sixth Commandment. The sanctity of human life is upheld, and murder, for any reason, is forbidden. But this command is wrongly quoted in opposition to capital punishment administered by the state. The judicial taking of life in punishment for crime is authorized in Exodus 21, as well as in Romans 13. On the other hand, it is seldom stressed that this command is applicable to whatever would degrade man and deprive him of the full and rich life it is God's will that he should enjoy.

14. The Seventh Commandment. While this is directed specifically to maintain the purity and sanctity of marriage, it is also applied by Jesus to all sexual immorality of thought as well as deed (Mt 5:27,28). 15. The Eighth Commandment. The rights of private property are to be respected. 16. The Ninth Commandment. "Not only is lying prohibited, but false and unfounded evidence in general" (KD). 17. The Tenth Commandment. Covetousness is "the inordinate desire of unpossessed good" (G. A. Chadwick, Exodus in Expositor's Bible). "The most inward of all the commandments, forbidding not an external act, but a hidden mental state, a state, however, which is the root of nearly every sin against a neighbor" (Cambridge Bible). It is basically the sin of Adam and Eve, to desire that which it is not God's will that we have. 20. Fear may be before your faces. Keep you from sinning by a steady awe of Him (Moffatt).

3) The Covenant Constitution. 20:21–23:33. The ordinances next given to Moses and through him to the people have to do briefly with (1) the general form of worship (20:22-26); at some length with (2) social relations and rights of the people (21:1–23:13); and finally with (3) the relation of the people to Jehovah (23:14-33).

Formerly some critics found grounds in these laws for dating this section much later than the time of Moses. Since the discovery of a number of law codes much earlier than the Mosaic—e.g., Babylonian, Assyrian, Hittite, and Sumerian—the practice now is to determine the "dependence" of the Hebrew code upon the earlier ones. That people living in roughly the same era and under similar cultures should require legislation along similar lines is obvious, but this does not constitute dependence. "These laws are not all new, but combined approved customs, already established, with fresh legislation suited to the occasion . . .; foresight also appears in adapting the legislation less to present nomadic conditions than to the proximate settlement in Canaan" (Catholic Commentary). The spirit of the Mosaic law is found in the Ten Commandments. Not only were the people to whom these laws were addressed different from the nations around them, but the underlying assumptions of the laws themselves are radically different.

a) The General Form of Worship. 20:22-26. The command is here emphasized (vv. 22,23) that the God whose presence had been manifested to all Israel was not to be likened to any image produced by man's invention. No elaborate structures were to mark the way of approach of Israel to Jehovah, but a simple altar of earth or of common, unfinished stone (vv. 24-26). This precept does not disagree with later instructions concerning a brazen altar (27:1-9), but deals with a particular situation. Altars were not to be erected everywhere but where "I cause to be remembered my name" (RSV). At such places a simple altar was to be erected, not an ornate shrine. The practical application of the command is found in many places in later history (Jud 6:25,26; Josh 8:30; I Kgs 18:30-32). Steps (v. 26). Flowing garments would be lifted by the raised foot and the body would thus be disclosed. Other regulations provide for the priest serving at the larger altar (28:42).

b) Civil and Social Relations. 21:1–23:13.

21:1-11. The Israelite Slave. This law deals only with Hebrew slaves; foreign slaves are treated in Lev 25:44-46. Hebrews could become slaves of their own volition because of poverty or some private disaster. The regulations ensured their being treated as brethren under these circumstances. Some have suggested that these are not so much laws to be enforced as personal rights to be observed (e.g., KD), Seventh [year] (v. 2). The sabbatical year, the end of toil (cf. 21:2; 23:10,11). The slave was to go out in the same personal status as he came in (21:3,4). Unto the judges (v. 6). Unto God (ASV, RSV). Either translation is justified. Although the word is 'Elōhîm, the customary word for God, the actual transaction undoubtedly took place before judges who acted as representatives of God's righteousness (cf. Ps 82:6; Jn 10:35). To the door. He was thus fastened, as it were, to the house forever by the ear, the organ of hearing and obedience.

The ordinance is different for the female slave, who as concubine or even wife would become a part of the master's household (21:7-11). She was protected by three regulations: she could not be sold to a Gentile, to a far different kind of slavery (v. 8); if she had been taken to be espoused to a son, she was to be treated as a daughter (vv. 9,10); if she was not given the food, clothing, and rights of a wife, she was to be set free (v. 11). The father, who because of circumstances was forced thus to dispose of his daughter, was not selling her into cruel bondage, but sending her into a household where she would be as well treated as at home.

12-17. Capital Crimes. The sanctity of life is stressed by these laws against murder, kidnapping, and violence. God curbs the violence of sinful men by this sanction of strict justice. God deliver him (v. 13). We would say "accidentally," but to the Hebrew there were no "accidents" in a world where God reigned supreme.

18-32. Bodily Injuries, Whether Inflicted by Man or Beast. Here again the value of an individual in the sight of God is stressed. These also are more in the nature of admonitions than ordinances: injury as the result of a quarrel (vv. 18, 19); injury to a slave (vv. 20,21); injury to a pregnant woman (vv. 22-25). 22. No mischief follow; i.e., in addition to the loss of her child, no permanent injury to the mother ensues. Verses 23-25 state the lex talionis (law of retaliation) so often quoted as typical of the harsh OT laws. It should be noted first that this ordinance is restricted to matters of bodily harm only. Second, its purpose was not to enforce the rule but to check the passionate vengeance that for a slight injury often retaliated with death and destruction. Slaves were to be freed in retribution for a permanent injury (vv. 26, 27). When men suffered injury from animals, the owners were to be held responsible (vv. 28-32).

21:33–22:17. Laws Regarding Property.

33-36. Injury incurred by animals. In such cases responsibility was fixed for neglect or failure to take precautions. Open a pit (v. 33). This refers to cisterns for the storing of water or grain. "I have been astonished at the recklessness with which wells and pits are left uncovered and unprotected all over this country" (Thomson, The Land and the Book, II, 283; cf. I, 89, 90; II, 194; III, 458).

22:1-4. Theft. Breaking up. (v. 2). Literally, digging through. The usual way of access for a thief was digging through the relatively soft clay walls of the house. There shall be blood shed for him (v. 3). The householder is guilty (Moffatt). A mortal blow struck in darkness in defense of life and property was excused, but in the light of day, it was reasoned, such violent defense would not be necessary. The life, even of a thief, is of consequence in the eyes of God. Sold. Not in punishment but in restitution.

5-17. Loss of value, whether through accident, theft, or other cause. Verses 5 and 6 have to do with restitution for damage done to fields and crops. To be eaten may be rendered "to be grazed over" (RSV). Restitution must be made if damage had been done to the field. With slight emendation verse 5 might be read: "If a man shall cause a field or vineyard to be burnt," i.e., to destroy stubble and weeds. Getting out of control, the fire destroys another's field.

Loss or damage to goods left on deposit (vv. 7-13). No bonded warehouses or safety deposit boxes, or even banks were known. If a man had to be absent from home, he entrusted his property to a dependable neighbor. In a sense, this law served as the neighbor's bond. Stuff (v. 7). A very general term for a variety of things. Judges (v. 8). Cf. 21:6. Manner of trespass (v. 9). Breach of trust (RSV). Oath of the Lord (v. 11). Whether before judges or by oath, disputes were to be settled as before God and in recognition of his law. The Law held a man responsible for things he borrowed or hired (vv. 14, 15).

Seduction (vv. 16, 17). The girl is considered here as part of the family wealth, and the attack is regarded in respect to the loss of value because of the dowry, a considerable item, both then and now in the East. The moral crime is dealt with in Deut 22:22-27. Dowry. Better, marriage price. It was the price paid by the groom to the parents or family of the bride (cf. Gen 24:53).

22:18–23:9. Moral and Religious Laws. These laws are all based upon the fact that Israel was to be a holy nation unto Jehovah.

18. Witch. Sorceress (ASV, RSV). The malignant practice of magic and divination is still a potent force in primitive areas, and even among the superstitious in more enlightened lands. These few words are often quoted and voluminously commented on as a proof that superstitious ignorance is found in the OT, which must therefore not be inspired. These laws have been grossly misapplied, as in the seventeenth century witchcraft trials in New England. The New Testament, it is true, does not contain such laws, because the Christian economy is not a civil authority as was the Old Testament church. This, however, does not negate the reality of the demonic practices or the validity of the laws against them. 19. Bestiality. This unspeakable act was in fact a part of some of the degraded religious practices of the day. 20. Sacrifice to strange gods. Utterly destroyed. Literally, devoted, set apart unto Jehovah. "By death devoted to the Lord to whom he would not devote himself in life" (KD).

21-27. Humanitarian laws for the protection of the poor, the alien, and the helpless. These admonitions are forgotten by those who think of the Mosaic law as harsh and nationalistic. I will surely hear (vv. 22-24). The God who marks the sparrow's fall, will bring due recompense upon the heartless oppressor. Usury (v. 25). Interest. The lending of money as a commercial transaction is a modern practice and not considered here. Money was loaned as an act of charity to those who were in great need. To charge interest under such circumstances, profiting by another's need, is contrary to all decency. Raiment (v. 26). For the poor man who slept in his clothes, the large, rectangular mantle, the only garment worth taking as a pledge, was his only protection at night. I will hear (v. 27). God would hear the cry that the hard-hearted creditor ignored (cf. Thomson, I, 54,99; III, 89).

28. Reviling God or the ruler. "Contempt of God consists not only in blasphemies of Jehovah openly expressed, which were to be punished with death (Lev. xxiv. 11 sqq.), but in disregard of His threats with reference to the poorer members of His people (vers. 22-27), and in withholding from them what they ought to receive (vers. 29-31). Understood in this way, the command is closely connected not only with what precedes but also with what follows. The prince (lit., the elevated one) is mentioned by the side of God, because in his exalted position he has to administer the law of God among His people" (KD).

29-31. The terms of the covenant emphasized the Israelites' responsibility to the Lord. They were to show themselves holy not only in giving what the Lord required but in abstaining from what was forbidden.

23:1-9. The duty to uphold truth and justice. The Israelites were to walk in integrity and consideration for all men. They were not to bear false witness (v. 1), i.e., raise a false report (AV), nor be in any collusion with such as did. Unrighteous witness. Literally, witness of violence. Not follow a multitude (v. 2). A classic condemnation of mob violence. Neither by action nor by word was justice to be perverted because of the pressure of a crowd. Countenance (v. 3). To favor or be partial. Some think that this is a scribal error and that "rich" and not "poor" man was meant. But there is need to warn against injustice due to wrongly directed sympathy as well as for other reasons. Thine enemy's ox (vv. 4, 5). Not only was their conduct not to be determined by public opinion, the direction taken by the crowd, or compassion for the poor man; but personal antipathy, enmity, and hatred were not to lead them to injustice or churlish behavior (cf. Mt 5:44; Thomson, op. cit. III, 345). Wrest the judgment (v. 6). Never tamper with a poor man's rights in court (Moffatt). This is the converse of the injunction in 23:3.

Keep thee far (v. 7). Have nothing to do with unrighteousness. I will not justify. The LXX reads, Thou shalt not justify. The Hebrew reading makes the forceful point that to do such a thing puts one in opposition to a holy God who will not justify wickedness. Blindeth the wise (lit., the seeing men) and perverteth the causes (not words, AV) of the righteous. Again and again God emphasized the Israelites' responsibility for those who were without rights or redress, by recalling their own experiences (ye know the heart of a stranger, v. 9) from which only His compassion delivered them.

10-13. A Church Calendar. The responsibilities of worshipers; only brief mention is made here of matters that are treated at length later. Sabbaths, the Year of Rest, and the Day of Rest (vv. 10-12). Let it rest and lie still. As the slave was to be released from toil (21:2), so also the land was to rest the seventh year. The poor were permitted to eat of that which grew of itself that year (cf. Lev 25:1-7,20-22; Deut 15:1-18; 31:10-13). 12. The Sabbath Day. Cf. 20:8-11; 31:12-17; 35:1-3. That thine ox . . . may rest . . . the son of thy handmaid . . . the stranger. This adds a humanitarian reason to the religious one given in 20:11, but does not contradict it. 13. In all . . . be circumspect. Driver (Cambridge Bible) thinks this verse is displaced and should follow verse 19. But according to KD, it is a transitional sentence: verse 13a stresses their faithfulness in the laws that deal with their fellow men; and 13b prepares for the laws dealing with their relation to Jehovah.

c) The Pilgrimage Feasts 23:14-19. Though there were other observances to be kept, these three were the great festivals during which all the men of Israel were required to present themselves before the Lord. In them there was a remembrance not only of their redemption, but of God's continual blessing and provision. It has been pointed out that these are not only duties, but rights, "for keeping a feast to the Lord and appearing before Him were both privileges bestowed by Jehovah upon His covenant people" (KD). 14. A feast. Cf. 5:1. 15. Unleavened bread. Inseparable, of course, from Passover (cf. chs. 12; 13; Lev 23:5). None shall appear before me empty. Gifts were to be brought as evidence of thanks for God's blessings and as tribute to Jehovah their King (cf. Deut 16:16,17). 16. Feast of harvest. Pentecost (Lev 23:15-22; Num 28:26-31; Deut 16:9-12). Feast of ingathering. Tabernacles (Num 29:12 ff.; Lev 23:34-43; Deut 16:13,14). These feasts marked the beginning and ending of the harvest of all the produce of the land.

18,19. Three rules were to be observed in the feasts. (1) Unleavened bread was to be used, not only in the feast of that name, but in all the feasts. (2) Fat of my sacrifice was not to remain (cf. 12:10). Firstfruits. The withholding of this confession and expression of gratitude brought judgment on Israel again and again (cf. Mal 3:8). (3) Seethe a kid. This direction seems oddly at variance with the other regulations, and long caused much speculation by the commentators. Then, in the Ugarit literature discovered in 1930, it was learned that boiling a kid in its mother's milk was a Canaanite practice used in connection with fertility rites (Birth of the Gods, 1:14). Israel, by the presentation of the first fruits, acknowledged that blessing came from Jehovah, not from magic.

d) Farewell Exhortation. 23:20-33. The covenant is concluded with these words of promise and warning.

20-22. The Angel of Jehovah. "The name of Jehovah was in this angel; that is to say, Jehovah revealed Himself in Him; and hence he is called in 33:15,16 the face of Jehovah, because the essential nature of Jehovah was manifested in him. This angel was not a created spirit, therefore, but the manifestation of Jehovah Himself" (KD). "The angel is Jehovah Himself in a temporary descent to visibility for a special purpose" (McNeile, Westminster Commentary).

23-33. Promise and Warning. God promised to drive out the nations before them and to bless them, providing for their needs and protecting them. The people of Israel, on their part, were to abstain from all idolatry and covenanting with pagan peoples.

Overthrow (v. 24). Tear down and break down. Images. Pillars (ASV). Stones set up near a temple or in a sacred grove, a regular feature of Canaanite worship. The number of thy days (v. 26). Both the faithful individual and the faithful nation were promised that they would live out their days. My fear (v. 27). The panic of heart that would come to the heathen as the knowledge of God's mighty acts on behalf of Israel became known (Josh 2:11). Destroy. Better, throw into confusion (RSV). Hornets (v. 28). This is hardly to be taken literally, though some do take it so. To determine just what is symbolized here has exercised the ingenuity of generations of commentators. It has been suggested that the hornets represent Egyptians, sickness, natural disasters, et al. The suggestion of KD that it was the sting of fear (v. 27) seems a most reasonable idea. After gradually expelling the Canaanites, the people of Israel were to occupy the land (vv. 29, 30). This they signally failed to do (Jud 1; 2). I will set thy bounds (v. 31). Only once, under Solomon (I Kgs 4:21), and then only briefly, did Israel achieve these boundaries. Sea of the Philistines. The Mediterranean. Desert. The wilderness between Egypt and Palestine. The river. The Euphrates. Lest they make thee sin (vv. 32,33). The destruction of the Canaanites was necessary, and contact with them was forbidden lest they infect the people of God with their sin as with an infectious disease.

4) The Ratification of the Covenant. 24:1-11.

1,2. These two verses are actually the conclusion of the words of the Lord from the preceding chapter. God gave Moses directions in regard to the ratification of the covenant which were distinct from the ordinances to be delivered to all the people. Aaron and his two elder sons, Nadab and Abihu, and seventy of the elders were to worship "afar off" while Moses drew near to the Lord. The rest of the people were not to go up on the mountain at all.

3. Words . . . judgments. Both the positive commands and decisions in regard to particular cases (the contents of 20:22 -- 23:33) were delivered to the people. The Decalogue may not have been included, since all Israel had heard this from Jehovah himself. "It was necessary that the people should not only know what the Lord imposed upon them in the covenant about to be made with them, and what He promised them, but that they should also declare their willingness to perform what was imposed upon them" (KD). 4. Altar . . . pillars. "As the altar indicated the presence of Jehovah, being the place where the Lord would come to His people to bless them (20:24), so the twelve pillars, or boundary stones, did not serve as mere memorials of the conclusion of the covenant, but were to indicate the place of the twelve tribes and represent their presence also" (KD).

5. Young men. These were neither first-born sons nor Aaronic priests, but men chosen by Moses for this particular act, perhaps "as the strongest and most active members of the community" (Cambridge Bible). Burnt . . . peace offerings. It is significant that no sin offering is described. These were redeemed people, who now, by these sacrifices of dedication and fellowship, were committing themselves and entering into a close and binding communion with their Redeemer. 7. Book of the covenant. The book written by Moses (v. 4) and containing the laws of 20:22 – 23:33.

8. "In the blood sprinkled upon the altar, the natural life of the people was given up to God, as a life that had passed through death, to be pervaded by His grace; and then through the sprinkling upon the people it was restored to them again as a life renewed by the grace of God . . . . it became a vital power, holy and divine, uniting Israel and its God . . . a transposition of Israel into the kingdom of God, in which it was filled with the powers of God's spirit of grace and sanctified into a kingdom of priests, a holy nation (19:6)" (KD). Concerning all these words. On the basis of all these regulations (American Trans.).

9-11. The covenant meal was celebrated by Israel in its representatives. Saw the God of Israel (v. 10). "We must not go beyond the limits drawn in ch. 33:20-23 in our conceptions of what constituted the sight of God; at the same time we must regard it as a vision of God in some form of manifestation which rendered the divine nature discernible to the human eye. Nothing is said as to the form in which God manifested Himself" (KD).

B. Directions for the Sanctuary and the Priesthood. 24:12–31:18. The covenant having been established, there still remained the necessity "to give a definite external form to the covenant concluded with His people and construct a visible bond of fellowship in which He might manifest Himself to the people and they might draw near to Him" (KD). For this reason Moses was called up into the mountain for a long period. The construction of the sanctuary was not to be left to the devices of men. "The divine directions extended to all the details, because they were all of importance in relation to the design of God" (KD). At the same time, the absence of Moses served as a test of the sincerity of the recent dedication and pledge of the people.

1) Moses' Ascent into the Mountain. 24:12-18.

12. The tables of stone were to have inscribed on them the Decalogue (31:18). Law, and commandments, including, probably, the instructions (tōrâ) for the sanctuary and priesthood, and the laws now in Leviticus and Deuteronomy. 13. Joshua accompanied Moses onto the mountain, but seems not to have been in the immediate presence of Moses when Jehovah gave the laws. 14. The elders. Not necessarily just the seventy of 24:1. Aaron and Hur were appointed administrators in Moses' absence.

2) The Offerings To Be Brought for the Tabernacle. 25:1-7.

2. Offering. Literally, lifted. A gift lifted from one's possessions and given to the Lord. 3. Brass. Actually bronze. Modern brass, an alloy of copper and zinc, was not known in the ancient world. Bronze, i.e., copper hardened by tin, was used widely until iron came to be generally used. 4. The exact shades of the colors mentioned are difficult to determine. Blue was nearer purple-blue or violet, while purple was a red-purple. Both colors were costly and highly prized for their brilliance. 5. Badgers' skins. The meaning of the Hebrew word is uncertain, and various interpretations have been offered: seal (ASV), goat (RSV), porpoise (American). A similar Arabic word means "dolphin" or "dugong." Another view is that this is an Egyptian word meaning simply "leather" (Moffatt). Badger was suggested by the Talmud, but there is little probability that this was the skin used. Shittim. Acacia. Found widely on the Sinaitic peninsula, a very hard and durable wood.

3) Instructions for the Sanctuary. 25:8 – 27:21.

The names given to the structure commonly called the Tabernacle are many. It is called "the tent," usually referring to the outer covering; the "tent of meeting," where God met with his people (27:21); the "tent of the witness" or "testimony," because it contained the ark and the Decalogue (25:16); the "dwelling" and "dwelling of Jehovah" (Num 16:9), or "dwelling of the testimony" (Ex 38:21); and "the sanctuary" or "holy place" (25:8). The names "house" and "temple" (I Sam 1:9; 3:3) are also used, but they refer to a more settled condition of the Tabernacle. The common name is "tent," a term which the English translators exalted to the more high-sounding "tabernacle," following the Vulgate tabernaculum.

Although no symbolism is attributed to the Tabernacle in the text, there can be no doubt that it symbolized for Israel, as it does for us, great spiritual truths. It clearly taught the fact of God's presence in the midst of his people At the same time it indicated that he was a holy God in the midst of a sinful people, for the whole arrangement of the Tabernacle made plain that "the way into the holiest was not yet made manifest" (Heb 9:8). With the ark containing the Testimony, it was "an ever present witness to the claims of God and the duty of man" (Cambridge Bible).

9. According to all that I show thee. Moses not only received detailed instructions, but he must also have seen a pattern or model. Herein lies the difficulty for us; much that is confusing in the instructions would immediately be made clear if we could only see the model. Therefore, in considering the various speculations as to the exact form and mode of structure for the Tabernacle, we can only attempt to decide which seems the most reasonable.

a) The Ark of the Covenant. 25:10-22.

The ark was an oblong box or chest of acacia wood overlaid with gold. Taking the cubit as approximately eighteen inches long, the ark measured about three feet nine inches long, two feet three inches wide, and two feet three inches deep. Around the top was a crown or molding of gold, forming a rim. At each of the four corners or "feet" (v. 12) there was fixed a ring of gold. Through these rings were slipped gold plated poles or staves by which the ark was carried. The cover of the ark is referred to separately as "the mercy seat" (v. 17) or "the propitiatory." It was a slab of solid gold, fitting the length and width of the ark. Mounted upon the cover were the figures of two cherubim made out of beaten gold. These figures faced each other, with their wings spread as though shadowing the mercy seat. "The gold plate upon the ark formed the footstool of the throne for Him who caused His name, i.e., the real presence of His being, to dwell in a cloud between the two cherubim, above their outstretched wings. . . . Thus the footstool of God became a throne of grace, which received its name kappōret or hilasterion from the fact that the highest and most perfect act of atonement under the Old Testament was performed upon it" (KD). 16. Testimony. The Decalogue upon the tables of stone. 18. Cherubim. Whatever the exact appearance of these figures might have been, they always symbolized the presence of the Lord (cf. Ezk 1:5 ff.; Gen 3:24; II Sam 22:11; Rev 4:6,7).

b) The Table of Shewbread. 25:23-30.

This was a plain table, three feet long, one foot six inches broad, and two feet three inches high, made of wood overlaid with gold. A border or frame about three inches broad (a handbreadth, v. 25) ran around the table, either just below the top, as in modern tables, or halfway down the legs, as it appears in the representation on the Arch of Titus. On the four legs were rings of gold for the poles by which the table was carried. The name shewbread was first used by Tyndale (A.D. 1526) in translating Heb 9:2, probably following Luther's rendering schoubrot. A better translation is presence bread (ASV marg.; Moffatt) or bread of the presence (RSV). Bread was set on the table in the presence of Jehovah, one loaf for each tribe of Israel. There was thus a continual acknowledgment by Israel that from Jehovah came their daily bread, a symbol of both communion and dependence.

29. Dishes. Large, platter-like dishes to carry the flat loaves of bread. Spoons. Rather, cups for the frankincense that was to be placed on the bread, identifying it as a sacrifice (Lev 24:7). Covers. Chalices or bowls for the wine of the drink offering. Bowls. Flagons to pour the wine out in libations.

The loaves of bread were called bread of the face (v. 30) because they were to lie on the table before the face of Jehovah as a food offering presented by the children of Israel (Lev 24:7), "not as food for Jehovah but as a symbol of the spiritual food which Israel was to prepare . . . so that the bread and wine, which stood upon the table by the side of the loaves, as the fruit of the labor bestowed by Israel upon the soil of its inheritance, were a symbol of its spiritual labor in the kingdom of God, the spiritual vineyard of its Lord" (KD). The shewbread also reminded the Israelites of their dependence upon Jehovah, from whom came their daily sustenance (cf. Ezk 16:19; Hos 2:8).

c) The Candlestick. 25:31-40.

The only light in the Tabernacle was furnished by the candlestick, or, properly speaking, the lampstand. This consisted of a central shaft from which three branches extended outward and upward from each side; on the tops of the branches and the shaft, lamps were fixed, seven in all. Both stem and branches were decorated at intervals with ornamental work shaped like the calyx and corolla of the almond flower. The size of the lamp is not given in Scripture. Josephus says that it was five feet high and three feet six inches broad. Others infer that it was two feet three inches high and wide, the size of the table of shewbread opposite it. A talent of pure gold, approximately ninety-four pounds, was used to make the lampstand and its various vessels. Apart from its utilitarian function, the lamp stood as a symbol, not only of the light of God by which Israel walked, but of Israel itself, a light in the midst of a dark world, supplied with the oil of the Spirit of God.

31. Shaft, and . . . branches. Base and shaft (ASV). Bowls . . . knops. Cups, each with its calyx and petals (American). The cup is the whole flower, the knop, the bud with its outer and inner petals. Some have thought that the lampstand was to resemble the almond tree, called the "awakening one" by the Hebrews because of its early blossoming. 37. A lamp in Bible times was like a saucer with the rim pinched in at one end. It was filled with oil, and a wick was placed in it with one end protruding from the pinched-in part. Light the lamps. Actually, "fix on" the lamps to the stand after they had been prepared. 38. Tongs. An instrument, something like tweezers, to draw out the wick. Snuff dish (lit., fire catcher). A tray for the tongs.

d) The Tabernacle. 26:1-37.

1-6. The Ornamental Curtains that Formed the Tabernacle Itself. There were ten curtains, each forty-two feet long and six feet wide. When fastened together, they formed one great hanging, sixty by forty-two feet. The curtains were beautifully woven tapestries of white linen, and blue, purple, and scarlet fabrics, with figures of cherubim either woven in or embroidered on them. These, mounted on the wooden framework (vv. 15-30), formed the Tabernacle proper. Unless we are to understand that this beautiful work was completely hidden, we must suppose either that the boards of the frame formed hollow squares rather than a solid fence (Kennedy, "Tabernacle," HDB), or else that the curtains hung down inside the frame (James Strong, The Tabernacle). Strong believes that they were not used as a tent at all, but hung like curtains on the inside of the frame.

Cunning work (v. 1). Work of the designer or pattern maker. The curtains (vv. 3-6) were fastened together in two sets of three each by means of loops of blue material on the edges, which were coupled together with gold clasps. The two sets were then fastened to each other in the same way, thus making one large curtain. Since the frame of the Tabernacle was forty-five by fifteen by fifteen feet, the sixty-foot curtain must have hung down to the ground in the back (assuming the front left open), and the forty-two-foot width would have reached to within a foot and a half of the ground.

7-14. The Outer Coverings. The tent over the dwelling was made of goats' hair, as Bedouin tents are still made, and probably as the Israelite tents were made then. While the linen curtains formed a beautiful interior, the goats' hair made a serviceable covering outside. This covering was made of eleven curtains, each forty-five by six feet, fastened together by bronze clasps (vv. 10,11) in the same manner as the linen curtains; this formed one great covering sixty-six by forty-five feet. Since the goats' hair curtain was three feet wider than the linen, it must have covered the latter completely on the sides (v. 13). It was six feet longer than the tapestry, and this excess was used by doubling one of the sections over (v. 9) and letting it hang down in front, as a sort of valance to protect the entrance screen. The rest of the excess probably hung down in the back. Any slack in this covering would have been taken up, as in other tents, by the ropes and pegs by which it was stretched out and held. Some think that there may have been a ridgepole to form a peak or gable, but this cannot be determined from the text. Two outer coverings of leather (v. 14; cf. 25:5) covered the woven goats' hair and provided protection from bad weather.

15-30. The Wooden Framework. A framework made of boards or frames of acacia wood plated with gold, each board being fifteen feet long and two feet three inches wide. Kennedy argues that these were open frames rather than solid boards ("Tabernacle," HDB). We do not know the thickness of the boards, but Josephus says that it was three inches (Antiq. III. 6.3), which would have made a very substantial and exceedingly heavy fence, rather than simply the sturdy frame that was required. Also, as suggested above, unless we are to think of the tapestry as drapes, the beauty would have been completely hidden by a solid frame. The Scripture does not give us enough detail to enable us to picture the frame exactly. Each board had two tenons (lit., hands) projecting beneath (v. 17), which fitted into mortices or sockets in bases of silver (v. 19). The silver bases weighed one talent (ninety-five pounds) each, enough weight to secure the frame quite solidly (38:27). The frames formed the sides and back of the Tabernacle. Twenty boards formed each side, forty-five feet long, and six boards formed the back. At the two corners where side and back met, two extra boards were added in some way for strengthening. Though the exact manner of forming the corners is obscure (v. 24), we know that the extra boards served somehow to buttress the framework. For further strengthening, five bars ran horizontally along each side and the back, fitting into gold rings on the boards. The middle bar ran from end to end (v. 28); the others presumably were shorter, each running perhaps half the length.

Boards (v. 15). Upright frames (RSV). Two tenons . . . set in order (v. 17). Two pegs clamped to the foot (Moffatt). Each of these two frames forming a double support and running it up to the topmost ring (v. 24; Moffatt).

31-35. The Veil of the Holy of Holies. The "Dwelling" was divided into two sections, called "the Holy Place" and "the Holy of Holies" or "Most Holy Place." The veil was made of the same richly woven tapestry as the inner curtains. It was hung by gold hooks from four pillars of gilded wood, which were held by tenons in sockets of silver, as were the boards of the framework. Taches (v. 33). Hooks or clasps.

36,37. The Entrance Veil. The entrance was covered by a veil of less elaborate workmanship than that of the Holy of Holies, and was hung, like the other, on pillars, fixed into sockets of bronze.

e) The Altar of Burnt Offering. 27:1-8.

This altar was a hollow frame of acacia wood, plated with bronze, seven and a half feet square and four and a half feet in height. At each corner a bronze point (horns, v. 2) projected. A grating or network of bronze was placed under the compass (v. 5), or ledge of the altar, even to the midst, i.e., reaching half way up (RSV). Some suppose that this network extended through the altar, forming a grate upon which the sacrifice rested. Others believe that the ledge, supported by the network, ran around the altar and formed a place for the priests to stand on while sacrificing. The latter seems more probable, for it is doubtful that there would have been a fire within the altar itself, as this would soon have charred the wood completely. The bronze altar was probably placed over a mound of earth or stone and the fire laid on top. At the four corners of the ledge were bronze rings, through which bronzed wooden staves were thrust for carrying the altar.

Horns (v. 2). "In these the whole force of the altar was concentrated" (KD). Those who fled for safety to a sanctuary laid hold of the horns of the altar (I Kgs 1:50). The blood of the sacrifice was smeared on the horns (Lev 4:7). As throughout Scripture, "horns" stand for power, it is probable that the horns of the altar symbolized the power of God. Ashes (v. 3; lit., fat), i.e., the ashes of the burned sacrifice. Basons (lit., tossing vessels). Large bowls in which the blood was caught and thrown against the sides of the altar.

f) The Court of the Tabernacle. 27: 9-19.

A rectangular area, one hundred and fifty feet long by seventy-five feet wide, surrounded the Tabernacle. It was enclosed by hangings of white linen, seven and a half feet in height, suspended on pillars. There were twenty pillars for each of the longer sides and ten for the shorter ones. The pillars, or poles, were of bronze with capitals of silver (38:17), and were set into sockets or bases of bronze. The curtains were attached to the pillars by means of silver hooks which hooked into the silver fillets or bands of the pillars. Cords and bronze tent pins kept the hangings taut (38:19). The entrance to this court was on the east side. There the hangings extended in for fifteen cubits from each corner, leaving a thirty-foot entrance. The entrance was closed by a screen of tapestry embroidered like the entrance screen of the Tabernacle itself. Vessels of the tabernacle (v. 19). Probably the tools used for setting up and taking down the Tabernacle.

20,21. The sanctuary light. Clear olive oil of the first quality, obtained by "beating," i.e., gently pounding the olives in a mortar. Inferior oil was obtained by grinding the pulp that remained. Evening to morning. The lamps were kept burning in the Holy Place, before God's testimony, all through the night.

4) The Garments and Consecration of the Priests. 28:1–29:46.

Aaron and his sons were chosen by Jehovah to be the priests, the mediators, of Israel. This was a new ordinance, as were the regulations for the sanctuary and the sacrifices. Critics insist that the restriction of the priesthood to the family of Aaron is a reflection of post-Exilic times. But if there was a Tabernacle, there must also have been a stated priesthood. There is no evidence in any of the later history of Israel that, except for extraordinary circumstances, any but the sons of Aaron ever acted as priests.

a) Directions Regarding the Appointment and Clothing of the Priests. 28:1-5.

b) The Ephod. 28:6-14.

This was the most distinctive part of the high priest's garments. It was a kind of waistcoat or apron, elaborately embroidered. It consisted of two pieces, front and back, joined at the shoulders by straps or shoulder pieces (v. 7), and bound around the waist by a girdle that was part of the ephod itself (v. 8). On each shoulder strap was an onyx stone in a setting of gold filigree, upon which were engraved the names of the twelve tribes of Israel, six on each stone. Thus symbolically the priest bore upon his shoulders the burden of all Israel as he represented them before God. The colors and material of the ephod (v. 6) answer to the colors and texture of the sanctuary, thus identifying the sanctuary and the minister. Instead of cherubim, however, the ephod was embroidered throughout with fine gold wire, woven in with the other colors (v. 8). Curious girdle. Skillfully woven band (ASV, RSV). According to their birth (v. 10). In the order of the ages of the ancestral sons of Jacob. Ouches (v. 11). Settings (ASV); settings of gold filigree (RSV).

c) The Breastplate. 28:15-29.

The breastplate or "pouch" of judgment, was a bag of the same material as the ephod. It was made of one piece of material, folded over to form a pouch, nine by nine inches. Fastened into this pouch in settings of gold were twelve precious stones, four rows of three each, upon which were engraved the names of the twelve tribes. The pouch was held to the ephod by means of two chains of gold, which linked into gold rings at the upper corners of the pouch and attached them to the shoulder pieces of the ephod (vv. 22-25). Through other rings at the bottom corners, the pouch was secured to the girdle of the ephod by means of bands of blue lacing (vv. 26-28).

As the high priest ministered in the sanctuary, he bore the burdens and needs of his people not only in the place of strength, upon his shoulders, but also upon his heart, that with wisdom and compassion he might be their mediator before Jehovah (v. 29).

The identity of some of the stones in the breastplate (vv. 17-20) is very uncertain. And since the early translators of the Bible were also uncertain about the identification, their renderings are quite inconsistent. The following identifications represent a consensus of the opinions of modern authorities.

Sardius (v. 17). Possibly carnelian or red jasper. Topaz. A yellow or green stone, possibly chrysolite. Carbuncle. Emerald or rock crystal. Emerald (v. 18). A red stone, obviously not an emerald; either ruby or garnet. Sapphire. More likely lapis lazuli than sapphire. Diamond. Either the crystal or sardonyx. There is no evidence that the diamond was known in ancient days. Ligure (v. 19). A stratified red and white stone, either jacinth or cairngorm. Agate. Properly named, a red opaque stone. Amethyst. The same clear purple stone we call by this name. Beryl (20). Either the same or chalcedony; possibly yellow jasper. Onyx. The same as oynx today. Jasper. Beryl or green jasper.

The directions for the lower fastening of the breastplate (v. 27) are not clear, but this was probably as explained above. Moffatt translates: low down on the apron, close to the joining of the shoulder straps and above the artistic ribbon.

d) The Urim and Thummim. 28:30.

The Hebrew words mean lights and perfections. The LXX translation is revelation and truth. "What the Urim and Thummim really were cannot be determined with certainty, either from the names themselves or from any other circumstances connected with them. Perhaps they were a certain medium given by the Lord to His people through which, whenever the congregation required divine illumination to guide its actions, that illumination was guaranteed; and by means of which the rights of Israel, when called in question or endangered, were to be restored, and . . . this medium was bound up with the official dress of the high priest, though its precise character can no longer be determined" (KD; cf. Num 27:21; I Sam 28:6; Ezr 2:63).

e) The Robe of the Ephod. 28:31-35.

It was woven of one piece of cloth, with armholes but no sleeves. It was put on over the head and probably reached to the knees. Around the edge of the skirt small golden bells alternated with pomegranates of twisted yarn. The pomegranates have been taken as symbols of the Word of God, a sweet and refreshing fruit, and the bells as the sounding forth of this Word (cf. Sir [or Ecclesiasticus] 45:9). Binding . . . as it were the hole of an habergeon (v. 32). For habergeon the ASV has coat of mail. The binding was to keep the edge from fraying. That he die not (v. 35). No mere priest was allowed to enter the Holy of Holies, the immediate presence of Jehovah. "This privilege was restricted to the representative of the whole congregation . . . and even he could only do so when wearing the robe of the word of God, as the bearer of the divine testimony upon which the covenant fellowship with the Lord was founded" (KD).

f) The Headdress. 28:36-38.

The headdress of the high priest was a turban of fine white linen (v. 39) upon the front of which was affixed, by means of a band of blue lace, a gold plate on which were engraved the words, "Holy to Jehovah." Thus was the office and person of the high priest marked out by God before the people, until He should come who was Himself holy (cf. Heb 7:26). Mitre (v. 37). The AV, ASV term is misleading, as the headdress bore no resemblance to modern conceptions of a mitre. It more likely resembled the common turban of the East. That Aaron may bear the iniquity (v. 38). The high priest was exalted into an atoning mediator of the whole nation; and an atoning intercession was associated with his office.

g) The tunic (AV, coat). 28:39.

The tunic or coat was woven of linen in a check pattern and was worn close to the body, beneath the robe of the ephod. According to Josephus (Antiq. III. 7.2), the tunic reached to the feet and had tight sleeves. It was bound about the body with a richly colored sash or girdle embroidered like the tapestries of the sanctuary.

h) Dress of the Ordinary Priests. 28: 40-43.

Although they are described as being "for glory and for beauty," these were very simple garments. There was a tunic such as the high priest wore, but of plain color, bound with a sash that is not otherwise described. Upon the head was a cap (RSV), either a band of linen about the head, or, more likely, a skull cap. Beneath the tunic the priests wore linen breeches or drawers. It should be remembered that linen was a costly and highly prized cloth in those days, so that even the least of the priests' garments were made of the finest material. By these garments the priests appointed by Jehovah were officially marked as his representatives. To fail to wear them, and thus approach the Tabernacle (v. 43) as in their own virtue and personal right, was to bring upon themselves judgment and death.

i) The Consecration of the Priests. 29:1-37.

"Although the holiness of their office was reflected in their dress, it was necessary, on account of the sinfulness of their nature, that they should be sanctified through a special consecration for the administration of their office" (KD). The directions now given for the consecration were carried out in Leviticus 8. Since a full appreciation of the significance of the directions must wait upon a discussion of the sacrificial laws of Leviticus 1–7, it seems best to deal here only with the actual directions and not their spiritual meaning.

1-3. Preparation of the Offerings. Three types of biscuit or bread accompanied the offering: ordinary unleavened bread; cakes, i.e., unleavened bread mingled with oil; and wafers, i.e., very thin cakes anointed with oil (v. 2).

4-9. The Investiture of Aaron and His Sons. The priests were to be washed, dressed, and anointed with oil. Certainly this is a very clear indication of their being cleansed spiritually, clothed with God's righteousness, and empowered by the Holy Spirit.

10-14. The Sin Offering. A bullock was offered as a sin offering for the appointed priests. The men who were a type of the Great Priest to come had first to be cleansed from their own sins (cf. Heb 7:27). Caul (v. 13). The appendix or the lobe upon the liver.

15-18. The Ram of Dedication. The ram, wholly burned upon the altar, symbolized the priests, wholly dedicated to God. Sprinkle (v. 16). Actually, toss or throw better represents the Hebrew.

19-28. The Ram of Consecration. The cleansed and dedicated priests, symbolically had communion with their Lord, as they partook of the sacrificed ram. Ears, hands, and feet (v. 20) were dedicated to God to hearken to and obey his word. The cleansing blood and sanctifying oil were sprinkled not only upon the men, but upon their official garments (v. 21), consecrating and empowering them for service.

Rump (v. 22; lit., fat tail). The fat-tailed sheep is still bred in Palestine, the tail being considered a special delicacy. Wave them (v. 24). The specified portions of the ram and bread were waved, i.e., extended to the altar and then drawn back; this symbolically presented them to God. God's portion (v. 25) was consumed upon the altar. The breast and the thigh of the ram of the installation offering were given to Moses as to the officiating priest (vv. 26-28). Ordinarily, as here ordained, this portion would go to the priest.

29,30. The priestly garments were to be passed on from generation to generation. The installation of priests in succeeding generations was to take seven days, as would this initial consecration (v. 35).

31-34. The Sacrificial Meal. That the priests should partake of the very offering by which they had been atoned for and consecrated, reminds us of Christian communion in the Lamb by whose sacrifice we have been redeemed. 35-37. Through seven days, the consecration not only of the priests but of the altar of sacrifice was to be carried out.

j) The Morning and Evening Sacrifice. 29:38-42. Daily, morning and evening, on behalf of the whole congregation of Israel, the priests were to offer a lamb, with the accompanying meal and drink offerings. Thus day by day the dedication of all the people was renewed.

k) Promise of Blessing. 29:43-46. In response to such a continual dedication, Jehovah promised his constant presence and blessing. He would dwell in the midst of his people, and the appointed means of mediation – priest, tabernacle, and altar – would be sanctified to him.

5) Concluding Directions in Regard to the Tabernacle. 30:1-38.

a) The Altar of Incense. 30:1-10. This small altar, made of acacia wood plated with gold, is often called the "golden altar" (39:38; 40:5,26; Num 4:11) as contrasted with the brazen altar of sacrifice. It was one and a half feet square and three feet high. Upon the four upper corners were horns. A rim or molding ran around the altar, and beneath this, on the corners, were rings of gold for carrying. The altar was placed in the Holy Place, directly in front of the veil that separated it from the Holy of Holies and the ark. This very close connection between the altar and the ark is apparently referred to in Heb 9:4. (AV erroneously translates censer.)

Only incense was to be burned on this altar, and only that mixture prescribed by God (Ex 30:34-38). This altar, the symbol of man's closest approach to God, had also to be cleansed by the atoning blood year by year (v. 10). "The connection between the incense-offering and the burnt-offering is indicated by the rule that they were to be offered at the same time. Both offerings shadowed forth the devotion of Israel to its God, whilst the fact that they were offered every day exhibited this devotion as constant and uninterrupted. But the distinction between them consisted in this, that in the burnt or whole offering Israel consecrated and sanctified its whole life and action, in both body and soul to the Lord, whilst in the incense-offering its prayer was embodied as the exaltation of the spiritual man to God . . . the incense-offering presupposed reconciliation with God. . . . In this respect, the incense-offering was not only a spiritualizing and transfiguring of the burnt-offering, but a completion of that offering also" (KD).

b) The Ransom Money. 30:11-16. Each Israelite, twenty years old and above (v. 14) was required to pay a half shekel (about forty cents) to Jehovah as an atonement for your souls (v. 15). "It was no ordinary tribute . . . which Israel was to pay to Jehovah as its King, but an act demanded by the holiness of the theocratic covenant. As an expiation for souls, it pointed to the unholiness of Israel's nature, and reminded the people continually, that by nature it was alienated from God, and could only remain in covenant with the Lord and live in His kingdom on the ground of His grace, which covered its sin. It was not till this sinful nature had been sanctified by a perfect atonement, and servitude under the law had been glorified and fully transformed into that sonship to which Israel was called . . . that as children of the kingdom they had no longer to pay this atonement-money for their souls" (KD; cf. Mt 17:25,26). Every one that passeth among them (v. 13). Numbered in the census (RSV).

c) The Bronze Laver. 30:17-21. The laver was a basin for water, set between the brazen altar and the Tabernacle, in which the priest could wash both hands and feet before entering the Holy Place. No description of the size or shape of the laver is given. By this laver, the need for daily cleansing for those who served the Lord was not simply suggested but demanded (v. 20).

d) The Holy Anointing Oil. 30:22-33. A perfumed oil, mixed according to a specific recipe, was to be prepared for sacramental anointing. To mark the sacredness of that which was set apart unto the Lord, any other use of the oil was forbidden (v. 33). Pure myrrh (v. 23). "Flowing" or liquid balsam. Five hundred shekels. About sixteen pounds. Cinnamon. In those days a rare and costly spice. Sweet calamus. An aromatic cane, possibly the same as that which in classical times came from India. Cassia (v. 24). A species of cinnamon. In all, about forty-eight pounds of spices, dried and powdered, were mixed with a gallon and a half of olive oil and blended as by the perfumer (v. 25, RSV).

e) The Holy Incense. 30:34-38. The incense to be used for worship was also carefully prescribed, and its use for ordinary purposes was forbidden (vv. 37, 38). Thus the fragrance of the holy oil and incense, as it was used in the service of the Tabernacle, was to be unique and unmistakable, a reminder to the people, with every breath they had of it, that God was in their midst. Stacte (v. 34; lit., that which drips). The word stacte is simply a transliteration of the LXX and the Vulgate term. It was a very fragrant kind of myrrh. It has also been identified with the gum of the storax tree, "a beautiful, perfumed shrub, abundant on the lower hills of Palestine" (Cambridge Bible). Onycha. This is also a transliteration from the LXX and the Vulgate; it was the powdered shell of a certain mollusc, still gathered and used for incense and perfume. Galbanum. A pungent, bitter resin, used also medicinally; it gave sharpness to the other ingredients. Pure frankincense. Another gum resin, from trees found in ancient times, chiefly in south Arabia. Tempered together (v. 35). Literally, salted, either as a symbol of purification or to induce more rapid burning; possibly both reasons. The ingredients were to be mixed together and melted into a solid mass (v. 36). Then small portions would be broken off and beaten into a powder to throw upon the live coals of the altar.

6) The Builders of the Tabernacle. 31:1-11. Two men were named by the Lord to supervise the carrying out of the directions for the Tabernacle. They were men who had been endowed by God with the wisdom and talent necessary for this very thing – Bezaleel of Judah and Aholiab of Dan.

7) The Observance of the Sabbath. 31:12-17. A solemn and repetitive enforcement of the Sabbath ordinance, already enjoined in the Decalogue. This observance was to be the peculiar sign of Israel's relation to Jehovah, "By this shall all men know. . . ." It is to be noted that this outward observance, along with other outer signs, such as circumcision, the dietary laws, et al., are specifically translated in the NT into inward, spiritual evidences of discipleship (cf. Rom 2:28,29; Gal 4:9,10; Col 2:16,17). Surely be put to death (v. 14). An added sanction to enforce the command (cf. 20:8-11; 23:12).

18. At the conclusion of this long period of instruction, Moses was given the two tables of testimony, inscribed by God himself with the Decalogue.

C. The Covenant Broken and Restored. 32:1–34:35.

The people of Israel found it hard to walk even forty days by faith while their visible leader was gone. They demanded that Aaron produce a tangible sign of God's presence. It is uncertain whether it was the first commandment that was broken, a repudiation of Jehovah as God, or the second, an image demanded to represent Jehovah. In either case, it was a clear and deliberate transgression of the covenant that they had committed themselves to so boldly a few weeks before, a covenant sealed with blood.

1) Israel's Demand for a God. 32:1-6. "They were unwilling to continue longer without a God to go before them; but the faith upon which their desire was founded was a very perverted one, not only as clinging to what was apparent to the eye, but as corrupted by the impatience and unbelief of a natural heart which has not been pervaded by the power of the living God, and imagines itself forsaken by Him whenever His help is not visibly and outwardly at hand" (KD).

1. Gods. The word 'Elōhîm, though plural, is usually rendered God, although it can be and is translated gods just as well. In the present instance it is difficult to know how to translate, and the commentators are divided because, as mentioned above, we do not know just what was in the mind of the people. Delay. Literally, cause shame, i.e., by not returning.

4. These be thy gods. Or, This be thy God. Fashioned it. The ancient idols were usually made by plating gold or silver upon a wooden center or frame (Isa 40:19,20; 44:12-17; Jer 10:1-9). It is unlikely that Aaron cast a solid gold animal. Calf. A young bull. The Egyptian Apis and the Phoenician Baal were both pictured as bulls, a common representation among many peoples of that day for fertility and strength. Whatever the original impulse of the Israelites, the making of the image was the first step on a very slippery path, which led to the eventual identification of Jehovah with the gods of the nations (cf. Isa 40; Jer 10). 6. Rose up to play. Idolatry was accompanied by sensual, lewd dances which formed a part of the fertility cult.

2) The Sin of Israel Revealed to Moses by God. 32:7-14.

7. Thy people. By this word God seemed to disown Israel. The phrase may have been used (as KD suggests) because they were the transgressors of the covenant of which Moses was the mediator, and so they were particularly his.

10. I will make of thee. "God puts the fate of the nation into the hand of Moses, that he may remember his mediatorial office, and show himself worthy of his calling. This condescension of God, which placed the preservation or destruction of Israel in the hands of Moses, coupled with a promise which left the fullest freedom to his decision . . . constituted a great test for Moses, whether he would be willing to give up his own people, laden as they were with guilt, as the price of his own exaltation. And Moses stood the test. The preservation of Israel was dearer to him than the honor of becoming the head and founder of a new kingdom of God" (KD).

11. Moses pled for Israel in this prayer of intercession because they were thy people; because of the great deliverance God had already wrought for them; and lest the Egyptians should mock, misconceiving the reason for the destruction; and finally, he pled the promise made to the fathers.

14. The Lord repented. "God is thus said to 'repent' not because He really changes His purpose, but because He does so apparently, when, in consequence of a change in the character and conduct of men, He is obliged to make a corresponding change in the purpose toward them which He had previously announced, and adopt toward them a new attitude" (Cambridge Bible). Keil and Delitzsch mention "the deep spiritual idea of the repentance of God, as an anthropopathic description of the pain which is caused to the love of God by the destruction of His creatures."

3) Moses' Return to the Camp. 32: 15-24.

19. The actual sight of the blatant transgression affected Moses more strongly than the report of it could do. Overcome with indignation, he threw to the ground the tablets of stone, the commands of which had already been broken by the hearts and acts of Israel. 20. The wooden core of the image was burned, the metal pulverized, and the dust of charcoal and gold strewed upon the water. The people were humbled into drinking their own sin.

4) Punishment of the Idolaters. 32:25-29. The Levites may have been involved in the sin of the rest of the people, but if so, there was immediate shame, repentance, and willingness on their part to turn from their idolatry to Jehovah. The stubborn persistence of the others in their sin was made clear by their unwillingness to respond to the call, Who is on the Lord's side? (v. 26)

25. Naked. Literally, broken loose, i.e., loose from all restraint and from allegiance to God. 27. Sweep the camp from side to side (Moffatt). "As in every other decimation, the selection must be determined by lot or accidental choice, so here Moses left it to be determined by chance, upon whom the sword of the Levites would fall, knowing very well that even the so-called chance would be under the direction of God. . . . The unresisting attitude of the people generally may be explained partly from their reverence for Moses, whom God had so mightily and marvelously accredited as His servant in the sight of all the nation, and partly from the despondency and fear so natural to a guilty conscience" (KD).

29. Consecrate yourselves . . . even every man upon his son. Against his son (ASV; LXX; Vulg.). You have ordained yourselves . . . each one at the cost of his son (RSV). "In the cause of the Lord, every one may not spare even his nearest relative, but must deny either son or brother for the Lord's sake" (KD; cf. Deut 33:9; Mt 10:37,38).

5) Moses' Intercession for Israel's Sin. 32:30-35.

30. Peradventure I shall make an atonement. Atonement for sin is a far greater thing than even Moses understood. Only God's Lamb could take away the sin of the world.

32. Blot me . . . out of thy book. "To cut off from fellowship with the living God, or from the kingdom of those who live before God, and to deliver over to death. As a true mediator of his people, Moses was ready to stake his own life for the deliverance of the nation, and not to live before God himself, if Jehovah did not forgive the people their sin" (KD; cf. Rom 9:3). "It is not easy to estimate the measure of love in a Moses and a Paul; for the narrow boundary of our reasoning powers does not comprehend it, as the little child is unable to comprehend the courage of warlike heroes" (Bengel, Gnomon of the NT).

33. Whosoever hath sinned. Not even the sacrifice of Moses could take away sin. 34. "Moses had obtained the preservation of the people and their entrance into the promised land, under the protection of God, through his intercession, and averted from the nation the abrogation of the covenant; but the covenant relation which had existed before was not restored in its integrity. Though grace may modify and soften wrath, it cannot mar the justice of the holy God" (KD).

6) God's Modification of Justice. 33:1-3. The words, mine Angel shall go before thee (32:34), are explained here. The statement was a modification of God's judgment upon Israel, but it was still punishment. Jehovah himself, not a mere messenger, had been in their midst before; but now, I will not go up in the midst of thee (v. 3).

7) Repentance and Probation of Israel. 33:4-11. The people were beginning to feel the weight of God's judgment, and in sorrow they stripped themselves of all adornment.

7. Tabernacle of the congregation. Critics have gratuitously introduced here a confusion which is not at all in the narrative. This "Tent of Meeting" (RSV) is obviously not the Tabernacle which had been described to Moses but was not yet built. To assume that this tent is the Tabernacle is to judge that generations of Jews and Christians, including the original author or editors of Exodus, have been so incredibly stupid as not to recognize the contradiction. What is stated here is that Moses set up a tent outside the camp, a temporary sanctuary where he met with Jehovah, and to which those who sought the Lord might come. Thus he enforced and illustrated God's judgment that He would not dwell in the midst of Israel. Moses' departure for the tent was marked by all the people (v. 8), and the lesson was firmly driven home that their sins had separated them from their God. This very fact awakened a longing in the hearts of the people (v. 10) that made possible a full restoration.

8) The Reconciliation of Israel to Jehovah. 33:12-23. Moses pleaded that although God had declared that Moses had found grace in His sight, He had not given the assurance that was necessary to carry on this difficult task. Moses also reminded the Lord that, after all, Israel was God's nation. 12. I know thee by name. I "know thee individually, more intimately than the other Israelites, like a king who knows the names of only such of his servants as he is on intimate terms with" (Cambridge Bible). 13. Show me now thy way. Literally, make me to know. Show, in early Modern English meant not only to "let see" but also to "let know" (cf. Cambridge Bible). 14. God promised that he himself, not simply a representative (vv. 1,3), would go up with Israel.

18. Moses was emboldened by this gracious promise to ask an unparalleled favor. "When God talked with him face to face . . . he merely saw a 'similitude of Jehovah,' a form which rendered the invisible being of God visible to the human eye . . . . What Moses desired, therefore, was a sight of the glory or essential being of God, without any figure, and without a veil" (KD). This request was not made from idle curiosity but from "a desire to cross the chasm which had been made by the apostasy of the nation, that for the future he might have a firmer footing than the previous history had given him" (Baumgarten, quoted in KD). 23. Shalt see my back parts. "So to say, only the afterglow which He leaves behind Him, but which may still suggest faintly what the full brilliancy of His presence must be" (Cambridge Bible).

9) The Restored Covenant. 34:1-35.

1-3. God instructed Moses to ascend the mount as before, bringing with him stone tablets to replace those that had been broken.

4-9. The revelation of God's glory to Moses. "What Moses saw we are not told, but simply the words in which Jehovah proclaimed all the glory of His being. . . . 'This sermon on the name of the Lord,' as Luther calls it, disclosed to Moses the most hidden nature of Jehovah. . . . all the words which the language contained to express the idea of grace in its varied manifestations to the sinner, are crowded together here, to reveal the fact that in His inmost being God is love" (KD).

11-26. As Israel was restored to fellowship with Jehovah, two of the leading points of the covenant were stressed, the same two points that the people had ignored in their transgression: a warning against any covenant with the Canaanites; and a reminder of their responsibilities in the worship of Jehovah. Images . . . groves (v. 13). Pillars . . . and asherim (RSV; ASV). Asherah, according to Canaanite mythology, was a goddess, the consort of El. In the OT she appears as the consort of Tyrian Baal, introduced by the Phoenician Jezebel into Israel (I Kgs 18:19). Asherim, the plural form, were cult objects erected for the worship of Asherah, probably trees or poles. The pillars, or masseboth, represented the male deity.

For commentary on verses 18-26, see notes on 13:13,14; 23:12,15-19. Earing time (v. 21). Plowing time. The Sabbath was to be observed even at the time when it seemed most necessary to work.

27-35. Moses' return from the mountain. "By the renewed adoption of the nation, the covenant in chap. 24 was eo ipso restored; so that no fresh conclusion of this covenant was necessary, and the writing down of the fundamental conditions of the covenant was merely intended as a proof of its restoration" (KD). 29. The skin of his face shone. The Hebrew word for shone is a peculiar one; coming from the word for "horn," it means, literally, rayed. Jerome in the Vulgate translated the clause in the light of the basic meaning of the root word – "horned." Hence Moses has often been represented in art with horns coming from his head.

D. The Building of the Sanctuary. 35:1–39:43. These chapters relate in detail the carrying out of the instructions given to Moses (chs. 25–31) for the Tabernacle and its furniture and the garments of the priests. In general the instructions are repeated verbatim, with a few additions for explanation and some omissions or abridgments. There is some difference also in the order of contents

(cf. Cambridge Bible for a tabular comparison).

1) Materials for the Work Brought by the People. 35:1-35.

1-3. The command to observe the Sabbath was repeated for the people, with the striking addition of the judgment of death upon the Sabbath-breaker (31:15). The reminder at this time was given to restrain the people and make it clear that even in their enthusiasm to build the house of the Lord, they were to rest and wait upon Jehovah one day in seven. The spiritual danger of being an over-industrious "Martha" is always present.

4-9. The invitation was given to the willing-hearted to bring the materials (25:1-8). It should be noticed that there was no pressure put on the people, no constraint or necessity, but a simple announcement of the need was made.

10-19. The wise hearted were invited to take part in the work. It is significant that at the very heart of Mosaic legal enactments and activity, there is perfect freedom to will and to do the work of the Lord. Pins . . . cords (v. 18). Even to the least item, everything was dedicated to Jehovah. Tent cords are not mentioned in 27:19 but would have been taken for granted.

20-29. Presentation of the Offering. Every one (v. 21). Both men and women are mentioned; this was an individual expression of faith and worship. Bracelets . . . tablets (v. 22). Armlets . . . brooches (ASV, RSV). The precise type of jewelry meant is uncertain. Offering of gold. Probably the gold that was not in the form of jewelry. Verses 23,24 describe the particular offering of the men, while verses 25,26 tell of the special contribution of the women, whose particular work was the spinning of coarser materials. The more precious materials came from the rulers (vv. 27,28).

30-35. Moses introduced Bezaleel and Aholiab as God's chosen and specially endowed craftsmen to supervise the work (31:2-5). Their own skills they were to pass on by instructing the others.

2) The Liberality of the People. 36:1-7. The giving exceeded the need. The materials were delivered to Bezaleel and Aholiab, or their assistants, until the amount was so great that the people had to be restrained from further giving.

3) The Execution of the Work. 36:8–38:20. The record of the construction of the Tabernacle follows the account of the instructions almost verbally. This is not useless repetition, but an emphasis upon the fact of Israel's careful adherence to God's word. Without this obedience, no amount of sacrifice and labor would have been acceptable.

8-19. The curtains and coverings of the Tabernacle. Cf. 26:1-14. 20-34. The framework. Cf. 26:15-30. 35-38. The veil and screen. Cf. 26:31-37. 38. Chapiters . . . fillets. Capitals for the pillars, and a band around the pillars just below the capitals (not mentioned in ch. 26). 37:1-9. The ark of the covenant. Cf. 25:10-20. 10-16. The table of shewbread. Cf. 25:23-29. 17-24. The candlestick. Cf. 25:31-39. 25-28. The altar of incense. Cf. 30:1-5. 29. The anointing oil and incense, a summary statement of 30:22-38. 38:1-7. The altar of burnt offering. Cf. 27:1-8.

38:8. The brazen laver. Cf. 30:18-21. The bronze for the laver was provided by the polished metal mirrors of the women. That which once reflected their natural faces was now to be used to remind men of their need of spiritual cleansing that they might reflect the glory of God. Women . . . which assembled. Literally, serving women which served, possibly for cleaning, or as a choir.

9-20. The court of the tabernacle. Cf. 27:9-19.

4) An Estimate of the Amount of Metal Used. 38:21-31.

The gold amounted to 29 talents, 730 shekels, or about 40,940 ounces troy weight. The silver mentioned was only the atonement money (30:13,14), which amounted to 100 talents, 1,775 shekels, or about 140,828 ounces troy. No account is made of the voluntary gifts of silver. Attempts to value the precious metals used in terms of modern currency do not mean much, as we have no way of knowing the comparable value in that day. It is obvious that the expenditure upon this little sanctuary was enormous, and a monument to the dedication of the people to their God. It is significant that the Tabernacle rested upon, and its curtains were hung upon the silver that was the representative contribution of every man in the congregation of Israel. The Tabernacle stood thus upon the dedication of God's redeemed people. 29-31. The bronze used weighed about three tons.

5) The Clothing of the Priests. 39:1-31. 2-7. The ephod. Cf. 28:6-12. 8-21. The breastplate. Cf. 28:15-27. 22-26. The robe of the ephod. Cf. 28:31-35. 27-29. Tunics and other vestments. Cf. 28:39,40,42. 30,31. The headdress of the high priest. Cf. 28:36-38.

6) The Finished Work Presented to Moses. 39:32-43. As the writer concludes his account of the work, he stresses again, as he has done repeatedly, after the description of each separate piece, that all was done as the Lord had commanded Moses.

E. The Erection and Consecration of the Tabernacle. 40:1-38.

1-6. Moses was instructed by Jehovah to set up the Tabernacle and to prepare both the Tabernacle and the priests for God's service. The actual erection is simply stated, the details having already been given, but the recurrent phrase, as the Lord commanded Moses, again reminds us of how exactly Israel obeyed the words of the Lord.

17-33. The Tabernacle was set up for use on the first day of the first month (New Year's Day) of the second year of the exodus from Egypt.

34-38. The fulfillment of God's commands culminated in the sanctifying by God's visible presence of all that had been dedicated unto him. For Israel and for all ages to come, these chapters clearly teach the lesson that the way of blessing is the way of obedience and faith.

LEVITICUS

INTRODUCTION

Title. The book of Leviticus gets its name from the Vulgate Leviticus, derived from Levitikon, "pertaining to the Levites," the title it bears in the LXX. To the Jews it was known by its first word, the Hebrew wayyiqrā', "And he called," after the custom of the Jews of naming many Old Testament books by their first word or words. The use of "And" at the beginning of this book does not mean that it forms an appendage to some other segment of Scripture. The thought of Exodus is continued, but the book is a unit and stands by itself. In this regard, note that several other Old Testament books begin with "And" in the Hebrew text, viz., Exodus, Numbers, Joshua, Judges, Ruth, et al.

Leviticus presents God's plan for teaching his chosen people how to approach him in a holy manner. Particular emphasis is given to the priestly functions in making this approach to God reverent and holy. Thus the book develops the priestly or "Levitical" office, reference to which we find in the New Testament in Heb 7:11, where the term "the Levitical priesthood" is found.

Date and Authorship. "And they set the priests in their divisions, and the Levites in their courses, for the service of God, which is at Jerusalem; as it is written in the book of Moses" (Ezr 6:18).

Ezra the scribe refers to the scroll of Leviticus in describing the source used in his day to determine proper procedure in dedicating the rebuilt Temple. The book of Leviticus itself continually stresses the role of Moses in recording the regulations given him by God for proper worship in the rites of the Tabernacle. The fact that there would have had to be regulations before there could have been orderly worship by the priests and people demands a central controlling force and a fixed time. We can best understand this as the role of Moses at the establishment of tabernacle worship. The nations of Moses' day had had elaborate, fixed rites of worship long before he came on the scene. There is no need to believe that this fixing of rites in worship of Jehovah was a gradual one of evolution or that the record of Leviticus is a late invention of Ezra's day.

Background Material. The very simplicity of the form of Leviticus has worried its critics. Some see in its second section (chs. 17–27), which describes man's basis for fellowship with God, the later addition of a "Holiness Code." However, shift of emphasis alone may account for the differences between the two main divisions of the book.

One may well say that Leviticus was given us through Moses to anticipate the "eternal sacrifice" – Jesus Christ – of the New Covenant. The book of Hebrews presents this picture of the New Covenant, and Leviticus furnishes the background for the more important aspects of "a priest after the order of Melchizedek." Actually, a study of Leviticus has lasting value only as it points to Jesus Christ – our High Priest.

COMMENTARY

I. How One Comes to God. 1:1–16:34.

A. The Laws of Sacrifice. 1:1–7:38.

1) The General Rules. 1:1–6:7.

a) Introduction. 1:1,2.

1. The Lord called unto Moses. The setting is explained in Exodus 40. God speaks to Moses from the tabernacle, 'ōhel mo'ēd, "tent of meeting," i.e., where God meets his people. This was not a meeting place in the sense of the later synagogue, for only priests and Levites were allowed to draw near to it.

2. Offering, Hebrew qōrbān, comes from the root qrb, "draw near." It is that with which one draws near to God. A man brought something to prepare him to enter the presence of God. What these offerings were is given in chapters 1 through 7.

b) Burnt Offerings. 1:3-17.

3. If his offering be a burnt sacrifice. The holocaust or burnt offering ('ōlâ) could consist of a large, male animal, bāqār (v. 3), or a small animal, sō'n (v. 10). The main thought here is that neither the offerer (cf. chs. 13; 14) nor the offering could be blemished or defiled. The offering was brought to achieve acceptance by God of both offering and offerer. 4. He shall put his hand. In the Hebrew (sāmak yādô) this implies pressing with vigor upon the animal's head. We do not know all the ritual involved, but the intent was probably to show the physical and mental energy involved in the transfer, whatever it implied. The ultimate purpose was atonement or covering (kappēr) of sin. 6. He shall flay. After the victim was bled, the offerer skinned it and divided it at its joints. In later practice (II Chr 29; 35) priests and Levites did the flaying of the carcass.

10. His offering . . . of the flocks. Not only could a large animal be used but also a small one, i.e., a sheep or goat. The same ritual as the above was observed by the offerer and the priests. The added remark is made here that the animal was to be killed on the northern side of the altar.

14. The smallness of the usual fowl necessitated some changes in the ritual used for larger animals. The ritual was handled solely by the priest. 17. A sweet savour. It smelled good to God; i.e., it pleased him.

c) Meal Offerings. 2:1-16.

1. Meat offering. The word rendered meat by the AV is better translated meal, though the Hebrew minḥâ used here means "a gift or present," and sometimes, "tribute." When used in relation to a sacrifice, it may denote either an animal or a grain offering (as in the case of Abel and Cain, Gen 4). It commonly signifies an offering of grain (in the ear), fine flour, or baked goods. The offering of fine flour, sōlet, was mixed with oil, frankincense, and salt. 3. The remnant. After the priests had burned the fine flour on the altar, the remnant was theirs. It was burned as a memorial, 'azkārâ – to put God in remembrance (cf. Acts 10:4).

4-10. An oblation. This word is used in the AV to avoid redundance in the usage of "offering." It is the Hebrew qorbān (cf. 1:2). This offering could be baked in an oven, in a baking pan or flat plate (maḥâbat, v. 5), or in a pot (marḥeshet, v. 7). What was left after the ceremony was the priests' for food.

11. No meat offering . . . with leaven. The meal was left unleavened. Nor was honey allowed. Both leaven and honey are subject to fermentation. Leaven as a sign of corruption was used in offerings on heathen altars. Only offerings given to the priests (7:13,14) could contain leaven.

12. First fruits. The rē'shît, "first" (fruits), here contrasts with the bikkûrîm of verse 14. Both mean the same. The former were not to be offered on the altar, while those mentioned in verse 14 were burned on the altar. 13. Every oblation . . . season with salt. Salt was considered a precious commodity in the ancient Near East. It was thought of as a necessary adjunct to the food offered to God as well as to that used by man. 14. Green ears of corn . . . corn beaten. Grain both in the ear and ground (gereś karmel) was parched and offered as a memorial, with the remainder going to the priests.

d) Peace Offerings. 3:1-17.

1. Sacrifice of peace offering. Hebrew zebaḥ shelāmîm might well be translated, "the sacrifice of unity or completeness." Completeness connotes a close relationship or fellowship between God and man. In ritual this offering was much the same as the burnt offering (ch. 1) except that, while in the former the whole offering was burnt, in the peace offering the worshiper joined the priest in the sacrificial meal of that which remained. In other offerings – meal, sin, and trespass – only the priest partook of this sacrificial meal (cf. 7:11-38). 4. Caul above the liver. Hebrew yōteret, probably "the finger of the liver" (lobus caudatus).

6. Of the flock; male or female. A male or female lamb without blemish was the usual sacrifice from the flock, as differentiated from the "herd" (v. 1).

12. If . . . a goat. A goat might also be sacrificed. No fat or blood was to be eaten. No mention is made of an offering of fowls, due, no doubt, to the fact that there would be little left for a sacrificial meal. The poor would have to share the sacrifices from the flock brought by others.

e) Sin Offerings. 4:1–5:13.

2. If a soul sin . . . through ignorance. The Hebrew word ḥaṭṭā't may mean either "sin" or "sin offering." This fact may clarify the statement of Paul concerning Christ in II Cor 5:21 a: "He hath made him to be sin (i.e., a sin offering) for us . . ." The sin offering here applies only to those who sin (bish'gāgâ) "through ignorance," unintentionally. For sin done knowingly (or defiantly), no sacrifice could atone (Num 15:30,31). In this light, consider the lament of the Psalmist (Ps 51) and the cry of the prophets against the sins of the people (e.g., Mic 6:6-8). How much more Christ, our Sin Offering, does for us! (Heb 7:26,27)

3-7. If the priest . . . sin. The anointed or high priest represents the community, and therefore his sin brings guilt on the community. A young bullock without blemish is the offering. The ceremony was much like that of the burnt offering except that the blood was used to sprinkle before the veil of the sanctuary and on the horns of the altar (cf. vv. 14-18).

8-12. And he shall take off . . . all the fat. Note that after the burning of the fat and certain organs on the altar, the carcass was taken to a clean place outside the camp to be burned. Cf. Heb 13:10-13.

13. And if the whole congregation . . . sin. The sin of the congregation of Israel was covered in a ritual much like that used for the sin of the high priest. The ceremony may have varied from the description here, as the account of the ceremony in Num 15:22-26 seems to indicate.

22. When a ruler hath sinned. The ruler, as one anointed of God, is responsible for a godly walk before his people. The sin offering prescribed for the ruler was a male goat. The blood was not brought into the tent of meeting, as in the cases cited above, but put on the horns of the altar of burnt offering and poured out at the base of the altar.

27. And if any one of the common people sin. The private citizen also was accountable to God. He could not hide in the group and feign innocence. He was to bring a female goat or a lamb. The same ritual was used as for the ruler.

5:1-5. Three instances are now given of the bringing of the sin offering. 1. If a soul sin, and hear . . . if he do not utter it. The first instance is that of a witness who has refused to testify. This is a man who has seen a crime committed or heard something that might help in the solution of a crime. He must pay the penalty for silence if he hides his knowledge. Does not this remind one of the punishment to the Christian for his lack of witness? 2. If a soul touch any unclean thing. The second instance given is accidental ceremonial defilement. One who accidentally touches an unclean wild or domesticated animal or a creeping thing is liable. The uncleanness of man is also not to be touched. This is further amplified in chapters 12–15. 4. If a soul swear. The third instance is the case of a man's making a rash oath or vow on any occasion. While the man may not at the moment realize that he has done wrong, he is liable when that truth dawns upon him.

6-13. Various offerings were allowed for expiation. There may be some question as to whether the sin offering and guilt offering (5:14,15) do not overlap. There are, however, some differences which the careful reader will note. A female sheep or goat was to be offered for the sins mentioned in 5:1-4. For those unable to afford an animal, two doves or young pigeons (v. 7) were prescribed. For the very poor a measure of fine flour (v. 11) sufficed.

f) Trespass Offerings. 5:14–6:7.

15. If a soul commit a trespass. The sin offering (ch. 4) stressed the sin of which one became conscious. The trespass or guilt offering emphasized that situation in which one felt guilt but was unable to specify it exactly. Here in the trespass offering ('āshām) if part of what was due the Lord was withheld – such as a tithe, a double tithe must be paid. Also a ram worth at least two shekels was offered. The act of sin is referred to in the Hebrew word ma'cal, "deal with deceit."

17. If a soul sin . . . though he wist it not. If one did unwittingly what God had commanded His people not to do, he brought a ram as a trespass offering (as above). But he made no restitution, since the exact sin was unknown. This voluntary offering helped relieve troubled minds and hearts.

6:1-7. If a soul sin, and commit a trespass. This section forms a part of chapter 5 in the Hebrew text. The sin in this case is damage to another's property by fraud or violence. This is a case in which the sin becomes known through confession. The legal aspects of such sins are discussed in Ex 22:7,8.

2) More Specific Rules about These Offerings. 6:8–7:38.

Discussion of the offerings in the prior section was from the viewpoint of the worshiper as he approached the altar with his sacrifice. The point of view now shifts to the priest, as the Law instructs Aaron and his sons in the proper exercise of their office as it had to do with the ritual of sacrifice.

8-13. Directions for the Presentation of the Burnt Offering. The offering of two lambs, one at sunrise and the other at sunset (Ex 29; Num 28), was commanded – for all the people – plus the wearing of proper garments by the priests in fulfilling their services.

14-18. Directions for the Presentation of the Meat (Meal) Offering. This discussion of the meal offerings is a reiteration of 2:2 ff. The specifications are given for the priests' food from the meal remaining after sacrifice. The court of the tent of meeting is the place of eating.

19,20. A meat offering perpetual. The provision for a perpetual meal offering was made, in which Aaron inaugurated a meal to be continued by his successors. At the time of the second Temple, this offering was made daily. It was wholly burned. No portion was eaten.

24,25. The law of the sin offering. The remainder of this chapter is a discussion of the sin offering as given previously from 4:1 to 5:13.

7:1. The law of the trespass offering. The first ten verses of chapter 7 review the laws relating to the trespass offering given from 5:14 to 6:7. Here, however, more details are given. 2. The place where they kill the burnt offering. The trespass and sin offerings were to be slain in the same place as the burnt offering (cf. 6:25; 1:11), that is, on the north side of the altar. 6. It shall be eaten in the holy place. The ritual of the eating of the offering likewise follows that of the sin offering (cf. 6:26,29).

8. The priest shall have . . . the skin. The skin ('ôr) of the burnt offering was retained by the officiating priest. On the basis of the statement in verse 7, the Mishna extended this privilege to the priests offering both the sin and trespass offerings. 9. And all the meat offering. The priests were to receive the meal offerings.

11-36. Directions for the Presentation of the Peace Offering. The peace offering could be made either as an act of thanksgiving, tôdâ, or as a result of a vow, neder, or as a freewill or voluntary offering, n'dābâ.

12. For a thanksgiving. The tôdâ, thank offering, was supplemented by three types of cakes prepared with oil. One cake of each type was a heave offering, t'rûmâ, lifted toward heaven in sight of the congregation and then presented to the officiating priest. 15. The tôdâ must all be eaten on the day of sacrifice, but it was permissible to allow a portion of the neder and n'dābâ to remain and be eaten on the second day. Any portion then remaining was to be burnt.

19. The flesh that toucheth any unclean thing. The sacrificial meat could neither touch anything unclean nor be eaten by an unclean person. That which made an individual unclean is discussed in the laws of purity, chapters 11–15. 22,23. Eat no manner of fat. Fat and blood were prohibited as items of food. The regulation regarding fat pertained only to the fat portions of sacrificial animals, which were reserved as an offering to God. The restriction was extended to the same portions of fat on animals rendered unsuitable for sacrifice by having died a natural death or having been slain by beasts. Blood of animals and fowls could not be eaten in any form.

28,29. He that offereth . . . shall bring his oblation. The individual making the offering was to bring it to the altar. That portion which served as the wave offering, t'nûpâ, was lifted and moved toward the altar and then moved away from the altar and given to the priests. The following verses (30-34) tell of those elements of the sacrifice of the peace offering which were to be set aside for the priests.

37. The law of the burnt offering. The last two verses of the chapter conclude the section on the Laws of Sacrifice.

B. The Testimony of History. 8:1–10:20.

1) Inauguration of the Offerings. 8:1-36.

2. Take Aaron and his sons. The background of this material is to be found in Exodus 28; 29, where the procedure for clothing and anointing the priests is given, followed by the sacrifice to be made at the time of their consecration. In Lev 8:1-4 we are told that Moses was to assemble all the required materials, along with the priests, at the door of the tent of meeting in the presence of the people.

8,9. The Urim and the Thummim. The nature of the Urim and the Thummim is not known, nor is their exact significance understood, though indications are that they may have been an early means of determining the will of the Lord (cf. I Sam 28:6; Ezr 2:63; Neh 7:65; and the LXX of I Sam 14:41.

10. The anointing oil. The investiture of the priests with the prescribed garments was followed by the anointing with the holy oil (vv. 10-13,30). The anointing oil (shemen hammishḥâ) was symbolic of an enduement with the Spirit of God and the resulting spiritual power (cf. I Sam 16:13; Isa 61:1; Acts 10:38). It likewise set apart the anointed persons and objects, consecrating them for the use of God's work.

14. The bullock for the sin offering. The bull of the sin offering was sacrificed in accordance with Ex 29:10-14. 15. Poured the blood at the bottom of the altar. The reconciliation (kapēr) or atonement (RSV) for the altar was necessary to remove from it the defilement of the priests who made sacrifices upon it. 18. And he brought the ram. The ram of the burnt offering was sacrificed in accordance with Ex 29:15-18 and Lev 1:3-9, thus implying complete dedication of the priests to the service of the Lord.

22. Brought the other ram. The ram of consecration or "fillings" (millū'îm) was sacrificed as in the case of the peace offering, except for the use of the blood, as described in 8:23,24. In this offering, the blood of the ram was placed on certain extremities: the ear hearkening to the Lord's words, the hand performing the Lord's tasks, and the foot hastening on the Lord's errands. 27. He put all upon Aaron's hands. The "fillings" (millū'îm) took place when the elements of the sacrifice were placed in the hands of the participants. The term used for consecration or appointing of the priest was to "fill the hand" (Jud 17:5,12).

31. Aaron and his sons shall eat it. Certain portions of the flesh and bread were to be eaten by the priests. Thus nourishment was provided for them as they observed seven consecutive days wherein the consecration procedure was repeated without their leaving the tent of meeting.

2) When First Offered. 9:1-24.

2. Take thee a young calf. Although Aaron had been consecrated for seven days, during which time the sin offering and the burnt offering had been made repeatedly, more sacrifices were needed. Perfection had not been attained (Heb 10:1-4). Aaron had to make additional sacrifices for himself and, in addition, sacrifices for the people.

22. Aaron lifted up his hand. Before coming down from the ledge which surrounded the altar of sacrifice, Aaron blessed the people with upraised hands. 23. Moses and Aaron went into the tabernacle. The entrance of Moses and Aaron into the tent of meeting may have been for the purpose of instructing the new high priest in his duties. Coming out of the tent, the mediator of the law of God and the high priest united in a joint blessing of the people. 24. There came a fire out from before the Lord. The glory of the Lord appeared as a miraculous fire (cf. Ex 3:2-4; 13:21; 19:18, et al.) which joined the one already burning on the altar and completed the consuming of the sacrifice. The people responded to the divine manifestation by prostrating themselves in wonder and humility.

3) The Misuse of Offerings (Nadab and Abihu). 10:1-20.

1. And Nadab and Abihu . . . offered strange fire. The strange fire ('ēsh zārâ) is not explained. The elements used or the procedure followed or both may have been contrary to that prescribed. Whatever their motive and abuse, the act in God's sight was worthy of punishment by death. 3. I will be sanctified. Improper offering of sacrifice on the part of the priest would detract from the glory of God, and this glory God was determined to maintain.

4. And Moses called. Cf. Ex 6:18,22, 23 for the designated members of Aaron's family. 6. Uncover not your heads is better read: Let not the hair of your heads hang loose. The usual expressions of mourning were denied the high priest and his two remaining sons, in this case lest dissatisfaction with God's judgment be indicated. Rather, they were to remain secluded in the sanctuary while others performed the burials and expressed grief.

9. Do not drink wine nor strong drink. Those consecrated to God's service were to perform their duties with a clear mind, unclouded by alcohol. The presence of this verse here does not necessarily imply, as some believe, that Nadab and Abihu sinned by performing their duties while drunk.

12. Take the meat offering. Moses reviewed with Aaron and his sons the laws concerning the eating of the sacrifices.

16. Behold, it was burnt. The portion of the sin offering which should have been eaten by the priests was burned instead. Aaron's explanation seems to imply that the judgment imposed upon two of his sons indicated that he and his other two sons were themselves not sufficiently free of sin to deserve to eat the designated portion of the sin offering. Moses was satisfied with the explanation.

C. The Laws of Purity. 11:1–15:33.

The means of maintaining and restoring ceremonial cleanness are given in the following chapters. The instructions concern the eating of the flesh of animals, contact with the dead (both human beings and animals), childbirth, and uncleanness of the person, garments, furniture, and houses. Although one important result of all these regulations may have been the preservation of health, this is not the same as stating that preservation of health was the motivation. The laws cannot thus be rationalized. In all ancient nations and religions there is to be found a usually distinct contrast between the cleanness or uncleanness of certain creatures, substances, and situations. There was a propriety connected with some and an impropriety connected with others. No reason for such a designation is assigned and none was apparently needed. Not many of the restrictions apply today, but they can be read with interest and can be recognized as regulations which both helped to maintain Israel's physical health and, at the same time, set her apart as a nation distinct from the idolatrous nations about her.

1) What Might Be Eaten or Touched. 11:1-47.

2. These are the beasts which ye shall eat. Cf. Deut 14:3-8. Although the passage in Deuteronomy lists clean (ṭāhôr) as well as unclean (tāmē') animals, the correspondent Leviticus passage lists only the unclean. The criteria of cleanness, however, are given in both passages: the animal must possess hooves completely severed, and it must also be a ruminant. 5. The coney (shāpān) is a rock rabbit or rock badger, a very timid animal, living in natural caves and rock clefts. Neither the coney nor the hare (v. 6) is actually a ruminant, but the constant movement of the jaws leaves that impression. 8. Of their flesh shall ye not eat. The unclean animal was not to be eaten, nor was its dead body to be touched (v. 39 includes clean animals that had died of natural causes).

9. These shall ye eat of all . . . in the waters. Cf. Deut 14:9,10. The restrictions in the following verses on creatures living in the water apparently ruled out the eating of all shellfish and eels.

13. These . . . ye shall have in abomination among the fowls. Cf. Deut 14: 11-18. Certain fowls are prohibited by name but without naming the factor which disqualified them. Not every fowl mentioned can be identified with certainty. 20. Cf. Deut 14:19,20. All fowls that creep, going upon all four is better rendered: All winged insects that go upon all fours (RSV), even though insects actually go upon six legs. 21. These may ye eat of every flying creeping thing. The cricket (beetle), locust, and grasshopper are here permitted. These are still eaten in many parts of the world today.

24. Whosoever toucheth the carcase of them. Contact with the carcasses of forbidden animals, aquatic creatures, and winged creatures brought defilement until the close of that day, and necessitated the washing of the garments.

29. These also shall be unclean. Additional unclean animals of a smaller size are enumerated. 32. It shall be unclean until the even. Any object became unclean when it came into contact with the unclean creatures listed, and it had to be washed to be made usable again. 33. And every earthen vessel. If the object was of pottery, however, washing was insufficient. It was to be destroyed. 36. A fountain . . . shall be clean. The well or spring had a continual supply of fresh water which tended to purify itself. 39. Cf. note on verse 8.

44. I am the Lord your God. The motivation for the observance of the restrictions listed above was to be the honoring of God, who had been seen by Israel in mighty acts in their behalf. They were to be a peculiar people, keeping a covenant that would constantly remind them of their relationship to God. Through Jesus Christ it has now been fully revealed that the spirit of an individual determines his obedience (Mt 15:11).

2) Childbirth. 12:1-8.

2. If a woman have conceived. Throughout the chapter it is the woman who is considered unclean, not the new-born child. 3. In the eighth day . . . shall be circumcised. Cf. instructions in Gen 17:12. This rite was an external sign indicating that a covenant relationship had been established between the individual and the Lord, with all the privileges and responsibilities entailed by such relationship. 4. Shall touch no hallowed thing. The state of her uncleanness prevented contact with all holy items and prohibited her presence in the house of worship during the designated period. 5. But if . . . a maid child. The period of uncleanness was twice as long in the case of the birth of a female. This may be attributed to an ancient belief that the period of recovery for the mother was longer in the case of a female child than in the case of a male.

8. If . . . not able to bring a lamb. Mary, Jesus' mother, availed herself of the privilege granted in the case of one of limited means (Lk 2:24).

3) Leprosy. 13:1–14:57.

The condition designated as leprosy (ṣāra'at) in this chapter and the next does not in every case refer to the disease known by this name at the present time. On the other hand, true leprosy is most certainly included in the physical irregularities described. With the limitations on diagnosis in the time of Moses, the recorded regulations dealt as effectively as possible with the problems raised by true leprosy and analogous conditions. Isolation and close observation of suspected victims of the disease are no less favored today than they were during that period.

Leviticus 13 deals with the identification of leprosy and analogous conditions in man and his garments. Chapter 14 deals with the purification procedures to be followed when ṣāra'at was observed on man and upon the walls of his house.

13:2. He shall be brought unto Aaron the priest. Aaron or one of his sons was designated to examine the individual suspected of being leprous. If there was a swelling, eruption, or light spot on the skin, it was to be designated leprosy if the hair growing on the mark had become white and if the condition appeared to be deep-seated. If the hair had not changed color and the condition seemed to be superficial, a quarantine for observation purposes was to be imposed. If the condition had not spread in the allotted time, the individual was considered clean; if, however, there was a spreading of the eruption, the condition was pronounced leprosy by the priest.

11. It is an old leprosy. If the priest was able to determine from the appearance of the man that he was suffering from an old case of leprosy, he could be pronounced unclean without quarantine and additional observation.

12. If . . . the leprosy cover all the skin. If the skin disease had spread over the entire body, the man was to be considered clean until raw flesh appeared. He then was to be pronounced unclean. If the raw flesh cleared up, he might be pronounced clean once more. It is not known whether or not this is a reference to true leprosy. 18. The flesh also, in which, . . . was a boil. A leprous condition might appear at the site of a recently healed boil. If there was doubt as to the certainty of the diagnosis, quarantine and observation were employed. 24. A hot burning. The site of a burn might also be the point at which leprosy would occur. The priest was to take proper steps to make the correct diagnosis. 29. A plague upon the head or the beard. If an itch or mange (neteq) appeared on the head or in the beard, it was observed by the priest. If after a certain period it did not spread and if it contained no yellow hair, the individual was pronounced clean. A washing was then employed. 35. If the scall spread much. If, after the washing, the itch appeared to have spread, the man was to be pronounced unclean whether yellow hair was present or not.

38. White bright spots. If a condition of the skin (bōhaq) should appear in which the inflammation consisted of dull white spots, no uncleanness would be involved. 40. Whose hair is fallen. Loss of hair did not of itself imply uncleanness. If, however, the condition was accompanied by an inflamed swelling, one was to be pronounced leprous. 45. The leper in whom the plague is. The plight of the leper was pitiable. He lived in complete exile outside the city (Num 5:2-4), being regarded as one dead (Num 12: 10-12). Since not all skin diseases which brought on such exile were actually leprosy, however, there were apparently those who recovered, were declared clean, and were allowed to return to their places in society.

47. The garment . . . that the . . . leprosy is in. Apparently the reference here is either to a type of mildew or to garments which had been worn by a leper. The former is the more likely. 49. If the plague be greenish or reddish. If the spots were green or red, the garments were to be put aside for seven days. If the growth had then spread, the material on which it was growing was to be destroyed by burning, because it was a "fretting" growth, i.e., malignant. 54. He shall shut it up seven days more. If the growth had not spread during the first seven-day period of observation, the garments were to be washed and set aside for seven additional days. 55. Thou shalt burn it in the fire. If washing did not clear up the growth, the garments were to be burned. To fret inward refers to the tendency of the mildew or mold to eat into the leather or fabric, whether it went all the way through or not. 56. He shall rend it out of the garment. If the spot had grown fainter, the priest was to remove that section of contaminated material from the remainder of the article. 57. Burn that wherein the plague is with fire. If the removal of the spot did not prevent the spread of the growth, the entire contaminated garment was to be burned. 58. It shall be washed the second time. If washing removed the growth, the item was to be rewashed and then considered clean.

14:1-57. Purification of Lepers and Leprous Houses. The first portion of the chapter (vv. 1-32) is devoted to the purification of the leper. The second portion (vv. 33-57) gives the procedure to be followed in the case of leprosy in houses.

2. He shall be brought unto the priest. When the leper was apparently healed and sought restoration in society, he was to be taken to the priest, who was to meet him outside the city area.

4. Two birds alive. For other references to these birds (ṣippŏrîm), see Gen 15:10, where it is recorded that Abraham used such birds in sacrifice, and Ex 2:21, where Moses' wife is called Zipporah (ṣippōrâ). The species of birds is not designated. The scarlet (shᵉnî tô laʿat), literally, "worm-crimson," was likely a small piece of scarlet cloth. 5. The priest shall command that one of the birds be killed. The blood of the slain bird was to be mixed with water in the earthen vessel. 6. He shall take it . . . and the scarlet. The scarlet cloth may possibly have been used to tie the cedar wood and hyssop together to be dipped into the blood-water mixture. 7. Shall let the living bird loose. It may be that as the one bird gave its life as a symbol of and in the place of the leper, the other bird symbolized the man's newfound freedom to return to his place among his people and to the house of worship, from which places he had been excluded. In verse 53 the same ritual is called a "ransom" or "atonement" (kipper).

8. And he that is to be cleansed. The man was not yet allowed to enter the community. After thoroughly washing himself and his garments and removing his hair, he was to remain outside seven additional days. After this time the washing and shaving were to be repeated. 10. And on the eighth day. On the eighth day he was to bring the elements necessary for a trespass offering, a sin offering, a burnt offering, and a meal offering. The quantity of flour was about three-tenths of a bushel. The log contained about a pint of oil.

11. And the priest. The trespass offering was to be made by the priest for the man in the prescribed manner. 15. The log of oil. The oil, after being sprinkled before the altar to consecrate it to the Lord and sanctify it for further use, was to be used in the same manner as the blood in verse 14. 18. The remnant of the oil. The remaining oil was to be used for anointing the man's head. 19. The priest shall offer. The sin offering, burnt offering, and meal offering were all three then made. 21-32. Special provision for the poor. These verses explain how provision was made for those who were unable to provide all the elements designated in 14:10. A reduction was allowed in the cases of the sin offering, burnt offering, and meal offering; but the trespass offering remained the same, viz., one young ram. Verses 23-32 simply repeat the procedure prescribed in verses 11-20 to be observed in the offering of the sacrifices designed to restore the man to a state of cleanness.

34. The plague of leprosy in a house. The presence of a growth on the walls inside a home necessitated examination by a priest. It may have been a species of mold or some form of rot, but it indicated specific action on the part of God and could neither be ignored nor treated without priestly supervision and instruction. Sanitary considerations may have been involved, but the occurrence was not without religious significance as well.

36. Empty the house. Apparently those who lived in the house and the furnishings might possibly be contaminated by that which grew on the walls. Consequently the house was to be vacated prior to the priestly inspection.

37,38. He shall look on the plague. Under certain conditions the house was to be sealed for seven days to observe if the growth spread. If so, the contaminated portions of the walls were to be removed and those sections completely refinished. 43. If the plague come again. If, however, the growth continued to spread on the walls, more stringent action was to be taken. The entire structure was to be demolished and all the materials disposed of.

46. He that goeth into the house. During the period of observations any person entering the house was to be considered unclean, and proper cleansing measures had to be employed.

48. If the priest shall come in. If after the refinishing of diseased sections the growth did not spread, the house could be considered clean. 49. And he shall take to cleanse the house. The same sacrificial elements were to be used and the same procedure to be followed in cleansing the house as in the cleansing of the healed leper (vv. 4-7).

4) Sexual Purity. 15:1-33.

2. A running issue (zāb), or "discharge," from the verb zûb, "to flow." The discharge out of his flesh (mibbᵉśārô) is taken to mean from the organs of generation, although the exact nature of the disease discussed is not known. 3. This shall be his uncleanness. Uncleanness existed whether the discharge was present continually or the condition developed an obstruction that temporarily caused a cessation of the discharge.

4. Every thing . . . shall be unclean. Anyone touching the unclean man, the discharge, or anything upon which he had sat or lain while unclean, had to wash himself and his clothing and be considered unclean until the evening. 11. And whomsoever he toucheth. If the unclean man touched some person without having washed his hands first, uncleanness would be transferred to the person touched.

13. He shall number to himself seven days. At the conclusion of the disease and after an additional seven days, the man was to wash himself and his clothing and be clean again. 14. And on the eighth day. Following this procedure, he was to bring two birds to the priest to be offered as a sin offering and a burnt offering. 16. He shall wash all his flesh in water. Whereas verses 2-15 refer to a diseased condition, verses 16-18 refer to natural secretion. Though the man would be unclean for a time, he did not have to make a sacrifice. The uncleanness prevented participation in the religious services (cf. v. 31).

19. If a woman have an issue. Another natural discharge is discussed in verses 19-24. During the period of a woman's separation, the same regulations applied as in 15:2-10. No need existed in this case for the sacrificial offerings. 25. Beyond the time of her separation. More in line with verses 2-15 is the diseased condition described in 15:25-30. In this case the woman had to bring two birds to the priest, who offered them for a sin offering and a burnt offering.

D. The Day of Atonement. 16:1-34.

In spite of all the sacrifices made during the year for the members of the congregation of Israel and for the priests themselves, there still remained sins and uncleanness for which atonement had to be made if the right relationship between God and his people was to be maintained. Hence a particular day was inaugurated upon which the ritual performed by the high priest would accomplish the reconciliation of the nation with its God. Hebrews 9 gives the significance of the ceremony to the Christian in such a clear picture that Lev 16 may truly be designated the pinnacle of the OT sacrificial system.

2. Come not at all times into the holy place. Aaron was not to be permitted frequent entrance to the holy place within the veil (pârōket), or "divider," before the mercy seat (kappōret), which is described in Ex 25:17-21. This kappōret is from the verb kāpar, "to cover, forgive or expiate." Therefore the lid of the ark, or mercy seat, could likewise be called "propitiatory." As prescribed in verses 29,30, the entrance was to be a once-a-year occasion. And it was to be performed only in the prescribed manner.

3. Thus shall Aaron come into the holy place. Since the priest himself needed to be cleansed before he could offer sacrifices for the people, he was to bring a bull for a sin offering and a ram for a burnt offering. From the people (v. 5) he was to take two goats for a sin offering and a ram for a burnt offering, these to be offered for the people. 4. He shall put on the holy linen coat. After washing himself, the priest was to don the priestly garments. 6. Aaron shall offer his bullock. The bullock was designated as a sin offering for the priest and his house (cf. v. 11). Contrast with this the description of Jesus in Heb 7:26,27.

7. He shall take the two goats. The two goats, after being "presented before the Lord," were designated by lots for the Lord and for "the scapegoat" ('ăzā'zēl). The identity and significance of 'ăzā'zēl are not given, but it seems clear from the references in this chapter that it was some sort of demon who represented to the Jewish people that which was opposed to Jehovah. It should be noted, however, that whereas one goat was to be sacrificed to the Lord (vv. 9, 15), the other was not to be sacrificed to 'ăzā'zēl but merely to be released into the wilderness after having first been presented alive before the Lord (cf. vv. 20-22).

Another interpretation of 'ăzā'zēl is that the Hebrew word is an abstract noun meaning "complete removal" (cf. ASV marginal reading). In this view 'ăzā'zēl is formed from an intensive stem of the verb root 'azal found in the cognate Arabic language meaning "to remove." Leviticus 17:7 expressly forbids any further sacrifice to demons. The real function of the live goat is to bear away out of sight all the sins of Israel and to make evident the effect of the great work of atonement. This unique ceremony involving the second goat teaches the complete removal of sins atoned for by sacrifice (cf. Ps 103:12; Isa 38:17; 43:25; Jer 31:34; Mic 7:19; Jn 1:29; Heb 9:26).

12. He shall take a censer. The high priest's first entrance into the Most Holy Place was for the purpose of carrying in the censer of live coals and two handsful of incense. 13. The testimony (hā'ēdût) is a term used in reference to the two tablets given Moses on Sinai and subsequently placed in the ark (cf. Ex 25:16; 31:18; 32:15). The cloud resulting from the burning incense was designed, perhaps, to hide from the priest's view the manifestation of God upon the mercy seat in order that he might not die (Ex 33:20).

14. He shall take of the blood. The implication here is that the high priest was to leave the Most Holy Place in order to obtain the blood of the bull, then enter it a second time to sprinkle the blood upon and near the mercy seat as directed. 15. Then shall he kill. Then he was to go out again, slay the goat of the sin offering for the people, and enter the Most Holy Place a third time, repeating with the blood of the goat the procedure followed in verse 14.

16. He shall make an atonement. Thus the high priest would atone for the sins of the people, and for the related uncleanness of the Holy Place and the Tabernacle, which required a periodic cleansing.

20. He shall bring the live goat. The live goat of verse 10 was to be brought forward, whereupon Aaron would lay both hands upon it and confess over it all the sins of the people of Israel. It was considered that this act symbolized the transference of the sins to the goat, which was then led away into the wilderness and released, presumably to die. It has already been said (v. 8) that 'ăzā'zēl represented to the Jews the one who was opposed to the Lord. As the first goat was a means of expiation in regard to the Lord for the sins of Israel, so the second goat was a means of expiation to the one who was opposed to the Lord by returning to him with the goat the sins for which he was responsible. But whereas the goat designated to the Lord was sacrificed, the goat designated to 'ăzā'zēl was not. Whether, in truth, the second goat was considered to bear all the sins (that is, the sins of a high hand as well as the unintentional sins) of the children of Israel is not made clear.

23-25. Aaron shall come into the tabernacle. Aaron was to enter the Tabernacle, remove his linen garments, wash, and put on other clothing. The garments donned at this point are not described, though it is likely that they were the formal clothing of the high priest (cf. Ex 28). He then was to sacrifice on the altar one ram as a burnt offering for the people, after which the fat portions of the sin offerings (cf. Lev 16:11,19) were to be burned.

26. He that let go the goat. The man made unclean by conducting the goat into the wilderness (v. 21) had to wash his clothing and himself before returning to the community. 27. The bullock . . . and the goat . . . shall one carry forth. The remaining portions of the bullock and goat used in the sin offerings were to be taken from the camp and destroyed by burning. Those performing this act had to wash their clothing and bodies before returning.

29. Ye shall afflict your souls. The perpetual establishment of the Day of Atonement, yôm hakkippūrîm (cf. 23:27), and its observance by the high priest and people follow in the remaining verses of the chapter. The tenth day of the seventh month was designated for the occasion, and on this day the people were to humble (t'annû) themselves and refrain from all work. This humbling or afflicting of one's self was likely performed through fasting (cf. Ps 35:13; Ezr 8:21; Isa 58:3,5), putting into subjection the earthly appetite in order to manifest one's penitence for wrongdoing. 31. A sabbath of rest. The words shabbat shabbatôn mean "a sabbath of solemn rest" (RSV); that is, a high sabbath, a particular sabbath. 32. And the priest . . . shall make the atonement. The prescribed ritual was to be followed once each year (v. 34) by the individual then holding the office of high priest. The entire ritual, imperfect and of necessity repetitive as it was, tended only to make the devout long for the coming of the High Priest and Perfect Mediator who should, by one act, fulfill for all time all the requirements necessary to effect perfect reconciliation with the Father.

II. How One Keeps in Touch with God. 17:1–27:34.

Once the desired relationship to God was established, it must be maintained.

The remaining chapters clearly present the way the individual Jew was to walk in order that he might be both different from the heathen and acceptable to the Lord.

A. The Holiness of the People. 17:1–20:27.

1) Concerning Food. 17:1-16.

1. God's instructions were given to Moses and thence to the people through Aaron and his sons.

3. What man soever. All animals to be slaughtered, those suitable for sacrifice, were to be brought to the priest and sacrificed at the door of the tent of meeting. At this time the blood and the fat were to be made a part of a peace offering to the Lord (v. 5). 4. And bringeth it not. If the command was disobeyed, the man was to be considered to have shed blood wrongly and was to be cut off from among his people. The word cut off is from the root krt, which also means "to root out," "to maim," or "to destroy." There is no certainty as to whether the term implied the death sentence or merely excommunication. Exodus 31:14 seems to imply the death sentence, as both terms are mentioned as the penalty for the same offense.

5-7. They shall no more offer their sacrifices unto devils. The purpose of such severe punishment is given in verses 5 and 7. The animals were to be slain at the door of the tent of meeting rather than to be sacrificed to the "devils" (śe'irim). These creatures, called "satyrs" in the RSV, are referred to in the singular in Lev 4:23 and translated simply "goats." The same term, however, as used in II Chr 11:15; Isa 13:21; 34:14 (in the Isa passages the AV also uses the term "satyr[s]") obviously refers to demons, objects of heathen worship. Apparently some of the idolatry of Egypt which had invaded the ranks of the Jews (Josh 24:14) had been brought from that place at the Exodus. Josephus (Against Apion. II 7) tells of the worship of goats in Egypt. A statute forever was adjusted by Moses as reported in Deut 12:15, in anticipation of the entrance into the Promised Land, where the dispersion of the tribes would render such restriction impractical.

9. That man shall be cut off. The penalty for improper offering of any sacrificial animal was designated both for the Hebrews and for the foreigners dwelling among them.

10. That eateth any manner of blood. Neither the Hebrew nor the resident foreigner was to eat any manner of blood. The reasons are given in 17:11. The first was that it was the fluid which carried life through the body, and thus it represented the life or soul (nepesh) of the animal. The second was actually the primary reason, with the first simply forming the foundation for the second: Atonement for sins was made by the sacrifice of animals, by offering the life of the animal as a substitution for one's own life; the shedding of blood as the fluid of life was the offering of that portion which most clearly set forth the atonement picture. 13. He shall even pour out the blood thereof. The blood of all edible game which was slain was to be shed on the ground and not to be eaten.

15. That which dieth of itself. The animal which had died a natural death, or had been slain by other animals, either retained its blood or had shed it in a manner which was ceremonially improper. Thus, even though the animal might ordinarily be considered clean, the nature of its death prevented its being eaten. When through ignorance, or without thinking, such an animal was consumed, the proper purification procedure was to be followed.

2) Concerning Marriage. 18:1-30.

3. After the doings of the land of Canaan. The Hebrew people, chosen by God to be the nation which would produce the Saviour of all mankind, were not to be allowed to indulge in the immoral and idolatrous practices of the people from whom they had just departed nor of the land into which they were soon to march. 4. Ye shall do my judgments. Rather, they were to walk in the way set for them by their Leader, the Lord God of Israel. And it was with the authority of their Leader and their God that the following commandments were given to them, thus enforcing upon them their covenant obligation. 5. He shall live in them. The commandments were not given without a promise. The obedient individual would live. The same expression is to be found in Ezk 20:11,13,21 without making clear the exact meaning. It is felt, however, that the meaning is to be found in the NT (Lk 20:38; Rom 10:5; Gal 3:12), where the "abundant," "full," or "true" life seems to be signified.

6-15. Commands Concerning Purity in the Parent-child Relationship.

6. Near of kin to him. Literally, flesh of his flesh (sh'ēr b'śārô), i.e., blood relation as opposed to relation simply by marriage. To uncover their nakedness. Hebrew idiom for having sexual intercourse. This is a prohibition of incest.

7. The nakedness of thy father. These laws were addressed to men. Hence this verse contains a prohibition not against incest between father and daughter, but against incest between son and mother only. The shame brought upon the mother was brought also upon the father. As they were of one flesh (Gen 2:24), any act committed against the mother could be considered to have been likewise committed against the father. 8. It is thy father's nakedness. Even though a stepmother is not a blood relation, the status of man and wife compelled the same prohibition and for the same reason as in verse 7.

9. The nakedness of thy sister. References to a half sister and a stepsister are found here. Whether she be born at home, or born abroad is most likely a reference to whether the girl was a product of a marriage subsequent to or prior to that which produced the son. 10. Thy son's daughter. Intercourse between father and granddaughter is prohibited. 11. Thy father's wife's daughter. Again reference is made to a half sister, since a blood relationship exists (see also v. 9).

12,13. Thy father's sister. . . . thy mother's sister. These verses refer to an aunt, sister of either father or mother. 14. Thy father's brother. Intercourse even with the wife of a paternal uncle is prohibited, since this would bring dishonor upon a blood relation.

15. Thy daughter in law. Dishonor upon a son would result from illicit relations between father and daughter-in-law.

16-18. Commands Concerning Purity in Other Family Relationships.

16. Thy brother's wife. The reference is to a sister-in-law. This, however, did not obtain where the deceased brother had left no children. Rather, the man was obliged to marry his brother's widow (Deut 25:5) in order that she might bear a child to preserve the name of the deceased. 17. Intercourse with both a woman and her daughter, or with both a woman and her granddaughter is prohibited. 18. A wife to her sister. Marriage to two sisters while both were living was prohibited, although the law, it seems, did not prevent marriage to the sister of a deceased wife. Cf. the case of Jacob, Leah, and Rachel (Gen 29:23,30), which shows that the law was not known in earlier times.

19. As long as she is put apart for her uncleanness. Other kinds of impurity and unnatural crimes are mentioned in verses 19-23. During a woman's period of separation, no man was to approach her (cf. 15:24; 20:18).

21. The fire is not in the Hebrew text but is simply an interpolation by the translators, based on such passages as II Kgs 16:3; 17:17; 21:6. Actually, the nature of the dedication that is indicated may have involved both fire and human sacrifice, although such is not stated. Molech was a heathen god who was also called Moloch (Amos 5:26), Milcom (I Kgs 11:33), and Malcham (Zeph 1:5). In I Kgs 11:5 he is called "the abomination of the Ammonites," and in I Kgs 17:7 Solomon is said to have built a high place for him, in the hill that is before Jerusalem." In Jer 32:35 it was at the high places of Baal that Molech was worshiped, thus showing a close relationship between the two gods. By worshiping Molech the children of Israel would profane the name of God. To profane (ḥillēl) is "to belittle, defile, make common." It is interesting to note that the Hebrew word is very similar in spelling to another word which means the very opposite (hillēl), "to praise, celebrate, glorify."

22. Thou shalt not lie with mankind. The perversions mentioned here and in verse 23 can not produce offspring, and thus they defeat the purpose for which mankind was given such responsibility and capability. This, therefore, is rebellion both against God and against a God-ordered society.

24. Defile not ye yourselves. Cf verse 3. The picture in the remaining verses of the chapter is that of a person, nauseated by the corruption and vileness within, violently expelling from his system that which would only further defile him. By contrast God reminded the people that they were to look to him as their God and to separate themselves from the customs of the heathen nations and unto him.

3) Concerning the Social Order. 19:1-37.

1,2. This is one of the greatest chapters in the OT. It is a Mosaic anticipation of the very spirit of the Sermon on the Mount. The contents are closely related to the Ten Commandments with the assertion, I am the Lord your God, which frequently recurs as a refrain. The Book of the Covenant (Ex 21–23) likewise reveals several of the commands to be found herein. Ye shall be holy. The motive and inspiration for obedience to the commands which follow were to be the holiness of God. The Hebrew people were to measure their own holiness by that of God. Obedience to God's commands would insure that they would remain a separated, peculiar people of God.

3. Ye shall fear every man his mother, and his father. This command may have been placed first in recognition of the truth that, if a child is taught respect for his parents and for God's Day, he will be more likely to have respect for the commandments of his Lord.

4. Turn ye not unto idols. The command to avoid turning to idols ('ĕlîlîm, "vanity," "emptiness," "nothing") certainly set them apart from their idolatrous neighbors.

5. Cf. 7:15-18. Ye shall offer it at your own will is better translated: You shall offer it so that you may be accepted (RSV).

9-18. Commands Concerning a Man's Dealings with His Neighbor. Love and generosity were to motivate the course of action to be followed. 9,10. Thou shalt not wholly reap the corners. Provision for the poor and the sojourner was to be made by allowing some of the crops to remain in the field for them at harvest time (cf. Deut 24:19-21, where olives are included in the commandment). 12. Swear by my name falsely. To swear by God's name falsely was to do so in order to cheat or defraud another, which act would profane (ḥālāl, "discredit, make common") his holy name. 13. The wages of him that is hired. Prompt payment of wages due was commanded. 14. Thou shalt not curse the deaf. Ridicule of the deaf and blind was prohibited. Since God knows of each such act, fear of retribution should prevent it. 15. Thou shalt not respect the person of the poor. There were not to be two standards of justice: one for the rich and one for the poor (cf. Deut 25:13 ff., where two kinds of weights and measures are mentioned). The administration of justice was to be of equal nature to all classes. This was likewise the burden of Amos (see 2:6, 7; 4:1; 5:11,12,24). 16. The blood of thy neighbour. A man was not to seek the life of his neighbor either by accusation or by silence. 17. Rebuke (from yākaḥ) involved reproving him, telling him where he was at fault. Doing this sincerely would reveal not only a lack of hatred but also a desire for his improvement. A word of rebuke left unsaid might well encourage him to continue in sin, thus bringing sin upon one's self. 18. Avenge, nor bear any grudge. A man was neither to take vengeance on (nāqam) nor bear a grudge against (nāṭar) his neighbor. Nāṭar means literally to watch for and thus to bear malice in the heart towards another. Rather, love towards him was to be the rule (cf. Mt 19:19; 22:39; Rom 13:9; Gal 5:14).

19-25. Directions for Safeguarding the Moral Order. According to Keil and Delitzsch, this group of commandments to the Chosen People was designed "to keep the physical and moral order of the world sacred" (KD, Pentateuch, II, 421). In verse 19 the people are told that those things which were separated by creation are to remain so. Diverse kinds of animals were not to be allowed to interbreed. Nor were diverse kinds of seeds to be sown together. A cloth consisting of both linen and wool was not to be made.

20. A woman, that is a bondmaid. The fact that the bondmaid, though betrothed, had not been ransomed nor given her freedom would protect her from the death sentence for the sin referred to (cf. 20:10). And the man was to be required to bring a trespass offering to the Tabernacle to gain forgiveness for his sin (vv. 21,22). 23. Count the fruit thereof as uncircumcised. In the land into which they were to go, they were not to eat fruit from the fruit trees for the first four years. The fruit of the first three years was to be considered unclean or forbidden (RSV), while that of the fourth year was to be dedicated to the Lord as an offering of thanksgiving. 25. In the fifth year. Eating the fruit in the fifth year was permitted, and in accordance with the obedience of the people, the blessings of the Lord would be upon the future bearing of fruit. The one sanction for the commandment to forbear for four years was not the dedication of fruit to field spirits or fertility spirits but simply, "I am the Lord your God."

26. The first part of this verse is largely a repetition of 17:10 ff. To use enchantment and observe times was to practice augury and witchcraft (RSV).

27. Ye shall not round the corners of your heads. An ancient Arab religious custom required that the hair and beard be trimmed in such manner. The prohibition of the custom was necessary if the Jews were to be distinguished from the heathen. 28. Cuttings in your flesh. This prohibited any voluntary disfigurement of the person. Both cutting and tattooing of the body were practiced by the heathen. 29. Do not prostitute thy daughter. Such action would result in a dissolving of the very heart of society, the home. 30. Ye shall keep my sabbaths. In honoring the Lord's Day and the Lord's House, the groundwork for a godly nation is laid. 31. Familiar spirits. Seeking out mediums and wizards would indicate a lack of trust in and dedication to the Lord. 32. The hoary head. Respect for earthly authority and wisdom is a prerequisite to respect for the judgment and commandments of the Lord.

33. If a stranger sojourn. With God's treatment of the Jews in Egypt as an example, the Jews were likewise to be gracious and kind to the foreigner who came to live among them, loving him as one of themselves (v. 34). 35. Ye shall do no unrighteousness. Justice and scrupulous honesty were to be the rule in all dealings with one's fellow man.

4) The Punishments for Disobedience. 20:1-27.

3. Given of his seed unto Molech. By such open rebellion on the part of one of the Chosen People, God's house and name would be belittled. 4. Hide their eyes. If the people did not perform their duty in the carrying out of the death sentence, God would bring judgment upon the man and his family, and all his companions who joined him to play the (spiritual) harlot (from zānâ), thus, to apostatize.

6. Familiar spirits. God would deal in like manner with one who turned to mediums or wizards, since this, too, was a form of spiritual adultery. The sentence to be imposed by his fellow man is referred to in verse 27. 7. Sanctify yourselves (hitqaddishtem from qādash, "to be holy, consecrated, devoted") can also be rendered consecrate yourselves (RSV) or show yourselves holy.

9. Cf. Ex 21:17 and Deut 27:16. His blood shall be upon him means that the law of blood revenge would not obtain in the case of those who took his life.

10-21. Review of Some Laws Regarding Sexual Sins. See chapter 18 for the earlier enunciation of these statutes. Here their punishments are appended.

12. They have wrought confusion (they have committed incest, RSV) in that they have rebelled against the divinely created order. 14. Burnt with fire. Likely, as in Josh 7:15,25, death was not by burning, but destruction of the remains of the executed individual was accomplished by fire. 19. They shall bear their iniquity. Punishment by the people was not prescribed for the sins encountered in 20:19-21. It appears that God himself would see to the matter. 22. Keep all my statutes. Since God had separated the Jews unto himself (vv. 24, 26), they were to keep themselves in every way apart from the practices of the heathen who had been cast out of the Land of Promise (v. 23). This Promised Land was to flow "with milk and honey" (v. 24), but it would not retain the Jews if they did not remain a dedicated people (v. 22). They were to be holy because the Lord to whom they belonged was holy.

B. The Holiness of Priests and Their Offerings. 21:1—22:33.

21:1-9. Instructions to the Priests Generally.

1,2. Noné . . . defiled for the dead. Exhibiting external signs of mourning and touching the dead disqualified a priest for performing his priestly duties. Consequently, he was denied this privilege except in the case of his immediate family. 3. This included a virgin sister who, being still unmarried, had not left the family. It is not known why the wife is not mentioned here, particularly since Ezk 24:15ff. seems to assume that the prophet would have mourned his wife's death had not the Lord spoken to him on that particular occasion.

4. The meaning of this verse is obscure. Chief man (ba'al) should in all probability be translated husband (RV marg. and RSV) or lord of the house. Thus, because of his position in the family and community, the priest should take care not to become defiled, except in the cases permitted above. 5. Make baldness upon their head. These were signs of mourning among heathen peoples (cf. 19:27,28). They were therefore denied the Jewish priest, who, in offering the "bread (leḥem; also translated "meat" and "food" elsewhere) of their God" were not to be in such condition of ceremonial uncleanness that God's name would be profaned (v. 6).

7. Profane (Hălālâ) means "a woman who has been defiled" (RSV), an immoral woman. A woman put away from her husband, i.e., a divorced woman, was likewise unacceptable as a wife for a priest.

10-15. Commands Concerning the High Priest Specifically.

10-12. Upon whose head the . . . oil was poured. The term anointing oil, shemen hammishḥâ, comes from the verb, māshaḥ, meaning "to anoint or consecrate." The noun māshîaḥ is "the anointed one," the Christ, Messiah. A man in the position of high priest was to maintain such purity as would prevent his showing the customary signs of mourning for anyone at all; and he might not leave the sanctuary to participate in mourning, as this would bring defilement upon the Lord's sanctuary.

13. A wife in her virginity. He was to marry only an Israelite virgin. 15. His seed (zar'ô, "posterity") was not to be made unholy by his having contracted an improper marriage, for he was to remember his status of one separated by the Lord to a particular office.

16. The remainder of the chapter is concerned with those imperfections and deficiencies that disqualified a man for exercising the duties of a priest. The general statement made in 21:17 is made specific in 21:18ff. 18. Flat nose is better translated more generally a split or mutilated face (RSV). Anything superfluous. Anything beyond that which was normal. 20. A blemish in his eye. A sight defect. Scurvy. An itch.

21. To offer the bread of his God. To offer a sacrifice to God in the role of priest. One with such a blemish might, however, partake of those portions of the sacrifices usually given to the priests (v. 22). He was not to be allowed to perform any priestly function. These restrictions were based on the Hebrew belief that the spiritual nature of a man was reflected in his physical condition. Only one who was physically perfect could be considered of sufficient holiness to perform the functions of a priest.

22:2,3. The holy things consisted of the sacrifices made by the people and offered by the priests. The separation referred to was required during a state of ritual uncleanness. No priest could handle these dedicated gifts while unclean. The portions of the sacrificial food given to the priests were of great importance to them, but they could neither be prepared nor eaten except when the eater was clean. 6. For the Jew, the new day began at sunset. Therefore, being unclean until the even meant being unclean for the remainder of that day—until the sun is down (v. 7).

10,11. No stranger (zār, "outsider," "layman") could partake of the holy food, but a member of the priest's household, such as a slave, could do so. 12,13. If the priest's daughter married a zār, she could not eat of the dedicated food; but if she returned to her father's house as a childless widow or divorcee, she then could do so. 14. These shall he not take. It is a non-priest to whom reference is here made. Cf. 5:14-16, but in chapter 22 the regulation concerns specifically the eating of the holy food unintentionally by a zār.

17-25. Commands Concerning the Condition of Animals Offered as Sacrifice. These rules pertain to the payment of vows and freewill offerings (cf. 7:16).

22. A wen. An ulcer or running sore.

23. Any thing superfluous. In the case of a freewill offering an animal might be brought which was not perfectly proportioned; e.g., one part might be longer or shorter than normal. For the fulfilling of a vow, however, such laxity was not permitted. 24. That which is bruised. The reference here is specifically to castrated animals, the operation having been performed in any of the four ways mentioned. 25. From a stranger's hand. A foreigner who desired to offer a sacrifice to the Lord had to observe the same rules regarding the quality of the animal as did the Jews.

27. A bullock, or a sheep, or a goat. The animals mentioned were to be at least seven days old before they could be offered as a sacrifice to the Lord. Cf. Ex 22:30. 28. Ye shall not kill it and her young both in one day. Cf. Deut 22:6. The purpose of this commandment is not clear, but it was perhaps given in order to impress upon the Israelites the importance of keeping sacred the relationship existing between parent and offspring.

29. Cf. 7:15; 19:5,6.

31-33. Concluding exhortation.

C. The Holiness of Time. 23:1—25:55.

1) The Holy Use of Days. 23:1-44.

Certain days and periods were to be dedicated to the Lord. This chapter lists such times.

2. Feasts of the Lord and my feasts were those "holy convocations" or religious assemblies set apart by the Lord and dedicated to him for the observance of some particular phase of Israel's religious life. Mô'ēd, the word translated "feast," means "an appointed time," "a festival time," "an assembly," and comes from the verb yā'ad, "to appoint," "to meet by agreement."

3. The term sabbath of rest, shabbat shabbātôn, comes from the word shābat, which means "to cease," "to rest", "to come to an end." As indicated, the observance of the day presupposes six days of labor. The day of rest is further identified as the sabbath of the Lord, i.e., both appointed by and dedicated to him. Its origin, as given in Gen 2:2,3, relates the day to God's creation of the world, places it in an indispensable position in that creation, and makes the observance of it an incontestable imperative. Mark 2:27 can not be used to weaken the imperative. "The sabbath was made for man" because it was an absolute necessity that man have one, and that he observe it in the proper spirit.

5. The first month was Abib (later called Nisan, as in Neh 2:1 and Est 3:7) and corresponded to the latter part of March and the first part of April. The details of the Feast of Passover and the Feast of Unleavened Bread are to be found in Exodus 12. Here only the bare outline is furnished.

6. Unleavened bread is called maṣṣâ, with a plural form, maṣṣôt, which even today designates the unleavened wafers sold for Jewish observance of this holy time. 7. Servile work was apparently labor connected with agricultural pursuits and other definite occupations. That preparation of food was permitted is implied in Ex 12:16. 8. An offering made by fire. Num 28:19 ff. gives the details of the sacrifice.

9-14. Instructions for the Offering of First Fruits. Cf. Deut 26:2 ff.

10. When ye be come into the land. This command looked forward to the time when the Israelites would raise crops in the Promised Land. The sheaf, 'ōmer, was of grain, but it is not specified whether of wheat or barley. The latter is assumed because it was the first ripe.

The offering was to be lifted by the priest and moved toward the altar and then moved away from the altar. This constituted waving it. It denoted dedicating it to the Lord and receiving it again. The specific day for the offering, the morrow after the sabbath (v. 11), is uncertain, since the seventh day of the week was not the only day called the "sabbath." The Day of Atonement received this designation (16:31; 23:32) regardless of the day of the week on which it occurred. The same is true of the first day of the Feast of Unleavened Bread. It was a day of rest, shabbāt. It is most likely that the offering of first fruits was to be brought to the priest on the day after the first day of the Feast of Unleavened Bread. This would place it on the sixteenth day of Abib (cf. v. 6). Thus this feast prefigures the resurrection of Christ as the firstfruits from the dead (I Cor 15:23; Rom 8:29).

13. Two tenth deals referred to two-tenths of an ephah, while a quarter of a hin represented about one and one-half quarts.

15-22. Instructions for the Observance of the Feast of Weeks. Cf. Ex 34:22. It was also known as the Feast of Harvest (Ex 23:16). The term "Pentecost," found in Acts 2:1; 20:16; I Cor 16:8, is from the Greek word pentēkostē, meaning "fiftieth" (day). The Feast of Weeks was later known as the "Feast of Pentecost."

15. The morrow after the sabbath. See the note on 23:11. 16. Shall ye number fifty days. In verse 15 the command is to count seven weeks (hence "Feast of Weeks") plus one day ("unto the morrow after the seventh sabbath"), or a total of fifty days. It was to be a new meat (meal) offering in that it was to be from the new harvest.

17. They shall be baken with leaven. Cf. note on 23:13. This is the only meal offering to be made with leaven. Very likely it was so made that the produce might be presented to the Lord in the condition in which it would be useful to and enjoyed by the people.

18-20. A burnt offering, a sin offering, and peace offerings were to be offered at this time. "In this way the whole of the year's harvest was placed under the gracious blessing of the Lord by the sanctification of its commencement and its close; and the enjoyment of their daily food was also sanctified thereby" (KD, Pentateuch, II, 444).

22. Thou shalt leave them unto the poor. Cf. 19:9,10. Thanksgiving to the Lord can frequently best be demonstrated by acts of kindness for the underprivileged.

24,25. In the seventh month. On the first day of the seventh month the Israelites were to observe a day of rest (shabbāt), a blowing of the trumpet (likely the ram's horn or shôpār), a religious gathering (v. 24), and the offering of a burnt offering. These observances set apart the entire seventh month as a sabbatical month, important not simply because of its numerical order but because of the fact that the month contained the period when Israel received forgiveness for her sins. In OT times the month was called Ethanim (I Kgs 8:2), but it was later called Tishri.

26-32. Instructions for a Day of Atonement. Cf. 16:1-34.

27. The day is designated as the tenth day of Ethanim (Tishri). 32. The Jewish day went from sunset to sunset, thus from even unto even.

33-36. Instructions for the Observance of the Feast of Tabernacles.

34. Tabernacles. Hebrew sukkôt, "booths." This feast was to last for seven days, beginning on the fifteenth day of the seventh month, i.e., five days after the Day of Atonement. 36. Certain acts, such as the 'ăṣenet or "solemn assembly," were to be performed on the eighth day, it is true, but these simply provided a closing of the observance. The Feast of Tabernacles (Booths) commemorated the sojourn of the Israelites in the wilderness of Sinai when the Lord brought them out of Egyptian bondage (v. 43).

37,38. These are the feasts of the Lord. This is a concluding statement which looks back to the introduction in 23:4. The preceding verses in the chapter have told of special holy days to be observed in addition to the regular sacrifices, offerings, and holy days indicated elsewhere.

39. Ye shall keep a feast unto the Lord. A fuller description of the Feast of Tabernacles is given in the remainder of the chapter. In Ex 23:16; 34:22 it is called the "Feast of Ingathering" (ḥag hā'āsip, from 'āsap, "to gather or draw together"), and reference is made in this verse to the time when the Israelites shall "have gathered in the fruit of the land."

40. Cf. Neh 8:15. Boughs of goodly trees were literally, the fruit (p°rî; so RSV), although Keil and Delitzsch hold that "fruit" refers to "the shoots and branches of the trees, as well as the blossom and fruit that grew out of them" (Pentateuch, II, 448). The second word translated "boughs" in the AV is from 'ānāp, which means specifically "sprout" or "branch." It was with the several types of branches here mentioned that the Israelites were to construct the booths of 23:42.

43. I made the children of Israel to dwell in booths. The observance of this special feast was not to remind the people of the privations suffered during the period of desert wandering. It was, rather, to bring to mind the provisions made for their needs by their Creator and Liberator during that most important period of their history, the birth of the Hebrew nation as a result of the direct intervention of the Lord their God.

2) The Holy Use of Objects. 24:1-23. The chapter can be divided into three topics: (1) the oil for the tabernacle lamps (vv. 1-4); (2) the showbread (vv. 5-9); and (3) blasphemy and retaliation (vv. 10-23).

2. Pure oil olive. The oil for the lamps was to be provided by the people to make certain that they would be kept burning at all times. Cf. Ex 27:20,21, where the same instructions are given as appear in verses 2 and 3 here. To obtain this oil, they first pounded the olives or pressed them, to squeeze out their juice. Next they strained the juice to remove the pulp. Then, when the oil rose to the surface of the juice, they skimmed it off. 3. Testimony. A reference to the Tables of the Law placed in the ark within the veil (Ex 25:16; cf. Deut 31:26. In the former, 'ēdut is used, as in the Leviticus passage. In the latter, 'ēd is used. Both mean "witness" or "testimony"). 4. Candlestick. Better, lampstand (RSV), since oil lamps rather than candles were involved.

5. Two tenth deals. Two-tenths of an ephah, as in 23:13,17. This means that each cake or loaf of unleavened bread was to contain about six and one-fourth pounds of flour. 7. The frankincense was possibly put into small golden cups and placed with each row (RSV; cf. Jos Ant. iii.10.7), not directly on the bread. It was, with the bread, to serve as a memorial ('azkārâ; cf. note on 2:3), the frankincense itself likely being cast upon the altar fire. 8. Taken from the children of Israel. As in the case of the oil (v. 2), the showbread was to be provided by the people. 9. And it shall be Aaron's and his sons'. After the frankincense had been offered by fire to the Lord, the bread was to be eaten by the priests.

10. The son of an Israelitish woman. The son of the Egyptian, accompanied by his Jewish mother, was apparently included among the "mixed multitude" of Ex 12:38. According to Deut 23:7,8, he was likely not considered a part of the "congregation of the Lord." The nature of the quarrel between him and the Israelite is not stated. 11. The word translated blasphemed is from nāqab and literally means to "bore, pierce, mark, distinguish, or designate." It does not in itself denote a lack of reverence (cf. Num 1:17, where it is translated "expressed"), but in the context of this passage no doubt is left as to the intended meaning. The Jews later took the word in its general meaning and would not speak the sacred name Yhwh at all, substituting for it the word 'Adōnay, "Lord." Of the Lord is not present in Hebrew because it was understood that "the name," hashshēm, in this context referred to the Lord. 12. That the mind of the Lord might be shewed them. No punishment had as yet been specified for blaspheming the name of God.

14. Lay their hands upon his head. Since the sin of the man could have involved the entire community in punishment, what guilt there may have been in the community was transferred to the sinner by the laying on of hands. (Cf. 16:21, where the community sins were symbolically transferred to the "scapegoat".) He was then executed by the people. 15,16. These verses state the law which was at that time divinely enacted concerning the sin which had been committed. Shall bear his sin. Shall bear full responsibility and be subjected to the designated punishment for it.

17-21. Review of a Group of Previously Enacted Laws.

For the earlier statement of the laws, see Ex 21:12 ff. The situation in 24:18 is, however, not directly treated in the Exodus passage.

17,18. He that killeth any man is literally, he that smites the soul (nepesh) of any man. In verse 18 the same general construction is found: "the one smiting the soul of a beast shall make it good, soul in place of soul." The AV beast for beast is preferable to the more literal life for life of the RSV (cf. v. 21a). 19, 20. Cf. Ex 21:24,25. Eye for eye, tooth for tooth. This law of retaliation, lex talionis, was mentioned by Jesus Christ in Mt 5:38 ff., when he condemned, not the principle of civil law involved here, but the spirit of retaliation and revenge which was most likely to be found in association with it.

22. Ye shall have one manner of law. The principle mentioned in verse 16 is here stressed. The law was to apply to the foreigner as well as to the Israelite.

3) The Holy Use of Years. 25:1-55. The Sabbatical Year is discussed (vv. 2-7); the observance of the Year of Jubilee is commanded (vv. 8-12); and the effect of the Year of Jubilee upon property (vv. 13-34) and persons (vv. 35-55) is related.

2. Then shall the land keep a sabbath. In 23:3 we learn that a sabbath day was caused to be kept by the people. In this verse it is commanded that the land be allowed to observe a sabbath (wᵉshābᵉtâ shabbāt) unto the Lord. 4. A sabbath of rest unto the land. Just as the seventh day was designated the sabbath day, so each seventh year was to be a sabbath year, in which neither sowing nor pruning would occur. 5. That which groweth of its own accord. The owner of the land was not to reap that which grew up of its own accord during the sabbath year. The undressed vine is called a nazir, the same Hebrew word as for a Nazirite, whose hair was allowed to remain uncut or undressed. 6. The sabbath of the land shall be meat for you. Instead of the crops being reaped by the owner, they were to provide food for all, rich and poor alike (cf. Ex 23:11).

8,9. After seven sabbaths of years, or forty-nine years, Israel was to cause the sound of the horn (shōpār) to be heard throughout the land. The blowing of the horn was to take place on the Day of Atonement, and it was apparently at this time that a special year was to begin. Trumpet of the jubile is literally, the horn of shouting, or "loud trumpet" (ASV). The word translated jubile in verse 9 is tᵉrûʿâ. Elsewhere the word "jubile" is from yôbēl, a word of uncertain derivation (v. 10 ff.; 27:17-23; Num 36:4; see comment on Josh 6:4). This Hebrew word went into the Vulgate as Jubilaeus and thence into English as "jubile" and "jubilee."

10. The fiftieth year presents the difficulty of two successive sabbatical years, the forty-ninth and fiftieth, with the land lying fallow both years. This difficulty has led some to suppose that it may have been so calculated as to make the fiftieth year coincide with the seventh sabbatical year. And the year of "jubile" seems to have commenced on the Day of Atonement, which fell on the tenth day of the seventh month of the Jewish sacred year, Ethanim or Tishri. This seventh month, however, was also the first month of the Jewish civil calendar. This is how a year might be considered to have begun in the seventh month. Another explanation is that the trumpet blast on the Day of Atonement gave six months advance notice of the beginning of the Jubilee Year. However, the inference is that the horn actually ushered in the special year. Insufficient details are furnished to afford a solution to the problem. At least it was to be a year which provided liberty to many who had for a time lived without it. The general statement is made that every man would return to his possession and family, and the statement is more clearly defined in verses 23-34,39-55.

13. Ye shall return every man unto his possession. The first of the two effects of Jubilee Year is stated again generally, and in preparation for the year the instructions of the following verses are given. The basis for these instructions is that the land actually would belong to the Lord rather than to the individual. The Lord would allot the land to the various families, and they could not sell it in perpetuity because it must eventually revert to the family to whom it had been allotted (cf. vv. 23,24).

14-16. Oppress (from yānâ) means "to wrong or maltreat" by misrepresenting the value of a piece of land. According to the number of years. Since the land belonged to the Lord, only the crops which grew on it could be sold. Therefore the time remaining until the next Jubilee Year had to be considered in the setting of the price for the exchange of all land, since the nearer the exchange occurred to that special year, the fewer crops would remain to be raised before the land reverted to its original Israelite owner.

18,19. When the Israelites kept the Lord's commandments, they were to find themselves dwelling in safety (beṭaḥ, "security and confidence"). The land was to bear enough so that they should eat their "fill" (śōbaʿ, "abundance"). 20-22. What shall we eat the seventh year? As the Israelites naturally would be concerned lest with the land lying fallow there should be a decrease in harvested crops, God promised that the crops of the sixth year would be sufficient to last until the Sabbatical Year and the Jubilee Year were both completed (vv. 21,22).

24. A redemption for the land. There were several ways in which the land might be redeemed (from gāʾal, "buy back," "ransom." Boaz performed the duty of a kinsman-redeemer, gôʾēl, when he married Ruth. Christ Jesus was our gôʾēl at the cross.).

25. If thy brother be waxen poor. Poverty was the only situation which would force an Israelite to sell his land (cf. I Kgs 21:3). In such a case a kinsman-redeemer could come and buy back what had been sold and restore it to its original owner. 26,27. None to redeem it. If he had no near kinsman to redeem his land and had earned a sufficient amount, he could buy the land back himself by taking into consideration the number of crops still remaining until the Jubilee Year and paying the man for them. 28. Not able to restore it. If he had neither a kinsman-redeemer nor the ability to redeem the land himself, the land simply reverted to his possession at the arrival of the Jubilee Year. The buyer lost nothing through this arrangement, for he had paid only for the crops to be harvested until the Jubilee Year.

29. If a man sell a dwelling house. In a walled city, if a house was sold and remained in the buyer's possession for a whole year (i.e., without anyone's having redeemed it), it then became the full possession of the buyer (cf. one exception in v. 32). The Jubilee Year did not affect its ownership. 31. The houses of the villages which have no wall. A house in an unwalled town, however, was subject to the same regulations as the land itself (vv. 25-28). 32-34. The cities of the Levites. In the case of the Levites, the laws of the Jubilee Year which ordinarily pertained to land applied, instead, only to their houses, whether in a walled city or not. Their land could not be sold at any time.

35-55. The second effect of the Jubilee Year is given in the remaining verses of the chapter.

35-37. Thy brother refers to a fellow Israelite. Loans to needy friends were not to involve interest. Rather, the needy one was to be assisted by being allowed to reside with one of the community and to enjoy the same privileges as a stranger or foreigner who, although he could not own land, was permitted to accumulate property and live in comfort as a free man.

38. I am the Lord your God. As the One who created them, chose them, and delivered them from Egyptian bondage, God was authorized to impose these rules upon the Israelites.

39-43. If thy brother . . . be waxen poor. The Israelite who had to sell himself into bondage to another was not to be a slave laborer, but was to work simply as a hired servant and was to be treated kindly. When the Jubilee Year arrived, he was to be liberated, unless he had renounced his claim to freedom. The contents of these verses do not disagree with Ex 21:2-6, because the Leviticus passage is confined to a discussion of the effect of the Jubilee Year on a man's freedom. If the Israelite sold himself into bondage more than seven years prior to the Jubilee Year, the instructions in Ex 21:2 applied. At any rate, six years was the maximum length of time he could be required to serve before returning with his children to his family and possessions.

44-46. Both thy bondmen, and thy bondmaids. Slave labor was to be restricted to those bought from foreign nations and those foreigners who had settled among the Jews. This category of slaves, bondman (ʿebed, from ʿābad, "to serve or work"; cf. ʿōbadyâ, Obadiah, lit., servant of the Lord) and bondwoman (ʾāmâ, "maidservant"), could be passed on to one's children as an inheritance (v. 46).

47-54. And thy brother . . . sell himself. If an Israelite sold himself into the service of a resident foreigner, he could be redeemed by a near kinsman (vv. 48,49; see note on v. 24), or he could redeem himself. Here, too, he would have to consider proper payment for the time remaining until the Jubilee Year, the amount depending on whether there were many or few years left (vv. 50-52).

53. While in service to a resident foreigner, the Israelite was to be treated with consideration, as a hired servant. 54. If he be not redeemed. His length of service was bound to end free of compensation at the Jubilee Year.

55. They are my servants. The provisions for the Jubilee Year had as their guiding principle the fact that the Israelites were servants of the Lord and could not be sold permanently into the service of another. Likewise, since the land was the Lord's, it must return from time to time to the possession of those Israelites to whom it had been originally allotted.

D. Promises and Warnings. 26:1-46.

After the first two verses, which seem to summarize the first four Commandments, verses 3-13 relate the blessings of obedience, verses 14-39 tell of the punishments for disobedience, and verses 40-45 promise forgiveness upon repentance.

1,2. Ye shall make you no idols. In prohibiting idolatry (v. 1) and requiring the keeping of the Sabbaths (v. 2), the first four of the Ten Commandments can be said to be summarized. Idols (ĕlîlim) were, literally, things of nothingness. Graven image (pesel) was a carved or cast idol. A standing image (maṣṣēbâ) was a pillar set upright. Image of stone (ʾeben maśkît) was a figured stone, or one with an image carved into its face. If idolatry was set aside by the people and if the Lord's Sabbaths were given proper observance, the likelihood of their becoming apostate would be considerably reduced.

3,4. I will give you rain. Obedience to the Lord's commandments would result in improved agricultural conditions within the nation (cf. II Chr 7:14). 5. They would be able to eat their bread to the full, i.e., to the point of complete satisfaction (śōbaʿ; cf. 25:19). 6. I will give peace in the land. The safety promised in verse 5 (cf. 25:18,19) is reinforced by the promise of peace (shalôm), both mental and national, which would result in the ability to live an abundant life. 7,8. Ye shall chase your enemies. In the event, however, that war should ensue, they would have complete and easy victory. 10. Because of the new is apparently to make way for the new (RSV), a means of expressing the abundance of provision.

11,12. God would make his tabernacle (mishkān), i.e., his dwelling place, among them; and they would be continually aware of his presence in their midst. 13. I am the Lord your God. The gracious deliverance performed by the Lord only recently would testify to the fact that the promises of the preceding verses could be depended upon.

14,15. If ye will not hearken unto me. The very opposite of the preceding blessings would fall upon Israel if the nation became disobedient and unfaithful. The rebellion is depicted in four ways in the terms despise, abhor, will not do, and break.

16-39. The Details of the Curses.

16. I will even appoint over you terror. Terror would come in the form of disease (burning ague, i.e., fever) which would cause life to pine away (AV cause sorrow of heart is less accurate). Their enemies would devour their crops, so that seed planting would be useless. 17. I will set my face against you. Their enemies would so completely overcome them and Israel would be so thoroughly cowed, that they would even run from a nonexistent enemy (cf. v. 36 and Prov 28:1).

18. Seven times or sevenfold indicates an even greater intensification of the punishments. This threat is repeated in verses 21,24,28. 19,20. A heaven as iron would shed no rain and an earth as brass could produce no crop.

25. Avenge the quarrel of my covenant. Execute those punishments prescribed for breaking the covenant relationship. 26. And when I have broken the staff. The supply of bread would be so reduced that one oven would suffice for baking the bread prepared for ten families. Bread would be rationed and, in contrast to the situation in 26:5, that which was eaten would bring no satisfaction. Micklem assumes that, since each house had its own oven, the picture of ten women baking at one oven denotes "the breakup of family life" (Nathaniel Micklem, IB, II, 129). It is more likely, however, that scarcity of food is depicted here rather than dissolution of the home.

29. Ye shall eat the flesh of your sons. The severity of the hunger would result in cannibalism within the family circle (cf. II Kgs 6:28,29; Lam 4:10). 30. Idols. Gillûlîm, from gālal, "to roll," was a term of derision, which referred to the objects worshiped as "blocks" or "clods." 32,33. I will bring the land into desolation. These words look ahead to the time of enemy occupation, and exile.

34,35. Then shall the land enjoy her sabbaths. During the time of exile the land would at last be able to lie fallow, the greed of the people having prevented this earlier. "As the earth groans under the pressure of the sin of men, so does it rejoice in deliverance from this pressure, and participation in the blessed rest of the whole creation" (KD, Pentateuch, II, 476).

36,37. I will send a faintness into their hearts. Complete demoralization would be the lot of the exiles (see on v. 17). 38. Shall eat you up refers both to death at the hands of the enemy and to absorption by them (cf. Num 13:32). 39. Pine away is from māqaq, "to melt or decay." They would suffer not only for their own sins but also for those of their fathers. The word translated iniquity ('āwōn) involves both punishment and sin (cf. Jas 1:15).

40-42. If they shall confess their iniquity. If, however, Israel realized and confessed that her punishment was from God, a deserved and just chastisement for the rebellious and perverse hearts of her people, then God would remember the covenant made with the patriarchs.

43. The land . . . shall enjoy her sabbaths. Even though Israel would be made to leave her beloved land, which therefore would lie fallow, and even though she would for a while undergo chastisement for her sin, she would repent and be forgiven, and the covenant would be renewed by the Lord, her Deliverer from Egyptian bondage.

E. The Making of Vows. 27:1-34.

The chapter may be divided into two major portions: vows, 27:1-29, and tithes, 27:30-33. The former consists of instructions on vows concerning (1) persons, verses 1-8; (2) cattle, verses 9-13; (3) houses, verses 14,15; (4) land, verses 16-25; and (5) exceptions to the foregoing instructions, verses 26-29. A vow was never commanded, but, once made, was to be scrupulously kept (Eccl 5:4,5; Deut 23:21-23; Num 30:2). If commutation or redemption (buying off) was to be accomplished, a payment was required. And, according to KD (Pentateuch, II, 480), "the fulfilment of the vow could only have consisted in the payment into the sanctuary of the price fixed by the law."

2. Singular. "Special." A free translation of the passage might be: "When a man makes a special vow, the persons involved shall be reckoned by you as belonging unto the Lord" (Nathaniel Micklem, IB, II, 131).

3-7. And thy estimation. The evaluation of an individual was apparently based on his worth as a laborer for a given period. The value of the shekel at the time is unknown; consequently no attempt will be made to translate the values into modern coinage. They are stated as follows: (1) age twenty to thirty, fifty shekels per man and thirty per woman; (2) age five to twenty, twenty shekels for a boy and ten for a girl; (3) age one month to five years, five shekels for a boy and three for a girl; (4) age over sixty, fifteen shekels for a man and ten for a woman. 8. But if he be poorer than thy estimation. In case the person making the vow was too poor to provide the designated amount, the fixing of the sum was to be left to the discretion of the priest.

9. And if it be a beast. An animal apparently could not be redeemed for money. 10. He shall not alter it. Both the animal originally dedicated and the one substituted were to be forfeit.

14,15. And when a man shall sanctify his house. A house that was dedicated to the Lord was evaluated by the priest. If not redeemed, it apparently was to be sold for the good of the sanctuary. If the owner wished to redeem it, he had to add one-fifth to the estimated value.

16. And if a man shall sanctify . . . some part of a field. The value of a field belonging to a man through inheritance was to be reckoned by the amount of seed required to sow it properly. The amount stated here was apparently the estimated value of the crops of such a field for the entire Jubilee period. 17. From the year of jubile. If the Jubilee period had partly elapsed at the time the field was dedicated, the estimate was to be modified according to the time yet remaining. 19. He shall add the fifth part. After paying the stated amount, he apparently would continue to hold the field, but would not have the right to sell it. He could redeem it by adding one-fifth to the evaluation. 20,21. It shall not be redeemed any more. If not redeemed by him before the Jubilee Year, the field would become the property of the priest and would be sold by him.

22,23. A field . . . he hath bought. If the field was his not by inheritance but by purchase, and was dedicated to the Lord, he was to pay all at one time, in that day, the value placed upon it by the priest. 24. The field shall return. According to this verse and to 25:23-28 the land would revert to its hereditary owner at the time of the Jubilee Year.

26. Only the firstling of the beasts. The first-born of clean cattle and sheep belonged to the Lord by law and could not be redeemed. 27. If it be of an unclean beast. The first-born of an unclean animal dedicated to the Lord was evaluated by the priest and could be redeemed by adding one-fifth to the state value.

28. No devoted thing. Things which were devoted (hērem, under a ban, set apart entirely for the use of the Lord) could not be redeemed. This was different from dedication. An item thus placed under a ban as a result of being vowed to the Lord was to be considered most holy, literally, holiness of holinesses. It was surrendering something to God in an irrevocable and unredeemable manner. 29. None devoted . . . shall be redeemed. In certain instances persons could be placed under a ban, and such individuals were to be put to death. It is not likely that this "devoting" was done at the pleasure of just any man. Most probably it was done officially and was used against "those persons who obviously resisted that sanctification of life which was binding upon them" (KD, Pentateuch, II, 485).

30. And all the tithe of the land. The tithes belonged to the Lord and were subject to the same redemption rules as the clean beasts that had been dedicated (vv. 9,10). 32. Whatsoever passeth under the rod refers to the custom of counting animals by causing them to pass in single file out of an enclosure and marking each tenth animal by a rod dipped in a coloring material. 33. It shall not be redeemed. He was not to substitute another animal for one so designated lest he be required to part with both.

NUMBERS

INTRODUCTION

Title and Scope of Book. Among the ancient titles given to this book is the one used in our present Hebrew Bibles b'midbar, meaning "in the wilderness." It is taken from a prominent word in the first line, and is quite descriptive of the total contents. The English title has its origin in the Septuagint Version (LXX), whence, through the Vulgate, we get our name Numbers. Only a few chapters (1–4; 26) are given over to numbering (census-taking), while the bulk of the book deals with laws, regulations, and experiences of Israel in the wilderness. We must not, however, underemphasize the significance of two censuses, one taken at Sinai in preparation for the wilderness, the other taken near the Jordan, almost forty years later, in preparation for entering the promised land. One might even say that these censuses break up the book into its two logical divisions. Thus chapters 1–21 begin with a census and cover the years in the wilderness, while chapters 26–36 begin with a census of the new generation and tell of the months before entrance into Canaan. The Balaam story, which separates these two groups of chapters, forms a literary hinge, about which we comment later.

Numbers should not be studied independently of Exodus, Leviticus, and Deuteronomy. For example, Exodus 19:1 tells of Israel's arrival in the wilderness of Sinai in the third month after the Hebrews left the land of Egypt. From the third to the twelfth month they received the Decalogue, instructions for building the Tabernacle, and directions concerning the many details of the sacrificial system set forth in Leviticus. In Numbers, the people of Israel are taught how to function as a camp. Their religious, civil, and military economies are set in order, in preparation for their journeying, worshiping, and conquering as a nation.

Laws and instructions supplementary to the many legal and ceremonial details of Exodus and Leviticus are interspersed throughout the book. The earliest date given in Numbers appears in 9:1, where we are told that in the first month of the second year, the people were given regulations for keeping the first commemorative Passover. Numbers 1:1,2 tells us that Israel, while at Sinai, took a census in the second month of the second year, and received additional instructions, largely ceremonial (chapters 5–10), then left Sinai on the twentieth day of the second month beginning the second year after the Exodus (10:11). Numbers, then, gives the history of Israel's movements from the last nineteen days at Sinai (1:1; 10:11) until the people arrived in the Plains of Moab, east of Jordan, in the fortieth year (Num 22:1; 26:3; 33:50).

The sequence of events in the book of Numbers runs as follows: From Sinai, Israel journeyed north to the Wilderness of Paran. There the spies who brought back an "evil report" instigated a rebellion, and so the people refused to enter the land. Through foolish presumption they suffered defeat at the hands of the heathen, and were turned back to wander in the wilderness thirty-eight more years. At the end of this period, they traveled to the plains of Moab, east of the Jordan, and defeated and occupied all of Trans-Jordan north of the river Arnon. Here they fell into sin with the Moabite and Midianite women and worshiped their gods. Israel, as a new generation, was numbered again, and at the command of God destroyed the Midianites who had so harassed them. Gad and Reuben and the half tribe of Manasseh were given possessions east of the Jordan, and Moses appointed Joshua his successor. From chapter 20 through chapter 36, the book deals with events of the fortieth year (36:13). Because of its many laws and regulations this part has much in common with the book of Deuteronomy.

Date and Authorship. G. B. Gray voices the opinion of a number of higher critics when he says concerning Numbers, "Much that is here related of the age of Moses can be demonstrated to be unhistorical. . . ." (ICC, p. xlii). He admits, however, that some matters presented "are not incompatible with any known historical facts and conditions." In trying to account for the Book of Numbers without admitting its Mosaic authorship, many scholars have proposed that it is a composite of several documents. Most of the book such scholars designate "P" (Priestly) document, which they claim was written not earlier than the sixth or fifth century B.C., chiefly by priests of post-Exilic times. They allow that some of Numbers is from "J" and "E", two documents not older than the ninth and eighth centuries B.C. Even these earlier documents, they say, were so far separated from Moses' time and their traditions are so confused that they tell us little about the Mosaic period.

Such a view leaves us with a book written over a half millennium or more of time, by many different authors, editors, and redactors. Numbers, such critics say, is "lacking in unity of religious expression," and it is "impossible to summarize the fundamental ideas, or to point out the religious value of the book, for these are different in different parts" (ibid., p. xlvii). The basic arguments advanced by Gray and others in support of this documentary hypothesis of the origin of the Pentateuch are no longer considered valid by the best source scholars. E. E. Flack in Interpretation (1959, XIII, p. 6) says, "The trend in recent thought is to recognize early materials in the Pentateuch and to seek a more satisfactory solution to the problem of literary structure than the documentary theory provides." (See also B. D. Eerdmans, Oudtestamentische Studien, Deel VI, 1949). C. H. Gordon in his "Homer and the Bible" (Hebrew Union College Annual, Vol. XXVI, 1955) observes that "newly discovered texts show that much of the material ascribed to "P" is very early, even pre-Mosaic." Gordon here accuses advocates of the documentary view of giving hypothetical dates to hypothetical strata (documents) and calling this "historical" criticism. However, recent trends in scholarship have not resulted in any general acceptance of the claims presented in the book (eighty or more times) that "the Lord spake unto Moses" or that "Moses wrote their goings out. . . ." (33:2). One must ask whether pious frauds inserted the words, "The Lord spake unto Moses," to give their literary work a ring of authority. W. F. Albright, the noted archaeologist, pointed out that pious fraud and pseudepigraphy were not common in the pre-Hellenistic Orient.

Indeed, the findings of modern archaeology have forced some scholars to change their attitude about the origin of much of the material in Numbers. Many competent modern archaeologists even depend on the geographical references in the Pentateuch to guide them in their work. As recently as 1959, Nelson Glueck, after many years of fruitful discovery in Bible lands, speaking of the amazing "historical memory" of the Bible, said, "It may be stated categorically that no archaeological discovery has ever controverted a Biblical reference" (Rivers in the Desert, p. 31).

The Book of Numbers, along with other books of the Pentateuch, has long posed difficult problems for scholars. But many of the problems have been resolved in the light of recently discovered additional data. For a good example see the comments accompanying Numbers 34:15. The critic's approach to the Scriptures is often negative and destructive, for he begins by ruling out the supernatural. We must come to the text of Numbers with a positive attitude and with faith in the validity of the supernatural. We may be critical of the text and be aware of difficulties in it without closing our minds to its true meaning. In matters involving the supernatural, we must look for the clearest meaning consistent with a historico-grammatical method of interpretation. When the Bible claims that there has been supernatural intervention, we must accept the claim on its own grounds. Where the Bible does not so state, we need not read anything supernatural into the text; for interposition of the supernatural is intended to be the unusual and not the common practice. Hence, what one thinks of the origin of Numbers depends on what philosophical presupposition he assumes. If his basic philosophy is naturalistic, he will conclude that such a supernaturalistic book must be fraudulent and fanciful. But if one believes that the Supreme Being may intervene in the course of human events, he does not find it difficult to view the deliverance of Israel from Egypt as supernatural.

We must recognize, however, that there was an economy of the supernatural. Moses was not always performing a miracle, nor did God dictate every word of the inspired text. The prophet undoubtedly made use of numerous scribes (cf. Num 11:16,25), which explains the use of the third person. God revealed directly to Moses some parts of the book, including the provisions for settlement in the land and the details of ceremonial procedure. But on the other hand, Moses and his scribes probably had access to documents and knew many oral traditions. The Spirit of God kept them from errors of fact, doctrine, or judgment. The account of Balaam and Balak (Num 22–24) is the only passage in the book which is not expressly attributed to Moses and in which Moses is not mentioned.

X. Marriage of heiresses. 36:1-13.

COMMENTARY

Part One. Israel in the Wilderness. 1:1—22:1.

I. First Census, in the Wilderness of Sinai. 1:1—4:49.

The setting of this scene is Sinai, some ten months after Israel arrived there (Ex 19:1). Only nineteen days were left before the cloud would be lifted from the Tabernacle and Israel would start for the Promised Land (Num 10:11). Since the people faced a barren wilderness and stiff enemy resistance, they needed a well-organized camp.

A. Census of Israel's Fighting Men. 1:1-54.

1. And the Lord spake unto Moses. This formula is used over eighty times in the Book of Numbers. It is necessary to assume that the writer of these words was a fraud if this writing did not originate with Moses. The second month, in the second year. This was exactly one month after the Tabernacle was set up (Ex 40:1,17). Numbers 7:1 and 9:1,15 refer to the first day of the first month, antedating this opening verse by one month. The priests and the Tabernacle were consecrated in this one month (Ex 40; Lev 8); the princes brought their gifts in this month (Num 7); and the first commemorative Passover took place then (9:1-14).

2. Take ye the sum of all the congregation. The Tabernacle, just completed, became the center of the camp. The army had to be organized and the whole camp arranged and ordered as a religio-civil and military organization; hence a census became a basic necessity. The word rō'sh, sum, commonly meaning "head," is rendered number in I Chr 12:23. Likewise polls refers to the actual counting of individuals or heads (gulgᵉlōt, "skulls").

3. From twenty years old and upward . . . able to go forth to war. This terminology, used fourteen times throughout the chapter, makes clear that the census had a military purpose. The nonmilitary Levites were to have a separate census (1:47-49; 3:14-51).

5. And these are the names of the men. Attempts to show that the list (vv. 5-15) is "unhistorical" cannot be supported by factual data. Abundant use of the divine name 'ēl (Eliab, Pagiel, etc.) by no means indicates late authorship (ICC, Numbers, pp. 6,7), for the name is freely used in personal names in the Ugaritic texts of about 1400 B.C. Also the compound Shaddāy (as in Zurishaddai, v. 6) appears in a personal name on a figurine from the late fourteenth century (Wm. F. Albright, The Biblical Period, p. 7).

18. Declared their pedigrees. To the Semitic mind, knowledge of one's genealogy is more important than knowledge of one's birthday or age. Hence we have the long genealogies of the Bible, which were used, eventually, to trace the descent of Messiah through Abraham, Judah, and David, in accordance with the promises of God. 19. So he numbered them. This verb pāqad has a wide area of meaning. Here it means "to pass in review," or "muster," and in this sense, "to number." The much repeated phrases, by their generations, after their families, by the house of their fathers (v. 20) indicate what we mean by saying, "by household," "by clans," and "by whole tribes."

46. Six hundred thousand and three thousand and five hundred and fifty. These were the army only, for there were two conditions governing the numbering—the men included were to be over twenty, and they must be able to go forth to war. It has been estimated that from two to three million people—including Levites, aged persons, children, and women—comprised the camp. Scholars unable to accept the supernatural elements of God's dealings with his ancient people claim that five thousand fighting men would be a more reasonable number to expect, and explain this numbering as a misplaced census of a later time. Some say it was David's census of II Sam 24. But there the number of fighting men of Judah alone is 500,000 (II Sam 24:9), while here Judah had only 74,000. In II Sam 24 the term for a soldier is 'ish ḥayl, "man of might"; in Numbers it is kōl yōṣē' ṣābā', "everyone who goes out with the host."

George E. Mendenhall, in a challenging study (JBL, March, 1958) views the census accounts in Numbers as authentic lists misunderstood by later generations. He points out that such lists appear commonly in early ancient cultures. From the Semitic world, census lists have been discovered from Mari, Ugarit, and Alalakh, ranging in date from the Patriarchal Age to shortly before the time of Moses. The word 'elep, commonly meaning a thousand, is taken by Mendenhall to mean a tribal unit, probably nonmilitary and comprising far fewer than a thousand men. For example, when the Hebrew lists 46,500 men for Reuben, this would mean forty-six tribal units but only five hundred fighting men. Hence there were 558 such units and 5,550 fighting men. The difficulty with this view is that Num 2:32 gives a total which assumes that 'elep means "a thousand." But Mendenhall believes that the post-Exilic priests who composed Numbers forced the word to mean "a thousand," not knowing the earlier meaning. Mendenhall correctly observes, in connection with Jud 6:15, that Gideon did consider his thousand ('elep) to be weak (i.e., not up to full strength), a characteristic of many military units. But then he is forced to regard Ex 18:25 as a spurious verse, because it says, "Moses chose able men . . . and made them . . . rulers of thousands ('alapîm), rulers of hundreds, rulers of fifties, and rulers of tens." The present writer believes evidence shows that the term 'elep designated a military unit (Num 1:16; 31:5,14), but eventually came also to mean a tribal unit of indeterminate number (I Sam 23:23; Mic 5:2). For two to three million people to be sustained in a desert required supernatural intervention. The purpose of the Book of Numbers is to tell us that this is what happened.

B. Arrangement of the Camp. 2:1-34. The order of the march and the arrangement of the camp around the Tabernacle are specified in this chapter.

2. Every man . . . shall pitch by his own standard ("banner"). There were four such banners, marking the four basic encampments about the Tabernacle (vv. 3,10,18,25). There were also other banners marking families, referred to here as the ensign of their father's house. Far off . . . shall they pitch. Only the Levites and priests encamped beside the Tabernacle. "The stranger that cometh nigh shall be put to death" (3:10,38). The Tabernacle had to be kept pure from the ceremonial contaminations associated with the daily living of the people. 17. Then the tabernacle . . . shall set forward. Half of the tribes marched before it and half behind; and when they encamped, the Tabernacle, with its priests and Levites, was in the middle. When the priests and Levites set forward, everyone followed suit and was expected to be in his place, literally, on hand, by his banner.

34. Israel did . . . all that the Lord commanded. The people obeyed all that God commanded, a marked contrast with the frequent disobedience recorded in this book.

C. Priestly Function of Aaron's Sons. 3:1-4.

1. These also are the generations. This Hebrew idiom is used in Gen 2:4 as a way of introducing the account of creation. This is a transition verse and may be translated: "And this is the story of Moses and Aaron when God spake to Moses on Mount Sinai." 3. Whom he consecrated. The Hebrew figure of speech translated, literally, to fill one's hand, is used to express consecration to a sacred office. The basic idea is not the call to the office but the installation or filling of the office by the one consecrated. 4. Ministered . . . in the sight of Aaron. Practicing their priestly duties before their father enabled them to learn how to please God in a myriad of ceremonial details that took time and careful practice.

D. Charge and Census of Levites. 3:5-39. Since all first-born sons of Israel were saved from the death angel in Egypt, God declared them hallowed for service in the Tabernacle. Subsequently, however, he provided the Levites to serve in their place. The Levitical branches of Gershon, Kohath, and Merari, having specific duties in the Tabernacle, were encamped adjacent to its three sides. Moses, Aaron, and Aaron's sons camped on the east side of the Tabernacle, in front of the sanctuary. When it was discovered that there were 273 more first-born males than Levites to take their places, the surplus men were redeemed from service by the payment of five shekels of redemption silver apiece.

9. Wholly given unto him. The term n'tûnim, "given ones," is repeated for emphasis; hence the translation, wholly given. The same root is used later to describe the foreign slaves given to the Levites, who were to perform the most menial of the temple duties (Nethinims, I Chr 9:2).

12. I have taken the Levites from among the children of Israel. A separated group, dedicated to serve God through service in the holy Tabernacle, which others were forbidden to approach, on pain of death (1:53; 2:2; 3:10). Instead of all the firstborn (cf. v. 41). The preposition taḥat, instead of, is used often in the OT to express "substitution" (Gen 22:13). The idea of "substitutionary atonement" was a truth long familiar to the Israelites, and was meant by God to prepare them and others for the great First-born among many brethren, the Lord Jesus Christ (Mk 10:45). 13. Mine shall they be. The point here is not the future tense but the possession of the first-born by the Lord, who redeemed them. The point is made twice again, in verse 41 and in verse 45. The Lord was saying, "They belong to me."

25. The charge of . . . Gershon in the tabernacle . . . shall be the tabernacle, and (even) the tent. The tabernacle of an appointed time and place ('ōhel mô'ēd) is reserved as a designation for the entire complex where God alone dwelt and met with his people. The sons of Gershon were in charge of the 'ōhel, the tent, signifying the actual curtains that formed the enclosure.

28. Eight thousand and six hundred. A discrepancy arises when we add together the totals of the three families of Levites. There are three hundred more than the 22,000 given in verse 39. Probably some scribe, by mistake, omitted one letter; instead of writing three (sh-l-sh) hundred, he wrote six (sh-sh) hundred.

38. Keeping the charge of the sanctuary for the charge of the children of Israel. Better, preserving the function (mīshmeret) of the sanctuary for the safe-guarding of (mīshmeret; I Sam 22:23*) the children of Israel.*

E. Census of First-born Males. 3:40-51.

41. And the cattle of the Levites instead of all the firstlings among the cattle of the children of Israel. The first-born cattle of Israel were saved during the Passover in Egypt (Ex 12:29,32); so now the first-born cattle were dedicated to the Lord. The redemption of cattle (Ex 34:20) and the assignment of moral responsibility to cattle (Ex 21:28,29) are not unknown in the Bible. In Jonah 3:7,8; 4:11, it is recorded that God spared the cattle along with the people of Nineveh who repented (cf. Hos 5:6). Among some ancient Semitic peoples (Ugarit), domestic animals were included in census figures as members of the community. While the Hebrews shared this cultural peculiarity, their law strongly opposed the sinful conduct to which such familiarity with animals led the heathen (Lev 18:23,24). In the Hittite Law Code bestiality was permitted with certain animals.

47. The shekel of the sanctuary. The shekel was not a piece of money but a measure of weight. The necessity for standards or official measures of weight is reflected here. Such standard weights bore an official inscription. In a theocratic society the sanctuary provides the standard (cf. Gen 23:16). 49. The redemption money. Here and in verse 48 money for kesep, "silver," is not a clear translation. Since coinage was not invented until the sixth century B.C., the commodity silver was an early measure of value; hence it is used to express the Old Testament teaching about atonement. There was atonement silver (kesep hakkippūrîm), as in Ex 30:16, and ransom silver (kesep happīdyôm), as in this verse. The greatest measure of value is life itself; therefore the offering of blood, not silver, was the most impressive lesson of man's spiritual indebtedness to God (Lev 17:11).

F. Census of Levitical Working Force, and Their Duties. 4:1-49. On pain of death no one but Aaron and his sons was allowed to see or touch the sacred implements within the sanctuary (vv. 15,19,20). Instructions for proper handling of these most holy things, and for covering them (v. 4) are here given. The family of Moses and Aaron (26:58,59), the Kohathites, were commissioned to carry them, under the direction of Aaron's son, Eleazar (v. 16). The remaining Levitical families were given the less honorable service of caring for the hangings (Gershonites) and the bars and pillars (Merarites). This work was put under the priestly supervision of Aaron's other son, Ithamar. Levites thirty to fifty years old, the actual working force (v. 3), were numbered and found to total 8,580.

4. The most holy things (qōdesh haqqādāshîm). The phrase is used to describe the most holy place (Ex 26:34) within the "veil of separation" (pārōket hammāsāk), but it is also used for the things of the entire sanctuary.

5. Aaron . . . and his sons . . . shall take down the covering veil. This is the "veil of separation" between the two parts of the Tabernacle—the holy place and the most holy, where the ark of the covenant was kept (Ex 26:31-34).

6. Put thereon . . . badgers' skins. The ASV uses sealskin, following an Arabic root similar to the Hebrew taḥash. An Egyptian cognate root suggests that this refers to a process like tanning rather than to the skin of a special animal. For protection from the elements, these coverings were customarily used over everything. However, it is to be noted that the ark was to have the blue ("violet") cloth placed over the skins, not under as with the other holy things (vv. 7-10). By such means the ark could be distinguished in the march (cf. 10:33). Put in the staves. Literally, its in-the-hands (baddāyw). Better rendered, "Set its handles," or "carrying poles."

7. The table of showbread. The table of the Presence, i.e., the presence of the Lord. And covers to cover. These q'śôt hannāsek were sacrificial bowls out of which drink offerings were poured. The continual bread. Also called the bread of the Presence ("showbread"; Ex 25:30), since it was continually kept spread out before the Lord upon the table.

8. A cloth of scarlet. The term tôla 'at shānî indicates the insect or weevil from which the scarlet color was obtained. Another dye, as in a cloth of blue (t'kēlet, "violet"; v. 9) was obtained from a species of shellfish found on the seashores surrounding the Sinai peninsula. Dyeing was a common practice of the Canaanites in the sixteenth century B.C. (W. F. Albright, Archaeology of Palestine, p. 96).

20. They shall not go in to see . . . lest they die. In verse 15 the Levitical bearers were warned not to touch any holy thing on pain of death. In verses 17-20 the Lord again warned that the Kohathites could be cut off "from among the Levites" if they became careless handlers of the most holy things. Should they dare even to look for a moment (k'balla'=like the time it takes to swallow), they would die.

23. To perform the service. The Hebrew root ṣābā' is usually reserved for serving in the army, as in 1:3,30. God is often called the Lord of Sabaoth ("hosts"). By this religious army (see also 1:3) we are reminded of spiritual service in the Church Militant.

37,45,49. According to the commandment of the Lord by the hand of Moses. The word commandment is translated "word" in verse 45 and "appointment" in verse 27. It is literally mouth (peh). This and the use of the word hand (yad) provide a fruitful insight. The mouth bespeaks the seat of authority and the hand the means to implement authority. So then the laws were according to God's mouth but by Moses' hand. With delegated authority (by the mouth, appointment; v. 27) Ithamar bore the responsibility for administering (under his hand, vv. 28,33) the service of the sons of Gershon and Merari. Again we are reminded that the Hebrew idiom for "to consecrate" is to fill one's hand (3:3).

II. First Priestly Scroll. 5:1–10:10.

Laws about keeping the Passover are dated one month prior to Num 1:1 (see 9:1). This is understandable when we realize that although an over-all chronological order was observed, the materials were arranged and kept together by topics. It is reasonable to assume that the original writings were on scrolls of vellum or papyrus. We have had a census scroll, and now we turn to a scroll in which are gathered additional ceremonial and other hieratic details.

A. Separation of the Unclean. 5:1-4.

2. Put out . . . every leper, and every one that hath an issue, and whosoever is defiled by the dead. According to the directions given here, these three types of unclean persons were to be put outside the camp. But in the three passages dealing more fully with their several defilements (Lev 13; 15; Num 19) only lepers had to be expelled from the camp (Lev 13:46). According to Leviticus 13, a person was not put outside the camp until it was established that he had a real and permanent case of leprosy. As for "one having an issue," Num 5:2 might likewise mean a permanent or long-sustained issue, necessitating expulsion from the camp, while Lev 15 deals only with the temporary type of issue. The third Hebrew idiom refers to "anyone who is unclean because of a person" (nepesh), which is usually the expression for defilement by reason of a corpse (Num 9:10; 19:11). This kind of uncleanness did not normally require expulsion from the camp. But, according to 19:20, if the unclean one failed to be properly cleansed, he was to be cut off from the congregation. In short, the three types of uncleanness mentioned here refer to extreme cases in which expulsion from the camp was the only way of preserving the ceremonial purity of the congregation.

B. Compensation for Offenses, and Priestly Honorarium. 5:5-10.

7. He shall recompense his trespass. Hebrew 'āshām, here trespass, is the key word of this passage. The term is expressive of an offense for which compensation can be made. These sins are against men, in contrast with sins against God alone. Therefore the AV, which says sin that men commit (Num 5:6) should read sins against man. This sin, like that dealt with in Lev 5:16, required complete restitution, plus one-fifth the value of the thing compensated for. 8. The ram of the atonement. The means by which a man's guilt was expiated ("cleansed") and hence God's anger against the sinner propitiated ("rendered favorable"). In Lev 5:16 this ram is called "the ram of the trespass offering," which stresses man's offense ("trespass"); while here in Numbers "ram of atonement" stresses God's alienation.

10. It shall be his. If the person to be repaid was deceased and there was no kinsman-redeemer (gō'ēl) to receive his recompense, then it was to go to the priest. Verses 9 and 10 make clear that each priest was the sole possessor of whatever he received in this way (Lev 10:12-15).

C. A Trial of Jealousy. 5:11-31. When a wife was suspected by her husband of adultery (there being no witnesses) and she maintained her innocence, she was to be brought to the priest and made to stand before the Lord, who alone could determine her innocence or guilt. The priest was to make her take an oath of innocence and to subject her to an ordeal—the drinking of bitter curse-bringing water made with dust from the floor of the Tabernacle. Her guilt would be determined by certain effects manifested in her body. If there were no telltale effects, she was innocent and was to return to her husband to bear children. A notable example of ordeal for a suspect wife is recorded in Hammurabi's Code (pars. 131,132. ANET, p. 171). We need not assume, with certain 'liberal' scholars, that this "custom of ordeal" among the Hebrews goes back to the remotest period of their history (ICC, p. 46), as if this were a carry-over from pagan beginnings. Nor need we go to the other extreme and ignore the fact that parallels to some Biblical laws have been found in the jurisprudence of certain ancient Semitic peoples (ANET, pp. 163-188). Just as God chose the practice of circumcision, already widely used by pagan peoples (e.g., Canaanites and Egyptians), as an ordinance for his people, so the fact that the Torah was divinely inspired need not rule out Moses' knowledge of his times.

In reality, even pagan ordeal trials had psychological validity, and the principle underlying them is still used in modern crime detection (e.g., the lie-detector). Though the results of the pagan trials were only partially valid, could not similar technique be employed with perfectly valid results under the sovereign providence of the Lord? "This law prescribed no ordeal whose effects were uncertain like the ordeals of other nations, but a judgment of God, from which the guilty could not escape, because it had been appointed by the living God" (KD, in loco). It should be added that there was nothing inherent in the dust to cause judgment. Supernatural intervention had to occur in any case.

12. If any man's wife go aside, and commit a trespass against him. Biblical laws express serious condemnation of adultery, in contrast with the lax attitude of Israel's neighbors and their immoral practices (G. E. Wright, Biblical Archaeology, pp. 111-119). Strange as this law may seem to us, it helped produce a high level of marital purity in Israel (Lev 20:10).

15. Ephah of barley meal . . . no oil . . . nor put frankincense thereon. Nowhere but here is barley prescribed for a meal offering. Usually fine meal (sōlet) was required along with oil and frankincense. The reason for the difference seems to be that the usual meal offering, unlike this one, was a joyous offering, often of the first fruits. The only other dry meal offering was the poor man's sin offering (Lev 5:11). In both cases the dry barley meal bespeaks a sinful and humiliating circumstance. An offering of memorial, bringing iniquity to remembrance. The term remembrance (zikkārôn) actually explains the purpose of this whole unusual procedure. It was not to remind God (ICC, p. 51) but to bring into the open ("make known") whether or not there was a basis for this jealousy. 17. Holy water in an earthen vessel. Earthen so that it could be broken after the ceremony (Lev 6:28). Water taken from the laver was holy; but since everything in the Tabernacle was holy, the water was rendered impressively more so by the addition of sacred dust. 18. Set the woman before the Lord. The Lord alone could solve this mystery. For emphasis this is repeated from verse 16. Uncover the woman's head. The word pāra' means "to unbind the hair," not uncover the head. As one under suspicion, she was deprived of this sign of dignity; her hair was unbound.

23. The priest shall write these curses in a book. This incidental acknowledgment of the use of pen, or brush, and ink fits well for a people who had lived for generations in Egypt, where the scribe's brush had been in constant use since early in the third millennium B.C. Shall blot. For the meaning of this blotting of the curse, see verse 24. 24. He shall cause the woman to drink. This verse anticipates the actual drinking after the priest received the offering (v. 26), but does so because the drinking had to be closely associated with the important detail of "blotting," in verse 23. By this act the very words of the curse were symbolically transferred to the bitter water.

27. Her belly shall swell, and her thigh shall rot. Or, Her body shall swell, and her thigh shall fall away (ASV). Though the ASV translation is preferable to that of the AV, it still leaves a question as to what this means. It is obvious that the swelling body may refer to pregnancy. The ICC suggests that the falling thigh means a premature birth (p. 48). The same root nepel, "a falling," is rendered untimely birth in Job 3:16; Ps 58:8,9; Eccl 6:3. Thigh or loin (yārēk) is used similarly as the seat of procreative power, in Gen 46:26 (and elsewhere): "Those that come out of his thigh" (or "loins"). So her thigh shall fall could mean "she will give birth." That nāpal, "fall," can mean "born" is clear from its usage in Isa 26:18 (ASV, note 17). We would translate this phrase as follows, "Her body shall swell and she shall give birth (or give an untimely birth), and that woman shall become a curse in the midst of her people."

The guilty woman, then, was not made to die, which would have been unjust, since the guilty man went free. However, illegitimate children were not allowed to become a burden to the camp because of God's supernatural intervention in instances like this (cf. Deut 23:2). There is no evidence that this law was practiced at any time except during the period of Moses' leadership.

D. Law of the Nazarite. 6:1-21. God desired that his people should become a "kingdom of priests and an holy nation" (Ex 19:6). Becoming a Nazarite was a step any Israelite man or woman could take toward attaining this ideal. Such a one thereby entered into a condition of life consecrated to God and free from contamination. The high priest, of course, was similarly set apart and purified (Lev 21:10-12). But his condition of life was based on his hereditary office. The vow of the Nazarite was usually undertaken spontaneously, and only for a period of time. The term nāzîr means "to separate," and always in this context it means to separate unto the Lord. Two distinct phases of this consecration are set forth here. The first is introduced in Num 6:3, where the devotee is told to separate himself by a certain practice of self-denial. The second phase, prescribed in 6:13-21, is called properly, "the law of the Nazarite." This phase, to be performed at the end of the period of separation, called for an elaborate series of offerings.

A Nazarite was to abstain not only from intoxicants but also from everything that came from the vine (v. 4). Hosea 3:1 (ASV) informs us that raisin (grape) cakes were a feature of luxurious living. I Samuel 25:18,36 tells of the abundant raisins at the home of Nabal, a rich and sensual man. In the spirit of self-denial, luxurious living was to be shunned by a Nazarite. The consecration of a Nazarite, however, was to be most completely symbolized by his wearing his hair uncut (Num 6:5). The Nazarite Samson's hair was a symbol of strength and virility dedicated to God; but when the strong man despised this dedication, he lost his gift of grace. Though such strength was not granted to all Nazarites, all were required, as Samson was, to devote all that they had to the Lord. This is shown by the provision made for Nazarites to vow large gifts as offerings (v. 21).

It was because the Nazarite's hair (nēzer, "crown") was consecrated that he had to avoid defilement by the dead. If he became defiled, he was to shave off the defiled hair and start his vow over (v. 12). As a lamb or goat brought for an offering had to be pure, so this "hair offering" had to be pure, for the Nazarite's hair was to become a burnt offering unto the Lord. Hair is representative of life itself, for only a living man produces hair. He offered it, therefore, in place of his own body, as a sign that he himself was a "living sacrifice, holy and well-pleasing to God." It is understandable why Paul (Acts 18:18; 21:24) and James, the elder at Jerusalem (Eusebius Ecclesiastical History ii.23), seeing deep spiritual significance in the ancient law of the Nazarite, took Nazarite vows.

The second phase of the law of the Nazarite began at the completion of "the days of his consecration" (Num 6:13). He was to make a sin offering for all his unknown sins, then a burnt offering and a peace offering to symbolize his surrender and worship. At the climax of these ceremonies the devotee was to have his head shaved, and the consecrated hair was to be placed on the coals under the peace offering (vv. 18-20).

2. Shall separate . . . to vow a vow of a Nazarite. The first verb here (pālā') means "to do something extraordinary or wonderful" (cf. the same root in an epithet of Messiah in Isa 9:6). Here and elsewhere (Lev 22:21; 27:2; Num 15:3,8) it is used to express the difficult thing of making a solemn vow. The ASV special vow is an attempt to show this distinction. Allowance was made also for the devotee to offer something voluntarily, beyond this required minimum (v. 21). 7. The consecration of his God is upon his head. Nezer denotes not merely "consecration" but consecration having to do with the "head," whether a consecrated crown (Ex 29:6; Zech 6:11) or the anointed hair of the high priest (Lev 21:12), or, as here, the "consecrated hair" of the Nazarite (cf. Num 6:19, where the AV inserts the words, "the hair of"). Instead of his separation unto God (ASV), read "the consecrated hair of (belonging to) his God is (still) upon his head." 13. Be brought unto the door. There was no reason why a Nazarite had to "be brought." The grammatical construction of the Hebrew here is unusual; but since there is no reflexive form of this verb, the clause may mean, "He shall bring himself."

21. Besides that that his hand shall get; i.e., the special offerings a Nazarite might vow in addition to what was specified in this law. While this refers to what a man might be able to add to his offering, the same terminology is used for the contribution of the poor man whose hand could not acquire a prescribed offering (Lev 5:11). According to the vow which he vowed, so he must do. That is, according to what he promised, he must do. Sometimes another person paid for a Nazarite's vow, as seems to be the case in Acts 21:24.

E. The Priests' Blessing. 6:22-27. This is a beautiful benediction, in the style of excellent Semitic poetry and filled with a message much needed by those facing the uncertainties and hostile forces of wilderness living. It tells of God's goodness in caring for and protecting his people. When an individual or a nation becomes an object of God's favor, distress, famine, peril, or sword only serve to prove how much the Lord loves his own children and how well able he is to deliver them.

23. Bless . . . Israel, saying unto them. The grammar of this sentence has been objected to. However, the famous grammarian, Gesenius, said that the form in question does occur "in the later books of the Old Testament, especially" (Lexicon, par. 113). We now know that Ugaritic texts (c. 1400 B.C.) confirm the construction as an old and much-to-be-expected idiom. 24. The Lord bless thee, and keep thee. On the one hand God provides all good things for his chosen ones; on the other, he keeps, guards, and protects them from the enemy who would deprive them of good. 25. Make his face shine. A typical Hebrew expression. When a man's face shines (Prov 16:15), he is filled with happiness; but when his face gathers blackness, it is evident that evil and despair have gripped his soul (Joel 2:6). 26. And give thee peace. Shālôm ("peace") is a comprehensive word, including the concepts of completeness, security, health, tranquillity, contentment, friendship, and peace with God and man.

F. Offerings of the Tribal Princes. 7:1-89. After the entire Tabernacle ('ōhel mô'ēd) was set up, anointed, and sanctified (see Ex 40:17), the head princes (cf. Num 1:5-16) brought offerings necessary for transporting the Tabernacle. They presented six wagons and twelve oxen to the sons of Gershon (4:24-26) and Merari (4:31,32). (Since the sons of Kohath were forbidden to carry the most holy things on wagons, they suspended them from poles, which they bore on their shoulders). Furthermore, on twelve separate days, the chief princes, each on his own day, brought stores of identical offerings for the dedication of the altar (vv. 11,88). The last verse of this chapter reveals that God communicated with Moses by a voice from above the mercy seat, between the cherubim (cf. Ex 25:22).

1. On the day that Moses had fully set up. This was not a specific day. The meaning is simply that after Moses had completed setting up and anointing, etc., then the princes offered their offerings (see v. 88). 3. Six covered wagons. The rare Hebrew word used here for wagons is cognate with Akkadian subbu, meaning "a cart or litter." The word itself does not specify whether the carts were covered or open.

10. For dedicating of the altar. Critics have insisted on applying this phrase to the Maccabean period, during which the Feast of Dedication originated. They claim that ḥănukkâ ("dedication") is a late word. But even they admit (ICC, p. 76) that the root of this word is old, as is seen from its use in the name Enoch (ḥănōk; Gen 4:17; 25:4; 46:9) and in the word for Abraham's experienced men (ḥănîk; Gen 14:14). Though the word is rare, the Bible shows that it was widely used. King David held a ḥănukkâ for his palace, according to the title of Psalm 30. Solomon, similarly, dedicated the altar of the Temple (II Chr 7:9). Nehemiah dedicated the wall of Jerusalem (Neh 12:27). And Judas the Maccabee rededicated the Temple after its desecration (I Macc 4:52). In every case the same Hebrew word is used. It is likely that Judas Maccabeus had knowledge of a long ḥănukkâ tradition, for his was not a day of innovation.

12. Nahshon . . . of the tribe of Judah. The order in which the princes came, unlike that in Numbers 1, was according to the line of march (ch. 2). 14. One spoon of . . . gold. A gold saucer (not spoon) filled with incense fits well with the description of the altar of incense in Ex 30:1-10 (cf. Rev 8:3,4).

88. After that it was anointed. A phrase similar to this in 7:10,84—"in the day when it was anointed"—evidently has no reference to a particular day (7:1), but is simply a temporal clause. This verse (88) makes it clear that the dedication of the altar took place sometime following the anointing recorded in Lev 8:11.

89. He heard the voice of one speaking unto him. Moses received divine revelation by conversing with God. A rare use of a Hebrew stem, here, gives a reciprocal meaning, "to converse," to the verb "to speak" (KB, p. 200). The same usage is employed to show that Ezekiel was on speaking terms with God (Ezk 2:1; 43:6; cf. II Sam 14:13). In Mal 3:16 a related verb is used in such a way as to mean "to speak with one another." Thus, "When Moses came in . . . to speak with (God), then he heard the voice making conversation with him from above the mercy seat."

G. The Golden Lampstand. 8:1-4. The details about the lampstand are given elsewhere: in Ex 25:31-40, where it is planned; in Ex 37:17-24, where it is made; in Ex 40:24, 25, where it is actually set up; and in Lev 24:2, where expensive olive oil is prescribed for it. Here in Num 8, we find it in use, shedding its ceremonially sacred light before the Lord continually (cf. Jn 8:12).

7. The seven lamps. Joseph P. Free, in his excavations at Dothan, found a seven-lipped ceramic lamp from early strata, which tends to refute the notion entertained by some scholars that such a lamp was unknown in the time of Moses. 3. He lighted the lamps thereof over against the candlestick. It is not necessary to add the words "to give light" (ASV; RSV). Translate 8:2,3: "When you set up the lamps on the front of the lampstand, the seven lamps will shine . . . . And Aaron did this; on the front of the lampstand he set up its lamps . . . . "

H. Consecration of Levites, and Their Retirement. 8:5-26. The Levites were to wash their garments and shave their skin, to be sprinkled with holy water, to bring appropriate offerings and gather before the Tabernacle, together with all the congregation. At this time Aaron offered the Levites as living sacrifices (wave offerings) in place of the firstborn, whom the Lord, at the time of the Passover in Egypt, purchased to himself for service. Hence the Levites were to be "given ones," wholly dedicated to the service of the sanctuary. Their assigned position, in the immediate vicinity of the Tabernacle and surrounding it, served to guard against violation of the sacred precincts by secular Israelites (v. 19). At age fifty the Levites retired from manual service, which was their main occupation. But they continued to minister in some capacity, perhaps as instructors of the young and in other less strenuous duties.

7. Sprinkle water of purifying. This is called sin-water (mê ḥaṭṭā't). As the sin offering was an offering for sin, so this water was for the cleansing of sin. It may be that this water should be identified with the "water of separation" made by use of the ashes of a red heifer and also called ḥaṭṭā't, "for sin" (Num 19). Shave all their flesh. Since the Hebrew language has another word meaning "to shave bald" (6:9,18), some commentators feel that this means only "to trim the hair" (KD, p. 47). But the command reads, "Let them cause a razor to pass over all their flesh." Certainly this must mean that they were to remove all (ceremonially defiled), hair, just as washing was to remove defilement from their clothes and the sprinkling of the "sin water" was to purify their bodies. This ceremonial cleansing not only foreshadowed Christ's spiritual cleansing of the Church (Eph 5:25,26), but also involved the essential element of obedience to God's Word, by which Christ would accomplish the cleansing.

10. The children of Israel shall put their hands upon the Levites. This was done, no doubt, in some representative way, though it is possible that each first-born son actually laid his hand upon one of the Levites. By this act the truth was conveyed pictorially that these Levites were substitutes for the first-born in the service of the sanctuary. The early church continued such well-known practices as the laying on of hands (Acts 6:6; I Tim 4:14).

11. Aaron shall offer (i.e., wave) the Levites . . . for an offering. In view of the difficulty of determining how the Levites could be "waved" before the Lord, the AV has omitted the full significance of the verb and noun. How thousands of Levites could be waved as a wave offering is only hinted at in verse 13. This technicality, however, is far less important than the meaning of the offering. Some feel that the word may have lost its original significance, so that it now meant simply to offer (Ex 35:22). It seems more likely that the term had a specialized meaning, whether or not the physical procedure of waving was always carried out. It was a "rite in which originally the priest lifted his share of offering and waved it, i.e., moved it toward the altar and back, in token of its presentation to God and its return by him to the priest (BDB, p. 632). Thus the ceremony demonstrated that the Levites belonged to the Lord but were given back to Aaron to minister as living sacrifices in the Tabernacle.

12. The Levites shall lay their hands upon the heads of the bullocks. Again the principle of substitution is the lesson taught. By the substitution of an innocent victim, expiation (atonement) was made for ("in behalf of") the Levites. 14. Separate the Levites . . . the Levites shall be mine. God demands separation of the clean from the unclean, of his people from the heathen and their practices. Here is a truth found in the very warp and woof of Old Testament and New Testament teaching but often neglected by the church. God is holy, and his people are holy, for they belong to him; he therefore makes a division between them and others (Lev 20:26). So Christ came to call men to holiness and thereby make a distinction among people, so that a man's foes may be even those of his own household (Mt 10:34-36).

19. I have given the Levites as a gift. Note the sequence: "I have taken the Levites" (v. 18); "I have given the Levites." The very sequence fulfills the purpose of a *t*ᵉ*nûpâ*, "wave offering". God took and gave back to Aaron these living sacrifices as "given ones." The church likewise speaks of those whom God has "given" to it (cf. Eph 4:11,12), not as its priests but as its ministers, because theirs is the "work of serving, unto the building up of the body of Christ." To do the service of the children of Israel . . . to make an atonement . . . that there be no plague. There was only one Servant par excellence who "came not to be ministered unto, but to minister, and to give his life a ransom for many" (Mk 10:45). These servants, like him, were substitutes, taking the place of the children of Israel, by their service making an atonement, providing the ransom that brought deliverance from the wrath of God. 21. Levites were purified. As the "sin water" (v. 7) and the sin offering were designed to remove sin, this verb from the same root ḥaṭā' means to de-sin oneself, or better, "to do the things necessary for ceremonial cleansing."

24. From twenty and five years old and upward. This does not agree with 4:35 (and other verses), where the numbering is from thirty years old. Such an obvious difference does not seem to be a textual error. The exacting work of "warring this warfare" (ASV, marg.), in which the mistakes of untrained hands could result in death (II Sam 6:6,7), may well have called for a five-year apprenticeship.

I. First Commemorative and First Supplementary Passover. 9:1-14. The original Passover was observed when Israel came out of Egypt, in the first month, the month of freshly ripened barley ('ābîb). Now the people celebrated the first Passover (pesaḥ) in remembrance of that event, beginning on the fourteenth day of the first month of the second year. The purpose of this section is not to tell about the Passover, but to tell about a provision made for those who were unable to keep the Passover. Hence the section is inserted here, for the keeping of this supplementary Passover began on the fourteenth day of the second month, a month and a half after the opening date of the book. Faithful Israelites who had to isolate themselves seven days because they were defiled by the dead or who were on a journey during the keeping of regular Passover petitioned Moses that they be allowed to make this offering unto the Lord. Moses was instructed by God to make this allowance provided that all who kept the month-late Passover had legitimate reason. God further gave strict warning that any who neglected to keep the Passover in its appointed season should be cut off from the people. It was on the last day of this second-month Passover that the cloud began to rise from the Tabernacle and people began to prepare to journey (10:11).

1. The first month (Ex 12:2; 13:4; Deut 16:1). This month, the time of freshly ripened barley ('ābîb), was in the spring, as the Passover is and always has been. After the Exile (587 B.C.), the Israelites gradually adopted the Babylonian calendar, and they have used it since. Rō'sh Hashānâ (the present Jewish "New Year") is observed in the fall, following the Babylonian reckoning. While this historical fact is not conclusive, it helps refute the theory that most of Numbers was written by post-Exilic priests. Post-Exilic books of the Bible, like Ezra, Nehemiah, and Esther, show knowledge of the Babylonian calendar. In earlier times the Hebrews numbered their months, instead of naming them, and also used agricultural terms like 'ābîb, but no cultic terminology (cf. Gezer Calendar, BASOR 92; see also commentary notes on Num 32).

2. Appointed season. This is the same word as is used for the Tabernacle when it is called "the tent of the congregation," meaning the place where the people congregated according to God's instructions at an appointed time. It was around this ritual law of the Tabernacle that the people of Israel carried on their religious life. To break these laws of appointed times and places was paramount to a denial of the Lord and contempt for his revealed message. 3. At even. Literally, between the two evenings. Just as a 'dual' of the word "shine" (ṣāhar) refers to that high point of the sun we call noon or midday, so the dual of the word "evening" ('ereb) refers to that half light we call twilight. Proverbs 7:9 equates this time with twilight in contrast to the middle of the night.

6. The dead body of a man. A most interesting expression in the Hebrew, because the word often rendered "soul" by the AV has here the meaning "corpse." The word nepesh is most frequently used in conjunction with the animal functions of the body, the passions, and the appetites, rather than in reference to immaterial existence. In Genesis the animals (2:19), like man (2:7), are called nepesh ḥayâ, "living creatures (selves, lives)." And in Deut 12:23,24 nepesh is the life principle" that is in the blood (cf. also Prov 12:10; Ex 21:23). The word often stands for one's "self" or "person," and is usually associated with the body. This is true of Ps 16:10, where bodily resurrection—not spiritual immortality—is in view (cf. Acts 2:27-31). In the light of this it is not difficult to see how nepesh 'ādām, "the human self," comes to mean a "corpse."

12. Nor break any bone of it. Among the laws of the Passover stands this rather minor detail, which is also enjoined in Ex 12:46. The insignificance of this rule, which is nowhere else mentioned in the OT, gives force to its fulfillment as an evidence that the Christ of Calvary was truly the Passover Lamb of God, which takes away the sin of the world (Jn 19:36).

13. That man shall bear his sin. If he brought the offering of the Lord, that lamb would bear his sin; but if he neglected this offering, he would bear his own sin. Substitutionary atonement is in view, for God's appointed substitute must bear a man's sin if that man would remain an object of divine favor. 14. If a stranger . . . will keep the passover. Provision was always made for converts (proselytes), but all such had first to become Israelites through the ordinance of circumcision (Ex 12:48,49).

J. The Cloud over the Tabernacle. 9:15-23. The presence of the cloud was no new experience for the Israelites (Ex 13:21, 22). Now that the Tabernacle was erected, the cloud took its position above it. By the movements of the cloud the people were reminded that they were about to journey once again (Num 10:11, 12). (The translators of the LXX stumbled at the redundancy here and left out a few phrases. The repetitive style is not mere literary mannerism, but a way of emphasizing the importance of divine guidance.) To the Israelites the movement of the cloud was the commandment of the Lord. By it they would journey and by it they would encamp. Whether it rested overnight only, or two days, a month or a long time, they had only to rest or go with it, in unquestioning obedience to God. This, in a very short time, they miserably failed to do.

16. So it was always: the cloud covered it. Does this begin a narration of past events or instruction (v. 17) as to how the Israelites should act in the future? Since in Hebrew the tense of verbs is often obscure, let it suffice to say that the verbs of this passage describe a continuous situation. 20. And so it was, when the cloud was a few days upon the tabernacle. In keeping with the above interpretation, we would translate this verse as follows: "And sometimes the cloud might be but a few days upon the Tabernacle; according to the word of the Lord they would encamp, and then according to the word of the Lord they would journey." 22. Or a year. Both the AV and the ASV usually translate the Hebrew word for "days" as "a year." Genesis 24:55 shows that this word means a number of days, possibly ten; but usually it means more than a month.

K. The Two Silver Trumpets. 10:1-10. Israel's earlier experience with trumpets is recorded in Ex 19:16-20. There, words of both Canaanite and Phoenician derivation tell of the sound of the ram's horn trumpet that accompanied the terrifying thunders and lightnings on Mount Sinai. Now an entirely new kind of trumpet was prescribed. These ḥāṣôṣrōt were silver clarions, depicted in extra-Biblical sources as long straight tubes flared at the end. From this time on, the Hebrews used this particular instrument as a "statute forever," for sacred purposes only (e.g., Num 31:6; II Kgs 12:13; Ezr 3:10). Now God also commanded a variety of signal calls. Two trumpets were to blow together to gather the congregation to the door of the Tabernacle, and one trumpet was to blow for the princes only. Distinction is made in Scripture between merely blowing to gather the people and sounding a blast (alarm) to signal the breaking of camp. The priests were to go forth in battle blasting the trumpets so that Israel "might be remembered before the Lord their God." They also were henceforth to blow in conjunction with feasts, with new moons, and with burnt offerings and peace offerings. The Apostle Paul doubtless had the use of these instruments in mind when he made metaphorical reference to the trumpet in I Cor 14:8.

9. And ye shall be remembered before the Lord your God. Must the Lord be reminded to save his people? The answer is Yes and No. Israel did not conceive of him as a limited deity, whose interest was diverted to other things, or as a god who went to sleep and had to be aroused by the blast of the trumpets. Critics who hold this view appeal to Ps 44:22-24, and quote the words, "Awake, why sleepest Thou, O Lord?" But scrutiny of this psalm shows that it is a complaint to God, who knows the "secrets of the hearts" and who chastens his people. They are in trouble, and he seems to do nothing; hence the feeling of depression comes forth in hyperbolic language. For an account of the use of the trumpets in a time of distress, see II Chr 13:12-15. In battle the people "cried unto the Lord and the priests sounded with the trumpets." Indeed, the trumpets as an "ordinance forever" symbolized dependence on God. Similarly prayer, as a more articulate expression of that dependence, reminds God to bless his people.

III. From the Wilderness of Sinai to the Wilderness of Paran. 10:11–14:45.

Beginning on the twentieth day of the second month of the second year, the tribes set out from Sinai in the order indicated in earlier chapters, and with the cloud proceeding on to the Wilderness of Paran. Time elapsed is not given, but we know the events covered at least a number of months (forty days for the spies and several weeks or months for chapters 10–12). Their route took them by way of Taberah (11:3) and Kibroth-hattaavah (11:35) to Kadesh (13:26).

A. Departure from Sinai. 10:11-36. The order of the march (vv. 11-28), an invitation to Hobab (vv. 29-32), and the importance of the ark (vv. 33-36) constitute the several subjects relating to Israel's taking leave of Sinai.

12. Took their journeys. The Hebrew would be broke camp according to their stations (stages). They were following the procedure outlined in chapter 2. The cloud rested in the wilderness of Paran. The verse is a summary statement anticipating their arrival in Paran (cf. v. 33—"the ark . . . went before them . . . three days journey," etc.).

17. The sons of Gershon and . . . Merari set forward, bearing the tabernacle. A slight change from 2:17, where the Levites are said to have traveled in the midst of the host, following the tribes led by Reuben. Verse 21 clears up this point by informing us that the Kohathites, carrying the holy things, traveled in their regular place; while "the sons" of Merari and of Gershon went ahead to set up the Tabernacle and have it ready for the arrival of the holy things (see ASV, 10:21 b). We must remember that there were women, children, and those over fifty in the Levite camps besides the actual burden-bearers. It is likely that only the burden-bearers are meant in verse 17.

21. Bearing the sanctuary. The Kohathites were not bearing the sanctuary but the holy things used in it. The use of miqdāsh ("sanctuary") is not improper, for Numbers 18:29 b shows that the word can mean a holy part as well as a holy place, although the latter is indeed its usual meaning. Against they came. Against their coming (ASV). See comment under verse 17.

25. The rearward of all the camps (ASV). The rearward, rear guard or (even closer to Hebrew) gatherer (me'assēp), is a word bearing a tender connotation. As when a man gathers his neighbor's lost sheep into his own house to restore it, so the Lord gathers us up even when our mother or father forsakes us (Ps 27:10). Or when evil oppression brings on a captivity, the God of Israel not only goes before his people but becomes the "gatherer" ("rear guard") of the strays (Isa 52:12).

29. Hobab, the son of Raguel the Midianite. Moses' "in-laws" are called Midianites in Ex 2:16; 3:1; 18:1, but Kenites in Jud 1:16; 4:11. Both of these are nomadic people who lived adjacent to or even among each other. The term Kenite refers to the roving "smiths," especially coppersmiths from the copper-rich valley of the Arabah. Their presence among the people of Israel fits in with the making of the brazen serpent (Num 21:8,9) and the metal work of the Tabernacle. The intermarriages and long association of these two tribes might make it reasonable for Moses' brother-in-law, Hobab, to be called both Midianite and Kenite. These very Kenites who became a part of Israel continued to be called Kenites and Israelites (1 Chr 2:55). It is equally possible that the name Midianite became a generic term for the many camel-riding Bedouins east of the Arabah. The names Ishmaelite and Midianite are used interchangeably in Gen 37:27,28,36. We are also reminded of the camel-riding Midianites who fought Gideon, and the association of the name Midian with both the Edomites (Gen 25:4) and the Moabites (Gen 36:35; Num 22:3,7). Moses' father-in-law. Re'u'ēl, may have been the name of the grandfather of this family, or it may be another name for Jethro (cf. Ex 2:18; 3:1). The term hōtēn, "father-in-law," means any male relative by marriage, so that the words in Jud 4:11 might be translated, "Hobab, the brother-in-law." We will do thee good: for the Lord hath spoken good concerning Israel. When the Lord speaks, his word is his promise.

30. I will not go. Hobab was determined to return to his homeland; but Jud 1:16 informs us that Moses persuaded him to come, for it tells us there that he entered Canaan with Israel.

31. Thou knowest how we are to encamp . . . thou mayest be to us instead of eyes. The Jewish Targums and the LXX, interpolating here, represent Moses as pleading with Hobab to serve as guide to Israel, when God had already given a supernatural means of guidance. There is really nothing incongruous in Moses' request, for dependence on God for divine guidance and even for supernatural intervention does not obviate the use of human knowledge when it is available. Hobab knew the wilderness well and could help make both the journeying and the camping easier by pointing out the secrets of the desert.

33. The mount of the Lord. At Mount Sinai God revealed himself as a righteous Sovereign expressing the requirements of his holy will, as well as his wrath against all sin. Though the Mount of the Lord was now behind them, its message (the testimony) remained inscribed on the tablets of stone now kept in the ark. The ark of the covenant of the Lord. The ark is often called the ark of the testimony; here it is the ark of the covenant. In Ex 34:28 the covenant is identified with the Ten Commandments. The ark was the abiding place of the Lord and of the tablets of the Law. As such it was a symbol of divine purity. When the high priest approached the ark once a year, it then symbolized the covenant of mercy with a defiled people, who by means of the blood of atonement could be cleansed and so enjoy the benefits of God's favor on them and their children.

34. The cloud of the Lord. With the experience of the Mount of the Lord behind them and the ark before them searching out a resting place, the Israelites also had the sacred cloud over them as a symbol of God's presence. It not only guided but brought comfort and assurance, and possibly provided protection from the elements, especially from the fierce sun, by spreading itself over the entire camp, as is suggested in Ps 105:39 (KD, p. 62).

35. When the ark set forward . . . Moses said. Moses uttered this prayer on the first leg of the journey from Sinai. It became a classic prayer, used, it seems, each time the ark went out (cf. Ps 68:1; 132:8; II Chr 6:41,42). Moses also spoke for (in behalf of) the time of its resting (Num 10:36). The prayer eloquently teaches the effective working relationship between God and the Church Militant. He goes before her, and the gates of hell cannot prevail against her. He abides in her midst and she is strengthened and becomes a great host.

B. Taberah and Kibroth-hattaavah. 11:1-35. Refusing to be instructed by a minor chastisement at Taberah, the people of Israel allowed the rabble to set them to craving the meat and the succulent fruit and vegetables of Egypt. The anger of the Lord was kindled against them once again, and even Moses fell victim to a feeling of lonely responsibility for these spiritual delinquents. Moses asked the Lord to kill him outright rather than leave the entire burden of rebellious Israel on his shoulders. So God appointed seventy elders to help the prophet bear the burden and gave them the spirit of prophecy. When two elders, not of the seventy, were found exercising the gift of prophecy in the camp, Joshua asked Moses to stop them. This called forth Moses' magnanimous reply: "Would that all the people were prophets, that the Lord would put his spirit upon them." Israel's craving for flesh was satisfied when God sent flocks of quails to eat. Those that lusted ate their fill, and soon afterward a plague broke out among them.

1. And when the people complained. The Hebrew word translated when is not temporal. The as of the ASV better captures the force of the word. We would translate, "And the people became like murmurers over misfortune, in the ears of the Lord." The idea conveyed is that Israel had no real misfortune over which to complain but murmured, nevertheless, like those who are cursed with actual evil. The fire of the Lord burnt among them. Senseless ingratitude in the face of all God's goodness brought a necessary though minor chastisement in the extremities of the camp. They named the place Taberah, "burning," which burning may have been a natural phenomenon but was still "the fire of the Lord," sent by God to accomplish his purpose.

2. The people cried . . . Moses prayed . . . the fire was quenched (abated). In capsule form we have here the story of God's people for ages to come (cf. Ps 107). Israel failed to learn the lesson of cheerful obedience, and hence went on to harder chastisements as recorded in this and subsequent chapters.

4. The mixed multitude. A nondescript rabble had followed Israel out of Egypt (Ex 12:38). 5. Which we did eat in Egypt freely. The annual inundation of the Nile made Egypt seem like a garden to Bedouins who lived on the sterile desert. The fruits and vegetables mentioned are still common in modern Egypt and still called by the same Semitic names used in the text. 6. Our soul is dried away. Again the word for soul, nepesh, is the seat of animal appetites; it does not designate the spirit (see comment on 9:6). It is translated appetite in Prov 23:2 and Eccl 6:7. The people had been so long on a bland diet that they began to crave (lust for) food that would stimulate their salivary glands. Nothing at all, beside this manna. This is an exaggeration common to people carried away by self-pity and their animal appetites.

7. The colour of bdellium. Verses 7-9 are a digression on the manna itself. Careful comparison of this description with that in Ex 16:31-36 shows that the only real differences in the two accounts concern color and taste. These differences, far from pointing to different sources, show spontaneity and freedom on the part of the writer, which a redactor would obscure. Both sight and taste are so subjective that the manna could be called white and still be yellowish or pearl (bdellium); and it could taste like honey to one person and fresh oil to another.

12. As a nursing father. The prophet uses a figure here that does not accord well with modern Western ideas of the role of a great national leader. Moses is being neither humorous nor sarcastic with the Lord, but is reminding Him of His sovereignty, for He alone brought this nation into being and promised them a land. Therefore, the Lord alone must bear this baby and sustain it, as a wet nurse carries and feeds a suckling child. 14. I am not able to bear all this people alone. Moses' human frailty appears here and in the language of verse 15. His words are loaded with intense emotion, for he was at the end of his rope, and he felt that it would be an act of mercy for God to take his life.

16. Gather unto me seventy men . . . elders of Israel. These men became Moses' organizers and secretaries, as is indicated by the word officers (shōṭēr; cf. Assyrian shaṭâru, "to write"). Hence the LXX translates here with the familiar term "scribes" (grammateis). They were indeed "officers," but may have contributed to the organization and preservation of the sacred record. These are to be distinguished from the rulers of the thousands and hundreds, etc., of Ex 18:21-27; Num 10:4. 17. Take of the spirit which is upon thee. Because of Moses' emotional depression, God reserved some of the gift of prophecy to give it to these elders.

18. Sanctify yourselves. Why? Because God was going to do a miraculous work (cf. Josh 3:5). The New Testament counterpart is God's assurance that he will work miracles in hearts. This he does, for example, through his word (and through every means of grace). But unprepared hearts only make a mockery of such a promise. 20. Ye have despised the Lord which is among you. This was the basic reason for Israel's punishment. The people regretted that they had left a state of bondage for a state of freedom with self-denial. This shows that they were rejecting the promise of God, and therefore God himself.

22. Shall the flocks and the herds be slain for them, to suffice them? "Why should people rich in flocks cry out for flesh?" (ICC, p. 103) Moses' problem was not that of the critical commentary which belittles the account by suggesting that there was inconsistency in the divine economy. Israel's wilderness flocks would soon have been depleted if they had been eaten as daily food. There was undoubtedly some meat consumption (cf. priests' portions), but this was on special occasions (festivals), as is still true among the cattle-raising Bedouins.

25. They prophesied, and did not cease. Better, did not do (it) again. Does this mean that they prophesied only this one time and never again, or that they prophesied on this occasion only once and did not continue (the opposite of the AV translation)? The former view is unlikely in the light of 12:6. The latter view would provide Moses with a corps of inspired secretaries who also assisted in recording and editing the sacred writings (Pentateuch). Exodus 4:16 taken with 7:1 indicates that a part of the Hebrew idea of a prophet (nâbî') was "one who spoke for another." The elders may have had an ecstatic experience; if so, it was only because they were receiving the Word of God.

26. The spirit rested upon them . . . they were of them that were written. Rather than two disobedient members of the seventy who had not gone out with the rest, these were two of the many registered princes-over-the-thousands. This gift upon them was entirely unexpected. 29. Enviest thou for my sake? Moses showed the true spirit of God-directed leadership. He was not a demagogue, maintaining his position by unworthy means. Wholly desirous that others share in this wonderful gift, he had the corporate good of Israel at heart more than his own position.

31. Went forth a wind. The ICC (pp. 117-119) has a most interesting, largely constructive commentary on verses 31-34. Two cubits . . . upon the face of the earth. The phrase makes best sense by taking 'al ("upon") as "over" or "above" (ASV) the face of the earth, meaning low-flying quails. The RSV uses the word "deep," which is not in the text and is a step backward from AV "high." 32. Spread . . . all abroad . . . round about the camp. An ancient means of preserving food by sun-drying. 33. Ere it was chewed. The Hebrew verb does not mean "to chew"; it means "to cut off."

Translate, ere it ran short. (The same verb is translated cut off in Josh 3:16 and elsewhere.) This does not mean that punishment fell upon the people before they had time to eat any quail, for the Lord had predicted that they would eat flesh for a month (Num 11:19, 20). The idea is that before they had finished eating all the quail, the plague broke out.

35. Kibroth-hattaavah unto Hazeroth. These stations cannot be identified. All that can be said is that Israel was proceeding in a northerly direction from Sinai.

C. Rebellion of Miriam and Aaron. 12:1-16. As high priest, Aaron was a prominent figure in Israel; but he lacked qualities of leadership, and so far as we know he was not granted the gift of prophecy. Using Moses' marriage to an Ethiopian as a pretext to start a whispering campaign against their brother, Miriam and Aaron challenged Moses' sole right to speak for God to the people. God made clear to the rebel couple that Moses was a special instrument of divine revelation, far more intimate with the Almighty than any ordinary prophet. Miriam, as leader in the rebellion (cf. Aaron's weakness in the matter of the golden calf; Ex 32), was smitten with leprosy. Humble repentance by the offenders and gracious intercession by Moses brought healing and restoration, but only after the regular seven days of exclusion for the cleansing of a leper.

1. And Miriam . . . spake against Moses. The Hebrew text makes clear at the opening of the chapter that Miriam was the instigator of this rebellion; for her name is placed before Aaron's, and the verb spake carries a feminine inflection. Because of the Ethiopian. The circumstance used by the two as a pretext for criticizing Moses was his second marriage. The rest of the chapter reveals that the basic cause for the criticism was jealousy. The Ethiopian woman (Cushite) may have been an Asiatic rather than an African Cushite (cf. Gen 2:13; 10:6-8; Hab 3:7; Herodotus, VII. 70). 2. Hath the Lord . . . spoken only by Moses? The preposition b (by) can mean "by means of," "with," or even "out of" Moses (cf. Rom 1:17, ek, "out of," quoting Hab 2:4 b). This last rendering is most in keeping with the theme of this passage (Num 12:8), which shows that God chose to communicate with Moses directly, and not indirectly, as he did with other prophets.

3. Moses was very meek. The question is sometimes asked, How could Moses have been truly meek if he sought recognition of his meekness by praising himself? Hengstenberg suggests that Moses' character is not to be measured by that of ordinary men. This chapter itself teaches that the prophet had so intimate a relationship with God that he could speak the truth objectively, as it was revealed to him, even when it regarded his own nature. But the answer may also be that this is the work of a divinely inspired shōṭēr (11:16), as were the account of Moses' death and burial and other editorial notes.

6. A prophet among you. The Hebrew says, If there be your prophet of the Lord, I will make myself known. The Hebrew is unusual but possible. The grammar represents a survival of a very old form of speech (Ugaritic Manual, C. H. Gordon, p. 46). 7. Faithful in all mine house. God revealed himself to ordinary prophets by secondary means (visions and dreams). But because Moses was the man of faith among all the house of Israel, he had a special relationship with the Lord. 8. Mouth to mouth, even apparently, and not in dark speeches. Not by a vision (mar'â) but plainly (mar'eh); the meaning being ascertained by the antithetical phrase "not in riddles," for Moses gazed upon the form of the Lord. Aaron knew what this meant, because he himself had had one such experience with Moses (Ex 24:10).

10. Miriam became leprous. She alone was punished, for she was the instigator of this unhappy affair. 12. Of whom the flesh is half consumed. Aaron was abjectly repentant and pleaded for Miriam's deliverance from the horror of having the leprosy consume her flesh.

13. Heal her now, O God, I beseech thee. Moses' intercession is brief (especially so in Hebrew) but fervent. Twice he interjets nā, a particle of entreaty—"O God, please heal her, please." 14. If her father had but spit in her face. The Lord forgave Miriam and cleansed her of her grievous sin. Spitting in the face was a sign of shame imposed on wrongdoers who had not incurred the extreme discipline of excommunication (Deut 25:9).

T. The Story of the Spies. 13:1–14:45. The spies went forth with orders from Moses to find out whether the land of Canaan was good or bad, wooded or barren, whether the people were few or many, weak or strong, and whether they were nomads living in tents or inhabitants long settled, having walled fortresses. After a search of forty days, from the Negeb to the border of Hamath, the spies returned. All agreed that the land flowed "with milk and honey," but ten of them were so deeply impressed by the fortresses and the mighty stature of the people that they stirred up a surge of opinion against any attempt to take the land. Only Caleb and Joshua had confidence that, "If the Lord delight in us, then he will bring us into this land, and give it us." The sudden appearance of the glory of the Lord saved the two faithful spies from being stoned. The Lord proposed to Moses that He destroy the people and make of the prophet himself a greater nation. But Moses effectively interceded for Israel. He pled the necessity of upholding God's honor before the heathen, who were sure to say, "The Lord was not able." And he also appealed to God's long-suffering and great mercy. The Lord pardoned the people but also chastised them, declaring that this generation which had murmured and rebelled should not see the Promised Land. The people of Israel, thankful for forgiveness but failing to perceive the full meaning of the promised chastisement, determined now to obey in the matter in which they had disobeyed. Despite Moses' warning, they went up to fight the Amalekites and Canaanites. They were put to rout and beaten back to Hormah.

2. Send thou men, that they may search the land. According to Deut 1:22, God yielded to a request from the people that the land be searched. The Lord did not object to such an intelligent approach. Israel's subsequent lack of faith, however, is even more shameful in the light of the spies' unanimous testimony that the land was fruitful, just as God had promised it would be. 4. And these were their names. The theory that the unique names in this list fit some other time better than the Mosaic period cannot be proved. The very uniqueness of the names is evidence that they come from the heroic period of Israel's history and are not the product of late authors.

16. Moses called Oshea . . . Jehoshua. Moses added the covenant name of God (yhwh) to the name Oshea ("deliverance"). This name for God is translated Jehovah in the ASV and in a few places in the AV, but the latter usually renders it LORD. According to Ex 3:14,15, the name designates God as the great "I AM," eternal and personal in his being. It also reminded Israel that he was the Covenant-Maker, who gave the promises to the fathers – Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob. Prefixing this name of the Deity to a personal name was the beginning of a great tradition that kept pace with Israel's increasing contest with the Canaanite deities, especially Baal.

17. Get you up this way southward. They actually went northward, "through the Negeb," or "dry area." Negeb is translated "south" because it was south in relation to Caanan. 18. See the land . . . and the people. This reconnaissance was designed to determine whether or not the land was good, whether the people were strong or weak, and whether they dwelt in walled cities as permanent possessors or in tents as Bedouins. Centuries later, when the Assyrians invented siege warfare, they used massive machinery and an engineering corps to subdue walled cities; and even then it often took years. From the human viewpoint, Israel was to face a formidable foe.

21. Wilderness of Zin unto Rehob, as men come to Hamath. They traveled from an area just north of Kadesh to a town called Rehob, which was near or "in the direction of" the entrance to the ancient kingdom of Hamath, the antiquity of which is reflected in Gen 10:18. 22. Built seven years before Zoan in Egypt. Zoan was the Greek Tanis, a city in the east part of the Nile delta. As Hebrew Ṣōr became Greek Tyr(e), so Ṣō'an became Tan(is). Hebron played an important role in the life of the patriarchs (Gen 13:18; 23:19), which may make this verse refer to pre-Abrahamic times. The reference, however, may be to the rebuilding of these towns at the time of the Hyksos. The linking of Zoan and Hebron in Hebrew tradition would more likely have occurred after Egypt was under Semitic (Hyksos) rule, especially since Zoan was the capital of Hyksos Egypt and a likely residence of Pharaoh in the time of Moses. 24. Brook Eshcol. The word for brook is naḥal, meaning "a dried river bed." Such 'wadies' often held water beneath the surface long after the rains ceased, and thus contributed to the fruitfulness of the land. Eshcol means "cluster." Some link this name with a ruler who lived in this area at an earlier time (see Gen 14:13).

28. People be strong . . . cities . . . walled. The spies brought back a factual report about the land. With this report or word (dābār, v. 26) Joshua and Caleb agreed (vv. 26-29). It was the evil report (dībbat, "a slandering," "a whispering," v. 32) to which they took exception. 30. Caleb . . . said, Let us go up . . . and possess it. Caleb had confidence in the One who had proved himself thus far. Moses expressed Caleb's characteristic attitude when he said: "The Lord your God . . . he shall fight for you, according to all that he did for you in Egypt . . . and in the wilderness" (Deut 1:30,31). We are well able to overcome it. It was after this triumphant expression of faith that the ten spies started their slanderous words (evil report, v. 32). This alone is what made them the objects of divine displeasure.

32. Brought up an evil report. The Hebrew says, They made go out a defamation of the land, which suggests that they started a campaign of evil-speaking against the two faithful men. A land that eateth up the inhabitants thereof. This does not mean that the land was poor — they had shown otherwise — but that many people fought over it because it was such a good land.

33. The giants, the sons of Anak. Some have suggested that the spies imagined there were giants about when they saw great walls, sometimes fifty feet high, and supposed only giants could build them. But the measurements of King Og's iron bedstead given in Deut 3:11 testify to the existence of a race of abnormally large people. Deut 2:10,20 and Gen 14:5 indicate that the "giants" date from as early as patriarchal days, and were given various local designations (Emims, Zamzumims, and Rephaim). In the Hebrew of Deut 2:11 the Anakim are called Rephaim (translated "giants"). Joshua 11:22 tells us that Anakim remained in three of the Philistine cities — Gaza, Gath, and Ashdod (Jer 27:5, LXX). The family of Goliath in Gath may have been descendants of these earlier people, for in II Sam 21:16-22 and I Chr 20:4-8 these Philistine giants are called sons of the Rāpā'. The fifteenth century texts from Ugarit mention the Rephaim (C. H. Gordon, Ugaritic Literature, pp. 101-103), who probably were not "shades of the dead" but actually these same mighty people (cf. Ugaritic ilnym and Hebrew 'ēlîm; Job 41:17, Heb. Bible; 41:25, Eng.) from the north, whence came iron processing (cf. Og's bedstead).

14:8. If the Lord delight in us, then he will bring us into this land, and give it us. The sinful slander ("evil report") which the ten spies spread among the people accused the Lord himself of wanting to slay them. Note in contrast the wholehearted confidence in the Lord expressed here by Caleb. It was not until Caleb was eighty-five years old (Josh 14:11,12) that, with the same vibrant faith, he dispossessed the Anakim in the vicinity of Hebron. 9. They are bread for us. The verb 'ākal, "to eat," also means "to devour," "lay waste," or "destroy" (12:12). The same figure is conveyed here without the verb. Their defence (shadow) is departed. Jonah 4:6 tells how a shadow protected a prophet from the burning heat of the desert sun. When the shadow was removed, Jonah was left exposed and vulnerable (Jon 4:8). But Ezk 31:3,12 shows us that powerful nations are like trees (Num 24:6) under whose shadow other nations are forced to live. When Assyria fell, her shadow, meaning her strength, was dissipated; and other nations no longer were under her power. Thus the text could mean, "Their strength is departed."

15,16. The nations . . . will speak, saying . . . the Lord was not able. The beauty of this passage lies in the fact that Moses was zealous for the Lord's honor and not for his own. While Moses' spirit was wonderful, his argument itself was only partially valid. If God had acted on Moses' advice, he would never have chastened his people, for fear the heathen would misunderstand. The valid part of the argument centers around Moses' confidence that God is able to carry out his promises.

18. The Lord is longsuffering, and of great mercy. This part of Moses' plea is in behalf of the people. The argument now is completely valid, because he states the whole case for God. God is not only of great mercy but is the Just One, who cannot clear the guilty, that is, leave iniquity unpunished. This foundation truth for the teaching of substitutionary blood atonement pervades the whole Bible. God is merciful and does forgive, not by overlooking iniquity but by providing a substitute so that He may be both the Just One and the Justifier of those who believe (Rom 3:21-26). 19.

As thou hast forgiven. The root meaning of the word forgive, "to bear or carry," supports this substitutionary aspect of forgiveness. For God to pardon there must be a sin-bearer.

21. But as truly as I live. This is the introduction to an oath which continues through verse 23. To clarify several points, we offer the following translation: "Surely as I live and as the earth shall be full of the glory of the Lord, none of the men who saw my glory and my signs which I did in Egypt and in the wilderness but who have tried me now tenfold and have not hearkened to my voice, shall see the land which I sware to their fathers." The tenfold trying seems to refer to the ten evil spies.

23,24. Neither shall any of them that provoked me see it but (except) my servant Caleb. The verse division in the AV violates the sentence structure. 24. Because he . . . hath followed me fully. "Follow fully" derives from a root meaning "to fill," and is used to express the consecration of the priest ("fill his hand," 3:3). It also means "to overflow" or "to do anything in abundance without holding back," whether for evil or for good (Job 16:10). Caleb abandoned himself completely to God, who in turn 'abundanced' Caleb by "filling his hand" to do the divine will. A perfect example of consecration! His seed shall possess it. This promise was faithfully fulfilled. See Josh 14:6-15.

25. Turn...get you into the wilderness. The command was clear. They had only to obey. The way of the Red Sea. The Hebrew Yam Suph ("sea of reeds") means the waters of the two gulfs that bound the Sinai peninsula. This "way" is distinguished in Ex 13:17,18 from "the way of the land of the Philistines," which followed the Mediterranean coast.

26. And the Lord spake . . . saying. Verses 26 through 35 form an expanded statement giving the reason for and details of this chastisement. Far from representing a different source document, as some hold, it follows good Semitic literary style in repeating and emphasizing a phase of a larger context (Gen 1,2). 28. Truly as I live. The oath of 14:21-23 is here repeated in expanded terms that spell out the actual falling of their carcasses in the wilderness and God's fulfilling his promise through their children. The irony of their situation was that in their murmuring they had accused the Lord of making these very children a prey in the wilderness (v. 31). In this chastisement God reminded them of their words, and promised that these same children would inherit the land.

33. Bear your whoredoms. This is a metaphor. Through unfaithfulness, those married to God (believers) committed spiritual adultery, which sin their children bore until the passing of that entire generation. 34. And ye shall know my breach of promise. The phrase, breach of promise, which suggests that God may fail to keep his promise, is an unfortunate translation for a term meaning "rebuke" or "opposition." In 30:5 a verb of this root means "to disapprove," and in 32:7 it means "to discourage." "If God be for us, who can be against us" (Rom 8:31). The converse is the tragic lesson of this verse: When men persist in sinning, God can only oppose, disapprove, and discourage.

36. Who . . . made . . . the congregation to murmur . . . by bringing up (causing to go out) a slander. This text, which uses the same word dibbâ that is used in Num 13, confirms our interpretation of the "evil report" as slander (13:28,30,32). By a campaign of slanderous words these sinful men turned the entire congregation against the Lord. They now "died by the plague before the Lord" (v. 37).

41. Wherefore now do ye transgress the commandment of the Lord? God had made plain that they must now return to the wilderness (v. 25). Therefore, this attempt to show a belated zeal was ill-advised; for faith is obedience, without which they could not have God's presence or blessing (v. 42).

44. But they presumed to go up. Their former sin was reticent unbelief, shown by their extreme caution and fear (II Tim 1:7). Now they had moved to the other extreme of presumptuous unbelief, demonstrated by their overconfidence and carelessness. The Hebrew root of presumed, 'āpal, is used also in Hab 2:4: "Behold the presumptuous one, his soul is not upright in him; but the righteous one shall live by his faithfulness." The Apostle Paul saw the spiritual truth latent here. The unrighteous man trusts in his own virtue. But true righteousness originates in God's faithfulness and is communicated to man by living, obedient trust, from faith to faith (Rom 1:17).

IV. Second Priestly Scroll. 15:1—19:22.

The main feature of this priestly section is found in chapters 16 and 17, which recount the rebellion of Korah and the consequent triple vindication of the Aaronic priesthood. Gathered around this vindication of Aaron as priest are other details of priestly concern (see outline).

A. Ceremonial Details. 15:1-41. An earlier set of instructions (Lev 2:1-11) regarding meal (cereal) offerings gave no exact quantities. We now have a passage specifying exact proportions (cf. Lev 23:13). Looking forward to the time when the people would eat the food of Canaan, the Lord gave them directions for making a token contribution of the first fruits of their produce (heave offerings). He made provision for forgiveness of sins of ignorance – cases in which either the congregation as a whole or individuals might have transgressed unwittingly – on the ground of burnt offerings accompanied by atonement blood (vv. 22-31; cf. Lev 4). But he also made clear that if a man acted with evil intention (a high hand), he must be cut off from the people and bear his own iniquity. One man was stoned to death for despising God's commandment regarding Sabbath observance. Some have attempted to identify this severe judgment with the Sabbath ideas of the Pharisees, against whose misinterpretations Christ spoke. The two situations are not the same. The Pharisees added to Jewish religious law Sabbath regulations not contained in the Old Testament, and so provided loopholes for themselves. The Lord of the Sabbath teaches that the Sabbath law is designed for man's spiritual enjoyment and to satisfy his deepest needs. The Bible nowhere takes a light attitude toward deliberate transgression of any of God's laws. The chapter concludes with a statute of psychological value (Num 15:37-41). The Israelites were to attach tassels made of blue thread to the borders or corners of their garments as a reminder to keep all these commandments (Deut 22:12). This was Israel's "string around the finger."

5. For one lamb. Note that the amounts of mixed oil and flour and of wine for the drink offerings increase with the size of the animal offered: the fourth of a hin of oil and wine with each lamb, a third of each with the ram, but one-half hin with each bullock. This demonstrates a principle underlying all the offerings –that a man is to give according to his ability (Lev 5:7-13).

7. For a sweet (quieting, restful) savour. The phrase is used in 15:3,10, 13,14. In Gen 8:20,21 we are told that the Lord smelled the pleasing fragrance of Noah's burnt offering, and it had a favorable effect upon Him. Some dislike the extreme anthropomorphism in this thought. Yet the Bible is filled with such descriptions of God. The expression is no more literal than the words: "And he rode upon a cherub," or, "he did fly upon the wings of the wind" (Ps 18:10). The heathen deity Baal is called "the rider on the clouds" (C. H. Gordon, Ugaritic Literature, p. 30), as is also the Lord in Ps 68:4 (RSV). The critic who assumes that this "anthropomorphism" is evidence that Israel's religion was in a primitive stage might as well accuse a modern pastor of idolatry when he prays that God will "lay bare His arm in behalf of His people." In terms of the known, man is made to understand the unknown, in this case God's feeling toward him. By this practical expression, a sweet savour, God's people knew that their sacrifices were pleasing to him, much as a pleasant smell was soothing and pleasing to the people themselves.

16. One law . . . for you, and for the stranger that sojourneth with you. Strangers were welcome to "sojourn" with Israel but obligated to worship in God's appointed way, not in their own way. The spiritual decadence of the surrounding peoples was such that the introduction of their religious practices would have defiled the nation.

20. A cake of the first of your dough. The word 'ărîsâ, translated dough, is usually taken to mean "coarse grain." An earlier reference to the offering of first fruits (Lev 23:14) mentions only the waving of a sheaf, accompanied by a meal offering of sōlet, "fine flour." The fact that this heave offering of coarse grain is called t'rûmâ, "a contribution," indicates that it was for priestly consumption, while the fine flour of Lev 23:13 was to be a fire offering, a pleasing savor unto the Lord.

30. Doeth ought presumptuously (with a high hand). Obedient Israel came out of Egypt "with an high hand" (Ex 14:8), with a raised, clenched fist in defiance of Pharaoh. Here arrogant Israel sins with a high hand in defiance of the Lord (cf. Deut 32:27; Isa 10:32).

36. And stoned him with stones, and he died; as the Lord commanded. The lips of Christ described a fate far worse than this for those whose hearts despise the law of God (cf. Mt 18:9). Indeed, this Old Testament event was in reality a merciful lesson. Though such judgment could not change the heart of the one judged, it kept many wayward Israelites from defying God.

39. That ye seek not after your own heart and your own eyes. The tassels reminded them to walk not after their own evil inclinations and desire, but instead to follow the good, health-giving commandments of the Lord.

B. The Rebellion of Korah, Dathan, and Abiram. 16:1-35. Any rebellion of this size has numerous facets and various underlying reasons and grievances. Critics have imagined that the different thought currents here derive from the hypothetical document sources JE and P, and that our story represents the combined accounts of several rebellions during Israel's history. From the text itself, however, we gather that there were both ecclesiastical and civil sides to this rebellion. Korah persuaded fellow Levites and others to join him in seeking the priestly function (vv. 9,10). At the same time, the Reubenites, Dathan and Abiram, turned against Moses because of his seeming failure to provide the fields and vineyards of the Promised Land (v. 14). The thought that they were to spend the rest of their lives in the wilderness must have made rebellion seem like a way out.

Dathan and Abiram refused to come out to the Tabernacle to face Moses but sent a bitter complaint (vv. 12-14). Korah, on the other hand, and his 250 "princes" (not all, but many being Levites; vv. 7,8; 27:3) appeared with censers in hand, to prove that they were holy and could perform this priestly duty. Suddenly the glory of the Lord appeared at the door of the Tabernacle; and the Lord upheld Moses' authority by opening the earth to swallow the three leaders of the rebellion, with their households and possessions (v. 32). A further judgment by fire devoured the company of censer-bearers.

3. Ye take too much upon you. Or, "We have had enough of you." Moses, a little later, threw these very words back at them (v. 7). All the congregation are holy. In Ex 19:6 God promised to make Israel a kingdom of priests and a holy nation. But this promise had a condition, "If ye will obey . . . my voice and keep my covenant." For the giving and execution of this covenant divinely appointed mediators were needed. 11. For which cause both thou and all thy company are gathered together against the Lord. God had already chosen his mediator (v. 5). For Korah and his congregation to question this was to question God. And what is Aaron. Aaron's right to be priest did not originate in him.

12. Dathan and Abiram . . . said, We will not come up. The scene shifts to the Reubenites, whose rebellious motives were different from Korah's but whose purpose to overthrow Moses and Aaron was the same. 13. Except thou make thyself altogether a prince over us. Or, that you might keep on playing the prince over us. These men were chafing under the prospect of spending all their lives in the wilderness. They blamed Moses for the defeat at Hormah (14:45). They imagined that he refused to take the ark up with them on that occasion for fear he would lose control over them when they entered the land. 14. Wilt thou put out the eyes of these men? In line with Prov 30:17 the allusion here is to vultures plucking out the eyes of dead bodies in the wilderness. Had not Moses said that all this generation must die in the wilderness?

19. And Korah gathered all the congregation against them. The Hebrew makes a distinction between his congregation, "company," and the congregation (cf. v. 9). Korah presented himself as a champion of all the congregation: "Are not all the people holy ones?" (v. 3)

22. The God of the spirits of all flesh. The very evident dualism of spirit and flesh revealed in this phrase gives evidence that this concept was a part of Hebrew religious ideology as early as the time of Moses. 'Liberal' scholarship, however, tends to assign this concept to the late document "P" theology.

24. Get you up from about the tabernacle of Korah, Dathan, and Abiram. It is unlikely that these men had built another tabernacle. The term mishkan can refer to any dwelling place or tent (24:5). The mere addition of the Hebrew consonant "yodh" would indicate plural, "tents of." The translators of the LXX either saw this difficulty and left out the names Dathan and Abiram, or worked with a Hebrew manuscript that mentioned only Korah. Our present Hebrew text of 16:32 mentions only Korah as a shortened expression for all three rebels. 27. So they gat up from the tabernacle (tent) of Korah. The people who believed Moses now proved it by their actions. Dathan and Abiram . . . stood in the door of their tents, as if to challenge Moses.

28. For I have not done them of mine own mind. Again we see that the quarrel was not with Moses but with God. The Hebrew lēb, "heart," is correctly rendered mind in the AV; for the heart often meant the intellectual capacities (cf. Hos 7:11, "sense," RSV), while the kidneys, bowels, etc., ("reins," Ps 16:7, and elsewhere) meant the emotional capacities. 30. But if the Lord make a new thing. Both the verb and the noun are from bārā', "to create"; therefore the new thing had to be supernatural, or at least preternatural. And they go down quick, i.e., "alive," into the pit (Sheol). In the OT the term Sheol rarely means "the place of the departed dead"; here it indicates "the grave."

32. Swallowed them up, and their houses, and all the men that appertained unto Korah, and all their goods. Bāttêhem does not mean their houses but their households, as in 18:31. The rest of the verse differentiates between human possessions (servants) and non-human (animals and goods). This was simply a Hebrew way of saying "everything." However, Num 26:11 informs us that the sons of Korah did not perish with him. Probably Korah's "household" did not include his adult sons who had families of their own.

C. Incidents Vindicating the Aaronic Priesthood. 16:36–17:13. At this point the Hebrew Bible begins a new chapter. Jewish scribes considered the rest of chapter 16 and all of 17 a unit, on the theme of Aaron's sole right as priest. The brazen censers used by the rebels were beaten into covering plates for the altar, as a memorial to perpetuate the exclusive priesthood of Aaron's house. A further overtone of the rebellion appears in a murmuring that blamed Moses for the death of the rebels. God's wrath abated only when Aaron used his censer to make atonement for the people (v. 46). The vindication of Aaron's house culminated in the test of the rods (ch. 17). Of twelve selected rods, one for each tribe, only the rod of Levi, inscribed with Aaron's name, supernaturally blossomed and yielded almonds before the Lord. This rod was to be kept in the ark as a testimony against all future attempts to reject God's choice of the mediatorial family.

37. For they are hallowed. Why were the censers of these evil men counted holy? Because God had a sacred purpose for them. "Because they offered them before the Lord . . . they shall be a sign . . . . a memorial . . . that no stranger, which is not of the seed of Aaron, come near to offer incense before the Lord" (cf. vv. 37-40).

48. And he stood between the dead and the living. A dramatic illustration of Aaron's mediatorial office. Not by virtue of anything in himself (16:5) but only because God had chosen him, did Aaron's incense make an atonement for the people and stay the plague (cf. Heb 5:4-6).

17:4. Before the testimony. The reference is to the ark of the testimony. Where I will meet with you. The Hebrew verb for meet means "to appoint a time or place." The same root is used for the tabernacle of the congregation, 'ōhel mō'ēd, meaning "the tent of the appointed time and place." The congregation is sometimes called 'ēdâ, "the company assembled by appointment."

6. Twelve rods. Since one was Levi's (Aaron's) and both Ephraim and Manasseh were constituted as tribes, there would have been thirteen instead of twelve. There were two ways of numbering the tribes so that there would always be twelve. In Num 1:5-15 the sons of Joseph are reckoned as one tribe. In 13:4-15, however, the land and its eventual division is in mind; therefore the tribe of Joseph is divided to give twelve divisions, since Levi was given no inheritance of land. 8. On the morrow. This limiting of time helps to establish the fact that a true miracle from God took place. 10. Aaron's rod . . . to be kept for a token. A symbol to teach future generations. Against the rebels. The sons of contention, or children of rebellion (AV marg.). These were men who made their lives miserable and gravely offended God by letting self-pity or some other form of deep unrest seethe in their hearts (v. 12).

12. Behold, we die, we perish, we all perish. A final expression of self-pity from a gainsaying generation closes this chapter and also the report of God's dealings with them. The next words of narration (20:1) describe the closing days of wilderness wandering and the rise of the new generation.

D. Duties and Revenues of the Priests and Levites. 18:1-32. Aaron and the Levites were God's servants appointed to perform the sacred ministry of the sanctuary by which Israel learned of God's holiness (vv. 1-7). None of the house of Levi would receive an inheritance of land; God provided for them by means of the perpetual portion, ḥāq ʿôlām (v. 8). This was the priests' part of Israel's offerings. But since not all the tribe of Levi could be supported by portions of offerings, the Levites received the tithe of all Israel's inheritance. And each Levite gave a tenth of his tithe to the priest, just as if he had raised it himself in the field.

1. Shall bear the iniquity of the sanctuary: and . . . of your priesthood. To bear (forgive) iniquity means to cleanse by means of a substitutionary offering. The priests had to make atonement for their own sins (Lev 16:6). Also, since there was always the possibility of the sanctuary's being defiled by someone unwittingly, the holy place itself and the altar had to be cleansed (Ex 29:36, 37; Lev 16:20).

6. To you they are given as a gift for the Lord. They were given to the priests as those who were devoted ("given ones") to serve the Lord. This verse is a key to understanding the Apostle Paul's use of Ps 68:18 in Eph 4:8.

7. As a service of gift. The priesthood was a privileged service, God-given and God-appointed.

8. Heave offerings. These tᵉrûmōt were the contributions to the priests and Levites as distinguished from fire offerings, which were expiatory. By reason of the anointing. Better rendered, I have given them for an anointed (or consecrated) portion. 9. Which they shall render (return) unto me. The thought is that of returning to God what is his. 10. Every male shall eat it. The offerings of verse 9 were "most holy"; so only the males partook of them. 11. To thy sons and to thy daughters . . . every one that is clean . . . shall eat of it. These were not fire offerings for atonement; therefore all the priestly household partook.

16. Those that are to be redeemed . . . This should read, And his ransom price, beginning at a month old, you shall take, according to your evaluation, starting at five shekels of silver. Compare Lev 27:1-7 for the varying evaluations according to age and sex. For the money of five shekels. There was no money (in our sense) in ancient Israel. The Hebrew text says, silver, five shekels, which is twenty gerahs (grains of weight). 19. A covenant of salt for ever. According to Lev 2:13, every sacrifice was salted. Christ used this thought to describe the eternal verity of hell (Mk 9:49). The salt signified an inviolable covenant between God and the priests.

20. I am thy part and thine inheritance. Their lives were to be spent serving God in the sanctuary. Therefore they were to be physically sustained by the people, who themselves were sustained by God. 24. The tithes . . . which they offer . . . unto the Lord, I have given to the Levites to inherit. Levites and priests were dependent upon the faithfulness of the people, who in turn enjoyed the good pleasure of their God through careful observance of all the law of the sanctuary

29. Every heave offering (contribution) of (due) the Lord, of all the best thereof. The offering due to the Lord (v. 26) was to be from the best of the best. The people gave their best to the Levites, who gave the best of this to the Lord as represented by the priest. 31. It is your reward for (in return for) your service. The word śākār, "hire," may seem mercenary; but compare Gen 15:1, where God calls himself Abram's śākār ("reward").

E. The Water Purification for Those Defiled by the Dead. 19:1-22. Verses 1 to 10 explain how this water was to be prepared, and the rest of the chapter tells how it was to be used. Eleazar, the son of Aaron, was to oversee the slaying of a blemish-free red heifer outside the camp. He was to sprinkle its blood toward the Tabernacle seven times and then burn it entirely, blood included, together with cedar wood, hyssop, and scarlet cloth. The resultant ashes were to be used to make the "water of impurity"; that is, water for removing ceremonial impurity. A person defiled by the dead was to be counted impure for seven days. He was to achieve ceremonial purity by being sprinkled with this water on the third and seventh days. On the seventh day he was to wash his clothes and flesh, and at sundown he would be "clean." One who failed to comply was to be cut off from the congregation as an unclean person.

2. An ordinance of the law. What is called here a teaching statute, is later called an eternal ("perpetual") statute (v. 10). Hence, the dual purpose of this ritual was to teach Israel about the purity of God and to preserve this revelation for future generations. A red heifer without spot. Many strained allegorical interpretations of the use of this red heifer have been put forth, wherein each detail, including the color of the animal, is given a spiritual meaning. It is better to regard such a ceremony as one would an artist's painting, recognizing that while the whole conveys a message, the details are insignificant when considered independently. Hebrews 9:13,14 points out the message of this object lesson, which is that God's people need to experience cleansing from impurity. Just as the ashes of the red heifer ceremonially cleansed a defiled Israelite, even so Christ's blood satisfies divine justice, purges a poor sinner's conscience, and restores him to God.

4. Sprinkle of her blood directly before the tabernacle. This was the atoning act that expiated sin and propitiated God (Lev 16:14,15). The life of a pure and innocent victim was substituted for the life of the one defiled. For this reason this is called a sin offering ḥaṭṭā't (Num 19:9,17). 9. A clean place, i.e., ceremonially clean. For a water of separation. More correctly water of impurity, that which removes impurity. It is a purification for sin. The plan of this ritual was to provide a simple way to purify Israelites from a very common defilement. They felt in their consciences the relation between sin and death and the need for deliverance from the curse death represents, the curse of sin.

12. He shall purify himself. As in 8:21, the Hebrew expression is he shall de-sin himself. Though it means cleansing, the emphasis is on the defilement, not on the purity, perhaps because one cannot truly be cleansed unless he realizes that sin is sin. 13. Defileth the tabernacle of the Lord. An Israelite defiled by the dead would pollute everything he touched or came near. This idea of the contagion of ceremonial impurity is stressed in verses 14,15 (cf. Hag 2:13).

16. A dead body, or a bone of a man, or a grave. Anything having to do with death contaminated. The people could not help becoming defiled occasionally; therefore "the water of impurity" was always available. The priest, however, was forbidden to become unclean except when his closest relatives died (Lev 21:1-3). 18. A clean person shall take hyssop. Any "clean" person could perform this duty; it did not require a priest. The purpose of this provision was to make cleansing from unavoidable contact with the dead readily accessible.

V. From the Wilderness of Zin to the Steppes of Moab. 20:1–22:1.

We may infer from Num 33:36 that at the end of the years of wandering, Israel was at Ezion-Geber, on the northernmost coast of the Gulf of Aqabah. From there they entered the Wilderness of Zin, in which was located the oasis called Kadesh, a term used in 33:36 to designate a wide area. They requested passage through Edom via the ancient trade route, the king's highway, but were refused it. These chapters indicate that Edom, Moab, the Amorites, and the Canaanites controlled many established fortresses in the Negeb and Trans-Jordan. While encamped at Mount Hor, Israel fought and defeated Arad the Canaanite. At this point (21:4) they proceeded south by way of Yam Suph (here the Gulf of Aqabah) to avoid a clash with the Edomites. Eventually they traveled north in the Valley of Arabah until they reached the Wadi Zered. They then traversed between Edom and Moab in the Zered Valley, avoiding Moab by going east of it and proceeding northward to the Arnon, then west again to the king's highway. The territory north of the river Arnon, called "the Steppes of Moab," they captured by defeating the Amorite King Sihon, who took it from the Moabites. Additional land east of Jordan they won by conquering Og, king of Bashan. The rest of Numbers (after the Balaam story) is devoted to preparing this new generation for the major conquests west of the Jordan.

A. The Wilderness of Zin. 20:1-21.

1) The Sin of Moses. 20:1-13.

1. Then came . . . Israel . . . into the desert of Zin in the first month. Zin (Ṣin) lies between the Ascent of Akrabhim, southwest of the Dead Sea, and Kadesh (20:16; 34:3). Though the year is not mentioned, it must have been the end of the thirty-ninth year or the fortieth year after the Exodus. For they proceeded from Kadesh to Mount Hor (20:22), where Aaron died; and 33:38 tells us that he died in the fortieth year. 5. No place of seed, or of figs, or of vines, or of pomegranates; neither is there any water to drink. Nelson Glueck's description of the importance of water in the Negeb (Rivers in the Desert, pp. 20-25) makes God's sympathetic attitude toward this complaint plausible (p. 16).

8. Speak ye unto the rock . . . and it shall give forth his water. A rock giving forth its water indicates that this water from a rock was somewhat the expected thing. The miracle was in Moses' knowing what rock was ready to give water and in the fact that he needed only to speak to it.

10. Hear now, ye rebels; must we fetch you water. Psalm 106:32,33 gives the divine commentary on these words. The people angered Moses, and "they made his spirit bitter and he spoke words that were rash" (RSV). It was not God but Moses who was angry at the people. Therefore the pronoun we was a form of blasphemy. 11. Smote the rock twice. If Moses had merely spoken to the rock, as the Lord had directed, the miracle would have pointed to the power of God. As it was, Moses took God's place both in word and in deed.

12. Because ye believed me not, to sanctify me in the eyes . . . of Israel (cf. v. 24). Moses' sin was a willful refusal to point away from himself to God's power and thus sanctify the Lord in the eyes of the people. Moses and Aaron shared the chastisement for this sin, for God had said, "Speak ye (plural) unto the rock." After the deed he said, "Ye (plural) shall not bring this congregation into the land." 13. This is the water of Meribah. The place was not called Meribah after the incident, as Rephidim had been forty years earlier (Ex 17:7); but the water was now called "the water of strife" (mᵉrîbâ) because Israel strove with the Lord.

2) The Request To Go Through Edom 20:14-21.

14. Moses sent messengers . . . thus saith thy brother Israel. The Edomites were descendants of Esau (Deut 23:7). Moses was being tactful as well as stating the truth. 16. In Kadesh, a city in the uttermost of thy border. The border of Edom is usually considered to be the western edge of the Valley of Arabah. If present identification for Kadesh at 'Ain Qadeis (or 'Ain el-Qudeirat) is correct, then Edom's border must have extended far into the Negeb. This suggests the extent of Edom's sphere of influence, since actual borders were established only by the control of certain key fortresses. 17. The king's highway. This was an old caravan route. Long before Moses' day it was used as a major public artery. Verse 19 calls this the public road or the highway (mᵉsillâ).

20. Edom came out against him with much people, and with a strong hand. No battle ensued, because God's purpose was not to dissipate Israel's strength here, but to save it for the hard fighting against the Amorites, whose land was needed to secure access to Canaan.

B. The Area of Mount Hor. 20:22–21:3.

1) The Death of Aaron. 20:22-29.

22. Journeyed from Kadesh, and came unto mount Hor. The location of Mount Hor (Hōr hāhār) is indefinite. Many think that it is Jebel el-Medhra, which is just east of the Valley of Arabah. Others suggest that some mountain northeast of Kadesh is the place. The latter would fit Moses' description of Edom's sphere of power, since Mount Hor was on the border of Edom (v. 23). Moses, in Deut 1:44, assumes that Seir (a designation for Edom) is in the Negeb, which would fit the view that Edom's border was not confined to Wadi Arabah. The descriptions of Israel's southern border in Num 34:1-5 and Josh 15:1-12 make both Israel's and Edom's border veer away from the Arabah westward, touch Kadesh-barnea, and lead on to the River of Egypt (Wadi el 'Arîsh). 23. Mount Hor, by the coast of the land of Edom. This does not mean that the mountain was exactly on the border of Edom. It may simply be a way of distinguishing it from the other Mount Hor of 34:8. a number of places were called Kadesh (sacred) and had to be distinguished, i.e., Kadesh-barnea, Kedesh-naphtali, and Kadesh on the Orontes.

28. And Moses stripped Aaron of his garments, and put them upon Eleazar. These were the holy garments of Ex 39, the badge of the high priesthood. They had marked Aaron—and now marked Eleazar—as God's chosen mediator, whose ministrations taught the people that God was their almighty and ever-holy Friend.

2) Arad the Canaanite Defeated at Hormah. 21:1-3.

1. Arad the Canaanite, which dwelt in the south (Negeb). The name Arad is still used of a mound in the Negeb. A man who could give his name to an area for thousands of years was hardly just a tribal chieftain (Glueck, Rivers in the Desert, p. 114). Verses 1,2 do not describe two events separated by hundreds of years, as some think. By the way of the spies. "The way of the 'ătārîm" was possibly the name of a caravan route, since the Arabic equivalent of 'ătārîm means "the footprints." 3. They utterly destroyed them. The men of Israel were forced into this battle, for it was not their plan to enter the land from the south. The event became a token of future conquests. The outcome of the last battle God's people had fought thirty-eight years before was sad defeat at a place named Hormah (14:45). Hence there is a play on words in this verse, Hormah being from the same root as the verb "utterly destroy." This may not have been the town of Hormah mentioned in 14:45 (Josh 15:30; Jud 1:17). Perhaps Moses sought to bolster morale by naming this place of victory in remembrance of that place of humiliating defeat by the same enemy.

C. The Journey to the Steppes of Moab. 21:4–22:1.

1) Rebellion on the Journey Around Edom. 21:4-9.

4. The way of the Red sea. Not the Red Sea as shown on our maps, but Yam Suph, meaning "sea where reeds grow," in this case the Gulf of Aqabah. Deuteronomy 2:8 (ASV) calls this "the way of the Arabah," meaning that low plain that gradually ascends from the depths of the Salt Sea to the Gulf. Israel went in this direction, though not necessarily all the way to the sea, to avoid contact with the Edomites.

8. Make thee a fiery serpent. There is no adjective in the Hebrew; the term śārāp means a "poison snake." Every one . . . when he looketh upon it, shall live. Only those who believed God's promise would act upon the direction and live. Our Lord saw in this not only an illustration of the efficacy of faith in God's word, but an apt object-lesson of his own coming vicarious suffering, when he should be lifted up between heaven and earth (Jn 3:14).

2) Places Passed on the March from the Arabah. 21:10-20.

10. And the children of Israel set forward. Verses 10 to 20 give the names of the places where Israel encamped while traveling north in the Arabah. This itinerary is given more fully in 33:41-49.

14. The book of the wars of the Lord. Here is one of the authentic sources from which Moses and subsequent scribes of Israel obtained information concerning earlier events. What he did in the Red sea. These words are a questionable translation of the beginning of a fragment from this ancient source. This first line is obscure because it is broken from its context. The latter part of verse 14 is the more important because it gives the reason for the quotation—to show that the Valley of Arnon was the border of Moab. The two Hebrew words comprising this opening phrase of the quotation may be translated in several ways. The RSV follows the ICC in transliterating the Hebrew as place names—Waheb in Suphah. The AV takes the opening words as an Aramaic verbal form (an old Jewish exegesis, followed also by Jerome in the Vulgate). The AV rendering of sûpâ as Red sea is not likely, since the area in question is adjacent to Moab. The difficult reference to sûp in Deut 1:1 (ASV) locates this otherwise unknown place in Trans-Jordan, where Moses gave his last words. The fragment might be translated then as follows:

A portion in direction of Suph:
Even the Arnon wadies,
Even the slope of the wadies
Which turn toward the seat of Ar,
Verily is adjacent to the border of Moab.

17. Israel sang this song. The poetic tradition is here reflected. The poets and ballad singers may have passed on some of Israel's history as epic poetry. It is possible that the Book of the Wars of the Lord was a compilation of such poems. That the traditional poetry was very early incorporated in written records is evidenced by the literature from fifteenth century Ugarit. This little fragment, of verse 17, has been called "The Song of the Well." The first line is an introduction or theme line. With sceptre and with staves (v. 18, ASV) probably expresses the authority of the nobles, who would direct the digging. However, water often lay very near the surface in a nahal, "wadi," or "dried river bed," so that even a staff thrust into the soil would bring it to the surface (cf. Gen 26:19; II Kgs 3:16-18).

"Spring up, O Well! Sing to it!
A well, the princes dug it,
Even the nobles of the people digged it,
With scepter and with their staves."

18. From the wilderness they went to Mattanah. Most of the place names of verses 18-20 cannot be exactly located. The general direction of the journeying was from the desert east of Moab, in the area north of Arnon, westerly to the height called the Pisgah, which overlooked the waters of the Salt Sea and the wastes of the Wilderness of Jeshimon.

3) Defeat of the Amorites. 21:21-32.

21. Israel sent messengers unto Sihon. Moses' purpose was to gain access to the land west of Jordan. He asked for peaceful passage (vv. 21,22), but Sihon refused (v. 23); and so there was no way to avoid a conflict. 24. The border of . . . Ammon was strong. The LXX has a better Hebrew text, and correctly reads, Jazer was the border of the Ammonites (Josh 13:25; Num 32:1). Our present Hebrew text has lost one letter, an "r." 26. Who had fought against the former king of Moab, and taken all his land . . . even unto Arnon. This verse, taken with Israel's victory over Sihon, explains the meaning of the poem given in 21:27-30.

27. They that speak in proverbs. These Mōshᵉlîm were poets, possibly ballad singers. Baalim oracles are called mashals (AV, maschil), as are the Proverbs and some didactic psalms (see titles of Ps 32,42,52, and others). According to Num 21:26, Sihon the Amorite had previously destroyed Moab (cf. second and third parallel stanzas below); but verses 21-25 inform us that Israel had destroyed the Amorites (first and fourth parallel stanzas). So the poem is a satiric ode, which says, in substance, "You (Amorites) have beaten them (Moabites), but we (Israelites) have beaten you." Note the strophic balance and the climactic development in this poem. The second and third stanzas have the same structural pattern. The final stanza answers by antithesis what immediately precedes, but actually completes the meaning of the opening stanza.

"Come ye! Heshbon shall be (re)built,
Yea! Let be (re)established the city of Sihon.

For fire has gone out from Heshbon,
A flame from the town of Sihon;
It has devoured Ar of Moab,
The Baals of the high places of Arnon.

Woe to you, O Moab!
You are undone, O people of Kemosh!
(For) he has given his sons as prisoners,
And his daughters into captivity,
(Even) to the Amorite king, Sihon.

But we shot them: Heshbon perished as far as Dibon.
Yea, we devastated (them), until fire spread as far as Medeba."

31. Israel dwelt in the land of the Amorites. All the territory between the rivers Arnon and Jabbok was secured, and in addition, the Ammonite city Jaazer (v. 32) and the kingdom of Og (vv. 33-35); so that Israel controlled the land east of Jordan from the Arnon to Mount Hermon (Deut 3:8). Most of the geographic designations in these verses are well known even to this day.

4) The Defeat of Og. 21:33-35.

33. The king of Bashan went out against them. These verses parallel Deut 3:1-4 almost word for word (except for the change in the personal pronoun). Og's iron bedstead (or sarcophagus) evidently captured Israel's curiosity. The special notice given it here suggests that such use of iron was rare at this time. (In regard to its size, see Deut 3:11; cf. comment on 13:33).

5) Arrival in the Plains of Moab. 22:1.

1. Pitched in the plains of Moab. They encamped at a place called Shittîm (25:1), near where the Jordan empties into the Salt Sea. On this side Jordan by Jericho. See comment on 34:15.

Part Two. Foreign Intrigue Against Israel. 22:2–23:30.

Chapters 22 to 25 form a literary divider between the two logical halves of the Book of Numbers. Nowhere in chapters 22 to 24 do we have the usual formula, "God said unto Moses," found in every other chapter. This section, like the Book of Job, may have originated outside of Israel. Although we are told (Deut 23:5) that Moses was aware of Balaam's machinations, it is impossible to determine whether this 'foreign' source material became part of the sacred record under Moses' supervision. Numbers 22:4b, which says, Balak . . . was king of the Moabites at that time, points to the work of post-Mosaic scribes. The story, then, may have been inserted here, where it fits chronologically and at the same time provides a literary hinge for turning from the old generation to the new, and to a new census and new legislation pointed toward settlement in the land.

Some commentators attempt to reduce the prominence of Balaam, the man, in this story (ICC, p. 316; followed by IB, Vol. 2. pp. 248-263) and to see in it only the larger religio-political concepts of the culture represented. But Balaam is such an integral, strongly etched character that one cannot really appreciate the story without seeking to understand him. Certainly the purpose of the narrative is to show how God protected his people from the evil designs of a pagan monarch and the hidden lusting of an errant prophet. But Balaam's subtle deeds and powerful words make the story a dramatic masterpiece.

Fear was instilled in the heart of Balak, king of Moab, because of Israel's defeat of the Amorites. He sent for Balaam, a popular prophet from northern Mesopotamia, promising him fame and substance in exchange for cursing Israel. Balaam was told by the Lord not to go, and so he refused. When King Balak made greater promises, however, the prophet sought a change of the Lord's mind. The Lord therefore permitted Balaam to set out for Moab. On the way, God sought, through an angel, to communicate to the prophet his displeasure with him. But only Balaam's ass saw the angel of the Lord. The ass eventually spoke and rebuked Balaam for his spiritual blindness. Then the prophet's eyes were opened to see the angel. The Lord permitted Balaam to go on to Moab so that he might openly declare God's purpose to fulfill His ancient promise to Israel. Balak showed Balaam the camp of Israel from three different vantage points in succession, and at each point the prophet uttered a blessing on Israel. Balak, in disgust, told Balaam to speak no more. But the prophet continued with even more oracles, in which he predicted not only the future prosperity and power of Israel as a nation, but also the destruction of Moab, Edom, Amalek, the Kenites, and Asshur.

I. Balak's Failure To Turn the Lord from Israel. 22:2–24:25.

A. Balaam Summoned by Balak. 22:2-40.

4. Balak the son of Zippor was king of the Moabites at that time. As a post-Mosaic reference, either the single sentence was added, or it reflects the fact that the whole account was inserted in post-Mosaic times (see above).

5. Pethor, which is by the river of the land of the children of his people. The ICC claims that some editor has confused two different places from a compilation of several stories. The river is the Euphrates; the land is called 'Ăram of the two rivers in Deut 23:4. This area was just as much the land of the ancestors of Moab through Lot (Gen 19:37) as it was the land of the ancestors of Israel through Abraham. Haran, Lot's father, died in the land of his nativity, in Ur of the Chaldees (Gen 11:28). Some evidence indicates that Ur was possibly a northern Mesopotamian city rather than the ancient Sumerian city of southern Mesopotamia (JNES, XVII, 1958, pp. 28-31, 252). The worship of the Lord by Abraham's family continued, but Lot's descendants, the Moabites and Ammonites, adopted the gods of the people among whom they settled. That there was a prophet of the Lord in the area called 'Ăram Nahărayîm (Gen 24:10), fits the total Biblical picture.

6. For I wot that he whom thou blessest is blessed. Balaam was apparently a popular prophet and also a prophet of the Lord (Jehovah). Balak therefore sent "fees of divination" (v. 7), with hopes that such a combination of talents would be effective against Israel. Whether Balaam was a true prophet gone astray or a false prophet overpowered by God cannot be known for sure. The comments on him from other places in the OT and NT are consistently derogatory (Num 31:8,16; Deut 23:5,6; Josh 13:22; 24:9; Neh 13:2; II Pet 2:13-15; Jude 11; Rev 2:14). Though some writers have put forth the weak argument that God in Mic 6:5 speaks well of Balaam, really the Lord there speaks well only of His own blessing of Israel through the unfaithful prophet and makes no comment on Balaam's character. In Josh 13:22 Balaam is called a soothsayer (haqqōsēm), and soothsaying was an abomination to the Lord (Deut 18:10). We might compare this prophet with Simon Magus (Acts 8:13-24), a confused believer who sought to combine soothsaying and the power of the Holy Spirit. Numbers 24:1 informs us that Balaam resorted to auguries (nᵉhāshîm).

7. The rewards of divination in their hand. The story shows a marked distinction between the heathen concept that the prophet was a manipulator of the gods and the Hebrew idea that God was a sovereign Determiner of all that came to pass, "who blesses whom he will bless and curses whom he will curse" (v. 6). 18. If Balak would give me his house full of silver and gold, I cannot go beyond the word of the Lord. Though these were great words, they belied his heart (cf. v. 18). God had spoken, but Balaam was hoping for some change that would make it possible for him to go. And God did allow him to go, to show in a dramatic way His sovereign choice to bless Israel.

22. God's anger was kindled because he went. The use of a participle in the Hebrew suggests the translation, "God's anger was kindled as he was going." Though God had granted Balaam's wish that he might go, His anger arose because the prophet's heart was swayed by his love of "the wages of unrighteousness" (II Pet 2:15). 25. And crushed Balaam's foot against the wall. The crushing of his foot may be reflected in the word shepî (23:3), which, it has been suggested, may come from an Akkadian root, shēpu, meaning "with hindered step." The AV renders shepî, "a bare height," and the RSV reads, "a high place" (23:3).

28. The Lord opened the mouth of the ass. Did the ass give forth audible sound, or was this merely an experience in the mind of Balaam? The truth is probably to be found on both sides. While the appearance of the angel and the voice of the ass were not hallucinations, it seems that they were seen and heard by Balaam only and not by the others who were present – as was the case several times in the New Testament (Acts 9:7; 22:9; Jn 12:28,29). On the road to Damascus there were physical phenomena which only Paul understood; so Balaam, because of a combination of mental and spiritual distractions, could not see the angel until God opened his eyes. Nor could others have understood the ass unless God had given them this ability.

35. Go with the men. As in 22:20, God told Balaam to go. He was not, therefore, angry because the prophet went but because of his motive for going. Men cannot easily determine the motives of others, but God can. We have the divine commentary in the rest of Scripture to guide us, and Num 31:16 proves that Balaam was reprobate. In addition, the story cannot be understood otherwise, unless we adopt the dubious expedient of claiming that the account is a piecing together of several different stories (cf. ICC).

38. Have I now any power at all to say anything? the word that God putteth in my mouth, that shall I speak. Balaam had not told the Moabites of God's revealed intention to bless Israel. And so the best that can be said for this reply is that it is ambiguous, probably because Balaam was hoping for God to change His mind. Balak assumed, therefore, that Balaam's coming indicated his willingness to curse Israel.

B. The Oracles of Balaam. 22:41–24:25.

Outstanding Semitic linguists see in this poetry a reflection of the Age of Moses. The form of language, the subject matter, technical terms, and proper names all tend to support the view that these are authentic utterances from a poet of the mid-second millenium. Balaam calls each poem a māshāl, translated "parable" in 23:7,18; 24:3,15. Māshāl cannot be limited to either parable or proverb; rather, it is so broad that it applies to all "Wisdom" literature. Hebrew poetry has as its main feature parallelism of thoughts, lines, and stanzas, in appositional, oppositional, or progressive form. The Balaam oracles display all this, and in addition they have an archaic and often Aramaic flavor, which points to the antiquity and origin (from Aram) of the character who speaks. William F. Albright, who has done definitive, scholarly work on these oracles, says, "There is nothing in the matter of the poems which requires a date in the tenth century or later for original composition" (JBL, Sept., 1944, p. 227). He observes that Balaam's name is characteristic of the second millennium B.C. (2000–1000), and that it has survived in several places, all of which go back to the fifteenth century. Then he states that Balaam was really "a north Syrian diviner from the Euphrates Valley," who "spent some time at the Moabite court . . . became a convert to Yahwehism," and "later abandoned Israel and joined the Midianites in fighting against the Yahwists (Num 31:8,16)" (JBL, Sept., 1944, pp. 232,233). Adequate treatment of the poems would be impossible here. Therefore we offer a private translation which, it is hoped, will clarify some points and illustrate the poetic structure.

First Oracle. 23:7-10.

The poem contains a 1-2-1-2-1 pattern of parallel couplets. The last couplet is a conclusion, expressing the nostalgic thought that Balaam would like to share in Israel's blessing.

7. "From Aram Balak brought me,
The king of Moab from the hills of the east.
'Go, curse for me Jacob,
Go, denounce Israel.'
8. How shall I curse when God has not cursed?
How shall I denounce when God has not denounced?
9. For from the top of the mountains I see,
From hills I do observe.
Lo, a people who dwell alone,
Among the nations they are not reckoned.
10. Who can count the dust of Jacob,
Or number the 'dust' cloud of Israel?
Let me die the death of a just man,
Let my end be like his!"

Second Oracle. 23:18-24.

Balaam here sees the Lord as the One who forces him to bless Israel because He must bring to pass His promised word. The Lord is the source of His people's strength; so no incantation can be effective against them. Balaam concludes by likening Israel to a stalking lion, that catches and devours its prey. In the phrase, shout of a king (v. 21), we follow the LXX, the Targum of Onkelos, and the Samaritan Pentateuch, and translate royal majesty.

Introduction

18. "Arise, O Balak, and hearken;
Hear my testimony, O Son of Zippor.

Stanza 1

19. God is not a man, that he should lie,
Nor a human being, that he should repent.
That which he says, will he not do?
That which he decrees, will he not bring to pass?
20. Behold I have learned to bless,
And bless I will, for I cannot do otherwise.
21. Iniquity is not seen in Jacob,
Nor is perverseness evident in Israel.

Stanza 2

The Lord his God is with him,
And royal majesty accompanies him.
22. When God was bringing him out of Egypt,
He had the strength of a wild ox.
23. For there can be no omen against Jacob,
Nor incantation against Israel.
Now it shall be said of Jacob,
Even concerning Israel, 'What has God done!'

Conclusion

24. Lo, a people that arises like a lioness,
Who exalts himself like a lion,
Which does not lie down until it devours the prey,
And licks the blood of the slain."

Third Oracle. 24:2-9.

The two main stanzas of this poem contrast Israel at peace and at war. Among the peoples of the ancient Near East this was a favorite way of depicting a nation. The peace and war standards from the Royal Tombs of Ur (J. Finegan, Light From the Ancient Past, Fig. 16) effectively illustrate this custom. The poem also shows symmetry in its opening and closing parallel couplets, which are the only lines using the pronoun "thee" concerning Israel. Though the couplet that ends the first stanza is admittedly difficult, it is clear to this writer that it refers to the boughs of the trees mentioned in the preceding verses. Ezekiel 31 uses the same figure ("the cedar" is Assyria) and the same root, dālâ, in reference to boughs of the cedar that grows beside many waters. In Ezk 19 Israel is "a vine beside many waters" and "a devouring lion." The first couplet of the second stanza of this oracle is not found in our Hebrew text but comes from the LXX. It may represent a family of Hebrew manuscripts behind the LXX text that preserved this verse but lost the preceding couplet. This couplet provides a transition between the peace and war stanzas.

Stanza 1

5. "How fair are thy tents, O Jacob,
   Thy dwellings, O Israel.
6. Like river valleys that stretch out,
   Like gardens beside a river.
   Like aloes which the Lord planted,
   Like cedars beside the waters.
7. With dew dropping from their boughs,
   With their seed being among many waters.

Stanza 2

A man shall proceed from his seed,
And he shall be lord of many nations.
And his kingdom shall be higher than Agag's,
And his dominion shall be exalted.
8. For when God was bringing him from Egypt,
   He had the strength of a wild ox.
   The nations, his adversaries, he will devour,
   Their bones he will break in pieces,
   And with his arrows smite through.
9. He crouches, he lies down,
   Like a lion, like a young lion.
   Who can raise him up?

Conclusion

Blessed is the one blessing thee,
The one cursing thee is accursed."

Fourth Oracle. 24:15-19.

Balaam introduces himself (st. 1) with the same words he used in 24:3,4. The translation of the last words of the opening couplet, "who is true of eye," is upheld by a Phoenician incantation text that uses a similar idiom (Albright, JBL, Sept., 1944). King David is here predicted as that star of Jacob which would crush both Moab and Edom. The translation of the last line as a "remnant of Seir" involves a slight emendation of the text, which the context favors.

Stanza 1

15. "The oracle of Balaam son of Beor,
    The oracle of the man who is true of eye.
16. The oracle of the one hearing the words of El,
    The one knowing the knowledge of Elyon.
    The one being made to see what Shaddai sees,
    The one falling and opened of eye.

Stanza 2

17. I see it, but not now,
    I behold it, but not nigh.
    The star of Jacob shall rule,
    The scepter of Israel shall arise,
    And shall crush the forehead of Moab,
    And tear down the pate of the sons of Sheth.
18. And Edom shall be dispossessed,
    Even dispossessed is Seir by his enemies.
19. But Israel shall do mightily;
    Dominion shall be exercised by Jacob,
    And the remnant of Seir shall he destroy."

Fifth Oracle. 24:20.

The destruction of the Amalekites was particularly a Davidic feat.

Then he saw Amalek . . . and said,
"The first of the nations is Amalek,
But his latter end is eternal destruction."

Sixth Oracle. 24:21,22.

As Albright points out (JBL, 1944, Vol. 63, No. 3, p. 227), the only time the Kenites (metalsmiths) were an autonomous people was in the Mosaic Age, so that the oracle could not have come from the tenth century, as suggested by many. Asshur (v. 22) was the name of an Arab tribe that lived in the same area as the Kenites (cf. Gen 25:3); but it is also the name for the Assyrians. The latter had no contact with the Kenites as a distinct people. A switching of two letters in the word burned (AV wasted) would make the line read, "Kain (the Kenite) shall belong to 'ēber ('the Hebrew')." The Kenites were indeed assimilated into Israel, and as part of northern Israel (Jud 4:17; 5:24) were taken into captivity by the Assyrians in 722. However, W. F. Albright takes "Asshur" as a verb, "I gaze"; but this makes little sense even with an emendation.

Then he saw the Kenite and . . . said,
"Enduring is your dwelling place;
Your nest is set in the rock.
Nevertheless Kain (the Kenite) will be burned,
Until Asshur shall take you away captive."

Seventh Oracle. 24:23,24.

We follow Albright in part in the translation of this difficult passage. In the first line we prefer the Aramaic word ḥayâ, "to show or make known," to a similar Arabic root meaning "to gather." Albright says the passage refers to the irruption of Mediterranean peoples that brought the Philistines from the Aegean isles into the land of Canaan in stages during the second millennium. The question again arises, Is Asshur the distant Assyrians, or possibly just an Arab tribe related to the Midianites through Abraham's wife Keturah? The latter would fit the view that Balaam was speaking about the early sea peoples from the Aegean world. The former view is variously interpreted to mean (1) Asshur (Syria) of the Seleucids; or (2) Asshur as Persia, and "ships from Kittim" as Alexander the Great (cf. I Macc 1:1).

23. And he took up his parable and said,
"Isles which are known on the side of the north,
24. Even ships from the coast of Kittim,
They shall afflict Asshur,
Even shall afflict his quarter (or, 'ēber, 'the Hebrew')
And he also shall perish."

II. Balak's Success in Turning Israel from the Lord. 25:1-18.

Numbers 31:16 shows that Balaam, who could not turn God away from the people, succeeded in turning some of the people away from God. The New Testament speaks of "the way of Balaam" (II Pet 2:15), meaning his love of "the wages of unrighteousness" (cf. Num 22–24); and "the doctrine of Balaam" (Rev 2:14), referring to this incident.

A. The Baal-peor Sin. 25:1-5.

2. They called the people unto the sacrifices of their gods. The subject they is feminine, referring to the daughters of Moab, with whom the men of Israel committed fornication. Balak, with Balaam's advice (Rev 2:14), used this method to weaken Israel. 3. Joined himself unto Baal-peor. Possibly Baal of Beth-peor (Deut 3:29; 4:46). In the Baal cult, spring festivals dramatized, in act, the mating of Baal with the goddess of fertility. Archaeological discoveries have revealed that the devotees of Baal practiced prostitution as a part of their worship. This sordid practice was adopted by the Israelites. Legislation against male and female prostitution is given in Deut 23:17. 4. Take all the heads of the people. Summon the elders to perform judgment. And hang them up. That is, the fornicators. The verb is somewhat obscure. It may mean "to slay them." Before the sun (ASV) means "openly."

B. Zeal of Phinehas. 25:6-18.

8. He went after the man . . . into the tent. The rare term qūbbâ, meaning "vaulted tent," designates the bedchamber where Phinehas caught them in the act (Delitzsch).

11. While he was zealous for my sake. Literally, zealous with my zeal. Phinehas had championed God's zealous hatred of sin. Such perfect hatred of sin is behind all the "difficult" plagues and imprecations of the Bible. 13. An everlasting priesthood. Because of this covenant of peace (v. 12), the descendants of Phinehas would become the high priests of Israel (cf. I Sam 14:3; 22:11,20). They continued so throughout the history of the Tabernacle and the Temple.

14. A chief house. The house of a father (AV, marg.), as used in 1:2, and elsewhere, means a subdivision of a tribe. 15. Cozbi, the daughter of Zur. This man is listed as one of the five kings of Midian. Here he is called "head of a clan." 17. Vex the Midianites. Slaying of a king's daughter could only mean war. God reminded Israel that they had a righteous reason to be at war with Midian. The Midianites and Moabites were confederates in opposing God's chosen people, both in the hiring of Balaam (22:4) and in this matter of Peor (v. 18).

Part Three. Preparation for Entering the Land. 26:1–36:13.

From this point to the end of Numbers 36, the subject matter is directly connected with Israel's entry into the promised land, a new mustering of the warriors (ch. 26), problems of inheritance by daughters, and the consecration of a successor to Moses (ch. 27), the dividing of the land and various directions for settlement of the land (chs. 32; 34) and the establishment of the Levitical cities (ch. 35).

I. Second Census in the Plains of Moab. 26:1-65.

5. Reuben, the eldest son of Israel. This census, in contrast to the one at Sinai, lists the families of the different tribes with their inheritance in view (cf. Gen 46). 11. The children of Korah died not. Not all the family of Korah were destroyed. Probably Korah had grown sons, with households of their own, who did not have to share their father's judgment (cf. comment on ch. 16). Some of the sons of Korah became famous in Israel. The prophet Samuel and the singer Heman were among them (I Chr 6:33-37; cf. Ps 88, the title).

51. Six hundred thousand and a thousand seven hundred and thirty. Israel multiplied phenomenally in Egypt (Ex 1:20). Why then, after thirty-eight years of wilderness wandering, did the nation remain approximately the same number as when at Sinai. The answer lies in verses 64,65, which show that only three out of an original 603,550 (Num 2:32) remained alive. Also Israel had been through several serious plagues in this period, the last of which took 29,000 lives. 53. Unto these the land shall be divided. In addition to supplying information for military purposes, this census was also to provide a basis for dividing the land. The larger tribes were to inherit more land and the smaller less, with the actual placing of tribes to be decided by lot (26:54-56; 33:54).

59. Amram's wife was Jochebed, the daughter of Levi . . . and she bare unto Amram Aaron and Moses, and Miriam. Some suggest that Amram and Jochebed were progenitors but not father and mother of Moses. They say that the genealogy of Kohath, Amram, and Moses is too short for there to have been 8,600 Kohathites (3:27,28) in Moses' day from a month old upward. However, if Moses' father had children by other wives and his uncles each had children by several wives, all of whom had begun another generation (Moses being eighty before he left Egypt), then 8,600 cousins of Moses' age, along with second and third cousins down to those a month old, would not be an unreasonable number to expect.

II. The Law of Inheritance. 27:1-11.

4. Give unto us therefore a possession among the brethren of our father. The Manassite Zelophehad had five daughters and no sons. These daughters pointed out that if they, as daughters, could not inherit land, then their father's inheritance would be lost. God confirmed to Moses the well-known provision by which daughters might inherit land (Josh 17:3-6). But the next in line of inheritance were to be paternal brothers of the deceased, then paternal uncles, and then the nearest kinsman. However, the daughters were to be free to marry, and their children would continue their father's genealogy and inherit his land. Thus was Jair in the line of Manasseh in 32:41 and Deut 3:14 (cf. also I Chr 2:34,35). Similar to this was the law of levirate marriage, by which a widow without children married the nearest kin of her husband, that his name and inheritance might not be cut off. Both of these laws were based on the principle that the land which the Lord gave to a family should never be sold or allowed to pass out of that family (Lev 25:23). The custom of inalienable property is now known to have been in practice long before the time of Moses, as the false adoptions at Nuzu testify (C. H. Gordon, Old Testament Times, p. 101). The Hebrews usually followed their ancestral tradition by which an inheritance passed from father to sons (Deut 25:5-10). But in Egypt, where they had spent many years, inheritance passed through mothers. Under an extenuating circumstance, that is what is being allowed in the text.

III. Appointment of Moses' Successor. 27:12-23.

12. Get thee up into this mount Abarim. Abarim was the name of the range that abuts on the geologic cleft which forms the Jordan Valley and the Salt Sea (Num 33:47,48). A part of this range, called Mount Pisgah, had a peak called Nebo, where Moses eventually died (Deut 34:1). Probably the town called Nebo (Num 32:38) gave its name to this prominence. It is evident that in 32:1 the city Jazer gave its name to its area, and for the same reason the people of Tyre were sometimes called Sidonians.

16. The God of the spirits of all flesh. See note on 16:22. 17. Which may go out . . . and . . . in before them. Hebrew frequently uses antonyms to express totality. Joshua would be the man who could see them through everything. That the congregation of the Lord be not as sheep which have no shepherd. Moses had just been reminded that he would not enter the land because of his sin over "the waters of Meribah" in Kadesh. But Moses' spirit was like that of Christ, who without self-pity, though rejected and facing Calvary, was moved with compassion for the multitude and saw them as sheep having no shepherd (Mt 9:36).

18. Take thee Joshua . . . a man in whom is the spirit. The word spirit has no article in Hebrew. Though the primary reference here is to Joshua's capacity, he also received divine endowment. The Bible says he "was full of the spirit of wisdom; for Moses had laid his hands upon him" (Deut 34:9). Lay thine hand upon him. The laying on of hands as a symbol of the conferring of authority or the imputing of responsibility is ancient Biblical practice. Jacob followed this custom when conveying blessing on Joseph's sons (Gen 48:14). The people of Israel transferred their responsibility by laying hands on the Levites (Num 8:10), and the Levites referred their own guilt to the atonement bullocks by laying on of hands (8:12). The practice was continued in the synagogue and adopted by the apostles (Acts 6:6; I Tim 4:14).

19. Give him a charge in their sight. The Hebrew says command him. The command was to all the people as well as to Joshua (see Deut 31). 20. Thou shalt put some of thine honour upon him, that all the congregation . . . may be obedient. This honor was the authority Joshua needed in order to have the respect of the people as their leader. 21. He shall stand before Eleazar . . . who shall ask counsel for him after the judgment of Urim. Joshua's authority was not to be equal to that of Moses, whose communion with the Lord was direct (Num 7:89; 12:7,8). Joshua would depend upon the use of the Urim and Thummim (Ex 28:30) by Eleazar the priest. We do not know, today, how the priest used this means of determining God's will.

IV. Third Priestly Scroll. 28:1–29:40.

The two chapters of Num 28; 29, like Lev 23, give the whole ritual year in outline. But here the quantities of offerings are in view, looking forward to Israel's settlement in the land. The months are numbered, and the year is further divided by the observance of a festival at the opening of the seventh month (Num 29:1). The early Hebrew religious calendar was controlled by respect for the agricultural seasons, as is seen from the name of the month Abib, "the first ripe barley" (Ex 13:4), and from the tenth century Israelite tablet, the Gezer Calendar (G. E. Wright, Biblical Archaeology, pp. 180,181). Such dependence on solar seasons (Deut 16:9) kept the calendar of the Israelites from revolving, as does the Arab religious calendar today, for the Hebrews put in an extra month when necessary. In these chapters the months (the new moons) are marked by the blowing of silver trumpets, providing a practical means to carry out the ritual year here prescribed. In their rustic simplicity the Hebrews avoided the complicated problems of the Egyptian 365-day calendar, based on observation of stars, which, though sophisticated, was also one-quarter of a day off, and in due time reversed the calendar in relation to the seasons. On the other hand, the Hebrews seem to have borrowed the Egyptian system of numbering the months, while most Semites named their months. Israel did not do this officially, however, until after the Exile, when they adopted the Babylonian designations.

A. Introduction. 28:1,2.

2. My bread for my sacrifices made by fire. God's food here referred to was not that which the priests received as their due, but rather the food that went up in smoke at the fire offerings. The thought is that God eats and drinks with his worshipers, which, far from being a primitive notion, is carried over into the NT in the parallel ordinance of the Lord's table, the Communion.

B. Daily Offerings. 28:3-8.

5. An ephah of flour . . . an hin of beaten oil. The flour was sōlet, a fine flour, and the oil was from beaten or crushed olives, very expensive, though prescribed at Sinai and repeated here because the items were specifically for those living a settled life in the land.

C. Sabbath Offerings. 28:9,10.

10. Beside the continual burnt offering. The offerings were cumulative, the Sabbath offering being added to the daily offering, and so on with the rest throughout these two chapters.

D. Monthly Offerings. 28:11-15.

11. In the beginnings of your months (new moons). Since the quantities of offerings is the point stressed, the directions for the blowing of silver trumpets (cf. 10:10) are omitted, though stressed as part of the religious festival in the beginning of the seventh month (29:1). According to 10:10, the trumpets were regularly blown at the new moons. The custom was possibly designed to have civil as well as religious significance for the people. 15. One kid of the goats for a sin offering. A sin offering was added to care for sins that had not been atoned for during that month.

E. Yearly Offerings. 28:16–29:40.

1) Feast of Unleavened Bread. 28:16-25.

16. The fourteenth day of the first month is the passover. No offering is specified for the Passover, because these instructions are for offerings by the priests. The Passover lamb ceremony was a family affair (Ex 12:3-14,21,22). 17. In the fifteenth day . . . is the feast. The Feast of Unleavened Bread (maṣṣôt) was to be kept from the fifteenth to the twenty-first of the first month (Ex 12:15-17). The first and seventh days were to be sabbaths, when no "servile" work was to be done (Num 28:18,25).

24. The meat (food) of the sacrifice made by fire . . . shall be offered beside the continual burnt offering. In addition to the daily offerings, these special ones were to be offered each day of the feast.

2) Feast of Weeks. 28:26-31.

26. When ye bring a new meat (cereal) offering . . . unto the Lord, after your weeks be out. Leviticus 23:16 gives the key to understanding these words. On the day following the seven sabbaths after the Feast of Unleavened Bread (Pentecost, Gr., "fiftieth day"), the people were to offer a cereal offering of the first fruits. The feast sacrifices to be presented at this time were the same as those offered at the time of unleavened bread. 29. A several tenth deal unto one lamb. A tenth of an ephah was to be offered along with each lamb. (See the same expression in vv. 13,21).

3) Feast of Trumpets. 29:1-6.

1. In the seventh month, on the first day . . . ye shall have an holy convocation. The new moon of the seventh month was a day of accumulated sacrifices, including the daily sacrifices, the regular new moon sacrifices, plus those that marked the beginning of the second half of the year (cf. Lev 23:24).

4) Day of Atonement. 29:7-11.

7. On the tenth day of this seventh month . . . ye shall afflict your souls. Special mention is made of repentance and soul-searching on this high day when the priest entered within the veil to make atonement for himself and all the people (Lev 16:29-34; 23:26-32).

5) Feast of Tabernacles. 29:12-40.

12. On the fifteenth day of the seventh month . . . ye shall keep a feast. This feast was the climax of the religious year. The attention paid to the offering of bullocks each day indicates the importance of the feast. Seventy bullocks in all were offered, beginning with thirteen on the first day, twelve on the second, and so on, down to seven on the seventh day. Then followed an eighth day sabbath of offerings. All this was in addition to the regular daily offerings. As in the case of the monthly blowing of trumpets (10:10), it is assumed here that such details as dwelling in booths are well known (Lev 23:40-44). Animal sacrifices were multiplied at this season because it was a "feast" (ḥag) not a "fast." Except for the Passover and the Day of Atonement, when there was afflicting of souls, the people were in festival mood on their special days. Though some sin offerings were always prescribed, most of these offerings were consecration and thanksgiving offerings.

39. Beside your vows, and your free-will offerings. In addition to presenting the prescribed offerings, the people were always encouraged to take vows of consecration (Num 6) and to make voluntary offerings in gratitude to God for his bounteous provision.

V. The Validity of Women's Vows. 30:1-16.

Every culture devises ways of making human intention binding. In civil matters the Bible world used both the signed document and sworn testimony (oaths). In religious matters people made vows. The unspoken intention was made binding when embodied in speech. Laws regulating vows are taken up in Deut 23; Lev 27; and Num 6; but here special emphasis is laid on the validation of a woman's vow. The Lord directed that a woman's father or her husband was to invalidate her vows if he felt that she was not to be held responsible. He could uphold her vow by his silence or make it invalid by his veto. A father was to have absolute authority over an unmarried daughter in such matters, and a husband over a wife. Women were largely untaught concerning the details of religious ceremony and therefore could make rash pledges (see note on v. 6) or vows harmful to their husbands' households. A disaffected wife might purposely make a vow or pledge that would injure her husband. So his legal ability to invalidate his wife's oath protected his estate, since a vow might include the payment of a large sum. If the vow was the kind that placed an affliction or prohibition on the wife, the husband was free to validate the vow and so share this burden, or to veto it.

5. If her father disallow her. One of the verbs used to express invalidation of a woman's vow is henî, "to hinder, restrain, or frustrate." The root, though rare, is used mostly in Numbers and appears in 14:34 (see note), where we are told that, for forty years, God frustrated, or restrained, Israel from entering into the promised land. The same root is also used to describe what the spies did in "discouraging the hearts of the people" (32:7,9). Here in Numbers 30 provision is made for a daughter to be forgiven if she is hindered by her father in fulfilling her vow; and for a husband to "frustrate" the intention of his wife for the good of his household.

6. Or uttered ought out of her lips. The force of this clause is "a rash utterance from her lips." Moses spoke thus rashly at the waters of Meribah (Ps 106:32, 33).

15. If he . . . make them void . . . he shall bear her iniquity. To fail to keep a vow was a sin. If a husband did invalidate his wife's vow, he was to bear her iniquity. That is, he was to meet all ceremonial and legal requirements as if the sin were his own.

VI. War with Midian. 31:1-54.

The Lord commanded the destruction of the Midianites because they were the vile people responsible for the Baal-peor orgy (ch. 25). For light on the degradation of Canaanite worship, see G. E. Wright, Biblical Archaeology, pp. 111-119). When the Hebrew warriors returned from the battle, with the Midianite women and children as captives, Moses reminded them that these were the very women of Baal-peor, and that they were morally debased and must die. This seems a cruel judgment, but it was the lesser of two evils. The alternative was to allow the Midianites to live and corrupt Israel, which would have compounded human suffering as well as brought dishonor to God. The Midianite male children were also slain, for if they had been reared among the children of Israel, they would have destroyed the inheritance of Israel's sons. The only ones saved alive were the virgin girls, who could be assimilated into Israel. In later years the same principle was applied in those cases in which non-Israelite women (but never men) became a part of the Messianic line (e.g., Rahab and Ruth).

Nothing is told of the actual fighting with Midian, which indicates that the central purpose of this lengthy chapter is to set forth the law relative to the booty and captives of war. Otherwise the defeat of Midian might have been mentioned in a few verses (cf. the treatment of the victories over Arad, Sihon, and Og; Num 21). This law specified that all booty was to be purified, either by fire or with "the water for impurity" (31:23, ASV; 19:9). Half of the spoil (of captives and animals) was to go to the men of war, and the other half to those who remained behind. Then one five-hundredth of the soldiers' half was to be given to the priests as an offering to the Lord. One fiftieth of that belonging to the rest of the congregation was to be given to the Levites. After the defeat of Midian, the soldiers made a special offering of gold and jewels they had taken. This they turned over to the sanctuary "to make an atonement" for their "souls."

A. Destruction of Midian. 31:1-18.

3. Avenge the Lord of Midian. To avenge is "to visit just or merited punishment on a wrongdoer" (Webster). The Lord called on Israel to visit such punishment on Midian. This commandment, however, is no justification for any of the holy wars of the Christian era for the simple reason that in this era there has been no Moses to learn through revelation just when and where the sovereign God wills to avenge himself. 6. Phinehas . . . to the war, with the holy instruments, and the trumpets . . . in his hand. This use of the Urim and trumpets by the priest in battle (27:21; I Sam 28:6), the unique names of the five kings of Midian (Num 31:8; Jud 21:12), and the taking of the Midianite virgins as wives are all details that run counter to the view advanced by some that the chapter is late Midrash and therefore has little historical value (ICC, p. 418). 17. Kill every male among the little ones. The Lord, not Moses, bears the responsibility for this slaughter. Had not God described himself as one "visiting the iniquity of the fathers upon the children unto the third and fourth generation of them that hate me"? (Ex 20:5) Refusal to reckon with the prerogative of a righteous Sovereign to judge sin reduces him to something less than sinful man.

B. Purification of Warriors. 31:19-24.

23. Every thing that may abide the fire. In this provision the Lord differentiated between those things that could be purified by fire (metals) and those that could not (people and wooden articles). Everything that could not, including the warriors and their captives, had to be purified with "the water for impurity" made with the ashes of a red heifer according to the law of chapter 19.

C. Dividing the Spoils of War. 31:25-54.

30. One portion of fifty . . . unto the Levites. The Lord required that one five-hundreth of the warriors' half be assigned to the priests as their portion (v. 28). Here one fiftieth of the people's half is designated for the Levites. Multiples of five, it seems, prevailed for tax purposes in the Semitic world. Joseph set up a law in Egypt taxing the Egyptians one-fifth of their yield (Gen 47:26).

32. Six hundred thousand . . . sheep. It is claimed that these numbers are too high to be authentic. The census in chapter 1 and that in 26 numbered over 600,000 fighting men in Israel's army. Compare with this David's census of 800,000 fighting men for Israel and 500,000 fighting men for Judah (II Sam 24:9). It is not logical for critics to take David's census seriously but assume that the Mosaic figures are unreliable. The Egyptian culture behind Moses was even more sophisticated than that behind David. There is no evidence to prove that Moses' figures are not correct.

VII. Settlement of Two and One-Half Tribes in Trans-Jordan. 32:1-42.

Reuben and Gad, who had much cattle, seeing that the lands of Jazer and Gilead were good for grazing, asked Moses if they might live there. Moses feared that the settling of two tribes on the east of Jordan might break the morale of the people, as "the evil report" of the spies had done thirty-seven years earlier. He reminded them of the tragic result of their fathers' unbelief at Kadesh. If they now, in turn, he said, avoided facing the enemy, it would bring similar results, and the nation would be destroyed. Reuben and Gad took this advice and willingly offered to fight with their brethren until all were settled in their inheritance, and then return to their homes. To this Moses agreed, with a final warning that to do less would constitute sin. And he added, "Be sure your sin will find you out" (v. 23). The two tribes promised to do as Moses commanded (v. 25). So Reuben, Gad, and half the tribe of Manasseh were given numerous cities in Trans-Jordan. They rebuilt and renamed the cities and provided walled enclosures for their cattle.

A. Moses' Response to Gad's and Reuben's Request. 32:1-33.

1. A very great multitude of cattle. Much of this was cattle that had been acquired through conquest (ch. 31). However, Israel had previously had some cattle in the wilderness, which was not all barren (cf. 20:19). The land of Jazer, and the land of Gilead. Jazer was on the border of Ammonite territory (see v. 32; cf. LXX, Num 21:24). Trans-Jordan was divided into two parts, north and south of the river Jabbok

(Josh 12:2). 4. Even the country which the Lord smote. The land is described not by nonexistent borders but by fortified cities (v. 3) which controlled certain areas. The figure of the Lord smiting the country reminds us of similar figures in the Book of the Wars of the Lord (21:14), which, like the great epic poems, Ex 15, Ps 68, and Hab 3, describes the Lord as a heroic warrior who founds or saves a nation. The same figure is dominant in the apocalyptic literature of the Bible, which describes the Lord's bringing the nation to its ultimate goal (cf. Isa 9:6—'El gibbôr, "the mighty hero").

7. Wherefore discourage ye the heart of the children of Israel. Moses was afraid their proposal might start a wave of complacency among the other tribes, who had yet to face the terrors of an unknown enemy. If a few rested on the laurels of past victory, would not all the others want to do the same? As a leader facing a problem of morale, Moses was justified in this stern treatment of the two tribes. Moses' choice of a verb reminds them of God's rebuke in 14:34 (cf. commentary); and his words stress that incident lest they again fail wholly to follow the Lord (32:11-13). The geographic separation of these tribes beyond Jordan eventually produced in them an indifference toward the welfare of the nation that Deborah, in her song, held up to scorn (Jud 5:16,17). Time proved that Moses' fears were well founded.

27. Every man armed for war. The root ḥālaṣ, "to gird for battle," is used in 32:17,20,21,27,30, and in 31:3. The hero's belt, ḥălîṣâ, with which he girded himself, was standard equipment for every warrior. See II Sam 2:21 (armor-belt) and Jud 14:19 (spoil-belts), which indicate that the stripping off of this girdle from a foe was the symbol of victory over him. Soldier's belts or "girdles" were such commonly accepted pieces of their equipment that in ancient Semitic, Egyptian, and Greek art, not only human but even divine heroes are shown wearing them. In keeping with this custom, the Messiah wears "righteousness as the belt of his waist and faithfulness the belt of his loins" (Isa 11:5). (See C. H. Gordon, "Belt Wrestling in the Bible World," Hebrew Union College Annual, Vol. XXIII, p. 131).

30. But if they will not pass over with you armed, they shall have possessions among you in the land of Canaan. In order to secure their possession in Trans-Jordan, they had to be girded for war in the presence of God as Israel crossed the Jordan, thus proving they believed God's promise regarding the land and were willing to trust him for ultimate victory. The tribes that chose to live east of Jordan assisted in the conquest of Canaan, then returned to their own inheritance.

B. Cities Rebuilt by Reuben and Gad. 32:34-38.

34-36. And the children of Gad built . . . fenced cities: and folds for sheep. That is, they rebuilt on top of ruins or simply took over and added to the captured cities. Many of these cities are named in the famous inscription of King Mesha of Moab, dating about 835, where the king of Moab says that "the men of Gad dwelt in the land of Ataroth," etc. The sheepfolds were rough stone enclosures such as are used to this day in the area (cf. Jn 10:1-18).

38. Nebo, and Baal-meon (their names being changed). Nebo may have been named after a Babylonian deity by the same name, while Baal was a popular god of the Canaanite pantheon. The Israelites reacted against giving pagan deities recognition in their own personal and place names. Scribes of later times often changed names that had contained the name of a pagan deity (e.g., in I Chr 8:33,34 two of Saul's sons are called Esh-baal and Merib-baal; in II Sam 4:4,8 they are Ish-bosheth and Mephibosheth).

C. Gilead taken by Manassites. 32: 39-42.

41. And took the small towns thereof, and called them Havoth-jair. The term havvôt, translated small towns, means "tent villages"; but this only shows that they were at one time such, for Jud 10:4 numbers them at thirty and calls them "cities." While no longer "tent cities," neither were they fortresses, as was Kenath, mentioned in the next verse, where the text speaks of Kenath and her daughters (AV, "villages"). The people who worked the fields while living in the hamlets could find refuge behind the walls of the mother city in times of invasion.

VIII. The Route from Egypt to the Jordan. 33:1-49.

Numbers 33 gives the itinerary of Israel's journeys from the day they left Egypt to their arrival on the banks of Jordan forty years later. In verse 2 the writer asserts that Moses wrote these facts according to the commandment of the Lord. The burden of proof rests on those who claim the chapter is a composite of several late documents, for there is no evidence that fraudulent authorship played any part in pre-Hellenistic Hebrew writing.

Nothing is known about that part of the journey outlined in verses 18-30. This passage describes the route during the silent thirty-seven years following the defeat at Hormah (14:15). The chapter does not mention Kadesh at the time the spies were sent out (v. 18). The reason may be that Kadesh is the name of an area as well as a city in the Wilderness of Paran-Sin and that Rithmah was a smaller oasis in the Kadesh area. The encampment covered a large area that could have included both towns (cf. v. 49). Wadi Abu Retemat (cf. Rithmah) is near the 'Ain Qadeis, which modern archaeologists are convinced was near Kadesh-barnea (KD, Vol. III, p. 243).

8. Wilderness of Etham. Called Shur in Ex 15:22. This was an ancient route used by the patriarchs (Gen 16:7; 20:1; 24:62; 25:18; 26:22). 13. Dophkah . . . Alush. Dophkah is now identified as Serâbit el-Khâdim, an Egyptian mining center (G. E. Wright, Biblical Archaeology, p. 64). All the places mentioned in verses 5-12 are found in the Exodus account except Dophkah and Alush. 15. Rephidim. Identified by archaeologists as Wâdī Refâyid, near Mount Sinai.

31. Moseroth. This is the place where Aaron died, according to Deut 10:6,7. It was near or on Mount Hor. In Deut 10:6,7 there is a different order of these towns, which suggests that this verse (31) speaks of earlier journeying in the area, while verses 37-39 coincide with Deut 10:6,7; Num 20:22-29.

36. Ezion-gaber (Elath). This is Tell el-Kheleifeh on the northern coast of the Gulf of Aqabah, where Solomon's copper refineries have been found. 42. Punon. Feinan, in northern Edom, mentioned in Byzantine sources, was also a copper-mining center (see G. E. Wright, Biblical Arch., Fig. 35). 43. Oboth. Identified as 'Ain el-Weiba, on the west side of the Arabah, about thirty miles south of the Salt Sea. 46. Dibon-gad. Diban, a few miles north of the Arnon. The tribe of Gad inherited it from the Amorites, who had taken it from the Moabites (21:27-30). It later became a capital of Moab, according to the Mesha inscription (835 B.C.).

49. They pitched . . . from Beth-jesimoth even unto Abel-shittim. The extent of Israel's encampment, as may be inferred from the verse, is in keeping with the large numbers given in the census lists.

IX. Directions for Settlement in Canaan. 33:50—35:34.

A. Expulsion of Inhabitants, Setting of Boundaries, Division of Land. 33:50—34:29. The section opens with an introductory formula (33:50), which is repeated in 35:1: "The Lord spoke unto Moses in the plains of Moab by the Jordan at Jericho." Moses instructed Israel to destroy all the stone idols, the molten images, and the high places of heathen worship they would find in Canaan. They were to drive out the pagan inhabitants, for failure to do so would allow these people to become thorns in their sides and would ultimately bring about Israel's own destruction.

Chapter 34 is a description of the ideal borders of the future homeland. Israel did not attain these borders until the time of David and Solomon. Even then they made some of their gains by means of treaty rather than by conquest. The actual dividing of the land into inheritances was to be done, God said, under the supervision of Joshua and Eleazar the priest, with the help of one prince from each tribe.

33:52. Drive out all the inhabitants. Translate: Dispossess all the inhabitants. Destroy all their pictures, i.e., their figured stones. (See W. F. Albright, The Archaeology of Palestine, Fig. 27, for Astarte plaques from the Late Bronze Age). 54. Every man's (family's) inheritance shall be in the place where his lot falleth. The size of the inheritance was determined by the size of the tribe, but the position was determined by lot.

34:3. Your south quarter shall be from the wilderness of Zin along by the coast of Edom. This general description, made specific in the next two verses, is proof that Edom's domain included considerable territory west of the Arabah. 4. The ascent of Akrabbim (Scorpion Pass).

Between this steep rise out of the Arabah and to Kadesh-barnea is the broken hill country called the Wilderness of Zin. Through it the southern border passed and then turned northwest near Kadesh ('Ain Qadeis) to follow Wadi el-'arish, the river of Egypt (v. 5), out to the Mediterranean.

7. Your north border: from the great sea ye shall point out for you mount Hor. Except for such outstanding features as Hamath, the sea of Chinnereth (Galilee), and the Jordan, most of the points on the north and eastern borders cannot now be identified with certainty (cf. comment on 20:23).

15. On this side Jordan near Jericho eastward, toward the sunrising. Comments by destructive critics on these words afford an excellent example of how the interpretation of Numbers has been obscured by a negative approach. The ICC claims that "at Jericho" is an unsuitable expression for describing the frontier line of the two and one-half tribes and that the phrase was just mechanically written. Following this view, the IB states that Jericho is described here as eastward, and therefore the sentence was written as from Canaan, and that the mention of Jericho is not exactly a full description of the territory asked for by these tribes. In a number of passages (22:1; 26:3,63; 34:15; 36:13) the phrase used is Yardēn Y'rēho, "The Jordan of Jericho." Numbers 34:15 and Josh 20:8 say, "Jordan of Jeriocho eastward," and then refer to it as the whole Trans-Jordan. The fact is that the word "Jordan" comes from an East Mediterranean word introduced by the Caphtorim and other Aegean people (Deut 2:23), and meant "the River" in their homeland, Crete (C. H. Gordon, Old Testament Times, p. 109 note). Hence these passages all refer to "the River (the Jordan) of Jericho" and all the land east of it. The definite article is used when the word Jordan stands alone, showing that it was a common noun, not a name. It is "The River" of that land, and Jericho was the most commanding fortress in that valley, thus "The River of Jericho."

17. These are the names of the men which shall divide the land unto you. These princes are named in the approximate order of the placement of the tribes in the land, beginning at Judah in the south and proceeding to Naphtali in the north. This seems to indicate that the lots for position (33:54) had already been cast and that these verses did not find their way into the text until after the events of Josh 14:1-5 (the casting of lots).

B. Levitical Cities and Cities of Refuge. 35:1-34. God directed the people to give to the Levites, from their possessions, cities to dwell in and the pasture land around them. Six of these cities were to be "cities of refuge" for manslayers (not murderers). Forty-two other Levitical cities with pasturage were to provide the Levites' living quarters. The manslayer (Deut 19) is defined as one who kills in error and must be protected from the gō'ēl, "the kinsman-redeemer," who, among other things, was blood avenger for his slain brother. The protection of the manslayer was a lofty moral principle assuring the administration of justice. A manslayer was to flee to one of these cities and stay there until he stood before the congregation for judgment. The Lord here declared that men who murdered must die, and, in accordance with prevailing custom, the avenger of blood (the kinsman of the slain man) was to slay the murderer. This principle of blood revenge, which is still practiced by Bedouins in the Near East, is upheld in this chapter. It acts as an effective deterrent in communities where there is little or no established central authority. Such was to be the case in Israel for many years, until the rise of the United Monarchy. Even if a man was adjudged an accidental manslayer, the Lord said, he must dwell in the city of refuge until the death of the high priest, after which he might return to his own land. The Lord was careful to point out that murder is premeditated killing; a murderer is a killer guilty of hatred or lying in wait (ASV, v. 20). Further protection to assure justice required that a man should not be put to death on the testimony of a single witness (v. 30).

5. And ye shall measure. Some claim that the measurements given in this verse leave the city a mere point (IB, Vol. 2, p. 303). Close attention to the Hebrew text shows the following. Verse 4 says, "From the wall of the city verily outward, one thousand cubits." A rather literal rendering of verse 5 would be, "You shall measure from outside with respect to the city, on the east side two thousand cubits." "With respect to the city" could very well mean that this perimeter measurement was in addition to whatever the city measured.

31. Ye shall take no satisfaction for the life of a murderer. That is, no ransom price might be taken to save his life, nor might a manslayer give a ransom to come out of the city of refuge. Since shedding of human blood ceremonially polluted the land in which the Lord dwelt, no offering of animal sacrifice or payment of a price could cleanse the land, but only the blood of the one who had shed blood. This explains the OT concept of blood-guiltiness (Ps 51: 4,14) as an encroachment on God's purity.

X. Marriage of Heiresses. 36:1-13.

Elders from the tribe of Manasseh complained that the legislation given concerning the daughters of Zelophehad (ch. 27) could result in the loss of Zelophehad's portion of their inheritance should his daughters marry outside their tribe. Moses, under divine authority, agreed with this and required that the daughters of Zelophehad marry within their own tribe, Manasseh. The property was inalienable and could not be removed even from tribe to tribe (v. 7). The principle of inalienable property Israel held in common with Near Eastern peoples long before she merged as a nation. The real estate contracts of a fifteenth century north Mesopotamian town, Nuzu, center around this principle (cf. comment on 27:4). It continued to control the thinking of faithful Israelites even in the days of Ahab and Naboth (I Kgs 21:3). Thus these women had to marry their paternal cousins (Num 36: 11), who could have been even second or third cousins.

13. These are the commandments . . . in the plains of Moab. This verse forms a fitting epilogue to Part Three (chs. 26–36), the legislation of which is pointed solely toward Israel's entry into the Land of Promise.

DEUTERONOMY

INTRODUCTION

Title. The English title of the book of Deuteronomy is apparently based on the LXX's mistranslation of the phrase, "a copy of this law" (17:18), as to deuteronomion touto, "this second law." The Jewish title, dᵉvārim, "words," arises from the custom of using the opening word(s) of a book as its name. Deuteronomy opens with the statement, "These are the words which Moses spake" (1:1a, ASV). Since ancient suzerainty treaties began in precisely this way, the Jewish title draws attention to one of the clues which identify the literary character of this book.

Date and Authorship. The origin of Deuteronomy is of crucial significance in modern higher critical study of the Pentateuch and, indeed, in studies of Old Testament literature and theology in general. According to the older Developmental Hypothesis, Deuteronomy originated in the seventh century B.C. and was the basis for Josiah's reform (cf. II Kgs 22:3–23:25), allegedly in the interests of a centralized cultus (cf. Commentary on Deut 12:4-14). That view in modified forms continues among negative critics; but some would suggest a post-Exilic date, and others trace the Deuteronomic legislation to the early monarchic and even pre-monarchic period. Significant for the dating of the several alleged documents of the Pentateuch is the tendency to explain the supposed conflict of their codes not by resort to a long chronological evolution but by positing different geographic - cultic sources for them. Deuteronomy, in particular, is then traced to a Shechemite sanctuary. Instead of associating Deuteronomy with the first four books of the Pentateuch, one modern approach thinks in terms of a Tetrateuch and of a Deuteronomic literary-historical tradition comprising all the books from Deuteronomy through II Kings.

Current orthodox Christian scholarship joins older Christian and Jewish tradition in accepting the plain claims of Deuteronomy itself to be the farewell, ceremonial addresses of Moses to the Israelite assembly in the plains of Moab. Deuteronomy 31:9 and 24 state that Moses wrote as well as spoke "the words of this law." Some theocratic officer, in all likelihood, completed the document by recording Moses' death (ch. 34) and probably Moses' witness song (ch. 32) and testament (ch. 33). Possibly he also added certain other brief skeletal elements to this legal document.

The unity and authenticity of Deuteronomy as a Mosaic product are confirmed by the remarkable conformity of its structure to that of the suzerainty type of covenant or treaty in its classic, mid-second millennium B.C. form. (See further below and consult Commentary for details. See also M. G. Kline, "Dynastic Covenant," WTJ, XXIII (Nov. 1960), 1, pp. 1-15.)

Historical Occasion. It is only within the framework of the administration of God's redemptive covenant that Deuteronomy can be adequately interpreted. The promises given to the patriarchs and finally and truly fulfilled in Christ had a provisional and typical fulfillment in the covenants mediated to Israel through Moses. In the Sinaitic Covenant the theocracy was established, with Moses as earthly representative of the Lord's kingship over Israel. Then, when the rebellious exodus generation had perished in the wilderness and Moses' own death was imminent, it was necessary to renew the covenant to the second generation. The central, decisive act of the ceremony was the consecration of the servant people by an oath to their divine Lord. In particular, God's reign as symbolically represented in the earthly, mediatorial dynasty must be confirmed by securing from Israel a commitment to obey Joshua as the successor to Moses in that dynasty.

Part of the standard procedure followed in the ancient Near East when great kings thus gave covenants to vassal peoples was the preparation of a text of the ceremony as the treaty document and witness. The book of Deuteronomy is the document prepared by Moses as a witness to the dynastic covenant which the Lord gave to Israel in the plains of Moab (cf. 31:26).

COMMENTARY

I. Preamble: Covenant Mediator. 1:1-5.

Ancient suzerainty treaties began with a preamble in which the speaker, the one who was declaring his lordship and demanding the vassal's allegiance, identified himself. The Deuteronomic preamble identifies the speaker as Moses (v. 1a), but Moses as the earthly, mediatorial representative of the Lord (v. 3b), the heavenly Suzerain and ultimate Sovereign of this covenant.

These are the words (v. 1a, ASV). With this introductory formula the extra-biblical treaties began. The site of the covenant renewal ceremony to which Deuteronomy witnesses was the Jordan area in the land of Moab (vv. 1a, 5a; cf. 4:44-46). The time was the last month of the fortieth year after the Exodus (v. 3a), when the men of war of that generation had all perished (2:16), the conquest of Trans-Jordan was accomplished (v. 4; 2:24ff.), and the time of Moses' death was at hand. It was especially this last circumstance that occasioned the renewal of the covenant. God secured the continuity of the mediatorial dynasty by requiring of Israel a pledge of obedience to his new appointee, Joshua (cf. 31:3; 34:9), and a new vow of consecration to himself. The ceremony is described as a declaration or exposition of this law (v. 5), since the stipulations occupied so central and extensive a place in suzerainty covenants. The location of this assembly is apparently further described in verse 2b. Although the mention of otherwise unknown localities makes interpretation uncertain, the purpose of the notation in verses 1b,2 seems to be to orient the Moab assembly historically as much as geographically by indicating that it lay at the end of the journey from Horeb via the Arabah wilderness. For Israel, the journey to Canaan by this route proved to be of forty years duration (v. 3), although the original route they followed to Paran was normally only an eleven-day trek (v. 2). At Paran, on the southern border of Canaan, however, Israel had rebelled, refusing to enter the land (Num 12:16ff.), and so that generation was sentenced to die in the wilderness. Now their children had arrived via the Arabah route from "Suph" (presumably the Gulf of Aqabah) for an eastern approach to Canaan through the land of Moab. Both the direction of approach to Canaan and the length of the wanderings spoke of a history of covenant breaking and of postponed inheritance. There is, thus, an interesting contrast between the preamble's look south from Moab into the past of failure and curse and Moses' closing look north from Moab into Israel's future of fulfillment and blessing (Deut 34:1-4).

II. Historical Prologue: Covenant History. 1:6—4:49.

The preamble in the international suzerainty treaties was followed by a historical survey of the relationship of lord and vassal. It was written in an I-thou style, and it sought to establish the historical justification for the lord's continuing reign. Benefits allegedly conferred upon the vassal by the lord were cited, with a view to grounding the vassal's allegiance in a sense of gratitude complementary to the sense of fear which the preamble's awe-inspiring identification of the suzerain was calculated to produce. When treaties were renewed, the historical prologue was brought up to date. All these formal features characterize Deut 1:6—4:49.

The historical prologue of the Sinaitic Covenant had referred to the deliverance from Egypt (Ex 20:2b). Deuteronomy begins at the scene of the Sinaitic Covenant and continues the history up to the covenant renewal assembly in Moab, emphasizing the recent Trans-Jordanian victories. When, still later, Joshua again renewed the covenant to Israel, he continued the narrative in his historical prologue through the events of his own leadership of Israel, the conquest and settlement in Canaan (Josh 24:2-13).

A. From Horeb to Hormah. 1:6—2:1.

6-8. By the end of a year's encampment in the Sinai area, where the covenant was ratified and the Tabernacle established as God's dwelling in Israel, the time had come for the next decisive step in the fulfillment of the promises made to the fathers (vv. 6,8b). The initiative in the advance against the land of promised possession was provided by the Lord's command, Go in and possess the land (v. 8; cf. Num 10:11-13). On verse 7b, see Gen 15:18ff.

9-18. With the hour of his death at hand, Moses was concerned to confirm the authority of those who must bear the burden of rule after him. Of primary importance was the succession of Joshua, to which he would presently refer (1:38; 3:21,28), but now Moses reminded Israel of the authorization of other judicial officers. For the original account, see Ex 18:13ff. 10. As the stars of heaven. The very circumstance that gave rise to the need for these judicial assistants to Moses, namely, the multiplication of Abraham's seed, was itself evidence of the Lord's faithfulness in fulfilling his promises (Gen 12:2; 15:5; etc.), and thus afforded encouragement to Israel to advance in faith to take possession of Canaan (cf. Deut 1:7,8). God's faithful mediator, reflecting the goodness of the Lord, prayed for the full realization of all the promises of the Abrahamic Covenant (v. 11). 17. For the judgment is God's. This reason for righteous administration of justice was at the same time a reminder of the theocratic nature of the Israelite kingdom, a reminder that God was the Lord who was making covenant anew with them that day.

19-40. Over against the covenant faithfulness of the Lord (cf. 6-18) there had been the infidelity and disobedience of Israel. The fact that the Lord was renewing his covenant against this background of the vassal's past rebellions further magnified his grace and goodness (cf. introductory comments on II. Historical Prologue). The particular sin of the people of Israel recalled on the eve of their conquest of Canaan was their refusal to advance into Canaan when they were first commanded to do so, some thirty-eight years earlier. For the original account, see Numbers 13; 14.

At that time Israel's approach to Canaan was from the south (Deut 1:19). Moses clearly advised them that Canaan was theirs for the taking (vv. 20,21; cf. 7,8; Gen 15:16); yet when so ordered by the Lord (cf. Num 13:1ff.), he consented to Israel's strategy of reconnaissance before attack (Deut 1:22-25). 26,27a. Ye rebelled . . . And ye murmured. Israel's response to the report of the spies was one of faithless fear and refusal to advance. 27b. He hath brought us forth . . . to destroy us. Israel's perversity went to the extreme of interpreting their election as an expression of God's hatred of them; he had delivered them from the Egyptians only that the Canaanites might kill them! 29-33. They could not be dissuaded – ye did not believe (v. 32) – from their open revolt against the Lord's covenant program by all Moses' pleas and assurances of God's fatherly and supernatural help, such as they had experienced in Egypt and in the wilderness. 34. The Lord heard . . . and was wroth. Their unbelief provoked the divine verdict, sealed by an oath, sentencing them to exile from the homeland which they had refused to enter (v. 35), exile unto death in the wilderness (v. 40). 36-38. Save Caleb. . . . Joshua. In the announcement of judgment there was a manifestation of God's covenant mercy, for not only the godly spies Caleb and Joshua were to be spared to enter Canaan at a later day, but the whole second generation of Israel as well (v. 39). Therein lay the promise of a gracious new beginning – now being fulfilled in the Deuteronomic covenant renewal. 37. The Lord was angry with me. Israel's rebelliousness became the occasion for a failure on Moses' part to fulfill properly his calling as a type of the messianic mediator who is always submissive to the Father's will (cf. 3:26; 4:21; 32:50ff.). That happened at the return to Kadesh after the thirty-eight years of wandering (cf. Num 20:1ff.), but it is mentioned here because its consequence was the exclusion of Moses along with the older generation from Canaan (cf. v. 35). It was this that necessitated the appointment of Joshua as heir to the mediatorial dynasty – Joshua "shall go in thither" (v. 38) – to lead the spared little ones (v. 39) into Canaan.

1:41–2:1. After the people of Israel had capped their revolt against the Lord's will with a presumptuous and disastrous assault on Canaan, in the vain hope of escaping God's verdict against them (1:41-44; cf. Num 14:40ff.), they remained a while in Kadesh (1:46). Then, as God had commanded (1:40; cf. Num 14:25), they wandered unto their wilderness graves (2:1a). So the time was spent in the area to the southwest of the Edomites until the fortieth year (2:1b; cf. 2:14-16).

B. Advance to the Arnon. 2:2-23.

2-8. Cf. Num 20:14-21. 3b. Turn you northward. The divine mandate to advance on Canaan given a generation earlier (cf. 2:14-16) was now repeated. On the route, apparently around the north of Edom and across the way of the Arabah which leads from the Gulf of Aqabah to the Dead Sea, see Num 20:21ff.; 21:1-12; 33:36-44. Uncertainty as to the route arises from our inability to identify many of the sites, but it is not probable that 2:8 or Num 21:4 suggests a southern detour as far as the Gulf of Aqabah as part of a circuit of Mount Seir. 4. They shall be afraid of you. Esau's fear of Israel (contrast Gen 32:3ff.) was displayed by his blocking entry into Seir (Num 20:20). 5. Do not contend with them (RSV). The struggle for the birthright was long since settled; Canaan was Jacob's. Nevertheless, Esau had his possession, too, in Mount Seir (cf. Gen 36), and Israel was forbidden to contend for it. (See Deut 23:7,8 for the relatively privileged position of the Edomites in Israel's assembly.) When the policy dictated by the Lord was followed, the Edomites refused passage through their land, thus compelling Israel to make a circuit about their borders (v. 8; cf. Num 20:14ff.). The Numbers passage does not say that the Edomites refused to sell provisions to the Israelites once it was clear that Israel was content to go around Edom. Moreover, Deut 2:6 and 29 do not clearly state that Edom did sell provisions to Israel. For even 2:29a possibly refers only to the last clause in verse 28 (cf. 2:29b with 23:3,4). Hence there is no contradiction between Numbers and Deuteronomy on this matter. 7. Thou hast lacked nothing. This verse is one more reminder of God's past benevolences bestowed on Israel even during the execution of his judgment of exile (cf., e.g., 32:1).

9-23. Israel came into contact next with the descendants of Abraham's nephew Lot, the Moabites and Ammonites (Gen 19:37,38). 9. Distress not the Moabites. Though these groups did not enjoy the Edomites' privilege of entrance into Israel's assembly (23:3ff.), they too had possessions for which Israel was not to contend (cf. 5,19). Each nation had dispossessed a tall Anakim-like people usually known as Rephaim, but called Emim by the Moabites (vv. 10,11) and Zamzummim by the Ammonites (vv. 20,21; cf. Gen 14:5). The tribe of Anak is mentioned in Egyptian execration texts and the Rephaim in Ugaritic administrative texts. 12. The Horites . . . dwelt in Seir beforetime. In connection with the territorial acquisitions of each nation, it is noted that similarly the Lord had dispossessed the earlier Horite (i.e., Hurrian) population of Seir in favor of the Edomites (cf. 5b,22). Also, in each case one further comparison is made; respectively, the Lord's bestowal of an inheritance on Israel (v. 12b) and the dispossession of the Avvim by the Caphtorim (v. 23). If the notice concerning Israel's inheritance was not appended by some unnamed official, like the one who evidently completed the Deuteronomic document after Moses' death, then it doubtless refers to the conquest of Trans-Jordan.

By all these historical notices the covenant servant Israel was advised that the Lord had a hegemony over the territory about the promised land. In his all-controlling providence he had repeatedly dispossessed great nations – even the Anakim, whose presence in Canaan had frightened Israel into rebellion against the Lord a generation before (cf. 1:28; 2:14,15). And the Lord had done this in behalf of various peoples who enjoyed no such special status of covenant calling as elect Israel enjoyed. With what confidence, therefore, Israel might obey the Lord's summons to rise up (v. 13) and cross the mountain torrents of Zered and Arnon (v. 24), and soon the Jordan (cf. Josh 1:2). See Amos 9:7 for another lesson drawn from such historical data. The Zered marked the southern boundary of Moab, along whose eastern border Israel went, so approaching the frontiers of Ammon, which lay east and north of Moab (Deut 2:18,19; cf. 8b; Num 21:11ff.).

C. Conquest of Trans-Jordan. 2:24–3:29.

Across the Arnon (2:24), Moab's northern boundary, Israel would encounter Amorites. Sihon the Amorite ruled from the Arnon to the Jabbok (2:36; cf. Num 21:24), with his capital at Heshbon (2:26), and Og the Amorite (cf. 3:8) ruled from the Jabbok over northern Gilead and Bashan to Mount Hermon (3:4,8-10; cf. 3:13; Josh 12:5). The Amorites were protected by no such inviolability as the Edomites, Moabites, and Ammonites. The fact that an offer of peace was made to Sihon (2:26) indicates that his land in Trans-Jordania (which had earlier belonged to the Moabites and Ammonites; cf. Josh 13:25; 21:26; Jud 11:13) was not a part of Israel's promised land proper (cf. Deut 20:10). But his people, as a people of Canaan, fell under the hērem principle (see on 7:1-5; cf. 2:33-35; 3:6; 7:2,16; 20:14-17).

It was indeed the time when the Amorites should have ripened for judgment, which had been set as the hour for Israel's conquest of Canaan (cf. Gen 15:16). With the spread of these Amorites across the Jordan, there was a corresponding extension of the territory that would fall into Israel's possession by conquest. Therefore, a new divine order met Israel at the Arnon: Begin to take possession and contend (v. 24, RSV); and a new divine promise: This day will I begin to put the dread of thee . . . upon the nations (v. 25). The process of Sihon's fall was much the same as that of the fall of Amenophis II, the Pharaoh of the Exodus. Each was approached with a request to favor the Israelites (vv. 26-29), which he refused, because the Lord . . . hardened his spirit (v. 30). Each made a hostile advance against Israel (v. 32) and suffered defeat, as the Lord fought for His people (vv. 31,33ff.). (On 2:29, see comments on 2:2-8.) The upper course of the Jabbok to the east ran north and south, separating Sihon's kingdom from the Ammonites (2:37). 36. The Lord . . . delivered all unto us. In this victory, the beginning of the dispossession of the Amorites, there were demonstrated the irresistible power and absolute authority of the Lord's dominion exercised over and in behalf of Israel. For the original account of the conquest of Sihon, see Num 21:21ff.; for the conquest of Og, see Num 21:33ff. 3:2. I will deliver him . . . into thy hand. The advance against Og was also at God's command, accompanied by his promise of success (cf. 2:24,25); and victory was again the gift of the Lord (3:3). 5. Fortified with high walls (ASV). The height of the enemy's fortifications was not to arouse fear in the armies of the Lord, nor the size of their king (v. 11; cf. 2:11,20). Deuteronomy 3:8-11 summarizes the fruits of Israel's victories at Jahaz (2:32) and Edrei (3:1).

3:12-20. It was given to Moses to see both the beginning of the conquest under his leadership and also the distribution of the tribal allotments. For this latter event, see Numbers 32. 12. This land . . . gave I unto the Reubenites and . . . Gadites. The tribes of Reuben and Gad took the initiative in requesting the newly conquered land. But when Moses granted the request, he took account of particular triumphs gained in the north by the Manassite families of Machir, Jair, and Nobah (v. 14; cf. Num 32:39-42). To this half tribe of Manasseh was given the territory of Og, i.e., Gilead north from the Jabbok and Bashan (Deut 3:13,15; cf. Josh 13:29-31). To Reuben and Gad was given Sihon's land from the Jabbok in Gilead south to the Arnon, the tribe of Gad being located north of Reuben, with their boundary just above the Dead Sea. Gad also received the Jordan Valley as far as the Sea of Chinnereth (see Deut 3:12,16,17; cf. Josh 13:15-28). 18. Ye shall pass over armed. The strict condition laid upon the two and a half tribes inheriting land outside of Canaan was that they must first fulfill their responsible share in the conquest of Canaan (Num 32:6-32). Moses' intense concern for this matter emerges again here in the Deuteronomic treaty (vv. 18-20).

21-29. Except for the covenant renewal ceremony itself, the conquest and distribution of the land beyond Jordan eastward brought Moses' work there to an end. 24. Thou hast begun to shew . . . thy mighty hand. In these achievements the servant of God had witnessed the earnest of Israel's entrance upon its inheritance. But much as he longed to see the fulfillment of God's promises in Canaan itself – let me go over (v. 25) –, he was not permitted to pass over the Jordan but only to look across it (v. 27; cf. Num 27:12ff.; Deut 34:1ff.). On 3:26, see 1:37; 4:21,22. Moses' final duty, therefore, was to charge the people to conquer in the name of the Lord (v. 22) and to commission Joshua to lead them in that conquest (vv. 21,28; cf. Num 27:18-23; Deut 1:38; 31:7,8,14,23). The reference to Beth-peor in the identification of the site of these final acts of Moses (Deut 3:29; cf. 4:46) recalls other events that transpired during Israel's encampment there (cf. Num 22-25).

D. Summary of the Covenant. 4:1-49.

The historical prologue closes with exhortation. This is transitional to the following section on the obligations of the covenant relationship. The summons to obedience sounded here is briefly echoed in paragraphs that introduce significant divisions within the stipulations (see 5:1; 6:1; 12:1). Deuteronomy 4 is remarkable in that it embodies, to some extent, all the features which constitute the documentary pattern of ancient suzerainty treaties. Thus, there are: (1) the identification of the author of the covenant as speaker (vv. 1,2,5,10); (2) references to past historical relations; (3) the presentation of the central demand for pure devotion to the suzerain; (4) appeal to the sanctions of blessing and curse; (5) invocation of witnesses (v. 26); (6) the requirement to transmit the knowledge of the covenant to subsequent generations (vv. 9,10); and (7) allusion to the dynastic issue (vv. 21,22). This mingling of the several leading aspects of covenant institution found here and elsewhere throughout the book is explained by the origin of the material in the free oratory of Moses' farewell. Deuteronomy is not a document prepared in the state office with dispassionate adherence to legal form.

Verses 1-8 present a call to wisdom. The statutes that Moses taught Israel were a revelation of the will of God (v. 5). 2. Ye shall not add . . . neither . . . diminish ought. God's laws must not suffer amendment or abridgment through human legislation (cf. 12:32; Rev 22:18ff.). Man's whole obligation is to heed, and to the obedient Israelites was given the promise of life and rich inheritance – that ye may live, and . . . possess the land (v. 1). The fact that, ultimately, piety and prosperity will be united is foreshadowed in the history of the Israelite theocracy, for it symbolizes God's consummate kingdom. Illustrative of this fact was God's recent judgment on Israel for her involvement in the idolatry of the Baal of Peor (v. 3; Num 25:1-9); for those who proved faithful in that temptation were spared the plague of death (Deut 4:4). Understandably, then, obedience to God's law is identified as true wisdom. 7,8. God so nigh. . . . statutes . . . so righteous. Obedience is the way to the enjoyment of the supreme blessings of the covenant – the nearness of God in saving power, and the knowledge of true righteousness. This light revealed in Israel has indeed become the light of the Gentiles (v. 6b). In this exposition of the way of the covenant as the way of wisdom, the foundation was laid in the Torah for the Wisdom literature which was afterwards to find its place in the sacred canon.

In verses 9-31 the folly of idolatry is declared. As Moses confronted the new generation with the challenge to reaffirm the allegiance their fathers had pledged at Sinai, he was vividly mindful of the fathers' sin of the golden calf, by which they had violated the covenant almost immediately after it had been sealed (cf. 9:7ff.; Ex 32). He therefore stressed the prohibition contained in the second commandment as he contrasted to the way of wisdom and life (Deut 4:1-8) the way of folly and destruction.

10. I will make them hear my words. At Horeb God had revealed to Israel the manner of true worship. That revelation was contained in the covenant which was first orally communicated and then inscribed on the two tables. The preparation of duplicate documents, one for the suzerain and one for the vassal, was the regular procedure in ratifying suzerainty treaties. The fact that the contents of the tables are called the "ten commandments" as well as "covenant" points to the nature of the covenant as a declaration of God's lordship. 12. The Lord spake . . . out of . . . the fire (see also v. 15). The manner of true worship was also revealed by the very nature of the theophany. For though a voice was heard declaring the words of the covenant, no form of God was seen but only the devouring fire of God's glory. The visible symbols of God's self-revelation thus re-enforced the prohibition of the second commandment.

Israel was to beware of the idolatry of worshiping the work of men's hands – a graven image (vv. 16-18,23; cf. 5:8) – but also that of worshiping the work of God's hands, the host of heaven (v. 19). The worship of the visible and creaturely was characteristic of the Gentile nations whom God had abandoned to their perverse folly (v. 19b; cf. 29:26; Rom 1:21ff.). 20. To be . . . a people of inheritance. For Israel to turn aside into idolatry was to prefer the lot of reprobation to her divine election as God's own redeemed and exclusive possession (see also 7:6; 14:2), an exclusive privilege which required an exclusive service and devotion. 23. Take heed unto yourselves. Prophetically Moses warned that prolonged enjoyment of the blessings of Canaan, blessings denied even to him (vv. 21,22a), would produce the forgetfulness of old age (v. 25; cf. v. 9). Let the Israelites, therefore, recall that the God to whom they had sworn allegiance at Sinai appeared there as a consuming fire (v. 24). If provoked to jealousy by idolatry, he would visit the covenant curses on such folly. And what greater curse than to abandon the repudiators of divine election to the vanity of the idolatry they preferred and to the community of men of like reprobate mind and destiny? (vv. 27,28; 28:64ff.) 29-31. Thou shalt find him, if thou seek him. Nevertheless, God's covenant is one of salvation, and its fulfillment is guaranteed by the oath of God to the patriarchs. Hence, after Israel's folly and judgment God would grant repentance so that beyond the curse of exile there might arise the blessings of restoration (cf. 30:1ff.).

Verses 32-40 present evidences of true religion. The identity of the Lord as God alone – none else beside him (v. 35) –, sovereign Creator of heaven and earth, was evidenced by his wondrous self-revelations in theophany and redemptive miracle (vv. 35,39; cf. Ex 10:2). 32. Ask . . . whether there hath been any such thing. His glorious acts at Horeb and in Egypt were signs without parallel; no idol of the nations ever thus identified itself. If the purpose of Israel's calling was to bring the people to reverent fear (v. 36) and knowledge of the Lord as God (vv. 35, 39), the source of that calling was found in God's free grace (cf. 9:5). 37,38. Because he loved thy fathers. Moses traced the deliverance from Egypt and the inheritance of the promised rest (earnest of which was the occupation of Trans-Jordan) to God's sovereign love of the patriarchs, first of all, of Abraham. 39. The Lord he is God. Moses further pointed to the totality of past miraculous mercies and the sanction of the covenant's future hope (v. 40) as reasons for conscientious reckoning with the claims of the Lord's exclusive deity.

41-43. As part of the historical prologue of the Deuteronomic treaty, the most recent significant event in God's gracious government of Israel is here cited. In obedience to God's direction (cf. Num 35:1,14), Moses appointed three cities of refuge in Israel's Trans-Jordanian inheritance, one each in the southern, central, and northern sectors (cf. 19:1-13).

44-49. This passage is transitional. As a summary of the Trans-Jordanian conquests (vv. 46b-49; cf. 2:32-36; 3:1-17), it serves as a conclusion to the historical prologue. But it is also immediately introductory to the stipulations (vv. 44-46a). The scene of the covenant ceremony and Moses' farewell is precisely set (cf. 1:3-5; 3:29). 46. When they came forth out of Egypt (ASV) marks the transaction as belonging to the Mosaic era of prolonged journeying from Egypt to the Jordan. The ratifying of this covenant was to be finally concluded in the new era when Israel entered into Canaan under Joshua (cf. 11:29ff.; 27).

III. Stipulations: Covenant Life. 5:1—26:19.

When suzerainty treaties were renewed, the stipulations, which constituted the long and crucial central section of the covenant, were repeated but with modifications, especially such as were necessary to meet the changing situation. So Moses rehearsed and reformulated the requirements promulgated in the Sinaitic Covenant. Furthermore, just as treaty stipulations customarily began with the fundamental and general demand for the vassal's absolute allegiance to the suzerain, and then proceeded to various specific requirements, so Moses now confronted Israel with the primary demand for consecration to the Lord (vv. 5-11) and then with the ancillary stipulations of covenant life (vv. 12-26).

A. The Great Commandment. 5:1—11:32.

The covenant's first and great commandment, the requirement of perfect consecration to the Lord, is enunciated in chapters 5—7, and enforced by divine claims and sanctions in chapters 8—11. These subject divisions are not, however, rigid; the exhortative strand is pervasive. Analyzed in somewhat more detail, this section develops the theme of the great commandment as follows: the Lord's existing claims upon Israel (ch. 5); the challenge of God's exclusive lordship over Israel, expressed as a principle (ch. 6) and a program (ch. 7); warnings against the temptation to autonomy, whether in the form of the spirit of self-sufficiency (ch. 8) or of self-righteousness (9:1—10:11); a call to true allegiance (10:12—11:32).

1) God's Covenant Lordship. 5:1-33.

1. Hear . . . learn . . . keep, and do. This chapter opens and closes (vv. 32,33) with a charge to follow carefully the divine stipulations of the covenant which was in process of solemnization.

2-5. The commitment to which Israel was summoned was to be a renewal of the covenant relationship to the Lord which already obtained. Forty years earlier, at Sinai, God had by covenant ceremony established Israel as his theocratic people (v. 2). That was done in faithfulness to his earlier promises to the patriarchs. 3. Not . . . with our fathers, but with us. The patriarchal "fathers" (cf. 4:31,37; 7:8,12; 8:18) had died without receiving the promises. But the present generation, with whom the Sinaitic Covenant was established as well as with the older generation that perished in the wilderness (cf. 11:2), was privileged to see the promised kingdom realized. 5. I stood between the Lord and you. At Sinai, as now, Moses was the mediator between God and Israel, an office the more needful because of Israel's fear of face-to-face confrontation with the fiery theophany (cf. 4:12). If the reporting role of Moses described here does not refer to revelations given after the promulgation of the Decalogue, then statements found elsewhere to the effect that Israel heard God declare the Decalogue (e.g., 4:12; Ex 19:9; 20:19) would mean that God's voice was audible but his words were indiscernible to Israel. However, verse 5 is more likely proleptic, like 22b.

6-22 (Heb. Bible 6-18). From the fact of the Sinaitic Covenant Moses proceeds to its documentary content as inscribed on the duplicate tables (cf. comments on 4:13). While continuing the thought that Israel was already covenantly bound to the Lord, this achieves the additional purpose of incorporating the comprehensive summary of permanent covenant law into the stipulations section of the Deuteronomic renewal document. The Decalogue, being itself not simply a moral code but the text of a covenant, exhibits the treaty pattern as follows: preamble (v. 6a), historical prologue (v. 6b), and stipulations interspersed with curse and blessing formulae (vv. 7-21). 12. Keep the sabbath day to sanctify it. Most significant of the variations from the form of the Decalogue as presented in Ex 20:2-17 is the new formulation of the fourth "word" or commandment. The sabbatic cycle of life symbolizes the consummation principle characteristic of divine action. God works, accomplishes his purpose, and, rejoicing, rests. Exodus 20:11 refers to the exhibition of the consummation pattern in creation for the original model of the Sabbath. Deuteronomy 5:15 refers to the consummation pattern manifested in redemption, where the divine triumph is such as to bring God's elect to their rest also. Most appropriately, therefore, was the Sabbath appointed as a sign of God's covenant with the people he redeemed from the bondage of Egypt to inherit the rest of Canaan (cf. Ex 31:13-17). The New Testament's association of the Sabbath with the Saviour's resurrection triumph, by which his redeemed, with him, attain to eternal rest, corresponds to the Deuteronomic interpretation of the Sabbath in terms of the progress of God's redemptive purpose.

Other notable Deuteronomic variations in the Decalogue are the reversal of the order of wife and house in the tenth commandment, and the addition there of his field (Deut 5:21). The latter is added because Israel was about to enter upon a settled existence in the land, whereas during the wilderness wanderings such legislation would have been irrelevant. This is a good example of the kind of legislative modification found in ancient secular renewal treaties. 22. These words the Lord spake unto all your assembly. The uniqueness of the revelation of the ten "words" is underscored in this verse. That revelation alone was spoken directly by God to all Israel; it alone was written by God.

23-27 (Heb. Bible 20-24). Continuing the account of the covenant-making at Sinai, Moses reminded the people of Israel of their former vow to obey God's voice (cf. Ex 20:18-21). Indeed, such had been their fear of God in the presence of his glory that they desired Moses to receive the further revelations of the divine voice for them — Go thou near, and hear (Deut 5:27). Such reluctance to experience the presence of God is a far cry from man's original delight in communion with his Creator in the Garden. And therein is exposed the exceeding cursedness of the curse upon sin. There are, of course, ultimate limits to man's qualifications for the vision of God (cf. Ex 33:20). But even though, within those limits, redemptive grace makes possible the enjoyment of a vision of God, fallen man regards the experience as a threat to his life (e.g., Gen. 32:30; Jud 6:22,23). In God's holy presence at Sinai, the Israelites were so keenly conscious of their defilement that they feared to venture further with their unique privilege (cf. Deut 4:33). Nevertheless, their fear was godly, for they acknowledged the God who appeared so terribly on the mount as their God, and committed themselves to do his will.

28-33 (Heb. Bible 25-30). What more stirring memories could Moses have evoked in anticipation of his concluding exhortation to walk in the way of the Lord and of life (vv. 32,33) than these: (1) God's approbation of Israel's previous vow — they have well said (v. 28); (2) his fatherly yearning that when the Sinaitic theophany should have ceased, the reverent devotion it had inspired might continue and thus it might be well with them, and with their children for ever! (v. 29) This response of the Lord supplements the record of Exodus 20.

In chapter 6 the principle of exclusive devotion to the Lord is enunciated, and with it the corollary prohibition of allegiance to alien deities. Then in chapter 7 the program of conquest is announced for the elimination of foreign gods and their people from the domain of Canaan, the land chosen by the Lord as an earthly type of his eternal and universal kingdom.

2) The Principle of Consecration. 6:1–25.

1-3. The commandments about to be given were the divinely dictated law for the theocratic kingdom as it was soon to be erected in the new paradise land of milk and honey. 3. That it may be well with thee. Israel's continued enjoyment of a habitation in God's land, like Adam's continued enjoyment of the original paradise, depended on continued fidelity to the Lord. Certain important distinctions are necessary in making such a comparison. Flawless obedience was the condition of Adam's continuance in the Garden; but Israel's tenure in Canaan was contingent on the maintenance of a measure of religious loyalty, which needed not be comprehensive of all Israel nor perfect even in those who were the true Israel. There was a freedom in God's exercise or restraint of judgment, a freedom originating in the underlying principle of sovereign grace in his rule over Israel. Nevertheless, God did so dispense his judgment that the interests of the typical-symbolical message of Israel's history were preserved. (See further the comments on chs. 27–30).

4-9. 4. The Lord is our God, the Lord alone. This confession (various translations of which are grammatically possible) seems best understood as equivalent to the declarations of monotheism in 4:35 and 32:39 (cf. I Chr 29:1). "For though there be that are called gods, whether in heaven or in earth, (as there be gods many, and lords many,) but to us there is but one God, the Father . . . and one Lord Jesus Christ" (I Cor 8:5,6). God is unique; deity is confined to him exclusively. To him alone were the people of Israel to submit in religious covenant, and him they were to serve in the totality of their being, with the intensity of love (Deut 6:5). God's demand of this exclusive and intensive devotion to himself Jesus called "the first and great commandment" (Mt 22:37,38; Mk 12:29,30; cf. Lk 10:25-28). It is the heart principle of all the covenant stipulations. 6. These words . . . shall be in thine heart. The past mercies of God rehearsed in the historical prologue would prompt such love, and the love would reveal itself in reverent obedience to all God's particular commandments (cf. 11:1,22; 19:9; 30:16; Jn 14:15). These verses are thus the text for all that follows. 7a. Thou shalt teach them . . . unto thy children. The family character of covenant administration requires that the children be brought under the government of the stipulations (cf. 20ff.). Day and night the godly are to meditate on God's law (vv. 7b-9; cf. Ps 1:2). Moses was not here making ceremonial requirements, but elaborating with concrete figures the demand for a constant focus of concern on the good pleasure of Israel's Lord. 9. Posts . . . gates. These words reflect architectural custom in the world of Moses' day. For the figurative use of such language, see Ex 13:9,16. A literal practice of the injunctions of Deut 6:8,9 came into vogue among later Jews in the form of the phylacteries worn on the person (cf. Mt 23:5) and the mezuzah affixed over the doorpost.

10-19. The constant corollary of the demand for loyalty in ancient suzerainty treaties was the prohibition of allegiance to any and all other lords. In Canaan the temptation to idolatry would be fierce, since the claim made for the gods of that region was that they were the bestowers of fertility and abundance in the land. Such is human perversity that Israel, satisfied with the material plenty of a plundered culture, would be inclined to honor the claims of their victims' idols and forget the claims of the Lord who had saved from Egypt and given victory in Canaan (vv. 10-12). 13. Swear by his name. Such swearing constituted a renewal of the oath of allegiance which ratified the covenant and invoked God as the deity who avenged perfidy. 14. Ye shall not go after other gods. Thus God explicitly forbade entanglement with the gods of Canaan. He would indeed jealously guard the honor of his name (v. 15). 16. Ye shall not tempt the Lord. Israel must not, therefore, presume to put God on trial, as at Massah (cf. Ex 17:7), seeking proof of his presence and his power to visit on them the covenant sanctions, whether blessing or curse. Let Israel rather be faithful, and God would faithfully fulfill his good promises (vv. 17-19; cf. v. 10).

20-25. Seeing generations come and go had lengthened Moses' perspective. His interest was not confined to the present assembly of Israel but took in the long future of God's kingdom (cf. v. 2). 20. When thy son asketh. Crucial to the well-being of the theocracy would be the faithful nurture of the children in the message of God's redemptive actions and purposes for his people. 24. For our good always. In particular, God's giving of the Law furthered the purposes of mercy by revealing the path of righteousness, to follow which would lead to divine favor and blessing. 25. It shall be our righteousness. This verse does not present a works principle of salvation. The stress falls on the function of law as disclosing the standard of conduct which is righteous in God's sight, a love for which is prerequisite to beatitude but not the meritorious ground of such a state.

3) The Program of Conquest. 7:1-26.

1-5. In the Book of the Covenant produced at Sinai there was promulgated a program of conquest and extermination against the Canaanite people and cultus (cf. Ex 23:20-33; 34:11-16). Thereby the ancient prophecy in which Noah pronounced Canaan accursed and the servant of Shem (Gen 9:25,26; cf. Gen 10:15-

18; Ex 23:23) would be fulfilled (see, too, Gen 15:16-21). The hour of divine judgment having come, Moses now charged Israel with the execution of that program. Everybody and everything in Canaan that was consecrated to idols rather than to the service of God must be consecrated to the wrath of God.

1. Seven nations (cf. Josh 3:10; 24:11). In such lists elsewhere the number varies from three to ten. The "seven" specified here possibly is a figure for completeness. 2. The Hebrew root ḥrm, translated utterly destroy in the major English versions, means primarily devote and hence "ban" and "extirpate." The ḥērem principle comes to full and final manifestation in the judgments of hell.

Some people take offense at God's command to Israel to exterminate the Canaanites, as though it represented sub-Christian ethics. Actually, they are taking offense at the theology and religion of the Bible as a whole. The New Testament, as well as the Old, warns men concerning the realm of the everlasting ban, where the reprobates, devoted to wrath, must magnify the justice of the God whom they have hated. Since the OT theocracy in Canaan was a divinely appointed symbol of the consummate kingdom of God, there is found in connection with it an intrusive anticipation of the ethical pattern that will obtain at the final judgment and beyond.

Moreover, the extermination of the Canaanites and their cultic installations (destroy their altars . . . burn their . . . images; v. 5) was necessary if Israel's calling to positive consecration to God in living service was to be fulfilled. For, because of Israel's frailty, the proximity of the Canaanites would lead to the dissolution of Israel's spiritual distinctiveness (v. 3), to foreign and idolatrous allegiances (v. 4a), and hence to Israel's own destruction (4b). The program of conquest (ch. 7) is thus a consistent application of the principle of consecration (ch. 6; esp. 6:12-15).

6-16. The purposes of Israel's election which were to be protected by the elimination of the Canaanites are here elaborated. 6. Chosen . . . to be a special people. This recalls Ex 19:5,6, the classic formulation of the unique theocratic status for which Israel was chosen. High calling is attended by temptation to boasting (cf. Moses' concern with this problem in chs. 8–10). Therefore, Israel was reminded to glory only in the name of God. 8. Because the Lord loved you. In his sovereign love and faithfulness alone was to be found the explanation of Israel's election (4:37), certainly not in the nation's size. For God chose their father Abraham, being only one, and the family of Jacob, which descended into Egypt as only some seventy souls (7:7; cf. 10:22). It followed from the sovereignty of God's grace that Israel had no claims upon him that might encourage carelessness with respect to his covenant demands and sanctions. 9. Keepeth covenant . . . to a thousand generations. Alluding to the sanction formulae which are affixed to the second commandment, Moses declared that though unmerited grace would be continued to the thousandth generation (5:10), apostate despisers of grace and holiness would discover that the covenant curses were not idle threats (7:9-11). 12. The Lord . . . shall keep . . . covenant. The faithful might be confident that the covenant blessings were not empty promises (vv. 12-15; cf. Gen 12:2,3; Ex 23:22-31). The God of Israel, the Creator, not Baal, was the bestower of fertility in field, flock, and family (Deut 7:13,14). 15. The Lord will take away . . . all sickness. It was the Lord who had subjected man to nature's curse for his sin, and he could therefore deliver the Israelites from Egypt's notorious diseases (e.g., elephantiasis, dysentery, and ophthalmia) just as he had rescued them from Egypt's infamous Pharaoh (v. 15; cf. v. 8; Ex 15:26). Verse 16 summarizes, repeating the command and its purpose.

17-26. Though in respect to the privileges of election the Israelites were tempted to vanity, in the face of the responsibility of their commission they would be tempted to timidity (v. 17; cf. Num 13:31ff.). 18,19a. Thou shalt not be afraid. In answer to any such rising fears Moses reminded them of that wondrous experience in Egypt during their youth when by mighty signs their God saved them. He assured them that this same terrible God was still in their midst to war in their behalf against the Canaanite kings (vv. 19b-24). Whom then should they fear? 20. The hornet (cf. Ex 23:28; Josh 24:12) is not here a symbol for Pharaoh's power, even though it be so in Egyptian usage. It is, rather, a figure for the terror of God, which, descending on Israel's foes, would produce panic and rout (cf. Deut 7:23). The fact that certain species of hornets in Palestine build nests underground and in rock crevices suggests the appropriateness of the figure to the destruction of Canaanites in hiding. Some would translate sir'â not "hornet" but "discouragement." 22. Will put out . . . by little and little. Cf. Ex 23:29,30; Jud 2:20-23; 3:1,2. God's gradual dispossessing of the Canaanites, designed for Israel's good, was suspended after Israel's post-Joshuan apostasy, as a chastisement. 24. Thou shalt destroy their name. Reassuring promise turns into renewed imperative in verses 24b-26 (cf. v. 5). To appropriate that which had fallen under God's ban would be to forfeit the status of covenant favor and place oneself under the divine anathema (cf. Josh 7).

Chapters 8–11 set forth the truth that absolute allegiance to the Lord (6:4ff.) meant not only that the Israelites must refrain from simultaneous service to any other god (6:12ff.; 7:1ff.), but also that they might not declare their religious independence. Moses therefore enforced the fundamental obligation of wholesouled devotion to God by warning against the dangers of an autonomous attitude, whether manifested in the spirit of self-sufficiency (ch. 8) or in the spirit of self-righteousness (9:1–10:11). Following the negative warnings, this section concludes with a positive challenge to submit to God's lordship (10:12–11:32).

4) The Law of the Manna. 8:1-20.

The focal point of this chapter is verse 17, with its picture of a future Israel at ease in Canaan, basking in self-congratulation. The recollection of God's providential guidance during the forty years in the wilderness (v. 2ff.) would afford the corrective for such vanity.

1-6. Verse 1 is another introductory summary of the covenant summons and sanctions (see also 4:1; 5:1; 6:1). 2. So far as the surviving generation was concerned, the wilderness wandering was designed as a period of probation – to prove thee – (v. 2b; cf. 13:3) and of necessary instruction (v. 3c). It was a fatherly discipline and contributed to their ultimate blessing (v. 5; cf. 16c). 3. He . . . fed thee with manna. What is meant by God's humbling Israel (v. 2) is illustrated by reference to his extraordinary provision for every need during the forty years (vv. 3,4; cf. 29:5,6), particularly by means of the manna (see Ex 16, esp. v. 4). Humbling consisted of privation and then the provision of the "What-is-it?," the unknown, supernatural bread of heaven, which compelled the people to recognize their dependence on God (cf. Deut 8:16a,b). Modern naturalistic exegesis identifies the Biblical manna with the honey-like excretions of scale insects found in tamarisk thickets in the Sinai area. Whatever substantive role was or was not played by these excretions, the bread of heaven was, none the less, in its nature and manner of provision, clearly a miraculous product. Moreover, a mere change from one normal, palatable food staple to another, no matter how exotic, would neither have humbled Israel nor taught them the truth which the manna did: Man doth not live by bread only (ASV), but by every word that proceedeth out of the mouth of the Lord doth man live.

God led Israel into a situation in which life was derived and must be daily sought from a heavenly bread, the fruit of a daily creative exercise of the word of God. This was an effective reminder that the creature does not exist as a self-sufficient being, sustained by the fruits of an earth also existing and producing independently of God. He is ultimately and always dependent on the divine word which called him and his world into being. Furthermore, God purposed to teach Israel that man's life, unlike a beast's, does not consist solely in a physical vitality which bread, whether earthly or heavenly, might sustain. Hence he provided the bread of heaven in such a way as to require an ethical-religious response to his preceptive word. This response was appropriately focused on the observance of the Sabbath, the sign of man's covenant allegiance as well as the recaller of God's role as Creator. The manna thus taught Israel that only as man stands obediently under his Lord's sovereign word, the ultimate source of life, does he find true and lasting life (cf. 30:20).

7-20. 7a. A good land. The recollection of the wilderness lesson was necessary at this point, for God was conducting Israel into a land where the normal products of nature would afford a comparatively luxurious standard of living (vv. 7-10a). 9b. Whose stones are iron. In the sandstone substratum of Palestine are copper and iron veins, and ancient mining operations have been discovered where this sandstone outcrops in the Arabah. 11. Beware that thou forget not. Though all these natural products were to be gratefully recognized as the gifts of God just as much as the supernatural manna (v. 10b), luxury and ease would blunt the edge of Israel's awareness of God (vv. 12,13). 14. Thine heart be lifted up. Pride would suppress the memory of humbler days of slavery, scorpions, and thirst, days when deliverance and survival required divine intervention by hitherto unknown ways (vv. 15,16). Of such denial of their Lord through self-adulation they must beware. The same truth that had to be learned in the former days of empty stomachs would be the relevant truth in the coming days of full stomachs: the source of man's life is the word of God — he . . . giveth thee power (17,18a). Israel's beatitude was due solely to God's fidelity to his covenant oath (v. 18b; cf. Gen 15). At the same time the Lord would visit upon covenant-breakers the curses they had invoked. 20. So shall ye perish. Repudiation of election as the Lord's peculiar possession, and identification with the anathematized Canaanites in their idolatrous iniquity, would result in Israel's identification with the heathen in their doom.

5) The Warning of the Broken Tablets. 9:1–10:11.

For Israel to assume that Canaan was a reward for their righteousness (9:4), would be an even greater contradiction of the realities of the covenant relationship than their boasting that the possession and prosperity of the land were achieved by their might (8:17). The conceit of self-righteousness is an attempt of the sinner lusting after autonomy to free himself from God at that very point where his need of God is most desperate — the need for forgiveness and cleansing. Moses therefore passionately presented the truth that the promises and blessings of the covenant relation were Israel's by virtue of mercy, not of merit.

1-5. The occasion for this admonition was the prospect of Israel's dispossessing a people reputedly invincible in offensive warfare and defended by seemingly impregnable fortifications — cities great and fortified (ASV) up to heaven (v. 1). On the Anakim and other impressive people, see 1:28; 4:38; 7:1; Num 13:28. The spearhead of Israel's advance, however, was the One who dwelt in the heavens and made the highest mountains of earth his footstool, who was, moreover, a devouring fire (cf. Deut 4:24; 7:17ff.). 4c. For my righteousness. This is the tragic misinterpretation of the conquest events to which Israel would be prone in defiance of all the obvious historic facts and God's explicit warning to the contrary. The explanation of Israel's triumph could lie only in the wickedness of the Canaanites on the one side (vv. 4c,5) and in God's forgiving grace to Israel on the other (9:6–10:11). For the relationship of the iniquity of the inhabitants of Canaan to the fulfillment of the promises of the Abrahamic Covenant, see Gen 15:16. Archaeological investigation has revealed the abysmal depths of moral degeneration in Canaanite society and religion in the Mosaic age. The way in which Israel's acquisition of their promised land was bound up with the elimination of the Canaanites exemplifies the principle of redemptive judgment. The salvation of the friends of God necessarily involves their triumph over the friends of Satan. From the viewpoint of the elect, the judgment of the latter is a redemptive judgment (e.g., Rev 19:11ff.; 20:9, where the redemption of the elect is consummated by the doom of the Satanic hordes).

9:6–10:11. Israel's self-righteous interpretation of the conquest had been contradicted in advance by all Moses' experience with the nation during the forty years past (vv. 7,24). They had repeatedly shown themselves to be a fractious, covenant-breaking people (vv. 6-17,21-24). They had been spared and preserved in covenant relationship to God only through the Lord's merciful renewal of the broken covenant (10:1-11) in response to the importunate mediatorial intercession of Moses (9:18-20, 25-29).

9:8. In Horeb ye provoked the Lord. The classic example of Israel's faithlessness occurred at the very time the covenant was being solemnized at Horeb (9:8ff.; cf. Ex 32). Israel had just sworn allegiance to God and vowed obedience to his commandments (Ex 24). Indeed, it was while the Lord was in the very process of inscribing the treaty on the duplicate stone documents during Moses' first stay of forty days and nights on the mount that Israel broke the covenant by engaging in idolatry. In that hour the wrath of God blazed and Israel was at the brink of destruction — Let me alone, that I may destroy them (v. 14; cf. 19a). So far as merit was concerned, therefore, Israel deserved not to inherit the bounties of Canaan but to fall under the ban along with the dispossessed Canaanites. Moses' treatment of the treaty tablets — I . . . brake them before your eyes (v. 17) — and the golden calf (v. 21) was symbolic of the shattering of the covenant. Such ritual procedure is attested in ancient state treaties in connection with a vassal's violation of his oath. 22. And at Taberah . . . Massah . . . Kibroth-hattaavah. Other instances of Israel's provoking God's wrath preceded and followed the day of assembly at Sinai (Ex 17:2-7; Num 11) until their perversity at Kadesh-barnea (Deut 9:23; cf. 1:26ff.; Num 13; 14) brought the verdict of exile unto death upon the older generation.

More than once judgment had been averted through the intercession of Moses. In this aspect of Moses' ministry, more remarkably than in any other, his mediatorship prefigured the antitypical mediatorship of Christ, who also "made intercession for the transgressors" (Isa 53:12). When at Sinai God threatened to blot out Israel and offered to exalt Moses' descendants as a new covenant nation (Deut 9:14; cf. Ex 32:10), Moses faithfully fulfilled his mediatorial office in behalf of Israel rather than grasp at the opportunity to be a second Abraham. In fact, he offered himself as a second Isaac on the altar. Moses pleaded that if there must be a blotting out, rather than being made the one exception to the judgment, he might be blotted out as a means of securing forgiveness for the others (Ex 32:32). He "stood before him in the breach to turn away his wrath lest he should destroy them" (Ps 106:23). The intercession referred to in Deut 9:18,19,25-29 (cf. 10:10) was offered during Moses' second forty days on the mount.

Difficulty has been found in the fact that the content of Moses' prayer, 9:26-29, corresponds to that recorded in Ex 32:11-13, for it has been assumed that the latter refers to Moses' first forty days before God. Actually, Ex 32:11-14 is an introductory summation of the following account, which embraces the second period of forty days. The immediate chronological sequence is from Ex 32:10 to 32:15, as is reflected in Deut 9:14,15. The Exodus narrative from 32:30–34:29 possibly all refers to the second forty days and their sequel, not to preceding events; the arrangement, as often in Hebrew narrative (cf. Deut 9 itself), subordinates strict chronological sequence to topical interests. For at that time also (9:19; 10:10), even at that time would be better, giving gam its more frequent emphatic sense.

God's particular wrath against Aaron, (v. 20), not mentioned in the Exodus account, is cited here to demonstrate how completely devoid of merit Israel was and how dependent on mercy – even their high priest was a brand plucked from the burning! The same truth is apparent from the grounds of Moses' intercession (vv. 26-29). 27. Remember . . . Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob. He pleaded for a stay of judgment in spite of Israel's stubborn wickedness (v. 27b) and only on the basis of God's interest in his own name among the nations of the earth. God had from of old declared his sovereign purposes of redemptive judgment and had identified that program with his dealings with Israel and Egypt. 28b. Not able to bring them into the land. If now he destroyed Israel, even though he would not thus violate his covenant and though he would still faithfully fulfill his promises to the patriarchs (cf. 9:14), such a procedure would be liable to misunderstanding. The significance of God's mighty revelation of his name in judgment and salvation at the Exodus would be obscured and the fear of him diminished by contempt for what would be misinterpreted as weakness.

10:1-11. The renewal of the covenant after Israel's idolatry at Sinai was, therefore, due solely to divine grace. Part of the ceremony of renewal was the preparation of the two new treaty tablets. See Ex 34:1-4a, which possibly belongs chronologically between 32:29 and 32:30. Similarly, Deut 10:1a precedes in time 9:18ff. and 9:25ff. There is further disregard of chronological distinctions within 10:1-5, for the mention of the construction of the ark as the depository for the stone tablets is interwoven with the account of the hewing and engraving of this second set of treaty texts. It was actually after the second period of forty days that Moses had Bezalel construct the ark (Ex 35:30ff.; 36:2; 37:1) and it was, of course, some time later that Moses put the testimony in the ark (Ex 40:20) and then put the ark in the Tabernacle (Ex 40:21).

The condensed, summarizing treatment in Deut 10:1-5 reflects the requirement found in the international suzerainty treaties that the duplicate covenant texts were to be deposited in the sanctuaries of the two covenant parties in order thus to be under the surveillance of the oath deities. In the case of God's covenant with Israel, there was but one sanctuary involved, since God, the covenant Suzerain, was also the God who had his sanctuary in Israel. The purpose of 10:1-5 being to state in a comprehensive and general way that God had mercifully reconfirmed the covenant with the rebellious vassals, Moses included the matter of the ark as a familiar and integral element in the standard ratification procedure.

Verses 6 and 7, with which verses 8 and 9 belong materially, constitute a stylistic break. It is uncertain (1) whether this excursus originated as a quotation read from an itinerary in the course of Moses' address, (2) whether he parenthetically inserted it when writing the Book of the Law, or (3) whether someone like the author of Deuteronomy 34 added it. 6. The children of Israel took their journey. The journey in view is that southward from Kadesh recorded in Num 33:37 (for the particular stations, see Num 33:30-33). His son ministered in the priest's office (v. 6c). Verses 6,7 are relevant to the context; for they further enhance the covenant-renewing grace of God by recalling that the Lord re-instituted the priesthood of Aaron of the tribe of Levi and continued it in Aaron's son Eleazer in spite of his anger against the father (9:20). 8. The Lord separated . . . Levi. Cf. Exodus 28; 29; Num 1:49ff.; 3:9ff.; 4:17ff.; 8:6ff.; 18:20-24. This section may also be regarded as an elaboration of the subject of the covenant tables (Deut 10:8; cf. v. 5). The intercession theme is concluded in 10:10,11. 10. The Lord hearkened unto me. Cf. 9:18,19. The journey to the promised homeland, of which Israel was so utterly undeserving, was to be resumed because of God's regard for his own name, the name he had taken in oath because he could swear by no higher (10:11; cf. Ex 33:1ff.).

6) A Call to Commitment. 10:12–11:32.

Israel was now confronted with the great decision, the choice between the blessing and the curse (11:26-32). Moses enforced the call to obedience (10:12ff.; 11:1,8,13,18ff.,32) by focusing the eyes of the people on him who addressed to them his covenant as the righteous Judge of heaven and earth (10:12-22), whose impartial judgment Israel had in the past seen irresistibly executed in Egypt and in the wilderness (11:1-7) and should in the future find sovereignly exercised over the land and inhabitants of Canaan (11:8-25).

12-22. 12. And now introduces the conclusion to a major division of the address (cf. 4:1). Fear the Lord . . . love him. The basic and comprehensive covenant requirement is here repeated (vv. 12,13,20; cf. 6:5,13,24; Mic 6:8). True fear and true love are complementary and inseparable. They are the response of a true heart to God's majesty and goodness, respectively, and together they are productive of wholehearted service in obedience to all God's good pleasure. 16. Circumcise . . . your heart. Such genuine devotion can flow only from a heart that has experienced the reality of that qualification which was symbolized in the initiatory sign of the covenant (cf. 30:6; Ex 6:12,30; Lev 26:41; Jer 6:10; 9:25,26). To inspire the fear of the Lord, Moses summoned Israel to behold him as Lord of the cosmos (Deut 10:14), as God above all that be called gods (v. 17a), as righteous Judge (v. 17b), and as Sovereign over history and nature (v. 21). To encourage love toward him, Moses recalled how God had bestowed the privilege of covenant status on Israel's ancestors (v. 15a), fulfilled the patriarchal promises (vv. 15b,21,22), and shown himself a Helper of the helpless (vv. 18,19).

11:1-7. The charge to love the Lord (v. 1) is a connecting refrain in 10:12–11:32. After "And know ye this day" (v. 2), there is a parenthetical remark (see RSV), which notes that the summons to covenantal decision was not addressed to the children born in the wilderness. It was, rather, directed to those who had been born in Egypt and had seen God's great acts of judgment in the past (v. 7). 2. The object of know ye is the discipline (AV, chastisement) of the Lord your God, his greatness, etc. (RSV). Israel had been disciplined to reverence the Lord as the Judge with whom they had to do by their experience of his judgment on their enemies (vv. 2-4) and themselves alike (vv. 5,6). They knew, therefore, that his judgment was almighty, so that the mightiest on earth could not prevent it; and it was impartially righteous, so that even his covenant people dared not presume upon their election. 6. What he did unto Dathan and Abiram. See Numbers 16, especially verses 31-33. Moses' silence with respect to the rebel Korah was possibly in deference to the surviving Levitical Korahites (Num 26:11).

8-17. From Israel's future, too, Moses adduced motives for obedience. 8,9. That ye may . . . possess the land . . . and . . . prolong your days. On the relation of Israel's tenure on the land to her covenant fidelity, see comments on 6:1-3. Unlike Egypt, with its irrigation agriculture, Canaan was clearly dependent for its fruitfulness on the direct blessing of God (vv. 11,12; cf. 8:7ff.); and in that sphere God's righteous judgment with respect to Israel's conduct would be registered (vv. 13-17). 13,14. If ye shall hearken . . . I will give the rain. Prosperity would depend on proper weather conditions the year around (cf. 12b), especially important being the timely commencement of the rainy season in the fall and the due extension of the latter rains in the spring. The very state of nature would thus constantly serve as a sensitive barometer of Israel's standing before the Lord. Therefore, Israel must be on guard against the spiritual dangers of material abundance (vv. 14b,15). 16. Take heed to yourselves. For bounty can turn into drought, famine, and death at the mere word of the Lord, the impartial, almighty Judge at whose command even the earth opened its mouth to swallow the Israelites Dathan and Abiram (vv. 15-17; cf. 11:6; 6:11-15; 8:11-20).

18-25. Since the nations, as well as nature, are under the Lord's absolute control, they are another agency in his government of his Israelite vassals. 18. Lay up these . . . words in your heart. Cf. 6:6-9. Faithfulness from generation to generation would result in the perpetuation of Israel's possession of the promised land as the days of heaven upon the earth (v. 21); i.e., as long as the heavens continue above the earth, in short, forever (cf. Ps 72:5,7,17; 89:29). By the same token infidelity must lead to termination of tenure. 22,23. If . . . then. Success in the stipulated program of conquest (vv. 23-25; cf. 7:1,2,17ff.; 9:1ff.) would depend first and last not on military prowess but on religious commitment. Fulfillment of the great commandment would be blessed with inheritance of the land of promise to its utmost boundaries: from the wilderness of the Sinai peninsula on the south to the Lebanon mountains on the north, and from the Euphrates on the east to the Mediterranean on the west (v. 24; cf. 1:7; Gen 15:18).

26-32. 26. A blessing and a curse. Here is the sum and conclusion of the whole matter (vv. 26-28). The sovereignty of the Lord, declared in the covenant now renewed unto Israel, could be manifested in either blessing or curse (cf. ch. 28; 30:15-20). Israel must decide which it should be. This twofold prospect and its challenge, which Moses placed before Israel this day in Moab, would be set before them again by Joshua on the other side of the Jordan in Canaan, that the nation might be careful to obey God and live (11:29-32). The transition from the Mosaic to the Joshuan leadership was thus to be marked by a two-stage renewal ritual, which would exhibit the continuity of the more ultimate divine leadership. This arrangement was the equivalent of measures taken in vassal treaties by human suzerains to guarantee the dynastic succession on their thrones. See Deuteronomy 27 for the more detailed directions concerning the second stage of the ceremony to be conducted on Mount Gerizim and Mount Ebal (cf. Josh 8:30-35).

B. Ancillary Commandments. 12:1–26:19.

Having delineated the inner spirit of theocratic life (chs. 5–11), Moses went on to detail the ordinances and institutions of the theocracy's outward form (chs. 12–26). Chapters 12:1–16:17 are primarily concerned with cultic-ceremonial consecration requirements. Governmental and judicial authority is the subject in 16:18–21:23. The sphere of the mutual relationships of the theocratic citizens is covered by the legislation in 22:1–25:19. The stipulations conclude with ritual confessions of the Lord's dominion and a final declaration of covenant ratification (ch. 26).

1) Cultic - Ceremonial Consecration. 12:1–16:17.

The central interest of the laws of this section was to guarantee a thoroughgoing consecration to the Lord. Governing all the demands for tributary service in tithe (v. 14), first fruits (v. 15), and sacrificial offerings (v. 16) was the law of the central altar, with which this section opens (v. 12). Singleness of devotion to the Lord was safeguarded by the imposition of the severest penalties on all who enticed to or became guilty of apostasy (v. 13).

a) Allegiance to God's Altar. 12:1-32.

1-3. In the land (v. 1; cf. 6:1). In the prophetic perspective of the following stipulations Israel is viewed as already in possession of her inheritance. Utterly destroy . . . And . . . overthrow (vv. 2,3). This section connects with the preceding by resuming that part of the mandate of conquest which required the obliteration of Canaanite cultic centers and installations (cf. 7:5,25; Ex 23:24; 34:13). The execution of the program of conquest as a whole would bring the tribes into control of idolatrous shrines throughout the land (cf. Isa 1:29; 57:5; 65:7; Jer 2:20; 3:6; 17:2; Ezk 6:13; 18:6ff.; Hos 4:13; I Kgs 14:23; II Kgs 16:4; 17:10); and these would present a temptation to religious syncretism (Deut 12:29,30). The Israelites would be in danger of adopting abominations like the fiery votive offering of children (v. 31; cf. 18:10; Lev 18:21; II Kgs 16:3; 17:17; 21:6; 23:10; Jer 7:31; 19:5; 32:35). In addition to the punitive purpose of the destruction of Canaanite cultic sites there was, therefore, the preventive design of protecting Israel against ensnarement in the Canaanite cultic rites. The fact that the law of the central sanctuary (Deut 12:4ff.) is thus introduced (vv. 2,3) and concluded (cf. vv. 29-31) by such references to the Canaanite cultus shows that one purpose of the centralization of Israelite worship, too, was to avoid the contamination of the pure worship of the Lord by idolatrous practices.

The centralization requirement must also be understood in terms of Deuteronomy's nature as a suzerainty treaty. Such treaties prohibited the vassal's engaging in any independent diplomacy with a foreign power other than the covenant suzerain. In particular, the vassal must not pay tribute to any other lord. Similarly, all the requirements and prohibitions of Deuteronomy 12 were calculated to secure for the Lord all Israel's tributary sacrifice and offering. Israel must not pay any sacrificial tribute to other gods, for such an impossible attempt to serve two masters would be rebellion against the great commandment of God's covenant.

In the promised land the law of the central altar would involve both the centralization of the special sacrificial festivals (vv. 4-14) and the decentralization of the common family feasts (vv. 15-28).

4-14. In contrast to the multiplicity of altars among the Canaanites (v. 4), who sacrificed wherever they pleased (cf. v. 13), Israel was to have one central altar, and that at the place which the Lord your God shall choose (v. 5). This oneness of the sanctuary corresponded to the oneness of the divine lordship over Israel (cf. 6:4,5).

Modern higher criticism has erroneously held that the concept of the central altar taught in Deuteronomy (or according to some, only in Deut 12:1-7, which is then regarded as a later interpolation) stands in contradiction to other Biblical legislation (see esp., in the Book of the Covenant, Ex 20:24). The Deuteronomic requirement has therefore been judged to be a later modification of earlier, supposedly more lax practice. The book as a whole has been dated in the seventh century B.C. and identified as the law book found in Josiah's day. A more recent approach of critics is to resolve the supposed conflict of codes not by placing them in a chronological sequence across the centuries, but by assigning to each a different geographic-cultic source. Deuteronomy is thought to represent the northern, Levitical outlook, the central sanctuary in view being Shechem. Some critics have even allowed that the centralization law in Deuteronomy might represent a return to an earlier, premonarchical ideal of the amphictyony.

Actually, so far as normative religious practice was concerned, there was nothing essentially new about this law even in Moses' day. In patriarchal times, when a succession of altars was built in the course of the patriarchs' journeyings, there was apparently but one central family altar at any given time. Similarly, in the Sinaitic legislation (Ex 20:24), Israel's place of sacrifice is identified with the central place where God recorded his name (i.e., revealed his glorious nature) by special supernatural theophany, the place of God's visible symbolic dwelling in the midst of his people. The Tabernacle had successively different locations during Israel's wilderness journeyings, but it remained a single sanctuary.

What is new in the Deuteronomic formulation is only the prospect of a stationary location for the sanctuary. Deuteronomy envisages a permanent habitation of God in Israel. 10. When he giveth you rest. Even this new circumstance must await the attainment of peace and rest (cf. Heb 4:1ff.), a condition which fully arrived at the OT typical level only in the days of David and Solomon (II Sam 7:1; I Kgs 5:4). Only then did God choose out of all the tribes the city of Jerusalem as the site for his house (I Kgs 8:16,44,48; 11:13,32,36; 14:21; II Kgs 21:7; 23:27), though at the first he had recorded his name temporarily at Shiloh (Jer 7:12; Jud 21:19). Furthermore, the Mosaic law of the central altar, while regulating the prescribed and ordinary sacrificial service of Israel (Deut 12:6,7,11ff.) as it was to be performed periodically at the three principal festivals, also recognized the possibility of revelatory action of God apart from the central altar and allowed for the specially appointed service and altar (cf. 27:5ff.). The accent thus falls more heavily on the purity than on the unity of the cultus. Also prominent in Moses' thought of covenant communion with the Lord was the note of joy – ye shall rejoice before the Lord (v. 12; cf. v. 7). Love to God expressed in joyful worship was also to find its corollary in love to the brethren, especially in kindness to those who, like the Levites (v. 12; cf. v. 19), were dependent on the generosity, indeed on the piety, of the congregation (cf. Num 18:21; 35:1ff.).

Contrasting the future arrangements with present practice, Moses declared that even under his leadership the Israelites were doing whatever was right in their own eyes (Deut 12:8; cf. Jud 17:6; 21:25). Here at least this expression is not derogatory but apparently indicates simply that there was no need to reckon as yet with distinctions such as that between sacrificial feasts (Deut 12:4-14) and family feasts (vv. 15-28).

15-28. Besides bringing the Israelite tribes into contact with heathen shrines, the inheriting of Canaan would locate the tribal homes at considerable distances from Israel's own central sanctuary (v. 21). If the stipulations of 12:4-14 were to be carried out in that new situation, a distinction had to be made between the slaughtering and eating of animals suitable for a sacrificial feast and those suitable for an ordinary meal; and permission must be granted for the decentralization of the latter. This new provision constituted a modification of the requirements of Lev 17:1ff., which governed the Israelites' consumption of flesh while they were a compact camp about the Tabernacle in the wilderness. 15b. The unclean and the clean may eat of it, as of the gazelle and as of the hart (RSV; cf. v. 22). Participation in the family feast was not dependent on ceremonial condition (cf. Lev 7:19ff.), and the kind of meat permissible included that which was proper for sacrifice as well as meat like game (cf. Deut 14:5), which was not sacrificially acceptable.

Attached to this permission were certain restrictions. One is the familiar prohibition of blood – ye shall not eat the blood (vv. 16,23ff.; cf. Lev 17:10ff.; Gen 9:4). Pouring the blood upon the ground would be a safeguard against pouring it as a sacrifice on some nearby, illegally remaining Canaanite altar. The centralization, during the wilderness journeyings, of the slaughter of all animals fit for sacrifice was explicitly designed to avoid such temptation (cf. Lev 17:7). 17. Thou mayest not eat . . . the tithe, etc. Another proviso, or better, a clarification of the permission of verse 15, was the reminder that all holy gifts to the Lord must be taken to the place of the central sanctuary which God should choose (see also vv. 26,27). That is, the permission operated within the positive requirements of verses 4-14 (cf. esp. vv. 6,11). The interspersing of exhortations among the stipulations (e.g., vv. 25,28) is one of the identifying marks of the Deuteronomic legislation as treaty stipulations rather than as a legal code.

29-32. On verses 29-31, see comments on verses 1-3. 32. Thou shalt not add thereto, nor diminish from it (13:1 in Heb. Bible). Repeating essentially 4:2, Moses again declared that the only true standard of ethics and godly service is the revealed will of God – no less, no more.

b) Resistance to Apostasy. 13:1-18.

In the ancient suzerainty treaties it was required of the vassal that he must not connive at evil words spoken against the suzerain, whether they amounted to an affront or to a conspiracy. The vassal must report the insult or the fomenting of revolt. In case of active rebellion, he must undertake military measures against the offenders. Moreover, he must manifest fidelity to his lord in such cases no matter who the rebel might be, whether prince or nearest relative. All of this finds its formal counterpart in Deuteronomy 13. Stylistically the chapter is cast in the casuistic form characteristic of ancient law codes but also of some treaty stipulations. Three cases of rebellion against the Lord are dealt with. The first two relate to the instigation stage, the guilty parties being sign-attested claimants to revelation (vv. 1-5) and the vassal's nearest relative or companion (vv. 6-11). The third case concerns a city that has been enticed to rebel against the Lord and is guilty of serving idol-lords (vv. 12-18).

1-5 (Heb. Bible, vv. 2-6). 1. A prophet, or a dreamer of dreams. Intimation of the prophetic institution to be established in Israel had already been given. God's self-disclosure to the prophets would be through the media of vision and dream (Num 12:5; cf. Deut 18:15ff.). Even if one with impressive credentials to the effect that he was a channel of revelation (1b,2a) should incite Israel to render allegiance and tribute to other gods (2b; cf. 3b,5b), his counsel must be despised (3a; cf. Gal 1:8,9). 2. And the sign or the wonder come to pass. Both terms can refer to an event which in itself is either ordinary or extraordinary.

Here they apparently refer to a predicted event, not necessarily miraculous, which comes to pass. The fulfillment of the prediction is then claimed as a sign of genuine prophetic vocation and authority. Saying (v. 2) is to be taken with if there arise (v. 1). Israel's standard of life and worship was God's revelation through Moses, spoken and written; the fundamental demand thereof was exclusive allegiance to the Lord – walk after the Lord (v. 4). In order to test Israel's obedience to that paramount stipulation, God would permit the false prophet to arise (v. 3b). And because the latter would counsel Israel to repudiate that demand, the very essence of the covenant (cf. 6:4,5; Ex 20:3), the ultimate penalty was prescribed for him – that prophet . . . shall be put to death (v. 5). Notice the quotations from the preamble and historical prologue of the covenant tablets (cf. Ex 20:2). The execution of the instigator to defection would "burn out" the evil from the midst of Israel, which, if it remained and spread, would result in the burning out of many in Israel (cf. Deut 13:12ff., esp. v. 16; 17:12; 19:11-13; 21:18-21; 22:21-24; 24:7).

6-11 (Heb. Bible 7-12). As effective as the wonder-sign of the speaking serpent, with its oracular declarations, in the case of Eve's seduction was the constraint lent to Eve's subsequent temptation of Adam by his affection for her, the wife of his bosom, beloved as his own soul. 6. If thy brother . . . entice thee secretly. The subtlety of the temptation in this case contrasts with the public invitation of the false prophet (cf. v. 1ff.) and would make it easy to conceal the dear one's sin and to avoid the judicial responsibility without detection. But, as in the case of the international treaties, any failure to report "evil words" and expose rebellious plots was a breach of God's covenant. 8. Neither shall thine eye pity him. The call of the covenant is to love the Lord our God though it mean to hate parents and brethren, wife and children, and one's own life also (cf. Lk 14:26). Therefore, that one who was dearest to the covenant servant must be as sternly judged as the false prophet if he or she proposed disloyalty to the Lord. 9. Thou shalt . . . kill him. For the judicial procedure in view, see 17:7. An important benefit of executing the divine sentence would be the monitory impact on Israel, forestalling further apostasy (v. 11; cf. 17:13; 19:20; 21:21).

12-18 (Heb. Bible, 13-19). If the stipulations of the preceding verses were not vigorously carried out, the rebellion would increase from individual to community proportions, a situation requiring the yet more difficult judicial decision and action prescribed here. 13. Base fellows (ASV; RSV) and children of Belial (AV) are renderings of an expression variously understood as sons of worthlessness or disorder or wickedness or Sheol. This is how God sees those enticers to idolatry who appear to men as impressive prophets or dearest kin. If the verdict of guilt was reached (v. 14), the sentence must be the infliction of the ban (v. 15ff.; cf. comments on 7:1-5). 15. Smite the inhabitants of that city. By embracing the abomination of Canaan, the Israelite city would become an abomination; it would become like Canaanite Jericho and must share its cursed doom by fire and sword. The divine Suzerain, like the human lords in their ancient treaties, imposed regulations concerning the spoil that would fall into the hands of his vassal on a punitive campaign. In the present instance, the less common demand was made that all the spoil be added to the holocaust by which the accursed city would become a whole burnt offering to the praise of God's justice and wrath. 16. An heap for ever. Hebrew tēl denotes an abandoned mound produced by the accumulated debris of successive occupations of a site. Israel's experience in the case of Achan (Josh 7; 8) exemplified both the danger of violating the law of the spoil in Deut 13:16, 17a and the faithfulness of the Lord to the promise of verses 17b,18.

c) Filial Obligations. 14:1–15:23.

As the people of the Lord, committed to his service and commissioned to remove from their midst all devotees and shrines of idols (chs. 12; 13), Israel was a distinctive nation. That must be manifested throughout the ceremonial dimension of the nation's life. Whether in connection with death (14:1,2) or life (vv. 3-21), the ceremonial practice of the Israelites must reflect their peculiar sanctity. Their sacred consecration was also to be displayed in the consecration of the fruit of their life's labor to the Lord their God (vv. 22-29).

1,2. Ye are the children of the Lord your God. . . . an holy people. Here again the Ex 19:5,6 definition of the theocratic nation is echoed (cf. Deut 7:6), enriched now with the concept of sonship (cf. Ex 4:22). In the OT period the emphasis was on Israel as servant rather than as son, because though the nation of Israel was the son and heir, it was to be under governors until the time appointed of the Father (cf. Gal 4:1ff.). Ye shall not cut yourselves. The Israelites were not to mutilate themselves as the heathen commonly did in mourning rites (v. 1b; cf. Lev 19:28; 21:5). The reason assigned is that, as the elect and adopted people of God, they held a holy status. And underlying that reason was the fact that their God is Lord of life and Creator of man in his image.

3-21. 3. Any abominable thing. Ceremonial distinctions may at times appear arbitrary. Such is the case with the classification of clean and unclean meats in these dietary regulations. For although hygienic explanations are apparent in some instances, they are not apparent in all. But the very arbitrariness of these stipulations made them the better tests of submission to the sovereign word of the Lord and more distinctive badges of consecration to him. It reminded Israel that man must live according to every word of God's mouth (cf. 8:3). It is God's creative word that gives to all things their definition and meaning, and man must interpret all things in imitation of the interpretation God assigns them. In this respect the Mosaic dietary rules resembled the probationary proscription of the fruit of the tree of knowledge in Eden or the arrangements for the provision of the manna in the wilderness.

4. These . . . beasts . . . ye shall eat. This section repeats almost verbally Lev 11:2-23. Deuteronomy 14:4b,5 supplements the Levitical formulation and that in a way which reflects the wilderness origin of Deuteronomy. For the habitat of the edible game animals specified was the area of Israel's journeying from Egypt to Canaan, not the wooded hill country of Canaan itself. 21. Any thing that dieth of itself. This involves a modification of Lev 17:15. The practice mentioned here in verse 21b (cf. Ex 23:19; 34:26) was prohibited because it was a ceremonial custom of the Canaanites.

22-29. 22. Tithe . . . the increase of thy seed. An annual tithe of the produce of the land was to be offered to the Lord in recognition of the fact that the land was his and that he was the bestower of life and fertility. Because of variants between the Deuteronomic and the earlier tithe stipulations (Lev 27:30-33; Num 18:21-32), the erroneous view was developed by the Jews (and has been accepted by many Christian exegetes) that Deuteronomy prescribes a second tithe and, some would say, even a third tithe (cf. Deut 14:28ff.; 26:12-15). Deuteronomy 14 does not, however, necessarily involve any drastic modification of the earlier tithe law. It specifies only an agricultural tithe, though it mentions the firstlings of flock and herd (v. 23; cf. 12:17; 15:19ff.). But even Numbers 18 does not explicitly mention an animal tithe. Only Leviticus 27 does so (cf. II Chr 31:6). It is possibly taken for granted in both Numbers 18 and Deuteronomy 14. According to Num 18:21, "every tithe" (RSV) was given to the Levites. Deuteronomy 14 specifies that except in the third and sixth years (and of course the fallow sabbath year also; cf. Ex 23:11), the offerer might use the tithe—presumably, however, only a small part of it—for a communion feast at the sanctuary.

23. That thou mayest learn to fear the Lord. The purpose of this section is not so much to give a comprehensive statement of the tithe law as to guard tithing procedure from being prostituted to idolatrous ends; that is, to prevent Israel from honoring the Canaanite fertility deities for their harvests. The insistence, therefore, was that all religious ceremony associated with tithing be conducted at the central sanctuary (12:6,11). It is necessary to take account of this particular purpose of these verses when making comparisons with tithing regulations elsewhere. (On the reason for the permission of vv. 24ff., see 12:21.) 28. At the end of three years. The conjunction of this with the sabbatical legislation of 15:1ff. indicates that such triennial years (called in 26:12 "the year of tithing") were the third and sixth years within the sabbatical-Jubilee cycle.

29. The stranger . . . the fatherless . . . the widow. A minor modification of the agricultural tithe, in keeping with the familiar charitable interest of the Lord in the poor class, which would emerge in the social stratification of life in Canaan, is this inclusion of other dependents along with the Levites in the use of the tithe of the third and sixth years. See Num 18:26-32 for the disposition of these tithes to be made by the Levites.

15:1-23. The main thread of the preceding legislation is picked up again in the law of the firstlings in 15:19-23 (cf. 14:23). Meanwhile, verses 1-18 elaborate the subject of love toward needy brethren, which came up in the exposition of tithing procedure (14:27ff.). Specifically, these stipulations deal with the remission of debts (vv. 1-11) and the manumission of bond servants (vv. 12-18). A further element of continuity is found in the sabbatical framework for this program of mercy (cf. 14:28).

1-11. 1. At the end of every seven years. This refers to the sabbatical year which ended each seven-year period within a Jubilee cycle (cf. 14:28). The institution of the year of release was established in the Book of the Covenant (Ex 23:10,11) and expounded in the Levitical instructions (Lev 25:2ff.). 2. The Lord's release. Hebrew shᵉmiṭṭâ, "release," comes from a root meaning to let fall. In Ex 23:11 it is applied to the land in the sense of lying fallow. Hence the year of release is "a sabbath of rest unto the land" (Lev 25:4). Here it is applied to debts in the sense of remission. Many have interpreted this as a one-year moratorium on the creditor's collection of debts. However, the fact that the seventh year of release and the Jubilee year of liberty belonged to one symbolical unit indicates that a permanent cancellation of debts is meant. The crowning Jubilee Sabbath simply carried the principle further to a restoration of personal freedom and a return of real estate. At each level the sabbatical release was a renewal of the Lord's original deliverance of the covenant people from bondage and a reinstatement of the families in their original inheritance. Agreeably, the Sabbath itself is associated with the Lord's deliverance of his needy, crying people from bondage (cf. Deut 5:14,15). The release of the seventh year was the Lord's, though his mercy was manifested through the philanthropy of his servants. It was designed to refurbish the theocratic symbol of the kingdom of God periodically by a fresh realization of the saving and restoring grace of the Lord which was experienced so abundantly at the beginning of Israel's theocratic life. At the same time it pointed prophetically to the future redemptive action of God, anticipating the Messianic reign of mercy to the poor and helpless (cf. Ps 72). This consummation prospect is always present in sabbatical symbolism. 4. But there will be no poor among you (RSV). The need for such charity, as is parenthetically observed (vv. 4-6), would be obviated by the absence of any poor in Israel, if such faithfulness were always manifested as to warrant the bestowal of the covenant blessings in richest measure. As a matter of fact, however, for want of fidelity in Israel, the poor would always be present (v. 11; cf. Mk 14:7). 9. Beware [lest] . . . thine eye be evil against thy poor brother. Such, indeed, were the sinful propensities of even the covenant people that they must be warned lest this septennial provision of mercy to the poor become an occasion for oppressing them in the intervening periods. The practice of observing a year of release seems to some financially infeasible (which is one reason why some commentators interpret the release as a temporary suspension of debt). But the people of faith were called upon to recognize that within the peculiar covenantal arrangements of God with the theocratic nation, obedience to this stipulation was a guarantee of prosperity – for this thing the Lord . . . shall bless thee (v. 10; cf. Lev 25:20,21). That the Scriptures do not recommend this as a normative policy outside the OT theocratic community of Israel is evident even from the exceptive clause in Deut 15:3a. The foreigner (v. 3a) is not, like the "sojourner" or "stranger who is within thy gates," a permanent member of the community, but one temporarily visiting for commercial purposes or the like.

12-18. 12. Thou shalt let him go free. Though septennially structured, this law, unlike 14:28,29 and 15:1-11, does not refer to the regular sabbatical units within a Jubilee cycle but to a seven-year period beginning whenever an individual Hebrew became an indentured servant. This provision for manumission was also contained in the Book of the Covenant (Ex 21:2-6), and it finds a counterpart within the Levitical legislation concerning the Jubilee year (Lev 25:39-55; cf. Jer 34:14). Or an Hebrew woman. The inclusion of Hebrew women, possibly implicit in Ex 21:2-6 (cf. Ex 21:7-11, which deals with the special case of the concubine-maidservant) becomes explicit here. As in the release of debt, so in the release of the slave, the limits of application were the Israelite brotherhood.

In view of the contrast instituted between the "brother" and the "foreigner" in this context and the identification of the Hebrew servant as a brother (Deut 15:12), the theory which regards the "Hebrew servant" as a "foreign servant" must be judged erroneous. According to that theory, what Ex 21:6 and Deut 15:17 allow for a Hebrew servant, Lev 25:44-46 forbids for an Israelite. But Leviticus 25 refers to a compulsory, rigorous slavery, while the Hebrew servant passages refer to a voluntary, agreeable service. The stipulation of a Jubilee manumission in Lev 25:40,41 supplements the Hebrew servant's right of seventh-year release as a special boon when the Jubilee arrived before his seventh year of service. 16. If he say . . . I will not go away. This supplementary right, like that of release in the seventh year, was subject to the servant's further right to voluntary lifelong service of a beloved master (cf. Ex 21:5,6). In the Deuteronomic reformulation of this provision, it becomes more liberal (15:13,14) and various inducements to obedience are cited (vv. 15,18).

19-23. The subject of firstlings mentioned in 14:23 (cf. 12:6,17) is now resumed. Earlier legislation on the subject is found in Ex 13:2,11-16; 22:29,30; 34:19,20; Lev 27:26,27; Num 18:15-18. The Deuteronomic treatment is not exhaustive but designed only to clarify the relevance of the law of the central altar (Deut 12) to the administration of the law of firstlings within the anticipated circumstances of the tribes dispersed and exposed to the dangerous influences of local Canaanite shrines. Thus the new formulation refers to a fact not noted in previous legislation, namely, that the offerer and his household were to participate in the sacrificial meal accompanying the presentation of firstlings. 20. Thou shalt eat it before the Lord. Clearly, that is mentioned here in order to press the requirement that all sacred feasting must take place at the central sanctuary (12:6,17), even though in Canaan common feasts would be permitted elsewhere (12:15ff.). There is no necessary contradiction between the assignment of the firstlings to the priests and their families (Num 18:15-18) and this sharing of the offerer's family in the sacrificial meal. See 14:23-27 for a similar situation with respect to the disposition of the tithes. Year by year. Annual offering was substituted for eighth-day offering (cf. Ex 22:30) for the same reason that eating of flesh at home was henceforth to be allowed (Deut 12:21). On verse 21a, see Lev 22:19ff.; Deut 17:1. Observe again the concern to show the relevance of the fundamental legislation of Deuteronomy 12 to this particular matter of the firstlings (15:22,23; cf. 12:15,16,22ff.).

d) Tributary Pilgrimages. 16:1-17.

The section which began at 12:1 concludes with commandments concerning the three annual pilgrimages to the central sanctuary: the feasts of Passover and Unleavened Bread (16:1-8), Weeks (vv. 9-12), and Tabernacles (vv. 13-15). For the earlier legislation, see chiefly Exodus 12; Leviticus 23; Numbers 28 and 29. Our comments here are largely devoted to features peculiar to the Deuteronomic formulation and problems raised thereby. The sabbatical scheme is again present (cf. Deut 14:28–15:18), for the entire religious calendar of feasts was sabbatically patterned. Still prominent is the concern with the way in which the contemplated divine choice of a permanent sanctuary site in the midst of an extensive land must modify previous ceremonial practice. Note the repeated use of the formula for the central altar (16:2,6,7, 11,15,16). Because Deuteronomy is a covenant-renewal document presupposing earlier covenant stipulations as still valid, except as it expressly modifies them, it condenses and omits much while giving new emphasis to features affected by the introduction of "the place which the Lord shall choose." Recognition of this should have prevented many of the higher critical allegations of contradiction between Deuteronomy and other Pentateuchal legislation. Viewed as a suzerainty treaty, Deut 16:1-17 corresponds to the customary demand that the vassal appear annually before the suzerain with the stipulated tribute. Beginning with verse 18 there is a new section principally concerned with the administration of justice.

The Passover. 16:1-8. 1. The month of Abib. See Ex 12:1,6; 34:18. The passover. This term is used in these verses as comprehending both the Passover proper and the following seven-day Feast of Unleavened Bread (cf. v. 3, noting that the antecedent of "therewith" is passover). Consequently, this Passover sacrifice might be taken from both flock and herd (v. 2), whereas for the Passover proper, a lamb was prescribed (Ex 12:3ff.). For the sacrifices referred to in Deut 16:2, see the account of the celebration in II Chr 30:22ff. and 35:7ff., and note the use there of the term "passover offerings," literally, passovers, for sacrifices from the herd. 3. The bread of affliction recalled the oppressive circumstances in the house of bondage, especially Pharaoh's opposition to Israel's departure, which compelled them to make hasty preparations for flight. On verses 3,4a, see Ex 12:15,18-20; 13:3,6,7; 23:15; 34:18; Lev 23:6. On verse 4b, see Ex 12:10; 23:18b; 34:25b; Num 9:12. On verse 8, see Ex 12:16; Lev 23:7,8; Num 28:18,25.

4. In order to designate more specifically the Passover proper, Moses calls it the flesh, which thou sacrificedst the first day at even. The references to the "passover" immediately after that designation (vv. 5,6) are also evidently to be taken in that narrower sense. 7a. Roast and eat it (AV, ASV). The RSV unnecessarily creates a conflict with Ex 12:9 by translating the verb bāshal as "boil." It is only an additional specification like "with water" or "in pots" that definitely gives this Hebrew verb the meaning "boil" (cf. Ex 12:9; II Chr 35:13b). When further defined by "with fire," bāshal clearly signifies "roast" (see II Chr 35:13a). By itself it is ambiguous. This ambiguity in Deut 16:7 is due to the fact that the manner of preparing the sacrifice for eating had already been established and was not Moses' present concern. He was, rather, emphasizing the point that this feast must take place at the central sanctuary. Only after the observance of the complete feast, both preparation and participation, might the worshipers depart from the sanctuary to their living quarters. 7b. Unto thy tents. The ambiguity of this expression (which would here refer to the pilgrims' temporary quarters in the holy city) is also attributable to Moses' overriding interest in the idea of the central altar. Preparation of the sacrifice at the sanctuary was a modification of the observance of the first Passover in Egypt, when the blood was applied to the individual homes in the absence of a centralized cult and altar.

The Feast of Weeks. 16:9-12. On the subject of this section, see the earlier prescriptions in Ex 23:16; 34:22; Lev 23:15ff.; Num 28:26ff. 10a. The feast of weeks (cf. Ex 34:22) was also called "feast of harvest" (Ex 23:16) and "day of the firstfruits" (Num 28:26). In later times it received the Greek name Pentecost because of the way its date was calculated, namely, fifty days from a set starting point (Lev 23:16). That point is here described in general terms as the beginning of the grain harvest (Deut 16:9). There was no need for greater precision because the exact date had already been given in Lev 23:10ff. It was the second day of the Feast of Unleavened Bread, the day of the offering of the sheaf of the first fruits of the grain harvest. This was the "morrow after the sabbath" (Lev 23:15), for the first day of Unleavened Bread was a day of rest. Following this reckoning, the NT Pentecost event fell on a Saturday. The seven weeks between the Passover and Harvest pilgrimages allowed time for the completion of the grain harvest. 10b. Freewill offering (cf. Num 29:39; Lev 23:38). This feast was one of joy – joy in the Lord, who had brought his people unto their fruitful paradise land (Deut 16:10c,11; cf. 12:7,12,18; 16:14,15) – joy in the Lord who had delivered from bondage (v. 12), and thus a joy to be shared with all the poor within the covenant family (v. 11b).

The Feast of Tabernacles or Booths. 16:13-15. Parallel legislation is in Ex 23:16; 34:22; Lev 23:33ff.; Num 29:12ff. 13. The feast of tabernacles or booths (RSV) is also called the "feast of ingathering" (in Exodus). Like the Feast of Unleavened Bread, it lasted a week, i.e., from the fifteenth to the twenty-first of the seventh month. It was followed by an octave sabbath day (Lev 23:36,39). The name Tabernacles reflects the custom of dwelling in booths during the festival, which served as a memorial of life in the wilderness (cf. the use of unleavened bread). The name "Ingathering" indicates that this feast was the culmination of the agricultural year, when vintage as well as grain had been harvested. In the year of release, when there was no harvest, this feast was the occasion for the significant public reading of the text of the covenant (Deut 31:9-13). Once again, the point of the formulation was to enforce the law of the central sanctuary – the place which the Lord shall choose (v. 15). Here, too, joy and love are the marks of covenant life and worship (v. 14).

16, 17. Cf. Ex 23:17; 34:23. This concluding summary turns all eyes again to the central sanctuary (v. 16a) and brings into relief the character of the pilgrimages as tributary trips to the throne of the God-King (v. 16b). 17. According to the blessing of the Lord. Cf. I Cor 16:2.

2) Judicial-Governmental Righteousness. 16:18–21:23.

This section contains a series of stipulations concerning theocratic government, with primary emphasis on the judiciary. Israel must add to cultic holiness political-judicial righteousness. Between the governmental and the cultic there was a unity of ultimate authority, since the Lord was both God and King in Israel. Consequently, all theocratic institutions, unlike those in the ordinary state, were confessionally religious, and there was an extension of cultic practice beyond the sanctuary into the administration of government. Moreover, because all theocratic law, moral and civil as well as cultic, was comprehended in the covenant stipulations of the Lord which were written in the covenant document, and because that Book of the Law was committed to the priests at the central sanctuary to be guarded and expounded by them, the priesthood possessed the dominant judicial voice (cf. 21:5), at least until the beginning of the monarchy (cf. 17:9,10). In addition to their knowledge of the written law, the priests had access by Urim and Thummim to direct divine verdicts. That would afford to the priests a more ultimate role, even though kings became more prominent in the judicial process. Abroad in the land the oracular voice of the divine King enthroned in the sanctuary was increasingly revealed to and through the prophet. But while prophets registered the Lord's unsought judgments upon the vassal people and leadership, the judicial functioning of the priest related to litigation instituted by one Israelite vassal against another or to legal investigations initiated within the Israelite community.

a) Judges and God's Altar. 16:18–17:13.

18-20. During the wilderness journeyings Moses, the mediator, had been Israel's chief judge, while assistant judges appointed from the tribes handled the ordinary cases (cf. 1:12ff.; Ex 18:13ff.). That arrangement was now modified to meet the new conditions of life in Canaan. 18. In all thy gates. The judicial districts there were to be the towns rather than tribal-genealogical divisions. The natural leaders of the local council of elders would probably be the judges and assistant officers who are in view here (cf. 19:12). In this introduction to the subject, the emphasis falls, however, not on the organizational structure of the judicatories but on the demand for justice in administering the law of the Lord — thou shalt not wrest judgment (vv. 19,20; cf. Ex 23:3,6,8). Even in the codes and epics of Israel's heathen neighbors the virtue of justice in leaders is an often reiterated ideal.

16:21–17:1. The interlocking of cultic and governmental processes (cf. introductory comments on 16:18–21:23 above) explains the appearance of cultic proscriptions among the judicial regulations. These verses propound in concrete fashion the regulative religious principles found in the first three laws of the Decalogue, which were to characterize judicial procedure. First, the authority of the Lord alone must be consulted (vv. 21,22; cf. 17:8-10). This is expressed negatively in the prohibition of idolatrous appeal for oracular decision (18:9-14). 21. Asherah (RSV; grove, AV), the Canaanite goddess, had as one significant epithet, "Asherah of deposits, goddess of oracles" (Keret, 201,202). The cultic Asherah and pillar were apparently, then, symbols associated with judicial procedure, specifically, the giving of oracular verdict (cf. Prov 16:10). Such a role was played by images of gods in Egypt, especially in the New Kingdom. Second, the cultic aspect of judicial procedure must be characterized by the same reverence for the Lord's holy name that was required in all Israel's cultic service — Not sacrifice . . . any bullock, or sheep, wherein is blemish (17:1; cf. 15:21; 21:1ff.; Lev 22:17ff.).

17:2-7. Beginning here, rules of evidence and judgment are presented. The particular case of apostasy which is cited (vv. 2,3) is simply illustrative of cases requiring capital punishment as the verdict. Concrete rather than abstract formulation of principles is a feature of the Deuteronomic legislation. For the stipulations concerned with apostasy as such, see Deut 13 (cf. Ex 22:20). The selection of this particular illustration is appropriate, for it underscores the contextual emphasis on the exclusive lordship of God in the judicial process. 2. In transgressing his covenant. The prohibition of foreign allegiance is the recurring, basic prohibition of the covenant. 3. Which I have not commanded. The first person reminds us that Moses spoke as the mouth of the Lord (cf. 1:3; 7:4). The central point is the demand that justice be safeguarded by a conscientiously thorough investigation (v. 4; cf. 13:14) and insistence on adequate evidence (vv. 6,7; cf. 19:15). A minimum of two witnesses was required (see also Num 35:30), and their confidence in their own testimony was to be evidenced by their assuming the dread responsibility of delivering the first and quite possibly lethal blows in the execution of the condemned (cf. 13:9). This measure also prevented secret accusation in prosecution of private quarrels. 5. Bring forth . . . unto thy gates. The execution occurred outside the camp (cf. Lev 24:14; Num 15:36; Heb 13:12).

8-13. Moses perpetuated in modified form the system of lower and higher judicatories which had been instituted at Sinai (Ex 18:13ff.). During the wanderings, both Moses, the final arbiter, and the body of judges assisting in less weighty matters held court in the vicinity of the sanctuary. Since, however, the lower courts would henceforth be decentralized and located throughout the towns of Israel (Deut 16:18), it was now specified that the higher tribunal was to continue at the central sanctuary — the place which . . . thy God shall choose (v. 8) —, a reminder that he who dwelt at the sanctuary was Israel's supreme Judge. This arrangement was designed in the first instance for the premonarchial period, but it could be continued after the rise of a king in Israel (cf. 14ff.; II Chr 19:8ff.).

8a. A matter too hard for thee. Any variety of case that proved too difficult (lit., too wonderful; cf. Job 42:3) for the local court would come under the jurisdiction of the court at the central sanctuary (cf. 19:16-18). The latter was not a court of appeal, however. 9. The priests . . . the judge. The central judicature consisted of a plurality of both priests and judges (19:17), but each of these groups had its individual head, viz., the high priest (cf. 17:12) and a "chief justice." The formulation is not specific enough to determine from this ordinance the exact division of responsibility between priest and judge (cf. II Chr 19:11). Apparently verdicts might be announced by either priest or judge (Deut 17:12). 12. The man that . . . will not hearken . . . shall die. Since the decision was in either case delivered by the representative of the Lord, any failure to comply was rebellion against him and rendered the offender liable to the death penalty. Indeed, these representatives of the Lord, as the official agents of his judgment, are denominated ʾĕlōhîm, "gods" (AV, "judges") in Ex 21:6; 22:8,28 (in the latter, note the parallelism with "ruler of thy people"). On Deut 17:13, see 13:11.

b) Kings and God's Covenant. 17:14-20.

Like the law of the stationary sanctuary, this law envisages not the immediate but the more distant future. Though the establishment of a monarchy is presented not as imperative but as permissive, that is sufficient to show that a monarchy as such need not be antithetical to the principle of theocratic government (cf. Gen 17:6,16; 35:11; 49:10). All depended on the kind of monarchy that should emerge. If the king conformed to the spirit of the present provision, ruling under the Lord and by the covenant law, he would actually enrich the OT's symbolic prefiguration of the Messianic reign. It was the indifference of Israel to the religious requisites for a theocratic king that accounted for Samuel's opposition to their request for a king (cf. I Sam 8:4ff.). It is noteworthy that in the secular suzerainty treaties, a similar oversight of the vassal's choice of king is exercised.

The main insistence of this passage, which lays the legal-covenantal foundation for the later monarchy, is that even when dynastic kingship will have replaced charismatic judgeship, the kings, too, must subject their life and reign, particularly their judicial activity, to God's covenant (vv. 18-20). The judicial supremacy belonged to the Lord, whose law was under the guardianship of the priests (v. 18; cf. 11). 15. Whom the Lord thy God shall choose. The divine choice of a king to sit on the throne of the Lord (cf. I Chr 29:23) was revealed through a prophet (cf. I Sam 10:24; 16:12ff.). One from among thy brethren. He was to be a fellow covenant servant. In this respect the king would be like his Messianic antitype. The restrictions of verses 16,17 reflect conditions in the royal courts of the nations around Israel. In some of these, the king was a god; in Israel, God was King (cf. Ex 15:18; 19:5,6; Deut 33:5; Jud 8:23). On 16b, see Ex 13:17; 14:13; Deut 28:68. In the wilderness, the Israelites longed for the agricultural produce of Egypt (Num 11:5,18,20; 14:4). Confronted by empires in which horses were a source of economic and military strength, they would lust for the Pharaoh's famed horses and chariots (cf. Isa 30:2; I Kgs 10:28,29), forgetting the import of their election and deliverance from Egyptian bondage. For the Solomonic violation of these restrictions, see I Kgs 10:26ff.; 11:1ff. 18. A copy of this law. A duplicate copy of the suzerainty treaty was provided for each vassal king. The Lord's copy, here regarded as the original and standard, was deposited at the central sanctuary (31:9). On verses 19,20, cf. 31:12,13. David manifested the conformity of his spirit to this covenantal law of kingship by his psalmodic response to it (see Ps 1) and by locating his throne site near the central sanctuary at the place which God had chosen.

c) Priests and Prophets. 18:1-22.

Responsibility was laid upon Israel for the support of the priestly ministers of God whose administrative assignments are cited in the preceding and following contexts (vv. 1-8). Then Moses enjoined the elimination of all false oracular claimants, including the false prophet (vv. 9-22). In that connection, he set forth the institution of the true prophets (v. 15ff., rounding out the treatment of theocratic leaders (judge, 16:8; king, 17:14ff.; priest and Levite, 18:1ff.), which is appropriately incorporated into this section of legislation dealing with the official administration of righteousness in theocratic life.

1-8. 1. The priests the Levites. Deuteronomy uses this designation seven times, and seven times simply "priest(s)." And all the tribe of Levi. The and is interpretive, since in Hebrew the construction is one of simple apposition. This interpretation is grammatically acceptable (cf. 17:1) and consistent with the representation in the rest of the Scriptures, according to which all the priests were descended from Levi but only Aaronite Levites were priests. The RSV translation, that is, all the tribe of Levi, foists on Deuteronomy the view that all Levites were priests and thereby creates a conflict between it and the other Biblical legislation. Deuteronomy itself conveys a distinctly different image of each group: the priests are the altar ministers of the central sanctuary, who enjoy a position of supreme honor and authority; the Levites are everywhere functional subordinates and social dependents. Priests and Levites did share the commission of instructing Israel in the Law (33:10a; Lev 10:11; II Chr 15:3; 17:8,9; 30:22; 35:3). 1a. No part nor inheritance. That is, they would have no unified tribal territory (cf. 10:9; 12:12; 14:27,29). As compact formulations serving the purposes of treaty renewal, the Deuteronomic stipulations assume the validity of the more minute regulations given earlier, unless, of course, they expressly modify them. So here, verses 1b,2 allude to legislation like that of Num 18:20ff.; Lev 2:3; 7:6-10,28ff.

2. The Lord is their inheritance. The Lord chose the Levites as his first-born consecration portion of Israel (v. 5; cf. Num 3:5-13) and then gave himself to them as their portion. The latter was expressed in their participation in Israel's offerings to him. The arrangement was symbolic of the great covenantal truth that the Lord was Israel's God and Israel was the Lord's people.

3. The priest's due. It is a question whether this verse further defines the fire offerings and inheritance (e.g., first fruits, tithes) of verses 1,2, or appoints certain additional portions. In the former case, there is a modification of earlier law, for the specific parts here assigned to the priests are not those detailed in Lev 7:29ff. If this is correct, an explanation of the modification of the earlier right shoulder requirement might well be that the right shoulder was the portion given to Canaanite priests – as has been disclosed by the discovery of a pit connected with a Canaanite temple and filled with right shoulder bones. Assuming verse 3 to be supplementary to earlier legislation, some have held that the reference is not to sacrifice but to animals slaughtered at home (cf. the terminology in Deut 12:15,21). Such a provision would prevent the serious diminution of priests' revenue, which would otherwise be the effect of removing this considerable share of butchery from the category of sacrifice. Another and more tenable explanation of 18:3 interpreted as a supplementary provision is that it refers not to the peace offerings proper but to certain other sacred meals eaten at the sanctuary, whether generally festive, or, as the present context might suggest, associated with judicial procedure. In verse 4, the fleece supplements earlier requirements (cf. Num 18:12).

6. If a Levite come from any of thy gates. The priests' cities were near Jerusalem, but those of the Levites were farther afield (see Josh 21). Verses 6-8 guaranteed the rights of all Levites against any restrictive tendencies of vested priestly interests at the central sanctuary. The charity towards the Levites required of Israel in general was required of the priests too.

9-22. If Israel desired further revelation of the will of the Lord in addition to that expressly written in the Law of Moses, the means of Urim and Thummim was available to their priests. Beyond that, the initiative in revelation lay with God, who would raise up prophets and speak through them (v. 18). The Israelites must be satisfied with and submissive to that revelation (vv. 15-19). If they deemed Moses and the prophets inadequate, then even a voice from the dead would not help. Allegedly oracular sources, such as flourished among the Canaanites, must be shunned (vv. 9-14). And a presumptuous prophet, speaking as from the Lord, indeed, every false prophet, must be exterminated (vv. 20-22).

9. Thou shalt not learn to do . . . abominations. All occult superstitions – divination, sorcery, spiritualism (vv. 10, 11) – were abominations (vv. 9,12) to the Lord and invited the sentence of the ban (cf. comments on 7:1ff.). Pagan magic was identified with pagan religion, and therefore its practice would be rebellion against the demand of the Lord's covenant for Israel's loyalty – thou shalt be perfect (v. 13).

15. A Prophet from the midst of thee . . . like unto me. This figure of the prophet, like certain others in the OT (e.g., the seed of the woman, the son of David, the servant of the Lord, the son of man) has both a corporate and an individual significance. The collective sense (i.e., the whole institution of OT prophecy) is clearly required, for the problem of distinguishing true and false prophets is broached in this connection (vv. 20-22), and this "prophet" is presented as the legitimate counterpart to the oracular institutions of Canaan (vv. 9-14). Moreover, within the structure of Deuteronomy, this is the section which deals with the several theocratic offices, and the prophetic office is not elsewhere formally instituted (cf. Lk 11:50,51). At the same time, this passage was interpreted by Jesus and the apostles as pointing to Messiah (see especially Acts 3:22, 23; cf. Jn 5:43; 12:48,49; Mt 17:5). Jesus was the antitypical prophet whom the OT prophetic institution foreshadowed. The prophetic office was a mediatorial function and so, in measure, an extension of the mediatorial office of Moses – like unto me (cf. Num 12:6,7). It was given to Israel in response to the request made at Horeb for a mediator of divine revelation (Deut 18:16ff.; cf. 5:23ff.

20a. The prophet, which shall presume to speak a word in my name. Such a one was a more subtle menace than the Canaanite soothsayer or the Israelite dreamer of dreams, sign-attested, who enticed to other gods (v. 20b; 13:1ff.). And he was to receive the same treatment as these (v. 20c; cf. v. 12; 13:5). Identifying him was more difficult (v. 21), but he would be exposed by the failure of his verifiable predictions (v. 22).

d) Guarantees of Justice. 19:1-21.

The theme of judicial justice is continued with stipulations calculated to secure a fair trial and a true verdict. Asylum was provided for the manslayer lest the wrath of the avenger prevent sober adjudication (vv. 1-13). Tampering with evidence was prohibited (v. 14). Adequate and honest testimony was required (vv. 15-21). These measures served justice by protecting the innocent, but justice was also to be satisfied by the pitiless punishment of the guilty (vv. 11-13, 19-21).

Judicial Asylum. 19:1-13. 2,3. Thou shalt separate three cities. . . . that every slayer may flee thither. The land west of Jordan is in view, for, as stated at the conclusion to the historical prologue (4:41-43), Moses had already appointed the three cities of refuge east of Jordan. Joshua's role in completing this appointment of refuge cities is a mark of the functional and dynastic oneness of Joshua with Moses (cf. Josh 20).

6. One function of the kinsman-redeemer was to be the avenger of the blood (Gen 4:10ff.). This institution was not necessarily the mark of an ethically primitive society; rather, it was a mark of a less complex and less centralized form of government. Ideally, the avenger was to act out of passion for justice. However, because of the possibility of his acting out of mere passion, his office, while continued, was wisely controlled in the new, more highly centralized government of Israel established by Deuteronomy. The control was achieved by exploiting and expanding the institution of asylum early associated with the altar (cf. Gen 4:15; Ex 21:14b).

The germ of this was contained in the Sinaitic Book of the Covenant (Ex 21:12-14), and it was fully expounded in Num 35:9-34. Certain refinements are added in Deuteronomy 19 (cf. 3a, 8, 9 and 12), particularly with reference to Israel's future growth in Canaan. In Numbers, the term "cities of refuge" is applied to these cities which afforded protection to the fleeing manslayer not guilty of premeditated murder (vv. 4,5). Just as the geographical separation of the tribes from the central altar in Canaan required a decentralization of animal slaughter (12:15ff.), so it required a decentralization of asylum. The fact that the cities of refuge were Levitical cities (cf. Josh 20:7ff. and 21:1ff.) indicates, however, that, unlike animal slaying conducted apart from the central altar, the decentralized asylum did not lose its ceremonially sacred character. Note, too, the integration of this provision with the life of the high priest (Num 35:25). The cities of refuge were, then, extensions of the altar as a place of asylum. All this contributes further to the emphasis of this section of laws on the judicial importance of the priesthood and the central altar. Since the altar was the Lord's dwelling place, one can see in these laws of asylum the Deuteronomic equivalent of the extradition stipulations which figure prominently in the international suzerainty treaties.

9. Then shalt thou add three cities more. Moses looked beyond the near future and the selection of the three western cities to a more remote future, when Israelite expansion – in accordance with the divine promise (1:7; 11:24; 12:20) – would necessitate nine instead of six cities of refuge. There is no historical notice of compliance with this command.

12a. The elders of his city. These local authorities had the responsibility for innocent blood shed in their vicinity (see also 21:3ff.), and were therefore given a role in satisfying the cry of that blood for justice (cf. v. 13), but without abrogating the ancient right of the individual avenger (12b). The trial itself was conducted before "the congregation" (Num 35:12,24), i.e., publicly, but whether in the locality of the homicide or in the city of refuge is not clear. Joshua 20:4 (cf. v. 6) mentions a trial, at least provisional, which was to be held at the latter.

The Law of Landmarks. 19:14. This verse deals with what was, in effect, a violation of the ninth commandment, as do also verses 16-21. Thy neighbour's landmark. The value of boundary marks as evidence in property litigation is apparent. Their inviolability was protected by severe sanctions in the various ancient legal codes, and by curses against molesters inscribed on the landmarks themselves (cf. 27:17). Stones several feet high (kudurru, in Akkadian), marked the boundaries of royal grants. The fact that the inheritance of Israel and of each individual Israelite was such a royal grant from their divine King would add to the culpability of any who should tamper with the landmarks that would be established by the earliest generations after the conquest – they of old time.

The Law of Witnesses. 19:15-21. 15. At the mouth of two . . . or . . . three witnesses. This verse stipulates as a general principle of administration in criminal cases the law of witness which had earlier been enunciated for capital cases (17:6; Num 35:30). Deuteronomy 19:16-21 deals with the perjured witness, that is, with the violation of the ninth commandment in court (see 5:20; Ex 20:16; 23:1). 16. A false witness. He is thus designated in view of the outcome; but from the standpoint of the local judges it is not clear whether he or the defendant is the liar. It is precisely because of this difficulty that the case was to be referred to the central court (cf. 17:8-13). 18. Diligent inquisition (cf. 13:14; 17:4). There was to be no resort to ordeal, as in some such cases in the legal practice of Israel's neighbors. 21. Life for life. The penalty for perjury, however, was to be set according to the principle of the lex talionis (Ex 21:23ff.; Lev 24:17ff.), which was almost universally followed. That principle was not a license to vengeance but a guarantee of justice. Note again the pre-eminence of the priest in judgment (Deut 19:17).

e) Judgment of the Nations. 20:1-20.

Theocratic justice must be exercised in the prosecution of war beyond Israel's borders as well as in the administration of criminal law within the land. Here, again, a hegemony of priest and cult appears in the judicial process (v. 2ff.). Just as the cities of refuge were an extension of the asylum aspect of the altar throughout the land (cf. 19:1ff.), so the consecrated military campaign against the foreign foe was the just and holy judgment of the sanctuary – or better, of the Lord – abroad in the earth (vv. 1b,4,13a). While all Israelite military operations sanctioned by the Lord were theocratic judgments, and the adversary always assumed the character of enemy of God's kingdom, a distinction was made between wars waged against the Canaanite nations and those against nations very far off (v. 15ff.). The programmatic mandate of Deuteronomy 7 concentrated on the former; the present stipulations center on the latter. In the extra-biblical suzerainty treaties, too, the vassal's military activities and share of the spoil were carefully regulated and the suzerain promised support if needed.

1. The Lord . . . is with thee. The memory of God's almighty exploits in establishing the theocracy, and the assurance of his presence in the midst of his people even as they waged the wars of the Lord were to confirm their faith when they faced superior hosts and military technology. As for horses and chariots, let Israel sing anew the Song of the Sea: "The Lord is a man of war . . . Pharaoh's chariots and his host hath he cast into the sea . . . the horse and the rider hath he thrown into the sea . . . the Lord shall reign for ever and ever" (Ex 15:3a, 4a, 21b, 18). 2. The priest shall approach and speak. In the ancient world, priests and interpreters of omens were regular members of military staffs (cf. Num 10:8,9; 31:6; I Sam 7:9ff.). The function of the Israelite priest was not analogous to that of a modern army chaplain. He rather represented the sanctuary in the name of which the Israelite host advanced; he consecrated the battle to the glory of the Lord of hosts and of his covenant kingdom. On verse 4, see 23:14; I Sam 14:18; II Sam 11:11.

The situation envisaged in verses 5-9 is that of the early days in Canaan before there would be a regular army with foreign mercenaries as an elite corps. 5. The officers. The militia of the tribes was to be levied by tribal officers (cf. 1:15). The Assyrian, Shamshi-Adad, in his military correspondence, commands those in charge of the levy: "The chief whose forces are not turned out in full and who leaves one man behind will incur the disfavor of the king" (Mari, I, 6:18ff.). Since, however, in the wars of the Lord, victory came not by the might of Israel's hosts, recruiting was made so free of compulsion that only conscience fortified by faith in the Lord as the Giver of victory (v. 4) compelled enlistment. (For striking historic exemplification of the principle, see Jud 7:2,3). 8. Lest his brethren's heart faint. The Homeric epics depict demoralized troops weeping like calves and wailing like children for home. Such behavior in the Israelite army would disgrace the name of the Lord before the heathen. The types of exemption cited in verses 5-7 were evidently not novel in Israel (cf. the Sumerian poem, "Gilgamesh and the Land of the Living," 49ff.; The Ugaritic poem, Keret, 101ff.). Jesus insisted (Lk 14:18ff.) that such excuses as availed for exemption from military service might not prevent a man's responding promptly to His invitation to salvation. (On v. 6, cf. Lev 19:23ff.; on v. 7, cf. 24:5.)

10. Proclaim peace unto it. Such an offer was expressly forbidden in the conflict with the cities of Canaan (7:2ff.). The identification of God's kingdom with the earthly kingdom of Israel brought an OT anticipation of the final judgment which is to overtake those who remain outside the redemptive kingdom of Christ. This OT judgment, however, could not be executed universally. For then the age of grace for the Gentiles would have been prematurely terminated, and the promise that Israel should be a blessing to all the nations through the Messiah (Gen 12:3) would have been nullified. Therefore, the typology of final judgment was strictly applied only in warfare against nations within the boundaries claimed by God for his typical kingdom (Deut 20:16-18; cf. 7:2ff.). 15. The cities . . . far . . . from thee. Beyond those boundaries the typology of judgment was tempered by the principles that govern the customary relations of ordinary nations (vv. 10-15), yet not so that the religious significance of the encounter of an ancient nation with God's Kingdom Israel was lost. Consequently, in Israel's offer of peace (v. 10) and in the submission of the Gentile city as a covenant tributary to the Lord (v. 11) there was imaged the saving mission of God's people in this world (cf. Zech 9:7b, 10b). The judgment of those who refuse to make their peace with God through Christ was exhibited in the siege, conquest, and punishment of the unsubmissive city (Deut 20:13), even though, as observed above, this did not amount to a strict application of the hērem (ban), nor was it even as severe treatment as was customary in ancient warfare (vv. 14,19,20). 19b. The tree . . . is man's life. These words, placed in parenthesis in the AV, are obscure; but the AV seems to translate the end of the verse more accurately than the ASV and the RSV.

f) Authority of Sanctuary and Home. 21:1-23.

This chapter concludes the commandments concerned with governmental authority. Since all such authority is an extension of the authority of the individual family head (see the fifth commandment), these final stipulations on this subject appropriately concern the exercise of authority within the home. There are sanctions imposed to enforce this authority (vv. 18-21), and there are regulations to insure a just exercise of it (vv. 10-17). The opening verses prescribe judicial procedure in cases in which penal justice cannot be satisfied because the identity of the offender is not known (vv. 1-9). The provisions are such as to demonstrate further the orientation of all theocratic government to the sanctuary. Similarly, the closing stipulation insists that cultic-ceremonial law be respected in the administration of criminal law (vv. 22,23). The theocratic altar and the theocratic court were two manifestations of the justice of the theocratic King, the holy One who chose a dwelling place in Israel.

Corporate Community Responsibility. 21:1-9. 2. Thy elders and thy judges. The members of the local judiciaries (see 16:18) were to determine which city must bear the responsibility. 3. The city which is nearest (ASV). This principle of corporate community responsibility in cases of undetected criminals appears also in the Code of Hammurabi. Laws 23 and 24 of that Code require the nearest city to make restitution in cases of robbery and to compensate with one mina of silver the family of someone slain. The elders of that city (cf. 19:12), as the representatives of the whole population, were to conduct the ceremonial execution (3b,4). This ritual was to be under the jurisdiction of the priests (5a). 5b. By their word shall every controversy and every stroke be tried (cf. 17:8,10). Here is a clear affirmation of the ultimate judicial authority vested in the priesthood. The priests' function in the case at hand was to be purely judicial, for the slaying of the heifer (v. 4b) would not be a cultic sacrifice, but a judicial execution. That it was not an altar sacrifice is evident from the mode of execution (cf. Ex 13:13). Since it was only a ceremonial execution, with the heifer regarded as a substitute for the unknown murderer, there was no actual satisfaction of justice. 9. So . . . put away the guilt . . . from among you. The ritual served to preserve the ceremonial status of those involved as sacramentally qualified covenant members (vv. 8,9). In so doing, it prophetically prefigured (as would an altar sacrifice) the vicarious execution of the Messianic Servant of the Lord for the blood-guiltiness of his people. Not only men, but the blood-stained land participated in the symbolical defilement; and its defilement, too, was, after a figure, purged by the judicial ritual (cf. Num 35:33). In this there was a reminder that perfect righteousness must at last pervade the totality of God's kingdom. Another by-product of this ritual requirement would be the preservation of peace by the elimination of possible misunderstanding that might spark inter-city strife if the kinsman of the slain were rashly to pursue his role of avenger.

Limits of a Husband's Authority. 21:10-14. This first of three stipulations concerned with the authority of the head of the household (cf. vv. 15-21) deals with the limits of the husband's authority over his wife. The case of a captive woman (vv. 10,11; cf. 20:14; contrast 7:3) is used as a case in point for establishing the rights of the wife, perhaps because the principle would obviously apply a fortiori in the case of an Israelite wife. On the purificatory acts of verses 12b, 13a, which signified removal from captive-slave status, compare Lev 14:8; Num 8:7. On the month's mourning, see Num 20:29 and Deut 34:8. This period would provide for the achieving of inward composure for beginning a new life, as well as for an appropriate expression of filial piety. 14. Thou shalt not sell her. A wife might not be reduced to slave status, not even the wife who had been raised from slave status. Though the particular illustration of the captive wife is peculiar to Deuteronomy, the same principle is expressed in the Book of the Covenant, where the case of the Israelite bondmaiden is cited (Ex 21:7-11). Then thou shalt let her go whither she will. The severance of the marriage relationship is mentioned here only incidentally to the statement of the main principle that a man's authority did not extend to the right of reducing his wife to a slave. The dissolution of the marriage would have to be accomplished according to the laws of divorce in the theocracy (cf. Deut 24:1-4). Not the divorce was mandatory, but the granting of freedom in case the man should determine to divorce his wife according to the permission granted by Moses because of the hardness of their hearts (cf. Mt 19:8).

Limits of a Father's Authority. 21:15-17. This stipulation circumscribed the authority of the father over his sons specifically with respect to the rights of the first-born. The particular illustration involves another situation within the Mosaic economy which was merely tolerated, namely, polygamy. Where polygamy was practiced, the problem cited (v. 15) would have been common (cf. Gen 29:30ff.; I Sam 1:4ff.). 17c. The right of the first-born is his. The right of primogeniture included a property inheritance share double that of other sons. The principle here enforced is that parental authority is not absolute. A father's mere personal preference did not justify disregard of the divinely sanctioned customary rights of those who were under his parental authority.

Judgment of a Rebellious Son. 21:18-21. If misuse of authority produced tyranny, disrespect for proper authority would produce anarchy, the very contradiction of the covenant order as a manifestation of God's lordship. Parental authority, in particular, had been ordained of God to represent divine authority and to be the cornerstone of all human government and societal order. Therefore, while it was necessary to protect those under the authority of a household head from the arbitrary abuse of his authority (vv. 10-17), it was also necessary to fortify that authority against the spirit of lawlessness in a generation of Belial (v. 20). It is here enforced by the ultimate sanctions of theocratic law (v. 21; Ex 21:15,17; Lev 20:9; Deut 27:16). 18. Though they chasten him (ASV). Chastening was to be the limit of the parents' own application of judicial sanctions. Beyond that, the judicial process must be conducted by the elders at the gate (v. 19), that is, by the local theocratic judicatory (cf. 16:18ff.).

Disposition of a Criminal's Corpse. 21:22,23. The preceding law had proceeded from parental to official judicial authority and had prescribed the death penalty. The present case takes the judicial process a step beyond the execution, to the exposure of the corpse as a monitory, public proclamation of the satisfaction of justice. The principle being exemplified is that all theocratic law administration must operate in the service of covenant religion. 23. He that is hanged is accursed of God. The condemned will have been guilty of offenses declared accursed in the covenant sanctions. As one executed, he would visibly embody the curse of God poured out. And as a human carcass exposed to birds and beasts of prey (cf. II Sam 21:10), the man hanged on a tree would be an expression of the ultimate in the curse of God on the fallen race (cf., e.g., Rev 19:17ff.). In this conclusion to the series of stipulations wherein God demands a perfect judicial righteousness and the satisfaction of every claim of justice, if need be through a vicarious sufferer, the New Testament believer is reminded of him who was accursed of God to redeem his people from the law's inexorable curse (Gal 3:13).

3) Sanctity of the Divine Order. 22:1–25:19.

Love for God requires reverence for the divine ordinances at the various levels of creation and in the various spheres of human activity. The covenant servant must respect the sanctity of the orders of nature (22:5-12), marriage 22:13-30; Heb. Bible 23:1), and the theocratic kingdom (23:1 [Heb. Bible 23:2] – 25:12). With the partial exception of the natural order, the area in view is that of the mutual relationships of the covenant servants. This whole section, therefore, is bounded by laws which clearly express the basic principle that the same loving regard must be shown for one's neighbor's interests as for one's own (22:1-4; 25:13-16). The extra-biblical suzerainty treaties also regulated the relationships of the lord's vassals to one another.

a) The Ordinances of Labor and Marriage. 22:1-30.

1-4. Similar legislation is found in the Book of the Covenant (Ex 23:4ff.). There, it is in the midst of laws aimed at securing an honest administration of justice. The law of God must be obeyed by a man even in his secret actions which are beyond the detection of God's human agents of law enforcement. Deuteronomy 22:1-4 might thus well serve as an appendix to the preceding section on the enforcement of theocratic law. The reminder is provided that God's requirements concerning our relations with our neighbor are truly fulfilled only when we act in a spirit of love that goes beyond merely keeping within the law, to avoid punishment, and positively seeks the welfare of others as though it were our own. This law of love is the essential principle which the following stipulations apply in the particular life situations of the covenant people.

5-12. Man must be mindful that, in all the use he makes of this world, he is God's steward. Various regulations were therefore prescribed for the Israelites which would continually remind them, as they pursued the cultural program of God's kingdom (cf. Gen 1:28), that the world is the Lord's, for he is its Maker. Man is indeed set as king over the earth, with the whole order of nature under his dominion; but man's rule is a viceregency in the Creator's name. Human authority must therefore be exercised according to the pattern God appoints. It is this fundamental principle which underlies the opening requirement of this section that the distinction between man and woman should not be blurred by the one's appropriating the characteristic articles of the other (Deut 22:5). God created them male and female, with distinctive natures and functions; specifically, in the divinely established order of authority, man is the head of the woman as together they reign over the earth. The Lord created the various "kinds" in the vegetable and animal kingdom (Gen 1:11ff.). Israel was so to treat these "kinds" that they would be preserved in their distinctive natures (Deut 22:6,7,9-11; cf. Lev 19:19). 8. Bring not blood upon thine house. Of special significance in the natural order of creation is the lifeblood of man. Carelessness with respect to it shows a want of neighborly love and of respect for God. It therefore incurs guilt before the Creator even when accidents resulting from such carelessness receive no human redress. 12. Make thee fringes. Like the other stipulations in this section, the final regulation, which required the appendage of tassels to the outer garment, was designed to provide a special reminder of God's suzerainty over Israel (cf. Num 15:37-41).

13-30. The laws of the preceding verses were to regulate the creation ordinance of labor; the laws of this section were designed to govern the creation ordinance of marriage. The sanctity of the divine institution of the family is thus the interest of the present provisions. 13,14. If any man take a wife . . . and bring up an evil name upon her. The case is that in which a husband brings an allegation of unchastity against his bride, whether falsely (vv. 13-19) or justly (vv. 20,21). In the first instance, the malicious accuser was to suffer corporal punishment (v. 18; cf. 25:1-3), pay compensation to his father-in-law for defaming his house (v. 19a), and retain his wife without ever being permitted to divorce her (v. 19b). In the second case, the guilty bride who had "wrought folly" was to suffer death by stoning before the disgraced house of her father. In societies where such evidence was legally decisive, it was customary after the consummation of the marriage to keep the tokens of the bride's virginity (v. 17). (On the judicial responsibility of the elders, see 19:12; 21:2-6,19,20; 25:7-9. On adultery, punishable by death, see 5:18; Lev 18:20,29; 20:10.)

Verses 23-29 concern the seduction of unmarried girls, whether betrothed (vv. 23-27) or unbetrothed (vv. 28,29). If the girl was betrothed, the apprehended man was to be stoned to death. The same penalty befell the girl if their sexual intercourse occurred in the city (vv. 23,24); but not if the circumstances permitted the reasonable assumption that she had been forced – there is in [her] no sin worthy of death (vv. 25-27). The seducer of an unbetrothed virgin was obliged to take her as wife, paying the customary bride price and forfeiting the right of divorce (vv. 28,29). Probably the father's rights mentioned in Ex 22:17 continued to have precedence. On Deut 22:30, see Lev 18:6ff.; 20:11ff.; Deut 27:20ff. This single prohibition represents, as it recalls, the whole list of forbidden degrees of affinity.

The theme of chapters 23–25 is the sanctification of the theocratic kingdom. Israel must respect the sanctity of the congregation of the Lord as such (23:1-18; Heb. Bible, 2-19); the sanctity of special classes of God's servants, particularly the needy (23:19 [Heb. Bible, 20] – 24:22); and the sanctity of every citizen of the theocracy as an individual bearer of God's image (25:1-12).

b) The Congregation of the Lord. 23:1-18.

1-8. The sacredness of the congregation of the Lord was signified by the exclusion from participation in the official theocratic assembly of those disqualified in various ways. The disqualification might be physical (vv. 1,2) or ethnic and historical (vv. 3-8). Excluded were the eunuch (v. 1) and the bastard (v. 2) together with his descendants – even to his tenth generation, i.e., indefinitely (cf. v. 3). The eunuch's condition was a mutilation of the divinely given nature (cf. 14:1). The bastard was the issue of a repudiation of the divinely appointed ordinance. Possibly the mamzēr, translated bastard, was, more precisely, one born of an incestuous union (cf. 22:30). Such exclusions from privilege point to the importance in covenant administration of the marriage design of securing a godly seed. Nevertheless, even in OT days such physical disability was an obstacle only to external privilege, not to the spiritual realities of salvation. In NT times such disabilities no longer enter into consideration even in the external administration of the church (cf. Isa 56:4,5; Acts 8:27,28). The same is true of the cases of disqualification mentioned in Deut 23:3-8.

4a. Because they met you not with bread and . . . water. Although the Ammonites and Moabites were begotten in incest (cf. v. 2; Gen 19:30ff.), the reason assigned for their debarment is that they were unwilling to show hospitality to the people of God on their wilderness journey from Egypt to their homeland (cf. Deut 2:18ff.,29), and even attempted offensive action against Israel – hired . . . Balaam . . . to curse thee (4b; cf. Num 22–25). The divine curse is the portion of those who would curse the covenant people, according to God's promise to Abraham (Gen 12:3). Hence, theocratic Israel might not enter into covenantal alliance with these accursed would-be cursers (Deut 23:6). 7. Thou shalt not abhor an Edomite . . . an Egyptian. In the case of the Edomites and Egyptians exclusion was again the rule because of their past enmity (cf. the Egyptian oppression, Ex 1:8ff., and Edomite opposition, Num 20:18ff.), but it was modified (Deut 23:8; cf. Ex 20:5), in the one case, because of ties of Abrahamic kinship (cf. Gen 36:1ff.) and, in the other, because of hospitality shown to Abraham and Jacob's family when distressed by famine (Gen 12; 42–47).

9-14. 9. Keep thee from every wicked thing. The military camp of Israel engaged in the wars of the Lord was an extension of the theocratic kingdom and must be characterized by that same sanctity which marked the settled community. 14. Thy God walketh in the midst of thy camp. In war, as in peace, God was present among his people, and his name must be hallowed. Physical cleanliness was the appropriate symbol of the holiness of the covenant relationship. (On vv. 10,11, cf. Lev 15:16).

15-18. These verses present further examples of what might and might not be deemed compatible with sacred membership in the congregation of the Lord. 15. The servant which is escaped. This law relates to foreign runaway slaves. On the giving of asylum to the refugee, compare the extradition laws in the secular treaties. 17. Whore . . . sodomite. These were female and male religious prostitutes, as indicated by the Hebrew terms, which are the feminine and masculine forms of a root meaning "sacred." The law relates to native Israelites devoted to cultic prostitution. The abominable rites of the pagan fertility cults are in view. 18. The price of a dog. On dog, another name for a male prostitute, see Rev 22:15. One could not satisfy the holy demands of God's covenant by hiding sin under religious hypocrisy. Lest the rules given in Deut 23:3-8 leave the false impression that ethnic considerations were paramount, it was made clear by these two further rules, the one welcoming the foreigner and the other excluding certain Israelites, that mercy and morality were the vital principles of covenant administration.

c) Protection for the Weak. 23:19–24:22.

Respect was to be shown to all those dignified by the status of covenant servant to the Lord. This section of stipulations was designed to guarantee this sanctity of the theocratic citizen by regulations which assured peace, prosperity, and liberty within the covenant commitment to all God's people, but especially to those classes whose welfare was jeopardized by various circumstances. The legislation seems to be arranged in groups corresponding to laws six through ten in the Decalogue, but in a slightly different order, as follows: laws of property (23:19-25), of family (24:1-5), of life (24:6-15), of justice (24:16-18), and of charity (24:19-22).

Laws of Property. 23:19-25. 19. Not lend upon usury to thy brother. Impoverished Israelites were protected from exploitation at the hands of their richer brethren by the prohibition of interest on loans granted to them (cf. Ex 22:25; Lev 25:35ff.; Deut 15:1ff.). Interest might be exacted from foreigners (a stranger, v. 20), however, because the loans made to them would not be for the relief of destitution but for business capital to be employed by these traveling merchants for profitable enterprise. 22. If thou . . . forbear to vow. Beyond the specified tributary demands of the covenant Lord, the property of the vassal was at his own disposal. This right was not intended, however, to discourage the free expression of religious love and gratitude, nor did it provide escape from the obligation of a voluntary vow once made. Reverencing his own holy name, God would not encourage a sense of carelessness or impunity in those who made solemn commitments to him (vv. 21,23; cf. Lev 27; Num 30:2ff.). 24. The law of crops (vv. 24,25) provided such liberty as to satisfy the principle of brotherly hospitality, but prohibited the changing of liberty to license in violation of the property rights of the theocratic citizen.

Laws of Family. 24:1-5. Divorce as permitted in the Mosaic Law (cf. Lev 21:7,14; 22:13; Num 30:9), because of the hardness of the Israelites' hearts (Mt 19:8; Mk 10:5), endangered the dignity of women within the theocracy. Hence, easy abuse of the permission was forestalled by circumscribing it with technicalities and restrictions (Deut 24:1-4). The RSV is correct in regarding verses 1-4 as one sentence, with 1-3 the condition and 4 the conclusion. The AV is liable to the interpretation that divorce was mandatory in the situation described. Actually, what was mandatory was not divorce, but (if divorce was resorted to) a legal process which included four elements. (a) There must be a serious cause for the divorce. The exact import of the words some uncleanness (v. 1; cf. 23:14) is uncertain. Adultery is not meant, for the law prescribed the death penalty for that (22:13ff.; Lev 20:10; cf. Num 5:11ff.). (b) A writ of separation was to be placed in the woman's hand for her subsequent protection. The preparation of this legal instrument implies the involvement of (c) a public official who might also have to judge of the adequacy of the alleged grounds of divorce. (d) The man must give her a formal dismissal – send her out of his house (v. 1). The main point of the present law, however, was that a man might not remarry his wife after he divorced her if she had meanwhile remarried, even though her second husband had divorced her or had died. With respect to the first husband, the remarried divorcee was defiled (v. 4). Such was the abnormality of this situation, tolerated in OT times but abrogated by our Lord in the interests of the original standard (Mt 19:9; Mk 10:6-9; cf. Gen 2:23,24). 5. He shall be free at home one year. Further respect was shown for the sanctity of the family relationship and especially for the welfare of the woman within it by granting a year's exemption from public services to the newly married man, that his bride might be gladdened by his presence.

Laws of Life. 24:6-15. The concern of these stipulations was the life of God's people and things essential to the preservation of their life. Safeguards were afforded to the dignity and peace of the needy, in particular, for the Lord delights to be the Help of the helpless, and would have his people to be of like mind. 7. Maketh merchandise of him. Traffic in human life was forbidden under penalty of death (cf. Ex 21:16). Respect for the whole community's life and health demanded careful attention to the divine prescriptions for dealing with the disease of leprosy (Deut 24:8; cf. Lev 13; 14), the seriousness of which was evidenced by Miriam's experience (Deut 24:9; cf. Num 12:10ff.). 10. When you make your neighbor a loan (RSV). Though interest on loans to Israelite neighbors was forbidden (23:19,20), a pledge might be taken as security; but even this was not to be acquired in such a way as to prejudice the dignity, let alone the life, of the debtor. Men were not to be deprived of articles indispensable to life and health. In this category were the millstone (v. 6), the quadrangular mantle used as cover in sleeping (vv. 10-13; cf. Ex 22:26,27), and the day laborer's wages (Deut 24:14,15; cf. Lev 19:13). 15. Lest he cry against thee unto the Lord. In the secular suzerainty treaties, too, complaints of one vassal against another were to be adjudicated by the suzerain.

Laws of Justice. 24:16-18. Justice must be dispensed to each Israelite in accordance with truth. 16. Every man . . . for his own sin. The guilty individual alone was to be punished, and not innocent members of his family (cf. II Kgs 14:6). There is no contradiction between this and the divine judgment as described in the Decalogue (Deut 5:9; Ex 20:5), for the latter does not say that God afflicts the innocent. Those who share in the visitation of judgment upon the fathers' iniquities are such as share also in the fathers' hatred of God. On the other hand, there is no repudiation of the principle of the corporate responsibility which obtains in certain group situations. 17. Stranger . . . fatherless . . . widow. Even the most helpless classes were to enjoy justice and be guaranteed all their legal rights. On the familiar appeal to the Exodus (v. 18), see 22; 15:15.

Laws of Charity. 24:19-22. The spirit of charity, negatively required in the tenth commandment, was to be the governing spirit of theocratic life. Once again the poor were to be the beneficiaries. Cf. Lev 19:9,10; 23:22.

d) Sanctity of the Individual. 25:1-19. Verses 1-12, the final laws on the sanctification of the kingdom (23:1–25:12), guarded the sanctity of man as individual image-bearer of God. Verses 13-19 conclude the laws of reverence for the natural, family, and theocratic orders (vv. 22-25) as they began (cf. 22:1-4), with the golden rule principle.

1-12. The just punishment of the guilty was to be so dispensed that his individual human dignity was honored (vv. 1-3). The principle of the sanctity of the individual god-like creature was thus enforced at the point where such respect might most plausibly seem to have been forfeited. Contrary to the sentence division in the AV, the conclusion does not begin until verse 2 (so RSV). Unbecoming public degradation was to be prevented by several precautionary measures. The punishment of the criminal must be preceded by a trial and sentence, and must be personally supervised by the judge. The stripes were to be scrupulously counted – Forty stripes he may give him, and not exceed (v. 3) – and not applied at random, as to an animal, or with the abandon of anger, unmindful that the judgment was the Lord's. The severity of the scourging was to be proportionate to the gravity of the offense, yet in no case to exceed forty stripes. 4. Thou shalt not muzzle the ox . . . The positive counterpart to the prohibition of dishonoring a man in spite of his evil works is the requirement that he receive all proper honor for his good works. This verse, probably a proverbial expression, seems even here to have the force given it by Paul in I Cor 9:9 and I Tim 5:18.

The covenant servant is an immortal being with a stake, even beyond death and the grave, in that future blessedness of God's kingdom which was promised in the Covenant of Redemption to believers and their seed after them (vv. 5-10). 6. That his name be not blotted out of Israel (ASV). Witness was to be borne to this dignity of the servant-son of God by the perpetuation of his name in a covenant seed dwelling in his inheritance within the OT typical kingdom. As an application of this, the Deuteronomic Covenant adopted a form of the widespread practice of levirate marriage, whereby there devolved upon the brother of a man who died childless the duty of raising up an heir to the dead by his widow – the firstborn . . . shall succeed in the name of his brother. This requirement constituted an exception to the prohibition in Lev 18:16; 20:21. For Biblical examples of this or similar practice, see Genesis 38 and the Book of Ruth. The levirate duty is limited in Deuteronomy to situations in which brothers shared the same estate (25:5a), and even then it was not compulsory – My husband's brother refuseth (v. 7). Failure to comply, however, betrayed a want of fraternal affection and was publicly stigmatized (vv. 8-10). On the transfer of the sandal for confirming legal transfer of right or property, see Ruth 4:7. In view of the provision of Num 27:4ff., there would be no need for the levirate marriage if the deceased had daughters. Hence the AV seems preferable to the RSV in rendering in Deut 25:5 – no child rather than no son. Verses 11,12, also are concerned with the dignity of the individual and indeed precisely with his dignity as God's covenant servant, who in his circumcision bears in his body the sign of the covenant. The reference to the organ of reproduction might account for the immediate conjunction of this prohibition with the law of levirate marriage. That the act forbidden includes contempt for the covenant sign and not just indecency is suggested by the apparent similarity in the nature of the punishment and the sign, both involving a mutilation of the body. Weight is added to this interpretation by the fact that apart from this case, only the lex talionis (19:21) calls for such penal mutilation.

13-19. 15. Thou shalt have a perfect and just weight. Neighbor must be loved as self (vv. 13-16); therefore, business with one's neighbor was not to be conducted with two sets of measuring standards, the large for receiving, the small for dispensing (cf. Amos 8:5). This law somewhat expands Lev 19:35,36, especially by the appended blessings and curses of the covenant. While this law of love sums up the requirements for inter-theocratic relationships dealt with in the immediately preceding sections of stipulations, no repudiation of the mandate of conquest (cf. Deut 7; 20:16,17) is intended (25:17-19). Nor is there any contradiction between the two. For though God requires love of neighbor, those who set themselves to destroy the people of the typical OT theocratic kingdom removed themselves from the neighbor category, just as those doomed with Satan in eternal perdition are not the neighbors of the inhabitants of the heavenly theocracy. On the charge to exterminate Amalek, see Ex 17:8-16. Taken together, the laws of love and hate amount to the single requirement to love God, and consequently to love whom he loves and hate whom he hates.

4) Confession of God as Redeemer-King. 26:1-19.

The long stipulations division (chs. 5–26) draws to a close with the liturgies for two cultic confessions (vv. 1-11; 12-15) and a declaration of the ratification of the covenant (vv. 16-19).

3. The country which the Lord sware . . . to give us. The Israelite servants of the Lord were to make continual thankful confession that their goodly inheritance in Canaan was the gift of God's redemptive grace in fulfillment of his oath to the patriarchs. They were to confess his continuing lordship and to express their consecration by a tributary offering of the first fruits. On the law of first fruits, see 18:4; Ex 23:19; 34:26; Num 18:12ff. Elements of first-fruit offering are found in connection with each of the annual feasts (Deut 16). For example, at the Feast of Unleavened Bread a sheaf of first fruits was waved (Lev 23:10ff.). Also, the Feast of Weeks was called "the day of firstfruits" (Num 28:26; cf. Ex 23:16; 34:22) and two first-fruit loaves were offered at it (Lev 23:17); and the first fruits of wine could not be offered until the Feast of Tabernacles, when the vintage had ripened. If "all the fruit of the earth" (Deut 26:2) indicates the end of the harvest season, then the Feast of Tabernacles must have been the occasion for the presentation of this basket of first fruits at the central altar. Grammatically, verse 2 can be understood as describing either all the first fruits of the ground or only a token basket thereof. In the case of agricultural first fruits, the amount is nowhere specified. Since first fruits were assigned to the priests (Num 18:13,14), the reference to the sacred feast which the offerer was to enjoy after this ritual – Thou shalt rejoice in every good thing . . . the Lord . . . hath given (v. 11; cf. 12:6,7,11,12, 17,18; 16:11,14) – indicates that the basket represented only a token of the first fruits (see comments on 14:22ff.; 15:20), at least if this feast was provisioned out of the first fruits. That, however, is uncertain. The Israelite must confess that the theocratic calling of his people could not be attributed to their might (v. 5ff.; cf. 7:7,8; 8:17,18). 5b. A wandering Aramean (AV, Syrian) was my father (RSV). Hebrew 'ôbēd connotes the ideas of "lost" and "in peril" (cf. AV, ready to perish). The reference is to Jacob. He is called Aramean because the patriarchal origins were geographically, though not racially, Aramean, and because Jacob himself sojourned in Aram-naharaim during the period of the birth of his sons, the future tribal fathers of Israel. 7,8. The Lord heard . . . brought us forth. The commemorative recital of God's redemptive acts in exodus and conquest was Israel's confessional Amen to God's own recital of his favor to the nation in the historical prologue of the covenant. Verse 10b does not describe a new step in the ritual of the first-fruits offering (in contradiction of v. 4); it is, rather, a summarizing conclusion.

12-15. The dependence of Israel on the Lord for continuing prosperity was to be expressed in a special triennial service of petition for his favorable attention and blessing. (On the tithing regulations, see the comments on 14:22ff.). 13. Before the Lord thy God. This direction probably refers to the central sanctuary. If so, then the emphasis on the completion of the tithing process (vv. 12,13) suggests that the Feast of Tabernacles was the occasion. This liturgy may have followed immediately upon that of the presentation of the basket of first fruits (vv. 1-11). 15. Look down . . . and bless . . . Israel. The avowal of obedience to all the tithing prescriptions (vv. 13,14) as the preliminary to this petition for divine blessing recalls the fact that God declared the latter to be contingent on the former (14:28,29). The worshiper must affirm that his tithe had not been exposed to ceremonial defilement, particularly, the uncleanness associated with mourning for the dead (v. 14; cf. Lev 22:3ff.; Num 19:11ff.; Hos 9:4).

16-19. The central act in the ceremony of covenant ratification was the oath of allegiance which the vassal took to his lord in response to the declaration of the covenant stipulations and sanctions. Israel had taken such an oath after the reading of the Book of the Covenant at Sinai (Ex 24:7), and now Israel must do the same in the plains of Moab, as is reflected in these verses (see also Deut 29:10-15). 16. Do them with all thine heart. The Lord demanded covenantal consecration. The people of Israel avowed that they submitted to the Lord as their God, who was to be obeyed according to all his holy will – to walk in his ways (v. 17). The Lord graciously acknowledged them as his people (v. 18a) and guaranteed the blessings of the covenant to the faithful (vv. 18b,19; cf. 7:6; 14:2; Ex 19:5,6).

IV. Sanctions: Covenant Ratification. 27:1–30:20.

The fourth standard division in the ancient suzerainty treaties was the curses and blessings, the woe and weal sanctions of the covenant. In Deuteronomy this section is found in chapters 27–30. While 26:16-19 forms a conclusion to the stipulations, it also introduces the element of covenant ratification, the nucleus around which the curses and blessings of these chapters cluster. The ratification of the new covenant which Moses was making with the second generation was to unfold in two stages. That was customary procedure in securing the throne succession to the appointed royal heir. When death was imminent, the suzerain required his vassals to pledge obedience to his son; then, soon after the son's accession, the vassals' commitment was repeated. Similarly, Moses and Joshua formed a dynasty of mediatorial representatives of the Lord's suzerainty over Israel. Hence the succession of Joshua, which symbolized the continuing lordship of Israel's God, was ensured by the oath elicited from Israel before Moses died, and again later by a ratification ceremony after Joshua's accession. The pronouncing of curses and blessings is prominent in each of these ratification rituals.

The sanctions section of Deuteronomy opens with the curses and blessings to be used at the second stage of the ratification (ch. 27), then returns to the immediate situation and the solemn sanctions of the initial stage of ratification (chs. 28–30). When Deuteronomy is considered as the finished legal documentary witness to the covenant, no difficulty need be felt with the position assigned to the directions of chapter 27. On the other hand, the connection between the end of chapter 26 and the beginning of chapter 28 is so smooth as to suggest the possibility that chapter 27 may not have intervened at this precise point in the progress of the ceremony in Moab. Similarly, in the original flow of Moses' oration, Deuteronomy 30 might have followed immediately upon the end of chapter 28.

A. Ratification Ceremony in Canaan. 27:1-26.

Moses prescribed the ceremony for the second stage of the covenant renewal, to be conducted in Canaan (vv. 1-8). The re-establishment of the covenant was proclaimed (vv. 9,10). A charge was given concerning the recital of blessings and curses in the later ceremony (vv. 11-26). For the historical performance of what is here prescribed, see Josh 8:30-35. For an anticipation of these instructions among the Deuteronomic stipulations, see Deut 11:26-30.

1-8. 1. To promote respect for the appointed authorities, Moses associated with himself in this solemn hour the elders of Israel and the priests (cf. v. 9). 2. Set thee up great stones, and plaister them. Covenant consecration must be an act of intelligent, informed faith and devotion. Therefore, the content of the covenant was to be published preparatory to its ratification by the people. That was one purpose of writing the covenant on the plastered stones, an Egyptian technique, as is confirmed by the fact that in the historical fulfillment Joshua read this law to the people (Josh 8:34). Comparable were Moses' reading of the Book of the Covenant to Israel at the ratification of the Sinaitic Covenant and the proclamation of the Deuteronomic Covenant in the plains of Moab. The fact that durable stones were selected invites comparison with the two stone tables of the law written by the finger of God and suggests that a further purpose was to provide a symbolic witness to the permanence of the covenant (cf. Deut 31:26; Josh 24:26,27). 3. All the words of this law. This refers to the Deuteronomic Covenant, the part, "law," being taken to represent the whole. The ceremonial feast was another recognized symbolic method by which people ratified treaties. That is the significance of the peace offerings and the associated joyous meal (v. 7; cf. Ex 24:11).

The final ratification was to be carried out after Moses' death, when Israel under Joshua was in Canaan (v. 2a). Its setting was to be the impressive one of the adjacent mountains, Ebal and Gerizim, between which lay Shechem (v. 4; cf. vv. 12,13). There is no record of a military effort having been necessary to take that area of Canaan. The essential element of the ceremony would be Israel's self-consecration to the covenant Lord. The burnt offerings (v. 6) symbolized such consecration. To similar effect was the series of self-maledictory oaths (v. cf. 15ff.).

5. There shalt thou build an altar. For the purpose of the sacrificial offerings, a special altar was to be erected on Ebal. It may be that the mount of cursing was selected because the Mosaic economy, in its distinctive emphasis, was a ministration of death and condemnation (cf. II Cor 3:7-9), though, like a schoolmaster, conducting men to the grace of Christ. Or possibly the altar was to be erected on Ebal because the peace of the covenant was to come through the infliction of the curses on the Redeemer-Servant, sacrificed for the sins of God's people. The altar was to be made of unhewn stones, in accordance with the requirement of the Book of the Covenant (Ex 20:25). Clearly the Deuteronomic law of the permanent central altar was not intended to be a repudiation of the altar law of the Book of the Covenant. Nor was the principle of the centralization of the altar so absolutely restrictive that there might not be the special altar for extraordinary occasions (see on 12:4-14).

9,10. In the midst of the instructions concerned with the later stage in the renewal process, a solemn reminder was given that the covenantal engagement had already, on the day of the Deuteronomic proclamation, been entered upon.

11-26. Six tribes descending from Jacob's wives Leah and Rachel were to stand on the slopes of the mount of blessing and two of similar descent – the tribe of Reuben, who forfeited the birthright by the sin of incest (Gen 49:4; cf. Deut 27:20), and the tribe of Zebulun, Leah's youngest son – were to join the four tribes descending from the handmaids on the mount of cursing (vv. 12,13). Whether the two sets of tribes were to fulfill their respective roles unto curse and blessing simply by having either curse or blessing formulae directed toward them, or by themselves reciting or at least assenting to one or the other is not stated. In chapter 28 there appear matching sets of six blessings (vv. 3-6) and six curses (vv. 16-19); it seems difficult to dissociate these from the present two sets of six tribes. Joshua apparently read Deuteronomy 28 before all the assembly of Israel as part of the entire renewal treaty (cf. Josh 8:34,35).

The ark of the covenant and the Levitical priests were to be stationed between Ebal and Gerizim (Deut 27:14; cf. Josh 8:33). They must lead Israel in the oath of ratification, consisting in a series of twelve self-maledictions (Deut 27:15-26). The repeated Cursed be identifies the covenant-breaker's fate with that of the serpent (cf. Gen 3:14). The Amen response was the customary formula of assent (cf. Num 5:22; I Kgs 1:36; Neh 5:13; 8:6; Ps 72:19). The fact that only curses and not blessings are given in this passage indicates that this is not the detailed account of the curse and blessing proclamation by the two pairs of six tribes mentioned in Deut 27:12,13. A similar indication is the fact that verses 15-26 were to be addressed to and receive response from all the Israelites (v. 14). This section rather describes a separate feature of the covenant ceremony, the actual oath, which characteristically took the form of provisional self-maledictions, but not benedictions. In contrast to the curses in chapter 28, the several members of this series differ not in variety of curse but in kind of sin. The area of transgression covered is that of secret sins likely to escape human detection and punishment (note esp. 27:15,24; cf. Job 31:24ff.) and, therefore, peculiarly the judicial province of God as divine Witness to the oath. Those are imprecated who secretly violate God's demands for respect to himself (v. 15), to rightful authority (v. 16), to truth (vv. 17-19), to family (vv. 20-23), to human life (vv. 24,25), and, in sum, to God's covenant (v. 26).

B. Proclamation of the Sanctions. 28:1-68.

Returning to the first stage of the ceremony of covenant renewal, Moses pronounced its sanctions. In the corresponding section of the Sinaitic Book of the Covenant (Ex 23:20-33), the blessings predominated. Now, the forty years' history of Israelite apostasy having intervened, Moses' emphasis falls heavily on the curses; thus, blessings (Deut 28:1-14) and curses (vv. 15-68). This emphasis was anticipated in the promises and threats of a similar section in Leviticus (ch. 26), written after Israel's earliest rebellion against the Sinaitic Covenant. The remarkable preview in Deuteronomy 28–30 of Israel's history, especially of the far-off exile, has been a major stumbling-block to the recognition of the Mosaic origin of this document by naturalistic higher criticism.

1) Blessings. 28:1-14 (cf. 7:12ff.; 11:13ff.; 22ff.).

1. If thou shalt hearken diligently. Although Israel's inheritance and continued enjoyment of the promises was not a matter of legal merit, there was a connection between the nation's corporate piety and her prosperity. For the OT theocratic kingdom prefigured the consummate kingdom of God, in which righteousness and glory are to be united. Accordingly, to keep the message of the typical-prophetic picture clear, God allowed the Israelites to enjoy the blessings of the typical kingdom only as they, and especially their official representatives, exhibited an appropriate measure of the righteousness of the kingdom. Since any righteousness that Israel possessed was a gift of grace from the God of her salvation, the principle which informs Deuteronomy 28 has no affinities with a religion of works-salvation (see on 6:1-3). Verses 3-6 present six blessings which are paralleled by six curses in 16-19. (On the apparent use of these at the later ceremony in Canaan, see comments on 27:12,13.) The blessings depict a comprehensive fullness of beatitude. The paired opposites, for example, express totality (cf. vv. 3,6). What was concisely presented in liturgical formulae in the six beatitudes is elaborated in verses 7-14. The arrangement of the blessings is chiastic: thus, foreign relations (vv. 7 and 12b,13); domestic affairs (vv. 8 and 11,12a); and in the center position, relationship to the Lord (vv. 9, 10).

If Israel would obey the Lord, she would come out on top in every military and commercial encounter with other nations. Within the kingdom there would be abundance of the earth's goodness. Canaan would truly be a paradise flowing with milk and honey. Of primary import, Israel would prosper in her relationship to her covenant Lord. That is the secret of all beatitude, for his favor is life. From the manifest tokens of God's favor to Israel, all the earth would recognize that the name of the Lord is called upon thee (v. 10). That is, it would be clear that God's covenant was established with Israel and that he, the Suzerain, was Israel's Owner and Defender (cf. Isa 63:19; Jer 7:10,11; 15:16). Once and again the prerequisite covenant loyalty is recalled (Deut 28:9b, 13b,14).

2) Curses. 28:15-68.

Banishment from the promised inheritance was the extreme of malediction. It signified the loss of God's special presence and favor, loss of the appointed sacramental access to him on his holy hill of Zion, and loss of status as the people of God's kingdom. In this long section of curses, therefore, siege and exile repeatedly appear as the climax of woe. There is a series of parallel pictures of the disastrous future looming before this nation so prone to unfaithfulness (vv. 20-26,27-37,38-48,49-57,58-68). The first three and the last of these pictures culminate in the doom of conquest by the enemy, with its dreadful sequel (vv. 25,26; 36,37; 48; 63-68); the fourth is completely devoted to that accursed event (vv. 49-57). This extended description of particular evils follows an introductory, ritualistic formulation of the covenant's curse sanctions (vv. 15-19).

15-19. Verse 15 corresponds to verses 1,2, and 16-19 are the counterpart to 3-6. The vengeance of the covenant (cf. Lev 26:25) would overtake the oath-violating people even within the asylum of their inherited paradise land. Without holiness no man can abide where God reveals his glorious presence, and there is no respect of persons with him.

20-26. 20. Thou hast forsaken me. Such was the essence of Israel's sin — violation of the first commandment of the covenant. The Lord shall send. It was the right and duty of the forsaken Lord himself, the One to whom and by whom Israel swore the covenant oath, to avenge the oath. Whatever the human or earthly origin of the several curses, the Lord was their ultimate Author. Until thou be destroyed (cf. vv. 24,45,51,61). It is repeatedly stated here that the final issue of the various types of curses — epidemic (vv. 21,22a), drought (vv. 22b-24), and war (vv. 25, 26) — would be nothing short of Israel's destruction (vv. 20-22,24,26). 24. The rain of thy land powder and dust. The sirocco would fill the air with sand and dust. Verse 25 is the reversal of verse 7 (cf. Lev 26:17). 26. Thy carcase . . . meat unto all fowls . . . and . . . beasts. The curse principle is essentially the prostration of man under the sub-human realms over which God appointed him in the beginning as king. Hence, the Scripture depicts the doom of rebel mankind as an eschatological feast in which slain men are devoured by birds and beasts (cf. Ps 79:2; Ezk 39:4,17ff.; Rev 19:17,18).

27-37. Vexation and frustration characterize the curses of this section. Observe the references in almost every verse either to the utter impotence of the Israelites to cope with their afflictions or to their helplessness in the face of oppression. God created man as one who, entering into the program of His kingdom, might rejoice to follow the divine sabbatic pattern of labor crowned with the joy and satisfaction of consummation. But accursed Israel's undertakings in the areas of marriage and labor would be rewarded always and only with failure. Instead of attaining to the sabbath joy of accomplishment, the people of Israel would be driven mad with the vanity and frustration of their exertions (vv. 28,34). The contents of verses 27-35 are chiastically arranged: (a) incurable disease (v. 27); (b) madness (v. 28); (c) continual oppression (v. 29); (d) frustration (vv. 30-32); (c) continual oppression (v. 33); (b) madness (v. 34); (a) incurable disease (v. 35). The similarities to the calamities of Job are noteworthy.

The section ends (vv. 36,37) with the curse of conquest by a foreign nation — which neither thou nor thy fathers have known — which was anticipated in verses 32,33. God would afflict the apostates by abandoning them to their own reprobate mind and worship of idols (v. 36; cf. v. 64; 4:27). In idolatry man substitutes subservience to creatures beneath him for self-consecration to the Suzerain above him. In so doing man seals his own helplessness in sin; for, cutting himself off from the Lord-Protector, the Rock who delights to deliver the helpless, he looks in vain to a covenant lord weaker than himself. The essential nature of the curse principle once more finds expression in this worship rendered by man to the sub-human over which the Creator made him king. 37. Thou shalt become . . . a byword. Israel, heir of the promise that all nations would be blessed in her, would become proverbially identified with cursedness by all peoples.

38-48. The curses of 28:38-42 are the opposite of the blessings of verses 8,11ff. 38,39. The locust. . . . worms. The crop pests, another sector of man's erstwhile total dominion (cf. Gen 1:26), in effect would make the Israelites their servants, who must labor to feed them. On 28:41, see verse 32. 43. Thou shalt come down very low. Here the beatitude of verses 12b,13 is reversed. In verses 45-48 there is a summation of the preceding threats of curse, both as to cause (cf. v. 20) and as to result. The cause would be Israel's breaking of the covenant oath; the result would be that Israel would suffer the full vengeance of the covenant to the extremity of exile's devastation. 46b. And upon thy seed for ever. If this threat means more than that the climactic OT exile-judgment of Israel would serve as a perpetual sign of God's covenant vengeance, if a perpetual divine cursing of Israel is predicted, then Moses here warns of that which Paul declares to have become a fixed decree (I Thess 2:16). The punishment (Deut 28:48) was to fit the crime (v. 47). Israel's curse-yoke (v. 48) would amount to a return to the status from which God had called her in covenant love (cf. Lev 26:13). Though Moses does not at this point detract from the impressiveness of these curses by any qualifications, elsewhere he proclaims the triumph of covenant grace through the restoration of an elect, repentant remnant (Deut 4:29ff.; 30:1ff.).

49-57. What had constituted the climax in each of the preceding series is the exclusive subject of this fourth prophetic picture of Israel, overtaken by the covenant curse. With unsparing vividness Moses exposes the appalling distress and degradation to which this people, once the head of the nations, would be reduced when caught in the curse of siege. 49. A nation . . . from far . . . as swift as the eagle flieth. The barbarian invader from afar, descending on Israel like a vulture on its prey, would be unpitying in its rapacity (vv. 50,51). But the inhumanity of the enemy warrior would pale beside that of even the tenderest Israelite mother, turned cannibalistic in the horror of the siege (vv. 52-57; cf. Lev 26:29; Lam 4:1-10). 51-53. The fruit of thy land. . . . the fruit of thine own body. The passage contrasts the natural appetite of the barbarian and the unnatural lust of the Israelites. There would be no refuge from the siege anywhere in the land (vv. 52a,c,55,57) for those who had put their trust in human defenses rather than in God, their true Refuge. Old Testament history witnessed successive executions of this curse, and it was finally exhausted in the Fall of Jerusalem in A.D. 70.

58-68. 58. If thou wilt not observe . . . this law. In this closing paragraph Moses harks back to the conditional form with which the pronouncing of the curses began (cf. v. 15), for in the day of assembly in Moab the decision between the curses and the blessings was still to be made by Israel. To avoid the curses the people of Israel must obey the stipulations of this covenant document out of true reverence for the Lord who had revealed his glory and fearful works in saving them from Egypt. 62,63. Ye shall be left few in number. . . . and . . . be plucked from off the land. Disobedience would bring loss of the blessings promised in the Abrahamic Covenant, namely, the multiplication of the people and the possession of a homeland. In place of the blessings would be every possible extraordinary and persistent affliction (vv. 59-61). 64. The Lord shall scatter thee among all people. Prophetically following the besieged and conquered people into their exile (vv. 64-67), Moses catches with a few strokes all the pathos of unbelieving, homeless Israel down through the centuries – once the people of God, but become in their exile like unto the heathen, without Christ, having no hope, without God in the world (Eph 2:12). By repudiating their election and covenant calling, in virtue of which they had been delivered from Egyptian slavery to become God's theocratic sons, the people of Israel were doomed to fall back into a worse Egyptian bondage (v. 68), into bondage to Satan and sin, death and Hell.

C. Summons to the Covenant Oath. 29:1-29.

In a direct, personal appeal to the generation standing before him, Moses confronted them with the central purpose of the ceremony of this great day (vv. 10-15). This central demand for the oath of allegiance, which reflects the over-all pattern of the suzerainty treaty, is preceded by a reminder of the Lord's past works of salvation (vv. 2-9) and followed by a warning that the curses of the covenant would be visited on an unfaithful nation throughout their generations (vv. 16-29).

1. (Heb. Bible 28:69). Though some, following the Hebrew arrangement, regard this as a subscription, and it would indeed be an accurate description of what preceded, it is probably to be understood as a superscription. On the relation of verses 1 and 2, compare the similar sequence from 4:45 to 5:1. There is essential continuity in God's Covenant of Redemption from Genesis through Revelation. Nevertheless, the successive administrations of that Covenant, as it is repeatedly renewed by divine grace, are to be distinguished. The covenant made in Moab renewed the one made at Sinai, which renewed the covenant God made with Abraham, which renewed the covenant He made with Adam (cf. Gen 3:15; Deut 5:2,3).

2-9. The mercy and the miracle of the deliverance from Egypt and the passage through the wilderness should have opened the eyes of this generation to the supreme wisdom of giving themselves in wholehearted love to so great and gracious a Lord. (On vv. 5,6, see 8:2ff.; on vv. 7,8, see 2:30ff.; 3:1ff.) 4. Not given . . . an heart to perceive. But the simplest spiritual knowledge is beyond the perception of man the sinner unless the Spirit of God grants him understanding as a sovereign gift of grace. This people, so signally favored as to have lived forty years in the atmosphere of supernatural providence, lacked that necessary gift (cf. 9:7,24). 9. Keep . . . the words of this covenant. The responsibility for this spiritual dullness was Israel's, and by this reproof the people were incited to a better response to their Lord. The imperceptible way in which the appeal of Moses becomes the direct appeal of the Lord (v. 5ff.; cf. 7:4; 11:15; 17:3; 28:20) evidences the reality of the supernatural revelation which came through Moses, God's mediator.

10-15. The central act of covenant ratification and its significance are here declared. The terms of verses 10,11 indicate the solemnly formal nature of the assembly and stress the fact that the entire covenant community was present for participation in the oath. Women and children, non-Israelites (cf. Ex 12:38; Num 10:29; 11:4), and servants (Deut 29:11c; cf. Josh 9:21) were included. 12. Enter into . . . covenant of the Lord (RSV). The Hebrew phrase, found only here, means literally, pass over into, or pass through. According to the latter translation, the expression might derive from a ceremony of oath-taking like that in Gen 15:17,18. The equating of the Lord's covenant with his oath (Deut 29:12) is a significant index to the nature of the covenant as an instrument of God's rule whereby he secures the commitment of a people to his service. 13. That he may establish thee. This verse is to the same effect, but it shows, too, that God's establishment of covenant relationship with man is not a humiliating subjugation but an act of redemptive favor. It fulfills the promise and oath in which the children of God have found hope and consolation (cf. Heb 6:17,18). 15b. And also with him that is not here with us this day. This means that there was to be genealogical continuity to the covenant. Such is the case not because salvation is an inalienable family heirloom but because God is faithful to his promise to extend his covenant mercies to the thousandth generation of those who love him and because covenant administration respects parental authority (vv. 14,15). Accordingly, the covenant with its sacramental sign of consecration is administered to believers together with their children.

16-29. For (v. 16) and lest (v. 18) both assume some antecedent thought. The idea to be supplied is probably that of the call to faithful allegiance which was presented in the preceding section. Thus: (Remember, O Israel, that the Lord is your God), for, as you well know, the temptation to idolatry comes to you from all the surrounding nations—ye have seen their abominations (vv. 16,17). (Remember), lest idolatry take root among you and you reap a bitter, poisonous harvest (v. 18; cf. Heb 12:15). The danger figuratively depicted in verse 18b is developed in verses 19-28—the root in verses 19-21 and the bitter fruit in verses 22-28. 19b. To the sweeping away of moist and dry alike (RSV). The reference of this proverbial phrase is to plants; watered and thirsty plants means all plants. It continues the figure of verse 18b, warning again that if idolatry took hold in Israel, its ultimate issue must be deadly, indeed must be the ruin of the entire people. This thought is resumed in 29:22ff. As for the individual who would hypocritically mouth the self-maledictory oath of the covenant (v. 19b), the Lord would not hold him guiltless for having taken his name in vain. Though the individual might think himself hidden in the assembled host of Israel and suppose his hypocrisy concealed within his own heart, the Lord, the avenging divine Witness of the oath, would single him out and mercilessly pour on him all the curses he had idly invoked. On verse 20b, see Rev 22:18,19. Abruptly changing his standpoint to the future (Deut 29:22) beyond the desolation of the theocracy and the Exile (v. 28), which he had before threatened in the covenant curses, Moses again traced the cause of Israel's fall to her having forsaken the covenant by transferring her allegiance to idol god-kings (vv. 25-28). 24. Wherefore hath the Lord done thus . . . ? He used the device of a dramatic dialogue of Israelites and foreigners standing amid the charred ruins of the theocratic land, a former paradise turned, like the cities of the plain, into a barren waste by the fury of God's judgment (v. 23). 29. Those things which are revealed belong unto us and to our children for ever. Attention to the Lord's revealed demand for consecration is the life business of his servants (cf. 30:11ff.), not lusting after knowledge of divine mysteries (cf. Gen 3:5).

D. Ultimate Restoration. 30:1-10.

Beyond the curse of exile opened the prospect of restoration (vv. 1-10; cf. 4:29-31; Lev 26:40-45). The redemptive program is not to be frustrated by the fall of those who were of Israel yet were not faithful Israelites. An obedient remnant together with the remnant of the Gentiles will be restored to the covenant Lord in his glorious kingdom. Of this ultimate restoration, the OT return from Babylonian exile was typical. The one vast complex of typical and antitypical restoration is embraced in this prophetic blessing of Moses. The section of the treaty concerned with covenant ratification (Deut 27–30) closes with the call for decision, in which Moses reminded the people of Israel that they could not plead ignorance of God's demands (vv. 11-14) and warned them that the alternatives set before them in the covenant curses and blessings were those of life and death (vv. 15-20).

1-10. In 28:64ff. Moses portrayed the hopelessness of unbelieving Israelites in their dispersion among the nations. 1. When all these things are come upon thee. Here he looked beyond the Exile, indeed beyond all the curse and blessing described hitherto in these covenant sanctions, and extended to his people the hope of restoration, the hope of a new covenant. 2. Shalt return unto the Lord. The way into this new beatitude would be the way of a renewed and true consecration to the Lord against whom Israel had rebelled (cf. v. 10). 6-8. The origin of that repentance and heart-love for the Lord would be in a divine work of qualification – the Lord . . . will circumcise thine heart. What had been externally symbolized in circumcision, the OT sacrament of consecration, would be spiritually actualized by the power of God (cf. 10:16; Jer 31:33ff.; 32:39ff.; Ezk 11:19; 36:26,27).

As the development of this theme in the prophets shows, the renewal and restoration which Moses foretold is that accomplished by Christ in the New Covenant. The prophecy is not narrowly concerned with ethnic Jews but with the covenant community, here concretely denoted in its OT identity as Israel. Within the sphere of the New Covenant, however, the wall of ethnic distinctions disappears. Accordingly, the Old Testament figure used here of exiled Israelites being regathered to the Lord in Jerusalem (Deut 30:3b,4; cf. 28:64) finds its chief fulfillment in the universal NT gathering of sinners out of the human race, exiled from Paradise, back to the Lord Christ enthroned in the heavenly Jerusalem. 3a. Turn thy captivity (AV), or turn thy turning, refers to a radical change of condition. 9. The Lord . . . will make thee plenteous in every work. Along with the spiritual gifts of regeneration, conversion, and sanctification by which the rebels are transformed into faithful servants, the Messiah will give them a new world of prosperity and peace as their inheritance (vv. 3a,5,9; cf. 28:4,62). The restored theocratic kingdom in Canaan is used as a typical figure for the anti-typical reality, the eternal kingdom of God in the renewed universe. That will be secured by a divine judgment, for while the people of God are to inherit the earth, their enemies will be plagued with every curse

(v. 7). The Messianic salvation is, thus, a new exodus and conquest, a renewal of the covenant mediated through Moses and Joshua, first at Sinai and afterwards in Moab and at Ebal and Gerizim.

E. Radical Decision. 30:11-20.

11-14. The Lord did not require of Israel something incomprehensible or unattainable (v. 11). Israel's duty was not hidden at some inaccessible height (v. 12) or beyond some insuperable barrier (v. 13). Note Paul's similar use of these proverbial questions in Rom 10:5,6. 14. The word is very nigh unto thee. There are the secret, incomprehensible things which belong to God (cf. 29:29a; Ps 131:1), but the covenant demand is one of the revealed things given to God's people to be obeyed (cf. 29:29b; 6:6,7; 11:18,19; 31:19). As Job affirmed, exhaustive knowledge is the possession of God alone, but to man God assigns, as his portion of wisdom, the fear of the Lord, which is the way of the covenant (Job 28, esp. v. 28).

15-20. Moses concluded his setting forth of the covenant blessings and curses with an appeal of memorable simplicity and sublimity. He reminded Israel that in her experience as a kingdom, blessing and obedience would be inseparable, as would also rebellion and the curse (vv. 16-18). 15. Life and good . . . death and evil. The issue was as clear and radical as life and death (cf. 19b). To love the Lord, obey him, and remain loyal to him — that was their life (v. 20; cf. 6:1-5). 19. I call heaven and earth to witness against you this day (ASV; RSV). One of the standard divisions in the secular suzerainty treaties was that containing the invocation of the gods of the Lord and vassal as the divine witnesses of the covenant oath. It is significant that the Deuteronomic treaty contains at least a rhetorical parallel to that feature (cf. 4:26; 31:28; 32:1). The Lord was, of course, the divine Witness as well as the Suzerain of this covenant. Over and over again Moses traced the work of salvation which God was accomplishing through him to the promises sworn unto Abraham (v. 20c).

V. Dynastic Disposition: Covenant Continuity. 31:1–34:12.

This final section of the covenant document has as its unifying theme the perpetuation of the covenant relationship. Of special importance is the subject of the royal succession, which is also prominent in the extra-biblical suzerainty treaties (cf. above, the introduction to IV. Sanctions). This succession is provided for by the appointment and commissioning of Joshua as dynastic heir to Moses in the office of mediatorial representative of the Lord (ch. 31). The testamentary assignment of kingdom inheritance to the several tribes of Israel (ch. 33) reckons with the status of all God's people as royal heirs. Included also are two other standard elements in the international treaties. One is the invocation of covenant witnesses, here represented chiefly by the Song of Witness (ch. 32). The other is the directions for the disposition of the treaty document after the ceremony (31:9-13). By way of notarizing the document, an account of the death of Moses is affixed at the end (ch. 34).

A. Final Arrangements. 31:1-29.

A series of charges was given by Moses, all concerned with carrying on the covenant and its program: to all the people (vv. 1-6), to Joshua (vv. 7,8), and to the priests (vv. 9-13). Then in a theophanic revelation at the sanctuary (vv. 14,15), the Lord instructed Moses concerning a Song of Witness for future Israel (vv. 16-22), and also commissioned Joshua to his imminent command (v. 23). Finally, Moses again commanded the priests concerning the disposition of the documentary witness to the covenant and concerning the assembling of the people to hear the Song of Witness (vv. 24-29).

1-6. On Moses' age (v. 2a), see Ex 7:7; Deut 29:5. 2b. I can no more go out and come in. Though Moses was still competent in terms of individual daily life (cf. 34:7), he had lost the stamina necessary to shepherd the whole flock of Israel and in particular to lead the campaign of conquest lying before the nation (cf. Num 27:16ff.). On Deut 31:2c, see 3:23ff.; 4:21,22; Num 20:12. The Lord, with Joshua as his new mediatorial representative, would continue and complete in Canaan the conquest already successfully begun under Moses in Trans-Jordan (vv. 3-6). With such leadership assured, Israel must execute the mandate of conquest (cf. 7:1ff.) with strength and courage (v. 6; cf. vv. 7,23; 20:3,4; 31:7,23; Josh 1:6ff.).

7,8. At the command of God Joshua had already been ordained by Moses before Eleazar and the congregation as the new leader of Israel (Num 27:18-23; Deut 1:38). 8. The Lord . . . will be with thee. Repeating the promise of the divine presence (cf. Josh 5:13ff.) just made to all the people (Deut 31:3-6), Moses publicly charged Joshua to complete the mission of conducting Israel into its inheritance.

9-13. Moses assigned the priests and elders the duty of regularly republishing the law of the covenant. The effect of this was to associate the priests and elders with Joshua in the responsibility of rule and in the esteem of Israel. More important, all the covenant people, together with all human authorities in the covenant community, were placed under the lordship of the Giver of the law. 9a. Moses wrote this law. This is a clear statement of obvious import for higher critical investigations (cf. v. 24). Though the writing is mentioned at this juncture, it is probable that the official covenant document, or at least the main part of it, had been prepared earlier. The delivery of the law to the priests and elders referred to here (9b), if it is to be distinguished from that mentioned in verses 24ff., may have been simply a symbolic transfer of the responsibility of enforcing the covenant law as described in verses 10-13.

In the suzerainty treaties of the nations, directions were included for reading them to the vassal people at regular intervals, from once to thrice annually. 11. Thou shalt read this law before all Israel. In Israel there was to be a constant proclamation of the will of the Lord through the service of the cult and in time through the ministry of prophets. Parents, too, were charged with the faithful instruction of the covenant children in the commandments of the Lord (see e.g., 6:7,20ff.). Hence the septennial reading of the Law to Israel (v. 10) at the Feast of Tabernacles (cf. 16:13ff.) in the year of release (cf. 15:1ff.) was intended not as the sole means of teaching the people of Israel their covenantal obligations but as an especially impressive reminder, at this time of sabbatical renewal and consummation, of the need for an ever fresh self-consecration by the servants of the Lord if they would enjoy full covenant blessing.

14-23. Joshua, like Moses (cf. Ex 3:1—4:17), was personally commissioned by the Lord himself. This was the chief and stated purpose for the summoning of Moses and Joshua into the presence of the heavenly Suzerain, who then spoke with them face to face as a man speaks to his friend (Deut 31:14,15; cf. Ex 33:9,11; Num 12:5). The words of the divine revelation (Deut 31:23) were simply a direct statement of the charge — Be strong — and promise — I will be with thee — given mediately through Moses (vv. 7,8) and a confirmation of Joshua's public ordination (Num 27:18-23).

On this occasion the Lord also confirmed Moses' dark prophecies of Israel's future infidelity and God's wrath against them — this people will . . . forsake me, and break my covenant (v. 16ff.). In particular, the Lord directed Moses to teach Israel a song that would be a witness for Him against them when they broke the covenant (v. 19ff.). Israel's lusting after idol-gods, her spiritual whoredom (v. 16; cf. Ex 34:15,16), because of the abominable rites of the Canaanite fertility cult which would ensnare her, would involve carnal prostitution as well. The inclination to ignore the Lord would be most evident when the people of Israel would become secure and prosperous in their land (Deut 31:20; cf. 6:10ff.; 8:12ff.; 32:15). 17. I will forsake them. Such would be the inevitable consequence of Israel's forsaking the Lord. Without God's protection the nation would fall victim to many evils and so be made painfully aware that our God is not among us (v. 17b). Lest the Israelites should then recall the divine promise not to forsake them (cf. v. 6) and impute unrighteousness to him, God appointed for them the Song of Witness, which places the promised blessings and the threatened curse in their proper perspective within the covenant. This song would proclaim the perfect righteousness of God and convict the Israelites of the justice of their afflictions (cf. 32:4,5). It was only because of the pure grace of God that Israel might even enter the land of promise, for the Lord was fully aware of the pride and rebellion in their hearts before he led them across the Jordan, 31:21b. Verse 22 anticipates 31:30—32:47.

24-29. As a complementary covenant witness along with the song, the treaty document was to be preserved by the side of the ark of the covenant (v. 26; cf. 9ff.). This requirement and the similar disposition of the two Sinaitic tables accorded with contemporary practice (see comments on 10:1-11). Possibly it was one of the priests into whose hands the Deuteronomic treaty was now entrusted (v. 25) who affixed the record of Moses' death, or indeed everything from this point to the end. This official may have had some further but minor part in bringing the rest of the document into its final form. 27. Ye have been rebel- lious . . . how much more after my death? The foreknowledge of God just revealed to Moses (cf. v. 21) was now the foreknowledge of Moses. In these instructions to the priests, all the treaty witnesses are brought together. The Song of Witness about to be recited to assembled Israel included at the same time an invocation of heaven and earth as witnesses (v. 28). The force of the witness was primarily against the people of Israel in view of their foreseen provocations (v. 29).

B. The Song of Witness. 31:30–32:47.

30. According to Moses' directions (v. 28), Israel was assembled, and Moses, together with Joshua (32:34), the old and new representatives of the Lord, proclaimed the song (Deut 32).

In its general structure this poetic song follows the pattern of the Deuteronomic treaty. After the invocation to the witnesses to give ear (vv. 1-3), the Suzerain is identified in preamble-like fashion as God of truth and as Israel's Father (vv. 4-6). Then the historical prologue of the treaty finds its counterpart in a recital of the special favor shown to Israel by the Lord hitherto (vv. 7-14). Next, the treaty stipulations are reflected upon in the condemnation of Israel's rebellion against the Lord in favor of new gods (vv. 15-18). The consequence of this covenant breaking is the heaping of the curses upon them (vv. 19-25). Yet, as is also asserted in the blessing and curse section of the treaty, beyond the final curse lies the prospect of covenant renewal accomplished through a redemptive judgment in which God will avenge his servants upon their enemies; such is the closing theme of the song (vv. 26-43).

a) Invocation. 32:1-3.

1. The address to heaven and earth must be understood as a summons to them to be witnesses of the covenant, since Moses had just stated that precisely that was the purpose of assembling Israel to hear the song (cf. 31:28). 2. The way of the covenant and the way of wisdom are united here as Moses identifies this song as my doctrine (AV), or, my teaching (RSV), a word common in the Wisdom literature. The song presents true wisdom because its theme is the fear of the Lord, great God of Israel (v. 3).

b) Preamble. 32:4-6.

The song is a theodicy (cf. comments on 31:19ff.). 4. With that in view, the identification of the Lord is in terms of his perfect justice. The Rock. This epithet contemplates God as the reliable refuge of his people (cf. vv. 15,18,30). The Hebrew ṣûr, as thus used of God, may derive from a root meaning "mountain" (cf. Ugaritic ġwr). In contrast to God's righteousness stands the perversity of the Israelites, these "sons of God" (cf. Deut 32:6,18ff.; 14:1; Ex 4:22ff.) who were actually his not-sons (32:5a, lit.; cf. "not-god" (v. 21) and "not-people" (v. 21). This introduces the main burden of the song, namely, that Israel's sin provided a completely adequate explanation of all the evil that would overtake them. 6. O foolish people and unwise. In keeping with the wisdom motif, sin is regarded as foolishness (cf. vv. 28,29). Is not he your father, who created you? (RSV) The reference is to the Lord's forming Israel into the theocratic people by election and redemptive calling out of Egypt.

c) Historical Prologue. 32:7-14.

7a. Remember the days of old. So begins the historical prologue section of the song. The fact that verse 8 refers to divine providence as far back as the events of Genesis 10 and 11 explains the historical perspective of Deut 32:7a. 8. He set the bounds . . . according to the number . . . of Israel. As Paul teaches that Christ rules over all things for the benefit of his church, so Moses affirms that the Lord took special interest in the geographical needs of Abraham's numerous seed in his providential government of all nations (cf. Gen 10:32), for Israel was his elect people (Deut 32:9; cf. 7:6; 10:15). According to a reading supported by the LXX and the Qumran fragments, "sons of God" would replace children of Israel. Those who prefer this reading appeal to the mythical tradition that El, head of the Canaanite pantheon, had seventy sons, and to the fact that there are seventy nations mentioned in Genesis 10; and they conclude that this numerical correspondence is referred to in Deut 32:8. Similarly, Jewish commentators, following the Masoretic text, saw a correspondence of the seventy nations of Genesis 10 to the seventy Israelites of Gen 46:27.

Having arranged for Israel's inheritance in Canaan from the days of old, the Lord was, in the days of Moses, conducting them into the possession of its rich goodness (Deut 32:10-14). 10. He found him. The Lord, coming to seek and to save that which was lost, found homeless Israel helpless in the desert. As the apple of his eye. He cherished his people as jealously as does a man that which is most precious to him, or as an eagle cherishes its young (v. 11). The figure might be interpreted of the deliverance from Egypt as well as of the guidance of Canaan. 12b. There was no foreign god with him (ASV, RSV). Since the Lord was Israel's sole benefactor, their subsequent shift of allegiance to foreign gods (v. 15ff.) was manifestly without excuse. 13a. He made him ride on the high places of the earth. In the Lord's strength Israel advanced in majestic triumph through Trans-Jordan (cf. 2:31ff.) and over mountainous Canaan to feast on all the choicest offerings of field and flock (vv. 13b,14).

d) Record of Rebellion. 32:15-18.

As their Suzerain, the Lord demanded, primarily, perfect and exclusive loyalty. Like an unruly beast, Israel, fattened in rich pasture, refused to submit. 15. Jeshurun, the upright, is here used reproachfully. In their arrogant contempt for the Rock of their salvation, the people of Israel paid their sacrificial tribute to phantom no-gods. 17a. They sacrificed to demons which were no gods (RSV), from whom they had received nothing and of whom hitherto they had never even heard. So unspeakable was their ingratitude, that they preferred such new god-kings to the Rock who had shown to them the love of both father (v. 18a) and mother (v. 18b).

e) Curses on the Covenant-Breakers. 32:19-25.

In the Sinaitic Covenant, attached to the stipulation forbidding rival image-gods, was the warning: "I the Lord your God am a jealous God" (5:9; Ex 20:5). God responds to unfaithfulness in the covenant relationship with something akin to the fiery conjugal zeal of a man whose spouse has been unfaithful (Deut 32:21, cf. v. 16). The law prescribed death for the adulteress. The covenant curses threatened Israel with extinction if she played the harlot with the no-gods of Canaan (cf. 31:16ff.). From the fire of divine jealousy there is no escape; it burns unto the depths of Sheol (32:22, RSV), the place of the dead. 19,20. He abhorred them. . . . And he said, I will hide my face. Applying the lex talionis principle, God would reject Israel and remove his protection from them. He would incite jealousy in Israel by means of a no-people (v. 21; cf. Eph 2:12). That is, he would grant to a people that had not known his covenant favor to triumph over his children in whom is no faithfulness (v. 20b, ASV and RSV).

23. I will heap evils upon them (ASV). In verses 23-25 the covenant curses, especially pestilence, famine, and the sword, the terrors which come with the climactic curse of siege and exile, are threatened (cf. ch. 28). Therein would lie the triumph of the no-people. As a result of siege, Israel would be removed from God's kingdom and become herself a no-people (cf. Hos 1:9). In the further unfolding of redemptive revelation God was to promise a renewal of his mercy whereby the no-people would become again "my people" (cf. Hos 1:10; 2:23). And Paul has interpreted that as fulfilled in the coming of Gentiles as well as Jews into the New Covenant in Christ Jesus (Rom 9:25,26). In that connection Paul also gives a turn to the idea of Israel's jealousy at the favor shown by God to the Gentiles (Rom 11:11ff.; cf. 10:19). The Mosaic Song of Witness itself anticipates the redemptive mercy and blessing that lie beyond the predicted cursing of Israel (see Deut 32:26-43).

f) Blessings Through Redemptive Judgment. 32:26-43.

Attention is now focused upon the enemy nation which would mercilessly smite both infant and hoary head. 27. Our hand is high. Lest the enemy misinterpret its victory over Israel and withhold from the Lord the honor due Him (cf. Isa 10:5ff.), He would limit the enemy's slaughter of Israel (Deut 32:26). From the viewpoint of the covenant curses, this would be a stay of God's vengeance against Israel. The preservation of a remnant from annihilation is thus rooted in God's jealousy for his own glory. At the same time, the ultimate vindication of his people, which the preservation of a remnant provides for, arises from God's compassion for them (v. 36). 29a. If they were wise, they would understand this (RSV). The foolish enemy should have known that their easy victory over Israel, the covenant protectorate of the Suzerain of heaven and earth, must be due to his displeasure with Israel (vv. 19ff.,30). Verse 31 is a parenthetical interjection of Moses, enforcing the cogency of 32:30 by eliminating the possibility that the enemy's god had wrought victory for him. On verse 31b, see Ex 14:25; Num 23 and 24; Josh 2:9,10; I Sam 4:8; 5:7ff.; Dan 4:34ff. 29b. Furthermore, if the enemy were wise, they would discern their latter end (RSV). This theme is continued in verse 32ff. Their arrogance would turn to trembling if they realized that the God of Israel, who had judged even his own people in fiery wrath, would certainly judge them also with strict justice (v. 34) for their depravity and cruelty (vv. 32,33). The greatest evil of the enemy nation would be that it was at enmity with the people of God. For though in this it would be the rod of God's anger against Israel, its own motives and purposes would be quite different (cf. 27b; Isa 10:7ff.). 35,36a. Hence God's judgment of the enemy would be an act of vengeance and vindication in behalf of his people . . . his servants. So the song returns skillfully to its main theme of Israel and the covenant sanctions, and intimates that ultimate blessing will follow the penultimate curse.

For NT quotation of 32:35,36, see Rom 12:19 and Heb 10:30. 36b. Their power is gone. Only when his people would be as helpless as when first he found them (v. 10) would God intervene in redemptive judgment. Forgiveness, however, was to be granted only as they were confronted with their sin (vv. 37,38) and so were led to godly sorrow and repentance and to trust in the Lord as their true and only Rock. 39. I kill, and I make alive. Promising to come in judgment as the Saviour of his servants, the Lord identifies himself as God alone and absolutely sovereign (cf. v. 12; 4:35,39; 5:6a; Isa 43:11-13). 40. I lift up my hand to heaven. As the Lord added oath to promise in the Abrahamic Covenant, so also he did in this New Covenant, swearing by himself, for there is no other (cf. Isa 45:22,23; Heb 6:13), that his judgment would be terrible against those who hate him (Deut 32:41,42; cf. v. 35; Isa 63:1ff.). In verse 42, the third clause completes the first; the fourth, the second. 43. The song concludes with the prospect of jubilation over the judgment of God which involves both retribution upon the enemy and expiation of all guilt within the kingdom of God. Since the nations universally are called upon to participate in the joy of God's salvation, the horizon of this hope is clearly the Messianic age, when all the nations of the earth will find blessing in the seed of Abraham.

44-47. The commissioning of Joshua and the instructions concerning the Song of Witness were joined in the special revelation at the sanctuary (31:14-23), and significantly Joshua was associated with Moses in proclaiming the song to Israel (32:44). Moses sealed the recital with a final appeal to the covenant community to cultivate in its successive generations fidelity to the covenant, which in its summarization in the song was a witness for God to Israel (v. 46). The conclusion to the sanctions (30:15ff.) is echoed in the warning that this was a question of Israel's very life (32:47).

C. Moses' Testament. 32:48–33:29.

48-52. Cf. 3:27; Num 27:12-14. 48. That selfsame day. It was toward the close of the day of the renewal ceremony (cf. 1:3-5; 27:11; 31:22) that Moses ascended this mountain of the Abarim, mount Nebo (49a, RSV), there to die. On Aaron's death on Mount Hor, see 10:6; Num 20:22ff.; 33:37,38. 51. Because ye trespassed. On the sin which disqualified Moses for entrance into Canaan, see 1:37; 3:26; 4:21; Num 20:10ff.; 27:14. The performance of this command is described in Deut 34:1ff.

In the ancient Near East, a dying father's final blessings spoken to his sons were an irrevocable legal testament, accepted as decisive evidence in court disputes. In the case of the Biblical patriarchs, the authority and potency of their last blessings derived from the Spirit of prophecy in them, speaking in the testamentary form (cf. the cases of Isaac, Gen 27, and Jacob, Gen 49). As spiritual and theocratic father of the twelve tribes, Moses pronounced his blessings on them just before he ascended the mount to die (Deut 33:1), and thus his words constitute his testament. In so far as Deuteronomy was a dynastic guarantee, Joshua as Moses' successor was the heir of the covenant. It was also true, however, that all the Israelites were God's adopted sons, and thus heirs of the blessings of His kingdom which were being dispensed through His servant Moses. It is impossible simply to equate the covenantal and testamentary forms without a drastic impoverishment and distortion of the covenant concept. But to the extent that the blessings promised in God's redemptive covenant are not inheritable apart from the promisor's death, that covenant does include as one of its features the testamentary principle.

Moses' poetic testament contains three parts: (a) an introduction, describing the glory of the Lord as he declared his kingship in the giving of his theocratic covenant to Jeshurun (vv. 2-5); (b) the blessings of the tribes, these being in the form of prayers, doxologies, imperatives, and predictions (vv. 6-25); and (c) a conclusion, extolling God, the majestic Protector of Jeshurun (vv. 26-29). (For a useful study of textual problems in this chapter and a new translation see F. M. Cross and D. N. Freedman, "The Blessing of Moses," JBL 67 (1948), 191-210.)

1) Introduction. 33:2-5.

The appearing of the Lord as King of Kings to proclaim his covenant was in radiant, sunrise-like glory over the eastern mountains of the Sinai peninsula (v. 2a; cf. the similar poetic descriptions of the desert theophany in Jud 5:4ff.; Ps 68:7ff.,17ff.; Hab 3:2ff.). 2b. In attendance upon the King at his advent was a heavenly host of holy ones (ASV and RSV; cf. Ps 68:17; Zech 14:5; Acts 7:53; Gal 3:19; Heb 2:2). Probably nearer than the AV to the true sense of verses 2d,3 is the translation by Cross and Freedman: At his right hand proceeded the mighty ones, yea, the guardians of the peoples. All the holy ones are at thy hand, they prostrate themselves at thy feet, they carry out thy decisions. As the Lord's earthly representative, Moses gave God's covenant with its kingdom promises to Israel (v. 4), and by the covenant ceremony the Lord's theocratic kingship over Israel was ratified (v. 5).

2) The Blessings of the Tribes. 33:6-25.

Moses first blessed the sons of Jacob's wives, then the sons of the handmaids. Though Jacob announced first-born Reuben's loss of the rights of primogeniture, both he and Moses began their testaments with him (cf. Gen 49:3,4). 6. Let Reuben live. Moses prayed that Reuben might not suffer tribal extinction. 7. Bring him unto his people. The blessing for royal Judah (Leah's fourth son) is, in effect, the prayer that Jacob's prophetic blessing on him might be fulfilled (cf. Gen 49:9-12), that Judah might be enabled to accomplish the kingly task of conquering the adversaries and thence return to his people to receive their obedience. In the testament of Jacob, Simeon and Levi (second and third sons of Leah) were rebuked and scattered in Israel (Gen 49:5-7). Historically, Simeon was early absorbed by Judah (cf. Josh 19:2ff.). Moses omitted Simeon from the separate blessings (the number twelve being then obtained by the division of the Joseph tribe). But he invested Levi's distribution throughout Israel (cf. Josh 21:1-40) with a new significance. 9b. They have . . . kept thy covenant. Levi had displayed the devotion to the Lord requisite for the priestly office in the testing at Sinai (Ex 32:26-29). On the events at Massah and Meribah (Deut 33:8b), the beginning and end of God's trial of Israel (cf. 8:2ff.), see Ex 17:1-7; Num 20:1-13; Deut 6:16; 9:22; 32:51. Upon this tribe was conferred the honor of the priesthood in the family of Aaron, with its privileges of receiving special divine revelation (33:8a), teaching the covenant law (v. 10a), and officiating at the altar (v. 10b). Levi's blessing fittingly closes with the prayer that his priestly ministry in behalf of the covenant people may prove efficacious (v. 11).

Having dealt with royal and priestly tribes, Moses turned to Benjamin (younger son of Rachel). 12c. He shall dwell between his shoulders. To Benjamin was allotted Jerusalem on the border of Judah, site of the Lord's sanctuary and throne (cf. Gen 49:27; Josh 15:8; 18:16). The use of the term "shoulder" in the latter passages (RSV) to denote Jerusalem's elevated situation supports the view that the Lord is the subject of dwell. On the beloved of the Lord, see Jer 11:15; Ps 60:5. Adjoining Benjamin in the blessing (Deut 33:13-17) and in territorial inheritance was Joseph (Rachel's older son). The double portion, the right of the firstborn forfeited by Reuben, had been given to Joseph (Gen 48:22) in that his two sons enjoyed separate tribal status. Moses now confirmed the pre-eminence which Jacob gave Ephraim over Manasseh (Deut 33:17; cf. Gen 48:14ff.). Again like Jacob, Moses blessed Joseph with military power and abundance of the choicest gifts of the earth (cf. Gen 49:22-26). 16. The source of all Joseph's prowess and prosperity was in the favor of him that dwelt in the bush (RSV; cf. Ex 3:2ff.). A slight change in the text would substitute "Sinai" for bush. Zebulun and Issachar (sixth and fifth sons respectively of Leah) are here united in their blessing (Deut 33:18,19; cf. Gen 49:13-15). Their special portion was to be the treasures of the sea, secured apparently by trade with those laboring in and along the Mediterranean and the Sea of Chinnereth. Their inheritances were near but not on these waters (cf., however, Gen 49:13). 19a. They shall call the people unto the mountain. This seems to indicate that their commercial successes would be thankfully acknowledged in true worship.

The tribe of Gad (first son of Leah's handmaid Zilpah) had chosen a commander's portion (v. 21a, RSV) as their inheritance in Trans-Jordan, the first fruits of the conquest (vv. 20,21a). Then they faithfully joined their brethren in the conflict for their portions in Canaan (v. 21b). Like Shem's blessing (Gen 9:26), Gad's is couched in doxology (cf. Gen 49:19). In energetic strength the tribe of Dan (elder son of Rachel's handmaid Bilhah) was to be like the lions of Bashan (Deut 33:22; cf. Gen 49:17). It was to the area of Bashan that an expedition of Danites migrated from their earlier territory on the southern coast (Jud 18). The Lord's favor on Naphtali (Bilhah's younger son) was to be shown in the remarkable fertility and beauty of his inheritance, especially its southern portion on the shores of Chinnereth (Deut 33:23; cf. Gen 49:21). 24a. Blessed above sons be Asher (RSV). This tribe of Zilpah's younger son was situated on Israel's northwest border, a fertile land adjoining Naphtali (v. 24b; cf. Gen 49:20). 25. As thy days . . . thy strength. Moses' prayer was that Asher's protection might be constantly strong.

3) Conclusion. 33:26-29.

26a. There is none like unto God, O Jeshurun (RSV). As in the introduction (vv. 2-5), Moses here extols the true Giver of the blessings of this testament. The establishment of the covenant was celebrated in the introduction, but here the Lord is praised as Israel's Defender and Benefactor in the subsequent conquest (v. 27) and settlement in the paradise land (v. 28). On verse 26b, see Ps 18:10; 68:33. On 27a, see the Mosaic Psalm 90:1,2. 29. Who is like unto thee, O people saved by the Lord. The uniqueness of Israel's beatitude arises from the uniqueness of Israel's Saviour-Lord (cf. v. 26a). Your enemies shall come fawning to you (RSV). All must acknowledge Israel's supremacy.

D. Dynastic Succession. 34:1-12.

A testament is of force only after the death of the testator. So the Deuteronomic Covenant in its testamentary aspect (cf. comments introd. to ch. 33) would not become operative until after the death of Moses. Only then would Joshua succeed to the role of vicegerent of God over Israel, and only then under the leadership of Joshua could the tribes, according to the declarations of the Lord, enter into their inheritance in Canaan. It was, therefore, appropriate that the Deuteronomic treaty should close with the record of Moses' death, which in effect notarizes the treaty. That the testamentary significance of Moses' death is in view is evidenced by the accompanying attention given to the land of Israel's inheritance and to Joshua's accession to the royal mediatorship of the covenant. Verses 1-8 record Moses' death and verses 9-12, Joshua's succession to Moses. The account resumes the narrative of 32:48-52.

1-8. 1a. Moses went up . . . unto mount Nebo (ASV). Moses walked alone the ascent of no return, away from the promised land to the top of the mountain ridge on the west of the plains of Moab, opposite Jericho, to Mount Nebo. The panorama of Israel's sworn inheritance is described as it appeared looking first towards the northeast, thence westward and south, back to the plain stretching between Jericho and Moses. 2. The Western Sea (RSV); i.e., the Mediterranean, lying beyond the hills of Judah, is not naturally visible from Nebo. 4b. Thou shalt not go over thither. Cf. 1:37; 3:26; 4:21,22; 32:52. Though not now able to enter the land, Moses beheld its northern mountain peaks, on one of which he, with Elijah, was afterwards to stand and speak with the Mediator of the New Covenant concerning the exodus he must accomplish at Jerusalem before he might cross over into the heavenly inheritance (cf. Mt 17:3; Mk 9:4; Lk 9:30,31). It was necessary for Jesus to die before entering his rest, because he was the true Mediator who came to reconcile his sinful people unto God; Moses must die without entering the typical rest because as the OT mediator he had by official transgression disqualified himself for completing the mission which prefigured that of the sinless Son of God. Unlike Moses, who after his death was succeeded by Joshua (Deut 33:9), the Messianic Mediator would succeed himself after his death because it was not possible that death should hold him. 7. Nor his natural force abated. Moses, though 120 years of age (cf. 31:2; Ex 7:7), did not expire of old age, but by the command of God, who by His sovereign word creates and destroys (Deut 34:5). On the location of Moses' burial (v. 6), see 3:29; 4:46. On its sequel, see Jude 9.

9-12. 9a. Full of the spirit of wisdom. Joshua had been ordained as the dynastic heir by the bestowal of the charismatic gifts of this dynasty, pre-eminently the gift of governmental wisdom (cf. Num 27:18ff.; Deut 31). 9b. Israel heark- ened unto him. True to their oath of obedience to the Lord's will, sworn in the Deuteronomic ceremony (cf. 26:17; 29:12), Israel assented to the accession of Joshua. 10. Whom the Lord knew face to face. Though successor to Moses, Joshua was not his equal. With Moses God conversed directly (Ex 33:11; Num 12:8), but Joshua must discover the will of God through priestly mediation (Num 27:21). By the signs of victory over Jordan's waters and Canaan's hosts, Joshua was attested as the successor of Moses, who had triumphed over Pharaoh's hosts and the waters of the sea. But none was like Moses in the fullness of his revelation of the Lord's redemptive might (Deut 34:11,12).

JOSHUA

INTRODUCTION

Title. The first book of The Prophets, the second great division of the Old Testament canon, is named after its principal character, Joshua. There is no ancient Jewish tradition or manuscript evidence that this book ever formed a unit with the five books of The Law to form a so-called Hexateuch (see E. J. Young, Introduction to the Old Testament, pp. 157ff.).

Authorship and Date. The book appears to be a literary unit, composed by a single author, not based upon two or more primary sources, as some have asserted, which were edited and re-edited for many centuries. While Joshua himself had certain documents written (18:9; 24:26), he cannot have been the author of the entire book bearing his name. It records his death (24:29,30), and events which did not occur until after his death: conquest of Hebron by Caleb (15:13b, 14; cf. Jud 1:1,10,20), of Debir by Othniel (Josh 15:15-19; cf. Jud 1:1,11-15), and of Leshem by the Danites (Josh 19:47; cf. Jud 17; 18) at a time after idolatry was tolerated in Israel (but cf. Josh 24:31). These events probably took place before the oppression by Cushan, or during the Judgeship of Othniel (Jud 3:8-11), about 1370–1330 B.C.

On the other hand, the author was an eyewitness of many of the events described (e.g., Josh 5:1,6). Rahab was still living at the time of writing (6:25). The book must be pre-Solomonic (16:10; cf. I Kgs 9:16); pre-Davidic (Josh 15:63; cf. II Sam 5:5-9); earlier than the twelfth century, when Tyre gained the ascendancy over Sidon, for the Phoenicians are here still called Sidonians (Josh 13:4-6); and it must have been written before 1200 B.C., after which more Philistines invaded Palestine, for the Philistines were not yet a menace in Joshua's time (see Commentary on 13:2 b-4 a).

It seems most likely that Joshua was written during the Judgeship of Othniel (c. 1370–1330. See Commentary on 1: 4). The far greater familiarity with the concerns of the tribe of Judah (cf. the detailed account of the southern campaign, 10:1-23; the interest in Caleb and Othniel, 14:1-15; 15:13-19; the lengthy list of the borders and towns of Judah, 15:1-63) indicates that the author may have resided within Judah. He only very sketchily traces the borders of the important Joseph tribes even though within them lay Shiloh (16:1–17:11). If he lived in Judah, it is understandable that he listed the geographical areas of that territory first without qualifying his terms (11: 16). Since there is repeated mention of the fact that no territory was given to the tribe of Levi (13:14,33; 14:3,4; 18:7), perhaps he was a priest (see J. J. Lias, "Joshua," Pulpit Commentary, III, xi, xii).

Purpose and Value. The purposes of the book are to continue the history of Israel begun in the Pentateuch and to demonstrate God's faithfulness to his covenants with the patriarchs and the theocratic nation by settling the tribes in their promised homeland (11:23; 21:43-45). Furthermore, God's holiness is seen in his judgment upon the iniquitous Canaanites and in his insistence that Israel, in fighting this holy war, must put away everything evil. A third aspect of God's relation to man evidenced in the book is God's salvation. The very name "Joshua," the Hebrew form of Jesus, means "Jehovah is salvation." Thus the redemptive history of Israel's entering and possessing Canaan illustrates the Christian's spiritual experience of conflict, victory, and blessing in heavenly spheres (Eph 1:3; 2:6; 6:12) through the mighty power of God (Eph 1:19,20; 6:10). In Hebrews 4 the rest in Canaan from vain wilderness strivings is set forth as typical of our present spiritual rest in the finished work of Christ and in his continual intercession to enable us to conquer self and Satan.

Historical Background. The data for determining the historical setting of the Exodus and the Conquest are supplied by the Biblical records and archaeological research. The patriarchs sojourned in Canaan during what archaeologists call the Middle Bronze Age (2100–1550). Joseph probably rose to power during Egypt's Twelfth Dynasty. Then the new king who rose against (qûm 'al) Egypt and who knew not Joseph (Ex 1:8) was undoubtedly a Hyksos ruler in the Nile Delta region. Since the Hyksos afflicted the Israelites, forcing them to build Pithom and Raamses (Ex 1:11), Israel did not flee Egypt when native Egyptians thrust out the Hyksos about 1570 B.C. The Pharaohs of the Eighteenth Dynasty (whose capital was Thebes, but who had subsidiary palaces at Memphis, Heliopolis, and probably Bubastis) continued to enslave the Israelites until Moses finally led them into Sinai, about 1447 B.C. (cf. I Kgs 6:1), during the reign of Amenhotep II (1450–1423). Joshua must have led Israel into Canaan about 1407, during the Late Bronze Age (1550–1200). The tribal allotments were made about 1400, and Joshua lived until 1390 or later. An alternate view dates the Exodus during the reign of Pharaoh Rameses II shortly after 1300 B.C. Those who hold this view take the 480 years of I Kgs 6:1 as a round number for twelve generations.

By the time of the Israelite invasion of Canaan, Pharaoh Amenhotep III (1410–1372) was losing interest in his Asiatic holdings, so that most of the petty kings of Palestine and Syria soon revolted from Egypt or refrained from paying their tribute. The cuneiform letters found in 1887 at Tell el-Amarna in Egypt, the site of the capital of Amenhotep's son Akhenaten (1380–1363), are the royal archives of these two rulers. The majority were written by vassal princes in Palestine and Syria during the period 1400–1360, pleading for help from the Pharaoh against neighboring city-states or against the Habiru. Usually the term Habiru (or 'Apiru) designates mercenary troops. In this case it designates troops hired from Syria by the Canaanite princes rebelling against Egypt. Thus the silence in Joshua concerning Egypt may be explained by the fact that Egypt had a weak foreign policy from Amenhotep III until Seti I (1313–1301), the next Pharaoh to march into Palestine. Even then the Egyptians avoided the mountains and took the coastal route when campaigning against the Hittites in Syria.

By the period of Joshua and the Judges, the Canaanite religious observances had degenerated to the most sordid licentiousness and brutality – as we learn from the Ras Shamra (Ugaritic) tablets and the extant relics of fertility cult practices unearthed at Beth-shan, Megiddo, etc. The immoral character of the Canaanite deities led their devotees into the most demoralizing rites of the ancient Near East, such as sacred prostitution of both sexes, serpent worship, and infant sacrifices. Since such religious practices were spiritually and morally contaminating, one can readily see why God commanded Israel to exterminate the Canaanites. Thus they and their cities were to be devoted to destruction lest the religious life of the Israelites be endangered through contact with such idolatrous peoples. W. F. Albright strikingly explained the issues involved when he wrote:

> It was fortunate for the future of monotheism that the Israelites of the Conquest were a wild folk, endowed with primitive energy and ruthless will to exist, since the resulting decimation of the Canaanites prevented the complete fusion of the two kindred folk which would almost inevitably have depressed Yahwistic standards to a point where recovery was impossible. Thus the Canaanites, with their orgiastic nature-worship, their cult of fertility in the form of serpent symbols and sensuous nudity, and their gross mythology, were replaced by Israel, with its nomadic simplicity and purity of life, its lofty monotheism, and its severe code of ethics (From the Stone Age to Christianity, p. 281).

COMMENTARY

I. Entrance into the Promised Land. 1:1—5:12.

A. God's Commission to Joshua. 1:1-9. At the close of the Pentateuch the death of Israel's outstanding leader and lawgiver and Jehovah's faithful servant is recorded. The Israelites were still encamped east of the Jordan. God's inspired history of his chosen people now continues.

1. The Lord spake unto Joshua . . . Moses' minister (cf. Ex 24:13; Num 27:18-23; Deut 1:38; 31:23). Whereas Moses, whom Joshua had served as chief assistant or officer, had previously given a charge to him, now God spoke directly to him to assume command of the Israelites. While probably not "mouth to mouth" (Num 12:8), this revelation must have come almost immediately after Moses died, in order to maintain the continuity of God's theocratic rule. The Lord gave Joshua four specific orders: (1) go over Jordan; (2) be strong . . . ; (3) cause this people to inherit; (4) observe to do according to all the Law. 2. Arise, go over this Jordan. Up! prepare to cross over into Canaan. The Jordan was now at flood stage (3:15). The land which I do give. I am giving (Heb. participle), or, I am about to give.

3. As I said unto Moses. See Deuteronomy 11:23-32. They actually had to occupy the territory in order to receive it from God, as Christians must claim and appropriate their spiritual blessings in Christ (Eph 1:3). 4. This Lebanon. According to the LXX, Anti-Lebanon, of which range Mount Hermon, perhaps visible from a height above Abel-shittim, is the southernmost peak. The land of the Hittites. This phrase is not in Deut 11:24; the LXX omits it here. In 1407 B.C. the Hittite emperors had not yet overrun Syria; their supremacy between the Euphrates and the Mediterranean began thirty to fifty years later, under King Suppiluliumas. If this phrase is genuine in the original manuscript, then the book of Joshua was not written before about 1350 B.C.

5. I will not fail thee. Literally, I will not drop, abandon thee (cf. 10:6, "drop not," or "slack not, thy hand"); LXX, I will not leave thee in the lurch. 6. Be strong and of a good courage (cf. 1:7a, 9). God's second order, so necessary to a warrior, was, Be strong and resolute, inflexible; LXX: Behave like a man. For unto this people . . . the land. Literally, for thou shalt cause this people to inherit the land, God's third command to Joshua. Canaan was promised in the Abrahamic covenant (Gen 15:16-21).

7. Observe to do according to all the law. The fourth command was to keep watch or be careful to practice the whole Mosaic law, not merely the letter of the Law, but the spirit of it as well (cf. Mt 5:27,28, etc.). 8. Meditate therein day and night. Hāgâ, "recite in an undertone." The LXX uses meletâō, denoting the meditative pondering and audible practice of orators. Joshua's courage, hope of victory, and wisdom necessary for success were dependent upon his constant attention and inflexible adherence to the written Law (tôrâ, "instruction, teaching").

9. Have not I commanded thee? The invasion which Joshua was about to lead was unmistakably ordered by God. Hence, Joshua was no desert chieftain or tribal sheik raiding Palestine, as the kings of the Midianites and Amalekites did later on (Jud 6–8). He was simply the field general taking orders from his Commander-in-chief (Josh 5:14) in a holy war of extermination of wicked, God-rejecting peoples.

B. Joshua's Mobilization for Crossing the Jordan. 1:10-18. Rested after the rigorous conquest of Trans-Jordan, the Israelites were far better organized and disciplined than they had been forty years previously.

10. The officers of the people. The term shoṭᵉrîm (Ex 5:6-19; Deut 1:15; I Chr 27:1) designates the scribes of the muster roll, corresponding to today's adjutants or staff officers who issue the administrative orders of a command. 11. Victuals. Provisions. Since other food was now available, no longer were they to depend on manna alone; and soon it was to cease altogether (5:11,12). They could forage in the fields of ripening grain in the Jericho oasis. God does not support his people in idleness. Within three days. Literally, within yet three days ye are going to be passing over this Jordan, i.e., beginning the march which will take you across Jordan. Probably the same three days that the spies were away (2:22), but not the three days of 3:2. 13. Remember the word. The proposal made by Moses in Num 32 (cf. Deut 3:12-21).

14. Armed. Literally, in five parts — van, rear, body, two wings; i.e., "in battle deployment." All the mighty men of valour. Joshua permitted the eastern tribes to send their best troops (4:13), so that a majority remained to protect their families and their flocks. 16-18. The ready response of the Trans-Jordanian tribes enabled the Israelites to invade Canaan with a united front, so necessary for both the military and the spiritual morale of God's people.

C. Mission of the Spies. 2:1-24. Having some firsthand knowledge of Canaan from his own spying experience thirty-eight years before, Joshua, in executing the divine orders, prudently sent spies to Jericho, the key fortress of the entire southern Jordan Valley. Two immediate difficulties faced him: how to overcome the hostile Canaanites on the western bank; and how to cross the Jordan at flood stage (cf. 3:15; I Chr 12:15. Not all could swim it as the spies must have done).

1. Shittim is identified by Nelson Glueck with Tell el-Hammam on Wadi Kefrein, in the foothills of the eastern edge of the Jordan Valley (Num 25:1; 33:49). Secretly, saying. This mission was carefully concealed, even from the Israelites, lest the circulation of an unfavorable report should dishearten the people (cf. Num 13:28–14:4). Came into an harlot's house, named Rahab. Josephus and many writers since his time have argued that Rahab was an innkeeper. But the Hebrew word zônâ, the Greek pornē in the LXX, and Heb 11:31 and Jas 2:25 all definitely class her as a common harlot (not a qᵉdēshâ, a temple- or cult-prostitute). Did the spies spot her walking the street toward evening (cf. Prov 7:9-12) and follow her to her house, as detectives today may visit places of ill fame, where they may overhear the secrets of criminals? Or, guided entirely by the Lord, did they merely "happen upon" the house of this one prepared beforehand by the Spirit? Her house was probably built against the western city wall, her rear window overlooking the mountain (Josh 2:15,16); hence her house was some distance from the one city gate of Jericho, which opened upon the fine flowing well just to the east of the city mound. Rahab's calling implied far less deviation from the accepted standard of morality in her environment than it does with us. Furthermore, she also engaged in the honest occupation of linen weaving and dyeing. Her harlotry is mentioned to bring into bold relief God's mercy in giving her faith and in sparing her (cf. Mt 21:32; Lk 15:1).

2. The king of Jericho. In the Late Bronze Age every important city of Canaan was the center of a city-state and had its king. 4,5. Rahab's expedient lie was a sin of weakness in one whose conscience was just beginning to be awakened out of heathen darkness. A man of developed faith learns to answer without lying (e.g., Gen 22:7,8). In Oriental ethics, guarding one's guest as an act of hospitality is one of the highest virtues. As for the charge that she was betraying her king, a new allegiance to the heavenly King was developing in her heart. Thus she concealed the spies, though at greatest risk to herself. 6. The stalks of flax were the stems, three or four feet long, spread out to dry on the flat roof (cf. Deut 22:8) after being retted (soaked) in water for several weeks. The flax bolled (ripened) early in March, when barley was in the ear (Ex 9:31,32).

9-11. Rahab revealed the priceless information that panic (as sung by Moses in Ex 11:15,16; as promised by God in Deut 2:25) had spread throughout the vicinity of Jericho. Her testimony (Josh 2:11b) is remarkable coming from the lips of a sinful woman in an idolatrous, polytheistic society. The Israelite leaders themselves did not always speak so monotheistically (see 24:14,15; I Kgs 18:21). The same evidence that convinced Rahab served only to harden her fellow-countrymen.

12. The translation shewed you kindness does not give the proper connotation. The word ḥesed basically refers to an unwritten promise, agreement, or covenant (as differentiated from the more formal bᵉrît, "covenant," inaugurated by a ceremony; Gen 15:7-18). In the desperate pact between Rahab and the spies, it is evident by the oaths sworn that neither party was acting out of pure sympathy and loving-kindness. More literally, she said: "Now then, swear to me by Jehovah that as I have made a ḥesed-agreement with you, ye also will make a ḥesed-agreement with my father's house, and give to me a pledge of (your) faithfulness." The pledge was the oath with which they were to confirm their loyalty to the agreement; it is given by them in verse 14.

14. The spies answered: "Our lives to die instead of yours (if we are faithless); if ye (you and your relatives) do not report this our mission, then it shall be, when Jehovah gives us the land, that we shall keep the ḥesed-agreement and faithfulness with thee." 15. A cord. Ḥebel, a rope (II Sam 17:13; Jer 38:6-13). 16. And she said. Better, Now she had said. No doubt they exchanged parting instructions (vv. 16-21 a) before the spies climbed through the window, lest they be discovered while still talking. 18. This line of scarlet thread. A cord (tiqwâ; cf. Song 4:3) made of scarlet yarn which they spotted in Rahab's house, to be tied in the window through (not by) which she let them down. It was to enable the attacking Israelites to identify her house.

22. The mountain. Limestone cliffs 1500 feet high, with many caves, a half mile west, at the edge of the Jordan Valley. These cliffs are only eight or ten miles north of the caves where the Dead Sea Scrolls were discovered. 23, 24. Probably before the dawn of 3:1 the spies reported to Joshua the dispirited condition of the Canaanites, thus giving him the answer to his first problem. They properly fulfilled their task without trying to give advice as to the attack (cf. 7:2,3).

D. Crossing of the Jordan. 3:1–5:1. Crossing the Jordan into Canaan was a major crisis of faith. Nearly forty years before, Israel had faced the same crisis, but had failed. To escape into Sinai via the Red Sea took a measure of faith; but to invade Canaan via the Jordan and thus become committed, without possibility of retreat, to the struggle against armies and chariots and fortified cities demanded supreme faith in the living God (3:10). Here a whole nation took the step to hazard their lives (cf. Acts 15:26) in total commitment to the Lord.

1. Came to Jordan. As soon as the spies reported, Joshua was reassured that God was working. Though not yet knowing how to get across the river, in faith he moved camp near to the edge of the Zor, the narrow depression 150 feet deep in which the waters flooding the "jungle of the Jordan" (Jer 12:5; 49:19 RSV) were contained.

1) Final Preparations for Crossing the River. 3:2-13. At the end of the third day, the ninth of Nisan (cf. 4:19), the people received instructions (3:2-4) for a new manner of marching, since the pillar of cloud would no longer guide them. The priests the Levites. The priest Levites, Levites who were priests, not Kohathites (Num 4:15), would carry the ark, because this was to be a solemn and extraordinary occasion (cf. Josh 6:6; I Kgs 8:3-6). The people were to spread around the ark at a radius of 3,000 feet, so that all might see the guiding symbol of Jehovah's presence more readily, "for ye have not marched in this manner heretofore" (Josh 3:4 b). 5. Sanctify yourselves. They needed to consecrate themselves with outward purification and inward devotion to God, because he was about to perform miracles among them, giving the first public evidence of his presence with Joshua (3:7), and because they were entering upon a holy war (Num 31:24).

7. This day. That night, after the new Hebrew day began at sundown, the Lord honored Joshua's faith by revealing to him the means of passage. Then he could announce to the nation just how they were to cross the river (3:9-13). This was to insure that after the event they would know that their crossing was not a coincidence but that a Being of life, power, and activity was defending them and working for them. 11. This verse, taken literally, indicates that the ark containing the written Law definitely represented God to the Israelites: Behold the ark of the covenant! The Lord ('ādôn) of all the earth is about to proceed before you into the Jordan.

2) Passage of All the People. 3:14-17. Early the next morning the entire nation crossed over, all in one day, for they hasted (4:10), undoubtedly hundreds or thousands abreast. There is no need to search for two differing accounts of the crossing when various statements in chapter 4 are properly interpreted. The waters . . . from above . . . stood (v. 16). This difficult verse may best be explained by translating literally: The waters coming down from above stopped; they rose up as one heap very far at Adam, the town which is on the side of (i.e., on the same side of the Jordan as) Zarethan. And those coming down (to the Jordan in other streams south of Adam) toward the sea of the Arabah, the Salt Sea, were wholly cut off. Adam may be identified with Tell ed-Damiyeh just south of the junction of the Jabbok and the Jordan, about fifteen miles upstream from the crossing area. The waters may have been dammed up as far as Zarethan (Tell es-Sa'idiyeh), twelve miles further north. A landslide of high (150 feet) marly cliffs of the Zor in the vicinity of Adam may have blocked the river (which happened about 1266 A.D., and more recently; according to Garstang, in 1927 the river was thus blocked for over twenty-one hours). Nevertheless, God wrought a great miracle: other streams had to be blocked as well; the waters stopped and returned (4:18) almost immediately; and the soft river bottom was dry at once; furthermore, the stopping of the water took place at flood time.

3) The Crossing Commemorated and Completed. 4:1-18. Before the priests bearing the ark could leave their post, stones for two cairns were collected, and one of these was erected where the priests stood in the river.

1. That the Lord spake. Rather, that as the Lord had spoken. The repetition of the divine command—undoubtedly given at the time of 3:7,8, for Joshua had already appointed the twelve men (3:12)—is made here to introduce the account of its execution.

5. This verse may be translated, Proceed to the presence (i.e., the vicinity) of the ark of Jehovah your God, to the midst of the Jordan, and take up each of you a stone upon his shoulder . . . Joshua and the twelve appointees may have remained on the eastern bank until the multitude had crossed. 6,7. The heap of stones was to be a witness to God's power and faithfulness in bringing all Israel back to the Promised Land (cf. 4:21-24). Both the OT and archaeology testify to the frequent use of single standing stones (maṣṣēbôt) and cairns as memorials to commemorate theophanies (Gen 28:18; 35:14), vows or covenants (Gen 31:45-53; Josh 24:26), supernatural events (I Sam 7:10-12), or even relatives or tribes (Gen 35:20; Ex 24:4). An altar, since it was built of unhewn stones (Ex 20:25), could serve a similar purpose (Isa 19:19; Josh 22:10, 26-34; cf. Gen 12:7; 26:24, 25; 35:1,3,7; Ex 17:15; Deut 27:1-8; Josh 8:30-35).

9. Joshua set up twelve stones in the midst of Jordan on the very spot where the priests had stood. This spot must have been on the eastern brink, where they first stepped into the flood waters, for neither 3:17 nor 4:9,10 indicates that they had proceeded any farther into the river. Hence the cairn must have been readily visible during most of the year. Note that the two sets of twelve stones bore witness to the fact that all twelve tribes were in the wilderness together and entered Canaan at once.

10. And the people hasted and passed over. This statement explains in retrospect (i.e., had hasted) how the priests were able to stand patiently. 12,13. The men of the Trans-Jordanian tribes, unencumbered by families and possessions, had led the crossing (1:12-18). 14. The Lord magnified Joshua as the divinely chosen leader by enabling him to take the people safely across (cf. 1:5,17; 3:7).

15-18. This passage gives a fuller account of 4:11. Translate 4:15 as follows: For the Lord had spoken to Joshua . . .

4) The Erection of the Monument at Gilgal. 4:19–5:1. The first encampment of the Israelites in Canaan, and their headquarters for the conquest of the land, was at Gilgal, two or three miles northeast of Jericho, near Khirbet el-Mefjir. As on the opposite shore, here the stones were set up in a memorial cairn, each being too small to be an individual standing stone (maṣṣēbâ). The name Gilgal, however, which means "circle," evidently belonged to the site already, for Moses seems to have known it (Deut 11:30). Perhaps to mark a cult burial site, as at Stonehenge or Mycenae, the Canaanites had formerly installed sculptured stones in a circle near Gilgal (Jud 3:19, RSV), so that the Israelites established there a memorial to Jehovah to counteract idolatrous practices.

19. The tenth day of the first month. Abib (Ex 13:4) or Nisan (Neh 2:1), our March-April, 1407/6 B.C. They reached their camp just in time to select the Passover lamb (Ex 12:3) to be slain on the fourteenth day (cf. Josh 5:10), the providence of God arranging that exactly forty years after leaving the land of enslavement they should enter the land of promise.

23. As the Lord your God did to the Red Sea. These are the two crowning proofs of Jehovah's power and mercy in the history of the Israelite nation, never forgotten by the psalmists and prophets (Ps 66:6; 74:13,15; 114:3,5; Isa 50:2; Hab 3:8). 24. That all the peoples of the earth may know the hand of Jehovah, that it is mighty (ASV). This purpose was strikingly fulfilled as soon as the various peoples of the land of Canaan heard the news (5:1). They had probably relied on the swollen Jordan to act as a sure, if temporary, barrier. But when they learned that it had been completely dried up, their morale utterly collapsed before so incontestable a proof that the Jehovah of the invaders was an actual, living, mighty God.

E. Renewal of Circumcision and Passover Observance. 5:2-12. Circumcision and observance of the Passover marked the final stages in God's preparation of his chosen people for the Holy War. Because the inhabitants of Canaan were terror-stricken, Joshua could afford to let his warriors be immobilized a few days by circumcision, the prerequisite to the Passover feast (Ex 12:44,48).

2. Sharp knives. Literally, knives of flint, not of bronze; although stone cutting tools were no longer in common use. But the use of flint knives for this ritual seems to have been demanded (cf. Ex 4:25). Egyptian art depicts the survival of this custom, undoubtedly because of religious conservatism. Circumcise again . . . the second time. The command did not require the older men, born in Egypt, to undergo the operation again; rather, the men of Israel, as a whole, were now to return (shûb) to their former circumcised condition as a people in covenant relation with Jehovah. The second time may merely emphasize the word shûb, "again" (Keil); or it may indicate a general circumcising on some previous occasion, as before the Passover of Num 9:5, since a mixed multitude accompanied the camp (Jamieson in JFB). The people had not purposely neglected the rite since Sinai, but apparently God had prohibited its practice because the nation was under his judgment. The people had rebelled against Jehovah repeatedly, had practiced idolatry, and had refused to enter the land (Num 14:1-10) promised them in the Abrahamic covenant (Gen 15:18; 17:8); hence they were forbidden to place on their children the sign of the Abrahamic covenant, which in spirit and in reality they had broken.

9. The reproach of Egypt does not refer to the reproach or taunts heaped upon Israel by the Egyptians, nor to the misery the Israelites endured as slaves in Egypt, but to the suspension of the Abrahamic covenant agreement of which circumcision was the sign. The word ḥerpâ, "reproach," often refers to the condition of shame, disgrace (cf. Gen 34:14 for the disgrace of uncircumcision). Even though delivered from the land of Egypt and united with God by covenant at Sinai, nevertheless the Israelites abrogated the Abrahamic covenant (conditional upon faith in Jehovah) and the Mosaic covenant (conditional upon obedience to Jehovah) by their desire for the idolatrous Egyptian worship (Ex 32; Josh 24:14; cf. Ezk 20:5-9; 23:3,8; Acts 7:39-42) and pleasurable things of Egypt (Ex 16:3; Num 11:5,18; 14:2-10; 16:13). Recognizing their apostasy, Moses exhorted the Israelites to repent before Jehovah, employing the figure of circumcision (Deut 10:16). When by faith the people of Israel crossed into their promised land and showed their willingness to reaccept God's covenant terms by submitting to circumcision, then the shame of their idolatry and lustfulness stemming from Egypt was finally rolled away. Called Gilgal. A new signification of "rolling" was attached by Israel to the old name, which probably had meant "circle" (see notes on Josh 4:19–5:1).

10. Kept the passover. This is only the third recorded Passover; the second (Num 9:5) was held on the first anniversary of the institution. For many years the people had not been in covenant relation with God, and so could not keep the Passover (see Amos 5:25,26). 11. Old corn of the land. The yield or produce of the land, eaten in the form of their unleavened bread (Ex 12:14-20), and parched or roasted heads of barley (cf. Lev 2:14; Ruth 2:14), which were also unleavened food and easily prepared. Since barley was available from the harvest then in progress in the Jericho oasis, from that day the gift of manna entirely ceased (Ex 16:35).

II. Conquest of the Promised Land. 5:13–12:24.

A. Appearance of the Divine Commander-in-chief. 5:13–6:5. As Jehovah had spoke to Joshua to prepare him for the first great event – the passage of Jordan, so now He appeared to him to reassure and instruct him for the second great enterprise – the subjugation of Canaan. Recognizing the strategic necessity of the capture of Jericho to the Israelites (any retreat across Jordan was cut off), Joshua had gone to reconnoiter the bastion himself, perplexed because of its seeming impregnability (6:1).

13. A man . . . with his sword drawn. Not a mere vision, but an actual appearance of the preincarnate Son of God himself – a theophany (cf. Gen 18:33; 32:24-30; Ex 3:2-6). The Angel of Jehovah appeared in the character most adapted to the circumstances of his people: to Moses, as Israel's Saviour, suffering with his own (Ex 3; Isa 63:9); to Joshua, as Israel's Commander, leading his army with sword drawn, ready to judge Canaan. As Wm. G. Blaikie comments (Exp B): "The Captain of the Lord's host had drawn His sword from its scabbard to show that the judgment of that wicked people was to slumber no more."

14. One may translate the Man's reply: Nay, for it is I; as General-of-the-Army-of-Jehovah have I now come. In fulfillment of his promise to Moses (Ex 33:14), God manifested his presence with Israel not as a mere ally but as their leader. It was his war, for the iniquity of the Amorites was now full (Gen 15:16; Deut 9:5; 18:12); and the Israelites were only a division of his great army, along with his angels (Ps 148:2) and forces of nature (Josh 10:11-14; Jud 5:20). Thus Joshua immediately perceived he was but the Captain's servant. The account of the conquest (Josh 6–11) makes clear that Joshua's military strategy was divinely directed. There were three campaigns in the conquest. Brought by the Lord against the center of the land, Israel first captured Jericho and Ai, thus securing the passes to the Central Ridge and driving a wedge between the northern and southern sections of Canaan. The second campaign in the south then conquered the Amorite coalition, and the third, the northern confederacy. 15. The place whereon thou standest is holy. Compare Ex 3:5. This spot in defiled Canaan was sanctified by the presence of the holy God.

6:1. Straitly shut up. The Hebrew expresses the fact that the defenders had shut the gate, and Jericho was shut in, beleaguered by the Israelites. This verse is a parenthesis introduced to explain the immediate situation of Jericho to the reader, followed by God's orders to Joshua (6:2-5). 2. I have given into thine hand Jericho. Jehovah, Joshua's Commander, promised the divine, supernatural destruction of Jericho as the earnest of the capture of all Canaan. Joshua therefore no longer needed to devise any plan to take Jericho.

3. Ye shall compass. The execution of this command in absolute silence, but for the trumpets (6:8), could not but produce ridicule among the enemy, and so would be a discipline of humiliation for the Israelites. The brilliance of faith on the part of Joshua, priests, and people shone for a week at its brightest in all of Israel's history (cf. Heb 11:30). 4. Seven trumpets of rams' horns. Literally, seven jubilee trumpets. Hebrew yôbēl ("ram's horn"), of uncertain derivation, is first used in Ex 19:13, even before the references to the year of jubilee (Lev 25:8-54; 27:17-24; Num 36:4); it seems to have a religio-ceremonial significance, announcing the arrival of Jehovah as King, whether to his people to complete his covenant or proclaim release and liberty, or to his enemies to judge and smite them. The "trump of God" (I Thess 4:16) will have this dual purpose in announcing Christ's second advent. Seven priests bearing seven trumpets for seven days signified that the judgment would be complete.

B. The Central Campaign. 6:6–8:29.

First Jericho in the Jordan Valley, then Ai on the Central Ridge had to be taken.

1) Capture of Jericho. 6:6-27. The archaeological evidence from Jericho (Tell es-Sultan) is not clear concerning the capture of this stronghold by Joshua. Miss Kathleen Kenyon's expedition (1952–1958) demonstrated that the parallel fortification walls (built of mud bricks and fallen outwards) which John Garstang excavated (1930–1936) and dated to the Late Bronze Age (1500–1200 B.C.), actually belonged to a time much earlier than the days of Joshua. In tombs west of the town, however, Garstang discovered 320 Late Bronze Age objects, including two scarab seals of Amenhotep III (1410–1372 B.C.), as well as Late Bronze potsherds in the fosse and on the mound, especially in debris underlying the isolated "Middle Building" (which Garstang attributed to Eglon; see Jud 3:12-30). Thus he confirmed occupation of the site in Joshua's day. Garstang and Kenyon (who did find a small Late Bronze floor level with an oven and juglet)would essentially agree that the previous city, inhabited by the Hyksos, was destroyed and burned around 1560 B.C. Then the mound lay vacant for about 150 years. Since most of the typically fifteenth century forms of pottery are lacking, reoccupation must have taken place about 1410. Probably the Late Bronze Age Canaanites reused the Hyksos rampart, upon which they built their own mud brick wall. The reason not more Late Bronze pottery has been found may be that the city was reoccupied such a short time before its destruction in 1407. In addition, one must take into account the completeness of the destruction (Josh 6:21,24) and the exposure of most of this stratum to erosion for the following five centuries, until Hiel rebuilt Jericho (I Kgs 16:34).

In this portion we see the triumph of faith. Israel was doing God's work in his way, no matter how foolish the marching must have seemed (cf. I Cor 1:25).

8. The ark of the covenant of the Lord followed them. Mentioned nine times in 6:6-13, the ark surely symbolized to Israel that Jehovah was with them and leading them in this strange maneuver. 15. On that day they compassed the city seven times. One can easily walk around the nine-acre mound in fifteen or twenty minutes.

17. Accursed. Ḥērem, LXX anathema, translated in 6:21 "utterly destroyed." Ḥērem was anything irrevocably devoted to one's God, because it was hostile to theocracy by its having been sacred to or associated with another deity (Deut 7:25,26; 20:17,18; Moabite Stone, line 17). To prevent its being put to common use, the object (at times) or person (always) was banned and doomed to destruction (Ex 22:20; Lev 27:29; Deut 13:15-17; I Sam 15:3, 21) by divine sentence pronounced by God's duly appointed leader. Certain possessions (Lev 27:21,28) or captured objects (Josh 6:19), however, could be banned and dedicated to sacred use in the sanctuary or by the priests (Num 18:14; Ezk 44:29). In the case of Jericho alone, the city with all its contents was completely devoted to Jehovah (nothing could be considered as booty for the people; but cf. Deut 2:35; Josh 8:27; 11:14) as the first fruits of the land, for a sign that they would receive all Canaan from him. Thus the destruction was not due to lust for blood. 18. Translate: But ye, keep altogether from the devoted portion, lest ye covet (so the LXX and 7:21) and take some of the devoted portion, and place the camp of Israel in the devoted status, and (thus) bring trouble upon it.

20. The wall fell down flat. Literally, the wall fell in its place; i.e., it collapsed – except for the portion by Rahab's house. Whether an earthquake was used by God or not, it was a miracle of timing and completeness.

22-25. Joshua acted honorably in accordance with the agreement made by the spies with Rahab (2:12-21). Rahab and her kindred had to be placed outside the Israelite camp in order that they, as heathen, might be cleansed from the defilement of their idolatries and the men might be circumcised. The required time may have been seven days (Num 31:19).

26. The curse was a prohibition against refortifying Jericho, not against inhabiting the site (cf. Josh 18:21; Jud 3:13; II Sam 10:5). It was fulfilled during the reign of Ahab, when Hiel rebuilt the walls at the cost of (not in) his two sons (I Kgs 16:34).

2) Repulse at Ai Because of Achan's Sin. 7:1-26. Ai stood about two miles east of Bethel, at the eastern edge of the Central Ridge, close to Beth-aven (7:2). French excavations (1933–1935) at et-Tell, the site usually identified with Ai, revealed a gap (c. 2000–1200

B.C.) in its occupation, showing that et-Tell was not occupied when Joshua entered Canaan. Seemingly the evidence from et-Tell favors its being identified as Beth-aven, house of idolatry, for pagan temples stood on its summit in the third millennium; and a small settlement existed there again up to the time of Saul, perhaps beginning in the fourteenth century by the time of the author of Joshua (cf. 18:12; I Sam 13:5; 14:23). Later, Hosea applied the name Beth-aven to nearby Bethel (Hos 4:15; 5:8; 10:5). Probably et-Tell is not to be identified with Ai. The long-denuded ruins of Ai may well lie under the present village of Deir Dibwan immediately southeast of et-Tell. Aiath (Isa 10:28) sprang up later, at Khirbet Haiyan, less than a mile south of Deir Dibwan, and was the post-Exilic Ai or (Aramaic) Aija (Ezr 2:28; Neh 7:32; 11:31). Whatever its exact location, in Joshua's day Ai was a fortified city, distinct from Bethel, and having its own king. It was a place of strategic importance, commanding the main route from Gilgal to the region of Bethel.

This chapter reveals how the faith of a body of God's people is undermined and disabled by the spreading effects of secret compromise on the part of a single member. Sin lurks in the very shadow of faith's victory; like leaven, it soon contaminates the whole. Also, Joshua is exhibited as the spiritual guide who drew forth, with mingled sweetness and severity, the sinner's confession (Josh 7:19,20), so that the nation might repudiate the sin and be delivered from the anathema now upon it.

1. Committed a trespass in the accursed thing. Literally, committed a breach of faith in regard to the devoted portion, for this was a crime against the covenant law. One transgressor against the ḥērem (curse) on Jericho brought the guilt and punishment of such treachery upon the whole nation. This verse anticipates the narrative in order to give the reason for the reverse.

2. Viewed. Spied out. The spies erred in estimating the size of Ai's population (8:25; see comment on 2:23,24). 5. Shebarim. The broken places (i.e., defiles) in the cliffs, associated with the next gorge north of the famous one at Michmash (I Sam 14:4,5). Thirty-six Israelite fighting men were slain as they were ignominiously routed and tried in panic to reach the descending trail on the south rim of the wadi.

6-9. As a great general, Joshua was despondent about such loss of morale near the beginning of the war. Momentarily forgetting his own commission (1:5), he feared that God had forsaken Israel. Most of all, he feared the revival of hope among the Canaanites and the dishonoring of God's character (cf. 4:24; Num 14:15,16; Deut 9:28). 10-15. Jehovah replied that the reverse was owing not to His unfaithfulness but to Israel's sin (cf. Isa 59:1,2). He revealed the reality or perversity of sin (Josh 7:10,11), its result or defeat (7:12), and its remedy or removal (7:13,14).

16-18. The offender, Achan, was identified by the sacred ritual of drawing lots, perhaps inscribed potsherds, from a jar (cf. I Sam 10:20-24; 14:41,42; Prov 16:33). This was the method to be used in apportioning the land among the tribes (Num 26:55). 19. Give . . . glory. By means of this solemn adjuration to tell the truth before God, Joshua commanded Achan to make full confession (cf. Jn 9:24). Make confession. Literally, render praise; through a confession Achan was to give the omniscient Jehovah praise for bringing the secret to light and to acknowledge that the judgment was just.

21. A goodly Babylonish garment. Literally, one beautiful mantle of Shinar, a robe from North Syria (cf. Amarna Letter No. 35, line 49) probably woven with gold threads, thus devoted to God's treasury. Two hundred shekels of silver. Lumps or rings of silver, measured by weighing. A wedge of gold. A "tongue" or ingot of gold, about ten inches long, one inch wide, and one-half inch thick, such as Macalister unearthed at Gezer. A similar wedge is indicated in Amarna Letter No. 29, line 39.

24-26. Achan, in stealing devoted objects, placed himself in the devoted status, i.e., under the doom of destruction. Whoever touches ḥērem becomes ḥērem and thus devoted to death (cf. I Kgs 20:42). Achan's entire household, including his children, was cursed with him (cf. Deut 13:12-17). Living under the same tent, they could not but be accomplices. Infamous persons were often buried under a pile of stones (Josh 8:29; II Sam 18:17). The valley of Achor (Troubling, Josh 7:25), on the northern boundary of Judah (15:7), is probably Wadi Qelt, a mile south of Jericho.

3) Second Attack and the Burning of Ai. 8:1-29. As soon as Israel's crime had been judged by Achan's death, the Lord restored His favor and Israel's faith was re-empowered. 1,2. Now God was ready to lead Joshua, for he was now willing to listen to His plan.

3-9. The men of the first ambush were sent by night to take a position back of some knoll behind the city on its west and be ready to rush into the city to set it on fire when the main army would draw out the defenders. The number, thirty thousand mighty men of valour (8:3), seems impossibly large for an ambush that was to hide so near the city. R.E.D. Clark has suggested that in certain passages (e.g., I Chr 12:23-27; II Chr 13:3,17; 17:14-19) the Hebrew word 'elep, translated thousand, has the meaning of "chief," "officer," a synonym for the mighty men of valour ("The Large Numbers of the Old Testament," Victoria Institute paper for May, 1955). Thus Joshua would have selected thirty officers or chief warriors, each a valiant hero, to go on this commando-like mission.

10-17. Remaining that night in Gilgal, Joshua mustered (wayyipqōd, "numbered") the army early next morning and advanced with the men the thirteen to fifteen miles up to Ai (climb of 3,200 feet). He had the main army encamp in plain view across a valley north of Ai. Then he sent another ambush of about 5,000 men (here a full detachment, not specified as "mighty men of valour") to cut off any reinforcements for Ai that might come from Bethel. (Josh 8:17 and 12:16 b indicate that these 5,000 were kept busy killing Bethelites. The fighting potential of Bethel was thus neutralized, making it unnecessary for Israel to capture that city until much later; Jud 1:22-26.) Joshua spent the night in the valley at the forward outpost to be ready to lead the assault in the morning.

14. At a time appointed, before the plain. Better, to the appointed place in the direction of the Arabah (Jordan Valley), where the men of Ai had successfully routed the Israelites previously. 18. Stretch out the spear. Joshua's signaling weapon actually was his scimitar (kîdôn), the large blade more readily reflecting the gleaming sun to the thirty men hidden in ambush.

23,29. The king of Ai, as a greater criminal, was reserved for ignominious execution and burial under the direct supervision of his enemy's leader. For the divine command regarding the suspending or impaling of a criminal's body on a stake – a widely-practiced ancient custom – see Deut 21:22,23.

C. Establishment of Israel's Covenant as the Law of the Land. 8:30-35. Instead of capitalizing on the victory at Ai, Joshua did the militarily foolish thing – he stopped to make a divinely ordered pilgrimage (Deut 11:26-30; 27:2-13). God would protect them while the whole nation worshiped in the area so sacred to the patriarchs. Either Joshua led the people north some twenty miles from Bethel to Shechem, along the approximate route of the present Jerusalem – Nablus road, through wooded mountains (cf. Josh 17:18) almost devoid of ancient sites, except for Shiloh, which Israel later founded; or, more likely, since the women and children accompanied the army, he took the easier route from Gilgal up the Jordan Valley and Wadi Far'a opposite the Jabbok.

To reach the huge natural amphitheater formed by large curved bays, one on the side of each mountain, facing each other, the Israelites had to pass the fortress of Shechem guarding the entrance to the valley, less than a mile to the east. This city must have been in friendly hands (see 20:7; 24:1). Several of the Amarna Letters declare that around 1380 B.C. Lab'ayu, the prince of Shechem, was in league with the invading 'Apiru. In this case the Israelite Hebrews may be referred to under the stigma of 'Apiru. The reason for such friendship between Shechemites and Israelites may be that residing in Shechem were some descendants of Jacob who had left Egypt in small numbers before the oppression (e.g., I Chr 7:24, where a daughter or granddaughter of Ephraim returned to Canaan to build Beth-horon generations before Joshua's day).

30. In mount Ebal. At the foot of this landmark in the center of Canaan. Ebal, the higher of the two hills (3,085 feet high), is designated rather than Gerizim (2,890 feet high). Even though Moses had first given orders (in Deut 27:2-4,8) about inscribing the Law on great plastered stones, and then orders about sacrificing on an altar of unhewn stones (Deut 27:5-7; cf. Ex 20:25), the religious ceremony would logically have started with the sacrifices (cf. Ex 24:4-8), necessary because the covenant was being established for the first time in Canaan.

32. Upon the stones. Not those of the altar but large pillars, such as the seven-foot-high stele of the famous Code of Hammurabi, with its 3,654 lines of text. According to Deut 27:2-4,8, these stones were to be plastered to receive the inscription. The Egyptians often whitewashed stone before writing or painting on it in black ink. Several stelae, about eight feet tall and whitewashed, were found at Byblos in conjunction with a temple dated about 200 B.C. We can only speculate about how much of the Mosaic law was inscribed upon the plastered stones, very possibly Deut 5–26, however. The Behistun Rock inscriptions are about three times as long as Deuteronomy.

33-35. With the officials standing around the ark near the altar, halfway between the mountains and the tribes on the slopes, according to Deut 27:11-26, Joshua had the Law proclaimed to the nation. It was in keeping with the divine purpose for the conquest of Canaan that the Law should be set up in the heart of the country to be thenceforward the law of the land, and that Israel should renew her covenant vows to Jehovah her God. See Ex 24:4,7; II Kgs 23:2; Neh 8,9 for similar public readings of the Law. See comments on Joshua 24.

D. The Southern Campaign. 9:1–10:43. After returning to Israelite headquarters at Gilgal in the Jordan Valley, Joshua was soon called upon to fight against the Amorite city-states which controlled South Canaan. While the kings of 9:1,2 may unanimously have planned to unite, they never succeeded in joining hands to oppose the invading Israelites. The defection of the Gibeonites may explain the collapse of a united effort, so that only five cities in the south and a large confederacy in the north did battle with Joshua.

1) Treaty with the Gibeonite Tetrapolis. 9:1-27. Faith is endangered when God's people fail to refer every decision to him (cf. 9:14). Today, Christians need to be aware of the stratagems of our arch-deceiver (II Cor 2:11).

3. Gibeon. Probably the modern el-Jib (six miles north-northwest of Jerusalem, six and one-half miles southwest of Ai), this large town was the head of an independent republic ruled by elders rather than by a king (9:11; 10:2). In 9:7 its inhabitants are called "Hivites"; here, and in Gen 34:2, the LXX reads, "Horites," who may be identified with the Hurrians. These were a dominant ethnic element in the Near East (c. 2300–1200), spreading so rapidly in Canaan in the sixteenth and fifteenth centuries that one of the Egyptian names for Palestine was Huru.

a) Deception of the Gibeonites (vv. 4-15). Craftily pretending to be envoys of a far-off country, as if from across the Jordan (for they claimed to have known about Sihon and Og, but did not mention Jericho and Ai. See 9:10), a group of Gibeonites perpetrated their hoax upon Joshua by means of their old sacks and mended wineskins, patched sandals and threadbare clothing, and dry, crumbled bread. God allowed the Israelites to let people at a considerable distance submit and pay tribute to them, but he ordered them to wipe out completely cities belonging to the peoples of Canaan (Deut 20:10-18). Convinced when they ate of the Gibeonites' stale provisions (which very act of eating, by ancient Oriental custom, established a more or less enduring friendly relationship), the leaders of the congregation made a formal covenant-treaty (bᵉrît) with them. "The Israelites were guilty of excessive credulity and culpable negligence, in not asking by the high priest's Urim and Thummim the mind of God, before entering into the alliance" (Jamieson in JFB; cf. Num 27:21).

b) Discovery of the Stratagem (vv. 16-21). Three days later, when the Israelites somehow heard that their new vassals dwelt in their vicinity, they set out at a normal pace to deal with the deceivers. Besides Gibeon, their towns were Chephirah (Tell Kefireh, four and one-half miles west-southwest of el-Jib, less than two miles north of Abu Ghosh), Beeroth (probably el-Bîreh, a town today on the Jerusalem – Nablus road, four and one-half miles north-northeast of el-Jib, and Kirjath-jearim (Tell el-Azhar, with Late Bronze sherds, immediately west of Abu Ghosh, a town five miles southwest of el-Jib). Beeroth was only three miles west of Ai, in sight of the Israelites as they passed by Bethel! Because the covenant was ratified in the holy name of Jehovah, it was sacred; hence the leaders dared not break their treaty oath and bring God's wrath upon themselves (cf. Ezk 17:12-19). God judged Israel in the days of David for Saul's disregard of this oath (II Sam 21:1-6).

22-27. The reason for the decision of the princes in 9:21 is here given in detail: For Joshua had called for them . . . 23. There shall none of you be freed from being bondmen. Literally, There shall not be cut off from you a slave. You will never cease to be or to furnish slaves, to act as wood-choppers and water-carriers for the Tabernacle (Deut 29:11). Joshua not improperly called this structure the house of my God; it was termed "temple" (hêkal) in Eli's time (Sam 1:9). Actually, it was Joshua's curse, not God's. Because they were assigned to perpetual service in God's house, He blessed them. For the protection of Gibeon the Lord performed a great miracle (Josh 10:10-14), and in later years the Tabernacle was pitched there (II Chr 1:3). For sixty-seven years or more God let the ark of the covenant remain at Kirjath-jearim (I Sam 7:1,2; II Sam 6:2,3). Because Joshua made (from nātan, "to give") them to be hewers of wood, etc. (Josh 9:27), later they were called the Nethinim (ones given to the Temple service; I Chr 9:2; Ezr 2:43,58; 8:20) and were brought back from the Exile along with the priests and Levites by God's providential hand.

2) Destruction of the Amorite Coalition. 10:1-43. The king of Jerusalem, closest to the Gibeonite tetrapolis, assumed leadership in gathering allies to punish the Hivite cities for their defection and to prevent the Israelites from occupying them.

1. Adoni-zedek is nearly synonymous with Melchizedek (Gen 14:18), both fairly common names or titles of the Jebusite kings. The Jebusites (Josh 15:63) were a racial mixture of Amorites, Hittites (i.e., non-Indo-European Hattians), and Hurrians, as Ezk 16:3 and the name Araunah (Hurrian word for "the king") in II Sam 24:18,23 indicate. Adoni-zedek must have been a predecessor of Abdi-heba, the ruler of Jerusalem in the Amarna Letters. Meredith Kline has argued clearly (in his articles on the Habiru in WTR, XIX, XX) that in general the Habiru ('Apiru) mercenaries with their chariots, filtering in from Syria to aid the Canaanite kings revolting from Egypt, cannot have been identified with nor have included (except possibly around Shechem) the Israelites invading en masse from Trans-Jordan to destroy the Canaanites and build a nation.

According to the Amarna Letters, by 1375 B.C. there were only four main independent city-states in southern Palestine – Jerusalem, Shuwardata, Gezer, and Lachish (the latter two both hostile to Jerusalem). Jarmuth and Eglon were governed by Egyptian officials. In Joshua's time, however, counting Jericho, Ai, Bethel, Gibeon, and the cities of the other South Canaanite kings of Josh 12:9-16, there were nearly twenty city-states. But before the Amarna period Israel had gobbled up many of these and left the others suspicious of one another. 3. Hebron. The ancient town evidently was on Jebel er-Rumeidi, just west of the present city, nineteen miles south of Jerusalem. Jarmuth. Khirbet Yarmûk, sixteen miles west-southwest of Jerusalem. Lachish. Tell ed-Duweir, twenty-seven miles southwest of Jerusalem. Eglon. Perhaps Tell el-Ḥesi, over seven miles west of Lachish.

a) The Battle of the Unique Day (vv. 6-21). The historical importance of this victory has been compared with that of the Battle of Marathon (Blaikie). When the Gibeonites appealed urgently for help, the Israelites were covenant-bound (see comment on 24:1) to come to their defense. Encouraged by the Lord (10:8; cf. 1:5), Joshua led a forced moonlight march from Gilgal of at least twenty-five miles, perhaps up the Jericho-Jerusalem route, in order to cut off retreat to this the nearest of the Amorite strongholds (Maunder, in ISBE). He was able to surprise the besieging Amorites at daybreak and to slaughter them from Gibeon northwestward via Beth-horon to the Shephelah. The Amorites kept fleeing southwestward along the valleys separating the foothills from the Central Ridge, to Azekah (Tell ez-Zakarîyeh, which guards the Valley of Elah, about three miles west of Jarmuth) and Makkedah (possibly Khirbet el-Ḥeishum, two miles northwest of Jarmuth), as they tried in vain to reach Jarmuth (10:3), about twenty miles on foot from Gibeon.

The Lord increased the panic (10:10) by sending a storm of deadly hailstones upon the Amorites as they were fleeing the two miles down the sloping trail along the ridge between Beth-horon the Upper (alt. 2,022 feet) and Beth-horon the Lower (1,210 feet). Verses 12-14 do not describe an incident subsequent to the events of verses 10,11; rather, they are part of an extract (10:12-15) from the Book of Jashar introduced to render more vivid the circumstances behind God's raining down the hail. Similar to the Book of the Wars of Jehovah (Num 21:14-18), the Book of Jashar was a collection of songs, interspersed with explanatory historical notices, in praise of the heroes of Israel; the songs must have been progressively accumulated (cf. II Sam 1:18).

The usual interpretation of the miracle described herein is that God prolonged the daylight about a whole day (v. 13) to enable the Israelites to complete their pursuit of the enemy. However, if the sunlight was extended for ten, twelve, or more hours, so that the entire ancient Near East could have observed the phenomenon – a more spectacular miracle than the crossings of the Red Sea and the Jordan River – then it seems strange that only one other reference to the event (Hab 3:11) is to be found in the OT. God does not display his miraculous powers recklessly; instead he unleashes his strength only in sufficient measure to achieve his desired goal, only in sight of those who thus can be taught to recognize him if they will. What Joshua deemed necessary for his pursuing troops, already tired from their all-night climb, was relief from the merciless sun in the cloudless summer sky. (Up to this episode the conquest of Canaan moved so rapidly, after Passover at Gilgal, that only a few months need have elapsed.) For the sunshine to cease in the dry season would have been miracle enough. God answered above all that Joshua could ask or think by sending not only the desired shade to refresh His army but also a devastating hailstorm to crush and delay His enemies. Any storm from grain harvest on through the summer months was considered a judgment from God (see I Sam 12:17).

The true explanation of this miracle, told in ancient, Oriental, poetic style, tends to confirm the idea that Joshua was looking for relief from the sun. The word dôm, translated stand thou still (v. 12b), means basically "be dumb, silent, or still"; and then "rest" or "cease" from usual activity, as in Job 30:27; 31:34; Ps 35:15; 37:7; Lam 2:18. Robert Dick Wilson demonstrated that the root dm in Babylonian cuneiform astronomical texts meant "to be darkened." Thus the sun is spoken of as "dumb" when not shining, as in Dante's Inferno, line 60; the "words" or "speech" of the sun is its world-wide shining, its universal heat (Ps 19:2-6). Likewise the synonym 'āmad, translated stayed (v. 13a) and stood still (v. 13b) frequently has the sense of "cease" (Gen 30:9; II Kgs 4:6; Jon 1:15). Joshua 10:12-14 may then be translated: "Now Joshua spoke to Jehovah, in the day that Jehovah gave the Amorites over to the sons of Israel; and he said before the eyes of Israel,

'O sun, be dumb at Gibeon, and thou moon, in the Valley of Ajalon.'
And the sun was dumb and the moon ceased (shining), until the nation took vengeance on its enemies—
Is it not written in the Book of Jashar –
For the sun ceased (shining) in the midst of the sky, and (i.e., although) it did not hasten to set about a whole day.
And there was no day like that before it or after it,
that Jehovah hearkened to the voice of a man;
for Jehovah was fighting for Israel."

Evidently Joshua made his request when the sun was rising over Gibeon to his east and the moon was setting in the Valley of Ajalon (Wadi Selman, which emerges from the mountains a mile south of Lower Beth-horon) before they had pursued as far as Upper Beth-horon. Thus he prayed prior to the hailstorm.

15. Unless, following the LXX, we omit this verse entirely, it must be the conclusion of the condensed account from the Book of Jashar. For according to the main account, Joshua made camp at Makkedah (10:21) and did not return to Gilgal until he had finished this campaign (10:43).

b) The Five Kings Hanged (vv. 22-27). Probably it was on the day after the long one that Joshua had the kings dragged from the cave where they had hidden (10:16-27). 24. Put your feet upon the necks. The ancient symbol of complete subjugation, pictured often on the monuments of the kings of Egypt and Assyria, here to be acted out by Joshua's field commanders (cf. I Kgs 5:3; Ps 8:6; 18:38-40; Isa 49:23).

c) The Conquest of Southern Palestine (vv. 28-43). At this stage Joshua's method of warfare seems to have been a series of lightning-like raids against key Canaanite cities, with the purpose of destroying the fighting ability of the inhabitants, not necessarily of actually capturing and occupying the cities attacked (10:19,20). When the king of Gezer and his troops were destroyed (10:33; 12:12), Joshua did not go against that city (16:10). The same was true of Bethel (see comment on 8:10-17). At the end of the campaign he returned with his entire army to Gilgal (10:

43), leaving no garrisons; and so Hebron and Debir had to be recaptured later (15: 13-17). Therefore Yehezkel Kaufmann, of the Hebrew University, has termed Joshua's campaigns "wars of destruction and extermination, not of occupation by immediate settlement" (Biblical Account of Conquest of Palestine, p. 86).

Since Joshua did not spend enough time at any one city to employ siege tactics (10:31-35) – although concerning sieges Moses had instructed Israel (Deut 20:10-20)—it seems probable that he did not attempt to storm the city walls and certainly not the inner citadels. The mighty army of Thutmose III finally captured Megiddo only after a siege of seven months. There is no report of further divine intervention as at Jericho, whose defenses Israel could not have hoped to destroy by frontal attack. Therefore Joshua must have concentrated on the surrounding dependent towns—all the cities thereof (Josh 10:37,39), and the residential section of each main city below and outside of the fortifications. To get an opportunity to kill the king and defenders, Joshua no doubt depended on their making a sortie, as at Ai; or he may have expected their previous battle losses and broken morale to make their resistance negligible. This theory of Joshua's military tactics seems to be confirmed by 11:13, "But none of the cities that stood on their mounds (tēl) did Israel burn, except Hazor only." Hence most of these cities could have been quickly resettled by Canaanites, perhaps even by those who survived in the citadel of each town; later, the separate tribes had to reduce them one by one during the period of the Judges (cf. Jud 1).

31. Lachish. The Late Bronze Age city on Tell ed-Duweir was burned about 1230 B.C., perhaps by Pharaoh Merneptah, but certainly not by Joshua (cf. 11:13). The end, however, of the earliest of three successive shrines built in an earlier fosse outside the city wall may give evidence of Joshua's raid. This "Temple I" belonged to the fifteenth century. 38. Debir. Also named Kirjath-sepher (15:15) and Kirjath-sannah (15:49). Kyle and Albright located Debir at Tell Beit Mirsim, but archaeological evidence at that site does not harmonize with the fifteenth century date of the Exodus. J. Simons suggests instead Khirbet Terrameh (five miles southwest of Hebron) with neighboring springs at noticeably different altitudes, as "the upper and lower springs" of 15:19 (The Geographical and Topographical Texts of the Old Testament, p. 282).

40. Read: So Joshua smote the whole land, the mountain ridge and the Negeb and the Shephelah and the steep slopes . . . The Negeb is the desert region of South Palestine; the Shephelah is the foothills between the Central Ridge and the Philistine Plain; the steep slopes (hā'ăshēdôt) are those descending from the Central Ridge to the Dead Sea. 41. Goshen. A town (15:51) in the southernmost mountains of Judah, used along with Gibeon to delineate the south-north extent of this campaign.

E. The Northern Campaign. 11:1-15. Reports of the Israelite victories in the south alarmed the North Canaanite kings. Summoned by Jabin, king of Hazor (see 11:10b), they joined forces and encamped at the waters of Merom. Meanwhile Joshua and the Israelite soldiers were marching unopposed up the lonely west side of the Jordan Valley. Beth-shean (17:16) may have had only a garrison at this time (Amarna Letter No. 289). Other towns, farther north, allied with Jabin were left undefended. Thus Joshua's rapier-like thrust caught the confederates completely off guard.

1. Jabin (the intelligent one). Another king bearing the same dynastic name or hereditary title ruled Hazor in the days of Deborah and Barak (Jud 4:2). It is rash to assert that the two stories are merely varying accounts of the same event. Hazor (Tell el-Qedah, nearly five miles southwest of Lake Huleh) in the Late Bronze Age covered over 170 acres and had a probable population of 40,000. It was by far the largest and most famous city of that time in Palestine. Its last phase has been dated archaeologically to the thirteenth century B.C.; the destruction discovered by the excavators must be that alluded to in Jud 4:24. Since the ruins reveal continuous Canaanite occupation from the twentieth century through the thirteenth, Canaanites must have rebuilt the city shortly after Joshua burned it (Josh 11:11). Madon. Qarn Hattin (the horns of Hattin) on the heights west of Tiberias. Shimron. Or Shim'on (so the LXX, Amarna Letter No. 255, and Egyptian ostraca), four miles west of Nazareth. Achshaph. Tell Keisan in the Plain of Acco.

2. Read: "And to the kings who were to the north in the hill country (i.e., Upper Galilee), and in the Arabah south of (or, near) Chinneroth (i.e., the Plain of Gennesaret, Mk 6:53), and in the Shephelah (i.e., the foothills between Samaria and Carmel, including Megiddo and Taanach; cf. Josh 11:16), and in the Hills-of-Dor region to the west (low dune-like coastal hills are prominent between Dor and Athlit" – Baly, pp. 24, 132). Chinneroth. Tell el-'Oreimeh, captured by Thutmose III, two miles southwest of Capernaum. 3. The Hivite under Hermon in the land of Mizpeh. Hurrian settlements at the western foot of Mount Hermon in the Valley of Lebanon (the southern part of the Lebanese Beqa', containing the Leontes River; cf. 11:17; Jud 3:3). The valley of Mizpeh (11:8) contains the uppermost headwaters of the Nahr el-Hasbani, a source of the Jordan. Mizpeh and Baal-gad (11:17) were side by side, about twenty-three miles east of Sidon.

5. The waters of Merom. Not Lake Huleh. The LXX has Marrōn. Very likely it was on the small plain by the copious spring between the modern towns of Meirôn and Safed, about six miles southwest of Hazor; a wadi from the spring flows nine miles southward into the Sea of Galilee at Chinneroth.

6. How graciously God encouraged Joshua to attack the seemingly invincible foe in His strength the next day! The Israelites may have bivouacked on the Plain of Gennesaret that night. God commanded them to hamstring the horses and burn the chariots of the Canaanites, lest Israel put confidence in superior military weapons rather than in him (cf. Deut 17:16; Ps 20:7; Isa 31:1). Furthermore, to employ such equipment would have required a professional army like the Maryannu class among the Canaanites (cf. I Sam 8:11,12). Later, worship of Assyrian deities in Jerusalem involved idolatrous horse-and-chariot rituals (II Kgs 23:11). 8. Great Zidon. The larger, mainland city of Sidon opposite the islets with the island-city of Little Sidon (cf. Taylor Prism of Sennacherib). Misrephoth-maim. Khirbet el-Mushreifeh, just south of the promontory known as "the ladder of Tyre." Thus the enemies fled northward, westward, and northeastward (see comment on 11:3).

11. With the edge of the sword. Literally, to the mouth of the sword, i.e., to the hilt. The short thrusting sword (hereb), the chief weapon of the Israelites, had a bronze blade ten or twelve inches in length protruding from a hilt often fashioned like a lion's head with open mouth (cf. Rev 19:15). The handle of Ehud's hereb had two mouths, with an over-all length of eighteen inches (Jud 3:16. See BASOR, No. 122, pp. 31ff.). Joshua's army also used the scimitars (Josh 8:18; see comment), bows and arrows (24:12), and undoubtedly slings with stone balls (Jud 20:16), thrusting spears or lances (Num 25:7,8), and hurling javelins (I Sam 18:10,11).

F. Summary of the Conquest. 11:16-23. "The battles of Beth-horon and Merom were decisive, and the power of the Canaanites to resist the invaders was shattered. All organized resistance was broken And the land rested from war (v. 23) in the sense that no more pitched battles were required" (Blair, NBC, p. 232). But these battles, plus the mopping-up operations or guerrilla fighting, took "a long time" (11:18), about seven years, according to 14:7,10. Courage and perseverance were both essential in possessing all the land (cf. 13:1; 23:5-13), in capturing the isolated strongholds (cf. 15:63; 17:12,16-18; Jud 1). This wearisome activity became the oft neglected responsibility of the individual tribes.

16. The mountain of Israel. The highest mountain in all Canaan (hence, in all Israel) is 3,963 feet high. It is Jebel Jermaq, just west of Meiron. This term, therefore, is not necessarily evidence of Joshua's having been written during the divided monarchy.

17. Mount Halak, that goeth up to Seir. Jebel Halaq (the bald mountain), the ridge up which the Maaleh-acrabbim (Ascent of the Scorpions, "Scorpion Pass"; 15:3; Num 34:4) zigzagged from Wadi Fiqreh, twenty-three miles southeast of Beersheba. Seir, the homeland of the Edomites before the monarchy, was in the Central Negeb, west of the Arabah, between Kadesh-barnea and Scorpion Pass (see Josh 15:1,21). Thus Israel had to go southward from Kadesh-barnea and Mount Hor to Ezion-geber in order to circumvent Seir, before marching northward up the Arabah toward Moab (Num 21:4; Deut 2:1-4,8). 20. Harden their hearts. An expression revealing the sovereign working of God in confirming the hearts of unrepentant men in their obstinacy before judging them (cf. Ex 4:21; 7:13,14; 9:12; 14:17; Isa 6:10; Jn 12:40; II Thess 2:10-12).

21,22. The Anakim. Joshua nearly exterminated these people, who were either a branch of a race of giants ('Ānāqim, "long-necked ones," i.e., tall), or immigrants from Anaku, a land in the Aegean area mentioned in a cuneiform tablet from Asshur. Possibly the Anakim are mentioned in an Egyptian execration text (ANET, p. 328). They inhabited southern Canaan, especially Hebron (Deut 2:10, 11,20,21; Josh 14:12,15; 15:13,14). Only in Gaza, Gath, and Ashdod did some remain, the ancestors of Goliath, et al. (II Sam 21:16-22). Perhaps they are specially mentioned here because they were the men who had terrified the spies of Israel over forty years before (Num 13:22-33).

G. Appendix: Catalogue of the Defeated Kings. 12:1-24.

1) Those East of the Jordan. 12:1-6. The territories of Sihon and Og, conquered under Moses, are delineated. See Num 21; Deut 2:24–3:17.

2) Those West of the Jordan. 12:7-24. The thirty-one kings conquered by Joshua either on his three campaigns, or in subsequent isolated battles, were autonomous princes of city-states with only local authority. The Amarna Letters written by such petty rulers to the Pharaohs of Egypt about 1400–1360 B.C. also reveal numerous city-states in Syria and Palestine. It is not claimed that Israel occupied the cities of all these kings. The topographical divisions of 12:7,8 are those of 10:40; 11:16,17.

3) Kings in Southern Canaan. 12:9-16.

4) Kings in Northern Canaan. 12:17-24. Tappuah (v. 17 a) is more likely the town named in 16:8; 17:7,8, at the site of Jiljuliyeh, three and one-half miles north of Antipatris by Wadi Kanah, than the Tappuah of 15:34, probably Beit-Nettif east of Azekah. Hepher (v. 17 b) may be et-Tayibeh, about ten miles west of Samaria, on the Via Maris, the Mediterranean Trunk Road used so often by the Egyptian military expeditions. The route ran along the eastern edge of the Plain of Sharon, which in those days was swampy and heavily wooded. Aphek (v. 18 a; I Sam 4:1; 29:1) is Ras el-'Ain (Antipatris; see Acts 23:31), nine miles east of Joppa, at the headwaters of the River Yarkon (Josh 19:46), captured by Thutmose III and Amenhotep II. Lasharon (v. 18 b). In the LXX 12:18 reads, The king of Aphek of the Sharon; hence only one king is mentioned here. Shimron-meron (v. 20 a), according to the LXX, represents two kings —the king of Shimron (11:1) and the king of Marōn (11:5). Thus, with only one king indicated in 12:18 and three in 12:20, the full number of thirty-one kings is maintained. The king of the nations of Gilgal (v. 23 b) is unintelligible as it stands. In the LXX we read, The king of the Goyim of Galil. This is most likely a reference to Harosheth-of-the-Gentiles (Goyim) of Jud 4:2, a city in the region of Galilee, probably inhabited by some of the Sea Peoples coming from the Aegean Sea area. Tirzah (v. 24) is most likely the early capital of the Northern Kingdom (I Kgs 14:17; 15:21,33; 16:6-23), provisionally located at Tell el-Far'ah, six miles northeast of Shechem. This king either heeded Jabin's call (Josh 11:1-3), or was attacked on Joshua's return march from Hazor, or was killed subsequently in an isolated battle.

III. Apportionment of the Promised Land. 13:1–22:34.

This large section of Joshua sets forth in geographical detail the assignment of land made to each tribe, with the boundaries of the tribe's future possessions and usually with an enumeration of the towns contained therein. As Kaufmann has argued, the distribution of the land was an act of national policy made by the tribes which conquered Canaan, begun while the Israelites were still in their base camp at Gilgal (op. cit., p. 25).

It is important to recognize that the tribes had not yet colonized their portions when these lists were drawn up. In actuality, the Danites did not permanently settle their appointed territory; Ephraim did not conquer or settle Gezer (16:3,10; 21:21); and the Benjamites never conquered or enjoyed sole occupation of Jerusalem, although this city was assigned to Benjamin (18:28). Furthermore, the fact that Ophrah and Ophni, towns belonging to Benjamin (18:23,24), were three to four miles north of the border in Ephraim, points to an early period before there was tribal friction. Thus the lists of the tribal territories cannot be lists of the cities and districts of the kingdoms of Judah and Israel either at the time of Josiah (so Alt, Noth, Mowinckel) or at the time of Jehoshaphat (so Cross, Wright, Albright, in regard to Josh 15:21-62; JBL, LXXV, Sept., 1956, 202-226). Many of the cities and their villages listed in these chapters were not conquered by the Israelites for centuries. And some of the town sites listed may then have been uninhabited by Canaanites and not settled by Israelites for a long time after the distribution of the land.

Reuben, Gad, and the half-tribe of Manasseh already had had their territories assigned to them by Moses in Trans-Jordan (Num 32:1-42; Josh 13:8-33). The return of their warriors after helping to conquer Canaan is described in chapter 22. In fulfillment of the tribal blessings pronounced by Jacob (Gen 49) and Moses (Deut 33), the main division of the Promised Land was between the tribes of Judah and Joseph; the divinely governed allocation made to the other tribes depended on this basic division.

The tribe of Judah was allotted territory in southern Canaan because with Judah was associated Caleb, who claimed Hebron for his inheritance (14:12-15). The tribe of Simeon later was given its share within Judah because "the part of the children of Judah was too much for them" (19:9). The descendants of Joseph –Ephraim and the other half-tribe of Manasseh–received central Canaan (Samaria), evidently because Shechem had been assigned to Joseph by Jacob (Gen 48:21,22; Josh 24:32). Shiloh, where the Tabernacle was stationed (18:1), was in Ephraim's territory, this strategic site in the hill country being chosen for its defensibility and its centrality for all the tribes.

Between Judah and Ephraim, land was later allotted to Benjamin (18:11-28), and, westward to the Mediterranean, to Dan (19:40-48). The remaining tribes–Zebulun, Issachar, Asher, and Naphtali – at the same time drew lots for territory north of Manasseh in the regions of Jezreel and Galilee (19:10-39). In addition to the tribal allotments, cities of refuge and cities for the Levites were assigned (20:1--21:42). The method of apportioning the land for the last seven tribes was by casting lots before the Lord (18:6; see comment on 7:16-18). The sections, with their borders, undoubtedly were predetermined to run along natural lines of defense by a special committee selected to describe the remaining land (18:4-9). The partitioning of the land was no simple task, but a complex one, that demanded careful direction and a considerable amount of time.

A. God's Command To Divide the Land. 13:1-7.

1. Joshua was old and stricken in years. Better, Joshua had aged and was advanced in years, for since he was nearly one hundred and ten years old in 23:1 (see 24:29), he must have been ninety or one hundred years old here. The apportioning, as well as the subjugation, of the land had been included in the commission to Joshua (1:6). Hence, his aging supplied a special reason for entering on the immediate discharge of that duty – namely, to allocate Canaan among the tribes of Israel, not only the parts already conquered but also those still to be subdued (Jamieson in JFB). Joshua had to be content to see the task of conquest the Lord had committed to him remain unfinished, in order that God might develop the energy and courage of each particular tribe. The peoples and areas still to be overcome are itemized (13:2-6).

2 b-4 a. Translate and punctuate: all the regions of the Philistines and of the Geshurites (from the Shihor, which is this side of Egypt, northward to the border of Ekron it is reckoned as Canaanite; there are five tyrants of the Philistines, those of Gaza, Ashdod, Ashkelon, Gath, and Ekron), and of the Avvim in the south; all the land of the Canaanites and the cities that belong to the Sidonians. Only here in Joshua are the Philistines mentioned; for this people from Crete ("Caphtor," Amos 9:7) did not invade Palestine in force until after 1200 B.C., according to Egyptian records. In Josh 11:22 it is the Anakim, not the Philistines, who inhabit the later Philistine cities of Gaza, Gath, and Ashdod. The Philistines are not listed in 12:8 among the inhabitants of the land. They were still confined to the coastal area of the Negeb (Ex 13:17), near the Shihor (Wadi el-Arish), in the same region where the Philistine forerunners were found in the Patriarchal period (Gen 21:32; 26:1). They were classed on an equality with the Geshurites (I Sam 27:8) and the Avvim (Deut 2:23). Their forerunners may well have been Minoan (Cretan) merchants, who were establishing trading colonies around the Mediterranean Sea as early as 2000 B.C. Philista is mentioned as a precinct in Crete on the Phaistos Disk, dated about 1450 B.C. (JNES, XVIII (1950, 224-227). In the light of the foregoing evidence, Josh 13:3 is perhaps an early scribal notation to inform us that the domain of the five Philistine lords (seren, Jud 16:5; I Sam 5:8) in Joshua's day still belonged to the Canaanites.

B. The Territory of the Trans-Jordanic Tribes. 13:8-33.

8. With whom. God's command to Joshua ends with 13:7; this verse literally begins, With him (i.e., with the other half-tribe of Manasseh) the Reubenites and the Gadites had received their inheritance.

C. Beginning of the Division of Canaan. 14:1-15.

1) Introduction. 14:1-5. The inheritance of each tribe was designated by lot, according to Num 34:16-29. In the apportionment, the Levites were not considered as one of the twelve tribes, "for the priesthood of Jehovah [was] their inheritance" (Josh 18:7), yea, even God himself (13:33; Deut 18:1,2).

2) Caleb and His Promised Inheritance. 14:6-15. Caleb, the grand old man of Judah, the outspoken minority leader of the twelve spies (Num 13:30), came humbly to Joshua at Gilgal to request his promised tract of land (Num 14:24, 30; Deut 1:36). Notice that no rivalry existed between these two.

6. Caleb the son of Jephunneh the Kenezite. Before the Exodus Caleb's father, a non-Israelite, had married a daughter of Hur of the clan of Chelubai (Caleb) in the tribe of Judah (I Chr 2:9, 18,19,50). She bore to Jephunneh his first son, to whom was given her family name, Caleb. This youth inherited the prerogatives of her clan, and eventually became a chief of her tribe. Caleb's relative, Othniel (Josh 15:17), is called a son of Kenaz (I Chr 4:13,15), i.e., a Kenizzite. The Kenizzites (Gen 15:19) were one of the tribes in the Negeb and Mount Seir. Related to the Kenites, they were perhaps skilled copper workers of the copper-rich Arabah.

8. Caleb is an outstanding example of a godly believer. Because he wholly followed the Lord, God kept him physically strong and courageous to the age of eighty-five. He claimed a glorious inheritance – Hebron, near which Abraham had tented and died – and was eager to fight to overcome the Anakim, illustrative to us of inward sins and outward temptations. In capturing Hebron he rendered the whole nation valuable service; later he willingly yielded his city to the Levites and lived in the suburbs (21:12).

D. Territory of the Tribe of Judah. 15:1-63.

1) The Border of Judah. 15:1-12. The southern border went from the southern shallow bay (lāshōn, lit., "tongue") of the Dead Sea below the el-Lisan peninsula, along Wadi Fiqreh, southward of the Ascent of the Scorpions (see comment on 11: 17), along Wadi Murrah through the Wilderness of Zin, south of Kadesh-barnea, curving northwestward through several other oases to Wadi el-Arish and the Mediterranean.

The northern border began in the east at the mouth of the Jordan, ran northwestward through two small campsites with wells (Beth-hogla, Beth-arabah) to the western escarpment of the Jordan Valley at the Wadi Qelt (Valley of Achor), where stood the boundary stone of Bohan. It ascended the north bank of Wadi Qelt, turning toward another Gilgal (Gᵉlîlôt, 18:17) near the Ascent of Blood (not far from the present Good Samaritan Inn on the Jerusalem-Jericho road) on the south side of Wadi Qelt (the river). It went on to En-shemesh (the Spring of the Apostles, east of Bethany), then over the Mount of Offense to En-rogel (the well south of Jebus-Zion, at the juncture of the Kidron and Hinnom Valleys, I Kgs 1:9). From immediately south of Jerusalem the border ascended the valley of Hinnom (Aramaic Ge-henna) to the height (at the present railroad station) separating it from the northern end of the Vale of Rephaim (valley of the giants; see II Sam 5:18,22). Thence the border turned northwestward to the spring of the water of Nephtoah (Josh 15:9; 'Ain Lifta) and followed the course of the modern Jerusalem-Jaffa highway to Kirjath-jearim (see comment on 9:16-21; cf. 15:60; I Chr 13:6). West of that town the border turned southward through Seir (Sōrēs, LXX 15; 59a; modern Sarīs), entered the Valley of Sorek (Jud 16:4, Wadi es-Surar) north of Chesalon, and went down to Beth-shemesh (Ir-shemesh, 19:41; Tell Rumeileh, probably unoccupied then, between Levels IV a and IV b, since it is not mentioned in chapter 10 nor in 15: 33-36 nor in the Amarna Letters). It continued past Timnah (Tell el-Batashi, five miles down Wadi es-Surar from Beth-shemesh) to the shoulder of the hill north of Ekron (Khirbet el-Muqanna) on the south slope of the wadi as it leaves the Shephelah. The border curves in the wadi past Shicron (Tell el-Ful, three and one-half miles northwest of Ekron) on the north bank, passed along to mount Baalah (19:44; Mughar, a steep slope two miles northwest of Shicron), on to Jabneel (Jamnia, Yavneh) and to the mouth of the wadi at the sea (Y. Aharoni, "The Northern Boundary of Judah," PEQ, 1958, pp. 27-31).

This method of delineating borders – proceeding in order by topographical landmarks, from town to mountain to town to river, etc. – is almost exactly paralleled at this same period in history in the agreement defining boundaries accorded by the Hittite king Suppliuliuma to Niqmadu of Ugarit, ruler of a vassal city-state on the Syrian coast (Claude Schaeffer, Le Palais Royal d'Ugarit, IV, 10-18).

2) The Possessions of Caleb and Othniel. 15:13-20. This bit of narrative is repeated in Jud 1:10-15,20. 17. Othniel. For his subsequent career as Judge, see Jud 3:9-11. 19. A blessing. Here the b'rākâ is a tangible gift, as in Gen 33:11; I Sam 25:27; II Kgs 5:15. Given me a south land. Here it is best to retain the original meaning of negeb and translate, for thou hast set me in arid land. Kirjath-sepher is on the northern fringe of the Negeb. Springs of water. The gullōt more likely are either cisterns or reservoir-pools formed by damming wadis. Ruins of ancient dams may still be seen in the Negeb.

3) The Cities of Judah. 15:21-63. The cities are listed by twelve districts according to their location within four geographical areas.

a) Cities in the Negeb (vv. 20-32). Beersheba (v. 28) was the principal city of the Negeb in ancient times, as it is also in modern times. The next name, Bizjothjah, probably should be read, with the LXX, and her daughters (i.e., villages). While some of the place names may be combined (Hazor-ithnan, v. 23; Hazor-hadattah and Kerioth-hezron, v. 25; Ain-rimmon, v. 32), there are nevertheless more than twenty and nine. Either the number twenty-nine is a copyist's error, or names originally placed in the margin were afterwards interpolated into the text.

A comparison of Josh 15:21-32; 19:1-8; I Chr 2; 4 with the second half of the campaign list of Pharaoh Shishak (II Chr 12:2-12) discovered at Karnak, reveals that few of the eighty-five place names listed by Shishak in the Negeb and adjoining areas are found in the Joshua passages; whereas many appear as personal or clan names in the later genealogical lists of I Chronicles 2 and 4. Therefore the lists of towns in Joshua belong to a time before the descendants of Judah and Simeon began to occupy the Negeb and to give their names to new settlements that were in existence by the time of Shishak (see Benjamin Mazar, "The Campaign of Pharaoh Shishak to Palestine," Supplement to Vetus Testamentum, IV, 59-66).

b) Cities in the Shephelah (vv. 33-47). Four districts are included in the region of the foothills, although in the fourth (vv. 45-47) lie cities in the coastal plain only theoretically under control of Judah (11:22; 13:2,3). 36. Gederah and Gederothaim. Read with the LXX, Gederah and her sheepfolds, making fourteen cities in all.

c) Cities in the Hill Country (vv. 48-60). Six districts are included in the region of the Central Ridge, the fifth appearing in a verse in the LXX between verses 59 and 60, omitted from the Masoretic text by an ancient copyist. Among the eleven towns listed are Tekoa, Bethlehem, and Etam (cf. II Chr 11:6).

d) Cities in the Wilderness (vv. 61, 62). This is the inhospitable Wilderness of Judea, sloping down to the Dead Sea. Since Beth-arabah (15:6; 18:22) is near Jericho, the next three or four towns may have been near the mouth of the Jordan or along the western shore of the Dead Sea north of En-gedi, rather than in the Buqei'ah, an elevated valley above and southwest of Qumran. 63. Neither Judah nor Benjamin could drive out the Jebusites from their fortified city on Zion (see Jud 1:21); but men of Judah did capture and burn the unwalled residential area on the southwest hill (Jud 1:8), and dwelt there with Jebusites before David took the stronghold (II Sam 5:6,7).

E. Territory of the Joseph Tribes, 16:1–17:18. This was drawn as one allotment and afterwards divided between Ephraim to the south and the half-tribe of Manasseh to the north. The territory of Ephraim is outlined first because, although that tribe was smaller (Num 26:34,37), Jacob had granted the birthright to Ephraim (Gen 48:9-20).

1) The Southern Border (of Ephraim). 16:1-4. From the Jordan, past Naarath (16:7) at the springs just north of Jericho ('Ain Duq and 'Ain Nu'eimeh), into the hill country to the south of Bethel-Luz (v. 2), the border went unto the domain of Beth-horon the Lower (v. 3), down the Valley of Ajalon past Gezer, and along the extension of that wadi to the Mediterranean just north of Joppa. Theoretically at least, Dan was to possess the towns around Joppa and the Yarkon River (19:45,46).

2) Territory of Ephraim. 16:5-10. From the Yarkon the western border followed the shore north to Michmethath (v. 6. LXX: Ikasmon; probably Tell Arshuf, six and one-half miles north of the Yarkon, where there was an ancient anchorage). The northern border with Manasseh turned southeastward from Shechem (the central point; cf. Sarid as central point in Zebulun's southern border, 19:11,12) unto Taanath-shiloh (six miles east-southeast of Shechem in Wadi Kerad – next valley south of Wadi Far'a) and down Wadi Kerad east of Janohah (16:7; Khirbet Janun, seven miles southeast of Shechem) to Ataroth, somewhere near the high hill with the Hasmonean fortress of Alexandrium (Qarn Sartabeh; see comment on 22:10-34) overlooking the Jordan Valley. The northern border traveled westward down the river Kanah from its headwaters near Shechem (see comments on 17:7-9) to Jiljuliyeh, the Tappuah of 16:8; 17:7,8; 12:17. From that town the border went northwestward along an ancient course of the Kanah to Michmethath. (See Eva Danelius, "The Boundary of Ephraim and Manasseh in the Western Plain," PEQ, 1957, 1958.) The stronghold Gezer (cf. 10:33) was finally captured by a Pharaoh of Egypt, who presented it to his daughter as a dowry when she married Solomon (I Kgs 9:16).

3) Clan Divisions of the Territory of Manasseh. 17:1-6. 1. Translate: There was (also) a lot (in Canaan) for the tribe of Manasseh, for he was the first-born of Joseph. (Now) Machir the first-born of Manasseh, the father (i.e., lord, owner) of (the land of) Gilead, because he was a man of war, had Gilead and Bashan. 2-6. The fact that the ten portions allotted to the clans of Manasseh in Canaan were actually established is attested many centuries later by the Samaria ostraca, dated about 770 B.C. These records of tax payments in kind from various clan districts, discovered in the palace of Jeroboam II, include the name of Abiezer (as a district; cf. Jud 6:34; 8:2), Helek, Shechem, Shemida, Noah, and Hoglah (see Num 26: 28-34; 27:1-11; 36:1-13).

4) The Holdings of Manasseh in Canaan. 17:7-13. 7. The seacoast of Manasseh stretched from Shihor-libnath, the creek-boundary with Asher just south of Dor (19:26), to Michmethath (16:6). This site lieth before (or, is opposite) Shechem ('al-p'nê Sh'kem) in the sense that, looking eastward from Michmethath across the Sharon Plain, one can see the valley of Shechem between the round hills of Ebal and Gerizim (G. A. Smith, The Historical Geography of the Holy Land, p. 119). 8. The land or fields of Tappuah were on the north bank of the River Kanah in Manasseh, although Tappuah itself was south of the river in Ephraim. 9. These cities of Ephraim. Eva Danelius (op. cit., 1958, pp. 135-142) has proposed to read 'ārîm hā'ēlleh as 'ārîm ha'ela, and following the LXX (Margolis' edition), to translate: "The 'Arim (equivalent to Arabic Ḥaram, a secluded, holy area) of the terebinth belongs to Ephraim among the cities of Manasseh." For the sacred place with its oak or terebinth near Shechem, see 24:26 and the comment on 24:25-28. Thus Shechem, the city of refuge, was considered as in Mount Ephraim (20:7).

11. Even three countries. Read (and the) three heights, i.e., Mount Tabor, the Hill of Moreh, and either Mount Carmel or Mount Gilboa (Baly, The Geography of the Bible, pp. 173,174). The northern border with Asher and Issachar was less well defined because Manasseh, the stronger tribe, was allotted the resisting Canaanite fortresses. "This fact would manifestly tend to produce a solidarity among the several tribes, and to prevent disunion by creating common interests. The interest of the stronger tribes would be served by completing the conquest of the territory assigned to the weaker" (C. H. Waller, A Bible Commentary for English Readers, p. 142). Excavation reveals that Canaanite Megiddo did not fall to Israel until the latter half of the twelfth century B.C.

12,13. But the Canaanites would dwell in that land. That is, they were determined to remain in that region. Manasseh could not drive them out. Jamieson suggests that "indolence, a love of ease; perhaps a mistaken humanity, arising from a disregard or forgetfulness of the Divine command, a decreasing principle of faith and zeal in the service of God, were the causes of their failure" (JFB, p. 154).

5) The Demand of the Joseph Tribes for More Land. 17:14-18. Joshua demonstrated tact and firmness in dealing with his own tribesmen. He did not grant them an additional allotment, but encouraged them to clear the trees and settle the forested hill country. That the Central Ridge was once heavily forested is attested by acorns and terebinth seeds and deer antlers found in many excavations and a wild boar's tooth at Gezer, as well as cypress and pine lumber in King Saul's fortress at Gibeah (Tell el-Ful). While the Canaanites occupied the best land– the Valley of Jezreel (v. 16)–and possessed superior military equipment–chariots armed with projecting iron blades, no doubt obtained at this early time from the Hittites in Asia Minor–, the mountains of Ephraim and Manasseh were very sparsely settled around 1400 B.C. Except for Shechem and Tirzah, there are singularly few Late Bronze I sites of Canaanite fortified towns or villages between Bethel and Ibleam. From that whole area Shechem may be the only town whose name is found in the Amarna Letters. Even Dothan, captured by Thutmose III about 1479 B.C., is not mentioned in Joshua or Judges or in the Amarna Letters. So this large site probably was vacant in 1400 B.C. A little later settled sites increased rapidly in the hill country, as the Israelites learned the knack of digging cisterns and lining them with waterproof lime plaster to store rain water (Albright, Archaeology of Palestine, p. 113). Thus a reason exists for the lack of town lists in Joshua 16 and 17.

F. Territories of the Seven Remaining Tribes. 18:1–19:51.

1) The Tabernacle Pitched at Shiloh and the Lots Cast There. 18:1-10. For a common sanctuary the Israelites chose an abandoned Middle Bronze Age town site in Ephraim because of its central location with respect to all the tribes (Seilûn, ten miles north-northeast of Bethel, eleven miles south of Shechem). The Tabernacle served as the nucleus of Israel's amphictyonic organization before the nation desired to have a kingdom. The town must have been named Shiloh by Joshua after the Messianic usage of that title in Gen 49:10, since the ark, symbolizing God's presence was to remain there. While the selection of Shiloh and the consequent assembling of the nation there had necessarily interrupted the process of assigning portions to the last seven tribes, these tribes, on their part, were slack in going out to conquer the remaining land in Canaan. Joshua had to commission a twenty-one-man reconnaissance expedition to describe the land in seven parts.

2) Territory of Benjamin. 18:11-28. The hand of God is evident in the drawing of the lot for Benjamin. This tract of land between the Judahites and the Josephites both served to fulfill Deut 33:12 by placing the ultimate temple site in Benjamin, and secured a tie to unite Israel by making Benjamin the link between the two most powerful and naturally rival tribal groups. Joseph and Benjamin were sons of the same mother, and the Rachel tribes marched together from Sinai (Num 10:22-24); while it was Judah who offered himself as hostage in Benjamin's stead (Gen 43:8,9; 44:18-34).

3) Territory of Simeon. 19:1-9. By giving Simeon land in the southern section of the inheritance of Judah, God began the fulfillment of Jacob's curse with respect to Simeon (Gen 49:7). The Simeonites were separated from their marching companions, Reuben and Gad (Num 10:18-20), who had already rejected Simeon and chosen, instead, to settle Trans-Jordan along with the Manassites.

4) Territory of Zebulun. 19:10-16. A landlocked district in Lower Galilee including the NT Nazareth. Divine wisdom placed the Leah tribes, Zebulun and Issachar, to the north of the Rachel tribes in order to cement the union of all Israel. Judah, Issachar, and Zebulun encamped together in the wilderness (Num 2:3-7; 10:14-16). These ties persisted for centuries. Mary and Joseph, for instance, both of the tribe of Judah, dwelt in the old territory of Zebulun. Also, only the Zebulunites named a town Bethlehem (Josh 19:15) after the one in Judah.

5) Territory of Issachar. 19:17-23. The territory stretching from Mount Tabor on the west to the southern tip of the Sea of Galilee and including in its area the Valley of Jezreel.

6) Territory of Asher. 19:24-31. The coastal region from Mount Carmel north, theoretically at least, to Tyre and Sidon. Inscriptions of Seti I (c. 1310 B.C.) and of Rameses II contain references to a territory of a people called 'Asaru, corresponding to the hinterland of southern Phoenicia, thus indicating that Asher had begun to settle there by the end of the fourteenth century.

7) Territory of Naphtali. 19:32-39. Eastern Upper and Lower Galilee. Y. Aharoni of Israel, who has made an archaeological survey in Upper Galilee, has discovered evidence of numerous small settlements, close together, which he attributes to the Israelites and some of which he says began in the fourteenth century ("Problems of the Israelite Conquest in the Light of Archaeological Discoveries," The Holy Land, Antiquity and Survival, II (1957), 146-149. See also in Journal of Semitic Studies, IV (July, 1959), 279, 280, B.S.J. Isserlin's review of Aharoni's report in Hebrew).

8) Territory of Dan. 19:40-48. To strengthen further the union of Israel, God separated Dan from his brother Naphtali, both sons of Bilhah (Gen 30:5-8) and from his wilderness campmates, Naphtali and Asher (Num 10:25-27), by locating Dan between Benjamin and the Mediterranean. For this reason, when part of the territory of Dan was lost to the Amorites in the Philistine Plain (Jud 1:34), some of the Danites apostatized and migrated northward and captured Leshem near the northern part of Naphtali (Jud 17; 18). That migration necessarily occurred before the rise of Aramean city-states in that area in the twelfth century (cf. II Sam 10:6), probably during the Judgeship of Othniel (Jud 3:11; 18:28,30), about 1370–1330 B.C.

9) The Conclusion of Dividing the Land. 19:49-51. Joshua was willing to wait until the last for a possession—Timnath-serah (Khirbet Tibneh, eleven miles west-southwest of Shiloh, seventeen miles southwest of Shechem) in the mountainous district of Ephraim, his tribe.

G. Inheritance of Levi. 20:1–21:42.

1) Appointment of Cities of Refuge. 20:1-9. All of these six cities were Levitical towns, probably considered as a sacred oblation (t'rûmâ, Ezk 45:1) to Jehovah for use of his Levites, and therefore God's property, where manslayers could be placed under the protection of divine grace (see Num 35:9-34; Deut 4:41-43; 19:1-13). The cities of refuge were established to protect from the ancient right of vendetta (blood revenge) the manslayer who had killed a person accidentally, without premeditation. Arriving at the nearest asylum, the manslayer presented his case at the gate, the ancient law court (cf. Deut 21:19; 22:15). Later he was brought to stand trial before the congregation of the community nearest the scene of the crime. If acquitted, he was returned to the refuge city until free to return home at the death of the high priest. That death meant a change of priestly administration and acted as does our statute of limitations (see comment on 24:33).

2) Assignment of Promised Cities to the Levites. 21:1-42. The fulfillment of Num 35:2-8. See also I Chr 6:54-81. While these cities with pasturage (suburbs) were allocated in anticipation of complete subjugation of the land (Gezer, Josh 21:21, not in Israelite hands until Solomon's reign; for Taanach, v. 25, and Nahalal, v. 35, see Jud 1:27-30), yet for the most part the Levites had occupied their towns by the time of David (I Chr 13:2). This distribution among the other tribes achieved a fulfillment of Jacob's curse on Levi as well as Simeon (Gen 49:5,7 b). But God overruled in the case of Levi's descendants to preserve their identity because of their having stood with Moses in a crucial hour (Ex 32:26) and because of the righteous action of Phinehas in regard to Zimri (Num 25). Neither Shiloh nor any Ephraimite cities were given to the priests; all the priestly cities were assigned in Judah and Benjamin so as to fall ultimately within the kingdom of Judah, of which the capital would be Jerusalem, Zion, the city of God (Ps 48). Thus we see that God intended the conquest to be completed rapidly and Jerusalem to be the seat of his sanctuary centuries before David (cf. Josh 9:27). But Israel's repeated apostasy in the period of the Judges prevented the execution of God's perfect will.

H. Summary of the Conquest and Apportionment. 21:43-45. This is the key passage of the book, emphasizing the theme of God's faithfulness in keeping his promises to Joshua (1:5-9; cf. Ps 44:2,3). In harmonizing these general statements with Israel's failure to subdue Canaan, remember God's provision for taking over the land gradually (Ex 23:29,30; Deut 7:22-24).

I. Appendix: Departure of the Trans-Jordanic Tribes: 22:1-34. An incident concerning the two and a half tribes subsequent to the campaigns and distribution of the inheritances is related to demonstrate further God's providential care in maintaining harmony within Israel (cf. 22:31). This chapter reopens the question of whether these tribes were in God's will in settling east of Jordan. Many scholars have blamed Reuben, Gad, and the half tribe of Manasseh for choosing their inheritance in Trans-Jordania. But C. H. Waller has argued that this view is historically incorrect: "God delivered the land of Sihon and Og to Israel; someone must inherit it. Again, the true eastern boundary of Palestine is not the Jordan, but the mountain range of Gilead, which parts it from the desert which lies beyond. Really the two and a half tribes were as much in Palestine as the rest . . . ." (op. cit., p. 153).

1-9. Joshua dismissed the eastern tribes with a blessing. He acknowledged that they had fulfilled their obligations to Moses and to himself (Num 32:20-33; Josh 1:16,17). 5. Note the six one-syllable infinitives in English, all basic principles for a godly life before the Lord.

10-34. Returning home from Shiloh, the two and one-half tribes erected an altar in the western region of the Jordan Valley, perhaps somewhere near Qarn Sartabeh (see comment on 16:5-10), overlooking the ford at Adam leading to the Jabbok Valley. 10. A great altar to see to. A large altar to cause one to look, to draw attention. Thus it served well as a testimony (witness, 22:27,28) to all generations that the eastern tribes had a portion in the Lord and in Israel. But it was a needless and presumptuous deed; God's method to preserve unity was to have all the tribes gather thrice yearly around the altar at Shiloh (Ex 23:17).

11. An altar . . . at the passage of the children of Israel. RSV: An altar at the frontier of the land of Canaan, in the region about the Jordan, on the side that belongs to the people of Israel (i.e., to the nine and one-half tribes). 13. Instead of immediately waging war (22:12) on the basis of Lev 17:8,9; Deut 12:4-14; 13:13-18, the western tribes wisely and providentially sent a delegation headed by Phinehas, the zealous son of the high priest, who once before had stemmed the tide of apostasy when Israel had turned to Baal-peor (Josh 22:17; Num 25). He restored the eastern tribes "in the spirit of meekness" or gentleness, so necessary in Christian workers (Gal 6:1; Mt 18:15). 16. Trespass. Treachery, faithless act. This word is also used of the sin of Achan (22:20; cf. 7:1), which had almost ruined the whole nation.

22. The Lord God of gods. The combination and repetition of the three divine names, El, Elohim, Jehovah (cf. Ps 50:1, ASV), form a solemn and majestic oath pronounced by the accused in their denial of the charge of rebellion and treachery. Save us not this day. An excited imprecation, addressed directly to God, in the midst of their affirmation.

30. It pleased them. The action of the eastern tribes seemed perfectly honorable to the deputies. No underlying condemnation of the Trans-Jordanic tribes is set forth by the inspired author. Nevertheless, this departure from God's plan for centralized worship later resulted in apostasy, seen in their refusal to come to Deborah's aid (Jud 5:15 b-17 a).

IV. Final Summons to Covenant-loyalty in the Promised Land. 23:1–24:33.

A. Joshua's Farewell Address to the Leaders of Israel. 23:1-16. The book of Joshua opens with God's commissioning Joshua to assume command; it closes with Joshua's exhorting the nation to complete the conquest of the land. From ten to twenty years must have elapsed since the apportionment of the tribal territories, when Joshua's age first began to tell on him (see notes on 13:1). In those intervening years he observed Israel's growing complacency and tendency to compromise with the heathen, while his own infirmity prevented his taking further personal leadership in the military reduction of the Canaanite centers of resistance. While God did not intend that anyone should succeed him as central commander, had he failed by not training tribal leaders to carry on the fight? Now as he felt death approaching, he had to use his remaining strength to stir up Israel to renewed faithfulness to Jehovah and obedience to the covenant.

1,2. Translate and punctuate: And it came to pass a long time afterward, when the Lord . . . enemies round about, and Joshua was old and advanced in years (lit., days), that Joshua called for all Israel: for their elders, . . . First he summoned the leaders of the nation, probably to Shiloh, where the Tabernacle was (18:1), in order to warn them most earnestly of the dangers of apostatizing from Jehovah.

3-5. First, he encouraged them to review what God had done for them and also His promises to thrust out the heathen nations. 6-11. Secondly, he pleaded (the imperative or jussive form of command is not used) with them to be very resolute in following the Law, as he had been (1:7), lest they mix and associate with the unexpelled idolatrous Canaanites. He urged them to continue to stick devotedly (cleave, 23:8) to Jehovah their God and to love him (cf. Ex 20:6)—"for the Lord your God, he it is that fighteth for you, as he hath promised you." Cleave unto the Lord is the OT way of saying, "Abide in Christ" (cf. Jn 15:1-10).

12,13. Thirdly, he strictly forewarned them of the consequences of intermarrying with their neighbors (prohibited in Ex 34:12-16; Deut 7:3), for such association would lure the Israelites into the snare of the fertility cults and react as a whip on their sides and as rankling thorns in their eyes (cf. Num 33:55). Likewise we must not make peace with any lurking habits of sin in our lives. 14-16. In closing, he summed up his thoughts, emphasizing the curse that would follow transgressing the covenant, basing his threats upon Lev 26:14-33; Deut 28:15-68; etc.

B. Renewal of the Covenant Commitment at Shechem. 24:1-28. As a direct result of his meeting with the leaders, Joshua called the entire nation to Shechem to re-establish once again the covenant as the foundation of their relationship with Jehovah. Twenty years or so had passed–the momentous period of the subjugation and settlement of Canaan, and inclusion of new peoples (e.g., the Gibeonites) in the Hebrew Commonwealth. As Moses had done after the wilderness wandering (Deut 30:15-20), so now Joshua asked the tribes solemnly and formally to pledge anew their covenant allegiance to their God–not at Shiloh but at Shechem, for near the latter was an ancient shrine or holy place of the Hebrews (see comment on 24:26). Here God had first promised Canaan to Abram; here that patriarch erected his first altar in the land (Gen 12:6,7). Here also Jacob had built an altar (Gen 33:20) and called upon his household to put away their idols (Gen 35:1-4). Near here Joshua himself had on a former occasion led in the covenant-establishment ceremony (Josh 8:30-35).

George E. Mendenhall has lucidly revealed the nature of the covenant and covenant-renewal in Israel in the time of Moses and Joshua (Law and Covenant in Israel and the Ancient Near East, pp. 24-44). In form, the Mosaic covenant seems closest to the suzerainty treaty by which a great monarch obligated his vassals to serve him in faithfulness and obedience. Such treaties are found in the international covenants of the Hittite Empire with its vassal states, 1450–1200 B.C., but nowhere later than toward the close of the second millennium B.C. Both the Mosaic covenant and the suzerainty treaty are essentially unilateral. "The stipulations of the treaty are binding only upon the vassal, and only the vassal took an oath of obedience" (Mendenhall, p. 30). While the vassal was obliged to trust in the benevolence and protective support of the monarch, the latter maintained "his sole right of self-determination and sovereignty" (ibid.) by not binding himself to specific obligations. In the case of the Mosaic covenant, the Israelites and the mixed multitude (cf. Num 11:4) stood in the position of the vassal peoples, while Jehovah was their divine sovereign. Thus God employed a standard form of covenant known in western Asia at that time.

The covenant mediated by Moses is nowhere proclaimed as an everlasting covenant; hence it had to be renewed periodically–at least every generation. Similarly, since the Hittite treaties "were not regarded as binding in perpetuity from the first, a renewal of the covenant would be from time to time necessary" (ibid., pp. 40,41), as with the heir following the death of the vassal king. Likewise there was to be periodic public reading of the covenant, both in the Hittite Empire and in Israel (see note on 8:33-35). The vassal was required to appear or present himself before the ruler once a year to pay tribute (cf. 24:1 b; Deut 16:16).

Most of the elements found in the Hittite treaty texts can be detected in this covenant renewal at Shechem, as shown in the following outline:

1) Preamble. 24:2 a. Thus saith the Lord God of Israel. This statement identifies the Author of the covenant in his relationship to his vassal people.

2) Historical Prologue. 24:2 b-13. This section describes in detail the previous relations between the sovereign and the subjects. "In the suzerainty treaties great emphasis is placed upon the benevolent deeds which the Hittite king has performed for the benefit of the vassal . . . . They are emphatically not stereotyped formulas, . . . but are rather such careful descriptions of actual events, that they are a most important source for the historian" (ibid., p. 32). In the historical prologue the monarch always speaks in the "I-thou" form of address, directly to the vassal. Thus in this section it is not Joshua but Jehovah speaking, sketching his theocratic dealings with Israel from his call of Abraham to the Conquest.

2 b. On the other side of the flood. Literally, in Beyond-the-River, the district north and east of the Euphrates River, including Haran (cf. II Sam 10:16; I Kgs 14:15; II Kgs 17:6; Isa 7:20). Ur of the Chaldees may well have been a town in the Armenian mountains north of Haran rather than the Sumerian city near the Persian Gulf (see Cyrus Gordon, "Abraham and the Merchants of Ura," JNES, January, 1958). Terah . . . Abraham . . . Nachor. Only two of Terah's three sons are mentioned, those who were the ancestors of Israel—Nachor as grandfather of Rebekah and great-grandfather of Leah and Rachel.

7. Since this ceremony was obviously a renewal of the covenant, mention of the original covenant made at Sinai is omitted, perhaps for the sake of brevity. But that covenant is definitely mentioned in the near context (23:16).

12. The hornet. Probably a figurative expression for the panic-producing power of God that overwhelmed Sihon and Og (see Ex 23:27-30; Deut 7:20), rather than a veiled reference to the armies of Pharaoh (see Garstang, Joshua-Judges, p. 259), which never pillaged southern Gilead and Moab.

3) The Stipulations. 24:14-24. As in Hittite suzerainty treaties, the first obligation was prohibition of other foreign alliances outside the Hittite Empire, so also "the first obligation of the covenant [of Jehovah] was to reject all foreign relations—i.e., with other gods, and by implication, with other political groups" (Mendenhall, op. cit., p. 38). This primary duty was required of Israel by Joshua, as we learn from 24:14,15,23; and the record of the acceptance of this covenant-obligation by the people rather than the complete text of the formal covenant-renewal, is interposed for the sake of brevity. Furthermore, since it was a renewal of the Mosaic covenant rather than a new covenant, no other stipulations needed to be listed. Probably such local peoples as the Gibeonites and the inhabitants of Shechem (see remarks on 8:30-35) also became "vassals" of Jehovah by giving up the gods of the Amorites (24:15; cf. I Kgs 18:21).

4) The Deposit of the Covenant. 24:25-28. Even among the Hittites the treaty was considered as being under the protection of the deity and "was deposited as a sacred thing in the sanctuary of the vassal state" (ibid., p. 34). Likewise, Joshua wrote these words in the book of the law of God (24:26; cf. I Sam 10:25), which was deposited by (AV, in) the side of the ark of the covenant (Deut 31:24-27). Also he inscribed the statute (s) of the covenant-renewal on a large stele, which he set up beneath the oak or terebinth tree belonging to the sacred place of Jehovah near Shechem (see note on Josh 17:9). This tree is mentioned in Gen 12:6 (lit., the terebinth of the teacher for "the plain of Moreh"; cf. 35:4. In the case of the covenant ceremony of Josh 8:30-35, the curses and blessings formula was pronounced, another regular feature of the Hittite treaties.

C. Appendix: Death of Joshua, and Subsequent Conduct of Israel. 24:29-33. Joshua must have been held in high esteem at the time of his death, for the effect of his godly influence is stated in 24:31—Israel served the Lord all the days of Joshua, and all the days of the elders that overlived Joshua, whom he had exhorted so forcefully, according to chapter 23. 32. The burial of Joseph's remains (cf. Gen 50:25,26; Ex 13:19) may have taken place long before the death of Joshua, but inspired authorship "placed the account of it here, symbolizing at the close the message of the whole book of Joshua—the faithfulness of God" (Blair, in The New Bible Commentary, p. 235). 33. The death of the high priest Eleazar, son and successor of Aaron, is recorded along with the death of Joshua, successor of Moses, to indicate the close of the era (cf. 20:6 and comment on 20:1-9).

JUDGES

INTRODUCTION

Title. The book of Judges receives its name from the leaders (shōp'tîm) who delivered Israel from a series of foreign oppressions during the period between the death of Joshua and the beginnings of the monarchy.

The term shôpēṭ has a wider connotation than the English term "judge" can convey. In ancient Carthage and Ugarit it was used to describe civil magistrates, or heads of state. The Canaanite literature from ancient Ugarit uses the expression shptn, "our judge," in parallel relation to mlkn, "our king," (Ba'al V, v, 32). The Biblical period of the shōp'tîm must be distinguished from that of the kings, however. During the time of the Judges a definite antimonarchal feeling existed (cf. Jud 9:8-15), although external pressures from prospective invaders caused the people eventually to demand a king (I Sam 8). Judges were Spirit-endowed men, raised up of God and empowered by him to meet specific crises in Israel's history. God himself was looked upon as Israel's King (I Sam 8:7), although the sin of the people frequently reduced this ideal rule to a state of anarchy (Jud 21:25). The Judges exercised authority under God in both military and civil matters, rendering legal decisions when called upon to do so (4:4,5).

In Judges 11:27 the God of Israel is called hashshōpēṭ, "The Judge." God's "judgments" (mishpāṭîm) form a part of that instruction which is known as the law (tôrâ) of Jehovah (cf. Ps 19:9; 119:7).

Date and Authorship. Like other of the Old Testament historical books, the book of Judges is anonymous. Internal evidence, however, helps us to determine the approximate time of its composition. The destruction of Shiloh is presupposed (18:31). The words, "In those days there was no king in Israel" (17:6), suggest a date during the monarchy. The fact that Jebusites are mentioned as still in Jerusalem (1:21) implies a date before the capture of Jebus during the reign of David. Similarly the mention of Gezer (1:29) implies a date before Pharaoh gave that city as a wedding gift to Solomon (I Kgs 9:16).

Internal evidence thus suggests a date for Judges during the early days of the monarchy (c. 1050–1000 B.C.), either during the days of Saul or early in the reign of David. The Talmud (Baba Bathra, 14 b) and early Christian tradition ascribe its authorship to Samuel. Although evidence does not warrant a positive conclusion concerning the writer of the book of Judges, it does indicate that the book was written by a contemporary of Samuel. The author probably made use of both oral and written source material, but the book, in the form in which we have it, exhibits a unity that argues against any complex scheme of compilation.

Historical Background. The generation that entered Canaan under Joshua had accomplished much by way of occupying strategic sites and settling the tribes in their assigned portions. The work of conquest and occupation, however, was far from complete. Important Canaanite strongholds had been bypassed by Joshua, and so the individual tribes were expected to fight to occupy their assigned territories (Josh 13:1-7).

COMMENTARY

I. Introduction. 1:1–2:5.

A. Political Background of the Period of the Judges. 1:1-36.

During Joshua's lifetime Canaan was occupied and divided among the Israelite tribes. Substantial pockets of resistance remained, however. The presence of enemy peoples in the midst of Israelite territory and the strength of opposition from without produced the political situation described in the book of Judges.

After the death of Joshua. Cf. Josh 1:1. As the death of Moses marked the end of Israel's wilderness wandering, so the death of Joshua marked the end of the first phase of the conquest of Canaan. Who shall go up? Included in the allotments made by Joshua was much territory still unconquered. The tribes were expected to occupy the territories assigned to them. The Canaanites. The term is sometimes used of all the inhabitants of Canaan without regard to racial origin. The area occupied by Canaanites at this time is delineated in Jud 1:9.

2. Judah had been assigned the territory west of the Dead Sea and south of Jerusalem (Jebus), the territory known as Judea in NT times (Josh 15:1-63). I have delivered the land into his hand. God's purpose is stated as an accomplished fact. The assurance of success is stated as an inducement to activity. 3. Judah said unto Simeon his brother. Jacob had declared that the tribes of Simeon and Levi would be scattered in Israel (Gen 49:5-7). Joshua did not assign a specific territory to Simeon but permitted the Simeonites to settle in the portion assigned to Judah (Josh 19:9). Thus Simeon was virtually incorporated into the tribe of Judah.

4. Perizzites are thought to have been an aboriginal people of different race from the Canaanites. They were settled in Canaan before Abraham arrived (Gen 13:7). 5. Adoni-bezek means "lord of Bezek." He had subdued seventy petty kings and cut off their thumbs and great toes (1:7). Physical mutilation disqualified a person from holding either religious or civil office (Lev 21:16-24; contrast I Sam 9:2; 16:12). Adoni-bezek was similarly mutilated by his Israelite captors (Jud 1:6).

8. Fought against Jerusalem. Although temporarily taken, Jerusalem was not held permanently by Israel until the time of David (cf. 1:21; II Sam 5:6-9). During the Amarna Age (c. 1400–1360 B.C.) the city was known as Urusalim, and was one of the most important Canaanite city-states.

9. In the mountain, and in the south, and in the valley. These terms explain much of the geography and history of Palestine. The mountain, or "hill country," was first taken and longest held by Israel. Important cities of the Judean mountains include Jerusalem (2,593 feet above sea level) and Hebron (3,040 feet above sea level). The south refers to a specific area known as the Negeb or Negev. This semidesert country begins a few miles south of Hebron. Beersheba serves as the principle city of the Negev in modern times as it did in antiquity. Valley should be rendered lowland, or transliterated as Shephelah. It is the term used for the foothills lying between the coastal plain and the Judean mountain range. During the period of the Judges the Philistines occupied the coastal plain, the Israelites occupied most of the Judean mountains, and the Shephelah was the scene of constant fighting between the two.

When the Israelite tribes settled in Canaan, they were subject to the temptations of Canaanite religion. Religious prostitution and the sacrifice of infants to Molech were among the degrading practices that confronted them in their new home. They often forgot their covenant with God at Mount Sinai. When they lapsed into idolatry, God chastised them by delivering them over to their enemies. When, in a spirit of repentance, they prayed for mercy, help came in the person of a 'Judge' who was raised up by God to save His people from their oppressors. The periods of Israel's faithfulness to God were of short duration, however. The pattern of apostasy, defeat, repentance, prayer for deliverance, and victory through a Spirit-endowed Judge is frequently repeated. A series of such episodes forms the major portion of the book of Judges.

10. And Judah went against the Canaanites that dwelt in Hebron. The ancient city of Hebron was located about 20 miles south of Jerusalem, in the highest part of the mountains of Judah, 3,040 feet above sea level. Abraham had sojourned in the vicinity of Hebron (Gen 13:18; 35:27), and the patriarchal burial ground was located there (Gen 23:2-20). In anticipation of the conquest, Hebron was assigned to Caleb (Num 14:24), who subsequently occupied it by right of conquest (Josh 15:13,14). The earlier name of Hebron was Kirjath-arba ("fourfold city" or "tetrapolis"). A man named Arba is described as "the greatest man among the Anakim" (Josh 14:15). He probably took his name from the city which he founded. And they slew Sheshai, and Ahiman, and Talmai. Caleb and the detachment of Judean warriors who attacked Hebron were successful in destroying its armed forces and occupying the city. The three names of those killed are Aramaean, suggesting that the city was occupied by tribes related to the people who later had a powerful kingdom with Damascus at its capital.

11. And from thence he went against the inhabitants of Debir. Debir, also known as Kirjath-sepher, is believed to be identified with the mound now called Tell Beit Mirsim, thirteen miles southwest of Hebron. This mound was excavated in 1926 and the following years by an expedition directed by Melvin G. Kyle and William F. Albright. A royal scarab of the Egyptian Pharaoh, Amenhotep III, found there suggests that Egyptian control of the city continued into the fourteenth century B.C. Above the remains from the Late Bronze Age, the excavators found a burned layer, on top of which were Israelite remains. The name Kirjath-sepher is usually interpreted to mean city of (the) book. The name Debir seems to be related to a Hebrew root meaning to say. In all probability ancient Kirjath-sepher was a town noted for its possession of an oracle.

12. And Caleb said, He that smiteth Kirjath-sepher, and taketh it, to him will I give Achsah, my daughter, to wife. The promise of a daughter in marriage as a reward for an act of bravery is a common motif in the Bible (cf. I Sam 17:25) and in secular literature. Here it is implied that the captured city as well as the daughter would be given to the victor. 13. Othniel, the son of Kenaz, Caleb's younger brother. Grammatically the words can mean that Othniel was either Caleb's nephew or his younger brother. Took it; i.e., captured Debir.

14. She moved him to ask of her father a field. After the marriage, Achsah persuaded her husband to permit her to ask a field of her father. 15. And she said unto him, Give me a blessing; i.e., a present (cf. Gen 33:11; Josh 15:19; II Kgs 5:15). For thou hast given me a south land might better be rendered, Thou has put me in the Negev region. She desired a blessing to compensate for the arid surroundings of the Judean Negev.

And Caleb gave her the upper springs and the nether springs. Achsah requested Gūllōt-māyīm, perhaps a place name, translated "springs of waters." Caleb gave her Gūllōt-'illit and Gūllōt-tahtit, doubtless also place names commonly rendered "upper springs" and "nether springs." The excavators of Tell Beit Mirsim suggest that the "wells" were shafts giving access to the ground water, a number of which have been found in this region. A mile below, and two miles above Tell Beit Mirsim such wells have been discovered. Others, however, identify the wells given to Achsah with the springs above and below the road at the Seil ed-Dilbeh, five and three-quarters miles southwest of Hebron, on the way to Beersheba. This is one of the best-watered valleys in southern Palestine. The possession of these springs was of great importance, and the record here given would indicate to all concerned the claim that Achsah and her descendants had on the wells. J. Simons (The Geographical and Topographical Texts of the Old Testament, p. 382) rejects the Tell Beit Mirsim location of ancient Debir, suggesting Khirbet Terrameh because of its proximity to these wells.

16. And the children of the Kenite, Moses' father in law. The Kenites were related to the Israelites through Moses' marriage to Zipporah (Ex 2:21; Jud 4:11). They preserved their identity, yet remained friendly to the Israelites as late as the time of David (I Sam 30:29). Went up out of the city of palm trees, i.e., Jericho, into the wilderness of Judah, which lies in the south of Arad. Tell 'Arad is a barren-looking height seventeen miles south of Hebron. The Masoretic text continues, and they went and dwelt among the people. We later learn that the Kenites were settled among the Amalekites (I Sam 15:6). It has been suggested that the words the people—hā-'ām—result from the loss of the latter part of the word Amalekite in pre-Masoretic manuscript history. The original would have read, "and they went and dwelt among the Amalekites."

17. And Judah went with Simeon his brother. The tribe of Judah co-operated with the tribe of Simeon in the destruction of Zephath, possibly Tell es-Sab'a. Hormah. In this passage there is interesting interplay between two different meanings of the one Hebrew root. The same root that produces the noun ḥērem, meaning that which is devoted to or sacred to the gods of the non-Israelites and hence offensive to the God of Israel, also produces the verbal ḥāram, which means "destroyed." God had said that the Canaanite cities were to be "utterly destroyed" (Deut 7:2). Zephath had been a pagan city, "devoted" (ḥērem) to the pagan gods. At the command of the Lord it was "devoted" to him; that is, devoted to destruction, destroyed (hāram). It was renamed Hormah, which means utter destruction. 18. Also Judah took Gaza . . . and Askelon . . . and Ekron. These were the principal Philistine cities south of Joppa. The historian goes on to state that the tribe of Judah was able to drive out the inhabitants of the mountains, but that the chariots of iron used by the inhabitants of the valley formed an insuperable obstacle to conquest. Since the cities of Gaza, Askelon, and Ekron were firmly in Philistine hands at a later date, any victories on the coastal plain at this time were temporary in nature. The Iron Age began in Palestine during the twelfth century B.C. The Hittite monopoly of iron was broken about 1200 B.C. and David's conquest of the Philistines marked the beginning of the use of iron as a common commodity in Israel.

20. And they gave Hebron unto Caleb, as Moses said. Because Caleb had proved himself to be a man of faith when the majority of the spies brought an evil report, God had promised a blessing for him (Num 14:24; Deut 1:36). Although Hebron was given to Caleb, he had the responsibility of occupying it. To do so he had to drive out "the three sons of Anak." The expression sons of Anak means men of (long) neck, i.e., men of great height, or giants. 21. And the children of Benjamin did not drive out the Jebusites. The Jebusites of Jerusalem did not capitulate before the forces of Benjamin or Judah, their northern and southern neighbors, until Joab, David's general, took the city by stealth (II Sam 5:6-9).

22. And the house of Joseph, the tribes of Ephraim and Manasseh, they also went up against Bethel. Bethel was twelve miles north of Jerusalem, eighteen miles south of Shiloh. Excavations at the site of Bethel reveal burned brick, ash-filled earth, and charred debris, evidence of the thorough destruction of the Canaanite predecessor of Israelite Bethel, the city mentioned more often in Scripture than any other except Jerusalem. 25. He showed them the entrance into the city. The Joseph tribes promised to show mercy to a man they chanced to see in the vicinity of Bethel on condition that he show them the entrance into the city. He did so, and was permitted to escape to the land of the Hittites (v. 26), probably a reference to northern Syria, which was reckoned as part of the Hittite "sphere of influence." The great Hittite Empire was centered in Asia Minor. The escapee from Bethel built a city which he named Luz, the earlier name of Bethel (cf. Gen 28:19).

27. Neither did Manasseh drive out . . . Beth-shean . . . Taanach . . . Dor . . . Ibleam . . . Megiddo. A string of fortified Canaanite cities divided north Israel into two parts. Beth-shean is at the eastern end of the Valley of Esdraelon, where it joins the Jordan Valley. It was occupied by Egyptian garrisons until the time of Rameses III (1198–1167 B.C.). Ibleam, Taanach, and Megiddo overlooked the Plain of Esdraelon from the south. Dor was on the Mediterranean coast, south of Mount Carmel. 28. When Israel was strong . . . they put the Canaanites to tribute. The history of Israel during the time of the Judges alternated between periods of strength and periods of weakness. The Canaanites were never expelled, but they were reduced to slave status during periods of Israelite strength.

29. Neither did Ephraim drive out the Canaanites that dwelt in Gezer. Gezer is located eighteen miles northwest of Jerusalem, where it guards a pass from Joppa to Jerusalem. Entrenched behind walls fourteen feet thick, the Gezerites were able to resist Israelite dominance. The city became part of Solomon's kingdom only when it was given to him as a wedding gift by the Egyptian Pharaoh (I Kgs 9:16).

30. Neither did Zebulon drive out the inhabitants of Kitron, nor . . . of Nahalol. These cities in Zebulon have not been positively identified. 31. Neither did Asher drive out the inhabitants of Accho, . . . Zidon . . . Ahlab . . . Achzib . . . Helbah . . . Aphik . . . Rehob. Accho is now known as Acre. It is located north of the Carmel Ridge, opposite the city of Haifa on the Bay of Acre. Zidon was the Phoenician city famed in Homeric literature as a center of art and culture. In later times it took a place second to Tyre. Ahlab has not been identified, but Achzib was located about ten miles north of Accho. Helbah has been identified with Mahalliba of the Assyrian monuments, located northeast of Tyre. Aphik may be Tell Kurdaneh, about six miles southeast of Accho. Rehob has been identified with Tell Berweh, a well-watered site seven miles inland from Accho. The Phoenicians were never dispossessed by the Israelites. Both David and Solomon had friendly relations with Hiram of Tyre. 33. Neither did Naphtali drive out the inhabitants of Beth-shemesh, nor . . . of Beth-anath. Both of these places appear to have been shrines to Canaanite deities, the first to the sun-god, and the second to the popular Canaanite goddess of fertility and war, the sister and consort of Baal. It has been suggested that Beth-shemesh is another name for Kadesh-naphtali. Beth-anath may be modern el-Ba'neh, twelve miles east of Acre.

34. And the Amorites forced the children of Dan into the mountain. The Amorite is here synonymous with the Canaanite. The term appears in Assyrian documents as a designation of people from the west (of Mesopotamia). The Danites appear to have pushed into the lowlands, where they were checked and pushed back into a small district around Zorah and Eshtaol (Jud 13–16). Because this territory was too small, the main body of the tribe migrated to Laish, at the headwaters of the Jordan, which they renamed Dan (Jud 18).

35. But the Amorites would dwell in mount Heres in Aijalon, and in Shaalbim. Heres means "Sun Mountain" and is doubtless the equivalent of Beth-shemesh (Josh 15:10) and Ir-shemesh (Josh 19:41). The site, known today as 'Ain-shems, is located on the south side of the Wadi Surar, opposite Zorah. Aijalon was located in the valley that bears the same name, fourteen miles from Jerusalem. It appears in the Amarna Letters (fourteenth century B.C.) as Aialuna. Shaalbim appears in Josh 19:42 as Shaalabbin. It may tentatively be identified with Selbit, three miles northwest of Aijalon. The Joseph tribes did not drive out the Amorites from these sectors, but they did gain control over their territory. 36. And the coast of the Amorites was from the going up to Akrabbim, from the rock, and upward. The Ascent of Akrabbim (scorpions) leads up from the level of the southern end of the Dead Sea to that of the hill country of southern Judah. It forms the northern border of the Wilderness of Zin and also, in Bible times, it served as the boundary between Edom and Judah. Amorites occupied the territory north of the Ascent of Akrabbim at the period described in Judges 1. The reference to the rock (Hebrew, sela') should probably be interpreted as a proper name, Sela or Petra, the capital city of the Edomites. Petra was built in a valley surrounded by rocky cliffs, and its houses were partly hewn out of the natural rock. The Edomites were driven out of their mountain strongholds by the Nabataean Arabs, c. 300 B.C. (cf. Obadiah's prophecy).

B. Religious Background of the Period of the Judges. 2:1-5.

Although Israel had experienced the power of God during the period of the exodus from Egypt and the conquest of Canaan, they soon forgot the covenant they had made with God at Sinai. Idolatry was tolerated among them, and intermarriage with the Canaanites became commonplace.

1. An angel of the Lord came up from Gilgal to Bochim. The angel of the Lord was a theophany, an appearance of God in a form perceptible by the human senses. Such a manifestation had been seen by Hagar (Gen 16:7-12) and Moses (Ex 3:2-6). Bochim was probably located between Bethel and Shiloh, some twenty miles from the Dead Sea. I made you to go up out of Egypt. God identified himself as the One who has met the needs of his people in the hour of distress. His mercies should have elicited a grateful response. 2. Ye have not obeyed my voice. God had been faithful to his covenant, but Israel had forgotten her pledge of obedience to the Law given through Moses at Sinai. 3. I will not drive them out from before you. Israel had compromised her loyalty to God by her idolatry. The Lord declared that the inhabitants of Canaan would not be completely driven out, and that they would prove a snare to Israel. These words anticipate the history of the time of the Judges, when a series of oppressors subdued Israel. The gods of Canaan served as a temptation to the tribes to forget the God of Israel.

4. The people lifted up their voice, and wept. The message of the Angel of the Lord was one of judgment. Subsequent history indicates that the weeping was superficial, for Israel was not deterred from idolatrous practices. 5. They called the name of that place Bochim (weepers). Scripture frequently associates place names with significant episodes (cf. Bethel, Gen 28:16-19; Mahanaim, Gen 32:2; Gilgal, Josh 5:9).

II. History of the Judges. 2:6—16:31.

A. Israel's Failure to Subdue the Enemy Nations. 2:6—3:6.

Under Joshua the initial phase of the conquest of the land was accomplished. The land was divided among the tribes, but it was necessary for the Israelites to occupy the territory assigned to them.

7. The people served the Lord all the days of Joshua, and all the days of the elders that outlived Joshua. The generations of Joshua and his immediate successors remained true to the Lord because of their association with the great works of the Lord, that he did for Israel. These words form a transition from the account of Joshua's conquest of Canaan to the history of the Judges. They parallel the words of Josh 24:28-31. 8. And Joshua . . . died, being an hundred and ten years old. An hundred and ten years is the ideal length of life, according to the Egyptian papyri and stelae. Joseph is said to have had the same life span (Gen 50:26). Moses lived a decade longer (Deut 34:7). 9. And they buried him in the border of his inheritance in Timnath-heres. Timnath-heres, portion of the sun, is also rendered "Timnath-serah," double portion (Josh 19:50; 24:30). The traditional site is at Tibneh, seventeen miles northwest of Jerusalem.

10 b. There arose another generation after them, which knew not the Lord. The new generation forgot the mercies of God to Israel and the nation's covenant to obey the Law of the Lord. 11. And the children of Israel . . . served the Baalim. Baal was a fertility-god, whose worship was thought to bring productivity to mankind, animal life, and the produce of the field. Since Baal was worshiped in local manifestations (Baal-peor, Baal-gad, Baal-zeboul, etc.), the plural Baalim is used. 13. And they forsook the Lord, and served Baal and Ashtaroth. The Ashtaroth were the female counterparts to the Baalim. Ashtoreth was the Canaanite equivalent to Babylonian Ishtar, the goddess of love and fertility.

14. And the anger of the Lord was hot against Israel. Idolatry was regarded as a breech of covenant, and it involved immoral rites incompatible with the holiness God demanded of his people. They could not any longer stand before their enemies. The God of Israel was not powerless to protect his people from their spoilers. In the exercise of his government, however, he chose to use Israel's enemies as a means of chastening the rebellious people.

16. The Lord raised up judges. The punishment for idolatry was designed to bring Israel back to God. The Lord answered the penitential prayers of his people in their hours of distress, and raised up judges, i.e., saviours or deliverers. 17. And yet they would not hearken unto their judges, but they went a whoring after other gods. The ministry of the Judges had no lasting effect upon Israel. The Book of Judges records an unvarying cycle in which Israel repeatedly relapsed into idolatry. The fertility cult provided the language used in describing apostasy. Unfaithfulness to God is described as adultery. 18. And when the Lord raised them up judges, then the Lord was with the judge. The Lord enabled the Judges to lead the people of Israel victoriously against their foes. Both the victories and the defeats recorded in the book of Judges are interpreted as acts of God. 19. When the judge was dead . . . they returned, and corrupted themselves. A strong Judge could influence the people for God during his lifetime. The Judges did not form a dynasty, however. At the death of a Judge, the people tended to lapse into idolatry again.

21. I also will not henceforth drive out any from before them of the nations which Joshua left when he died. The status quo was to be maintained. Israel would not be forced out of Canaan, but neither would the Canaanites who were not destroyed by Joshua be dispossessed.

22. That through them I may prove Israel. From one point of view, Israel's failure to drive out the Canaanites was a means God used to chasten his people for their idolatry. It was also a means of testing Israel's faithfulness to him. 23. Therefore the Lord left those nations, without driving them out hastily. The conquests by Joshua took place over a relatively short period of time. The further conquests which led up to the monarchy of David and Solomon took a much longer time.

3:1. The nations which the Lord left. Those that had not been conquered by Joshua could not be dislodged by the generations of the Judges. 2. To teach them war. The presence of the enemy among the tribes of Israel helped train the Israelites in the art of warfare. 3. Five lords of the Philistines. The Philistines seem to have migrated to Palestine from Crete and neighboring islands. Leadership was vested in the lords of Ashdod, Ashkelon, Ekron, Gath, and Gaza. All the Canaanites. Important Canaanite strongholds were situated in the Valley of Esdraelon. The Sidonians. Inhabitants of the Phoenician city-state of Sidon. The term can refer to the Phoenicians as a people. Subsequently the city of Tyre took the place of leadership.

The Hivites that dwelt in mount Lebanon. Hivites were probably a branch of the Horites, or Hurrians, who established the kingdom of Mitanni in upper Mesopotamia about 1500 B.C. Horites spread rapidly in Canaan during the fifteenth and fourteenth centuries. One of the Egyptian words for Canaan is Huru-land. From mount Baal-hermon unto the entering in of Hamath. Baal-hermon may be identical with Baal-gad at the foot of Mount Hermon (Josh 11:17; 12:7). It was the northern limit of Joshua's conquest and is thought to have been on the western side of Mount Hermon. Hamath was a town on the Orontes River, about 150 miles north of Dan. The word translated entering in (l'bô) may conceal the name of a town, Lebo of Hamath, identified with modern Lebweh in the Beqa'a Valley, which separates the Lebanon Mountains from the Anti-Lebanon ranges. This was Hivite territory during the period of the Judges.

6. And they took their daughters to be their wives. Not only did the Israelites share the land with the tribes that had not been dispossessed by Joshua, but they intermarried with them and adopted their religious customs and beliefs.

B. The Oppressors and the Deliverers of Israel. 3:7–16:31.

After a general introduction which describes life during the period of the Judges, we are given a series of specific episodes. In each instance we read of Israel's idolatry, with its subsequent chastisement.

1) Chushan-rishathaim's Oppression Ended by Othniel. 3:8-11.

8. He sold them into the hand of Chushan-rishathaim. The first oppressor bore a name that means doubly wicked Chushan. This may be an epithet assigned to the man by his enemies. It is also possible that the word rishathaim is a Hebraized form of a foreign word, perhaps a place name. Chushan came from Mesopotamia, or, as the Jewish Publication Society version transliterates the Hebrew, Aram-naharaim. During the time of the Judges, the Hittites overran Mitanni, the state which served as a buffer in northern Mesopotamia between the Hittite and Assyrian kingdoms. During this time Canaan was nominally subject to Egypt. Chushan may have been an obscure Hittite prince who wished to challenge Egyptian power in Canaan. An alternate view suggests that Chushan was from Edom rather than from Aram. The two words look very much alike in Hebrew, and the proximity of Edom to the tribe of Judah is a point in favor of this interpretation. According to those who read Edom for Aram, the designation Naharaim is a later interpolation. Extensive military campaigns were carried on throughout the Fertile Crescent as early as the time of Sargon of Akkad (c. 2400 B.C.), so that a Mesopotamian origin for Chushan cannot be dismissed on a priori grounds. He is not mentioned elsewhere in the Bible, nor in extra-Biblical sources.

9. The Lord raised up . . . Othniel, the son of Kenaz. Othniel has already been introduced (1:13-15). Here he is termed a saviour (cf. AV marg.), which is a synonym for a "Judge." He saved his people from the oppression of Chushan.

11. The land had rest forty years. From the victories over Chushan until Othniel's death, Israel was free from foreign domination. The term forty years is a round number. Many scholars suggest that it represents a generation.

2) Eglon's Oppression Ended by Ehud. 3:12-30.

12. The Lord strengthened Eglon the king of Moab against Israel. After the death of Othniel, idolatry again became rampant among the Israelite tribes. The leader of the second oppression came from Moab, the land east of the Dead Sea and south of the Arnon River. 13. And he gathered unto him the children of Ammon and Amalek. The Ammonites were settled east and north of Moab, from the Arnon to the Jabbok. Sihon, king of the Amorites, had been defeated by Israel in this area before the conquest of Canaan. The nomadic Amalekites were bitter foes of Israel from the battle at Rephidim, on the way to Sinai, to their final destruction in the days of Hezekiah (I Chr 4:43). And possessed the city of palm trees. Eglon and his confederates invaded Canaan by the same route that Joshua had used earlier. They crossed the Jordan and captured the city of palm trees, or Jericho. The city destroyed by Joshua had occupied a strategic position, and evidently another city was built in the same area a short time after its destruction. The text implies a battle for the "city of palm trees" before it was occupied by Eglon and his allies.

15. The Lord raised them up a deliverer, Ehud the son of Gera, a Benjamite, a man lefthanded. The Benjamites seem to have had a tendency to be left-handed (Jud 20:16), and in at least one instance they are described as being ambidextrous (I Chr 12:2). By him the children of Israel sent a present unto Eglon. The present was doubtless the tribute demanded of Israel by the Moabite oppressors.

16. But Ehud made him a dagger which had two edges, of a cubit length. Ehud provided himself with a sword with which he intended to kill the Moabite king. 18. He sent away the people that bare the present. Ehud dismissed the large retinue of men who had accompanied him. Since tribute was paid in silver, gold, cattle, and other bulky materials, it required a large number of men to bear it. By dismissing the men, Ehud allayed any suspicion of evil intent. 19. But he himself turned again from the quarries that were by Gilgal. The word translated quarries (pᵉsîlîm) is usually rendered graven images, and the LXX so renders it here. After dismissing his retinue, Ehud turned back to address the king again. I have a secret errand unto thee, O king. A message was sent to Eglon requesting a private audience. The implication was that the errand was of such import that it could not be entrusted to a minor courtier.

20. And he was sitting in a summer parlour. Eglon was in his 'ălîyâ when Ehud approached. The 'ălîyâ was an additional story raised above the flat roof of the house at one corner. It usually had just one room, with latticed windows on all sides to provide ventilation. The 'ălîyâ was the coolest room in the house. And Ehud said, I have a message from God unto thee. Ehud's words implied that he was the bearer of a message from the God of Israel to the Moabite king. Some commentators paraphrase the message: "I have God's business with you, a divine commission to execute you." and he [Eglon] arose out of his seat. The Moabite king presumably arose as a sign of reverence for the divine oracle. This may have been planned by Ehud so that he might get within striking distance of Eglon.

21. And Ehud put forth his left hand, and took the dagger from his right thigh, and thrust it into his belly. Ehud's plan was successful. Without arousing suspicion, he approached the king, then suddenly drew his weapon and murdered the oppressor of Israel. 22. And the haft also went in after the blade. The blow was quick and forceful. Ehud left the weapon in the wound. And the dirt came out. Such a wound in the abdomen forced out the excrement. This is the most natural interpretation, and it is physiologically correct.

23. Then Ehud went forth through the porch. The misdᵉrôn, translated porch, through which Ehud escaped, cannot be positively identified. The word appears only once in Scripture.

24. Surely he covereth his feet in his summer chamber. The servants of Eglon evidently saw Ehud leave. As there had been no disturbance, they had no reason to be suspicious. They did not intrude on Eglon's privacy, assuming that he was caring for his personal needs. To "cover the feet" is a euphemism for "to relieve one's self." 25. And they tarried till they were ashamed. They waited until they saw that they were mistaken. They took a key, and opened. The type of lock used in Biblical times was common in Palestine until quite recently. A bolt was shut by hand. A number of pin tumblers dropped into corresponding holes in the bolt and locked it. The key, used for unlocking only, was usually a flat piece of wood with pins at one end corresponding in number and position to the tumblers of the lock. The length corresponded to the depth of the bolt. The bolt was undercut so that the key could be slipped lengthwise under it until the pins lifted the tumblers and allowed the bolt to be pushed back.

26. And Ehud escaped . . . unto Seirath. By the time Eglon's servants discovered his dead body, Ehud had reached the edge of the highlands of Ephraim. The exact location of Seirath is not known. 27. He blew a trumpet in the mountain of Ephraim. The trumpet called men to battle (cf. I Sam 13:3,4). The mountains of Ephraim comprise the central mountain range of Palestine from the Plain of Esdraelon south to the environs of Jerusalem. 28. And they went down after him, and took the fords of Jordan toward Moab. The Israelites rallied to the call of Ehud. They seized the fords of the Jordan which would be used by the fleeing Moabites (cf. Josh 2:7; II Sam 19:15). 29. And they slew of Moab at that time about ten thousand men. Although properly regarded as a round number, the ten thousand men must have been a serious loss to Moab. Moabite power over Israel was effectively broken.

30. The land had rest fourscore years. Cf. 3:11. Nothing is said of the Judgeship of Ehud after his victory over the Moabites. We read, however, of eighty years (two generations) during which the land was free from invasion.

3) Israel Delivered from the Philistines by Shamgar. 3:31.

And after him was Shamgar the son of Anath. Shamgar is a foreign (Hurrian) name. Anath was the name of the Canaanite goddess of sex and war, sister of Baal. Hence, son of Anath may be interpreted to mean "the warrior." Shamgar is mentioned in 5:6 as living in days when Israel's foes had gained undisputed control over the land. He probably was a contemporary of Deborah and Barak. Which slew of the Philistines six hundred men with an ox goad. This is the first of two Philistine oppressions during the time of the Judges. The second (13:1–16:31) is described in the account of Samson. Shamgar is known for but one episode. Using an ox goad, he killed six hundred Philistines. The ox goad might have been as long as eight feet. At one end it had a spike, and on the other a chisel-shaped blade, which was used in cleaning the plow. When necessary, the ox goad could serve as a substitute for a spear. And he also delivered Israel. The usual time references are not given in the case of Shamgar. He probably should be thought of as a heroic individual who defeated Israel's enemies rather than as a ruler over Israel during the time of the Judges.

4) Oppression by Jabin and Sisera Ended by Deborah and Barak. 4:1–5:31.

4:1. And the children of Israel again did evil in the sight of the Lord when Ehud was dead. During the lifetime of Ehud, Israel remained true to the Lord. Subsequently, however, a fresh outbreak of idolatry ushered in another period of oppression.

2. The Lord sold them into the hand of Jabin, king of Canaan, that reigned in Hazor. The earlier oppressions were from outside the land of Canaan. Jabin, however, a Canaanite ruler, led an uprising against the Israelites who, under Joshua, had dispossessed them. Hazor was the most important stronghold in northern Canaan. The captain of whose host was Sisera, which dwelt in Harosheth of the Gentiles. Sisera's home, Hărōshet haggôyim, is modern Tell 'Amar, located at the place where the Kishon River passes through a narrow gorge to enter the Plain of Acre. It is about ten miles northwest of Meggido.

3. He had nine hundred chariots of iron. See 1:19, where the Philistines are similarly described as possessing chariots of iron. These were most formidable war equipment to the Israelites, who had not yet entered the Iron Age. Twenty years he mightily oppressed the children of Israel. For half a generation Israel was oppressed by the Canaanites, who used their strategic locations in the Valley of Esdraelon as vantage points from which to expand their holdings.

4. And Deborah, a prophetess, the wife of Lapidoth, she judged Israel at that time. Deborah is described as both a prophetess and a Judge. At a time of despair she aroused her people to fight.

5. And she dwelt under the palm tree of Deborah. Instead of dwelt we might read sat. Part of Deborah's responsibility as a Judge was to sit as arbitress in the settlement of disputes. The particular tree associated with her Judgeship was between Ramah and Beth-el. Ramah was in Benjamin, north of Jerusalem. This is the area in which Samuel subsequently judged Israel (I Sam 7:16).

6. And she sent and called Barak the son of Abinoam out of Kedesh-naphtali. Kedesh-naphtali was a City of Refuge (Josh 20:7; cf. 12:22). This was the part of Israel closest to the Canaanite oppressors. Go and draw toward mount Tabor. Barak was ordered to muster the armies of Israel at Mount Tabor, in the northeastern part of the Plain of Esdraelon. 7. And I will draw unto thee to the river Kishon, Sisera . . . and I will deliver him into thine hand. Deborah spoke as a prophetess. God promised through her to bring destruction to Sisera's armies.

8. If thou wilt go with me, then I will go. Barak wanted the assurance that the prophetess would accompany him, thus insuring success in battle. 9. And she said, I will surely go with thee . . . the Lord shall sell Sisera into the hand of a woman. Deborah promised to accompany Barak, but she declared that a woman would be the heroine. This anticipates the part played in the defeat of the Canaanites by Jael, the wife of Heber. 10. And Barak called Zebulon and Naphtali to Kedesh. The two northern tribes had the responsibility of meeting the threat from Sisera.

11. Now Heber the Kenite, which was of the children of Hobab, the father-in-law of Moses. The sacred historian provides some background material concerning the Kenites. They appear to have been nomadic smiths whom Moses first met during his sojourn in the desert before he became leader of the Exodus. Heber had separated himself from the main body of his tribe and had settled near Kedesh.

12. And they showed Sisera that Barak the son of Abinoam was gone up to mount Tabor. Sisera, being informed of Barak's movements, assembled his forces, including the nine hundred iron chariots, and marched from Harosheth to the Kishon. 14. So Barak went down from mount Tabor, and ten thousand men after him. Assured by Deborah that God was about to bring a great victory to Israel, Barak and his ten thousand men sallied forth against the Canaanite army in the valley. 15. And the Lord discomfited Sisera. The Canaanites were panic-stricken. The sudden onslaught of the Israelite army and the storm that caused the Kishon to overflow its banks (5:21) forced the Canaanites to flee from their chariots, which they left mired in the valley.

17. Sisera fled away on his feet to the tent of Jael the wife of Heber the Kenite. With the rest of his army destroyed, Sisera's prime concern was to save his own life. For there was peace between Jabin the king of Hazor and the house of Heber the Kenite. Sisera had reason to think that he would be safe if he reached the house of Heber. Evidently the Canaanites had not oppressed the nomadic Kenites in their midst, and the Kenites had not taken part in the Israelites uprising against them.

18. And Jael went out to meet Sisera, and said unto him, Turn in, my lord. Jael offered the hospitality of her tent to the frightened Sisera. Whether or not she invited him into her tent in order to kill him is a matter of inference. She covered him with a mantle. The exact meaning of the word rendered mantle is uncertain. It may also be rendered tent curtain. 19. She opened a bottle of milk, and gave him drink, and covered him. Sisera asked for water, but Jael opened the lamb or goatskin bottle in which milk was kept and poured him a bowlful. 20. Stand in the door of the tent. Sisera had reason to suspect that the Israelites would pursue him. He asked Jael to tell them that he was not in her tent. Her acts of hospitality led him to feel that he could trust her.

21. Then Jael, Heber's wife, took a nail of the tent . . . and smote the nail into his temples . . . . So he died. Among the Bedouins it is the responsibility of the women to pitch the tents, and this may have been true in antiquity. The tent pin and the mallet that Jael used were probably of wood. Sisera, exhausted from his difficult escape, was sound asleep, and Jael considered this her opportunity to kill the enemy of Israel. Some commentators suggest that Jael was not sympathetic with the neutrality of her husband (4:17), and that her actions toward Sisera were motivated by her loyalty toward Israel. Whether or not her murder of Sisera was premeditated is beside the point, as far as the record in Judges is concerned. From the Israelite point of view, she was a heroine for bringing death to Sisera. 22. And, behold, as Barak pursued Sisera, Jael came out to meet him. Jael brought Barak the good news that the Canaanite captain was dead.

23. So God subdued on that day Jabin the king of Canaan before the children of Israel. Scripture does not abstract God from historical processes. The act of Jael is described, but the victory is ascribed to God. The attitude toward history throughout the Bible is consistent. God allows the heathen to chasten his people, and God raises up deliverers to save them. Cause and effect is meaningful at the historical level, but God is seen as the Power behind all that takes place, good or bad. It is not necessary to justify Jael's act. Even wicked deeds are represented in Scripture as furthering God's ultimate purposes (cf. Acts 2:23, 24; Ps 76:10).

5:1. Then sang Deborah and Barak. The account of the defeat of Sisera is given in two recensions, one in prose (Jud 4), and the other in poetry (Jud 5). Most critical authorities ascribe very great antiquity to the Song of Deborah, dating it near the events it describes.

2. Praise ye the Lord for the avenging of Israel, when the people willingly offered themselves. The ode commences with an exhortation to praise the Lord. The words that immediately follow have been interpreted in varying ways. One rendering preserves the parallelism of the original: For the leading of the leaders in Israel, for the volunteering of the people. Quite different is the translation: For that they let the long hair go loose in Israel. The latter suggests either that Israel became practically a nation of Nazarites, or that they enjoyed the freedom and strength with which the long hair of the Nazarite was associated. 3. Hear, O ye kings; give ear, O ye princes. The rulers of the nations are urged to consider the mighty acts of the God of Israel.

4. Lord, when thou wentest out of Seir, when thou marchedst out of the field of Edom. In contrast to the fertility-gods of Canaan, the God of Israel was associated with the arid regions of the south, particularly Sinai and Horeb. As he had entered into covenant with his people at Sinai, and as he had provided for them during the wilderness wandering, so now he is pictured as coming out of Seir and Edom to deliver his people from their oppressors. 5. The mountains melted from before the Lord. The RSV renders this, The mountains quaked before the Lord. Moore prefers The mountains streamed, which is comparable to the RV flowed down. The picture is of God setting forth from his abode to assist his people in the conflict with Sisera. All nature was convulsed as God acted in power. The imagery is poetic and is designed to impress upon the mind of the reader the awesomeness of the Divine activity. Even that Sinai. The Israelites doubtless associated Sinai with the theophany to Moses and the giving of the Law. There Israel entered into covenant with God. Here God is pictured as coming from the south, even Sinai, to deliver his people.

6. The highways were unoccupied, and the travellers walked through byways. The Canaanites had secured control of the main roads throughout the land, so that the Israelites who had to travel used the byways, literally, crooked paths, the circuitous bypaths unfrequented by the enemy. 7. The inhabitants of the villages ceased. Peasants deserted their villages for the protection of the walled cities. Others (e.g., Jew. Pub. Soc. vers.) suggest the rendering, The rulers ceased in Israel. Until that I, Deborah, arose. The verb may be either the first person or the second person, feminine, with an archaic ending. Most recent translations render, Until that thou didst arise, Deborah (JPS; similarly RSV). A mother in Israel. The phrase occurs in II Sam 20:19, where it denotes a city.

8. They chose new gods. These words have puzzled Biblical scholars. Their most obvious meaning is that Israel, devoid of help from God, turned to idolatry. Some commentators make God the subject, reading, God (ʾĔlōhîm) chose something new (so the Peshitta and the Vulgate). Others translate ʾĔlōhîm as judges, although such a usage is foreign to the Book of Judges. It seems best to render the words as in the AV, seeing in them a description of the apostasy of the people of Israel and their desperate attempt to gain help from idols. Then was war in the gates. Raids of the enemy reached the very gates of the Israelite cities. Was there a shield or spear seen among forty thousand in Israel? Either the Israelites were unarmed, or they feared to let their arms be seen by the enemy.

9. My heart is toward the governors of Israel, that offered themselves willingly among the people. The poet expresses gratitude for the leaders of Israel who proved faithful in a time of crisis.

10. Ye that ride on white asses. All classes of people had reason to be thankful. The rich merchants and the nobility rode on white asses. Ye that . . . walk by the way. The poorer classes had to journey on foot in carrying on their business. 11. There shall they rehearse the righteous acts of the Lord. Some expressions in this verse are obscure to the modern reader. Albright suggests that at the signal of the cymbals between the drum beats, the people were to repeat the words of praise. In the AV, interpretive words are supplied in italics: They that are delivered; i.e., from the noise of archers—implying that enemy archers are meant. Keil and Delitzsch translate: With the voice of the archers among drawers of water, there praise ye the righteous acts of the Lord. This presupposes a scene of victory in which the warriors, having returned from the field of battle, mingle among the women at the watering-troughs, recounting to them the victories wrought by God.

12. Awake, awake, Deborah. These words form an introduction to the second part of the song, which describes the conflict and victory. 13. Then he made him that remaineth have dominion. The people of the Lord, thought of as but a remnant, would rule the mighty. The RSV renders it: Then down marched the remnant of the noble. 14. Out of Ephraim was there a root of them against Amalek. The RV renders it: Out of Ephraim came down they whose root is in Amalek; i.e., Amalekite nomads had invaded central Canaan. Out of Machir came down governors. Machir was a branch of the tribe of Manasseh. The part of Manasseh that settled west of the Jordan took part in the conflict.

16. Why abodest thou among the sheepfolds? Certain of the tribes did not take part in the battle against the Canaanites. They are the subject of a series of taunts. 17. Gilead abode beyond Jordan. No help came from the two and one-half tribes which settled east of the Jordan. Similarly, Dan, Asher, Zebulon, and Naphtali are chided for their indolence.

19. The kings came and fought. After the account of the attitude of the tribes, the poet describes the battle itself. Sisera led a confederacy of kings against Israel. In Taanach, by the waters of Megiddo. Taanach, located five miles southeast of Megiddo, commands one of the passes to the Plain of Esdraelon. The waters of Megiddo are the Kishon and its tributaries. They took no gain of money. This may be interpreted as a taunt, in which case it would assert that the campaign was profitless. It may also refer to the kings who, in their eagerness to fight against Israel, did not accept the pay of hirelings.

20. The stars in their courses fought against Sisera. The God of Israel intervened on behalf of his people. The very forces of nature itself were arrayed against the Canaanite. 21. The river of Kishon swept them away. In this area the Kishon is not normally a dangerous stream. At the critical moment of battle it swelled into a torrent that rendered the Canaanite chariots useless. 22. Then were the horsehoofs broken. The JPS renders, Then did the horsehoofs stamp; i.e., stamp the earth in their efforts to escape.

23. Curse ye Meroz. The town of Meroz did not join the Israelites in their attack upon the Canaanites. Its site is unknown. Some think it was located along the route of Sisera's flight, and that its inhabitants failed to capture him. The curse on Meroz may be contrasted with the blessing on Jael. 24. Blessed above women shall Jael the wife of Heber the Kenite be. In contrast to the cowardice of the men of Meroz, the devotion of Jael stands out in bold relief. Blessed above women is a Hebrew superlative, meaning, "Most blessed of women."

25. Water he asked, milk she gave him. The pronouns effectively identify the characters in the story, Sisera and Jael. She brought forth butter in a lordly dish. The word hem'â, rendered butter in the AV, was artificially soured milk. It was made by shaking milk in the skin bottle in which it was stored, and fermenting it with the stale milk adhering to the skin from previous use. The beverage is still prepared by Bedouin Arabs (cf. C. M. Doughty, Arabia Deserta, I, 325). The lordly dish would have been a dish of large size, a vessel fit for a lord.

26. She put her hand to the nail. The prose account in 4:21 helps explain the action. Jael took the tent pin in her left hand and the mallet in her right hand, and so smote the sleeping Sisera. The act was one of bravery in that she risked her own life to kill Israel's enemy. Had Sisera awakened, Jael would have been at his mercy. 27. At her feet . . . he fell down dead. The falling need not imply that Sisera was in an upright position when he was smitten. The poet is describing the result of the blow of Jael. The fact that Israel's enemy had been killed was an occasion for rejoicing, and the poet almost gloats over Jael's triumph. The fact that the powerful Sisera was killed by a woman was a particular occasion for rejoicing.

28. The mother of Sisera looked out at a window. The scene – a most human one–now shifts to Sisera's home. Sisera's mother was concerned about her son. She wondered why he was late in returning from battle. 29. Her wise ladies answered. The women of rank who were with her attempted to encourage her. They were "wise" but in this instance did not know the truth. 30. Have they not divided the prey. It takes some time to divide the spoils of war. The victorious army must make proper distribution. They killed the men, divided the women among the warriors (to every man a damsel or two), and distributed the spoil itself at the behest of the victor. This was the normal practice in ancient warfare. The strong irony of the present reference is that Sisera was not sharing such fruits of victory, but was a corpse at the foot of a woman, his murderess.

31. So let all thine enemies perish, O Lord. The poet suddenly breaks off his graphic description of Sisera's fate with a prayer to God. May all of God's enemies perish as Sisera perished. Conversely, let them that love him be as the sun when he goeth forth in his might. The sun, annihilating the darkness of night by its invincible power, is here symbolic of the strength of those blessed by God. And the land had rest forty years. The destruction of Sisera brought relief to the harassed Israelites. For a generation Israel was free from outside interference.

5) Midianite Oppression Ended by Gideon. 6:1–8:35.

6:1. The Lord delivered them into the hand of Midian. The cycle of sin, punishment, and deliverance was repeated. The Midianites were nomads who dwelt in the region east and southeast of the Dead Sea. Their genealogy is traced through Abraham's concubine, Keturah (Gen 25:1,2). 2. Because of the Midianites the children of Israel made them the dens which are in the mountains, and caves, and strong holds. The Midianite raids were so effective that the Israelites had to resort to caves and mountain retreats as places of refuge.

3. When Israel had sown . . . the Midianites came up, and the Amalekites, and the children of the east. Associated with the Midianites were the Amalekites (cf. 3:13) and the children of the east, a general term for the nomads of the Syrian desert. 4. And they encamped against them. In typically nomad fashion they settled temporarily in the land, using it as pasture for their herds and flocks, and taking its produce for themselves. Israel was powerless to interfere with these Bedouin movements. 5. Both they and their camels were without number. The use of the domesticated camel made possible, for the first time, raids involving long distances. The Bible refers to camels earlier in the Patriarchal Age (Gen 24:10 ff.), but this is the first reference to an organized raid in which camels were used.

8. The Lord sent a prophet unto the children of Israel. The Midianite oppression brought the people to the place where they cried out to God for deliverance. A prophet appeared in their midst who reminded them of God's merciful deliverance of his people from Egypt, and their subsequent disobedience.

11. And there came an angel of the Lord. The message to Israel came from a prophet, but the call to Gideon came from the angel of the Lord. The definite article should be inserted, as in the RV and the RSV. As in 2:1-5, this may best be understood as a theophany–an appearance of God himself to Gideon. And . . . Gideon threshed wheat by the wine press, to hide it from the Midianites. Read with the RSV: Gideon . . . was beating out wheat in the wine press. Gideon, along with his fellow Israelites, had to work in secret lest the Midianites seize the grain. Within the confines of a wine press only a small amount of wheat could be threshed at a time. This was an act of desperation.

12. The Lord is with thee, thou mighty man of valour. The message of the angel of the Lord seemed to be a mockery, for Gideon felt powerless to meet the need of his people. 13. Oh my Lord, if the Lord be with us, why then is all this befallen us? The power of Israel's enemies seemed to show that God was not with his people. Gideon asked concerning the miracles of the past, and wondered why he did not see them in his generation.

14. Go in this thy might, and thou shalt save Israel from the hand of the Midianites. Although Israel was weak before her foes, God promised Gideon might to deliver his people. 15. Wherewith shall I save Israel? Israel's leaders uniformly exhibited a spirit of humility before God (Ex 3:11; Isa 6:5; Jer 1:6). Gideon protested that his situation in life precluded his being a leader in Israel. 17. Show me a sign that thou talkest with me. Gideon wanted a supernatural act performed in his presence to confirm the fact that this was indeed a message from God.

19. And Gideon went in, and made ready a kid. This was to serve as the offering (minḥâ) which he desired to present to his guest (6:18). The terminology is purposely ambiguous. In one sense Gideon prepared such food as he might normally set before a guest whom he wished to honor. Such food, however, might also serve as an offering to God. A sign that God had accepted the offering would validate the message that was a source of bewilderment to Gideon. 20. Take the flesh and the unleavened cakes, and lay them upon this rock. The angel gave orders for setting out the food on an improvised altar. 21. There rose up fire out of the rock, and consumed the flesh and the unleavened cakes. This was the mark of divine acceptance (Lev 9:24; I Kgs 18:38), the kind of sign for which Gideon had asked.

22. Alas, O Lord God! Gideon was frightened because he had seen the (not an) angel of the Lord. Jehovah had said to Moses: "There shall no man see me and live" (Ex 33:20). When the Angel of the Lord disappeared, Gideon feared that the theophany was an omen of impending death. 23. And the Lord said unto him, Peace be unto thee; fear not: thou shalt not die. God assured Gideon that he was not to die. The message of the angelic Visitor was validated, and Gideon would prove a "mighty man of valour." 24. Then Gideon built an altar there. He built the altar to commemorate God's message to him. Shālôm is the Hebrew word for "peace." The altar was still standing at the time the Book of Judges was written.

25. Take thy father's young bullock. Since idolatry was the prevailing sin of Israel, Gideon was commanded to show his loyalty to Israel's God and his abhorrence of the Baalist cult. Gideon was to take a bullock for the worship of the Lord. Then he was to destroy the altar of Baal and cut down the Asherah (AV grove) which was beside it. This grove represented the female element in the fertility cult and consisted of a wooden post, or a stump of a tree, which was set up beside the altar of Baal. 26. Build an altar unto the Lord thy God upon the top of this rock. Gideon was to build an altar to the God of Israel and use the wood of the Asherah in the preparation of his sacrifice.

27. Then Gideon . . . did as the Lord had said unto him. Ten men were associated with Gideon in this act, which was carried out at night as a precaution against meeting opposition from the Israelites who were sympathetic with Baal worship. 29. And they said one to another, Who hath done this thing? On the next day the villagers were incensed over an act which they interpreted as sacrilege. 31. Will ye plead for Baal? When the men demanded that Gideon be killed for his act of desecration, Joash, his father, sprang to his defense. He said, If he be a god, let him plead for himself. In other words, a god who cannot defend himself is not worthy of the devotion of his people. This was the import of the assertion of Joash, who further threatened death to any who would espouse the cause of Baal.

32. He called him Jerubbaal. This was an alternate name for Gideon. It is here interpreted as meaning, "Let Baal strive (yārêb Ba'al). It thus serves as a kind of motto for the adversaries of Baalism. Subsequently the name Jerubbesheth was substituted for Jerubbaal (II Sam 11:21), just as Ishbosheth (II Sam 2:8) replaced Eshbaal (I Chr 8:33). The term ba'al in the earliest stratum of Hebrew life was synonymous with ădōnāy. Both terms meant "lord" or "master" and could be used of Israel's God. After the period of conflict with the Phoenician Baal cult, the word became synonymous with idolatry. The word bōshet, "shame," was considered a suitable substitute for the Baal component in personal names.

33. Then all the Midianites . . . pitched in the valley of Jezreel. The valley extends from Mount Carmel to the Jordan valley. One branch passes between Mount Tabor and the Hill of Moreh, and another between the Hill of Moreh and Mount Gilboa. Because Jezreel leads into the heart of Palestine, it has been a battleground throughout history. 34. But the Spirit of the Lord came upon Gideon. Literally, clothed Gideon (JPS version). God's spirit enveloped Gideon so that he became the instrument used of the Spirit in accomplishing the divine purpose. And Abiezer was gathered after him. Gideon's clan, the Abiezrites, were the first to rally to his side. Manasseh, Asher, Zebulon, and Naphtali subsequently aided Gideon in his campaign against the Midianites.

37. Behold, I will put a fleece of wool in the floor. Gideon again sought a sign by which he might know whether or not to expect victory in battle. He placed a fleece on the threshing-floor and declared that he would be assured of victory if he found the fleece wet with dew but the surrounding ground still dry. 38. On the morrow he found the fleece wet with dew, and he wringed the dew out of the fleece, a bowlful of water. To make doubly certain, he proposed that on the next day the fleece be dry but the ground about covered with dew. The double sign, which precluded naturalistic interpretations, was evidence to Gideon that God would bring victory to him and his army.

7:1. Then Jerubbaal, who is Gideon, . . . rose up early, and pitched beside the well of Harod. The Spring of Harod may be 'Ain Jalûd, located at the foot of Mount Gilboa. The Israelites under Gideon encamped there, and the Midianites settled across the valley at the Hill of Moreh, four miles away.

2. The people that are with thee are too many. A large army might have given rise to a measure of self-reliance. God desired to teach his people the necessity of trusting in him. 3. Whosoever is fearful and afraid, let him return. In the first stage of reducing the size of the army, each individual was permitted to leave of his own volition. About two-thirds of the army left, but there were still too many men for God's purpose.

4. Bring them down unto the water, and I will try them for thee there. A further division took place at the water, where the men used two different methods of drinking. Those who bowed on their knees to drink were dismissed, whereas those who lapped with their tongues as a dog lappeth (v. 5) were kept in Gideon's army. The latter seem to have taken water in their hands (v. 6) and stood upright while lapping the water. Men drinking thus would be prepared for sudden attack. Josephus interprets this passage differently: Those who lapped were the greatest cowards in the army, for they were afraid to drink in the usual manner in the presence of the enemy. God, according to this view, showed his grace in using the worst men of the army to defeat the Midianites! The passage, however, does not pass moral judgment on the two groups, but does suggest the means by which the numbers were reduced so that God's grace might be made manifest. 7. By the three hundred men that lapped will I save you. God planned to manifest his grace in using a small army to defeat Israel's enemy.

9. Arise, get thee down unto the host. The command implies an immediate attack. During the Exodus spies were sent from Kadesh-barnea (Num 13) to spy out the land of Canaan. And Joshua sent spies to Jericho before he attacked it (Josh 2). Gideon, however, was to attack the Midianites at once. 10. But if thou fear to go down, go thou with Phurah thy servant down to the host. Phurah (also written Purah) was the page, or armor-bearer, of Gideon. In spite of God's promise, Gideon must have felt some hesitation in leading an army against the enemy. He had never led an army before, and his men were untrained and inexperienced.

11. And thou shalt hear what they say. The fears of the Midianites would prove a source of encouragement to Gideon. Afterward shall thy hands be strengthened. God would use these experiences to prepare Gideon to lead Israel to victory.

12. And the Midianites . . . lay . . . in the valley like grasshoppers. This verse is an example of the use of hyperbole in Scripture. Compared with the three hundred men in Gideon's army, the Midianites and their allies seemed to be an innumerable host. They are here likened to an army of grasshoppers that invades an area, devours all the vegetation, and leaves desolation in its wake. 13. There was a man that told a dream unto his fellow. Dreams were considered to contain revelations of the future. The Midianite dreamed that a cake of barley bread tumbled upon the tent of Midian and destroyed it. Barley was the cheapest grain in Palestine, and its use here may underscore the poverty of Israel. The dream was interpreted as evidence that God was about to use Israel to destroy the hosts of Midian. Gideon, having learned of the fear in the hearts of the Midianites, returned confidently to his camp and prepared for the attack.

16. And he divided the three hundred men into three companies. Gideon deployed his forces in such a way as to simulate an attack from three sides at the same time. The actual method used by Gideon was a kind of psychological warfare. He made use of horns (Heb. shôpārôt, "rams' horns"), empty pitchers, and torches. The pitchers were to conceal the lights until the right moment. Gideon wished to stage a surprise attack. In the midst of the night the Midianites would be awakened by the sound of the horns and at the same time would see sudden bursts of light in the darkness. Gideon thus expected, with God's help, to throw the enemy camp into consternation.

19. In the beginning of the middle watch. The night was divided into three watches of four hours each, the first beginning at 6:00 P.M. They blew the trumpets, and brake the pitchers. The sound of the horns would signal the call to battle. The breaking of the pitchers would simulate the clash of arms. As the Midianites awoke, each would think that the battle had already begun. 20. The sword of the Lord and of Gideon. The war cry added to the sound of the shôphārim and the breaking of pitchers to strike panic among the Midianites. The RSV reads, A sword for the Lord and for Gideon.

22. And the Lord set every man's sword against his fellow. In the confusion, the Midianites and their allies began attacking one another. Gideon's army was comparatively weak, but the enemy army put itself to rout. The Israelites followed up their advantage and pursued the enemy. And the host fled to Beth-shittah. Beth-shittah (house of acacia) was located somewhere between the Valley of Jezreel and Zererah in the Jordan Valley. Some scholars equate Zererah with Zarethan (Josh 3:16). As far as the border of Abel-meholah, by Tabbath. Abel-meholah (field of dancing) has been identified by Nelson Glueck with Tell-el-Maqlûb in the Jordan Valley. Others prefer a site on the west side of the Jordan about twelve miles south of Beth-shean. It is best known as the birthplace of the prophet Elisha. 23. And the men of Israel . . . pursued after the Midianites. The victory of Gideon's three hundred men served as the cue for a general campaign to rid the land of the Midianites.

24. Take before them the waters unto Beth-barah and Jordan. It was Gideon's purpose to cut off the escape routes in order to bring about the destruction of the enemy. Beth-barah may be located south of Beth-shean, facing the Wadi Fāra'a. 25. And they slew Oreb upon the rock Oreb, and Zeeb they slew at the winepress of Zeeb. The names mean raven and wolf respectively. Names were given to the places to commemorate the victory over these Midianite princes. And brought the heads of Oreb and Zeeb to Gideon. As trophies of victory, the heads of the Midianite princes were taken to Gideon.

8:1. And the men of Ephraim . . . did chide with him sharply. The Ephraimites were angered that Gideon had not enlisted their aid earlier in the battle with the Midianites. Since the victor divided the spoil, they suspected Gideon of trying to deprive them of the spoils of war. 2. Is not the gleaning of the grapes of Ephraim better than the vintage of Abiezer? Gideon's reply stands in marked contrast to that of Jephthah (12:1-6). He assured the men of Ephraim that theirs was the greater accomplishment. Ephraim had taken the Midianite chieftains, whereas the clan of Abiezer (Gideon's clan) had only performed a preparatory function. Gideon's soft answer satisfied the Ephraimites.

4. And Gideon came to Jordan. Gideon and his band of three hundred pursued the Midianite kings, Zebah and Zalmunna, across the Jordan. 5. Give, I pray you, loaves of bread. Gideon and his army passed through Succoth, east of the Jordan, north of the Jabbok. Since the army was weakened through hunger, Gideon asked the men of Succoth for loaves (lit., circles) of bread. The officials of the city chose to go their separate way, with no concern for the welfare of their brethren in Canaan. They taunted Gideon, asking him if Zebah and Zalmunna were already in his hands that he made such a demand. Gideon threatened to punish the men of Succoth after his defeat of the Midianite kings, and then he moved on. 8. And he went up thence to Penuel. At Penuel, east of Succoth, Gideon made the same request and received a similar answer. The men of Penuel prided themselves upon their tower, which served as a stronghold during periods of attack. Gideon threatened to destroy the tower on his return in peace – that is, as victor over the Midianites.

10. Now Zebah and Zalmunna were in Karkor. The place is not identified. Its name means soft, even ground. 11. And Gideon went up by the way of them that dwelt in tents. The Midianites were escaping into the desert area, which was populated only by tent-dwelling nomads. They did not expect Gideon to pursue them that far. On the east of Nobah and Jogbehah. Jogbehah can be identified with Jubeihat, fifteen miles southeast of Penuel. The host was secure. The Midianites thought they were sufficiently far removed from Gideon's men to relax their guard. They fancied themselves secure, and so were surprised by Gideon. 12. He . . . took the two kings of Midian . . . and discomfited all the host. When the kings were captured, fresh terror fell upon the Midianite armies.

13. And Gideon . . . returned . . . before the sun was up. Read with the RSV, returned . . . by the ascent of Heres. Somewhere along the route he met a youth from whom he received information concerning the officials and elders of Succoth. 14. He described unto him the princes of Succoth. Read instead: And he wrote down for him the princes of Succoth. Writing was widely known by the time of the Judges. Our first written documents antedate 3000 B.C. Documents from Ras Shamra (ancient Ugarit) in Canaan date from the fifteenth century B.C. 16. With them he taught the men of Succoth. See 8:7, Gideon's threat: "When the Lord has given Zebah and Zalmunna into my hand, I will flail your flesh with the thorns of the wilderness and with briers." Although the exact form of punishment is not certain, Gideon recompensed the men of Succoth for their refusal to help him. 17. And he beat down the tower of Penuel, and slew the men of the city. This, too, was in accord with the earlier threat (8:9).

18. What manner of men were they whom ye slew at Tabor? Literally, Where are they . . . ? The question implies that Gideon knew that Zebah and Zalmunna had killed his brothers. The reply was in the form of arrogant flattery: "They were just such men as you, men of kingly figure" (ICC). 19. If ye had saved them alive, I would not slay you. By slaying his brothers, the Midianites imposed the duty of blood-revenge on Gideon (Deut 19:6). Gideon explained that they were his full brethren, i.e., not only of the same father but of the same mother as well. 20. And he said unto Jether his firstborn, Up, and slay them. This would have added to the humiliation of the Midianite kings. The boy did not draw his sword, however.

21. Rise thou, and fall upon us. With haughty spirit the Midianites challenged Gideon to slay them himself. Gideon slew Zebah and Zalmunna without further delay. And took away the ornaments that were on their camels' necks. The collars of the camels had metal, moon-shaped ornaments (Hebrew śaharon) attached to them. The word is related to the Aramaic and Syriac word for "moon" (śahar). Such ornaments were also worn by men (8:26) and women (Isa 3:18). They were doubtless originally amulets used to bring good luck or ward off evil spirits.

22. Rule thou over us, both thou, and thy son. Gideon had proved himself a man endued with the spirit of God in bringing victory over the Midianites. His people were ready to make him king. This is the first recorded attempt to establish a hereditary monarchy in Israel. Gideon's refusal is consistent with his recognition of the kingship of the Lord, the theocratic ideal stressed throughout the Book of Judges.

24. Give me every man the earrings of his prey. Having refused the kingdom, Gideon made a request for himself. He asked the warriors to give him the rings they had taken from the fallen Midianites. 27. And Gideon made an ephod thereof. About seventy pounds of gold was thus provided (8:26), and this was fashioned into an ephod. The exact nature of the ephod is uncertain. It was the name given to a part of the attire of the high priest (Ex 28:4). On occasion it was consulted as a source of divine guidance (I Sam 23:9-12; 30:7,8). Perhaps for this reason it developed into an object of idolatry. It is possible that Gideon had an idol made, wearing an ephod similar to that worn by the high priests. And all Israel went thither a whoring after it. Gideon's ephod became an object of idolatry. Its erection marks the tragic end of the career of a truly great man. Gideon and his family suffered as a result of it. In 9:5 we read of the death of most of Gideon's sons because of the desire of one, Abimelech, to be king. This tragedy may be traced to the idolatry that resulted from the construction of Gideon's ephod.

28. And the country was in quietness forty years. The victory over the Midianites brought about a generation of peace for the Israelites. 29. And Jerubbaal, the son of Joash, went and dwelt in his own house. Gideon appears to have retired from his active pursuits a number of years before his death. 31. And his concubine that was in Shechem, she also bore him a son. In addition to the seventy sons of his wives, mention is made of Abimelech, the son of a concubine, because of the attempt he was to make, after the death of Gideon, to have himself recognized as Israel's king (9:1 ff.).

33. The children of Israel turned again . . . and made Baal-berith their God. A specific Baal is mentioned as the object of idolatry after the death of Gideon. Baal-berith had a shrine at Shechem (9:4). His name means Lord of the covenant, a possible reference to a confederation of city-states that looked to Shechem as their leader. The fact that Israel had entered into a b'rît, or covenant, with God at Sinai may have encouraged some to equate the Israelite with the Canaanite b'rît. Scripture makes it clear, however, that men cannot make such an equation without incurring the wrath of Israel's God.

6) The Usurpation of Abimelech. 9:1-57.

1. And Abimelech . . . went to Shechem unto his mother's brethren. As the son of a concubine, Abimelech was considered a part of the family of his mother. Among the early Arabians, a concubine or secondary 'wife' stayed with her own clan and was visited by her 'husband' from time to time. The children of the union belonged to the wife's clan. Abimelech, the son of a concubine, had close relations with the family of his mother. He sought their help in supporting his claims to the throne. 2. Remember also that I am your bone and your flesh. Abimelech implied that all of the sons of Gideon were ambitious to rule. Dissention among them would certainly have harmful consequences for the people subject to them. It would be best to dispose of them all, said Abimelech, in favor of his own rule. Since his mother was from Shechem, he could claim a blood kinship with the Shechemites. Thus he appealed to local pride in the suggestion that he be named ruler.

3. They said, He is our brother. The men of Shechem were convinced that their loyalty should be expressed toward Abimelech. 4. And they gave him . . . silver out of the house of Baal-berith. In antiquity, temples were frequently the centers of great wealth. People brought gifts to the temples, and public funds were frequently kept there for safekeeping. The seventy pieces of silver given to Abimelech was not a large sum, but it represented the backing of the men of Shechem for Abimelech's cause. Abimelech hired vain and light fellows (AV, persons) Abimelech found a group of scoundrels who were willing to do anything for a little silver.

5. And he went unto . . . Ophrah, and slew his brethren. Only Jotham, Gideon's youngest son, escaped the carnage. The detail that they were killed upon one stone suggests a parallel to animals offered in sacrifice on a stone altar. The brethren were not slain in battle, but were formally executed.

6. And all the men of Shechem . . . and all the house of Millo . . . made Abimelech king. Millo may be the name of the citadel, or fortress, at Shechem. We should probably read Beth Millo, for the house of Millo. By the plain of the pillar that was in Shechem. It was appropriate that Abimelech be proclaimed king at a spot with religious associations. The coronation took place by the terebinth of the pillar. Jacob had buried the idols which his family had gathered under a tree at Shechem (Gen 35:4), and there Joshua had set up a monument as a witness to the covenant between God and Israel (Josh 24:26).

7. And . . . Jotham . . . went and stood in the top of mount Gerizim. A triangular rock platform projects from the side of Gerizim, which forms a natural pulpit overlooking Shechem. The voice of a person speaking on Gerizim can be heard as far as Mount Ebal, across the valley in which Shechem is located. Jotham, the only surviving brother of Abimelech, chose this site as the spot from which he could address the men of Shechem.

8. The trees went forth . . . to anoint a king. Jotham chose to instruct the people by means of a parable. He sought to show that only base individuals desire to lord it over others. Those with worthwhile occupations are too busy to seek to become kings.

9. The olive tree said . . . Should I leave my fatness? Groves of olive trees flourish in the area around Shechem. Olive oil was used as an unguent on the skin and for ceremonial purposes when priests or kings were anointed. It was burned to provide illumination, and used as an article of food corresponding to our butter. The olive tree could not be persuaded to leave its important work in order to be a king. 11. The fig tree said . . . Should I forsake my sweetness? The fig tree was the commonest fruit tree of Palestine. Figs were not a delicious luxury, as they are in some parts of the world, but one of the food staples of the country. 13. The vine said . . . Should I leave my wine, which cheereth God and man? 'Ĕlōhîm may be rendered God or gods. In this context Jotham appears to refer to religious libations offered to the gods, during which wine was poured either over the sacrifice or on the ground beside the altar. The grape was highly esteemed in Israel, as in the Mediterranean world in general. The vine could serve no higher function than to produce grapes. 15. The bramble said unto the trees . . . come and put your trust in my shadow. As the last alternative, the trees approached the thorn bush, or bramble, which could be seen clinging to the rocks in the neighborhood of Shechem. The bramble ironically said, Put your trust in my shadow, an obvious absurdity. With a feeling of self-importance, it threatened to devour the cedars of Lebanon if the other trees did not accord it due deference. The dry thorn often was the starting place for destructive fires. Moore, in ICC notes, "Those who made the thorn king over them put themselves in this dilemma: if they were true to him, they enjoyed his protection, which was a mockery; if they were false to him, he would be their ruin."

16-20. If ye have done truly and sincerely . . . rejoice ye in Abimelech . . . but if not, let fire come out from Abimelech. Jotham made a pointed application to his parable. The men of Shechem may have felt that they had done well in forgetting all that Gideon had done for them and supporting the murderer of his sons. If so, Jotham said, "Much happiness may you have in this bramble-king of yours." (Moore) However, Jotham warned, such may not have been the case. Not only would this bramble-king prove destructive to the men of Shechem, but the men, in turn, would devour Abimelech. 21. And Jotham . . . went to Beer. Jotham managed to escape beyond the reach of Abimelech's vengeance. Beer means well, and there were many places in Palestine bearing that name. Some commentators suggest Beer-sheba as the place of retreat. El-Bireh, between Shechem and Jerusalem, is another possibility.

23. God sent an evil spirit between Abimelech and the men of Shechem. When Abimelech had reigned three years, he and the men of Shechem developed a spirit of animosity one to the other. The Scripture often accounts for such attitudes by the working of God in human affairs (cf. I Sam 16:14; I Kgs 22:21). The principle of divine retribution is evident throughout the Book of Judges. Here we are told how Abimelech fell prey to treachery, even as he had treacherously killed his brothers. 25. And the men of Shechem set liers-in-wait for him in the top of the mountains. The ambush established by the men of Shechem would have successfully deprived Abimelech of tribute and other tolls that he might have collected from caravans using the important routes through Shechem.

28. And Gaal . . . said, Who is Abimelech . . . ? In the celebration of the vintage, Gaal led the Shechemites in cursing Abimelech and fomenting rebellion against his rule. He spoke as a Canaanite rather than as an Israelite, urging the people to serve the men of Hamor the father of Shechem (cf. Gen 33:19). He thus urged the people to reject the "modern" Israelite rule of the house of Gideon and revive the ancient Shechemite aristocracy.

31. They fortify the city against thee. Zebul warned Abimelech of the activities of the rebels. Instead of fortify, however, read incite, with the RSV. Abimelech evidently had appointed Zebul as governor of Shechem while he, personally, dwelt at Arumah (9:41). Where the AV reads that Zebul sent messengers privily, the JPS version reads in Tormah, which is another form of the place name, Arumah. 34. And Abimelech rose up . . . and they laid wait against Shechem in four companies. Abimelech took Zebul's advice and organized his forces to end the rebellion of Gaal (cf. 7:16; I Sam 11:11; 13:17).

36. Behold, there come people down from the top of the mountains. When Gaal saw the movement of men in the mountains, he spoke of it to Zebul, who mocked him for thinking the shadows of the mountain to be men. Zebul implied that Gaal was frightened as the result of a guilty conscience. 37. See there come people down by the middle of the land, and another company come along by the plain of Meonenim. The first company appeared to come from the middle, literally the navel, of the land. This was doubtless the central hill in the district. Another came from Elon-meonenim, meaning the terebinth of the diviners. This may be equated with the terebinth of verse 6.

38. Where is now thy mouth? Zebul now openly taunted Gaal for his boastful renunciation of Abimelech. 39. And Gaal went out before the men of Shechem, and fought with Abimelech. Gaal rallied his forces, but it was too late to repulse Abimelech. 41. And Zebul thrust out Gaal and his brethren. The revolt of Gaal was ended and its leader expelled from Shechem. Gaal doubtless became a scapegoat for the Shechemites, who would have blamed him for the unsuccessful revolt.

43. And he [Abimelech] rose up against them, and smote them. As the Shechemites left their city, Abimelech personally directed his forces against them. It is not clear whether the men of Shechem were going out to their field for normal agricultural pursuits or on missions of plunder, as in 9:25. 45. And Abimelech . . . took the city, and slew the people . . . therein. Abimelech showed no mercy to the men of Shechem. To make sure that no trouble would ever again come from that source, he beat down the city, and sowed it with salt. Salt ground, in Hebrew, is equivalent to desert. It was Abimelech's purpose to render the very soil of Shechem sterile. Nevertheless, Shechem became an important center during the days of the Israelite kingdom (I Kgs 12:1). It was rebuilt and fortified by Jeroboam (I Kgs 12:25).

46. And . . . the men of the tower of Shechem . . . entered into an hold of the house of the god Berith. Shechem was a walled city, with an outlying tower that served as additional defense. The god Berith, or El-Berith, is to be identified with Baal-berith (9:4). Since his temple was located near the tower, the men of the tower fled to the temple for refuge. 48,49. And Abimelech . . . and all the people that were with him . . . . cut down every man his bough. Abimelech decided to burn down the temple that served as a stronghold for the men of the tower of Shechem. He ordered his men to follow him to a near-by mountain, where they cut down branches from trees to serve as kindling wood for the burning of the temple. About a thousand men and women perished in the flames.

50. Then went Abimelech to Thebez. Thebez may be modern Tubas, situated about thirteen miles north of Shechem. The inhabitants of Thebez probably had joined in the revolt that centered in Shechem. 51. But there was a strong tower within the city. The tower of Shechem was outside the city, that of Thebez, within. After Abimelech took the city, he had to take the stronghold within it.

53. And a certain woman cast a piece of a millstone upon Abimelech's head. The victorious Abimelech was suddenly stopped by a woman. Her weapon was the upper, movable stone of a hand mill. Such stones were eight to ten inches long and several inches thick. Hurled from the height of the tower, this piece of a millstone proved an effective weapon. 54. Draw thy sword, and slay me. A warrior's honor demanded that he die in battle like a man. Death at the hands of a woman was regarded as utter disgrace. Abimelech asked his armor-bearer to slay him, which the young man did.

55. And when the men of Israel saw that Abimelech was dead, they departed every man unto his place. The army of Abimelech is designated as the men of Israel. The rebellion of the Shechemites can be interpreted as a Canaanite rebellion against the Israelites. Although Abimelech had initially gained his rule on the basis of the support of the men of Shechem, his relationship to Gideon made him acceptable to many in Israel. The Shechemite support of Gaal may be considered as a nationalistic movement with anti-Israelite overtones.

57. And all the evil of the men of Shechem did God render upon their heads. Both the destruction of Shechem and the death of Abimelech are interpreted as just punishment for the crimes perpetrated against Gideon's family. Upon them came the curse of Jotham. Compare 9:20. The men of both Shechem and Abimelech were "devoured" as Jotham had prophesied.

7) Tola's Judgeship over Israel. 10:1,2.

1. And after Abimelech there arose to defend Israel Tola the Son of Puah. Tola was one of the minor Judges of whom we know little. His mission, like that of the other Judges, was to save (l'hôshîa') Israel. A son of Issachar bore the name of Tola (Gen 46:13). He is mentioned as the founder of a clan (Num 26:23). Tola and Puah seem to have been common names in the tribe of Issachar. He dwelt in Shamir in mount Ephraim. There was another Shamir in Judah (Josh 15:48). This Shamir was probably in the neighborhood of Jezreel.

8) Jair's Judgeship. 10:3-5.

10:3. And after him arose Jair, a Gileadite. Jair was the name of one of Manasseh's sons (Num 32:41), and the Judge came from the tribe of Manasseh. 4. And he had thirty sons that rode on thirty ass colts. This is mentioned as an indication of the rank and prominence of the sons. The ass was highly esteemed as a riding beast (Jud 1:14; I Sam 25:20). And they had thirty cities, which are called Havoth-jair. The hawwōt were originally groups of Bedouin tents. The term came to be applied to more permanent settlements. Each of Jair's sons was associated with a Gileadite village that bore the name of Jair. 5. And Jair died and was buried in Camon. Camon may be modern Kumem, east of the Jordan, between the Jarmuk and the Jabbok.

9) Ammonite Oppression Ended by Jephthah. 10:6–11:40.

6. And the children of Israel did evil . . . and served Baalim. Contact with surrounding nations brought to Israel the temptation to adopt the social and religious customs of their neighbors. The Baalim and the Ashtaroth had been a recurring temptation (cf. 2:11,13). Now mention is made of numerous other gods: the gods of Syria (including Hadad or Rimmon); the gods of Zidon, particularly the Phoenician Baal, whose worship rivaled that of Israel's God in the days of Ahab and Jezebel; the gods of Moab (including Chemosh); the gods of the children of Ammon (including Molech); and the gods of the Philistines (including Dagon and Baal-zeboul, renamed Baal-zebub).

7. And . . . the Lord . . . sold them into the hands of the Philistines, and into the hands of the children of Ammon. Mention of the Philistines and the Ammonites is introductory to the Samson story (13:1–16:31) as well as to the Judgeship of Jephthah (11:1-40). 8. They vexed and oppressed the children of Israel. For eighteen years the Ammonites oppressed those Israelites settled in Gilead. 9. The children of Ammon passed over Jordan to fight also against Judah. Like the Moabites, who earlier took the same route (3:12,13), the Ammonites made destructive raids into Judah.

10. We have sinned against thee. In their time of oppression the children of Israel acknowledged their sin against God. By worshiping Baalim, they had broken the covenant; and so they interpreted the power of their enemies as the chastening hand of God. 11,12. Did not I deliver you? No doubt a prophet or some other spokesman was raised up by God to remind the people of past deliverances. Not only did God bring his people from Egypt, but he also delivered them from the Amorites (Num 21:21-35), from the children of Ammon (Jud 3:13), from the Philistines (Jud 3:31), the Zidonians (no specific reference, probably included in the oppression of Jabin, Jud 4:2,3), the Amalekites (allied with Eglon, Jud 3:13), and the Maonites (LXX, Midianites; no specific reference). 14. Go and cry unto the gods which ye have chosen. Since Israel had rejected the Lord, His spokesman ironically urged them to look for help to the gods they had chosen to serve.

15. The children of Israel said unto the Lord, We have sinned. Confession of sin was the turning point for Israel. Do thou unto us whatsoever seemeth good unto thee. They threw themselves on the Lord's mercy. 16. And they put away the strange gods. Confession of sin was accompanied by renunciation of the cause of offense. And his soul was grieved for the misery of Israel. God could no longer stand aloof and allow the enemy to oppress his people (cf. Isa 63:9 a).

17. Then the children of Ammon were gathered together and encamped in Gilead. And the children of Israel assembled themselves together and encamped in Mizpeh. The two armies confronted one another. Israel was at Mizpeh (watchtower), which may be the place where Jacob and Laban made their covenant (Gen 31:46-49). 18. What man is he that will begin to fight against the children of Ammon? The Gileadites needed a leader to direct the campaign against their Ammonite oppressors. This forms an introduction to the story of Jephthah.

11:1. Now Jephthah the Gileadite was a mighty man of valour. The words describe him as a great warrior (cf. Gideon, 6:12; Kish, I Sam 9:1; Naaman, II Kgs 5:1). He was, however, the son of an harlot, which gave him inferior status within the family. 2. (They) thrust out Jephthah. The legitimate sons of Gilead called Jephthah the son of a strange woman, and sought to have him disinherited. 3. Then Jephthah . . . dwelt in the land of Tob. Tob was probably northeast of Gilead. Later the men of Tob were allied with the Ammonites in their war with David (II Sam 10:6-8). It was a kind of frontier district, where men like Jephthah could lead a lawless existence on the fringes of society. And there were gathered vain men to Jephthah, and went out with him. Jephthah and his companions were esteemed vain (réqîm, "empty"), i.e., wild and reckless, in contrast to 'respectable' members of society.

5. The elders of Gilead went to fetch Jephthah. When war broke out between the Ammonites and the Gileadites, the latter thought of Jephthah as a potential leader. 7. Why are ye come unto me now when ye are in distress? Jephthah reproached the delegation of Gileadites for not helping him in his time of need. They had cast him out, confident of their own prowess. Now they came to him, asking help. 8. Be our head over all the inhabitants of Gilead. The men gave no answer to Jephthah's complaint, but they were ready to give him absolute power if he would help in the time of need. 11. Then Jephthah went with the elders of Gilead, and the people made him head. After receiving the assurance that his sovereignty would be recognized after the removal of the Ammonite threat, Jephthah accepted the offered position. The choice was approved by the people (cf. Saul, I Sam 11:15; Rehoboam, I Kgs 12:1; Jeroboam, I Kgs 12:20).

12. And Jephthah sent messengers unto the king of the children of Ammon. As official leader of Gilead, Jephthah sent messengers to the Ammonite leaders to ask a reason for attacks on Israelite territory. 13. Because Israel took away my land when they came up out of Egypt. The disputed territory was bounded by the Arnon on the south and the Jabbok on the north, and it extended westward to the Jordan. This land had been the kingdom of Sihon at the time of the entrance into Canaan, and Sihon had wrested it from Moab (Num 21:26). Ammonites and Moabites, who were confederate during the time of Jephthah, felt that they had a claim to this forfeited territory.

15. Israel took not away the land of Moab, nor the land of the children of Ammon. Jephthah rejected the charge. Israel had been careful to request permission of the kings of Edom and Moab before passing through their lands. Permission was not granted, and so Israel scrupulously avoided touching the borders of Edom and Moab. When Sihon, king of the Amorites, at Heshbon refused permission for Israel to pass through his country, however, a battle was fought at Jahaz. The God of Israel gave his people victory over Sihon, and "Israel possessed all the land of the Amorites" (v. 21).

24. Wilt not thou possess that which Chemosh thy god giveth thee to possess? Jephthah argued that a people should be expected to occupy territory given them by their god. One such method of assigning territory was through victories given by a people's god on the field of battle. The people of Chemosh would, of course, occupy the territory Chemosh had enabled them to conquer. Since Israel's God had given his people land by right of conquest, it was to be expected that they would occupy it. The Moabite Stone attributes the victories of Moab to the favor of Chemosh, and the victories of Israel over Moab to the anger of Chemosh. Strictly speaking, Milcom (or Molech) was the god of Ammon and Chemosh the god of Moab. Moab and Ammon, descended from the same father, Lot, had much in common; and both Jephthah and the Ammonite king treated them as one people. A confederacy may be the historical justification for this terminology. Jephthah's ad hominem argument does not mean that the Israelites of his day actually believed in the power of Chemosh. Considering his own background and his subsequent conduct, Jephthah himself may have had such concepts, however. There was a strong tendency to make the God of Israel merely one of the gods who should be recognized.

25. Art thou any . . . better than Balak? The Moabite king, Balak, did not contest Israel's possession of the lands north of the Arnon. Although he called in a soothsayer to pronounce a curse on Israel, Balak never ventured to meet Israel in battle. Did the present king of Ammon think himself better able than Balak to subdue Israel? 26. While Israel dwelt in Heshbon . . . and in Aroer. Aroer, the southernmost city of Israel east of the Jordan, was located on the banks of the Arnon. Jephthah implied that the Moabites, by failing to make a claim at the time Israel occupied the kingdom of Sihon, tacitly recognized that the territory was not theirs. 27. The Lord the Judge be judge this day between the children of Israel and the children of Ammon. Jephthah summarized his defense. Israel had done no wrong. For three centuries (a round number), the right of Israel to its Trans-Jordanian cities had been recognized. If Ammon now insisted on battle, the outcome could be left in the hands of Israel's God.

29. Then the Spirit of the Lord came upon Jephthah. Jephthah was not a mere opportunist. He was empowered by God to lead the Gileadites to victory over their oppressors. We read of a series of journeys made by Jephthah. He passed on to Mizpah of Gilead (RSV), where the Israelite camp was located, and then moved against the Ammonites. 30. And Jephthah vowed a vow unto the Lord. The form taken by Jephthah's vow is reminiscent of his half-heathen background. He vowed to offer as a burnt offering whatever first came out of the door of his house to meet him when he returned as victor from the Ammonite war. 33. And he smote them from Aroer, even till thou come to Minnith, even twenty cities. Jephthah was victorious in his campaign. This Aroer is not the town on the Arnon (v. 26) but another town of the same name, east of Rabbath-ammon (Josh 13:25). The plain of the vineyards is a place name, ʿAbēl kᵉrāmîm.

34. And, behold, his daughter came out to meet him. Perhaps Jephthah expected a servant to appear first. The remembrance of his vow and the sight of his daughter changed the joy of the victor to the sorrow of a father about to lose his only child. 35. I have opened my mouth unto the Lord, and I cannot go back. To Jephthah the vow was sacred, and it had to be carried out. Human sacrifices were forbidden in Israel, but Jephthah had lived on the fringes of society, where heathen ideas prevailed.

37. Let me alone two months. Jephthah's daughter submitted to the demands of the vow without flinching. She requested a two-month period during which she might bewail [her] virginity with her companions. She regarded her coming death as a double tragedy: Not only was she to become a burnt offering, but she must die childless, not having been married. 39. She returned unto her father, who did with her according to his vow. After the two-month period, Jephthah fulfilled his vow. Although some commentators suggest that her perpetual virginity would have been a fulfillment of the vow, the text seems to leave no doubt that Jephthah's daughter died at the hands of her father.

10) War Between the Gileadites and the Ephraimites. 12:1-7.

12:1. And the men of Ephraim gathered themselves together. As the Ephraimites had resented Gideon's apparent neglect of them (8:1), so they were offended that Jephthah had apparently neglected them in his battle with the Ammonites. They assembled and crossed the Jordan, going toward Zaphon (AV, northward), a place on the east side of the Jordan, near Succoth. In a hostile spirit they demanded that Jephthah account for his failure to enlist their aid. 2. When I called you, ye delivered me not out of their hands. Jephthah insisted that he had asked help of the Ephraimites to meet the Ammonite oppressions, but that they had failed to respond.

4. Then Jephthah gathered together all the men of Gilead. They had been dismissed after the victory over Ammon, but the threat of civil war was justification for a fresh call to arms. Ye Gileadites are fugitives of Ephraim. The taunt of the Ephraimites has been variously interpreted. It suggests that the tribes in the Trans-Jordan area—those that traced their descent from Joseph—were deserters from Ephraim and Manasseh.

5. And the Gileadites took the passages of Jordan. The Gileadites succeeded in defeating the Ephraimites and seizing the Jordan fords in order to prevent their escape. 6. Say now Shibboleth. The word shibboleth (an ear of corn) served as a password because it contained a consonant which was not pronounced in the Ephraimite dialect. The Ephraimites pronounced the word sibboleth and thus identified themselves to the Gileadites. The existence of distinct dialects of Hebrew during the period of the Judges is consistent with the concept of tribal rather than national consciousness that appears throughout the book.

7. And Jephthah judged Israel six years. Six eventful years ended with Jephthah's death. The place of his burial is not definitely known. The Hebrew text simply reads, He was buried in the cities of Gilead. Some manuscripts of the LXX read Mizpeh of Gilead.

11) Judgeship of Ibzan. 12:8-10.

8. And after him Ibzan of Bethlehem judged Israel. The only things told concerning Ibzan are the places of his birth and burial and the size of his family. Bethlehem in Judah is probably meant, although many commentators suggest Bethlehem in Zebulun, about seven miles west-northwest of Nazareth. Ibzan seems to have made it a practice to strengthen his political ties by marrying his children into families at a distance from Bethlehem.

12) Elon's Judgeship. 12:11,12.

11. And after him Elon, a Zebulonite, judged Israel. Only the name of the Judge, his birthplace, burial place, and the length of his rule are given. The consonants of Aijalon (v. 12), the vocalized reading of Elon's burial place, are identical with the name of the Judge. The place may simply have been named Elon. Its location is not known.

13) Abdon's Judgeship. 12:13-15.

13. And after him Abdon the son of Hillel. Abdon is termed a Pirathonite, i.e., a resident of Pirathon in Ephraim, probably Fer'ata, six miles southwest of Shechem. He is known for his family of forty sons and thirty grandsons (AV, nephews), who rode on seventy saddle asses. As noted in 10:4, this was a mark of high rank. 15. His burial took place in the hill country of the Amalekites, a name suggestive of Amalekite occupation (cf. 3:13; 5:14).

14) Samson and the Philistines. 13:1—16:31.

13:1. And the children of Israel did evil again in the sight of the Lord. The recurring idolatry forms the setting for a period of oppression by the Philistines which lasted a full generation (forty years). The career of Samson belongs to this time.

2. And there was a certain man of Zorah, of the family of the Danites, whose name was Manoah. Zorah was a border city between Dan and Judah, seventeen miles west of Jerusalem. Manoah and his wife had not been blessed with a child, which was an occasion of grief to them. 3. And the angel of the Lord appeared unto the woman. The wife of Manoah received an angelic annunciation. In Scripture such annunciations are associated with the births of important personages, notably, Isaac and John the Baptist. 5. Thou shalt conceive . . . . the child shall be a Nazarite. Special precautions had to be taken concerning the mother's diet. Numbers 6:2-21 prescribes the laws for the Nazarite. Regarded as dedicated to God, he must be kept pure of possible defilement. He shall begin to deliver Israel out of the hand of the Philistines. Other Judges would bring about complete deliverance. The promised child would begin to deliver. The Philistine threat continued until the time of David.

6. His countenance was like the countenance of an angel of God, very terrible. The angelic messenger inspired awe and reverence, not terror. 8. Let the man of God . . . come again unto us. When Manoah received the report of the annunciation to his wife, he desired further instruction concerning the treatment to be accorded the child to be born.

15. Let us detain thee until we shall have made ready a kid. The angel reappeared to Manoah's wife, who sought her husband, and both heard substantially the same directions concerning the care of the child. Manoah sought to detain the stranger in order to show him proper hospitality. 16. Though thou detain me, I will not eat of thy bread. In 6:18-22, Gideon prepared food for one whom he later recognized as the Angel of the Lord. The food was then converted into an offering. Here the Angel tells Manoah that he will not eat, and that burnt offerings must be made to the Lord. 17. What is thy name? Manoah asked his strange guest his name, in order that he might subsequently accord it due honor. 18. Why askest thou thus after my name, seeing it is secret? (AV marg., wonderful) The Angel declared that his name was ineffable, beyond human capacity to hear and understand.

19. So Manoah took a kid with a meat offering, and offered it upon a rock unto the Lord: and the angel did wonderously. A burnt offering and a meal offering were offered unto the Lord. Manoah and his wife watched the angel as he "did wonderously." 20. The angel of the Lord ascended in the flame of the altar. As the smoke of the sacrifice ascended heavenward, the Angel seemed to mount up with it until Manoah and his wife could no longer see him.

21. Then Manoah knew that he was an angel of the Lord. Read the angel of the Lord. Manoah may have had some question concerning this mysterious visitor, but the peculiar ascent with the flame from the altar provided positive identification. 22. We shall surely die, because we have seen God. Cf. Gideon's similar reaction (6:22). 23. If the Lord were pleased to kill us, he would not have received a burnt-offering and a meat-offering at our hands. The acceptance of the sacrifice and the strange announcement were evidence that God was not ill-disposed toward Manoah and his wife.

24. And the woman bare a son, and called his name Samson. The words of the Angel came true. A son was born and named Samson, meaning sun. Just across the valley from Manoah's home was Beth-shemesh, the shrine town of the sun-god. Although Manoah was not an idolator, he may have given his son a name that was common in the community. 25. And the Spirit of the Lord began to move him at times in the camp of Dan between Zorah and Eshtaol. Samson became a leader endued with the Holy Spirit. The place of his activity was the Valley of Sorek.

14:1. And Samson went down to Timnath. Timnath was located about three miles southwest of Beth-shemesh, on the border of Judah's territory. At this time it seems to have been occupied by the Philistines, for Samson decided that he wanted to marry a Philistine girl whom he met in Timnath. 2. Get her for me to wife. Marriages were negotiated by the parents (cf. Gen 21:21). 3. Manoah was disturbed that his son should ask to marry a Philistine girl, but Samson insisted that he wanted to marry the young lady of his choice: Get her for me; for she pleaseth me well.

4. It was of the Lord. The sacred historian views the demand of Samson in the light of its results. Samson's parents could not foresee that their son's desire to marry a woman of the "uncircumcised Philistines" would actually result in the destruction of many of Israel's enemies. The words, he sought an occasion against the Philistines, may refer to God or Samson. In view of the theological nature of the earlier statement, it seems best to take this as a statement that God, through Samson's proposed marriage, was seeking to bring about the defeat of the Philistines.

5. Behold, a young lion roared against him. Samson was on his way back to Timnath, with his parents, when a full-grown lion cub attacked him. With his bare hands, Samson tore the lion limb from limb. The source of this physical strength, according to the Scripture, was the Spirit of the Lord, who empowered the young man in the emergency. 8. He turned aside to see the carcase of the lion. On another trip along the same road, Samson observed that there was a swarm of bees and some honey in the carcass of the lion. Bees will not approach a putrid carcass. In a hot, dry climate, however, the moisture may be dried from a dead body in a very short time. The lion's carcass had quickly dried up, and when Samson next passed along the road, it already contained a hive of bees, with their honey. 9. And he took thereof in his hands. Read rather, He scraped it out into his hands. That was a violation of the Nazarite code, which forbade contact with a carcass. This may be the reason why Samson did not tell his parents where he found the honey.

10. And Samson made there a feast. He made the feast at the bride's home. Samson's father was present, but the other guests were all Philistines.

12. I will now put forth a riddle unto you. Riddles served as a form of entertainment. At a later time, the queen of Sheba came to test Solomon's wisdom with riddles (I Kgs 10:1). In this case, Samson limited the time for solving the riddle to the week of wedding festivities. As a wager, he offered to provide thirty linen garments (sādîn) and thirty festive garments (ḥălîpâ), one for each of the companions, if the men could solve his riddle. If they failed to do so, they were expected to give him the same. The sādîn was a garment made of fine linen, rectangular in shape, which was worn as an undergarment next to the skin or as an outer robe to cover other clothing. The ḥălîpâ was a garment worn on festive occasions instead of everyday clothing. 14. Out of the eater came forth meat, and out of the strong came forth sweetness. Meat is used in the sense of "food." The RSV renders it:

"Out of the eater came something to eat.
Out of the strong came something sweet."

Without the clue of the slain lion and the swarm of bees, the guests could not solve Samson's riddle.

15. Entice thy husband, that he may declare unto us the riddle. The Philistines appealed to their countrywoman, Samson's wife, to find the secret. They made it clear that failure to come to their aid would result in her death by burning. In 15:6 such a burning is carried out. 17. She wept before him the seven days. According to the Hebrew text the Philistines tried to solve the riddle in three days (v. 14), appealed to Samson's wife on the seventh day (v. 15), and she "wept before him the seven days" (v. 17). The LXX and Syriac versions place the appeal to Samson's wife on the fourth day. Rashi suggested that the seven days actually meant the days of the week that remained. On the seventh day . . . he told her. The entreaty and tears so weakened Samson that he told his wife the answer to the riddle. 18. If ye had not ploughed with my heifer, ye had not found out my riddle. The use of the term heifer was a scornful allusion to the wife who had betrayed her husband's secret.

19. He went down to Ashkelon, and slew thirty men of them, and took their spoil, and gave changes of garments unto them which expounded the riddle. Samson paid his 'companions' with garments taken from thirty men whom he killed in Ashkelon, twenty-three miles away on the Mediterranean coast. Thereupon Samson went up to his father's house. The wedding festivities lasted for seven days, but the marriage itself was not consummated until the seventh day. On the day on which it was to have been consummated, Samson's companions presented the solution to his riddle, which proved their complicity with his wife. Samson, thereupon, returned home to Timnath without consummating the marriage. 20. But Samson's wife was given to his companion. Samson's flight left the bride without a husband to consummate the marriage, which would have disgraced the girl. The marriage was consummated, however, with Samson's companion or "best man" taking the bride.

15:1. Samson visited his wife. Samson, bringing a kid as a present, visited his wife when his anger had abated. Her father, however, would not allow the young man to enter the inner chamber, and informed him that the girl had been given to the best man. He offered Samson the younger sister of his 'wife,' with the added suggestion that she was the fairer of the two. 4. And Samson went and caught three hundred foxes. Feeling himself justified in taking vengeance on the Philistines, Samson caught three hundred foxes (or jackals; the two animals are frequently confused), joined them in pairs by their tails, and tied to the tails torches saturated with oil. Then he lighted the torches with fire and released the foxes into the Philistines' grain fields. The result was destruction to the grain and to the olive orchards of the Philistines. 6. And the Philistines came up, and burnt her and her father with fire. The Philistines placed the blame for the outrage on Samson's wife and her family, and retaliated accordingly.

7. Though ye have done this, yet will I be avenged of you. The destruction of the family of Samson's wife was not a proper recompence to Samson. 8. And he smote them hip and thigh with a great slaughter. The idiom, literally leg on thigh, apparently means a complete overthrow. On Babylonian cylinder seals, Gilgamesh is represented as using this device in wrestling. He went down and dwelt in the top of the rock Etam. This was probably located near the town of Etam in Judah, about two miles southwest of Bethlehem.

9. Then the Philistines went up. From the Philistine Plain the Philistines went up to the Judean highlands in search of Samson, that they might punish him.

11. Then three thousand men of Judah . . . said to Samson, Knowest thou not that the Philistines are rulers over us? Samson was a Danite, and the men of the tribe of Judah felt no obligation to protect him. The fact that three thousand men were sent to Samson is an indirect tribute to his reputation for strength. Judah recognized that the Philistines held the country tributary, and resented the acts of Samson, which were in the nature of rebellion. 12. We are come down to bind thee. The men of Judah felt an obligation to their Philistine overlords to capture Samson and turn him over to them. Samson did not resist their purpose to deliver him to the Philistines, but he asked them to swear that they would not personally attack him. If they had attacked him, Samson would have had to defend himself, and in so doing he would have had to shed the blood of Israelites. Though Samson had no scruples about killing Philistines, he did not wish to kill his fellow Israelites.

13. And they bound him with two new cords. When the men of Judah pledged that they would not personally attack Samson, he permitted himself to be bound. The new cords were chosen for their strength. It would not have been thought expedient to bind Samson with cords that had been used before, or that were old and brittle. 14. And when he came unto Lehi, the Philistines shouted. Lehi was occupied by the Philistines. The men of Judah took their prisoner there, and the Philistines rejoiced at the sight of their assailant being brought to them in fetters. While Samson's enemies were shouting in triumph, the Spirit of the Lord came mightily upon the captive, and he broke the cords that bound him. For him they seemed as easy to break as flax that has caught fire.

15. And he found a new jawbone of an ass... and took it and slew a thousand men therewith. The moment of Philistine triumph was turned into one of disaster. Samson grabbed the first weapon at hand, a new (literally, fresh) jawbone of an ass. With it he attacked his enemies and slew a thousand of them. 16. With the jawbone of an ass, heaps upon heaps. Samson's song of triumph is in the form of poetry. The day of Philistine victory had been turned into a victory for the Israelite champion. Since he was alone in the conquest, he had to compose and sing his own song of triumph. 17. He . . . called that place Ramath-lehi; i.e., the hill of the jawbone.

18. And he was sore athirst. After the exertion of killing a thousand Philistines, Samson grew thirsty; and he felt that his weakened condition would make him a prey for the other Philistines, who would seek to avenge the death of their countrymen. In his distress he called upon the Lord. 19. But God clave an hollow place . . . and there came water thereout. The noun maktēsh, translated hollow place, denotes a round, deep basin. It was used for a "mortar" (cf. Prov 27:22). In this hollow place God caused water to spring forth as a means of quenching the thirst of Samson. He called the name thereof En-hakkore. The Spring of the Caller was the name given to a spring in the vicinity of Lehi at the time the book of Judges was written. Qôrē', "the caller," is the Hebrew name for the partridge. The spring may have been known as "Partridge Spring" as well as "Spring of the Caller."

20. And he judged Israel in the days of the Philistines twenty years. This forms a conclusion to the story of Samson's victory over the Philistines at Lehi. The fact is mentioned again in 16:31.

16:1. Then went Samson to Gaza and saw there an harlot. Samson's physical strength had as its counterpart his moral weakness. At Gaza, in the Philistine country, two miles from the Mediterranean coast, Samson fell under the control of another evil woman. 2. And it was told the Gazites. The men of Gaza learned that their enemy was somewhere within the city. They did not attempt to search the city by night in order to find him, but they set a watch and determined to kill him in the morning. 3. And Samson . . . arose at midnight, and took the doors of the gate of the city . . . and carried them up to the top of an hill that is before Hebron. Here again stress is placed on the physical prowess of Samson. He was able to lift the gates of the city, with their posts and the bar which fastened them, and carry them forty miles, to the vicinity of Hebron.

4. He loved a woman in the valley of Sorek, whose name was Delilah. This is the final episode in the life of the mighty Samson. Again he was in love with a Philistine woman. Much of Samson's life was spent in the Valley of Sorek, now known as the Wadi es-Surar, which starts fifteen miles west of Jerusalem and runs toward the coastal plain.

5. Entice him, and see wherein his great strength lieth. The Philistine leaders saw an opportunity to gain an advantage over Samson through his affair with Delilah. They requested her to discover, literally, by what means his strength is great. If she could tell them the means whereby Samson could be humbled, each of the lords of the Philistines promised to pay Delilah eleven hundred pieces of silver.

6. And Delilah said . . . Tell me, I pray thee, wherein thy great strength lieth. Three times she asked the question and three times Samson gave wrong answers. In his first answer Samson said, If they bind me with seven green withs that were never dried, then shall I be weak, and be as another man (v. 7). Thereupon, either while he was sleeping or in playfulness, Delilah bound him with the fresh bowstrings (AV, green withs) provided by the Philistines. 9. The Philistines be upon thee, Samson. In the inner room of the house were Philistines, ready at the call of Delilah to take Samson. After he was securely bound, Delilah uttered the words, The Philistines be upon thee, Samson; whereupon Samson brake the withs, as a thread of tow is broken when it toucheth the fire. The bowstrings were broken, and the secret of Samson's strength was still undisclosed. It is presupposed in the subsequent parts of the story that the Philistines did not rush upon Samson at the word of Delilah. They appear to have waited to see whether or not the cords held.

10. And Delilah said . . . Behold, thou hast mocked me. Delilah pretended to be hurt at Samson's failure to tell her the truth. Urging him again to give the secret of his strength, she drew from him a second explanation: If they bind me fast with new ropes that never were occupied, then shall I be weak, and be as another man (v. 11). The pattern was repeated. Delilah bound him with new ropes, and cried out, The Philistines be upon thee, Samson (v. 12). Again, however, Samson showed his power, for he brake them from off his arms like a thread.

13. And Delilah said . . . Hitherto thou hast mocked me, and told me lies. A third time, however, Samson gave an erroneous answer. He said, If thou weavest the seven locks of my head with the web . . . Then, it is presumed (although not expressed in the text), Samson would be rendered weak like other men. Thereupon Delilah fastened her piece of weaving in the loom and began to weave Samson's hair into her work as she would have done with ordinary threads. In this instance Samson was approaching the truth, for the loss of his hair would have resulted in the loss of his strength. When, however, Delilah said, The Philistines be upon thee, Samson (v. 14), Samson awakened from sleep and, as he arose from the couch, he pulled the posts of the loom out of the ground by the hair of his head, which was still fastened in the loom.

15. And she said . . . How canst thou say, I love thee, when thine heart is not with me? Delilah pressed him daily with her words (v. 16), insisting that if there were real affection between the two, there would be no reluctance to divulge secrets. 17. He told her all his heart. Samson explained the Nazarite vow (cf. Num 6:2-21) and declared plainly, If I be shaven, then my strength will go from me, and I shall become weak, and be like any other man. Thereupon Delilah called for her Philistine companions. While Samson was asleep on Delilah's knees, one of the Philistines shaved off his seven locks. A fourth time Delilah cried out, The Philistines be upon thee, Samson (v. 20), but this time the Israelite strong man was powerless before his enemies. It is part of the tragedy of the story that he wist not that the Lord was departed from him.

21. But the Philistines took him, and put out his eyes, and brought him down to Gaza, and bound him with fetters of brass; and he did grind in the prison house. The Philistines mutilated their enemy by blinding him. Then they chained him to the mill in the prison-house, where he was forced to perform menial labor. While he was in the prison, however, the hair of his head began to grow again. The process was slow, but it meant that Samson's strength would ultimately be restored.

23. Then the lords of the Philistines gathered . . . to offer a great sacrifice to Dagon their god. Dagon is known to have been one of the gods of the Canaanite pantheon at Ugarit. He was adopted by the Philistines after their settlement in Palestine. They ascribe their victory over Samson to the power of Dagon (v. 24). 25. Call for Samson, that he may make us sport. While the Philistines were celebrating, Samson was grinding at the mill. In the midst of the merriment, however, they asked that Samson be brought to the temple, probably in order that they might gloat over his humbled condition.

26. Suffer me that I may feel the pillars. Samson was brought into the temple. There he requested permission of the youth who was guiding him to lean upon the pillars that held up the temple roof. In the design of the temple, two middle columns supported the roof of the hall where the more distinguished people were assembled. The hall opened to a great court. The crowds would sit or stand on the roof above the hall; from there they could overlook the great court where Samson was forced to provide entertainment. On his request, Samson was led from the court to the supporting pillars of the adjacent hall. If these pillars should be removed, the crowd on the roof would come crashing down on the heads of the dignitaries below, killing many from both groups.

28. And Samson called unto the Lord. Scripture does not present Samson as a model of piety. His downfall is attributed, in the Bible, to his sinfulness. Yet the humiliation he experienced at the hands of the Philistines seems to have made him conscious of his God-given mission. Even here, however, his prayer was for vengeance on the Philistines because of the loss of his eyes. 30. And Samson said, Let me die with the Philistines. Exerting all his might, the strong man pushed on the two middle supporting pillars (v. 29) until they gave way, and the roof of the temple came crashing down. This brought about the death of the Philistine lords and nobles, and doubtless many of the 3,000 men and women spectators on the roof also died.

31. Then his brethren . . . took him . . . and buried him . . . in the burying place of Manoah his father. Samson had brought about the death of a host of the Philistines, Israel's inveterate enemy. He had not removed the Philistine threat, but he was honored for his peculiar accomplishments. His body was removed from Gaza and given honorable burial in the family burial plot. The Samson story concludes with the statement, And he judged Israel twenty years (cf. 15:20). The words may be loosely interpreted to mean that for about two decades he obtained security for Israel by keeping the Philistines from attacking the covenant people.

III. Lawless Conditions During the Period of the Judges. 17:1–21:25.

A. The Idolatry of Micah, and the Danite Migration. 17:1–19:31.

17:1. And there was a man of mount Ephraim, whose name was Micah. The chronology of the story of Micah is not certainly known. The account serves as a part of an appendix to the Book of Judges, preserving certain episodes that do not form a part of the history of the Judges, properly so called. Rabbinical commentators placed the story of Micah in the age of Othniel (3:8-11). Its position following the story of Samson is accounted for by the fact that it deals with Danites, the tribe from which Samson originated. 2. The eleven hundred shekels of silver that were taken from thee. Micah had stolen eleven hundred pieces of silver from his mother. She, not realizing that her son was the thief, had pronounced a curse on the one who had taken the money. Micah doubtless feared the power of his mother's curse, and so confessed that he had the silver. The fact that the amount was eleven hundred shekels of silver has led some commentators to identify Micah's mother with Delilah (cf. 16:5). There is not sufficient evidence, however, to take this view seriously.

3. I had wholly dedicated the silver unto the Lord. Micah's mother determined that the money should be used for religious purposes. By so doing, she doubtless expected to avert the curse upon her son. She determined to make a graven image and a molten image, actually one image consisting of carved wood overlaid with silver. 5. And the man Micah had an house of gods. The JPS version reads, an house of God, and the RSV renders, by way of interpretation, a shrine. Micah's mother provided the necessary silver; a founder (AV, v. 4) or silversmith (RSV), did the work; and Micah provided the shrine in which his idol was kept. To complete the equipment of the shrine, Micah made an ephod, and teraphim, and consecrated one of his sons, who became his priest. The ephod and teraphim served as additional idols (cf. 8:27; 18:24). 6. In those days there was no king in Israel. These words serve as an explanation for the anarchy that allowed such irregularities to take place. The words imply that the author lived during the monarchy, when such lawlessness was not permitted.

7. And there was a young man out of Bethlehem-judah . . . who was a Levite, and he sojourned there. The young Levite from the area of Bethlehem in Judah was residing in the neighborhood of Micah, in Mount Ephraim. When Micah learned that the Levite was not employed (v. 9), he urged him to become his private family priest. He made an offer. 10. Dwell with me, and be unto me a father and a priest, and I will give thee ten shekels of silver by the year, and a suit of apparel, and thy victuals. The Levite thought the offer a good one, and accepted it. 13. Then said Micah, Now know I that the Lord will do me good, seeing I have a Levite to my priest. Micah had prepared for the externals of worship. He had his idols, his shrine, and a Levite employed and ordained as priest. Superstition, not faith, however, marked his attitudes toward life. The spiritual content of religion was completely lacking.

18:1. And in those days the tribe of the Danites sought them an inheritance to dwell in. The Danites, whose assigned land was occupied by the powerful Philistines, found themselves cramped for living space in the territory west of Judah. 2. And the children of Dan sent . . . five men . . . to spy out the land. Five spies were sent in search of new territory that could be made a homeland for the Danites. On their way northward they came to the house of Micah in Mount Ephraim (17:1-13).

3. They knew the voice of the young man, the Levite. The Levite who was serving as Micah's priest had evidently met the Danite spies on some previous occasion. 5. Ask counsel, we pray thee, of God. The Danites requested the Levite to ascertain the success of their mission.

They assumed that a priest with his ephod could serve as a kind of fortune-teller. 6. Go in peace: before the Lord is your way wherein ye go. The Levite brought an encouraging report. He indicated that the expedition could expect the blessing of the Lord.

7. Then the five men . . . came to Laish. Laish, or Leshem, is the town at the north of the land occupied by the ancient Israelites. After it was conquered by the Danites, it became known as Dan. The spies found that Laish was a town with no strong internal government, far removed from the Phoenicians of Zidon, and having no treaties with neighboring tribes that might be expected to give the Danites trouble in the event of an attack.

9. Arise, that we may go up against them. The spies brought back a good report, suggesting that the Danites should possess Laish. 11. And there went from thence . . . six hundred men. The Danite expedition included six hundred warriors, their wives, children, and possessions. 12. And they went up, and pitched in Kirjath-jearim. Kirjath-jearim (city of forests) is a journey of two or three hours from Eshtaol. In the days of the conquest, Kirjath-jearim was one of the cities of the Gibeonite confederacy (Josh 9:17). The name of the Danite settlement near Kirjath-jearim was Mahaneh-dan (the camp of Dan).

13. And they . . . came unto the house of Micah. The five spies told the expedition about the Levite who served in the house of Micah and about the cult objects the Ephraimite had in his private shrine (v. 14). After giving the conventional greeting (v. 15), while the six hundred warriors stood by, the five men who had been spies entered the shrine and took the image, the ephod, and the teraphim (cf. 17:4,5). They then persuaded (or forced) the Levite to accompany them (18:19), assuring him that it was better to serve as priest to an entire tribe rather than to one family only. Having accomplished their mission at Micah's house, the Danites prepared to move on (v. 21).

22. The men that were in the houses near to Micah's house . . . overtook the children of Dan. Micah and his neighbors overtook the Danites and challenged them for stealing Micah's priest and cult objects. 25. Let not thy voice be heard . . . lest angry fellows run upon thee. The Danites threatened the neighbors of Micah with death if they attempted to rescue the threatened cult objects. Micah and his companions were forced to return home without their stolen property (v. 26).

27. And they . . . came unto Laish, and they . . . burnt the city with fire. The Danites came upon the inhabitants of Laish, killed them with the sword, and burned their city. The distance of the city from Zidon, and its lack of allies rendered it defenseless (v. 28). The Danites subsequently rebuilt the city, named it Dan, and occupied it.

30. And the children of Dan set up the graven image. Micah's idol was set up in a shrine in the city of Dan. A line of priests who traced their origin to Gershom, the son of Moses officiated in the Danite sanctuary. The AV reading, Gershom, the son of Manasseh, is based on a scribal convention devised by the ancient scribes to remove the name of Moses from association with idolatry. Jonathan may have been the name of the Levite first mentioned in 17:7. The priesthood of Jonathan and his sons is said to have lasted until the day of the captivity of the land. On the basis of verse 31 the "captivity" is interpreted by some as a reference to the exile of the ark from Shiloh (I Sam 4:11). Others suggest that it refers to the deportation of the people of Northern Galilee by Tiglath-pileser (II Kgs 15:29). 31. And they set . . . up Micah's . . . image . . . all the time that the house of God was in Shiloh. For a time Shiloh was the religious capital of Israel (I Sam 1:3), but the Danites maintained their own idolatrous worship. Dan continued as a center of idolatry after the disruption of Solomon's kingdom. Jeroboam set up golden calves at Bethel and Dan (I Kgs 12:29).

B. The Crime at Gibeah and the War Against Benjamin. 19:1–21:25.

19:1. There was a certain Levite . . . who took to himself a concubine. The story of the crime at Gibeah is prefaced by the note that there was no king in Israel. In those lawless times when in theory God was king, but in practice men did what was right in their own eyes, a Levite from the hill country of Ephraim, in the central highlands, took a concubine from Beth-lehem-judah.

2. And his concubine . . . went away . . . unto her father's house. The cause of the difficulty as given in the AV is that she played the whore against him. The RSV, following the LXX and Old Latin, reads, she went away from him, i.e., deserted him. Moore, in the ICC, reads that she was angry with him.

3. And her husband arose, and went after her. The husband followed his wife to speak friendly unto her (AV), literally, speak unto her heart (cf. Hos 2:14). He was warmly welcomed by the young lady's father, who entertained him for three days (v. 4). On the fourth day, the Levite and his concubine prepared to leave, but the father was reluctant to let them go. They remained until the fifth day (v. 8).

10. But the man would not tarry that night. Resisting the further entreaty of his father-in-law, the Levite and his concubine headed northward. They passed Jerusalem, known as Jebus because of the Jebusites who lived there. Because it was a city of non-Israelites, the Levite refused to pass the night at Jebus, but insisted on passing on toward Gibeah, a city of the tribe of Benjamin (v. 12).

15. And they turned aside . . . to lodge in Gibeah. Expecting hospitality in the city of Gibeah, the Levite was disappointed. He waited in the public square, inside the gate of the city, but no man of Gibeah offered hospitality.

16. And, behold, there came an old man from his work out of the field. Hospitality was finally offered from a man of Mount Ephraim who sojourned in Gibeah. Again the lack of hospitality of the men of Gibeah is underscored. 18. I am now going to the house of the Lord. The Levite identified himself to the man who showed an interest in helping him. The words, the house of the Lord, are taken to mean Shiloh or Bethel (cf. 20:18,26). The RSV follows the LXX in reading, I am going to my home. 21. So he brought him into his house. The elderly sojourner in Gibeah offered the Levite hospitality, suggesting that he would care for all of the wants of his guest (v. 20).

22. Certain sons of Belial beset the house round about. The vice of the men of Gibeah is comparable to that of the Sodomites. They desired carnal relations with the Levite. As Lot offered his daughters under similar circumstances (Gen 19:8), so here the host offered his own daughter and the Levite's concubine as a means of protecting his guest (v. 24). 25. So the man took his concubine, and brought her forth unto them. The Levite offered his concubine as a means of saving himself. The act cannot be justified. Abraham was willing to sacrifice Sarah to save himself under similar circumstances (Gen 12:10-20). The Levite's concubine was abused all night.

27. And her lord rose up . . . and, behold, the woman his concubine was fallen down at the door of the house. After her harrowing night experience, the concubine made her way to the house, seeking a place of safety. She died, however, outside the house of her host. 29. He took a knife, and laid hold on his concubine. When the Levite saw what had had happened, he placed the dead body of his concubine on an ass and took it to his home. There he divided the corpse into twelve pieces and sent them to the various parts of Israel (cf. I Sam 11:7). All agreed that no such atrocity had taken place since the exodus from Egypt (v. 30).

20:1. Then all the children of Israel went out. The Israelites prepared for war. They assembled at Mizpeh, a central point in the tribe of Benjamin. Except for the men of Jabesh-gilead (21:8), all Israel was represented. 3. Now the children of Benjamin heard that the children of Israel were gone up to Mizpeh. Gibeah was about three miles from Mizpeh. The Benjamites determined to defend the inhabitants of Gibeah.

4. And the Levite . . . answered . . . I came into Gibeah. The Levite recounted the events that led up to the death of the concubine, and declared his reason for sending parts of the dead body throughout Israel. Then he asked counsel of the assembled company. 8. We will not any of us go to his tent. The united tribes determined to punish the men of Gibeah, and laid out a plan of action. They decided to go up by lot against it (v. 9). A lot could be used in determining who should first attack Gibeah. Here, however, it seems to have been used to determine the tenth of the fighting force which should be deployed to serve as the commissariat. A large army requires men responsible for securing provisions (v. 10).

12. And the tribes of Israel sent men through all the tribe of Benjamin, saying, What wickedness is this that is done among you? The other tribes judged that Benjamin had permitted an atrocity not consistent with the moral stature of Israel as a whole. They asked that the offenders be turned over to them for punishment. The purpose of this was to put away evil (v. 13, AV) from Israel. In the Jewish liturgy the verb translated put away is used of the complete removal of leaven on the eve of Passover. The Israelites desired "to extirpate" evil from their corporate life by punishing the offenders. 14. But the children of Benjamin gathered themselves together . . . to go out to battle against the children of Israel. The men of the small tribe of Benjamin felt able to defend themselves against the rest of the tribes. They mustered an army, including seven hundred chosen men, lefthanded (vv. 15,16; cf. 3:15). The Benjamites were skillful as archers and slingers (cf. I Chr 12:2).

18. And the children of Israel . . . asked counsel of God. The Israelites consulted the oracle at Bethel to determine who should first go to battle with the Benjamites. Judah was designated as the tribe to lead the assault. Israelite troops prepared to assault Gibeah (v. 20), but they were massacred by the forces of Benjamin that sallied forth from the city (v. 21). After regrouping their depleted forces, Israel again asked counsel of the oracle of the Lord: Shall I go up again to battle against the children of Benjamin my brother? When the Lord gave an affirmative answer (v. 23), Israel prepared for a second attack. 25. And Benjamin went forth against them out of Gibeah the second day. A second time the Benjamites defeated the forces of the other tribes.

26. Then all the children of Israel . . . came unto the house of God. The RSV reads came to Bethel. Bethel means house of God. The question of interpretation, here, concerns the location of the "house of God." Was it at Shiloh or at Bethel? From the days of Joshua to those of the priest Eli, the ark was located at Shiloh (Josh 18:10; I Sam 1:3). This does not, however, rule out the possibility of a shrine at Bethel during the time of the Judges. The Israelites wept, fasted, and offered suitable sacrifices. When the priest Phineas went before the Lord and asked whether or not the battle should be resumed, he received the answer: Go up; for tomorrow I will deliver them into thine hand (v. 28).

29. And Israel set liers-in-wait round about Gibeah. In their third battle with the Benjamites, the Israelites used strategy that had been used successfully by Joshua at Ai (Josh 8:4-29). They drew the Benjamites out of Gibeah to fight an Israelite army, while a group of liers-in-wait watched for the strategic moment to move into the city. In the initial phase of the battle, the Benjamites, thinking themselves successful, said, They are smitten down before us, as at the first (v. 32). The Israelites, however, were acting in accord with their strategy. They said, Let us flee, and draw them from the city unto the highways. The line of the Israelites was re-formed at Baal-tamar, a place otherwise unknown. 33. And the liers-in-wait of Israel came forth out of their places, even out of the meadows of Gibeah. The RSV follows the LXX and the Vulgate in reading their place west of Gibeah, as the source whence the ambush came. The JPS version transliterates it as Maareh-geba. The place served as a hiding place for the ambush.

37. And the liers-in-wait . . . rushed upon Gibeah. The city was undefended while its armies were pursuing the apparently retreating Israelites. The men of the ambush entered Gibeah without battle and announced their presence there by starting a great fire (v. 38). When the Israelites, in feigned retreat, spied the smoke of the fire (v. 40), a pre-arranged signal (v. 38), they turned upon the Benjamites (v. 42) and slew them within sight of their burning city. Eighteen thousand valiant Benjamites were killed (v. 44). 45. And they turned and fled . . . unto the rock of Rimmon. A group of six hundred Benjamites found a place of refuge at the rock of Rimmon, about four miles east of Bethel (v. 47), where they remained four months. The other Benjamites, with their cities and property, were destroyed.

21:1. Now the men of Israel had sworn in Mizpeh. After the slaughter of the Benjamites, the Israelites faced a new problem. Almost the entire tribe of Benjamin had been destroyed, and the other tribes had vowed not to allow their daughters to marry the few remaining Benjamites. How was the tribe of Benjamin to be preserved?

5. Who is there . . . that came not up with the congregation unto the Lord? Seeking some means of preserving the tribe of Benjamin from extinction, the Israelites sought to determine if there were any who had not assembled with them at Mizpeh. They had vowed that any who refused to come to Mizpeh should be put to death. Upon inquiry it was discovered that Jabesh-gilead had not responded to the appeal to come to the assembly (v. 8). Thereupon twelve thousand men were sent against Jabesh-gilead with the command to kill the males and the married women, but to bring back the virgins to the camp at Shiloh (vv. 10-12).

13. And the whole congregation sent some to speak to the children of Benjamin that were in the rock Rimmon. The Benjamites that were left were assured of the peaceful intent of the Israelites, and the virgins from Jabesh-gilead became wives to four hundred of them (v. 14).

16. How shall we do for wives for them that remain? In view of the oath that had been taken not to give wives to the Benjamites and the desire to preserve Benjamin from extinction, some means had to be found to provide wives.

19. Behold, there is a feast of the Lord in Shiloh yearly. A way of evading the oath was discovered. During an annual feast at Shiloh, the young ladies of the city would be seen in their dances (v. 21). The Benjamites were instructed to Go and lie in wait in the vineyards (v. 20) until they saw the maidens. Then they could come out from hiding and catch . . . every man his wife. The Benjamites would thus have wives, and the Israelites would not have violated their oaths, for they would not have 'given' their daughters to the Benjamites. If complaints came from the relatives of the girls involved (v. 22), the Israelites indicated that they would intercede on behalf of the Benjamites. 23. And the children of Benjamin did so. Wives were thus secured for the Benjamites, who then returned home and rebuilt the cities that had been destroyed in the war.

24. And the children of Israel departed . . . every man to his tribe. The assembly of Israelites was dispersed after the matters pertaining to the Benjamites were properly cared for. The book closes with the reminder that these sad episodes took place during the time when there was no king in Israel: every man did that which was right in his own eyes (v. 25). Though the hand of God can be traced throughout the history of the Judges, human failure stands out in bold relief.

RUTH

INTRODUCTION

Title. The Book of Ruth is named after its heroine, a Moabitess who, after the death of her husband, journeyed to Bethlehem with her widowed mother-in-law. Ruth occupies an important place in Israelite history because she became the ancestress of King David (Ruth 4:18-22) and of Jesus (Mt 1:1,5).

Date and Authorship. The date of composition of the Book of Ruth is unknown. Biblical scholars find some clues to the time of composition within the book itself. Since David is mentioned in the book (4:17,22), it could not have been written before the tenth century B.C. The writer found it necessary to explain certain customs which he regarded as archaic (4:6-8), a fact which indicates that the book was written some years after the customs fell into disuse.

How much later than the time of David the Book of Ruth was written is a matter of conjecture. Although some scholars date it as late as the fourth century, many others insist on a pre-Exilic date. Robert Pfeiffer notes, "The general character of the Hebrew vocabulary and syntax, the use of ancient idiomatic expression current in the best prose of the Old Testament . . . , and the classical purity of style could be adduced in favor of an early date" (Introduction to the Old Testament, p. 718). He prefers a date about 400 B.C., however, and suggests that a gifted writer from a later period might have patterned his work after earlier models.

Edward Young, calling attention to the absence of Solomon's name in the genealogy, suggests that since a later writer would have extended his genealogy beyond the time of David, the book was probably written some time during the reign of David (Introduction to the Old Testament, p. 358).

The Talmud (Baba Bathra, 14 b) attributes the authorship of Ruth to Samuel, a view which is no longer held by either Jewish or Christian scholarship. As in the case of other Old Testament historical books, we cannot assign a known author to Ruth. That does not, of course, detract from the spiritual value and literary beauty of this episode from the time of the Judges, which an unknown Jewish author has preserved.

Use of Book. In the Jewish liturgy the scroll of Ruth is read on Pentecost.

Historical Background. The period of the Judges was one of turbulence and unrest. Tribal jealousies and foreign oppressions weakened the Israelites politically, and idolatry sapped the moral strength of the people who had experienced the power of God at the time of the Exodus. The story of Ruth, however, presents a different side of life during the period of the Judges. Here we read of the joys and sorrows of a godly family from Bethlehem. Ruth, the Moabitess, who became a worshiper of Israel's God, exhibited a faith and loyalty at that time rare in Israel. After the sorrow of losing her first husband, Ruth returned to Bethlehem with her mother-in-law and was happily married to Boaz. In this way she became an ancestress of King David.

COMMENTARY

I. The Family of Elimelech Migrates to Moab. 1:1-5.

1. In the days when the judges ruled. The Book of Ruth presents a contrast to the turbulent events described in Judges. There we read of apostasy and oppression, intertribal jealousy and civil war. Here we are reminded of God's providential dealings in the life of one family, of the sorrows of that family, and of the way the Lord's purposes found fulfillment through a Moabitess who became the ancestress of King David, and of the Saviour (cf. Mt 1:5).

There was a famine in the land. Rainfall in Palestine is never plentiful, and quite frequently it is insufficient to provide adequately for the basic crops. Famines took place during the lifetimes of Abraham (Gen 12:10), David (II Sam 21:1) and Elijah (I Kgs 17:1). In the country of Moab. Moab was a son of Lot, the evil fruit of the incestuous relation of Lot with one of his daughters (Gen 19:36,37). Moabites had hired Balaam to curse Israel (Num 22:1-8), during Israel's pilgrimage to Canaan. Under normal circumstances Moabites were barred from participation in the national, corporate life of Israel (Deut 23:3-6). There were friendly relations between some individual Israelites and Moabites, however. When fleeing the wrath of Saul, David found a friend in the king of Moab (I Sam 22:3,4).

2. Mahlon and Chilion. The names of the two sons of Elimelech and Naomi are expressive of physical weakness. Mahlon means "sickly" and Chilion, "wasting." As a matter of fact they did not live long after settling in Moab. 4. They took them wives. The sons of Elimelech and Naomi settled in Moab and married. There is no specific condemnation of these marriages, although they would surely have been frowned upon by the orthodox in Israel. 5. The woman was left. During the ten years' sojourn in Moab, the husband and two sons of Naomi died. All that were left of the once happy family were three women – Naomi and her two daughters-in-law, Ruth and Orpah.

II. Elimelech's Widow and Daughter-in-law Return from Moab. 1:6-18.

6. She had heard . . . how that the Lord had visited his people. While in Moab, Naomi learned that the famine had ended in Bethlehem. Being a widow with family ties there, she prepared to return home. 7. Her two daughters-in-law with her. The girls were so attached to their mother-in-law that they wished to leave their own country and go to Bethlehem. 8. Go, return each to her mother's house. Naomi thought it would not be wise for the girls to leave Moab, their native land. She commended them for their loyalty to their dead husbands and to herself, and urged them to stay in their homeland. 9. Each of you in the house of her husband. Naomi thought that the girls would wish to remarry. As they had been faithful in times of adversity, she prayed that God would grant them days of prosperity and blessing in second marriage.

10. Surely we will return with thee unto thy people. It was a tribute to the godly character of Naomi that her daughters-in-law were prepared to leave their own land to go with her to Judah. 11. Why will ye go with me? According to the principle of levirate marriage, the next brother (or, as we note later, kinsman) was expected to marry the childless widow of his deceased brother. The first child of the second marriage was accounted to the deceased brother, and that child carried on the family name and inherited the property as if he had been the child of the deceased man. Naomi asked, Are there yet any more sons in my womb? She implied that she could not hope to be the mother of sons who could later marry the two Moabitish widows.

14. But Ruth clave unto her. Ruth would not be dissuaded. She had determined to abide with Naomi whatever the consequences, and she became the ancestress of David as a result of her choice. Though the character of Orpah suffers by contrast with that of Ruth, no word of reproach is intended for her. She acted on the advice of Naomi and returned to Moab, thereby dropping out of the Biblical record. 16. Whither thou goest, I will go. This section of Ruth is esteemed one of the most touching passages of literature. Ruth renounced all that she could be expected to hold dear in Moab and voluntarily chose to go to Judah and there begin an entirely new life with her mother-in-law. This choice had religious as well as cultural overtones, as we see from the words – thy God [shall be] my God. In Moab Ruth would have been expected to worship

Chemosh (Num 21:29). In going to Judah, however, she would worship the God of Israel. It was a testimony both to her deceased husband and to her mother-in-law that Ruth was willing to entrust herself to the God whom they worshiped. 17. The Lord do so to me, and more also. Ruth in these words solemnly affirmed her desire to be loyal to Naomi as long as she lived. Her words imply a solemn vow, which may be paraphrased, "May a severe judgment fall on me if I am not true to my vow."

18. She saw that she was stedfastly minded to go with her. Ruth's words expressed a love and loyalty that the older woman could not reject, and a determination that made Naomi give up urging her to return to Moab.

III. Naomi and Ruth Arrive at Bethlehem. 1:19-22.

19. So they two went . . . to Bethlehem. When Naomi and Ruth arrived in the city, they caused quite a stir. Is this Naomi? the people asked, expressing surprise. Naomi and Elimelech had left with their happy family; now Naomi's very appearance bore testimony to the hardship and sorrow she had experienced.

20. Call me not Naomi, call me Mara. Naomi means pleasant, whereas Mara means bitter. Naomi said, in effect, that the experiences in Moab had brought such grief into her life that she could no longer bear the name Naomi. The Almighty hath dealt very bitterly with me. Naomi recognized that the tragedies of her life were not accidents but that the hand of God had been in each of them. God is the Almighty, the One who controls all the circumstances of life. He is not powerless in the presence of evil, but remains the sovereign God, who can make all things work together for the good of his children (Rom 8:28). Although Naomi did not rise above the feeling of grief as she arrived at Bethlehem, her recognition that God is almighty offered a ray of hope. 21. The Lord hath brought me home again empty. The very tragedies of her life she traced to God's sovereign will. Paul said he knew how "to be abased" and how "to abound." Naomi thought of her poverty as the result of God's providential dealings in her life. Although "empty," Naomi thankfully recognized that the Lord had brought her home.

22. They came to Bethlehem in the beginning of barley harvest. Famine was over and the beginning of harvest was a good time to return home. The Moabite experience had proved tragic, but the fields of Bethlehem were now full.

IV. Ruth Gleans in the Fields of Boaz. 2:1-23.

1. Naomi had a kinsman . . . and his name was Boaz. The kinsman is described in the AV as a mighty man of wealth, translating a phrase that usually signifies a mighty man of valour, i.e., a brave warrior. Here the expression seems to convey the idea of the finest manly qualities.

2. Let me . . . go to the field, and glean . . . corn. According to Mosaic law the poor were entitled to gather the grain that fell from the hands of the reapers (Lev 19:9; 23:22; cf. Deut 24:19). Corn here signifies grain. It is barley that is meant (cf. Ruth 1:22). 3. Her hap was to light on a part of the field belonging unto Boaz. She had not determined to go to a particular field, but "happened" to go to the field of Boaz. What appeared to be an accident is seen in the light of the whole story to be the providence of God.

5. Whose damsel is this? Boaz noted the presence of a stranger in his field. Her appearance and dress were different from those of the girls he usually saw gleaning behind his reapers. 6. It is the Moabitish damsel. The reply was almost derogatory: "It is that foreigner who came back with Naomi from Moab!" 7. She came, and hath continued even from the morning until now. Ruth had asked permission to glean in the field of Boaz. When the overseer of the reapers gave her permission to do so, she worked diligently. She tarried a little in the house. These words probably refer to the time she spent in the hut erected in the field for rest and refreshment. The Hebrew text implies that Ruth spent a little time there, although the LXX translates, She has not rested (even) a little. The Vulgate reads, She has not returned home (even) for a short time.

8. Abide here fast by my maidens. The maidens followed the reapers in the field, in order to bind the sheaves. Boaz suggested that Ruth should remain in his field with them. There is a tacit assumption that he would provide for her needs. 9. Have not I charged the young men that they shall not touch thee? Boaz directed his workers to keep Ruth from harm. She was further instructed to drink of the water provided for the workers in Boaz' field.

10. Why have I found grace in thine eyes? Ruth was moved by these acts of kindness on the part of Boaz. Her very question showed a spirit of humility and self-effacement.

11. It hath fully been shewed me. Boaz had inquired about Ruth and learned of her faithfulness to her mother-in-law. Leaving the land of one's nativity was considered a real sacrifice. 12. A full reward be given thee of the Lord God of Israel. Boaz recognized that he alone could not adequately repay Ruth for her faithfulness. He prayed that Ruth might be abundantly rewarded by the Lord. Under whose wings thou art come to trust. Ruth had found a place of refuge in Israel's God. As a hen gathers her young under her wings to protect them from harm, so God protects those who come to him for safety.

13. Thou hast comforted me. Ruth had been deeply stirred by the remarks of Boaz. She felt herself unworthy of his acts of kindness. Though I be not like unto one of thine handmaidens. She regarded herself as inferior to the girls who worked for Boaz – perhaps because of her poverty, her Gentile nationality, and her heathen background. His kindness to the others was understandable. His kindness to her was pure grace.

14. At mealtime come thou hither. Boaz invited Ruth to take a place of honor at mealtime. He made it a point to see that she had plenty to eat.

15. Let her glean even among the sheaves. Normally the gleaners took only the grain that had not been bound in sheaves. Boaz, however, made special provision for Ruth. 16. Let fall also some of the handfuls of purpose for her. JPS reads, "Pull out some for her." The reapers were told to provide in a special way for Ruth (without her knowing it). She had the legal right to take all that was accidentally left behind. The reapers saw to it that an abundance of grain was left for her.

17. She . . . beat out that she had gleaned. When the quantity of grain was small, it was beaten by means of a stick to separate the grain from the chaff. And it was about an ephah of barely. This amounted to approximately three pecks, dry measure. It was enough to support Ruth and Naomi for about five days. 18. Her mother-in-law saw what she had gleaned. Naomi was doubtless surprised at the amount of barley Ruth brought home. She . . . gave to her that she had reserved after she was sufficed. Ruth brought her mother-in-law the food she had left after she had eaten her own meal.

19. Where hast thou gleaned today? Surprised at the amount of grain, Naomi asked concerning the field where Ruth had worked. The man's name . . . is Boaz. Boaz was both a wealthy landowner and a close relative of Naomi. As such he could be expected to buy for the family its rightful land (Lev 25:25) and look after the helpless members of the family.

20. Blessed be he of the Lord, who hath not left off his kindness to the living and to the dead. By caring for the widow of Mahlon, Boaz was providing for the dead as well as showing kindness to the living. 22. It is good, my daughter, that thou go out with his maidens. "If Boaz desires to treat you kindly, do not go elsewhere," Naomi advised. "Accept his generosity and remain with his maidens." 23. Unto the end of barley harvest and of wheat harvest. Throughout the harvest season Ruth continued to work with the maidens by day and to return to the home of her mother-in-law each evening.

V. Ruth Finds a Redeemer. 3:1-18.

3:1. Shall I not seek rest for thee. Rest here is equivalent to marriage. Naomi felt that Ruth should not remain a poor gleaner in the fields. Since Ruth had no mother (in Judah, at any rate), Naomi determined to take the initiative to arrange a marriage. 2. Is not Boaz of our kindred? Naomi, mindful of the levirate marriage customs, determined to approach Boaz. Behold, he winnoweth barley tonight in the threshing floor. Boaz spent the night at the threshing floor to avail himself of the breeze that enabled him to winnow. The grain was thrown into the air, and the breeze carried away the chaff. It is possible also that Boaz spent the night there to guard the grain from thieves.

3. Get thee down to the floor. The record is clear that both Naomi and Ruth had the purest of motives in their plans. Although Ruth had been kindly treated by Boaz, he had made no suggestion concerning marriage. Naomi now planned a way by which Ruth might be able to meet Boaz alone. 4. Thou shalt go in, and uncover his feet, and lay thee down. Under usual circumstances this would have been interpreted as an immoral act. The integrity of both Ruth and Boaz, however, was such that Naomi felt free to suggest it.

9. Spread therefore thy skirt over thine handmaid; for thou art a near kinsman. The custom of a man's placing a corner of his garment over a maiden as a token of marriage is known among the Arabs.

10. Thou followedst not young men, whether poor or rich. A tradition states that Boaz was eighty years old when he married Ruth. She is here commended for not seeking the company of the youthful men who, presumably, would have been more attractive to her. 11. All the city of my people doth know that thou art a virtuous woman. The term translated virtuous when used of a man describes strength, bravery, and manliness. The RSV renders it here a woman of worth. All qualities which are admirable in a woman were found in Ruth, according to this testimony.

12. There is a kinsman nearer than I. Boaz was only a nephew of Elimelech, whereas a brother was still living. Although desirous of assuming the responsibility of the gô'ēl (i.e., "redeemer") himself, Boaz insisted on allowing the man with the closest relationship to decide whether or not he wished to assume the responsibilities. 13. If he will not do the part of a kinsman to thee, then will I do the part of a kinsman to thee. The closer relative should have first opportunity, but Boaz expressed a willingness to act as gô'ēl if the close relative chose not to do so. The gô'ēl was a protector responsible to redeem family property that had been alienated.

14. She rose up before one could know another. This is not the "know" of sexual intercourse, but another verb meaning discern. The RSV reads, before one could recognize another. The Hebrew idiom says, "Before man could recognize his neighbor," i.e., before morning. Let it not be known that a woman came into the floor. Though no overt sin had been committed, Boaz was concerned lest people misunderstand the presence of Ruth at the threshing floor. 15. He measured six measures of barley, and laid it on her. The barley may have been sent to Naomi in recognition of her responsibility for Ruth's action. Probably Ruth carried the barley on her head, as is customary in the East.

VI. Boaz Marries Ruth. 4:1-17.

4:2. And he took ten men of the elders of the city. Later Judaism considered ten men as the quorum required for a synagogue. Ten also were required among the Jews for the marriage benediction. 3. Naomi . . . selleth a parcel of land, which was our brother Elimelech's. The context implies that selleth means "intends to sell" or "has offered for sale" (cf. v. 5). It was the concern of the community that a family be preserved from extinction. For this reason the problems of Naomi and Ruth were matters of community interest.

4. I thought to advertise thee. Literally, uncover thine ear. RSV, I thought I would tell you of it. If thou wilt redeem it, redeem it. The near kinsman was legally informed of his right of redemption. I will redeem it. He assumed that the property belonged solely to Naomi, and that his duty would end with the purchase of the field from her.

5. What day thou buyest the field . . . thou must buy it also of Ruth the Moabitess . . . to raise up the name of the dead upon his inheritance. Both the alienation of land and the extinction of a family were to be prevented by the law of the gô'ēl. The gô'ēl would not come into possession of the land himself, but would hold it in trust for his son by Ruth, who would inherit the name and patrimony of Mahlon (her first husband). 6. I cannot redeem it. This would involve financial loss to the purchaser. The prospective gô'ēl would mar his own inheritance by spending money on land that would belong not to him but to a son of Ruth. The Targum suggests that the relative was already married, but this would not have relieved him of obligation.

7. This was the manner in former time in Israel. The explanation implies that at the time of writing this custom was no longer practiced. A man plucked off his shoe, and gave it to his neighbor. This was a symbolic act of transfer. The man who took off his shoe renounced any legal rights he had in the matter. The custom is mentioned in the Nuzu tablets (Ernest R. Lacheman, "Notes on Ruth 4:7,8," JBL, LVI [1937], 53-56).

8. Buy it for thee. The next of kin said to Boaz, Buy it for yourself (RSV). Boaz had earlier made it clear that he would do so if the next of kin did not choose to accept the responsibility of the gô'ēl.

9. I have bought all that was Elimelech's, and all that was Chilion's and Mahlon's, of the hand of Naomi. Boaz publicly stated that he had taken possession of the property and assumed the responsibility for Naomi and Ruth. 10. Ruth the Moabitess . . . have I purchased to be my wife. The verbs translated bought (v. 9) and purchased (v. 10) may simply mean "obtain." Boaz took Ruth in levirate marriage that the name of the dead be not cut off, i.e., to perpetuate the family of Mahlon. From the gate of his place. The gate of an Oriental city was the city hall, the place of government and authority.

11. The Lord make the woman . . . like Rachel and like Leah . . . and do thou worthily in Ephratah, and be famous in Bethlehem. Rachel and Leah were the wives of Jacob. The witnesses expressed their prayer that Boaz would be rewarded with a family comparable to that of Jacob (or Israel). Ephratah is the name given to the region in which Bethlehem is located. Be famous. Literally, Call a name. The elders and people expressed a wish for children who would be reckoned descendants of Boaz. 12. Let thy house be like the house of Pharez. Pharez was the offspring of a Canaanite (Gen 38:2,29). The girl Tamar took into her own hands the law of gô'ēl after the death of two husbands. In the disguise of a harlot she enticed Judah into a sinful relationship which produced twin boys – Pharez and Zarah.

13. So Boaz took Ruth . . . and she bare a son. The marriage was blessed of God. In characteristic Biblical teaching the Lord gave her conception. Children are looked upon as a sacred trust from the Lord.

15. He shall be unto thee a restorer of thy life. As Naomi's sons were dead, she had no hope of continuing her family line. Ruth's marriage and the son she bore brought the hope of a new family in Israel. Thy daughter-in-law . . . is better to thee than seven sons. Seven sons would be indicative of the blessing of God (cf. I Sam 2:5; Job 1:2). Naomi, however, had a daughter-in-law in whose child she found consolation for the loss of her own sons. 16. Naomi took the child . . . and became nurse unto it. This is often interpreted as an adoption ceremony.

VII. Ruth Becomes an Ancestress of David. 4:18-22.

17. They called his name Obed: he is the father of Jesse, the father of David. Obed means "worshiper," "servant," or "slave." It is often combined with the names of the God of Israel or of pagan gods, as in Obadiah, Obed-edom, Ebednego, and Abdullah.

18. The generations of Pharez. Pharez was a son of Judah (Gen 46:12). 20. At the time of Moses, Nahshon served as head of the house of Judah (Num 1:7; 7:12,17; 10:14). Salmon in the form "Salma" (as used in the Hebrew of Ruth 4:20) occurs in I Chr 2:51,54 as "the father of Bethlehem," doubtless an allusion to the people who settled there, including Boaz.

FIRST AND SECOND SAMUEL

INTRODUCTION

Title. The title of these two books comes from the name of the key figure in the opening chapters of I Samuel. The Hebrew word Samuel has had many interpretations. However, the meaning first suggested by the German Hebrew scholar, Gesenius, "The Name of God," still seems to hold first place among Biblical scholars.

Date and Authorship. As is the case with many other Old Testament books, the date for the writing of I and II Samuel is not certainly known. Part of the difficulty in determining the date lies in the fact that most portions of the two books deal with events that occurred after Samuel's death. The early part of I Samuel could have been written about 1000 B.C., the remainder some thirty to fifty years later. Although the Talmud ascribes the authorship of the books to Samuel, it is likely that the prophet wrote only those sections that deal with the history of Israel prior to his retirement from public office. One suggestion, an intriguing one, is that Abiathar wrote much of I and II Samuel, especially those parts that treat of the court life of David. Abiathar was intimately associated with the rise and fortunes of the great king of Israel in that he spent some time with David in his exile. Also, he came from a priestly family and thus had access to the art of writing and record-keeping. Another suggestion is that one of the sons of the prophets from one of the schools founded by Samuel carried on the history of Israel begun by his master.

Historical Background. The call of Samuel to be the prophet and judge of Israel formed a strong turning point in the development of the Old Testament kingdom of God. In the period of transition from leadership by divinely chosen judges to the monarchy, Samuel had the tremendous task of directing the rebuilding of social and religious unity. He was God's instrument for establishing the kingdom of Israel in this great national crisis, second only in importance to the Exodus experience. Samuel's task was to lead Israel out of the period of the Judges and into that of the kings.

He finished the work of the Judges, not by the physical might of his arm alone, but by the spiritual power of his word and prayer. He also laid the foundation of the prophetic office and developed it to the level of the priesthood and the kingship. From his time on, the prophets sustained and fostered the spiritual life of the nation and were the instruments through whom God's will was communicated to ruler and to people.

COMMENTARY

I. The Life and Ministry of Samuel. 1:1–7:17.

A. The Birth and Childhood of Samuel. 1:1–4:1a.

1:1. A certain man of Ramathaim-zophim. The LXX reads, a man from Arimathea (cf. Mt 27:57), a Zuphite. Ramathaim, Twin Heights, is the dual form of Ramah, "high." According to this book, Ramah was the birthplace (1:19), residence (7:17), and burial place (25:1) of the prophet Samuel. It is usually identified with Beit Rima, a village on the western edge of the central highlands of Palestine, twelve miles northwest of Bethel and twelve miles west of Shiloh. Zuph was an ancestor of Elkanah (v. 1), and Ramah, Samuel's home (1:19), lay in the land of Zuph (9:5). Hence, Ramah may be the abbreviated name for Ramathaim-zophim. An Ephrathite. Elkanah (and hence Samuel) was a Levite (see I Chr 6:33) living in Ephraimite territory. This was not unusual, since the Levites had no tribal territory but dwelt among the tribes in specified cities.

2. Two wives. Polygamy, at variance with the ideal of marriage (Gen 2:24), was practiced by Abram, Jacob, Gideon, David, and Solomon. This bigamous marriage (probably in accord with Deut 21:15-17), was undoubtedly caused by a childless first marriage. No moral blame is here attached to Elkanah's marriages. Hannah, or Grace, was also the name of Anna the prophetess (Lk 2:36), and of the mother of the Virgin Mary (according to a tradition), and of the sister of Queen Dido of Carthage, niece of Queen Jezebel. Peninnah, "Coral," or "Pearl," may be compared to Margaret, which means "pearl."

3. The Lord of hosts. A title for God, the leader of the earthly hosts (armies) of Israel (Ex 7:4; Ps 44:9), and the commander of the heavenly hosts, either (a) celestial bodies, such as the sun, moon, and stars, or (b) celestial beings. This title attached to the divine name Jehovah, occurring for the first time in the OT in Samuel, proclaims his universal sovereignty. In Shiloh. Shiloh continued to be the religious center of the nation until after the loss of the ark of the covenant in the disastrous battle of Ebenezer. Nob then replaced Shiloh as the religious center. Jeremiah points to the desolation of Shiloh as the standing witness of God's judgment: "Go ye now unto my place which was in Shiloh, where I caused my name to dwell at the first, and see what I did to it for the wickedness of my people Israel" (Jer 7:12,14). The two sons of Eli, Hophni and Phinehas. Both names are Egyptian. Hophni means tadpole, and Phinehas – the negro.

4. Offered. His sacrifice was a thank offering, for it was only of the thank offering that the worshipers partook (Lev 7:11-18). Part of the animal was offered in sacrifice to God, and the remainder was consumed by the worshipers in a simple communion service. 5. Unto Hannah he gave a worthy portion. Most commentaries accuse Elkanah of favoritism toward Hannah. This misconception arose in the translation of the Geneva Bible of 1560, which reads, a worthy portion, based on the Targum translation of the difficult Hebrew word 'apāyīm ("two-faced"?) as choice. The LXX reads 'epes-kí, "but," suggesting that Elkanah gave Hannah but one portion, although he loved her. The favoritism of Elkanah consisted not in his showing discrimination at the dinner table but in his loving Hannah more than he loved Peninnah.

6. And her adversary also provoked her. Kā'as, the word for "provoke," denotes the feeling aroused by some unmerited treatment. It is used of God's feeling at the triumph of the enemies of Israel (Deut 32:27). To make her fret. Literally, cause her to thunder. The word ra'am means to stir up inwardly, to excite, put into inward commotion. Later, the Syriac Version read this word to mean "lament, complain, murmur." 8. Better to thee than ten children (AV, sons). Ten is a round number used to express a large number. "Am I not better to you than a large family?" is the meaning.

9. Eli the priest belonged to the family of Ithamar, fourth son of Aaron. The duty of the members of this family was to care for the physical property of the Tabernacle. Just when the high priestly succession passed to Eli's family is unknown. Some scholars feel that the Shiloh temple was an abortive attempt by the family of Ithamar to usurp control of the high priesthood. Others feel that the high priestly line of Eleazar became decadent or may even have died out, and hence this office was transferred to the most promising section of the family. Temple of the Lord. Literally, palace of the Lord. Hêkal is a loan word from Sumerian É-gal, "the big house." Originally it was used to denote the palace of the king, while later it was used to signify the temple of the deity. The Tabernacle is called "the palace of Jehovah," not on account of the magnificence and splendor of the building, but because it was the dwelling place of Jehovah of Hosts, the God-King of Israel (cf. Ps 5:7).

10. Bitterness of soul. Elisha uses the expression, "her soul is bitter," in describing to his servant, Gehazi, the distress of the wealthy woman of Shunem at the death of her young son (II Kgs 4:27). The phrase used of Hannah conveys the idea of mental embitterment, deep disappointment. 11. She vowed a vow. Her vow was twofold: (a) lifelong Levitical service; (b) life membership in the guild of the Nazarites. Neither of these positions was necessarily permanent among the Hebrews. A Levite served until the age of fifty; the Nazarites' vow was for a specific period of time (see Num 6:2 ff. for the law of the Nazarite). Samson, Samuel, and John the Baptist were dedicated to perpetual Nazaritehood from birth.

13. Her lips moved, but her voice was not heard. Silent prayer did not characterize early Hebrew praying. Hannah's unusual type of prayer caused Eli to think her drunk. 16. Daughter of Belial. Belial is used in post-biblical literature as a surrogate for Satan. Here it means a "base woman."

17. The God of Israel grant thee thy petition. Jewish commentators offer an alternative reading which makes Eli predict that God will give Hannah a son. The Hebrew text implies a pious wish, not a prophetic prediction. 18. Went her way. The LXX reads, went to her lodging chamber and ate. Both the AV and the LXX imply that Hannah interrupted her meal to pray for a son.

19. They rose up . . . early, and worshipped. This custom of rising early for prayer is attested of the Essenes at Qumran. The Lord remembered her. The suggestion here is that the direct action of the Lord was required in conception. From this idea it was but a step to the belief that a large family was a reward for virtue, and that barrenness was a sign of sinful conduct.

20. When the time was come. Explained by the Jewish commentator, Kimchi (d. 1235), as "at the end of the period of gestation." It is better understood as "at the coming round of the new year," i.e., at the next season for Elkanah's annual pilgrimage. Samuel. Some derive his name from shᵉmû'a-'ēl, "heard of God"; others, from shᵉmû-'ēl, "his name is mighty." Derivation from "the name of God," as first put forth by Gesenius, is preferable, however. Two other persons in the OT have the name of Samuel (Num 34:20; I Chr 7:2).

21. And his vow. Perhaps Elkanah joined Hannah in making vows to the Lord. The LXX reads, vows, and adds that on this occasion he paid "all the tithes of his land" (cf. Deut 12:26,27). Following Josephus, it has been suggested that the Hebrew copyist omitted what the LXX had recorded because of the improbability of a Levite's paying tithes. However, Josephus does describe Elkanah as a Levite, and according to Num 18:26 ff. and Neh 10:38, the Levites did pay tithes. 22. Until the child be weaned. According to II Macc 7:28, Hebrew women suckled their children for three years. 23. The Lord establish his word. God had not yet revealed himself to Hannah. Perhaps Eli's words to her (v. 17) caused them to think that God had spoken in the birth, and so they anticipated his further word. The Syriac and the LXX read, thy word, as Elkanah's expression that Hannah was to fulfill her vow in due time.

24. Three bullocks. The two bulls, according to Ehrlich, were gifts to Eli, and one was sacrificed (v. 25). Keil suggests that all three were offered, one for the vow of the child, one for the annual burnt offering, and one for the annual thank offering. The LXX reads, a three-year-old bull. 26. That stood by thee.

Prayer was offered (a) standing, as by Hannah and Abraham (Gen 18:22); (b) kneeling, as by Solomon (I Kgs 8:54), and Daniel (Dan 6:10); or (c) prostrate, as by Moses and Aaron (Num 16:22), and Jesus (Mt 26:39). 28. I have lent him to the Lord. Lent is a poor word to describe Hannah's gift of Samuel to the service of the Lord in the Shiloh temple. It carries the idea of temporal action, while here the dedication is complete and irrevocable.

2:1. Mine horn is exalted in the Lord is a picture of the wild ox with head carried high in the confidence of strength. My mouth is enlarged over mine enemies refers to a gesture of gaping still used in the Middle East to show derision and contempt.

2. None holy as the Lord. It is the holiness of the Lord that makes him other than man, transcendent. This transcendence is in terms of degree rather than of remoteness. Rock like our God. Rock is a frequent metaphor to express the strength and permanence of the Lord. Rocks, as capable of easy defense, were often used as places of refuge. The strength of God is a place of refuge (Ps 91:1,2).

3. By him actions are weighed. With this figure of the balance as the means of testing human worth (Prov 16:2; Dan 5:27), we may compare the familiar illustration from the Egyptian Book of the Dead, representing the heart of the deceased being weighed in a scale against the symbol of Truth and Right before the deceased is admitted to the realm of Osiris. The text to which the Hebrew part refers, however, is applied to this life. 4. Bows of the mighty men are confounded. Apart from Jer 51:56, ḥatat is not used to denote the breaking of outward things, but the breaking of men. 6. He bringeth down to the grave, and bringeth up. Although this may refer to the resurrection of the dead, it is generally understood to convey the idea that the issues of life and death are in the hand of God; and it may refer to a man's being brought to the point of death but spared.

8. Out of the dust . . . from the dunghill. The town dump was the place where beggars slept at night and where they asked for alms by day. This verse shows God's treatment of the weak and needy. As the human judge is in duty bound to give judgment in favor of the widow, the orphan, the foreigner, and the poor (Isa 1:17; Jer 5:28), so God, the divine Judge, gives judgment in favor of the helpless (Ps 43:1; Isa 11:3,4). Thus, his righteousness becomes a synonym for salvation (Isa 46:13; 51:4-8). The pillars . . . are the Lord's. That is, the princes or governors. The Lord has set men in places of authority and has set the world upon them, i.e., he has laid the government of world kingdoms upon their shoulders (cf. Gal 2:9, where men are called "pillars").

9. His saints (ḥasidîm). The Hebrew word ḥăsîdāw is best rendered "loyalty in love." It conveys the idea of loyalty to an agreement. The best example in human affairs is faithfulness to the marriage vow – loyalty and love. Ḥăsîdaw is often translated "mercy," "kindness," or "loving kindness." It is the root of Ḥasidîm, "the pious ones." 10. His king . . . his anointed. This is the first reference in the OT to the king as the anointed of the Lord. Later, in the eschatological thought of Judaism, this expression became the characteristic title of the expected Deliverer, the Messiah or the Christ, who would alleviate world troubles in a Messianic era.

11. Did minister unto the Lord. To serve in the presence of the Lord denotes to perform the duties of priests or Levites in connection with the worship of God. In such service Samuel took part as he grew up, under the superintendence of Eli and according to his instructions.

13-17. The priests' custom. That which is justified by precedent. Actually, the precedent is seen in the law of Deut 18:3 and Lev 7:31-34. The sons of Eli were guilty of a twofold sin: (a) instead of taking only their allotted portion, they took all the fork would hold; and (b) they took their share before the fat and blood were offered in sacrifice to the Lord. Apparently the priests did not accept invitations to every family meal but wanted prize cuts sent to their homes. To make sure of getting these prime cuts, they insisted that their servants get the best pieces before the offerings were made.

18. Girded with a linen ephod. The ephod was a scanty garment (II Sam 6:14) worn by inferior priests, Levites, judges, and eminent persons for religious purposes. It is not to be confused with the ephod used in divination. Although the Egyptian priests also wore linen garments (ipd), it is not certainly known that their dress influenced that of the Hebrew priests. 19. A little coat. The Hebrew me'îl denotes a kind of long loose robe worn by kings (I Chr 15:27), prophets (I Sam 15:27), men of position (Job 2:12), and women of rank

(II Sam 13:18). It had a hole for the head, and slits in the sides for the arms to come through, but no sleeves. It was worn as an outer garment over the tunic.

21. Grew. The same verb is used of Moses (Ex 2:10ff.). It may denote mental and moral advancement as well as physical growth.

22. The women that assembled at the door. Exodus 38:8 mentions these women "in service." Some think that the two sons of Eli introduced the cultic prostitution of Canaan into the Shiloh temple. Others think that these women were nursery attendants for small children like Samuel.

24. People to transgress. The LXX reads, so that the Lord's people do not worship; i.e., refuse to attend the services because the leaders are immoral.

25. If a man sin against the Lord. When a man has a complaint against another, the matter can be decided by God through his representative, the judge (Ps 82:3), or by the sacred lot in the hand of the priest. But in a case in which God is the plaintiff, there can be no reference to a disinterested party, and the crime incurs the direct vengeance of heaven. Because the Lord would slay them. Cf. the language of Ex 4:21 and Josh 11:20, where we read that the Lord hardened the hearts of Pharaoh and the Canaanites; and I Sam 16:14, where it is said that "an evil spirit from the Lord troubled Saul." Yet we are assured that "the Lord delighteth in mercy" (Mic 7:18), and "hath no pleasure in the death of him that dieth" (Ezk 18:32). This coexistence of mercy and judgment in the Divine will (Ex 34:6,7) is a mystery that transcends our comprehension. But it must be carefully noted that it was not until Pharaoh had turned a deaf ear to repeated warnings, not until the Canaanites had polluted themselves with intolerable abominations, that God hardened their hearts. Only when Eli's sons had ignored and defied His laws did He determine to slay them.

27. A man of God. The song of Hannah and the prophecy of the man of God are the only recorded instances of prophecy since the days of Deborah in the early period of the Judges. The house of thy father. That is, Aaron. Although the genealogy of Eli is nowhere given in the OT, the chronicler states (I Chr 24:3) that one of Eli's descendants was one "of the sons of Ithamar," the fourth son of Aaron. Also, the name of Eli's son Phinehas is another link connecting him with the family of Aaron (Ex 6:23,25).

28. To burn incense was to sprinkle a powder over live coals and thus create an aroma. Canaanites, Hebrews, Greeks, and Romans all used this feature in the worship of deity.

29. Wherefore kick ye. The figure is that of a pampered and intractable animal (Deut 32:15). 31-35. Verse 31 refers to the massacre of the priests at Nob; verses 32,33 to the deposition and consequent poverty of Abiathar; verse 35 to the rise of Zadok to the high priesthood. Ezekiel, in his vision of the new Temple, saw the sons of Zadok as the true priests. 36. Some modern scholars find in this verse a picture of the straits to which the priests of the local sanctuaries were reduced when the latter were abolished by the reform of Josiah.

3:1. The child Samuel. According to Josephus, Samuel had just completed his twelfth year when the Lord spoke to him. It was also at the age of twelve that the child Jesus went up to Jerusalem with his parents (Lk 2:42). The word of the Lord was precious. The rarity of revelation made the few occurrences prized possessions. No open vision. The revelation was in the form of a word "seen" by the prophet (cf. Isa 2:1 – "The word that Isaiah the son of Amoz saw"). The LXX implies that there was no publicly recognized prophet whom the people could consult, and no recipient of divine revelation.

3. Ere the lamp of God went out in the temple. Since the candlestick (seven-branched) was filled with just enough oil to burn through one night (Lev 24:2,3), the time of Samuel's call was undoubtedly the early morn. And Samuel was laid down. Samuel slept somewhere near the ark, in a cell for the ministering priests. The word temple took in all the area. Hence, Samuel did not sleep by the ark but in a cell in the temple area. 4. The Lord called Samuel. Modern Moslems still believe that God speaks in visions to those who sleep in the sanctuary. Keret, too, in the Ugaritic Epic, received a revelation in the sacred tent.

11. I will do a thing. This, according to Rashi and Kimchi, means the capture of the ark. However, it may have been intended to be more comprehensive and to include the defeat of Israel, the death of Eli and his sons, the capture of the ark, and the desolation of the sanctuary. The ears . . . shall tingle. This expressive phrase occurs two other times (II Kgs 21:12; Jer 19:3), in reference to the destruction of Jerusalem by Nebuchadnezzar.

13. He restrained them not. Either he did not rebuke them severely enough (2:23,24); or (according to Kimchi), he rebuked them too late, when he was old and his rebuke ineffective. Men of God, whose duty it is to admonish others regarding their sinful behavior, often fail to notice the presence of sin in the lives of those nearest to their hearts. Paul's insistence that religious leaders must be home leaders, is appropriate. 14. The iniquity . . . shall not be purged with sacrifice nor offering for ever. No sacrifice, animal or vegetable, would cause God to turn from his decision to end the dynasty of the house of Eli. The sins of Eli's sons could be forgiven, but their office of priesthood was forever gone.

15. Opened the doors. This was a part of the regular duties of a temple servant. He also lighted the evening lamps and led the semiblind Eli to his posts. The Tabernacle in the wilderness had a curtain at the entrance; the temple at Shiloh had folding doors. 17. God do so to thee, and more also, if thou hide any thing. An imprecation connected with the slaying of an animal at the taking of an oath. The parties involved prayed that the fate of the victim might be theirs should the oath be violated.

20. From Dan even to Beer-sheba. Equivalent to "from Maine to California." Dan was the northernmost point in Israel. It stood on a hill from which the main source of the Jordan takes its rise. Beer-sheba was the southernmost point in Israel, a favorite haunt of Abraham. Because of the present division of the city of Jerusalem into Jewish and Arab sections, modern Beer-sheba may soon become the capital of the new State of Israel. Beer-sheba is centrally located in the Negev, the most undeveloped area with potential in modern Israel. Samuel was established. He was accredited, approved. The implication of this verse is that men from all parts of Israel came to consult Samuel at Shiloh.

B. The Capture and Return of the Ark. 4:1b–7:1.

1. The Philistines were the sole non-Semitic inhabitants of Palestine. They came from Caphtor (Amos 9:7; Jer 47:4,5; Deut 2:23), which has usually been identified with Crete. Some scholars believe these Philistines were the displaced persons uprooted by the Achaean invasion of ancient Greece, the Aegean Islands, and the coast of Asia Minor in the 1200's. The Philistines were organized under five lords, each of whom controlled one of their five chief cities – Ashdod, Ekron, Askelon, Gaza, and Gath. Their centers lay in the path of conquering armies; and so, eventually, the Philistines pass off the scene of Israel's history, except in their bequeathing to the land of Israel the name Palestine. The earlier Philistine population in Canaan during the patriarchal times was swelled by these displaced persons. 2. In the field. The battle took place in open country, probably in the Plain of Sharon, where the Philistines had the advantage with their chariots (13:5; II Sam 1:6). The Israelites held their ground but suffered serious loss of men.

3. Let us fetch the ark of the covenant . . . that . . . it may save us. The ark preceded Israel at the crossing of the Jordan and at the battle of Jericho. It symbolized the presence and power of Jehovah, and the elders believed that apostasy could be rectified by the presence of the divine symbol. They could not distinguish between the ark as the symbol of God's presence and the actual presence of God. 4. Which dwelleth between the cherubims. Between is missing in the Hebrew, and the LXX reads on. Dibelius theorized that the ark was a throne borne by cherubim, stylized on the sides of the box.

5. A great shout. This may have been the war cry of Num 10:35 – "Rise up, Lord, and let thine enemies be scattered; and let them that hate thee flee before thee." 6. In the camp of the Hebrews. Hebrews was the name used of the Israelites by foreigners and by the Israelites of themselves when speaking to foreigners. It may be from 'ēber, "beyond," originally applied to Abraham as coming from beyond the Euphrates (Josh 24:2ff.). Or it may be a patronymic from Eber (Gen 10:21,24), signifying the descendants of Eber.

10. There fell of Israel thirty thousand footmen. Some say this figure is a military exaggeration of losses; some, that it includes all losses (men and beasts of war); some, that thirty thousand men lost the battle; others, that close combat and poison-tipped arrows produced huge losses. Herodotus and Josephus attest the vast mortality that frequently marked the battles of antiquity. 11. Were slain. For an account of this national disaster, see Ps 78:60ff.

12. A man of Benjamin. There is a rabbinic tradition that this man was Saul and that he rescued the tables of the Law from Goliath, who in turn walked off with the ark of the Lord. Clothes rent. Rending one's clothes and putting earth or ashes on one's head were the universal signs of mourning for the dead, or for a national calamity (Josh 7:6; II Sam 15:32).

13. Eli sat . . . by the wayside watching. Eli had gone to the gate of the city to wait for news of the battle. The messenger, in his anxiety to bring the news, hastened past the blind old man at the city gate and had to return to him to render an account of the battle. All the city cried out. Most of the men of Shiloh had been killed.

17. This well illustrates the climactic style of the Biblical writer. The four items – Israel's flight, the general massacre, the death of Eli's sons, and the capture of the ark – are presented in order of increasing significance for the old priest.

19. She bowed herself. In some parts of the East, parturient women give birth to their offspring in a standing position; in others, they bring forth kneeling, as is still the custom in Ethiopia. 21. Departed. The Hebrew word expresses much more. It is an ominous word, meaning, is gone into exile. The ark had gone into a foreign land. It is probable that this victory of the Philistines was followed by the desolation of Shiloh. Though the historical books are silent about this tragedy, it was still far from forgotten in Jeremiah's day (7:12,14; 26:6). Ichabod. Hebrew 'ikābôd—"Where is the glory?" Glory has a variety of meanings in Hebrew. It may mean "weight," used metaphorically to denote worth or prestige. Such "glory" may be evidenced in riches (Ps 49:16,17), in a crown (Job 19:9), in gorgeous vestments (Ex 28:2). The glory of a forest is its trees; of a nation, its people. "Glory" is also used as a surrogate for God. Here it means, "Where is God?" The Hebrews often failed to distinguish between the presence of God and the religious symbols for his presence. God was where the holy objects were. When the ark was taken, God was regarded as absent from Israel. In subsequent years, Israel's prophets insisted that God was with his people as truly in the hour of chastisement as at the time of blessing.

5:1. Ashdod was thirty-three miles west of Jerusalem, strategically located on the high road from Syria to Egypt. It had been assigned to Judah (Josh 15:47). Sargon of Assyria captured it in 711 B.C., and in 630 B.C. it withstood an Egyptian siege for twenty-nine years. It was finally destroyed by Jonathan the Maccabee (I Macc 10:84).

2. Dagon. Perhaps from dag, "fish," or from dāgān, "corn." A fish-god, represented by a figure with the head and the hands of a man and the body of a fish, was worshiped in Syria and is depicted on an Assyrian bas-relief. On the other hand, the Philistines in the rich wheat belt of the Shephelah had worshiped a grain-god imported from the Euphrates Valley. This god was Dagon, who is mentioned in the Ras Shamra tablets as the father of Baal. A temple to Dagon existed in Ashdod until the time of the Maccabees (I Macc 10:83ff.). The depositing of a trophy in this temple of Dagon was not unique. In the Gezer sanctuary was found a sacred stone carried from Jerusalem after a military victory. Also, the Hammurabi stele was carried away by the Elamites and erected in Susa. 4. The Philistines were victorious over the Hebrews, but not over Jehovah. "The idols shall be moved at his presence" (Isa 19:1). 5. Tread on the threshold. The practice of jumping over the threshold and not stepping on it was perhaps an ancient custom (cf. Zeph 1:9). The Targum paraphrases this, "who walk in the customs of the Philistines."

6. He destroyed. When applied to men, as in Mic 6:13, the word signifies "to make desolate" not only by diseases but also by withdrawal or diminution of the means of subsistence. 8. Lords. Seren is used only of the five Philistine city rulers. It may be an Achaean word which the Philistines retained when they adopted the Semitic vocabulary. It is related to the Greek tyrannos, ("tyrant") in form and function. The Greeks may have borrowed it from their Aegean forebears. Gath means wine press. It was captured by David (I Chr 18:1), fortified by Rehoboam (II Chr 11:8), taken by Hazael (II Kgs 12:17), then retaken by Uzziah and dismantled (II Chr 26:6). It is mentioned in Amos 6:2 as an example of fallen greatness. Goliath lived there (I Sam 17:4), as also did David, for a while, when fleeing from Saul.

11. For there was a deadly destruction, is used regarding the tumult of a routed army (Deut 7:23; Isa 22:5). 12. The longer the Philistines refused to recognize the supremacy of Jehovah, the heavier became the plagues. This increasing severity also characterized the plagues inflicted on Egypt in Pharaonic times.

6:2. Diviners. Isaiah 2:6 mentions the fame of the Philistine diviners. 3. Send it not empty. In all religions offerings are regarded as a necessary part of worship. These offerings could be in the form of animal or vegetable sacrifices, or in cash. 6. Harden. This same word is used of the hardening of Pharaoh's heart in Ex 7:14; 8:15,32.

7. A new cart. Likewise our Lord rode on an ass whereon never man sat (Mk 11:2); his body was placed in Joseph's new tomb, wherein never man before was laid (Mt 27:60). From the evidence of archaeology, this was undoubtedly a two-wheeled cart similar to those seen in Europe today. 8. In a coffer. The word 'argāz occurs only here. The RSV reads, in a box; the AV, in a coffer.

12. The kine took the straight way to . . . Beth-shemesh. Since the natural thing for a cow to do is to go directly to her calf, the obvious conclusion was that the animals were controlled by a supernatural power. Compare with this the sign to Gideon, in Judges 6, which consisted in phenomena contrary to expectations. 13. Reaping their wheat harvest in the valley. At such times in Bible lands, the whole village goes forth to the field.

14. A burnt offering. The cart and oxen, having been used for a sacred purpose, were holy and could not be used for secular purposes, but must be offered in sacrifice. The Talmud and various Jewish commentators explain this offering by stating that, after the desolation of Shiloh, sacrifices were permitted at 'high places.' As there was no central sanctuary, the law of Deut 12:10 ff. was temporarily suspended.

19. Fifty thousand and threescore and ten men. Some manuscripts mention only the seventy. How the fifty thousand got into the text is unknown. 20. This holy Lord God. Their action illustrates man's desire to free himself from the burden of God's presence instead of seeking to fit himself for it. 21. Kirjath-jearim. The city of thickets. In Josh 15:60 it is called Kirjath-baal, indicating possibly the presence of a sanctuary there. Earlier it was a city in the Gibeonite league.

C. The Victory over the Philistines. 7:2-17.

3. The . . . Ashtaroth. The Hebrew plural of Ashtoreth, the name of the goddess whom the Babylonians called Ishtar and the Greeks, Astarte (31:10). She was one of the oldest and the most widely distributed of Semitic deities. Among the western Semites she was the goddess of fertility and sexual relations. Hence, rites of a most licentious character were associated with her worship. The name of the goddess was most probably pronounced Ashtart in Palestine (hence the Gr. form), while the traditional form, Ashtoreth, was an intentional deformation from the vowels of bosheth ("shame") given in the pronunciation of this goddess' name. 4. Baalim. Baal was the supreme male deity of the Phoenician and Canaanite nations. In the Ras Shamra inscriptions he is known as the son of Dagon and the heir to the throne of El. He was a fertility-god whose domain was in the sky, from where he fertilized the land and thus controlled nature. The cult of Baal was in vogue when Israel entered Canaan, and its many similarities to the Hebrew worship of Jehovah made for a hasty syncretism on the part of many Israelite communities. The ministry of Elijah and Elisha was directed against the worship of Baal, and even some kings joined the crusade.

5. Mizpeh. Mizpeh was the meeting place of the national assembly on two other important occasions – when war was declared on Benjamin (Jud 20), and when Saul was elected king (I Sam 10:17). Two identifications have been suggested: Nebi Samwil, a height about five miles north of Jerusalem, the traditional residence of Gedaliah, the governor of Judah appointed by Nebuchadnezzar (II Kgs 25:23), and the scene of another day of national humiliation under Judas the Maccabee (I Macc 3:44 ff.); and Mount Scopus, the broad ridge immediately northeast of Jerusalem. Because of the similarity of meaning between Mizpeh – watch tower, and Scopus – watchman, some have favored the latter site. I will pray for you. Samuel was both the child of prayer and a man of prayer (8:6; 12:19,23). In Jer 15:1, Moses and Samuel are cited as men of prevailing prayer.

6. Poured it out. The pouring of water as a sign of penitence is attested only in this passage. The nearest parallel was the pouring out of water from the pool of Siloam within the temple area on the last day of the Feast of Tabernacles in memory of the gift of water from the rock in the Exodus. Judged. His function was twofold – civil and military. As civil judge, he did what Moses did – judged "between one and another," and made them "know the statutes of God, and his laws" (Ex 18:16). As military judge, he did what Othniel, Ehud, Barak, and

Gideon had done before him – organized and marshaled the people for effective resistance to their oppressors and led them to victory.

14. Amorites. In several passages in the Bible the name Amorite (Westerner) is used loosely of the original inhabitants of Canaan in general. Hammurabi was a famous Amorite.

16. In circuit. Samuel voluntarily performed the functions of an itinerant judge for the convenience of the people residing in different districts of the country, and for the adjustment of all controversies. Gilgal. After the destruction of Shiloh, Gilgal seems to have become one of the principal centers of the religious and civil life of the nation. There Samuel held assizes, the national assembly was convened (11:14), and the army was mustered (13:4). The remoteness of this place from the Philistines may have been the reason for the choice. 17. And there he built an altar. This deviation from the law of Deut 12:5,13 was probably occasioned by the public disorder of that period and the destruction of both the Tabernacle and its altar. Samuel, being a pious man, was desirous of animating his devotions by prayer and sacrifice. Jehovah sanctioned the erection of this altar by accepting the person and service of the worshiper.

II. The Life and Ministry of Saul. 8:1–14:52.

A. Israel's Request for a King. 8:1-22.

3. Took bribes. Samuel failed to learn from the lesson of Eli and his sons. 5. Make us a king. The institution of the monarchy involved the separation of the civil from the religious leadership. And this in turn meant that Israel now began to have a political history independent of her religious history, and therefore, of her true calling. Israel was called to religious leadership of the world, and the verdict of history is on the side of those who regarded her entry into world politics as a fundamental mistake.

6. The thing displeased Samuel. The elders (v. 4) gave Samuel two reasons for their request: the maladministration of justice by Samuel's sons in the Beersheba court; and the need for a war leader (v. 20). Samuel was personally affected by the request. To be told, after a lifetime of service, that his sons were unworthy to succeed him was most distressing. And to be superseded by another after years of faithful service was a terrific blow to his sensitive spirit.

11. The manner of the king. The demands which the king would make are enumerated: military service, forced labor on royal lands and in the royal arsenal, service in the royal kitchen, appropriation of land to reward the king's ministers, taxation, and confiscation of slaves for the king's work. 13. To be confectionaries. That is, those who make compounds of spices and perfumes. 15. Tenth. This is the only reference in the OT to the exaction of tithes by the king. However, in the East it was not unusual for the revenue of the sovereign to be derived in part from tithes, as, for example, in Babylon and Persia.

21. He rehearsed them. "Rehearse" is derived from Old French rehercier, "to harrow over again." Samuel once more went over the matter as a farmer harrows again a plot before planting it.

B. Political Life of Saul. 9:1–12:25.

9:1. A mighty man of power. Or, a man of great wealth (cf. II Kgs 15:20). 2. Whose name was Saul. Saul occurs as the name (a) of an Edomite prince (Gen 36:37,38); (b) of a son of Simeon (Gen 46:10); (c) of a Kohathite Levite (I Chr 6:24); (d) and, in the NT, of Saul of Tarsus (Acts 7:58). Young man. Bāhûr in Hebrew means a man in the prime of life. Saul was not a teen-ager, for he had a young son, Jonathan, at this time.

4. Mount Ephraim. This was an extended tour. Shalisha and Shalim are unidentified. 6. All that he saith cometh surely to pass. This was one of the tests of a true prophet. A second test was that the teaching of the prophet must be in keeping with the faith of Israel (cf. Deut 18:21,22; 13:1-3).

11. Going out to draw water. The customary duty of the young women of the village, practiced yet today. The time was evening (cf. Gen 24:11). One well or spring supplied the entire village. 12. In the high place. High place does not mean a height or hill, necessarily; but throughout it signifies a place of prayer or sacrifice. 13. He doth bless. He is emphatic. Samuel must be present to offer the prayer of blessing before the participants engaged in the sacred meal. Such a blessing of the sacred meal is not mentioned elsewhere in the OT. The priestly blessing on the meal is seen in Qumran literature and in the Lord's Supper.

15. Told Samuel in his ear. Literally, had uncovered his ear, a figure of speech said to be derived from the practice of one's pushing aside another man's hair or the corner of his turban in order to whisper a secret into his ear.

19. Go up before me. Permitting a person to go in front was a way of showing great esteem. The Mishnah says that Elkanah was "a fool," for he walked behind his wife! All that is in thine heart. May we not suppose that Saul at his plough, like Joan of Arc with her flock, had been brooding over the oppression of his country by the Philistines, and cherishing a vague but real desire to liberate his people?

22. Into the parlour. Connected with the high place was a banqueting hall, in which the sacrificial feast was held. In later times this word was used of the chambers in the temple area used for the residence of priests and Levites. 23,24. The portion. In Levitical law, this was the priests' portion. Josephus calls it "the royal portion." 25. Samuel communed with Saul upon the top of the house. The flat roof was used for relaxation. Probably Saul slept there. The content of Samuel's conversation was the deep religious and political degradation of Israel, the oppression of the Philistines, the causes of the inability of the Israelites to meet their problems, the necessity of a national revival, and the need for a leader entirely devoted to the Lord and His program.

10:1. And kissed him. This was an evidence of Samuel's personal affection for Saul, for kissing is nowhere an act expressive of fealty to a king. Bowing expressed one's loyalty to the crown. Anointed. Anointing was not a peculiarly Israelite ceremony. It was practiced in Canaan before the Israelite invasion (Tel el Amarna Letters 37, line 6) and in Egypt, where kings were regularly anointed. Originally the fat of an animal was used in the ceremony of anointing; later the oil of olives was used. Some think the custom of anointing started in the belief that the anointing infused the strength of the animal into the king. However, to a Hebrew, anointing signified that the power of God was infused into the person of the one anointed. Anointing is still part of the ceremonial of coronation in England, as well as in many other countries.

2. Thou shalt find. Samuel gave to Saul a sign the fulfillment of which would confirm the divine nature of his call to kingship. 3. The oak (AV, plain) of Tabor is supposed by some to be identified with the tree of Deborah, between Ramah and Bethel (Jud 4:5).

5. The hill of God. Or the Gibeah of God. Gibeah is used to denote the bald, rounded hills of central Palestine. Garrison may be the Philistine officer (13:3) placed in the city to maintain Philistine harmony and to collect tribute. Company of prophets. This is the first mention of a prophetic guild in the OT. The main interest of these prophets was to uphold the pure religion of the Lord against any syncretism with the fertility cult of Canaan. Some scholars have felt that Samuel was responsible for introducing the prophetic guilds. Psaltery . . . tabret . . . harp. The psaltery was an instrument of ten strings, shaped like a wine bottle and played by the fingers. Tabrets were drums or tambourines, usually played by women. The harps were played with plectra.

9. God gave him another heart. The Spirit of God changed his character into headstrong courage and endowed him with the qualities needed for kingship.

20. The tribe of Benjamin. Benjamin was a favorite son of Jacob and the only son of the twelve born in Palestine proper. The temple area was near the territory of Benjamin and Judah. 22. The stuff. The baggage of those assembled. Many had come from afar and had brought their own provisions. 23. He was higher than any. Physical stature was desirable for leadership. Perhaps it was an aid in war, both offensive and defensive, inasmuch as a tall man makes a good fighter and can easily be seen by those who follow him. Goliath was tall; Xerxes stood out above his men. Samuel also saw physical qualification in the eldest son of Jesse and was prepared to make him his choice for king. 24. God save the king. Literally, Let the king live! This expression is still in common use in England.

25. The manner of the kingdom. As Moses had written the law for the community of Israel, so Samuel now wrote the constitution of the theocratic kingdom. This constitution has never been located. It would be interesting to read the rules and regulations set forth by Samuel. In a book. That is, in a scroll. The book form came into use much later. This scroll was deposited in a high place at Mizpeh.

26. Whose hearts God had touched. Probably these were the men who formed Saul's cabinet. They went home with Saul to Gibeah, where from his farm he ruled as a gentleman farmer. The ruins of the estate of Saul, about four miles north of Jerusalem, have been the subject of much excavation. It is possible to see from Gibeah across the valley to Nebi Samuel (Mizpeh), one of the stations for Samuel's ministry. 27. The children of Belial. An opposition party formed early. Samuel describes the members as sons of Belial, i.e., "hellions." Their refusal to present gifts according to custom was ignored by the magnanimous Saul, and his spirit of generosity "got him off to a good start."

11:1. The Ammonite. The Ammonites, who were related to Israel through Lot (Gen 19:38), lived a Bedouin type life in the territory east of Gilead. 2. Thrust out . . . right eyes. The savage character of the Bedouin Ammonites is attested by Amos 1:13. The loss of the right eye was intended to disable a man for war, since his left eye was usually covered by his shield. Similarly, the amputation of a man's thumbs and great toes (Jud 1:7,8) was designed to incapacitate him for the use of the bow and to destroy his swiftness of foot.

5. Saul came after the herd. In view of the opposition to Saul's election (10:27), Kimchi thinks that he refrained, for the time being, from exercising his rule and went back to farming. It is likely that Saul ruled Israel from the farm as a matter of choice. 7. Hewed them in pieces. The severe threat of Saul, along with his power to carry it out, put "the fear of God" into all Israelite farmers. A volunteer program swamped the draft board!

11. In three companies. Saul used the strategem of Gideon (Jud 7:16). With a forced overnight march, he surprised the Ammonites in the early morning hours and threw consternation and confusion into their hosts.

12:3. Witness against me. Samuel's argument is concerned with his conduct as a judge. A bribe is the price of a life. Normally it means that blood money is offered to the relatives of a murdered man on condition that they forego the right of blood revenge. Here it was a bribe offered to a judge to persuade him to acquit a murderer or to hinder the execution of justice in some manner. 4. Thou hast not. Samuel's political and religious life was audited and found to be in good order.

7. The righteous acts of the Lord. Those acts whereby he vindicates the helpless in delivering them from their enemies. It is this same saving power of God, directed against sin rather than against human enemies, of which Paul speaks when he declares that the righteousness of God is revealed in the Gospel (Rom 1:17).

9. He sold them. God's abandonment of the people of Israel to their foes is described under the figure of a sale, just as the deliverance of Israel is called redemption or buying back. Hazor . . . Philistines . . . Moab. These were the three chief oppressors of Israel during the period of the Judges. 11. Bedan does not occur in the list of the judges. Bedan and Barak are almost identical in Hebrew. The Septuagint, Syriac, and Arabic all read Barak. Moreover, in Heb 11:32, Gideon, Barak, Samson, and Jephthah are named together, as is the case here. In addition, the mention of Sisera in I Sam 12:9 makes it almost a necessity to read Barak here.

17. Thunder and rain. Jerome's testimony (that of an eyewitness), "I have seen rain in the end of June, or in July, in Judea," is borne out by modern travelers. But while unseasonal storms have occurred in Palestine, the evidence of divine intervention in this case is seen in the specific timing of the storm.

23. I should sin. Samuel regarded failure to pray for Israel as a personal sin against God. Prayer for one's nation remains an obligation for a believer.

C. War of Independence. 13:1–14:52.

13:1. Saul reigned one year. The Hebrew of this verse is very difficult to translate. The age of Saul at his accession and one of the two numbers representing the length of his reign have fallen out of the text. It is natural to assume that as David and Solomon reigned forty years, Saul also reigned forty years. Ishbosheth, his son, was also forty years old when he took office and is not mentioned among the sons of Saul in 14:49. One suggested way to read this difficult verse is, "Saul was___years old when he began to reign, and he ruled ___and two years over Israel."

2. Michmash is a village nine miles north of Jerusalem. Jonathan in Hebrew means Jehovah has given; it may be compared with the Greek Theodore, "gift of God." 3. Garrison. The Hebrew nᵉṣîb may mean "the resident" or "political officer" of the Philistines. The assassination of this representative of Philistine rule was the signal for revolt.

13. Thou hast done foolishly. Saul's sin was not his sacrificing. David and Solomon offered sacrifices without being censured. His sin was disobedience to a particular command of Samuel to wait seven days. It was Saul's impatience that brought censure. One can well understand his human tendency toward fear when, on the one hand, he saw his army fleeing at the least opportunity, and on the other, he saw the Philistines massing their chariotry and manpower. However, man's extremity always has been God's opportunity. Israel won wars not with numerical superiority but with men of dedicated valor. Samuel had believed Saul could provide this type of courage and was discouraged at the king's lack of faith in the hour of crisis. The single failure of a great man brought an end to the hope of a lasting dynasty. Leaders must not fail. Men who fail in the hour of decision prove faithless to the sacred trust and stand condemned before a holy God. 14. A man after his own heart. This was the ideal for future leaders (cf. Jer 3:15).

17. The spoilers came. That is, bands sent out to ravage the country immediately concerned in the insurrection. The word "spoiler" is the term used of the destroying angel of Ex 12:23.

21. Yet they had a file for the mattocks. Literally, And the price of the filing was a pim for the mattocks. Hebrew weights discovered at Lachish and elsewhere were marked with the word pim. A pîm weighed approximately two-thirds of a shekel. The Philistines controlled the rights to metallurgy and thus held a distinct advantage over the Hebrews in technological warfare. The Iron Age, which came in around 1200 B.C., began to displace the bronze weapons and implements. Since weapons of iron could easily pierce helmets of bronze, they thus nullified the bronze instruments of warfare. The Philistines were known for their interest in iron, and their control of its use kept the Hebrews in subjection.

14:10. Come up unto us, would be a sign to Jonathan of the cowardice of the Philistines, since it would betray their lack of courage to leave their positions to attack the Hebrews.

13. They fell before Jonathan. Apparently the Philistines, surprised by Jonathan's sudden appearance, fled without their weapons. Jonathan easily overtook them and cut them down. It was the function of the armorbearer to kill outright those whom his master had struck down. 15. There was trembling. The activity of Jonathan started a panic among the Philistines. A very good trembling, literally, a trembling of God, implies that there was also an accompanying earthquake.

16. The watchmen of Saul. These were the army scouts stationed on an adjoining hill. 17. Number now. The term used for muster or parade of troops for inspection. 18. Bring hither the ark. The LXX reads ephod. The ephod was the usual organ of divination, and the ark was at this time in Kirjath-jearim. Some have used this passage to suggest that there were several arks in use among the tribes. Perhaps the LXX preserves the true reading, since it would take some time to go to Kirjath-jearim to secure the ark.

19. Withdraw thine hand. Saul feared that by delaying the attack he would lose the advantage of the general confusion in the Philistine camp. Here again Saul displayed lack of patience in determining the will of God.

29. My father hath troubled the land. Troubled is not a good translation for this ominous term, earlier used of the trouble brought by Achan upon Israel (Josh 7:25), by the daughter of Jephthah upon her father (Jud 11:35), and by Elijah upon Ahab (I Kgs 18:17). The Hebrew word means "to make turbid," "to destroy the happiness of." 31. From Michmash to Aijalon. The route was substantially the same as that by which Joshua chased the Canaanites (Josh 10:10). It was a distance of some twenty miles.

35. Saul built an altar. Apparently at that time the right to sacrifice was not restricted to priests, whose particular function was to use the ephod in interpreting the sacred lot. Saul undoubtedly built other altars, since this was the first altar that he built.

43. Lo, I must die. The ban of Saul was as much reverenced as the vow of Jephthah (Jud 11:35). But Jonathan's life, unlike that of Jephthah's daughter, was important to the whole nation, and Saul found that his power was very strictly limited by the popular will. 45. The people rescued. Hebrew, ransomed. This does not mean that another person was killed in Jonathan's place. The ransom paid might be the life of an animal or a sum of money (Ex 12:21-23; 13:11-15; 30:12-15).

47. He vexed them. The disastrous ending of the life of Saul must be viewed in proper perspective. The earlier part of his reign was a series of successes, both against local enemies and against far-flung outposts in the north and in the southeast. To the end, Israel was contented with his rule, and the nation remained faithful to his dynasty even after his death.

49. Ishui is taken by most commentators to be Ishbosheth. Others say it refers to Abinadab (31:2; I Chr 10:2).

III. The Life and Early Ministry of David. I Sam 15:1–II Sam 24:25.

A. Saul rejected by Samuel. 15:1-35.

2. Amalek. The Amalekites, who were descendants of Esau (Gen 36:12), were constant enemies of Israel. They attacked the Israelites at Rephidim in the neighborhood of Sinai and killed the stragglers on the exodus from Egypt. A nomadic people, they were found in a number of locations in Palestine. They were not exterminated by Saul. A remnant survived until the time of Hezekiah (I Chr 4:43), when they were destroyed by a band of Simeonites in the region of Mount Seir. Saul's campaigning against Amalek was to secure the support of Judah against the Philistines, since the Amalekites were on the flank of Judah. 3. Utterly destroy. Literally, devote (to Jehovah). The first idea of hērem is that the object is dedicated to Jehovah, and so forbidden to common use. Cities, persons, animals, possessions, and precious objects could be devoted in this manner. We meet with the same idea in "harem" (the women's apartment), and the haram (the sacred enclosure at Mecca), in that these, too, were set apart from secular use.

6. The Kenites. The services of Jethro the Kenite to the Israelites in the period of wanderings led to a firm alliance between Israel and the Kenites. These people had accompanied Israel to Jericho, and then gone to dwell with the Amalekites in the desert south of Judah. Famous among the Kenites was Jael, whose husband, Heber, had migrated to north Palestine (Jud 4:11; 5:24). And the Rechabites, who belonged to this tribe (I Chr 2:55), long preserved the nomadic habits of their ancestors (Jer 35:7-10).

7. Shur means wall. The name may have been derived from a wall or line of fortifications which anciently defended the northeast frontiers of Egypt. 8. Agag is found elsewhere only in Num 24:7. It may possibly have been a hereditary title, like Pharaoh among the Egyptians and Abimelech among the Philistines.

11. It repenteth me. In the language of the OT, God is said to "repent" when a change in the character and conduct of those with whom he is dealing leads to a corresponding change in his plans and purposes toward them. His repentance is not to be understood as his regretting his action, nor is it a sign of changeableness. His promises and threats are often conditional (Jer 18:8-10). 12. He set him up a place. That is, a monument to commemorate his victory. To Gilgal. In the same place where Saul's kingdom had been confirmed (11:14), it was to be taken from him. And where the warning regarding the consequences of disobedience had been uttered (13:13,14), the sentence on disobedience had been pronounced.

15. Saul said . . . the people spared the best . . . Saul, like Aaron at Sinai (Ex 32:22), and Adam and Eve in Eden (Gen 3), tried to shift the personal responsibility to others. Samuel now realized that Saul was not a leader, but the tool and slave of the people. 17. Little in thine own sight. These were Saul's words about himself when Samuel first told him of God's plans for his kingship. A curious tradition in the Targum here is that Saul's elevation was a reward for the courage of the tribe of Benjamin at the passage of the Red Sea, when they sought to pass over first.

23. Rebellion . . . witchcraft. Both are forms of apostasy, the one being denial of God's authority, the other a recognition of supernatural powers distinct from God. 24. I have sinned. Saul's penitence was not genuine. He still attempted to shift the blame to the people. His main concern was his fear that the breach between Samuel and himself might become a public scandal and weaken his authority. Notice that Saul feared the people instead of fearing Jehovah, and obeyed their voice instead of obeying the voice of Jehovah.

32. Agag came unto him delicately. By a slight emendation some read, came in fetters. Others, by a clever emendation, read, came in backwards. Some think he was doing the dance of death. The Hebrew word is quite uncertain of meaning.

B. David Anointed To Be King. 16:1-13.

2. Take an heifer with thee. It may be inferred from the command that Samuel was in the habit of holding religious gatherings in different provincial towns from time to time. 4. The elders . . . trembled. Perhaps they looked upon Samuel as the judge who had come to their city to hold court and to punish their offenses (7:16).

7. The height of his stature. Saul's height was one of his qualifications, and Samuel looked upon the height of Eliab and was misled.

12. He was ruddy. Usually this designates the red hair and fair skin regarded as beautiful in southern countries, where the hair and the complexion are generally dark. However, 'admônî, "ruddy," may refer to the youth's physical prowess. David and Esau are the only two in the OT referred to by this term. Perhaps the word "warrior" would be a better translation than ruddy. 13. In the midst of his brethren. Probably they understood by the anointing that David would become a disciple of Samuel, or in time might become a prophet in Samuel's stead, as later Elisha became the ministering servant of Elijah. David occurs often in the Mari tablets as dawid-um and may be a title, such as Captain or Sergeant. The Jewish etymology is that it is from dôd, "love," and that he was the beloved of God.

C. David in the Court of Saul. 16:14–19:17.

15. An evil spirit from God. Apparently a gloomy, suspicious melancholy, bordering on madness, affected the mind of Saul. To the Hebrew, every visitation, alike of good and evil, was directly from God (Amos 3:6). 16. He shall play . . . thou shalt be well. The powerful influence exerted by music upon the state of mind was well known even in the earliest times; so that the wise men of ancient Greece recommended music to soothe the passions, to heal mental diseases, and even to check tumults among the people. 18. A son of Jesse . . . cunning in playing. The qualifications of David were that he was first-rate. He was good looking. He knew music, and he was a skilled warrior. He was quick to learn and to comprehend. And the Lord was with him. Everything that a king needed for success David had.

21. Stood before him. As a Levite stood before the congregation to perform his duties, so David stood before Saul in the capacity of a court minister.

17:1. Socoh is the modern Shuweikeh, some fourteen miles west of Bethlehem. The name Socoh has been found on jar handles in the neighborhood. 2. Valley of Elah. Elah means "oak" or "terebinth." The area probably received its name from a distinctive tree that flourished in the region.

4. Six cubits and a span. A cubit is approximately eighteen inches, a span about nine inches. Goliath stood nine feet and nine inches tall. He was a survivor of the ancient race of Anakim, a remnant of which found refuge in Gaza, Gath, and Ashdod, when Joshua "cut them off" (Josh 11:21,22) from the mountains of Judah. 5. Coat of mail. This piece of armor, made of overlapping plates of metal, protected the body down to the knees. Armor of this kind is represented on the Assyrian sculptures. 6. Brass. Apart from the javelin, all of Goliath's defensive weapons were of bronze, while those used for attack were iron. 7. One bearing a shield. This was an attendant who carried a large shield and went before the warrior to protect his whole body.

8. Am not I a Philistine. The Targum of Jonathan states that Goliath went on to boast that it was he who had killed Hophni and Phinehas and carried the ark to the house of Dagon, and on many occasions had slaughtered Israelites. 10. That we may fight together. Many battles in ancient times were decided by a contest between two warriors. Achilles and Hector agreed to a duel to settle the Trojan War. Goliath proposed that the differences between Israel and Philistia be settled by himself and an Israelite warrior.

15. Went and returned. He went from Saul to feed his father's sheep in Bethlehem, so that he was not in the permanent service of Saul, but at that very time was with Jesse. 17. Parched corn. The words describe grain plucked just as it was ripening, and roasted in a pan or on an iron plate. Arabs still eat "parched corn" as an important element in their diet. 18. Take their pledge. Bring back from them some proof that he had fulfilled his mission.

25. Free from forced labor and contributions (cf. 8:11).

28. Few sheep in the wilderness. Wilderness is unfenced range land suitable for grazing cattle, as distinguished from arable land. Naughtiness. Cf. Eliab's anger with the hatred of Joseph's brethren for him (Gen 37). Apparently Eliab was unaware of Samuel's having anointed David to succeed Saul, or else he interpreted the anointing to mean that David was to become a servant of Samuel.

34. There came a lion, and a bear. A frequentative imperfect—"From the Lebanon at times descended the bear; from the Jordan ascended the lion." The Syrian bear is said to be especially ferocious, and appears to have been more dreaded than the lion. David had had many harrowing experiences but had been victorious in preserving the flock of his father from the evil beasts. Now he assured Saul that he could protect the flock of God from this uncircumcised Philistine. Faith in past events lends a believer courage to trust in the power of God to meet the crises of the present.

38. Saul armed David. The fact that David tried on the armor of Saul indicates that he approximated the height of Saul. If this is the case, the taunts of Goliath concerning the abilities of the "youth" are more sharply barbed than is commonly supposed.

40. His staff. Probably the common walking stick still seen in the Middle East, used to aid one in walking and to ward off ferocious dogs. His sling. In all ages the sling has been the favorite weapon of the shepherds of Syria. The Benjamites were especially expert in its use; even the left-handed could sling stones "at an hair [breadth] and not miss" (Jud 20:16).

54. Brought it to Jerusalem. Jerusalem was still a non-Hebrew city (II Sam 5:4ff.). A little later we find the sword of Goliath at Nob (21:9), and hence some think Nob is intended here. Others think David brought the head of Goliath to Jerusalem at a later period. However, Josh 15:63 and Jud 1:8 show that Hebrews did live at Jerusalem. It was the citadel on Mount Zion that was in the control of the Jebusites.

18:1. And Jonathan loved him as his own soul. Each found in the other the affection that he did not find in his own family. Knit is the same Hebrew word used in Gen 44:30 to express Jacob's love for Benjamin. Rare natures, like that of Jonathan, seldom attain to the highest place, and records of their lives are all too few. But as they pass through the world, they strengthen man's faith in humanity, and they leave behind them a fragrance that endures. 4. Jonathan . . . gave . . . to David. Cf. the exchange of armor between Glaucus and Diomede when they met before Troy and thus confirmed the pledge of old family friendship (Homer The Iliad VI. 230). Jonathan, the son of the king, gave all the material gifts; David, the poor man's son, gave but love and respect. One is reminded of the gift of God's Son to poverty-stricken humanity. Perhaps this accounts for Paul's designation of himself as the slave of Christ.

7. Played. This word is used of festive sports, and especially of festal dancing (I Chr 15:29). Some women performed mimic dances while others sang in alternate choruses. 11. The javelin. Saul, it seems, held the javelin in his hand as a scepter, according to an ancient custom.

18. My father's family means a group of families united by blood ties, moving and acting together, and forming a unit smaller than the tribe, but larger than that of a single family.

21. A snare. The Hebrew word suggests the idea of the trigger of a trap with bait laid upon it. It is also used metaphorically, as here, of that which allures a person to destruction.

25. Dowry. Some payment was made to the father by the prospective bridegroom. Service might be rendered instead of payment in money (Gen 29:20). The same custom prevailed among the ancient Greeks (Homer The Iliad XVI. 178; The Odyssey VIII. 318), Babylonians, and Assyrians, and it still survives in the East.

19:12. Through a window. The house of Michal was apparently situated on a wall. Cf. the escape of the spies from Jericho (Josh 2:15) and of Saul from Damascus (Acts 9:25). 13. Teraphim (AV, marg.). Michal, like Rachel, probably kept teraphim in secret because of barrenness (Gen 31:19). 14. He is sick. Josephus relates that Michal placed a still-moving goat's liver in the bed to make the messengers believe that there was a breathing invalid beneath.

D. David in Exile. 19:18–31:13.

18. Naioth. Somewhere in Ramah, whether a building or a district, is uncertain. Naioth means dwellings, and may be the college or common residence of the society of prophets Samuel gathered round him at Ramah.

24. The prophets. From this passage we learn that there was a company of prophets at Ramah, under the superintendence of Samuel, whose members lived in a common building, and that Samuel had his own house at Ramah (7:17ff.), although he sometimes lived in Naioth. The origin and history of these schools are obscure. According to 3:1, before the call of Samuel as a prophet, the prophetic word was rare in Israel, and prophecy was not widespread. There is little doubt that these unions of prophets arose in the time of Samuel, and were called into existence by him. The only uncertainty is whether there were other such companies in different parts of the land besides the one at Ramah. These unions may have grown until the time of Elijah and Elisha. They arose only in Israel, not in Judah. If these schools came from Samuel, it seems strange that there were none in Judah.

20:1. What is mine iniquity? and . . . my sin. Or, my deviation from the right path, and my failure. 3. But a step. Jewish commentaries here refer to the step David took in avoiding Saul's spear. 5. The new moon. For the observance of new moon festivals in Israel, see II Kgs 4:23; Isa 1:13; Amos 8:5. It was not merely a religious festival (Num 10:10; 28:11-15), but also a civil festival. Apparently it was used as an opportunity for religious instruction (II Kgs 4:23). David, as a member of the royal household, was expected to be present at the new moon sacrificial meal.

15. Thou shalt not cut off thy kindness. Jonathan, who was David's brother-in-law, surmised that his friend would succeed Saul upon the throne. Therefore he requested that when David's enemies were destroyed – especially, in accordance with Oriental custom, the family of his predecessor – his own relationship with David's house might not be forgotten or disowned.

20. I will shoot. No suspicion would be aroused by Jonathan and his bow, since he was a warrior and presumably went out often for archery practice. This was a prearranged agreement in case spies were around. 22. The Lord hath sent thee away. When Jacob's sons sent their younger brother to Egypt, God was in the plans for Joseph's life. So now God was sending David away to prepare him in the tough discipline of life for the leadership of Israel.

25. The king sat. Saul occupied the place of honor, with his back to the wall opposite the entrance. Jonathan was opposite him, Abner and David to his right and left. Apparently these four sat alone at a round table; so David's absence was conspicuous. 26. He is not clean. Persons who were ceremonially unclean were excluded from participating in a religious festival. The presence of the Deity in the sacred festivals necessitated ritual and moral purity on the part of the participating members.

27. David's place was empty. The king knew that uncleanness could not be the reason for his second absence, since the impurity Saul had in mind lasted only until sunset (Lev 15:16). 29. My brother, he hath commanded me. The eldest brother, who acted then as the head of the family, arranged the sacrificial meal. This implies that Jesse was well advanced in years.

30. To thine own confusion. Either Saul was disclaiming Jonathan and suggesting that people would think he was the fruit of an adulterous union; or he was telling Jonathan that his mother would some day become the wife of the new king! 31. Nor thy kingdom. Saul evidently suspected David as his rival who would either wrest the government from him, or, at any rate, after his death, from his son.

38. Jonathan cried after the lad. These words, spoken to the boy, were really intended for David's ears. 41. Fell on his face. In token of reverence and loyalty to the king's son. An Oriental, upon meeting a superior, knelt down and touched the ground with his forehead.

21:1. Nob was at that time a priests' city (22:19), where stood the Tabernacle and where the legal worship was carried on. According to Isa 10:30,32, it was between Anathoth and Jerusalem, about one mile north of Jerusalem, on a ridge from the brow of which one can see the temple area.

5. The vessels. Ewald understood this to refer to the young men's bodies, as in I Thess 4:4. The men were ceremonially clean; so they were fit to partake of holy things. Ahimelech departed from the Levitical law and observed the higher commandment of love to a neighbor (Lev 19:18). When Mk 2:26 assigns this action to the days of Abiathar, the high priest, the statement rests upon the copyist's memory, in which Ahimelech is confounded with his son Abiathar. It is also possible that the son acted as coadjutor to his father, as Eli's sons apparently did (cf. I Sam 4:4).

6. The shewbread. So called because it was solemnly placed as an offering in the presence of Jehovah. A golden table for the shewbread in Solomon's Temple is mentioned in I Kgs 7:48; and the form of the table, as it existed in Herod's Temple, is preserved in the sculptures on the Arch of Titus at Rome. The shewbread was renewed every Sabbath, and the loaves that remained were to be eaten by the priests in the Holy Place. Jesus referred to this incident (Mt 12:3,4; Mk 2:25,26; Lk 6:3-5), to show that when moral and ceremonial obligations come into conflict, the ceremonial gives way to the moral. The high priest was bound to preserve David's life, even at the expense of a ceremonial rule.

7. Doeg may have entered the service of Saul after the Israelite campaign against Edom (14:47). Maybe a vow, suspicion of leprosy, or some other impurity kept him at the sanctuary.

10. Achish. Or, Abimelech (AV, marg.). The headnote to Psalm 34 refers to the king of Gath by this standing title, "Abimelech." 11. In dances. They danced in circles as they sang. Whether the Philistines intended by these words to describe David as a hero, or to point him out to their prince as a dangerous man cannot be ascertained from these words; nor can the question be decided with certainty at all. 13. Scrabbled. Made meaningless marks. The LXX reads, beat or drummed, from a word which sounds like (but is not written like) the Hebrew for "scrabble."

22:1. They went down. That is, from their home to Bethlehem. The whole clan apparently joined David in exile. In the East it is not uncommon for a whole family to be put to death for the fault of one member, and the massacre at Nob showed David's family what they might expect.

5. This Gad is here mentioned for the first time. He later became David's seer (II Sam 24:11). He rebuked David for his sin of the census and wrote a history of the reign of David (I Chr 29:29). From II Chr 29:25 it appears that he was concerned with the arrangement of the temple service.

6. Now Saul abode. Here is a vivid description of an ancient council, such as met to deliberate on affairs of state and to administer justice. 7. Ye Benjamites shows how isolated the tribes still were, and that for the most part Saul was surrounded by members of his own tribe. Will the son of Jesse give. Saul had no palace and no elaborate court. His men were strictly Benjamites. He implied that David would be as narrow in his tribal affiliations. However, as it turned out, David went the other way and risked losing the loyalty of Judah.

18. That did wear a linen ephod. The word rendered wear always means "to lift up," "to carry." So, Doeg slew on that infamous day eighty-five ephod-bearing men, priests of full status, each qualified to give oracles by the use of the ephod. 19. The edge of the sword. Literally, according to the mouth of the sword. The ancients designed a sword to resemble an animal, with the blade of the sword representing a tongue and the two sides of the haft resembling lips. In the madness of his self-willed fury, Saul wreaked upon an innocent city, within the confines of his own tribe, the vengeance he had failed to execute upon a guilty heathen nation at the command of God (15:3).

20. Abiathar, one of the sons of Ahimelech, probably left in charge of the sanctuary at Nob, escaped the massacre and fled with the sacred ephod (23:6) to David at Adullam. He shared in all David's wanderings and was made by him joint priest with Zadok. Later he backed Adonijah's quest for the throne and was deported by Solomon to Anathoth. Jeremiah may have been a descendant of this family.

23:1. Keilah was a city in the Shephelah, a place of importance in the time of Nehemiah (Neh 3:17,18). It is mentioned in the Tell el Amarna letters as Kila. Today it is a city of ruins, but the terraced hillsides bear testimony to its grain-growing capacity, which the Philistines envied. They rob. The Philistines used this method to reduce Israel to submission by starvation. In the East, to this day, the main source of food supply remains – bread.

9. Secretly practised. From hārash, "to fabricate," "to forge." It is a metaphor derived from the working of metal.

14. In the wilderness. The wild uncultivated tract lying between the mountains of Judah and the Dead Sea. It begins in about the longitude of Maon and Carmel and becomes wilder and more desolate as it descends toward the Dead Sea. In Josh 15:61,62 six cities are mentioned as existing in this desolate region. David's chief abode was Ziph, which lay about halfway between Hebron and Carmel, in one of the many caves of this limestone rock region. 15. Ziph in a wood is a conspicuous mound, 2,882 feet above the sea, four miles southeast of Hebron, on a plateau of red, rolling ground. The plateau is mostly bare, though partly covered with wheat and barley. It is broken, here and there, by limestone scarps partly covered by scrub, and it is honeycombed by caves, which commence near Hebron.

16. Jonathan . . . went to David. The humility and unselfish love of Jonathan are apparent in this passage. However, it was doubtless well ordered by God's good providence that Jonathan's noble sentiments were not subjected to the unnatural strain of such a situation. Jonathan died a soldier's death, fighting gallantly for his country, before anything happened to disturb the perfect beauty of his friendship for David.

19. The Ziphites. The reason for the Ziphites' betrayal was either their zeal for Saul or the fact that David levied protection money against them as he did against Nabal (ch. 25).

24. In the plain. The word 'ărābâ usually denotes the depressed locality around the Dead Sea, the desert tract which extends along the valley of the Jordan from the Dead Sea to the Sea of Galilee, now called El Ghor. This word is also applied to the valley between the Dead Sea and the Gulf of Akaba, to which alone the name is now given by the Arabs.

29. En-gedi is a well watered spot on the east edge of the desert of Judah. It is six hundred feet above the Dead Sea, and from the limestone rock a copious stream plunges toward the sea. There are five or six waterfalls en route, the stream skipping like a goat from one ledge to another; hence the name "The Fountain of the Kid." In the days of Abraham, the city of Hazezon-tamar stood on this site. Engedi is still an oasis in the limestone desert, and though palm trees and vineyards have vanished, the petrified leaves found there and the terraces cut in the hills attest its ancient fertility. A small Jewish kibbutz (farm) is at present located at Engedi.

24:2. The rocks of the wild goats. The cliffs near Engedi, where the wild goats still climb the rocky fastnesses. 3. The sheepcotes. Rough stone walls built at the entrances to the caves to protect the sheep from wild beasts and to serve for shelter in case of bad weather. Thomson says that there is scarcely a cave in the land but has such a cote in front of it. 4. The skirt of Saul's robe. Saul had probably laid aside his robe upon entering the cave. This enabled David to cut off a piece of it unobserved.

25:1. Samuel died; . . . all the Israelites . . . lamented. This was like our flying the flag at half-mast in tribute to a national figure. All Israel sent delegates to the funeral service. And Samuel was laid to rest in the family estate at Ramah, the city of his birth, judgeship, and death. Paran was the desert that separated Palestine from the Sinai Peninsula.

2. A man in Maon. Nabal's home was in Maon, and his place of business was about a mile north of Carmel. 3. Nabal. The name means fool.

7. We hurt them not. David contrasted the strict discipline maintained by him with the usual license of similar roving bands, and asked that some acknowledgement of this should be made by the wealthy farmer. This species of "protection money" is regularly levied at the present day by the Bedouins living on the borders of the desert and the cultivated land. In return for gifts, they guarantee the protection of life and property in these notoriously insecure districts.

10. Many servants. David's retinue included many runaway slaves, as well as men who had abandoned the service of Saul. Nabal looked upon David as a mere runaway slave. 11. My water. Water is a precious article in these dry lands.

13. David . . . girded on his sword. David's wrath was an outburst of sinful passion, unseemly in a servant of God. By carrying out his intention, he would have sinned against the Lord and against his people. But the Lord preserved him from this sin. Just at the right time, Abigail, the intelligent and pious wife of Nabal, heard of the affair and was able to appease the wrath of David by her immediate and kindly interposition.

14. He railed. Literally, he flew at them. It is the same word as 'it, "fly," from which 'ayit, "a bird of prey," and Greek aetos, "eagle," are derived. 18. Clusters of raisins. The vineyards near Hebron still produce the largest and best grapes in all the country; and the finest of them are dried as raisins.

25. Nabal . . . folly. The Hebrew words for "fool" and "folly" denote not mere stupidity, but moral perversity. Fool is an inadequate rendering. The word in Hebrew suggests one who is insensible to the claims both of God and of man, and who is consequently at once irreligious and churlish. 28. A sure house. Abigail was as certain of David's rise to kingship as was Rahab certain of Israel's conquest of Canaan (Josh 2:9-13). In spite of David's misfortunes at court, the average citizen expected his tide to turn. Many looked upon him in his exile as the hope of Israel.

29. Bound in the bundle of life. This saying has long been applied to life beyond the grave, and its initial Hebrew letters are today found on almost every Jewish tombstone. This beautiful metaphor is taken from the custom of binding up valuable things in a bundle to prevent their being injured. The figure is that of a precious jewel carefully tied up (Gen 42:35). The converse follows in the prayer that the lives of David's enemies might be cast away like the stones from a sling. 31. Shed blood causeless. Abigail's argument was that any shedding of blood at this point would work against David's program. It would start a blood feud among the clans of Judah that would involve men David needed to support his bid for kingship. David had only Judah to back him in the quest for the throne. In addition, Abigail argued, David's conscience would trouble him if blood flowed needlessly.

39. Communed with Abigail. This is a technical expression for asking one's hand in marriage (cf. Song 8:8). 43. Also took. David married Ahinoam, mother of Amnon, before he married Abigail. In the lists of David's wives, Ahinoam is always mentioned first. 44. Gallim is mentioned in the neighborhood of Anathoth in Benjamin (Isa 10:30).

26:6. The Hittite. The Hittites are mentioned repeatedly in the OT as one of the nations to be driven out of Canaan. Their empire, centered in Asia Minor, came to an end about 1200 B.C. Subsequently, powerful Hittite city states maintained themselves in northern Syria, notably at Carchemish on the Euphrates and Kadesh on the Orontes. These were destroyed by the Assyrians in the eighth century. Abishai saved David's life in one of the Philistine wars (II Sam 21:17), was implicated in the murder of Abner (II Sam 3:30), shared in the command of the army (II Sam 10:10), and remained faithful to David in Absalom's rebellion.

8. Let me smite him. David's generosity toward Saul is contrasted, in this passage, with Saul's murderous hatred of him. Saul had attempted to transfix David with his javelin. Now Abishai wanted to transfix Saul with his spear. But David refused to let him touch the Lord's anointed.

12. A deep sleep. This was a slumber so profound and unnatural that it was regarded as sent directly from the Lord. The same term is used of the sleep of Adam while the Lord created Eve from a rib taken from Adam's side.

19. Let him accept an offering. The idea here is that if it was the Lord's prompting that led Saul to pursue him, David would seek God's pardon by a suitable expiatory offering. David recognized the legitimacy of Saul's intention but offered to atone for any sin on his part. This was going more than halfway. The second half of the verse suggests that possibly men were seeking to set up human barriers between Saul and David. If this was the case, David pled for their just punishment. Go, serve other gods. It was the custom for a person to adopt the gods of the land to which he went. Ruth volunteered to accept Jehovah in Palestine in place of Chemosh in Moab. David felt that Israel was literally driving him from the worship of Jehovah to that of foreign gods. 20. Let not my blood fall to the earth. No Hebrew wanted to die outside the land of Israel.

27:5. A place in some town. In a district of his own, David could observe his own religious rites as a worshiper of Jehovah and not be under the constant surveillance of the king.

10. The south. The Negev. Literally, the dry country. It was the name of the waterless district to the south of Jerusalem, between the hills of Judah and the actual desert. The various regions of the south were known as: the Negev of Judah, including the cities mentioned in Josh 15:21-32; the Negev of the Jerahmeelites; the Negev of the Kenites; the Negev of the Cherethites; the Negev of Caleb; and the Negev of Arad.

28:2. Thou shalt know. David's reply was ambiguous. The words, what thy servant will (AV, can) do, contained no distinct promise of faithful assistance in the war with the Israelites. The expression thy servant was simply the ordinary form for speaking of oneself to a superior. Keeper of mine head. Perhaps this incident caused David later to hire mercenary troops for his bodyguard.

3. Familiar spirits. The term yidde'ōnîm means those in touch with the diviner. One who divined by the yidde'ōnîm consulted only the particular spirit which was his familiar. From Isa 8:19; 19:3 it may be inferred that the oracles were uttered in a squealing voice, by means of ventriloquism.

4,5. They pitched in Gilboa. . . . greatly trembled. Saul may have camped on the same ground where Gideon and his men camped. The spring by which Gideon pitched is called "the well of Harod" (Jud 7:1, AV), i.e., the Spring of Trembling. Saul camped beside the same spring and "trembled greatly."

7. Endor was long held in memory by the Jewish people as connected with the great victory of Deborah and Barak over Sisera and Jabin. The distance from the slopes of Gilboa to Endor is seven or eight miles, over difficult ground. On the bleak northern slope of Jebel Duhy (the Little Hermon), the name still lingers, attached to a once considerable but now deserted village. The rock of this mountain village is hollowed into caves, one of which contains a little fountain and may well have been the scene of the incantation of the witch. 8. They came . . . by night. It was a perilous journey of seven or eight miles, part of which skirted the Philistine encampment.

11. The question whether the woman really possessed the power of communion with the spirits of the dead, or had deluded herself into believing that she had such power, or was simply a deliberate impostor, is answered differently by different writers. That the spirit of Samuel actually appeared was the view of the ancient rabbis. This is attested in the LXX translation of I Chr 10:13b – "And Samuel the prophet made answer to him"; and by Ecclesiasticus 46:20. The same view was held by Justin Martyr, Origen, and Augustine. Tertullian and Jerome maintained that the appearance of Samuel was a diabolical delusion.

12. Thou art Saul. With the apparition of Samuel, the woman, either by the fact of Samuel's appearance, or by her intensified perception in the state of clairvoyance, recognized that it was Saul who sought her help. It is difficult to understand why she had not recognized the tallest of all the Israelites before. Perhaps the darkness hid him from her view.

15. Disquieted me. The more modern orthodox commentators are almost unanimous in the opinion that the departed prophet did really appear and announce the coming destruction of Saul and his army. They hold, however, that Samuel was brought up not by the magical arts of the witch, but through a miracle wrought by the omnipotence of God. Earlier orthodoxy looked upon this appearance as a spectre, an apparition or delusion. 16. Is become thine enemy. This word for enemy is an Aramaic form, found only in one or two other places in Hebrew. The LXX renders this, has come to be on the side of thy neighbor; the Vulgate, has passed over to thy rival; the Targum, has become the help of man who is thine enemy. The LXX reading is preferred.

20. Along on the earth. Literally, the fullness of his stature. Exhausted as he was by fasting, Saul fainted from the shock of hearing his doom pronounced. 23. The bed. Probably the platform running along the wall, which in the East serves for a seat by day and a bed by night.

29:2. The lords of the Philistines were the supreme civil authorities, but they were not army commanders. This division of civil and military authority predates the Roman system of government division of power.

30:1. On the third day. From the probable site of Aphek in the Sharon to the probable site of Ziklag is about seventy miles. David and his men must have returned by forced marches. 2. The women captives . . . carried away. The captives were intended for sale as slaves in the markets of Egypt.

9. Brook Besor. This may be the Wadi esh-Sheri'ah, four or five miles south of the proposed site of Ziklag. The Hebrew word for brook is nahal, which means a ravine, or the bed of a torrent, with a stream at the bottom. 10. Were so faint. From the forced march from Aphek to Ziklag, and the immediate pursuit without rest. The warriors were "dead beat." (The word faint is used here and in verse 21 with a noun meaning "a corpse.")

13. My master left me. The life of a sick slave was of little more importance than that of a crippled horse. 14. Cherethites were possibly connected with Crete (Caphtor), the country from which the Philistines were believed to have come (Amos 9:7). Coast of Judah. The eastern portion of the Negev belonged to Judah. One part of it belonged to the family of Caleb, and was called Caleb's Negev (25:3; cf. Josh 15:13).

20. David took all the flocks and the herds. David's motive in choosing the sheep and oxen for himself is evident from verses 26-31. They were the most acceptable presents he could make to his friends in Judah in exchange for security from the men of Saul and to promote his cause in their midst. 24. They shall part alike. According to Polybius (X. 16.5), Scipio, after the sack of New Carthage, directed the tribunes to divide the booty in equal portions to all, including the reserves, the guards of the camp, and the sick.

28. Siphmoth is not elsewhere mentioned, but Zabdi, the Shiphmite (I Chr 27:27), who was over David's wine cellars, was evidently a native of the place. 31. Hebron was known in the days of Abraham as Kirjath-arba. Today it is called El-Khalil, "The Friend," an abbreviation for "the city of the Friend of God," and is the Mohammedan title for Abraham (cf. II Chr 20:7; Isa 41:8; Jas 2:23).

31:1. In mount Gilboa. Four memorable battles were fought in this area:

a. The battle of Kishon, in which Deborah and Barak defeated the hosts of Sisera (Jud 4:15; 5:21).
b. The battle of Jezreel, in which Gideon's three hundred defeated the vast hordes of the Midianites (Jud 7).
c. The battle of Mount Gilboa, recorded here.
d. The battle of Megiddo, in which

Josiah, king of Israel, lost his life fighting against Pharaoh-nechoh (II Kgs 23:29).

3. He was sore wounded. The LXX and the Vulgate read, he was wounded in the abdomen. The story does imply a wound that prevented his escape. 4. Abuse me. This same word is used anthropomorphically of Jehovah's treatment of the Egyptians (Ex 10:2). Saul took a sword. There are only four examples of suicide in the Bible, those of Ahithophel (II Sam 17:23), Zimri (I Kgs 16:18), Judas (Mt 27:5), and Saul, here. 5. Died with him. Had David continued in his office of minister to Saul, he would probably have perished in this battle. God, however, had stationed him in a place of safety, though at the time it seemed one of great peril.

9. They cut off his head. Probably in retaliation for the treatment given Goliath (17:54). 10. The house of Ashtaroth. This has generally been supposed to be the famous temple of the Phoenician goddess Ashtart at Ascalon, mentioned by Herodotus (I. 105) as the most ancient of all temples of the Greek Aphrodite. However, in the excavations of the University Museum of Philadelphia at Bethshan, two important temples built by Ramses II have been discovered, one of Ashtoreth, and one of Resheph. It was probably in this temple of Ashtoreth that Saul's head was placed.

12. Burnt them. Perhaps they feared that the Philistines would remove the bodies and add further insult. However, cremation, except in the case of criminals (Josh 7:25), was not a Hebrew practice. It was practiced by the Philistines and may have been borrowed by the men of Jabesh-gilead. 13. Buried. Saul was a hero of tragedy in the classical sense of the term. He had some good features, such as courage, generalship, modesty, and generosity. But he did not have single-minded tenacity; that was his 'tragic flaw.' Even his pursuit of David was at times halfhearted. He lacked the greatness of the later David. Nevertheless, here, in an exquisite elegy, David laments him as a great figure.

E. David, King at Hebron. II Sam 1:1—4:12.

9. Slay me. This account is at variance with the account of the death of Saul in I Sam 31:3ff. It is unlikely that Saul would have been leaning on his spear, unattended by Israelite warriors, as the Philistine chariots charged him, and had to call on a stranger who just happened to be passing by. The story was faked, in part, by the Amalekite in hope of obtaining a better recompense from David. The man probably had found Saul after he had died but before the Philistines returned to strip the slain. Anguish is come upon me. The Hebrew word for anguish has been variously translated "giddiness" "dizziness," "anguish," and "cramps." The Jewish commentators read, "cramps have seized me and I can't defend myself." 10. Bracelet. In the Assyrian sculptures, warriors are often depicted wearing such ornaments. They were really armlets worn on the upper part of the arm.

12. They mourned . . . for Saul. The only deep mourning for Saul was by the person he had hated most and persecuted for so many years, even to the time of his death. Compare the weeping of Jesus over the fall of Jerusalem, even when it was about to destroy him.

13. A stranger. This is the technical term for a foreigner living in Israel and enjoying protection but not full civil rights. He did receive the benefit of the law of the Sabbath rest (Deut 5:14), but he was expected to adopt the religion of his community if he wanted to participate in the religious festivals. The stranger is mentioned, along with the widow and the orphan, in special legislation. Blood feuds, adventure, and discontent may have necessitated the origin of this institution in Israel.

15. Fall upon him. This just punishment of the Amalekite precluded any untrue accusations by David's political opponents that he might have had a part, directly or indirectly, in the death of Saul. Though David had numerous opportunities to slay Saul, he always regarded him as the Lord's anointed.

17. Lamented. A technical term. According to custom, the lament for the dead was chanted by professional mourners (II Chr 35:25), usually women (Jer 9:17). Here David, himself, lamented the death of Saul and Jonathan. 18. The use of (AV marg., ode of) the bow. This is probably the record of David's custom of teaching military music to develop martial spirit. The book of Jasher is mentioned in Josh 10:13 and I Kgs 8:53 (LXX). It was a history of the wars of Israel ("Jeshurun"; Deut 32:15).

20. The daughters of the Philistines. The rejoicing of the daughters of the Philistines refers to the custom of employing women to celebrate the victories of their nation by singing and dancing (I Sam 18:6). 21. Not . . . anointed with oil. The shield of Saul is pictured by David as lying upon the mountains, no longer polished and ready to be worn in action, but cast aside as worthless, and neglected. In ancient times, shields, whether made of leather or of metal, were oiled to keep them in good condition.

22. The bow of Jonathan. Jonathan was celebrated for his use of the bow, while Saul was known for the use of the sword. Returned not empty. The figure underlying the passage is that of the arrow drinking the blood of the slain, and of the sword devouring their flesh (Deut 32:42). 23. Lovely . . . not divided. Notwithstanding their difference in character, David pays tribute to both as courageous and of good character. Jonathan remained loyal to his father in spite of his own love for David and Saul's enmity toward the younger man. Eagles . . . lions. The light motion or swiftness of an eagle (Hab 1:8) and the strength of a lion were the leading characteristics of the great heroes of antiquity. 24. Scarlet . . . gold. These were the ordinary ornaments of a Hebrew woman (cf. Jer 4:30).

2:1. Hebron really means brotherhood (cf. v. 3, cities of Hebron, i.e., a federation of cities). It is now called El Khalil ("the friend"), a contraction for the city of the friend of God, viz., Abraham. It served as the center of the league or confederation of the clans of Judah and Caleb and those associated with them. It is approximately twenty miles south of Jerusalem, in the region famed in antiquity for its fertile vineyards.

7. Be ye valiant. In sending this royal message, David was doubtless actuated by motives of policy as well as by gratitude. Here, for the first time, he claimed to be Saul's legitimate successor and expressed hope for the loyal support of the men of Gilead.

8. Mahanaim. Twin camps, situated on the eastern side of the Jordan, not far from the ford of the Jabbok, was an important place for the execution of Abner's plans, partly from its historical associations (Gen 32:2,3), and partly from its strategic geographic situation. 10. Ishbosheth was originally Ishbaal. Hebrew names were often compounded with ba'al, the title of the Canaanite god of fertility. Since the word was peculiarly associated with the low standards of Canaanite sex morality and baseness in worship, this practice was later discontinued. Later editors substituted bosheth, "shame," for ba'al. Another view of the meaning of Ishbaal is that it comes from the Ugaritic it-ba'al and means "Baal lives."

13. The pool of Gibeon, six miles northwest of Jerusalem, is known as el-Jib. Recent excavations have turned up more than twenty jar handles with the name of the city, Gibeon, inscribed on them. 14. And play before us. No other example of a war game exactly like this unusual one has ever been found.

23. The hinder end of the spear was pointed so that it might be stuck into the ground. This explains the fact that the spear passed through the body. 32. The sepulchre of his father. Zeruiah was the mother of the three brothers (cf. 17:25). We do not know why they were called by their mother's name. Perhaps their father had died early. Or, perhaps the fact that Zeruiah was in the immediate family of David accounts for this usage.

3:3. Chileab is called "Daniel" in I Chr 3:1, and therefore he probably had two names. Geshur. This marriage with a foreign princess may have been prompted by the desire to secure an ally in the neighborhood of Ishbosheth's capital.

13. Bring Michal. The return of Michal has been viewed by some as a political move to enlist the support of the Benjamites. By others it is taken as a sign of David's undying affection for his first wife. According to the law of Deut 24:1-4, David could not legitimately receive back his wife after her marriage to Paltiel. Jewish commentators explain that David had fled from Saul's home on the night of his marriage. Others say that Paltiel's marriage with Michal was never consummated. The latter seems very unlikely in the light of verse 16.

22. Joab . . . Abner. Abner was doomed as long as there was a Joab. Sooner or later their paths must cross. It is difficult to understand why David tried, in the interests of the state, to sacrifice Joab in the political treaty with Abner. 27. Aside in the gate. The most public spot in the city is not the place for a "quiet word" with anyone! The LXX reads, to the side of the gate, in a retired corner. The motive for Joab's action was blood revenge, to avenge the death of his brother at the hand of Abner (3:30). Underlying this duty to avenge was perhaps jealousy, or a mistaken zeal for what Joab considered to be the best interests of the king.

39. Too hard for me. David organized six hundred malcontents, dealt harshly with the Amalekites (II Sam 1), put to death the men who murdered Ishbosheth (II Sam 4), but failed to act in the case of Joab's misdeeds. David washed his hands and left the family of Joab to the judgment of God.

4:2,3. Beerothites fled. The Beerothites (Gibeonites, Josh 9:17,27) were expelled by Saul (II Sam 21:1,2) and fled to Gittaim. Their town, Beeroth, passed into the possession of Benjamin. Beeroth is generally identified with el Bireh, a village nine miles from Jerusalem, on the road leading to the north.

5. On a bed at noon. This is the siesta, from twelve till three or four o'clock. At this hour his guard would likewise have been asleep, or at least insufficiently alert. 6. Fetched wheat. Their ruse to gain entrance to the house is an old one – the delivery man approach. The LXX has an altogether different rendering: And, behold, the woman who kept the door of the house was winnowing wheat, and she slumbered and slept; and the brothers Rechab and Baanah escaped notice. This also explains how it was that they were able to enter unnoticed.

F. David, King at Jerusalem. 5:1–8:18.

5:2. Feed. To act as a shepherd. This became a technical term for a ruler (Jer 3:15). The figure is developed in Ezekiel 34. 3. Made a league. It is regrettable that we do not have the terms of agreement in the covenant with Israel. Apparently they included equal rights with the tribe of Judah.

6. The Jebusites. In Jud 19:10 and I Chr 11:4,5, the city of Jerusalem was called Jebus. The Tel el Amarna letters (c. 1400 B.C.) refer to it as Uru-salim ("city of peace"). The inhabitants were of an Amorite-Hittite background (cf. Ezk 16:3,45). For their defense they relied upon the unusual natural advantages of their citadel, which stood upon Mount Zion, a mount shut in by deep valleys on three sides. In their haughty self-assurance they boasted that they did not need to employ healthy and powerful warriors to resist David's men, since their blind and lame could successfully withstand an Israelite attack.

7. David took . . . Zion. The capture of Jerusalem marks a most important point in the history of Israel. Hitherto, the national life had had no real center. The residence of a judge, a prophet, or a king served as a temporary rallying place, such as the "palm tree of Deborah," Shiloh, Mizpeh, Gibeah (of Saul), Nob, or Hebron. From this time, the center was fixed, and, at least for the southern kingdom, all the other cities grew less and less important in comparison with the new capital. Jerusalem's position, however, in the midst of the rocky, barren ridge running down central Palestine made it always more suitable for a fortress than for a wealthy commercial capital, such as Solomon tried to make it.

8. Getteth up to the gutter. Archaeological discovery has provided an attractive identification of this gutter (RSV, watershaft) with the shaft that leads down through the rock on which the city is built to a pool fed by the Virgin Spring opposite the village of Siloam. 9. Millo. The word apparently means filling and may denote a mound or a rampart of earth, or a building constructed for the purpose of filling a large hole in the earth. This type of construction was found at several Hyksos centers, e.g., Avaris in Egypt and Hazor in Palestine. It resembled a corral in appearance. Inward is literally toward the house and means northward in the direction of the Temple. This expression was probably a note by a scribe after the Temple was built.

11. Tyre. One of the two great cities of the Phoenicians, famous for its commerce, craftsmen, and wealth. It was situated midway between Carmel and Beirut.

20. Baal-perazim. An ancient Canaanite name meaning the Lord of breaking forth, indicating the local nature-deity or baal, who was supposed to dwell in the fountain. The image is that of waters breaking through a dam. 21. Left their images. They had probably taken them to the war – as the Israelites took their ark – to serve as an auxiliary force.

23. Mulberry trees. The LXX reads, pear trees. The Hebrew word bākā', according to Abulfadl, is the name given in Arabic to a shrub that grows at Mecca. It resembles the balsam, except that it has longer, larger leaves and its fruit is more nearly round. If a leaf is broken off from a twig, a white pungent sap, like a white tar, flows out. This feature, in all probability, gave rise to the name bākā', "weeping."

6:2. Baale of Judah. Cf. I Chr 13:6. The idiom means Lords of Judah. These were the leading members of the land of Judah. Cf. the Baal Schechem – Judges 9. Traditionally the term has been regarded as a place name – Baale of Judah. 3. The ark . . . upon a new cart. Jewish commentators point out that the ark and the holy vessels should have been borne only upon the shoulders of the Levites (Num 3:31; 7:9).

7. Anger of the Lord was kindled. The sin of Uzzah arose from the fact that the ark was not carried by Levites, as God had directed (Num 4, espec. v. 15). 10. The Gittite. The later tradition (I Chr 15:18) makes him a Levite. If this is correct, he probably came from Gath-rimmon, a Levitical city (Josh 21:25).

13. Six paces. After they had proceeded six paces safely, they knew that the journey to Jerusalem had the sanction of God.

14. Girded with a linen ephod. Probably David wore only the linen ephod. Hence the contempt of Michal, who saw the kingship degraded by religious ritual. Some feel that her jealousy for the house of Saul, or her desire to lead the procession as did Miriam the prophetess, sister of Moses (Ex 15), caused her to despise David. 18. The fact that David wore an ephod, offered sacrifices, and pronounced the blessing, shows that the priesthood was not confined strictly to the Levite class.

23. No child. David thus inflicted on Michal the greatest disgrace that could befall an Eastern woman when he became permanently estranged from her.

7:14. His father . . . my son. In Heb 1:5 these words are applied to Christ. God's covenant with David is a guarantee that His purpose to bring to mankind a righteous king would surely be fulfilled. Solomon, David's son and successor, brought an immediate and partial fulfillment to the promise. Solomon was not, however, the righteous king whose dominion would endure forever. David's "greater Son," Jesus, was the long awaited Messiah of Davidic lineage who was in the fullest sense also the Son of God.

18. Sat before the Lord. Not in a chair, but back on his heels, with his head erect, in the manner of a modern Muslim at prayer.

8:1. Metheg-ammah means bridle of the mother (city). In I Chr 18:1 this is equated with Gath, which may have been the control station for the five Philistine cities. David's capture of his city of political asylum and the home of his first victim, Goliath, indicated to the Israelites both his ability and his nationalistic spirit. 2. Measured them with a line may mean that he spared the little ones but killed the adults whose height approximated the length of two cords. 3. Zobah was a Syrian kingdom, whose territory seems to have lain north of Damascus and not far from the Euphrates. 8. Exceeding much brass. It is said that the Egyptians of the Eighteenth and Nineteenth Dynasties got so much copper from Syria that they gave up working the mines at Mount Sinai in the south. 10. Joram his son. The king's son was his ambassador.

17. Zadok . . . Ahimelech . . . priests. Zadok may have been priest under Saul. Abiathar served under David while the latter was in flight from the court of Saul. David solved the resulting difficulty by dividing the office between them. But for the prompt action of Joab, he would probably have divided the command of the army between Joab and Abner. Seraiah was the secretary of state, rather than a military officer responsible for raising and mustering the troops; for the technical expression for mustering the people was not sāpar (the verb form from which the noun scribe is derived) but pāqad.

18. Cherethites and the Pelethites. It is well known that at all times kings and princes have preferred to commit the protection of their person to foreign mercenaries rather than to home guards. Rulers feel that they have all the surer pledge of the guards' devotion in the fact that the men do not spring from the nation, and are more dependent upon the ruler alone. David had received a hospitable reception in the land of the Philistines and perhaps met with many loyal friends there. Chief rulers. Literally, priests. Just what the duties were which they discharged is far from clear. Zadok and Abiathar were the priests for the nation, and it is evident from 20:26 and 1 Kgs 4:5 that these "priests" stood in some special relation to the king. Accordingly, Ewald conjectures that they were his domestic priests. In Egypt, the king's confidential advisers are said to have been chosen from among the priests, and it is this view of the functions of these two men which is taken in Chronicles.

G. Court Life of David. 9:1–20:26.

9:10. Eat bread. A general expression here meaning to have all the necessaries of life provided.

10:4. Shaved . . . the one half of their beards. Even today cutting off a person's beard is regarded by the Arabs as a great indignity, quite equal to that of flogging and branding among ourselves. Many would rather die than have their beards shaved off. The insult was still further increased by the cutting short of the long dress that covered the limbs, and thus exposing the lower part of the body. 5. Jericho was halfway between Amman and Jerusalem. 12. Be of good courage. We learn from this that a man should not depend on miracles, but should first strive as far as he can to save himself, and then rely on God's help.

11:1. Rabbah is modern Amman (Philadelphia in Hellenistic times), about twenty miles east of the Jordan at the head of the Wadi Amman.

3. Eliam and Ammiel (or Bath-sheba, AV) have the same signification. The difference consists simply in the transposition of the component parts of the name. 4. She came in. Although David is held responsible for the sin, Bath-sheba was not without blame. She came at his request, seemingly without hesitation, and offered no resistance to his desires (at least as far the the record is concerned). The fact that she was bathing in the uncovered court of a house in the heart of a city, into which anyone could look down from the roofs of neighboring houses or from higher ground, does not say much for her modesty, even if she had no ulterior motive, as some commentators suggest. However, this does not excuse David from the enormity of his transgression against the Lord's statutes and against one of his top fighting men.

16. Joab, as a general who was not accustomed to spare human life, served his lord faithfully in this matter, with a view to having his own interests served at another time. 21. Thy servant Uriah the Hittite is dead might be interpreted as meaning that it was without Joab's command, or in opposition to it that Uriah went so far with his men, and he was therefore chargeable with his own death and that of the other warriors who had fallen.

27. Mourning was past. The ordinary mourning period was seven days. Whether widows mourned longer, we do not know. David promptly took Bath-sheba as his wife, so that she might be married to him as long as possible before the birth of the child. He hoped thus to forestall any suspicions of premarital relations that might otherwise arise.

12:6. Restore . . . fourfold. The fourfold restitution corresponds to the provisions of the law of Ex 22:1. 13. I have sinned against the Lord. Sin has two results — it separates a man from God, and it produces evil effects in the world. The first of these can be canceled by forgiveness, but the second remains. The tragedy of human history is that the evil effects of sin are not always nor wholly borne by the sinner.

23. I shall go to him. Cf. Job's "the house appointed for all living" (Job 30:23). Something of the Hebrew idea of conscious existence in the next life may be implicit in the common expression, "he was gathered to his fathers." Perhaps by this reference David merely meant that the child could not return to life and activity, but he himself would some day join his son in death.

24. Solomon. The name means peace. Perhaps the conferring of this name signified that David was now at peace with God. Another view is that Solomon was born at the end of the hostilities with Ammon and when the peace was declared. Solomon was his royal name. 25. Jedidiah (beloved of the Lord) was his family name. It was quite common in Judah for the king to possess two names. By the hand of Nathan. Some think that Nathan served as the royal tutor of Solomon.

27. The city of waters. "Waterfort" — the work defending the water supply of the royal city. Polybius, in his account of the siege of Rabbath-Ammon by Antiochus Epiphanes, says the Syrian king succeeded in stopping the water supply and forced the garrison to surrender the city proper, which was built on the high ground above. 31. The children of Ammon. David put them to hard labor, not to torture. To a Bedouin this type of punishment was extreme cruelty.

13:1. Absalom . . . Tamar . . . Amnon. Absalom and Tamar were David's children by Maacah, the daughter of the king of Geshur (3:3); Amnon was David's son by Ahinoam the Jezreelitess (3:2). The case of Abram and Sarai shows that marriage between the children of the same father by different mothers was sanctioned by early Hebrew custom, though forbidden by the Levitical legislation (Lev 18:9). 2. Thought it hard. He had few opportunities to see the unmarried members of the royal harem, probably none to see Tamar alone.

6. Let Tamar . . . come. It is evident that the king's children lived in different houses. Probably each of the king's wives lived with her children in one particular compartment of the palace. A couple of cakes. The Hebrew word used for cakes is from the root lbb, "heart." Perhaps these were heart-shaped cookies. Also, there may be a play on words in the use of this term.

13. He will not withhold. The Law forbade this type of marriage (Lev 18:9), but it may not have been strictly observed at this time. The Talmud overcomes the difficulty by assuming that Tamar was of illegitimate birth.

18. A garment of divers colours. This was also said of the coat of Joseph. The famous tableau of Beni Hasan (Egypt) shows that the typical dress of nomads in patriarchal Palestine was a many-colored garment. However, none of the garments in this tableau are ankle or wrist length. This feature is distinct in the case of Joseph and Tamar, and signifies something special. 20. Tamar remained desolate. It cannot be proved that shōmēm, "desolate," ever meant single or solitary. However, this is the usual interpretation.

21. David . . . was very wroth. He was content merely to be angry, since he himself had been guilty of adultery. However, his lack of appropriate action stemmed from his indulgent affection toward his son and his habitual failure to discipline members of his family.

27. He let Amnon . . . go with him. Since Absalom had shown no sign of desiring revenge, David reluctantly permitted Amnon to attend the party. 29. His mule. This is the first mention of a mule in the Bible. The horse was used mainly for drawing war chariots; the ass was the mount of royalty (I Kgs 1:33). According to the law of Lev 19:19, the breeding of hybrids was forbidden.

14:1. Joab thought Absalom had the best chance to succeed to the throne. And he felt that if he could put Absalom in the position to succeed to the throne, Absalom in turn would cancel the threat of judgment hanging over him. 2. Tekoah. Joab grew up in the vicinity of Tekoah, about six miles south of Bethlehem. He may have known this woman from earlier days.

7. Not leave . . . name nor remainder. The extinction of a family was the most dreaded of all misfortunes. The institutions of concubinage and levirate marriage were both instituted to forestall this possibility. The birth of a son to carry on the family name was regarded as most important. 9. The iniquity be on me. From the woman's answer we infer that David had put her off with a promise because he saw that if he defended the guilty son, he would become involved in his guilt. The mother pleaded for the king's help and offered to bear personally any guilt.

10. Bring him to me. David empowered the woman to bring her prosecutors into the royal presence. 11. The woman asked David to take an oath to this effect before she applied her story to the situation of Absalom's predicament.

12-20. The woman placed David in the position of her imaginary prosecutors. What they could do to her family by cutting off the only heir, David was doing to the people of God by punishing Absalom for a crime he had committed in the heat of human anger and in his desire to render justice for the dishonor done to his sister, Tamar.

25. His beauty. David was also known for his handsome appearance. Absalom sheared his head yearly and weighed the hair according to a metric system introduced into Palestine. There may have been religious significance in this act. 27. The LXX adds a note that this second Tamar became the wife of Rehoboam, the son of Solomon, and bore him Abia. According to I Kgs 15:2, Maachah the daughter of Solomon married Rehoboam.

15:1-6. Absalom began a vigorous campaign to win the loyalty of the tribes. His method was to meet persons in the gate, the court of ancient Israel, find out their native cities, suggest to them his interest and availability, and hope that they would return to their district and become ambassadors for his cause.

7. Hebron still bore a grudge against David because he had removed the seat of government to Jerusalem. Also, the allied clans of the Negev, through whose good offices David first mounted the throne, were jealous of the northern tribes – now the dominant partner in the united kingdom – because of their power and influence with the king. 12. Ahithophel the Gilonite. Giloh was six or seven miles northwest of Hebron. Ahithophel was the grandfather of Bath-sheba (11:3; 23:34). His espousal of Absalom's cause is usually attributed to a desire to avenge the disgrace David had brought upon his family, as well as the murder of Uriah.

14,15. Let us flee. David's decision to abandon Jerusalem has been a constant puzzle to historians. Some have supposed that his courage failed temporarily; some, that he had valid grounds for suspecting the loyalty of the population, perhaps still predominantly Jebusite; others, that he wished to spare the city the horrors of a siege; and still others suppose he argued that, if the revolt prospered in the north while Absalom was marching on him from the south, he would be caught in Jerusalem as in a trap. The fact that David's loyal followers did not question his decision indicates that his decision was not based on cowardice but upon the cold calculation of an experienced military specialist.

18. Gittites. These were the men who had gathered around David on his flight from Saul and emigrated with him to Gath. Afterward they lived with him in Ziklag, and eventually followed him to Hebron and Jerusalem. In all probability, they formed a separate company of well trained veterans, or a kind of bodyguard, in Jerusalem and were well known as the Gittites.

21. In death or life. Ittai's reply is magnanimous in light of the apparent hopelessness of David's cause. Ittai felt undying gratitude to David for his benefactions in earlier days.

23. The brook Kidron is the well-known valley east of Jerusalem. The road taken was probably the one on the south slope of the Mount of Olives, the same which is still traveled to Jericho and the Jordan Valley.

24. Zadok means righteous. This family of priests won out over the house of Abiathar (of the line of Eli) in the reign of Solomon. The New Testament Sadducees claimed descent from the house of Zadok.

16:1. Mephibosheth was the lame son of Jonathan to whom David had shown kindness for the sake of his love for Jonathan. 3. The kingdom of my father. According to Ziba, Mephibosheth believed that the internal struggle within the house of David would enable the house of Saul to regain the throne. This would give Mephibosheth, the sole heir to the throne, the opportunity to assume the leadership of Israel. Ziba's story was an outright fiction, by means of which he hoped to get a grant from the estate of Mephibosheth.

6. He cast stones. This is still done as a sign of anger or insult. 7. Thou man of Belial. A most degrading epithet; it means, "You are a good-for-nothing."

9-14. David regarded the cursing of Shimei as ordained of God. He felt that if he suffered it silently, God would reward him ultimately. His generous spirit was taxing, however, to his soldiers, who saw in the curses not the will of God but the slanderous remarks of a dissatisfied citizen. Dead dog (v. 9). An epithet of disdain. Take off his head. That is, decapitate him. Cursing the king was a capital crime.

16. God save the king was a cry of respect for the royal personage. The usual explanation is that it means, "May the king live for a long time!" The repetition of this phrase by Hushai expressed his feigned enthusiasm for the new regime.

21. Go in unto thy father's concubines. Ahithophel advised Absalom to assume the right to the throne through a public seizure of the royal harem. This was the custom employed in ancient times to demonstrate possession of the throne. It was not actually viewed with abhorrence by the Israelites, whose feelings on such matters were blunted by the practice of polygamy. Following this counsel would cause an irreparable breach between father and son. Ahithophel's advice was to run every risk in this adventure.

17:4. The saying pleased Absalom. He thought the advice of Ahithophel was excellent. If David had been attacked that very night, he would have been but twelve or fifteen miles from the capital, without food and ammunition, and with his forces in a serious state of disorganization. The rebellion of Absalom would have secured its objective and David would have met with certain defeat. Apparently Ahithophel's plan was to quickly surround the forces of David and create such a panic that all would flee, making it possible to slay only David. This would make it easier to win over the remnant of David's cohorts.

8. Chafed in their minds. Hushai's argument was that David's men would fight like a cornered bear. The Syrian bear is said to be particularly ferocious. The Septuagint adds, "and like a savage sow in the plain," which is more like the Greek than the Hebrew and must have been added by a later writer.

12. We will light upon him. The verb is used of swarms of locusts (Ex 10:14) or flies and bees settling down (Isa 7:18, 19). 13. We will draw it into the river. Hushai said that the city in which David might hide would be completely destroyed. Most cities were built on hills, and the penalty of a conquered city was to be treated as is expressed in the words of Mic 1:6: "I will pour down the stones thereof into the valley."

17. En-rogel. Perhaps the fuller's spring, mentioned in I Kgs 1:9. It was in the valley of the Kidron, below the village of Silwan, near the junction of the valleys of Kidron and Hinnom. It served as a landmark on the boundary between Judah and Benjamin. A wench. Literally, a maidservant. The definite article in the Hebrew may denote simply the maid chosen for the task, or it may denote a particular servant — taken from the household of one of the priests – who could be entrusted with the mission. She could go to the fountain for water without exciting suspicion, since the drawing of water was carried on mainly by women.

19. Ground corn. This was bruised or husked wheat or barley, which the people prepared by pounding it in a mortar.

23. Hanged himself. The number of suicides in the Bible is extremely few. The care with which Ahithophel prepared himself and his family and the burial in the family plot indicate that this suicide was not frowned upon. Ahithophel had worked himself into a difficult predicament. If Absalom had been victorious, Ahithophel would have had to give way to Hushai; if David had been victorious, Ahithophel would have been called to account for his advice concerning the proposed capture of David. The people knew his precarious position and understood the thinking of a hopelessly defeated man. It may be noted that the suicide of Ahithophel did not exclude him from regular burial in the family sepulchre.

24. To Mahanaim. This was originally the headquarters of Ishbosheth's kingdom. It was selected by David for his headquarters in view of its strong position among the Trans-Jordan cities and because of its lesser disaffection. This city was significant in patriarchal days and was the scene of one of Jacob's stops on his return to Palestine to meet with his brother Esau. At this place Jacob saw in a vision the divine messengers encircling and protecting his camp, and he named it Mahanaim (Twin Camps).

25. Abigail the daughter of Nahash. According to Jewish tradition Nahash is another name for Jesse. Others feel that Nahash was the first husband of Jesse's wife.

29. Butter. Curdled milk is probably meant. It is called leben by modern Arabs and is greatly esteemed as a refreshing drink.

18:1. David numbered the people. This means not merely that he counted his forces but that he mustered and reviewed them. And set captains. This was the usual military arrangement, and it corresponds to the civil arrangement suggested by Moses in Ex 18:25. It is interesting that David gave one third of the army to Ittai, a man of Gath, who had proved loyal to the cause of the king in the exile.

5. Deal gently for my sake with the young man. Apparently David still looked upon Absalom as but a boy. He treated the rebellion as a youthful escapade which he could forgive rather easily. However, Joab and the army regarded the insurrection as having serious portents.

8. The wood devoured. The usual explanation is that a great multitude perished in the pits and precipices. Apparently, because of the nature of the ground, more were slain in the pursuit through the forest than in the battle itself. 9. A mule. To ride a mule was a mark of royalty (I Kgs 1:33,38). This mule may have belonged to David. His head. The tradition that Absalom was caught by his hair comes from Josephus.

10-13. The man who saw Absalom hanging by his head reproved Joab for suggesting that he should have slain Absalom and claimed Joab's reward for the deed. However much the captain of David's forces might wish for Absalom's death, the man suggested, when faced by the king, who had ordered the troops to deal gently with Absalom, he would not be able to stand up for the slayer.

17. A great pit. This may have been a cave or an unused cistern. Some think the heaping of stones on Absalom's grave was symbolic of the stoning which was the legal penalty due a rebel son (Deut 21:20,21). It is still a custom in the East for passers-by to cast stones on the grave of a criminal. 18. The king's dale. "The King's Vale" is given as an alternate name for the vale of Shaveh in Gen 14:17 (ASV). Here the King of Sodom met Abraham. The location of the valley is unknown. The Tomb of Absalom still to be seen in the Kidron Valley is of Roman making and is most likely of a later tradition. Absalom's place. That is, a monument. Whether it was a column, an obelisk, or a monolith cannot be determined.

23. Ahimaaz . . . overran Cushi. The route taken by Cushi was the shorter route, but it led over hill and dale. The route taken by Ahimaaz lay along the bed of the Jordan River valley and could be traversed more quickly.

19:4. The king covered his face. This was the customary way of expressing one's grief. The muffled head marked the grief which shut one from the external world. Perhaps it symbolized the sorrow unto death that David felt for his son Absalom. His vocal expression suggested to the people that the king wished that he might die and be with Absalom. In a sense the covered head of David symbolized the shroud of Absalom's burial. Veils worn by mourning widows are a modernization of this old custom. However, the suggestion in modern mourning is that one desires to be alone as one grieves. For the same reason, at funerals the members of the immediate family are seated in a separate room.

5. Thou hast shamed . . . thy servants. The severe military discipline of Joab hindered his understanding the grief of a father for his son. David viewed the events as they related to himself, and felt keenly the loss of his son Absalom. Joab viewed the same events in the light of their meaning to the people of Judah and the family of David. He urged the king to conceal his personal feelings in the best interests of the political situation. Joab feared the reaction of the populace to the expressed sentiment of David for Absalom. Consequences more serious than Absalom's rebellion might follow if the mob were stirred to anger by their king's lack of appreciation for their bravery on his behalf. 7. Speak comfortably. Literally, speak to the heart. Speak in a friendly way, encouraging them and appeasing their discontent. This expression is used often in the OT.

9. All the people were at strife. The short-lived rebellion had failed to gain its objective, and the element of discontent spread throughout the country. The movement to restore David to power was not unanimous. Some felt that he had lost his ability to rule; others looked upon him as having earned the right to rule by his past service.

11. The elders of Judah. These were the men who could win the tribe of Judah back to the cause of David. Their reticence derived from the fact that Judah had played a prominent part in the insurrection. David commissioned the religious leaders, Zadok and Abiathar, to make his appeal to Judah through the tribal elders. The text of their message is too brief to disclose what approaches these two religious delegates made. Perhaps they reminded the elders of the movement of Israel to restore David and hinted that there might also be a movement started to make a northern city the capital instead of Jerusalem. David had once before moved his capital from Hebron to Jerusalem, and another move could happen again. David's action in turning to his own tribe was natural and essential in his return to power. However, some have looked upon his conciliatory action toward Judah as a deed breeding fresh rebellion.

13. Say ye to Amasa . . . thou be . . . captain. This course of action was a bold stroke of military policy to secure the loyalty of the general of the rebel army. By so doing, David hoped to secure the allegiance of the rebel army and at the same time to demote Joab for his murder of Absalom. The move has been questioned as hardly prudent, for Joab was not the type of man to acquiesce quietly, nor had the loyalty of Amasa been proved. 20. The house of Joseph. The ten tribes of Israel were distinguished from Judah by the title of the most powerful tribe among them – Ephraim, son of Joseph. 24. Neither dressed . . . nor trimmed . . . nor washed. The neglect of his appearance was the outward sign of extreme grief. 29. Thou and Ziba divide the land. It is not known whether David was making a compromise to keep the family of Ziba and Mephibosheth friendly to his cause, or whether he decided this on the spot because he did not have time to investigate the claims of both parties. 37. Behold thy servant Chimham; let him go over with . . . the king. Cf. I Kgs 2:7. Josephus says that he was Barzillai's son.

20:1. He blew a trumpet. Sheba, a worthless son of the family of Becher, the second son of Benjamin, blew the trumpet to call Israel to revolt from the house of David. This rebellion was perhaps engendered by the traditional hostility between the house of Saul and the house of David, the Benjamites and the Judahites. Sheba was interested in wresting the power from Judah and regaining it for Benjamin. In his call to revolt, Every man to his tents, O Israel, he employed the words used in the successful rebellion led by Jeroboam (I Kgs 12:16). The meaning is: "Men, let's turn in our uniforms and K rations and return to the farms, and I shall head up a resistance group to secure better portions for us all." The use of tents is strange in that Israel had long since left the nomadic form of life for the settled life of Canaan. The terminology of the past culture persists in every society, and Sheba was using a cliché that had propaganda and sentimental value.

3. Living in widowhood. These were the ten women whom Absalom had violated in broad daylight as a signal to Israel that he had taken over the throne. David could not return these women to the royal harem, nor did he wish to do so. Instead, he made provision for their support and declared them to be widows for the remainder of their natural life.

This action of David had in it the elements of both generosity and tragedy. Life in a king's harem carried with it the possibility of dire consequences as well as the reward of luxurious living. These women were confined in order to protect David from further embarrassment or predicament in regard to them. They were accorded the right of support because their violation was perpetrated by Absalom and was not initiated as a harem intrigue to overthrow the ruling king.

5. He tarried longer than the set time. Was Amasa, cousin of Joab, whom Absalom had appointed captain of his host, lacking in initiative; or was the assembling of the army a more difficult task than David had expected? It is probable that some men questioned the strength of David's return to power, while others resented the change of generals, preferring Joab to Amasa. David had already promised Amasa the position of Joab (19:13,14). Perhaps Amasa's delay was the result of military and political hindrances set up by those who questioned the wisdom of David's rash promises.

6. David said to Abishai. David still superseded Joab by giving the orders to Joab's brother. However, once the campaign was under way, Joab, with Abishai's consent, resumed his place as commander-in-chief.

9. To kiss him. Laying hold of the beard to kiss is still customary among the Arabs and the Turks as a sign of friendly welcome. 10. Amasa took no heed to the sword. This part of the text is quite difficult to translate accurately, and hence the nature of Joab's treachery is difficult to ascertain. Joab, it seems, had a second weapon concealed under his military cloak, while he openly wore another sword in its sheath. Presumably he deliberately let fall the sword he wore openly to banish any doubt or suspicion from the mind of Abishai.

14. Unto Abel, and to Beth-maachah. As is seen in verses 15,18, this should be read, Abel of Beth-maachah. It is also known as "Abel-maim" (meadow of waters) in II Chr 16:4. This town fell to the forces of Ben-hadad of Syria (I Kgs 15:20) and afterward to the Assyrian Tiglath-pileser. The mention of Maachah may suggest a connection with the Syrian kingdom of that name (10:6). Its location is about twelve miles north of Lake Huleh and four miles west of Tell el Kadi (Dan) at the site of the village of Abil. 15. They cast up a bank against the city. The purpose of this mound was to enable them to reach the highest point of the wall in order to break down the wall and force an entrance. This type of warfare is depicted on the bas-reliefs of the siege of Lachish.

17. Hear the words of thine handmaid. The woman went on to suggest to Joab that before he began the siege and possible destruction of the town, he should ask the inhabitants of Abel whether or not they intended to fight for Sheba and his cohorts. This was to be done, according to the legislation of Deut 20:10ff. Her second implication was that Joab ought to have taken into consideration the peaceableness and fidelity of the citizens of Abel and not to destroy peace-loving citizens and members of the nation of God. She was indeed a wise woman and in sympathy with the wise woman of Tekoa, who undertook to spare needless bloodshed. Compare, too, the intercession of Abigail in the cause of the farm families of Carmel and vicinity. Women have generally pled the cause of peace and argued for peaceful arbitration to avert bloodshed. Ecclesiastes (lit., The Preacher) said that wisdom is better than strength, and perhaps used this incident for his reference in Eccl 9:13-16.

22. Every man to his tent. This is a satirical commentary on the rebellion of Sheba. He had called for Israel to secede from the union of Israel and Judah, and had lost his head as a result. The men of Judah returned to their tents, while Sheba's forces were scattered. The way of the sword can lead to dire consequences.

24. Adoram was over the tribute. Rather, he was over the labor gangs raised under the system of forced labor. He held this office until the reign of Rehoboam (I Kgs 4:6; 12:18).

IV. The Last Days of David. 21:1–24:25.

A. The Famine. 21:1-14.

1. A famine. Ezekiel 14:21 lists the sword (war), famine, the noisome beast, and pestilence as the four sore (heavy) judgments of God for the sins of Jerusalem. In I Kgs 8:35-37, Solomon refers to the cloudless heaven that could bring famine as the result of the sins of his people. The precise time of this famine is not given. "In the days of David" could refer to any time during his lengthy reign. Some would place it after David's acquaintance with Mephibosheth (cf. v. 7), but before Absalom's rebellion.

It is for Saul. Saul, it seems, refused to recognize the treaty made by Joshua with the Gibeonites (Josh 9), and, in his zeal for his own people, put some of these Amoritic remnants to death. This constituted the breaking of a covenant and was to be reckoned as unexpiated murder, which, according to Deut 21:7-9, defiled the land.

3. Wherewith shall I make the atonement. David asked the Gibeonites what they would accept as settlement for their injury. The literal meaning of the Hebrew verb for "to make atonement" is to cover. This "covering" was intended to hide the offense from the eyes of the offended party, and to withdraw the guilt of the offender from the gaze of a God who avenged the wrong. The atonement could be made by a settlement in money, which gave rise to the expression, "blood money," or by the application of the law of revenge. If the latter method had been used in this case, David could have given the Gibeonites the same number of men Saul had executed. These could have been men in disfavor at the court of David or men chosen by lot. However, the Gibeonites would not be satisfied with anything less than revenge on the family of Saul. They accused Saul of trying to exterminate them (an ancient policy used to invalidate the law of revenge). They wanted to see his descendants dealt with exactly as he had sought to deal with them (cf. v. 5). This demand for exact justice was in keeping with the legislation of Num 35:31,32, which insists upon a strict regard for human life. The payment of money by the murderer to the family of the murdered was a dangerous precedent, which could be abused by the rich. Men with money could "beat the rap."

6. Seven men. Seven may have been the exact number of Gibeonites executed by Saul; or, more likely, it was a sacred number, the men being chosen to be executed in a solemn ritual "unto the Lord." This execution, however, was not like a sacrifice to entreat God for rain, but was a case of judicial retribution.

8. Rizpah. A concubine of Saul. Ishbosheth once accused Abner of having illicit relations with Rizpah in an attempt to assume the throne of Saul in his (Ishbosheth's) place. This accusation led to Abner's transferring his loyalty to the house of David. Sons of Michal presents a problem. According to the Biblical record, Michal died childless as a result of her estrangement from David. Her attitude toward her husband in his dealings with the priesthood and the ark of the covenant brought about strained relations. He did not divorce her, but assigned to her a special house and had no further marital relations with her. The Targum recognized the problem here and suggested that Michal raised the five sons of her deceased sister Merab, whom Merab had born to Adriel. The Meholathite. That is, of Abel-meholah, a town in the Jordan Valley, near Beth-Shan, famous as the birthplace of Elisha (I Kgs 19:16).

10. Rizpah . . . took sackcloth, and spread it . . . upon the rock. Rizpah took cloth, made a tent, and stood watch from April to October, till the fall rains came and she knew that the sin of Saul's household had been expiated and that no further claim would be made on the lives of her family. It was contrary to the law of Deut 21:23 to permit a body to hang over night, but this law was set aside in the present case.

13. And they gathered the bones of them that were hanged. David was touched by the maternal devotion of Rizpah. To show that he had no personal hostility toward the house of Saul, he disinterred the remains of Saul and Jonathan from the graves given them by the men of Jabesh-gilead and gave them decent burial in their home sepulchre at Zelah. This place is enumerated among the towns of Benjamin in Josh 18:28, but it has not yet been identified. Beih Jala near Bethlehem has been suggested, but this is in Judah, not Benjamin. It is strange that Saul's burial was not at Gibeah, his birthplace.

B. Heroic Exploits. 21:15-22.

16. The sons of the giant. The word for sons is used in Num 13:22,28 of the sons of Anak, the giants of the land in the period of the Conquest. The Hebrew for giant, Rapha, is not a name of an individual. It is a collective, used of the Rephaim, a giant race that inhabited Palestine in primitive times and gave to a valley near Jerusalem the name "Valley of Rephaim." The Vulgate has Arapha, from which comes Harapha, the name of the giant introduced in Milton's Samson Agonistes. 17. Quench . . . the light of Israel. This was a metaphor for changing the light of prosperity for the darkness of calamity. In modern parlance, these men wanted David to carry the torch for Israel.

19. Elhanan . . . slew the brother of Goliath. The brother is missing in the Masoretic Text. It is added on the basis of the parallel account in I Chr 20:5. Some commentators suppose that the Samuel account preserves the older tradition and that only later was the slaying of Goliath attributed to David. There is no serious difficulty, however, in supposing that there was another man of great stature called Goliath besides the one slain by David. There is another Elhanan of Bethlehem mentioned in II Sam 23:24. Some (cf. Targum and Jerome) have tried to identify Elhanan (the one whom God shows favor) with David. But there is no strong evidence to support this idea.

20. Six fingers . . . six toes. This was not an unusual deformity in ancient times, nor is it in modern times. Pliny mentioned such a peculiarity in his Natural History. According to Lev 21:18, one with such a deformity was excluded from the temple service.

C. David's Psalm. 22:1-51.

3. My salvation. Salvation in OT thought was often seen in physical deliverance from the power of enemy forces.

6. The snares of death. The fortunes of David brought him on a number of occasions to dangerous places. Many times there was only a step between him and death. In all his life he saw the hand of God protecting him from serious harm.

7. Out of his temple. The Lord as king ruled in the heavens and there was his temple. The Solomonic Temple was to become the earthly symbol of the heavenly authority of God in the national destiny of Israel.

17. He drew me. Same root as the name Moses. As Moses was taken out of the waters of the Nile, so David was taken out of the great (many, AV) waters of tribulation.

D. David's Testament. 23:1-7.

1. The sweet psalmist of Israel. David is remembered for many things. He was not only the patron of synagogue and church choir music, but was the favorite of the song writers of Israel. They loved him for the music that came from the inner depths of his soul. His last words were in poetic form, expressing the glory of God in the ruling of a righteous king.

4. As the light. David saw in the good king the welcome response of the nation to true leadership. It was as welcome as the morning sun and as refreshing as the rains in their seasons.

5. An everlasting covenant. The Lord is a covenant-making God. Covenants in the Bible include those made both with individuals and with nations. With every covenant was implied the duty of loyalty to the terms of the covenant. Although Israel failed to keep her part of the covenant, she was to learn that God was ever faithful.

17. He would not drink it. The magnanimous spirit of a warrior is seen in David's respect for the courage of the three mighty men who braved the armies of the Philistines to bring the cool water to David. A well in modern Bethlehem is pointed out to tourists as the well of David.

E. Heroic Exploits. 23:8-39.

18. Joab is not mentioned. Either he is in a class by himself or the disgrace of killing Absalom, and siding with the unsuccessful claimant (I Kgs 1:7) caused his name to be stricken from the honor roll. He served well, was loyal in a dog-like devotion, yet was without honor. The stories of these heroic figures are often paralleled in the Iliad and Odyssey and in personal exploits in the wars of Egypt and Mesopotamia. In the latter stories it is usually the heroic king or pharaoh who is commemorated; in Homer and in the OT, the heroic figures come from the ranks.

F. Census and Plague. 24:1-25.

1. He moved David. The Chronicler (I Chr 21:1) refers the inciting of David to Satan. From the Biblical viewpoint, all things have their ultimate source in God. Even the wrath of man, and Satan, ultimately further the divine purposes. Go, number Israel and Judah. Censuses in the Middle East always have been frowned upon, for the purposes of counting the people were to determine tax proportions and to conscript for war service.

14. Let us fall . . . into the hand of the Lord. The religious insight in this passage is very great indeed. Angry deities in pagan religions were to be appeased quickly and offenders were to keep out of the way of offended deities. David knew that his overt act was sinful and that he was endangering the nation with the righteous anger of God in judgment. However, he also knew his God as a forgiving Lord, plenteous in mercy toward all who repent. He saw more mercy in God than in the hand of man. Sinners in the hands of an angry God have more reason for hope than does offending man in the clutches of an offended society.

16. The Lord repented him of the evil. Repentance on the part of man involves a turning about in a new attitude toward God. Repentance on the part of God is a change of approach toward man on the basis of man's changed attitude toward God. The threshing floor of Araunah. Araunah was known as a Jebusite, one of the original inhabitants of the city of Jerusalem. His name indicates a Hurrian origin, or at least a Hurrian title. Many believe that this threshing floor is to be identified with the rock formation preserved under the Dome of the Rock, on or near the site of Solomon's Temple.

FIRST AND SECOND KINGS

INTRODUCTION

Title. The books now known as I and II Kings were so named from their contents. In the Septuagint (Greek version of the OT) the original Hebrew Kings is regarded as a continuation of the material in the book of Samuel. It is divided into two parts and is entitled The Third and Fourth Kingdoms. Jerome, though retaining this division in his Vulgate, called the two parts simply, The Book of the Kings.

The two books obviously form one whole, covering Israel's history from the monarchy under Solomon to the nation's dissolution under Zedekiah. They deal with the fortunes of the nation of Israel under the covenant with the Lord, pointing out the sins of the kings who broke the covenant and brought about the deportation of Israel and Judah.

Date and Authorship. II Kings closes with the release of Jehoiachin from prison in the thirty-seventh year of his imprisonment – about 562/561 B.C. The book could not have been completed before this date, nor later. than 536 B.C., the year of the return from Babylon, since it says nothing of that event. As this book is a unit and not the product of several hands of successive dates, it is to be dated in the period about 562–536 B.C.

Since the release of Jehoiachin would have been of significance only to Jews of the Babylonian captivity, we would conclude that I and II Kings were written by some Jewish captive living in the area of Babylon.

Sources. The author states plainly that he had sources for his history: (1) Acts of Solomon (I Kgs 11:41). (2) See references to the chronicles of the kings of Judah (e.g., I Kgs 14:29), and the chronicles of the kings of Israel (e.g., I Kgs 14:19). Sources for the history of the kings of Judah are never mixed with those for the history of the kings of Israel. Therefore we know that each of the above was a separate, distinct document. The citations from these works show that they contained much more material than is given in Kings.

Specific authors of the firsthand sources are cited for us in the parallels in I and II Chronicles: Nathan the prophet, Ahijah the Shilonite, and Iddo (II Chr 9:29); Shemaiah the prophet and Iddo the seer (II Chr 12:15); Iddo the prophet (II Chr 13:22); Isaiah the prophet (II Chr 26:22; 32:32); Jehu (I Kgs 16:1). Because the sources are thus strictly prophetical matter, not mere annals, we have here a forthright record of the deeds of the kings. No royal annalist would have dared to publish such incriminating facts about David or Jeroboam I as are here given.

Aim and Purpose. Though the author's chief concern is with the Davidic monarchy, he first treats a matter of secondary interest – the kingdom in Israel. Then he returns to the account of the Davidic monarchy. While the people knew the prophetical sources of this history, the sources were too numerous, voluminous, and cumbersome to display readily to the people the will of God; hence Kings was written.

Using extracts from the various sources, the author develops the history of the elect nation in respect to the covenant of Jehovah (Ex 19:3-6). They were to have no gods but the Lord (Ex 20:2-6). Idolatry and image worship are regarded in these books as the worst of all sins, which, continued and repeated, brought about Israel's deportation. The language of these books can be said to be 'Deuteronomic' because Deuteronomy speaks in much the same way against the same sins condemned in I and II Kings. The author of Kings holds up the history of Israel and Judah before the captives to teach them that the only way to freedom is to repent of idolatry, return to God, keep the covenant, and trust in the divine promises. He seeks to awaken in them a conviction of the truth of this teaching and to strengthen them in this conviction.

In respect to the covenant the prophets were God's messengers to remind the people of its provisions, and his instruments to oversee its implementation. It was their mission to seek by means of warnings, threats, and promises to obtain adherence to it (cf. Jer 7:13; 11:1-8). In these books, kings are pronounced good or bad as they adhered to or departed from the covenant.

Historical Background. The Israelites were the first people of antiquity to develop a true historiography. Other nations, such as Assyria, Babylonia, and Egypt, composed annals, but only the Hittites among the Gentile nations attempted historical writings.

In David's day Egypt's power had waned and Assyria was weak; hence there were impotent nations on both of Israel's frontiers. However, Assyria soon awakened under Tiglath-pileser III (also called Pul, II Kgs 15:19; 745–727 B.C.). In 721 B.C. Samaria fell under the attack of Shalmaneser and Sargon. Later, under Sennacherib, Assyria invaded Judah and took many cities but failed to take Jerusalem because of the rear-guard threat of Egypt. Esarhaddon and Ashurbanipal extended Assyrian hegemony to Egypt.

In Josiah's time Pharaoh-necho went up to help Assyria against Babylon at Carchemish, but the two allies were defeated. Shortly, the victorious Nebuchadrezzar invaded Palestine, and on his third attack against Jerusalem, plundered and destroyed the city, carrying the people off to final captivity (586 B.C.).

COMMENTARY

I. The United Kingdom from Solomon to Rehoboam. I Kgs 1:1–11:43.

A. Solomon's Ascension to the Throne. 1:1–2:46.

1) Adonijah's Aspiration to the Throne Defeated. 1:1-53. 1. Now king David was old. David's many misfortunes at the hand of Saul before he came to the throne, and his forty-year reign over Israel had left their indelible impressions upon him. Yet, before death overtook him, the warrior-poet-king reached the age of seventy years (II Sam 5:4), which his own writings had marked out as the ultimate bound of life. The final blow that hastened the old man's death was Absalom's rebellion (II Sam 15:1–19:10). And they covered him with clothes. Bᵉgādîm designates bedclothes, not garments. They took the simplest precautionary measure to sustain the old man in his physical declension, which, however, did not aid the ailing monarch. 2. Wherefore his servants said unto him. The suggestion of the servants that a maiden be found for the king to restore his lost vitality and to provide him warmth was an accepted medical prescription even down to the Middle Ages.

No immoral connotation should be read into this rather strange-sounding practice.

3. So they sought for him a young maiden. She was chosen for virginity and beauty. Abishag, of Shunam, a city of Issachar in the plain of Jezreel, at the foot of Mount Hermon, the lesser. 4. And ministered to him: but the king knew her not. That is, did not enter into sexual relations with her. Abishag assumed somewhat the role of a practical nurse to the dying David.

5. Then Adonijah the son of Haggith exalted himself. His rebellion was expressed in the determined words — I will be king. In his turbulent life David had previously experienced rebellion on the part of another son, Absalom. Adonijah, whose mother was Haggith, was David's fourth son. Perhaps Adonijah believed that as the eldest living son of David he had right to the throne. But if so, he ignored the theological implications of God's having already chosen Solomon, David's son through Bath-sheba, wife of Uriah the Hittite (II Sam 12:24). 6. And his father had not displeased him at any time. From this it may be inferred that Adonijah was allowed to go unchecked and undisciplined.

7. And he conferred with Joab . . . and with Abiathar. Joab was the son of Zeruiah, David's sister, the brother of Abishai and Asahel. He seems to have resided in Bethlehem. As chief-in-command of David's army, he proved himself a brilliant military strategist, valiant in battle, though not above cruelty and actual treachery in certain instances. His chief military accomplishments were the capturing of Jerusalem and the siege of Rabbah, of the Ammonites. Because he had needlessly shed the blood of Abner and Amasa, Solomon ordered Benaiah to put him to death. At his own request Joab was slain beside the altar of God in the Tabernacle, where he had taken refuge. Abiathar was the only priest who had escaped the brutal vengeance Saul took on the priestly order at Nob for extending aid to David. After fleeing to David, he had become spiritual adviser and friend to the fugitive warrior. Up to this point Abiathar had remained true to the king personally, but now he joined in the conspiracy of Adonijah against Solomon. His subsequent penalty was not the execution he deserved, but expulsion from the priesthood by Solomon.

8. But Zadok the priest . . . Nathan the prophet . . . were not with Adonijah. Zadok had joined David at Hebron immediately after Saul's death (I Chr 12:28), accompanied him on his flight from Jerusalem during Absalom's insurrection, and acted as the king's spy (II Sam 15:24-29; 17:15). Nathan. See I Kgs 1:11.

9. Adonijah slew sheep and oxen and fatlings by the stone of Zoheleth. As a pretender to the throne, Adonijah wished to be thought munificent. Therefore, in anticipation of his coronation, he gave this royal feast to those concerned. The stone of Zoheleth; i.e., the serpent's stone (RSV), or "the steep rocky corner of the southern slope of the Valley of Hinnom, which casts so deep a shade." The place has been identified with the Wadi el Rubab. En-rogel. "Fountain of the treaders," or "the foot fountain." Here the fullers cleaned garments by treading them in the waters of the spring. This site has been identified as the "Well of Job" (more likely Well of Joab), situated below the junction of the Kidron Valley with the valley of Hinnom, 550 feet below Mount Zion. 10. But . . . Benaiah . . . and Solomon his brother, he called not. Benaiah, son of Jehoiada the high priest (I Chr 27:5), native of Kabzeel, head of David's police force, valiant in battle against man and beast, remained faithful to Solomon. Hence he was not summoned in the rebellion of Adonijah. Solomon, son of David through Bath-sheba, the legitimate and God-appointed heir to the throne, naturally was not summoned to Adonijah's feast.

11. Then Nathan spake unto Bath-sheba . . . saying. Nathan the prophet first appears in Scripture to announce to David that he must defer building the Temple (II Sam 7). Later he appears to reprove David for his double sin of murder and adultery in the matter of Uriah the Hittite (II Sam 12; Ps 51). Nathan now secured the kingdom to David's son Solomon by exposing Adonijah's machinations to the proper authorities, in this case Bath-sheba. 12,13. Nathan urged Bath-sheba to appeal directly to the king to name his successor before his death. 14. Behold, while thou yet talkest . . . I . . . will come in. That is, I will appear in order to verify your words before David, to show that you are not a victim of fright or imagination. The news of Adonijah's rebellion now fell upon David's ears, apparently for the first time. 20. The eyes of all Israel are upon thee. Bath-sheba appealed to David to make a forthright and immediate declaration.

22. True to his promise, Nathan put in an appearance to support Bath-sheba's account of Adonijah's rebellion, which otherwise might have appeared to the monarch as an exaggerated report. 23-27. Nathan repeated substantially the same story that David had just learned from Bath-sheba's lips.

28. Call me Bath-sheba. In Oriental fashion Bath-sheba had discreetly withdrawn when Nathan entered, but now she was recalled to hear the king make his official pronouncement. 29. And the king sware, and said, As the Lord liveth. By the sacred name of Jehovah, the king swore that Solomon, Bath-sheba's son, should indeed be appointed legitimate successor to his throne. All debate was thus ruled out of order. 31. Then Bath-sheba bowed with her face to the earth. She thus conveyed her gratitude for the decision of her husband and monarch, who had thus granted her request.

32,33. Cause Solomon . . . to ride . . . and bring him down to Gihon. This command to Zadok, Nathan, and Benaiah spelled the collapse of Adonijah's plot, for the coronation of the rebel's half brother Solomon was about to begin. The king gave specific instructions for the ceremony of crowning. David's own mule was to be used, the royal mule, to signify that Solomon was the king's chosen one. 34. Anoint him there king over Israel. Both king and priest in Israel were inducted into office through the rite of anointing, in contradistinction to the prophet, who held a non-anointed office. The blast of the trumpets was to announce to the people that Solomon had now legally taken the throne of his father, even before the latter's death. Long live king Solomon (ASV, RSV), a pious combination of a cheer and a prayer for the longevity and prosperity of the reign of the new monarch.

36. And Benaiah . . . answered the king, and said, Amen. Benaiah gave his acquiescence and his promise of obedience to all that David had stated in relation to the crowning of Solomon.

38. The Cherethites, and the Pelethites, went down. The royal bodyguard thus carried out the instructions of the king to the most minute detail. Gihon situated in the Kedron Valley just below the eastern hill (Ophel), was an intermittent spring which was at that time Jerusalem's chief source of water. 39. And Zadok the priest took an horn of oil. Zadok, the custodian of the sacred Tent, repaired to it to bring forth the material symbol of God's invisible anointing (cf. II Sam 6:17). 40. And all the people . . . rejoiced with great joy. With a new and promising king on the throne, a new and promising era stretched out before Israel. Behind lay memories of great conquests under David; ahead lay a future of peace and expansion.

41-48. And Adonijah and all the guests that were with him heard it. These verses relate the collapse of Adonijah's conspiracy to seize the throne. 49. And all the guests of Adonijah were afraid. They feared, with reason, that they would be regarded as traitors against the state, and be summarily dealt with.

50. And Adonijah feared because of Solomon. Forsaken and bereft of those who shortly before had called themselves his friends, Adonijah fled in very terror of his life to seek asylum in the sanctuary of the Tabernacle. 51. And it was told Solomon, saying, Behold, Adonijah feareth. In Oriental practice, an insurgent like Adonijah would have been severely punished, if not put to death. However, Solomon dealt mercifully with him, remitting the death penalty and placing him under watchful observation, thus setting the pattern for his magnanimous rule. Not until Adonijah committed another act of perfidy was his judgment pronounced. 53. So king Solomon sent, and they brought him down from the altar. Solomon respected the sanctuary of the altar. Only one who was proved to be a murderer was to be removed from the altar without mercy. Adonijah professed to submit to Solomon and obey his rule. Had his submission been genuine, his subsequent life would have been more peaceful and his story far happier.

2) Last Words and Death of David. 2:1-11.

1-4. Now the days of David drew nigh that he should die. This may have been an extended period of months. The words do not necessarily refer to immediate death. 2. I go the way of all the earth. David's charge to Solomon may be regarded as twofold: (1) an exhortation to obey the law of Jehovah (vv. 3,4); (2) an admonition to deal wisely with David's enemies and friends, according to their deserts (vv. 5-9).

5,6. David specifically instructed Solomon to liquidate the king's enemies, i.e., Joab and Shimei. The critics claim that David's instructions concerning these men were a "piece of Oriental cruelty." However, it should be noted that the inflicting of penalties upon them was not due merely to David's personal desire for vengeance. Joab, captain of the host, was guilty of a double murder – the slaughter of Abner, a deed of deepest treachery (II Sam 3:27), and the slaying of Amasa, son of Jether (II Sam 20:10). Joab was rightfully accused by David of committing acts of war in times of peace. He therefore must die at once. Observe the picturesque figure of speech of the bloody girdle and shoes (I Kgs 2:5).

7. But show kindness unto the sons of Barzillai. Barzillai, the aged man, had sustained David in his flight from his son Absalom (II Sam 19:31ff.). Without this assistance David might have succumbed to starvation in the wilderness.

8. And, behold, there is with thee Shimei . . . who cursed me (ASV). During the rebellion of Absalom, Shimei came out to meet the fleeing king, cursing as he came and flinging dust and stones at David and his entourage (II Sam 16:5-13). After the rebellion had been repressed, Shimei sued for pardon. And David did pardon him as far as execution of punishment was concerned. There are two leading interpretations of David's charge to Solomon to "hold him not guiltless" (I Kgs 2:9). The one, attributing superstition to David, takes the view that the king, as a typical Oriental, feared the curse. The most effective way to remove the curse, according to the prevailing mode of thinking, was to remove the one who had uttered it, and thus render it inoperative. The other, more feasible interpretation is that since Shimei, as a Benjamite, stemmed from the neighborhood of the erstwhile king Saul, David feared that this man, once his protective custody was withdrawn, would again strike at the throne. Moreover, before actual penalty was imposed, Solomon gave Shimei a reprieve conditioned on obedience.

10. Buried in the city of David. Jerusalem, the precincts of Mount Zion (Acts 2:29). The city David had wrested from the Jebusites and claimed for his capital became the burial ground for the great king. Though David was born in Bethlehem, Jerusalem henceforth was to be designated the city of David. 11. David reigned over Israel . . . forty years. There is no particular chronological problem involved here. David died at the age of seventy, having reigned forty years. He had reigned seven years over the Hebron area, a small southerly sector, and he had sat upon the throne of all Israel for thirty-three years (1010–971 B.C.).

3) Solomon's Disposal of Aspirants to the Throne. 2:12-46.

Execution of Adonijah. 2:13-25.

13-17. And Adonijah . . . came to Bath-sheba. He approached Solomon's mother with a seemingly harmless but really insidious request. He said, in effect, "Let Abishag be given to me." This young girl had attended David in his declining state. The unsuspecting mother saw nothing perverse in this request, but simply an "affair of the heart," and readily agreed. 19. Bath-sheba therefore went unto king Solomon. She innocently became a go-between for Adonijah. With great courtesy the king received his mother . . . until she placed the request before him.

22. Why dost thou ask Abishag . . . for Adonijah? The mental acumen of Solomon penetrated the plot. Even though David had not 'known' Abishag, she was nevertheless considered an inheritor. With her would go the rights to the throne. Having once failed in an abortive attempt to seize the kingdom, Adonijah now sought in a more subtle way to gain his objective. This time he would not be pardoned. 25. And king Solomon sent . . . Benaiah. Adonijah had failed to appreciate mercy; therefore relentless judgment fell.

Demotion of Abiathar. 2:26,27.

26. Unto Abiathar . . . said the king, Get thee to Anathoth (v. 26). Abiathar, a descendant of Aaron through Eli, was removed from his priestly office and sent back in disgrace to his home village. The reason for Abiathar's punishment, as stated by Solomon, was that he had participated in Adonijah's rebellion. Though expelled, he was not executed, because he had remained faithful to David in the rebellion of Absalom (II Sam 15:24ff.).

The Death of Joab. 2:28-35.

28. And Joab fled unto the Tent of Jehovah, and caught hold on the horns of the altar (ASV). Solomon now began to carry out the orders of his deceased father regarding his enemies. The Tabernacle was located at Gibeon (see 3:4), whither Joab fled, knowing that his doom was sealed. However, not even the sanctuary of the altar could afford refuge for the willful murderer.

33. So shall their blood rest upon their own head forever. The king was giving concrete evidence as to the justice of the sentence. The words of the 'benediction' following imply that once bloodguilt was removed from the throne, it would then stand in a position of blessing before God. After the execution had taken place, Joab was interred in his own house. The old general was not dishonored after all. To be buried on one's own property was a mark of distinction, as in the case of Samuel the prophet (I Sam 25:1) and other outstanding personalities. Joab's dwelling was east of Bethlehem, in the wilderness of Judea.

35. And Zadok the priest did the king put in the room of Abiathar. After the replacement of Joab by Benaiah, Zadok succeeded Abiathar. The appointment of Zadok was fraught with serious consequences, for from then on, the priesthood was subject to the political maneuvers of the state.

The Punishment of Shimei. 2:36-46.

36-41. And the king sent and called for Shimei (see 2:8,9). Next in order for Solomon to deal with, in accordance with David's charge, was Shimei. The king commanded him to build a house in Jerusalem, and to remain within the limits of the city. The brook Kidron divided the tribe of Judah from the tribe of Benjamin. Shimei was from the latter tribe. He was thus forbidden to return to his own tribe (v. 37). Shimei agreed to the terms and promised obedience (v. 38). Though placed under rigid surveillance, and knowing the punishment, he broke the conditions of his reprieve by leaving Jerusalem to seek two of his servants who had fled to Gath, a city of the Philistines (vv. 39,40).

42. And the king sent and called for Shimei. It is implied here that his every movement was reported to Solomon. Whether or not Solomon's infliction of the death penalty was fully justified is debatable. At least the monarch read into Shimei's disobedience the most pernicious motives, and punished him with death. Solomon had now completed the charge made to him by his father. It would have been well for Solomon if he had been as zealous in adhering to the Lord his God (cf. 2:3) as he was in completing this charge. 45. And king Solomon shall be blessed. Solomon congratulated himself that with the death of Shimei, the curse placed upon David directly and himself indirectly would now be removed.

46. And the kingdom was established in the hand of Solomon. With all threats removed, Solomon could settle down to a peaceful and prosperous reign.

B. The Wisdom and Wealth of Solomon. 3:1–4:34.

1) Solomon's Marriage to Pharaoh's Daughter. 3:1.

And Solomon made . . . alliance with Pharaoh king of Egypt. This alliance was made through marriage. The exact identity of this Pharaoh is a matter of controversy. He was either the last Pharaoh of the Twenty-first Dynasty or the first of the Twenty-second. Archaeology may yet add more light on this. And he brought her into the city of David, i.e., Jerusalem. Popular feeling would have been against a pagan queen's living in the dwelling place of the ark. Solomon's marriage was a political move. This short section may be somewhat out of chronological order.

2) Solomon's Worship and Vision. 3:2-15.

2. Only the people sacrificed in the high places. There is no particular blame charged to the people for their various sanctuaries. This was an anachronistic practice handed down from the period of the Judges. Bamôt (high places) is from the ancient Canaanite word for an "elevated platform on which cultic objects were placed" (Albright). These high places were viewed as sacred to the worship of the Canaanite deity. During the earlier years of Solomon's reign, the "Bamoth" were dedicated to the worship of the God of Israel only and were located at Gibeon. 4. And the king went to Gibeon to sacrifice there. Prior to the erection of the Temple, Gibeon of Benjamin (a possession since the days of Joshua, and the last resting place of the Tabernacle) was the center of worship.

5. In Gibeon the Lord appeared to Solomon in a dream by night. God revealed himself to Solomon. Solomon's mind had probably been lifted to a high state of religious fervor, approaching ecstasy. In this state revelations were often accorded (cf. Isa 6:1-3). And God said, Ask what I shall give thee. The God of heaven bent down to grant the supplication of a man. Within the bounds of reason, Solomon could have obtained whatever he wished.

6. Thou hast showed unto . . . David my father great lovingkindness (AV, mercy). Solomon acknowledged the Lord's kindness to his father. 7. I am but a little child. Solomon was about twenty years of age when he ascended the throne. In relation to the magnitude of the task, he felt his own immaturity. 9. Give thy servant, therefore, an understanding heart. Lēb shōmēa', "a hearing heart," a heart inclined to do thy will. That I may discern between good and bad. Here the words good and bad are used in a judicial sense. The thrust of Solomon's prayer is that he might judge the people in equity and truth.

10-15. And the speech pleased the Lord. God congratulated Solomon because he had requested the highest prize. He had petitioned for the supreme good, the acquisition of wisdom, in comparison with which all other blessings are vain and futile. Many other gifts he might have requested would have been entirely justifiable, but the supplication for wisdom surpassed them all. The Wisdom literature of Solomonic and post-Exilic days bears testimony to the high desirability of wisdom (Prov 8:11-36; Eccl 12:9-11).

3) Solomon's Wisdom Displayed. 3:16-28.

16. Then came there two women, that were harlots. Solomon's wisdom was soon given a pragmatic test. Some critics have regarded this as a fictional incident designed to embellish Solomon's prayer. However, the marks of authenticity are upon it. The problem posed for the youthful monarch to adjudicate was a knotty one: Which woman was the mother of the dead infant and which was the mother of the living infant? Each claimed the living child as her own. Solomon, with a flare for the dramatic, appealed to the sympathies of the real mother by suggesting that the living child be divided between the two women. The woman whose claims were false, not recognizing the intent of the suggestion, all too readily fell into the carefully constructed trap. The mother whose maternal instincts were stirred within her, quickly voiced vehement protest. Solomon accorded the custody of the child to her.

4) Organization of the Empire. 4:1-28.

1. So king Solomon was king over all Israel. This verse takes us back to a time prior to the division of the kingdom. The tribes that formerly often warred and clashed with one another were now united under one head and living in a state of prosperity and happiness (see v. 20).

2-6. And these were the princes which he had. There follows a listing of the priest[s], princes, and other high officials of the royal court. In the light of verse 4, "the priest" of verse 2 refers to Zadok, while Azariah occupied the position of scribal recorder. Azariah the son of Zadok. The identity of this man is a controversial problem. Following Unger (Merrill Unger, Bible Dictionary) we identify said Azariah with the grandson of Zadok, son of Ahimaaz, who immediately followed his own grandfather (I Chr 6:8,9). In other words, the Azariah, grandson of Zadok, of I Kgs 4:2 and the Azariah, son of Nathan, of 4:5 can not refer to the same individual. Although the term "the priest," hākkōhen, is attributed to both individuals, in 4:2 it is apparently employed in the strict or religious sense, to specify a minister; while in verse 5 it is used in a more secular sense, to specify an officer.

7-19. And Solomon had twelve officers over all Israel. The names that follow constitute a listing of Solomon's officers, and to all intents and purposes they are unidentifiable. It is of interest to observe that the services of the officers were arranged on the basis of the calendar year of twelve months, each officer being responsible for his particular month.

20. Judah and Israel were many, as the sand. This verse sketches in miniature the picture of a happy, prosperous people. The wars of David were in the past; the sore conflicts of division were yet mercifully hidden in the future.

21. And Solomon reigned . . . from the river . . . unto the border of Egypt. Solomon's kingdom extended from the Euphrates to the land of Egypt. All of the smaller kingdoms in between had by this time become vassals to Solomon. It might seem impossible that with two such strong contending powers as Egypt to the south and Assyria to the north it would be possible to build so large an empire, but such was the case at the beginning of Solomon's reign. At this time, the kingdom of Egypt was ruled by the weak and inglorious Twenty-first Dynasty; and the power of Assyria was in a state of decline. 24. On this side the river. Better, beyond the river. Tiphsah, or Thapsacus, a most important crossing point on the Euphrates. Perhaps no more is implied here than that Solomon had free and unrestricted usage of this great center of trade upon the Euphrates River.

26. Much of Solomon's wealth was invested in "horse flesh" (see I Kgs 9:19, especially in the light of archaeological information).

5) Summary of Solomon's Wisdom. 4:29-34.

29. And God gave Solomon wisdom . . . and largeness of heart. Largeness of heart is from a Hebrew term meaning breadth of mind. 30. And Solomon's wisdom excelled the wisdom of all the children of the east. This wisdom is concerned with mundane affairs, rather than with spiritual realities. Unfortunately we know nothing of these wise men whom Solomon exceeded in wisdom. 32. And he spake three thousand proverbs. By common consent the Wisdom literature contained in Proverbs and Ecclesiastes is traditionally ascribed to the pen (or penmen) of Solomon. The literary production of the reigning son of David was little short of prodigious. 34. And there came of all people to hear the wisdom of Solomon. The writer here expresses himself in hyperbole. He means that Solomon's court was open to all, and that as a wise man he attracted many important and influential visitors (cf. ch. 10).

C. Solomon's Building Activity. 5:1–9:28.

1) Preparation for Building the Temple. 5:1-18.

1. And Hiram king of Tyre sent his servants unto Solomon. Hiram (c. 970–937 B.C.) had been a friend of David. After David had conquered the stronghold of Zion, he made a permanent treaty of peace with the king of Tyre. Hiram had assisted David in his public works by sending to Jerusalem laborers and cedar wood from the Lebanon Mountains (II Sam 5:11; II Chr 2:3,4). Now Hiram guaranteed his continued aid and goodwill to Solomon by a trade agreement, stipulating that in exchange for Tyrian wood and stone, Solomon would furnish him with agricultural products (II Chr 2:3ff.). A temporary rift in the friendship occurred when Solomon turned twenty of the cities in Galilee over to Hiram in exchange for some large shipments of gold, and Hiram found the cities displeasing (I Kgs 9:11-14). However, the rift was subsequently healed, and the two kings engaged in profitable trade with each other (10:22). Hiram assisted Solomon materially in the construction of the Temple.

3. Thou knowest how that David my father could not build an house. Solomon assumed that Hiram knew about his father's earnest desire to erect a house for the service of God, and about God's denying the wish on the ground of David's having been a man of war. Solomon now announced his intention of carrying forward the plans, and solicited Hiram's aid. He painted for the king of Tyre a picture of the favorable conditions in his own land which would contribute to his ability to perform the task.

6. Now therefore command . . . that they hew me cedar trees out of Lebanon. While the western slopes of the Lebanon Mountains must have been extensively covered with cedars in Solomon's day, only a few hundred of these trees remain today. Having taken hundreds of years to grow, these trees were valuable for building purposes because of the beauty of the wood and its extreme bitterness, which repelled insects and worms, and therefore it did not decay as rapidly as other woods.

7. When Hiram heard the words of Solomon . . . he rejoiced greatly. Hiram's response was enthusiastic. He pledged that he would perform all that Solomon had requested. The lumber would be carried from the forest to the sea, and from there it would be floated by rafts along the Mediterranean coast to a designated port of reception.

11. Solomon gave Hiram twenty thousand measures of wheat. An estimated 130,000 bushels of wheat, as well as 120 gallons of pure olive oil were the agricultural products Solomon sent to Tyre in exchange for the material provided by Hiram. This is indeed a good example of a "gentleman's trade agreement." Solomon was exercising caution that his "good should not be evil spoken of." This was on a year-by-year arrangement.

13. And king Solomon raised a levy out of all Israel. There is no contradiction between this and 9:22, as the Israelites were free when their period of service expired, while the Canaanites became permanent slaves. The men were arranged in shifts. While 10,000 men would be working in Lebanon for a month, the other 20,000 would be at home tilling the soil. 14. Adoniram (or, Adoram), who was placed over the corvee, came to be thoroughly detested (12:18). In addition, Solomon had 70,000 transporters and 80,000 stonecutters working in the mountains to the north. It appears that all the able-bodied males, except the members of the royal court, were engaged in some employment concerned with the construction of the Temple.

17. And they hewed out great stones . . . to lay the foundation (ASV). The term foundation refers both to the foundation of the Temple proper and to that of its related structures. 18. Stonesquarers. Gebalites, men from Gebal (modern Byblos, thirteen miles north of Beirut).

2) Construction of the Temple. 6:1-38.

a) Introduction. 6:1.

1. In the four hundred and eightieth year after the children of Israel were come out of . . . Egypt, in the fourth year of Solomon's reign. This introduction, as scholars agree, presents one of the most acute problems in OT chronology. The work proper upon the Temple is said to have begun 480 years after the Exodus. This brings up the thorny problem of the date of the Exodus. There are two main systems of dating this event, one assigning it an early date and the other giving it a late date. To employ round figures for the sake of convenience, the first system dates the departure from Egypt about 1440 B.C., while the second system dates it about 1250–1225 B.C., or nearly two centuries later. The earlier date is in substantial agreement with Gen 15:13; Ex 12:40,41, and Jud 11:26, where Jephthah indicates that Israel had been in Canaan 300 years.

Solomon ascended the throne about 963 B.C. The fourth year of his reign, in which he began to build the Temple, was probably about 959 B.C. This verse must be understood to favor the earlier dating of the Exodus. The city of Raamses (Ex 1:11), which the children of Israel are said to have built for Pharaoh, would then be considered a later name for the older city of Zoan or Avaris. The entrance of the patriarchs into Egypt would have been about 1870 B.C., a date which allows for the 400 years in Egypt. The Pharaoh of the Exodus may then be identified with Amenhotep II, who commenced his reign about 1447 B.C. There is evidence that his eldest brother died and did not succeed his father. It seems that, in the light of present knowledge, the early date is to be preferred. It should be pointed out that on this basis Garstang's date for the fall of Jericho, about 1400 B.C., becomes feasible. In the month Zif, which is the second month. Later called Iyyar, the month of flowers, our May.

b) General Plan and Measurements of the Temple. 6:2-10.

We here come to a rather detailed description of the erection of the Temple. 2. And . . . the length thereof was threescore cubits. In modern measurements this building was an estimated ninety feet long, thirty feet wide, and forty-five feet high. In addition, there was a porch which added another thirty feet to the length.

4. And for the house he made windows. The windows, or frames, present a slight difficulty. It is thought that they were unmovable in their construction and designed to let air and light filter through, but that they could not be lowered or raised, as our ordinary windows can be.

5. And against the wall of the house he built stories (floors, AV marg.). Hebrew yāṣiw'a; AV chambers. These are best understood as side rooms, or cells, which were reserved for the priests. 6. And the nethermost story (AV chamber) was five cubits broad. The lowest cell was seven and a half feet wide, the middle one nine feet, and the highest ten and a half feet. A triple-decker arrangement, with connecting stairs is here outlined.

7. And the house . . . was built of stone made ready at the quarry (ASV). The stones were prepared at the quarry so that no tool or iron would have to be used on the premises of construction. Solomon is known to have possessed a quarry on the outskirts of Jerusalem.

8. The door for the middle side-chambers was in the right side of the house (ASV). There was one main entrance to the side rooms of the priests.

c) God's Charge to Solomon. 6:11-13.

11. And the word of Jehovah came to Solomon (ASV). The Lord once more reaffirmed his conditional covenant with Solomon: namely, that if the king would obey God's commandments, God would confirm the Davidic covenant, and would honor Solomon's house by manifesting His own august presence there. That this promise was indeed conditional was demonstrated by the subsequent history of Judah at the time of the division of the kingdom (ch. 12). As for the Temple itself, it was destroyed in 586 B.C. by the Babylonian army (II Kgs 25:8,9).

d) The Finishing and Ornamentation of the Temple. 6:14-38.

14. So Solomon built the house, and finished it. The Temple was constructed of stone, overlaid with cedar wood. One of the critical barbs directed against the OT is the assertion that structures of such complexity were not known as early as the time of Solomon. However, archaeological findings at Megiddo have shed light upon the problem. Excavations by the University of Chicago have turned up fragments of mud brick together with wood ashes from the superstructure of a large building of the Solomonic era. A piece of charred wood from these remains was subjected to chemical analysis and found to be cedar. The evidence indicated that the superstructure was built with a half timber, half stone type of structure, similar to that of the courts of Solomon, which were made of rows of hewn stones and cedar beams. This type of construction is thought to be of Hittite origination (see J. P. Free, Archaeology and Bible History, p. 168).

The details which follow are to be viewed as further description of the house now regarded as completed.

16. And he built twenty cubits on the hinder part of the house (ASV). The rear room of the house is called here the oracle or the most holy place, commonly designated as the Holy of Holies. It was thirty feet (twenty cubits) long, thirty wide, and thirty high (6:20). Thus the entire Temple building contained two main rooms, (1) the Holy of Holies and (2) the Holy Place before it, sixty feet long (6:17), reminiscent of the arrangement of the Tabernacle. Sliding doors separating the two chambers replaced the former curtain (6:31,32).

18. And there was cedar on the house within (ASV). From the floor to the ceiling, the entire interior of the Temple was covered with cypress boards, so that the stone construction was hidden. The decoration of this section of the Temple, which consisted of cedar wood carved in gourds and open flower designs, must have been very beautiful.

19. And he prepared an oracle in the midst of the house within (ASV). Oracle is a technical designation for the ark of the covenant, and for the room or chamber containing it. 23. And in the oracle he made two cherubim of olive-wood (ASV). In this building Solomon carried out the general plan of the ancient Tabernacle. He introduced new figures of the cherubim overshadowing the ark. These cherubim were made of olive wood overlaid with gold and stood fifteen feet high. Their wings, each seven and a half feet long, formed an arch over the ark. The dimensions of the ark are not here recorded, but see Ex 25:10,11.

29. And he carved all the walls . . . with carved figures. The carvings represented angelic figures, palm trees, and open flowers.

In the exterior court were placed the large altar of burnt offering, the lavers, and the bronze sea.

31. And for . . . the oracle he made doors of olive-wood (ASV). These appear to have been sliding doors. They were decorated with the same carved figures as the walls. The entrance to the Temple proper was flanked with doorposts of olive wood and two doors decorated to match those between the Holy Place and the Holy of Holies.

37,38. These verses give the dates of the commencement of the house and of its completion, a period spanning seven years, from the fourth to the eleventh year of Solomon's reign. This was a comparatively short time for a building of such magnificent structure. It should be remembered that: (1) much of the preparation had been completed even before Solomon's time; (2) the building though highly ornate was comparatively small; (3) a huge personnel was employed in the task. The present writer sees no censure implied in the statement that it took Solomon thirteen years to build his own house, but simply a matter of fact.

3) Solomon's Palace and Other Buildings. 7:1-12.

1. But Solomon was building his own house thirteen years. The length of time consumed was nearly double the period involved in building the Temple. But note that no extensive preparations had been made for the palace, and no great urgency beset its construction. 2. He built . . . the house of the forest of Lebanon. At this point, the original Hebrew is somewhat obscure. The expression kol betho (all his house, v. 1) is capable of several renderings. It is possible to view Solomon's buildings, exclusive of the Temple, as one great structure. It is also possible to regard these buildings, including the Temple, as four distinct but closely connected structures. The four would be – (1) Solomon's Temple, (2) his private palace, (3) the Hall of Cedars (armory for defense), (4) the throne room for judgment. 10. The foundation was of costly stones. These stones measured from twelve to fifteen feet in length.

4) The Furnishings of the Temple. 7:13-51.

a) Hiram, the Workman from Tyre. 7:13,14.

13. And king Solomon sent and fetched Hiram out of Tyre. Hiram or Huram was half Jewish, having a Tyrian father, but a Jewish mother of the tribe of Naphtali. An apparent contradiction arises between this verse and II Chr 2:14, where Hiram's mother is said to have come from the tribe of Dan. The solution may be quite simple, for the one verse may refer to her place of birth and the other to her place of residence. Some commentators assume that there were two Hirams who were artisans, but this is not likely. 14. A worker in brass . . . filled with wisdom, and understanding. The brass should be rendered copper or bronze.

b) The Bronze Pillars. 7:15-22.

For he cast two pillars of brass (v. 15). Cf. II Chr 3:15-17; Jer 52:21-23. The pillars flanking the entrance to the court were fifty-two feet high, with the crown or capital measuring seven and one-half feet. They appear to have been for ornamentation only. Around the top each had decorative chains from which pomegranates were suspended. They were given the names, Jachin, He shall establish, and Boaz, In it is strength (v. 21). Some have discerned in these names a cryptogram for the words, "In the name of Jehovah will the king rejoice."

c) The Sea and the Laver. 7:23-39.

And he made a molten sea (v. 23). The sea, a huge, perfectly round, basin-like construction of bronze or copper, for the use of the priests, measured fifteen feet from brim to brim, seven and one-half feet high, and forty-five feet in circumference. It rested on twelve oxen, three facing in each direction of the compass. The sea and its lavers, it seems, were portable. Archaeological findings have helped to make understandable an otherwise difficult passage regarding the wheeled carriages for the ten lavers (7:38).

d) Hiram's Work Summarized. 7:40-47.

40. So Hiram made an end of doing all the work that he wrought for king Solomon in the house of Jehovah (ASV). The making of the bronze altar is not mentioned, although the existence of the altar is assumed in 8:64.

In addition to the lavers and the sea, Hiram's work included the lamp stands, the table of showbread, the pots and the shovels, and the other necessary equipment. No estimate is given of the weight of the bronze utilized.

5) The Dedication of the Temple. 8:1-66.

a) The Ark Brought to the Temple. 8:1-11.

1. Then Solomon assembled the elders of Israel, and all the heads of the tribes. The king was about to hold a service for the dedication of the Temple. As a prelude to this service, the ark was brought up to be enshrined in its new location. The actual dedicatory services were held approximately eleven months after the completion of the Temple. The position of the German OT scholar, Ewald, that the building was dedicated a month prior to its completion, is untenable. In the days previous, the abode of the ark had been the city of David, or Mount Zion (II Chr 6:5-7). The actual transfer of the ark was accompanied by a reverential but joyous procession.

5. Sacrificing sheep and oxen, that could not be . . . numbered for multitude. The act of sacrificing, in the theology of Israel, must be regarded not merely as a "penitential rite," but also as an act of thanksgiving and rejoicing. Such a great occasion seemed to call for a multiplicity of sacrifices. The season chosen for this event was Ethanim, the earlier name for the month Tishri, October-November.

6. And the priests brought in the ark of the covenant of the Lord unto his place. From David's first bitter experience in moving the ark, Solomon had learned God's proper order of procedure (II Sam 6:6ff.). He therefore entrusted the management of the ark to the divinely appointed stewards, the Levites. 9. There was nothing in the ark save the two tables of stone, which Moses put there at Horeb. In Heb 9:4 two other articles are mentioned as being in the ark, i.e., the pot of manna and Aaron's flowering rod. The seeming discrepancy between the OT (I Kgs 8:9) and the NT in this connection may arise from the fact that the Hebrews verse refers to an earlier period, perhaps to Mosaic times.

b) Solomon's Sermon. 8:12-21.

The Lord said that he would dwell in the thick darkness. The speaker focused his hearers' thoughts on the divine condescension. The point of the sermon, beyond all reasonable question, was that the all-powerful God of heaven was willing to take up His abode, in protective presence and power, in the house that Solomon had now erected for His glory and honor. Magnificent and glorious as the house was to be reckoned among men, Solomon rightly and humbly realized that it was as nothing compared with the glory of heaven, the dwelling place of God. 17. It was in the heart of David. The "princely preacher" was not unmindful of the debt of gratitude he owed his father.

c) Solomon's Prayer of Dedication. 8:22-61.

22. And Solomon stood before the altar of the Lord. In the similar account in II Chr 6:12-42, a note is added indicating that a special scaffold had been erected for this purpose. This prayer of Solomon may be regarded as containing seven rather distinct petitions. The king asked for: (1) God's continued presence and protection (I Kgs 8:25-30). (2) Condemnation of the wicked and vindication of the righteous (vv. 31,32). (3) Deliverance from the enemy upon confession of sin (v. 33). (4) Divine succor in days of calamity (vv. 35-40). (5) Divine help for the devout foreigner (vv. 41-43). (6) Victory in future battles (vv. 44,45). (7) National forgiveness (vv. 46-53).

In this prayer, the theology of Solomon rises to great heights. The critical allegation (based upon an evolutionary hypothesis) that the theology of Israel was not fully molded until the times of the "Second Isaiah," the "Great Unknown," is here by Solomon's words definitely confounded. The immanence, yet transcendence of the Deity is upheld. 23. Mercy. Hebrew ḥesed implies covenantal love, the kind of love that is expressed in the covenant between God and his people. Solomon prayed on this occasion for a continuance of this covenantal love. The terms of fulfillment of this love are set forth upon the grounds of obedience and faith. Through David's line, the promises culminated in his great son, the Lord Jesus Christ.

27. But will God indeed dwell on the earth? The account in II Chr 6:18 contains the variation dwell with men on the earth? This slight divergence is followed by the LXX. Although in this prayer the note of grace is by no means concealed, the emphasis is still upon the attribute of justice (v. 31ff.).

37. If there be in the land famine . . . pestilence, blasting, mildew. Blasting is blight. The conditions here envisioned are those caused by drought or war, or the invasion of locusts and caterpillars, plagues to which Biblical lands are ever prone. These afflictions are here viewed as intensified above the normal course of events as disciplinary measures. Solomon, however, recognized that the primary need was not the removal of these obnoxious creatures, but the remission of sin (v. 39).

41-43. Moreover, concerning the foreigner . . . Hear thou. Contrary to critical allegations, the people of Israel were commanded to love the foreigner (AV stranger), remembering that they were once foreigners in the land of Egypt. To be sure, the God-fearing foreigner, or proselyte, is here in mind.

47. Yet if they shall bethink themselves in the land whither they were carried captives. Here Solomon seems to have exercised the prophetic gift of insight into the future. Peering down the long corridors of time, he seemingly foresaw the Babylonian captivity centuries ahead. It is significant that the builder of the Temple was given a vision of its eventual downfall, which occurred in 586/585 B.C., when Nebuchadnezzar destroyed both city and Temple. Not merely is the captivity of the nation thus foreshadowed, but also its subsequent restoration.

54. And it was so, that when Solomon had made an end of praying. This and the ensuing verses bring us to the benediction. For some reason this brief, but important addition is omitted in the corresponding account in II Chronicles. The benediction, by which the people were subsequently dispersed, was already a very old feature of Hebrew liturgy (cf. Num 6:23-26).

d) Solomon's Sacrifices. 8:62-66.

62. And the king, and all Israel with him, offered sacrifice before the Lord. Although the figures given – 22,000 oxen and 120,000 sheep – for the number of sacrifices offered seem high, they are not to be regarded as impossible, especially when one considers the magnitude of this event.

65. So Solomon held the feast at that time, and all Israel with him (ASV). The feast of dedication was followed by the Feast of Tabernacles, a regularly scheduled event, which commemorated the years of wandering. Its observance on this occasion must have held special significance for Israel. From . . . Hamath unto the brook (AV river) of Egypt. Though the exact boundaries designated by this phrase are controversial, the sense is clear enough. The celebration was observed by people from all over the land, from north to south.

66. On the eighth day he sent the people away. Seven days had been consumed in spiritual service centering around the dedication and the following feast. The people now left for their farms and villages, with a new sense of the divine destiny of the kingdom upon them.

6) Ratification of the Davidic Covenant. 9:1-9.

1-3. The Lord appeared to Solomon the second time. This chapter is concerned with promise and warning. The Lord's first appearance to Solomon had occurred at Gibeon (cf. 3:4,5). 4. If thou wilt walk . . . in uprightness. Comparison of this passage with II Chr 7:12-22 reveals some interesting variations in the terms on which revival was conditioned: "And as for thee, if thou wilt walk before me." God held up the example of David, a godly father, as a bright and shining standard for the monarch. It is deeply significant that no great moral scandal is connected with the name or reign of Solomon, yet he never attained to the high spiritual character of his father, and at best died under the displeasure of the Lord. The promise is therefore to be viewed as conditional.

6. But if ye . . . turn from following me. The announced penalty was twofold: (1) the kingdom would cease; (2) the Temple, in which both king and people took such pardonable pride, would be leveled to the ground. The subsequent history of Israel fully established the validity of this prophetic warning. After the destruction of the Temple in 586/585 B.C., at the hand of the Babylonians, never again — neither at the time of the restoration, nor yet under Herod the Great — did it attain to its old glory. The cause of Israel's falling away was idolatry. It is noteworthy that Solomon, to whom the warning was given, was soon to be guilty of this very offense (11:4,5). 7. And Israel shall be a proverb and a byword among all people. This prophetic warning looks even beyond the captivity, and envisions the later rejection of Israel for her repudiation of Jesus the Messiah. 8. Hiss. Literally, whistle. The passer-by, observing the devastation of the Temple, would whistle in surprise and awe.

7) Summary of Solomon's Building Activities. 9:10-28.

a) Hiram's Dissatisfaction. 9:10-14.

12. And Hiram came out from Tyre to see the cities which Solomon had given him. In exchange for the material aid from Tyre, Solomon had agreed to give Hiram twenty cities in northern Galilee. It has been suggested that the Israelitish treasury was at this time short of funds and that therefore these cities were given in lieu of cash settlements. They comprised the area later known as "Galilee of the Gentiles" (Mt 4:15). 13. Cabul. Unproductive land or marsh land. 14. Sixscore talents of gold. An estimated $3,500,000. There is some ambiguity in this passage; evidently not all the details of the transaction between the two men are here recorded.

b) Solomon's Conscriptions. 9:15-28.

15. And Megiddo. Solomon's stables at Megiddo used to be regarded by 'liberal' scholars as purely fictional. But "the excavation of Megiddo by the University of Chicago has revealed a section of extensive stone stables from the level of Solomon's time" (Free, op. cit.). This stable was large enough, it is estimated, to house from 300 to 500 horses. And it accords very well with the details given here.

24. But Pharaoh's daughter came up out of the city of David. She was taken from Mount Zion because of her heathen religious background, lest she give offense to the pious people of Israel. Millo. Better, the Millo. Possibly, the fortification covering the breach David had made in the old wall of the Jebusites (cf. 11:27; II Sam 5:9).

25. And three times in a year did Solomon offer burnt offerings. Though Solomon's heart was not right in the sight of God, he nonetheless kept up the outward ceremony prescribed by Mosaic law (Ex 23:14-17). So he finished the house. This last clause may be regarded as a final sweeping statement of recapitulation.

26. And king Solomon made a navy of ships in Ezion-geber. Ezion-geber, Solomon's seaport, was situated on the eastern arm of the Red Sea, near Eloth, Israeli Eilat. Archaeology has again confirmed the historicity of the Biblical record in this regard. In 1938 and 1939, under the direction of Nelson Glueck, excavators unearthed a compact but important town at the site of Ezion-geber. Glueck discovered there the smelting furnaces that were used to produce the copper for Solomon's trade. The city of Ezion-geber has often been styled the "Pittsburgh" of Biblical times. 28. And they came to Ophir. Solomon's merchant marine extended its navigation as far as Ophir. This is generally conceded to have been in southwestern Arabia, but some scholars, on the basis of the cargo mentioned in 10:22, locate it in India.

D. Golden Age of Solomon. 10:1-29.

1) The Visit of the Queen of Sheba. 10:1-13.

1. And when the queen of Sheba heard of the fame of Solomon. The queen of Sheba has been identified as the ruler of the Sabeans (Job 1:15), who inhabited Arabia Felix, or the greater part of the territory of the Yemen. In Biblical times it was considered royal sport for rulers with a reputation to test each other's abilities. The primary purpose of the queen's visit was to find out whether Solomon's pretensions to wisdom were equaled by his performance. All claims that she came from Ethiopia should be regarded as purely legendary. 2. And she came to Jerusalem with a very great train. In conformity with ancient (and present) diplomatic protocol, the queen presented to the ruler of Israel costly gifts. 3. And Solomon told her all her questions. Her curiosity was in no way disappointed. The actual wisdom of Solomon fully matched his pre-established reputation. The Sabean people over whom the queen ruled were governed by priest-kings (Ps 72:10). No doubt the queen took back to her native land glowing reports of Solomon's wisdom.

6. And she said . . . It was a true report that I heard. The queen confessed that she had thought the reports greatly exaggerated. Now she admitted that the half had not been told to her. Her astonishment arose not only from what she heard from the king's lips, but from what she saw with her own eyes. 9. Blessed be Jehovah thy God, who delighted in thee (ASV). Considering the speaker, this statement was not inconsistent with polytheism. The queen was now willing to admit the existence of the God of Israel on the level of other deities. To press this to mean that she had become a proselyte to the Hebrew faith would be claiming too much (Mt 12:42). 10. And she gave the king an hundred and twenty talents of gold. An estimated $3,500,000, a costly gift from an opulent queen! This was in addition to the precious stones and spices.

11. Moreover, the fleet of Hiram . . . brought gold from Ophir (RSV). The insertion relative to Hiram at this point indicates that at this time Solomon negotiated a trade agreement with the Tyrians in the interest of his visitor.

13. And king Solomon gave unto the queen of Sheba all her desire. The queen after being "wined and dined" and given many gifts, now turned homeward. No doubt the queen had reason to feel that her diplomatic mission had been highly successful.

2) The Glory and Power of Solomon's Empire. 10:14-29.

18-20. Moreover the king made a great throne of ivory, and overlaid it with the best gold. Throne. A high bench, or chair, denoting royalty. Solomon's throne was of special proportions. It was approached by means of six steps, flanked with twelve lions, six on either side, presumably representing the twelve tribes. The throne was a symbol of justice, rulership, and judgment. 19. The Hebrew words for round (AV, ASV) and calf (RSV) are formed from the same consonants; only their vowel markings are different. Those who translate calf in this verse, take the word to signify that there was a figure of a calf behind the throne. If this is true, we may see the ugly figure of calf worship casting its shadow across the theism of Israel (12:28ff.).

Verses 23-29 constitute a recapitulation of Solomon's wealth and wisdom. So king Solomon exceeded all the kings of the earth for riches and for wisdom (v. 23). The court of Solomon was ever open to receive both native and foreign admirers. The reputed wisdom of Solomon, plus the grandeur of his public buildings, including the Temple, inevitably attracted many visitors. And Solomon gathered together chariots and horsemen (v. 26). It has been said that little things portray the true character of a man more certainly than great ones. A casual reader might see little significance in the king's assembling horses. However, the Mosaic law, in anticipation of the monarchy, particularly forbade the king of Israel to amass horses from Egypt (Deut 17:16). The fact that Egypt has not been known for breeding horses presents some difficulty here. The horses may have been bred in Cilicia, and Egypt may have been the trader. The Hittites and Syrians also supplied the market. Some take the Hebrew word translated "Egypt" as, in reality, a place in Cilicia – Musr.

E. Solomon's Apostasy, Decline, and Death. 11:1-43.

1) Solomon's Unfaithfulness to God. 11:1-13.

1. But king Solomon loved many foreign women. He disobeyed the Mosaic regulations for the king prophetically viewed in the Deuteronomic code in regard to the multiplication of horses (Deut 17:16), of foreign women (17:17), and of gold (17:17). Although the three sins of this monarch, taken separately or even weighed together, may not be nearly as glaring as the one great sin of his father, yet, they were sins that drew his heart away from the living God. Furthermore, there is no written indication that he ever repented of them. 2. For surely they will turn away your heart after their gods. The reason given for the prohibition of mixed marriages was that they would lead to idolatry, into which Solomon was about to fall. For a great ruler to maintain seven hundred wives and three hundred concubines was quite in keeping with the fashion of typical Oriental courts. The more dwellers in the harem, the greater the ruler. Perhaps Solomon's great sin was not so much sexuality as it was simply the desire to be thought great.

4. For it came to pass, when Solomon was old. We see here the sad picture of Solomon's forsaking God and turning to idolatry to please his pagan wives. 5. Ashtoreth. The goddess of the Zidonians, a Canaanite deity connected with the fertility cult. The name is cognate with the Babylonian Ishtar, the goddess of sexual love, maternity, and fertility (Unger, op. cit.). This goddess is among the best known of the fertility cult goddesses. Milcom the abomination. Another form of Malcham, sometimes identified with Molech or Moloch, the chief god of Moab and Ammon. So ensnared in the practice of idolatry did Solomon become that he built a high place for this evil deity. The worship of Molech was stringently prohibited by law (Lev 18:21; 20:1-5). Molech demanded the rite of human sacrifice, especially of little children. His worship was utterly desecrated by the good king Josiah. 6. And Solomon did that which was evil. The particular evil of idolatry; the general evils of greed, love of luxury, and oppression of his people. 7. Then did Solomon build an high place for Chemosh. The national deity of the Moabites. Chemosh was "twin brother" to Moloch of the Ammonites — equally cruel, licentious, and vulgar in his demands. The mount (AV hill) that is before Jerusalem. Identified tentatively as the Mount of Olives.

9-13. And the Lord was angry with Solomon, because his heart was turned. We now hasten toward the division of the kingdom. God announced to Solomon the extent of the divine chastisement. The kingdom was to be rent and divided; Israel would lose her political unity. Solomon's sun, which had risen in such splendor, was now about to set behind the darkest clouds. However, David was still to have a lamp in Israel (cf. v. 36). Not yet would the kingdom be totally taken away.

2) Adversaries and Impending Division. 11:14-40.

14-28. And Jehovah raised up an adversary unto Solomon (ASV). Although the division of the kingdom did not occur until after the king's death, Solomon was to experience punishments, as God, in His displeasure, raised up external and internal enemies against him. Three strong adversaries arose:

(1) Hadad, a prince of the royal house of Edom, had escaped Joab's massacre and fled with some of his followers to Egypt, where he was treated kindly by the Pharaoh. Now, apparently for no valid reason but through the providential leading of God, he requested and obtained permission from Pharaoh to return home. Back in Israel, he proved to be a thorn in the side of Solomon (vv. 14-22).

(2) Rezon of Damascus, the son of Eliada, after the defeat of his master, Hadadezer (II Sam 8:3-8,10), became a freebooter with a party of bandits that harassed the countryside. Shortly after David's death he seized the city of Damascus, no doubt by a surprise attack. From this position Solomon could not expel him. Little by little Rezon became an increasing threat as he dominated the trade routes to the East (vv. 23-25).

(3) Jeroboam, the son of Nebat, of the tribe of Ephraim, became the internal adversary of Solomon. A young man of considerable ability and talent, he soon attracted the attention of the king (v. 28), who made him overseer of his public works.

29. And it came to pass . . . that the prophet Ahijah the Shilonite found him. On leaving Jerusalem one day, the young Jeroboam was suddenly accosted by Ahijah, the prophet (first introduced here), who symbolically made known to him his future. The prophet took hold of the new garment he himself was wearing and tore it into twelve pieces. Giving the young man ten pieces and retaining two, he announced that God was about to rend the kingdom of Solomon similarly, giving ten tribes to Jeroboam and leaving only two for the house of David.

31. And he said to Jeroboam, Take thee ten pieces. In the light of prophecy, Jeroboam was already viewed as the leader of the new state of Israel formed in disciplinary judgment for Solomon's sins. 32. But he shall have one tribe for my servant David's sake. The pronoun "he" doubtless refers to the house of Solomon, i.e., Rehoboam and his descendants. The one tribe, Benjamin, faithfully adhered to the house of David. The two tribes are viewed as one; hence, in reality, no tribe is missing here. 33. Because that they have foresaken me, and have worshipped Ashtoreth . . . Chemosh . . . Milcom. A specific reason given for the impending division is that they had fallen into idolatry – a sin, which, despite the severity of God's judgment, continued to plague both kingdoms until they went into captivity.

34. Howbeit I will not take the whole kingdom out of his hand. Despite the unfaithfulness of men, God was faithful in preserving the seed of David "until he come whose right it is; and I [God] will give it him" (Ezk 21:27; Mt 1:1; Rom 1:3). 36. And unto his son will I give one tribe, that David my servant may have a light. Literally, that there may be a light to my servant David. God's purpose would be carried out despite Solomon's disobedience. The house of David would be disciplined but not destroyed. Solomon indeed had proved to be a sinner; yet through the line of David, Christ, the Saviour of sinners, should appear.

38. And it shall be, if thou wilt hearken. Not only did God pledge himself to be faithful to the house of David, but he also promised, conditionally, to extend his mercies to Jeroboam – I will . . . build thee a sure house, as I built for David. How different might have been the personal history of Jeroboam, as well as the subsequent history of his kingdom, if he had obeyed the Lord's voice! This man, however, gained the unenviable epithet, "who caused Israel to sin." Though the prophecy of Ahijah was not immediately fulfilled, all that he foretold came to pass in due time.

40. Solomon sought therefore to kill Jeroboam. Though the prophetic announcement was made in secret, it seems that Jeroboam could not wait for God's time but began to plot against Solomon. The king, therefore, sought to slay him on the ground of supposed treachery. Jeroboam was forced to flee to Shishak (Sheshonk) of Egypt until the death of Solomon.

3) Solomon's Decease. 11:41-43.

41. The rest of the acts of Solomon. The book of the acts of Solomon mentioned here is quite evidently a manuscript no longer extant, to which the author of the book of Kings had access. Thus we are led to the rather tragic end of a life once so promising. 42. And the time that Solomon reigned . . . was forty years. The actual time of Solomon's reign was forty-two years, though part of this must be reckoned as the time of his coregency with David.

43. And Rehoboam his son reigned in his stead. Rehoboam reigned over all Israel a very short time. The seeds of division planted in the time of Solomon now came to full bloom.

II. The Divided Kingdom, from Rehoboam to the Fall of Israel. I Kgs 12:1–II Kgs 17:41.

A. Early Antagonism Between Israel and Judah, from Jeroboam to Omri. 12:1–16:28.

1) The Rupture of the Kingdom. 12:1-33.

a) The Petition of the Malcontents. 12:1-20.

The immediate natural cause for the impending disruption of the kingdom was the heavy taxation brought about through the vast expenditures of Solomon (cf. II Chr 10). The unseen cause was the divine discipline.

1. And Rehoboam went to Shechem: for all Israel were come to Shechem to make him king. Rehoboam, who is the only son of Solomon mentioned in Scripture, had doubtless been appointed by his father to succeed him. Shechem. A town in Ephraim, rather than the capital city, was the rallying point.

2. When Jeroboam . . . heard it, he returned out of Egypt. No doubt it was through spies that Jeroboam, who was in exile (11:40), heard of the impending coronation of Rehoboam. Thereupon, he hastily returned to Israel to bid for the kingdom. Upon his arrival, the people made him their spokesman to voice their varied and many grievances. The people requested the new king to ease their burdens. 4. Thy father made our yoke grievous. No doubt this is an abridgment of the people's petition, giving its essence. The petition asked primarily for a lightening of the economic load, but perhaps it also had in view political and social oppression.

5. And he said unto them, Depart yet for three days. The king's request that he be allowed time to think over their petition seemed reasonable. From that which follows, however, it seems that the verdict was already determined. 6. And king Rehoboam consulted with the old men. The elders of the court advised Rehoboam to speak in the language of diplomacy, to admit the validity of the complaints and to promise reformation in due time.

8. But he forsook the counsel of the old men...and consulted with the young men. The advice of Rehoboam's young counselors was exactly the reverse of that proposed by the older, wiser men. 10. Thus shalt thou speak unto this people. Their advice to him was to assume a threatening, undiplomatic attitude, to show the people that he knew of the plottings behind his back, and to warn them that each complaint would be regarded as a treacherous act.

14. Whips . . . scorpions. A "whip" was a plain leather strap. A "scorpion" was a whip with barbed points or tips of steel imbedded in it, used in the castigation of slaves. Hence the speech was highly insulting. Not only did Rehoboam threaten the people with heavier burdens than they had known before, but he indicated that he was about to treat them as a nation of slaves. It should be said in favor of Rehoboam that his treatment of those who remained faithful to the Davidic house was much more moderate than the speech suggests. This attitude, however, the people could not foresee, and so the rift became unbridgeable. 15. So the king hearkened not unto the people. The hidden motif is given in the following clause: For it was a thing brought about of Jehovah (ASV). The words of the prophet Ahijah concerning the division of the kingdom must be fulfilled. The decrees of God, though originated in eternity, are culminated in history.

16. What portion have we in David? Thus the suzerainty of the Davidic house was repudiated by the majority of Israel. With these words, they turned their backs on their heritage to seek out new paths with their newly chosen leader, Jeroboam, the son of Nebat.

17. But as for the children of Israel which dwelt in the cities of Judah, Rehoboam reigned over them. In fulfillment of God's promise that David would "have a light alway . . . in Jerusalem" (11:36, AV), the southern Hebrews that dwelt in Judea remained faithful, while the northern ones went their separate way. Rehoboam's attempt to exercise dictatorial powers had failed.

18. Then king Rehoboam sent Adoram . . . and all Israel stoned him to death. Not fully realizing that the break between the two nations was final and decisive, Rehoboam unwisely sent his officer, Adoram, to Israel to conscript labor. The reaction of Jeroboam's people was swift and terrible: they killed the luckless overseer. King Rehoboam made haste to mount his chariot (RSV). It seems that Rehoboam himself narrowly escaped the same fate.

b) Civil War Averted. 12:21-24.

Rehoboam . . . assembled all . . . which were warriors, to fight (v. 21). Rehoboam's thought was to invade the northern tribes to bring them back into subjection to his rule. Shemaiah, the prophet, intervened with a message from God urging him not to go to war and declaring that such a course would only end in his defeat. To his credit, in this instance, he obeyed the voice of the Lord and disbanded the army.

c) Northern Kingdom Set Up. 12:25–32.

25. Then Jeroboam built Shechem in the hill-country of Ephraim (ASV). In this passage we discover what preliminary steps Jeroboam took to establish his new kingdom. He chose Shechem for his capital. In reality, three capitals arose in the north – first Shechem, then Tirzah, and later Samaria, which eventually became the permanent capital.

26. And Jeroboam said in his heart, Now shall the kingdom return to the house of David. This may be viewed as Jeroboam's first act of infidelity to Jehovah. He had already been given assurance that the Lord would build him a sure house. But because he did not trust God's word, he resorted to this measure of religious apostasy – the religious as well as political separation of the two kingdoms. 28. Whereupon the king took counsel, and made two calves of gold. Two calves (bulls of gold), replacing the cherubim of the mercy seat. Though Jeroboam may not have intended to establish actual idolatry, he thus set the general tenor of spiritual declension. W. F. Albright (From the Stone Age to Christianity, p. 299) builds a good case, on archaeological grounds, in support of the theory that the golden bulls were not really images of Jehovah, but formed the visible pedestal upon which the invisible god of Israel stood. But even such use of images was a throwback to the idolatry of the Canaanites or of Egypt, and it was roundly condemned by the prophets Hosea and Amos (Hos 8:5,6; 13:2,3). 30. And this thing became a sin. Even though it might be insisted, for the sake of the argument, that Jeroboam erected these calves in honor of Jehovah, it is still evident that as far as the people were concerned, the images rapidly became idols.

31. And he made houses of high places, and made priests from among all the people (ASV). The second step which Jeroboam took to weaken the religious ties between northern and southern Israel was to infiltrate non-Levites into the priesthood. The Mosaic law specified that none should attend holy ordinances except men from this tribe.

32. And Jeroboam ordained a feast in the eighth month. This was actually the Feast of Tabernacles, which according to the Law was to be held in the seventh month (Lev 23:24ff.), Jeroboam changed the time to the eighth month. These three measures weakened the ties between the tribes and widened the gulf religiously.

2) The Reign of Jeroboam I, and His Death. 13:1–14:20.

a) The Divine Judgment Pronounced. 13:1-10.

1. And, behold, there came a man of God out of Judah. An unnamed prophet, bearing the simple designation, a man of God, came from Judah to Bethel, one of the two centers of Jeroboam's calf worship, to administer a stinging rebuke and to announce doom. 2. Behold, a child shall be born unto the house of David, Josiah by name. This is one of the most remarkable instances in the OT of prophecy demonstrating God's omniscience. This forecast is on a level with the Isaianic prophecy regarding Cyrus (Isa 45:1ff.). Because this forecast is so remarkable, 'liberal' Biblical critics have sought to reduce it to an ad hoc status. However, to regard this as a historical insertion, coming to pass after the day of King Josiah, is utterly to fail to understand the true genius of prophecy. For the remarkable fulfillment of this prediction see II Kgs 23:15-20. 3. And he gave a sign. The rending of the altar may be regarded as confirmation of the prophetic utterance. It is apparent that there is an immediate as well as a long range manifestation of the divine displeasure.

4. When the king heard the saying . . . he . . . put forth his hand (ASV). Thoroughly angered, Jeroboam stretched out his hand to order the prophet's arrest. Before the wicked order could be carried out, however, the king's hand was withered (Heb., dried), that is to say, paralyzed to the extent that he could not draw it in again. The vengeful king now cried for mercy (v. 6). In answer to the prophet's prayer, Jeroboam's hand was restored.

7. Come home with me. Jeroboam's invitation may have been designed to serve a twofold purpose: it may have been in the nature of an apology for attempting arrest; and it may have been a device for warding off or at least softening the judgment pronounced upon the royal household. 8. If thou wilt give me half thine house, I will not go in with thee. True to his divine instructions, the prophet declined on the ground that it had been expressly forbidden him to eat bread or to drink water in Bethel. Such social intercourse might well have created the impression in the minds of the people that the judgment pronounced by the prophet had either been averted or at least mitigated. 10. So he went another way. The prophet now sought his homeward way. So far he had acted in strict obedience to the divine command.

b) Seduction of the Man of God by the Old Prophet. 13:11-32.

11-14. Now there dwelt an old prophet in Beth-el. What the king, with all his riches, fame, and glory, could not accomplish in the life of the man of God, a believer obviously not having "the mind of the Spirit," was now able to accomplish. The sons of the old prophet at Bethel told their father about the prophecy that had been made against Jeroboam. Acting upon their report, the old prophet went forth to seek the man of God, and he found him under the oak or terebinth tree.

15. Come home with me, and eat bread. The Oriental is known for his hospitality to a much more marked degree than is his Occidental brother. Besides wishing to show hospitality, perhaps the old prophet wanted to learn more exactly about this wonderful and unusual prophecy. 16. I may not return with thee, nor go in with thee. As the prophet had declined Jeroboam's invitation, so now he at first refused the invitation of his fellow prophet on the ground of God's prohibition (v. 17).

18. I am a prophet also as thou art; and an angel spake unto me. . . . But he lied unto him. The prophet from Bethel pretended that he had received divine orders countermanding those previously given the younger prophet. We do not know why he lied. 19. So he went back with him. He disobeyed the divine command. A practical lesson to be learned is that the advice of other men, no matter if they are Christian friends, should not be substituted for the clear call of duty within our own hearts.

20. And it came to pass, as they sat at the table. The prophet who had been willing to assume the role of the tempter, now, by God's urgency, assumed the more difficult role of the announcer of punishment. The prophet's penalty for disobedience was to be death. This prophecy came to pass almost immediately.

24. And when he was gone, a lion met him by the way. Lions still prowled the forest around Bethel and once in a while accosted an unwary traveler. However, in order that it might be known that this was indeed a supernatural judgment and not simply an unfortunate accident, the lion, after slaying the prophet, did not harm or tear his body, nor did he even kill the meek donkey upon which the prophet had been riding, but calmly stood at attention, as if by divine arrest. 26. It is the man of God, who was disobedient unto . . . the Lord. Though the lying prophet suffered no corporeal punishment, his pangs of conscience must have been severe when he realized that he had brought about the death of a man by urging him to pursue a course of disobedience.

28. And he went and found his body cast in the way. The supernatural character of the story is apparent throughout. We are accustomed to think of miracles being acts or tokens of great healing and benefit, but we must remember that there are miracles of discipline as well. 29-32. And the prophet took up the body of the man of God. The corpse of the disobedient prophet was not to be left uncared for but given honorable burial. The last tribute that could possibly be paid by one prophet of God to another was thus touchingly performed. With bitter lamentations the old prophet from Bethel laid his brother prophet to rest in his grave. Perhaps a twofold source of grief may be seen here: (1) He had contributed to the death of the first prophet, though perhaps quite unwittingly. (2) At that time the nation could ill afford to sacrifice any of its godly men. The old prophet, with bowed head, lamented not only the sorrowful fate of his brother prophet, but also the miserable state of the divided kingdom as a whole. He acknowledged that the words spoken by the deceased prophet would be fulfilled in due season.

c) Jeroboam's Persistence in Evil. 13:33,34.

33. After this thing Jeroboam returned not from his evil way. These strange, portentous happenings, terrible as they were, did not deter the king from pursuing the wicked ways he had chosen. He repeated rather than repented of the three initial sins which at the beginning began to draw the northern kingdom down the pathway of spiritual declension. 34. And this thing became sin unto the house of Jeroboam, even to cut it off. The root spiritual cause of the declension and final fall of the house of Jeroboam is given here. Various political and sociological conditions, and even international relations, might be cited as reasons for the destruction of Jeroboam's line. Nevertheless, the destruction stemmed directly from the king's disobedience to the command of the holy God. Therefore, we judge those scholars to be wrong who excuse, if not defend, Jeroboam's calf worship on the ground that he was simply worshiping the true God of Israel in another fashion.

d) Further Doom and Woes Pronounced Against Jeroboam. 14:1-14.

1. At that time Abijah the son of Jeroboam fell sick. This Abijah should not be confused with Rehoboam's son of the same name, who succeeded his father on the throne of Judah. This sickness of the child was not one of the many misfortunes of life to which all human beings are prone, but rather a disciplinary act of God. Jeroboam, first king of the northern union, had failed to hear God's "more tender solicitations"; so now the Lord struck directly at his most precious possession, his young son. 2. And Jeroboam said to his wife, Arise, I pray thee, and disguise thyself. With these words the writer introduces the king's plot to deceive the prophet Ahijah and yet learn the future. Jeroboam reasoned that if the prophet perceived the identity of the inquirer, he would be sure to deliver a message of judgment and doom. Shiloh. The former central sanctuary and previous dwelling place of the ark. The town had now become the dwelling place of Ahijah, the prophet, who originally had predicted Jeroboam's rise to power (I Kgs 11:26-40).

4. But Ahijah could not see; for his eyes were set by reason of his age. The prophet, now deprived of his sight through extreme age, yet kept his ears attuned to the voice of God, ready to receive messages from the outer world. 5. Behold, the wife of Jeroboam cometh to inquire (ASV). The ungodly queen thought within herself that the ruse would be quite adequate to deceive the prophet. She had no idea that the "God before whom all things are open" had already gone before her to appraise his servant of her coming and of the message he was to deliver to her.

6. When Ahijah heard the sound of her feet . . . he said, Come in, thou wife of Jeroboam. Disguised, discovered, and doomed. Not only the veil upon her face, but the draperies on her heart were penetrated. Her most wicked intentions as well as her nature were now laid bare. Hypocrisy and sham will always meet with the severe displeasure and judgment of our Lord. 7. Go, tell Jeroboam, Thus saith the Lord God of Israel. Ahijah, with bold strokes, now proceeded to tell of the king's anointing, of God's conditional promise, of His grace in placing Jeroboam over the tribes of the north. He then sharply reminded Jeroboam, through his wife, of his apostasy and serious idolatry, culminating in the worship of the golden calves. Therefore, he must expect punishment.

10. Therefore . . . I will bring evil upon the house of Jeroboam . . . every manchild (ASV). The kingdom of Israel would be depopulated of its male children either by captivity or by death. 11. Him that dieth. Their bodies were to be devoured by dogs and wild birds of prey – the worst disgrace that could befall a Semite. 12. When thy feet enter into the city, the child shall die. Thus doom was pronounced in the most awesome way against Jeroboam's household. Even the most calloused in heart are touched by the death of a little child, especially of one in line for the throne. But the decree was to be put into effect speedily. Jeroboam's wife would never again see her son alive. He was to lie still in death as her feet passed over the threshold of the capital city. In contradistinction to his father, he would be given honorable burial.

e) The Captivity Foreseen. 14:15-19.

15. For Jehovah will smite Israel . . . and will scatter them beyond the River (ASV). This is a long-range prediction of the captivity yet to come. When Samaria fell in 722 B.C., the northern kingdom experienced this bitter fate at the hands of the Assyrians. And when Jerusalem fell in 586/585 B.C., the southern kingdom underwent deportation at the hands of the Babylonians. The ground given for such chastisement was Israel's incurable idolatry.

17,18. And Jeroboam's wife arose . . . and came to Tirzah. These verses recount the tragic sequel to Ahijah's prediction. As the prophet had foretold, the child much loved by the populace at large was wept and mourned as his body was laid in the tomb.

f) Jeroboam's Continued Apostasy and His Death. 14:20.

And he slept with his fathers. For supplementary facts the reader is referred to the account in II Chr 13:15-20. However, this reference may be regarded as a convention or formality, since the accounts in I Kings concerning Jeroboam are much fuller than those in Chronicles.

3) Judah under Rehoboam, Abijam, and Asa. 14:21—15:24.

a) Rehoboam of Judah. 14:21-24.

21,22. And Rehoboam the son of Solomon reigned in Judah. The historical scene now shifts toward the south as the fortunes of the house of David are delineated. Rehoboam reigned one year as co-regent with his father and sixteen years in his own right. Though his reign was free from the worship of the golden calves, yet spiritual declension and moral delinquency characterized its downward course.

Idolatry, and that in gross form, had become the order of the day. 23. High places (Heb. bāmôt). Places of elevation which though not necessarily idolatrous in character, readily yielded themselves to this type of worship. The pillars (Heb. maṣṣēbôt; AV, images). Stones placed on end representing the male counterpart of the Canaanitic deity. The Asherim were poles representing the female side of the deity. Compare the groves of the AV. The licentious worship of Canaan infiltrated the worship of Judea. 24. And there were also sodomites in the land. Thus, the whole ugly picture of idolatry is now filled in. Sodomites. Male prostitutes, reserved for sexual purposes in connection with religious worship. As in the land of Canaan, the Israelites had failed to exterminate this idolatrous practice. Now it had become a snare and a trap to them.

b) The Invasion of Shishak. 14:25-28.

25. In the fifth year of king Rehoboam . . . Shishak king of Egypt came up against Jerusalem. Shishak. Sheshonk of Egyptian records (945–924 B.C.), the founder of the Twenty-second Dynasty. This was the first serious foreign invasion of Israelite territory since the days of Saul. In the temple of Karnak, in a relief picturing the victory of Egypt over Judah, Shishak boasts of the trouble he made for the Judean king. A briefer, more sober account is given in the Bible, wherein it is honestly admitted that Shishak despoiled the beautiful Temple of Solomon before he agreed not to pillage Jerusalem fully.

c) Death of Rehoboam. 14:29-31.

29. The rest of the acts of Rehoboam, and all that he did. Once more the reader is referred to the fuller account in II Chr 12:13-16. This reign had been characterized by tension and frequent outbreaking of warfare between the divided tribes, once so strongly united under one glorious head, David.

d) Abijam of Judah. 15:1-8.

1. Now in the eighteenth year of king Jeroboam . . . began Abijam to reign over Judah (ASV). He reigned three years, 913–911 B.C. 2. And his mother's name was Maachah, the daughter of Abishalom. Maachah was the queen mother. Abishalom. The longer form for Absalom. 3. And he walked in all the sins of his father, which he had done before him. For a fuller account of the reign of Abijam, see II Chr 13:1-22. Abijam (or Abijah) fashioned his life after Rehoboam's ungodly and wicked example. His heart was not perfect. An expression used to indicate that Abijam was sadly lacking in devotion and fidelity toward God.

4. Nevertheless for David's sake. Verses 4 and 5 set forth God's kindness and fidelity. Despite the continued iniquity of Abijam, the Lord did not withdraw his mercy from these people of Judah. For the meaning of the lamp, see 11:36.

6. And there was war between Rehoboam and Jeroboam. Warfare continued to plague and scourge the divided kingdom. 7. Now the rest of the acts of Abijam. A somewhat more pious portrait of Abijam is given in II Chronicles. Particularly, in the oration Abijam made against Jeroboam, he seems to evidence some faith in Jehovah. Perhaps Abijam, like many others, could preach better than he could practice.

e) Asa and His Reforms. 15:9-15.

It is heart-warming and refreshing to observe the young king breaking away from the evil tradition of the two preceding kings and determining to do what was right in the eyes of the Lord, as did David his 'father.'

9,10. In the twentieth year of Jeroboam . . . reigned Asa over Judah. And his mother's name was Maachah. Abijam and Asa may have been brothers. It is more likely that we should understand mother to mean "grandmother" here, in accordance with Semitic usage.

11-15. And Asa did that which was right. Having set his heart on following God's will, Asa first eradicated idolatrous practices and personnel from the kingdom. Especially, he removed the sodomites (14:24). Asa did not limit his reform to strangers, but extended it into his own family. He even removed Maachah from the position of queen, because she had introduced idolatry into the land. The young king next hewed down his grandmother's graven images and burned them by the brook Kidron. This was the swiftly flowing winter brook to the northeast of Jerusalem, the "Cedron" (AV), which Jesus crossed on the night of his agony in Gethsemane (Jn 18:1).

f) War with Baasha of Israel. 15:16-22.

16. And there was war between Asa and Baasha. Baasha declared war upon his neighbors. The threatening, hostile gesture Baasha made was to fortify Ramah, a stronghold four or five miles north of Jerusalem. This was regarded as a very warlike act.

18. Then Asa took all the silver and the gold that were left in the treasures of the house of the Lord. By these means and with this gift, Asa sought the favor of Ben-hadad of Syria. Ben-hadad I, it seems, assumed the throne of Syria in 890 B.C. Later, King Ahab went to war against Ben-hadad. 20. And Ben-hadad hearkened unto king Asa, and sent the captains of his armies against the cities of Israel (ASV). The cities here mentioned, which Ben-hadad took, were towns in the general environs of the Sea of Galilee.

21. And it came to pass, when Baasha heard thereof, that he left off building of Ramah. Frightened by the news of the coming of powerful Syrian assistance to Asa, Baasha retired to his own capital city of Tirzah. 22. And king Asa built with them Geba . . . and Mizpah. Geba of Benjamin is identified with Jeba', near Mikmash. Asa took the material Baasha had collected, ostensibly for defense against him, and utilized it for a new fortress of his own.

g) Death of Asa. 15:23,24. And Asa slept with his fathers, and was buried . . . and Jehoshaphat his son reigned in his stead. The good Asa was followed by his godly son, Jehoshaphat (873–848), who had been co-regent with him for three years.

4) Israel under Nadab, Baasha, Elah, Zimri, and Omri. 15:25–16:28.

a) Nadab of Israel. 15:25,26.

25. And Nadab . . . began to reign over Israel. The historian here picks up an incident that was occurring in the north. Nadab (910–909), the wicked son of Jeroboam, son of Nebat, came to the throne. It must be remembered that while some eight dynasties were succeeding each other in northern Israel, to the south in Judah but one dynasty, the Davidic house, held sway.

26. And he (Nadab) did that which was evil in the sight of the Lord. Nadab had a short reign, variously estimated as lasting from one to one and a half years.

b) Baasha's Conspiracy and Reign. 15:27–16:7.

27. And Baasha the son of Ahijah, of the house of Issachar, conspired against him. The dynasty of the house of Jeroboam was coming to an inglorious end, while Baasha's dynasty, which was likewise to be brief, was coming to the fore. 29. As soon as he was king, he smote all the house of Jeroboam . . . even as Ahijah the prophet had predicted. Thoroughly, ruthlessly, Baasha proceeded to destroy Nadab's house. The judgment of God was thus speedily executed against the wicked dynasty of Israel. Nevertheless, Baasha paid no heed to the precepts and law of God, but walked in the same evil way as did those before him. Civil conflict continued between the two nations (v. 32).

34. And he did evil in the sight of the Lord, and walked in the way of Jeroboam. Though Baasha had extirpated the house of Jeroboam, he most unfortunately had not abolished his sins, either from the kingdom in general or from his own life in particular.

16:1. Then the word of the Lord came to Jehu the son of Hanani against Baasha, saying. Though the Northern Kingdom was unfaithful to the Lord God of Israel, God still extended mercy to her by warning her of coming judgment. 2. Forasmuch as I exalted thee out of the dust, and made thee prince over my people. Baasha was to be properly chastised. The reason for this was that, although chosen of God to rule over His people Israel, he had lightly esteemed his sacred vocation. He had clung to the sins of Jeroboam, the son of Nebat, who "made Israel to sin." 3. Behold, I will utterly sweep away Baasha and his house (ASV). A similar threat had been made against the house of Jeroboam by the prophet Ahijah (14:10,11). As Baasha had chosen to share in the iniquity of the house of Jeroboam, so likewise was he to share in the severe penalty thereof, even to being devoured by dogs.

6. So Baasha slept with his fathers. The reign of Baasha was brought to an ignoble end, and Baasha was succeeded by his son Elah. We may consider Elah but a duplicate of his father. On the basis of verse 7 it appears that the prophetic ministry of Jehu continued throughout Elah's reign. Blessed is the king whose prophet is his counselor, but cursed is he who heeds not his prophet.

c) Elah of Israel. 16:8-10.

8. In the twenty and sixth year of Asa king of Judah began Elah the son of Baasha to reign. Elah's reign (886–885 B.C.), a brief and unhappy one, lasted just one year and ended in a violent death. Zimri, one of the captains of Elah's own guard, conspired against him and slew him.

9. Now he was in Tirzah, drinking himself drunk in the house of Arza. Elah and Belshazzar had at least this in common: they were both slain while drinking themselves drunk. Arza. The prefect of his palace, who arranged for the drinking bout and was doubtless a party to the conspiracy. 10. And Zimri went in and smote him. Thus the third dynasty came to the throne of Israel – if, indeed, a line that ruled for only seven days can be dignified with the name of dynasty.

d) Zimri of Israel. 16:11-20.

11. When he began to reign . . . he slew all the house of Baasha. In fulfillment of the words of the prophet Jehu, Zimri destroyed not only the relatives but also the friends of his predecessor (vv. 12,13).

15. In the twenty and seventh year of Asa king of Judah did Zimri reign seven days in Tirzah (885 B.C.). The shortest reign of any of the kings of Israel or Judah – one brief week! 17. And Omri went up from Gibbethon, and all Israel with him, and they besieged Tirzah. News traveled a good deal more slowly then than it does in our day, but finally word about Zimri's treachery reached the ears of the people at Gibbethon. Led by Omri, they marched upon Tirzah, the capital. 18. When Zimri saw himself besieged by the forces of Omri, he retired within the castle, shut the doors behind him, and burned himself and his castle to the ground. 19. For his sins which he sinned in doing evil in the sight of the Lord. The ultimate ground for Zimri's terribly swift end is thus set forth. Divine judgment had been visited upon him.

e) Omri of Israel. 16:21-28.

21. Then were the people of Israel divided into two parts. A second schism now occurred. For a time it appeared that the nation of Israel might be divided into three parts instead of two. For now the people of the north formed themselves into two equal blocks, the one espousing the cause of Omri, the other championing the cause of Tibni. Tibni is identified only by name. 22. But the people that followed Omri prevailed against the people that followed Tibni . . . so Tibni died, and Omri reigned. Omri did not come into possession of the throne of Israel immediately but rather was obliged to contend for it. According to Josephus (Antiq. VIII. 12.1) Tibni was slain by his opponents. But this meaning is not necessarily contained in the words so Tibni died. It is to be taken that the latter met his death in the fierce engagements that followed the schism, five years later.

23. In the thirty and first year of Asa king of Judah began Omri to reign over Israel. Omri (880–874) was in many ways an able ruler. The blot upon his character is that he departed not from the sins of Jeroboam. 24. And he bought the hill Samaria of Shemer for two talents of silver. Upon this hill he established a fortified city, and named it after the former owner of the hill, Shemer. No doubt the desolation wrought by Zimri's fire was one of the factors that made a new capital highly desirable, if not absolutely necessary. 28. So Omri slept with his fathers, and was buried in Samaria. His new capital marked his burial ground.

B. From Ahab to the Ascension of Jehu. I Kgs 16:29–II Kgs 9:10.

1) Beginning of Ahab's Reign in Israel. 16:29–34.

29. And in the thirty and eighth year of Asa king of Judah began Ahab the son of Omri to reign over Israel. Ahab (874–853 B.C.), in many respects an able ruler, was plagued not only with the sins of Jeroboam but also with the idolatrous practices of the princess whom he married. 30. And Ahab the son of Omri did that which was evil in the sight of Jehovah above all that were before him (ASV). This is the historian's sober evaluation of the infamous career of Ahab.

31. He took to wife Jezebel the daughter of Ethbaal king of the Zidonians. This marriage was doubtless mainly a political maneuver, based on the ancient treaty of peace made between Israel and Zidon under the leadership of Solomon. And Ahab may have thought that he was partially justified in this union. However, the cruel, licentious worship of Baal so permeated the worship of Tyre and Sidon that its infiltration into Israel through Jezebel was inevitable. The term Baal, the Hebrew word for "lord" and "master," was employed more or less indiscriminately for a number of national gods. The Baal of Tyre, however, was Melkarth, the Tyrians' chief god. Jezebel played the role of chief priestess of the Tyrian Baal. Melkarth was the kind of god that required the burning of innocent children as oblations upon his altar. One of the underlying reasons why Baal was worshiped was that he was believed to be lord of the land. To induce him to send rain upon the earth, fertility cult practices were engaged in and sacrifices were offered. Perhaps there was some excuse for Jezebel, who was born and reared as a heathen princess, to follow such a religion. But there was absolutely no justification for Ahab's letting his wife introduce this heinous religion into the life of Israel.

32. And he reared up an altar for Baal . . . in Samaria. Samaria, the capital city of the Northern Kingdom, now became one of the centers of Baal worship. 33. And Ahab made the Asherah (AV, a grove). According to G. Ernest Wright, Jezebel may have conceived of the asherah as representing not merely Baal worship but the wife of Baal.

34. In his days did Hiel the Bethelite build Jericho. The ancient city of Jericho, ruined by the Israelites in the days of Joshua, was now rebuilt, with the result that the curse pronounced against it by Joshua (Josh 6:26) came to pass. An older view is that Hiel actually offered up his two sons as "foundation sacrifices." According to a newer view, the lives of the boys were cut off as a divine visitation upon Hiel for his disobedience in restoring the city God had cursed.

2) The Ministry of Elijah, to the Call of Elisha. 17:1–19:21.

a) Drought Predicted by Elijah. 17:1-8.

17:1. And Elijah the Tishbite . . . said unto Ahab. Like the coming of a meteor flashing across the dark, midnight sky, so was the coming of Elijah in the darkness of Israel's spiritual night. With the arrival of Elijah, the process of direct revelation, suspended since the days of Joshua, commenced again. By substituting Baal worship for the worship of Jehovah in Israel, Jezebel had challenged the existence of the living God. God's answer to Baal worship was his mighty prophet, Elijah (my God is Jahweh or Jehovah) the Tishbite. Tishbe was in Gilead, between the Jarmuk and Jabbok Rivers in Trans-Jordan. As the Lord God of Israel liveth, before whom I stand. With this introductory formula, Elijah announced that discipline was about to fall upon Ahab and Jezebel in particular, and upon the land of Israel. The punishment was to be in the form of a drought of three years and six months duration. Note the appropriateness of this punitive measure. The people of Israel had turned from Jehovah to the folk gods of the Baalim, the gods of the fertility cult. They needed to be reminded that Jehovah, the God of Israel, controls the elements and hence all fertility and life. Therefore rain was to be withheld from the land. 2,3. And the word of the Lord came unto him, saying, Get thee hence, and turn thee eastward. That is, eastward from Samaria, toward the Jordan. The brook Cherith is one of several brooks that empty into the Jordan. Though its exact identification is unknown, tradition locates it at Wadi el Kelt. This location constituted a suitable hiding place from the wrath of Ahab and Jezebel; and it also afforded Elijah sustenance in famine, as he was to drink of the brook and be fed twice daily by ravens.

b) Elijah at Zarephath. 17:9-24.

9. Arise, get thee to Zarephath. After the water of the brook had been depleted, God commanded his servant Elijah to proceed to the city of Zarephath, where a widow woman had been commanded to sustain him. Zarephath (in the LXX, Sarepta) was a small village situated on the Mediterranean Sea between Tyre and Sidon.

10. So he arose and went. Upon his arrival he was greeted by the sight of a widow preparing her last meal for herself and her son. His request for water, though reasonable under ordinary circumstances, may have been designed as a test of faith. As the woman was about to oblige the prophet with a drink, he also asked her for a morsel of bread (v. 11).

12. And she said, As the Lord thy God liveth, I have not a cake. She thus revealed that she recognized the stranger as a prophet of God. At the same time she invited a divine curse upon herself if the words she was about to utter were not true, i.e., that she and her son were about to eat their last meal.

13. And Elijah said unto her, Fear not; go and do as thou hast said. By her obedience in feeding the prophet, the woman exchanged the uncertain for the certain, famine for plenty, death for life. 14. The jar of meal shall not waste. The prophetic words of assurance given by the man of God were the woman's criterion for conduct, as with unquestioning obedience she carried out the command of the prophet. For a Gentile woman, her faith is unsurpassed. Our Lord's endorsement of this widow is found in Lk 4:26.

16. The jar of meal wasted not. It is worse than useless to try to assign some natural cause for the woman's unfailing supply of oil and flour. The ministry of Elijah was marked by miracles. In this case God intervened supernaturally to preserve the lives of this woman, her family, and the prophet.

17. And it came to pass after these things, that the son of the woman . . . fell sick. In ancient days sickness was regarded as a visitation of God to call sin to remembrance (v. 18). Elijah's actions here prove that this sickness was not a judgment because of sin. 20,21. Taking the dead child, the prophet retired to his bedchamber, where he called upon God to restore life.

22. And the Lord heard the voice of Elijah. The confident belief of Elijah carried with it the certainty of being heard. This is the first genuine, indisputable instance of the resurrection of the dead in the OT. 24. And the woman said to Elijah, Now by this I know that thou art a man of God. All her fears and doubts were dissipated. Elijah's claims as a prophet were established.

c) Elijah's Meeting with Obadiah. 18:1-16.

1. The word of the Lord came to Elijah in the third year. The year of the sojourn at Zarephath was accomplished, and Elijah returned to show himself to Ahab. The famine was now most acute. So dire and devastating had been its effects upon the vegetation of Israel that the cattle could no longer find grazing spots. So Ahab set out in search of possible pasture land. Hoping against hope, he sent his servant Obadiah one way, while he himself went another.

7. And as Obadiah was in the way, behold, Elijah met him. The length of the famine, according to Lk 4:25 and Jas 5:17, was three years and six months. When that time had elapsed, God told Elijah to show himself to Ahab. Obadiah. The governor or steward of Ahab's castle, a God-fearing man, not to be confused with the author of the book Obadiah. It was this steward who had concealed a hundred prophets of God from the wrath of Jezebel (v. 4). The slaughter referred to in verse 4 is mentioned again in 18:13, but not elsewhere. Jezebel had been doubly irked, first because of the famine, and second, because of her inability to lay hands upon Elijah. So she had vented her wrath upon the luckless heads of the prophets of Jehovah.

8. Go, tell thy lord, Behold, Elijah is here. With these dramatic words Elijah announced his determination to appear before the king.

9-16. And he said, Wherein have I sinned (ASV). Obadiah protested that the bearing of such news to Ahab might well cost him his life, especially if the Spirit of God carried Elijah away. His fears were not altogether groundless, as may be learned from II Kings 2, where we read that Elijah was carried into the other world in a fiery chariot. However, the prophet assured the fearful Obadiah that he would indeed confront Ahab that very day.

d) The Contest upon Carmel. 18:17-40.

Ahab Confronted by Elijah. 18:17-20.

17. Is it thou, thou troubler of Israel? (ASV) Ahab's conduct was more childish than vicious, as he petulantly accused the man of God of bringing trouble upon the land. Elijah met Ahab's insinuating remarks forthrightly by casting the challenge back into his face. 18. He reminded the king that it was not he, Elijah, who had been the troubler, but thou, and thy father's house, in that ye have forsaken the commandments of Jehovah, and thou hast followed the Baalim (ASV).

19. Mount Carmel. A mountain range of surpassing beauty, consisting of many peaks intersected by hundreds of larger and smaller ravines. It extends about thirteen miles in a southeasterly direction, and at its western end drops off sharply into the Mediterranean, near Haifa. On one of the promontories Elijah chose to stage the "battle of the gods," between the gods of the heathen Phoenicians, represented by the Baalim, and the living God, Jehovah. It is probable that the prophet selected this spot first for its natural geographic prominence, but also because it was debated ground between Israel and Phoenicia, and because the Canaanites believed Mount Carmel was the especial dwelling place of the gods. If this interpretation be correct, Elijah, like saints before and after him, dared to do battle with "the spirit of wickedness in high places," even from the heights of Carmel itself. So confident was he of the outcome that he made it as difficult as possible for himself and for his cause to win, yet defied Baal to be the victor.

Elijah's Challenge to Israel. 18:21-24.

21. And Elijah came near unto all the people. After gathering the people of Israel together, Elijah issued his challenge to them. How long halt ye between two opinions? (AV). Rather, How long go ye hobbling between the two forks of the road? Whichever translation one takes, the meaning is crystal clear. The issue was before them. A clear decision must be made. If Baal was to be god, Jehovah must be renounced. If Jehovah was to reign as God, Baal and all his worship must be forever abandoned. Many in Israel were probably tempted to compromise. Elijah, with whom no compromise was possible, saw clearly the radical character of the two issues and called for a definite decision. Such men always enjoy the blessings of God despite temporary unpopularity with the masses.

Elijah's Proposal to Jezebel's Prophets. 18:25-35.

25. And Elijah said unto the prophets of Baal, Choose you one bullock for yourselves. Following the ominous silence of the people, Elijah proceeded with his proposal, as simple as it was direct. The two opposing factions (450 Baal worshipers; one representative of the worship of Jehovah) were each to make ready a sacrifice, erecting an altar and laying out the prepared sacrificial animals. Only the fire would be missing. The test was clear and unequivocal — "The God that answereth by fire, let him be God" (v. 24).

26. And they . . . called on the name of Baal from morning even until noon. With increasingly frantic measures, the worshipers of Baal tried to coax the lord of the atmosphere to answer by fire, in accord with the agreed stipulation.

27. Elijah mocked them. These words, which on the surface may appear amusing, were spoken with the deepest irony and sarcasm. In mocking mood, Elijah suggested that their god Baal might be sleeping or off on a hunt. 28. And they cried aloud, and cut themselves . . . with knives and lancets. They worked themselves into an ecstasy of frenzy. Such a condition is not unknown even today among certain of the dervish dancers. To make Baal more propitious, they did not hesitate to mutilate their own bodies till the blood gushed forth. But despite their most frantic endeavors, there was no answer, for they called to deaf ears.

30. And Elijah said . . . Come near unto me. Confidently, with calm assurance, the prophet now proceeded to call upon the one true God of Israel. To build his altar, he selected twelve stones — one for each of the tribes of Israel. Though politically and socially divided, in the mind of God they were still one people, with one Lord and one Messianic expectation. Therefore, Elijah erected the altar with just twelve stones, as a testimony unto and against them. Round about the altar he next constructed a trench large enough to hold two measures, that is two bushels of seed.

35. And the water ran round about the altar; and he filled the trench also with water. The arrangements for the sacrifice being completed, Elijah made the strange request that the altar be soaked with water three times, until the trench was filled to overflowing. This was to prove the absolute validity of the miracle about to follow. Elijah insisted on making the test as difficult as possible for God to meet, that the answer might stand out in clearer, sharper contrast to the impotency of Baal and his prophets.

Elijah's Prayer and Its Answer. 18:36-39.

36,37. O Jehovah, the God of Abraham, of Isaac, and of Israel (ASV). The extreme brevity, though absolute sincerity, of Elijah's prayer is striking when compared with the frenzied crying, leaping, and dancing of the Baal worshipers. The prophet simply reminded God that he had not invented this seemingly strange procedure, but had carried it out by the divine command.

38. The fire of Jehovah fell, and consumed the burnt offering (ASV). So intense was the divine fire, that it devoured the stones of the altar and even licked up the super-abundance of water in the trench. The intervention of the supernatural in response to the believing faith and prayer of the prophet of God now settled the matter. 39. The people, recalling the terms of the spiritual duel, cried out, The Lord, he is the God.

40. Take the prophets of Baal; let not one of them escape. Elijah's slaying of the prophets of Baal has been a point of contention for critics. Let it be remembered that this killing was in reprisal for the slaying of Jehovah's prophets by Jezebel, and that death was the penalty prescribed by God for worshiping idols (Deut 13:13-15). Kishon. A rivulet that rises on Mount Tabor and flows down into the Mediterranean. Beside this brook Elijah slew the priests of Baal.

e) The End of the Drought. 18:41-46.

41. Get thee up, eat and drink. That the people might know that the drought was not merely an unfortunate coincidence of nature, but had come particularly as a disciplinary measure, it now ended as it had begun — at the command of a man of God (Jas 5:18).

43. And said to his servant, Go up now, look toward the sea. The sea was the Mediterranean. The dazzling waters could be plainly seen from the heights of Carmel. Six times the servant of Elijah was sent to the top of the mountain to detect the coming of the rain. Each time he was disappointed. 44. But the seventh time he returned with the report, "There arises a cloud as small as a man's hand." 45a. The heavens grew black with clouds and wind. The cloud "as small as a man's hand" rapidly increased till the heavens were covered with blackness. Lightning darted, serpent-like, and thunders rolled in the deep ravines of Carmel as the earth, long parched, awaited the welcome rain.

45b. Jezreel, located on the spur of Mount Gilboa, was the winter capital of Ahab. 46. And the hand of the Lord was on Elijah; and he . . . ran before Ahab. Elijah's celebration of the triumph of God. Well it was for him that he did not know what severe testings lay immediately ahead.

f) Elijah's Flight to Horeb. 19:1-18.

1. And Ahab told Jezebel all that Elijah had done. When Jezebel received the news of the slaying of her prophets, her fury knew no bounds. Her reputation as priestess of Baal worship was at stake. 2. Then Jezebel sent a messenger unto Elijah. Jezebel doubtless meant every word of her threat and intended to punish Elijah severely. The essence of her ominous message was that as he had done to her prophets, she would do next day to him. 3. And . . . he arose, and went for his life . . . to Beer-sheba. The southernmost city of Judah. Elijah fled from the Northern Kingdom into the more friendly kingdom of Jehoshaphat. He went not merely to Judah proper but even "to the end of civilization" – to Beer-sheba.

4. But he himself went a day's journey into the wilderness. That is, into the Negeb, to the south of Judah. Not allowing himself the comfort of a city, obviously for fear of detection by one of Jezebel's spies, he retreated into the wilderness. Here, in absolute discouragement, not realizing that God was working out his providential design, Elijah requested that he might die. Juniper tree. The broom brush tree, under which Elijah found refuge and solitude. 5. Behold, then an angel touched him. God's tender care of his overwrought prophet is here evident. The emotional experiences through which the prophet had so recently passed had left their marks upon him.

8. And he arose . . . and went . . . unto Horeb the mount of God. Strengthened by the miraculous provisions, Elijah retired to Horeb, a mountain in Arabia in the vicinity of Mount Sinai (Ex 3:1; 33:6). The mount of God. That is, the mount on which the Law had been given to Moses (Ex 19:20). 9a. And he came thither unto a cave, and lodged there. It was a far cry from the mountain-top experience of Mount Carmel to the cave experience among the rocky cliffs of Horeb. He at whose prayer God moved the elements, now hid from the rage of a woman. However, he was not destined to spend the rest of his days as a fugitive, hunted by Jezebel and Ahab. Baal had been defeated; Jehovah was upon the throne. And God had not yet finished with Elijah; he still had work for him to do.

9b. What doest thou here, Elijah? A divine challenge as well as an interrogation. 10. And he said, I have been very jealous for the Lord God of hosts. In solitude and loneliness he bewailed his fate before the Lord. Had these words not been uttered in a state of emotional distress, they would have been inexcusable. But God deals tenderly with his overwrought children. The prophet's words taken at face value – which indeed they cannot be – practically accuse God of infidelity. I, even I only, am left. See Paul's comment on this experience (Rom 11:2-4).

12. After the fire a still small voice. Hebrew, a sound of gentle stillness. In sharp contrast to the tremendous manifestations of nature that moved so catastrophically before the presence of the Lord, the Lord himself now quietly spoke. The sound of gentle stillness summoned Elijah from the cave of his hiding to stand face to face with God.

15-18. And the Lord said . . . Go, return . . . to the wilderness of Damascus. God now gave Elijah a threefold commission: (1) to anoint Hazael king over Syria (cf. II Kgs 8:7-15); (2) to anoint a new king for Israel, Jehu son of Nimshi (cf. II Kgs 9:1-10); (3) to appoint his own successor, Elisha the son of Shaphat. These three individuals, though differing in vocation and character, would yet be united in the humbling and desecrating of the house of Ahab.

g) The Anointing of Elisha. 19:19-21.

19. So he departed thence, and found Elisha the son of Shaphat. Elisha means, literally, My God is salvation. The exact whereabouts of Elisha at the time of his call is not given, though his home was in Abel-meholah, the northern part of the Jordan valley. Elijah cast his mantle over him, a symbolic act signifying that the power and authority of Elijah, the retiring prophet, were about to rest upon the younger prophet, Elisha.

20. Let me, I pray thee, kiss my father and my mother. We may wonder at Elijah's rough response to a seemingly reasonable request until we remember that Oriental farewells sometimes occupy days and even weeks. 21. And he returned from following him. Despite the rebuff of verse 20, the younger man was permitted a brief adieu to his family and friends. The feast prepared for the occasion was no doubt in honor of the elder prophet, Elijah, as well as in the nature of a farewell.

Then he arose, and went after Elijah, and ministered unto him. The first commission given on Horeb to Elijah was now completed. It provided for the continuation of the prophetic ministry in the person of Elisha, son of Shaphat, after the assumption of Elijah.

3) Later Years of Ahab's Reign, and His Death. 20:1–22:40.

a) War with Syria – The Siege of Samaria. 20:1-21.

1. And Ben-hadad the king of Syria gathered all his host together. Ben-hadad.

A titular rather than a personal name. Ben-hadad I, renewing the struggle against Israel, now chose to besiege the capital city of Samaria. 2. And he sent messengers to Ahab. He offered conditions of peace which proved quite unacceptable to Israel. 3. At first Ben-hadad demanded Ahab's wives and children and his silver and gold. Ahab reluctantly agreed to surrender them. Then Ben-hadad made further unjust demands. 6. He declared that he would also send his servants to search the king's private dwelling and take away whatever was desirable. Ahab answered with a diplomatic note couched in terms of Oriental courtesy but rejecting this demand.

7. Then the king of Israel called all the elders. The king stated to them the unjust demands of the Syrian oppressor, Ben-hadad. A dilemma confronted them: (1) Should they refuse these unjust demands and thus prolong the siege? Or, (2) should they acquiesce and permit this brigand, who called himself a king, to pillage their city? 8. And all the elders . . . said unto him, Hearken not. The representatives of the people stood behind the king's decision. 9. Wherefore he said unto the messengers of Ben-hadad, Tell my lord the king. Using the deferential language of a skilled diplomat, Ahab rejected the terms of surrender.

10. The gods do so unto me, and more also. The arrogant boast of the Syrian monarch was that there were more soldiers under arms with him than there were handfuls of dust in the land of Samaria – an Oriental exaggeration for the number of soldiers led by him and by the thirty-two kings (v. 1; otherwise unspecified) allied with him. 11. Let not him that girdeth on his armor boast himself as he that putteth it off. An Oriental maxim meaning, Let not the one who inaugurates a fight boast prematurely of the victory.

12. When Ben-hadad heard this message, as he was drinking . . . he said . . . Set yourselves in array. Drunkenness often creates a false sense of assurance, as exhibited by the attitude of Ben-hadad. The pavilions. Tents, the huts of the Syrian army. Set yourselves in array (AV, ASV). Take your positions (RSV). Attack (Berkeley Vers.). So Ben-hadad gave the order for the commencing of the battle.

13. And, behold, there came a prophet unto Ahab. The prophet, here unnamed, directed Ahab's attention to the great multitude that confronted him, not however, to discourage but to encourage him. Behold, I will deliver it into thy hand this day. The somewhat surprising promise of God's deliverance was grounded not upon Ahab's fidelity but simply on God's love-care for His people.

14. After learning that he should conduct the battle, Ahab called the army together, about 7,000 men. 16. Then he struck strategically at noon, the traditional time of repose, when Ben-hadad and his associates were in their tents drinking. By this surprise attack, Ahab threw the Syrian army into confusion and utterly routed them. 20. Ben-hadad escaped on his horse. But his army was decimated.

b) The Warning of the Prophet. 20:22-30.

22. And the prophet came to the king. God warned Ahab that however glowing the victory had been, it was not the end of the struggle. Ben-hadad would renew his effort.

23. Their gods are gods of the hills. These words betray the Syrians' lack of knowledge regarding the omnipresence of God. The deities of the Syrians were gods of the valley; therefore Ben-hadad's servants suggested that they renew the conflict in the valley. This insinuation about Israel's "gods" was to be sternly corrected in the minds of the Syrians by Jehovah himself (v. 28). 26. At the return of the year . . . Ben-hadad mustered the Syrians. No doubt it was at the coming of spring that the contest was renewed. Aphek. Hebrew, a fortress. There are at least four places given the name Aphek. It appears that this one was a city on the plateau east of the Sea of Galilee, where disaster befell Ben-hadad.

28. And there came a man of God. Because the Syrians had thought of Israel's God as limited to the hills, they were to learn that Jehovah's power is everywhere.

29. And they pitched one over against the other seven days. The precise reason for the delay in battle is not given. Perhaps they were assaying one another's position by means of spies. On the seventh day hostilities broke out. It was the Syrians – much to their surprise – and not the Israelites who were defeated and devastated. Ben-hadad escaped and concealed himself in a secret chamber of the city.

c) Ben-hadad Spared by Ahab. 20:31-34.

31. Behold now, we have heard that the kings of . . . Israel are merciful. In Oriental warfare, the victory was not complete until the leader, in this instance Ben-hadad, was executed. The servants of Ben-hadad advised him to throw himself upon the mercy of Ahab. It should be noted that the mercy of the kings of Israel was greater than that of the kings of the enemy nations surrounding them. 32. So they girded sackcloth on their loins. Sackcloth and ropes were signs of penitential submission. Flattered by the Syrians' compliance, Ahab consented to let Ben-hadad live. He is my brother. These words imply a disposition to enter into a covenant.

33. Now the men observed diligently, and hasted to catch it (ASV). Trained in the technique of discerning the capricious royal will, the servants regarded the query of Ahab as a good omen and hastily laid hold upon it. Thus Ahab bound himself by an oath to save Ben-hadad's life. This was not only the greatest injustice to his own subjects but open opposition to God, who had foretold the victory and had delivered the enemy into his hands (Keil and Delitzsch, p. 267). 34. The cities which my father took . . . I will restore. Instead of seizing the opportunity to crush Syria once for all, Ahab permitted Ben-hadad, under the terms of this agreement, to depart in peace. So he made a covenant with him, and sent him away. No doubt Ahab spared Syria so that it might serve as a buffer between Israel and the rising power of Assyria.

d) A Prophet's Rebuke. 20:35-43.

35. And a certain man of the sons of the prophets said. The institution of the schools of the prophets was well established in Israel by this time. Smite me, I pray thee. And the man refused. The prophet wished to deliver a sermon of rebuke in a parable. He therefore requested his associate to smite him. The second prophet, however, refused and for punishment was slain by a lion (v. 36). 37. The prophet requested another associate to smite him. This time the request was granted; the third prophet smote the first and wounded him.

38. So the prophet departed, and waited for the king by the way. Disguised, the prophet awaited the coming of the king in order to deliver the message of censure from the Lord. 39. And as the king passed by, he cried unto the king. In parabolic form, the prophet now set forth a hypothetical situation, which Ahab, not recognizing the prophet's identity, took as actual. The prophet said that a soldier of Israel, an enemy prisoner of war, had been placed in his charge with the stipulation that if the prisoner should escape, he, the imagined soldier, must forfeit his own life, or give a talent of silver ($2,000). 40. Almost without hesitation, Ahab returned a verdict of guilty, and told the disguised prophet that he must choose between the alternatives of punishment.

41. And he hasted, and took the headband away from his eyes (ASV). The disguise being removed, Ahab recognized the 'soldier' to be a prophet of God. The prophet now turned the verdict of Ahab against the king himself. The prisoner of war committed to his hands had been Ben-hadad. Just as the king had judged the 'soldier' negligible in allowing the prisoner to escape, so the prophet condemned the king on the same charge. 42. Thus saith the Lord, Because thou hast let go out of thy hand a man. This verse is not given to teach Christian morality in the event of a situation involving prisoners of war. Rather, the spiritual principle set forth is that believers must not extend toleration, even in the name of mercy, to the forces of Satan. It had lain within the power of Ahab to end forever the life and death struggle between Syria and Israel. Now with Ben-hadad free, the struggle would continue, with disastrous results.

43. And the king of Israel went to his house heavy and displeased. Ahab retired to Samaria in a truculent and melancholy mood. It would go ill with any individual who, even through no fault of his own, crossed Ahab's dark pathway, as is shown in chapter 21.

e) Ahab, Jezebel, and Naboth's Vineyard. 21:1-16.

1. Naboth the Jezreelite had a vineyard . . . hard by the palace of Ahab. Naboth is nowhere else referred to except in this chapter. He was a God-fearing Jew, possessor of a vineyard in Jezreel which adjoined the winter palace of King Ahab. 2. And Ahab spake unto Naboth . . . Give me thy vineyard. Ahab had, of course, legal and moral right to try to purchase the vineyard from Naboth. His great transgression lay in his failing to respect the right and privilege of his neighbor to refuse his offer. The Bible knows nothing of the hideous political doctrine that the individual exists for the state. Ahab made a business proposition to his neighbor, offering to pay for the property in currency or to exchange vineyard for vineyard.

3. The Lord forbid it me. Naboth refused, on religious grounds, to sell Ahab the vineyard because God had forbidden the Jews to sell their paternal inheritance (Lev 25:23-28; Num 36:7ff.). 4. And Ahab came into his house heavy and displeased. In sullen, childish mood the king returned to his castle, dejected over Naboth's refusal of his offer.

7. And Jezebel his wife said unto him. Noticing Ahab's petulant mood, Jezebel induced him to tell her the cause of his troubles. Her response was cynical and edged with iron: Dost not thou rule Israel? In other words, Are you not in supreme authority? What right has one of your subjects to deny you anything you wish? We have already observed that Jezebel was a woman with no conscience. Ahab, pleased with his wife's interest, failed to note the ominous character of her words: I will give thee the vineyard of Naboth.

8. So she wrote letters in Ahab's name. That is, letters bearing the royal insignia. 9. Set Naboth on high among the people. A technical phrase meaning to bring him to trial. The verdict was predetermined. This was a mock trial with a mere semblance of justice. That it might appear, however, in the sight of the people as a legal trial, two witnesses were produced, as provided for by the Law (Deut 17:6,7); but they were false. The technical accusation was not merely that Naboth had opposed the king, but that he had blasphemed the Divine name, a sin of which Jezebel herself was notoriously guilty. The penalty for such a crime, when a man was justly convicted, was stoning (Lev 24:16; Jn 10:33). After the victim had succumbed, it was customary to raise a pile of stones over his grave as a testimony to the manner of his death and the reason for it.

11. And the men of his city, even the elders and the nobles . . . did as Jezebel had sent unto them. There are always men ready to sell their testimony for money and to alter it to suit the evil purposes of the one who hires them. Compare the witnesses at the trial of Jesus (Mt 26:60,61). 13. Then they carried him forth out of the city, and stoned him. Naboth was executed for a crime he never committed. And the God of all justice had observed the wicked act. Soon Ahab and Jezebel were to stand before the bar of eternal justice, to receive righteous judgment. When Ahab knew Naboth was dead, he promptly claimed the vineyard (v. 16).

f) Elijah's Rebuke. 21:17-29.

17. And the word of the Lord came to Elijah the Tishbite. The God of truth and right, who had seen the criminal act, now sent his prophet with the message of doom. Note that in the Divine estimate, Ahab was equally guilty with Jezebel. 19. Hast thou killed, and also taken possession? The shadow of justice and of inevitable doom now fell across the house of Ahab.

20. Hast thou found me, O mine enemy? Ahab's ejaculation revealed his dismay; he realized that his sin had found him out. Too late did he learn that God has set our secret sins in the light of his countenance (Ps 90:8). And he answered, I have found thee. Elijah boldly replied to Ahab's despairing question, then proceeded to pronounce judgment. Ahab had become the hopeless slave of sin, as is implied by the prophet's explanation: Because thou hast sold thyself to work evil in the sight of the Lord (AV).

21. Behold, I will bring evil upon thee. The curse pronounced against Ahab is identical with that uttered against the house of Jeroboam and against Baasha (14:10,11; 16:3,4). 23. The dogs shall eat Jezebel by the rampart of Jezreel. For the terrible fulfillment of this prophecy, see notes on II Kgs 9:30-37. Because of his belated repentance, Ahab was given a little respite.

25. But there was none like unto Ahab, which did sell himself to work wickedness. This is the sober estimation of the historian as to the life, reign, and character of Ahab, son of Omri of Israel. Once again we note the striking but terrifying figure of Ahab selling himself as a slave to an evil master for the purpose of material gain. Whom Jezebel his wife stirred up. Being married to an evil companion, the daughter of the king of Tyre, Ahab chose the course of least resistance. The two principal sins of Ahab denounced in the Scripture were mercenary - mindedness and idolatry – two very closely connected evils.

27. And it came to pass, when Ahab heard those words, that he rent his clothes. Sincerely repentant, Ahab now donned sackcloth and ashes and went softly before the Lord. This was not repentance unto life but a temporary turning from sin, to soften the inevitable temporal vengeance. 29. Seest thou how Ahab humbleth himself before me? Even a temporary token repentance, as here, will move God to mercy. The mercies of the Lord are infinite. The fullness of the Divine curse was not executed upon Ahab as it was upon Jezebel, who showed no sign of repentance.

g) The Battle of Ramoth-gilead and the Defeat of Ahab. 22:1-4.

1. And they continued three years without war between Syria and Israel. The renewal of hostilities was brought about this time by the alliance between the north and the south, between Ahab and Jehoshaphat. The two allied Israelitish nations now took up the offensive against Ben-hadad. 2. In the third year . . . Jehoshaphat the king of Judah came down to the king of Israel. For a full account of the reign of the godly Jehoshaphat of Judah (co-regent 873–870 and sole ruler 870–848 B.C.), read II Chr 17:1–21:1. For political purposes, Jehoshaphat of the line of David now disregarded the vast moral and religious gulf separating the two kingdoms and made affiliation with the Northern Kingdom, headed by Ahab, son of Omri.

3. Know ye that Ramoth in Gilead is our's. Ramoth-gilead, one of the chief cities of the tribe of Gad, was east of the Jordan. It is now identified as Tell Rāmith in north Trans-Jordan (Glueck). The immediate objective of the projected offensive warfare was the recapturing of the city of Ramoth-gilead. 4. And he said unto Jehoshaphat, Wilt thou go with me to battle. Ahab seemed glad enough to welcome the assistance of the South in the contemplated project.

h) False Prophecy Versus True Prophecy. 22:5-18.

5. Jehoshaphat, as a truly God-fearing king, showed some understandable misgiving about the oncoming battle and wished not only the assurances of Ahab but the blessing of Jehovah from the mouth of His prophet.

6. Then the king of Israel gathered the prophets together, about four hundred men. These four hundred are not to be identified with Jezebel's four hundred prophets of Baal, whom Elijah had already slain. These men were ostensibly prophets of the Lord, as Jehoshaphat's willingness to seek their counsel shows. But they were untrue to their calling and willing to bend their message to the whims and wishes of the wicked king. And they said, Go up; for the Lord shall deliver it into the hand of the king. They realized that this was the message the king wanted most to hear, but their assurance of victory was too facile for Jehoshaphat.

7. And Jehoshaphat said, Is there not here a prophet of the Lord. The king of Judah was justifiably suspicious of the glib assurances of the prophets. He therefore insisted that the advice of one more prophet be sought. 8. There is yet one man, Micaiah the son of Imlah . . . but I hate him. Micaiah is the longer form of Micah (not to be confused with the prophet in Isaiah's day whose book bears his name). Josephus and the rabbinical scholars have imagined that Micaiah was the unnamed prophet who had condemned Ahab for setting Ben-hadad free (20:35ff.). Ahab himself declared that he hated Micaiah because the prophet never prophesied good of him but always evil. And Jehoshaphat said, Let not the king say so. Thus the king of Judah overruled the objections of Ahab and insisted that Micaiah be called.

10. And the king of Israel and . . . the king of Judah sat each on his throne, arrayed in their robes. Before Micaiah arrived there was a very interesting interlude. Another false prophet, Zedekiah, the son of Chenaanah, stepped forward to make his prophecy. Displaying two symbolic iron horns, he predicted that the two kings would push the Syrians as if with horns until they were consumed. This Zedekiah is therefore to be reckoned among the false prophets. 13. And the messenger that went to call Micaiah said . . . speak that which is good. In the name of diplomacy and good will, but obviously not in the name of veracity, the messenger sent to summon Micaiah pled with him to bring his message into conformity with the others; that is, to break his established reputation of being the purveyor of bad news and for once speak encouraging words to the allied kings. 14. And Micaiah said, As Jehovah liveth, what Jehovah saith unto me, that will I speak (ASV). Here was a prophet who was above mercenary considerations, who would not 'tailor' his message to suit the situation. He bore the Lord's message, and that only would he declare. This prophet would not compromise himself as Zedekiah and the others had so willingly done.

15. The king said unto him, Micaiah, shall we go against Ramoth-gilead . . . ? The king, most likely, was Ahab, who was more or less in charge of the proposed expedition. The same question was put to Micaiah as had been put to the others: Should they or should they not proceed to battle? Go, and prosper. Micaiah's tone of voice and his manner doubtless betrayed the fact that he was speaking in irony – that he meant just the reverse of what he said.

16. And the king said unto him, How many times shall I adjure thee. Fully realizing that Micaiah had spoken sarcastically, Ahab now besought him under oath to tell the truth. The time for mockery had passed; the time for sober dealing had come. 17. And he said, I saw all Israel scattered upon the hills, as sheep that have no shepherd. A picture of hopelessness, confusion, and despair. The shepherd and leader, Ahab, was to be destroyed and the people scattered (Ezk 34:5; Zech 13:7). The meaning of Micaiah's prophecy was clear: Desist from making war against Syria.

18. Did I not tell thee that he would prophesy no good . . . ? Thus childishly did Ahab dismiss the sober warning of the man of God.

i) Micaiah's Vision. 22:19-28.

19. I saw the Lord sitting on his throne. For one brief moment the curtain of eternity was lifted and Ahab was given a glimpse behind the scene. There Jehovah sits in majesty, the unseen Lord of history. The message of doom previously spoken by the prophet Elijah was about to be fulfilled. Both the Testaments teach that evil and good spirits are under the authority of God. 22. I will be a lying spirit. The method by which Ahab was to be deceived was through the spirit of deception about to take possession of the prophets. Ahab would listen to their counsel, giving no heed to the true prophet Micaiah, that the purpose of God might be fulfilled. 23. The sending of the evil spirit is to be regarded as done by the permissive will of God instead of by his direct will. Let it be remembered that Ahab had had ample chance to know truth through Elijah, but had stubbornly resisted it.

24. But Zedekiah . . . went near, and smote Micaiah. Zedekiah, the false prophet, struck Micaiah with the open hand, an act regarded by all Orientals as the greatest of insults. 25. Behold, thou shalt see in that day. In response to Zedekiah's insult and insinuation that Micaiah was guilty of trying to create fear where there was no cause to fear, the prophet of God quickly replied that the day was coming soon when Zedekiah and all the false prophets would hide themselves in terror in a secret place. This would be when Israel was defeated and Ahab was dead. Then Zedekiah and all would know the truth.

26. And the king of Israel said, Take Micaiah, and carry him. Micaiah the true prophet was thus placed under arrest for telling the truth. We can only hope that someone thought to set him free when the king did not return.

j) The Lord's Warning Spurned. 22:29-33.

29. So the king of Israel and Jehoshaphat . . . went up to Ramoth-gilead. Despite the advice of the prophet of God, the two kings still chose to follow their own inclinations.

30. And the king of Israel said . . . I will disguise myself. Despite his bold front, Ahab secretly feared that Micaiah was telling the truth. He, therefore, suggested that Jehoshaphat should dress in his regal robes (perhaps a special uniform), but that he himself should dress like an ordinary soldier. The good Jehoshaphat did not perceive that he was being involved in trickery – trickery that nearly cost him his life.

31. But the king of Syria commanded. Ahab did not know that he had become the personal target of Ben-hadad and his men. The king of Syria, it seems, did not care if everyone else escaped uninjured so long as he could have the king of Israel slain. In view of the fact that Ahab had recently spared Ben-hadad's life, this was gross ingratitude. Perhaps Ben-hadad justified his conduct on the ground that Ahab was a violator of the peace treaty, for Ahab had renewed the war. 32. When the captains of the chariots saw Jehoshaphat. When the archers caught a glimpse of the royal robes, they naturally drew the conclusion that the wearer was King Ahab, their target. And Jehoshaphat cried out. Perhaps he uttered a brief but earnest prayer for deliverance. 33. In any event, the Syrians detected that he was not the man they were after, and they withdrew.

k) The Death of Ahab. 22:34-40.

34. And a certain man drew a bow at a venture. The Hebrew for at a venture means in his simplicity, i.e., without taking specific aim. The mathematical probability that the arrow would find its right target was extremely low. Yet directed by the judgment of the Lord, it found its mark. 35,36. Though Ahab was struck and mortally wounded, he did not die immediately; he lingered, suffering, while the battle raged.

37. So the king died . . . and they buried the king in Samaria. Jezebel was to be eaten by the dogs, but Ahab, because of his temporary repentance, was allowed honorable burial. To a Jew, the worst punishment that could befall a man was not to be buried.

38. And they washed the chariot (ASV; And they washed his armor, AV). This clause presents a textual problem, since the Hebrew consonantal form can be translated and the harlots washed themselves there. Though it may be argued that the best reading is the former, let it be remembered that in the Mosaic law dogs and harlots are placed within the same category. The dogs came to lick up Ahab's blood; the harlots came to wash. Perhaps a double curse was thus enacted to show the extreme displeasure of God against a man who had so despised his word.

39. The ivory house which he made. Through archaeological investigation, Ahab's ivory palace has come to light in Samaria. The remains of this structure reveal that the walls were faced with white marble, giving the appearance of ivory. In addition to this there were numerous plaques, panels, and pieces of furniture decorated with ivory. Thus in a double sense Ahab's palace may be called an "ivory house."

40. So Ahab slept with his fathers; and Ahaziah . . . reigned. Ahaziah succeeded his father on the throne of Israel.

4) Judah under Jehoshaphat. 22:41-50.

41. Jehoshaphat . . . began to reign over Judah. With this and the following verses a brief synopsis of the reign of Jehoshaphat is given. Three chief facts stand out: he was co-regent with his father Asa; he was in almost all respects a godly man; his main mistake was that he aligned himself with Ahab of Israel (II Chr 17:1–21:1).

5) Israel under Ahaziah and Joram. I Kgs 22:51–II Kgs 1:1.

The Reign of Ahaziah. 22:51–1:1.

51-53. Ahaziah . . . began to reign over Israel. Ahaziah's reign (853–852 B.C.), despite its brevity, was characterized by extreme iniquity. The new king was very different from his contemporary to the south. A brief alliance was made between them, which was rapidly dissolved when the ships of Jehoshaphat were broken at Ezion-geber because of the displeasure of the Lord (cf. II Chr 20:37).

1:1. Then Moab rebelled. This verse properly goes with I Kgs 22:51-53, forming the conclusion to that passage. Rebellion frequently broke out at the death of a reigning monarch. Mesha, king of Moab, as archaeologists have discovered, has left an inscription (known as the Moabite Stone) describing his successful revolt against Ahab because of the Israelite king's "oppression" of Moab.

6) Later Ministry of Elijah, to His Translation. 1:2–2:11.

This section, which includes the account of King Ahaziah's attempt to capture Elijah and the death of the king, teaches several important lessons. It shows that it is fatal to forsake God, that it is necessary to honor his prophet, and that there is power and protection only in obedience to the God-given prophetic word.

2. Ahaziah . . . was sick. Ahaziah's illness arose from his having fallen out the window of the roof chamber. Go, enquire of Baal-zebub. According to the Ugaritic alphabetic cuneiform tablets, this name is to be spelled Baal-zebul. Possibly the spelling was changed by some copyist to make the name ridiculous. The former means Baal of the fly. The latter means Baal of the dwelling, i.e., the Canaanite life-god, the chief Canaanite deity. Ahaziah had tried to syncretize Baal worship with the worship of Jehovah. Elijah here proves Baal to be powerless. Ahab on his part had broken the covenant by introducing Baal worship, substituting idolatry for the worship of the Lord. Ahaziah's request for an oracle was a challenge to the God of Israel. Whether I shall recover of this disease. Protracted illness had resulted from the fall, arousing the king's concern and leading him to ask for the oracle.

3. The angel of the Lord said. Genesis 22:15,16 makes the "angel of the Lord" and the Lord the same. God took up the challenge. Is it not. The idolatry of the people had shut God out of their hearts. 4b. Thou . . . shalt surely die. An adverse oracle indicated that open sin and deliberate defection from God must end in death.

4c. Elijah departed. Elijah went to meet the king's messengers. 5. The messengers turned back unto him. The messengers had met Elijah and, at his message, at once turned back to him, i.e., to Ahaziah – to Samaria. Idolatry had so beclouded their hearts that they did not recognize God's intervention through Elijah. 6. There came a man. The dumbfounded messengers faithfully repeated Elijah's words to Ahaziah. 7. What manner of man. Not having forgotten the adventures of Ahab with Elijah, Ahaziah conjectured that Elijah was active again. 8. It is Elijah the Tishbite. The description of Elijah confirmed his conjecture. Elijah's garb was characteristic of the preachers of repentance. A ministry of repentance was most apropos at this time of apostasy in Israel (cf. Mk 1:6,7).

9. Then the king sent. The second phase of this contest between the Lord and Baal now began. Ahaziah moved to punish Elijah's insult. Thou man of God . . . Come down. The address was scornful. The soldier did not understand that the treatment dishonored the covenant by dishonoring God's prophet. 10. And Elijah answered. And should be read But, since this verse stands in contrast to verse 9. The captain's contempt was to result in death. All too often does the "world" regard the servants of God in the same manner. Sin and worldly might blind men's eyes. Fire from heaven . . . consumed him. The Lord God confirmed Elijah's word and proved himself the victor in the conflict.

11. Another captain of fifty. In the second attempt to take Elijah, the king compounded his sin by adding the word quickly. 12. See verse 10. Sin was not yet vanquished in these people. 13,14. Came and fell on his knees. The third captain, whether or not he realized the significance of the happenings, was convinced of the prophetic standing and power of Elijah and treated him with respect. He said, in effect, "I am only the king's servant, doing my duty; so please honor me in this and come before the king." 15. The angel . . . said unto Elijah. The king's power was vain. Elijah was not to fear Ahaziah, because the Lord would defend his prophet. 16. And he said unto him. Elijah repeated the earlier message given to the messengers.

17. So he died. God's word is never spoken in vain (see E. R. Thiele, Mysterious Numbers of the Hebrew Kings, p. 61). Jehoram reigned in his stead . . . because he had no son. A brother (cf. 8:16) ascended the throne (cf. 3:1; I Kgs 22:51). Ahaziah's reign of slightly more than a year was too short a time for him to beget an heir. Second year of Jehoram. Jehoram of Israel became king in the eighteenth year of Jehoshaphat and the second year of Jehoram, kings of Judah. At this time there was a co-regency in Judah (cf. 3:1. See Introd., Chronology).

Elijah's Translation. 2:1-11. See 6) above, Later Ministry of Elijah, etc.

1. And it came to pass. For the time of this event see I Kgs 22:51; II Kgs 3:1; 1:17. Elijah's translation obviously occurred after the death of Ahaziah. By a whirlwind. Retrospective insertion. Only the possibility of Elijah's translation was known at this time (2:3,5). Elijah went with Elisha from Gilgal. The Hebrew says went down. This Gilgal is higher than Bethel, and is in Ephraim near Shiloh, the modern Jiljiliyeh. In Amos 4:4 and Hos 4:15 it is named, along with Bethel, as a seat of false worship of God. 2. Tarry here. In spite of the exhortation, Elisha declared that he would go with Elijah, who was now to visit the three schools of the prophets to strengthen them against inroads of Baal worship. The existence of these schools indicates that the prophets were organized into a type of guild.

Elijah now began to test Elisha's personal call to the prophetic office. 3. Sons of the prophets . . . at Beth-el. Students and followers of God's prophets, exercising teaching ministries under them. Knowest thou . . . ? God had revealed to Elijah that he was soon to depart. And Elijah had made known the revelation in order to prepare both Elisha and the sons of the prophets for his going. Take away thy master from thy head. Elisha was to lose his teacher and leader. Hold ye your peace. That is, "Yield to God's will; do not add to my burden of sadness." We should not try to retain those whom God calls away, but rejoice in their entrance into his presence. 4. See verse 2 for the same request and answer. 5. At Jericho. See verses 1-3. At this point it appears that God definitely purposed to present Elisha as Elijah's successor (cf. v. 3), qualified to lead in withstanding false worship and in halting its spread among the people. 6. Cf. verses 2,4. Elisha's constancy was made evident. See 9 below for what must have been growing in his mind.

7. Fifty men . . . stood to view afar off. A number of the sons of the prophets followed after the two and observed the happenings at Jordan, probably from a bluff above them. 8. Elijah took his mantle. The call of Elisha (I Kgs 19:19) had made Elijah's mantle a symbol of the prophetic office; here it was a symbol of God's power (cf. Moses' rod, Ex 17:9).

9. Ask what I shall do for thee. Elijah opened the door to the prophetic succession. A double portion. Comparison with Deut 21:17 indicates that Elisha was asking to be the heir – successor. See Heb 3:5,6 for training in "sonship" to qualify for holding an office in question. 10. A hard thing. The boon requested was not Elijah's to give. If thou see me . . . taken from thee. The sign by which Elisha would know that his request was granted. If Elisha would have the courage to face Elijah's translation, and the spiritual understanding to know the meaning of the older man's going, he would be the successor.

11. As they still went on. As they walked on across and beyond Jordan. The whirlwind (storm, se'ārâ, with dark clouds and lightning), and the fiery chariot and horses were symbols of Jehovah's power in battle (cf. Isa 31:1; 34:8,9; Ex 14:9,17; I Kgs 10:29; Ps 104:3,4). Elijah went up in the storm in the presence of the Lord, not in the chariot. See also Mal 4:5,6; Mt 11:14.

7) Introduction of Elisha. 2:12-25. Elisha was presented as God's prophet appointed to follow Elijah. His was a teaching ministry, designed to show the practicality of following the Lord and to demonstrate that Baal could not fulfill the needs of the people.

12. And Elisha saw. This was evidence that Elisha was chosen. My father. Elisha spoke thus as successor to Elijah. The chariot of Israel, and the horsemen thereof. The chariot was the mightiest weapon then known, symbolic of God's supreme power. Elisha was speaking of Elijah as the prophetic instrument through which God's power was operating on behalf of the truth in Israel. For Israel's defense lay in the Lord alone, and her idolatry was a rejection of her defense. This divine power could help the people keep the covenant. Saw him no more. Elijah disappeared completely. Took hold of his own clothes, and rent them. Elisha thus expressed his sincere grief at Elijah's departure. 13. He took up also the mantle. The dropped mantle was to be one more confirmation of Elisha's succession (see v. 15). 14. Where is the Lord God of Elijah? See Jer 2:6-8 for the same question, which the people had failed to ask in faith. Elisha was not being impertinent; he was praying, in effect: "Here is thy opportunity to show forth thy great power in thy obedient servant."

15. And when the sons of the prophets . . . saw him. Still watching, they saw Elisha use the cloak. The spirit of Elijah doth rest on Elisha. Elisha had been granted the same gifts Elijah had, as evidence of his having been anointed to the prophetic office. 16-18. Let them . . . seek thy master. The sons of the prophets did not realize that Elijah's departure was permanent. Their persistent demands to send out a search party brought grudging consent. When their search proved fruitless, they had to accept the fact that Elisha was now the prophet of the Lord.

19. The men of the city said...Behold . . . the water is evil (AV, naught). The pleasant situation of Jericho was deeply marred by the poor water. Translate, . . . but the water is evil -- and the land – causing miscarriage. They regarded the bad water, which they drank, as responsible for miscarriages. The principal spring by the ancient site of Jericho is sweet and pure, while the others are brackish. 20. Bring me a new cruse. God's work must be performed through new – uncontaminated – vessels. Put salt therein. Salt cleanses and preserves. Here it is a symbol of the purifying, preserving power of God. 21. I have healed these waters. The sign and symbol of the healing was the salt cast therein. 22. The waters were healed unto this day. God sought to testify of his power to heal from sin and preserve through faith. The purification was permanent; the water from this spring remains good to this day (see on v. 19). Even so God's work of grace in us is permanent, our only sure foundation for building pure lives.

23. He went up . . . unto Beth-el. Elisha's first 'official' visit, as successor to Elijah, to Bethel (cf. vv. 2,3), the seat of the calf worship of Jeroboam (I Kgs 12:29). Little children. Rather, young men (ne'ārîm qe†annîm, plu.) not irresponsible babes. Both Solomon (I Kgs 3:7) and Jeremiah (Jer 1:6,7) are called na'ar (sing.) These were young people, morally responsible. Go up, thou bald head. They echoed the words of the sons of the prophets to Elisha: "The Lord will take away [up] thy master" (vv. 3,5). They meant: "Ascend, that we may be rid of thee [and may continue unreproved in our wicked ways]!" A bald or shaven head was the mark of a leper and denoted disgrace (Isa 3:17). While Elisha was probably not yet bald, the epithet shows that the youths considered him as an "outcast," like a leper. They despised God's prophet. 24. Cursed them in the name of the Lord. Their scorn was a dishonor to God. Hence the promise of divine judgment. They broke the divine covenant by ridiculing its overseer. Two she bears . . . tare forty and

two. Breaking the covenant brings punishment. The size of the group suggests that the taunting was prearranged.

25. After completing his business with the sons of the prophets, he went . . . to mount Carmel, for quiet and rest to prepare for the work ahead. He returned to Samaria. Elisha returned to the scene of his future, significant labors in behalf of Israel.

8) Jehoram's Expedition Against Moab. 3:1-27. Jehoram's campaign against Moab demonstrates how utterly abominable heathen religion was to God. The outcome was an object lesson to Israel showing her why she should turn from her idolatry. Nevertheless, she did not turn from it.

1. Jehoram . . . began to reign . . . the eighteenth year of Jehoshaphat. See 3:1; 1:17 for double dating his accession. This indicates a co-regency of Jehoshaphat and Jehoram in Judah (see Thiele, op. cit., p. 61ff.). 2. He wrought evil, etc. Jehoram did not sin as Ahab did; but he broke the covenant, for he cleaved unto the sins of Jeroboam (v. 3). For Jeroboam's evil way, see I Kgs 12:26-33; 13:33; II Kgs 10:29.

4. Mesha king of Moab. The Moabite Stone describes the length of Moab's subjection to Israel (see ANET, "Moabite Stone"). Rendered. Used to pay, designating tribute status. A sheepmaster. Moab abounded in sheep-raising. The number of sheep noted designates the annual tribute. 5. Rebelled. Mesha considered Israel weakened enough, after Ahab's death, for Moab to attempt to gain her freedom. See II Chronicles 20 for a previous Moabite invasion of Judah, when the Moabites were destroyed, and Moab was left too weak to repel the alliance. 6. King Jehoram . . . mustered all Israel (ASV). Mesha's revolt consisted in refusing the tribute. Jehoram, therefore, mustered his troops to collect it. 7. Sent to Jehoshaphat. The fact that Jehoram sought an alliance with Jehoshaphat indicates that he needed to cross Judean territory in order to advance against Moab. This in turn indicates that Mesha had strengthened his northern border. If Jehoram could gain Jehoshaphat, he would also gain Edom, which was now under Judah. Jehoshaphat forgot that alliances with those who sin against the Lord are forbidden to believers. 8. The route chosen by Jehoshaphat passed along the west side of the Dead Sea and around its southern end.

9. Seven days' journey. Having left Jerusalem and met and joined Edom on the way, they wandered about seeking Mesha, and finally ran short of water. 10. Jehoram's impiety led him to blame God for the disaster facing them. 11,12. A prophet of the Lord. Jehoshaphat rejected Jehoram's opinion. Here is Elisha. It seems that Jehoram did not know of Elisha's presence. The word of the Lord is with him. Elisha was known by reputation. Dire straits now forced them to go to him. 13,14. Get thee to the prophets of thy father. See verses 2,3. Elisha rejected all recourse to his office that savored of heathen belief in the magical. Nay. See on verse 10 above. If it had not been for the presence of Jehoshaphat, Elisha would have made no response to such impiety. Meeting with the leader of northern idolatry was nerve-racking. 15. Bring me a minstrel. To play hymns that he might be brought into a proper disposition to hear the Lord's word. The hand of the Lord. God answered by foretelling the success of the campaign. He would use it to show his people the abominable aspect of heathen worship.

16. Make this valley full of ditches. The valley was the Zered, present Wadi el Hesa, Moab's southern boundary. 17. Not see . . . rain; yet that valley shall be filled. Rain water from the upper hills would fill the ditches. The miracle lay in the timing. 18. Will deliver the Moabites. Confirmation that Jehovah was doing this. 19. Smite every fenced city. Destruction was to be thorough.

20. When the meat (meal) offering was offered. The water, arriving at the time of the love offering in the Temple, spoke of God's love, and thus foreshadowed the conclusion of the expedition. By . . . Edom. See verse 17. 21. The Moabites . . . stood in the border. Moab mustered its troops against the invasion. 22,23. In the morning. On the same morning that the water appeared. Red as blood. Due to its muddy color and to the morning sun's rays. The Moabites, eager for booty, concluded that their enemies had killed each other off. 24. When they came to the camp . . . the Israelites rose up. The Israelites surprised the attackers from an apparently empty camp. They went forward. The prediction of their conquest began to be fulfilled. 25. Beat down the cities. Such destruction represented the ordinary war policy of that time, now called a "scorched earth" policy. Kir-haraseth. The only city not taken, the present el Kerak. Standing on an eminence at the end of a narrow defile, it resisted attack by slingers on surrounding heights.

26. With great boldness Mesha personally led a sortie of seven hundred Moabite swordsmen; however, this attempt failed. Unto the king of Edom. Mesha evidently expected him to be a weak link or a less zealous soldier than the others. 27. Took his eldest son. The king of Moab desperately sought to induce his god to give victory. To heathen peoples, adversity was a sign that their god was angry. The sacrifice of the first-born was not too great a price to pay for a god's favor. Upon the wall. In Israel's sight, to cause Israel to fear Chemosh, the Moabite god, and therefore withdraw. Great indignation in Israel (not against, as in the AV). The Hebrew preposition 'al here indicates that Judah and Israel were indignant because of this abominable act (cf. Lev 18:21; 20:3). They departed . . . returned. Israel, Judah, and Moab broke off the engagement and returned to their land, their moral sensibilities profoundly shocked. The author seems to be asking: If Israel was so deeply moved in this case, why was she not shocked enough to forsake her own idolatry? But idolatry continued in Israel and in Judah.

9) The Prophetic Ministry of Elisha. 4:1–8:15. Elisha's prophetic ministry was intended to show that there is no need, personal or national, that God cannot meet, that all events are in his hands, and that he cares for his people.

a) Elisha and the Widow in Debt. 4:1-7.

1. A certain woman of the wives. The presence of married men among the sons of the prophets indicates that the prophets were not monks. Did fear the Lord. He had been a faithful servant of God. Creditor is come. The fact that sons were sometimes demanded as payment for debts is frequently indicated in cuneiform records. 2. Not anything . . . save a pot of oil. Elisha was about to reveal to the woman the living and loving God. The oil was olive oil. 3. Go, borrow . . . vessels. For the coming abundant provision. 4. Shut the door . . . pour. To exclude interruption during the filling process, which was to be done in God's presence. 6. The oil stayed. God's provision exactly meets our capacity and need. 7. Told the man of God. She sought further instruction. Sell . . . pay the debt. The debt could now be paid without the loss of needed sons. The rest. To sustain them until the boys should find work.

b) Elisha and the Woman of Shunem. 4:8-37.

8. Shunem. Present Sôlem, near Jezreel. As oft as he passed. The woman observed Elisha on his frequent trips. 9. Holy man. A real, not merely a so-called, man of God. 10. Let us make a . . . chamber. A weatherproof room on the flat top of the house, provided with true regard for his character.

12. Gehazi. In trying to make some return to the woman for her hospitality, Elisha used Gehazi to avoid embarrassing her. 13. I dwell among mine own people. She explained that her life was contented and undisturbed. She had not extended hospitality to them for gain. 14. What then is to be done for her? The woman had left them. Elisha questioned Gehazi. No child, and her husband is old. She desired a son, but her husband was too old to fulfill her wish. 16. Thou shalt embrace a son. The woman was called back and promised a son. Nay, my lord. This was the cry of a heart weary with hoping. Such a fulfillment she could not expect. Her protest meant, "Don't joke with me!" 17. Bare a son. God alone can revive and give life. Such blessings he grants to those who keep his covenant.

18. The child . . . went out to his father. The ensuing event occurred during harvest, the warmest time of the year. 19. My head. Probably he suffered a sunstroke. 20. Brought him to his mother, he . . . died. The Lord was about to demonstrate again the impotence of Baal. 21. Laid him on the bed of the man of God. She committed him to Elisha, the only one who could help her in this deep trouble. 22. Called unto her husband. She requested of her husband the help of a young man and an ass, probably because they had only two asses, both in use. 23. Wherefore wilt thou go . . . today? There were no annual or other religious affairs to occasion the visit. It shall be well. Hebrew, Peace. She simply urged him not to worry. God's prophet was her only help.

25. Behold . . . that Shunammite. Elisha saw her as she approached Mount Carmel. 26. He instructed Gehazi to ascertain her trouble. But she put off the servant, preferring to tell Elisha. 27. Caught him by the feet. Her anguish could no longer be held in. Let her alone. "Let her collect herself before telling me." The Lord hath hid it. Elisha was unaware of the child's death. On infrequent occasions, God prepared his prophet beforehand, but not usually. 28. Do not deceive me. "I did not ask for a child. If I be given a son only to see him die, it would have been better never to have had one."

29. Gird up thy loins. Elisha made Gehazi his deputy. To lay the rod, a symbol of God's power, upon the child's head was to arrest the oncoming death. Elisha believed the child was not dead. 30. I will not leave thee. That is to say, "This is not enough." He . . . followed her. Elisha perceived that the case was serious. 31. But there was neither voice, nor hearing. Elisha had no authority to depute to another the power God had given him. Hence Gehazi could do nothing. Elisha had been hasty in instructing his servant. 32. When Elisha was come . . . the child was dead. Elisha now understood completely the woman's grief. 33. Shut the door. Following the example of Elijah, his "master," Elisha sought quiet for prayer to God. Prayed. He asked the Lord to restore life to the boy. 34. Flesh . . . waxed warm. The preceding actions were symbolic of what was desired, and constituted an extension of the prophet's prayer, which was now being answered. 35. Walked. Elisha, greatly moved, waited for God's answer. 36. Call this Shunammite. The Lord was about to show his grace and mercy (cf. Ps 4:3; 25:10). God does reward believers for their faith and trust, but he punishes idolaters and terminates their lives.

c) Elisha and the Deadly Gourds. 4:38-41.

38. Came again to Gilgal. On one of his circuits. Set on the great pot, and seethe pottage. Elisha at mealtime used the dearth to teach the sons of the prophets that he who lives in God's presence need not regard the "dearth." 39. Gather herbs. Our "greens." Wild vine . . . wild gourds. Wild cucumbers, egg-shaped gourds having a bitter taste and producing colic and violent diarrhea when eaten. The young man mistook them for the edible variety (cf. Num 11:5). 40. Death in the pot. The familiar bitter taste warned them. They assumed that it was another similar plant, the colocynth, which also was poisonous and bitter tasting. 41. Bring meal . . . he cast it into the pot. By casting in ordinary and wholesome food, Elisha demonstrated God's power to remove evil. The Lord by faith can remove the evil in us.

d) Elisha and the Multiplying Loaves. 4:42-44.

42. A man from Baal-shalisha. Or Beth-shalisha, "House of Three Valleys" (I Sam 9:4), near Gilgal. The gift met the need of the prophets. Firstfruits. See Num 18:13; Deut 18:4. Lacking priests and Levites in Israel, he kept the spirit of the ordinance. These may well have been Israel's "priests and Levites." 43. Give the people. The prophet recognized and accepted the food as God's provision for the people, rather than for himself and his servant. They shall eat, and shall leave thereof. There would be enough and to spare. Thus the Lord demonstrated that his power and provision will always be sufficient and may exceed our needs, and thus he assures us that we need not slow up in opposing evil nor in seeking to root it out.

e) Conversion of Naaman. 5:1-27.

1. Naaman, captain of the host. The public phase of Elisha's ministry now began. Naaman's position enhanced the importance of the event. A leper. In Syria, leprosy caused only physical incapacity to perform required duties; Naaman as a leper won no further victories for Syria, and this caused genuine concern. 2. Brought away captive out of . . . Israel a little maid. A note on God's providence. 3,4. Would God my lord were with the prophet. Her thought was: There is a living God in Israel who can heal. One went in, and told his lord. Her words were reported to the king. 5,6. I will send. The king promptly sent to the king of Israel, because it was believed that he could gain anything he desired of Elisha, "his" prophet. The message went to the wrong person, for the Lord wished the healing to be a public matter. Apparently a truce existed between Syria and Israel. 8. He shall know that there is a prophet in Israel. That is, "Do not fear that war shall erupt because of your inability to heal Naaman. Almighty God will deliver Naaman." In face of fear we must remember, "Lo, I am with you alway" (Mt 28:20).

9,10. Elisha sent a messenger . . . saying, Go and wash in Jordan. Elisha remained inside to emphasize to Naaman that neither wealth (v. 5) nor position (v. 1) could buy healing. The washing in Jordan emphasized God's power to heal. 11,12. Naaman almost lost the blessing through pride. Humility and faith bring deliverance, however, to all (Mt 18:3). 13. How much rather. If we don't obey God in small things, how can we expect him to bless us with great things? 14. His flesh came again. Healing was obtained through obedience, on the seventh dip.

15. Now I know. Naaman learned that there was a God in Israel by doing His commands. Thus he was persuaded that Jehovah was God alone, and his own Lord (v. 17). 16. I will receive none. The Lord wants no payment but the loving obedience of redeemed souls. 17. Earth. Naaman desired the earth as a remembrance of his "blessing." 18,19. Pardon thy servant in this thing. Naaman was not to be regarded as worshiping the god [Hadad] -Rimmon. Go in peace. Naaman showed a tender conscience about appearing to worship idols, and he received assurance that God understood his heart. However, we are to beware of oft exposure to weakening environment lest we overestimate our powers of resistance.

20,21. Gehazi . . . said, i.e., thought in his heart. Is all well? Gehazi's haste made Naaman think he had brought misfortune on Elisha. 22-24. My master. Gehazi was blind to the fact that great harm would be done to the witness of the Lord through his covetousness. Bestowed them. Gehazi took something of "this Syrian," then hid his ill-gotten gains. 25-27. Thy servant went no whither. Gehazi lied to hide his sin. Is it a time . . . "This is the worst possible time to receive gold . . ." Gehazi hoped, through Naaman's largess, to buy the things enumerated. Shall cleave unto thee. "If you buy these, you also buy Naaman's leprosy." Naaman had become an Israelite, but Gehazi became a pagan through sin (cf. Mt 6:31-34). Naaman's conversion was to show the Israelites how easily the Lord could turn the hearts of their adversaries and thereby make them worshipers of Jehovah, fellow believers with the Jews themselves.

f) Recovery of the Borrowed Axe. 6:1-7.

1. The place where we dwell . . . is too strait. Through increase of believers, need arose for larger quarters. Elisha's ministry was bearing fruit. Our good works should draw others to the fellowship of the saints. 3. Go with thy servants. They expressed a sincere desire for Elisha's presence. 5. It was borrowed. This reflects their simple ways and their poverty. 6,7. The iron did swim. God's faithful ones may experience his deliverance in seemingly small matters. Sometimes deliverance comes by extraordinary interposition, as is shown by the following incident.

g) The Conqueror Frustrated. 6:8-23. The fact that God could maneuver the Syrians so easily was to teach Israel that the Lord could protect them as well as help them control their sin.

8. The king of Syria warred against Israel. Translate: The king of Syria, being at war with Israel. War now existed between Israel and Syria (see 5:5,6). My camp. Rather, we should expect, "we shall set an ambush." Theodotion reads, conceal yourselves. 9. Thither the Syrians are come down. The Syrians had set a trap. The Hebrew for are come down is inexplicable. The context demands a meaning like "concealed." 10. Saved himself. The king of Israel saved himself several times through Elisha's warning. 11. Will ye not. "One of you betrays my plans to Israel." How else could they have been known? 12. Elisha . . . telleth . . . the words that thou speakest in thy bedchamber. The Lord told Elisha. And the Syrians knew through their own spies that Elisha had this uncanny foreknowledge.

13. That I may . . . fetch him. The king of Syria, wanting to put a stop to Elisha's works, compassed Dothan (v. 14) to get him. 15. Alas . . . how shall we do? Sight looks to appearances, and fears; while faith (v. 16) looks to God, and the soul is at peace. 17. The mountain was full of horses and chariots. God's powerful protection was made evident (cf. Ps 34:7). 18. Smite . . . with blindness, i.e., lack of recognition. Elisha and his servant had gone down to him, i.e., to the Syrian host. The Lord rendered the Syrian army powerless, to show to all that any whom he protects cannot be taken (see on v. 7 above).

19,20. I will bring you to the man whom ye seek. Elisha's words imply a question on the part of the Syrians: "Where is Elisha?" But his answer, This is not the way, neither . . . the city, was to spare Dothan, and to lead the Syrians to Samaria, where he restored their powers of recognition. Elisha desired to confound further attacks. 21. Shall I smite? The king of Israel, recognizing that the circumstances were unusual, did not order the customary execution of prisoners of war (Deut 20:13). Actually, these were the Lord's prisoners. "This is not actually a case of war," Elisha replied, in effect. 22. That they may . . . go to their master. Syria was to know that she could do nothing to Israel, whose guardian was God. 23. The bands . . . came no more. Syrian incursions ceased for some time.

h) Ben-hadad's Profitless Siege of Samaria. 6:24–7:20.

This was the Ben-hadad of I Kgs 20, and of II Kgs 8:7, identified as Ben-hadad I. There were not two kings of the same name, as some scholars have formerly held. His inscription on the stele dedicated to the god Melkart has been reliably dated about 850 B.C. (BASOR, 87, p. 23ff.; 90, p. 30ff.). Hence his reign extended from before the thirty-sixth year of Asa (873/872 B.C.; II Chr 15:19) to shortly before 841 B.C., when Shalmaneser, as he records, attacked Hazael of Damascus. A minimum reign of thirty-two years and possibly more than forty is not unlikely, when we consider that Asa and Joash reigned forty years each, Uzziah fifty-two, and Manasseh fifty-five years.

24. Ben-hadad . . . besieged Samaria. See commentary on 6:7. The famine (cf. Lev 26:26-29; Deut 28:51-53) and siege were designed to punish the people for violating the covenant (cf. I Kgs 11:38 for normal covenant requirements). This was at least Ben-hadad's second siege of Samaria (see I Kgs 20). 25. Ass's head. The siege caused high prices even for defiling food. Dove's dung. If bird dung had been eaten, it would not have been dove's dung only; hence, the meaning is, a small grain. The Arabs speak of a certain plant (herba alcoli) as "sparrow's dung." The cab (qab) is a measure. 27. Whence shall I help thee? "The stores are exhausted. Except Jehovah help you, whence shall I?" 28. Give thy son. Idolatry stooped so low as to ask royalty to enforce a cannibalistic contract.

30. He rent his clothes . . . sackcloth. Because he wore sackcloth underneath his garments, as a symbol of repentance, he thought Elisha should have put an end to the suffering of the people, the continuation of which was now so shockingly revealed to him. 31. If [his] head . . . shall stand on him this day. Enraged by the woman's crime, he vowed vengeance upon Elisha for having deceived him, as he supposed (cf. 6:21,22). 32. Son of a murderer. An epithet. Possibly it designates Jehu as the king's father. But more likely it indicates that Joram's attitude was that of an unrepentant murderer. 33. He said. The king, having changed his mind (cf. v. 31), overtook the messenger and acknowledged that this evil (affliction) was of the Lord. What should I wait. "The end is here. Is there no hope?" The king came to the right attitude for God to deliver, and so must we. 7:1. Hear ye the word of the Lord. Upon the king's repentance (6:33), Elisha gave the ready answer that the next day there would be deliverance, with plenty of food at low prices. 2. If the Lord would make windows in heaven. The noble (lit., third officer. See Thiele, Mysterious Numbers, p. 114. Cf. v. 11) expressed unbelief and scorn at such a possibility.

3. Four leprous men. Nobody now brought them food. 4. Let us fall unto . . . the Syrians. Death either by starvation or at the hands of the Syrians faced them, but there was a chance that it was not so certain in the latter case. 5. Behold, there was no man there. God used the speculative reasonings of despised outcasts to discover Samaria's deliverance. 6. Made . . . the Syrians to hear a noise of chariots. God used sound produced in unknown ways to deceive and frighten away the besiegers. It may have been wind rushing through mountain defiles. Hittites . . . Musrians. Not Egyptians, as in the AV. Muṣri is in Syria (I Kgs 10:28). Shalmaneser III enumerates Muṣri among his adversaries at Qarqar in 853 B.C. (see ANET, Shalmaneser, ii. 78-102, note on Muṣru). Hittites as mercenary bands were common and available, though their empire had long since fallen. Egyptian mercenaries were neither common nor available.

8. These lepers came. Naturally their first thought was to satisfy their hunger. 9. We do not well. If they delayed till the morning, they would be held guilty of not feeling concern for the besieged. 10. No man there. They told first the essential item – that the soldiers had fled. Then they told of the provisions and the tents, all which was immediately reported to the king.

11,12. I will now shew you. The king, so soon forgetting Elisha's promise, suspected a plot by which Samaria would open its gates to its destruction. 13. Let some take. "Don't be hasty; let's find out. In any case, death awaits inside or out; and if not, deliverance is the quicker." 15. They went after them unto Jordan. And they found conclusive evidence of Syrian flight.

16. So a measure . . . for a shekel. Elisha's prediction as to the plenty was fulfilled. 17. The king appointed "the third officer" to keep order in the gate – the market place. Such a functionary was often needed. Trode upon him. This scoffer was trampled to death under the feet of hunger-driven people scrambling for food. 18-20. Elisha's prediction concerning food and the unbelieving lord is here recalled. Its fulfillment was perfectly natural, perfectly inevitable.

i) The King's Regard for Elisha. 8:1-6. In spite of the king's high regard for Elisha, shown by this incident, he still did not forsake his sins; for the next paragraph (vv. 7-15) indicates that judgment was to come.

1. Now Elisha had spoken (ASV), serves as introduction to what follows. The exact time of the incident is indeterminate. Arise. Elisha's warning was one more testimony to the fact that God cares for those who trust in Him. Evidently the woman was a widow by now, for it was she whom Elisha told to leave and it was she who "cried" for restoration of her properties when she returned. 3. When the woman returned, she found others dwelling in her holdings. 4. Tell me. The king desired to know of the less-known acts of Elisha. 5. The woman came in — in God's providence. 6. Restore. The king was carried away by the story of the raising of her son. He gave more than she asked. This king could have been either Ahaziah or Joram, both of whom "did evil" (I Kgs 22:51,52; II Kgs 3:1,2).

j) Hazael's Usurpation of Ben-hadad's Throne. 8:7-15.

7. The man of God is come hither. Elisha was well known in Syria. The prediction of I Kgs 19:15 waited till now for accomplishment. The change of kings in Syria had been of less importance to Elijah than the destruction of Baalism, against which he moved at once. Now Elisha's visit points up the judgment to come upon Israel through the agency of Hazael because she persisted in her sinful ways (see I Kgs 19:17; II Kgs 8:12). Hazael's rise to the kingship is told to complete the picture. 9. Forty camels' burden denotes a usual gift made by heathen people to their gods when an oracle was desired. 10. Thou mayest certainly recover. Translate: "Go say to him (as thou intendest to do), 'Thou shalt surely live'; however, the Lord has shown me that he shall surely die (by your hand)." 11. He [Hazael] was ashamed. Knowing the heart of Hazael, Elisha stared sternly at him till the Syrian's thoughts were revealed by his shamefacedness. The man of God wept. He foresaw what cruelties Hazael would wreak on Israel (II Kgs 10:32; 13:3,4,22) despite his protestations of humility — "Am I a dog" — and denial — "Do not think I want to be king" (8:13) — in the same breath. Elisha only repeated the fact that Hazael would be king. 15. Laid (AV, spread) it on his face. Hazael smothered the king to make it appear that he died a natural death. Then he usurped the throne, and thus fulfilled Elisha's words and his own ambition. Shalmaneser III (860–825 B.C.) of Assyria says of him: "Hazael, son of a nobody, seized the throne" (David D. Luckenbill, Ancient Records of Assyria and Babylonia, Vol. I, Sec. 681). In other words, Hazael was not of the royal line.

10) Reigns of Jehoram and Ahaziah in Judah. 8:16-29. The brief history of Jehoram and Ahaziah is included to show how Baal worship and its attendant sins came into Judah.

16. In the fifth year . . . Jehoram the son of Jehoshaphat . . . began to reign (cf. II Kgs 3:1). Jehoram began a coregency with his father (see Thiele, op. cit., pp. 54,65). 18. For the daughter of Ahab was his wife. She was the source of Jehoram's sins. Athaliah brought Baal worship into Judah, which accelerated the downward course of the nation and was a major factor in its ruin (II Chr 21:5-7). 19,20. Yet the Lord would not destroy. . . . In his days . . . Although Judah had plunged deep into sin, neither the dynasty nor the kingdom would now come to an end. Yet, Judah would pay dearly in the loss of once-subject principalities, such as Edom (vv. 20-22a) and Libnah (v. 22b). 21. Zair. Probably to be read Se'ir. That is, Edom. (See v. 21 for the area of campaign to support the reading of Se'ir). 22b. Libnah, which was near Philistia, was possibly incited by the Philistines (cf. II Chr 21:16). Sin causes immeasurable loss. 25. Did Ahaziah . . . begin to reign. In 842 B.C. (see Thiele, op. cit., pp. 63,64). 26,27. His mother's name was Athaliah. . . . And he walked in the way of . . . Ahab. Athaliah handed on Ahab's sins to Ahaziah. "Evil communications corrupt good manners." She was the granddaughter (descendant), not the daughter of Omri; a tribute to Omri. In II Chronicles 21 Ahaziah's name is spelled Jehoahaz, but it is the same name. Ahaz is the verbal part of the name, to which is prefixed the divine name Jah, spelled Jeho, and iah is added at the end. The ascension of Ahaziah marked the turning point in Judah, from which she never recovered. 28. He went with Joram. Here was the immediate cause that led Ahaziah to his death (cf.

9:16), which fell as a judgment on the "house of Ahab."

11) Jehu Made King in Israel. 9:1-10.

1. Elisha . . . called one of the sons of the prophets (ASV). The cup of iniquity of the house of Ahab was now full, and the judgment of I Kgs 21:21-24 was about to fall. The next events occurred during Joram's convalescence. Ramoth-gilead. Joram and Ahaziah had joined together in an attempt to wrest this place from Syria. Their attempt brought the necessary military strength and disposition of personages into proper setting for the accomplishment of God's purposes. 3. Thus saith the Lord, I have anointed thee king. Jehu was the second of the two agencies – the prophets Elijah and Elisha being the first – by which the Lord sought to make his will known. If the first and gracious ministry of chastisement was not heeded, the second ministry, of judgment, must follow. 5. Behold, the captains of the host were sitting. The reference to "the house" (v. 6) indicates that Ramoth-gilead had been taken. Jehu said. Jehu answered as spokesman, signifying that he was the chief. Jehu, it appears, was highly regarded by the others, probably because he had distinguished himself in the capture of Ramoth, while Joram had left the scene of battle to recuperate from wounds. 6. Poured the oil. Signifying divine appointment either to the kingship or as a special servant of the Lord. Jehu was appointed to both offices for a single purpose (see vv. 6,7). 7. Smite the house of Ahab. The commission given covered the whole house (v. 8). 9. Like the house of Jeroboam . . . and . . . the house of Baasha. See I Kgs 15:29; 16:11. 10. He . . . fled. A predictive act indicating the swiftness and awfulness of the destruction to follow.

C. From Jehu to the Destruction of Israel. 9:11–17:41.

Because idolatry threatened to destroy all remaining good influences in Israel and to invade Judah and so destroy the whole nation, the house of Ahab was marked for extinction.

1) Jehu's Reign. 9:11–10:36.

In conformity with the divine principles regarding judgment of sin, as set forth in Deuteronomy, Jehu became the executioner of the wrath of God on the chief sinners in Israel – Ahab and his wicked descendants.

11. Is there peace? Is all well? (AV) The question concerned conditions in Israel. Mad fellow. The epithet conveys their impression of his behavior. Ye know. Jehu implied that they had sent the prophet-disciple "with a view to proposing that he lead an attempt to revolt." Their reply, "tell us now," revealed their honesty. So Jehu revealed the story. 13. Translate: Took every man his garment and spread it upon the way to the stairs and blew. . . . They laid an impromptu carpet for his on-the-spot coronation.

14. Now Joram had defended (AV, kept). After Joram had taken Ramoth, the Syrians had attacked him there, and wounded him in battle. Kept Ramoth-gilead. As an outpost against raids by Hazael. 15. Let none go forth – to divulge plans to Joram. 17. A watchman . . . said, I see a company. Joram's unpreparedness facilitated the swift execution of judgment (cf. v. 10; he fled). 18. Turn thee behind me. Jehu retained the two messengers to avoid any "leak" to Joram. The act was reported to Joram. 20. The driving of Jehu . . . he driveth furiously. The driving was said to resemble the furious pace customary to Jehu. Joram now feared for the situation in Gilead. 21. Make ready. To meet the possible bad news. 22. Is it peace. That is, Was the Gilead campaign successful? What peace . . . ? Jehu played upon the word peace, reminding Joram that there was no "peace" to him who partook of Jezebel's sins of idolatry and witchcraft (cf. Ex 22:18; Deut 18:10). Jehu condemned Jezebel as the founder and patroness of idolatry in Israel. 23. Treachery. Joram did not perceive God's judgment. 24. Between his arms, i.e., between his shoulders. Jehu felled Joram as he turned and fled. 25. The portion of the field of Naboth. The burden was that he should suffer death by judgment. And the fulfillment of the prediction rightfully took place near Naboth's vineyard (cf. vv. 21,23,25). This incident stands out as showing the Lord's power to use our actions to fulfill his will. Hence it shows, too, that he could have destroyed his nation Israel even though they thought that not probable.

27. When Ahaziah . . . saw. Ahaziah foresaw the doom awaiting him as a descendant of Ahab (cf. I Kgs 21:21). Smite him also. . . . at the going up to Gur. Jehu gave orders to his men to pursue Ahaziah, while he himself set out for Jezreel to find Jezebel. He estimated that the men would overtake him in the pass of Gur near Ibleam.

30. Jezebel heard . . . painted her face. Jezebel knew for what purpose he had come. 31. Had Zimri peace . . . ? "You Zimri! you regicide!" She sought to stop Jehu by reminding him of the quick overthrow and death of Zimri. 32. Who is on my side? Jehu called on the onlookers to take sides on the issue. Eunuchs. These probably signaled to Jehu as allies. 33. They threw her down . . . and he, i.e., the chariot horses, trode her under foot. 34. Go . . . bury her. After he had eaten, he belatedly remembered that Jezebel was a princess. 36. In Jezreel shall dogs eat the flesh of Jezebel. So signally and by the carelessness of Jehu was the prediction of the Lord concerning Jezebel fulfilled. 37. They shall not say. Jezebel would have no grave at all but would be as offal.

10:1. And Ahab had seventy sons. Cf. verses 2,3. All Ahab's male descendants are meant. Jehu intended to obliterate all the house of Ahab. He was now beginning to visit judgment on Israel as a nation. For Israel to lose this family would be to lose the entire line of one of her most able kings. However, what Jehu did in dispatching these people and the worshipers of Baal was condemned by Hosea (1:4), for Jehu acted in a spirit of bloodthirstiness, greed, and ambition. 3. Look even out . . . set him on his father's throne, and fight. Jehu proposed settling affairs by means of a gladiatorial contest (cf. II Sam 2:11-17), a common means of settlement of disputes in the ancient Near East. Guilt or fear usually worked to the advantage of the winner. 5. We are thy servants. Fear brought quick acquiescence. Though they favored the old regime (v. 4), they renounced any intent to revolt. 6. The heads of . . . your master's sons. The elders were required to execute judgment on sin. 7. Seventy persons. Specifically, the ones demanded (cf. I Kgs 21:21,22). 8. They have brought. . . . Lay ye them. Jehu's request was fulfilled. 9. Ye be righteous. That is, "Ye are just; so judge for yourselves." He sought to give the impression that he had nothing to do with this massacre, alleging that, although the seventy died by their act, yet they died because of the sentence of Elijah's prediction.

12. He . . . came to Samaria. After all effective opposition had ceased. 13. Who are ye? Cf. II Chr 22:8. These were cousins of Ahaziah's sons. They knew nothing of the revolution. 14. Take them alive. To eliminate them also. Slew them. Jehu eliminated them to prevent their leading a counterrevolution.

15. Jehonadab's ascending into Jehu's chariot signified that he accepted Jehu as a servant of Jehovah, hence an adversary of Ahab. As an adversary of Ahab, he led the religious community in worshiping Jehovah. Jehu used him to sanction his actions in Samaria. Josephus reports that Jehonadab praised Jehu's action.

18. Jehu shall serve him [Baal] much. Jehu allayed the people's suspicions by pretending to worship Baal. This act, which was one of his falsehoods, showed his bloodthirstiness. 19-22. Call unto me all the prophets of Baal. . . . But Jehu did it in subtilty. Jehu planned a trap. The garments (v. 22) were to make it easier to identify the priests of Baal. Gathering them in the outer-court confines of the Temple (v. 21) made it easier to effect their death. 23. Search. Only the priests of Baal were to be put to death. Jehu intended to break the power of Ahab's dynasty completely by removing these adherents, and he hoped at the same time to gain the support of those loyal to Israel's God, thus securing his own position.

25. Translate: When they had completed preparations for the sacrifice, Jehu said . . . Jehu did not participate in the sacrifice. To do so would have been fatal to his attempt to win the favor of the faithful Israelites. Go in. Only the execution of the priests of Baal could adequately serve the requirements of justice and God's holiness. 27,28. They brake down. Jehu destroyed the cult center to bring the cult to an end.

29,30. Howbeit from the sins of Jeroboam . . . Jehu departed not. Jeroboam had "broken the covenant" by leading Israel into the worship of the calves of Bethel and Dan. Jehu continued this sin. For this act of Jehu, Israel went into captivity. Thus Jehu destroyed the value of his work. His dynasty was military, not religious. 32. The Lord began to cut Israel short. In Jehu Israel had her last chance. Her lack was that Jehu's reforms ended in his revival of the "sins of Jeroboam." The "cutting off" was the loss of territory to Hazael (v. 33).

2) Athaliah of Judah. 11:1-20.

The sin of Athaliah brought about her death, but God preserved the line of the house of David, in conformity with II Sam 7:28,29.

1. And when Athaliah . . . saw that her son was dead. Cf. II Chr 22:10-12. Like many other Oriental usurpers, she attempted to eliminate any and all claimants to the throne. 2. Jehosheba. Half sister to Ahaziah (II Chr 22:11), the wife of Jehoiada. Nurse. Wet nurse; Joash was an infant.

4. And the seventh year. See II Chr 23:1ff. for the gathering of an alliance of five hundred lifeguards and the Levites in a covenant with Jehoiada about Joash, probably at one of the three annual feasts. Verses 5-8 describe the groups of the lifeguard of the king as Jehoida prepared to move Joash from the Temple to the throne. One third of those who came on duty on the Sabbath were to be divided into three parts: one band was to stand guard at the king's house – the palace; another was to guard the palace exit – the gate Sur; and the third was to guard the approach and the gate to the king's house. The two thirds released on the Sabbath were to guard the Temple and Joash with closed ranks, and to slay any that pierced their ranges (ranks). 10. To the captains . . . did the priest give . . . spears and shields. Jehoiada armed the soldiers on the day appointed to set Joash on the throne. 11,12. Joash was crowned by the Lord's officer (the priest). The testimony. At least the Decalogue (Ex 25:21; 16:34). Cf. Deut 17:19. The presence of the multitude indicates that the coronation occurred on a feast day. The people signified their approval by clapping their hands.

13. And when Athaliah heard. Noise of this degree did not normally occur at the change of the palace guard or the course of priests. Athaliah had only to see Joash standing in the king's place ('al hā'amôd) to realize the intent of the assemblage. See II Chr 23:13; Ezk 46:2; (cf. II Chr 6:13 for the concept of the place reserved for the king). Her cry of Treason (v. 14), presumes the presence of her own bodyguard, whom she now ordered to take the boy Jehoash and his supporters. 15. Have her forth. Jehoiada acted first and commanded that Athaliah be taken and executed. Bracketed between ranks, she was led out and executed in the palace horse gate. Jehoiada's faithfulness prevented the politically expedient policy of Jehoshaphat from resulting in the extinction of David's line. However, the priest's act only put off Judah's final downfall.

17. And Jehoiada made a covenant . . . The covenant of Mount Sinai, broken by the sins of Athaliah, Ahaziah, and Jehoram. Joash accepted this "testimony," by which he would govern as God's viceroy, agreed to by the people. This is the covenant. The destruction of the house of Baal (v. 18), in Jerusalem, which necessarily followed their renewing the covenant, occurred after Jehoash had been placed on the throne (v. 19). The order is logical, for verse 18 follows verse 19 in time, while verses 19,20 refer to events under the regime of Jehoash. 18. And the priest appointed officers. Jehoiada installed the priestly courses in the Temple (cf. I Chr 25; II Chr 23:18).

3) Judah Under Jehoash. 11:21–12:21. Emphasis is here laid upon the renewing of the covenant under Jehoash, requiring the cleansing of the Temple and its restoration to the worship of Jehovah. The calamities that came upon him reflect the principle of Gal 5:17.

12:1. This section should begin with 11:21 in accordance with the normal formula used in regard to a king's life and reign. Jehoash began to reign. For the time of this event see Thiele, Mysterious Numbers, p. 66. 2. Jehoash did right . . . all his days wherein Jehoiada . . . instructed him. Jehoash walked with the Lord only as long as Jehoiada lived (II Chr 24:17-25). He lacked personal conviction of the truth. 3. High places: See I Kgs 22:43; II Kgs 12:3; 14:4; 15:4; II Chr 15:17; 20:33. Not idolatrous high places but illegal centers of Jehovistic worship. Notice I Kgs 3:2. Only two kings of Judah, Hezekiah (II Kgs 18:4) and Josiah (23:8), removed the high places. One of the evil effects of this worship on the high places was that it divided Judah's spiritual vision; and thus it contributed materially to the nation's fall.

4. Jehoash said to the priests. As the final stage of the renewal of the covenant with Jehovah, it was necessary to repair those sections of the Temple that had fallen into a state of dilapidation during the reign of Athaliah (cf. II Chr 24:6,7). Two classes of offerings are cited: (1) payment in fulfillment of a vow (Lev 27:2), the amount fixed by the priest, actually an assessment of persons (Lev 27:8) for the support of the Temple; and (2) the money coming into one's heart (II Kgs 12:4b) – a freewill offering to Jehovah. Translate: All the money regarding dedicatory matters, which is brought . . . the pieces of silver (not coinage) used in business, the silver of one's valuation . . . Jehoash simply asked that temple funds be used for the Temple. The money of every one that passeth. Pieces of silver sheet, of definite weight, used in business. Coined money did not occur until the Exile.

6. In the three and twentieth year . . . had not repaired. Instructions were not followed, possibly because the total temple income was insufficient to support the Levites. Previous idolatry under Athaliah had discouraged giving by the people. 7. Receive no more money. Jehoash commanded that they cease receiving these monies from the worshipers. 8. The priests consented. For practical reasons, new arrangements were divised to collect repair money, in which process the priests were eliminated.

9. Jehoiada . . . took a chest. II Chronicles 24:8 (RSV) says "outside the gate"; here it says, beside the altar. The chest may have been first beside the altar, later outside the gate, for easier access. 10. The king's scribe and the high priest came up. The work was under the direction of the king in co-operation with the high priest (cf. v. 8). 13. There were not made . . . bowls of silver. II Chronicles 24:14 states what was done with the residue from repairs. There is no contradiction here. 16. The trespass money (cf. Num 5:8,9; Lev 5:16). These being the "cost of sin," they could not be brought into the Temple.

17. Hazael king of Syria went up. For the sin of Jehoash as the cause of invasion, see II Chr 24:15-22. The exaction of ransom is to be regarded as a judgment on Jehoash and on Judah for their sin (see II Chr 24:18b). 20. His servants . . . made a conspiracy. Joash died because he had had Zechariah, grandson of Jehoiada, slain (II Chr 24:25). 21. Jehozabad. "Zabad" in II Chr 24:26 was written in error for Zachar, contracted from Jehozachar.

4) Israel Under Jehoahaz and Jehoash. 13:1-25. This section demonstrates how insidiously sin entrenches itself and spreads in spite of repeated efforts to eradicate it.

1. In the three and twentieth year of Joash. The nonaccession year method of dating was employed, reducing this twenty-third year to the actual twenty-second, the first year of Jehoahaz, with his seventeenth year the thirty-eighth of Joash (21 + 17 = 38; see Thiele, op. cit., pp. 37,38, chart, op. p. 74). 2. Followed the sins of Jeroboam. The covenant of God remained broken under this king (see also 10:29).

3. The Lord . . . delivered them into the hand of Hazael king of Syria – for the sins enumerated in verse 2 above. For the loss of the territory east of Jordan, see II Kgs 10:32. These new losses were now in the territory west of Jordan, thus an advance on the former chastisements. For several years Hazael was occupied with incursions by Shalmaneser III, but after that ruler's death, he was free to turn his oppressive activities toward Israel. All their days; i.e., the days of Jehoahaz (cf. vv. 22,25). 4. And Jehoahaz besought the Lord. Jehoahaz' extremity (v. 7) forced him to seek the Lord, who sent deliverance for the sake of the oppressed people. 5. The Lord gave Israel a saviour. He came after Jehoahaz died (see v. 22 below). 6. The people continued to practice the sins of . . . Jeroboam, thus continuing the broken covenant. Jehoahaz' "repentance" was only mental; he did not return to the covenant. 7. Neither did he leave. See verse 4. The he is the Lord.

10. Began Jehoash the son of Jehoahaz to reign. This was in 798 B.C. (see Thiele, op. cit., p. 67). 11. He did evil. Though Baalism was rooted out, there was, however, no real return of Israel to the Lord under Jehoash, for the calves of Dan and Bethel were still worshiped. The "sins of Jeroboam" had now become permanently enshrined in the hearts of the people.

14. Now Elisha was fallen sick. This incident is related here, with following verses 22-25, because of the needs of topical outline. This was at least forty-five years after the accession of Jehu (cf. 10:36; 13:1). Elisha's sickness was serious enough to bring a visit from Jehoash of Israel to his bedside (13:14-19 falls in the period of 13:10-13). The chariot of Israel. Jehoash meant to say, "When you go, whence will wisdom and deliverance come?" 15. Take bow and arrows. The means of victory and method of assurance for Jehoash. 17. Thou shalt smite is a specific promise of deliverance by the Lord in fulfillment of the promise of verse 4. 18. Take the arrows. Compare the last clauses of verses 17 and 19. Jehoash lacked faith and tireless zeal to persevere in trusting the Lord for the utter rout of Syria. He was told (v. 18) to shoot the arrows to the earth. That is, "Lay your enemies in the dust." 19. Five or six times. Until they were vanquished.

20. And Elisha died. The words form a transition to the next event. 21. He revived, and stood up. The dead man was restored to life because the Lord wrought a miracle as confirmation of His promise of deliverance to Jehoash.

22. The words, But Hazael . . . oppressed Israel, resume the theme of verse 3. 23. And the Lord was gracious resumes the theme of 4a. Although Hazael had almost ruined Israel, the Lord did not as yet permit the destruction of the nation, because of his covenant with Abraham. 24. Hazael . . . died. A first step in the promised deliverance. 25. Took again . . . the cities. These were on the east side of Jordan (cf. 10:32,33). These cities had been taken by Hazael, leaving only the west side of Jordan for Jehoahaz. Three times. Cf. v. 19.

5) Judah Under Amaziah and Azariah. 14:1-22. Amaziah's record tells the story of how an arrogant heart lifted up in pride is abased, and how the Lord brings judgment upon the sin of arrogant pride.

1. In the second year of Joash . . . reigned Amaziah . . . king of Judah. This was 797/796 B.C. (See on 13:1 for the chronology of the period, and Thiele, Mysterious Numbers, p. 68ff.) 3. He did right . . . yet not like David his father [=ancestor]. For the account of how Amaziah failed to follow David, see II Chr 25:14ff. He later began to worship Edomite gods brought back from his campaign in Edom. He followed in the steps of his father Joash (3c). 5,6. He slew his servants. Amaziah did not follow the Oriental custom of slaying the conspirators and their children; he slew only the conspirators, in conformity with Deut 24:16. Note: The citation from the law of Moses is evidence that Deuteronomy is not a late composition, as the higher critics hold. 7. And took Selah by war. Selah is ancient Petra. He also took its gods to Jerusalem and worshiped them (cf. II Chr 25:14ff.). This describes an unprovoked act of war on Edom, showing Amaziah's arrogance and cruelty. It was one more step down in Judah's progression to her final destruction.

8,9. Amaziah sent messengers. His arrogance led him into trouble with Israel, because of his worship of Edomite gods. In the flush of victory over Petra, Amaziah challenged Jehoash of Israel to war: Come, let us look one another in the face. Josephus (Antiq. lx. 9. 2) says that Amaziah demanded submission, or war would result (see also II Chr 25:13). The thistle . . . sent to the cedar. Jehoash was the cedar; Amaziah was the thistle. Amaziah's challenge was presumptuous and arrogant. Jehoash had smitten Syria and measured her. Verses 11-14 describe the defeat of Judah, the partial destruction of Jerusalem, and the taking of hostages – all because Amaziah worshiped Edomite gods (II Chr 25:20). Amaziah himself was taken captive (II Kgs 14:13), for he had rejected the prophet's counsel to repent (II Chr 25: 15,16).

17-20. Amaziah . . . lived after . . . Jehoash . . . fifteen years. See Thiele, Mysterious Numbers, pp. 68-72. Jereboam II had a co-regency of twelve years with Jehoash (cf. 14:23; 15:1); Azariah had a co-regency of twenty-four years with Amaziah (cf. 15:1,8; 14:23). Azariah was elevated to the throne, then, in the fifth year of Amaziah, probably because the people were dissatisfied with Amaziah's wanton expedition against Israel and its result (see ch. 19). Amaziah fled to Lachish, a former royal city, a fortress offering refuge, to avoid capture by the conspirators. Situated near Judah's southern boundary, it offered quick escape to other countries, and possible safety. Slew him there. Possibly the people of Lachish did not help the king to defend himself.

21. Now the people . . . had taken Azariah. See verses 13,19; cf. II Chr 26:1,2. The sameness of these passages in Kings and Chronicles, when compared with II Kgs 15:1-7, indicates that Uzziah placed more emphasis on conquest than on ridding Judah of the divisive high places (cf. II Chr 26:11ff.). Azariah means (He whose) help is Jah. His other name, Uzziah, means, "My strength is Jah." 22. Elath. The event is important; see 15:1-7.

6) Reign of Jeroboam II over Israel. 14:23-29. This account of the reign of Jeroboam II shows (1) how Jeroboam broke the covenant (for only the king's relation to the covenant was important); and (2) how Jehovah's promise to Jehoash (cf. 13:17) was fulfilled.

23. Fifteenth year of Amaziah. Amaziah and Uzziah were co-rulers; so Jeroboam's ascension to the throne is reckoned in terms of the king of Judah first in order (see vv. 17-20). 24. He did evil. Jeroboam continued the breaking of the covenant, the worship of the calves of Dan and Bethel (cf. 10:29). 25. Hamath. Not the city but the area (see I Kgs 8:65; Amos 6:2,14; cf. II Kgs 23:33; 25:21). Jeroboam II was an able administrator and general. Jonah. An incidental prediction of Jonah the prophet, not contained in the Book of Jonah but dating the prophet's time – 780 B.C. 26. The Lord saw. Cf. 13:23. Testimony is given to the faithfulness of God that it might turn men's hearts to God.

7) Reign of Azariah over Judah. 15:1-7. The importance of Uzziah's reign lies in his failure to eliminate the worship in the high places, which divided the religious unity of the people, contrary to Deut 12:1-5,14; 16:16.

1. The twenty and seventh year of Jeroboam. See on 14:17. 3. Did right. He followed the early life of his father Amaziah. 5. The Lord smote the king. Uzziah intruded into the priest's office (II Chr 26:17ff.), and for this he was smitten with leprosy (cf. Num 12:10; Deut 24:8,9; II Sam 3:29; II Kgs 5:27). Azariah's lack of spiritual insight, revealed in allowing the high places to continue, contributed to his grasping after control of the priesthood (cf. II Chr 26:16,17).

8) Reigns of Zachariah, Shallum, Menahem, Pekahiah, and Pekah in Israel. 15:8-31. The lack of information about the activities of these men is intentional, to show how their despising the covenant hastened the fall of Samaria, now in its final dissolution.

8. Thirty and eighth year of Azariah. See on 14:17ff. Zachariah continued to break the covenant by maintaining the nationally divisive and idolatrous worship of the calves of Dan and Bethel. 10. Before the people. Zachariah was assassinated publicly. Lack of retaliation by the people indicates that they had sunk far down in their sins. 12. This was the word. Zachariah was the fourth descendant of Jehu, the last of that line to hold the throne (cf. 10:30).

13. Shallum . . . began to reign. The rapid succession of murders amply illustrates the pitiful condition of the kingdom. 14. For Menahem . . . smote Shallum. The for refers to the shortness of Shallum's reign. Menahem, the commander in chief, according to Josephus (Antiq. ix. 11. 1), quartered in Tirzah, hearing of the assassination, marched against Shallum, defeated and slew him, then ascended the throne himself. Menahem's action was based on the facts that the Israelite kingdom was a military monarchy, that Shallum was a usurper, and that when the Jehu line died out, the throne would go to the commander in chief of the army. 16. Menahem smote Tiphsah. Not the Tiphsah (Thapsacus) on the Euphrates, but the one near Tirzah; Assyria would have stopped any such action at the former. Refusal to recognize him as king arose here, and his ferocious deeds were intended to warn and demoralize his opposition. There was no spiritual vitality left to oppose him.

17. In the nine and thirtieth year. Zachariah ascended the throne in Uzziah's thirty-eighth year, and the reigns of the two kings Zachariah and Shallum bridged over into his thirty-ninth year. 18. He did evil. See on verse 8. 19. Pul the king of Assyria. This is Tiglath-pileser III, who had another name, Pul (Pulu of the Assyr. inscriptions. See JNES, III (July, 1944), pp. 137-186. See also, Thiele, Mysterious Numbers, pp. 76,77). This first Biblical reference to the Assyrians reveals Assyria on the march, on her road to empire. Assyria became the great power in the Near East. The empire fell about 611 B.C. Tiglath-pileser says: "Terror overwhelmed him [Menahem], like a bird alone he fled, and submitted to me. To his place I brought him back and . . . silver . . . I received . . . his tribute" (Luckenbill, Anc. Rec., Vol. 1, para. 815). Menahem fled; but he was captured, set up as a puppet, and forced to pay tribute – a thousand talents of silver. The date is approximately 743 B.C. (see Thiele, op. cit., p. 98).

23. In the fiftieth year of Azariah . . . Pekahiah . . . began to reign. Pekahiah's two-year reign coincided with Azariah's last two years, overlapping with his fiftieth year (see Thiele, op. cit., pp. 73,74). 24. He did evil. Cf. on verse 8. His evil was that he followed in the sins of Jeroboam. 25. Pekah . . . conspired. Pekah was an adjutant of Pekahiah, a captain of fifty men of the king's bodyguard. The fact that the bodyguard, instead of protecting the king, helped Pekah slay him, shows how the bonds of discipline, order, fidelity, and obedience had dissolved. Therefore the Lord had a "controversy with the inhabitants of the land" (Hos 4:1,2). 27. In the two and fiftieth year. Pekah took the throne of Israel in Uzziah's last year. Correlation of all references to Pekahiah, Uzziah, Jotham, Ahaz, and Hoshea reveals the startling fact that Pekah usurped the years of Menahem and Pekahiah (see Thiele, op. cit., p. 102ff.; also pp. 133,134). 28. He did evil. See on verse 8. Pekah perpetuated the sins of Jeroboam, thus breaking the covenant. It appears that the captivity by Tiglath-pileser was a judgment on the sins of Pekah.

29. In the days of Pekah . . . came Tiglath-pileser. These activities occurred before 732 B.C., when Tiglath, as we learn from data in the Eponym Chronicle, placed Hoshea on the throne of Israel. This deportation became the beginning of the end of Israel, foretold by a long line of prophets. Tiglath-pileser III (745–727 B.C.) had made Menahem a vassal (see Luckenbill, Anc. Rec., Vol. I, para. 816). He took . . . and carried them captive. The first of two deportations of Israel, the second being by Shalmaneser V in 723/722. This was in fulfillment of Deut 28:36. Ijon. In Naphtali. See I Kgs 15:20. Abel-beth-maachah. See II Sam 20:14,18. Janoah. Also in Naphtali, probably near the first two. Kedesh. To the northwest of Lake Huleh. Hazor has been excavated by Yigael Yadin [see BA, XIX, No. 1 (Feb., 1956); XX, No. 2 (May, 1957); XXI, No. 2 (May, 1958); XXII, No. 1 (Feb., 1959)]. 30. Hoshea . . . made a conspiracy against Pekah. Tiglath-pileser says, "I placed Ausi (Hosea) over them as king." What happened was that Hosea had to have his usurpation of the throne approved by Tiglath.

9) Judah Under Jotham and Ahaz. 15:32–16:20.

32. The second year of Pekah. Cf. 15:5; II Chr 27:1-9. Jotham had a co-regency with Uzziah, 751/750 to 740/739, and four years' co-regency with Ahaz, 736/735–732/731 B.C. (cf. Thiele, Mysterious Numbers, p. 116ff.). He actually began to rule in the second year of the reign of Menahem (II Kgs 15:17). 33. Sixteen years. See on verse 37. 34. He did according to all that his father Uzziah had done, except that he did not enter the sanctuary (II Chr 26:16), i.e., did not usurp priestly functions. 35. High places. Jotham let the divisive high places continue (see on 12:3). He built the upper (AV, higher) gate (cf. Ezk 9:2; on the north side of the Temple). He rebuilt it. The verse speaks of high places and the upper or higher gate, from which juxtaposition of words the conclusion is to be drawn that Jotham constructed the gate to attract the people to the Temple so that they would offer their sacrifices there.

37. In those days. In the days of Jotham. Rezin . . . Pekah. Syria and Israel were now seeking to force Jotham into the pro-Assyria camp (cf. Thiele, op. cit., p. 117). Ahaz was brought to the throne, and Jotham is credited with only sixteen years (15:33), due to popular resentment of his (Jotham's) anti-Assyria policy. See also on verse 32.

16:1. In the seventeenth year. See on 15:32. 2,3. Ahaz . . . . walked in the way of the kings of Israel (cf. II Chr 28:1-4, esp. 3,4). Ahaz broke the covenant of the Lord. He lived as the kings of Israel lived, and made images of Baal to worship (cf. Ex 20:3). Made his son to pass through the fire. Numbers 31:23 indicates that this means a literal burning. He made of his children a burnt sacrifice to Baal (II Chr 28:3). This was one of the sins for which Israel was deported (see on 17:17).

5. Then Rezin . . . and Pekah. See on verse 37. Now the peoples of Syria and Canaan were resisting Assyria's advance, and this was an attempt to force Ahaz to join the movement. Thus the Lord used circumstances to chastise Ahaz, bringing these forces against him because of his sins. For the deliverance proffered by the Lord, see Isaiah 7. Ahaz was defeated by Pekah, however, because he had no faith (Isa 7:4,9b, 11,12), and many of his people were taken captive (II Chr 28:5-8). 6. Rezin . . . recovered Elath [from Judah] to Syria. A further punishment for Judah for her sins. 7. So Ahaz sent. Cf. Isa 7:17. Assyria would ultimately plunder the land even if the appeal was made. When Syria fell, Judah lost her buffer against Assyrian invasion. Thy servant. The price for help from Assyria was vassalage. 8. Ahaz took the silver and gold. He did not heed Isaiah's promise. He could not believe! 9. The king of Assyria . . . went up against Damascus. Tiglath took Damascus, but he also afflicted Ahaz. II Chronicles 28:20 says, "It did him [Ahaz] no good."

10. And king Ahaz . . . saw an altar (in Damascus). Ahaz went to express his obedience to Tiglath for his continued favor, but the altar became one more sin by which he turned away from God. 11. Note the apostasy of Urijah the high priest, who by his actions, broke the covenant. 12. The king saw the altar . . . and offered thereon. Ahaz found the altar ready (cf. v. 10) – the original Solomonic altar having been pushed aside to the north side – and he made his sacrifices thereon. 15. To enquire by. Translate: "Will be to me for deliberation;" i.e., "I will make further arrangements about it after deliberation." The Solomonic altar did not please Ahaz after he had seen the altar in Damascus. He sinned against the Lord by having removed the altar made according to the Lord's instruction and placed there by His direction. God's appointed instruments are not to be tampered with. 17,18. Ahaz made further depredations upon the temple furnishings, stripping them of valuable ornamentation for fear of (not for, i.e., for the benefit of) the king of Assyria. He guarded against exciting the cupidity of Tiglath-pileser, should he come into Jerusalem.

10) Destruction and Captivity of Israel. 17:1-41.

1. In the twelfth year. See on 16:1-4; 15:27–31. 2. Not as the kings of Israel . . . before him. Chronicles is silent on the manner of difference. It was only in his "walk"; he perpetuated Jeroboam's sins. 3. Against him came up Shalmaneser. See 15:30. Tiglath-pileser III had died in 727 B.C. Hoshea became vassal to Shalmaneser. He was to pay tribute annually. About his sixth year, Hoshea sought independence from Assyria. He conspired against Shalmaneser by forming an alliance with So of Egypt, and he stopped paying the tribute. Thus, naturally, arose the attack against Israel, and her fall.

5. The king of Assyria . . . besieged it [Samaria] three years. Time here is inclusive; parts of years are considered as whole years (cf. 18:9,10 for the exact time). 6. King of Assyria took Samaria. For the belief that this was Shalmaneser V and not Sargon II, see J. P. Free, Archaeology and Bible History, pp. 199,200. Carried Israel away into Assyria. Not Assyria as such, but the empire. In Halah and on the Habor. Cf. I Chr 5:26. The Habor is the river Khabur, which empties into the Euphrates. Gozan is the present Tell Halaf (Assyr. Guzanu). Cities of the Medes. The area northeast of Nineveh. (See Natl. Geog. Mag. map: "Bible Lands and the Cradle of Western Civilizations.") Transportation of peoples was now the accepted norm for controlling subject nations.

7. And it came to pass when the children of Israel. The conclusion is in 17:18: Therefore the Lord. Verses 8-12 contain a list of sins – specifications for judgment. Who had brought them up out of . . . Egypt. The people of Israel sinned against their Saviour. They were ungrateful, unthankful wretches, covenant-breakers and rebels. 8. And walked in the statutes of the heathen . . . and of the kings of Israel. Their sins fell into two categories – the idolatries of the Canaanites, and the worship of the golden calves. 9. They covered over the Lord their God with words which were not right. By idolatrous ways and deeds they so denied the Lord that he could no longer be seen or recognized. From the tower. No place escaped from this idolatry. Images and statues of Astarte were set up in the groves (v. 10), and the incense of worship was burned before them (v. 11), as in the practices of the heathen. 12. Logs (AV, idols). Idols made of wood, stone, metal, or clay (Deut 29:17); a contemptuous term indicating their utter helplessness. They served, i.e., worshiped them.

13. The Lord testified against them. Verses 13-17 review the dealings of the Lord with Israel. The writer shows how God, in his faithfulness, supplemented the prohibitions of the Law with direct warnings by his prophets, exhorting the people of Israel to turn away from their idolatry. Note that in 17:13 Judah also is brought into the account, for this was written after the fall of Judah. Yet they did not hear, following the example of their fathers. 14. That did not believe. This was the willful act of rebellious hearts, hardened necks. 15. Followed vanity. "Their whole life had a worthless aim." 16. They left all the commandments of the Lord their God, and made them molten images, even two calves, and asherah (not a grove; the goddess Astarte), and worshipped all the host of heaven. The instruments and objects of worship – idols and the stellar deities of Assyria – are enumerated, all strictly prohibited in Deut 4:14-19. 17. Caused their sons . . . to pass through the fire. The burnt offering of children is prohibited in Deut 18:10,11, as are all forms of soothsaying.

18. Therefore the Lord . . . removed them. God's wrath was provoked, and he punished them by deportation; Judah alone was left. The fact that these sins broke the covenant is the only reason for their deportation. 19-23. These verses describe the utter rejection of Israel, and though Judah was left, yet she, too, was unfaithful. Verse 19 intimates that she was to share Israel's fate. 20. And the Lord rejected all the seed of Israel. God delivered them up to judgment because Israel in toto broke the covenant. This was, therefore, written after the fall of Judah. 21. For he rent Israel from the house of David. The Lord did not intend to have the national division result in sin such as is here described (cf. I Kgs 11:37ff.). 22,23. The thought is: "Though I separated the two peoples, yet Jeroboam led the people into sin, and they consented to be led down the road of sin to final destruction."

Verses 24-41 tell of the transplantation of people from various countries to the land of Israel. 24. The king of Assyria brought. Shalmaneser died during or just after the siege of Samaria, and Sargon II (722–705) may have been the one who repeopled the land after Israel's deportation. Ezra 4:2 indicates that there was a later transplantation under Esarhaddon (681–668). If this first action also was by Esar-haddon, then the land must have remained waste at least forty-one years. To repeople it just after Samaria's fall was to put into effect a sensible program for producing revenue. Men from . . . Cuthah. Josephus identifies these with the Kosseans who lived northeast of Susa (Antiq. ix. 14. 3; x. 8. 7). Ava. The "Ivvah" of 18:34; 19:13, between Anah and the Habur on the Euphrates. Hamath. A city in Syria, on the Orontes. Sepharvaim. Sippar on the Euphrates, above Babylon. Samaria. First application of this name to the land of Israel.

25. The Lord sent lions. The lapse of time after the deportation and before the colonists' arrival gave time for the lions to multiply, and God used their natural incursions to humble the people. 26. The nations . . . know not the manner of the God . . . therefore he hath sent lions among them. A superstitious analysis on the part of these people, but a true one. It formed the basis for their appeal for saviour priests. 27. Their request implied in verse 26 was heeded. 28. Then one of the priests . . . carried away from Samaria was sent. He came back to Bethel, seat of Jeroboam's calf worship, and taught the people "how" they should fear the Lord. 29-32. The result was a mixture of pagan religion and the worship of Jehovah, which was worse than out-and-out paganism. 33. Feared the Lord. An impure "fear," since they served their own gods, as the previous Israelites had done.

Verses 34-41 present an analysis of the peoples' actions in relation to the Lord's commands. Verse 34 indicates that mixed religious practices continued to the day of the writing of Kings. Verses 35-39 constitute a long quotation put together from Ex 20:5,7; 22:11; 6:6; 20:23; Deut 4:34; 5:15; 13:5; 28:14, etc. Here the Lord again points to his works among them to delineate the awful heinousness of their sins.

37. Which he wrote for you. This is a clear reference to the fact that Exodus and Deuteronomy were written by Moses and could not have been composed at a later date. If these books were done at a later date, as the critics hold, how could God have deported his people for sinning against his commandments and statutes? 40. They did not hearken. They includes both the Israelites and the colonists. They continued in their old sins. 41. This verse is a summary of events up to the time of writing of the record which was the author's source.

III. The Kingdom in Judah to the Final Destruction of the Nation of Israel. 18:1–25:30.

A. The Kingdom Under Hezekiah. 18:1–20:21.

1) Hezekiah's Reforms. 18:1-12. Hezekiah is the Lord's illustration of a righteous king who trusted in him. Coming at the time of Israel's downfall and the nation's darkest hour, he was given to the people by God to bring home to them their true destiny and character, and to demonstrate that God's ways are pure goodness and truth to such as keep his covenant and testimony. During Sennacherib's first campaign, in 701 B.C., Hezekiah trusted in allies; in the second campaign, about 688 B.C., he depended on the Lord. Judah's king was growing in the area of faith and trust in God.

1. In the third year of Hoshea. This is the last co-ordination in Kings of Judean reigns with Israelite reigns. Other historical data help to establish the proper chronological sequence hereafter. 2. He reigned twenty and nine years. Hezekiah reigned twenty-nine years. In addition, he held a regency with Ahaz, deduced as follows. Nebuchadrezzar II destroyed Jerusalem on July 19, 586 B.C. (BASOR, 143, pp. 46,47). The reigns of Manasseh (55 years), Amon (2 years), Josiah (31 years), Jehoahaz (3 months), Jehoiakim (11 years), Jehoiachin (3 months), and Zedekiah (11 years) total 110 years. Adding 110 to 586 B.C. gives us 696 B.C. as the date for Manasseh's accession. This does not, however, allow for Hezekiah's additional fifteen years after 701 B.C. (see on ch. 20). The gap of five years (701-696) deducted from fifteen leaves ten years unaccounted for. These must have been a period of coregency with Manasseh. (See below on each of the forenamed kings.) However, Hezekiah's accession is set at 715 B.C. But he is said to have been ruling in the fourth and sixth years of Hoshea, which indicates that he had a co-regency with Ahaz of twelve years minimum (see on 18:13). Ahaz is said to have been twenty years old when he came to the throne (II Kgs 16:2), and he reigned sixteen years. Hence he must have been thirty-six in 715 B.C. In the third year of Hoshea, Hezekiah came to the throne (see on 18:1), which would have been 729/728 (incl. reckoning). Ahaz would, then, have been twenty-three years old, and Hezekiah would have been twelve, which would make Ahaz eleven when Hezekiah was born, and that is too young. It becomes clear that the age twenty at which Ahaz is said to have come to the throne was his age at the beginning of his co-regency with Jotham. The statement that he reigned sixteen years must refer to the period of his independent reign (see Thiele, op. cit., p. 133). According to this reckoning he died at age forty. And he must have been only fifteen years old when his son Hezekiah was born. Such early parenthood is not infrequent in Middle East countries. 3. He did right. The life of Hezekiah is assessed in regard to his relation to the covenant of Jehovah; he fulfilled it.

4. He removed the high places. See the full account in II Chr 29–31. In II Kgs 18:22 these are places of worship — devisive worship of Jehovah (see on 12:3). Hezekiah and Josiah are said to have been "like David" in that they tolerated no divisive worship. Brake . . . the brasen serpent . . . Moses had made. This most distinctive item had become an object of idolatry, and therefore it was destroyed by Hezekiah in spite of its origin and veneration. 5. After him was none like him, in trust in and obedience to Jehovah, for (v. 6) he . . . departed not from following him. 7. The Lord was with him signifies God's favor to the obedient. He rebelled against the king of Assyria. Hezekiah reversed Ahaz' policy of submission to Assyria. 8. He smote the Philistines. Evidence that the Lord was with him.

9-12. These verses present a review of the fall of Israel, filled into Judean annals according to the synchronistic pattern of the author. Though the event recorded came before Sennacherib's first invasion, it is mentioned here to remind the people of what trouble rebellion against the Lord can cause.

2) Deliverance from Sennacherib's Two Invasions. 18:13–19:37.

a) First Invasion of Judah by Sennacherib. 18:13-16. For chronology see on verse 1. Sennacherib was a son of Sargon II, and he reigned 705–681 B.C. Verses 13-16 summarize his first campaign into Judah, in 701 B.C. (17ff. refers to a later campaign, c. 688). Though Hezekiah reversed Ahaz' policy of submission to Assyria, the desertion of Judah's allies forced him to submit (Luckenbill, Anc. Rec., II, par. 240; cf. II Kgs 18:14). Hezekiah collected the tribute by stripping the Temple (vv. 15,16). The fact that Sennacherib received the tribute in Nineveh (Luckenbill, ibid.), indicates that Hezekiah gave it on condition that the Assyrians would withdraw from Judea.

b) The Second Campaign. 18:17-25. The point of this account is that the Lord provides deliverance in response to true faith. The time of the second campaign, which took place thirteen or fourteen years after the events of verses 13-16, is determined by the date of Tirhakah, king of Ethiopia (19:9). An article in BASOR (130, pp. 8,9) indicates that Tirhakah did not become co-regent until 690/689 B.C. Since his birth occurred in 711/710, it would have been impossible for him to lead Egyptian forces in 701 at the age of nine years.

17. Tartan. Field marshal. Rabsaris. Head of the eunuchs, i.e., of the palace servants, generally eunuchs. Rab-shakeh. Chief cupbearer. Conduit of the upper pool. It extended from Gihon (II Chr 32:30; I Kgs 1:33) to the field of the clothes-washers — fullers. 18. When they had called to the king. The delegation wished to speak to Hezekiah. But he, observing protocol, sent officials ranking on their level. Verses 19-25 constitute a message of heathen effrontery to Jehovah.

19. Thus saith the great king. So styled because he ruled over other kings. What confidence. Confidence here means "thing depended on." His question expresses his astonishment in view of the conquests of Assyrian might. 20. Thou sayest . . . vain words. Just so much "talk." On whom dost thou trust. Rabshakeh supposed this whom to be Egypt (v. 21). Evidently Sennacherib supposed that Hezekiah had made an alliance with Pharaoh (cf. v. 22; 19:1ff.). However, the Philistines of Ekron called for Tirhakah to help them (Luckenbill, Anc. Rec., loc. cit.). 22. Whose altars Hezekiah hath taken away. These Assyrians interpreted Hezekiah's cleansing the land of idols as sacrilege rather than obedience.

He had acted in direct opposition to heathen practices and beliefs. Sennacherib was attempting to turn the populace toward himself and so weaken the defenses of Hezekiah. 23. Give pledges should read make a bargain. Note the sarcastic insinuation that Hezekiah did not have even this many horsemen. Hezekiah, however, had chosen other means of defense. 24. How then wilt thou turn away. "You can't, therefore, oppose the least of Sennacherib's captains." 25. Am I now come up without the Lord. "The Lord has sent me to destroy the land." Only to chastise the land, however, as events showed. It is true that God uses foreign nations to chastise his people (see 19:25).

c) The Embassy's Attempt to Persuade the People. 18:26-37. 26. Speak . . . in the Aramaic tongue (AV, Syrian language). To prevent further effect on the people, the officials of Judah requested that any further conversation be conducted in the Aramaic language, which was rapidly becoming the lingua franca of the ancient world. It was already the language of diplomacy, but it was not yet generally known by the people. 27. Hath he not sent me to the men . . . on the wall. Hezekiah's defenders. That they may eat. "By refusing to surrender you will subject your people to the terrible famine of a long siege." 28. In the Jews' language; i.e., Hebrew. He addressed his strongest appeal to the populace. 29,30. Deceive. Hezekiah's exhortation to them to trust the Lord, he said, would lead them astray, for neither Hezekiah nor Jehovah could deliver them. 31. Make an agreement. That is, "Make peace with me," or, "Surrender"; for he says come out to me. Eat ye. A temporary promise. They would be transported to a "better" land. 32. That ye may live. "You can live only through surrender and deportation." It was the confident expectation of Sennacherib that they would surrender, and this would demonstrate Assyrian might.

Verses 33-35 show how the Assyrians misunderstood the power and purpose of their previous conquests. Rabshakeh was ignorant of the fact that the Lord often selects certain nations for subjection and others for deliverance.

34. Hamath. See on 17:24. Arpad. The present Tell Erfad, thirteen miles north of Aleppo. Hena and Ivah were in the general area of the North Euphrates, east of Hamath. For the others see on 17:24ff. 35. Who are they among all the gods. See on verse 33.

36. The people held their peace. See Isa 36:21. Both the people and Hezekiah's ministers refused to answer. Hezekiah intended God to reply. 37. Clothes rent. Because of sorrow for blasphemies against Jehovah.

d) Hezekiah's Appeal to the Lord. 19:1-19. 1. When king Hezekiah heard . . . he . . . covered himself with sackcloth. A sign of penitence. Hezekiah considered the invasion to be a chastisement. The king prayed and also sought God's answer from the prophet Isaiah. He had learned to trust the Lord completely. He had forsaken the practice of worldly alliances. God alone was to lead and deliver. See 3) below. 3. A day of distress . . . chastisement . . . disdain (not blasphemy, as in the AV). The distress (AV, trouble) of the people was the chastisement of invasion by their enemies. The children. The people were in great peril, but their feeble efforts to effect deliverance might destroy all. 4. It may be. Hezekiah expressed hope that the Lord would take notice of the blasphemy.

6. Be not afraid. Isaiah spoke first to remove fear, declaring that, as Sennacherib had made Hezekiah fear, likewise a message from his capital would make him fear. 7. As he intended Jerusalem's fall, so would he fall in his own land (see v. 37).

8-13. So Rab-shakeh returned. He withdrew because Jerusalem was too strongly fortified. Lachish. A sculpture excavated at Nineveh pictures Sennacherib seated before Lachish, receiving its tribute. 9. When he heard. Sennacherib heard of the advance of Tirhakah, king of Egypt (see BASOR, 130, p. 8ff.). See comment on 18:17. This occurred after 688, toward the end of Hezekiah's reign. He sent messengers. Sennacherib sought to subdue Hezekiah by fear and thus gain Jerusalem without a fight. 10. Let not thy God . . . deceive thee. Sennacherib now attributed the "deception" to the Lord. In this he reached the apogee of blasphemy and sealed his doom (cf. v. 7). 11. Thou hast heard. "Take note of my previous conquests" (cf. 18:34). None of these cities is mentioned in the first three campaigns. If this attack had occurred after the capture of these cities, Sennacherib would not have failed to mention them. Hence this must refer to a later, unrecorded campaign (see Luckenbill, Annals of Sennacherib, p. 29). The cities not previously mentioned are: Gozan – Assyrian Gazanu, modern Tell Halaf, on the Habur, east of Haran, which dates back to the fifth millennium B.C.; Haran – ancient Haran, on the Balikh river; Rezeph – Assyrian Rasapa, probably present Rusafah, or Risafe, northeast of Palmyra; Eden – the Bit-Adinni of the Assyrian inscriptions, a small kingdom athwart the Euphrates, west of the Balikh River; Thelasar – probably in the same area. 13. The king of the city should read, the king of La'ir, since this city is now known as the Assyrian city of Lahiru (see BASOR, 141, p. 25; Luckenbill, Anc. Records, Vol. II, para. 252. Cf. II Kgs 18:34). Sennacherib lists more cities, etc., to heighten the effect of the message.

14. When Hezekiah had received the letter . . . and had read it. The significance of this incident lies in what Hezekiah did with the message. Spread it before the Lord. He handed over the letter to the Lord, so to speak, leaving Him to punish the blasphemy of it. 16. The words, Bow down thine ear . . . open . . . thine eyes, express most earnest appeal for God's help and his most specific attention. God is glorified when we cast ourselves thus so completely on his power and mercy. 17,18. Of a truth. Hezekiah admitted the truth of the claims of Sennacherib (vv. 12,13). At the same time he recognized that the Assyrian had been successful not because the gods of wood and stone were powerless, but because the Lord was working in human history.

e) The Deliverance of Jerusalem. 19:20-37. 20. Thus saith the Lord God. The answer came quickly, probably by Eliakim and Shebna (v. 2). The first part of the answer (vv. 21-28) was directed to Sennacherib. 21. The virgin . . . daughter. That is, Jerusalem yet unconquered and unconquerable by Sennacherib. Hath despised thee. Isaiah, anticipating the deliverance of the city, represents Sennacherib's boastful threats as evoking only scorn and ridicule. "She bobs (AV, wags) the head at thy retreating figure, departing in shame and discomfiture." Sennacherib was to lose his entire army. 22. Whom hast thou reproached. Reviling the Lord was Sennacherib's folly. 23. With the multitude of my chariots. Sennacherib boasted of transient earthly might. Come up. Perfect tense. The Lord reveals Sennacherib's thought that he was invincible and could not be turned from his purpose. Lebanon is Judah, its summit (AV, height) is Jerusalem, its fir trees are the princes of Judah, and its lodgings and forest are the palaces of Mount Zion (cf. Jer 22:6,7,23; Ezk 17:3). 24. I have digged, etc., continues the same idea in another figure. 25. Hast thou not heard. Now the Lord God speaks of his own deeds and shows that Sennacherib is a thief who has laid claim to the deeds of another, and that he will certainly be punished. Thou shouldest be. Sennacherib was but the instrument, and should fear lest he fall as other arrogant sinners had fallen. 26. Therefore their inhabitants were of small power. Not because their gods were weaker than those of Assyria, but because the Lord had empowered Sennacherib for His own purposes. Grass on the roof (AV, house tops) withers because of lack of soil. Grain (AV, corn) blasted in the germ is grain prone to decay that fails to germinate. These comparisons illustrate and confirm Sennacherib's failure. 27. But I know thy abode. God knows a man's heart and his determining thoughts (Ps 139:1-4). Rage. Violent hate, positive animosity (cf. vv. 23,24). Here it forms the ground for Jehovah's vengeance. 28. I will put my hook in thy nose. Sennacherib would most surely be turned away from his purposes, as surely and shamefully as he had led away his captives.

The second section of the Lord's answer to Sennacherib is addressed to Hezekiah (vv. 29-31). 29. And this is the sign to thee. This description of the three years' cycle of crops indicates that Isaiah was prophesying in a sabbatical year, which means that there would be no crop the next year. The sign was that the "aftergrowth" of the sabbatical year would remain to them. That is, Sennacherib's host would not be around to despoil the "aftergrowth." It would be left for the Jews to gather. See Leviticus 25. 30. The remnant . . . shall yet . . . bear fruit. Jerusalem would escape destruction. And the population left from the invasion would be greatly increased. 31. The zeal of the Lord. Cf. Zech 4:6b.

Through the prophet Isaiah, God predicted the collapse of Sennacherib's siege. 32. He shall not come into this city. The invincible siege tactics of the Assyrians would not be used against Jerusalem. The Lord would take the king of Assyria back by the way he came, fruitless and defeated. 34. For mine own sake; i.e., to rebuke Sennacherib's boasting. For my servant David's sake. In order that David's house might endure for a while longer as a testimony to God's sure promises to David.

35. That night . . . the angel of the Lord . . . smote . . . the Assyrians. Compare verse 7. Herodotus records an Egyptian tradition which may describe physical means God used to destroy Sennacherib's army: "Mice ate up the quivers." Presumably the mice came carrying bubonic plague. The plague, incubating in the soldiers, reached killing fever stage on the night when the city had been promised relief, and it slew them in their sleep. God orders events to coincide with his will. The event occurred after Rab-shakeh withdrew from Jerusalem and found Sennacherib at Libnah. 36. Sennacherib . . . departed, and went and returned. He fled to Nineveh because of possible action from Egypt. Dwelt at Nineveh indicates that he undertook no further campaigns to the west (cf. Luckenbill, Annals of Sennacherib, p. 17). 37. His sons smote him. Sennacherib died as the result of a palace intrigue (cf. v. 7). Esarhaddon (681–668 B.C.), states (Luckenbill, Anc. Rec., Vol. II, pars. 501,592) that his brothers slew Sennacherib in a plot to gain the throne. Ashurbanipal (688-626 B.C.) states (ibid., Vol. II, par. 795) that he slew those who slew Sennacherib, his grandfather.

3) Hezekiah's Illness and Recovery. 20:1-11.

1. In those days. The days of the first invasions of Sennacherib. Comparison of the order of 18:1–20:19 with that of Isa 36:1–40:1 indicates that Isaiah's record became the source for this account. It is evident that the two accounts have different purposes. In Isaiah the purpose is to show that only the Lord can comfort his people; in Kings it is to show that Judean kings who follow Hezekiah's policy of worldly alliances assure Judah's fall. Thus saith the Lord. Succeeding events show that the pronouncement of death was conditional. 2. He turned his face to the wall. Hezekiah communed alone with God. 3. I have walked before thee in truth. Hezekiah prayed for length of days, such as is promised to those who walk uprightly (Prov 10:27). Assuming that his works were done in obedience to God's commands, why then, must he die? Compare Hezekiah's testimony in Isa 38:10-20. Hezekiah wanted time to establish his moral reforms more firmly among the people. 4. The middle city (AV, court). The area of the castle, Mount Zion. The Lord answered quickly. 5. I have heard thy prayer. He promised healing. From Isa 38:17,18 it appears that there was some reason why Hezekiah should be chastised, most probably because of shameful lack of faith under Sennacherib's first invasion, when Hezekiah made allies of the Arabs (Luckenbill, Annals of Sennacherib, p. 33). At this point he was not a notable example of one who trusted and obeyed God. 6. I will add. God purposed that Hezekiah should yet show what true faith is. The words, I will deliver thee and this city, place the illness during the first invasion by Sennacherib. I will defend. See 19:34,35. 7. Take a lump of figs. The ancients believed that a fig poultice would heal boils. The exact cause of Hezekiah's illness is not known. Perhaps the boil was symptomatic.

God graciously gave the king a sign that he would certainly be healed. 8. What is the sign. For the natural sequence of events read the verses in this order – 6,8,11,7. Hezekiah desired an external or "second" witness to relieve his anxiety and strengthen his faith. The third day. His recovery was to be rapid. 9. Shall the shadow . . . go back ten degrees? Hezekiah chose the reversal as the strongest, most positive proof of the Lord's promise.

4) The Embassy of Merodach-baladan. 20:12-19.

12. Merodach-baladan (Marduk-Apal-iddin) was twice king of Babylon (722–710, 703–702). He was dethroned the first time by Sargon about 710 B.C., but later regained the throne. The second time he was defeated and dethroned by Sennacherib, along with his ally Elam (see Luckenbill, Annals of Sennacherib, p. 24) in his first campaign, 703 B.C. The embassy of 20:12 came in Hezekiah's fourteenth year (since fifteen years are added) during the course of Sennacherib's first invasion (see on v. 6). Merodach sought to make an ally of Hezekiah (see Jos Antiq. x. 2. 2). Hezekiah had not yet forsaken his practice of making alliances. He was yet to do so before the second invasion, and thus to be a true man of faith. Merodach's embassy probably came in 700 B.C. 13. Hezekiah hearkened . . . shewed them all the house of his precious things. Translate hearkened as welcomed. Josephus (Antiq. x. 2. 2) indicates that Hezekiah showed his treasuries to prove he was an able ally. Evidently the tribute he yielded to Sennacherib in 701 had not too badly depleted his reserves.

14. Then . . . Isaiah . . . said unto him. Isaiah, who understood the ulterior motive of the embassy, called Hezekiah to account and warned him of the consequences. Compare II Chr 32:31. 17,18. Which thy fathers have laid up. . . . And . . . thy sons . . . shall they take away. Hezekiah's vanity was an example of that vanity and faithlessness that would bring about Judah's fall. Hezekiah forsook faith in the Lord of hosts and trusted in his own means (II Chr 32:25). 19. Then said Hezekiah . . . Is it not good, if peace and truth be in my days? This was not a confession of sin. It was an expression of the "peace in our time" policy, that short-sighted attitude that shows little concern for those on whom coming catastrophe shall fall. Therefore Isaiah could only turn to Jehovah and cry out, "Comfort ye, comfort ye my people" (Isa 40:1). Only after the predicted destruction would there come an end to Israel's sin of apostasy, and only then would true peace endure.

5) Hezekiah's Death. 20:20,21.

20. The building activities of Hezekiah are here summarized (cf. II Chr 32:27-30). 21. Hezekiah slept with his fathers. The important acts of Hezekiah's life have been told. Now we must turn to the next figure who illustrates that vanity and pride which forwarded Judah's downfall.

B. The Reigns of Manasseh and Amon. 21:1-26.

1) The Iniquity and Death of Manasseh. 21:1-18.

a) Manasseh's Wickedness. 21:1-9.

1. Manasseh was twelve years old when he began to reign. See on 18:1-3. Manasseh had a co-regency of ten years with Hezekiah (cf. Thiele, Mysterious Numbers, p. 155). 2. He did that which was evil. Manasseh, following the wicked kings of Israel, broke the covenant. 3a. He built . . . again the high places and erected altars for Baal. 3b-5. He reintroduced the Assyro-Chaldean star worship and erected altars for all the host of heaven in the forecourts of the Temple. 6. He even offered his son as a burnt offering, and made use of soothsaying and communion with evil spirits, all as though he intended to provoke the Lord to anger. 7. Grove. Rather, image of Astarte, bloodthirsty female deity. This act was the chief sin by which Manasseh repudiated and broke the covenant of the Lord. 9. More evil than did the nations. He worshiped more and different gods than the heathen Canaanites did.

b) Jerusalem's Final Doom Pronounced. 21:10-16.

11,12. Because Manasseh . . . hath done these abominations. Manasseh's deliberate sins would destroy the nation and take it into captivity. His ears shall tingle. The news of Judah's devastation, like a harsh musical note, would jar and shake all who heard. 13. I will stretch. God's righteousness had measured Samaria and required its fall. 16. Manasseh shed innocent blood, that of God's prophets. This made his deportation inevitable (II Chr 33:11).

c) Manasseh's Death. 21:17,18. Buried . . . in the garden of Uzza. Because he was considered unworthy of burial with the kings.

2) The Sins and Death of Amon. 21:19-26.

19. Amon was twenty and two years old when he began to reign. See 18:1-3. 20. He did evil in the sight of the Lord. He broke the covenant, following his father (v. 21). 22. He forsook the Lord. Therefore Jehovah forsook him; so death resulted. 23. The servants of Amon . . . slew him. Court officials made a conspiracy which died in its inception, for the people . . . slew all them (v. 24), and made Josiah . . . king. Josiah could thus not have been co-regent; see on 18:1-3.

C. Reform in Judah and Israel under Josiah. 22:1–23:30. The discovery of the book of the Law stimulated wide reforms of a temporary nature only. There was not sufficient time for Josiah's reforms to root out deep-seated sin.

1. Josiah was eight . . . when he began to reign. Josiah was too young for a co-regency (see Thiele, op. cit., p. 154). 2. He did right. He kept the Lord's covenant. The reason is given in II Chr 34:3: he sought the Lord in his eighth year, and this gave him direction in his eighteenth year.

3. In the eighteenth year. Cf. II Chr 34:8. The affairs of this year concern the restoration of Judah's covenant relation with the Lord. The juxtaposition of these verses with verse 2 indicates that this was the result of Josiah's seeking God. 4. Sum the silver. The first step in restoring Judah's covenant relation with God was to obtain money to repair the Temple (cf. II Chr 34:9).

8. Hilkiah . . . said . . . I have found the book of the law. The Torah, the five books of Moses (cf. Deut 31:24-26). 10. Delivered me a book. Shaphan turned to the important matter last. What he read (v. 8) and what he read to the king (v. 10) were no doubt the same; both he and Hilkiah must have desired more thorough reforms. 11. When the king had heard . . . he rent his clothes. Possibly the portion read was Lev 26, or Deut 28:15ff. The Lord combined various circumstances to turn Josiah's heart toward reform. 13. Enquire of the Lord. "Go find out if these imminent judgments can be stayed." 14. Huldah. The nearest source of answer from Jehovah.

16,17. I will bring evil . . . because they have forsaken me . . . burned incense unto other gods. They broke the covenant by according worship to other gods. God's wrath would not be quenched, but it would fall upon Judah in later times. 20. Thine eyes shall not see all the evil . . . to come. Because of his good works (v. 19).

The second step in restoring Judah's covenant relation with God was to renew the covenant (23:1-3). 23:1. They gathered . . . the elders of Judah and of Jerusalem. The spiritual rulers must take part and leadership. 2. Both small and great. All classes of people were to take part in restoring the covenant relation. He read . . . all the words of the book of the covenant. See Deut 31:24-26. Josiah read the covenant of the Lord. Cf. Josh 23:6; 24:22-25. 3. The king . . . made a covenant before the Lord . . . And all the people stood to the covenant. All participated in the restoration.

The third step was to eradicate the idolatry in Judah (vv. 4-20). 4. Bring forth out of the temple. Josiah removed defiling idols, and had them burned (cf. Deut 7:25; 12:3). God's Temple is for him alone. 5. Put down the idolatrous priests. "Sacerdotal functionaries" who led the people in idolatry were removed so that the Levites might be restored. To the planets. Zodiacal worship. 6. Grove. Figure of Astarte. These items indicate the scope of Judah's idolatry. 8. Brought all the priests . . . from Geba to Beersheba away from the high places. That is, he caused divisive worship to cease throughout all Judah and Benjamin. 9. Came not . . . but they did eat of the unleavened bread. Divisive worship deprived them of the right to Levitical service but did not deprive them of sustenance. 10. Defiled Topheth. By burning human bones there (cf. vv. 16-18). 11. Took away the horses. Sun worship was removed. 12. The altars . . . of the upper chamber of Ahaz. Used for astral worship. 13,14. Mount of corruption. On the Mount of Olives. For the origin of the name, see I Kgs 11:7.

King Josiah also abolished idolatry in Israel. 15. Altar . . . at Beth-el. He rooted up the fountainhead of the idolatry by which Israel had broken the covenant (cf. I Kgs 12:28; 13:1; Amos 3:14; 6:10,13; Jer 48:13). 16. Polluted it. By burning human bones upon it to profane it for use in the eyes of the idolater. 17. What grave stone (AV, title) is that. This is Josiah's connection with I Kgs 13:2. 19,20. Josiah sacrificed (AV marg.) these high priests to the Mosaic law which forbade idolatry.

The king next replaced sin with positive worship of Jehovah (vv. 21-23). He led his people in an observance of the Passover, the central reminder of the covenant (cf. II Chr 35:1-19). 22. The words, such a passover, indicate the circumstances and strictness of the observance, surpassing that of Hezekiah.

24. Josiah extended his reforms to every house, that he might establish (AV, perform) the words of the law. Pure homes form the basis of a pure society. 25. Like unto him was there no king. He carried out the Law more exactly and faithfully than other reformers did.

26. But Josiah's good deeds could not deliver Judah (cf. II Kgs 22:16-20). 27. I will remove confirms the prediction of II Kgs 20:17 and adds to it. Removal of God's name guaranteed Jerusalem's fall.

29. Pharaoh-nechoh (609-594) went up to (not against, as in AV) the king of Assyria . . . to help him against Nabopolassar, king of Babylon (see BASOR, 143, p. 25; D. J. Wiseman, Chronicles of Chaldean Kings, p. 19). At Megiddo. On the normal line of march to Syria. Babylon was not stopped, because Josiah's effort weakened Necho and thus facilitated fulfillment of II Kgs 20:17.

D. The Last Days of Judah. 23:31–25:30.

1) The Reign and Deportation of Jehoahaz. 23:31-34.

See 18:1-3 for chronology. His having been made king by the people precludes the possibility of a co-regency (cf. Jer 22:11). 32. He did evil. He broke the covenant. 33. Nechoh took him captive at Riblah, whither he was summoned for that purpose (Jos Antiq. x. 5. 2).

2) Jehoiakim's Reign and Nebuchadrezzar's Invasion. 23:34–24:7.

34. Nechoh made Eliakim . . . king by right of conqueror, having slain Josiah. 35. Jehoiakim paid tribute to Nechoh in order to remain king. 37. He did evil. See on verse 32. 24:1. Nebuchadnezzar . . . came up in 604 B.C., summoning the kings of Hattu land (Palestine-Syria) to pay tribute (see Wiseman, op. cit., p. 28; BASOR, 143, pp. 24,25). The proper spelling of the name is Nebuchadrezzar. Jehoiakim became his servant three years. That is, until 601, when he rebelled, yielding to the pro-Egypt party, but submitting and paying the tribute when Nebuchadnezzar came into the land the same year. 2. The Lord sent against him bands. Bands of Arabs, and others, who vented their spite against Nebuchadrezzar on Jehoiakim, to destroy Judah, i.e., to contribute to her fall (cf. 20:17; 23:27; Wiseman, op. cit., p. 32). 3,4. These bands acted at the commandment of the Lord . . . for the sins of Manasseh (20:17) and for the innocent blood he shed (21:16). 5. The rest of the acts. Cf. II Chr 36:8a. See Introduction, Sources. Cf. Jer 22:19 for his ignominious end. 7. King of Egypt came not again any more out of his land. Nebuchadrezzar now controlled Egypt's former possessions in Palestine and Syria, down to the Wadi Arish, the river bordering Egypt.

3) Reign and Captivity of Jehoiachin. 24:8-16.

8. Jehoiachin was eighteen years old . . . reigned . . . three months (and ten days; cf. II Chr 36:9a). See 18:1-3. No co-regency is involved (see Thiele, Mysterious Numbers, p. 154). 10. At that time. Cf. II Chr 36:10, "at the turning point of the year," i.e., Tishri (Sept.-Oct. See BASOR, 143, pp. 24,25). The servants of Nebuchadnezzar . . . came up. He called out his army in Kislev (Dec.), 598 B.C., after Jehoiakim had died. And he took Jerusalem on 15/16 March, 597 B.C. (Wiseman, op. cit., p. 33), when Jehoiachin was king. 12. Jehoiachin . . . went out. He hoped to keep his rulership by surrendering. The king . . . took him to deport him, for he was too badly infected by pro-Egypt influences to be a good vassal. Eighth year of his reign. Nisan 10 (April 22), 597 B.C. (Thiele, op. cit., p. 163). 15. He carried away Jehoiachin to Babylon. Ration tablets from Babylon for Jehoiachin and five sons have been found (see BA, Dec., 1942, pp. 49-55). 16. All the men of might . . . and apt for war. Specific classifications of those listed in verse 14.

4) Reign of Zedekiah. 24:17-20.

17. Made Mattaniah . . . king. An uncle of Jehoiachin (cf. Jer 22:30). Matthew records Christ's legal line through Jehoiachin; Luke traces his actual line through Nathan and Mary. Jeremiah's prediction was fulfilled. However, Jehoiachin was still regarded as king of Judah (II Kgs 25:27). Zedekiah. A third son of Josiah, Jehoiachin's uncle, brother of Jehoahaz (23:31). Note that Jer 52:1-34 (lacking II Kgs 25:22-26) and II Kgs 24:18–25:30 (lacking Jer 52:28-30) reveal a common source. 19. Did . . . evil. He broke the covenant. 20. Through the anger of the Lord. The sins of Judah reached a climax under Zedekiah and brought on her fall under a judgment previously pronounced (20:17; 23:27).

5) Siege and Fall of Jerusalem. 25:1-21.

1,2. In the ninth year . . . tenth month . . . tenth day. January 15, 588 B.C. (BASOR, 143, p. 23). Came . . . against Jerusalem. Because Zedekiah broke his oath of allegiance. Unto the eleventh year. The siege lasted one year, five months, and twenty-nine days (cf. Jer 37:5,11 for a break in the siege due to a campaign against Egypt; Wiseman, op. cit., p. 30). 3,4. On the ninth day. The people were weakened through famine, and the city fell. A breach was made (ASV). On July 19, 586. 6. They . . . brought him (Zedekiah) . . . to Riblah. (See Jer 39:2-5 for evidence that Nebuchadrezzar's generals took Jerusalem.) Zedekiah was judged as a rebel. 7. Slew the sons. To put an end to his intractable dynasty. Put out the eyes of Zedekiah because he would not do the Lord's will.

Verses 8-17 record the destruction of Jerusalem. 8. In the fifth month, i.e., four weeks after the breach. Nineteenth year. Not to be confused with an eighteenth year, but the actual nineteenth year of Nebuchadrezzar (according to BASOR, 143, p. 26, it was Aug. 15, 586 B.C.; cf. Thiele, op. cit., p. 164). Nebuzar-adan [chief executioner] burnt the house of the Lord . . . the king's house. . . . And all the army . . . brake down the walls. The destruction of Jerusalem as a resistance fortress fulfilled the forecasts of 20:17; 23:27.

The Babylonians lost no time in liquidating the resistance leaders. 18-21. The captain of the guard took Seraiah, an ancestor of Ezra (Ezr 7:1) and Zephaniah, probably the son of Maaseiah (II Kgs 23:4; cf. Jer 21:7; 24; 25; 29) and the three keepers or guards, one at each temple gate, heads of soldiery: And . . . an officer . . . over the men of war, and five men, chief royal officers, and threescore men who were leaders in the revolt. All were taken to Riblah to Nebuchadrezzar. The words smote . . . slew denote the power and vigor with which Nebuchadrezzar finished the nation.

6) The Puppet Governor, Gedaliah. 25:22-26.

22. As for the people that remained in the land . . . he made Gedaliah . . . ruler. Gedaliah was a friend of Jeremiah (39:14); he was, therefore, pro-Babylon and for that reason was made governor. 23. Captains of the armies. Or, of the fields (cf. Jer 52:7). Gedaliah, following the words of the Lord, advised cooperation with Assyria (II Kgs 25:24). 25. But . . . Ishmael. Gedaliah, refusing to believe the warning concerning him (Jer 40:14), lost his life (Jer 41:2). Because Ishmael was of royal blood, he thought he should govern. 26. And all the people . . . came to Egypt. These were of the pro-Egypt party, the party that helped bring down Judah.

E. Epilogue. The Release of Jehoiachin. 25:27-30.

27. In the seven and thirtieth year. The thirty-seventh year of his captivity, but the twenty-seventh day of the twelfth month of Evil-merodach's accession year. If this had been Jehoiachin's thirty-seventh year only, Evil-merodach's accession year would not have been mentioned. According to Thiele (op. cit., p. 165), it was March 21, 561 B.C. Did lift up the head. Cf. Gen 40:13. Jehoiachin had been imprisoned after his deportation, and Evil-merodach released him. 28,29. Set his throne above . . . changed his prison garments. His change was permanent. Did eat bread . . . before him all the days of his life. Because Jehoiachin was so treated, there was hope for restoration of the nation to its land.

FIRST CHRONICLES

INTRODUCTION

(for both I and II Chronicles)

Title. In the Hebrew Bible, the books of Chronicles are entitled dibrê hay-yāmîm, "The affairs (lit., the words) of the days." Other historical journals, which are now lost, such as the "Dibrê hay-yāmîm of King David" (I Chr 27:24), employed this same terminology. The name therefore signifies "The Annals," or, as suggested by Jerome, one of the Church Fathers, "The Chronicles," which became the designation of the books in English. The books of I and II Kings mention similar annals entitled "Dibrê hay-yāmîm of the kings of Israel" (e.g., I Kgs 14:19), or "of Judah" (I Kgs 14:29). Such citations, however, cannot refer to the present books of Chronicles, which were not written until one hundred years after Kings, but suggest other lost books, contemporary chronicles of Israelitish history.

Chronicles once existed as a single composition. The current division into two parts arose in the Greek translation, which was made some time before 150 B.C., though it now appears in all Bibles, including the printed editions of the Hebrew. In the original arrangement of the canon, moreover, Chronicles stands at the end of the Old Testament. Thus Christ in Lk 11:51 spoke of all the martyrs from Abel, in the first book (Gen 4), to Zechariah, in the last (II Chr 24).

Date and Authorship. The Chronicles do not state when, or by whom, they were written. The books record events down to Cyrus' decree of 538 B.C., which permitted the Jews to return from exile (II Chr 36:22). Their genealogies, moreover, mention King Jeconiah's grandson Zerubbabel (I Chr 3:19), who led the Jews in the return of 537. They then outline Zerubbabel's family down through two grandsons, Pelatiah and Jeshaiah (3:21), or to approximately 500 B.C. Four names follow, of men whose exact relationship to the king Jeconiah is not given in the text. But the family of the last of these, a certain Shecaniah (3:21), is traced down through seven great-great-grandchildren (3:24). Thus, if Shecaniah were of the same period as King Jeconiah, who was born in 616, these four additional generations would again bring us to approximately 500 B.C. as the earliest possible date for the composition of Chronicles, on the basis of the internal evidence.

The origin, however, of Chronicles is strongly suggested by its close relationship with another part of the Old Testament, namely the Book of Ezra, which describes the events from the decree of Cyrus down to 457 B.C. Hebrew tradition affirms that Ezra wrote Chronicles as well as Ezra, a conclusion confirmed by the modern scholarship of William F. Albright (JBL, 40 (1921), pp. 104-124); and the books do have the same style of language and type of contents. This is apparent from such matters as the frequent lists and genealogies, the similar stress upon ritual, and their common devotion to the law of Moses. The closing verses, moreover, of Chronicles (II Chr 36:22,23) are repeated as the opening verses of Ezra (1:1-3 a). This seems to indicate that Ezra and Chronicles were originally one consecutive history, composed by Ezra at about 450 B.C. The very fact that II Chronicles breaks off in the middle of Cyrus' decree suggests that when Ezra was inspired to incorporate his book of Chronicles as the concluding portion of the Old Testament, he was thus deliberately guiding his readers back to his book of Ezra. This latter half of his original writing seems already to have been placed by God in the canon of Scripture so as to continue the historical record of the books of Kings. Then, since Ezra is separated from Chronicles in the Hebrew arrangement by Nehemiah's autobiography, which mentions the king Darius II who began to reign in 423 B.C. (Neh 12:22), we may date the incorporation of Chronicles and the close of the Old Testament canon at about 420 B.C.

If Ezra the scribe (Ezr 7:6) was the writer of Chronicles, his "scribism" may well account for the detailed acknowledgments of historical sources in these books. These sources include the writings of such early prophets as Samuel, Nathan, Gad (I Chr 29:29), Ahijah, Iddo, Shemaiah (II Chr 9:29; 12:15), Jehu the son of Hanani (20:34), and such later ones as Isaiah (32:32) and Hozai (33:19, ASV). The chronicler's major reference work was "The book of the kings of Judah and Israel" (16:11; 25:26, etc.), with "The commentary (Hebrew midrash) of the book of the kings" (24:27). But though I and II Chronicles often follow I and II Kings closely, our books of Kings cannot be the source here intended. For verses such as I Chr 9:1 and II Chr 27:7 refer to "The book of the kings" for additional data on certain genealogies or wars about which nothing further actually appears in our canonical books. This major reference must have been a larger court record, now lost, which also incorporated some of the prophetic writings, as Jehu's (II Chr 20:34) or Isaiah's chapters 36–39 (II Chr 32:32). From this source both Kings and Chronicles then drew (cf. Isa 36–39 with II Kgs 18:13–20:19 and II Chr 32).

Occasion for Writing. Ezra's zeal for the establishment of the law of Moses (Ezr 7:10) led him in 458 B.C. to return from Babylon to the Jewish community in Palestine. He took immediate measures to restore the temple worship (Ezr 7:19-23,27; 8:33,34) and to eliminate the mixed marriages that a number of the Jews had contracted with pagan neighbors (Ezr 9–10). In light of the wide powers granted Ezra by the Persian king (Ezr 7:18,25), he seems to have been the one who commenced the rebuilding of Jerusalem's fortifications (Ezr 4:8-16). It was not until Ezra was joined by Nehemiah in 444 B.C. that the walls were actually reconstructed (Ezr 4:17-23; Neh 6:15,16) and the Mosaic law was fully recognized (Neh 8). But that the chronicler's purpose was to stimulate this rebuilding of the theocracy is evidenced by the features of the book itself.

In comparison with the parallel histories in Genesis, I and II Samuel, and I and II Kings, the books of Chronicles, with their goal of maintaining racial and religious purity, are weighted with genealogies (e.g., I Chr 1–9). Again, because of their goal of preserving a proper priesthood and worship, they devote greater emphasis to the law of Moses, to the Temple (I Chr 22), and to the ark, the Levites, and the singers (I Chr 13; 15; 16). They omit the detailed activities of the kings (II Sam 9; I Kgs 3:16-28) and also extensive narratives of the prophets (as I Kgs 17–22: 40; or II Kgs 1:1–8:15). This characteristic stress on priesthood seems to account for the books' position in the third (non-prophetic) division of the Hebrew canon, separated from I and II Samuel and I and II Kings, whose moralistic emphases place them with the prophets in the second division. Finally, the books' goal of providing encouragement for those who had been disillusioned by post-Exilic hardships explains their rehearsals of Judah's former, God-given victories (II Chr 13;14;20;25). This goal also explains the omission from I and II Chronicles of David's earlier lack of success (II Sam 1–4), his later sins and defeats (II Sam 11–21), Solomon's failures (I Kgs 11), and indeed the whole inglorious history of the northern kingdom of Israel.

Because of these features, most of today's non-evangelical critics of the Old Testament reject I and II Chronicles as being a propaganda work of fifth century Levites, with extensive (and conflicting) revisions as late as 250 B.C. (so Adam C. Welch, Robert Pfeiffer, and W.A.L. Elmslie). The book, it is argued, cannot reflect authentic history but simply invents "what ought to have happened" (IB, III, 341). Its large figures, such as the 1,000,000 invading Ethiopians (II Chr 14:9), are subject to particular ridicule. Legitimate explanations, however, are forthcoming in such cases (see below, or Edward J. Young, An Introduction to the Old Testament, pp. 388-390). This censure, moreover, is based upon liberalism's previous rejection of the Mosaic authorship of the Pentateuch, the rituals of which receive validation throughout the Chronicles record. Disbelieving criticism is thus compelled in advance to deny the historicity of the book. Yet excavations at ancient Ugarit have confirmed the authenticity in Canaan of just such elaborate rituals, and in the very century that Moses was leading Israel out of Egypt (J. W. Jack, The Ras Shamra Tablets: Their Bearing on the Old Testament, p. 29 ff.). Albright has noted how many of the historical statements found uniquely in I and II Chronicles have been established by archaeological discoveries (BASOR, 100 (1945), p. 18). Furthermore, it is significant that while the books of Chronicles stress the bright side of Jewish history, they do not deny the failures. They rather assume such prior knowledge on the part of their readers (as in I Chr 22:8; 28:3), and they go on to emphasize, for example, the more encouraging second anointing of Solomon (I Chr 29:22) or the more exemplary first ways of David (II Chr 17:3). The prophetic judgments of I and II Kings and the priestly hopes of I and II Chronicles are both true and both necessary. The morality of the former is fundamental, but the redemption of the latter is the more distinctive feature of Christian faith.

COMMENTARY

I. Genealogies. 1:1—9:44.

A. Patriarchs. 1:1-54. This first chapter summarizes the development of the human race. It begins with Adam and follows his genealogical descent through Abraham to Jacob and Esau. Its purpose is to define the place of God's chosen people in world history. Branches of the human race remote from Israel are therefore dismissed with but brief mention, if noticed at all; while those more closely related to Israel are treated in greater detail. Most of the material is drawn directly from the records of Genesis.

4. Noah. The chronicler expects his readers to understand that Shem, Ham, and Japheth are the three sons of Noah, and not successive generations (Gen 5).

5. The sons of Japheth. Verses 5-23 reproduce the table of Genesis 10, with but minor differences of spelling. The Japhethites include such peoples of Europe and northern Asia as Javan (Ionia, the Greeks), Gomer (the Cimmerians of the Russian plains), Tubal and Meshech (the ancient Tabali and Mushki of the Turkish plateau), and Madai (the Medes, of Iran).

8. The sons of Ham. Ham's descendants occupy Africa: Put (Libya), Mizraim (Egypt), and Cush (Ethiopia). But Ham also settled in southwest Asia: Canaan (Palestine), and the Cushite Nimrod in Babylonia (cf. Gen 10:10; and note how the second river of Eden borders "Cush," 2:13).

17. The sons of Shem. After the earth was divided (v. 19), which probably refers to the confusion of languages at Babel (Gen 11:1-9), the Semites stayed closest to mankind's home in central Asia, though ranging from Lud (Lydia, of Asia Minor) and Aram (Syria) to Elam (north of the Persian Gulf). From Arphaxad came Eber (i.e., "Hebrew"), the ancestor of Abram and other unsettled peoples, known in ancient history as the Khabiru or Apiru. Uz, Hul, Gether, and Meshech were sons of Aram (Gen 10:23). 27. Abram; the same is Abraham. His descent is drawn from Gen 11:10-26, and the change of his name is described in 17:5. 28. The sons of Abraham. Though Isaac is named here, verses 28-33 deal with the descendants of Abraham by his subordinate wives, Hagar and Keturah (v. 32; see Gen 25:1-4, 12-16). The chronicler mentions these nomadic Arabian descendants before he turns to Sarah's son Isaac, who was the child of promise.

35. The sons of Esau. Then, of Isaac's twin sons, Esau and his Edomite offspring are briefly listed, before Jacob and the Israelitish people, who are the theme of I and II Chronicles, are introduced. Verses 35-54 summarize the table of Genesis 36 with but scribal variations in spelling. 36. Timna was not a son of Eliphaz, but his mistress, and a daughter of Seir (v. 39). She bore Amalek (Gen 36:12), and her name was attached to a district in Edom (v. 51). 38. Seir was of the "Horites" (Gen 36:20), or Hurrians, an important ancient people, some of whom had settled in Edom before the arrival of Esau (Deut 2:12,22). 42. Uz. Job, who was from this man's area (Job 1:1), may thus have been an early Edomite descendant of Esau (cf. Lam 4:21). Compare Esau's son Eliphaz, father of Teman (v. 36), after whom Job's friend, Eliphaz the Temanite (Job 2:11), may have been named.

51. Hadad died also. His death is not mentioned in the corresponding section of the Pentateuch (Gen 36:39), probably because he was a contemporary of Moses, but had, of course, long been dead at the time of Ezra and the composition of the Chronicles. The dukes of Edom. These were tribal leaders, or "chiefs" (ASV).

B. Judah. 2:1–4:23. The land occupied by the Jews who returned from Exile consisted primarily of the territories of Judah and Benjamin. The leading elements, moreover, in Ezra's community were likewise drawn from these two tribes (Ezr 1:5; 10:9), of which the former southern kingdom had been composed. In his attempt, therefore, to establish national purity, the chronicler's major emphasis rested upon Judah (most of chapters 2–4) and Benjamin (much of 7–9). It was Judah that was particularly prominent (Ezr 4:4,6), from whom the very name "Jew" is derived.

1) The Clan of Hezron. 2:1-55. Of the five sons of Judah, the first two died without issue. Pharez, however, who was the fourth, produced Hezron, under whose headship were included some of the leading elements of Judah's later population. This chapter therefore moves rapidly to this grandson of Judah and concentrates upon the relationships within his clan. Some names are of whole communities, descended from Hezron, as Kirjath-jearim and Bethlehem (vv. 50, 51). 4. Tamar. The details on Judah, Tamar, Er, and Onan are found in Genesis 38.

6. The sons of Zerah. These appear to be five later descendants, mentioned because of their importance: Zimri, who produced the Carmi of the next verse, is called Zabdi in Josh 7:1; the other four "Ezrahites" (Zerah) were famous for wisdom (I Kgs 4:31) and composed Ps 88; 89, but are not to be confused with Ethan and Heman, musicians of David, who were from Levi, not Judah (I Chr 15:15).

7. Achar, the troubler of Israel. His transgression occurred under Joshua at Jericho. See Josh 7, where the name is Achan.

10. Of the five sons of Hezron, Ram is listed first, being the ancestor of the royal family of David (vv. 10-17; cf. Ruth 4:18-22). 15. Ozem the sixth. A seventh son is mentioned in I Sam 16:10; 17:12, but not named. He may have died in childhood. 16. Zeruiah and Abigail were half-sisters of David, by a different father (II Sam 17:25). Their sons were famous soldiers under their half-uncle, David (see II Sam 3:10,20; 19:13). 18. The branch of Caleb (cf.

v. 42), or Chelubai (v. 9), son of Hezron, is next traced (vv. 18-20, 42-55). He is not to be confused with Caleb, the faithful spy (4:15), who came three hundred years later. 20. Bezaleel became the chief craftsman in building the Tabernacle (Ex 31:1,2). 23. The towns of Jair. See Num 32:41,42; Deut 3:14. Then read with the ASV, Geshur and Aram took the towns . . .

25. The descendants of Jerahmeel the firstborn of Hezron (vv. 25-41) occupied an extensive area in the Negeb, or south country of Judah (I Sam 27:10; 30:29). 35. Sheshan gave him his daughter, probably Ahlai (v. 31).

42. The sons of Mareshah (a variant of Mesha?) the father of Hebron. Read, from the Hebrew (KD), and Mareshah also had Abi-Hebron. 47. Jahdai['s] exact relationship to the preceding has been lost. 49. The daughter of Caleb, Achsa, was actually a distant descendant of this Caleb, son of Hezron, and an immediate daughter of Caleb the faithful spy, son of Jephunneh. She is famous as the bride of Othniel, given him because of his conquest of Debir (Josh 15:15-19; Jud 1:11-15).

50. The sons of Caleb the son of Hur. Read, "The (grand)sons of Caleb (were): the son of Hur, (namely) Shobal, etc." Ephratah is Caleb's wife, Ephrath (see v. 19). 55. Kenites of the family of Hobab, brother-in-law of Moses, became incorporated by marriage or adoption into the tribe of Judah (Jud 1:16). J(eh)onadab, a later descendant of Rechab, was noted as a reformer and prohibitionist. To prevent his family's corruption, he maintained the primitive forms of nomadic life (II Kgs 10:15-28; Jer 35).

2) The Family of David. 3:1-24. This chapter traces the royal house of Judah from David, its founder, down to about 500 B.C. Under the Persians the Jewish community was permitted no king, and indeed prophecy had stated that no purely human descendant of David would ever again occupy the throne of Israel (Jer 22:30). Post-Exilic interest, however, still centered in this family. For not only did the house of David furnish civic leaders (Zech 12:7,8), including Zerubbabel, the governor of the early restoration, but through this house there would arise Israel's ultimate hope. They looked for that greater Son of David, a man, but more than a man, God's "fellow" (Zech 13:7). Through this Messiah, the Deity pierced (Zech 12:10), would come redemption (Zech 13:1) and the kingdom of God on earth (Zech 14:9).

1. The second Daniel is known as Chileab in II Sam 3:3. 5. Bath-shua is elsewhere called Bath-sheba. This list of sons appears with minor variants in 14:4-7 and II Sam 5:14-16. It was Solomon whom God selected to succeed David (I Chr 22:9), rather than one of the older sons, at least three of whom were murdered in family feuds. 6. Elishama and Eliphelet. Rather read, Elishua and Elpalet (as in 14:5); they would not have had the same names as their brothers in verse 8. 9. Tamar their sister. See II Sam 13 for the account of how she was raped by Amnon and avenged by Absalom.

10. Abia. Elsewhere in Chronicles the AV renders this name Abijah. 15. Shallum is also called Jehoahaz (II Kgs 23; II Chr 36; cf. Jer 22:11). He was, in fact, older than Zedekiah (II Kgs 24:18), but had an inferior length of reign. 16. Jeconiah is also called Coniah (Jer 22:24, 28; 37:1) and Jehoiachin (II Kgs 24; II Chr 36). Zedekiah was his son only in the loose Hebrew usage of son for "successor" or "relative." Actually, he was his uncle (v. 15).

17. Assir is probably not a proper noun and should be rendered, the captive (ASV). Salathiel must have been simply a legal (adopted) son, for Lk 3:27 notes his true father to have been a certain Neri.

19. Zerubbabel is often reckoned as a son of Pedaiah's brother Salathiel (or Shealtiel; see Hag 1:1,12; Ezr 3:2; Mt 1:12; Lk 3:27), perhaps by the custom of the levirate, if it be assumed that Salathiel died without seed (cf. Deut 25:5-10). Zerubbabel was a leader in the return of the Jews to Palestine after the Exile, 538 B.C. (Ezr 2:2; 3:2).

21. Rephaiah, Arnan, Obadiah, and Shechaniah. The exact connection of these four with Jeconiah does not appear. If they were brothers, the fifth generation would again bring the line to about 500 B.C., some time before Ezra and the compilation of the Chronicles. See above, Introduction, Date.

3) Other Clans of Judah. 4:1-23. Verses 1-7 provide a supplement to the genealogies of Hezron in chapter 2. The clan relationships of the ten leaders listed in verses 8-20 are unclear in the text, either because of gaps in the records available to Ezra or because of subsequent corruption in copying. Verses 21-23 outline the clan of Judah's third son, Shelah.

1. The sons of Judah. But they are by no means brothers (see above, 2:4-7,50). 2. Reaiah the son of Shobal is called Haroeh in 2:52, to which this verse constitutes a supplement; as do, also, verses 3,4 to 2:19,50; and verses 5-7 to 2:24. 8. The exact connections of Coz, Jabez (v. 9), Chelub (v. 11), Kenaz (v. 13), Meonothai (v. 14), Jehaleleel (v. 16), Ezra (v. 17), Hodiah (v. 19), Shimon, and Ishi (v. 20) within the tribe of Judah are not given.

9. Jabez and sorrow are associated in Hebrew, Ya'ăbes and 'oṣeb; and the name is rendered, He causes sorrow. But Jabez' prayer of faith (v. 10) brought blessing instead of 'oṣbî ("grieving me").

13. Othniel, son of Kenaz. This Kenizzite was adopted from his wilderness people (Gen 15:19; 36:42) into Israel, tribe of Judah, and became the first of the Judges (Jud 3:9,10). 14. Charashim means engravers. 15. Caleb the son of Jephunneh was Othniel's (considerably) older brother (Jud 1:13; cf. Josh 14:6) and the faithful spy (Num 13; 14). 17. And she bare. That is, Mered's Egyptian wife, Bithiah (v. 18). 18. For, his wife Jehudijah bare, read with the RSV, But his Jewish wife bore . . . 19. For, The sons of his wife Hodiah, read with the ASV, The sons of the wife of Hodiah.

23. The Hebrew words for plants and hedges are better taken as place names: Netaim and Gederah. These were the potters . . . they dwelt with the king. Archaeology has demonstrated the existence of hereditary guilds of potters during the divided kingdom (930–586 B.C.), with royal patronage, and using regular jar-stamps from generation to generation (R. A. Stewart Macalister, Palestine Exploration Fund Quarterly Statement (July and Oct., 1905), pp. 244,245,328,329).

C. Simeon. 4:24-43. Simeon, with Levi, was scattered among the tribes because of the massacre of Shechem (Gen 34:24-30; 49:5-7). Specifically, Simeon was made to inherit the southwestern corner of Palestine and virtually merged with Judah (Josh 19:1-9; cf. Jud 1:3). After the division of the kingdom, however, elements of Simeon either moved to the north, or at least adopted its religious practices (cf. the mention of Beersheba in Amos 5:5, etc.), and were counted with the ten northern tribes (II Chr 15:9; 34:6). Others carried on a semi-nomadic life in such isolated spots as they could seize, examples being the two migrations noted in verses 34-41 and 42,43.

24. The sons of Simeon. This genealogy enlarges on the family of Simeon as outlined in Gen 46:10; Ex 6:16; Num 26:12-14. 31. Their cities unto the reign of David. After the Philistine wars, certain of Simeon's towns, as Ziklag (v. 30), became Judean (I Sam 27:6).

40. They of Ham. Probably Canaanites, Hamitic in descent (1:8). 41. And the habitations. Read, And the Meunim (ASV), an Edomite tribe (cf. II Chr 26:6; 20:1 note). 43. Amalekites that were escaped. Both Saul and David had devastated these ancient enemies (I Sam 14:48; 15:7; II Sam 8:12).

D. Trans-Jordan Tribes. 5:1-26. Just prior to the conquest of Canaan, Israel had been forced to engage in battle with the nations lying east of the Jordan (Num 21:21-35). Upon their defeat, Moses had granted their territories to the tribes of Reuben (I Chr 5:1-10) and Gad (vv. 11-17) and to half of the tribe of Manasseh (vv. 23,24). This chapter is based both on pre-Exilic records and on what may have been a post-Exilic census (v. 7). It describes their lands and clan genealogies, their early faith that gave them a great victory over the Ishmaelites (vv. 16-22), and their later apostasy that caused their exile to Assyria (vv. 25,26).

1. Reuben . . . defiled his father's bed. With Bilhah (Gen 35:22; 49:4). His birthright was given to . . . Joseph, as the first son of Rachel, the wife whom Jacob (Israel) loved. 2. Judah prevailed. As predicted by Jacob (Gen 49:8,9) and fulfilled in David (II Sam 5:1-3), the precursor of Jesus Christ (Mt 1:6). 3. The sons of Reuben. This section enlarges on his family as noted in Gen 46:9; Ex 6:19; Num 26:5-7. 4. Which of the preceding four was Joel's father is not stated.

6. Tilgath-pilneser (-pileser) III of Assyria took the border tribes captive in 733 B.C. (vv. 22,26; II Kgs 15:29), eleven years before the fall of Samaria to Shalmaneser V (or possibly to his successor, Sargon II).

16. Suburbs. Rather, pasturelands.

17. Jotham and Jeroboam II reigned 751–736 and 793–753 B.C. respectively.

19. Hagar was the mother of Ishmael, the ancestor of Jetur, Nephish, and other Arabian tribes (Gen 25:15).

26. Pul was the name of Tiglath-pileser prior to his accession. Therefore read, "God stirred up the spirit of Pul, even the spirit of . . . "

E. Levi. 6:1-81. Though both Simeon and Levi had been cursed to a tribal scattering among Israel (Gen 34:24-30; 49:5-7), Levi's subsequent devotion (Ex 32:26-28) converted this dispersion into one of blessing and religious leadership (Deut 33:8-11). Ezra himself was a Levitical priest and proud of his genealogy (Ezr 7:1-5); and the post-Exilic community centered about the services of the tribe of Levi (cf. Ezra's concern for their presence, 8:15-20). An authentic genealogy, however, was essential for Levitical standing (cf. Ezr 2:59-63); hence the significance of this chapter. It enlarges on the family of Levi as noted in Gen 46:11; Ex 6:17-19; Num 3:17-20; 26:57-62, and includes the high-priestly line (vv. 3-15,49-53), the three clans of Levi (vv. 16-30), the Levitical singers (vv. 31-48), and the scattered territories assigned to Levi (vv. 54-81). See also chapters 23–26.

3. Nadab and Abihu were killed in the wilderness for sacrilege and left no children (Lev 10:1,2; Num 3:4).

4. Eleazar, Phinehas (I), Abishua. The relatively short list of high priests that follows cannot be complete for the 860 years between the Exodus and the fall of Jerusalem. It does not include the descendants of Ithamar, who held office under the last Judges and the early kingdom: Eli, Phinehas II, Ahitub I, Ahimelech I (= Ahijah), Abiathar, and Ahimelech II (I Sam 14:3; 22:20; II Sam 8:17); or certain other high priests: Amariah II (II Chr 19:11), Jehoiada (II Chr 22:11), Zechariah (?) (II Chr 24:20), Urijah (II Kgs 16:10), Azariah III (II Chr 31:10), and Meraioth (I Chr 9:11).

8. Zadok (I) was high priest under David and Solomon, 970 B.C. 10. Azariah (II) . . . in the temple. This may refer to his resisting Uzziah's attempt to take over priestly functions, 751 B.C. (II Chr 26:17). 13. Hilkiah was the high priest who discovered the book of the Law given by Moses, thus causing Josiah's reformation of 621 B.C. (II Chr 34:14).

16,17,20,43. Gershom is the Gershon of verse 1 and elsewhere.

22. Amminadab is apparently another name for Izhar (vv. 18,38). Korah was swallowed by the earth for rebelling against Moses (Num 16:32). 25. The names that follow indicate that this must be Elkanah II, the son of Shaul (v. 24) and great-great-great-great grandson of Ebiasaph (vv. 36,37), not Elkanah I, the brother of Ebiasaph, just mentioned in 6:23. Ahimoth, the son (not brother) of Amasai, is also called Mahath (v. 35). 26. This is Elkanah (III), son of Ahimoth (v. 25). Zophai, Nahath, and Eliab (v. 27) are Zuph, Toah, and Eliel (vv. 34,35). 27. This Elkanah (IV) is the famous Levite from Mount Ephraim, husband of Hannah and father of Samuel (I Sam 1:1). 28. Vashni. Hebrew for and the second. This verse should therefore read, "The firstborn, Joel; and the second, Abiah," Joel's name being supplied from verse 33 and I Sam 8:2.

32. Tabernacle of the congregation. Tent of meeting. The place where God met the people, and only secondarily, the people each other (cf. Ex 29:42,43). 42, 44. Ethan and Kishi are also called Jeduthun (25:1) and Kushaiah (15:17).

54. The Hebrew for castles means "encampments" or "settlements." Theirs was the lot. The first lot in the 1400 B.C. distribution of the land (Josh 21:10). The following verses on the Levitical cities compare with Josh 21:3-40. 56. They gave to Caleb. As promised by Moses and Joshua (Josh 14:6-15). 57. The city of refuge. On these six cities see Num 35; Deut 19:1-10; Josh 20. 60. Thirteen cities. Only eleven have been named in our present text, but the others are to be supplied from Joshua 21. 61. Cities were given out of the half tribe of Manasseh, and also out of Ephraim and Dan (cf. v. 66 and Josh 21:5).

F. Six Other Tribes. 7:1–8:40; 9:35-44. Although Judah and Benjamin (with Levi) dominated post-Exilic Israel, the other tribes that had once composed the northern kingdom were not unrepresented. Many had fled to Judah with the fall of Samaria in 722 B.C. (I Chr 9:1; II Chr 30:1,2; cf. 34:6); and others regained their place among God's people during the exile of 586–538 (cf. Ezk 37:15-23), and returned with the rest under Zerubbabel and Ezra (Ezr 6:17; 8:35; cf. the Anna of the tribe of Asher in Lk 2:36). The so-called lost ten tribes, and their genealogies, were matters of personal involvement for a number of Ezra's contemporaries!

1) Summaries. 7:1-40. On the basis of Genesis 46 and Numbers 26, I Chronicles 7 outlines the significant clans of six tribes: Issachar (vv. 1-5), Benjamin (vv. 6-12), Naphtali (v. 13), Western Manasseh (vv. 14-19), Ephraim (vv. 20-29), and Asher (vv. 30-40). The chronicler thus makes no mention of either Dan or Zebulun. Attempts have been made to account for this on grounds of textual corruption, but it may merely have been that these tribes had little significance to the society of Ezra.

1. The sons of Issachar. These verses expand the data of Gen 46:13 and Num 26:23-25.

6. The sons of Benjamin . . . three. There were others as well (see 8:1). These paragraphs supplement and provide slight variants to Gen 46:21 and Num 26:38-41. 12. Ir = Iri (v. 7), and Aher may perhaps be identified with Ahiram (Num 26:38).

13. The sons of Naphtali. These verses repeat Gen 46:24 and Num 26:48-50, with but minor differences of spelling. The names are of grand-sons of Bilhah, the maid of Rachel and mother of Naphtali (Gen 30:3-8).

14. The sons of Manasseh; Ashriel. This man was a great-grandson of Manasseh through Machir and Gilead. For the more complete records of western Manasseh, see Num 26:29-34; Josh 17:2-5. 15. The second, many generations later, was Zelophehad, who had daughters that inherited on an equality with males (Num 26:33; 27:1; 36:2). 19. Shemidah was another great-grandson of Manasseh through Machir and Gilead.

20. The sons of Ephraim. These verses enlarge on Num 26:35-37. 21. Men . . . born in that land, in Canaan, came down to Goshen, on the border of Egypt toward Palestine, where the Israelites had settled under Joseph. 23. Beriah, because it went evil. The Hebrew words are bᵉrî'â because bᵉrā'â. 27. Non. The name of J(eh)oshua's father is usually spelled Nun. 28. For Gaza, which is too far from Ephraim, read rather "Ayyah."

30. The sons of Asher. These verses enlarge on Gen 46:17 and Num 26:44-47.

34,35. Shamer and Helem appear as Shomer and Hotham (?) in verse 32.

38,39. Jether and Ulla appear as Ithran and Ara in verses 37 and 38.

2) Benjamin. 8:1-40; 9:35-44. This section constitutes a major supplement to 7:6-12, as well as to Gen 46:21 and Num 26:38-40. For the tribe of Benjamin not only produced the family of King Saul, that was prominent for many generations (8:33-40; 9:39-44), but also ranked second to Judah itself in post-Exilic Jewish society (Neh 11:4,7,31,36).

6. Neither Ehud's ancestry in Benjamin, nor that of Shaharaim (v. 8), is preserved. 7. Naaman, Ahiah, and particularly Gera, were the ones who took away Ehud's descendants, Uzza and Ahihud, in this undated captivity. 8. Shaharaim . . . sent them away. That is, he divorced his two wives, an early example of moral deterioration within Israel.

17,18. Meshullam and Ishmerai may be variants for Misham and Shemed (v. 12). 21. Shimhi is probably a variant for Shema (v. 13). 27. Jeroham may be identified with Jeremoth (v. 14).

29. The father of Gibeon: Jehiel (9:35; or, as in I Sam 9:1; 14:51, Abiel). 32. Mikloth was Jehiel's youngest son (9:37,38).

33. Ner, Jehiel's fifth son (9:36), was grandfather to Saul, the first king of Israel (1050–1010 B.C.), and father to Abner, Saul's military commander and uncle (I Sam 14:50,51). Abinadab = Ishui (I Sam 14:49). Esh-baal. Man of Baal, seems to have been the original name of Ish-bosheth (II Sam 2:8); but in Samuel bōshet, "shame," is substituted for the name of the shameful idol. Saul, however, may not have had the idol Baal in mind when he named his son, but simply the Hebrew word ba'al, "master." The name would then mean, "man of the Master," perhaps referring to God. 34. Similarly, Merib-baal, "hero of Baal," or "a warrior is Baal," is styled Mephibosheth in Samuel, or one who scatters (?) shame (II Sam 4:4).

G. Jerusalem's Inhabitants. 9:1-34. After a transitional verse (9:1) that serves as a conclusion to the genealogies of Israel (I Chr 2–8), this section moves to an enumeration of the inhabitants of Jerusalem, prior to the city's capture and destruction in 586 B.C. It consists primarily of a listing of certain heads of large family groups or clans that once lived in the capital: clans of Judah (vv. 4-6); of Benjamin (vv. 7-9); of the priests (vv. 10-13); of the Levites in general (vv. 14-16); and of the porters or temple gate-keepers (17-19a). This is followed by a description of the duties of the Levites (19b-33). A knowledge of these constituent elements in the population of pre-Exilic Jerusalem was of prime significance in Ezra's subsequent campaign to restore legitimate theocracy to Judah. An attempt, however, is often made to equate this material with the later listing, found in Neh 11:3-24, of Jerusalem's post-Exilic groups. But despite a similarity in over-all arrangement, the specific differences between these two lists are pronounced; and only by a forced rendering of I Chr 9:2 (as for example in the RSV) can the plausibility of the later dating of I Chronicles 9 be sustained.

1. The book of the kings. This refers to some court record, now lost; see above, Introduction, Authorship.

2. The first inhabitants. This must refer to Israel's population before the carrying away of 586, just mentioned. Nethinims means given ones. They were temple slaves, such as the men of Midian (Num 31:47, in context) and of Gibeon (Josh 9:23, in context), organized into a distinct group by David (Ezr 8:20).

3. The scattered individuals and families of Ephraim, and Manasseh are not mentioned in the lists that follow, which are limited to the heads of larger family groups or clans. 5. The Shilonites. Read, Shelanites, that is, of Shelah. These, with Pharez and Zerah, constituted the three clans of Judah (Num 26:20).

10. Jedaiah, Jehoiarib, and Jachin appear to be names of the second, first, and twenty-first respectively, of the twenty-four priestly courses established by David (I Chr 24:7-18), rather than of individuals. 11. Azariah (IV) . . . the ruler of the house of God, was high priest in about 600 B.C., shortly before the Captivity (6:13). 12. Adaiah was a son of Malchijah, David's fifth course (24:9); and Maasiai . . . of Immer, the sixteenth (24:14).

14. Merari was one of the three clan-founding sons of Levi. 15,16. Asaph and Jeduthun were two of David's chief musicians, 1000 B.C.

18. Porters in the companies . . . of Levi means, "the gate-keepers for the stations of the Levites," as they had once encamped about the Tabernacle (Num 3:23,29,35,38). 19. Shallum, the porter, was a son of Korah; for though Korah himself was destroyed, his clan continued as an important part of the Kohath division of Levi (see above, 6:22 and its note). The tabernacle refers to David's tent form of God's house (16:1), prior to the construction of the permanent Temple. 20. The office of porter thus dates back to Phinehas the son of Eleazar, who was the son of Aaron and his successor as high priest in the wilderness. 21. Zechariah had served as porter under David (26:2). 22. Samuel's interest is illuminated by his having served as a porter in his youth (I Sam 3:15). With David came the final organization of the porters.

31. The things that were made in the pans. The flat cakes used in the "meat" (meal) offerings. 32. The shew bread. The bread set out in rows on the golden table, symbolizing the communion of the redeemed with God (Lev 24:5,6).

33. These are the singers refers to the men of verses 15,16; even as verse 34 summarizes the whole section.

The rest of this chapter, 9:35-44, is practically identical with 8:29-38 (which see), except for minor matters, such as the spelling of names. It serves to introduce the record of the end of Saul's reign (ch. 10, following).

II. The Reign of David. 10:1–29:30.

A. Background: The Death of Saul. 10:1-14. The chronicler's interest centers in King David. He was both the founder of the royal dynasty of Judah and a heroic example of the success that will crown the endeavors of those who trust in God, in Ezra's time, or in any other. But to establish the background of David, the chronicler connects the genealogy of Benjamin (just given in I Chr 8; 9:35-44) with the historical disaster that precipitated David's rise to the throne, namely the death of his Benjamite predecessor, King Saul. I Chronicles 10 is directly parallel to I Samuel 31, though there is some difference in the choice of the details described. The chapter is a historical demonstration of how failure results when the Lord is forsaken (vv. 13,14).

1. The Philistines fought against Israel. The Philistines were a Hamitic, but non-Canaanitish, people descended from Mizraim (Egypt) through Casluhim (Cyrene) and Caphtor (Crete; see I Chr

1:8-12; Amos 9:7). Some came early to Palestine, "Philistine land," and were encountered by Abraham, 2050 B.C. (Gen 21:32; cf. 26:14). Before 1400 they had occupied the southern coast from Egypt to Ekron (Deut 2:23; Josh 13:2,3). They were not conquered by Joshua (Josh 13:2,3; Jud 3:3), and Judah held their cities only temporarily (Jud 1:18). Shamgar's victorious skirmish, about 1250 B.C. (Jud 3:31), shows at the same time Israel's material inferiority to the Philistines. With the fall of Crete to the general barbarian movements, 1200 B.C., the "remnant of Caphtor" (Jer 47:4) reinforced the older Minoan Philistines.

But while their advance on Egypt was broken in 1196 as a consequence of the crushing defeat of the "Pulesti" by Ramses III, yet these sea people reconsolidated and, in three waves, almost overwhelmed Israel. The first wave, 1110—1070 (Jud 10:7; 13:1; I Sam 4), was broken by Samuel at the second battle of Ebenezer (I Sam 7:13); and the second, about 1055—1048, by Saul at the battle of Michmash (14:31). I Chronicles 10 is dated in 1010 B.C., the inauguration of their third and last great oppression.

1. Israel . . . fell down slain in mount Gilboa, southwest of the Sea of Galilee, at the head of the Valley of Esdraelon, through which the Philistines were able to penetrate into the interior and to the Jordan (cf. I Sam 31:7).

2. The sons of Saul. See 8:33, and its notes, on Saul's family. 5. Saul was dead. In II Sam 1:6-10, the story reported to David differs from this Scriptural record of Saul's death. The unscrupulous Amalekite who did the reporting seems simply to have discovered and plundered Saul's body and then fabricated his tale of murder, hoping for reward. 6. All his house died. I Samuel 31:6 says, "all his men;" i.e., those who immediately surrounded him in the battle. There were others, both of his sons and his troops, that managed to survive (II Sam 2:8; 21:8).

9. They stripped him, and took his head, etc. Despite the Philistines' attainments in material culture, "Philistine" has become a byword for barbarism and cruelty. 10. In the house of Dagon, a Philistine idol (I Sam 5:2-5). I Sam 31:10 adds that they fastened his body to the wall of Bethshan, a leading city that fell to them between Mount Gilboa and the Jordan.

11. The men of Jabesh-gilead, in Trans-Jordan, were still loyal to Saul after his great deliverance of them forty years before (I Sam 11:1-11). 12. Oak. The Hebrew 'ēlâ refers to a "large tree." I Sam 31:13, however, specifies the species as that of a tamarisk.

13. The word of the Lord he kept not. He disobeyed Samuel (I Sam 13:8,9; 15:2,3); and he asked counsel of . . . a spirit, through the witch at Endor (I Sam 28).

B. David's Rise. 11:1—20:8. Upon the death of Saul in 1010 B.C., David was anointed in Hebron as king over the tribe of Judah (II Sam 2:4). But his bid for the national kingship (II Sam 2:5,6) was rejected, as Saul's son, Ish-bosheth, was set up over the northern and eastern tribes (II Sam 2:8,9). The chronicler, however, disregards this inglorious seven and one-half year period (II Sam 5:5) of disputed succession, civil war, and Philistine domination (cf. II Sam 3;4), and moves directly to the events of David's establishment over all Israel (1003 to about 995 B.C.). I Chronicles 11:1—20:3 thus parallels and amplifies II Sam 5—10 (omitting ch. 9, David's personal kindness to Mephibosheth). It describes his capture of Jerusalem, to become "the city of David," his political capital, together with his military supporters (chs. 11—12). It recounts his winning of independence from the Philistines (ch. 14) and his centralizing of worship by his installation of the ark in Jerusalem, which thus became Israel's religious capital as well (chs. 13; 15; 16). It records the advance of his armies, victorious in every direction (chs. 18—20).

The climax appears in God's prophecy through Nathan (ch. 17): "I have been with thee whithersoever thou hast walked, and . . . I will subdue all thine enemies" (17:8,10). For this message of hope applies not only to David, but to "My people Israel . . . . for a great while to come" (17:9,17); to the struggling community of Ezra; to the church of that greater Son of David, of whom God said, "He shall be my Son" (17:13); and to the kingdom, which is yet to be consummated, of the Messiah, whose "throne shall be established for evermore" (17:14).

1) David Established in Jerusalem; His Heroes. 11:1—12:40. After his anointing as king over all Israel (11:1-3), David's first undertaking was to secure the fortress of Jerusalem (vv. 4-9). This afforded him not only an impregnable citadel but also a neutral site, on the border between Judah and the north, for the capital of his reunited nation. The chronicler then enumerates David's heroes, "the Three" (vv. 10-19), the two commanders (20-25), and "the Thirty" (26-47), following with a description of the military officers and units that had flocked to his standard in exile and had been largely responsible for his elevation to the kingship (I Chr 12). This last section is found only in Chronicles, though chapter 11 has a close parallel in II Sam 5:1-10; 23:8-39.

11:3. They anointed David king . . . according to the word of the Lord. Twenty years previously Samuel had consecrated David through the true anointing of God (I Sam 15:28; 16:1-13), and the tribes at last recognized both his personal worth and his divine appointment. But David made a covenant, establishing a "constitutional" monarchy, unique in the ancient Near East. For the only effective curb upon despotism is the believer's commitment to the kingship of God. (Contrast even weak Ahab's religious scruples, I Kgs 21:3,4, with Jezebel's more "natural" course, vv. 7-10).

4. Jerusalem, which is Jebus. This ancient city-state had been known as "Salem" to Abraham (Gen 14:18) and as "Urusalim" to the Egyptians at the time of the conquest (in the Amarna letters of about 1400 B.C.). Jerusalem had been a center of Canaanitish resistance against the Hebrews (Josh 10:1-5). Joshua had defeated its army and executed its king (12:7,10), and the tribe of Judah had overrun its defenses in an initial attack (Jud 1:8). But for almost 400 years Judah had been unable either to win the city or to drive out its Jebusite inhabitants (Josh 15:63; Jud 1:21; 19:10-12); hence their overconfidence (I Chr 11:4; cf. II Sam 5:6).

6. He shall be chief and captain. David may have made this offer in the hope of by-passing Joab, his efficient but uncontrollable general in Judah (cf. II Sam 3:39), and promoting someone else to the rank of commander of the armies of united Israel. But Joab went up first, using a ṣinnôr, "hook," or scaling ladder (II Sam 5:8). The ASV translates "watercourse," which corresponds to the Jebusite tunnel archaeologists found cut down through the rock under the city, evidently used for drawing up water in case of siege.

8. Millo means filling and may have been a fortress constructed to fill a gap in the defenses (cf. R. A. Stewart Macalister, A Century of Excavation in Palestine, p. 106).

10. The mighty men are included at this point because of their influence in David's rise to power. Part of this list —through verse 41a—is also found, with variants in spelling, etc., as one of the appendices to II Samuel (23:8-39). Twelve of the heroes appear also in a list of the commanders of the twelve corps of David's armed forces (I Chr 27). 11. The captains. The Hebrew text reads "the Thirty" (cf. ASV), which may have been the initial number in this "legion of honor" of David. Actually listed are thirty-seven (II Sam 23:39), including the outstanding Three and the two commanders, plus sixteen more (I Chr 11:41b-47), apparently subsequent additions to the original group.

13. The text of I Chronicles is defective at this point. On the basis of II Sam 23:9-11 the following restoration should be made: The Philistines . . . gathered together to battle, "and the men of Israel were gone away: He arose and smote the Philistines until his hand was weary, and his hand clave unto the sword: and the Lord wrought a great victory that day; and the people returned after him only to spoil. And after him was Shammah the son of Agee the Hararite. And the Philistines were gathered together into a troop," where was a parcel of ground . . . The most distinguished "Three" thus consisted of Jashobeam, Eleazar, and Shammah.

15. The Philistines encamped in the valley of Rephaim, southwest of Jerusalem. This refers to their first campaign against David (14:8,9), even before his capture of the city. David thus resorted to his old outlaw refuge of Adullam (cf. I Sam 22:1; II Sam 5:21).

20. David's half-nephew Abishai had commanded with Joab against Abner (II Sam 2:24) and later led divisions in the wars against the Ammonites (II Sam 10:10), Absalom (II Sam 18:2), and Sheba (II Sam 20:6). His heroism with David in Saul's camp is recorded in I Sam 26:6,7. 21. Of the three, he was more honorable than the two. Read, "Over the Three he was doubly honored"

(KD), being made their commander, even though not attaining to their specific acts of heroism. 22. Benaiah was appointed commander of the professional Cretan and Philistine troops that made up David's guard (18:17). He became Solomon's leading general (I Kgs 4:4). 23. A weaver's beam refers to the heavy shaft of a loom, that holds the threads taut.

26. Asahel was killed when pursuing Abner in David's war against Ish-bosheth (II Sam 2:18-23). 34. Instead of the sons of Hashem, read the name of one man, Bene-hashem. 41. Uriah the Hittite, the husband of Bath-sheba, was murdered by order of David, who was trying to cover up his adultery with Uriah's wife (II Sam 11).

12:1. Ziklag was the town on the Judean border over which David had been appointed by Achish, the Philistine king of Gath (I Sam 27:5-7). 2. Even of . . . Benjamin. Some of Saul's own tribesmen recognized the divine appointment of David.

4. Among the thirty, and over the thirty. Though not a member of this select group, Ismaiah was worthy of even greater recognition. 6. The Korhites (Korahites, ASV). Descendants of Korah, who rebelled against Moses (see notes on 6:22 and 9:19). These five must, therefore, have been from the tribe of Levi rather than from the tribe of Benjamin, as were the rest of the list, though probably they were residents of Benjamite territory.

8. The Gadites . . . separated themselves, leaving their Trans-Jordanian homes, and perhaps breaking with their fellow tribesmen who yet followed Saul. The hold may refer to the Cave of Adullam (11:15). 13. Jeremiah in the Hebrew is Jeremiahu, distinct from the Jeremiah of verse 10. 15. The first month was March/April, the time of the spring flood (Josh 3:15; 4:19), which made their action all the more outstanding.

18. The Spirit came upon, literally, clothed Himself with, Amasai (as in Jud 6:34; II Chr 24:20). Amasai's devotion to David is expressed in the form of Hebrew poetry and may be rendered:

> We belong to you, O David;
> We are with you, son of Jesse!
> Peace, yes, perfect peace go with you;
> Peace bless him who fights for you,
> Because your God does lend you aid!
> The Berkeley Version

19. He came with the Philistines against Saul. See I Samuel 29 for the description of this event. 21. The band of rovers suggests the group from Amalek that had plundered David's city of Ziklag in his absence (I Sam 30). 22. Like the host of God. That is, "like a very great army" (cf. I Chr 9:19). The same phrase is used for cedars (Ps 80:10).

23. They came to David to Hebron. The total of almost 350,000, from all areas of Palestine, gives some idea of the enthusiasm with which David's rule was received. 27. This Jehoiada seems to have been Benaiah's father (11:22; 27:5). 28. This may have been the Zadok who was the colleague of Abiathar and his successor as high priest. 31. The western half of the tribe of Manasseh is intended (cf. v. 37).

2) The Ark Sought. 13:1-14. The primary goal of Ezra was to lead his people into an enthusiastic commitment to the faith and practices of the law of Moses (Ezr 7:10). The chronicler therefore records David's next act, his attempt to conduct the ark of the Lord into Jerusalem. This project sprang from David's sincere piety and his desire to worship in the presence of his God (vv. 3,8). And even its temporary frustration served to underline the necessity of reverence for divine revelation (vv. 9-13). Conformity, however, to the law of God produces blessing (v. 14). Except for minor variants, II Sam 6:1-11 parallels I Chronicles 13.

2. The phrase, our brethren that are left, reflects the seriousness of the great Philistine oppression, 1010—1003 B.C. (cf. 16:35).

3. Bring again the ark. The ark, or chest, was the most holy object in the ritual of Moses, a sacramental symbol of the presence of God himself (v. 6; Ex 25:22; cf. I Sam 4:7). But Israel came to believe in an inherent association of the divine presence with the ark. In order to show the falsity of this superstitious notion of a magical "God in a box," the Lord allowed the ark to be captured by the Philistines at the disastrous first battle of Ebenezer, about 1090 B.C. (1 Sam 4:10,11). The lesson learned, however, God resumed his manifestations of power from the ark; the smitten people, both of Philistia and of the Jewish town of Beth-shemesh, had banished its fearful presence; and it had rested for over eighty years in the house of Abinadab in Kirjath-jearim, or Baalah (I Sam 7). We inquired not at it in the days of Saul. The one exception is noted in I Sam 14:18; and even there the ark may not have been actually employed but only asked for.

5. Shihor is the stream bed that marks the southwestern border of Palestine (Josh 13:3). All Israel. II Samuel 6:1 specifies a total of thirty thousand chosen men.

7. Uzza and Ahio were descendants of Abinadab (II Sam 6:3). 9. Chidon. A variant name, "Nachon," appears in II Sam 6:6. 10. He died before God. Such severity served the purpose of emphasizing for all future generations the necessity for reverence and conforming obedience toward God's sacred objects. Two distinct transgressions combined to produce the situation: (1) the ark should not have been mounted on a cart in the first place, but carried by hand (Num 4:15; the Philistines had indeed used a cart, but that had been in ignorance, I Sam 6:11); and (2) it should not have been touched: even its authorized carriers, Levites of the clan of Kohath (which Uzza and Ahio are not known to have been), had been warned against this on pain of death (Num 4:15). Uzza's intentions, however, were good; and his individual salvation was not necessarily involved.

11. David was displeased. Literally, angry, a natural response, because he himself was largely responsible. But his anger turned rapidly to fear (v. 12). Perez-uzza. The outbreak of Uzza. 14. Obed-edom, though coming from the area of Gath, was a Levite of the family of Korah in the clan of Kohath (26:1,4) and so met the requirement for a caretaker of the ark.

3) Independence from the Philistines. 14:1-17. I Chronicles 14 parallels II Sam 5:11-25. After summarizing David's royal establishment (vv. 1-7), the chronicler turns to David's chief international problem, that of domination by Philistia (vv. 8-17). In his flight from Saul, David had become a vassal of the Philistines (I Sam 27:1–28:2); and, during his years at Hebron, which coincide with their third great oppression (1010–1003 B.C.; see I Chr 10, introd.), he was still doubtless considered a Philistine client-king. His accession, however, over united Israel posed a threat that Philistine power could not ignore. Their attack was launched immediately (I Chr 14:8), even before his capture of Jerusalem (ch. 11; see v. 15, note). But by his reliance upon divine strength, David was able to beat off two invasions and to secure his nation's independence. The lesson is one of permanent validity for the believer: "God is gone before thee to smite the host of the Philistines!" (v. 15).

1. Hiram sent . . . timber. Years later Hiram supplied Solomon in the same way (II Chr 2:3), for even paganism may render service to the people of God.

3. But David took more wives, a thing which was prohibited by the Law (Deut 17:17) and led to calamity (II Sam 5:13-16; 11:27). 4. These are . . . his children. The same list appears, with minor variants, in 3:5-8. 7. Beeliada, The Master knows, was later changed to Eliada, "God knows," to avoid the idolatrous implications of Beel, Baal (cf. 8:33 note).

9. The Philistines . . . spread themselves, more accurately, raided, in the valley of Rephaim, southwest of Jerusalem (Josh 15:8). This is perhaps the Valley of "Weeping," Hebrew bākā', balsam tree (cf. v. 15). 11. Baal-perazim = Master of the break-throughs. 12. Their gods. David's men took them away (II Sam 5:21) and burned them with fire, as required by the Law (Deut 7:5,25).

15. A sound of going (marching) in the tops of the mulberry (balsam) trees. This was a miraculous sound (cf. II Kgs 7:6), signaling David to spring his ambush. 16. He smote the . . . Philistines . . . to Gazer (Gezer, on the border), thus expelling them from Israelitish territory.

4) The Ark Brought to Jerusalem. 15:1–16:43. In the days of Ezra, Jerusalem was more important religiously than politically (and indeed it has been so ever since). The chronicler therefore resumes his narrative (see ch. 13) of the induction of the ark into Jerusalem, the accomplishment of which brought about a permanent centralization of the religion of Israel within the walls of David's new capital. Chapters 15; 16 considerably amplify the parallel description found in II Sam 6:12-20. For they list the king's elaborate preparations (I Chr 15:1-15) to forestall any tragedy such as marred his previous attempt and to insure an appropriate retinue of singers (vv. 16-24); they quote David's model psalm of thanksgiving, that was used at the installation of the ark in its tent (16:7-36); and they explain the Levitical organization that he established for the preservation of a regular ministry at the Jerusalem sanctuary (vv. 4-6, 37-42).

15:1. He prepared a place for the ark. The reports of God's blessings on Obed-edom (II Sam 6:12) had revived David's desire for the presence of the ark. 2. None ought to carry the ark . . . but the Levites. David thus recognized his previous errors (see 13:10, note).

7. Gershom. Read Gershon, as in 6:1 and elsewhere (though cf. 6:16,17). 8-10. Elizaphan, Hebron, and Uzziel. These are family subdivisions within the first named Levitical clan of Kohath (v. 5; Ex 6:18,22).

12. Sanctify yourselves. By the prescribed ritual washings and the avoidance of ceremonial defilement (Ex 19:10,14, 15; Lev 11:44). 16. Cymbals, sounding. Literally, ones which cause (men) to hear (cf. v. 19, etc.). That is, the cymbals marked the time by sounding clear and loud. 18. Obed-edom, and Jeiel. Azaziah (v. 21) should probably be added. 20. Aziel. A shortened form of Jaaziel (v. 18). On Alamoth. In the soprano register (?). 21. On the Sheminith to excel. In the base register (lit., the eighth, or lower octave?), for leading off. Obed-edom the Gittite was, by position, a porter or gate-keeper (vv. 18, 24). But, for his faithful ministry (13: 14), he, with Jeiel, was rewarded with the post of bass harpist in the procession, a position subsequently made permanent (16:5,38). Berechiah and Elkanah then took over the "door-keeping" en route (15:23). 24. The priests did blow with the trumpets. This was a function reserved to them (Num 10:8; cf. I Chr 16:6). Jehiah is probably the Jeiel of verses 18,21, and 16:5.

25. David . . . went . . . with joy. He seems to have composed Psalm 24 for this occasion, "Lift up your heads, O ye gates; and the King of glory shall come in." 26. They (the whole company) offered seven bullocks and seven rams. II Samuel 6:13 records only David's offering, of one each. 27. An ephod. A surplice, or cape, worn in worship (Ex 28:6; I Sam 2:18). David, in his enthusiastic devotion (cf. II Sam 6:14), seems to have removed his outer garment. Contrast the rigid, unsympathetic reaction of David's queen, Michal the daughter of Saul (v. 29; II Sam 6:20-23).

16:3. A flagon of wine. Translate rather, a cake of raisins (ASV).

4. He appointed . . . Levites to minister. This was by divine command (II Chr 29:25) and marked the establishment of regular Levitical singers, who soon became an important part of Hebrew public worship, much stressed in Chronicles. 5. Asaph the chief. David thus elevated Asaph over Heman, who had apparently been the first choice of the Levites (15: 17). Asaph and his descendants subsequently composed twelve of our inspired psalms (Ps 50 and 73–83). Jeiel (first time) is the same as Jaaziel (15:18).

7. David delivered first this psalm. The following model song that David provided them consists, with slight modifications, of Ps 105:1-15; Ps 96; and Ps 106:1,47,48. All three psalms are listed anonymously in the Psalter, but on the basis of David's use of them here, it would appear that he is indeed their author. Into the hand of Asaph. Thus many of David's psalms include in their titles, "To the chief musician."

12. Remember his marvellous works. Psalm 105, is one of the Psalter's great historical surveys of God's faithfulness. 15. Be ye mindful . . . of his covenant, or testament (Heb., b'rît). This was God's legal instrument of redemption, by which he granted men reconciliation with himself, on condition of their exercising sincere faith in his promise (Gen 15:6). First revealed in Eden to fallen Adam (Gen 3:15), it was confirmed to Abraham and his chosen seed (Gen 17:7,8; Ex 19:5,6; Gal 3:29). Its ultimate effectuation was contingent upon the death of Jesus Christ, the divine testator (Heb 9:15-17), a fact symbolized under the anticipatory older testament by the shedding of sacrificial blood (Ex 24:6-8; Heb 9:18-22).

20. They went from nation to nation, having been promised Palestine, but not yet having received it (Heb 11:9). 22. Mine anointed. Set apart by My Spirit (cf. I Sam 16:13). My prophets. Abraham was a recipient, though not a regular proclaimer, of God's revelations. He was thus designated a prophet at the time of God's protecting him against Abimelech, king of Gerar (Gen 20:7). Other patriarchs, however, did make specific prophecies (e.g., Jacob, Gen 48:19). Psalm 105:16-45 then continues Israel's history through the greater vindication of the Exodus; but at this point David shifted to the second of his compositions, Psalm 96.

29. Worship the Lord in the beauty of holiness. More accurately, in holy array (ASV). Come before him. This is particularly appropriate because the divine presence rested over the ark (Num 7:89). 33. He cometh to judge the earth. An expression of Israel's developing hope in the glorious (second) coming of Jesus the Messiah (cf. Gen 49:10; Num 24:17; I Sam 2:10; Ps 2). 35. Deliver us from the heathen. An applicable prayer in light of the Philistine oppression just passed (cf. 13:2, note).

36. This verse is based on the conclusion of Psalm 106, which is also the closing doxology of Book IV of the Psalter (Ps 90–106). Thus it appears that David composed Psalm 106 with the purpose of concluding this collection of psalms (cf. v. 13 in his Ps 41, which closes the Davidic Book I of the Psalter). The people said, Amen, meaning, firm, steady. Amen may thus be rendered, "True indeed!" And praised the Lord. "Praise the Lord" is in Hebrew, Halleluya.

37. The ark of the covenant. For the ark of God's presence was the symbol of his redemptive testament, with its promise, "I am the Lord your God" (v. 14; cf. v. 15 note; Gen 17:7,8). 38. Jeduthun. The Hebrew text reads Jedithun, who is not to be confused with Jeduthun, the chief singer of the clan of Merari. Obed-edom's family was of Kohath (26:1,4). To be porters. Obed-edom was thus confirmed in his double position (see 15:21, note). 39. The tabernacle of Moses remained, as a separate sanctuary, at the high place . . . Gibeon (II Chr 1:13) until Solomon's construction of the Temple (I Kgs 8:4). 41. His mercy, Hebrew, his hesed, the basic meaning of which is, his loyalty to the provisions of the convenantal relationship (cf. Gen 21:23; Ps 136:10).

5) Nathan's Prophecy. 17:1-27. Chapter 17 (paralleling II Sam 7) is the climax of I Chronicles and explains the abiding significance of David and his career. Dated in about 995 B.C., after the cessation of the wars chronicled in chapter 18 (see 17:8; cf. II Sam 7:1), it commences with David's desire to build a permanent temple for the ark. But though God forbade David to construct His house (vv. 1-6), He promised to establish David's house (vv. 7-15). Just as God had prospered David personally, so He would prosper his kingdom. In the immediate future David's seed (Solomon) would construct God's Temple (vv. 11,12). In the more distant future David's seed (Jesus Christ) would combine in his person both human sonship and the Sonship of God (v. 13), and would some day set up on this earth the Kingdom of God forever (v. 14). David then breaks forth in praise to God for His incredible grace (vv. 16-27).

1. Nathan the prophet later rebuked David's sin (II Sam 12), aided Solomon (I Kgs 1:10,11), and recorded source material drawn upon in the Chronicles (I Chr 29:29; II Chr 9:29). 2. Do all that is in thine heart. This was Nathan's personal, non-inspired reaction, prior to his receiving God's true word (v. 3).

4. Thou shalt not build. David's ruthless warfare (cf. II Sam 8:2) had disqualified him (I Chr 22:8; 28:3). 5. I have not dwelt in a house. Except for the building briefly erected at Shiloh (I Sam 3:3), only to be destroyed by the Philistines after the first battle for Ebenezer (Jer 7:12).

7. I took thee from the sheepcote. From the sheepfold. Better, the pasture (RSV marg.; cf. I Sam 16:11). 9. I will ordain . . . and will plant them, and they shall dwell . . . and shall be moved no more. The Hebrew suggests, and context prefers, the past tense: "I have ordained . . . and have planted them so that they dwell . . . and are moved no more" (KD). As at the first. When Israel was oppressed in Egypt. 10. The Lord will build thee a house. Not a building, like the "house" David wished to build for God, but a dynasty (cf. v. 25).

12. He shall build me a house. This was fulfilled by Solomon (II Chr 3;4). But the promise, I will stablish his throne for ever, carries us forward to the ultimate successor to the throne of David, Jesus Christ (Lk 1:32,33). Christ set up his kingdom (in men's hearts) at his first coming (Lk 17:21; Dan 2:44 a), though its imposition over the world awaits his second coming (Lk 17:24; Dan 2:44b). 13. I will be his father, and he shall be my son. This refers to the deity of Jesus Christ (Heb 1:5; cf. Ps 2:7,12; Acts 13:33; Heb 5:5) and not to Solomon (cf. I Chr 22:10 note). It was necessary that Christ combine in his person perfect humanity and full deity (Mt 22:12-45; Phil 2:9), that he might make a true substitution for sinful man (I Pet 2:24; Heb 2:17,18) and yet restore us to God the Father (Jn 1:18; 14:6). With the words, I will not take my mercy away from him, Nathan returns to David's more immediate successors (cf. the context in the parallel passage, II Sam 7: 14,15), who would not be overthrown as was him that was before thee, namely Saul.

16. David . . . sat before the Lord. In the tent sanctuary he had erected for the ark (16:1). 17. A man of high degree. The text is somewhat uncertain, but it reflects David's amazement at his own exaltation from humble beginnings (v. 7).

22. Thine own people . . . and thou . . . their God. This is the central promise of God's reconciling covenant (cf. 16:14, 15), from Genesis (17:7) to Revelation (21:3).

6) Conquests and Administration. 18: 1-17. This section closely parallels II Samuel 8 and establishes the proposition that "the Lord prospered David whithersoever he went" (vv. 6,13): in the west, against Philistia (v. 1); in the east, against Moab (v. 2); north, against Syria (vv. 3-11); and south, against Edom (vv. 12,13). A concluding paragraph surveys David's administrative officers (vv. 14-17).

1. Now after this. An introductory formula, indicating no more than a logical succession of topics. In point of time, chapter 18 precedes chapter 17 (cf. 17:8), just as chapter 19 (cf. these same introductory words in 19:1) must precede 18 (v. 3). Gath was one of the five "mother cities" of the Philistines (II Sam 8:1, ASV). 2,6. Gifts. Tribute. 3. Hadarezer. Better, Hadadezer (II Sam 8:3). The king of Zobah, an Aramean territory lying northeast of Damascus and south of Hamath. Went to stablish his dominion. This was the second defeat of these Syrians (Arameans), the full account being found in the next chapter (19:6-19). The river Euphrates. Considerably further north and east. Hadadezer had summoned reinforcements from this area (19:16). 4. He houghed, i.e., hamstrung, all the chariot horses, to insure peace.

8. Tibhath and Chun. These, and some of the names that follow, have variant forms in the corresponding verses (II Sam 8:8-10). Brass. Nᵉḥoshet, "bronze." Wherewith Solomon made the brazen sea (cf. v. 11). The vast resources that David furnished for Solomon's Temple are outlined in 22:2-5,14,15.

12. Abishai . . . slew of the Edomites . . . eighteen thousand. The title to Ps 60 names Joab as David's "chief of staff" (cf. II Sam 8:13,16; I Kgs 11:15,16), and cites a variant figure of 12,000.

16. Abimelech. Rather, Ahimelech (24:3; II Sam 8:17). Shavsha. Seraiah (II Sam 8:17).

17. The Cherethites and the Pelethites were David's Cretan and Philistine guard, the Philistines having come originally from Caphtor (Crete; cf. I Chr 10 notes). During the periods of their domination over Israel they had utilized Hebrews as troops (I Sam 14:21; 28:1). But David's victories in 1003 had reversed the situation, and the Philistines were now found in his employ.

7) Victories over Ammon. 19:1–20:3. One of David's last (about 995 B.C.) and most desperate international struggles arose in connection with two campaigns against the Ammonites, a people kindred to Israel and inhabiting an area to their immediate east in Trans-Jordan. The chronicler details this specific instance of God's care for his own (19: 13), including: (1) the causes of the conflict (19:1-5); (2) Joab's victorious campaign against the double army of the Ammonites and their mercenary Syrian allies (vv. 6-15); (3) David's crushing of an attempted Syrian counterattack (vv. 16-19); and (4) Joab's second campaign, which resulted in the destruction of the Ammonite state. These records, except for their omission of David's crime with Bath-sheba, are parallel to II Sam 10–12.

19:1. After this. See 18:1, note. The children of Ammon. Descendants by incest from Abraham's nephew Lot (Gen 19:36-38). They had repeatedly ravaged the neighboring territories of Israel in the chaotic days of the Judges (Jud 3:13; chs. 10; 11; I Sam 11:1), but had been first repelled and then subdued by Saul (I Sam 11:11; 14:47). 2. His father Nahash showed kindness. This could hardly be the same Nahash Saul had battled fifty-five years before (I Sam 11), but may have been a son, who aided David against Saul. Compare David's help from the king of Moab (I Sam 22: 3). 4. Hanun . . . shaved them. II Samuel specifies, "Shaved off the one half of their beards" (10:4), a most shameful deed in the Orient (v. 5), and one that reaped heavy punishment (20:3).

6. A thousand talents of silver. Each talent weighed about seventy-five pounds avoirdupois, or ninety-two pounds troy weight, the total value being well over $2,000,000. Mesopotamia. The area between the Tigris and the Euphrates rivers provided the later reinforcements v. 16). It probably included the Beth-rehob mentioned in II Sam 10:6,8 (cf. Gen 36:37). Syria-maachah was southwest of Zobah (see 18:3 note), between Damascus and Galilee. 7. Thirty and two thousand chariots. Add "horsemen, and footmen" (cf. v. 18; II Sam 10:6). The king of Maachah and his people. II Samuel 10:6 specifies one thousand men. They pitched before Medeba. A Trans-Jordanian city in northern Reuben, southwest of the Ammonite border. 9. The gate of the city; i.e., of their capital, Rabbah (cf. v. 15; 20:1).

13. Behave . . . valiantly . . . and let the Lord do that which is good. One's utmost effort, combined with implicit faith (cf. Phil 2:12,13).

15. Joab came to Jerusalem. It seems to have been too late in the year to undertake a siege (see 20:1).

16. Beyond the river. On the eastern side of the Euphrates (18:3). 17. They fought. At Helam (II Sam 10:16,17), near Hamath in the Orontes Valley (I Chr 18:3), the northern border of Zobah. 18. Seven thousand men . . . in chariots. The parallel account (18:4) correctly defines these as "horsemen," since the total of captured chariots was only one thousand. The figures in the Hebrew text of Samuel (but not in the LXX, which agrees with Chronicles) have been corrupted into the less likely proportion of "seven hundred" (II Sam 8:4) horsemen ("men of chariots," II Sam 10:18). Forty thousand footmen (not "horsemen," II Sam 10:18) seems likewise to be a textual corruption of the original figure of twenty thousand (II Chr 18:4). The total of the initial force is given as thirty-two thousand (19:7).

19. The servants of Hadadezer included his client-kings (II Sam 10:19).

20:1. At the time that kings go out. Spring of the following year, after the rainy season. David tarried at Jerusalem. At this point occurred the scandalous affair of David's adultery with Bath-sheba and his murder of her heroic husband, Uriah (II Sam 11:2-27), which the chronicler thus suggests to his readers, without retracing the sordid details.

2. David took the crown. After reaching Rabbah for its final capitulation (II Sam 12:27-29). Their king. Hebrew malkām. Compare "Malcham" (Zeph 1:5) and "Milcom" (I Kgs 11:5,33), names of the leading Ammonite idol. Found . . . to weigh a talent of gold (see 19:6, note). It could not have been worn regularly by a man. There were precious stones in it. Better, a precious stone. A singular stone (RSV). 3. And he cut (them) with saws. Hebrew, way-yā'sar. This word should be corrected to a form very similar to it in the original, way-yā'sem. Read, "And he put (them to work) with saws," etc. David could be ruthless (cf. II Sam 8:2), but he was not cruel. Harrows. Better, picks. II Samuel adds, labor "in the brickkiln" (12:31).

8) Philistine Wars. 20:4-8. The chronicler concludes his analysis of the period of David's rise with a survey of certain outstanding incidents that occurred in battle with the Philistines. They follow the first Philistine wars (14:8-17), but they precede the God-given rest from foreign enemies granted David about 995 B.C. (17:8; II Sam 7:1). They are included, with minor variants, within the appendix of II Samuel (in 21:15-22) and may be associated with the campaigns outlined in I Chr 18:1.

4. After this. See 18:1, note. Gezer (II Sam 21:18, "Gob") was the border city to which the Philistines had been forced back after David's wars of independence (14:16 note). Sibbechai was one of "the Thirty" heroes (11:29) and commander of David's eighth corps (27:11). Of the children of the giant. Hebrew, Rephaim, an ancient people (Gen 14:5), noted for their large size. Except for the kingdom of Og in Bashan, the Rephaim had died out by the time of Moses (Deut 3:11). 5. The brother of Goliath, who was slain by David (I Sam 17). A slight textual corruption causes the parallel passage (II Sam 21:19, ASV) to read as though Elhanan slew Goliath himself! A weaver's beam. See 11:23, note.

C. David's Latter Days. 21:1–29:30. David's sin with Bath-sheba precipitated a chain of crimes (cf. Amnon's license, as "king's son," II Sam 13:4), that centered about Prince Absalom and occupied the space of a full eleven years

(II Sam 13:23,38; 14:28; 15:7, variant reading), or from approximately 990 to 979 B.C. Such unenlightening conduct, however, contributed little to Ezra's purpose of embodying in the men of his own day the piety that characterized David at his best. Most of the events recorded in II Sam 11–19, accordingly, find no counterpart in the chronicler's work (cf. Introduction, Occasion for Writing). With these must also be included the revolt of Sheba (II Sam 20); so that it is not until about 975 B.C., in the latter years of David's life, that the historical analysis of Chronicles is resumed. It then traces the course of David's census (I Chr 21), which resulted in the revelation of the site for the Temple and the preparations for its building (ch. 22). The results of David's organizational genius, in the spheres both of religious (chs. 23–26) and of civil administration (ch. 27), are outlined, followed by his final charges to the people to be faithful to their God (chs. 28–29). Only chapter 21 has a direct parallel elsewhere in Scripture.

1) The Census. 21:1-30. While the cause for David's census lay in Israel's provocation of God (II Sam 24:1), and while the king's own insistence upon a census was equally sinful (v. 3 note); yet David's subsequent repentance was not only exemplary in every way (vv. 8,13,17,24), but it became, also, the means of God's designating the spot for the high altar of sacrifice, within the Temple that would soon thereafter be erected in Jerusalem. The chronicler therefore retraces these events, which form likewise the concluding chapter to the appendix of II Samuel (ch. 24).

1. Satan . . . provoked David. Because of the devil's antipathy against Israel and, ultimately, against the God of Israel (cf. Job 1:11; 2:5). The parallel record (II Sam 24:1) goes deeper and shows that Satan was but an instrument of God, being used to execute punishment on Israel for their sins, presumably their revolts against David, God's anointed, that terminated only with Sheba's death prior to 975 B.C. (cf. Job 1:12; 2:6; I Kgs 22:22,23). 3. A cause of trespass to Israel. Not that there was anything inherently wrong in a census (cf. Num 1:1,2; 26:1,2); but in this case David seems to have been seeking his security in the strength of his armies (v. 5) rather than by faith in the promises of God (compare 27:23 and Ps 30:6; see I Chr 22:1, note).

4. Joab . . . went throughout all Israel. II Samuel 24:5-8 notes that it took about ten months, and outlines his route of travel. 5. Of Israel one million one hundred thousand . . . and in Judah four hundred and seventy thousand. II Samuel 24:9 gives the round figure for Judah of 500,000 and limits Israel's census to 800,000 valiant men.

9. Gad, David's seer, counseled him wisely on several occasions (I Sam 22:5; II Chr 29:25), and later composed one of the literary sources of the Chronicles (I Chr 29:29). 12. Three years of famine. So also in the LXX of II Sam 24:13. The Hebrew text of this parallel passage, however, reads "seven years," a less likely figure in light of the other "three unit" alternatives. Pestilence . . . and the angel of the Lord. Compare similar instances of divine punishment in I Sam 6:3-6; II Kgs 19:35. 13. David said unto Gad. The king's submission to the voice of God through the prophet is noteworthy (cf. II Sam 12:13). 14. There fell of Israel seventy thousand. An appropriate punishment, since David's sin seems to have involved reliance upon numerical military strength. 15. Ornan. "Araunah" in II Samuel 24. 17. These sheep. Scripture frequently compares leader and people to shepherd and flock (11:2; Ps 23). David's self-sacrificing spirit is commendable, though this was not a case of the nation's suffering simply for her leader's sin (v. 1 note).

23. The oxen were used to pull the wooden threshing sledges over the grain. 24. Burnt offerings without cost. Even so, God finds no pleasure in the man who yields him only what involves no sacrifice. He asks of us our whole life (Rom 12:1; cf. Lk 21:1-3). 25. Six hundred shekels of gold. Worth about $5000. II Sam 24:24 notes a small amount of silver paid first for the threshing floor itself.

26. He answered him from heaven by fire. God similarly inaugurated others of his places of sacrifice (Lev 9:24; II Chr 7:1). 29. The tabernacle . . . at Gibeon. See 16:39, note.

2) Temple Preparations. 22:1-19. An effective stimulus for future devotion to the post-Exilic Temple lay in the example of consecration furnished by David, as he made the preparations for its pre-Exilic prototype (cf. chs. 28;29). The chronicler therefore takes joy in recounting David's own efforts (vv. 2-5) and the exhortations by which he encouraged his son Solomon (vv. 6-16) and the leaders of Israel (vv. 17-19) to the prosecution of this holy task.

1. This is the house of the Lord. Ornan's threshing floor on Mount Moriah, on which site the Temple was soon to be built by Solomon (II Chr 3:1). It thus appears that Psalm 30, which is stated to be by David, and yet was used "at the dedication of the house (temple)" (ASV), belongs historically at this point. Its fifth and sixth verses well summarize David's experiences of I Chronicles 21. 2. David gathered together the strangers, Hebrew, gērîm, "resident aliens." Cf. similar "construction drafts" by Solomon (II Chr 2:17,18; 8:7,8). This parallels the employment of the conquered Canaanites as the "Nethinim," temple slaves (I Chr 9:2, note). 5. Solomon . . . is young and tender. He was apparently David's fourth son by Bath-sheba (3:5). Thus, if born in 990 B.C., he would have been twenty at his accession. 8. The word of the Lord came to me. Brought by Nathan before Solomon's birth (17:4). Thou hast made great wars. It is not that war may not be necessary and right (cf. 14:10; 19:13). But David had gone too far; he had been guilty of needless bloodshed (e.g., II Sam 8:2). 9. For his name shall be Solomon. Hebrew, peaceful. 10. He shall build an house for my name . . . and I will establish the throne of his kingdom. A direct quotation from 17:12-14, Nathan's prediction that Solomon would build the Temple. The middle clauses, however, I will be his father, and he shall be my son, refer to Christ (17:13). Scripture seems to have included them here simply as means of associating the relevant passages that precede them and follow them. Compare the inclusion of Acts 2:19,20 in the total citation that extends from Acts 2:17 to 21, as an example of a similar sandwich-structure quotation.

14. In my trouble. By my hard labor. David's resources came to exceed those of his proverbially wealthy son (II Chr 9:13). A hundred thousand talents of gold, a million talents of silver (RSV) = 9,200,000 and 92,000,000 pounds troy weight, respectively. Its value by modern standards would be $6,000,000,000, and its equivalent in ancient purchasing power was far greater! 16. Of the gold . . . there is no number. "Of men for the gold-work . . . there is no number." 17. The princes of Israel. National and tribal leaders, not necessarily of royal blood (so in 23:2, etc.). 19. Bring the ark . . . into the house. David's original project would thus be accomplished (chs. 13; 15; 16; 17).

3) Levitical Organization. 23:1–26:32. One of David's most lastingly significant contributions to posterity lay in the arrangements that he made for the ministry of the tribe of Levi. The genius he displayed in the organization of the Levites helped preserve the Levitical services under his successors, provided the administrative force for the revival of the Mosaic theocracy under Ezra (see chapter 6, introd.), and continued to serve as the basis for Israel's religious organization on into NT times. David's fundamental policy was one of separating the 38,000 Levites of his day into four operational groups (23:3-5). After an outline of the Levitical clans and families (vv. 7-23) and a brief survey of their duties (vv. 24-32), these four groups are enumerated: 24,000 who "set forward the work of the house of the Lord" (ch. 24), under whom were included the priestly family of Aaron (24:1-19) and the other Levites who assisted them (vv. 20-31); 4,000 who served as singers (ch. 25); 4,000 "porters" or door-keepers, under whom were included the temple treasurers (26:1-28); and finally 6,000 "officers and judges," who were engaged in "the outward business over Israel" (26:29-32). The priests, the temple Levites (?), and the singers were further organized within themselves into twenty-four "courses" each, whose rotation could be coordinated into periods of monthly service.

23:1. David was . . . full of days (cf. v. 27; 26:31). He was seventy years old in 970 B.C. (II Sam 5:4). He made Solomon . . . king. The disputed succession and the ruthless consolidation that followed upon Solomon's rise to power (I Kgs 1;2) are passed over by the chronicler as unworthy of comment.

3. They were numbered from the age of thirty years and upward (see v. 24, note) and, presumably, under fifty years (Num 4:3). 5. Instruments which I made. The king had inventive genius in this area that was long remembered (Amos 6:5). 6. The sons of Levi. Compare the lists in 24:20-30; 6:16-30, and the other Biblical references cited in the introduction to chapter 6. Minor variants exist in the spellings, and in some other details.

7. Laadan and Shimei . . . These are listed not to provide a complete genealogy but rather to establish the major clans of Levi, out of which the Davidic organization was formed. 8. The chief was Jehiel. Jehiel was the ancient Levite who founded this chief family. The individual "chiefs" who headed up David's courses are listed in 24:20-30. 9. This Shimei is apparently not the same as the Shimei son of Gershon listed in verses 7,10. It is likely that both this second Shimei and Laadan were sons of Libni, the older son of Gershon and brother of Shimei (6:17). Thus the clans of Gershon totaled nine—six for Laadan and three for Shimei (on the basis of the combining of Jeush and Beriah, v. 11).

14. The man of God. Moses' distinctive title (Deut 33:1; Ps 90, title). Moses ranks as one of the greatest human figures in the whole OT (Deut 34:10-12).

22. Their brethren (cousins) took them in marriage, according to the Mosaic law for the preservation of family property (Num 36). This gave the clan of Merari four divisions (one for Mahli and three for Mushi), making then, with the nine each of Gershon and Kohath, twenty-two Levitical divisions, plus the Aaronic priests.

24. The age of twenty years and upward. But in verse 3, it is thirty years and upward. Moses had likewise taken the census of Levites aged thirty and above (Num 4:3), but later included in the work those twenty-five and upwards (8:23-26). The explanation for David's further lowering of the age limit appears to have been the lessening physical demands of the service (v. 26), plus the increasing man-power needs that would arise with the new Temple. 25. That they may dwell in Jerusalem for ever. Rather, and he dwelleth in Jerusalem for ever (ASV).

29. For the showbread. Cf. 9:32 note. Flour for meat offering. Better, meal offering (ASV). This was the one major form of sacrifice that did not employ flesh (Lev 2). That which is fried. Literally, that which is mixed (with oil).

30. Every morning . . . and at even. The times of the two regular daily sacrifices (Ex 29:38,39). 31. And to offer all burnt sacrifices. Connect with verse 30 and read, to stand . . . at even and for all offering of burnt sacrifices. Only the priests could actually officiate at the altar. The set feasts, observed annually, were five: Passover, Pentecost, Trumpets, the Day of Atonement, and Tabernacles (Lev 23). The first, second, and last required pilgrimage to the central sanctuary (Ex 23:14-17; Deut 16:16).

24:1. The sons of Aaron. For the priestly family, compare 6:3-15 and the accompanying notes.

3. David, with Zadok and Ahimelech (ASV), distributed them. Ahimelech II was the son of Abiathar (v. 6) and grandson of Ahimelech I, who had been high priests in the earlier days of David.

4. Sixteen and eight. The twenty-four priestly courses (23:6) continued as the basis for rotating the priestly duties down into NT times. Although some of these courses died out or had to be consolidated with others, new ones were formed to take their places. In the return from exile, 538 B.C., four registered courses were represented, David's second, third, and sixteenth, and a new course, Pashur (Ezr 2:36-39); and by 520 B.C. twenty-two were again in operation (Neh 12:1-7; cf. vv. 12-21; 10:2-8).

10. The eighth to Abijah. This was the course to which Zacharias, father of John the Baptist, belonged (Lk 1:5).

20. The rest of the sons of Levi. The courses that follow (vv. 20-30) are those of the Levitical temple assistants that correspond to the priestly courses. The first nine (vv. 20-25) equal the nine family divisions (23:12-20) that arose from the four sons of Levi's son Kohath: Amram, Izhar, Hebron, and Uzziel. For each course, e.g., Shubael (or Shebuel, 23:16), there is given the chief in the time of David, e.g., Jehdeiah, except for the chiefs of Hebron, whose names may have been lost to Ezra. 22. Shelomoth. Or, Shelomith (23:18).

26. The courses of the sons of Merari (vv. 26-30) include four that correspond to the four family divisions (23:21-23), though the only chief's name to appear is Jerahmeel (24:29), for the combined Mahlite group of Eleazar and Kish (cf. 23:22). The sons of Jaaziah. This Jaaziah is contextually distinguished from Mahli and Mushi, the actual sons of Merari, and may have been a later Merarite, the numerical strength of whose descendants had grown to the point of separate recognition as courses by David.

31. They likewise cast lots over against

. . . the sons of Aaron; that is, the above-mentioned chiefs of the non-Aaronic Levites. If the nine divisions of Gershon from the preceding chapter (23:7-11) be included as courses, and if Jaaziah's sons Beno (or Bani; cf. LXX and ICC) and Shoham, Zaccur, and Ibri (24:27), be considered as representing two separate courses, with their chiefs, then the total of the twenty-two Levitical divisions (23:22 note) would provide twenty-four courses of approximately one thousand men each, to correspond to the twenty-four courses of the priests.

25:1. David . . . set apart for the service certain (ASV) of the sons of Asaph. These arrangements were, by divine command, mediated to David through the prophets Nathan and Gad (II Chr 29:25). Asaph . . . Heman, and . . . Jeduthun, belonging respectively to the Levitical clans of Gershon, Kohath, and Merari (6:33-47), had been appointed chief musicians at the time of the entrance of the ark into Jerusalem (16:5, 41).

2. Asaph . . . prophesied. Many of the OT prophecies are in poetic form (cf. the musical prophets of I Sam 10:5); and, correspondingly, much of the poetry is of a prophetic nature (cf. v. 4 note). Specifically, Asaph and his descendants composed Ps 50 and 73–83. 3. After the name Jeshaiah insert "Shimei" (v. 17), to make the required total of six.

4. Starting with the sixth son, Hananiah, these names, when translated from the Hebrew, form the following prayer of Heman about his work as a prophet-singer:

> (6th) Be gracious, oh Lord, (7th) be Thou gracious unto me! (8th) My God, Thou; (9th) I've praised (10th) and exalted for helping; (11th) Though sitting forlorn, (12th) I've proclaimed (13th) highest (14th) visions.

5. Heman the king's seer in the words of God. He may have been responsible for some of the psalms (42–49; 84; 85; 87; 88) composed by his Korahite clan (6:33-38). Sons . . . to lift up the horn. That is, Heman's horn (power): God blessed him with a numerous family. Three daughters. Women, too, had a part in the musical service (Ps 68:25).

8. They cast lots. To determine the arrangement of the courses under the twenty-four sons of Asaph, Heman, and Jeduthun. The teacher as the scholar. The division seems to have included all 4,000 of the singers (23:5) and not just the 288 master musicians.

11. Fourth . . . Izri; i.e., Zeri (v. 3). Compare similar spelling variants for the leaders of the seventh, eleventh, thirteenth, and fifteenth courses.

26:1. The porters served as gatekeepers (v. 13) and as guards over temple property in general (v. 20, note). Korhites = descendants of Korah, the notorious Levite who rebelled against Moses (see on 6:22; 9:19). Kore's father Asaph was Ebiasaph (9:19), not the famous musician Asaph, who belonged to the clan of Gershon. Korah, and these porters who were his descendants, belonged to the clan of Kohath.

4. Obed-edom. The Levite who had received God's blessing for keeping the ark after the death of Uzza (13:13,14). He held the double appointment of both singer and temple guard (see on 15:21; 16:38).

10. Hosah was appointed at the same time as Obed-edom (16:38). That original number of 68 gate-keeping guards had, at this point, increased to 93 (18, 62, and 13), who constituted the leaders for the total group of 4,000 porters (23:5). Indeed, by the time Jerusalem fell in 586 B.C., the number had risen to 212 (9:22).

13. They cast lots, not for periods of service, as in the previous allotments, but for places of service. 14. Shelemiah. Or, "Meshelemiah," as in verse 1 and elsewhere. 15. The house of Asuppim (cf. v. 17). Literally, the storehouse (ASV). 16. Shuppim is not otherwise known but was probably, like Hosah, a gate-keeper of the clan of Merari. The causeway going up moved from the western, lower city, through the Tyropeon Valley, to the higher elevation of the Temple. 17,18. Eastward were six, etc. A total of twenty-four leaders of guards(?) (cf. v. 10, note) were thus on duty at one time. 18. Parbar. The form is uncertain, perhaps a colonnade or court.

20. Of the Levites, Ahijah was over the treasures. The porters' "office of trust" included the treasurerships (9:26, ASV). But Ahijah (Heb. text, ʾḥyh) is otherwise unknown; and it may be better to read with the LXX, The Levites, their brethren, were over the treasures. Their brethren (Heb. ʾḥyhm) would then be Jehieli's Laadanites, over the temple treasury (vv. 21,22), and Shelomith's Amramites, over the dedicated gifts (vv. 23-28).

22. Jehieli. A man of Jehiel. Jehiel, Zetham, and Joel were, in fact, all sons of Laadan; but Jehiel was the accepted leader over his two brothers (23:8). 23. The Amramites, etc. The divisions of the clan of Kohath. 24. Shebuel the son of Gershom (23:16; 24:20). He had been chief treasure-officer under his grandfather, Moses. But Shelomith (v. 25) the descendant of Gershom's brother Eliezer, held the position under David (v. 26). 26. Treasures of the dedicated things. See 18:11 and II Chr 5:1 for David's devotion in this regard.

29. Izharites and Hebronites (vv. 30-32). These Levites of the clan of Gershon, provided 4,400 (1,700 plus 2,700) of the 6,000 officers and judges (23:4). Moses had first issued the natural directive that the Levites, who taught the word of God (Deut 33:10), should be entrusted with its interpretation in judgment (Deut 17:9; cf. II Chr 19:8,11; Neh 11:15). 32. Reubenites, the Gadites, and the half tribe of Manasseh. That is, the part of Israel that lay east of the Jordan.

4) The Civil Organization. 27:1-34. The flourishing state of Israel under David was a far cry from the impoverished Jewish subprovince that existed in the days of Ezra. Although this outline of the glories of a past administration was without political relevance to the returned exiles (as it is to us!), it nevertheless must have thrilled Ezra's people (as it does us) with the truth that visible political rewards are included in God's decree for his faithful servants (cf. Rev 2:26). I Chronicles 27, accordingly, surveys: David's military system of twelve army corps, each with its commanding officer, its complement of 24,000 men, and its term of one month's active duty per year (vv. 1-15); his regional organization by tribal areas, each with its tribal prince (vv. 16-25); and his central administration of "cabinet" executives and officials over the royal property (vv. 25-34).

2. Over the first course . . . was. The "lieutenant generals" who commanded the twelve army corps were all distinguished military figures (cf. I Chr 11, with the occasional variant spellings of their names). Jashobeam. The first of "the Three," the outstanding heroes (11:11). 3. Jashobeam was of the children of Perez, one of the two chief clans of the tribe of Judah (2:4).

4. The second corps, Dodai, the second of "the Three" (11:12). Of his course was Mikloth also the ruler. His "executive officer."

5. The third corps, Benaiah (11:22-25), the son of Jehoiada the priest (ASV; see on 12:27). This was the commander of the Cretan guard (18:17, note). 6. Benaiah . . . was . . . above the thirty. See notes on 11:11,21; 12:4.

7. The fourth corps, Asahel. The first of "the Thirty," the heroic "legion of honor." He was killed in the war against Abner early in David's reign (11:26, note). 8. The fifth corps, Shamhuth the Izrahit. Shamhuth was "of Zerah" (i.e., a Zarhite, vv. 11,13), the other chief clan of Judah (cf. v. 3). He was a member of "the Thirty" (11:27). 9. The sixth corps, etc. The remaining seven commanders were also members of "the Thirty" (11:28-31). 15. Heldai was of the descendants of Othniel, the first of the Hebrew Judges (Jud 1:13; 3:9-11).

17. Hashabiah and Zadok the priest. Two princes were thus appointed for Levi, while the princes for the tribes of Gad and Asher were either unknown to Ezra, or perhaps their names were lost from the text by later scribal error. 18. Elihu, . . . of the brethren of David. Elsewhere called Eliab (2:13). 21. For Benjamin, Jaasiel the son of Abner, who was the famous general and uncle of King Saul of Benjamin (26:28; I Sam 14:50; cf. I Chr 8:33; 9:39).

23. God would increase Israel like to the stars. The promise given more than one thousand years before, to Abraham (Gen 22:17). David, therefore, did not order a total numbering of the people, which would have left the impression of questioning this prophecy. He had, however, apparently through a lack of faith in God's power to protect his kingdom, taken a sinful census of the men of fighting age (21:1-8).

28. The low plains. Hebrew, Shephelah. The piedmont area between the Philistine coastal plain and the inland Judean hills.

32. Also Jonathan. This list of high officials supplements the earlier "cabinet" presented in 18:15-17 and II Sam 20:23-26. 34. After Ahithophel was Jehoiada. Ahithophel deserted David for Absalom (II Sam 15:12,31; 16:20-23); but, when thwarted by Hushai, the king's companion (ASV, the king's friend, an official cabinet post; II Sam 15:32-37; 17:1-16), he committed suicide (II Sam 17:23).

5) Final Words. 28:1–29:30. This passage resumes the record of David's last assembling of the leaders of Israel (v. 1 parallels 23:2), 970 B.C. (23:27; 26:31). His purpose had been not simply to place the Levitical organization on a permanent footing (chs. 23–26) but also to insure his nation's commitment to the erection of the Jerusalem Temple. David therefore charged both the people (28:2-8) and his son Solomon (vv. 9,10) with dedication to this holy task. Then, after presenting his son with the inspired written plans for the Temple and its services (vv. 11-19), he again charged him to be faithful (vv. 20,21). Turning to the national leaders, David next appealed to them for an all-out effort of giving for the Temple (29:1-5). The assembly rose to the challenge (vv. 6-9), and David praised God for their bounty (vv. 10-22). Solomon was then confirmed on the throne of his father, and David passed to his eternal reward (vv. 22-30).

28:2. The footstool of our God suggests the golden plate, or "mercy seat" (v. 11), that covered the ark, and above which the cloud of God's glorious presence appeared (Ex 25:20,21; II Sam 6:2; 22:11). 3. Thou hast shed blood (cf. 22:8, note). David had earlier spoken of these same matters with Solomon privately (22:7-16).

4. God . . . chose me . . . to be king over Israel for ever. His dynasty, culminating in Christ, would be eternal (17:11). Chosen Judah . . . to make me king. For this progressively narrowing choice, see Gen 49:8-10; I Sam 16:1-13; I Chr 22:9,10. 5. The throne of the kingdom of the Lord over Israel. Earth's rulers are but ministers, deputies of God (29:23; I Sam 12:14; Rom 13:1-6). 6. I have chosen him to be my son, and I will be his father. See on 22:10.

9. Serve him with a . . . willing mind. The spirit of this pious charge parallels David's similar admonition in I Kgs 2:2-4.

11. The place of the mercy seat. See on verse 2. 12. The pattern . . . by the Spirit (cf. v. 19). The plans for the Temple were divinely inspired, just as had been those of Moses' Tabernacle before it (Ex 25:9,40; 27:8). For the very items of furniture and their arrangement were typical of the way in which salvation would ultimately be accomplished by Christ (Heb. 8;9, especially 8:5). 18. The chariot of the cherubim. Not the cherubim on the ark (see v. 2, note), but the larger cherubim that overshadowed this whole "seat" of God (II Chr 3:10-12; cf. Ezk 1:5-26).

29:1,2. Solomon . . . is yet young and tender, and . . . I have prepared. Thoughts similar to those expressed by David when he commenced the temple preparations (22:5,14, notes). 3. Over and above all that he had prepared (22:14,15). The following was an additional gift, from David's personal resources. 4. Three thousand talents of gold from Ophir (the best quality) and seven thousand . . . of . . . silver (cf. 19:6; 22:14, notes) are worth about $1,100,000,000 and $16,000,000 respectively, though its purchasing power in ancient times would have been much greater. 5. To consecrate his service. Literally, to fill his hand. The phrase is a technical one. It was used when candidates were ordained to the priesthood. Our gifts should be equally "devoted."

7. Gold, five thousand talents. About $185,000,000. Ten thousand drams (darics, ASV). Persian gold coins worth about $5.00 each. The chronicler used the daric to evaluate this offering in 970 B.C., even though coinage was actually unknown to David. Ten thousand talents of silver and eighteen thousand of brass (bronze). That is, 920,000 and 1,656,000 pounds troy weight, respectively. One hundred thousand talents of iron equals 3,750 tons. Iron was then a much rarer commodity than it is today. 8. Jehiel the Gershonite. The chief temple treasurer (26:21,22). 9. They offered willingly. Willingness is the attitude that God loves (II Cor 9:7) and that should characterize all our giving.

10. God of Israel. Israel here is the patriarch Jacob (Gen 32:28). 11. Thine is the kingdom. From these praises come the words placed at the end of the Lord's Prayer in the AV (Mt 6:13). 14. Of thine own have we given thee. This is the basis of "stewardship": that everything we have and are is from God, being simply held in trust by us, and that it should therefore be used for him (Lk 17:10).

20. They worshipped the Lord, and the king. "To worship," as used here, means to "prostrate oneself." Thus it may be performed either to God or to a man. 21. And sacrifices in abundance for all Israel. Probably peace offerings, on which the people feasted, as the Lord's guests (Lev 7:15; cf. Ex 24:11).

22. They made Solomon . . . king the second time (parallels 23:1). The chronicler thus makes no attempt to conceal, but rather suggests to his readers, the inglorious incident (which he does not relate) of Solomon's first proclamation as king under pressure of a plot to have him displaced (I Kgs 1:39). Confirmatory rites were of value, particularly when there had been such a disputed succession (cf. I Sam 10:24 and 11:14,15 on Saul). And Zadok. His anointing as high priest was similarly confirmed; for David's other priest, Abiathar, had disqualified himself in the plots (I Kgs 1:7; cf. 2:26).

24. All the sons . . . of . . . David, submitted themselves, particularly Adonijah, Solomon's older brother, who had attempted to usurp the throne (I Kgs 1:53).

28. He died . . . full of . . . honour. I Kings qualifies this generalization with certain specific matters of a less complimentary nature (1:1-4,15; 2:5,6,8,9).

COMMENTARY

I. The Reign of Solomon. 1:1–9:31.

A. Solomon's Inauguration. 1:1-17. Prior to his own death, King David had placed his son on the throne of Israel and made sure that the nation's leaders "pledged their allegiance to King Solomon" (I Chr 29:24). However, the brilliant reign of Solomon received its inauguration with God's appearing to him at Gibeon (II Chr 1:1-13). This incident, more than any other in all history, confirms the Biblical teaching that, "If any of you lack wisdom, let him ask of God . . . and it shall be given him" (Jas 1:5). With it, therefore, the chronicler opens the second half of his great study. He thus parallels I Kgs 3:4-15, though he omits Gibeon's immediate validation in Solomon's decision over the children of the two harlots (I Kgs 3:16-28), as being of limited, personal interest. He substitutes, rather, its later economic validation, as seen in Israel's national prosperity (II Chr 1:14-17, a passage paralleled in I Kgs 10:26-29).

1. The Lord . . . magnified him. This resumes the thought of I Chr 29:25.

3. The high place that was at Gibeon. This city was seven miles northwest of Jerusalem. By Solomon's time, Gibeon, with the tabernacle of . . . the Lord (I Chr 16:39), and Jerusalem, with the ark of God (II Chr 1:4), were the only legitimate places for divine sacrifice (see I Kgs 3:2; cf. the principle of centralized worship, where God was revealed, in Ex 20:24; Deut 12:5). Other high places, even if used in the name of Israel's God Jehovah (Yahweh), were contaminated by association with Baal worship and were under God's ban (Num 33:52; Deut 12:2). Solomon's sin began, in fact, with his recognition of the high places, plural (I Kgs 3:3). 4. The ark . . . had David brought up. See I Chr 13;15;16.

7. God . . . appear[ed], in a dream (I Kgs 3:5,15; cf. I Sam 28:6). 8. Thou hast shewed great mercy. Mercy (hesed) here means "faithfulness" (see on I Chr 16:41). 9. For God's promise unto David see I Chr 17:11-14. It included the establishment of David's seed upon his throne and the erection of the Temple in Jerusalem. A people like the dust of the earth. God had thus fulfilled exactly his earlier promise to Abraham (Gen 13:16). 10. Give me . . . wisdom. Solomon's own prayer corresponded to that which his father David had wished for him (I Chr 22:12).

12. Wisdom . . . is granted unto thee. Solomon's factual knowledge was limited by his cultural environment; but his "wisdom," his ability in the application of knowledge, has never been surpassed (I Kgs 3:12). And I will give thee riches, and wealth, and honour (cf. I Chr 29:25). "Seek ye first the kingdom of God and his righteousness, and all these things shall be added unto you" (Mt 6:33).

14. The existence of Solomon's chariot cities (cf. 9:25) has been remarkably confirmed by archaeology. The excavation of Megiddo, southeast of Mount Carmel, has revealed one extensive stone stable capable of housing about four hundred horses (William F. Albright, The Archaeology of Palestine, p. 124).

15. Sycomore trees . . . in the vale. This verse parallels 9:27. Cf. I Chr 27:28, note. 16. And linen yarn. The Hebrew says, actually, "and of q'wē," i.e., Cilicia, a northern source of supply for horses (cf. 9:28). 17. A chariot for six hundred shekels of silver, and an horse for an hundred and fifty. A shekel was about two-fifths of an ounce. The cost would therefore be about $500 and $125 respectively, by present standards, though ancient purchasing power was far greater. So the law forbade excess in such matters (Deut 17:16), the very sin into which Solomon's prosperity led him.

B. Solomon's Temple. 2:1–7:22. The greatest productions of Solomon were his inspired books (Prov, Eccl, Song, and possibly Job) and his magnificent Temple. For us today, the former possess the greater significance. But for Ezra, living at a time when the "God-breathed" writings of the OT canon came to an end (II Tim 3:16; see above, Introduction, Date), but when the Temple was concentrating in itself the very means of access to God, the latter became, understandably, his primary concern, the event that for him overshadowed all others in the career of Solomon. For the Temple, like the Tabernacle before it, symbolized the presence of the reconciled God in the midst of the people he had redeemed (II Chr 7:1,2; Ex 29:45,46). It constituted their way of salvation, anticipating with its sacrifices the Lamb of God, who would "tabernacle" amongst us to take away the sin of the world (Jn 1:14 [ASV marg.], 29). And it typified the glorification that awaits men in the heavenly presence of God himself (Ex 24:18; Heb 9:24). The chronicler therefore devotes six of his nine Solomonic chapters to the Temple: the preparation for it (II Chr 2); its construction (chs. 3; 4); and its dedication (chs. 5–7). These sections form an amplified parallel to I Kgs 5; 6; 7:13–8:66.

1) Preparations. 2:1-18. The major planning for the Temple had already been accomplished by David: designing the architecture, gathering the supplies, and enlisting the personnel (I Chr 22; 28; 29). It remained for Solomon to organize his labor force (II Chr 2:2, 17,18). His wisest move, however, was to seek the aid of Hiram king of Tyre, David's friend (cf. v. 12) for the provision of an experienced superintendent of construction, and a supply of the matchless timbers from Lebanon (vv. 3-10). A suitable contract was quickly negotiated (vv. 11-16).

2. Threescore and ten thousand men to bear burdens, etc. (parallels vv. 17, 18). These 153,600 drafted laborers consisted of aliens resident in Israel, as had already been determined by David (I Chr 22:2, note). Solomon also levied 30,000 men out of Israel, to work in shifts of 10,000, each man to serve one month out of three (I Kgs 5:13,14).

3. Huram the king. Read Hiram (i.e., Ahiram), as in I Kings, II Samuel, and I Chronicles. Of Tyre. On the Mediterranean coast, north of Israel. Tyre possessed the best harbor in the area, and its Phoenician inhabitants were noted for their mercantile ability. Didst deal with David. See I Chr 14:1.

4. To burn before him sweet incense. This was done twice daily on the incense altar (Ex 30:6-8). Shewbread, burnt offerings . . . feasts. Cf. on I Chr 9:32; 23:30,31. 6 Heaven . . . cannot contain him (cf. 6:18; Acts 7:48, 49). Solomon thus recognized from the first that God's localized presence in the Temple was a gracious condescension on His part and constituted no limitation upon the otherwise omnipresent God (cf. on I Chr 13:3).

7. Send me . . . a man cunning to work. Solomon, in fact, hired a number of experienced Phoenicians to assist the less highly skilled Palestinians (I Kgs 5:6,18), to the lower culture of whom archaeology bears witness. 8. Send me . . . cedar trees. The fragrant cedars of Lebanon, famed throughout antiquity, were resistant to rot and superior to any timber native to Israel. Today only a scattering of the trees survives. Fir trees. The Phoenician juniper, a tree similar to the cypress. Algum (almug) trees. Sandalwood, a foreign import from Ophir (9:10), used for ornamental woodwork and in musical instruments (I Kgs 10:12).

10. To . . . the hewers (cf. I Kgs 5:6) . . . measures (Hebrew, kōr) . . . and . . . baths. About ten bushels and ten gallons each, respectively. Solomon also sent a smaller, but annual, supply to Hiram (I Kgs 5:11). Such payments, which were specified by Hiram (I Kgs 5:6), constituted a heavy drain on the economy of Israel. When prolonged, because of Solomon's private building projects (II Chr 2:1,12; cf. I Kgs 7:1-12), they exhausted the kingdom (cf. I Kgs 9:10,11).

11. The Lord hath . . . made thee king, etc. Though these may have been sincere acknowledgments, they seem rather to represent words carefully chosen by a practical business man.

13. Of Huram my father's. Rather, even Huram, my father (ASV marg.). Hiram (cf. I Kgs 7:13) is entitled father as a token of his master craftsmanship. 14. Son of a woman of . . . Dan, a widow who lived in Naphtali (I Kgs 7:14). Purple was the deep red dye obtained from the murex shellfish, known as "royal purple" because of its scarcity and costliness. 16. Joppa served as the port of inland Jerusalem. Between the cities lay some thirty-five miles of rugged, hilly terrain.

18. Three thousand and six hundred alien overseers. There were also 250 Israelites (8:10); total, 3,850 overseers (equals the 3,300 lower, plus 550 higher, overseers of I Kgs 5:16; 9:23).

2) Construction. 3:1–4:22. To the men of Ezra's day, the form of the Solomonic Temple both witnessed to the glory of Israel in the past, and exhibited a structural ideal toward which they might pattern the restoration of their own sanctuary. For men of all time, however, the main features of Solomon's Temple, like those of the Mosaic Tabernacle, which was placed within it (I Kgs 8:4) and upon which it was modeled, furnish typical illustrations of undying significance, created, as they were, by the divine Architect to depict the changeless truths of the Gospel. II Chronicles 3 (generally parallel to I Kgs 6) describes the building as a whole; and chapter 4 (parallel to I Kgs 7) describes its furnishings. The latter, with the exception of the altar of incense and the most holy ark, show considerably more elaboration than the corresponding pieces in the Tabernacle of Moses.

3:1. Mount Moriah. The summit on which Abraham had been willing, almost 1,100 years before, to sacrifice his son Isaac (Gen 22:2). In the threshingfloor of Ornan. See I Chr 21:18–22:1. 2. In the . . . second month, April/May, in the fourth year, which ran from the fall of 967 to the fall of 966. The date is therefore 966 B.C. (cf. Edwin R. Thiele, The Mysterious Numbers of the Hebrew Kings, pp. 30,31).

3. These are the things wherein Solomon was instructed. Better, These are the foundations which Solomon laid (ASV). Cubits after the first measure. The earlier, or sacred, measure ran about three inches longer than the ordinary cubit of approximately eighteen inches. Threescore cubits by twenty cubits is therefore about one hundred and five feet by thirty-five feet rather than ninety by thirty. This was just double the surface dimensions of the Tabernacle. 4. The height an hundred and twenty cubits. This eastern vestibule was therefore in the form of a great tower, over two hundred feet high. 5. The greater house, or Temple proper, corresponded to the outer room of the Tabernacle, the Holy Place. Compare the "most holy house," literally, the holy of holies (v. 8). Fir tree. Cf. 2:8, note. Cedar also was used (I Kgs 6:9).

6. Gold of Parvaim came, probably, from a mine in southeastern Arabia. The expenditure for this overlaying of the entire house was enormous, but see I Chr 22:14; 29:4,7. 7. The posts. The thresholds (ASV). Cherubim were angelic creatures, symbolic of the presence of God, sovereign and transcendent (v. 14, note; Gen 3:24). They appeared normally in human form, but winged (Ezk 1:5,6). The attempt of 'liberal' criticism to relate the cherub to the mythological sphinx is without Biblical foundation. Palm trees and flowers were also depicted in the carvings (I Kgs 6:29). 8. Gold . . . six hundred talents (see I Chr 19:6, note), worth about $22,000,000. 9. The nails, for fastening the sheets of gold to the walls, weighed fifty shekels of gold (see 1:17). They were worth $640.

11. Wings of the cherubims, twenty cubits long. These are not to be confused with the cherubim on the ark, but were two great, gold-plated figures of olive wood (I Kgs 6:23) that filled "the most holy house" (II Chr 3:8) and, side by side, overshadowed the ark.

14. The veil (see Ex 26:31-33) sealed off from mankind the Most Holy Place with its awesome presence of God. The veil was thus emblematic of the truth that the way to God was not yet clear (Heb 9:8) and would not be until Christ should take out of the way the anticipatory forms of the older testament (Mt 27:51).

15. The two pillars stood free, in front of the Temple. Thirty and five is either a corruption for eighteen (the two are easily confused in the Hebrew), or a representation of the length of the original casting. Each pillar measured eighteen cubits long if an attachment for the chapiter[s], the ornamented capitals, is included. The existence of such ornamental pillars, or obelisks, at ancient temples has been confirmed repeatedly by archaeology. 17. Jachin. It establishes. Boaz. In it is strength.

4:1. The new, larger altar of brass (bronze) was the first object encountered in the temple court, demonstrating that God may be approached only through sacrifice, the substitutionary and testamentary death of Christ (Heb 8:2,3; 9:12).

2. The molten sea taught the necessity of purity (Ex 30:21), and it points to the washing of regeneration and sanctification in Christ (Tit 3:5; Heb 9:10). A line of thirty cubits did compass it. Only approximately, for the diameter was ten cubits. 3. Under it. Under the brim was the similitude of oxen . . . ten in a cubit. The reference, if not a copyist's error in Chronicles, must be to the round-shaped heads of oxen; for I Kgs 7:24 reads "knops," i.e., gourd-shaped ornaments. 5. A capacity of three thousand baths is too great for these dimensions. It must be a textual corruption for two thousand (I Kgs 7:26), or about twenty thousand gallons (cf. II Chr 2:10 note). This huge reservoir, then, supplied the ten smaller lavers on their wheeled bases (vv. 6,14; I Kgs 7:27-39). Archaeological confirmation for the latter has been found in excavations at Cyprus (cf. the plates in C. F. Burney, Notes on the Hebrew Text of Kings).

7. Compared with the Tabernacle's one "candlestick" (really, a lampstand), the Temple was equipped with ten candlesticks of the same form (prescription). They symbolized the perfection (seven fold) with which God's Church must shine for him (Lev 24:3), through the oil of the Holy Spirit (cf. Zech 4:2-6). They thus seem to typify the light and truth that should shine in the Christian (Mt 5:14) through the priestly ministration of Christ (Lev 24:4; Jn 8:12).

8. Ten tables likewise replaced the one, though it seems that only one table at a time was used to hold the showbread (13:11; 29:18). The tables symbolized the believer's re-established harmony and sustaining communion with God (Lev 24:8; cf. Ex 24:11), and may have been a type and pledge of that closer fellowship that will exist in the heavenly and eschatological Kingdom of God (Lk 14:15).

9. The court of the priests, and the great court. This was an advance over the Tabernacle with its single court. The desire for efficiency suggested that an inner and higher (more visible) area be constructed, in which the priests could perform their sacred duties (I Kgs 6:36; Jer 36:10). But this very distinction (cf. II Kgs 23:12) gave tangible expression to the fact that under the older testament there did not yet exist that universal priesthood of believers which was to come, when through Christ all should have direct access to the Father (Jer 31:34; Heb 4:14-16).

11. Huram. Not the king, but the master craftsman (2:13,14). 12. The pommels were the bowl-shaped, net-covered, lower sections of the capitals, above which rose the crowns, like opened lilies (I Kgs 7-17-20). 16. Huram his father. See 2:14, note. Of bright brass. Of polished bronze. 17. Zeredathah. Or, Zarthan (I Kgs 7:46). It lay east of the Jordan and about halfway between Galilee and the Dead Sea. The clay ground was suitable for great metal moulds.

21. The flowers served as ornaments on the lampstands (Ex 25:33). 22. The doors . . . were of carved olive wood, overlaid with gold (3:7; I Kgs 6:31-37). These protected the entry of the house, the holy place, and provided a barrier, in addition to the veil, for the sealing off of the most holy place (see 3:14, note).

3) Dedication. 5:1–7:22. The significance of the Temple is made explicit in the ceremonies that accompanied its dedication. After assembling the representative leaders of Israel, Solomon first designated his Temple to be the lineal successor to Israel's previous sanctuaries by installing within its Most Holy Place the ark of God's testament (5:1-10). God then confirmed the reality of his localized dwelling within the Temple by filling the house with the Shekinah, the cloud of his glory (vv. 11-14). Solomon, in adoration, gave a brief testimony to God's faithfulness (6:1-11). This was followed by a longer prayer of dedication, calling upon the Lord to intervene in behalf of the people of Israel when they should submit their petitions toward His presence in the Temple (vv. 12-42). This, too, was confirmed as God sent fire from heaven upon the new altar and thus instituted two weeks of great dedicatory sacrifices and of feasting (7:1-10). Later, after Solomon had built his own palace, the Lord appeared to the king by night and reaffirmed His promises, on condition that Israel prove faithful, but threatened exile and the Temple's destruction in case the nation turned apostate (vv. 11-22). These chapters correspond closely to I Kgs 8:1–9:9.

5:1. The things David . . . had dedicated. See I Chr 18:11; 22:14; 26:26; 29:2-5. Some treasures must have remained, even after the tremendous outlay for the Temple.

2. To bring up the ark . . . out of the city of David. Solomon had it transported from the old citadel of Zion to the ridge of Moriah, which lay north of the former city wall. 3. The seventh month. September/October. The dedication did not take place until after the work was completed (v. 1) in the eight month (Oct./Nov.) of Solomon's eleventh year, or 960 B.C. (cf. 3:2, note). So the Temple was not dedicated until eleven months had passed, that is, in 959 B.C., in the annual feast of Tabernacles (cf. 7:8-10).

4. The Levites took up the ark. Solomon took the added precaution (cf. on I Chr 13:10) of employing priests within Levi for this work (v. 7; I Kgs 8:3). 5. And the tabernacle. This was brought from Gibeon (cf. 1:3, notes). 6. The multitude of the sacrifices followed David's more modest precedent (I Chr 15:26).

7. The oracle of the house. Oracle (Heb., d^ebir) is a technical term for the most holy place (cf. 4:20). Under the wings of the cherubims. See 3:11, note. 9. There it is unto this day. Not until Ezra's day, but until the day of the written source being quoted (cf. 9:29; I Kgs 8:8). 10. Nothing in the ark save the two tables. By this time the golden pot of manna (Ex 16:32-34) and Aaron's rod (Num 17:10,11; Heb 9:4) had disappeared. The Lord made a covenant. The two stone tables of the Decalogue expressed the moral fruitage expected of the people whom God had already redeemed (Ex 20:2; cf. 19:4-6). They were therefore called "the testimony" (Ex 25:16,21) to the redemptive covenant (testament).

11. They did not then wait by course. Members from all the twenty-four courses (I Chr 24:3-19) assisted on this important occasion. The normal rotations in service could come later! 13. His mercy (Heb., hesed). That is, his faithfulness. See I Chr 16:41, note. 14. The cloud . . . the glory of the Lord. This represented the presence of the divine Angel of God, the pre-incarnate appearance of Christ (Ex 14:19; 23:20-23). It had first guided the people out of Egypt (Ex 13:21,22) and had then filled the Mosaic Tabernacle (Ex 40:34,35). In the days just before the Exile, Israel's sin drove this cloud from earth (Ezk 10:18,19). It was later called the "shekinah," God's "dwelling." It marked Christ's first coming (Mt 17:5); and it will herald his glorious second advent (Rev 1:7; 14:14; cf. R. E. Hough, The Ministry of the Glory Cloud).

6:1. The Lord . . . would dwell in the thick darkness. That is, covered by cloud in the darkness, first of Sinai (Ex 19: 9; 20:21), and then of the veiled Most Holy Place of the Tabernacle (Lev 16: 2). 2. Thy dwelling for ever. There was, indeed, the condition that Israel must be faithful (7:20; Mt 23:37,38). But Christ will yet reign on Zion (Mt 23: 39; Rom 11:26), in the final, new Jerusalem (Rev 21:2).

4. God fulfilled that which he spake . . . to . . . David; i.e., that the Temple would be built and David's dynasty established (v. 10; I Chr 17). 6. I have chosen Jerusalem (I Chr 22:1) that my name might be there. That is, his very presence (Deut 12:5,7). 11. The ark, wherein is the covenant. See 5:10, note.

13. Upon a scaffold (platform) Solomon . . . kneeled down (cf. I Kgs 8: 54). The king thus publicly acknowledged that he, too, was but God's servant, administering a kingdom not his own (I Chr 28:5).

14. Keepest covenant, and showest mercy (hesed; cf. on 5:13; I Chr 16: 41). Synonymous expressions. God's gracious testament, through the death of Christ, is the source of all blessings, both for us and for those who "received the promise of inheritance under the first testament" (Heb 9:15). Unto thy servants. Faith must always be manifested by obedience (v. 16; Jas 2:17-26). 18. The heaven of heavens (i.e., highest heaven) cannot contain thee. See 2:6, note.

20. Prayer toward this place. It became the practice of devout Jews to pray literally in the direction of Jerusalem (Dan 6:10). The emphasis here, however, should be on true heart commitment to the God of special revelation, who has ordained the Jerusalem sanctuary to depict his redemptive work in Christ (cf. introd. to chs. 5–7). 21. Hear thou . . . from heaven, God's ultimate dwelling place (Ps 11:4; Hab 2: 20), and forgive. The following seven petitions may be summarized by I Jn 1:9, "If we confess our sins, he is faithful . . . to forgive . . . , and to cleanse us . . . ."

22. (1) If an oath is laid upon him to make him swear. Testimony in doubtful cases was confirmed by an oath at the sanctuary (Ex 22:10,11; Lev 6:3-5). God is petitioned to intervene for the maintenance of justice. 24. (2) Defeat and exile before the enemy were occasioned by sin (Lev 26:17,33; Josh 7:11,12). 26. (3) When . . . there is no rain. The phenomena of nature may have moral causes. Certainly Israel suffered drought in times of apostasy (I Kgs 17:1; Lev 26:19). 28. (4) If there be dearth. Plagues of various sorts were likewise caused by sin (Lev 26:16,20, 25,26), for God knows the hearts of men (v. 30; cf. I Sam 16:7). 32. (5) Concerning the stranger . . . if they come and pray. The Temple was to be "an house of prayer for all people" (Isa 56:6-8). Israel's very election had as its goal the universal knowledge of God (v. 33; Gen 12:3; Eph 2:11,12). 34. (6) If thy people go out to war. God will fight for his own, who cry unto him in the battle (14:11,12; I Chr 5: 20). 36. (7) There is no man which sinneth not. Here is expressed the consistent Biblical teaching of man's total depravity (cf. Jer 13:23; 17:9; Eph 2: 3). If . . . they carry them away captives. The exile and restoration of Israel had been predicted as early as Moses (Lev 26:44,45); and all was fulfilled, just as Solomon had prayed (II Chr 36:16,22, 23).

41. Arise, O Lord God, into thy resting place (cf. Num 10:35). These final verses quote Ps 132:8-10, which is anonymous but was probably written by David on the occasion, analogous to this, of his installing the ark in the Jerusalem tent (I Chr 16). 42. Turn not away the face; i.e., reject not the prayers of thine anointed. That is, of Solomon himself, because of the mercies (hesed), faithful acts, of David.

7:1. Fire came down from heaven. In this same way God had inaugurated sacrifice at the Mosaic Tabernacle (Lev 9:24) and at the Davidic altar on Moriah (I Chr 11:26). 3. And all . . . Israel saw . . . the glory of the Lord upon the house. God thus gave a greater manifestation of what he had already revealed to his priests within the Temple (5:13, 14); and Solomon added his own blessing upon the congregation (I Kgs 8: 55-61).

5. Twenty and two thousand oxen, and an hundred and twenty thousand sheep. I Kings 8:63 confirms these staggering figures and defines them as "peace offerings," hence eaten by the people (cf.

on I Chr 29:21). It supplied them for the fifteen days of feasting (II Chr 7:9,10). 7. The fat of the peace offerings. Choice token portions were presented to God on the altar, prior to the feasting of the people (Lev 3). For the burnt offerings, and the meat (meal) offerings, see, respectively, Leviticus 1 and 2.

8. Solomon postponed the dedication for many months (cf. on 5:3) that it might coincide with the great harvest feast of Tabernacles. Israel gathered from . . . Hamath on the Orontes, in the far north toward the Euphrates River, to the river of Egypt, Shihor (I Chr 13:5), the southwestern border toward Egypt. 10. On the three and twentieth day of the seventh month he sent the people away. The special seven-day dedication feast had lasted from the eighth day to the fourteenth day (v. 9), including the great Day of Atonement on the tenth (Lev 16). This then was followed by the regular Feast of Tabernacles from the fifteenth to the twenty-second (i.e., the "eighth" day of II Chr 7:9; cf. Lev 23:33-36).

11. Solomon finished . . . the king's house. His own palace. Thirteen additional years have thus passed (I Kgs 7:1; 9:10), bringing us to Solomon's twenty-fourth year, 946 B.C.

12. The Lord appeared to Solomon. This was his second revelation to Solomon (I Kgs 9:2), the first having been at Gibeon (II Chr 1:3-13). 13. If I shut up heaven, etc. God thus specifically answered Solomon's earlier petitions (vv. 15,16; cf. 6:22-39). 14. If my people . . . shall humble themselves . . . and turn from their wicked ways; then will I . . . heal their land. This great verse, the best known in all Chronicles, expresses as does no other in Scripture God's requirement for national blessing, whether in Solomon's land, in Ezra's, or in our own. Those who believe must forsake their sins, turn from the life that is centered in self, and yield to God's word and will. Then, and only then, will heaven send revival. 16. That my name may be there for ever. See on 6:2,6.

18. Then will I stablish the throne of thy kingdom. This quotes I Chr 17:12, 14, but makes explicit the divine condition of faithful obedience. 19. But if ye . . . shall go and serve other gods. Solomon and his successors did serve other gods (I Kgs 11:1-8; II Chr 36:16), and their unfaithfulness led to the very results he had himself anticipated (vv. 20-22; cf. 6:36; 36:17-20).

C. Solomon's Kingdom. 8:1–9:31. Just as the chronicler's appraisal of David's kingdom provided encouragement for the post-Exilic community, because of its demonstration of God-given power; so his description of Solomon's kingdom furnishes a correspondingly effective exhibition of the glory that follows upon service to God. Specifically, Chronicles concludes its record of Solomon with an outline of the achievements of his administration (II Chr 8) and with illustrations of the splendor that surrounded his throne (ch. 9). This material agrees closely with that found in Kings except that it intentionally omits, as less edifying, or even detrimental to Ezra's theocratic goal, the details of Solomon's autocratic officialdom (I Kgs 4), the extravagances of his extensive palace (I Kgs 7:1-12), the idolatry that eventuated from his gross polygamy (I Kgs 11:1-8), and the resultant political deterioration that plagued his latter years (11:9-40).

1) The Achievements of Solomon's Kingdom. 8:1-18. II Chronicles 8 parallels I Kings 9, outlining the success achieved by Solomon: in his expansion and military endeavors (vv. 1-6); in his organization of manpower (vv. 7-10); in his regulation of public worship (vv. 11-16); and in his commercial ventures (vv. 17,18).

1. At the end of twenty years. That is, in 946 B.C. (see 7:11, note). 2. Cities which Huram had restored to Solomon. This reference assumes, without comment, the sordid record of I Kgs 9:11-13. The record tells how Solomon had to give up some twenty non-Israelite cities in Galilee to Hiram king of Tyre, apparently because Hiram foreclosed on Solomon's unpaid building debts. In the transaction Hiram was actually cheated, as the territory was greatly impoverished. Hence Solomon, it seems, was forced to take back the territory. After this he did effect some development of the region by causing the children of Israel to dwell there.

3. He went to Hamath-zobah, and prevailed against it, perhaps for breaking the peace of I Chr 18:10. Thus the only recorded campaign of Solomon resulted in his conquest of the kingdom of Hamath, which bordered upon the already occupied kingdom of Zobah (see comment on I Chr 18:3). 4. He built Tadmor in the wilderness. This is the oasis of Palmyra, 150 miles northeast of Damascus, and the half-way point on the caravan route to the Euphrates River. Tadmor controlled the trade on this desert cut-off to Babylon, producing in Roman times the fabulous state of Queen Zenobia. Some texts of I Kgs 9:18 (cf. ASV) present the less desirable reading, Tamar, which was a city in the far south of Judah.

5. The two Beth-horon[s] controlled an important pass northwest of Jerusalem leading down to the port of Joppa. 6. Baalath may have been in the vicinity of Beth-horon. Other cities are listed in I Kgs 9:15-17. Chariot cities. See on 1:14.

8. Solomon compelled the Canaanites to pay tribute and (cf. I Kgs 9:15,21) conscripted them for labor as well (cf. II Chr 8:9 and I Chr 22:2, note). 10. Chief . . . officers, two hundred and fifty. Cf. the five hundred and fifty of I Kgs 9:23; but see II Chr 2:18, note.

11. Early in his reign Solomon had married the daughter of Pharaoh (I Kgs 3:1). Such an alliance, even with Solomon's contemporary, Hor-Psibkhannu, the last Pharaoh of the weak Twenty-first Dynasty, built prestige. But this woman's Egyptian idolatries led to eventual apostasy in Israel (I Kgs 11:1; cf. 11:8; Ezr 9:1), though at this point Solomon retained enough sensitivity to remove her residence from the places that are holy.

13. The certain rate of sacrifices had been prescribed by Moses (Lev 23:37).

17. Ezion-geber and . . . Eloth (Elath). Ports at the northern end of the Gulf of Aqaba, which provided Solomon with strategic access southward into the Red Sea. Archaeology has shown them also to have been centers of Solomon's copper smelting industry (Nelson Glueck, The Other Side of the Jordan, chs. 3,4). 18. The copper then provided an export product to exchange for the gold from Ophir, on the southwestern coast of the Arabian Peninsula, or perhaps the eastern shores of Africa. Huram sent him . . . ships, and servants that had knowledge of the sea. That is, the Tyrians constructed ships with materials sent to Ezion-geber and then guided the less experienced Israelites in their navigation, making one trip every three years (9:21). Solomon thus gained a total of four hundred and fifty talents of gold (420 is the textual variant of I Kgs 9:28), or over $15,000,000.

2) The Splendor of Solomon's Kingdom. 9:1-31. Our Lord Christ spoke of "Solomon in all his glory" (Mt 6:29); and II Chr 9 (paralleling I Kgs 10) presents a variety of historical data that illustrate the splendor of Solomon: the visit he received from the queen of Sheba (vv. 1-12); the revenue he gathered, and the shields, the throne, and the equipment it produced (vv. 13-21); and the extent of his fame and power (vv. 22-28). A concluding summary is then given for Solomon's reign as a whole (vv. 29-31).

1. The Semito-Hamitic kingdom of Sheba (I Chr 1:9,22), lying at the southern point of the Arabian Peninsula, was noted for its commerce in gold and spice. Its queen visited Solomon, perhaps for trading purposes (cf. II Chr 8:18), but also to test his God-given wisdom (I Kgs 10:1) with hard questions. The Hebrew is ḥîdôt, "riddles" (as in Jud 14:12); and their exchange is a familiar Arabic custom to the present day. 4. The sitting of his servants. The high officials at his table. His ascent suggests the processional of the royal party for temple worship. 6. The half . . . was not told me. See verse 23, and 1:12 note. 8. God made thee king, to do . . . justice. This had been the purpose of Solomon's wisdom from the first (1:10, 11). 9. An hundred and twenty talents of gold. Well over $4,000,000.

10. The servants . . . of Huram . . . brought algum trees. See on 2:8 and 8:18. 11. Terraces. Hebrew msillôt, "highways." Perhaps a flight of stairs (cf. I Kgs 10:12, ASV marg.).

12. Solomon gave her all her desire. I Kings 10:12 notes this as over and beyond his regular kingly hospitality.

13. Six hundred and three score and six [666] talents of gold per year. About $25,000,000. 14. Chapmen (traders). Literally, the men of the caravans. Governors of the country. Vassal princes in neighboring lands.

15. Each of the two hundred targets (large shields, covering the body) was plated with six hundred shekels (about 240 ozs.) of gold, worth approximately $7,600. The three hundred smaller shields (v. 16) had half this value each (in I Kgs 10:17, by a different standard, "three pounds," Heb. mānîm; cf. HDB, IV, 903). 16. The house, or palace, of the forest of Lebanon (in Jerusalem) received its name from its rows of cedar pillars (I Kgs 7:2-5). 18. The stays of Solomon's throne; i.e., its arm rests. 21. Solomon's ships went to Tarshish. Literally, were goers of Tarshish. Not that they went to Tarshish (Tartessus, on the Mediterranean coast of Spain), for they navigated in the Red Sea (8:17,18), but that they were large ships, like those that were built to sail to Tarshish.

24. Harness. Hebrew nesheq, "armor." 25. Four thousand stalls for horses (cf. on 1:14,17). I Kings 4:26 reads, erroneously, "forty thousand."

26. He reigned . . . from the river. The Euphrates (I Kgs 4:21,24). He thus occupied the limits of what God had promised to Abraham (Gen 15:18). 29. Written in the book . . . in the prophecy . . . in the visions. See Introduction, Authorship. I Kings 11:41 refers to another source, "The book of the acts of Solomon."

II. The Kingdom of Judah. 10:1–36:23.

A. The Division of the Kingdom. 10:1–11:19. "Our God is marching on!" Humanly speaking, the three-stage course of the Kingdom of Judah—its division from the majority of Israel, its succession of diversely-minded rulers, and its final demise in exile—was one of stark tragedy. Even the prophetic author of I and II Kings, writing near the close of the Exile, could salvage from it only the moral vindication of Jehovah, rendering to His faithless people according to their deeds (II Kgs 17:7-23; 24:1-4). But the chronicler, writing after the restoration of 536 B.C., was inspired to see that behind the four centuries of decline in Judah moved the hand of God, sovereignly accomplishing his own plans in history. This is clear, even in the chronicler's analysis of the initial division, 930 B.C. Rehoboam's resistance to reform and the subsequent rebellion against him (II Chr 10) were "brought about of God" (10:15, ASV), and his attempt to resubdue northern Israel was blocked by the word of the Lord (11:1-5). But the result was a separation of the godly from the apostate north (11:6-22), "so they strengthened the kingdom of Judah" (v. 17). Note that II Chr 10 and 11:4,13-17, correspond to I Kgs 12, through II Chr 11:5-12,18-23 is without parallel.

10:1. Solomon's son Rehoboam went to Shechem. This city, which was thirty miles north of Jerusalem, was a center for the northern tribes. David's dynasty had been divinely appointed (I Chr 17:14), but each ruler was yet subject to popular confirmation (II Chr 10:4). Rehoboam could reign only as a "constitutional" servant (v. 7) under God (cf. on I Chr 11:3). 2. Jeroboam had already been anointed of God for kingship over ten-twelfths of Israel (I Kgs 11:26-40); hence the necessity for his flight from the presence of Solomon into Egypt.

4. Thy father made our yoke grievous. Solomon had indulged in sinful extravagance at the expense of his people (cf. Deut 17:17,20). 9. That we may return answer. Rehoboam thus early in his reign identified himself—we—with the insolent autocracy of the generation raised in Solomon's luxury. 15. The cause (Heb. n'sibbâ, "the turn of affairs") was of God, who had ordained Israel's division, through his prophet Ahijah the Shilonite, in punishment for Solomon's lapse into idolatry (I Kgs 11:29-33).

16. What portion have we in David? Such a rebellious spirit, however, against the divinely ordained dynasty was equally condemnable (13:5-7). Every man to your tents (cf. II Sam 20:1). The geographical isolation arising out of life upon Palestine's broken terrain was, in itself, conducive to political disruption. 17. Israel . . . in . . . Judah. The more pious of Israel, who had become attached to Judah, remained faithful to Rehoboam (cf. 11:3).

18. Hadoram. Adoniram (I Kgs 4:6; 5:14) was over the tribute. Hebrew mas, the conscripted labor gangs. He was probably one of the most hated men in Israel, an embodiment of autocracy. 19. Israel rebelled. I Kings 12:20 describes how the northern tribes confirmed Jeroboam as their king. Chronicles, however, concentrates on the faithful remnant and dismisses the history of northern Israel from this point on.

11:1. Judah and Benjamin. As had been prophesied by Ahijah (I Kgs 11:31,32), these two tribes continued loyal to the Davidic dynasty (II Chr 11:3, 12; cf. on I Chr 4:24-43).

2. Shemaiah was the prophet, or man of God, who counseled Rehoboam after his later lapse (12:5-7) and who composed one of the source-records of his reign (12:15). 3. All Israel in Judah and Benjamin are defined in I Kgs 12:

23 as "the remnant," the pious survivors out of the larger apostate group (Lev 26:39,44; Isa 10:20-23). 4. This thing is done of me. See 10:15, note.

5. Rehoboam . . . built cities. Forbidden to repossess Israel, he prepared defenses for the territory left to him, a necessary move in light of the constant warfare that followed (12:15). The cities listed (vv. 6-10) lie to the south and the west, located there, apparently, because of the Egyptian danger (cf. 12: 2-4).

14. Jeroboam . . . had cast off the Levites (cf. I Kgs 12:31), as a part of his general policy of alienating his people from religious dependence upon Jerusalem (I Kgs 12:26-28). And his sons (successors). The migration of the faithful to Judah was thus a process that continued down through the years. 15. He ordained him priests . . . for the devils. Hebrew *s*ᵉ*'îrîm*, "he-goats" (as inhabiting ruins; Isa 13:21; 34:14). Far from being mythological "satyrs," as claimed by 'liberal' criticism, the *s*ᵉ*'îrîm* appear to have been simply goat idols, used in conjunction with the golden calves . . . he had made (cf. Lev 17:7). 17. But sinful as were Jeroboam's substituted idolatries, they did serve, in God's providence, to gather the pious to the south (vv. 13,16) and so strengthened the kingdom of Judah.

18. Abihail was the wife of Jerimoth and mother of Mahalath, not a second wife of Rehoboam (cf. ASV). 21. Maachah (Michaiah, 13:2) must have been Absalom's grand-daughter, through his daughter Tamar, the wife of Uriel (13: 2; cf. II Sam 14:27; 18:18). He took eighteen wives. Rehoboam thus willfully disregarded both the law of God (Deut 17:17; Lev 18:18; cf. John Murray, Principles of Conduct, Appendix B) and the disastrous precedent of his father. 23. He dealt wisely. By delegating to his sons authority in the national defense, and by providing them with substance and with wives (ASV); but also by dispersing them, to insure the undisputed succession of Abijah, the designated heir (v. 22).

B. The Rulers of Judah. 12:1–36:16. The nineteen men and one woman who occupied David's throne from 930 to 586 B.C. ranged in character from the strongest and best to the weakest and worst. The fate of any nation is determined in large part by the caliber of its leadership, and this was markedly so in Israel, where God's intervening hand was more clearly manifest than elsewhere. The chronicler thus encourages the men of his day to consecration by demonstrating from God's miraculous past deliverances of Judah how "faith is the victory" that can overcome the world (II Chr 20:20). Yet at the same time, and from the same historical data, he admonishes them against compromise with the world, against indifference to the Law, and against deviation from the Lord. For the fundamental pattern of Judah's history is one of religious deterioration. Sin becomes so ingrained that even a Josiah cannot reverse the downward trend: "The wrath of the Lord arose against his people, till there was no remedy" (36:16). God can cast off his people whom he foreknew! At points, II Chr 12:1–36:16 corresponds closely to I Kgs 14:22–II Kgs 24:20. Much of the content of Kings, however, is omitted, e.g., the lives of the prophets, and, indeed, the whole history of northern Israel (cf. Introduction, Occasion for Writing). But for Judah, the chronicler supplies thrilling examples of faith and of deliverance that are without parallel in the more summary account of Kings.

1) Rehoboam. 12:1-16. Solomon's son succeeded to the throne in 930* B.C. and reigned until 913 B.C. II Chronicles 12 takes up Rehoboam's rule with his establishment (v. 1), after the division of Solomon's kingdom had assumed permanency (chs. 10; 11). It describes his punishment for departure from the Law (vv. 1-6), and then his restoration upon submission to God (vv. 7-12). A summary of his seventeen-year reign concludes the section (vv. 13-16). A shorter, but parallel, account occurs in I Kgs 14:21-31.

1. Rehoboam . . . forsook the law. By turning to the immoralities and polytheism of the native Canaanites (I Kgs 14:23,24; 15:12). This was the determining cause for Shishak's invasion (v. 2). 2. In the fifth year, 925* B.C., Shishak . . . came up. This campaign of Sheshonk I, energetic founder of the Twenty-second Dynasty of Egypt, has been confirmed by his list of conquered Palestinian cities, engraved on the walls of the temple of Amon at Karnak. This list shows that he plundered northern Israel as well as Judah. 3. Lubim (ASV). Libyans of North Africa. The Sukkiim remain unidentified.

The * indicates a possible occurrence in the closing months of the preceding year; see Edwin R. Thiele, The Mysterious Numbers of the Hebrew Kings, p. 55.

5. Shemaiah. See 11:2, note. 7. They humbled themselves and were delivered (v. 12), thus illustrating a standing principle (I Pet 5:6), though Rehoboam seems not to have taken the experience to heart (II Chr 12:14). 8. That they may know my service. Compared with the service exacted by the world. How much better to submit to God! (Mt 11:28-30) 9. Shishak . . . carried away also the shields of gold. See 9:15, note. 10. Instead of which king Rehoboam made shields of brass (bronze). Faithlessness reduced him to imitations of the glory that once was his. 11. The guard . . . brought them again, replacing them after their use.

12. In Judah things went well. Literally, there were good things. True consecration did continue. 13. The Lord . . . put his name there, i.e., in Jerusalem. See 6:6, note. 15. The book . . . of Iddo . . . concerning genealogies. Its content may have been largely genealogical.

2) Abijah (Abijam, I Kgs 15:1). 13:1-22. The three-year reign of Rehoboam's son Abijah, 913–910* B.C., was occupied primarily by his war with Jeroboam (cf. I Kgs 15:6,7). Moreover, while the outline in I Kgs 15:1-8 gives no detail on this conflict, the parallel account in II Chronicles 13 reveals both Abijah's bravery against odds, springing from trust upon the God whose law he obeyed (vv. 1-12), and his glorious victory that resulted (vv. 13-21). "Judah prevailed, because they relied upon the Lord God of their fathers" (v. 18).

2. His mother's name . . . was Michaiah (Maachah); see 11:21, note.

3. Four hundred thousand against eight hundred thousand. Abijah was badly outnumbered. The historicity of these figures, confessedly high for such limited areas, is vouchsafed by I Chr 21:5 (cf. its accompanying note). This was an all-our attack. 4. Mount Zemaraim. The town of Zemaraim lay within the territory of Benjamin (Josh 18:22); so this battlefield must have been on the border between the kingdoms of Ephraim (Israel) and Judah.

5. God . . . gave the kingdom . . . to David, and his descendants (I Chr 17:14), by a covenant of salt, meaning, of permanence (cf. Lev 2:13). Salt is noted as a preservative.

7. Children of Belial (Heb., worthlessness). By NT times, but not here, Belial had come to refer specifically to Satan (II Cor 6:15). When Rehoboam was young. His actual age was forty-one (II Chr 12:13); but he was tender (weak)-hearted, i.e., immature in his understanding and experience. 8. Golden calves . . . for gods. 'Liberal' criticism minimizes Jeroboam's apostasy by assuming his calves to have been, like the ark, but "pedestals" for the invisible presence of Jehovah. But those who were contemporaries understood these calves as molten images of other gods (cf. I Kgs 12:28; 14:9).

10. The Lord is our God. This ringing affirmation is modified by the fact that Abijah "walked in all the sins of his father" (note his polygamy, v. 21, and see on 12:1). His faith fluctuated; for "his heart was not perfect with the Lord his God, as the heart of David" (I Kgs 15:3). 11. Daily sacrifices and sweet incense, and the shewbread. See notes to 2:4; 4:1,8; I Chr 9:32; 23:30. The candlestick (lampstand). Solomon's Temple had ten such lampstands (4:7; cf. the accompanying note), one of which was doubtless the original lampstand of Moses. 12. Priests with . . . trumpets to cry alarm. To call God to their rescue (v. 14; Num 10:9).

15. God smote Jeroboam. Whether through direct supernatural intervention, or through the courage of His encircled people, is not stated. 17. The slaughter of five hundred thousand chosen men, over half the army, was a staggering loss for the relatively small nation of Israel (cf. v. 20).

19. Abijah took . . . Beth-el, near the border between Benjamin and Ephraim, the very seat of Jeroboam's calf worship (I Kgs 12:29,33), though the idol was likely removed before the city's capture. Jeshanah . . . and Ephrain (Ephron) were four miles north and northeast of Beth-el respectively. 20. The Lord struck him. The details of Jeroboam's death in 910 B.C., three years after Abijah's, are not elsewhere elaborated.

22. The story of the prophet Iddo. The Hebrew word used here for story is midrash, a "commentary," perhaps on the official court record (cf. 24:27).

3) Asa. 14:1–16:14. These three chapters (amplifying I Kgs 15:9-24) describe the four outstanding events of Asa's long reign, 910*–869* B.C.: (1) the first reform, during his ten years of peace (14:1-8); (2) the victory over Zerah the Ethiopian in 896* B.C. (14:9-15); (3) the second reform, that came as a result (ch. 15); and (4) the hostile reaction of Baasha of Israel, 895 B.C., that induced a series of religious deviations on the part of Asa (ch. 16). Asa was, nevertheless, the most righteous monarch yet to arise in Judah after the division of Solomon's kingdom (I Kgs 15:11).

14:1. The land was quiet ten years. That is, until the invasion of Zerah in 896 (see 15:19, note). This peace, which was God's reward for Asa's first reform (vv. 5-7), may be traced back, in part, to Abijah's crushing defeat of northern Israel (13:17,20).

3. He took away . . . the high places (see 1:3, note), in obedience to Deut 12:2,3; but it appears that the people continued to resort to them, despite the royal abolition (15:17). The images (Heb., maṣṣēbôt) were Canaanitish stone pillars (ASV), thought to contain the local fertility-gods, the Baalim. The term groves (Heb., 'ăshērîm) refers, actually, to Baal's goddess-consort Asherah, believed to reside in a wooden pole beside the stone pillar. Both, when carved, became idols (cf. I Kgs 15:12). 5. The images are now known, from archaeology, to have been incense-stands (William F. Albright, Archaeology and the Religion of Israel, pp. 215,216).

7. While the land is yet before us. Free from enemies. 8. Of Judah, three hundred thousand spearmen with targets (heavy shields covering the entire body); of Benjamin, two hundred and fourscore thousand [280,000] bowmen with lighter shields. These large figures must have included the whole population capable of bearing arms.

9. There came out against them Zerah the Ethiopian. Hebrew, Cushite. This may represent an attempt by Osorkon I, second Pharaoh of the Twenty-second Dynasty in Egypt, to duplicate the invasion and pillage of his predecessor, Sheshonk (see on 12:2). The results, however, against pious Asa, were quite opposite! An host of a thousand thousand. This is a round figure; but it does indicate a vast assemblage, far outnumbering the forces of Asa. 10. They set the battle in array . . . at Mareshah. In the valley that marks the entrance into the hills, half way between Gaza and Jerusalem. This was one of the cities Rehoboam had fortified in anticipation of just such an attack (11:9).

11. It is nothing with thee to help . . . them that have no power. Asa's position was hopeless. But for God, the humanly impossible is as nothing (Gen 18:14); and Asa had the faith to rest on God and to expect the impossible (cf. Mk 9:23). 12. The Lord smote the Ethiopians (cf. v. 13). Again the details are not furnished (see on 13:15).

13. Asa . . . pursued them unto Gerar, even south of Gaza, on their flight back to Egypt. That they could not recover. Literally, so that they had no revival (KD). Israel experienced no more trouble from Egypt for 170 years, until the Twenty-fifth Dynasty (II Kgs 17:4). 15. They smote also the tents of cattle; that is, of the Philistinized cattle herders in the area.

15:1. Azariah, and Oded (cf. v. 8), are unknown but for this prophecy. 2 If ye seek him, etc., was David's admonition to Solomon (I Chr 28:9); and Azariah proceeds to illustrate this truth from Israel's past history. 3. Israel hath been (better, was, ASV) without the true God. Probably referring to the chaotic days of the Judges (cf. Jud 21:25). And . . . a teaching priest. One of the major priestly functions was to teach the Law (Lev 10:11). 4. When they in their trouble did turn unto the Lord . . . he was found of them. Cf. Judges 2:18. 5. There was no peace. Cf. Judges 5:6.

8. Asa . . . put away the abominable idols, and also the sexual immoralities that accompanied Canaanitish worship (I Kgs 15:12). 9. The fact that many fell to him out of Israel illustrates God's purpose in dividing Solomon's kingdom, that the "remnant" might be preserved (cf. on 11:3,14). But it also explains the acts of reprisal taken by Baasha of Israel soon thereafter (16:2). Out of Simeon. See on I Chr 4:24-43.

10. They gathered in the third month of the fifteenth year, May/June, 895 B.C., perhaps for the Feast of Weeks (Pentecost), one of the three annual pilgrimage feasts (cf. I Chr 23:31, note; Lev 23:15-21). This was the year following Zerah's attack (II Chr 15:19, note), since the pursuit and the occupation of the surrounding territories (14:13-15) must have consumed several months.

12-15. They entered into a covenant. Hebrew, "the" covenant. God's one great, everlasting testament (cf. I Chr 16:15, note) for the redemption of his people. The following are among its noteworthy, changeless features: (1) Objective redemption, as expressed by the phrase God of their fathers (v. 12). Cf. verse 15, "He was found of them." God enters into a saving relationship with his elect (Gen 17:7; Jer 31:34; Jn 17:6). (2) Man's subjective responses of faith and obedience (v. 13). Seek the Lord God of Israel (cf. v. 15; Gen 15:6; Ex 19:5; Lk 13:3; Jn 3:16). Conformity was here enforced on pain of death (cf Deut 17:2-6); for, after all, it is better for a man to be restrained in this life than for him, or others who may be affected by him, to be lost for eternity (Deut 13:12-15; Mk 9:43-48). (3) The inheritance of reconciliation (v. 15): The Lord gave them rest. Here an immediate rest from their enemies. But the testamental rest involves, in its fullness, all the joys of redeemed life in the present (Ps 103), of heaven beyond the grave (Ps 73:23-26; Heb 4:9-11), and of the ultimate kingdom of God upon earth (Rev 20:6; 22:5).

16. Maachah was the mother of Asa's father Abijah (cf. 11:21; 13:2, notes), and so technically the queen-grandmother. Since she must have been an influential figure at the court, Asa is to be commended for placing faith above family in her removal (cf. Deut 33:9; Mt 10:37). An idol in a grove. Literally, a horrible thing for Asherah (see on 14:3). Whatever her object of worship may have been, he burned it at the brook Kidron, the sharp valley between the eastern wall of Jerusalem and the Mount of Olives. 17. But the high places were not taken away. This describes the sad historic fact, not the king's personal intention (see on 14:3).

18. He brought into the Temple (cf. I Chr 18:11; 26:26-28) the things that his father . . . and that he . . . had dedicated, including spoils of Jeroboam (13:19) and of Zerah and his allies (14:13-15). 19. There was no more war unto the thirty-fifth year. The Hebrew text lacks the word more and should be rendered, There had not been war until the thirty-fifth year, which had reference to Asa's reign. The war was that with Zerah in 896, which was the thirty-fifth year after the division of the kingdom (cf. 16:1). It could not refer to the thirty-fifth of Asa's own reign, since he warred with Baasha before his twenty-sixth (I Kgs 15:16,33; cf. Thiele Mysterious Numbers, pp. 57-60).

16:1. In the thirty-sixth year, 895 B.C. (cf. on 15:19), after the assemblage of May/June (15:10), Baasha came up. In 909 B.C. Baasha had overthrown the dynasty of Jeroboam I and usurped the kingship of Israel (I Kgs 15:27-29). Having been at odds with Asa from the first (I Kgs 15:16), and having been aroused by the defection among his people to the southern king (II Chr 15:9), he advanced southward, probably recapturing Beth-el (cf. 13:19), and fortified Ramah, thus blockading Jerusalem only five miles further south.

2. Asa brought out silver and gold (all there was, I Kgs 15:18) out of the Temple. He thus sacrificed the results of his own piety (II Chr 15:18) and of God's blessing (14:12-14) to induce a pagan king, Ben-hadad (I) of Damascus, to perform a deed of perfidy (v. 3) in order to achieve his and Judah's "protection"! But see Jer 17:5. 3. There is a league. Read with ASV margin, Let there be a league. As there was between my father and thy father. That is between Abijah and Tabrimon (I Kgs 15:18) the son of Hezion (Rezon[?], the adversary of Solomon and the founder of the Kingdom of Damascus; I Kgs 11:23-25). Damascus switched allies at convenience.

4. Ben-hadad's armies smote Ijon, and Dan, and Abel-main (Abel-beth-maachah, I Kgs 15:20), and all the store cities (I Kgs specifies Cinneroth, the plains of northwestern Galilee) of Naphtali, all in the far north of Israel. This attack on Baasha's rear compelled him to abandon his southern operations against Asa. 6. Asa Built Geba and Mizpah, east and west of Ramah, respectively (cf. Jer 41:9).

7. Hanani the seer. Father to Jehu, the seer of Asa's son Jehoshaphat (19:2; 20:34). Therefore is the host (army) of . . . Syria escaped. For they, as Baasha's allies (v. 3), would presumably have joined with Israel in attacking Judah, and God would have delivered over the entire force to Asa. 8. The Ethiopians and the Lubims. See 14:9,11; cf. 12:3, notes. 9. The eyes of the Lord run to and fro. No problem can arise for God's people of which he is not aware, or from which he will not deliver (cf. Rom 8:32). Whose heart is perfect. Hebrew shālēm, "whole." God protects those who are "wholeheartedly" devoted to him. Henceforth thou shalt have wars (cf. I Kgs 15:32). The very Syrians whose attacks Asa had initiated later brought Judah to her knees (II Kgs 12:17,18).

10. Asa . . . put him in a prison house. Literally, the house of stocks. This is the first recorded persecution of a prophet, but many such followed (cf. I Kgs 22:27; Mk 6:17,18). And Asa oppressed some of the people. One sin leads to another.

11. The book of the kings of Judah and Israel is not our I and II Kings, but some court chronicle, now lost (see Introduction, Authorship). 12. In the thirty and ninth year of his reign, 871* B.C., he sought not to the Lord but to the physicians (pagans?). Medicine is God's gift, but it is the Creator of medicine who gives healing (II Kgs 20:7; cf. vv. 2,3). 14. Buried him in his own sepulchres. This clarifies the general statement of I Kgs 15:24 that he "was buried with his fathers in the city of David." A great burning, of the spices (not cremation), was made in his honor (cf. Jer 34:5).

4) Jehoshaphat. 17:1–20:37. His regnal years extended from 872* to 848 B.C. (see 17:7, note). Like father, like son! As Asa had accomplished the first reform, so Jehoshaphat removed idolatry, taught God's Law, and strengthened his kingdom, 866 B.C. (II Chr 17); but even as Asa had entered into unholy alliances, so Jehoshaphat allied himself with Ahab of Israel and became involved in the near-fatal campaign of Ramoth-gilead, 853 B.C. (ch. 18). Again, just as the prophet Azariah had admonished Asa and brought about his second reformation, so Jehu the son of Hanani led Jehoshaphat to a further reform in religion and in the administration of justice (ch. 19). Finally, as Asa had faced hordes from the southwest, so Jehoshaphat, with trust in the Lord, met and overcame the multitudes from the east (20:1-30). A final passage summarizes Jehoshaphat's reign and describes the failure of his commercial alliance with Israel (20:31-37). Of these divisions, only chapters 18 and 20:31-37 find real parallels in I Kings (ch. 22).

17:1. Jehoshaphat . . . strengthened himself against Israel. Godless Ahab, second king of the dynasty of Omri, was now ruling in Samaria; hostility between the two kingdoms continued. 2. Asa had taken cities of Ephraim. Not simply the threatening outpost of Ramah (see on 16:1), but others as well (15:8).

3. In the first ways of . . . David. The chronicler thus by implication confesses that David's later ways were less exemplary (cf. II Sam 11–21). The Baalim. Hebrew plural. For "the Baals" were multifold, each field, even, having its own fertility-spirit. 4. The doings of Israel included Jereboam's innovations in the priesthood and calendar as well as his calf worship (I Kgs 12:28-33). 6. He took away the high places and groves (Asherah-poles; see on 14:3). Cf. I Kgs 22:46; though this official act, like that of Asa before him (II Chr 15:17), was not popularly sustained (20:33).

7. In the third year of his reign. That is, of his sole reign, or 866* B.C. A comparison of II Kgs 3:1 and 8:16 indicates that Jehoshaphat's full reign of twenty-five years (II Chr 20:31) must have commenced three years prior to his father's death, or in 872*. A co-regency was, perhaps, made necessary by Asa's illness, which became increasingly serious in the following year (16:12, note). He sent to . . . Benhail . . . Read simply, He sent Ben-hail, etc. (ASV). These are the names of the princes. To teach. Jehoshaphat realized that the teaching of God's Book (v. 9) is the work of all leaders, who are of the faith (cf. Mt 28:20), not just of professional Levites and priests (Deut 33:10; Lev 10:11). 9. They . . . went about, like the traveling exhorters and evangelists of the NT (cf. III Jn 7,8).

12,13. He built . . . castles . . . . and had much business. Literally, fortified places and work (and the property gained thereby).

14. Of Judah . . . Adnah . . . and with him . . . three hundred thousand . . . Jehoshaphat's three Judean armies thus totalled 780,000, as compared with 500,000 in the time of David (II Sam 24:9). He also commanded the services of the two Benjamite armies of 380,000. These are very large figures, the muster doubtless including all his citizenry (cf. II Chr 14:8). 19. These, the five army commanders, waited on the king. Portions of their troops would then have been stationed in the fenced cities. 18:1. In about 865 B.C. (cf. the age of his son's son, Ahaziah, at his accession in 841; II Kgs 8:26), or after sixty-five years of hostility between northern Israel and Judah, Jehoshaphat . . . joined affinity with Ahab (cf. v. 3; I Kgs 22:44). This included the marriage of Jehoshaphat's son Jehoram to Athaliah, the daughter of Ahab and Jezebel (II Chr 21:6), an alliance which was to have disastrous results for Judah (22:10). This alliance may have been furthered by the threat of Assyrian power, against which a coalition of western states, including Damascus and Israel, fought a drawn battle in 853 at Qarqar on the Orontes River.

2. Go up . . . to Ramoth-gilead. This key city on the caravan route at the edge of Trans-Jordanian Israel had been seized by Syria (16:4, or II Kgs 20:38); but Ahab may have felt that Damascus had been sufficiently weakened by her losses at Qarqar to permit of its recapture at this time (853 B.C.).

4. Enquire . . . of the Lord. Jehoshaphat had already committed himself (v. 3), but he retained enough piety to realize his need of divine guidance, though he neglected the guidance after it was given (v. 29). 5. Of prophets four hundred men. These men from Ahab's court spoke in the name of the Lord (in his corrupted golden calf form), but falsely (v. 22) with whatever message was calculated to please (v. 12; Mic 3:5,11). Jehoshaphat put little faith in them (v. 6). 7 Micaiah, who is known only from this incident, never prophesied good unto Ahab. The true prophet was, in fact, distinguished by the fact that he faithfully warned Israel of the results of her sin (Jer 23:22; Mic 3:8).

9. A void (open) place. Hebrew a threshing floor. At . . . the gate, the traditional place of judgment (cf. Ruth 4:1). 10. He made . . . horns of iron. Symbols of victory (Deut 33:17), but perhaps superstitiously believed to possess magical power, too.

13. What my God saith . . . I speak (cf. Num 24:13). God's revelations were objectively distinguished, by genuine prophets, from the thoughts and desires of their own hearts (Jer 14:14). 14. Go ye up, and prosper. He spoke in mockery, as his tone of voice must have made clear (cf. v. 15).

16. These have no master (cf. Num 27:16,17). He thus predicted Ahab's death (II Chr 18:24), and his people's release in peace (v. 30). 18. The host (army) of heaven . . . on his right. That is, angels. Cf. the "sons of God" (Job 1:6). 19. Who shall entice Ahab. God may work through his spirits to incite evil men to manifest their sin and thus be led to punishment or to repentance (cf. I Sam 16:14,15; 18:10,11). 20. There came out a spirit. Hebrew, the (well-known) spirit, Satan (Job 1:6-12). Micaiah assumed in his hearers a knowledge of the Book of Job (already written down in the days of Solomon?).

23. Zedekiah . . . smote Micaiah. This act was proof that the Spirit of God was not with Zedekiah (Jas 3:17). Which way went the Spirit . . . from me. The false prophet brazenly asserted that a prophecy contrary to his own could not be of the Spirit. 24. Thou shalt . . . hide thyself. The fulfillment of this forecast is unrecorded, but the prophecy may refer to the punishment meted out to the false prophets by Ahab's family, after the king's death.

25. The order, Carry him back, implies that Micaiah was already in prison at the time; cf. Asa's precedent (16:10). 26. With bread of affliction. Short rations. 27. Hearken, all ye people. Hebrew plural, peoples. Micaiah summoned all nations to be his witnesses.

29. I will disguise myself. Ahab sought this futile means to avert God's decree (v. 16). 30. Fight . . . only with the king of Israel. If he could be taken, the battle would be won (cf. II Sam 21:17). 31. They compassed about him. Jehoshaphat would then and there have reaped the fruit of his sinful alliance had not the Lord helped him. 33. A . . . man drew a bow at a venture. Hebrew, in his unsuspectingness. But there is no chance with God (Prov 16:33). Between the joints of the harness. The Hebrew suggests, "between the links of mail below, and the breastplate"; i.e., in the abdomen.

19:1. Jehoshaphat . . . returned . . . in peace, thus fulfilling the last detail of Micaiah's prophecy (see 18:16, note). 2. Jehu the son of Hanani had condemned the dynasty of Baasha of Israel some twenty-five years before (I Kgs 16:1). Shouldest thou . . . love them that hate the Lord? Not that the Christian should not have a compassionate love for the lost (Mt 5:44), but that he must not compromise his stand for God (Ps 139: 21,22) or help the ungodly with cooperation (II Jn 10,11; Rom 16:17). Therefore is wrath upon thee (ASV). It had been upon him (18:31) and would be (20:1,37; 22:10). Jehoshaphat, however, humbled himself before the prophet (cf. 12:6), as his father Asa had not humbled himself before Jehu's father Hanani (16:10). 3. The groves. See on 14:3. 6. Ye judge . . . for the Lord. Good government springs from submission to the Lord (see I Chr 11:3, note). 7. Nor respect of persons, nor taking of gifts. The servant of God must be impartial, and he must accept no bribes.

8. In the Jerusalem central court of appeal, he set . . . Levites . . . for . . . judgment; see on I Chr 26:29. 10. Between blood and blood. Cases of bloodshed. Warn them. A judge is chargeable to God for his actions, for which wrath may come upon him (cf. Ezk 33:6). 11. Matters of the Lord . . . the king's matters. In the Pentateuch, religious and civil, ceremonial and moral law are inseparable. The distinction that is here first made (though based on Deut 17:9, 12) became clarified in later prophetic thought (Isa 1:11-17; Amos 5:21-24).

20:1. Other beside the Ammonites. The Hebrew, mēhā'ammônîm, is quite likely a scribal corruption of mēhamm"ûnîm, "of the Mehunim," a people from Mount Seir in Edom, farther south (cf. vv. 10, 22,23). 2. From beyond the (Dead) sea on this side Syria (Aram). Read Edom, which is a very slight scribal change in the consonantal Hebrew, and which agrees with the geography of En-gedi, on the western side of the Dead Sea. 3. Jehoshaphat . . . proclaimed a fast. Fasting was a sign of grief (Jud 20:26) and was not a regular feature of pre-Exilic Hebrew religion (unless implied in Lev 16:29-31). But from Samuel's time on, it had been employed to emphasize the sincerity of the prayers of God's people when Israel faced special needs (I Sam 7:6; cf. Acts 13:2).

5. The new court was an innovation of Solomon's in building the Temple (see on 4:9). Perhaps it had recently been restored by Jehoshaphat (cf. 17:12). 9. If, when evil cometh. The king was quoting from Solomon's plea (6:28-30; cf. 7:13-15). 10. Whom thou wouldest not let Israel invade (Deut 2:4). Jehoshaphat thus called on God to honor Israel's former obedience, as well as His own gracious promise (II Chr 20:11). 12. We have no might . . . but our eyes are upon thee. Here was faith like that of his father Asa (see on 14:11).

14. Jahaziel . . . of the sons of Asaph seems to have been inspired by God's Spirit to compose Psalm 83 on this occasion (see especially vv. 2,6-8 of the psalm). 15. The battle is not yours, but God's. Cf. I Sam 17:47. 16. From a point seven miles north of En-gedi, the cliff (ascent, ASV) of Ziz wound inland to the valley of Berachah (v. 26). 17. Stand ye still, and see the salvation of the Lord. Cf. Ex 14:13. 20. The wilderness of Tekoa lay south of Bethlehem, toward Hebron. Believe in the Lord your God, so shall ye be established. Cf. Mk 9:27. 21. Singers . . . went out before the army, as had the arks of God and the priestly trumpeters at Jericho (Josh 6:9). Praise the beauty of holiness. Cf. I Chr 16:29, in holy array (ASV). 22. The Lord set ambushments. Perhaps marauding Seirites, for note the way in which the forces then turned on the men of Seir (v. 23). 23. Every one helped to destroy another. As in the triumph of Gideon (Jud 7:22). 26. Berachah (see v. 16) means blessing in Hebrew.

33. The high places were not taken away. See on 17:6. 34. The book of Jehu . . . who is mentioned in the book of the kings. Rather, which is inserted in the book (ASV; cf. on 32:32).

35. Jehoshaphat . . . join[ed] himself with Ahaziah, the son of Ahab, who reigned in Israel, 853–852 B.C. 36. Ships in Ezion-gaber. See on 8:17,18. To go to Tarshish. That is, of the sort that could go to Tarshish (cf. on 9:21). Their destination was, in fact, Ophir (I Kgs 22:48). 37. Eliezer is otherwise unknown. The ships were broken. God will not honor compromising alliances.

5) Jehoram. 21:1-20. He reigned from 848 to 841 B.C. II Chronicles 21 is a commentary on the man who married the daughter of Ahab and Jezebel, and who walked in their ways (v. 6). It describes Jehoram's viciousness and his apostasy (vv. 1-11), but also God's condemnation upon him through the prophet Elijah, and the failures, both national and personal, that overwhelmed him as a result (vv. 12-20). The former verses represent an expansion of II Kgs 8:16-24, though the latter are without Biblical parallel, except for Jehoram's death notice.

1. Jehoshaphat slept with his fathers . . . And Jehoram . . . reigned. This was 848 B.C. Actually, Jehoram had been an associate on the throne since 853* (cf. II Kgs 3:1 with 1:17; II Chr 17:7, note; and Thiele, Mysterious Numbers, pp. 64, 65). 2. The second Azariah is Azariahu in Hebrew. 3. Jehoshaphat gave to his six younger sons gifts, etc., following the prudent policy of his great-grandfather Rehoboam (see on 11:23). 4. Jehoram . . . slew all his brethren, and others.

Having accepted the godless standards of his wife Athaliah, he apparently assumed (falsely, v. 13) that his brothers would act with similar ruthlessness toward him, if given the opportunity.

7. The Lord would not destroy the house of David. It was this same divine reticence that had preserved the southern kingdom to Rehoboam, after Solomon's sin (I Kgs 11:12,13). The term covenant, Hebrew b'rît, does not occur in God's promise in I Chr 17. But that this was indeed one of the manifestations of God's redemptive testament is confirmed in a number of other passages (cf. II Sam 23:5; Isa 55:3).

8. "Because he had forsaken the Lord" (v. 10), Edom revolted (ASV) from the rule of its Hebrew governors (I Kgs 22:47). Moab, to the north of Edom, had already established its independence (II Kgs 1:1). 9. After being compassed . . . in (almost overwhelmed), Jehoram . . . smote the Edomites, at Zair (I Kgs 8:21; possibly Zior (?), a few miles south of his father's victory-site of Berachah; II Chr 20:26). He failed, however, to quell the Edomitic uprising as such (v. 10). This campaign thus corresponds closely to Israel's unsuccessful attempt to resubdue Moab shortly before (II Kgs 3:3-27). 10. Also . . . Libnah. A Philistinized city north of Gath.

11. Jehoram made high places, the very shrines his fathers had tried with such difficulty to eradicate (see on 14:3; 17:6). While the Canaanitish worship thus introduced did involve obscenities (cf. I Kgs 22:46), the fornication concerned here is that of Israel's faithlessness toward Jehovah, her divine Husband. For Moses and the prophets, idolatry was "whoredom" (II Chr 21:13; cf. Lev 20:5; Num 25:1,2).

12. The last recorded act of Elijah took place in 852 (II Kgs 1:3,17). But his translation may not have occurred until after Jehoram's crimes of fratricide, following his accession as sole monarch in 848 (II Kgs 3:3 need not require an earlier date). Elijah was, however, probably gone by the time of the delivery of his letter, so that its sentences of doom came almost as a voice from the dead.

16. The Arabians, that were near the Ethiopians (Heb. Cushites), may have been nomads from the borderlands between Philistia and Egypt (cf. on 14:9).

19,20. The sore disease of which Jehoram died appears to have been a violent form of dysentery. He died, moreover, without mourners—no burning (cf. 16:14, note); and was buried in dishonor, apart from the sepulchres of the kings (cf. 24:25).

6) Ahaziah (841 B.C.). 22:1-9. These verses furnish a historical demonstration of how, in God's providence, the results of a sin may bring about that very sin's punishment. In the case of Ahaziah it was the evil alliance of Judah with Israel that brought about the king's death (vv. 4,7), after a reign of only a few months. The events through which this came about are explained in the more detailed, parallel passage of II Kgs 8:25–10:14.

1. The inhabitants of Jerusalem made Ahaziah . . . king. This popular intervention suggests a succession that was disputed (cf. II Kgs 23:30), perhaps by the king's own mother, the ruthless Athaliah (cf. II Chr 22:10). The band of men . . . had slain all Jehoram's older sons. See 21:17 (Jehoahaz is but a variant form of Ahaziah). 2. Forty and two years old is impossible (cf. 21:5). It is probably a copyist's error for twenty-two (I Kgs 8:26). He reigned one year, and for only one part of it (cf. II Kgs 8:25; 3:1; and note that Ahaziah's death was simultaneous with that of J(eh)oram of Israel). Athaliah was the daughter of Omri, meaning, one of his dynasty. Specifically, she was a granddaughter (cf. 21:6; I Kgs 16:29). 3. His mother was his counsellor. Further testimony to the dominating influence of this evil woman (cf. 21:6; 21:4 note). To do wickedly. Athaliah patronized the Phoenician Baal worship of her mother Jezebel (cf. 23:17).

5. Twelve years after the death of Ahab at Ramoth-gilead in 853 B.C. (18:34). Ahab's second son, Joram, had recaptured the city, apparently emboldened by the murder of Ben-hadad and the succession of Hazael as new king in Damascus (II Kgs 8:7-15). Hazael, however, reattacked Ramoth-gilead (cf. II Kgs 9:14,15) and in the fighting smote and wounded Joram. 6. Joram returned to . . . Jezreel at the head of the Valley of Esdraelon, site of Ahab's palace (I Kgs 21:1), from Ramah (i.e., Ramoth-gilead, v. 5). Azariah is Ahaziah in the more correct MSS.

7. The details of how the Lord had anointed Jehu to cut off the house of Ahab appear in II Kings 9. 8. Only after Ahaziah's death (v. 9) did Jehu slay the sons of the brethren (v. 1) of Ahaziah (cf. II Kgs 10:12-14). They could not have been more than little children (cf. II Chr 21:5). 9. After the murder of his uncle Joram by Jehu, Ahaziah fled southward and hid in Samaria. He was then brought . . . to Jehu, who fatally wounded him near Ibleam (between Jezreel and Samaria), whence he fled northwest to Megiddo and died (II Kgs 9:27). Ahaziah's servants carried him to Jerusalem (II Kgs 9:28) and buried him.

7) Athaliah (841–835 B.C.). 22:10–23:21 (paralleling II Kgs 11). Jehoshaphat's alliance by marriage with the house of Ahab led in the end to the almost total extinction of the dynasty of David and to the official paganizing of Judah. For the queen-mother Athaliah, after the death of her one remaining son, Ahaziah, proceeded to slaughter her own princely grandchildren in order to usurp the throne herself, and to entrench the Baal worship of her mother Jezebel as the state religion of Judah. There remained, however, a one-year-old son of Ahaziah, Joash, who was protected by the high priest Jehoiada (II Chr 22:10-12). Finally, after six years, Jehoiada engineered a revolt that brought about the coronation of Joash (23:1-11), the death of Athaliah (vv. 12-15), and the extirpation of her false worship (vv. 16-21).

22:11. Jehoshabeath (Jehosheba, II Kgs 11:2) the daughter of the preceding king, Jehoram, and sister of Ahaziah (ibid.) hid her infant nephew Joash . . . in a bedchamber, the room, that is, in which the mattresses and bedding were stored. He was later removed to the Temple (v. 12) by the high priest Jehoiada, her husband, who was many years her senior (cf. 24:15).

23:1. II Kings 11:4 explains that the captains of hundreds were the officers of the Carites (cf. the Cherethites, I Chr 18:17 note) and other elements of the royal guard. 2. The gathering of the Levites . . . and the chief of the fathers must have been done with secrecy, since the uprising caught Athaliah wholly off-guard (v. 13). 3. They made a covenant with the king. With Jehoiada, that is, as the king's protector (cf. v. 1; II Kgs 11:4). Here is another instance of the requirement of popular confirmation, that played so prominent a part in the history of Israel's royal succession (cf. I Chr 11:3; II Chr 10:1, notes).

4. A third part . . . entering on the sabbath. At this time there was a changing of the Levitical courses that were on active service in the Temple (I Chr 24:4,20, notes). Of those coming on duty, one third were to be at the doors of the Temple, "behind the guard" to "keep the watch of the house" (II Kgs 11:6) and thus prevent the entrance of unauthorized, non-Levitical personnel (v. 6). 5. A second third were to be at the king's house in the Temple (cf. 22:12; not Athaliah's palace, which remained open; cf. 23:12). The remaining third were to be at the gate of the foundation (i.e., the gate of Sur; II Kgs 11:6), a temple gate of uncertain location. 8. With them that were to go out on the sabbath. The two companies of Levites going off duty were not dismissed, but kept watch about the king (II Kgs 11:7), equipped with the temple weapons (II Chr 23:9).

10. He set all the rest of the people, the non-Levitical chiefs (v. 2) and such of the royal guard as were considered faithful by the five covenanted commanders (v. 1; II Kgs 11:6,11), with their weapon[s], in ranks in the temple court (v. 5). 11. They gave Joash the testimony, perhaps the book of the Law of Moses, that was to guide his conduct in office (Deut 17:18,19).

14. Jehoiada . . . brought out (rather, commanded, II Kgs 11:15) the captains, to have Athaliah forth of the ranges. That is, to march her out of the holy Temple between the armed ranks, and to slay any of her followers who might attempt a rescue.

16. With the political revolution came the corresponding religious revival, that king, priest, and citizenry, all should be the Lord's people. This included the reaffirmation of "constitutional" monarchy under God by king and people (v. 3). 17. They slew Mattan. This was the fate required by God's Word for those who lead others into false religion (Deut 13:5-10). And they re-established the true worship, as it had been under David (v. 18).

8) Joash (835–796 B.C.). 24:1-27. The reign of Joash serves as an epitome of the whole history of Judah. In its earlier part, Joash lived righteously, honoring the Lord and caring for the Temple, with its sacrifices that depicted God's eternal plan of salvation (24:1-14). Yet in its later part, he forsook both the Lord and His Temple (vv. 15-19), murdered the prophet who rebuked him, the son of the very priest who had established and guided him (vv. 20-22), suffered a humiliating subjugation to Hazael of Damascus (23,24), and died weakened by wounds and slain for his crimes (vv. 25-27). This chapter provides an amplified parallel to II Kgs 12 (Joash = Jehoash).

2. Joash did that which was right, except that he did not accomplish the removal of the high places (14:3, note; II Kgs 12:3). All the days of Jehoiada; that is, until some years after 813 B.C. (v. 14; cf. II Kgs 12:6). But after the death of his great protector he fell into sin (vv. 17,18).

4. After the temple vandalism of Athaliah's sons (v. 7), repair had become necessary for the house of the Lord. 5. Gather . . . money. Hebrew, silver. Coinage did not arise until the Exilic period. But the Levites hastened it not, not only because men become used to things 'the way they are," but because the priests too easily exhausted receipts on current operating expenses and their own support (II Kgs 12:7; Num 18:19).

6. The collection (tax, ASV) of Moses. II Kings 12:4 specifies the sources of revenue: (1) "the dedicated things," of "every one that passeth the account," i.e., the half-shekel collected in censuses (Ex 30:14; Mt 17:24); (2) of the evaluation "that every man is set at," in substitutionary redemptions, three to fifty shekels (Lev 22:1-8; Num 18:15,16); (3) and of the voluntary gift "that cometh into any man's heart." 7. Baalim. Plural. See on 17:3.

8. They (Jehoiada; II Kgs 12:9) made a chest, with a receiving slot in the cover (ibid.). The priests had agreed to give up both the collecting and rebuilding work (II Kgs 12:8), their needs being met by "the money for the trespass-offerings, etc." (v. 16, ASV; Lev 5:16). And set it without at the south gate; that is, on the right-hand side of the altar (II Kgs 12:9). 9. They made a proclamation. For the necessary boost in receipts (cf. v. 5, note). 13. They set the house of God in its proper state, for none of the gifts was used for holy equipment (II Kgs 12:13) until the repair work was finished (II Chr 24:14). II Kings 12:15 stresses also the honesty and faithfulness of the workmen.

16. They buried him . . . among the kings, an honor that contrasts with Joash's fate (v. 25). Jehoiada was son-in-law to Jehoram (22:11).

17. The princes of Judah, to whom the king hearkened, were the class most attracted by the materialism of Baal worship (v. 18; cf. Zeph 1:8) and were the most punished later (v. 23). 18. Groves. Asherah poles (see on 14:3).

19. God sent prophets and they testified against them. Some of the earlier ones, e.g., Shemaiah and Jehu, had been heeded (11:2; 12:5; 19:2); but the later ones, e.g., Hanani, Micaiah, and now Zechariah (v. 20; 16:7; 18:16), were increasingly not heeded.

20. The Spirit . . . came upon, literally, "clothed himself with," Zechariah (cf. I Chr 12:18, note). 22. Joash . . . remembered not Jehoiada's kindness (Heb. hesed, "faithfulness"; cf. I Chr 16:41, note). He owed his throne and very life to the priest's loyalty (II Chr 23). Zechariah's martyrdom was cited by Christ as the final instance in the OT canon (Hebrew book order) of the gross perversity of Israel (Lk 11:51). Lord look upon it, and require it. This prayer of imprecation, rather than of forgiveness (cf. Lk 23:34; Acts 7:60), was justified by the official positions of both the killer and the killed. God's name was at stake, and vengeance did follow (II Chr 24:24,25).

23. The host (army) of Syria . . . sent all the spoil to their king, together with tribute that Joash stripped from the Temple. This included all that had been accumulated since the days of Asa (cf. 16:2 note; II Kgs 12:18), whose sin thus reaped its final reward (cf. II Chr 16:9, note). 24. A great Judean army fell to a small company of [Syrian] men, just as Moses had predicted (Lev 26:17; the opposite of v. 8). 25. The Syrians left him in great diseases (Heb., severely wounded) and his own servants . . . slew him on his bed in the house of Millo (II Kgs 12:20; perhaps this parallels I Chr 11:8, see note). II Kings 12:21 describes his burial as "with his fathers in the city of David," which is here confirmed, but with the specification that it was not in the sepulchres of the kings (cf. on v. 16). 26. Variant forms of Zabad, etc., occur in II Kgs 12:21.

27. The burdens laid upon him may refer to prophetic threatenings (v. 19). The story, Hebrew midrash, "commentary," of the book of the kings, suggests some interpretation of this more basic source (cf. on 13:22; and Introduction, Authorship).

9) Amaziah (796–767 B.C.). 25:1-28. Apart from an introduction on Amaziah's succession (25:1-4) and a conclusion on his death (vv. 25-28), the chronicler's record of the reign of Amaziah centers about two wars and the historical lessons to be gained therefrom: (1) his reconquest of Edom, through obedience to the Lord (vv. 5-16); and (2) his subsequent defeat by northern Israel, in punishment for idolatries adopted after his earlier victory (vv. 17-24). The chapter closely parallels II Kgs 14:1-20, except for the detailed review of the Edomitic war, which receives only brief mention in II Kings (v. 7).

2. He did the right, but not with a perfect heart. See below; and the high places were not taken away (II Kgs 14:4; cf. v. 3). 4. He slew his father's murderers (24:26), but not their children; for he honored Moses' commandment (Deut 24:16).

5. Because of losses such as those of Joash (24:23), his three hundred thousand . . . men are considerably under the totals of Asa and Jehoshaphat (see on 14:8; 17:14); but they were choice (chosen, ASV). 6. He hired also an hundred thousand . . . out of Israel for an hundred talents of silver, or over $200,000. But no purchased alliance with sinners such as the Ephraimites could have God's blessing (v. 7; cf. on 16:2), and his is the final decision (vv. 8,9). 10. So Amaziah sent them home again, placing his trust in God, as had his fathers (cf. on 14:11; 20:12).

11. Seir (Edom) had enjoyed fifty years of independence from Judah (cf. 21:8) but was now resubjugated, with wanton cruelty (v. 13). The valley of salt, located at the south end of the Dead Sea (?), had been the scene of David's former victory over Edom (I Chr 18:12). Amaziah eventually captured the Edomite capital city of Selah (Petra; II Kgs 14:7).

13. The Ephraimite soldiers . . . which Amaziah sent back, plundered the northwestern Benjamite (frontier) cities of the kingdom of Judah . . . and smote three thousand citizens of them. The attempt to hire these mercenaries thus brought about its own punishment (v. 5; cf. 22:1-9, introductory note). 14. He burned incense. Rather, He made offerings to them.

15. The futility of gods . . . which could not deliver their own people should have been obvious, but still today men worship matters that are known to be unsatisfying. 16. Forbare. Amaziah's mistreatment of the prophet at least went no further than threats (contrast 24:21).

17. Let us look (AV, see) one another in the face. Amaziah's victory over Edom emboldened him to challenge the far mightier forces of Israel. This was senseless pride, as the northern ruler Joash (Jehoash, II Kgs 14, 798–782 B.C.) himself proceeded to point out in his fable (II Chr 25:18,19). 21. They saw one another (fought, v. 17) at Bethshemesh, due west of Bethlehem, in Judah on Amaziah's own picked ground. 23. Jehoash brake down . . . four hundred cubits (200 yds.) of the wall of Jerusalem from the gate of Ephraim, on the north side of the city, toward Ephraim, to the northwest corner gate. 24. With the gold, he took Obed-edom, the family of Levitical porters and singers (cf. I Chr 26:4-8), and other hostages.

27. As a further divine punishment (cf. v. 20), this disaster may then have precipitated a conspiracy against Amaziah and the accompanying elevation of his sixteen-year-old son Uzziah to the co-regency (and actual rule) in 790* B.C. (26:1). For while Amaziah died in 767, the twenty-seventh year of Jeroboam II (II Kgs 15:1), the latter's death in 753, fourteen years later (II Kgs 14:23) is called the "thirty-eighth" year of Uzziah (II Kgs 15:8). Amaziah's fatal flight to Lachish (25 miles southwest of Jerusalem on the route to Egypt) in 767 may thus have sprung from an attempted recovery of the throne (cf. Thiele, Mysterious Numbers, pp. 71,72). 28. The city of Judah. The city of David (II Kgs 14:20).

10) Uzziah (790*–739* B.C.). 26:1-23. The career of Uzziah ("Azariah" in I Chr 3:12, and predominantly in II Kgs) exhibits a certain parallelism to the career of his father Amaziah and his grandfather Joash. That is, the chronicler evaluates the earlier part of Uzziah's long reign as one of piety and of corresponding prosperity (II Chr 26:1-15); but its latter part, as marked by religious deviation, which resulted in his affliction with leprosy, his banishment from the palace, and eventually his death (vv. 16-23). His failure, however, was less than the crimes of his fathers; and his achievements mark him as one of the great kings of Israel, though the parallel passages in II Kings (14:21,22; 15:1-7) provide only the formal summary of his reign.

1. Uzziah, . . . sixteen years old in 790, must have been born when his father was only fifteen (cf. on 25:1). Early marriages of this sort are not uncommon in the East. 2. He built Eloth (Elath; cf., on 8:17) after . . . the king had died, in 767. This confirms the hypothesis of Uzziah's accession some time prior to the death of his father Amaziah (cf. on 25:17).

4. He did the right; though the high places remained (cf. 25:2; II Kgs 15:4) and Israel's moral and spiritual condition suffered decay (cf. Hosea and Amos) beneath the surface prosperity (next note). 5. Zechariah, who had understanding in the visions of God. Other MSS read, who instructed (him) in the fear of God. This prophet, though seemingly well known to Ezra, cannot be identified today. God made him to prosper. The period of Jeroboam II and Uzziah, or the four decades from 790–750 B.C., constituted Israel's "Indian summer" (vv. 8,15), when the Assyrians had destroyed her Syrian enemies on the northern borders (cf. II Kgs 12: 17-19; 13:3-5) but had not yet begun their own destruction of the Hebrew states (cf. II Kgs 15:19ff. and the concern suggested by Isa 6:1). 6. Uzziah's subjugation of Gath reduced henceforth, the major Philistine cities from five to four (cf. Zeph 2:4). 7. The Arabians of Gur-baal, and the Mehunims seem to have been nomadic enemies along Judah's southeastern border (cf. on 20:1; I Chr 4:41).

9. The corner gate and the valley gate and the turning were located at northwest, west, and east (Neh 3:19-25) points of the wall, respectively. 10. The desert. That is, arid south Judah. The low country. The Shephelah (see on I Chr 21:28). And . . . the plains. The tableland (ASV marg.) of Trans-Jordan, formerly under Ephraimitic control, but apparently reconquered by Uzziah from Ammonites who had occupied it (v. 8).

11. Maaseiah the officer (ASV). Hebrew shôṭēr, "adjutant," the scribal or mustering officer (Ex 5:6). 13. Uzziah's army of 307,500 fighting men was approximately the same size as Amaziah's army (25:5, note). 14. Habergeons. Coats of mail (ASV).

16. Uzziah's burning incense not simply usurped an exclusively priestly function (v. 18; Ex 30:7,8) but implied his claim to the Canaanitish office of divine-priest-king (see Gen 14:18; cf. Num 12: 10). 17. The Azariah who withstood Uzziah is probably Azariah II (cf. I Chr 6:10. 21. Uzziah . . . dwelt in a several house. Literally, a house set apart, a modified form of the required quarantine (Lev 13:46). Jotham thus assumed the co-regency over the king's house. The date was 751* B.C.; for Jotham's twentieth year (II Kgs 15:30) was Ahaz's twelfth (II Kgs 16:1), which is 732* (cf. II Kgs 18:10).

22. Isaiah wrote the acts of Uzziah, even as he did those of Hezekiah (cf. on 32:32). 23. Because Uzziah was leprous, he was buried in the field of the burial, not in the sepulchres of the kings (cf. 24:25).

11) Jotham (751*–736 B.C.). 27:1-9. Jotham was a king whose righteousness was rewarded (vv. 2,6) but whose reign so overlapped with the reigns of other rulers as to grant him but little independent notice. The few verses of II Chronicles 27 elaborate the bare summary of II Kgs 15:32-38 only to the extent of mentioning a victory he sustained over the Ammonites and of itemizing the resultant tribute (II Chr 27: 5,6).

1. He reigned sixteen years. The words, "in the twentieth year of Jotham" (II Kgs 15:30) seem to mark a theoretical point of time, used because Jotham himself had not yet been discussed, let alone his successor. 2. The people did yet corruptly, sacrificing to idols on the high places, etc. (II Kgs 15:35; cf. Isa 1–6, which belongs to this period).

3. He built the high (upper) gate, on the northern side of the Temple (23: 20; Jer 20:2), and on the wall of Ophel, the northern part of the original city of David, south of the Temple (II Chr 33:14).

5. An hundred talents of silver. More than $200,000 (cf. 25:6), and ten thousand measures. Hebrew kōr designates a measure of about ten bushels capacity. 7. All his wars. Jotham was probably the actual commander of the alliance conceived by his quarantined father Aza-riah (cf. 26:21), who is mentioned in the Assyrian annals (but not in Scripture) as overcome by Tiglath-pileser III about 743 B.C. (see Thiele, Mysterious Numbers, pp. 78-98).

8. He . . . reigned sixteen years. But after eight years, in 743*, his son Ahaz was associated with him on the throne (see on 26:21), perhaps because of the defeat by Tiglath-pileser (cf. v. 7; 28:5, notes; II Kgs 15:37).

12) Ahaz (743*–728* B.C.). 28:1-27 (paralleling II Kgs 16, with changes and additions). Ahaz was one of the weakest and most corrupt of the twenty rulers of Judah. Both II Kings and II Chronicles discuss his reign in two stages: (1) his religious apostasy and resultant subjection to Syro-Ephraimitic attack (II Chr 28:1-7); and (2) his subsequent defensive capitulation to Assyria, which led him into even further corruption because of his involvement in the idolatries of his new masters (vv. 16-27). Between these, the chronicler inserts a paragraph telling how the prophet Oded delivered a company of Jewish captives from the hands of Ephraim (vv. 8-15), which is not mentioned in II Kings.

1. Ahaz's accession to co-regency in 743 B.C. when twenty years old (cf. on 27:8), indicates that his father was aged thirteen at his son's birth (27:1; but cf. on 26:1).

2. Baalim (plural). See on 17:3. 3. He burnt incense. Rather, made offerings (vv. 4,25, also). The valley of (the son of) Hinnom (Heb. gê'hinnōm) marked the southern boundary of Jerusalem and became noted as the scene of atrocious pagan practices (33:6). It was later defiled by Josiah when he converted it into a city dump (II Kgs 23:10), the perpetual fires of which became a symbol for hell, Gehenna (Mk 9:43, ASV marg.). He . . . burnt his children. The Canaanitish practice of child sacrifice had been forbidden to Abraham (Gen 22:12) and was made a capital offense under Moses (Lev 20:1-5). 4. High places. See on 14:3.

5. God delivered him over to the king of Syria. . . . and the king of Israel, Rezin and Pekah (752–732 B.C.), respectively. They may have turned on Judah because of the failure of Azariah's alliance (see on 27:7) and the sufferings they had then experienced at the hands of the victorious Assyrians (II Kgs 15:19; cf. v. 37). They besieged, but were unable to capture, Jerusalem (II Kgs 16:5; Isa 7:1), though Rezin did take Elath (II Kgs 16:5; cf. II Chr 26:2; 8:17 note).

9. Oded, who is otherwise unknown, reminded the Ephraimites that those who serve as God's punitive instruments must not exceed their divinely appointed mission (cf. Isa 10:5-19). Their own standing, moreover, was far from secure (II Chr 28:10). 15. They gave them to eat, etc., following the OT standard of showing love, even to the enemy (Ex 23:4; Prov 24:17; 25:21; cf. Mt 5:44).

16. In 734 B.C. Ahaz threw himself on the "mercy" of the Assyrians, asking them to help him. Isaiah had tried to prevent this, as a breach of trust in the Lord (cf. 16:2,9; 25:6,10, notes). Ahaz's cry, moreover, was unnecessary (Isa 7:4-9); it put Judah under the iron heel of Tiglath-pileser (vv. 20,21); it caused Israel's deportation to Assyria—three and one-half tribes in 733 B.C. (II Kgs 15:29), the rest eleven years later (II Kgs 17:6); and it led in 701 to Judah's own devastation by the armies of Sennacherib (II Kgs 18:13). 17. Again the Edomites smote Judah, for Edom was ever ready to capitalize on Judah's distress (cf. 20:22; 21:8). This attack may have then provoked the prophecies of Obadiah (cf. v. 11) and Joel (cf. 3:19). 18. The Philistines also. See Joel 3:4. Low country. The Shephelah (see on I Chr 21:28).

23. The gods of Damascus, which smote him (cf. II Kgs 16:10-13). Reference is to the gods of the Assyrian monarch, who had now become king of Syria II Kgs 16:9). Homage to his gods was doubtless included as part of the price of Ahaz's fealty. 24. He shut up the doors of the Temple, not simply advocating the Assyrian and other religions, but specifically displacing the true (cf. II Kgs 16:14-18).

27. They brought him not into the sepulchres of the kings. For harmonization with II Kgs 16:20, see II Chr 24:25b (cf. 21:19b), notes. Hezekiah . . . reigned in his stead. Popular dissatisfaction with Ahaz seems to have forced Hezekiah to assume rule in 728* (cf. II Kgs 18:9,10), three years prior to his official inauguration (and the death of Ahaz?) in 725* (see on II Chr 32:1).

13) Hezekiah (725*–696* B.C.). 29:

1–32:33. Hezekiah's piety and strength of character were the antithesis of his father's apostasy and surrender to expediency. Whereas Ahaz had converted Jerusalem into a shrine for idolatry and its accompanying immoralities, Hezekiah purified the Lord's Temple of its pollutions (II Chr 29), celebrated a solemn Passover (ch. 30), and campaigned far and wide to stamp out the idolatrous high places and to establish pure religion (ch. 31). Then in politics, whereas Ahaz had short-sightedly capitulated to Assyria, Hezekiah planned and fought for Judah's ultimate welfare and freedom, not always wisely, but with eventual success (ch. 32). The parallel passages in II Kings touch only briefly on Hezekiah's religious reforms (18:1-6) but furnish a more detailed record of his political dealings (18:7–20:21) than is found in the single chapter of II Chronicles 32.

29:2. He did right. Of particular note was his "trust in the Lord," so that among "all the kings of Judah there was none like him before or after" (II Kgs 18:5; cf. Isa 26:3,4).

3. The first year of his reign must refer to that which followed his accession to sole rule in 725* B.C. (see on 30:1), rather than to the time of his rise into power three years earlier (see on 28:27); otherwise Ahaz would have been eleven, rather than fourteen at Hezekiah's birth (cf. 26:1). The first month would then be March/April, 724. He . . . opened the doors of the Temple, shut by the apostate Ahaz (vv. 6,7; 28:24), and repaired them, which included overlaying with gold (II Kgs 18:16). 4. The east street (broad place, ASV). The wide space in front of the Temple (Ezr 10:9).

5. Sanctify now yourselves (v. 15, also). See on I Chr 15:12. 9. The punishments experienced by sinful Judah had included captivities to Damascus, Samaria, Edom, and Philistia (28:5,8,17,18). 11. The Lord hath chosen you, Levites (v. 4; cf. Num 3:5-13), to . . . burn incense. Rather, to make offerings, which was, specifically, the priestly function (v. 21).

12. Kohath, Gershom, and Merari were the three clans of Levi (I Chr 6:1). 13. Separate mention is given to the family of Elizaphan, who had been prince of Kohath in the days of Moses (Num 3:30; cf. I Chr 15:8). Asaph, Heman, and Jeduthun (v. 14) had founded the three families of singers (I Chr 25). 15. The king's commandments were by the words of the Lord, conforming, that is, to the inspired Mosaic Law (cf. Deut 12:2-4).

16. The priests . . . brought out all the uncleanness. Not just dirt accumulated by neglect, but Ahaz's filthy idolatries and their equipment (cf. II Kgs 16:15). To the brook Kidron. Where Asa had burned the queen-grandmother's abominations (see on 15:16). 19. Ahaz . . . did cast away (discard), and even partially destroy, the Lord's vessels (28:24; II Kgs 16:17). 21. For the sin offering and its ritual, see Lev 4:1–5:13.

23. They laid their hands upon them [the he goats], thus designating them as substitutes for their own lives and transferring their sins to them (Num 27:18-21; cf. 8:18,19). The goats were symbols of Christ's dying in the sinner's place (II Cor 5:21). 24. The priests killed them . . . to make an atonement. The Hebrew for atonement, kippēr, means to "appease" or "pacify" (Gen 32:20; Prov 16:14), to avert punishment by paying a ransom (KB, p. 452). Israel was saved through such anticipations of the death of Christ on the cross, who endured the wrath of God for us (Mk 10:45; Rom 3:25). For all Israel. Cf. Lev 4:13; 16:30.

27. For the burnt offering. See Leviticus 1. The song of the Lord suggests the Psalms, used since David's time (I Chr 16) in worship. 31. As many as were of a free heart brought burnt offerings, which were wholly consumed on the altar. These contrast with the more numerous thank, or peace offerings ("consecrated things," v. 33), which were largely eaten by the sacrificers in a feast that followed (see on I Chr 29:21).

34. The subordinate Levites were more upright . . . than the priests (cf. 30:3; and Uriah's apostasy, II Kgs 16:11). This was just the opposite of what might have been expected (cf. Ezk 48:11). But true faith is often found among the humble, while historically professional religious leaders have been least willing to submit to Christ and to the Word (cf. Jn 7:48). 35. The choice fat of the peace offerings was presented to God on the altar before the people feasted (cf. v. 31, note; Lev 3).

36. They rejoiced over what God had prepared for (ASV) the people, for in the final analysis all spiritual triumphs are gifts of God's grace (30:12; I Kgs 18:37; Acts 11:18).

30:1. Hezekiah sent . . . to Ephraim and Manasseh to come to Jerusalem. Such an action would have been impossible at any prior point in the history of northern Israel (cf. vv. 5,26; I Kgs 12:27,28). But now Hoshea's capital had been under Assyrian siege for several months (II Chr 30:6; II Kgs 17:5), and the northern king was powerless to interfere. The Assyrians, furthermore, would encourage anything that suggested defection from him.

2. The passover in the second month (April/May, 724) was one month late, but the delay was justified by Mosaic precedent (Num 9:10,11), when circumstances made it necessary, as they did at this time (cf. II Chr 29:17). 3. At that time, the fourteenth day of the first month (29:3,17), the priests had not sanctified themselves (see 29:34 and I Chr 15:12, notes). But repentance followed (v. 15). 5. They had not done it of a long time. Rather, in great numbers (ASV), i.e., as a united kingdom.

8. Enter into his sanctuary. The Passover was one of the three annual pilgrimage feasts, that required every male's presence at the Temple (Deut 16:16). 9. Your exiled brethren . . . shall find compassion and shall come again, as Moses had predictively promised (Lev 26:40-42).

10. They laughed them to scorn. Human depravity is so complete as to render men unapproachable, even when on the brink of disaster (cf. Amos 4:10; Rev 9:20).

13. The feast of unleavened bread ran for seven days after the Passover itself (Lev 23:5,6), as a reminder to Israel both of their hasty departure from Egypt and of their perpetual need for separation from sin (Ex 12:11,34; I Cor 5:7). 14. They cast them into the brook (stream-bed) Kidron. See 29:16; 15:16 note.

15. They killed the passover lamb, as a memorial of God's past deliverance of Israel from the last plague in Egypt (Ex 12:27) and as a symbol of his continuing claim over sinners, which would be met by the future substitutionary death of Christ, the Lamb of God (Ex 13:15; I Cor 5:7). 16. The priests sprinkled the blood of the Passover lambs upon the altar, as they received it from the Levites. It was normally presented directly by the head of each household (cf. Lev 1:11).

17. But the Levites had to kill and sanctify them (the lambs), because many in the congregation . . . were not sanctified. That is, they were not clean (as in Num 9:6); and the value of the sacrifice as a propitiation of God depended on its typifying the perfect ransom of Christ (Heb 9:14). 18. Yet did they eat. Hezekiah's prayer of intercession made it possible for them to share to this extent in the Passover. For if they were true in heart (v. 19), they could on this first occasion be pardon[ed] ("healed," v. 20) for a failure in outward conformity.

22. The Levites that taught the good knowledge of the Lord. Rather, that had good understanding in the (musical) service of Jehovah (ASV). Similarly, not making confession; but giving thanks (ASV marg.).

24. For Hezekiah . . . did give . . . a thousand bullocks, etc. The quantity of these peace offerings contributed to the decision to extend the week of feasting! (cf. on 29:31; I Chr 29:21)

27. The priests . . . blessed the people, as Moses had directed (Num 6:23-27).

31:1. They cut down the groves. See on 14:3. And threw down the local high places (see 1:3, note), whether of Baal, or of Jehovah worshiped in this Baal pattern. Hezekiah was also forced to destroy Nehushtan, the brazen serpent of Moses, because it had been perverted into an object of idolatry (II Kgs 18:4). In Ephraim also. For some had repented of their two centuries of apostasy (30:11), while the obdurate were powerless to act (30:10,11, notes).

2. Hezekiah appointed the courses of the priests. That is, he re-established the orderly administration of worship first set up by David (cf. on 23:17; I Chr 24,25). 3. The king's portion . . . for the burnt offerings. This responsibility of providing for the national worship had been set forth in detail by Moses (Num 28; 29). For the morning and evening burnt offerings . . . and for the set feasts. See on I Chr 23:30,31. 4. The portion of . . . the Levites (v. 5) consisted primarily of the "firstfruits" (Ex 23:19; Num 18:12) and of tithes from the other tribes (Lev 27:30-33; Num 18:21-24). The Levites could devote themselves to God's work unhindered by secular pursuits only if they received these "portions" regularly (cf. Neh 13:10).

6. The tithe of holy things may be a general term for the token percentages of certain offerings that became the property of the priests (Num 18:6; cf. Lev 6:16–7:36). 7. In the third month (May/June), the season of the Feast of Pentecost and the grain harvest (Ex 23:16a), they began . . . , and finished in the seventh month (Sept/Oct), the time of the Feast of Tabernacles and the ingathering of the fruit and vine harvests (Ex 23:16b). 10. Azariah III (v. 13; cf. I Chr 6:4, note) is probably not the Azariah (II) who resisted Uzziah (II Chr 26:17) almost thirty years before.

12. Over which Cononiah . . . was ruler. David had first organized the dedicated things under Levitical porter-treasurers (I Chr 26:20,26, notes). 14. To distribute the oblation of the Lord. He assigned these additional freewill offerings and most holy things (e.g., the specified parts of the guilt offerings; Lev 6:17) to their legitimate priestly recipients (Lev 7:14; cf. 6:29). 15. In the cities of the priests (v. 19). These had been named and distributed by Joshua (Josh 21:9-19).

16. Beside the males, from three years old and upward . . . that entere[d] into the house. From this early age, priests' sons must have accompanied their fathers in the service, and so received their portions directly, in the Temple. 17. The revived Levitical distributions gave renewed, practical significance to the genealogy. Twenty years old and upward. See on I Chr 23:24. 18. They sanctified themselves in holiness. Kore and his associates faithfully discharged a touchy task!

21. In every work, Hezekiah was whole-heartedly committed to the law of Moses, and prospered. Cf. II Kgs 18:6,7.

32:1. After these things. In 715 B.C. Ashdod, and other Palestinian states, rebelled against Assyria. They were urged on by Shabaka of the Twenty-Fifth Dynasty in Egypt (i.e., "So," II Kgs 17:4) and Marduk-pal-iddina of Babylon (see on II Chr 32:25,31). But in 711 B.C. Ashdod was resubdued, Hezekiah yielded to the will of God and submitted (Isa 20), and the Assyrian ruler Sargon II called himself the "subjugator of Judah, whose situation is far away" (cf. Isa 10:28-32; Mic 1:9). This was in the fourteenth year of Hezekiah, calculated back from the known accession of his son Manasseh in 696* B.C. But with Sargon's death in 705, Hezekiah let himself become involved in plots with Egypt (Isa 30:1-5; 31:1-3). He disregarded the counsel of Isaiah and assumed the leadership of a western revolt against Assyria, and he even imprisoned the Philistine king of Ekron, who refused to cooperate (II Kgs 18:8). Then in 701 Sennacherib, the son of Sargon, came against Judah. These two attacks are summarized without differentiation in II Kgs 18:13. Compare the description in II Chr 32:24-26 of Hezekiah's sickness in 711 B.C. after the account, in verses 1-23, of Sennacherib's invasion of 701 B.C. Sennacherib encamped against the fenced cities, and thought to win them. And he did win them, except for Jerusalem (II Kgs 18:13; Isa 36:1).

4. They stopped . . . the brook. Probably the Gihon (v. 30, note). 5. . . . built up all the wall and repaired Millo (see on I Chr 11:8). His efforts, however, were criticized by Isaiah (Isa 22:9,10), because Hezekiah had disobeyed God (Isa 22:11) by relying on the arm of Egypt (Isa 30:7; 31:1-3; cf. II Chr 16:2-9; 25:6, notes) rather than upon the Lord (Isa 30:15,16). As a result, Sennacherib boasts that he "shut up (the king) like a caged bird inside Jerusalem." And Hezekiah was forced to capitulate and pay huge indemnities to Sennacherib, including the very gold with which he had adorned the Temple earlier in his reign (see on II Chr 29:3; II Kgs 18:14-16). These facts are assumed without comment in Chronicles but are confirmed in detail by Sennacherib's own annals, plus further data on the defection of Hezekiah's Arabian mercenaries and the release from Jerusalem and reinstatement of the king of Ekron. Sennacherib claims further to have taken captive over 200,000 from Judah, which serves to explain Isaiah's subsequent messages of comfort for a ravaged country (Isa 40:1) and of hope for its deported people (Isa 43:6,7).

9. After this. That is, after Hezekiah's surrender of the stipulated tribute. Sennacherib's annals, with understandable diplomacy, say nothing of the events beyond this point. But the fact is that the treacherous Assyrian now renewed his demands upon prostrate Hezekiah. He laid siege against Lachish, twenty-five miles southwest of Jerusalem, and sent his servants, including the "tartan," his military commander, to Jerusalem. But the very insolence of the message that follows (cf. II Kgs 18:17-25) provided justification for the stirring hope just expressed by Hezekiah (II Chr 32:7,8; cf. v. 11). 12. Hath not . . . Hezekiah taken away his high places . . . ? Sennacherib hoped to capitalize on any popular dissatisfaction with Hezekiah's reforms (31:1). 14. More to the point was his blasphemy of Jehovah, as no more able to deliver than had been the false gods of those nations already conquered by Assyria (cf. v. 19; Isa 10:15).

16. His servants spake yet more (vv. 18,19), as recorded in II Kgs 18:27-35. 17. He wrote also letters, having had to withdraw his troops to meet the advance of an Egyptian force under Tirhakah, younger brother of Shabaka and later Pharaoh (cf. II Kgs 19:9-13).

20. Hezekiah . . . and . . . Isaiah . . . prayed. See II Kgs 19:1-7,14-34 for these heart-searching pleas and ringing affirmations of faith. 21. An angel . . . cut off all the mighty men of . . . Assyria, 185,000 in one night. The suggestion has been made that a rodent-carried plague struck down the Assyrians. This theory is based on an Egyptian legend that Hezekiah owed his victory over Sennacherib to field mice that ate up the Assyrians' equipment (Herodotus Histories II. 141). But the intensity of the disaster points to a supernatural agency. This event ranks with Israel's crossing of the Red Sea as one of the great historical examples of God's intervention to save his people. So he returned and was slain (II Kgs 19:35-37).

24. In those days. Fifteen years before his death (II Kgs 20:6), or 711 B.C., his fourteenth year. Hezekiah . . . prayed (cf. 16:12, note; II Kgs 20:2,3). "The prayer of faith shall save the sick" (Jas 5:15). And he (God) spake in deliverance unto him (II Kgs 20:4-6) and gave him a confirmatory sign, the miracle of the shadow that regressed (II Kgs 20:8-11). 25. But Hezekiah's heart was lifted up. See on verse 31. Therefore there was wrath. Isaiah's threat of subsequent exile to Babylon (II Kgs 20:16-18; cf. Mic 3:12). 26. Hezekiah humbled himself . . . so that it came not in his days. See II Kgs 20:19; Isa 39:8.

30. To provide a permanent supply of water within the walls of Jerusalem, Hezekiah brought down the upper watercourse of Gihon by tunneling a passageway 1,700 feet long through solid rock. In 1880, archaeological confirmation of this engineering feat was provided by the discovery of the dedicatory "Siloam inscription," in old Hebrew, inscribed by the very engineers who constructed the tunnel.

31. The ambassadors of . . . Babylon were sent by Marduk-pal-iddina (the Merodach-baladan of Isa 39:1,2; cf. II Kgs 20:12,13), not simply to inquire about Hezekiahs' sickness and about the miraculous sign of his recovery, but also, presumably, to arrange practical measures against Sargon's attack of 711 B.C. The embassy thus served to try Hezekiah's relative reliance upon man or God. The fact that the test demonstrated the former was the cause of Isaiah's wrath (v. 25).

32. The vision of Isaiah . . . , in the book of the kings (ASV). Isaiah 36–39 was incorporated into the common source from which Kings and Chronicles both drew (cf. Introduction, Authorship). 33. The chiefest (the ascent, ASV) of the sepulchres may identify some more elevated position, used when the lower tombs had all become occupied.

14) Manasseh (696°–641° B.C.). 33:1-20. It was Manasseh more than anyone else who brought about the destruction of the Kingdom of Judah (II Kgs 23:26; 24:3). This evil son of a godly father was granted the longest reign of any Hebrew king. But he squandered most of it in the seduction of his people to paganism, religiously, and in a renewed subservience to Assyria, politically (II Chr 33:1-10, paralleling II Kgs 21:1-18). In his final years, personal distress did bring him to repentance, though too late to have much national effect (II Chr 33:11-20; there is no corresponding narrative in Kings).

3. He built again the high places . . . for Baalim, and made groves. See 14:3; 17:3, notes. And worshipped all the starry host of heaven (cf. II Kgs 23:10, 11). This ancient form of idolatry (Deut 4:19) which was a particular sin of the astrology-minded Assyro-Babylonians, must have received stimulus in Judah by Manasseh's resubmission to Assyria in 676 B.C., when Sennacherib's son Esar-haddon advanced westward against Egypt. 4. In Jerusalem shall my name be for ever (cf. v. 9). See on 6:2,6. 5. The two courts. See on 4:9.

6. He caused his children to pass through the fire in the valley . . . of Hinnom, as had Ahaz (28:3, notes). And used enchantments (soothsaying), etc., attempting to communicate with the dead by means of spiritists, which Scripture condemns as opposed to true faith in God (Ex 22:18; Deut 18:10-12). Familiar (knowing) spirit[s] meant originally "ghosts," supposedly having superhuman knowledge; but it came to be applied to "mediums." Manasseh also practiced tyranny, shedding "innocent blood very much" (II Kgs 21:16).

8. God would no more remove . . . Israel from out of the land . . . , so that (if only, ASV) they will take heed to his commands. See on 7:14,19. 10. The Lord spake, through "his servants the prophets," threatening their destruction (II Kgs 21:10-15), but they would not hearken.

11. The king of Assyria . . . took Manasseh among the thorns. Rather, with hooks (ASV marg.). To Babylon. Perhaps in 648 B.C., when Ashurbanipal overcame a four-year revolt led by his brother in that city. Egypt (Dynasty XXVI) had taken this opportunity to throw off the Assyrian yoke; and Manasseh might have attempted the same, with less success. 12. In affliction, he . . . humbled himself. God sometimes has to drive men to their conversion (cf. Acts 9:3-5).

14. Gihon . . . and Ophel. See notes on 27:3; 32:30. To . . . the fish gate. In the north wall (Neh 3:3). 17. Nevertheless the people did sacrifice still in the high places. A half century of paganism could not be overcome by a half-dozen years of reform. Yet unto the Lord (Jehovah, Yahweh) . . . only. This was still contrary to the Mosaic law of the central sanctuary (see on 1:3) and must actually have accomplished little more than to apply a new name to the old Baal worship.

18,19. His prayer (cf. vv. 12,13) is now lost. "The Prayer of Manasses" in the Apocrypha, the title of which is based upon this reference, was composed shortly before the time of Christ. The sayings of the seers. Rather, the history of Hozai (ASV), an unknown prophet.

15) Amon (641*–639* B.C.). 33:21-25. Amon was the unhappy product of his father's pagan life, not of his pious death. This brief summary of his reign closely parallels II Kgs 21:19-26 and notes the immediate relapse of Judah to the pre-conversion religion of Manasseh. In two years Amon died at the hands of his own courtiers.

22. Amon sacrified unto all the carved images which Manasseh . . . had made. Either their removal had not involved their destruction (v. 15), or the concentration of Manasseh's reformation in Jerusalem had left available his more scattered idolatries (cf. v. 17).

16) Josiah (639*–608). 34:1–35:27. Josiah was Judah's last good king, and in some respects her greatest (see on 34:2). For it was his reformation of 621 B.C. that did more than all else to restore Israel's commitment to God's Book; and it was loyalty to this same written word that provided the glimmer of hope for Judaism during the Exile (cf. Dan 9:2), in its precarious restoration (Ezr 7:10; Mal 4:6), and throughout the centuries down to the coming of Christ (Mt 5:17,18). II Chronicles 34,35 analyzes Josiah's earlier reforms (34:1-7); the great reformation of his eighteenth year, which began with the temple repairs, during which the crucial book of the Law was discovered (34:8-33); the king's solemn Passover, that followed (35:1-19); and his tragic death (35:20-27). The first and third of these topics are little more than touched on in the parallel section in II Kgs 22:1–23:30, while other matters (see II Chr 34:33, note) receive a correspondingly greater emphasis.

2. He did right (see on 29:2), particularly in his devotion to "all the law of Moses," so that "like unto him was there no king before him or after" (II Kgs 23:25).

3. The eighth year. That is, 631 B.C., when Josiah was sixteen years old. And in the twelfth year. Or, 627. This second date falls within the time of chaos that was caused by an eruption of nomadic horsemen from the north over most of the Near East (628–626 B.C.). These Scythian hordes wrought terror in the hearts of complacent Jews (Jer 6:22-24; Zeph 1:12); and, while never raiding much beyond the coastal plain, where they were finally stopped by the Egyptians, they did render Judah a twofold service: (1) they precipitated the calls of Jeremiah (Jer 1:2) and Zephaniah the prophet (cf. Zeph 1:1?), as well as the 627 B.C. stage of Josiah's revival, which went far beyond a mere "foxhole" religion (II Chr 34:3-7); and (2) they swept away the Assyrian imperial domination, that had throttled Judah for the half-century preceding (v. 6; cf. 33:3, note).

4. The images (in v. 7, "the idols"). Incense stands (see on 14:5). 6. Simeon. See on I Chr 4:24-43. Even unto Naphtali, in Galilee. Josiah had thus recovered most of the formerly Assyrian province of northern Israel (vv. 7,9).

9. The Levites that kept the doors had gathered money, after the example of Joash and his chest (II Kgs 12:9). 12. The men did the work faithfully, with no audit needed (II Kgs 22:7), as under Joash (II Kgs 12:15).

14. Hilkiah . . . found a (Heb., the) book of the law of the Lord. It is also called "the book of the covenant" (v. 30), which suggests Exodus 19–24; while the curses it contained (II Chr 34:24) and the law of the central sanctuary (II Kgs 23:8,9) imply respectively Leviticus 26 or Deuteronomy 28 and 12:5-13, etc. The book was probably the official scroll of the Pentateuch, usually kept by the side of the ark (Deut 31:25,26) but misplaced during the previous administrations, when the ark had been moved about (II Chr 35:3). Given by (lit., by the hand of) Moses. Though not all the Pentateuch claims to have been written down, or even spoken by Moses (cf. Deut 34), the Biblical witness is clear that all its contents belongs to a historical time no later than that of the writer (Deut 4:2; 12:32) and was composed under his directing authority (cf. Christ's own belief, Jn 7:19; Lk 24:44). Our Lord, as if in anticipation of the present widespread denial of the Mosaic authorship of the Pentateuch, stated explicitly that those who refuse to believe Moses' words could not consistently accept His own (Jn 5:47).

19. He rent his clothes. Rendered distraught by threats such as those in Lev 26:32,33 and Deut 28:36 (see II Chr 34:21,24,27), "written concerning us" (II Kgs 22:13). 20. Asaiah a servant of the king's. Rather, the servant (ASV). This was a specific position, high in government. Abdon the son of Micah. II Kings 22:12 has the variant forms, "Achbor the son of Michaiah." 22. Huldah the prophetess. Discrimination on the ground of sex was foreign to the spirit of the OT (cf. Jud 4:4; II Sam 20:16). Restriction of women, e.g., to a separate court in the Temple, arose only with the perversions of inter-Testamental Judaism. She dwelt . . . in the college. Hebrew mishneh, "the second (quarter)" of the city.

24. I will bring evil. The Lord would not "turn from the fierceness of his great wrath, because of all the provocations (of) Manasseh" (II Kgs 23:26). 28. Neither shall thine eyes see all the evil. Postponements of divine wrath because of humble repentance had been granted to Hezekiah (32:26) and even to Ahab (I Kgs 21:29) before him.

30. The covenant (v. 31) is the instrument God uses for the redemption of his elect people. This refers to the "older testament" (cf. I Chr 16:15 and II Chr 15:12-15). 31. The king stood in his place. "At his pillar" (23:13; II Kgs 23:3).

33. Josiah took away all the abominations. For detail on his thorough removal of idolatry—with its accompanying sexual immoralities—, of high place worship, and of spiritism, see II Kgs 23:4-14,24. Out of all the countries that pertained to . . . Israel (see v. 6). The king destroyed Jeroboam's altar at Beth-el, together with the other high places of the former Northern Kingdom, slaying such of the priests as remained (II Kgs 23:15-20). All his days they departed not from following God. The testimony, however, of Jeremiah, who supported Josiah's reformation (Jer 11:1-5), shows that for many the following was one of external compliance, and not of the heart (Jer 11:9-13).

35:1. Josiah kept a passover. This confirmation of Josiah's reform sprang likewise from his obedience to the re-established Law, "as it is written in this book of the covenant" (II Kgs 23:21). The first month. Of the same great eighteenth year (v. 18), 621 B.C.; compare Hezekiah's having had to postpone his passover to the second month (30:2). 3. Put the holy ark in the house which Solomon . . . did build. In the dark days of Manasseh and Amon, the ark seems to have been removed by faithful Levites and carried elsewhere for its protection (cf. 33:7-17; 28:24). 4. After your courses, according to . . . David. See on I Chr 24:4,20. And according to . . . Solomon. See 8:14. 6. Prepare your brethren. Josiah thus provided against the sort of confusion that had arisen under Hezekiah a century before (cf. on 30:16-18). 7. Three thousand bullocks (cf. vv. 8,9,13b). The flocks had been for paschal lambs, but these must have served as peace offerings for feasting in the days of unleavened bread that followed (cf. 30:24; I Chr 29:21, notes).

12. They removed the burnt offerings. That is, they separated certain choice parts of the passover lambs to offer unto the Lord (v. 14), apparently after the pattern of the peace offerings (Lev 3). The people then roasted and ate the Passover itself (per Deut 16:7). 17. And the feast of unleavened bread. See on 30:13. 18. There was no passover like it, since the days of Samuel. II Kings 23:22 adds, "from the days of the judges." That is, Josiah's feast met the Biblical standards as had no others since those of Moses and Joshua.

20. After all this; i.e., in 608 B.C. (Thiele, Mysterious Numbers, pp. 158-160). Necho (II) king of Egypt came up. The Pharaohs of the Twenty-sixth Dynasty made an active bid to succeed to the rule of the Assyrian empire. Nineveh fell in 612; and the Egyptians opposed Babylon's claim to the spoil by going up "on behalf of [not, against] the king of Assyria, to the river Euphrates" (II Kgs 23:29), at the westernmost point of which lay the key city of Carchemish. 21. I come not against thee. Necho wished merely to march along the Palestinian coast, so as to meet the house wherewith I have war, namely the Babylonian army under the crown-prince Nebuchadr(n)ezzar. God commanded me to make haste. This was probably no more than diplomatic doubletalk on Necho's part (cf. on 2:11; 32:12).

22. Josiah, like Ahab, disguised himself for protection against his fate (cf. 18:29, note). For though this fact might have come as a surprise to the Pharaoh, the words of Necho were from the mouth of God. For the Lord's insistent message to Judah had been that she must rely upon Him and avoid involvement in international "power politics" (cf. on 16:9; 28:16; 32:1,5). Megiddo marked the strategic pass in the ridge between the coastal plain and the valley of Esdraelon to the northeast. It has been the scene of key battles from the fifteenth century B.C. right down to World War I. The final battle of the age, against Christ at his second advent, will be joined at "Armageddon" (Rev 16:16), i.e., the mountain of Megiddo.

25. Jeremiah lamented for Josiah, whom he held in high regard (Jer 22:15,16). Written in the lamentations. These dirges are not to be confused with Jeremiah's later laments over Jehoiachin (Jer 22:10-30) or over Jerusalem's fall (Lam).

17) Jehoahaz, Jehoiakim, Jehoiachin, and Zedekiah (608–586 B.C.). 36:1-16. In signal contrast to the godliness and strength of character of their father, these last kings of Judah, three sons and one grandson of Josiah, exhibited a moral incapacity that brought what remained of the kingdom of Israel to its inglorious end. Jehoahaz' displacement from the kingship marked the end of independent government in Judah (36:1-4); Jehoiakim's regime saw the establishment of Babylonian domination (vv. 5-8); Jehoiakim's son, Jehoiachin, reaped the fruit of his father's rebellion (vv. 9,10); and Zedekiah heedlessly touched off the final revolt through infidelity to his suzerain, Nebuchadrezzar, who thus became God's instrument for bringing destruction upon a faithless people (vv. 11-16). These paragraphs are an abbreviated parallel of II Kgs 23:31–24:20.

2. Jehoahaz was twenty and three, younger than Jehoiakim, who succeeded him (v. 5). But though "he did that which was evil" (II Kgs 23:32), the people of the land, the free citizens (II Chr 36:1), seemingly saw more hope in him than in his elder brother. He reigned three months, or just until Necho found opportunity to replace him (cf. 35:20, 21). 3. Necho imposed indemnities of an hundred talents of silver and a talent of gold (cf. 25:6; 27:5), about $220,000, plus $35,000 (cf. I Chr 19:6, note). 4. He turned his name from Eliakim, God raises up, to Jehoiakim, Jehovah (Yahweh) raises up, showing Necho's willingness to tolerate the religion of the Jews. More significantly, this control over the king's name demonstrated Necho's control over his person (see on 6:6). Necho took Jehoahaz . . . to Egypt, where he died (II Kgs 23:34; cf. Jer 22:10).

5. Jehoiakim . . . reigned eleven years, 608–598 B.C., and did evil. He taxed the land for tribute to Pharaoh (II Kgs 23:35), while living in luxury himself (Jer 22:14,15); he perverted justice and oppressed the poor (Jer 22:13,17); and he persecuted the prophets who reproved him (cf. II Chr 35:8,16, below; Jer 26:21-24; 32:36).

6. Against him . . . Nebuchadnezzar (more correctly, Nebuchadrezzar, II Kgs 24:1, Hebrew text) came up. In the spring of 605 the Babylonians won a decisive victory over Necho at Carchemish

(see on 35:20; Jer 46:2). The Egyptians, as a result, were driven back within their own borders; and Palestine was left in the hands of Nebuchadrezzar (II Kgs 24:7). The conqueror proceeded to bind Jehoiakim in fetters, to carry him captive, though the threat seems to have been sufficient without taking him bodily to Babylon.

7. Nebuchadnezzar also carried off temple vessels, and also an initial captivity of select Jewish hostages, including Daniel (cf. Dan 1:1-3). This began the seventy years of Babylonian exile, 605–536 B.C. (Jer 29:10). The authenticity of this Palestinian campaign of 605, once widely questioned by disbelieving OT critics, was strikingly confirmed by the publication in 1956 of two Babylonian tablets of Nebuchadrezzar's reign. On these Nebuchadrezzar states that he conquered "the whole land of Hatti" [the western Fertile Crescent including Palestine] in the summer of 605 and "took heavy tribute of Hatti to Babylon" (cf. J. B. Payne, "The Uneasy Conscience of Modern Liberal Exegesis," Bulletin of the Evangelical Theological Society, I:1 Winter, 1958), 14-18).

8. The rest of the acts of Jehoiakim. After serving Nebuchadrezzar three years (until 602), he rebelled (II Kgs 24:1,2) but died before his full punishment could fall.

9. Jehoiachin was eight years old, rather, "eighteen years old," according to other MSS (cf. II Kgs 24:8; and he reigned three months and ten days, from December 598 to March 16, 597, according to the new Nebuchadrezzar texts (v. 7, note). 10. Nebuchadnezzar . . . brought him to Babylon, 597 B.C., along with a second deportation, which included Ezekiel and 10,000 of the backbone of Jewish society (cf. II Kgs 24:10-16). And made Zedekiah his brother (uncle, II Kgs 24:17) king.

12. He humbled not himself before Jeremiah. Zedekiah first disregarded Jeremiah's messages (Jer 34:1-10), then inquired of the prophet (Jer 21), and finally pleaded with him for help (Jer 37), but never submitted to his requirements. Zedekiah was a weak man, pliable to the schemes of the vicious nobles that had been left to him (Jer 38:5). 13. He . . . rebelled against . . . Nebuchadnezzar, at the instigation of Hophra (588–567 B.C.), Pharaoh of the Twenty-sixth Dynasty in Egypt (cf. Ezk 17:15; Jer 37:5). He made him swear. Zedekiah had been bound as a vassal to Nebuchadrezzar by oath; thus his faithlessness became his undoing (Ezk 17:13-19).

C. The Exile. 36:17-23. Chronicles is essentially a book of encouragement. The chapters on Judah's rulers record great triumphs, vindications of men's faith in God, even in the midst of the nation's general deterioration. Then, having demonstrated that God can and will cast off his people for their disobedience (36:17-21, paralleling II Kgs 25 in brief summary), the chronicler goes on to intimate that out of the ruins are to arise a rejuvenated land, a recommissioned Temple depicting God's changeless salvation, and a refined and therefore restored people (II Chr 36:22,23, paralleling Ezr 1:1-3a). For the Exile was not a permanent defeat but, ultimately, a triumph of God's providence. History is a process, not of disintegration, but of sifting and selection. When the dross, therefore, is removed, a faithful remnant is disclosed (cf. on 10:9; 11:3): "The Lord his God be with him! Let him go up!" (II Chr 36:23).

17. The Lord gave them all into the hand of the Chaldeans. See II Kgs 25:1-21 for the details of Jerusalem's fall and pillage and the third, great deportation, 586 B.C. (cf. II Chr 36:7,10, notes). 20. Them that had escaped from the sword. II Chronicles omits, as irrelevant to the final destiny of Judah, any account of the regathering under Gedaliah and the flight of the remnant to Egypt (II Kgs 25:22-27); of the small, fourth deportation of 582 B.C. (Jer 52:30); and of "the poorest of the land" that remained scattered in Palestine (II Kgs 25:12, ASV). Archaeology has demonstrated Judah's thorough depopulation at this time. He carried . . . away to Babylon, as servants. After certain initial discouragements (Ps 137) and oppressive service (Isa 14:2,3), some Jews gained favor and status (cf. II Kgs 25:27-30). The worldly ones grew indifferent and drifted away (cf. Ezk 33:31,32), but the godly gained in spiritual maturity (cf. Dan 1:8; Est 4:14-16; Neh 1:4).

21. To fulfill the word of the Lord . . . land had enjoyed its sabbaths . . . seventy years (RSV; cf. v. 7, note), presumably making up for a half-millennium of neglected sabbatic years (Gustav Oehler, Theology of the Old Testament, p. 343; cf. Lev 25:1-7; 26:34).

22. In 538 B.C. Cyrus king of Persia

overthrew Nabonidus and his son Belshazzar, the last native Babylonian rulers (Dan 5). His policy of religious conciliation and of restoration for exiles has received full archaeological confirmation from the inscriptions of Cyrus himself. (On the correspondence of this material with Ezr 1:1-3a, see Introd., Authorship).

23. All the kingdoms of the earth hath the Lord (Jehovah) given me. Such diplomatic language (cf 35:21, note) meant nothing to Cyrus; of his words to a Babylonian audience, "Marduk, king of the gods [the leading deity of Babylon, but not of Persia!] . . . designated (me) to rule over all the lands." But Cyrus was in fact an instrument of God's providence (Isa 44:28–45:5).

EZRA

INTRODUCTION

Title. The Book of Ezra, like Ruth, Job, Esther, and others, is named after its principal character. The Jews considered it to be one book with Nehemiah (cf. Talmud, Masoretic text, Josephus), but the repetition of Ezra 2 in Nehemiah 7 indicates that the two books were originally distinct works. In the LXX, Ezra and Nehemiah are called Esdras B, to distinguish them from an apocryphal book, Esdras A (which contains II Chr 35:1 through Ezra, plus Neh 8:1-12, with variations and additions).

Date and Authorship. Although the author is not mentioned, and the narrative appears in both first and third persons, it is highly probable that Ezra himself wrote the book, using various decrees, letters, and genealogies as his original sources. Some Babylonian documents used a similar form of narration; so the change of persons is not a conclusive argument against his authorship. Nor can the fact that he refers to himself as "a ready scribe in the law of Moses" (7:6) be used as an effective argument to the contrary (cf. Num 12:3).

Since Ezra lived to the time of Nehemiah (Neh 8:1-9; 12:36), he had plenty of time to finish his book between April of 456 B.C., when the events of Ezra 10:17-44 took place, and the summer of 444 B.C., when Nehemiah arrived in Jerusalem from the Persian court. Robert Dick Wilson ("Ezra-Nehemiah," ISBE, II, 1083) pointed out that the Hebrew of Ezra resembles that of Daniel, Haggai, and Chronicles much more than that of Ecclesiasticus (written about 180 B.C.), and the Aramaic portions of Ezra (4:7–6:18; 7:12-26) are very similar to the Aramaic of the Elephantine papyri of the fifth century B.C.

Historical Background. The Book of Ezra records the fulfillment of God's promise to the nation of Israel through Jeremiah to bring them back to their land after seventy years of captivity. Through the protection and help of three Persian kings (Cyrus, Darius, and Artaxerxes), and the leadership of such great and godly Jews as Zerubbabel, Joshua, Haggai, Zechariah, and Ezra, the second Temple was completed and true worship restored in Jerusalem.

The first six chapters of the book cover events during the first two or three years of the reign of Cyrus (538–530 B.C.) and the first six years of the reign of Darius I (521–486 B.C.). The last four chapters (plus 4:7-23) record events during the first part of the reign of Artaxerxes I (464–423 B.C.). No mention is made of Cambyses (530–522 B.C.) or of Smerdis (522 B.C.), and only one verse (4:6) mentions Xerxes (486–465 B.C.). Thus, although eighty important years of Achaemenid Persian history are spanned by the Book of Ezra, practically nothing is said of the fifty-eight-year period between 515 B.C. and 457 B.C., during which time the Persians made two great but futile efforts to conquer Greece, and the events of the book of Esther occurred.

As the scene opens in Ezra 1, the Jews have just seen the overthrow of the hated Neo-Babylonian Empire, in 539 B.C., by Cyrus the Persian. And Daniel has just been put into a place of honor by Darius the Mede, whom Cyrus appointed to rule over the Neo-Babylonian territories (Dan 5:30–6:3).

COMMENTARY

I. The Exiles' Return from Babylon. 1:1—2:70.

A. The Decree of Cyrus. 1:1-4. God fulfilled his promises to Israel through Jeremiah that the Captivity would last only seventy years. When that period ended, he raised up Cyrus the Persian to conquer the Babylonians, who had enslaved the Israelites. One of Cyrus' first public acts as the new king of Babylon was to encourage the Jews to return to Palestine to rebuild the ruined house of Jehovah.

1. Now in the first year of Cyrus. These words, and those that follow, to the middle of verse 3, are identical with those that conclude II Chronicles. The two books are thus connected by a common link. It is quite possible that Ezra wrote I and II Chronicles. Cyrus, who, by 550 B.C., had welded the Medes and the Persians into a dual monarchy, finally conquered Babylon in October, 539 B.C. The word of the LORD by . . . Jeremiah. It was in 605 B.C. that Jeremiah had prophesied the seventy-year captivity of Judah (Jer 25:12; cf. 25:1). And it was this prophecy that caused Daniel to pray for the deliverance of his people in the year of Babylon's fall (Dan 9:2).

2. The LORD . . . hath charged me to build him an house at Jerusalem. Nearly two hundred years earlier, Isaiah had prophesied that Cyrus would be God's chosen instrument for liberating the Jewish exiles and initiating the restoration of the Temple (Isa 44:28—45:7; 45:13). It is not necessary to assume that the liberator was a true believer (cf. Isa 45:4—"I have surnamed thee though thou hast not known me"). The famous cuneiform Cyrus Cylinder records this prayer of the Persian king: "May all the gods whom I have resettled in their sacred cities ask daily Bel and Nebo for a long life for me . . . " Cyrus probably recognized the God of Israel as one of the most important deities, especially if Daniel showed him the prophecies of Isaiah (Jos Antiq. 11.1.1). This decree was filed in Ecbatana, where Darius I discovered it twenty years later (Ezr 6:2).

B. Preparations for the Journey. 1:5-11. Thousands of godly Jews heeded the summons of Cyrus and made preparations for the long journey. And many of the vessels that Nebuchadnezzar had taken from the Temple were handed over to the Jews to be restored to Jerusalem.

6. And all they that were about them strengthened their hands. Only about 50,000 Jews returned (cf. 2:64,65). The majority decided to remain in Babylonia, where many were well settled (Jer 29:4-7). Thus, they were in a position to help those who did return. Gentiles, too, probably gave gifts (cf. Ex 12:35,36).

7. The vessels of the house of the LORD. Some vessels were taken to Babylon in 605 B.C. (Dan 1:2), some in 597 B.C. (II Kgs 24:13), and the rest in 586 B.C. (II Kgs 25:14,15; Jer 27:16-22). Those which Cyrus did not send back at this time were restored to the Temple by Darius I about 518 B.C. (Ezr 6:5). However, the furniture of the Temple, including the ark of the covenant, was destroyed in 586 B.C. (Jer 3:16; II Kgs 25:13). 8. Sheshbazzar, the prince of Judah. Even as Daniel was known in Babylon officially as Belteshazzar (Dan 1:7), so Zerubbabel was probably known as Sheshbazzar. We know that Zerubbabel laid the foundation of the Temple (Ezr 3:8; 5:2; Zech 4:9); but in an official letter to Darius, "Sheshbazzar" is said to have done this (5:16). Zerub-babel was a grandson of King Jehoiachin (Jeconiah; I Chr 3:17-19) and an ancestor of Joseph (Mt 1:12). The fact that I Chr 3:19 calls him the son of Pedaiah instead of Shealtiel (Ezr 3:2) suggests that Shealtiel died childless and Pedaiah contracted a levirate marriage with his brother's widow. 11. Five thousand and four hundred. The 2,499 vessels listed in 1:9,10 may have been the largest or most important ones.

C. Those Who Returned. 2:1-70. The list is divided into eight groups: Zerubbabel and his companions (vv. 1,2); Jewish families (vv. 3-19); Palestinian towns (vv. 20-35); priests (vv. 36-39); Levites (vv. 40-42); Nethinim (vv. 43-54); Solomon's servants (vv. 55-58); those with uncertain genealogies (vv. 59-63). The section ends with a list of totals (vv. 64-67), and a brief statement of their arrival and the gifts they gave to the Temple (vv. 68-70).

2. Which came with Zerubbabel: Jeshua, Nehemiah . . . According to Neh 7:7, there are twelve in this group of leaders. Jeshua, or Joshua, was the high priest (3:2), grandson of the high priest Seriah, whom Nebuchadnezzar slew at Riblah (II Kgs 25:18-21; cf. I Chr 6:14). The Nehemiah listed here is not, of course, the same as the famous governor of eighty years later.

3-19. Many of these names appear again in Ezra 8 and 10 and Nehemiah 10. Thus, we have here not the names of individuals living at this time, but of families that were old and well established. Some members of these families returned with Zerubbabel in 536 B.C., and the rest came later with Ezra. 20-35. Most of these towns appear elsewhere in the OT.

36-39. Jedaiah is probably the name of a family head in the high-priestly family of Jeshua, who descended from Eleazar, the third son of Aaron. Immer is the name of the third order of priests (I Chr 24:14). Pashur is possibly of the family of Malchijah, the fifth order of priests (I Chr 24:9; cf. I Chr 9:12; Neh 11:12). Harim is the name of the third order of priests (I Chr 24:8). 40-42. Three classes of Levites are mentioned: (1) regular Levites, who assisted the priests; (2) singers; and (3) porters, or doorkeepers. Only 341 Levites returned, as compared with 4,289 priests. Ezra found a similar reluctance to return on the part of the Levites of his day (Ezr 8:15). This is not easy to explain.

43-54. The Nethinims were probably descendants of the Gibeonites, whom Joshua made subject to taskwork (Josh 9). 55-58. The children of Solomon's servants were doubtless the descendants of his prisoners of war. They were like the Nethinim and were counted with them (v. 58).

59-62. Three families of common people (vv. 59,60) and three families of priests (vv. 61,62) could not prove their relationship to the nation through genealogical records, and were therefore excluded officially, although permitted to accompany the true Jews on this journey.

63. The Tirshatha. This was a Persian title, possibly meaning "his excellency." It here refers to the governor, Zerubbabel. In Neh 8:9 the same title is applied to Nehemiah. Till there stood up a priest with Urim and with Thummim. In Ex 28:30, the Urim and Thummim are designated as part of the high priest's ceremonial dress. They were used in some way to determine the will of God. But it seems that God's will could no longer be determined in this way after the departure of the Shekinah glory in 592 B.C. (Ezk 8–11). Zerubbabel's earnest hope (and that of all godly Jews) that this tragic situation would not long continue was, of course, not fulfilled, and the problem of the six families was left unsolved.

64-67. This total of 42,360 is identical with that of Neh 7:66; but the actual numbers in Ezra 2 come to only 29,818, and the numbers in Nehemiah 7 total only 31,088. In the transmission of OT numbers, changes and omissions sometimes occur through repeated copying; perhaps that is the explanation of this discrepancy. Singing men and singing women (v. 65). Non-Israelites who were hired for festivities and lamentations, in addition to Levitical singers.

68-70. They came to the house of the LORD. An interesting expression, suggesting that it had continued to be in Jerusalem even after its destruction in 586 B.C.! Cf. Jer 41:5; Hag 2:9 (ASV). Threescore and one thousand drams of gold. See notes on parallel passage, Neh 7:70-72. All Israel in their cities. Cf. Ezr 2:2b. It is certain that all twelve tribes were represented in this expedition, for refugees from the northern tribes had been pouring into Judah for centuries before the Babylonian captivity.

II. Temple Building Begun. 3:1—4:24.

A. The Altar and the Foundation. 3:1-

13. Soon after reaching the Promised Land, the Jews made provision for offering sacrifices. The following spring the foundation for the second Temple was laid, with great ceremony and mixed emotions.

1. And when the seventh month was come. This was the first day of the month (v. 6), the Feast of Trumpets (Num 29:1-6), a foreshadowing of Israel's final regathering. Assuming a two-year delay in the beginning of the journey from Babylon after Cyrus' decree, this would have been September 25, 536 B.C. The laying of the temple foundation the following spring would thus have brought to an official close the seventy-year captivity predicted by Jeremiah, from 605 to 535 B.C. (Jer 25:1-12). 3. Fear was upon them because of the people of those countries. Therefore, they were fully aware of their need of God's protection. Contrast the paganism of II Kgs 17:24-34. That their fears were not exaggerated may be seen in the following chapters of Ezra. 4. They kept also the feast of tabernacles. This feast lasted from the fifteenth to the twenty-second of the seventh month, just two weeks after the Feast of Trumpets. Cf. Num 29:13 ff. The Day of Atonement, on the tenth day of the seventh month, is not mentioned in this chapter.

7. To bring cedar trees from Lebanon to the sea of Joppa. Compare Solomon's gathering of materials, more than 500 years earlier (II Chr 2:16 and context). According to the grant . . . of Cyrus. The full terms of this grant are found in 6:3-5.

8. Now in the second year . . . in the second month. May-June 535 B.C. See notes on Ezr 3:1. Levites, from twenty years old and upward. Whereas twenty-five was the minimum age for tabernacle service for Levites (Num 8:24; 4:3), the age was only twenty for temple service (I Chr 23:24; II Chr 31:17). There were 24,000 Levites appointed to oversee the work of Solomon's Temple (I Chr 23:4), whereas now there were only 341 altogether! (Ezr 2:40-42) 9. Jeshua . . . Kadmiel . . . Judah . . . Henadad. For Judah substitue the ASV marginal reading, Hodaviah. Thus, the first three names here are the same as in 2:40, and represent special Levitical families placed in charge of the temple workmen.

10. The priests in their apparel with trumpets, and the Levites . . . with cymbals. This was the same order observed when the ark was brought to Jerusalem in David's time (I Chr 16:5,6; cf. Num 10:8). 11. And they sang together. One to another (ASV), antiphonally. The very psalm sung on this occasion (cf. Ps 136:1) suggests that they were thinking in terms of Jeremiah's great prophecy (Jer 33:11). And all the people shouted with a great shout. Their joy was overwhelming, for the prayers and hopes of decades of captivity were now being fulfilled before their very eyes.

12,13. But many . . . wept with a loud voice; and many shouted aloud for joy. Fifty years had passed since the first Temple had been destroyed, and many of the older men who had seen it wept now because of the sad contrast in size and grandeur of design. And what a contrast this was to the glorious Millennnial Temple prophesied by Ezekiel, the Jews of this period knew all too well! When work on the second Temple was renewed in 520 B.C., there were still some of these old men living who wept again (Hag 2:3).

B. Opposition to the Work. 4:1-24. No sooner had the foundation been laid than the Jews' troubles began. First came the temptation to compromise their testimony. When they had successfully resisted this, active opposition began, and it continued intermittently from the days of Cyrus to the days of Artaxerxes.

1. The adversaries of Judah and Benjamin. These two tribes are mentioned in particular because they now constituted the majority of the nation, and it was largely in their old territories that the remnant now lived. 2. Since the days of Esar-haddon. Isaiah had prophesied that the northern ten tribes would cease to be a distinct people within sixty-five years. Since he prophesied this in 734 B.C. (Isa 7:8), it was fulfilled by 669 B.C., within the reign of the Assyrian king, Esar-haddon (680–668 B.C.), who was responsible for transplanting foreigners into Samaria (II Kgs 17:24). These foreigners intermarried with Israelites, and it was their descendants who now approached Zerubbabel saying, "We seek your God, as ye do." This proposal was the more dangerous since it came under the guise of true religion (II Cor 11:15; cf. II Cor 6:17).

3. We ourselves together will build. That is, the people of Jehovah, as contrasted with "the people of the land" (v. 4). Zerubbabel clearly saw the impossibility of accepting pagans on an equal basis with true Jews in the building of Jehovah's Temple. These Samaritans revealed their true character when, after further rejections, they built their own temple on Mount Gerizim (Jn 4:20-22).

4. Weakened the hands of the people of Judah. The prophet Jeremiah was accused of doing this in his day (Jer 38:4). 5. Hired counsellors against them. Could this have been in the court at Shushan (Susa)? If this was 535 B.C., then probably Daniel was no longer living, and there was no influential Jew interceding for the nation at the Persian court. All the days of Cyrus king of Persia, even until the reign of Darius king of Persia. This means the remaining years of Cyrus (535–530 B.C.), the reign of Cambyses (530–522 B.C.), the short reign of Smerdis (522 B.C.), and until the second year of Darius I (521/520 B.C.). After the parenthetical history of opposition (vv. 6-23), the present history is resumed (v. 24).

6. Now begins a parenthesis in the main story, which tells of similar opposition to the Jews in the days of Xerxes (486–465 B.C.) and Artaxerxes (464–423 B.C.). Since Ahasuerus (Heb., 'ăḥashwērôsh) is mentioned, in verse 6, after the Darius of verse 5, and has the same name as the king of the Book of Esther, it should have been obvious to the older commentators that this was Xerxes (see ASV margin). An accusation. The same root word in Hebrew as for Satan, "the accuser" (I Chr 21:1; Job 1:6). This written accusation to Xerxes in 486 B.C. is referred to nowhere else in the OT.

7. Bishlam, Mithredath, Tabeel were probably Samaritans who hired two high Persian officials–Rehum the chancellor and Shimshai the scribe (v. 8)–to write the letter of 4:11-16 to Artaxerxes accusing the Jews of rebuilding the walls of Jerusalem. Tabeel (God is good) may be the same as Tobiah (Jehovah is good) in Neh 2:19. Written in the Syrian tongue. This was Aramaic, the commercial language of the Fertile Crescent during the first millennium B.C. Not only is the letter of 4:11-16 written in Aramaic, but also the entire section of Ezra from 4:8 through 6:18. It is very similar to the Aramaic of the Elephantine papyri. 9. Apharsathchites. Cf. 5:6. Keil believed these were a race specially devoted to the Persian king, who took a prominent position among the settlers in Syria. Some of the other races are difficult to identify, though most of them probably came from the regions of Babylonia, Persia, and Media (cf. II Kgs 17:24). 10. The great and noble Asnapper. The great Assyrian king Ashurbanipal (668–626 B.C.), who completed the transplanting of peoples into Samaria that Esar-haddon (v. 2) had begun a year or two earlier. And at such a time. Literally, and so forth. This abbreviation of the customary lengthy salutation appears again in 4:11, 17; 7:12.

12,13. The enemies of the Jews here profess great concern for the welfare of the Persian king. Their report of the progress on the walls (v. 12) is obviously exaggerated, in the light of verse 13. Nevertheless, it seems clear that some effort had been made to rebuild the walls of Jerusalem, possibly through Ezra's enencouragement (see note on v. 23). The building of the Temple is not under consideration in this letter, for it had been completed in 515 B.C. (6:15). The rebellious and the bad city. Cf. 4:15. Jerusalem had certainly proved to be such under the tragic reigns of Jehoiakim (II Kgs 24:1) and Zedekiah (II Chr 36:13). And as far as the Assyrians were concerned, it was so in the days of Hezekiah and Manasseh (II Chr 32;33).

14. We have maintenance from the king's palace. Literally, We eat the salt of the palace (ASV). They were in the king's pay. 15. The book of the records of thy fathers. See Esther 6:1, where Darius' father, Xerxes, consults "the book of the record of the chronicles." These may have included chronicles of Assyrian and Babylonian as well as Persian history.

20. There have been mighty kings also over Jerusalem. While David and Solomon were Jerusalem's greatest kings, such monarchs as Asa, Jehoshaphat, Uzziah, and Hezekiah had certainly left their mark upon ancient Near Eastern history. 21. Until another commandent shall be given from me. This final clause left the door open for the king to change his mind, as we find in Nehemiah 2! Truly this was providential, for the laws of the Medes and Persians changed not!

23. Made them to cease by force and power. It is clear that the Samaritans took full advantage of this decree, and even went to the extreme of partially destroying the walls that had been built, and burning the gates. It was news of this disaster that so shocked Nehemiah and forced him into mourning and prayer (Neh 1:3,4). We may thus date this decree at about 446 B.C. Ezra's relation to the entire crisis is not indicated in Scripture, although he was certainly in favor of walls being built for the city (Neh 12:36). 24. Then ceased the work of the house of God. This follows the parenthesis of 4:6-23, and harks back to verse 5, with the additional information that it was in the second year of Darius that work on the house of God (not the city walls) was resumed (5:2). Older commentators, thinking that 4:24 had to follow 4:23 chronologically, were forced to interpret Ahasuerus in 4:6 as Cambyses, and Artaxerxes in 4:7 as Smerdis!

III. The Building Completed. 5:1–6:22.

A. Work Resumed. 5:1-5. After fifteen years of stagnation, the work on the Temple was resumed under the impetus of powerful preaching from Haggai and Zechariah. Even Tatnai's challenge did not stop the work.

1. The prophets, Haggai . . . and Zechariah. The name of Haggai's father is omitted here and likewise in his book. Zechariah's grandfather was Iddo, his father being Berechiah (Zech 1:1). Haggai's ministry began on August 29, 520 B.C. (Hag 1:1), but Zechariah did not begin his ministry until October-November. 2. Began to build the house of God. Work on the Temple was renewed only three weeks after Haggai began preaching! This was September 20, 520 B.C. (Hag 1:14,15). Zerubbabel is highly honored in the book of Haggai and in Zechariah 4, while Jeshua is honored in Zechariah 3 and 6.

3. Tatnai, governor on this side the river. This was the Persian satrap for the entire region west of the Euphrates. From 539–525 B.C., not only this region, but Babylonia as well, was ruled by Darius the Mede. Shethar-boznai was probably Tatnai's aide or secretary, as Shimshai later was to Rehum (4:9). To make up this wall. The wall of the Temple is referred to here (cf. 5:8). 4. See the ASV for the Jews' answer to Tatnai. Verses 9,10 contain Tatnai's full question, which explains the answer of 5:4. But the full answer of the Jews to Tatnai's challenge is found in verses 11-16. 5. The eye of their God was upon the elders. A clear evidence of God's providence. (For a similar and more frequent phrase, see 7:6.) Since it probably took a year to hear from Darius again, it would have been a severe blow to the Jews to stop their work in the meantime.

B. Tatnai's Letter to Darius. 5:6-17. Tatnai, the Persian satrap, then wrote to Darius the king, telling of his challenge and the Jews' answer, and asking for a verdict on the basis of Cyrus' decree.

8. The house of the great God. This letter is concerned exclusively with the Temple, in contrast to the letter of 4:12-16, which was written about seventy years later (see notes). 11-13. The letter now quotes the Jews' answer to Tatnai, in which they relate the history of their Temple from its completion in 960 B.C. to its destruction in 586 B.C., and Cyrus' decree for rebuilding it in 538 B.C.

16. The same Sheshbazzar . . . laid the foundation of the house of God. Cf. 1:8; 5:14. Another name for Zerubbabel, because Zerubbabel laid the temple foundations in 3:8-10. Since that time even until now hath it been in building. The Hebrew wording here does not preclude interruptions in the work (E. J. Young, An Introduction to the OT, p. 373). The point is, that there had been no official "cease-work" decree from the Persian court (contrast 4:23) from the days of Cyrus to the present. 17. Even if Cyrus' decree was found, and was favorable, Tatnai probably hoped for a reversal from Darius, the founder of a new branch of the Achaemenid dynasty (see notes on 6:1,2).

C. Decrees of Cyrus and Darius. 6:1-12. Darius not only succeeded in discovering Cyrus' decree concerning the Jews and their Temple, but made one of his own, ordering Tatnai to help the Jews in their work and threatening those who altered the decree.

1,2. The house of the rolls . . . in Babylon. . . . at Achmetha. Keil points out that the vast complexity of the Persian Empire and the general confusion that accompanied the shift of royal power from the line of Cyrus to the line of Darius in 521 B.C. help to explain why some earlier decrees would have been forgotten. But it is a tribute to the efficiency of the Persian administration that records were safely filed in an elaborate network of archives centering in Babylon and reaching to branch libraries as far distant as Achmetha (Ecbatana), capital of the old Median empire. The rolls (v. 1) should be translated archives (ASV). But a roll (v. 2) means a papyrus or leather scroll (different Hebrew word), instead of the usual clay tablet. Possibly all the ancient scrolls were stored in the library at Ecbatana because the air was not so hot and humid there as it was in Babylon.

3. For an explanation of the differences between this decree of Cyrus and that of Ezra 1, see E. J. Young (op. cit., p. 372). While that was a public proclamation, this was a more detailed official counterpart for the archives. The height thereof threescore cubits. The porch of Solomon's Temple was twice this height (II Chr 3:4).

8. Moreover I make a decree. Not only did Darius warn Tatnai to leave the Jews alone because of Cyrus' decree, but he also added one of his own which must have stunned Tatnai and his companions. Of the tribute beyond the river . . . expenses be given unto these men. Cf. 6:4. This probably cut into Tatnai's own pocketbook, for he took his share from the tribute. 10. Offer sacrifices . . . unto the God of heaven, and pray for the life of the king. Darius could easily say this without abandoning his polytheism. Praying for kings is implied in Jeremiah's command to Jewish exiles (Jer 29:7). Carl F. Keil (The Books of Ezra, Nehemiah, and Esther, p. 87) shows that this was done in later centuries too (I Maccabees 7:33; 12:11; Jos Antiq. 12.2.5). 11. Let timber be pulled down . . . let him be hanged thereon. Keil cites Herodotus (III. 159) as saying that Darius impaled 3,000 Babylonians after conquering their city. Therefore this was no idle threat! Let his house be made a dunghill. Cf. Dan 2:5; 3:29; II Kgs 9:37.

D. The Temple Finished. 6:13-22. With the help of secular rulers and godly prophets, the Jews finished their Temple within five years, and dedicated it to Jehovah with great joy. A month later, multitudes gathered in Jerusalem to celebrate the Passover and the Feast of Unleavened Bread.

14. The commandment of Cyrus, and Darius, and Artaxerxes king of Persia. Ezra is careful to add the name of his own king, Artaxerxes, because he helped in the maintenance of the Temple (7:15, 16,21). 15. The third day of the month Adar. That was March 12, 515 B.C., four and a half years after the work was begun in earnest. While the Temple was being built, the events of Zechariah 7 occurred. 17. Solomon offered more than two hundred times as many oxen and sheep at the dedication of his Temple! (I Kgs 8:63)

19. The passover. This was April 21, 515 B.C., just five weeks after the Temple had been dedicated. Beginning with this verse, the text is again in Hebrew. 20. The priests and the Levites were purified together. As one, without exception. Levites replaced heads of families (Ex 12:6) and slaughtered Passover lambs for both laity (who might be unclean) and priests (who were too busy). Cf. II Chr 35:11, 14,15. 21. Two groups of Jews are mentioned here, those who had returned from Babylon, and those who had remained in the land, mixed with the heathen population (II Kgs 17:33). 22. The king of Assyria. Since the Persians now ruled the former Assyrian territories, it could be said that Darius was king of Assyria, even as Cyrus was king of Babylon.

IV. Ezra's Journey to Jerusalem. 7:1–8:36.

A. Ezra Introduced. 7:1-10. Ezra's family connections and personal characteristics, as well as a brief summary of his great journey, are now set forth.

1. Now after these things. Between chapters 6 and 7, fifty-eight years intervene, during which time the events of the Book of Esther occurred. This might explain Artaxerxes' favorable attitude toward Ezra. Ezra the son of Seraiah. Seraiah was high priest in 586 B.C. (II Kgs 25:18). But Ezra must have descended from a younger son of Seraiah, because he is not called "son of Jozadak," as Jeshua is (Ezr 3:2; I Chr 6:14); and therefore his immediate ancestors were not in the high-priestly line. 3. Azariah, the son of Meraioth. To shorten the list, six names have been dropped out between these two (I Chr 6:7-11).

6. This Ezra . . . was a ready scribe in the law of Moses. Scribe. Hebrew soper earlier meant a "secretary." But by Jeremiah's time scribes were already Bible teachers (Jer 8:8), and that is the meaning here. 7-9. The nine-hundred-mile journey took four months—March 27 to July 24, 457 B.C. 10. For Ezra had prepared his heart. See II Chr 12:14; 19:3; 30:19, for similar expressions.

B. Letter of Artaxerxes to Ezra. 7:11-28. Artaxerxes wrote a letter in Aramaic to Ezra, giving him permission to take Jewish volunteers, silver and gold, and temple vessels back to Jerusalem. Also, he made ample provision for temple supplies and ministers, and gave Ezra authority to appoint magistrates and judges.

14. His seven counsellors. Artaxerxes' supreme court (cf. Est 1:14; Herodotus III, 84). To enquire concerning Judah and Jerusalem. It seems that Ezra held a position at the Persian court corresponding to that of Secretary of State for Jewish affairs.

18. And whatsoever shall seem good to thee. Could Ezra have interpreted this to include permission to rebuild the walls of the city? And to thy brethren. His fellow priests. 20-22. Artaxerxes followed the examples of Cyrus and Darius (cf. 6:4,8). The maximum amounts to be given were an hundred talents of silver (about $100,000), an hundred measures (cors) of wheat (625 bushels), an hundred baths of wine and also of oil (580 gallons).

25. Judge all the people that are beyond the river. That is, Jews ("all such as know the laws of thy God"). Teach ye them that know them not. Uninstructed Jews were to be taught the Scriptures. Ezra doubtless suggested to Artaxerxes what the decree should include. The latter provision, in particular, coincided with the scribe's life aim (v. 10).

27,28. Ezra recognized, in this remarkable decree, that Jehovah had turned the king's heart toward His people (Prov 21:1). The beautifying of the Temple was the chief cause for thanksgiving, for the re-establishment of divine worship was the key to revival.

C. The Journey to Jerusalem. 8:1-36. About 1,500 priests and heads of houses started out with Ezra from Babylon. In addition to these, Ezra obtained some Levites and Nethinim from Casiphia. He entrusted the temple treasures to twenty-four priests and Levites. After a time of prayer and fasting, the company began the long journey to Jerusalem. Four months later they arrived at the city, and deposited their treasures at the Temple. They offered sacrifices on the altar and delivered Artaxerxes' commissions to the proper authorities.

2. Gershom . . . Daniel. These heads of priestly houses were descendants of the third and fourth sons of Aaron respectively (see v. 24, n.). Strangely, no total is given for the priests, nor for the family of Hattush, a descendant of King David.

3-14. This list of genealogies is also to be found among the seventeen genealogies in Ezr 2:3-15, except for Joab (v. 9). Of the sons of Zattu and Bani probably should appear in 8:5,10 (LXX and I Esd), matching the same names in 2:8, 10. The fact that the same names appear eighty years apart shows that they are the names of families, not of individuals living in the days of Zerubbabel and Ezra. Some members of these families returned with Zerubbabel, but other members did not return until Ezra's day.

15. There abode we in tents three days. Since they finally left the river Ahava (location unknown, probably a canal) on the twelfth day (v. 31), they must have traveled nine days from Babylon to get there (cf. 7:9). None of the sons of Levi. Only 341 Levites returned with Zerubbabel, compared with 4,289 priests (2:36-42). 17. Iddo the chief at the place Casiphia. This must have been a settlement of Levites and Nethinim. Iddo was probably a Levite. 18-20. A man of understanding. Probably a proper name, Ishsechel, a descendant of Mahli, Levi's grandson (Ex 6:16,19). Sherebiah and Hashabiah are mentioned again in Ezr 8:24 (see note).

21-23. Then I proclaimed a fast. For other OT examples of fasting to obtain answers to prayer, see Jud 20:26; I Sam 7:6; II Chr 20:3; Joel 1:14. This time, no pillar of cloud appeared to lead the pilgrims back to the Holy Land; but the hand of their God was upon them (Ezr 8:22). I was ashamed to require . . . soldiers and horsemen. Ezra gave a good testimony in this way. But the fact that Nehemiah did have an escort (Neh 2:9) only proves that our lives and circumstances before God are never identical. He was intreated of us. Ezra thus looks back upon a safe and successful journey.

24. Sherebiah, Hashabiah, and ten of their brethren. These are obviously Levites (vv. 18,19), making twelve priests and twelve Levites. None of these twelve priests are named here, but two are named in verse 2. 25-27. See Artaxerxes' decree, 7:14-16. The silver, gold, and precious vessels were worth about $3,000,000. Little wonder, then, that Ezra proclaimed a fast to seek God's protection for the trip!

31,32. They left Ahava on April 8, 457 B.C., and arrived at Jerusalem on July 24 (7:9). Nine hundred miles in four months was about seven miles a day. This was a good average, for there were "little ones" (v. 21), as well as much equipment to be carried. The hand of our God was upon us. Cf. Ezra's testimony, 8:22. Abode there three days. Cf. Neh 2:11. 35,36. What a joy it was for these Jews to offer sacrifices on the true altar of God! Among them were priests and Levites who had never seen Jerusalem or its Temple. Unto the king's lieutenants, and to the governors. These were the satraps and rulers of districts surrounding Judah. Judah at this time, and for many decades afterward, was counted as part of a larger governmental area.

V. The Great Reformation. 9:1–10:44.

A. The Tragic Report and Ezra's Prayer. 9:1-15. When Ezra was advised by the Jewish rulers concerning the mixed marriages that had been entered into in recent years, he collapsed in grief, and his deep distress brought conviction of sin to the hearts of many. His great prayer contained no requests for pardon, but it did provide the proper atmosphere for confession and forsaking of sin on the part of the congregation. He contrasted God's faithfulness with the disobedience of Israel, for which the nation deserved extinction.

1. Now when these things were done. It must have taken several months for the events of 8:36 to be accomplished, for we are now in the month of December (10:9). The princes came to me. All classes of the nation were involved in this recent sinful trend; but since the princes had led in this sin (9:2), they and not the priests came first to Ezra. Five of the seven Canaanite nations are listed here (Deut 7:1; Acts 13:19), as well as three others. These pagan peoples in the land had escaped deportation by Nebuchadnezzar. 2. The holy seed have mingled themselves. Cf. Ex 19:5; Isa 6:13.

3. Plucked off the hair. Tearing of garments was a sign of deep affliction (Lev 10:6; Josh 7:6); but plucking out a portion of the hair and beard was an expression of violent wrath or moral indignation (Isa 50:6; Neh 13:25). Ezra fully realized that because of the holiness of God, such grave sin could only lead to another period of captivity. 4. Every one that trembled at the words of the God of Israel. Cf. 10:3; Isa 66:2,5; Ps 119:120,161. A man's attitude toward God's Word is one of the ultimate criteria of his spirituality.

8. And now for a little space. Literally, for a little moment. Eighty years in the Holy Land seemed like a short time compared with the centuries of sufferings under the Assyrians and Babylonians (cf. Neh 9:32). A nail in his holy place. Cf. Isa 22:23. The Temple was a nail that upheld the community. That our God may lighten our eyes. Cf. Ps 13:3; I Sam 14:27,29. 9. For we are bondmen (ASV). No well-taught Jew thought that the Millennial Age had dawned when Zerubbabel's remnant returned to Palestine (cf. Isa 14:1-3). To give us a wall in Judah and in Jerusalem. Wall here is figurative, like "nail" in 9:8. The Hebrew word gâdēr means a wall or fence of a vineyard, built for its protection (Isa 5:2,5). Since the kings of Persia protected them, they were in this sense a 'wall' between Judah and her enemies.

B. The Abandonment of Mixed Marriages. 10:1-17. Ezra's prayer of confession produced the desired effect, and many gathered to him to confess their sin. A proclamation was now issued, that all Jews must report to Jerusalem within three days. However, the complexity of the problem and the inclement weather necessitated a delay in the judicial proceedings. Finally, the guilty Jews were brought to court and were forced to put away their foreign wives.

1. Casting himself down before the house of God. While casting himself down in the court of the Temple, he was still on his knees (9:5). The people wept very sore. The Jews were touched to tears by the sins of the nation, seen now in an entirely new light. Ezra accomplished far more by loving heart-concern than he ever could have done by mere force.

6. The chamber of Johanan the son of Eliashib. Josephus (Antiq. 11.5.5) states that Joiakim (Neh 12:10) was high priest when Ezra arrived in Jerusalem. His son, the Eliashib of this verse, was high priest in Nehemiah's day (Neh 13:4,7). Since Neh 12:10 states that Johanan (Jonathan) was Eliashib's grandson, we may say that the Johanan of our verse was a younger brother of Joiada, Eliashib's son. In honor of his brother, Joiada named his own son Johanan, too. It is quite reasonable to suppose that the grandson of the high priest Joiakim would have had a chamber in the Temple in Ezra's day. 8. All his substance should be forfeited. Literally, devoted. This probably meant not destruction, as of an idolatrous city (Deut 13:12-17), but appropriation for the benefit of the Temple (Lev 27:28).

9. On December 8, 457 B.C., vast multitudes of Jews, unable to crowd into the small city (cf. Neh 7:4), gathered in the open space in front of the water gate at the southeastern corner of the temple court (Neh 3:26; 8:1,3,16; 12:37) to hear Ezra's solemn message (Ezr 10:10,11). Trembling because of this matter, and for the great rain. Two factors created much discomfort among the people: an overwhelming fear of God's wrath upon the nation; and the pouring rain that characterizes the month of December in Jerusalem. 15. Only Jonathan . . . and Jahaziah . . . were employed about this matter. Better, stood up against this matter (ASV). The opposition of these two men and their two supporters may have been based upon sympathy for the homes that were now threatened with division. If so, they were not looking at the matter from God's viewpoint, and their opposition fortunately failed.

17. And they made an end . . . by the first day of the first month. Parker and Dubberstein (Babylonian Chronology 626 B.C.—A.D. 75) have shown that there was an intercalary month in this year, so that the examination actually lasted four months instead of three, and ended on April 15, 456 B.C. This was about a year after Ezra's departure from the river Ahava.

C. List of Those with Foreign Wives. 10:18-44. Seventeen priests, ten Levites, and eighty-six men of the congregation of Israel were found guilty, and each put away his foreign wife, after offering a ram for his trespass.

18. All four orders of priests are represented here, proving true the statement of the princes (9:1; cf. 2:36-39). 19. They gave their hands . . . they offered a ram of the flock for their trespass. They entered into a solemn agreement, ratified by pledging the right hand (Prov 6:1; Ezk 17:18), that they would put away their foreign wives. See Lev 5:14-16 for the command to offer a ram for the trespass offering.

44. Some of them had wives by whom they had children. This is mentioned to show how thoroughly the separation was carried out, being far more grievous than parting with childless wives. "Doubtless an adequate provision was made for the repudiated wives and children, according to the means and circumstances of the husbands" (Robert Jamieson, Commentary on Ezra in JFB). A comparison with Neh 10:30 (twelve years later) and Neh 13:23 (about thirty years later) shows that the evil was not permanently eliminated. Long association with heathen neighbors made such clear-cut separation a difficult thing for untaught Jews. But Ezra was God's man for the hour to preserve, at least for that generation, the identity and true testimony of the nation for the ultimate fulfillment of God's purposes.

NEHEMIAH

INTRODUCTION

Title. Like Ezra, the Book of Nehemiah is named after its main character. See the Introduction to Ezra for a discussion of the relation of the Book of Nehemiah to the Book of Ezra, and of these two canonical books to the apocryphal book of Esdras A.

Date and Authorship. The fact that the narrative is written in the first person singular in many places is evidence that the book was written by Nehemiah himself. The places where he is mentioned in the third person (8:9; 10:1; 12:26,47) can be explained in harmony with his authorship. For example, 12:26 and 12:47, which seem to look back to "the days of Nehemiah," are both used in conjunction with the days of someone else. For uniformity of style, it was better to use the third person than to say, "in the days of X and in my days." Furthermore, perhaps Nehemiah had retired from the governorship, and was here looking back on his administration.

Serious objection to the unity of the book has been raised by some because of the mention, in the same chapter, of Jaddua (12:11,22) as the great-grandson of the high priest Eliashib, and of Darius the Persian (12:22). Arguments in favor of dating Jaddua toward the end of the fifth century B.C., and of identifying Darius the Persian as Darius II (423–404 B.C.), are set forth in the notes on 12:22.

The historicity of the book has been well established by the discovery of the Elephantine papyri, which mention Johanan (12:22,23) as high priest in Jerusalem, and the sons of Sanballat (Nehemiah's great enemy) as governors of Samaria in 408 B.C. We also learn from these papyri that Nehemiah had ceased to be the governor of Judea before that year, for Bagoas is mentioned as holding that position.

Historical Background. Artaxerxes I, whom Nehemiah served as cupbearer, was the son of Ahasuerus (Xerxes), who took Esther to be his queen. The Feast of Purim (Est 9:20-32) was instituted on March 8, 473 B.C., only eight years before Artaxerxes I became king. In the spring of 457 B.C., Ezra led an expedition of Jews back to Jerusalem with the blessing of Artaxerxes; and by the following spring, he had completed the examination of those in Judea who had married foreign women (see notes on Ezra 10).

One of the by-products of the revival under Ezra seems to have been an effort on the part of the Jews to rebuild the walls of Jerusalem. This in turn provoked the wrath of Rehum and Shimshai, who wrote an accusation against them to Artaxerxes (Ezr 4:7-16). The king commanded the work to cease until a further decree should be issued (Ezr 4:21). Rehum and Shimshai, upon receiving this decree from the king, hurried to Jerusalem and "made them to cease by force and power," presumably breaking down the wall that had been started and burning the gates (Ezr 4:23; Neh 1:3). It was the news of this fresh disaster that shocked Nehemiah and brought him to his knees before God.

The Book of Nehemiah covers a period of at least twenty years, from December, 445 B.C., to about 425 B.C., when Nehemiah returned from Babylon to cleanse Jerusalem, and the province, of various evils that had crept in during his absence since 432 B.C. The careers of Ezra and Nehemiah overlap, as may be seen in Neh 8:1-9 and 12:26. It is quite probable that Malachi prophesied during the governorship of Nehemiah, for many of the evils he denounced are found to be prominent in the Book of Nehemiah.

It must be said, in conclusion, that no portion of the Old Testament provides us with a greater incentive to dedicated, discerning zeal for the work of God than the Book of Nehemiah. The example of Nehemiah's passion for the truth of God's Word, whatever the cost or consequences, is an example sorely needed in the present hour. May the prayerful study of this book lead more of God's people today to "earnestly contend for the faith which was once delivered unto the saints."

COMMENTARY

I. Nehemiah's Arrival in Jerusalem. 1:1–2:20.

A. Tragic News from Jerusalem, and Nehemiah's Prayer. 1:1-11. Nehemiah hears that Jerusalem's walls and gates have been destroyed, and in great remorse he confesses to God the sins of Israel and prays for deliverance for His people.

1. Nehemiah the son of Hachaliah. This distinguishes him from others of the same name (Ezr 2:2; Neh 3:16), though nothing further is known of his father, nor do we know his tribe. In the month Chisleu, in the twentieth year. This was December, 445 B.C., the twentieth year of Artaxerxes (2:1). In Shushan the palace. In 478 B.C., Esther became Xerxes' queen in this palace (Est 2:8-18); and in 550 B.C., Daniel was carried there in a vision (Dan 8:2). Hanani, one of my brethren. Probably a blood brother (cf. 7:2). 3. The wall . . . is broken down, and the gates thereof are burned. C. F. Keil (The Books of Ezra, Nehemiah, and Esther) and others insist that this refers to the destruction of 586 B.C. But why would Nehemiah have been so shocked about that news? More likely, it was a recent destruction (see Historical Background, and notes on Ezr 4:23).

4-11. For four months (2:1), Nehemiah prayed to God "day and night," (1:6) on behalf of His people. And will bring them unto the place (v. 9; cf. Deut 12:5,11,14). Here Nehemiah is praying not for more exiles to return to Palestine, but for the protection of those already there. Only through God's supernatural protection could the city survive and be restored. I was the king's cupbearer. This was a high and trusted position in the Persian court, for it was the cupbearer's duty to taste the king's wine to see that it was not poisoned. "The cupbearer . . . in later Achaemenid times was to exercise even more influence than the commander-in-chief" (A. T. Olmstead, The History of the Persian Empire, p. 217).

B. The Granting of Nehemiah's Request. 2:1-8. Nehemiah's sadness in the king's presence provokes a crucial question, which leads to Nehemiah's request for permission to go to Jerusalem to rebuild the walls. The king grants not only this request, but also his request for letters of introduction to western governors and for materials to build the gates of the city, palace, and castle.

1. In the month Nisan, in the twentieth year of Artaxerxes. Although this was the first month, it was still Artaxerxes' twentieth year (cf. 1:1), because his official year began in the seventh month—Tishri (October). Wine was before him. This was probably a private banquet, for the queen was present (v. 6). 2. Why is thy countenance sad? . . . Then I was very sore afraid. Nehemiah had reason to fear, for being sad in the king's presence was a serious offense in Persia (cf. Est 4:2). Furthermore, he knew that his request might greatly anger the king. 4. So I prayed to the God of heaven. This brief, silent prayer, backed up by weeks of fasting and petition (1:4-11), brought about one of the most astonishing reversals of royal policy in all history.

5. That thou wouldest send me unto

. . . the city . . . that I may build it. Doubtless Nehemiah knew of the recent decree of Ezr 4:21, with the possibility left open for a further decree concerning Jerusalem. He now asked the king to reverse the first decree. 6. The queen also sitting by him. This was Damaspia. Remembering Esther's testimony, she probably influenced Artaxerxes to favor the request of this Jew. I set him a time. Possibly a short time, later extended; for he remained in Jerusalem twelve years (5:14), and then returned to the king for several years (13:6).

7,8. The letters to the western governors and to Asaph, which the king granted to Nehemiah, probably included his appointment as governor of Judah (5:14). The issuing of these letters, with authority to rebuild Jerusalem and its walls, is almost certainly the decree to "restore and build Jerusalem" which was to begin the seventy weeks of prophetic years of Dan 9:24-27. The king's forest. The Hebrew word for forest is literally paradise, meaning a "park or orchard" (Song 4:13; Eccl 2:5). The palace which appertained to the house. This was the castle that protected the Temple and overlooked the northwest corner of its courts. Hananiah was the governor of this castle (Neh 7:2). Hyrcanus I (134–104 B.C.) built an acropolis here (Jos Antiq. 15.11.4), and still later Herod rebuilt it and named it Antonia. The house that I shall enter into. This was to be the governor's palace.

C. Nehemiah's Survey of the Walls, and His Report. 2:9-20. After traveling to Jerusalem with an armed escort, Nehemiah makes a secret night inspection of the broken walls. He challenges the Jews to rebuild the walls, and answers the insults of enemies.

9. Now the king had sent captains . . . with me. Nehemiah's official position called for a military escort (see notes on Ezr 8:22). These soldiers remained in Jerusalem for his protection (Neh 4:23).

10. Sanballat the Horonite. He was probably from Upper or Nether Bethhoron, about eight miles northwest of Jerusalem. An Elephantine papyrus mentions his sons as being governors of Samaria in 408 B.C. Tobiah the servant, the Ammonite. He may have been an ex-slave in Ammon, or possibly a servant of the Persian king (see note on Ezr 4:7). It grieved them exceedingly. Nehemiah resorts to irony to describe their attitude.

12. I arose in the night . . . neither told I any man. It was wise, with enemies on every hand, to keep his plans secret until he could ascertain the true magnitude of the task. To avoid exciting attention, his companions walked, while he rode a horse or mule. 13-15. Beginning at the valley gate in the southwest corner of the city wall, he moved eastward and then up the Kidron Valley (by the brook). Here his path was broken by collapsed walls, and he was forced to dismount. Circling the city, he entered again by the same gate. 16. The rest that did the work. Probably those who had worked on the recently destroyed walls of Jerusalem.

17. Ye see the distress that we are in. Nehemiah refrained from assigning blame for the situation, and included himself in the general plight. Come, and let us build . . . that we be no more a reproach. Rebuilt walls would end forever the exposed condition of their city, which constantly invited attacks and reproaches from their enemies. 18. Then I told them of . . . the king's words that he had spoken unto me. What a climax this must have been to his speech! None in Israel could deny the direct providence of God in reversing Artaxerxes' decree of Ezra 4:23. The effect was immediate and wholehearted: So they strengthened their hands for this good work. This was August 1, 444 B.C., for the wall was finished fifty-two days later, on September 21 (Neh 6:15).

19. Geshem the Arabian. (Cf. 6:1,2, 6). Probably the governor of Dedan (Olmstead, op. cit., pp. 295, 316), or the chief of some Arab tribe living south of Jerusalem (cf. 4:7). They laughed us to scorn . . . will ye rebel against the king? Cf. 4:1. They sarcastically challenged the Jews to build a wall powerful enough to resist the Persian army, against which they were obviously rebelling! (cf. 6:6) 20. The God of heaven, he will prosper us . . . but ye have no portion . . . in Jerusalem. For its impressive gravity, Nehemiah's reply is comparable to that of Zerubbabel (Ezr 4:3). Only by such uncompromising vigilance could the theocracy be perpetuated.

II. The Building of the Wall. 3:1–6:19.

A. The Workmen and Their Tasks. 3:1-32. Beginning at the northeast corner of the city, and moving in a counterclockwise direction, Nehemiah lists in this chapter eight different gates and their attached sections of wall, together with the men who repaired them. In order, these were: the sheep gate (northeast corner); the fish gate (north); the old gate (northwest corner); the valley gate (southwest corner); the dung gate (south); the fountain gate (southeast corner, near the Pool of Siloam); the water gate (east, near Ophel); and the horse gate (east, near the Temple).

1. Then Eliashib the high priest rose up (cf. Ezr 10:6; Neh 12:10). In later years this old high priest (Jeshua's grandson, and therefore probably in his eighties now) caused much trouble for Nehemiah (13:4). Where was Ezra at this time? Possibly he had made a trip back to Babylon but returned in time for the revival of the seventh month (8:1-18) and the dedication of the wall (12:36c). They sanctified it, and set up the doors of it. Perhaps they dedicated this gate first, in order to sanctify the entire enterprise. On the other hand, 6:1 states that the doors were not set up until later.

5. Their nobles put not their necks to the work of their Lord. It is better to translate lord, referring to Nehemiah. Tekoa was the home town of the prophet Amos.

26. The Nethinims dwelt in Ophel. Ophel is now known to be the hill immediately to the south of that on which the Temple was built. It was also known as Zion, and was the site of the Jebusite stronghold that David captured and made his capital (II Sam 5:6-10).

B. The Opposition of Enemies. 4:1-23. When Sanballat and his allies find that ridicule is not enough to stop the work, they actively conspire against Nehemiah's workmen. Many of the Jews are discouraged, and others fear for their homes and families. But Nehemiah sets up a continual guard so that the work may go forward without delay.

2. Will they fortify themselves? will they sacrifice? In other words, "With their utterly inadequate materials and manpower, do they actually expect to carry through this project? And what is the use of offering sacrifices? God can't help them anyway!" (cf. Isa 36:7,15). Revive the stones . . . which are burned? Limestone is softened by fire and loses its durability (Keil, The Books of Ezra, Nehemiah and Esther, in loc.). 5. Cover not their iniquity. Let them not go unpunished (cf. Ps 85:2,3). Before the builders. These enemies were blaspheming God in the hearing of the builders, to discourage them (cf. Neh 6:5; II Kgs 18:26,27).

7. The Arabians, and the Ammonites, and the Ashdodites. The Arabs were led by Geshem and the Ammonites by Tobiah (2:19). The Ashdodites, who belonged to the Philistine race, were probably easily aroused by Sanballat to fight their old enemies, the Jews. 8. Conspired all of them together to come and to fight against Jerusalem. It was now obvious that it would take more than ridicule (v. 2) and foxes (v. 3) to stop the work! Therefore they planned to attack, as in Ezr 4:23, "by force and power." But the attack had to be secret (conspired) because of Artaxerxes' favorable decree. 9. We made our prayer . . . and set a watch. Under the circumstances, prayer and watchfulness were an excellent combination, blending faith and responsibility.

10,11. We are not able. The combination of discouragement from overwork and fear of invasion plots was almost too much for God's people. 12. The ASV is better here: They said unto us ten times from all places, Ye must return unto us. Jews in outlying towns (3:2,5,7) wanted their workmen to quit the wall-building project and help defend their families against the threats of their enemies.

13,14. Be not ye afraid of them. Apparently Nehemiah brought these Jews and their families into the city. He placed them in open spaces behind the wall, and supplied them with weapons so that they could protect their families as well as the city. 15. Our enemies heard that it was known. The enemies must have abandoned their plan to attack when they saw the alerted Jewish guards on the wall. The crisis now past, work on the wall could continue.

16. The half of my servants wrought in the work. These were probably official servants that pertained to Nehemiah as governor (4:23; 5:10,16). Habergeons. Leather coats covered with thin plates of metal. The rulers were behind all the house of Judah. In case of attack, each ruler was prepared to lead his people against the enemy. 17,18. The meaning seems to be that each of the burden-bearers carried a weapon in one hand, while each builder used both hands but kept a sword girded by his side. He that sounded the trumpet. To sound the alarm in case of danger (cf. v. 20). 21. Half of them held the spears. Half of those mentioned in 4:16.

22. Let every one . . . lodge within Jerusalem. Apparently not all workers had been remaining in the city at night. Walking back to their villages not only took valuable time, but left the city exposed to night attacks. 23. None of us put off our clothes. Nehemiah's own servants and his Persian bodyguard set the example of vigilance. The last phrase is obscure in the Hebrew. Keil translates: each laid his weapon at the right; that is, when he slept, his weapon was ready at hand.

C. Reforms of Nehemiah as Governor. 5:1-19. This parenthetical chapter describes how Nehemiah succeeded in stopping the practice of usury, which resulted in extreme poverty and even bondage for many Jews. Throughout his first twelve years as governor, he was an example of unselfishness and generosity toward his fellow Jews.

1. Then there arose a great cry of the people (ASV). It is possible that this occurred during the fifty-two days of wall building, because of the interruption of normal trade; but the calling of a great assembly (v. 7) and the wording of verse 14 suggest a later period, in spite of the position of the chapter. 2-5. There were that said. This phrase divides the complainers into three classes: (1) large families without property; (2) families with property, which were in the process of mortgaging it; and (3) those who were borrowing money to pay tribute by pledging their crops, and being unable to repay, were forced to sell their children into slavery. For the laws on loans, pledges, and Hebrew debt slaves (who had to be released after six years, or on the year of jubilee), see Ex 21:2-11; Lev 25:10-17,39-55; Deut 15:7-18.

7. Ye exact usury, every one of his brother. "The lending of money, etc., at interest is not regarded in the Bible as wrong in itself (Deut 23:19,20; Matt 25:27), but it was forbidden as between one Israelite and another (Ex 22:25), since the money was borrowed for the relief of distress and not for the development of trade" (J. Stafford Wright, New Bible Commentary). 8. Will ye even sell your brethren? Nehemiah and others who honored the Law had redeemed their Jewish brethren who had been sold to heathen masters. But these usurers had sold their brethren to the heathen in defiance of the Law! (Lev 25:42) 9. Because of the reproach of the heathen. The constant scrutiny and hatred of enemy nations constitute a powerful motive for blameless and consistent living.

11. Nehemiah appealed to the wealthy Jews to restore immediately the property they held in pledge (v. 5 c) and also to cease exacting from their Jewish debtors the hundredth part of the money (probably 1 per cent a month, or 12 per cent a year, like the Roman "centesima"). Thus their "brethren" would find it possible to start paying off on the principal.

12,13. Took an oath of them. Like Ezra before him (Ezr 10:5), Nehemiah insisted upon confirming verbal promises by an oath administered by priests. This time it is emphasized by a graphic symbolic act of warning against transgressors (cf. Acts 18:6), and confirmed by the "Amen" of the entire congregation, most of whom doubtless benefited by this overdue reform.

14. I and my brethren have not eaten the bread of the governor. Just before the close of his first administration as governor of Judea (cf. 13:6), Nehemiah recalled that for twelve years (444–432 B.C.), because of the prevailing poverty (v. 18), neither he nor his household demanded their rightful salaries from the people. Though wealthy, the governor had sacrificed much for Israel. 15. But the former governors . . . were chargeable unto the people. These were probably Persians who didn't fear God (cf. 15 c). We may be sure he was not including Zerubbabel in this indictment of former governors! Forty shekels of silver. "This (like the interest of vs. 11) is probably to be reckoned for the month. The former governors had received their table and 480 shekels a year as salary. The 480 shekels would be only $360 in amount of silver; but this would represent in value a large official salary in that day" (Howard Crosby, Lange's Commentary on the Holy Scriptures, in loc.).

16. Neither bought we any land. Nehemiah did his share of work on the wall, and gained no mortgages of land through loaning money and grain (v. 10). 17. Nehemiah regularly entertained 150 table guests, besides those Jews who came from surrounding nations and as yet had no place to live in the city. All this was at his own expense. Queen Jezebel entertained 400 prophets of Asherah "at her table," i.e., provided for their support (I Kgs 18:19). 18. One ox and six choice sheep. Contrast I Kgs 4:22,23, where it is recorded that Solomon served thirty oxen and one hundred sheep daily. Times had definitely changed! 19. Think upon me, my God, for good. Cf. 13:14,22,31.

D. The Wall Finished Despite Intrigues. 6:1–7:4. Failing to trap Nehemiah into coming up to Ono for a conference, Sanballat sends an open letter to Jerusalem accusing Nehemiah of claiming kingship. He also tries to frighten Nehemiah into fleeing into the Temple. But in spite of false prophets and false brethren, the wall is finally finished, to the dismay of the enemy; and special guards are set over the city.

2. One of the villages in the plain of Ono. Trying to appear impartial by leaving the choice of village to Nehemiah, Sanballat and Geshem tried to lure the governor twenty miles northward to certain death or kidnapping. 3,4. I am doing a great work. Nehemiah saw his task in its true light. His presence in Jerusalem was desperately needed for the completion of the wall, to say nothing of the futility and obvious danger of a trip to Ono, which lay seven miles east of Joppa.

5. An open letter. To discourage the workmen, this letter of accusation against Nehemiah was made public. Possibly it was written on papyrus and was posted or read aloud in a public gathering place in Jerusalem. 6,7. Sanballat, who was supported by Gashmu (the same as Geshem the Arabian, 2:19), accused Nehemiah of claiming kingship and hiring prophets to support his claims. Perhaps prophets like Malachi were at this very time preaching about Messiah the King, and their messages were purposely twisted by Sanballat to bring Judah into trouble with the Persians. The purpose of the letter was to force Nehemiah to come for an interview to Ono to clear himself of suspicion.

10. As though in fear of Sanballat, the false prophet Shemaiah invited Nehemiah to his home to reveal a plot against the governor's life. He wanted Nehemiah to know that God had revealed Sanballat's plot to him and that the fateful hour would strike that very night. The only real hope, he said, was to flee into the Temple for refuge. 11-13. But this exposed Shemaiah's treachery, for Nehemiah knew that God could not have led him to break the Mosaic injunction against laymen entering the Temple (Num 1:51; 18:7). Such a cowardly act and ceremonial crime would, at the very least, have permanently destroyed his testimony in Israel. Once again, Satan had overstepped himself.

14. The prophetess Noadiah, and the rest of the prophets. So soon after the Captivity was the land again cursed with false prophets! (See Ezk 13 for God's denunciation of false prophets and prophetesses during the Captivity period.) The plot of 6:10-13 was doubtless only one of many that added to the burdens of an already burdened leader. As in Jesus' day, false religious leaders were the most determined and unscrupulous enemies of God's true servants.

15,16. In fifty and two days. The work was finished between August 1, and September 21, 444 B.C. This may seem like an extremely short time; but there were thousands of zealous workmen, the wall had not been completely destroyed (it was mainly a task of repairing breaches; see 6:1), and the gate of Ephraim, which is not mentioned in chapter 3, may not even have been damaged. Nevertheless, it was indeed a tremendous accomplishment, in which the Jews' enemies perceived the hand of God.

17-19. In concluding his account of plots and intrigues, Nehemiah tells of Tobiah's alliance with Jewish nobles through his marriage with a daughter of Shechaniah the son of Arah (Ezr 2:5), and the marriage of his son Johanan with the daughter of Meshullam (Neh 3:4,30). Later, even the high priest entered into an alliance with him (13:4-8). Keil suggests that Tobiah and his son (having genuine Jewish names) were probably descendants of the northern tribes while being related also to naturalized Ammonites (2:10). And Tobiah sent letters to put me in fear. Apparently, some Jewish nobles demonstrated their alliance with Tobiah by delivering to Nehemiah some of his threatening letters, like that of verse 6.

7:1,2. When the wall was finished, Nehemiah set up doors in the various gates (cf. 6:1). He appointed Levitical singers and porters—whose work was usually that of caring for the Temple and the gates of its courts (26:12-19)—to help stand guard at the city gates ("while they stand by, let them shut the doors, and bar them"—v. 3). Then he put his brother Hanani (1:2) and Hananiah, the governor of the castle (on the north side of the Temple, 2:8) in charge of the city.

3. Every one in his watch, and every one to be over against his house. During the night the inhabitants of Jerusalem were to keep watch over the city, presumably one group occupying posts at various parts of the wall and the other standing by their own homes to watch certain sections of the city. 4. Now the city was large and great: but the people were few therein. Although vast crowds assembled in Jerusalem on special occasions (8:1; Ezr 10:9), for several generations Jews had avoided making their homes in a city without walls. See notes on 11:1,2.

III. Civil and Religious Reforms in Jerusalem. 7:5–10:39.

A. List of Jews Who Returned with Zerubbabel. 7:5-73. Now that the wall is completed, Nehemiah lays immediate plans for populating the city with pure Jews. The register of those who returned with Zerubbabel becomes his basis for determining purity of genealogy. Except for verses 70-72, the register is identical with that of Ezr 2:1-70.

70. Five hundred and thirty priests' garments. Literally, thirty priests' garments, and five hundred. Because of the analogy of verses 71 and 72, and because of the unusual word order, the phrase, "pounds of silver," should probably be added to the end of this verse. If this supposition is correct, then Zerubbabel ("the Tirshatha"), some of the chiefs of the fathers, and the rest of the people gave a total of 41,000 drams (darics) of gold, 4,700 pounds of silver, 97 priests' garments, and 50 basins. This agrees with the round numbers of Ezr 2:69, except for the drams of gold, which are exactly 20,000 less than in Ezra.

B. The Reading and Observance of God's Law. 8:1-18. On the first day of the seventh month, Ezra reads the Law to the people. The people weep because of sin, but are reminded by their leaders of the joyous character of this day. The following day the leaders find in the Law that all Jews should observe the Feast of Tabernacles; so that feast is universally celebrated and with great solemnity.

1. The chapter should begin with the last sentence of 7:73: "And when the seventh month came, the children of Israel were in their cities." Ezra 3:1 begins the same way, after the list of those who returned from Babylon; but the occasion, of course, is quite different. The street that was before the water gate. The street (ASV, broad place) was near the southeast corner of the Temple near Gihon Spring in the Kedron Valley. They spake unto Ezra the scribe. Possibly Ezra had been in Babylon during the period of wall construction. But he was the appropriate person to read the Law of God on this occasion, since Nehemiah was a layman.

2. The first day of the seventh month. This was the Feast of Trumpets, which in 444 B.C. fell on September 27. Only a week before, the wall had been completed (6:15). The Feast of Trumpets was the most sacred of the new moons, and commenced the final month of religious festivals (Lev 23:23-25; Num 29:1-6). 3. From the morning until midday. This would have been about six hours, with Ezra's reading of the Law alternating with instructive lectures on the Law by the Levites (vv. 7,8).

4. Ezra the scribe stood upon a pulpit of wood. This is the first mention of a pulpit in the Bible. Behind him stood six (priests?) on his right hand and seven on his left (compare v. 7, where thirteen Levites are said to have participated). 8. So they read . . . distinctly. The word distinctly (Heb., m'pōrōsh) suggests not only an exposition of the Law, but also, possibly, a translation of it into Aramaic (cf. Ezr 4:18).

9. This day is holy unto the LORD your God; mourn not, nor weep. The clear exposition of God's Word (probably portions of Deuteronomy) powerfuly convicted the people of sin and brought forth tears of repentance. But the only day of the year which God had specifically set aside for weeping and sorrow was the Day of Atonement (tenth day of the seventh month). Therefore, their true strength was to be found in the joy of the LORD (v. 10). 12. To make great mirth. Notice the sudden change in emotions from 8:9 to 8:12! Also, cf. Est 9:19.

13-18. The detailed study of the Law of God caused many of the leaders to come to Ezra the next day for further instruction, especially concerning the proper observance of the Feast of Tabernacles (fifteenth to twenty-second of the seventh month). The Jews had observed this great feast for centuries (I Kgs 8:65; II Chr 7:9; Ezr 3:4); but now they realized, from a more careful study of Lev 23:42, that "all that are Israelites born shall dwell in booths." Presumably in past centuries this point had been neglected; so now, for the first time since the days of Joshua the son of Nun, all the congregation . . . sat under the booths (v. 17). Probably the inhabitants of the city built their booths by their own homes, the priests and Levites built in the temple courts, and non-resident laymen in the open places (v. 16).

C. A Public Confession and Covenant. 9:1—10:39. Soon after the Feast of Tabernacles, the people gathered to hear the Word of God again, and to confess their sins to God in a solemn public ceremony conducted by certain Levites. Afterwards, all classes of Israelites entered into a covenant to keep the Law of God, especially with regard to separation from the heathen and the support of the Temple.

1. Just one month after the completion of the wall (6:15) and two days after the Feast of Tabernacles (8:18), the people set aside their mood of joy and gladness in order to acknowledge before God in a public manner the depths of their sins and their sorrow for them (cf. Joel 2:15-17). Sackclothes were penitential garments made of hair. Earth upon them. They put earth on their heads as a sign of deep mourning (I Sam 4:12). 3. One fourth part of the day. For three hours God's Word was read publicly, following which the people joined in a great confession of sin led by the Levites (vv. 5-37). 5. Stand up and bless the LORD your God. The Levites now exhorted the people to join them in the confession of sin which follows.

36. Behold, we are servants this day. This sad confession, like that of Ezr 9:9, affords clear proof that the leaders of post-Exilic Judaism did not regard their return from Babylon as final fulfillment of such prophecies of Israel's restoration to the land as Isa 11:11-16; 14:1,2. 38. And because of all this we make a sure covenant. This written covenant, to which each leader was asked to affix his personal seal, is set forth in detail in 10:29-39. It was simply a renewed effort to keep their part of the Sinai covenant.

10:1-8. Nehemiah the governor and twenty-two priests are listed first. See notes on 12:1-9. 9-13. Of the Levites, Jeshua, Binnui, Kadmiel, and fourteen of their brethren are mentioned. Individual Levites signed in the names of their families, for two of these names appear in 7:43. 14-27. Here forty-four chiefs of the people are listed. Of the thirty-three families that returned from Babylon (Ezr 2), only thirteen are found in this list. Perhaps further subdivisions of families were made during the intervening years.

30,31. Three points in the oath are here stressed: (a) no intermarriage with heathen (Deut 7:3); (b) no commerce on the Sabbath or other holy days (Amos 8:5); (c) faithful observance of the seventh year, the year of release (Ex 23:10, 11; Deut 15:1,2).

32. The rest of the chapter deals with support of the Temple. The third part of a shekel. This was a revival of the Mosaic precept that every man over twenty years old had to pay one half shekel for the support of the Tabernacle (Ex 30:13; cf. Mt 17:24). Perhaps the poverty of the people at this time called for a slightly lowered tax rate. This was in addition to the contributions guaranteed by Artaxerxes (Ezr 7:20-22). 34. Lots were cast to determine the correct order in which the various families would contribute temple supplies. The wood offering was for the continual altar fire (Lev 6:12; cf. Neh 13:31). At times appointed year by year. The order was settled several years in advance. 38,39. And the priest . . . shall be with the Levites, when the Levites take tithes. The Levites, who received tithes, as well as other Jews, were responsible for the support of the priests (Num 18:26-29) and the porters and singers (from among the Levites) who ministered in the Temple. Note how this gracious system of mutual support soon disintegrated and had to be restored by Nehemiah (13:10-14).

IV. Lists of Inhabitants. 11:1—12:26.

Nehemiah's account of how he sought to populate Jerusalem with pure Jews in accordance with the list of those who returned from Babylon (7:4 ff.) having been interrupted by the narrative of the special services of the seventh month (chs. 8—10), is now resumed (11:1,2). Then follows a list of those who dwelt in Jerusalem (11:3-24); a list of the other towns where Jews lived (11:25-36); a list of priests and Levites who returned with Zerubbabel (12:1-9); and a list of high priests, priests and Levites in later years (12:10-26).

1,2. As was stated in 7:4, Jerusalem had few permanent inhabitants, probably because of the dangers of living in an unwalled city (especially after the disaster mentioned in Neh 1:3). Here we are told that those who did live in Jerusalem were mostly princes. Doubtless Nehemiah had taken occasion, during the revival of the seventh month, to encourage others to move into the capital city. The lot was accepted as Jehovah's will in this matter, and those heads of families who willingly acquiesced were blessed by the people. Jerusalem is called the holy city because the Temple was there (Isa 48:2).

3-24. The total number of men living in Jerusalem, exclusive of the Nethinim, was 3,044. If this was one-tenth of the total number of men living in Judea (v. 1), the population had increased considerably during the previous century; for the 50,000 who returned from Babylon with Zerubbabel (Ezr 2:64-67) apparently included women and children.

25-36. Heads of houses are not named for the country districts, but only for the towns in the former territories of Judah (vv. 25-30) and Benjamin (vv. 31-35). Strangely, the towns of Jericho, Gibeon, and Mizpah, though listed in Nehemiah 3, are omitted here.

12:1-9. We have here the names of twenty-two priests and eight Levites who returned with Zerubbabel. Since fifteen of these priests are listed among those who sealed the covenant in Nehemiah's day, we must conclude that they sealed the covenant in the name of their families (10:3-9). In Ezra 2:36-39, only four priestly families are named as having returned with Zerubbabel.

10,11. A genealogy of post-Exilic high priests is given here to provide a comparative chronology. Thus, 12:1-9 lists priests and Levites in the days of Jeshua, while 12:12-26 lists priests and Levites in the days of his high priestly successors. Jonathan is the same person as the Johanan of verses 22,23. For comments on Jaddua, see verse 22. 12-21. The sons of priests listed in verses 1-7, who lived in the days of Joshua's successor, Joiakim. Of Iddo, Zechariah. This is the famous prophet (Ezr 5:1).

22. In the days of Eliashib, Joiada, and Johanan, and Jaddua . . . to the reign of Darius the Persian. It has frequently been assumed that this Jaddua was the high priest who lived at the time of Alexander the Great (Jos Antiq. 11.8.4), and that Darius the Persian was Darius III (335–331 B.C.). But even if Josephus is right that a Jaddua was high priest in Alexander's time (and he is far from trustworthy in his chronology of this period), we are still left with the distinct possibilities that there were two high priests named Jaddua, or that the Jaddua of Neh 12:11,22 lived to be about 100 (the high priest Jehoiada died at the age of 130; II Chr 24:15).

It is quite probable that Nehemiah knew Jaddua as a young man, if not as high priest. There are two lines of evidence to support this. First, the high priest Eliashib must have been over ninety years old when he entered into an alliance with Tobiah (Neh 13:4-9) after Nehemiah's departure for Babylon in 432 B.C., for his grandfather, Jeshua, was high priest in 536 B.C. (Ezr 3:2). Therefore, in 432 B.C. Joiada could have been nearly seventy, Johanan (Jonathan) over forty, and Jaddua twenty. Secondly, Nehemiah expelled from Jerusalem one of Joiada's sons for marrying a foreigner (Neh 13:28), thus demonstrating that Johanan, who was Joiada's eldest son, could have been married long enough to have a twenty-year-old son, Jaddua.

Eliashib lived to such a great age that the four contemporary generations in his high-priestly house are mentioned together in verse 22. This is supported by the fact that "in each of the other lists of the same chapter, the times of only one high priest are mentioned, and at the close of the list, vs. 26, it is expressly stated that the (previously enrolled) Levites were chiefs in the days of Joiakim, Ezra, and Nehemiah" (Keil, p. 147). Furthermore, it is important to observe that the latest date mentioned in the book is the high priesthood of Johanan (v. 23). The fact that Johanan's father Joiada did not retain his high priesthood down into the fourth century B.C. has been proved by the Elephantine papyri, which mention Johanan as being the high priest in 408 B.C. Therefore Nehemiah, who could have lived (even if not as governor) until about 400 B.C., and who might even have seen Jaddua become high priest sometime after 408 B.C., could well have written everything in this chapter and in the book. In the light of these considerations, we may conclude that Darius the Persian was almost certainly not Darius III (335–331 B.C.), but rather Darius II (423–404 B.C.). The verse tells us that the Levites were registered during the lifetime of Eliashib; whereas the priests were registered after Eliashib's death, in the days of Darius the Persian (423–404 B.C. See R. D. Wilson, ISBE, II, 1084).

26. In the days of Nehemiah the governor. Cf. 12:47. It has been claimed that this proves that Nehemiah must have died before the book was finished. "But in reply we may note that the phrase is in each instance used in conjunction with the days of someone else, Jehoiakim (v. 26), Zerubbabel (v. 47). Hence, it would seem natural for Nehemiah to employ a similar phrase with reference to his own time" (E. J. Young, Intro. to the O.T., p. 378. See also above, Date and Authorship).

V. Dedication of Walls and Organization of Temple Services. 12:27-47.

For the dedication of the city wall, Levites, especially the singers, are brought from surrounding villages. Two great processions move from the southwest corner of the wall, and encircle the city, one led by Ezra and the other followed by Nehemiah. Meeting at the Temple, they offer sacrifices and rejoice greatly. The Temple services are then set in order, and its workers are faithfully supported.

27. The story now resumes from 11:2, although no exact date is given for the events about to be recorded. The various time indications might even lead one to date the dedication service seventeen or more years after the completion of the walls! (cf. 13:4 with 13:1; and 13:10,11 with 12:28-30) They sought the Levites out of all their places. According to 11:18, only 284 Levites actually lived in Jerusalem at this time. 28,29. Members of the three Levitical companies of singers (11:17; 12:25 a) receive special mention here because of the importance of music for this great occasion (v. 27 b). The villages of Netophathi. About fifteen miles southwest of Jerusalem (I Chr 9:16). 30. The priests and the Levites purified themselves. By the offering of blood sacrifices (II Chr 29).

31-37. Speaking in the first person again, Nehemiah tells of the two great companies that he gathered at the southwest corner of the city wall (presumably at the Valley Gate) for the purpose of encircling the city and giving public thanks to God on the day of dedication. The first company was led by Ezra and moved eastward and then northward. For both groups the order of procession seems to have consisted first of Levitical singers "that gave thanks" (v. 31), followed by princes (vv. 32,33), then the priests with trumpets (v. 35; cf. 41), and finally Levites with stringed instruments (v. 36).

38-43. The second company moved northward and then eastward to the temple area, followed by Nehemiah. The various gates follow the same order given in chapter 3, except for the gate of Ephraim and the prison gate, which are not mentioned in that chapter (possibly because they were not originally destroyed and did not have to be rebuilt). However, in 3:25 mention is made of "the court of the prison," probably at the southeast corner of the temple area. The two companies seem to have met at the broad place before the water gate (v. 37; cf. 8:1), and from there they entered the Temple to offer their sacrifices (v. 43). Regarding the tremendous joy of this occasion, cf. II Chr 20:27; Ezr 3:13; 6:22.
