44-47. At that time (ASV, on that day). This phrase (cf. 13:1) refers not only to the dedication day, but possibly also to the entire subsequent administration of Nehemiah, which was characterized by reform movements (Keil, op. cit., p. 152). This might help to explain the phrase, "before this," in 13:4. The treasures. The various offerings listed afterward. The tithes. One tenth of the nation's crops went to the support of the Levites. The Levites that waited. A technical verb in Hebrew meaning "ministered" (Deut 10:8). The commandment of David and of Solomon (v. 45). Cf. II Chr 8:14. The Levites sanctified them unto the children of Aaron. The people paid tithes to the Levites, who in turn paid tithes of these tithes to the priests (Neh 10:38; cf. Num 18:25-32).

VI. Nehemiah's Final Reforms. 13:1-30.

The climax of dedication day reforms came with the separation of Israelites from the mixed multitude. During Nehemiah's long absence from Judah, many abuses had crept into the life of the nation, such as Eliashib's alliance with Tobiah, failure of the people to support the Levites, breaking of the Sabbath, and intermarrying with the heathen. But with God's help, Nehemiah valiantly cleansed the nation of these abuses, and established proper religious observances once again.

1-3. On that day. Presumably the same day as in 12:44, and thus the day of dedication. The Ammonite and the Moabite. Separation from heathen nations was the first point emphasized in the covenant the people had made earlier (10:30). Descendants of mixed marriages with these two nations were excluded from the congregation of Israel to the tenth generation. It was needful that the Jews be reminded of this law, for Tobiah was an Ammonite (2:19), and he was already forging strong alliances with prominent Jewish families through marriage (6:18; cf. 13:4-9). Hired Balaam against them. It was a Moabite king who had hired Balaam to curse Israel (Num 22:2-6). The mixed multitude (v. 3). Cf. Ex 12:38. Descendants of mixed marriages with Egyptians and Edomites were permitted full membership in Israel after the third generation (Deut 23:7,8).

4-9. And before this. See notes on 12:27; 12:44. Eliashib the priest . . . was allied unto Tobiah. The word allied can mean nigh of kin (Ruth 2:20), and may refer to a family tie with Tobiah through Meshullam, a priest (Neh 6:18; cf. 3:30). During Nehemiah's absence, Eliashib had turned over to Tobiah a great chamber in the forecourt of the Temple (vv. 5,7-9), where the tithes and offerings of the nation were to be stored (12:44). There Tobiah had a furnished room (v. 8), or even a suite of rooms (note the plural in v. 9), whenever he visited Jerusalem. In all this time was not I at Jerusalem (v. 6). In the year 432, B.C., after governing Judah twelve years (5:14; cf. 2:6), Nehemiah had returned to King Artaxerxes. King of Babylon. Since most of the Jews were still in Babylon, and the king himself was probably there at this time, Nehemiah uses the more restricted title (see note on Ezr 6:22). After certain days. Nehemiah must have been away for several years, for the abuses he found on his return had had time to spread far and wide in Judah (Neh 13:10,15,23). Since Artaxerxes died in 423 B.C., Nehemiah may have returned to Jerusalem about 425 B.C. It is quite possible that Malachi was prophesying during this time (compare 13:12 with Mal 3:8-10).

10-14. Fled every one to his field. In spite of the oath of 10:35-39 (cf. 12:47), the Levites (and presumably many priests as well) were deprived of their rightful support (I Cor 9:8-14). For that reason they had to forsake their temple duties in order to earn their living on farms (Neh 12:29). Then contended I with the rulers (v. 11). It was the duty of the heads of the community to see that tithes, etc., were regularly brought to the Temple (cf. 17,25). I gathered them together, and set them in their place. That is, the Levites were gathered from their villages and were set once again to the performance of their duties.

15-18. While touring the outlying districts of Judah, Nehemiah found men desecrating the Sabbath by busily preparing for sales during the following week in Jerusalem (Amos 8:5). He waited until they came to Jerusalem to sell their products, and then testified against them. Even worse, merchants of Tyre sold dried fish and other products to Jews in the province and in Jerusalem on the Sabbath, leading the Jews to violate the oath they had taken (Neh 10:31 a). Did not your fathers thus? (v. 18) Nehemiah doubtless had in mind the clear warning of Jer 17:21-27, which went unheeded, to the subsequent sorrow of the whole nation.

19-22. At sunset, just before the Sabbath, Nehemiah commanded the main gates to be shut. Presumably during the day of the Sabbath people were permitted to enter and leave the city, but Nehemiah's own guardsmen (4:23) watched the gates to keep merchants out. I will lay hands on you (v. 21). When they defied this measure by setting up bazaars just outside the gates, he put an end to this desecration of the Sabbath by threats of violence (cf. v. 25). After the crisis had passed, it seems that he replaced the special guard with Levites (v. 22), who kept the gates and sanctified the Sabbath by consecrating it as a holy day above ordinary days.

23-27. Journeying to the very frontiers of the province of Judah, Nehemiah discovered Jews who long since had married women of surrounding nations, especially those of Ashdod (a city in Philistia), Ammon, and Moab. This was in spite of the reforms which had been initiated by Ezra about thirty years before, and in spite of the more recent decisions of 10:30 and 13:1-3. Children of these unions could not even speak pure Hebrew. Nehemiah, reacting to this challenge with characteristic zeal, contended with them, and smote certain of them (Deut 25:2), and plucked off their hair (Isa 50:6), and made them swear by God that they would not intermarry with foreigners. In the light of Ezr 10:19, he probably insisted also that these unholy alliances should be dissolved. Though seemingly harsh, such measures were absolutely necessary, as subsequent history has proved. The sad case of Solomon (cf. Neh 12:45) is effectively brought into use at this point. Although he was unique among kings (II Chr 1:12; I Kgs 3:12) and beloved of God (II Sam 12:24), nevertheless foreign wives proved to be his downfall (I Kgs 11:1-8).

28,29. One of the sons of Joiada . . . was son-in-law to Sanballat. We know from 12:22,23 that Johanan was the eldest son of Joiada and the father of Jaddua. Johanan appears in the Elephantine papyri as high priest in 408 B.C. Therefore, the one who married a daughter of Sanballat must have been a younger brother of Johanan. This is an important fact, because it shows that Johanan must have been old enough at this time to have sons of his own, of whom the eldest was Jaddua. See note on 12:22. I chased him from me . . . . because they have defiled the priesthood. This sin deserved special mention, for it was committed against greater privileges. By marrying the daughter of a foreigner, this son of the high priest Joiada had brazenly defied God's covenant of holiness with the Aaronic priesthood (Lev 21:6-8,14,15), and thus richly deserved banishment from the nation. Jos (Antiq. 7,8) tells of a certain Manasseh, brother of the high priest Jaddua, in the days of Alexander the Great, who married a daughter of Sanballat. When the Jewish authorities excluded him from the priesthood, Sanballat established for him a new temple and worship on Mount Gerizim in Samaria. It is true that such a rival temple was later established (cf. Jn 4:20), but Josephus was confused in trying to connect this with the episode recorded in Neh 13:28.

30,31. Nehemiah summarizes his great contributions to the spiritual well-being of his nation. Negatively, foreigners were removed from positions of honor in Israel; and positively, the priests and Levites were reinstated in their proper occupations, and the various offerings for the Temple were resumed. Remember me, O my God, for good. Cf. 5:19; 13:14,22. This prayer was wonderfully answered by the Lord, for Nehemiah's memoirs form a permanent part of the Word of God.

ESTHER

INTRODUCTION

Title. The book is named after its principal character, Esther. This is a Persian name and means star. Her Hebrew name was Hadassah, myrtle (see 2:7).

Date and Authorship. It is quite certain that the book was written after 465 B.C., for the reign of Xerxes (486–465 B.C.) is spoken of in the past tense (10:2). But the author shows too intimate a knowledge of the events of Xerxes' reign and of the furnishings of the palace in Shushan (which was destroyed by fire about 435 B.C.) to permit a date for the book after the time of Artaxerxes I (464–424 B.C.). Although Josephus thought that Mordecai wrote the book, it seems that 10:2,3 excludes this possibility. Nevertheless, the author must have been a Jew who lived in Persia at the time of the events narrated and who had access to the official chronicles of the kings of Media and Persia (2:23; 9:20; 10:2). Purely Persian words and names appear in the book, and its Hebrew style closely resembles that of Ezra, Nehemiah, and Chronicles.

Historicity and Purpose. In spite of the objections that have been raised against the historicity of the book, it gives a perfectly credible account of events that could have occurred during the reign of Xerxes. The statement regarding the extent of Xerxes' dominion (1:1; 8:9) agrees with statements in Herodotus (Histories 3.97,98; 7.9), and it was true of no other Persian king. The great feast of the third year of Xerxes' reign (Est 1:3) harmonizes with the date given by Herodotus (7.8) for the planning of the Persian king's expedition against Greece. The description of his palace (Est 1:6) has been confirmed by archaeological discovery. The taking of a new wife in his seventh year (2:16) fits Herodotus' description of the new interest he manifested in his harem after the disastrous Greek campaign (9.108, 109).

The Feast of Purim, which is mentioned in II Maccabees 15:36 as being observed about 160 B.C., could hardly have been established for no reason at all. The most logical explanation is that it was instituted in commemoration of the events described in this book. The Jews have always accepted the Book of Esther as canonical.

When we turn our attention to the purpose of the book, the question immediately arises as to why all references to prayer, worship, Jerusalem, the Temple, and the name of God are omitted, with the exception of some hints of prayer and providence (Est 4:14; 4:16; 9:31). Some have conjectured that it was too dangerous to worship Jehovah openly in those days and therefore all references to him were carefully excluded from the book. But this tends toward a low view of the inspiration of Scripture. It seems better to conclude that "since these Jews were no longer in the theocratic line, so to speak, the Name of the Covenant God is not associated with them. The Book of Esther, then, serves the purpose of showing how Divine Providence overrules all things; even in a distant, far country, God's people are yet in His hands. But since they are in this distant, far country, and not in the land of Promise, His Name is not mentioned" (Edward J. Young, An Introduction to the Old Testament, p. 349).

Historical Background. As far back as 722 B.C., Israelites from the northern tribes were transplanted as captives to "the cities of the Medes" among other places (II Kgs 17:6). Furthermore, after the conquest of Babylon by Cyrus in 539 B.C., some of the Jews who had been transported to Babylonia by Nebuchadnezzar probably moved eastward to Shushan and other cities in Medo-Persia, as Mordecai did (Est 2:5,6). But of the millions of Jews who had been dispersed throughout the Near East, only about 50,000 chose to return to the Promised Land with Zerubbabel and Joshua in 536 B.C. (Ezr 2:64-67).

According to Ezra 6:15, the second Temple was completed in 515 B.C., in the sixth year of Darius I. It was just thirty-two years later that Xerxes, the son of Darius I, "made a feast unto all his princes and his servants" (Est 1:3). The events of this book cover a period of ten years, from the great feast of Xerxes (483 B.C.) to the Feast of Purim (473 B.C.). Sixteen years after the first Feast of Purim, Ezra led his expedition back to Jerusalem (Ezr 7:9). Thus, the events of this book fit in between the sixth and seventh chapters of the Book of Ezra.

COMMENTARY

I. Vashti Divorced. 1:1-22.

On the last day of a seven-day feast in Shushan the palace, King Xerxes called for Queen Vashti to appear before his drunken nobles to show her beauty. Her refusal provoked the king's wrath, and he followed the advice of Memucan, one of the chief princes, that she be divorced by a public decree. This punishment, the men reasoned, would warn all wives throughout the empire to honor their husbands.

1. In the days of Ahasuerus. This can be none other than Xerxes (486–465 B.C.; cf. Ezr 4:6), the son of Darius I, who attempted to conquer Greece in 481 B.C. He completely failed in this objective as a result of crushing defeats at Salamis (480 B.C.) and Plataea (479 B.C.). This is Ahasuerus which reigned, from India even unto Ethiopia. In order to avoid possible confusion with the father of Darius the Mede, who had the same name (Dan 9:1), the author points to the vast territory over which this Xerxes ruled (cf. 8:9; 10:1). The India referred to was the territory corresponding to the province of Punjab in West Pakistan today, the region west of the Indus River to which Alexander's forces came in their conquests. Herodotus tells us that both India and Ethiopia were subject to Xerxes (3.97,98; 7.9). Over a hundred and seven and twenty provinces. This has been confused with the twenty satrapies listed by Herodotus for Darius I (3.89-94) and the one hundred and twenty satraps appointed by Darius the Mede (Dan 6:1). The word provinces (Heb. medînâ) refers to the smaller governmental units of the empire, such as the province of Judah (Neh 1:3), whereas Herodotus was referring to the larger units, such as the fifth satrapy, which included all of Phoenicia, Palestine, Syria, and Cyprus. But the Book of Daniel speaks of neither of these territorial units, for it merely states that Darius the Mede "set over the kingdom a hundred and twenty satraps" (Dan 6:1, ASV; cf. John C. Whitcomb, Darius the Mede, pp. 31-33).

2. Shushan the palace. Shushan (or Susa) was one of the main capitals of the Persian Empire, the others being Ecbatana (Ezr 6:1-2) and Persepolis. To this city Daniel was once carried in a vision (Dan 8:2); and later Nehemiah served there as Artaxerxes' cupbearer (Neh 1:1; 2:1).

3. In the third year of his reign, he made a feast. This feast (literally, a drinking feast) took place in the year 483/482 B.C., and it was certainly the one referred to by Herodotus (7.8), in which Xerxes laid plans for the great invasion of Greece. The power of Persia and Media, the nobles and princes. In the days of Cyrus, Media was mentioned before Persia (Dan 6:8), but now Persia was far more prominent in the dual monarchy. Power represents the military, while nobles and princes represent the civil rulers. 4,5. During the 180 days

Xerxes discussed war plans with his subordinates and overawed them with the opulence and grandeur of his court. After this, a seven-day feast was held (vv. 3 and 5 probably refer to the same feast) for all the people that were present in Shushan the palace, including the leaders from various provinces who had come for the 180 days of planning (Keil, in loco). The court of the garden of the king's palace. The grounds or park surrounding the palace.

6. The meanings of some of these words are obscure, but the ASV gives the general sense. White and blue cotton hangings (the royal colors; cf. 8:15) were fastened to marble pillars by means of silver rings. Also, there were gold and silver couches (cf. 7:8) upon floors made of inlaid stones of various colors. This strikingly beautiful palace burned to the ground toward the end of the reign of Artaxerxes, the son of Xerxes, about 435 B.C. (A. T. Olmstead, The History of the Persian Empire, p. 352). 7,8. Vessels of gold . . . diverse one from another. Great variety in drinking vessels was a Persian luxury. According to the state of the king. According to the bounty of the king (ASV; cf. I Kgs 10:13). The drinking was according to the law; none did compel. Usually the king pledged his guests to drink a certain amount, but now they could drink as much or as little as they desired.

9-12. On the last day of the feast, the inebriated king (Jud 16:25; II Sam 13:28) sent his seven chamberlains (or eunuchs; cf. Est 1:12,15), who constituted his means of communication with the harem, to fetch Vashti. Persian queens usually ate at the king's table, but not necessarily at great banquets. Fearing for her dignity in the midst of such a drunken group (Herodotus, 5.18), she utterly refused to obey the summons.

13,14. Wise men, which knew the times . . . the seven princes. Perhaps seven was a sacred number in Persia (cf. 1:10; 2:9; Ezr 7:14). These wise men may have been astrologers or lawyers. It was from these leading families that Persian kings were to find their wives (Herodotus, 3.84). 16-20. Memucan, one of the seven princes (v. 14), seized the opportunity to transform a private affair into a public and national crisis, doubtless because of a previous conflict between the queen and the princes. The wives of ordinary citizens would defy their husbands (v. 17), and the wives of the seven princes would even "this day" (v. 18) demand equality through a desire to emulate their queen. That it be not altered (v. 19). Cf. 8:8; Dan 6:9. Doubtless they did not want Vashti to return to power and punish them for giving this advice!

21,22. Sent letters into all the king's provinces . . . according to the writing thereof. The Persian Empire boasted an efficient postal system, but communication was complicated by the scores of languages spoken throughout the empire. That every man should bear rule in his own house, and that it should be published according to the language of every people. The meaning is somewhat obscure, but presumably "the rule of the husband in the house was to be shown by the fact that only the native tongue of the head of the house was to be used in the family" (Keil; cf. Neh 13:23). The mention of this point in the decree presupposes that the facts concerning Vashti were also mentioned.

II. Esther Made Queen. 2:1-23.

When Xerxes longed for Vashti again, it was proposed that a new queen be chosen for him from among the most beautiful virgins in the land. Esther, a young Jewess who had been reared by her cousin Mordecai, was among those brought to the house of the women. Xerxes loved her more than any other and chose her to be his queen. Soon afterward, Mordecai discovered a plot against the king. Through Esther the matter was reported to Xerxes, and the criminals were executed.

1. After these things . . . he remembered Vashti. Since Esther became queen in December, 479 B.C. (2:16), and more than a year must have elapsed between the decree of 2:3 (cf. 2:12) and her marriage, the king's desire for Vashti must have become known while he was still engaged in the great campaign against Greece (481–479 B.C.). 2-4. Realizing that the restoration of Vashti would spell doom for them (see note on 1:19), the princes abandoned the precedent of providing a queen from among their own daughters, and suggested that the king choose a new queen from among the most beautiful virgins in the empire. Hege the king's chamberlain [eunuch], keeper of the women. Cf. 2:8,15. Only eunuchs had access to "the house of the women" (v. 9). Let the maiden which pleaseth the king be queen (v. 4). In this way, his desire for Vashti would be lessened. The princes were well aware of the weakness of Xerxes' character (Herodotus, 9.108-113) and took full advantage of it for their own purposes.

5-7. A certain Jew, whose name was Mordecai . . . . brought up Hadassah, that is, Esther, his uncle's daughter. The true hero and heroine of the book are now introduced. Mordecai, of the tribe of Benjamin, was the great-grandson of a man named Kish, who had been carried off to Babylon with King Jeconiah (Jehoiachin) in 597 B.C. Upon the death of his uncle Abihail (2:15), Mordecai took his uncle's orphaned daughter into his own home and brought her up. "Assuming that Hadassah is from hadhas, myrtle, and that Esther is sitar, the Persian for star (Sanskrit sta'na; Akk. istar), we have here an early example of the later Jewish practice of giving two names—a Hebrew and a Gentile name, such as, John Mark, Joses Justus, etc." (A. Macdonald, "Esther," The New Bible Commentary, p. 382).

8-11. Esther was brought also . . . to the custody of Hegai . . . . and the maiden pleased him (vv. 8,9). Esther's personal feelings in this matter are not recorded, but we may assume that she trusted Jehovah and was therefore blessed by him (somewhat like Joseph and Daniel). Unlike Joseph and Daniel, however, she did not identify her nationality, and may therefore have partaken of ceremonially unclean food. Why Mordecai charged her to keep her nationality secret (v. 20) is not easy to determine. Perhaps he feared for her safety (v. 11). Or possibly he was granted by the Lord a special premonition of coming trouble for Israel and the part Esther might play in delivering her people (4:14).

12-15. After an entire year of preparation, the turn of each maiden came to go to the king. For this visit she could have any ornaments, jewelry, or apparel that she wanted. Esther revealed a unique spirit in that she was not concerned to please the king by the "outward adorning of plaiting the hair, and of wearing of gold, or of putting on of apparel," but by "the ornament of a meek and quiet spirit, which is in the sight of God of great price" (I Pet 3:3,4). It is not surprising, therefore, that Esther obtained favour in the sight of all them that looked upon her, and that she won the heart of the king.

16-18. In the month of December, 479 B.C., just four years after his divorce from Vashti, Xerxes made Esther his queen. During those four years, the emperor had hurled one of the greatest armies of ancient history against the Greeks, only to suffer humiliating and crushing defeats at Salamis and Plataea. Esther afforded him a measure of the consolation that he so greatly needed. He made a release to the provinces (v. 18). This was either a remission of taxes or a remission of labor (a holiday).

19-23. When the virgins were gathered together the second time. The purpose of this second gathering is not explained, but it must be remembered that Xerxes (like Solomon) was a polygamist and was constantly adding to his harem. It was during this second gathering, however, that Mordecai discovered a plot against the life of the king. Two eunuchs, Bigthan and Teresh, who may have had access to the king through the virgins mentioned in 2:19, and who may possibly have been enraged at Vashti's divorce, plotted to kill the king. It is interesting to note that Xerxes finally did die by assassination (Olmstead, op. cit., p. 289). Providentially, Mordecai was the one who foiled the plot, for the record of his good deed was placed in the royal chronicles and later became the means of his exaltation (6:1-3). They were both hanged on a tree (v. 23). They were probably either crucified or impaled alive (cf. 7:10).

III. Haman's Plot Against the Jews. 3:1-15.

Mordecai refused to bow before Haman, whom Xerxes had elevated to the second position in the kingdom; and consequently Haman's wrath was aroused against Mordecai's nation. By means of the lot (Pur), the fateful day was determined for the destruction of the Jews, and Haman promised to the king all their confiscated property. Haman sent letters to the entire empire in the king's name, announcing the day of the Jews' destruction.

1-6. According to 3:7, the events of this chapter occurred in 474 B.C., more than four years after Esther became queen (cf. 2:16). By now, Haman, the Agagite, had become the king's favorite, and before him every knee had to bow (cf. Gen 41:43). It was customary for Jews to bow before their kings (II Sam 14:4; 18:26; I Kgs 1:16). But when Persians bowed before their kings, they paid homage as to a divine being. The Spartans refused to bow before Xerxes for this reason (Herodotus, 7.136). He had told them that he was a Jew (v. 4). Since his loyalty to Jehovah was the basis for his refusal to bow before Haman, he had to divulge his nationality at last. At the time, this must have seemed disastrous to Mordecai; but God ultimately brought greater blessing through it, for he delights not in silent witnesses (cf. 8:17). Haman sought to destroy all the Jews (v. 6). Discovering that Mordecai's refusal to bow was based upon religious motives, Haman realized that nothing less than a nation-wide pogrom would finally solve this problem.

7. Early in April, 474 B.C., Haman had the astrologers and magicians cast the lot to determine which day of the year would bring destruction to Israel (Pur is an Old Persian word meaning "lot"). The ancients placed great confidence in astrology and divination, but little did they realize that when "the lot is cast into the lap . . . the whole disposing thereof is of the Lord" (Prov 16:33). God's overruling was particularly evident in this case, for as they cast the lot concerning each subsequent day of the year, it fell upon the thirteenth day of the twelfth and last month, allowing time for Haman's plot to be overcome and a counterdecree to be issued!

8-11. Haman revealed his extreme subtlety by the proposition he made to the king. Realizing that Xerxes was completely egotistical, Haman gained permission to exterminate the Jews by convincing him that they were defying his laws and that their confiscated property would bring vast wealth to his treasuries. The uniqueness of Israel's laws and customs has always caused offense to ungodly Gentiles (Num 23:9; Acts 16:20, 21). But it was hardly true that they refused to keep the laws of the nations in which they lived, except in the case of doing homage to a mere creature (cf. Dan 3:12; 6:10). Haman was correct, however, in his assumption that the Jews had much wealth. Many were able to give generously to their brethren who returned to Palestine (Ezr 1:4). "Thirty-eight Hebrew names . . . occur on 730 account tablets belonging to Murashu and sons, a family of bankers at Nippur (Babylonia) in 464–404 B.C." (D. J. Wiseman, Illustrations From Biblical Archaeology, p. 76). Ten thousand talents of silver (v. 9). This would be approximately $15,000,000 in modern currency. Herodotus (3.95) claimed that Darius I received nearly 15,000 talents a year in revenue. The king took his ring from his hand, and gave it unto Haman (v. 10). In ancient times the signet ring was very important, for it was equivalent to one's signature. With this ring, Haman was able to send letters in the king's name (3:12). Later, the ring was given to Mordecai (8:2,8). The silver is given to thee, the people also, to do with them as it seemeth good to thee (v. 11). Possibly to avoid the appearance of greed, Xerxes offered the money to Haman. The king's utter indifference to the fate of millions of his subjects has found modern parallels in Hitler, Stalin, and Khrushchev.

12-15. On the thirteenth day of Nisan (April 17, 474 B.C.), scribes were called to prepare copies and translations of the decree for distribution throughout the empire. The letters were sent by posts (v. 13). Herodotus wrote: "Nothing mortal travels so fast as these Persian messengers. The entire plan is a Persian invention; and this is the method of it. Along the whole line of road there are men (they say) stationed with horses, in number equal to the number of days which the journey takes, allowing a man and horse to each day; and these men will not be hindered from accomplishing at their best speed the distance which they have to go either by snow, or rain, or heat, or by the darkness of night. The first rider delivers his dispatch to the second, and the second passes it to the third; and so it is borne from hand to hand along the whole line, like the light in the torch-race, which the Greeks celebrate to Hephaestus" (8.98). The thirteenth day of the twelfth month. This would have been March 7, 473 B.C., nearly a year later. To take the spoil of them for a prey. All who helped to exterminate them would gain spoil, but a portion would be turned over to Haman. The city of Shushan was perplexed (v. 15). Doubtless the Jews had many friends in this capital city (cf. 8:15), who were stunned by this shocking example of irresponsible despotism. Perhaps the decree was published so soon in order to encourage the Jews to flee and to leave their property behind (Keil).

IV. Esther's Decision. 4:1-17.

Mordecai's great mourning provoked the curiosity of Esther, who then learned from him of the decree and of his desire that she appeal to the king. When she protested that this might prove fatal to her, Mordecai insisted that this was her responsibility to God. She promised to go to the king if Mordecai would join her in a three-day fast.

1-3. Mordecai perceived all that was done (v. 1). Not only did he know what was publicly announced and have in his possession a copy of the decree (v. 8), but he also knew of the agreement between Haman and the king and the exact amount of money that had been promised (v. 7). This aggravated his grief, for he probably realized that it was the divulging of his nationality (3:4) that had brought Haman's wrath upon his people. Put on sackcloth with ashes. The token of overwhelming grief (Job 2:12; Dan 9:3). None might enter into the king's gate clothed with sackcloth (v. 2). The king would not tolerate sorrow or tragedy in his presence (cf. Neh 2:1,2).

4-8. Learning of Mordecai's mourning, Esther sent appropriate raiment to him so he could enter the court (cf. v. 2). But he received it not. He wanted to impress upon Esther the gravity of the situation and have the opportunity of communicating with her. Then called Esther for Hatach (v. 5). It is possible that Hatach was a Jew who knew of the relationship between Esther and Mordecai. At least he soon learned, for among other things Mordecai told him to charge Esther to make request before the king for her people (v. 8).

9-12. There is one law . . . to put him to death (v. 11). From early times, Median kings had refused entrance to the throne room to unannounced persons in order to enhance their dignity and to protect themselves (Herodotus, 1.99; 3.118). But any who desired an audience might ask to be announced (Herodotus, 3.140). However, Esther had not been called for thirty days and doubtless feared that the king's temporary lack of interest in her would jeopardize the success of her formal request for an audience. The only other possibility was to appear at the entrance of the court unannounced and hope for a gracious response from the king. This was to Esther an impossibly dangerous plan under the circumstances.

13,14. Think not with thyself that thou shalt escape. Mordecai reminded her of the dangerous position in which she herself stood, especially because her refusal to help God's people in this hour of crisis would bring God's judgment upon her and her family, while relief and deliverance would arise to the Jews from another place (v. 14). Mordecai knew the promises of God and the history of Israel too well to doubt this for a moment. As a matter of fact, God may very well have raised her to be Queen of Persia because of the crisis that he knew would arise through the wrath of Haman! This passage is a key to the basic meaning of the entire book, namely, to demonstrate the unfailing providence of God in behalf of his people Israel. Mordecai's implications were quite clear and his plea was irresistible.

15-17. Fast ye for me . . . three days (v. 16). Prayer to God is not mentioned here, but it is quite obviously implied (cf. Joel 1:14). I also and my maidens will fast likewise. Possibly they were Jewish maidens or else proselytes whom Esther had taught to pray. If I perish, I perish. This is not a blind fatalism or a hopeless resignation (cf. Gen 43:14), but rather a confidence in God's will and wisdom (cf. Job 13:15; Dan 3:17,18).

V. Esther's First Banquet. 5:1-14.

The king graciously received Esther, and she in turn invited him and Haman to a private banquet. At the banquet the king offered to grant any request she might have; she asked that they come to another banquet the next day. Haman was overjoyed at the special invitations, but was chagrined at Mordecai's refusal to bow before him. Haman's wife and friends suggested that he obtain permission from the king to hang Mordecai on the gallows which he would build.

1-4. On the third day. The third day of the fast, which probably lasted over forty hours (4:16). She obtained favour in his sight (v. 2). A remarkable evidence of the fact that "the king's heart is in the hand of the LORD, as the rivers of water: he turneth it whithersoever he will" (Prov 21:1); especially in view of Est 4:11. It shall be even given thee to the half of the kingdom (v. 3). Probably surprised at her unannounced appearance, he thought her request must be an urgent one. Even though this expression was hyperbole, it was never thought to be a light promise (cf. 5:6; 7:2; Mk 6:23; and Herodotus, 9.109).

5-8. My petition and my request is . . . I will do to morrow as the king hath said (vv. 7,8). Esther's purpose in inviting the king and Haman to a private banquet, in the first place, was to accuse Haman of plotting to destroy her people

(cf. 7:6). But now, perhaps sensing that she did not yet have sufficient influence with the king to make such a bold accusation, she postponed her request and invited them to another banquet the following evening. This, of course, was providential, for the intervening events, as recorded in chapter 6, provided the necessary background for her accusation at the second banquet.

9-14. Then went Haman forth that day joyful and with a glad heart: but . . . he was full of indignation against Mordecai. An interesting example of the deceived sinner, glorying in self and hating God and God's people. Although Esther's attendants knew of her relation to Mordecai (cf. note on 4:4-8), Haman obviously did not. This ignorance proved to be his undoing. The multitude of his children (v. 11). Haman had ten sons (9:7-10). To have many children was considered to be a great honor not only in Israel (Ps 127:3-5) but also in Persia (Herodotus, 1.136). Let a gallows be made of fifty cubits high . . . that Mordecai may be hanged thereon (v. 14). Haman ordered the workmen to construct in his own courtyard (7:9) a seventy-five-foot gallows, in order that it might be seen from afar, probably even from the palace. Construction began that very night because Haman was supremely confident that the king would grant his request and thus enable him to enjoy Esther's second banquet with complete peace of mind.

VI. Haman Humiliated Before Mordecai. 6:1-14.

Unable to sleep that night, the king had the official chronicles read to him, which told of Mordecai's unrewarded loyalty in exposing a plot against the king. When Haman arrived at the court to ask for Mordecai's death, he was asked what honors should be bestowed upon a favorite of the king. Thinking of himself, he suggested very elaborate exaltation, only to be told that he had to do these honors to Mordecai the Jew. When he arrived home, his wife and friends warned him that if Mordecai was indeed a Jew, he could not prevail against him; his own doom was surely sealed.

1-3. On that night could not the king sleep. Possibly it was anxiety with respect to Esther's request or overindulgence at the banquet of wine that kept Xerxes awake that night (cf. Dan 6:18). But above all, it was the providence of God, for apart from this, the king would never have heard the account of Mordecai's deed as recorded in "the book of records of the chronicles" (cf. 2:23).

4-9. Who is in the court? His carpenters having worked all night to finish the gallows, Haman arrived at the court early in the morning to ask the king's permission to have Mordecai hanged. But before he could make this request, the king summoned him to the throne room to answer an important question. Apparently the king wanted to consult any statesman he could find, and Haman happened to be the most available man at that moment! More than to myself (v. 6). This is a clear illustration of the text: "Pride goeth before destruction, and an haughty spirit before a fall" (Prov 16:18; cf. 11:2; 18:12). Haman immediately began to list those honors which would be most highly esteemed in the Orient, as though he had often meditated on this possibility and was ready to give an answer if the king should ever ask him! Royal apparel . . . which the king useth to wear (v. 8). Not an ordinary robe of state, but a costly garment which the king owned and had actually worn (cf. I Sam 18:4). On the head of which a royal crown is set. The crown was to be set on the horse's head, for in Assyrian and Persian sculptures ornaments may be seen on the heads of horses (Keil). Bring him . . . through the street . . . and proclaim before him (v. 9). Compare the similar honor accorded to Joseph in Egypt (Gen 41:42).

10. Do even so to Mordecai the Jew. Doubtless the king had discovered that Mordecai was a Jew from conversation with his courtiers concerning the good deed he had done (6:1-3). But being a fickle and forgetful monarch, he had failed to connect this fact with the decree he had recently issued commanding the extermination of the Jews! (cf. 3:11)

13,14. Haman's friends, who had formerly acted as his counselors (5:14), now acted as wise men (magi), for they predicted his downfall. If Mordecai be of the seed of the Jews . . . thou shalt not prevail against him (v. 13). The sudden change in Mordecai's fortunes made them realize, with a superstitious awe borne of careful observation of God's providential care for his people since the days of Cyrus, that Haman's preliminary fall would not stop short of total destruction. Hasted to bring Haman unto the banquet. His spirit crushed, Haman went to Esther's second banquet as a sheep to the slaughter.

VII. Esther's Second Banquet. 7:1-10.

Esther asked the king for the preservation of her people from destruction and boldly accused Haman of being the adversary. The king went into the garden enraged at this discovery, and returned to find Haman pleading with Esther for his life. Accusing him of attacking the queen, he ordered Haman to be hanged on the same gallows he had built for Mordecai.

1-6. We are sold, I and my people (v. 4). Emboldened by Mordecai's sudden change of fortune, Esther finally identified herself with the people of Israel who had been sold (3:9; 4:7) to be destroyed, to be slain, and to perish (the same wording as in 3:13). If we had been sold for bondmen . . . I had held my tongue, although the enemy could not countervail the king's damage. Literally, although the enemy is not equal to the damage of the king. Although the Hebrew wording is not altogether clear to us today, it probably means that the punishment of Haman would involve far less financial loss to the king than would the destruction of thousands of Jews. By contrast, however, Esther would have remained silent if the Jews had been sold as slaves, for this would doubtless have brought much initial profit to the king (F. U. Schultz, "Esther," in Lange's Commentary). Who is he . . . that durst presume in his heart to do so? (v. 5) This is the response for which Esther and Mordecai had been praying. The king, learning for the first time that his queen was a Jewess, was overwhelmed by the thought that she and her people had been sold unto destruction by an unalterable decree. To be sure, he had originally consented to Haman's plot without much deliberation (3:10,11); but it is difficult to imagine that he didn't know who had been responsible for initiating this pogrom only two months before (cf. 3:7; 8:9). Perhaps he purposely refrained from turning upon Haman in order that the utter wickedness of the deed itself might be emphasized first. The adversary and enemy is this wicked Haman (v. 6). Esther carefully built up her case before finally naming Haman.

7. While the enraged king went into the garden to regain control of himself, Haman pled with Esther for mercy, realizing that he could now find no favor from the king apart from her intercession. The day before, he had led a Jew in triumphal procession through the streets of the city, and now he was pleading with a Jewess for his very life! A similar reversal will take place at the inauguration of the Millennium (cf. Isa 14:1-3).

8. Will he force the queen also before me in the house? (v. 8) Desperate for his very life, Haman fell at Esther's feet as she reclined upon the gold and silver couch (ASV; cf. 1:6). The Persians as well as the Greeks and Romans reclined at meals, and the Jews did so in later years (cf. Jn 13:23). When Ahasuerus returned from the garden, he poured his wrath upon Haman and attributed to him the worst of motives for thus approaching the queen. The king certainly did not think that Haman was actually attacking Esther, but in the heat of his anger he spoke out in this manner to show the servants how he now felt toward Haman. As the word went out of the king's mouth, they covered Haman's face. This word was not the question he had just asked, but a command to execute Haman, which is not actually recorded in the text. The ancients sometimes covered the heads of those about to be executed.

9,10. Harbonah was one of the seven eunuchs whom the king had sent to bring Vashti to the great banquet (1:10). Behold also, the gallows . . . which Haman had made for Mordecai. The eunuchs had probably listed the various crimes of Haman in order to keep in step with the king's wrath against him, and concluded by pointing to the seventy-five-foot high gallows in Haman's courtyard, which could be seen clearly from the palace. Following the suggestions of his courtiers, as usual, the king ordered Haman to be hanged upon his own gallows.

VIII. Mordecai's Counterdecree. 8:1-17.

Haman's property and position were now given to Mordecai by Xerxes and Esther. But the king was unable to reverse his decree against the Jews; so he empowered Mordecai to issue a new decree to counteract the first. This was quickly done, and the Jews were now permitted to defend themselves on the thirteenth of Adar, the date which Haman had originally set for their destruction. This produced great rejoicing everywhere and many became Jewish proselytes.

1,2. Now that she had revealed her nationality to Xerxes (7:4), Esther was happy to present Mordecai to the king as her guardian and cousin. The king had already delighted to honor Mordecai for exposing the plot against his life (6:6); so it was perfectly natural for him to give the Jew his signet ring (cf. 3:10; 8:8) and to appoint him chief minister of the empire (cf. Gen 41:42).

3-6. In spite of Haman's death and Mordecai's exaltation, the Jews were still doomed to destruction by an irreversible decree. Therefore Esther's task was not yet completed. In 8:3 the general contents of her petition are outlined, but in 8:5,6 her actual words are given. Let it be written to reverse the letters devised by Haman . . . for how can I endure to see . . . the destruction of my kindred? (vv. 5,6) Esther was desperately concerned for the fate of Israel now, as may be seen by the fourfold introductory formula she used, which emphasized her personal relationship to the king. Not fully understanding the intricacies of Persian law, she appealed directly to the heart of the king for mercy upon Israel and for the reversal of "the letters devised by Haman," being careful not to put blame upon the king for his part in Haman's deed.

7,8. Behold, I have given Esther the house of Haman. . . . the writing . . . may no man reverse. Anxious to show Esther that he did love her, he began by reminding her of the favors he had already shown her. But he added that no one, not even the king of Persia himself, had the power to reverse the laws of the Medes and Persians (compare the similar plight of Darius the Mede in Dan 6). Nevertheless, Mordecai had the full right to issue a counterdecree in the king's name, which would be just as irreversible as the one issued by Haman.

9,10. The official letters were now prepared in the same way as those which Haman had sent forth (3:12-15). The date was June 25, 474 B.C., a little over two months after the first decree was issued, allowing more than eight months for the Jews to prepare their defenses (v. 9). Posts on horseback, and riders on mules, camels, and young dromedaries. Posts on horseback, riding on swift steeds that were used in the king's service, bred of the stud (ASV). Special emphasis is placed here upon the speed with which Mordecai's letters were sent out, some of them perhaps overtaking those of Haman.

11-14. Four main ideas seem to be set forth in Mordecai's decree: (a) the Jews were to gather into groups by the thirteenth of Adar; (b) they were to defend their lives; (c) they were to kill those who attacked them; and (d) they were to take the spoil of their attackers. The power of the people (v. 11) refers to their military forces. Hastened and pressed on by the king's commandment (v. 14). It has often been observed that this serves as a remarkable illustration of missionary work today. God's death sentence hangs over a sinful humanity, but he also has commanded us to hasten the message of salvation to every land (cf. Prov 24:11,12). Only by a knowledge of, and a response to, the second decree can the terrible effects of the first decree be averted.

15-17. Having issued the decree, Mordecai clothed himself in royal apparel of blue and white (the royal colors of Persia; cf. 1:6), a great crown of gold, and a robe of fine linen and purple. These were probably his own official robes as prime minister rather than the special attire that was granted to him on his previous day of exaltation (6:8). His appearance in the city reinforced the joy that had been produced by the decree (contrast the sorrow produced by Haman's decree, 4:3). The Jews had light, and gladness, and joy, and honour (v. 16). Gladness and joy, a feast and a good day (ASV). This feast was in anticipation of the Feast of Purim, which was first celebrated eight months later (9:17-19). Many of the people of the land became Jews (v. 17). The verb became Jews occurs only once in the OT. In fact, we find little evidence of Gentiles becoming proselytes in significant numbers until NT times (cf. Acts 2:10; Mt 23:15). The fear of the Jews fell upon them. Israel had now begun to experience one of the greatest deliverances of God since the Exodus, and the lesson was obvious to many (9:2,3; Ex 15:16; Deut 11:25).

IX. The Jews Victorious, and Purim Instituted. 9:1–10:3.

When the fateful day arrived, the Jews successfully defended themselves with the aid of government officials and slew five hundred men in Shushan, including the ten sons of Haman. Esther obtained permission for the Jews to defend themselves a second day as well, and three hundred more enemies were slain in Shushan. In the provinces, seventy-five thousand enemies were slain. The Feast of Purim was then established by special letters to commemorate this tremendous deliverance. A second letter confirmed the first and provided for a fast as well. Mordecai's greatness and his love for Israel were recorded in the chronicles of the kingdom.

1-4. Finally, on March 7, 473 B.C., the fateful day arrived, and the Jews gathered into compact groups within the various cities to await their attackers. It was turned to the contrary (v. 1). An obvious reference to the providence of God, and yet the name of God still does not appear! To lay hand on such as sought their hurt (v. 2). In this context the phrase lay hand on means to kill (cf. 2:21; 3:6; 6:2). All the rulers of the provinces . . . helped the Jews; because the fear of Mordecai fell upon them. (v. 3). The tenor of the second decree made it perfectly clear to Persian officials that the king, to say nothing to Mordecai, his prime minister, now favored the Jews. To have joined in the attack against the Jews now would surely have brought wrath upon them. Perhaps they remembered the fate of those rulers who had opposed the true wishes of Darius the Mede in a somewhat similar situation (Dan 6:24).

5-10. Nevertheless, there were many Persian citizens who took full advantage of the first decree to attack their hated Jewish neighbors. Deprived of full government support and faced by a zealous and newly encouraged people, they were totally defeated. In Shushan itself five hundred Persians, plus Haman's ten sons, were slain. All these sons of Haman, with the possible exception of Adalia, had Persian names (see Lange's Commentary, in loco, for the root meanings of the names). On the spoil laid they not their hand (v. 10). Cf. 3:13; 8:11; 9:15,16. The Jews refrained from taking advantage of their rightful privilege, in order that the purity of their motives might be made evident to all.

11-16. What have they done in the rest of the king's provinces? (v. 12) Apparently the king rejoiced to hear that the Jews had gained such a tremendous victory in Shushan, and he expected reports of even greater victories from the provinces (see ASV). Let it be granted to the Jews which are in Shushan to do to morrow also according unto this day's decree (v. 13). Apparently, Esther heard of a Persian plot to attack the Jews on the following day as well, and therefore she asked permission for the Jews to defend themselves again. The king granted this request and issued a new decree permitting the Jews to kill their enemies in Shushan on the fourteenth of Adar as well, for Mordecai's decree had specified only one day for the Jews to defend themselves in this manner (8:13). This additional decree was obeyed (v. 15), and three hundred more Persians were slain in Shushan. Thus, the decree of 9:14 does not refer primarily to the impaling of the dead bodies of Haman's sons (14 b; cf. Deut 21:22,23). In the meantime, the Jews in the provinces had killed seventy-five thousand of their enemies on the thirteenth of Adar.

17-28. Provincial Jews began to observe the fourteenth of Adar as a holiday, while those in Shushan observed the fifteenth. As on our Christmas day, gifts were exchanged (cf. Neh 8:10,12; Rev 11:10), and the poor were cared for (v. 22). And Mordecai wrote these things, and sent letters unto all the Jews (v. 20). Apparently after several years had passed, Mordecai reviewed the events relating to their victory and decreed that there should no longer be two distinct holidays (the fourteenth in the provinces and the fifteenth in Shushan) but that both days should be observed as the Feast of Purim (vv. 26-28). In fact, many Jews had already begun to observe both days (v. 23).

29-32. This second letter of Purim. This was not the letter of 9:20, but a new letter described in 9:30-32, in which a period of fasting and prayer (the fastings and their cry, v. 31), in addition to the days of joy, was to be observed in memory of the anxious days of prayer which had preceded God's deliverance. Presumably Esther and Mordecai had been observing such a time of fasting for several years now (cf. 4:15-17), and they thought it best to make it a national custom. And it was written in the book (v. 32). Not the book of Esther itself, but the book in which Mordecai had written his record of events (v. 20) and which served as one of the basic sources for the book of Esther.

10:1-3. Xerxes died in 465 B.C. Looking back over his reign shortly afterward, the author emphasizes the stupendous power and wealth of this king (v. 1) in order to show the marvelous providence of God in elevating a despised Jew to a position of honor in such an empire.

Speaking peace to all his seed (v. 3). This does not refer to Mordecai's own children, but to Israel, his race (cf. II Kgs 11:1).

JOB

INTRODUCTION

Title. The name of both the book and its hero, 'iyyôb, appears in extra-Biblical texts as early as 2000 B.C. Its monosyllabic English form, Job, derives from the Vulgate (i.e., Latin) version.

Literary Genre. The central core of the book is poetry, set like a gem within a prologue and an epilogue of epic prose. Such ABA structures are found elsewhere in ancient literature. For example, Hammurabi placed his laws within a prologue and an epilogue of poetry. And an Egyptian work, The Eloquent Peasant, frames the peasant's nine semipoetic protests within a prose prologue and an epilogue.

Along with Proverbs, Ecclesiastes, and, in a sense, the Song of Solomon, Job belongs to the Wisdom (ḥokmâ) genre, a type of writing amply illustrated in a variety of forms in ancient Near Eastern literature. Within the canon of Old Testament Scripture, the distinctive contribution of the Wisdom books is that they expound the relevance of the foundational covenant revelation through Moses to the great issues of man's life in this world, more specifically, of man's life apart from the peculiarly theocratic context of Israelite history. There are many formal similarities between Job and various extra-Biblical Wisdom pieces; e.g., dialogue style, and motifs like the problem of suffering and the longing for death. Nevertheless, in its essential teaching, Job differs altogether from the non-Biblical Wisdom literature because it represents the unique message of redemptive revelation, the wisdom of God which makes foolish the wisdom of men. Even in its literary structure, considered as a whole, it is unique – a masterpiece universally acclaimed.

Closely related to the literary form is the question of historicity. Certainly Job was a historical person (cf. Ezk 14:14,20; Jas 5:11), and his actual experience was substantially as recorded in this book. Nevertheless, the magnificent poetry of the several discourses has compelled general assent to the conclusion that the treatment of the account here is not literal but free. Moreover, the semipoetic epic style of the prologue and epilogue (with their strophic structure and refrains), though it does not require the view that the narrative is legendary, suggests the possibility of a free, figurative treatment of some details.

Authorship and Date. Discussions of the authorship of Job by most modern critics are complicated by the critics' doubts as to the unity of the book as we have it. The evidence is not primarily external, for though the LXX text of Job is about one-fifth shorter than the Masoretic text, its omissions are clearly secondary. The sections that have been most widely regarded as additions to an original basic work are the prologue and the epilogue, the poem on wisdom (ch. 28), the Elihu material (chs. 32–37), and part or all of the Lord's discourses (chs. 38–41). Also, chapters 24–27 are regarded as seriously disarranged. However, strong defense of the integrity of our present text is found in the masterly structural unity of the whole and the rich interrelationships of all the parts.

The question of date has received every possible answer, which indicates the difficulty of determining the time precisely. The date of the writing of the book is not to be confused with the date of the history narrated. The man Job apparently lived in early, patriarchal times. We note, for example, the longevity of Job, as well as the not inconsiderable practice of true religion (attended by special supernatural revelation) outside the bounds of the Abrahamic covenant, and the early economic and political developments reflected in the book. The question regarding the dating of the book, then, is: How long was the story of the patriarch Job transmitted – whether orally or at least partially in writing – before the anonymous Israelite writer, under divine inspiration, transformed the tradition into the canonical book of Job. The majority of negative critics favors an Exilic or post-Exilic date, their judgment being influenced by the way they construe the interdependence of Job, Isaiah, and Jeremiah—and by their dating of the pertinent Isaiah passages. The most extreme dating (2nd century B.C.) seems to be decisively contradicted by fragments of Joban manuscripts included among the Dead Sea finds, especially those in the old Hebrew script. The grandeur and spontaneity of the book and its deeply empathic re-creation of the sentiments of men standing early in the progress of revelation point to the early pre-Exilic period, before the doctrinal, especially, the eschatological, contribution of the prophets. Many conservative scholars have favored a date in Solomon's time, that being the great age of Biblical Wisdom literature (cf., e.g., the similarities of Job to Psalms 88 and 89, which are from the Solomonic age; cf. I Kgs 4:31).

Theme. Through the medium of the problem of theodicy, the book of Job sounds anew the central religious demand of the Covenant. It calls men to unreserved consecration to their sovereign Lord. And this way of the Covenant, this consecration to the transcendent, incomprehensible Creator, it identifies with the way of wisdom. Thereby it presents the Church with its proper testimony to redemptive revelation before the wisdom schools of the world.

COMMENTARY

I. Desolation: The Trial of Job's Wisdom. 1:1—2:10.

A. Job's Wisdom Described. 1:1-5.

The fear of the Lord, which is the beginning of wisdom, was the hallmark of Job. The wellspring of his life and character was the covenantal religion of faith in the Christ of promise, "who of God is made unto us wisdom" (I Cor 1:30; cf. Isa 11:2).

1. Job's homeland, Uz, lay somewhere to the east of Canaan, near the borders of the desert that separates the eastern and western arms of the Fertile Crescent. It was an area of towns, farms, and migrating herds. Perfect and upright (AV), does not denote sinless perfection (cf. Job's recognition of his sins; e.g., 7:20; 13:26; 14:16ff.) but straightforward integrity, specifically, covenant fidelity (cf. Gen 17:1,2). There was an honest harmony between Job's profession and his life, quite the opposite of the hypocrisy of which he was presently accused by Satan and later by his friends. One that feared God. In the OT "the fear of the Lord" is the name for true religion. Job's piety was the fruit of a genuine commitment to his Lord, before whom he walked in reverence, resolutely rejecting what He proscribed.

2,3. True wisdom finds expression in the vigorous prosecution of God's creation mandates to replenish and subdue the earth (Gen 1:28). Due to the abnormality of history, which results from the Fall, failure often dogs the efforts even of the godly. But Job's undertakings in family, field, and flock had been crowned with the Creator's blessings (cf. Job's description of this period in ch. 29).

4,5. Mindful of his God in good days as in evil, Job faithfully fulfilled his function as priest within his family. No mere formalist, Job perceived the root of sin in the human heart (cf. ch. 31); and no mere moralist, he recognized, as special redemptive revelation had made clear, that there is no remission of sins without the shedding of sacrificial blood. Burnt offerings, while symbolic of the Messianic expiation of sin, were also a consecration rite. By means of them Job dedicated the fruits of progress in the area of culture (cf. 1:2,3) to his Creator. Thus human culture reached its proper end in the worship of God.

B. Job's Wisdom Denied and Displayed. 1:6—2:10.

He who is wise unto salvation is aware of the demonic dimension of history, the age-long fury of Satan against "the seed" of the woman (cf. Gen 3:15), that is, Christ and His people. The Adversary charged that Job's godly wisdom was not genuine, that his piety was only a temporary by-product of his prosperity. Put to the test, however, Job bruised Satan under foot by demonstrating that he was ready to serve God "for nought." Since true wisdom, the fear of God, is a divinely bestowed redemptive gift, Satan's charge against Job was actually a defiant denial of the wisdom of God, a challenge to the sovereign efficacy of God's redemptive decree to "put enmity" between the elect and the serpent (Gen 3:15). The primary purpose of Job's suffering, unknown to him, was that he should stand before men and angels as a trophy of the saving might of God, an exhibit of that divine wisdom which is the archetype, source, and foundation of true human wisdom.

1) The Enmity of Satan. 1:6-12.

6,7. That the reader may discover the primary purpose of Job's sufferings and so be in a position to judge accurately where true wisdom lay in the sequel, the veil is withdrawn from the invisible angelic world, depicted here as a royal court with the Sovereign seated on his throne amid his servants. The sons of God. This phrase in ancient polytheistic myths denotes divine beings. In the Bible it refers either to men (e.g., Gen 6:2) or, as here, to celestial creatures. Satan, literally, the Adversary, is among those obliged to render account before the heavenly throne. That, as well as the fact that Satan cannot tempt Job without permission, advertises his absolute subordination, along with all other creatures visible and invisible, to the God whom Job feared.

8-10. God glorifies himself by pointing to Job as a creation of his redemptive grace. There is none like him in the earth (v. 8b). This divine endorsement goes even beyond the description in verse 1. But though the hostile accuser can find nothing in Job's outward life to condemn (contrast the situation in Zech 3), he insinuates that the patriarch's apparent devotion is that of calculated self-interest. He is saying, in effect, "Job is a deceiver like me, his true father, the devil." Satan sought to pluck Job out of God's hand, and so he disputed the Lord's claim that Job had been made His son by redemptive grace. The devil hints that, in failing to recognize the fraudulence of Job's piety, God is naive. For who, having been given a world all his own with a fence around it, would not keep up the necessary appearances of loyalty to the giver? The satanic assault on the integrity of Job is thus ultimately an assault on the integrity of God: God has bribed the profane Job to act pious. The opportunity given to Job by his trial, therefore, is not so much to vindicate himself as to justify God.

11,12. In the temptation in Eden, Satan disparaged God to man; here he disparages man to God. But he used the same subtle technique in both instances. He began with an insinuating question, then moved boldly on to outspoken contradiction of the divine word. Remove Job's prosperity, he says, and the piety that rests on it will collapse. God accepts the challenge. Indeed, by directing Satan's attention to Job, in his unfathomable wisdom, he invites the challenge.

That the heavenly scene and the transactions of the heavenly court are not disclosed to Job is in keeping with the fact that this book is not intended primarily to answer the question, Why do the righteous suffer? Rather, the book represents absolute consecration of self to man's faithful Creator-Saviour as true wisdom. A man must continue to fear God even when his world flies apart and life strands him, like Job, in stunned bewilderment on the refuse heap.

2) The Integrity of Job. 1:13-22.

13-19. How unequal the contest seems! Preternatural knowledge and power – with the element of surprise in its favor – arrayed against a mortal! David and Goliath, in comparison, were equally matched. Yet Job's steadfast righteousness, like David's heroism, was only the visible index of the power of divine redemption working in and through the servant of God. The strategy of God, like that of Elijah on Carmel, was to make it impossible for Satan to foist on the witnesses a naturalistic explanation of the wonder He was about to perform. The overwhelming advantage God allowed Satan became, in the sequel, the measure of the devil's ignominy and of God's praise.

There was a day (v. 13b). Possibly the banquet weeks were special occasional celebrations; but if there was a continuous succession of weekly rounds of feasting, this was the day when Job had offered burnt offerings. His piety and desolation being thus set side by side, his desolation seems the more unaccountable. Certainly the repetition of the picture of Job's happy family life as the prelude to the record of the strokes that obliterated it serves to set the joyous prosperity and the sudden desolation in sharpest contrast. The Sabeans (v. 15). Arab Bedouins. The fire of God (v. 16b). Possibly lightning. The Chaldeans (v. 17) of this early period, unlike the later empire-builders, were nomadic marauders. The great wind (v. 19b). Apparently a desert whirlwind, like that from which God later addressed Job. Note how the unsparing assaults of men on the accumulated fruit of Job's lifetime alternate with the assaults of nature. The messengers were spared only to convey the evil tidings, in overwhelmingly close succession, to their bereaved master.

20-22. And worshipped (v. 20b). Behold, the wise man! Not wise because he comprehended the mystery of his sufferings, but because, not comprehending, he feared God still. Naked shall I return thither (v. 21b), i.e., beyond the scene of life under the sun, into the dust (to which Job perhaps pointed). Cf. Gen 3:19. Blessed be the name of the Lord (v. 21 c). The remarkable thing is that Job, recognizing that he could not resist the sovereign God, not merely maintained his spiritual composure, but even found in adversity occasion for praise. Perhaps in measuring the greatness of his loss, Job took stock of the abundance which had all the while been entrusted to his stewardship. Moreover, this hour of desolation was a moment of truth for him. Stripped naked of the things of this world, Job was unusually sensible of God's confronting presence. Deep was constrained to cry out unto deep. And how can the adoring redeemed heart respond in the presence of God but with doxology: "Whom have I in heaven but thee? and there is none upon earth that I desire beside thee" (Ps 73:25). Satan prophesied: "He will curse thee" (Job 1:11). But Job blessed God his Saviour. In the Hebrew there is a play here on one root word, Satan using it with the meaning of cursing, and Job with the meaning of blessing.

3) The Persistence of Satan. 2:1-6.

1-3. Summoned again before the throne of the heavenly court to render account, Satan volunteers no report on his temptation of Job. God, however, to magnify His name, declares openly the fact of the tried and true integrity of His servant. Without cause (v. 3c). This represents the same Hebrew word as the "for nought" of Satan's question (1:9). God echoes the term to give the lie to Satan's insinuation. It is now obvious that Job does serve God for nought and, therefore, it was for nought that Satan had accused him.

4-6. Skin for skin (v. 4b). A cynical parody of the reverent praise with which Job had responded to his desolation (1:21). Satan insinuates that even Job's doxology, born in the anguish of bereavement, was the calculated response of a shrewd bargainer. Though disappointed that God had not given him anything to keep, Job concealed his bitterness over his losses out of profane concern for his physical well-being: all that a man hath will he give for his life (v. 4b). Satan implies that Job, by his doxology had only feigned love for God as the exorbitant but necessary fee for health insurance. Touch his bone and his flesh (v. 5b). If God will let Satan touch not merely Job's possessions but also his person, so that there will be no profit left in "the religious deal," Job will weigh back curse for curse. Thus again Satan proceeds from the depreciation of Job's past piety to a prediction that he will prove to be profane. So once again God permits the mystery of affliction to engulf His servant.

4) The Patience of Job. 2:7-10.

7,8. Sore boils (v. 7b). Modern medical opinion is not unanimous in its diagnosis of Job's disease, but according to the prognosis in Job's day, it was apparently hopeless. The horrible symptoms included inflamed eruptions accompanied by intense itching (2:7,8), maggots in ulcers (7:5), erosion of the bones (30:17), blackening and falling off of skin (30:30), and terrifying nightmares (7:14), though some of these may possibly be attributed to the prolonged exposure that followed the onset of the disease. Job's whole body, it seems, was rapidly smitten with the loathsome, painful symptoms. Though Satan had been obliged to spare his victim's life, the sufferer probably thought his death was imminent. Among the ashes (v. 8b). The incurable disease was such as to reduce this former prince of eastern patriarchs, reverenced above all others by his fellows, to an outcast from human society. Once renowned as the salt of the earth, he was driven out as its offscouring. His dwelling was in the utter desolation of what was probably the town dunghill.

9,10. The narrative reminds us repeatedly of the temptation in Eden (Gen 3). Job's wife plays a role remarkably like that of Eve. Each woman succumbed to the tempter and became his instrument for the undoing of her husband. Satan had spared Job's wife—as he had spared the four messengers—for his further use in his war on Job's soul. Curse God, and die (v. 9b). The blasphemous apostasy to which she urged the sufferer was precisely what Satan had prophesied of Job. Her evil counsel brought this phase of Job's torment to its fiercest pitch and elicited his second decisive response. As one of the foolish women (v. 10a). The charitable restraint of Job's reply testifies as convincingly as his doxologies to the genuineness of his piety. He did not call his wife a fool, but he charged her with speaking, in her frenzied despair, like one of that company in whose counsel she would not ordinarily walk. The folly of her behavior brings into sharper relief the wisdom of Job's godly patience. In the Bible, "wisdom" is a religious virtue, and the "foolishness" Job refers to is not lack of intellectual keenness but surly lawlessness and godlessness (cf. Ps 14:1). Shall we not receive evil? (10b) The verb means to receive meekly, patiently. It is used in an ancient Canaanite proverb: "If ants are smitten, they do not receive (it passively) but they bite the hand of the man who smites them" (Amarna Letters, 252:18). In all this did not Job sin with his lips (v. 10c). He did not utter curses against God, as Satan had hopefully prophesied. There is certainly no veiled suggestion that Job had cursed God in his heart. Job's wisdom proved sound; he truly served God for nought but for God Himself.

Satan seduced Adam even while Adam was standing in the integrity of his creation righteousness. From this it might have appeared that Satan could trip up the depraved sons of Adam at will and trample upon them. But herein lies a great wonder of redemptive grace: sinner Job stands triumphant where righteous Adam tragically fell! Thus, for the confounding of Satan and the reassurance of the saints, the Lord gave clear proof that a righteousness more enduring than that of Adam was being provided through the second Adam. This triumph of Job's patience over the Adversary's malice provided a seal, especially for the ages before the Incarnation, of God's promise that He would bestow on the faithful the gift of eternal salvation through the Christ to come.

II. Complaint: The Way of Wisdom Lost. 2:11–3:26.

A. The Coming of the Wise Men. 2:11-13.

The trial of Job's wisdom was by no means over. A new phase of it now began with the aggravation of Job's evil state by spiritual torment. Though Satan does not appear again, he was none the less still present, subtly using Job's well-intentioned comforters as his unwitting accomplices, with more apparent success than had marked his efforts hitherto.

11. After the second crisis of temptation and before the arrival of the friends, there was an interval of some months (7:3), during which Job's spirit was stretched taut by the unrelenting distress in his flesh and the ravages of the foul disease which disfigured him beyond recognition (see chs. 19;30). Job's three friends. The cherished companions and counsellors of "the greatest of all the men of the east" must have been princes of their people and sages of renown. Teman in Edom was proverbial for wisdom (Jer 49:7). The Shuhite tribe (cf. Gen 25:2,6) and doubtless Naamah, were located in the east country, land of wise men (cf. I Kgs 4:30).

12,13. Though the friends were aware of Job's calamities, they were unprepared for what they found. Their stunned, week-long silence was like a mourning for the dead (cf. Gen 50:10; I Sam 31:13). Sincere as was their sympathy, their mute presence evidently afforded little comfort. To judge from their subsequent interpretation of Job's wretchedness, their mission of consolation would have misfired even sooner had they spoken. Still, it does seem regrettable that the prolonged silence had to be broken by the cry of the distraught sufferer rather than by a healing word of comfort from a friend.

B. The Impatience of Job. 3:1-26.

Between the heights of spiritual serenity in the prologue and in the epilogue stretches the abyss of Job's spiritual agony. The descent into and ascent out of that abyss are marked by sudden, dramatic changes of spiritual temper. These are described in brief transitional passages (i.e., chs. 3; 42:1-6). The first of these portrays Job's startlingly abrupt plunge from patience to deep despondency.

1. Cursed his day. What turned Job's submissive doxologies into unrestrained imprecations? Had his spiritual resistance been worn away by the endless days and nights of physical distress? Or did the sight of the distinguished companions of his former prosperity recall too vividly the vanished honor and happiness of the past? Or was it that the faces of his friends, aghast with unutterable pity, mirrored too faithfully the ugliness of his present? Is not the clue to be found in the friends' identity as "wise men"? The brooding presence of these philosophical interpreters of life could not fail to start Job philosophizing about his tragic experience. But the more intently he sought an explanation for it, the more anxiously aware he became of the wall of mystery encompassing him. Seeking the Why, he soon had lost the Way. Obsessed by the dread that God had abandoned him, he cursed his forsaken existence. Neither at this point nor later did Job fulfill Satan's prediction that he would renounce God with a curse. By cursing his own existence, however, Job, in effect, ventured to dispute with the Sovereign who decreed it. Whatsoever is not of faith is sin; hence, the need of Job's repentance (cf. 42:1-6) as the way to renewed peace with God.

3-10. Job's inescapable present misery obliterates the memory of his former joyful years as he laments that he was ever born. Let the Almighty not call his birthday into the light (v. 4), but let darkness and the shadow of death claim it for their own (v. 5a, ASV). Would that the night of his conception were blotted out of the calendar of time (v. 6), that leviathan (v. 8b, ASV; a mythological symbol of the foe of cosmic order) would swallow it into chaos.

11-19. Why? Explosive imprecation yields to piteous lamentation. Why, since he was conceived and born, was he at least not an abortion or stillborn (vv. 11,16)? Even confinement in the dark grave—not yet illumined by the resurrection glory of Christ—seemed a far better state of existence. There Job, outcast and a byword of base men and fools, would share a common lot with kings and princes (vv. 14,15); there all those afflicted by "the wicked" and taskmasters find relief from human troublers (vv. 17-19).

20-26. Why, not having been stillborn but rather welcomed alive and nourished (v. 12), must his wretched life continue? As the complaint draws to a close, Job finally voices his basic problem: Why does God give the light of life to a man whose way is hid, and whom God hath hedged in? (v. 23; cf. v. 20) The word Satan had used to describe Job as hedged about on every side by the favor of God (1:10), Job now uses for himself as one hemmed in by God with darkness and disfavor.

III. Judgment: The Way of Wisdom Darkened and Illuminated. 4:1–41:34.

A. Verdicts of Men. 4:1–37:24.

Because the dialogue of Job and his friends attaches to Job's complaint rather than directly to his calamities, the friends' mission assumes less the air of pastoral consolation than of judicial discipline, and this becomes increasingly so with each successive cycle of speeches. (For the cyclic structure of the dialogue, see the Outline above.) The friends sit as a council of elders to pass judgment on the clamorous offender. The weighing of Job's guilt involves discussion of broader aspects of the problem of theodicy, but always with Job's particular case and condemnation in view. Hence, for Job the debate is not a detached, academic study of suffering in general, but a new, more painful phase of his sufferings. The friends are beguiled by their adherence to traditional theory into aiding and abetting Satan in his hostility to God, and darkening the way of wisdom for God's servant, Job. But the debate serves to silence this wisdom of the world and so prepares for the presentation of the covenantal approach to wisdom, which follows in the discourses of Elihu and the Lord. Again, in Job's appeal from the verdicts of men to the highest court, expressed in his passionate longing to plead his case before the Lord, the debate reaches out to the visible manifestation of God.

1) First Cycle of Debate. 4:1–14:22.

a) First Discourse of Eliphaz. 4:1–5:27.

4:1. As the eldest, apparently, of the friends (cf. 15:10) and thus the possessor of the most seasoned wisdom, Eliphaz is accorded the dignity of precedence in each series of speeches (cf. 42:7). He sets the direction for the counsel of the friends by presenting his theory of sin and suffering and applying it to Job's case. The fundamental, but false, assumption of Eliphaz is that righteousness invariably brings weal and wickedness woe, that there is a direct ratio between sin and suffering. He addresses himself first to Job's despondency (4:2-11), then to his impatience (4:12–5:7), and finally counsels him to repent (5:8-27).

2-11. Who can withhold himself from speaking? (v. 2b) For seven days the wise men had looked on Job's calamities without offering a word of consolation. When Job complained, however, the comforters could not restrain reproof for a moment. Thus for the whole course of the debate their sights were fixed on Job's temporary lapse into impatience, while his earlier prolonged display of patience quite disappeared from their perspective. They reproach Job as though he had given up at the first taste of adversity: it toucheth thee, and thou art thrown into alarm (v. 5b).

Even as I have seen (v. 8a; cf. 5:3). The authority for Eliphaz' theory is experience. He accepts the traditional view of Eastern sages because his observations of life seem to bear it out. His statistics show, for example, that extreme calamity follows extreme wickedness (vv. 8-11). Only arrogant sinners who make a lifework of sowing sin reap a harvest of death amid calamities. They perish like herbage scorched by the withering blast of desert wind (v. 9), or like a den of roaring lions dispersed by a sudden blow (vv. 10,11). His observation also has confirmed the converse: Who ever perished, being innocent? (v. 7a) Though the righteous experience a measure of suffering, they are never cut off under affliction. From such observations Eliphaz deduces his law of sin and suffering, and he assumes that it must uniformly and universally govern human history. Unfortunately, Eliphaz' method of constructing the doctrine of providence is unreliable. For true theology rests on the authority of divine revelation, not on limited human observation and fallible speculation. Unfortunately, too, as Job points out later, even Eliphaz' observations and statistics are inaccurate (cf. 21:17ff.).

Vain doctrine can offer only vain comfort. Is not thy fear of God thy confidence, And the integrity of thy ways thy hope? (4:6, ASV) Eliphaz does not question Job's essential righteousness. Therefore, thinking to arouse him from his despondency, he assures him that because he is a pious man, he will not perish. But this favorable evaluation of one laid low by disasters is inconsistent with Eliphaz' own theory. To be consistent he must regard Job as the basest son of Belial. For the patriarch's agony is so great that he passionately covets that death from which Eliphaz, declaring it the worst calamity that could befall the ungodly, has pronounced him immune. Later, when Eliphaz has worked out his position more consistently, he charges Job with hypocrisy and criminality. In this first speech, however, unappreciative of the exceptional severity of Job's sufferings, he classifies Job with the generality of moderately sinning, moderately suffering righteous men, and is only astonished that he complains so immoderately.

4:12–5:7. Job had called in question the wisdom of God's providence. Eliphaz counters with the argument that fallen men, whether godly or ungodly, are deficient in wisdom and justice and, therefore, incompetent to criticize Providence (4:12-21). They are, moreover, justly subject to all the woes attending mortality (5:1-7).

4:12-21. Now a word was brought to me stealthily, my ear received the whisper of it (v. 12, RSV). As a supplementary source of his knowledge, Eliphaz refers impressively to a special revelation vouchsafed to him in a hair-raising (v. 15) night vision. His account of the mysterious appearance and voice (vv. 15,16) serves to cast a prophetic mantle about him. (For similar features in theophanies witnessed by Abraham, Moses, and Elijah, see Gen 15:12; Num 12:8; I Kgs 19:12.) The content of the alleged revelation is presented in Job 4: 17-21. Shall mortal man be just before God? Shall a man be pure before his Maker? (v. 17, ASV marg.; cf. RSV) The AV and ASV translation is also grammatically possible and would provide as suitable a rebuke for the challenge to God's government implicit in Job's complaint. If by comparison with God's wisdom, even the wisdom of angels is imperfect (v. 18), certainly man who lives and dies without wisdom (v. 21b, ASV) is not qualified to sit in judgment over God's ways. Analyzing man's inferiority to angels in terms of his mortality, Eliphaz echoes the divine verdict against man's body of dust (v. 19; cf. Gen 3:19). In comparison with angelic life, human life, like that of the moth (Job 4:19,20), is fleeting. Man's death is like the collapse of a tent when its cord is loosed (v. 21, ASV).

5:1-7. If Eliphaz had applied to himself the message of the Lord's transcendent wisdom and man's lack thereof sent him in the night vision, he would not have volunteered so dogmatic an explanation of God's dealings with Job. Affliction cometh not forth from the dust . . . but man is born unto trouble (vv. 6a, 7a, ASV; cf. 4:8). Though a servant of God, he insists, Job is still a fallen mortal. His troubles, therefore, did not spring out of the ground like a magical harvest, never sown; they are the thorny fruits of his sins. Hence, neither men nor angels can listen sympathetically to his cry (v. 1). Vexation killeth the foolish man (v. 2a, ASV). To display resentment against God's providence is worse than futile; it invites affliction unto death. I have seen the foolish (v. 3a). Again Eliphaz' authority is experience. His thoughtless sketch of the cursing of the house, field, and children of the churlish fool (vv. 3-5), reminiscent as it was of Job's recent losses, might well have made Job wonder whether Eliphaz judged him to be such a fool.

8-27. Eliphaz urges the murmuring victim to submit trustfully to God. The core concept of his exhortation is the beatitude of the chastened man (v. 17). He describes the goodness of God's marvelous ways (vv. 8-16), prophesies of the happiness that will follow upon repentance (vv. 18-26), and adds a confident guarantee of the wisdom he has offered (v. 27).

8-16. But as for me, I would seek unto God (v. 8, ASV). The unscarred sage has no doubt how he would act if tempted like Job. His advice is clearly sound; his account of the goodness of God's providence and His special interest in the mourning poor is excellent (see Paul's quotation of v. 13 in I Cor 3:19). But his misinterpretation of Job's extraordinary sufferings and his uncharitable attitude indispose Job to profit from this exhortation.

17. Happy is the man whom God correcteth. Eliphaz recognizes the distinction between chastisement and punishment, and he appreciates the ultimate benefits of God's fatherly chastening. However, his views of the relation of sin and suffering leave no room for other purposes, such as trial and testimony, in the suffering of the righteous. (For further comments on this theme see 33:31-33.)

18-26. Crops and flocks restored (vv. 23,24; ASV, shalt miss nothing rather than AV shalt not sin), numerous offspring (v. 25), and long life (v. 26)—these are indeed to be Job's happy portion. Eliphaz spoke more truth than he realized, too, in predicting deliverance from the scourge of the tongue (v. 21a), as the reader, aware of Satan's slanders and the friends' misjudgments, well knows. The skill of the author is evident in this early anticipation of the actual outcome, presented as it is in the form of a forecast based on such profound misunderstanding. For Eliphaz was mistaken in assuming that renewed prosperity always follows repentance. Suffering is not sent in exact proportion to sin in this life, and neither is prosperity granted in proportion to piety. All depends on God's good pleasure.

b) Job's Reply to Eliphaz. 6:1–7:21.

The presence of the philosophers had set Job to speculating about his fate, and that led to his questioning God's wisdom (ch. 3). The pronouncements of Eliphaz concerning the relation of sin to suffering had introduced a theme that was to lead Job to question the justice of God; for Job knew that his own extraordinary sufferings could not be accounted for on the ground of extraordinary sins. In this first reply, however, the patriarch does not engage in theological discussion about God's justice, but vents again his inner ferment, the consequence of his sense of estrangement from the God who afflicted him. That had been the undercurrent of Job's original complaint, and the efforts of Eliphaz had only aggravated it. The present speech is, therefore, a continuation of the complaint, with certain new overtones. Beginning on the defensive, Job justifies his original outburst (6:1-13). Then, taking the offensive, he reproves his friends for their pitiless attitude (6:14-30). Finally, turning from his friends to God, he renews his lament (7:1-21).

6:1-13. As the plural forms indicate, this chapter is addressed to all the friends. For they all concurred in the views of Eliphaz, and by glance and gesture had no doubt signified the "Amen" which would presently become vocal in their own speeches. Oh that my vexation were but weighed (v. 2a, ASV). Job ignores Eliphaz' insinuations as to the cause of his desolation, and defends the vexation expressed in his complaint. To Eliphaz the complaint had sounded ominous (5:2). But, says Job, if the rash (v. 6:3b, ASV) words wrenched from his lips by anguish were placed in the scales, they would easily be overbalanced by his calamities, which were heavier than the sand of the sea. The arrows of the Almighty . . . the terrors of God (v. 4). An aloofness, an almost sullen resentment, had been betrayed in Job's complaint by his reluctance to mention God even as the author of his sufferings. The vigorously theistic interpretation of Eliphaz did at least prompt a wholesome change in this regard. Job now frankly expresses his feeling that God is confronting him like an enemy, marshaling hosts of terrors against him. In further defense of his complaint, Job observes that even animals do not complain without reason (v. 5). And it is only natural for a man to reject insipid, loathsome food (vv. 6,7). Then, recalling Eliphaz' description of the death of frail mortals (4:19-21), Job declares that death is precisely what he longs for (vv. 8,9). I would even exult in pain unsparing (v. 10b, RSV). Even if he should die the kind of death Eliphaz says is reserved for the ungodly, it would be welcome. Nor would it, in his case, be the death of the ungodly; for contrary to the insinuations of Eliphaz, he had not denied the words of the Holy One (v. 10c, ASV). What is my end, that I should be patient? (v. 11b, RSV) Job's resources for endurance were spent. In spite of Eliphaz' fair predictions, the future in this world was hopeless.

14-30. Eliphaz has attacked Job's complaint; Job now attacks Eliphaz' "consolation." My brethren have dealt deceitfully as a brook (v. 15a). He has not begged favors, such as a great ransom (vv. 22,23)—only the pity a man naturally expects from friends. Yet he has been as bitterly disappointed in his "comforters" as a thirsty desert caravan when it reaches the eagerly anticipated wady—sometimes a rushing, dark torrent—and finds not even a trickle among the rocks (vv. 15-21). Ye see a terror, and are afraid (v. 21b, ASV). . . . And make merchandise of your friend (v. 27b, ASV). Their pitiless procedure, says Job, is dictated by fear that terrors like his may be visited upon them. If they should show him sympathy, God might misinterpret their concern as criticism of His providence, and He might plague them similarly. To buy God's partiality for themselves, they insinuate that Job must have sinned in proportion to his sufferings. As evidence they point to the rebellious tone of his complaint. But his desperate words uttered under extreme provocation give no proof of his normal attitude and conduct (v. 26). Return, I pray you (v. 29a; i.e., "Stop begging the theological question by assuming my guilt, for I am righteous" (v. 30).

7:1-21. In the midst of his replies Job repeatedly turns from his friends and addresses himself to God. The structure of the patriarch's individual speeches thus reflects the over-all course of his inner struggle as, disappointed by earthly friends, he is compelled to look anew to his heavenly Friend and divine Redeemer for understanding.

1-16. Like the days of an hireling (v. 1). Human existence, and Job's life in particular, is like a soldier's hard campaign or a field laborer's weary grind. It is a succession of days of panting for the cool of evening, and restless nights of longing for the morning, a round of misery and hopelessness (vv. 1-6). Thine eyes shall be upon me, but I shall not be (v. 8b, ASV). Reverting to the theme of human mortality introduced by Eliphaz, Job builds upon it his renewed complaint. He introduces (vv. 7-10) and concludes (v. 21b) his appeal for relief (vv. 11-21a) with the pathetic prospect of the Deity looking for his faithful servant too late to show him overdue pity. Am I the sea, or a sea-monster? (v. 12a, RSV) To judge from the incessant surveillance kept over him, Job says, one would think he was the chaos-monster (a mythological figure, cf. 3:8) threatening the stability of the universe.

17-21. What is man (v. 17a). An ironic twist is given to Ps 8:4 (cf. Ps 144:3). The contrast between divine transcendence and human finitude is exploited to minimize the significance of human action. If I have sinned, what do I unto thee (v. 20a, ASV). Actually, of course, God's transcendence magnifies the seriousness of sin; it is the foundation of the meaningfulness of human experience and of all that is. Moreover, this struggle of Job was particularly significant because it had been made the test case for this very truth of the transcendent authority and control of God over history. In Job's temptation the stability of the universe was under attack—as the "sons of God" could have told Job—by the real "dragon" (cf. Rev 20:2) of whom the mythical sea monster was a paganized version. The angels saw the world trembling with every tremor of Job's spirit. For if the redemptive power of God could not preserve Job in the fear of God, not only Job but the world was lost to satanic chaos.

c) First Discourse of Bildad. 8:1-22.

Bildad proves to be as insensible as Eliphaz regarding Job's wretchedness. He spurns the sufferer's defense of his complaint, ignores his criticism of the unsympathetic approach of the friends, and proceeds to give Job more of Eliphaz' counsel in the name of divine justice (vv. 2-7) and venerable tradition (vv. 8-19). Then he awkwardly appends a brief word of cheer (vv. 20-22).

2-7. How long (v. 2a). Here is no appreciation of the months of patience; only indignation over a few minutes' impatience! Doth God pervert justice? (v. 3a, ASV) Of course God was not unjust to Job. But behind Bildad's rhetorical question lay the judgment that Job was reaping a harvest of sin. This issue of God's justice, though doubtless involved in Job's complaint, had not previously been foremost in his thoughts. The patriarch had contemplated his destiny more from the metaphysical perspective of divine transcendence and human finitude. By focusing attention on the judicial aspect, the comforters succeeded only in intensifying their friend's temptation. Job's theodicy was as inadequate as theirs. Reason therefore told him that God must be deeply grieved with him. But his conscience refused to acknowledge transgression commensurate with his suffering. Where then was justice? Where was the good God he had known? He has delivered them into the power of their transgression (v. 4b, RSV). An astonishingly heartless but thoroughly consistent application of the friends' thesis! Though the form is conditional, the intent is declarative. If thou wouldest seek unto God (v. 5a). Since Job's afflictions have not yet proved fatal, as his children's did, he may entertain hope that he is not, like them, reprobate and that his repentance will be followed by a restoration of blessing surpassing his former prosperity (v. 7; cf. 42:12).

8-19. Enquire . . . of the former age (v. 8). Aware of the limitations of the individual mortal (v. 9), Bildad would bolster the authority of personal observation with traditional lore (vv. 8,10). Between Bildad and Eliphaz there is no essential difference. Each builds on sand—on speculations drawn from the subjectivity of his own consciousness and the relativity of the changing world—rather than on the granite disclosures of the omniscient Creator. Bildad reproduces the proverbial wisdom of the fathers, couched in similes drawn mostly from the lush growth of swamp and garden (vv. 11-19). So are the paths of all that forget God (v. 13a). All the similes teach one lesson: the happiness of the wicked is fragile, perishable. If appearances sometimes seem to contradict the traditional theory that suffering is the wages of sin, it is never for long. But why does Bildad allow a warning designed for the ungodly to dominate his counsel to Job?

20-22. The peroration states the application of Bildad's doctrine to the perfect and to evildoers (v. 20, ASV). The speaker offers some encouragement for Job, but it is brief and perfunctory (vv. 21,22). Though the sufferer finds himself here in the category of the "perfect," he cannot forget Bildad's earlier If (v. 6).

d) Job's Reply to Bildad. 9:1–10:22.

Following the general pattern of his previous reply, Job addresses himself first to the friends (9:1-24), then more or less directly to God (9:25–10:22). He opens his rebuttal of Bildad with sarcastic endorsement of his friend's opening (and fundamental) theme (9:2; cf. 8:3) and closes with vehement contradiction of Bildad's closing (and dominant) contention (9:22-24; cf. 8:20-22). Then Job resumes his complaint to God in the mood of reckless defiance to which the counsel of the friends has goaded him. In this speech he plunges into the darkest depth of his imagined alienation from God. Though he approaches blasphemy in his frenzy, he does not turn from God with a curse but wrestles on in prayer. For Satan cannot pluck him from his Father's hand.

9:1-24. Of a truth I know that it is so (v. 2a, ASV). See comments on 8:3. The judicial aspect of the situation now looms large to Job. God appears to him a prosecuting judge. But how can man be just with God? (v. 2b, ASV) Though this question is similar in form to Eliphaz' revelation (4:17), its meaning is different. Job is not saying that man, being a fallen mortal, cannot stand in his own integrity before God. He is saying (as the following verses show) that no matter what the righteousness of a man's cause, he is too puny and ignorant to defend it successfully in court before the overwhelming wisdom and power of God. The thought of God's transcendence had led Job to ask why God should bother to afflict a frail man. Now the same thought provokes the question, Why should a frail man bother to contend against God? This question exposes Job's loss of the sense of God's loving-kindness. The Almighty seems to confront him like a giant adversary.

Which doeth great things past finding out (v. 10a). Again Job gives a new application to a quotation from Eliphaz (cf. 5:9) by way of answering Bildad. Eliphaz spoke these words as a ground for Job's committing his cause to God (5:8) and illustrated with gracious works of providence (5:10-16). Job repeats them to show how futile it is for him to plead his cause before God. And he illustrates with more ominous examples of the sheer omnipotence of God's cosmic rule (vv. 5-13). In the final illustration Job apparently adopts again the imagery of current mythology, the helpers of Rahab (v. 13b, ASV), to depict God's rule over the sea (cf. 26:12). He cannot answer him one of a thousand. . . . Though I were righteous, yet would I not answer, but I would make supplication to my judge (vv. 3b, 15). This strikingly anticipates the subsequent theophany (38:3ff.) and Job's response (40:3-5). Yet the preview is again subtly veiled in misunderstanding. For the reality which will prove to be the prelude to joy regained, here seems to Job a dismal eventuality. I am perfect (v. 21a, ASV). This section terminates in a crescendo of invective, Job's exclamations becoming almost incoherently staccato. In utter despair of ever establishing his integrity before the irresistible God, who seems bent on breaking him without cause (v. 17b; cf. 2:3), Job nevertheless defiantly affirms his uprightness. He destroyeth the perfect and the wicked (v. 22b). The assertion of the friends that only the wicked are carried away violently needs correction; Job, however, fails to discern the love of God in the death of the righteous. He will laugh at the trial of the innocent (v. 23b), just as, sitting unassailable in the heavens, he will "have in derision" (Ps 2:4, the same word as is here translated laugh) the rebels raging against his throne. The friends had condemned Job that God might be righteous—according to their standard. Job, defending himself against their unjustified insinuations, is driven to condemn God that he himself might be righteous (cf. 40:8).

9:25–10:22. The sufferer bewails his sorrows, continuing to interpret them as tokens of divine condemnation. He cannot suppress his longing for a day in court, though he has no hope of being granted such a privilege. Hence, he reasons earnestly with the strange God, the phantom creation of his frenzied doubt.

9:25-35. Now my days are swifter than a post (v. 25a). The opportunity for the Judge to reverse his decision and return Job's prosperity will soon be gone. Job compares the swift passage of his miserable life to those things that are fleetest on land (v. 25), on the sea (v. 26a), and in the air (v. 26b). Yet shalt thou plunge me in the ditch (v. 31a). Even if the case came to court and Job proved his innocence as effectively as human skill could (v. 30), the Judge would overpower him with charges of guilt. There is no umpire between us (v. 33a, RSV). Here, when Job's faith is at its lowest ebb, there emerges in this complaining negative form the concept of the Mediator, which was afterwards to become for Job a positive conviction. This concept attains its grandest expression in the speech (ch. 19) that marks the crest reached by Job's faith within the course of the debate. For lack of a daysman, Job trembles before the omnipotent One, who seems determined to terrorize him into dumbness (vv. 33-35) and find him guilty.

10:1-22. I will give free course to my complaint (v. 1b, ASV). With the bravado of despair Job questions the Judge who condemns him (v. 2). He appeals to God against God—to the nature of the God he had known against the phantom God who contends against him. In particular, Job appeals to God's pride of office as Judge (vv.3-7) and to his Creatorhood (vv. 8-12). Is God subject to human limitations, liable therefore to misread the facts (v. 4) or fail to overtake the guilty (vv. 5,6)? No. He has the qualifications to be judge of all the earth; he is omniscient and omnipotent (v. 7). Thine hands have made me (v. 8a). Does the Creator destroy the creature on which he has expended such marvelous skill in the processes of procreation and gestation (vv. 10,11) and such providential care (v. 12)?

The imaginary "trial" of God ends as the reality of pain and ignominy reasserts itself in Job's consciousness. The phantom God has prevailed, it seems, and Job changes abruptly from appeal to complaint and lament (vv. 13-22). Yet these things thou didst hide in thy heart

(v. 13a, ASV). God's secret design in the earliest formation and nurture of Job's life was to prepare a prey to be stalked like a lion, mercilessly, relentlessly (vv. 14-16). God's hidden purpose was all the while to make that life miserable at last by witnessing to its guilt with an unending host of plagues (v. 17). Wherefore then hast thou brought me forth out of the womb? (v. 18a) The consideration of God's role in the origin of his life brings Job back to the theme of his original complaint (cf. 3:11). Let me alone (v. 20b). Cut off, as he feels himself to be, from the love of God, the most he can ask, before he slips into the darkness of death, is that God will simply cease paying attention to him for a moment. Nevertheless, it is still to God that Job cries.

e) First Discourse of Zophar. 11:1-20.

Job had reacted to Eliphaz' and Bildad's concentration on his judicial status with increasingly intense protestations of innocence. These in turn provoked the friends to ever more consistent application of their theory, until Zophar now bluntly condemns Job's alleged iniquity (vv. 1-6). He supports his charge by appealing to God's infinity (vv. 7-12), yet he concludes with an assurance of restored prosperity (vv. 13-20).

1-6. Job had insisted that God had afflicted him knowing him to be righteous (v. 4; cf. 9:21; 10:7). That, Zophar points out, contradicts traditional theory, is irreligious, and can not be allowed to stand as the last word. Should a man full of talk be justified? (v. 2b) The customary introductory courtesies, dispensed with altogether by Bildad, are thus dispatched by Zophar with such haste and distaste that accusation merges with apology. But oh that God would speak, and open his lips against thee (v. 5). Job seems irrepressible in controversy with his fellows; but if he were granted the very thing he himself longs for, an open debate with God (cf. 9:35), he would be silenced. Know therefore that God exacteth of thee less than thine iniquity deserveth (v. 6b). More literally, God causes to be forgotten for thee some of thine iniquity. In his zeal to contradict Job's complaint that God searches out and mercilessly marks his every sin (cf. 10:6,14), afflicting him out of proportion to his iniquities, Zophar ventures to modify the other two friends' theory of direct ratio—but in the opposite direction from Job! Here is the climax of condemnation in the first cycle. Job 11:6 is pivotal; it concludes the indictment but also introduces the following theme by mentioning the unfathomable wisdom of God (cf. 5:9).

7-12. Canst thou find out the Almighty unto perfection? (v. 7b) By his infinite wisdom God comprehends and controls creation in its height and depth, length and breadth (vv. 8,9). Who can hinder him? (v. 10b) If God wills to bring a man into judgment, the man cannot escape. Zophar thus endorses the conclusion Job had earlier drawn from the absolute wisdom of God, namely, that resistance to Him is futile (cf. 9:12; 10:7b). But while Job had also appealed to the divine omniscience for vindication of his innocence (10:7a), Zophar does so to convict Job of guilt: He seeth wickedness also (v. 11b). Having openly condemned Job, and being ignorant himself of any direct evidence to substantiate his charge, Zophar finds it convenient to supplement his own ignorance with the omniscience of the Almighty. He would have made better use of his excellent doctrine of the incomprehensibility of God, however, if he had humbly recognized the limitations of his own knowledge of divine providence and had not presumed to understand Job's sufferings to perfection. This truth of God's unsearchable wisdom, though sadly mishandled by Zophar, is the doctrine that should have quieted Job's spirit and silenced his complaints. By reckoning more seriously with it, Job and his friends alike would have recognized that his sufferings were compatible with exemplary piety on one side and divine favor on the other. It is primarily by the proclamation of His incomprehensibility that the Lord Himself later delivers Job from his temptation. Thus again the author of the book employs veiled anticipation. In 11:12 he uses another favorite device, clinching an argument with a proverbial saying. He cites the asininity of vain men as a foil for the infinity of divine wisdom.

13-20. Compare the similar appeals of Eliphaz (5:8ff.) and Bildad (8:5-7,20-22). Contrary to Job's pessimistic opinion (9:28; 10:15), suit for God's favor would be successful (v. 15). At least it would be if preceded by thoroughgoing repentance, extending to heart, hand, and home (vv. 13,14; cf. Ps 24:4). By laying down this condition Zophar manages to insinuate accusation into the midst of consolation. Renewal of God's favor will be accompanied by restoration of prosperity, in which present grief will be forgotten as waters that are passed away (v. 16b, ASV). Also, contrary to Job's forebodings of unrelieved darkness (10:21,22), a bright dawning of hope, peaceful security, and honor, as of old, awaits him (vv. 17-19). But the eyes of the wicked shall fail (v. 20a). Zophar's growing suspicion of Job suggests the advisability of his seasoning consolation further with warning. He closes by identifying the only hope of the wicked with death, in words clearly resembling Job's description of his own prospects. Zophar's pattern of repentance and restoration was to be worked out; but in a way quite surprising to him.

f) Job's Reply to Zophar. 12:1–14:22.

Thoroughly contemptuous of the arrogant ignorance of his counselors, Job subjects them to devastating criticism (12:1–13:12). He declares his righteousness to his friends (13:13-19), then once more appeals directly to God (13:20–14:22). In the midst of this appeal, a new hope dawns in Job's soul—the hope of life beyond Sheol! Though despondency darkens Job's concluding words, it is clear that in this reply to Zophar, his faith has begun its triumphant ascent out of the abyss of despair.

12:1–13:12. Wisdom shall die with you (12:2b). Job's sarcasm suggests how insufferable he found the pretensions of the trio who had all sung the same empty tune. Their words would continue to sting but he would no longer take them seriously as possible solutions to the riddle of his sufferings. I am not inferior to you (12:3b; cf. 13:2). The familiar formulae they recited hardly justify their attitude of superiority. In the thought of him that is at ease there is contempt for misfortune (12:5a, ASV). In sheer exasperation Job bewails the whole situation. Because of his troubles, a man of godly wisdom is treated like a simpleton or criminal on the basis of a theory that is contradicted by another (equally distressing) fact, namely, that robbers are prospering while he is reduced to such mockery (12:4-6). Into whose hand God bringeth (12:6c). Better, who bring their god in their hand (ASV marg. and RSV). Lamech-like (cf. Gen 4:23,24; Dan 11:38) they idolize the weapon in their hand.

Ask now the beasts (12:7a). The three friends' doctrine of God's majestic wisdom is common knowledge; all creation teaches it. In 12:11-25 Job demonstrates his familiarity with the concept of divine rule, which his friends thought to teach him. His account of it, indeed, surpasses their own (cf. Ps 107). All the glory and dignity of man's earthly kingdoms are at the mercy of God's sovereign might (Job 12:23; cf. I Cor 1:25). The elemental forces of nature are at his disposal to overturn the earth (Job 12:15; cf. Gen 7). The highest civil and cultic dignitaries are impotent against him (Job 12:17-21,24). Verse 19 mentions priests (ASV) and 'ētānîm (cf. Ugaritic ytnm, a temple guild). Job takes special delight in expounding the text: "Hath not God made foolish the wisdom of this world?" (I Cor 1:20), and one need not look far to discover certain wise men he had particularly in mind.

Surely I would speak to the Almighty (13:3a; cf. 5:8). Mounting disgust with human helpers drives Job again to reason with God, but first he delivers a scathing rebuke to the self-appointed legal counsel for God (13:4-12). And it should be your wisdom (v. 5b). If they had never broken their seven days' silence, they would not have exposed their stupidity (cf. Prov 17:28). Will you show partiality toward him, will you plead the case for God? (13:8, RSV) They have disgraced their dignity by servility. Worse, they have curried God's favor at the expense of truth: ye are forgers [lit. plasterers] of lies (13:4; cf. v. 7). See the similar charge in 6:21,27. Your memorable sayings are proverbs of ashes, Your defenses are . . . of clay (13:12, ASV). The weighty maxims by which they falsely condemn Job in order to justify God are as vulnerable to the hammer of truth as clay to a hammer of iron. Their defense of God was an offense to God. They equated a certain providential procedure, falsely assumed to be invariably followed, with divine justice. In effect, they set up an abstract principle as an absolute and so subordinated God to it. Is it good that he should search you out? (13:9a) Zophar sought to convict Job of his supposed guilt by haling him before the bar of God's omniscience. The patriarch reminds him and his associate prosecuting attorneys that, in the process of indicting him, they too have come to stand before that Judge; and under such scrutiny their impious motives and false charges cannot escape detection. He will surely reprove you (13:10a) is Job's accurate prediction (cf. 42:7ff.). Though Job's confidence in the justice of God is obscured, in his more desperate moments, by his ascription of absolute caprice to the Almighty, he has not lost it altogether.

13:13-19. In the process now of turning from men to God, Job stirs up his courage to face his Judge. Let come on me what will (v. 13b). He intends to plead his cause at all hazards, even though it may imperil his life (v. 14). Behold, he will slay me; I have no hope: Nevertheless I will maintain my ways before him (v. 15, ASV). This translation follows the Hebrew text, and it suits the context better than the familiar AV rendering — yet will I trust in him. The latter depends on the Masoretic marginal suggestion to read lô ("for him") instead of lō' ("not"). The verb in the disputed clause means "wait in patiently eager expectation" (cf. 6:11; 14:14). Job has nothing to look forward to, for he expects God to terminate his life very soon — perhaps all the sooner for the bold plea he is about to make. Nevertheless, he must declare his innocence. This also shall be my salvation (v. 16a, ASV). This daring desire to come before God is itself a token of a favorable verdict; for the presence of God is the one place shunned above all others by one whose heart condemns him as a hypocrite. Who is there that will contend with me? For then I would be silent and die (v. 19, RSV). A triumphant challenge, but unseemly if Job envisages God as well as men. If he could be successfully contradicted, if he could be proved ungodly in reality—and not just according to appearances and theories—, he would die dumb. But that, he knows, is impossible: I know that I shall be justified (v. 18b).

13:20—14:22. Then will I not hide myself from thee (13:20b). If granted a fair trial, Job will not, like Adam, flee from God, covered with shame. If only God will desist for a time from oppressing him and refrain from overwhelming him with his terrible majesty (13:21; cf. 9:34, 35), Job will appear before him either as defendant or as complainant (v. 22). If Job can successfully defend his integrity, it will be evident (according to his inadequate concept of human suffering) that God has been at fault in afflicting him so severely. Or, if Job is to succeed in convicting God of such wrong, he must first demonstrate his own integrity. Imagining himself as confronting his tormentor in the coveted trial, the sufferer now demands an explanation of God's hostility (13:23,24). But the judicial scene quickly fades, and the court oratory turns into the customary closing lamentation (13:25ff.).

Thou . . . makest me to possess the iniquities of my youth (13:26b). Compare with this the affirmation of man's universal sinfulness in 14:4. When Job was disputing with his friends, the issue at stake was his general integrity, concerning which he was outspokenly confident. But apparently, in the imagined confrontation with the Judge, that issue yielded to the more penetrating question of the status of a sinner before the perfectly holy One. Job's later response to the actual theophany is foreshadowed here (cf. 40:3-5). Meanwhile, his fearful desolation, not accounted for by the general sinfulness of men, crushes his spirit. Turn from him, that he may rest, till he shall accomplish, as an hireling, his day (14:6). Though this lament is expressed in terms of the frailty of all mortals, it is nevertheless personal (cf. 14:3b). Let the common toil and sorrow of mankind suffice for Job (cf. 7:1ff.; Gen 3:17-19). Till the heavens be no more, they shall not awake (14:12b). Once laid low in death, man, like a felled tree (14:7-9), has no prospect of standing again on the earth (14:10-12). (For the eternity of the heavens, cf. Ps 72:5,7,17; 89:29,36,37; Jer 31:35,36.) Job does not expect annihilation, but he despairs of anything beyond death except existence in Sheol, which is not real life.

Recoiling from such gloom, he exclaims: Oh that thou wouldest hide me in Sheol . . . and remember me! (14:13, ASV) If this longing would come true; if Sheol were only a temporary abode and, indeed, a place of relief from the present inexplicable hostility of God (v. 13); if beyond Sheol there were a resurrection change (v. 14c) springing from renewed compassion in the Creator (v. 15) — so blessed a future would transfigure the present warfare (v. 14b)! The concept of resurrection does not provide the key to unlock the mystery of Job's present suffering, but it does offer a framework for hope. Job's yearning later becomes conviction (19:25ff.), and such a hope is glorious. This ultimate hope of redemption is not, however, the central theme of the Book of Job. The book does, indeed, challenge us to endure, with hope. But it confronts us with an even more profound demand. It sounds the primary and everlasting call for glad consecration, come what may, to the covenant Lord.

But now thou numberest my steps (14:16a, ASV). The curve of Job's spiritual state through the course of the great debate is graphed in reduced scale in individual replies like this, where the climax is not at the end but is followed by an emotional decrescendo. The flame of the patriarch's hope is extinguished, though only for the moment, by his bitter thoughts of the unsparing severity of God, who miser-like hordes up Job's every sin for visitation (14:16,17). Thou destroyest the hope of man (14:19c). By incessant affliction, even as a constant force in nature wears away the most durable objects (14:18,19). Thou prevailest for ever against him (14:20a). God's hostility culminates in the death stroke, cutting man off from rapport with this world, even from knowledge of his posterity (14:21), shutting him up to himself in death, to the endless dull pain of decomposition and the soul's dreary dirge (14:22).

2) Second Cycle of Debate. 15:1–21:34.

a) Second Discourse of Eliphaz. 15:1–35.

How a round of debate can alienate friends! The genteel Eliphaz forgets even introductory civilities. All is new censorious warning. The philosopher exposes his professional sensitivity to Job's slights (cf. 12:2,3,7ff.; 13:1,2,5,12) by reverting to the relative wisdom of himself and Job each time he introduces a new indictment (cf. vv. 1ff., 7ff., 17ff.).

1-6. Vain knowledge (v. 2a). Literally, knowledge of wind. Cf. the parallel east wind (v. 2b), i.e., the violent, suffocating desert blast. Job's claims to wisdom are belied by his windy speeches (v. 3). Yea, thou doest away with fear, And hinderest devotion before God (v. 4, ASV). Job's brazen outbursts are worse than intemperate, for they depreciate the fear of God, and so undermine religion. The tongue of the crafty (v. 5b). Possibly an allusion to the "subtle" (same word) serpent in Gen 3:1. Job's guilt explains his words (v. 5), and his words prove his guilt (v. 6).

7-16. The friends have the advantage over Job in age and hence in wisdom (vv. 7-10; cf. 12:12). His bravado to the contrary, Job has not the antiquity of Adam nor of some primeval beings (v. 7; cf. wisdom personified in Prov 8:22ff.). Neither has he any special, secret knowledge of God's decrees (Job 15:8; cf. the heavenly scenes in the Prologue). Perhaps verse 10 refers particularly to Eliphaz. Are the consolations of God too small for thee (v. 11, ASV). A rather charitable description of the friends' counsel, but in line with Eliphaz' alleged special revelation (4:12ff.), which he now echoes (vv. 14-16; cf. 4:17-19). The purpose of the repetition is revealed by a comparison of 15:16 with 4:19. Eliphaz seeks to express his revised estimate of Job as one who lusts disgustingly after sin.

17-35. Unto whom alone the earth was given (v. 19a). In addition to the personal observations of the eldest contemporaries (v. 17; cf. v. 10), Eliphaz invokes the sanction of purest tradition (vv. 18,19) to support his retribution dogma and contradict the Joban heresy that the ungodly often prosper (cf. 12:6). The prosperity of the wicked, with whom Job (by his afflictions) is evidently identified, is merely imaginary (vv. 20-35). He believeth not that he shall return out of darkness (v. 22a). His peace is ruined by presentiments of calamity without remedy (vv. 20-24), the tormenting forebodings of a conscience defiled by carnal ease and contempt of God (vv. 25-28). Every promising enterprise he undertakes proves abortive (vv. 29-34), according to the law of retribution (v. 35), which may be delayed but not thwarted. Eliphaz has here sounded the counselors' keynote for the second round of debate.

b) Job's Second Reply to Eliphaz. 16:1–17:16.

As the crisis of faith nears, Job pays little attention to his friends' arguments, except to express his disappointment in a brief introduction (16:1-5). In the remainder of this speech Job seems to be musing aloud and only occasionally addressing his words to God (16:8; 17:3,4) or to his friends (17:10).

16:1-5. Miserable comforters (v. 2b). Literally, comforters of trouble. A sarcastic response to Eliphaz' query (15:11). The counsel of the three friends has not merely been irrelevant; but it has also betrayed their ignorance of the comfort of redemptive righteousness.

6-17. Though I speak (v. 6a). It seems useless to Job to continue the lament and the debate, for both man and God are set against him. His fervent protestations of innocence have been and will be interpreted as proof of godlessness. Devoid of inner resources and outer reinforcements (v. 7), he is labeled "sinner" by his impotent wretchedness (v. 8). He hath torn me in his wrath (v. 9a, ASV). It seems to Job that God has savagely rent him (v. 9), and given him over to the spiteful rabble, who had once been obliged to respect him (vv. 10,11). God shatters (v. 12a) and batters (v. 14) him, piercing his vitals (vv. 12b,13) and reducing him to a sobbing wreck, prostrate in the dust (vv. 15,16). And all without cause: Although there is no violence in my hands, And my prayer is pure (v. 17, ASV; cf. Isa 53:9).

16:18–17:3. The power of God that is made known to a man in his weakness now enables Job to hope against hope. O earth, cover not thou my blood (v. 18a). The cry of Job's innocent blood demanding vindication must not be muffled (cf. Gen 4:10; Heb 12:24). Even now, behold, my witness is in heaven (v. 19a, ASV). This heavenly witness-avenger is God himself! Job prays to him with tears (v. 20b), that he will maintain the right of a man with God and with his neighbor (v. 21, ASV). This paradoxical faith in God to advocate Job's case against God, who now slays him, reappears in the plea: Give now a pledge, be surety for me with thyself (17:3, ASV). Let God covenant to establish Job's integrity at the time of judgment.

17:4-9. Verse 4 is transitional. It explains that God must provide Job's pledge because human friends refuse to do so, and it launches a lament over the patriarch's public humiliation. Job's experience cannot but astound righteous men (v. 8). But they (and Job among them) will persevere the more in righteousness, undaunted by the irregular dealings of providence or the slanders of the public. A triumphant confession; it confounds Satan's hopes (cf. 2:5).

10-16. Job's changes in mood are abrupt and extreme. Disdainfully inviting the wisdomless wise men to renew their witless counsel (v. 10), Job concludes with a description of his pathetic plight —on the brink of community with the worms.

c) Second Discourse of Bildad. 18: 1-21.

In his longing for a divine advocate, Job probes far deeper into the mystery of godliness than do his counselors, whose later replies degenerate into irrelevant harangues on the woes of the wicked.

1-4. Resentful of Job's low estimate of his accusers' acumen (v. 3; cf. 17:10; 12:7), Bildad retorts in kind: Thou that tearest thyself in thine anger (v. 4a, ASV), like a stupid brute, bellowing the while that God is to blame (cf. 16:9). To judge from the way Job beats himself to death against the established order of creation and providence (in particular, against the law of retribution invoked by the friends), it would seem that he expects the universe to be redesigned just for him (v. 4b, c). The plural forms in verses 2 and 3 are possibly in sarcastic allusion to Job's associating himself with the company of the righteous (cf. 17: 8,9).

5-21. This word-painting, entitled by the artist the dwellings of the wicked (v. 21a), is not an exact likeness of its original, but it is sufficiently so for Job to recognize it as his portrait. He beholds his tent-site strewn with brimstone, symbol of God's perpetual curse (v. 15b; cf. 1:16; Gen 19:24; Deut 29:23). He sees himself being consumed by the firstborn of death (v. 13b), i.e., deadly disease; being hurried off to the king of terrors (v. 14b), death itself; being chased into oblivion (vv. 16-19), a spectacle of horror at which people involuntarily shudder (v. 20).

d) Job's Second Reply to Bildad. 19: 1-29.

Felled by Bildad's brutal judgments (cf. 18:20), Job cannot summon the contemptuous indifference he showed toward the disputants in his previous speech. He is starved for understanding, and he seeks pity from his fellow human beings (19:2-22). But he finds them inhuman still. In his extremity, however, he discovers again the breath of life in the love of God, his heavenly Sympathizer (vv. 23-29).

2-22. Job's introductory plaint leads to further self-defense, along with a description of his desolation (vv. 7-12) and isolation (vv. 13-19). If the friends are so antagonistic that they must prosecute the case against him (v. 5; cf. 22), let them know now that God hath subverted Job in his cause (v. 6a, ASV; Bildad used the same verb in 8:3, to which this is a delayed reaction). They are defending injustice. Mine acquaintance are wholly estranged from me (v. 13b, ASV). Job's sense of ostracism, aggravated by the debaters' callous handling of him, has become a crushing burden. He is avoided, forgotten, abhorred by all—from nodding acquaintance to closest family intimate (vv. 13-18), and last but not least by his group of counselors (v. 19). Out of this abandonment issues the double Have pity upon me (v. 21a). Enough of accusation and false charges! (v. 22) Thus this section comes full circle (cf. vv. 2,3), encompassing Job in dereliction.

23-29. Since his contemporaries disbelieve his personal witness to his integrity, Job wishes it might be committed to writing on a scroll (v. 23) or, more indelibly, on a rock (v. 24). Then it might secure a hearing and possibly a kinder verdict from some future generation. By the inclusion of Job's history in the Scriptures, that wish has been realized beyond his imagining. Job despaired, however, of any fulfillment whatsoever. Besides, what his soul most craved was not human but divine vindication. The look to the future was, therefore, only preliminary to the look unto heaven: But I know that my Redeemer lives and at the last he shall arise upon the dust (v. 25). The hope of a heavenly, a divine vindicator which had been gathering strength in Job's soul (cf. 9:33; 16:18ff.) is here perfected. The office of the redeemer (gô'ēl) was that of next of kin. It was his responsibility to restore the fortune, liberty, and name of his relative, when necessary, and to redress his wrongs, especially to avenge the shedding of innocent blood. Job is confident that although all earthly kin may disown him (cf. v. 13 ff.), his divine kinsman is prepared to own him and to speak in his favor the last word in the case (cf. Isa 44:6). The heavenly gô'ēl, hearing the cry of Job's innocent blood from the dust of his grave (cf. Job 16:18; 17:16), will pursue his defamers (vv. 28,29) and avenge his name.

And after the loss of my skin which is thus destroyed, even from my flesh shall I see God (v. 26). Like English "from," the Hebrew preposition here translated "from" is ambiguous, meaning "in" or "without" (though the latter meaning is not attested elsewhere with a verb of perception). Job still regards death as imminent for his wasted body, rapidly being destroyed by disease (cf. v. 20); but his earlier longing for a return from Sheol to true life (14:13-15) revives now as a firm hope. God will thoroughly fulfill his kinsman's office, even delivering Job from the tyranny of the king of terrors. Hence, Job will witness, as he never could if he were cut off in Sheol (cf. 14:21,22), the intervention of God in the real world for his vindication. However the phrase from my flesh is construed, Job still expresses the idea of a renewal of the whole man after death. The emphasis of 19:27 is probably not that Job rather than another will see God (AV), but that Job will behold God as his kinsman, not as a stranger (ASV) hostile to him (cf. vv. 11,12). Here are the beginnings of what progressive revelation would ultimately enunciate in the doctrines of the coming of Christ at the end times, the resurrection of the dead, and final judgment. The fact that neither Job nor any other speaker subsequently refers to these exalted convictions is further indication that the author's purpose was not theodicy. This remarkable thrust of faith at the midpoint of the debate served to break the tension for Job, even though his spirit was unable to maintain this sublime level.

e) Second Discourse of Zophar. 20:1-29.

Job has struck such chords of redemptive truth as to thrill angels, but Zophar, having ears, hears not. He is enamored of Eliphaz' song, and he joins in close harmony with Bildad, continuing the ballad of the wicked man. Unfortunately, Zophar is too often content to draw the inspiration for his lyrics from the dunghill where the friends found Job.

I have heard the reproof which putteth me to shame (v. 3a, ASV). At the threat of God's pursuing him to avenge Job's blood (cf. 19:29), Zophar seethes with anger. He hastens to recast the actors, making Job the culprit on whom God wreaks vengeance for his oppression of the poor (v. 19). According to all the friends, the alleged prosperity of the wicked is deceptive, evanescent. Eliphaz stressed the continual inner unrest of the wicked; Bildad pointed to his perpetual desolation; Zophar emphasizes his sudden vengeance at the pinnacle of his rapacious career. While his ambition is in the clouds (v. 6) and his bones are full of his youth (v. 11, ASV), when he has just savored sin like a delicate morsel (vv. 12,13,15a), in the fulness of his sufficiency (v. 22)—then the Avenger overtakes him (v. 23). Verse 27 is a direct contradiction of Job's hope (cf. 16:18,19; 19:25) and serves, in case there should be some doubt in Job's mind, to identify Zophar's wicked man.

f) Job's Second Reply to Zophar. 21:1-34.

The accusers, blind to Job's transparent sincerity, have denied rather than explained the mystery of his afflictions. But stronger now in hope, Job rises above his disappointment in them and takes the initiative in the debate. His eyes, once opened by his own strange experience to the fallacy of the tidy traditional notion of retribution, perceive that history abounds in "exceptional" cases. After a prefatory request for attention (vv. 2-6), he proceeds to undermine the opposition by exposing the fallacy in their analysis of the fortunes of the wicked (vv. 7-34).

2-6. Let this be your consolations (v. 2b). Their open ears afford more comfort than their open mouths (cf. the similar sarcastic response to Zophar in 13:5). The force of Job's argument should silence them (v. 5).

7-34. Job describes the prosperity of the wicked, first in general terms (vv. 7-16), then in contradiction of the friends' specific representations (vv. 17-26), and finally by way of his self-defense (vv. 27-34).

7-16. Wherefore (v. 7). The apparent inequity of life, though it supports Job's case, troubles him (cf. v. 6) precisely because he recognizes that God governs all (vv. 9b,16a). It is indicative of Job's integrity that even in his misery he would not exchange places with the wicked rich (16b). Job does not, however, appreciate sufficiently the necessity of divine grace for the continuance of the fallen race in this world. Furthermore, he lacks understanding of the evangelical goal of the common grace enjoyed by unbelievers (Rom 2:4; cf. Mt 5:45).

17:26. How oft (v. 17). The patriarch challenges the statistics on which the accusers lean (cf. v. 29). Job himself exaggerates, but he is nearer the truth than his opponents. In 21:19a Job anticipates a possible evasion (cf. 5:4; 20:10) and rebuts it (21:19b-21). The verbs in verses 19b,20 have the force of command; e.g., Let his own eyes see his destruction (v. 20a, ASV). Shall any teach God knowledge? (v. 22a) The traditional theory constitutes a disguised criticism of God's actual ways (vv. 23-26).

27-34. I know your thoughts (v. 27a). Job recognized his image in their veiled portraits. Have you not asked those who travel the roads? (v. 29a, RSV) Though the friends recommend their observations as primeval law (cf. 20:4), they are ivory-tower theorists, out of touch with real life (cf. comments on 4:2-11). The wicked man is spared in the day of calamity . . . he is rescued in the day of wrath (v. 30, RSV). The AV would make Job inconsistently endorse his friends' view of the death of the wicked, whereas Job insists that the death of such men is often easy (vv. 13b, 23) and honorable (32,33). Job's estimate of the career of the unrighteous lacks a balancing emphasis (found to an extent in the friends' speeches) on their spiritual unrest during life and perdition hereafter. But by puncturing the balloon of airtight retribution, Job leaves his accusers clinging to falsehood (v. 34).

3. Third Cycle of Debate. 22:1—31:40.

a) Third Discourse of Eliphaz. 22:1-30.

The conclusion inherent in the three friends' theory from the beginning and ever more broadly hinted at is now blurted out unashamedly. This open accusation of Job was their only alternative to capitulation after Job's considered denial that justice is uniformly discernible in God's treatment of men. The lamentable fact is that the friends endorsed Satan's view of Job as a hypocrite. Thinking to defend God, they became Satan's advocates, insisting that he whom God designated as His servant belonged to the devil.

2-11. Since the all-sufficient God cannot be helped or harmed by man's actions, the answer to Job's sufferings cannot be in Him (vv. 2,3). Certainly Job is not being punished for piety: Is it for thy fear of him that he reproveth thee? (v. 4a, ASV) From these negative premises Eliphaz draws his positive conclusion in a sad betrayal of truth and brotherhood. Is not thy wickedness great (v. 5a). . . . Therefore snares are round about thee (v. 10a, ASV). For lack of real evidence Eliphaz finds the key to the precise nature of Job's crimes in his former wealth—its accumulation must have been stained by inhuman abuse of the poor and weak (vv. 6-9). Contrary to this drastic oversimplification of Job's dilemma, the Prologue has, of course, revealed to the reader that the answer was in God, who, though all-sufficient in himself, glorifies himself in his works and had decreed Job's trial for the praise of his redemptive wisdom.

12-20. And thou sayest, What doth God know? (v. 13a, ASV) Presuming to read Job's secret thoughts, Eliphaz puts in Job's mouth blasphemies untrue to the sentiments he has actually expressed (vv. 12-14). The fictitious argument is, then, unsatisfactorily answered by appeal to the unusual divine judgment on the Deluge generation (15ff.; cf. Gen 6:1-7; 8:21,22).

21-30. Eliphaz' last words, urging return to God in hope of peace and blessing, remind us that, in spite of all, he was a friend in the family of faith. Nevertheless, this consolation is vitiated by its Pharisaic spirit and its implicit repetition of the false accusations. In their distorted way these promises were prophetic of the sequel. Note especially 22:30: He will deliver even him that is not innocent: Yea, he shall be delivered through the cleanness of thy hands (ASV). Cf. Job's intercession for the friends (42:7-9).

b) Job's Third Reply to Eliphaz. 23:1--24:25.

The patriarch refrains from indignantly denying Eliphaz' unfounded charges, and resumes the theme of his previous speech (ch. 21). This monologue is, therefore, only indirectly a reply to Eliphaz. Job ponders the perplexing absence of discernible justice in God's dealings with himself, a righteous man (ch. 23), and with the wicked (ch. 24).

2-9. Even today is my complaint rebellious (v. 2a, ASV). Job stubbornly refuses to yield to any exhortation to penitence which implies that his sufferings are his just desert (cf. 22:21ff.). Oh that I knew where I might find him! (v. 3a) Since he now believes that his divine Avenger lives, his longing to appear before God is more ardent than before, and his confidence in his vindication firmer than ever (vv. 4-7). But he cannot find God to reason with him face to face (vv. 8,9).

10-17. But he knoweth the way that I take (v. 10a). Knoweth probably expresses here not mere acquaintance but approval (as in Ps 1:6). More than my own precept I treasured the words of his mouth (v. 12b). Job has all along followed the way Eliphaz recommends (cf. 22:22). Yet God inexorably executes against Job all he has foreordained, in apparent disregard of merit or demerit (23:13,14). Therefore am I terrified at his presence (v. 15a, ASV) . . . not because of the darkness or because of my own face which thick darkness covers (v. 17; cf. ASV marg.). Not dark calamity (cf. 22:11) nor marred visage most dismayed Job but the inaccessibility of God (23:16) and his seeming failure to inform his providential rule with justice.

24:1-12. The burden of this section is found in its opening and closing words: Why are times not laid up by the Almighty? And why do not they that know him see his days (v. 1, ASV) . . . God regardeth not the folly (v. 12c, ASV). God does not, like Samuel (cf. I Sam 7:16), have a regular judging circuit for preserving order and punishing crime. Cruel and greedy men prey, unchecked, upon the helpless. Job voices, therefore, the plaintive "How long?" of those who are oppressed by the lords of the soil.

13-17. Economic tyrants, such as those just described, often operate within legal technicalities. In addition to them, wanton and violent men overrun the earth. These are murderers, adulterers, thieves (cf. Ex 20:13-15), all lovers of darkness.

18-20. If the point of these verses is the quick, easy death of the wicked and the subsequent cursing of his heritage, unobserved by him, they agree with Job's views in chapter 21. The RSV introduces them with, "You say," so adopting the interpretation that Job here quotes the opposition's view of the certain doom of the wicked in order to answer it (cf. v. 21ff.). Possibly this section represents a corrective modification in Job's earlier analysis of the wicked (cf. 27:7ff.).

21-25. Yet God preserveth the mighty by his power (22a, ASV; for vv. 22,23, see ASV for correction of AV). God allows the lives of the wicked to attain full maturity and to end as other men's lives end (v. 24). Who will prove me a liar (25a, ASV). Sure of his facts, Job issues his victory challenge.

c) Third Discourse of Bildad. 25:1-6.

Bildad avoids Job's challenge (24:25). Anxious, however, to say something, he repeats ideas expressed earlier by Eliphaz (cf. 4:17ff.; 15:14ff.) and accepted by Job (cf. 9:2; 14:4). The inept repetition indicates that the philosophers have exhausted their resources of wisdom. Bildad's brief, feeble effort represents their expiring breath. Zophar's subsequent failure to speak is the silence of the vanquished (cf. 29:22).

Job, an insignificant worm of the dust, says Bildad, by comparison with the glorious heavenly bodies (v. 6), may not hope to prove his innocence before God (v. 4), whose awe-inspiring majesty prevails universally (vv. 2, 3), putting to shame even the brightness of moon and stars (v. 5). The speech is reverent but irrelevant.

d) Job's Third Reply to Bildad. 26:1-14.

Job pursues more impressively and to better purpose the theme attempted by Bildad—God's wondrously wise ways (cf. 9:4-10; 12:13-25).

2-4. The patriarch indulges his bent for sarcasm as he turns in disdain from Bildad's useless recitation. From whom hast thou declared words (4a. On 'ēt, "from," cf. Akk. ittu; on this use of 'ēt, with higgîd, cf. Mic 3:8). Bildad's ideas were but echoes of Eliphaz', and his use of them to condemn Job was more likely inspired by Satan than by God.

5-14. They that are deceased tremble Beneath the waters and the inhabitants thereof (v. 5, ASV). More remarkable than the awe God instills in beings near his heavenly throne (25:2) is the consternation his wisdom and dominion bring to the shades in Sheol (26:5,6). Whether Job's cosmology actually agreed with ancient concepts or is merely figuratively expressed, it is not presented as necessarily normative revelation. In his survey of the evidences of God's greatness, the speaker now passes from the underworld to this world (vv. 7-13). Though verse 7 might envisage creative action, this section as a whole pictures God's general providential rule of nature. The north over empty space (v. 7a, ASV), refers to the northern heavens. He incloseth the face of his throne (v. 9a, ASV) means, He veils the heaven with clouds. The qualification in 26:10b is not temporal (AV) but spatial (ASV). The pillars of heaven (v. 11), are mountains, their peaks hidden in clouds. He smiteth through Rahab (v. 12b, ASV) . . . His hand hath pierced the fleeing serpent (v. 13b, ASV marg.). God controls the upper and lower waters to procure favorable climatic order. For the mythological imagery, cf. Isa 27:1; Ugaritic text, Gordon UH 67, I, 1ff. Lo, these are but the outskirts of his ways: And how small a whisper do we hear of him! (v. 14a,b, ASV; cf. ch. 28) If Job's friends had recognized the limitations of their knowledge, they would have avoided their misinterpretations. Job's praise of the perfection of God's knowledge contradicts their identification of him with ungodly men.

e) Job's Instruction of the Silenced Friends. 27:1–28:28.

Since Zophar fails to speak, Job continues, now addressing all the friends (cf. plurals in 27:11,12). Aware of his mastery, he assumes the role of teacher (27:11). After once again declaiming his righteousness, with a strong oath (27:1-7), he contrasts his own experience with that of the wicked (27:8-23). Chapter 28 is an artistic introduction to the way of wisdom. Modern critics have argued forcefully that the text from 27:7 on has suffered disarrangement. They contend that the sentiments expressed contradict Job's previous remarks, or, in the case of chapter 28, are incompatible with the sequel. It seems possible, however, to defend the originality of the present textual arrangement, and the following exposition is based upon it.

27:1-7. As God liveth, who hath taken away my right (v. 2a, ASV). This oath remarkably epitomizes Job's spiritual dilemma. On the one hand, it proclaims God the God of truth, and on the other, charges that his treatment of Job is unjust. Surely my lips do not speak unrighteousness (v. 4a, ASV, marg.). This is not a vow (AV); it is a declaration that Job's unshakable claim to integrity (vv. 5,6) is true to conscience and fact.

Let mine enemy be as the wicked (v. 7a). The reader of the Prologue appreciates how diabolical was the accusation that Job's piety was not genuine.

8-23. For what is the hope of the godless when God cuts him off? (v. 8a, RSV) No longer driven to reactionary extremes by the pressure of debate, Job achieves a more penetratingly spiritual analysis of the ungodly. They are without God in the world. That means not only that they will suffer eternal perdition (v. 8), but that they have no divine refuge amid present trouble (vv. 9,10; cf. 22b). Why then are ye become altogether vain? (v. 12b, ASV) The friends should have recognized by Job's persistent crying to God that their identification of him with the godless was false (cf. 35:9ff.). This is the portion of a wicked man with God (v. 13a; cf. 20:29; 31:2). The prosperity of an ungodly family (vv. 14-18) is not passed down through successive generations. As for a wicked individual, prosperity is not his final destiny (vv. 19-23). Job so far modifies his former statement as to agree with his silenced opponents that the prosperity of the wicked is not the dominant trend in the world. But he still recognizes that the wicked may prosper for a season. And any such exception is fatal to the logic of the theory that condemned him.

28:1-28. Some commentators regard this chapter as a hymnic interlude inserted by the author to separate the dialogue from Job's final summing up (chs. 29–31). It is treated here as a continuation of Job's instruction "concerning the hand of God" (27:11a, ASV) and, as such, further demonstrates that his piety is both genuine and fervent.

1-11. As a foil to the following theme of the failure of man to gain true wisdom apart from God (v. 12ff.), there is pictured the success of the daring sons of Tubal-cain (cf. Gen 4:22) in exploiting earth's hidden treasures. Mankind's conquest of the earth, commanded by God at the beginning (Gen 1:28), is marked by phenomenal technological triumphs.

12-19. But where shall wisdom be found? (v. 12a) The next section (20-27) is also introduced by this refrain question. There it receives a positive answer, but here a negative one. In spite of amazing achievements in scientific enterprise (vv. 1-11), men are unable by the techniques or treasures of science to attain wisdom. That supreme prize cannot be obtained by probing or purchase, because it is not, like some precious stones, deposited in earth or sea (vv. 13,14).

20-27. Back of the assumption that man can discover wisdom lies the presupposition that the Creator possesses infinite wisdom. Wisdom is not found in the land of the living (v. 21; cf. 13,14), nor in the realm of the dead (v. 22). The way of wisdom is beyond the unaided ken of man here or hereafter. It is directly visible only to the One who enjoys all-encompassing, all-penetrating perception (vv. 23,24). Note the use of hearing and seeing for partial and perfect knowledge respectively (vv. 21-27). The Creator perceived wisdom in the beginning, when he was ordaining the laws of the world (vv. 25,26). In fact, the natural creation, with its governing laws, established by God, is an expression and embodiment of wisdom (v. 27; cf. Prov 8:22-31). For wisdom is the word of his will and becomes articulate for man in God's law – natural and moral. Divine law is the form in which God reveals his wisdom to men.

28. The fear of the Lord, that is wisdom. Man's reverent acknowledgment that he and his world are subject to the Creator is so much the lifeblood of human wisdom that it can be identified with wisdom. A man begins to be wise when he ceases to strive for wisdom independently of God and in his own power. He advances in wisdom through meditation on the moral law and investigation of natural law. Apart from a true recognition of divine revelation, whether in the natural creation or in the Word, man's meditation and investigation produce not wisdom but folly. The cultural enterprise not begun and consummated in the cult is vain. And the cult, if it be not the true cult of the Lord, is vanity. The fear of the Lord, covenant consecration, is the beginning and chief part of wisdom.

f) Job's Final Protest. 29:1–31:40.

The engagement with the friends is over; now the encounter with God comes to the fore. In a final monologue Job summarizes his cause. The direct address in 30:20-23 marks it as part of Job's continuing recourse to God. This speech is a reiteration of Job's opening complaint, considerably tempered for having passed through the fires of the great debate. It is a trilogy, consisting of a description of Job's former exaltation (ch. 29), a description of his present humiliation (ch. 30), and a final protestation of innocence (ch. 31).

1-25. Job begins this exposition of his extraordinary history where the Book of Job begins it — in the prosperous months of old (v. 2a, ASV). In the ripeness of my days (v. 4a, ASV); not youth (AV). Job starts with the heart of the matter (as the book also does) — the close covenant bond between himself and God (cf. 1:1). The blessedness of those former days which now stirs such longing in Job was not the paradise-like abundance as such (v. 6), but the friendly favor of God (cf. Ps 25:14), from which that prosperity flowed (vv. 2-5). When I went forth to the gate (v. 7a, ASV). Because Job's estate was adjacent to the city, Job was active in civil and judicial affairs. The gate and adjoining "street," or open market place, was the location of the town forum. The eminent role the patriarch had played in council and court seems to him now the most significant aspect of his past (vv. 7-17,21-25), viewed from his present personal struggle for justice. The last word, so grudgingly granted him in the present debate, had always before been his undisputed right (vv. 21-23) as he sat a king among his fellows (v. 25). The irony was that he who had been the celebrated champion of the poor and oppressed (vv. 11-17), the beloved comforter of mourners (v. 25c), was now, in his trouble, denied a fair hearing by friends (cf. esp. ch. 22) and, apparently, by God. I put on righteousness and it clothed itself with me (v. 14a, ASV marg.). The righteous cause became incarnate in Job, who, undaunted by despondency or difficulty (v. 24, ASV), wielded the sword of justice to deliver the innocent from predatory men (v. 17a; cf. Isa 11:2-5; Ps 72:12-14). One of the blessings of Job's lost paradise had been his happy hopes of prolonged days in the bosom of his family (Job 29:18), of honor (20a), and of strength (20b) constantly renewed (v. 19). Job presently relates the sad confounding of these hopes (ch. 30).

30:1-31. The repetition of But now .... And now .... And now (vv. 1, 9,16) effectively accents the theme as Job contrasts the bleak, turbulent present with the peaceful past. The king of counselors has become the byword of fools (vv. 1-15). The friendly favor of God has turned into cruelty (vv. 16-23).

1-15. The extremity of Job's dishonor appears in the fact that even the lowest of humanity look down on him. By describing their wretchedness (vv. 1-8; cf. 24:5ff.), the sufferer suggests with skilfull indirectness his own yet worse condition. So devoid of all dignity and reliability was this bestialized breed (vv. 6-8) of starving outcasts (vv. 3-5), that Job, for all his sympathy towards social inferiors (cf. 29:12ff.; 31:15), would not have entrusted even their eldest with responsibilities customarily given to shepherd dogs (v. 1b). Men whose vigor is gone (v. 2b, RSV). They lack even the physical stamina to serve as hirelings. But now even the juveniles (v. 1a) of this rabble regard Job as the fitting butt of their derisive ditties (v. 9). No show of contempt is too mean for them (v. 10; cf. 17:6, ASV) as with unbridled spite (v. 11b) they devise torments (v. 12ff.) against this ruined bourgeois, now a helpless outcast in their dunghill domain.

16-23. Far more distressing to the patriarch than the cruelty of men is that of God (v. 21a), who seems to stare stonily (v. 20b, ASV) at his pleading victim. God persecutes Job (v. 21b, with physical afflictions continually (vv. 16b,17), humiliatingly (vv. 18,19), mercilessly (vv. 20,21), violently (v. 22, ASV), unto the grave (v. 23). Though Job fails here to pursue the logical implications and to appropriate the comfort of his recently expressed thoughts concerning wisdom, human and divine (ch. 28), it must be remembered that he was not stone but a man of flesh, and still being crushed by the serpent's coils.

24-31. A melancholy cry concludes Job's reflections on his humiliation and dereliction. To cry for help in distress is natural (v. 24, according to ASV and RSV), especially when the calamity is contrary to all expectations (vv. 25,26; cf. 29:15-20). In emotional turmoil (v. 27, ASV), Job wails before the world (v. 28, ASV) like a howling jackal or dolorous ostrich (v. 29, ASV). With deathfever consuming him (v. 30), he plays beforehand a dirge against the day of his burying (v. 31).

31:1-40. Protestation of innocence has been Job's main burden all along. Here, elaborately formulated, it becomes the climax of his peroration. In form, this is a retroactive oath of covenant allegiance (cf. v. 1a). In such oaths the speaker called down curses upon his own head for proved violations of the moral code (cf., e.g., the Hittite Soldiers' Oath, ANET, 353, 354). Even the imagery of the extant samples of such ancient oaths corresponds with Job's (e.g., loss of crops, grinding, breaking of limbs, thistles. See vv. 8,10,22,40). The picture, therefore, is that of the covenant vassal protesting his faithfulness to the various stipulations laid upon him, dumbfounded that his sovereign has visited him with the curses rather than the blessings of the covenant (cf. Deut 28:18,31,35). God seems to Job to have forsaken the suzerain's role as protector, and strangely turned enemy against an obedient vassal.

1-8. Job begins by disclaiming private sins of the heart — lust (v. 1), vain deceit (v. 5), covetousness (v. 7). In this he displays profound insight into the spirituality of God's law (cf. the Sermon on the Mount, Mt 5; 6; 7). His deep concern with the Suzerain's imminent judgment emerges frequently (vv. 2-4; cf. 11,12,14,23,28), most strikingly in his self-maledictions (v. 8; cf. Deut 28:30c, 33). By these references to the penal sanctions of the covenant Job solemnizes his oaths of innocence. Mingled with Job's reverent fear of his Judge is his confident longing to stand before him, eloquently proclaimed in vv. 35-37 and more simply here (v. 6).

9-23. The patriarch also disavows public sins against his neighbors—adultery (v. 9), maltreatment of menials (v. 13), neglect of the social obligation of charity to the needy (vv. 16,17,19-21). Self-maledictions are attached to the first and last "if" clauses in this section. In addition, Job's denials are vigorously enforced: his denial of adultery, by indignant denunciation of such enormity (vv. 11,12); his denial of abuse of servants, by a reckoning with divine investigation (v. 14) and a recognition of common creaturely origin (v. 15); and his denial of uncharitableness, by positive affirmation of the opposite (v. 18) and confession of his fear of God (v. 23).

24-37. The charge of hypocrisy and secret iniquity that the counselors brought against him, for want of evidence of Job's supposed crimes, had already been contradicted by his protestations. It is now directly repudiated by his denial of concealed sin in his relations with God, his enemies, and strangers. Neither the deceitfulness of riches (vv. 24,25) nor the fascination of pagan worship of heavenly bodies (vv. 26,27) had ensnared Job in covert idolatry, the transgression of the most fundamental demand of allegiance to God (v. 28). Secret malice towards foes (v. 29) he firmly denies (v. 30). Household intimates acquainted with his private life can vouch that he has not begrudged hospitality to the passing stranger (vv. 31 [ASV, not AV], 32). Summing up, he forswears any similarity to Adam, who tried to hide his sin (v. 33; cf. 13:20; Gen 3:7-10). Job had no need to fear the open scrutiny of society (Job 31:34) or of God (v. 35ff.). In utter contrast to the fright and flight of Adam at the approach of the Lord, Job passionately desires to confront God (v. 35a; cf. 13:3,22; 23:3-9; 30:20). Lo, here is my signature (v. 35b, ASV). Dramatizing the desired audience with God, Job represents the defense he has just offered as a signed and sealed legal document. Then, with consummate arrogance, he declares how he will stride before God as a prince (v. 37b), crowned with the very scroll of his indictment (v. 35c, ASV; v. 36) which will be transformed into an emblem of honor for him by being refuted charge by charge (v. 37a).

38-40. The impious challenge just uttered (vv. 35-37), while answering to the "if like Adam" condition (vv. 33,34), forms so satisfactory a refutation of the entire catalogue of sins and so grandiloquent a conclusion for the whole speech that many scholars regard the anticlimactic verses 38-40 as dislocated. Stylistically, however, the author of Job is fond of the penultimate climax (cf. e.g., 3:23ff.; 14:15ff.). And materially this final sin (vv. 38,39) and imprecation (v. 40) follow naturally the allusion to the fall of Adam (v. 33ff.), for Job here invokes the elementary primeval curse upon the ground (Gen 3:17,18; cf. Gen 4:11,12).

Job's protestations of innocence have kept pace with his deepening perception of the demands of divine holiness. But now his exhibition of remarkable penetration into God's moral requirements exposes an equally remarkable depth of self-righteousness in him. Such blindness to the depravity and deceitfulness of his own heart did not negate the genuineness of the divine redemptive work in Job. But it did constitute a serious spiritual need, to deal with which — as Elihu was presently to point out (ch. 32ff.) — was one purpose of God (even though not the paramount purpose) in appointing Job's sufferings.

4) The Ministry of Elihu. 32:1—37:24.

Elihu, apparently one of a larger audience attending the debate of the masters, now comes forward and presents his theodicy. Introducing him earlier would have marred the dramatic movement of the poem by a clumsy anticipation of the debate's outcome. The younger man was as ignorant as the others of the heavenly transactions related in the Prologue. His interpretation of Job's sufferings is, therefore, not comprehensive. Elihu did, however, perceive the significance of the all-important principle of God's free grace, which the others had slighted. Hence, with this speech, the light of day begins to dawn on the way of wisdom after the long night of debate, pierced by only an occasional gleam of understanding. The princely arrogance of Job is subdued, and thus Elihu serves as one sent before the face of the Lord to prepare the way for His coming in the whirlwind (ch. 38ff.).

The speech of Elihu (32:6–37:24), though marked by several pauses (34:1; 35:1; 36:1), is essentially a unit. Following the apology (32:6-22), the theodicy is developed in answer to particular complaints of Job (quoted in 33:8-11; 34:5-9; 35:2,3; cf. 36:17ff.) and by means of an exposition of God's grace (33:12-33), righteousness (34:10–36:25), and power (36:26–37:24).

32:1-5. The poetical form is briefly interrupted by this prose preface. Elihu's origins are rather fully traced (v. 2a; cf. 1:1; 2:11). Buzite. Cf. Gen 22:21. Job's failure to be more jealous of God's honor than his own had aroused Elihu's indignation (v. 2b); note the Lord's concurrence (40:8). What provoked Elihu to instruct his elders was the failure of the friends to answer satisfactorily Job's defiant protests against God. And yet had condemned Job (v. 3b). The friends' charge of hypocrisy was a shameful expedient to cover their logical and theological deficiencies. Another possible translation is: because they had not condemned Job. That is, they had failed to prove him wrong in his aspersions against divine justice. This agrees well with Elihu's interest in the justification of God. According to a variant ancient textual tradition, verse 3b would read: and so condemned God. That is, the friends' silence before the still-protesting Job was tantamount to their condemning God.

6-22. Elihu's preliminary apology for claiming the ears of the audience is here expanded beyond Occidental taste, but that may not reflect on proprieties in the land of Uz (cf. Iliad 14:122ff.). Days should speak (v. 7a). Deference for the wisdom associated with age had forestalled Elihu's earlier intervention (vv. 6,7,11). Wisdom, however, is basically a matter of divine gift, specifically of God's endowment of the spirit he has breathed into man: But it is the spirit in a man, the breath of the Almighty, that makes him understand (v. 8, RSV; cf. Gen 2:7). The inglorious performance of the counselors has demonstrated their lack of wisdom in spite of age (Job 32:9,12,15,16), while Elihu claims understanding in spite of youth (v. 6b,10). Rebuking them for abandoning the crusade (v. 13, ASV), Elihu undertakes it (vv. 16,17) with new strategy (v. 14), under the compulsion of a spirit bursting with knowledge of the mystery the sages found so perplexing (vv. 18-20), and with fearless devotion to truth alone (vv. 21,22).

33:1-33. The general apology has been directed to the friends. Now introducing his answer to Job's protests, Elihu addresses to him a challenge (vv. 1-7). He cites statements of Job (vv. 8-11) and gives his own reply (vv. 12-30). So the gauntlet is once more thrown down (vv. 31-33).

1-7. Behold, I am toward God even as thou art (v. 6a, ASV). Elihu is a fellow human being, made out of clay (v. 6b) by God's creative breath (v. 4; cf. Gen 2:7). Facing Elihu's challenge, Job cannot, therefore, make his favorite excuse that paralyzing divine terrors rob him of the composure necessary to defend himself (cf. Job 9:34; 13:21).

8-11. Elihu does not misrepresent Job's position. Job had given a nod of assent to his involvement in human sin (cf. 7:21; 13:26). Moreover, his protestations of innocence were justified in so far as they defended his integrity against the cry of hypocrisy and other excessive charges of the friends. Nevertheless, a tendency towards an overestimate of his righteousness is traceable in those protestations (cf. 9:21, ASV; 10:7; 12:4; 16:17; 23:10ff.; 27:5,6; 29:11ff.). And this conceit becomes almost incredibly bald and bold in Job's final words (ch. 31). In 33:10b Elihu quotes 13:24b; in 33:11 he quotes 13:27a.

12-30. When Elihu cites the further complaint of Job that God giveth not account of any of his matters (v. 13b; cf. 19:7; 30:20), it might seem that he has dismissed Job's doubts of God's justice very briefly (vv. 8-12) to return to them later (cf. chs. 34–37). But in his answer to the alleged lack of revelation concerning God's ways (vv. 14-30), Elihu incorporates an explanation of the suffering of God's servants, and thus actually begins his defense of divine justice. In OT days God spoke to his people by various special means no longer employed after the completion of the NT revelation (cf. Heb 1:1). Elihu mentions dreams (Job 33: 15-17) and the interpreting angel (vv. 20-30) as special media of revelation. God did not leave his covenant people to grope without the light of authoritative revelation. If there be for him an angel as an interpreter, one of a thousand (v. 23). Innumerable angels minister to the heirs of salvation (Heb 1:14; cf. Job 4:18; 5:1; Deut 33:2; Ps 68:17; Dan 7:10; Rev 5:11), one ministry being the interpretation of God's will and ways. Possibly one of a thousand suggests not the abundance of such hierophants but the rarity and pre-eminence of his angel-mediator (cf. Eccl 7:28).

To bring back his soul from the pit (v. 30a; cf. vv. 18,24,28). At the heart of such revelation are the principle and purposes of divine grace. Men live under the shadow of the destroyers (v. 22b), God's angels of death, because of the Lord's holy displeasure with their sin. But once . . . twice, yea thrice (vv. 14,29, ASV) grace intervenes. Sometimes special revelation interposes as a warning to prevent the purposed evil and so deliver from its disastrous consequences (vv. 15-18). Sometimes the revelation comes at the eleventh hour, when a course of sore chastening has brought man to the brink of the pit (vv. 19-22). Then there is remarkable restoration of the blessings of righteousness (vv. 25,26), celebrated by a psalm of confession and thanksgiving (vv. 27,28, ASV). Such deliverances are accomplished by the confrontation of man with his uprightness, i.e., the straight, right way for him (v. 23b; cf. v. 16), and by the man's repentance. This process is the ransom (v. 24c) which is found if God is gracious unto him (v. 24a). In the light of past revelation vouchsafed to God's servants, Elihu labels their sufferings as chastening (v. 19).

31-33. The interpretation of suffering as chastisement is applicable in Job's case (see concluding comments on ch. 31). Eliphaz, too, had suggested chastening as one reason for affliction (5:17), but he regarded chastening as meted out in proportion to sin. Though severe chastening might actually be "blessed," nevertheless it stigmatized a believer as ranking humiliatingly low in the community of the sanctified! Elihu saw chastening in its redemptive context, as informed and governed by the principle of sovereign grace. Since grace is by its very nature sovereignly free, it may bestow the blessing of chastening most abundantly on the saint who has relatively least need! Elihu does not reflect here upon wicked men, but his discovery that suffering is a working of God's free grace is clearly the key to the unpredictable, seemingly arbitrary variety in their sufferings, and in their prosperity as well. For them, too, suffering is a gracious dispensation warning them away from the eternal pit. Thus Elihu removes the sting from the mystery of the suffering of the righteous and the prosperity of the wicked. Job's heart leaps for joy. But shame fills him as he recalls the railing accusations he has shouted against the God of grace, and so he holds his peace (v. 33).

34:1-37. The structure of chapter 33 is repeated: an introductory call to hear (vv. 2-4), quotation from Job's complaints (vv. 5-9), an answer thereto (vv. 10-28), and a closing challenge (vv. 29-37).

2-4. It appears from 34:34 that Elihu calls for the attention of a wider circle of listeners than the three friends.

5-9. Elihu once more sets up as his target Job's complaint that God perverts justice by afflicting him with incurable wounds though he is without transgression. This accurately summarizes much in Job's speeches (for v. 5a, cf. esp. 13:18; 23:10; 27:6; for v. 5b, 27:2; for v. 6, 9:20; 6:14; 16:13; for v. 9, cf. 9:22; 10:3; 21:7ff.; 24:1ff.).

10-28. The perversity of Job's charge is proved by a consideration of the righteousness of God. Elihu begins with a direct denial that God is unjust (vv. 10-12). Logically, this may be begging the question, but that only demonstrates the limitations of human logic. For Elihu's appeal is to the sense of deity in God's image-bearer, and that is the only ultimately sound procedure in declaring God's name. Confirmation of the Creator's perfect justice is found in his omnipotence and omniscience (v. 13ff.). Pure impartiality is the correlate of his transcendence above all possible motivation to show respect to the persons of his creatures (vv. 13-20). It is in God that all flesh lives, moves, and has its being (vv. 13-15); kings and the mighty are no exceptions (vv. 16-20). Moreover, God's ordering of the universe contradicts the charge of injustice in him, for injustice works anarchy, not order (v. 17a). No flaw can arise through ignorance in God's government (vv. 21-28). He needeth not further to consider a man (v. 23a, ASV). With one omniscient look God comprehends all the facts in the case, even the secret works of dark ness (vv. 21,22) and veiled oppression of the poor (vv. 24-28).

29-37. To question the benevolent providence of God is folly (vv. 29,30). For unto God does one say, I have borne (affliction) without offending? (v. 31). Elihu apparently resumes the thought of verses 5-9 – the unheard of presumption (cf. v. 7) of Job's protests to God (cf. v. 6b). Shall his recompense be as thou wilt, that thou refusest it? For thou must choose, and not I (v. 33a,b; ASV). Again opportunity is afforded Job to defend his rebelliousness, but he remains silent.

35:1-16. Returning to the idea that God is infinitely exalted above any temptation to tamper with justice (vv. 4-8), Elihu again introduces it by citing the complaint of Job which it refutes (vv. 2,3). He then corrects a distortion of this doctrine of divine transcendence (vv. 9-13), applying the point to Job (vv. 14-16).

2,3. Cf. 34:9. Thinkest thou this to be right? (35; 2a) This refers not to 2b but to verse 3 (see ASV). Also, 2b is subordinate to 3, thus: To criticize the consequences of righteousness is to assume a righteousness superior to God's.

4-8. Thy companions with thee (4b). The workers of iniquity with whom Elihu associated Job in this complaint of profitless righteousness (cf. 34:8,9). It is evident that men can neither diminish (v. 6) nor increase (v. 7) the glory of him who is exalted above the heavens (v. 5). Therefore, neither fear nor favor can hamper him in his administration of justice. Eliphaz had presented a similar argument for divine justice (cf. 22:2-4), but it was vitiated by his misunderstanding of the administration of that justice. Job, too, had referred to the unchangeableness of the self-contained Creator, but had concluded that it minimized human responsibility (cf. 7:20,21).

9-13. God's transcendent immutability is not equivalent to indifference to human virtue and vice; it is not a distant disinterest in the multitudes who cry . . . because of the pride of evil men (v. 12 a,c), as Job had complained (cf. 24: 12). Such prayer rather goes unheeded because God will not hear an empty cry (v. 13a, ASV), a mere animal cry (v. 11) for physical relief. None saith, Where is God my maker, who giveth songs in the night (v. 10). It is not that God is indifferent to men but that men are indifferent to God. They do not seek God for God's sake, content to sing doxologies in the midst of desolation if only he be their portion. Elihu summons Job to the wisdom of his original response of faith (cf. 1:21).

14-16. If God's judgment tarries (v. 14; cf. 19:7; 23:8ff.; 30:20), and his wrath is restrained the while (v. 15, ASV; cf. 21:7ff.), Job ought not jump to vain conclusions (v. 16).

36:1–37:24. Continuing the theme of God's righteousness, Elihu expounds further the gracious design of the afflictions of the righteous, exhorting Job to be profitably exercised thereby (36:1-25; cf. 33:19ff.). In the closing verses of this exhortation, the appeal shifts to the excellency of God's power (cf. 34: 12ff.), and that becomes the grand subject of Elihu's conclusion (36:26–37: 24), the herald's cry before the advent of the Lord (ch. 38ff.).

36:1-25. Elihu characterizes his theodicy as complete truth (vv. 2-4). Possibly 4b refers to God (cf. 37:16). God's greatness is a greatness of goodness and wisdom (v. 5), of justice bestowed impartially and grace bestowed abundantly on the righteous (vv. 6,7). Here again Elihu might seem to lapse into the approach of the friends, but the difference between them appears in his interpretation of the apparent exceptions to the general pattern observable in divine government (8ff.; cf. comments on 33:12-30). Afflictions call the righteous to more ardent spiritual strivings and thus are an effective means of deliverance from sin and its consequences (vv. 8-10,15). They disappear when their specific purpose is realized (v. 11); and only then (v. 12). Similarly, if the godless in heart (v. 13a, ASV) react to a long-suffering God's afflictive warnings with sullen rage (v. 13), they may expect only to be early fatalities of their debaucheries (v. 14). Let not the great- ness of the ransom turn you aside (v. 18b, RSV; cf. 33:24). The overwhelming loss entailed in Job's chastening allured him away from the instruction (lit., mouth) of affliction (v. 16a; cf. 15b) into a response of angry judgment and scoffing (vv. 17,18a, RSV). Will thy cry avail, that thou be not in distress? (v. 19a, ASV) In Job's angry complaint, with its bitter longing for the night of the grave (v. 20), he spurns the sanctifying work of affliction (v. 21). Let him, therefore, consider the exalted works of God (vv. 22a,25), attend submissively to the instruction he sends (vv. 22b, 23), and so transform complaint into doxology (v. 24; cf. 35:10).

36:26–37:24. Adopting his own counsel (36:24), Elihu utters psalmodic praise to the Lord of creation. The divine rule is illustrated by various atmospheric phenomena: the rain cycle of evaporation and precipitation (36:26-28), fearfully majestic thunderstorms (36:29–37:4), and frosty winter's ice and snow (37:5-13). Each of these is introduced by an affirmation of the incomprehensibility of God's works (36:26,29; 37:5). Elihu observes that the elemental forces once unleashed do not escape God's control; but, like the expertly hurled missiles of warriors in the elite ambidextrous corps (36:32; cf. Iliad 21:183; I Chr 12:2), they perform God's bidding (37:12), whether as a curse (36:31a; 37:13a; cf. 1:16, 19) or as blessing (36:31b; 37:13b; cf. 37:7).

The intimate relation thus suggested between God's rule of nature and his rule of history prepares for Elihu's concluding application to Job: If man cannot comprehend God's natural rule, he ought not expect to comprehend God's moral rule. By a series of humbling questions (37:15ff.) Elihu impresses on Job his creaturehood, reminding him that by his finite standards he cannot judge God, all of whose ways are infinitely higher than human thought. Hence the folly of disputing his government (37:19,20,24b). The way of wisdom is to fear him who is incomprehensible and excellent in all his attributes (vv. 23,24a).

His ministry accomplished, Elihu retires from the scene. He has prepared the way of the Lord in the hearts of Job and his friends. From the literary perspective, the Elihu discourse forms an eminently successful transition to the following theophany. The younger man's vivid description of the fury of the elements sets the mood for (perhaps was actually inspired by) the approaching whirlwind vehicle of God. His thematic concentration on natural revelation is continued by the Lord, as is also even the interrogating style of his final exhortation (cf. 38:3ff.). In judging Job's controversy with his friends (cf. 42:7-9), the Lord does not mention Elihu, because the younger man was not a party to the dispute of the older ones, nor had his words been such as to require expiation. Though the Speaker from the whirlwind does not mention Elihu by name, He does not ignore him. For by continuing Elihu's essential argument and endorsing his judgments concerning both Job (cf. 32:2 and 40:8) and the friends (cf. 32:3 and 42:7ff.), the Lord owns Elihu as his forerunner.

B. The Voice of God. 38:1–41:34.

The verdicts passed on Job by men had darkened the way of wisdom until Elihu spoke. That way is now fully illuminated by the Voice from the whirlwind. It is eminently appropriate that the Lord's approach to Job is in the form of challenge. So also he had confronted Satan (cf. 1:7,8; 2:2,3). God challenged both Satan and Job by confronting them with his wondrous works. And since Job himself is the divine work by which Satan was challenged, it is through the success of this challenge to Job that God perfects the triumph of his challenge to Satan. God's challenge to Job proceeds in two stages (38:1–40:2 and 40:6–41:34), with a pause midway, marked by Job's initial submission (40:3-5).

1) The Divine Challenge. 38:1–40:2.

38:1-3. Out of the whirlwind (v. 1). This characteristic vehicle of theophany (cf. Ps 18:7ff.; 50:3; Ezk 1:4,28; Nah 1:3; Hab 3; Zech 9:14) was such as to dramatize the spoken revelation it accompanied. Who is this that darkeneth counsel (v. 2). The absurdity of Job's criticism of God's counsel lies in their respective identities. The creature critic of the Creator! Gird up now thy loins like a man (v. 3a). The imagery of the divine challenge is drawn from the popular ancient sport of belt-wrestling. The figure is especially suitable in this context because belt-wrestling was also used as an ordeal in court, and it is by ordeal that Job's case is being settled.

38:4—39:30. The ordeal to which the Creator challenges his creature is a test of wisdom. Many of God's questions deal with executive power, but the OT concept of wisdom includes the craftsman's talent. Attention is drawn to the Creator's unsearchable wisdom everywhere displayed—on the earth (38: 4-21), in the heavens (38:22-38), and in the animal kingdom (38:39—39:30), the sequence of narration being, in main outline, the same that this Speaker adopted in Genesis 1. Job becomes increasingly impressed with the immensity of his own ignorance and impotence.

38:4-21. Where wast thou (v. 4a). Job's knowledge of the earth suffers from his spatial and temporal limitations. This section opens and closes with references to Job's nonexistence at creation (vv. 4,21; cf. 12; contrast "Wisdom" in Prov 8:22ff.). Hence his ignorance of how the earth was founded (Job 38:4-7) or the sea bounded (vv. 8-11), of how earth's days are rounded by the cycle of dawn and darkness (vv. 12-15, 19-21). Neither has Job sounded the depth of the sea nor measured the breadth of the land (vv. 16-18).

38:22-38. Canst thou set the dominion thereof in the earth? (v. 33b) To qualify as director and judge of man's life on earth, one must be able to govern the heavenly bodies that rule the earth (cf. Gen 1:14-18). Note the repeated mention of the influence of the atmospheric and astral heavens on earthly affairs (Job 38:23,26,27,33,34,38). But Job has no control over the waters above as to whether, where, when, or how they will precipitate. The lightning will not present itself before him like an obedient servant (v. 35); nor has he the remotest influence upon heaven's seasonal signs (vv. 31,32).

38:39—39:30. Again in this section on animate creation, the purpose is to convince Job of his incompetence for the role of world governor, while magnifying the wisdom of Him who actually is creation's Ruler (cf. 12:7). The creative and providential activity of God embraces wild creatures beyond man's control, just as, in the inanimate sphere, it embraces the wilderness beyond man's acquaintance (cf. 38:26,27). Lions and ravens are not available or likely subjects for man's charities (38:39-41), nor the wild goats for the solicitous care of the animal husbandman (39:1-4). Man cannot bring the elusive wild ass (39: 5-8) and untamable wild ox (39:9-12) under his yoke. Even the stupid ostrich scorns the proud horsemen (39:13-18), while the horse, in turn, scorns the human battle host and the boast of Lamech (39: 19-25; cf. Gen 4:22-24). The final vignette directs Job's eyes on high, toward his Creator's throne—to the raptorial hawk and eagle, waiting to be called by God to His judgment feast, with its prey of rebel men, kings and captains, horses and riders together (Job 39:26-30; cf. Ezk 39:17; Rev 19:17ff.). Here is the ultimate vanity of all the efforts of human wisdom—that man is reduced to food for the subhuman creation. "God hath chosen the foolish things of the world to confound the wise" (I Cor 1:27a). Even the wildlings laugh at man's cultural strivings (vv. 7, 18, 22).

40:1,2. Will the critic contend with the Almighty? (v. 2a) The first "fall" of the wrestling ordeal is about to be decided. God demands that Job admit defeat. This would be still clearer according to a reading reflected in some ancient versions: "Will the contender with the Almighty yield?"

2) Job's Submission. 40:3-5.

Behold, I am of small account (v. 4a, ASV). The Creator's surpassing wisdom has been so effectively impressed on Job that he will not further dispute God's ways as he had once and again (v. 5). Far less will he approach God as a prince (cf. 31:37). Job's practice begins to adorn again the doctrine of wisdom he has confessed (cf. 28:8).

3) The Divine Challenge Renewed. 40:6—41:34.

40:6,7. An aim of belt-wrestling was to strip the opponent of his belt, but a contest was not always terminated by one such "fall." Thus Job is, in a figure, to fasten on the belt again and renew the ordeal. His initial submission (40: 3-5) was good but only the beginning of his repentance. He must recognize not only the unreasonableness but also the sinfulness of criticizing the Almighty.

40:8-14. Hast thou an arm like God? (v. 9a) The redemptive power of God by which he saves his people and judges their enemies is often pictured as an outstretched arm and a mighty hand (cf. v. 14b). Job's criticism of God's government, especially his boast that he will overcome the Lord's imagined opposition to his justification, was, in principle, a usurpation of the divine prerogative of world government, a lusting after godlike knowledge of good and evil (cf. Gen 3:5), a self-deification. Let Job prove his ability to execute the sentence of condemnation against wicked men, whose prosperity seems to him unjust (Job 40:10-13). Then God will worship at the cult of Job, acknowledging that he possesses the divine power of redemptive judgment whereby he can justify and save himself (v. 14).

40:15—41:34. (Heb. text, 40:15—41:26). Since Job obviously cannot ascend the heavenly throne to try his hand at judging the wicked, God proposes a more feasible test. The motif of the deity commissioning an animal champion to battle a human hero is paralleled in ancient mythology. (Cf. Gilgamesh Epic, in which Ishtar sends the bull of heaven against Gilgamesh.) In Mesopotamian art, moreover, the bull of heaven is depicted wearing the wrestling-belt. Behemoth (40:15ff.) is commonly identified with the hippopotamus; leviathan (41:1 ff.; Heb. text 40:25ff.), with the crocodile. These two are found together in Egyptian art. It is not necessary to demonstrate the presence of hippopotamus or crocodile in the Jordan area of old, since yardēn (40:23b) is apparently a common noun meaning "river" (cf. the parallel in v. 23a). Many other identifications have been suggested; recently, for example, of behemoth with the crocodile and leviathan with the whale. If behemoth can successfully be identified as a crocodile (cf. 40:17,24a, Heb.), it ought to be considered whether the entire passage describes only one creature, i.e., leviathan. The designation behemoth, taken as a plural intensive, "the beast par excellence," would be an epithet like chief of the ways of God (v. 19a). Note the similar supreme claims made for leviathan (41:33,34). Certain descriptive details do not fit any real creature. This has led to the view that not zoological creatures are intended but mythological chaos monsters conceived along the lines of stylized hippopotamus and crocodile. Then 40:15ff. would be a symbolic elaboration of the preceding challenge to quell rebellious proud men (40:9-14). Compare the use of the dragon symbol for Satan in Revelation. How appropriate would be an intimation to Job that his wrestlings were with the prince of proud rebels!

Contextually suitable as this mythical interpretation is, the passage is more naturally understood as a picture of real creatures painted with some highly figurative strokes (e.g., 41:19ff.). Note especially that God presents behemoth as one which I made as I made you (40:15b, RSV). Here indeed is the point of the passage: Job is to discover from his inability to vanquish even a fellow creature the folly of aspiring to the Creator's throne. The a fortiori conclusion becomes explicit in 41:10b; Who then is able to stand before me? The absolute divine transcendence contradicts Job's assumed right of claim against God because it precludes the possibility of Job's having given anything to God: Who hath first given unto me, that I should repay him? Whatsoever is under the whole heaven is mine (41:11, ASV).

Since the occasion of this extended demonstration of God's power is his engaging Job in a court ordeal, the demonstration is clearly offered as a defense of God's justice. Accordingly, it is introduced by the question: Wilt thou also disannul my judgment? wilt thou condemn me, that thou mayest be righteous? (40:8; cf. 38:2) Not that the attribute of justice can be abstractly deduced from that of omnipotence. Attention is rather directed to the mighty, divine works as compelling witnesses to God—not just to one attribute but to God himself; the God who has revealed himself to man from within and without, by general and special revelation; the living God, infinite, eternal, and unchangeable in his being, wisdom, power, holiness, justice, goodness, and truth; the God whose veracity and justice were the presupposition of Job's trial by ordeal, who swears by himself because he can swear by no greater.

IV. Confession: The Way of Wisdom Regained. 42:1-6.

42:1-6. This confession is the counterbalance to Job's complaint (ch. 3). It acknowledges the sinful rebelliousness which began with that complaint. It is not an admission of sins prior to his sufferings such as would support the friends' accusation. By this unreserved commitment of himself to his Lord, a commitment made while he was still in his sufferings, not having received either explanation of the mystery of the past or promise for the future, Job shows himself a true covenant servant, ready to serve his God for nought. The confession therefore marks Job's final "bruising" of Satan, the final vindication of God's redemptive power.

No purpose of thine can be restrained (v. 2b, ASV). This is not bare resignation under omnipotent pressure, but praise of the living God and a trusting acquiescence in his wise purposes. In 42:3a,4 Job quotes God's words (cf. 38:2,3b; 40:7), directing their convicting light upon himself, and then responds, "I am the man" (42: 3b,5,6). Things too wonderful for me (v. 3c). Finite man may not pose as final arbiter, for in God and his ways there is mystery beyond human comprehension. But now mine eye seeth thee (v. 5b). For the contrast between hearing and seeing in relation to knowledge, see 26:14; 28:21-27. No form of God had appeared in the whirlwind; but the revelation of the Voice had been a transforming experience, illuminating all other divine revelation, whether general or such earlier, special revelation as had been transmitted to Job. By this new light Job finds again the way of wisdom. Wherefore I abhor myself, and repent in dust and ashes (v. 6). Godly hatred of his own defilement is the natural accompaniment of the believer's confrontation with his holy Lord (cf. Isa 6:5). The philosophical Why? has not been answered, but God, by the condescension of his coming, has assured Job of his gracious concern. That is enough for Job.

V. Restoration: The Triumph of Job's Wisdom. 42:7-17.

A. Job's Wisdom Vindicated. 42:7-9.

The Lord works deliverance from Job's evils in the reverse order of their incurrence and in the obverse order of their gravity. Job's false sense of God's estrangement had been the first evil corrected. Now the defamation of Job's name among men is dealt with, and afterwards family and wealth are restored.

Ye have not spoken of me the thing that is right, as my servant Job hath (v. 7c, ASV). If 'ēlay were translated unto me, there would be a clear reference to Job's confession. But even if it is translated of me, it seems necessary to think primarily of Job's confession and the friends' lack of such repentance in response to the theophany. For in terms of the theology expressed in their debate, the difference between them was merely one of degree. The words of all of them were in part censurable. Agreeably, the remedy is that Job should mediate for them in offering sacrifice, which was a mode of expressing public repentance in OT times (v. 8). The proportions of the offering were commensurate with the status of the offenders and the solemnity of the occasion (cf. Num 23ff.). Job is vindicated and the friends are rebuffed, but in such a way that the friends are forgiven by Job as well as by God. For the very form of Job's vindication is the privilege of praying for those who have despitefully used him (cf. Ezk 14:14-20). God's vindicatory acknowledgment of Job as my servant answered to Job's faith in his heavenly Kinsman and anticipated the eschatological, "Well done, good and faithful servant" (Mt 25:21 ff.). Further, it was the confirmation of God's original boast to Satan (Job 1: 8; 2:3) and so crowns His triumph over the evil one.

B. Job's Wisdom Blessed. 42:10-17.

Religion is not a means to prosperity as an end. But God's creation is good, and the inheritance of the earth promised to the meek is an integral part of the total beatitude of the whole man. As the book of Job itself teaches, in this world piety and prosperity are not invariably companions. But under the government of the righteous Creator, righteous men must ultimately be given beauty for ashes. The life of Job was shaped by God to be a prophetic sign of "the end of the Lord" (cf. Jas 5:11) for the greater encouragement of the righteous in that early period of redemptive revelation when the end was yet very far off (cf. Enoch's rapture, Gen 5:24).

Significantly, the turning point in Job's external circumstances, his deliverance from the hands of Satan, was marked by the act in which he spiritually exemplified the righteousness of God's kingdom (cf. Mt 6:33) and ceremonially typified the Messianic sacrifice which establishes that righteousness (Job 42: 10). The double blessing (v. 10b; cf. Isa 61:7; Zech 9:12) extends to Job's property (Job 42:12) and family (vv. 13-15), for the dead children are still Job's in his hope of immortality (cf. also v. 16b). Possibly the prolongation of his life to patriarchal fullness (vv. 16, 17; cf. Gen 25:7,8; 35:28,29) is a doubling of a previous seventy years (cf. Ps 90:10). It certainly suggests the recovery of health, as the daughters' inheritance among their brothers (Job 42:15b) suggests the restoration of Job's earlier family felicity.

THE PSALMS

INTRODUCTION

Nature. Among all the books of antiquity, none has made such a powerful appeal to the human heart as The Psalms. In no other book of the Bible can one find such varieties of religious experience. Here the heart of Israel is laid bare in manifold expressions of faith, for Israel knew experientially the truth of God's revelation. In the various psalms Israel's insights of former days are united with worship and thus given permanence. The experience of individuals is here linked with the corporate life of Israel. Hence, in the Book of Psalms there is a universal quality which can come only from the combined expression of the spiritual experiences of men in many periods of history and in a variety of circumstances of life. Each man was motivated by his desire to respond to the living God. All were united by their inherent desire to respond by means of their deepest emotions. Every type of religious experience is reflected in the crucible of daily life and projected upon the life of the believer today. There is thus in the Psalms a timelessness which makes this book equally applicable to every age of history.

The term "Psalms" comes from the LXX, which applies the title Psalmoi to the collection. One of the major Biblical manuscripts, the Codex Alexandrinus, furnishes the designation "Psalter" by using the Greek word Psâlterion. However, the Hebrew Bible uses the designation Tᵉhillîm, which means "Praises." In Rabbinical literature this same idea was carried over in the term Sēper Tᵉhillîm, meaning "Book of Praises." In both the Hebrew and Greek terms there is the root meaning of playing instrumental music. In time the word took on the meaning of singing to a musical accompaniment, a feature of Israelite worship made popular by the singing of the Levitical choirs. Many of the psalms give evidence of their use by choirs and worshipers as hymns, while others are not suited to such use. However, the collection as a whole attests to the deepest and most passionate yearning of corporate Israel at worship before God.

Titles and Authorship. One of the first things noticed about a particular psalm is the title it bears. How to arrive at a proper interpretation of these titles is one of the most vexing problems posed by this book. At times, authorship is emphasized in the titles, at other times, relationship. The occasion of the psalm's composition is sometimes pointed out. Certain titles make reference to the designated use of a psalm for public worship. Other titles indicate the desired musical effect or setting. Still others describe the basic character of the psalm as (1) a hymn to be sung with musical accompaniment (mizmôr), (2) a song (shîr), (3) an anthem (maśkîl), or (4) a lamentation (miktām).

All but thirty-four of the psalms bear some type of title as a superscription. The thirty-four psalms without titles are referred to as the Jewish "orphans." Among the titled psalms, seventy-three use the inscription lᵉ Dāwid. This is rendered as "A Psalm of David" in the AV, RV, ASV, and RSV. However, the Hebrew usage may indicate "belonging to David," "connected with David," "concerning David," "for David," "dedicated to David," "in the style of David," or "by David." By no means must these titles be required always to indicate authorship, whether referring to David or others. The LXX adds David's name to fifteen psalms not so designated in the Hebrew. In addition to the seventy-three referred to David (eighty-eight in the LXX), twelve are connected with Asaph, twelve with the Sons of Korah, two with Solomon, one with Ethan, and one with Moses.

Although these titles are not a part of the original text, they are based upon relatively ancient tradition. A comparison between the Masoretic Text and the LXX indicates that the titles antedate the LXX, for some of the musical directions were already unintelligible to the Greek translators, and the titles had not become fixed. Though the superscriptions are not a part of the original text, they are worthy of consideration, for they represent man's first effort to write an introduction to the Psalter.

Structure. Though the book of Psalms may appear to lack a plan, it is not without definite order. While it lacks organization in terms of subject matter, it follows a much more obvious system of organization. It is divided into five sections, representing various collections brought together. According to the Midrash on the Psalms, an ancient Jewish commentary, this fivefold division was made to correspond to the five books of the Law. Thus there may have been an original purpose among the editors of the psalm collections to parallel this fivefold response of the people to the fivefold summons by God.

Further evidence of a plan is the presence of a doxology at the end of each of the five books. Psalms 41, 72, 89, 106, and 150 include doxologies for each of the five books. Indeed, Psalm 150 is an over-all doxology, while Psalm 1 is a general introduction to the Psalter. Psalms 2, 42, 73, 90, and 107 serve as introductions to their respective books.

This careful organization gives evidence that the final edition of the entire collection was designed to fit into the scheme of Jewish worship. There is an amazing correlation between the first four books of Law and the first four divisions in Psalms. Since the worshiper in Palestinian Judaism completed the reading of the Pentateuch every three years, it is very probable that the use of the Psalms was scheduled to correspond. According to ancient tradition, it appears that eight portions of the Law were assigned to the Sabbaths in a two-month period, along with suitable portions from the Prophets. N. H. Snaith (Hymns of the Temple, p. 18) has shown that successive psalms may well have been used in similar fashion. He has calculated that the book of Exodus was started on the 42nd Sabbath, Leviticus was reached on the 73rd, Numbers by the 90th, and Deuteronomy on the 117th. These Sabbaths correspond exactly with the first chapters in each of the five books of the Psalter. No psalm could be more fitting than Psalm 1 to introduce the forthcoming three-year "meditation upon the Law." Psalm 23, for example, would accompany the reading of the story of Jacob at Bethel.

Collection and Growth. The present organization of the Psalter is the result of a process of growth. Long before the book of Psalms took its present form, minor collections were in circulation. And gradually these smaller collections were added together.

Within the present fivefold arrangement, the bounds of certain smaller collections are still discernible. In addition to the Davidic collections, there are certain groupings assigned to the Sons of Korah and Asaph. In Psalm 72:20, it is stated that "the prayers of David are ended," though other psalms follow which are ascribed to David. Other smaller collections include the Psalms of Ascents and the Hallelujah Psalms. Certain sections also show a decided preference for either Yahweh or Elohim, pointing toward early existence in specialized collections. The following collections may well have circulated separately, to be later united:

Psalms 3 – 41. A Davidic collection with doxology and preference for Yahweh (272 occurrences compared with 15 for Ĕlōhîm).

Psalms 51 – 72. A Davidic collection with doxology and preference for Ĕlōhîm (208 occurrences compared with 48 for Yahweh).

Psalms 50, 73 – 83. Levitical guild collection ascribed to Asaph.

Psalms 42 – 49. Levitical guild collection attributed to the Sons of Korah.

Psalms 90 – 99. Sabbath Psalms closely connected with regular Sabbath worship.

Psalms 113 – 118. Hallel of Egypt Psalms, connected in worship with the Passover Feast (cf. Ps 136).

Psalms 120 – 134. Songs of Ascents or Degrees, probably sung by the pilgrims journeying to the Temple.

Psalms 146 – 150. Hallelujah Psalms sung at festivals.

T. H. Robinson (The Poetry of the Old Testament) and others have suggested that a threefold division preceded the final fivefold form. These three books, 1-41, 42-89, 90-150, may well have been redivided into the present form to make them correspond to the divisions of the Law. Whether this theory can be proved or not, a proper understanding of the composite nature of the book of Psalms is essential. Through the gradual process of collection, rearrangement, and revision, God preserved this treasure of Israel's response to his revelation.

Dating. A precise system of dating for the book of Psalms is impossible. Those responsible for the final edition of the Psalter, as well as previous collectors, endeavored to provide a hymnbook for their own generation. In times of stress and difficulty, they sought to revive the vigor of the past to serve the needs of their own day. The process of revision and adaptation makes many of the psalms appear to be later than they were in their original form. N. H. Snaith (Twentieth Century Bible Commentary, p. 235) says: "Few Psalms are either pre-exilic or wholly post-exilic. Some Psalms may contain elements varying in date by more than a thousand years." Some scholars have followed Duhm in making the majority of the psalms originate in Maccabean times. However, the trend today among such scholars as Gunkel, Snaith, Patterson, Oesterley, and others is toward earlier dates. The phrase, "The Hymn and Prayer Book of the Second Temple," may still be applied to the over-all collection because of the final editing after the Exile. Yet much of the Psalter is pre-Exilic, with some elements originally pre-Davidic. This recognition of early and late material makes the book of Psalms even more valuable as a record of the entire history of Israel's response to God as his Chosen People.

While it is important in interpretation to know the exact historical background and date of a passage, it is less imperative in the Psalms than in other Old Testament sections. Because of the universality of its truth, the book suffers less from lack of this knowledge than may be expected. Its timeless message makes it applicable in the pre-Exilic period, the post-Exilic period, and in our present age. However, this timelessness should not keep us from discovering the historical background wherever possible. Literary style, historical allusions, language, theological ideas, and other internal evidences should be examined, because any passage gains in reality when the background is properly understood. Even though such gains in reality are desirable, dogmatism in assigning authors, dates, and circumstances is out of place because of the timeless message of the book. It must be remembered that history has a way of repeating itself again and again.

Poetic Form. The Hebrews have given to the world a heritage of simple and childlike poetic expression. Their poetic utterances came from the heart rather than from a desire for artful excellence. Since Hebrew is a pictorial language, every word is graphic and vivid. The verbal roots portray visible action, while the usage provides room for strong imagination. There is in the language an intense emotional quality well fitted to display burning religious passion.

Although Hebrew poetry lacks rhyme and is weak in metrical system, it has compensatory features. Instead of these basic fundamentals of English verse, Hebrew employs two main distinguishing characteristics—accentual stress (rhythm) and parallelism. According to F. C. Eiselen (The Psalms and Other Sacred Writings), rhythm is "the harmonious repetition of fixed sound relations." An accentual pattern of two, three, or four beats to the line makes possible this harmonious repetition. Several unaccented syllables between the beats make a regulation of short and long syllables. This form of regulation depends upon rhythm within clauses and rhythmical balance between clauses. The result is a simple but pleasing rise and fall of the voice which can express animated spirit, calm assurance, excitement, lamentation, or other emotional qualities.

The second main distinguishing characteristic of Hebrew poetry is the balance of form and sense called parallelism. The poet states an idea; then he reinforces it by means of repetition, variation, or contrast. Three major types of parallelism are found throughout the Psalter:

1. Synonymous. The second line repeats the first in slightly different words (cf. Ps 1:2).
2. Antithetic. The second line shows sharp contrast with the first (cf. Ps 1:6).
3. Synthetic. The second line completes the first by supplementing the original thought (cf. Ps 7:1).

Three lesser types help to add richness and variety to Hebrew expression:

1. Introverted. The second line is parallel to the third and the first to the fourth (cf. Ps 30:8-10; 137:5,6).
2. Climactic. The second line completes the first by bringing the thought to a climax (cf. Ps 29:1,2).
3. Emblematic. The second line continues the thought of the first by raising it to a higher realm or using a simile (cf. Ps 1:4).

There are other factors which explain the effectiveness of parallelism. At the heart of the matter is the reader's expectation and satisfaction. The first line should always raise a sense of expectation, while the succeeding lines should satisfy that expectation. The poet can gain variety by changing the degree of expectation raised or the method of satisfying it by using contrast to show the unexpected. The parallelism is sometimes complete, sometimes incomplete, with one element missing; and at other times there is a compensatory element added to bring a better sense of satisfaction. Not only parallelism but patterned rhythm produces this expectation-satisfaction sensation. G. B. Gray (The Forms of Hebrew Poetry, 1915) has given names to the two basic types of rhythm. "Balancing rhythm" produces a certain satisfaction because the number of accentual stresses is equal (3:3 or 2:2). "Echoing rhythm" produces a different sensation by giving the second line fewer stresses than the first (3:2). The most frequently used form of the latter is the Quinah metre, used in laments and dirges.

In addition to parallelism and rhythm, two other elements affect Hebrew poetry. These are not distinguishing characteristics, for they are present in all poetry. The first is the emotional quality which produces a heightened expression. Special power-packed words or phrases can produce this effect. The use of a profuse number of gutturals can display harshness. Sharp sibilants can express victory or grief over defeat. Onomatopoetic words can easily suggest the message. The second element is the mnemonic value of the poem, which helps the reader to remember it. Rather than using rhyme, the psalmist occasionally employed an acrostic arrangement. Each line or a set number of lines would begin with successive letters of the Hebrew alphabet. Psalm 119 is an excellent example, as each line in an eight-line section begins with the same letter. All twenty-two letters of the Hebrew alphabet are used in successive sections. Such an artificial device made it easier for people to commit these psalms to memory. Actually, only eight or nine psalms are so constructed in their entirety. Each of these is proverbial in nature and would suffer from some detachment of thought if it were not for this alphabetical arrangement.

In basic style Hebrew poetry is vastly different from modern poetry. However, the Hebrew pattern has close affinity with that of the Near East. There are numerous similarities in style between the poetry of Israel and that of Egypt and Mesopotamia. Yet the most marked similarities are evident in a comparison of Hebrew psalms and Ugarit poems. The poetry of Ugarit is basically the Canaanite-Syrian type. Canaan and Syria were in close contact with Israel throughout pre-Exilic history. The main similarities concern metaphors, phrases, rhythm, and parellelism—all matters of literary style and phraseology. Religiously and theologically, the differences outweigh all the similarities.

Classification. Any cursory comparison of the poems in the Psalter reveals that they have not been grouped by subject matter. The subjects, covered or alluded to, run the gamut of human experience. Although the various topics are too numerous to list, five dominant themes can be recognized:

1. Realization of God's presence.
2. Recognition of a need for thanksgiving.
3. Personal communion with God.
4. Remembrance of God's part in history.
5. Sense of deliverance from enemies.

There have been many attempts to classify the psalms according to a preconceived standard. Mowinckel and others have centered on the content, developing elaborate topical subdivisions. Others have attempted to uncover the basic mood of the author of each psalm. Still other authors have relied upon the type of each psalm as a criterion for classification. This began simply as a threefold division into hymns of praise, prayers, and songs of faith. Recently Gunkel has done valuable work in further identifying these types or categories. His basic premise is that the psalms were originally cult songs used in the worship of Israel. He thus classifies each according to the "regular recurring formulae" of each particular type. Gunkel recognizes five main types as follows:

1. Hymns of Praise
2. National Laments
3. Royal Psalms (including Messianic Psalms)
4. Individual Laments
5. Thanksgivings of the Individual

To these he adds a number of minor types represented by a few psalms each:

6. Songs of Pilgrimage
7. Thanksgivings of the Nation
8. Wisdom Poems
9. Torah Liturgies
10. Mixed Types

These categories represent the final and latest scheme by Gunkel (cf. N. H. Snaith in Twentieth Century Bible Commentary, p. 235ff.). Previously, Gunkel had included other minor types, such as: "Blessings and Curses," and "Prophetic Psalms" (cf. John Patterson, The Praises of Israel, p. 32). We may add to these classifications the category of Messianic Psalms.

As tempting as it is to discover a system of classification, there is a certain indefiniteness about the Psalter which defies absolute classification. This lack of definiteness is caused by the timeless and universal characteristics of the collection. Actually, each method of classification gives a different view of the Psalms, making possible an understanding of the many facets available.

Abiding Value. The Psalter is first a living testimony to Israel's faith. The individual psalms give evidence of the thought and feeling of countless Hebrew worshipers. They echo the aspirations and hopes of men and women in every era of Israel's history. They reflect the hardships and struggles of God's people. They show the pilgrimage from doubt to certainty in these critical centuries of God's leading. They point always toward the conquest of despair by means of faith in the living God. The history of Israel would be lacking indeed without these evidences of faith's response to God's revelation.

Secondly, the Psalms form an important background for Jesus' ministry. He learned them in his Jewish home at his devotions. At his baptism, his mission was stated in the words of a psalm. On the cross, a psalm came to his mind in his last moments there. The Psalms are quoted more frequently in the New Testament than any other book of the Old Testament. There are about a hundred direct references or allusions to the Psalter in the New Testament. Phrases and verses are carried over to explain the character and message of Jesus as the Messiah.

In the third place, the book of Psalms has proved to be an indispensable source of devotional material. Christians around the world have been aided in their personal approach to God in worship. Psalm 51 voices the thoughts of the repentant sinner. Psalm 32 shows what joy a forgiven man can experience. Psalm 23 expresses the sense of trust common to all children of God. Psalm 103 pours forth the praise of God which every believer should express. Other psalms satisfy basic devotional needs, enriching the personal experience of any seeking person.

Finally, the Psalter has become the hymnbook of the ages. No other book of hymns has been used so long by so many people. It is read, chanted, or sung every day of the year. Samuel Terrien says of it: "No other book of hymns and prayers has been used for so long a time and by so many diverse men and women" (The Psalms and Their Meaning for Today, p. vii). In an age of informality, the Psalms provide an indispensable language for worship. In the words of Luther's "A Mighty Fortress Is Our God," Watts' "Jesus Shall Reign," and his "O God, Our Help in Ages Past," the message of the Psalter sounds around the earth.

OUTLINE

The present organization of the book clearly indicates its own appropriate outline:

Book I. Psalms 1–41.
Book II. Psalms 42–72.
Book III. Psalms 73–89.
Book IV. Psalms 90–106.
Book V. Psalms 107–150.

BOOK I. Psalms 1–41

The first book in the fivefold division of the Book of Psalms appears to have been once in a separate Davidic collection. The name Lord, Hebrew Yahweh, occurs 272 times, while the more general 'Elōhîm is found only 15 times. The psalms are varied in content, but the moral teaching is simple and direct. Evident throughout this division is a positive faith in the justice of God. Psalm 1 serves as an introduction to the entire Psalter, while Psalm 2 introduces the collection in Book I. The fact that some manuscripts list Psalm 3 as the first psalm makes the introductory character of 1 and 2 more apparent. It is further possible that 1 and 2 were originally joined as one psalm, beginning and ending with "Blessed." All except 1, 2, 10, and 33 are connected with David in the title annotations.

Psalm 1. The Two Ways of Life

This psalm presents in sharp contrast two extremes—the truly righteous way of life and the basically wicked way. The contrast introduces in a didactic manner the two categories of men to be described throughout the Psalter. The psalmist continues the antithesis by showing the present and future destinies of each group.

1-3. The Way of the Godly Man. Blessed is the man. The Psalter opens with a strong interjection, O the happinesses of the man who follows God's plan. The verbs, walketh, standeth, sitteth, describe the characteristic steps of the wicked which the righteous avoid: accepting the principles of the wicked, participating in the practices of outright sinners, and finally joining with those who openly mock. Note the threefold parallel between the three verbs and their modifying clauses. The shift is then made from the negative refusal to the positive delight. Such a man meditates or muses constantly on God's teaching. As a result, he becomes more and more like a "transplanted tree," with roots in eternal realities. Constant vitality is assured and ultimate success is certain because he has put his trust firmly in God.

4-6. The Way of the Ungodly Man. The ungodly are not so. An abrupt change now occurs with the words not so. The sharp contrast is intensified by the use of this frequent term for the wicked, which stands as the exact antithesis of the term, the righteous. Unlike the firmly established tree, the ungodly is swept away by the wind. The picture is that of a threshing floor on a hill-top, where the wind clears away the chaff and leaves the grain. In parallel construction, the two classes (ungodly and sinners) are promised no part in the vindicated company of the righteous. While God regards or concerns himself with the way of the righteous, the wicked merely drift on to ultimate destruction.

Psalm 2. The Victory of God's Messiah

This is basically a royal psalm, with highly dramatic qualities and great poetical power. Included in its structure is an oracle of the Lord which has occasioned various interpretations. Gunkel connects it with a festival celebrating the coronation of a Judean king. If such was the original setting, the psalm has been thoroughly adapted to wider Messianic hopes. Even as Psalm 1 deals with the two ways for an individual's life, Psalm 2 sets forth the two ways for nations and peoples.

1-3. The Rebellion of the Nations. Why? In prophetic style, the psalmist begins with two rhetorical questions. The point of the questions is to demonstrate the absurdity of those who would rebel against the decree of the Almighty. Their rebellion against God's people and king is regarded as an attack against God himself. Basically, this antagonism is aimed at Jehovah's rulership through his anointed (one).

4-6. The Answer of God. He . . . shall laugh . . . . then shall he speak. A bold anthropomorphism draws a sharp contrast between the worried little kings and the supreme Ruler who puts them in derision (root idea, "to stammer"). His laughter changes quickly to burning anger as he informs these rebellious ones that he has already installed his king with full divine approval.

7-9. The Plan for the Anointed. The Lord hath said. The oracle by God's anointed is declared as God's decree. The declaration, Thou art my Son, parallels the "my king" of God's answer. The phrase is applied to Jesus at his baptism (Mk 1:11). The term, begotten, is part of an Oriental formula for adoption used in the Code of Hammurabi. Note that two promises are given to God's anointed —dominion and victory. Although the psalmist probably thought of the Son as the chosen ruler (II Sam 7:14), in the light of the NT we see the Messiah as truly the Son of God.

10-12. The Admonition to the Kings. Be wise . . . be instructed. The choice is laid before the kings, along with the admonition to be wise and straighten up in making their decision. The choice of wisdom goes beyond mere acceptance of the decree. They are to serve the Lord with the awe and reverence due him. The kissing of royal feet and hands was a symbol of homage. Even as the way of the wicked shall perish in Psalm 1, so shall the way of those who refuse to do homage.

Psalm 3. A Morning Prayer of Confidence

The basic characteristics of an individual lament are exhibited in this psalm, the sequel to which is found in Psalm 4, where a sense of relief is evident. Because of the expression of sublime trust in God's protection, this psalm has been a favorite of many people facing peril. Verse 5 clearly identifies it as a morning prayer.

1,2. The Psalmist's Plight. They . . . that trouble me. The enemies of the psalmist are becoming more numerous than they have ever been before. Physically, he is in grave danger. And besides, his spirit is weighed down by his adversaries' taunts to the effect that he is beyond the help of God. These disheartening comments are similar to those directed toward Job (Job 2:11-13).

3,4. His Helper. But Thou, O Lord. In the midst of his troubles he remembers again that God is a shield to protect him, my glory to restore his dignity, and the lifter up of my head to give him new courage. The verbs in verse 4 should be frequentative: Whenever I call, He answers!

5,6. His Confidence. I laid me down and slept. The knowledge that God is his helper and protector makes this sleep possible. Upon awaking, he realizes that it is God who has sustained him. With his confidence increased by this experience, he is certain that no number of foes can make him afraid.

7,8. His Prayer. Arise, O Lord. The power and deliverance of God are invoked by this petition, as the psalmist seeks active intervention. He is either recalling what God has done on previous occasions or using a prophetic perfect. The latter foresees an end as clearly certain and so speaks of it as complete already. The last verse adapts the psalm to public worship, and may indicate a lack of selfishness in the whole private prayer.

Psalm 4. An Evening Prayer of Relief

The circumstances surrounding this psalm are similar to those of Psalm 3. However, here the lament becomes a song of trust to express the psalmist's relief. The serenity of tone throughout is the result of an experience of God's help in the past. Even as God gave rest in the previous experience (Ps 3), there is assurance that he will provide that same peaceful rest again. Verse 8 connects this song with evening prayer.

1. Urgent Appeal to God. Answer me . . . be gracious . . . hear my prayer (RSV). There is here a threefold request to God, who has proved himself to be righteous and capable of deliverance. Past experience leads the psalmist to believe that God will again meet his deepest needs.

2-5. Wise Counsel for Fellowmen. O ye sons of men. These men had slandered the reputation of the psalmist; they had loved vain schemes, and thrived on falsehood. In quietness they should meditate on their needs and sin not. They should speak to their own consciences and be silent. Even as the psalmist calls, "O God of my righteousness" (v. 1), he demands this same righteous motive in their sacrifices. The logical parallel is that of trust in the One to whom they offer these sacrifices.

6-8. Serene Trust in God. Thou hast put gladness in my heart. Many individuals were discontented and pessimistic, lacking the gladness which the psalmist knew. In contrast to these pessimists, the author knows that God's help in the time of need causes more gladness than bumper crops. He closes with the picture of peaceful sleep possible to one who knows God's care by personal experience.

Psalm 5. A Morning Prayer, Preparatory to Worship

There is in this psalm an atmosphere of strife between the righteous and the wicked, such as is frequently found in the Psalter. The situation is similar to that of Psalms 3 and 4 in that in both there are dangerous foes all about. The psalm may have been used by the priests in their preparation for morning sacrifice or by the individual as he prepared for worship.

1-3. An Invocation to God. Give ear . . . consider . . . hearken. The preparation for worship must always include the individual's cry to God. Not only his words but his meditation (lit., whispering) is a part of this invocation. In parallel form, the time is specified, probably connecting the speaker's prayer with the morning sacrifice.

4-9. A Lesson in Contrast. Wickedness . . . worship. There is a double contrast in these verses: the attitudes of the righteous and wicked toward sin and worship are contrasted, as well as the different responses of God toward the two groups. The psalmist recognizes that God cannot tolerate sin nor sojourn with the evil man. Therefore, God will not allow the foolish (lit., arrogant) to stand in his presence. He considers the workers of iniquity detestable. The end destined for those that speak lies (ASV) is utter destruction, and the bloodthirsty and deceitful man (ASV) is an abomination that God abhors. While these wicked men deal in treachery, the psalmist prostrates himself before God, praying for divine guidance.

10-12. A Prayer for Retribution. Destroy thou them. The prayer continues with a plea for justice upon these enemies. As those who rebel against God, they must be held guilty, allowed to fall, and cast down completely. In contrast to the threefold fate of the wicked ones, those who trust in God share in unending joy. They are to rejoice, to shout for joy, and to exult in God.

Psalm 6. A Cry for Relief

Here is a vivid picture of a man in dire distress because of a severe illness. Although the psalmist refers to his enemies, he is primarily crying out for relief from his malady. His mention of divine wrath shows that he conceives of his suffering as resulting from sin. While used among Christians as one of the seven Penitential Psalms, this may have been a penitential liturgy in the temple worship as well.

1,2a. Prayer for Cessation of Punishment. Rebuke me not . . . neither chasten . . . have mercy. These expressions show a recognition of the disciplinary side of suffering. The writer does not deny his guilt, not claim innocence. His punishment must cease before his emaciated body can be restored. All he can do is cast himself on the mercy of God.

2b-5. Prayer for Recovery. Heal me . . . deliver my soul . . . save me. The sufferer clearly realizes that deliverance must come from without, for he is thoroughly inadequate. He bases his plea upon the seriousness of his suffering, the mercy of God, and the fact that God will lose his thanksgiving if he goes to Sheol.

6,7. Description of His Condition. Groaning . . . tears . . . grief. The nature of his illness is somewhat obscured by the characteristic Oriental expressions. However, there can be no doubt that his grief is real and his suffering intense. Like Job, he has to endure the insults of his enemies in addition to his wretchedness.

8-10. Answered Prayers. The Lord hath heard. Twice the psalmist uses this phrase to indicate that a new era has arrived. He predicts that all his enemies shall turn back because God has taken command.

Psalm 7. A Prayer for Justice

Like many other psalms, this is first of all the lament of an individual. There is an element of self-righteousness in the psalmist's appeal. This may be due to the nature of the religious strife which occasioned the bitter persecution. However, there are corporate aspects which point to the possibility that several psalms have been combined into this one. If the individual is taken as representative of the nation, the unity of the psalm is preserved.

1,2. Prayer for Deliverance. Save me . . . deliver me. This appeal is based upon the speaker's personal trust in God. The fierce attack of the enemy also appears to be personal, as indicated by my soul.

3-5. Protestation of Innocence. O Lord . . . if I have. The author was certain that he was not deserving of his persecution. He was willing to put the protest in the form of an oath and an offer to accept any deserved reward for punishment.

6-8. Prayer for Judgment. Arise, O Lord. A bold figure of waking God is used to point up the necessity of immediate judgment. There is here a combination of personal vindication and the eschatological idea of a world judgment.

9-13. Confidence in the Righteous Judge. The righteous God trieth the hearts and reins. The outcome is assured by the very nature of God. The upright are preserved, while the wicked suffer God's wrath every day. God's action of judgment upon the unrepentant is figuratively stated in terms of earthly combat.

14-16. Nature of the Wicked. Iniquity . . . mischief . . . falsehood. These words characterize the adversary, who has fallen by his own devices. He is covering himself with the shroud of his evil desires.

17. Concluding Vow. I will praise. This characteristic doxology illustrates the assurance of the psalmist that the cause of righteousness will triumph.

Psalm 8. Man's Dignity and God's Glory

This psalm is a hymn which reaches a height of majesty seldom realized by finite man. There is a development of thought from the grandeur of God's throne in heaven to the lowest beasts of the earth. Man is pictured at the center of God's creation. The poem is artistically set inside a refrain at the beginning and end. This refrain acts as a beautiful introduction and conclusion. The questions of Psalm 8 are cited in Heb 2:6ff. in describing the humiliation and exaltation of Christ.

1,2. The Glory of God. How excel- lent thy name. The introduction carefully identifies that "name" as Jehovah, our Lord ('Adôn). "Magnificent" or "majestic" would be a better translation than excellent. The phrase babes and sucklings may be a figure of man in his weakness. The sincere praise of these "babes" is set in sharp contrast to the scheming of God's enemies.

3,4. Man in Contrast. When I consider thy heavens . . . what is man? The night scene calls forth this praise of God's glory in the heavens. When man ('enôsh, frail man) is compared with all of the expanse above, how insignificant he seems. He is truly just the son of mankind ('ādām, generic man).

5,6. The Place of Man. Little lower than the angels. This would be better translated "little lower than divine" or "little less than divinity." Three things designate man's position: his relation to divinity, his dignity (glory and honor), and his dominion.

7,8. Illustrations of Man's Dominion. All sheep . . . oxen . . . beasts . . . fowl . . . fish. These lesser forms of life illustrate "all things" of the previous verse. The creatures of earth, air, and sea are included in this obvious reference to the creation story of Genesis 1.

9. Doxology. How excellent is thy name. The refrain calls man back to the majesty of God lest he become absorbed in thoughts of personal grandeur. Man has dignity, but God alone is majestic.

Psalm 9. Praise for Destruction of the Enemy

Evidently this psalm was originally joined to Ps 10, as shown in certain Hebrew manuscripts, the LXX, the Vulgate, and in another Latin version by Jerome. The two psalms form an acrostic using the letters of the Hebrew alphabet. The presence of selāh at the end of Ps 9 and the lack of a title on Ps 10 bear this out. The first psalm is highly national, while the second is strongly personal.

1-3. The Reason for Thanksgiving. I will praise . . . shew forth . . . be glad . . . rejoice . . . sing. All of this is wholehearted thanksgiving because the psalmist's enemies have been condemned by God. Sitting on his throne, God has passed judgment so that there is no doubt about the outcome.

4-8. A Vision of Final Judgment. He shall judge the world in righteousness. This is an eschatological picture of the final judgment, visualized as present. Mowinckel believes this to be a psalm used at the Feast of Tabernacles in a symbolical enthronement celebration.

9-12. The Exhortation to Praise. Sing praises. Since God will bless those that trust him, the psalmist seeks those who will join him in sincere praise. The natural sequel to praising God's name is to declare his doings.

13,14. An Appeal for God's Favor. Have mercy upon me. In the midst of national appeal a personal note is inserted. This lament is unusual within an expression of thanksgiving, but it may be natural for one expressing such sincere gratitude.

15-20. The Certainty of Judgment. The Lord is known by the judgment. The idea, previously introduced, of a world judgment to come is continued, as the writer declares that doom will surely overtake the wicked. The psalmist adds a request that nations may be brought to realize that they are only men!

Psalm 10. A Plea for Action

While this psalm has literary and textual affinity with the preceding one, the mood here is entirely different. The enemy is no longer the wicked of the nations but the wicked within Israel. The calamity has been caused by the misuse of power on the part of ungodly men of power. The mood is one of lament rather than of thanksgiving.

1,2. The Statement of the Plea. Why . . . Why? The frequent question beginning with "why" always describes a situation of frustration and forsakenness. The psalmist shows his own impatience and despair. After all, the persecution of the poor by the proud wicked leaders has reached an unbearable limit. His plea is that the wicked may reap what they have sown.

3-11. The Basis of the Problem. The wicked boasteth. This long list of grievances begins with the pride mentioned in the previous verses. The singular is used collectively of the many in Israel who have given no thought to God. Each condition is ethically oriented to Israel's way of life, and the whole passage reminds one of the writings of Isaiah, Micah, and Jeremiah.

12-18. The Call for Intervention. Arise, O Lord . . . lift up thine hand. This intense appeal for direct action by God is followed by arguments to strengthen the force of the appeal. The faith of the psalmist does not waver as he concludes that the Lord is King forever.

Psalm 11. The Assurance of Faith

A grave peril confronts the psalmist as enemies seek his life. His desperate situation gives rise to deep thought and noble expression of his confidence in the Lord. His words of assurance flow in a poem of true lyric quality. The circumstances are strikingly similar to those of several episodes in David's life.

1,2. Faith versus Expediency. Trust or flee. The advice of well-meaning friends is to take the way of expediency. "Flee to the mountain, where there are plenty of hiding places," is the worldly idea of how to find safety. Even in the face of the drawn bow of the enemy, the speaker affirms that his trust is in the Lord. Instead of taking the easy way out, he will take the way of faith.

3-7. The Foundation of Faith. If the foundation be destroyed. The psalmist knows that fleeing would only undermine his basic faith. After all, God is in his holy temple, his throne is established in heaven, and his eyes behold what goes on down here. Therefore, the punishment of God shall come upon the wicked even as it did upon Sodom, while the upright shall behold God's face.

Psalm 12. A Prayer for the Faithful

This psalm depicts another dark hour of persecution, when society is falling apart. While lamenting a situation in which lying and falsehood prevail, the author is likewise expressing his utmost confidence in God, who is still worshiped by the faithful minority. Gunkel treats this psalm in a liturgical sense, making it corporate. Whatever the final usage, there could well have been an original individualistic basis for its composition.

1-4. The Prayer of the Faithful. Help, Lord. The writer is speaking for the faithful, godly men who have been abused by the loudmouthed ones who speak idle flattery and indulge in double talk. Like Elijah, the psalmist speaks of himself as the only one left who has not joined these braggarts.

5. The Answer of God. Saith the Lord. This verse takes the form of an oracle from the Lord answering the sincere prayer of the faithful. God promises his help, which will result in complete safety.

6-8. The Response of the Worshiper. Pure words. In contrast to the talk of the loudmouthed ones, God's words are as pure as the finest silver. What he has promised, he will perform. His trustworthiness is assured and proclaimed as a response of worship.

Psalm 13. From Doubt to Trust

Expressed in this brief psalm are the deepest longings of a troubled soul. Although a personal enemy is behind the scenes, the psalmist is wrestling with his own doubts as to God's divine activity on his behalf. Since sickness is not alluded to, the problem is probably mental, very likely fear. In its structure this psalm is an excellent example of the lament of an individual, being carefully divided into three brief stanzas of two verses each.

1,2. His Problem of Doubt. How long . . . ? The fourfold repetition of this phrase clearly shows the writer's intense suffering. He is wearied by his enemy but even more distressed by God's seeming unconcern. He feels God-forsaken in the time of his greatest need.

3,4. His Prayer for Assistance. Consider . . . hear . . . lighten mine eyes. In the midst of doubt and dejection, he prays for God to understand his problem and bring back the brightness in his eyes. Not only does he fear physical death, but he knows how his enemies, in their godlessness, will boast concerning the downfall of a friend of God.

5,6. His Relief in Trust. But I have trusted. Although no spoken answer is recorded, a real relief comes over this troubled soul. His trust is based upon God's loving-kindness, his rejoicing upon God's salvation, his singing upon God's bountiful care. He has found true peace by utter trust in God.

Psalm 14. Judgment for Denying God

Here we have a good example to show how the Psalter developed. Except for minor textual variations (esp. v. 6) it is identical with Psalm 53. Since the latter is from a later collection and substitutes Elohim for Yahweh, Psalm 14 is considered to be the earlier form. In both psalms the speaker views the depraved condition of men with the true prophetic spirit.

1-3. The Depravity of the Fool. No God. The use of the word fool (nābāl) indicates not a theoretical atheist but a practical atheist, who lives as if there were no god. For all practical purposes God does not enter into his thinking. The words corrupt, abominable, and filthy all point to the depravity of such an individual, who is clearly pictured as typical of Israel in this age.

4-6. The Corruption of the Priesthood. No knowledge. These who lack knowledge of God are perhaps the priests, who eat the shewbread and should call upon God. Instead they are becoming workers of iniquity (cf. Hos 1:4-6). Instead of leading God's people, they devour them. The generation of the righteous obviously refers to my people, while the poor have a special place of refuge in God.

7. The Hope of Deliverance. Oh that . . . ! This appended prayer may have been added for liturgical purposes. Or it may express the psalmist's one glimmer of hope in this dark period. To bring back the captivity may mean simply to "restore the fortunes." Regardless of when this verse was composed, it serves as a fitting conclusion.

Psalm 15. The Guest of God

This Wisdom psalm is a commentary on man's duty to God and to his fellowman as set forth in Deut 6:5 and Lev 19:18. It deals with the moral and ethical qualifications which admit a worshiper to the presence of God. The early custom of challenging the fitness of a worshiper may be reflected here. Perhaps the priest asked the questions in verse 1, the worshiper responded with an answer such as is given here, and the priest closed the challenge with the final promise of verse 5b. Some interpreters refer the question to the worshiper, with the answer and promise as the usual reply of the priests to the worshipers entering the Temple. The former seems preferable.

1. The Pertinent Question. Lord, who . . . ? The person who is to come into God's presence must face squarely this twofold question. The practice of pitching tents on Mount Moriah may have been allowed to pilgrims in certain periods of Israel's history. However, the parallel questions emphasize that God's standard must be met if a man is to be God's guest.

2-5b. The Acceptable Answer. He that. The matters of integrity and righteousness relate to man's duty to God, while truthfulness and the remaining virtues refer to man's duty toward his neighbor. By combining the similar uprightness and integrity (AV, righteousness), it is possible to discover an ethical decalogue in the phrases of this section.

5c. The Priestly Promise. He that doeth. The one who meets God's standard must be one who doeth these things. Such a person not only knows what God expects of his guest, but puts these principles into practice. The note of stability gives a proper climax to the psalm.

Psalm 16. The Joy of Loyalty

This song of trust is a wholehearted profession of the joy that comes from faithfulness and loyalty. The author lived in a day when apostasy and idolatry were extensive. Against this background he contrasts his supreme happiness with the plight of those who have slipped into idolatry. His great hope amplifies his present trust in God. The psalm is ascribed to David by Peter (Acts 2:25) and by Paul (Acts 13:35,36) when they refer to its prophecy of Messiah's resurrection.

1-4. Joy in Service. Preserve me, O God. This prayer is not for deliverance from an enemy but for the continuance of the happiness he has already found. His delight is in the saints, while his trust is in God. Contrasted with this is the state of multiplied sorrows which is the lot of those who have sought other gods.

5-8. Joy in Faith. Inheritance . . . lot . . . lines. These figures all refer to the allotment of land by lots whereby the Levites received no specific apportionment. Along with the figure of the writer's cup of happiness, these add up to a truly goodly heritage because God is his choicest possession. His stability is based upon God's constant leadership.

9-11. Joy in Hope. Therefore. On the basis of his present joy, the psalmist uses phrase after phrase to show the basis of his joyous hope. His heart, liver (rather than glory), and flesh all respond to the thrill of this hope. Verse 10a does not present a clear-cut reference to an afterlife, because the first phrase can be better translated, "For thou wilt not abandon my soul to Sheol"; but verse 10b must refer to someone other than the psalmist in saying, "Neither wilt thou allow thine Holy One to undergo corruption." Verse 11 points to a continuance of the happy life which he has already come to know in the presence of the Lord.

Psalm 17. The Vindication of the Righteous

The psalmist here laments his unjust treatment at the hands of his enemies. The cause of his problem is not known, only that he is innocent of the charges brought against him. God is clearly his last court of appeal, his only hope. His absolute confidence in God is shown throughout, but especially in the final verse.

1-5. An Appeal for Justice. Hear the right. The psalmist prays first that God will hear, attend, and give ear to his side of the case, which he presents, he declares, with lips free of deceit. His cry is only for a just sentence from the One who knows his innocence. God has proved, visited, and tried him, and will continue to find him guiltless.

6-12. An Appeal for Mercy. Shew thy marvelous lovingkindness. The speaker repeats his cry, this time with direct reference to his enemies. He requests that God will demonstrate his loving-kindness, keep him safe, and hide him from those who rise up against him. He describes his enemies in terms that point up the contrast between them and himself.

13-15. An Appeal for Deliverance. Deliver my soul. The next step is naturally the actual deliverance of this sufferer and the attendant destruction of the wicked enemy. The psalmist calls for decisive action to disappoint and cast down the enemy in open vindication of himself. When I awake may refer to the next morning after this experience or to a vision of God beyond the sleep of death.

Psalm 18. The Victor's Gratitude

Like Psalm 14, this psalm can be compared with another passage, in this case II Samuel 22. The psalmist repeatedly voices his thanksgiving and his confidence in God.

1-3. An Opening Hymn of Praise. I will love . . . I will call. This praise is based upon a full realization of what God means to him. These figures show God as a defending helper, not as the instigator of aggression.

4-19. A Picture of God's Deliverance. He delivered me. When the psalmist, in his distress, called on the Lord for help, the earth shook, the Lord thundered, and deliverance came. In graphic figures like those describing the theophany when the Law was given at Mount Sinai (Ex 19:16-18; 20:18,21; 24:16-18), the power of God is set forth.

20-30. The Basis of This Deliverance. According to my righteousness. Deliverance is here clearly regarded as a reward for righteousness, cleanness of hands, faithfulness, and uprightness. This is a comparative rather than an absolute evaluation of self. All of this is made possible by trust in God.

31-45. A Picture of Deep Gratitude. It is God that girdeth me. Credit for the victory is explicitly given to God, who made every step possible. He prepared the way, taught, trained, and led into battle.

46-50. A Concluding Hymn of Praise. Let the God of my salvation be exalted. All honor and praise is due unto God alone.

Psalm 19. God's Glory Above and Within

This psalm is clearly divided into two distinct sections, which suggests that it may be a composite of two poems. The first section (vv. 1-6) uses a general Semitic name for God ('Ēl), while the second uses the special covenant name (Yahweh). In subject matter, style, and form the two sections differ. However, the union has been skillfully made; the psalmist's exaltation of the revelation of nature is fused with his exaltation of the law of God into one glorious hymn of praise.

1-6. The Testimony of the Heavens. The heavens . . . the firmament . . . the sun. Each of these has its part in making known the mystery of God's glory. In constant revelation by day and by night the expanse of the heavens reveals the excellence of God's creative work. The sun appears as the greatest member of the heavenly choir, running its appointed course of witness. While similar figures abound in Akkadian literature describing the sun-god Shamash (ANET, pp. 91, 116, 179, 387-389), the psalmist clearly regards the sun as an agent of God in revealing His glory.

7-10. The Testimony of the Torah. The law of the Lord. The psalmist here uses six names to describe the whole of God's inner revelation. The word tôrâ (law) embodies more than a written list of precepts; it includes all of God's teaching. Using adjectives and participial phrases, the psalmist describes the excellence of God's revelation, which surpasses even gold or honey.

11-14. The Personal Application. Cleanse thou me. The moral teaching of God, which serves as a warning, can lead a person to the desired reward. Meditating upon God's teaching acts as a mirror to make visible the inner man. Therefore, the psalmist closes by requesting the strength to overcome all types of sin and be found acceptable.

Psalm 20. Supplication for Victory

In both structure and content this royal psalm is very closely linked with

Psalm 21. The latter acts as a sequel of thanksgiving for answered prayer. The king is the central figure, while his victory occupies the attention of his subjects. It may well have been arranged for antiphonal singing, with the congregation or the Levitical choir acting as a chorus in verses 1-5 and 9. A priest or Levite may have voiced the words of assurance in verses 6-8. Complete confidence in God is expressed throughout.

1-5. A Prayer for the King. The Lord hear thee. Although the prayer is addressed to the king, it is also an act of intercession for the king. This describes a vital step in the preparation for battle, as the king presented his sacrifices to the Lord and received the assurance of God's blessing.

6-8. An Oracle of Assurance. Now know I. After an interval, possibly the time during which the sacrifices were offered, the speaker's response of confidence issues in the form of a prophetic oracle. The use of the prophetic perfect tense gives the necessary divine assurance to the king and worshipers. The army is now prepared to go forth in the name of the Lord.

9. Closing Chorus. Save, Lord . . . This is more literally stated in the LXX as O Lord, save the King and answer us when we call. It may have been sung by the whole congregation or by the Levitical choir.

Psalm 21. Thanksgiving for Victory

This royal psalm acts as the natural sequel to Psalm 20, since supplication becomes thanksgiving because of the recent victory. The same antiphonal arrangement may have been used in its adaptation for temple worship. Some commentators have suggested that the occasion was the birthday (cf. v. 4) or the coronation of a king (cf. v. 3).

1-7. Thanksgiving for Answered Prayer. The king shall joy. The congregation or temple choir addresses a prayer of gratitude to God for his signal victory. Each verse contributes to the list of things which God has done for and through the king. All of these blessings are directly related to the king's utter trust in God.

8-12. Confidence in the Future. Thine hand shall. The words are now addressed directly to the king but still in an attitude of worship. The thanksgiving is continued in terms of anticipated victories until finally all enemies will be destroyed.

13. Closing Doxology. Be thou exalted. Again the chorus joins in a final expression of heart-felt gratitude and united praise, returning to the picture of strength in verse 1.

Psalm 22. Triumph in Suffering

This psalm is the first of those sometimes called Passion Psalms. The use of the opening cry by Christ on the cross and the amazing phraseology of verses 6-8 and 13-18 have made this psalm especially important to Christians. There is within the psalm a strange mixture of praise and complaint. There is no reference to sin as the cause of the trouble, no plea of innocence, no claim of righteousness, and no vengeance. Therefore the words are peculiarly appropriate of the suffering Messiah, although in their primary meaning they are based on some experience of the psalmist.

1-18. His Personal Suffering. My God, my God, why . . . ? This initial appeal is stated in a question of only four words in the Hebrew ('Ēlî 'Ēlî lāmâ 'ăzabtānî). These words were quoted by Jesus on the cross in Aramaic. Note that the psalmist does not lose faith even while describing his intense suffering and persecution. He feels forsaken by God but knows that God is near. After recalling the trust of his forefathers and their deliverance, he describes the contemptuous action by his enemies.

19-21. His Plea for Deliverance. Be not thou far from me. This idea occurs for the third time in an open plea for God's aid. Haste thee to help, deliver, and save all point to the urgency of his need.

22-26. His Public Thanksgiving. I will declare. This vow forms a transition from his description of suffering to his expression of praise. His desire is now to acknowledge publicly his dependence upon God and to proclaim his own personal deliverance.

27-31. His Joyful Anticipation. All the ends of the world. In hope, the psalmist sees the circle widen to include all mankind and future generations. His personal hope encompasses the nation and then the world. In accord with the highest hope of Israel, the turning of mankind to God in worship (cf. Isa 40:7; Phil 2:10) is based upon what he (the Lord) has done.

Psalm 23. My Shepherd

As a song of trust, this psalm has no peer. It is impossible to estimate its effect upon man through the centuries. Grief, sadness, and doubt have been driven away by this strong affirmation of faith. Peace, contentment, and trust have been the blessings upon those who have come to share the psalmist's sublime confidence. While the language is simple and the meaning clear, no one has been able to exhaust the message of the poem or improve upon its quiet beauty.

1-4. God as the Personal Shepherd. The Lord is my shepherd. A long experience of trusting God lies behind these words. The rich corporate relation of Israel to God is appropriated as an individual realization. The picture of a faithful shepherd is the epitome of tender care and continuing watchfulness. The sheep instinctively trust the shepherd to provide for the morrow. The most distinctive feature of this extended metaphor is the wise leading of the shepherd. He leads into rest and reviving, into the struggles of life, and through the dangerous places. The shepherd thus provides for the needs of life and protects from the fear of danger.

5-6. God as the Gracious Host. Thou preparest a table. The writer introduces a secondary metaphor to further express his trust. The scene changes to show the psalmist as the guest of honor at God's house, enjoying the warm hospitality characteristic of the East. He is under God's protection. His head is anointed with perfumed oil. His every need is completely satisfied. On the basis of this trust, every moment of his life will be filled with God's richest blessings. The greatest blessing will be an intimate fellowship with God through continued worship of Him.

Psalm 24. An Inaugural Anthem

This is one of the most majestic and stately hymns of the entire Psalter. Because of several abrupt changes in subject matter, many have judged that this psalm is made up of selections from three poems originally independent (vv. 1,2; 3-6; 7-10). While this may be so, the psalm is now an appropriate unit. The occasion has been associated with the Feast of Tabernacles, an annual New Year's festival, the dedication of the Temple, and the bringing of the ark to Jerusalem. It is very likely that this psalm, like many others, was used antiphonally.

1,2. The Processional Chorus. The earth is the Lord's. This emphasis upon the sovereignty of God over the habitable earth and all creatures is worthy caution against limiting God to one city or one temple. These words were probably sung on many occasions by groups approaching the city of Jerusalem.

3-6. The Prerequisites of Worship. Who shall ascend . . . shall stand? A recognition of the Creator. God as sovereign over all the earth must not be approached lightly. The moral requirements for approaching God are carefully set forth by questions similar to those of Psalm 15. The same high standards of ethical conduct are demanded, with special emphasis upon the character of the worship. The questions and answers were probably chanted by priests or Levites, while verse 6 may have been used as a chorus.

7-10. The Divine Entrance. Lift up your heads, O ye gates. The lintels or tops of the portals are pictured as being too low for the divine king to enter. The King of glory shall come in. The summons to the gatekeepers symbolizes the truth that the presence of God is to be evident. Then the challenge to identify this King is chanted by another group or by an individual on the city wall. The powerful answer may well have been the response of the congregation clearly identifying this King as the Lord. After the second summons and challenge, the response rings clear — The Lord of hosts (Yahweh Ṣᵉbā'ôt), He is the King of glory.

Psalm 25. An Acrostic Prayer for Help

This psalm, the supplication of an individual, uses the letters of the Hebrew alphabet as a framework. It is difficult to recognize here a logical order of thought because of the necessity of beginning each verse with a subsequent letter of the alphabet. There are only three places in our present text (vv. 2,5,18) where the acrostic breaks down. The style is simple, straightforward, prayerful, and humble.

1-7. A Prayer for Protection. Unto thee, O Lord. The basis of this petition for protection is the psalmist's simple trust in God. Though his enemies have not triumphed over him, they are a constant threat. He appeals to God's mercy and loving-kindness, which have been revealed in history.

8-10. A Meditation upon the Character of God. Good and upright is the Lord. These and other characteristics of God are discerned from his response in history. Because of his justice, righteousness, loving-kindness, and truth, he will guide and teach men in these same paths.

11-14. A Meditation upon Man's Relation to God. The secret of the Lord. After a brief prayer for pardon, the psalmist reflects on the secret of man's proper relation to God. This he discovers to be the fear of the Lord – that reverential and trustful relation referred to frequently in Proverbs.

15-22. A Prayer for Deliverance. Turn thee unto me. Using graphic verbs (pluck, turn, bring, look, forgive, consider, keep, preserve), the writer prays for God to deliver him. A fitting conclusion to the psalm is found in the broadened view of verse 22, where God is petitioned to redeem the nation as well as the speaker himself. If this verse is taken as an integral part of the original psalm, it forms a climax for the thought. If, however, it is taken as an addition, it serves to adapt the psalm for corporate use.

Psalm 26. A Worshiper's Prayer

That there was conflict between religious groups in Israel is evident from this lament. Some commentators suggest that a pestilence is involved in the background. However that may be, the psalmist's protests regarding his integrity point to a society in which the ungodly have ascendancy. This psalm, although more individual than corporate, could well be used by a pious group in the time of affliction.

1-7. A Protest of Innocence. Judge me, O Lord. The psalmist is so sure of his integrity that he seeks divine judgment; he asks that God examine, prove, and try him. He claims to have walked in the truth, to have avoided any contact with renegade Jews, and to have participated regularly in worship. All of this stands in sharp contrast to the conduct of his enemies.

8-12. A Prayer for Vindication. Gather not my soul with sinners. His plea is not that he may avoid death, but that he may avoid being grouped with the ungodly, whom he has so carefully avoided in life. In this prayer for special treatment, he prays for God to redeem and be merciful to him because he is going to continue to walk in integrity, stand firmly, and bless the Lord publicly.

Psalm 27. A Song of Trust

The marked contrast between verses 1-6 and 7-14 has led most commentators to designate this psalm as a composite. Both the content and the spirit of these sections are vastly different. The mood changes from joyful confidence to anxious fear. However, two elements tie together these dissimilar parts – similar enemies and trust in God.

1-3. Unconditional Trust. The Lord is my light and my salvation. These exultant words introduce a scene of serenity. Nowhere else in the OT is the Lord referred to as my light. Because the psalmist has found God as light, salvation, and strength, there is no cause for fear or terror. His serenity is not conditioned by outward circumstances but is unconditional.

4-6. Life's Greatest Desire. One thing have I desired. The one thing desired cannot be equated with the Temple, as many commentators suggest. It must refer to a basis for the three-part wish. That basis or common denominator is most likely the presence of the Lord, which the psalmist desires and seeks. The realization of this presence comes from dwelling in God's house, beholding his beauty, and inquiring in his Temple. This same presence results in safety in the time of trouble.

7-14. A Cry of Anxious Fear. Hear, O Lord. These words shift the mood entirely from triumph to deep distress as they introduce a new situation and occasion. Even though the psalmist has been forsaken and rejected, his trust does not fail. From the depths of despair, he calls himself back to the patience required in waiting for God to work out his will.

Psalm 28. An Answered Prayer

This psalm, like many other laments, deals with the strife between those of traditional faith and those affected by alien influences. The psalmist is deeply afraid he will suffer the fate which must overtake his wicked antagonists. That he views his prayer as answered is obvious from the change in verse 6.

1,2. Appeal To Be Heard. Be not silent. . . . Hear. The psalmist appeals to God both to hear him and to answer. To a Hebrew, the lack of an answer often seemed to indicate that God would not hear the petition. The urgent nature of the speaker's cry is emphasized by his fear that he will die if God does not answer.

3-5. Prayer for Intervention. Draw me not away. . . . Give them according to their deeds. His first prayer is for protection against his godless foes. However, his emphasis quickly changes to a plea for retribution upon these enemies.

6,7. Thanksgiving for Answered Prayer. Blessed be the Lord. The cause of this outburst of praise is to be understood as God's response to the appeal of verses 1 and 2. This thanksgiving may have been added later by the psalmist. Or it may be the expression of an inner confidence that God has truly heard and is no longer silent.

8,9. Application for the Nation. The Lord their strength. The fact that God is the psalmist's strength finds application for the nation and the king. This may well be a later addition designed to adapt the individual's expression of faith for corporate worship.

Psalm 29. God's Glory in the Storm

In awe-inspiring poetry, this hymn of praise points to the thunderstorm as another evidence of God's glory. Notes of assurance are constantly intermingled with the phrases descriptive of God's omnipotence. Seldom does any psalmist exhibit more graphic poetical power than the one who wrote this nature psalm. The close parallels in terminology with Canaanite poems from 1400–1300 B.C. discovered at Ugarit in Syria indicate that this psalm is at least as old as David, but the psalmist is careful to recognize Yahweh alone as the true God.

1,2. The Call to Worship. Worship the Lord. The whole heavenly host is exhorted to ascribe unto the Lord glory and strength. This worship is to be accomplished in holy array (RSV; rather than in the beauty of holiness, AV). Many commentators believe that in using the term bᵉnê 'ēlim (AV, O ye mighty), which might be translated as "sons of God," the author is summoning the angels. But others believe that the people of Israel, as the sons of God, are being addressed (cf. Deut 14:1; Ps 82:6).

3-9. The Seven fold Voice. The voice of the Lord. Seven times this phrase is used to express the thunder of the storm. It is not God's anger but his majestic power which makes the storm move. It begins out over the Mediterranean Sea with power and majesty. It then moves in over the mountains to the north of Palestine and over the wilderness to the south. The description of the effect upon trees, mountains, wilderness, and animals is followed by the chorus of "glory" which comes from man's worship.

10,11. Conclusion. The Lord will bless. While God sits over all in glory (v. 9), he grants to his people the two things they most need – strength and peace.

Psalm 30. Praise for God's Healing

This psalm relates the experience of one who has just escaped death by being delivered from a serious illness. His remarkable recovery produces joyful thanksgiving and causes him to reflect on the lessons he has gained from his suffering.

1-3. Praise for Recovery. I will extol thee, O Lord. The psalmist's object is, clearly, to exalt the Lord because he has been saved from Sheol and the grave. He gives full credit to God for his deliverance. There are, however, foes in the background who rejoice to see a righteous man suffer.

4,5. A Call to Remembrance. Sing . . . give thanks. Because of his personal experience with God, the psalmist calls on the saints to join him in praise. These are the like-minded ones who are bound to the Lord in covenant relation. They are urged to give thanks to the memorial of his holiness. The phrase in his favor is life may also be translated his favor is for a lifetime. This rendering contrasts the moment of God's wrath with a lifetime of his favor.

6-10. Suffering in Retrospect. I shall never be moved. Prior to his sickness, he had boasted, in a spirit of self-sufficiency. His pride collapsed with the crush of illness. However, the sickness had the effect of opening his eyes to his dependence upon God, so that he cried for mercy and healing.

11,12. Renewed Praise. I will give thanks unto thee for ever. No longer silent, the psalmist wants everyone to know of the change in his life – from mourning to dancing, from sackcloth to gladness, from silence to praise.

Psalm 31. A Prayer of Surrender

Here, again, is the strong complaint of an individual against the unmerciful treatment of his enemies. The general nature of his sufferings (esp. vv. 1-8) makes this psalm the voice of many worshipers through the centuries. The seeming change in tone in verse 9 and the fact that relief has already come have led many commentators to suggest composite authorship. However, the latter section seems to describe an intensified problem on the part of the same author.

1-8. A Trustful Appeal. In thee . . . my trust. It is in God that the psalmist has taken refuge. Upon this basis he can appeal in faith for deliverance and security. Jesus' use of verse 5 on the cross has made this entire psalm sacred and memorable.

9-18. An Intensified Appeal. Have mercy upon me. While the preceding verses describe the mercies of the past, these verses set forth the extreme need of the present. This section has several striking parallels with the experiences of Jeremiah. The psalmist has become a reproach and a fear to his friends. He is a forgotten man who is cast away as a broken vessel. In this state of loneliness and despair, his only friend is God, and his only hope is surrender to God's mercy.

19-24. A Spirit of Gratitude. Oh how great is thy goodness. The recollection of past mercies and the assurance of continuing help calls forth words of praise and blessing. This trust in God prompts him to exhort others to love the Lord and be of good courage.

Psalm 32. The Joy of Forgiveness

The psalmist, in this second one of the seven Penitential Psalms, clearly speaks of his own personal experience. There is only a secondary sense in which the application may be made corporate. The true nature of sin is forcibly realized while the joyous freedom of pardon is a past and present reality. The didactic purpose of the psalmist indicates that the poem has affinity with the Wisdom psalms.

1,2. The Blessedness of Forgiveness. Blessed. Literally, O how happy. Joy comes to the sinner because God has completely pardoned him. Note the four words for sin: transgression means willful disobedience or rebellion; sin refers to missing the mark or aim; iniquity implies twistedness or perversity; guile suggests self-deception in this context. Each of these is an aspect of moral offense and is cared for in God's mercy and forgiveness.

3,4. The Burden of Guilt. When I kept silence. His previous silence was actually a refusal to acknowledge his sin before God. Whether sickness was involved or not, the psalmist recognized that God's chastening was being felt. There was no relief, day or night, as long as he refused to confess his sin before the Lord.

5. The Relief of Confession. I acknowledged . . . thou forgavest. This was undoubtedly a process rather than an instantaneous act. He first began to acknowledge, did not hide, and finally said, "I will confess." Note the emphatic position of thou as the writer shifts the emphasis to what God does.

6-11. The Wisdom of Experience. For this. Because of the availability of God's forgiveness, the psalmist exhorts men to pray in like manner. On the basis of his own profound experience, he becomes an instructor, a teacher, and a guide, using the language of a sage. Verse 8 seems to be a quotation from one of the songs of deliverance mentioned in verse 7, so that it is God who guides and instructs the believer.

Psalm 33. A Call to Congregational Worship

This psalm corresponds to the nationalistic psalms of Book V. At first glance it appears to be out of place in Book I, but it is placed here as an answer to the invitation of verse 11 in the preceding psalm. The answer translates the personal experience into a national hymn of thanksgiving. The presence of twenty-two verses suggests a relation to the Hebrew alphabet, although there is no acrostic arrangement.

1-3. The Call to Worship. Rejoice . . . praise . . . sing . . . play. The response of the righteous takes the form of public worship. The nature of the accompaniment to be used, as to kinds of instruments and intensity of sound, is clearly stated. The occasion demands a new song or a fresh composition.

4-9. Praise of the Lord's Word. The word of the Lord. The actual praise begins with a listing of God's moral attributes as evidenced in history. Uprightness, faithfulness, righteousness, justice, and lovingkindness all describe him. Praise continues as the writer describes the creative power of God's word. The word is thus viewed as an expression of the Lord's thought, will, and action.

10-12. Praise of the Lord's Counsel. The counsel of the Lord standeth for ever. In contrast to the futile counsel of the heathen, God has chosen and guided his chosen people.

13-19. Praise of the Lord's Watchfulness. The Lord looketh. God looks, beholds, and considers all that men think or plan. He understands the plots of evil men and his all-seeing eye recognizes the needs of his people.

20-22. The Final Chorus of Praise. Our soul waiteth. The rejoicing of the entire psalm is based upon the waiting, trusting, and hoping of the assembled worshipers.

Psalm 34. The Goodness of the Lord

This song of praise is an acrostic, similar in structure to Psalm 25. It is indeed striking that both psalms omit the letter Waw and add an extra Pe at the end. In regard to content, both are songs of thanksgiving, similar in thought to the book of Proverbs.

1-3. His Invitation to Praise. O magnify the Lord with me. The resolution to praise God continually is the basis for seeking others to magnify and exalt the Lord. This invitation is directed toward those who are humble and teachable.

4-6. His Testimony of Deliverance. I sought . . . he heard . . . and delivered. Out of his firsthand experience, the psalmist illustrates the basis for this sincere praise. Following the LXX and various manuscripts and versions, verse 5 would be better translated, Look upon me and be lightened, and your faces will not be ashamed.

7-10. His Assurance of Blessing. O taste and see. The only way that others can know the blessings is by putting God to the test. The psalmist says, "Try him and see." The true blessings come only to those who trust, fear, and seek the Lord.

11-22. His Lesson for Disciples. Come, ye children . . . I will teach you. His experiential knowledge has given him the right to teach others. Those addressed as children are again the humble and teachable disciples of any age. The style is the didactic question and answer method of the wise men. The theme is retribution as interpreted by orthodox Judaism.

Psalm 35. A Plea for Vengeance

The psalmist here offers further evidence that God is the court of appeals for the persecuted in Israel. It appears that two incidents or two series of incidents are described. Verses 1-10 refer primarily to physical acts, whereas the remaining verses suggest a law court scene. The poem is clearly divided into three cycles, each ending in a vow of thanksgiving. The psalmist appears as the defendant throughout, but constantly recommends the punishment for his foes.

1-10. The First Appeal for Judgment. Plead my cause, O Lord. In the language of warfare, the psalmist pleads for justice on his own terms. He expresses his resentment by asking that his enemies be completely defeated, discredited, and caught in their own pitfalls. He ends this cycle with a vow that he will really rejoice in the Lord.

11-18. The Basis of Further Appeal. They rewarded me evil for good. This appears to belong to another occasion, although it may be a sequel to the first appeal. The enemies are here former friends who have turned on the writer and rejoiced over his ill fortune. They employed false witnesses and mocked him, while he only returned good for their evil. Again he closes the cycle with a vow that he will publicly praise God if God will only deliver him.

19-28. The Second Appeal for Judgment. Judge me, O Lord. The psalmist pleads first that his enemies may no longer taunt him or speak evil of him. Then he appeals for a final judgment on the case so that his enemies will receive the treatment of shame and dishonor which they afforded him. Once again he closes the cycle with a vow of thanksgiving.

Psalm 36. A Lesson in Contrast

Two sharply defined pictures, one of godlessness and the other of godliness are presented here. The style varies with the contrast in themes. The psalmist uses rough poetic form and language to describe evil, and smooth form and beautiful language for the description of God. Although some commentators suggest that two poems have been joined together in this psalm, that is neither clear nor necessary. The language and thought of the conclusion in verses 10-12 revert to the pattern of the first section.

1-4. The Hideousness of Evil. No fear of God. This appears to be the substance of an oracle which describes in essence the evil enemy of the psalmist. The manuscripts and versions differ as to whether the oracle is directed to the heart of the psalmist or to that of the wicked man. There is also a question as to the subject of flattereth in verse 2. It may be the wicked man, transgression, or God. The first seems to be preferable if the oracle is designed to reach the heart of the psalmist, while the second possibility fits best if verse 1 refers to the heart of the wicked. The obvious fruits of denying God are stated in verses 3,4.

5-9. The Gloriousness of God. Thy mercy . . . thy faithfulness . . . thy righteousness . . . thy judgments . . . thy lovingkindness . . . thy light. In a beautiful and melodious flow of words, these various attributes of God are likened to different phenomena of nature and then to human experience. In addition, God is spoken of as "the fountain of life." Every aspect of God's glory is spiritually oriented to produce one of the most spiritual pictures of God in the Psalter.

10-12. The Triumph of Love. O continue thy lovingkindness. After a brief prayer for the continuance of God's dealings with the righteous, the psalmist envisions the actual overthrow of the wicked.

Psalm 37. A Vindication of Providence

This psalm is related to the Wisdom literature by its distinctively didactic character. The major problem for the psalmist is the inconsistency connected with the prosperity of the wicked. Although tempted to doubt God's goodness, the author quiets his own mind and his hearers' by appealing to patience and trust. The organization is alphabetic, similar in many ways to the acrostic in Psalms 9 and 10.

1-11. Counsel for the Wise. Fret not thyself because of evildoers. The opening verse sets forth the basic maxim for a mature outlook: Don't fret or be envious about those who seem to prosper though wicked. Instead, the wise man will trust, delight in, commit himself unto, rest in, and wait patiently for the Lord. Herein is the positive cure for indignation and envy.

12-20. Doom for the Wicked. His day is coming. In the preceding passage the scene was set for this proclamation of woe by the declaration that the wicked have just a little while (v. 10). The various calamities are carefully catalogued.

21-31. Reward for the Righteous. Shall inherit the earth. The meek (v. 11), the blessed (v. 22), and the righteous (v. 29) are the terms applied to the recipients of the promised reward. The personal illustration in verse 25 is a unique departure from the formalized style of the psalm as a whole.

32-40. Contrasts of Retribution. When the wicked are cut off, thou shalt see it. While the wicked now watch for an opportunity to trap the righteous, in the future the righteous will have their chance to watch. The end of the upright is peace, but the end of the wicked is destruction.

Psalm 38. The Lamentation of a Sufferer

Although this psalm is a personal lament, it is also classed as one of the seven Penitential Psalms. The writer complains of a serious bodily affliction aggravated by mental anguish and the desertion of loved ones. He accepts the fact that his suffering is merited retribution for his sins. Forsaken and dejected, he looks to God as his last and only hope.

1-8. The Suffering of Sin. No soundness in my flesh because of thine anger. The psalmist does not contend with God or claim innocence. He pleads for mercy, that his burden may be lightened. His suffering is clearly because of my sin. The seriousness of his ailment is indicated by the description of a skin disease comparable to that of Job.

9-14. The Suffering of Persecution. Stand aloof . . . lay snares . . . speak mischievous things. These words describe the treatment of his former friends. His loved ones, friends, and kinsmen all keep their distance. His enemies take advantage of his distress and weakened condition. This phase of his suffering is also similar to Job's circumstances in that friends desert him or fail to sympathize properly with him.

15-22. The Hope of Deliverance. For in thee, O Lord, do I hope. The author has not attempted to refute his enemies because his hope is in God alone. After repeating his confession of sin, he voices again his petition for mercy.

Psalm 39. An Appeal for Strength

This appears to be a sequel to the preceding psalm. However, the author need not be the same in each case, since it is the arrangement of the psalms within the collection that gives this continuity. Although penitential in character, this poem has not been included among the seven Penitential Psalms. There are certain affinities to the experience of Job in the suffering of the psalmist as well as a parallel to the book of Ecclesiastes in the view of life.

1-3. A Resolve of Self-control. I will keep my mouth. Because of the stroke of God mentioned in verse 10, the psalmist is sorely tempted to complain against God. Like Job, he must restrain the temptation to charge God with foolishness. The presence of the wicked suggests an outside source of temptation and the possibility of doing great harm to the cause of the righteous by public complaining.

4-6. A Prayer for Understanding. Lord, make me to know. The object of his prayer is knowledge to enable him to understand the frailty and vanity of life. He gives vent to his feelings and thoughts concerning the vanity of human aims. He hopes to be led back to a quiet confidence in God which will dispel these vain thoughts.

7-13. A Request for Mercy. And now, Lord. . . . Deliver me. On the basis of his present hope in God, he can ask that God will deliver, remove thy stroke, hear, and spare. In tone, these requests are quite different from his former thoughts. His recognition and confession of his sins has given a sense of humility not possible previously.

Psalm 40. A New Song of Praise

Here is yet another good illustration of the method of compiling which has produced our present Psalter. A reading of the psalm soon shows the sudden change from praise for answered prayer to petition for immediate deliverance, verse 12. That a new psalm begins here is verified by the use of verses 13-17 as Psalm 70. Although the latter may have drawn from this psalm in its present form, the separate identity of verse 12 is obvious.

1-3. An Experience of Answered Prayer. I waited . . . he inclined . . . and heard. After a period of waiting, the psalmist was rescued from great trouble. The problem may have been illness or another situation where death seemed imminent. This experience has given him a new song which will inspire trust in God.

4,5. The Theme of the Song. Many . . . thy wonderful works. Although the psalm begins like Psalm 1 with a beatitude, the theme of God's goodness is uppermost in the psalmist's praise. His wonderful deeds and thoughts are too great to be described and too numerous to be counted.

6-11. The Response to the New Song. I delight to do thy will. It is the new song and the experience behind it that leads the psalmist to look beyond the sacrificial system. The four basic sacrifices and offerings of verse 6 are unacceptable to present true gratitude and praise. The depth of the writer's experience is shown in his open proclamation of the nature and work of the Lord. The author of Hebrews quotes these words as applicable to Christ (Heb 10:5-7).

12-17. The Petition for Deliverance. Make haste to help me. Verse 12 appears to be a connecting link to join these two poems and to serve as an introduction to the appeal for help. Almost every phrase in this section is found in other psalms as well as in Psalm 70. This use of other sources stands in sharp contrast to the originality of verses 1-11. However, the great need of the psalmist is no less real. After pleading for immediate attention, he requests that his enemies be ashamed, confounded, driven backward, put to shame, and desolate. He further requests that seekers of God may rightly rejoice and magnify the Lord. Realizing his own inadequacy, he is confident that God considers him and will prove to be his helper and deliverer.

Psalm 41. Thanksgiving for Healing and Vindication

An individual who has just recovered from a serious illness here expresses his thanksgiving. It is not pure thanksgiving in that he is influenced by the Wisdom school in the opening verses and reverts to a lament in describing his desperate situation. However, the danger is now past and recovery is assured.

1-3. Meditation upon God's Deliverance. Blessed is he that considereth the poor. This beatitude corresponds to the "Blessed are the merciful" of the Sermon on the Mount. Such a man is delivered, preserved, blessed, and strengthened by God. The psalmist recognizes himself as an illustration of his case in point.

4-9. Prayer for Restoration. I said, Lord . . . heal. His appeal includes a plea for mercy and for actual healing. Note that a confession of sin makes the prayer complete. His enemies have taken great delight in viewing his afflictions. Even a close friend has turned on him, as Judas Iscariot betrayed his Master and Friend (cf. Jn 13:18; Acts 1:16).

10-12. Prayer for Vengeance. Raise me up, that I may requite them. This is not a prayer that God will punish those who took advantage of him. He asks for strength to do it himself! It is only through such a victory that he can feel sure of God's favor.

13. Benediction. Blessed be the Lord. This subscript marks the close of Book I of the Psalter.

BOOK II. Psalms 42–72

The second book in the fivefold division of the Psalms appears to be a part of a larger collection, i.e., Psalms 42–83, which uses the name 'Ĕlōhîm instead of Yahweh for the most part. The former is used 164 times and the latter only 30 times in Book II. Within the larger collection, several smaller collections are observable: one connected with the Levitical family called the Sons of Korah; one associated with David; and one referring to Asaph. Besides these collections Book II also includes one anonymous psalm and one ascribed to Solomon.

Psalms 42, 43. Longing for God

Here are two poems so closely connected in content and style as to defy separation. The occurrence of the same refrain in 42:5; 42:11; and 43:5, the fact that Psalm 43 is without a title, and the internal form of the two psalms all point to one original composition. The division probably was made after the Elohistic collection, 42—83, began to be circulated. The psalmist is despondent because he cannot make his usual pilgrimages to the Temple. He seems to live in the northern section of Palestine, where he is constantly taunted by enemies who do not share his longings for God. The entire poem is one of great poetic beauty, constantly mingling longing and hope.

42:1-5. The Nature of His Longing. My soul thirsteth for God. Even as the hind (not hart) cannot disguise her thirst, neither can the psalmist hide his passion for the living God. His heathen enemies taunt him with remarks about the indifference of his God. The hardest thing for him to endure is the remembrance of the days when he was able to lead pilgrimages to the great festivals. The refrain in verse 5 is the beautiful formula of trust with which he allays his despondency.

42:6-11. The Depths of His Despair. Deep calleth unto deep. Again the psalmist becomes downcast and voices despair, which is more plaintive than before. Although he attempts to pray and recall how measureless is God's loving-kindness, he still feels forsaken. Mixed with his longing for the Temple is his remembrance of the constant barbs of his enemies. He gains renewed strength by repeating his formula for inner peace.

43:1-5. The Prayer for His Restoration. Judge me, O God, and plead my cause. Despairing again, the psalmist lays his case before God. Two desires alternate here – the desire for freedom from persecution and the desire to go to the Temple. Light and truth are the personified forces which he requests to lead him even as he has led pilgrims in the past. The repetition of the refrain echoes a confident hope that God will answer his prayer.

Psalm 44. A Plea for Justice

This psalm, national in scope, is permeated with a deep sense of self-justification. The serious calamity alluded to and the attendant humiliation are not viewed as resulting from sin but are taken as ground for rebuking God. The spirit of disrespectful rebuke is found nowhere else in the Psalter. No other psalm makes such claims of national fidelity to God. There is presented here another side of Israel's heart life. The abiding value lies in the emphasis upon God's power to help.

1-3. The Blessings of the Past. We have heard. By oral tradition, as well as in the sacred Scriptures read publicly at the religious festivals, the mighty deeds of God in times of old have been preserved. This sense of history is frequently seen because God is best known by what he has done.

4-8. The Assurance of the Present. In God we boast. It is by God that all victories are possible. The personal illustration of the bow and sword amplifies the argument of the psalmist.

9-16. The Abandonment of Israel. But thou hast cast off. Their only hope does not go out into battle with them. God is thus blamed for their recent defeat. The psalmist uses cutting sarcasm in saying that God made a bad bargain in selling his people to the enemy for nothing.

17-22. The Claim of Faithfulness. Yet have we not forgotten thee. The claim is repeated over and over that the nation has remained faithful. At no time in Israel's history was this literally true. The psalmist must have in mind a comparative fidelity based on generalities.

23-26. The Request for Justice. Awake . . . cast us not off for ever. The concept of God sleeping on the job is out of place, even in poetical expression. This is similar to the sarcastic words of Elijah on Mount Carmel concerning Baal. However, the psalm closes with the request that God redeem us for thy mercies' sake.

Psalm 45. The Marriage of a King

This is one of several royal psalms which relate to many phases of kingly life. Its secular nature is at once recognized. However, the event is idealized and spiritualized by a court attendant who is obviously moved by this solemn occasion. The hopelessness of identifying the king or the period in history gives a more idealized significance to it. Later Jewish interpreters made it Messianic, as did early Christian writers (cf. Heb 1:8, 9).

1. Dedication of the Song. Touching the king. Because his heart is overflowing, the psalmist dedicates this song of his own composition to the king.

2-9. Eulogy of the Groom. Thou art fairer. His appearance is handsome; his speech is graceful; his bearing is majestic; his rule is righteous; his military might is powerful; his spiritual choices are right; his garments and court are regal. If verse 6a refers to a human king, it might be translated, Thy throne is like God's. In Heb 1:8,9 the words are applied to Christ, in accord with the literal sense, "Thy throne, O God."

10-12. Advice to the Bride. Hearken, O daughter. Fatherly advice is appropriate for a young princess, to help her find her proper place in the royal family. She must be submissive to the king as well as loyal to his people.

13-15. Entrance of the Bride. She shall be brought unto the king. The bride is not described in detail; but, instead, emphasis is placed on the scene of the processional march. Her clothing and attendants are fitting for the occasion.

16,17. Anticipation for the Marriage. Thy children . . . thy name. Two wishes are set forth as assured results. There will be princes to bless this union and carry on his name. The psalmist promises to make that name to be remembered for all generations. The name represents the character, reputation, nature, and attributes of a person.

Psalm 46. A Mighty Fortress

This and the next two psalms form a trilogy of praise. The likelihood that the same historical situation provided the background for all three has caused much speculation as to the event itself. Although some great deliverance seems to be understood, the particular occasion cannot be identified. The pronounced apocalyptic elements are used by the psalmist to encourage the people in their current crisis.

1-3. Our Refuge. God . . . our refuge and strength. These words express the dominant theme of the psalm, a theme which inspired Luther to write "A Mighty Fortress Is Our God." The idea of a world-wide catastrophe was drawn from the writings of the prophets. It furnishes the background for assuring the people that God will be present whatever the outward circumstances. The refrain found in verses 7 and 11 may originally have appeared also between verses 3 and 4.

4-7. Our Deliverer. God shall help her. In contrast to troubled waters, there is a life-giving river which supplies Jerusalem, for God is in her midst (cf. Ezk 47). Again, in the picture of the final battle of the ages, reference is made to the apocalyptic view. Deliverance is certain because the Lord of hosts is with us.

8-11. Our Peace. He maketh wars to cease. The outcome of the apocalyptic battle is triumph and the end of warfare. The beautiful phrase, Be still, and know that I am God, carries the idea of refraining from vain strivings and lack of confidence. The refrain is repeated in order to show the triumph of this confidence in God.

Psalm 47. A Victorious King

This second psalm in the trilogy that expresses confidence in God amplifies the thought expressed in 46:10 and 48:2. According to the Talmud, Psalm 47 was used in later Judaism on the Jewish New Year's Day. As a result of the work of Mowinckel, many commentators regard Psalms 47, 93, 95—100 as celebrating the enthronement of Yahweh as the King of all the earth. There is no direct evidence that such a festival took place in pre-Exilic days. But these psalms become more meaningful when viewed against the background of such a celebration. In its prophetic aspect this psalm finds its fulfillment in the future reign of Christ on earth.

1-4. The Call for Rejoicing. O clap your hands . . . shout. In an eschatological vein, all peoples are called upon to rejoice. The description of the divine sovereignty introduced in Psalm 46 reaches a new height here. The psalmist, like the prophets, here envisions the action of the future as occurring in the present. He sees all nations subdued, while Israel stands in a unique relation to God because of her inheritance.

5-9. The Call for Praise. Sing praises. There is a slight shift here from jubilant rejoicing to more formal praise. The cue for the shift to praise is seen in verse 5. The future victory of the Lord is again set forth as present in order to give confidence in its absolute certainty.

Psalm 48. A Holy City

The trilogy begun in Psalm 46 with emphasis on confidence in God is here concluded with a similar note of confidence. The concepts of God as Refuge in Psalm 46 and of God as King in 46 and 47 are both incorporated in this psalm. The eschatological features are continued here but in lesser degree. The fact that there is some historical background for the trilogy becomes more apparent. The psalm was undoubtedly used in connection with a prominent festival as first-time pilgrims were shown the city.

1-8. City of Our God. The city of our God. The two themes within this section – the greatness of God and the glory of his city, complement one another. Not only is the Lord great, he is the great King and exceedingly worthy to be praised. The close connection of this psalm with the preceding ones suggests that perhaps it is the apocalyptic Jerusalem as the center of the Messianic kingdom that is described. However, it is possible that the siege by Sennacherib in 701 B.C. is referred to in verses 4-8 (cf. Isa 37:33-37).

9-14. Praise of Our God. For this God is our God. While the psalm begins with praise "in the city of our God," it is raised to praise unto the ends of the earth in verse 10. After the worship in the Temple was concluded, the pilgrims undoubtedly joined in joyful procession around the city. Each sacred place reminded them that God would guide them even as he had guided their fathers.

Psalm 49. The Folly of Earthly Wealth

Psalm 49 is a moral lesson designed for all peoples. There is an avowed didactic purpose throughout, in keeping with the purpose of Wisdom writers. Never does the psalmist address God, and only twice does he mention Him by name. His purpose is to present a meditation on the riddle of life.

1-4. Call to Attention. Hear . . . give ear. The call is not restricted to any class or nationality. It is universal in scope; the psalmist is speaking to mankind. He uses four words frequently employed by the Wisdom school: wisdom, understanding, parable, and dark saying. His use of the harp to accompany his words is interesting, because this was not the usual practice in instruction of this sort.

5-12. Wealth and the Present Life. Wherefore should I fear. The psalmist deals in a different way with the age-old problem of the prosperity of the wicked. He says, Why worry? With this premise he goes on to discuss the problem with a confident rather than a pessimistic attitude. He never accuses God of injustice, but continually points to the fate of those who trust in their wealth. All must come to the end of life and all must leave their wealth behind. Following the LXX, 11a reads better: Their graves are their houses forever. Verse 12 is a refrain, emphasizing that man without discernment will go the way of all beasts.

13-20. Wealth and the Fate of Man. Like sheep they are laid in the grave. Those who trust in their wealth and honor will share a common fate. They will be led into Sheol by the shepherd, Death. Verse 15 is one of the clearest evidences of a hint of immortality in the OT. This is not a general promise but a prediction regarding the personal fate of the psalmist in contrast to that of the wicked man of wealth. He shall take me. The same verb is used here as is employed to describe the special cases of Enoch and Elijah. The refrain of verse 12 is used again as a closing thought.

Psalm 50. The Nature of True Worship

This didactic psalm is closer to the prophetic tradition than to the Wisdom emphasis. The opening utterance of God, the emphasis upon spiritual religion, and the straightforward denunciation of the wicked point to a prophetic background. Acceptable worship and social morality are the two dominant themes. These correspond to the two main divisions of the Ten Commandments – man's relation to God and man's relation to his neighbor.

1-6. The Summons by the Judge. The mighty God . . . hath spoken. In a prophetic theophany, God comes to gather and judge Israel. This manifestation takes place out of Zion rather than out of Mount Sinai. Notice that the judgment is to be upon his people, although other peoples are to listen. In fact, heaven and earth are to act as silent witnesses.

7-15. The Message to the Worshiper. Hear, O my people. God is speaking to the formalistic worshiper and the one who trusts ritual. The judgment is not upon sacrifice as such but upon the wrong motives involved. It is made clear that God is not dependent upon the sacrifice of his people. He most desires heartfelt thanksgiving, proper payment of vows, and sincere prayer.

16-23. The Message of the Wicked. But unto the wicked, God saith. This judgment is upon the hypocrites within Israel who claim to keep the law of God in outward observance, but use the keeping of the law as justification for their evil deeds. Even though God has kept silence by delaying punishment, the time of reproof has come.

Psalm 51. A Cry for Forgiveness

This is the fourth and most profound of the Penitential Psalms. The depth of individual experience, the sense of sin, and the plea for forgiveness are unsurpassed in any other psalm. This is the first psalm in another collection bearing David's name, Psalms 51–70. Opinion is greatly divided as to the occasion suggested by this confession. To some it has a corporate significance; to some it arises from the well-known experience of David; to others it describes a worshiper who goes to the Temple for pardon and cleansing. The addition of verses 18 and 19 seems to adapt a purely individual plea to the requirements of corporate worship. Whether David composed the poem or not, his experience seems to have occasioned it.

1,2. A Cry for Mercy. Have mercy on me, O God. The psalmist neither pleads innocence nor shifts the blame to someone else. Since he knows that he does not deserve forgiveness, he pleads first for mercy, based on God's loving-kindness. In line with this mercy, he asks that his transgressions or rebellions be wiped out and his iniquity or twistedness be washed away.

3-6. A Confession of Sin. For I acknowledge my transgressions. Here the psalmist emphasizes the fact that he knows and is constantly aware of his sin, and acknowledges that his sin is more than sin against man. At the same time he recognizes the universal tendency toward sin but does not excuse himself on this basis. The depth of his confession is apparent in his desire to open up the inward and hidden parts of his being.

7-12. A Plea for Cleansing. Purge me . . . wash me. The verbs are extremely significant in carrying forward the plea. The psalmist begins (vv. 7-9) by asking for external cleansing. Purging with hyssop and washing are related to ritual acts. With the plea for a newly created heart and a renewed steadfast spirit, his emphasis shifts to inward cleansing.

13-17. A Vow of Consecration. Then will I teach. This vow to testify to others gives evidence of the writer's pardon and changed nature. The psalmist's view of sacrifice is essentially prophetic and very similar to that of the author of Psalm 50. His sense of sin and guilt requires more than burnt offerings; hence he offers his broken spirit and contrite heart.

18,19. A Prayer for Restoration. Do good . . . build . . . then. This emphasis upon works as a means of making sacrifices acceptable appears to be a liturgical addition by a priestly writer or editor.

Psalm 52. The Fate of an Arrogant Sinner

In this individual lament, presented in the direct manner of the prophets, there is no appeal for God's help, only confidence that God will bring a retributive fate. Although a particular individual is addressed throughout, a class of men may be referred to, with the prophet as the example of a righteous man.

1-4. The Character of the Opponent. Thou lovest evil. This denunciation is directed toward an arrogant tyrant whose tongue seems to be his weapon. His greed, treachery, and falsehood all stem from this razor-like tongue.

5-7. The Retribution of God. God shall likewise destroy thee. This is the pronouncement of the psalmist, still directed toward the arrogant tyrant. The destruction is described in verse 5 in three stages – God will snatch, tear away, and uproot (RSV). Although these verbs are rendered as a prayer in the LXX (May God destroy, etc.), the future usage seems better, since the psalmist is certain that the righteous will observe this destruction.

8,9. The Trust of the Psalmist. I trust in the mercy of God. While the tyrant trusts in his riches, the psalmist has the stability of absolute trust in God. The green olive tree may have stood in the temple courtyard, or the psalmist may be emphasizing his strength in the Lord with two figures – like a green olive tree and in the house of God.

Psalm 53. The Judgment for Denying God

This psalm is actually another version of Psalm 14. The only significant change is that the content of 14:5,6 is here strengthened and compressed into one verse. It is possible that both of these psalms are adapted versions of an original poem. However, 53 may be simply a version of 14, adapted for some historical crisis. (For outline and comments, see on Ps 14.)

Psalm 54. A Prayer for Assistance

Though this is the appeal of a troubled man, in the characteristic form of an individual lament, the language and content are so general as to make it adaptable for the needs of any who are oppressed by godless men.

1-3. Prayer in a Perilous Situation. Save me, O God. This appeal for help is based upon God's revealed character (his name) and his revealed power (his strength). The adversaries are called strangers (zārîm) according to the Masoretic Text, while certain manuscripts designate them as proud or insolent men (zādîm). Psalm 86:14 seems to quote verse 3 of this psalm, using the latter spelling. The most important characteristic of these men, however, is their utter disregard of God.

4-7. Praise for an Assured Deliverance. I will praise . . . for he hath delivered. Since the psalmist has complete confidence in God as his helper, he is sure that God will give suitable punishment to his enemies. His certainty is such that he can vow to give a freewill offering and promise to praise the name of Jehovah.

Psalm 55. A Protest Against the Wicked

Basically this is a lament of an individual oppressed by enemies and deserted by friends. However, some commentators consider that the original lament has been adapted for a national situation. Indeed, many scholars believe that two poems have been combined into one psalm. Verses 12-14, 18b-21, and 23 are most in question. However, no agreement can be reached as to which verses were once a separate poem.

1-8. Complaint of the Psalmist. I mourn in my complaint. In keeping with the form of a poetic lament, the writer appeals for God's attention to his restless condition. He is slandered, oppressed, mistreated, and hated. The constant threat to his life causes pain, fear, trembling, and horror. In words of lyric beauty, he expresses his desire to fly away to the wilderness, where he may be able to escape persecution.

9-15. Denunciation of the Wicked. Destroy O Lord, divide their tongues. This section opens and closes with a plea for vengeance. The division of tongues is reminiscent of God's judgment upon the builders of the Tower of Babel (Gen 11:5-9). Violence, strife, mischief, and sorrow are all descriptive of the wickedness inside the city walls. The thing hardest to bear, the psalmist finds, is the treachery of a close friend who had worshiped with him.

16-23. Confidence Through Prayer. Evening . . . morning . . . noon. His persistence in prayer is rewarded by personal peace and by confidence in the affliction of his adversaries. The confusion between singular and plural has suggested to some interpreters that verses 20,21 should follow verses 12-14, or form a separate original poem. However, the intensity of wrath may have caused the psalmist to shift from the group to his chief foe without clear transition. The trust of verse 22 brings the assurance of the closing verse.

Psalm 56. The Triumph of Faith

Here, again, an individual voices his lament over his treatment by his enemies. The distress of the psalmist, prompted by the malicious plots of crafty men, makes fear inevitable. However, his trust in God overcomes all fear.

1-4. The Plea for Help. Be merciful unto me. This plea is often repeated by the devout worshiper in Israel. It seems that the psalmist's enemies are warriors rather than religious antagonists. They trample him under foot. Yet, the inevitable fear is conquered by trust in God.

5-11. The Appeal for Vengeance. In anger cast down the people, O God. After describing the treachery of his enemies, the psalmist calls for divine aid. He has conquered fear, but God must conquer the oppressors lest they escape judgment. The writer is certain that God will answer his prayers and give vengeance. This assurance leads into a repetition of the expression of trust, a kind of refrain, found in verse 4.

12,13. The Vows of Victory. Thy vows are upon me. Since victory has already come or is envisioned as assured, the psalmist recalls his obligation of praise and thanksgiving. Perhaps he vowed a vow during his trouble. Since God has fulfilled his part in delivering from oppression and death, the rest is up to the psalmist.

Psalm 57. A Prayer for Protection

The same person who wrote Psalm 56 may possibly have also written this lament of an individual. In spirit, content, style, and situation the two psalms are similar. Both begin with the same appeal and both use a striking refrain as a division of structure. Verses 7-11 of this psalm form a striking hymn that is repeated in Psalm 108. It is possible that two poems were united to fashion this psalm in its present form.

1-5. A Prayer for Protection. Be merciful to me, O God. The psalmist's request is not for vengeance or destruction but for God's watchcare and mercy. Since his trust in God is so implicit, he is taking refuge in the confidence that God's mercy and truth will suffice.

6-11. A Resolution of Thanksgiving. My heart is fixed . . . I will sing and give praise. After a brief reminder of his present situation and the assurance that his enemies will suffer self-destruction, the psalmist makes his steadfast resolution. His praise is universal and it arises from the two grounds of confidence named in verse 3 – God's mercy and his truth. The psalm closes with the prayerful refrain exalting the universal sovereignty of God.

Psalm 58. A Protest Against Injustice

This is the lament of an individual indignant over the lack of justice in the world. He sees tyranny and oppression as the rule in society rather than the exception. He is especially concerned with the perversion of justice by earthly rulers or judges. It is difficult, however, to determine whether he refers to the leaders of Israel or to foreign rulers (cf. Ps 82).

1-5. A World of Injustice. In heart ye work wickedness. The whole problem of injustice in the affairs of men is here recognized as due to innate wickedness. The term translated congregation ('ēlem) in verse 1 is obscure. Some commentators read instead – O ye gods ('ēlîm), and find here an expression of sarcasm directed at the unjust judges. This emendation parallels Psalm 82 but is not supported by the MSS or LXX. In verses 3-5 direct reference is made to these wicked men as innately wicked and untamable.

6-11. A Call for Vengeance. Break their teeth, O God. With blistering language the psalmist creates a series of brief metaphors dealing with lions' teeth, streams, a snail, miscarriage, and thorns. Each of these is spoken as an imprecation against his unjust enemies. Thus there is here a sevenfold curse in the form of prayer. Verses 10,11 show the confidence of the psalmist in realistic terms. He feels sure that the righteous, whom he represents, will see and rejoice in the utter destruction of these unjust enemies.

Psalm 59. A Prayer for Rescue

Though this psalm is basically the lament of an individual, it has overtones which adapt it to national use as well. There are points of similarity with Psalms 55 and 58. The picture of oppression is again dominant, as is the vindictive attitude of the writer. Contrary to the normal pattern of an individual lament, refrains are evident. Verses 6,13, although not completely identical, act as a recurrent thought. Verses 9,10 are likewise repeated in similar thought pattern in verse 17.

1-5. Prayer for Protection. Deliver me . . . defend me . . . Deliver me . . . save me. The seriousness of the psalmist's plight is evident in this fourfold outcry. After describing his enemies' activity and pleading innocence, the psalmist pleads that God will rise up against the heathen, i.e., the nations. The reference to punishing the nations seems to apply the experience to a national emergency.

6-9. Defiance of the Enemy. They make a noise like a dog. The sharp words and taunts remind the psalmist of scavenger dogs searching for food at night. However, he is confident that God will laugh the enemy to scorn and come to his defense.

10-13. Plea for Vengeance. Slay them not . . . scatter them. Because of his trust that God will meet (AV, prevent) him, he prays for a gradual punishment upon his enemies. He does not want them destroyed immediately but rather made an example to the people. The shift to consume them in verse 13 shows his ultimate desire for them.

14-17. Contrasts of Fate. Let them make a noise . . . But I will sing. Verse 7 is repeated to set up this vivid contrast. While the wicked search in vain all night like scavenger dogs, the psalmist vows that he will sing aloud in the morning. Verses 9,10 serve as a basis for the closing refrain of assurance.

Psalm 60. A Plea for Ultimate Victory

Because of the evident disaster facing the nation, and because of the frequent plurals, this psalm should be classed as a national lament. Public complaint is voiced at the beginning and at the end of the psalm, and a separate oracle of God is placed in the middle. The psalm ends on a note of confidence. Verses 6-12 are repeated by the author of Psalm 108.

1-5. A Dire Circumstance. O God, thou hast cast us off. The situation is worse than mere military defeat and disaster, because it is interpreted as God's forsaking his people. The seeming displeasure of God is graphically described as causing earthquakes and making the people reel as if from drunkenness. The conclusion is drawn that God has given them his banner but led them into defeat. The plea of verse 5 is transitional, introducing the promise of God.

6-8. A Prophetic Oracle. God hath spoken. The answer is expressed in terms of a previous promise by God. The references to widespread geographical areas seem to express God's universal power and ownership rather than describe a historical situation.

9-12. A Confident Hope. Through God we shall do valiantly. Although public complaint continues in spite of the heartening oracle, hope begins to emerge. God is their only hope to win the battle. The plea for help brings with it an assurance of ultimate victory.

Psalm 61. Prayer for a King

This psalm is the earnest lamentation and appeal of one who is away from Jerusalem. The end of the earth need not refer to a remote area, because the distance is magnified by the yearning to be back home. Although an enforced exile may be the lot of the psalmist, it is not required by this phrase.

1-4. A Petition for Personal Restoration. Hear my cry, O God. In despair the psalmist pleads for the sense of God's presence and protection. He desires to experience the safety of a rock that is too high for him to climb without God's help. Because of God's past blessings, he finds assurance for the present and hope for the future.

5-8. A Prayer for Royal Blessing. Thou . . . hast heard. The writer expresses deep confidence that his prayer for the welfare of the reigning king will be answered. Verses 6,7 can be viewed as a statement of his previous prayer or translated as a present request — Prolong the king's life. . . . Note that the writer prays for three things — for prolonged life, for an extended reign, and for the blessings of mercy and truth. His confidence that God will answer makes him determine to pay daily vows of thanksgiving.

Psalm 62. An Unshakable Faith

There is an element of lamentation in the opening verses of this outstanding song of passive trust, and a didactic purpose in the closing verses. However, the dominant note of trust and confidence is evident throughout. The author is a man of authority whose position is threatened. Though his opponents are from various walks of life, he views them all as utterly worthless.

1-4. The Only Salvation. From him my salvation. The key to the serene confidence is probably tied up with the Hebrew particle, 'ak, which occurs six times in this brief psalm, three times as the first word of a stanza. The particle may be translated "surely," "but," "alone," or better, "only." Only for God does he wait, while only God is his rock, salvation, and defense. His persecutors are scheming against him all the time.

5-8. The Only Hope. My expectation from him. The words of verses 1 and 2 are slightly altered to form an introduction to this stanza. The writer calls himself to calm remembrance of the key to his peace. Again it is only God upon whom he waits and in whom he trusts. In this stillness of humble resignation he adds hope or expectation to the certainty of salvation.

9-12. The Only Strength. Strength belongeth unto God. Although he begins the stanza with the same Hebrew particle, 'ak, it is not until verse 12 that he presents the basis of this phase of his inner peace. His enemies trust in oppression, robbery, and riches, but he has received the twice-spoken oracle describing God as the only strength and mercy worth having.

Psalm 63. A Thirst for God

Like the preceding psalm, this is a song of trust, based upon a close relation to God. The psalmist is obviously in exile or banished from his home. His deep desire to share in public worship is partially satisfied by his fellowship with God in meditation. This song is an excellent example of the highest type of personal and spiritual worship in Israel.

1-4. Longing for God. My soul thirsteth . . . my flesh longeth. After positively identifying his life with God, the psalmist expresses his deepest desire. The whole of his being yearns for communion with God. His life is as dry as a thirsty desert without this fellowship. God's loving-kindness is more important to him than existence itself and causes life-long praise.

5-8. Remembering Past Mercies. When I remember thee. Recalling his experiences of worship, he likens the soul satisfaction of nightly meditation to the marrow and fatness of the sacrifices. In the stillness of the three night watches, he praises and rejoices because God has been near as his Helper.

9-11. Hoping for Retribution. They shall fall. The enemies of the psalmist here come into view for the first time. This is not an imprecatory prayer against them, but a quiet confidence that righteous retribution will result. The speaker feels sure that they will die by the sword, their bodies will lie unburied for jackals to eat, and they will find themselves in Sheol.

Psalm 64. An Appeal for Assistance

The familiar plea for help is heard again in this individual lament. The plight of the psalmist is desperate, although there is no reference here to physical harm. His enemies scheme and slander secretly rather than coming out in open opposition. After enumerating and describing their wicked deeds, the psalmist expresses his certainty that God will judge them rightly.

1-6. The Petition for Protection. Hear my voice . . . preserve my life. The appeal begins with the request that God will hear his complaint (not prayer) and will act to give him protection from fear. He describes the machinations of his conspiring enemies in a series of metaphors normally used to portray the hunting of wild animals.

7-10. The Certainty of Judgment. But God. The change is swift and abrupt to a statement of prophetic authority. The psalmist declares that the evil deeds of the enemies shall turn back on them. Then men will recognize the hand of God at work. The sorrow of heart finally turns to gladness when the writer considers the fate of the righteous.

Psalm 65. A Hymn of Thanksgiving

As a thanksgiving psalm this is a remarkable review of God's gracious dealings with the children of men. A spirit of universalism breaks the bounds of narrow nationalism in Israel. This hymn was closely connected with a thanksgiving festival at the Temple, either composed for or inspired by such an occasion.

1-4. Praise for God's Favor. Praise waiteth for thee. As evidenced by the ancient versions, this can better be rendered praise is seemly or fitting. Praise is voiced for God's answer to prayer, his forgiveness of sin, and his spiritual favor. The universal note is strong in that all flesh is included.

5-8. Praise for God's Power. By terrible things in righteousness. God's deeds are pictured as awe-inspiring and righteous, even to men at the ends of the earth. His dominion in creation and his power to still storms are but two illustrations of his sovereignty over the earth.

9-13. Praise for God's Harvest. Thou visitest the earth, and waterest it. The aforementioned praise leads up to the primary praise because of the harvest season. It is clearly God who watered the earth, prepared the seed, and made ready the soil. All this brought about a record harvest — Thou crownest the year. There is such happiness that the hills, pastures, and valleys join in the rejoicing.

Psalm 66. A Song of Deliverance

Psalm 66 is both nationalistic and individualistic in its presentation of thanksgiving. Verses 1-12 relate to the nation but also reach out to the world, while verses 13-20 refer to the personal life of the psalmist. Some commentators see here two distinct psalms which have been joined. However, the corporate experience of the nation forms an excellent background for the individual experience of the author.

1-4. The Call for Praise. Make a joyful noise . . . make his praise glorious. The psalmist takes in the whole world in one sweep as he sounds the call and gives the proper words for the expression of true praise.

5-12. The Testimony of History. Come and see. The events of the exodus from Egypt and Israel's early history were awe-inspiring enough to call forth the praise of God by the peoples of the earth. More recent evidences of deliverance are also included to justify this universal call to praise.

13-20. The Experience of the Psalmist. Come and hear. Those who fear God are called to witness the payment of the writer's vow in the Temple. His offerings and sacrifices are supplemented by his public testimony of what God has done for him.

Psalm 67. Hymn for a Harvest Festival

This brief psalm of thanksgiving is remarkable for its beauty, its simplicity, and its world outlook. The occasion for its use is probably to be seen in verse 6, where the climax is expressed in terms of harvest thanksgiving. The hymn may well have been a part of the music for the Feast of Pentecost or the Feast of Tabernacles.

1,2. The Purpose in God's Blessings. That thy way may be known. The familiar priestly blessing of Num 6:24-26 is adapted for use in the first person in order to present the basis of Israel's greater mission. God's gracious dealings are viewed as the means by which all people are led to turn to God. Israel is to be the witness by which the knowledge of God is spread abroad.

3,4. The Call for Universal Praise. Let the people praise thee. The refrain in verses 3 and 5 appears to be introductory, because of the presence of the selâ at the end of verse 4 and because of the general thought development. This call for joyful praise is based upon God's vindication and guidance of the nations. This is a striking universalistic note.

5-7. The Hope of Continued Blessing. God shall bless us. The psalmist repeats the meaningful refrain to correspond to the introductory pleas of verses 1 and 3. The declaration that the earth has yielded its increase (RSV) appears to be an obvious connection of the psalm with the joyous harvest festivals. Verse 7 amplifies the thought of verse 1 expressing hope for God's continued blessing in order that Israel's mission may be completed.

Psalm 68. God's Victorious March

This psalm is composed of such diverse elements as to defy classification. Verses 1-18 are basically an ode, while verses 19-35 resemble more closely a hymn. Several commentators have recognized a great number of forms, classifying it as a medley of songs and hymns. The dominant theme appears to be God's march as victor both past, present, and future. The background of the material is to be seen in the totality of Israel's history, rather than in a specific deliverance.

1-6. God's Appearance as Leader. Let God arise. This may be a plea or a reference to his appearance ("God ariseth!"). The basis for this language is found in the ancient signal for lifting up the ark (cf. Num 10:35). The righteous are to rejoice at his appearance while the wicked will melt away.

7-18. God's March As Deliverer. When thou didst march through the wilderness. The picture is still that of a leader out in front of his people, delivering them by special acts of mercy. The march begins with the deliverance from Egypt and ends with God dwelling in Zion. Cf. Eph 4:8ff., where Paul applies verse 18 to the ministry of the risen Christ.

19-23. God's Presence as Saviour. The God of our salvation. Even as God performed acts of deliverance in the past, he is still an ever-present helper who blesses daily and continues to deliver.

24-27. God's Procession as King. They have seen thy goings, O God . . . my King. The scene is an actual procession of a festival occasion celebrating the victory and enthronement of God as King. Benjamin and Judah represent the southern tribes, while Zebulun and Naphtali represent the northern tribes.

28-35. God's Exaltation as Lord. Kings bring presents unto thee. The deliverances of the past and the blessings of the present point to the future triumph of God. God is called upon to command his strength in a final act of power. After the assertion of ultimate victory, all the nations are called upon to exalt God as Lord through praise.

Psalm 69. A Prayer for Retribution

An individual in the depths of despair and agony here laments his case. His persecution is viewed as a result of his religious convictions. With fervor he pleads for retribution upon his persecutors. Because of his worried state of mind, his mood changes often. However, his despair becomes triumph and his complaint becomes praise after he voices his innermost feelings.

1-6. The Basic Complaint. Save me. . . . I sink in deep mire. After crying out for help in one brief phrase, the psalmist describes his plight. The words waters, mire, deep waters, and floods are all used to show the extreme nature of his trouble. His enemies are numerous, hateful, and powerful. He is greatly concerned that his reproach not injure other devout men who look to him as an example.

7-12. The Underlying Cause. Because for thy sake. It is because of his loyalty, faithfulness, and zeal that he has suffered. He appears to have fought against the liberal and popular forms of religious expression in his day. For all this, he has become the laughing-stock of the community and the jest of the drunkards.

13-18. The Intensified Appeal. My prayer is unto thee. In terse and rapid pleas, he asks for deliverance and vindication. His previous complaint is repeated but becomes secondary to his request for immediate assistance.

19-28. The Bitter Imprecation. Pour out thine indignation upon them. Each of these requests for retribution is based upon God's entering into the bitter indignation of the psalmist. These are God's enemies as well as his. The fierce climax is reached in the plea that they be completely obliterated from the book of the living (cf. Ex 32:32; Phil 4:3; Rev 13:8; 20:15). The Gospel writers may well have had verse 21 in mind as they depicted the passion of Christ (Mt 27:34; Mk 15:23; Jn 19:29).

29-36. The Assured Deliverance. Let thy salvation, O God, set me on high. The vow of thanksgiving which follows seems to presuppose an answer to this request for deliverance. It is interesting to note that the psalmist's views on sacrifice may account for some of his opposition. The psalm closes on a note of intense praise as heaven and earth are invited to join in the chorus.

Psalm 70. A Cry for Immediate Help

This psalm is an individual lament which also occurs as part of Psalm 40. Here the name for God has been changed from Yahweh to Elohim, and some slight variations in wording are evident. Its presence as a separate psalm may indicate that it was found in both of the basic collections already mentioned, or that it was detached from Psalm 40 for liturgical use in the Temple. (Cf. Ps 40:13-17 for added notes.)

Psalm 71. The Confidence of an Aged Saint

Here is the lament of an individual who has suffered great adversity in his many years upon earth. Persecutions, sickness, calamities, and trials have added gray hairs to his head. Yet he has maintained his close relation to God since childhood. His appeal for help once more is based upon the blessings of past experience. His desire is to live long enough to teach the present generation something of what life has taught him.

1-3. His Confidence in God. In thee, O Lord, do I put my trust. These words are drawn by the psalmist from Psalm 31 as an expression of his deep confidence in God. He knows God to be his refuge and rock of safety.

4-13. His Appeal for Deliverance. Deliver me, O my God. Although his enemies are quick to take advantage of his weakness, God has stayed or braced him since birth (cf. Ps 22:9,10). These enemies, who believe that God has forsaken him, are rebuffed for their wrong interpretation of his affliction. His appeal is based solely on his trust in God's power and willingness to deliver him.

14-16. His Hope in God. But I will hope continually. The turning point of the psalm is seen here, as appeal changes to hope and praise. The past gives way to the future.

17-21. His Testimony of Revelation. Thou hast taught me. On the basis of God's special teaching, he has been able to teach others. Now he asks for more time in order to show forth God's strength, power, and righteousness (vv. 18,19).

22-24. His Vow of Praise. I will also praise thee. The psalmist promises to praise with voice, instruments, lips, tongue, and his whole being. He is inwardly assured that he will be vindicated even as he requested (v. 13).

Psalm 72. Blessings on the King

This is the prayer of a loyal subject who desires God's richest blessing upon a young king. All of the hopes of the nation rest on this king, who is God's representative. The description was inspired by Solomon's reign or accession, but it may have been applied to more than one king in its historic use. There is throughout a picture of an ideal king, and thus the psalm has Messianic significance.

1-7. Prayer for Justice and Righteousness. Give the king thy judgments, O God. This prayer begins rightly with a plea for the two most important royal characteristics—justice and righteousness. It is on the basis of God's judgment that the king can act justly. The phrase, the king's son, probably refers to the new king as young, and parallels the first line of the verse. The verbs translated as futures may express prophetic confidence or be better rendered as prayers, i.e., may he judge or let him judge.

8-14. Prayer for Dominion and Peace. He shall have dominion. Again this plea may better be translated, May he have dominion. On the basis of the king's justice, righteousness, and dominion, there will be peace for his subjects. The verbs in verses 12-14 are properly indicatives ("he spares . . . saves . . . redeems," etc.), and mark out the public rewards arising from his ideal characteristics.

15-17. Prayer for Fame and Blessing. His name shall endure . . . and men shall be blessed in him. This section is also a prayer, better rendered may he live and may his name endure. The psalmist prays that the king's fame (his name) may endure long after he has died, even among the other nations which he rules.

18-20. Doxology of Praise, and Conclusion. Blessed be the Lord God. These verses were added as a concluding doxology to Book II of the Psalter. Verse 20 is an editorial note which originally separated the preceding collection from the psalms connected with Asaph, which follow. A number of the manuscripts do not include verse 20 here.

The third major division in the Psalter, which is much shorter than the previous two books, includes only seventeen psalms. The first eleven are connected with the name of Asaph, who was one of the chief musicians under David's rule. The other two chief musicians of David were Heman and Ethan, each of whom is connected with a psalm in this book. One psalm is referred to David, while the remaining four psalms are associated with the sons of Korah. Again it is not necessary to attribute authorship to those connected with these titles. Just as the sons of Korah formed a Levitical guild, so Asaph's sons continued to occupy places of musical leadership.

Psalm 73. The Trial of Faith

Here is yet another approach to the problem of the prosperity of the wicked. Although the psalmist is troubled by his own suffering, he is more perplexed by the lack of punishment of the wicked. This psalm goes deeper into the problem than do Psalms 37 and 49, and the author finds peace in spiritual fellowship with God. It may be classified as a song of trust, with overtones that link it with the Wisdom writers. The didactic purpose is evident throughout, but it is interwoven with the confession of a man whose faith has been sorely tested.

1. His Conclusion. Truly God is good. The psalmist states first the confident conclusion which came from his supreme test of faith. He uses the Hebrew particle 'ak, which can be translated in many ways – "now," "truly," "surely," "only," "after all." Here and in verses 13 and 18 it is probably best translated surely.

2-12. His Problem. I saw the prosperity of the wicked. Contrasted with the writer's general conclusion is his pilgrimage in the valley of doubt, introduced by the emphatic as for me. He was in danger of complete apostasy because of his envy toward prosperous wicked men. He describes their arrogant bearing, their freedom from suffering, their overbearing pride, and their mockery of God.

13-22. His Struggle. Verily, I have cleansed my heart in vain. This is not his conclusion as stated in verse 1, but a statement of his temptation during his struggle with doubt. He refused to parade his doubts lest he influence others adversely. Though he wrestled with his questions, he found no relief until he went to the Temple. There he regained his spiritual balance, as he received insight into the end reserved for the wicked.

23-28. His Victory. Nevertheless, I am continually with thee. Now the writer has found a complete victory over his doubts. His foolishness is a thing of the past, because God is his guide and strength. The phrase, afterward receive me to glory, may well refer to a hope beyond life; the same verb here translated "thou shalt receive me" is used for the experiences of Enoch (Gen 5:24) and Elijah (II Kgs 2:10; cf. Ps 49:15). However, the psalmist emphasizes the sense of God's nearness as he experiences it in his present circumstances.

Psalm 74. An Appeal for Vindication

This psalm is the expression of national lament by Israel in the wake of extreme disaster. The feeling is widespread that God has forsaken and forgotten his people. The destruction of the city and the Temple suggests the occasion of the Babylonian conquest. This is the only time known when the Temple was burned to the ground. The conditions are similar to those described in the book of Lamentations.

1-3. The Nation's Appeal. Remember thy congregation. The psalmist voices the basic appeal to God to remember His relationship of love with Israel. Even though the Divine wrath is evident in the present tragedy, it is incomprehensible to the psalmist that the Lord, as Israel's Shepherd, could forsake His sheep. Therefore, he pleads for God to take the giant steps necessary to redeem His people.

4-11. The Nation's Plight. Thine enemies roar. Instead of being filled with rejoicing worshipers, the temple area is filled with roaring enemies. In place of the emblems of the tribes, the standards of the enemy are seen. The patient, quiet work by which the Temple was built has been nullified by the ruthless axes and hammers of the invaders. The questions introduced by how long and Why express the heightened nature of the lament, and relate the basic appeal to the specific disaster.

12-17. The Nation's King. For God is my King of old. It is Israel's supreme King whose power is pictured here. Using symbolic language and descriptive terminology drawn from the mythology of the Canaanites, the psalmist insists that it is God who has won the mighty victories of the past. While the figures of speech are derived from ancient creation stories, the psalmist is applying them to God's displays of power in the Exodus and the wilderness wanderings.

18-23. The Nation's Prayer. Arise, O God, plead thine own cause. The former appeal is raised to a higher level with this impassioned plea. This is not merely Israel's cause, but God's cause as well. Therefore, the psalmist prays that God will watch over His defenseless people, remember the covenant of love, and keep an eye on the roaring enemies.

Psalm 75. The Gratitude of the Nation

While the opening of this psalm is an expression of national thanksgiving, and the conclusion is related to an individual, the central portion is difficult to classify. Some commentators suggest that verse 1 has been added to an individual's prayer for victory in order to adapt the psalm for public worship. Although this may have been the case, the psalm exhibits careful poetic arrangement as well as definite progression of thought.

1. The Invocation of Israel. Unto thee . . . we give thanks. Behind this terse statement of gratitude there appears to lie an actual, historical deliverance. The reality of a recent manifestation of power gives confidence that God's revealed nature (his name) is close at hand.

2,3. The Response of God. I will judge uprightly. This oracle from God gives the basis for the pronouncements which follow. It is at the appointed time (v. 2; mô'ēd, not "the congregation," AV) when God will take his place on the judgment seat. His control of the universe assures that the judgment will be sure.

4-8. The Warning of the Psalmist. I say unto the arrogant . . . to the wicked. The arrogant and wicked are reminded that power to lift high is not found in the east, west, or south. God alone can lift up or put down (v. 7, ASV) for he it is who executes judgment and causes the wicked to drink the cup of his wrath (Ps 11:6; Rev 14:10).

9,10. The Triumph of the Righteous. But I will declare for ever. Speaking as Israel's representative, the psalmist vows endless praise. With these vows comes the assurance that the arrogant will fall from their self-elevation, while the righteous will gain their rightful place.

Psalm 76. A Song of Victory

This song is closely related to Psalms 46, 48, and 75 in its celebration of a military victory. Many commentators seek the common background for these four pieces in the defeat of the Assyrians in 701 B.C. Even though some historical event may have inspired the original poem, the present psalm seems to have been adapted for temple worship.

1-3. The Fame of God. In Judah . . . in Israel . . . in Salem . . . in Zion. The reputation of God has been spread far and wide because of his victories. Jerusalem is the center of his fame because his battle headquarters are located there.

4-6. The Might of God. Thou art more glorious. The Lord has proved himself in battle to be mightier than all his foes. He easily conquers the stouthearted and the men of might. He is glorious and majestic, more majestic even than the everlasting mountains (cf. LXX).

7-9. The Judgment of God. Thou, even thou, art to be feared. The thought goes beyond the battle scene as God takes his seat in heaven. He is the judge to be feared, who strikes man with terror. All of the earth stands still as the Lord saves the oppressed peoples, of whom Israel is representative.

10-12. The Homage Due God. Vow, and pay unto the Lord your God. This call for praise and offerings is based upon the bold assertion that the Lord can turn even man's most dangerous passion into a means of glory. The last ounce of his enemies' wrath can only add to God's glory, as he girds it upon himself (ASV; not restrain, AV).

Psalm 77. Remembering God's Works

Lament is intermingled with praise in this psalm. The opening verses (1-9) are the lamentations of an individual, who may represent the nation in affliction. The later verses (10-20) are words of praise which clearly complement the opening section. Verses 16-19 express a different mood and exhibit a different style and rhythm from the rest of the psalm.

1-3. His Perplexity of Spirit. I cried unto the Lord . . . my spirit was overwhelmed. Between these clauses the psalmist's deep anguish and anxiety are graphically portrayed. His outstretched hand (not sore, AV) sought God, but found no comfort. His meditations and musings only overwhelmed his spirit.

4-9. His Search for Answers. My spirit made diligent search. Worry and anxiety still ruled his life so that he could not sleep. He counted the days of the past, instead of sheep. Finally, he voiced the six questions that puzzled as well as troubled him. He could not understand why a God of mercy and compassion should remain silent and inactive.

10-15. His Solution in History. I will remember the works of the Lord. Recalling the wonders of God in past days brings hope for the psalmist. God has proved himself to be one who does glorious deeds; he has shown his strength, and has redeemed the children of Israel. The unspoken request is that God may so act again.

16-19. His Confidence in God's Power. The waters saw thee . . . they were afraid. These verses, which act as a hymn within a hymn, differ greatly in mood and form from the rest of the poem. Although the dominant note of this section is God's power over nature in general, the position of the passage, between verses 15 and 20, relates it to the deliverance at the Red Sea.

20. His Assurance of God's Leadership. Thou leddest thy people. This verse voices again the thought of verse 15, with the forceful implication that God can do it again.

Psalm 78. Wisdom from History

Here is a good example of the didactic purposes of the Wisdom writers. God's wonderful acts of deliverance, blessing, and guidance are recalled to serve as a lesson for the psalmist's generation. The teaching is directed toward the inhabitants of Judah, illustrating God's choice of Jerusalem and the Davidic line as recipients of his promises instead of the tribe of Ephraim, which disqualified itself by rebellion (vv. 9-11,57,60,67,68).

1-11. The Warnings of the Past. I will utter dark sayings of old. The didactic purpose of the psalmist is clearly stated. A general statement stressing the responsibility of the 'fathers' to teach the children, and the danger of apostasy serves as an introduction to the many illustrations from history which follow.

12-39. The Experiences of the Wilderness. Marvelous things did he. . . . and they sinned yet more. The works of God are described in detail: the crossing of the sea, the guidance of the cloud and the pillar of fire, the provision of water, manna, and quails. Even in the face of these constant blessings, the people kept on sinning and tempting God. But in spite of their sin, God demonstrated his compassion and understanding by forgiving them.

40-55. The Deliverance from Egypt into Canaan. They remembered not his hand. The same tragic story is repeated. This time the emphasis is placed upon the plagues as illustrations of God's deliverance. Although only seven of the ten plagues are cited and these are not in the same order as in the Book of Exodus, they serve as graphic reasons for faithfulness to God. The psalmist tells how God led His people into Canaan and how they provoked Him by turning aside to idolatry as soon as they had taken the land.

56-72. The Choices of God for Israel. He forsook . . . awaked . . . chose. The subjection of Israel during the period of the Judges is pointed out as evidence of abandonment by God. Then, in bold language, the psalmist suggests that the Lord awoke to the need of Israel. The rejection of the northern tribes brought the assurance of God's choice of Judah. The establishment of Jerusalem as Israel's center of worship and David as king marked the southern tribes as undisputed leaders of God's people.

Psalm 79. A Prayer for Vengeance

This psalm is the collective lament of the community of Jerusalem in a time of national disaster. The description of the defiling of the Temple and the devastation of the city points to a serious destruction, such as the Babylonian conquest in 586 B.C. There is here close affinity to the background of Psalm 74, where the Babylonian destruction seems most appropriate. The Jews have long connected these two poems for use on the fast day which commemorates the two destructions of Jerusalem, in 586 B.C. and in A.D. 70.

1-4. The Grief in Jerusalem. The heathen are come. The city of Jerusalem is described as being in a real state of emergency. Gentiles have desecrated the Temple, laid the city in ruins, and left the dead unburied. All of this devastation and slaughter has resulted in scorn and ridicule on the part of Israel's Gentile neighbors.

5-8. The Plea for Mercy. How long, Lord? This frequent cry of the distressed is followed quickly by the second question, "Will it be forever?" The bitter hurt of the psalmist is evident in his begging God to wreak vengeance on the godless even before he asks Him to extend His tender mercies to His people.

9-12. The Prayer for Help. Help . . . deliver . . . purge . . . for thy name's sake. The psalmist not only recognizes his forefathers' sin but confesses the sin of his own generation. He stresses not selfish desire, but the glory of God's name. After all, God's name has been abused in the defilement of the Temple and in the derision by the heathen. The psalmist calls upon God to pay them back seven fold for their scoffing.

13. The Vow of Praise. We will show forth thy praise. If God will answer the prayer for help, his people will fulfill a double vow. They determine to praise God by giving continual thanks and by publicly declaring his praise.

Psalm 80. A Plea for Restoration

Here is another expression of national lament in a time of distress. The psalmist has sincere interest in the Northern Kingdom either as an outsider or as an inhabitant of that area. The former is probably the case, for the distress appears to be associated with the Exile. The irregular recurrence of a refrain, in verses 3,7, and 19, with an abbreviated form in verse 14, makes the structure of the psalm difficult to explain.

1-3. The Cry to the Shepherd. Give ear, O Shepherd of Israel. Although the phrase, Shepherd of Israel, is not used elsewhere in the OT, the figure occurs frequently. The three tribes, Ephraim, Benjamin, and Manasseh, were all descended from Rachel and represent the Northern Kingdom. The cry is designed to call God into action to restore his people.

4-7. The Plight of the Flock. Thou feedest them with the bread of tears. As in Psalms 74 and 79, the psalmist cries out, How long . . . ? He wants to know how much longer God is going to keep on fuming in anger. Although the Lord is not mentioned as shepherd in these verses, the metaphor is continued in the reference to his feeding them with tears.

8-13. The Nurture of the Vine. Thou hast brought a vine out of Egypt. Another metaphor is used here to show how God nurtured his chosen people. After transplanting the vine from Egypt to Canaan, the Lord caused it to cover the hills and spread out from the Mediterranean to the Euphrates. With verse 12, the past nurture is compared with the present rejection. The vine has been ravaged by man and beast as they have passed by.

14-19. The Appeal to the Husbandman. Return . . . and visit this vine. Since God planted and cared for the vine, he should continue to look down on it and visit it. It is God's wrath which has caused the vine to be burned, and hence the people are in danger of annihilation. If God will revive and restore his people, they will worship him. The last occurrence of the refrain is heightened by the use of the covenant name for God. The man of thy right hand. The psalmist prays for help for God's people Israel, depicted as the man of God's right hand. Ultimately, of course, the Messiah became the fulfillment of this prayer (cf. the use of the phrase, "Son of man," in the Gospels, and references to Christ as being at the right hand of the Majesty on high — Heb 1:3; 8:1; 10:12; Acts 7:56).

Psalm 81. A Warning from Experience

A hymn of praise opens this psalm, and a prophetic utterance concludes it. The abrupt change at the end of verse 5 has suggested to many commentators that fragments of two psalms are joined together here. However, this view is not imperative, for a solemn festival would be a logical time for such a recital of God's relation to Israel. The special term for festival, the blowing of the trumpet, the references to the new moon and to the full moon probably give the poem double reference to the Feast of Trumpets and the Feast of Tabernacles.

1-5. A Festival Summons. Sing . . . make a joyful noise. This call is a graphic picture of the opening ritual for a great festival. The call was probably vocalized by a priest, who summoned the people to join their voices in joyful singing, the Levitical choir to share with psalms and instruments, and the priests to sound the horns. The time appointed in verse 3 is better translated full moon.

6-10. A Divine Testimony. I removed his shoulder from the burden. In terse statements, the deliverances of the Exodus are recounted by a prophet who acts as God's spokesman. Since God has always satisfied the needs of Israel, He promises to continue to fill their mouths if only they will open them in complete trust.

11-16. A Divine Lament. But my people would not hearken. The prophetic utterance continues as a lament over Israel's ingratitude. The cry of verse 13 intensifies the grief of the lament. How different things would have been if only Israel had walked in God's ways! Then she would have had victory and blessings instead of defeat and misery.

Psalm 82. The Final Authority

A scene of judgment upon injustice is set forth in this didactic poem. The proper interpretation of the entire psalm rests on the identity of the second 'Élôhîm in verse 1. Some commentators translate it literally as gods and relate it to a concept of subordinate gods in a heavenly council. Others translate it angels and connect it with a less polytheistic concept. Still other interpreters translate it as judges and make it refer to the unjust men in authority. The last interpretation seems preferable.

1. The Supreme Judge. God standeth . . . he judgeth. The scene is a vision of the assembly over which God presides. This may be identified with the nation of Israel (cf. Neh 13:1, where we find the synonymous phrase, qᵉhal ha'elohîm). Thus God takes his stand in his nation and judges among the human judges appointed over Israel.

2-4. The Corrupt Judges. How long will ye judge unjustly. The arraignment involves the assembled judges of the nation; the indictment concerns the unjust decisions they have pronounced. The basic problem involves the judges' favoring influential men in the courts. These unjust authorities are admonished to cease their partiality, do justice, and defend the oppressed.

5-7. The Just Sentence. Ye shall die . . . and fall. Since these judges lack understanding, the essential quality of justice, judgment is unavoidable. They were given god-like functions as judges, but now they must fall like all men who pervert justice.

8. The Sovereign Judge. Arise, O God, judge the earth. The psalm closes with an appeal to God to complete his work as the Sovereign Judge of all nations. He must take possession as well as pass judgment before true justice can endure.

Psalm 83. Judgment upon the Nations

Psalm 83 is a typical national lament in a time of great danger. Since the enemies of Israel are automatically the enemies of God, the name of God (Yahweh) is at stake. The occasion cannot be identified with certainty, because at no period in Israel's history has such a confederation of nations existed. The psalm may refer to an event unrecorded elsewhere in Israel's history, or it may list tribal groups which merely gave moral support in a time of crisis.

1-8. An Appeal for Action. Keep not thou silence, O God. In the Hebrew this is a strong plea for activity, repeated in a threefold manner. God's silence must be broken because these nations are his enemies as well. They are making a loud noise about their conspiracy to blot out the name of Israel. Most of these peoples named were nomadic tribes dwelling south and east of Israel. Philistia and Tyre are exceptions; they occupied territory west and north respectively. The majority of these were traditional foes of Israel.

9-18. A Prayer for Vengeance. Do unto them. In a blistering imprecation the psalmist appeals for the utter destruction of these would-be foes. He uses the defeat of the Canaanites and Midianites as an illustration of the type of destruction he desires. The severity of his prayer is lessened in verses 16-18 when he inserts a moral basis of conversion and expresses a desire that others may learn from their destruction.

Psalm 84. A Joyful Pilgrimage

This is the song of a pilgrim whose goal is almost reached. There is throughout a sense of peace and communion which transcends the ritual and other outward features of worship. While the poem reflects the sentiments of pilgrims of any age, it appears to come from the period of the monarchy at a time when the Temple was still standing.

1-4. The Longing for God's House. My soul longeth, yea, even fainteth. After exclaiming, How lovely are thy dwelling places, the psalmist shares his intense longings, which are about to be satisfied. His whole being yearns for fellowship with God. He envies the birds that live in the temple precincts. He recognizes how fortunate are those servants who live within the temple buildings.

5-8. The Pilgrimage to God's House. Blessed is the man whose strength is in thee. The happiness of the permanent dweller is reflected in the pilgrim. He has a special sense of God's strength and has in his heart the highway to Zion. As he passes through the waterless valley, where only balsam trees can grow, a change takes place. The parched valley is transformed into a place of springs as the pilgrim receives and transmits the blessings of God.

9-12. The Joy of Worship in God's House. For a day in thy courts is better than a thousand. After breathing a short prayer for God's anointed king, the psalmist describes the joy of joining others in the service of worship. One day in the place of worship, he feels, would be worth more than a thousand days anywhere else. He would rather be the humblest servant in the Temple, or get no further than the door, than have a permanent place where wickedness abounds. A sun and shield. God, like the chief heavenly body in the physical realm, is the sole source of all our spiritual power, energy, and light. He is our protection, and He bestows needed grace in this life and glory in the life to come. Blessed, or happy. Happiness is again emphasized for the one who has taken refuge in God through spiritual worship.

Psalm 85. A Cry for Pardon

Though basically a national lament, this psalm has a strong prophetic element as well. The first section (vv. 1-3) appears to refer to the return from captivity, but these verses are idealized beyond the known situation of those days. The psalmist uses this ideal picture to show the sharp contrast with the present and the assurance for the future.

1-3. The Ideal of Forgiveness. Lord, thou hast been favourable. The pictures of God's favor, restoration, forgiveness, and cessation from wrath set forth the ideal of a perfect relation to God. The verbs in these verses, although translated as past tenses, are probably prophetic perfects, indicating that the psalmist views the events they forecast as certain of fulfillment.

4-7. The Reality of the Present. Turn us . . . cause thine anger toward us to cease. The present situation stands in bold relief when viewed in relation to the prophetic ideal. God's anger is still evident and appears to be unending. The psalmist appeals to God to restore, revive, show loving-kindness, and grant deliverance.

8-13. The Answer of Hope. I will hear what God the Lord will speak. In prophetic fashion the psalmist pauses to hear God's message in answer to the prayer of the people. He is certain that it will be a message of peace. By means of vivid personifications, he describes how real is God's salvation. The union of God's mercy or covenant love and our truth or faithfulness, of His righteousness and our peace of heart, of earth and heaven are certain when God and men meet. As a result of this encounter, God will provide for men's needs and lead them in right paths. For us today, the meeting-place can only be at the foot of the cross.

Psalm 86. A Prayer for God's Favor

In Psalm 86 we recognize the sincere prayer of an individual who is in personal distress. The general nature of his distress makes the message apply to any person in trouble. It is this lack of specific detail that has led several commentators to view the psalm as corporate rather than individual. While this is basically a personal meditation, the author at times identifies himself with his community.

1-5. A General Plea for Help. Bow down . . . hear me. In general terms the psalmist sets forth his needs. Each plea carries with it the reason why God should answer it. He cries for God to hear because of his needy condition, to keep because of his pious nature, to save because of his continual prayer, and to gladden because of his sincere devotions. His faith is based upon the fact that God is a "forgiver," who shows mercy and pardons.

6-10. A Confident Hope in a Response. Give ear . . . for thou wilt answer me. The majesty and power of God make this confidence possible. While the other nations have their own gods, none of them can do the mighty works of the Lord. His greatness will eventually cause these nations to worship Him who is God alone.

11-17. A Prayer for Guidance and Protection. Teach me . . . unite my heart. It is God's teaching that will enable the psalmist to walk in truth. He desires unity of purpose that he may worthily praise and glorify the name of the Lord. With the humility of a slave or a handmaid's son, he asks for God's merciful protection and requests some sign of divine favor toward him.

Psalm 87. The City of God

The psalmist sings a song in praise of Zion as the center of worship for the world. The abrupt, terse style, which identifies the psalm with prophetic oracles, also renders several phrases obscure and difficult. The pronounced universalism points to the author's contact with the major prophets. The mention of Egypt and Babylon together as world powers suggests the period of the Exile as the occasion of composition of the poem.

1-3. The Glories of Zion. Glorious things are spoken of thee. These glories include the facts that God himself founded Zion, that he chose her in preference to every other place where Israelites dwell, and that she is in reality the city of God. Further glorious things are referred to in the verses which follow.

4-6. The Citizens of Zion. This man was born there. These words act as a refrain in this prophetic utterance. The Egyptians (Rahab), the Babylonians, the Philistines, the Phoenicians (Tyre), and the Ethiopians are all to become citizens of Zion. The certainty of this edict is assured by God's registering them in his census of the nations as "born in Zion." The concept of the future Jerusalem as the mother of all peoples is developed in Isa 60; 66:7-13,20,23; and referred to in Gal 4:26 and Heb 12:22.

7. The Rejoicing in Zion. All my springs are in thee. The musicians are instructed to sing, All my fountains are in thee. Thee is feminine, referring to Zion. The psalmist exults in addressing the sacred city as the mother or cradle of Israel's future generations. For ma'yān, "springs," in the sense of wife or mother, the source of offspring, see Prov 5:16; Song 4:12,15; Isa 48:1.

Psalm 88. The Darkness of Despair

This lament and prayer of an individual completely engulfed in gloom and despair ends without an answer or even a glimmer of hope. Although some interpreters view the psalm as a corporate sequel to portions of the book of Lamentations, the personal aspects are too intense for such a national interpretation. The psalmist cannot be located in history, but this does not affect the interpretation, for his suffering has a timeless quality.

1,2. His Appeal. Let my prayer come before thee. In the midst of his suffering he demonstrates his faith by this direct appeal to the Lord God of my salvation. This is not his first plea to God but the continuation of a prayer which begins in the day and runs on into the night.

3-8. His Complaint. My life draweth nigh unto the grave. His trouble is so serious that he is as good as dead. Nothing is left for him but the grave and Sheol. His most descriptive term for Sheol is the pit (v. 4), a place of darkness where the dead are cut off from God's hand. He seems to feel that the Lord no longer remembers him, since he is counted with the dead.

9-12. His Urgency. Lord, I have called daily upon thee. He is certain that he will pass beyond God's help when he actually goes to Sheol. Therefore, God must act immediately if He is going to show His wonders, loving-kindness, faithfulness, and righteousness.

13-18. His Desperation. But unto thee have I cried. His petition becomes more impassioned with each outcry. Now in a spirit of desperation, he asks the ever-recurring question, Why . . . ? Having prayed continually for relief since his youth, only one conclusion is left: "It is all the result of God's wrath." He makes no further request, but leaves his burden with the Lord. How different is the NT hope in life with Christ beyond the grave (cf. Phil 1:21,23; II Cor 5:1-8).

Psalm 89. An Appeal to God's Promises

This psalm is basically a lament by an individual who speaks for the nation. The actual lament is prefaced by a lengthy introduction, which consists of a hymn of praise and an oracle. These divergent elements have suggested to some commentators that this piece is a composite of two or three original poems. While it is possible that the author incorporated existing poems, the subject matter is arranged in a logical manner. The hymn and oracle both present the basis for the lament.

1-4. God's Limitless Loving-kindness. Mercies . . . faithfulness . . . covenant.

In this beautiful introduction the psalmist presents the themes which he will develop. The Lord has shown his loving-kindness (v. 1, ASV) in his acts of deliverance. His faithfulness is the guarantee of his continued loving-kindness. His covenant gives binding power to these important attributes.

5-18. God's Incomparable Faithfulness. For who in the heaven can be compared unto the Lord? The incomparableness of God both in heaven and among his saints within Israel is set forth as a plea to God and a comfort to the people. The reference to Rahab (v. 10) employs a term from an ancient Near Eastern legend to speak of God's victory over Egypt at the Red Sea (cf. Job 9:13; Ps 74:13-15; 87:4; I Sam 30:7; Isa 51:9,10). The other allusions are used here to intensify the picture of God's power in creation, his victory over all opposition, and his dominion over heaven and earth.

19-37. God's Sworn Promise. Then thou spakest in vision. The motif of the covenant with David now becomes central, though it is still connected with God's loving-kindness and faithfulness (cf. vv. 24,28,33). The psalmist first deals with the divine promise to David. The former promise to the nation as God's firstborn in his estimation (Ex 4:22) is now focused on the king; the epithet of verse 27 is extended to all the Davidic succession, culminating in Jesus, God's anointed one (Messiah). Then the emphasis is shifted in verse 29 to the working out of the promise through the seed of David. While he appeals to God's sworn testimony that the covenant will stand, he recognizes that punishment must come upon David's seed for their unfaithfulness (vv. 30-32).

38-51. God's Shattered Covenant. But thou hast cast off and abhorred. The emphatic But thou marks a sharp contrast between the promises of God and the present situation. The covenant has been made void, the city walls are broken down, the land is spoiled, the battle lost, and the throne cast down. The shortening of the king's youth may refer to Jehoiachin, who was only eighteen when carried away captive. After setting forth the present plight of the nation, the psalmist turns to his appeal in verse 46. The transitoriness of human life, God's power to save, and his former loving-kindness are all linked to the covenant with David as reasons for immediate restoration. While no hope is expressed, the enthusiasm of the former sections would suggest a positive expectation of hope.

52. Closing Benediction. Blessed be the Lord for evermore. This benediction is not a part of the psalm itself, but a doxology added as a formal close to Book III.

BOOK IV. Psalms 90–106

The fourth major division in the Psalter is actually a part of a larger collection embracing Psalms 90–150. The break at Psalm 106 seems to be made for convenience, since the same dominant thought continues in Psalm 107. While the psalms in Book I were primarily personal and those in Books II and III were generally national, the remainder of the Psalter is basically liturgical. The emphasis is upon the worship of God's people as they offer their thanksgiving and praise in a form suitable for temple worship. The covenant name for God, Yahweh, predominates. It occurs in every psalm in Book IV and is absent from only two in Book V.

Psalm 90. Our Help in Ages Past

Although this may well be the meditation of an individual, its purpose is clearly to voice the petition of a corporate group. The author looks back on a long period of history to arrive at his concept of God's wrath. In view of man's frailty and brevity, he pleads for restoration to God's favor.

1-6. Man's Life Contrasted with God's Eternity. Lord, thou hast been our dwelling place. The psalmist begins by citing his confidence in God's everlasting nature (cf. Deut 33:27). Truly all generations have found this to be true. The Lord is immortal; man is mortal. The Lord is above time; man is ever time-conscious. The Lord is from everlasting to everlasting; man, like grass, is short-lived. The similes of verses 4-6 emphasize not merely the brevity or frailty of life, but man's dependence upon the Eternal. Man is surely at God's disposal, returning to dust at His command and being swept away as by a flood.

7-12. Man Consumed by God's Wrath. For we are consumed by thine anger. The psalmist now interprets the reason for man's transitory nature and his suffering. He realizes from history and personal experience that God's face is as the light of the sun in its power to probe into the depths of man's being. Compared with God's timelessness, a lifetime of seventy or eighty years seems pitifully short. Furthermore, this span of years is filled with sorrow and suffering. Out of this pessimistic view of life comes the plaintive cry for teaching and wisdom to help a man discern the true meaning of life.

13-17. Man Seeking for God's Favor. Return, O Lord . . . satisfy us. The appeal introduced in verse 12 is continued throughout the poem. The writer desires God to grant his people happiness in proportion to the suffering they have endured under His wrath. The psalm closes with a plea that God's loveliness or graciousness (his beauty) may be the basis of the Lord's preparing and establishing (cf. Eph 2:10) all the daily tasks ahead (viz., the work of our hands; cf. Deut 2:7; 14:29; 16:15; 24:19).

Psalm 91. The Security of Trust

In this companion poem to Psalm 90 the psalmist sings a noble song of trust, but he has a didactic purpose as well. The prophetic oracle at the close adds a note of authority to the confidence expressed throughout. The depth of trust and the quiet confidence suggest that this is the meditation of an individual. However, its possible use as an antiphonal song adapts it for congregational use.

1,2. Divine Protection. He is my refuge and my fortress. The writer opens with a powerful presentation of his theme — the security of the one who trusts completely in God. The secret place may better be translated the shelter, which meaning better parallels the concept of the shadow.

3-8. Divine Providence. Surely he shall deliver thee . . . cover thee. The basic idea of protection is expanded to include many acts of providential care as well as active deliverance. Because of the references to pestilence and disease, many commentators treat the entire psalm as a polemic against the use of magic formulae for warding off demons. Indeed, the Talmud suggests that the psalm be used in the case of demonic attacks. The terror by night may refer to the night demon Lilith, while the arrow . . . by day may describe the devices of the wicked demons. The pestilence . . . in darkness may have affinity with the demon Namtar, while the destruction . . . at noonday may refer to a one-eyed demon also mentioned in Rabbinical tradition. Even if these ideas were absent from the author's thoughts, they were very much a part of the psalm in its actual Jewish use. The snare of the fowler is a reference to traps set by adversaries (cf. Ps 124:7). Noisome pestilence is literally, death of destructions, perhaps referring to a violent death. The psalmist was conscious of God's care amid the varied circumstances of life.

9-13. Divine Reward. Because thou hast made the Lord . . . thy habitation. The psalmist, reverting to his main theme, carries forward the idea of reward alluded to in verse 8. The man of faith is assured that God will send guardian angels to protect him from plagues and stumbling. Satan quoted these words in tempting Jesus (Mt 4:6; Lk 4:10). According to the Talmud, every man has two ministering angels beside him during his entire life.

14-16. Divine Promise. Because he hath set his love upon me. The authority behind the idea of reward is heightened by the oracle from God. The promise includes the blessings of deliverance, exaltation, answer to prayer, long life, and victory. These blessings and more are promised to the one who has come to love and trust God.

Psalm 92. A Hymn of Gratitude

An individual with great confidence in the righteous judgment of God here expresses his thanksgiving. His confidence goes beyond theory or formal theology, for it is derived from personal experience. The use of the psalm as a hymn for the weekly observance of the Sabbath is attested by ancient Jewish sources. The notation in verse 3 of the instruments to be used shows that it was probably designed for corporate worship.

1-4. The Delight of Praise. It is a good thing to give thanks . . . to sing praises. The psalmist expresses his personal delight in the services of the Temple. After enumerating the instruments involved, he clearly sets forth the basis of public praise. It is God's wondrous works that make the worshipers glad.

5-8. The Sovereignty of God. O Lord, how great are thy works. The sovereign, sublime nature of God as expressed in his works and his thoughts is set in contrast to the lack of comprehension of the fool and the brutish man. In comparison to the sure destruction of these men who lack perception and understanding, God stands immovable on high for evermore.

9-15. The Certainty of Judgment. Thine enemies shall perish. . . . but my horn shalt thou exalt. The writer's enemies are again viewed as God's enemies, too. The psalmist is certain that God will bring true retribution, for he feels at one with the Lord, that he is inseparable from the vindicating triumph of God's righteous cause. He closes with a beautiful description of the happy lot of the righteous, who are transplanted into the household of the Lord (v. 13). Following the pattern of antiquity, he gloats over this certain destruction, but returns quickly to a description of the happy lot of the righteous.

Psalm 93. The Everlasting King

The emphasis upon the enthronement of Yahweh as King gives this psalm close affinity with Psalms 47 and 96–99. For this reason, these six poems are usually called Royal Psalms or Enthronement Psalms. Mowinckel and others have done extensive research in an attempt to reconstruct an actual enthronement ceremony in connection with the New Year's celebration. These psalms would take on increased meaning and significance if it could be shown that they were used in such a ceremony. However, positive evidence of such a practice is indeed slight.

1,2. God's Kingship. The Lord reigneth. These opening words can better be translated, Yahweh is King or has become king. He has robed himself with majesty, has girded himself with strength, and is ready for action. The psalmist hastens to state that the Lord's rulership is not a new thing, but has been established of old (cf. Jud 8:23), while God himself is from everlasting.

3,4. God's Might. Mightier than the noise of many waters. It is God's might that assures the permanence and immutability of his rule. Raging storms and pounding waves cannot shake his everlasting throne. The Lord's supremacy in creation is probably alluded to here, as well as his victory over heathen powers.

5. God's Government. Thy testimonies are very sure. God's kingship and might are evidenced by his moral laws or decrees. Permanence and immutability characterize the holiness God imparts to his house.

Psalm 94. A Plea for Vengeance

Although this lament embraces the whole community, it is pervaded by a deep personal element. Some writers consider the psalm to be composite, but there is little justification for denying its basic unity. Its position between two joyous psalms sets it out in sharper contrast. While it is possible that foreign oppressors are in view, the author is mainly concerned over those leaders in Israel who oppress the righteous.

1-7. The Judge Sought. Shew thyself. . . . lift up thyself. The psalmist appeals to the Lord as the God of vengeance and judge of the earth, as the One having the power to punish and the right to effect retribution. The big question is not whether God can avenge wrongs done, but how long it will be before he brings about justice.

8-11. The Unwise Rebuked. Understand, ye brutish . . . ye fools. These two epithets classify the oppressors as cruel and lacking in common sense. The direct address (v. 8) drives home the point that God is aware of all that goes on in the world.

12-15. The Righteous Vindicated. Blessed is the man. Happy is the man who is educated by God. He will have strength for the difficult days and assurance of ultimate vindication.

16-23. The Judgment Realized. Who will rise up for me against the evildoers? From his experience with God, the psalmist answers his own question: God will surely give the vengeance he seeks (cf. v. 1).

Psalm 95. A Call to Worship

This psalm combines a hymn and a prophetic oracle for group worship. The latter section has the distinctly didactic purpose of reminding the worshipers of their forebears' failures, lest they fall into the same errors. The hymn section was undoubtedly designed as a processional to be sung as the congregation gathered for Sabbath worship. Along with the other psalms in this group (95–100), it seems to have been composed for use in the services of the Second Temple.

1,2. The Call Announced. O come, let us sing. This summons was probably sounded by a Levitical choir as the procession to the Temple began. The happy worshipers quickly joined in by making a joyful noise of praise in exuberant Oriental style.

3-5. The Lord Described. A great God, and a great King. The basis for the summons of verses 1 and 2 is declared in true hymn style. The greatness of Yahweh as King and Creator and Shepherd is beautifully expressed. The menace of foreign beliefs makes necessary a clear statement of the nature of God as a preparation for worship.

6,7. The Call Repeated. O come, let us worship. The processional has now reached the temple gates. The joyful singing gives way to the more solemn acts of worship, such as bowing down and kneeling before God. The emphasis upon God's sovereignty over his cosmic creation gives way to a reminder to the worshipers of his special relation to Israel.

8-11. The Warning Voiced. Harden not your heart. The reminder of Israel's sin in wilderness days serves as a warning to those waiting to enter the Temple. God's rest refers historically to entrance into the Promised Land, which was denied to those who doubted. Here the worshipers are exhorted to keep their hearts tender before the Lord lest he reject them also.

Psalm 96. The Glory of God

Here is a hymn of praise which closes on an eschatological note. The striking universalism running throughout demonstrates the enlarged outlook of the exiles as they returned from captivity. The LXX identifies the occasion as the time "when the house was being built after the captivity." The frequent quoting of other psalms (9,29,33,40,48,95,98,105), the universalism, and the concept of the "nothingness" of the gods all tend to confirm the LXX designation of the occasion.

1-3. Israel's Mission of Praise. O sing . . . declare his glory among the heathen. A new song was needed to express praise for Israel's deliverance from captivity. The people are exhorted to sing unto God and bless him, making known his salvation with new outbursts of praise every day.

4-6. God's Glorious Nature. Great, and greatly to be praised. As in the previous psalm, the people are exhorted to praise God, because the great God is worthy of great praise. Honour . . . majesty . . . strength . . . beauty, though here personified, are still related in thought to God's characteristics.

7-9. Mankind's Duty of Praise. Ye kindreds of the people. In keeping with Israel's universal mission, all the nations are called to praise God. They are invited to give due praise, bring their offering, enter the sacred precincts, and worship God. Note that they must worship in the proper attire – holy array (RSV), and in the proper attitude – fear or reverence.

10-13. God's Righteous Rule. The Lord reigneth. The literal translation of this phrase is: Yahweh is King or is become King. Perhaps this refers to a ceremonial enthronement which may have been a part of the New Year's celebration. However, the main emphasis is eschatological; God is pictured as King of the nations and Judge of the earth.

Psalm 97. The Sovereignty of God

In this hymn of praise the theocratic principle of God's kingship is acclaimed. An eschatological note predominates in the first half of the psalm, which is then applied to the people. The entire hymn may have been designed as a commentary on the last verse of the preceding psalm, or it may have been placed in its present position because of the close relationship in thought. Though almost every phrase that appears here had already been used by other writers, the skill of this psalmist in weaving the phrases together is evident throughout.

1-6. The Manifestation of the King. The Lord reigneth. Again the idea is, "Yahweh is become King." All those who will benefit are called to rejoice in the truth of this eschatological dominion. Mystery and awesome majesty characterize the King's coming. However, the righteousness of God's government undergirds all of this awesome display of power.

7-12. The Effect upon Mankind. Confounded. . . . glad. The manifestation of God as King makes evident a sharp contrast. Those who worship idols are put to shame, while the worshipers of the Lord are made glad. With this contrast in mind, the conclusion follows that Israel has a distinct duty to God. Those who rejoice at the coming of the King must even now love the Lord, hate evil, rejoice, and give thanks.

Psalm 98. Praise by All Nature

Psalm 98, a hymn of praise, echoes the thoughts of many other psalmists. It is an integral part of the collection that emphasizes God's kingship (Ps 95–99). The reference to God as the King in verse 6 and the eschatological note in the concluding verses connect it with the preceding psalms. All nature is here summoned to join in acclaiming God's praise.

1-3. Praise to the Deliverer. O sing unto the Lord a new song. This new song, although drawn from previous sources, is occasioned by some recent deliverance. God has done marvelous things, won the victory, and brought deliverance. All of this is based upon the declaration of his righteousness to the nations and the remembrance of his mercy and truth to Israel.

4-6. Praise to the King. Make a joyful noise unto the Lord. . . . the King. Since all the earth has seen how God has delivered Israel, all men are called to join with the Israelites in worshiping him. This is a call for universal participation, in keeping with the broad outlook of Isaiah 40–66.

7-9 Praise to the Judge. Let the sea roar. . . . for he cometh to judge the earth. Although this stanza continues the appeal of the preceding stanza, a new element is here introduced. God the King comes as the Judge of the earth. Since all creation is to be judged, all created things must join in praise. The psalm closes with the prediction that the judgment will be characterized by righteousness and equity.

Psalm 99. The Holiness of God

The emphasis in this hymn of praise is on the sublime nature of God, expressed by his holiness. While the hymn is based upon the concept of God's kingship, there is less of the eschatological in this than in the four preceding psalms. The refrain in verses 3,5, and 9 expresses strongly the distinctive teaching on God's holiness.

1-3. The Holy God is Sovereign. The Lord reigneth. Again the translation should be: Yahweh is King or is become King. God is pictured as enthroned upon the mercy seat, between the cherubim, the place of his earthly manifestation in the Temple. He is also represented as taking his place upon his earthly throne in Zion, a concept that relates this psalm explicitly to an enthronement celebration. Such a manifestation of the Eternal causes trembling of man and nature, but issues in praise to His name.

4,5. The Holy God is Righteous. Judgment . . . equity . . . righteousness. Not only is God sovereign in his rule of the world; he is righteous in his judgment of men. He does not wield his power in an arbitrary way but according to his just and righteous nature. Again, this righteousness is summed up in the words of the refrain, Holy is he (ASV).

6,9. The Holy God is Faithful. They called . . . he answered. Moses, Aaron, and Samuel are cited as great intercessors of the past. This is the only place in the OT where Moses is classed as a priest, although he did perform some priestly functions and had access to the Tabernacle. While God answered the prayers of these spiritual giants for Israel, he still found it necessary to punish his people for their persistent evil-doing. The final call for exaltation and worship is occasioned by the Lord's faithfulness and is based upon his holiness.

Psalm 100. The Essentials of Worship

A double call to worship characterizes this brief but eloquent hymn of praise. The psalm was undoubtedly used as a processional hymn and appears to have been written for this purpose. Verses 3 and 5 give a concise statement of the doctrine of Judaism.

1-3. A Joyful Procession. Make a joyful noise unto the Lord. This first call to worship may well have been rendered by a choir outside the Temple precincts. Prime essential for such worship is a knowledge of God; that is, a recognition that the Lord is God, Creator, and Shepherd of his people Israel. And this knowledge leads to joyful praise, gladness, and singing.

4,5. A Thankful Entry. Enter into his gates with thanksgiving. This second call to worship may well have been the invitation by a choir within the Temple precincts. The worshipers, approaching the gates, were invited to continue their worship by entering the gates and then the courts. The further essentials of worship are thanksgiving, praise, prayer, and additional knowledge of God's character. The Lord's attributes of goodness, love, and faithfulness must be recognized by worshipers in any period of time.

Psalm 101. A Royal Code of Ethics

This is best classified as a royal psalm, since it is a declaration of principles by which a ruler intends to rule. These principles, or resolutions, are expressed in the form of promises to God, and therefore addressed to him. Though no king is mentioned in the body of the psalm, the nobility of expression certainly fits the personality and character of David. As an ideal for kingship, it could have been used by many rulers in Israel, whatever the occasion of its composition.

1-4. Personal Resolutions. I will sing of mercy and judgment. The guiding principles of mercy and judgment form the basis for the resolutions. After declaring his determination to choose the way of uprightness or integrity, the speaker voices his longing for closer fellowship with God. He resolves to abstain from wickedness and apostasy. Not only does he hate the work of apostates, but he promises to refuse to know, or entertain any evil thought (v. 4).

5-8. Official Intentions. Whoso privily slandereth . . . him will I cut off. In keeping with the guiding principles of mercy and judgment, the speaker sets forth his intentions as to what kind of people he will show favor and what kind he will shun or destroy. Only the faithful and those who walk in integrity will know his favor. Slanderers and wicked-doers he will destroy, and he will deny his favor to the proud, to the deceitful, and to liars. In so doing he will cleanse the royal court, the royal city – Jerusalem, and the entire land.

Psalm 102. A Prayer for Help

Though basically the lament of an individual, this psalm has a corporate element as well. For this reason, commentators are divided as to its original intent. A distinctly personal appeal is followed by a plea for the nation. Then the psalmist reverts to his own problem again, facing it in the light of his assured hope for the nation.

1-11. The Suffering of the Psalmist. Hear my prayer, O Lord. The psalmist's deep sense of urgency makes this cry especially poignant. He needs an answer immediately. He is suffering from a disease that has produced mental anxiety, and his enemies have taken advantage of his condition. All of this suffering, he believes, is due to God's wrath.

12-22. The Restoration of the Nation. But thou, O Lord, shalt endure for ever. In contrast to the psalmist's transitory nature (v. 11), God endures. It is upon this truth that Zion's restoration is based. The suggestion of some that this section is a separate psalm inserted by the compiler is not warranted. It is evident that the solution of the speaker's problem is intimately tied in with the solution of that of his nation (cf. vv. 12,26,27).

23-28. The Assurance of the Psalmist. They shall perish, but thou shalt endure. Though the speaker reverts to his suffering and weakness, he gains assurance from his nation's hope in the Lord. Even when the entire creation has passed away, God will endure. Verses 25-27 are referred to Christ the Lord in Heb 1:10-12 (cf. Heb 13:8). In the meantime, His eternity guarantees deliverance and permanence for the psalmist's people.

Psalm 103. A Hymn of Thankful Praise

This hymn of praise is without a peer in all the world's literature. It appears to be the expression of an individual, though some commentators find here a corporate voice. The psalmist seeks first to stir his own spirit to offer praise and thanksgiving to God, then the spirits of others. His words are untouched by sorrow, complaint, or sadness. The manner of expression and the depth of insight are remarkable for one living prior to the coming of Christ.

1-5. Praise for Personal Blessings. Bless the Lord, O my soul. The psalmist first addresses an exhortation to himself. In the term translated soul (nepesh) as well as in the parallel expression – all that is within me, he refers to his entire being. He now stirs his inner self to remembrance as he counts his many blessings. Note the strength in the verbs – forgives, heals, redeems, crowns, satisfies, and renews.

6-10. Praise for National Blessings. The Lord executeth righteousness and judgment. God is not only righteous and just in himself, but he actively engages in acts of righteousness and justice for oppressed peoples. Just as the Lord has crowned the psalmist with lovingkindness (hesed, v. 4), he has proved himself in Israel's history to be plenteous in loving kindness. This is best seen in his being slow to anger and in his punishing his people less severely than they deserve.

11-14. Praise for Forgiving Love. So great is his mercy. Adding illustration to illustration, the psalmist seeks to convey an adequate description of God's loving-kindness. He does not know how far it is from earth to heaven, but he knows that even that vastness could not contain God's mercy. He does not know how far east is from west, but he knows that God's love has removed our sins even farther. The most beautiful and intimate illustration is that of God as the Father who has compassion upon man in his weakness and frailty.

15-18. Praise for Eternal Love. From everlasting to everlasting. The continuance of God's loving-kindness stands in the sharpest contrast possible to man's transitoriness. The extension of this loving-kindness to man is conditioned by man's responding to the covenant and commands of God in a proper attitude of fear or reverence.

19-22. Call for Universal Praise. Bless the Lord, ye his angels. . . . hosts . . . ministers. After stating the principle of divine kingship, the psalmist calls for praise by the chorus of the whole universe. The purpose of the praise is to declare all his works in all places, both in heaven and on earth. The psalmist closes by taking his place in the anthem of the ages.

Psalm 104. The Creative Power of God

Here is a hymn of praise similar in certain respects to the preceding one. The opening and concluding phrases of the two psalms are almost identical, setting forth an attitude of thanksgiving and praise. While the previous hymn emphasized God's relation to history, this one pictures God's relation to creation. It offers interesting parallels to Persian, Babylonian, and Egyptian thought (cf. "Hymn to Aten," ANET, pp. 369-371). Even more important are the parallels with Genesis 1 and Job 38–41.

1-4. God's Greatness in Creation. Thou art very great. After calling his whole being to praise, the psalmist pictures the Lord as clothed in the wonderful majesty of his creation. Light appears as his robe; the heavens are spread out as a canopy; his abode is supported by pillars; clouds, wind, and angels are created for his use.

5-9. God's Formation of the Earth. The foundations of the earth. The Near Eastern concepts of cosmology are evident here as well as throughout the psalm. The earth is firmly established upon her bases (AV marg.) or pillars (v. 5); the mountains and valleys are formed; the seas are divided and fixed as to their bounds.

10-18. God's Provision for His Creatures. He sendeth the springs. One of the greatest needs in ancient Palestine was an adequate supply of water. The psalmist praises God for making provision for springs and rain so that all forms of life, animal and vegetable, may be sustained. He praises Him, too, for the blessings of food, wine, oil, trees, hills, and rocks.

19-23. God's Ordering of the Heavens. The moon . . . the sun. These two celestial bodies are singled out for attention because they are indispensable in the ordering of seasons and days. While the wild animals thrive on darkness, man's labor is mainly accomplished in the hours of daylight.

24-30. God's Providence. In wisdom hast thou made them all. The psalmist pauses to marvel at the Divine wisdom displayed in all God's wondrous creations. The marvels of the sea and the mystery of life are pointed out as illustrations of God's providence.

31-35. God's Glory in Praise. The glory of the Lord shall endure for ever. The psalmist vows that he will sing praise to God as long as he has life. His desire that evil be eradicated is in keeping with his concept of the goodness of God's creation (cf. Gen 1).

Psalm 105. The Wonders of the Past

Again the psalmist sings a hymn of praise, this time emphasizing the wondrous acts of God within the covenant relation. Psalms 105 and 106 are companion pieces in that history is searched in both. In the former, God's acts are emphasized; in the latter, Israel's acts of disobedience are recited. Both poems show affinity with Psalm 78, in which the two themes are interwoven.

1-6. The Call for Thanksgiving. Give thanks . . . call . . . sing . . . talk . . . glory . . . rejoice. . . . seek. . . . remember. The psalmist's detailed instructions reveal what it means to praise the Lord. It is clear that the hymn was designed for congregational use.

7-15. The Covenant with the Patriarchs. He hath remembered his covenant. The special feature of the covenant singled out is the promise that Canaan was to be Israel's inheritance. The rest of the psalm demonstrates the working out of this aspect of the covenant. Note the unusual use of mine anointed ones and my prophets to refer to the patriarchs.

16-25. The Experiences of the Sojourn. Moreover he called for a famine. Also unusual is this reference to God as the direct cause of the famine that brought Israel's family into Egypt. The psalmist is primarily emphasizing God's part in all that occurred: He called a famine, sent a man (Joseph), tried him, allowed him to be raised to power, increased his people, and stirred up hatred for Israel among the Egyptians. In keeping with general OT thought, the psalmist ignores secondary causes.

26-38. The Deliverance from Egypt. He sent Moses . . . Aaron. The writer places special emphasis upon the plagues as signs of God's power. He moves the ninth plague to the head of the list, inverts the order of the third and fourth, and omits the fifth and sixth.

39-45. The Realization of the Promise. For he remembered his holy promise. After recalling how God guided Israel in the wilderness, the psalmist draws his conclusion: Each of God's wondrous acts was brought about because the Lord remembered and kept his promise, first given to Abraham. The climax comes in the fulfillment of the promise that Canaan, the lands of the nations (AV, heathen), with all the fruits of previous labor, should belong to Israel

Psalm 106. The Long-suffering Nature of God

The continuous rebellion of Israel is emphasized in this sequel to Psalm 105. While beginning as a hymn (vv. 1-5), the poem continues as a national lament or confession. The sadness of the lament section is offset, to a certain degree, by the picture of God's long-suffering mercy in dealing with his people.

1-6. Praise and Confession. Praise . . . give thanks. . . . we have sinned. In hymnic fashion the author issues a call to praise, followed by an expression of beatitude, a personal prayer, and a confession of national sin. Note that the present generation is included along with the past generations.

7-33. Murmuring and Disobedience. Our fathers understood not. Here, as frequently in the Psalms, the Exodus and the period of wandering through the wilderness provide illustrations of the way the children of Israel misunderstood God. They murmured for food (vv. 13-15); they rebelled against Moses and Aaron (vv. 16-18); they apostatized in making a golden calf (vv. 19-23); they refused to accept God's leadership in the incident of the spies (vv. 24-27); they joined in Moabite worship (vv. 28-31); and they involved Moses in their murmuring at Meribah (vv. 32,33).

34-36. Backsliding and Unfaithfulness. Thus were they defiled with their own works. In contrast to God's faithfulness, shown by the mighty works he performed in Israel's behalf, his people repeatedly proved unfaithful after entering Canaan. Mingling with the inhabitants, they learned new modes of sin. Not only did they serve idols, but they joined in the abomination of human sacrifice. God's compassion notwithstanding, punishment was repeatedly necessary.

47,48. Prayer and Doxology. Save us. . . . Blessed be the Lord. The lengthy confession leads to a request for mercy and restoration. The doxology appears to be an integral part of the psalm, while also serving as a concluding doxology for Book IV.

The fifth book in the fivefold division includes several smaller collections or groups of psalms. The Psalms of Ascents (120–134) and the Hallelujah Psalms (111–113, 115–117, 146–150) are evidently the nucleus around which the other psalms were grouped together. Prior to the fivefold division, there was probably a threefold arrangement in which Books IV and V were one large collection. An over-all liturgical purpose is evident throughout, resulting in a deep sense of public worship, which culminates in the closing words of Psalm 150: "Let everything that hath breath praise the Lord. Hallelujah!"

Psalm 107. The Song of the Redeemed

Psalms 105,106, and 107 constitute a trilogy of praise and thanksgiving, in spite of the book division here. The different character of verses 33-42 has suggested to many that this passage was added later. The differences in content and style make this suggestion plausible although not mandatory.

1-3. The Call to Thanksgiving. O give thanks unto the Lord. The recipients of this call are the redeemed of the Lord. Isaiah 62:12 uses this term to apply to the captives returning from Babylon, but a wider usage of the term may well be meant.

4-32. The Reasons for Thanksgiving. They wandered. . . . cried unto the Lord. . . . and he led them forth. The psalmist uses four vivid illustrations of God's deliverances to reinforce his call to thanksgiving. After each incident he repeats the call in the form of an interjection. This fourfold refrain keeps central the theme of thanksgiving. God's care over lost travelers (vv. 4-9), over captives (vv. 10-16), over the sick (vv. 17-22), and over seafarers (vv. 23-32) calls for thankful remembrance. In each instance, the author describes the helpless condition of those in trouble, their cry to God, and the deliverance He gives.

33-42. The Providence of God. He turneth rivers into a wilderness. . . . wilderness into a standing water. These verses describe the blessings and curses apparent in God's rule of nature and mankind. They may serve as a general conclusion drawn from the more particular situations described in verses 4-32. However, the illustrations given are quite different from those of previous passages. This fact, plus the lack of any note of thanksgiving, the didactic purpose, the emphasis upon wisdom in the closing verse, and the lack of any refrain, certainly suggests that these verses were designed for a separate occasion.

Psalm 108. A Prayer for God's Help

In this psalm are combined a hymn and a lament, both of which are found in other psalms. Verses 1-5 occur also in Ps 57:7-11, while verses 6-13 are found in Ps 60:5-12 with only minor variations. Since the divine name Yahweh is used in verse 3 rather than the 'Adōnāy of Psalm 57, the present psalmist undoubtedly drew his material from the two earlier works. Perhaps the combination was formed to meet the needs of a new historical situation. (Cf. the previously mentioned psalms for further comments.)

Psalm 109. A Plea for Vengeance

Contrary to the views of some commentators, this psalm is clearly the lament of an individual rather than the voice of the nation. The personal character of the thought and expression is too strong for corporate significance. The imprecations in verses 9-20 make the poem unadaptable for worship purposes. The theory of some interpreters that these imprecations are the taunts of the psalmist's enemies is not convincing. There is a righteous indignation against evil (cf. Mt 23:13ff.); and the psalmist was assured that his foes were enemies of God.

1-5. His Appeal for Help. Hold not thy peace. In one terse statement the writer makes his appeal, and immediately he begins to voice his complaint. His enemies have been extremely vocal, while God has been silent. They have slandered him unjustly with a lying tongue. They have rewarded his love and goodness with hatred and evil.

6-20. His Plea for Retribution. Let him be condemned. The psalmist envisions a law court in which a wicked man is to be judged. The speaker sets forth the details of the sentence which the accused deserves. At the death of the accused someone else will take his office, and many difficulties will beset his wife and children. Worse than the speaker's desire for the death of his enemy is his wish that his enemy's family may come to an end and the father's name be forgotten within one generation. In verse 20, all of the speaker's adversaries are included in the foregoing imprecations.

21-31. His Prayer for Deliverance. But do thou for me . . . deliver thou me. The psalmist prays that God will have mercy upon him in his sick and needy condition, and vindicate him, so that his enemies may realize that God's hand has delivered him. After another outburst of imprecation, he closes with the confident promise that he will have opportunity to praise God for answered prayer.

Psalm 110. The Promise of Victory and Dominion

This is properly a royal psalm with Messianic overtones throughout. The psalmist is uttering a divine oracle with the authority of a prophet. He addresses the oracle to his king and gives him assurance of victory. Men from Abraham to Simon of Maccabean times have been suggested as the historical recipient of the message. Yet Jesus' use of verse 1 clearly authorizes our finding here a wider significance than the primary meaning of the psalm in OT history (cf. Mt 22:41-45).

1-4. The Oracle of the Lord. The Lord said. The term used is a prophetic formula, "Oracle of the Lord." It is nowhere else employed in the Psalter, but it is frequently used by the prophets. While some commentators limit the extent of the oracle to verse 1, it seems better to extend it through verse 4. The Messianic king is commanded to occupy the position of highest honor and share the divine rule until his enemies are completely vanquished (cf. Josh 10:24; I Kgs 5:3). The term footstool is used by David (I Chr 28:2). The king rules from Zion, and all foes are submissive to him. The oracle is addressed to my Lord ('Adōnî), a title of respect used for a king or superior. This king is to be honored and protected by divine blessing. His rule is to be universal. His subjects are to be willing volunteers. All of this is made certain by the use of a prophetic oath declaring the king's priesthood by divine appointment. The Messianic ruler serves a priestly as well as a royal office. In this he is likened to Melchizedek, the priest-king of Salem (Gen 14:18), whose ministry typified that of Jesus (cf. Heb 6:20–7:24).

5-7. The Victory of the Priest-King. The Lord at thy right hand. The scene changes now to the battlefield, where the Lord at Yahweh's right hand will shatter all his foes. The vivid language and the prophetic perfect tenses are designed to show clearly the completeness of the victory. The subject changes in verse 7 to the anointed king, whose head will be lifted in triumph. The frequent NT application of this psalm to Christ gives it special importance for the Christian interpreter.

Psalm 111. God's Wonderful Works

Here is a hymn of praise carefully designed as an acrostic poem. The twenty-two short lines begin with successive letters of the Hebrew alphabet. While this serves as an excellent mnemonic device, it greatly restricts the choice of words for a given line. This hymn is closely connected with Psalm 112 in form, language, and subject-matter. The two psalms are introductory to the Hallēl collection, which properly begins with Psalm 113.

1. The Annunciation of Praise. I will praise the Lord. The psalmist declares his intention to praise God with a whole heart as an act of public worship. This probably signifies that the message was delivered in the temple services by a solo voice.

2-4. The Greatness of God's Works. The works of the Lord are great. . . . honourable and glorious. The author thus describes God's works in general, then speaks of the Lord's eternal righteousness, his graciousness, and his compassion, attributes revealed most fully in his mighty acts. Note that man responds to evidences of God at work by seeking for further evidences and by remembering those works already performed.

5-9. The Verity of God's Care. The works of his hands are verity and judgment. God's provision of manna and quail demonstrated that he was mindful of the covenant. His works in the conquest of Canaan showed his intention to fulfill his covenant promise to Abraham. The verity of God's works is made known by his faithfulness.

10. The Beginning of Wisdom. The fear of the Lord. The psalm closes with a familiar maxim of the Wisdom writers. This kind of fear is best understood as reverence and awe that pervade every area of life. It is the beginning of true religion in that insight and understanding follow. It is also the consummation, for it is never replaced in true religious expression.

Psalm 112. Portrait of a Righteous Man

The concluding thought of Psalm 111 is more fully developed here, in keeping with the emphasis of the Wisdom literature. While 111 declares God's wonderful works, 112 describes the righteous man who has learned what it means to fear God. In its acrostic construction as well as in its subject-matter, this didactic psalm is a companion to the preceding one.

1-3. His Blessedness. Blessed is the man. In language reminiscent of Ps 1:1, the happiness of the God-fearer is set forth. A man who fears the Lord naturally finds delight in keeping the divine commandments. His children become heirs of his spiritual and material blessings. Note that the phrase, his righteousness endureth for ever, is applied to God in the preceding psalm.

4-6. His Character. Gracious, and full of compassion, and righteous. These terms are also used in Psalm 111 in the author's description of God. This is an application of the eternal truth that a devout man becomes more and more like the object of his worship. His prosperity will be lasting and his name long remembered because of his godly character.

7-10. His Permanence. His heart is fixed. His utter trust in God has given a sense of stability that the wicked cannot know. The truth that his righteousness endureth for ever here stands in sharp contrast to the fate of the wicked.

Psalm 113. The Condescension of God

This hymn of praise is the first psalm in a collection known in the Talmud as "The Hallel of Egypt." The designation comes from the repeated use of the Hebrew exclamation Hallelujah (Praise ye the Lord), and from the reference to the Exodus in 114:1. This collection (113–118) was included in the worship of Judaism on festival occasions.

1-3. Praise to His Name. Praise the name of the Lord. The psalmist opens with an appeal to the servants or worshipers of the Lord. By name the writer means not a mere appellation, but the character of God's revealed nature and the manifestations of his person. Note that the praise is to be both unending (v. 2) and universal (v. 3).

4-6. Praise for His Incomparableness. Who is like unto the Lord? The incomparable nature of the Lord is pictured in the twofold aspects of his transcendence and his immanence. These two aspects are not set in contrast but treated as complementary. While supreme over the nations of the earth and the hosts of the heavens, God humbles himself to consider the needs of mankind.

7-9. Illustrations of His Condescension. He raiseth up the poor. The element of God's condescension, set forth by the psalmist in verse 6, deserves further illustration. The poor, the needy, and the barren woman are singled out as beneficiaries of God's special providence. These instances are cited as representative of all God's generous deeds toward the children of men.

Psalm 114. The Wonder of the Exodus

The power of Hebrew poetry at its best is illustrated by this lyric. The terse expression, the dramatic vividness, the excellent parallelism, and the imaginative exaggeration mark the psalm as a poetic masterpiece. The arrangement of the material into four stanzas of two verses each adds balance to the poem's heightened expression. The final "Hallelujah" of Psalm 113 undoubtedly once stood at the beginning of this psalm, as attested by the LXX.

1,2. The Birth of Israel. When Israel went out of Egypt. In concise language, the psalmist presents his theme as the Exodus and the subsequent settlement in Canaan. God brought His people out of a land of strange language into their home. The parallel reference to Judah and Israel points to a time when the Temple was the center of worship and the northern area was considered a part of God's dominion.

3-6. The Effect upon Nature. The sea saw it, and fled. With poetic imagination, the psalmist describes the effect of God's works on nature. The sea, the Jordan, the mountains, and the hills were witnesses to his power in overcoming all obstacles that threatened to hinder the progress of Israel. The statements of verses 3,4 become Why? questions in verses 5,6. The answers are clearly implied in the further emphasis upon the awesomeness of God's power.

7,8. The Admonition to Nature. Tremble, thou earth. The recognition of God's wondrous acts and the effect of his presence should make all creation tremble. The conclusion to be drawn is that, even as God brought forth water in the wilderness, he will provide for the needs of his people.

Psalm 115. Glory to His Name

This psalm is basically a hymn of praise designed for use in the temple worship. The presence of a complaint (vv. 1,2) does not nullify the hymnic qualities, but gives a historical basis for its original composition. That it was used in the worship of the feast celebrations is known from various sources. In fact, Psalms 115–118 were sung at the conclusion of the Passover meal, just before the worshipers returned to their homes. The hymn appears to have been designed originally for antiphonal use.

1-8. A Contrast of Power. Our God. . . . their idols. The burden of the psalm is seen in the question by Israel's Gentile enemies, Where is now their God? In appealing for help, the psalmist does not seek glory for his nation but recognition by the heathen of the glory due to the name of Yahweh. The impotent idols and their feeble worshipers stand in sharp contrast to God's power and glory.

9-11. An Exhortation to Trust. O Israel, trust thou in the Lord. This threefold appeal for trust was probably voiced by a priest; and very likely a choral response followed each appeal. The nation, the priests, and the devoted God-fearers are all addressed in turn.

12-15. An Assurance of Blessing. The Lord hath been mindful of us. Remembrance of God's previous blessings gives assurance for the present and the future. Note that blessing is assured for each of the groups singled out in the previous exhortation.

16-18. A Chorus of Praise. We will bless the Lord . . . for evermore. The Lord who created both the heavens and the earth has reserved the heavens for his domain. To man he has given the earth and the right to praise him here and now. In the thinking of most writers, death ends the opportunity for further worship. Hence the urgency of the exhortation, Praise ye the Lord.

Psalm 116. A Song of Personal Thanksgiving

This hymn of thanksgiving is strikingly personal from beginning to end. Its use in this Hallel collection in connection with the main feasts probably indicates that it was associated with the payment of individual vows. The LXX divides this psalm into two separate poems, making a division after verse 9. The presence of frequent Aramaic expressions points to a post-Exilic setting.

1-11. Praise for Deliverance. I love the Lord, because . . . Out of the depths of trouble and sickness the psalmist called and the Lord answered. From this experience of answered prayer, he came to know God as gracious, righteous, and merciful. He now knows by experience that God preserves, helps, deals bountifully, and delivers. In the midst of his exultation he recalls that previously he had clung to his faith even when he had said, "I am greatly afflicted" (v. 10). In his consternation or alarm (haste, AV) he had said, "All men are liars," i.e., deceitful for not fulfilling their promised help. His quoting of Ps 31:22 in verse 11 probably indicates that now he has learned to rely on God in the face of human frailty.

12-19. Expressions of Gratitude. What shall I render unto the Lord? The speaker's realization of God's blessings gives birth to his desire for more concrete expression of gratitude. He promises to offer a drink offering (take the cup of salvation), worship (call upon the name of the Lord), pay vows, and offer a thanksgiving sacrifice. This is not the usual order of such sacrifices and offerings. The psalmist's humility and sense of dedication are seen in verse 16. As a servant, yea a trusted servant (son of thine handmaid), he expresses his dependence upon God.

Psalm 117. A Shout of Praise

This is the shortest hymn of praise recorded in the Psalter. In some MSS it is attached to the preceding poem and in other MSS to the following one. However, both the Hebrew Text and the LXX treat it as an entity. The two verses contain a complete act of praise. The first verse, employing strict parallelism of form, sets forth a universal call to praise. The second verse, which is in similar form, completes the call by expressing the reasons for rendering praise. Truly universal, the call includes all nations and all peoples. The concept of God is equally lofty, as his mercy and truth are singled out for mention.

Psalm 118. Thanksgiving for Deliverance

As a processional and a jubilant expression of thanksgiving, this song of praise serves as a fitting conclusion to the Hallel collection. Clearly designed for antiphonal use, it employs solo voices, choruses, and congregational refrains. Verses 5-21 are quite individualistic in content, suggesting that verses 1-4 and 22ff. were added to adapt the original psalm for collective use.

1-4. The Invocation to Praise. O give thanks unto the Lord. This call to thanksgiving and praise was the signal for beginning the procession to the Temple. The leader or priest presented the call, while a chorus or the congregation answered with the refrain. Note that the same threefold division is found in Ps 115:9-11 (Israel, house of Aaron, and God-fearers), while the refrain comes from Psalm 136.

5-21. The Deliverance of God. I called . . . the Lord answered me. The theme throughout this passage is one of rejoicing that God has given deliverance and victory. In actual use, this passage, because of its individualized nature, called for a solo voice. The single voice represented the personified nation in general and the assembled worshipers in particular. With verses 19-21, the procession had undoubtedly reached the temple gates and was demanding entrance.

22-29. The Application for Worship. This is the Lord's doing. These verses abound in words well known from their NT application. Verse 22, describing the chief cornerstone, was probably a proverb of that day referring to Israel, rejected by the great empire-builders as unworthy to fit into their plans. But the divine mission of Israel became focused and fulfilled in its greatest representative, the Messiah. Thus Jesus appropriated its imagery for his own ministry (cf. Mt 21:42; Mk 12:10; Lk 20:17; Acts 4:11; Eph 2:20; I Pet 2:7). The priestly benediction of verse 26 found expression six times in the Gospels because of its distinct application to the mission of Christ.

Psalm 119. The Torah of the Lord

Essentially a didactic poem, this psalm takes the form of a personal testimony. Although the poem contains allusions to persecution and shows certain characteristics of laments, its main purpose is to glorify the Tôrâ (God's law or teaching). The psalmist directs almost every verse to God, using many forms of petition. At the same time, he uses some synonym for the law in all but seven verses. The synonyms are: law, testimonies, precepts, judgments, commandments, statutes, sayings, word, way, and path. Possibly in employing ten terms to describe God's Torah, he was following the lead of Ps 19:7-9, where six such synonyms for the law are used.

The acrostic principle is highly developed in this psalm, employing all twenty-two letters of the Hebrew alphabet. Each stanza is composed of eight lines, which begin with the letter characteristic of that stanza. This artificial yet artistic arrangement makes for a certain monotony in the great repetition of words and phrases. However, this mechanical monotony is overcome by the intensity of the psalmist's own devotion to God's teachings.

1-8. The Blessing of Obedience. Blessed . . . who walk in the law of the Lord. The theme of the psalm is here set forth clearly. Note that most of the ten synonyms for the law are used in this first strophe.

9-16. The Way of Cleansing. Wherewithal shall a young man cleanse his way? The question and answer are in keeping with the emphasis of the Wisdom writers. The answer to the problems of youth in any period of history is to heed God's Word by meditating on it (v. 15) and committing it to memory (v. 11) and by testifying concerning it to others (v. 13).

17-24. The Delight of Experience. Thy testimonies are my delight. This delight is based upon his past experience with God in times of persecution. A note of sorrow and desire runs through this strophe, but the section ends in delight.

25-32. The Strength in Understanding. Quicken. . . . teach. . . . make me to understand. The peril confronting the psalmist makes him call for strength and comfort. He realizes that the quickening he desires comes from an understanding of God's teachings.

33-40. The Need for Guidance. Teach me . . . and I shall keep it. In phrase after phrase, the speaker pleads for God's guidance in ordering his life and in refraining from folly.

41-48. The Courage for Witnessing. Let thy mercies come. This appeal for help is not selfish; it is inspired by a desire to have wherewith to answer him that reproacheth me. The speaker further declares that he will witness to kings without being ashamed.

49-56. The Source of Comfort. Remember the word unto thy servant. . . . this is my comfort. In the time of affliction, God's teachings have been his stay and the songs in the house of my pilgrimage.

57-64. The Resolution of Faithfulness. I have said that I would keep thy words. Thinking upon his ways brought him to the point where he could turn his feet unto God's testimonies. His gratitude is evident in his promise to arise at midnight to thank God.

65-72. The Discipline of Affliction. It is good for me that I have been afflicted. Having gone astray before his affliction, the psalmist now sees a beneficent purpose in his suffering.

73-80. The Justice of Retribution. Let the proud be ashamed. After voicing again his desire for understanding, he pleads for God's blessings upon himself and shame upon his enemies. His end desire is that he may strengthen the faith of others.

81-88. The Hope in Darkness. My soul fainteth . . . I hope in thy word. In a succession of sobs, he expresses his hope and determination in his darkest hour. With each plea for comfort he reiterates his desire to be faithful.

89-96. The Triumph of Faith. Unless thy law [had been] my delights, I should then have perished (v. 92). The hope of the preceding strophe becomes an assured victory here. He affirms that he will never forget God's precepts since with them thou hast quickened me.

97-104. The Rapture of Enlightenment. O how love I thy law! Without the usual petitions, the psalmist describes how his study of the divine law has made him wiser and more understanding than his enemies, his teachers, and the aged. The emphasis is here upon the law itself, the source of knowledge rather than on native intelligence.

105-112. The Light of Life. Thy word is a lamp . . . a light. His pilgrimage through life is under the guidance of God's teachings. He thus vows to follow the light wherever it may lead and whatever dangers may be involved.

113-120. The Inspiration of Loyalty. Thou art my hiding place and my shield. The sharp contrast drawn between faithless men and the psalmist emphasizes the loyalty of the latter. This loyalty gives him a sense of safety and the inspiration to face the future.

121-128. The Time of Intervention. It is time for thee, Lord, to work. After declaring that he has diligently followed the right, the psalmist appeals for action on God's part. So completely have his oppressors disregarded God's law that only divine judgment is left for them.

129-136. The Wonder of Illumination. Thy testimonies are wonderful. The greatest wonder is the inner light that gives understanding even to the unlearned man. The psalmist is brokenhearted over those who do not keep God's law.

137-144. The Challenge of Righteousness. Righteous art thou, O Lord. The concept of God's nature as righteous finds emphasis here in verses 137,138, 142, and 144. Because the Lord is righteous, his judgments and testimonies, also, are everlastingly righteous.

145-152. The Assurance from Prayer. I cried . . . hear me, O Lord. Recalling the many times he has prayed unceasingly for divine help, he cries again for God's quickening power. Then he reaffirms his faith in the Lord's nearness and the verity of His teaching.

153-160. The Consciousness of Need. Consider mine affliction, and deliver me. The severity of the speaker's affliction and his understanding of his personal need are clearly shown in the repetition of quicken me in verses 154,156, and 159. The enduring nature of God's righteous judgments is his hope and assurance.

161-168. The Peace in Love. Great peace have they which love thy law. Even in the presence of potent enemies, the psalmist has an inner peace that grows out of his love for God's way. Note the absence of any petition, as in verses 97-104.

169-176. The Determination of Steadfastness. My lips shall utter praise. The psalmist sums up his message by pleading for further spiritual help, while declaring his intention to stand fast upon the foundation of God's teachings.

Psalm 120. The Sojourn of the Pilgrims

Psalm 120 begins a new collection that extends through 134. Each lyric in this group is designated by a term variously translated "A Song of Degrees" (AV), "A Song of Ascents" (ASV), and "A Pilgrim Song." Various theories as to the meaning of the term relate it to the return from Babylon, the fifteen steps from the women's court to the men's court, the climactic parallelism in these poems, and the journeys of pilgrims. The most likely theory is that this collection arose as a hymnbook for pilgrims coming up to the Temple for the great feasts. The fact that 120, 124, 125, 130, 131 are not explicitly related to a pilgrimage points to their incorporation into the collection from other sources. Most of these psalms fit into the pattern of life in post-Exilic society, although some may have first had a pre-Exilic origin.

1,2. A Cry for Deliverance. Deliver my soul, O Lord. The psalmist finds himself in the wretched plight of one who has to associate with men given to falsehood. His appeal for deliverance is based upon God's past answers to him in times of similar trouble. Many understand that there is some reference here to the slanderous opposition of Sanballat and Tobiah to Nehemiah's rebuilding the walls of Jerusalem (Neh 4; 6).

3,4. A Plea for Retribution. What shall be given unto thee? The deceitful tongue and its owner are singled out for judgment. The answer to the rhetorical questions is based upon the nature of the alleged offense. Sharp arrows and hot coals will provide fitting retribution.

5-7. A Lament for Peace. Woe is me . . . I am for peace. The poet's basic complaint is that he finds it necessary to sojourn among bloodthirsty and barbaric enemies. Mesech in Asia Minor and Kedar in the north Arabian desert south of Damascus are used symbolically to represent barbaric powers.

Psalm 121. The Helper of the Pilgrims

The intense assurance of those journeying up to Zion is reflected in this pilgrim song. They here express a deep sense of trust in God without a murmur of complaint or word of petition. The song was probably used as an antiphonal hymn, although the exact voices or parts used cannot be identified with certainty.

1,2. The Source of Help. From whence cometh my help? Looking up to the hills around Zion, one of the pilgrims voices a question which sets the mood for all that follows. The question does not express doubt but introduces the affirmation that contains the theme of the psalm, namely, that his helper is Jehovah the Creator.

3-8. The Promise of Protection. The Lord is thy keeper. All verses except verse 6 employ the Hebrew word shāmar to emphasize this idea of God's guardianship. Unlike the sentry who occasionally slumbers, or Baal, who has to be awakened (cf. I Kgs 18:27), the Lord never slumbers or sleeps. The psalmist employs climactic parallelism throughout, building up each new phrase from the thought in the preceding phrase. Note that the conclusion applies to the pilgrims in that God preserves them in every phase of their journey, seeing them safely home.

Psalm 122. The City of the Pilgrims

This poem is oriented around the visit of a pilgrim to Jerusalem. By indicating that the journey is accomplished, it acts as a sequel to the two preceding psalms. Some interpreters hold that the speaker has returned home and is reminiscing about his recent pilgrimage. Although this is possible, it is more likely that he is still in Jerusalem, about to leave for home.

1,2. Joy in Pilgrimage. I was glad when they said . . . let us go. The psalmist recalls with what joy he responded to the invitation to join a group of pilgrims. Now the journey is complete and he can say, Our feet have stood within thy gates, O Jerusalem. The future tense of the AV is not appropriate in the light of the following verses.

3-5. Impressions of Jerusalem. Jerusalem . . . compact together. While the city undoubtedly was fully built up within massive walls, the emphasis here seems to be upon its function in unifying the people. The verb ḥābar, translated "compact," refers primarily to close human associations. The going up of the tribes accentuates this togetherness and the attendant sense of fellowship.

6-9. Prayer for Jerusalem. Pray for the peace of Jerusalem. Before leaving, the pilgrim exhorts his companions to pray for the prosperity and peace of the city, because here is the house of the Lord. There is an excellent play on words in the Hebrew, not evident in any English translation.

Psalm 123. The Plea of the Pilgrims

This is an intense lament by an individual who speaks for his people. The change from the singular to the plural pronoun at the end of verse 1 suggests an antiphonal arrangement in actual use as a pilgrim song.

1,2. The Eye of Hope. Unto thee lift I up mine eyes. The psalmist refers to eyes four times in these verses, in order to emphasize the fact that the pilgrims are seeking God's favor. Just as the servant and the maiden look to their superiors for favor, so those in the band of pilgrims wait for God's mercy.

3,4. The Plea for Mercy. Have mercy upon us, O Lord. The measure of their need is indicated by the reiteration of this cry for mercy. The previous mention of servants and masters, coupled with the contempt for those that are at ease, suggests either the widespread servitude of Israel during the Exile or the dispersion during post-Exilic days.

Psalm 124. The Deliverer of the Pilgrims

Here the community at large expresses thanksgiving. While the original purpose was undoubtedly to praise God for a particular act of deliverance, the place of the poem in this pilgrim collection indicates a general use as well. Because travelers were constantly subject to danger, the words of this psalm would have given them assurance and strengthened their trust.

1-5. Deliverance by God. If it had not been the Lord. The repetition in verses 1 and 2 is liturgical; the congregation (later the pilgrims) repeated the words of the leader. Note that the effective use of conditional clauses as a triple apodosis (vv. 3-5) completes the double protasis (vv. 1,2). If it had not been for the Lord, then the end would have been certain and complete.

6-8. Thanksgiving to God. Blessed be the Lord. The psalmist further employs figures of speech to describe the narrow escape and to heighten the expression of gratitude. The last verse refers to the act of calling upon the name of the Lord in prayer, recognizing him as the source of help.

Psalm 125. The Security of the Pilgrims

This song of trust emphasizes the confidence of the faithful in Israel. Like the preceding psalm, this one was not designed as a pilgrim song but has been included in the collection. The actual use in pilgrimages can be envisioned from the references to the mountains round about Jerusalem, which come into view after a long and arduous journey.

1-3. A Statement of Confidence. They that trust . . . as Mount Zion. . . . As the mountains . . . so the Lord. Not only is God's presence symbolized by the hills around Jerusalem, but also those who trust in the Lord are immovable like the rock of Zion. If foreign rule did remain permanently, a general departure from the faith would occur, even among the righteous. The danger of apostasy is too great even for the righteous to bear.

4,5. A Prayer for Favor. Do good, O Lord. The psalmist prays for God's favor upon the faithful, whom he identifies as the good and upright. In contrast to these individuals, the unfaithful renegades are abandoned to their just fate. The psalm closes with the simple prayer, Peace upon Israel.

Psalm 126. The Restoration of the Pilgrims

Psalm 126 is the lament of the community over disappointed hopes past and present. Although there is an obvious reference here to the return from the Exile, the conditions are not those pictured in early post-Exilic society. The psalmist deals with the ideal conditions expected and with the disillusionment experienced for many years.

1-3. The Ideal of Restoration. We were like them in a dream. The hope of a glorious restoration was idealized to the point of being too good to be true. The phrase, turned again the captivity, may be translated restored the fortunes. However, the context seems to demand a picture within the Exile. There was singing and laughter – like that on V-Day – when the Edict of Cyrus was made known. The exiles joined in a chorus of praise reiterating the words of the observers from other nations.

4-6. The Plea for Fulfillment. Turn again our captivity, O Lord. The beautiful ideal of restoration envisioned by the prophets and sung about by the exiles was not fully realized by those who returned to the homeland. Conditions were anything but glorious and ideal (cf. Hag 1:10,11; 2:19). Therefore, the plea is now made for completion of the ideal. Even as the farmer sows in anxiety and reaps in joyful singing, Israel will realize the restoration ideal. Christian workers have often made an application of verses 5 and 6 to the ministry of soul winning.

Psalm 127. The Dependence of the Pilgrims

The didacticism of this psalm is characteristic of the teachings of Wisdom literature. Here the emphasis is placed upon the futility of human effort without God's help. Although the original didactic purpose was general, this psalm found special application as a folk song of the pilgrims.

1,2. A Dependence upon the Lord. Except the Lord build . . . keep. Man's utter dependence on God is illustrated by reference to basic human endeavors. Building a house and watching over a city cannot succeed (according to divine standards of success) if God is not included in man's plans and efforts. Even the diligent man who works from early morning until late evening cannot hope for success without God's blessings and sanction.

3-5. A Heritage from the Lord. Lo, children are an heritage of the Lord. The concept of the necessity of dependence upon God is carried over into the building of a family (cf. Gen 30:2). A recognition that children are God's gift is the basis for building a successful home. Joy and protection are pictured as the results of fruitfulness in the bearing and rearing of children. Especially important are the sons of a man's youth, who can protect him and plead his cause, in his old age, against his adversaries in the local court of justice inside the city gate.

Psalm 128. The Home Life of the Pilgrims

Like the preceding psalm, this one is didactic in character, and thus vitally connected with Wisdom literature. The basic Wisdom teaching, "the fear of the Lord is the beginning of wisdom," is the starting point for the psalmist. He then applies this truth to the ideal home situation. Although not designed as a song for pilgrims, the psalm probably found its way into the collection as a folk song which met the needs of all pilgrims.

1-4. Blessings upon the Home. Blessed is every one that feareth the Lord. The psalmist begins by stating that happiness is the lot of the one who has learned to fear the Lord and walk in His ways. It is well with him because he eats the products of his labor rather than losing them in the time of drought or sharing them with oppressive overlords. His wife is likened to a fruitful vine, while his children are compared to the tender shoots of the olive tree. This picture of contentment, joy, prosperity, and fruitfulness illustrates how the God-fearer finds perfect happiness.

5,6. Blessings upon the Community. Thou shall see the good of Jerusalem. A vital part of the blessing enjoyed by one who fears God comes from beyond the limits of his home – out of Zion. The corporate nature of Israel's society is seen in the adaptation of this psalm for public worship. Like Psalm 125, this one closes with the brief prayer, Peace upon Israel.

Psalm 129. The Plea of Suffering Israel

This is a lament of the community, with overtones of confidence and trust. The characteristics of a song of trust are present, but they are overshadowed by the complaint and appeal of the lament. Reviewing past troubles brings the psalmist confidence, while his appeals regarding the future result give him assurance of relief.

1-4. Israel's Past Afflictions. Many a time have they afflicted me. The long history of Israel's troubles is compressed by the psalmist into one statement. From the time of the Exodus (Israel's youth) onward, the nation had suffered severe affliction from numerous foes. Two metaphors are used to illustrate this affliction: the marks of a whip upon their backs are likened to the furrows made by a plow; and the cords of their oppressors are likened to the ropes used to harness oxen. However, the Lord manifested his righteousness by cutting the cords and delivering his people.

5-8. Israel's Future Hope. Let them all be confounded. In an imprecation upon those that hate Zion, the speaker expresses the desire that the enemy may be put to shame and turn homeward. Then a lengthy simile is employed to request that the evil plans of the enemy be thwarted. The grass which grew on the dirt rooftops withered quickly because the soil was too shallow for its roots. It could not be grasped by the reaper nor bound into sheaves. It was not even worth the customary greeting of those passing by.

Psalm 130. The Redeemer of the Pilgrims

Here an individual voices a penitential prayer as his personal plea for forgiveness. The closing plea for others in the household of Israel does not make the entire psalm corporate, but rather emphasizes the personal nature of the speaker's appeal. However, since the psalmist's troubles and despair were shared by the nation, the psalm became appropriate for the bands of pilgrims in post-Exilic society.

1,2. The Cry of the Penitent. Out of the depths have I cried. The speaker is more probably using a present tense here, as the remainder of the prayer shows. He is still calling out of the depths when the psalm closes, but has clearly expressed his assurance and hope.

3,4. The Assurance of Forgiveness. But there is forgiveness with thee. The universality of sin is forcefully presented in the statement that no one could be justified if God marked down every sin rather than blotting sins out. The only hope comes in God's forgiveness, which in turn quickens the feeling of awe in the forgiven sinner.

5,6. The Expectancy in Hope. I wait for the Lord . . . and in his word do I hope. The sense of expectancy is strongly emphasized by the repetition of phrases. The speaker's whole being (his soul) is engaged in diligent waiting. He waits for the Lord even as the sentinel on the walls awaits the relief of the morning change of watch.

7,8. The Application to Israel. Let Israel hope in the Lord. The psalmist's thoughts turn to others who need to share his enthusiastic confidence. In view of the loving-kindness and abundant redemption of the Lord, he can assert that God will redeem Israel from all his iniquities.

Psalm 131. The Composure of the Pilgrims

Though essentially a song of trust, this beautiful literary composition reads like a confession. The picture of humble resignation to God's leading exemplifies a deep sense of personal discipline. While some interpreters treat this psalm as a corporate expression, the final plea for Israel suggests that an individual voice speaks consistently throughout. It was only natural that a beautiful expression of humility like this should become a folk song of the pilgrims.

1,2. A Spirit of Humility. Lord, my heart is not haughty. After a long struggle, the psalmist has been weaned from his presumptuous desires and his excessive pride. He can now declare himself free of the former attitudes of haughtiness and unbridled ambition. He has calmed or composed his soul or inner self so that he is now like a weaned child upon his mother's lap, no longer fretting after her milk.

3. A Desire for Israel. Let Israel hope in the Lord. As in the preceding psalm, here the writer expresses his desire that others in Israel may come to know his inner peace.

Psalm 132. The Assurance of the Pilgrims

Unique among the songs in the pilgrim collection, this one appears to have been included because of its nature as a processional hymn, which may well have been rendered antiphonally. It is basically a song of Zion, connected in thought with David's bringing the ark of the covenant to Jerusalem.

1-10. The Prayer of the Congregation. Lord, remember David. Although David's afflictions are mentioned first, the emphasis of this prayer is upon his intention to find a suitable place for the ark. Since the historical narratives mention no oath in this connection, the psalmist may be drawing from an independent tradition. Verses 6,7 were probably rendered by a group of pilgrims as they reenacted the search for the ark, its discovery in Kirjath-jearim (the fields of the wood), and its entrance into Jerusalem. The prayer is concluded in verse 10 with a plea for God to show favor to each successive king in the line of David.

11-18. The Response of the Lord. The Lord hath sworn. . . . hath chosen. These verses act as a liturgical response quoting from two separate oracles of the Lord. The first oracle (vv. 11,12) is the promise to David that his royal line will continue as long as his descendants are faithful (cf. II Sam 7:12-16). The second oracle (vv. 14-18) is introduced by the statement in verse 13 that the Lord has chosen Zion. Because of this divine choice, there will be spiritual and material blessings for Zion and the line of David, while there will be shame upon Israel's enemies. Since, when a man died without children, his family line was stopped, his lamp was said to be put out; therefore a lamp symbolized offspring. Thus God ordained a series of descendants of David, to culminate in Messiah the Light of the world (cf. I Kgs 11:36; 15:4).

Psalm 133. The Brotherhood of the Pilgrims

In this short didactic poem we have a beautiful expression of family solidarity, in keeping with the emphasis of the Wisdom writers. The suggestion of many commentators that the psalm mirrors Nehemiah's efforts to increase the population of Jerusalem is intriguing. However, the psalm must have more significant connection with the spirit of fellowship and brotherly harmony at the great feasts.

1. The Premise Stated. Behold, how good and how pleasant. The writer begins with a proverbial statement concerning the benefits of brotherly solidarity. The emphasis is upon the pattern of ancient Hebrew life, in which married sons, with their children, continued to live with their parents. A wider application, however, is evident in the family and tribal reunions on the feast occasions.

2,3. The Principle Illustrated. Like the precious ointment . . . as the dew. The psalmist employs two comparisons to illustrate the principle embodied in his basic premise. Even as the anointing oil upon the high priest's head symbolized his consecration, so this spirit of brotherly love permeated the nation and symbolized its consecration. Even as dew upon vegetation symbolizes fertility and growth, the sense of true brotherhood revived and quickened the devotion of the nation as a whole.

Psalm 134. The Benediction upon the Pilgrims

Here is a fitting conclusion for the collection of folk songs used by the pilgrims. In its benedictory nature this psalm corresponds to the benediction at the end of each book within the Psalter. The position of the song in the collection and the reference to night service suggest that it was sung at the close of evening worship. The Feast of Tabernacles is the most likely occasion.

1,2. The Call to the Priests and Levites. Behold, bless ye the Lord, all ye servants. That the regular ministers of the Temple are addressed is generally recognized. However, the voice of the call is variously ascribed to the high priest, a Levitical choir, or the gathered pilgrims. The last explanation gives more reason for inclusion of the psalm in the collection, since the pilgrims actively participate. The temple ministrants are called to lift up their hands in an attitude of prayer and bless the Lord.

3. The Response by the Priests. The Lord . . . bless thee. The answer to the call is given in a shortened form of the priestly blessing found in Num 6:22-26. The people are reminded that God is Creator and that his blessings flow forth out of Zion. This may well have been used as the final act before the pilgrims returned to their homes.

Psalm 135. A Mosaic of God's Works

This hymn of praise is a mosaic of quotations from other psalms and various books of the OT. The main emphasis is upon those works of God which illustrate his power in nature and history. That the psalm was designed for temple worship in an antiphonal pattern is evident from its structure. However, there is no unanimity in the division into voices. Undoubtedly, there were solo parts, Levitical choruses, and congregational responses.

1-4. The Initial Call to Praise. Praise ye the Lord. Similar phrases are repeated as an emphatic liturgical call to praise. As in the preceding psalm, those who stand in the house of the Lord are undoubtedly the priests and Levites. The Lord's goodness and his choice of Israel are given as initial reasons for praise.

5-14. The Greatness of Yahweh. For I know that the Lord is great . . . above all gods. The I is emphatic, indicating personal knowledge, and possibly the shift to a solo voice in actual temple use. The use of the name Yahweh is here important, because it is Israel's covenant God who is contrasted with the gods of the heathen. He is described as the God of Nature (vv. 5-7), doing whatsoever he pleases in heaven, in earth, in the seas, and in all deep places. He is further described as the God of History (vv. 8-14), leading his chosen people out of Egypt and through the conquest of Canaan.

15-18. The Impotency of Idols. The idols of the heathen. This section is quoted almost verbatim from Ps 115:4-8. However, the words are especially appropriate here to set in sharp contrast the omnipotence of the Lord and the uselessness of all idols.

19-21. The Final Call to Praise. Bless the Lord. The call to praise in Psalms 115 and 118 is expanded by the addition of O house of Levi and a concluding verse. The nation as a whole, the priests, the Levites, and the God-fearing worshipers may all have had their own antiphonal parts, but ended the psalm in chorus.

Psalm 136. God's Enduring Mercy

This hymn of thanksgiving greatly resembles Psalm 135 in content. It is, however, much more liturgical, having an antiphonal refrain that appears in every verse. The fact that the psalm is easier to read and understand without the refrain suggests that it originally stood without this repetition in verses 4-25. Yet the refrain gave it a distinctive character and a prominent place in Jewish worship. In the Rabbinical writings, it was designated as "the Great Hallel" (sometimes in conjunction with Ps 135). The term Hallelujah at the end of the preceding psalm probably should stand at the beginning of this psalm, as evidenced by the LXX.

1-3. The Call to Thanksgiving. O give thanks unto the Lord. The psalm opens with a threefold invitation to join in thanking God for his goodness and mercy. It is addressed by the leader or choir to the congregation. The refrain was probably sung throughout by the entire group of worshipers. The brevity of the refrain is especially evident in the three words of the Hebrew (for forever his lovingkindness). The three terms for God – Yahweh, God of gods, and Lord of lords – are interesting in light of the emphasis in the preceding psalm on the impotency of idols and the omnipotence of God.

4-9. The God of Creation. Wonders . . . heavens . . . earth . . . lights. In concise statements the wonders of creation are made to testify to God's loving-kindness and goodness. Each time to him is used, it is the object of O give thanks.

10-25. The God of History. To him that smote Egypt. Each event, from Egypt to Canaan, witnesses to the way God manifests his loving-kindness within the scope of Israel's history.

26. The Doxology of Thanksgiving. O give thanks unto the God of heaven. The opening call is here repeated but with a different term for God. This term would be especially fitting if the emphasis were first on the creative wonders of God alone.

Psalm 137. The Song of the Exiles

A deep spirit of revenge is clearly evident in this community lament. The opening verses evoke a deep sympathy for the captives, while the final verses give vent to their indignation experienced when they witnessed the desolation of their land. While it is not certain where the psalmist was when he wrote this song, he appears to have been one of the exiles who returned to Jerusalem in 538 B.C. His first view of Jerusalem may well have prompted his imprecations against Edom and Babylonia.

1-3. Sorrows of the Exile. By the rivers of Babylon . . . we wept. The voice of the psalmist sobs with pathos as he describes the heartbreak of captivity. The exiles undoubtedly had special places along the Euphrates or its canal system where they would mourn their condition. When asked to sing for the amusement of their captors, they would answer by hanging their lyres on the willows that lined the river banks.

4-6. Love for Jerusalem. How shall we sing the Lord's song. After all, how could they sing the sacred songs of the temple services for the amusement of those in a foreign land? That would have been to desecrate holy things and to commit treason against Zion. The psalmist would rather have lost his ability to play the lyre and sing than to have forgotten the sanctity of Jerusalem.

7-9. Hatred Toward Enemies. Children of Edom. . . . daughter of Babylon. The intensity of the psalmist's emotions is seen in his hatred toward his enemies as well as in his love for Jerusalem. He singles out Edom for her conduct in aiding the enemy against Jerusalem (cf. Ezk 25:12-14; 35; Ob 10-14). Then Babylon becomes the object of the psalmist's impassioned imprecation. Such ruthless slaughter as depicted in verse 9 usually was practiced in sacking ancient cities (Isa 13:16; Nah 3:10) and was used against Israel (II Kgs 8:12; Hos 13:16).

Psalm 138. Wholehearted Thanksgiving

This piece begins as a hymn of thanksgiving but later becomes a song of trust. Even though the speaker is in the midst of troubles, he begins not with a lament but with grateful acknowledgment of God's blessings. Many of the ideas and phrases of this piece are reminiscent of other sections of Scripture, especially Isa 40–66. Several manuscripts of the LXX connect this psalm with the time of Haggai and Zechariah.

1-3. Praise for Strength. I will praise thee with my whole heart. The psalmist has experienced a recent answer to his prayers for help. Because of God's gift of spiritual strength, he engages in wholehearted worship. The phrase, before the gods, has been variously interpreted, because the LXX uses angels and the Targum has judges. However, gods seems to be the best translation because of the subsequent reference to the kings of the earth. Since they now serve their various gods but will in future worship the true God, the psalmist challenges the power of these "gods" (cf. Ps 95:3; 96:4,5; 97:7).

4-6. Worship by Kings. All the kings of the earth shall praise thee. The praise of the individual is envisioned as ultimately becoming universal. There is a striking relation here to the Edict of Cyrus, in which the conquering king praises Yahweh (along with the gods of the other displaced peoples). Note that God's glory is especially revealed in his condescension toward the lowly.

7,8. Assurance of Deliverance. Though I walk in . . . trouble, thou wilt revive me. The speaker expresses a deep confidence that God will fulfill his promises and complete the deliverance of Israel. Although the whole psalm is spoken by an individual in a very personal manner, he is voicing thanksgiving and assurance for his nation as well.

Psalm 139. The Personal Concern of God

Here an individual who has had an intimate knowledge of and experience with God offers his personal prayer. From the standpoint of OT theology, this is the climax of thought in the Psalter on God's personal relationship to the individual. The psalmist does not engage in abstract philosophy or speculative meditation; he merely describes his humble walk with God and shares his experiential knowledge of the Lord.

1-6. The Omniscience of God. O Lord, thou hast searched me, and known me. The psalmist is convinced by experience that God knows everything about him. He realizes that God's perfect knowledge goes behind his individual acts to his motives and purposes. While he stands in awe at his own understanding of divine omniscience, he knows that full comprehension is beyond human understanding.

7-12. The Omnipresence of God. Whither shall I go from thy spirit? By means of two rhetorical questions, the psalmist shows that he can never move beyond the reach of God's personal concern. He does not contemplate trying to do so, but uses this method of presenting his thoughts. The four suppositions which follow express the extremes of the universe and reinforce his basic premise.

13-18. The Foreknowledge of God. My substance was not hid from thee. Two ideas are involved in the psalmist's thought here: the wondrous way in which he was created, and the way God knew all that was going on in the process. He seems to emphasize the latter as he sees the hand of God ordering his entire life. This is actually another glimpse of the omniscience of God in the marvelous processes of creation and procreation. Again the speaker stands in awe at the incomprehensible nature of God's thoughts.

19-24. The Problem of Evil. Surely thou wilt slay the wicked. This surprising change of tone and outlook is regarded by some interpreters as a later addition. However, the intensity of conviction apparent in the earlier verses is seen again here. God, who has such minute knowledge of man, cannot overlook flagrant sinners. The psalmist closes with the personal plea that God will search, try, know, see, and lead him. His goal is the way everlasting, the way of life and peace, as compared with the way of ruin and destruction for the wicked.

Psalm 140. A Plea for Preservation

An individual who has suffered bitter persecution from the ungodly within Israel utters this lament. It is closely related to Psalms 141–143, reflecting the same general conditions and employing similar language, form, and thought patterns. And it may possibly reflect the beginnings of party strife in Israel, although the groups cannot now be identified by name.

1-8. His Appeal for Help. Deliver me, O Lord. Through three stanzas (vv. 1-3; 4,5; 6-8) the psalmist makes his appeal for God's help. He pleads: deliver me, preserve me, keep me, grant not . . . the desires of the wicked. He uses very descriptive terms to describe these enemies in order to portray vividly his own danger. The singular designations are to be understood collectively, as shown in the use of plural verbs. The four traps which the enemies set are probably to be interpreted in a figurative sense here.

9-11. His Desire for Retribution. Let the mischief of their own lips cover them. The deep bitterness of the psalmist becomes more apparent in these verses. While he employs figurative language in expressing his desires regarding his enemies, it is clear that he wants all of their evil plans to turn upon them. He will not be satisfied with less than their complete destruction.

12,13. His Confidence in the Lord. I know that the Lord will maintain the cause of the afflicted. The psalmist is convinced that the righteous, in contrast to the wicked, shall have cause for rejoicing, because God champions those who, like the psalmist, are oppressed.

Psalm 141. A Cry for Protection

This psalm is another lament by an individual who has suffered at the hands of the powerful ungodly in Israel. His prayer is not the usual form of lament, where deliverance from enemies is sought. It is more spiritual in that he seeks God's help to overcome the temptations about him.

1,2. His Appeal for an Answer. Lord, I cry . . . make haste . . . give ear. The psalmist begins with an urgent plea for God to hear and answer his prayer. The reference to incense and evening sacrifice suggests the meal (AV "meat") offering, which was accompanied by prayer and presented both morning and evening.

3-5. His Prayer for Strength. Set a watch, O Lord, before my mouth. Passing over the circumstances of his complaint, the psalmist prays for strength to overcome temptation. He seeks power to guard his speech, keep his heart pure, avoid the practices of the wicked, refrain from sharing in their luxurious indulgences, and welcome reproof from the righteous.

6-10. His Confidence in Retribution. When their judges are overthrown. The historical circumstances behind verses 6,7 are taken for granted. It appears that the speaker expects to be proven right when these judges are punished. Verse 7 either refers to a slaughter of the psalmist's friends or should be translated their bones rather than our bones. Whatever the original meaning behind these verses, the psalmist is looking to God to continue to strengthen him, while he is certain that the wicked man will receive retributive justice by falling into his own trap.

Psalm 142. A Supplication for Deliverance

Here is the prayer of a devout individual who is facing intense persecution. It follows the normal pattern of a personal lament. The psalmist voices his appeal, makes his complaint, states his petition, and closes with a note of confidence. In this fervent prayer, he makes no appeals for revenge and voices no vindictive imprecations.

1,2. The Appeal. I cried unto the Lord with my voice. The verbs in verses 1-5 should be translated as present tense, since the context shows that the psalmist is not recounting a previous appeal. His great need is made obvious by the terms cry and pour out, as well as by his emphasis upon crying aloud with his voice.

3,4. The Complaint. They privily laid a snare for me. . . . no man cared for me. The psalmist realizes that God has known his condition from the beginning. For this reason, he merely states the fact of his trouble and describes his sense of dejection.

5-7. The Petition. Deliver me. . . . Bring my soul out of prison. Appealing again for attention to his needs, the psalmist declares that God is now his only refuge. The reference to a prison may represent an actual confinement or a state of distress. Vowing to praise God for his deliverance leads him to express his confidence that others will join him in this thanksgiving.

Psalm 143. A Prayer for Guidance and Deliverance

Again an individual in dire trouble utters this very personal prayer. His persecutors have all but taken his life. While seeking deliverance, his greatest desire is for God's direction and guidance. Since he comes as a repentant sinner, this psalm is classed as one of the Penitentials (cf. Ps 6, 32, 38, 51, 102, 130).

1-6. The Appeal of the Penitent. Hear my prayer . . . and enter not into judgment. After pleading for attention, the psalmist implies his guilt in God's sight. He does not plead innocence but casts himself on the mercy of God. His complaint, tersely stated, as in the preceding psalm, indicates a bitter persecution. He has been pursued, crushed, and made to dwell in darkness like unto death. However, remembering God's mighty works of the past gives him courage to appeal for further manifestations of power.

7-12. The Plea for Action. Hear me speedily, O Lord. In rapid-fire petitions, the psalmist expresses the urgency of his need for help. He seeks a speedy answer, an expression of God's loving-kindness, direction for life, deliverance from his persecutors, instruction in God's will, and destruction of his enemies. As a penitent servant, he feels certain that retribution will be accomplished.

Psalm 144. Triumph in War and Peace

Beginning as a hymn of praise, this psalm shifts to the lament pattern after verse 4. Many commentators have raised serious questions as to its unity. Verses 12-15 appear to have once been a part of an unknown psalm. In fact, the entire psalm is a compilation of citations from other psalms (cf. Ps 8, 18, 33, 39, 104).

1-4. Past Blessings Acknowledged. Blessed be the Lord my strength. The psalmist opens with a hymn of praise for God's aid to him as a warrior. He has come to know the Lord personally, for he calls him my rock, my lovingkindness, my fortress, my refuge, my deliverer, and my shield. The contrast between God's greatness and man's insignificance impresses the psalmist. Using the familiar words from Psalm 8, he confesses humility before introducing his petition for help.

5-8. Present Deliverance Sought. Bow thy heavens, O Lord, and come down. This prayer for a manifestation of God's power in the form of a theophany is drawn from several verses in Psalms 18 and 104. The psalmist is requesting that God intervene in the struggles with his enemies, because they are guilty of false charges and breaking of treaties.

9-11. Future Praise Vowed. I will sing a new song unto thee, O God. Following many quotations from old songs, the psalmist vows to give thanksgiving in a new form when the victory is won. After making this vow and expressing himself as confident of victory, he repeats the appeal of verses 7,8.

12-15. Peace and Prosperity Pictured. Sons as plants . . . daughters as cornerstones. As indicated above, this appears to be quoted from an unknown psalm. The picture is an idealized view of family life in a community whose God is the Lord. The sons are vigorous as young plants; the daughters are tall and stately; the barns are full; the flocks are prolific; and the oxen are strong. Such are material blessings expected in such an ideal society.

Psalm 145. Praise for God's Greatness

This hymn of praise is both a triumphant expression of faith by an individual and a call to men to glorify the greatness of God. It carries a note of universal appeal too seldom present in expressions of the faith of Israel. The psalmist uses an acrostic framework, beginning each verse with a letter of the Hebrew alphabet. Only one letter is missing, the nun, which should come between verses 13 and 14. The psalm serves as an introduction to the final collection of praises (Ps 145–150).

1,2. The Promise of Praise. I will extol . . . bless . . . praise. The purpose of the psalmist is clearly shown in his promise to praise God every day, yea, for ever and ever. His personal relationship and his universal outlook are seen in his initial address to my God, O king.

3-20. The Greatness of God. Great is the Lord, and greatly to be praised. Verse 3 is the theme of his praise. Although this greatness is unsearchable, the psalmist does an admirable job of illustrating it. His hope is constantly that others will bear witness to God's greatness. In the verses that follow he emphasizes God's greatness in terms of his mighty works, his glory and splendor, his great goodness, his gracious compassion, his tender mercies, his glorious and everlasting kingdom, his providential care, his righteousness, his holiness, and his availability for those who call upon him in truth and with fear. This understanding of God's nature is a high-water mark in the Psalter.

21. The Doxology of Praise. Let all flesh bless his holy name for ever and ever. After repeating his promise of personal praise, the speaker opens the invitation to all flesh. His desire includes all mankind and extends as long as the world endures.

Psalm 146. Praise for God's Help

This is the first of five similar hymns of praise, all beginning and ending with Hallelujah. This small collection has served as a short hymnal to be used daily in the worship of the Synagogue. Like most of the psalms in this final Book, the present form of these psalms reflects post-Exilic circumstances, thought, and language.

1,2. The Vow of Praise. While I live will I praise the Lord. In language similar to that of the preceding psalm, the vow of praise is set forth in absolute terms.

3,4. The Powerlessness of Man. Put not your trust in princes. Because of his own experiences, the psalmist pleads with men not to depend on the favors of noblemen (cf. Prov 19:6). He realizes that no lasting help can come from one whose breath and thoughts vanish while his body goes back to dust. The exact circumstance to which the psalmist refers cannot be identified. However, such a conclusion could be drawn from any time in Israel's history.

5-10. The Power of God. Happy is he . . . whose hope is in the Lord. The one who has the Lord as his helper and his hope is truly blessed. This hope is based upon God's creation of the universe, his loving care of man, and his everlasting reign. The special emphasis upon God as the champion of the needy and the oppressed suggests that the psalmist was a member of such a group within the society of his day. Note the fivefold emphasis placed upon the name Yahweh in verses 7-10.

Psalm 147. Praise for God's Providence

The outpouring of gratitude, as in this psalm, has always been a vital part of Israel's worship. This is truly a hymn of praise from beginning to end without a word of complaint or a single petition. A logical development is difficult to discover because three psalms are here compressed into one (vv. 1-6, 7-11, 12-20). These separate elements are partly evident in the LXX, where verses 12-20 are listed as a different psalm.

1-6. His Goodness to Israel. The Lord doth build up . . . he gathereth together. After a brief call to praise, the psalmist declares how good the Lord has been to his people. Verses 2,3 undoubtedly refer to the restoration following the Exile. Each thing that God has done is linked up with his greatness, his power, and his understanding.

7-11. His Providence over Nature. Who covereth the heaven with clouds. The thought is extended beyond the borders of Israel to encompass all creatures. The Lord's provision of rain and food is especially important in a land where skies are cloudless from April to October. The psalmist realizes that God's favor is not based upon physical strength in man or beast.

12-20. His Care for Jerusalem. For he hath strengthened the bars of thy gates. Jerusalem and Zion are used as parallel terms in descriptive personification, symbolizing God's people who dwell and worship within. The blessings of protection, peace, and prosperity are set forth as present realities. The psalm closes with a reference to Israel's unique relationship to God as his Chosen People.

Psalm 148. Praise by All Creation

The third hymn of praise in the closing collection is a call for a universal chorus of praise by everything in heaven and on earth. The closing verse undoubtedly refers to the return from exile and indicates the reason and occasion for such world-shaking praise.

1-6. The Call to the Heavens. From the heavens . . . in the heights. Using the language of the ancient Near-Eastern cosmology, the psalmist seeks praise from the heavenly beings and the heavenly phenomena. Verses 5,6 are a response or a refrain which was probably sung by a choir in an antiphonal manner. God's creation of the heavenly objects and his sustaining of them are reason enough for praise.

7-12. The Call to the Earth. From the earth. The psalmist begins with the depths of the earth and refers to all forms of life, inanimate and animate. Note that man, as the crown of creation, is reserved until the last. Verses 13,14 act as a second response, signifying the basic reasons for this praise. God's glory and the redeeming of his Chosen People are judged to be sufficient reasons.

Psalm 149. Praise for God's Triumph

This hymn of praise makes special reference to the celebration of a recent victory. Many interpreters understand the closing verses to be eschatological rather than historical. However, the first four verses are clearly related to a present reality of God's deliverance. Although the event cannot be identified precisely, the purpose of the original composition is evidently to thank God for victory at the time of the warriors' return.

1-4. The Summons to Praise. Sing unto the Lord a new song. The scene is a great assembly of the saints or godly ones at the Temple. The importance of the occasion is seen in the need for a new song to celebrate the new victory of their armies. Verse 3 with its mention of dancing brings out clearly the spirit of rejoicing and joy requested in verse 2. The victory itself is an indication that God's favor and salvation have been poured out on his oppressed people.

5-9. The Song of Victory. Let the saints be joyful . . . let them sing aloud. The pious ones are pictured as rejoicing in triumph and singing on their beds because safety is now their reward. The picture of the warriors praising God with "two-mouthed" (AV, two-edged) swords in their hands is symbolic of the victories achieved in his name. Figuratively, God's saints today are to wield the sword of the Spirit, which is the word of God (Eph 6:17; Heb 4:12).

Psalm 150. Praise in Its Universal Climax

This final hymn of praise measures up to its position of honor as the doxology for the whole Psalter. Every phrase in the psalm seems to build upon the preceding thought in preparation for the climax, which comes suddenly as an outburst of mighty praise from the host of heaven and earth.

1. The Place Specified. In his sanctuary . . . in the firmament. The sanctuary may have reference to God's heavenly habitation or the earthly Temple. While the former meaning is parallel to the firmament, the latter idea would have much more significance for the assembled worshipers.

2. The Reasons Advanced. His mighty acts . . . his excellent greatness. His mighty acts in creation and history have been the theme of many psalms. His greatness has been a recurring theme in these final hymns of praise (cf. Ps 145, 147).

3-5. The Instruments Enumerated. With the sound of . . . The psalmist seems to have arranged these instruments in random order. It is likely that each was sounded when it was mentioned and continued to play through the end of the Hallelujah (cf. W. O. E. Oesterley, The Psalms, p. 589ff., for a description of the instruments involved).

6. The Choir Assembled. Let everything that hath breath. Not merely the priests and Levites nor merely the congregation, but all the creatures of time and space which have breath are included in this choir of choirs. The Psalter ends, but the melody lingers on as the worshipers continue to chant, Hallelujah, Praise ye the Lord.

PROVERBS

INTRODUCTION

The Teaching of Proverbs. The essence of the Book of Proverbs is the teaching of moral and ethical principles. The peculiarity of this book is that it is largely given over to teaching by contrasts. Especially noteworthy are chapters 10–15, where almost every verse is divided by the word "but."

In the first section, chapters 1–9, there is also a use of contrast–between good and evil. The good in this section is denominated by several words–wisdom, instruction, understanding, justice, judgment, equity, knowledge, discretion, learning, counsels–but especially wisdom, which occurs seventeen times in this portion and twenty-two times in the rest of the book. What amounts to a text for the book is the well-known statement of 1:7, "The fear of the Lord is the beginning of wisdom," which is repeated near the end of the section (9:10). This statement reappears verbatim (with the clauses reversed) in the alphabetical Psalm 111:10, and in almost identical form as the climax of chapter 28 of Job, which describes in highly poetic form the search for wisdom.

Peculiar to this section of Proverbs is the personification of wisdom as a woman. This is first seen in 3:15. Actually, in 3:15-18 the pronouns referring to wisdom could be translated "it" as well as "she," but the personification is accepted because of later references. Proverbs 7:4 opens the way for the personification, "Say unto wisdom, Thou art my sister." It is complete in chapters 8 and 9, where Wisdom invites fools to partake of her feast. Only in Proverbs and only in this first part is wisdom thus personified.

It is essential to the understanding of this first part to recognize this personification. Since "wisdom" in Hebrew is a feminine noun, it therefore is naturally and readily personified as a woman. More important, the author here is contrasting "wisdom," the virtuous woman, with the harlot, the strange woman. And just as wisdom stands for all virtue, so probably the strange woman typifies and includes all sin.

The contrast is a studied and artistic one. Wisdom cries in the streets (8:3). Her invitation is, "Whoso is simple, let him turn in hither" (9:4). In contrast, the foolish woman, who invites to stolen waters and whose guests are in the depths of hell (9:17,18), issues the identical invitation, "Whoso is simple, let him turn in hither" (9:16). Wisdom calls the simple to forsake sin; the harlot calls him to its indulgence.

This section, Proverbs 1 to 9, therefore contrasts sin and righteousness. The words "wisdom," "instruction," "understanding," etc., used throughout this passage, do not mean merely human intelligence and skill; but rather they are contrasted with that which is evil. Wisdom as here used is therefore a moral quality. It should be observed that this is a special usage. In most of the Old Testament, wisdom is mere skill or sagacity. Even in Ecclesiastes, where wisdom is also emphasized, it is merely human intelligence and therefore is included with folly as vanity (Eccl 2:12-15). Only in Job 28 and in certain psalms (37:30; 51:6; 90:12; 111:10) is the Proverbs concept of wisdom noticeable. Even the wisdom for which Solomon was famed in the historical books is not exactly this wisdom. He was famous for his skill in natural science (I Kgs 4:33) and jurisprudence (I Kgs 3:16-28) and for his high intelligence (I Kgs 10:1-9). Proverbs adds to the concept of mental acumen the moral rectitude that alone makes intelligence worth while.

In the second section, the Proverbs of Solomon, 10:1–22:16, the teaching is presented almost exclusively by the single verse treatment. Through chapter 15, the teaching is by contrast, indicated by a "but" in the middle of nearly every verse. Thereafter there are parallels of thought more often than contrasts.

This section covers a wide range of subjects and defies outline. The viewpoint, however, is fairly consistent. Solomon is contrasting wisdom and folly. And, as in Section I, this is not intelligence versus stupidity; it is moral wisdom versus sin. In this section wisdom is never personified, but the same synonyms for it as occur in Section I are used here–understanding, righteousness, instruction.

The fool also has his parallels: the scorner, the slothful, the froward. The following sections (see Outline) continue in this vein. As Toy points out (Crawford H. Toy, ICC on Proverbs, p. xi), the ethics of the book are very high. Honesty, truthfulness, respect for life and property are insisted upon. Men are urged to extend justice, love, mercy to others. A good family life, with careful training of children and high status of women, is reflected.

As to religious outlook, the Lord is understood to be the author of morality and justice, and monotheism is presupposed. The references to the Law and prophecy (29:18), priesthood and sacrifices (15:8; 21:3,27) are scarce, however. The author speaks in his own right, inculcating principles of right conduct as from the Lord.

Authorship. The name of Solomon occurs in three parts of the book—1:1; 10:1; and 25:1. There is thus a claim of Solomonic authorship for the major sections, indeed for all sections except Parts III, 22:17—24:22; IV, 24:23-34; and VI, 30:1—31:31. This claim is disputed by critical scholars. Toy (op. cit. p. xix), who denies the Mosaic authorship of the Pentateuch and holds that Isaiah and the prophets did not write the books attributed to them, rather naturally gives no credit to Solomon here. On the grounds of many internal indications, he assigns the book a post-Exilic date. Driver (S. R. Driver, Introduction to the Literature of the Old Testament, 4th ed., pp. 381ff.) holds that parts of the book are pre-Exilic, but little if any of it is by Solomon. Pfeiffer (Robert H. Pfeiffer, Introduction to the Old Testament, pp. 649-659) goes over the internal characteristics of Proverbs thinking to date various strata. Because Wisdom literature in Egypt about 1700—1500 B.C. was purely secular, he concludes that the religious strata in Proverbs must derive form the fourth century B.C. After reconstructing to his own satisfaction the history of thought in Israel, he dates Proverbs relative to that development. His conclusion is that the book was finished after 400 B.C. and sometime before the end of the third century.

W. F. Albright ("Some Canaanite-Phoenician Sources of Hebrew Wisdom" in Wisdom in Israel and the Ancient Near East, ed. by M. Noth and D. W. Thomas, p. 13) studies the similarity of the language to Ugaritic, and argues that the book in "its entire content" is probably pre-Exilic, but that much of it was orally transmitted until the fifth century. He holds that a Solomonic nucleus is probable. See also an article by one of Albright's students, Cullen I. K. Story, "The Book of Proverbs and Northwest Semitic Literature," JBL, LXIV (1945), 319-337. Charles T. Fritsch (The Book of Proverbs, IB, Vol. IV, p. 775) on like grounds holds a very similar opinion. Oesterley (W. O. E. Oesterley, The Book of Proverbs, p. xxvi) would place most of the book in pre-Exilic times, but dates Section I, 1:1—9:18, and Section VI, 30:1—31:31, in the third century "and quite possibly later still."

The fact is that the closest attention to these internal evidences can not date the book or its collections. Granted that secular proverbs may have preceded religious, or single-line aphorisms the more developed varieties, still the development to the complex and religious may well have been full-blown already before Solomon's day. Granted that Jeremiah opposed wise men in his day (Jer 18:18), this proves nothing about dating. He also opposed priests and prophets and kings, but that does not prove these offices to be post-Exilic! The most promising approach on dating by internal criteria is that of Albright in his comparison of Ugaritic words and forms.

Our external evidence is not so complete as we might wish it to be, but it should not be totally dismissed. Proverbs 15:8, for example, is quoted with the formula, "It is written," in the Zadokite Document (col. XI. line 20; C. Rabin, The Zadokite Documents, p. 58). This shows that the book was regarded as canonical in the second century B.C. Solomon's production of "proverbs and parables" is referred to in Ecclesiasticus 48:17, dated about 180 B.C. There is as yet no external evidence previous to this. Oesterley claims a case of borrowing from Proverbs by the Story of Ahikar in the fifth century (see the Commentary at 23:14). One's opinion of the dating of the book will be heavily weighted by the view he holds of other books. If one holds that the Pentateuch was not written until 400 B.C. and the prophets were largely post-Exilic, he will deny that Solomon wrote Proverbs. If, however, the pre-Exilic dating of Pentateuch, Psalms and Prophets be allowed (as by this author), there seems to be no valid reason to deny the traditional ascription to Solomon of the sections that bear his name.

Fritsch (op. cit., p. 770) objects to the traditional glorifying of Solomon's wisdom when "he made so many foolish mistakes throughout his life in every realm." This seems to be a harsh judgment upon Israel's most brilliant king. That he made mistakes in his long reign of forty years is clear; but archaeology testifies to Solomon's skills in architecture, ability in administration, and discoveries in engineering in connection with his copper foundry at Ezion-geber. True, in his old age he became oppressive (I Kgs 12:10), but his later decline should not blind us to his early brilliance. More critics object to Solomon's character because of his many wives. Close attention to the texts, however, (and they are our only sources) shows that they do not picture Solomon as a creature of lust. As an important king over an area that included many petty kings of city states, Solomon doubtless concluded numerous treaties. Surely in many cases such treaties were sealed by Solomon's marrying the petty king's daughter, as was the ancient custom and as was the case in the alliance with Egypt (I Kgs 9:16,17). Solomon's marriages were doubtless largely political arrangements. His error lay not so much in lust as in allowing his politically important wives to bring their heathen worship into the city of God (I Kgs 11:7-9).

The authors of the other sections of Proverbs (III, 22:17–24:22; IV, 24: 23-34; VI, 30:1–31:31) are totally unknown to us. See remarks in the Commentary. We can not, therefore, be dogmatic as to their dates except to say that there is no need to place the final editing of the book after the traditional close of the Biblical period–about 400 B.C.

Collections in Proverbs. Toy (op. cit., pp. vii, viii), and others following him, have argued that the appearance of the same line or verse in various parts of the book shows different authorship for those parts. Toy lists over fifty correspondences, some, however, not very close. He inadvertently omits 15:13 and 17:22. Most of these parallels are noted in the Commentary section of this treatment. Toy has not given sufficient attention to the obvious fact that in many cases a portion of a verse is repeated with variations that likely are significant. Such repetitions prove nothing as to collections of proverbs of different authorship. Sometimes, also, the repetition comes within a section held by Toy to be a unified collection, as 14:12 and 16:25. Here Toy is forced to suggest the existence of subcollections. Furthermore, there is a similar repetition in an Egyptian work held to be of unified authorship (cf. Commentary on 22:28). Apparently Toy's contention is based on a fallacious assumption. It is clear that there are several distinct collections in Proverbs, as the titles show; but the internal evidence of these parallels is insufficient to disprove Solomon's authorship of those portions ascribed to him.

Proverbs and other Wisdom Literature. Just as the writing of poetry in ancient times was not limited to the Hebrews, so the literary form of Proverbs is not uniquely Hebrew. It should not surprise us to discover that there were collections of proverbs in ancient Egypt and Mesopotamia. Several such pieces may be named, but two are of special importance–the Story of Ahikar and the Wisdom of Amen-em-Opet, which must be considered below in some detail.

One of the oldest of these Wisdom pieces is the Instruction of Ptah-Hotep, of about 2450 B.C. in Egypt. Few parallels to it in the Book of Proverbs are alleged, but the style of writing is proverbial and the thoughts are similar in some cases. For instance, it commands obedience of sons, humility, justice, caution at the table of a noble, listening rather than speaking, etc. Obviously such pious advice is old and was the common property of the East. Parallels between such materials and Proverbs prove nothing as to the origin of our book. Similar observations apply to the Instruction of Ani and other early Egyptian literature. Some pieces of Mesopotamian literature may be mentioned. The so-called Babylonian Job, entitled I Will Praise the Lord of Wisdom, reminds us somewhat of the Biblical Job in its story of a man in great sickness who is cured by the gods. There is also a Dialogue about Human Misery, sometimes called the Babylonian Ecclesiastes. The similarity of the words to the Biblical Ecclesiastes is quite minor, but it includes a few proverbial sayings.

Various Babylonian tablets from the eighth century or before include proverbs counseling one to recompense good for evil, not to speak hastily, not to enter into another's quarrel, etc. Again, since these principles of morality are very general, their presence in these tablets proves nothing about the origin of the Book of Proverbs, except that it should naturally be considered against its background. Just as Moses could draw on the laws of Hammurabi, and David used some of the forms of Canaanite poetry, so Solomon and his successors had a wealth of background material for illustrative purposes. In all these cases, however, the common ancient material was molded by the Hebrew author, who was inspired by the Spirit of God to write His revelation for His people. (All of these writings can be conveniently seen in the collection edited by James B. Pritchard, Ancient Near Eastern Texts Relating to the Old Testament, 2nd. ed.)

Of more consequence for our study is the Story of Ahikar, a tale from Mesopotamia embellished with many proverbs. The story has long been known, as portions of it occur in early Christian authors. But in 1906 eleven papyrus sheets containing the story were turned up in excavations of the Jewish colony at Elephantine, Egypt. This copy is from about 400 B.C. Ahikar was a counselor of the kings Sennacherib and Esarhaddon in Assyria, about 700 B.C. He adopted his nephew, who by deceit persuaded the king to execute Ahikar. But the official executioners, being friendly to the doomed man, hid Ahikar a while, then reinstated him when the king's wrath cooled off. Two-thirds of the booklet is composed of Ahikar's sayings, which present a number of parallels with Proverbs. W. O. E. Oesterley in his The Book of Proverbs (pp. xxxvii-liii) lists thirty-three parallels, which is probably a somewhat exaggerated number. Story (op. cit., pp. 329-336) also presents important comparisons. For the most part these parallels are general. For instance, Ahikar cautions men against looking at a bedizened and painted woman or lusting after her in their hearts, as this is a sin against God (cf. Prov 6:25, etc.). Also he urges a father to subdue his son while he is young, else he will rebel when he is stronger (cf. Prov 19:18). It is doubtful, however, that there is any direct connection between the proverbs of Ahikar and those of the Bible. Furthermore, the proverbs of Ahikar lack the moral tone of the Book of Proverbs. They do not have the contrast of the wise man versus the sinner which is so characteristic of Proverbs. They are more secular. The Book of Proverbs, however, does occasionally use this secular backdrop to develop its moral teaching. Actually it is quite difficult to be sure—if there is dependence—which piece is the debtor. The Story of Ahikar, though the scene is laid in Assyria, was current among the Jews and later among the Christians. Our best copy is from a Jewish source. The proverbs of Ahikar could as easily have been influenced by the Book of Proverbs or by the general Jewish reservoir of proverbs as the other way around (see the Commentary on 23:14 for a probable case of borrowing by Ahikar from Proverbs).

Some feel that the case is different with the Egyptian Wisdom of Amen-em-Opet. This remarkable collection of proverbs has even more parallels to the Biblical book than does Ahikar. Its date is uncertain. The papyrus is later than the composition, but is itself not datable. F. Ll. Griffith did the principal work on the translation of the Egyptian. Oesterley reports Griffith's date for the book as seventh to sixth century B.C. and H. O. Lange as even later. Oesterley himself assigns the work to the eighth century or later (The Wisdom of Egypt, pp. 9,10). Albright favors an earlier date, about 1100–1000 B.C. (op. cit., p. 6). If this date be sustained, any thought of derivation must be from an Egyptian original. John A. Wilson (ANET, p. 421), in his translation of the work, does not commit himself in regard to the date.

The nature of the parallels is to be observed. Oesterley, in his discerning study, notices that the Wisdom of Amen-em-Opet is very un-Egyptian. It has high ethics and a high conception of God—pointing toward monotheism of a sort. He declares that "the like is not to be found elsewhere in Egyptian literature of pre-Christian times" (op. cit., p. 24). Parallels are found by Oesterley with several Old Testament books besides Proverbs, e.g., Deut 19:14; 25:13-15; 27:18; I Sam 2:6-8; Ps 1; Jer 17:6ff. These passages are not particularly significant, however, for most of them deal with themes also appearing in Proverbs, where the parallels are numerous—over forty being listed by Oesterley (The Book of Proverbs, pp. xxxvii–liii). The parallels occur with various parts of Proverbs, but are particularly striking with the portion 22:17–23:14. All but five of these verses are paralleled in Amen-em-Opet.

Most striking of all, the Egyptian book is divided into thirty chapters (of considerable length) and concludes with an exhortation to give heed to these thirty chapters. This section in Proverbs, expanding it to include 22:17–24:22, is said to contain thirty sayings (Oesterley, op. cit., p. 192). The introductory words of this section in Proverbs are, "Have not I written unto thee excellent things" (22:20). This can with more justification be read with very slightly different vowels, "Have not I written unto thee thirty." It must be admitted that the discovery of just thirty sayings in these sixty-nine verses is a bit arbitrary. And the thirty sayings are not nearly so long as the thirty chapters of the Egyptian book. Still, the parallel is striking. Oesterley (The Wisdom of Egypt, p. 105) points out the curious fact that the section Prov 22:17–23:12 has parallels to all but three verses in scattered parts of the Egyptian work. But the other parts of Proverbs, which have fewer parallels, have them in general with chapters X and XXI of Amen-em-Opet. He argues quite plausibly from this that the usage as regards borrowing differs in the different sections of the two books. Neither work borrowed directly from the other. In some sections, both borrowed from a common reservoir of proverbial sayings. But from the peculiar character of the Egyptian work, he argues that the fountain of both lay in the background of Hebrew wisdom and theology.

We can perhaps go a little further. Much has been made of the reading, "Have not I written to thee thirty things." It is clear that the thirty sayings in this section of Proverbs are not copied from the Egyptian thirty. Actually, the last half of the section in Proverbs has no parallels at all with the Egyptian book. The "thirty" of Proverbs may have been modeled after the Egyptian "thirty," but in any case, it was not slavishly borrowed. Rather, we should see here another example of the characteristic use of numbers in Wisdom literature. Well-known examples are the climactic references to "three things . . . yea, four" too difficult to understand (Prov 30:18ff.) or "six things . . . yea, seven" (6:16-19). Such references can be matched in the Ugaritic literature. Baal is said to hate two sacrifices, yea, three (C. H. Gordon, Ugaritic Literature, p. 30). Baal captures sixty-six towns, yea, seventy-seven cities (ibid., p. 36). Later, seventy-seven brothers, yea, eighty-eight are mentioned (ibid., p. 55). Many other examples could be given. Apparently in the sayings of Amen-em-Opet and in Proverbs 22:20 we have two examples of a literary use of the numeral thirty that probably could be multiplied if our sources of ancient Egyptian and Hebrew Wisdom were more complete. As to the detailed comparisons of Proverbs with the Egyptian sayings, see notes on the verses in the Commentary.

We should also mention the two apocryphal books, Ecclesiasticus of about 180 B.C., and the Wisdom of Solomon, likely a bit later. These books, of great interest in themselves, are modeled in some ways after Proverbs. But they are later, and show a further development in the personification of wisdom and in other matters. They borrow from our Book of Proverbs, not vice versa, and therefore extensive reference to them is not necessary for our present purposes.

COMMENTARY

I. Solomon's Tribute to Wisdom, the Fear of the Lord. 1:1—9:18.

A. Introduction. 1:1-7. Author and Subject. Some commentators have taken this portion to be an introduction to the entire book, but as various other sections also have author data, probably this is to be taken to refer to the first section alone.

1. The proverbs. The root from which this word comes is used both in Hebrew and in other Semitic languages to express comparison. A derivative in Akkadian means "mirror." From such usage, the word comes to include both a reproachful remark (Ps 69:11), and a prophet's message (e.g., Num 23:7,18). It is translated "parable" sixteen times in the OT. In the book of Proverbs it is used mainly in the titles (1:1,6; 10:1; 25:1) to denominate the comparisons and contrasts used to express the moral teaching of the book. Of Solomon. See the discussion of authorship in the Introduction to the book.

2-4. Wisdom . . . instruction, etc. There are here five synonyms for wisdom. These include righteousness (ASV) and equity, which are virtues rather than skills. The emphasis is upon moral wisdom or right conduct. The simple. This word, used fourteen times in Proverbs, four times elsewhere, designates the opposite of a moral man. It does not mean a simpleton in our sense of the term, but a sinner, a rascal. Proverbs has a message of morality for the wicked. It is not just a Poor Richard's Almanac of good advice for people of low intelligence or lazy habits. This introduction cautions us against taking the book in a secular sense. It is a book of Christian principles.

7. The fear of the Lord. A common expression in the Psalms and elsewhere, this phrase is used fourteen times in Proverbs. Illustrations of the usage occur in Ps 115:11 — "Ye that fear the Lord, trust in the Lord," and Isa 11:2,3, where the fear of the Lord is named as a characteristic of the Messiah. Such fear includes awe before the Almighty (Ps 2:11 — "Serve the Lord with fear and rejoice with trembling"). Job 28:28 is practically a definition — "The fear of the Lord, that is wisdom, and to depart from evil is understanding." Proverbs 8:13 is to the same effect — "The fear of the Lord is to hate evil." The beginning of knowledge. Not the "chief" or "sum," as the Hebrew root might suggest, for Prov 9:10 uses a word specifically meaning the "start" or "beginning." Rather, the first step in morality is our relation to God. Fools despise wisdom. "Fool" occurs eighteen times in Proverbs; seven times elsewhere. Also the usage differs. In Isa 35:8, "fool" obviously means "simpleton," as is true in our English usage. But in the specialized usage of Proverbs, "fool" means a sinner. Proverbs 14:9 is illustrative — "Fools make a mock at sin." The clause means that sinners deride holiness. The Greek LXX well renders fools by ungodly.

B. The Righteous Woman, Wisdom, Versus the Evil Woman. 1:8—9:18. In this section the method of teaching by contrast is beautifully illustrated. In major sections, personified Wisdom is set off against sin (see Introd., The Teaching of Proverbs).

11. Lay wait for blood . . . for the innocent. The motive, it develops, is robbery, but this gang openly suggests murder for gain.

12. Alive as the grave. The expression is found in Num 16:30,33; Ps 55:15. The former passage says that Korah and his company were swallowed alive by the opening earth. The latter expresses the curse that men may go down "quick," i.e., "alive," into the grave. These men of Prov 1:11-14 would murder with dispatch. They would bring whole, i.e., healthy men down to death. The grave. Hebrew she'ôl. The present writer believes that this term simply means "grave." It is used nine times in Proverbs, three times to refer to the results of adultery. Cf. 5:5; 7:27; 9:18, where it is made parallel with "death" and "the dead." At least in 1:12, the emphasis is simply on murder. There is here no concern with the afterlife of the victims. This is not to deny that there was a belief in the afterlife and in resurrection among the Hebrews, but merely to say that this much discussed word may have a more simple meaning than is sometimes given it. (See R. Laird Harris, "The Meaning of Sheol in the Old Testament," The Evangelical Theological Society Bulletin, Vol. IV (1961), No. 4.)

16. Their feet. Identical with Isa 59:7.

Possibly Isaiah quotes from this, or possibly it was a common expression. See comments on 30:5 for other quotations found in Proverbs from elsewhere in the OT.

22. Simple ones. Obviously those who are in sin. The word scorners is used in Ps 1:1 parallel with ungodly and sinners. Cf. commentary on 3:34. 25. But ye. This should be and ye. Verses 24 and 25 give the reason as a protasis; the apodosis or conclusion is in verse 26. When we refuse the invitation of the Lord, there comes a time when the door of grace is shut. 32. The turning away. The waywardness of sinners (so Berkeley Version). The word usually refers to apostasy, a turning away from God.

2:1. My son. Thirteen times in the first seven chapters this address occurs. It assists in showing the unity of this section, 1:1–9:18. 6. The Lord giveth wisdom. The essentially religious nature of the exhortation is here illustrated.

13. Ways of darkness. Verses 12-15 speak of evil in general. This is aptly typified by the expression, ways of darkness. It still is true that crime flourishes in the dark. The contrast is expressed in 4:18,19, where the path of the just is compared to light and the way of the wicked to darkness (a different Heb. word from that of 2:13, however). The ethical figure of light and darkness occurs also in Isa 5:20; Ps 43:3; and in a few other places where the contrast is less clear. It is not common in the OT, but is found in the Dead Sea Scrolls and in the NT.

16. The strange woman . . . the stranger. These two expressions obviously refer to the "loose" woman (so RSV). The words basically mean "alien" and "foreigner" (so Berkeley), but in Proverbs it is clear that immorality is implied. Elsewhere in the OT this is not so. Ruth calls herself a "stranger" (Ruth 2:10). These expressions when used in Proverbs are euphemistic for zônâ, "a harlot," a word seldom used in this book. 17. Guide of her youth. Her husband (so Berkeley). The covenant of her God. Probably an interesting reference to the divine sanction of the marriage vows.

18. Her house inclineth unto death. The translation is difficult in detail, but the meaning is clear from the parallel: the wages of sin is death. The same thought in very similar words is repeated in 5:5; 7:27; 9:18. Closest is 7:27, which says that her house is the road to Sheol, going down to the chambers of death; i.e., adultery is fatal. It is difficult to take her house as the subject of inclineth in 2:18, however, as "house" is masculine and the verb shûaḥ is feminine. Toy (The Book of Proverbs, ICC., ad loc.) therefore derives it from a similar verb with the same consonants, shāḥāḥ, "to be bowed down." This is possibly correct. The dead. Hebrew, repāîm, translated by some as shades (so RSV and Berkeley). This translation is not necessary. The word cannot give us a theology of the underworld. Its etymology is uncertain. It is used several times in Ugaritic (C. H. Gordon, Ugaritic Handbook, glossary) and is there made parallel with "deities." This usage is not very instructive, since it involves Ugaritic theology, which is quite different from that of the Bible. We are thrown back upon the seven other Biblical instances of the use of the word. Three times it is used as parallel to "dead men," twice to Sheol; twice it has no parallel. Instructive is Isa 26:14, 19. In the first verse the plaint is that the dead men, the repāîm, shall not live or rise; in the later verse it is promised that they will. The word simply means dead people. As to the state of the dead being shadowy, conscious, or unconscious, this word says nothing. (On this subject cf. the plain teaching of Phil 1:23; Lk 23:43; et al.). There is another word spelled the same way which is the name of one of the nations of Canaan, the Rephaims. That word is sometimes translated "giants," but probably not correctly so.

3:1. My law. This phrase and "My commandments" (2:1) and similar words are not to be pressed to refer to the law of Moses. They are the advice of the father-teacher. It is given, however, as the Lord's word. The author implies that he is giving divine commands, as does Paul in I Cor 14:37. Though a practical end is often given in Proverbs, the author urges rectitude for its own sake, not because "honesty is the best policy." 2. Length of days. A possible allusion to the first commandment with promise (Ex 20:12). 3. Bind them about thy neck. A similar phrase, but not identical occurs in Deut 6:8. Closer is Prov 7:3: "Write them upon the table of thine heart." 5. With all thine heart. This precious verse contrasts ordinary human wisdom and the divine wisdom that is the basis of the whole book. Heart in Hebrew is used symbolically to represent not so much the seat of the emotions as the seat of intellect and will. In other words, commit your inner self to God. Do not seek to be independent of him. 6. Direct. Hebrew, make straight. The verse promises not so much guidance as enablement for us to go forward.

9. Firstfruits. An interesting reference to the Levitical legislation. In general, Proverbs is silent as to the Mosaic laws (but cf. the verses mentioned in the Commentary at 15:8), although clearly these laws were in force when Proverbs was written — even according to critical opinion which would make both Proverbs and the Levitical legislation post-Exilic The silence of Proverbs in this regard simply shows again that an argument from silence is often fallacious. 10. New wine. The Hebrew has two words for wine. Yayîn, which means fermented wine, is used in the condemnatory passage in Prov 23:31-35. Tîrôsh, used here as the fresh product of the pressing, is properly "must," "grape juice." Both words are translated oinos, "wine," by the LXX.

11. Despise not the chastening of the Lord. Quoted from Job 5:17, except that in Job the characteristic name Shaddai, "Almighty," occurs. Hebrews 12:5,6 quotes verbatim from the LXX (Alexandrinus and Sinaiticus texts), as is usual in Hebrews. The LXX adequately represents the Hebrew. (For other quotations, in Proverbs from the OT, cf. 30:5.)

14. Merchandise. "Profit," or possibly, "value." 15. Than rubies. Cf. Job 28:18; Prov 8:11; 31:10. 18. Tree of life. The phrase occurs also in Gen 2:9; 3:22-24; Prov 11:30; 13:12; 15:4; Rev 2:7; 22:2. Genesis is the only satisfactory source for the reference in Proverbs. We should therefore conclude that, as in the Revelation, these verses in Proverbs relate to the narrative of the Fall. There is no evidence for a "primitive sacred tree of life," as Toy supposes. Revelation 22:2 also has reference to a tree of healing by the river of the sanctuary (cf. Ezk 47:12; Zech 14:8). Famous trees in the garden of God, Eden, are mentioned in Ezk 31:8-16. All of these references presume acquaintance with the Genesis narrative. 19. By wisdom . . . founded the earth. Cf. 8:25-31. The "wisdom" of Proverbs is basically an attribute of God, and is not to be equated with mere earthly maxims of a clever teacher. This wisdom is God's law. In Prov 8, wisdom is personified and called eternal, as God is eternal. Many have found here an adumbration of Christ, which is a possible interpretation, but not sure.

27. Withhold not. Pay wages and pay on time, i.e., treat the laborer honestly and fairly (cf. Lev 19:13; Mal 3:5). Others would broaden the injunction to include all charity. 32. The froward. The root meaning apparently is to depart. This form is used only in Prov 2:15; 3:32; 14:2; Isa 30:12. Its parallel is "crooked." The LXX says transgressors. Perhaps "transgressor" or "apostate" gives the meaning best. 34. He scorneth the scorners. The same root, lîṣ, is used in both the noun and the verb. But the meanings probably are a shade different. The verb has the meaning "to deride" (cf. Ps 119:51). The LXX, which is quoted verbatim in Jas 4:6; I Pet 5:5, uses resist as a free translation. The noun, however, is limited to Proverbs, Ps 1:1, and Isa 29:20. It is one of the many synonyms for a wicked man. The Greek uses the word arrogant, which is a fair representation. Its opposite is humble (AV, lowly) in the last half of the verse. But there is wide variety in the Greek translation of this root. It evidently has many overtones of wickedness.

4:3,4. My father's son. These verses give an interesting touch. The teacher-father declares that his doctrine is not new. There is no reason why we may not see here the solicitous care of David and Bathsheba for their son Solomon. 7. Wisdom is the principal thing. The RSV and Berkeley insist on reading here a genitive — The beginning of wisdom is: Get wisdom. So also Toy and Delitzsch (The Proverbs of Solomon, KD. Reprinted.). But this seems unnecessary. Oesterley (op. cit.) and Fritsch (op. cit.) would drop the verse, since it is not in the LXX. The same form beginning is used four times not in the genitive. The meaning of "chief" or "principal" is well attested. The AV translation can be defended. The beginning of wisdom is: get wisdom violates the thought of 1:7 and seems unsuitable. With all thy getting. Get understanding. There is not here a progress — Don't stop at wisdom; get real understanding. Rather, as is usual in Proverbs, wisdom and understanding are synonymous. 9. Crown of glory. The expression is also used in 16:31; Isa 62:3. 12. Not . . . straitened. The old English strait does not mean "straight," but rather, "strict," "narrow" (cf. Mt 7:14). Your steps will be unimpeded (Toy).

14. Enter not. Verses 14-27 represent the advice of wisdom — namely, Turn from evil (cf. Job 28:28). 18. The path of the just. Note the emphatic contrast with "the way of the wicked" (v. 19). The perfect day. The precise meaning is debatable. Rashi and many others say noon (cited in Julius H. Greenstone, Proverbs with Commentary). The general meaning is clear: the just walk in increasing light; the wicked, in darkness (cf. comment on 2:13).

22. Life . . . and health. Cf. 3:8. 23. Keep thy heart, i.e., the mind which should seek right conduct (cf. 23:26). Out of it. Grammatically this could be "out of the heart"; but more likely, "out of keeping the heart in wisdom" is life.

5:3. For the lips. As a honeycomb drops honey, so the strange woman speaks honeyed words; her speech (lit., palate, as organ of speech) is, we would say, 'slick.' Strange woman. See comment on 2:16. 4. Wormwood. The Greek translates gall as the height of bitterness. The Hebrew la'ănâ appears to be a shrub of bitter taste used in the preparation of absinthe and traditionally used as medicine for deworming. 5. To death. See comments on 2:18. 6. Lest is difficult and is rendered by the LXX, Delitzsch, and others as a negative. Ponder means "weigh" or "make level." The subject could be "thou" or "she." Read, She does not weigh (or consider) the path of life. The last half can be translated, Her ways wander (so RSV). The last verb again could have as its subject "thou" or "she." She knows it not (Berkeley and similarly RSV). Jones and Walls ("The Proverbs," The New Bible Commentary) favor a slightly attested meaning of the verb, She is not at rest. 9. Thine honour unto others. Proverbs 5:9-14 is aptly called "Rake's Progress" by Jones and Walls.

15. Thine own cistern. Verses 15-17 are highly poetic and beautiful exhortations to fidelity, while 16,17 probably refer to children. In any event, the blessing of marital fidelity is beautifully presented. 19. Let her breasts satisfy thee. This Hebrew word dad, translated "breasts" in the AV, does not bear the connotation expected in this verse as another word, shad, would. Certain copies of the LXX and the parallel in Prov 7:18 argue that the word here should be read with another vowel, dōd, and translated Let her love satisfy thee (so Greenstone and RSV). 21. Before . . . the Lord. Contrary to Toy, who usually finds in Proverbs the concept of temporal blessings as the incentive for morality, this verse shows that the outlook of the author includes the higher reference to God's holiness as the reason for rectitude. 23. Without instruction. The Hebrew says, with no instruction. Doubtless "for lack of discipline" is meant (so RSV, BV, Jones and Walls, etc.).

6:1. If thou be surety. The practices in regard to lending among the Jews in antiquity are not fully known. Toy imagines that there was no suretyship in the "commercially simple" pre-Exilic life. It would seem, however, that the far-flung enterprises of Solomon, now illustrated by archaeology, and the increase of wealth pictured by Amos and others must have given ample opportunity for making loans and taking surety; although we do not have examples of just this thing in other Scriptures. The rabbinic attitudes are discussed by Greenstone, who remarks that the Hebrew word for "surety" here was used by the Phoenician traders and entered Latin as arrabo. He might have added that it is also in Greek arrabōn (Eph 1:14. Cf. Zellig S. Harris, Grammar of the Phoenician Language, "American Oriental Series," Vol. VIII; Glossary). In brief, the Levitical law forbade lending on interest to poor Israelites (Lev 25:35-37). The idea was that for a poor fellow Israelite, a man should give the needed money outright. The Law required that if a man did lend and take a pledge for collateral, he might not enter his debtor's house to remove the collateral by force. And if a poor man gave his garment as collateral, the lender must restore it to him the same day (Deut 24:10-12). These provisions answer to our minimum personal exemptions. Lending to non-Israelites was permitted, and probably commercial loans were arranged. The author of the article "Usury," in ISBE, remarks that the Pentateuchal regulations do not cover commercial loans; but perhaps he goes too far in saying that commercial loans were practically unknown. Rather, it is probable that the practice of making commercial loans gave rise to the injustices in II Kgs 4:1; Neh 5:1-12. At the year of release all Israelites' debts were remitted (Deut 15:2). This argues for commercial loans being permitted, for other loans were prohibited.

Rates of interest, if we may judge by Neh 5:11, were commonly 1 per cent per month, although they doubtless varied.

Charging such high interest was usury, and those who required it of fellow Jews were condemned. The prophet Jeremiah protests (Jer 15:10) that he has not engaged in such ventures, yet all men hate him – presumably as they hated usurers. The word is translated extortioner in Ps 109:11. The very word for "usury," neshek (Prov 28:8), implies "bite" or "devour," though milder words are also used. Not to practice usury is an element of righteousness in Ps 15:5; Ezk 18:8, 13,17; 22:12. The practice of a creditor is illustrated in II Kgs 4:1. We can reasonably fill in the details that the husband had a commercial loan which his widow could not pay; or possibly some usurer had loaned to a widow in violation of Lev 25:35-37. The BV and the RSV translate these words by interest. It would seem better to translate by "usury," as apparently it is the excesses that are condemned. Because of these excesses, Solomon cautions against becoming surety for "another." He urges one to escape speedily the possibilities of ruin. Sureties are recommended in the postbiblical book, Ecclesiasticus 29:14. When they developed or what form they took, we do not know. It is probable that in the time of Solomon their abuses were such as to call forth the rebuke here recorded (see also Prov 11:15; 20:16; 27:13 – the last two verses practically identical).

6. The ant. Mentioned in the Bible only here and in Prov 30:25, though there probably is no question about the translation. Formerly there was a problem raised about ants storing food (see Toy). A type of ant found in the Near East, however, does this. Ants have social organization, but no ruler corresponding to a queen bee. Thou sluggard. This noun is found fourteen times in Proverbs and nowhere else. It is usually defined as "a lazy person." Though the word includes this idea, it may well have other overtones, such as our "ne'er-do-well," which does not mean merely a "failure." The usage in Proverbs argues that "lazy" is not the total connotation. In 15:19, the contrast is an upright man – not just a "worker." In 19:15 the parallel is with remîyyâ, which is usually rendered deceit in the AV and the RSV, but rendered by them idle in this place. In Prov 21:25,26 the contrast evidently is a righteous man (so AV and Berkeley). The RSV separates the two verses and supplies an extra thought in verse 26. In 26:12-16 there are several verses on the sluggard. Verse 13 is similar to 22:13. Verse 15 is from 19:24. But 26:16, as a final, perhaps climactic verse, says a "sluggard" is wise in his own eyes. We must note that this section of Proverbs 26 was introduced by verse 12, which declares that one wise in his own eyes is worse than a "fool." It is clear that the author is reproaching a "sluggard" not merely with idleness, but with associated sins. We hope to show by many examples that the word "fool" means not a "moron" but a "sinner." So the author of Proverbs here is not merely recommending thrift and diligence; he is apparently condemning a characteristic that combines shiftlessness with shiftiness! 10. A little sleep. Verses 10 and 11 are exactly paralleled in 24:33,34, except for a couple of vowels (cf. Introd.). In this case both contexts speak of a shiftless man, using different comparisons, but the same conclusion. The saying may have been a well-known epigram. The LXX translates it a bit differently in the two places. The Syriac also differs, but not in the same way as the LXX.

12. A naughty person. Hebrew, a man of Belial. Froward. Hebrew, crooked. 13. Speaketh with his feet. LXX, makes a sign with his feet. The Hebrew mâlal can mean "speak," "rub," "scrape," "languish," or "wither" (BDB). The meaning "scrape" is poorly attested. The idiom may well refer to some low gesture, like our thumbing the nose. Teacheth with his fingers. The word probably means "point," but the connotation is difficult. Possibly another low gesture typical of the wicked man. 14. Frowardness. A different word from that in verse 12. It is used nine times in Proverbs, elsewhere only in Deut 32:20. The root means overturn. It is clear that it refers to some kind of evil, but it is hard to catch the exact intent. The LXX reads perverted (so Fritsch). Delitzsch says malice; Toy: evil. In 8:13 "a perverse mouth" is paralleled with pride and arrogancy. In 23:33 a drunk man is pictured as speaking "perverse things," using this word. Soweth discord. Literally, lets loose strife. The LXX translation, causes trouble to a city, arose from confusing the word with a later derivative. The root is dîn, "to judge, whence mâdôn, "strife." This word, discord, with variants, is found twenty-seven times in Proverbs and three times elsewhere. It is part of the peculiar moral vocabulary of the book. The wording of 16:28, a "perverse man lets loose strife," is very similar to that of this verse.

16. Six things . . . yea, seven. These are not seven cardinal sins (Greenstone and Jones and Walls) nor an indefinite six or seven (Toy). Delitzsch strikes it right in saying that the proverb is climactic. The six items are background for the seventh, which receives the emphasis (cf. Job 5:19; Prov 30:18,19). The statement emphatically concludes with what verse 14 had introduced – "letting loose strife."

21. Bind them . . . upon thy heart. Cf. 3:3. 23. Commandment . . . law. Jones and Walls well remark that this is parental instruction, but that such instruction consisted of the divine law (Deut 6:6,7). 25. In thine heart. Note well that the OT commandments reach to the internal attitudes of man. Christ's teaching that inner lust was already inner adultery (Mt 5:28) is not an advance upon the OT teaching so much as a rescuing of the OT doctrine from the Pharisaic traditional comments (cf. R. Laird Harris, Inspiration and Canonicity of the Bible, p. 53). 30. A thief. The thought is that there may be mitigating circumstances for thievery, and even restitution greatly assists in removing the blot. But for adultery there is no excuse. It brings a train of evil consequences. No restitution is possible.

35. Ransom. A good example of the meaning of kōper, "a payment to pacify." The root is said to mean cover (BDB), but it is not so used in the OT, and it is a dubious inference from the Arabic. From the noun for ransom a denominative verb, kipper, is formed, logically meaning "to give a ransom." This is the verb many times translated "to make an atonement." From this verb a second noun is formed, kappōret, "place of atonement." This is the word for the top of the ark called "the mercy seat" in the AV, or hilastērion in the LXX. Christ is called our hilastērion, or "propitiation," in Rom 3:25.

7:2. Apple of thine eye. Center of the eye; therefore the pupil, a symbol of a most precious thing. 5. Flattereth. Not so much to "flatter" as to use smooth words, i.e., agreeable, seductive words (so Delitzsch and RSV).

7. Among the simple. The silly, the morally unstable. See comment at 1:4 and cf. 9:4 and 16. 10. Subtil. The Hebrew apparently means "guarded of heart," i.e., secretive, wily (so Delitzsch). The description of the following scene is a classic. As Delitzsch says, "like meets like," the seduction is complete, the excuses are given. But the inspired author gives tersely enough the end product of evil. 11. Loud and stubborn. Better, tumultuous and rebellious. The rebellion is obviously a refusal of God's law and the obligations of morality. 14. I have peace offerings. The peace offerings were eaten in part by the worshiper. Therefore, at national feasts with thousands present, peace offerings were given by the thousands. The woman does not mean to claim that she has recently worshiped. She is, rather, alluring the young man with the announcement that her refrigerator is full, as we would say. "My husband is away," she says; "the coast is clear. We can have our fling, and no one will know." No one but God! 20. Day appointed. A rare word. The LXX and Syriac give the sense, after many days. Probably the meaning is "at full moon," which was presumably some days off.

22. Straightway. Better, all at once (RSV). The man's resistance to sin at last gives way, and his doom is sealed. Stocks. The sense is plain, but again the details are difficult. The Hebrew seems to say, "like fetters unto correction a fool (goes)." The word "fetter," however, is rare and elsewhere means anklets. The LXX translates the word for "stocks" by "dog," apparently reading a different text –"like a dog (goes) to bonds." The word "bonds" in the LXX arises from the Hebrew word for "correction," using different vowels. Then the LXX ends the verse with this clause–"as a dog goes to bonds." The word "fool" is understood with different vowels, and it is transferred to the following verse, which reads in the LXX–"A deer shot in the liver with an arrow." The LXX reading of the whole passage differs from the Hebrew only in two words. It is supported by the Syriac and Targum, and should perhaps be adopted.

27. Sheol. See comments for 1:12 and 2:18. We should not lose the solemn thrust of this passage in the details of the exposition. Sin cannot be indulged with impunity; its wages is death. The deceitfulness of sin is an old story, but the ancient Hebrew author here beautifully unmasks its deceit and gives the unvarnished truth. But he does not stop there. There is a cure for sin–it is the voice of Wisdom of chapter 8.

8:1. Doth not wisdom cry? Greenstone well remarks that we have here not just a discourse on the beauties of family life or on chastity, else the contrast to the harlot would be a dutiful wife. But Greenstone does not follow up his suggestion to show that the contrast is really the basic one of sin versus godliness. It is for this reason that wisdom is personified and so closely paralleled with God himself. Proverbs 8:1-13 gives the exhortation of wisdom; 8:14-31 describes the exalted status of wisdom; 8:32–9:11 presents the invitation of wisdom to profit by her instruction.

5. Simple . . . fools. These are not mental fools, but, as much of the preceding shows, sinners. For simple, see comments on 1:4. The word k'sîl, "fool," is used forty-nine times in Proverbs, eighteen in Ecclesiastes, three times elsewhere. It is obvious that it is part of what we have called the moral vocabulary of Proverbs. Its use in Ecclesiastes is somewhat different, even as its counterpart, "wisdom," is used differently there. In Ecclesiastes, wisdom is inventive genius, mental ability; folly is pleasure—even noble pleasure in works like architecture, gardening, etc. Both are alike condemned as fruitless. In Proverbs, both wisdom and folly are of a moral sort. Examples of the usage of (k'sîl) are: (1) in connection with 'iwwelet, "folly" of the sinful sort, 12:23; 13:16; 14:8; 15:14; 17:12; etc.; this root is not found in Ecclesiastes. (2) The "fool" (k'sîl) is contrasted with the wise man or with wisdom in Prov 3:35; 10:1, 23; 13:20; 14:16; 29:11. (3) The word "fool" is paralleled with "simple" (petî) in 1:22; with "scorner" (lês) in 19:29; and associated with "evil" (ra') in 13:19. This word "fool," or "folly," 'iwwelet, in Proverbs, obviously connotes moral badness. This must be understood if we are to hold the teaching of Proverbs in focus. It is not a book on intelligence so much as on integrity (see Introd., The Teaching of Proverbs).

8. Froward. Not the word used in 2:12 and elsewhere. This root, pātal, means "twisted"; therefore it is used for "string," "tie," "wrestle," etc. Here it means morally twisted, the opposite of righteous. Perverse. Crooked. 10. My instruction. The translation of the AV is satisfactory. The Hebrew strictly says, Receive my instruction and do not (receive) silver. It is a comparative negative (cf. 9:8; 31:6; and, for another famous example, see Hos 6:6). 11. Than rubies. Cf. 3:15; 8:10; 16:16; 31:10. 12. Prudence. Hebrew 'ormâ. The root means "be wise," and is used in a good sense, as here, and also in a bad sense (Gen 3:1). Inventions. This also is used elsewhere in a bad sense (Prov 12:2). Here it is good. 13. To hate evil. Verses amplifying the concept of "the fear of the Lord" are: 1:7,29; 2:5; 8:13; 9:10; 10:27; 14:27; 16:6; 19:23. Job 28:28, like Prov 16:6, emphasizes departing from evil. Prov 8:13 warns us that true godliness is not all positive. The teaching that sin is hateful is a wonderful and vital truth. In ancient times, as now, only the Biblical revelation stressed this truth.

22. The Lord possessed me. A famous verse. The LXX translates, The Lord created me, as does the Syriac. The clear personification of these verses led most of the early Church Fathers to find here a prophecy of Christ. The Arian heretics of the fourth century therefore made much of this verse, speaking of wisdom as a created being. The orthodox party repelled this idea, as Jones and Walls say, "on other grounds." It is curious that the controversy was carried out on the basis of the LXX text. There was little recourse to the Hebrew. The Hebrew uses the word qānâ. This verb is used many times in the sense of "buy," "possess," "acquire." Its derivative means "cattle," or practically, "wealth." Only in Gen 14:22 would "make" be a reasonable translation. The RSV has maker in Gen 14:22 and created here. The BV has possessor in Gen 14:22 and made here. Albright holds that Ugaritic similarities with Proverbs 8 and 9 are striking, and argues for "create" on that basis (op. cit., p. 7). The deeper question is, What function is here ascribed to wisdom? It seems clear that she is pictured as eternal —having existed even before God created the world. She was not active in creation, but was with God while he created. If wisdom is personified righteousness, then the eternal nature of God is righteous. The Lord possessed me simply means, "I was the Lord's." The verbal similarity to John 1:1 has led many to think of an adumbration of Christ. We should compare with Proverbs 8 the teaching of Ecclesiasticus 24, coming from about 180 B.C., and the Wisdom of Solomon 7. Ecclesiasticus is high in his praise of wisdom, but makes her to reside in Israel and equates her with Moses' law. The Wisdom of Solomon also appears to be an extravagant development from the teaching of Proverbs. There seems to be no clear indication that we should find Christ revealed in Proverbs 8. Nor need we be troubled about the translation, The Lord created me. Delitzsch remarks, "Wisdom is not God, but is God's; she . . . is not herself the Logos."

23. From everlasting. In several expressions wisdom is said to be eternal: "at the beginning of his way" (v. 22); "when there were no seas" (v. 24); "before the mountains were founded" (v. 25); i.e., before anything was created, there was wisdom. True, wisdom is said to be brought forth in this beginning (v. 24). But as this is highly figurative language, there is no reason why verse 22 cannot also, in figurative language, refer to wisdom's creation. It is a poetic declaration of the eternity of wisdom. See Delitzsch for the Nicene interpretations.

24. No depths. Toy makes much of the Hebrews' conception of the world as suggested in 8:24-29. He claims that the Hebrews, like the Babylonians, thought of a subterranean ocean (the depths) from which springs arose and in which the foundations of the earth were laid. The sky was a solid dome supported on pillars, and rain came through it when the "windows of heaven" were opened (Gen 7:11). All this is an imaginary construction by modern authors who take literally the poetic expressions of various passages and, putting them together, build a crude cosmology which the Bible does not teach. Toy argues that the Hebrews believed rain came through these windows when they were opened. He forgets that windows in an ancient Hebrew house did not close as ours do but were mere slits in the walls. To open a window in a house likely meant to cut out a window. Also, the "windows of heaven" could let down barley and flour (II Kgs 7:2) or other blessings (Mal 3:10). It is obviously a figurative expression which Toy has forced into a crude literalism. Also the assertion that the Hebrews thought of subterranean waters is quite incorrect. The word here used for "depths," t^{e}hôm, is many times used simply of the sea where Jonah sank (Jon 2:5), or where ships are tossed (Ps 107:26). Also the "waters under the earth," of the second commandment, can not be some unseen subterranean ocean. They are simply the water below shore line. As the Hebrews were forbidden to make images of birds and stars in the sky or animals on land, so they were forbidden to make images of anything in the waters under the earth, i.e., fish living in seas, lakes, and rivers (cf. Deut 4:18). The Bible speaks of no subterranean waters, and the assumed Hebrew cosmology of modern writers is mostly fiction.

27. Set a compass. That is, marked out the circle of the horizon (cf. 26:10; 22:14; Isa 40:22). These verses probably all refer to the circle of the horizon. The use of this phrase should teach us that the other expressions, "the four corners of the earth," the "ends of the earth," were not meant to imply that the earth is square.

30. One brought up. This Hebrew word is used only here and in Jer 52:15. The LXX says: I was arranging. The meaning master workman (RSV and Berkeley) may be the best. It is based on a tablet found at Taanach which has the root as "wizard," or "craftsman" (W. F. Albright, "A Prince of Taanach in the Fifteenth Century," BASOR, No. 94, (April, 1944), p. 18).

9:1. Wisdom. Here, as in Prov 1:20, the noun is feminine plural, yet used with a feminine singular verb. This usage is well attested from Ugaritic grammar, as Albright has pointed out ("Some Canaanite–Phoenician Sources of Hebrew Wisdom," Wisdom in Israel and the Ancient Near East, ed. by M. Noth and D. W. Thomas, p. 9). Seven pillars. This has been variously interpreted as a feature of architecture, the liberal arts, seven sacraments, etc. (see Toy). It was even used by T. E. Lawrence as the (irrelevant) title of his book on the Arabian campaign in World War I! Probably it is a round number of perfection, suggesting that Wisdom is fully prepared to satisfy. 2. Mingled her wine. Just what practice is meant is not clear. The Greeks mingled wine with water in a bowl called a kratēr, and the LXX translates, she has mingled her wine in a bowl. Revelation 14:10 declares that the wicked will drink the wine of God's wrath unmixed, i.e., undiluted. The apocryphal book II Maccabees 15:39 declares that wine undiluted with water was thought distasteful. The rabbis held that the Passover wine should be diluted with three parts of water (Art. "wine," ISBE; The Mishnah, Berakoth 7:5). Obviously, not all the wine of antiquity was thus diluted or it would all have been nonintoxicating. Wine was also mixed with spices (Isa 5:22). Wisdom's wine is at all events symbolic. 5. Come, eat. The blessed call often appears as an invitation to a banquet; cf. Isa 55:1; Jn 6:35; Rev 22:17. Of. This is a good example of the Ugaritic usage of the preposition b, meaning "from" (Story, op. cit., p. 329).

7. A scorner. See notes on 1:22 and 3:34. Here scorner parallels "sinner." 8. Reprove not a scorner. The negative is comparative. It does not treat some men as incorrigible (as Toy), but warns of the rebuff to be expected from a sinner. See 8:10 for another comparative negative. 10. Fear of the Lord. See comments on 1:7. The holy. Better, the Holy One (RSV) or Most Holy (Berkeley). The noun is plural, but is evidently a plural of majesty (see above, 9:1) and is parallel with Lord.

13. Foolish. The feminine abstract form of the noun "fool," which is frequent in Proverbs for the folly of sin (see comments on 8:5). Clamorous. See also 7:11, where the word occurs in a similar context. It means "loud," probably with immoral overtones. 18. The dead. Not the shades (RSV) or ghosts (BV). The Hebrew word is simply a poetic parallel for the dead. See comments on 2:18. On the whole picture of the harlot, see 7:5-27; 5:3-13, etc. Here the major contrast of wisdom versus sin in the first portion of the book finds its conclusion.

II. Miscellaneous Proverbs of Solomon. 10:1–22:16.

It is our contention that in Proverbs the inspired Word of God is given in a special literary form. Just as David used the vehicle of poetry, so Solomon used the vehicle of Wisdom literature, which teaches largely by contrast. In the first major section (I) the contrast is maintained throughout long passages–e.g., the evil woman is set over against wisdom. In Section II the contrast is expressed in short one-verse units. The great majority of verses in this section have a "but" in the middle of the verse.

The exposition is made more difficult by the isolated nature of these proverbs. There is no immediate context to guide us. Some commentators have concluded that the proverbs follow no plan, but are a motley collection (Greenstone). Toy calls them "detached aphorisms." Delitzsch declares that there is a grouping according to thought, not in a comprehensive plan, but in a "progressive unfolding" that "continuously wells forth." There is a kind of unity in this section, but it comes rather from the language and subject than from the arrangement. A proverb is annunciated, then repeated elsewhere with variations which add to the meaning. The first instance may contrast parts a and b; the second, a and c. Even a third may occur, comparing a with d. Putting all three instances together, we get a fuller definition of the thought expressed in a. We would feel it easier if these thoughts were grouped together. The ancients evidently found it more interesting to have these thoughts separated and somewhat concealed. Also, as we have seen, there is a certain unity in the moral vocabulary used. So, many proverbs concern the righteous, the wise, the upright versus the cruel, the foolish, the perverse. Adequate study of one verse may involve concordance study of the whole book–but better, not mere mechanical concordance study so much as a thoughtful musing over the whole outlook of the author. For by repetition, contrast, distinctive vocabulary, and varied consideration of the theme, God, through this author, teaches us that righteousness exalteth anyone, but sin is always a reproach. Again we must insist that this is not a Poor Richard's Almanac of pithy, common sense sayings bearing on life's problems; this is a divine collection of sayings pointing out the way of holiness.

A. Contrasting Proverbs. 10:1–15:33.

10:1. The proverbs of Solomon. See Introduction, Authorship. A wise son. This phrase is used again in 13:1; 15:20. In the latter, 20a is identical with 10:1a. The contrast in 13:1 is with a "scorner" (see comments on 1:22). In 15:20 the contrast is with a "fool" (see notes on 8:5).

2. Treasures of wickedness, i.e., ill-gotten gain. Verse 10:2 b parallels 11:4 b. 3. Soul of the righteous. Here, as often, soul is used for the whole person (cf. Ps 37:3,25). 4. A slack hand. At first sight, in the English translations, this appears to be merely a recommendation of thrift. But the word slack usually means deceitful. The difficulty is that its root, rāmâ, may mean either "deceive" or "grow loose," though the latter meaning is not well attested. We find the contrast with "diligent" at 12:24 and 12:27. "Slack" is paralleled with "sluggard" in 19:15, which is contrasted with "diligent" in 13:4. "Sluggard" has moral connotations, as we have shown at 6:6. We may therefore conclude that 10:4 means, "The one working with a deceitful hand becomes poor; but the upright hand makes rich." 5. A wise son. In the English translations this is a proverb opposing laziness. Toy, however, remarks that the verse could as well be reversed—"A wise son gathers in summer," etc. This is the order of the Greek. According to this view, we have here one characteristic of a good man—he is provident—rather than a suggestion that to be provident makes one good!

6. Violence covereth. It is better to turn the phrase around, as do the RSV and the Berkeley. The contrast is better seen in 10:11, where 11 b is identical with 6 b: the mouth of the wicked "conceals violence." 7. The memory of the just is blessed. This phrase is famous as being used by Jews after mentioning a good man deceased. It is a Hebrew requiescat in pace, usually abbreviated to z s l (zēker saddîq libᵉrākâ). 8. A prating fool. The word fool ("always morally bad," BDB) and its feminine parallel,"foolishness," are used fifty times in the OT, and forty-one of these occurrences of 'ĕwîl are in Proverbs. The translation fool is misleading in modern English. Some such word as "rascal" would be better. Verse 8 b is repeated in 10 b.

10. Winketh. See comments on 6:13. 11. Violence. See Verse 6. 12. Love covereth. Observe the connection between this verse and 17:9; 16:28. In 17:9 the opposite of the man who covers a transgression is the man who magnifies another's fault. Such a man in 16:28 "soweth strife." To stir up strife is the characteristic of hate in 10:12. There are verbal similarities between this passage and 6:14-19, which see. Obviously the meaning here, and in the allusions in I Pet 4:8 and Jas 5:20, is not that if we love others, our love will atone for our sins; but if we truly love others, we will minimize their faults.

14. The fool is near destruction. Jones and Walls nicely remark that destruction in this proverb furnishes a catchword for the next verse. Often this happens, and the catchword offers a connection between the proverbs that is totally missed in English. 15. The rich. This verse alone would be misleading. Neither riches nor poverty is a sacrament in Proverbs. Comparison with 18:11 shows that the rich man thinks in his own conceit (or imagination) that his riches are his strength. 19. Multitude of words. Probably verses 18-21 go together, as 20 and 21 show that it is not loquacity that is condemned, but evil speech.

23. Fool. The remainder of the chapter gives a series of terse contrasts between the wicked and the godly. Mischief. Only three places in the AV is zimmâ so translated. Elsewhere it is "wickedness," "lewdness," "crime." A rascal thinks sin is fun. 31. Froward. Here and in verse 32 perverse is better.

11:1. A false balance. The same thought is in 16:11. In 20:10 differing weights and measures are called an "abomination to the Lord," and in 20:23 a "false balance" is again condemned. There were various methods of commercial thievery. One was to have a falsely graduated balance. Another was to have shekel weights of varying weight to be used in buying or selling to one's own advantage. These were the "diverse weights." A just weight. Hebrew, a perfect stone. Stones were used for weights, and it was all too easy to grind them off or chip them down. The law of Moses forbade all such dishonesty (Lev 19:36; Deut 25:15; cf. Ezk 45:10; Amos 8:5, et al.). Our governments today have bureaus of weights and measures to maintain standards. In the theocracy of Israel, establishing of such standards fell often to the priests. Therefore we find references to the "shekel of the sanctuary" (Ex 38:26). Weights were especially important, for in the absence of coinage in the early days, silver and gold were weighed for payments. Many shekel weights have been discovered. They average about 11.4 grams for the normal shekel (R. B. Y. Scott, "Weights and Measures of the Bible," BA, XXII (1959), 32-40).

2. Pride. In the Hebrew there is alliteration between pride, zādôn, and shame, qālôn. 7. The expectation of the wicked. Verse 7 a is parallel to 10:28 b. See also 11:23. In Job the term expectation (AV, hope, Job 14:7) is used of the afterlife (cf. Job 14:7-15). If the wicked man has no hope after death, if his expectation is wrath, whereas the expectation of the righteous is joy, then the author here by faith looks beyond the grave as did Job, David, Daniel, and others.

13. A talebearer. Hebrew, rākîl, "slanderer." The statement in 13 a parallels that in 20:19a, which see. Concealeth. See also 10:12, where the same word is used. 14. Multitude of counsellors. Cf.

24:6 for the same expression. 15. Surety. See comments on 6:1.

16. A gracious woman. Not in the modern sense of gracious, i.e., cultured and kindly, but literally a woman of grace. Possibly verse 16 b is not a mere added statement, but a well-known comparison—"A gracious woman retaineth honor as surely as a ruthless man gets wealth." 17. The merciful man. Probably a parallel to the "woman of grace" in verse 16. His soul . . . his flesh; i.e., himself. There is a reward to goodness. 18. Deceitful . . . reward. An alliteration, sheqer versus seker. Such alliterations, catchwords, and repetitions are some of the style features of Proverbs that sometimes explain the order of the material, but are lost in translation. 20. Froward. Crooked. Upright. Perfect, complete (morally).

22. Jewel of gold. The nose ring often worn by an Oriental woman. How incongruous in the nose of so unclean an animal! But not more so than a woman having beauty without character. Discretion. This is doubtless moral perception, as in Ps 119:66. The good taste of the Berkeley Version is far too colorless.

24. There is that scattereth. Verses 24-29 may be taken together as treating of liberality—"Give and it shall be given unto you again." This person gives from a heart of blessing (v. 25). The opposite hoards corn—and we may suppose there were many black marketeers in times of siege and famine—and gets a curse for a blessing. The error lies not in having riches but in trusting in them (v. 28).

25-31. The righteous will flourish (cf. Ps 1:3; 52:7,8; 92:12-14; Jer 17:8). This thought occurs frequently in Proverbs.

30. Tree of life. See comment on 3:18. Winneth souls. The idiom is not clear. Literally it is, the one who takes souls (persons) is wise. Some interpret, "the wise man wins friends" (Berkeley). Fritsch says take means "to destroy." The RSV gives an unnecessary conjecture that lawlessness takes many lives (changing hākām to hāmās). Delitzsch supports the AV, which is satisfactory, though it may include more than fishing for men. 31. The righteous. The LXX interprets it that the righteous will be punished for their sin; much more the wicked. This is quoted verbatim in I Pet 4:18. However, the Hebrew can also be understood to mean that the righteous will get a blessing, while the wicked will receive judgment. The Syriac agrees with the LXX, and this interpretation can be accepted.

12:4. Virtuous woman. The phrase is used again in 31:10. The word hayil, when relating to men, especially soldiers, means "strength." Referring to a wife, it designates the womanly virtues, perhaps "nobility." Proverbs 11:16 speaks of a woman of grace; 19:14 refers to a wise woman. All of these terms in the context of Proverbs speak of a good woman under various aspects. 8. Wisdom. The word sēkel is here contrasted with a "perverse" or "twisted" heart. Elsewhere it is contrasted with "deceiving" (13:15), "sinful folly" (16:22; 23:9). Delitzsch, Toy, and others seem quite wrong in calling it only "intelligence." Moral wisdom or goodness surely is intended.

11. Vain persons. This proverb is repeated almost verbatim in 28:19. The RSV, Berkeley, and Delitzsch translate as vain pursuits. But the word is not so used elsewhere. In Jud 9:4; 11:3; II Sam 6:20 it refers to vain persons, rascals. The LXX says vanities, perhaps referring to idols. 12. Net of evil. The word net is difficult. The LXX omits it. The Syriac translates it, to do evil. It can mean strong tower (RSV), hardly booty (Berkeley). The root is to hunt. Possibly the Syriac gives a clue for a helpful reading —"the desire of the wicked is to hunt evil, taking it in an Aramaic form. 18. There is that speaketh. Several proverbs begin with this special construction, "There is that . . . " Verses 18-23 have to do with evil speech.

28. No death. Not the usual negative for this Hebrew construction, but it is used similarly in 31:4. The LXX and Syriac make 28 b a contrast to 28 a, "the ways of the wicked are unto death," which is adopted by the RSV, Fritsch, Toy, and others. The reading of the AV, the BV, Delitzsch, Greenstone, and others refers the verse to immortality. But the note in Berkeley that there are "few assertions of immortality in the Old Testament" is unfortunate. Many positive references to resurrection and the future life exist in the Psalms and Prophets, though most are debated by 'liberal' scholars. Cf. Job 19:25-27; Ps 16:10; 17:15; Isa 25:8; 26:19; Ezk 37:10; Dan 12:2; and others.

13:1. A wise son. See comments on 10:1. The verb "heareth" is to be supplied in the first half as in the AV, the LXX, and the Syriac. 4. The soul of the sluggard. Soul simply means the individual, the sluggard himself. On sluggard as a moral term, see notes on 6:6.

8. Ransom . . . are his riches. The thought is that a rich man attacked or kidnapped can ransom himself. Under Hebrew law a man could not buy his freedom from judgment. The poor heareth not rebuke. Cf. 1 b, "The scorner heareth not rebuke." To "hear not rebuke" is characteristic of an evil man. Why say it about the poor? The LXX and Syriac follow the Hebrew. The RSV emends drastically. Possibly we should read rāsh, "poor," as rō'sh, "chief," and make it parallel to verse 8a. The "chief" ("bigshot," as we say) hears no rebuke; he can always buy his way out of a tight spot. 9. The lamp of the wicked. See also 20:20; 24:20; Job 18:5; 21:17. It was a popular metaphor. 12. Tree of life. See comment on 3:18.

14. The law of the wise. The preceding verse mentions the "word" and the "commandment." Law, therefore, is the meaning here rather than teaching (RSV, Berkeley). This verse is like 14:27 with the "law of the wise" replaced by the "fear of the Lord." It is surely purposive that the author thus recurs to a similar thought with variations. 15. Good understanding giveth favour. Very similar to 3:4. Ḥēn, favour and sēkel, understanding, are here so clearly moral terms, coming as the result of God's commandments, that it is difficult to see how Delitzsch can call sēkel "fine culture." The BV has, Ideal understanding lends attractiveness. The RSV speaks of good sense. These translations miss the meaning that contrasts goodness with transgression. 16. Prudent man. Cf. 8:12. A wise man, an opposite to kesîl, "knave." 20. Companion of fools shall be destroyed. A play on words. In the Hebrew, companion and destroyed are similar words.

24. Spareth his rod. On the rod of correction, see also 19:18; 22:15; 23:13, 14. "Spare the rod and spoil the child," has become a common saying. We should remember, however, that Proverbs does not recommend brutal beatings. Nor is physical chastisement the only instrument of child training mentioned (cf. 22:6). Indeed, instruction in righteousness and in the fear of the Lord is that without which mere whipping will fail.

14:1. Every wise woman. Not quite the same wording as in 9:1, but here and in 14:2 the mention of the one "fearing the Lord" is doubtless a reference to the first section of the book, 1:1–9:18.

5. A false witness. Repeated with interesting variations in 19:5,9 and 21:28. The wording is close to that of the ninth commandment, but not identical with it.

9. Fools . . . mock at sin. The first half of this verse is difficult, largely because mock is used as a finite verb only six times in the OT. Its meaning is not clear. Close to 14:9 is 19:28—"An ungodly witness mocks at justice" (RSV). It seems that there is equal reason to translate here with the AV, fools mock at sin. 12. A way which seemeth right. This verse is repeated verbatim in 16:25. (On these repetitions cf. Introd., Collections in Proverbs). In this case, there is a catchword in verse 12, "its end," which ties it to verse 13. 13. Even in laughter. Rather than understand this verse to show a pessimism not common in Proverbs, the verse can be joined to the preceding, and read—"The end of the way that seems right to a man is sorrowful and heavy."

20. The poor is despised of his neighbor. This verse does not merely state a common truth, much less approve it. The catchword his neighbor in verse 21 shows that to despise one's neighbor thus is sin. 24. Their riches. The Greek, reading one letter differently, has The crown of the wise is their prudence (so also the RSV).

27. The fear of the Lord. This goes with verse 26, as the repetition of "the fear of the Lord" shows. Otherwise the verse is a parallel to 13:14. 31. He that honoreth him. See comments on 19:17, and compare 17:5. 32. Hope in his death. As it stands, a real witness to hope in eternity. For in his death the LXX and Syriac have b'tummô, in his integrity, reading the m and t reversed. This is strong witness against the Hebrew text, and it is adopted in the RSV. Toy argues for it because, he says, the author had no hope in a future life. It is dangerous thus to prejudge a question. See comment on 12:28. But the text in his integrity has good support.

15:4. Tree of life. See notes on 3:18.

8. The sacrifice of the wicked is an abomination. The phrase, abomination to the Lord, ties together verses 8 and 9. A number of verses are thus associated in the Hebrew. Proverbs 15:8 a is repeated in 21:27 a, where it is added that such sacrifice comes from a wicked heart. This verse is quoted in the Zadokite Documents of the age of the Dead Sea literature (see Introd. under Authorship). Toy, representing the older 'liberals,' remarks that sacrifices are mentioned in Proverbs only here and in 7:14; 17:1; 21:3,27, and always with disapprobation (but see also 3:9). He sees here a contrast between the prophetic religion, which called for morality, and the priestly emphasis on ritual. He cites the Sermon on the Mount as part of the prophetic movement, which he sees also in Amos 5:22; Isa 1:11; Jer 7:22; I Sam 15:22; and others. Happily, this one-sided reconstruction of Israel's religion, with its perversion of such texts, is no longer fashionable. Of course the prophets opposed idolatrous sacrifices (Jer 7:18; Amos 4:4, 5; and others) and sacrifice offered in disobedience; but they did not oppose true sacrifice. Indeed, Isaiah calls the coming suffering Servant a "sin offering" (Isa 53:10). Unfortunately the newer 'liberalism' of the so-called Swedish school goes off on another tangent: It indeed unites the prophets and priests, but makes them together the devotees of the Babylonian New Year cult.

11. Hell and destruction are before the Lord. Observe how this verse is connected with, "The eyes of the Lord are in every place" (15:3) and "The ways of man are before the eyes of the Lord" (5:21). Destruction (Abaddon) is paralleled with Sheol here and in 27:20 and Job 26:6. It is paralleled with "death" in Job 28:22 and with "grave" in Ps 88:11. Elsewhere it is used only in Job 31:12 and Rev 9:11. Its root means perish, die (BDB). Delitzsch falls prey to the common tendency of scholars to interpret Sheol and Abaddon by the Greek Tartarus and Hades. This is fallacious, for the Greek and Hebrew conceptions of the afterlife were as different as their deities. These words do not designate the realm of the dead nor place it in a subterranean cavern. They are simply poetic words for the grave, which, of course, is underground. For Sheol, see notes on 1:12 and 2:18.

12. Scorner. A sinner. See notes on 1:22. 13. A merry heart. A happy heart. Similar to 17:22. This is a secular proverb used apparently as a foil for the next one, regarding "an understanding heart," i.e., a heart of integrity (cf. 12:25). 17. A stalled ox. An ox in his stall, a fattened ox (RSV, Berkeley). Verses 16 to 18 go together as proverbs against anger. Verse 18a parallels 29:22a.

20. A wise son. See comments on 10:1.

24. Hell beneath. For Sheol, see notes on 1:12 and 2:18. The blessing of the good man saves from premature death. Toy takes it that the wise man is preserved from premature descent to the underworld. Delitzsch makes it a contrast between heaven above and Sheol for the ungodly, in a development of the doctrine of the future life. It is simpler to take it as life versus death.

B. Proverbs Largely Parallel. 16:1–22:16.

16:2. Clean in his own eyes. The same thought appears in 14:12 and 16:25. This verse makes it more explicit that the Lord is the true Judge. The same, with variations, occurs in 21:2. 3. Commit thy works. This wording is very similar to that of Ps 37:5. And Ps 37:1 is distinctly parallel with Prov 24:19.

4. Even the wicked for the day of evil. This verse has been appealed to in support of an extreme Calvinism. Delitzsch comments that "the wickedness of free agents is contemplated in this plan," but he does not take the verse in the sense of a predestination to evil, which careful Calvinists do not hold. Calvin himself, according to Delitzsch, asserted that predestination to evil would be a "horrible dogma." But in the Bible divine sovereignty is taught side by side with free agency. The celebrated verse, "I make peace and create evil" (Isa 45:7), clearly does not mean moral evil, but calamity. 5. Proud in heart. Note the interconnection of verses against pride: the haughty spirit and pride before destruction (16:18); pride before destruction, and before honor, humility (18:12); before honor, humility (15:33); all pride is an abomination to the Lord (16:5; cf. also 11:20a).

8. A little with righteousness. See 15:16, 17 for similar wording.

10. A divine sentence. Verses 10-15 point out various duties and functions of kings (Greenstone). The passage begins with an interesting verse that must have pleased King James I in 1611! But the word qesem, divine sentence, is nowhere else used in a good sense! It means basically divination, or oracle (LXX). Inspired decisions (RSV) and godly decision (Berkeley) are too grandiose to fit the Hebrew. Delitzsch reminds us that Israel never thought her kings infallible. The proverb of verse 10 means that true judgment is the duty of kings. That duty is specified and limited in 16:12,13. 11. A just weight. See exegesis of 11:1. 15. His favour. The word carries on the idea of 16:13, where the king's delight (the same word) is said to be righteous lips.

16. Better . . . than gold. Cf. 8:10, 11. 18. Pride . . . before destruction. See note on verse 5.

21. Increaseth learning. Verse 21 b is parallel to 23 b in a conscious association. Evidently the Hebrew sages loved this repetition with artistic variation. 22. Wellspring of life. For 22 a, cf. 10:11; 13:14; 14:27. For 22 b, cf. 14:24.

25. A way that seemeth right. Verbatim with 14:12. Cf. 16:2. 28. A whisperer. Compare 17:9; 18:8 (which is the same as 26:22). On talebearing, see exegesis of 20:19. As 16:28 a shows, a whisperer is not merely one who whispers secrets but a "perverse" man (RSV and Berkeley) who "sows discord" (cf. 6:14,19).

31. Crown of glory. The young have strength for their glory (20:29), and the aged have gray hairs. But this verse makes explicit the condition for the glory of the aged—righteousness. 33. The lot is cast. Greenstone rightly concludes (versus Toy and Delitzsch) that this is not a special sanction of lots to determine matters, much less to determine the divine will. It is merely a declaration that the lot—the most capricious of human acts—is controlled by the all-powerful God.

17:1. A house full of sacrifices. Plenty to eat. A large part of the peace offering was eaten by the worshiper. See notes on 7:14. 2. A son that causeth shame. See also 19:26; 29:15. A wise servant, i.e., an upright one, will dispossess a wicked son. Toy interprets this in a purely secular way, entitling it, "Cleverness succeeds"!

3. The fining pot. The crucible used in refining. 5. Whoso mocketh the poor. Compare 14:31 a, which is very similar, and notes on 19:17. 6. The crown of old men. See notes on 16:31.

8. A gift. Hebrew, a bribe. That bribes are effective is here given as common knowledge (cf. 18:16; 21:14). But the author does not stop there; he condemns their use (17:23). 9. Covereth a transgression. For a truth similar to this, see 10:12. See 16:28 and the exegesis of 20:19 for the truth of 9 b. A good example of the interlocking of distant verses in Proverbs.

12. A bear robbed of her whelps. The same figure is used in Hos 13:8. In Proverbs there are not as many illustrations from nature as we might expect. 13. Evil for good. Most commentators take this as showing that Proverbs warns merely against ingratitude. But even evil for evil is also condemned (see 20:22; 25:21,22, quoted in Rom 12:20). 18. Becometh surety. See exegesis of 6:1.

21. The father of a fool. See exegesis of 10:1 and compare 17:25 for this word "fool" (Heb. nābāl; hence Nabal, I Sam 25:25). In Proverbs it is found only here and in 17:7; 30:22. It is one of the many synonyms for "fool." As in Ps 14:1, it does not mean mere stupidity. Psalm 14:1 means, "The rascal hath said in his heart, 'There is no God.'" 22. A merry heart. Note similarity to 15:13. In this verse also there is a catchword, similar to one in the preceding verse.

23. A gift. That is, a bribe (cf. v. 8). 25. A foolish son. Cf. 17:21 and see notes on 10:1. Verses 21, 25 both use the word kesîl, "fool," in their first part, but show artistic variation in the second half. 27. Excellent spirit. Better, calm spirit (Berkeley and Delitzsch). We may question Toy's dictum that 17:27,28 merely teaches the "value of silence." Rather, as Delitzsch shows and the words understanding and fool ('ewîl, "rascal") emphasize, the teaching is against angry talk.

18:1. Separated. This verse is somewhat difficult to understand in detail. Hence, it has been given some strained interpretations. Delitzsch takes the first part of the verse as a condemnation of the "schismatic and the sectary," i.e., of dissenting churchmen, in the modern sense of the term. Hillel, also, according to Greenstone, took it to condemn religious separatism. But this interpretation is unnecessary and disagrees with other Scripture. Paul separated himself from the Pharisees (Acts 19:9) in a way that was surely justified. Obviously, this verse has nothing to do with such questions. The separated is the one wrongfully separated from God, seeking his own desire, not the Lord's. Such a man is a sinner. 4. Deep waters. For 4 a, compare 20:5 a. 5. To accept the person of the wicked. To show partiality in judgment. Cf. 17:15,16; 24:23; 28:21; Deut 1:17; 16:19; et al. 8. Talebearer. Parallel to 26:22. See note on 20:19. Wounds. Used only in these verses. Most modern versions say dainty morsels, but the evidence for the reading is slight.

11. A high wall. This term is from the same root as for "safe" in verse 10. This proverb offers a contrast to that in 10, which gives the secret of true safety. A rich man is safe only "in his own imagination." The RSV derives its reading from a different root and thus misses the connection with 18:10. Verse 11 a is parallel to 10:15 a. 12. Before destruction. Note the similarity between 18:12 a and 16:18 a; between 18:12 b and 15:33 b. See notes on 16:5. 20. The fruit of his mouth. This verse speaks not of food, but of speech, and warns about what Jones and Walls call the "lethal power of the tongue"!

22. A wife. The LXX supplies a good wife, which is understood from 12:4 and 31:10, but need not be expressed.

19:1. Better is the poor. Observe that 19:1 a is identical with 28:6 a. The contrast in 19:1 is with a perverse man, a fool. In 28:6, the contrast is with a perverse rich man. Not riches per se are condemned, but riches with wickedness. 3. Fretteth against the Lord. The Hebrew verb means be angry or vexed. Berkeley resentful is good. The LXX says blames God. 4. Wealth maketh many friends. Note the similarity to 14:20. Here the thought is elaborated in 19:6,7. See comments on 17:8,23. The fact of the influence of wealth is stated here, but not approved of; elsewhere the evil use of gifts is condemned. 5. A lying witness. Almost identical with 19:9.

10. Delight. Better luxury (as in most versions). 11. Discretion. The word sēkel refers to wisdom, but that moral wisdom which Proverbs commends. Prudent (Berkeley) is better than good sense (RSV). Deferreth . . . anger. The phrase means to restrain anger, be slow to anger. The noun in Ex 34:6 is "longsuffering."

13. The contentions of a wife. Such proverbs on the contentious woman sometimes evoke humor. The verses of similar wording are 21:19; 25:24; and 27:15. The AV gives the impression that the continual drip of a leaky roof is like a nagging woman. But the Hebrew word for contentions does not mean nagging. The sin objected to is clearly anger. The same root is used for "discord" (cf. 6:14, 19). Much is said against anger in men. These verses protest against the same vice in women. 14. Prudent. Same root as "delight" in 19:10. 15. Slothfulness. See notes on 6:6.

17. He that hath pity upon the poor. He that is charitable. Proverbs 14:31 a is similar. Charity for the poor is earnestly enjoined in Hebrew law (Deut 15:7 ff.). Many verses in Proverbs recommend this liberality (21:13; 22:9,16; 28:3,8,27; 29:7). The usurer, on the other hand, is condemned because he oppresses the poor (cf. on 6:1).

18. Chasten thy son. See comments on 13:24; 23:13,14. The word his crying is derived from the root hāmâ, to "murmur," "roar." The word can also be read as from the root mût, "to kill." Toy translates, Set not thy heart on his destruction, and is followed by Greenstone, the RSV, Berkeley, and others. Delitzsch is similar. The Hebrew literally is unto his crying (or his death) do not lift up thy soul. The AV translation still seems closer than the others to the Hebrew wording and context. But as the parallel in 23:14 speaks of chastisement as saving the child from death, so perhaps, in compressed expression, this proverb means the same: "Don't avoid chastening and [thus] bring on his death."

24. A slothful man. The proverb of 24 a is repeated in 26:15 in a series dealing with sloth. 26. A son that causeth shame. See notes on 10:1, and compare 29:15, which repeats this phrase. 27. Instruction that causeth to err. The words that causeth are not in the Hebrew, and Proverbs does not use this word instruction of false teaching. Therefore the RSV and the Berkeley correctly take the proverb to mean hearing instruction "only to stray" from it.

20:1. Wine is a mocker. See the commentary on 3:10 on wine. Strong drink. Hebrew, shēkār. The exact meaning is uncertain. It was not strong drink in our sense of the word; for before distillation was invented by the Arabs, no drink was stronger than about 7-10 per cent. It was intoxicating, as the Scriptural context frequently shows. Toy and Berkeley (footnote) suggest that it may have been a drink fermented from fruit juices. The writer of the article on "drink" in ISBE argues that shēkār is the term comprehending all such beverages, including wine. This is argued from Num 28:7,14. The term may at least have included beer. We know that beer was made and used in Palestine, for pottery used for straining beer has been found. No word in Hebrew appears to refer to beer specifically. Wine was forbidden to ministering priests (Lev 10:9) and Nazarites (Num 6:3). It was used as a drink offering, but this was not drunk. "Libation offering" would be more accurate. The word for mocker is lēṣ, "scorner." As Delitzsch says, the wine is condemned with its effects. We may notice that the condemnation is rather severe. Deceived thereby. The word usually means "err" or "lead astray." The BDB argues that it means also "reel" in drunkenness. However, the only evidence for that is Isa 28:7, where the word is used in reference to "erring" through wine and also "erring" in vision. It should not be limited to getting drunk, as Berkeley implies. The passage concerns any use of wine, because of its final effects. The LXX says, But every fool is entangled with them. See comments on 23:29 ff.

2. The fear of a king. On kings, see 16:10 ff. and 20:8.

4. By reason of the cold. The word does not mean "cold" so much as "fall" or "winter." He does not plow in plowing season. Cf. 10:5. Diligence is a virtue. Note the apostolic rule in II Thess 3:10. 5. Deep water. Compare the similar verse, 18:4. 6. His own goodness. The word ḥesed means "goodness," "kindness" (BDB), not "loyalty" (RSV). The BV here and the RSV often elsewhere have "steadfast love," which is more curious and strange than wrong. The word includes love, but the steadfastness found in some contexts is due to the steadfastness of the God who loves.

8. A king. See 20:2.

10. Divers weights. Diverse, differing weights. See notes on 11:1. 13. Love not sleep. On industry, see 6:9-11. 16. Surety. This verse is identical with 27:13. On sureties, see notes on 6:1.

19. A talebearer. Hebrew, rākîl. Proverbs 20:19a parallels 11:13a. Proverbs 20:19 b explains the meaning: "Do not go with one of deceiving lips" (read "deceive," not "flatter," for the Hebrew pātâ). Rākîl elsewhere is translated slander. Leviticus 19:16 condemns it. But a talebearer is not what children call a "tattletale." Another word, nirgān, is used in 16:28; 18:8 (which parallels 26:22); 26:20. Here, too, the emphasis is not on tattling, but on spreading slander and discord. 20. Curseth his father. A capital offense (Ex 21:17; Lev 20:9). Varying degrees of cursing and filial rebellion were recognized. Doubtless capital punishment was exacted only in extreme cases. But the divine attitude toward the offense is given here and in 30:11 (note context). Obscure darkness. The word means pupil of the eye, as a symbol for blackness or for the middle of the night. 22. Recompense evil. The principle set forth here is reinforced in 25:21,22, quoted in Rom 12:20. 23. Divers weights. Compare verse 10 and see notes on 11:1.

24. Man's goings are of the Lord. The first part of 20:24 is identical with the first part of the more famous verse, Ps 37:23. As Ps 37:1 is also echoed in Prov 24:19, we need not hesitate to call these proverbs quotations (note other quotations in 30:5,6). 26. Scattereth the wicked. Note the similarity to 20:8 b. Literally, winnows the wicked. Bringeth the wheel over them. The word wheel is often used elsewhere, but its use in punishment is unknown. It may be figurative here. Just as a man winnows grain and brings the threshing wheel over it, so a king punishes evil. 29. The grey head. See exegesis of 16:31. 30. The blueness of a wound. Better, blows of bruising, i.e., that bruise. These cure a man of evil. Stripes . . . the inward parts. It is not that stripes reach the inward parts (Berkeley). Rather, the stripes, like the blows, cleanse the inner man (same phrase as in 27 b).

21:2. Right in his own eyes. Almost identical with 16:2. 3. More acceptable . . . than sacrifice. The thought is that of I Sam 15:22, but the wording varies somewhat. On sacrifices, see Prov 15:8.

9. Brawling woman. Parallel to 25:24. Actually, anger is the sin condemned. A wide house. Apparently a storehouse or granary according to Ugaritic evidence (Story, op. cit., p. 325). 10. The wicked. There is a play on words. In Hebrew, "wicked" and "neighbor" sound alike. 12. Wisely considereth. A verse difficult in detail. The AV supplies "God" as subject of the second half. The BV makes the second half passive. Neither treatment is fully justified by the text. Perhaps it would help to divide the verse differently: "The righteous act wisely at home; wickedness overthrows the wicked in ruin." This involves adding a vowel for "wickedness."

13. The cry of the poor. See exegesis of 19:17. 14. A reward in the bosom. A bribe. See notes on 17:8. 16. The congregation of the dead. The word is repā'îm, "shades," according to Toy (also Berkeley, n.). The idea is certainly not that the wicked "find rest" (Berkeley), but that they "dwell" or "lie down" (Delitzsch). The phrase, assembly of the dead, says nothing of the state of existence of their souls. It refers merely to their lying in the grave. See exegesis of 2:18.

18. A ransom for the righteous. An unusual thought and unusual use of ran- som. The LXX has offscouring, evidently interpreting the verse to mean that the wicked are but refuse in contrast to the righteous. The general sense of the verse is that the bad and not the good suffer judgment (Toy). In Isa 43:3,4 the word is used of God's judgment on Egypt in order to deliver Israel.

19. A contentious . . . woman. See comments on 19:13. 27. The sacrifice of the wicked. Verse 27 a is parallel with 15:8 a, which see. 28. A false witness. Parallel to 19:9 b.

22:1. A good name. Not just reputation in our sense of good name, but good character. 3. A prudent man. This verse is identical with 27:12. 4. By humility. That is, the consequence of humility and the fear of the Lord. Cf. the triad in 21:21.

5. The froward. The crooked, perverse. 6. Train up a child. Not a common word for "educate," but the meaning is clear and the promise a rich one.

7. The rich ruleth over the poor. With 22:1,2 in mind, we see that this clause states a fact, but does not approve of it. Possibly the verse is another warning against borrowing with usury: "As surely as the rich rule over the poor, so the borrower is servant . . ." See exegesis of 6:1, on usury. 8. The rod of his anger shall fail. The LXX here adds a couplet, "God blesses a cheerful and liberal man, but the folly of his works he shall punish." Possibly II Cor 9:7 alludes to the first half of this verse, but of that we cannot be sure. We need not suppose a different Hebrew text, though that would not be impossible.

14. Strange women. The parallel verse, 23:27, shows that loose women are meant (so RSV).

15. Folly . . . in the heart of a child. As we have seen, folly is not just "stupid tricks, silly sport" (Delitzsch), for which indeed we should not whip our children. Nor does the verse say they are "morally immature" (Toy). It says they are sinners and need punishment. The current theories that children are not naturally bad, but only maladjusted, and that education should lead them to self-expression, find no support in Proverbs.

16. He that giveth to the rich. Giving bribes or gifts is condemned (see notes on 17:8,23). Oppressing the poor is often condemned in Scripture, but giving to the poor is commended in 28:27.

III. The Words of the Wise, Thirty Sayings. 22:17–24:22.

The previous section, 10:1–22:16, had the heading, "The Proverbs of Solomon." It was composed almost exclusively of two-part verses. The present section is composed of longer units, often four-part stanzas, or "tetrastichs" (e.g., vv. 23,23). It is not accurate to say, with Oesterley and Fritsch, that at 22:17 the LXX has the heading, "The Words of the Wise," for in the Greek, "Words" is in the dative case, whereas in a heading it would be in the nominative case. The LXX translation is a bit free, but is substantially like the Hebrew except that it includes two words of verse 18 in 17. The phrase, "Words of the Wise," found in both Greek and Hebrew, does, however, suitably chracterize this section.

A. Sayings Paralleled in Egyptian Wisdom. 22:17–23:12. The parallels in this section to the Wisdom of Amen-em-Opet are taken from ANET and may conveniently be located by reference to the table at the bottom of p. 424 in that work. (For a discussion of these parallels and their significance, see Introd., Proverbs and Other Wisdom Literature.)

17. Bow down thine ear. The similarity between this verse and the introduction of the Egyptian composition has been much emphasized. But the expressions, "Give ear," "Listen to the words of wisdom," are quite general and are found elsewhere in Psalms and Proverbs.

18. They shall withal be fitted in thy lips. Oesterley and Fritsch hold that the word withal, or altogether, does not make sense. They suggest the translation, peg, because the Egyptian parallel in Amen-em-Opet has an obscure word which may mean that. But the word "peg" hardly fits better than "altogether." There is no good reason for alteration. The LXX has hama, "together." 19. Even to thee. Toy and Oesterley object to these words as redundant. But we must not judge the Hebrew by our ideas of redundancy. Greenstone quotes Prov 23:15 and I Kgs 21:19 for very similar phraseology.

20. Excellent things. Older commentators and BDB struggled with this word, which comes from a root for three. It is used elsewhere only in the phrase, yesterday three days, meaning "formerly." The slight alteration of the vowels suggested by the Egyptian evidence (see Introd., Proverbs and Other Wisdom Literature) to read thirty is a happy solution. The word, then, is used to refer to the thirty proverbs following in this section. Toy suggests that the mention of writing in this verse is unusual in Proverbs and points toward a late date. Oesterley, arguing for dependence on the Egyptian writing, concludes the opposite! 21. That thou mightest answer the words of truth. Oesterley compares this with the Egyptian, "to direct a report to one who has sent him," referring it to the proper delivery of a message. But the following verses are not instructions for messenger boys! Indeed, even the Egyptian is obviously of deeper meaning, for it goes on: "in order to direct him to the ways of life." The Hebrew uses a plural—"to the ones sending thee." The LXX probably has the right meaning: "Answer words of truth to them that question thee" (cf. I Pet 3:15).

23. The Lord will plead their cause. This has no parallel in Amen-em-Opet. The Egyptian, after all, gives only common sense dicta of morality. Proverbs absorbs these dicta from many sources and makes them the background of its divine instruction.

24. An angry man . . . a furious man. Literally, an owner of anger . . . a man of wrath. In 29:22 the phraseology is similar, but reversed: "A man of anger . . . an owner of wrath." The Egyptian parallel is: "Do not associate to thyself the heated man nor visit him for conversation." Several times Amen-em-Opet contrasts the "heated" man with the "silent" man; i.e., the impulsive versus the humbly pious (ANET, p. 422, n. 7). 25. Lest thou learn his ways. The alleged Egyptian parallel, "Lest a terror carry thee off," is not impressive.

26. That strike hands. No parallel is alleged for 22:26,27. On the dangers of suretyship, see notes on 6:1.

28. Remove not the ancient landmark. The Egyptian says, "Do not carry off the landmark at the boundaries of the arable land . . . nor encroach upon the boundaries of a widow." Removing landmarks meant falsifying the survey and stealing land (cf. Deut 19:14 and 27:17). This verse does not teach veneration for historical markers, but respect of property rights. The Egyptian proverb is similar but peculiarly adapted to the Nile Valley. Some have argued (Toy, pp. viii) that repetition of a proverb argues for two collections, since one author would not repeat himself. However, in this collection of the "thirty" this proverb occurs a second time, but with a variant ending (23:10). Interestingly, Amen-em-Opet (in the English) also has a repetition of three lines of text (ANET, p. 422, col. 2; p. 423, col. 2). Since such repetition was apparently purposive, it cannot be used to prove that there were two authors. Cf. Introd., Collections in Proverbs.

29. A man diligent in his business. Because the Egyptian says, "The scribe who is experienced in his office, he will find himself worthy to be a courtier," and because the word diligent is sometimes associated in the OT with scribes, Oesterley and Fritsch assume that a scribe is meant here. But there is no warrant for this limitation. The Egyptians in Amen-em-Opet and elsewhere ("In Praise of Learned Scribes," ANET, pp. 432, 434) glorified the work of scribes as a profession superior to all others. The Hebrew exalts diligence in any work.

23:1. To eat with a ruler. It seems superficial to say, with Fritsch and Oesterley, that this concerns good table manners. Rather, it concerns one's relation to royalty. It enjoins fear and caution before a king. The point is that the king's table is not for mere surfeiting, but for conference. We get a picture of a king's feast accompanied by discussion in the Letter of Aristeas, lines 236-274 (R. H. Charles, The Apocrypha and Pseudepigrapha of the Old Testament, II, 117, 118), where the Jewish envoys to Ptolemy are tested with questions by the king at table. The parallel from Amen-em-Opet reads, "Eat not bread in the presence of a ruler . . . look upon the dish that is before thee." The differences are as great as the similarity. In Proverbs the attitude toward the king (cf. also 25:6,7) is the backdrop for the warning of 23:4,5 against seeking uncertain riches, power, or advancement. 2. Knife to thy throat. Threaten your appetite with death. 5. Set thine eyes. Literally, if you make your eyes fly after riches, they in turn fly away. The alleged Egyptian parallel refers to riches acquired by robbery.

6. An evil eye. Not an eye of evil enchantment as used in superstition. The LXX already erred in this fashion. The phrase occurs in 28:22, which does not greatly clarify, but Greenstone, Toy, and Delitzsch compare 23:6 with 22:9, where the "good of eye" refers to a bountiful man. So here the RSV is correct, the stingy man. The Egyptian parallel is only approximate. Do not desire his dainties. Repeated from 23:3. It should be cut out from verse 3, say Toy and Oesterley, but there is no warrant for its excision. 8. Lose thy sweet words. Cf. verse 9. The "fool" will despise the wisdom of thy words. This parallel assists in identifying the "fool" of 23:9 with the stingy man of verses 6,7.

10. The old landmark. See 22:28. Here end the parallels to Amen-em-Opet.

B. Sayings with No Parallel in Egyptian. 23:13—24:22. Curiously the alleged parallels with the Egyptian stop suddenly, and the last two-thirds of this section of the "thirty" has but one alleged parallel with the thirty chapters of the Egyptian work.

12. Apply thine heart. A new subdivision of the "thirty" is hinted at by these words (cf. the heading of 22:17).

13. Withhold not correction. On the use of the rod, see exegesis of 13:24. 14. Deliver his soul from hell. This translation of the AV is too specific. The word soul very often means simply the person (cf. Ps 107:9 and many other instances in concordances). The word Sheol may mean and often does mean simply the grave (see Gen 42:38; Isa 14:11; and comment on Prov 1:12; 2:18). The parallel expression of 23:13 is "he shall not die." The verse likely does not mean that beating will save the child's soul (Greenstone), but that it will be spiritually beneficial and save him from untimely death (Delitzsch, Toy). Oesterley makes the very interesting observation that this proverb has a parallel in the sayings of Ahikar. But in form, the saying is more like 23:14 in the Elephantine copy of Ahikar than in other copies, which presumably give Babylonian originals. He concludes that the Jews in Egypt modeled their Ahikar after this verse in Proverbs. This section of Proverbs therefore goes back farther than the fifth century (cf. Introd., Proverbs and Other Wisdom Literature).

15. My son. A new subsection characterized by longer treatment of topics. 16. My reins. Literally, kidneys. The Hebrew language used the kidneys and liver as psychological terms very much as we use the "heart." The Hebrew "heart" more closely approximates our word "mind."

20. Be not among winebibbers. The word sābā' occurs only here and in Deut 21:20; Isa 56:12; Nah 1:10. Winebibber is not an exact rendering. The word refers not so much to a man's drinking habitually, as to his drinking strong drink (Isa 56:12). Delitzsch defines as "to drink wine or other intoxicating drinks." 21. Glutton. There seems to be no justification for this translation. The word is used elsewhere in Deut 21:20; Prov 23:20; 28:7; Lam 1:8,11; Jer 15:19; and a derivative is used in Ps 12:8. In five of these cases eating of food is not even suggested by the context. The basic meaning is to be "light," "worthless." It refers more to the riotous nature of a feast than to overeating (cf. Prov 23:20). Apparently overeating per se is not condemned at all.

26-28. My son, give me thine heart. A solemn call to the attention of the hearer. Cf. Prov 5; 7; 9 for condemnation of adultery.

29. Who hath woe . . . sorrow? This section seems to be not just a condemnation of excessive drinking, but an exhortation to avoid drink because of its final fatal consequences. Cf. commentary on 3:10, where a nonintoxicating drink is mentioned. 30. Tarry long. One word, actually, derived from the common preposition "after." It means "remain behind." It is used in Ps 127:2 to mean "stay up late" in anxiety. It is used in Isa 5:11 in a passage similar to ours to refer to staying up late at night to drink. What an old and common tragedy! Mixed wine. See notes on 9:2. 31. Giveth his colour in the cup. Emphasis upon the allurements of the drink. Literally, gives its eye. RSV, sparkles. Moveth itself aright. Literally, goes straight. RSV, goes down smoothly.

32. At the last. Emphatic condemnation. "Look not" (v. 31), because of the eventual consequences. You will not slide downhill if you never start down the grade! How forceful is the comparison to a serpent's venom, and how apt! Does the author appear to imply that a little is all right, but you must not go too far? That is not our attitude toward a serpent's venom. Stingeth. The meaning of the Hebrew word is uncertain, but the translation "sting" is not appropriate to a snake's bite. This same word is used of a snake's bite in Ugaritic (Story, op. cit., p. 326).

33. Strange women. Not strange things, as in the RSV. The word is used in Prov 2:16; 5:3,20; 7:5; 22:14, always of harlots. We have the tragic accompaniments and consequences of drink—immorality, insensibility, irresponsibility. It is not importing extraneous thoughts to remark that not a word is said here of allowance of moderate drinking. Nor can the words from Prov 31:4-7 be fairly alleged for this. That passage mentions excessive drinking to drug the deeply unfortunate. It probably does not excuse such conduct, but only contrasts the situation of a king with that of a criminal: "Others do this; you can not afford to."

If this is the conclusion of Proverbs, how much more careful should we be in our day. The wine and strong drink of Biblical times were more like our light wines and beer. The people had no distillation and so could not make strong liquors. In our day, social drinking much more easily turns into alcoholism. Also, in a mechanized age a single drink can have far worse consequences for others than 23:35 suggests. Why, therefore, should so many cling to a practice that rapidly enslaves and so frequently degrades? Why can not drinking be just as sociable with soft drinks? Or, if the escape provided by alcohol constitutes the value of the social glass, is not the desire to "escape" already the incipient drunkenness against which our author contends? Ecclesiasticus, one of the apocryphal books accepted by Roman Catholics, but not by Protestants, has a differing treatment denouncing drunkenness, but expressly allowing moderate drinking (Ecclesiasticus 31:25-30).

24:1-3. Through wisdom is an house builded. In this portion and the verses following, the thoughts are similar to some in the first section, 1:1–9:18. This may indicate some dependence (cf. 9:1). 5. A wise man is strong. The LXX, Syriac, and Targum say is better than a strong man, which is smoother (RSV reading is similar). 7. Too high for a fool. In 24:7-9 folly and sin appear again as the standard proverbial contrast to wisdom.

10. Thy strength is small. This involves a play on the words ṣārâ, "adversity," and ṣar, "small," "compressed." 12. Doth not he know. Probably this verse joins with the preceding and exposes the flimsy excuses of mortals. The verses insist that we are our brother's keepers. Shall not he render. The thought resembles that of Ps 62:12, but the wording is not identical. It reappears in Mt 16:27.

13. My son. Another subsection of this division of the "thirty." 14. Thy expectation. Cf. 23:18.

17. When thine enemy falleth. The same thought as in 17:5. Oesterley and Fritsch object to the last thought of 24:18 –that if we rejoice not, the Lord will continue to punish our enemies; otherwise he will spare them! Toy, Delitzsch, and Greenstone do not take so strict a view. A similarly strict treatment of Rom 12:20 (quoted from Prov 25:21,22) would have us feed our enemies in order to condemn them more severely! Rather, these expressions give results in such matters, not purposes. 19. Fret not thyself. This verse is identical with Ps 37:1 except for the last word. For other quotations, see 30:5.

IV. The Words of the Wise, Appendix. 24:23-34.

The main reason for calling this a separate section is that with 24:22, the "thirty sayings" come to an end. Toy and Delitzsch, who wrote before the section of the "thirty" was suggested, speak of this section as an appendix or supplement to that portion, as indeed it probably is. The material is not greatly different. The LXX inserts 30:1-14 before this section.

23. Respect of persons. Cf. 18:5.

26. Kiss his lips. Fritsch, Oesterley, and others remark that kissing the lips is not elsewhere mentioned in the OT. Toy thought the custom came from the Persians. Another argument from silence! It is definitely mentioned in Ugaritic (C. H. Gordon, Ugaritic Literature, p. 60).

29. As he hath done to me. This is really a statement of the golden rule (Lk 6:31). It is finely expressed here, but also elsewhere (20:22; 17:13; 25:21, 22). This high ethical principle is not opposed to the Mosaic legislation of an "eye for [an] eye" (Ex 21:24; Lev 24:20; Deut 19:21). This particular Mosaic law was for judges, and it required that the penalty fit the crime. It was probably not intended to be executed literally, and we have no cases of its literal application in the OT. It was and is a principle of justice. Christ (in Mt 5:38) did not contradict this principle of OT law, but did object to the Pharisaic interpretation which allowed a vengeful attitude (see the author's Inspiration and Canonicity of the Bible, pp. 50-52). There are parallels to this 24:29 in the Babylonian Counsels of Wisdom (ANET, p. 427). After all, it is not the ethics of Christianity that is unique—God has given all men consciences. The ethics of Christianity is the highest, but the unique element is redemption.

30-34. The field of the slothful. See comment on 6:6-11. The last verses of the two sections are practically identical.

V. Proverbs of Solomon, Edited by Hezekiah's Men. 25:1–29:27.

The LXX inserts 30:15–31:9 before this section. 1. The meaning of the heading is obscure. It begins like the headings in 1:1; 10:1, except that these also reminds us of 24:23. But what did the men of Hezekiah do? Collect, or edit, or recopy? The verb "to copy out" means "to be old" or "to remove." Oesterley and Fritsch claim that the meaning "copy out" is very late. True, it is used in post-biblical times, but our evidence regarding literary activity is not full enough to deny it to earlier times as well. Toy says the reference to Hezekiah has no more value than the titles of the Psalms or headings of the prophetical books! We may add, no less value either. Oesterley quotes the Talmudic tradition that Hezekiah edited Proverbs and Ecclesiastes. He explains away the tradition by asserting that it arose because Hezekiah had a prominent scribe, Shebna, at court! (Isa 37:2) Oesterley forgets that other kings—likely all kings—had scribes (II Sam 8:17; I Kgs 4:3) whose duties were apparently military more than literary. They mustered the army. It is safer just to take this heading at its face value. It appears in the LXX and therefore is older, at least, than 200 B.C.

2-7. Honour of kings. A short section on kings. Note in verses 2 and 3 the repetition of the catchwords translated search out and unsearchable. Also in verses 4 and 5 the secular proverb on refining is tied with moral maxim by the repetition of take away. The ideal king is established in righteousness. Fritsch remarks that the reference to kings argues for a pre-Exilic date.

11,12. A word fitly spoken. The figure of speech is difficult to interpret because our vocabulary of Hebrew fruits is not extensive. Delitzsch says apples of gold are oranges; Toy says quinces. More important, the word fitly spoken of verse 11 is equal to the wise reprover of verse 12. 13. As the cold of snow. Another beautiful comparison. But it does not mean a snowfall in harvest (Mar.–Sept.), which did not happen and would have been disastrous. It refers to a cool drink from the snowy mountains or a cooling trip to them.

15. Breaketh the bone. Softness accomplishes hard things if you have patience.

16,17. From thy neighbor's house. Verse 16 serves as a backdrop to 17. The two verses are tied together by the verbs be filled and be weary, which in Hebrew are the same. 18. False witness. The words of 18a quote the ninth commandment. For other quotations, see 30:5.

20. Vinegar upon nitre. The chemistry is simple and interesting. Nitre is the old English for "soda," which was collected from the alkali lakes of Egypt. It was called "natron" in Egyptian. The reaction causes carbon dioxide gas to bubble up violently. The simile does not emphasize "cheering," as Oesterley says, but rather violence. The RSV follows the LXX "wound," but likely the LXX misunderstood the chemistry. The RSV footnote strangely says, "Heb. lye." This would fit neither the chemistry nor the vocabulary. Egyptian natron was a prominent source of soda until Napoleon, noting its value in his Egyptian campaign, offered a prize for its industrial synthesis. 21,22. Thine enemy. See notes on 24:17. Quoted in Rom 12:20 in the LXX form, which closely follows the Hebrew.

24. Brawling woman. Parallel to 21:9. A woman of discord. See notes on 19:13.

26. Righteous man falling. The Hebrew verb means to be moved. Delitzsch, Oesterley, and Fritsch rightly take it to refer to moral defection.

27. To search their own glory. The verse is hard to understand, though the words as they stand are not difficult. Most writers say the verse is hopelessly corrupt and makes no sense (Fritsch, Oesterley, and Toy). It is about as logical to say that there is an idiom concealed in the compressed expression which escapes us. Greenstone follows the AV. Delitzsch changes some vowels to get, to search difficult things is honour. 28. No rule over his own spirit. Very similar to 16:32.

26:1. A fool. Verses 1-12 constitute a subsection on the subject of fools. See exegesis of 10:8. Moral folly is intended. 4,5. Answer not a fool. A famous case of apparent contradiction, not real. The balance is due to the artistic contrast of proverbs, not to a mistake. In one sense you should answer a rascal; in another sense, not. These verses caused some early Jewish rabbis to question the canonicity of Proverbs! More sober minds saw through the difficulty. 7. Not equal. Better, hang down, be useless. 8. A sling. Not the usual word for "sling." Perhaps:

"like one who puts stones in a heap."

10. The great God that formed all. All commentaries admit the difficulty of this verse. The LXX departs widely. "God" is not in the Hebrew. Formed can have several meanings, among which a common one is "pierce." The great is read archer by the RSV, which is possible, but arrow is equally possible (cf. Job 16:13). A possibility is, "An arrow pierces all; so is one who rewards a fool and a transgressor." 11. As a dog returneth to his vomit. Quoted in II Pet 2:22. 12. A man wise in his own eyes. This attitude of pride is repeatedly denominated sin (3:7; 26:5,16; 28:11). It is even possible that this is a climax line after the whole discussion of a fool; i.e., a man of pride is worse.

13-16. The slothful man. See comments on 6:6. 15. Hideth his hand. Practically identical with 19:24.

17. Meddleth with strife. The Hebrew text has 'obēr mit'abbēr, "passing by and vexing oneself." The AV, following the Syriac and Vulgate, reads as if the word were mit'ārēb. Likely Delitzsch is right in making the "passing by" refer to the dog (so also Oesterley). "Like one taking a passing dog by the ears" is one who vexes himself in another's lawsuit.

22. Talebearer. This verse is like 18:8. See comments on 20:19. 23. Silver dross. A new word for pottery glaze found in the Ugaritic literature explains this verse. The two words "silver dross," kesep sìgìm should be one word, "like glaze," with the consonants kspsg (cf. H. L. Ginsberg, "The North Canaanite Myth of Anath and Aqhat," BASOR, No. 98 (April, 1945), p. 21, and W. F. Albright, "A New Hebrew Word for Glaze in Proverbs 26:23," ibid., pp. 24,25). 24. He that hateth. Repeated in 26:26 as a catchword expanding the thought.

27:1. Boast not thyself of tomorrow. A common, but solemn, thought. Oesterley gives a parallel from the Wisdom of Amen-em-Opet differing somewhat from the quotation in ANET, p. 423 (ch. XIX. 12.13). The general parallel may be allowed, however. 2. Let another man praise thee. Praise is the same Hebrew word as "boast" in verse 1.

12. The simple. The verse is parallel to 22:3. 13. Take his garment. Parallel to 20:16. 14. Blessing his friend. Most writers say this insincere, overly loud blessing is a curse. Possibly also we have here a contrary use of "bless," meaning "curse" (see the lexicons). A morning curse will come home at night!

15. A continual dropping. Very similar to 19:13. 16. Hideth the wind. The thought is of something impossible. Better, Whoso treasures her, treasures up wind, i.e., she is worthless. Toy and Oesterley declare the last of the verse impossible. The Delitzsch reading seems all right, oil meets his right hand, i.e., he grasps nothing.

17. Iron sharpeneth iron. The significance of this proverb is well known in education. But it illustrates the fact that the similes chosen in Proverbs may be obscure. 19. As in water. Probably this refers to reflections in water.

20. Hell and destruction. Hebrew Sheol and Abaddon. On Sheol, see 1:12; 2:18. Sheol often means merely the grave, here called insatiable. 21. Fining pot. Refining pot. 22. Bray a fool. Pound him as when pounding grain in a mortar to grind it.

28:1. The wicked. Though there is no heading here, most writers understand a new subsection. The proverbs in chapters 28; 29 remind us of those in the second section (10:1–22:16), with their frequent contrasts of good and evil.

2. Many are the princes. Their reigns are brief and troubled. 4. Forsake the law. Toy is right in pointing out that the words imply a codified law, like the law of Moses. He concludes that therefore the verse is late. We could as well argue that the Law is early! Contend. They oppose the wicked. Oesterley remarks that "forsaking the law" concords best with the Greek period. As if God's people at other periods were always faithful! 8. Usury. See notes on 6:1. 9. His prayer shall be abomination. Because insincere (cf. 20:4).

13. Whoso confesseth. Oesterley argues that this is a late usage of the word (though it occurs in David's psalm of penitence, 32). Toy and Fritsch observe that here forgiveness depends not on sacrifice, but on ethics. This is a good case of arguing from silence. Psalm 32 also omits mention of sacrifice. But David's other psalm of penitence, 51, does enjoin sacrifice in verses 16-19. These verses are cut off by W. R. Taylor (IB, ad loc.) as a later appendix. The fact is that God requires both contrition and sacrifice. 14. Mischief. Trouble, calamity (RSV).

17. That doeth violence. Toy, Oesterley, and Fritsch declare the Hebrew impossible. But Greenstone relates the verse to homicide. The root 'shq appears in Syriac, and clearly means "accuse." A man accused of the blood of a person shall flee unto the pit (or grave). Let them not support him. The verb 'āshaq is perhaps chosen to contrast with 'āqash of verse 18.

21. Respect of persons. Cf. 18:5 for similar references. 22. An evil eye. Cf. 23:6. 23. Afterward. Literally, after me. Toy, Oesterley, and Fritsch urge its deletion. A simple change of vowel would make it read easily, "A man rebuking another."

25. A proud heart. A similar phrase occurs in 21:4. 26. Trusteth in his own heart. A conscious contrast to verse 25, "one trusting in the Lord." 28. When the wicked rise. Parallel to 28:12, with slight variations.

29:4. He that receiveth gifts. The word gifts usually refers to the heave offering of the Temple. But it clearly refers to taxes in Ezk 45:13,16; so here it should be taken as taxes that are too heavy, or gifts that are in effect bribes. It is not the usual word for "bribes." 5. A man that flatters. Cf. 26:28; 28:23. 8. Into a snare. Better, Set a city aflame (so RSV).

10. The just seek his soul. The usage of seek does not seem to admit of "seek to help." Therefore, Oesterley and Fritsch call the second line impossible. Delitzsch and Greenstone solve it satisfactorily by making the "they" refer to the wicked—they attempt the life of the upright. 11. Uttereth all his mind. Not so much mind as anger (so Delitzsch, Oesterley, RSV).

15. Bringeth his mother to shame. Note the parallel in 19:26.

16. When the wicked are multiplied. Multiplied is the same word as is translated "authority" in verse 2, but it is here applied to the wicked. Oesterley remarks, "See note on verse 2, where the same slight corruption of the text occurs." We would rather say, "See verse 2, where Oesterley again slightly forces the text!" It is not logical to assume the same corruption in two verses without good reason.

18. Where there is no vision. This famous verse has often been misquoted because the word vision has taken on new meaning since A.D. 1611. The Hebrew (and originally the AV) means "where there is no prophetic vision, the people perish." The RSV is right, Where there is no prophecy. The proverb does not refer to the need for high idealism, as it is often taken to do. There is no warrant for Fritsch's comment here and at 13:13 that the Prophets of the OT were already canonized and the Writings were not. (The author's Inspiration and Canonicity of the Bible, pp. 138-148, gives the evidence on the canonization of the Writings.) Perish. Better, cast off restraint (ASV).

22. An angry man. Similar wording in 15:18; 22:24.

24. Bewrayeth. An old English word for "betray," "divulge." Cf. Lev 5:1, which requires confession from partners in guilt.

25,26. The fear of man and of rulers is overcome by the fear of God (cf. 18:10).

VI. Final Appendices. 30:1–31:31.

A. The Words of Agur. 30:1-33. The LXX divides these last chapters into four parts: 30:1-9 is located after 24:22; 30:10-33 and 31:1-9 are found after 24:34; 31:10-31 is at the end of the book. The reference to Agur is difficult to understand. Of Agur, Jakeh, Ithiel, and Ucal (v.1), we know nothing. Furthermore, the time and location of the author are equally obscure. In view of the difficulties of the text, Toy and Oesterley call it hopelessly corrupt. Agur and the other proper names do not occur in the LXX, which begins: "My son, reverence my words, and receive them and repent. Thus saith the man to them that believe in God, and I cease." In this version, the Hebrew words sometimes translated Ithiel and Ucal are probably rendered as common nouns or verbs. The Syriac translates the name Ucal as prevail and renders Ithiel only once. The vowels of our present Hebrew text were inserted in late times and apparently served to confuse this section. The original consonants, however, seem to have been very close to what is represented both in the LXX and the Syriac, and in our modern Hebrew.

1. There is no reason to emend the first verse to read – The words of Agur the son of Jakeh, the oracle which the man saith. The names Ithiel and Ucal present more of a problem. The most unusual explanation suggested is that given by Charles C. Torrey ("Proverbs, Chapter 30," JBL, LXXIII (1954), 93-96). He argues that these words are not names but an Aramaic phrase. The letters as they stand in the original, with slightly different vowels, can be translated, "I am not God." They then form a contrast to verse 2, "For I am more brutish than a man." In favor of Torrey's suggestion is the well-known fact that in 31:2 the Aramaic word for "son" is used three times.

4. What is his name, and what is his son's name? The speaker seeks the answer to the riddle of the universe in words reminiscent of God's challenge to Job in Job 38:4-9. He seeks for God. The question about God's son is peculiar. Greenstone denies that the name applies to Israel or Moses or the Logos, but gives no positive suggestion to explain it. Delitzsch suggests that it refers to the mediator in creation, revealed at last as God's Son. He well remarks, "He would not have ventured this question if he did not suppose that God was not a unity who was without manifoldness in Himself."

5. Every word of God is tried. This verse is quoted verbatim from Ps 18:30, substituting the Aramaic form of God for "Lord." The idea is that the answer to his search is in God's Word. Cf. other quotations from the OT in 1:16; 3:11; 20:24; 24:19; 25:18; 30:5. 6. Add thou not. From Deut 4:2. Oesterley and Fritsch are right in calling this a reference to Scripture. Oesterley, however, says much that cannot be supported about the third division of the OT not being complete until Christian times. The Dead Sea scrolls show the OT canon to have been complete in the second century B.C. at least. See exegesis of 29:18.

7-33. Numerical proverbs (cf. Introd., Proverbs and Other Wisdom Literature). In these sequences of three things, yea, four, it is probably the climactic fourth that is emphasized. It is the author's contention that in the Beatitudes, also, there is this climactic teaching in the two sets of four blessings: Mt 5:3-6; 7-10; see also Lk 6:20-23,24-26. Jesus' teaching in the Jewish proverbial and climactic method emphasizes the fourth item.

8. Feed me with food convenient for me. The Hebrew is, appointed for me.

10. Do not accuse. Calumniate (Delitzsch). This proverb is the only one in this section standing alone, says Oesterley. Toy thinks it out of place. But likely, as in 6:14-19, the numerical proverb begins with a thought that is reiterated in the concluding statement. "Do not slander a servant," says verse 10. The climactic item mentioned in verse 14 speaks of one with "teeth as knives."

15. The horseleech. This proverb has occasioned much comment because of the obscurity of the point. Toy and Oesterley conclude that the text is corrupt. Delitzsch repeats in the middle of verse 15 the reference to the grave and barren womb from 16. The LXX assigns three daughters to the leech. Our trouble is in seeking too much. For the numerical proverb, all that is required is a backdrop to set off the climax. Verse 7 refers to two things; cf. notes on verse 17. The two insatiate daughters of the leech in verse 15 simply form a background for the 3 and 4 of 15 and 16. The sage could count!

17. Mocketh at his father. An isolated verse, out of place, say Oesterley and Fritsch. As noted above, it is part of a regular sequence—2 plus 3, yea 4. Mocking the father and despising the mother are the backdrop to the three and four of verses 18-20.

19. The way of a man with a maid. This maid is the famous word 'almâ, "maiden," used in Isa 7:14; Gen 24:43 (of Rebecca); Ex 2:8 (of Miriam); Ps 68:25; and Song 1:3; 6:8 (where the "virgins" are distinguished from queens and concubines). The word nowhere refers to a married woman. In the case of the girl Miriam, it could hardly refer to a marriageable girl. It means a virgin and a young virgin. The root means "conceal." Probably the word refers to a maiden still kept in her father's house. Toy, Oesterley, Fritsch, and Greenstone take the point of our verse to be not the marvels of courtship, but the mysteries of procreation. But Delitzsch points out that there are other words—"male and female," or "man and wife"—to express this. Here the words are literally, strong man and maiden. Delitzsch takes the proverb as a reference to sin, immorality concealed. However, the "virgin" seems to be contrasted with the adulteress of verse 20. And adultery as it is repeatedly pictured in Proverbs is never represented as wonderful or "past knowledge." There seems to be no good reason why the more romantic view cannot still be held: Wonderful is the way of courtship, issuing at last in the mysteries of love and life begotten.

21-31. Three sets of proverbs on authority and kingship. The point of the first two is not clear, yet each of the three has some reference to the king. Perhaps the first two especially set off the last one.

23. An handmaid that is heir. An upside down situation, like a servant's being king. 25. The ants. See comment on 6:6-8. 26. The conies. Not rabbits, which do not live in the rocks, but apparently cliff badgers, peculiar little animals, distantly related to the rhinoceros (ISBE, article, "coney"). Conies are classed as unclean in the Mosaic law (Lev 11:5; Deut 14:7), because they chew the cud. Some have objected that conies are not ruminants and only seem to chew the cud. The description in Leviticus, however, is probably not intended to be a scientific description of ruminants, but only a classification based on the easily observed chewing habits of these cliff badgers. The Hebrew may mean no more than that. 27. Locusts. Not the cicada or seventeen-year locust, but a type of grasshopper. 28. Spider. Opinions differ regarding the translation of this word, but Delitzsch gives good argument for the meaning "lizard"—a small animal which you can take in your hands (RSV), and which invades king's palaces.

31. Greyhound. The meaning of the Hebrew word is uncertain. The RSV says strutting cock, but Delitzsch's arguments for greyhound are reasonable. Rising up. The Hebrew word is unknown. The LXX speaking publicly before his nation is as good a reading as we can get.

B. The Words of Lemuel. 31:1-9. The LXX omits the name of Lemuel in 1 and 4. The Syriac renders it Muel.

1. Prophecy. This is the word for a prophetic oracle. But it could be the name of a place (RSV, Lemuel, king of Massa). It is difficult to account for the absence of the article with "king," but there are no articles in this section, perhaps because of Aramaic influence. It seems easiest to translate the first part as a title: "The words of King Lemuel, a prophecy, the words which his mother taught him."

2. What, my son? Three times the word "son" is used in the Aramaic form bar, as in Ps 2:12. 3. Kings. Again, an Aramaic form. 4. It is not for kings. The choice of the negative is peculiar, as in 12:28. The LXX follows a different text, but the Hebrew seems preferable. Delitzsch suggests the translation, "Let it not be . . . ." It is the more difficult reading, and, as is generally agreed, the harder reading is usually preferred.

6. Give strong drink. As mentioned at 23:31, this is not an allowance of moderate drinking, as Fritsch suggests, nor cynical advice (Oesterley). It may recommend alcohol as a drug (Toy). Delitzsch mentions the wine offered at executions by the noble women at Jerusalem on the basis of this verse (cf. Mk 15:23). More likely, however, the verse is a comparative negative (cf. 8:10): Regardless of others, you should not take it. Wine, women, and song are the old debasing trio. A king has a higher responsibility, for which see verses 8,9.

C. Alphabetical Poem on the Virtuous Woman. 31:10-31. The alphabet in this piece is regular, as in Lamentations 1 and Psalm 119. (Lamentations 2; 3; 4 have the letters Ayin and Pe reversed. Some of the alphabetical psalms have minor irregularities). Since an alphabet was discovered in Ugarit dating from the fifteenth century, alphabetical pieces need no longer be thought of as late.

10. A virtuous woman. Literally, a noble wife. The same phrase as in 12:4. Fritsch remarks on the high status of women shown in 12:4; 18:22; 19:14; and other places.

15. Meat to her household. The Hebrew words for food and portion are unusual, but used in a very similar sense in 30:8. 16. She considereth a field. Oesterley remarks that this is exaggeration, since "these things were wholly outside a woman's sphere." Can we really be so sure? Do we not tend to judge ancient Israel by modern Arabia? 18. Candle. The oil lamp of ancient times. Does this refer to a custom of burning lamps all night? The meaning is, she has plenty of oil. Contrast Mt 25:8.

19. Spindle . . . distaff. The RSV reverses these. The word for "spindle" is used only here. "Distaff" in one other case seems to mean "staff." The Hebrew women had no spinning wheel, but rotated doughnut-shaped weights on sticks to form thread. This was their spindle. The word now is found in Ugaritic as a woman's instrument, but the context adds little of detail (Story, op. cit., p. 329). 21. Scarlet. The LXX says double, using different vowels. This would fit well because of the mention of cold, but the change is not necessary. The word means good clothing.

26. Wisdom. Her virtues are not mere industry. Wisdom and kindness and nobility are hers—not the characteristics of a sluggard. These virtues, typical of the Book of Proverbs, are capped by the fact that she "feareth the Lord" (v. 30; cf. 1:7).

The book ends as it begins, with that wisdom which is the fear of the Lord.

ECCLESIASTES

INTRODUCTION

Title. The book of Ecclesiastes gets its name from the Greek version, which has the title ekklēsiastēs, "assembly." The name in Hebrew is literally qōhelet, "one who assembles." This has been taken to mean either (1) "one who collects" wise sayings (cf. 12:9,10), or (2) "one who addresses an assembly," that is, a preacher or speaker, the implication being that one assembles a group for the purpose of addressing it. The general understanding in either case is that it is a technical title to denote an office.

Date and Authorship. Until the nineteenth century it was generally believed that Solomon wrote the book in its entirety. Today most scholars agree that Solomon was not the author, but rather that the work is a product of post-Exilic times. They usually assume, however, that the central figure in the book is Solomon, and that the unknown author used him as a literary device to convey his message. He did not intend to deceive his original readers, and undoubtedly no one was in fact deceived. Lack of certainty concerning authorship does not destroy canonicity of the book.

Purpose. The primary aim of the author is to show from personal experience that all earthly goals and blessings, when pursued as ends in themselves, lead to dissatisfaction and emptiness. The highest good in life lies in reverencing and obeying God, and in enjoying life while one can. Thus the author was a man of faith; he was skeptical only of human wisdom and endeavor.

  B. A commendation of his teachings. 12:11,12.
  C. The conclusion of the matter. 12:13,14.

COMMENTARY

I. Introduction. 1:1-3.

A. The Title. 1:1. Solomon, although not identified by name, becomes the literary spokesman for the observations and convictions of the author. He is the king in Jerusalem who, because of his wealth, wisdom, and worldly concern, has ample opportunity to sample all of life.

B. The Theme. 1:2,3. All of human existence, when lived apart from God, is frustrating and unsatisfactory. All of the pleasures and material things of life, when sought for their own sake, bring nothing but unhappiness and a sense of futility.

2. Vanity of vanities. The word vanity means basically "breath" (see Isa 57:13) or "vapor" (see Prov 21:6), like the condensed breath that one breathes on a cold day. It appears to imply here both (1) that which is transitory, and (2) that which is futile. It emphasizes how swiftly earthly things pass away, and how little they offer while one has them (cf. Jas 4:14). This concept is given greater stress by the repeated use of the superlative, vanity of vanities. The phrase, all is vanity, is literally, the all is vanity: that is, the whole thing, the totality of existence is vain. This is to be understood, however, not in reference to the universe, but to all the activities of earthly life, the things "under the sun" of verse 3. The latter context shows this quite clearly. The author is not a complete pessimist; he is merely pessimistic about human existence bringing satisfaction apart from God.

3. What profit hath a man of all his labour. From the root "to remain over," the word profit conveys here more the idea of "advantage" than of "gain" (cf. 7:11). If a person looks at life merely in terms of earthly values, there is no discernible advantage to struggle and toil. The author then goes on to prove this by a survey of the various areas of human activity.

II. The Theme Demonstrated (I). 1:4–2:26.

A. By Human Life in General. 1:4-11. Life is an endless and meaningless repetition. Man's labor achieves nothing permanent; only the earth remains forever. The course of human activity is as monotonous and aimless as the processes of nature.

4. One generation passeth away. The Hebrew uses participles here—one generation is always passing off the scene, and another is always arriving. Man is born merely to be caught up in the tide, and then to pass away. But in contrast, the earth abideth forever, a participle again being used to express continuance. Man, who was made from earth, is short-lived and dies, but the material from which he was fashioned continues to remain. This wearisome repetition is also seen in the "sun" (1:5), the "wind" (1:6), and the "streams" (1:7).

8. All things are full of labour. The phrase, full of labour, is better translated, all things are wearisome, a reference to the fact that all things in life are monotonous and futile, that no matter where one looks in nature, he finds the same tiresome, ceaseless round of activity. Man cannot utter it. It is impossible to put into words the futility of it all. It never brings real satisfaction to the eye or the ear of man.

11. There is no remembrance of former things. This gives the reason for the "nothing new" of verse 10, and probably is best translated former men. Man is plagued not only by his inability to accomplish anything worth while, but also by the realization that even the memory of his efforts is soon forgotten. This is the complete answer to the question in verse 3, "What profit hath a man?" He gains nothing, not even a memory of his struggle. The world of nature is futile; human activity is also futile.

B. By Knowledge. 1:12-18. The author sought knowledge more than anyone else did, but he found no lasting satisfaction, for the world was still full of problems that could not be solved.

14. Vexation of spirit. The better translation is striving after wind or feeding upon wind, a reference to the aimlessness and futility of human activity, for one can never lay hold of real satisfaction. 15. What is crooked (RSV). The writer's quest forced upon him the realization that life is full of paradoxes and anomalies that cannot be solved; and, contrariwise, it is empty of so much that could give it meaning and value.

17. To know wisdom. He sought to determine the standard for what was wise and what was foolish, not merely to see both sides of the question. 18. Increaseth sorrow. Not only does the search for life's meaning prove frustrating and its goal unattainable, but it also brings mental and spiritual pain. There does not appear to be any consistent standard for life upon which one may base his conduct.

C. By Pleasure. 2:1-11. His intellectual faculties having failed him, the author turned to pleasure as a possible source of complete satisfaction. He provided himself with wine, women, and song, with luxuries and buildings and gardens. And although these brought him pleasures for the moment, they also brought him no enduring satisfaction, for he was always seeking something new to do.

3. Acquainting mine heart with wisdom. The idea is not that he went about acquiring more wisdom. The phrase is better translated, my heart (mind) conducting itself in wisdom. The author did not blindly grasp at life's pleasures, but rather he conducted his search for satisfaction with thoroughness and care.

8. Peculiar treasure of kings. Probably the taxes and art objects obtained from subject peoples and nations. The phrase peculiar treasure (s'qullâ) means basically "property," but is used generally of valuable property. Thus Israel is called God's "peculiar people" (Ex 19:5), a people whom God has specially chosen and values.

10. This was my portion of all my labour. There was a certain amount of gain in the sensuous life, for his heart found pleasure (RSV) in all his toil. This was his portion, his profit from his satiety. But the gain was short-lived, lasting as long as the pleasure was being taken in hand. 11. Then I looked. Literally, Then I turned (to consider). The author stopped in the midst of his sensuous indulgence to take stock of the results. And he concluded that although a certain amount of good can be gained from pleasure, it yields no permanent gain; it is a vexation of spirit.

D. By the Fate of All Men. 2:12-17. The author made a comparison between wisdom and folly, and admitted that wisdom has certain uses in that it keeps one from unnecessary suffering. But the gain is only temporary, for both the wise man and the fool die and are forgotten.

14. Eyes are in his head. The wise man can at least see what lies ahead of him, and can choose the path that will give him the most happiness; while the fool must grope his way, getting his happiness by chance. But the advantage is not for long, for one fate comes to all (RSV).

E. By Human Toil. 2:18-23. He was disgusted not only with life, but also with toil, for he saw that it is useless. Someday he must leave all the results of his diligent work to someone who might be careless, or perhaps to one who had done nothing to deserve them.

20. Therefore I went about. Better translated, I turned about. The verb is used of the physical action of turning the body. It speaks here of a traveler who turns around to view the road he has walked. The verb in verses 11 and 12 is different; it speaks of mental turning. What he saw when he turned caused him to despair of all the labour which he had done, for he felt that the road he had traveled had not been worth the effort and discomfort it required. 21. A man that hath not laboured therein. Not only might the heir be a fool, but there was the distressing possibility that the wealth for which he had labored so carefully might fall into the hands of one who, never having worked for it, would not prize it highly and would squander it.

F. Conclusion: Enjoy Life While You Can. 2:24-26. Even though life's pleasures are temporary, and do not completely satisfy, at least they are real. Thus the best a man can do under the circumstances is to enjoy the fruit of his labor as long as he can.

24. From the hand of God. The will of God is that man should get his pleasure from eating, drinking, and working. Since it appears to the author that under God's providence this is the highest man can enjoy, the author recommends taking life where one finds it. 25. More than I? The AV implies the idea, "Who can prove this by experience better than I?" But perhaps the best way to read the verse, in light of context, is with the Greek version, apart from Him (that is, God). 26. To a man that is good in his sight. The author is not giving a moral judgment here, for the word good merely means "one whom God takes a fancy to," while the sinner is one with whom God is displeased. He is giving another reason for his philosophy of life; there is no discernible consistency to the conduct of God.

III. The Theme Demonstrated (II). 3:1–4:16.

A. By the Laws of God. 3:1-15. All of life, including human activity, is part of a determined cycle. Although man longs for something more, he can do nothing about it. He must be content to get what little happiness he can while engaging in this endless round of events.

1. To every thing. Literally, for the all, that is, for the whole thing. Everything in nature and in human life is under a set scheme. There is a season (an appointed period) and a time (a predetermind occurrence) for all that takes place under the sun. Seeming chance events are all part of a huge plan.

3. A time to kill. The killing that takes place in warfare, in self-defense, in judgment is never accidental. This finds echo in modern parlance in the expression, "It was his time to go." 5. A time to cast away stones. In light of the rest of the verse, the Jewish interpretation seems best, i.e., that this is a metaphor for the marriage act. 7. A time to rend. This is a reference to the practice of rending one's clothes as a sign of bereavement (see Gen 37:29; Job 1:20). The time to sew is when one's grief has subsided. This would then be parallel with the last part of the verse and would suggest that a time to keep silence refers to a time of deep emotion (cf. Lev 10:3).

11. Every thing beautiful. Although the word beautiful is generally used in the OT with the sense of physical beauty, it appears that this is an allusion to such a concept as that of Gen 1:31 regarding the "appropriateness" of all creation. Everything (lit., the all) is exactly as God wants it. The phrase he hath set the world in their heart has a variety of interpretations. The AV rendering, world, is rather harsh in context, and is opposed to the use of the word elsewhere. The preceding verses seem to require that the word be translated in its normal sense of "eternity." The author is suggesting the contrast between time (individual occurrences) and eternity (continuousness without discernible limits). God has ordered all of life's occurrences according to his will. He has also given men minds that look beyond daily occurrences to the total sweep of life. Yet the human mind has been limited, so that no man can find out the work that God maketh; he can never solve all the seeming paradoxes of life. God has given man reasoning power, but he has not given him enough to unravel all mysteries.

15. God requireth that which is past. Literally, God seeks that which is pursued. The idea is that God has ordained the continual circle of events in life, so that each has its predetermined season. The picture is of God continually pursuing the things that have passed in order to capture them and cause them to reoccur.

B. By the Lack of Immortality. 3:16-22. Miscarriage of justice in life should be rectified in some future life, but is not; for at death all men return to dust, just like the animals.

16. The place of judgment. In the courts of law, where one might expect the proper administration of justice, there is, instead, wickedness and iniquity. 17. God shall judge the righteous. The author suggests one solution to the problem—God will someday right the wrongs which have been committed, for there is a time which he has appointed for all things. 18. God might manifest them. Here the author contradicts himself, offering another solution to the difficulty. God is merely demonstrating to men that, despite their intelligence, they do not differ in value from animals. The word manifest is often translated "test" or "prove"; that is, men are being subjected to the disciplines of life that they might see that they themselves are beasts.

21. Who knoweth the spirit of man that goeth upward. The AV implies a belief on the author's part in some sort of immortality. But the text is perhaps better read, as with the RSV, Who knows whether the spirit of man goes upward. The author has claimed in the previous verse that there is no afterlife where injustice can be rectified. Here he adds that even if there were, one has no proof of it; so the best thing for a man to do is to enjoy his work (3:22, RSV) while he can.

C. By Evil Oppression. 4:1-3. Because of so much oppression in life, the only happy men are the dead men. The happiest or most blessed are those who have never been born. This is a transitory mood which the writer somewhat contradicts in 9:4.

D. By Work. 4:4-6. Human toil is futile because (1) although the man who works may achieve something in life, his motive is only envy of his neighbor; yet (2) the man who does not work destroys himself, for he cannot subsist on nothing.

5. Eateth his own flesh. This is a metaphorical expression implying starvation (cf. Amos 4:6). The person who does not work uses up all his substance until he has nothing left but his own person upon which to feed. 6. Handful with quietness. A man should not go to extremes. Work brings some reward (cf. 2:10,24), but too much work, or a total concern with work, can destroy this good. It is better to have a handful of earnings when they are gained with a restful mind, than to procure large gains by worry and vexing toil.

E. By Miserly Accumulation of Wealth. 4:7-12. Wealth often makes a man a miser, so that he withdraws from the company of others. This then deprives him of one of the few joys that life can offer.

8. There is not a second. This is explained by what follows, namely, that the man has no partner or helper. Since the passage is concerned with avarice, the implication is that this is a miser who toils alone so that he will not have to share the profits with anyone. The author then goes on to list the advantages of association with others—assistance in distress, warmth, protection and security (cf. 4:9-12). 12. A threefold cord. This probably refers to the advantage of companionship, and means that if fellowship with two is good, then fellowship with three is better still. A cord with three strands will stand greater strain than one with only two.

F. By the Transient Nature of Popularity. 4:13-16. Those who seek popularity as their chief goal will find that it brings no real satisfaction, for it is dependent on the fickleness of the people, and thus is insecure.

13. Better is a poor and a wise child. A hypothetical example of what often happens in the rise of a man from poverty to the throne. A king who will no more be admonished, that is, take advice, was better off when he was a poor youth. Then at least he was open to learning. Now old age and years in the public eye have blinded him (the author implies) to his incapabilities and the need for wise counsel. 14. Out of prison he cometh to reign. Often age and experience teach a man nothing. The king who himself was once poor, who arose out of prison to the throne, who caused the downfall of another, did not learn the chief lesson of his struggle—popular favor is uncertain and unpredictable. The rendering he that is born in his kingdom becometh poor suggests that the king, through his failure to learn the lessons of popularity, may someday become a pauper in his own kingdom.

IV. Words of Advice (A). 5:1-7.

Here are various words of advice on proper worship. The author recommends caution and brevity in one's prayers (5:1-3) and alacrity in the payment of one's vows (5:4-7).

1. Keep thy foot. Make sure you know what you are doing when you go to the house of God. In the phrase be more ready to hear, the author is not speaking of coming to the Temple to listen to the exposition of the Law, but rather he is cautioning against approaching the worship of God in the wrong way. The word hear often has the sense of "obey" in the OT. The contrast is between those who come to God in obedience, that is, out of a background of ethical and moral conduct (cf. Ps 119:101), and those who are fools, that is, those who worship with unrepentant hearts. 2. Be not rash with thy mouth. The emphasis is on conscientiousness in prayers. The "vain repetitions" (Mt 6:7) of many do not accomplish as much as the few words of those who are sincere. 3. A dream cometh through the multitude of busi- ness. The author quotes a proverb in support of his previous point. Just as a night of dreams is the result of too much preoccupation with one's business, so nonsensical speech is the result of too many words at worship.

6. To cause thy flesh to sin. The word flesh is used here as a metonym for one's whole self or person; the idea is not to let one's mouth get one's self into trouble with God. The angel or "messenger" is not the angel of judgment sent by God, but rather the priest whose duty it was to collect what had been vowed (cf. Mal 2:7). 7. In the multitude of dreams. This difficult proverb is probably an allusion to verse 3, and the author is summing up his point. Just as too much concern over business brings dreams, so too many words spoken at worship bring rash promises and punishment by God.

V. The Theme Demonstrated (III). 5:8–6:12.

A. By Wealth That Can Be Enjoyed. 5:8-20. Here riches are viewed from three angles. Though God may give a man a certain power to enjoy wealth, yet (1) riches are the cause of much greed and injustice among government officials (5:8,9); (2) the gaining of wealth never brings satisfaction, for the more one gets, the more one wants (5:10-12); and (3) riches are an insecure possession, for a man acquires wealth only to pass it on to others (5:13-17). So in 5:18-20 the author gives his oft repeated counsel: Enjoy life while you can.

8. For he that is higher than the highest regardeth. This is not a statement to the effect that God watches all earthly rulers, and will eventually punish them, but rather it refers to the system of government in those days. Each official watched the one beneath him in order to obtain part of the spoils of taxation and graft. Because of this system one should not marvel at the oppression and lack of justice. 9. The profit of the earth is for all. It appears best to read this with the RSV margin, the profit of the land is among all of them; a cultivated field has a king. In other words, not only do all the officials get a share of the extortion, but there is no cultivated area which does not fall under taxation.

13. Riches were kept by their owner to his hurt (RSV). This refers to the loss the man sustains by evil travail (v. 14), that is, in a bad business speculation. The vanity of wealth lies in the fact that a man may accumulate a great deal, only to lose it in an unfortunate business enterprise, and thus have nothing to leave his son.

20. God answereth him in the joy of his heart. Better translated with the RSV, God keeps him occupied with joy in his heart. There are not many enjoyments in life, but such as there are should be sought for the pleasure they will provide. This will then cause life to pass pleasantly by, for God will allow a man to be absorbed by these things, and forget about the difficulties of life.

B. By Wealth That Cannot Be Enjoyed. 6:1-9. One of life's greatest misfortunes is that a man may have riches and not be able to enjoy them, either because of an early death or perhaps because of a spirit of avarice which will not let him be satisfied.

2. God giveth him not power to eat thereof. The next verse, as well as the phrase, a stranger eateth it, shows that the picture is of a man who dies early in life before he has had a chance to enjoy his wealth. No son becomes his heir, but rather some stranger benefits by it all. 3. If a man beget an hundred children. This is the opposite of the previous case. Even if a man has long life and many children, this is no guarantee of the enjoyment of life. He may be so bound up with avarice or worry that he lacks the capacity to feel satisfied. To make the contrast even greater, the author adds, and also that he have no burial. That is, if he were to live forever, and still not be able to enjoy life, it would have been better if he had never lived at all.

9. Better is the sight of the eyes. Satisfaction in the things that life affords is better than the wandering of the desire, that is, better than a life that can never find fulfillment in its longings.

C. By the Fixity of Fate. 6:10-12. It is ultimately useless to try to change things, and to wish for more than one has. Submission to the fixed order is best, since God has determined things the way they are. Man is powerless even to argue the issue.

VI. Words of Advice (B). 7:1–8:9.

The author has questioned, in 6:12, the possibility of determining ultimate good. Here he admits that there are certain ways of living which are "better" than others. And so he gives his advice about how to find these.

A. Honor Is Better Than Luxury. 7:1. To have a good name, that is, a good reputation (cf. Prov 3:4; 22:1), is better than having the luxury of much fine perfume. An honorable life makes a man's day of death better than his day of birth, for at the end he knows he has made something out of life.

B. Sobriety Is Better Than Levity. 7:2-7. Sympathetic understanding of sorrow and death gives one a proper appreciation of life. When one visits the house of mourning (v. 4), he is reminded of the brevity of life and therefore of the need for wise living. The phrase, by the sadness of the countenance the heart is made better (v. 3), implies a thoughtful serious mind concerned about the problems of life.

C. Cautiousness Is Better Than Rashness. 7:8-10. It is best to take a quiet second look at the past and present before saying that the former days were better than these (v. 10). The years have probably obscured difficulties in the past similar to those of the present. It is best to be slow to anger (v. 9), and not to make a rash statement for which one will be sorry. The phrase, better is the end of a thing than the beginning thereof (v. 8), suggests the wisdom of cautious speech, since only after one has spoken is he able to determine the full effects of his words.

D. Wisdom with Wealth Is Better Than Wisdom Alone. 7:11,12. The author is quick to acknowledge that wealth can provide a man with good things (cf. Prov 13:8), and when this wealth is combined with wisdom, the man has double means for finding life's few pleasures.

E. Resignation Is Better Than Indignation. 7:13,14. This is a summation of much of the author's philosophy of life. Since our lives are in the iron grip of God, both the day of prosperity (v. 14), and the day of adversity have been determined by him. Therefore, let a man make the best of whatever life may bring.

F. Moderation Is Better Than Intemperance. 7:15-22. Experience has shown that the righteous do not necessarily live longer and happier lives than the wicked (cf. Ps 1:3,4). Therefore the best way to live is moderately. Be not righteous over much (v. 16), for this will not guarantee happiness; and be not over much wicked (v. 17), for evil may bring a premature death. Therefore moderation is the answer, for why should you destroy yourself? That is, Why should you alienate yourself by extreme conduct from the few good things that life can provide?

G. Men Are Better Than Women. 7:23-29. A good example of the wickedness of folly (v. 25) is an evil woman (v. 26) who lures men into sin. It is difficult enough to find a good man, but a (good) woman is almost impossible to discover (v. 28). Although God hath made man upright, men have deviated from this condition in going after inventions, that is, purposes or devices (perhaps here, devices of women) which have brought corruption and evil into the world. (v. 29).

H. To Compromise Is Sometimes Better Than To Be Right. 8:1-9. In the service of a king who is often arbitrary and doeth whatsoever pleaseth him (v. 3 b), the wise action is not to demand one's way in every matter. When the king commands some unpleasant thing, be not hasty to go out of his sight (v. 3 a). That is, do not impulsively turn your back on what he wants. There is a time and a place for everything (v. 6).

VII. The Theme Demonstrated (IV). 8:10–9:16.

A. By the Incongruity of Life. 8:10-14. Although, perhaps, generally the righteous are insured of a happy life, while the wicked are cut off; yet even this has its exceptions, so that one cannot depend on morality as a guide for life.

B. Conclusion: Enjoy Life While You Can. 8:15–9:16. Since God's ultimate purposes are unknowable (8:15-17), since there is no afterlife (9:1-10), and since the length of life is uncertain (9:11-16), the wise course of action is to enjoy oneself here and now.

9:1. No man knoweth either love or hatred. This difficult phrase is best taken as referring to God. No man knows whether or not his righteous deeds will gain the love or the hatred of God (cf.

Mal 1:1-3; Rom 9:13). 5. Neither have they any more a reward. The man who is alive can gain a reward, that is, some profit on earth from his labor, and at least is somebody, while the dead person is not even a memory.

10. In Sheol (AV, in the grave). The Hebrews of ancient times thought Sheol was a pit deep under the earth where the dead abode (cf. Deut 32:22). It is uniformly depicted as the place to which both righteous and unrighteous went after death, and where there were no punishments or rewards (cf. Eccl 3:19, 20; 6:6). It was a "land of forgetfulness" (Ps 88:12) and darkness (Job 38:17), where men existed as shadowy replicas of their former selves (cf. Isa 14:9,10). Here (Eccl 9:10) is one of the strongest statements in the OT about the nothingness of Sheol.

VIII. Words of Advice (C). 9:17—12:8.

A. Some Lessons on Wisdom and Folly. 9:17—10:15. The author here adds a few groups of maxims about the wise use of words (9:17,18; 10:12-14), about wise conduct (10:2-4, 8-11), and about wisdom in general as compared with folly (10:1,5-7,15).

17. The words of wise men are heard in quiet. The quiet speech of a wise man is heeded more readily than the clamorous chatterings of a loudmouth. This proverb seems to have been added to suggest that what was said in verse 16 is not always true.

10:1. Dead flies. If a fly, one of the scourges of the East, becomes engulfed in perfume and dies, its decaying body ruins all the perfume. So a little folly can degrade much wisdom and honor. It may seem insignificant, but it can destroy all the good that wisdom has accomplished. A man may commit one sin, and this can destroy a lifetime of virtue.

5. As an error which proceedeth from the ruler. One of the evils of life is human misjudgment, which can appoint a fool to a place of authority, and ignore those who should rule.

8. He that diggeth a pit. These proverbs are general observations on the dangers of various activities, and therefore on the need for prudence. 11. The serpent will bite without enchantment. Success in life comes by knowing when to exercise skill. If a charm is to work, it must be used before the serpent bites, else what good is it to know how to charm? Instead of the AV rendering, a babbler is no better, read, in terms of the context—"the charmer (lit., the lord of the tongue) has no advantage."

15. The labour of the foolish wearieth every one of them. Literally, wearieth him, that is, himself. The fool, although he can talk a lot, labors to exhaustion without ever really accomplishing anything. He is too stupid to see the obvious way to accomplish his purpose. This is the import of the last phrase, he knoweth not how to go to the city; that which is plain to most is veiled to the fool. This last has its parallel in, "He does not know enough to come in out of the rain."

B. Some Lessons on the Rule of Kings. 10:16-20. The consequences on the life of a nation when it is ruled by a fool are illustrated by the author. Buildings are ruined and money is squandered. Yet a person, if he is wise, will not give thought or voice to criticism.

16. When thy king is a child. The child is one who is influenced by advisers (the implication being, unscrupulous advisers), while the son of nobles (v. 17), better translated free man, is mature and able to do his own thinking. 18. By much slothfulness the building decayeth. The reference is to the neglect of national affairs by rulers who eat in the morning (v. 16), that is, spend their time in idleness when they ought to be working.

C. Some Lessons on Overcautiousness. 11:1-8. Since the future is always unpredictable, even "the best laid schemes of mice and men gang aft a-gley [go oft astray]." Therefore a man must be willing to take risks if he is to achieve any sort of success. The person who waits until he is certain will wait forever.

1. Cast thy bread upon the waters. There is no certain explanation of this proverb. Traditionally, it has been seen as an exhortation to liberality or charity, which one is to cast (lit., send forth) before others without any immediate realization of gain, but which will return someday to reward its giver (cf. Lk 16:9). But perhaps the verse is to be read, "Cast your bread upon the waters (strange though this may seem), yet you may find it after many days." Read thus, it refers to the uncertainty of this life, in which even an apparently unwise action may yield reward. 2. Give a portion to seven. Here is another emphasis on the uncertainty of life's outcomes even when wisdom is used. Translate, "Give a portion to seven, or even to eight (that is, be wise in your investments); yet you do not know what evil may happen on earth."

3. If the clouds be full of rain. This is at the heart of the author's argument, and seems to be part of verses 4-6. It is an argument against overcautiousness, in the light of nature's unpredictability and man's inability to change it. 4. He that observeth the wind. The ideal time for action is always uncertain, but one must act sometime if work is to be accomplished. If one worries about storms before he sows or reaps, no crops will be grown or gathered.

D. Some Lessons on Enjoying Life. 11:9–12:8. Make the most of youthful days, when the pleasures of life can still be enjoyed, instead of waiting until old age, when vitality is gone. Yet God's way, not debauchery, must be the guide to pleasure.

9. God will bring thee into judgment. The author recommends intelligent pleasure. Satisfy your heart's desires, he says, but remember that God has certain requirements for living, and that he punishes excess and abuse of his will. This thought is continued in verse 10 in the words remove sorrow and put away evil.

12:1. Remember now thy Creator. Perhaps better translated, Remember then thy Creator, for the author seems to be summing up what he has just said. 2. While the sun. The imagery in this and the following verses has led to a variety of interpretations, but the majority of commentators take the passage as an extension of the author's advice to his readers to enjoy their youth. These verses are probably, then, an allegory on the decay of old age and the approach of death. The figures of the sun, the light, the moon, the stars, and the clouds depict old age as a storm that gathers and obscures the light and the heavenly bodies, so that there is no warmth or brightness, that is, no enjoyment of life.

3. Keepers of the house. Here the writer likens man's body to a house. The keepers are the hands and arms, the strong men are the legs that become weak, the grinders are the few teeth that have not fallen out, and those that look out of the windows are the eyes that have grown dim. 4. The doors shall be shut. The form of the word doors, in the Hebrew, is dual, suggesting therefore "two doors" or "double doors," probably referring to the ears that have grown deaf. The sound of the grinding refers to the toothless chewing. An old man's inability to sleep is illustrated by the fact that he rises up at the voice of the bird. The daughters of music are probably musical notes which are heard with difficulty because of the man's impaired hearing.

5. That which is high. This is probably a reference to the shortness of breath which makes any ascent difficult. The man has fears . . . in the way because he cannot trust his frail legs when he must wend his way through the narrow, crowded streets. The almond tree is perhaps a picture of grey hair. For although the blossoms of the almond are actually pinkish, when seen from some distance a tree in full blossom has a snowy white appearance. The grasshopper shall be a burden is better translated, shall drag itself along, a picture of the wizened old man who can scarcely move his stiff limbs and bent back. The phrase desire shall fail is literally, the caper berry shall fail; this berry was an aphrodisiac which stimulated sexual or physical appetite.

6. The silver cord. The figure represents an expensive gold and silver lamp hung from the ceiling. Its chain is snapped so that it comes crashing to the ground. The oil spills out of the broken bowl, and the light is gone. Light is the symbol of life. The pitcher and the wheel continue the same idea, but from the symbolism of the drawing of water. The pitcher is broken, and so it can contain no more water, that is, life; the wheel is broken, so that water can no longer be drawn. 7. Then shall the dust return to the earth. Here sketched in bold relief is the common thought of what happens after death: the body returns to that from which it was made (cf. 3:20; Gen 2:7); and the spirit, that is, the breath of life, returns to its source (cf. Gen 2:7; Job 34:14,15; Ps 104:29). Man ceases to exist as man.

IX. Epilogue. 12:9-14.

A. The Aim of the Preacher. 12:9,10. The purpose of his wisdom, says the author, has been to communicate it to others. He has attempted to do this effectively and frankly.

10. To find out acceptable words. Better read with the RSV, pleasing words. The author sought to make his teaching interesting so as to gain the attention of his hearers, but he never sacrificed frankness or truth in order to keep his audience.

B. A Commendation of His Teachings. 12:11,12. Claiming to have received his teachings by direct revelation from God, the author states that therefore his hearers do not need to go elsewhere for truth.

11. As nails fastened. These teachings are truths to which one can affix his life securely. The masters of assemblies. The schools of wise men. By the words one shepherd the author seems to indicate not some teacher, such as Solomon, but rather God, who is often called by such a title (cf. Ps 23:1). He implies, thereby, that his teachings are God-given. 12. Of making many books there is no end. Speaking to the general reader as my son, the author warns against useless reading and studying. The reader should concentrate on the author's teachings, for they are divinely inspired.

C. The Conclusion of the Matter. 12:13,14. Taking everything into consideration–the experiences and the mental turmoil through which the author has gone–the highest good in life is a proper reverence of God in all of life.

13. Fear God. The foundation of life is fear of God, that is, reverence toward him, a proper acknowledgment of who he is, and what he demands of men in everyday life (cf. Prov 15:33; Isa 11:3). 14. Every work into judgment. Both man's work and his secret thing, that is, his thoughts, will be judged by God. The heart attitude is important in God's sight, as well as one's public actions.

In reality the author says nothing more in these last verses than he has been saying throughout the book–enjoy life while you can. This can be accomplished only by fearing God; for God is in control, and he can be expected to reward righteousness and punish evil.

The author of Ecclesiastes has often been called a pessimist, but this is not necessarily so. He longed to know more of the answers to the puzzles of life than he had thus far learned, but God in His providence did not choose to disclose them. Yet the author had discovered that life apart from God is futile. A man attains to the 'good life' by reverencing God. That this writer's 'highest good' was primarily physical happiness should not cloud the issue. He lived on the plane of the physical and sensuous; he did not know the higher things. But he never gave up his faith in God. The preacher learned to live with life's paradoxes, having discovered, as did Job, that life will not wait upon the solution of all its problems.

THE SONG OF SOLOMON

INTRODUCTION

Name, Authorship, and Integrity. This book, belonging to the five megilloth, or rolls, was annually read by the Jews on the eighth day of the Passover. The heading Song of Songs (1:1) is the literal translation of the Hebrew Shîr hash-shîrîm. The repetition of the noun in the genitive plural is the Hebrew way of bringing out the special character of the Song: it is the best or most excellent of songs (cf. Gen 9:25; Ex 26:33; Eccl 1:2).

Although the first verse of chapter 1 can also be read: "The Song of Songs which is about or concerning Solomon," the traditional view has been to regard King Solomon as the author of the Song. Since the contents of the book is fully in harmony with the great gifts of wisdom which we know Solomon possessed (I Kgs 4:32,33), there is no sufficient ground to deviate from this historic position.

The unity of the book can hardly be seriously challenged. Similar refrains occur in 2:7; 3:5; 8:4; the imagery is the same throughout the book; and the same characters appear again and again.

Interpretation. As to its literary genre, the Song of Solomon is obviously a poem of love. The difficulty is how to interpret it. The following are some of the varied interpretations that have been advanced.

1. Allegorical. This was the interpretation common among the Jews from ancient times, and from them it has passed over into the Christian Church. The Jews regarded the Song as expressing the love relationship between God and his chosen people. The Christian Church saw in it reflected love between Christ and the Church. Essentially this view has been advocated by Hengstenberg and Keil.

2. The dramatic view. The essence of this view, as advocated by Franz Delitzsch, is that the Song is a drama representing Solomon as having fallen in love with a rustic girl, the Shulamite, whom he takes to his royal palace in Jerusalem. A particular form of this view, the shepherd hypothesis, introduces into the Song a third character, a shepherd, to whom the Shulamite girl remains faithful despite the advances of Solomon.

3. The typical view. This view, too, holds that in the Song there is portrayed the great love between Christ and the Church, King Solomon being regarded as a type of Christ, and the bride as representing the Church. This view differs from the allegorical in that it tries to do justice to the actual language of the Song without seeking a special meaning in every phrase, as the allegorical view does.

4. The natural or literal view. The basic tenet of this view is that the Song is a poem extolling human love. From that point on, because of the inclusion of this book in the canon of Scripture, adherents of this view may differ widely as to the ultimate significance of this song of love. This commentary is construed on the assumption that the natural view is correct. Taking this approach, the canonical significance of the Song of Songs may be stated as follows.

(a) The book is called the "best of songs," and understandably so. This is a song which Adam could have sung in Paradise when the Lord in His wise providence led Eve to him to be his wife. In frank but pure language the book praises the mutual love between husband and wife, and thereby teaches us not to despise physical beauty and married love as being of a low order. Since these are gifts from the Creator to his creatures (cf. Jas 1:17), they are good and perfect in their place and for their purpose. The book presents a strong warning against an unbiblical dualism which holds the physical and material in lower regard than the spiritual, and which exalts the unmarried state as more virtuous than the state of matrimony.

(b) As the counterpart of (a), the Song instructs us not to glamorize physical beauty and idolize the biological aspect of marriage. Notwithstanding the straightforward manner in which physical beauty and attractiveness are described, the love relationship portrayed in the Song is of a lofty character. Nowhere does the description even border on what might be considered lewd and licentious. Thus the Song holds before us the ideal love relationship in marriage. (For the separation of the two lovers spoken of, see the commentary). The Apostle Paul uses marriage to illustrate the nature of the love between Christ and His Church (Eph 5), but certainly not every marriage reflects this bond of intimate love. Only a marital relationship as pure as that portrayed in the Song can serve this purpose.

(c) The reading of this book, far from raising sensuous thoughts in our minds, should lead us to praise the Creator who created man in His own image, who made the human body beautiful, who awoke in Adam the longing for a companion like himself yet different, and who led the first bride—the very climax of the works of creation—to her admiring bridegroom. The reading of this book should also make us aware of our sinful failures in our attitude toward members of the other sex in general, and in particular our sins of the flesh within marriage. Thus it is that by this book the Holy Spirit will lead sinners to the Christ who is also the Redeemer and Sanctifier of holy wedlock. Seeing and experiencing the purity and holiness of this earthly bond of love will also lead us to better understanding of that love relationship which is heavenly and eternal, namely, the spotlessly pure and indestructible bond of love that exists between Christ and his Church.

OUTLINE

(The book does not present definitely marked divisions. The following is a suggested outline.)

I. The mutual affection of bride and bridegroom. 1:1—2:7.
II. The bride speaking of her bridegroom. Her first dream about him. 2:8—3:5.
III. The bridal procession. The bride's second dream. Her conversation with the daughters of Jerusalem. 3:6—6:3.
IV. The bridegroom's further praise of his bride's beauty. Her desire for him. 6:4—8:4.
V. Final expressions of mutual love. 8:5—14.

COMMENTARY

I. The Mutual Affection of Bride and Bridegroom. 1:1—2:7.

A. Superscription. The Maiden's Expression of Her Love for Her Lover. 1:1-4.

1. For this verse see the Introduction. 2. The bride speaks first, eloquently expressing her great love and longing for her lover. Let him kiss me. Not the expression of mere sensuous desire. In Scripture the kiss is frequently referred to as an expression of a deep and pure love (Rom 16:16; I Thess 5:26; I Pet 5:14). The bride's use of the pronouns him and his suggests the spontaneity with which this expression of love bursts from her lips. It is not necessary to resort to the translation you and your as in the RSV; oscillations in the use of persons occur frequently in Hebrew (cf. Deut 32:13-15; Jer 2:2,3; Hos 4:6; Zech 9:13,14). Wine is often associated with joy and gladness (Jud 9:13; Ps 104:15; Prov 31:6; Eccl 10:19). It can also express the spiritual joy that comes from possessing the gifts of the grace of God (Isa 55:1; Joel 3:18; Amos 9:13). But better than wine which gladdens the heart is the love of the bridegroom to the bride. 3. Ointment. Anointing oil was an indispensable item in the Orient. The hot climate made frequent bathing necessary, after which the skin was treated with sweet-smelling oil (cf. II Chr 28:15; II Sam 14:2; Dan 10:3; Mt 6:17). Thy name. Not merely as a badge of identification. The name of a person frequently said something specific about him (Ex 2:10). It could even suggest his entire character (Mt 1:21). The bride is speaking of the splendid character of her bridegroom and the esteem in which he is held everywhere. Because of these outstanding characteristics, the maidens (AV, virgins) love him. In her boundless admiration for him, the bride cannot but think of other maidens as likewise having a great affection for her bridegroom. The word for maiden (Hebrew 'almâ) is used of a girl of marriageable age who is still unmarried (Gen 24:43; Ex 2:8; Isa 7:14 and Mt 1:23; Ps 68:25; Prov 30:19).

4. Already the bride is close to her lover, having been brought into his chambers, but she desires to be in his immediate presence. The king mentioned here is Solomon. Those who interpret typically see in this and similar expressions a reference to Christ. Let us (AV, we will) be glad. The bride wishes to share her joy with others; the reference is to the maidens mentioned in verse 3. These maidens are not mistaken in their affection for the king; he fully deserves it.

B. The Bride to the Daughters of Jerusalem. 1:5,6.

5. Swarthy am I, but comely. Exposure to the sun has tanned the skin of the bride, but she has not lost her loveliness. Even though she is swarthy as the tents of Kedar, she is still comely as the curtains of Solomon. Kedar was a son of Ishmael (Gen 25:13). The tents of the nomadic tribe descended from him (Jer 2:10; Ps 120:5) were of black or dark brown goatskin. The hyperbolic reference to these tents emphasizes the darkness of the complexion of the girl. The curtains of Solomon must have been very beautiful; and notwithstanding her dark complexion, the bride is still lovely like them. The allegorical significance of "black (so AV) through sin, but comely through grace" is often suggested. 6. My mother's children were angry with me. The girl is not to be blamed for her present dark complexion. For a reason not mentioned her brothers became incensed with her and put her to keeping the vineyards. They went so far as not even to let her tend her own vineyard. This harsh treatment, however, has not detracted from her loveliness, and it has not prevented the king's conceiving a special love for her.

C. The Girl to Her Distant Lover, and the Reply. 1:7,8.

7. Tell me . . . where you pasture the flock. Genuine love for the lover brings with it constant longing to be in his immediate presence. The Song brings this out by several times representing the two lovers as separated from each other. The king is pictured as a shepherd; certainly a fitting designation. Why should I be as a veiled woman . . . ? It was the custom of harlots to veil themselves (Gen 38:14). True love wishes to avoid every appearance of unfaithfulness and impurity. 8. Follow the footprints of the flock, and pasture thy kids. It is not stated from whom the answer to the girl's query comes. The thought expressed by the answer is that all the bride has to do is to perform the duties that are hers as the bride of the king. These duties she is to perform near the tents of the shepherds, that is, in the presence of others; and such faithful service will confirm her unsullied reputation.

D. Bridegroom and Bride to Each Other. 1:9-17.

9. I have compared thee . . . to . . . horses. The king speaks. Horses were known for their strength and their beauty, and they were often beautifully ornamented. A fine description of a horse is given in Job 39:19-25. Solomon possessed large numbers of horses and chariots (I Kgs 4:26; 10:26), many of which came from Egypt (I Kgs 10:28,29). The comparison suggests the striking beauty of the bride and her excellent personality traits. 10. How lovely are your cheeks among the jewels. The description given here is continued with still greater detail in chapter 4. The ornaments accentuate the beauty of the cheeks and neck of the bride. 11. We shall make for thee . . . The king promises his love new ornaments to enhance her beauty even more (cf. Ezk 16:11).

12. The bride begins to speak. The Hebrew may also be translated While the king was on his couch . . . The spikenard, or nard, was a fragrant plant of Indian origin from which was extracted an aromatic oil, very precious and highly valued (Mk 14:3-5). The sweet smell of the nard is a symbol of the bride's love. 13,14. Myrrh was a fragrant substance, prepared from a plant which also originally came from India. It was used for various purposes (cf. Ps 45:8; Prov 7:17; Est 2:12). Hebrew women often wore small bags of myrrh between their breasts. Myrrh was among the gifts the Wise Men offered Jesus (Mt 2:11). Henna is a plant with fragrant yellow and white flowers. In Palestine it was found especially in the valley of Engedi, an oasis on the western shore of the Dead Sea. These comparisons suggest how highly the bride regards her lover.

15. Thou art fair, my love. The bridegroom resumes speaking, again praising the exceeding beauty of his bride. Apparently it is the sparkling beauty of the bride's eyes rather than her purity and innocence that reminds the lover of doves, for in this passage it is the physical beauty of the bride which is emphasized. The allegorical interpreter will insist that the bride's beauty is a gift of God's grace.

16. The bride replies, calling him beautiful, as he did her. Then she immediately turns to a description of imaginary surroundings which form the proper background for their great love for each other. Since all other details in the immediate context are figurative, it is not necessary here to think of an actual place in the open air or of a booth of leaves constructed on the flat roof of a house.

E. Dialogue Between Bride and Bridegroom Continued. 2:1-7.

1. I am the rose of Sharon. The bride is still speaking. It is difficult to determine which flower the bride refers to. The only other occurrence of the word in the OT is in Isa 35:1. Crocus appears to be the best translation. Sharon is the Mediterranean coastal plain between Joppa and Caesarea. In the time of Solomon it was a place of great fertility. 2. As the lily among thistles. The bridegroom speaks. In her humility the bride may think of herself only as a beautiful but humble crocus; he regards her as a lily among thistles. So far as lilies surpass thistles, so far does she surpass other maidens. 3. As the apple tree. The bride responds in the same vein. As an apple tree which produces delicious fruit surpasses the other trees of the forest, so does her bridegroom surpass other young men. 4. The king has brought her, a humble country girl, to a banqueting hall. But she need not fear and be bashful in the presence of the young ladies of Jerusalem, for with his love he is protecting her and putting her at ease. (For the thought of protection, see Ex 17:15.) 5. Overcome with love and admiration for her lover, the bride asks for raisin cakes (flagons) and apples to strengthen her physically.

6. His left hand is under my head. This verse can be translated either as expressing a wish or as stating a fact. Both translations fit the context equally well. The first translation makes this verse another cry from the bride for help. According to the second possible translation, the fact related in this verse is the response of the bridegroom to the request of his bride; or it may indicate how close together the two are in the banqueting hall. 7. I charge you. No real oath is intended by the girl, since the adjuration is by animals. Why these animals are chosen, we do not know. Perhaps they were thought of as best symbolizing the character of pure love. Putting her request in the form of an oath emphasizes her most urgent pleading not to awaken love prematurely, for love is very tender and easily harmed. At its own proper time it will awaken of itself.

II. The Bride Speaking of Her Bridegroom. Her First Dream about Him. 2:8–3:5.

A. The Bride's Song of Love for the Bridegroom. 2:8-17.

8. The voice of my beloved! In well-chosen imagery the bride speaks of the coming of her beloved. Although this section may well have had a historical background in the life of the king, its purpose is to give expression to the bride's deep love for her bridegroom. The imagery is drawn from nature. Gazelles and young harts climb mountains and leap over hills with ease and grace. 9. By the wall must be meant the wall of the house in which the Shulamite dwells. Before this wall the bridegroom, like a gazelle or young hart that is shy and distrustful of men, stands looking through the window and peering through the lattices. He does not come to his bride rudely or even boldly but as one deeply respecting her.

10,11. Winter past . . . rain . . . gone. He calls her to go with him. Here the symbolism of the gazelle and hart is dropped and the imagery of the seasons is introduced. The latter suggests that bride and bridegroom have reached the proper state of maturity for the fruition of their mutual love (contrast v. 7). 12-14. The picture of the arrival of this time of spring is made more vivid by the enumeration of changes that take place in nature at this season. The urgency of the call of the bridegroom to his bride to join him is evident from the repetition of the words of verse 10: Arise, my love, . . . , and come away. She had called him a gazelle and a young hart; he now calls her my dove, a term of endearment. The bride reproduces here the words of her bridegroom.

15. These are the bride's own words. The foxes. Likely the annoyances and cares that may interfere with and damage their love. Their love is fully blossoming, and nothing should be allowed to disturb it. 16,17. My beloved is mine, and I am his. The bride is confident that she and her bridegroom belong together. She pictures him here as a shepherd who during the day is feeding his flock and is thus away from her. In the language of spiritual devotion, these words have frequently been applied to the relationship between Christ and his beloved people. Among the lilies suggests that the bridegroom carries on his daily duties in surroundings that are in keeping with his character and dignity. Until the day break. Or, until the day cools. Literally, until the day breathes, i.e., until the evening breezes come. The reference is to the end of the day, when the heat, often scorching, is displaced by invigorating coolness. Evening is also the time when the shadows, which exist only when there is sunlight, are disappearing. Verse 17 is the final response, in this section, of the bride to her lover. Throughout the section both are giving expression to their yearning desire for each other. Mountains of Bether (AV). Or, possibly, craggy mountains. The Hebrew verb may come from a root meaning "to cut in pieces" (cf. Gen 15:10; Jer 34:19). If this etymology is accepted, the words may be translated "craggy" mountains or "mountains of separation," that is, mountains that separate us (Berkeley Version).

B. The Bride's Dream of Her Lover. 3:1-5.

1. By night . . . I sought him. The section beginning with this verse records a dream of the bride. True love is not blanked out during sleep but may manifest itself in dreams about the beloved. In the dream related here—a consequence of the bride's constant preoccupation with her lover during waking hours – she seeks him everywhere but cannot find him. 2. In the broad ways I will seek him. The bride dreams that she arises and goes about the city in search of her bridegroom. 3. The watchmen that go about. A detail of the dream. The words to whom I said (AV) are not found in the Masoretic Text. In a dream, scenes shift quickly; hence the seeming abruptness of the question.

4. I found him. The scene shifts again. No answer from the watchmen is recorded; in a dream such is not necessary. The dream of the girl and her longing for her lover culminate in her finding him and bringing him home to her mother's own room. This chamber, which speaks of intimacy, must have been almost sacred to the young woman. Her leading him to it suggests the tenderness of her affection for him. 5. Stir not up . . . my love, till he please. Love can be a mighty force in the lives of men and women. Unanswered and unsatisfied it can cause untold pain and great grief to the human heart. But love requited gives unspeakable joy. The Shulamite in her dream experiences both in some degree – both love unsatisfied and love fulfilled. Hence this refrain (cf. 2:7) is not an anticlimax to the reunion of the two lovers in the dream. Rather, it indicates recognition of the fact that because these are the effects which love can have, it must be handled with the utmost care and should not be aroused before its proper time.

III. The Bridal Procession. The Bride's Second Dream. Her Conversation with the Daughters of Jerusalem. 3:6–6:3.

A. The Bridal Procession. 3:6-11.

6. What is this. The section beginning here speaks of the bridal procession (see verse 11). The word desert (AV wilderness) may mean no more here than the open country as distinct from inhabited villages and cities. The pillars (or columns) of smoke indicate that during the procession much fragrant incense is burned, marking the route of the procession. Myrrh and frankincense, with all the [fragrant] powders of the merchant (AV). These lend additional dignity and importance to what is seen coming up from the desert.

7. Behold his litter. The arrival of the bridal procession is introduced in the form of a question; this verse gives the answer. In keeping with the royal dignity of the king, his litter is surrounded by strong soldiers from among the best men of Israel. 8. Expert in war. These are all experienced soldiers, capable of protecting the king and his bride from any dangers to which they may be exposed, especially the dangers of the night. 9,10. A chariot. Or a bed, or a throne. A more detailed description of the litter or palanquin which Solomon made for himself. The whole gives the impression of magnificent royal splendor and dignity. The midst thereof being paved . . . Possibly, its interior made from gifts of love. The daughters of Jerusalem, it seems, provided the material for the interior of the royal palanquin, to show their love for their king. 11. Behold king Solomon with the crown. The bride is not separately mentioned in this verse; but from the fact that Solomon is wearing the crown given him by his mother, it may be inferred that she is sitting beside him on the royal couch. Because Solomon had many wives (I Kgs 11:3), it is impossible for us to say whether or not what is recorded in this section refers to one specific event in the life of the king. This passage does, however, speak of a wedding day and of the great joy which such a day brings to the bridal couple, a gladness which is witnessed and shared by others.

B. The Bridegroom's Praise of His Bride's Beauty. 4:1-15.

Chapter 4 is a song praising the exquisite beauty of the bride, in imagery best understood and appreciated by the Oriental mind. 1. For eyes as doves, see on 1:15. Mount Gilead, a mountain range east of the Jordan River, was very well suited for animal husbandry (cf. Num 32:1). Goats, which are often of dark color, trailing down the slopes of the mountain, suggests the dark waves of the girl's beautiful hair. 2. In recognition of the custom of washing sheep before shearing, some commentators prefer to read this verse: Your teeth are like a flock of sheep ready for the shearing. It seems better, however, to translate, your teeth are like a flock of shorn sheep which have come up from the washing, because the comparison is intended to bring out the whiteness of the teeth. None of the bride's teeth are missing, as the next comparison indicates. 3. Scarlet is a bright, rich crimson, obtained from an insect called kirmiz by the Arabs (Westminster Dictionary of the Bible). The bride's temples can be said to be like a sliced pomegranate, because the inside of this fruit is filled with numerous ruby-colored seeds. 4. Like the tower of David. This tower, though no longer known to us, was apparently well known in those days. The exact rendering of the words translated in the AV builded for an armory remains a question. The translation, built with terraces, which seems the most plausible, goes back to the Vulgate. The armoury (AV), or terraces, upon which there hang . . . shields (cf. Ezk 27:11) may well suggest jewels worn by the bride, which accentuate the beauty of her neck. 5. Like two young roes. The breasts of the bride are youthfully tender like fawns of a gazelle. Feeding among the lilies suggests the well-formed body of the bride from which the breasts arise.

6. I will get me to the mountain. This verse in which the bridegroom digresses from describing the beauty of the bride is difficult to explain. Some commentators hold that the mountain of myrrh and the hill of frankincense are symbols for the physical attractions of the girl. A better approach seems to be to read here Solomon's intention to gather these precious aromas with which, in the evening, he will go to his beloved. For Until the day break, see 2:17. 7. No spot. Without blemish. This sums up the beauty and attractiveness of the girl.

8. This verse expresses the great longing of the king for his bride. The words, from Lebanon, perhaps indicate that because of his great longing for her, she seems far away and inaccessible. Amana is one of the streams that flow eastward from the top of the Lebanon mountains (cf. II Kgs 5:12). Mount Hermon, called Senir (Shenir, AV) by the Amorites (cf. Deut 3:9), is the highest peak of the Lebanon. 9. To the king the beauty of the bride is irresistible. The designation my sister expresses how unspeakably dear she is to him. 10. Compare 1:3,4. 11. The fragrance of Lebanon, coming from the cedars and other plants that grew there in abundance, may well have been proverbial (cf. Hos 14:6,7). 12. A garden inclosed. Since the bride belongs exclusively to Solomon, she resembles a garden that is locked and inaccessible to all but the owner. Also wells and fountains were sometimes sealed to preserve the water, a far from plenteous commodity in the Orient, and to keep it away from others. 13,14. An orchard . . . with pleasant fruits. The figure of the garden is continued. To the king, the Shulamite, whom he may call his own, is like a garden yielding its owner the choicest fruits. 15. A garden fountain. As verses 13 and 14 elaborate on the first part of 12, so this verse elaborates on the second part of that verse. To the king his bride is like fountains and streams yielding an abundance of fresh and pure water.

C. The Response of the Bride. 4:16.

The bride calls upon both north wind and south wind to blow upon her, that the wonderful fragrance which the bridegroom has ascribed to her may stream forth from her as from a park full of excellent fruits. Since she herself is this garden, or orchard, she here calls her lover to herself to enjoy the fruits to which he is entitled.

D. The Bridegroom's Reply to His Bride, and a Call to the Two Lovers. 5:1.

1a. Heeding the bride's invitation, the king is now saying that he comes and enjoys the excellent fruits of his garden, his bride. The reunion of the two lovers, so deeply in love with each other, is again in view here. 1b. It is best not to understand these words as part of the preceding paragraph. Someone (possibly more than one), we do not know who, is speaking here and exhorting the two lovers to delight fully in each other's presence. This call forms the fitting climax to the bridegroom's description of the exquisite beauty of his bride.

E. The Bride's Dream of Longing for Her Bridegroom. 5:2-7.

2. The first statement here suggests that what is about to be related occurred in a dream. The contents of this dream must be understood as forming the introduction to the expressions of love and the description of the appearance of the bridegroom in 5:8-16. In 5:2 the poet is skillfully representing the bridegroom as coming to his bride after having gone a long way through the night, as is evident from the dew with which his hair is wet. 3. I have put off my coat. The bride's excuse for failing to open to her beloved. In the East, whether one walked barefooted or wore sandals, the feet always became soiled so that they required frequent washing. 4. By the hole of the door (AV). Not put his hand to the latch (RSV; Berkeley). In events occurring in a dream one must not press for exactness in detail. Through some sort of hole the bridegroom puts his hand, likely in order to open the door.

Seeing this, the bride is greatly thrilled, and (cf. v. 5) overcoming her reluctance, rises to open the door. Touching the handles of the bar, her fingers and hands drip with the myrrh which the bridegroom has poured on it. 6. My soul had fainted (AV, failed) when he spoke gives an additional reason for her failure to open the door immediately; hearing his voice has overwhelmed her. 7. Instead of finding her beloved, she meets with misfortune. As in the previous dream (ch. 3), so now again she meets with the watchmen. But this time, likely thinking her to be an evil woman prowling the streets at night, they beat her and take away her mantle. Then the dream breaks off.

F. Dialogue Between the Bride and the Daughters of Jerusalem. 5:8–6:3. The dream preceding this section introduces a separation between the two lovers. This separation now becomes the basis for renewed declarations of love and devotedness to the loved partner.

8. Tell him, that I am sick with love. This time it is the bride who gives expression to her deep feeling of love for her bridegroom. Not having been able, in her dream, to find her beloved, she now urgently appeals to the daughters of Jerusalem, if they find him, to tell him of her great love (cf. 2:7; 3:5). 9. What is thy beloved more than another. This urgent appeal prompts these girls to ask what is 'so special' about her beloved. Their question affords the bride opportunity to describe the striking appearance of the bridegroom. 10. Chiefest among ten thousand. His appearance is such that among ten thousand he is easily distinguished. 11. The head like pure (AV, most fine) gold illustrates the nobility that radiates from his head and face. 12. For eyes as doves see on 1:15. The sparkling beauty of the dove is particularly brought out when it sits beside brooks of water. Bathing in milk refers to the white in the eyes. 13. As sweet flowers (AV). Literally, towers of herbs. The RSV, with a slight change in the Hebrew original, translates: yielding fragrance. However, towers should be allowed to stand, since it refers to the fullness of the cheeks. 14-16. His hands . . . his mouth. The bride moves on to describe other features of her lover's body, every one of which she finds exceedingly beautiful. Finally to the girls in Jerusalem she calls out: Such is my beloved, and such is my friend.

6:1. In 5:8 the bride urges the girls in Jerusalem to tell her beloved of her great love for him in case they should find him. Now these girls ask, Whither is thy beloved gone? This question comes also as a direct sequence to the dream of the bride in which she fails to find her beloved. 2. Down into his garden. But the bride needs the other maidens no longer. Her bridegroom has gone to his garden. In the light of 4:12-15 and 5:1, where each lover calls the other a garden, it does not seem farfetched to read in this verse that the bridegroom has now returned to her. 3. Cf. 2:16.

IV. The Bridegroom's Further Praise of His Bride's Beauty. Her Desire for Him. 6:4–8:4.

A. The Lover's Praise of His Beloved. 6:4-10.

4. The city of Tirzah, located northeast of the city of Samaria, was the first capital of the northern kingdom till the time of Omri (I Kgs 14:17; 15:21,33; 16:8,15,23,24). If Solomon is regarded as the author of the Song of Songs, he cannot, of course, have known Tirzah as a capital city. It appears that the city must have been a very beautiful one, which would account for its mention here. Terrible as an army with banners. Though modern Western minds find it difficult to appreciate this illustration, it indicates the irresistible beauty of the bride. 5. Turn away thine eyes. The great beauty of the bride confuses the king. For 5 b,6,7, see on 4:1-3. 8. The total number of Solomon's queens and concubines was greater than that mentioned here (cf. I Kgs 11:3). 9. But among all these women and maidens, the Shulamite stands out by virtue of her flawless beauty, even as the king is distinguished among ten thousand (5:10). The choice one (or, the dearly beloved or darling) of her mother. 10. The words, Who is she . . . , are best regarded as reproducing the words of praise spoken by the queens and concubines.

B. The Bride and Her Admirers. 6:11-13.

11. I went down into the garden. It is difficult to determine who is the speaker here, Solomon or his bride, though it seems best to take the bride as the speaker. She is directing these words to the women admiring her (v. 10), to whom she tells of her going down to the garden of nuts. 12. He had placed me in the chariots of my noble people. No one has yet been able to provide a satisfactory rendering and interpretation of these words. The bride may be speaking here of the way in which she was unexpectedly and suddenly elevated to queenly dignity. This verse, as well as verse 11, would then be the bride's response to the words of praise extended to her by queens and concubines. 13. The queens and other women ask the bride to turn around again and again so that they may admire her. It cannot be said with certainty who it is that asks the question, What will ye see. This question is plainly a device employed by the poet to introduce his next description of the beauty of the bride. It is not impossible that this question is asked by the women urging the Shulamite to turn again and again. The designation Shulamite for the bride is likely derived from the place Shunem (cf. Josh 19:18; I Sam 28:4; II Kgs 4:8). The Mahanaim dance must have been a well-known dance. Mahanaim was a place located on the boundary of the tribe of Gad, not far from the river Jordan.

C. The King Extolling the Beauty of His Bride and Her Love for Him. 7:1-13.

Verses 1-9 constitute an ode in praise of the physical excellence of the bride. Our God, who created the magnificence of nature, with its almost infinite variety, also created the human body in such a way that it is a marvel of his handiwork. Physical beauty and the pure desire of husband and wife (and bridegroom and bride) for each other are God-given gifts to man. It is the perversion of these gifts that is base (cf. Rom 1:26,27), and therefore to be condemned.

The second part of Song 6:13 forms the introduction to the description of the bride given here. 7:1. How beautiful are thy feet. The king is speaking. Perhaps we may think of the bride as engaged in dancing, in which act her beauty becomes even more strikingly apparent. 2. May it never be lacking mingled wine (AV, which wanteth not liquor), serves to complete the picture, as does the phrase set about with lilies. 3. See on 4:5. 4. As a tower of ivory. The bride's neck is fair and smooth like ivory and slender like a tower. The pools of Heshbon suggests the sparkling clarity of the eyes. Heshbon was the ancient capital of the Amorites (Num 21:25,26; Deut 2:24). Bath-rabbim was a gate of Heshbon. The tower of Lebanon was likely a watchtower. The writer must have regarded a prominent nose as very beautiful. 5. Carmel is the mountain range the summit of which overlooks the Mediterranean sea and the Palestinian land in solitary majesty. Hair . . . like purple. The beauty of the bride's hair is such that it has captivated the king. 6. Of all the things that a person may desire, there is nothing that can compare with this beautiful bride. 7. Thy stature is like a palm tree. She is like a stately palm tree. As clusters . . . Likely clusters of dates are meant. 8,9 a. The bridegroom expresses his desire to embrace his beloved bride and fully enjoy her love and beauty.

9b. Like the best wine. The response of the bride, who continues the symbolic language employed by her lover. Even while he is sleeping, her love is flowing out to him. 10. The bride echoes the words in Gen 3:16: "thy desire shall be to thy husband." 11,12. Let us go forth into the field. The bride urges her beloved to go with her to a place where they can fully enjoy each other's love. 13. The ancients believed that eating mandrakes would stimulate sexual desire (as well as induce conception; cf. Gen 30:14-16). Hence mandrakes are also called love apples. The plant gave forth a strong smell which was pleasing to people in the East. The choice fruits are an indication of the bride's loving care for her bridegroom.

D. The Bride's Longing To Be Fully One with Her Lover. 8:1-4.

1. As my brother. Obviously the Shulamite does not really want her bridegroom to be her brother; rather, she desires the close and intimate relation only brothers and sisters know. The fact that her descent was much humbler than that of Solomon may form the background of this statement (cf. 1:5,6). If he were her brother, she could also freely kiss him in public without incurring public scorn. 2. I would . . . bring thee into my mother's house. The intimate fellowship in the family circle is referred to (cf. 3:4). 3. See on 2:6. Another climax in the book; the bride is close to her lover. 4. Except for why should you, this verse is identical to 2:7 and 3:5. Love should not be stirred up before its proper time, because the love relationship, unless carefully guarded, may cause grief instead of the great joy it should bring to the human heart (cf. 2:7; 3:5). Neither is it necessary to seek to arouse love, for worthy love will awaken of itself in its own time.

V. Final Expressions of Mutual Love. 8:5-14.

A. Lover and Loved One Walking Together. 8:5-7.

5a. Who is this that cometh . . . ? This question is asked by the poet to set the scene for what follows. For wilderness, see 3:6. The two are observed walking together and conversing. The king reminds his bride of how he once found her (perhaps on their first meeting?) sleeping under an apple tree near the house of her mother, and had awakened her. 6,7. Set me as a seal upon thine heart. These words, uttered by the bride, sum up the theme of the entire Song and constitute its climax. A signet ring or seal was worn on the right hand (Jer 22:24), or carried suspended over the heart by a string worn around the neck (Gen 38:18). It was an emblem of authority (cf. Gen 41:42; I Kgs 21:8) and hence a very precious possession. The symbolism is expressive of the bride's irresistible desire to be her bridegroom's most treasured possession.

King Solomon, who composed this Song under the inspiration of the Holy Spirit, here transcends his own practices, for his granting the wish of the Shulamite would have ruled out his polygamy. This expression of fervent and irresistible love from the lips of the bride points to the monogamous character of marriage. Marriage is the union in love of one man and one woman, and any intrusion by a third party violates the unique relationship between the two. The desire of one who truly loves is so strong that he gives himself completely to the other and desires the same strong, exclusive affection in return. Such a love for another is from the Lord, who put it into man's heart, and it cannot be extinguished. Neither can it be bought. Not even Solomon, with all his wealth, could buy the love of the Shulamite girl. Instead, she gave it to him spontaneously, and her love was overwhelmingly great. Such absolute love is likewise the spiritual ideal between God and his people. We are warned not to serve two masters (Mt 6:24) and to love the Lord our God with all our heart, soul, mind, and strength (Mk 12:30).

B. The Virtuous Life of the Bride. 8:8-10.

8,9. We have a little sister. These verses, apparently spoken by the brothers of the bride, form the introduction to verse 9, where we again hear the bride speak. She hath no breasts. She has not yet reached maturity; she is not yet of marriageable age. The figure of a wall suggests the virtue of chastity and the ability to keep suitors at a proper distance. The turret (AV, palace) of silver shows what great respect, in that case, the brothers would have for their sister. However, if she would be a door, that is, be easy in yielding, then they would take proper measures to defend her so that she would not suffer from her own weakness.

It cannot be said with certainty who the young girl mentioned in this verse is, perhaps a younger sister of the bride; although it is also possible that verses 8 and 9 refer to the bride when she was still a child. 10. The Shulamite was like a wall, protecting her sacred honor. Only to her royal suitor, Solomon, did she surrender herself. Him she did not repel; she offered him peace; that is, she gave herself to him.

C. Words from the Bride. 8:11,12.

11. These may also be the words of the poet himself. He shows how rich Solomon was and how his riches continued to increase. The thousand pieces of silver were to be given to the king by each one who took of the fruit of the vineyard. Baal-hamon is nowhere else mentioned in Scripture; its location is unknown. 12. My vineyard . . . is before me. The bride, too, had a vineyard, but unlike Solomon she did not keep the price of the fruit for herself. Two hundred pieces of silver she paid to those in charge of the vineyard, but the thousand (pieces of silver), which represent the yield of the vineyard, she gave to Solomon. She surrendered not only herself to the king but her possessions as well.

D. Final Expressions of Mutual Love. 8:13,14.

13. The bridegroom utters his final longing words to his spouse. To him she is now like one dwelling in the garden (cf. 2:1). The companions, that is, those who are in her immediate presence, like to listen to her sweet voice. He likewise desires to hear it. 14. She responds to him in words similar to those she spoke before (cf. 2:17). With these words the Song ends. Perhaps we might think that a more appropriate conclusion would have been to bring the two lovers together in joyful union. But it must be remembered that the Song is not a modern novel or poem of love; it is the Word of God teaching us the beauty and purity of genuine human love, one of the gifts of the Creator to his creatures. This love the Holy Spirit saw fit to picture in terms of mutual desire for fellowship on the part of those devoted to one another. This relationship can indeed be used to depict the love between Christ and His Church, although human love, even in its purest form, can never be more than a shadow of that spiritual relationship. People who truly love each other will always long for one another. But greater yet should be the longing of the Church to be with Christ, her heavenly Bridegroom. The Church is the bride of Christ, and through the Holy Spirit dwelling within her she gives expression to her great longing to be forever with Him in the words: "Come, Lord Jesus, yea come quickly" (cf. Rev. 22:17,20).

ISAIAH

INTRODUCTION

Date and Authorship. Isaiah, the son of Amoz, was apparently a highly esteemed citizen of Jerusalem, who enjoyed access to the royal court, and was a trusted advisor of King Hezekiah. His ministry extended from the year of King Uzziah's death in 740 B.C. (if not from an earlier date) to the reign of the idolatrous King Manasseh, in whose persecution he was probably martyred. Tradition reports that he was slain by being sawn asunder (cf. Heb 11:37). Apparently he did no public preaching after Manasseh ascended the throne in 698, but confined his message to the written form preserved in chapters 40 through 66. The high point of his political influence came in the crucial year 701 B.C., when the Assyrian invasion threatened to destroy the Kingdom of Judah and remove its inhabitants into slavery and exile. Through his intercession with God, the terrible danger was miraculously removed, and the remnants of Sennacherib's army fled back ingloriously to Nineveh.

Historical Background. It was during this critical period of the latter half of the eighth century that Israel, the Northern Kingdom (the Ten Tribes), suffered a swift and catastrophic decline, after the death of the redoubtable Jeroboam II. Samaria was finally destroyed after a desperate siege in the year 722. The long succession of ungodly kings and the steady dwindling of Biblical faith spelled the downfall of Israel. Judah, under the corrupt and degenerate King Ahaz, seemed ready to follow Israel's dismal example of apostasy, and looked to pagan Assyria for protection and deliverance, rather than to her covenant God, Jehovah. Against this unfaithfulness Isaiah and Micah raised a stern and determined protest. By 726 the government had come under the control of Ahaz' God-fearing son, Hezekiah. He obliterated most of the idolatrous "high places," even those dedicated to Jehovah (contrary to His Law), and promoted Bible-literacy among the people as a whole. A near-fatal illness deepened Hezekiah's piety, and the reform movement continued. But still Judah adhered to the misguided policy of trusting to pagan allies, even though Isaiah earnestly warned against intrigues with Egypt. As the prophet predicted, trust in the worldly power of Egypt (rather than in the protection of God alone) proved well-nigh fatal. Egyptian armies crumbled before the onslaught of Sennacherib's fighting machine, and only divine intervention saved Hezekiah's kingdom from utter ruin. At this time of crisis the king thoroughly repented of his disregard of God's warnings (conveyed to him by Isaiah), and rose to such a height of faith and purity of trust that the Lord found it proper to hear his prayer.

Hezekiah survived this moment of glory by only a few years. Then his young, self-willed son, Manasseh, came to the throne. He lent a ready ear to the worldly-minded nobility, who had long chafed under the religious purity his father had enforced, and in the spirit of "broad-mindedness" gave license for the resumption of idolatry. Step by step he became a convinced idol-worshiper himself, and brutally persecuted those who held true to his father's faith. Doctrinal defection among the people was accompanied by a general breakdown in morals. The king and his nobles, who exploited the populace for selfish gain, filled Jerusalem with bloodshed and rapine. In this atmosphere of corruption and depravity Isaiah was granted a series of marvelous revelations looking forward to the Babylonian conquest of the following century, and beyond to the Restoration period, when the Second Jewish Commonwealth would be established in the Promised Land.

Critical Theories of Authorship, Largely on the assumption that genuine predictive prophecy is impossible, rationalist higher critics have contested the genuineness of Isaiah 40–66 ever since the late eighteenth century. The author of these chapters seemed to know of the fall of Jerusalem (a good century later than Isaiah's death), and also of the restoration to Palestine of the Jewish captives after the fall of Babylon to the Persians in 539 B.C. Therefore this section of "Isaiah" must have been written by an unknown author—the "Deutero-Isaiah" —who lived at least 130 years after the death of the eighth-century prophet.

In support of this position it is argued: (a) that a futuristic standpoint could not have been maintained over such a large number of chapters; (b) that the actual name of the Persian conqueror, Cyrus, who was destined to liberate the Jewish captivity, could not have been foreknown a century and a half in advance of the event. Actually, however, a futuristic standpoint is by no means maintained throughout these twenty-seven chapters; many passages deal with issues contemporary with the historical Isaiah. Secondly, Holy Scripture does not hesitate to foretell specific names when the occasion calls for it. The name of King Josiah was predicted by a prophet of Judah three centuries before his time (1 Kgs 13:2), in order to furnish a seal that the coming destruction of Jeroboam's idolatrous altar at Bethel was of the Lord's ordaining. Bethlehem was specifically named as the birthplace of the Messiah seven centuries before his advent (Mic 5:1,2). Moreover, it should be recognized that throughout the sixty-six chapters of Isaiah an extraordinary emphasis is laid upon predictive prophecy as a seal of divine inspiration. Some of the predictions were to be fulfilled soon (such as the deliverance of Jerusalem from Sennacherib by sudden, supernatural means—37:33-35; the defeat of Damascus within three years by Assyria—8:4,7; the destruction of Samaria within twelve years—7:16; the retreating of the shadow on the sundial—38:8). Others were intended for the more distant future (such as the Glory that should come to Galilee with the Messiah—9:1,2; cf. Mt 4:15,16; the devastation of Babylon by the Medes and its eventual total destruction, so as to remain an uninhabited and accursed site forever—13:17,19,20). It should be noted that it was precisely the reign of the wicked Manasseh (696—641 B.C.) which furnished the most serious challenge to the survival of the true faith. It was therefore most appropriate at this time for the covenant-keeping Jehovah to demonstrate his sovereignty and absolute authority by announcing a century or two in advance exactly what steps he would take in judgment upon apostate Judah and upon God-defying Babylon. This test of fulfillment of prophecy would furnish unanswerable proof of the divine authority of Isaiah's message: "Who, as I, shall call, and shall declare it . . . ? and things that are coming, and shall come [to pass], let them (the idols) declare. . . . Have I not declared to thee of old and showed it? And ye are My witnesses" (44:7,8). (Cf. 41:21-23, 26; 42:9,23; 43:9,12.)

It has been supposed that this hypothetical "Deutero-Isaiah" lived and wrote in Babylon as one of the Jewish Captivity around 550 B.C. But this is impossible to reconcile with internal evidence. Isaiah 40—66 shows little familiarity with Babylonian geography, but great familiarity with Palestine. The trees referred to are native to Palestine, but unknown in Babylonia (the cedar, cypress, and oak—44:14; 41:19). The viewpoint is Palestinian, for the Lord is said to send a message off to Babylon (43:14); Israel is described as the seed of Abraham which the Lord has taken from "the ends of the earth" (41:9), or "from the east" or "from a far country" (46:11). The prophet's contemporaries are assumed to be dwelling in Palestine, not in the land of exile. For example: "Is not this the fast I have chosen: to loose the bands of wickedness, and to let the oppressed go free, and that ye break every yoke?" The unavoidable inference is that the Jews were still holding their own law courts and administering justice (or injustice) as an independent nation, rather than being a subject race in a foreign land.

Some of the more recent critics (like Bernhard Duhm) have surrendered the notion that any of Isaiah 40—66 was written in Babylonia, but still insist that it was not composed until the latter part of the Exile or even a century later. But this theory also is controverted by the data of the text itself. The same evils prevailing in the time of Isaiah I are still rampant in the last twenty-seven chapters as well. Hypocrisy is prevalent in religion (cf. 29:13 and 58:2-4); bloodshed and violence are the order of the day (1:15 and 59:3,7); falsehood, injustice, and oppression hold sway unchecked (10:1,2 and 59:3-9). The same degeneracy and moral breakdown prevail in 59:1-8 as characterized the reign of Manasseh, who "filled Jerusalem with innocent blood from one end to the other" (II Kgs 21:16). Most decisive of all is the fact that in Isaiah II idolatry appears as a wide and prevalent evil among the prophet's Jewish contemporaries. "Against whom do ye sport yourselves . . . enflaming yourselves with idols under every green tree, slaying the children in the valleys under the clifts of the rocks?" (57:4,5; cf. 65:2,3 and 66:17, which also speak of contemporary Jewish practice.) It is almost universally recognized by critics of every persuasion that Judah was completely purged of idolatry after the Babylonian captivity. Many other evils and national sins are denounced and dealt with in the post-Exilic records, Ezra, Nehemiah, and Malachi, such as: intermarriage with foreign women, oppression of the poor by the rich, the violation of the Sabbath, and the withholding of tithes. But never once is idolatry referred to in any shape or form, even though in the pre-Exilic records it was much spoken of and sternly denounced as Israel's Number One sin. The only logical conclusion to draw in the light of this evidence is that these anti-idolatrous passages were composed before the Exile. And since they are imbedded in the context of the rest of Isaiah II (so also 44:9-20 and other passages), it is only reasonable to assume that the entire twenty-seven chapters were composed before the fall of Jerusalem in 587. There is not a shred of internal evidence to support the theory of a Second Isaiah, apart from a philosophical prejudice against the possibility of predictive prophecy. At every checkpoint the only place of origin that satisfies the data of the text is Palestine; the only time of composition that squares with the internal evidence is a date prior to the Exile, and more specifically, the reign of Manasseh.

The unity of the authorship of all sixty-six chapters is attested by the prevalence of the characteristic Isaianic title for God – "the Holy One of Israel." This occurs only five times in the rest of the OT, but it appears twelve times in the first thirty-nine chapters of Isaiah and fourteen in the last twenty-seven. Many distinctive phrases and figures of speech which are employed in the first part of the book recur in the second part as well (cf. 35:10 and 51:11; 11:9 and 65:25; 1:11,14 and 43:24). The unity is also certified by NT references, notably in Jn 12:38-41, where John quotes first from Isa 53:1 and then from Isa 6:9, and follows with the comment: "These things (i.e., these two quotations) said Isaiah when he saw His glory and spoke of Him." If the same author did not compose the two parts of Isaiah, then plainly the inspired apostle was in error, and his entire Gospel record is open to suspicion of untrustworthiness.

OUTLINE

(In its main divisions this outline follows the excellent analysis of B. F. Copass in The Prince of the Prophets.)

VOLUME I. REBUKE AND PROMISE. 1:1–6:13.

COMMENTARY

VOLUME ONE. REBUKE AND PROMISE. 1:1—6:13.

Sermon I. Rebellion Confronted with Judgment and Grace. 1:1-31.

1. Title: The vision. A technical term (ḥăzôn) for divine revelation, as something displayed before the mind's eye of the prophet. Actually there is no vision (in the modern sense of the word) in the entire first chapter. Isaiah. Hebrew yᵉsha'-yāhû, "Jehovah is salvation." Amoz. "Strong" or "courageous." Uzziah. Also known as Azariah, a good king, who fell into the sin of pride and ended his days as a leper (reigned 767—740 B.C.). Jotham (co-regent 750—740, sole king 740—736). Uzziah's godly successor. Ahaz (736—716). A wicked and idolatrous king, who led the kingdom astray. Hezekiah (co-regent 726—716, sole king 716—698 B.C.). Ahaz' god-fearing son, who promoted religious reform, and paid earnest heed to Isaiah's message, except in the matter of his pro-Egypt policy.

A. Judah's Ingratitude and Rebellion Against God. 1:2-9.

2. The words heavens and earth imply that the angelic inhabitants of the heavens and the human inhabitants of earth are to serve as condemnatory witnesses against God's covenant people. The Lord. This title stands for the covenant name of God, "Jehovah" (or more properly, Yahweh), and is everywhere so given in the ASV. This name is used wherever a covenant relationship is involved. Rebelled. The first of five significant terms for sin used in this chapter (cf. vv. 4,13). It signifies that primal sin of man in revolt against God whereby he sought to dethrone God from first place and to substitute himself and his own will as supreme. 3. The ingratitude of these "believers" debased them below the level of brute beasts, for even beasts recognize and appreciate their owners who feed them and care for them. Crib. A feeding trough (not a baby's bed). Doth not know. This common verb "to know" is often used in Hebrew to mean the owning and acknowledging of one's husband, wife, parent, or child. Israel was ignorant of God, yet this ignorance was not involuntary, but deliberately chosen by a rebellious and self-willed heart.

4. Sinful. A participle from the verb ḥāta', meaning originally, "miss the mark" (cf. Prov 8:6; Jud 20:16); hence, miss the proper goal of life, miss the way God has ordained. Laden. Like a wagon with a heavy load. The load is Israel's iniquity — a perversion or twisting aside (from 'āwâ, "to bend or twist") from the standard of rectitude and duty. Seed of evildoers. They were of the spiritual family of those who commit harmful, injurious sin (from rā'a', "be harmful," "be evil"). They were children that are corrupters, i.e., who destroyed or caused to putrefy (hiśhḥîth) that which was wholesome or perfectly made. Because they had rebelled against God's rightful sovereignty over their hearts, they had forsaken or abandoned him altogether, and joined the camp of the enemy, so far as moral life and behavior were concerned. Though they attended church, so to speak, and kept up outward appearances of piety, yet in God's eyes they had deserted him for his foes (vv. 11-15). A church-going hypocrite is a most valued tool of Satan.

They had provoked to anger the Holy One of Israel. This name for God is the most significant title employed by the prophet Isaiah. In chapter 6 Jehovah reveals himself in a scene of heavenly glory as the Holy One (Qādôsh), i.e., the transcendent God, who is wholly separate from the frailty and finiteness of Creation (his majesty-holiness), and wholly separate from the sinfulness and defilement of man (his purity-holiness). But this Holy One has claimed the family of Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob as his covenant children. He has given himself to them and they have given themselves to him in a covenant undertaken nationally, on their part, and solemnized before Mount Sinai (Ex 19:5-8). Therefore he is the Holy One of Israel. Wherever this term appears in Isaiah (twelve times in chs. 1—39, fourteen times in chs. 40—66), it presents his pure and holy love acting to vindicate his covenant rights — either chastening his people when they are disobedient, that they may repent and return unto him, or else defending and delivering them from their heathen foes. Because he is the Holy One of Israel, he could not stand idly by while he witnessed their grievous apostasy (they are gone away backward). Rather, he must discipline them, and let them suffer affliction and invasion — as they had already.

5,6. The land of Israel, and more especially the Southern Kingdom of Judah, is figuratively presented as the victim of a brutal assault, left bleeding and half-dead by the wayside. The ancient method of treating an infected wound was to squeeze it together (so render, they have not been closed) in order to press out the pus, anoint it with olive oil so that it would continue to drain, and then bind it up with a bandage. None of these things had been done for Judah. The whole heart is faint (or better, sick). Not only are external afflictions in view here, but also sickness of soul. This malady of head and heart (v. 5) found expression in the stubborn waywardness and disobedience the nation manifested toward God.

7,8. The figurative language of the previous verses is now translated into grim realities, describing the devastation of the land by the marauding Syrians (under King Rezin), North Israelites (under King Pekah), Edomites, and Philistines in 734–733 B.C. (cf. II Chr 28). Jerusalem itself was menaced by these invaders and largely cut off from the surrounding territory by besiegers. Doubtless these verses look forward prophetically to the far more serious investment of Jerusalem by the Assyrians under Sennacherib in 701 B.C. (some scholars refer this whole chapter to that later period). The cottage or booth (sukkâ) in the vineyard and the lodge or overnight shelter (mᵉlûnâ) both refer to temporary lean-to's or shanties built for the quartering of guards to protect the ripening crops against poachers.

9. Very small remnant or group of refugees (śārîd). That is, a remnant of true believers, for whose sake God would spare the whole commonwealth from the total destruction it deserved. (Cf. the complete annihilation of Sodom and Gomorrah, centers of filthy immorality and sexual perversion, in the time of Abraham; Gen 18; 19.) The Lord continued, in subsequent history, to preserve the Hebrew race for the sake of a small minority of sincere believers. In Rom 9:29 Paul quotes this verse with reference to Christian converts from Judaism.

B. The Sinful Subterfuge of Hypocritical Worship. 1:10-15.

10. The backsliding people of Jerusalem and their corrupt rulers (under wicked Ahaz) are here addressed as citizens of Sodom and Gomorrah because they had culpably and wickedly turned their backs on God's special revelation — as did the Sodomites upon general revelation — and the voice of conscience.

11-14. These verses do not represent rejection of the validity of blood sacrifices (as some scholars have argued), for such an interpretation would entail also rejection of prayer (cf. v. 15). Rather, they make clear that even right and proper forms of worship are utterly offensive to the Lord when presented by unrepentant worshipers seeking to bribe him to spare them the punishment they deserve. God does not, and cannot, find acceptable even the most lavish and costly offerings the unrepentant may present at the altar. 12. When the would-be worshiper has no sincere purpose to abandon his evil ways, his entrance before God at the Temple amounts to an impious trampling (RSV) of the holy precincts (a verb used of the violent intrusion of foreign invaders) rather than a properly reverent treading upon the hallowed pavement. 13. Vain oblations. Literally, a (meal) offering of worthlessness — worthless because of the carnal motive behind it. It is iniquity, even the solemn meeting. Better rendered by construing the previous words as anticipatory (since a solemn meeting or ăsārâh was generally held on these solemn holidays). Thus: "As for the festival of the new moon and the sabbath (and) the convoking of a convocation—I cannot stand iniquity and (i.e., along with) a solemn meeting." 14. Your appointed feasts (mô'ădîm). Probably the major three of the Hebrew year: Passover and Unleavened Bread in the first month, Pentecost in the third month, and Tabernacles in the seventh month. On these three occasions every male in Israel was to appear before the Lord. But no celebration of these feasts had any spiritual value unless supported by the offering of a completely yielded and obedient heart. 15. Spread forth your hands (lit., palms). In supplicatory prayer the Hebrew extends his hands with the palms upward towards God. How offensive these palms must be if they are stained with the blood of innocent victims they have oppressed or slain! Failure to turn from their sins rendered these worshipers utterly filthy in God's eyes.

C. The Invitation to Choose Between Pardon and Destruction. 1:16-20.

Two things are necessary for those who would approach God for forgiveness and favor: repentance from sin (v. 16), and a life-purpose to walk in the ways of holiness (v. 17). 16. Wash you does not imply self-amendment by mere human effort or exertion of will-power. Rather, it suggests application of the Lord's gracious promise to cleanse those who come to him in the appointed way of blood sacrifice. This appointed way includes the abandonment of all known sin – put away the evil of your doings – with a feeling of hatred towards it and sincere regret at ever having committed it. From before mine eyes suggests what heinous effrontery it is for a man to appear, unrepentant, before a God who can see all, even down to the very depths of the guilty soul. 17. Learn to do well. That is, Learn to live virtuously and uprightly, in accordance with God's holy will, and particularly to be fair toward the weak and oppressed. Seek judgment. Have an earnest and consistent purpose to apply the principles of righteousness to concrete situations (mishpāt). A believer's chief concern must be to show real justice and fairness, even towards those who are easily victimized and cannot defend themselves. Judge the fatherless. Judgment and judge both come from shāpat, "to judge." This command signifies: "Bring justice and fairness to bear upon the case of the orphan." Plead for the widow employs another legal term, rîb, which means "to argue or plead the case of someone." The widow was to obtain her legal rights even against a wealthy or influential litigant. In those days, since a woman could not hold a job in industry, the loss of her husband usually meant the cutting off of her income. Forced to mortgage her property, she soon fell into the toils of wealthy moneylenders, who had no scruples against taking her property or selling her children into slavery for the discharge of the debt.

18. Let us reason together. Another courtroom term. The Lord was saying, "Let us implead one another as plaintiff and defendant at a court of law." The defendants in this case were the guilty Israelites who had repented and shown a will to lead a godly life; as described in 1:16,17. No matter how heinous their sins might be, though they bore the guilty hue of shed blood (and the crimson dye of the scarlet worm here referred to was absolutely colorfast and indelible), nevertheless the grace of God was able to cleanse them completely and restore them to the snowy whiteness of innocence.

19,20. The destiny of the people depended upon their response to this offer of forgiving grace. If they were willing to turn from their wickedness and claim the Lord's gracious promises, and if they were obedient (i.e., presented themselves as living sacrifices to do the will of God, making that the chief purpose of their life), then it would be safe and proper for God to bestow his favor upon them. He would signify and seal his favor by bestowing on them the external blessing of material prosperity, safely maintained against invaders. But if they continued to reject his offer of grace and persisted in their rebellion against his rightful sovereignty over their hearts, he would have to unleash the heathen invader upon them to wreak havoc in their midst. For the mouth of Jehovah hath spoken it (ASV). This formula is added for the sake of special solemnity. Because it contains the very utterance of the Lord himself, this predictive announcement must surely come to pass; else God was no longer God, and his word was not to be trusted. In this case the fulfillment came in two installments: the Assyrian invasion of 701 B.C. and the Chaldean invasions of 588–587 B.C. The Jews were truly devoured by the mouth of the sword.

D. Jehovah's Sorrow at Judah's Moral Decline. 1:21-23.

21. In transgressing against the covenant relation with the Lord, Israel had committed a sin like that of a wife who becomes unfaithful to her husband. To trample upon the tender ties of marriage is to wound her husband in those areas where he is most sensitive and most vulnerable; hence this is the cruelest wrong that can be perpetrated. There was a time when Israel (back in the days of Joshua and of David) was a faithful wife to Jehovah, and in her affections cleaved to him only. In those days Israel's doctrinal purity was accompanied by moral uprightness and the equal enforcement of the laws for the benefit of all. But when the nation later became more "broadminded," ready to see "the good in all religions," it was but a step to spiritual harlotry, the prostitution of the soul to the false and abominable gods of the heathen. Doctrinal declension was accompanied by moral declension, and murderous gangsters came to dominate the life and politics of the Holy City!

22. Wine mixed with water. Wine was customarily diluted with water before being served at the table. But merchants were obligated to deal honestly with purchasers and sell only a pure, unwatered product. 23. Princes . . . rebellious, That is, against the sovereignty and law of God. These princes and government officials, who were charged with the duty of upholding the law and protecting the public against crime, were covertly in league with the leaders of the underworld – companions of thieves. Those who decided judicial cases had their price; the wealthier litigant in any suit was sure to win the verdict. The poor and defenseless, such as widows and orphans, were not even given a hearing, because they had no money to bribe the judge.

E. Restoration To Follow Chastisement and Repentance. 1:24-31.

24. The Lord of hosts, i.e., of the hosts of mighty angels who wait upon his beck and call. This title of God alludes to his omnipotence and sovereignty. This thought is strengthened by the additional phrase, the mighty One of Israel, which alludes to the Lord's miracle-working power (as displayed in his redemptive miracles in the days of the Exodus and the Conquest), which would now be employed against the apostate covenant nation instead of on their behalf. I will ease me. Literally, I will comfort or relieve myself of my adversaries. That is, he would grant relief to his long pent-up feelings of holy displeasure at the flagrant violation of his covenant and the oppression of the weak in Israel. He would inflict due punishment upon the whole Jewish state, and utterly crush their ungodly leaders.

25. Turn my hand upon thee. Literally, cause the hand to return upon. This indicates the special interposition of God to take appropriate and summary action against offenders; or, as here, to deal with them as their spiritual condition demands. Only furnace fire can smelt away alloy and slag from metal that is being refined; hence the fiery trial of suffering and exile is implied in God's promise here. 26. Thy judges as at the first; i.e., as in the days of Joshua, David, and Solomon. God would not set aside the free will of the nation Israel, but he would nevertheless see to it that his ideal of a godly covenant people would some day be realized. The Israelites, despite their stubborn waywardness, would not permanently frustrate his purpose. He would yet make of Jerusalem the city of righteousness, the faithful city. This was to be spiritually fulfilled in the formation of the NT Church (cf. Heb 12:22 – "the heavenly Jerusalem"). But also it will be fulfilled in the glorious city of the Millennium, under the personal rule of Christ.

27. Redeemed; i.e., ransomed or bought back out of bondage. With judgment. Rather than by some mode of salvation that by-passes the guilt of sin. A judicial act of inflicting punishment upon all God's foes (and the foes of his chosen people), and also upon the Redeemer, as the representative of sinners, at Golgotha.

28. They that forsake Jehovah (ASV); i.e., even though they be nominal Israelites. Only true, converted believers will partake of Zion's glorious future. The rest will go to the destruction destined for the heathen. 29. They shall be ashamed. At the Last Judgment, when they will be exposed as fools who have staked their immortal souls upon a lie and sealed their eternal doom; and even in this life, when calamity and retribution flood in upon them, and their false idols prove unable to rescue them. Oaks and gardens refer to the superstitiously venerated oak groves and the pleasure gardens connected with temples of idolatry, where sex orgies were held in connection with heathen worship (cf. 57:5). 30. That hath no water. Contrast the flourishing tree by the "rivers of water" in Psalm 1, the leaves of which do not wither. When there is no vital connection with the life and Spirit of God, only decay can result. 31. The worker (AV, maker) of it. Better, his work, as in the ASV (for the word for "work" may be so spelled in Hebrew, and it makes better sense in this context). The sinner's wicked deeds in this life will furnish the basis for his condemnation and fiery destruction in the end. None shall quench them. No human power can avert this fiery punishment for unrepentant sinners, and the punishment will be endless and eternal.

Sermon II. Punishment for Sin as Preparation for Glory. 2:1–4:6.

A. God's Goal for Israel: Spiritual Conquest, Lasting Peace. 2:1-4.

2:2. Mountain of Jehovah's house (ASV). Properly, Mount Moriah (which came to be called Zion), on which Solomon's Temple was built. But the literal Temple was a type of the spiritual temple – the NT Church, or body of Christ (Eph 2:21), the beacon light of divine testimony to the world. The gathering of the nations to Jerusalem in eager faith therefore signifies the conversion of the Gentiles. But since this scene is said to occur in the last days, and since we are taught by other Scriptures that the Kingdom of God will finally overcome all the kingdoms of this world, we must therefore look to the time of Christ's return, at the end of our present age, for the ultimate fulfillment of this prophecy. In this verse we are granted a glimpse of God's final goal for Israel and for the human race. Exalted above the hills. The Kingdom of God will be exalted above the kingdoms of this world (Dan 2:35). All nations. All the gôyîm, or Gentile nations, as distinguished from the 'am or "people" of Jehovah – the Israelites. But these are referred to in verse 3 as many people[s], or 'ammîm.

3. The primary concern of the surviving Gentiles of the 'last days' will be to discover the will of God and to do it. And they will be eager to have others share in the blessing of covenant relationship to God, for they will exhort and encourage one another to come to him. They will seek to learn his ways and to walk in his paths of holiness. Out of Zion . . . the law. Zion here represents the one authoritative divine revelation, since it was in Zion that God met with man for his enlightenment and forgiveness, and nowhere else. The law or tôrâ here signifies "revelational instruction" in the larger sense (since tôrâ comes from the verb hôrâ or yārâ, "to instruct"). The verb shall go forth may equally well be translated goes forth (present tense). Hence it may aptly be included in what the converted nations will say in the 'last days,' as they realize the unique validity of the Hebrew-Christian revelation.

4. He will judge between the nations (ASV). Jehovah himself (i.e., the Lord Jesus, according to 11:3,4) will impose his righteous rule upon the earth, and compel the nations to practice justice and fairness toward each other. There will therefore be no international strife, no aggressor nations; all countries will dwell together in peace. Rebuke. Better, and he will decide (i.e., as a judge seated upon the bench), as in the ASV. Since there will be no appeal to arms or violence to settle differences – for all will be governed by Christ's judicial decision –, the weapons of war will be converted into tools of peace and economic productivity. The Millennial kingdom will be characterized by a warless society.

B. Judgment upon Sin to Precede Messiah's Rule. 2:5–4:1.

1) A Nation Ripe for Judgment. 2:5-11.

5. In the light of God's promises of pardon for repentant sinners, and in view of the glorious prospects for the future conversion of the Gentiles, the prophet urged his countrymen to walk in the light and live to please God, trusting Him to perform His word. They were to do this even though it meant running counter to the stream of the times and opposing current and fashionable trends. 6. Judah had eagerly adopted new ideas from the heathen and embraced many elements of heathen religion and morals. Replenished from the east. Literally, they have become full from the east. They were filled with ideas and influences from Assyria and Babylon. From their Philistine neighbors on the western coastline, they had adopted a faith in soothsayers ('ōn^{e}nîm probably meant originally, "those who gather omens from the clouds"). They please themselves in. . . . Rather, they strike hands with the children of foreigners (ASV), a term used of entering into compacts and making common cause with others. 7. The successful campaigns and mercantile operations of Uzziah had resulted in considerable economic prosperity in Judah, but this wealth had only encouraged the Jews in materialism and neglect of the God of the Bible. From such carnality of viewpoint it was an easy and natural step to idolatry and to joining with the rest of the world in "worshiping the creature more than the Creator." 9. Before the most abominable idols – Baal, Ashtoreth, Milcom, Dagon, Hadad, and all the rest – both the upper classes of Judah and the common people bowed in heathenish worship. To allow this sin to go permanently unpunished would have cast the greatest discredit upon God's cause and compromised his glory. Therefore Isaiah prayed him to vindicate his truth by punishing those who had shamelessly trampled upon it.

10. As if assured that Jehovah will surely visit judgment upon all who despise His revealed Word, the prophet exhorts the unrepentant of every generation to run for cover, if they can. For dreadful retribution will surely overtake every nation and every culture that ignores the Bible message. There are overtones here suggestive of the unsurpassable horrors of the Great Tribulation to come. The immediate reference, however, is doubtless to the historical judgments of the Assyrian and Chaldean invasions. Not only Israel and Judah, but all the heathen nations of that age as well were to experience crushing blows of disaster as each successive empire rose and fell.

2) Pride of Man To Be Crushed in the Day of the Lord. 2:12-22.

12. The day of Jehovah (ASV). An oft-recurring term in the prophetic books. It refers to God's special intervention in human history to bring nations and empires into catastrophic judgment. As a process, the Day of Jehovah occurs whenever God crushes the pretensions and power of a human society in revolt against him; e.g., the fall of Nineveh and the Assyrian Empire in 612 B.C., the fall of Jerusalem in 587, the fall of Babylon in 539. But as an eschatological occurrence, the Day of Jehovah is that final event towards which all of these earlier and partial judgments prophetically point, that final overthrow of all human power which will precede the second coming of Christ (so II Thess 1:7–2:12; II Pet 3:12; Acts 2:20).

13. Cedars and oaks. Symbols of the proud, self-sufficient human leaders of society (as in 10:33,34). 14. Similarly the mountains and hills are symbolic of the hilltop citadels and the kingdoms over which they presided (as in 2:2), with the added connotation of human pride and self-reliance in the phrase that are lifted up. 16. Ships of Tarshish. A term applied, it seems, to large, especially seaworthy merchant vessels, able to make the voyage to distant Tarshish (probably Sardinia, and secondarily also Spain) – whether or not they were actually engaged in Tarshish trade (as those constructed at Ezion-geber certainly were not; II Chr 20:36). Pleasant pictures. Or, as in the ASV, pleasant imagery. Probably the beautiful objects of art and skill which these merchant vessels brought to wealthy purchasers.

19. The holes of the rocks. Smaller caves, a traditional hiding place in time of invasion or major calamity (cf. I Sam 14:11). But this seems to refer definitely to the events of Rev 6:15. In view of modern weapons of destruction, the need for taking shelter below ground or in mountain caves to escape an overwhelming destructive force has a very up-to-date ring about it. 20. The complete collapse of all the defenses and security measures upon which worldlings rely will finally result in their anguished rejection of all the false gods and vain philosophies they have substituted for the one true God.

22. Cease ye from man. Cease putting your trust in man (as contrasted with God, the only true refuge). Breath . . . in his nostrils. A reminder of man's frail mortality. Once the breath ceases from the nostrils, a man's life is snuffed out and his power is gone (even though he be a Sennacherib or a Tirhakah).

3) All Classes of Society To Be Humbled and Chastened. 3:1–4:1.

1. Stay is simply the masculine form of the Hebrew word for staff. Both words signify that upon which one leans. In this case the crops and the rainfall are referred to as the support or foundation of the nation's material well-being. 2,3. Not only were drought and famine to beset the land of Judah, but also the leading classes of Jewish society would be removed from their posts in the government or the army; and even the skilled craftsmen, responsible for manufactured products, would be taken away. The country would be left without leadership or resources. This sentence was gradually carried out by the successive invasions of Nebuchadnezzar, particularly that of 597 B.C., when "he carried away . . . the mighty of the land . . . and all the men of might, even seven thousand, and craftsmen and smiths a thousand, all that were strong and apt for war" (II Kgs 24:15,16).

4. Children to be their princes. Children not only as regards age (the wicked and degenerate King Manasseh, who reigned from 698 to 642, was only twelve when he began to reign), but more especially as regards prudence and political ability. Such were Jehoiakim, Jehoiachin, and Zedekiah. These kings by their foolish vacillation between Egypt and Babylon, brought their country to complete destruction within twenty years after the death of good King Josiah. 6. Thou hast clothing; i.e., an outer garment or mantle (śimlâ), which would set a man off as comparatively wealthy in that coming day of general destitution. He would, therefore, be entitled to the distinction of ruling over the rest, who would be too poor to own more than an undergarment. 7. An healer. A binder up (i.e., of wounds). A comforter, one who cares for others who are injured or in need. So despised was the nation to become that men would not consider it an honor to rule over it. Those invited to do so would beg off on the ground of their poverty. 8. Jerusalem is ruined. Literally, has stumbled and fallen. Her coming destruction had already been decided upon by God, even though it was not to be consummated until nearly 150 years later.

The eyes of his glory. Probably to be understood (with the RSV) as his glorious presence.

9. Rewarded evil unto themselves. Better, have dealt out evil (or injury) to themselves. 12. Children are their oppressors. Incompetent, degenerate rulers who had no more skill in government than fickle, shortsighted children, and were influenced by their scheming mistresses. 13-15. These oppressive rulers and aristocrats might be immune from punishment by human courts for their ruthless exploitation of Jehovah's people; but God himself would bring them to judgment for their unfaithfulness to their trust, which was a personal injury to him.

16-26. The fashionable society women of Jerusalem had given themselves over to flirtation and coquetry, to allure other women's husbands. They had devoted themselves to the latest fads in jewelry, hair style, and dress. They were wholly taken up with self-adornment, having no concern for God's law or their holy mission in life. But all the tawdry baubles for which they had sold their souls were to be stripped away from them in the coming invasions (from Assyria and Babylon). Their nakedness would be uncovered when they were led away as miserable slaves by their conquerors (v. 17). Or they would crouch in some wretched corner, filled with despair and covered with sackcloth and ashes. All their earthly possessions would be destroyed or snatched away from them, and their men would be slain. (The Qumran Isaiah Scroll reads in 3:24: ". . . a girding of sackcloth; surely instead of beauty there shall be shame.") So scarce would be the male population (4:1) after the slaughter of war, that each surviving man would be importuned by several unmarried women to marry them as self-supporting wives.

C. Ultimate Blessedness of Revived Israel Under Messiah. 4:2-6.

2. In that day does not refer to the period just described, except insofar as that Assyrian and Chaldean devastation prefigured the tribulation of the 'last days.' Rather, it refers to the final age, when the Messiah shall come to rule the earth. This is the usual force of the phrase, "in that day," throughout the prophetic books of the OT. The branch (semah) of Jehovah (ASV) refers to Christ himself as the descendant of the promised line of David. The same word, literally, sprout, is used with reference to Messiah in Jer 23:5; 33:15; Zec 3:8; 6:12. In him will be found the true beauty and glory of Israel (as contrasted with the false and worldly beauty of the society women of Jerusalem). Note that the ultimate prosperity is promised only to the escaped (pᵉlētâ) of Israel. Although the nation as a whole must be rejected for disobedience, the Lord would continue to work out his purpose with the remnant of true believers (as Paul later pointed out in Rom 11:5). Only those who have been sanctified by the new birth and inwardly transformed to mirror forth Christ's holiness will be enrolled (Isa 4:3) as citizens of spiritual Jerusalem. Cleansed of carnality and worldliness, the women of that holy city will stand in complete contrast to those of Isaiah's generation. But this new order will not prevail until God's Spirit shall have purged the city of its wickedness and idolatry by the fires of judgment and of suffering (v. 4). In that future day the presence of Jehovah will once again be granted to Israel as in the days of the Exodus, and the Lord will shield his godly children from all calamities and adversity. (This sermon concludes, as it began back in 2:2, with a glowing picture of the final fulfillment of God's covenant plan for Israel).

Sermon III. Judgment and Exile in Store for Israel. 5:1-30.

A. Evil Yield of the Lord's Vineyard. 5:1-7.

This is the first appearance, chronologically, of the vineyard as a symbol of Israel. In the OT the figure recurs in Jeremiah 12:10 and Psalm 80. In the NT it appears in the Parable of the Wicked Husbandmen (Synoptic Gospels), and, with a special adaptation, in Christ's discourse on the vine and the branches (Jn 15). My beloved (RSV) perhaps refers, not to God (for this term, dôd, is never so applied elsewhere), but to some friend of Isaiah's who had suffered this disappointment in his vineyard. Yet the way in which the prophet becomes identified with this "beloved" in Isa 5:4 indicates a mystical unity between them that best befits the relationship of a prophet to the God whose mouthpiece he is. What inexcusable guilt was Israel's, to produce such evil fruit when God had given them every possible advantage in a fair and fertile land! Their inevitable penalty must be the removal of his protective hedge and their devastation by invaders.

B. The Verdict of the Judge: Guilty on Seven Counts. 5:8-23.

8,9. Guilty of selfish greed. By foreclosing mortgages or by forcing sales of land, the wealthy landowners acquired all the adjoining farms to form huge estates. But all these were to be stripped from them: their mansions would be left in smoking ruins, and their fertile acreage would be reduced to near-sterility when foreign invaders had done their grim work.

11-17. Guilty of frivolous pleasure-seeking and vicious dissipation. They arose early, not to begin the day with God in prayer, but to begin it with their liquor bottles in drunkenness. And they ended the day with wild drinking parties and jazz bands. Because they ignored God and his holy purpose for their lives, their temporal punishment would be bondage, exile, and famine (v. 13); and their eternal punishment would be destruction in Hades (Sheol) along with all their tawdry possessions. Their fair estates would revert to mere pasturage (v. 17). The justice of God was to find complete vindication in their fate (v. 16).

18,19. Guilty of cynical materialism. Like idol worshipers drawing the cart of a great idol in festal procession, these backslidden people dragged along their idol of iniquity, challenging the Holy One of Israel as if he were powerless to intervene in human history and exercise his sovereignty.

20. Guilty of reversing the standards of morality. They acclaimed depravity of character as manly strength, and sensuous impurity as true virtue and strength.

21. Guilty of intellectual pride and self-sufficiency. They fancied themselves wiser than God or the experience of past generations.

22. Guilty of alcoholic indulgence. They measured strength by dissipation and excess.

23. Guilty of corruption. They sold their integrity for silver in their discharge of public office, and deprived the innocent poor of their legal rights in cases at law.

C. God's Sentence: Defeat and Devastation by a Foreign Foe. 5:24-30.

As a withered plant, rotten at the root, suddenly crumbles away in a breeze, or as dry stubble roars up in sudden flame at the slightest spark, so quickly would Israel fall. Her spiritual dry rot stemmed from her contemptuous rejection of God's Word (v. 24). Therefore the Lord's stretched forth . . . hand (v. 25); i.e., his miracle-working power would be turned against them instead of against their enemies. Their corpses would lie like garbage in their streets. The agents of this vengeance were to be invaders from a distant land (e.g., Assyria or Babylon) – rather than from Syria or the other surrounding lands – , and their attack would be spectacularly sudden. The enemy warriors would be fierce and unsparing, and their armies would engulf Palestine like a tidal wave. (These specifications were fulfilled by Nebuchadnezzar after his victory at Carchemish in 605 B.C.)

Sermon IV. The Prophet Cleansed and Commissioned by God. 6:1-13.

A. The Vision of God in His Holiness. 6:1-4.

Uzziah's death in 740 or 739 B.C. marked the passing of a golden age of spiritual vigor in Judah (at least until the king's sin of presumption ten years before his decease); and his ungodly grandson, Ahaz, was perhaps already exerting an influence in Jotham's government. To the discouraged prophet, as he knelt in prayer at the Temple at Jerusalem, the Lord granted a transforming vision of His glory. He thus assured Isaiah that despite the apparent triumph of wickedness on earth, the Lord Jehovah still reigned omnipotent upon his heavenly throne, adored by the mighty angels of heaven (symbolically represented by the six-winged cherubim). Even the foundations of the earthly Temple trembled at the thunder of the angelic choir, and the sanctuary was filled with the incense smoke of adoring prayer.

B. Confession, Cleansing, and Sanctification. 6:5-7.

How could the prophet's impure lips repeat that angelic song? His conscience was burdened by a sense of personal weakness and failure. He could only confess his helplessness and fallen estate. But God's redeeming grace hastened to meet his need, applying to his lips a coal from the incense altar (originally from the altar of blood sacrifice; cf. Lev 16:12). Isaiah was thus cleansed and equipped for praise, intercessory prayer, and the proclamation of God's word.

C. Response and Commission of the Yielded Believer. 6:8-13.

Every believer is saved to serve; he is ipso facto from the time of conversion a witness for God. But note that Isaiah was invited by the query, Who will go for us? (v. 8). God can use only willing, loving service. Coupled with the thrice-repeated "Holy" of 6:3, this reference to us may well point to the trinitarian plurality in God (although it may also include the angels as associated with God in common viewpoint and purpose). Isaiah was thereupon commissioned to preach God's message faithfully and fearlessly, even though his ministry would result in rejection and apparent failure. 9. Render this, Keep on hearing and keep on seeing, as the Hebrew syntax demands. Because Israel's rejection of Isaiah's message was foreseen, their hearing of it would be like not hearing at all. And their unwillingness to hearken would result in the judicial blinding of their hearts. (For the sake of vividness their negative response is put into the imperative mood, although of course the prophet would not have quoted these exact words in addressing his people.) 13. Yet his work was not to be in vain, for after the utter destruction of the Chaldean invasion here foretold (resulting in complete depopulation of the land), a tenth of the deported population of Judah would come back – shall return (for so this verb should be translated in view of the appearance of Isaiah's son, Shear-jashub – A remnant shall return – in the next chapter). That is, a remnant would return to Palestine in faith, trusting in God's promises to establish them there. Nevertheless, even this remnant would be consumed by invasion and warfare (notably in the time of Antiochus IV of Syria). Israel would be perpetuated only by the faithfulness of a still smaller remnant, the holy seed, who was to spring out of the stump of the felled tree of Judah. (The terebinth and oak are especially prone to produce such shoots from their stumps.)

VOLUME TWO.
IMMANUEL. 7:1–12:6.

Sermon I. Immanuel Rejected by Worldly Wisdom. 7:1-25.

A. God's People Confronted by Peril. 7:1,2.

Syria and the Northern Kingdom of Israel had formed an alliance against the menace of a revived Assyrian empire, and were determined to bring Judah into their coalition, even though it meant deposing Ahaz and substituting a puppet king, the son of Tabeel (see Albright, "The Son of Tabeel," BASOR #140, pp. 34,35). Marshaling their armies for the successful invasions recorded in II Chr 28, they sent a shiver of fear through the outnumbered forces of Judah, captained by their ungodly king.

B. God's Promise of Deliverance. 7:3-9.

3. Ahaz inspected the city's water supply in preparation for the siege that was to come (probable date, 735 B.C.). God revealed to the prophet the precise thoughts running through the king's mind, and bade him go to meet Ahaz, taking along young Shear-jashub, presumably because of the gracious promise contained in his name – A remnant shall return (from captivity). 7. Without prior mention of the king's unrenounced sins, God, through Isaiah, first conveyed to him a promise of practical deliverance, treating him with kindness altogether undeserved. 8. Within threescore and five years shall Ephraim be broken in pieces. That is, by 669 B.C. (reckoning from 735). Actually, Samaria fell within eleven years (722 B.C.), and her population was deported beyond Assyria. But the settling of non-Israelite colonists by the government apparently did not take place on a large scale until the reign of Ashurbanipal (669–626) – a fact alluded to in Ezr 4:10), where the immigrants refer to the king of Assyria as Asnapper (or Osnapper). With this foreign influx, the Northern Kingdom was truly "broken in pieces" ethnically, and the sparse native Israelites still left in the land were submerged. 9. A threat to Pekah is implied here, though not made explicit. Note that the Jews (ye) had to receive and rest upon this divine promise if they were to be established, i.e., derive practical benefit from this judgment visited upon the northern allies. Their failure to do so led to the worsening of their plight as they became subject to Assyria.

C. God's Promise Spurned by Unbelief. 7:10-12.

The Lord offered a confirmatory miracle to bolster Ahaz' faith, inviting him to name it. It could be anything from heaven above to earth beneath. But Ahaz, having made up his mind to put his trust in Assyria, put Isaiah off with a hypocritically pious pretext (alluding to the general prohibition of Deut 6:16).

D. God's Deliverance Reaffirmed and His Deliverer Promised. 7:13-25.

14. A virgin shall conceive. The word for virgin here is carefully chosen. Etymologically 'almâ does not necessarily signify a virgo intacta (an untouched maiden). In actual usage in the Hebrew Scriptures, however, it refers only to a maiden chaste and unmarried (so far as the context shows). This well fits the prospective mother alluded to in this situation. Judging from 8:1-4, the typical mother was the prophetess who became Isaiah's wife within a short time after this prophecy was spoken. Therefore she was a virgin at the time this promise was given. She serves as a type of the Virgin Mary, who remained a virgin even after her miraculous conception by the Holy Spirit. The son of this prophetess, correspondingly, is a type of the Messianic Immanuel, as will shortly be explained. 15. Butter and honey was the standard diet of those who lived in a devastated land that had reverted to pasturage. Such a diet the son of the prophetess was to eat as the result of the coming Assyrian depredations, as well as those of the neighboring nations (cf. II Chr 28). Read with the ASV, when he knoweth, rather than with the AV, that he may know (the Hebrew can signify either). That is, when he attains the age of legal accountability (doubtless twelve years of age). This would come out to 721, after the destructive campaigns of Shalmaneser V and Sargon. Certainly by 721 Damascus was forsaken (having been captured by Assyria in 732) and likewise Samaria (which fell in 722). 17. Jehovah will bring upon (ASV) Ahaz and his people, because they refused to trust him, the king of Assyria; i.e., the unparalleled oppression and tyranny of the Assyrian Empire.

This coming punishment of Judah is more fully described in the remainder of the chapter. 18. The fly . . . of Egypt, and . . . the bee . . . of Assyria. A forewarning of the clash of armies (notably at Eltekeh in 701) between the rival powers of Egypt and Assyria. Their troops undoubtedly stripped the whole countryside of Judah for provisions and supplies. 20. The razor that is hired was the future king Sennacherib, who leveled most of Judah to the ground in 701, destroying forty-six cities (according to his own account) and leading captive some 200,000 people. The Assyrians were hired in the sense that they were first bribed by Ahaz to intervene in the West (II Chr 28:21). 21,22. Here again we find butter and honey as the food of sparse survivors in a land of ruined fields and orchards and desolated cities. 23. Naturally in such areas the value of real estate would drop to nothing, and fields would revert to young forest in which wild animals might be hunted (v. 24) or cattle might range (v. 25).

Sermon II. Messianic Deliverance Foreshadowed. 8:1–9:7.

A. Birth of a Child Foreshadowing the Downfall of Judah's Foes. 8:1-4.

God told Isaiah before he had even married his fiancee that he would have a man-child by her, and He bade him inscribe the child's name on a tablet as a matter of public record before two witnesses of reputation. Maher-shalal-hash-baz, meaning "hasten to the booty, rush to the spoil," was to betoken the successful Assyrian assault upon Damascus and Samaria. This assault would crush both those kingdoms before the infant boy would be old enough to utter, "Mummy" or "Daddy," i.e., within three years. (This prophecy was fulfilled in the capture of Damascus and the spoliation of Samaria in 732 by Tiglath-pileser III).

B. The Foolish Choice of Worldly Wisdom. 8:5-8.

6. Waters of Shiloah or Siloam. A gentle, healing spring in Jerusalem, typifying the reign of God in the yielded heart of the believer. The God-forgetting people were rejoicing in (or better, with respect to) Rezin of Damascus and Pekah of Samaria because they had been defeated by Tiglath-pileser. (Hence this part of the chapter must have been written two or three years later than the episode of ch. 7.) 8. The words O Immanuel are very significant here. Isaiah's son was but a type of Immanuel, God with us. The birth of the child may have evoked this thankful cry from the parents as they beheld the fulfillment of God's word. But from this time on, Israel became the land of the promised Redeemer, the Messianic antitype of Maher-shalal-hash-baz. Though scourged by Assyrian invasion, it remained the land of promise because of the Messiah.

C. Final Triumph of God's Grace. 8:9-15.

9. Though the pagan people might do their worst in trying to extinguish Israel's light, they must eventually fail, because "God is with us" ('immānû'ēl). 12. Isaiah and his followers were not to be intimidated by the reproach of their countrymen that they were guilty of conspiracy (ASV; rather than AV, confederacy) against their country in opposing Ahaz' alliance with Assyria. 13. No matter how unfavorable present circumstances are, true believers will sanctify Jehovah by continuing to regard him as supreme in governing human affairs, and the fulfiller of his promises. They are to fear and revere him only; they are never to fear men. 14. The apostates of Judah would stumble over his word (which they had spurned) into destruction and damnation.

D. The Faithful Remnant To Trust in God Alone. 8:16-22.

16. Now that Isaiah's prophecy had been made public, it was to be sealed up against the day of its fulfillment, when God would authenticate it by the events of history. 18. The children whom Jehovah hath given (ASV) were, of course, Shear-jashub and Maher-shalal-hash-baz, with their names of prophetic meaning. (Heb 2:13 indicates that here Isaiah speaks of himself and his children as types of Christ and His blood-bought children, who are signs and wonders from the Lord.) 19. Familiar spirits and wizards were much consulted in that age when people had lost their faith in the Scriptures. Like spiritualists today, they pretended to have communication with the dead. Hence the appropriateness of the rhetorical question: On behalf of the living (should they seek) unto the dead? (ASV; rather than AV for the living to the dead?). 20. Every human opinion, religion, or philosophy is valid only as it agrees with God's Word – the only absolute yardstick of spiritual truth. 21,22. A description of the tragic disillusionment and despair of those who trust in something other than the Word of God. There is no morning (AV, marg.) or dawn of deliverance for them. They shall plunge into the eternal night of perdition with vain and bitter curses upon their lips.

E. Coming Deliverance by a Divine King. 9:1-7.

Verse 1 should be construed as in the ASV: But there shall be no gloom to her that was in anguish (i.e., the land of Galilee). In the former time he brought into contempt the land of Zebulun and . . . Naphtali (by permitting them first to come under the direct yoke of Assyria; cf. II Kgs 15:29); but in the latter time hath he made it glorious, by the way of the sea, etc. (by sending his Son to live in Galilee and carry on his principal ministry there; cf. Mt 4:13-17). 3-5. Multiplied the nation; i.e., by the addition of the Gentile church, which, in the coming age, would unite with Jewish Christians to carry out Christ's Great Commission and bring in the harvest of the redeemed from all the earth. Compare Christ's statement about the joy of the reapers in Jn 4:36. 4. In the time to come, all the heathen enemies and persecutors of God's people will be utterly crushed (as the Midianite host was defeated by Gideon long ago). 5. For every boot (RSV; rather than ASV's armor, or AV's battle) of the tramping warrior in battle tumult and every garment rolled in blood will be burned as fuel for the fire. This refers to the complete destruction of all weapons of oppression – both in the temporal judgments of the fall of empires, and in the Armageddon of the 'last days.'

6. Here we have set forth the character of the Immanuel who will bring this deliverance. He will come into the world as a baby born to the Hebrew people, a gracious gift of God to them. (Contrast the fierce denial of the Moslem faith that God could ever have a son, as enunciated in Sura 112 of the Koran.) He will rule God's kingdom with God's authority. He will be a Wonder of a Counselor. That is, as a person of two distinct natures – God and Man – he will truly be a wonder from Jehovah; and as the One who alone has the words of eternal life, he will be a counselor like none other. As mighty God (a term clearly applied to Jehovah in Deut 10:17; Isa 10:21; Jer 32:18), he will be the irresistible battle champion (as this word for "mighty" implies) who will obtain the final victory in the arena of history. As everlasting Father (lit., Father of Eternity), he will be not only lord of eternity but the author of eternal life to the redeemed. As Prince of Peace he will bestow what shālôm, "peace," implies in its fullest meaning: health to the sin-sick soul; a sound and healthy relation between sinners and God, as well as between sinners and fellow sinners; and a sound condition of universal righteousness and prosperity prevailing over the earth. 7. As the antitype of King David, and as his descendant and heir, this promised One will rule over the people of God forever and ever (cf. II Sam 7:16).

Sermon III. Boastful Samaria Doomed to Exile. 9:8—10:4.

Even after the disastrous invasion of the Northern Kingdom by Tiglath-pileser in 732 (the year in which he also destroyed King Rezin of Damascus), the Ephraimites still blindly ignored God's last warning. They boasted that they would rebuild their devastated country and make it stronger and more glorious than ever before (vv. 9b,10). But the time was soon coming when even their former allies of Syria and Philistia would join the besieging armies of Assyria to bring about Samaria's final extinction. 14,15. All the leading classes, who had failed to repent and return to God and who had been unfaithful to their trust, would be totally destroyed, with all their children. 18-21. Sin bears in itself the seeds of its own retribution and destruction. Along with the agonies of famine there would arise the horrors of civil war between Ephraim and Manasseh, the two main tribes composing the Northern Kingdom (doubtless involving the other tribes as well).

10:1-4. Those unrighteous judges and government officials who abused their power by oppressing their people and inscribing unjust sentences and decrees for their own personal gain would find their iniquities fittingly punished before God's bar of justice. They would lose all their tainted possessions when foreign invaders would strip them of all they had and lead them off as miserable captives into bondage. Your glory. Their treasures and valuables they had substituted for God (Israel's true glory).

Sermon IV. World Empire Crushed; the Glorious Empire to Come. 10:5—12:6.

A. God's Instrument for Judgment To Be Judged in Turn. 10:5-34.

5,6. Not by its own human power, but by the sovereign action of God had Assyria attained power to chasten Israel and mete out God's punitive displeasure upon the heathen nations. 9. The cities here mentioned were all notably powerful and defended by strong forces, but they were helpless before the onward march of Assyria. The victors boasted that they had overcome all these kingdoms themselves and the gods who were worshiped there. Insignificant little Judah with her puny gods, they declared, would easily fall. But such contempt towards Jehovah was to result in the complete destruction of this haughty empire when he was through with it. Human rulers are but instruments in God's hand, and they show utmost folly in boasting against him who uses them for his own purposes. 17. God is here called the light of Israel. His fire of judgment would consume the heathen as fiercely as if their invincible armies were a mere patch of briers. The forest of goodly trees, representing their proud leaders, would be so devastated by this fire that a little child might easily count the number left. (All of this was fulfilled between 612, the fall of Nineveh, and 605, the Battle of Carchemish.)

20-23. While pagan empires would have their day and pass away, the Lord declared, the weak and despised people of God were to live on down through history. By the divine discipline they would be taught to trust in the Lord alone for their salvation. Again the hope of Israel is here placed in the remnant of true believers who would return from captivity. No matter how small a fraction they might be, after the judgments of God had befallen the apostate nation, the future would lie with them. 24-27. They were to trust in these promises of God and not fear the ruthless conquerors who would seem to be having everything their own way. For these enemies, too, would be quickly destroyed, as were the Midianites by Gideon, or the Egyptians who were drowned in the Red Sea. 28-34. For the present, the Assyrians would irresistibly proceed from one Jewish stronghold to another (their plan of march is here predicted in detail); but they would some day be lopped off and felled like a mighty tree under the woodsman's axe.

B. The Messiah To Restore and Rule. 11:1-16.

1,2. The Messiah (who will set up the true and godly empire, the counterpart of Assyria's) will be a descendant of the promised line of David, God here declares. After the tree of David has been felled and only the stump left, this nēser or Branch, a significant Messianic title, will spring up. He will be supernaturally endowed by the sevenfold Holy Spirit of God. Therefore, he will administer a perfectly righteous rule, for no clever litigant or petitioner will ever be able to deceive him by false evidence (v. 3). Furthermore, he will maintain the rights of the defenseless and the poor (especially the meek who are persecuted for their faithfulness to God) as against the wealthy and influential. As a belt holds all the wearer's clothes together in proper place, so God's standard of holiness will be the constant and unifying force in Messiah's rule (v. 5). 6-9. The condition of Christ's empire will be that of harmony and peace, based upon the true religion. The picture of the fierce predatory animals living peaceably with the weak and defenseless symbolizes the removal of all natural hostility and fear between men. (The references to the little child, v. 6, and the sucking child, in v. 8, clearly preclude construing the beasts as various types of men.) 9. The basis for this Eden-like harmony will be the full and adequate knowledge of God that all mankind will then possess, and that even brute creation will reflect (cf. Rom 8:21).

10-16. The Messianic kingdom will be ushered in by a second (v. 11) restoration of the Jews (which clearly excludes reference to the return under Zerubbabel in 537 B.C. and yet indicates a national restoration of comparable magnitude). This time the scattered people will come from every geographical direction: east – Assyria, Elam, Shinar; west – the isles of the sea; north – Hamath; and south – Egypt, Pathros or Upper Egypt, and Cush or Ethiopia. Such diverse regions were not involved in the return of 537. Not Jews alone, but the Gentile nations (gôyîm) also will rally to the standard of the cross (v. 12), to form a Jewish-Gentile Church even in the latter days. Furthermore, in that day there will no more be a cleavage between northern tribes and southern, but the Christian Israelites will constitute one harmonious people. God's people, moreover, will triumph over all the not-yet-converted nations surrounding them (as Philistia, Edom, and Moab surrounded ancient Israel). The natural barriers of the Euphrates and Nile will be removed, and communication between all these formerly hostile regions will be easy and unimpeded when the Prince of Peace rules over them all.

C. Thanksgiving and Triumph of Christ's Redeemed. 12:1-6.

Here we have a beautiful paean of praise expressing the joy of a people completely yielded to God's will and discipline, and completely content with his grace. This song of the Millennial believers furnishes assurance that despite the hindrances presented by the disobedient and backsliding ones of the chosen race, God's perfect plan for that race will be completely realized at the end of human history.

VOLUME THREE. BURDENS OF JUDGMENT UPON THE GENTILE NATIONS. 13:1–23:18.

Burden I. Fall of Babylon; and Her King's Descent into Hades. 13:1–14:27.

A. The Downfall of Babylon. 13:1-22.

1. Burden (maśśā') is also rendered oracle, as if it signified a mere lifting up of the voice of the prophet (coming from nāśā', "lift up"). But judging by its usage, it seems better to understand it as that which is lifted up – a burden. That is, a burden of divine judgment which an offender must bear. 2. Nobles. The chief men of the Babylonians. 3. The Persians under Cyrus the Great are prophetically called God's consecrated ones (ASV) because He ordained them to overthrow Babylon. Note that they were to come from a far country (v. 5) rather than from some neighboring region. Persia lay well to the east of Elam, over 350 miles from Babylon. 6. Here the day of Jehovah (ASV) is clearly not eschatological, but refers to the events of 539 B.C. Yet this fall of Babylon is prophetically typical of the overthrow of latter-day Babylon (Rev 14:8), to which the fearful meteoric phenomena of 13:10 more particularly apply (cf. Mt 24:29). This is brought out by the reference to the world (tēbēl) in 13:11, rather than to the Chaldean Empire alone. But verses 14-16 certainly apply to 539, for the mention of Medes in verse 17 makes this clear ("Medes" being a name more familiar in Isaiah's day than "Persians," who were then still unknown to the western Asiatics). 19-22. In these verses the Lord very definitely predicts for historical Babylon eventual extinction of a most permanent sort. Later history saw the literal fulfillment of this prophecy, for Babylon was completely deserted by the seventh century A.D. Its desolate site has been regarded with superstitious dread by the Arabic-speaking population, the Arabian (v. 20), ever since.

B. The Fall of the King of Babylon. 14:1-27.

1,2. The ungodly World Power of Babylon will be crushed, but the people of God will emerge triumphant in the end. They will even subject the heathen nations to themselves (through the spiritual conquest of the Gospel, and through the mighty imposition of Christ's rule in the 'end time'). The Gentiles will aid in the restoraton of Israel to her promised land.

3-11. A song of triumph over vanquished Babylon (both the historical city and the eschatological one). 8. Fir trees and cedars. These are both literal (since they were spared from the deforestation of Chaldean axemen) and symbolic – of the other nations in the forest of mankind. 9. Hell or Sheol (ASV). A name for the general abode of the dead prior to Christ's resurrection. But here it represents the dwelling of the spirits of proud God-defying rulers of former ages. These are represented as welcoming the arrival of the king of Babylon with malicious satisfaction, for all of his brief earthly glory will have been extinguished, even as theirs was.

12-20. Lucifer. The Roman name for the morning star (Heb. hêlēl, "the bright one"), which speedily disappears before the far greater splendor of the sun. This title is addressed to the king of Babylon, not so much as a specific human individual (like Belshazzar, for example), but as a representative or embodiment of Satan, who is regarded as the power behind the king's throne. The titanic pride and ambition expressed in verses 13,14 are out of place on any lips but Satan's. The epic poetry of Canaanite Ugarit often refers to the "mountain of the North" or Sapunu (equivalent to Heb. sāphôn used here) as the abode of the gods. The ignominious downfall of the tyrant of Babylon, prophetically pictured here, whose corpse lies unburied and dishonored, reflects upon Satan, his lord.

21-27. This passage reverts more particularly to the fall of historical Babylon in 539, and the permanent extinction of her power and posterity. As a confirmation beforehand of this promise concerning Babylon, the Lord foretold the more immediate disaster to the armies of Assyria (the suzerain of Babylon at the time) in Palestine (v. 25), which took place upon Sennacherib's invasion of 701 B.C. All these disasters to neighboring nations would demonstrate the irresistible power of the one true God, the God of Israel (vv. 24,27).

Burden II. The Downfall of Philistia. 14:28-32.

The Philistines, in their war against Ahaz, had recently seized four large Jewish cities (II Chr 28:18). But here they are warned of coming retribution from Hezekiah, the adder (ASV) of verse 29, and from the later Jewish princes of the Hasmonean dynasty (like Jonathan Maccabaeus, who burned Ashdod and Ashkelon and compelled Gaza to surrender). 31. A smoke out of the north (ASV) refers to the coming devastations of Sargon (20:1) and Sennacherib (mentioned in his record of the campaign of 701). 32. Philistia's envoys were therefore to be sent home with the declaration that Judah's true and only safety is to be found in Jehovah her God.

Burden III. The Downfall of Moab. 15:1–16:14.

Here we have a vision of the fearful depredations the Assyrians were to inflict upon the various cities of Moab which are mentioned throughout chapter 15. Even though the Moabites had been implacable enemies of Israel, the prophet could only weep with compassion at the spectacle of the bloody cruelty of the conqueror and the wretched lines of refugees streaming away from their doomed cities. 9. Waters of Dimon . . . full of blood. A play on words, between Hebrew dām, "blood," and Dimon, which is perhaps a sinister variation from the more familiar name of Dibon. The lions mentioned here may refer to triumphant Judah in a later day, or perhaps to Esarhaddon the Assyrian (who records the subjugation of the Moabite king, Mutsuri), or even to the Chaldeans of a subsequent age.

Chapter 16 presents a related but separate utterance occasioned by the coming flight of Moabite refugees to Sela, the capital of Edom (which was allied to Moab). From their asylum in Edom they are bidden to make submission to the people of God, for Jehovah is their only sure refuge. His throne shall some day be established at David's capital of Jerusalem (a prediction of the second coming of Christ). 16:3. A summons to Judah to maintain a godly testimony and show compassion on the Moabite refugees. 6-12. The prophet sets forth the reason for Moab's disaster: her overweening pride (so clearly evidenced in the "Moabite Stone" of King Mesha). He follows with a description of her coming devastation at the hands of Sennacherib (who records the submission of Chemoshnadab, king of Moab). 7. For foundations of Kir-hareseth, read with the ASV, raisin-cakes. These were offerings that would no longer be available for idol worship because of the destruction of all the vineyards. 8. Sea. Possibly the Dead Sea, or else the celebrated pools of Heshbon. Isaiah could not but lament the destruction to be meted out to all the fair and smiling countryside of Moab. In vain her suppliants would besiege the heathen altars of her high place[s]; their imaginary gods would be powerless to save them. 13,14. Within three years. A more precise date for this invasion. The time was doubtless revealed in 704 B.C., and referred to the coming of Sennacherib three years later.

Burden IV. The Downfall of Damascus and Samaria. 17:1-14.

This chapter is contemporaneous with Isaiah 7, and predicts the downfall of the northern coalition in the reign of Ahaz. Tiglath-pileser was to leave Damascus a heap of ruins in 732 B.C.; likewise its vassal cities, like Aroer near Rabbath-Ammon. The glory of Damascus would be removed along with that of North Israel (which had risen to such power under Jeroboam II, 782–753 B.C.). Only a pitifully small remnant of the ten tribes would remain, like the final wheat ears or the last olives left after the harvest has been gathered. 7-11. A prediction that these last survivors after the tragic events of 722 (when Samaria would fall to Sargon and be deported to Assyria) would repent. They would renounce their graven images and their groves (v. 8; a mistranslation of 'ashērîm, cultic wooden pillars or tree trunks representing the female consort of the deity worshiped on a "high place"). They would turn in faith to Jehovah, the Holy One of Israel (v. 7). (Cf. the record of the great Passover celebration in II Chr 30:1-22, in which worshipers from the surviving Samaritans participated. But perhaps the perspective here is also eschatological.) The reason for this coming devastation was, of course, their desertion of the true God, who was their only real strength in resisting heathen conquest.

12-14. A graphic description of the coming invasion by the Assyrian host, with its various contingents of subject-allies under Sennacherib (heir of the conquerors of Damascus and Samaria). God would suddenly rebuke the Assyrians, declares the prophecy, in a night of terrible plague and destruction. So shall he eventually deal with all his foes and the armies they marshal against his cause.

Burden V. The Downfall and Conversion of Ethiopia. 18:1-7.

Under Piankhi the Ethiopians had established the Twenty-fifth Dynasty in Egypt, and Piankhi's son Shabaka (called "So" in II Kgs 17:4) had encouraged Hoshea of Israel in the last unsuccessful revolt against Assyria. Shabaka also leagued with Merodach-baladan of Babylon, and was later an encouragement to Hezekiah to rebel against Sennacherib, who finally crushed the Ethiopian-Egyptian forces at Eltekeh in 701. So's nephew, Tirhakah, led a new Egyptian effort, but was finally crushed by Ashurbanipal in 667. 7. Here the Ethiopians are identified as coming from the land where the Blue Nile joins the White Nile – whose land the rivers divide (ASV) – and as being tall of stature and smooth of skin. They would be pruned away like branches, the prophet says, and their carcasses would fall in battle, to be consumed by the vultures. Yet some day the Ethiopians would pay tribute to God and come to Zion as true believers.

Burden VI. The Afflictions of Egypt. 19:1–20:6.

A. The Subjugation of Egypt. 19:1-25.

1-10. Isaiah sets forth the afflictions of civil war, Assyrian conquest, drought, and devastation which were to befall Egypt in the coming decades. Jehovah would demonstrate his sovereignty to the discredit of the false gods of Egypt. Civil war was to arise as the Libyan Dynasty (XXII) clashed with the Ethiopians and with the Saites of Dynasty XXIV, and thus foolishly prepared the way by internecine conflict for the cruel subjugation of them all by Esarhaddon of Assyria (v. 4). This was to take place in 671, and the Assyrian rule would endure nineteen years. The economic ruin of Egypt would be insured by a prolonged and terrible drought (vv. 5,6), in which the Nile would fail to overflow its banks. 7. Paper reeds. Rather, meadows by the Nile (ASV). Hence there would be no fish to catch and no flax to spin. 10. Foundations (AV marg.; pillars, ASV). Rather, weavers. Hence read: And her weavers shall be crushed, all the workers for hire shall be grieved of soul.

11-15. The Egyptians had prided themselves on being the wisest and most learned of peoples. But they would prove utterly foolish and incapable as they met the coming blows of disaster, and their clashing leaders would bring them to ruin. 13. Zoan or Tanis was a northeastern capital near the border of Sinai. Noph (ASV, Memphis) lay more to the south at the apex of the Delta. 15. Every class of society would be thrown into a state of unemployment and want.

16-25. But God still had a bright future in store even for this grossly idolatrous land. First of all, the Egyptians would tremble at the fearsome power of Israel's God as he brought judgment upon them, especially when the avenging armies of Nebuchadnezzar would invade their land in pursuit of the Jews who would take refuge there (cf. Jer 46:24-26). Then they would recognize that Jehovah had intervened in history. Later on, Jewish immigrants would exert a leavening influence upon Egypt. They would establish sizable Hebrew-speaking colonies in at least five of the Egyptian cities, one of which would be Heliopolis. 18. The word Heliopolis, "City of the Sun," has here been deliberately altered, in a play on words, to read city of destruction. There would even be an altar erected to Jehovah in Egypt (v. 19; erected by a priest named Onias in the reign of Ptolemy VI), as an earnest of the later conversion of Egyptians to Christianity. God would send them a saviour (Alexander the Great) to deliver them from their Persian oppressors, as a token of that divine Saviour who would free them from Satan's rule. 21,22. Probably a reference to the Christianization of the land. 23-25. A forecast of the harmonious relations to be established by the spread of the Gospel to all the lands of the Fertile Crescent prior to the Mohammedan conquest. And this in turn is but a foregleam of that final and more lasting peace that will be established between East and West in the days of the Messiah.

B. Egypt To Be Enslaved by Assyria. 20:1-6.

This oracle was probably revealed somewhat later than that of chapter 19, for it expands upon the prediction made in 19:4. At any rate, the exact year of the fulfillment of the prophecy is given. This was 711 B.C., when King Sargon sent Tartan (v. 1, AV; Accadian tartānu), his "chief general," to subdue the Philistine city of Ashdod. Azuri, king of Ashdod, was deposed (according to Sargon's Annals), and a revolt raised by Iatna was suppressed. This prophecy of Egypt's disgrace and subjugation came about forty years before the Assyrian Conquest. Severe chastening was due Egypt because she had pretended to serve as Israel's deliverer and had made promises she could not keep, distracting the Hebrews from a wholehearted trust in God alone.

Burden VII. Babylon To Be Conquered and Her Idols Destroyed. 21:1-10.

1. The wilderness of the sea (ASV). The alluvial plain of Babylonia, laid down by the Euphrates and the Tigris with their various tributaries. Numerous swamps and shallow lakes always built up whenever the drainage canals were neglected or damaged. 2. The treacherous destroyer (dealer; AV) here mentioned is Chaldean Babylon, ripe for judgment. Elam. Persia. Elam was better known than Persia in Isaiah's day, and was later incorporated into the territory of Persia proper. 3,4. To a man of Isaiah's sympathetic nature, the vision of bloody carnage in the captured cities of Babylonia, as Cyrus' forces advanced toward the capital, had a deeply disturbing effect, like that of a fearful nightmare. 5. In prophetic vision he saw the princes of Babylon, careless in their false sense of security, banqueting with Belshazzar. 7. A chariot. Contingents of cavalry and mounted cameleers formed a characteristic portion of the Medo-Persian armies. 8. He cried, A lion. Better, He cried as a lion. So intense was the prophetic watchman's feeling. 9. This is the first pronouncement of judgment upon the degenerate and idolatrous world culture which Babylon represents; the last is found in Revelation 14 and 17. 10. Isaiah foresaw Babylon thoroughly beaten and flailed, like wheat upon a threshing floor.

Burden VIII. Defeat for Edom; Victory for Israel. 21:11,12.

11. Dumah. Edom. Apparently an ominous play on words, according to which the main syllable of the name is fitted to the pattern of a word meaning silence (used for the realm of the dead in Ps 94:17; 115:17). Isaiah, as the watchman, announces to the Edomites of Mount Seir that the morning of deliverance is breaking for Israel, but the night of defeat and bondage will soon fall upon Edom. Let the Edomites, therefore, seek Jehovah in repentance and faith.

Burden IX. Dedan and Kedar To Be Routed. 21:13-17.

Allied with the Philistines, these northern Arabs had plundered Jerusalem in the reign of Jehoram (c. 845 B.C.). They were later defeated by Uzziah. But here they are warned of the crushing blows to be administered to them by the Assyrians (such as Sennacherib) and the Chaldeans (such as Nabonidus, who made Tema his second capital).

Burden X. Fall of Jerusalem Foreseen; Eliakim To Replace Shebna. 22:1-25.

A. Worldly-minded Jerusalem To Be Destroyed. 22:1-14.

Jerusalem is located upon two or three hills in the midst of valleys surrounded by dominating mountain ranges. As the scene of the revelations granted to God's prophets, its location is appropriately described as the valley of vision. The Jerusalemites, from their rooftops, were to descry the approach of the besieging armies of Babylon. Yet in the face of imminent danger, the Jews would be bent upon giddy pleasure and carnal indulgence. And they would meet with utter disaster. Their king (Zedekiah) would vainly attempt flight from the city. Lamentable destruction was to be meted out to both city and people (v. 4).

5-11. The prophet gives details of the coming siege (589–587 B.C.), in which the subject warriors of Kir would fight in the ranks of the Persians of Elam (cf. 21:2). The physical arrangements for the city's defense (the refortifying of the breeches and the guarding of the precious water supply) would all prove useless, because the Jews would refuse to look to their God, their only true defense against the world. 12-14. The Lord's urgent call for repentance had only met with cynicism and crass fleshly indulgence. But God's fatherly love cannot be so blatantly disregarded and despised without severest consequences. This oracle most likely refers to the eve of Sennacherib's invasion, when Judah would mistakenly choose to rely on the help of Egypt in meeting the vengeance of Assyria. It took the horrors of the invasion in 701 B.C. to bring Jerusalem back to repentance and a renewed commitment to God.

B. A Corrupt Official Replaced by a Godly Public Servant. 22:15-25.

In the light of the preceding context, it is fair to assume that Shebna, the royal chamberlain, was a leader of the pro-Egypt faction in the councils of state. In the confidence that his position was secured, he had ordered a sumptuous tomb for himself, not realizing that he would be demoted from his office and die a pauper in a far country. (In 701 he was already replaced by Eliakim, according to II Kgs 18:18, though he was still a secretary in government service.) But Eliakim (God will establish) was a truly devoted follower of God, and therefore he represents the remnant of true believers who opposed alliance with idolatrous Egypt.

22,23. The key of the house of David refers to the position of high trust and influence Eliakim was to enjoy as Hezekiah's prime minister (Hezekiah being of David's dynasty). His position would be as secure as that of a nail or large peg built into the wall of a house, and his glory and prosperity would be passed on to his family and descendants. Many interpret verse 25 as a prediction of Eliakim's eventual downfall. But in view of the sure place of verse 23 (which, of course, was made sure by God himself), it seems better to understand this of others besides Eliakim who falsely supposed themselves as securely established as he, but had not given their hearts to Jehovah as he had done, and who therefore must some day be cut off.

Burden XI. Downfall and Enslavement of Tyre. 23:1-18.

Tyre represents the ruthless materialism of a great commercial center. Through Jezebel, daughter of the king of Sidon and Tyre, it had exerted a baneful influence upon Samaria, and carried on a brisk trade in Israelite slaves (Amos 1:9). It was forced to capitulate to Assyria in 664; Nebuchadnezzar razed all but the island city in the sixth century; and Alexander completely demolished the island city in 332 B.C.

1. From Kittim (ASV), or Cyprus, would come the melancholy tidings of the fall of Tyre. This would mean ruin for the commerce of Tarshish (located in Sardinia or Spain) and for the Phoenician colonies generally throughout the Mediterranean. 3. No more would the produce of Egypt – Shihor (ASV) being a branch of the Nile – purchase valuable goods in the marts of Tyre. 4. Zidon was to be involved in the same calamity, and her decimated populace would dwindle away. 8-12. Jehovah would be the author of this doom (as the fulfillment of this prediction would amply demonstrate), which would serve as a judgment not only upon Tyre but upon the whole world view it represents. 11. Canaan (ASV; AV, merchant city). Originally the name of the red-purple wool dyed from the Phoenician murex, which formed the first basis of trade with other nations. Then the name came to be applied to merchants generally. Even in Cyprus the refugees would find no safety (for this island would become tributary to Assyria and its successors).

13-18. A seventy-year eclipse of Tyre would ensue between Nebuchadnezzar's disastrous siege and the fall of Babylon in 539. The Berkeley Version makes land of the Chaldeans (v. 13) a vocative, rightly implying that it was the Tyrians who should be no more; the Assyrians would make their land a place for the wild beasts to roam in. It was presumably the Chaldeans who would fashion the siege-engines. 16. Having lost her independence, the city would have to pander to the lusts and desires of her conquerors, like a woman of the streets. Under the Persians, Tyre enjoyed a great measure of favor and made a good recovery from the Chaldean suppression. Yet even the Persian Cyrus compelled Tyre and Sidon to contribute materials for the rebuilding of Jehovah's Temple in Jerusalem (Ezr 3:7) – a partial fulfillment of Isa 23:18. Today Tyre is virtually a deserted site, and most probably will continue to serve only as a historical symbol of the coming commercial power and capitalistic materialism of the 'last days.'

VOLUME FOUR. GENERAL REBUKE AND PROMISE, I. 24:1–27:13.

Delitzsch describes these four chapters as an appropriate finale, a closing hallelujah, to the unfolding account of God's righteous dealings with the nations.

Sermon I. Universal Judgment upon Universal Sin. 24:1-23.

The judgment that has been particularized in chapters 13–23 for each of the nations involved with Palestine now is represented as about to be poured out upon the earth as a whole. Verse 4 makes it certain that earth here must mean "the whole inhabited world" and not simply the land (of Palestine), as eres (v. 3) might otherwise be construed. There are just two classes of mankind in view here: the wicked and corrupt society of this world; and the faithful people of God. Without distinction as to class or condition, the wrath of the Almighty is to be poured out upon all the people of the world; and all the delights of sinful pleasure will be snatched away from them. Only the smallest remnant of them (vv. 6,13) will survive the general destruction.

On the other hand, there is to be a company of believers all over the world who will rejoice in this outworking of God's righteous condemnation of sin (vv. 14-16). At present, as Isaiah mournfully recognizes (v. 16b), wickedness seems to triumph and victimize the devout people of God. But a dreadful and inescapable doom awaits every citizen of earth as the world comes to a catastrophic end (v. 19). And the proud rulers of men will be cast into the prison house of Hell to await the final judgment of God (v. 22). Then will the glory of God be revealed (as Christ returns to reign on earth) in such splendor that the light of the sun and moon will pale into insignificance. Jerusalem will be the capital of Messiah's empire, and his faithful followers will bask in his radiance (cf. the twenty-four elders in Rev 4:4; 7:11; 14:3).

Sermon II. Jehovah Praised as Deliverer and Comforter of Zion. 25:1-12.

As spokesman for God's covenant people, the prophet gives expression to adoring praise of the Lord for his marvelous providence and righteous dealings with men. Over the span of the centuries the Holy One enforces his holy law upon all the offenders who transgress it. The strongest of cities may become a destroyed and forsaken ruin if its citizens lack faith in God. But the faithful and obedient will be preserved and protected over the years. Despite testings and misfortunes, they will survive the passage of centuries after the proudest human empires have crumbled to dust. 6. This mountain. Mount Zion. All people[s] doubtless includes Gentile Christians, who will be included in the blessings of spiritual Israel. Fat things. Choice dishes prepared with olive oil and marrow from meat-bones, the most desirable items of food to the Semites. Wines on the lees (or "dregs") were filtered, and afforded a clear and most flavorful drink. These details of food and drink symbolize the delights and nourishing satisfactions of the Gospel. Perhaps they also symbolize "the marriage supper of the Lamb" (Rev 19:9). 7. The covering. The veil of spiritual blindness beclouding the souls of unbelievers. 8. In victory. Probably best construed with the ASV as for ever (since lānesah means that everywhere else; yet nesah does mean "glory" in two other passages in the OT). This promise refers to the ultimate triumph of heaven (cf. I Cor 15:54; Rev 21:4). 10. Moab here is representative of the obdurately hostile and unbelieving world, whose God-resisting troops will be mowed down in the final destruction. 12. Thy walls. Moab is addressed directly. All the fortifications of the rebellious world will prove powerless against God.

Sermon III. Song of Joy over Judah's Consolation. 26:1-21.

1. The redeemed saints will come thronging to the gate of Jerusalem at the end of the age, chanting hymns of praise (hence the appropriateness of referring to them as Judah, for Yehûdâ means "Praise"). 2. They will be a righteous nation because clothed with Christ's righteousness and indwelt by God's Spirit. 3. Their characteristic evangelical faith will be expressed as complete trust in the sufficiency of God and the perfection of his will. Perfect peace. More literally, peace peace (shālôm shālôm), which means "a peace that really is peace," rather than the spurious and temporary peace, which is all that man can bestow. 4. Trust ye. The redeemed will readily testify of the everlasting faithfulness of Jehovah. 6. The poor and needy. Here (as often in the Prophets and Psalms) the lowly, persecuted, despised people of God who suffer hardship and discrimination in this life. They will yet see the power and pretensions of the world crushed to the ground. 8. The desire of our soul. They will be wholly wrapped up in the truth and glory of God. This includes all that he has revealed of his person and will (for all this is implied by name in Hebrew usage), especially in his character as Jehovah (the covenant-keeping God of grace), for that is his "memorial name." Their most ardent desire and prayer (v. 9) will be, "Thy kingdom come!" 10. Wicked. The obstinately sinful, the reprobate who reject faith in the Gospel (cf. "the ungodly" in Ps 1).

12. Thou wilt...thou...hast wrought. The redeemed will confess that they have no righteousness apart from Jehovah himself, and it is he who has performed his own good deeds through them (when they have yielded their members as instruments of his righteousness). 13. Other lords. Probably false gods rather than foreign rulers. They are regarded as false alternatives to the Lord, which the speakers had in former times wickedly chosen in preference to him. 14. Now they are dead, for their 'life' depended upon their now-vanished devotees; nor shall they ever rise again, for their cult has been forever abandoned. (Christianity forever abolished the worship of all the heathen gods known to the Israelites.) 15. Increased the nation. This remarkable increase of God's people points to the inclusion of the world-wide Gentile Church; hence also the enlargement of the borders of the Kingdom.

16,19. Poured out a prayer. Israel repeatedly called upon Jehovah in times of deepest distress (compared to the agonies of childbirth) and heartbreaking frustration – (We have . . . brought forth wind). Fallen. That is, "fallen in combat under our successful onslaught" (rather than referring to parturition, as some scholars interpret it). Judah, the speaker here, refers to the dead saints (v. 19) both as Thy dead – speaking to God – and as my dead bodies (ASV). This is a most explicit OT prediction of the bodily resurrection of believers. 20,21. God's comforting invitation to his people. They are to take refuge in him during the grim time of the Tribulation, when he will be punishing the unconverted for their rebellion and for their bloody crimes, which will be brought to light at the Last Judgment.

Sermon IV. Oppressors To Be Punished but God's People Preserved. 27:1-13.

1. Leviathan. A symbolic creature (reflected in the dragon myths of the pagan Semites), representing the arrogant, turbulent world in revolt against God. More particularly it stands for the successive world empires of Egypt, Assyria (associated with the swift-running Tigris), and Babylon (associated with the winding Euphrates). 2. In the end of the age there will be occasion for a blessed counterpart to the mournful Vineyard Song of Isaiah 5. Redeemed Israel will constitute a vineyard which a holy God may properly protect from its foes. 4. Read with the Berkeley Version: There is no wrath now with Me. Should I find thornbushes and briers (in it), I would fight them and burn them altogether. 5. Let him take hold. Even a thornbush, i.e., an enemy of God's people, will be extended an opportunity for forgiveness and grace. Verse 6 should be rendered with the ASV: In days to come shall Jacob take root. . . . Israel's filling the earth with fruit refers to the spread of Christianity (which is the faith of the true Israel of God).

7-12. God reveals his plan for Israel's future: survival through trial; purgation through suffering; and destruction for all her foes. Translate verse 7 (with Delitzsch): Hath He smitten it (i.e., Israel) like the smiting of its smiter, or is it slain like the slaying of those slain by Him? That is, God would smite Israel only to chasten her; he would smite her foes to destroy them forever. Read verse 8 (Berkeley): By driving her, by sending her away, He contended with her. He removed her with His rough blast as in the day of an east wind. This refers, of course, to the Babylonian captivity. The east wind came in from the hot Syrian Desert. 9. The prophecy looks forward to Israel's complete abandonment of idolatry. 10. Defenced city. The apparently impregnable capitals of Israel's conquerors, e.g., Nineveh and Babylon. Their inhabitants were devoid of spiritual understanding; they would receive no compassion (such as would be accorded to exiled Judah. 12. His fruit (ASV). The regathered and converted remnant of Israel. The river. The Euphrates.

VOLUME FIVE. WOES UPON THE UNBELIEVERS OF ISRAEL. 28:1–33:24.

Sermon I. Judgment of Ephraimite Drunkards and Jewish Scoffers. 28:1-29.

A. Doom of the Drunkards of Ephraim. 28:1-8.

The declining Northern Kingdom is set forth as a warning example to the Kingdom of Judah. 2. Though God's mighty and strong one, Assyria, was poised to deliver the final blow of destruction, the Ephraimites continued to trust in the fertility of their soil and in economic prosperity, and to lead a life of libertinism and debauchery – in which even the clergy participated with disgusting excess (vv. 7,8). 5. In contrast to this evanescent and carnal glory of Ephraim stands the Lord himself, who is Israel's only true glory, and who will some day be recognized as such by the remnant of true believers. He will empower them for righteousness in judgment and for victory in warfare.

B. Judah's Scoffing Answered by God's Messianic Promise. 28:9-22.

Verses 9,10 give us the jeering reply of the pro-Assyrian party of King Ahaz, who resisted the impact of Isaiah's words recorded in the previous paragraph. They scoffed at his remarks as 'Sunday School moralizing,' appropriate for infants but quite irrelevant to grown men who understand the art of practical politics. They dismissed the prophet's teaching as hackneyed precept upon precept; line upon line. 11-13. The solemn answer to these jibes. God had offered them security and peace if they would trust in him and submit to him; but they preferred to trust in Assyria (against the Northern Coalition). Therefore they would have to learn of their mistake at the punitive hands of those who spoke a foreign tongue (for the Assyrian language was quite incomprehensible to the Hebrews, though distantly related to their tongue). By the hammer blows of cumulative misfortune and disaster, they would have to learn their bitter lesson precept upon precept; line upon line. 14,15. These scoffers are identified as the top officials in the government, who had backed Ahaz' foreign policy of bribing Assyria to engage in a treaty of alliance. Assyria wielded her power in the interests of Hell, and she spread death and destruction in her wake. Yet the Jews had chosen her, rather than God, to be their protector, vainly supposing they would thus escape her devastating might. They had made a compact with a heathen power that regarded inconvenient treaties as mere scraps of paper – we have made lies our refuge.

16. In contrast to this supposedly clever diplomacy of power politics, God declares the true basis of Israel's safety: the person and work of the Messianic Redeemer. Foundation . . . stone implies that Christ's atonement is the basis upon which Israel and the Church are built; apart from him and his merit, there could be no Church at all. In Zion. The appointed place of revelation, the only valid disclosure of the one true God; and of blood sacrifice, the only way of salvation. A tried stone (lit., a stone of testing); i.e., one with no faults or cleavages. Christ proved equal to the subtlest and craftiest temptations Satan could bring against him. Precious corner stone. He is of greater value than the whole world. He alone makes the difference between eternal heaven and eternal hell for the sinner. Shall not make haste. Better, shall not be excited or alarmed (cf. I Pet 2:6; ASV paraphrases, following the LXX – "shall not be put to shame").

17. The false foundation of the worldly wise was to be violently swept away in the catastrophe of Assyrian invasion, and Judah's treaty of alliance would prove to be a false refuge. 18. Your covenant with death. The covenant with Assyria would be annulled when the Assyrian government should turn upon Judah and treat her like a subjugated foe. At this, Judah would join a conspiracy of revolt against Sargon, but more especially against Sennacherib, thus breaking solemn oaths of allegiance to the Assyrian government. 19. The punitive incursions of the Assyrians would be recurrent and of mounting intensity, until the dreadful campaign of 701. 20. The bed is shorter. Even with Egyptian aid, Judah's resources would be wretchedly insufficient to meet the pressure of Assyria. 21. Mount Perazim. The place where David, with God's help, routed the Philistines (II Sam 5:20). But now that power of Jehovah was to be turned against his own covenant children – a strange act, to which God was compelled by their disobedience.

23-29. Judah's situation is set forth in a parable. The farmer does not plow for the sake of plowing, but rather to prepare for his intended crop. So also God prepares his garden for the crop he wishes to reap – the crop of righteousness from a holy people. To this end God must employ the cutting and crumbling force of disciplinary judgments, perfectly adjusted to Israel's spiritual needs, just as the farmer (using the intelligence God gave him) uses the proper threshing instruments for each type of grain.

Sermon II. Disaster Ahead for Hypocrites. 29:1-24.

1-4. The careless Jews must be humbled and sobered before God. Ariel, signifying hearth of God, is a symbolic name for Jerusalem, implying that God's fire of judgment would burn there (as invaders spread fire and devastation up to her very gates). Let them kill sacrifices (AV). Rather, let the feasts come round (ASV). The Jews were faithful about celebrating the feasts of Passover, Pentecost, and Tabernacles each year, even though with guilty, unrepentant hands. 3. I . . . will lay siege. Through the instrumentality of the Assyrians in 701. 4. Out of the dust. Jerusalem was to be brought to abject humiliation and extremity of supplication. 5-8. The multitude of . . . nations . . . shall be as a dream. The Lord would suddenly disperse and destroy these heathen besiegers. Sennacherib's forces lifted the siege to fight the Egyptians at Eltekeh. It was on their return from that victorious engagement that the devastating stroke of God here predicted fell upon them. The loss of 185,000 troops in one night was like the shattering devastation of a mighty thunderstorm and whirlwind. To the Jews the sudden disappearance of the enemy would be like the fading of a nightmare when the dreamer awakes from his tortured sleep.

9-12. A rebuke to the spiritually blind countrymen of Isaiah. Translate verse 9: Tarry and be amazed; blind yourselves and be blind; they are drunken. . . . As the drunkard could have avoided his besotted condition by abstaining from liquor, so these who had blinded themselves with the folly of sin and unbelief could have avoided their condition. 10. The Lord . . . hath closed your eyes. Judicial blinding was the natural result of their initial turning away from God's revealed will. Even the professional prophets had lost contact with God and had no more message from him. 11. A book that is sealed. The Bible and the oracles of the true and faithful prophets of God remained incomprehensible and irrelevant to the "modern men" of the eighth century, who felt that they had advanced beyond their forefathers' outmoded submission to the authority of God's revelation. Having therefore no absolute authority outside themselves and their reason, they could not make head nor tail of God's message to them through Scripture. Verses 13-16 announce God's sentence of judicial blinding upon all who would deceive with sham piety or feigned submission. A mere commandment of men (ASV; precept, AV). A mere intellectual principle taught by moral philosophy is no satisfactory substitute for true surrender of heart. Their fear of me (ASV), or piety, was a mere artificial form, and sprang from no sincere love of God for his own sake. What knowledge they retained of spiritual truth would be taken from them until they were left with nothing but barren agnosticism or heathen superstition. 15. Hide deep their counsel (ASV). The Jews were carrying on secret intrigues with pagan allies, to whose military strength they were looking for deliverance, rather than to Jehovah.

16. Turning of things upside down. They were attempting to reverse true values, putting man at the top of the scale and God at the bottom, and supposing that the thing created matters more than the Creator. But God will not be subject to man's puny judgment nor tolerate his behaving as if he existed for his own sake, independently of the divine will.

17-24. A prophecy of the eventual removal of Israel's blindness. 17. Lebanon probably represents man in his self-pride. The proud will be hewn down; but because of this humiliation, the ensuing repentance will cause the cleared ground to spring up as a fruitful garden or orchard (karmel). But those who now produce the fruits of righteousness may later, through carelessness and neglect, revert to a disordered forest. 18,19. God promises a revival in Israel, centering in the humble and poor of the Lord's flock. Then spiritual deafness and blindness will give way to a ready responsiveness to the glorious truths of the Gospel, and the result will be a joyous, hymn-singing group of believers. 20,21. All that watch for iniquity. The ruthless and unscrupulous materialists who dominated the economic and political life of Israel were to meet with their just retribution and be removed from God's commonwealth. 22-24. The Redeemer will surely bring to pass his perfect plan for Israel, and forge them into a godly and reverent people, after they have repented and opened their hearts to the truth of Christ.

Sermon III. Confidence in Egypt Versus Confidence in God. 30:1-33.

A. Futility of Alliance with Egypt. 30:1-17.

1-5. The Lord here pronounces woe upon those who seek human counsel instead of divine, and follow the dictates of worldly wisdom. The league (ASV; counsel, AV). A secret alliance with Egypt to throw off the yoke of Assyria (a policy into which Hezekiah was unwisely allured at the death of Sargon in 705 B.C.). 4. The princes. The Jewish nobles included in the embassy to the Egyptian court, which conducted negotiations at Hanes (ancient Egyptian Hwt-nn'-nsw – "House of the child of the king" – Heracleopolis) fifty miles south of Memphis, as well as at Zoan (or Tanis) in the northeast of the Delta.

6-17. The Lord here condemns the embassy to Egypt. 6. The beasts of the south (or Negev, the southernmost part of Judah, which joins with the desert of Sinai). Those that carried the Jewish envoys and their gifts intended for the king of Egypt (Shabaka). The Negev is, of course, the land where these noisome creatures dwelt. 7. Rahab (ASV) means "insolent arrogance." That sitteth still (ASV). More literally, they are a sitting; i.e., they are do-nothings. 8. Isaiah was to inscribe on a tablet, which was to become a matter of public record, that God was displeased with the Bible-rejecting people of Judah and would utterly crush them for their willful disobedience. 10. Speak . . . smooth things. Very modern is this demand of the congregation that their clergy temper their messages to the desires and preferences of the people, rather than preach some unpopular doctrine derived from God's Word. 11. Cause the Holy One . . . to cease. They wished to hear no more of the God of the Bible, but only of a God of unrighteous love who would not seriously disturb them in their pursuit of their own schemes and desires. 13. The wall of self-will which they had built for their protection would suddenly collapse on them and crush them to death. 14. God would dash their iniquity (or the wall that symbolized it) into pieces like a pot of earthenware. 15. Ye would not. Through his prophets God had admonished them to "return" to him; i.e., to repent, and to rest or trust in him with confidence, for then he would deliver them from the tyrannous yoke of Assyrian overlordship. But instead they put their dependence upon Egyptian chariots, as if horses would insure their victory, rather than the strong arm of the Lord of hosts. In the coming time of trouble, bereft of God's favor, they would not be able to resist even an enemy force which they would outnumber a thousand to one (v. 17), and only a few scattered refugees would survive.

B. Comfort for God's Chastened and Repentant People. 30:18-26.

18. Therefore will the Lord wait. Despite the faithlessness of the nation as a whole, Jehovah would bear with them patiently (rather than inflict final destruction upon them all) until a penitent remnant would turn in faith to him; for he would fain display in them the riches of his kindness and grace. Those persecuted and afflicted believers who looked to him for deliverance would some day see him inflict judgment upon the wicked. 19. The people shall dwell in Zion. His ultimate purpose for his people is that they may dwell in security and peace in his holy city. Yet he must prepare them and teach them (translate Teacher in v. 20, rather than teachers) through affliction and trial, giving them sure guidance for each step and deterring them from going astray. Thus through suffering he would bring Israel to despise their false gods, who could not save them from disaster (v. 22), and to utterly abjure idolatry.

23-26. Evidently a description of the glories of the Millennium (since this kind of prosperity has no appropriateness for a heavenly existence). The day of the great slaughter (v. 25) refers to Armageddon, when the ramparts of the wicked shall have fallen in ruins. The intensified light of 30:26 is symbolic of glorious deliverance and peace as the kingdom of David is established on earth.

C. Destruction of the World Power. 30:27-33.

27,28. The prophet describes, with rich symbolism, the fearful devastation to be wrought upon the rebellious nations of earth at the last great conflict, a token of which was to be the more immediate destruction of Sennacherib's army. But even as these vials of divine wrath are being poured out upon the wicked world, God's redeemed people will abide in peace and joy, recognizing that he is working out his righteous purposes and vindicating the authority of his holy law before angels and men. The tabrets and harps of 30:32 are the orchestra that would sound the Lord's praise at Jerusalem as his supernatural destruction would fall upon the Assyrian host. 33. Topheth (ASV). The name of a place of Moloch worship in the Valley of the Sons of Hinnom, just outside the southwest corner of Jerusalem. Here idolatrous Jews, since the days of Ahaz, had carried on abominable infant sacrifice (II Kgs 23:10), utilizing special furnaces for this purpose. Possibly the king here mentioned is not the king of Assyria (for Sennacherib met no such end), but rather Moloch, the king-god. A furnace or Topheth of destruction was being prepared for Assyria resembling this sacrificial furnace in the Hinnom Valley. Perhaps this is meant to imply the final judgment of hell-fire.

Sermon IV. God, not Egypt, To Be Jerusalem's Defense. 31:1-9.

1-3. Disaster awaits those who trust in human strength rather than in God. The helpers (v. 3) were, of course, the Egyptians, and the helped were the Jews who concluded an alliance with them against Assyria. 4-9. God would defend Jerusalem without human aid. First he is compared to a lion, invincible and undismayed by all attackers as he guards his own. Then his watchful care is compared to that of birds who protectively hover over their threatened nests. (Passing over in verse 5 is from the same root as pesah or Passover.) The summons to repent and put away idolatry (v. 6) is accompanied by an assurance that the besieged Jews in Jerusalem, in the last extremity, as the Assyrians thundered at their gates, would discard their idols and cast themselves wholly upon Jehovah. Verse 8 contains a most remarkable prediction that no human army would shatter the enemy, but rather a direct stroke of God. 9. His rock (ASV; his strong hold, AV); i.e., the Assyrians' strength would pass away from Palestine, fleeing back to Nineveh. The ensign. Apparently the Jewish battle standard, which doubtless bore the name of Jehovah upon it.

Sermon V. Israel's Final Deliverance, and Her Spiritual Renewal. 32:1-20.

The destruction of the Assyrian army points prophetically to the final world conflict, which will usher in the rule of Christ, the perfect King of Israel. Christ's kingdom will fulfill God's ideal of a holy commonwealth, administering a perfect righteousness throughout the earth. God's King will provide complete shelter to all who seek refuge in him, and he will satisfy their thirsty souls with living water. (Note how all these blessings are already at hand in the present age for those who are spiritually citizens of his invisible kingdom.) He will bestow upon believers spiritual sight and hearing power that will never fail, and an understanding heart and clear testimony resulting from the complete transformation of the new birth. Under his government and influence, men will no longer be deceived by the prince of lies but will clearly see the difference between moral wisdom and folly, appreciating how fatuous is a life bent upon evil. God's standards of judgment will at last become man's standards.

9-14. The prophet issues a stern warning to the worldly-minded society women of Jerusalem that the devastation of warfare would cut off their income and plunge them into poverty (v. 10). They would be reduced to desperate straits and doleful lamentation as their mansions were destroyed and their ruined estates reverted to wilderness in the wake of Sennacherib's scourge. (Virtually every Jewish city besides Jerusalem was looted and burned in the campaign of 701, and the country districts were laid waste by Assyrian foragers).

15-20. The bright promise held out for the future was that after the utter ruin of the land (and this seems to point forward to the Chaldean invasion, and beyond), the Holy Spirit would be poured out upon God's people. This was to take place at Pentecost, as we now know, and the arid wilderness of unconverted souls would become transformed into fruitful gardens. But in the light of 32:18 it is necessary to see in this also a promise of great revival in the 'latter days.' Along with that gracious outpouring, will come unprecedented prosperity and fertility, even in lands now sterile. And conditions of righteousness and peace will safeguard the products of every man's toil. War will be completely abolished, after the forest of human power and pride has been laid low by the hail of divine judgment. 20. This seems to apply to the well-watered and fruitful lands at the service of Israel in the latter day, where their cattle may graze unhindered.

Sermon VI. Punishment of the Treacherous, and Triumph of Christ. 33:1-24.

1-6. A prophecy of Jehovah's triumph over the treacherous Assyrians. See II Kgs 18:14-36 for the account of how Sennacherib first accepted Hezekiah's bankrupting indemnity and then demanded unconditional surrender. Verses 2,3 express the appeal of the believing Jews to Jehovah for deliverance in the coming crisis, and their admiration and praise at his special intervention and routing of the Gentile invaders. 4. Your spoil. The prophet addresses the Assyrians directly as a vanquished foe. Verse 5 is an affirmation of God's glorious sovereignty, which was to be demonstrated in the Assyrian disaster. In his revealed Word and holy Temple he has filled Zion with the blessings of righteousness and justice, manifesting these qualities in his own marvelous dealings with Israel. 6. Wisdom and knowledge. A reference to the blessings of revival under Hezekiah, especially in the last years of his reign. Thy is addressed to the Judah of that generation.

7-12. A picture of Judah's situation when Sennacherib would devastate the land and contemptuously spurn the peace envoys of Hezekiah. The Assyrian's earlier acceptance of indemnity would imply a covenant of peace, but this he would break. In Judah's extremity of helplessness, Jehovah would arise to destroy the invader's army and expose his vaunting pride as worthless, and his defiance of God as the occasion for his fiery doom. Burnings of lime (v. 12) implies a burning so thorough that only ashes would be left, like the small lump left after lime has been burnt.

13-16. The Lord points out for all observers the moral of His judgment upon Sennacherib. The unconverted sinners of Judah would be thrown into consternation at this proof of God's power, for it implies a threat that their own iniquities would be visited upon them. They would see that only a sincere and upright believer can be secure in the face of the perpetual flame of God's just vengeance – everlasting burnings (v. 14). The only true safety is a godly walk that follows the laws of God in practical life. There is no place so secure as the center of God's will. There a believer is surrounded by the Lord's protecting care, and defended against all possible assailants (v. 16).

17-24. This passage, judging from the statement that Jerusalem will be inviolable, is a foreglimpse of the Millennial kingdom. Therefore the king of Israel (v. 17) must be Christ in his regal splendor, reigning over a world-wide domain. 18,19. The Almighty prophesies the complete removal of latter-day "Assyrians" from the scene, after their abortive siege of Jerusalem. The undisturbed quiet of the Holy City indicates a time after the conclusion of the "times of the Gentiles" (cf. Lk 21:24). Jehovah's presence with a Zion obedient and faithful will insure her impregnable defense (v. 21). She will be like a city surrounded by protective moats – impenetrable to enemy ships – and fructifying streams. No mere man is sovereign over Israel, but Jehovah God himself, and this insures her ultimate deliverance. But the invading ship of Assyria (figuratively speaking) will run helplessly aground, with its tackling loosened; and all its contents will become spoil to the Hebrew defenders. Even the lame Jews (v. 23) will be able to clamber aboard and pillage the helpless attacker. There will be no more spiritual sickness in the cleansed and forgiven land of latter-day Israel.

VOLUME SIX. GENERAL REBUKE AND PROMISE, II. 34:1–35:10.

Sermon I. Utter Destruction of Gentile World Power. 34:1-17.

1-7. The judicial wrath of God will be poured out upon all rebellious nations of earth and powers of Satan. Here we have depicted the scene of carnage that will ensue upon the Battle of Armageddon. The army or host of heaven (v. 4) seems to refer to angelic powers opposed to God, in collaboration with unconverted mankind (cf. Eph 6:12 – "the spirit-beings of wickedness in the heavenlies"; cf. Mt 24:29; Rev 6:12). Also involved is a removal or alteration of the (lower ?) heavens as now constituted, ushering in "new heavens and a new earth" (cf. Isa 65:17). 5-7. The prophecy here represents the destruction of heathen mankind under the example of Edom, or Idumea, the nation accursed of God (v. 5). Just as Edom was an estranged brother of Israel (Esau and Jacob being their respective ancestors), even so unbelieving men are estranged and lost brethren of the redeemed. Their slain upon the battlefield will be like sacrificial animals slain at the altar. Hence the appropriateness of the mention of Bozrah, a famous sheepherding center in Edom. The wild oxen (AV, unicorns) and bulls are symbolic of conquering invaders, who will wreak bloody destruction throughout the land of the Edomites.

8-15. A description of the coming utter desolation of the Edomite domains, and, by implication, the ruin of all the God-denying civilization of unregenerate mankind. The complete depopulation, and the occupation of the site by beasts and birds of prey quite resembles what was earlier predicted of Babylon (13:21,22). Babylon, Moab, and Edom all represent different phases of the degeneracy of the corrupt culture of fallen mankind. 11. Confusion and emptiness. In Genesis 1:2 the same words, tōhû and bōhû, are translated "without form and void." The satyr (ASV, wild goat) and screech owl (ASV, night monster; Hebrew lîlît) may perhaps represent demonic creatures, for demons are fit spiritual inhabitants for such a place. 16,17. A strong affirmation that these predictions recorded in writing in Jehovah's book, i.e., the inspired prophecies of Isaiah, would be literally fulfilled; and these loathesome creatures would be the only permanent inhabitants of Edom.

Sermon II. Blessing on the Highway of Holiness. 35:1-10.

In stark contrast to the future of the unrepentant, God-defying world stands the future of the people of God. 1,2. The blossoming of desert vegetation symbolizes the inward change that takes place in the redeemed soul. Instead of arid fruitlessness and spiritual death comes the fair bloom of newly blossoming faith and the more matured grandeur of the cedars of Lebanon. The redeemed will, in a measure, reflect the glory of the Saviour who has appeared for their redemption. 3,4. Your God will come. A comforting assurance to the discouraged and disheartened that the Lord will intervene on the world scene, to make society subject to the demands of righteousness and to rescue his people from their oppressors. 5-7. A guarantee that the strength of God will replace the feebleness of man. Believers will be able to see God's truth and hear his voice, walk in his ways unhampered, and sing forth his testimony and praise. Rich and satisfying refreshment will be their constant portion, rather than the searing heat and parching thirst of their unregenerate past. Note that parched ground (v. 7; glowing sand) may have been the Hebrew term for "desert mirage," which mocks the thirsty traveler with a deceitful vision of waters on the horizon. 8-10. The redeemed people will walk on the way of holiness, from which moral filthiness will be excluded, as well as the ravenous lions of Satanic malignancy. On that pathway even the foolish and unwary traveler, once redeemed and born again, may travel without becoming lost. And those who journey to the Holy City by this highway from Babylon, the City of Destruction, will be characterized by a special joy of which the world knows nothing, and will sing a special song of thanksgiving which the unsaved can never utter.

VOLUME SEVEN. THE VOLUME OF HEZEKIAH. 36:1–39:8.

A. The Destruction of Judah Averted. 36:1–37:38.

Scene I. Jehovah Challenged by Assyrian World Power. 36:1-22.

In this gripping account there stands on the one side of the arena the arrogant, ruthless power of the world, with every material advantage on its side. On the other stands the feeble remnant of Judah, having no resource but God himself. Here we are presented with a historical test to demonstrate once and for all whether Jehovah is the one true God, the Sovereign over all the earth.

1. Fourteenth year seems to refer to the second reign of Hezekiah, i.e., the additional span of fifteen (plus ?) years added to the king at the time of the deadly illness recorded in Isa 38. The illness would have occurred in 714, or eleven years after the death of Hezekiah's father, Ahaz. Sennacherib had begun his reign in 705, and had spent most of his time since then suppressing rebellions in various parts of his empire. All the fortified cities (ASV). Sennacherib's own record lists them as forty-six in number. 2. Rabshakeh. Not a proper name, but the title of a high court official (originally a royal cupbearer, since the name means "chief wine-pourer"). Note that his challenge is given at the very spot where Isaiah had confronted Ahaz twenty-three years before (cf. Isa 7). 3. Eliakim and Shebna. Cf. 22:15-25. 7. Very craftily the Assyrian appealed to the idolatrous party in Judah, who were grieved at Hezekiah's reforms. 8. Give pledges. Make a bargain with. He threw into their teeth their pitiful inadequacy in cavalry and chariots. They did not have enough trained men to handle two thousand horses even if Assyria should give them that many. 10. Sennacherib's blasphemous arrogance in claiming Jehovah's authorization contains within it a disquieting element of truth (cf. 10:5,6). 11. At this early period Aramaic – the Syrian language – was already becoming the lingua franca of the Near East (replacing Rabshakeh's native Akkadian, which had enjoyed this status in the previous millennium). But the average Jew, untrained for foreign commerce, was ignorant of it. 17. The Assyrian policy was still to deport rebellious populations, just as it had been in the case of the ten tribes in 721. Note that this is an offer of economic security at the price of liberty, an offer presented by Assyria's counterparts even today. 18-20. Hath any of the gods . . . delivered his land. The Assyrian king regarded his subjugation of these north Syrian principalities as a triumph over the gods of the various nations. Surely, he reasoned, no god could be any bigger and stronger than the nation that served him. The defeat of Israel could be interpreted as defeat of Israel's God.

Scene II. Assyria Answered and Judged. 37:1-38.

1. Hezekiah rent his clothes in token of deepest humiliation and distress. Well he knew how largely he himself was responsible for the terrible blow that had fallen upon his kingdom. He had disregarded God's warnings (cf. Isa 30; 31) and concluded the disastrous alliance with Egypt. Now he could only turn back in penitence to the prophet whose warnings he had ignored. 3. The children are come to the birth. The situation of Judah resembled the hopeless impasse when a baby lodges in the mouth of the womb and cannot pass through. Death threatens both mother and child. 6,7. God's first response to Sennacherib's challenge was to foretell that (a) a rumor of enemy attack would move Sennacherib to lift the siege; (b) he would return to Assyria without renewing the siege; (c) he would there be assassinated. 8. Libnah was less than ten miles north of Lachish and just below the border of Dan. 9. Tirhakah was not king at this time, but Shabaka. Tirhakah must therefore have been the commanding officer of the Egyptian expeditionary force in 701 B.C. His reign as king of Egypt did not begin until 688. (Or perhaps this Tirhakah was of an earlier generation than the one who became king, since some inscriptional evidence indicates that the latter would have been but a child at this time.) 12. Gozan was in Padan-aram about 180 miles west of Nineveh. Haran was still farther west, about 70 miles. Though Rezeph and Telassar were in the north Mesopotamian region, their location is not certainly known. The cities named in 37:13 were all in Syria, north of Damascus. 15. So deep was the king's concern and grief at this insult to the Lord God that he dispensed with any prophetic intermediary and went directly to God. 16. Dwellest between. Rather, sittest (enthroned) above the cherubim (ASV). That is, the cherubim of the mercy seat on the ark of the covenant in the Temple. 19. Under the apparently hopeless circumstances confronting Hezekiah, this forthright assertion of the unique deity of Jehovah and the nonexistence of the gods of the heathen demonstrated a sturdy faith. 20. He grounded his petition upon the need for vindication of God's glory, not upon his own personal need or that of his people (for he realized that they little deserved divine favor).

21-29. God's second reply, directed to Sennacherib personally this time, as well as to Hezekiah. 23. Very significant is the title Holy One of Israel, for it was at this juncture that Jehovah was about to demonstrate his immeasurable superiority over his creatures, and his self-commitment to Israel, his precious possession. 24. The cedars and fir trees of Lebanon were the choicest of timber for the woodsman to fell. The Assyrian presumed to fell the choicest of nations, including God's specially chosen people. 26. How fatuous was Assyria's pride, for her armies had achieved their victories so far only by the ordaining of the God whom they defied. 29. God would humiliate Assyria by treating her as a wild beast subdued by means of hook (used especially for bulls) and bridle, and compelling her to return home with her objectives not achieved. 30-32. The Lord appointed a confirmatory sign of the divine authority behind this assurance: the Jews would be free to return to their ruined fields and gather unmolested the aftergrowth; that is, the crop that would spring up from the fallen grains of the previous harvest (the invasion having lasted thus far from spring to autumn). The following year also they would be dependent mostly on spontaneous growth, since their houses, equipment, and livestock would have to be repaired or replaced. The year after that they would engage in normal sowing, plowing, and reaping, for there would be no return of the Assyrian marauders. (This, of course, is the fulfillment to which this "sign" points, rather than to the more immediate destruction of Sennacherib's army.) 31,32. God gave assurance that the cooped-up refugees behind the walls of Jerusalem would fan out and re-establish their cities and towns (during the 113 years' interval before the fall of Jerusalem to the Chaldeans).

33. After withdrawing to meet the Egyptians at Eltekeh, Sennacherib would not return to renew the siege, but would flee homeward by the shortest route possible. 35. God's ground for delivering Jerusalem was not the merit of the present generation but rather his covenant promises to David of old. 36. The usual assumption is that the Lord used a sudden outbreak of rat-borne bubonic plague to accomplish this heavy mortality. Herodotus records a tradition of a plague of field mice that chewed through all the bowstrings of the Assyrians during the Egyptian campaign.

38. This assassination seems to have taken place twenty years later, in 681. The Assyrian spellings of these names were Adadmilki and Shar-usur (whose crime is referred to in inscriptions of Esarhaddon and Ashurbanipal). The idol's name has not yet been identified in Assyrian records, unless Nisroch is a misspelling of Nusku. (Schrader explained it as a participle from sarāku, meaning "The Dispenser" or "The Gracious One." This might have been the title of some better-known deity.) The land of Ararat (ASV) was central Armenia. Armenian tradition relates that these parricides lived to found influential dynasties in that land.

B. Destruction of Judah's King Averted. 38:1–39:8.

Scene I. Hezekiah's Recovery from Deadly Illness. 38:1-22.

Verses 5,6 of this chapter show clearly that at the time of Hezekiah's illness the Assyrian threat to Judah's existence would not arise for many years, presumably not until the latter end of the additional fifteen years added to the king's life. Therefore this illness must have occurred long before the events of the preceding chapters. Why was chronological order thus violated in the arrangement of material in this book? Because the prophecy of eventual Babylonian captivity for Judah arose out of Hezekiah's folly in displaying his wealth to the Chaldean envoys. This in turn set the stage for the events of the latter portion of the book (chs. 40–66), which tends to center attention on the Exile and the return to Jerusalem. As for the illness itself, it seems to have been a severe carbuncle or abscess, or even a cancer (see v. 21).

3. With a perfect heart; i.e., with a completely sincere and devoted heart. He made no claim to sinless perfection, nor does the Hebrew shālēm carry such a connotation. 8. In the light of our present information it is impossible to ascertain how many steps or degrees made up this sundial of Ahaz. The markings may have indicated half-hours or even quarter-hours. Nor can we be certain whether this miracle involved an actual reverse rotation of the earth (which might well have occasioned violent geological disturbances), or was caused by some special atmospheric condition involving an unprecedented refraction of the sun's rays.

10-14. The prospect of painful and untimely death plunged Hezekiah into anguish and despair. 12. For mine age (AV), read my dwelling (ASV; from dôr). And for I have cut off, read I have rolled up. That is, the strip of fabric, now completed, is rolled up into a bolt of cloth. 13. I reckoned (AV). Rather, I have smoothed, or quieted [my soul] until morning; as a lion, so He breaketh all my bones (ASV; a proverbial expression for acute mental anguish and distress of soul).

15-20. The theme of the second movement of this psalm is thanksgiving for God's grace. 15. God had spoken to the king powerfully through this great crisis in his life. Go softly. Better, I shall walk in solemn procession because of the (former) bitterness of my soul. 16. By these things. By such divine providences as severe sickness or peril. Men live; i.e., attain continued life or are saved (spiritually). 17. Render with the ASV: Behold, (it was) for (my) peace (or well-being that) I had great bitterness. By this trial he learned a most valuable lesson. 18. The grave. More properly, Sheol (ASV). The inhabitants of the infernal regions cannot maintain fellowship with God as can those still dwelling upon earth. In Sheol, according to Christian theology, the dead were shut away in a waiting room until the day of Christ's resurrection (or the Day of Judgment). 19. Naturally it is impossible for fathers, after they are dead, to teach their children about God.

Scene II. Hezekiah's Foolish Pride and God's Rebuke. 39:1-8.

1. In Babylonian, Merodach-baladan was Marduk-apla-iddina, "Marduk has given a son." In 721 this Chaldean leader seized control of Babylon and was accepted as a vassal by Sargon. This congratulatory embassy of his to Judah in 712 B.C. had the ulterior motive of enlisting Hezekiah in a conspiracy against Assyria. But two years later Sargon captured Babylon, and he made the Chaldean a prisoner in 709. 5. God had lent these earthly treasures as a trust, but Hezekiah regarded them as his own, and missed a wonderful opportunity of spiritual witness to these pagan envoys. He was giving the glory to himself instead of to God. 6. This very explicit prediction was fulfilled to the letter in the days of Nebuchadnezzar. All this treasure went as booty to Babylon (instead of to the Assyrian capital, Nineveh, as human foresight might have supposed). 8. Hezekiah felt the justice of God's rebuke and submissively bowed before it. At the same time he clung to the comforting assurance that at least this Babylonian captivity would not take place in his lifetime.

VOLUME EIGHT. THE VOLUME OF COMFORT. 40:1–66:24.

Section I. The Purpose of Peace. 40:1–48:22.

Sermon I. The Sovereign Majesty of Jehovah the Comforter. 40:1-31.

1-11. The Spirit of God here proclaims divine comfort. There is no clear suggestion in this chapter (nor in Isa 41; 42) as to what had befallen Israel. Neither the Exile nor the restoration to the land is specifically alluded to. It is simply stated that Israel will have endured hard military service (warfare in v. 2), and received a double penalty from God for her sins. 1. My people. The gracious language of a compassionate, covenant-keeping God. Comfort ye. A summons to all God's true prophets, from Isaiah's time until the close of the Exile. 2. Speak ye comfortably. More literally, Speak unto the heart of Jerusalem; i.e., to soothe or reassure. Her iniquity is pardoned. More literally, has been atoned for. Double perhaps refers to (a) the temporal punishment of the seventy years of captivity, (b) the eternal punishment visited upon the person of Christ the sin-bearer on Calvary.

3. The implication here is that Jehovah was to return to Jerusalem through the desert route by which the exiles would return from Babylon, and that a fitting preparation for his advent would be the removal of obstacles and the smoothing out of a highway. But from Matthew's application of this verse to the ministry of John the Baptist (Mt 3:3), it is apparent that these geographical features symbolize the arid lifelessness of the unconverted soul. The hills therefore represent the carnal pride of the sinner, and the valleys his moods of carnal hopelessness and self-pity. 5. The glory of Jehovah (ASV) was to be revealed through (a) Cyrus' liberation of the exiles from Babylonian captivity and their restoration to the land of promise; (b) Christ's liberation of Satan's bondslaves and their adoption into the family of God. All flesh. All mankind are to witness this divine intervention on behalf of the redeemed people.

6,7. Taken by himself, man is tragically frail and transient, and his beauty soon fades. His life is devoid of real dignity or meaning. But the eternal and infallible Word of God invests believing mankind with imperishable significance and glory.

9-11. The AV reading here, O Zion, that bringest good tidings (i.e., that preachest the Gospel) is preferable to that of the ASV, Thou that tellest good tidings to Zion. The latter leaves unexplained what female personage it may be who is to evangelize Zion (for the "thou" is feminine in Hebrew). Jerusalem, the Holy City, is to announce Jehovah's coming to all the other cities of Judah. 10. With strong hand. ASV, as a mighty one. His work means His wages or reward, i.e., benefit to the godly and retribution to the wicked. 11. He shall feed . . . gather . . . carry . . . lead. A prediction beautifully expounded and lived out by our Lord Jesus Christ.

Verses 12-17 set forth the incomparable majesty of Jehovah as the infinitely great and wise Creator. According to pagan mythology the gods of the heathen were spawned by pre-existent matter. But this God of revelation was eternally pre-existent before creation, and remains transcendent above his creation, utterly unapproachable in wisdom and profundity of thought. This sets the scene for the exposure of idolatry (vv. 18-20) in all its pitiful absurdity. The fashioning of a graven image speaks eloquently of the fact that the heathen god himself was a mere creature of man's imagination. 21. Even the ancestors of the Gentiles (e.g., Adam and Noah), at the beginning of history, knew of the one true Creator-God. 22. Note that circle (hûg) is compatible with the notion of the earth as a sphere (or even a discoid). 23. The great ones of this earth — even a Sennacherib or a Nebuchadnezzar — are mere worthless trash (vanity) before the omnipotent Sovereign. They are like unrooted seed that is quickly blown off the ground on which it alights (v. 24). 26. The grandeur of the starry heavens is a reminder of how puny and infinitesimal man is.

27-31. If then the God of Israel is this omnipotent Creator and Sovereign, his people need never fear that their problems and difficulties are too much for him to handle, or that he is unable to bring their unjust oppressors into judgment (even though Israel's long years of captivity to come might give her that impression). His power to deliver and avenge them is never diminishable through weariness or overstrain. His wisdom in ordering the affairs of men is beyond their comprehension. To his children, who lack both stamina and strength, he liberally grants all they need for their constant progress and spiritual attainment, provided they trustingly wait upon him in expectation and prayer.

Sermon II. God's Challenge to Idolatrous Unbelievers. 41:1-29.

1-7. Jehovah, as Lord over the destiny of nations and men, here declares his omnipotent providence. The islands or coastlands (v. 1). The Mediterranean lands. The people (ASV peoples). Mankind in general, as an aggregate of national units. God condescends to reason with them on the basis of that intelligence and conscience in regard to the moral law that he has implanted in their hearts by common grace. 2. The one from the east (ASV; or place of sun-rising). The future conqueror of Babylon, Cyrus the Great of Persia (558—529 B.C.). He was to come as God's anointed servant (45:1), a type of Christ, the Liberator of God's people from bondage. Isaiah stresses the evidential value of the coming fulfillment of these predictions regarding Cyrus' irresistible triumph under the blessing of God. 3. Pursued . . . passed . . . had . . . gone. Translate as present or future time (as in ASV). 4. The coming downfall of Babylon and success of Cyrus would demonstrate that this God of a despised and exiled little nation is truly the Eternal One, the Ordainer of the destinies of men. 6,7. The idol manufactured by the heathen is a carnal device designed to give men some sense of security in face of the superhuman forces of life.

8-20. Israel, as the chosen people of the Almighty, is an instrument of his sovereign providence. 8. The first appearance of the momentous figure of the Servant of the Lord. The Servant is here the believing nation of Israel, as opposed to the unbelieving Gentiles. The significance of the people of Israel lies in the facts that (1) they are descendants of Abraham, God's friend (lit., My lover); and (2) they are therefore heirs of the covenant promises (Gen 12:1-3). As an immigrant from Ur in Sumeria, Abraham came from the "ends of the earth" (from the Palestinian standpoint, at least). So the captive exiles were to be gathered back from Babylonia in 537. 10. Even though no exiled nation had ever before in history been brought back to start life anew in their ancestral homeland, and even though the Gentile government would have no practical means of inducing the Jews to return home, nevertheless God would bring this seeming impossibility to pass. In the words of this verse he sought to strengthen his people so that they would triumph over every earthly power (whether Babylon or Persia, Greece or Rome) that would seek to extinguish their testimony. All these heathen empires were to fall and pass away, whereas Jehovah's people would live on and flourish. (Amazing prediction, amazingly fulfilled!) Not that Israel would ever acquire great worldly power, but her God would be her constant strength. By herself Israel was but a feeble worm (v. 14), to be despised and stepped on by the world. But as a yielded instrument in God's hand, she was to be the means of overthrowing the mightiest of the nations and bringing them to ruin. The prayers of the faithful unleash the mightiest forces in human history, and even the invincible armies of Persia, Greece, and Rome would crumble before the decrees of God, leaving the people of God triumphant amid their ruins.

17-20. These verses set forth with rich symbolism the transformation of life that God promised to bring about for spiritual Israel. Both in the generation that was to return from Babylon and in all subsequent generations, he guaranteed that he would supply the physical and spiritual needs of the servant-nation. Even in the most distressing hardships and times of gravest peril, God would abundantly furnish all his people might need, invigorating their souls with sweetest refreshment and appointing for them shady and beautiful gardens and groves for their spiritual delight. The seven species of trees in verse 19 symbolize the perfection of God's work in this connection. 20. Such gracious provision would mightily strengthen the faith of God's people as they recognized and rejoiced in his faithfulness.

21-29. Turning now to idol-worshiping Gentiles, Jehovah challenges them to prove the reality and power of their idols by the test of prophecy and fulfillment (v. 22). His people charge these false gods with being utterly unable to fore-announce their will and purpose, through their prophets, and then carry it out. But Jehovah here and now (v. 25) declares his purpose to raise up — 150 years later — an irresistible conqueror from the east (making his attack from the north), who would respect God's name and carry out his plan. The imaginary gods of the heathen could accomplish no such feat as this. 27. Behold them; i.e., behold the fulfillments of my predictions. Render the verse thus: "(As) the first (to say) to Zion, 'Lo and behold them,' I was giving to Jerusalem a messenger of good news" (i.e., Isaiah himself). 28. No man. No predictive prophet among the devotees of idols.

Sermon III. The Servant of Jehovah — Individual and National. 42:1-25.

1-4. The Messiah-Servant is presented as the tender Prophet (a passage applied to the Lord Jesus in Mt 12:18-20). Clearly the Servant is now an individual rather than the nation of Israel as a whole. God would be delight[ed] or "well pleased" with him (cf. Mt 3:17). As the Chosen One, he was to be the federal Head of God's elect people. He would be especially empowered by the Holy Spirit (cf. Isa 11:2). Avoiding all ostentation or self-display, he would carry on a quiet and unassuming ministry (even though multitudes, as we now know, would flock to him out in the fields and hills). Tenderly he would avoid crushing the bruised reed (v. 3), i.e., the contrite sinner, or extinguishing the feeble testimony of the weakest believer. He would have a ministry to all nations, bringing to them judgment (in vv. 1,4 mishpāṭ implies the standards or principles of divine holiness and truth — the true faith of the Gospel). Moreover, this message and standard of his would take permanent root in the world, even in the isles or coastlands of the west.

5-9. God's twofold mission for his Servant would be: (a) to fulfill his covenant promises to Israel; (b) to bring the light of revelation to the Gentiles. The Creator and Sustainer of life would undertake to uphold and support the Servant in his earthly mission (v. 6). The Servant's Gospel would operate to free all believers from the prison house of sin (v. 7). All the glory for accurately predicting coming events is to be kept by God alone. He will not share it with gods invented by men.

Verses 10-13 represent the Gentiles as singing praise for their deliverance and conversion, and rejoicing with faithful Israel over God's conquest of all his foes, his overthrow of empires and intellectual systems hostile to his authority and truth. The culminating conquest, of course, will be the final conflict of Armageddon.

Verses 14-17 set forth the promise that

God would visit condign judgment upon the heathen and tenderly restore his chastened people. Having restrained himself during their disciplinary sufferings, he would now burst forth in judgment upon the heathen powers symbolized by these mountains and hills, and the various water barriers of Babylonia that would keep the Jewish exiles in captivity (v. 15). 16. The blind. The backslidden and wayward Jews, who were about to be led through suffering to forsake their idolatries and return to God. For their long night of disgrace and sorrow, the Lord would give them spiritual renewal, and he would smooth out all of the difficulties obstructing their return to Palestine. But the heathen idolaters who clung to their abominations he would discredit and destroy.

18-25. Jehovah here calls attention to the strange and unaccountable blindness of his servant-nation, Israel. Having beheld his miracles of deliverance, the Jews nevertheless remained uncomprehending and obtuse. God's purpose, when he chose Israel, was to exalt and dignify his holy law through a people who obeyed it. But, alas, the Jews had altogether ignored his law; and so they would have to undergo despoliation by their foes and captivity in Babylonia. 24. God made plain that defeat and exile would come upon his people not because he was unable to protect them, but rather because he had chosen and decreed that they should be thus punished.

Sermon IV. The Witness Nation Redeemed from Chaldean Bondage. 43:1-28.

1-7. The Lord here promises Israel blessed restoration, issuing from his love and operating by redemption. 1. Redeemed thee. Here, as often elsewhere, the word "to redeem" comes from gā'al, "to serve as gō'ēl, or kinsman-redeemer." Through Isaiah God made clear that he would treat Israel as members of his own family; he would claim their rights and fulfill their obligations for them. 3. The ground for these promises of companionship and deliverance through suffering and trial was not any superiority or merit on the part of the Jews, but God's unmerited favor and grace, and his self-commitment as Father to his covenant people. He had granted to the Persians, beforehand, as a reward for their releasing captive Israel from Babylon, the country of Egypt and a portion of Ethiopia as additions to their empire (these being added in the reign of Cambyses, son of Cyrus). 4. Thou. The people of Israel, precious in the Father's eyes because invested with the perfections of the Lord Jesus, imputed to them by grace. 5. The scattered exiles will be regathered from every geographical direction. But by implication the coming back to Zion seems to refer also to the gathering in of all the elect (v. 7) into the Church of Jesus Christ, for they include every one . . . whom I have created . . . for my glory.

8-13. Here the servant-nation is presented as God's witness to the Gentile world. Restored Israel, cured of her blindness, was to qualify as a witness to the truth and faithfulness of the living God — in contrast to the pagan devotees of idolatry, who could testify to nothing like this in their own gods. It was Israel's responsibility to proclaim Jehovah as the only God there is, and as the only Saviour of sinners. 12. Never was any heathen deity associated with Jehovah in delivering Israel from foreign tyranny or national peril. Never did the Almighty show forth his power to save except when his people put away their worship of all other gods.

14-21. This passage declares that God would demonstrate his sovereignty by overthrowing the Chaldean Empire and bringing the Jews back to Palestine. He would bring the Chaldeans down from their pre-eminence and make them flee from Babylon before the onslaught of Persia. He was the same God who made a path through the Red Sea for the Hebrews of the Exodus, and drowned the Egyptian chariots that pursued after them. But his coming deliverance was to eclipse even that in glory. For he would conduct the liberated Jews through the parched Syrian Desert, and cause it to put forth streams of water to quench their thirst (probably figurative for the sustaining provision he would grant the pioneers through their early years of privation and suffering). The desert animals that are represented as rejoicing in this water supply may stand for Gentile nations which will benefit from the witness of the restored Jews.

22-28. Ungrateful Israel must first suffer national disaster before these promised blessings could be bestowed. Tiring of God and the old-fashioned religion of the Scriptures, they turned to other gods, new faiths, and pagan allies. Hence, although they maintained the forms of worship, what they really brought to Jehovah was not their sheep, but their unrepentant hearts and unconfessed sins. What the Lord requires is not lavish and expensive offerings, but filial trust in him and submission to his will. Despite the guilt of his people, however, God purposed to cancel out their sins altogether (v. 25), not for any extenuating merit in Israel, but only because of his own loving desire to honor his covenant undertakings. From the standpoint of the laws of justice, the Jews had no case to defend, for even their covenant forefather, Abraham, was guilty of sin (in lying to Pharaoh and Abimelech about his wife's status), and their spiritual leaders had turned against the Lord (v. 27). Therefore they would have to endure national catastrophe and shame (in their captivity in Babylonia). 28. I have profaned. Rather, I will profane (ASV).

Sermon V. Israel's Witness for God Against Idols. 44:1-28.

1-5. Despite Israel's backsliding and apostasy, she was God's chosen people and the object of his unmerited favor. 2. From the very beginning — from the womb — he had appointed her to be his peculiar people, bestowing upon her the title of Jeshurun (ASV), Upright One (cf. Deut 32:15; 33:5,26) — a token of her eventual conversion to Gospel holiness. Circumstances in the reign of Manasseh (when Isaiah was doubtless granted these revelations) may have seemed to indicate a complete and permanent departure from the faith. But God here explicitly predicts that future Israel was to receive the Living Water and the Holy Spirit himself poured out upon them (pre-eminently at Pentecost, Acts 2). 6-8. God presents anew His challenge to an idol-worshiping world, asserting his eternal being and his uniqueness as the only true God. Again he points to the testimony of fulfilled predictions (a phenomenon peculiar to the Hebrew Scriptures) as a type of evidence of divine authority no man-invented religion can ever produce. To this fulfillment of prophecy, the Jewish nation stands as witness, furnishing verification to all the world that only Jehovah is God, and there is no security in any but him.

9-20. Jehovah exposes the foolishness of polytheism and the blindness of idolaters to most obvious truth. (This extended exposé was doubtless intended to strengthen the Jews against the allurements of paganism during the long captivity in Babylon.) 9. Their delectable things. The idols these pagans delighted in, all decked with gold and precious stones. The witnesses. The spiritually blinded devotees themselves. 11. They shall be put to shame (ASV), as the dreadful judgment of God closed in upon them, and their cities and empire crashed in ruins, even though they had been faithful fellows or companions (hăbārîm) of their idol. 15-17. With merciless sarcasm the Lord points out the arrant folly of making a god out of a substance used for firewood. (John Knox, in decrying the idolatry of the Mass, parodied this passage with devastating effect: "With part of the flour you make bread to eat, with the residue you fashion a god to fall down before"). 20. The idol-worshiper feeds his soul on ashes; i.e., upon degrading and revolting worthlessness. Even so, in the philosophical realm, Bible-rejecting agnostics show a similar blindness to obvious and inescapable laws of cause and effect (e.g., that the mechanism of the universe requires a Mechanic to fashion it). But neither idolaters nor modern freethinkers can answer the all-important question: "How can I be saved?"

21-23. Here is a promise of mercy for the nation that stands for God's truth. The many and grievous sins of the Jews would be canceled out, and they might come to God for forgiveness, since he would act for their redemption (in appointing Messiah as their atonement). At these Gospel tidings the angels of heaven would sing with joy, and also the OT saints who in Sheol awaited Christ's resurrection. Even the nonhuman creation, which eagerly awaits the "manifestation of the sons of God" (Rom 8:19), would share in this triumphal rejoicing.

24-28. Jehovah presents himself (1) as the omnipotent Creator, who has prepared Israel from all eternity as his redeemed people; and (2) as the all-wise Sovereign over history, who overthrows the puny wisdom of the philosophers and savants of this world by exposing the fallacy of all their vain imaginations. Worldlings would never have believed that Jerusalem and its holy Temple would be completely rebuilt seventy years after the Chaldeans had demolished them; yet the city and the Temple were restored exactly as God had foretold. Worldlings, too, would have scornfully rejected the possibility that a repopulated Judah would be rebuilt by descendants of Nebuchadnezzar's deportees; yet Jehovah was to bring even that to pass. Least likely of fulfillment, to the mind of an unbeliever, was the prediction that the Jews would be liberated by a non-Israelite pagan like Cyrus; and yet so it was, 150 years after the Lord predicted it.

Sermon VI. Coming Gentile Deliverer, and Conversion of the Heathen. 45:1-25.

1. His anointed is māshîah or Messiah. As deliverer of God's people from bondage, as invincible victor over his foes, Cyrus stands as a type of Jesus Christ; and many of the promises to him have a spiritual fulfillment also in the ministry and career of our Redeemer. The gates shall not be shut. Remarkably exemplified in the capture of Babylon in 539. By strategem a Persian contingent entered the city on the dry river bed and opened the gates to the main army from the inside. 3. Treasures of darkness. Even treasure hidden away in secret places (Cyrus secured $630,000,000 worth of bullion from Croesus alone). 4. I have surnamed thee. Rather, I do surname thee, or, give thee an honorable epithet, namely, "My anointed one." 6. Great stress is laid upon the evidential value of naming Cyrus specifically such a long time in advance. The fulfillment of this prediction was to furnish positive proof of the divine authority of this prophecy and the sovereignty of the Revealer, as the only God who exists.

7. Jehovah is the Creator and Sustainer of the physical universe, and of the moral law as well. The evil he creates is the antithesis of peace. But since the opposite of peace is not sin or moral evil, it is obvious that physical evil, or the calamitous consequences of wrongdoing are here intended. Nowhere does the Scripture ascribe to God the creation or authorship of sin; this originates only from the free moral agency of created beings. 8. God's ultimate purpose is to form a holy and righteous society. As the physical heavens pour fructifying rain upon the soil, so the spiritual influence of heaven is to produce spiritual fruitage in the hearts and lives of those who inhabit the earth. 9,10. It is the part of folly to subject God's dealing to man's criticism or condemnation. All human understanding of the issues of right and wrong has originated in him as Creator, and therefore can never surpass him in excellence or validity. A child may not properly call his parents to an accounting, as if he possessed judicial authority over them. How much less may a man be critical of God!

11-13. As the Creator of heaven and earth, as the Lord of history, who brings to pass what he foretells will happen, Jehovah here invites the people of Israel to put their complete trust in him. 11. Command ye me concerning. . . . Translate, with Delitzsch, commit to me the care of thy sons. The verb "to command," used with the accusative of the person and the preposition "concerning," forms an idiom meaning, "commit something to the care of someone." 13. I have raised him up; i.e., Cyrus the Great, who would subsidize the reconstruction of Jerusalem and its Temple without any monetary or practical inducement whatever.

14-19. The nations that lay to the South of Israel would be overcome by the power of God's truth and thereby compelled to acknowledge the Jehovah of Israel as the only true God. Turning from idolatry (v. 16), they would perceive that only through the special revelation of the Scriptures can God truly be known. (Christianity was for a time, at least, extended to the Sabean regions of South Arabia, v. 14a; there were also Sabeans on the Ethiopian side of the Red Sea.) History, in the long run, will vindicate God's truth entrusted to Israel after all other religions and philosophies have fallen into discredit (v. 14b). Through both OT and NT, God discloses that he had a wise purpose in creating the earth as a place for man to dwell on. 18. In vain. Rather, a chaos. Hence, "I did not create it a chaos," tōhû being the word translated "without form" in Gen 1:2. (Yet tōhû also means "in vain," as in Isa 45:19.) The Lord has not left the human race to its own hopeless conjectures, but has spoken to his covenant people through the clear and sufficient revelation of the Scriptures, that they may know for a certainty how to come into a saving relationship to him.

20-25. Those Gentiles who were to survive the judgment to be visited on their respective nations are here invited to discard their foolish worship of imaginary and futile gods, and to come in faith to the one true God who alone can bring to pass what he has predicted, and who alone can save from sin and death. All nations are included in this invitation, even those most remote. They are to be saved simply by looking in faith to the Lord, as the only God and Saviour. 23. In righteousness. In fulfillment of his covenant undertakings. Every knee shall bow, whether in the loving submission of faith, or constrained by his overwhelming power (at Christ's second advent). 24. Put to shame (ASV), because they will discover that they wagered their life upon a lie and therefore must be sent away to eternal damnation. 25. Seed of Israel. The seed of spiritual Israel, all they that are of faith being reckoned as children of Abraham (Gal 3:7).

Sermon VII. The Downfall of Babylon and Preservation of Israel. 46:1—47:15.

1-12. The helplessness of heathen idols is contrasted with the omnipotence of Jehovah. 1. Bel (the Babylonian form of the name Baal). The god of the lower atmosphere and of the dry land, a patron deity of Babylon. His name appears in Belshazzar, which means Bel, protect the king! Nebo. Bel's grandson (being the son of Marduk), the god of writing and education. His name appears in Nebuchadnezzar, meaning Nebo, protect the boundary! The helpless images of these gods had to be packed like baggage on the draft animals of the Chaldean refugees as they fled before the Persian invaders. The heathen had to carry their gods, but Jehovah had carried and cared for his people (v. 3) from their infancy as a nation, and had undertaken to care for them until the very end of their national career (at the end of this age). 7. No matter how costly their substance, graven images are helpless to deliver in a time of real crisis. But the Lord God is abundantly able to save, for he is unlike any deity known in man-made religions. 8-11. All infidels and skeptics are bidden to face the irrefutable objective evidence of divine prophecy and fulfillment. As Jehovah had predicted the fall of Jerusalem, the seventy years' exile, and the return to the homeland, so all should come to pass, fulfilling the forecast to the letter, and demonstrating that the Scripture speaks the truth of the one true and omnipotent God. 11. The ravenous bird and the man who executeth God's counsel is, of course, Cyrus of Anshan, the province of Persia. 12,13. The emphasis here is on God's righteous vindication of his unjustly victimized and oppressed people. This leads to an announcement of the righteousness of salvation (according to which God keeps his covenant promises of deliverance for the seed of Abraham).

47:1-7. This passage presents a song of triumph over vanquished Babylon. Cast down from her imperial power, Babylon was to be reduced to the disgraceful status of a half-naked slave girl grinding meal with the heavy grindstone. The silence and darkness of verse 5 refer to the impotence and obscurity that were ever after to be hers. Babylon would never again attain independence or imperial power (and after 539 B.C. she never did). 6,7. The Lord explains that he would permit the Chaldean conquest and captivity only for the chastening of apostate Israel. But the pagan victors would go far beyond the bounds of humane decency in their savage maltreatment of their captives. Moreover, they would fail to recognize divine righteousness behind the disaster that would befall Judah. They would suppose they were by their own might the lords over the destinies of nations, and secure forever in their supreme position.

In verses 8-11 Jehovah pronounces doom upon the atheistic humanism of Babylonian culture. Babylon represents the man-centered culture of the unregenerate world: living for carnal pleasures and lusts, abjuring responsibility towards a God of justice, and even — with the self-confidence of megalomania — denying God's existence altogether. Chaldean Babylon (v. 10) combined the practical atheism of the freethinker with astrology, necromancy, and crass superstition. Notice how modern is the credo of the philosophical humanist: "I am, and no (God) besides me." The only fitting judgment for these moral and intellectual degenerates was sudden and appalling destruction, the slaughter of Babylon's armies (v. 9a), and the abrupt termination of her political power (all of which came to pass in 539 B.C.).

12-15. God challenges the proud world power to avert its destruction. Ancient Babylon prided herself on the accumulated wisdom of her sages and wonder-working savants, especially those who had perfected the science of astrology and claimed the ability to tell fortunes and predict propitious and unpropitious days for every enterprise. (The cuneiform literature is full of this sort of thing.) But the fire of God's judgment was to devour the whole tissue of these 'wise' men's lies and leave only ashes behind. The nations that had admired the brilliance of Babylonian culture would return disillusioned to their own places, leaving Babylon to face the Persians alone.

Sermon VIII. God's Honor To Be Upheld by Israel's Deliverance. 48:1-22.

1-11. God here admonishes the faithless hypocrites among his chosen people. These seemingly pious Israelites practiced idol-worship on the side (v. 5) and yet had the effrontery to invoke the name of Jehovah as their God also, pretending that they were true citizens of his holy city. In order to expose the falseness and emptiness of those other gods to whom they divided their loyalty, God presented them with the proof of his existence as the only true God — the unanswerable objective proof of fulfilled prediction. 3. The former things. The prophecy of Jerusalem's fall to the Chaldeans and deportation to Babylon. The point here is that this prediction was made a long time — a hundred years — before its fulfillment. No human being, not even a demon-inspired devotee of idols, can accurately and specifically foretell events that far ahead. 6. The new things. The prophecies of deliverance from bondage and return to the land of Israel, not foretold before Isaiah's generation, lest the Jews should boast that they knew all about these coming events all along (v. 8). God well knew from Israel's very beginning as a nation in the time of Moses that the Jews' piety was largely a sham and that their ears were closed to his call to a life of genuine devotion. But because he had chosen them and put his name upon them, he would refrain, for the sake of his glory, from cutting them off as they deserved. Rather, he would purge them of their idolatry and spiritual impurity by putting them through great suffering and leading them thus to repentance. 10. With silver is inappropriate, since silver is no agent for purification in metallurgy. Translate rather, as silver (lit., in the quality or capacity of silver); i.e., with an even hotter flame, spiritually speaking, than that needed to smelt silver ore. 11. Will not give my glory unto another. That is, either (a) the glory of my possession of Israel, not to be given over to idols or demonic powers; or (b) my glory in the spiritual refinement of Israel is not to be granted unto men, i.e., unto the Jews themselves, as if they were capable of self-perfection.

12-16. Jehovah invites Israel to recognize his sovereign wisdom in using a heathen instrument to deliver them. As eternal Creator, God is the Lord of human history and brings to pass amazing providences beyond all human surmise or ability to predict. It was indeed a marvel that God should call Israel's deliverer, Cyrus, by name 150 years before he was born, and love him as His chosen instrument to smite Babylon and destroy her power. But an even greater wonder is the fact that from the beginning of the human race, God the Son, the "angel of the Lord" (of the OT) and the "Word" or Logos (of the NT) has time and again clearly spoken to God's covenant children and revealed the divine will and plan for the future. In verse 16 the preincarnate Christ identifies himself as the one sent by the Father and the Spirit to convey God's prophetic message to the inspired prophet.

17-22. God lovingly remonstrates with perverse and wayward Israel, exhorting his people to return and trust in him, as during the Exodus wanderings. He laments the unnecessary tragedy of their loss of his blessing through self-centered waywardness. 18. Peace . . . as a river. A constant, abundant, fructifying supply of blessing. Righteousness. The implanted righteousness and holiness of God himself, operating within them and through them like vast deep waves, flowing in continual succession. 19. If Israel had obeyed God, her name would not have been cut off (as it was to be during the Babylonian Captivity) from the Land of Promise. 20. A summons beforehand to Jews who would be captives in 539 B.C. not to tarry in the pagan soil of Babylon, but to take advantage of Cyrus' permissive edict and return to Judah. They were to bear triumphant testimony before the Gentiles as they celebrated this deliverance and recalled Jehovah's mercies to their fathers in that earlier return from Egypt. 22. Those who would not flee the defilements of Babylon would never know the peace of God, being spiritually out of joint (as rāshā', the word for wicked, literally implies). Note that this same sentiment, in nearly the same wording, also closes Section Two (57:21) of this eighth Volume.

Section II. The Prince of Peace. 49:1—57:21.

Whereas Section I dealt especially with the Doctrine of God, Section II treats principally of the Doctrine of Salvation. Salvation comes from God only, and through the ministry of the Servant of Jehovah. It includes deliverance from the penalty of sin, and a new life of protection, joy, and peace. It is world-wide in scope.

Sermon I. Messiah To Restore Israel and Enlighten the Gentiles. 49:1-26.

1-7. The Servant's divine commission as Prophet is set forth. Although the Servant is addressed as "Israel" in verse 3, we are to understand this name as applying to him on whom the covenant relationship was based and all the covenant promises rested, the One who in his own person fulfilled God's expectations for a holy people. 1. From the womb. Doubtless an allusion to the annunciation of the angel to the Virgin Mary (Lk 1:31-33). His words, like a sharp sword, were to pierce the conscience of sinners and administer judgment as well (Rev 19:15). 4. Christ the Servant would have moments of discouragement, as he met with almost universal misunderstanding, even from his disciples. Yet even then he would find his chief satisfaction in "doing the will of him that sent me" (Jn 4:34). His commission would be twofold: (1) to restore Israel to God, i.e., the Remnant of true believers who would make up the Jerusalem Church of the NT period (as well as the Christian Jews of this present age and of the latter day revival); (2) to bring the light of God's salvation to all the nations of earth. 7. In his humiliation he would be despised and rejected, even by his own nation, the Jews. But in his exaltation, after the resurrection victory, he would eventually be worshiped as Lord, even by the kings of the heathen.

8-13. The prophet describes the joy of those whom Christ will deliver. 8. In an acceptable time. An anticipatory reference to the "fullness of time" when the incarnate Christ offered himself to the Father, and was delivered from the malice of demons and men. At the hour of atonement on Calvary, he fulfilled the covenant of grace to Abraham and his seed. On the strength of that coming atonement God would physically restore the exiles to their desolated patrimony in Judah, and would spiritually repopulate the forfeited heritage of Israel by entrusting it to a "nation bringing forth the fruits thereof."

From verse 9 on, the reference is chiefly spiritual and pertains to the deliverance of sinners from bondage by the power of the Gospel, their supply of food and drink for their souls, and their protection from the pressures and heat of temptation and the opposition of the hostile world. Even on the high places (v. 9) that is, the bare sandy hills of the semiarid wilderness, God will feed them bountifully. That is, their times of affliction he will use to their spiritual enrichment. The mountainous barriers (v. 11) that he will send their way, when conquered by faith, will prove to be stepping-stones to glory. To the strong nucleus of the first Jewish Christians in Palestine there would be added converts from all the Gentiles, even from so remote a region as China (the most probable identification of Sinim, v. 12, although Elam and Syene have also been suggested). Verse 13 shows that the scope of this action is world-wide, and that the Church Age is here in view.

14-26. The Lord offers Israel reassurance in view of her discouragement. In the disgrace and misery of the Captivity, it would be easy for Israel to feel abandoned by God. Hence the encouraging affirmation (vv. 15,16) that God's parental love surpasses that of any human mother. The Chaldean destroyers were to pass away into oblivion, and in time the converted heathen would come to Israel to submit to her God, and to acknowledge Messiah as their Saviour and King. Thus multitudes of new citizens would more than fill in the gaps left by the Jews who were to be slaughtered in the Chaldean, Maccabean, and Roman wars. Spiritual Israel, which after Christ's coming would be Christian Israel, would be filled with joyous incredulity at this tremendous influx of born-again Gentiles. It is very likely Gentile converts who are referred to in verse 22 as flocking to the standard of the cross, and showing tender, loving concern for their Jewish co-religionists. Even Gentile royalty would come under the sway of the Messiah and show a reverent concern for the Holy Land and its people, being proud to serve as protectors and guardians of Christ's Church. 24. Lawful captive should be construed, their rightful captives, or those whom "the mighty" have captured in a fair fight. 25. These mighty and terrible ones were, in the first instance, the Chaldeans, but then also the Seleucid Greeks, who would engage in frequent internecine warfare as rival dynasts struggled for supremacy. 26. These oppressors would become drunken with their own blood. Here again the fulfillment of prophecy demonstrates to the world the sovereign power of Jehovah God.

Sermon II. Sinfulness of Israel and Obedience of the Servant. 50:1-11.

1-3. It was no personal inclination that was causing God to put away his covenant wife, Israel, during the Babylonian captivity, but rather the compulsion of Israel's own incorrigible iniquity and deafness to his appeal. Nor was it because Jehovah owed anything to the Chaldeans that he would sell Judah into bondage. His omnipotence was equal to delivering his people from them or any other foe, when he should find it safe and proper to do so.

4-9. By way of contrast the Lord Jesus is set forth as true Israel, the completely obedient Servant. The tongue of the learned (AV). Rather, of them that are taught (ASV). That is, the Messiah would speak as one to whom God has taught his true message of comfort for those who are weary of sin. Morning by morning characterizes his early-morning trysts with the Father. 5. Unlike national Israel, the Servant would present to God perfect obedience, and willingness to endure humiliation and persecution for the Father's sake. Verse 7 speaks prophetically of the sublime confidence and majestic calm that our Saviour preserved during his Good Friday sufferings, sustained by his consciousness of being in the will of God (v. 8), and therefore in the right, as against all the slanders and assaults of his foes. He was confident that the Father would bring him victoriously through crucifixion and burial, and that his opponents would be inexorably consumed away by divine judgment (until the final blow of the capture of Jerusalem by Titus in A.D. 70).

10,11. God would send deliverance to trusting believers, but fiery condemnation upon those who rebelled against his sovereignty. Note that the Servant was to speak with an authority that must be obeyed, and that salvation would come to sinners only through faith, through trusting in the God of grace. The word translated sparks (ASV, firebrands) probably means fire arrows. Those arsonists who would set fire to the camp of the Lord would themselves be consumed by the fire of destruction they had hoped to inflict upon others.

Sermon III. Encouragement To Trust God, Not Fearing Man. 51:1-16.

1-3. Israel was to take comfort for the future from God's faithfulness in the past. Abraham was the rock from which his descendants were hewn – having a rocklike quality imparted to him by God's faithfulness and grace. From that single ancestor God made a great and numerous nation. He purposes in the future to settle them in a latter-day Eden (into which the land of Canaan will be transformed when Israel herself has become spiritually transformed).

4-8. The Lord promises to judge the world and purge it of evil. 4. Law here means "authoritative instruction." God's standard of righteousness will be set up as a standard for all the nations of the earth, who will submit to Jehovah's authority through conversion, and trust in his strength and grace. His salvation will prove longer lasting than the physical heavens (which are temporal, because material, whereas redeemed souls will dwell forever in God's presence). Since all Christ-rejecting unbelievers are doomed to utter destruction, no believer should ever quail before the menace of the world or the hostility of ungodly men, whose plight is desperate, and their doom sure.

9-11. The believer prays that God may indeed fulfill this promise. 9. Jehovah's arm implies his active, supernatural intervention to deliver his people and punish his foes. Rahab (arrogance or raging violence) is here a mythological monster representing Egypt, which lost its finest chariots in the Red Sea crossing. 11. As the Israelites of the Exodus burst forth in joyous song at their deliverance (Ex 15), so were the returning deportees from Babylon to do in 537 (this verse being a repetition of Isa 35:10). The ultimate vista is, of course, the bliss of heaven (Rev 15:3; 21:4).

12-16. God again speaks to reassure his trusting people. He points out the folly of fearing mortal man (who can kill only the body) more than the omnipotent Creator, who in the end frustrates the fury of even the fiercest opponents. 14. The captive exile. Better, He that is bowed down (as a wretched slave). Read the rest of the verse as – shall speedily be loosed; and he shall not die, etc. The Assyrians and Chaldeans would go down to destruction, and only the once-captive Jews would survive. 15. The sea symbolizes the turbulent, restless, unregenerate world (cf. 57:20). But God has put his inspired Word into the mouth of his covenant people (v. 16); it is the possession of Scripture that gives Israel her importance.

Sermon IV. Israel Summoned To Awake and Return to God's Favor. 51:17–52:12.

17-23. God announces that He considers the Captivity sufficient penalty for Israel, and that a new day of forgiveness has dawned. As the drunkard brings woe upon himself by the poison of liquor, even so would wayward Israel drink the slow poison of disobedience and incur the misery decreed by God's righteous wrath. Bereft of all spiritual leadership among her citizens, the nation would meet with the calamities she richly deserved. And the streets of Jerusalem would be covered with her slain, who would be cornered for slaughter by the armies of Babylon (v. 20). But then would come the turn of Judah's brutal oppressors – who had arrogantly trampled upon her prostrate form – to drink the cup of God's vengeance.

In 52:1-6 God conveys his determination to restore captive Israel for his name's sake and for his glory. By grace he presented them with his perfect power and spiritual beauty as equipment already fashioned and complete, which they had only to put on by faith. He adds the assurance that his holy commonwealth would never again be so defiled by idolatry as it had been under Ahaz, Manasseh, and Zedekiah. His people were confidently to lay hold upon "the glorious liberty of the children of God" (Rom 8:21). 3. They were sold (ASV) into bondage for nothing of any value, only the empty promises of the world. Even so they would be redeemed from Babylonian captivity without paying Cyrus any ransom price. 5. For nought. Without adequate cause, so far as their conquerors were concerned. The arrogant contempt of the heathen towards Israel's God called for him to live up to his covenant name, "Jehovah, the Holy One of Israel," and to demonstrate by Babylon's overthrow his continuing sovereignty. This fulfillment of prophecy would also confirm the authority of God's holy word.

Verses 7-10 express the joy and consolation that the Gospel brings to God's people. To them the very feet of the messengers are fair, because they bear tidings of the most beautiful thing in the universe – the redeeming love of God. By bearing to ruined Jerusalem the good tidings that God had procured Israel's release from Babylon, these messengers were to serve as types of the Gospel missionaries of the NT age (Rom 10:15). Peace, or shālôm, includes reconcilement between God and man, the healing of the sinsick soul, and the spiritual prosperity of a harmonious walk with God. 8. Jehovah returneth (ASV; the Lord shall bring again Zion, AV). A reference to the return of God's favor and also his Shekinah presence, in the Second Temple, at rebuilt and restored Jerusalem.

11,12. This is an exhortation addressed beforehand to the Jews of 537 B.C., who would have to choose between the economic security of their situation in Babylonia and the hazards and hardships of pioneering back in their devastated ancestral land. But the safety and purity of their souls would depend upon their fleeing from this defiling atmosphere, and setting their faces towards fulfilling God's program of redemption. 12. Not . . . with haste. They would not be escaping refugees as their forefathers were in the Exodus), for they would enjoy the patronage and safe-conduct of the Persian emperor. But far more important than such human guarantees would be the vanguard defense of the Almighty, who would also make up their rearguard (rereward).

Sermon V. The Divine Servant's Substitutionary Atonement. 52:13–53:12.

13-15. Here is presented Christ's amazing victory through humiliation. 13. Deal prudently (from hiśkîl). The implication is that he would act with such intelligence as to succeed in his objectives. The words for exaltation are piled upon one another in order to convey the idea that he would be lifted up superlatively high, above all other men, to the height of God himself. The words for be exalted and extolled are the same as those used in 6:1 of Jehovah enthroned – "high and lifted up." 14. With the words at thee the prophet speaks directly to the divine Messiah, as if beholding him before his mind's eye. Then he turns to the people themselves and resumes speaking of him in the third person. This marring of visage, as we now know, was to be the result of his maltreatment at the hands of Pilate's soldiers. 14,15. Like (ASV; as, AV). . . . so. The point of the comparison is this: As astonishing as would be his humiliation, so astonishing would be his exaltation (as described in v. 15). Sprinkle is still the best attested rendering of this frequently occurring word, although some have preferred to translate "startle" (which would then be the only occurrence of that meaning for this root in the OT). The sprinkling connotes the bestowal of spiritual cleansing upon the nations so evangelized. Kings shall shut their mouths – both from amazement and from their inability to say anything by way of self-justification. That which had not been told these Gentile kings would, of course, be the Gospel message of salvation through the cross.

53:1-3. The Servant as viewed by man would be rejected and despised. 1. Report. Literally, the thing heard (i.e., by the prophet from God); hence the prophetic message. Our report. The message of Isaiah and his fellow prophets. The arm of the Lord is a phrase always used to designate special interpositions in human affairs whereby God delivers his people and punishes his foes. It is especially used in reference to the miracles of the Exodus. Christ, then, was to be God's greatest miracle. 2. Tender plant. More literally, a suckling (used of a baby at its mother's breast, as well as of a shoot from a tree stump). No form. More accurately, no comely form. Nor comeliness (hādār). More literally, majesty or splendor. In other words, the Servant would lack the earthly grandeur that allures the admiration of the world. The we here includes the prophet as he identifies himself with his spiritually blind countrymen. 3. Rejected of men. More exactly, lacking men of distinction (as his supporters). We hid as it were our faces from him. More literally, and (it was) like a hiding of face from him. That is, men would persistently avoid facing the real Christ, preferring a "historical Jesus," who would not trouble them with his cross.

4-6. The Servant as viewed by God would be the vicarious Redeemer. 4. Griefs. More literally, sicknesses. In token of Christ's power to forgive sins, he did heal many of men's physical sicknesses. But since the subject matter here is illness of soul rather than of body, the rendering griefs is justifiable. 5. Wounded. Transfixed or pierced, a term quite appropriate to crucifixion. Transgressions. A noun derived from the root, "to rebel," and implying revolt against the sovereignty of God. Bruised. More accurately, utterly crushed. The chastisement of our peace; i.e., the punishment that brings about our peace, or state of well-being (not a mere unfortunate consequence of man's sin). 6. Like sheep – being helpless to protect themselves or escape from danger when attacked, and being lost without a shepherd. Turned every one to his own way. Each of us has preferred his own way to God's way; this is the essence of sin or of "going astray." Hath laid on him. Literally, caused to alight upon him, or better still, caused to meet him (cf. Num 35:19, where the revenger of blood is authorized to slay the murderer when he "meeteth" him in the way – the same verb being used there as here.) Our transgressions were to "meet" him in the way and slay him as if he were the guilty one instead of us. Note that the remedy was to have just as universal application (us all) as the need (all we).

7-9. As viewed by man, Messiah's suffering would be a tragic misfortune to the innocent. 7. Opened not his mouth; i.e., in his own defense, before either Caiaphas or Herod or Pilate. 8. From prison and from judgment. Rather, as a result of coercion and a judicial action. That is, by an unjust trial a judicial murder was to be perpetrated. Taken; i.e., taken away to the place of execution. Render the next sentence with the ASV: And as for his generation, who (among them) considered that he was cut off out of the land of the living for the transgression of my people to whom the stroke (was due)? 9. He made his grave. Better rendered as impersonal: "One appointed his grave." The wicked. The two murderous thieves crucified at either side of him. The rich man (ASV). Joseph of Arimathea, in whose burial vault he was interred. Because he had done no violence. Probably to be construed as, "although he had done no wrong (to others)."

10-12. God sees Messiah's suffering as the redemption of sinners and triumph over death. 10. When thou shalt make his soul an offering. Addressed to God directly, as the One who alone has the prerogative of appointing Christ's life an offering for sin (Isaiah uses the word for trespass offering – 'āshām – which involved the payment of 120 per cent damages as well as the presentation of the sacrificial animal itself). See his seed. His children by faith, born-again Christians. Prolong his days. Does this not refer to a time subsequent to his death and burial? Only his bodily resurrection could serve to fulfill such a prediction as this. 11. By his knowledge. In the light of the fulfillment, this must be an objective genitive, meaning, by the knowledge of him (as Saviour). The verse continues . . . shall a righteous one, my servant, furnish justifying righteousness unto the many (i.e., the many for whom he shall die). 12. A portion with the great. Rather, with the many, for it is the same word (hārabbîm) as the one translated the many in verse 11, and both refer to the same class of people – the redeemed. The strong. His followers, who do battle with Satan and his minions in the power of Christ's spiritual weapons. The spoil. The booty of precious souls won to Christ through the preaching of the Gospel.

Sermon VI. Resultant Blessings to Israel and the Church. 54:1-17.

1-3. Fruitfulness and enlargement are promised to post-Exilic Israel. Jerusalem was first to become barren, in that her population would be cut off and carried away by the Chaldeans. But the time would come (especially after Christ's first advent) when believers in Jehovah would be more numerous than they had ever been before the Exile (when Israel had enjoyed the status of covenant wife in the home that her heavenly husband had provided in Palestine). Enlarge . . . thy tent and lengthen thy (land-measuring) cords. Israel in her NT phase would spread the true faith to all the lands of the Gentiles, whose nations should consequently become "possessed" by Zion's posterity as they were conquered by the Gospel.

4-10. The prophet foretells the gracious restoration of Jehovah's covenant wife, Israel. The shame of her youth refers to her rebellious murmurings during the Exodus journey, and the apostasies of the time of the Judges and the divided monarchy; her reproachful widowhood to the Babylonian captivity. 6. When thou wast refused (ASV, cast off) seems to refer to the seventy years' estrangement between Jehovah and Israel. 9. The promise here is to be understood in the light of the analogy of the Flood. Just as God promised Noah there would never again be such a deluge, even so he promises restored Israel that she shall never again go into exile. Since the Jews actually were driven into exile again after their revolt against the Romans in A.D. 135, this can only mean that God accounts the Christian Church as true Israel. 10. Kindness. From hesed, rendered by the ASV as lovingkindness and by the RSV as steadfast love. But since it implies mutual committedness or solidarity between the parties involved in a covenant relationship, it is best rendered covenant love.

11-17. The Lord describes the purity and glory of the converted Israel of the future. As the Gospel transforms the lives of Jewish and Gentile converts, they will become as living stones (I Pet 2:5) built up into a spiritual temple, and glowing with the beauty of the Christ who indwells them. But the full glory of this new city of God will be that of New Jerusalem described in Rev 21. The Church will be composed of those "taught by God" (Isa 54:13), as Christ reaffirmed in Jn 6:45. The ultimate freedom from fear and terror points toward Millennial conditions. But all the way from Calvary to Armageddon, the enemies of the Church will fall back in ultimate defeat. 16. God retains sovereign control over the forces of human warfare and destruction; they can never really get out of hand. 17. The Lord will impart to redeemed Israel a justifying righteousness that he will ever vindicate as against her foes, whether human or satanic.

Sermon VII. God's Grace Towards Repentant Sinners. 55:1-13.

1-5. The price for admission to eternal life is repentance and faith, plus nothing. Those who would partake of the living water must first feel thirst (repent), and then be willing (have faith) to come to the Saviour (cf. Jn 7:37). Wine symbolizes the Gospel as cheering and invigorating the soul; milk indicates its nourishing quality (I Pet 2:2). 2. That which satisfieth not. The mirage of personal happiness based upon earthly advantages and blessings. Only God himself can satisfy the human soul. The David of Isa 55:3,4 is the Messianic Son of David, since he is here described as exerting a controlling influence in the coming age. Verse 5 is a prediction that Gentiles will be converted and will join themselves to redeemed Israel because of her God.

6,7. In view of these glowing promises for the future, sinners are urged now to respond to the Gospel invitation while they yet have opportunity. 8-11. The grace of God surpasses human understanding, but it is guaranteed effectiveness through the faithful and inspired preaching of the Word (that goeth forth out of my mouth). 12,13. When God's Word is heard and obeyed, the redeemed shall be freed from their bondage and enter into joy and peace. All nature about them will share in this exultation at the manifested grace of God. And some day nature will indeed share in the liberty and glory of God's children (Rom 8:21).

Sermon VIII. Gentiles To Be Included in Israel's Blessing. 56:1-8.

Here we have an admonition to believers to maintain the testimony of a godly life. In due season they shall reap, "if they faint not." The loving observance of the Sabbath is especially emphasized as a covenant sign testifying to a saving faith. Gentile converts to the faith of Israel are assured of full and permanent citizenship in God's kingdom. Eunuchs (and by implication all childless believers) who manifest saving faith by their godly life are assured eternal life and a glory far more significant than that of a long line of descendants. Two groups are to be included in the true people of God: Gentile converts and the outcasts of Israel. As contrasted with nominal, insincere believers, they will show cordial love for the Sabbath and cordial adherence to the covenant.

Sermon IX. Condemnation of the Corrupt Leaders of Israel. 56:9–57:21.

9-12. The indictment of the self-seeking, unscrupulous professional prophets of Israel. (This passage reverts to the degenerate moral conditions of Isaiah's own time, such as prevailed in the reign of Manasseh.) These prophets are described as watchmen who fail to watch. They are like dogs that fail to bark to warn men of danger, being interested only in filling their own bellies. Or, like stupid shepherds, they are so wholly preoccupied with self-interest that they do not care for their sheep, but give themselves over to winebibbing.

57:1,2. God expresses indignation at the plight of faithful conscientious believers who were being exploited by the cruel and immoral leaders of Jewish society. A notable example of such a leader was King Manasseh, who "shed innocent blood very much, till he had filled Jerusalem from one end to another" (II Kgs 21:16). Yet these martyrs were actually saved from the horrors of Judah's approaching siege and exile, and had entered into the peace of "Abraham's bosom" (Lk 16:22), there to await Christ's resurrection.

Verses 3-10 describe the abominations of Judah's idol-worship. 3. The idolaters' degenerate parentage is inferred from their degenerate practices. 4. They made grimaces of mockery and contempt against Jehovah. 5. With idols. Rather, among the oaks (ASV). They indulged in ritual sex orgies in the oak groves and performed infant sacrifices. 6. Stream. Better, valley (ASV). There they poured drink offerings to their idols. 7. On their high places were their idol shrines, where they committed spiritual adultery. 8. Enlarged thy bed. A reference to their worshiping several heathen gods at once. 9. The king is probably the king-god, Moloch (rather than some human king). 10. Despite the bitterness and bondage ensuing from their ungodly life, the people of Judah were too much infatuated to forsake it.

11-13. These theological compromises they had made under the pressure of heathen powers – though all such powers are puny mortals –, and at the same time they had neglected their longsuffering God. In the coming invasions they would have to look to their helpless idols for a deliverance that would not come. Only true believers would inherit God's Kingdom.

14-21. The prophet tells of the Lord's compassion upon the truly repentant. Cast ye up refers to the constructing of a cross-country highway by heaping up a long mound of earth and stones. The stumblingblock is an unrepentant and idolatrous heart. Verse 15 presents the classic statement in Scripture of the two dwelling places of God. Revive; i.e., to restore life to that which is spiritually dead (lit., cause to live). 16. The spirit, namely, of the guilty sinner being rebuked. 17. This covetousness (besa') is probably the Hebrew expression that comes closest to English "selfishness." 18. God's grace is bestowed without the slightest human merit to warrant it.

19. The Lord bestows blessings that inspire human lips to offer adoration and praise – the fruit of the lips (cf. Heb 13:15). Men praise him for genuine and perfect peace (here shālôm is used, as in Isa 26:3). Far off – Gentile converts; near – Jewish converts (cf. Eph 2:17). 20. Wicked here is the word for "ungodly" (Ps 1) or "morally out of joint" (rāshā'). The unconverted can never find true peace, but are finally spewed up as foul flotsam on the beach of time.

Section Three. The Program of Peace. 58:1–66:24.

In this third section of Isaiah the emphasis is upon the Holy Spirit as he applies and extends the work of redemption. God's program of grace is outlined to the end of this age and the commencement of the new world.

Sermon I. False Worship Contrasted with the True. 58:1-14.

1-7. The hypocrisy of Israel's piety is here exposed. The prophet is bidden to denounce unsparingly the spurious faith of the Jews, with its sanctimonious pose at worship services and its ostentatious fasting, soon to be followed by the same wrongdoing and ungodliness as before (v. 4). No religious observance has value for Jehovah that is not supported by a godly, law-abiding life, and compassion towards those in need. Righteous behavior, the fruit of saving faith, will insure the dawn of deliverance (v. 8) for unhappy Judah; the righteousness of compassionate love will clear the way before God's faithful army as they make their forward march.

8-14. The Lord promises to restore fellowship and blessing to those who abandon hypocrisy. 9. The putting forth of the finger; i.e., in (false) accusation of the innocent. 10. Thy darkness be as the noon day; i.e., "your present state of calamity and distress shall be replaced by the sunshine of God's favor." 11. A spring of water. The outgoing godly influence of a warm believer who shares his blessings with others. 12. The new commonwealth (after the Exile) was to be built up by sincere and dedicated believers who meant business with God. They would repair the mischief resulting from the wicked hypocrisy of their forebears. 13. A most significant evidence of sincere love for the Lord is the delight with which his worshiper hallows the Sabbath for God's service and praise (rather than using it for self-serving and weekday purposes). 14. High places. Spiritual exaltation and prosperity.

Sermon II. Israel's Confession and Her Rescue by God. 59:1-21.

1-8. This passage describes the appalling moral breakdown of Jewish society – which perfectly accords with what we know of the degeneracy of Manasseh's reign. Isaiah told the people why God did not hear their cry for deliverance from the oppressive yoke of Assyria. 5. The eggs of the cockatrice. More properly, the viper. The suggestion is that the apostate people were like poisonous serpents that produce evil influences calculated to destroy the unwary who trust them. The webs of evil they spun would by no means cover their nakedness before God's piercing eye in the day of judgment (v. 6). They had consecrated every part of their bodies to wickedness and evil. 8. Peace with others demands a loving good will of which the ungodly are incapable; nor can they ever enjoy contentment or peace in their own hearts.

9-15a. The grim consequences of this depravity of life are clearly set forth. 9. Judah had become a victim of Assyrian injustice and oppression, and all her hopes of independence and prosperity were constantly dashed to the ground. 10. At noon day as in the night. Better, in the twilight. God's truth shone brightly upon them, but they were plunged into the darkness of spiritual ignorance and national calamity. The Hebrew word for desolate places does not occur elsewhere, but probably should be translated stout or lusty men (so the ASV– among whom the enfeebled Jews were but corpses by comparison. 12-15. This passage has the tone of a heartbroken confession of inexcusable guilt and aggravated wickedness. 15. Maketh himself a prey. That is, anyone who attempted to lead an honest life made himself a victim of the ruthless cutthroats who dominated Israelite society.

In verses 15b-21 is predicted God's personal interposition to rescue helpless sinners from their guilt and bondage. The standpoint here is Calvary. 16. Displeased as Jehovah was with the Jews' complete moral failure, he was also distressed at the absence of any qualified human mediator for Israel. The only course left was for him to become the Mediator himself – His arm brought salvation unto him – in the person of Jesus Christ, who alone was clad with spotless righteousness impenetrable to Satan's darts. 18. But the First Advent is here combined with the Second, at which Messiah will come to crush the world power (at Armageddon) and enforce God's holy standards upon all the inhabitants of earth. 19. The whole world will come to revere Jehovah, and his Holy Spirit will successfully repel all attacks upon his redeemed people. (The very different rendering of v. 19b in the ASV depends upon questionable renderings of two rare words; the AV is to be preferred.) 20. Redeemer here is gô'ēl, "kinsman-redeemer," which involves a blood relationship (into which God could not enter except through the incarnation of Christ). 21. The true people of God will ever be a witnessing people, faithfully proclaiming the truth of the Gospel in the power of the Holy Spirit.

Sermon III. The Radiance and Peace of God's Redeemed People. 60:1-22.

1-3. The prophet declares that the darkness of the world is to be overcome by the light of Israel. The standpoint is that of Christ's first advent, for he is the Light that was to rise upon the Jews.

And his Church was to be the light, i.e., the reflector of his glorious perfection and love, and the channel for his truth in reaching the heathen. The NT Gospel was to have a powerful attractiveness for the Gentiles such as the OT Gospel never had.

4-9. Here Gentile converts are described as crowding into the Kingdom and presenting all their possessions and talents as thank-offerings to the Lord. Perhaps these converts were to be accounted children of God by adoption, hence Israel's sons and daughters (v. 4). Or else these may be the dispersed Jews who were to be accompanied and escorted by Gentile Christians as they entered by faith into God's Kingdom. It is quite remarkable that, in origin, all these offered treasures are preponderantly Arabian. Perhaps there is a suggestion here that Islam will some day turn to the Cross. All these immigrants into the Land of Promise resemble flights of doves in their swift eagerness and great numbers (v. 8). They are drawn thither by their hope (v. 9) or trust in the Lord (a better rendering than wait for [AV; ASV], which is inappropriate here). The procession is to be led first by the ships from the greatest distance – those from Tarshish.

10-14. Here the Scripture gives us a picture of the glory and peace of Millennial Zion, as Gentile believers join hands with Jewish believers to establish the new theocracy and its glorious capital, Jerusalem. (The earthliness of this setting seems to preclude assigning it to heaven.) The empire of Messiah will be supreme and will brook no opposition or rebellion (v. 12). Apparently (as in Ezk 40–48) a beautiful temple is to be built in Zion (Isa 60:13), to which even the converted descendants of Israel's persecutors will come as worshipers. 15-22. The glory of the Millennial kingdom is contrasted with the ignominy of the apostate pre-Exilic kingdom of Israel: glory in place of contempt, wealth in the place of poverty (vv. 16,17a), righteousness in place of injustice (v. 17b), unending peace instead of bloodshed and war (v. 18), the glory-light of God's favor and presence perpetually (v. 19, a verse which points forward specifically to conditions in heaven; cf. Rev 22:3-5), continuous revival and prevailing godliness in all of society rather than the recurrent apostasies and declensions of OT Israel (Isa 60:21). God's plan for a perfectly righteous and obedient human race will then at last be realized on earth (v. 21b), as the tiny minority of true believers expands into a great number and a mighty nation (v. 22). (In v. 16 the bold imagery indicates that just as the mother gives up vital energy in giving suck to her child, so the nations and their rulers will yield up their vital energy for the service of the Millennial Church.)

Sermon IV. The Joy-Bringing Gospel of the Anointed One. 61:1-11.

1-3. Christ is here represented as empowered by the Spirit to preach the liberating and life-transforming Gospel (a passage applied to Jesus by himself in Lk 4:18-21). The Gospel is especially intended for the meek (i.e., the humble, who recognize their own sin and need of a Saviour) and the brokenhearted (who repent of their sins). It is a message of deliverance from bondage, of consolation for sorrow, and of power from God for a new holiness of life – trees of righteousness, the planting of Jehovah (v. 3, ASV). This Gospel also promises God's righteous judgment upon all the forces of unrepentant evil – the day of vengeance of our God (v. 2).

4-9. A picture of the glory of the new life that will replace the old. The new Israel, charged with the energy of Christ's Gospel, will rebuild the structure of the theocracy that has been ravaged by the dreadful consequences of disobedience and infidelity. 5. Gentile converts will join in the pastoral work and service of the Kingdom, in willing submission to the Jewish apostles and Jewish Scriptures, and gladly present themselves and all their possessions to the Lord. 7. Double. The double glory or blessing of (a) membership in God's family, (b) possession of Christ himself as their indwelling Lord and Companion. 8. Robbery (or rapacity) in connection with (rather than for) burnt offering (ASV needlessly amends to iniquity) was what characterized the hypocritical majority of Israel, but it will have no place in the Kingdom. The sincere redeemed Jews will have a commanding and influential position among all mankind in that latter day (v. 9).

10,11. The born-again believer joyfully responds to these gracious promises. He has been clothed with Christ's imputed righteousness and has been adorned with his grace as a bridal pair are adorned for marriage. He rejoices in the Saviour as his chief good, and in the triumph of righteousness in the earth.

Sermon V. The Restoration of Zion; Destruction of Infidel Heathen. 62:1–63:6.

1-5. The beauty of Zion's imputed and imparted righteousness is set forth, and her new status as Christ's holy bride. God will not be permanently thwarted in his plan to create a holy nation, despite Israel's sorry record of failure and backsliding. 4. In the 'latter day' she will display Christ's righteousness and thereupon receive a new name: Hephzibah, My delight is in her. And her land shall be called Beulah, Married. In verse 5 alter the vowel point in bānāyik, "thy sons," to bōnāyik, "thy builders," a plural of majesty for "Thy Builder" (Jehovah); this avoids the implication of incestuous relationship in the word "sons," and forms a perfect parallelism with the second half of the verse.

6-12. God's persevering grace guarantees that this beauty will be conferred on Israel at Christ's second advent. Faithful and diligent prophets who call to mind God's words (remembrancers, ASV) will persist in preaching and prayer until Messiah's earthly kingdom is established. From that time on, no invasions will lay waste the crops of Palestine (a prediction which can only be fulfilled by an earthly Millennium). In verse 10 we have a summons to repentance very similar to that in 57:14. The standard, or ensign, is the cross of Christ. 12. The people of latter-day Jerusalem will be the very opposite of what they were in the time of Isaiah and his immediate successors: unholy people, left in bondage to their foes, not sought out by God's delivering grace, but abandoned to the consequences of apostasy.

63:1-6. The divine judgment will be inflicted on the World Power (in contrast to Israel's final blessedness). 1. Here again (as in 34:5,6) Edom typifies the rebellious world as implacably hostile to God's people (Amos 1:11). Bozrah in Edom suggests the verb bāsar, "to cut off grape clusters, gather the vintage." Christ is pictured as wearing garments stained with blood. This is the blood of those who are to be slain at Armageddon (cf. Rev 19:13), where he will by himself achieve the victory (even as he won it alone on Calvary). In verses 3-6 Christ answers the prophet's question in verse 2. Mine own arm (v. 5) as in 59:16, signifies the personal interposition of God on the arena of history. The scene here is the same as in Rev 14:18,19. A Christ-rejecting, Gospel-spurning world leaves the Lord no other alternative but to send fearful and terrible destruction when the time of his longsuffering is past.

Sermon VI. Israel's Plea for Help, Based on Past Mercies. 63:7–64:12.

63:7-9. Israel sings a song of thanksgiving for Jehovah's tender love toward his covenant children, all of whose rigors and trials he has shared. 10-14. The prophet recalls Israel's ungrateful rebellion, which compelled the Lord to chasten his chosen people as if they were his enemies. Omit the italicized saying in 63:11; the question beginning Where is asked by the prophet as Israel's spokesman. 14. Caused them to rest (ASV); i.e., during the wilderness journey under Moses and Aaron (the shepherd[s] mentioned in v. 11). 15-19. These verses present the supplication of the repentant backsliders that God would cease from his estrangement and once again show his tender love (even if Abraham and Jacob disowned them because of their infidelity). 18. A little while. About 800 years by the time of Jerusalem's fall in 587 B.C. (and only 673 years thereafter: from 538 B.C. to A.D. 135).

64:1-7. Isaiah represents the people of Israel as entreating Jehovah to intervene in the world scene and enforce the claims of his holiness and sovereignty. 1. The imagery is reminiscent of the eruption of Mount Sinai. 2. The righteous people are grieved at the contempt men show God, with apparent impunity. They recognize that the Lord cannot properly intervene to deliver, unless his people walk in love and obedience (v. 5), whereas the people of Israel (and a fortiori the rest of mankind) are defiled with sin; even their pretensions to righteousness (v. 6) are vitiated by a basically self-seeking motive, rather than by supreme love of God (which alone can be the basis of true morality; cf. Deut 6:5). 8-12. Recognizing their own inexcusable guilt, the repentant Israelites plead only God's gracious covenant promises, and present their devastated land and ruined Temple as arguments for his pity and compassion.

Sermon VII. God's Mercy Reserved for Spiritual Israel. 65:1-25.

1-7. This is a scathing indictment of the hypocritical Jewish nation of Isaiah's day, professing to be a holy and righteous people (v. 5), and yet practicing all the execrable abominations of the heathen. (This description would be altogether inappropriate for post-Exilic Israel, which had abandoned idolatry forever). 1. A nation . . . not called by my name. The Gentiles (according to Rom 10:20,21), who would some day respond to the Gospel, while the covenant nation remained obdurately Christ-rejecting. Warnings and loving entreaties had proved unavailing; there was no other alternative but the well-deserved punishment of the Babylonian captivity (and of the Roman expulsion from Palestine in A.D. 135).

8-12. Yet this inevitable punishment would be delayed for a time, to prepare a remnant of true believers for future blessing. The grape cluster of verse 8 is composed, largely, of spoiled or shriveled grapes; few grapes in it are round and sweet. For reasons of sentiment, because it is the earliest cluster of the vintage season, the husbandman preserves it from discard. 11. That troop. Better, Fortune (ASV; Gad here being the proper noun for the Syrian god of good luck). That number. Rather, Me·nî, the god of Destiny, – which introduces the grim word play of verse 12; I will destine (from the same root as Me·nî) you to the sword (ASV). 13-16. The ultimate lot of disobedient Israel is contrasted with that of spiritual Israel. The unbelieving Jews will suffer a famine, thirst of soul, and the torments of hell; but the faithful will enjoy the bounties of heaven forever, and be called by another name (v. 15), presumably that of "Christians."

17-25. Here is given a foreview of the Millennial felicity of earth after it has been purged of unbelievers. 17. The designation new heavens and a new earth is applied to the Millennial kingdom only as a stage preliminary to the eternal glories of heaven (the New Jerusalem of Rev 21; 22) – just as Pentecost was to be regarded (Acts 2:17) as ushering in the 'last days,' although it occurred at least nineteen centuries before the Second Advent. 20. This prediction requires the conditions of an earthly city, where babies are born and older people die (even though the average lifespan is to be much prolonged). This final scene is that of a warless, capitalistic (v. 22) society, in which even predatory animals have become tame and inoffensive (as in 11:7-9).

Sermon VIII. The Blessing of True Believers in the Final Age. 66:1-24.

1-4. Jehovah condemns externalism in worship. The Almighty needs no temples built by man to dwell in nor sacrificial animals for food (what a contrast to the pagan concept!). It is the repentant and believing heart that he requires. A valid sacrifice is a sacramental seal of faith. Apart from faith, the slaying of animals is as abominable to God as murder, or the offering of an unclean beast (v. 3). Those who turn away from his call will find to their sorrow that he will turn away from their call.

5-9. The marvelous deliverance of the repentant remnant is here predicted. The unbelieving majority jeer at sincere Bible believers, challenging their God to display his glory by a miracle of deliverance or of vengeance, if he can. Jehovah's answer to the challenge will come as the Chaldean besiegers tumultuously storm the walls of Jerusalem (v. 6). In the 'last days' (beginning at Pentecost) that remnant was to multiply speedily into a great and numerous people as the Gospel was preached. And without the protracted birth pangs of parturition, the far-flung commonwealth of the Christian Church would spring up all over the Roman Empire within a single generation.

10-14. In the comfort and prosperity of the Millennial age, the whole company of believers will enjoy uninterrupted peace and plenty (like a river – v. 12) and will exert an absolutely controlling influence over all the world. The closest and tenderest of relations will obtain between latter-day Israel and her God. A decisive and immediate punishment will be meted out to all the unrighteous and disobedient.

15-17. Idolatrous unbelievers will be consigned to the fires of hell (as is reaffirmed in II Thess 1:7-9). 17. Behind one (tree). Rather, behind one person; i.e., behind the cult leader who heads up idolatrous purification ceremonies (e.g., Jaazaniah, in Ezk 8:11).

18-21. God's glory will be manifested to all the world, that is, to all who have escape[d] the destructions of Armageddon, and have gathered together as adherents to the Millennial Church. Apparently there will then be extensive foreign missionary activity. Mentioned are Tarshish (western Mediterranean), Pul (south of Egypt, perhaps Somaliland), Lud (probably Lydia in Asia Minor), Tubal (southeast of the Black Sea), and Javan (Greece). 20,21. All the regenerated Jews of the Dispersion will be honorably escorted by their Gentile co-religionists to Palestine. Possibly they will be welcomed as equally holy (for priests and for Le- vites) with the Jews already in the land. Or else of them refers to the Gentile believers themselves.

22-24. The establishment of new heavens and a new earth will usher in the final, permanent, and unchanging state of both the redeemed and the damned. Apparently the regular appearance of all mankind in Jerusalem for worship is figurative of religious commitment and allegiance to Jehovah as the one true God. Yet Jerusalem visits would still be a logical possibility for the duration of the Thousand Year period. The faithful will look on the corpses of those who have joined in the final assault of the World-Power on Jerusalem, as they litter the battlefield, and will abominate them and all that they stood for in this life. Note that it is not said that the corpses will lie there forever. The souls of the wicked will be consigned to the eternal torments of hell (as Christ reaffirmed in Mk 9:48).

Thus the majestic trilogy of Volume Eight is brought to a close with a glimpse into the everlasting destiny of all mankind. The atoning work of Jehovah's Servant has laid the foundation for a new Commonwealth, for New Heavens and a New Earth that shall never pass away.

JEREMIAH

INTRODUCTION

The Life and Times of Jeremiah. The history of the Kingdom of Judah after the death of Solomon and the division of his kingdom has been seen as four religious declines and three revivals. Josiah (640–609 B.C.) was the last good king. In his reign occurred the well-known revival occasioned by the finding of the scroll of the Law. This was the last revival. After this time Judean history is one of constant political, moral, and religious decline, culminating in the Babylonian exile. This final period of decline was the time of the ministry of the prophet Jeremiah.

This was the period during which the new Babylonian empire arose. During the middle of the Divided Kingdom period, Assyria had dominated the Fertile Crescent. But after the fall of its capital Nineveh, in 612 B.C., the Assyrian Empire disintegrated, and Babylon became the mistress of the civilized world. The vain attempt of the Egyptians to assert their authority in this crisis of empires left its imprint on the Biblical story. In fact, it appears from the Biblical sources that there were two parties at the Jerusalem court. The pro-Egyptian party believed that Egypt was reviving as a world power and should be relied upon by the Jews as a bulwark against Babylonian aggression. The pro-Babylonians saw in the rising star of Babylon an invincible power and urged submission to her as the price of continued national existence. The prophets counseled the nation to look neither to Egypt nor to Babylon, but to trust in God.

Jeremiah began his ministry in Josiah's thirteenth year (626 B.C.), five years after the revival. His ministry continued into the early years of the Exile. He died in Egypt, probably a few years after the destruction of Jerusalem, which occurred in 587 B.C.

Josiah was killed in 609 B.C., at Megiddo, in his abortive attempt to stop Pharaoh-necho, who was on his way to support the tottering Assyrian Empire. Jehoahaz, Josiah's son, succeeded his father in Jerusalem. Necho evidently believed Jehoahaz to be of pro-Babylonian sympathies, for he carried him off to Egypt (after a three-month rule) and made Jehoiakim king (609–598 B.C.). Jehoiakim was a strong ruler and a very wicked man. He tried, on a number of occasions, to silence Jeremiah. During his reign Jeremiah dictated his first book, which the king promptly destroyed (Jer 36). During his reign, also, occurred the battle of Carchemish (605 B.C.), in which Egypt was crushed by the Babylonian crown prince Nebuchadnezzar, who soon afterward became king of Babylon. Then the Babylonian empire was on its way to world domination.

Nebuchadnezzar's victory at Carchemish was followed by a conquest of Palestine, which brought Judah into the Babylonian orbit. A few Hebrews (Daniel among them) were deported to Babylon at this time. Later Jehoiakim rebelled. There followed many troubles for Judah, including possibly another Babylonian capture of Jerusalem. In the middle of this unrest, Jehoiakim died—possibly the victim of a palace coup—after a reign of eleven years.

Jehoiachin, the son of Jehoiakim, succeeded his father on the throne. Jeremiah called this king Coniah and Jechoniah (22:24,28; 24:1; 27:20; 29:2). When Jehoiachin had reigned only three months, the Babylonians attacked Jerusalem (in a belated attempt to crush Jehoiakim's revolt) and carried off Jehoiachin to Babylon (597 B.C.), together with other important Jews and many artisans. After thirty-seven years of confinement there, Jehoiachin was released from prison in Babylon.

In Jehoiachin's place, Nebuchadnezzar appointed Zedekiah, uncle of Jehoiachin. For eleven years he maintained a precarious position as Nebuchadnezzar's vassal on the throne. He was a weak character, yet he protected Jeremiah from the nobles' attempts on his life and welcomed Jeremiah's advice, although he was never able to carry it out. Inevitably he, too, was caught up with the will-o'-the-wisp of independence, and rebelled. In the ninth year of Zedekiah, Nebuchadnezzar began the final siege of Jerusalem; in Zedekiah's eleventh year (587 B.C.) the city was captured and destroyed. Zedekiah, blinded, was carried off to Babylon, together with more of Jeremiah's fellow countrymen.

For the events in Judah after the destruction of Jerusalem, we are dependent almost exclusively on Jeremiah (chs. 40–45). Jeremiah and many of the common people were left in the land under Gedaliah, the Jewish puppet governor. After civil unrest, in which Gedaliah was assassinated, certain Jews, doubtless remnants of the pro-Egyptian party, fled to Egypt, forcing Jeremiah to accompany them there. In Egypt the prophet died.

The death of Jeremiah brings the history of the Hebrew kingdom to an end. The proclamation of Cyrus, permitting the exiles to return to Judah, was the opening signal of the new Second Commonwealth epoch.

Jeremiah: The Man and His Message. Jeremiah the priest was called to the prophetic office at a most unhappy time. Josiah's revival was over and its results short-lived. The final decline was under way. When the prophet was called, it was intimated that his message would be one of condemnation rather than of salvation. Throughout his long ministry of more than forty years, his preaching reflected this theme of judgment. God had risen early and sent his servants the prophets, but Israel would not hear. Now the fate predicted for an apostate nation in Deuteronomy 28–30 was inevitable. Babylon would capture Judah. And it would be best for the people to give in gracefully and so save their lives.

This message, coming to men whose desperate nationalism was all they had to cling to, was completely rejected, and the bearer was rejected with his message. Jeremiah was regarded as a meddler and a traitor; and people, nobles, and kings, alternately, tried to do him to death.

We understand Jeremiah's personality more clearly than that of any other prophet. This is due to the fact that his book is full of autobiographical sections—"Jeremiah's confessions." These outpourings of the human spirit are some of the most poignant and pathetic statements of the tension of a man under divine imperative to be found anywhere in Scripture. They are listed below. They show us a Jeremiah who was retiring, sensitive, and afraid of people's "faces," one whom we should consider singularly unfitted for the work placed upon him. That he tenaciously clung to his assigned task through the succeeding years of rejection and persecution is a tribute both to the mettle of the man and to the grace of God, without which his personality surely would have gone to pieces.

Jeremiah's Confessions.

11:18–12:6	18:18-23
15:10-21	20:7-18

The Composition of the Book. The book of Jeremiah is not arranged in chronological order. This commentary states the date of each section or chapter, i.e., the time when the events took place or the prophecy was proclaimed, whenever such a date is known. Why the book was arranged as it is, we do not know. Every outline of Jeremiah is somewhat arbitrary. The one given below seeks to show the unity of the book.

It is impossible, in the present state of our knowledge, to tell the circumstances of the writing of the book. Many modern commentators feel that certain parts of it were written not by Jeremiah but by later writers, whose point of view differed markedly from the prophet's. It is the viewpoint of this commentary that there is good reason to take a conservative attitude toward the authorship of the book—that in its present state it is substantially the work of Jeremiah and his helper, Baruch (cf. Jer 45:1).

It seems likely that the book went through a number of editions, each succeeding one containing additional material. The story of the writing of the first edition, its destruction, and the composition of the second edition, with additions, is told in chapter 36. No doubt there were succeeding revisions. It has long been noted that the Greek translation of Jeremiah as it appears in the Septuagint, made in Egypt before 132 B.C., is much shorter than the Hebrew book, from which our English translations have been made. Further, the Septuagint omits many of the repetitions that are contained in the Hebrew copy, and rearranges the material somewhat. It is not now possible to arrive at any certain conclusion about the relationship of the Septuagint to the Hebrew text, and this commentary, based as it is on the English Bible, follows the Hebrew Jeremiah.

The Foe from the North. Throughout Jeremiah's sermons occur references to a foe from the north who would devastate Judah and take her captive. Chapter 4 is typical of these oracles: The foe will destroy like a lion or a whirlwind and leave the land in desolation like the primeval chaos. Who is this destroying enemy? The fulfillment indicates that the northern foe was Babylon. Although Babylon is on the same latitude as Samaria, her invasions of Palestine always came from the north, as the desert which separates the two was impassable. The view that the Scythians are referred to as the northern foe in some places of the book seems not to be held so widely today as it once was, and may safely be rejected.

Sometimes north is used of the origin of the conquerors of Babylon (50:3,9, 41; 51:48). This use of the term is difficult to account for. The Persians, who were the principal captors of Babylon, came from the east. Probably here north has become an expression for the source of any trouble, arrived at because Israel's troubles for so long a time had come from that direction. Further explanation may be found in the fact that the Medes, located to the north, joined with the Babylonians in capturing Nineveh. See note on Jer 50:11.

The Lachish Letters. Lachish, in the Judean foothills, was one of a series of fortresses maintained for the defense of Jerusalem against attack from the Mediterranean Plain. It was one of the last cities to fall to the Babylonians prior to the final taking and the destruction of Jerusalem (Jer 34:7, note). Interesting light has been shed on these last hectic days of Judah's history by a discovery in the ruins of ancient Lachish. When the city was being excavated (1932 through 1938), there were found in a guardroom of the outer gate twenty-one letters written on broken pieces of pottery. They were written in the ancient Hebrew script, with carbon-iron ink, and date from the time of Jeremiah, when Lachish was undergoing its final siege.

Many of these letters were written by a certain Hoshaiah, a military officer at some outpost near Lachish, to Yaosh, the commander of Lachish. Their language is very like that of the book of Jeremiah. Hoshaiah is constantly defending himself to his superior. Could it be that he was suspected of being ready to defect to the Babylonians? Once he describes one of the princes in words almost like those the princes used against Jeremiah (Jer 38:4). There is mention of "the prophet" whose message is "Beware." Is this a reference to Jeremiah? We cannot be sure. According to the book of Jeremiah, there were prophets aplenty in that troublous time. Another letter mentions the inability of Hoshaiah to see the smoke signals of Azekah, although he could still see those of Lachish. Perhaps by that time Azekah had fallen (cf. Jer 34:7). Although the specific meaning of many of the references of these letters eludes us, the letters throw a vivid light on the disturbed and fearful days just prior to the fall of the Judean kingdom. (For a translation of this correspondence, see Ancient Near Eastern Texts Relating to the Old Testament, ed. by James B. Pritchard, 2nd ed.).

Literature on Jeremiah. Commentators on the book may be divided into two groups. The older commentators generally believe prophecy to be of divine inspiration and explain the prophecies on that basis, but are out-of-date in matters of historical background. Of these the best is probably still C. F. Keil, The Prophecies of Jeremiah, Edinburgh, 1883, recently reprinted in Eerdmans' Keil and Delitzsch Commentaries Series.

A majority of the newer commentaries, naturalistic in approach, regard the prophetic message as originating in the mind of the prophet, whose brilliant intuition is the highest form of inspiration. They usually embody the latest archaeological discoveries and so give a better orientation to the large amount of historical material in the book. "Jeremiah" in The Interpreter's Bible (1956), with introduction and exegesis by James Philip Hyatt, shows this method at its best.

The chapter entitled "The Doom of the Nation" in Understanding the Old Testament, by Bernhard W. Anderson, gives a good summary of the contents of the book placed in their historical setting, together with a sympathetic delineation of the character of Jeremiah.

Edward J. Young in his Introduction to the Old Testament arranges the material of the book in its chronological order, and gives a discussion of the problem of authorship from the viewpoint of conservative Christianity.

COMMENTARY

I. Oracles Against the Theocracy. 1:1–25:38.

A. The Prophet's Call. 1:1-19.

Jeremiah, in spite of his reticence, was commissioned to proclaim the message that Judah would be destroyed by a foe from the north. God promised to protect him from the anger of his fellow citizens.

1) Introduction. 1:1-3.

1. The words. The Hebrew dibrê means not only words but "deeds," and is so translated in 5:28. Perhaps both meanings apply here. This book contains the prophet's history as well as his messages. Priests. A man might be a priest by birth, but he was a prophet only by divine call. Anathoth. A town in the territory of Benjamin, set aside for residence of the priests and Levites (Josh 21:18). It is located two and one-half miles northeast of Jerusalem and is called Anata today.

2. The word of the Lord came. Jeremiah's frequently used statement of prophetic inspiration. Josiah. Judah's last good king, who instituted a great reform in the religion of the nation. His thirteenth year was 626 B.C.; he still had eighteen years to reign.

3. Jehoiakim came to the throne three months after the death of Josiah. During the intervening months, his brother Jehoahaz reigned, until Pharaoh-necho took him to Egypt (II Kgs 23:30-34; II Chr 36:1-4; Jer 22:10-12). Jehoiakim was an apostate, who revived the paganism his father had abolished, and Jeremiah has nothing good to say for him. He reigned eleven years (609–598 B.C.), during which time Nebuchadnezzar attacked Jerusalem, and forced Jehoiakim to pay him tribute. Later Jehoiakim rebelled. The manner of his death is not known, but Jeremiah's prophecy (22:19, note) seems to indicate that he was to come to a violent end (II Kgs 23:36–24:7; II Chr 36:5-8). Zedekiah. Judah's last ruler. Although called king, he seems to have been more of a regent, acting in the place of Jehoiachin, his nephew, who, after a three months' reign, was carried to Babylon by Nebuchadnezzar (II Kgs 24:8-16; 25:27-30; II Chr 36:9,10). His reign lasted eleven years (597–587 B.C.) and was brought to an end by the destruction of Jerusalem and the captivity of the Jews (II Kgs 24:18–25:7; II Chr 36:11-21). Fifth month. See note on 52:12,13. Cf. II Kgs 25:8,9.

2) God's Call to Jeremiah. 1:4-10.

4. Me. The change from third person (vv. 1-3) to first is not unusual in ancient Hebrew literature. 5. Knew . . . sanctified . . . ordained. These verbs are roughly synonymous. Jeremiah's task was to be a difficult one; these words assured him of God's choice and support. Know, when used of God in Scripture, has an active connotation. Sanctified. Set apart to the prophetic office. Prophet. The Hebrew term nābî seems to mean a "speaker," which is a good characterization of the Hebrew prophet. He was God's spokesman.

6. A child. Isaiah, when called to be a prophet, felt "unclean" (Isa 6:5). Jeremiah, in keeping with his timid nature, expresses his feeling as one of inadequacy. 8. Their faces. A part used for a whole. The faces of the men of Jerusalem will reflect the animosity of their wicked personalities. 9. Touched my mouth. To enable him to overcome fear and to speak. My words in thy mouth. Jeremiah was given a message to preach. Ezekiel, when he became God's spokesman, symbolically ate a scroll (Ezk 3:2,3). 10. God's use of four synonyms for destruction and only two for building indicates that Jeremiah's message was to be predominantly one of warning about the coming judgment. Set. Made overseer (Gen 39:4,5).

3) The Vision of the Almond Tree. 1:11,12.

11. There is here a play on words. Almond tree is shāqēd and hasten is shōqēd. The mention of shāqēd brings to mind shōqēd, which sounds like it. This kind of play on words is frequent in the Hebrew Bible. 12. I will hasten. Better, I am watching over (cf. 31:28; 44:27).

4) The Vision of the Seething Pot. 1:13-16.

13. Seething. Literally, blown upon; therefore boiling hot. Face . . . toward the north. Better, facing away from the north. The pot was turned toward the south. Soon it would overturn, and its scalding contents would flow over Judah.

North. Cf. Introduction, The Foe from the North. 14. An evil. Better, the calamity. The Hebrew word often means "misery," "distress," "trouble," as well as "evil." The land. That is, Judah. 15. I will call. I am in the act of calling. Entering of the gates. The open place outside the city gate was the scene of public business (Ruth 4:1,11); here kings dispensed justice (I Kgs 22:10). The fulfillment of this prophecy is recorded in Jer 39:3.

5) Encouragement to the Prophet. 1:17-19.

17. Gird up thy loins. Cf. 13:1 note. Dismayed . . . confound. Do not be dismayed by them, lest I dismay you before them. 18. Defenced city. Fortified city (cf. Ezk 3:8,9). Kings . . . princes . . . priests . . . people. The various classes of citizens; each group later opposed Jeremiah. People of the land. The Hebrew idiom means "the common people."

B. Reproofs and Admonitions, Mostly from the Time of Josiah. 2:1–20:18.

These six sections, which are general and repetitive in character, seem to date from the early part of the prophet's ministry. They may well be typical of his oral preaching.

1) Israel's Neglect of God. 2:1–3:5.

The backsliding of the Hebrew people is here very tenderly described in terms similar to those used in Hosea.

2. Kindness. Ḥesed contains the ideas of "love" and "faithfulness." The RSV translates it devotion. God's relationship to Israel is often likened by the prophets to that of a husband to his wife (Isa 54:4; Hos 2:2-20; Ezk 16). Here Israel's early days are referred to as a honeymoon. Israel had left Egypt and followed her husband to a strange land (Ex 19:4). Jeremiah does not mean to deny the frequent backslidings of the early days, but he emphasizes here the nation's praiseworthy determination to follow her God into the wilderness. Wilderness is defined as a land . . . not sown. The midbār of the Middle East is not completely desolate, but it is an uncultivated land over which the Bedouins roam to find pasture for their flocks (cf. Joel 2:22; Ps 65:12,13). Here the journey of the Hebrews through the wilderness from Egypt to Canaan is referred to.

3. Holiness. Holy (cf. Ex 19:5,6). Firstfruits. The harvest firstfruits were set apart as sacred (Ex 23:19; Lev 23:9-21); so Israel, God's firstfruits-people among the nations, was sacred. The firstfruits were offered to God and could not be eaten by lay Israelites. So here, those who devour Israel shall be guilty. Offend. Better, become guilty (cf. Gen 12:3). History has proved the truth of this statement.

4. Jacob . . . Israel. The whole Hebrew nation is in view. The prophets frequently ignored the division of the kingdom and the exile of the northern tribes and addressed "the whole family which I brought up out of Egypt" (Amos 3:1). 5. Vanity . . . become vain. The noun and verb come from the same Hebrew root, which means basically "vapor," "breath," and so, "worthlessness" or "worthless." It is frequently used (as here) as a synonym for idolatry (cf. 10:15; 16:19; and many others).

Israel's ingratitude to her Saviour-God. 2:6-8. A plentiful country (v. 7). A garden land, cultivated and fruitful, in contrast to the desert through which they had just traveled. The priests said not . . . (v. 8).

The defection of the people was caused by their leaders. Law. Probably law in the broad sense of "instruction in the will of God." Knew me. The lack of the knowledge of God is a frequent theme of the prophets (cf. Hos 4:6). What is meant is that the priests had deliberately rejected the God "in the knowledge of whom standeth our eternal life" (cf. Jer 31:34). Pastors. Hebrew rō'eh has the basic meaning "shepherd" and here should be translated rulers. Baal. The Canaanite storm-and fertility-god. Things that do not profit. This expression (like vanity, v. 5) is often used of idolatry, as here (cf. v. 11).

9. Plead. The idea suggested by this word is that of bringing a suit against a person in a court of law. 10. Isles. Better, coast lands, or regions. Chittim. Cyprus, or possibly the coast lands of the Mediterranean in general. Kedar. Probably an Arab desert tribe in the opposite direction from Cyprus (cf. Gen 25:13). The meaning is, "Search east or west." 11. Their glory. God was Israel's glory (Ps 106:20). 13. A vivid contrast between a perennial spring of fresh water and a cistern (whose water was brackish at best) now cracked by an earthquake and thus completely emptied.

The results of Israel's apostasy. 2:14-19. As the nation neared collapse, two political opinions were advanced at court. Some counseled a league with Babylon —here referred to as drinking "the waters of the river," and others urged a treaty with Egypt—drinking "the waters of Sihor" (v. 18). Jeremiah describes the destruction which has come to the nation in the recent wars in Palestine. Nothing but enslavement and ruin could follow either course; rather, the people must return to God.

14. Homeborn slave. Slaves were of two types: those acquired by purchase, and those born in the house of the master and so his permanent possession (Ex 21:2-4). 15. Made his land waste. Already the northern kingdom had been desolated because of the apostasy of its people. 16. At the same time, the Egyptian armies had begun to ravage Judah. Noph. Memphis, an important Egyptian city near modern Cairo (44:1). Tahapanes. Modern Tell Defenneh, on the eastern border of the Delta, commanding the road to Palestine (cf. 43:7-9; 44:1). 18. Sihor. The Nile, symbolizing Egypt (Isa 23:3). The river. The Euphrates, meaning Assyria (cf. Hos 7:11; 12:1).

20. The RSV is to be preferred:

For long ago you broke your yoke and burst your bonds; and you said, "I will not serve."
Yea, upon every high hill and under every green tree you bowed down as a harlot.

Israel's infidelity to her husband-lord is frequently called harlotry. The figure is rendered more forceful because of the cultic prostitution frequently practiced in Baal worship, and probably alluded to here (cf. Ezk 16; Hos 1-3). High hill . . . green tree. Cf. 3:6 note.

21. Viniculture was one of the main occupations of the ancient Hebrews. Because the raising and care of grape vines was difficult and hazardous, and the yield uncertain, but the product valuable and desired, the vineyard is frequently used as an illustration in prophetic preaching. Israel is likened to a vine, God to the vine-raiser (Isa 5:1-7; Ps 80:8; Hos 10:1; cf. Jn 15:1-8). A strange vine. A wild vine. 22. Yet thine iniquity is marked before me. In other words, "Even though you perform righteousness outwardly, this does not conceal from me your secret iniquity, which cannot be cleansed by physical means." Nitre is lye, a mineral alkali obtained from the soda lakes in Egypt, and mixed with oil for washing clothes.

23-25. Jeremiah likens his people to wild creatures in heat. Their desire is so great that any mate that wants them can find them without wearying itself. Here the female pursues the male. Baalim (v. 23). Baals (cf. 2:8 note). A swift dromedary traversing her ways. A restive young camel interlacing her tracks (RSV). That snuffeth . . . turn her away (v. 24). Better, In her heat sniffing the wind! Who can restrain her lust? Her month. That is, her time of heat. 25. Withhold thy foot. "Do not continue to run after and crave idolatry," says God. But Israel replies, "I will continue to follow foreign gods."

26-28. In a future time of trouble, the Lord warns, Judah's much-sought-after gods will be unable to deliver her. Stock . . . stone (v. 27). Probably references to the widely used cultic objects, 'ăshērâ, and maṣṣēbâ. The 'ăshērâ (AV, "grove") is thought to have been a wooden pole that stood in a Canaanite high place of worship. It was a symbol of Asherah, the goddess of fertility. The maṣṣēbâ (AV, pillar and image) was used in connection with the worship of Baal (Deut 12:3). According to the number of thy cities (v. 28). Baals tended to be identified with places. There was a Baal of Ekron (II Kgs 1:1-16). Thus each city had a local deity (cf. Jer 11:13).

29. Wherefore . . . plead with me? "Why do you complain that I desert you in your crisis, seeing that you rebel against me?" 31. We are lords. Better, We are free; i.e., We roam at large, without restraint. 33. Why trimmest thou thy way . . . ? How well you direct your course to seek lovers! So that even to wicked women you have taught your ways!

A condemnation of the iniquitous oppression of the poor. 2:34,35. Cf. Amos 2:6-8; 4:1; 5:10-12. 34. Poor innocents. Innocent poor. The latter half of the verse should be related to verse 35 thus: "You did not find them breaking in (which might have justified an act of homicide; Ex 22:2). Yet in spite of all this, you say, 'I am innocent.'" 35. Plead with you. Judge you.

36,37. The Lord here condemns the desperate counsels of the pro-Egyptian party. See note on 2:14-19. Yea, thou shalt go forth . . . (v. 37). From it (Egypt), too, you will come away empty, beating your hands on your head in grief and dismay (cf. II Sam 13:19). Thy confidences. Those in whom you trust.

3:1-5. The translators of the AV understood this paragraph as a plea for Israel to return to God. Many modern commentators believe that this is a message of reproof, not of pleading. It is difficult for a divorced wife to return. Yet Israel carelessly and impudently talked of returning and hoped thus to postpone judgment.

1. Deuteronomy 24:1-4 forbids a man's taking back his divorced and remarried wife, even if her second husband dies or divorces her. Put away; i.e., divorce. Yet return again to me. Or, and would you return to me? 2. Judah's idolatry, stated under the figure of an animal in 2:23,24, is now described with the more usual term "harlot." In the ways. Literally, By the wayside. As the Arabian in the wilderness lay in wait to seize and plunder the unwary, so did Judah run to idolatry. 3. Showers . . . latter rain. The early rains (probably referred to here as showers) fall in October and November, breaking the summer drought. Then the farmer plows and seeds the land, and the crops begin to grow. The latter rains come in March and April, and bring the crops to fruition. Soon afterward follows harvest. God showed his displeasure with his people by withholding the rain (e.g., 14:1-6; I Kgs 17:1; Amos 4:7,8). A harlot's forehead. Cf. English "brazen-faced." 4. Wilt thou not from this time cry unto me . . . ? Or, Have you not just now called to me? 5b. Thou hast spoken and done evil. Although you have spoken of returning, you have at the same time done all the evil you could.

2) Judah Warned by the Doom of the Northern Kingdom. 3:6–6:30.

Jeremiah continues his condemnation of Judah begun in the previous section (2:1–3:5). In addition, he here holds out God's promise of pardon, if only the people will genuinely repent. Captive Israel is here mentioned as a warning to Judah, and her restoration is predicted.

3:6-10. Israel's backsliding and punishment were a warning for Judah, yet she had not repented. Israel here means the northern ten tribes, taken captive nearly one hundred years previously (721 B.C.). Her unfaithfulness resulted in captivity, referred to as "divorce" (v. 8; cf. Hos 2:2-13). Judah's pretended repentance (v. 10) is a reference to Josiah's revival (II Kgs 23; II Chr 34; 35), which seems to have been legislated by the king, and did not go very deep into the life of the nation. 6. High mountain . . . green tree. References to high places, where the Canaanites practiced their Baal worship.

3:11-18. God calls Israel to repentance, and promises her pardon and restoration. The OT prophets refused to recognize the division of the Davidic kingdom as final. They often speak of its reunion and the glorification of the whole nation in the Messianic kingdom.

11. Justified herself. Shown herself more righteous. Judah had enjoyed greater privileges (divinely ordained kingship, priestly service), and had had before her the example of captive Israel, and so was the more guilty (Ezk 16:44-63; 23:1-49; Lk 12:48). 12. Proclaim . . . toward the north. That is, towards Assyria, where Israel had been taken captive, for she was not wholly cast off by God. Cause mine anger to fall. Literally, cause my face to fall (cf. Gen 4:5; contrast Num 6:26). 13. Hast scattered thy ways to the strangers under every green tree. They were free with their love for foreign gods on the high places.

14. Am married. Israel should return to her God, who is her Husband and Lord (cf. 31:32). The word ba'al means, primarily, "be master," then, "be married." These two ideas are really one to the Semitic mind. One of a city . . . two of a family. The doctrine of the remnant, frequently found in Jeremiah (23:3; 32:36-44), is here referred to. Out of God's purifying judgment will come a few refined souls. They will be regathered and will constitute the new Israel, blessed by God (cf. Rom 11:5). 15. Pastors. Shepherds (the original meaning of the English "pastors"); i.e., rulers obedient to God (cf. 2:8,26; 23:4).

16,17. In the future regathering, no longer will the ark be God's throne (Ex 25:22), but Jerusalem itself will be the throne of God as he rules all the nations (cf. Rev 21:22). The covenant symbolized by the ark will be replaced by a new covenant written upon the heart (cf. Jer 31:31-34). The ark disappeared when Jerusalem was destroyed in 587 B.C., and was never replaced. 16. Neither shall that be done any more. It shall not be made again. 17. To the name of the Lord. That is, to God's presence, which his name signifies. 18. The captivity of Judah as well as of Israel is here understood. Both will be regathered to Palestine.

3:19—4:4. God calls Israel to return. An antiphonal section, characterized by deep feeling. God's urgings (3:19-22a) are followed by Israel's remorseful reply (3:22 b-25), then more divine urgings and promises (4:1-4).

19. The verse begins with an exclamation, not a question. God thought to set Israel among the sons, but she rejected her Father and Husband. 20. Treacherously. Faithlessly. 23. The multitude of mountains. Perhaps, "The uproar (wild orgies that accompany idol worship) of the mountains." 24. Shame. The shameful thing, a circumlocution for Baal worship (cf. Hos 9:10).

Verses 1 and 2 of chapter 4 constitute one sentence, 4:1-2a being the condition, 4:2b the result. 1. Then shalt thou not remove. And (if) you do not waver. 2. And the nations. Then the nations.

The coming of the foe from the north. 4:5-31. The coming of the Babylonian armies is here vividly described. The people are counseled to flee for safety to the fortresses (v. 5). Many figurative expressions are used to describe the foe: lion (v. 7), sirocco (v. 11), eagles (v. 13). He comes through northern Palestine, from Dan, through Mount Ephraim to Jerusalem (vv. 15,16). Vividly the prophet states his anguish at the destruction (vv. 19-26).

5. Defenced. Fortified. The walled cities to which the rural people went for refuge in time of war. 6. North. Cf. Introduction, The Foe from the North. 7. Gentiles. Nations. 9. Shall perish. Shall fail.

10. Thou hast . . . deceived. A difficult statement. Possibly it means that since God permitted the false prophets to cry "Peace! peace!" (cf. ch. 28), he was thought responsible for the people's deception. Jeremiah makes a number of deeply emotional outbursts of this kind (cf. 20:7, although deceive there represents a different Hebrew word).

11. A dry wind. The sirocco or khamsin, which blows in from the desert, bringing almost unbearable heat and dust. The daughter of my people is the people of Judah personified as a woman (cf. v. 31). Fan. Winnow. Cleanse. Cf. Mt 3:12. This hot wind cannot be used for threshing, as it would blow away grain and chaff together. 12. Even a full wind from those places shall come unto me. Better, A wind too full for this (threshing) comes for me. 15. Dan. The northernmost place in Palestine. Mount Ephraim. The last large section of Palestine to be crossed before one reaches Jerusalem. 16. Watchers. Besiegers.

In verses 19-22 Jeremiah again expresses his painful reactions. Bowels (v. 19). Thought by the Hebrews to be the seat of the emotions. Maketh a noise. Is beating wildly.

23-26. In vivid figurative language the prophet describes the destruction of Judah to be made by the Babylonian armies. Among excavated Judean cities, archaeologists have found that every one which existed in Jeremiah's time was completely destroyed. Without form, and void (v. 23). The same words occur in Gen 1:2. Jeremiah is likening the destruction about to come upon Judah to the primeval chaos. 24. Moved lightly. Moved to and fro. 27. This qualifying statement that the desolation will not be quite complete seems at first out of place. Yet it is not, for the prophets all agree on the preservation of the remnant and the reconstitution of the nation through it (cf. 5:10,18; 30:11; 46:28).

28-31. The statement of destruction is now complete. It closes with a reference to the scarlet harlot, destitute and writhing in pain. For verse 28, see note on 18:8. Thou rentest thy face with painting (v. 30). You enlarge your eyes with paint. A black mineral powder, antimony, was used to increase the brilliance of the eyes by darkening the edges of the lids. Thy lovers. A term of scorn—thy paramours. Bewaileth herself (v. 31). Gasps for breath. My soul is wearied. I am fainting.

The corruption of Jerusalem. 5:1-9. The prophet is told to search the city for a god-fearing man (vv. 1-3), much as Diogenes in ancient Athens of a later time sought for an "honest man." Finding none among the common people, Jeremiah seeks among the leaders, but they are no better (vv. 4-6). Therefore God can find no ground for pardoning them (vv. 7-9).

1. Broad places. Squares. Judgment. Justice. Truth. Faithfulness. 2. The Lord liveth. The fact that they use the name "Jehovah" in their oaths is no proof that they really worship him, for they swear to lies. 3. Upon truth. Looking for faithfulness. 4. Judgment. The word here (and in v. 5, and II Kgs 17:26, RSV) means "the divine law," i.e., religion. 5. The great men. Those who have leisure and learning to know God's commandments. 6. The nation is as defenseless as a man in a forest of wild beasts (cf. 4:7). Evenings. Better, deserts. 8. Fed horses in the morning. Well-fed lusty stallions (cf. 2:23,24). 9. Visit. Punish.

The call to the destroyer. 5:10-19. Jeremiah, like Isaiah (Isa 10:5-34), sees God beckon to a foreign nation to come and chasten His people.

10. Walls. Vine-rows. Battlements. Branches. The vineyard of Israel will be ravaged (2:21; cf. Isa 5:1-7). 12. It is not he. He will do nothing. 13. This verse continues the statement of the unbelievers. "The prophets of doom are empty windbags, and their threatening predictions will only come upon themselves." There is a play here upon the word rûaḥ, which can mean "spirit" or "wind." The prophets believed that they had the spirit of God; the people replied, "It is only wind!" 17. Which thy sons and thy daughters should eat. Better, They shall eat up your sons and your daughters (to be understood metaphorically). Impoverish. Batter. 19. Strange gods. Foreign gods.

The cause of the impending calamity. 5:20-31. God the moral governor of the universe must judge his rebellious people.

24. Rain. See on 3:3. Reserveth . . . the . . . weeks of the harvest. The harvest season (the latter half of April and May) should be a dry season; rain then harms the crops (Prov 26:1). 26-29. A rebuke to the wicked rich who oppressed the poor. 26,27. Birds were snared with a net; men closed the net with cords when a bird came into it. Then the birds were put into a basket (cage, AV; cf. Mic 7:2). 28. Shine. Are become sleek. 29. Visit. Punish. 30,31. A rebuke is ministered to the false prophets and the priests who were subservient to them. Wonderful. Appalling. By their means. At their beck.

Jerusalem's destruction threatened. 6:1-8. It will be besieged by the northern foe day and night. The people are to flee from the city for safety, for it will be desolated.

1. The Benjamites, living near Jerusalem, usually fled into it for refuge. The prophet urges that warning signals be placed at points south of Jerusalem, for the foe will come from the north (cf. 4:15). Tekoa. A town twelve miles south of Jerusalem, probably chosen because its name permits a play on the word "blow" (tiq'û). Beth-haccerem. A town of Judah, probably modern Ain Karim, four and a half miles west of Jerusalem. The smoke signal here referred to is mentioned in the Lachish letters as a means of communication between cities under siege at the time (cf. Introduction, The Lachish Letters).

2. I have likened. The comely and delicate one, the daughter of Zion, will I cut off.

3. The invaders are likened to shepherds whose flocks denude the land.

4. Prepare. Literally, sanctify war; i.e., offer sacrifices to ensure success.

6. Mount. (Siege) mound. Visited. Punished.

7. Casteth out. Literally, keeps cool; i.e., keeps fresh.

The shamelessness of the people in the face of their total corruption. 6:9-15. Israel, like a gleaned vine, will be thoroughly devastated. Children and adults, houses and fields, commoner and noble, priest and prophet will be taken.

9. Turn back . . . baskets. Like a grape gatherer, pass your hand again over its branches to find the last grape. 10,11. Jeremiah expresses his personal reaction to the unbelief of his people. He is identified with God in this crisis, and increasingly it will be clear that since the people have rejected God, they have also rejected Jeremiah. Abroad; i.e. playing in the street. All people, even children, will suffer the pains of war. 14. The prophets and priests assure the people that all is well, even while calamity is hovering over them. 15. Visit. Punish.

The ancient paths rejected by the people. 6:16-21. They would not listen to the true prophets, and so their continued sacrifices do not please God (I Sam 15:22,23).

16. The old paths. The ways of the patriarchs and of the fathers who experienced redemption from Egypt. 17. Watchmen. In a rural, unfenced land, the watchmen played an important part. The prophets often call themselves watchmen (Ezk 3:17; 33:7). 18. What is among them. What will happen to them. 19. Their thoughts. Their (evil) devices. 20. Sheba. Modern Yemen. Ancient source of frankincense, which was used as a part of the sacrificial ritual. Sweet cane. Calamus, an aromatic rue, which came from India.

The enemy's cruelty and the incorrigibility of the people. 6:22-30. The coming of the northern armies will bring terror to all; let the people mourn. The prophet has been made by God a tester, to discover how wicked they are.

22. The sides. The remote parts of the earth (cf. 25:32; 31:8). 25. Way. Road. Fear (terror) is on every side—a favorite expression of Jeremiah (cf. 20:3 note, 10; 46:5; 49:29). 26. Daughter of my people. Cf. 4:11 note. Sackcloth and ashes were signs of deepest mourning (cf. Ezk 27:30). For an only son. The most severe bereavement a Hebrew could suffer (cf. Amos 8:10; Zech 12:10). 27. Tower . . . fortress. The words are difficult to interpret, but the sense is probably, "I have made thee a trier and a tester among my people." The prophet would test the people as a smith tests and refines metal, purifying it. But this people was all dross, could not be refined, and so was rejected (cf. 5:14). 29. Are burned. Better, blow fiercely. With a note of rejection and despair the section ends.

3) Jerusalem's Wrong Religion. 7:1–10:25.

Jeremiah warns against trust in the Temple and its ritual. Jerusalem is no more sacrosanct than was fallen Shiloh (7:1–8:3). The people have resisted all reformation and will surely be punished (8:4–9:22). The true wisdom, which consists in the knowledge of God, is contrasted with idolatry (9:23–10:25).

a) The Temple Sermon. 7:1–8:3.

It appears that chapter 26 gives the historical background of this sermon. The fury it aroused well indicates its cogency. Shiloh, in Ephraim, was the home of the Tabernacle during the time of the Judges. The Bible does not mention the fall of Shiloh. Jeremiah's inference that it was destroyed (7:12,14; 26:6,9) has been confirmed by the recent excavation of the site, which indicated that the city was destroyed by the Philistines about 1050 B.C., probably after the battle of Eben-ezer (I Sam 4).

4. The Temple had become a fetish, as was the ark when Shiloh was destroyed (I Sam 4:3).

5-7. Only the practice of justice and godliness would ensure the divine presence which the Temple symbolized. Judgment. Justice.

12. Shiloh. Cf. Josh 18:1; 22:12; Jud 21:19; 18:31; I Sam 1:9,24; 2:14; 4:3,4. 14. See what I did to it. As the ark was only an empty box when Shiloh was destroyed, so now Jerusalem, bereft of the divine presence, will be of no help, and will itself perish. 15. Seed of Ephraim. The northern kingdom of Israel. 16-20. Jeremiah was not to intercede for his people (contrast Moses, Ex 32:32; Num 14:13-19), for God was determined to punish them (cf. 11:14; 14:11,12). Cakes to the queen of heaven (v. 18). Probably a reference to the Babylonian fertility-goddess Ishtar, goddess of the planet Venus. The cakes were probably in the form of the goddess (cf. 44:15-25).

The futility of sacrifices without obedience. 7:21-28. Jeremiah is not saying that God never wanted or commanded sacrifices. He is expressing by strong contrast the relative importance of sacrifice and obedience (cf. I Sam 15:22). The prophets opposed empty ritualism, not the Mosaic ceremonies as such. Put (v. 21). Add. Burnt offerings were wholly burnt on the altar; parts of the other sacrifices were eaten by the priests and offerers. The idea here is that there is no sanctity in offerings brought by unrepentant men. They are merely flesh, and so the burnt offering might as well be eaten too.

Sinful rites in the valley of the son of Hinnom. 7:29–8:3. This valley, immediately south of Jerusalem, was the center of the cult of infant sacrifice. This foreign rite, introduced by Ahaz and Manasseh (II Kgs 16:3; 21:6) was stamped out by Josiah (II Kgs 23:10) but had now revived, probably under Jehoiakim. The valley will become a desecrated waste.

29. Cut off thy hair. A sign of mourning (Mic 1:16; Job 1:20). 30. Abominations; i.e., idols. 31. Tophet probably originally meant "fireplace," but was now so pronounced that it rhymed with bōshet, "shame" – a circumlocution for an idol. References to slaughter, bury (v. 32), carcases (v. 33), and bones (8:1) all mean that what was now a holy religious site would become a desecrated place, for contact with a corpse rendered unclean. Later this valley seems to have become a city dump, and thus Gehenna, the NT word for the place of woe, originated. Gehenna is a transliteration of the Hebrew gê' hinnōm—"the valley of Hinnom." 33. Fray. Frighten. 34. Then will I cause to cease. Cf. 25:10 note.

8:1. They (Jerusalem's captors) shall bring out. The desecration of graves was a common practice in warfare (Amos 2:1). Frequently, too, dead enemies were left unburied, both as an insult and also in the belief that their spirits would thus have no rest in the nether world. 2. Host of heaven. Cf. 19:13 note.

b) The Result of Impenitence–Retribution. 8:4–9:22.

Here are a number of prophetic oracles with no common theme.

The unnaturalness of Israel's backsliding. 8:4-7. Those who fall rise again; even the birds come back at a certain season. But Israel is perpetually backslidden. Judgment (v. 7). Ordinance, law.

The leaders' false claims to wisdom. 8:8-12. The scribes, prophets, and priests claimed to be wise in the law and soothingly predicted that all would be well. Lo, certainly . . . in vain (v. 8). Better, But, behold, the false pen of the scribes has made it into a lie. This is the first mention of the scribes. They copied and studied the Law (i.e., the Scriptures; cf. 2:8). Already they were beginning to make the law of God void (Mt 15:6). Verses 10-12 are almost identical with 6:12-15. God gives a foreglimpse of the results of defeat in war. Them that shall inherit them. Better, their conquerors (cf. 49:2). 8:13–9:22. These verses comprise the Haptārâh (lesson from the prophets) read in the synagogue on the ninth of Ab, the anniversary of the destruction of the Temple and the end of the Hebrew kingdom (cf. 52:12 note).

Despair of the people at the invasion of foreigners. 8:14-17. Be silent . . . put us to silence (v. 14). Be cut off . . . cut us off. Water of gall. See note on 9:15. Cockatrices (v. 17). Adders.

The prophet's lament. 8:18–9:22. Jeremiah, in a moving poem, expresses his sympathy with his stricken people (8:18–9:1), laments the people's treachery (9:2-9), and wails for the destruction of Judah (9:10-22).

19. Strange vanities. Foreign idols (cf. 2:5 note). 20. Harvest. This word (qāṣîr) refers to the harvest of the barley, wheat, and spelt in April, May, and June. Summer (qāyiṣ) really means "summer fruits," i.e., the figs, grapes, and pomegranates, that were harvested in August and September, and the olives, picked beginning in October. Thus Jeremiah reviews the whole harvest season; it was ended, but no fruit had been stored for the winter ahead–we are not saved. 21. I am black. In mourning. 22. Balm in Gilead was resin derived from a tree and used medicinally. It was exported (46:11; 51:8; Gen 37:25; Ezk 27:17).

9:4. Utterly supplant. The Hebrew 'āqôb ya'qōb is from the same root that occurs in the name "Jacob" (cf. Gen 27:36). 8. Layeth his wait. Plans an ambush for him. 9. Visit. Punish.

10. Habitations of the wilderness. Better, pastures of the wilderness. The prophet sees the whole land desolate (cf. 4:23-26). 11. Dragons. Jackals. 12. Declare it, for what the land perisheth. Better, Declare it? Why is the land ruined? 14. Baalim. Baals (cf. 2:8 note). 15. Wormwood. A plant having very bitter juice. Gall. Poisonous bitter herb (cf. 8:14). The two terms are used together to indicate bitter afflictions. 17. Mourning women; i.e., professional mourners (cf. Mt 9:23). Cunning. Wise, skilled in lamenting. 19. Our dwellings have cast us out. Better, They (our enemies) have cast down our dwellings (cf. II Kgs 25:9). 21. Without . . . streets. Better, Streets . . . squares. 22. Handful. The reaper would grasp a handful of standing grain, cut it off, and proceed to the next handful. So death shall reap, inexorably.

c) The True God Contrasted with Idols. 9:23–10:25.

25,26. These verses are difficult to understand. The thought seems to be that circumcision without the true knowledge of God is useless (cf. 4:4). Thus Paul's statement (Rom 2:28,29) is anticipated. Circumcised with the uncircumcised. Better, Circumcised but yet uncircumcised. Egypt. See notes on Jeremiah 46. Edom. See notes on 49:7-22. Ammon. See notes on 49:1-6. Moab. See notes on Jeremiah 48. That are in the utmost corners, that dwell in the wilderness. Better, Who dwell in the desert, that cut the corners of their hair. A heathen practice (cf. 25:23; 49:32; Lev 19:27).

A vigorous denunciation of idols as nothing. 10:1-16. God, by contrast, is the Maker and Upholder of the universe.

The nothingness of idols. 10:1-5. Signs of heaven (v. 2). Such as eclipses and comets. The making of an idol demonstrates its nothingness (vv. 3,4). Vain. The Hebrew word means "breath," what is unsubstantial and worthless. It is often used of idols (cf. 2:5 note). They are upright as the palm tree (v. 5). Better, They (the idols) are like a post (i.e., a scarecrow) in a garden of cucumbers.

The majesty of God. 10:6-16. King of nations (v. 7). God is the universal King, not a tribal god. Silver spread into plates (v. 9). Beaten silver. Tarshish is a place in Spain or Sicily; a source of metals (Ezk 27:12). Uphaz is unknown. Verse 11 is the only one in Jeremiah written in the Aramaic language. Perhaps it was originally a marginal notation, which finally became part of the text. Every founder . . . graven image (v. 14). Every goldsmith is put to shame by his idol. Vanity (v. 15). See on verse 3. Visitation. Punishment. Portion of Jacob (v. 16). While God is the King of the universe (v. 7), he is also the peculiar portion (possession) of the Hebrew people. Rod. Tribe.

The coming desolation. 10:17-25. Probably Jerusalem is thought to speak verses 19-21. Cities were often pictured as mothers with children (Ezk 26:6,8). Tabernacle (v. 20). Tent. Pastors (v. 21). Shepherds (cf. 2:8 note). Bruit (v. 22). Rumor. Dragons. Jackals. With judgment (v. 24). In just measure.

4) Israel Rejected for Breaking God's Covenant. 11:1–13:27.

"This covenant" (11:3) was made with Israel at Sinai. Its fullest statement is found in Deuteronomy (chs. 29; 30). Many scholars believe that these chapters of Jeremiah have as their background the Josianic reforms which were precipitated by the finding of a book, probably Deuteronomy, in the Temple (cf. Introduction, The Life and Times of Jeremiah). Jeremiah supported these reforms, but here sees the revival as superficial, inadequate to put off judgment.

a) The Judeans' Violation of the Covenant. 11:1-17.

3. Cursed. Cf. Deut 27:11-26. This covenant. Israel was to obey the Lord and be his people; so the Lord would be their God, and Canaan would be their land (Ex 19:5,6; 24:3-8; Deut 29:1-28). 5. Perform the oath. Cf. Deut 7:8; 8:18; 9:5. So be it. The Hebrew word is our "amen," a term used to indicate affirmation of the curse in verse 3 (cf. Deut 27:15-26). 8. Imagination. Stubbornness. Will bring. Better, brought. The people had already begun to feel the penalty of the broken covenant.

11. I will bring. Better, I am bringing. Josiah's revival having been a failure, God was now in the act of terminating the covenant and bringing the punishment. 13. The Judeans had as many gods and altars as cities and streets (cf. 2:28 note). Shameful thing. See note on 3:24. 14. See note on 7:16.

15. A difficult verse, evidently a statement of the inadequacy of the temple ritual to forestall the coming doom (cf. 7:1–8:3). Using the LXX, the RSV translates it, What right has my beloved in my house, when she has done vile deeds? Can vows and sacrificial flesh avert your doom? Can you then exult? My beloved. Israel. My house. The Temple. 16,17. Judah is likened to a destroyed olive tree. The olive was the source of oil for light, cooking, medicine, anointing for the body, and many other uses. It became the symbol of "prosperity and divine blessing, of beauty and strength." Thus it is here an apt picture of the Hebrew people, blessed by God, but now rejected. Paul uses the same figure (Rom 11:17-24).

b) The Plot Against Jeremiah's Life. 11:18–12:6.

Perhaps Jeremiah had not yet moved from Anathoth to Jerusalem when this section was written. It is evident from 12:6 that the question, "Wherefore doth the way of the wicked prosper?" raised in 12:1-6 is to be connected with the plot against the prophet's life (11:18-23). Possibly Jeremiah's kinsmen in Anathoth (they would also have been priests) sought to kill the prophet because of his frequent denunciation of the false trust in ritual. This would explain the location of this section after 11:15-17. This is one of Jeremiah's confessions (cf. Introduction, Jeremiah's Confessions).

18. It . . . their doings; i.e. the plot against Jeremiah's life. The prophet seems to mean that God informed him of the plot in time for him to escape. 19. A lamb or an ox. Better, a docile lamb. 20. Reins. Literally, kidneys, i.e., the region of the kidneys, the loins, once thought to be the seat of the affections. 23. Visitation. Punishment. 12:3. Jeremiah did not have the example of Christ's, "Father, forgive them; for they know not what they do" (Lk 23:34). The prosperity of the wicked was one of the most perplexing problems faced by the OT saints. 4. They said; i.e., men said.

5,6. God replies to his discouraged prophet. The swelling of Jordan (v. 5).

The jungle of the Jordan, the low bottom land through which the Jordan flows, hot, full of thick undergrowth, and inhabited by wild animals (cf. 49:19; 50:44). Called a multitude (v. 6). Better, called aloud. They had raised the hue and cry against Jeremiah, as though he were a common criminal.

c) Jehovah's Lament over the Destruction of His Land. 12:7-13.

It is the Lord rather than his prophet who weeps over the land in this unusual passage. Many figures of speech—house, heritage, beloved (v. 7); lion (v. 8); bird (v. 9); vineyard, portion (v. 10)—are used to describe Israel.

9. Speckled bird. It would be attacked by other birds because of its brightly colored plumage. 10. Pastors. See note on 2:8. The shepherds are here the kings of foreign nations who had desolated Israel. 12. All high places through the wilderness. Better, all the bare heights in the wilderness. 13. They shall be ashamed of your revenues. Better, you shall be ashamed of your harvests.

d) The Fate of Judah's Enemies. 12:14-17.

They will also be despoiled, but will be restored if they repent (cf. 25:8-14). Return and have compassion (v. 15). Again have compassion.

e) Parables and Warnings. 13:1-27.

The chapter contains five passages unified by the theme of humiliation and doom for Judah. Possibly this chapter dates from the reign of Jehoiachin (13:18; cf. 22:26).

The parable of the buried girdle. 13:1-11. This parable graphically teaches Israel's former importance to God and her present corruption and rejection.

1. Girdle. Better, loincloth, used to brace the hip joints for prolonged exertion, and to hold up the hanging skirts for greater freedom in walking or work. 4. Euphrates. The distance from Judah to the Euphrates River is at least four hundred miles, regarded as a very great distance in ancient times. Two round trips are mentioned (cf. vv. 4,6). Some scholars believe that not the Euphrates River but a Palestinian town with a similar sounding name is here referred to. Many, however, believe the Euphrates River is meant, but regard the account as a spoken parable, not literally acted out. The truth of the story is not dependent upon Jeremiah's having actually made the journey. Certainly the reference to the Euphrates in 2:18 is not to be taken literally! 11. Israel, as intimately attached to God as a loincloth (v. 11), has become corrupt and useless. She shall be cast off.

The parable of the jars. 13:12-14. It indicated that God would fill the people with confusion, as when men are drunk; they would dash against each other and be destroyed.

12. Every bottle shall be filled with wine. Probably a common tippler's saying. Bottle. The large clay jar used for storing oil, grain, or wine. The largest ones found by archaeologists contain up to ten gallons. 13. Drunkenness. Not literal intoxication. Here, as elsewhere in the prophets (Jer 25:15-28; Ezk 23:31-34; Isa 51:17,18), the picture of a drunkard is used to symbolize the pathetic condition of the people when taken into captivity.

A warning against pride. 13:15-17. Give glory (v. 16). Confess your sinful pride. Dark mountains. Twilight mountains. A vivid picture. The traveler on the mountain road is first overtaken by dusk, then by thick darkness.

A lament over the king and the queen mother. 13:18,19.

Probably Jehoiachin and Nehushta are referred to (22:26; II Kgs 24:8).

18. Queen. Better, queen mother. The Hebrews paid great attention to the mother of the king. Since the kings had many wives, not all with the same status, the identity of the prince's mother was important in the succession to the throne. For your principalities shall come down, even the crown of your glory. Difficult; perhaps for your beautiful crown has come down from your head (RSV). 19. South. Negev, the southern part of Judah. Only recently has the importance of this part of the land in ancient times been realized. Shut up; i.e., under siege.

The shame of Jerusalem. 13:20-27.

The city is as a shepherdess who has forsaken her flock. She, the head of the nation, has led it into sin.

21. Difficult. Perhaps, "What will you say when he (the Babylonian conqueror) shall set as head over you those whom you have taught to be friends to you?" 22. Discovered. Removed. Evidently a reference to the treatment of a harlot (cf. v. 26; Hos 2:3). Made bare. Better, suffered violence. Heels may be a euphemism for "secret parts" and the clause parallel to the previous one. 25. Falsehood. Idolatry. 26. See note on verse 21.

5) Prophetic Intercession Unable to Prevent Judgment. 14:1–17:27.

A section quite autobiographical, full of the prophet's pessimism concerning the future of his people, and also revealing his communion with God, from which he drew his sustenance.

a) The Drought and the Prophet's Intercession. 14:1–15:9.

The drought described 14:1-6. The rainfall in Palestine is marginal; a single dry year may cause much real suffering. Here the drought is described as first touching the city (vv. 2,3), then the farmers (v. 4), and then even the wild animals (vv. 5,6).

1. Dearth. Drought. 2. They are black; i.e., in mourning. 3. Pits. Cisterns. Much of the water supply in cities was gathered into cisterns during the rainy season. Covered their heads. As a sign of mourning (cf. II Sam 15:30). 4. Chapt. Cracked. Earth. Land. 6. They snuffed up the wind like dragons. They panted for air like jackals.

Jeremiah's intercession for the people. 14:7-9. Our iniquities (v. 7). The prophet identifies himself with his people. For thy name's sake. An appeal for God to act for the sake of his reputation and grace (cf. Ps 25:11; 79:9; 106:8; 109:21; 143:11). Stranger . . . wayfaring man (v. 8). Foreigners and tourists have little real concern for the land through which they travel. Let not God be so. Astonied (v. 9). Surprised by an unforeseen attack.

Jeremiah forbidden to pray for the people. 14:10-12. Visit. Punish.

Judgment on the false prophets. 14:13-16. Compare 6:13,14; 23:9-32.

Jeremiah's further lament and prayer for Judah. 14:17-22. The virgin daughter of my people (v. 17). Judah is personified as a virgin, which term emphasizes God's selection of his people to be his own peculiar possession, his virgin bride. Go about into a land that they know not (v. 18). Better, Ply their trade through the land (the 'business-as-usual' attitude) and have no knowledge (of the impending doom). Vanities (v. 22). See note on 2:5.

God's determination not to relent. 15:1-9. Moses and Samuel (v. 1). Two great intercessors. For Moses, cf. Ex 32:11-14; Num 14:13-19. For Samuel, see I Sam 7:5-11; 12:19; Ps 99:6. Yet even they would not be successful now: Four kinds of punishment (v. 3). To be removed (v. 4). Better, to be a horror, i.e., an object of terror. Manasseh introduced great idolatry into Judah (II Kgs 23:26; 24:3). Yet usually Jeremiah insists that the people are themselves responsible for their sins and punishment (e.g., 31:29,30). Repenting (v. 6). Compare note on 18:8. I will fan them with a fan (v. 7). I will winnow then with a winnowing fork (cf. Mt 3:12).

b) The Renewal of Jeremiah's Call, and Its Cost. 15:10–16:9.

A deeply revealing confession, showing the prophet's bitterness of soul. God's reply indicates that Jeremiah needed to be careful of his mood and to speak nothing but the truth. He was then encouraged and recommissioned.

The prophet's lament and recommission. 15:10-21. Earth (v. 10). Land. Verse 11 is difficult to interpret. The meaning seems to be that God will protect the prophet in the coming catastrophe. It shall be well with thy remnant. Better, I will strengthen you for good.

13,14. These verses occur again, with variations, in 17:3 b,4. They are directed to the people of Judah, and predict exile.

16. The sufficiency of the Word of God is graphically stated. Cf. Josh 1:8; Ezk 3:1-3; Rev 10:8-11, where John's experience is very like Jeremiah's. Called by thy name. Literally, thy name was called upon me. A reference to the prophet's special call by God. The remembrance of this call strengthened Jeremiah to go on. 17. Thy hand. God's hand was upon Jeremiah—an idiom expressing the divine inspiration, which was the reason for Jeremiah's persecution (cf. Ezk 1:3, and frequently in Ezekiel; I Kgs 18:46; Isa 8:11). 18. Liar. Better, deceitful brook. Jeremiah reproaches God with having failed him, as when a traveler in the dry season discovers that the brook from which he hoped to drink has dried up (cf. Job 6:15-20).

19. If thou return, then will I bring thee again. The idea is, If you repent (of your self-pity), I will restore you. Take forth the precious from the vile. The prophet needed to discipline his thought and speech. Then he could be God's spokesman (mouth). The end of the verse is a command to the prophet not to sink to the level of those to whom he ministered.

20,21. These verses repeat the substance of 1:18,19.

The prophet commanded to remain celibate and avoid social intercourse. 16:1-9. His life was to be a warning of the coming judgment. 2. Wife. Celibacy was very unusual in ancient Israel. Jeremiah was denied the joy and fulfillment of marriage. Others of the prophets used their married life as signs (cf. Hos 1–3; Isa 8:3,4; Ezk 24:15-27). Verses 4,6,7,9 portray the results of war. 5-7. The ancient Semites made a great show of mourning (cf. 7:29 note; 9:17 note). Self-laceration and shaving of the head (v. 6) were forbidden (Deut 14:1; Lev 19:28), but other mentions seem to indicate their frequent practice (Jer 41:5; 47:5; Isa 22:12; Amos 8:10; Mic 1:16; Ezk 7:18). 7. Tear themselves for them in mourning. Better, Break bread for them in mourning. It was customary for the friends of mourners to provide them with their first meal after the funeral (II Sam 3:35). Probably the cup of consolation was a similar custom.

c) Warnings and Promises. 16:10—17:27.

10-13. When the people ask, "Why the exile?" Jeremiah is to point out to them their wickedness. 14,15. They will experience a second Exodus. See note on 23:7,8.

16-18. Israel is still known to God. Double (v. 18). In great measure (cf. Isa 40:2). Carcasses. As dead bodies defile, so idols pollute.

19-21. Gentiles will be converted to the Lord. Lies, vanity, and things wherein there is no profit (v. 19). Synonyms for idols (cf. 2:5 note).

The nation's sin indelible. 17:1-4. Table of their heart (v. 1). Where the new and better covenant will be written (31:31-34). Horns of your altars. Where the blood of the sacrifices was smeared (Lev 4:7). Groves (v. 2). See note on 2:27. Green trees . . . high hills. See note on 3:6. Verses 3,4 repeat the substance of 15:13,14.

Trust in man and God contrasted. 17:5-8. The background of these verses may be the tendency of the last Judean kings to seek for the help of Egypt against the Babylonian threat (cf. 2:18 note). Flesh (v. 5). In the OT the term refers to the frailty of human kind. Heath (v. 6). The dwarf juniper, which grows in the barren desert and has a gloomy, stunted appearance. Careful (v. 8). Anxious.

Sin a disease of the heart. 17:9-13. Heart (v. 9). In the OT, man's inner being, from which spring his will and action. It may also refer to the reason. Wicked. This word at times refers to sickness, and is translated "incurable" (15:18). Here it means "corrupt." Reins (v. 10). See note on 11:20. Written in the earth (v. 13); i.e., in the ground or dust, rather than in the Book of Life (Ex 32:32).

A prayer for vindication. 17:14-18. Cf. 15:15-18. Pastor (v. 16). Shepherd. Paraphrase: "I have not abandoned the mission you have given me."

Sabbath observance prerequisite for the return of national glory. 17:19-27. Cf. Isa 58:13,14. It may seem strange that Jeremiah, who decries ritual observances, should have been interested in the Sabbath. But the Sabbath is more than a ritual observance. It is a humanitarian institution (Deut 5:14,15) and a sign that God is Israel's Sanctifier (Ex 31:13). These words are not incongruous in Jeremiah's mouth. Plain (v. 26). The Shephelah, the low hills and valleys between the Judean hill country and the Philistine Plain. A center of ancient Hebrew agricultural life. Mountains. The central Judean hill country. South. "Negev" (cf. 13:19 note).

6) Two Symbolic Sermons and an Imprisonment. 18:1—20:18.

The parable of the potter and the symbolic action of the broken vessel are good examples of the vivid preaching of the prophets. The rest of the section is concerned with the negative response of the people to Jeremiah's preaching, and the prophet's communings with his God.

a) The Parable of the Potter. 18:1-23.

The potter's work a symbol of God's procedure. 18:1-17. Here is emphasized the conditional character of prophecy. Even Jeremiah's sternest declaration of doom, like Jonah's (Jon 3:4), presupposes an opportunity to repent. This parable also teaches the divine Potter's patience.

2,3. Potter's house. Probably located in the potters' quarter in the southern section of the city, near the Potsherd Gate and the Valley of the Son of Hinnom (cf. 19:2 note). On the wheels. Two stone discs were used. The lower, which was kicked by the craftsman, was attached by an axle to the upper, on which the clay was shaped (Ecclesiasticus 38:29,30 describes the process).

5-11. The homily. Jehovah, the Potter of nations, is sovereign in his work, yet his is a sovereignty that is responsive to the wills of his creatures. Here the analogy breaks down. Human clay is not passive as is that of Jeremiah's potter; and if Israel will repent, God will yet make of her a "vessel unto honor." Repent (v. 8). The use of the word repent in referring to God does not imply fickleness on the part of the Almighty. When a human word is used to describe the actions of the Divine, the word undergoes a subtle redefinition. God is not a man that he should repent (cf. 4:28; 15:6)—he does not blow hot and cold. Yet he does relent when his people turn to him; and this action of relenting is called repentance (cf. 20:16; 26:3,13,19; 42:10).

13-17. Virgin of Israel (v. 13). See note on 14:17. Verse 14 is difficult to interpret. It seems to teach the unnaturalness of Israel's apostasy from God. The RSV translates it: Shall the snow of Lebanon fail from the rock of the field? or shall the cold waters that flow down from afar be dried up? That is to say, nature pursues her course unchanged, but the nation has unnaturally changed its course. Vanity (v. 15). See note on 2:5. Paths. Bypaths. A way not cast up; i.e., not properly constructed, not a highway. Desolate . . . astonished (v. 16). These words are from the same Hebrew root. They could be translated a horror . . . horrified. East wind (v. 17). See note on 4:11. The back, and not the face. Because God is departing. The face of God symbolizes his favor (Num 6:25,26).

A plot against Jeremiah. 18:18-23. Cf. 11:18–12:6; 15:15-21. The three groups of religious leaders are here mentioned (v. 18), together with the special work of each. The priest taught the Law (Mal 2:6) and carried out its ritual commands; the wise man (the sage) dispensed the accumulated wisdom of the ages; and the prophet mediated the direct word of the Lord (the false prophet, who opposed Jeremiah, is meant here). Surely Jeremiah (who rejected all three classes) could not be right! Smite him with the tongue; i.e., bring charges against him. For verses 21-23, see note on 12:3.

b) The Broken Vessel. 19:1-15.

This sermon upon a symbolic action naturally follows the parable of the potter. As long as the vessel remained plastic, it could be remade. Once it was baked, however, it could no longer be remolded. If unacceptable then, it would be broken up.

1. Earthen bottle. A clay water decanter, with a narrow neck, named baqbūq for the gurgling sound of the water being poured out. Ancients. Elders. 2. Valley of the son of Hinnom. The southern boundary of Jerusalem (cf. 18:2 note). East gate. Probably, "the Potsherd Gate." 4. Blood of innocents; i.e., infant sacrifice (cf. 7:29 note). 5. Burn their sons. Cf. II Kgs 16:3; 23:10; Jer 32:35; and notes on 7:29–8:3. 6. Tophet. See note on 7:31. 9. Straitness . . . straiten. Distress . . afflict.

11. No way was known for mending a broken bottle; it was discarded and a new one obtained; so Jerusalem would be rejected, her time of repentance having passed. 13. Host of heaven. Army of heaven, an expression used of the stars (e.g., Gen 2:1; Isa 45:12), but here for the worship of the planets or the gods of the planets. Ahaz and Manasseh introduced this pagan cult into Judah (II Kgs 21:5; 23:12), probably from Mesopotamia, where it was practiced from remote antiquity.

c) Jeremiah's Persecution and Complaint. 20:1-18.

Jeremiah in the stocks. 20:1-6. Pashur (v. 3). A name of Egyptian origin. There is no play on it here, but only on Magormissabib, which means, "Terror on every side"; cf. terror (v. 4). Strength (v. 5). Wealth. Labours. Prosperity. Spoil. Plunder.

The prophet's complaint against God. 20:7-18. One of Jeremiah's most revealing confessions, this prayer shows the terrible personal cost at which he spoke the word that was placed upon him.

7. Deceived. A strong word, used of "seducing" a virgin (Ex 22:16), and of the "lying" spirit that deceived Ahab (I Kgs 22:20-22). Here the prophet, bitter of soul, complains against the divine compulsion, which he calls enticement. 8. Since I spake. Better, As often as I spoke. 10. The defaming of many . . . A vivid statement of the feeling of a man who believes that all are against him. Fear on every side. The Hebrew words are the same as the name Magor-missabib (cf. 20:3 note). Halting. Stumbling. 11. A mighty terrible one. A mighty warrior. 12. Reins . . . heart. Cf. notes on 11:20; 17:9.

14-18. Jeremiah laments the day of his birth (cf. Job 3). Cities (v. 16). Sodom and Gomorrah (Gen 19). Repented. See note on 18:8. The shouting. An alarm.

C. Later Prophecies. 21:1–25:38.

These chapters record oracles concerning the kings of Judah and the false prophets after the time of Josiah. They reflect the growing feeling of doom as the captivity nears.

1) The Issue of the Siege. 21:1-14.

Date: Sometime late in the reign of Zedekiah. Zedekiah is urged to submit to Nebuchadnezzar, for the city will fall.

a) Reply to a Deputation from Zechariah. 21:1-10.

1. Pashur. Not the Pashur of 20:1-6. Zephaniah the son of Maaseiah. See note on 29:25. 2. Nebuchadrezzar had evidently just begun the final attack against Jerusalem (588-587 B.C.) which ended in its destruction. This is the Nebuchadnezzar of the books of Kings and Chronicles. Jeremiah's spelling is nearest to the Babylonian form of the name. 4. Chaldeans. The name given to the reigning dynasty of the new-Babylonian empire and, by extension, to the Babylonians generally at this time.

8-10. The people would do best to give up to the Chaldeans. Little wonder that Jeremiah was regarded as a traitor. But his was a higher patriotism; godliness was to him the only reason for the nation's being, as well as its only hope of survival. 9. Falleth to the Chaldeans; i.e., defects to the enemy. Prey. Prize of war.

b) A Message to the Royal House. 21:11-14.

Verse 12 is typical of the prophets' demand for social justice. Even when the city is in her dying gasp, the concern for human welfare is voiced. It is uncertain against whom verses 13 and 14 are directed.

2) An Exhortation to King and People. 22:1-9.

This section, calling upon palace and city to do justice or become destroyed, is probably an introduction to the succeeding oracles against named kings, and may date from the reign of Jehoiakim.

3-5. See note on 21:11-14. The spoiled (v. 3). Him who has been robbed. Gilead . . . Lebanon (v. 6). Well-wooded regions. Thy choice cedars (v. 7). The palace complex in Jerusalem included the House of the Forest of Lebanon; and much cedar from Lebanon was used in building Solomon's palace and Temple (I Kgs 5:6,8-10; 10:27). All was to be burned.

3) The Fate of Shallum. 22:10-12.

No doubt this oracle was made early in the reign of Jehoiakim. The people were not to weep for Josiah, who had recently been killed, nor for his son Shallum (the private name of Jehoahaz; I Chr 3:15), whom Pharaoh-necho had deported to Egypt, for he would never return (II Kgs 23:29-35).

4) An Oracle Against Jehoiakim. 22:13-23.

This denunciation of the evil Jehoiakim, made during his reign, is one of Jeremiah's most pointed. It condemns the king for building his palace with forced labor at a time when heavy tribute had to be paid to Egypt (II Kgs 23:35). It concludes (Jer 22:20-23) with a wail over the end of the kings, or possibly over the city of Jerusalem.

13. Him that buildeth his house; i.e., Jehoiakim. 14. Ceiled. Paneled. 15. Father; i.e., Josiah. 16. The knowledge of God is a moral matter; intellect is not enough. 19 Burial of an ass; i.e., no burial, the carcass being left for the beasts and birds (36:30). We are not informed as to the fulfillment of this prophecy (cf. II Kgs 24:6). Perhaps this wicked king was overthrown by a palace revolt and his body cast outside the city gates.

20. The passages. Better, Abarim ("regions beyond"), the mountain range (which included Nebo) from which Moses saw the Promised Land (Num 27:12; Deut 32:49). Lovers. Perhaps the nations upon whom the kings relied for help, instead of trusting God. 22. Pastors. Shepherds. Lovers. Cf. note on 22:20. 23. O inhabitant of Lebanon. Cf. note on verses 6,7. How gracious. Spoken ironically.

5) An Oracle Against Jehoiachin. 22:24-30.

Seldom has any reigning king been so severely castigated in an oracle during his reign as is Jehoiachin here.

24. Coniah. This man, also called Jeconiah and Jehoiachin, succeeded his father Jehoiakim on the throne in 598 B.C. During his reign, early in 597 B.C. Nebuchadnezzar besieged and captured Jerusalem and took Jehoiachin and many important people to Babylon (II Kgs 24:8-17; II Chr 36:9,10). 26. Thy mother. See note on 13:18. 28. Idol. Better, vessel; i.e., a broken, forgotten pot. 30. Childless. Coniah would have no son to succeed him on the throne. He did have seven sons (I Chr 3:17). Cuneiform tablets found in Babylon list rations of oil provided "Yaukin (i.e., Jehoiachin) king of the land of Yahud (i.e., Judah)" and his five sons. Though the genealogy of Mt 1 follows the descent of the Messiah through Solomon and Jeconiah, that record of David's lineage indicates only who Jesus' legal father was, not who his real father was. Luke traces the real pedigree backward from Mary, His true parent, through Nathan to David.

6) The Messianic King. 23:1-8.

After the oracles against wicked kings, there is a promise of a righteous one, the Shoot of David. The Davidic tree, cut off to the ground by the captivity, would sprout again, and its shoot would be called "The Lord our Righteousness." Prophet, priest, and king are the three offices of OT times that are typical and prophetic of Christ. The Church has always seen here a prophecy of Messiah, "Great David's greater son," the King of Kings.

1,2. Woe unto the (false) shepherds (pastors, AV). These are the unrighteous king and rulers of Judah, who have been condemned in chapters 21 and 22. The once-glorious house of David has become wholly degenerate. But this woe, unlike many woes of this book, is but a prelude to the pronouncement of a better hope. Have not visited them (v. 2). Have not attended to them. I will visit upon you the evil. I will attend to you for the evil. A play on the word visit.

3,4. Israel will be regathered from exile, and be ruled by godly shepherds. Verses 3-8 presuppose the Exile. This is not to say that Jeremiah was not the author of this passage. It is a common feature of the style of the pre-Exilic prophets that after announcing exile, they then go on to predict restoration (cf. Amos 9:11-15; Isa 11:1-16; 44:24–45:13; and many others). All countries (v. 3). The prophecy seems to imply not only the Babylonian exile, but a world-wide scattering. Shepherds (v. 4). The leaders of the nation after the Exile (Zerubbabel, Ezra, Nehemiah, the Maccabees) who prepared the way for Messiah. They be lacking. Any be missing.

5,6. The scion of David; repeated in 33:15,16. Behold, the days come (v. 5). A formula often used to introduce predictions of the Messianic day. Unto David; i.e., of David's line (cf. II Sam 7:8-16; Isa 11; 12; Mt 1:1; 21:9,15; Lk 1:32; Rom 1:3). Branch. Shoot, a Messianic title (Zech 3:8; 6:12; a different word is used in Isa 11:1). Judgment and justice. Justice and righteousness. These frequent Messianic attributes shed a ray of hope in despot-ridden ancient times, as they do today.

Judah . . . and Israel (v. 6). All of the Hebrew people were involved, not the southern kingdom only (Ezk 37:19). The Lord Our Righteousness. Jehovah Ṣidqēnû is perhaps a play on Zedekiah's name (Ṣidqîyāhû—"Jehovah is righteous"). The ideal Davidic king will more truly deserve the name. Righteousness here has the double meaning of "righteousness" and "salvation" (cf. Isa 46:13; 51:6,8; Rom 1:16,17). God is here seen as Saviour or Deliverer.

7,8. A second exodus (cf. 23:3,4 note).

7) Against the False Prophets. 23: 9-40.

Jeremiah was troubled throughout his career by men who pretended to be true prophets but were not (27:16-22; 28; 29:8,9). They preached an easy message of "peace in our time" and were no doubt popular. Here the prophet denounces them.

12. Visitation. Punishment. 13. In Baal. By Baal. 15. Wormwood . . . water of gall. See note on 9:15. 16. Make you vain. Give you false hopes. A vision of their own heart; i.e., they spoke what originated in their own minds (cf. 17:9 note), but the true prophet speaks the word that God gives him (cf. v. 18).

20. Heart. See note on 17:9. Consider. Understand. 22. In my counsel. The same Hebrew word means both counsel (Amos 3:7) and, as in this verse, council.

The OT in various places pictures a heavenly assembly, presided over by the Lord. The beings making up this assembly are called "holy ones," "spirits," "sons of God," etc. These beings worship God and are under his power (Ps 82; I Kgs 22:19-22; Job 1:1–2:7; Isa 6:1-13). True prophets are, evidently admitted to this council.

23,24. The false prophets cannot hide from God to escape his punishment. 25-32. Jeremiah seems to be saying that the word of the Lord came to him not by a dream, but by some better way, perhaps while he was completely awake.

33. Burden. A term for a prophetic oracle. The word comes from a Hebrew root meaning "to lift up." God placed the burden on the prophet. He bore it to the people. The people are here told not to use the term lightly.

8) The Vision of the Figs. 24:1-10.

In this vision, used as a parable, the prophet states that those who have gone into exile with Jehoiachin will fare better than those left behind in Jerusalem. Given early in the reign of Zedekiah.

1. Carried away captive. Cf. notes for Jeremiah 29. 2. First ripe. The early crop gathered in June was considered best. A later crop appeared in August. Naughty. Bad. The same word is translated bad later in this verse and evil in verse 3. 6. The exiles will be purified and later return; those left in Jerusalem will be destroyed in the fall of the city. 7. Cf. 31:33. 8. Give. Treat. 9. To be removed. See note on 15:4.

9) The Judgment on Judah and All the Nations. 25:1-38.

This important chapter, significantly dated in Nebuchadnezzar's first year (Jehoiakim's fourth; v. 1), predicts a seventy-year exile for Judah, and then goes on, in apocalyptic style, to call upon the nations to drink God's cup of fury. Daniel was reading this passage when the prophecy of the seventy weeks came to him (Dan 9:2; cf. II Chr 36:21).

a) Judah's Captivity and Babylon's Punishment. 25:1-14.

1. Fourth year of Jehoiakim. 605 B.C. (cf. 36:1; 45:1; 46:2).

9. Families of the north. Cf. Introduction, The Foe from the North. My servant. The heathen Nebuchadnezzar was unconsciously doing God's will (cf. 27:6; 43:10). So Cyrus is called God's "anointed" (Isa 45:1). These nations round about. Much of the Near East was to be captured by the Babylonians. 10. The sounds of daily human activity would cease. Candle. Better, lamp. 11. Seventy years. A round number. If the beginning of Judah's submission to Babylon is reckoned at Nebuchadnezzar's first capture of Jerusalem (605 B.C.; cf. 1:3, note), and the decree of Cyrus permitting the return at 538 B.C., the Exile lasted sixty-seven years.

12. Babylon, after being used by God to punish Judah, will be destroyed for her own sins (cf. Isa 10:5-34). Perpetual desolations. See note on 50:12,13. 14. Shall serve themselves of them. "Shall make slaves of them," i.e., of the Babylonians. The reference is to the Medes and Persians, who overthrew Babylon (cf. introductory note to chs. 50; 51; and 51:11 note).

b) The Nations To Drink the Cup of God's Fury. 25:15-38.

These verses could serve as an introduction to Jeremiah's oracles against the foreign nations (chs. 46–51), and they are connected with these oracles by the LXX. The nations listed in these verses are largely the same as those mentioned in the oracles; only those not mentioned there are commented on here.

15-17. To be given a stupifying potion is to feel the effect of God's wrath (cf. 49:12; 51:7). Be moved (v. 16). Reel to and fro. 20. Mingled people; i.e., "foreigners" in Egypt. Uz. The land of Job (Job 1:1). It was east of Palestine, probably in Edomite territory (Gen 10:23; 22:21; 36:28; Lam 4:21). Azzah. Gaza. 22. Isles. See note on 2:10. 23. Tema is in northwest Arabia (cf. Isa 21:14; Job 6:19). Buz is unknown. That are in the utmost corners. See note on 9:26. 25. Zimri is unknown. Medes. See note on 51:11. 26. Sheshach. Babylon. The prophet here uses a cipher that substitutes the last letter of the alphabet for the first, the last but one for the second, etc.

32. Coasts of the earth. See note on 31:8. 34. Shepherds . . . principal of the flock; i.e., rulers of the nations. 37. Habitations. (Sheep)folds.

II. Events in the Life of Jeremiah. 26:1–45:5.

This section consists mainly of autobiographical and historical material. Jeremiah's relations with the rulers and people became more strained, until finally Jerusalem fell as he had predicted. Still, in all this, a theme of hope emerges with the message of the New Covenant. The section closes with a brief account of Jeremiah's last days.

A. The Temple Sermon and Jeremiah's Arrest. 26:1-24.

Here are given the circumstances surrounding the preaching of the temple sermon which is recorded in 7:1–8:3. The date is early in Jehoiakim's reign.

1) The Preaching of the Sermon. 26:1-6.

3. Repent. See note on 26:13,19; 18:8. 4-6. A summary of the message recorded in 7:3–8:3. Shiloh (v. 6). See notes on 7:12-14. Curse; i.e., people will curse others saying, "May you become desolate like Jerusalem."

2) The Arrest and Trial of Jeremiah. 26:7-19.

8,9. The religious leaders appear to have stirred up the people against Jeremiah. Against. Better, about. Jeremiah was surrounded by a throng.

10. Princes. These were the good court officials who had been appointed to office by Josiah and had survived him. They here defend the prophet (cf. 26:24). 14,15. Jeremiah's unflinching courage here hardly needs comment. Meet. Right.

16. People. Contrast verse 8. How easily the mob changes sides!

17. Elders. Evidently these were aged, pious men. The Hebrew term more usually means "rulers."

18. Micah the Morasthite. The writing prophet, from Moresheth, who had lived more than a hundred years before. The quotation is from Mic 3:12.

19. We have no other record of Hezekiah's repentance, but he is known as a reforming king (II Kgs 18:3-6).

3) The Arrest and Execution of Urijah. 26:20-24.

This account of how Jehoiakim vented his spleen upon a lesser adversary suggests his intense hatred of Jeremiah, and gives us reason to believe that he was behind Jeremiah's persecution (26:8).

20. Urijah the son of Shemaiah. Nothing is known of him apart from these verses. Kirjath-jearim. A town eight miles west of Jerusalem, on the road leading down to the coastal plain. 21. Afraid . . . fled. It is not given to all men to stand as Jeremiah did, nor is it always wise to do so. 23. Fetched. Jehoiakim was still an Egyptian puppet; so extradition was easily arranged.

24. Ahikam the son of Shaphan. One of Josiah's princes (cf. v. 10 note; II Kgs 22:12,14). His son Gedaliah was the ill-fated governor of Judah after the fall of Jerusalem (II Kgs 25:22).

B. The Yoke of Babylon. 27:1–29:32.

Zedekiah, although placed on the throne by Nebuchadnezzar, conspired against him, and kings of neighboring nations gathered to Jerusalem to make united plans for rebellion. No doubt the hopes of the people were aroused. Jeremiah here counsels the foreign kings and Zedekiah to desist, for they cannot hope for success. Perhaps his advice carried weight. At least, it seems that the rebellion did not take place at this time. The events of Jeremiah 27; 28 took place in Zedekiah's fourth year (cf. 25:1 note); those of Jeremiah 29, sometime during the same reign.

1) The Message to Foreign Kings. 27:1-11.

A symbolic sermon; the bonds and yokes would graphically set forth the picture of captivity. A similar symbolic act is recorded in I Kgs 22:11.

1. Jehoiakim. Verses 3,12,20 indicate that Zedekiah was ruling at this time. The Syriac Version and some Hebrew manuscripts read Zedekiah here. The LXX omits the verse entirely. Many commentators believe that this verse was erroneously copied by a scribe from 26:1. Certainly Zedekiah is correct here.

2. Bonds. Thongs. The yokes consisted of wooden bars held together by leather thongs. In 28:10 Jeremiah is still wearing the yoke. 3. Moab. See note on 48:1. Ammonites. See note on 49:1. Tyrus. Tyre. Zidon. Sidon. See note on 47:4. The small nations of Syria-Palestine frequently revolted against their Mesopotamian overlord, often with Egyptian connivance. They were seldom successful. 5. Meet. Right. 6. Not only would revolt be unsuccessful; it would be wrong, for God had ordained the Babylonian power for its strange work, and Nebuchadnezzar was God's servant (cf. 25:9 note). 7. Serve themselves of him. Make him their slave. His son, and his son's son. An idiom meaning "a very long time."

9. Enchanters. Soothsayers. The prolonged national crisis had seen the rise of a throng of quack religious practitioners. The hysterical people, it appears, embraced them wholeheartedly. They told the people what they wanted to hear: "Peace, peace" (6:14).

2) The Message to Zedekiah. 27:12-15.

Zedekiah was a weak, vacillating person, likely to dabble in revolts, and also to draw back at the last minute. The word to him is similar to that given to the foreign envoys. Evidently Jerusalem might have been spared destruction, and the large final deportation avoided, had Zedekiah continued to submit to Babylon.

3) The Message to the Priests and the People. 27:16-22.

All are warned not to be misled by the easy message of the false prophets (cf. 23:9-40 notes).

16. Vessels. In the Temple were storerooms, some of which constituted a treasury for expensive objects that had been given to God. These treasures had been carried off to Babylon when Nebuchadnezzar raided Jerusalem in 597 B.C. (II Kgs 24:13). 19. Pillars. Of bronze. These stood in front of the Temple (I Kgs 7:15). Sea. The bronze wash basin in the temple court (I Kgs 7:23-26). Bases. Stands. These were objects on wheels mentioned in I Kgs 7:27-36. The metal of these objects, as well as that of the "vessels" referred to in verse 16, was very valuable. 20. Jeconiah. See note on 22:24. 22. Visit. Attend to.

4) Hananiah's Opposition to Jeremiah. 28:1-17.

This conflict occurred shortly after the events of the previous chapter, for Jeremiah still wore the yoke (v. 10). On the false prophets, see notes on 29:9-32.

1. Hananiah the son of Azur. There are fourteen Hananiahs in the OT; the name means, The Lord has been gracious. Nothing is known of the son of Azur except what is told here.

2-4. Not content with general predictions of peace, Hananiah predicts the return of the deportees and the treasure within two years. This specific prediction proves to be the means for discrediting him, for of course there was no such return. Fulfillment is a test of true prophecy (Deut 18:22). It is interesting to note that according to the recently published Babylonian Chronicle, Nebuchadnezzar was at this time busy putting down a rebellion in Babylon. Probably Hananiah's friends among the deportees in Babylon sent this information to him, thus provoking his optimism to be specific. Jeconiah (v. 4). See note on 22:24.

6. Amen. May it be so (cf. 11:5 note). Jeremiah is quite willing to have the prediction come true. 7-9. Evidently Jeremiah had no word from the Lord against Hananiah at this time. So he declared that time would tell—if the prediction came to pass—whether Hananiah was sent by God or not.

10. Yoke. See note on 27:2. 12. Later Jeremiah received an answer for Hananiah. 16. Jeremiah made a counter sign (cf. v. 3). Its fulfillment meant not only the discrediting of Hananiah as a prophet, but also his death (v. 17).

5) A Letter to the Exiles. 29:1-32.

The prophets of optimism were busy among the Judeans already exiled to Babylon (those carried away after the 597 B.C. attack on Jerusalem), as well as among those still in Jerusalem. To persuade the deportees to settle in Babylon and be contented there was the purpose of this letter, doubtless written within a few years after 597 B.C.

2. Jeconiah. See note on 22:24. Carpenters . . . smiths. Nebuchadnezzar took important leaders as hostages, and also artisans (whom he gathered out of every nation he conquered) to help him rebuild and beautify Babylon. 3. Elasah the son of Shaphan. Possibly the brother of Ahikam, who protected Jeremiah from Jehoiakim (26:24), and also of Gemariah, in whose room in the Temple Baruch read Jeremiah's scroll (36:10). Gemariah the son of Hilkiah is unknown. It is very unlikely that he was Jeremiah's brother (1:1). Elasah and Gemariah were sent on an official mission to Babylon; its purpose is unknown.

5. The Hebrew exiles in Babylon were not slaves but deportees. Evidently they were free to live as they pleased. In time some became wealthy men of commerce, and others attained to high places at the court. 7. This most unusual command was made out of regard for the people's welfare. The Jews' adherence to this principle of loyalty to the government of the country in which they live is one of the reasons for their survival in the world until today.

8. Which ye cause to be dreamed. The false prophets flourished by the general encouragement of the people. 10. Seventy years. See note on 25:11. 11. An expected end. A future and a hope. Israel had both; but they were not to be realized immediately. First she must undergo purgation by fire (cf. vv. 12-14). 14. Turn away your captivity. The general meaning of the phrase is "restore your fortunes." Here it means particularly "restore you to your land." 17. Vile figs. Cf. 24:1-10. 18. To be removed. See note on 15:4. I have driven them. Here, as often in the prophets, a future event is spoken of as though it had already taken place.

21. Ahab the son of Kolaiah . . . Zedekiah the son of Maaseiah. We know nothing about these men or the incident here referred to. 22. Of them. Because of them. Roasted in the fire. Another reference to Babylonian use of this punishment occurs in Dan 3:6. 23. The Babylonians would hardly have put men to death for these reasons. These were sins against God, who delivered the men to Nebuchadnezzar, who probably put them to death for plotting to overthrow the state.

24. Shemaiah the Nehelamite. A Judean leader in Babylon who had written to the priest Zephaniah in Jerusalem, urging him to silence Jeremiah. Shemaiah is otherwise unknown. 25. Zephaniah the son of Maaseiah was a temple official (cf. 21:1; 37:3; 52:24). 26-28. The text of Shemaiah's letter. Maketh himself a prophet (v. 27). How little did Shemaiah understand the divine compulsion that drove the timid Jeremiah to do and utter what was so repugnant to him! 29. Read this letter. Evidently Zephaniah was in sympathy with Jeremiah.

C. The Book of Consolation. 30:1–33:26.

Much of Jeremiah's work was to proclaim judgment. In this section he looks beyond the nearer judgment to the Day of the Lord, Israel's restoration and salvation, and the New Covenant.

1) The Day of the Lord: Its Terror and Deliverance. 30:1-24.

The Day of the Lord will commence with great distress for Israel, but will eventuate in her regathering and salvation.

a) Introduction. 30:1-3.

The captivity is here taken for granted (cf. 23:3,4 note). There was to be a restoration to the land. Bring again the captivity (v. 3). See note on 29:14.

b) Jacob's Trouble. 30:4-7.

In the prophetic vision, the Day of the Lord begins with a time of great trouble for the nations and for Israel (Amos 5:18-20; Isa 2:12-22; 34:1-15; Zeph 1:2–3:8; Zech 14:1-8, 12-15). Israel and . . . Judah (v. 4). See note on 2:4. That day (v. 7; i.e., the Day of the Lord. Cf. Isa 13:6; Jer 46:10; Lam 2:22; Ezk 30:3; Joel 1:15; 2:1; and the references earlier in this paragraph.

c) Jacob's Deliverance. 30:8-11.

Israel shall be saved out of the trouble, freed from Gentile domination, and returned to her land, where she shall serve God and a Davidic king. This is the second part of the Day-of-the-Lord vision. Serve themselves of him (v. 8). See note on 27:7. 9. David their king. Not the resurrected David the son of Jesse, but a king of the Davidic line (Hos 3:5; Ezk 34:23). Caesar was originally the name of a Roman emperor; it became the title of his successors. Jeremiah has already indicated that Messiah will come from the Davidic line (23:5 note). 10,11. These verses are repeated at 46:27,28. My servant Jacob (v. 10). The idea that Israel is God's servant is more fully developed in Isaiah (e.g., 41:8-14; 43:1-7; 44:1,2).

d) Zion's Seemingly Incurable Wounds To Be Healed. 30:12-17.

14. Seek thee not. Do not care for you. 17. Seeketh after. Cares for.

e) Jerusalem To Be Rebuilt and Happy. 30:18-22.

18. Bring again the captivity. See note on 29:14. Heap. Hebrew, tēl. The same word is used by the Arabs today for the desolate mounds of Palestine, the sites of ancient cities. Remain after the manner thereof. Better, stand upon its rightful site. 21. Their nobles shall be of themselves. Better, their prince shall be one of themselves. Prince and governor seem to be used to avoid the more usual word "king." For who is this that engaged his heart to approach unto me? For who would dare of himself to approach me? This prince is also a priest who has the right to come to God.

23,24. The Lord's storm of vengeance.

2) The Restoration of the Nation, and the New Covenant. 31:1-40.

In preparation for the statement of the New Covenant, first Israel (vv. 1-22), and then Judah (vv. 23-30) is assured of God's love and of his purpose to regather them.

a) God To Do for Scattered Israel As He Did for the Survivors of the Exodus. 31:1-6.

1. The purpose of the Abrahamic Covenant (Gen 17:7) will finally be realized. This is the highest blessing God can give.

2. Which were left. Who escaped. In the wilderness; i.e., in the forty-year wilderness wandering (Ex 14–Deut 34).

3. Lovingkindness. See note on 9:24.

4. Virgin of Israel. See note on 14:17. Tabrets. The timbrels or hand drums, used to beat time for dances on occasions of rejoicing (cf. Ex 15:20).

5. Eat them as common things. The Hebrews did not eat the fruit for the first three years. The fruit of the fourth year was given to God. But it could be "redeemed" and eaten as a common thing (Lev 19:23-25; Deut 20:6). This verse means that Israel would be settled and living off the land in a normal condition.

6. Israel would also return to the pure worship of the Lord which became lost to her at the division of the kingdom. Mount Ephraim was the center of the Northern Kingdom. The watchman probably gave the signal for the pilgrimage.

b) Regathering of the Exiles Predicted. 31:7-14.

They will return, repentant and restored to God's favor (cf. Isa 40:3-5,9,11; 42:5-16; 43:1-21; 48:20-22; 49:8-13).

8. North country. Cf. Introduction, The Foe from the North. Coasts of the earth. Farthest parts of the earth. This seems to indicate a dispersion throughout the whole world.

10. Isles. See on 2:10. 11. Redeemed . . . ransomed. References to God's deliverance of his people from foreign bondage to the freedom of their own land. The NT usage (probably anticipated in Isa 44:22,23; 62:12) of these words in the sense of deliverance from sin is a very natural extension of the meaning. 12. Flow together. As in our English expression, "the crowd streamed into the city." Wheat . . . wine . . . oil. Symbols of the good life (cf. Ps 104:15). Watered garden. In dry Palestine, irrigation is the only guarantee of perpetual verdure (Isa 58:11).

c) Rachel and Ephraim To Be Comforted. 31:15-22.

Rachel, the mother of Joseph and Benjamin, from whom the leading tribes in the Northern Kingdom descended, is represented as weeping for the captivity of Israel; but God comforts her with the promise of their restoration.

15. Ramah (v. 16). A town about five miles north of Jerusalem, evidently the place where the captives were massed before being taken to Babylon (40:1). The prophecy represents Rachel (AV, Rahel), who pled for children (Gen 30:1) and died in sorrow (Gen 35:18,19), as weeping at Ramah to see her descendants carried away. (The place of Rachel's burial is a matter of dispute.) Matthew sees a fulfillment of this verse in the Massacre of the Innocents (Mt 2:17,18).

18,19. Ephraim prays a prayer of repentance. Ephraim is a synonym for Israel. 19. I was turned; i.e., away from God. Smote upon my thigh. A sign of great sorrow (Ezk 21:12). 20. God declares Ephraim forgiven. Bowels. Cf. 4:19 note.

21,22. The prophet admonishes Israel to prepare to return from captivity. High heaps (v. 21). Used as guide posts. Turn again. Return. Go about (v. 22). Turn hither and thither (in uncertainty). A woman shall compass a man. This statement is difficult to understand. Commentators differ widely on its meaning. It is hard to know how to translate the verb rendered in the AV compass. The view which sees here a prophecy of the virgin birth of Christ is now rejected by most. The RSV translates "a woman shall protect a man"; i.e., weak Israel shall become strong enough to protect others. Still others, "a woman shall embrace a man"; i.e., Israel shall return to her husband-God. No interpretation has ever gained the acceptance of a majority of commentators.

d) Judah Also To Be Restored. 31:23-30.

23. As yet. Yet again. Bring again their captivity. See note on 29:14. 24. Husbandmen. Farmers. In ancient Palestine, farmers and shepherds lived in the towns and went out each morning to the fields and the pastures. A situation of quiet prosperity is meant. 25. Satiated. Satisfied. Replenished. Filled (with joy). 26. The prophet appears to say this. But it is strange, for Jeremiah repudiated dreams (23:25-28).

27. Captivity resulted in the decimation of the human and animal inhabitants. In the coming day, God will repopulate the united nation (Ezk 36:8-11; Hos 1:11; 2:23). 28. To build, and to plant. Cf. 1:10. 29. A popular proverb (cf. Ezk 18:2-4). 30 For his own iniquity. A statement of the responsibility of the individual.

e) The New Covenant. 31:31-34.

The concept of the new covenant is Jeremiah's most important contribution to Biblical thought. The OT frequently mentions the covenant God made with Israel (Ex 19:3-8; 24:3-8; Deut 29:1-29), which covenant was the foundation of the Israelites' national and religious life. God makes clear, through Jeremiah, that Israel has failed to keep this covenant (7:21-26; 11:1-13) and predicts that He will make a new one with His people. The new covenant will not be a new law (the old law was still good), but it will produce a new "heart"—i.e., it will confer a new motivation to obey the law of God. Jesus, while instituting the Lord's Supper, declared, "This cup is the new covenant in my blood" (ASV, I Cor 11:25; cf. Lk 22:20). The Hebrews epistle teaches that Christ brought in the new covenant by his perfect and final sacrifice for sin (Heb 7:22; 8:7-13; 10:15-22; cf. II Cor 3:5-14).

31. The days come. An eschatological formula. The Day of the Lord is meant (cf. 30:7 note). 32. Covenant that I made with their fathers. The covenant made at Sinai, renewed at the Plains of Moab (cf. references in introductory paragraph above). I was a husband; i.e., I was faithful to them, even though they were unfaithful to me. 33. In their hearts. The old covenant was written upon stone (Ex 31:18). Only the new covenant, written upon the heart, can accomplish what the old one sought to bring about: "I . . . will be your God, and ye shall be my people" (Lev 26:12; cf. Ezk 36:25-27). 34. Know me. This knowledge is intimate, experiential, based on the forgiveness of sins.

f) Israel To Remain Forever. 31:35-37.

The survival of the Hebrew people, long after their neighbors have perished, is hardly explainable on any but supernaturalistic grounds.

g) Jerusalem To Be Rebuilt and Holy. 31:38-40.

38. To the Lord. No mere nationalism is here; the city is dedicated to God, holy (v. 40). Tower of Hananeel. At the northeast corner (Neh 3:1; 12:39; Zech 14:10). Gate of the corner; i.e., the northwest corner (II Kgs 14:13; II Chr 26:9). 39. Hill Gareb . . . Goath. Unknown; probably they indicate the southwest and southeast extremities of the city. 40. Valley of the dead bodies. The Valley of Hinnom (cf. 7:31 note). The brook Kidron is the eastern boundary of Jerusalem, and flows into the Valley of Hinnom. The horse gate seems to have been at the southeast corner of the city.

3) Jeremiah's Redemption of a Field in Anathoth. 32:1-44.

By this action, which took place during the final siege of Jerusalem, Jeremiah showed his faith in the restoration to Palestine after the captivity. The law of redemption commanded that if a needy Hebrew was about to sell his land to pay for his debts, his near relative should redeem the land—i.e., buy it back for him. Jeremiah's action takes on added significance when it is recalled that Anathoth had already fallen into enemy hands; thus his action would have been meaningless apart from the hope of a restoration.

a) God's Command. 32:1-8.

1. Tenth year. Jerusalem fell the next year. Already it was under siege. 2. The story of Jeremiah's imprisonment is told in 37:11-21. 7. Redemption. Cf. introductory paragraph above; Lev 25:23-28. Anathoth. Jeremiah's birthplace (cf. 1:1 note).

b) The Redemption of the Land. 32:9-15.

An interesting example of a business transaction of that time.

9. Weighed. Since there was no coined money, payments were made by weighing out precious metal. Seventeen shekels. About seven ounces. Probably the field was small. 10. Subscribed the evidence. Signed the deed. Witnesses were always important for legal transactions. Cf. an earlier real estate transaction, where no writing was done, Ruth 4:1-12. Balances. Scales. 11. Two copies of the deed were made, probably on papyrus. One was rolled up and sealed to prevent tampering, the other left unsealed for ready reference.

12. Baruch. The first mention of Jeremiah's secretary, who wrote much of the Book of Jeremiah under the prophet's direction. 15. Possessed. Bought.

c) Jeremiah's Reaction of Doubt. 32:16-25.

The purchase made, a wave of doubt swept over the prophet, and he prayed in anguish of spirit. His prayer is somewhat similar to the prayer of the Levites reported in Neh 9:6-38.

18. Lovingkindness. See note on 9:24. 20. Signs and wonders in . . . Egypt. Cf. Ex 7:8–12:36. Unto this day. Probably this phrase modifies the statement which succeeds it. 24. Mounts. (Siege) mounds. Chaldeans. See note on 21:4. 25. The prayer breaks off as the prophet feels the incongruity of his "playing at business as usual" when the land is lost to the Babylonians. Yet he will not state his doubt more fully.

d) God's Gracious Reply. 32:26-44.

The Lord comforts and reassures his prophet by telling him that although the city will fall as he has been predicting, there will be a restoration, when people will again buy and sell in the land of Judah.

27. With great kindness God urges Jeremiah to greater faith by taking up the prophet's own statement (v. 17) and asking it of him as a question, as if to say, "Jeremiah, do you really believe what you have said?" 34. Abominations; i.e., idols. There were idols even in the Jerusalem Temple (cf. Ezk 8:3-11). 35. See notes on 7:29,31; 19:13. 38-40. See notes on 31:31-34. 44. Mountains. See note on 17:26. Valley. The Shephelah (cf. 17:26 note). South. The Negev (cf. 13:19 note). Cause their captivity to return. See note on 29:14.

4) More Promises of Restoration. 33:1-26.

The themes introduced in Jeremiah 31 are here repeated. This chapter records revelations Jeremiah received during the final siege of Jerusalem.

a) Rebuilt Jerusalem To Be Holy. 33:1-9.

2. The maker thereof. Maker of what? Probably the earth is meant. Lord. See note on Ex 3:14. 3. Mighty. Hidden. 4. By the mounts . . . by the sword. Better, for the mounts . . . for the sword. Buildings near the wall were destroyed so that the soldiers defending the city might have more space in which to maneuver (cf. 32:24 note). 7. Captivity . . . to return. See note on 29:14. As at the first. Before the kingdom was split after the death of Solomon. 8. I will cleanse them. Cf. 31:34. 9. It; i.e., Jerusalem (cf. 32:40-42).

b) Devastated Jerusalem To Revive. 33:10-13.

11. See note on 25:10. Praise the Lord. A liturgical refrain used in the temple services (Ps 135:1). Return the captivity. See note on 29:14. 12. An habitation of shepherds. A picture of quiet peace. 13. Mountains. See note on 17:26. Vale. The Shephelah (cf. 17:26 note). South. The Negev (cf. 13:19 note). Telleth. Counts.

c) Davidic Kings and Levitical Priests and Israelites Never To Be Cut Off. 33:14-26.

15,16. These verses repeat 23:5,6, for which see notes. 21. God's covenant with David is stated in II Sam 7:8-16. See note on 23:5. 24. Two families; i.e., Israel and Judah.

D. Some of Jeremiah's Experiences Before Jerusalem Fell. 34:1–36:32.

These events illustrate the depths to which king and people had plunged, and thus prepare the way for the account of the destruction of Jerusalem which follows.

1) An Oracle to Zedekiah. 34:1-7.

This warning was delivered in the reign of Zedekiah, while Jerusalem was under attack. It contains the frequently repeated warnings of national defeat, with a promise to the king.

1. Jerusalem. Here, as often in the Bible, the name of the capital city stands for the whole nation, as, e.g., Tyre and Sidon are used for Phoenicia, Damascus for Syria, etc.

5. These words of promise hardly seem to have been fulfilled. Zedekiah's eyes were put out, and he died in a Babylonian prison (39:7; 52:8-11; II Kgs 25:5-7; Ezk 12:13). It seems that this is a conditional promise, dependent upon the king's surrender to the Babylonians. Since Zedekiah refused to obey, his end was a worse one. Burn odours. The burning of incense was a part of the funeral ceremony.

7. Lachish. An important town in the Shephelah (cf. 17:26 note), twenty-three miles southwest of Jerusalem (modern Tell ed-Duweir). It guarded a valley road that led to Jerusalem, and hence it was important for the defense of the capital. Graphic evidence of its destruction by the Babylonian army has been found by its excavators. (For the Lachish letters, cf. Introduction, The Lachish Letters.) Azekah. Another Shephelah town important for the defense of a road to Jerusalem. It is modern Tell ez-Zakariyeh, eighteen miles west-southwest of Jerusalem, some eleven miles north of Lachish. Both of these cities would have to fall before Jerusalem could be successfully reduced.

2) The Broken Covenant Regarding Hebrew Slaves. 34:8-22.

During the siege of Jerusalem, the people promised to release their Hebrew slaves, hoping thus to obtain God's favor. But when the Babylonians were temporarily distracted from the siege by the approach of an Egyptian army (37:6-11), and withdrew from the city, the people took their slaves back again, thus earning Jeremiah's castigation.

9. None should serve himself of . . . his brother. Hebrew slaves (usually taken for debt) could be held only six years; on the seventh they must be set free (Ex 21:2; Deut 15:1,12-15). It seems that this law (like that of the Sabbatical year, II Chr 36:21) was seldom kept. In a wave of repentance, all slaves held more than six years were released. Probably, with the city now under siege and the fields outside inaccessible, the slaves were an economic liability, with the owners unable to feed them.

14. Seven years. Actually six years. But here the year of liberation is included (cf. Deut 15:1,12).

18. When they cut the calf in twain, and passed between the parts thereof. An interesting allusion to the manner of ratifying a covenant. A sacrificial victim was cut in half, and the contracting parties walked together between the parts prior to the offering of the sacrifice (cf. Gen 15:9-17). This probably accounts for the fact that the Hebrew verb regularly used for making a covenant literally means to cut.

3) The Example of the Rechabites. 35:1-19.

Jeremiah's moral drawn from the strange behavior of the sons of Jonadab the son of Rechab was delivered in the reign of Jehoiakim.

a) The Rechabites' Refusal To Drink Wine. 35:1-11.

The Rechabites were a puritan group, the followers of Jonadab the son of Rechab (II Kgs 10:15,16,23). They followed the desert ideal, seeking to abstain from what to them appeared to be the degenerating influences of settled town life—farming, wine, and houses. The Lord praises them not for their strange ideals, but for the tenacity with which they stuck to what they believed to be right.

2. House of the Rechabites; i.e., the Rechabite clan. 3,4. The persons here named are unknown, except that Maaseiah may have been the father of the priest Zephaniah mentioned in 21:1; 29:25; 37:3. 6. Our father. Used in the extended Semitic sense of "founder" of the order. 11. So we dwell at Jerusalem. Probably in tents still. However, it was now impossible to keep their vow absolutely.

b) Jeremiah's Sermon on the Rechabites. 35:12-17.

19. Contrast the curse pronounced upon Jeconiah (22:30). Even today, in Syria and Arabia, there are groups that claim to be Rechabites and that follow the Rechabite rule.

4) Jeremiah's Prophecies Dictated to Baruch. 36:1-32.

This chapter is of great interest in that it gives the only detailed OT description of the writing of a prophetic book. That Jeremiah should have dictated to a secretary was normal for the times. Writing was a specialized skill, often restricted to a professional class. Learned men could read, but (like executives today) scorned to write. The book was dictated in Jehoiakim's fourth year. This 'first edition' of the book was burned; immediately the prophet issued a 'new edition' with additions (v. 32). The odd order of materials in our present Book of Jeremiah may be due to this manner of composition—a short original work, with frequent revisions.

a) The Scroll Written by Baruch. 36:1-7.

2. A roll of a book. A blank scroll, probably of papyrus imported from Egypt. Our present book form ("codex") originated in early Christian times. 4. Baruch the son of Neriah. Jeremiah's secretary, thought to have been of a prominent family (32:12,13,16; 51:59). 5. I am shut up. Better, I am detained. We do not know whether it was some ritual impurity or physical restraint from his enemies that kept Jeremiah from going to the Temple himself. 6. Fasting day. A fast had been proclaimed on account of some now unknown calamity. This would have ensured a crowd to hear the reading.

b) The Scroll Read Aloud by Baruch. 36:8-21.

9. Fifth year . . . ninth month. This was December, 605 B.C. It is believed by some that the king's regnal year was at this time reckoned from the autumn (beginning with the seventh month). If this is so, the king's fourth year had ended only two months before, and no very long time need have elapsed between the writing (cf. 6:1) and the reading of the book. 10. Gemariah the son of Shaphan was a brother of Ahikam (26:24; 39:14; II Kgs 22:8-14). Evidently this was a pious family of nobles.

11,12. Concerning these princes, see note on 26:10. 17. At his mouth. Jeremiah is not mentioned here but understood. The nobles were fearful for Jeremiah, but sympathetic with him, and they sought to protect him (v. 19).

c) The Scroll Burned by the King. 36:22-26.

22. Winter-house. Probably a sheltered part of the palace, facing the sun. Hearth. Better, brazier. The rainy season in the Judean hill country is cool, with occasional light snows, as well as rain. 23. Leaves. Better, columns. A scroll was composed of papyrus leaves pasted together, with the writing on the inner side of the scroll in columns. When a few columns had been read, the king cut them off and burned them.

24. Baruch was struck with the lack of reverence of the men for the scroll. In time past, when Josiah heard the Law scroll read, "he rent his clothes" (II Kgs 22:11). It seems that Baruch regarded Jeremiah's scroll to be equally Scripture with the Law which had so impressed Josiah.

26. Hammelech. Literally, the king. But Jehoiakim was probably too young to have an adult son at this time. Perhaps this is an honorific title. Seraiah. See note on 51:59.

d) A Second Edition Dictated by Jeremiah. 36:27-32.

30. None to sit upon the throne of David. Jehoiakim's son, the last of his descendants to rule, reigned three months. Dead body. The manner of Jehoiakim's death is nowhere stated. On the ground of this verse, it is believed that this wicked king may have died in a palace coup or a popular uprising (cf. 22:19).

32. Many like words. The burning of the first scroll could not destroy the oracles; it only led to more words of judgment.

E. Jeremiah During the Siege and Destruction of Jerusalem. 37:1–39:18.

This section tells of Jeremiah's fortunes during the last days of the Judean kingdom. Chapters 21; 32–34 also give information about this period.

1) Jeremiah Imprisoned. 37:1-21.

There is no reason to believe that the prophet meant to go over to the Babylonians when he sought to leave the city during the brief lifting of the siege. But his people, to whom he seemed a hateful quisling, so interpreted his action, and therefore he was cast into a dungeon.

1. Zedekiah. See note on 1:3. Reigned. The Hebrew expression is unusual: literally, And Zedekiah reigned (as) king. Zedekiah, uncle of Jehoiachin (Coniah), probably was considered a regent in the place of his nephew, who had been carried off to Babylon. Whom Nebuchadrezzar . . . made king refers to Zedekiah, not to Coniah (II Kgs 24:17).

a) Jeremiah's Prediction of the Return of the Chaldeans and the Fall of the City. 37:3-10. (Cf. 21:1-10, where a different situation is referred to.)

3. Jehucal the son of Shelemiah, called Jucal in 38:1, was opposed to Jeremiah. Zephaniah the son of Maaseiah. See note on 29:25. Pray now. Zedekiah was not a strong-willed, wicked man like Jehoiakim. He was rather a weak, vacillating man, usually led the wrong way by the evil nobles who had come to power during the reign of Jehoiakim. He seems to have had a superstitious respect for Jeremiah, as his request here indicates.

5. Pharaoh. He is named Pharaohhophra in 44:30. An alliance with Hophra probably encouraged Zedekiah to rebel. Now Pharaoh came to his aid, but, soon after, the Babylonians defeated the Egyptians and returned to Jerusalem.

b) Jeremiah Imprisoned. 37:11-15.

12. To separate himself thence. The Hebrew is difficult to construe. It is often translated to receive his portion there. The portion could not be the land referred to in 32:8, for the events of that chapter had not yet taken place. Probably he was bound for Anathoth. 13. Gate of Benjamin. A gate on the north side of the city, leading to the land of Benjamin (cf. 38:7). Captain of the ward. Sentinel. Irijah. Otherwise unknown. It is interesting to see how all the characters in the moving drama of Jeremiah's ministry are named, even to a humble sentry. 15. The princes. See note on 37:3. The house of Jonathan. Perhaps the regular prisons were full of political prisoners.

c) Zedekiah's Secret Meeting with Jeremiah. 37:16-21.

16. Cabins. Cells. 17-20. Another dramatic situation, in which the prophet neither flinches nor grovels. 21. Court of the prison. This was in the palace complex (cf. 32:2). Piece of bread. Better, a loaf of bread. Bakers' street. In ancient cities (and in the Old City of Jerusalem today) each business had its own street or quarter (cf. 18:2 note). Until . . . the bread . . . were spent. Because of the scarcity caused by the siege.

2) Jeremiah Rescued from a Cistern by Ebed-melech. 38:1-28.

These events seem to have taken place after those of the previous chapter, near the end of the siege, when, in desperation, the anti-Babylonian clique at court sought to rid themselves of their most vigorous opponent. Zedekiah appears weak, but not unfriendly to the prophet. His final interview with Jeremiah is here also recorded.

a) Jeremiah's Rescue. 38:1-13.

1. Gedaliah the son of Pashur. He may have been the son of the Pashur who earlier beat Jeremiah and put him in stocks (20:1-6). Jucal the son of Shelemiah. Cf. 37:3. Pashur the son of Malchiah. See note on 21:1. 2. This verse is almost identical with 21:9. 4. He weakeneth the hands of the men of war; i.e., Jeremiah is a traitor. The same accusation is made in one of the Lachish letters against certain people in Jerusalem (cf. Introduction, The Lachish Letters). 5. He is in your hand. This reveals Zedekiah's weakness. 6. Dungeon. Better, cistern. Jerusalem was full of cisterns, where water was collected during the rainy season for use during the months when no rain fell (May to October). Jeremiah was thrown into a nearly empty cistern and left to suffocate or starve. Malchiah the son of Hammelech. Perhaps the father of the Pashur of verse 1. Hammelech. See note on 36:26.

7. Ebed-melech the Ethiopian. Ebed-melech means servant of the king, but this man was not a slave. Eunuch is too narrow a translation for the Hebrew sārîs, which means an "officer" or "palace official." Still, it is to be doubted whether he was an important official. It is in keeping with the melancholy temper of this book that only a despised foreigner cared enough for the prophet to risk trouble in saving him (cf. 39:15-18). Gate of Benjamin. See note on 37:13. 10. Thirty men. The number seems unnecessarily large and the grammatical construction is unusual, as if the number had been changed. One Hebrew manuscript and the LXX read three men, which is probably the original number. 12. This thoughtfulness stands in direct contrast to the venomous hatred shown the prophet by his fellow Judeans.

b) Zedekiah's Final Meeting with Jeremiah. 38:14-28.

17. Thy soul shall live. Thy life shall be spared. The basic meaning of nepesh is "life." The word occurs twice in verse 16, once translated "soul," once "life" (cf. v. 20). 19. Some Jews had surrendered (39:9; 52:15). The king feared that the Chaldeans might give him to them for torture. 22. A conquering king always took possession of his defeated enemy's harem (cf. II Sam 16:21,22). The second half of the verse represents the women of the royal harem as speaking an oracle as they are led away.

26. Jonathan's house. See note on 37:15.

3) The Fall of Jerusalem. 39:1-18.

The capture and destruction of the city are described in greater detail in Jeremiah 52, except that the contents of 39:3,14 are not found there. For comment see notes on chapter 52.

3. A large clay prism found at Babylon, which lists high officials of the Babylonian court, helps us to understand these names. Three persons are mentioned: Nergal-sharezer (whose office is) Shamgar (meaning unknown); Nebo-Sarsechim (whose office is) Rab-saris (chief of the eunuchs—a high office); and Nergal-sharezer (whose office is) Rab-mag (meaning unknown); Nergal-sharezer was Nebuchadnezzar's son-in-law and second successor.

9. Nebuzar-adan was a general. This name has been found in several Babylonian lists, with the title "Chief Baker." As the name was a common one in this period, we cannot be sure that the Biblical person is identical with the one mentioned in these lists.

13. See note on verse 3. 14. Gedaliah the son of Ahikam. Cf. 40:5.

The oracle concerning Ebed-melech. 39:15-18. While he was shut up (v. 15). Before the city fell (cf. 38:13). Ebed-melech (v. 16). See note on 38:7. Men of whom thou art afraid (v. 17). Perhaps Zedekiah's princes, who may well have been planning their revenge against the one who had saved Jeremiah's life.

F. The Last Years of Jeremiah. 40:1—45:5.

Jeremiah's old age was as pathetic as his earlier life. Left to remain in Judah after the fall of Jerusalem, he was taken to Egypt against his wishes, and died in that idolatrous place.

1) The Administration of Gedaliah, and His Murder. 40:1—41:18.

II Kings 25:22-26 gives a summary of these events.

a) Jeremiah's Release When the City Fell. 40:1-6.

It is difficult to reconcile the statement here that Jeremiah was released after being held a prisoner at Ramah with the inference of 39:13,14 that the Babylonian princes freed him from the Jerusalem prison to the custody of Gedaliah. Perhaps the inference is unfounded, and 39:14 takes for granted the Ramah episode.

1. Nebuzar-adan. See note on 52:12. Ramah. A Benjamite town a few miles north of Jerusalem. Probably the captives were interrogated and screened there prior to their deportation. 2-4. This speech, couched in Jewish theological language, is not so unlikely in a Babylonian mouth as it might at first seem. It appears that the Assyrians studied the theology of the people whom they attacked for use in psychological warfare (II Kgs 18:22,33-35). And the Babylonians had surely heard of the strange, quisling prophet within the Jerusalem walls and his seeming pro-Babylonian speeches. Since he had served them so well (as they thought), the Babylonians purposed to let him go free. Jeremiah's proud Hebrew heart must have rebelled at the inference that he was on their side, but he accepted his freedom.

5. Gedaliah the son of Ahikam. A man of high birth, a grandson of one of Josiah's nobles. The Babylonians made him puppet governor of the subjugated and largely desolate province of Judah. A seal from this period, found at Lachish, mentions a Gedaliah who was "over the house"; i.e., a palace governor (cf. Isa 36:3). This may well have been the same Gedaliah mentioned in these verses. 6. Mizpah. Only a few poor farmers were left (52:16). They settled at Mizpah, near Ramah (cf. 40:1), a place a few miles north of Jerusalem, sometimes identified with Tell en-Nasbeh, recently excavated. This place was not so thoroughly destroyed by the Babylonians that it could not have served as a refuge after the destruction of Jerusalem. There was found there a beautifully carved seal with the name of its owner, "Ya'azanyahu servant (officer) of the king," perhaps the Jezaniah of II Kgs 25:23 and Jer 40:8.

b) Gedaliah's Governorship. 40:7-12.

Gedaliah was a good ruler and probably had Jeremiah's support. His governorship is believed to have lasted about five years (cf. 52:30 note). It was brought to an end by his assassination. This was carried out by the same desperate group that had goaded Judah on to her fateful resistance to the Babylonians prior to Jerusalem's fall.

7. Forces . . . in the fields; i.e., Jewish military units still uncaptured. 8. Seraiah. See note on 51:59; cf. II Kgs 25:23. Jezaniah. See note on 40:8. 9. Gedaliah sought to quiet these explosive resistance forces by promising that if they submitted, their lives would be safe. 10. Mizpah. See note on 40:6. Jerusalem was destroyed in the middle of the summer. There was still time to make wine, gather the late summer fruits (cf. 8:20 note) and olives, and so keep from starving during that first desolate winter. In this they were successful.

c) Gedaliah's Life Threatened. 40: 13-16.

The welfare of the little salvaged community depended on their submission to Babylon and their support of Gedaliah. Johanan knew that Ishmael, sponsored by the Ammonites and probably also by the pro-Egypt party, was seeking to kill Gedaliah, but the latter refused to take the necessary precautions.

d) Gedaliah Assassinated by Ishmael. 41:1-3.

Seventh month (v. 1). October. The seed royal. Perhaps in addition to being an anti-Babylonian extremist, Ishmael wished to avenge the indignities done to King Zedekiah, his relative.

e) The Massacre of Seventy Pilgrims. 41:4-9.

This brutal slaying, for which no good motive can be given, shows the desperation of Ishmael and his band.

5. Pilgrims from the towns which had been in the Northern Kingdom were on their way to Jerusalem. Shaven . . . rent . . . cut themselves. Indications of mourning, probably for the fall of Jerusalem and the destruction of the Temple (cf. 16:5 note). 7. Pit. Compare note on verse 9. 8. Treasures in the field. Cisterns in the field were frequently used as storage places. They could easily be covered over and concealed, an advantage at this time of great political unrest. 9. Pit. See note on 14:3. King Asa had fortified Mizpah against Baasha, king of Israel (I Kgs 15:22). Cisterns to provide water during siege were vital for fortress cities. At Tell en-Nasbeh (cf. 40:6 note) fifty-three such cisterns have been found.

f) The Remaining People Carried Off and Returned. 41:10-18.

Ishmael, who was in league with the Ammonite king (40:14), carried off the Mizpah refugees, intending to take them to the Ammonites. But Johanan, with certain Jewish forces, rescued them, and they went south to a place near Bethlehem.

12. The great waters; i.e., a great pool. Referred to in II Sam 2:13. Gibeon is modern El-jib, some three miles southwest of Tell en-Nasbeh (40:6 note). Recent excavations there have disclosed an involved waterworks system, with a large storage cistern. 14. Cast about. Turned around. 17. Habitation of Chimham. The place is unknown. To go to enter into Egypt. The people feared that even though innocent of anti-Babylon activity themselves, they would suffer for Ishmael's murder of Gedaliah and the Babylonian garrison.

2) Migration of the Refugees to Egypt. 42:1—43:7.

a) Jeremiah Asked To Seek Counsel from God. 42:1-6.

The people feared to stay in Palestine, but hesitated to leave their homeland for the protection of a foreign nation. Jezaniah the son of Hoshaiah (v. 1). Not the same as the Jezaniah of 40:8. He may be identical with the Azariah the son of Hoshaiah of 43:2, for the two names have a similar meaning.

b) The Prophet's Warning Against Going to Egypt. 42:7-22.

7. After ten days. Even though the request was urgent, Jeremiah had to wait until he was certain that he had the divine reply. He dared not confuse his own desire to stay at home with God's will. 10. Repent. See note on 18: 18. 20. For ye dissembled in your hearts. Taken at face value these words seem to say that the Jews asked Jeremiah's advice hypocritically, already having determined their course. But many translate, For you err at the cost of your lives. In going to Egypt, you will lose everything (cf. v. 22).

c) Jeremiah Taken Along to Egypt by the People. 43:1-7.

Restless after ten days of waiting, the refugees disregarded Jeremiah's warning and migrated to Egypt. They took Jeremiah and Baruch with them against their will. Evidently Jeremiah died in Egypt.

2. Azariah the son of Hoshaiah. See note on 42:1. 3. Baruch the son of Neriah. See note on 36:4. There is no evidence in this book to confirm the opinion of the people that Baruch unduly influenced the now elderly Jeremiah. 5. Returned from all nations. The war that culminated in the destruction of Jerusalem had caused many Jews to scatter for safety to the surrounding nations. Some of these had now returned to their land. 6. Nebuzar-adan. See note on 52:12. Gedaliah the son of Ahikam. See note on 40:5. Jeremiah. It seems clear that Jeremiah went unwillingly. Whether force or a sense of duty to his irresponsive fellow countrymen impelled him is not known. 7. Tahpanhes. See note on 2:16.

3) Jeremiah in Egypt. 43:8–44:30.

Jeremiah's life in Egypt seems to have been an unhappy one. The land was filled with idols; his own people were not sympathetic with him; and he could hardly expect good treatment at the hands of the government when his political attitudes voiced during Judah's last years became known.

a) Jeremiah's Prediction of Nebuchadnezzar's Conquest of Egypt. 43:8-13.

Another symbolic action of the prophet. Our knowledge of the neo-Babylonian empire is quite fragmentary. While we do not have enough extra-Biblical information at the present time to confirm the fact that Nebuchadnezzar actually conquered Egypt, we do know that he invaded it. The fact that this prophecy was left in this book by the next generation argues for knowledge on their part (now lost to us) of a reduction of the land by Nebuchadnezzar.

9. The clay in the brickkiln. Better, the mortar of the quadrangle (or pavement). Sir Flinders Petrie, who excavated Tell Defenneh, found a large paved area which he believed to be the one referred to here. It was situated in front of what he identified as Pharaoh's house, and was probably used as an unloading and storage area. 10. My servant. See note on 25:9.

12. Carry them away captives. Idols were frequently carried in the triumphal processions of conquering kings. Array himself . . . putteth on. These are translations of the same Hebrew verb. The meaning seems to be that Nebuchadnezzar would have Egypt so completely under his control that he would wrap himself with that land as a shepherd wraps himself in his robe in the cool night. 13. Beth-shemesh. The Hebrew for "the House of the Sun," ancient Heliopolis, modern Tell Husn, near Cairo. Re, the sun-god, was worshiped there in ancient times. The images are obelisks. One of the Heliopolis obelisks is now in Central Park in New York City, another on the Thames Embankment in London. Both are wrongly called "Cleopatra's Needle."

b) Idolatry of the Egyptian Jews Condemned. 44:1-14.

1. Migdol. On the northeastern border of Egypt, probably modern Tell el-Heir, eleven miles south of Pelusium. Tahpanhes. See note on 2:16. Noph was called Memphis by the ancient Egyptians. Located near the apex of the Delta, it was an important center of Egyptian life, having been capital of the nation in earlier days. The god Ptah, the creator god, patron of artisans and sculptors, was worshiped here. The country of Pathros. Upper (or southern) Egypt—the land south of the Delta. The fact that some Jews had migrated south shows that they quickly became dispersed throughout the land. A little later there was a colony of Jewish mercenary soldiers at Elephantine, modern Aswan on the Ethiopian border.

7. Against your souls. Against yourselves. 14. Such as shall escape. Some refugees (cf. 44:28).

c) The Response of the Jews. 44:15-19.

This blatant confession of trust in the Queen of Heaven is characteristic of the people to whom Jeremiah had preached all his life.

15. Their wives. The women seem to have been especially devoted to the Queen of Heaven, perhaps because she was thought to bring the desired fertility. Pathros. See note on 44:1. 17. The queen of heaven. See note on 7:18. For then had we plenty. In the opinion of these women, Josiah's reform, which excluded the previously practiced idolatry (II Kgs 23), was the cause of the nation's downfall. 19. To worship her. Better, in her image (cf. 7:18 note). Without our men; i.e., the husbands, too, approved of these sentiments.

d) Jeremiah's Warning Concluded. 44:20-28.

26. My name shall no more be named. Because the Jews in Egypt would perish. Later on, during the Inter-Testamental Period, there was a large Jewish population in Egypt, worshiping the Lord. Perhaps this is an example of the conditional character of judgment prophecy. The Jews repented of their idolatry and were spared.

e) Pharaoh-hophra's Downfall a Sign of Disaster to the Egyptian Jews. 44:29, 30.

Pharaoh-hophra reigned from 588 to 569 B.C. (cf. 37:5 note). Jeremiah said Pharaoh would be captured by his enemies, as was Zedekiah. One of his officials, Amasis, revolting against his rule, finally killed him and succeeded him.

4) Jeremiah's Oracle to Baruch. 45:1-5.

Baruch, like his master, became discouraged in the work. Evidently he was also tempted to seek "great things." Perhaps he aspired to influence Jeremiah (cf. 43:3). At any rate, he is here encouraged and warned. Surely his giving Jeremiah's memoirs to the world has brought him legitimate fame.

1. Baruch the son of Neriah. See note on 32:12. These words. Evidently Jeremiah 36 is referred to. Compare the date mentioned in this verse with that in 36:1. 5. Thy life will I give unto thee for a prey. Although Baruch would suffer, his life would be spared.

III. Jeremiah's Oracles Against Foreign Nations. 46:1–51:64.

The Hebrew prophet characteristically had a word for neighboring nations of the Hebrews as well as for the Chosen People themselves. Jeremiah was ordained "a prophet unto the nations" (1:5) and was set "over the nations and over the kingdoms" (1:10). In the last part of this book are gathered together his prophetic indictments of the Gentiles, given at various times. The Greek Bible places these oracles immediately after 25:13.

A. Oracle Against Egypt. 46:1-28.

1) Superscription. 46:1. This verse forms a heading for the whole section 46:1–51:64.

2) Song on Nebuchadnezzar's Victory over Pharaoh-necho at Carchemish. 46:2-12.

2. In Carchemish. A wealthy commercial city, situated near the ford of the Euphrates in northern Syria. It had been a Hittite center in earlier days and was later dominated by the Assyrians. After the collapse of the Assyrian empire, it became the point where the Egyptian and Babylonian powers frequently clashed. The battle of Carchemish (605 B.C.) was one of the decisive battles of history. The Egyptians sought here to curb the rising power of Babylon and bolster the almost destroyed Assyrian empire. The Egyptians were defeated, and Nebuchadnezzar's pursuit of Necho toward Egypt was brought to an end only by the news of the death of his father Nabopolassar. He hurried back to Babylon to become the new king. From this time the Assyrian empire ceased to exist, and Babylon dominated not only Mesopotamia but all of the Levant.

4. Brigandines. Breastplates, i.e., protective armor. 5. For fear was round about. See note on 6:25. 7. As a flood. As the Nile. The word translated "flood" in the AV is y'ʾōr, an Egyptian loan word meaning the Nile River. It is frequently used in connection with the Egyptian plagues (Ex 7,8). The Egyptian armies are here likened to the Nile during its annual inundation. 8. Flood. See note on 46:7. 9. Ethiopians, Libyans, Lydians. Allies of the Egyptians in the battle (cf. Ezk 30:5). The Ethiopians (Hebrew Kush) occupied the upper Nile region, and seem to have become involved in the Egyptian scene increasingly toward the end of Egypt's greatness (cf. II Chr 14:9-15; II Kgs 19:9; Isa 37:9). The Libyans lived west of Egypt, along the Mediterranean. Lydians. This term usually refers to a kingdom of Asia Minor. Its meaning here is not clear.

10. The day of the Lord God of hosts. This expression occurs nowhere else in Jeremiah. Here (as in Joel 1:15; 2:1) the day of the Lord means the day of God's judgment upon a nation, and does not refer to the judgment preceding the Messianic Day. 11. Balm. See note on 8:22.

3) Nebuchadnezzar's Devastation of Egypt. 46:13-26. Cf. 43:8 note.

14. For these places, see notes at 43:7; 44:1.

15. The RSV translates this verse: Why has Apis fled? Why did not your bull stand? Because the Lord thrust him down. Those who translate thus divide the word for swept away (AV) into two words. If this division is correct, this is the only mention in the Bible of Apis, the bull-god of Egypt. The image of this god was often carried into battle, and his influence on the Hebrews is probably seen in the golden calf made by Aaron (Ex 32:4,5) and Jeroboam's similar image (I Kgs 12:28,29).

17. He hath passed the time appointed.

Better, he has let the appointed time pass by. Perhaps this means that Pharaoh procrastinated and out of fear let pass by the opportune moment for successful battle. 18. Tabor and Carmel are prominent mountains in northern Palestine. The road to Egypt runs by them. He (i.e., Nebuchadnezzar) shall come to Egypt as surely as these peaks stand in Palestine.

19. Daughter; i.e., the Egyptians (cf. v. 11). Noph. See note on 2:16. 20. Destruction. Better, a gadfly. A stinging insect will come to plague the fair heifer. 21. Hired men; i.e., mercenary soldiers.

22. The voice thereof shall go like a serpent. Better, her sound is like that of a serpent going.

23. It cannot be searched. It is impenetrable. Grasshoppers. For the severity of a locust plague, see notes on Joel 1:1–2:27.

25. The multitude of No. Better, Amun of Thebes. The god Amun, by this time identified with Re, the sun-god, was worshiped at Thebes (modern Luxor). He was now almost a national god (cf. Nah 3:8). Them that trust in him; i.e., Egypt's satellite states. 26. Afterward it shall be inhabited. Egypt will be restored and not become a perpetual ruin (cf. Ezk 29:13-15).

4) Israel's Salvation. 46:27,28.

The prophets frequently add a favorable oracle concerning Israel after a denunciation of a foreign nation (cf. Ob 17-21). These verses are also found in Jer 30:10,11 (cf. notes there).

B. Oracle Against the Philistines. 47:1-7.

The Philistines inhabited that part of the coastal area of Palestine called the Philistine Plain. Their five cities were Ekron, Ashdod, Ashkelon, Gaza, and Gath. Although David subjugated the Philistines to some extent, during the Divided Kingdom their cities maintained their independence of Judah. On the Assyrian inscriptions they are mentioned as formidable peoples. The many campaigns fought in the Philistine Plain from the Assyrian period through the time of Alexander the Great caused the gradual attrition of the Philistines. Those who were left were conquered by the Maccabees (second half of the second century B.C.) and absorbed into the Hebrew people. Other oracles against the Philistines are found in Amos 1:6-8; Isa 14:28-31; Ezk 25:15-17; Zeph 2:4-7.

1. Before...Pharaoh smote Gaza. Perhaps this occurred during the campaign in which Josiah lost his life at Megiddo (II Kgs 23:29,30). 2. Out of the north. The Babylonians were a menace not to Judah alone, but to the whole Levant. See Introduction, The Foe from the North.

4. Tyrus and Zidon. Tyre and Sidon were the chief Phoenician cities, located on the coast of what is now Lebanon. They were great centers of maritime trade, and vigorously resisted Assyrian and Babylonian conquest. Although friendly with the Hebrews during the United Kingdom, they later became bitter enemies. Some prophetic oracles against them are: Amos 1:9,10; Joel 3:4-8; Isa 23:15-18; Jer 27:1-11; Ezk 26–28. Why Tyre and Sidon are mentioned in connection with the Philistines is not known; possibly they were allies. The remnant of the country of Caphtor. Caphtor is usually identified with Crete, the supposed home of the Philistines before their migration to Palestine (Amos 9:7; Deut 2:23).

5. Baldness. Perhaps a figurative statement indicating that Gaza would be razed to the ground. Or possibly it is a sign of mourning for destruction (cf. 16:5 note). With the remnant of their valley. This phrase is difficult to understand. The LXX reads, O remnant of the Anakim, which represents a change of only one Hebrew letter. The Anakim were aboriginal dwellers in Palestine (cf. Josh 11:21,22). Cut thyself. See note on 16:5. 7. The sea shore; i.e., the Philistine Plain.

C. Oracle Against Moab. 48:1-47.

The Moabites were descendants of Moab, Lot's son (Gen 19:37). They lived in Trans-Jordan, east of the Dead Sea. Close neighbors of the Hebrews, they were frequently in conflict with them; for the Hebrews claimed control over the Moabite territory, and asserted this claim when they were strong. Nebuchadnezzar subjugated the Moabites, who then disappeared as a nation. Other prophetic oracles against Moab are: Isa 15; 16; Jer 9:26; 25:21; 27:3; Ezk 25:8-11; Amos 2:1-3; Zeph 2:8-11. This oracle is longer than the others in this section, and has been noted to contain resemblances to Isa 15; 16. Perhaps the invasion of Moabites (among others) into Judah during Jehoiakim's reign (II Kgs 24:2) is the background against which the oracle should be understood. Of the many Moabite place names that occur here, only the more significant will receive comment.

1. Nebo. A mountain peak across the Jordan from Jericho. 2. In Heshbon they have devised evil. A play on words. The verb translated they have devised evil sounds like Heshbon. This city alternated between Moabite and Israelite control. It contained famous reservoirs (Song 7:4). Be cut down, O Madmen. Another play on words. Madmen is an unknown place name. Be cut down. Better, be brought to silence. 5. The going up of Luhith. The ascent to Luhith, a town. The going down of Horonaim. The descent to Horonaim. 6. The heath in the wilderness is a symbol of destruction and loneliness (cf. 17:6 note).

7. Chemosh. The national god of Moab (cf. vv. 13,46; Num 21:29; I Kgs 11:7, 33; II Kgs 23:13). Idols were frequently taken captive with the people who worshiped them (cf. Jer 43:12; Isa 46:1,2).

8. Valley. The Jordan Valley, near the Dead Sea. Plain. The tableland where the Moabites lived.

11. He hath settled on his lees. Moab was so isolated that it had not experienced the discipline of frequent invasions and captivity. The figure comes from wine-making. The wine would be "fined" by being poured from jar to jar through a strainer. Moab had never been so purified, and was like wine with lees or sediment in it. 12. Wanderers that shall cause him to wander. Better, tilters who will tilt (i.e., decant) him, carrying out the picture of the preceding verse. But in Moab's case, this straining would be disastrous; for the careless tilters would break the jars, and Moab would perish. 13. Beth-el. A reference to the worship center made by Jeroboam I at Bethel, a religious stumbling block to the nation of Israel (I Kgs 12:26-33).

18. Dibon. Modern Diban, thirteen miles east of the Dead Sea, near the Arnon River. Here was discovered the famous Moabite Stone. 20. In Arnon. By the Arnon River. A perennial stream that falls into the Dead Sea about halfway between its northern and southern extremities. 21. Plain country. See note on 48:8. 22. Nebo. See note on 48:1. 25. Horn. A symbol of military strength and political power, probably derived from bulls, which push with their horns.

26. Drunken. See note on 25:15. 28. The sides of the hole's mouth. The sides of the gorge (of the Arnon). The Moabites would lead a hunted and precarious existence. 30. Wrath. Arrogance. His lies shall not so effect it. His boastings shall not accomplish (anything).

32,33. Moab's coming desolation is pictured as that of a ruined vineyard. More than for Jazer I weep for you, O vine of Sibmah! Your branches passed over the sea (v. 32, RSV). Jazer and Sibmah were places near Heshbon noted for their vineyards. Summer fruits. See note on 8:20.

34. Zoar. Evidently Lot's city of refuge still existed at this time (Gen 19:20-22). It has been identified with el-Keryeh, southeast of the Dead Sea. As an heifer of three years old. Better, and Eglath-shelishiyeh—another place name. 35. High places. See note on 3:6. 36. Pipes; i.e., flutes used for playing funeral dirges. 37. For these mourning practices, see note on 16:5.

40. He shall fly; i.e., the destroying enemy shall come. 42. Shall be destroyed. On Moab's fate, see the introductory paragraph to this chapter. 45. This verse seems to be dependent on Num 21:28,29; 24:17. The thought seems to be that the Moabite refugees would flee to the fortress of Heshbon, but even there they would be destroyed. Sihon (Num 21:21-30) is mentioned to recall the Amorite defeat at Heshbon long before. 46. People of Chemosh. See note on 48:7. 47. Yet will I bring again the captivity of Moab. Moab would not completely perish, for a remnant of Moab will be found in the Kingdom of God (cf. 46:26; 49:6,39). Bring . . . captivity. See note on 29:14.

D. Oracle Against the Ammonites. 49:1-6.

The Ammonites were descended from Ben-ammi, son of Lot (Gen 19:38). They lived in Trans-Jordan, between the Arnon and the Jabbok rivers, eastward toward the desert. They, like the Moabites, frequently fought the Hebrews. They showed their hostility during the reign of Jehoiakim (II Kgs 24:2), and helped to destroy the refugee community after the fall of Jerusalem (Jer 40:11-14). Other oracles against them are found in Ezk 21:20; 25:1-7; Amos 1:13-15; Zeph 2:8-11.

1. Hath Israel no sons? This is probably a reference to the capture of Trans-Jordan from the Northern Kingdom by the Assyrians in 732 B.C. (II Kgs 15:29). Upon the deportation of the Israelites, the Ammonites moved into the territory of Gad—that part of Trans-Jordan between the Arnon and the Jabbok, near the Jordan. Their king. If the vowels of this word are changed, it reads Milcom, the god of the Ammonites (I Kgs 11:5,7,33; II Kgs 23:13). The Greek, Syriac, and Latin Bibles support this change.

2. Rabbah. The chief city of the Ammonites, now called Amman, the capital of the Kingdom of Jordan. Heap. See note on 30:18. Daughters. Nearby villages which lived in dependence upon Rabbah.

3. Heshbon, while only five or six miles from the Ammonite border, was controlled by the Amorite king Sihon when Israel came (Num 21:25-30,34). Later it passed into Moabite hands (cf. 48:2 note). Ai. It appears that an Ammonite place by that name (not the Ai captured by Joshua, Josh 8:1-29) is meant. It is nowhere else referred to. Hedges. Enclosures for sheep. Their king. See note on 49:1.

4. That trusted in her treasures. The verse expresses the confidence of a people living in such a remote, inaccessible land that invasion seemed impossible.

6. I will bring again. See note on 48:47.

E. Oracle Against Edom. 49:7-22.

The Edomites were descendants of Esau, who was also called Edom (Gen 36:1-19). They lived in the land of Seir, or Edom, a very rugged, mountainous country, extending south of the Dead Sea, on both sides of the Arabah, to the Gulf of Akabah. The relations between the Hebrew kingdoms and the Edomites were never happy. The latter rejoiced over Jerusalem's destruction (Ps 137:7), and afterward occupied southern Judah. They were in turn dispossessed by the Nabateans. The Maccabees successfully warred against the Edomites, and forced those who remained to become Jews. Other prophecies against the Edomites are found in Ezk 25:12-14; 35:1-15; Joel 3:19; Amos 9:12; Ob 1-16. Parts of this section closely resemble parts of Obadiah's prophecy.

7. Teman. A tribe of Edomites known for their wisdom (cf. Job 2:11). 8. Dedan A tribe dwelling south of Edom, known for commercial interests (Ezk 25:13; 27:15,20; 38:13; Isa 21:13; Jer 25:23). Possibly the name still remains as Daidan, in the Arabian desert. Visit. Punish. 9,10. Edom would be stripped "clean," with nothing left even for gleaners. 12. Edom, because of her complicity in Jerusalem's fall (Ob 10-14) was especially guilty (cf. 25:15 note, 28).

16. Clefts of the rock . . . height of the hill. A reference to the high mountain fastness of Edom. Rock. Sela', the Hebrew name of Petra, the principal city of the Edomites (cf. Ob 3).

19-21. These verses are repeated in 50:44-46, where they are applied to Babylon. Verse 19 is difficult to interpret. It apparently says that Edom's enemy will come up against her from the Jordan Valley, but he will run away from her—it is not stated why. God will make His chosen one ruler over Edom. He shall come up; i.e., Edom's conqueror. The swelling of the Jordan. The jungle of the Jordan (cf. 12:5 note). Teman (v. 20). See note on 49:7. Shall draw them out. Shall drag them away.

F. Oracle Against Damascus. 49:23-27.

Damascus was the chief city of Syria. Little is known about it at the time of Jeremiah. Amos 1:3-5 records a prophecy against it.

23. Hamath. Modern Hamah, on the Orontes river, 120 miles north of Damascus. Originally a Hittite city, by this time it was a part of Syria. Arpad. A city near Hamath (cf. Isa 10:9). Sorrow on the sea. Syria had no sea coast in ancient times. The expression is a metaphor for restlessness and trouble. It cannot be quiet. This is the same Hebrew expression translated it cannot rest in Isa 57:20.

25. Damascus was considered one of the most beautiful cities of ancient times. Its springs make it a large oasis in the Syrian desert. 27. Ben-hadad. The name of several Damascene kings (I Kgs 15:18,20; II Kgs 13:24).

G. Oracle Against Kedar and Hazor. 49:28-33.

This oracle is directed against Arab tribes. Kedar and Hazor are not mentioned among the nations in the oracle of Jeremiah 25, but verses 23,24 of that chapter seem to refer to the same peoples. Little is known of the early history of the desert peoples to the east of Palestine, whom we now call Arabs.

28. Kedar. An Ishmaelite desert tribe (Gen 25:13; Isa 21:13,16; 60:7; Ezk 27:21. Cf. Jer 2:10 note). The kingdoms of Hazor. This can hardly refer to the great fortress Hazor in northern Palestine (Josh 11:1-13; 12:19), for it is here used of a desert area. There is no other mention in Scripture of a desert Hazor. Shall smite. Earlier, the Assyrians made campaigns against the Arabs, and Josephus refers to a conquest of Arabia by Nabuchadnezzar. 29. Fear on every side. A favorite expression of Jeremiah (cf. 6:25; 20:3,10; 46:5).

31. Arise, get you up. A commission to the Babylonians to plunder the desert peoples. 32. That are in the utmost corners. Better, who cut the corners (of their hair). See note on 9:26. 33. Dragons. Jackals.

H. Oracle Against Elam. 49:34-39.

Little is known about Elam in the time of Jeremiah. The land of Elam is located beyond the Tigris River, east of Babylonia. It had been conquered by the Assyrians. The Elamites may at this time have been planning a campaign against Babylon. Ezekiel 32:24,25 also mentions Elam.

35. The bow. The Elamites were famous for their skill in archery (cf. Isa 22:6). 38. I will set my throne; i.e., I will judge (cf. 1:15). 39. See note on 48:47.

I. Oracle Against Babylon. 50:1—51:64.

This lengthy oracle has two themes—the fall of Babylon and the return of the Jews from Babylonian exile. To argue that it could not have been written by Jeremiah because of the severity of the language against the Babylonians is to misunderstand the prophet. He was not "pro-Babylonian." As God's spokesman he did indeed urge the submission of the Jews to Nebuchadnezzar, God's punishing servant (27:6). Here, he predicts that the heathen nation of Babylon will itself be punished for her pride and rapacity. Babylon fell in 539 B.C. to the armies of Cyrus the Persian without a battle. Cyrus reversed the old Assyro-Babylonian policy of deportation by issuing a series of decrees permitting captive peoples to return to their homelands. The Jews were permitted to end their exile and rebuild Jerusalem.

2. Bel . . . Merodach. Bel is a title meaning lord and seems to have been applied at this time to Marduk, the chief god of Babylon, called in the OT Merodach. He was a sun-god and, according to the Babylonian creation myth, the creator of the world. 3. Out of the north. Evidently an allusion to the Persians, who came from the east. Perhaps by this time north had become to the Jews a sinister term for the place of origin of all evil. (Cf. Introduction, The Foe from the North.)

4. See notes on 31:7-9. 5. Perpetual covenant. Cf. 31:31-34; 32:40. 6. Shepherds. See note on 23:1. 8. He goats are the leaders of the flock. Let the Jews lead the return of captive peoples to their homes.

9. North country. See note on 50:3. 12,13. Cyrus did not destroy Babylon when he captured it. Later in the Persian period the city revolted, and Darius Hystaspis captured it and destroyed its walls (514 B.C.), thus beginning its decay. The city continued to decline until well into the Christian era, when it ceased to exist. The desolate ruins remained for archaeologists to uncover in the nineteenth century. 15. Walls. See note on 50:2. 16. Sower. Babylon was located in a fertile, irrigated farming land. With the destruction of the central authority, the system of irrigation canals became silted up, so that today the area resembles a desert.

19. The fertility of the land to which scattered Israel was to be restored is set forth here. Carmel means the garden land. The Trans-Jordan areas of Gilead and Bashan were known for their pasturage and forests (Deut 32:14; Isa 2:13; Mic 7:14; Zech 11:2). The hills of Ephraim contained much good agricultural land.

21. Merathaim . . . Pekod. These names represent plays on words on the names of Babylonian localities. Merathaim means double bitterness, and is a play on mât marrâti, a name applied to southern Babylonia. Pekod means punishment, and refers to the name of a tribe in eastern Babylonia, the Puqūdu (cf. Ezk 23:23). 25. The weapons of his indignation. Cf. Isa 13:5. 31. Visit. Punish. 34. Redeemer; i.e., Deliverer from Babylonian captivity (cf. Isa 43:14; Prov 23:11).

36. Dote. Become fools. 38. Drought. See note on 50:16. 39,40. Travelers say that these words are still true of the ruins of Babylon. The Bedouins avoid them as the haunt of wild animals and evil spirits (cf. Isa 13:19-22).

41. From the north. See on 50:3. 44-46. See note on 49:19-21. He shall come up (v. 44). Cyrus is referred to. Swelling of Jordan. See on 12:5.

51:1,2. God's judgment on Babylon is likened to threshers and the wind that winnows the grain on an Oriental threshing floor (cf. 51:33; Ps 1:4). The midst of them that rise up against me (v. 1). The Hebrew is lēb qāmāy, a cipher for "Chaldea," used in the same manner as the cipher of 25:26. Translate: "and against the inhabitants of Chaldea." A destroying wind. An apt picture of Cyrus. Fanners . . . fan (v. 2). Winnowers . . . winnow.

3. Brigandine. See on 46:4. 6. Deliver every man his soul. Let every man save his life. Iniquity. Punishment. 7. The wine of the Lord's wrath (cf. 25:15-17 note). 10. Our righteousness; i.e., our vindication or victory (cf. 23:6 note).

11. Make bright. Polishing the arrows would sharpen them. Medes. An ancient people living south of the Caspian Sea and east of the northern part of Mesopotamia. They had joined with the Babylonians to destroy Nineveh. Together with the Persians, the Medes (both Aryan nations) overthrew Babylon in 539 B.C. And the Medo-Persian empire succeeded the Babylonian (cf. Isa 13:17-19; 21:2,9; Dan 5:28,31; 8:20).

13. Many waters. A reference to the Euphrates and its many canals (cf. 50:16 note). 14. Caterpillers. Locusts (cf. Joel 1:1—2:27). 15-19. These verses are repeated from 10:12-16. See notes there.

20-23. These verses may be addressed to Cyrus (cf. Isa 41:2-4).

25. O destroying mountain. Babylon was situated on a plain. Mountain here is a symbol for a powerful kingdom (cf. Dan 2:35,44). 27. Ararat, Minni, and Ashchenaz were peoples north of Babylonia who were conquered by the Medes in the sixth century. They are here summoned to aid the Medes (v. 28) in battle against Babylon. Ararat. The land roughly equivalent to Armenia, north of Lake Van. Minni. A people near the Ararat kingdom, east of Lake Van. Ashchenaz (Ashkenaz). Said to be descended from Gomer (Gen 10:3). Ashchenaz is identified by some with the fierce Scythians. Caterpiller. See note on verse 14. 28. Medes. See note on verse 11.

31. At one end. On every side. 32. Passages. Fords.

34. Dragon. Monster. My delicates. My delicacies. 36. Dry up. Cf. note on 50:16. 37. Dragons. Jackals. 39. In their heat. When they are inflamed. This verse succinctly describes the fall of Babylon as recorded in Daniel 5.

41. Sheshach. See note on 25:26. 42. Sea . . . waves. Figurative language to describe the overflowing enemy armies (cf. v. 25 note). 44. Bel. See on 50:2. That which he hath swallowed up; i.e., the people deported from their homelands to Babylon would return home again.

45. Deliver ye every man his soul. See note on 51:6. 46. And (beware) lest your heart faint. A time of anxiety would precede Babylon's fall. God's people should patiently await the outcome. 48. The north. See on 50:3. 55. Waves. See on 51:42.

59-64. An appendix to the oracle against Babylon. Seraiah was to perform a symbolic action in the prophet's place (cf. 13:1-11). Seraiah the son of Neriah (v. 59). This Seraiah is to be distinguished from the one who helped arrest Jeremiah (36:26), from the high priest of the same name (52:24-27), and also from the Seraiah of 40:8. The Seraiah of this verse was the brother of Baruch, Jeremiah's secretary (32:12). In the fourth year. This Babylonian journey is not recorded elsewhere. It has been supposed that Zedekiah went at this time to clear himself of suspicion of complicity in a revolt. It is not unusual for puppet rulers of satellite countries to visit the capital of the empire occasionally. A quiet prince. Perhaps this is a title: "quartermaster."

IV. Appendix: The Fall of Jerusalem, and Related Events. 52:1-34.

This chapter is almost identical with II Kgs 24:18—25:30. Material in II Kgs which is omitted here is given in Jer 40:7—43:7 (cf. 39:1 note). Probably this appendix was added to the Book of Jeremiah to show how the prophet's message of doom was fulfilled.

1) The Reign of Zedekiah. 52:1-3.

1. Zedekiah. Cf. Introduction, Historical Background of the Prophet; and see on 1:3. His mother's name. See note on 13:18. Jeremiah. Obviously not the prophet. 2. Jehoiakim. Cf. Introduction, Historical Background of the Prophet; and see on 1:3.

2) The Siege and Fall of Jerusalem. 52:4-27.

7. In desperation Zedekiah and his guard sought to flee through the desolate valleys leading down to the Arabah (plain, AV)—that geological fault in which the Jordan and the Dead Sea are located. Crossing the Jordan, they would seek to hide themselves in the desolate reaches of Trans-Jordan. King's garden. Located in the south of the city, near the Kidron Valley, which leads down to the Dead Sea. 8. The plains of Jericho. It is amazing that the king and his entourage succeeded in eluding the siege forces and fleeing so far. 9. Riblah in the land of Hamath. A city (probably Ribleh on the Orontes River, thirty-six miles northeast of Ba'al-bek) where the Babylonians maintained their field headquarters (II Kgs 25:6,7,21).

12. Fifth month . . . tenth day. According to II Kgs 25:8, these events took place on the seventh day of the fifth month. The Jewish fast of the Ninth of Ab (August) recalls both this destruction of Jerusalem and that by Titus in A.D. 70. Nineteenth year. 587 B.C. Nebuzar-adan. See on 39:9.

16. Poor of the land. For what happened to these people afterwards, see Jer 40–45.

17-23. The sacred vessels were carried captive to Babylon (cf. I Kgs 6–8).

24. Seraiah. See on 51:59. Zephaniah. See on 29:25. 25. Eunuch. See on 38:7. The principal scribe of the host. The secretary of the commander of the army.

27. These men were executed for revolt against the empire, for the Babylonians had looked upon Judah as a subject state for some years, at least since 605 B.C.

3) The Three Deportations. 52:28-30. Much of this information is unique to this passage.

28. The First Deportation. This deportation is described in II Kgs 24:12-16. There the number of deportees is given as "ten thousand." The discrepancy is reconciled by some by the supposition that the figure in II Kings is for the number taken from Jerusalem; the number in Jeremiah tells how many arrived in Babylon, the rest having failed to survive the journey. II Kings indicates the eighth year of Nebuchadnezzar as the date; Jeremiah, the seventh. On this, compare the note on verse 29.

29. The Second Deportation. This one occurred in Nebuchadnezzar's eighteenth year; that is, the time of the destruction of the city (587 B.C.), called the nineteenth year in verse 12. The systems of dating based on the year of the king's reign are very confusing. Sometimes the year in which the king began to reign was accounted his first; at other times (and places) the first full year (i.e., the year which began at the first New Year's celebration after the king's accession) was considered his first year. This fact would seem to explain some of the one-year discrepancies in the chronology of the Babylonian period (cf. v. 28 note).

30. The Third Deportation. Not mentioned elsewhere. It may have been caused by a Babylonian expedition to punish the Jews for the disturbances at the time of Gedaliah's assassination (cf. chs. 40; 41; 40:7 note). Nebuzar-adan. See on 39:9.

4) Jehoiachin's Release from Prison. 52:31-34.

This section is repeated in II Kgs 25: 27-30 (cf. Jer 22:24-30). After a three-month reign, Jehoiachin was carried captive to Babylon (II Kgs 24:8-17). He never returned. Seals found in Palestine lead us to infer that the Judeans continued to consider him as the reigning king, and Zedekiah (his uncle) merely as a regent. Cuneiform tablets found in Babylon confirm this story of Jehoiachin's pension (cf. 22:30 note).

31. Evil-merodach. The son and successor of Nebuchadnezzar. Lifted up the head. The Hebrew expression (here translated quite literally) means that Jehoiachin was looked upon with favor by Evil-merodach and allowed to see the face of the king—the literal meaning of the phrase translated that were near the king's person (v. 25). To see the king's face (in court) was the greatest favor one in politics could hope to gain (cf. Gen 40:13,20; contrast Est 7:8). 34. A continual diet given him. This is the ancient way of saying that Jehoiachin lived at government expense; he was pensioned.

LAMENTATIONS

INTRODUCTION

The five chapters of Lamentations are five beautiful and solemn elegies, or songs of mourning, expressing the anguish of the Jewish people at the sight of the utter ruin of their city, its Temple, and its population, under the conquering Babylonians in 586 B.C.

Title. The title of this book in Hebrew is the first word of chapters 1, 2, and 4 — 'êkâ, literally, Ah, how! or Alas! In the Greek version of the Old Testament, the Septuagint (LXX), the Book of Lamentations is associated with the prophecy of Jeremiah, as it is in our English Bible. But in the Hebrew Bible it is placed among the books that make up the third division of the sacred writings. Our Lord spoke of this threefold arrangement as "the law . . . the prophets, and the psalms" (Lk 24:44).

The Greek title for these poems in the LXX is thrēnoi, the plural of thrēnos, "a lamentation." This noun comes from the Greek verb threomai, to "cry aloud, or lament." The Hebrew term for lamentation is qinâ, and the peculiar meter of the poems in this book is called qinôt meter. It is the Hebrew equivalent of our English term, "elegiac" meter. So in the Babylonian Talmud the book appears under the title Qinôt—"Lamentations." The title of this book in the Latin Bible is Liber Threnorum, "The Book of Lamentations." English "threnody" means "lamentation" or "dirge."

Literary Form and Style. The book consists of five beautiful poems, one for each chapter. The first four are dirges, but the fifth is more like a prayer poem. The first four are alphabetical (acrostic) in arrangement, each having twenty-two stanzas (verses in AV, except chapter 3, where each stanza is divided into three verses), and each stanza begins with a letter of the Hebrew alphabet. The fifth chapter also has twenty-two stanzas but lacks the alphabetical arrangement. (Compare the alphabetical arrangement of the sections in Ps 119.) In chapter 1 of Lamentations the verses follow the established order of the Hebrew alphabet, but in chapters 2 and 4 the positions of the letters ayin and pe are transposed. No satisfactory explanation has been found for this transposition.

In chapters 1 and 2 each stanza has three members, but only the first begins with the appropriate letter of the alphabet. In chapter 3 each stanza has three members, each of which begins with the same letter of the alphabet. Since each member is numbered separately in our English Bibles, we have sixty-six verses for the third chapter. Chapter 4 has stanzas of two members, but here again only the first member starts with the appropriate Hebrew letter. In the first four chapters the elegiac meter is used, wherein the second of the two parallel elements (lines in English poetry) is one beat shorter than the first. This gives, usually, a four-beat verse balanced with a three-beat verse or line. In chapter 5 the normal Hebrew meter is used, with four beats to each verse, or each half of the parallelism.

Threnodies in such "limping meter" were used in Bible times by the mourning women in funeral dirges at wakes for the dead. And so chanting songs set to such plaintive, melancholy cadences seemed an appropriate way to mourn the destruction of beloved Jerusalem, now lying a heap of ruins. Perhaps this helps to explain why these national hymns breathe such exquisite pathos and have been constructed with such conscious art. The Hebrew elegiac verse form is admirably suited to express the national woe. In these patriotic hymns we hear the death wail of smitten Zion.

In style there is much use of parallelism in these poems, much repetition, antithesis, and apostrophe, and a play on words and phrases. Vivid imagery throbs throughout. The reader is thus made to see the suffering and feel the pain of widowed, weeping Zion.

Authorship. Although the book itself does not name its author, II Chronicles 35:25 definitely connects Jeremiah with the lamentation type of literature. Our Book of Lamentations is not the lamentation of Jeremiah over the death of the good king Josiah, as some have suggested. But there are definite points of similarity between Lamentations and the poetical sections of Jeremiah's prophecy. And from ancient times the book has been attributed to Jeremiah. The LXX carries the following note as a superscription to the first verse of the first chapter of Lamentations: "And it came to pass, after Israel was led into captivity and Jerusalem laid waste, that Jeremiah sat weeping and lamented with this lamentation over Jerusalem, and said . . ." Then follows the first verse of the first chapter. Some scholars feel that the Hebraic character of this sentence suggests that these words came from a Hebrew original which is lost to us.

Let it be noted that the same sensitivity to national sorrow is to be found in both Lamentations and Jeremiah's prophecy. In both writings the national calamities are referred to the same causes — national sin, and the vain confidence of the people in weak and treacherous allies, along with the guilt of her false prophets and lax priests. Similar imagery runs throughout both writings. The characteristic phrase, "daughter of," occurs about twenty times in each book. The prophet's weeping, his fears as he appeals for aid to God, the righteous Judge, and his expectation that eventually Jerusalem's enemies will be punished — all are manifestly prominent in both books. These similarities of expression argue identity of authorship. Though a number of outstanding scholars reject the idea that Jeremiah was the author of these poems, many others equally important strongly favor Jeremiah as the author.

The vividness of description argues for the book's having been composed at a time very close to the fall of Jerusalem by one who lived through that terrible catastrophe and wrote while his heart was still sore and each horrible detail was still fresh in his mind. This fact, also, points toward Jeremiah as the most likely author.

The occasion for such a book is most assuredly the destruction of the city of Jerusalem in 586 B.C., and therefore the date of the writing could not have been many months afterward.

Religious Import and Usage. The Book of Lamentations represents the death wail of Jerusalem, pictured as a widowed and disgraced princess. It is interesting to recall that following the destruction of Jerusalem by the Romans in A.D. 70, the arch of triumph built as a memorial of that conquest by the Roman general Titus pictured Judah as a woman weeping and disheveled, seated upon the ground in mourning. Recall also that the daughters of Jerusalem sought to wail such a dirge over Jesus at his death (Lk 23:27-31). Certain portions of Lamentations have been interpreted as applying to the passion of Christ. Indeed the use of these national songs indicates that the Jewish people accepted a religious interpretation of the destruction of their city. The Jews include this writing among the Five Scrolls to be read on important anniversary days. The day set for the reading of Lamentations is the ninth of Ab, which commemorates the burning of the Temple. But always verse 21 of chapter 5 is repeated after verse 22, so that the reading may close on a more positive note. Among Roman Catholics the time appointed for the reading of Lamentations is the last three days of Holy Week. Protestant Christians, one regrets to say, have too often neglected the reading of these solemn poems. Yet in these days of personal, national, and international crises (and disaster) the message of this book is a challenge to repent of sins personal, national, and international, and to commit ourselves afresh to God's steadfast love. Though this love is ever present and outgoing, a holy and just God must surely judge unrepentant sinners.

COMMENTARY

I. The Ruined City of Zion. 1:1-22.

A. Wretched Condition of Devasted Jerusalem. 1:1-11. How doth the city sit solitary. See Introduction, paragraph 2.

1,2. Princess among the provinces. No longer foremost among the provinces of the land, Judah sits a tributary widow, bereft of her children and betrayed by friends and allies, lonely and desolate, and weeping bitterly, with none to comfort her (cf. the reverse in Ezr 4:20). 3. Judah is gone into captivity. Exile and slavery are made worse by the pagan environment. Isaiah's prophecy has come true (Isa 39:5-7; 47:8,9).

4-6. From the daughter of Zion . . . beauty is departed (v. 6). The poet's description is graphic. Her approaches are forsaken, her feasts unattended, her gates (places of assembly) deserted, her priests are in anguish, her virgins have been dragged away, and she herself suffers bitterly. The divine judgment upon her sins has given her enemies the upper hand as they force her children into exile ahead of them. Her princes, like stags without pasture, are quite unable to escape the pursuer. (The sons of Zedekiah were captured and slain in the sight of their father, whose eyes were then put out; Jer 39:4-7). 7. Jerusalem remembered. The memory of better days only increases Zion's present sorrows, especially when she is mocked by those who watch with delight. Sabbaths. Better, destruction, as in the Berkeley Version.

8-11. Jerusalem hath grievously sinned. Sin never brings ultimate happiness. Jerusalem, despised and desecrated by those who formerly honored her, turns her back in naked shame, for corruption and carelessness have brought their tragic consequences. Pagans have plundered her temple utensils, and people morally and ceremonially unclean have invaded her sanctuary in defiance of Jehovah's ordinance. Groaning for food, the people trade their valuables for mere sustenance. (Note the two apostrophes to Jehovah in vv. 9,11.)

B. Lament of the "Daughter of Jerusalem." 1:12-22. The disaster at God's hands is severe but deserved, as the speaker acknowledges.

12. The day of his fierce anger. Most moderns want to ignore the severity of the divine nature. They fail to recognize that real goodness is not indulgent of evil. 13-16. From above . . . fire into my bones (v. 13). The daughter of Judah recounts her sufferings endured at the hand of the Lord – fever in her limbs, a snare for her feet, frustration and faintness all day. God has woven her sins into a yoke of subjugation and slavery. Wine for the feast of Judah's foes is the blood of her men of valor trodden out in the wine press of affliction. Hence Judah weeps, uncomforted and unrevived, for her perishing children over whom her enemies have prevailed.

17-19. My lovers . . . deceived me (v. 19). Zion's hands outstretched for help are unheeded, for the righteous command of Jehovah has made enemies of all her lovers (cf. Lev 15:19-27). Jacob's neighbors, now adversaries, treat Jerusalem as a thing unclean. Zion reaps the reward of her rebellion. Her priests and elders, seeking a bare subsistence, have died of hunger; and her young men and maidens are captives. 20-22. Behold, O Lord; for I am in distress . . . none to comfort me. Zion's plea for vindication. The sword is in her streets and the silence of death is in every home. May her exultant enemies fare likewise, she prays. "Give them as many groanings and a heart just as sore."

II. The Ruined Holy Place of Zion. 2:1-22.

A. Jehovah's Judgments upon the Ramparts and upon His Sanctuary. 2:1-10.

1-5. How hath the Lord covered the daughter of Zion with a cloud. Zion's God has become Zion's enemy. Jehovah in wrath has destroyed the Temple, his footstool (I Chr 28:2), the beauty of Israel. The boundaries of Jacob are broken down, the strongholds of Judah leveled, and the kingdom with its princes has been degraded. God has become a consuming fire (Heb 12:29; Deut 4:24) to the land simply by withdrawing his power in the presence of her enemies. And like an archer hunting his prey, he has slain everything of youth, beauty, and rank. His fury has burned like a fire in the tabernacle (tent) of Zion. The divine Adversary has gobbled up Judah, her palaces and fortresses, and multiplied to the daughter of Judah moaning and mourning (wails and woe).

6-10. Violently taken away his tabernacle. That is, his Temple and its sacred institutions. Tabernacle, assembly, Sabbath, king, and priest—all have been despised and violently demolished. The Lord has discarded his own altar, despised his sanctuary, given into enemy hands the ark of the covenant, and allowed the shout of conquest to resound in the House of Jehovah like the sound of an orgy. In his determination to destroy the wall of Zion, his plumb line of judgment has caused both the ramparts and the walls to totter and fall. Zion's gates are sunken, her bars broken, her nobles exiled; her Law is suspended and no longer taught, and her prophets are without revelation. Hence Judah's elders, in their grief, sit silent on the ground, with dust on their heads and burlap on their loins; while her virgins hang their heads for shame.

B. Lament of the Eyewitness of This Judgment. 2:11-19.

11,12. Mine eyes do fail with tears. A graphic portrayal of protracted emotional distress: eyes exhausted with tears (Jer 9:1; 14:17), sympathies outraged, heart broken at the sight of babies swooning, small children crying for food and drink, and – worst of all – infants breathing out their lives on their mothers' breasts. 13,14. What shall I equal to thee? The witness of these sufferings is at a loss to find a figure or a situation with which to compare Zion's ruin. It is beyond repair. The false and flattering vision of her prophets (Jer 14:14-16; 23:9-40) failed to show the nation her sin, else she might have been spared her captivity. Here we have the moral cause of her misfortune clearly spelled out.

15,16. All that pass by clap their hands. Zion's enemies mock her ruin. The clapping hand, the wagging head, the hissing breath, accompany the spoken jibes at Jerusalem. The enemies, in their gloating, yell and hiss and clench their teeth as they bless the day of her ruin. This is derision unrestrained. 17-19. The Lord hath done that which he had devised, i.e., what he foretold he would do. Let Zion wail her distress. She rebelled, and he has let her enemies triumph over her. Verses 18,19 are an apostrophe to the wall of the city: Cry day and night with perpetual tears; lift both hands to Jehovah imploring his mercy upon your languishing children.

C. Terrors of This Day of Jehovah's Anger. 2:20-22. Here we have Zion's fourth apostrophe to Jehovah.

20-22. Consider to whom thou hast done this. "O Lord, do You realize whom You have slain?" Children are victims of cannibalistic mothers; priests lie slain in the sanctuary; youth and age lie unburied in the streets; maidens and young men are victims of the sword. In this pitiless killing, which none escapes, these objects of Zion's affections are devoted to the enemy slaughter. (Compare Josephus' description of the fall of Jerusalem in A.D. 70, Jewish Wars, Bk. vii.)

III. The Suffering Representative of Smitten Zion. 3:1-66.

This chapter is the mountain peak of the book. Here Jeremiah bares his heart to the reader, as he frequently does in his prophecy. His life was one long martyrdom, in which he served as both judge and intercessor for people bent on their own destruction. No prophet ever pleaded with a people in more impassioned manner, calling for a national conversion, than did he. And no one, except Jesus, was treated with more national contempt than he. These facts are plainly evident in these sixty-six verses of chapter 3.

A. The Sorrows God Sent His Servant. 3:1-18.

1-3. I am the man. Here the sufferer is identified and his theme stated. He speaks as a representative Israelite, facing the dark and baffling ways of Providence. Jehovah's unsparing onslaught against him he describes in verses 4-18.

4-13. He hath broken my bones. Under the tribulation of Jehovah's constant attack upon him, the poet knows only bitterness and frustration. He suffers physically; his light (Ps 143:3) and freedom are gone; his prayers are rejected. All the while Jehovah seems to lurk in ambush for him – like an animal stalking its prey – and at the same time He seems to blockade all the ways of escape. God has thwarted, mangled, and left him. As a target for Jehovah's bow, his vitals are full of arrows.

14-18. I was a derision to all my people. As an object of public derision, his peace of soul and rest in Jehovah have vanished. He is the butt of his people's jokes, and the theme of their daily satire. His abject condition is like that of one stuffed with bitter herbs, drunken with gall (cf. Jer 23:15), his teeth broken on gravel, and his body covered with ashes. His bliss and prosperity are forgotten and his hope in the Eternal is gone.

B. The Servant's Prayer of Reassurance. 3:19-42.

19-21. This I recall to my mind, therefore have I hope (v. 21). The prophet, pondering his bitter afflictions, realizes how they have humbled his soul. He knows that God remembers the humble and afflicted, and so he expresses hope. Verses 22-39 speak of the poet's reassurance in Jehovah's goodness and his resignation to His sovereign ways. 22-24. His compassions fail not. The loving-kindness (hesed, "steadfast love") of Jehovah is unfailing. It is daily renewed (like the manna of old); hence his people are not consumed, and a remnant remains as a seed for a new beginning. Great is thy faithfulness (v. 23). "Jehovah is my dearest treasure," declares my soul, "therefore I do hope in him" (v. 24).

25-27. A man should both hope and quietly wait (v. 26). Patient waiting upon Jehovah makes one a partaker of his goodness. The yoke in his youth (v. 27). Early discipline begets mature dependability. 28-30. Keepeth silence. Let the chastened soul submit silently and humbly, for in so doing there is hope. Mouth in the dust (v. 29). A confession of unworthiness.

31-33. He doth not afflict willingly (v. 33). Hebrew, from his heart. Jehovah will not cast off forever, nor is there any vindictiveness in his heart. He does not delight to bring pain and grief. 34-36. To turn aside the right of a man (v. 35). The Most High is not like a pagan deity, fickle and imperfect. He does not approve oppression, injustice, or subversion. (Favoritism in the courts then, as now, was all too common.) God is Moral Governor over all.

37-39. Wherefore doth a living man complain? (v. 39) Nothing can happen without the permission of the Most High. Then why should a man complain when punished for his sins? Not suffering, but sin should be lamented. Let us not murmur at God for that which we have brought upon ourselves. 40-42. Let us search and try our ways. An exhortation to heart-searching, sincere repentance. Let the hands be lifted up in supplication and surrender, and the heart become submissive. We . . . thou (v. 42). These words stand in contrast. We, on our part, have sinned and rebelled; and thou, thou therefore hast not pardoned (cf. the Hebrew and Luther's German).

C. The Servant's Prayer for Vindication. 3:43-66. The poet and his people tell of the calamities suffered by reason of Jehovah's wrath.

43-45. Thou hast . . . persecuted us. Wrapped in a cloud of anger which no prayer can penetrate, Jehovah has pursued the people of Judah, slaying without pity, until Zion is but rubbish among the people. 46-48. Fear and a snare (v. 47). In the presence of her yelling enemies, Zion is terror-stricken, like a hunted animal that can see no way of escape from the trap (pit, snare), while torrents of tears flood the eyes of her intercessor.

Verses 49-54 comprise the poet's lament over the enmity of his own people against him. 49-51. Mine eye . . . ceaseth not. His tears over their fate will flow unceasingly until Jehovah in heaven takes notice of his grief. 52-54. Mine enemies chased me . . . without cause. With no excuse for their hate, they have hunted him like a bird and cast him into a well, piling in stones upon him until the water closed over his head.

In verses 55-66 we have the prayer that brought Jehovah to the rescue. It is followed by a confident plea for vengeance upon the poet's foes. 55-57. I called . . . . thou saidst, Fear not. His prayer of desperation brought Jehovah's presence and comforting precept – Fear not. 58-60. Thou hast seen (v. 59). He is now confident that Jehovah has observed his plight and will become his Redeemer, Advocate, and Vindicator. 61-63. Thou hast heard. He is also sure that Jehovah has heard the insults of his assailants, their plots and daily mutterings as he is the topic of their taunt-song. 64-66. Render unto them a recompense, i.e., vengeance in keeping with their deeds — blindness of heart, the curse of Jehovah, persecution, and extermination from beneath the heavens.

IV. The Suffering People of Zion. 4:1-22.

In this chapter we have something of an eyewitness account of both Zion's guilt and her punishment. The inspired poet-prophet first describes her fate as a people, then gives the moral explanation for such a fate.

A. Horrors of the Siege, and the Sad Fate of Zion's Nobility. 4:1-11. Verses 1-6 give us the description of the suffering of the royal children. 1,2. The precious sons of Zion (v. 2). Worth their weight in gold as Zion's precious treasures, they have been thrown out like broken pottery and lie scattered at the beginning of every street. 3-5. They . . . brought up in scarlet embrace dunghills (v. 5). Even the predatory animals do not treat their young as Zion has been forced to treat hers. Sucklings die of thirst and infants lack bread, while their mothers, like cruel ostriches of the desert, disregard their cries. The royal diet and clothing have given way to famine and the garbage heap.

In verses 7-11 the poet contrasts the former beauty of Zion's princes with the frightful fate they now endure. 7. Her Nazarites. More correctly, her distinguished ones. How innocent, comely, and healthy they were! 8-10. Slain with hunger (v. 9). Now all beauty has become blackness. Note the reversal of the situation in verse 7. That once fair skin is now black, dry, and shriveled (a picture of unburied bodies in the desert sun). Better the piercing sword than the pangs of hunger and starvation. Some mothers even eat their own children during the famine of the siege. 11. His fury. Jehovah's consuming anger has burned like a fire to the very foundations of Zion.

B. Causes and Climax of Zion's Catastrophe. 4:12-20. Here the writer comes to grips with the moral explanation of such misfortunes. Verses 12-16 point out that what the heathen thought impossible for Zion — that she could be taken by an enemy — was brought about by the sins of her prophets, priests, and elders. Judah has destroyed herself by sin.

12. Would not have believed. No one on earth, not even her enemies, ever thought Zion's gates would fall before the foe. 13-15. Shed the blood of the just. Alas, these leaders, guilty of spilling righteous and innocent blood, are now defiled with the blood of men they once avoided. Consequently they themselves are treated as contemptible and unclean. (To touch a dead body meant ceremonial uncleanness.) 16. Respected not the persons of the priests. Now, as fugitives and vagabonds, the priests are without honor or respect. If Jehovah regarded them as his heritage once, he cares nothing for them now.

17-20. As the end draws near, hope for foreign aid is disappointed, and attempts to escape are frustrated. Even the king is captured, and so all hope of living in a foreign land under his rule is destroyed.

C. An Apostrophe to Haughty and Gloating Edom. 4:21,22. Edom was the "brother" of Judah, descended from Esau and Ishmael. Often the sharpest jibes come from one's kinsfolk. But now Jehovah turns his attention to Edom and foretells her humiliation.

V. The Supplications of Penitent Zion. 5:1-22.

This chapter is really a national prayer to Jehovah, Zion's only hope and help.

A. Zion's Plea to Jehovah to Regard Her Affliction and Disgrace. 5:1-18. Verse 1 opens the theme with Zion's fifth apostrophe to Jehovah. The pitiful plight of Zion merits Jehovah's attention.

2-10. This is a picture of the general suffering of the people from lack of life's necessities: they have lost homes and loved ones; they have to pay inflationary (black market) prices even for water and fuel; they toil without respite at hard labor; they are forced to beg food from their enemies east and west; they suffer the deserts of the fathers' sins; they are enslaved by former servants; in seeking bread they are exposed to the peril of Bedouin raids; and all the while the fever of famine consumes them. These distresses are the usual aftermath of war. 11-13. Here are noted specific cases of individual sufferings, such as rape, insult, and tasks beyond one's strength.

14-18. General despondency prevails. Joy . . . turned into mourning (v. 15). The elders have dropped all business and social gatherings, while the youths have left their music-making. Merriment is turned into mourning. The only crown is one of woe for sins committed. Our heart is faint (v. 17). Courage and vision fail because the place of the sanctuary is desolate and overrun by wild animals.

B. A Final Apostrophe to the Eternal Sovereign. 5:19-22. In this stanza the book reaches its conclusion. Note here Zion's sixth and seventh apostrophes to Jehovah.

19. Thy throne. The throne of Jehovah stands immovable. 20. Wherefore? Why, then, should he forget his people forever? 21. Turn . . . and we shall be turned. Restore and establish us. God is the only source of true revival. 22. Utterly rejected. In the Hebrew this is more probably a final query: Wilt Thou utterly reject us? In other words: "Surely you cannot cast us off and be angry with us forever!" God will not always chide. Or as another prayed: "In wrath, remember mercy" (Hab 3:2).

EZEKIEL

INTRODUCTION

The Times. The data in the book of Ezekiel place the prophet's ministry in the early years of the Babylonian exile, between 593/592 and 571/570 B.C. (1:1,2; 29:17). The prophet Ezekiel, from his Babylonian locale, envisaged the fall and restoration of the house of Israel; while his older contemporary, Jeremiah, in Jerusalem, actually beheld the dying gasps of the kingdom of Judah (Jer 1:1-3).

During much of the eighth and seventh centuries B.C., the ruthless Assyrian power harassed the kingdoms of Israel and Judah. The northern kingdom fell in 721 B.C.; but Judah, though seriously weakened, managed to outlive her oppressor. With the reign of Ashurbanipal (669–633), the Assyrian empire began to decline. Egypt pulled out from under her yoke in 655. Within a few years Assyria was fighting for her life against the Babylonians and Medes. The ancient Assyrian capital, Asshur, succumbed in 614, and the long-mighty Nineveh was utterly destroyed in 612. By 607 the remnants of the Assyrian empire had collapsed.

Taking advantage of the Assyrian decline, Josiah (640/639–609/608), the last great king of Judah, strengthened his kingdom. His brilliant career was cut short by an encounter at Megiddo with Pharaoh-necho II of Egypt, who was attempting to prop up the Assyrian empire as a bulwark against Chaldea (II Kgs 23:29). Shallum or Jehoahaz (Jer 22:10-12; Ezk 19:2-4), who succeeded his father Josiah, was deported to Egypt after a reign of three months, and Jehoiakim, an older son of Josiah, was enthroned by Necho (II Kgs 23:31-35).

The Egyptians under Necho were defeated by Nebuchadrezzar (also called Nebuchadnezzar) at Carchemish on the Euphrates River in 605 (Jer 46:2ff.). The Chaldeans became the new world masters (II Kgs 24:7), with Judah as a vassal state. Jehoiakim (608–597) persecuted the prophets (Jer 7; 26; 36), degraded the spiritual life of the nation (Jer 7:1-15; 13; 16–20; cf. Ezk 8), and showed himself a petty tyrant (Jer 22:13-15,17-19). He revolted against Nebuchadnezzar in 602 and was harried by neighboring states (II Kgs 24:1ff.). He died in disgrace before Nebuchadnezzar's punitive invasion reached Judah (Jer 22:19).

Jehoiachin (Jeconiah or Coniah), the son of Jehoiakim, ruled three months and then surrendered to Nebuchadnezzar (II Kgs 24:8-17; Jer 22:24-30; Ezk 19:5-9). After pillaging Jerusalem, the Chaldean monarch deported several thousands of its upper-class citizens to Babylonia. These Jeremiah compared to "good figs," the hope for the future Israel, in contrast to the "bad figs," the poorest of the people, who were left behind (Jer 24; 29). Included in the company of exiles was Ezekiel, who dates his messages from the year of Jehoiachin's captivity (1:1,2; 3:16; 8:1; 20:1; 24:1; 26:1; 29:1; 29:17; 30:20; 31:1; 32:17; 33:21; 40:1). The "Jehoiachin tablets," published in 1939, refer to "Yaukin the king of Yahud" and his sons (cf. W. F. Albright, "King Joiakin in Exile," BA, V (Dec. 1942), pp. 49-55). He was released from his imprisonment by Amel-Marduk, the son of Nebuchadnezzar, in 560, the thirty-seventh year of his exile.

The nineteenth and last king of Judah was Zedekiah (597–586), a third son of Josiah (II Kgs 24:17–25:7; Ezk 19:11-14), a weak king (Jer 37; 38), who soon broke his oath of fealty to Nebuchadnezzar by joining a coalition of revolting states (Ezk 17:13-15; Jer 27:1-11). This folly brought the avenging Chaldeans to Jerusalem. After a siege of one and a half years (II Kgs 25:1-3), relieved briefly by the rumored coming of Pharaoh-hophra's Egyptian army (Jer 34:3ff.; 37:5-8), the city was destroyed, the Temple plundered and burned, Zedekiah taken prisoner, and a host of exiles deported to Babylon (II Kgs 25:1-21). Jeremiah chose to remain in the land with the wretched survivors under the governorship of Gedaliah at Mizpah. After the latter's treacherous murder, the group, fearing reprisals, migrated to Egypt, against the advice of Jeremiah (Jer 40–44).

The Bible says very little about the exiles, and Ezekiel is especially reticent about them. Some no doubt became serfs or slaves, while others prospered, as the contract tablets from Nippur indicate (see on 1:1). Leaders such as Zerubbabel, Ezra, and Nehemiah arose out of the gôlâ (the exiles). Many exiles apparently lived in their own homes (Jer 29:1-7), in various settlements (Ezr 2:59; Neh 7:61), and had an organization of elders (Ezk 3:15,24; 8:1; 14:1; 20:1; 33:31). Some lost their faith; but to those who remained true, Ezekiel became a tower of strength. It is not strange that, upon being uprooted from their land, temple, and sacrifices, they laid emphasis upon fasting, the Sabbath, and circumcision, and that prayer, the reading of Scripture, and psalmody—precursors of the synagogue—were stressed.

The Man. Ezekiel (God strengthens), the son of Buzi, was of a priestly family, possibly of the Zadokite line (1:3; 40:46; 44:15). He manifests great familiarity with Jerusalem, where he spent his early years, and with its Temple. In 597 B.C. he was exiled to Babylonia by Nebuchadnezzar, along with King Jehoiachin and the upper classes of Jerusalem. His home was at Tel-abib, the principal colony of the exiles, on the river Chebar or "Grand Canal" (1:1; 3:15), near the city of Nippur, southeast of Babylon. He had a dearly beloved wife but no children (24:16-18). Apparently a person of consideration, his home became the meeting place of the elders of the exiles (3:24; 8:1; 14:1; 20:1).

In response to a magnificent theophany (1:4-28), he was charged to be God's spokesman and watchman to the exiles (chs. 2; 3). His ministry extended from the fifth year of Jehoiachin's exile, 592 B.C., to the twenty-seventh year, 570 B.C. (1:2; 29:17). Before the fall of Jerusalem in 586, he was primarily a preacher of repentance and judgment (chs. 1—24). To a people rebellious, inclined to idolatry, and susceptible to a pagan environment, he brought constant warnings (2:3ff.; 3:4-11; 13; 14:1ff.; 18:2,25; 20:1ff.). He reminded the exiles that the people still living in Jerusalem falsely clung to the inviolability of the Temple and the land (11:1-15), and put far off the day of recompense (12:21-28). To his despairing hearers, after the fall of Jerusalem (24:21ff.; 33:10,17; 37:11), he became a consoler, a herald of salvation, an expositor of the necessity of inner religion, a prophet of the regathering, and the envisager of God's restoration of the Temple, worship, and land to a redeemed and purified Israel (33:11; 34; 36:25-31; 37; 40—48). He pictured judgment falling on the hostile nations led by Gog and Magog (chs. 38; 39), but hinted of the conversion of other peoples, e.g., Sodom and Samaria (16:53ff.), and foresaw many nations taking shelter, like birds, under the goodly cedar, the Messiah (17:22-24).

Ezekiel conveyed his message by such striking methods as allegories (chs. 15; 16; 17:1-21; 19; 21:1-17; 23; 24:1-14), symbolic actions (4:1—5:4; 12:1-7,17-20; 21:18-23; 24:3-5,15-24; 37:15-17), and visions (1:4-28; 2:9—3:3; 3:22,23; 8—11; 37:1-10; 40—48). As for Zechariah, so for Ezekiel, an interpreting angel is prominent in his visions (often in 40—48; e.g., 40:3,4; 43:6,7; 47:1ff.). Apocalyptic imagery appears frequently (7:5-12; 20:33-44; 28:25,26; 34:25-31; 36:8-15,33-36; 38; 39; 47:1-12). Ezekiel's mastery of many styles of prose and poetry shows careful preparation and reflection.

During the last generation, scholars have proposed widely differing theories concerning Ezekiel: that no such person existed but the book is a pseudepigraphon of 230 B.C. (C. C. Torrey); that he lived in the time of Manasseh, was a native of North Israel, and addressed the Assyrian diaspora (James Smith); that all his ministry was in Palestine (Herntrich, Harford); that he exercised part of his ministry in Palestine but after 586 was in Babylonia (Bertholet, Auvray, Van den Born, Oesterley and Robinson); that he had several residences (I. G. Matthews, Fisher, Freedman); and that he was a North Israelite of 400 B.C. (Messel). The inability of scholars to produce a theory superior to the traditional view, plus the strong evidence for it, shows that no change is needed with reference to the residence of Ezekiel. (Cf. Carl G. Howie, "The Residence of Ezekiel," in The Date and Composition of Ezekiel, pp. 5-26.)

Attempts have been made to prove that Ezekiel was psychopathic. E. C. Broome, writing on "Ezekiel's Abnormal Personality" (JBL, 65 (1946), pp. 272-292), diagnosed him as afflicted with catatonic or paranoid schizophrenia! Howie has carefully contrasted the so-called evidence for Ezekiel's schizophrenia with the parallels between Ezekiel and other mystics ("Psychological Aspects of Ezekiel and His Prophecy," op. cit., pp. 69-84). He points out how absurd it is for a nonprofessional student of psychiatry to claim success in psychoanalyzing a person who has been dead for 2500 years!

Says Howie: "Ezekiel . . . was a mystic by nature with a sensitive, artistic imagination which brought forth some of the best-known visions and symbolic figures of speech in Biblical literature. . . . He deviated considerably from 'the norm' but was not truly psychopathic. No prophet is 'normal,' else he would not be a prophet. Ezekiel's strangeness or abnormality would seem to be the secret of his greatness" (Ibid., p. 84).

The prophet Ezekiel has been called "the first dogmatist of the Old Testament," "the Calvin of the Old Testament," "the most influential man in the whole course of Hebrew history," "the father of Judaism," "the prophet of personal responsibility," etc. One who seriously studies Ezekiel's book can readily see how such encomiums can apply to this priest, prophet, and pastor.

The Book—Authorship and Unity. The book, except for redactional glosses, has been ascribed by most scholars to Ezekiel in the Babylonian gôlâ; but modern scholars frequently challenge the unity and single authorship of the book.

Oeder, in 1771, denied the authenticity of chapters 40—48, and Carrodi (1791) in addition rejected 38; 39. Zunz (1831) placed the book in the Persian period, about 440—400, with chapters 25—28 being dated 332 B.C. Seinecke (1876—1884) regarded Ezekiel as a pseudepigraphon from 163 B.C. Kraetzschmar (1900) and Hermann (1908) held that there were two recensions of the book. Gustav Hölscher, in 1924, propounded the radical view that only messages of doom written in the poetic qînâ meter could be attributed to Ezekiel with certainty. Hence, six-sevenths of the work is editorial, he said, only 170 verses out of a total of 1273 having been written by the prophet. C. C. Torrey (1930) regarded the book as a pseudepigraphon dating from 230 B.C., but purporting to be from the time of Manasseh. In support of his views he quoted the uncritical fourth century A.D. Talmud Baba Bathra 14b-15a, treated the Babylonian exile as an invention (contrary to the findings of archaeology; cf. W. F. Albright, "The American Excavations at Tell Beit Mirsim," ZAW, 6 (1929), p. 16), and found many late Aramaisms in the book. For a reply, consult Howie, "The Aramaic of the Book of Ezekiel" (op. cit., pp. 47-68). W. A. Irwin (1943) ascribes only 251 verses in poetic form out of chapters 1—39 to Ezekiel. The rest of the prophecy, 80 per cent of the book, he says, is "false commentary," reflecting many additions from a multitude of hands over a long period of time.

It is well to heed the note of caution sounded by H. G. May in his commentary on Ezekiel: "Literary and historical criticism is not an exact science. . . . The subjective element enters in, for in a book like Ezekiel, scholars are influenced by their total concept of the development and characteristics of Hebrew religion and history" (IB, VI, 45).

The historical allusions, the nature of the language used, the evidence that Ezekiel lived before the Solomonic Temple was destroyed are all positive evidences to support the traditional date of the book (cf. Howie, "The Date of the Prophecy," op. cit., pp. 27-46).

The Masoretic Text (MT, the Hebrew text received, preserved, and given vowel points by scribes between the years 600 and 900 A.D.) has many textual corruptions, as indicated in the commentary. Scholars resort to the versions, particularly to the Septuagint (LXX), in attempting to restore the text. The LXX Papyrus Codex 967, the Chester Beatty papyri, containing Ezekiel 11—17 with lacunae, and the John H. Scheide collection, containing most of Ezekiel 19:12—39:29, and dating before Origen's Hexapla of the third century A.D., are especially useful. It is to be hoped that light on the text of Ezekiel will soon be forthcoming from the Dead Sea Scrolls manuscripts and fragments.

The Book—Contents. A brief reference to the contents of the book is in order. There are many similarities between Jeremiah and Ezekiel in turns of language, figures, and ideas. G. Currey exhibits in a synoptic chart a comparison of Ezekiel, Daniel, Zechariah, and the Apocalypse (Ezekiel in The Speaker's Commentary, pp. 12-16).

Some of the outstanding passages of the book, listed by chapter, are: 1; 2; 3:16-21 (cf. 33:1-9); 8 and 9; 11:19ff. (cf. 18:31; 24:7; 31:31; 32:39; 36:26); 14:14; 15; 16; 17:22-24; 18 (cf. 33); 21:8-17; 21:18-27; 23; 27 and 28; 31; 32:17-22; 34; 36:16-38; 37; 38 and 39; 47.

The chief Messianic passages are: 11:16-20, the Lord, the sanctuary; 17:22-24, the wonderful cedar sprig; 21:26,27, the rightful king; 34:11-31, the faithful shepherd; 36:25-35, the great purification; 37:1-14, the great resurrection; 37:21-28, the great reunion; 38 and 39, the overthrow of Gog; 47:1-12, the life-giving stream out of the Temple.

The fundamental teachings of Ezekiel may be enumerated as follows: (1) Ideas concerning God: his glory, chapters 1; 10; 43; his name, 20:8,9,14,22; 36:22,23; his holiness, 20:41; 28:22-25. (2) Emphasis on individual responsibility, 18:2,5-9, 19,20, an expansion of Jer 31:29,30. (3) Israel's sinfulness at the beginnings of her history, 20:8,9; 23:3ff. (4) Promises of restoration: judgment on the nations, 25–32; 38 and 39; endowment of the land with extraordinary fertility, 36:8, 9,29,30,34,35; a spiritual regeneration, 36:25-27; restoration of the exiles, 37:1-14; the Messianic ruler, 34:11-22,23,24; 37:22ff.; the Lord's return to the regenerated people, 37:26,27; 43:1-12. (5) Organization of the restored community, 40–48. Ezekiel, writing as a priest under the old covenant, pictures the renewed Temple, priests, and sacrificial system as the means whereby God enters into relationship with his redeemed people.

2. Boundaries and division of the holy land. 47:13-23.
3. Portions of the tribes, priests, city, and prince. 48:1-35.

COMMENTARY

The book of Ezekiel comprises two portions: chapters 1–24, a series of messages delivered before the fall of Jerusalem, the general burden of which is "doom"; chapters 25–48, delivered after its fall, with the underlying theme of "hope." The book is more appropriately studied under four headings: chapters 1–24, Prophecies of Judgment on Judah and Jerusalem; chapters 25–32, Prophecies Against Surrounding Nations; chapters 33–39, Prophecies of the Restoration of Israel; chapters 40–48, Visions of the New Temple and the New Law for the Redeemed People.

I. Prophecies Against Judah and Jerusalem. 1:1–24:27.

The minatory discourses against Jerusalem and the house of Israel, delivered before the fall of Jerusalem, consist of: an introductory section, detailing the prophet's call (chs. 1–3); symbolic actions and oracles portraying the overthrow of the city and state (chs. 4–7); a group of visions depicting the frightful sins of Jerusalem that call for its destruction (chs. 8–11); symbolic actions, parables, and allegories setting forth the moral necessity of the captivity (chs. 12–19); and a review of Israel's past history which cries out for certain judgment (chs. 20–24).

A. Introduction: The Call of Ezekiel. 1:1–3:27.

1) Superscription. 1:1-3.

1. In the thirtieth year. Since the time of Origen (185–254) this time note has been held to be a reference to the prophet's own age, the age when priests began their ministry (Num 4:3,4), a dating system without parallel in Hebrew history. Other proposed interpretations: thirtieth year of Jehoiachin's age, 585 B.C. (Snaith); thirtieth year after Josiah's reform, 593/592 B.C. (so Targum, Jerome, Hermann, Hölscher, L. Finkelstein); thirtieth year of the current jubilee period (Seder Olam, Kimchi, Hitzig); thirtieth year of the neo-Babylonian empire, 606/605 B.C. (Scaliger, Ewald); thirtieth year of Manasseh, 667 B.C. (Torrey); thirtieth year of Artaxerxes III, 328 B.C. (sic! L. E. Browne); various emendations: thirteenth year of Nebuchadrezzar's reign, 592 B.C. (Rothstein, Bertholet); fifth year of Jehoiachin's exile, 595/594 B.C. (Hern-trich). Albright and Howie suggest that this was the thirtieth year of the editing of Ezekiel's book, three years after the twenty-seventh year of 29:17, or 567 B.C., and the thirtieth year of Jehoiachin's reign. Compare II Kgs 26:27. All the other dates in the prophecy are reckoned from Jehoiachin's "reign" or captivity, also.

The fourth (month) was mid-June to mid-July, reckoning from the first month, mid-March to mid-April.

Among the captives. In the midst of the exile, or captivity. The Hebrew word gôlâ is a collective noun meaning "exiles," or, in the abstract, "exile."

The river Chebar (Ké-bär) or Nehar-Kebār (1:1,3; 3:15,23; 10:15,20,22; 43:3). Probably the nâru kabari, "the great river," "the grand canal," an artificial watercourse of the Euphrates. Beginning above Babylon, it flows southeast, passes through Nippur, site of ancient Jewish settlements (and of the wealthy banking house of Murashû and Sons, whose archives [464–405 B.C.] contain many Jewish names), and joins the Euphrates again below Ur. Its modern name is Shatt en Nîl, "the river Nile" (see H. V. Hilprecht, Explorations in Bible Lands in the Nineteenth Century, p. 409ff.).

Visions of God here includes visions given by God and visions in which God was seen.

2. King Jehoiachin. The eighteenth, and next to the last, king of Judah, was the son of the petty tyrant, Jehoiakim, and grandson of the godly Josiah. His name, meaning "The Lord establishes," is variously spelled: Yôyākin, Ezk 1:2; Yehôyākin, II Kgs 24:6,8,12,15; 25:27a,b; Jer 52:31a,b; II Chr 36:8,9; Yekonyā, Jer 27:20; Qerê; 28:4; 29:2; Est 2:6; I Chr 3:16,17; Yekon Yāhû, Jer 24:1; Konyāhû, Jer 22:24,28; 37:1. Enthroned by Pharaoh-necho of Egypt, he reigned only three months, when he was deported to Babylon by Nebuchadnezzar in the year 597, along with the upper classes (II Kgs 24:8-16). He was released by Amel Marduk (Evil Merodach), son of Nebuchadnezzar in 560, the thirty-seventh year of his exile (II Kgs 25:27). "The Jehoiachin tablets," published in 1939, refer to "Yaukin" and his sons as receiving rations (Albright, BA, V (Dec. 1942), pp. 49-55). Jeremiah (22:20-30) and Ezekiel 19:5-9) appear sympathetic toward him. His grandson Zerubbabel was in the Messianic line (cf. Mt 1:11,12; Ezr 3:8; I Chr 3:17-19).

The fifth year of king Jehoiachin's captivity (June-July, 592) is the first of fourteen date references in the book of Ezekiel (cf. 1:2; 3:16; 8:1; 20:1; 24:1; 26:1; 29:1; 29:17; 30:20; 31:1; 32:1; 32:17; 33:21; 40:1). Ezekiel was the first prophet to date his messages chronologically. (For dates of the period, cf. J. Finegan, "Nebuchadnezzar and Jerusalem," JBR, 25 (1957), pp. 203-205.)

3. Ezekiel (Yehezqē'l, "God strengthens") the priest. Nothing is known of his father Buzi. Other prophets with priestly background were: Samuel (I Chr 6:28; I Sam 7:9; 11:14; 16:2ff.); Jeremiah (1:1); Zechariah (1:7; Neh 12:4,16; Ezr 5:1). The hand of the Lord was . . . upon him. An expression describing a condition approaching prophetic ecstasy. (See also 3:14,22; 8:1; 33:22; 37:1; 40:1.) Thirteen Hebrew MSS and the Septuagint, Syriac, and Arabic versions read upon me.

2) The Prophet's Inaugural Vision: A Theophany. 1:4-28.

Ezekiel's call came in the form of a theophany, a manifestation of God in the midst of a storm. His vision is described in much greater detail than the theophanies of Moses (Ex 33; 24:9ff.), Amos (7:15), Isaiah (ch. 6), Jeremiah (1:4-10), or Daniel (7:9ff.). He starts from below, describing first the four living beings with the four wings and the four faces, combining human and animal forms to make the throne-car (vv. 4-14), then the wheels within wheels enabling the chariot to move in all four directions without turning (vv. 15-21), and lastly the crystal platform on which was the likeness of a throne, where was seated the likeness of one like fire encircled with rainbow glory (vv. 22-28).

a) The Living Creatures and the Chariot. 1:4-14.

4. For God's appearance in stormy wind (ASV; AV, whirlwind) and cloud, see also Ex 9:24; 19:16; Jud 5:4; I Kgs 19:11; Ps 29; Zech 9:14. Out of the north. Ezekiel here is not borrowing the mythological concept of the north as the home of the gods, but may be suggesting God's transcendence. Fire flashing forth continually. Literally, fire taking hold of itself. Gleaming bronze (RSV). Hebrew, like the eye of ḥashmal. Used only in 1:4,27; 8:2. Compare Akkadian elmešu and Egyptian hesmen, "bronze" (G. R. Driver, VT, I (1951), 60-62).

5. Likeness (demût) and appearance (mar'eh) occur ten and fourteen times in the account. The prophet senses the inadequacy of human speech to describe the ineffable, but he is also careful to avoid anthropomorphism. The four living creatures (ḥayyôt) are later identified as cherubim (10:15,20).

7. Their legs (rather than feet; cf. Gen 49:10; Isa 6:2; 7:20) were straight, without knee joints; and the sole[s] of their feet were rounded (Targum, Aquila) like calves' feet, to exclude bending and turning. 8. Each cherub probably had two hands, for on their four sides may mean "upon the sides of the four of them."

9. The cherubim, with a pair of outstretched wings touching one another, formed the sides of the chariot, which could move in all four directions, without turning (RSV; cf. v. 12). A second pair of wings covered their bodies (v. 11). 10. Each cherub had four faces, the face of a man in front, . . . the face of a lion, on the right side . . . the face of an ox on the left side, and the face of an eagle at the back (cf. 10:14; Rev 4:7).

12. The Spirit of God directed their movements (cf. v. 20; 10:17), just as he directed Ezekiel (2:2; 3:12,24; 11:24). 13. Read and in the midst of the living creatures (so RV marg., Moffatt, RSV, LXX, and Old Lat.). Fire, torches (ASV), and lightning flashed forth from their midst (cf. Ex 3:2; 13:22; 19:18; Num 11:1-3; Deut 4:24; II Kgs 1:12). 14. This verse is omitted by LXX B as a marginal amplification of verse 13. The Hebrew text seems corrupt.

b) The Four Wheels. 1:15-21.

15. The prophet next saw beside the living creatures (RSV) wheels. 16. Their appearance was like the gleaming (lit., eye) of a chrysolite (RSV; AV, beryl). Hebrew, tarshîsh. The stone named from Tarshish, or Tartessus, in southern Spain, is probably the ancient chrysolite (goldstone), corresponding to our gold-colored topaz, not the pale green aquamarine or beryl. A wheel in the middle of a wheel. The most common explanation is that each wheel looked like two wheels cutting each other at right angles to form a compound wheel, which could move in different directions without changing front (v. 17). 18. The Hebrew text is in disorder. The LXX suggests: And they had rims (or, felloes; AV, rings). And I looked at them (instead of Heb and terror was to them). And their rims were full of eyes, symbolizing life and intelligence.

19-21. There was a unity between the living creatures and the wheels, directed by the Spirit of God. Compare references to the wheels of the throne of "the Ancient of days" in Dan 7:9, and of the bases in Solomon's Temple, I Kgs 7:27-30, and to the chariot in I Chr 28:18. In later times the "Ophannim," wheels personified, stand next to the cherubim and seraphim in the presence of God (Enoch 61:10; 71:7).

c) The Platform, the Throne, and the Divine Appearance Thereupon. 1:22-28.

22. The likeness of the firmament. Hebrew rāqîa occurs seventeen times in the Scriptures, in Gen 1; Ezk 1; 10:1; Ps 19:1; 150:1; Dan 12:3. Here the picture is that of a "platform" spread out above (RSV) the heads of the living creatures like crystal (lit., as the eye or gleam of ice; so LXX, Syr, Vulg. Cf. Rev 4:6. Omit "terrible," with LXX).

24. When in motion, the sound of their wings was like the noise of great waters (Ps 42:7; Isa 17:12), like the thunder of the Almighty (Ps 29, "voice of God," seven times), a sound of tumult like the sound of a host (RSV; Isa 17:12; Joel 2:5). Almighty. Hebrew Shadday is a pre-Mosaic term for God, used chiefly in poetry, or in prose with El (God) prefixed (Gen 17:1). The name is of uncertain derivation, but may mean "omniscient, all-knowing," rather than "Almighty," or "of the mountains" (cf. N. Walker, "A New Interpretation of the Divine Name Shaddai," ZAW, 72 (1960), pp. 64-66). 25. This verse is omitted by nine Hebrew manuscripts, the LXX, and a Syriac manuscript, as a dittography.

26. On the platform was a throne in appearance of a sapphire (cf. Ex 24:10). This may be the ancient marble-like, azure stone known as lapis lazuli. 27. The upper part of the human likeness seated on the throne shown like gleaming bronze (RSV; lit., like the eye of ḥashmal; cf. v. 4), which fire enclosed round about (lit., like the appearance of fire a house to it round about); while the lower part, also, was covered by a fiery brightness.

28. The brightness round about the Lord's throne was as the appearance of the bow that is in the cloud. This suggests calm after storm. To the Hebrews and to us the rainbow recalls the covenant made with Noah (cf. Gen 9:12ff.; Rev 4:3; 10:1). The glory of the Lord (kᵉbôd Y H W H, 1:28; 3:12,23; 10:4,18; 11:23; 43:4,5; 44:4; and "the glory of the God of Israel," 8:4; 9:3; 10:19; 11:22; 43:2) in Ezekiel means primarily "an appearance of light and splendor indicating the divine Presence" (Cook, Ezekiel, ICC, p. 22). The root idea of kābôd is "weight," "heaviness," and conveys the idea of some external, physical manifestation of dignity, pre-eminence, or majesty (cf. Betteridge, "Glory," ISBE, II, 1235 ff.).

In the presence of God, Ezekiel recognized his unworthiness (cf. Gen 32:30; Ex 20:19,20; 24:11; Isa 6:5; Jer 1:6).

From his vision Ezekiel learned that God was not limited to Palestine, but was present in Babylon among the exiles, descending to the earth on cherubim and storm (Ps 18:10; 104:3). The chariot could move swiftly in all directions, symbolized by the number four. The figures facing four directions (vv. 9,10,17) suggest the thought that all parts of the universe are open to the gaze of God. The wings connected the vision with heaven and the wheels with earth. Thus no spot is inaccessible to the divine presence and energy. The omnipresence of God is hereby forcefully conveyed.

The figure seated on the throne speaks of the omnipotence and sovereign rule of God (v. 26). The sovereignty of God is manifested over inanimate creation—wind, cloud, fire, thunder (vv. 4,24), and animate creation—the four living beings (vv. 5,10).

The general human form and various faces of the living creatures express the dignity assigned by God to the various portions of his creation, a reflection of His majesty: man, intelligence; the eagle, swiftness; the ox, strength; the lion, majesty. The rabbis explain the symbolism thus: "Man is exalted among creatures; the eagle is exalted among birds; the ox is exalted among domestic animals; the lion is exalted among the wild beasts; and all of them have received dominion, and greatness has been given them, yet they are stationed below the chariot of the Holy One" (Midrash Rabbah Shemoth, § 23, on Ex 15:1). The noise of the cherubim's wings (v. 24) is the testimony of all creation to God (Ps 19:1), while the veiled bodies (vv. 8,11) represent the inability of all creatures to stand in the presence of a holy God (cf. Isa 6:2). The Church Fathers employed the four faces as emblems of the Evangelists. Irenaeus, Jerome, Athanasius, and Augustine vary in their usage. Jerome's, which has the greatest currency, is as follows: the man, Matthew; the lion, Mark; the ox, Luke; the eagle, John. While the Babylonian deities Marduk, Nebo, Nergal, and Ninib were denoted by the ox, man, lion, and eagle respectively (Jeremias), Ezekiel most likely derived his symbolism from the figures in Solomon's Temple (I Kgs 6:23-35; 7:27-37) and from the mercy seat above the ark in the Tabernacle (Ex 25:10-22).

The eyes on the wheels suggest omniscient intelligence (v. 18), while the spirit in the wings and the wheels (vv. 20,21) pictures the pervasive working of God's Spirit seen in the unity and harmony of his works. The divine purity and holiness are exhibited by the fire (v. 27), while the rainbow around the throne illustrates sublime beauty, and perhaps, also, the idea of forgiveness and mercy (v. 28).

This glory was seen by Ezekiel at Chebar (1:4-28), gave him a message at Tel-abib (3:12ff.,22ff.), transported him from his home in the exile to the entrance of the gateway of the inner court of the Temple in Jerusalem (8:4,5), departed from the cherubim in the Temple to the threshold of the Temple (9:3; 10:4), mounted up from the threshold to the eastern gate of the Temple's outer court (10:15,16,18,19), went up from the midst of the city to the Mount of Olives on the east side of the city (11:22,23), but returned to fill the new Temple and cleansed people (43:2-7; 44:4).

3) His Initiation into the Prophetic Office. 2:1–3:27.

In chapters 2; 3, the prophet is commissioned to be a fearless messenger to a rebellious people (2:1-7), is commanded to assimilate as his own God's word or message (2:8–3:3), is endowed with courage to speak to a calloused Israel (3:4-9), is impelled on a mission to the exiles at Tel-abib (3:10-15), is charged with the responsibility of a watchman (3:16-21), and is placed under a restraint of silence and seclusion (3:22-27).

a) The Prophet's Commission. 2:1-7.

1. Son of man (ben-'ādām) occurs ninety-three times in Ezekiel, meaning simply "man" or "mortal man." The term expresses creaturely weakness in the presence of God's majesty and power (cf. Dan 8:17). The Aramaic bar'ĕnosh, "son of man," of Dan 7:13, is a Messianic title. Jesus' use of the title perhaps was intended to conceal as well as reveal his true nature (Mt 8:20; 11:19; 16:13; Jn 12:34; Mk 2:10,28; 8:31; 9:9,12; 10:45; 14:41, etc.; cf. G. P. Gould, "Son of Man," HDCG, II, 659-665; and J. Stalker, "Son of Man," ISBE, V, 2828-2830).

2. The spirit entered into me. While the word is without the definite article in the Hebrew, this is the Holy Spirit. (For similar usage see 3:12,14,24; 8:3; 11:1,5,24; 37:1; 43:5.) In 11:5 and 37:1

"the Spirit of the Lord" occurs, and in 11:24 "the Spirit of God" (cf. H. B. Swete, "Holy Spirit," HDB, II, 402-411).

3. To the people of Israel. The MT has sons of Israel; LXX, house of Israel. This is the usual phrase in Ezekiel. To a nation of rebels. MT gôyîm nearly always means "heathen nations." The word is omitted by the LXX and the Old Latin. It appears in the singular gôy, "nation," in the Syriac. Ezekiel's mission was to the nation as a whole, both in Jerusalem and in exile.

4. The Lord GOD. The Masoretic Text has 'Ădōnāy Yahweh. The ancient Hebrews read 'Ădōnāy, "Lord," in place of the sacred tetragrammaton Yahweh (so called from the four consonants YHWH, vowels not being written in ancient times). When Ădonay and Yahweh occurred together, the Hebrews read the tetragrammaton as 'Ĕlohîm, God. In English the tetragrammaton is represented in solid capitals, LORD or GOD. An unusual feature of Ezekiel is the occurrence of the twofold name LORD God over 200 times. A. D. Johnson, Gehman, and Kase, editors of The John H. Scheide Biblical Papyri: Ezekiel, claim that only Yahweh, the LORD, should be read in these passages (pp. 48-63).

5. There hath been a prophet among them. Fulfillment is the test of a true prophet. See Deut 18:21,22; Jer 28:9.

6. Though briers and thorns. The two words are sārābîm and sallônîm. The former is found only here in the OT, and is probably an Aramaic loan word; the latter, of unknown etymology, appears also in 28:24. In Sir 4:2 and in the Aramaic, the root srb means "to contradict." The LXX and the Syriac render, "for they will contradict." The Hebrew idiom supports the English reading. A rebellious house. "House of rebellion" (bêt mᵉrî, as in verse 5). This translation is supported by thirty-two Hebrew manuscripts, as well as by the LXX and the Syriac.

b) The Prophet's Inspiration. 2:8–3:3.

8. Hear . . . Be not . . . rebellious. Cf. Jer 1:7,8,17; Isa 50:5.

9. A roll of a book. In Palestine and Babylonia, skins were ordinarily used for scrolls. The Dead Sea Cave Isaiah scroll (I Q Isaᵃ) is of parchment, twenty-four feet long. (Cf. Jer 36; Ps 40:7. See J. P. Hyatt, "The Writing of an Old Testament Book," BA, VI (1943), 41-80).

10. Written within and without. Literally, it was written (on the) face and hinder part, i.e., on both sides, contrary to usual practice. Lamentation, following the reading qînâ, "elegy, dirge," of the LXX, the Old Latin and Arabic versions, and the Targum, rather than the unusual masculine plural, qînîm, of the MT. Mourning. Translated sigh (Ps 90:9), and rumbling (of thunder; Job 37:2). Woe. This translation is arrived at by pointing hî of the MT as hôy, along with the LXX, and the Old Latin, Arabic, and Syriac versions. Before the fall of Jerusalem in 586, Ezekiel's messages in chapters 1–24 were of doom.

3:1. Eat that thou findest. Literally, what you find, meet with. The Lord touched Jeremiah's mouth (Jer 1:9) but gave Ezekiel a scroll to eat. God's immanence and transcendence are illustrated by the modes. 3. Eat. Literally, make your belly eat. And fill your stomach. Belly and stomach (beṭen and mᵉ'îm) are both used of "abdomen," "womb," "inward parts," and figuratively as the "seat of the emotions." The message was given by God but was to be assimilated by the prophet and made his own. Although the words were bitter, the scroll tasted sweet because its contents were God's word, and the privilege of being God's messenger is a great joy. Among the passages that illustrate the inspiration of the mind and will through the "eating" of God's word and that speak of the sweetness of that word are: Jer 15:16; Deut 8:3; Ps 19:11; 119:103; Rev 10:9,10. (For inspiration through drinking, cf. II Esd 14:38-41.)

c) The Prophet's Encouragement. 3:4-9.

4. Get thee unto the house of Israel. This and similar passages (e.g., 6:2; 7:2; 12:10,11; 16:2; 21:7; 22:2,3) are held to support a non-Babylonian residence for Ezekiel and a mission to his contemporaries in Jerusalem (cf. Introd.)

5,6. Strange speech and . . . hard language. Literally, deep of lip and heavy of tongue (cf. Ex 4:10; Isa 28:11; 33:19; and for a similar use of the genitive of specification, see Ezk 16:26; 17:3,6,7). Calloused Israel is often contrasted with the underprivileged heathen (cf. 5:16,17; 16:4,5,51; Jer 2:10,11; Mt 11:24-27; Lk 4:24-27). 7. All the house of Israel are impudent and hardhearted. Strong of forehead and hard of heart (Literal. Cf. 2:4; Jer 5:3; Isa 48:4).

8. Strong. Perhaps a play on Ezekiel's name, God strengthens. Cf. Jer 1:18; 15:20. 9. As an adamant harder than flint (ASV). Hebrew shāmîr is a foreign word, possibly related to the Akkadian ašmar, "emery." It is also translated ada- mant and diamond (cf. Jer 17:1; Zech 7:12). For opposition between the true prophet and the people, see Amos 7:10-17; Jer 20:7-18; 26:1-24.

d) The Prophet's Mission. 3:10-15.

11. Get you to the exiles (cf. 1:1), "to the sons of" thy people. Hebrew 'am, "people," is used in most cases for the chosen nation. The prophet's mission was to the house of Israel (v. 4), but in actuality it was confined to his fellow exiles. Yet he makes little reference to the circumstances of the exiles.

12. Then the spirit took me up. See also 3:14; 8:3; 11:1,24; 43:5. These are not references to physical levitations, as in Bel and the Dragon, verses 36,39; nor to clairvoyance; but to the mystical experiences of a highly sensitive soul under the exaltation of the Spirit. And as the glory of the Lord arose from its place. Since k and m are easily confused in the paleo-Hebrew script, Hitzig and Luzatto, arrived at this reading by changing brwk (bārûk) of the MT to brwm (bᵉrûm). There is no reference to a heavenly anthem being sung or heard. Rather, the prophet heard the sound of a great earthquake (AV, noise of a great rushing). 13. Sound of the wings . . . as they touched one another. Literally, kissed. That sounded like a great earthquake (RSV). And a sound of (lit.).

14. I went in bitterness. An adverbial accusative (cf. 27:30). Ezekiel, in sympathy with God, felt bitterness and heat of spirit against his people and at his task (cf. Jer 6:11; 20:7-11). Though the chariot had gone, he felt the hand of the Lord impelling him.

15. I came to them of the captivity at Tel-abib. In obedience to God, the prophet went to the principal colony of exiles by the river of Chebar, at the ancient Tilabûbu, "mound of the storm-flood" (cf. Hilprecht, Explorations in Bible Lands, p. 411). For the names of other colonies, see Ezr 2:59; Neh 7:61. The Hebrew phrase, following Chebar, reads, and who were dwelling there, or following the Qᵉrê, and I sat where they sat. It is lacking in two Hebrew manuscripts and the Syriac. And I sat there overwhelmed (ASV). Literally, showing horror, an inwardly transitive verb (see G-K, § 53d and § 67cc; cf. Ezr 9:3,4; Dan 9:27; 11:31).

e) The Prophet's Responsibility. 3:16-21.

17. I have made thee a watchman; i.e., one spying, or a sentinel (cf. Jer 6:17; Isa 57:10). The prophet's call to be a pastor, a watchman for the souls of individuals as well as for the nation, is more fully expounded in 18:1-32 and 33:1-20. In the present paragraph four cases are considered – the habitual sinner who is not warned (v. 18), the sinner who is warned but does not repent (v. 19), the righteous man who apostatizes but is not warned (v. 20), and the righteous man who is warned and remains righteous (v. 21). Ezekiel is accountable for the faithful deliverance of God's message, not for its success or failure (vv. 17-19). Die (v. 18) and live (v. 21) do not come up to the highest NT sense, but refer respectively (1) to perishing in the destruction of the state and being excluded from the restored kingdom of God, and (2) to being preserved and entering into the blessedness of the kingdom.

20. I lay a stumblingblock. This may only mean that the "temptations of the righteous are under God's providential control" (Dummelow's Commentary). The Hebrews ascribed temptation to God, recognizing that Satan himself is subject to the divine will (cf. Gen 22:1; Ex 4:21; Jer 6:21; contrast II Sam 24:1 with I Chr 21:1). 21. If thou warn the righteous man. This follows the versions rather than the MT, if you warn him, the righteous man. The second appearance of "righteous man" in the MT is lacking in the LXX, and in the Old Latin and Syriac.

f) The Prophet's Restraint. 3:22-27.

Some scholars understand this section to indicate a pathological element in Ezekiel: that he was afflicted with catalepsy and aphasia (vv. 23,26), and that his countrymen had to bind him with cords after he became demented (v. 25).

However, it is best to regard the various expressions of constraint as figurative for a period of silence and inactivity on the part of the prophet. Possibly Ezekiel prophesied publicly to the exiles after his call and met with opposition. Was this opposition occasioned by hostility after the execution of certain false prophets who had incited the people to rebellion? (cf. Jer 29:21-23; H. L. Ellison, Ezekiel: the Man and His Message, p. 31) He was summoned by God to the plain (v. 22), where in glorious theophany the Lord instructed him to cease being a public reprover for a time (v. 26). He was to open his mouth only in his own house to those who consulted him privately (v. 24; 26:8). This intermittent silence prevailed from the beginning of the siege of Jerusalem (24:1,27) until news of the fall of the city was brought to the prophet by a fugitive about two years later. Then Ezekiel spoke freely, and the people realized that God had spoken.

22. The plain. Of Babylonia. Not the place of the vision in 1:1 (cf. 8:4; 37:1,2). 23. The glory of the Lord. See on 1:28. 25. They shall put bands upon thee. This refers neither to sympathetic magic nor to the fettering of the "demented" prophet, for no acts of hostility are recorded, but to God's restraining him (cf. 4:8), except as He bade him speak (vv. 26,27).

B. Overthrow of the City and State Predicted. 4:1—7:27.

In this cycle of threats the prophet predicts the fall of Jerusalem and Judah by means of four symbolic acts (4:1—5:17), an oracle against the idolatrous centers of the state (6:1-14), and a dirge over the downfall of the kingdom of Judah (7:1-27).

1) Four Symbolic Actions Concerning Jerusalem. 4:1—5:17.

In 4:1—5:4 there are recorded four symbolic actions setting forth the coming siege of Jerusalem, with its attendant hardships and the captivity following thereupon. The prophets Ahijah (I Kgs 18), Isaiah (Isa 8; 20), Jeremiah (Jer 13; 14; 18; 19; 27; 28; 34; 35; 43; 51) all made effective use of symbolic action; and Ezekiel also employed symbolism: 3:25,26; 4:1—54; 12:3-7,17-20; 21:11,12; 24:3-5,15-24; 37:15-17. Scholars disagree as to whether these symbols were enacted in whole, in part, or not at all. Some are held to be so extraordinary or so ludicrous as to be impossible to carry out. But they would not have seemed ludicrous to Orientals! These symbols are to be regarded as illustrative, not as sympathetic magic. It may be that whereas the intent of the symbols was actually carried out, metaphorical language is used in describing some of their details (cf. 4:3,12; contrast 8:3. The prophet was not carried to Jerusalem literally by the hair of his head, but in a vision). Attempts have been made to reconstruct the chapter so as to give it more logical order—but how can visions be logical?—and these reconstructions are conjectural at best.

a) Symbol of the Siege of Jerusalem. 4:1-3.

In this section the prophet draws on a clay brick the representation of the siege of Jerusalem.

1. Take a brick. Of soft clay, such as Babylonians used to write or draw on with a three-cornered stylus.

2. Fort[s] (AV). Siegeworks; siege wall or wheeled watchtower. The word dāyēq is probably Aramaic. A mound (ASV). To connect the tower with the walls of the besieged city. Camp[s]. Or detachments of soldiers. Battering rams. Or breakers. For these operations, see 17:17; 21:22; 26:8; Deut 20:20; Mic 4:11; Isa 29:3. See also the relief of Sennacherib's army besieging Lachish (II Kgs 18) on the palace walls at Nineveh in J. B. Pritchard, The Ancient Near East (Fig. 101).

3. Take . . . an iron pan; i.e., a plate such as was used for baking. This act was to represent the enemy's stout attacks against the city and to suggest the barrier between God and the people.

b) Symbol of the Duration of the Exile. 4:4-8.

4,5. Lie thou also upon thy left side. For the Northern Kingdom, Israel. When facing the sunrise, left is north and right is south (cf. Gen 14:15; Ps 121:5). I will lay the punishment . . . upon you. The emended text is preferable to the MT. Here Ezekiel represents Israel bearing her iniquity rather than vicariously suffering for it. Three hundred and ninety days. Equal to the number of years of their punishment. The LXX has "one hundred and ninety days." 6. Lie down . . . on your right side for Judah; i.e., for the southern kingdom. Forty days . . . each day for a year. Same in the LXX.

7. In subject matter this verse seems to belong with verses 1-3.

8. I will lay bands upon thee, and thou shalt not turn thee from one side to another. Not physical bonds, but the divine constraint observed in 3:25; a symbol of the loss of freedom awaiting the people.

Some scholars hold that catalepsy or a prolonged illness is the motif behind this second symbol. It seems best to follow the comments made at 3:25 and find here a similar reference to Ezekiel's being bound spiritually and psychically. When he lay down in the privacy of his house, he lay on his left or right side, in keeping with the divine instructions.

From the fall of Jerusalem in 586 to the first return of the exiles in 538 is 48 years, which may in round numbers represent the duration of the punishment of the house of Judah (v. 6). On the 390 (or 190) days there is wide disagreement. The penalties of Israel and Judah would have been concurrent for the last forty years, but what is the terminus a quo? From the disruption of the monarchy in 922 B.C. to the return in 538 is 384 years, which is very near to 390 years. Perhaps this could be looked upon as a period of iniquity and punishment for the Northern Kingdom. In the books of Kings the total length of the reigns of the kings of Judah from Rehoboam to Zedekiah is given as 394½ years; but this can hardly be equated with Israel's iniquity or punishment. Others find some mystical similarity to the 430 years of Egyptian bondage by adding 390 and 40! Working from 734 B.C., the ravages of Tiglath-pileser (II Kgs 15:29), to the exile yields 148 years, which would be very near to the 150 years of the LXX in the added phrase in 4:5. From the fall of Samaria in 721 to 538 is 183 years, which is close to the figure of 190 years in the LXX in 4:5,9. Perhaps the numbers are to be taken ideally rather than literally. With the data at our disposal, it appears unwise to dogmatize as to how the 40 and 390 (or 190) years are to be reckoned.

c) Symbol of Scarcity During the Siege. 4:9-17.

9. The prophet was to make a mongrel bread from wheat, barley, beans, lentiles (a leguminous plant bearing a small reddish bean; cf. Gen 25:34), millet (dōḥan, a hapax legomenon, probably an Aramaic word; an annual grass which grows and matures without rain, the seeds of which are ground to flour and mixed with other cereals to form breadstuffs for the poor), and fitches, or spelt, a kind of wild wheat (cf. II Sam 17:28). The number of . . . days . . . thou shalt lie upon thy side. Unless this is looked upon as an intrusion from the previous symbol, the indication is that the second and third symbols were enacted simultaneously. The prophet could not have been literally bound on his side and also have gathered grain and baked bread.

10. Eat . . . by weight, twenty shekels a day. A shekel weighs four tenths of an ounce, avoirdupois. His food allowance was thus about eight ounces a day! 11. Water . . . the sixth part of an hin. Since a hîn is about six and four-tenths quarts, his water ration was about a quart a day!

12. Dung. Bread baked on human dung would be revolting and polluting (cf. Deut 23:12-14; Lev 5:3; 7:21). 13. Eat their bread unclean among the nations (RSV). Foreign nations and their products were considered unclean (cf. Amos 7:17; Hos 9:3,4).

14. Polluted. As a member of a priestly family, Ezekiel had observed the dietary laws (cf. Ex 22:30; Lev 7:18,24; 17:11-16; 19:7; 22:8; Deut 12:16; 14:21). Verse 14 is one of the few recorded prayers in the book. 15. Ezekiel was permitted to substitute cow's dung, which is still used as fuel by the Bedouins and fellahin of Arabia and Egypt.

16. Break the staff of bread. Cf. 12:17-19; 14:13; Lev 26:26. 17. Waste away under their punishment (RSV). Cf. 24:23; 33:10; Lev 26:39.

d) Symbol of the Destruction of Jerusalem's Inhabitants. 5:1-4.

1. Take a sharp sword; use it as a barber's razor (RSV). As the razor of (so the Syriac, Theodotion, Symmachus, Old Latin). A barber. The noun is gallāb, from the Akkadian gallābu, by way of the Phoenician or other Canaanite dialect. A hapax legomenon. Pass it over your head and beard (RSV). Figurative of sweeping the city clean of its inhabitants (cf. Isa 7:20; Jer 41:5). Take thee balances to weigh. "The divine justice is accurate" (A. B. Davidson).

2. Burn with fire. One third of the hair was to be burned, symbolic of the consuming of pestilence and famine; a second third was to be smitten with the sword, as was to be the lot of many inhabitants; and a third part was to be scattered to the wind, a figure of the scattered exiles (cf. v. 12). 3. A few in number . . . in thy skirts, i.e., of his robe. A reference to the pious remnant. For other allusions to the remnant in Ezekiel, see 6:8-10; 9:8; 11:13. 4. Take of them . . . and cast them into the . . . fire. Even this tiny remnant was to be subjected to additional trials.

e) Explanation of the Symbols. 5:5-17.

5. Jerusalem . . . in the midst of the nations. This is not to equate Jerusalem with the "navel of the earth" of the later apocalyptic, rabbinical, and Christian writers (cf. Eth Enoch 26:1,2; The Book of Jubilees 8:12,19). Israel, it is true, was located in the midst of the traffic lanes connecting Asia, Africa, and Europe; but more especially was she the center of God's providential choice and care (cf. Ex 19:5,6; Deut 7:6-8; 14:2; 26:19). 6. And she has wickedly rebelled (RSV). This reading of the MT is preferable to that of the versions, and she has changed (Theodotion, Symmachus, Samaritan, Targum, and AV). The root is mārâ. For the heinousness of Israel's sin, see 16:47, 48; Jer 2:10,11; 18:13.

7. Because you are more turbulent. Böttcher emends the MT's hămonkem (root hāmâ, "to roar, be turbulent") to hamrôtkem (root mārâ, as in v. 6), "because of your showing rebellion." And . . . in my statutes. Supported by the LXX, and the Old Latin and Syriac. Have done. The "not" (AV, neither) of the MT is omitted by about thirty Hebrew manuscripts and the Syriac. 8. In the sight (lit., eyes) of the nations. God will vindicate his holiness before the world (cf. 20:9,14,22,41; 22:16; 28:25; 38:23; 39:27). 9. I have not done. Unparalleled punishments upon Israel from the Lord (cf. Lam 1:12; 2:20; 4:6).

10. The fathers shall eat the sons. Cannibalism (cf. II Kgs 6:24-29; Lev 26:29; Deut 28:53; Lam 4:10). 11. Thou hast defiled my sanctuary. See chapter 8 for details. I will cut you down ('egda'). This RSV translation follows ten Hebrew manuscripts, as well as Symmachus, the Targum, the Vulgate, and the Masoretic Text.

12. A third part . . . shall die. These judgments are referred to in verse 2 (cf. Jer 14:12). 13. I will be comforted. Strong anthropopathy. "I will comfort myself" by taking vengeance (cf. Isa 1:24). In my zeal. God's 'jealousy' incites him to punish his people's careless disloyalty (16:38,42) and to restore them lest the heathen question his power (36:5, 6; 38:19; 39:25-29). The solemn asseveration, "I the Lord have spoken," appears in verses 13,15,17; 17:21,24; 21:17, 32; 23:34; 24:14; 26:14; 30:12; 34:24; 36:36; 37:14; 39:5; and elsewhere in phraseology closely resembling this.

15. You shall be a reproach (RSV). This is the reading of the LXX, the Syriac, the Vulgate, and the Targum, which is in keeping with the rest of the verse. 16. When I loose against you (RSV). This proposed reading differs only by one letter – bākem in place of bāhem – from the MT. 17. "The four sore acts of judgment," famine, evil beasts, pestilence, and sword, also appear in 14:20. See also Lev 26:22-26; Deut 32:24,25; Rev 6:7,8. The judgments on Israel have significance for the world (Ezk 5:5-8); for Israel (5:13-17); and for the survivors (6:8-10).

2) An Oracle Against the Mountains of Israel, Seats of Idolatry. 6:1-14.

While the prophet denounces Jerusalem in chapters 4—5, in this chapter he denounces the nation.

a) Fate of the High Places. 6:1-7.

2. The mountains of Israel. They formed the chief topographical feature of the land of Israel. The phrase is peculiar to Ezekiel. See also 6:2,3; 19:9; 33:28; 34:13,14; 35:12; 36:1,4,8; 37:22; 38:8; 39:2,4,17. In 36:1-15, the prophet portrays the felicity of the mountains under the new kingdom. 3. The mountains . . . hills . . . rivers . . . and valleys were physical features different from the flat Babylonian plains. They were also seats of idolatry of many kinds (Amos 7:9; Hos 4:13; Jer 2:20,23; 7:31,32; Isa 57:3-12; Zech 12:11; Mal 2:10,11). The course of idolatry had been checked in Israel by such leaders as Samuel, David, Asa, and Hezekiah. Manasseh re-introduced many types of pagan worship. Josiah engaged in a far-reaching reform in 622 B.C. (II Kgs 23:13-20), but his successors did not continue his work. High places. For a description of the high place, see W. F. Albright, Archaeology and the Religion of Israel, pp. 92,105-107; G. E. Wright, Biblical Archaeology, pp. 113, 114.

4. Incense altars. Not "sun images" of the older versions. See also Lev 26:30; II Chr 14:3; 34:4,7; Isa 17:8; 27:9; Ezk 6:4,6. Small limestone altars, with a horn at each corner, and pottery stands for the burning of incense have been found at Megiddo. An inscribed specimen found at Palmyra in Syria has established the identity of the ḥammān (cf. Albright, op. cit., pp. 144-147,215; Wright, op. cit., pp. 113,114). Your idols. Hebrew gillûlîm occurs thirty-nine times in Ezekiel and only nine times in the rest of the OT. The root means to roll, but the specific derivation of this name of contempt is obscure.

5. Scatter your bones. This was one method of defiling altars (cf. II Kgs 23:16). 6. That your altars may be laid waste. This translation follows the reading wᵉyēshammû of Symmachus, the Syriac, Targum, and Vulgate, in place of wᵉyēʾshᵉmû, "and will be made guilty," of the MT. 7. Ye shall know that I am the Lord. This statement, with its variants, Ezekiel's most characteristic phrase, appears more than sixty times in the book. The Lord is identified as the true God, the sole deity.

b) A Remnant Spared. 6:8-10.

8. I will leave a remnant. "He seasons judgment with grace" (Flack; cf. on 5:3). 9. When I have broken their wanton heart (RSV). Reading shābartî (so Aquila, Symmachus, Theodotion, the Targum, and the Vulgate) in place of MT, nishbartî, "I have been broken." Literally, their heart which has been committing adultery. Compare the allegories in Ezekiel 16 and 23. And blinded their eyes (RSV).

Some such verb is needed to expand the harsh literal zeugma, "broken their heart and eyes." 10. In vain. Hebrew ḥinnām (a hap. leg.; cf. Assyr. annáma, "in vain"), a substantive used as an adverb, from ḥēn; thus, "gratuitously, for nought, in vain."

c) Utter Desolation. 6:11-14.

The repetitions in this paragraph are characteristic of Ezekiel, and they emphasize his function as a watchman.

11. The prophet is to exult at the punishment of the abominations of Israel (cf. 21:14,17; 22:13; 25:6) and to exclaim, Alas! or Aha! (cf. 25:3; 26:2; 36:2). 12. Far off . . . and . . . near. Judgment will come not only on Palestine but on idolatrous Jews wherever they be. He that is besieged, or better, preserved (lit., watched; cf. Isa 26:3). The survivors shall die of famine.

13. Under every green tree, and under every thick oak. Literally, under every luxuriant tree and . . . leafy terebinth. The terebinth ('ēlâ) is a deciduous tree with pinnate leaves and red berries (Pistacia terebinthus), which often reaches a height of forty feet, and has wide spreading branches. It yields a type of turpentine. The verse refers to the cult of the fertility goddess (cf. Hos 4:13). Sweet savour. Hebrew, odor of soothing, i.e., tranquilizing odor of ascending sacrifices (Gen 8:21; Ex 29:18,25,41; Lev 1:9). Used with reference to idols, here and in 16:19; 20:28.

14. I will . . . make the land desolate . . . from the wilderness to Riblah (so variants in Ginsberg's Masoretic Bible and in Codex Petropolitanus of 916 A.D.); i.e., from the southernmost boundary to the ideal northern boundary (cf. Num 34:11, 12). The MT and the LXX read from the wilderness of Diblathah. There is no such place known, nor would the Moabitish towns mentioned in Num 33:45; Jer 48:22 be logical sites in this context. The name of the town is in the accusative (or he directive). Michaelis, pointing out the ready confusion between the letters d and r in both archaic and square characters, proposed Riblah, a city fifty miles south of Hamath, on the Orontes River (see also II Kgs 23:33; 25:20,21; Ezk 48:1).

3) Dirge over the Downfall of Judah. 7:1-27.

Ezekiel 7 is a climax to chapters 4–6. In partly lyrical, partly homiletical fashion, it declares that the time has come for the final punishment of Israel. Four short oracles of doom open the chapter (vv. 1-18) with the recurring theme, "the end has come" (vv. 2-4), "evil has come" (vv. 5-9), "the day has come" (vv. 10, 11), "the time has come" (vv. 12,13). The final scenes of the desolation of the state (vv. 14-27) picture the uselessness of defense (vv. 14-18), the wealth of the city becoming a prey to the invader (vv. 19-22), and the stupefaction seizing all classes of people (vv. 23-27). The city (vv. 13-15), king (v. 27), Temple (vv. 20-22), and enemy (v. 24) are all referred to in enigmatic fashion. The chapter abounds in repetitions, and the Hebrew presents many textual problems.

a) Four Oracles of Doom. 7:1-13.

2. The end is come upon the four corners of the land. This prophecy is restricted to Israel (vv. 1,3,7. Cf Amos 8:2; Jer 19:22). 3. I will send my anger. Cf. Job 20:23; Ps 78:49. And I . . . will judge thee. Literally, and I will give (or put) upon you all your abominations (cf. vv. 4,8,9; 23:49). Carrying the guilt was part of the punishment. 4. Mine eye shall not spare thee. Cf. 5:11; 7:9; 8:18; 9:10. While the language of verses 5-9 applies to Judah's fall, it has resemblances to eschatological passages, e.g., 30:3; Joel 1:15; Mal 4:1; Dan 12:1.

5. An evil, an only evil. Disaster after disaster, evil after evil. This rendering, found in thirty Hebrew manuscripts and the Targum, is derived from reading 'ahar, "after," in place of 'ahat, "one," of the MT (lit., an evil, one evil has come). Cf. v. 26. 6. The end . . . has awakened (RSV). An instance of paronomasia, or play on words, haqqēṣ hēqqîṣ. Similar paronomasia occurs in Amos 8:2 on "summer fruit" and "end," qāyiṣ and qēṣ (fall fruit . . . Israel will fall) and Jer 1:11 on "almond" and "watching," shāqēd and shōkēd (an awake tree . . . am awake).

7. Your doom (AV, morning). This rendering of ṣ^{e}pîrâ assumes a root like the cognate Akkadian sapâru, "to destroy," rather than the meaning "diadem" of Isa 28:5, or morning of the AV based on Aramaic saphrâ, "dawn." The day . . . is near. Cf. verse 10. In popular thinking, "the day" meant the victory of Israel over her foes (cf. Isa 9:3; Hos 2:2; Ezk 30:9), but the prophets stressed its aspect of judgment on Israel (Amos 5:18; Isa 2:12ff.; 13:9; Jer 30:7; Ezk 7:19; 13:5; 36:33; Mal 4:1). A later development assigned to "the day of Jehovah" the overthrow of heathenism (Jer 46:10; Ezk 30:2ff.; 38:10,14; 39:8,11,13; Zech 14:3) and the ushering in of the new order, the rule of God (Ezk 39:22; Mal 4:2). Tumult, and not of joyful shouting upon the mountains (RSV). Noise of battle and not (joyous) shout of mountains (lit.). The MT is obscure.

Verses 8,9 are virtually a repetition of 3,4.

10. The day . . . is come. Cf. verse 7. Injustice has blossomed (RSV). The Masoretic Text has matteh, "rod." Substituting other vowel points, one gets mutteh, "perverted justice" (cf. 9:9). This parallels pride hath budded. These are most likely references to the ruling power in Jerusalem. 11. None of them . . . for them. The Hebrew text here is uncertain. The suggested rendering of the RSV is as good as any that have been offered. (See T. H. Gaster, "Ezekiel and the Mysteries," JBL, 60 (1941), 299.)

12,13. Property is of little value to either buyer or seller when exile threatens (Isa 24:2). 13. For wrath is upon all their multitude (RSV). Reading ḥārôn, "wrath" (cf. v. 12b), for hāzôn, "vision," of the MT. The last half of the verse reads literally, and a man—in his iniquity (is) his life—they shall not strengthen themselves. The RSV presents a good conjectural reading.

b) Final Scenes of the Desolation of the State. 7:14-27.

14. Made all ready (ASV). An anomalous form of the infinitive absolute used as a continuation of the preceding finite verb (cf. Isa 5:5. Gesenius–Kautzsch, op. cit., 72z, 113zN). For my wrath. Cf. verses 12,13. 15. Sword . . . pestilence . . . famine. Cf. 5:2,12; 6:12; 33:27; Jer 14:18; Lam 1:20.

16. Like doves . . . mourning. Literally, murmuring or growling (cf. Isa 38:14; 59:11). The Syriac rendering, All of them will die each because of his own iniquity, seems premature in view of the following verses. 17. Paralysis of strength is depicted here. Cf. 21:7; Isa 13:7; Jer 6:24. 18. Gird . . . with sackcloth . . . and baldness upon all their heads. These were used to lament disaster (27:31; Isa 15:2,3; Jer 48:37) and to mourn the dead (Gen 37:34; Jer 16:6; Mic 1:16). The Hebrews were forbidden to make tonsures for the dead (Lev 21:5; Deut 14:1; Ezk 44:20).

19. Their gold shall be removed. Literally, shall be impurity, i.e., the ceremonial impurity of menstruation (Lev 15:19ff.; Ezk 18:6); or of touching a corpse (Num 19:13,20,21); and here of idolatry (cf. v. 20 and 36:17). Ezekiel "has the N. T. suspicion of money" (Lofthouse, op. cit., p. 92). Their silver and gold . . . cannot satisfy their hunger (RSV). Cf. Lam 1:11; 2:11,12,19,20; 4:4,8-10; II Kgs 6:25. It was the stumblingblock that caused their ruin (cf. 14:3; 18:30; 44:12).

20. The beauty of his ornament. Better, their beautiful ornament (so the Syriac, Symmachus, and the MT). He set it (AV). Rather, they used for vainglory. Read śamuhû (along with the LXX Dold's Old Lat., the Syr., and the Vulg.) for MT śāmāhû. They made their abominable images (RSV) of silver and gold. Cf. 16:16,17; Hos 2:8; 8:4. 21. And I will give it into the hands of strangers . . . to the wicked. A reference to the Chaldeans (cf. v. 24; 11:9; 28:10; 30:12; 31:12). They shall pollute, i.e., profane, the gold of the idols by putting it to common use. 22. My secret (place). The root means to hide, treasure up. Hence it connotes both "secret" and "precious." This is probably an allusion to the Temple (cf. 24:21,25; Lam 2:1). Robbers. The Chaldean pillagers.

23. And make a desolation (RSV). The LXX attaches the phrase to the end of verse 22, reading, "and they shall make confusion." The rendering of the MT, Make the chain (for the captives), gives little sense. 24. The worst of the heathen. The Chaldeans (see also v. 21; 28:7; 30:11; Jer 6:23; Hab 1:6,7,13). Pomp. Pride of their strength (so one Hebrew manuscript, the LXX, Dold's Old Latin, the Arabic, and Ezekiel's usual phrase; cf. 24:21; 30:6,18; 33:28). The MT rendering is pride of (the) strong. Their holy places shall be defiled. A reference to local shrines. The vowel points for holy places present a participial form, "they that sanctify them," which can easily be corrected.

25. Destruction cometh. Literally, shuddering comes. 26. Disaster comes upon disaster (RSV). The Hebrew word hōwâ, "disaster, ruin," is different from the word in verse 5, rā'â, "evil" (cf. Jer 4:20). The prophet with his oracles from the Lord, the priest with instruction out of the Law, and the elders with their counsel on civil matters were alike dumb (cf. Jer 18:18; Lam 2:9).

27. The king . . . prince . . . and people were also helpless. Ezekiel refers to Jehoiachin (17:12), to past kings (43:7,9), and to the future ruler (37:22,24) as king, but he does not use the title in regard to the reigning Zedekiah (12:12; 21:25). Prince is the designation for the head of the new community (45:7,8,16,17,22; 46:2ff.,16ff.; 48:21,22), of which Jehovah alone is king. It is used of members of the ruling class in 21:12; 22:6. The people of the land. Here, the general population of Israel ('am hā' āreṣ; 12:19; 33:2; 39:13; 46:3,9). In post-Exilic times the term was used with contempt of the non-Hebrews in Palestine (Ezr 4:4; 10:2, 11; Neh 10:31). In the Mishna it means the vulgar herd, who know not the Law (cf. Aboth ii, 5; John 7:49). And according to their own judgments (RSV). So twenty Hebrew manuscripts and the Vulgate. The MT has and in their own judgments.

C. The Sin and Fate of Jerusalem. 8:1–11:25.

The prophet is transported in the Spirit to Jerusalem, where in vision he beholds and describes four forms of idolatry practiced in the Temple (ch. 8), the slaughter of the idolatrous inhabitants by the divine avengers (ch. 9), the destruction of Jerusalem by fire (ch. 10), and the abandonment of the city and sanctuary by the Lord, together with a prediction of restoration (ch. 11).

1) Vision of Four Abominations Practiced in the Temple. 8:1-18.

In this chapter is described the idolatry and superstition practiced in public and private by all classes. The contrast between a glorious and holy God and this debased worship is striking.

a) The Image of Jealousy. 8:1-6.

1. In the sixth year. This vision is dated fourteen months later than that of Ezekiel's call (1:1,2) about August-September, 591 B.C. As I sat in mine house, and the elders of Judah sat before me. The leading representatives of the exile or gôlâ are frequently referred to (cf. 11:25; 14:1; 20:1,3). The hand of the Lord GOD put Ezekiel into a trance state (cf. 1:3; 11:5).

2. The appearance of fire. The LXX reading man, 'ish, is preferable to the "fire," 'ēsh, of the MT and agrees with the description in 1:26,27. 3. The spirit . . . brought me in the visions of God to Jerusalem. We are clearly told that these were visions (v. 3; 11:24; see 3:12), a kind of "second sight," and not physical levitations (cf. II Kgs 5:26; 6:8-12; Isa 21:6-10). Contrast Bel and the Dragon, verses 33-39, where the angel of God transports Habakkuk bodily from Judah to Babylon by the hair of his head.

To the entrance of the gateway of the inner court (RSV). The inner court was the temple court proper (v. 16; 10:3; I Kgs 6:36; 7:12). The middle court, on a lower level, contained the palace (I Kgs 7:8; II Kgs 20:4). On a still lower level was the great court or outer court, which enclosed the entire palace complex (Ezk 10:5; I Kgs 7:12. See description and plan, W. S. Caldecott, "Temple," ISBE, V, 2932 f). In ancient temples the gateway was a covered building entered by means of an entrance or door (vv. 3,5,7).

The seat of the image of jealousy, not of "jealousy" itself, but (that) "which provokes to jealousy" (cf. 5:13; 16:38, 42; 36:6; 38:19; Deut 32:21). This may have been an image of Asherah, the mother-goddess of the Canaanites, set up by Manasseh (II Kgs 21:7), and subsequently destroyed by Josiah (II Kgs 23:6). Albright holds that the image or figured slab (Heb., sēmel; used only here and in Ezk 8:5; Deut 4:16; II Chr 33:7, 15), similar to those found in Syria, Asia Minor, and Mesopotamia, was placed in a niche in the wall (see Arch. and Relig. of Israel, pp. 165,166,221). Was it because the niche was empty that the women were weeping for Tammuz (v. 14)? 4. The glory of the God of Israel. See on 1:28.

5. North of the altar gate, in the entrance, was this image of jealousy (RSV). The northern gate was that most frequently used, for the palace buildings were to the south and east. 6. The abominations . . . of Israel were causing Jehovah to withdraw from his sanctuary (cf. 11:1,22,23). Thou shalt see greater abominations. See verses 13,15.

b) The Secret Idolatry of the Elders. 8:7-13.

7. The door of the court is apparently the outside entrance of the gateway into the inner court (cf. v. 3). 8,9. He saw a hole in the wall, was told to dig through the wall, and there he saw a door, through which he was commanded to enter.

10. Portrayed (lit., carved, incised; cf. 23:14) upon the wall round about (emphatic, round about, round about) was "every pattern" of creeping things. Albright (op. cit., p. 166) sees here a syncretistic cult of Egyptian origin, while others find Babylonian influence, or ancient Canaanite worship suggested. Idols. The "block gods" of 6:4. 11. Seventy men. Probably a round number for prominent citizens of the Exile (cf. Ex 24:1; Num 11:16,24,25). Jaazaniah. Apparently a man well known. If this man was the son of Shaphan, who had assisted in Josiah's reform (II Kgs 22:3-10; Jer 26:24; 29:3; 36:10-12; 39:14), he had greatly corrupted the faith of his family. Smoke or odor. The Hebrew word 'ăthār is a hapax legomenon and its meaning is surmised from the context and from the versions.

12. In the dark; i.e., secretly. Every man in his room of pictures (RSV). Room is supported by the LXX, the Syriac, the Targum, and the Vulgate. In his secret chamber is the rendering of the LXX, the Syriac, and the Vulgate. In the chamber of his dwelling, i.e., "in the Temple," seems to be the Targum's rendition. Perhaps all that is meant is "in his imagination."

Two reasons are given for their practices: The Lord seeth us not; the Lord hath forsaken the earth. Cf. 9:9; Ps 94:7.

c) Women Bewailing Tammuz. 8: 14,15.

14. Tammuz. This god can be traced back to the Sumerian Dumuzi, the god of the subterranean ocean and a shepherd deity, whose sister-consort, Inanna-Ishtar, descended into the lower world to bring him back to life. In his worship are similarities to that of Egyptian Osiris, the Canaanite Baal, and the Syrian Adonis. Gebal or Byblos, twenty-one miles north of Beirut, was the great seat of Adonis worship. The nightly death of the god, the god's dying before the touch of winter, or the vernal god's dying with the parched summer are variations on the theme of death and resurrection. Mourning for the god was followed by a celebration of resurrection. Human sacrifice, castration, virginity, and sexual union formed part of the cult rites at one time or another (see S. Langdon, Mythology of All Races: Semitic, pp. 336-351, and passim). Here, Jewish women are seen engaged in the sorrowful rites of the vegetation myth involving worship of Tammuz. There may be allusions to Tammuz in Dan 11:37 and Zech 12:11.

d) Sun Worshipers in the Inner Court. 8:16-18.

16. Within the inner court of the Lord's house, near the entrance or door of the temple . . . between the porch on the east end of the Temple (I Kgs 6:3) and the altar of burnt offering (I Kgs 8:64) were about five and twenty men. Their station here suggests that they were priests (cf. Joel 2:17), the twenty-four leaders of the classes of priests (I Chr 24:5ff.) and the high priest (Keil). These men are called "elders" in Ezk 9:6, but Jeremiah also refers to the "elders of the priests" (Jer 19:1, ASV) or "senior priests" (RSV). In worshiping the sun toward the east (RSV), their backs would naturally have been toward the Temple. For references to sun worship, see Deut 4:19; II Chr 14:5; II Kgs 23:5; Jer 44:17 (?); Job 31:26.

17. They have filled the land with violence. The word violence can mean wrong done to man as well as to Jehovah (7:23; 12:19; 22:26; cf. 11:1-13). They put the branch to their nose. The meaning is uncertain. Some have found a reference to the Zoroastrian use of bundles of myrtle rods, or the sacred twig barsom held by the Parsees while praying, or even to phallic symbols. 18. Therefore will I also deal in fury. Cf. 5:11; 7:4,9; 9:5,10.

2) Vision of Inhabitants Slain by Divine Avengers. 9:1-11.

1. Draw near, you executioners of the city (RSV). The Hebrew abstract noun meaning "visitation" is to be taken in a concrete sense in the plural—"overseers, officers, executioners" (e.g., 44:11; II Kgs 11:18; Jer 52:11). Every man with his destroying weapon . . . Better, with his weapons of destruction in his hand.

2. And, behold, six men. Supernatural agents in human form. The higher gate, which lieth toward the north. This gate is mentioned in 8:14 and perhaps in 8:3,5,7. Cf. II Kgs 15:35; Jer 20:2,10; 36:10. Each one with his shattering weapon in his hand. A man . . . clothed in linen. White garments suggest his divine sanctity and eminence (cf. Dan 10:5; 12:6,7; Rev 15:6). With a writer's inkhorn. This occurs only here and in verses 3,5,11. The word seems to be a loan-word from Egyptian. This was a case for reed pens, with an ink container attached, and was carried in the girdle or sash (cf. J. P. Hyatt, "The Writing of an Old Testament Book," BA, VI (1943), pp. 78,79). The appearance of seven angels is common: see Rev 8:2,6; 15:6; Enoch 20:1-8; 81:5; 87:2; 90:21, 22. To explain their number as the equivalent of the gods of the seven planets (including sun and moon) is only conjecture. Stood beside the brasen altar. This had been set up by Solomon (I Kgs 8:64; II Chr 4:1), and was later replaced by Ahaz' stone altar (II Kgs 16:14).

3. The glory . . . was gone up from the cherub. Some say, from the cherubim in the most holy place in the Temple. The text implies that Jehovah went to the threshold (9:3), while the cherubim and vacant throne waited (10:3) until the Lord remounted and departed (10:18).

4,5. The Lord commanded the man with the inkhorn to set a mark upon the foreheads of those who wept over the sin of the city, while the rest were to be slain indiscriminately by the six executioners. Here the word mark is taw (Eng. "t"), the last letter of the Hebrew alphabet, written in the old form as a cross. Compare the "sign" given to protect Cain (Gen 4:15); the blood on the lintel and doorposts on the night of the first Passover (Ex 12:23); and the sealing of the saints of God (Rev 7:3-8; 9:4; 14:1; 22:4). Origen and Jerome found mystical significance in the mark.

6. The slaughter was to decimate all classes, including little children (contrast Jon 4:11), but was to touch no one upon whom is the mark (RSV). Ezekiel often stresses the doctrine of personal responsibility for sin (cf. 3:19; 14; 18; 33). Like Elijah, he learned that he was not alone in his faithfulness to God (I Kgs 19:18). Begin at my sanctuary. Where the grossest idolatry had been carried on. Neither Ezekiel nor Jeremiah held to the inviolability of the Temple (cf. Jer 7:4ff.; I Pet 4:17). 7. Defile the house. The Temple was desecrated with the slain. Compare the actual happening, II Chr 36:17,18. See also Rev 14:9-11, where those receiving the mark of the beast (Rev 13:16-18) are subjected to Divine torments.

8. Wilt thou destroy all the residue of Israel. Ezekiel so identified himself with the Lord's wrath against sin that we seldom find expressions of pity in him. See, however, 11:13; 24:15ff. Compare intercessions of Abraham (Gen 18:23-32), Amos (Amos 7:1-6), Jeremiah (Jer 14; 15).

9. The guilt of the land lay in its bloodshed and perversion of justice (ch. 22). The people felt that they could sin with impunity, claiming, the Lord hath forsaken the earth, and the Lord seeth not. All the prophets reminded Israel that a righteous God wants a righteous people, and that national calamity is a punishment for national sin. 10. Mine eye shall not spare. See also 5:11; 7:4,9; 8:18; 9:5; Isa 5:25ff.; Amos 1:3,6ff.

11. The man clothed with linen. The recording angel stated that he had done his task, and the ominous silence with reference to the six executioners implied that they had done theirs.

3) Vision of Jerusalem Destroyed by Fire. 10:1-22.

The narrative portion of the chapter comprises verses 2-4,6,7,18,19, and is completed by 11:22-25. The rest of the chapter contains descriptions of the throne-chariot very similar to those in chapter 1. The recording angel receives fire from the cherubim with which to burn the city, and the glory of the Lord departs to the outside eastern gate of the outer court.

1. I looked. Cf. 1:26. The throne was empty (cf. 9:3), and the chariot awaited the Lord's return (10:3,18). 2. The Lord addressed the man clothed with linen, who in this chapter becomes the agent of destruction. Go in among the whirling wheels (RSV). Hebrew galgal, "a whirl," is used of wagons (23:24; 26:10); of wheels (Isa 5:28; Jer 47:3); and of whirlwinds (Ps 77:18; 83:13). Here the word is singular and collective, describing the whole wheelwork. Under the cherubim. The LXX, the Syriac, and the Vulgate have the plural cherubim for the singular cherub of the MT, but the singular can be used in a collective sense, as is true of "living creature" in verses 15, 17,20. Coals of fire . . . scatter them over the city. God purposed the destruction of Jerusalem. Compare the event, as recorded in II Kgs 25:9. Sodom and Gomorrah, also, were destroyed by God (Gen 19:24).

3. The cherubims stood on the south (lit., the right) side of the house; i.e., the Temple. A cloud filled the inner court, betokening the Divine Presence (cf. v. 4; Ex 33:9,10; I Kgs 8:10,11; Isa 6:1). 4. The glory of the Lord went up. The first half of the verse is a repetition of the act described in 9:3. 5. The sound of the cherubim's wings. Cf. 1:24. 6. He . . . stood beside the wheels. Cf. verse 2; and 1:13. 7. A cherub on the side approached by the recorder handed him fire. The account is silent about his scattering it over the city, but this is assumed.

In verses 8-17, there is a renewed description of the throne-chariot, greatly resembling that in chapter 1, but with the added feature that the living creatures are definitely identified as cherubim.

8. A man's hand. Cf. 1:8. 9,10. The wheels. Cf. 1:16. 11. Without turning. Cf. 1:9,17. In whatever direction the front wheel faced (RSV). Literally, whither the head turned, i.e., the front of the chariot. 12. And their rims . . . were full of eyes (RSV). The MT has,

And all their flesh and their backs and their hands and their wings and the wheels were full of eyes, which seems to confuse the cherubim and the wheels. Backs can be rendered as rims (cf. 1:18) and hands as spokes, confining the reference to the wheels.

13. This verse is definitely out of place here and would more suitably follow verse 6.

14. And every one had four faces. Cf. 1:10, where each cherub has four faces. In this verse, what may be meant is that the prophet, standing to the north of the chariot and looking at it, saw the one face of each cherub that was turned toward him rather than all four faces of the four cherubim. Thus, at the front of the chariot directly in the line of his vision was the ox (in place of the cherub), while on the north was the man, at the rear of the chariot the lion, and on the south, the inner visible face, was the eagle. 15. Cf. verses 19,20,22. Living creature is a singular noun used collectively here and in verses 17,20.

16. Cf. 1:19. The same wheels also turned not from beside them suggests that the wheels did not turn away from beside the cherubim. The preposition min, "from," often loses its significance in another language, and is better untranslated, thus bringing the phrase into line with 10:11; 1:9,12,17 (cf. BDB, p. 581, under min, 4c). 17. When they stood, these stood. Cf. 1:21.

18. The glory of the Lord departed from . . . the threshold . . . (cf. 9:3), and stood over the cherubims, preparing to leave. 19. The throne-chariot moved to the east gate, apparently of the outer court, paused briefly on the Mount of Olives "on the east side of the city" (11:23), and left completely. Later, in prophetic vision, Ezekiel saw the glory return by the same eastern gate (43:1-4).

20. The living creatures . . . were cherubim, already identified in verse 15. 21,22. Four faces. Cf. 1:6,8,9,12a.

The etymology of cherub, cherubim is still dubious, although Akkadian karâbu, "to be gracious, bless," and karubu, "intercessor," may be cognate forms. Thev are emblematic, composite figures representing human nature spiritualized, sanctified, and exalted to be the dwelling place of God. They function in several ways: (a) they guard the tree of life (Gen 3:24), and the ark in Solomon's Temple (I Kgs 6:23-28; 8:7); (b) they engage in adoration of God in connection with the mercy seat in the Tabernacle (Ex 25:18-20; 37:7-9); (c) they support the Lord's throne (I Sam 4:2; II Sam 6:2; II Kgs 19:15; Ps 80:1; 99:1); and (d) personified as the wind and cloud, they form the chariot of Deity (II Sam 22:11; Ps 104:3; I Chr 28:18). These various concepts are present in Ezekiel, especially their function as bearers of the throne of Jehovah. In the book of Revelation they engage in perpetual worship (4:6ff.; 5:6ff.; 6:1ff.; 7:11). When redeemed humanity has entered heaven, these figures typifying humanity, having served their purpose, disappear. (See G. A. Cook, ICC, pp. 113,114, and a thorough discussion of "cherubim" in P. Fairbairn, The Typology of Scripture, I, pp. 215-239).

4. Vision of the Internal Condition of the City and the Lord's Departure from It. 11:1-25.

In chapters 8–10, the prophet denounces syncretism in religion. In this chapter he denounces the false confidence of the leaders of Jerusalem who felt that the city was secure and that its inhabitants were morally superior to the exiles who had been deported to Babylonia in 597 (vv. 1-13). Then he sounds a message of hope for the exiles, stating that God will replace their stony heart with a heart of flesh (vv. 14-21). The divine glory rises from the city and moves to the Mount of Olives; the prophet is "carried back" to Babylonia; and he thereupon relates his vision to the exiles (vv. 22-25). The narrative seems to follow chapter 8, and appears out of place after the events described in chapter 10; but in a vision one is not to expect chronological order.

a) The Flesh and the Caldron. 11:1-13.

1. Ezekiel was transported to the outer eastern gate, where he saw five and twenty men (not the same as in 8:16), among whom were Jaazaniah (not identical with the personage in 8:11) and Pelatiah, princes of the people. They represent the civil government of Judah.

2. These men gave wicked counsel, detrimental to the city. The anti-Babylon party counseled that the nation should revolt against Nebuchadnezzar and form an alliance with Egypt (ch. 17), contrary to God's command (Jer 28:16), and in violation of the oath her ruler had sworn to the Chaldean monarch (II Chr 36:13). This was the party of violence (7:23; 9:9; 11:6; ch. 22).

3. It is not near; let us build houses. If read as a question, "Is not the time near to build houses?" (lit., is not [or not is] near the building of houses?), we get a hint of their counsel which went contrary to the prophets. Then follows a popular saying: This city is the caldron, protecting us from the fire: and we be the flesh, valuable in contrast to the useless broth cast away, like the exiles in Babylonia. But in Jeremiah 24, exactly the opposite valuation is given to the remnant of Jerusalem and to the exiles in Chaldea.

5. The Spirit of the Lord fell upon me. Only here is this expression used in Ezekiel. The prophet was enabled to prophesy while still in the trance.

6,7. Ezekiel reverses the meaning of the proverb, comparing the city to a caldron burning with the fires of judgment, and the flesh to those slain in the streets (cf. 7:23; 22:25). 8. The sword. Those in Jerusalem were to share the fate of the exiles. For the antithesis, see 35:6. 9. Strangers . . . judgments. Cf. 7:21; 5:10. 10,11. I will judge you in the border of Israel; i.e., far from the so-called protecting city. The terrible judgment on King Zedekiah and the leaders took place at Riblah (see comment at 6:14). Cf. Jer 39:5-7; 52:24-27; II Kgs 25:18-21. 12. I am the Lord. This verse repeats a number of Ezekiel's phrases. Cf. v. 10; 5:6; 18:9,17.

13. When I prophesied. Ezekiel, enabled by God's Spirit to discern things at a distance and in the future, saw the death of Pelatiah, one of the twenty-five leaders. Thereupon he interceded for the remnant of Israel (cf. 9:8).

b) Hope for the Exiles. 11:14-21.

14. The word of the Lord. Cf. 6:1; 7:1; 12:1. 15. Your fellow exiles. With the LXX, Dold's Old Latin, and the Syriac, read gālutekā for MT ge'ullātekā, "your redemption, kindred." The exiles and all the house of Israel, descendants of the captivity of Samaria in 722/721, had been held in contempt by the inhabitants of Jerusalem, who now laid claim to the land.

16. Although I have scattered them (cf. 20:23; 28:25; 36:19) . . . yet I have been a sanctuary to them for a while (RSV; lit., in small measure). Not in the sense of asylum, but as One greater than the Temple whose presence sanctifies (cf. Ps 84; 137:4-6; Isa 8:12,13). Even in the countries where they have gone. Cf. 12:16; 36:20-22.

17. Therefore . . . I will . . . gather you. The gathering of the exiles is a frequent promise in Ezekiel: 20:34,41,42; 28:25; 29:13; 34:13; 36:24; 37:31; 38:8; 39:27; as well as in the other prophets: Jer 23:3; 29:14; 31:8,9; 32:37; Isa 43:5, 6; 54:7; 56:8; Zech 10:8,9. And I will give you the land of Israel. Cf. 20:42; 28:25; 34:13; 37:21; 39:28; and elsewhere. The yearning to be back in the land of Israel, uniting patriotic and religious motives, has characterized Judaism through the centuries. 18. The returned exiles will remove all the detestable things from the land. Pure worship is the condition for renewal of true relations with the Lord (cf. 14:6; 18:30,31).

19. I will give them one heart. Three Hebrew manuscripts and the Syriac read, a new heart, as in 18:31; 36:26. The LXX has another heart. In the Bible the heart is regarded as the seat of man's mental activities, his mind, his will. The spirit is regarded as the breath, wind, disposition which animates actions. The two together constitute man's inner being, into which God would instill a new energy. For "the heart of stone," unimpressionable, obstinate, God will give them an heart of flesh (cf. 36:26,27; Jer 31:31-33), which would be "sensitive, responsive to God's touch, and obedient to His will" (Bewer). This is God's work, his gift of grace. 20. They shall be my people, and I will be their God. See also 14:11; 36:28; 37:23,27. Cf. Jer 24:7; 30:22; 31:1,33; 33:28. The community of the future will be composed of converted individuals.

21. As for them whose heart walketh after . . . detestable things. Literally, and to the heart of their detestable things and their abominations their heart goes. The smoother reading is obtained with the help of the Targum and the Vulgate.

c) Departure of the Divine Glory. 11:22-25.

The narrative in chapter 10 is completed with this paragraph.

23. The midst of the city. The Temple was on the eastern border of the city, but it was the focus of the city's life. The mountain . . . on the east side of the city, across the Kidron valley, or valley of Jehoshaphat, was the Mount of Olives (cf. II Sam 15:30; Zech 14:4). From this mountain Jesus wept over the doomed city (Lk 19:37-44). Cf. Ezk 10:19; 43:1-4.

24. The Spirit . . . brought me in the vision . . . into Chaldea, to the exiles (RSV). See on 8:3. 25. The prophet related to the elders sitting before him (8:1), all the things that the Lord had shewed me.

D. Moral Necessity of the Captivity. 12:1–19:14.

The preceding messages of Ezekiel predict the fall of the nation. In this section (chs. 12–19), the prophet deals with the objections of men who thought the present storm would pass, who saw no calamity ahead, and who held that the Lord would never repudiate his people. By symbolical actions, allegories, and parables, Ezekiel demonstrates the moral necessity of the captivity. He gives two symbolical representations of flight from the besieged city (12:1-20), expostulates with false prophets (12:21–14:23), pictures Israel as a useless vine (ch. 15), and in a detailed allegory recalls Israel's long history of unfaithfulness to her divine bridegroom (ch. 16). He returns to the metaphor of the vine to emphasize Zedekiah's disloyalty (ch. 17), answers objections to divine punishment by an analysis of individual responsibility (ch. 18), and bursts forth into a dirge over the princes of Judah and over Judah itself (ch. 19).

The subject matter of chapters 12–24 may be classified under three categories. I. Unfaithful Israel: the useless vine (ch. 15); the foundling child who became an unfaithful wife (ch. 16); the two unfaithful sisters (ch. 23); a review of Israel's history (20:1-44). II. Sin and Its Judgment: prophecy and its abuses (12:21–14:23); moral freedom and personal responsibility (ch. 18); punishment of Jerusalem necessitated by her sins (ch. 22). III. The End of the Monarchy: two symbolic acts (12:1-20); two eagles and the vine (ch. 17); two lions and the vine (ch. 19); the avenging sword of the Lord (20:45–21:32); the allegory of the rusted caldron (ch. 24).

1) Symbolic Actions Depicting Exile and Invasion (cf. chs. 4; 5). 12:1-20.

a) Symbol of the Exile, and Its Exposition. 12:1-16.

1. The word of the Lord also came unto me ("saying"). This formula occurs six times: here and in verses 8,17,21,26; 13:1. 2. The exiles in Babylonia are a rebellious house (2:3,6-8; 3:26,27). They have eyes to see but do not discern the moral meaning in events (Deut 29:3,4; Isa 6:9; Jer 5:21; Mk 8:18; Acts 28:27).

3-7. The prophet was commanded to prepare an exile's baggage (RSV; lit., make thee vessels of exile), such scanty provisions as exiles might carry in bundles on their shoulders, which he was to bring out by day in their sight (lit., in their eyes). Then he was to go forth at even in their sight. . . . Dig through the wall, perhaps of his own house, go out through it (the reading of the LXX, Syriac, Vulgate, and Targum, in preference to the MT bring out), carrying the baggage on his shoulder in the thick darkness (vv. 6,7,12). He was also to cover his face (lit., eyes). In doing this he was to be a sign or portent for the house of Israel. See also v. 11; 24:24,27; cf. Isa 8:18; 20:3; Zech 3:8.

10. This oracle concerns the prince in Jerusalem. Literally, the prince is this oracle, or burden (AV). There is a play on words equivalent to, "The leader is this load." Ezekiel nowhere refers to Zedekiah as king. The house of Israel who are in it (RSV). Read b^{e}tôkâh for MT b^{e}tôkām, "in the midst of them." 11. I am a sign for you. Literally, your portent, symbol. Cf. verse 6. So shall it be done unto them; i.e., to the people of Jerusalem.

12. The prince (Zedekiah) . . . shall bear ("his baggage" should be supplied as direct object). He shall dig through the wall (RSV), following the LXX, and the Syriac. The MT has they shall dig, which can refer to Zedekiah's attendants. And go out through it (RSV). So the LXX, the Syriac, the Targum. The MT reads to bring (supply "him") through it. That he see not the ground. The LXX has a conflate reading, that he may not be seen by an eye, and he himself shall not see the land. Verse 12 refers to Zedekiah's disguising himself, while verse 13 refers to his subsequent blinding at Riblah (II Kgs 25:4-7; Jer 52:8,11).

13. My net . . . snare. See also 17:20; cf. 19:8, referring to Jehoiachin. Babylon . . . shall he not see it. Zedekiah, for breaking his oath of allegiance, was blinded and died in captivity in Babylon (cf. 17:1-21). 14. I will scatter . . . his helpers. So the LXX, Dold's Old Latin, the Syriac, and the Targum. The MT reads his help, an abstract noun used in a concrete sense. And all his bands. A loanword from the Akkadian, "wings"; then "wing of an army," "hordes"; used metaphorically also in 17:21; 38:6,9,22; 39:4. Draw out the sword. Cf. 5:2,10,12. 15. They shall know that I am the Lord. See 6:10.

16. I will let a few of them escape (RSV). Literally, I will let remain of them men of number; i.e., "men few in number." Cf. the idiom in Gen 34:30; Deut 4:27; Ps 105:2; Jer 44:28. See also Ezk

6:8-10. That they may declare . . . among the nations. The Lord's preserving the survivors will make clear to the nations that the catastrophe to his people was due not to his impotence but to his justice. He is concerned for the honor of his name. See 14:21-23.

b) Symbol of the Siege. 12:17-20.

18. With this symbol of eating bread with quaking and drinking water with trembling and with carefulness (i.e., anxiety), compare the symbol expounded in 4:9-17. There the emphasis was on the scarcity of food; here it is on the terror. The word quaking, ra'ash, is used of an earthquake (3:12; 37:7; Amos 1:1); of the hyperbolical shaking of the earth by forces in war (Isa 9:4; Jer 47:3; Job 39:24; 41:21).

19. The people of the land. The general populace, those left behind, in Judah (cf. 7:27). That her land may be desolate from all that is therein. In order that her land (i.e., Jerusalem's) may be desolate from her fullness (lit.; cf. similar construction in 32:15). Because of the violence of all them that dwell therein. See Amos 3:9-11 on the violence of Israel. 20. Cf. 35:4.

2) Prophecy and Its Abuses. 12:21–14:23.

In this collection of oracles the prophet deals with the popular attitude of contempt toward prophecy (12:21-28), citing the common saying that prophecy is no longer fulfilled at all (vv. 21-25), and that Ezekiel's prophecies refer to the far distant future (vv. 26-28). To these charges Ezekiel replies that the prophecies bear on the present and will be fulfilled. This leads to a discussion of the deceivers of the people, false prophets and false prophetesses (ch. 14). The lying prophets are compared to foxes who find ruins congenial (vv. 1-9); these whitewash the tottering walls the people build; i.e., they flatteringly approve of the futile projects of the people (vv. 10-16). False prophetesses, execrable women who professed to read the future for payment and predicted success for the wicked, are denounced (vv. 17-23). The prophet then turns to the wickedness of those who inquired of God but whose hearts were with their idols all the time (14:1-11). This raises the problem of general responsibility. The presence of a righteous man among a sinful people will not save a land when God brings His judgments upon it (14:12-23).

a) Rebuke Against Contempt of Prophecy. 12:21-28.

22. What is that proverb. The Hebrew word māshāl is apparently from a verb meaning "to liken, compare, be equal"; hence, a "comparison" or "similitude." Bentzen and J. Pedersen derive it from a verb meaning "to rule"; hence, a sentence spoken by rulers filled with the power of mighty souls, a winged word, outliving the fleeting moment. Ezekiel often quotes and replies to popular sayings (8:12; 11:3; 16:44; 18:2; 20:32). Time goes on and every vision comes to naught (AV, faileth); i.e., becomes a dead threat. The failure of prophecy to realize itself became a proverb. Scoffers made light of the threatened judgment. See also Jer 5:13,14; 17:15; II Pet 3:3, 4,9.

23. The fulfilment (ASV; AV, effect; lit., word). The contents were soon to be realized. The prophets did not ordinarily set definite dates for the fulfillment of their messages because of their moral and contingent character (see on v. 27). 24. Vain vision. The false prophets spoke contrary to the men called of God, and there was no external way to distinguish the truth from falsehood except that, "He that is of the truth heareth my voice" (Jn 18:37). The pagans made use of divination, magic, and mediums to learn the mind of the deity (21:21; Deut 18:9-12). In true prophecy mechanical arts were discarded, for Jehovah spoke to the mind of the prophet. Flattering or smooth divination promised immunity from trouble (cf. 13:10,16; Jer 23:16,17; 28:1-17). 25. I will speak. This verse continues verse 23. Literally, for I the Lord will speak what word I will speak.

27,28. To those who said, The vision . . . is for many days to come . . . far off, i.e., not of immediate concern, the prophet replied that the divine words were to be put into effect at once. In pronouncing threats, the prophets did not normally date their fulfillment, for such prophecies were moral, contingent threats, which might be averted upon repentance and amendment (see Jonah; Jer 18; 26:17-19; Joel 2:14,18).

b) False Prophets. 13:1-16.

The term false prophets is not used in the OT, but historical perspective is right in so designating them. There were two classes of false prophets: those who were representatives of some object of worship other than the true God, e.g., Baal, Moloch (cf. Elijah's contest with the prophets of Baal, I Kgs 18:19ff.); and those who falsely purported to speak in the name of Jehovah (cf. Micaiah's opposition to the prophets of Ahab, I Kgs 22:5-28). The strongest denunciations of these deceivers are by Jeremiah, who opposed them on moral, personal, and political grounds (Jer 23:9-32). During the dying gasps of Jerusalem, Hananiah opposed Jeremiah at home (Jer 28), and Ahab, Zedekiah, and Shemaiah opposed him in Babylon (Jer 29:15-32). Ezekiel in this chapter also exposes the false prophets and the false prophetesses. (See A. B. Davidson, "The False Prophets," O. T. Prophecy, pp. 285-308).

2. Ezekiel here refers sarcastically to the prophets of Israel, false prophets who prophesy out of their own hearts, i.e., their emotions and desires. He discloses the source (v. 3), content (vv. 4,5), and result of their message (vv. 6,7), and the doom of the false prophets (vv. 8,9). 3. Foolish prophets. A play on words: nᵉbî'im nᵉbālîm, something like "profitless prophets." Folly is primarily a moral rather than an intellectual deficiency. In the book of Proverbs, for example, wisdom is set forth as the "fear of the Lord," and folly as disregard for him and his precepts. The force moving these prophets was their own spirit and not the Spirit of the Lord.

4. Ruins were as congenial to them as to gamboling foxes, and they increased the devastation. 5. They failed to stand in the breaches, to stop the invading disaster (cf. 22:30; Ps 106:23). Nor did they build a wall of moral and spiritual counsel for Israel in the coming crisis. The day of the Lord. Cf. on 7:7.

6. Lying divination. To divine means to obtain an oracle from a god by drawing lots (cf. 21:21). To gain knowledge of secret things by superstitious means was forbidden Israel (Ex 22:18; Num 23:23; Deut 18:10,11), and divining was disparaged (cf. Ezk 13:7,9,23; 21:29; 22:28; Mic 3:6,7,11). Saying, The Lord saith. Oracle of the Lord (nᵉ'um Yahweh), the formula of true inspiration (cf. Amos, who uses it 21 times, 2:11,16, etc.). They expect him to fulfill their word (RSV). There was no external criterion for true prophecy. "While the true prophet had the witness in himself that he was true, the false prophet might not be aware that he was false" (Jer 23:21,31; A. B. Davidson, op. cit.).

9. A threefold punishment of the false prophets is predicted. At the present they have prestige and influence, but in the new kingdom they shall not be in the assembly of my people (cf. Gen 49:6; Ps 89:7; 111:1), nor be enrolled in the register (i.e., list) of the house of Israel (RSV; cf. Ezr 2; Neh 7; Ex 32:32,33; Isa 4:3; Mal 3:16), neither shall they enter the land of Israel (cf. Ezk 20:38; Jer 29:32).

10. The false prophets announced peace, when there was no peace. See Mic 3:5; Jer 6:14; 8:11; 23:17.

The next section reads, literally, and he (the people) is building a party-wall (ḥayiṣ, only here in the OT; a wall of stones loosely piled together without mortar), and behold them (the prophets) daubing it with marly clay plaster, or whitewash. The prophets acquiesced in the people's attempt to defend the city, hiding its weakness by lying prophecies.

11. There is a play on the words whitewash, tāpēl and fall, nāpal. Three elements in nature will make the wall to fall (cf. v. 13). Great hailstones. Omit the MT and you. 13. Cf. Mt 7:24-27. Hailstones. The unusual word 'elgābîsh (only here and in 38:22) is probably the Akkadian algamešu, "crystal," and so, "ice crystals." 14. Will I break down the wall. The prophets were buried beneath the collapsing walls (cf. Isa 25:12; Lam 2:2; Amos 9:1).

c) False Prophetesses. 13:17-23.

Several godly, gifted women are referred to in Scripture as prophetesses: Miriam (Ex 15:20); Deborah (Jud 4:3,4); Isaiah's wife (Isa 8:3); Huldah (II Kgs 22:14); Anna (Lk 2:36); and the four daughters of Philip (Acts 21:9). In the present paragraph, the prophetesses, or rather sorceresses, were counterparts of the false prophets, forerunners of the modern palmists, fortunetellers, and mediums.

17. Out of their own heart. Cf. verse 2.

18. Who sew magic bands upon all wrists and make veils for the heads of persons (RSV). The puzzling expressions in this verse apparently describe features of "sympathetic magic" whereby the sorceress fastened magic influence upon her inquirers by the tying of knots and the shrouding of the persons in veils varying in length according to their stature. It was believed that like effects like, that a desired result could be obtained by mimicking it, and that things once brought into contact continue to act upon each other after being separated. In the hunt for souls. Or persons (cf. BDB, p. 660b. So in vv. 19,20; 17:17; 18:4; 22:27). The prophetesses made victims of those who consulted them, hunting down some persons and keeping others alive for their own profit, or keeping their own persons alive.

19. Will ye pollute me . . . ? Better, And ye have profaned me. To pollute or profane is the opposite of to sanctify. It is to bring God down to the sphere of the common, the false, the unworthy (cf. 20:39). With (not for) handfuls of barley and with (not for) pieces of bread, used to obtain the oracles (cf. Jer 44:15-19). To slay the souls that should not die, i.e., the righteous; to save the souls alive that should not live, i.e., the ungodly (cf. v. 22; Hos 6:5; Jer 1:10). Contrast the work of the true prophet, set forth in Ezk 3:16-21.

20. Magic bands with which (RSV; following Dold's Old Lat., the Syr., Targ., and Vulg. in place of MT where) you hunt the souls, or persons (omit, with the LXX and the Syriac, MT for flying ones). Pārah, "to fly" is an Aramaic word, perhaps a gloss. And I will let the souls, or persons, that you hunt go free. This is Cornill's emendation, reading MT 'et n'pāshîm as 'ōtān ḥopshîm, "like birds" (so Ewald), instead of MT "for birds." This may also be an Aramaic gloss as above. 21. To be hunted. Cf. verses 18,20.

22. Because you have disheartened . . . although I have not disheartened (RSV). The second verb is, literally, pained. The verbs are kā'â and kā'ab respectively. Cornill uses "pained," kā'ab, in both places. By promising him life. Literally, "so as to keep him alive." Whatever encourages sin is false (cf. Jer 23:22). 23. No more . . . delusive visions (RSV); i.e., falsehood, as in verse 6. The judgment of diviners is at hand. Cf. 12:24; Mic 3:6,7; Amos 8:11. The issue will be that Jehovah shall be known in truth.

d) Idolatrous Inquirers of the Lord. 14:1-11.

1. Elders of Israel; i.e., elders of the exiles (cf. 8:1; 20:1). These leaders, probably perplexed by Ezekiel's denunciations of the false prophets, came to inquire further about Jerusalem and its future.

3. Have set up their idols in their heart. Note the frequent mention of idols (gillûlîm) in the paragraph. Cf. 6:4,5. Stumblingblock of their iniquity. Cf. 7:19,20. They have busied their thoughts with idolatry, which causes them to stumble and fall (cf. v. 6).

4. Every man of the house of Israel. A legal formula (cf. Lev 17:3,8,10,13; 20:2). The man whose heart was divided in its allegiance to Jehovah would receive no knowledge through a prophet, but would be answered by Jehovah himself in deeds. I will answer him by myself. This translation follows the reading of the Targum and of verse 7, bî, instead of MT bâ, "coming." 5. That I may lay hold of the hearts of . . . Israel (RSV). The Lord would call them to account for their idolatry. He cannot tolerate secret faithlessness.

6. Although the prophet had pointed out the self-acting law of divine retribution (v. 4), he here says that God pleads with men to forsake their evil way. 7. Stranger that sojourneth in Israel. Note Ezekiel's care for the resident aliens (22:7,29; 47:22,23). The proselyte enjoyed equal rights under the law and faced equal penalty (Lev 17:8,10,13; 20:2). 8. Cf. Lev 17:8-10; 20:3,5,6. A sign or warning example (cf. Num 26:10; Deut 28:37,46). And a byword i.e., a proverb reading the word in the singular with the Syriac and the Vulgate.

9. If the prophet be deceived. This may result not only from self-delusion (13:3,6) and from idolatrous inquirers (v. 7), but I the Lord have deceived that prophet. In ancient thought, secondary causes were often overlooked, and events attributed directly to the work of the Lord. See Amos 3:6; Isa 45:7. When a man sins against spiritual light, he brings on himself spiritual blindness. This does not relieve him of responsibility, however, for always the principle of "no other gods before me" obtains. Cf. II Kgs 22:15–23:3.

10,11. The prophet and he that seeketh alike would be punished, for the double purpose of deterring Israel from unfaithfulness (cf. Isa 4:4); and of restoring her true relations with the Lord (cf. 11:20). The judgments all have mercy in view.

e) The Righteous To Save but Themselves, not a Sinful Land. 14:12-23.

13. The prophet declares that when the land sinneth, and God sends one of his four judgments (cf. 5:16,17) against it—famine (vv. 12-14), hurtful beasts (vv. 15,16), sword and war (vv. 17,18), pestilence (vv. 19,20)—though the righteous ancients, Noah, Daniel, and Job, were in that land, they could deliver only themselves. The application to Jerusalem (vv. 21-23) finds no righteous persons within it. And what wicked survivors will escape all four judgments, in apparent exception to the principle enunciated above, will be a grim proof to the exiles of God's righteous judgment on Jerusalem. By trespassing grievously. A closer rendering is by treacherously committing treachery. See also 15:8; 17:20; 18:24; 20:17; 39:26; Lev. 5:15; 6:2.

14. Noah, Daniel, and Job are cited as examples of righteous men, non-Hebrews, in ancient times. Cf. Gen 6:8; 7:1; Job 42:7-10. Virolleaud, deVaux, and others equate the Daniel of Ezekiel with Dan'el, "righteous judge of the cause of widows and orphans," who is referred to in the Ras Shamra texts of about 1400 B.C. (Aqht, 170; 2 Aqht, V: 7,8. For full discussion, cf. Ginsberg, BA 8 (1945), p. 50: Pére de Vaux, RB (1937), pp. 245, 246; W. H. Morton, "Ras Shamra–Ugarit and Old Testament Exegesis," Review and Expositor, 45 (1948), pp. 70-72).

15. Noisome beasts. Literally, an evil beast (cf. 5:17; Lev 26:22). And they (lit., it, sing. collective) spoil, or bereave it. Cf. Jer 9:10,12. 16. These three men. Cf. 18:10-13; Jer 15:1-4. 17. A sword. See also 5:12; 6:3; 11:8; 21:3,4; 29:8; 33:2; Lev 26:25. 19,20. Pestilence. Cf. 5:17; 38:22.

21-23. Application to Jerusalem. 21. My four sore acts of judgment (RSV). Cf. Jer 15:2,3; Lev 26:22-26. Four signifies completeness.

22. A remnant. Any survivors to lead out sons and daughters (LXX, Syr., Sym., Vulg.). When these bad figs (Jer 24:8-10; 29:16-20) come forth unto you in Babylon, ye shall be comforted or reconciled by the justice of God's punishment on Jerusalem.

3) Parable of the Grapevine. 15:1-8.

The figure of Israel as a vine or vineyard occurs frequently (Gen 49:22; Deut 32:32; Hos 10:1; Isa 5:1-7; Jer 2:21; Ezk 17:61; Ps 80:8-16). Here reference is to the wild vine of the forest rather than to the cultured vine of the vineyard.

3. Shall wood be taken. If the vine did not bear fruit, its wood could not be used even to make a peg. 4. If in addition, it has been burned at both ends, is it useful for anything (AV, meet for any work) except for fuel?

6. Jerusalem is the vine destined for burning (5:2; 10:2,7; 16:38-42). 7. From the fire have they escaped? Yet the fire shall devour them. They will escape the burning city, only to meet another fate (5:4; 11:9; 12:14; 23:25).

4) Allegory of the Foundling. 16:1-63.

This allegory, like that in chapter 23, depicts the connection between the Lord and his people in terms of a husband-wife relationship (cf. Hos 2; Jer 2:1-3; 3:1-5). The OT seldom uses this figure or the father-son motif, whereas in Canaanite and other polytheistic religions, the marriage of divinities and mortals, and the physical birth of gods and demigods is prominent. After idolatry had been extirpated from Israel, the NT writers could effectively portray the relationship between God and the redeemed, Christ and his Church, under the symbols of fatherhood and husbandhood (Eph 5:25,26; I Jn 3:1-3).

Possibly Ezekiel took a familiar tale and developed it as an allegory, in keeping with Oriental tastes. A foundling child of dubious origin, Jerusalem, is exposed by the roadside to die. But she is rescued by the Lord, who becomes her benefactor (vv. 1-7). Having grown up to beautiful maidenhood, she is taken in marriage by her benefactor and becomes his royal consort (vv. 8-14). The proud queen proves utterly unfaithful and plays the harlot with Canaanites and other pagans (vv. 15-34). The punishment for this conduct, which is described in verses 35-43, is justified, since her depravity is worse than that of her two sisters, Sodom and Samaria (vv. 44-52). Nevertheless, the Lord makes glorious promises of restoration for the three sisters (vv. 53-58), foretelling that penitent Jerusalem will experience a glorious reconciliation through an everlasting covenant (vv. 59-63).

a) Jerusalem as the Foundling Child. 16:1-7.

2. Her abominations. Especially the worship of Baal and Moloch (vv. 15-22) and alliances with heathen nations (vv. 23-34). 3. The Canaanites. Referred to in the stele of Amenhotep II (1447–1421), in the El Amarna Letters of about 1370 B.C., and in an ancient Hittite incantation (see ANET, pp. 246, 352, 483, 484). Amorite (Westerner). Or the Amurru, a powerful Semitic people who invaded the Fertile Crescent about 2000 B.C. Cf. Gen 14:7; 15:16; Num 21:21-30; Josh 24:15. Hammurabi (1728–1686), of the first dynasty of Babylon, was an Amorite. (See G. E. Mendenhall, "Mari," BA, XI (1948), 1-19.) Hittite. A non-Semitic people, resident in Asia Minor in the second millennium B.C., with contacts in Canaan from patriarchal to Solomonic times (Gen 23:10-20; 26:34; Josh 1:4; I Sam 26:6; I Kgs 11:1). On Hittite bestiality, consult G. A. Barton, Archaeology and the Bible, pp. 423-426. Ezekiel was stressing the heathenism in Israel's background.

4. Salting made the skin drier and firmer, and aided in cleansing. To cleanse, (AV, supple) you (l^{e}mish'i) is an unknown expression, but it is suggested by the Akkadian and the Targum. 5. This baby girl, however, was cast out in the open field. Child exposure was practiced at the time of Christ's birth (W. H. Davis, Greek Papyri of the First Century, pp. 1-7). 6. Polluted; i.e., "kicking about." Five manuscripts, the LXX, the Old Latin, and the Syriac omit the second, "and I said . . . , Live," as dittography.

7. To multiply. The LXX and the Syriac read grow up in place of MT and a myriad . . . I made thee. Art come to excellent ornaments. Arrived at full maidenhood. The Syriac in the menses, or verse 8, in the time of love, suggests the meaning, full maidenhood. Thou wast naked and bare; i.e., "unmarried."

b) The Maiden Married to Her Benefactor. 16:8-14.

8. I spread my skirt over thee. Symbolic of marriage (Ruth 3:9; Deut 22:30). And entered into a covenant with thee. Cf. Mal 2:14; Prov 2:17. 9. Washed I thee. Preparatory ceremonies for the nuptials. Cf. Ruth 3:3. Purification from heathenism and consecration to the Lord. 10. I shod you with leather (RSV). Taḥash (used as a covering for the Tabernacle, Ex 25:5; 26:14), is either an Egyptian loan-word, "leather," or the Arabic dugong, a kind of porpoise, whose skin was used for sandals.

11-13. For the bride's finery, see Isa 3:18-24; Gen 24:22,30,47. 12. A ring on your nose (RSV; AV, forehead). See also Jud 8:24; Isa 3:21. 13. Bountiful food. Cf. Deut 32:13,14; Hos 2:10. 14. The splendor of Jerusalem in Solomon's time (cf. I Kgs 10; Lam 2:15).

c) The Wife's Shameless Infidelity. 16:15-34.

Her idolatries with the Canaanites (vv. 15-22), and with foreign peoples (vv. 23-29): Egyptians (vv. 26,27), Assyrians (v. 28), and Chaldeans (v. 29). 15. After settling in Canaan, Israel frequented the Canaanite sanctuaries (cf. 20:28; Jer 2:5-7; 3:1-3). 16. Gaily-colored tents on the high places (cf. II Kgs 23:7). 17. Images. Of Baals? Or phallic symbols? (May, IB) 18,19. Cf. Jer 10:9; Hos 2:8. 20,21. Child sacrifice. Cf. 20:26,31; 23:37-39. Cf Ex 22:29; Jud 11:39; II Kgs 16:3; 21:6; 23:10; Jer 7:31; 19:5; 32:35. 24. Objects erected for unlawful worship. 25. Cf. 23:8,17,30,40.

26,27. Alliance with Egypt. Cf. Isa 30:1ff.; 31:1ff.; II Kgs 18:21. Lustful neighbors (RSV); cf. 23:20, euphemism for power of Egypt. 27. Philistine harassment of Judah in the time of Sennacherib (see ANET, p. 288). 28. With the Assyrians. Ahaz' and Manasseh's pro-Assyria policy (II Kgs 16:7ff.; 21:1ff.; II Chr 33:1ff.). 29. The trading land of Chaldea (RSV). Literally, in the land of Canaan unto Chaldea. Here the word Canaan is used in the sense of "a trader, merchant"; i.e., unto the merchants' land, even Chaldea (cf. 17:4; Hos 12:7; Zeph 1:11; Zech 14:21).

30. How weak is thine heart. "How lovesick is your heart," seems to be the idea. In Aramaic and Akkadian the phrase occurs, "How am I filled with wrath against thee" (Cook, ICC). The deeds of a brazen harlot (RSV). Literally, the work of a woman, an imperious harlot. 31. Compare verses 24,25. Scornest or "mocked" hire (cf. H. G. May, "The Fertility Cult in Hosea," AJSL, 48 (1932) 89-93). 32-34. Other harlots take hire; she was different in that she gave hire to strangers (cf. Deut 23:18; Hos 2:19; 9:1). 33. The words nēdeh, "gift" (AV gifts), and nādān, "marriage gifts" (AV, gifts), are hapax legomena.

d) The Punishment of the Adulterous Wife. 16:35-43.

The passage interweaves a description of the punishment of an adulteress with a foreview of the destruction of Jerusalem.

36. The Hebrew word rendered thy nakedness elsewhere means "copper" or "bronze." It may be an Akkadian loanword—"excess, prodigality." The last part of the verse echoes verses 20,21. 37. All thy lovers. The nations with which she had become allied; and all those you loathed (RSV). Those with whom no alliances had been formed, e.g., the Philistines.

38. Break wedlock. Cf. Lev 20:10; Deut 22:22; Jn 8:5-7. Shed blood. Cf. verses 20,36; Gen 9:6; Ex 21:12; Lev 24:17. Blood in fury. With a minute change, the reading is, "I will lay on you wrath and jealousy," as in 23:25. 39. Strip . . . thy clothes. This signifies the exposure of the adulteress. See also 23:26; Hos 2:3,10.

40. A company. A multitude gathered for the trial and stoning of the adulteress (cf. v. 38). 41. Burn thine houses. Cf. Jud 15:6; 12:1. In the sight of many women. To warn them. Cf. 23:10,48. 42. My fury will be appeased. Cf. 5:13. 43. Thou hast not remembered. A summary of verses 35-43.

e) Jerusalem's Depravity Compared with That of Sodom and Samaria. 16:44-52.

44,45. As is the mother, so is her daughter. Jerusalem and her sisters resembled their common mother, the Hittite (cf. v. 3). 46. Thine elder (lit., greater, i.e., in political and territorial power) sister was Samaria, who lived with her daughters (dependent towns) to the north (i.e., left, as one faces east; Gen 14:15), while her younger (i.e., less important) sister to the south, or right (I Sam 23:19), was Sodom and her daughters. Galling comparisons. Cf. Jer 3:6ff.; Isa 1:9.

47. More than they. Jerusalem exceeded the wickedness of her sisters (cf. Mt 10:15; 11:20-24). 48-50. Sodom's heinous crimes of Genesis 19 are not recounted, but rather her pride, prosperous ease (RSV; abundance of idleness, AV), and failure to strengthen the hand of the poor and needy. Cf. Amos 6:4-6; Est 3:15; Lk 16:19-31. 51,52. Samaria. Samaria's sins are not named, but she and Sodom appear righteous, relatively speaking, in comparison with Jerusalem (cf. Amos 3:2).

f) Glorious Promises of Restoration for the Three Sisters. 16:53-58.

53. Bring again their captivity. Cf. Jer 12:14-17; 46:26; 48:47; 40:6,39; Isa 19:24. 54-56. If Samaria and Sodom were punished, how much more did Jerusalem deserve punishment! If Jerusalem was to be restored, it was only just that they who were a byword in her mouth be restored also.

57,58. Jerusalem had become an object of reproach of the daughters (i.e., cities) of Syria (following many MSS and Syr., read Edom instead of MT Aram, i.e., Syria) and to the daughters of the Philistines. The destruction of Jerusalem, here prophetically assumed, causes unholy glee in the Edomites and Philistines (25:12-14,15-17; Ob 10-14; Ps 137:7-9).

g) A Glorious Reconciliation and an Everlasting Covenant. 16:59-63.

59,60. Breaking the covenant. Jerusalem had broken the covenant made in her youth at the Exodus (cf. vv. 8,43). Consequently, she must suffer; but in the day of her repentance, God will give her an everlasting covenant (cf. 37:26; Isa 54:9,10; 55:3; Jer 31:35,36; 32:40; 33:20-22). Samaria and Sodom (as representing the heathen world) are to be included in the new covenant as an act of grace, since the former covenant broken by Israel did not include them. 63. Remember. Jerusalem will be abashed by memories of her unworthy past "when I purge you," "make atonement for you." The word "atone," kippēr, with God as agent, is used (cf. Deut 21:8; Jer 18:23; Ps 78:38).

The fall of Israel was a cause of Ezekiel's outreach to the Gentile world. Even peoples like those of Sodom shall be converted to the Lord, says Ezekiel. Similarly the Apostle Paul declares, "By their (Israel's) fall salvation is come unto the Gentiles" (Rom 11:11,12; ASV). "God hath shut up all unto disobedience, that he might have mercy upon all" (Rom 11:32; ASV).

5) Parable of the Vine and the Two Eagles. 17:1-24.

a) The Allegory. 17:1-10.

2. The prophet propounds a riddle (ḥidâ; cf. Jud 14:12; I Kgs 10:1) requiring interpretation, or a parable (māshāl; cf. 24:3; Isa 14:4) containing a similitude or comparison.

3,4. A great eagle. The great broad-winged eagle (nesher, often "vulture"; Hos 8:1; Lam 4:19; but here "eagle" is more fitting) with long pinions represents Nebuchadnezzar. The many colors possibly indicate the various nations included in the Babylonian empire. Lebanon is the mountain of Israel; the cedar is the Davidic house (vv. 12,22). Nebuchadnezzar is represented as carrying off Jehoiachin, king of Judah, to the land of traffick, Babylon. 5,6. The seed of the land, native to the region is Zedekiah. It was planted in a fruitful field (the land of Israel), in the vicinity of abundant waters (Deut 8:7; 11:11), where it possessed every natural advantage for growth and fruitfulness. Prosperity is indicated by the fact that the seed sprouted and became a low spreading vine . . . and brought forth branches and put forth foliage (RSV).

7,8. Another great eagle. Pharaohhophra of Egypt enters the scene (Jer 44:30; 37:7). Though flourishing in good soil, the vine (Zedekiah) sought the agency of another power to supply it more abundantly.

9,10. Ezekiel asks, Shall it prosper? Like Isaiah and Jeremiah, Ezekiel opposed an Egyptian alliance (Isa 30:1-5; 31:1-3; Jer 2:36). Cooke (ICC) suggests a transposition of verses 9 and 10. First comes destruction upon the vegetation of Palestine by the east wind and then destruction by the arm of Nebuchadnezzar, whose city, Babylon, lay almost due east of Jerusalem.

b) The Interpretation of the Allegory. 17:11-21.

Ezekiel addresses the interpretation to the rebellious house (v. 12), the Jewish exiles among whom he lived. The history of Jehoiachin's deportation and of Zedekiah's oath of fealty (II Chr 36:13; cf. Gen 15:9-18; Jer 34:8-22) is recapitulated.

13,14. Nebuchadnezzar had removed the mighty (chief men) of the land likely to stir up revolt, that Judah might remain as a state dependent on and friendly to Babylon. 15-17. He rebelled. Zedekiah broke the covenant with the king of Babylon, as well as that with the Lord (v. 19), and consequently was to die in Babylon with no aid from Pharaoh. 21. And all the pick (i.e., choice men) of his (Zedekiah's) troops (RSV, following the Targum and the Syriac) shall fall before the Babylonian armies.

c) The Promise of a New and Universal Kingdom in Israel. 17:22-24.

The Lord makes clear that he will not permit his kingdom to be annihilated, but will fulfill his promise to the seed of David.

Nebuchadnezzar broke off a twig from the cedar and brought it to Babylon, and the shoot he planted died. The Lord declares that he himself will pluck off a shoot from the top of the high cedar (the Davidic house; vv. 2,3; Isa 53:2) and plant it on a high mountain, that all may see it (cf. Isa 2:2; 11:10) and find protection under it (Ezk 17:23; cf. Mt 13:31, 32). The establishment of this new and universal kingdom by Jehovah will lead the world to recognize him as the Lord of human life and the Controller of Israel's destiny.

Other kingdoms are likewise called trees. See 31:5,8,14,16,18. For passages in Ezekiel concerning God's kingdom, see 21:27; 34:24ff.; 37:24ff. See also Lk 1:51-55. The lineage of Christ is traced through Jehoiachin (Mt 1:11,12).

6) God's Justice Shown in His Treatment of Individuals. 18:1-32.

Ezekiel begins this passage with Jeremiah's quotation of a current saying (Jer 31:29) that had made its way to the exiles at Tell Abib: "The fathers used to eat sour grapes, and the children's teeth are blunted" (Ezk 18:2).

Jeremiah had described the exiles carried away with Jehoiachin in 597 B.C. as "good figs," while those left behind under Zedekiah were "bad figs" (Jer 24). The Jews of Zedekiah's day probably looked upon themselves as righteous in comparison with the people of Manasseh's era; and so the proverb may convey a tone of self-righteousness.

However, the people were slipping into despair and fatalism. If they were being punished for the crimes of Manasseh (II Kgs 24:3,4) and for the sins of their fathers, why should they struggle? What chance does an individual have in the face of a fate inherited from the past? Why should anyone try to be godly in such an unjust world? (Cf. the hedonism pictured in Isa 22:12,13). Is there any alternative to bleak despair for man? (Ezk 33:10)

Ezekiel had previously thundered wholesale condemnation on the people (cf. chs. 16; 20; 23). Yet God allowed for brands being plucked from the burning. The righteous were marked off from the wicked by a sign (4:4). In the face of imminent judgment, they would deliver their own lives, but no others (14:14, 16,18,20). However, repentance would be possible (14:6,11).

The concepts of social solidarity and group responsibility were old in Israel. Ezekiel's homily or essay in chapter 18 implies the working of the natural sequence of cause and effect amidst the circumstances of human life. God does not hold a man responsible for the circumstances into which he was born, but only for the use to which he puts them subsequently. Hence, a man is free to renounce his past, whether for good or for evil.

Just as a writer can change the course of a narrative by adding new material to the previously written chapters of a book, so, despite a dismal past, the present can become the opportunity for total transformation and can issue in a triumphant future. Forgiveness does not obliterate the past, but relates it in a new way to God, so that we can transform it from a curse to a source of blessing (cf. Allen, IB, pp. 157-161).

Our prophet desires to vindicate divine justice and in doing so assigns new value to the individual in his treatment at the hands of God. God deals with men as individuals, says the prophet. "All souls are mine" (18:4). "I have no pleasure in the death of anyone" (v. 32, RSV). Since each soul is immediately related to God, its destiny depends on this relation. "The soul that sinneth, it shall die"

(v. 4); "So turn and live" (v. 32). Cf. 3:16-21; 33:10-20.

As the representative of God, Ezekiel states that the individual man is not involved in the sins and fate of his forefathers (vv. 1-4). And then he develops the principle of the personal responsibility of the individual in the instance of three successive generations: a righteous father, a wicked son, and a righteous grandson (vv. 5-9, 10-13, 14-18). He restates the principle of individual responsibility (vv. 19,20), and declares that divine forgiveness is available to the repentant sinner, but that the apostate will die in his sins (vv. 21-29). He concludes with an exhortation to repent and be saved (vv. 30-32).

a) All Persons Individually Responsible to the Lord. 18:1-4.

2. Proverb (māshāl). Cf. 8:12; 12:22 23, The fathers have eaten (lit., eat or used to eat sour or unripe grapes (bōser), and the children's teeth are blunted (AV, set on edge). That is, the children suffer the consequences of the sins of their fathers (quoted in Jer 31:29,30). On transmission of guilt, see Ex 34:7; Num 14:18; Deut 24:16; II Kgs 14:6; Lam 5:7. 3. The use of this proverb, ascribing injustice to God, will stop at once. 4. All souls are mine; i.e., all persons belong to the Lord alike and individually, and he alone has the authority to judge. The soul that sinneth, it shall die. "Live" (vv. 9,17,19) and "die" (vv. 4, 13,18) are used in both a literal and an eschatological sense. "To live" is to enter into the perfect kingdom of the Lord which is about to come (chs. 37; 38) and "to die" is to have no share in it. Ezekiel, like the other OT writers, views this kingdom as an earthly one.

b) Life To Be the Reward of the Righteous. 18:5-9.

In this picture of the righteous man we see the obligations of right living. A general statement about the man's righteousness (v. 6) is followed by the description of his practice of piety, his chastity, and his beneficence (vv. 7,8), as rooted in obedience to the commands of God (v. 9). For similar lists of virtues, see Ps 15; 24:3-6; Isa 58:5-7; Job 31. A good man's outward conduct is a revelation of his inner character, the result of obedience to God.

6. Hath not eaten sacrificial meals to false gods upon the mountains nor lifted up his eyes in prayer to idols (cf. 6:4). A righteous man abstains from adultery and impurity (Lev 15:19-30). 7,8. Hath restored to the debtor his pledge. Cf. Ex 22:26; Deut 24:6; Job 22:6, Amos 2:8. Does not lend at interest (RSV). Jews were forbidden to take interest from their needy brethren (Ex 22:25; Lev 25:25-37; Deut 23:19) but were permitted interest on loans to foreigners (Deut 23:20). Nor hath taken any increase; i.e., more than was lent. 9. The MT reads, "And my judgments he has kept to do truth ('emet), which the LXX renders, "to do them" (ôtām). He shall surely live. This contrasts with verse 4.

c) A Wicked Son of a Righteous Father To Incur Death. 18:10-13.

10. If he beget a violent son, a shedder of blood (the rest of the verse may be a gloss from Lev 4:2). 11. That doeth not any of those duties. Those listed in verses 6-9. 13. Shall he then live? This is the logical conclusion of the question posed in verse 10. He shall surely die. Literally, shall be put to death, the formula of Ex 21:15; 22:18; Lev 20:9,11. A good father cannot pile up merit for his son.

d) A Righteous Son of a Wicked Father To Merit Life. 18:14-18.

14. The man in the third link of the chain sees all the sin of his father and fears (so the LXX, Old Lat., and Vulg.), and avoids his example. 16. Exacts no pledge (RSV), thus going further than verses 7,12. 17. Withholds his hand from iniquity (RSV). This translation follows the reading of verse 8 and the LXX. The reading of the MT, has withdrawn his hand from, so as not to oppress, the poor (cf. 20:22), is tenable.

Hezekiah, Manasseh, and Josiah, the later kings of Judah, aptly illustrate the three cases above, though they comprise four generations.

e) The Principle of Individual Responsibility Restated. 18:19,20.

19. Yet say ye. See also verses 25,29; 33:17,20; Mal 1:2; and frequent occurrences in Malachi. Why? doth not the son bear the iniquity of the father? Ezekiel points out that neither son nor father will be held responsible for the other's iniquity, but each person is individually responsible to God.

f) Divine Forgiveness for the Repentant Sinner but Not for the Apostate. 18:21-29.

As a man does not inherit the consequences of what his fathers have done, so the individual, through repentance, can be emancipated from his own past. The wicked man who turns from his evil to righteousness shall live (vv. 21-23). However, the righteous man who abandons his righteousness for evil shall die in his evil (v. 24). To the objection that the ways of the Lord are not just, comes the rejoinder that the ways of the house of Israel are not just (vv. 25-29).

21. The sinner is free to repent and turn from sin and do God's will. Contrast the idea in Hos 5:4; Jer 13:23. 22. In his righteousness. Cf. verse 24; 33:16. 23. Have I any pleasure at all that the wicked should die? This question reflects God's mercy and his desire to save all. "The most precious word in the whole Book of Ezekiel" (Kraetzschmar). Cf. verse 32; 33:11; I Tim 2:4; II Pet 3:9.

25. The way of the Lord, the principle on which he acts, is not equal (yittākēn). Literally, adjusted to the standard. A figure from the mercantile exchange (cf. v. 29; 33:17; I Sam 2:3). 26-29. These verses repeat in shorter form the thought presented in verses 21-25, to emphasize this new concept.

g) Exhortation To Repent and Be Saved. 18:30-32.

31. Cast away. Here Ezekiel refers to man's part in the renewal. In 11:19; 36:25-27, he points out God's part. Cf. Jer 4:4; 24:7; 31:33; Ps 51:7; Phil 2:12, 13. His ministry required both emphases. 32. I have no pleasure in the death of him that dieth (AV). I desire not the death of him that is to die; i.e., that deserves to die (cf. v. 23; 33:11).

Ezekiel, as the appointed watchman of the Lord (3:16-21; 33:1-9), warned and wooed his people, proclaiming the justice of God and also His love toward the repentant sinner. How to harmonize the personal responsibility of the individual and his moral freedom with God's justice in the treatment of every individual is a difficult problem, with which the book of Job and Psalm 73 struggle. Job received not a solution but satisfaction in a fresh vision of God (Job 42:5,6). "The heart has reasons that the reason knows not of," said Pascal. Despite the problems of suffering and sin, trust in a loving Heavenly Father is ever the proper attitude of the believer.

7) Allegory of the Two Lions and the Vine. 19:1-14.

Two laments in elegiac meter (qînâ), under the guise of allegory, depict: (1) a lioness, the nation Israel, deprived successively of her two whelps—Jehoahaz, deported to Egypt (vv. 2-4), and Jehoiachin, taken captive to Babylon (vv. 5-9); and (2) a vine and its rods, torn up, planted in a wilderness, and consumed by fire out of one of its own rods; that is, Israel involved in destruction by her own King Zedekiah and exiled to Babylon (vv. 10-14).

a) The Lioness Deprived of Her Two Whelps. 19:1-9.

1. A lamentation (qînâ; see also 26:17; 27:2; 28:12; 32:2; Amos 5:1) is a poem in characteristic elegiac meter, in which a longer line, usually of three beats, is followed by a shorter one, usually of two beats (cf. Amos 5:1-3; Lam 1).

2. The nation Israel (or Judah) is pictured as a mother of mighty kings, a lioness, in power and majesty. Lions were common in ancient Palestine (Jer 49:19; 50:44; Zech 11:3; Song 4:8; Isa 30:6). Five different words for them are found in Job 4:10,11, three of which occur in this verse. The lion became practically extinct in Palestine after the Crusades. 3. One of her whelps. Jehoahaz. Learned to catch the prey; i.e., became a ruling king. 4. The nations sounded an alarm (RSV). Read the MT as a causative, caused a cry to be heard. Cf. Isa 31:4; Jer 50:29. Jehoahaz was carried to Egypt by Pharaoh-necho (II Kgs 23:33,34).

5. Was baffled (RSV; AV, had waited). Reading nô'ălâ in place of MT nôḥălâ, "waited." Another of her whelps. Jehoiachin. 6. He prowled (RSV). Walked about. 7. And he ravaged their strongholds (RSV). This translation follows the Targum instead of MT and he knew his widows. Cf. Jer 2:15,16; 4:7; 5:6; 25:37. 8. [Snares] on every side. Cf. 12:13; 17:20, where it is also parallel with "net." 9. Nebuchadnezzar carried Jehoiachin to Babylon (II Kgs 24:15).

b) The Vine Uprooted and Consumed by Fire. 19:10-14.

10. Another metaphor is introduced here. Israel is compared to a vine. See also Isa 5:1-7; 27:2,3; Ps 80:9; Mk 12:1-9. In a vineyard (RSV) appears in two manuscripts, in contrast to MT in thy blood. 11. Its strongest rod became a ruler's sceptre (RSV). So the LXX B, the Old Latin, the Arabic, and verses 12,14. This rod is Zedekiah (or Jehoiachin). 12. But she, the nation, was plucked up. Cf. 17:9,10; 31:12; Amos 9:15. The east wind, Babylon, dried up her fruit. 13. The nation is now in exile amid conditions where national life cannot thrive. 14. The fire has gone out from its stem (RSV). The vine was consumed by fire from one of her own rods. Zedekiah by his rebellion brought destruction on both nation and dynasty (II Kgs 24:20ff.; Jer 52:3). This [has become] a lamentation. That is, the dirge is finished, and has become history (cf. 32:16).

E. Israel's Coming Downfall Inevitable and Necessary. 20:1–24:27.

Ezekiel reviews the history of the people of Israel whom the Lord kept alive out of regard for his own name (20:1-44). But now regard for his name requires that his avenging sword smite Jerusalem (20:45–21:23 = MT 21:1-37). Moreover, Jerusalem's abominations, like dross, must experience the smelting fires of judgment upon the classes and masses alike (ch. 22). In an allegory reminiscent of that in chapter 16, the Lord dilates upon the infidelity and harlotry of two sisters, Oholah (Samaria) and Oholibah (Jerusalem), to their divine spouse, and the punishment consequent upon their adultery (ch. 23). On the day of the beginning of the siege of Jerusalem (Jer 39:1), Ezekiel relates the allegory of the rusted caldron set on the fire for purging. And by his abstention from mourning at the death of his wife, he becomes a symbol of the people's despair at the fate of their city (ch. 24).

1) Review of Israel's Unfaithfulness, and Her Preservation. 20:1-44.

To the elders of the Jewish community in Babylonia seeking a divine oracle (vv. 1-4), Ezekiel reviews Israel's history, with its recurring rebellions (vv. 8,13,16, 21,28), and its preservation by the Lord because of his regard for his own name (vv. 9,14,17,22,41-44). Israel sinned both in Egypt (vv. 5-9) and on the journey from Egypt to Kadesh-barnea (vv. 10-17). The second generation in the wilderness rebelled against God (vv. 18-26), and the people who entered Canaan were continually faithless to Him (vv. 27-29). The prophet's own generation was as idolatrous as the preceding generations (vv. 30-32). However, God's purpose for His people in the future would involve judgment and hope (vv. 33-44). Israel would be brought into the wilderness a second time, for the purpose of judgment (vv. 33-39). Then, after idolatry had been rooted out and true worship made possible, the Lord would be acknowledged by the nations and by an Israel that loathed her past (vv. 40-44).

a) Introduction: Ezekiel Consulted by the Elders of Israel. 20:1-4.

1. In the seventh year. July-August 590 (591) B.C., eleven months after the last date mentioned (8:1). The elders. Cf. 8:1. 3. I will not be enquired of. Cf. verse 31; 14:3; 36:37. Rather than answering their question relative to the present, God rehearses the relevant lesson of Israel's past. 4. Judge them (cf. 22:2; 23:6) by letting them know the abominations of their fathers.

b) Rebellious Israel Preserved by the Lord's Regard for His Name. 20:5-32.

5-9. Israel's rebellion in Egypt. 5. God's choice of Israel is mentioned only here in Ezekiel. It is mentioned first in Deut 4:37; 7:7,8; 10:15; 14:2; once in Jer 33:24; often in Isa 40–66, e.g., 41:8,9. Lifted up mine hand, in taking an oath (see also vv. 6,15,23,28,42; 36:7; 44:12; 47:14). Made myself known. Cf. Ex 3:6ff.; 4:28ff.; 6:3. 6. Flowing with milk and honey. In the Pentateuch this expression occurs fifteen times, e.g., Ex 3:8. Elsewhere it occurs only in Ezk 20:15; Jer 11:5; 32:22. On the beauty of Israel, see Jer 3:19; Dan 8:9. 7,8. The charge of Israel's idolatry in Egypt (cf. 23:3; Josh 24:14; Lev 18:3) is not alluded to in the Exodus account. 9. I wrought for my name's sake. This refrain occurs also in verses 14,22. Cf. Jer 14:7,21; Isa 43:25; 48:9,11. The name stands for what God is and has shown himself to be. If he had not led his people out of Egypt, the nations would have charged him with weakness (Num 14:13-16; Deut 9:28). His name is profaned when men harbor thoughts of him or attribute deeds to him inconsistent with his character as holy and unique (cf. v. 39; 36:20-22). The opposite of "to profane" is "to sanctify." It is to recognize the Lord as the one true God in every area of life, and to live in a manner befitting him.

10-17. Israel's rebellions in the wilderness. 11. Statutes and . . . ordinances. Giving of the Law at Sinai (Ex 19ff.). 12. My sabbaths. As a sign that the Lord was their God and they were his people (v. 20; Ex 31:13,14; Isa 66:2,4). During the Exile the observance of the sabbath became a distinguishing sign of the Jews as the people of the Lord (see vv. 12,13,16,20,21,24). I am the Lord that sanctify them; i.e., have set them apart from other peoples and consecrated them for myself. Out of regard for his name (v. 14) and out of pity for the sinners (v. 17), the Lord spared the second generation.

18-26. Rebellion of the second generation against God. 18. Their children in the wilderness. See Deut 1:39; Num 14: 31,33. 21. They imitated the sins of their fathers (Num 25:1,2; Deut 9:23,24; 31:27). 23-26. The sins were punished in two ways: by the threat of dispersion upon entering Canaan (vv. 23,24); and by forcing them to incur punishment (vv. 25,26). 23. Scatter them among the heathen. Such threats could be averted by repentance (cf. Mic 3:12; Jer 26:16-19; 18; Jonah). 25. I gave them also statutes that were not good. The Lord is not here speaking of the Law, which was good (vv. 13,21). But the rebellious people were left to a law of another kind (v. 18), working not life but death. "It is part of that universal moral government of the world . . . that the effect of disobedience and the neglect of grace is to lead the sinner on to greater sin" (F. Gardiner in Ellicott's Commentary). For the judicial blindness with which God afflicts those who willfully close their eyes, see Acts 7:42; Rom 1:24,25; II Thess 2:11. 26. God permitted them to fall into the crime of offering by fire all their first-born (RSV; cf. v. 31; 16:21; 23:37) that they might know that I am the Lord.

27-29. Israel's rebellion against God upon entering Canaan. 28. Canaanite worship on high places and under green trees was adopted by Israel. It was condemned by Amos (4:4; 5:21); by Hosea (6:6; 8:11,13; 9:1); by Jeremiah (2:20; 3:6). They offered there their sacrifices. Hebrew zebaḥ means animals slaughtered and eaten at feasts, especially peace offerings and thank offerings (Lev 3:1ff.; 7:12-25). The provocation, or vexation (omitted by the Syriac) of their offering. Hebrew qorbān, "offering," refers to both bloody and nonbloody oblations (Lev 1:2,3,10; 2:1,5), such as first fruits (Lev 2:12; 23:10,17). Soothing odors (RSV; rêaḥ niḥôaḥ). Odors of flesh, fat, or meal burnt on the altar as pleasant to the Lord (Gen 8:21; Ex 29:18; Lev 1:9). Drink offerings (nesek). Libations of wine that accompanied meal offerings and peace offerings (Lev 23:13; Num 15:1-12). 29. What is the high place whereunto ye go? These idol repositories (v. 28) were not fit for the worship of the Lord. "High place," bāmâ, is the object of a scornful play on words – bā', "go," plus mâ, "what."

30-32. Rebelliousness of Ezekiel's generation. 30,31. Ezekiel's contemporaries who, like their fathers, had defiled themselves, could not receive an oracle from the Lord (cf. v. 3). 32. Let us be as the heathen. One interpretation holds that the exiles were planning to assimilate themselves to their heathen surroundings, but it is not likely that they would have shared such plans with the prophet Ezekiel. A second view claims that the exiles wanted Ezekiel's approval for setting up an altar and temple to the Lord in Babylonia. (Cf. the Jewish temple at Elephantine, Egypt.) More likely the prophet, speaking for Jehovah, was condemning the syncretistic and idolatrous practices of his fellow countrymen in Judah.

c) The Lord's Regard for His Name To Bring Israel Through Future Judgment to Prospects of Hope. 20:33-44.

33-39. A second encounter in the wilderness (in contrast to vv. 10-26) for the purpose of judgment. 34. Will I rule over you. The sovereign Vindicator of right and truth speaks. 34. I will bring you out from the people. As a distinct race, to be dealt with as his own people. 35. Wilderness of the people. Perhaps not a material wilderness, but a wilderness condition – scattered among the nations. 37. I will cause you to pass under the rod. A figurative reference to a shepherd's staff, used in counting sheep (Lev 27:32; Jer 33:13). I will let you go in by number (so RSV, following the LXX) into the fold. 38. I will purge out from among you the rebels. The rebels will be separated and not allowed to share in the future restoration. 39. Serve ye every one his idols. God will give them up to pursue their chosen way to its inevitable end.

40-44. Idolatry to be rooted out of Israel and true worship made possible. 40. In the mountain of the height of Israel (Mic 4:1,2; Isa 2:2,3), all the (redeemed) house of Israel will be accepted. 41. As a sweet savour to the Lord. I will manifest my holiness among you (RSV). So that the nations may acknowledge the Lord's power and sole deity. See also 28:22,25; 36:23; 38:16,23; 39:27. 42. I am the Lord. Israel will know the Lord as the God to be honored and served when he fulfills his ancient promises to the fathers in the restoration of the land. 43. Ye shall loathe yourselves. For their past sins (6:9; 16:61ff.). But they will be brought to repentance by the goodness of God (Rom 2:4). 44. I am the Lord. The people will see that all through their past the Lord, for his name's sake, dealt with them in grace and not as they deserved (cf. Isa 40:5). Verses 40-44 point forward to chapter 40 and the following.

2) Israel To Be Punished by God's Avenging Sword. 20:45–21:32.

The MT numbers this section chapter 21, while the English version, following the LXX, the Syriac, and the Vulgate, makes it 20:45-49; 21:1-32. Four oracles can be distinguished: (a) A fire shall devour the forest of the south (20:45-49), even the fire of war and sword against Jerusalem and Israel (21:1-7); (b) The "song of the sword," despite textual obscurities, graphically depicts the divine visitation impending over Jerusalem (vv. 8-17); (c) The king of Babylon, the wielder of the sword, is directed by lot at the crossroads to proceed against Jerusalem (vv. 18-27); (d) Ammon, threatening Israel with the sword, will himself be doomed (vv. 28-32).

a) The Devouring Fire of War Against Jerusalem and Israel. 20:45–21:7.

45-59. The figure of a fire devouring the forests of the south. 46. Set thy face toward the south. Three words for south occur in this verse—têmān, dārôm, and negeb, meaning respectively, "right hand," "brilliant" or "midday," and "dry land." All are designations for Israel, which lay south in the path of conquerors advancing from Babylon (cf. 1:4). Note the threefold reference to Israel in 21:2,3. Preach. Literally, drop your word against (cf. 21:2; Amos 7:16; Mic 2:6,11). 47. Kindle a fire in thee. This is a figure of destruction (cf. Isa 9:17; 10:17-19; Jer 21:14; Zech 11:1-3; Ps 83:14). Green tree . . . dry tree. Cf. 21:3. All alike, righteous and wicked, are to be involved in the national judgment (cf. Lk 23:31). All faces. Of spectators, or of the trees.

49. Parables. Or enigmas. For the word māshāl, see 18:2. The people took notice of the prophet's method of speaking, but did not apply his message to themselves.

21:1-7. The fire of war and the sword directed against Jerusalem and Israel. 2. Preach. Cf. 20:46. The words, Jerusalem . . . holy places (the Temple and its precincts), and Israel, correspond to the three souths of 20:46. 3. My sword. Cf. 21:5; 30:24,25; 32:10. Jehovah will fight on behalf of his people (Josh 5:13-15); defeat Israel's enemies (Deut 32:41, 42; Isa 31:8; Jer 50:35), and judge the ungodly (Jer 25:31; Isa 66:16). The sword drawn against Israel is that of his agent, Nebuchadnezzar (see v. 19; 12:13; 17:20). I will cut off . . . righteous and the wicked. The "green" and "dry" trees of 20:47. This instance of corporate solidarity does not prevent the righteous individual's entering into that fellowship with God that transcends death (cf. ch. 18).

6. Sigh . . . with the breaking of thy loins. The loins were regarded as the seat of strength (Job 40:16; cf. Ps 66:11; 69:23; Isa 21:3; Nah 2:10). Before their eyes. An acted parable. 9. The exiles in Babylonia would likewise be heartbroken at the news of Jerusalem's fall (cf. 33:21).

b) The Song of the Sword. 21:8-17.

9-11. The sword sharpened for the slaughter. 10. Should we then make mirth? These words, from here to the end of the verse, are corrupt. Keil's interpretation (Biblical Commentary on Ezekiel, in loco) retains the MT: "Shall we rejoice (saying), 'The scepter of my son despises all woods' (i.e., other scepters)." This interpretation sees here a reference to Gen 49:9,10; II Sam 7:14. Cf. verse 27.

12,13. The agitation of the prophet. 12. Smite . . . upon thy thigh. As a gesture of despair (Jer 31:19). 13. It is a trial. The text is corrupt. Of many reconstructions, Keil's is close to the MT: "For the trial is made, and what if the despising scepter shall not come?" That is, What will happen if that kingdom, Judah, shall be left without a ruler? Cf. verses 10,27.

14,15. The sword doubled and tripled in intensity for the carnage. The MT of these verses is difficult, and all translations resort to conjectural emendations. Clap your hands (RSV). A gesture of strong emotion (cf. v. 17; 22:13). 16. Go thee one way or other. An apostrophe to the sword. 17. I will also smite mine hands together. The Lord exults over the coming vengeance.

c) The King of Babylon, the Wielder of the Sword, To Proceed Against Jerusalem. 21:18-27.

19. Appoint thee two ways. The prophet was commanded to mark on the sand, or possibly on a brick or tile (cf. 4:1), two lines representing two roads which the king of Babylon and his army would follow. These roads come forth from the same land, Babylon, and follow the same route hundreds of miles to the Orontes Valley before diverging. At the head of the way (road) to the city. Perhaps this refers to Riblah, in the Lebanon country (or Damascus), where the two roads separate. A pointing hand or signpost (cf. I Sam 15:12; II Sam 18:18) was to be erected, indicating direction. 20. Rab- bath of the Ammonites (cf. 25:5). In Greco-Roman times this city was called Philadelphia; today it is known as Amman. It is situated at the source of the Jabbok, twenty-five miles northeast of the Dead Sea. Rabbath-Ammon lay on one road and Jerusalem on the other. Both were guilty of conspiracy against Babylon (Jer 27:1-3).

21. At the parting (lit., mother) of the way, the king of Babylon would use three types of divination. He would shake arrows, one marked for Jerusalem and the other for Ammon, in a quiver or helmet; and the one inscribed "Jerusalem" would be drawn out. He would consult images, or teraphim, small household gods in human form (cf. Gen 31:19; I Sam 19:13,16). He would look at the liver (as the seat of life, filled with blood) for omens, a custom practiced among the Babylonians, Greeks, and Romans. 22. Divination for Jerusalem. All of the methods would point to Jerusalem as the goal against which the invaders would shout a battle cry, and erect battering rams, mounds, and siege towers (RSV). 23. But to the Jews who had sworn oaths of allegiance to Nebuchadnezzar only to break them (17:16-18), the divination would seem false. 24. Ye have made your iniquity to be remembered. Because of your guilt (āwôn), transgressions (pesha'), and sins (ḥaṭṭā't), you shall be seized by the hand; i.e., arrested by enemy officers.

25. The dishonored wicked prince of Israel, Zedekiah, had reached his day (I Sam 26:10) of punishment (cf. Ezk 21:29; 35:5). 26. The turban (RSV; miṣnepet, "diadem" or "mitre," used elsewhere of the high priest; see Ex 28:4; Lev 8:9) and the crown ('atārâ; cf. Jer 13:18; II Sam 12:30) of the royal house would be removed. The whole existing state of things would be overturned. 27. A ruin, ruin, ruin I will make it (RSV). The repetition expresses the superlative degree (cf. Isa 6:3; Jer 22:29). The prevailing condition of things would be overturned, until he come whose right it is; and I will give it him. This is Ezekiel's first distinct reference to the personal Messiah, who will have the right to wear the crown and will be a true king. See Gen 49:10, where Ezekiel evidently read shellô, "whose it is" (equivalent to 'ăsher lô; cf. v. 27) in place of Shîlōh. On this use of right, see Deut 21:17; Jer 32:7,8.

d) Oracle Against Ammon. 21:28-32 (cf. 25:1-7; Amos 1:13-15; Zeph 2:8-11; Jer 49:1-6).

Although Nebuchadnezzar would turn aside from Ammon to Jerusalem (vv. 19, 20), Ammon's doom would be worse than Jerusalem's. 28. Casting reproach upon Israel, they drew the sword against her for conquest. 29. They divine a lie. The false visions and lies of the Ammonite soothsayers would urge their warriors to lay the sword on the necks of . . . the wicked, the princes and people of Israel. 30. Return your sword to its sheath, says the Lord, for in your own land, the land of thy nativity, will I judge you. 31. They would be delivered into the hand of brutish men (cf. Ps 94:8), savages from the desert (Ezk 25:4,10), "forgers of destruction." 32. Ammon was to become as fuel to the fire, the lifeblood of the nation poured out in its own land. In contrast to Israel, there would be no future restoration for Ammon.

3) Jerusalem's Sins To Be Judged in the Smelting Furnace. 22:1-31.

From the standpoint of homiletics, this chapter specifies the abominations of which the nation was guilty (vv. 1-12), laments the absence of any voice raised against these sins (vv. 23-31), and announces the fires of judgment upon the nation (vv. 13-22).

a) Catalogue of Jerusalem's Defiling Crimes. 22:1-12.

Four main groups of abominable deeds are treated in this first oracle. (1) Idolatry and irreligion. Forgetfulness of the Lord (v. 12) is at the root of all the sins (23:35). Idols (vv. 3,4), despising of holy things, profaning the sabbaths (v. 8; cf. v. 26; 20:20,21), and eating idol sacrifices upon the mountains (v. 9; cf. 18:6) are denounced. (2) Widespread bloodshed occurred throughout the city (see vv. 2-4,6,9,12,13,27). (3) Immorality and incest were common. Men commit[ted] lewdness (v. 9b; cf. 16:27; Lev 18:17), marrying a stepmother (v. 10; cf. Lev 18:7,8; 20:11ff.). They humbled women who were unclean in their impurity (v. 10b, RSV; cf. 18:6; Lev 18:9). They committed adultery with a neighbor's wife, and incest with a daughter in law and with a sister (v. 11; cf. Lev 18:20,5,9). (4) Inhumanity was practiced: father and mother are treated with contempt, the sojourner suffers extortion . . . the fatherless and the widow are wronged (v. 7, RSV; cf. Ex 21:17; 22:21,22). There was slander leading to bloodshed (v. 9; cf. Lev 19:16). Men took bribes, usury, and extortion (v. 12; cf. Ex 23:8; 22:25; Lev 19:13). The people did not keep the code of righteousness extolled in 18:5-9.

b) The Lord's Judgment To Be Visited upon the Sinful Nation. 22:13-22.

13-16. The necessity and certainty of the judgment. 13. I strike my hands together (RSV). A gesture of disdain (cf. 21:14,17). 16. Thou shalt take thine inheritance. Better, I shall be profaned through you. Read LXX wᵉnihalti bāk in place of MT wᵉniḥalt bᵉkā. The chastisement would be dispersion among the nations, by which the Lord would be profaned. Cf. 20:9; 36:20.

17-22. Judgment on Israel under the figure of a smelting furnace. For the figure, see also Isa 1:22,25; 48:10; Jer 6:27-30; Zech 13:9; Mal 3:2,3. Here Israel is the raw material, Jerusalem is the furnace, Jehovah smelts the ore, and Israel comes out as dross! Note the repetition of ideas throughout this paragraph. 18. House of Israel is to me become dross. Dross was a symbol of worthlessness (cf. Ps 119:119; Prov 25:4; 26:23).

c) Classes and Masses Alike Guilty of Failing to Rebuke the National Vices. 22:23-31.

Beginning at the top of the social scale, Ezekiel indicts princes, priests, potentates, prophets, and people for their complicity in sin.

24. Israel is a land that is not rained upon. LXX, wetted by rain. A drought lies upon her (cf. 34:26). In the day of indignation. Day of Jerusalem's overthrow (cf. v. 31; 21:31).

25. Her prophets. Read, her princes, substituting nāsîʾ, "prince," of the LXX for MT nābîʾ, "prophet." These were members of the royal house (cf. v. 6). The prophets are singled out in verse 28. Cf. 19:1; 21:12; 45:8,9; Zeph 3:3. 26. Her priests. The kōhen. Cf. Zeph 3:4. 27. Her princes; i.e., her potentates or nobles, the śarîm, chiefs or leaders of the people. Cf. Jer 26:10; 36:12; Zeph 3:3. 28. Her prophets. The nābîʾ. Cf. 13:10, 11; 21:28; Zeph 3:4.

29. The people of the land ('am hāʾ āreṣ). The common people. Cf. 7:27; 12:19; II Kgs 25:3,19; Jer 37:2. 30. I sought for a man to . . . make up the hedge, and stand in the gap. Cf. 13:5; Ps 106:23. The Lord sought in vain for a man to stem the tide of ruin and turn the fortunes of the people, but there was none. Compare Isa 59:15,16; 63:5, where, in the absence of a man, the Lord's arm brought victory. 31. God's indignation and fiery wrath are poured out upon such a people (cf. vv. 21,22; 9:10; Zeph 3:8).

4) Allegory of Oholah and Oholibah. 23:1-49.

Chapter 23 contains an allegorical portrayal of the history of Samaria and Jerusalem as two sisters unfaithful to their divine spouse. In the allegory of chapter 16, Israel's religious unfaithfulness because of the seductions of Canaanite worship is likened to adultery. The present chapter treats of Israel's political alliances with heathen nations, involving distrust in the power of the Lord, under the figure of harlotry. In a poem exhibiting much repulsive detail (vv. 1-35), the prophet describes (1) the infidelities of Oholah (Samaria) and her punishment (vv. 1-10); (2) the infidelities of Oholibah (Jerusalem; vv. 11-21) and her punishment (vv. 22-35). An appended address (vv. 36-49) pictures the two sisters sinning and receiving judgment contemporaneously. The kingdom of the Lord must be faithful to him rather than rely on pagan alliances. "Already the conception was taking possession of the prophetic mind that the kingdom of God was not a state but what we now call a church" (A. B. Davidson, Cambridge Bible, p. 165).

a) Introduction. 23:1-4.

2. The two kingdoms, Israel and Judah, are introduced as sisters (cf. Jer 3:7; Ezk 16:46). 4. Oholah, she who has a tent, and Oholibah, a tent is in her, were "sisters alike in name and in guilt." For similarly formed names, see Gen 35:18; Isa 62:4. Ewald points out that in the East brothers and sisters often have names very similar, as Hasan and Husein (little Hasan), sons of Ali, son-in-law of Mohammed. They were mine. The law forbade taking two sisters in marriage (Lev 18:18). The figure of marriage (cf. Jer 2:2; Hos 2:21,22) is developed at length by Ezekiel.

b) The Infidelities of Oholah, Samaria. 23:5-10.

5,6. Her lovers the Assyrians, warriors (RSV). The AV neighbours, qᵉrôbîm, is probably connected with the word qᵉrāb, "battle" (Job 38:23; Zech 14:3); or it may be a cognate of the Akkadian ḳurâdû, "warriors," to be read qᵉrôdîm. 7. The Black Obelisk of Shalmaneser III (859–824) shows Jehu king of Israel paying tribute, 842 B.C. (cf. Pritchard, ANET, pp. 281-284). Israel entered into a costly alliance with Tiglath-pileser III (745–727), king of Assyria (II Kgs 15:19-29). Verses 8,9 tell of Samaria's intrigues with Assyria and Egypt (see also, Hos 5:13; 7:11; 8:9,10; 12:1). Hoshea's intrigues with Egypt against Assyria led to the overthrow of Samaria (II Kgs 17:3-6). 10. She became famous; i.e., she became a byword (lit., name; cf. v. 48; 16:41; 36:3).

c) The Infidelities of Oholibah, Jerusalem. 23:11-21.

11-13. Intrigues with Assyria. 11. When her sister Oholibah saw this. Samaria's example did not prove a deterrent to Jerusalem, which was guilty of greater excesses (16:47,51; Jer 3:8,11). 12. She doted upon the Assyrians. Cf. verses 5,6. Ahaz called in Assyrian aid (II Kgs 16:7; 23:11,12; Isa 7:1-25).

14-18. Intrigues with Babylon. Men pourtrayed upon the wall. The Babylonians decorated the walls of their rooms with carved and colored panels (cf. 8:10; Jer 22:14). 15. Girdles. Belts or waistcloths were part of the Babylonian's clothing (see Isa 5:27; 11:5; also, description of Babylonian noble, Herodotus Histories I, 195). Flowing turbans on their heads (RSV). Things wound around, and fillets hanging down behind. Looking like officers (RSV). An "officer" (shālîsh) was the third man who occupied the chariot with the king and the driver, a man of high rank. 16. She . . . sent messengers. The occasion is unknown, though Hezekiah had welcomed an embassy from Babylon about the year 712 B.C. (cf. Isa 39). 17. Her mind was alienated (lit., was dislocated; cf. Gen 32:25). She felt the revulsion of sated passion.

19-21. Intrigues with Egypt. 19. Played the harlot in the land of Egypt. In the time of Isaiah, there was a strong pro-Egyptian party (Isa 30—31; cf Jer 2:18; 37:5ff.; Ezk 29—32). 20. Paramours. For parallels to the revolting figures of this verse, see Hos 8:9; Jer 2:24; 5:8; 13:27. As a harlot is attracted by sexual potency, so Judah was allured by the military prowess of Egypt.

d) The Punishment of Oholibah. 23:22-35.

Four threats are announced, each beginning with the expression, "Thus saith the Lord God"—verses 22-27,28-31,32-34,35.

22-27. First threat of punishment. 23. Pekod, Shoa, and Koa (cf. Jer 50:20; Isa 22:5) are identified as the Puḳûdû, Sutû, and Ḳutû, tribes living east of the Tigris River, near its mouth, all part of the Chaldean empire. Captains and rulers. Officers and warriors, following the reading of verses 5,6, and 12. Rulers. The MT translates called ones, which may suggest counselors "called in" to give counsel. 24. Buckler. A small shield carried on the arm. And shield. A large protective device. I will commit judgment; i.e., of Jerusalem, to the Chaldeans (cf. I Kgs 8:46). They were to "judge" her according to their own cruel judgments. 25. Set my jealousy. Cf. Num 25:11. On mutilation of an adulteress, and others, see the Middle Assyrian Law Code (Barton, Archaeology and the Bible) pp. 427-438, especially sections 4,8,9,11-14, 40,41,50-59. On the practice in Egypt, see Diodorus Siculus The Historical Library i. 78. Cf. Ezk 12:13; 16:40. 26. They shall . . . strip thee. Cf. 16:38,39.

28-31. Second threat of punishment. 29. (Fruit of) thy labour; i.e., wealth (Jer 20:5; Ps 128:2). 31. Cup. Jerusalem must drink of her sister's cup of punishment (cf. Isa 51:17,22,23; Jer 25:15,16; Hab 2:16).

32-34. Third threat of punishment. These verses constitute a poem on the cup of punishment. 34. Pluck out your hair (RSV). A free rendering of the LXX for the MT gnaw its sherds. Pluck off thine own breasts. Cf. Jer 25:16; Job 39:24.

35. Fourth threat. 35. Bear (the consequences of) thy lewdness. Cf. verses 8,27,44.

e) Judgment of Oholah and Oholibah. 23:36-39. This passage constitutes an appendix with an independent description.

36-39. The sisters guilty of adultery, idolatry. 37. The blood of child sacrifices was upon their hands, in their worship of idols, especially Moloch (cf. 16:20,21). 38. They have defiled the sanctuary of the Temple and profaned the Lord's sabbaths. Cf. 20:12,13; 22:8. 39. After performing heathen worship, they entered nonchalantly into the house of the Lord. Cf. Mic 3:11; Jer 7:9-11.

40-44. The harlotry of Israel in foreign alliances. In these verses the harlot makes elaborate preparations to welcome her paramours. 40. Women painted their eyelids with powdered antimony or stibium to make them appear large and lustrous (cf. II Kgs 9:30; Jer 4:30; see also the name of Job's daughter, Kerenhappuch, "horn of eye paint," Job 42:14). 42,43. These verses are unintelligible in the MT, and the versions do not yield satisfactory readings. Verse 44 is a summary of the preceding verses. Translate, to commit lewdness (RSV), following the LXX, in place of MT women of lewdness.

45-49. The adulteress put to death by righteous men. Righteous men. Perhaps the meaning is that the moral sense of the community (not the Chaldeans) would pass judgment on the adulteresses (cf. vv. 24,47; 16:40). 47. Stone them. Stoning was the punishment for adultery prescribed by the Law (cf. 16:38-40; Deut 21:21). 48. Taught. Warned by a public example (cf. verse 10; 16:41). 49. Shall be requited (RSV). So the Targum. You shall bear the penalty (RSV). Cf. verse 35; Lev 20:20.

5) Symbols of the Final Siege of Jerusalem. 24:1-27.

a) Allegory of the Rusted Pot Set on the Fire. 24:1-14.

On the day when the siege and capture of Jerusalem began, the Lord gave the prophet an allegory and an acted parable to deliver concerning the siege and ultimate capture of the city. He was to set a rusted caldron (Jerusalem) on the fire, fill it with water, and throw pieces of flesh (the inhabitants of Jerusalem) into it. He was to pile fuel under it to make it boil furiously (the siege and its severities). Then he should pull out pieces of flesh indiscriminately from the kettle (the universal dispersion when the siege was over). He next was to set the empty pot on coals so that its rust and filth might be molten and consumed (the purifying judgments were to continue long after the destruction of the city).

1. Ninth year . . . tenth month . . . tenth day of the month. The day of the commencement of the siege of Jerusalem (II Kgs 25:1; Jer 30:1; 52:4). January 587 (or 588) B.C. During the Exile and till 518 B.C., this day was observed as a fast (Zech 8:19). 3. Utter a parable. A māshāl (cf. 17:2). Verses 3-5 are in poetical form. The prophet's inspiration came often during ordinary pursuits, here apparently while in the course of preparing a meal.

5. Pile the logs (RSV). Read with verse 10, in place of MT pile the bones. Boil its pieces (RSV). So two Hebrew manuscripts in place of MT boil its boilings. Seethe the bones. Along with the flesh on them (cf. v. 4). 6. Pot whose rust or filth is in it (RSV). Cf. 22:2. Let no lot fall upon it. In 597, were the inhabitants of the city taken captive by lot? It will not be so now. The dispersion will be indiscriminate. 7,8. Blood . . . upon the top of a rock. The openness of Jerusalem's sin (cf. Isa 3:9) is to be paralleled by the openness of her punishment. Blood uncovered cries out for vengeance (Gen 4:10; Lev 17:13; Deut 12:16; Job 16:18). In verse 8 the Lord is spoken of as appointing this shedding, so as to bring judgment on Jerusalem because of it.

10. Heap on wood. This is paralleled by verse 5. Empty out the broth (RSV). So the LXX, by slight change, instead of MT, spice the spicings. Let the bones be burned. By the powerful action of the heat in boiling. 12. In vain I have wearied myself (RSV). A slight emendation gives this reading, in place of MT with toil she hath wearied (me, or herself). Its thick rust (RSV) or great filth must be consumed out of the pot. 13. Till I have satisfied or appeased my wrath (RSV). See also 5:13; 8:18; 16:42. 14. I will judge you (RSV). So two Hebrew manuscripts and various versions. Cf. 23:49.

b) The Prophet's Unnatural Abstention from Mourning. 24:15-24.

The Lord told Ezekiel that his beloved wife would die suddenly, and that he was not to engage in the customary mourning practices. He was thus to be a symbol of the despair of the people at the fate of their beloved city Jerusalem.

16. The desire of thine eyes. Cf. verses 21,25. "The phrase alone reveals there was a fountain of tears sealed up within the breast of this stern preacher" (J. Skinner, ExpB). With a stroke. This expression refers to a sudden and fatal disease (Num 14:37), usually a plague (Ex 9:14; II Chr 21:14). 17. The prophet was to check his natural instincts when the blow fell. For mourning customs, consult Ecclesiasticus 38:17; Isa 20:2; Mic 3:7; Lev 13:45. Nor eat the bread of mourners (RSV). So the Targum and the Vulgate. Cf. Hos 9:4, reading 'ônîm for MT 'ănāshîm, "bread of men." Cf. Jer 16:7; Tob 4:17. 18,19. The people, accustomed to consult Ezekiel (8:1; 14:1; 20:1), asked why he did not mourn his wife's death. Contrast 21:12.

21. I will profane my sanctuary. By the action of a heathen foe (7:24; 25:3; 44:7; Dan 11:31). The Lord here looks behind secondary causes. The excellency of your strength. The Temple (cf. v. 25). 22,23. Ezekiel was to tell the people that they would grieve silently, deeply, at the destruction of the Temple (cf. 33:10; Ps 38:8), as he had grieved for his wife. 24. Ezekiel is unto you a sign. Cf. verse 27; 12:6,11.

c) The Prophet's Ministry Released from Limitations at the City's Fall. 24:25-27.

When tidings come of the city's fall, verifying the prophet's predictions, he is to be "no longer dumb"; the limitations will be removed, and he will be able to speak unrestrainedly to willing listeners before him.

25. In the day. Of Jerusalem's fall. 26. In that day. When the news of the city's fall reaches Babylonia. 27. Thy mouth be opened to him. In conversation with the escaped one. Be no more dumb. Cf. 3:26,27; 33:21,22. He can then be a watchman in the pastoral sense. His prophecies of doom will have been confirmed; he will be free to devote himself to building the new community. Thou shalt be a sign. Cf. verses 16-18.

II. Oracles Against Foreign Nations. 25:1—32:32.

The oracles announcing punishment on Israel's hostile neighbors (chs. 25—32) constitute a transition between the prophecies of judgment on Judah and Jerusalem (chs. 1—24), and the predictions of her restoration (chs. 33—39; 40—48). Oracles against foreign nations are grouped together in other prophets also: Isa 13—23; Jer 46—51; Amos 1; 2; Zeph 2:4-15.

Before the ideal state can be realized, enemies must be destroyed and Israel made secure in her land (28:24,26; 34:28, 29). Seven nations, possibly a symbol of completeness, are destined for retribution. Five of them had formed an alliance against Chaldea (Jer 27:1-3). Babylon, the anti-God power of the OT, is not included in the denunciations, perhaps because that nation was the instrument of God's justice (29:17ff.), although Ezekiel knew the character of the Chaldeans (7:21,22,24; 28:6; 30:11,12; 31:12).

The Lord was to mete out chastisement upon Israel's surrounding foes because of their demeanor toward Israel (25:3,8,12,15; 26:2; 29:6) and because of their ungodly pride and self-deification (28; 29:3). Here, as in the foreign oracles of the other prophets, is exhibited the international outlook of Hebrew prophecy, with its stress on the universal sovereignty of God and the moral responsibility of all mankind. "A nation's rank among the peoples depends upon the contribution which it makes to God's purpose for mankind and upon its homage to His universal rule" (Cook, ICC, p. 282).

The nations which fall under the prophet's scrutiny are Ammon, Moab, Edom, Philistia (25:1-7,8-11,12-14,15-17), Tyre (three oracles: 26; 27; 28:1-19), Sidon (28:20-26), and Egypt (seven oracles: 29:1-16,17-21; 30:1-19,20-26; 31; 32:1-16,17-32). The first four oracles are short and prosaic (ch. 25), while the pronouncements against Tyre (chs. 26—28) and Egypt (chs. 29—32) are long, magnificent poems, full of color and fire, well illustrating Ezekiel's varied style. The dates attached to some of the oracles locate this section between 587/586 B.C. (seven months before the fall of Jerusalem, 29:1) and 571/570 B.C. (16 years after its fall, 29:17).

A. Oracle Against Ammon. 25:1-7.

For other denunciations, see 21:28-32; Amos 1:13-15; Zeph 2:8-11; Jer 49:1-6.

Ammon at one time possessed the land between the Arnon and the Jabbok rivers but had been pushed eastward by the Amorites (Jud 11:13; Num 21:21). An implacable foe of Israel through the years (Jud 10—11; I Sam 11; II Sam 10), Ammon is denounced in this oracle for its unholy glee and malice at the destruction of the Temple and the miseries of Israel and Judah (Ezk 25:3,6). Post-Exilic references to Ammon are Neh 4:3; I Macc 5:6.

4. The men of the East. The Aramaean and Arabic tribes east of Ammon (cf. Jud 6:3,33; Isa 11:14; Jer 49:28) were to despoil Ammon. 5. Rabbah. Its chief city (cf. 21:20), the site of Philadelphia, established by Ptolemy II Philadelphus (285—246), was to become pasture (cf. Isa 17:2; 32:14; Zeph 2:14). Ye shall know that I am the Lord. The purpose of these judgments is to make men recognize that the Lord rules men and shapes history (cf. Dan 4:17). The expression in varying forms, starting at Ezk 6:7, occurs about sixty-five times in Ezekiel, and repeatedly in the foreign oracles.

B. Oracle Against Moab. 25:8-11.

Other maledictions are Isa 15—16; 25:10-12; Jer 48; Amos 2:1-3; Zeph 2:8-11.

Moab's territory lay between the river Arnon and the brook Zered, but Moab often laid claim to the land extending to the head of the Dead Sea. It possessed a higher degree of culture than Ammon. (On cities of Moab, cf. Nelson Glueck in AASOR, 18-19 (1937-'39), 72-75; The Other Side of the Jordan (New Haven: ASOR, 1940), pp. 134-139. Cf. Gen 19:30-38; Num 22—24; Ruth; Neh 13:1). 8. Moab saw nothing good or unique in Israel's existence: The house of Judah is like . . . all the nations (ASV). 9. Beth-jeshimoth. Tell el-'Azeimah, two and one-half miles northeast of the Dead Sea (Josh 12:3; 13:20). Baal-meon. Mâʿîn, nine miles east of the Dead Sea and four miles south of Medeba (Josh 13:17). Kiriathaim. Identified as el Qereiyat, ten miles below Baal-meon and seven miles northwest of Dibon (Josh 13:9; Jer 48:1, 23). The second and third of these cities are mentioned in the "Mesha Inscription," or "Moabite Stone" (ANET, pp. 320,321).

C. Oracle Against Edom. 25:12-14.

For other maledictions, see 35:1-15; 36:5; Isa 34; 63:1-6; Joel 3:19; Amos 1:11,12; Ob; Mal 1:2-5.

Edom displaced the Hurrians in Seir to occupy the rugged country extending from the southern end of the Dead Sea on both sides of the Arabah to the Gulf of Akaba (Gen 14:6; 32:3; 36:20,21,30; Deut 2:1,12; Jud 11:17,18; I Kgs 9:26). Its capital was Sela, probably later the site of Petra. At the fall of Jerusalem, the Edomites pressed into southern Judah (I Macc 4:29; 5:65). From the late fourth century B.C. through the first century A.D., the Nabataean Arabs established a high degree of culture in Edomite territory. The Edomites were subdued by John Hyrcanus in 125 B.C. and incorporated into Israel. Herod the Great was an Idumaean, the Greek and Roman name for Edomite. (See Jos Ant. XII. 8. 6; XIV. 1. 3; 7. 3; Wars IV. 9. 7. I Macc 5:3. 5.)

12. Because that Edom hath dealt against the house of Judah by taking vengeance, all her territory, from Teman (v. 13), probably Tawîlân near Sela in the north, to Dedan, in the south (cf. Jer 49:7,8; not the Dedan of Arabia, 27:20; 38:13), would be desolated.

D. Oracle Against Philistia. 25:15-17.

For other maledictions, see Isa 14:29-31; Jer 47; Amos 1:6-8; Zeph 2:4-7; Zech 9:5-7.

The Philistines, from whom the name Palestine is derived (Herodotus Histories vii. 89), came from Caphtor, or Crete, in the Aegean basin (Jer 47:4; Amos 9:7), and as part of the "sea-peoples" established themselves on the southern coast of Canaan, displacing the Avvim (Deut 2:23). Ever a threat to the Hebrews (Ex 3:17,18; Jud 14–16; I Sam 4–6), their monopoly on iron implements (I Sam 18:19-23) made them particularly formidable. Their pentapolis was under the control of five lords or serens (cf. Gr. tyrannos; Josh 13:3; I Sam 6:4). They adopted the worship of Dagan, the Semitic grain deity (I Sam 5), and various Canaanite gods. The great "uncircumcised" of antiquity were mighty carousers, as their ubiquitous wine craters and beer jugs suggest (Albright, Arch. of Pal., p. 115). Saul fought against them (I Sam 13–14; 17–18; 31), and David defeated them (II Sam 8:1,12; 5:17-25; 21:15-22). Relations continued hostile between Judah and the Philistines (II Chr 21:16; 28:18; II Kgs 18:8; II Chr 26:6,7), until the Maccabees finally liquidated them (I Macc 5:68; 10:83-89; 11:60,61).

16. The Cherethites (Cretans) were foreign mercenaries, David's bodyguard (II Sam 8:18; 15:18; 20:7). They are here synonymous with the Philistines, and not to be equated with Keret of the Ugaritic tablets (cf. Albright, BASOR, 71 (Oct., 1938), 35-40).

The Philistines were to experience God's wrathful chastisements (RSV; furious rebukes, AV; v. 17), because they took vengeance with malice of heart, to destroy it for the old hatred (v. 15).

E. Oracles Against Tyre. 26:1–28:19.

For other maledictions, see Isa 23; Joel 3:4-8; Amos 1:9,10; Zech 9:3,4.

The antiquity of Tyre is attested to by Herodotus (ii. 44) and the Amarna Letters (cf. Pritchard, ANET, 484). Forced out of Palestine and Syria in the thirteenth and twelfth centuries, the Phoenicians turned their energies seawards and became the greatest mariners and traders of all time, in relation to the known world (cf. Albright, "The Role of the Canaanites in the History of Civilization," in The Bible and the Ancient Near East, ed. by G. E. Wright, pp. 328-362, esp. pp. 328,335,340ff.). Ahiram I, king of Tyre (969–936), made pacts with David and Solomon (II Sam 5:11; I Kgs 5:1-18; 9:10-14,26,27). Ahab's queen, Jezebel, the daughter of Ethbaal (Ittobaal I, 887–856), king of the Sidonians, introduced the worship of the Tyrian Baal Melkart, lord of the underworld, of storm and fertility, into Israel (I Kgs 16:31; 18).

Tyre was harassed by Assyrian monarchs, and it yielded to Ashurbanipal (ANET, p. 295). It sought an alliance with Zedekiah against Nebuchadnezzar (Jer 27:3; 28:1). In 588 Pharaoh-hophra attacked Tyre and Sidon (Herodotus ii. 161; Diodorus Siculus, I. 68). Nebuchadnezzar laid siege to Tyre for thirteen years (585–573), but did not take it (Ezk 29:18; Jos Antiq. X. 11. 1; Against Apion I. 20,21). After a seven-month siege, Alexander the Great finally destroyed the island city in 332, by building a mole out to it from the mainland (Diod. Sic. XVII. 40-46). It was rebuilt in 314. Tyre had contacts with the ministry of Jesus (Mt 15:21-28; Mk 3:8; cf. Mt 11:21, 22), and was the home of believers (Acts 21:3-6). Origen was buried there in A.D. 254, and Eusebius preached there in 323. The Moslems conquered it in 638, and the Crusaders took it in 1124. The city was completely destroyed by the Saracens in 1291. Today it is a little fishing village, eṣ-Ṣur.

Ezekiel gives more space to Tyre, "The Venice of Antiquity," than does any other OT writer. In chapters 26–28, the prophet predicts the overthrow of this major sea power at the hands of Nebuchadnezzar (ch. 26); laments the shipwreck of the gallant ship Tyre in a magnificent dirge (ch. 27); and in a taunt song depicts the pride and fall of the prince of Tyre (28:1-19).

1) Overthrow and Destruction of Tyre. 26:1-21.

The chapter contains four oracles, each introduced by "thus saith the Lord" (vv. 3,7,15,19). The traditional Hebrew marginal note at the beginning of the chapter reads "half of the book."

a) The Guilt of Tyre. 26:1-6.

1. In the eleventh year, in the first day of the month; i.e., 586 (or 587) B.C. Verse 2 implies that the oracle came after the destruction of Jerusalem in 586, news of which Ezekiel did not hear until the twelfth year and the tenth month (33:21). Some Hebrew manuscripts and the LXX and Syriac read eleventh year in 33:21, which would allow for this prophecy in the eleventh year and the eleventh or twelfth month. 2. The gates of the people. Jerusalem lay on the toll roads. Is broken. She could no longer receive from the caravans the imposts that Tyre coveted.

4. Tyre (=ṣôr; and ṣûr = "rock"), located on a rocky island of 142 acres, had two harbors connected by a canal, the Sidonian harbor on the northeast and the Egyptian on the south. The island city was 1200 yards offshore from the walled city on the mainland. 6. Her daughters on the mainland (RSV; cf. v. 8). The line of Phoenician settlements opposite the island city.

b) Her Impending Destruction by Nebuchadrezzar. 26:7-14.

7. Nebuchadrezzar is the form of the name always used by Ezekiel, for Nabu-kudurri-usur, "Nebo, protect my boundary." King of Babylon, a king of kings. An Assyrian title (cf. Dan 2:37; Ezr 7:12). From the north. See also Jer 1:14; 4:6; 6:1, etc. 8,9. In his attack, Nebuchadrezzar employed: a fort or moveable tower; mound (AV, mount); roof of shields (AV, lift up the buckler), like the Roman testudo; engines of war, or battering rams; and axes, literally, swords, in the sense of tools. 11. Mighty pillars (RSV; strong garrisons, AV; singular, massēbâ). Sacred pillars or monuments (cf. Herodotus ii. 44).

c) Effects of Her Fall upon the Princes of the Sea. 26:15-18.

15. Isles. The shores and islands with which Tyre traded. Many of her colonies and mercenaries feared a threat to their own prosperity in the fall of Tyre. 16. The princes of the sea. Merchant princes or city-kings. Lay away their robes, and . . . broidered garments. Cf. Jon 3:6. Note the elaborate garments of Assyrian kings in sculptures and monuments. 17,18. The lamentation of the princes. Cf. 27:25b-36.

d) Tyre's Descent into the Underworld. 26:19-21.

19. The deep (t^ehôm). The nether sea, virtually a proper name here, as in 31:15; Amos 7:4. Tyre was conquered by the great waters, rather than conquering them.

20. Tyre was to descend into the pit, with the people dead from of old (Ps 143:3; Lam 3:6), to the low parts of the earth. Cf. 31:15 for discussion of pit, low parts, Sheol. The Scriptures often speak of the place of the dead as in the lower parts of the earth (cf. Eph 4:9), but this does not prove that the writers believed this to be the actual place of the departed spirits. Since men think in concrete terms, it is natural, in view of the burial of the body, to localize this place under the earth. Men on opposite sides of the globe speak of God as "above" them, though they know he is omnipresent (cf. Mk 6:41; 7:34; Lk 9:16; Jn 17:1). So that you will not be inhabited nor have a place (RSV; LXX, and you will not stand, i.e., exist) in the land of the living. This rendering of the vowel points seems to give the sense required rather than the unusual antithesis of the MT, and I will give glory.

Nebuchadrezzar either did not conquer Tyre, or he failed to obtain any considerable booty from it (29:18); for its treasures were probably shipped away, as Jerome suggests. Alexander the Great destroyed the city in 332 B.C., and the final destruction of the rebuilt city was the work of the Saracens in 1291 A.D. This may be an example of the conditional nature of some prophecies, a case in which repentance revoked the sentence of doom (cf. the Book of Jonah; Jer 26:17-19, which is an elucidation of Mic 3:12; Isa 38; Jer 11:7-11, a clear exposition of the principle). It is possible that Tyre was spared because of an unrecorded repentance.

2) Lament over the Downfall of Tyre. 27:1-36.

In this splendid poem, introduced within a prose passage, Tyre is represented as a gallant ship manned by sailors from Phoenician cities (vv. 1-9a), richly laden with wares from many nations (vv. 9b-25a), and shipwrecked, to the consternation and lamentation of seafaring men (25b-36).

a) The Construction and Manning of the Ship. 27:1-9a.

2. Lamentation. Cf. 19:1. 3. Entry (lit., entrances) of the sea. Possibly a reference to its two harbors (cf. 26:4). I am of perfect beauty. The sin of Tyre was its pride (28:2,5,17).

5,6. The ship's timbers are described. Her planks were made of fir trees from Senir, the Amorite name for Mount Hermon. Senir means sacred mountain, and is equivalent to the Sidonian Sirion. Her masts were made of cedars from Lebanon. Her oars came from oaks of Bashan, a region east and northeast of the Kinnereth, or the Sea of Galilee. Her deck (AV, benches; lit., frames; cf. Ex 26:15, 16; Num 3:36) was made of pines (the tᵉ'ashshur, or sherbîn, Arabic, refers to a species of cedar) from Chittim. Kittîyyîm designated first the people of Kition on the south coast of Cyprus, and then was applied to the islands and coasts of the Mediterranean Sea, especially to Greece (cf. Dan 11:30; I Macc 1:1; 8:5). The Dead Sea Habakkuk Scroll reads Kittîm (1:6) for MT Kasdîm, "Chaldeans." (Cf. Brownlee, BASOR, 112 (Dec., 1948), 8-18; Ginsberg, ibid, 20,21.) The deck was inlaid with ivory.

7. Her sails were of fine linen with broidered work from Egypt (shēsh; cf. 16:10). And her deck awning (ASV) or covering was of blue-purple and red-purple from Elishah, probably Cyprus, Alashiya (ANET, p. 29; Amarna Letters 33-40) or Carthage. Phoenicia, from phoinix, "purple," was famous for its dyes, obtained from the shellfish murex (cf. Pliny Natural History ix. 60; B. Maisler, BASOR, 102 (April, 1946), 7-12).

8. The mariners (ASV, rowers) of the ship were from Sidon and Arvad (far north in Phoenicia; classical Aradus; Ruwād of today). Instead of, thy wise men, O Tyrus, read wise men of Zemer (Tell Kezel, south of Aradus; cf. Gen 10:18). These served as pilots. Literally, rope-pullers. 9. The magistrates (AV, ancients) of Gebal (Gr. Byblos; Jebeil of today, 21 mi. north of Beirut) acted as ship's carpenters.

b) The Far-flung Trade of Tyre. 27:9b-25a.

A prose section follows. 9b-11. Her mercenaries. 10. They of Persia. The first mention of Persia (Pāras) in the Bible. The Weidner Tablets from Babylon, 592 B.C., mention one Persian and four Medes. An embassy of Ashurbanipal was sent to Cyrus, the king of Persia, in 639 (cf. Albright, JBL, 51 (1932), 98,99). Lud. Probably Lydia, of western Asia Minor. Phut may be Cyrene, in Northern Africa, or more likely Punt or Somaliland (cf. 38:5). 11. Arvad. Cf. verse 8. Possibly Ḫelech, in Cilicia; or Ḫethlon near Hamath. Gammadim. Perhaps the Kumidi of northern Syria, mentioned in the Amarna Letters, 116, 129, etc., or the Gomerim from Cappadocia. They hanged their shields upon the walls of Tyre (cf. Song 4:4; I Macc 4:57).

12-25. In this section are named places which acted as Tyre's merchants. This is "The Trader's Catalogue." For problems involved in identifying these places, see J. Simons, The Geographical and Topographical Texts of the Old Testament (Leiden: Brill, 1959), pp. 455ff.

12. Tyre received from Tarshish . . . silver, iron, tin, and lead. The Phoenicians had established a number of Tarshishes, i.e., "smelting plants, refineries." Tartessus in southwest Spain, built in the ninth century B.C., was famed for exports from the mines (Strabo Geography iii. 2. 8,9; Diodorus Siculus Hist. Lib. v. 35ff. Cf. Albright, in The Bible and the Ancient Near East, ed. by G. E. Wright, pp. 346,347). For your wares (RSV). Hebrew 'izzābôn, i.e., "what is left ('āzab) with the purchaser." The expression occurs also in verses 14,16,22.

13. Javan, Tubal, and Meshech. These are, respectively, the Ionians of Asia Minor, Tabal, and Musku of cuneiform sources, who settled on both sides of the Anti-Taurus range in Asia Minor, remnants of the old Hittite population (Cooke, ICC, p. 353); or they may be the Tibarenoi and Moschoi, who lived southeast of the Black Sea (Herodotus iii. 94; vii. 78). They trafficked in slaves and bronze. 14. Beth-Togarmah, . . . horses, war horses, and mules (RSV). Probably Armenia, east of southernmost Halys River, famed for horse-breeding.

15. Dedan . . . ivory and ebony. This Dedan (not to be equated with Dedan in verse 20) was likely an Arab tribe inhabiting a part of Edom (v. 16). The LXX B reads rdn, "Rhodes," for ddn, "Dedan" (cf. Isa 21:13). 16. Edom . . . emeralds, purple, embroidered work (RSV). The reading is supported by twenty-five manuscripts, the LXX, Aquila, and the Syriac. "Aram" or Syria of the MT comes in verse 18.

17. Judah, and . . . Israel . . . wheat. The MT has wheat of Minnith [an Ammonite town, Jud 11:33] and Pannag. None of the versions has a proper name here. Cornill suggests "wheat and spices" (cf. Gen 37:25). Pannag may come from Akkadian pannigu, "millet" (Zimmern).

18. Damascus . . . wine of Helbon, and white wool. Helbon, twelve miles north of Damascus, was famed for its wine (Strabo Geog. xv. 22). 19. Dan also. The LXX omits Hebrew wedan, "and Dan," and reads Yawan ("Javan") as yayin, "wine." Along with thirteen manuscripts, the LXX, and the Syriac, it reads mē'ūzāl, from Uzal, for MT me'ûzzāl, "going to and fro." Uzal. Sana', caital of Yemen in southeast Arabia. Cassia. An aromatic wood from southern India, an ingredient of anointing oil (Ex 30:24). Calamus. A sweet cane, used in sacrifice and in anointing oil (Ex 30:23; Song 4:14; Isa 43:24; Jer 6:20).

20. Dedan . . . saddlecloths for riding (RSV). This is el-'Ulâ, near Têma, southeast of the Gulf of Akaba (cf. Isa 21:13, 14; Jer 25:23). 21. Arabia . . . Kedar. The nomad Bedouins of northern Arabia and a nomad race in the Syro-Arabian desert (cf. Gen 25:13; Jer 2:10; 49:28). 22. Sheba and Raamah . . . spices. The former country is located in southwest Arabia, almost 1,200 miles from Jerusalem. It was famous for gold, frankincense, and precious stones (cf. I Kgs 10:1-13; Job 6:19). Raamah probably was on the Persian Gulf (Gen 10:7).

23. Haran, ancient city in northwestern Mesopotamia, sixty miles east of Carchemish (Gen 11:31,32; 12:45). Canneh. An unidentified place in Mesopotamia. Eden. Situated on the middle course of the Euphrates, south of Haran (cf. Amos 1:5; Isa 37:12). The merchants of Sheba of the MT is probably a dittography from verse 22. Asshur is the city south of Nineveh on the west side of the Tigris, between the Upper and Lower Zab rivers. Chilmad. Unknown, though apparently near Asshur. 24. Blue clothes. Hebrew g'lômîm, "mantles," is hapax legomenon from Aramaic through Akkadian. Chests of rich apparel. Carpets of colored stuff. Read (ginzê b'rômîm) explained by Aramaic and Akkadian parallels. And made secure. Cf. the Arabic root, meaning, "draw together, make firm." The MT made of cedar is unlikely. In these they traded with you. In place of MT in thy market.

c) Loss of the Ship, with Crew and Cargo. 25b-36.

25b-31. Consternation of all seafaring men. 26. The east wind. As an agent of destruction (cf. 17:10; 19:12; Ps 48:7; Jer 18:14; Acts 27:14). 27. The cargo comprises riches, wares (AV, fairs), and merchandise. The crew consists of mariners, pilots, calkers (carpenters), handlers of the wares, and men of war. 28. The suburbs—i.e., the countryside, the common land around a town (Lev 25:34; Num 25:2)—hear the cries of the drowning sailors. 30,31. Eight signs of grief are enumerated. See also, 7:18; 26:16; Job 2:12; Jer 6:26.

32-36. Lamentation over the wrecked ship. 32. They take up a lamentation (qînâ), saying: Who was ever destroyed like Tyre? (RSV). So the LXX, Syriac, Targum, and Vulgate. 34. Now you are wrecked (RSV). Read with the manuscripts and the versions. 35. Astonished. Those who have traded with Tyre will be appalled (cf. vv. 3,6,7; 26:15,18).

Revelation 18:11-20 is patterned after 26:16,17; 27:12ff.

3) The Fall of the Prince of Tyre. 28:1-19.

From the city, the prophet passes to its ruler, as a representative of the genius of the community, the embodiment of the spirit of the proud commercial city. King and people constitute a corporate solidarity, the pride and self-deification of which are doomed. Other instances of "the insanity of prosperity" are Sennacherib (II Kgs 17:33-35); Pharaoh (Ezk 29:3); Nebuchadnezzar (Dan 3:15; 4:30; note particularly the autotheism of Babylon, Isa 47:7-10); Herod (Acts 12:21-23); "the man of sin" (II Thess 2:3,4); and conquerors who rely on their weapons (Hab 1:11,16); and all who today worship the "goddess of getting ahead."

The prophet depicts the punishment of the proud prince (Ezk 28:1-10); and utters an ironical dirge over his fall (28:11-19).

a) Punishment of the Prince of Tyre for His Self-Exaltation. 28:1-10.

2. The prince of Tyre is called a nāgîd, "leader," a term used only of Israelite rulers except here and in Dan 9:25,26. Its appearance here suggests that he held his office only at God's appointment. He is designated "king," melek in verse 12, illustrating the concept of the Fertile Crescent that the ruler was the representative of the gods, and more than human. Ittobaal II was king of Tyre at this time (Jos Against Apion I. 21), but it is the autotheism of Tyre rather than any specific ruler that is denounced. The seat of the gods (RSV; not God, AV) may refer (1) to an empty throne in the Tyrian temple reserved for the king, (2) to the impregnable situation of Tyre, or (3) to the island as sacred to its own gods.

3. Wiser than Daniel. This may be the Dan'el of the Ras Shamra tablets (cf. on 14:14,20); or the Biblical Daniel (Dan 1:17-20; 2:48; 4:8,9). 4,5. This wisdom was devoted to the amassing of wealth.

7. Strangers . . . the terrible of the nations; i.e., the Chaldeans. See also 7:21,24; 30:11; 31:12; 32:12; Hab 1:5-10. 8. The pit (shaḥat). Equivalent to Sheol, the realm of the dead beneath the earth (cf. 31:15). From the root shûaḥ, "sink down"; so, "hollow place," "cavern." 10. Deaths of the uncircumcised. For the Phoenicians, who practiced circumcision (Herodotus II. 104), to die like the despised uncircumcised was a great shame (cf. Ezk 31:18; 32:19,21, 24ff.).

b) Lamentation over the Fall of the King of Tyre. 28:11-19.

Ezekiel applies to the king of Tyre a tale current among the Phoenicians. It has only cursory resemblances to the Garden of Eden account in Genesis 2; 3. In the garden of God in Eden there lived with the cherub who kept it an ideal person (the Urmensch, or first man), the perfection of wisdom and beauty. Though only a man, in his pride he claimed to be a god. For his sin he was driven out of the garden by the cherub. According to God's word to Ezekiel, the king of Tyre, for a similar offense was to be brought to ruin. Some early Church Fathers interpreted this section as having ultimate reference to the fall of Satan or the Antichrist (cf. Isa 14:4-20). This view is also held by some evangelical groups today.

12. Lamentation. Ezekiel's lamentation over the king of Tyre, though in qînâ meter, is irony rather than a dirge. You were the signet of perfection (RSV). The MT reads, You are (or were) one sealing up, or a sealer-of (ḥôtēm) proportion, measure, symmetry, i.e., "perfection" (toknît). This usage occurs nowhere else in the OT, and the versions vary considerably. One manuscript, the LXX, Syriac, and Vulgate read, You are (or were) the signet-ring [seal] (ḥôtam) of proportion, etc., as in the MT. The Syriac and Vulgate read, the seal-ring of the likeness (tabnît) of God. Another proposed reading is: You were wise to perfection ('atâ ḥākām l^etaklît).

13. Thou hast been in Eden the garden of God. Note "mountain of God" in verses 14,16. Eden is derived from the Akkadian edinu, "plain," a place capable of irrigation and fertility. It is also a play on the word 'ēden, "luxury, dainty, delight" (Gen 49:20; Jer 51:39; Ps 8. See also Ezk 31:9,16). Every precious stone was thy covering; i.e., robe. Nine stones of the twelve in the high priest's breastplate are named. See Ex 28:17-30, which is paralleled by Ex 39:10-13. See also Rev 21:19,20. The third row, omitted here, is supplied in the LXX. Wrought in gold were your settings and your engravings (RSV). The MT reads, and (of) gold (was) the workmanship (m^elā'kâ) of your tambourines (the context requires "settings") and of your sockets (piercings, neqeb; probably, "engravings." Cf. Akk. and Ug.).

14. With an anointed guardian cherub I placed you (RSV). The MT has You ('at) are a cherub. Read with the LXX and the Syriac, With ('et) a cherub. The MT reads, anointed (or "of expansion"; hapax legomenon) that covers (overshadows) and I gave (placed) you. Holy mountain of God. Located in the recesses of the north (Isa 14:13). To the Phoenicians this would likely have been Mount Ṣāphôn or Casius, between Antioch and Laodicea. Cf. the Tyrian god, Baal Ṣāphôn, "lord of the North." Stones of fire. Fiery flashing jewels (cf. Enoch 18:6-9; 24:1; 25:3); or, phenomena attending the divine presence (cf. Ezk 1:13; 10:16). Cf. the garden of jewelled trees in the Gilgamesh Epic (IX. v. vi. ANET, p. 89). 15. Thou wast perfect (tāmîm, "sound, unimpaired, innocent") . . . till iniquity ('awlātâ, for the more usual 'āwel) was found in thee. There is no reference to the cherub here, for the Bible does not speak of a fall of the cherubim; and the heavenly beings existed before creation (Job 38:7).

16. By the multitude of thy merchandise. The first part of the verse is probably a gloss from verse 5; 26:12; 27:12, 18, anticipating verse 17. So I cast you as a profane thing (RSV). The MT reads, And I profaned you (casting you) out of the mountain of God. And the guardian cherub drove you out (RSV). This reading follows the LXX we'ibbedkā (cf. Gen 3:24), in place of MT, And I destroyed you (wā'abbedkā), O cherub that covers (cf. Ezk 28:14).

17. Thine heart. This is direct application of the story to the king, who represents the city (27:3) and its inhabitants (27:8,9). 18,19. Thou hast defiled thy sanctuaries. The prophet predicts the ruin of Tyre itself. The king desecrated the temples which made Tyre a holy island, bringing about their destruction through his own sin. He fell below the standard of the truth his religion had preserved for him.

F. Oracle Against Sidon. 28:20-26.

Other maledictions against Sidon occur at Joel 3:4-8; Zech 9:2. Sidon (present day Saida, probably connected with the deity Ṣid, from the root ṣûd, "to hunt") is located twenty-five miles north of Tyre. It is mentioned in the Amarna Letters (75,85,149, etc.) and by Homer, Iliad 7:290. The tribe of Asher did not drive out the Sidonians (Jud 1:31; 10:12). Sidon later became subject to its daughter city Tyre (Jos Antiq. IX. 14. 2). It was destroyed by Esarhaddon in 677; with Tyre it became subject to Pharaoh-hophra in 588; it submitted to Cambyses in 526 (Herodotus VII. 89; VIII. 67); it sold cedar for the rebuilding of the Jerusalem Temple (Ezr 3:7); it was destroyed by the Persians in 345; it surrendered to Alexander the Great in 333; and it passed to the Romans in 64. In several NT references it is mentioned in connection with Tyre (cf. introd. to ch. 26), and Paul touched at its port (Acts 27:3).

20-23. Set thy face against Zidon (= Sidon). The Lord's greatness is recognized by the judgments on Sidon. Sidon, and the other nations, had been a "pricking thorn and a painful brier" to Israel (v. 24).

24-26. The house of Israel. The punishment of the nations will result in restoration for the house of Israel. God's providence is clearly marked in these verses. The captivity of Israel among her neighbors (v. 24), will lead to her repentance and restoration (v. 25), to God's judgment on her ungodly enemies, and to peace and prosperity for Israel (v. 26).

G. Seven Oracles Against Egypt. 29:1–32:32.

Other maledictions against Egypt occur at Isa 19; Jer 46; Zech 14:18,19. Egypt's sin was its pride (Ezk 29:3,9b; 30:10) and its leading Israel away from the Lord (29:6-9a).

Israel's involvements with Egypt at this time are discussed in the Introduction to Ezekiel. Since Egypt was a great world power, ruling nations and aspiring to universal dominion (29:15), the prophet treats of it on a cosmic scale. The judgment of Egypt was to be "the day of the Lord" (30:3). The fall of that great nation would be felt throughout the world (32:10), while even creation would shudder (31:15). The world was to know that God is the Lord (30:19,26).

The seven oracles describe in various ways God's judgment on Egypt: (1) Pharaoh as a sea-monster or crocodile is to be cast out to be devoured, and the nation is to be restored to lowly status after forty years (29:1-16). (2) Egypt is to be given to Nebuchadrezzar as a recompense for his futile siege of Tyre (29:17-21). (3) Egypt will be overthrown, together with its allies, wealth, princes, and cities (30:1-19). (4) The arms of Egypt will be broken by the arms of the king of Babylon (30:20-26). (5) In an allegory, Pharaoh, the mighty cedar, is cut down and enters the underworld in disgrace (31:1-18). (6) A lament over Pharaoh, the crocodile of Egypt, destroyed by the king of Babylon (32:1-16). (7) A dirge sung at the descent of Egypt into the underworld (32:17-32).

1) The Desolation and Restoration of Egypt. 29:1-16.

a) The Fate of the Great Sea Monster. 29:1-5.

1. Tenth year, tenth month, twelfth day. January 586 (or 587) B.C., seven months before the fall of Jerusalem. 2. Pharaoh king of Egypt. Apries or Hophra, of the Twenty-sixth Dynasty (588–569). 3. The great dragon (tannîm, or tannîn in many MSS). Cf. 32:2; Isa 27:1; 51:9. Gunkel and others equate this dragon with the mythological Tiamat of the Babylonians. It is, also, often associated with Leviathan (Isa 27:1; Job 41:1; Ps 74:14) and with "Rahab" (Isa 51:9; Job 26:12,13. Cf. Barton, Archaeology and the Bible, 279-302; ANET, 61-68, 137). Here perhaps the dragon is the crocodile, for there are no mythological associations in the present context (cf. A. Heidel, The Babylonian Genesis). River, the Nile, ye'ôr, is an Egyptian loan-word. The rivers, ye'ôrîm, are the arms of the Nile in the Delta (cf. vv. 4,5,10). "Egypt is the gift of the Nile," says Herodotus, but Pharaoh boasts, I have made it (cf. v. 9. So the Syriac; cf. the LXX).

4. Fish of thy rivers. The population or mercenaries of Egypt. 5. I have given thee for meat to the beasts of the field. Improper burial was considered a fearful fate in the ancient world, especially to the Egyptians in view of their meticulous care of the dead (cf. 32:4,5; Jer 22:18,19).

b) A Sword To Come upon Egypt. 29:6-9a.

6. All the inhabitants of Egypt shall know. Cf. Ex 2:3,5; Isa 19:6; II Kgs 18:21. 7. To shake (RSV). So the Syriac, a rendering derived by transposing two letters of the MT, to cause to stand 8. A sword. That is, the Chaldeans. See also verses 10; 32:11,12; Jer 46:13ff.

c) Desolation and Restoration. 29:9b-16.

10. Migdol (tower). Tell el-Heir, twelve miles southwest of Pelusium, the northeast border of Egypt (cf. 30:6; Ex 14:2; Jer 44:1). Syene. Egyptian Sun (prob. meaning "elephant"), at the first cataract of the Nile, near Assuan, the southern boundary of Egypt (cf. 30:6), near the border of Ethiopia, or Kûsh (Jos Wars IV. 10. 5). 11. No foot of man . . . of beast. Cf. 32:13,15; 26:20. Forty years. The period of Chaldean supremacy, anticipating verse 13. 12. Egypt desolate in the midst of the Arabian and Libyan deserts on either side (cf. 30:7). The Egyptians were to be scattered (cf. 30:23, 26).

13-16. At the end of forty years Egypt was to be restored but only to the status of a lowly (AV, base) kingdom. Cf. Jer 46:26. Pathros (southland). Upper Egypt. See also 30:14; Isa 11:11; Jer 44:15.

2) Egypt To Be Given to Nebuchadrezzar as Recompense. 29:17-21.

17. Twenty-seventh year, first month, first day. March-April 570 (571) B.C. The latest prophecy of Ezekiel. Nebuchadrezzar invaded Egypt in the thirty-seventh year of his reign, 568/567 B.C., but Egypt did not become a part of his empire. 18. In the arduous siege laid to Tyre by Nebuchadrezzar's army (585–573), every head was made bald by carrying loads, and every shoulder was rubbed bare (RSV) by the chafing of the weights.

19,20. The booty of Egypt was to become wages for Nebuchadrezzar's army. Cf. 30:10,24,25; Jer 43:10,11.

21. In that day. Cf. verses 19,20; 30:9; 24:26,27. The horn. Symbolizing Israel's restoration to power (cf. I Sam 2:1,10; Ps 92:10). Psalm 132:17 indicates that the Davidic dynasty is to be restored. Opening of the mouth. The verification of the prophet's words to his fellow exiles (16:63), that the divine judgments would be followed by new hope.

3) All Phases of Egypt's Life To Be Punished on the Day of the Lord. 30:1-19.

This section, of an eschatological character, is the only one not dated, but is perhaps chronologically related to 29:1-16. It consists of four oracles, each beginning with, "Thus saith the Lord" (see vv. 2,6,10,13).

a) The Day of the Lord Announced with Reference to Egypt. 30:1-5.

3. The day of the Lord. The dies irae, "day of wrath." See also 7:7; Amos 5:18-20; Zeph 1:7,14; Isa 13:6; Joel 1:15; 2:1,2. This is the day of judgment on sin and the final doom of the heathen world, of which Egypt is representative. 4. Foundations. The political and social institutions in which Egypt's strength lay (cf. vv. 6,8,13,15,17). 5. The allies of Egypt were to be overthrown. Arabia (RSV). This translation follows Symmachus, Aquila, and the Syriac in place of the AV, the mingled people. Libya. In northern Africa, west of Egypt (cf. Nah 3:9). Read Lûb, with the LXX, and the Syriac for unknown Chûb of the MT. Men . . . in league. Literally, and the sons of the land of the covenant with them. A reference to Egypt's allies rather than to Jewish mercenaries in the army of Psamtik II (594–588; see Letter of Aristeas, ch. 13).

b) Egypt and Its Allies To Be Destroyed. 30:6-9.

6. Migdol to Syene (RSV). Preferable to AV, from the tower of Syene. Cf. 29:10. 7. Cf. 29:12. 8. Fire. Figurative of war (cf. vv. 14,16). 9. Cf. Isa 18:2. The Lord's acts against Egypt were meant to warn the unsuspecting (AV, careless) Ethiopians and the world.

c) The Wealth of Egypt To Be Seized by Nebuchadrezzar. 30:10-12.

10. The multitude of Egypt (cf. 4; 29:19) would be carried off by Nebuchadrezzar, first referred to here by name. The reference in 29:17-19 is from a later date. 11. The terrible. Cf. 28:7; 31:12; 32:12; 7:24. 12. I will make the rivers dry. Drying up of the Nile arms (cf. 29:3) would be a calamity to Egypt. Cf. Isa 19:5ff. The hand of the wicked . . . strangers. Cf. Hab 1:6ff.,12,13.

d) Princes and Towns of Egypt To Be Destroyed. 30:13-19.

Eight principal cities, three in Lower and five in Upper Egypt, are singled out for destruction.

13. Idols and . . . images. The words gillûlîm, "logs, blocks," and 'elîlîm, "not-gods," are used only here in Ezekiel but often in Isaiah. One suggestion is to read g^{e}dôlîm, "nobles" and 'êlîm, "chiefs" (LXX).

Memphis (Gr.). Or Noph (Heb.), Mennofri (Egyptian), near mit Rahineh, ten miles south of Cairo. The home of the fire-god, Ptah, and the Apis bull. 14. Pathros. Cf. 29:14. Zoan. Egyptian S'nt, or Greek Tanis. The Hyksos capital Avaris, present day Sân el-Hagar, in the east Delta of the Nile, west of Pelusium. Thebes. Or No, No-Amon, Egyptian Nēt, capital of Upper Egypt, four hundred miles south of Memphis, home of the sun-god, Amon. 15. Pelusium (RSV). So the Vulgate. MT Sin (only here in Ezk). Identified as Tell Foramen. It was a frontier fortress on the northeast boundary, in the vicinity of Pelusium, twenty-three miles southeast of Port Said. 16. Pelusium (Sin) to Thebes (No) is all Egypt from north to south.

17. On, or Aven. Egyptian 'nw, Greek Heliopolis. The present Tell Hasn, or 'Ain Shems, "sun fountain," located about seven miles northeast of Cairo. It was the seat of the sun-god Ra. It was also the home of Joseph's father-in-law (Gen 41:45,50). Pi-beseth. Egyptian Pi Bastis, Greek Bubastis. Present-day Tel Basta, thirty miles north-northeast of Cairo. It was the house of the goddess Bast, to whom the cat was sacred. 18. Tehaphnehes. Elsewhere Tahpanhes. Greek Daphnae. Modern Tell Defenneh, on the Pelusiac bank of the Nile. It was an eastern frontier fortress, about thirty miles southwest of Pelusium.

19. Will I execute judgments. The purpose of the judgment was to be the revelation of the Lord and the recognition of his deity.

4) The Arms of Pharaoh To Be Broken. 30:20-26.

20. Eleventh year, first month, seventh day. March-April 586 (or 587), three months after 29:1, and four months before the fall of Jerusalem. In verses 21-23 the Lord is the destroyer of Pharaoh; in verses 24-26, the king of Babylon is His agent. 21. I have broken the arm of Pharaoh. Probably a reference to a recent defeat of Pharaoh-necho (Jer 37:5-8; 34:21). 22. The breaking of both Pharaoh's arms, the strong, and . . . broken, refers to the army still in Egypt for defense and the one defeated and fleeing.

23. I will scatter the Egyptians. Cf. verse 26; 29:12. 24. Strengthen the arms of the king of Babylon. This refers to the sword of the Lord in Nebuchadrezzar's hand. Cf. 21:9. 25. They shall know that I am the Lord. See also verses 8,19, 25.

5) Allegory of the Mighty Cedar. 31:1-18.

In the present chapter, the overthrow of a major land power is predicted (in contrast to the sea power in ch. 26). Ezekiel again uses allegory, now to describe Pharaoh, representing Egypt, as a mighty cedar, reaching to the clouds, in whose shelter the beasts and birds lodged (vv. 1-9). In the allegory the proud cedar is cut down and despoiled as a warning to the other trees, i.e., nations (vv. 10-14). Nature shudders at the fall of the tree, while the trees in the nether world are comforted at its descent (vv. 15-18).

a) Grandeur of the Cedar. 31:1-9.

1. Eleventh year . . . third month . . . first day. May-June, 586 (or 587), about two months before the fall of Jerusalem.

3. I will liken you to a cedar in Lebanon (RSV). The MT reads, Behold, Asshur (i.e., Assyria) was a cedar. The chapter has nothing to do with Assyria, nor is there any call to compare Egypt with Assyria. Supplying a missing letter to 'ashshûr, making it t^{e}'ashshûr, gives the reading, "Behold a sherbin, a cedar in Lebanon." Cf. 27:5. For the figure, see 17:3; Dan 4:10ff. Its top among the clouds (RSV). Read 'abôt, with the LXX, in place of MT 'abôtîm, "interwoven foliage." This reading applies, also, to verses 10,14.

4. The waters. Of the Nile. The deep (t^{e}hôm). The subterranean source of all springs and rivers (cf. 26:19; 29:3; Hab 3:10). 6. The fowls and beasts, i.e., the nations, dwelt under his shadow, the protection of Egypt. 8,9. The lofty trees of Eden, the garden of God, envied it. Cf. 28:13; Ps 104:16; 31:16.

b) Fall of the Tree and Its Significance. 31:10-14.

10. Thou hast lifted up thyself. The pride of Egypt (cf. 29:3,9) was to fall before the Chaldean might (vv. 11,12). 11. The mighty one (lit., a ram) of the heathen. Cf. 17:13. 12. Strangers, the terrible. Cf. 28:7; 30:11; 32:11,12. 13. The fallen tree, like the carcass of 29:5, would become prey to beasts and birds.

14. The downfall of the great cedar is to be a warning against pride. The last part of the verse, beginning at, For they are all delivered unto death, belongs to the subject matter of the next stanza.

c) Consternation at the Fall of the Cedar, and Its Descent to the Underworld. 31:15-18.

There are a number of references to the underworld in this paragraph (cf. note at 26:20). The nether world ('ereṣ taḥtît) is located deep down in the earth (26:20; 31:14,16,18; 32:18,24). The pit (bôr). A name given to the underworld because the grave was the mouth of it. It designates the entrance to Sheol, and is often a parallel word for it (26:20; 31:14,16; 32:18,23,24,25,29,30). Hell or Sheol ("place of inquiry" for necromancy; place that insatiably "asks," Prov 20:15,16; "hollow place," "underworld"). The vast burying place in the earth, full of graves (31:15,16,17; 32:21,27. Cf. shaḥat, 28:9).

15. I caused a mourning. The world of nature would mourn for Egypt. Lebanon, "White," would be clothed in black. 16. Trees of Eden . . . comforted in the nether world (RSV). Cf. Isa 14:9-11; Enoch 25:4-6. 17. They also went down into hell. More accurately, They also shall go down (prophetic perfect) to Sheol (RSV). The allies of Pharaoh were to perish with him (cf. v. 18). Pharaoh would be brought down with them, to lie among the uncircumcised (RSV). Cf. 28:10; 32:19-21. The Egyptians also practiced circumcision. Cf. ANET, p. 326.

6) Lamentations over Pharaoh and Egypt. 32:1-16.

a) The Monster of Egypt Caught, Slain, and Devoured. 32:1-10.

1. Twelfth year . . . twelfth month . . . first day. February-March, 584 (585) B.C., one year and seven months after the fall of Jerusalem. 2. Lamentation (19:1). Here, a tragic song with denunciations: "Pharaoh, young lion of the nations, you are destroyed!" You are like a sea monster (tannîm; cf. 29:3), stirring up trouble among the nations.

4,5. Then will I leave thee. The monster would be slain and his carcass flung out to be devoured. Cf. 29:3-5. 7,8. When I shall put thee out. Pharaoh is compared to a luminary whose extinction darkens the sky and stars. Cf. 30:18; Amos 5:18,20; Isa 13:9,10; 14:12. 9,10. I will . . . vex the hearts of many people. Egypt's fall would make a profound impression on the nations. Cf. chapters 30; 31.

b) Devastation of Egypt by the King of Babylon. 32:11-16.

11,12. The sword of the king of Babylon and his warriors would come upon Egypt (cf. 21:19; 29:8; 30:11). 13,14. I will destroy. A dramatic picture of uninhabited Egypt. Cf. verse 2; 29:11. 14. Then will I cause to sink down their waters. The mud would settle and the water would become clear, and the rivers would run like oil, no more trampled by man or cattle. This is the only comparison of a smoothly flowing stream to oil. 15. The purpose of the judgment.

16. The lamentation chanted by the daughters of the nations. Women were hired as mourners (cf. v. 18; 19:14; Jer 9:16,17).

7) Egypt's Descent to the Nether World. 32:17-32.

17. In the twelfth year, in the fifteenth day of the month (so MT). On the basis of 32:1, it may be assumed that this oracle was dated in the twelfth month, two weeks later.

This oracle contains the most graphic portrayal of the Pit or Sheol in the OT. It is the international abode of the dead, full of graves (vv. 22,23), peopled with nations once vital (vv. 18,29,30); nations are in places of honor or dishonor (vv. 23-25,30); kings on their thrones are surrounded by their subjects (cf. Isa 14:9, 10,18,19); warriors are buried with their weapons under their heads (v. 27); the nations are weak (vv. 20,21; Isa 14:10; cf. also Job 3:17-19). 19. Egypt would be consigned among the uncircumcised. Cf. 31:18.

22-30. Six welcoming nations to receive Egypt in Sheol. The repetition, 24-27, 32, gives a mournful quality to the oracle. Its general theme is, "They that live by the sword shall die by the sword."

22,23. Asshur (i.e., Assyria) would be consigned to the bottom of Sheol. 24,25. Elam (highlands), mentioned only here in Ezekiel, was located east of the Tigris River and north of the Persian Gulf. Its capital city was Shushan (Susa; Neh 1:1; Dan 8:2). The Elamites were a non-Semitic people.

26-28. Meshech and Tubal. Cf. 27:13. 27. The LXX and the Syriac omit not, to read, they lie with the mighty men, fallen from of old, having their weapons buried with them. The manner of their death and burial will be in keeping with their life of bloodshed and violence. 29. Edom. Cf. 25:12-14. The Edomites were circumcised, but here they are to lie with those who were not.

30. The princes (or chiefs, nāshîk, from nāshak, "to install"; cf. Josh 13:21; Mic 5:4; Ps 83:11; Dan 11:8) of the north (Ṣapôn); i.e., of the Syrian states bordering Mount Ṣāphôn (cf. 28:14). The Sidonians, or Phoenicians in general. Cf. Deut 3:9; I Kgs 16:31. The people of the Syrian states and the Sidonians were circumcised, and so the text should read as in verse 29, "they lie with the uncircumcised."

31,32. Pharaoh shall see them. Pharaoh was to have the miserable comfort of knowing that he was not alone in his fate. Cf. 14:22; 31:16.

III. Prophecies of Israel's Restoration. 33:1–39:29.

The fall of Jerusalem marks a turning point in the ministry of Ezekiel. The hitherto minatory oracles against Judah (chs. 1–24) and her pagan foes (chs. 25–32) now give way to the hortatory messages of a pastor to his shattered people (chs. 33–39). After the collapse of the state (33:21) and the complete prostration of people's minds under their calamities (33:10), the prophet declared that the Lord had not made a full end to Israel (contrast ch. 35). A new era was ahead for her. In moving words, Ezekiel here speaks of the purification, restoration, and peace of Israel (chs. 34; 36:16ff.; 37).

First the prophet is recommissioned as a watchman to prepare his people for the new age (ch. 33). A new government under God's servant David will supplant the old dynasty, whose wicked shepherds (rulers) scattered the sheep (ch. 34). Israel's territorial integrity will be assured by the desolation of Mount Seir and other enemies (ch. 35), while Israel will experience both outward restoration (36:1-15) and inward restoration (36:16-38). The reintegration of the people into one nation under one king, David, is symbolized by the resurrection of the dry bones and the joining of two sticks (ch. 37). The peace of restored Israel will be perpetual, for the Lord will protect her miraculously from the threatened invasion of Gog in the latter days (chs. 38; 39).

A. Function of the Prophet in Preparing for the New Age. 33:1-33.

In this transitional chapter, Ezekiel indicates that the prophet is but the medium through whom the principles of the new kingdom and the mode of entering it are announced. Just as the watchman is to warn the inhabitants of a city concerning danger, so the prophet is to sound out God's warning against sin (vv. 1-9). In response to the people's despair at their chastisements, Ezekiel utters reminders of God's good will and perfect justice (vv. 10-20). The presumptuous survivors of the fall of Jerusalem in Judah will have no future (vv. 21-29), but rather, God's purposes will be worked out through those in exile (vv. 30-33).

1) The Prophet Appointed as a Watchman for His People. 33:1-9.

a) The Parable. 33:1-6.

2. Watchman. Hebrew sôpeh, "one who looks out, spies, watches." Cf. II Sam 18:25; II Kgs 9:17,18. 3. Sword. Cf. 21:1-19. Trumpet. See Hos 8:1; Jer 6:1; Neh 4:19,20.

b) Its Application. 33:7-9.

7. I have set thee a watchman. The prophet receives a new appointment as the watchman of the people. Ezekiel's concept of the seriousness of his task has had a profound effect on all God's servants. Cf. Isa 21:6; 56:10; Jer 6:17; Hab 2:1.

2) The Prophet's Message to the Despairing Exiles. 33:10-20.

10. We pine away. Cf. 4:17; 24:23. 11,12. Two gracious words are granted to the exiles stunned by the feeling of irrevocable doom: (1) God has no pleasure in the death of the wicked, but wants him to turn from his way and live. (2) The past is not irrevocable for men, for they are free either to repent or to sin. Cf. 18:21-32.

13. On live and die, see comment at 18:4; cf. 18:24,26. 14. Cf. 3:18; 18:27. 15. Statutes of life. "Life" in this and related passages is "the enjoyment of the favor of God and the external prosperity which is the reflection and seal of it" (Davidson, Cambridge Bible). Cf. 18:7; 20:11. 16. Cf. vv. 18-22. 17-20. Cf. 18:24-30.

3) News of Jerusalem's Fall, and the Prophet's Message to the Survivors in Judah. 33:21-29.

Jerusalem fell in the eleventh year, fourth month, and ninth day of the reign of Zedekiah (Jer 39:2 parallels 52:5-7 and II Kgs 25:2), and was burned a month later (Jer 52:12-14 parallels II Kgs 25:8-10). 21. Twelfth year . . . tenth month . . . fifth day. The reading of the MT implies that the fugitive reached the exile one and one-half years after the fall of Jerusalem. Stuernagel holds that Jeremiah's year began in the autumn, while Ezekiel, following the Babylonian reckoning, began the year in the spring. Thus the eleventh year of Jer 39:2 is the same as the twelfth year of Ezk 33:21, and so the news reached Ezekiel in January 585.

E. Auerbach (VT, X (1960) 69, 70, and M. Noth (ZDPV, LXXIV (1958), 133-157) have amassed data to show that in the late monarchy the year began in the spring. Eight manuscripts, the LXX, Lucian, and the Syriac read, eleventh year. Dating this oracle in the eleventh year, tenth month, fifth day, permits it to fit in before 26:1, which may have been delivered in the eleventh or twelfth month of the eleventh year. The news would have come about six months after the fall of Jerusalem, i.e., about January, 585 B.C. Cf. Ezra's journey, 108 days (Ezr 8:31; 7:8,9).

22. The prophet had been in an ecstasy in the evening, and the Lord opened his mouth by the time the man arrived the next morning (cf. 3:26,27; 24:27). One tradition identifies the messenger with Baruch (Jer 45:5; Baruch 1:2). Ezekiel was now free to devote himself to pastoral work, earlier hinted at. Cf. 16:60ff.; 17:22ff.; 20:33ff.

24. They that inhabit those wastes (lit., ruins; cf. II Kgs 25:12,22), who survived the destruction of Jerusalem, keep saying: If Abraham . . . one . . . inherited the land (Isa 51:1,2), surely they, his numerous descendants, had a stronger right to it (cf. Mt 3:9). 25,26. Say unto them. The survivors of Jerusalem, so confident of their safety before the fall of the city (11:3-12), are charged with six specific sins (cf. 18:6,10-12,15; 22:6, 9), which disqualified them for any inheritance.

27. Those who are hiding in "ruins," the depopulated countryside, and in forts and . . . caves will fall before the three destructive forces of 5:12; 14:13-20. 28. The mountains of Israel (cf. 6:2,3). 29. God's visitations on the land will cause the apostate Israelites to recognize Him as the Lord, a lesson usually needed by the heathen (25:7,11,17).

4) An Oracle for the Exiles. 33:30-33.

Since Ezekiel's prophecies had been so remarkably fulfilled, the exiles took interest in him; but their enthusiasm was shallow. 30,31. In this snatch of Oriental life, the exiles are seen talking together (RSV) of Ezekiel, sitting before him (cf. 8:1; 14:1; 20:1). They liked his messages of the future restoration and prophecies against the nations but would not obey the moral and religious conditions without which they could have no part in the new era. 32. Love songs (RSV; "sensuous love," 'āgāb). Cf. I Sam 16:17; Ps 33:3; 137:3. 33. When this (judgment or crisis) cometh, they will know they have listened not to a hireling singer but to a prophet of the Lord. Cf. 2:5.

B. The Shepherds of Israel and Their Sheep. 34:1-31.

Because the shepherds or rulers in this allegory have been neglectful and selfish, the Lord will punish them (vv. 1-10). He will himself search out the sheep and be the Good Shepherd (vv. 11-16). He will judge between one sheep and another, protecting the weak from the violent (vv. 17-22). The Lord will set up David as the one shepherd (vv. 23,24), and will make a covenant of peace for the land (vv. 25-31).

1) Judgment on Selfish and Neglectful Shepherds. 34:1-10.

The word shepherd, rō'eh, occurs sixteen times in this chapter. 2. The shepherds of Israel. Rulers, like Jehoiakim and Zedekiah. See 19:1-9; Jer 22:10–23:4; see also Jer 25:34-38; Mic 5:5; Zech 10:2,3; I Kgs 22:17. (Cf. Homer Iliad i. 273; ii. 85; Dante, The Divine Comedy, "Paradise," xxvii, 55,56; Milton, Lycidas, 112ff. On king and god as shepherd in other lit., cf. G. E. Wright, "The Good Shepherd," BA, 2 (1939), 44-48.)

3. Ye eat the fat. Or, the milk; i.e., curds (so LXX, Vulg.). 4. Diseased . . . sick . . . crippled . . . strayed . . . lost (RSV). Five cases of the shepherd's neglect. Cf. verse 16; Jer 50:6; Mt 18:12-14; Lk 15:4; 19:10. 5. Scattered . . . no shepherd. Cf. I Kgs 22:17; Mt 9:36; Mk 6:34.

8. As I live. Cf. 5:11. Beast of the field. The exploiting nations, especially Babylon.

2) The Lord a Good Shepherd to His People. 34:11-16.

The Lord will . . . search for his sheep (v. 11); deliver them (v. 12); bring them to their own land (v. 13); feed them in a good pasture (v. 14); and be the shepherd (ASV) of his sheep (15,16). Ezekiel, like the Lord, had a pastor's heart. 15. The Lord identifies himself as the good shepherd. Cf. Isa 40:11; Jer 31:10; Ps 23:1; 30:1; 95:7. In the NT Christ is the good shepherd. See Lk 15:3-7; Jn 10:10-16; Heb 13:20; I Pet 2:25; 5:4; Rev 7:17.

3) The Lord To Protect the Weak from the Violent Sheep. 34:17-22.

17. The Lord will judge between sheep and sheep (RSV; śeh). That is, between the weak and the leaders, the rams and the he goats, who oppress the poor. 18,19. Callous wrongs of upper classes are pointed out. Cf. Isa 1:23; 3:14,15; 5:8; Hos 4:7-11; 7:1-6; Amos 3:9,10; 4:1,6; Mic 3:1-3.

4) David Installed as Shepherd-Prince. 34:23,24.

Instead of many worthless shepherds, there shall be one shepherd . . . my servant David. . . . prince (vv. 23,24). There is here no allusion to a resurrection of David. Rather, the ideal ruler of the future will be like David, a servant of the Lord, bearing universal rule, and securing peace for the people (Isa 55:3,4; Jer 23:5,6). He shall be the Lord's viceroy or prince (nāśî') forever. Cf. 37:24,25. Christ as the good shepherd (Jn 10:14-18) and the "Son of David" completely fulfills the promises found in II Sam 7:13; Jer 23:5,6; Mic 5:2-5; Isa 9:6,7; Dan 9:25,26; Cf. Mt 1:1; 22:41-45; Lk 1:31-33; Jn 1:43; 4:25; Acts 2:29-33; 13:22,23, to name but a few. Messianic prophecy denotes all prophecy which treats of the person, work, or kingdom of Christ. By extension it includes those passages which speak of the future salvation, glory, and consummation of God's kingdom even where the mediator is not specifically named. The Messianic times comprise the era which Christ inaugurated and conducts as mediatorial king, whether viewed in its entirety or only in some of its aspects.

5) God's Covenant of Peace for the Land. 34:25-31.

God's covenant of peace will remove from the land all that is hurtful (vv. 25, 28). It will provide showers of blessing (v. 26) and restore the productivity of nature (vv. 27,29). And, best of all, it will re-establish the presence of God with his people, the sheep of his pasture (vv. 30,31).

26. Shower . . . in his season . . . showers bringing blessing. The common words for rain are: yôreh, "the early rain," from the last of October to the first of December (Hos 6:3); malkôsh, "the latter rain, spring rain," of March-April (Hos 6:3); geshem, "shower," the word used here; and māṭār, "rain" (Ex 9:33), both of which are used of the heavy winter rains of mid-December to March. 27. Cf. Hos 2:22; Joel 3:18; Amos 9:13; Zech 8:12.

31. Ye . . . the flock of my pasture. Cf. Ps 74:1; 79:13; 95:7; 100:3. The LXX B, Ranke's Old Latin, and the Arabic omit men (ye . . . are men, AV; or you are Adam).

C. The Territorial Integrity of Israel Assured. 35:1–36:38.

After the promise of a good shepherd to replace the wicked shepherds who had ruled Israel, there follow three oracles on the security of the land itself. Mount Seir, for its hostility to Israel, was to be rendered a desolation (35:1-15); while the mountains of Israel, which had been ravaged by the nations, would become luxuriantly fruitful (36:1-15). The Lord would do all these things for his people for his name's sake (36:16-38).

1) The Desolation of Mount Seir. 35:1-15.

The present oracle, much more detailed than that in 25:12-14, was called forth by Edom's hostile behavior to Judah after 586. Israel must be cleared of hostile neighbors before the blessings of the new age would begin (36:1-7). The desolation of Mount Seir and the restoration of the mountains of Israel form a striking contrast (35:3,4,7-9,15; 36:1-6,8).

2. Mount Seir (hairy, i.e., covered with brushwood). The highlands east of the Arabah, stretching from the Dead Sea to the Gulf of Akaba, were the home of Edom (Gen 36:8,9; Deut 1:2; I Chr 4:42). The Edomites are indicted for: (1) their perpetual hatred against Israel (v. 5a; cf. Gen 25:15; 27:41; and references at Ezk 25:12. See N. Glueck, The Other Side of the Jordan, pp. 50-113; Rivers in the Desert); (2) Delivering Israel by the force of the sword at the fall of Jerusalem (v. 5b, cf. Ob 10-14; Ps 137:7,8); (3) planning to possess the territory of Israel after the decimation of its inhabitants (v. 10; cf. v. 12), unauthorized by Nebuchadnezzar or the Lord (36:5).

6-9. Retribution must fall on Edom. 10. These two nations. Israel and Judah (cf. Jer 33:24). After the fall of Jerusalem, the Edomites gradually penetrated Judah, occupying it as far as Hebron (cf. Ezk 25:12ff.). Whereas the Lord was there. The Lord had withdrawn his visible presence from the Temple and the city (10:18; 11:22,23), but he had not renounced his right to the land (36:5). A purified Israel, this prophecy declares, shall return, and Jerusalem will be given a new name (48:35). 14,15. As Edom rejoiced over the destruction of Judah, so the whole earth will rejoice when the Lord makes Edom desolate. Note the frequent first personal pronouns throughout the chapter, applied to the work of the Lord.

2) The Restoration of the Mountains of Israel: Restoration Outward. 36:1-15.

a) Judgment on the Nations. 36:1-7.

1. The mountains of Israel, denounced for idolatry in 6:1-7, are granted gracious promises in this chapter. 2. The enemy. Edom and other nations (vv. 3-7). Cf. 35:3,5,10,11. Note that in verses 2-7 "thus saith the Lord" recurs six times. Verses 3-7, 14 all begin with lākēn, "therefore." 5. In the fire of my jealousy. Cf. v. 6; 5:13; 23:25; 38:19; 39:25. 6. Cf. verses 2,3. The shame of the nations. Being scorned by and occupied by them (see v. 2; 34: 29). 7. I swear (RSV). Literally, I lift up my hand (cf. 20:5,6).

b) Restoration of Israel. 36:8-15.

In the approaching age of the regeneration, the land will be fruitful (vv. 8,9); populous (vv. 10-12); free from scarcity (vv. 13,14); and free from reproach (v. 15). Cf. Isa 54:1-8.

8. For they (my people Israel) are at hand to come from exile. Cf. 4:5,6. 10. All the house of Israel. Both Israel and Judah (cf. 37:16ff.). 11. As in your former times (RSV). At the time of the Exodus (Hos 11:1-4; Jer 2:1-3,6,7).

12b,13,14. The mountains, scourged by famine or wild beasts, are compared to beasts of prey and said to devour their inhabitants or to bereave their nation (cf. Num 13:32). In Ezk 36:13,14,15, Israel is called a goy or nation, the usual designation for the heathen (cf. 2:3). Read the word as a singular, along with the Hebrew marginal kᵉtîb and the versions. 15. Shame . . . reproach. Occupation by hostile neighbors (v. 6), destitution and impoverishment (v. 30).

3) Restoration of the People of Israel: Restoration Inward. 36:16-38.

This section containing a divinely imparted philosophy of history declares that Israel's sins deserved the chastisement of exile (vv. 16-21); but that the Lord will restore Israel, not because of any merit of hers, but to sanctify his name. The glorious accompaniments of the restoration are enumerated (vv. 22-32). In two appendices the Lord foretells that Israel's prosperity and increased population will cause the nations to acknowledge His greatness (vv. 33-36,37, 38).

Verses 16-23 constitute the prophetic lesson or haphtarah to the weekly Sabbath reading, Num 19:1—22:1, the Pārāh, "The Red Cow."

a) Israel Exiled for Her Sins. 36:16-21.

17. The uncleanness of a . . . woman. A figure for idolatry. Compare 7:19; 18:6. (For the figure, see Lev 15:19ff.) 18. Idols (gillûlîm). Cf. 6:4; 20:7,8; 30:13. 20. Profaned my holy name. Israel's exiling led to the profanation of the Lord's holy name by the nations. Note the expression "my holy name" in verses 20-23. Cf. discussion at 20:9,14, 22. The people of the Lord. Cf. Ex 6:7; Lev 20:24; Deut 4:20; 7:6.

b) Restoration of Israel. 36:22-32.

23. I will sanctify. Or set apart as sacred. The return of Israel after her chastisement will make manifest to the nations that the Lord is the supreme and holy God, and that he desires to reveal himself to all the world. See also verse 36; 29:6; 37:28; 39:7; Mal 1:11; Eph 1:3-10.

The next passage, verses 25-29, though referring primarily to Israel, is used in Christian liturgy, and is dear to the whole church.

25-27. The steps in the redemption of Israel are forgiveness, regeneration, and the gift of the Spirit of God. 25. Then will I sprinkle clean water upon you. Ezekiel the priest recalls the Mosaic ritual (cf. Ex 30:17-21; Lev 14:5-7,9; Num 19:9, 17-19) which is a picture of forgiveness. See also Ps 51:7; Jer 33:8; Heb 9:13; 10:22. 26. A new heart . . . a new spirit. God's part in regeneration is stressed here. Cf. 11:19; 18:30-32. See also Jer 31:31-34; Ps 51:10-12. On new things in God's redemptive scheme, see Isa 42:9, 10; 62:2; 66:22; II Pet 3:13; Rev 5:1; 21:1,5. 27. I will put my spirit within you. The pouring out of God's Spirit is to be a feature of the coming age (cf. 37:14; 39:29; Isa 42:1; 44:3; Joel 2:28, 29; Hag 2:5; Acts 2:16-21; Rom 8:23; Eph 1:13,14; 4:30).

28-32. The results of Israel's regeneration will be: her permanent occupation of the land (v. 28a); a covenant relationship with God (v. 28b); protection against relapse into idolatry (v. 29a); the abundant supply of every want (vv. 29b,30); and self-humiliation and repentance on account of past sin (vv. 31, 32; cf. Plumptre, Pulpit Commentary, in loco). These benefits are of pure grace (v. 22).

c) Effect of Israel's Prosperity on the Nations. 36:33-36.

Israel's restoration will cause those who pass by (v. 34b), of the nations (AV, heathen) that are left round about you (v. 36) to recognize the supremacy of the Lord. 35. History moves from Eden to Eden. Cities . . . fortified. Contrast 38:11.

d) Israel's Increased Population. 36:37, 38.

37a. Ask me to do for them (RSV). God is now ready to hear Israel, in contrast to his attitude in her sinful days (14:3; 20:3,31). 37b,38. The land will be repeopled with men like a flock, numerous as the sheep offered to the Lord at Jerusalem in her solemn feasts (Deut 16:16ff.; cf. I Chr 29:21; II Chr 7:4ff.; 29:33; 36:7-9; Jos Wars VI. 9. 3).

D. Reintegration of the People of Israel into One Nation. 37:1-28.

By the vision of dry bones coming to life, the Lord, through Ezekiel, proclaims to Israel the coming resurrection of her national life (vv. 1-14). He foretells by the symbolic act of joining two sticks the future union of the two kingdoms under one head, David (vv. 15-28).

1) The Vision of the Dry Bones. 37:1-14.

This portion of the chapter constitutes the haphtarah (reading from The Prophets) for the Passover and its Sabbath in the synagogue. The entire church has made use of this passage in public and private worship. A painting of the scene, dating from 244–245 A.D., appears on the remains of a synagogue at Dura-Europos (cf. RB 43 (1934), 117,118).

a) A Vision to Exiles Who Feared National Annihilation. 37:1-10.

1. The spirit of the Lord (cf. 1:12,20; 3:14) takes Ezekiel, in a prophetic ecstasy (cf. 1:3; 3:14), to a valley (cf. 3:22,23) strewn with the dried bones of human bodies. 4. Ezekiel is told to prophesy to the bones the promise of life. 5. I will cause breath to enter into you. The Hebrew word rûaḥ is translated "breath" in verses 5,6,8,9,10, "winds" in verse 9, and "spirit" in verses 1,14. The context usually determines the translation. Breath is a sign of life, identical with wind or air, and becomes, in this prophecy, the living principle itself, spirit.

9. The breath of life is breathed from the four winds of heaven (cf. Jer 49:36), a symbol of the universal life-giving Spirit of God (v. 14).

b) Explanation of the Vision. 37:11-14.

11. These bones are the whole house of Israel (both Israel and Judah, vv. 16, 22), whose survivors say, Our hope is lost. The prophet frequently quotes sayings of the people (e.g., 11:13; 12:22, 27; 16:4; 18:2; 20:49; 36:20).

12. The figure is altered from those slain on the battlefield to those dead in the grave. I will . . . raise you from your graves . . . and bring you back, out of the dark places of captivity, home into the land of Israel (RSV). See also verses 14,21; 36:24. 14. And shall put my spirit in you, and ye shall live. The Spirit of the Lord gives life. Cf. verse 10; Ps 104:30. In 36:27,28 He is the regenerating Spirit. Cf. Isa 49:8-12; 61:1.

The prophet is not here speaking of the bodily resurrection, though there are intimations of the doctrine in the OT, particularly in Isa 25:8; 26:19; Dan 12:2. It was "our Saviour Christ Jesus, who hath abolished death and hath brought life and immortality to light through the gospel" (II Tim 1:10).

2) A Symbol of the Reunion of Judah and Israel. 37:15-28.

a) The Two Sticks Joined Together. 37:15-17.

16. A stick. Hebrew 'ēṣ, "tree, wood, staff" (so vv. 17,19,20). Cf. Zech 11:7. Perhaps a wooden tablet. For Judah, and for the children of Israel his companions, e.g., Benjamin, Simeon, Levi. Joseph or Ephraim represents the northern tribes.

b) Explanation of the Symbol. 37:18-20.

Just as the sticks were united into one, so Israel and Judah are to be reunited into one kingdom.

c) The Blessings Resulting from Unification. 37:21-28.

Five great blessings are promised here: (1) The people will be brought back home (vv. 21,22). One nation . . . one king . . . no longer . . . two kingdoms. The prophets regarded Israel of the north as still living (Hos 1:11; 8:3,4; Jer 3:12-15; Isa 43:5-7; 49:5,6). Note the disposition of the twelve tribes in the new kingdom (ch. 48). (2) They will be purified from idolatry (v. 23; cf. 36:25). (3) David will be installed as king over them (vv. 24,25). He is called king (melek) here and in verse 22, but "prince" in other places. 25. Cf. 36:28. Jacob my servant. Jacob was an ancestor of Israel, as Abraham was (Hos 12:12; Isa 29:22). Their prince for ever. Cf. 34:23,24. A David-like ideal ruler, rather than a reference to a resurrected David ruling forever. (4) A covenant of peace will be established (v. 26a). Cf. 34:25. (5) God will dwell in their midst (vv. 26b-28).

26. My sanctuary (miqdāsh). The Temple as the dwelling place of the Lord, made holy by his presence. 27. My tabernacle (mishkān) shall be with them. Literally, over them, i.e., on higher ground (see 40:2; Isa 2:2; Mic 4:1), protecting them or sanctifying them. I will be their God. See also 11:20; 14:11; 36:28. 28. I . . . do sanctify Israel. God comes down to dwell with man, transforming earth into heaven (cf. 43:7,9; 48:8,10,21). Verses 26-28 lead to the rebuilding of the Temple (ch. 40ff.).

This prophecy, like the preceding one, has not yet been fulfilled historically, for so far, Israel has failed to meet the conditions. Its fulfillment lies in the future ingathering of a converted Israel into the body of Christ. It looks forward to the time when the Tabernacle of God will be with his people (Rev 21:3).

E. The Lord To Protect Israel Against Gog and His Allies. 38:1—39:29.

These chapters describe in apocalyptic manner God's deliverance of his people from an unparalleled invasion by a dreadful foe. Israel has been restored to her land (34:12,13,15,23,27) and converted (36:24-28). God's dwelling is in her midst (37:21-28), and she is living in prosperity and security (38:8,11,12, 14). Her neighboring foes no longer molest her (25—32; 36:36). Then in the far distant future (38:8,16), an invasion previously predicted (38:17; 39:8) is made by nations dwelling in the outskirts of the world (cf. Isa 66:19). They come like a cloud (38:9,16) — Gog of the land of Magog, and his allies, Rosh (?), Meshech, and Tubal (38:2,3), from the uttermost parts of the north (38:15; 39:2), along with Persia, Cush, and Put (38:25), and Gomer and Beth-Togarmah, with their hordes from the north (38:6). The commercial nations, Sheba, Dedan, Tarshish and its villages (38:13), are interested in this invasion, too. Gog comes at the direction of the Lord (38:4-7,16; 39:2,3), as well as at his own initiative, spurred on by his greed (38:10-14). Ezekiel only of the prophets places "that day" (38:10, 14,18,19; 39:11) after Israel has long enjoyed restoration and prosperity in her land. See also Rev 19:11; 20:7.

Israel is miraculously preserved, but Gog's hordes are destroyed by earthquake, internecine strife, plagues, torrential rains, fire, and brimstone (38:19-22), as well as rendered helpless in battle (39:3,4). Their discarded weapons will supply fuel for Israel for seven years (39:9,10). Seven months will be required to bury their corpses (39:11-15), and also their bodies and blood will become a feast for birds and beasts (39:17-20). The outcome of this battle will be that the nations shall know that God is the Lord (38:16,23; 39:6,7,21,23; cf. Isa 45:23), while Israel need nevermore doubt the protection of her God (39:22; cf. 39:25-29).

There are three divergent views of these chapters.

(1) They present a literal description of a future attack on Israel. From Jerome to our day, Gog has been variously identified as the Babylonians, the Scythians, Cambyses king of Persia, Alexander the Great, Antiochus the Great, Antiochus Epiphanes, Antiochus Eupator, the Parthians, Mithridates king of Pontus, Suleiman's Turks, the Turks and the Christians, the Armenian descendants of the Scythians, and a confederation of northern European powers including Russia (Rosh; Meshech and Tubal as Moscow and Tobolsk) and Germany (Gomer).

The following objections to the literal interpretations are raised (cf. Fairbairn, 414-431, esp. p. 421; Keil, II, 432; Faussett, JFB, IV, 348ff.): (a) The impossibility of identifying Gog and Magog with a historical person or place. (b) The improbability of such a conglomerate army forming a military coalition. (c) The disproportionate size of the invading army in comparison to Israel and its products. (d) The problems involved in burying corpses for seven months and using discarded weapons as fuel for seven years. (e) The gross carnality of the scene as being inconsistent with Messianic times.

(2) They are a symbolic description of some future event. Some scholars adopt Hengstenberg's view that this section pictures the final conflict of the nation Israel with unidentified foes. The more traditional interpretation of Hävernick and Keil sees this as the final catastrophic struggle between the Church and the forces of the world, and the triumph of God's truth over all forms of ungodliness. This view allows the narrative to be a source of comfort to Israel and the Church but restricts it to far distant fulfillment.

(3) They constitute a prophetic parable illustrating a great truth rather than referring to any specific historical event.

Ezekiel's illustrations frequently have details that cannot be literally pressed (e.g., 16:46-51,53-56,61) but are part of the drapery of the story. Here the elaborate and weird imagery expresses a great truth. To Israel in Babylon this prophecy gave assurance that, once she was restored to her land, the power of God would protect her from the worst foes imaginable. To the Church suffering at the hands of its most relentless persecutors, this is a promise of God's deliverance. The final triumph of the Messiah at the end time is also implicit in this parable. This view makes the passage pertinent to every period of history. The purpose of apocalyptic writing such as this is the "unveiling" of the future, showing God's Lordship over it. Thus it guides and strengthens the people of God in times of darkness (e.g., Daniel, Revelation. Cf. H. H. Rowley, The Relevance of Apocalyptic).

In the synagogue, 38:18—39:16 is the haphtarah for Ex 33:12—34:26 and Num 29:26-31 for the Sabbath within the festival of Sukkoth.

The chapters contain seven oracles introduced by the formula, "Thus saith the Lord" (see Introduction below, 38:1,2; also vv. 3-9,10-13,14-16,17-23; 39:1-16, 17-24; conclusion, vv. 25-29).

1) Invasion of Gog and His Destruction. 38:1-23.

a) Introduction. 38:1,2.

2. Gog (in chs. 38; 39; Rev 20:7), not based on Gogaia of the Amarna Letters, nor Gyges, king of Lydia (670—652) but on prophecies handed down. The land of Magog. The location of this place is unknown. Perhaps it lay between Cappadocia and Media; or the term may refer to the Scythians (Jos Antiq. I. 6. 1). Chief prince of Meshech and Tubal (cf. 27:13). Read the MT nᵉsî' rô'sh in apposition, prince of, head of Meshech and Tubal. The word rô'sh means "head," or "chief." The MT can also be read, "prince of Rosh, Meshech, and Tubal." Rosh (ASV) has not been identified. Possibly it refers to some Scythian tribe in the region of the Taurus mountains.

On the last battles with Gog and Magog, see Enoch 56,57; Sibylline Books [Oracles], III, 319,320; II Esd 13; Babylonian Talmud, Aboda Zara, 3b; Berakoth, 7,8; G. F. Moore, Judaism, II, 344, 348. Cf. the bloody battles of Anat, ANET, 136,137.

b) Gog and His Hordes Led Forth by the Lord. 38:3-9.

4. I will turn thee back. The figure is that of turning a wild beast from its meaningless inclinations to fulfill the divine purposes. 5. Persia, Ethiopia (Kûsh), Libya (Pût). Cf. 27:10; 30:5. 6. Gomer (Gen 10:2). The Gimirrai of the Assyrians; the Cimmerians of the Greeks, living south of the Black Sea, probably in Cappadocia. Togarmah (cf. 27:14), in the uttermost parts of the north (RSV). Similarly Rome in Ps of Sol, 8:16. 7. Be thou a guard or leader for invading hosts.

8. After many days . . . in the latter years. An expression used of the eschatological future (cf. introd. remarks on chs. 38; 39). 9. Gog and his allies advance . . . like a storm . . . like a cloud (cf. v. 16; Isa 21:1; Jer 4:13) against a peaceful and prosperous Israel (cf. vv. 8,11,12).

c) Gog's Evil Purpose in the Invasion. 38:10-13.

10. Into thy mind. Man's plans are but part of God's overreaching purposes. See, for example, 39:2; Isa 10:5,6. 12. In the midst (lit., navel) of the earth. Cf. 5:5. 13. Sheba and Dedan . . . merchants of Tarshish. Cf. 27:22,20,12. And all its villages (RSV). So the LXX and the Syriac, reading kᵉparîm instead of MT kᵉpîrîm, "young lions." The cry of the commercial nations may be ironical or perhaps in approval of anticipated gains for themselves.

d) Gog's Coming Determined by the Lord. 38:14-16.

14. When . . . Israel dwelleth safely.

Cf. verses 8,11,12. 16. My people . . . my land. An attack against the Lord's land is an attack against him.

e) Gog's Destruction. 38:17-23.

17. The prophets . . . which prophesied. This invasion was foretold, either in the preceding prophecy of Ezekiel, or in prophecies no longer extant (cf. 39:8; Zeph 1:14ff.; Jer 3-6; Joel 3; Zech 14). 19-22. Gog's destruction is accomplished by an earthquake (v. 19) that terrifies all nature (v. 20), by a supernatural panic among his soldiers (v. 21), by pestilence and bloodshed and visitations of nature (v. 22). 23. Cf. 36:23.

2) Resumption of Prophecy Against Gog. 39:1-29.

This is not a second invasion but a parallel account. Ezekiel often repeats his teaching. Cf. chapters 1 and 10; 2:3-7 and 8:4-11; 3:17-21 and 33:1-19; chapters 16 and 23.

a) Destruction and Burial of Gog's Hordes. 39:1-16.

1. Prophesy against Gog. Cf. 38:2,3. 2. I will . . . drive you forward (RSV). Cf. 38:4. 4. Gog falls on the mountains. Cf. verse 17; 38:21. 6. The coastlands (isles, AV) also feel the fire that smites Magog.

7. So will I make . . . known. This expresses the purpose of God through the invasion (cf. 38:16,17,23): the recognition of his holiness by Israel and by the nations. See also verses 13,21,25-28.

9. The weapons of the enemy will serve as fuel for Israel for seven years. 11. The corpses of Gog will be buried in the valley of the Travelers (hā'ôbᵉrîm), east of the sea (RSV). This place has been equated with Wady Fejjas, one and one-half miles from the south end of Lake Kinnereth (Sea of Galilee), or the Valley of Abarim (hā'ăbārîm) in Moab, east of the Dead Sea (Deut 32:48), called The valley of Hamon-gog (multitude of Gog). 12,13. All the lay people (note 44:25) will be occupied seven months in the burial. The number seven (vv. 9,14) signifies the completeness of the cleansing of the land from its enemies. 14-16. They will set apart men to pass through the land continually (RSV; lit., men of continuity), who will set up a sign (ṣiyûn, "sign-post, monument") by any unburied bone to help the buriers to cleanse the land. A city Hamonah (fem. form, "multitude") is there (RSV). So Targum shām, "there," in place of shem, "name." It is a city of graves (cf. Jos Life 54).

b) Birds and Beasts Invited To Feast on Gog's Hordes. 39:17-24.

17-20. Scavenging by birds and beasts (cf. Isa 63:1-6; Rev 19:17-21).

17,18. The slaughtering of animals was originally a sacrificial act (cf. Lev 17; Isa 34:6; Zeph 1:8). Here birds and beasts are invited to a great sacrificial feast upon the flesh of the mighty, and . . . the blood of the princes (RSV), who are compared to the fatlings of Bashan (cf. 27:6), a pastoral region famed for its cattle (Deut 32:14; Amos 4:1). 19. Ordinarily fat and blood, the holiest part of the sacrifice, were offered to the Lord (Lev 3:11ff.,17). Here they are eaten by beasts. 20. Horses and riders (LXX, rōkēb, "rider," for MT rekeb, "chariot"; but cf. II Sam 8:4, "chariot horses") are the fare for the scavengers summoned to the Lord's table. These horrendous details give force to Ezekiel's prophetic parable.

21-24. Lessons from the great destruction.

21. I will set my glory among the heathen. God's great power will be revealed to the nations by the destruction of Gog (38:16,23). 22. Israel will never doubt his protection from that day . . . forward. 23,24. The nations will learn that the people of Israel went into captivity and fell . . . by the sword not because of the Lord's inability to protect them (36:20), but because of their iniquity and treachery, which had caused him to hide his face from them. What a lesson to our day of powerful weapons!

c) Conclusion: Restoration of the Fortunes of Jacob. 39:25-29.

In this paragraph, which is not a part of the Apocalypse, the prophet returns to the point of view of chapters 33—37, predicting Israel's restoration.

25. Jealous for my holy name. Cf. 20:9,14,22,44. 26. They shall forget (wᵉnāshû, so kᵉtîb) their shame (RSV), i.e., reproach (cf. Isa 54:4). Qᵉrê, several MSS, and the versions read, they shall bear (wᵉnāśᵉ'û) their shame, i.e., an inward feeling of unworthiness at the goodness of God (cf. 16:52,54).

27,28. When I have brought them again. Through the history of his people, God reveals himself both to the nations and to Israel. 29. I have poured out my spirit. Cf. 36:25-31; Joel 2:28; Zech 12:10.

IV. A Vision of the Restored Community. 40:1—48:35.

Ezekiel first treated of the sins which led to Judah's fall (chs. 1–24), and announced the humbling of her hostile neighbors (chs. 25–32). He then pictured the Lord's glorious restoration of his people to their land (chs. 33–39), their regeneration (36:22-32), and the Lord's dwelling in their midst forever (37:26-28). As a practical seer, under divine direction, the prophet's next concern was to give attention to the organization of the religious life in the restored community (chs. 40–48).

These closing chapters present vast difficulties. The rabbis of the Talmud (Menaḥot 45a) remarked that only the prophet Elijah, who will herald the ultimate redemption, will elucidate the discrepancies with the Pentateuchal laws and the terms which do not occur elsewhere. Moreover, said they, had it not been for Rabbi Chanina ben Hezekiah (Babylonian Talmud, Hagiga 13a), who explained away several of these difficulties, the book of Ezekiel would have been excluded from the Canon of Scripture.

Textual corruptions and the bewildering architectural and ritual details baffle the reader. But the most persistent problem is that of the interpretation of these chapters, on which godly scholars have differed through the years. Were the manifold details of this vision (Ezk 40:2) meant to be actualized at some future date? What part will the bloody sacrifices play in any future economy (40:38-43; 43:18-27; 45:13-17; 46:13-15)? Will the Zadokite priesthood, without a high priest, function again (40:45, 46; 42:13,14; 43:18-27; 44:15-31; 45:18-20; 46:19-24)? Who is the prince and who are his sons (44:3; 45:7-12,13-17, 21-24; 46:1-8,12,16-18)? Who are the downgraded Levites (44:10-14), the uncircumcised foreigners excluded from the sanctuary (44:5,9), and the resident aliens who receive property (47:22,23)? How are the geographical problems relating (1) to the stream issuing from the Temple (47:1-12) and (2) to the apportionment of the land among the twelve tribes (47:13–48:29) to be explained?

The emphasis on ceremonials, forms, and institutions has led to the charge that Ezekiel transformed the ideals of the prophets into laws and dogmas and so became "the father of Judaism." Ezekiel, it is true, believed that the new age required expression of its religious concepts in external concrete form. The post-Exilic Jewish community still needed the Temple, priests, and sacrifices. It is doubtful whether it would have survived without them. Like the eighth century prophets, Ezekiel was interested in righteous living (e.g., chs. 3; 18; 33). The regulations of chapters 40–48 are intended for a regenerated people (cf. chs. 33–37).

The interpretations of the temple vision basically appear under two categories – the literal and the figurative. Herewith is a summary of the principal views regarding the account of the temple in Ezekiel's "political Utopia" or "nomocracy" (government by statute; so Joseph Salvador, quoted in J. Klausner, The Messianic Idea in Israel, p. 131) in chapters 40–48.

1) Some hold that it is a description of Solomon's Temple, preserved in order that the returning exiles might rebuild their sanctuary. Actually, the specifications for Ezekiel's Temple are different from and larger than those of Solomon's Temple.

(2) Others say it represents a lofty ideal, a general pattern to guide the returning exiles in their building. The whole section is viewed as a constitution for the post-Exilic theocracy. But nowhere in the post-Exilic books of the OT is there a reference to Ezekiel's Temple, nor is there any hint of it in the work of Zerubbabel and Joshua, Haggai and Zechariah (Ezr 3:8-13; 5:1,2,13-17; cf. 1:2-4; 6:14; Hag 1:2,7-15; 2:1-9; Zech 6:9-15), or Ezra (Ezr 7:10,15,16, 20,27) and Nehemiah (8–9) that this was the kind of temple they were required to build.

(3) Some Jewish commentators have held that King Messiah, at his coming, will complete the Temple and institute the details of the ritual.

(4) There are likewise Christians who hold that a literal Temple, sacrifices, and priesthood will obtain during the Millennium, according to the specifications laid down by Ezekiel.

Among serious objections to this viewpoint, the following may be noted:

(a) The atonement of our Lord Jesus Christ nullified OT sacrifices forever (Heb 9:10-15; 10:1-4,18).

(b) The old system was of a provisional nature, to which believers in Christ are not to revert (Gal 3:23-25; 4:3-9; 5:1; Col 2:16,17; Heb 10:11-14).

(c) All believers, whether Jew or Gentile, are Abraham's seed (Gal 3:7,16, 29), and members of the "Israel of God" (Gal 6:16), a relationship based on faith not on ancestry (Rom 4:11,14,16; 8:17; 9:6-8). Christ has broken down

"the middle wall of partition" (Eph 2:11-22), so that the distinctions Jew-Greek, circumcision-uncircumcision, bond-free, male-female convey no superior merit (Gal 3:28; Col 3:11; Eph 3:6; Rom 2:28, 29).

(d) The NT refers to the Church as the New Israel, in which adherents of old Israel may participate by accepting Christ (I Pet 2:3-5,8-10). Promises to old Israel broaden out to include the world-wide Church (Acts 2:39; 10:43ff.; 13:26; 15:14-18; Rom 15:9-12).

(e) Not a specific tribe or family, but all believers are priests and have direct access to God through the blood of Christ (see Heb 8:8-13, as fulfilling Jer 31:3-34; Lk 22:20; Heb 9:26; 10:4-10). It is spiritual worship not ritual that God acknowledges (Jn 4:21-24; Acts 7:48-50).

(f) When John employs these chapters to describe the Church of Christ, he removes the specifically Jewish elements (Rev 21:9–22:5).

To insist upon a literal explanation of the vision does not seem to be necessary. Rejecting a literal interpretation does not preclude the holding of a doctrine of the Millennium.

(5) Still others hold that Ezekiel's Temple is a figure representing the redeemed of all ages worshiping God in heaven. However, many of the earthly details of the vision, e.g., the sin offering, negate the suggestion that this is a portrayal of perfect worship in heaven.

(6) The symbolico-typical, or, more accurately, the allegorical view, was favored by the Church Fathers and the Reformers. They discovered in the prince, the priests, the offerings, the temple measurements, the stream that issued from the sanctuary, the tribal allotments, etc., elements depicting Christ and the spiritual perfections of the Church throughout the Gospel age. This view suffers from the vagaries of subjectivism and robs the passage of significance for Ezekiel's day.

(7) Some see in it merely a prophetic parable. These chapters, they say, set forth great spiritual truth in the language and thought patterns of Ezekiel the priest. They are characterized by the same minuteness of detail observed in his visions (ch. 1), allegories (chs. 16: 23), preaching (ch. 18), and predictions (chs. 26–28; 29–32), thus conveying the sense of divine certitude.

Ezekiel and other prophets conceived of the future ideal life as lived in the body, upon this earth (see on 18:4; cf. Isa 66:20; Jer 33:17,18). True religious perfection, they taught, is to be achieved only through the Lord's personal presence among his people (cf. 48:35b). Thus, to Ezekiel's contemporaries in the Babylonian exile, and to the following generations, the description of the new Temple, worship, and land brought comfort and edification.

The Christian Church, all through her history, draws from these chapters, not minute allegorical or typological details of her life, but the broad general principle of God's presence with his people and the fructifying power of his Holy Spirit. They point the Church, especially in their adaptation in Rev 21; 22, to the consummation awaiting God's people at the parousia (second coming) of his Son, who has prepared abiding places for his own in the Father's house. They remind the Church of her pilgrim character in this world, that she looks for "new heavens and a new earth wherein dwelleth righteousness" (II Pet 3:13).

Ezekiel's vision of the restored community embraces a new Temple, to which the glory of the Lord returns (chs. 40–43), a new service of worship, with an ideal ministry and sacrificial system (chs. 44–46), and a new holy land redivided among the tribes on new principles (chs. 47; 48).

A. A New Temple. 40:1–43:27.

The temple area, as described by Ezekiel, consists of three terraces, on the highest of which, facing east, stands the Temple with its annexes, the temple yard, and a large building directly behind it. On a middle terrace are kitchens and chambers for the priests, the court containing the altar of burnt offering, and the inner courts with three elaborate porticos. The lowest terrace, surrounded by an exterior wall, contains the outer courts with three porticos and kitchens and chambers for the people.

1) The Plan of the New Sanctuary, with its Courts and Chambers. 40:1–42:20.

1-4. Introductton. The prophet is transported in vision to the temple mountain, where a heavenly guide conducts him on a tour of the Temple, beginning at the east gate of the outer court.

1. Twenty-fifth year . . . in the beginning of the year, in the tenth day of the month. March-April 572 (573) B.C. 2. In . . . visions. Cf. 8:3; 11:22-25. A very high mountain. The idealized Mount Zion (cf. Ps 48:2; Isa 2:2; Mic 4:1; Zech 14:10). In visions the natural and supernatural mingle freely. The Temple resembles structure like (AV, frame of) a city (RSV). 3. A man, whose appearance was like . . . brass. A supernatural character (cf. Rev 21:10-27). With a line of flax. For long measurements. And a measuring reed. For shorter measurements.

a) Measurements of the Courts. 40:5-47.

5-27. The outer court and its three gates.

There is a wall surrounding the whole temple area (v. 5), one reed in thickness and one reed in height (v. 6), pierced by three elaborate gateways or porticos on the east (vv. 5-16), on the north (vv. 20-23), and on the south (vv. 24-27). Seven steps lead up to these gateways (v. 6; LXX, 22,26) which open on the terrace or platform on which the whole temple area is situated (v. 18).

5-16. The eastern gate. 5. The Hebrew cubit was 17.58 inches or 44.65 centimeters. The long cubit was 20.679 inches, and Ezekiel's reed was about 10½ feet long.

6. The gate (sha'ar) of the temple is 50 cubits long (v. 15) and 25 cubits broad (v. 13). It contains an outer threshold 6 cubits deep and 10 cubits wide (vv. 6,11); a passageway 13 cubits wide (v. 11) with three little chambers, side-rooms or guard-rooms on either side, each 6 cubits square (v. 7), having splayed windows (v. 16), and protected on the side towards the passageway by a barrier (RSV) or low wall 1 cubit thick (v. 12); jambs or blocks of masonry 5 cubits square between the siderooms, with splayed openings and carvings of palm trees in relief (v. 16); an inner threshold 6 cubits deep (v. 7); a vestibule or porch 20 cubits by 8 cubits at the inner end of the gateway, with splayed windows (vv. 8,16); and jambs, or posts of 2 cubits' thickness (v. 9).

17-19. The thirty chambers in the outer court. Passing through the east gateway, Ezekiel and his guide enter the outward court, situated on the lower pavement or terrace (v. 17). Disposed round about the court are thirty chambers (for the use of the people and the Levites who worship in the outer court) upon the pavement, perhaps ten on the east, north, and south sides, five on each side of a gateway. The pavement is fifty cubits wide, corresponding to the length of the outer gates (vv. 18,15). The four corners contain the people's kitchens (46:21-24). 19. From the inner front of the outer gate to the outer edge of the inner court is a hundred cubits.

20-27. The north and south gates. The details for the north and south gates correspond to those for the eastern gate, with the specific mention of seven steps up to the platform (vv. 22,26).

28-47. The inner court and its three gates. The inner court is located 100 cubits to the interior of the outer gates (v. 19) on a platform eight steps higher than the outer court (vv. 31,34,37). It is entered by means of gates on the south (vv. 28-31), east (vv. 32-34), and north (vv. 35-37) sides. In the vestibule of the east gateway there are arrangements for the manipulating of sacrifices (vv. 38-43). On the eastern sides of the inner north and south gateways are chambers for the priests responsible for the care of the temple buildings and the altar (vv. 44-46). Within the inner court is the altar court (v. 47), a square of 100 cubits, situated east of the Temple, in the center of which stands the altar of burnt offering (43:13-27). The priests' kitchens and chambers are situated at the western end of the inner court (42:1-14). The Temple itself is on a platform ten steps higher than the inner court (v. 49).

28-31. South gate of the inner court. 28. From the south gate of the outer court (vv. 24-27), Ezekiel is conducted to the inner court through its south gate. The gates of the inner court correspond to those of the outer court in all respects except that their vestibules lie at the outer end of the gateway, near to the outer court (vv. 31,34,37). 31. Eight steps lead from the lowest pavement to the terrace supporting the inner court.

32-37. The east and north inner gates. These gates are similar in description to the south gate.

38-43. The vestibule of the inner east gate, and arrangements for sacrifice. 38. A chamber is constructed within the vestibule of the (RSV) east gate (cf. vv. 40, 44; 43:17b; 46:2ff.), where the ministering priests or Levites will wash the burnt offerings. 39. Within the vestibule are four tables, two . . . on either side (RSV), on which are prepared the flesh of the burnt offering ('ōlâ; Lev 1, "that which goes up," a beast or fowl wholly consumed on the altar to symbolize the offerer's self-surrender to God), the sin-offering (ḥaṭṭa't; Lev 4:1–5:13, in expiation of sin), and the trespass-offering ('āshām; Lev 5:14–6:7, in which recompense or restitution is made). 40. On the outside, northwards of one going up the entrance of the gateway (Cooke, ICC) are four more tables, constituting eight tables (v. 41) for the sacrifices mentioned in verse 39. 42. There are also four tables, or pedestals, of hewn stone . . . on which the slaughtering instruments [are] to be laid (RSV). 43. Hooks or pegs are fastened in the outer wall of the vestibule on which to hang the slaughtered carcasses before flaying.

44-46. Priests' chambers on the east sides of the north and south gates. 44. There are two chambers in the inner court (RSV), one (v. 45) on the east side of the north gate toward the south for the priests (Levites, 44:10-14) who have charge of the temple and the other on the east side of the south gate facing north for the priests who have charge of the altar (v. 46). The Zadokite priests.

47. Measurements of the altar court. Within the inner court is the altar court, a square of 100 cubits in front (i.e., on the east) of the temple, in which stands the altar of burnt offering.

b) Measurements of the Temple Itself and Its Surroundings. 40:48—41:26.

The eighth century temple at Tell Tainat in Syria and the recently excavated Canaanite temple in Hazor had a threefold division of vestibule, nave, and inner room, similar to the arrangement in the plans of Solomon's and Ezekiel's structures. Ezekiel's Temple stands on a third platform ten steps higher than the inner court (v. 49). It consists of three parts, the vestibule (vv. 48,49), nave (41:1,2), and the Most Holy Place (41:3, 4). An annex of side chambers adjoins three sides of the Temple (vv. 5-11), and behind it there is a large building (v. 12). The dimensions of the Temple (vv. 13-15a) and a brief description of its interior are given (15b-26).

48,49. The vestibule or porch ('ûlām). The vestibule (cf. I Kgs 6:3) is 20 cubits wide from north to south and 12 cubits deep from east to west. Its entrance, 14 cubits wide, has a sidewall of 3 cubits on either side. Beside the jambs, 5 cubits thick, stand two pillars (cf. I Kgs 7:15-22, where these are called Jachin and Boaz).

41:1,2. The nave or Holy Place (hêkāl). The nave is 40 cubits long from east to west and 20 cubits broad from north to south. Its entrance is 10 cubits wide, with sidewalls of 5 cubits breadth on either side and jambs 6 cubits thick (cf. I Kgs 6:5).

3,4. The most holy place. Or inner room (qōdesh haqqodāshîm). The angel alone goes into the inner room, or most holy place, beyond the nave, which is 20 x 20 cubits. Its entrance, sidewalls, and jambs measure 6, 7, and 2 cubits respectively (cf. I Kgs 6:16; 7:50; 8:6).

5-11. The side-chambers of the annex. Round about three walls of the Temple are side-chambers for storage purposes in 3 stories, 30 in each story (v. 6; cf. I Kgs 6:5-10). The outer wall of the side-chambers is 5 cubits thick (v. 9), and the lowest tier of chambers is 4 cubits wide (v. 5), each story becoming broader, corresponding to the enlargement of the offset in the wall of the temple (v. 7). Taking a cue from Solomon's Temple (I Kgs 6:6), the temple walls are probably 6 cubits thick at the first story, with a chamber 4 cubits wide (v. 5), 5 cubits thick at the second story, allowing a five-cubit chamber, and 4 cubits thick at the third story, giving a six-cubit chamber. Ladders, or possibly a circular stairway, connect the stories (v. 7; cf. I Kgs 6:6). Both the Temple and the side building stand on a raised platform 6 cubits high (v. 8), the height of the ten steps of 40:49, and 5 cubits broad (v. 9), which give access to the side chambers on the north and south (v. 11). This, in turn, is surrounded by a narrow courtyard or separate place 20 cubits wide (vv. 10,12).

12. The building (binān) behind the Temple. The purpose of the large building (90 x 40 cubits, with walls 5 cubits thick) behind or west of the Temple, facing the temple yard ("separate place," gizrâ, 41:12-15; 42:1,10,13), is not explained. It is called the parwārîm in II Kgs 23:11, where the kings kept horses sacred to the sun, and parbār in I Chr 26:18.

13-15a. The measurement of the Temple. The Temple from east to west is 100 cubits long (v. 13; jamb of the vestibule, 5 cubits; vestibule, 12; jamb of the nave, 6; nave, 40; jamb of the Most Holy, 2; Most Holy, 20; wall, 6; side chamber, 4; outer wall of side building, 5 = 100). The breadth . . . of the temple from north to south, including the yard, is 100 cubits (v. 14; breadth of Temple, 20; side wall, 6 + 6; side chambers, 4 + 4 and their walls, 5 + 5; raised platform, 5 + 5; yard, 20 + 20 = 100). The yard and west building with its walls are 100 cubits long from east to west (vv. 12,13). The length of the western building from north to south, plus its walls is 100 cubits. There are thus three adjoining squares of 100 cubits: the altar court (40:47); the Temple and the yards on its north and south sides; and the western building with the yard in front of it.

15a-26. Description of the interior of the Temple. The three parts of the Temple – nave, inner room, and outer vestibule (15b) – are paneled or wainscotted with wood (or "of šᵉhîp wood"; Ak. loanword for costly black wood; cf. G. R. Driver, "Notes on Hebrew Lexicography," JTS 23 (1922), 409), from the ground up to the windows (v. 16). The windows with recessed or narrowing frames (cf. 40:16) are covered or latticed (v. 16). The walls of the inner room and nave are carved with likenesses of two-faced cherubims alternating with palm trees (vv. 17,18). The face of a man and the face of a young lion look toward palm trees on either side (cf. 1:6; 10:14, 21; I Kgs 6:29ff.).

The doorposts of the nave [are] squared (RSV) or fourfold (v. 21). In front of the holy place (RSV; i.e., Holy of Holies), is an altar-like table of wood, 3 x 2 x 2 cubits, possibly for showbread (v. 22; cf. Ex 25:23ff.; Lev 24:5-9). The nave and the holy place (RSV; i.e., Holy of Holies) each has a double door (v. 23), with two swinging leaves for each door (RSV; v. 24), on which are carved cherubims and palm trees (v. 25). An ornamental canopy or cornice of wood is on the outside front of the vestibule.

c) Other Buildings in the Inner Court. 42:1-20.

1-14. The chambers of the priests. The buildings containing the priests' chambers are located, it seems, at the west end of the inner court, between the north and south temple yards (vv. 1,10; cf. 41:10,12) and the inner edge of the outer court (v. 3). The chambers on the north are described at length (vv. 1-10a), and those on the south correspond to them (vv. 10b-12). The details are obscure and the text is corrupt. Apparently there are two structures, one running parallel to the temple yard, 100 x 20 cubits in size (v. 2), with a passageway beside it 10 cubits wide (v. 4), on the other side of which, overlooking the outer court, is the second structure, 50 x 20 cubits in size (v. 8). The two structures plus the passageway total a width of 50 cubits (v. 2). The chambers within these structures may be arranged in three stories (v. 6) or in three rows on terraces descending to the outer court. Somewhere below the eastern end of the shorter series of chambers is an entrance, giving access up a flight of ten steps (40:49) from the outer court to the priests' chambers (v. 9).

13,14. Use of these chambers by the priests. The chambers will be used by the priests for eating the holy offerings, for depositing them till they are baked in the kitchens (cf. 44:29; 46:20), and for storing the priestly garments when the priests are not on duty (cf. 44:19; 46:20). The section on the cooking places of the priests (46:19-24) could well belong here.

15-20. The over-all measurements of the temple area. The entire temple area is a square 500 cubits on each side (v. 20; 45:2), not a 500-reed square, which would be 3000 cubits (cf. Rev 21:13). The purpose of the surrounding wall is to make a separation between the holy and the common (RSV; v. 20).

2) Return of the Lord to the House Prepared for Him. 43:1-12.

Some eighteen and one-half years earlier, Ezekiel had seen a vision of the departure of the glory of the Lord from the Temple (10:19; 11:22,23). Now that all things are ready, he sees the glory return (vv. 1-5). The enthroned Lord pronounces that the Temple is his throne and instructs the prophet to teach the people the temple regulations (vv. 6-12).

a) The Return of the Lord. 43:1-5.

1. At the gate that looketh . . . east the prophet sees the visible manifestation of the Lord's presence as he had seen it when he came to destroy the city (v. 3; cf. chs. 8–11), and in his inaugural vision by the river Chebar (1:28; 3:12,23). 4. The glory of the Lord entered the east gate, and the spirit took him up (v. 5; cf. 2:2; 3:12,14; 8:3) into the inner court. The prophet cannot go in through the east gate once the Lord has entered it (cf. 44:2). On the glory of the Lord filling the Tabernacle and the Temple, see Ex 40:34,35; I Kgs 8:11.

b) God's Exhortation to Israel from the Inner Sanctuary. 43:6-12.

The Lord (not the man by his side, v. 6) speaks to Israel through Ezekiel concerning the holiness of the Temple (vv. 7-9). His exhortation forms a conclusion to chapters 40–42; and the temple regulations (vv. 10-12) form an introduction to chapter 44 and the following chapters.

7. The Jerusalem Temple is here represented as the throne of God (see also Jer 3:17; 14:21; 17:12. For heaven as God's throne, see Isa 66:1; Ps 2:4; 11:4; Mt

5:34; 23:22). Ezekiel pictures heaven come down to earth (cf. 37:26-28). Whoredom. Temple prostitution (II Kgs 23:7); or idolatry (ch. 8). Carcases of their kings. The royal sepulchres were on the same hill as the Temple, separated from it only by a wall (II Kgs 21:18, 26). 8. Formerly the Temple and the palace were contiguous (I Kgs 7:8; II Kgs 20:4, corrected). Thresholds and doorposts may refer to kings' tombs fashioned like houses (Isa 14:18; Job 17:13).

Verses 10-27 form the synagogue haphtarah for Ex 27:20—30:10.

10. Cf. 40:4; 44:5. 12. The law of the Temple is laid down in chapters 40—42. The whole temple area upon the top of the mountain is declared most holy (41:4; 45:3; 48:12).

3) The Altar of Burnt Offering and Its Consecration. 43:13-27.

a) Description of the Altar. 43:13-17.

Compare the various altars: in the Tabernacle (Ex 27:1-8), in Solomon's Temple (II Chr 4:1); in Zerubbabel's Temple (Ezr 3:2,3; I Macc 4:47); in Herod's Temple (Mishna Middoth IV, 1a, 3b, 4. Jos Wars V. 5,6; Letter of Aristeas, 87).

13. The altar of burnt offering (cf. 40:47), made of unspecified material, possibly stone, consists of four square ledges, diminishing in size, placed one on top of the other. The base is 18 x 18 cubits and one cubit high, with a border at the outer edge one-half cubit high, probably as a gutter to carry off the sacrificial blood. 14. Upon this rests the lower ledge, 2 cubits high and 16 x 16 cubits square. Next comes the upper or larger ledge, 4 cubits high and 14 x 14 cubits square. 15,16. On top is the altar hearth, or altar proper, 4 cubits high and 12 x 12 square, with horns one cubit high, projecting from its four corners. The name hār'ēl (v. 15), or 'ărî'ēl, has affinity with the Akkadian arallû, "underworld," or with the "mountain of the gods" (Albright, Arch. and the Relig. of Israel, pp. 150-152), and its design is reminiscent of the Babylonian ziggurat (Nielson, Journal of the Palestine Oriental Society, 13 (1933), 203ff.). Its total height, including the horns, is 12 cubits. Steps on its east side enable the officiating priest to face the Temple rather than the sun (cf. 8:16; Ex 20:26).

b) Consecration of the Altar. 43:18-27.

The altar is consecrated by the applying of the blood of the sin offering for seven days on its four horns, on the four corners of the upper ledge, and on the rim of the base, to cleanse (ḥittē', to remove sin, to "unsin," by applying sacrificial blood to the object), and to purge (kippēr, "to purge," "to expiate by a ritual act") it (v. 20; cf. Ex 29:12; Lev 8:15). Because objects used in the worship contact defilement from sinful man, blood, as the seat of life, is applied to them to remove uncleanness and to impart holiness (cf. Lev 16:15-20). The sin offering the first day is a bullock (v. 19), and on the succeeding days of the week a hegoat (vv. 22,25). Following the daily sin offering, a bullock and a ram sprinkled with salt are offered as a burnt offering (23,24). Salt, originally added to the cereal offerings (Lev 2:13) and to incense (Ex 30:35), was later placed on burnt offerings (Mk 9:49 marg.; Jos Antiq. III. 9. 1). 26. And so consecrate it (RSV). Literally, fill its hand, i.e., confer a dignity, invest with office (cf. Ex 28:41; Lev 16:32; I Chr 29:5). 27. From the eighth day . . . forward the regular burnt offerings and peace offerings (shelem, Lev 3, signifying peace and communion with God; they also include the thank, votive, and voluntary offerings, Lev 7:12, 16a,16b) can be offered on it.

B. A New Service of Worship. 44:1—46:24.

The following ordinances deal with: (1) who may minister in the Temple (ch. 44); (2) the revenues of the priests, the Levites, and the prince, and the prince's obligations to the Temple (45:1-17); and (3) the festal and daily offerings in the Temple, and the special offerings of the prince (45:18—46:24).

1) Those Who May Minister in the Temple. 44:1-31.

a) The Outer, East Gate Closed. 44:1-3.

Ezekiel, taken by the angel to the outer east gate (v. 1), is informed that the gate will remain shut after the Lord's entrance through it, lest the entrance of a mortal desecrate it (v. 2). The "Golden Gate" in the east wall of Old Jerusalem today is walled up. The walls were built by the Ottoman sultan, Suleiman the Magnificent, in 1542. He closed the gate to prevent festivals commemorating "the recovery of the Holy Cross." The prince cannot enter through the gate but is permitted to eat the sacrificial meal in its vestibule (v. 3; cf. Jer 30:21).

b) Restrictions on Service in the Temple. 44:4-14.

4. Glory of the Lord. Cf. 43:3. 5. Cf. 40:4.

7. Ye have brought into my sanctuary strangers. Foreign slaves or war captives had hitherto assisted in the offering of sacrifice and in performing subordinate tasks (Deut 29:11; Josh 9:23,27; I Sam 2:13; Zech 14:21; Ezr 8:20; 2:43-54). 9. Foreigners are now excluded as spiritually and physically unfitted (cf. Num 3:10; 16:40; Hag 2:14; Ezr 4:3; Neh 13:7-9,30). The Herodian Temple bore tablets in the outer court warning non-Jews against trespassing on pain of death (Jos Wars V. 5. 2; J. E. XII. 85). 10. Levites (cf. 48:11, or Israel, v. 15; 14:11) who in going astray misled the people (v. 12; Jud 17:7-13; 18:18,19; 30; Deut 33:8-11) will be degraded in rank. They will be watchmen at the gateways (cf. 40:7), will assist the people in the outer court, and will slay their offerings and cook their sacrifices (v. 11; cf. 46:24; Num 3:5–4:33).

c) Regulations for the Zadokite Priests. 44:15-31.

15. The Levitical priests, the sons of Zadok (RSV), were descendants of Zadok, a contemporary of David and Solomon (II Sam 8:17; 15:24-29; 20:25; I Kgs 2:27,35) and of Aaron through Eleazar (I Chr 6:50-53). 16. The faithful priests will minister to God. Come near to my table. Cf. Mal 1:7,12. Keep my charge. Cf. 40:45,46.

Verses 17-19 describe their garments (cf. Lev 13:47,48; Jer 13:1; Herodotus ii. 37). They are to remove their linen garments before going out, lest they communicate holiness to the people (RSV), a ritual sanctity which temporarily disqualified persons for the ordinary duties of life (cf. Lev 6:18,27; Ex 29:37; 30:29; Hag 2:10-12).

20,21. On cutting the hair, see Lev 21:5; 10:6; 21:10. On drinking wine while on duty, see Lev 10:9; Hos 4:11; Prov 20:1 (cf. Jos Antiq. III. 12. 2). 22. Neither shall they take for their wives. Cf. Lev 21:7,13,14. 23,24. And they shall teach my people. These verses set forth the priests' duties towards the people: ceremonial instruction (cf. 22:26; Lev 10:10; Hag 2:11; Mal 2:7); directions for the administration of justice (Deut 17:8-13; 33:10; I Sam 4:18; 7:15; Hos 4:6); judgments, laws, statutes (cf. 5:6; Lev 26:46); directions for keeping the sabbaths (cf. 20:12).

25-27. They shall come at no dead person. Regulations are given for the priests' necessary contact with the dead. Mourning was forbidden to them except for the closest blood relations (cf. Lev 21:1-3,11; Num 19:14ff.). 26. After he is cleansed. Cf. Num 19:14-19. 27. He shall offer. Cf. Lev 4:3.

In verses 28-31 the maintenance of the priests is provided for. They are to subsist on the offerings, things dedicated to the Lord (Num 18:14ff.; Lev 27:28,29), first fruits (Num 8:13; Deut 18:4), the contributions (t^{e}rûmâ; cf. 20:40), perhaps the tithe (Num 15:19; 18:19). 30b. Blessing. Cf. Mal 3:10. 31. Dead of itself. Cf. 4:14; Lev 22:8.

2) Portions of Land for the Priests, the Levites, and the Prince. 45:1-17.

a) Sacred Territory of the Temple and Its Surroundings. 45:1-8.

The Temple of Ezekiel, in addition to being on a high hill (40:2) and having walled courts (chs. 40–42), and in addition to being protected by the precautionary measures of 44:4ff., is further guarded against desecration by its location in the midst of sacred territory surrounded by the priests' quarters (48:8-22). A . . . portion (t^{e}rûmâ, "part lifted off or separated from the whole") of land is made over to sacred purposes (v. 1).

The area consists of three parallel strips, running east to west, forming a square 25,000 x 25,000 cubits in size. The center strip, 25,000 x 10,000 cubits, is set apart for the priests and their houses (vv. 3,4). In its midst is a square plot, 500 x 500 cubits for the sanctuary, surrounded by an open space of 50 cubits on all sides (vv. 1,2). North of this is the area for the Levites and their cities, 25,000 x 10,000 cubits (v. 5, LXX; Num 35:2; Josh 14:4). To the south is a section 25,000 x 5,000 cubits, in the center of which is a 5,000-cubit square for the holy city, with farm lands on both sides of it (cf. 48:15-20), the property of all the tribes (v. 6). On both sides of this holy portion is the portion of land assigned to the prince, 25,000 cubits wide, extending from the west border unto the east border of the land (vv. 7,8). In contrast to the past evil shepherds, the princes shall no more oppress the people (cf. 22:25; 34:1ff.).

b) Duties of the Princes. 45:9-12.

The princes of the future kingdom are to remove violence (Amos 3:6; Jer 6:7), execute . . . justice (Jer 22:3,15; 23:5), and cease . . . evictions (v. 9, RSV; cf. 46:18;

I Sam 8:14; Isa 5:8; I Kgs 21:9). There is to be no revival of the kingship with the power and pomp of old. The prince's main function is to provide the offerings. Through him the unity of the nation will find expression in its worship (45:16,17, 21-25; 46:1-12). He has neither priestly nor autocratic powers. The Lord is the true owner of the land. The prince is to establish a system of correct measures (vv. 10,11) and weights (v. 12; cf. G. A. Barrois, "Chronology, Metrology, etc., of the Bible," IB, 1, 142-164).

c) The Offerings of the People to the Prince and the Prince's Offerings to the Temple. 45:13-17.

The people are to give a specified offering from their grain (v. 13), oil (v. 14), and sheep (v. 15) to the prince (v. 16), who in turn will furnish the various offerings for the feasts, new moons, sabbaths, and all the appointed feasts (ASV), in order that expiation may be made for Israel (v. 17).

Chapter 45:16—46:18 is the haphtarah to Ex 12:1-20.

3) Offerings at the Various Sacred Seasons. 45:18—46:24.

a) Offerings at the Feasts. 45:18-25.

18-20. Semi-annual cleansing of the Temple. The sanctuary is to be cleansed semi-annually by the blood of the sin offering on the first day of the first month, March/April (vv. 18,19), and by similar rites "in the seventh month" (Sept./Oct.) on the first day of the month" (v. 21, LXX) atonement is to be made for the temple (RSV).

21-25. Offerings at the Feast of Passover and the Feast of Tabernacles. At the passover in the spring (cf. Ex 12:6; Deut 16:1) and the seven days of unleavened bread (cf. Ex 13:6,7; Deut 16:8), the prince is to provide for himself and for the people the requisite sin offering, burnt offering, and cereal offering (vv. 21-24). In the seventh month, he is to provide similar offerings for the feast of booths or sukkoth, the great harvest festival (cf. Ex 23:16; 34:22; Deut 16:13ff.).

b) Offerings on Sabbaths and New Moons. 46:1-12.

1-5. Sabbaths. The east gate of the inner court, shut during the six working days, is to be open on the Sabbath (v. 1). The prince will enter thereby and worship at its threshold, from whence he can see the sacrifices at the altar (v. 2). At the outside entrance of the gate, the people will worship, looking through it (v. 3). The prince will provide burnt offerings, cereal offerings, and optional offerings (vv. 4,5; cf. Num 28:11-15).

6-8. New Moon. Similar offerings are to be provided by the prince for the new moons. 8. He will go in by the vestibule, and he shall go forth by the same way. That is, without setting foot in the inner court. 9,10. When the people of the land shall come. To avoid confusion, the people coming to the feasts will enter by one gate and go out by the other. The prince will worship with them as one of the ordinary people.

11. At the feasts and the appointed seasons (RSV), the cereal offering is to accompany the burnt offering, as on the Sabbaths. 12. The free will or voluntary offerings are to be prepared by the community. On the continual burnt offering (tāmîd), see Ex 29:42; Num 28,29; Deut 8:11-13.

c) The Prince and His Landed Property. 46:16-18.

These verses supplement 45:8,9. If the prince give[s] any landed property to his sons, it is to remain theirs (v. 16). If he gives land to his servants, it shall return to the prince in the year of liberty (v. 17), probably the Year of Jubilee, every fiftieth year (cf. Lev 25:10; Jer 34:14; Isa 61:1). The prince is not to evict people from their property (v. 18; cf. 45:8,9).

d) Cooking Places for the Sacrificial Meals. 46:19-24.

The kitchens for the priests (vv. 19, 20) are at the west end of the priests' chambers, described in 42:1-14. Not . . . to sanctify the people. See 44:19. 21-24. The kitchens for cooking the sacrificial meals of the people are situated in the four corners of the outer court. In each of these are smaller courts or enclosures, 40 x 30 cubits in size, to house the kitchens, where the Levites (44:10-14) serve the people.

The circuit of the temple buildings is now completed, and a new topic is introduced.

C. A New Holy Land. 47:1—48:35.

After a description of the stream which gives life to the land (47:1-12), the boundaries of the land (47:13-23), and the disposition of the tribes in it are indicated (48:1-35).

1) The Life-giving Stream from the Temple. 47:1-12.

The prophet is brought from the outer court (46:21) to the vestibule of the Temple (40:48,49). There he sees a stream issuing from below the threshold of the Temple, eastward, passing south of the altar (v. 1), and south of the outer east gate (v. 2). At 1,000 cubits from the gate, the waters are ankle deep (v. 3), but within 4,000 cubits they have become a river (naḥal), deep enough to swim in (vv. 4,5).

Along the banks of the river grow ever-vernal trees (v. 7), bearing new fruit every month, whose leaves possess a healing virtue (v. 12, ASV). The water goes down into the Arabah, the depression of the Jordan Valley reaching to the Gulf of Akabah, transforming it, making the stagnant waters of the (Dead) Sea fresh (RSV; v. 8), and teeming with life (v. 9), like the Mediterranean Sea (v. 10). Fishers shall stand upon it [beside the Dead Sea] from En-gedi (spring of the kid, on the middle of the western shore of the Dead Sea, an oasis of fertility because of its abundant waters; cf. Song 1:14) to En-eglaim (v. 10; "spring of two calves" [?]), possibly near modern Ain Feshka, about two miles south of the Khirbet Qumran area, where the Dead Sea Scrolls were found. The miry places by the seaside will be left unsweetened, i.e., will be salt marshes (v. 11). The transformation of the land will be due to God's presence (cf. 34:26-30; 36:8-15, 30-36; 37:26-28).

Note the influence of this vision on other writers: Joel 3:18; Zech 13:1; 14:8; Jn 4:14; 7:37,38; Rev 22:1,2; also, Sir 24:34,35; Enoch 26:2,3. To the Christian believer, it speaks of life, healing, peace, and prosperity, all made available through the Holy Spirit.

2) The Boundaries of the Land. 47:13-23.

Compare Num 34:1-12, where the north to south boundaries span about 280 miles. The new land is to be divided equally among all twelve tribes (vv. 13,14).

14-17. The north boundaries: from the great (Mediterranean) sea by way of Hethlon (Heitela, six miles north of Tripoli, or Adlun, between Zarephath and Tyre) to [the entrance of (LXX)] Hamath on the Orontes (115 miles north of Damascus, Amos 6:2), to Zedad (Sadad, southeast of Homs), Berothah (belonging to Zobah, II Sam 8:8; or Beraitan near Baalbek), Sibraim (Zipheron, between Hamath and Homs, Num 34:9), to Hazer-hatticon (central Hazer = Hazer-enan?) on the border of Hauran (east of the Jordan, south of Damascus).

18. The eastern boundary. Cf. Num 34:10-12. RSV: From Hazer-enan, along the Jordan, to the eastern (Dead) Sea, as far as Tamar (perhaps Kurnub, twenty-five miles southwest of the end of the Dead Sea; cf. I Kgs 9:17).

19. The southern boundary. RSV: From Tamar to the waters of Meribath-kadesh (Kadesh-barnea; Num 27:14; Josh 10:41; etc., usually identified with 'Ain Qadeis, about fifty miles south of Beersheba), along the brook of Egypt (Num 34:5; the Wadi el-'arish) to the great sea (RSV).

20. The western boundary: The Mediterranean Sea to a point opposite the entrance of Hamath (probably at the northern end of the plain, el Biqâ, between Lebanon and Anti-Lebanon).

The country east of the Jordan is excluded.

21-23. According to the tribes. Resident aliens residing among the tribes are to receive an inheritance . . . among the tribes in which they dwell.

3) The Disposition of the Tribes in the Land. 48:1-35.

a) Seven Tribes North of the Sacred Portion. 48:1-7.

Seven tribes—Dan, Asher, Naphtali, Manasseh, Ephraim, Reuben, and Judah—are to have strips of land running from east to west from the northern boundary of the land to the Sacred Portion. The physical and topographical difficulties are overlooked.

b) The Sacred Portion. 48:8-22.

For a parallel description, see 45:1-8a. A strip of land 25,000 cubits wide and reaching from the eastern to the western boundaries of the land is set apart for sacred use. In the center of it is the holy district (vv. 8,9,20; cf. 45:1,2).

10-12. The priests' portion. Cf. 45:3,4.

13,14. The Levites' portion. Cf. 45:5.

15-20. The portion of the city. Cf. 45:6. In the middle of the third strip of the sacred portion, 25,000 x 5,000 cubits in size, is the city (v. 15), a square of 4,500 cubits on each side (v. 16), surrounded by a 250-cubit wide strip of open land (AV, suburbs; v. 17). The 10,000 cubits of land on either side of the city are for agricultural puposes, the produce of which is to go to industrial and agricultural laborers (v. 18). Members of all the tribes of Israel are to work in it (v. 19).

21,22. The prince's portion. And the residue shall be for the prince. Cf. 45:7, 8a. His territory is bounded by Judah on the north and Benjamin on the south.

c) The Five Tribes South of the Sacred Portion. 48:23-29.

Benjamin, Simeon, Issachar, Zebulon, and Gad are allotted sections of land running from east to west, reaching from the temple area to the south boundary of the land.

This allotment does not follow the original settlements of the tribes. The entire nation is here united west of the Jordan. Since the Temple must remain in Jerusalem, seven tribes are located north and five tribes south of it. The Leah and Rachel tribes are located closest to the Temple, while the Bilhah and Zilpah tribes are farthest away.

d) The New City of Jerusalem. 48:30-35.

30-34. The goings out of the city; i.e., the gates of the city. Each side of the city is 4,500 cubits in length, with three gates to a side, each named after a tribe of Israel. On the north are the gates of Reuben, Judah, and Levi (v. 31); on the east, the gates of Joseph, Benjamin, Dan (v. 32); on the south, the gates of Simeon, Issachar, and Zebulon (v. 33); and on the west, the gates of Gad, Asher, and Naphtali (v. 34). Note that Levi is reckoned as a tribe, and Joseph represents Ephraim and Manasseh. Cf. Rev 21:12-21; 7:5-8. 35a. It was round about eighteen thousand measures. The circumference of the city is 18,000 cubits. In Josephus' day, the circumference of the city of Jerusalem was thirty-three stadia, about four miles (Wars V. 4. 3).

35b. The name of the city, from the day that it exists again, shall be, The Lord is there (Yahweh shāmmâ). Cf. Rev 21:3.

DANIEL

INTRODUCTION

Name of the Book. In our English Bibles the title of this portion of Scripture is "The Book of Daniel." In the Hebrew Bible the title is simply, "Daniel," which, in accordance with the custom followed in the Major and Minor Prophets, is the name of the author of the book. As in several other books of prophecy (e.g., Jeremiah and Hosea), the author is also the chief actor in the events recorded. These Old Testament writings bear these names in the very earliest lists and references. Jesus referred to the prophecies of this book as "spoken of by Daniel the prophet" (Mt 24:15; Mk 13:14). Our Lord's testimony is not simply that the book was named after Daniel, but that its prophecies were spoken by him.

The name Daniel has been identified in literature of several other ancient languages – Akkadian, Sabaean, Palmyrene, Nabataean (J. A. Montgomery, A Critical and Exegetical Commentary on the Book of Daniel, ICC., p. 128), and in the Canaanite literature of Ras Shamra, where a hero named Daniel appears (Tale of Aqhat, ANET, 149-155).

Evangelical scholars usually identify the author of our book with the Daniel of Ezk 14:14,20; 28:3, where he is cited, along with Noah and Job, as an example of a righteous man. Those who deny the authenticity of Daniel claim that the Daniel of Ezekiel is "a figure of antique and cosmopolitan tradition, like the Noah-Utnapishtim of the flood story," etc. (Montgomery, ICC, p. 2). The Job and Noah of Ezekiel, however, are Biblical, not cosmopolitan, figures. We may therefore assume that the Daniel in Ezekiel is also the author of our book. (For the meaning of the name, see notes on Dan 1:6.)

Date and Authorship. Since the third century of the Christian Era the date and authorship of Daniel have been a battleground between those who accept the Bible's claims for itself and those who do not. So far as is now known, every Jew and Christian of early antiquity accepted the book as having been written in the Babylonian and Persian periods of the sixth century, in and near the city of Babylon, as the book claims. The New Testament, as well as several non-Biblical works, unquestioningly accepts the genuineness of the book. A Neo-Platonist philosopher, Porphyry (A.D. 233–304), in controversy with Christians, saw that the book accurately relates the story of events that took place between the fifth century and the early second century. Specifically, it tells of the advent of the Medo-Persian and Greek empires, and especially the details of the career of one Antiochus Epiphanes, king of Syria 175–163 B.C., in his conflict with the king of Egypt and with the Jews in Palestine. So Porphyry, denying that the book was written as claimed, asserted that it was written in Palestine by a Jew living in the time of Antiochus, and that what was written as prophecy was really history. He further claimed that the book is accurate as history down to Antiochus, but inaccurate after him. Eusebius of Caesarea, Apollinaris, Methodius, and most notably, Jerome, wrote answers to Porphyry (see Jerome's Commentary on Daniel, Prologue).

In modern times the rise of unbelief in church circles has brought about the resurrection of the arguments of both Porphyry and his opponents. As E. B. Pusey wrote, nearly a century ago: "Human inventiveness in things spiritual or unspiritual is very limited. It would be difficult probably to invent a new heresy. Objectors of old were as acute or more acute than those now; so that the ground was well-nigh exhausted" (Daniel the Prophet, p. iii).

The basic reason why some scholars deny the genuineness of Daniel is that they have previously rejected the possibility of predictive prophecy (see J.E.H. Thomson, Daniel in Pulpit Commentary, p. xliii). This, though usually left unstated, is sometimes frankly admitted (e.g., Robert H. Pfeiffer, Introduction to the Old Testament, p. 755). Arguments advanced in support of the negative view are chiefly these: (1) The author makes historical blunders. (2) The Hebrew and Aramaic of Daniel are of types much later than the sixth century. (3) Several terms used are Persian and Greek words that a Jewish author of the sixth century could not have known. (4) The position of the book in the third section (Writings or Hagiographa) of the Old Testament indicates late origin, after the prophetic canon was closed. (5) There is no external testimony to the existence of Daniel prior to the second century. (6) The theological ideas of the book are too advanced for the sixth century. (7) The stories are fanciful, unhistorical, and unreal. (8) Apocalyptic literature, of which Daniel is an example, did not arise until "well down in the Hellenistic period" (Montgomery, ICC, p. 80).

Arguments used by modern apologists in support of the genuineness of Daniel are these: (1) the prima facie evidence of the testimony of the book; (2) its reception into the canon, which witnesses to the fact that Jews of the pre-Christian centuries believed in its authenticity; (3) the uniform testimony of the New Testament, including our Lord's own expressed opinion; (4) ancient direct external testimony (including Ezk 14:14,20; 28:3; I Macc 2:59,60; and several passages in Josephus); (5) evidence of the influence of Daniel before 165 B.C.; (6) rebuttal of the negative arguments regarding the ideas and history of the book. These have found especially strong support from archaeology. Most of the historical objections have been silenced by Boutflower and Dougherty (Charles Boutflower, In and Around the Book of Daniel; R. H. Dougherty, Nabonidus and Belshazzar). Note particularly Montgomery's rather damaging admission (ICC, p. 72, 2nd full paragraph).

Structure of the Book. A superficial examination might yield a division of the book into two main parts, each having six subdivisions of a chapter each: chapters 1–6, the Histories of Daniel; chapters 7–12, the Prophecies of Daniel. As is usual with such neat outlines, however, this two-part division is more apparent than real. Chapters 10–12, in fact, constitute an important unit by themselves.

The true basis of division must be sought in the fact that Section 1:1–2:4 a is in Hebrew, Section 2:4 b–7:28 is in Aramaic (Syriac, Chaldee), and Section 8:1–12:13 is in Hebrew. This strange use of two languages, mysterious as it may be, is of divine intention and means something. Following C. A. Auberlen (The Prophecies of Daniel and the Revelation of St. John, 1857) and S. P. Tregelles (Remarks on the Prophetic Visions in the Book of Daniel, 1864) in seeing the shift in languages as the key to the thought structure – insofar as there is a structure –, we observe that the Book of Daniel carries a message of judgment and defeat for the Gentile world, of which the chief representatives at the time of the prophet were Nebuchadnezzar, Belshazzar, Darius, and Cyrus. The appropriate language in this Gentile-slanted portion (2:4 b–7:28) is Aramaic, the diplomatic and commercial language of the epoch. The book bears another message, one of hope and deliverance for God's oppressed but precious holy people, the Hebrews. For the Hebrew-slanted portion the language is, appropriately, Hebrew. This is not to say that Hebrews do not appear in chapters 2–7 nor Gentiles in chapters 8–12. It means only that the basic standpoint changes.

All of Daniel is a book of prophecy. This, from the Biblical standpoint, means merely that its author was a prophet (Mt 24:15; cf. Heb 1:1,2). Hence, while Biblical prophecy includes prediction, it is more than prediction. It may relate to events past, present, or future. It is always presented from a divinely given moral and spiritual point of view. So, the historical and hortatory portions are quite as prophetic as the predictive.

On these grounds the following analysis appears.

Historical Background. Ezekiel and Daniel were written in the Exile, a name customarily given to that period during which the Jews of the Judean kingdom were displaced from their country after the destruction of their temple, capital city, and commonwealth by Nebuchadnezzar. This destruction came in three stages: First, in 605 B.C. Nebuchadnezzar brought Jehoiakim to his knees and carried off hostages, among them Daniel and his three associates (Dan 1:1-6; see below on 1:1). Later, 597 B.C., on another expedition to Palestine, after certain rebellious acts of the Judean kings Jehoiakim and Jehoiachin made punishment necessary, Nebuchadnezzar again made Jerusalem submit. This time he carried off 10,000 captives, among them king Jehoiachin and the young prophet Ezekiel (Ezk 1:1-3; cf. II Chr 36:10; II Kgs 24:8-20). Finally, in 587 B.C., after a long siege, Nebuchadnezzar destroyed the city and the Temple and broke up the entire Jewish community (II Kgs 25:1-7; Jer 34:1-7; 39:1-7; 52:2-11).

Restoration to the land began in 538 B.C., when the victorious Cyrus, king of the new Medo-Persian empire and conqueror of Babylon, in harmony with a general policy of restoring displaced peoples to their lands, decreed that the Jews might return (II Chr 36:22,23; Ezr 1:1-4). Though some Jews remained in exile many years after permission was granted to return (indeed, a majority never returned as residents), the Exile as such, during which residence in Jerusalem by exiles was forbidden, lasted only about forty-eight years. The Temple, however, remained unrestored until about 515 B.C. (see Ezr 6:15), about seventy years after its destruction in 587. Jeremiah's prophecy of "seventy years," however, related to the period of servitude to Babylon (Jer 25:11) and included not only Judah but her neighbors. This was the period from 605 to 538, in round numbers, "seventy years" (cf. Dan 9:1,2, the date of which is 539/538 B.C.).

Many cultural and religious changes were thrust upon the Jews by their exile. Among these were the rise of synagogue worship in lieu of temple worship, and at least a beginning toward adoption of a second language — Aramaic (also called Syriac or Chaldee). A number of evidences lead to the conclusion that Abram's language was originally Aramaic. Biblical notices (Deut 26:5; Gen 31:47) show that the family from which Abram, Isaac, and Jacob sprang spoke Aramaic. Archaeological evidences (e.g., Moabite Stone, Ras Shamra tablets) demonstrate that the Canaanites spoke a language almost identical with Hebrew. So the Jews, ages earlier, even before the settlement in Canaan, had adopted "Canaanite," which, with minor evolution, became Hebrew. In Babylon they found Aramaic the language of commerce. It had also been the language of diplomacy for some time (cf. Isa 36:11,12). So, likely the Jews picked up the Aramaic, really very similar to Hebrew (although not identical with it by any means; see II Kgs 18:26) and were for some time bilingual. This circumstance apparently lies behind the fact that six chapters of Daniel are in Hebrew.

Form of Literature. Daniel is the first great book of Apocalypse. Though apocalypse is simply a Greek word meaning "unveiling" or "revelation" and is therefore quite properly a name for all of Scripture, especially the predictive portions, it is customary for theologians and exegetes now to apply it exclusively to a certain type of literature of which Daniel is the only Old Testament example and Revelation the only New Testament example. There are apocalyptical portions in other books (e.g., Zech 1:7—6:8), but no other Biblical books of Apocalypse. No conservative scholar could frame a definition of Apocalypse acceptable to the naturalistic temper of much present-day Biblical scholarship. For rationalists hold that falsely ascribed authorship and dates, as of the non-Biblical Jewish apocalyptic literature of the two centuries immediately before Christ, are of the essence of the Apocalyptic.

Those who view both Daniel and Revelation as authentic and truthful, hold Biblical Apocalyptic literature to be a form of predictive prophecy. It is distinguished chiefly by: (1) The employment of visions reported as seen (rather than digested and summarized, as with most prophecy). (2) Use of symbols predominantly as the vehicle of revelation — either interpreted (as the ram and goat of Dan 8), or left uninterpreted (as the woman clothed with the sun of Rev 12). (3) Prediction of the future of God's people (whether Israel or the Church) in relation to the nations of earth as consummated with the coming of Messiah. (4) Prose style rather than the poetic style characteristic of the other prophetic portions of the Old Testament.

Interpretation of Apocalypse. The special character of Apocalypse requires the best effort of the interpreter and his humble dependence on God. No special hermeneutical rules for dealing with Apolyptical literature have yet been successfully brought forth. Especially great care must be exercised that the rules for interpretation of non-Biblical apocalypse be not uncritically carried over into interpretation of Biblical Apocalypse. After all, only the inspired writings of Daniel and John are true Apocalypses. The others are false; and, however useful in supplying New Testament backgrounds or interesting in themselves to those who enjoy fanciful literature, they are still pseudepigrapha, i.e., spurious writings. They are all conscious imitations of true Apocalypse, of which Daniel is a shining Biblical model.

OUTLINE

Title: Prophecies of the Nations of the World and of Israel's Future in Relation to Them in the Plan of God.

I. The historical introduction. 1:1—2:4 a.
II. The nations of earth—their character, relations, succession, and destiny. 2:4 b—7:28.
  1. Nebuchadnezzar's dream of a great image: A prophecy of "the times of the Gentiles." 2:1-49.
  2. Nebuchadnezzar's trial of the confessors' faith: A lesson in steadfast faith. 3:1-30.
  3. Nebuchadnezzar's vision of the high tree: A lesson in humility. 4:1-37.
  4. Belshazzar's feast: A lesson in sin and its punishment. 5:1-31.
  5. Darius the Mede in the role of religious persecutor: A lesson in faith and prayer. 6:1-28.
  6. A vision of four beasts, the Ancient of Days, and the Son of man: The conflict of Christ with Antichrist. 7:1-28.
III. The Hebrew nation, its relation to Gentile dominion, and its future in the plan of God. 8:1—12:13.
  1. A ram, a goat, and a little horn: Israel in conflict with the Old Testament Antichrist. 8:1-27.
  2. The prophecy of seventy weeks: Israel's future in the plan of God. 9:1-27.
  3. Final vision: Israel through the centuries and at the consummation in the hands of enemies and in the hands of God. 10:1—12:13.

COMMENTARY

I. The Historical Introduction. 1:1—2:4 a.

In this section the chief personalities of the book are introduced, together with the circumstances that placed them in the positions they are later reported to have held.

A. The Setting of the Story and of the Book. 1:1-5.

1. In the third year of the reign of Jehoiakim. According to Jer 25:1, the fourth year of Jehoiakim was the first year of Nebuchadnezzar. Yet the Chaldean is called "king of Babylon" here in Jehoiakim's third year. This is a "prolepsis" (C. F. Keil, Biblical Commentary on the Book of Daniel) or "anticipation" (Rose, The Bible Commentary) whereby a later title is applied in speaking of a period even before it was actually conferred. A short while later Nebuchadnezzar's father, the king of Babylon, died, and Nebuchadnezzar, rushing home to Babylon ahead of his armies, received the throne (Jos Antiquities x. 11. 1.). Came Nebuchadnezzar. See Introduction, Historical Background. Whether the Hebrew bā' should be rendered "went" or "set off" (i.e., left Babylon), or "came," "arrived," is uncertain. Daniel's reportorial standpoint was Babylon; so "went" is possible. The Hebrew word is capable of either meaning. Until recently this verse was the only information available concerning this capture of Jerusalem, except for a brief report from Josephus. However, II Kgs 24:1, as well as II Chr 36:6,7, may possibly refer to it. In the absence of further proof it has become almost axiomatic among irreverent modern critics to deny that such an event ever occurred and to cite this as the author's first "historical blunder." As recently as February, 1956, the ancient documents were first published which now provide full historical support for Nebuchadnezzar's presence in Judah at exactly this time (see JBL, Dec. 1956, Vol. LXXV, Pt. IV, p. 277).

It is distressing to see this new data ignored by recent writers (see B. W. Anderson, Understanding the Old Testament, 1957, p. 355; N. K. Gottwald, A Light to the Nations, 1959, p. 618; John Bright, A History of Israel, 1959, p. 569). Believers, however, need not wait for archaeological confirmation to accept Daniel's word.

2. This is true interpretation of history. The Lord gave Jehoiakim. There is "no restraint to the Lord to save by many or by few" (I Sam 14:6). Nor is there restraint to destroy by many or by few. Later God's rule over history is made more emphatic (Dan 4:17). Nebuchadnezzar was God's "servant" (Jer 25:9). Similarly, God used the self-exalted dictators of the present century to chastise lands and peoples, and later he destroyed them (cf. Jer 25:12-14). As someone has quaintly said, their self-exalting exploits were hardly more than "exercise to keep them healthy for execution." Vessels of the house of God. How the nation's sins brought about gradual impoverishment of Solomon's magnificent temple is seen in I Kgs 14:25,26; II Kgs 14:8-14; 16:8; 18:13-16; 24:8-13; Jer 27:16-22; 52:17-23. For the desecration of temple vessels, see Dan 5; and for their return to Jerusalem, see Ezr 1:7-11.

3. Master of his eunuchs. Eunuch (Heb. sarîs), a castrated male. For obvious reasons eunuchs were frequently in charge of royal harems. Sometimes the word, by metaphor, was used simply of an official. There is great possibility that Daniel and his friends may have been emasculated. Again see Isaiah's ominous prediction (II Kgs 20:18). Of the children of Israel (Heb. Mib-bᵉnê yiś-rā-'ēl, lit., out from the sons of Israel). These were originally all the descendants of Jacob or Israel. Later, Israel was a name for the ten tribes, so-called, who fell away to Jeroboam (I Kgs 11:13; cf. 12:19). But after the destruction of the "Northern Kingdom," the name Israel reverted to its primitive sense. And of the king's seed (lit., seed of the kingdom). This refers to the family of David (cf. Isa 7:2,13). For a sample of the spiritual degeneracy of certain of the members of the royal line at about this time, see II Kgs 25:25; Jer 41:1 ff. And of the princes. The word princes (Heb. partᵉmîm) is a Persian term apparently cognate with words for important people in several Indo-European languages. It may have been in common courtly use. This refers to important families not of the Davidic house. The sense of the three terms, Israel . . . king's seed . . . nobles, is that selection was to be made of Hebrews, both of royal and of other courtly families.

4. Children in whom was no blemish. This is the first of a series of qualifications set up for selecting men to be trained in the court of Babylon. Children. Hebrew yᵉlādîm is a word like our own, of indefinite meaning, depending on the age standpoint of the speaker. In an objective report like this, the common estimate of fourteen or fifteen years of age is likely right. Absence of blemish does not eliminate the possibility of their castration. As selected, they would naturally have been without that mutilation. Well favoured, i.e., good looking. That which the king would look upon ought to be without deformity and very beautiful. The same combination of words is used of the beauty of Rachel (Gen 24:16; 26:7), Bath-sheba (II Sam 11:3), Queen Vashti (Est 1:11), and Esther (Est 2:2,3,7). Skilful in all wisdom, and cunning in knowledge, and understanding science. These three cumulative expressions emphasize native ability and previous instruction. The redundancy of the Hebrew idiom is for emphasis rather than for fine distinctions. This is what the youths already were rather than what they were to become. Usually, intellectual ability is an "early bloomer." Ability in them to stand in the king's palace. Natural and acquired talents that would enable these men to stand in attendance before a splendid king in a magnificent building are signified. The boys needed to be humble but neither timid nor dull.

Whom they might teach the learning and the tongue of the Chaldeans. The learning (Heb. book) of the Chaldeans means the literature of the people of lower Mesopotamia. Since the archaeological discoveries of the past century have uncovered and furnished the key to translation of that literature, we know how vast was the learning of the Chaldeans. Recent discoveries in the Near Eastern-Aegean regions demonstrate that a large amount of cultural exchange took place between the two areas. And the Philistine neighbors of Israel were apparently of "Greek" stock. With them, the Book of Judges shows, there was cultural exchange. (See G. Bonfante, "Who Were the Philistines?" American Journal of Archaeology, I, 2 (April–June, 1946), pp. 251-262.) The tongue (language) of the Chaldeans must refer to the Akkadian (Babylonian, Assyrian) language of the day. Chaldeans here appears to be used in a broad sense, to designate the inhabitants of the region of Chaldea, which in its widest significance was the whole of Babylonia. The several languages of the region, including the very ancient ritual language, were written on clay in wedge-shaped (cuneiform) characters. This was an ideographic and syllabic system, far different from the alphabetic writing inscribed on papyrus with pen and ink to which the people of Palestine and Syria were accustomed. The foundations of astronomy, mathematics, law, and a dozen other disciplines were recorded in that ancient cuneiform script, together with a lot of magical humbug. If all this learning was to be taught these youths, then three years (cf. v. 5) was none too long for their education.

5. A daily provision of the king's meat, and of the wine which he drank. Neither dainties (ASV) nor rich food (RSV) is any improvement on the AV meat. The word so rendered (patbag) is a loan to Hebrew from Old Persian, meaning "appropriation" or "allowance" (Montgomery, ICC, pp. 122-124). It has reference to the fact that these youths were put on government support, sharing with others of the king's official ménage'. There is not even a hint in the Hebrew text that there was anything physically or morally harmful in the food and drink. Wine was quite common to the Jewish diet (see Ps 104:15; Isa 55:1; Neh 5:18, where the same word yayin is used). Many injunctions against excessive use of wine, however, do appear in the OT (Prov 20:1; 23:20,30,31); and certain religious orders were forbidden the use of wine (Num 6:1-20; Jud 13:1-7; Jer 35:1-14). Priests were forbidden use of wine immediately previous to service in the Temple (Lev 10:1-9), and kings were discouraged from drinking it (Prov 31:4,5).

B. The Identity of the Chief Character of the Story and His Associates. 1:5-7. Daniel, introduced by name, is the one who throughout the book not only reports events but is himself the subject of most of the narrative in several capacities: interpreter of dreams (chs. 2; 4; 5), friend of sufferers (ch. 3), receptor of revelatory visions and dreams from God (chs. 6–12). In several incidents three Jewish friends are associated with him. Here all are introduced by name. The changing of the names of the youths is very significant. Their education in the highest pagan culture history had yet produced was to be completed by the substitution of names honoring the vile deities of Babylon for those honoring the Holy One of Israel. They were to be weaned from the old religion and culture, and transformed completely, even to identity, into Babylonians. For among the ancients a man's name was even more a part of his identity and character than it is among moderns.

7. For he gave unto Daniel the name of Belteshazzar. Daniel means in Hebrew, God's prince (or judge), whereas the new name Belteshazzar, in the language of Babylon, means Bel's prince. This name, Belteshazzar (a variant of the name of King Belshazzar, ch. 5), honors one of the chief deities of Babylon (see Isa 46:1; Jer 50:2; 51:44). Hananiah means mercy of Yahweh (being a variation of the original of the beloved name, John), whereas Shadrach, possibly meaning "command of Aku," the moon-god (HDB), may be a somewhat disguised form of Marduk (Montgomery, ICC, p. 123), a chief god of Babylon. Mishael almost certainly means, Who is what God is? whereas Meshach (according to competent authority, Fred. Delitzsch) means, Who is like Aku? This is regrettably uncertain inasmuch as the name appears nowhere else and its derivation is uncertain. Azariah means Whom Yahweh helps, or Yahweh will help, whereas Abed-nego most likely means Servant of Nebo.

"A custom . . . of imposing new names when persons entered upon a new condition or new relations in life," Moses Stuart points out, "is extensively developed in the OT: see Abram and Abraham, Gen 17:5; Joseph and Zaphnath-Paaneah, Gen 41:45; comp. II Sam 12:24,25; II Kgs 23:34; 24:17; also Est 2:7; Ezr 5:14 comp. with Hag 1:14; 2:2,21. So in NT: Mk 3:16,17. These names, thus imposed anew, generally designate something which is intended to honor the persons who receive them, or to honor the god that is worshipped by him who imposes them, or to commemorate some event that is interesting, etc." (A Commentary on the Book of Daniel, p. 9). Extensive discussion of these names will be found in Bible encyclopedias and dictionaries, as well as in Hebrew lexicons.

C. Events Placing the Author in Prominence. 1:8–2:4 a. A Crisis of Righteousness. This is described above in verse 5. Verses 6 and 7 intervene to identify Daniel and his friends.

8 a. A Decision for Righteousness. Daniel purposed in his heart. Native intelligence and courtly ability were matched in this man by steadfast loyalty to principle. That he would not defile himself. The defilement (cf. on v. 5) had nothing to do with any harmful elements in the food and drink. It was rather that it was "the king's." The word for defile (gā'al, a late Heb. word) may mean physical defilement (Isa 63:3, "stain"), moral defilement (Zeph 3:1), or, more frequently, ceremonial defilement (e.g., Ezr 2:62; cf. Neh 7:64). On the relation of food and drink to moral defilement, see Mt 15:11. While commending moderation, the Bible nowhere commands abstinence from any food or beverage on moral grounds; the problem was ceremonial or religious. Religion affected all of life for the ancients, as it does for primitive people today—and as it should for all men. Even eating and drinking had ritual and mystic significance. Slaughtering was a religious act to be carried out with proper solemnities. Flesh from the king's table was doubtless slain according to pagan ritual and offered to a god. The Jews were forbidden to eat flesh sacrificed to a pagan god (see Ex 34:15), for it was "serving other gods" in the public eye. Jews faced this problem whenever they ate out of the homeland (Hos 9:3,4; Ezk 4:13,14). A similar situation prevailed with regard to the wine. A further problem was that Levitical procedures were not regarded; i.e., the king's food and drink were not "kosher" (see Lev 3:17; 6:26; 17:10-14; 19:26).

8 b-14. A Procedure for Righteousness. 8 b. Therefore he requested, etc. In case of necessity to sustain life, the ceremonial laws might be set aside (Mt 12:3-5; I Sam 21:6; Num 28:8,9). It was because Daniel had the discernment to recognize the king's purpose in these things to wean him from his holy faith that he resolved not to yield without a battle. He "simply determined . . . by his very food perpetually to recall the remembrance of his country. He wished so to live in Chaldea as to consider himself an exile and a captive, sprung from the sacred family of Abraham" (Calvin, Commentaries on the Book of Daniel the Prophet, in loco.) The word for requested (biqēsh, "seek") cannot be used of mild entreaty. Being a piel (or intensive active) form, it is always a forceful word (used at II Sam 2:17; 12:16).

9. Now God had brought. The AV gives the impression that Daniel had previously won the favor of the chief eunuch. The sense of the Hebrew is most naturally rendered as consecutive; i.e., Daniel made request, and thereupon God gave him favor in the eyes of the chief eunuch. Observe that good motives and admirable sentiments are not absent from heathen hearts (cf. Josh 2:1ff.; contrast Prov 12:10; see Gal 5:22). God raises up defenders for his people in strange ways. 10. One is reminded of the butler and baker of Joseph's acquaintance (Gen 40). It appears that, though the chief eunuch was willing to help Daniel, he saw no means whereby to do it (see Jas 2:14-18).

11. Melzar. It is not a proper name, rather the steward. Hebrew names do not normally carry the article. Over Daniel, Hananiah, Mishael, and Azariah. Guided by the Holy Spirit's own point of view, the author does not deign to recognize the new names honoring the pagan gods of Babylon conferred by a timeserving heathen bureaucrat but rather uses the God-honoring names conferred by four pious Jewish mothers.

12. Prove thy servants, I beseech thee, ten days. The word prove (nā-sâ) is an intensive (piel) and joined with the cohortative na' expresses strong entreaty. For Daniel and his friends as well as for the steward the ten-day limit was a test of God's will. If the experiment failed, the young Hebrews were prepared to override their own ceremonial scruples, as the next verse shows. There is no evidence that Daniel knew what the outcome would be. No presumption was involved, as Young supposes (Edward J. Young, The Prophecy of Daniel, in loco), for a number of approved examples of such tests are furnished by Scripture. Ten days. A favorite round number (1:20; cf. Amos 5:3; Zech 8:23). Pulse to eat (lit., from the zērō'îm and we shall eat). Though used only here and in 1:16 in the entire Bible, and nowhere in other known literature, the word apparently means vegetables, for it is derived from a word meaning "to sow" (seed). So pulse was things grown from seeds planted in soil. No religious ritual of dedication to a god was directly involved in the preparation of vegetables, as it was in the preparation of flesh; and vegetables were not used in pagan ritual as were libations of wine. This is not a proof text for vegetarianism (see Rom 14:1-4).

14. So he consented in this matter. The Hebrew indicates that he gave exact heed to Daniel. 15,16. Rewards of Righteousness. The test was successful, and so Daniel and his friends were spared the embarrassment and emotional tension that offense against their own standards would have caused them.

17. As for these four children. Better, the lads, four of them. This emphasizes that all four received certain things, whereas Daniel had special endowments besides. God gave. All abilities and endowments, whether natural or acquired, are from him and are to be used for him. Knowledge. Hebrew maddā', a rare and late word. Though related to the ordinary verb "to know," it appears to mean "thought," in the sense of secret rational process, as its use in Eccl 10:12 clearly indicates. Perhaps "soundness of mind" or "good sense" conveys the idea. Skill. From haśkel (a hiph. inf. abs.), apparently meaning "insight" or "understanding." Learning. Hebrew sēper, usually meaning "book," but here, as in 1:4, designating the world of letters, literature. And wisdom. Hebrew ḥakmâ. Though often designating the proverbial lore of the ancient Near East, it has the larger meaning of any "intelligently arranged body of principles," or, as we should now say, "science" (S. R. Driver, Daniel, in Cambridge Bible for Schools and Colleges). Note that the word "all" qualifies this wisdom, showing that it was more than the superstitious lore of the pagan priests that was in mind. Researchers have shown that, in addition to astronomy (an adjunct of pagan worship), architecture, linguistics, agriculture, meteorology, agronomy, and many other sciences were already developed in the land of the two rivers. Daniel had understanding in all visions and dreams, or better, in every kind of vision and in dreams. This is merely pointing out, ahead of the following narrative, the prominence of Daniel as agent of God's revelation.

19. And the king communed with them; and among them all . . . The entire group, including many besides our special four, had participated in the three years of training, and all had been presented to Nebuchadnezzar. The question is irresistible: What happened to the other young Jews' training in true religion? It is obvious that it "went down the drain" of compromise and apostasy. None like Daniel . . . therefore stood they before the king. "The king, by his own personal examination, fixed upon the very individuals whom Providence had distinguished by peculiar gifts which rendered them superior to the other children" (Stuart, Commentary).

20. Ten times better than all the magicians. "Probably . . . men acquainted with occult arts in general" (Driver). The obscure word ḥartummîm, used also in 2:2,10,27; 4:7,9; 5:11, is thought by authorities to be of Egyptian origin. Outside the book of Daniel it is used only of Egyptian "magicians" (Gen 41:8,24; Ex 7:11,22; 8:7,18,19; 9:11). Some suggest that the word, apparently derived from ḥeret, "a stylus," should be rendered scribes, i.e., scribes of the ancient religious ritual texts in the archaic tongue of earlier inhabitants of Babylonia, a language unknown to common people in Daniel's time. (And) astrologers. There is no conjunction in the Hebrew; so astrologers is used appositively. This is a Babylonian word, found in both the Hebrew and the Aramaic portions of Daniel but nowhere else in Scripture. It is better rendered enchanters, or charmers. These words show what superstitious humbug vitiated knowledge of scientific truth in Babylon.

21. Unto the first year of king Cyrus. A contradiction with 10:1 has frequently been imagined. It is most likely that since the epoch of captivity officially came to an end with the first year of Cyrus (cf. Ezr 1:1ff.), the verse is pointing up the striking fact that the young man Daniel, who was in the first detachment of Jews taken captive from Jerusalem to Babylon (605 B.C.) outlived the long dreary epoch of captivity to see the first detachment of exiles return. This is the most natural understanding of the verse.

In language and first significance, Dan 2:1-4a, which follows, belongs with chapter 1; for these verses are a part of the introduction to the book. Here the reader is admitted to knowledge of the precise situation that brought Daniel into prominence in Babylon. These verses also serve as prologue to the dramatic prophetic narrative of chapter 2. They are, therefore, treated in this latter connection in the Commentary.

A few remarks on the practical meaning of chapter 1 should not be omitted. For the instruction of a hundred generations, this story presents the elements of moral heroism. (1) Discernment. The four lads saw precisely what was wrong with eating the prescribed food. Where did they learn it? From pious parents (Deut 6:4-9). (2) Resistance to evil. Distance from critical observation did not weaken it (see Mt 10:26-28; Jas 4:7). This resistance to evil also developed in their very early years in godly homes. Children do not naturally resist evil; rather they embrace it. They must be taught to hate evil! (see Heb 12: 9-13; Prov 3:11,12; 13:24; cf. Eli's sons, I Sam 2:12-30) (3) Power to voice disagreement. Youth is an age of conformity. Hence this incident gives strong evidence of special grace in the lives of these four. (4) Physical courage. The prince of the eunuchs was right. His head as well as theirs could have been in danger (cf. Dan 2:5, the lions' den, the fiery furnace.) (5) Perseverance. When no help came via the chief eunuch, Daniel tried the steward. (6) Determination. His purpose was "in his heart," the very center of his being. It was not a shallow purpose. (7) Meekness. Without mock heroics Daniel respectfully "requested" or "besought" his superiors. (8) Good sense. The trial suggested was reasonable and feasible. (See also Ezk 28:3; Prov 2:23 in context.)

II. The Nations of Earth—Their Character, Relations, Succession, and Destiny. 2:4b–7:28.

A. Nebuchadnezzar's Dream of a Great Image: A Prophecy of the Times of the Gentiles. 2:1-49. (For inclusion of 2:1-4a herein, see note following treatment of 1:21).

In this portion Nebuchadnezzar is reported to have experienced a frightening dream (v. 1), which is used as a means of testing the ability and willingness of his occult advisers (vv. 2-6). The failure of the main group of "wise men" to reproduce and interpret the dream endangers the lives of all the wise men, including the four Hebrews (vv. 7-12). But Daniel, supported by the successful intercession of himself and his friends, reproduces the dream (vv. 13-23). He reports the dream to Nebuchadnezzar (vv. 24-35) and provides a divine interpretation (vv. 36-45). For reward Daniel is made "ruler" over the province of Babylon, whereupon he secures advancement for his three associates (vv. 46-49). The interpretation of the dream provides the reader with a sketch of the succession of world kingdoms from Nebuchadnezzar's time down to the final outward establishment of Christ's kingdom at his second coming. (For discussion of variant views of this chapter, see note at end of chapter.)

1) Nebuchadnezzar's Frightening Dream. 2:1.

1. In the second year of the reign of Nebuchadnezzar. An apparent contradiction with data of chapter 1 is involved. Nebuchadnezzar is called "king" at the time of the capture of Jerusalem (1:1). Yet after the passing of at least three years (1:5,18), when Daniel is called before Nebuchadnezzar in this chapter, the king is in his second year. Any one of several possible explanations is available. None of them is certainly correct, though several are adequate to account for the facts. It is certain that a truly great writer like the author of Daniel would not have fallen into gross discrepancy. His first readers understood. There is, of course, the possibility of textual corruption, not uncommon with numbers in the OT (Montgomery, ICC, reports several suggestions). Some suggest a different beginning of the epoch than that referred to at 1:1—his reign over the whole empire, or after the sacking of Egypt, etc.

Most recent scholarship takes the apparent discrepancy as a simple matter growing out of Hebrew or Babylonian methods of counting regnal years. Among suggestions of this sort Driver's view (endorsed by Young) is good: "There is not, perhaps, necessarily a contradiction here with the 'three years' of i, 5,18. By Heb. usage, fractions of time were reckoned as full units. Thus Samaria, which was besieged from the fourth to the sixth year of Hezekiah, is said to have been taken 'at the end' of three years (II Kgs xviii. 9,10) and in Jer xxxiv. 14 'at the end of seven years' means evidently when the seventh year has arrived (see also Mk 8:31, etc.). If, now, the author, following a custom which was certainly sometimes adopted by Jewish writers, and which was general in Assyria and Babylonia, 'post-dated' the regnal years of a king, i.e., counted as his first year not the year of his accession but the first full year afterwards, and if further Nebuchadnezzar gave orders for the education of the Jewish youths in his accession-year, the end of the 'three years' . . . might be reckoned as falling within the king's second year" (Driver, Daniel, CBSC, p. 17). As with most difficulties of this sort, the solution will almost always be resolved once the author's point of view and manner of using words have been ascertained.

Dreamed dreams, wherewith his spirit was troubled, and his sleep brake from him. Nebuchadnezzar was no trembling neurotic easily upset, like a juvenile, by vague impressions. This verse is only the first of several pieces of evidence that the AV is incorrect in suggesting that Nebuchadnezzar had forgotten the dream (v. 5). He was scared precisely because he had not forgotten it.

2) The Test by Means of the Dream. 2:2-6.

2. The magicians, and the astrologers, and the sorcerers, and the Chaldeans. On magicians and astrologers, see notes on 1:20. Sorcerers. Hebrew m'kash-sh'pîm. Possibly from a Semitic root meaning "to cut"; hence to chop up elements in magical potions, formulae. Hence Greek pharmakoi, i.e., pharmacists. Recent scholarship prefers a complementary idea of "incantor of magical sayings, sorcerer." The same root appears in Akkadian for sorcerers or witches. The practice of sorcery is proscribed in the OT (Ex 22:18 [Heb. Bible v. 17, female witch], Deut 18:10; Isa 47:9). Chaldeans. Not used in the broad ethnogeographical sense of 1:4 but in the narrow professional sense, indicating the priestly class of Babylonian religion. Though used in this sense only in Daniel among Biblical books, it was commonly so used by classical writers, of whom the earliest is Herodotus (Histories I, 181, c. 440 B.C.; see Driver, op. cit., pp. 12-16 and Young, op.cit., pp. 271-273). Most authorities agree that the four terms are not used precisely but rather distributively to include all classes of royal counselors.

4. Chaldeans. Here, all classes of wise men. In Syriack. Rather, Aramaic, the language of a Semitic people concentrated in those days chiefly in Upper Mesopotamia and Syria. They are the Syrians of the OT. The idea is not that the Chaldeans spoke Aramaic but that, beginning here, the following portion of Daniel is in Aramaic. Compare the phrase, "in Aramaic," of Ezr 4:7 (see RSV note).

5. The thing is gone from me: if ye will not make known, etc. Gone from me is from a rare word of Persian origin, now generally acknowledged to be an adjective rather than a verb, and meaning "sure," or "certain." Thing. Better, word. "Words" (v. 9) is a translation of the same word. So translate, the word is certain with me, if ye will not, etc. The rendering of the ASV is correct here.

The king had not forgotten the dream, but rather, since he did remember it, he reasoned that his wise men, if able to predict the future by interpreting dreams, ought to be able to perform the lesser task of reconstructing the past, i.e., the king's private dream. This interpretation of the passage finds support not only in the king's fright (cf. comments on v. 1) and in the revised translation of 2:5, but also in the fact that the wise men did not fabricate something by way of a "dream" for the king when they saw that their lives were threatened. It would have been worth a try! In all likelihood it was precisely because they knew the king remembered his dream that they made no such attempt (see also on v. 8 below).

3) The Failure of the Wise Men. 2:7-12.

8. Ye would gain the time. Not that they were merely buying delay of the fatal moment of their execution (Driver, et al.), or trying to gain an interval in which to think up some way out (H. C. Leupold [Exposition of Daniel], et al.); but rather, in the sense of the primitive meaning of 'idānā', "time," a specified time is meant (cf. BDB). Interpretation of dreams was held to be related to the positions of heavenly bodies. When that particular arrangement of the Zodiac that affected that dream had elapsed, they could claim that divining was impossible (Thomson, Pulpit Commentary, et al.).

10. The complaint that the king was unjust in his demand has a sound of justice. But when it is recalled what a gigantic hoax the whole hocus-pocus of ancient astrology, divining, soothsaying, etc., really was, the king's decree, while excessively harsh, in that it included their "houses" (families? v. 5), was not unjust as regards the "wise men" themselves. They claimed occult powers and were frauds, granting a good bit of sincere self-deception. God holds men responsible for willful ignorance (cf. Rom 1:28). 11. The gods, whose dwelling is not with flesh. The comma after gods makes the following clause non-restrictive, that is applicable to all gods. If the comma is omitted, the clause is read as restrictive, i.e., applying only to a certain class of gods. Perhaps it is best to omit the comma and understand the wise men as claiming to have communication in their "flesh" with certain gods of the pantheon but none with the greatest ones (Marduk), who were able to control or reveal the future.

13. The fact that Daniel and his fellows shared in the decrees of destruction shows that they were included as official advisers. Was it because of the Chaldeans' pride that the Hebrews were not consulted earlier? Or, was it supposed that the youth of the exiles did not allow them any knowledge not common to their elder professional associates?

4) Miraculous Success Through Intercession by Daniel and His Friends. 2:13-23.

Herein Daniel's wisdom and piety are thrown into prominence. The same strength of character demonstrated in chapter 1 is raised a step higher. The value of concerted, importunate prayer in the face of imminent personal danger is both approved and exemplified. Daniel's prayer of thanksgiving (2:20-23) is a timeless model, one of a pair of model prayers in the book (see also 9:3-19; cf. 6:9-11; 10:2-12).

5) The Divinely Reconstructed Dream. 2:24-35.

25. I have found a man. It appears that Arioch was another timeserving bureaucrat who was willing to claim credit for goods he had no part in providing.

28. What shall be in the latter days. This is the scope of the prophecy to be revealed by the dream and its interpretation. It is a mistake to restrict this to the end time. A phrase out of the general prophetic literature, it refers to the future as developing and consummated in the Messianic era. See Isa 2:2; Mic 4:1; Gen 49:1ff. (in context), and Jer 48:47. Because it includes both advents of Christ, as well as the epoch between them, it involves the present age. The inquiring student will be satisfied on this point by comparing Acts 2:17 with Joel 2:28, and Jn 5:18 with Heb 1:1,2.

29. What should come to pass hereafter (lit., what should be that after this). Hereafter ('ahᵉrê dᵉnâ) has no reference to life after death, nor to the future in general. But, rather, like the equivalent Greek expression, meta tauta, or meta touto (Rev 4:1; 7:1), it refers to the future as subsequent to some previously mentioned item in the context. Here that item appears to be the king's thoughts about his own kingdom and its future. Hence, in a sense, the meaning of the dream is limited to what the king could understand. The "thing" which should be "after this" is world dominion in its political aspect. We should expect truth of an external political sort here in this chapter, for God is making truth known on the level of a pagan king's understanding ("maketh known to . . . Nebuchadnezzar," Dan 2:28; "maketh known to thee," v. 29; "that thou mightest know the thoughts of thy heart," v. 30). Any spiritualizing of the message in the direction of the NT church or "spiritual Israel" is clearly out of place here.

The description of the dream and the account of the actions involved are treated in the commentary along with the interpretation of the dream, which follows.

6) The Divine Interpretation of the Dream. 2:36-45.

The dream had been of an impressive, glittering, frightening metallic image in the form of a man.

a) The Head of Gold (vv. 36-38; cf. v. 32).

37. A king of kings. A title customarily applied to Medo-Persian and Babylonian emperors, found not only in the Greek classics but in the records of the countries involved and in Scripture (Ezk 26:7; Ezr 7:12), granted that most of the literature involved is later than the sixth century.

38. And wheresoever the children of men dwell . . . hath he given into thine hand, and hath made thee ruler over them all. Nebuchadnezzar's power is ascribed to divine providence (cf. Jer 25:9; 27:5,6; 28:14; Dan 12:1). The manner of expression may be hyperbolical, for Nebuchadnezzar was not a universal ruler. It is possible, however, that the reference is to a universal divine grant which Nebuchadnezzar never exercised himself to possess. Thou art this head of gold. See Isa 14:4.

b) The Breast and Arms of Silver (v. 39a; cf. v. 32).

39a. And after thee shall arise another kingdom inferior to thee. The breast and arms of silver represent the kingdom known to history and Scripture as the kingdom of "the Medes and Persians" (see Dan 5:28, 31; cf. 6:8). It replaced Babylon in 539 B.C. (cf. ch. 5). The duality of the kingdom is obviously represented by the duality of the breasts and arms.

c) The Belly and Thighs (buttocks) of Brass (v. 39b; cf. v. 32).

39b. And another third kingdom of brass, which shall bear rule over all the earth. History and Scripture agree that this was the Greek (Macedonian) empire of Alexander and his successors. This interpretation is established by Dan 8:20,21. This kingdom replaced that of the Medes and Persians when Alexander in a series of advances, beginning in 334 B.C., overcame the Medes and Persians.

d) The Fourth Kingdom of Iron (vv. 40-43; cf. v. 33). Though divided into legs of iron, and feet and toes of iron mixed with clay, it is one kingdom. It is the form of world dominion known to Bible and history as Rome, and which, through the progressive Westernization of mankind, appears to prevail to the present day. It is referred to historically first (chronologically) at Lk 2:1.

40. Strong as iron. Of all the four metals this is strongest. Considered in the context of its own time, none of the three previous kingdoms was as strong as Rome. And to the present hour government tends more and more to exercise control over every area of human activity. This is a necessary accompaniment of the progressive industrialization of society. Breaketh in pieces. Rome fragmented and reassembled—socially, culturally, and politically—all the peoples, institutions, etc., it took over. The only notable exception was Christianity itself as a spiritual movement (albeit truly Romanized in the perversion of the Roman Church). And subdueth all. "The empire of the Romans filled the world, and when the empire fell into the hands of a single person, the world became a safe and dreary prison for his enemies. To resist was fatal and it was impossible to fly" (Gibbon). Some see in the two legs a prophecy of the division of the empire into two empires, with capitals at Rome and Constantinople.

41. The kingdom shall be divided. The word p'lî-ga, though cognate with a common Hebrew verb meaning "to divide," occurs only here in the OT. Young's suggestion, following Buxtorf, that it be rendered "composite" is good, and seems consistent with the meaning of the prevalent Semitic root.

42,43. In its final stage, this kingdom will be brittle and easily shattered. This is owing to the mixture (in symbol) of the clay with the iron. They shall mingle themselves. This clause, a single reflexive participle in the Aramaic, apparently means the clay and iron (as grammatic agreement suggests). I take this to mean that "the seed of men," i.e., common humanity, shall intrude into government en masse. The Roman government became a rule of the mob. If modern history is forecast here, the suggestion of the dictatorship of the common man, in socialism, is almost irresistible.

e) The Messianic Kingdom of the Stone (vv. 44,45; cf. 34,35). Interpreters of all schools—reverent Christian, Jewish, rationalistic-unbelieving—agree that this refers to the Messianic kingdom. The grammatical meaning of the verses is not obscure. Disagreement about interpretation is rooted in the varying points of view with which readers approach the passage. Cognizance should be taken here of the two main views held by evangelical Christians. Those who identify Messiah's kingdom wholly with the Church (mainly postmillennialists and amillennialists) see the fulfillment of this prophecy in Christ's first advent. Those who, while recognizing in the Church an aspect of Christ's kingdom (Col 1:13; Jn 3:3; Acts 1:3; 20:25; I Pet 2:9), expect it to be manifested finally on earth only at the Second Advent (chiliasts, premillennialists), see the fulfillment in both advents. They call attention to the fact that the prophecy is of external political dominion as revealed to the mind of a pagan king (cf. Dan 2:29, 30 and comments), and so refer the prophecy to the Second Advent and the establishment of a "millennium" (cf. Rev 20).

The chief reasons advanced in support of this view are as follows. (1) The prophecy relates to the political fortunes of important empires of history. The fifth kingdom (Messianic) of this series is apparently no different in this respect from the others. Yet the Church (unless one takes a Roman Catholic point of view), is no political establishment. The Millennium has such a political aspect. (2) According to the dream and its interpretation, the destruction of the fourth kingdom by Messiah is sudden, violent, catastrophic. Just such a destruction is frequently assigned to the inauguration of Messiah's Millennial kingdom (see Rev 19:11 ff.). Insofar as the Church has gained any victory over this present world, it has been in a far different manner. (3) This passage predicts the complete victory of Messiah's kingdom over the kingdoms of the world. Just such a complete victory is assigned to the Millennium (e.g., Rev 19; 20; Isa 2). The Church has not conquered the world and will not do so (Mt 13:24-30, 36-43, II Tim 3:1 ff.). The present age is to end in great apostasy rather than in the victory of the Church (II Thess 2).

7) Reward and Promotion for Daniel and His Friends. 2:46-49.

48. Ruler over the . . . province of Babylon. This province, evidently including the city and its environs, was apparently not a large territory. Perhaps it was the same as the "realm of the Chaldeans" (9:1). Chief of the governors over all the wise men of Babylon. "What the particular duties of this office were, we do not know. That Daniel so managed them as to keep clear of divination by sorcery or astrology, and the performance of heathen rites, would seem to be implied by the account of his demeanor which is given in the book of Daniel" (Stuart Comm.). 49. The gate of the king. Cf. Est 2:19,21. An important position of nearest access to the king. There are many ancient and modern examples of such titles for Oriental courtiers. Perhaps the word gate should be rendered court (cf. BDB).

B. Nebuchadnezzar's Trial of the Confessors' Faith: A Lesson in Steadfast Faith. 3:1-30.

Everything in Daniel 3 suggests clearly that the main purpose of this chapter is directly practical rather than doctrinal. There are no predictions. The narrative simply reports the fortunes of the three friends of Daniel as steadfast confessors of faith (Daniel does not figure in the chapter at all). Hebrews 11:34 cites the story as a lesson in faith. The main incident is the subject of a spurious expansion in an Apocryphal book known as The Song of the Three Hebrew Children.

The actors in the 'drama' are familiar, all having been previously introduced: Nebuchadnezzar (Dan 3:1; cf. 1:1; 2:1); the Chaldeans (3:8; cf. 2:2); the "three Hebrew children" (3:12 ff.; cf. 1:6,7; 2:17,49). Why Daniel was not found in civil disobedience as the three were is best explained by the conjecture that he was absent from the city on some official errand.

In harmony with the didactic character of this narrative chapter, a homiletical outline, rather than an analytical one, is suggested. The actions herein set forth are: (1) the opposition to faith (v. 1; cf. v. 8); (2) the temptation of faith (vv. 2-15); (3) the demonstration of faith (vv. 16-18); (4) the salvation by faith (vv. 19-30).

1) The Opposition to Faith. 3:1 (cf. v. 8). The occasion was the erection of an idolatrous image. The dimensions furnished in ratio, $60 \times 6 = 10 \times 1$, suggest an image set on a pedestal. As to the location of Dura, though there are at least three places of that name reported by scholars, only one was in the environs of the city. The image may have been dedicated to some Babylonian deity, though verses 12,14,18 seem to rule this out. Montgomery and Keil argue that it was a symbol of Nebuchadnezzar's empire. The charge of treason (v. 12) supports this. Seiss (Joseph A. Seiss, Voices from Babylon) thought it might have been a symbol of Jehovah, since Nebuchadnezzar had seemed to confess His supremacy (2:47,48). There are precedents for Jehovah images (Ex 32; I Kgs 12:25-33; cf. Acts 17:23), but it seems unlikely that this was one. The persons who led the attack (Dan 3:8) were of all people those who should have befriended these Hebrews, since they owed their lives to them. But like all wicked men, they were the opponents of true service of God (cf. Prov 29:25; Mt 10:16-39, esp. v. 28).

2) The Temptation of Faith. 3:2-15. The temptation was first to perversion of faith. Idolatry is essentially perversion of a proper appetite to see God (Jn 14:6). But faith must always be in the "invisible One" only late in time "made flesh" (see Rom 1:23; I Jn 5:21; Acts 17:29; Ex 20:4-6). The temptation was, secondly, to compromise their faith. Advancement in their profession appeared to depend on their conforming to idolatry while artfully concealing their rejection of it (cf. II Kgs 5:15-19). Verse 14 suggests also temptation to concealment of faith.

3. The princes, the governors, and captains, the judges, the treasurers, the counsellors, the sheriffs, and all the rulers of the provinces (cf. v. 2). Certain of these terms are Semitic, as was the language of Babylon and both Hebrew and Aramaic; certain others are derived from Persian, the non-Semitic language of the Medo-Persian lords of the kingdom which succeeded in 539 B.C. (cf. chs. 5; 6). It is argued that the Persian words are anachronously used. This does not follow, inasmuch as the narrative was composed by Daniel, who published his work in the Persian period. The words then chosen would have been terms best suited to the understanding and custom of his readers. If this book had been composed in the Greek period, in Palestine, as many critics claim, it would have been quite surprising if any Babylonian words had been used.

5. The sound of the cornet, flute, harp, sackbut, psaltery, dulcimer, etc. (cf. vv. 7,10,15). It has been claimed that, since the names for certain of these instruments are Greek, the book must have been composed after Alexander's conquest of the East. Every year, however, historical studies demonstrate more fully that there was an early exchange of culture between Greece and the Orient. These musical instruments of Greek origin simply carried their Greek names with them, as is the case in similar cultural exchanges today, viz., piano, viola, guitar, zither, etc.

3) The Demonstration of Faith. 3:16-18.

16. O Nebuchadnezzar, we are not careful to answer thee. Absence of any flattering titles in the Hebrews' address to the king indicates no disrespect—rather, terse directness. Perhaps the name Nebuchadnezzar should be joined in sense with "the king" and the address begun with "We are not careful. . . . For not careful read, there is no need. These words express full commitment, and appear to answer the king's question of verse 14, Is it true . . . ? or better, Is it on purpose . . . ? 17,18. Our God . . . is able to deliver us. This expresses the full confidence of their faith (cf. II Tim 1:12). And he will deliver us out of thine hand. This expresses the full knowledge of their faith. They did not know how God would deliver from the king — whether by death, ushering them into His presence, or by a special act of providence, saving them alive. But dead or alive, they knew they were God's (I Cor 3:21-23; see also Heb 13:6).

4) The Salvation by Faith. 3:19-30.

19. One seven times. Possibly the Aramaic word had, rendered one, has here the sense of our indefinite article "a" or "an"; hence a seven. This would be some familiar kind of seven-fold thing (e.g., the Heb. word for week is seven, as is also the similar word for an oath). This seven would then be, as Zoeckler (Lange's Comm.) suggests, a seven of completeness of judicial penalty. See also Lev 26:18-24; Mt 18:21,22.

21. They were bound in their own clothing, for no time was allowed for special preparations. The meanings of the words for the articles of clothing are now almost completely lost. They have been lost since the time of the earliest translations, and the Septuagint (not the better known Greek text of Theodotion) comes from the very epoch when certain critics claim this book was written. If the words were unknown in the first two and a half centuries B.C., then the book must have been written far earlier.

24,25. These words must be interpreted from Nebuchadnezzar's pagan point of view, not from our Christian point of view. Like the Son of God (Aram. da-mé l'bar 'elahîn) should be like a son of the gods, i.e., like a divine being. The king was thinking of the various orders of pagan deities. (A similar case of failure of the AV is at Mt 27:54.) This person may indeed have been the preincarnate Son of God, but if so, Nebuchadnezzar did not know who He was. See also Isa 43:1-3.

The victory of faith was fivefold: (1) They were loosed from their bonds (v.

25). (2) They were protected from harm (v. 27). (3) They were comforted in trial (vv. 24,25,28). (4) Their God was glorified (v. 29). (5) As God's servants they were rewarded (v. 30).

C. Nebuchadnezzar's Vision of the High Tree: A Lesson in Humility. 4:1-37.

The first three verses in the Aramaic are joined mistakenly to chapter 3. In both style and thought they belong with chapter 4. The fact that Nebuchadnezzar speaks in the first person throughout chapter 4, from verse 1 on, indicates a distinct change from the third person report of 3:30.

Beginning with a brief salutation (vv. 1-3), followed by the king's own report of circumstances at court (vv. 4-9), he presents the narration of a dream (vv. 10-18), which Daniel interpreted (vv. 19-27), and which was fulfilled in the humiliating experiences of Nebuchadnezzar (vv. 28-33), happily followed by the king's recovery and restoration (vv. 34-37).

1) Salutation by Nebuchadnezzar. 4:1-3. The form of this, as well as of the rest of the chapter, indicates that here is a Babylonian state paper, incorporated by Daniel into Holy Scripture. This shows that inspiration of Scripture is by virtue of the divine authority of the person at whose direction a given word is included. Even an ass' words are included in Scripture (Num 22:28,30) by Moses' authority! Nebuchadnezzar's salutation addressed this document — which no doubt circulated independently before it was placed in Scripture — to his entire realm. It is not too much to hope that some archaeologist may turn it up. Perhaps it already lies unrecognized among some of the thousands of recovered, but still unread, clay tablets.

2) Circumstances in Court. 4:4-9.

4. I Nebuchadnezzar was at rest in mine house. Successful wars and immense construction in Babylon had brought him the rest of accomplishment. (Immense archaeological remains so testify. See bibliography and text of Boutflower, In and Around the Book of Daniel, pp. 65-113). Flourishing in my palace. Ordinarily used of plants, the adjective flourishing, ra-ʿanan, appears often in Biblical Hebrew in descriptions of the luxuriant growth of trees (Ps 92:12) and figuratively of healthy people (Ps 92:14). Outwardly all was prosperous. 5. I saw a dream which . . . troubled me. The king had a neurosis! Uneasy lies the head that wears a crown. 6,7. Appeal to his advisors was without avail. This school of pompous quacks should long since have been dismissed.

8. But at the last Daniel came in before me. Was it national pride that made him put off calling Daniel? Perverseness? Depravity? The rest of the verse indicates that though he held Daniel in highest regard, he was still maintaining a thoroughly pagan point of view. The evidence does not demonstrate that rûaḥ ʾelahîn qaddishîn should be rendered "the Spirit of the Holy God," as some hold, though that translation is possible grammatically, and the parallel with the cognate Hebrew of Josh 24:19 supports it, as well as the Greek of Theodotion and the RSV margin. Seeing that Nebuchadnezzar recognized another as "my god," it is doubtful if he regarded Jehovah as the one holy God. Holy here seems to mean simply "divine." My god is of uncertain identity. It may mean Bel, as in Belteshazzar, or Nabu, as in Nebuchadnezzar, or Marduk, chief patron god of Babylon and of the whole Babylonian pantheon. See Pharaoh's similar words in Gen 41:38.

Four expressions summarize the circumstances at court: prosperity in appearance, trouble within the king's heart, frustration of his efforts, and pathetic appeal to God's prophet.

3) Narration of the Dream. 4:10-18.

10,11. A tree. The most useful of all plants, used for shade, food for man and beast, decoration and beauty, fuel, building material. A common symbol in Scripture (e.g., Jud 9:8ff.; Ps 1:3; Jer 1:11,12; Ezk 15:1ff.; 31:3-18). Nebuchadnezzar loved the trees of Lebanon. Extant records tell of his traveling to see them and to bring them as lumber to Babylon (Wady Brissa Inscription. Boutflower, op. cit., in loco). Cf. Ezk 31:3-18. 12. Cf. Mt 13:31,32.

14,16. If any natural psychological suggestion from the king's past lay behind his dream, it was likely his experience in Lebanon, where he had personally supervised the felling of cedars for transport to his capital. The felling of a tall tree leaves a tremendous impression on the viewer.

For further details, see comments on interpretation in the section to follow. The important thing here is the statement of purpose, which summarizes the spiritual message not only of this chapter but also of the whole book.

17. Young's remark (Proph. of Dan., in loco) that the king speaks here as a pagan seems to be in error. The king is reporting the words of a divine messenger. It is better to say that we have a pagan's apparently exact quotation of the words of a divine messenger. The prophecy here, as in chapter 2, is aimed at a pagan king's level of understanding. This matter. Better, the decree, or, the decision. Authorities agree that this is the language of paganism. Possibly the language of astrological decisions is used (Montgomery, BDB). By the decree of the watchers . . . holy ones. Cf. v. 13—"a watcher, a holy one" (RSV). The two names are for the same divine messengers usually known to Hebrews as angels. They are watchful, holy angels. The most High. This name is peculiarly appropriate. The pagan king thus assigned to Daniel's God, with whom he identified Daniel, pre-eminence above all gods. The designation can likewise be understood of God's solitary grandeur as the one true God (cf. I Cor 8:4-6). The basest of men. The reference is to men of humble station rather than of evil character.

This verse which solemnly declares God's sovereign providential control over the course of human history is the core of the book of Daniel (cf. Isa 40:15 and context; Prov 21:1; Rom 13:1; Acts 17:24-26).

4) The Interpretation of the Dream. 4:19-27.

19. Daniel . . . was astonied. Better, perplexed—not because he had difficulty interpreting the dream but because he had none, and was most reluctant to give bad news to the kindly monarch. One hour. Probably an expression like our familiar, "for a minute," meaning a moment. His thoughts troubled (i.e., frightened) him. For Nebuchadnezzar's sake he was frightened. The king's commiseration of Daniel seems to show in what affection he held his Hebrew counselor, in spite of his failure to invite Daniel to his presence earlier. To them that hate thee. Some take this and the following clause to indicate Daniel's desire that the distress predicted of the king might be on his enemies and rivals. It is quite possible to interpret his words as stating simply that the events predicted would give comfort to the king's enemies and rivals, and this last seems the more probable sense.

20-22. The tree . . . It is thou, O king. The king himself, conqueror and proud lord of all the earth, is symbolized by the tree. For thy greatness is grown, and reacheth unto heaven, and thy dominion to the end of the earth. This statement, especially the second and third parts of it, was not literally true, even though it was the declaration of a prophet. Ancient Semites were fond of hyperbole and used it without its being misunderstood by anyone. Nebuchadnezzar's realm, in fact, was smaller geographically than either the Persian or the Greek or the Roman empire. It was, however, very large and included most of the well known parts of the world.

23. The intent of these words was that the king personally would experience a great disaster, losing his position for a period of seven times. The Aramaic is no more specific than the English translation in regard to the length of time involved. Inasmuch as days, weeks, or months would hardly have allowed time for the developments of verse 33b, it seems best to follow most commentators in adopting "years" as the meaning.

26. This assured the king of eventual restoration. 27. Daniel's advice enjoined the outward signs of repentance (see Joel 1:8,14; 2:17,18), no doubt as signs of inner change (see Joel 2:13). Personal impurity (sins) as well as oppression of his subjects and conquered enemies (iniquities) needed to be stopped. His repentance might bring on divine "repentance" (see Jer 18; Joel 2:12-14).

5) Fulfillment of the Dream. 4:28-33.

29. Twelve months. There had been some merciful "lengthening of thy tranquillity" (v. 27). The palace of the kingdom of Babylon. Ancient authors report, as archaeology confirms, that Nebuchadnezzar, in addition to repairing and enlarging older buildings in Babylon, conducted magnificent building projects of his own. A great street which he had rebuilt for processions stretched before him, as well as many temples and many miles of walls. "Now in this palace, having built up lofty substructures of stone, and planted them with all kinds of trees, giving an appearance very closely resembling mountains, he wrought out and prepared the famous Hanging Gardens, to gratify his wife, who was fond of a mountainous country, having been brought up in Media" (Jos Against Apion I. 19).

30. Great Babylon, that I have built. See notes on 4:29. Cf. Isa 14:4 ff. "The setting of the scene and the king's self-complaisance in his glorious Babylon are strikingly true to history" (Montgomery, op. cit., p. 243. Also see standard works on the ancient history and archaeology of Babylon. Some of the best are nineteenth century: e.g., Layard, Nineveh and Babylon; Rawlinson's various works; George Smith, Assyrian Discoveries. Cf. Boutflower, op. cit., for more recent works, as well as Montgomery, op. cit., p. 243). 31-33. A voice from heaven. The king's last conscious, clear-minded experience turned his attention upward to God in heaven. In the next section it is indicated that seven years later, when he returned to sanity, his first action was to respond by looking upward.

For ancient historical evidence of the historicity of this account, the reader is referred to larger standard works. There is support, though not proof. Various ancient parallels to Nebuchadnezzar's malady have been drawn. If it was a special divine judgment, no natural parallel is necessary, interesting as it might be. Since the ancients often regarded insane people as "possessed" by a god, the king may have been kept in a park and given deferential treatment. Parallels to the king's physical changes have been found in antiquity in the Ahikar story (ANET, pp. 427-430).

6) Recovery and Restoration of the King. 4:34-37.

34. When the man's understanding returned, he praised God! Nothing is more insane than human pride. Nothing is more sober and sensible than to praise God. 35-37. The restoration of the king should encourage men to hope for brighter days ahead, in the providence of God, no matter how low in chastening the Lord may have brought them.

This chapter shows that the heathen are not exempt from Jehovah's moral rule. Moral laws govern the rise and fall of men whether they are related to God in saving grace or not (see also Amos 1:1–2:3).

D. Belshazzar's Feast: A Lesson in Sin and Its Punishment. 5:1-31.

The purpose of this chapter is to give moral instruction rather than historical information. Verses 1,30,31 supply the only significant historical data. The rest is a lesson in sin and its punishment.

Gobryas (Bab. Gubaru), general of Cyrus, was at the gates of Babylon at the very moment of the opening of the king's feast. He had diverted the waters of the Euphrates and was marching his men up the bed of the river into the city, which lay on both its banks. The river gates had been left unguarded. Babylon, stocked with supplies for twenty years, was supposedly secure behind massive walls. Nabonidus (Bab. Nabunaid), Belshazzar's father, had been worsted in battle by Cyrus' armies, and he was now besieged at Borsippa, not far away. It was no time for alcoholic foolishness!

1) Pleasure, the Pursuit of the Feast. 5:1-4.

1. Belshazzar. Formerly unknown except through this chapter, the king is now well-authenticated by ancient documents (R. P. Dougherty, Nabonidus and Belshazzar). A great feast. A sensual affair, as the presence of women among the men, unusual in the ancient East, shows (cf. Est 1:9). Drank wine before the thousand. Even at public feasts Oriental kings (at least in Persian times) were screened from public sight. This was license unrestrained by convention.

2. Commanded to bring the . . . vessels. For Nebuchadnezzar to take these vessels out of the Jerusalem temple (1:1-3) was according to accepted practice in war. To remove them from the national repository for a drunken feast was sacrilegious. Nebuchadnezzar, the great king, had real military exploits to his credit, and to a degree Nabonidus, the king's father had exploits in peaceful pursuits to his credit. The spineless prince could only perform foolish sacrilegious acts to gain notoriety, if not fame. 4. Belshazzar's behavior was sensual, unrestrained, wild, and sacrilegious. It was also stupid. Gobryas' armies were already inside the city.

2) A Portent, God's Contribution to the Feast. 5:5,6.

5. In the same hour. God spoke suddenly. Time had run out. Fingers of a man's hand. The portent was mysterious. The supernatural was on display. Upon the plaister. In the very wall whereon the national memorials may have been written. Ruthless action! God does not care about our patriotic boasts. The king saw. It was striking.

3) Perplexity, the Effect of the Divine Visitation. 5:7,8.

7. Astrologers . . . Chaldeans . . . soothsayers. Once more (cf. 2:2-14; 3:8; 4:6,7) these monumental frauds appeared. Not only did they "know not God" (I Cor 1:21) in their "wisdom" but they knew little else (cf. Dan 5:8). Scarlet. Better, purple, the color of royalty among several ancient peoples and probably with the Babylonians likewise. A chain of gold. Cf. Gen 41:42. Third ruler. Of uncertain meaning. Some authorities identify it as a word meaning "adjutant" or "officer." The word talti is, however, almost certainly derived from the Aramaic t'lat (cf. BDB), and probably means third (ruler or part). Ordinarily only the father of Belshazzar, the besieged Nabonidus, would have had authority to declare a third ruler. But for yet an hour or two Belshazzar was de facto if not de jure supreme monarch, and felt he could confer this honor. No Jew in Palestine in the Maccabean period (second cent., B.C.) could have thus correctly reconstructed the historical situation, as certain critics claim the writer of Daniel did.

4) Pronouncement of Doom, Daniel's Part at the Feast. 5:10-28.

10. The queen. Not the king's wife, but his mother. In polygamous families the grand lady is the husband's mother (cf. reports of Jewish kings' mothers in the OT). This queen was likely a wife of Nabonidus. Perhaps she had also been a young wife of the noted Nebuchadnezzar (cf. Boutflower, in loco).

11. Nebuchadnezzar thy father. Nebuchadnezzar was, of course, not the king's immediate male parent. It is unlikely that Nebuchadnezzar was even his grandfather. Probably father in a legal sense only, since Nabonidus would have allied himself by marriage with the family of the great Nebuchadnezzar (Boutflower, in loco). The queen's repetitious affirmation of the "father" relationship suggests that it was a point of etiquette at court, not a real fact. This kind of etiquette is not unknown in other parts of the Bible (e.g., I Chr 3:17, where Salathiel, the son of Neri, who descended from David through Nathan [Lk 3:27,31] is called the "son" of Jeconiah).

17. The temporal gifts of a king whose time had run out meant little to a saintly prophet of advanced years.

25. MENE, MENE, TEKEL, UPHARSIN. Textual evidence, as well as the following verses, indicates that there is likely a combination of misunderstanding and textual corruption here. The verse should possibly read, using quotation marks: "And this is the writing that was written, 'Mene, Mene, Tekel' and 'Peres.'" The U of UPHARSIN is the Aramaic for "and." The PH is an aspiration of P to accommodate the previous vowel sound. The IN is a plural form, likely introduced by some later scribe who connected the word with Persians, for the ending only pluralizes the word. Mene is repeated for emphasis. The three words, Mene, Tekel, and Peres, as they stand, are passive participles, rightly rendered counted, weighed, and divided. They are also, when left without vowels, viz., MN, TKL, PRS, the names of three ancient weights that might be paralleled with our terms, a pound, an ounce, half a pound. Further, it is possible that the inscription on the wall was in syllabic cuneiform or in ideograms. None of these modes of writing would have been intelligible without a context. Actually, apart from interpretation, their only value was to secure the king's attention so that Daniel could talk to him.

26,28. (Boutflower, Montgomery, and Young are excellent help here.) It is possible that the words interpreted are names of weights or coins as indicated above. If so, then they are a play on words. Maneh (Aram.), a weight of fifty shekels, equivalent to about two pounds (see Ezk 45:12), parallels mene, which means divided. Tekel, a coin or weight, equivalent to the Hebrew shekel, suggests tekel in the sense of weighed. Peres (a half maneh) suggests Peres, divided. It also ominously suggested Persia, which appears in verse 28. To the Medes and Persians. This verse proves conclusively that the author of this book believed the successor of the Babylonian kingdom to be a dual kingdom, including two national elements. He was not guilty of supposing the second and third stages of empire (chs. 2; 7) to be Median and Persian respectively, but recognized them as Medo-Persian and Grecian respectively. Unbelieving criticism, which would have the author supposing a Babylon, Media, Persia, Greece succession rather than the true Babylon, Medo-Persia, Greece, Rome succession, is "hung" upon this verse.

5) Punishment, the End of the Feast. 5:29-31.

30. Belshazzar's sacrilege, like that of others (II Sam 6:6,7; Lev 10:1,2; I Cor 3:17), required immediate punishment in that night. Details of the siege and fall of Babylon had been prophesied long before by Jeremiah (chs. 50; 51). Thus God was fulfilling Isaiah's prophecy regarding Cyrus (Isa 44:24-28; 45).

E. Darius the Mede in the Role of Religious Persecutor: A Lesson in Faith and Prayer. 6:1-28.

The theme of faith and prayer is developed in a story of religious persecution, a theme first mentioned in Scripture at Genesis 4 and continuing to Revelation 20 (see also Mt 10:16-26; 23:33-36; 24:1-28; Jn 21:18,19; Acts 7; 18:2; I Pet 4:12,13; I Jn 3:12; Rev 1:9; 13).

The chapter begins by explaining what a prominent position Daniel held in Babylon (vv. 1-3). Next there is a report of a plot against his life (vv. 4-9). There follows the exemplary prayer of Daniel (vv. 10,11), then a report of the apparent success of the plot (vv. 11-17). The chapter continues with God's amazing answer to the prayer, and the failure of the plot (vv. 18-28).

1) The Prominence of Daniel. 6:1-3.

1a. It pleased Darius. The same Darius as that represented in 5:31 as the first ruler of Babylon after the Medo-Persian conquest, a man sixty-two years of age. History tells us of no man named Darius who at this time ruled in Babylon. Cyrus (1:21; 10:1) was the Persian king in supreme authority at this time, as the Bible (Isa 44:21–45:5; II Chr 36:22, 23; Ezr 1:1-4), secular historians (Herodotus, Berosus, Xenophon), and archaeological evidences (Nabonidus Chronicle, Cyrus Cylinder, etc.) testify. The truth of the narrative may stand without further support, however. Darius obviously was a subking under Cyrus. The language of Dan 5:31 and especially of 9:1 practically requires this. He was local "king over the realm of the Chaldeans" (9:1, i.e., of Babylonia); whereas, Cyrus was "king of Persia" (i.e., of the empire, 10:1). Whether we are to identify Darius with Cyrus himself, Cyaxares, Astyages, or Cambyses of the secular sources, or with Ugbaru or Gubaru of the contemporary records, cannot as yet be regarded as settled, though a very good case has recently been made for Gubaru (John Whitcomb, Darius the Mede). Several of the theories mentioned above are now thought to be most unlikely. Faith can wait for further information. We do know that it was common for kings to have two or more names (e.g., II Chr 36:4,8; cf. Jer 22:24).

1b. An hundred and twenty princes (satraps). These are not the heads of the 127 provinces of the grand empire of Ahasuerus (Xerxes, 486–465 B.C.). No geographical divisions are named. Rather, they are 120 assistants to Darius as governor of Babylon. "King" in Aramaic and Hebrew is a rather elastic term covering any ruler from a petty kinglet (e.g., city kings of the book of Joshua) to Nebuchadnezzar (Dan 1:3), Cyrus (10:1), and Ahasuerus (Est 1:2). 2. Three presidents. Rather, overseers. And the king should have no damage. The king was concerned for his own financial and material profit, not for the administration of justice. Ancient pagan monarchs had no true conception of government "for the people" (see I Sam 8).

3. Evidently Daniel, with over fifty years of public service behind him, was a prominent international figure, known for integrity; for he was a foreigner, twice removed from Darius, and a holdover from the enemy administration. This suggests the value of age in positions of high responsibility (Prov 16:10-16). But in Daniel's very prominence lay his peril, because of the envy and jealousy of others.

2) The Plot Against Daniel. 6:4-9.

4. Envy was at work (cf. Prov 27:4; Joseph's brethren, Acts 7:9; Joab, II Sam 20:4-10; Jesus' enemies, Mt 27:18). 5. Daniel's well-known integrity made him a sure target. It is known in advance what an honest man will do in certain circumstances. Control the circumstances and you control him!

6-9. The strength of the plan lay in taking advantage of Darius' vanity. The address and suggestions of the men all appealed to the king's vainglorious pagan desires. As a man sixty-two years old, he knew that if he was to achieve glory, it was now or never! Their claim that "all" the counselors had been consulted was a lie, for Daniel had not been consulted. Into the den of lions. The Persians, being Zoroastrians, held fire to be sacred. Hence for them it would have been improper to cremate or to execute by fire. Zoroastrians (Parsees) continue to the present the exposure of their dead to carrion-eating birds.

3) The Prayer of Daniel. 6:10,11.

God's own estimate of Daniel and his reputation in heaven make his prayers worthy of our attention and emulation (cf. Ezk 14:14; Dan 10:11). The sublimity of his courageous faith is recognized by all who enter sympathetically into the situation. He maintained his pious habits and his beliefs—as he did aforetime—in the face of an absolutely impossible predicament—when Daniel knew that the writing was signed.

10. When he knew. The prayer, in the first place, was courageous (cf. Hus at Constance, A.D. 1415). Went into his house . . . and prayed. It was, secondly, truly pious, without mock heroics in public. There was no parade of religion. Daniel only did what he knew was right (cf. Jas 1:27; Mt 6:5ff.). Thirdly, it was prayer according to Scripture. As Moses, in Deut 28:36-68, had predicted the Jews' captivity, so Solomon's words in II Chr 6:36-39 had prescribed their worship in captivity. Daniel 6:10, 11 must be understood in the indispensable light of these passages.

Eight specific elements of true prayer appear in the comparison. (1) Faith. Daniel believed the Word, for he obeyed it and regulated his prayers by it. The prayer of the exiles was to be directed "toward their land," and in facing toward Jerusalem Daniel showed respectful faith. (2) Worship. Solomon prescribed "toward the city," i.e., Jerusalem (Deut 12:5-7; I Chr 11:4-9; 13:1-14; 15:25-29; II Chr 3:1,2; 5:1-14; 7:1-3. Cf. Jn 4:20-22; Acts 4:12). Daniel could not worship literally in the Holy City, but his posture showed that he wished to do so; and in spirit he did do so. (3) The ground of atonement by blood. The "house . . . built for my name" was the center of the sacrificial ritual. Daniel's posture recognized that (cf. Heb 10:19-22). (4) Humility. This is indicated by the marked emphasis on the kneeling posture (cf. Lk 18:13,14). (5) Regularity. Three times a day (cf. Ps 55: 16,17). (6) Petition. And prayed or and kept on praying. The word ṣ'la' means " to bow in entreaty." (7) Thanksgiving. Gave thanks, etc. (cf. Phil 4:6). (8) Constancy. As he did aforetime.

11. Then these men assembled, and found Daniel praying. Here, as in verse 6, assembled has the sense of tumultous assembly. In the earlier case they mobbed the king with excited suggestions, and in the second they noisily interrupted an aged saintly public servant in his private devotions. Neither act was to their credit.

4) The Apparent Success of the Plot. 6:12-17. Darius found himself bound and gagged by his own law. In this manner he showed that his authority was quite inferior in nature to that of Nebuchadnezzar, whose person was above the law. The government of Darius came nearer to the democratic ideal, but it was less absolute than that of the Chaldeans. In that sense it was inferior, and so fulfilled what had been predicted of it by the silver portion of the image prophecy of chapter 2. Note that the king's fondness for Daniel did not fail, and that Daniel's faith inspired the king to believe also.

5) The Amazing Answer to Daniel's Prayer. 6:18-28. If Daniel prayed for himself, then verses 21-23 describe the answer; if for the king, then verse 16 of the earlier section shows God's work in his heart; if for God's glory, then verses 24-28 give the answer. The king's Zoroastrian faith was the nearest that paganism ever came to Jewish ethical monotheism. This statement reads almost as if he had "come across." God was glorified by the destruction of His enemies, by the king's confession, and by His servant's reward.

F. A Vision of Four Beasts, the Ancient of Days, and the Son of Man: The Conflict of Christ and Antichrist. 7:1-28.

Three important changes begin in this chapter. Up to chapter 7 the material is mainly historical. Henceforth it is mainly predictive. Heretofore Daniel has been God's agent in revelation, interpreting others' dreams. Hereafter, an angel interprets Daniel's own dreams and visions (7:16; 8:15-17; 9:20-23; 10:10-14). Heretofore the author has reported in the third person; hereafter he writes in the first, giving a much more intimate report of his experiences.

A transition from prophecy centered in Gentile nations to Jewish-centered prophecy takes place with the entrance of the "holy people" (rendered "saints" vv. 18,22,25). The Jews are the center of interest to the book's end.

The same succession of kingdoms that was found in chapter 2 appears here—four Gentile empires, then the kingdom of Messiah. The view that chapter 7 describes only events in the Mediterranean area at the close of this present age is ably set forth by G. H. Lang (The Histories and Prophecies of Daniel) in premillennial perspective. The view that the four kingdoms are (1) Babylon, (2) Medo-Persia, (3) Greece, and (4) the Greek successors of Alexander, and that the fifth is Messiah's kingdom is defended in reverent but non-millennial perspective by Moses Stuart (Commentary on Daniel) and in reverent amillennial perspective by the Roman Catholic work of C. Lattey (The Book of Daniel). After the usual historical setting (v. 1), there follow details of a series of visions (vv. 2-14,21,22), the new method of interpreting dreams and visions (vv. 15, 16), the interpretation (vv. 17-20, 23-27), and a concluding personal statement (v. 28).

1) Historical Setting. 7:1.

1. The first year of Belshazzar. About fourteen years before the events of chapter 5. It is likely that Babylonian weakness was already beginning to show through. Dream and visions. Not always clearly distinguished. Dreams are experiences in sleep; visions may occur in a waking condition, or, as here, may be successive "scenes" or stages in a dream. Then he wrote the dream, and told the sum of the matters. He recorded it immediately (then or thereupon, or at that time, as the Aramaic 'ĕdayin prefixed by b emphatically requires). It was written, contrary to current oral-transmission-of-prophecy theories (see Isa 30:8; cf. 8:1,16; Hab 2:2; Rev 1:19; 14:13; 21:5). It was a summary only, for the sum (Aram. head) or substance of the material was recorded. Similar use of Hebrew rō'sh appears at Ps 119: 160 (sum, ASV) and 137:6 (chief). (See Stuart, Comm., in loco.)

2) Details of the Visions. 7:2-14,21,22.

2. The four winds of the heaven. Usage elsewhere indicates that the winds represent God's providential power by which he controls the nations, setting them in commotion or settling them in peace (Rev 7:1-3; Jer 23:19; 49:36; 51:1; Zech 6:1-6, 7:14). Rûah may be rendered either "spirit" or "wind," and is here purposely ambiguous. (Note further Dan 4:17; I Tim 2:1,2.) Jerome thought the winds represented angels. Upon the great sea. Not just any sea, but, as Lang has ably demonstrated (Histories and Prophecies of Daniel, p. 86ff.), the Mediterranean (see esp. Num 34:6,7; Josh 1:4; 9:1; 15:11,12,47; 23:4; Ezk 47:10-15, 19,20; 48:28).

3. Four great beasts came up from the sea. Hence, the beasts, later described, are connected with the Mediterranean area. Likewise, as the prophetic, symbolical use of "sea" indicates, they arise with turmoil, unrest, boisterous talk, etc., accompaniments of so-called diplomacy (Isa 57:20; Jer 6:23; 50:42; 51:42; Rev 17:15; cf. Lk 21:25). Nations, and their rise, are not viewed complimentarily in Scripture (Isa 34:2; 40:15-17; Joel 3: 2; cf. "the world," I Jn 2:15ff.; 5:19; II Pet 3:10). Diverse one from another. Each nation has its own special characteristics, though all share in common their brutal, irrational, bestial character. How different this inward view of the prophet from the glittering dignity of the pagan Nebuchadnezzar's dream image!

4. The lion symbolizes Babylon here and also in Jer 4:6,7. The eagle's wings speak of swiftness, as the lion of strength. These are natural symbols scarcely needing explanation (cf. II Sam 1:23; Jer 49:19-22; Ezk 17:3-24). 5. The bear is an apt symbol of the Medo-Persian kingdom. Strength and ferocity figure in almost every Biblical use of the bear. The ponderous bulk fits the massive Persian armies. Xerxes is said to have moved two and one-half million men to attack Greece. Duality may be suggested by reference to the beast's side. 6. The sinewy four-winged leopard speaks, without doubt, of Alexander's Grecian (Macedonian) kingdom. Rulership passed from Nineveh (Assyria) to Babylon in 612 B.C.; from Babylon to Persia in 539 B.C., and from Darius III to Alexander in 331 B.C.

7,8. As in chapter 2, the fourth stage of empire is Roman. Since this kingdom must prevail until the destruction of Antichrist (the little horn) and the establishment of the eternal, final, visible kingdom of Christ (cf. Rev 19:11—20:4), it must be regarded as prevailing today. The ten-fold form of the final stage, perhaps suggested by the ten toes of chapter 2, is clearly taught here and confirmed by Rev 17:3ff. Later in the chapter the little horn is identified with final Antichrist.

9-14. This throne scene is fully elaborated in Revelation, chapters 4—20. Evidently the five verses of Daniel cover the same ground as the seventeen chapters of Revelation. It is a judgment scene wherein the Ancient of days—none other than "the high and lofty One that inhabiteth eternity" (Isa 57:15)—takes possession of the earth's kingdoms through the Son of man—a name our Lord clearly claimed for himself (Mt 24:30). The dramatic action whereby the beast's kingdom is violently taken away fits the many Biblical predictions of the manner in which our Lord will judge the nations at the close of this age.

21,22. Though separated by details of interpretation (vv. 15-20), these two verses belong to the vision itself rather than to the interpretation. The saints of the most High . . . the saints possessed the kingdom. Nothing is more sure than that all saints of all ages will share in Christ's ultimate triumph in his kingdom. But this passage is affirming only a part of that truth. The perspective of the book, the meaning of the words, and the context here limit the application to Daniel's people, Israel, clearly identified in 10:14 (the equivalent Hebrew expression is used). "By the 'people of the saints of the Most High' to whom dominion is to be given (Dan 7:18-27), Daniel evidently could only understand the people of Israel, as distinguished from the heathen nations and kingdoms, which were to rule up till then (2:44); nor have we, according to strict exegesis, a right to apply the expression to any other nation; hence we cannot apply it immediately to the Church . . . The prophet's words refer to the re-establishment of the kingdom to Israel" (C. A. Auberlen, The Prophecies of Daniel and the Revelation of St. John, pp. 216, 217).

3) The Method of Interpretation. 7:15,16.

Very strangely, an angel who is himself a part of the vision but likewise a real personal being, later identified as Gabriel, becomes the interpreter here and throughout the remainder of the book (cf. 8:16; 9:21). Though treated briefly by Daniel, this is an important feature.

4) Interpretation of the Visions. 7:17-20,23-27.

Except as noted in remarks at the beginning of this chapter, it is generally agreed that the succession of four Gentile dominions to be followed by the Messianic kingdom is the same here as that contemplated in chapter 2. But beginning at verse 19, the prophecy advances far beyond the dream of Nebuchadnezzar, to give details of prediction concerning final Antichrist and the relations the people of God will have with him in eschatological times.

19. I would know the truth of the fourth beast. This beast is of special interest because it produces the "little horn," Antichrist, and is the final form of Gentile dominion (see vv. 23-25 and cf. comments on 2:40-43). 20. And of the ten horns. See verse 24. Ten kings shall arise in the final stage of the fourth (Roman) kingdom and shall reign contemporaneously (not successively; cf. Rev 17:12ff. as further explanation). Of that horn that had eyes, and a mouth, etc. All interpreters—Jewish, Christian, unbelievers—agree that this is Antichrist. Rationalists who say this was written in the Maccabean era insist that he is Antiochus Epiphanes (about 165 B.C.) and that our author, though mistaken, thought the Messianic kingdom would follow immediately.

24-26. Note herein twelve facts about Antichrist: (1) He will not create a tenfold confederacy; he will absorb one (v. 24). (2) He will be just another king—"another . . . horn" (v. 8), and he will be mortal (Rev 13:2; II Thess 2:9). It will be the Satanic power behind him that will make him significant. (3) He will be obscure at first—"little" (Dan 7:8). (4) His march to power will begin with his conquest of three kingdoms (v. 8; cf. v. 24). (5) Yet something about him will be special (diverse from the first [ten], v. 24). See Rev 13:15; II Thess 2:4. Many extraordinary events will be connected with him (Rev 13:16,17; II Thess 2:9,10). (6) He will be very intelligent—"eyes of a man" (Dan 7:8). (7) He will be an orator of ability (v. 8). (8) His appearance will be striking (v. 20; cf. Isa 53:2,3). (9) He will be a blasphemer

(Dan 7:25; cf. Rev 13:5,6). (10) He will seek to make his accession a new epoch (Dan 7:25, change times). (11) He will seek to destroy Israel (v. 25a; cf. 9:26,27). (12) His time will be short (v. 25), a time, [two] times, and the dividing [half] of time (cf. Rev 11:2; 13:5; Dan 9:25; 12:7-12).

Evidence for a Premillennial View Herein: (1) Messiah's kingdom follows Antichrist's appearance (here described in personal rather than institutional terms), and destruction. The person has not yet appeared. This appears to make post- and a-millennial schemes identifying the Church with the Kingdom unfeasible. (2) The kingdom of Messiah here follows the Gentile kingdoms; it is at no time contemporary with them. It must, therefore, be still future. (3) The kingdom of Christ succeeds a final form of Gentile dominion which has not yet appeared. (4) The Messianic kingdom is external in aspect here, not a kingdom in men's hearts, as Church-Kingdom theories require. (5) This kingdom is in some sense Israelitish (cf. vv. 7,22,25,27 with 8:24). The "saints" or holy people referred to here are Israel and no other. The Church is not a Jewish kingdom.

III. The Hebrew Nation: Its Relation to Gentile Dominion and Its Future in the Plan of God. 8:1–12:13.

A. A Ram, a Goat, and a Little Horn: Israel in Conflict with the OT Antichrist. 8:1-27. This chapter repeats much of the prediction of chapter 2, and especially of chapter 7. It adds details regarding the Medo-Persian and Grecian periods. After a historical introduction (v. 1), the vision of a ram and a goat is described (vv. 2-14), followed by interpretation (vv. 15-26), and a conclusion (v. 27).

1) Historical Introduction. 8:1. This vision came two years after that of chapter 7 (cf. 7:1). It came when the exiled Jews needed encouragement to believe God really would restore them, as he had promised (Jer 25:11,12).

2) The Visions. 8:2-14.

2. I saw in a vision . . . at Shushan. His presence in Shushan, a city 250 miles east of Babylon, was in vision only (cf. Ezk 8:1-3; II Cor 12:2ff.; contrast Jer 13:1-7). Shushan was later a capital over Babylon in the Persian Empire. The palace. A structure yet future, a Persian palace, likely (cf. Rev 20; 21; and John's vision of a coming city). It was likely the palace of Xerxes a century later (486–465 B.C.), one of the most magnificent of all antiquity, covering two and one-half acres (cf. works on archaeology). Events of Esther (cf. Est 1:2) took place there.

3. There stood before the river a ram which had two horns. The duality of the Medo-Persian empire is again suggested (cf. pair of breasts and of arms in the image of chapter 2). The higher came up last. Though Persia was more prominent in the union, it was the younger kingdom. In 550 B.C. Cyrus, a Persian, builder of Pasargadae, twenty-five miles north of Persepolis, the older capital, rebelled against the Medes, who had been dominant, and became lord of the dual kingdom. This took place at about the time Daniel was prophesying.

4. Two books of Herodotus' Histories describe the events summarized here. The Persian Empire suffered no serious set-back until 490, when a determined little army of Athenians at Marathon defeated the forces of Darius (father of Xerxes, the Ahashuerus of Esther). A second defeat, this time in a naval battle in the Gulf of Aegina (above Athens), came to Xerxes ten years later. But the ram indeed became great with a magnificence still remembered and imitated today.

5. An he goat came from the west. Observe that both animals are relatively mild domestic farm animals rather than the ravenous bear and leopard of chapter 7. This seems to be because, as regards Israel, both were in the main relatively mild. As regards one another, they were vicious (see Ezk 34:17 and context, also Zech 10:3). As the metals of the image became progressively stronger, so the buck goat is stronger than the ram of sheep. The clean sweep of Alexander's armies is predicted in the latter part of Dan 8:7. His small swift army, with its devastating phalanx formation, swept through Asia Minor, Syria, Egypt, and finally Mesopotamia (334–331 B.C.). After that his armies advanced eastward to India, then turned back again toward the west.

8. Alexander died in the thirty-third year of his age, of fever and alcohol, at Babylon. In the subsequent twenty years, his winnings were divided into four parts among four of his military successors. Two of the resultant divisions —Egypt under the Ptolemies (the last of whom was the famous Cleopatra) and Syria under the Seleucids, the historic kings of the South and the North, respectively—are of importance as neighbors of the Jews. They figure prominently in chapter 11.

9-14. These verses predict the sad conflict of the Jews, in the second half of the second century B.C. (after their return from exile), with the Seleucid king, Antiochus IV, called Epiphanes ("Magnificent") by friends, Epimanes ("Madman") by enemies. Many evangelical interpreters see here a type of Antichrist and his conflict with Christ and his people in the end time. This may very well be (see below). The 2,300 days is literally, evening-mornings, i.e., evening and morning daily burnt sacrifices, and so refers to only 1,150 days. It seems to refer to a period in 168–165 B.C. when the Temple was desecrated by pagan sacrifices.

3) Interpretation of the Visions. 8:15-26.

15,16. Gabriel means hero of God. (See 9:21; 10:13; Lk 1:19. Cf. Dan 7:16 and note.)

17,18. That a man of Daniel's righteous character should so react demonstrates the moral gulf separating God and the holy beings of heaven from mankind. See also 10:9,15,17; Ex 3:6; Isa 6:5; Ezk 1:28; Acts 9:3,4; Rev 1:17. Daniel had reason to fear death (see Ex 33:20; Jud 13:22).

19. The terms, the end and the indignation (cf. 11:36), suggest that there is more here than history relating to the time of Antiochus and the Maccabees. This observation lends support to the typical interpretation suggested above. It is not uncommon to find a near, literal view combined with a far, typical view within the scope of a particular prophecy.

23-26. These verses add specific details to the portrait of Antiochus. The Jews could hardly fail to recognize him when he appeared. This prophecy may well have been the very divine means used to carry the faithful through those hard days. Hebrews 11:34-37 memorializes their heroism.

4) Historical Conclusion. 8:27. Fainted. Literally, was done in. He later went back to work, evidently pondering what he saw.

B. The Prophecy of the Seventy Weeks: Israel's Future in the Plan of God. 9:1–27. This prophecy is unique in Scripture in that it actually sets up a sort of time schedule of coming events. The nearest approach to it is Jeremiah's prophecy of seventy years (see below). The schedule relates to events in the future of the Israelites. After devoting brief attention to the historical setting (vv. 1,2), Daniel proceeds to report an intensive season of prayer (vv. 3-19), followed by the arrival of an angelic mesenger of prophecy (vv. 20-23). The very important prophecy of the seventy weeks comes at the end (vv. 24-27).

1) The Historical Setting of the Prophecy. 9:1,2.

1. In the first year of Darius. That is, 539/538 B.C., sixty-seven years after Daniel's transportation in the summer of 605 B.C.; about fifty-nine years from the beginning of King Jehoiachin's captivity (II Chr 36:9,10; Ezk 1:1 ff.); a bit less than fifty years from the final destruction of Jerusalem in 586 B.C. This explains Daniel's interest in Jerusalem (Dan 9:2). He wondered if the time was up. Made king over the realm of the Chaldeans. Daniel does not confuse him with Cyrus. He was made king, i.e., appointed, and that not over the Medo-Persian empire but over Babylonia only.

2. The number of the years. The reference seems to be to Jer 25:11,12, which says, "when seventy years are accomplished . . . I will punish the king of Babylon." That king had already been punished; so Daniel knew it was time for the desolations of Jerusalem also to be ended. Seventy is a round number; it was actually sixty-eight. Cf. Lk 21:26.

2) The Exemplary Prayer of Daniel. 9:3-19.

In the appreciation of a poem, play, or painting, the greatest value is to be received by simply taking the creation as a whole. Just so Daniel's prayer should be studied as a whole. The prayer was a providential means of accomplishing what was already determined (see Isa 42:24,25; 43:14,15; 48:9-11; Jer 49:17-20. Cf. Jer 50:4,5,20).

The names of Deity employed are significant. Daniel reminds God that both Jerusalem (Dan 9:18) and the Jews (v. 19) are called by thy name. He addresses the Lord as Lord God (ʾᵉdōnāy ʾᵉlôhîm, v. 3) and LORD God (Yahweh ʾᵉlôhîm, v. 4). See a Bible dictionary on names of God. Daniel's conception of God shows balance between the great and dreadful God (v. 4; cf. Isa 6:1 ff.) and a God of mercies and forgiveness (v. 9; cf. Ex 20:5,6).

The problems of interpretation here are not difficult. Note what light this chapter casts on prayer (Mt 6:5-18; Lk 11:1-13). Observe: (1) Daniel's prayer was a persistent, undespairing interest (Dan 6:1-10; cf. 9:1-3). In sixty-eight years of waiting, the prophet had not lost hope. (2) He had determination (v. 3; cf. Lk 9:51). (3) He was importunate (Dan 9:3. See also Mt 9:27; 15:22; 17:15; 20:30,31. Cf. Lk 16:24; 17:13; 18:38,39). (4) He showed humility. Note how he associated himself with his people in their sins (cf. Lk 18:10-14; II Cor 12:7). (5) He made confession (esp. Dan 9:4,5. Cf. Ps 32:5; 51:4; Jas 5:16). (6) He displayed submission (Dan 9:14) and engaged in (7) petition and (8) intercession.

Like Moses (Ex 32:10-14; cf. Ezk 14:14,20), Daniel as intercessor carried on argument with the Almighty, on several grounds: (1) God's people were a reproach among the heathen (Dan 9:16). (2) God was known to be merciful (v. 18). (3) God's reputation was at stake (v. 19).

3) The Angelic Messenger of the Prophecy. 9:20-23. Important to the continuity of the book is the fact that throughout the second half of Daniel the revealer is the same individual (cf. 7:16,23; 8:16; 9:21; 10:5ff. and comments). Note also that here is an immediate answer to prayer, whereas in chapter 10 there is a long delayed answer, both being in the will and plan of God.

4) The Great Prophecy of the Seventy Weeks. 9:24-27.

(For extended treatment, see R. D. Culver, Daniel and the Latter Days, pp. 135-160.) This prophecy is referred to by Josephus: "We believe that Daniel conversed with God; for he did not only prophesy of the future, as did the other prophets, but he also determined the time of their accomplishment" (Antiq. X. xi. 7). Jerome reports the Christian interpretations current in his time. They were as various as are ours today, although then, as now, all felt that the prophecy was of Christ. At least one writer (Hippolytus) felt that it reached to the times of the Antichrist of the end time, as is asserted and defended in this commentary (Jerome's Comm. on Daniel, trans. Archer, p. 103. See also Froom, The Prophetic Faith of the Fathers, I, 277. Hippolytus, "Treatise on Christ and Antichrist," Ante-Nicean Fathers, V, 213).

24. Seventy weeks are determined. The Hebrew word for week (shābuʿîm), "sevens," means "sevens" of years. This interpretation was the common one in antiquity. Daniel had been thinking of a multiple of "seven" of years (9:1,2; cf. Jer 25:11,12). He knew that multiple (seventy years) to be an epoch of judgment for 490 years of violated sabbaths (490÷7=70. See II Chr 36:21). Furthermore, there was a common "seven" of years employed in civil and religious reckoning (Lev 25, esp. v. 8) quite as aptly called a "week" as the seven of days. Not only so, but when weeks of days are intended (Dan 10:2,3), the Hebrew for "days" (yamîm), is added to "weeks" (shābuʿîm). This apparently indicates a break from the use of chapter 9. More importantly, if any literal meaning is to be attached to the weeks, no period less than weeks of years meets the contextual demands. Upon thy people and upon thy holy city. The people are Jews; the city is Jerusalem. "Here I have rendered al upon . . . in order to approach nearer the true idea of the Hebrew; for al often designates the idea of on or upon in the sense of what is burdensome, or it is used in what the lexicons style a hostile sense . . . . Plainly it is so here. The seventy weeks comprise the special burden, the trials, the troubles, through which Israel must pass, before the Great Deliverer will make his appearance, or in the language of the remainder of the verse, before sin will be thoroughly subdued and expiated, and righteousness introduced in the full measure often predicted" (Stuart, Commentary, p. 268). It is this fact, the Jerusalem-Jewish reference of the prophecy, that renders improbable any of the larger "Church" and "redemption" interpretations.

Six accomplishments of the 490 years are predicted:

(1) To finish the transgression. "Finish" (Heb. lᵉkallēʾ) means "to complete," not "to atone," as is sometimes asserted. The kind of transgressions Daniel had been confessing for his people were to come to an end. That has not yet, two and a half millenniums later, occurred.

(2) To make an end of sins. Literally, to seal up. This word (as in Job 9:7; 37:7) means to bring under full restraint. Cf. the sealing of Satan's prison to restrain him (Rev 20:1-3).

(3) To make reconciliation for iniquity (l'kap-pēr 'āwōn) Calvary's reconciliation will become effective for Daniel's people when again, "in that Day" of Messiah's second advent, they look on Him "whom they have pierced" (Zech 12:10; cf. Rev 1:7) and shall in repentance believe on Him (Jer 50:4,5,17-20).

The first three items of accomplishment are negative. The remaining three are positive:

(4) To bring in everlasting righteousness. This will be effected by inward moral transformation (Jer 31:33,34). (5) To seal up the vision and prophecy (Heb. prophet). When the people cease sinning, the disciplinary oracles of prophets will no longer be needed (Jer 31:34). (6) To anoint the most Holy (most holy place, ASV marg.). Most commentators, even many amillennialists (e.g., Keil and Leupold), to whom this passage is somewhat of an embarrassment, feel that this refers to a renewed Temple, anointed like the Tabernacle of old, following the results enumerated in the five promises preceding (see Ezk 40:1-7; Isa 4:2-6). The nature of worship in such a temple is problematical in view of the end of the ritual system (see Epistle to the Hebrews; Col 2:14-17). But this problem should not interfere with acceptance of this prediction.

25. From the going forth of the commandment to restore. Though the decree was made in heaven, it would be made manifest on earth in some human king's edict permitting the return and restoration. The preferred view is that of Africanus (second and third centuries) that this refers to the decree of Artaxerxes Longimanus (465–423? B.C.) made in 445/444 B.C. (Neh 2). The language of Daniel fits this better than it fits the decree of Cyrus (Isa 44:28, in context; Ezr. 1:1-4). Unto the Messiah the Prince. Opinions are nearly unanimous that this is Christ our Lord. Messiah is the Hebrew word meaning anointed, rendered Christos in Greek and transliterated Christus in Latin, from which we derive "Christ." Some official presentation, such as his baptism and the formal beginning of his ministry, or his triumphal entry, appears to be predicted. Shall be seven weeks, and threescore and two weeks. This translation best renders the Hebrew and has the weight of centuries of Christian tradition and translation behind it. The reasoning and evidence behind the RSV, which renders this clause quite incomprehensible, is most obscure, though the effect—to make the prophecy focus on Antiochus rather than on Christ—is plain enough. The Berkeley Version is no better. Both seem to destroy the essential reference to Christ in this verse.

As a matter of fact, 7 plus 62 equals 69; 69 x 7 = 483. From 444 B.C. to about 30 A.D., the general period of Christ's ministry is 470 plus years—so close to the specified 483 that without further refinement the correspondence is quite convincing—and as precise in proportion as the 70 years of Jeremiah's prophecy, really only about 68 years. Inasmuch as Christ presented himself officially as "Messiah-Prince" only once (Zech 9:9; cf. Mt 21:5. Contrast Mt 16:20; Lk 9:20,21) at the beginning of his last week, those interpreters who favor the Triumphal Entry for the close of the 69 weeks appear to be on the right track.

(Sir Robert Anderson's work, The Coming Prince, which seeks to reduce the prophecy to mathematical precision, is most convincing. In view, however, of the present state of NT studies in relation to the chronology of the life of our Lord and especially the date of the crucifixion, commitment to that view is a most risky matter. Anderson's evidences for the termini a quo and ad quem are still most respectable even if his mathematics is less than absolute demonstrative proof of inspiration.)

26. And after the threescore and two weeks (ASV). It is most important to observe that certain events are said to be and after (Heb. w'ahᵃrê) the sixty-two weeks (plus, of course, the seven, or sixty-nine in all). The Hebrew word does not mean "then" or "at that time," as do certain other words (cf. 12:1). Nor does the prophecy at all place the next event in the seventieth week. It places it after the sixty-ninth. Shall Messiah be cut off, but not for himself (or, and shall have nothing, ASV): and the people of the prince that shall come shall destroy the city and the sanctuary.

It is agreed by almost all evangelical interpreters that these two events, the cutting off of the Messiah (Anointed One) and the destruction of the sanctuary refer to the crucifixion of Christ and the destruction of Jerusalem by the Romans. These two events were separated by a period of nearly forty years (29–70 A.D.). Yet, in the literary order of the passage, they are both after the sixty-ninth week and before the final "one week" mentioned in the next verse. Thus the very syntax, grammar, and word-meaning indicate a gap in the succession of the seventy weeks.

Other important reasons for supposing a gap here are: (1) Jesus placed the culminating week, with its "abomination" in the times of final Antichrist, just before His second advent (Mt 24:15). (2) Daniel 7:25, which describes what appear to be the very same events as those of 9:27, the seventieth week, is certainly a prophecy of the times of final Antichrist. (3) The period of three and one-half times or years (the second half-week of v. 27) is often mentioned elsewhere in Scripture and always in an eschatological setting (Rev 11:2,3; 12:6, 14). (4) The six things to be accomplished in the seventy weeks (see Dan 9:24 and comments) require the second advent of Christ, and the restoration and conversion of Israel.

These considerations show that the idea of a gap in the weeks at this point is a matter of exegesis. Considerations of theology are not primarily involved. It is not this author's opinion that the Church is a mere provisional consideration thrust into this hiatus or gap. Both 'dispensational' and 'covenantal' theologians, doubtless, find more in this prophecy than is properly there. Let us stay by what the passage says. C. F. Keil (Comm., in loco) is correct in asserting that the prince is said to be coming (hābbā'), because he has already been introduced and discussed in the prophecy of chapter 7 as the final Antichrist. The Romans who destroyed Jerusalem (A.D. 70) were his people because they and he belong to the fourth stage (the Roman) of world empire (chs. 2; 7).

27. And he shall confirm the covenant with many for one week (make a firm covenant, ASV). The language (higbîr, from gābar, "be strong") does not signify confirmation of a covenant but causation of a firm covenant. And he shall cause to prevail is an excellent translation. The most natural antecedent for he, the subject of the clause, is the wicked "prince" of verse 26. This is the nearest noun in grammatical agreement, and it fits the sense. The many here, as elsewhere, is a reference to the Hebrew people, the subject of discussion throughout chapter 9 (cf. vv. 2,12,18,19, esp. 24, "thy people . . . thy holy city"). Evidently the covenant is to be made between Antichrist and Israel when the Jews are back in their homeland in the last days. The exact nature of the covenant is unknown.

The evil and destructive events described in the remainder of this verse should be interpreted as summary information concerning the final "time of Jacob's trouble" (Jer 30:7 and context) set forth rather more fully in Dan 12:1 ff.; II Thess 2; Rev 13; 14; and other passages.

C. The Final Vision: Israel Through the Centuries and at the Consummation in the Hands of Enemies and in the Hands of God. 10:1–12:13. The last three chapters of Daniel constitute one unit of prophecy. The "dates" at 11:1 and 12:1 do not announce new oracles, as does similar information at the beginning of other chapters.

Chapter 10 is the record of an introductory vision, corresponding in the structure of the section with the first two verses of chapter 9. Chapter 11, down to verse 35, relates to events of long ago that transpired mainly in the Grecian period after the death of Alexander and culminated with Antiochus Epiphanes' persecution of the Jews. From 11:36 to the end of chapter 12, the prediction is of end-time events.

Throughout this section Daniel is filling in details of the picture sketched in his earlier prophecies. Chapter 2 gave the grand outline; chapter 7 renewed it from another point of view, enlarging upon the final end-time stage of the fourth kingdom and the kingdom of Messiah. The future of the Hebrews ("saints" or "holy people") is barely introduced. Chapter 8 enlarged upon Jewish fortunes in the period of Medo-Persia and Greece, concentrating on Antiochus Epiphanes and the Maccabean conflict. Chapter 9 presented a sketch of the whole future of Israel and Jerusalem. Now this last oracle, chapters 10 to 12, fills in further details of Israel's future, concentrating both on the Antiochus epoch and on the questions of "last things": the Great Tribulation, the resurrection of the dead, final rewards and punishments.

These final chapters also report a marvelous culmination in the growing spiritual experience of God's prophet. First, he only interpreted another's dream by means of a dream of his own (ch. 2). Later, he interpreted further dreams and experiences of Nebuchadnezzar and Belshazzar (chs. 4; 5). Chapter 7 reports visions of his own – truly grand spiritual experiences. The story of chapter 8 reports a spiritual "transportation" whereby he received, in a land far from home, a vision of the future as it would affect his nation. Next is reported actual physical sight of the angelic Gabriel in Daniel's own room. Now the prophet sees with his eyes one like the very Son of God in his physical presence.

1) Circumstances of the Revelation. 10:1-4.

1. The date explains Daniel's mourning. By Cyrus' third year, the work begun on the restoration of the Temple (Ezr 1–3) had been stopped (Ezr 4:4,5). 2,3. These verses show that old age may be a time of intense spiritual activity and accomplishment (cf. Lk 2:36,37). This was temporary abstinence, not asceticism (see Mk 7:14-23; Acts 10:9-18; I Tim 4:1-5).

2) The Revelation and Its Effects. 10:5-9.

In favor of identifying the man of verse 5 with Gabriel, the angel who later talks with Daniel, is the absence of any clear categorical indication otherwise. In favor of identifying the man with the preincarnate Christ are: (1) correspondence of language with 7:13; (2) similarities to Ezekiel's vision of Him (Ezk 1:26, in context); (3) similarity to John's vision of Christ (Rev 1:12-20); (4) His standing, later in the vision, "above the waters," set apart, where even angels dare not stand (Dan 12:6, ASV); (5) the manner in which angels appeal to Him as having superior knowledge (12:6).

The effect of this sight on Daniel should make men cautious about seeking or praying for unusual supernatural experiences of the presence of God beyond those experiences ordinarily granted to sincere believers.

3) Strengthening of the Prophet for His Work. 10:10-12,15-19.

Suggestions for the believer's private devotional life: (1) Fear is not necessarily detrimental (contrast Rom 3:18). "God wishes our fears to restrain us like a bridle" (Calvin). (2) Prayer may be with fervor when the will of God is clear. The angel only confirmed Daniel's knowledge (cf. I Jn 5:14). (3) Deep humility is a proper accompaniment of prayer in view of God's sovereignty. (4) Fear, fervor, and humility may be joined with confidence or boldness, for one comes to his own God in Christ (cf. "thy God," Dan 10:12). See also Heb 11:6; Jas 1:6,7; Heb 4:16. (5) Expectancy. Something really happened.

4) The Scope of the Prophecy. 10:14. See comments on 2:38.

5) The Conflicts of the Angelic Messenger. 10:13,20,21.

In the OT world men believed each nation had its own special god (e.g., Isa 37:38; Dan 4:8; II Chr 28:23). The prophets proclaimed idols to be nothing. There is, however, in other portions of Scripture, occasional information to the effect that evil spirits, not to be identified with the idols, stood behind the whole delusion, gaining pleasure and wicked profit from it (Eph 6:11,12; I Cor 8:4,5; 10:19,20; Jude 9; Rev 12:7; Mt 25:41). See also II Cor 10:3,4; I Tim 4:1-4.

6) The Immediate Future of Israel in Relation to the Nations. 11:1-35.

a) Prophecy of the Medes and Persians (vv. 1,2). The purpose and nature of the angelic strengthening of Darius may only be surmised. Perhaps it had something to do with the benevolent treatment this king of the realm accorded the Jews. The three kings in Persia appear to have been: first, Cambyses, Cyrus' son (accession 529 B.C.); second, Pseudo-Smerdis, an impostor (though Olmstead, History of Persia, argues that he was a genuine Achaemenid, who reigned briefly in 522 B.C.); and third, Darius I, or Hystaspes, also called, the Great, (522–486 B.C.); a truly great monarch. The fourth, far greater than they all was, then, Xerxes, known in Esther as Ahasuerus (486-464 B.C.). The wars of Darius and of Xerxes, by which the Persians infuriated all of Greece, are well known to students of classical antiquity and standard ancient history.

b) Prophecy of the Greeks and Alexander (vv. 3,4). See notes on chapter 8.

c) Prophecy of Syria and Egypt in Conflict with One Another and with the Jews (vv. 5-35). Lack of space forbids tracing in detail the correspondence between Daniel's prophecy and the history of the Syrian Seleucid kingdom (the king of the north) and the history of the Egyptian kingdom of the Ptolemies (the king of the south). The prophecy does not give a continuous view; i.e., there are gaps in it. Nor is present knowledge of the Egyptian history of the epoch complete. Even the so-called historical portions of the OT lack the precision required of strict history. We may not, therefore, expect the predictions to be as precise in regard to sequence, chronology, etc., as our curiosity desires.

Egypt (v. 8) is mentioned by name in such a manner as to identify it as the "king of the south" (v. 9); but Syria (actually much larger than Syria, and unrelated historically to the OT kingdom of that name) is left unnamed. This appears to be because Egypt had long been known as a kingdom in Daniel's time, but the kingdom of the Seleucids was not yet in existence. If Daniel had been written in the second century, as some critics say, the kingdom of Syria would almost certainly have been named.

At verse 21 Antiochus Epiphanes (175–163 B.C.) is introduced as a vile person. His wicked persecution of the Jews and desecration of the Temple are described by a contemporary witness in I Maccabees, which ought to be read by every student of Daniel. His action is predicted also at Dan 8:13, and his deeds furnish a kind of pattern for those of the wicked "prince that shall come" (Dan 9:26,27; cf. II Thess 2:4,5; Mt 24:15-21).

In the dreadful days of Antiochus only those who knew their God (Dan 11:32) were able to hold up their heads without shame, being enabled by God to do exploits. Many died for their faith (vv. 34,35), by their deeds instructing many (v. 33). Their suffering produced unusual character, by God's help (vv. 34,35). They were the separatists of that day, who refused the pagan vices of their Greek lords no less than the beautiful lies of the heathen ritual and religion. They constitute the main link between the Testaments, for their spiritual descendants appear in the Gospels as the Pharisees (whose name means "separated ones"). How sad that their descendants fell from their true principles! Hebrews 11:34-39 memorializes the faithful Jews of that time of tribulation.

d) Prophecy of Israel in Conflict with "the Willful King" (vv. 36-45). Jerome states that in his time this portion of Daniel was applied to Antichrist by "our writers." And to the present day that interpretation is prevalent. The following are the chief reasons for holding that the prophecy shifts from Antiochus to Antichrist precisely at verse 36:

(1) The scope of the prophecy (10:14) demands some eschatological reference, thus making this view of the division a possibility.

(2) Although all prophecy in Daniel down to 11:35 can easily be related to well-known events of ancient history, correspondence can not be continued beyond that.

(3) Verse 36 mentions a king whose period is "the indignation," a technical term drawn from Israel's prophetic literature, usually having reference to eschatological events (e.g., Isa 26:20).

(4) Predictions herein correspond quite precisely with recognized prophecies of final Antichrist (cf. II Thess 2:4 ff.; Rev 13; 17).

(5) A natural literary break occurs before Dan 11:36, observed by both the ASV and the RSV.

(6) The willful king is a new element, separate from either of the two kingdoms whose history is under consideration up to verse 35.

(7) Of decisive force is the connection with the Great Tribulation, the resurrection of the dead, and final rewards, etc. (12:1-3) furnished by the words, "And at that time" (Heb. ûb'ʿēt hahî', 12:1). The time of these eschatological events is the time of the events of the latter part of chapter 11.

36. This king is the same as the "son of perdition" (II Thess 2:3,4), who is to appear before Christ's second advent (II Thess 2:1,2; cf. Dan 7:11,25). His career will be short, lasting only until the indignation of God is vented upon mankind in the end time.

37. God of his fathers ('ᵉlōhê 'abōtāyw). Though the phrase may be translated, "gods of his father," surely it is to be interpreted of the Lord God of Israel, for a false Messiah of the Jews could hardly be a Gentile. "God of the fathers" is a familiar designation of the Lord.

Desire of women. Meaning unknown. Interpretations vary from female idols to sexual passion. (See comments on "little horn" of ch. 7.) 38,39. God of forces. Worship of military power, such as that of the Caesars, Hittites, etc. The two verses describe a monumental fraud, who, while proclaiming himself a god, secretly practices religious quackery with astrologers, fortunetellers, etc.,—a situation not uncommon in history.

40. And at the time of the end. Cf. I Cor 15:24; Mt 28:20; 13:39. The end is the end of the events prophesied in this book—the arrival of Messiah's kingdom to replace all these others. From here to the close of the prophecies of Daniel, consummating events are in view (cf. esp. 12:1, "and at that time," etc.). Antichrist's end is set forth elsewhere (Rev 19:11 ff.; Isa 11:4; Ps 2). Observe that throughout this section this willful king is a different person from either "the king of the north" or "the king of the south," who both fight against him. With what nations these two opponents will be identified is difficult to say for certain. Antichrist's success at war is prophesied here (cf. Dan 7:8,20; Rev 17:13). Likely the particular engines of war—whirlwind, chariots, horsemen, ships—are to be interpreted in terms of the engines of that future day. He will have modern weapons. Daniel saw war in terms of his own day, else he would not have recognized it.

41. This describes an attack on Palestine. Perhaps it should be connected with Antichrist's breaking covenant (Dan 9:27). On his failure to capture Edom, Moab, and Ammon, see Isa 11:14. Many countries. The word "countries" is not in the Hebrew.

42-44. Correspondence of this section with events leading up to World War II, especially Mussolini's early career, was startling. But the failure of history to justify the prophetic interpretations of that decade should discourage other premature identifications with contemporary powers. This much seems sure: there are to be at least three strong national powers contemporary with Antichrist, the "Roman" king. They will be "of the north" (v. 40), "of the south" (v. 40), and out of the east (v. 44).

45. Evidently in Palestine to put an end to the perennial Jewish problem by wiping out the Jews, he himself meets his end (Zech 12:1-14; cf. Joel 3:16; see also Zech 14; Rev 14:17-20; 19). Tregelles (op. cit.) applies Isa 14:14 and Ezk 28 to the fall of this man. G. H. Lang (Histories and Prophecies of Daniel) applies Ezk 38; 39 at this point.

e) Prophecy Concerning the Great Tribulation of Israel (12:1). Here see Jer 30:4-11. At that time (cf. on Dan 11:36). At the same time as the events of 11:36-45. Michael. See Rev 12:7; cf. Josh 5:13-15; II Kgs 6:15-17; Isa 37:35, 36; Mt 26:53. This is Israel's time of trouble. Every reference to it uses superlative language (cf. also Mt 24:21). It is a providential chastening by the wicked hands of Antichrist to prepare for Messiah's coming (cf. Jer 30; 31; Ezk 20:33-38. See R. Culver, Daniel and the Latter Days, pp. 69-76). Though especially Israel's tribulation, it is a time of divine indignation over all the earth as well; so others will suffer (Isa 26:20; Dan 11:36; Rev 16:10).

f) Prophecy Concerning the Resurrection of the Dead (v. 2). Like the rest of the prophecy, this verse relates to Israelites. Since Scripture knows nothing of a special resurrection for Israelites, the "first resurrection" predicted in Rev 20:6 will include this company. Daniel 12:2 refers to righteous Israel only. Other passages which speak of three stages in resurrection (that of Christ, that of his saints, that of the rest of the dead) are I Cor 15:20-24 (see R. Culver, "A Neglected Millennial Passage from St. Paul," Bibliotheca Sacra, April, 1956; C. F. Kling, trans. of D. W. Poor on I Cor 15:20-24 in Lange's Commentary) and Rev 20. See also Jn 5:28, 29; Acts 24:15. That this passage describes a selective resurrection is agreed not only by many premillennial scholars but also by some amillennialists (e.g., Keil). See R. Culver, Daniel and the Latter Days, pp. 172-176; Tregelles, Remarks, in loco.

g) Prophecy Concerning Final Rewards (v. 3). Wise. See 11:33,35; 12:10. Cf. Prov 11:30; I Cor 9:19; Jas 5:20; I Pet 2:19-25; 4:12-16. See also I Cor 3:19-23; 9:25; II Cor 5:8-10; Phil 4:1; I Thess 2:19; II Tim 2:5; 4:8; Jas 1:12; I Pet 5:4.

h) Final Prophecies and Instructions (vv. 4-13).

4. Shut up the words, and seal the book. No reference to obscuration of meaning is intended. Parallel usage shows that it has to do with the protection and authentication of the message. See a concordance. Run to and fro . . . knowledge . . . increased. Eyes will run to and fro in scanning the prophecy, and understanding of it will grow. The disposition of the book and its future are under consideration.

5. Daniel (like the apostles, Acts 1:3-6) knew that revelation was now at an end. He wondered when all these events would come to pass (cf. Acts 1:7,8). Other two. Two angelic creatures, one of whom may have been Gabriel of the previous visions. 6. Upon the waters. Better, above the waters (ASV). Here the gulf that separates creatures (angels) from Creator appears in the vision. The man clothed in linen appears to be the preincarnate Son of God himself (cf. Rev 1:13-20). Note that ultimate questions are referred to him.

7. The consummation is to take place when the three and one-half times (3½ years; 1,260 days, 42 months) so frequently mentioned in Daniel's previous prophecies and in the Revelation are run out. This verse is an important base in support of the futurist interpretation not only of Dan 9:27 (seventieth week) but of the main portions of the Revelation. That last one-half week of years is an important consideration in prophecy, because in it take place the chief events of consummation. The majestic oath-taking scene reappears in Rev 10:5-7. Note that the center of the prophetic interest herein is still God's (and Daniel's) precious holy people.

8. Daniel was still no expert on prophetic interpretation. There will be no expert until prophecy becomes history (cf. Jn 2:22). 9. See on verse 4. 10. See Ps 19:7.

11. This carries prophecy from the middle of the seventieth week of Daniel 9 through the first thirty days of the Millennium to follow, perhaps to the end of some "mopping up" period. 12. This carries the prophecy sixty-five days beyond the end of the "week." Does it reach to the full establishment of Messiah's reign after sixty-five days of initial preliminary work? The Millennium, if a true administration of heaven's rule on earth in a visible manner, will require time for administrative processes to begin to work.

13. But go thou thy way till the end be: for thou shalt rest, and stand in thy lot at the end of the days. Go thy way. A man of the advanced age of Daniel cannot don an ascension robe and climb to the nearest hilltop to wait for the coming of the Lord. And neither can we. Rather, all must, like Daniel, serve faithfully to the end.

> Let us then be up and doing
> With a heart for any fate—
> Still achieving, still pursuing,
> Learn to labor and to wait.
> — Longfellow.

Thou shalt rest. In the light of the rest of the Bible, these words mean simply that Daniel, like all true believers, would truly find a kind of rest in the grave (cf. Isa 57:2), his spirit rejoicing in the presence of God, where he would "see his face" (Rev 22:4; Lk 16:19-22). The intermediate state, that is, the period between death and the resurrection, is neither one of painful purgatory, as the Roman Church teaches, nor one of unconscious sleep of body and soul. It is rather to "depart, and to be with Christ" (Phil 1:23), "in paradise" (Lk 23:43). It is a time of rest, as we read here, in the bosom of Abraham (Lk 16:22) and a time of comfort (Lk 16:25). And stand in thy lot at the end of the days. Neither Daniel nor any other saint will ever lose out in the "world's broad field of battle, in the bivouac of life"—rather, he will stand up in resurrection glory. Sown in corruption, reaped in incorruption; brought down in dishonor, brought up in honor; lowered in defeat, raised in victory; buried in sorrow, resurrected in joy, we shall stand to receive our lot. There is a "crown of righteousness" laid up which our Lord will give us in that day.

On this calm note of immeasurable joy, the book of Daniel comes to an end.

HOSEA

INTRODUCTION

Author. Our knowledge of the life of Hosea, the son of Beeri, is derived exclusively from the book which bears his name. He prophesied to the Northern Kingdom (Israel, or Ephraim) during the time that Isaiah was prophesying in Judah (1:1; cf. Isa 1:1). Another contemporary, Amos (Amos 1:1), was a native of Judah who prophesied in Israel. Hosea, however, was the one writing prophet of the Northern Kingdom to address his own people. Speaking to them with a broken heart, he prophesied their impending exile (Hos 3:4). His prophetic vision looked beyond exile to restoration, when a chastened people would again acknowledge the exclusive claims of the Lord (3:5). Since the fall of Samaria is not mentioned as an accomplished fact by Hosea, it is thought that he ministered for the most part before 722 B.C. Most of his prophetic ministry evidently took place during the quarter century from 750 to 725 B.C. That he lived and prophesied as late as the times of Hezekiah (beginning c. 715 B.C.) is attested in 1:1.

Hosea's Marriage. Israel's unfaithfulness to the Lord is depicted by Hosea in terms of a wife who has turned her back upon a faithful husband in order to follow evil lovers. The imagery is taken from Hosea's own experience, for 1:2 tells us that the Lord spoke to Hosea saying, "Go, take thee a wife of whoredoms." The many interpretations of these strange words largely fall into three categories: (1) Some suggest that the words are intended to present an allegory designed to impart the spiritual lesson of Israel's unfaithfulness, and that Hosea did not actually contract such a marriage. Among scholars who have held that view are Calvin, Keil, von Hoonacher, Reuss, Gressman, Robert Pfeiffer, and E. J. Young. (2) Some insist that Hosea actually married a woman known to him to be a harlot, perhaps a temple prostitute. T. H. Robinson and T. Laetsch defend this viewpoint. (3) Many hold that Hosea married a woman whom he thought to be pure but later learned of her faithlessness. According to this view the expression "wife of whoredoms" (1:2) was used proleptically. At the time of writing the book, Hosea saw that the hand of God had brought about a marriage which, from the human point of view, was marked by unmitigated tragedy. With high hopes, Hosea married Gomer, only to learn of her tendency toward adultery. Separation followed, and 2:2 actually contains a divorce formula—"She is not my wife, neither am I her husband." Still, Hosea's love persisted, and subsequently he remarried her (3:1). This parallels God's dealings with Israel. After vowing faithfulness to the Law of the Lord, Israel went lusting after Baal and the other gods of Canaan until God brought about a temporary rejection (the Exile), after which chastened Israel was returned to God's favor in the land of Judea. This view identifies the "woman" of 3:1 with the "wife of whoredoms" of 1:2. With some variations it has been held by Ehrlich, Marti, W. R. Harper, and G. W. Anderson. The present commentary is written from this viewpoint.

Hosea's Times. Hosea's prophecies were first uttered during the chaotic reign of Jeroboam II, when Israel enjoyed external prosperity but suffered inner corruption. The shrines were thronged with worshipers (Amos 4:4, 5), but the poor were oppressed (Amos 4:1) by a people whose religion was external. During the prosperous days of Jeroboam II judgment seemed remote to the Israelite, yet Assyrian power was soon to be felt in western Asia. The year following Jeroboam's death, Tiglath-pileser III came to the throne of Assyria (745 B.C.). By 732 B.C. Damascus had fallen to the Assyrians, and a decade later Samaria, the capital of Israel, fell and its people were deported. Amos and Hosea prophesied during the closing years of the Northern Kingdom, junt as Jeremiah of Jerusalem prophesied during the last hours of Judah's history.

COMMENTARY

I. The Prophet's Married Life. 1:1—3:5.

A. His Marriage to Gomer. 1:1-9.

1. Hosea's prophecy begins with the assertion that it has its origin in God: The word of the Lord . . . came. The word is divine; it finds expression in a human instrument—the prophet, Hosea, the son of Beeri. The name Hosea means "deliverance" or "salvation." The prophet's father, Beeri, is not mentioned elsewhere in Scripture, although early Jewish writers identified him with Beerah (I Chr 5:6), who was carried into exile by Tiglath-pileser. Hosea prophesied in the days of Uzziah and was a contemporary of Isaiah (cf. Isa 1:1). Isaiah, however, lived in Jerusalem and addressed his prophecies largely to the Southern Kingdom (Judah), whereas Hosea prophesied to the Northern Kingdom (Israel or Ephraim).

2. Hosea was told to marry a wife of whoredom (ASV) and to be a father to children of whoredom. Many commentators hold that he did not actually marry a harlot, but that the description is to be taken allegorically (see Introd.). They interpret Hosea's words as descriptive of a vision which he saw rather than of an event in which he was a participant. There is no hint of allegory, however, in the text, and the words seem actually to describe Hosea's marital life. The harlotry of his wife may well have developed after her marriage to the prophet, however. In retrospect Hosea would think of this marriage as providentially ordained by God, for it provided the analogy which he used in addressing Israel. The prophet charges: the land hath committed great whoredom. As Hosea's wife had proved untrue to him, so Israel was untrue to the Lord. Spiritual adultery is a figure of speech drawn from the Canaanite fertility cult, with its ritual prostitution.

3. Gomer the daughter of Diblaim was the name of Hosea's wife. The name was a common one, and there is no ground for reading into it an allegorical meaning. 4. Gomer's first son bore the name Jezreel, which means God sows. It had a twofold significance: (1) After the people of Israel had been scattered because of their sin, God would plant or "sow" them in their own land again. (2) Sins committed in the valley of Jezreel by Jehu would be punished, and Israel would taste defeat. The blood of Jezreel is a reference to Jehu's ill-advised attempt to defend the cause of the Lord by murdering all of the Baal-worshipers (II Kgs 10:1-11).

5. In judgment God said, I will break the bow of Israel. The bow here represents the might (cf. Gen 49:24) of the Kingdom of Israel, which would soon be ended. A broken bow was a sign of impotence. 6. Lo-ruhamah (not pitied). The daughter of Gomer was given a name designed to tell the people of Israel that they could expect no mercy. As "the unpitied one," she symbolized the plight of the Northern Kingdom, which had sinned against God and was ripe for judgment. 7. In contrast to Israel's imminent fall, God said, I will have mercy upon the house of Judah. Israel fell before the Assyrians (722 B.C.), but when Sennacherib besieged Jerusalem, God intervened to save the city (II Kgs 19:35). 9. The second son of Gomer bore the name Lo-ammi, meaning, Not my people. At Sinai Israel had covenanted to be the Lord's people, and He to be their God (Ex 19:1-7). They repeatedly broke that covenant, and here Hosea prophetically declares that they will be rejected. This would not be a permanent rejection (cf. Hos 2:3), but it would result in the Exile and the destruction of the Northern Kingdom as a political entity.

B. A Message of Hope. 1:10,11.

10. According to promise (Gen 15:5, 6), the number of the children of Israel would be as the sand of the sea. Hosea had pronounced judgment upon unrepentant Israel, but he held forth the promise of ultimate redemption. The people, although decimated by the enemy, were to be revived numerically and would again be called the sons of the living God.

C. Judgment of Faithless Israel. 2:1-13.

2. Hosea was to address Gomer with the words–she is not my wife, neither am I her husband. The prophet's wife had separated herself from him, and with a broken heart he recognized that their marriage ties were severed. The words are reminiscent of the formula used in divorce. In like manner God now addresses Israel. 3. She must put away her adulteries lest I strip her naked. This punishment for adultery is attested in Scripture (Ezk 16:38) and in the Nuzi tablets from northern Mesopotamia. The words here apply to Israel, who would become a prey to her enemies when left desolate and naked by her God. 5. Hosea's wife had said, I will go after my lovers. As she looked to her paramours, so Israel looked to Baal and the other Canaanite gods. 7. After being subjected to disappointment, Gomer, like Israel, will say, I will go and return to my first husband. Neither Gomer nor Israel could find satisfaction in infidelity. God here declares that he will bring Israel to the place where she shall see her need of him.

8. God had dealt mercifully with his people: I gave her corn, and wine, and oil. All the fruitfulness of the land had its source in the Lord, but Israel forgot him and took his blessings for granted. Corn (i.e., grain), wine, and oil were the material blessings provided by God in Canaan (Deut 7:13). 9. God, in discipline, declared that he would take away . . . corn. By removing the blessing he would bring Israel to the place where she would remember its divine source. Baal was powerless to help; and if the Lord did not provide for Israel, she would be hungry and destitute. As corn (grain) was used for food, so wool and flax provided clothing. Faithless Israel would be unclothed because she forgot the Lord. 10. In judgment God added that he would discover her lewdness. Literally, uncover her lewdness, i.e., reveal her to her lovers to be the shameful creature she really was. 13. The days of Baalim were sinful days, during which Israel forgot the Lord and made idolatrous and often lewd practices part of Israelite religious life. God could not sit idly by when his name was thus desecrated.

D. The Restoration of Faithless Israel. 2:14-23.

14. In love God says of Israel, I will allure her. God says that he will persuade his people with endearing words to turn from their idols and find joy in him. In Canaan Israel rejected her God. Surrounded by other "lovers" (i.e., Baal and other idols), she felt no need of him. God, however, declares his purpose to remove his people from the land of milk and honey and bring her into the wilderness, so that he may speak comfortably unto her. Literally, speak unto her heart. The grieved lover desired to win back the object of his love. He was going to take Israel to the solitary wilderness, where she could hear his voice without distraction.

15. Vineyards, which speak of prosperity and fruit-bearing, would be given by God to his restored people. The valley of Achor is described as a door of hope. There, centuries before, Achan had died as the troubler of Israel (Josh 7:25,26). Only through Achor, trouble, could Israel come back to fellowship with the Lord and its resultant blessing. God would thus restore the days of her youth. When youthful Israel crossed the Red Sea, she had a song (Ex 15:1-19). As she lost her first love, the song was quieted; but Hosea pictures repentant, restored Israel as again singing. 16. Restored Israel would address God as Ishi, literally, my husband, a word of tenderness. Baali is a synonym of ishi, but it contains the word Baal (master), the name of a Canaanite deity. For this reason it was associated with idolatry and rejected by Hosea. The Baalim (v. 18) will not be mentioned by restored Israel, who then will be true to her Lord.

18. Ancient Hittite covenants were of two kinds: (1) parity covenants, between equals; (2) suzerainty covenants between a sovereign and his subjects. The covenant between God and Israel was of the latter type. The Biblical covenant partakes of the nature of an ordinance with the beasts of the field. Nature itself will be at peace with restored Israel (cf. Isa 11:1-9). God adds, I will break the bow. The weapons of Israel's enemies will be broken so that they can do Israel no harm. 19. In love God tells his people, I will betroth thee. A second marriage between God and Israel—after she is restored—is pictured as preceded by a second betrothal. This betrothal shall be for ever; i.e., it will not, like the first marriage between God and Israel at Sinai, be brought to a violent end. This betrothal is in righteousness. The bond between God and Israel is not mere sentiment, but one based upon a right relationship. It is also in judgment, or justice, as opposed to arbitrariness. God will deal with his people in loving-kindness. Hebrew hesed, a word which stresses the idea of solidarity and belonging together. God deals with his people in a way consistent with their belonging to him. He likewise deals with them in mercies, or compassion, being mindful of their needs. 20. The betrothal is in faithfulness, for God will be faithful to his covenant, and his beloved will learn to respond.

21. God can now answer his people's prayers: I will hear the heavens, or respond to the heavens. Hosea depicts the plea of Israel for prosperity as going through the heavens to the Lord. The earth will not sigh in vain for the rains of heaven, for they shall hear the earth, i.e., the heavens will be sensitive to the plea of a parched earth. All nature works in harmony. 22. The earth shall hear, i.e., respond to the corn (grain), and the wine, and the oil, the staple agricultural crops of Palestine. The needs of the crops are discerned by the earth; the earth's needs are discerned by the heavens; and the need of the heavens is discerned by God. In poetic language Hosea thus depicts the God of heaven as the ultimate source of all blessing. God lovingly responds to the needs of the earth, watering it so that it will yield in abundance. The corn, wine, and oil will then respond to Jezreel (the Lord sows), here representing Israel. 23. Thereupon God adds, I will sow her unto me. Restored Israel will flourish like seed in fertile soil.

E. Hosea's Redemption of His Faithless Wife. 3:1-5.

1. Hosea was urged to love the woman who had turned her back upon him for the companionship of others. She was beloved of her friend, i.e., her paramour. Hosea was called upon to love an adulteress, one who had been unfaithful. She was like the Israelites, who love[d] flagons of wine. Better, cakes of raisins (RSV). They participated in pagan Baal rites which involved the offering of cakes of dried grapes. 2. Hosea bought his wife back from the slavery into which her sin had led her for fifteen pieces of silver. The price of a slave was thirty shekels of silver (Ex 21:32). Hosea evidently paid half in money and half in grain. 3. As punishment for sins, the prophet says, Thou shalt abide for me many days. The verb is sometimes used in the sense of "to live in seclusion" (Lev 12:4; Deut 21:13). Gomer was to lead a quiet, secluded life until Hosea would be free to take her as his wife. So will I also be for thee is literally, and also I to thee. Hosea appears to be saying that Gomer must be separated from others, and he would not have marital relations with her during the period defined as many days.

4. Hosea's experience with Gomer had a counterpart in God's experience with Israel, which would be many days without a king, and without a prince. Israel, in exile, would have no civil government but would be governed by strangers. She would also be without a sacrifice. The manner and place of sacrifice were particularly stressed in the Levitical law. Israel would be unable to meet these conditions in the land of exile. Without an image. Literally a pillar, a cult object used in pagan worship but forbidden in the Law (Deut 16:22). Israel's exile would remove her from the familiar temptations of Canaan. Without an ephod. The ephod was a part of the high priest's attire (Ex 28:6-14). The root meaning of the word is, "to overlay," and in Gideon's time we read of an ephod which was an idol. It was probably made of wood overlaid with precious metal. Without teraphim, or household gods (cf. Gen 31:19, 34; I Sam 19:13,16). Hosea states that the Exile would be a time during which the cult objects so dear to pre-Exilic Israel would be removed.

5. Afterward. After Israel had been removed from their land, their king, and their idolatrous worship, God would restore David their king, i.e., the Davidic king, or Messiah, who would rule as rightful king of Israel (cf. Mal 3:1). The dynasty would be revived in the latter days. Literally, in the end of days. The expression is used to describe the Messianic era, the climax of history, when God's Messiah will rule over all the world.

II. Israel's Unfaithfulness and Consequent Judgment. 4:1—13:16.

A. The Guilt of the People. 4:1-3.

1. Israel had been unfaithful to her covenant with the Lord, with the result that he had a controversy with her. God now acts as plaintiff and judge (cf. 12:2; Isa 1). Israel had been guilty of repeated transgression, and the prophet declared that the land had no truth or fidelity ('emet) nor mercy or covenant-loyalty (hesed), nor knowledge of God, in the sense of knowing and obeying his will. 2. They break out into acts of violence, and blood toucheth blood. One murder led to another, and the trail of blood was continuous. Idolatry and crimes of violence are closely related in Hosea's thinking. One who rejects the true God may be guilty of the most shameless atrocities.

B. The Guilt of the Priests. 4:4-8.

4. Israel had rejected the claims of God and was like a people who strive with the priest, rejecting the counsel of the God-ordained messenger (cf. Mal 2:7). 5. The result was that Israel would fall in the day, when men normally can see and avoid pitfalls. Hosea was aware of the failure of the spiritual leaders, or prophets (i.e., false prophets). Because they did not hold forth the truth, they would fall . . . in the night. They would stumble in darkness. 6. The result was the destruction of Israel for lack of knowledge. The people did not know God and his ways. This was not simply the result of neglect, but a criminal action. They rejected knowledge, choosing to resolve their problems by looking to false gods and the powerful nations which worshiped them. The priests had been poor examples, leading Israel into apostasy. For this reason they were rejected in the words thou shalt be no priest to me. 7. The priests had been highly honored, but as they were increased, so they sinned. That is, the more they increased, the more they sinned. 8. Priests became greedy, and the mercenary spirit which prevailed among them is expressed in the charge, They eat up the sin of my people. Sin may refer to the sin offering, referring to the fact that the priests grew wealthy as they greedily seized the offerings which the people brought to the Lord. The sons of Eli (I Sam 2:13-17) were guilty of such sins.

C. Punishment for All. 4:9,10.

9. God's judgment is expressed in the words like people, like priest. People and priests alike had transgressed, and judgment could be expected to fall on both groups. 10. In spite of the rapacity of the priests, Hosea states that they shall eat, and not have enough. They shall not be satisfied. Greed will be punished by lack of food.

D. Immoral Cult Practices. 4:11-19.

11. Whoredom and wine and new wine characterize those who reject God's word. Hosea states that they take away the heart. They make a man devoid of spiritual understanding. 12. In their bewilderment, the people sought help from stocks. That is, from wooden idols (cf. Isa 40:19-21; Jer 2:27). Similarly they used the staff, by which the heathen practiced divination, to foretell the future. 13. Sacrifices were offered on the tops of the mountains, instead of at the sanctuary of the Lord. Licentious nature worship characterized the "high places." This took place under the oaks and poplars and elms (or terebinths). The homes of the Israelites would be infected, for daughters, and spouses (or, rather, daughters-in-law, ASV marg.) would adopt the licentious religious practices of the Baal cult. 14. Ironically the Lord declares: I will not punish the daughters and spouses (daughters-in-law). He emphasizes the fact that the men are the worst offenders and that they cannot point to the women as the guilty ones.

15. Hosea warns the kingdom of Judah not to follow Israel's sins. Judah is urged not to offend. Literally, become guilty. She is to avoid the shrines at Gilgal and Beth-aven (House of wickedness, the prophet's designation of Beth-el). Judah should refrain from swearing—(As) the Lord liveth. To be guilty of idolatry while swearing by the Lord would be a twofold sin.

16. Israel slideth back as a backsliding heifer. Read, Israel is stubborn like a stubborn heifer. Rashi comments: "Like a fattened animal that kicks, so has Israel waxed fat and kicked." Now the Lord will feed them as a lamb in a large place. Better, Can the Lord feed them now as a lamb in a broad pasture? The question is rhetorical. A stubborn heifer is tied up so that she cannot graze as freely as a lamb. God had to restrict Israel because of her propensity toward evil. 17. Ephraim (Israel) is joined to idols. Israel's league with the idols of the land caused God to cry out, Let him alone. This is tantamount to saying, "Let him shift for himself." The future would show whether or not the idols could be of help.

18. Their drink is sour. Read instead: A band of drunkards, they give themselves to harlotry (RSV). The JPS suggests, When their carouse is over, they take to harlotry. When tired of one sin, they turned to another. Her rulers with shame do love. The text is difficult. The JPS reads, Her rulers deeply love dishonor. Cheyne translates: Her shields are enamoured of infamy (CBSC). 19. Speaking of the impending disaster, Hosea adds, The wind hath bound her up in her wings. The wind comes suddenly and violently, bringing destruction. Even so, Israel was to be driven into exile.

E. Judgment on Kings and Priests for Leading the People Astray. 5:1-7.

1. The address, O priests, reminds us that the priesthood of Israel had been responsible for leading the people into idolatrous worship at the high places. The king and his courtiers had likewise rejected the message of Israel's prophets; hence the further address, O house of the king. The idolatrous shrines at Bethel and Dan had political implications. They were devised to prevent the people from taking part in the worship at the Jerusalem temple. Hosea cites Mizpah and Tabor as examples of the idolatry which was practiced throughout Israel. There were several places named Mizpah (watch tower). This one is probably to be identified with es-Salt in Gilead. Tabor is the well-known mountain in Galilee (cf. Jud 4:6; 10:17).

2. The revolters were those who had turned aside, hence apostates from the law of God. They are described as profound to make slaughter. In this context profound must have a literal rather than a metaphorical sense. The translation of these words has troubled Biblical scholars since ancient times. Cheyne suggests, The apostates are gone deep in corrupting. With a slight emendation the text reads: "And the pit of Shittim they have made deep." If the latter is the true interpretation, Shittim (Num 25:1; Josh 2:1; 3:1), like Mizpah and Tabor, was regarded as a center for idolatrous worship. God adds, I have been a rebuker of them all. Literally, I am chastisement for them all. If mûsār is translated as a hophal participle, we read, I am rejected of them all. This would indicate that the idolatry of Israel resulted in the rejection of Israel's God.

3. I know Ephraim. In this context know bears the idea of acquaintance. Ephraim's idolatrous ways were not hidden from God. She was guilty of whoredom, turning in faithlessness from the Lord to Baal and participating in his licentious cult. 4. They will not frame their doings. The translation of the margin is preferable: Their doings will not suffer them to turn unto their God. Israel had rejected the Lord and was sinking deeper and deeper into heathen practices. Sin was a despot, keeping Israel from her only hope—God himself. They have not known the Lord is an indictment upon a people whose deeds belied any profession of faithfulness to her God. The word "to know" may here be rendered in the present tense, They know not the Lord.

5. The pride of Israel suggests a spirit of arrogance and self-confidence which was to be humbled. This interpretation is suggested by the LXX, the Targum, and the Peshitta. Cheyne suggests that the Lord himself is meant, the one designated as "the pride of Israel" being Israel's God. God, then, is seen to be testifying against Israel because of her sin (cf. Ruth 1:21). 6. Israel would approach God with sacrificial offerings, with their flocks and with their herds; but her sins had so alienated her from the Lord that such external gestures would be meaningless. The prophet warned that the idols would not help Israel in the day of her need, and that the Lord himself would not respond when his people made empty gestures at reconciliation. 7. The parents had turned from God, and they had begotten strange children (cf. 2:4,5), who are depicted as following in their evil ways. Now shall a month devour them. The Hebrew word for month is normally translated, "new moon." The prophet stresses the imminence of judgment. Instead of joyfully welcoming the new moon, they would be reminded by its arrival of the nearness of judgment at the hands of Assyria. With their portions is a reference to the lands allotted to the several tribes. They would be "devoured" by the enemy.

F. Disastrous Foreign Policies of Ephraim (Israel) and Judah. 5:8-15.

8. The cornet . . . the trumpet. Note that these names appear in parallel relationship. Hosea did not mean to stress a difference in the two instruments. The two were probably slight variants of the same instrument. The Mishna states that the shôpār (here rendered cornet) was sometimes straight and sometimes curved. It was usually a simple ram's horn. A silver trumpet, haṣōṣrâ, was prescribed in the Law for certain occasions (Num 10:1-10; 31:6). Gibeah and Ramah were both high among the mountains of central Palestine. The sound of alarm from these eminences could be heard in both Judah and Israel. Beth-aven. Cf. 4:15. After thee, O Benjamin, may be a warning addressed to Benjamin by the men of Beth-aven (Bethel). It would mean, "Benjamin, the enemy is behind you."

9. A rebuke in Hebrew thought is a judicial decision. God would render a verdict of "guilty" against idolatrous Israel, and the armies of Assyria would be his instruments for punishing his faithless people. God had made known that which shall surely be. The impending judgment had been decreed by God. Therefore it was sure. 10. Them that remove the bound. The bound was the boundary marker or landmark. The removing of landmarks was a crime under Israelite law (Deut 19:14; 27:17; Prov 22:28; 23:10). Judah is pictured as awaiting the overthrow of Israel, after which she could cross the frontier and appropriate Israelite territory. God's wrath was about to be poured out like water. A swollen stream brings destruction in its wake, and Judah's princes merited judgment.

11. Broken in judgment expresses the concept of war as a judgment of God. The opposing armies are depicted as pleading their cause before the bar of God. Here judgment falls upon Israel. The Judge renders an adverse decision. The commandment is difficult to explain here. Israel did not follow God's commandment, but is accused of idolatry. The LXX, Targum, and Peshitta translate "vanity," "idols." The Talmudic tractate Sanh. 56b interprets the passage as a condemnation of idol worship. Jeroboam I commanded Israel to worship calves at Bethel and Dan, and Hosea may be referring to that commandment. The JPS emends the text to read, He willingly walked after filth. 12. God likens the destruction that was to come upon Ephraim to the work of a moth and to rottenness which eats away at a dwelling. Both operate in silence. The moth comes from without, rot from within. Ephraim was being destroyed as much by her own inner corruption as by the external foes.

13. Conscious of her troubles, Ephraim sought help from the Assyrian, asking aid of king Jareb (Contentious), "the fighting king," perhaps Tiglath-pileser III.

14. God declares that he will be as a lion, carrying away Israel and Judah as prey. None is strong enough to challenge the lion in his purposes. 15. Looking upon idolatrous Israel, God says, I will go and return to my place (i.e., heaven), leaving his rebellious people to suffer for their sins. When in their affliction they sought God, he would be ready to come to their aid.

G. Israel's Plea and God's Rejoinder. 6:1-6.

1. Afflicted Israel had learned the bitter lessons of disobedience, and her people encouraged one another with the words, Come, and let us return unto the Lord. The words contain an implied confession, for Israel had departed from the Lord in her idolatrous practices. The God who had torn in judgment could be expected to heal in mercy. Israel's wounds could not be healed by Egypt or Assyria (cf. 7:1; 11:3). Only God could bring new life to the wounded nation.

2. God could not only be counted upon to deliver his people, but his aid would come speedily. The prophet states that after two days will he revive us, adding the parallel line in the third day he will raise us up. Ezekiel used similar language in describing life which would enter dry bones, representing Israel (Ezk 37:1-10; cf. Isa 26:19). The Targum paraphrases Hos 6:2: "He will revive us in the days of consolation which are to come." Calvin interpreted the words as expressive of the hope of Israel during the Exile: "... though they long remained in darkness, and the exile was long which they had to endure, they yet did not cease to hope: 'Well, let the two days pass, and the Lord will revive us' " (John Calvin, The Twelve Minor Prophets, I, 218). Pusey, on the other hand, considers the reference to our Lord's resurrection to be the primary one: "What else can this be than the two days in which the body of Jesus lay in the tomb, and the third day on which he rose again . . . " (E. B. Pusey, The Minor Prophets, I, 63). The fact that "after two days" and "the third day" serve as an idiom for a short period of time may be demonstrated by Jesus' use of the idiom in Lk 13:32,33. The words should not be applied to the Resurrection in a primary sense, although they may be regarded as typical (cf. Hos 11:1). As God brought his son Israel from the Exile "after three days" (i.e., a brief period of time), so he raised his Son Jesus from the tomb outside the walls of Jerusalem on the third day (literally).

3. Then shall we know continues the thought of verse 1. Those who would return to the Lord from their apostasy would come to know the Lord. They would experience his presence and power in their lives. The verb may be translated as the Hebrew cohortative – "And let us know" – suggesting that calamities had befallen Israel because she was living without the knowledge of God. His going forth. His answer to the needs of his people. Is prepared as the morning. Is sure as the morning. Israel was "in darkness" (Isa 9:1), but the appearance of God to bring relief could be likened to the dawn of a new and glorious day. 4. O Ephraim, what shall I do unto thee? What means can be employed to bring you back to fellowship with God? Your goodness (or piety) is as a morning cloud. You make efforts at reformation, but they do not avail. The morning cloud is deceptive. It is a dense mass of vapor which the westerly winds of summer bear from the Mediterranean. The sun quickly dissipates them, and they produce no rain in the dry Palestinian summer. Similarly the early dew does not remain. Grammatically we should read, The dew (which) vanishes early. The dew provides no permanent relief from the summer sun.

5. God, complaining about the conduct of his people, says, Therefore have I hewed them by the prophets. God sought to hew Israel into shape by sending prophets. The prophets warned of the consequences of sin (Isa 11:4; 49:2; Jer 1:10; 5:14; I Kgs 19:17). They uttered the words of (God's) mouth. 6. God repudiates the externalism of religion which characterized many in Israel, with the words I desired mercy, and not sacrifice. Mercy (hesed) is a word which speaks of covenantal affection and loyalty. Laetsch (The Minor Prophets, p. 60) and Harper (ICC, p. 286) translate it love. Harper adds, "This love is not love for God as distinguished from love for one's fellow-men, but both."

H. The Crimes of Israel. 6:7–7:7.

7. For like men, the RV reads, like Adam. Israel had transgressed God's commandment as Adam did in Eden. The RSV takes Adam as a geographical reference, At Adam. The AV like men probably means "like other men." 8. Gilead, the district east of the Jordan, is cited as an example of particular infamy. The Gileadites were less civilized than the tribes west of the Jordan. Here Gilead is mentioned as a city in which murder was common. 9. The priests murder in the way by consent. Read rather, murder in the way toward Shechem. Shechem, situated on the road from Samaria to Bethel, had long been noted for its violence (cf. Jud 9:25,43). 10. From heaven the Lord says, I have seen a horrible thing in the house of Israel. The abomination of Israel would bring judgment, and Judah, too, would surely reap the harvest which she had sown.

7:1. When I would have healed Israel (when I would have restore[d] the fortunes of my people (RSV), the sin of Ephraim and its capital city, Samaria, became apparent. Specifically, sins of falsehood and thievery are mentioned. 2. The rulers of Israel consider not in their hearts that God is judge of their doings. Their consciences had been dulled through constant sinning. Yet their own doings have beset them about. They were entangled in their sin and could not escape. 3. Even the king and the princes were so depraved as to rejoice in the iniquities which abounded in Israel. The rulers actually profited by the people's sins. The whole body politic was corrupt.

4. Hosea describes an incident in which king and people were involved in a drunken orgy. He begins with the generalization, They are all adulterers, stating that evil desires burned within them like the fires of an oven. For the baker there was an interval of rest between the time when he kneaded the dough and the time when it was thoroughly leavened. So Israel would have a brief rest after one indulgence before plunging into yet greater lust and infamy. 5. The day of our king was some special occasion, perhaps the coronation (so the Targum) or a royal birthday (cf. Mt 14:6). The king participated in the revelry—he stretched out his hand with scorners (cf. Prov 21:24; Isa 28:14).

6. They have made ready their heart like an oven. The hearts of the wicked courtiers were burning with intrigue. The Masoretic Text reads their baker sleepeth. But the LXX and many recent translations suggest: Their anger sleepeth all night; in the morning it burneth as a flaming fire. If we follow the MT, the baker may be the assassin who, after a night of sleep, attacked the king. Lehrman identifies the assassin with Shallum (II Kgs 15:10). 7. They are all hot as an oven seems to characterize the closing decades of Israel. Shallum, who killed Zechariah, was in turn killed by Menahem. Four of Israel's last six kings were murdered.

I. Israel's Disastrous Foreign Policy. 7:8–8:3.

8. With reference to the foreign policy of Israel, Hosea complains concerning Ephraim that he mixeth himself among the peoples; Ephraim is a cake not turned (ASV). The quest for alliances brought about a situation in which Israel was neither truly Israelite nor truly foreign, but "half-baked," like a pancake cooked on one side only. 9. The foreign nations, described as strangers, had weakened Israel, which already showed signs of age, gray hairs appearing on her head. Yet Israel did not heed the sign, but assumed that she was still in the vigor of youth and able to care for her needs. 10. The pride of Israel (cf. 5:5). Here evidently God, himself, testifies against his people; but they show no disposition to listen.

11. The fickleness of Israel is stressed in terms of a silly dove, having no understanding. First it calls to Egypt, then goes to Assyria. Hosea saw alliances with both Egypt and Assyria as evidence of lack of confidence in the Lord. 12. In their confused flights, God says, I will spread my net upon them. The birds would thus be brought to the ground by God. Israel could find deliverance neither from Egypt nor from Assyria. God humbled her for her rebellion.

13. Woe unto them! Israel fled from God like a bird scared out of its nest, but in doing so she left her only safe abode. The RSV reads, I would redeem them, but they speak lies against me. God desired to show mercy to his confused and erring people, but they had hardened their hearts. 14. When trouble came, they howled upon their beds in grief, but still they did not cry unto the Lord. Because they needed food, they assemble[d] themselves for corn and wine, desiring the gift but not the Giver. A variant reading of some Hebrew manuscripts, followed by the LXX, reads, they cut themselves, alluding to the practice of cutting the body as a sign of mourning (Deut 14:1; Lev 19:28; 21:5; Jer 16:6; 41:5; 47:5; 48:37). 15. In better days God had bound (or trained) and strengthened their arms, enabling them to stand before the foe; yet Israel rejected his revealed will.

16. They return, but not to the most High may be rendered literally, They turn — not upward. Israel turned for help, but not to God. She looked to the broken reed of Egypt for aid. A deceitful bow fails to shoot the arrow at the chosen target. So Israel's political moves did not accomplish their aim. The princes had spoken boastful words in defiance of the Lord, but the rage of their tongue would be their undoing. They expected help from Egypt, but all they would get would be derision.

8:1. Set the trumpet to thy mouth. Literally, To thy palate the cornet. The prophet is bidden to warn of the approaching foe. The Assyrian would come as an eagle. Hebrew nesher, the carrion-eating vulture. The bird of prey is an appropriate symbol of Assyria, which sought to control all of western Asia through a policy of unparalleled cruelty. The foe is described as coming against the house of the Lord, i.e., Israel. Israel is thus affectionately designated. Compare, "My servant Moses . . . who is faithful in all mine house" (Num 12:7). Although the Northern Kingdom (Israel) had separated itself from Judah, the two together were still reckoned as God's house.

2. In their distress, Israel would cry, My God, we know thee. The word order is: My God, we, Israel, know thee. In time of affliction Israel would stress the fact that she had known the Lord. In times of prosperity she had been content to forget. 3. Israel hath cast off (spurned, RSV) . . . the good. God, who had been good to Israel through the years of her history, had been rejected, with the result that Israel would have to face the evil of her foes without his aid.

I. Israel's Idolatry and Wicked Alliances. 8:4-14.

4. Israel sought aid from a succession of rulers: They have set up kings. Yet the kings of Israel lacked God's blessing and brought the people no lasting good. Kings and princes were of no real help when idolatry was rampant in the land. 5. Samaria had been devoted to calf (or bull) worship, a fact which led the prophet to say, Thy calf, O Samaria, hath cast thee off. The RSV reads, I have spurned your calf. And Cheyne (CBSC) suggests, Thy calf, O Samaria, is loathsome. The calf at Samaria was probably similar to those set up by Jeroboam at Bethel and Dan (I Kgs 12:28,29), which became an occasion for sin in Israel. 6. Amazed at the enormity of Israel's sin, Hosea exclaims, For from Israel was it also; i.e., the idol, as well as a succession of godless kings, had come from Israel. The workman made it. Hence it was vain to worship the work of man's hands. In fact, the calf of Samaria was to be destroyed by Israel's righteous God.

7. Israel was to learn the lessons of cause and effect, of sowing and reaping. They have sown the wind, that which cannot produce crops, but there would be a harvest, the destructive whirlwind. Israel's efforts had no stalk. They produce nothing but vain hope. Should there come the semblance of a harvest, strangers shall swallow it up. The enemy would seize it. Israel would have nothing. 8. Not only crops, but Israel, the nation, is swallowed up. The tribes were taken into exile, cast aside as a worthless vessel, i.e., a piece of cheap pottery. 9. Israel in exile is likened to a wild ass which wanders from place to place. Asses usually travel together, but a solitary, stubborn ass sometimes obstinately pursues its own path. Turning their back on the covenant love of God, Israel hired lovers. She tried by gifts to win aid from Assyria and Egypt.

10. Though Israel had sought to purchase favor from the nations, God would gather them (i.e., the Israelites) and send them into exile. They shall sorrow. They would become impoverished, because of the burden imposed upon them by the king of princes, an expression used only here, which may refer to Tiglath-pileser III, known as "the king of kings." The LXX, followed by the RSV, gives an emended reading — they shall soon cease from anointing kings and princes.

11. Israel went through the forms of religion. She made many altars, but her multiplying of sacrifices was an abomination to God (cf. Isa 1:11). Hosea says that they are altars to sin, i.e., for sinning. The altars were erected in defiance of God, and they became an occasion for further sinning. 12. God had raised up prophets to Israel who had boldly declared his Law. The great things should be read ten thousands (RSV) or never so many things (JPS). Bewer reads the verse: "Were I to write for him by the ten thousand my directions, they would be counted as those of a stranger."

13. The prophet continues to insist that the sacrifices are a mere form: They sacrifice flesh, and, in accord with the Law, they eat it. But it had no spiritual merit. The words rendered for the sacrifices of mine offerings are problematical. The JPS renders them, As for the sacrifices that are made by fire, which is justified on the basis of the fact that the word is used in Rabbinic Hebrew with the sense "to roast." The RSV gives a conjectural meaning, "They love sacrifice." Because of Israel's spiritual decline, Hosea prophesies, "They shall return to Egypt, i.e., go into exile. Whether or not Hosea meant that they would literally go to Egypt is debatable. He did assert categorically that they would suffer a future bondage similar to that they had once experienced in Egypt. 14. Hosea charges Israel with forgetting God, and building temples (AV). The alternate meaning of the word, viz., palaces, fits better here. Judah is similarly charged with building fenced cities, i.e., fortified cities. Palaces and fortified cities are not evil in themselves, but they were evidence of a secular trust in things material, which was the counterpart to spiritual decay.

K. The Exile of Israel Foretold. 9:1-9.

1. The heathen nations indulged in orgies during their joyful festivals, but the prophet warned Israel, Rejoice not. Israel's neighbors took part in licentious fertility rites, and Israel, following them, had loved a reward, literally, a harlot's hire, upon every cornfloor. The heathen had offered gifts to Baal, the fertility god, to induce him to make the fields fruitful. Israel had followed their footsteps. 2. The prophet warns that the floor, i.e., the threshing floor, and the winepress will fail. Efforts to seek blessing from Baal would prove futile, because only the Lord can bring blessing upon the fields.

3. The coming exile is described as a return to Egypt, i.e., to the house of bondage. Actually, it was to Assyria that Israel was taken, but the experience is metaphorically compared to the earlier bondage in Egypt (cf. 8:13). In Assyria the Israelites would have to eat unclean food (RSV). There would be no offering of first fruits to the Lord (cf. Ex 22:29; 23:19; Lev 23:10-12); hence the food would be esteemed unclean. 4. In exile there would be no wine offerings. Offerings are likened to the bread of mourners (cf. Deut 26:14), which, because of its association with death, was considered unclean. Food kept in Jewish homes while the corpse is there is still regarded as ritually unclean. In exile their bread shall be for their hunger only (RSV). Not their bread for their soul (AV). The exiles would have bread to supply their bodily needs, but they would be cut off from the house of the Lord; hence there would be no acceptable sacrifices. 5. The exiles would be perplexed and troubled on the solemn day when the feast of the Lord would normally be observed.

6. The prophet depicts the land as it would be after the enemy had come. Because of destruction Palestine would be depopulated. Some of the people would go to Egypt (cf. II Kgs 25:26). Nettles and thorns would grow over their treasure cities (the pleasant places for their silver) and their tabernacles (i.e., tents – either their dwelling places or tents in which their idols were formerly kept). 7. The judgment is described as the days of visitation and the days of recompense. Hosea here seems to quote the remarks of the unbelieving people who would not respond to his ministry: The prophet is a fool, the spiritual man is mad. They derided the prophet for his pessimistic message. Some scholars suggest that Hosea is uttering the words in condemnation of false prophets (so Laetsch, in loco).

8. The watchman of Ephraim is probably to be identified with Hosea, the true prophet. The verse is difficult as it stands. Bewer suggests the reading, "The prophet is the watchman of Ephraim, the people of my God. The snare of a fowler is on all his ways, enmity in the house of his God." The true prophet faithfully declares the word of God and meets active opposition from the blind leaders of Israel, including her false prophets. 9. The corruption of Hosea's day is likened to that in the days of Gibeah (Jud 19–21) which led to the almost complete annihilation of the tribe of Benjamin. For a time it seemed that Benjamin would be victorious and justice would fail, but God had the last word. So it would be again.

L. Israel's Ancient Apostasy at Baal-peor. 9:10-14.

10. Hosea harks back to Israel's early history. God found his people like grapes in the wilderness. The traveler rejoices as he comes upon an oasis with its luscious grapes. So God rejoiced over Israel, who received his Law in the wilderness and vowed fidelity to him. At Baal-peor (Num 25) Israel's disposition toward idolatry asserted itself. There they became detestable like the thing they loved —viz., Baal (RSV). 11. Once fruitful, Ephraim would soon find her glory flying away like a bird. Glory here seems to refer to progeny (cf. 4:7). The result of the departure of this "glory" is specified: There shall be no birth and none with child and no conception (JPS). 12. Should any children be brought up, yet will I bereave them. Children who survived infancy would not reach manhood. Woes are pronounced on a people from whom the Lord had departed. His blessing was gone, and they were awaiting his judgment. 13. Ephraim is likened to ancient Tyrus (Tyre), planted in a pleasant place (cf. Ezk 27; 28), yet destined to bring forth her children to the murderer. 14. In the light of the horrors to come, the prophet prays that God may give a miscarrying womb and dry breasts! God's judgments are right, and Hosea prays that the children of Israel may be cut off before they are born, that they may be spared the horrors to come.

M. Israel's Apostasy at Gilgal. 9:15-17.

15. The idolatrous shrine at Gilgal (cf. 4:15; 12:11; Amos 5:5) embodied all the evil that had marked Israel's history. The evils perpetrated there, and at similar shrines elsewhere, caused God to say, I will drive them out of mine house; i.e., from the land of Canaan, which God had given to them as an inheritance. In strong language God says he hated them, and will love them no more. As long as Israel continued in her sin, she could not enjoy the blessings of God's love. 16. The thought of verses 11,12 is taken up in verse 16: "Fruitful" Ephraim would be barren; children born to Ephraim would be destroyed. 17. Refusal to hearken to God and his prophets would bring upon Israel the judgment of exile. Like Cain (Gen 4:12) they were destined to be wanderers.

N. Destruction of the Baal Cult Prophesied. 10:1-8.

1. Israel is described as a luxuriant vine (RSV; not empty as in AV). The vine was very fruitful, but according to the multitude of his fruit he hath increased the (heathen) altars. With the increase of wealth and power in Israel, there came an increase in idolatry and its attendant evils. 2. In trying to serve God and Baal, Their heart is divided. Yet God was jealous, refusing to share his glory with another. Altars and images which were offensive to him must be destroyed. 3. When Israel saw her cities desolated by the enemy, she would cry out, We have no king, i.e., none worthy of the name. Godless rulers had not been able to stay the downward course of the nation. 4. They have spoken words. Kings and their ministers spoke idle words, making a covenant with Assyria and Egypt. Their perverted judgment springeth up like the deadly hemlock which grows abundantly in the furrows of the field.

5. The inhabitants of Samaria, seeing their idols carried off by the enemy, would be filled with fear. The calves of Beth-aven. The idols of Bethel. Beth-el means house of God, but its idolatrous cult had merited a new name for it—Beth-aven, house of iniquity. Under the tragic circumstances the people shall mourn, and the idolatrous priests shall wail (RSV), or tremble (JPS). Contrast the AV rejoice. The reference is to a ritual dance performed by the idolatrous priests, during which they implored their idol to save them and himself. 6. The calf would be taken from Bethel unto Assyria, where it would be presented to king Jareb, or "the fighting king." The JPS designates him "King Contentious" (cf. 5:13). The Northern Kingdom (Israel – Ephraim), filled with shame, would learn at last the futility of setting up a dumb idol as protector of the nation. 7. Samaria, the capital of Israel, would fall. Her king is cut off. Not only did he lose his life, but his death marked the end of Israel as a state. The king is described as the foam upon the water, or like a chip on the face of the waters (RSV). A helpless fragment of wood is irresistibly carried along by the power of the current. 8. Hosea states categorically that the high places of (Beth-) Aven would be destroyed. The thorn and the thistle, mentioned at the time of the curse on the ground following Adam's sin (Gen 3:18), would cover the altars of Beth-aven, which would come to symbolize the sinfulness of pre-Exilic Israel. The words of the people, to be addressed to the mountains and to the hills, are echoed in Lk 23:30 and Rev 6:16.

O. The Sin at Gibeah. 10:9,10.

9. Israel's sin at Gibeah (Jud 19) found many echoes in subsequent history. Israel had taken vengeance on the Benjamites for the outrage at Gibeah, but the wickedness perpetrated there entered the life of all Israel. 10. It is my desire. Read with the JPS, When it is My desire, I will chastise them. In God's time punishment would come, and the nations upon whom Israel had relied would be shown to be broken reeds. The words, when they shall bind themselves in their two furrows, are difficult to explain. The RSV reads, when they are chastised for their double iniquity, perhaps referring to the bulls at Dan and Bethel. The double iniquity may be their rejection of the Lord and the Davidic line (cf. 3:5).

P. The Ruin of Israel. 10:11-15.

11. Israel is likened to a well-trained heifer that enjoys the treading of corn (grain) which it can freely eat (Deut 25:4). No heavy yoke was placed upon her fair neck, such as the yokes which frequently wounded the necks of animals in the East. God's kindness was abused, however, and now he would cause Ephraim to ride, i.e., to draw a heavy load. The heavy work of the heifer is further described in terms of plowing and breaking clods. Drawing, plowing, and breaking up the soil are laborious tasks compared with the easier work of threshing. 12. Hosea still holds out hope for his people: Sow to yourselves in righteousness. If they would but turn to God, they would find him merciful. If a harvest was to be reaped, Israel must break up her fallow ground. She could not sow among thorns and hope for a good harvest. Hosea reminds Israel that there is still time to seek the Lord. If they did so earnestly, God would respond and rain righteousness on them. Although in need of material blessings, Hosea stresses the spiritual "rain" of righteousness, or salvation, which was the prime need.

13. In contrast with the spiritual possibilities of regeneration, Hosea charges that Israel had plowed (i.e., plotted) wickedness and reaped iniquity (or injustice). The lying policy bore sour fruit! 14. A tumult, the noise of armies, would arise among the peoples who had been the object of Israel's trust. Israelite fortresses would be despoiled. Shalman may be the Assyrian king Shalmaneser V (727–722 B.C.; cf. II Kgs 17:1-6). The battle at Beth-arbel is otherwise unknown. The town is either Irbid in Galilee, or Arbela, twelve miles southeast of Gadara, in Trans-Jordan. 15. The judgment at Beth-arbel was caused by the sins associated with idolatrous Bethel. In a morning. At dawn—when better things might be anticipated. The king of Israel would be cut off. The nation would be carried into exile, and the day of grace ended. True, God would remember his people in the land of bondage, but the Northern Kingdom and its succession of rulers was to come to an end forever with the fall of Samaria (722 B.C.).

Q. God's Love; Israel's Ingratitude. 11:1-7.

1. When Israel was a child. God refers to the early history of Israel, and contrasts it with the subsequent idolatry of his people. Called my son out of Egypt (cf. Ex 4:22). God called Israel from Egypt to Canaan and provided protection and sustenance. The words are used of Christ in Mt 2:15. God's son, Israel, was taken from Egypt, yet proved faithless in subsequent history and was threatened by judgment. The only begotten of the Father, the Son, Jesus, was taken from Egypt, grew into perfect manhood, and accomplished the work which the Father had purposed. 2. As they called them. The more they (i.e., the prophets) called them (Israel), the more they (Israel) obstinately hardened their hearts and refused to obey the Lord. They sacrificed unto Baalim (cf. 2:13). The cult objects of the iniquitous Baal worship claimed the loyalty of Israel.

3. I taught Ephraim also to go. Again the Lord refers to Israel's infancy. Walk is preferable to go in this verse. As a parent, God taught Israel to walk. His protecting care was shown when Israel would stumble, yet Israel showed no discernment: They knew not that I healed them. Israel did not realize that the Lord was her healer. She took his blessings for granted, ascribing them to Baal and other deities. 4. I drew them with cords of a man. God's care for Israel continued as she reached maturity. The illustration is here taken from the animal world. A man may lead his beast with cords suitable for an animal. God used cords suitable for a man—i.e., gentle, humane— in seeking to lead Israel. They that take off the yoke. A considerate master lifts the yoke from the neck of his beasts that they may eat more comfortably. God had shown consideration in his dealings with Israel.

5. He shall not return into the land of Egypt. The prophet speaks of judgment, but it would not take the form of renewed bondage in Egypt (cf. Deut 17:16). But the Assyrian shall be his king. The Northern Kingdom fell to Assyria in 722 B.C. 6. The sword is a symbol of war. Hosea depicts the cities of Israel as devastated by war. Because of their own counsels. In despair, Hoshea conspired with So of Egypt for deliverance, but this only hastened Israel's defeat (II Kgs 17:4-6). 7. Bent to backsliding from me. The word rendered backsliding is, literally, turning or turning about. Instead of turning to God, Israel persisted in turning from him. Though they called them is a reference to the prophets whose ministry was rejected by Israel.

R. God's Pity for His People. 11:8-11.

8. How shall I give thee up . . . ? The cry is heart-rending. God had loved his people, yet justice demanded that they be punished. Since God could not lightly forget the earlier days of Israel's faithfulness, he decreed judgment with great reluctance. Admah . . . Zeboim were cities of the plain which were overthrown along with Sodom and Gomorrah (Gen 19). 9. I will not execute the fierceness of mine anger. Although judgment would fall upon Israel, in wrath God would remember mercy. Israel was not to be forever cast off, although she would be sorely chastised. I will not enter into the city does not seem to fit here. The JPS suggests, I will not come in fury. Cheyne prefers, I will not come to exterminate, which is parallel to I will not return to destroy Ephraim. 10. When he shall roar. The Lord is likened to a lion who roars to summon its young. At the sound of his roar they would come from the west (Egypt, v. 11) and the east (Assyria). The children shall tremble implies the thrill of eagerness rather than of fear. The Syriac combines the ideas of haste and trembling.

S. The Sins of Jacob. 11:12–12:14.

12. Ephraim compasseth me about with lies. In the Hebrew text 11:12 becomes 12:1, for it begins a new subject. The Lord is speaking concerning the faithlessness of both Ephraim (i.e., Israel) and Judah. Judah yet ruleth with God may be read Judah is yet wayward toward God (JPS). In spite of all the prophetic messages addressed to Judah, she continued in her sin! Is faithful with the saints. The JPS reads: And toward the Holy One who is faithful. The LXX gives an entirely different reading: Judah is still known by God and faithful with the Holy One. 12:1. Ephraim feedeth on wind. Literally, shepherds the wind. The RSV reads, Ephraim herds the wind. The words depict the futility of running for help to Assyria and Egypt. The east wind was the hot, destructive sirocco. It was not only vain to look to the east (Assyria) for help, but also dangerous, for destruction would come from that direction. Israel's foreign policy was such that she could make a covenant with the Assyrians while at the same time export olive oil to Assyria's rival, Egypt. Such duplicity was made possible by a policy of lies which would ultimately trap Israel and bring about her ruin.

2. Not only Israel, but Judah also followed a path of deceit and duplicity. Her judgment came later than that of Israel, but Jerusalem was destroyed as violently as was Samaria. Jacob here is used of Judah (cf. Ps 77:15). 3. He took his brother by the heel (Gen 25:26) . . . and by his strength he had power with God (Gen 32:22-32). The RSV reads, In his manhood he strove with God. 4. He found him in Beth-el (Gen 28:10-17). He came face to face with God at Bethel. And there he spake with us. God, in speaking to Jacob, spoke to all Israelites who could be considered as in the loins of their ancestor (cf. Heb 7:9,10). 5. The God who addressed Jacob at Bethel is identified as the Lord God of hosts. His memorial is another way of saying his name (so JPS, RSV. Cf. Ex 3:15). 6. In remembrance of past mercies, the prophet urges Israel to turn back to her God. Jacob's victories would provide an example of blessings his descendants might enjoy. In turning to God, Israel would be expected to obey his commandments: Keep mercy and judgment, and wait on thy God continually.

7. Israel had not only followed the Canaanite in his licentious religion, but also had adopted his wicked business practices. The word merchant is identical with the word Canaan. As a geographical designation it meant the lowland and was applied to Phoenicia as well as to the other parts of Palestine (cf. Isa 23:11). "Canaanite" thus became a synonym for merchant (Job 41:6; Prov 31:24; Zeph 1:11; Ezk 17:4). The evil reputation of Phoenician traders is reflected in Homer (Odyssey XIV, 290, 291). 8,9. Living like her Canaanite neighbors, Israel had become proud and arrogant. She did not even realize that her life had become marked by sin. God, however, reminded her of the events of the Exodus, the period during which the tribes dwelt in tents. In her subsequent history the Feast of the Tabernacles, for which festival the Israelites erected booths to commemorate their earlier tent life, had become a joyous celebration. The prophet warned, however, that God would make his people again to dwell in tabernacles (tents), and that this would mean that their cities would be destroyed and life violently altered.

10. Israel could not plead ignorance, for God had spoken by the prophets and multiplied visions. In "divers manners" (Heb 1:1) God had spoken through his prophetic spokesmen. Here three are mentioned: words ("I have spoken"); visions ("I have multiplied visions"); and parables ("and used similitudes"). 11. Is there iniquity in Gilead? Read with the RSV, If there is iniquity in Gilead, they shall surely come to nought. II Kings 15:29 tells how Tiglath-pileser's armies despoiled Gilead in the days of Pekah of Israel. The Lord was further insulted by the sacrifice of bullocks at the shrine in Gilgal.

12. Verses 3-5 give certain lessons from the life of Jacob which were relevant to the Israel of Hosea's day. These continue in verse 12, where we read that Jacob fled into the country of Syria, and Israel served for a wife. Jacob-Israel had labored in the house of Laban to secure for himself a wife. Through all those years God cared for Jacob, and ultimately brought him back to Canaan. This fact would offer a glimmer of hope to the nation which was to go into captivity to Assyria. God had brought the earlier Israel back from Syria (lit., the field of Aram, the same in meaning as Padan-Aram). 13. Again, after a time in a distant land, by a prophet (Moses) the Lord brought Israel out of Egypt. The God who raised up Moses to be the leader of the Exodus, could raise up yet other prophets during the captivity to bring his people back to their homeland. 14. Through persistent sin, Ephraim provoked (God) to anger. The result is that He would leave his blood upon him. Ephraim-Israel would bear the consequences of his guilt.

T. The Wicked Bull Worship. 13:1-3.

1. When Ephraim spake trembling should be rendered, When Ephraim spoke, there was trembling. The tribe of Ephraim was so influential as to command unquestioning respect in the early days of the Northern Kingdom. Ephraim and all Israel subsequently were weakened through the impact of Baal worship, so that Hosea could here say, He died. The death was a spiritual one, but the prophet also foretold national judgment and the victory of Israel's foes. 2. In their spiritual death they sin[ned] more and more by making and worshiping molten images. Those who would kiss the calves as an act of worship were guilty of sin against God (cf. 8:5; I Kgs 19:18; Isa 40:18-20; 44:9-20; 46:6,7). 3. Because of sin, Israel would be as the morning cloud, the night mist which appears as a cloud in the morning but soon is dispersed. Cf. 6:14.

U. The Gracious God To Bring Destruction. 13:4-11.

4. In spite of Israel's sins, God reminds his people of his covenant relationship to them: I am the Lord thy God from the land of Egypt. The reference to Egypt serves as a reminder of the great events associated with the Exodus. God had been faithful to his people, even during times of their faithlessness. Thou shalt know no god but me should be rendered in the present — Thou knowest no god but me. The Lord alone had met the needs of his people. All other deities were helpless in themselves and useless to their worshipers. 5. God reminds Israel, I did know thee in the wilderness. As in Ps 1:6, know conveys the idea "to take favorable notice of." Those whom God knows he blesses, and Israel had received countless blessings — e.g., manna from heaven, water from the rock — during her wilderness sojourn. Yet, Israel became a murmuring people, rebelling against God, and a whole generation perished without seeing the Promised Land. 6. God had cared for all the needs of his people, but they soon forgot him. According to their pasture, so were they filled should read, When they were fed, they became full. When they had eaten to satiety, their heart was exalted, and they forgot the source of their blessings, God himself.

7. God, who had been the protector of his people, in judgment became their destroyer. He here likens himself to a lion, ready to devour, and a leopard, ready to spring upon his unprepared people (cf. Jer 5:6). As a leopard by the way will I observe them does not bring out the force of the original, which might better be rendered, As a leopard by the way will I lurk. 8. Continuing his similes from the animal world, God likens himself to a bear that is bereaved of her whelps, hence ferocious (cf. II Sam 17:8). The heart of Israel had resisted the loving call of her God; now, however, God likens himself to a charging animal, saying, I . . . will rend the caul (enclosure) of their heart. 9. God continues to address Israel: O Israel, thou hast destroyed thyself. The JPS reads, It is thy destruction, O Israel. God had described the path which led to Israel's destruction, but he adds, but in me is thine help. The LXX and the Syriac suggest a different reading: Who can help you? (So RSV). The JPS renders the verse: It is thy destruction, O Israel, that thou art against Me, against thy help. Although there are textual problems here, the meaning is clear: By rebelling against the God who was always ready to help his people, Israel had brought about her own destruction.

10. I will be thy king should read, Where now is your king . . . (so LXX, Syr., Vulg., BV, RSV). We then have a rhetorical question, "Where now is your king, to save you . . . ?" The people had earlier said, Give me a king and princes (cf. I Sam 8:5), but in the present emergency these rulers had proved futile. The BV and the RSV emend the words in all thy cities to all your princes because of the reference to kings and princes at the end of the verse. The verse then reads: "Where now is your king, to save you; where are all your princes, to defend you – those of whom you said, 'Give me a king and princes'?" 11. I gave thee a king in mine anger. The initial reference may be to Saul, but the words are likewise appropriate to the dynastic history of the Northern Kingdom, beginning with Jeroboam I. Kings were repeatedly given and taken away. Laetsch renders the passage: I have been giving you kings in my anger and have taken them away in my wrath. Because the kings were subject to God's providential government, they can be described as given of God. But their idolatrous ways and the rejection of the Davidic dynasty by the Northern Kingdom furnish the basis for the statement that they were given in God's anger.

V. Inescapable Ruin. 13:12-16.

12. Ephraim's sin (i.e., the sin of the Northern Kingdom) is described as bound up or wrapped up. It is kept in store (RSV), remembered in the courts of heaven, and one day will be dealt with in justice. The AV translation his sin is hid does not show the force of the words, rendered in the JPS, laid up in store. 13. Ephraim – Israel is likened to a travailing woman: The sorrows of a travailing woman shall come upon him. As the pangs of childbirth are inescapable, so Israel was to bear the trials which her sins had merited. She is also likened to an unwise son who, at the time of birth, does not present himself in the place of the breaking forth of children (i.e., at the mouth of the womb). In Hosea's apt illustration, a clever child would be eager to hasten from the womb; leaving the womb would usher in a new life (cf. Jn 3:3,4). Israel (Ephraim) could have had a new beginning in a life of obedience, but she chose to tarry in her idolatry.

14. I will ransom them from the power of the grave. The words express the feeling of a father who cannot bear to contemplate the utter ruin of even a faithless son. Judgment must come upon Israel, but beyond the judgment would be deliverance. The grave (sh'ôl) and death are used synonymously of the nether world. Its powers are arrayed against God's people of all ages (cf. Mt 16:18). Yet God will be victor over Death and the Grave. Paul, in I Cor 15:55, cites Hos 13:14 in describing the triumph of the Christian over death: "O death, where is thy sting? O grave, where is thy victory?" 15. Turning again to the immediate judgment upon Ephraim (which means fruitfulness), Hosea says, Though he be fruitful among his brethren, the smiting east wind from the wilderness will bring desolation on the land. The wind from the East seems to be an allusion to the Assyrian who would soon despoil Israel. 16. With the coming of the Assyrian, Samaria would become desolate. Or, literally, Samaria shall bear her guilt. The kings of Israel had been guilty of atrocities similar to those described here (cf. II Kgs 15:16).

III. Israel's Conversion and Renewal. 14:1-9.

A. The Call to Repentance. 14:1-3.

1. Hosea turned to his people with a plea to return unto the Lord. Israel had been faithless, but the prophet still saw hope if she would turn from her sin. Israel had fallen. Literally, stumbled. Sin had put a stumbling block in the way. 2. Hosea asks for confession of sin: Take with you words. Israel had been headed in the direction of judgment, which could only be averted by a complete turning from sin and idolatry to God and his righteous claims upon the lives of his people; hence the command to turn to the Lord. The prayer, Take away all iniquity, implies renunciation of sin. The words, and receive us graciously, literally read, and take good. The JPS renders, and accept that which is good. The Psalmist says, "it is good to sing praises unto our God" (Ps 147:1). For the calves of our lips, the LXX reads, the fruit of our lips (cf. Heb 13:15). Confession of sin, and renunciation of its hold upon the life of Israel would result in blessing, with its attendant praise and thanksgiving. Praise is likened to sacrifice which is offered by the grateful worshiper.

3. One party in the Israelite court looked to Assyria for help, but Hosea insisted Asshur shall not save us. To those who looked to Egypt, the source of war horses (cf. I Kgs 10:28; Isa 31:1), the prophet insisted, we will not ride upon horses. Israel was tempted to look to one or the other of the rival powers to satisfy her needs, but Hosea sought to remind her that such a policy would result in divine judgment. The work of our hands refers to idols which Israel made. Salvation would not come from Assyria, Egypt, or Israel's own efforts and idolatrous inventions (cf. Isa 42:17; 54:17). In the words, the fatherless findeth mercy, Israel is depicted as an orphan with no father to provide sustenance. Although exposed to danger from Assyria, from Egypt, and from other foes, Israel in her helplessness could find mercy only in her God.

B. The Promise of Pardon. 14:4-8.

4. When God's people call upon him in genuine penitence, he is ready to come to their aid and will heal their backsliding. The Lord's love is motivated by his own grace rather than by any merit in its subject. It is given freely, a word suggesting that it is bestowed of God's own free will. Israel had not earned God's love, but he was prepared to give it as a gift. The anger of the Lord speaks of his reaction to sin, which always provokes his wrath. In grace, however, anger may be turned away and judgment averted.

5. Rain is scarce in much of the Near East, and dew is essential if vegetation is to grow. God would enable Israel to flourish: He shall grow as the lily, suggesting both beauty and fruitfulness. Several flowers are suggested as the lily. Pliny spoke of the white lily which grows wild in Palestine and "is unsurpassed in its fecundity, often producing fifty bulbs from a single root" (Pliny Natural History XXI. 5). The Anemone coronaria is also suggested. The words, roots as Lebanon, imply stability. It is uncertain whether the cedar trees or the mountains of Lebanon are meant, but in either instance the symbol is one of permanence.

6. The branches which shall spread are the tender branches or saplings which spring from the root after Israel's vine is cut down (cf. Isa 53:2). Hosea indicates that the root of the tree shall send forth many fresh plants. The fruit of the olive tree was a staple in the economy of the ancient East. Jeremiah 11:16 speaks of Israel as "a green olive tree, fair and of goodly fruit." Lebanon had the fresh smell of its cedars and of the shrubs which grew on its slopes. 7 a. Read, They that dwell under his shadow shall again make corn to grow (so JPS). God is speaking, and declaring that restored Israel will enjoy such blessing that other peoples will be blessed through association with Israel. They shall plant corn and reap harvests under Israel's shadow.

8. Verse 8 is best understood as a dialogue between Israel and God. Israel asks, What have I to do any more with idols? Ephraim (Israel) has learned her lesson, and is ready to renounce idolatry. God replies: I have heard him and observed him. God looks with favor on Israel's renunciation of idolatry. Israel again speaks: I am like a green fir tree. In her prosperity Israel likens herself to a stately fir, or cypress tree. This boast appears presumptuous, however, and God reminds his people, From me is thy fruit found.

C. A Parting Admonition. 14:9.

The question, Who is wise, and he shall understand these things?" conveys the idea, "Whoso is wise, let him understand these things." The wise and prudent can be expected to heed the prophet's message. The ways of the Lord comprise his Word, or will. The term "way" is here used as a metaphor. The just can walk in the Lord's way without fear, but the transgressors find stumbling blocks along the road, and constantly come to grief.

JOEL

INTRODUCTION

Author's Name and Personal History. The author is termed "Joel the son of Pethuel" (1:1). The Hebrew name Yô'ēl (LXX; Iōél, Vulg.) means "Yahweh (or Jehovah) is God." Hence, like the name Micah, it may indicate a confession of faith on the part of the child's parents.

Joel's personal history is limited to what is suggested in the prophecy itself. Although thirteen other persons in the Old Testament bear the name Joel, the prophet cannot be identified with any of them. His message is concerned primarily with Jerusalem and Judah. His references to the land and city suggest that he was a citizen of southern Palestine and probably a resident of Jerusalem (see "Zion," 2:1,15,32; 3:16,17,21; the "children of Zion," 2:23; "Judah" and "Jerusalem," 2:32; 3:1,16,17,18,20; the "children of Judah" and Jerusalem, 3:6, 8,19). He demonstrates a thorough knowledge of the Temple, its services and personnel (e.g., 1:9,13,14,16; 2:14,17). However, his castigation of the priests seems to indicate that he was not a member of their caste.

Date. So far scholars have not been able to agree on the dating of the book of Joel. However, of the various dates proposed, there are two primary suggestions: (1) An early date, during the reign of Joash (or Jehoash) in Judah, about 830 B.C. (2) A post-Exilic date, about 400 B.C.—during the Persian period. There are some logical arguments to support a late date. For one thing, there is no reference in the title verse (1:1) to the ruling king, as in other pre-Exilic prophets. Also, the Northern Kingdom (Samaria) is not mentioned, so evidently it had long been extinct. Joel uses the word Israel for Judah, which no pre-Exilic prophet would have done. The term was used only for the ten northern tribes prior to 722 B.C. (the fall of Samaria). The priests, not nobles or kings, were the leaders in the post-Exilic society. The reference in 3:6 to the Greeks (Ionians) indicates a time when the Jews were in contact with them. Also verses 1,2,17 of Joel 3 indicate that the Captivity had already occurred.

On the other hand, arguments for the pre-Exilic date are strong. The prominence of the priests and the absence of the nobles and king are due to the fact that Jehoiada the high priest was ruling for the boy king, Joash. The argument from silence (see on Samaria above) is weightless, for the author was not primarily concerned with the events of the Northern Kingdom. The term Israel could be used appropriately of Judah as the rightful heir of the spiritual blessings of Jacob. Intercourse between Greece and Tyre could have occurred at an early date, for Greece is not here referred to as a nation. The Hebrew word Yāwān (=Ionian) could refer to a group of isolated bands of slave-traders from a distant country. Bring back the captivity (3:1) simply means "restore the fortune" (cf. Job 42:10). There is no description in Joel 3 that will not fit pre-Exilic times. Joel 3:4-6 refers to the same events as are described in the book of Obadiah. The enemies referred to are not countries of the Exile (Assyria, Babylonia, and Samaria), but pre-Exilic countries (Phoenicia and Philistia; cf. II Chr 21:16,17).

Authorship. The book of Joel has traditionally been accepted as the work of one author. However, about 1870 M. Vernes suggested that 2:28–3:21 (in the Hebrew Bible, chs. 3; 4) were not written by the author of 1:2–2:27 (in the Hebrew Bible, 1:1–2:18). Later, he modified his view and admitted that the same author wrote both sections; he still maintained, however, that striking differences exist between the two sections. Other minor attempts have been made to prove that the book is not a literary unit. Nowack, Marti, and others who have successfully questioned the validity of this school of thought contend that Joel is a unit. The higher critical view commonly accepted today is that Joel is the responsible author of the book but that later modifications, expansions, and interpolations may have occurred through the centuries of transmission of the Scriptures.

Style. The style of Joel is classical, resembling that of Amos and Micah.

Whether Joel borrowed heavily from the earlier prophets, or whether he was the well out of which they drew cannot be determined with certainty; but literary affinity is strong. Compare Joel 3:18 with Amos 9:13; Joel 1:4 with Amos 4:9; Joel 2:11 with Zeph 1:14,15; Joel 2:3 with Ezk 36:35 and Isa 51:3; Joel 2:11 with Mal 3:2; Joel 3:10 with Isa 2:4.

Occasion for Writing. The immediate occasion for the writing of the book was the devastation of the land by a double plague of locusts and drought. In poetic strain of matchless elegance and power, the prophet depicts the invasion of the locusts under the figure of an army, suggesting that they are a harbinger of the "Day of the Lord." He summons all classes of the population to repentance, and promises them that if they will meet the conditions of obedience to God, the land will be restored to its former fruitfulness. Also the Spirit of God will be poured out upon all flesh, the covenant people will eventually triumph over all their foes, and an era of universal holiness and peace will emerge.

Teachings. That "the Day of the Lord" is coming, is the central teaching of the book—the day when the Lord will manifest himself in the destruction of his enemies and the exaltation of his friends. This day will be accompanied by great convulsions of the earth and a display of extraordinary phenomena in nature (2:30,31). The attitude of a man's heart and life before the Lord will be the factor that will determine his reaction to that day. It will be a day of terror to the sinner (1:15; 2:11) and a day of blessing to the saint (2:12-14, 19-29). Those who call upon the name of the Lord will be delivered, but the enemies of the people will be annihilated (ch. 3).

    3. World judgment. 3:9-17.
  D. The blessings following the judgment. 3:18-21.

COMMENTARY

Title Verse. 1:1.

1. Joel means Yahweh (or Jehovah) is God. Pethuel. Persuaded of God. In the East the use of one's father's name served as a mark of identification. It was analogous to our use of second names (cf. Hos 1:1; Zeph 1:1; Mic 1:1).

I. The Locust Plague as the Harbinger of the Day of the Lord. 1:2—2:17.

A. A Threefold Calamity: Locusts, Drought, and Conflagrations. 1:2-20.

In the midst of a terrible calamity the prophet summons the people to universal mourning. He interprets the present condition as a forerunner (harbinger) of the Day of the Lord (1:2-12). To avert its terrors he calls upon all classes of the populace to turn to God in repentance (1:13,14). He re-emphasizes the present plight and closes with a prayer for deliverance (1:16-20).

1) The Invasion of the Locusts. 1:2-12.

2. Listen to this. A solemn plea to be attentive to what follows (cf. Amos 3:1; 4:1; 5:1). Old men. Not the official elders, but the "aged" who transmitted the lore of the past to the next generation. In the days of your fathers. Among the people of the East memories of past times were handed down from generation to generation. 3. The reply to the question of verse 2 is not stated. The answer could only be NO! Tell. The Hebrew word săppērû (an intensive stem) comes from the same root from which "book" is derived. Here the verb means the giving of careful, detailed information. (For the transmission of the record of Divine deliverance and revelation in this manner, see Deut 4:9; 6:6,7; 11:8; Ps 78:5.) Now the same procedure must record this unparalleled calamity.

4. Palmerworm . . . locust . . . canker-worm . . . caterpiller. Literally: Shearer, swarmer, lapper, devourer – describing four of the eighty or ninety species of locusts in the East. 5. Awake, you drunkards. It is high time to awake from the sleep of intoxication! The drunkards represent the luxurious classes, who are here urged to weep and howl because the destruction of the vineyards has cut off their supplies.

6,7. The reason for the plight, i.e., the immense number of the enemies, their horrible weapons, and the awful results of their attack. Nation (Heb. gôy). The swarms of locusts are like a nation; they devastate the land like an invading army. Has come upon. A military term used of the approach of an enemy (cf. I Kgs 20:22; Isa 21:2). Jaw teeth. The "eye teeth" or "projectors." The jaws of some locusts are toothed like a saw. With such jaws they can gnaw wood and leather as well as foliage. Barked (or splintered). This is hyperbolic. The locusts could not splinter the fig tree, but they could reduce each fig tree to the value of a mere splinter. Stripped. Literally: Making bare he has made it bare. By constant gnawing the locusts stripped off the blossoms, foliage, and bark. White. Not the appearance of a burnt countryside, but that of ground covered with snow, due to the whiteness of the trees and the dry herbs.

8. Wail (Heb. 'ĕlî). This verb is used only here, but the meaning is clear from the Aramaic and Syriac. The form is feminine because the entire community is addressed. Like a virgin (Heb. betûlâ). Literally, one who is separated from all others, one who has not known any man (Gen 24:16). Husband of her youth. Left a widow before she married. 9. The justification for the call to universal mourning. Meal offering and drink offering. They stand for the daily sacrifice (cf. Num 15:5; 28:7; Ex 29:38). In later Judaism nothing was more dreaded than the suspension of the Thamid (see Dan 8:11; 11:31; 12:11). Josephus felt this breach of daily sacrifice to be the most terrible and unprecedented calamity in the siege of Jerusalem (Antiq xiv. 16. 2; Wars vi. 2. 1).

11,12. The prophet issues a call to the plowman and the vine dressers. Be ye ashamed. The farmers, like the vine, are to be embarrassed. Joel depicts men, crops, and fields as mourning together. Jerome allegorizes here and contends that the husbandmen and vine dressers are priests and preachers. The fig tree was native in western Asia and very plentiful in Palestine. It was highly prized and often mentioned along with the vine (cf. Deut 8:8; Jer 5:17). To "sit under one's vine and fig tree" was a symbol of prosperity and security (I Kgs 4:25; Mic 4:4). Figs were dried and pressed into cakes and used for food (I Sam 25:18) and as a poultice (II Kgs 20:7; Isa 38:21). Grapes and figs are referred to by Josephus as the principal fruits of the land (Wars iii. x. 8). Also today many houses in the Near East are entirely covered with vines and are hidden almost entirely behind fig trees. Pomegranate tree. There are numerous references in Scripture to this tree (e.g., Num 13:23; 20:5; Deut 8:8; I Sam 14:2; Song 4:3, 13). It is a shrub or low tree, from ten to fifteen feet high, with small, dark green foliage. It bears a fruit about the size of an orange, sweet on one variety and acid on the other. The pulp is most refreshing to the taste. The juice of the acid kind was sweetened and used as a beverage (Song 8:2). It was also used in salads.

Palm tree. The palm has existed since prehistoric times over a vast area in the dry warm zone which extends from Senegal to the basin of the Indus–chiefly between the fifteenth and thirtieth degrees of latitude. It is very common in Palestine. The coin struck to commemorate the capture of Jerusalem in A.D. 70 represented a weeping woman (the symbol of the country) sitting under a palm tree; it bore the inscription Judaea capta. The apple tree. Various suggestions have been offered for the identification of this tree, i.e., quince, citron, orange, apricot, and apple. According to the Song it was a majestic tree suitable to sit under, its branches overshadowing a tent or house, its fruit pleasant to the taste, and its smell desirable, refreshing to the weary. Withers . . . disappeared (AV, is withered away). Literally, shows shame. The same verb occurs in verses 10,11,12. This frequent repetition of the word for "ashamed" is an indirect call to repentance in verse 13. When joy itself disappears, the time for penitence has arrived!

2) A Call to Repentance. 1:13,14.

13. The thought returns to verse 9. The priests are here addressed on the same principle as the drunkards are in verse 5. With the failure of the crops, their ministry would end, for there would be no first fruits, and sacrifices would soon cease. Put on sackcloth. The wearing of sackcloth by the priests would add solemnity to the occasion. Lament. The word used especially of mourning for the dead – expressive of intense grief (LXX, Smite yourselves upon the breasts). My God . . . your God. A sharp contrast! The prophet's God called for repentance; the priest's God demanded the drink offering and the meal offering. 14. Joel appeals to the priests to call a solemn assembly, to issue a call for a public religious gathering, in which every one will participate. The elders. Though officials, they were subject to the priests in religious matters. House of the Lord. The Temple.

3) The Terrors of the Day of the Lord· 1:15-20.

15. The day of the Lord. Man has his day and walks in his own way, but eventually the Day of the Lord must come! In the light of man's sin, the Day of the Lord must be a time of vengeance. Almighty. Hebrew Shadday is used as a name for God, with distinct reference to the Divine power (used thirty-one times in the Book of Job).

16. Before our eyes. The Judeans are helpless to prevent destruction. Joy and gladness. The joy of religious convocation and the presentation of the first fruits. These were to be offered at the Temple with rejoicing (Deut 26:1-11). 18. Even the irrational animals are represented as crying out in agony. Groan (sob). The cattle participate in the sorrow of man. Perplexed. Press themselves, or are held guilty. The poor, innocent, helpless beasts have to bear the guilt of man's sin.

19,20. While the beasts can only sob and suffer, the human souls can cry to the Lord. Pastures of the wilderness. (Uncultivated land where sheep graze (cf. Amos 1:2). Fire . . . flame. Heat and drought which accompany the plague of locusts.

B. The Scourge As the Forerunner of the Judgment Day. 2:1-17.

The prophet visualizes a more terrible plague coming. In highly poetical terms he depicts the swarms of locusts like a hostile army, coming as the army of the Lord for judgment (2:1-11). But the door of mercy, he says, is still ajar! If the people will turn to their God with contrite hearts, the calamity may be averted (2:12-14). The prophet summons the whole community to assemble for prayer and fasting in the house of the Lord (2:15-17).

1) A Vivid Picture of the Coming Judgment. 2:1-11.

1. Blow the trumpet. An announcement of danger (see Jer 6:17; Ezk 33:3; Hos 8:1). Tremble. It is high time to awake from careless indifference. The summons is to acts of penitence in face of the scourge.

2,3. A more effective portrayal of the terror of The Day as indicated by the present calamity. A day of darkness . . . gloom . . . clouds . . . thick darkness. Four synonyms used for emphasis, signifying intense, impenetrable darkness (cf. Zeph 1:15; Ezk 34:12). Three of the words are used in Deut 4:11 of the darkness which enveloped Sinai when the Lord descended upon it in fire. The fourth word is applied in Ex 10:22 to the plague of darkness. Dawn dispersed upon the mountains (AV, the morning spread upon the mountains). The locust hosts are compared to the dawn, either because of its ruddy appearance, or because the dawn is engulfed by masses of cloud and mist, and so day is shut out. One traveler tells of seeing a swarm of locusts that extended a mile in length and half a mile in width, and appeared in the distance like a black cloud. Fire devours. All is lost; the beautiful country has become a wasted desert. The country looks as if it has been scorched, burned up, or reduced to brown ash. Garden of Eden. This and Ezk 36:26-35 are the only references to the Garden outside the book of Genesis. Before the destruction, the land was rich in vegetation, pleasant to behold; now it is a desolate wilderness, like Egypt and Edom.

4. The prophet vividly describes the appearance of the hosts and their terrible advance. As . . . horses. "In the locust is . . . the face of a horse, the eye of an elephant, the neck of a bull, the horns of a deer, the chest of a lion, the belly of a scorpion, the wings of an eagle, the thighs of a camel, the feet of an ostrich, the tail of a serpent" (an Arab saying, quoted in Pusey's The Minor Prophets, I, 174). 5. The noise which accompanies the advance of innumerable horses is compared to the rattling of chariots—low two-wheeled vehicles used for military purposes. The amazing noise of the locusts can be heard six miles off. It is comparable to the sound of a cataract, a torrent, a rushing wind, or a raging flame.

7. Joel begins his comparison of this host with a well equipped army. The advance is irresistible; there is no confusion in the warriors' ranks; they scale the highest walls; they penetrate the inmost recesses of the houses. They run to the assault, ready to charge. Break their ranks. Literally, change not their caravans; each squadron remains compact, like a regiment in an army.

8. Swords or missile(s). Locusts defy all weapons that men may array against them. They are so numerous that even after millions have been detroyed, the swarms advance as though nothing had happened. It is only through the destruction of their eggs that locusts can be eliminated.

9. Like a thief. The doors are shut, but the invaders pour through the unglazed windows. This image reveals that the prophet is not thinking of an attacking army, but only of the actual locusts. The same image is used in the NT for our Lord's coming (Mt 24:43,44; Lk 12:39; I Thess 5:2; II Pet 3:10).

11. His voice. In the terrific storm depicted in 2:10, the prophet hears the voice of God (cf. I Sam 12:18; Ps 18:14; 46:8). Who can endure it? (RSV) Behind and beyond the locusts' ravages, the earthquake, and the storm looms the Day of the Lord, bringing a camp more impregnable, a host more irresistible, and a punishment great and terrible. Who can abide the day of his coming? Apparently no one! But there is still hope. The door of mercy is open! If the people will turn to God in a true spirit of repentance, he may yet pardon!

2) An Exhortation to Repentance. 2:12-17.

12. Yet even now (RSV). At the eleventh hour, when destruction appears imminent! Return to me (RSV). Forsake your self-chosen paths of rebellion; come to your senses; recognize Me as your God; and follow My instructions. This is the appeal of all the great prophets (e.g., Hos 14:1; Isa 1:2; Amos 4:6). Return emphasizes the idea of conversion. With all your heart. The seat not only of the emotions, but of all the powers of personality, intellect, sensibility, and will. All of the activities of the human spirit (all thoughts, all affections, and all volitions) are to be centered upon the Lord. The inward change (heart turning) will manifest itself in the outward change of actions.

13. Rend your heart, and not your garments. A demand for moral and ethical religion. Penitence must be heartfelt; it must not be a matter of mere ritual. Joel, like all the true prophets, demands "heart sorrow and a clean life following" (cf. Ezk 36:26; Ps 51:19). Penitence is not an opus operatum ("a work performed," i.e., a meritorious work), a tearing of the garment (cf. this expression of grief in Lev 13:45; Jer 36:24), but an inward sorrow, yearning, anguish, and a tearing of the heart! Gracious. Literally, inclined to pardon the repentant sinner. Merciful. Possessing mercy in abundance —equivalent to "full of compassion." Slow to anger. Literally, long as to the breathing of the nostrils in anger. The Lord does not permit his anger to break forth immediately as an avalanche upon the discovery of sin, but he waits to see if the sinner will repent. Abounding in loving kindness. The Hebrew word hesed, used of (1) the love of God toward man, (2) the love of man toward man, and (3) the love of man toward God.

14. Who knows. Perhaps he might return and repent. God is not man that he should repent; he cannot turn or be converted like a man. Yet he has his own Divine ways of both repenting and turning. Although changeless in his attitude toward sin, God may still show mercy on his sinful people. A blessing. A new harvest, which will make the meal and drink offerings again possible.

15,16. A solemn assembly. Called first in terror in 1:14 and 2:1, it is now summoned in the hope of Divine mercy. All classes and ages of the population are summoned to this great expectant party of repentance! Even the bride and the bridegroom, to whom a year's exemption from public service was allowed, are included (cf. Deut 24:5).

17. Priests . . . ministers. The mediators between God and the people. Weep. In sorrow and repentance as they lead the people. Between the porch and the altar. The inner part of the court of the priests (cf. Ezk 8:16). Here Zechariah was standing when he was martyred (II Chr 24:20-22; Mt 23:35). Spare. Have mercy and withhold future judgment. Thy people . . . thy heritage. The basis of the appeal (cf. Deut 9:25,29). The Lord is intensely interested in their welfare. Reproach. Again and again the Almighty is reminded that, if he should forsake Israel and permit her to be destroyed, his power would be questioned. Where is your God? A sneer at the covenant relation between the Lord and his people. The only way to avoid the mocking is for God to avert the calamity (cf. Ex 32:12; Ps 79:10).

II. The Averting of Judgment and Bestowal of Blessings. 2:18–3:21.

A. The Blessings in the Immediate Future. 2:18-27.

This is the turning point of the book. Evidently the people responded to the prophet's invitation. The solemn convocation was convened, the people repented, and the Lord forgave them. Consequently, he now promises to remove the locusts and restore the prosperity of the land. Now all will know that God himself dwells with his people.

18. Then. The time is not definitely stated, but it is implied that the people turned to the Lord in penitence of heart. Jealous . . . compassion. The jealousy of God is founded upon the covenant (cf. marital relationship between the Lord and his people in Isa 54:5; 62:5; Hos 2:19). His jealousy is aroused when his people spurn his love.

20. The northern army. The Northerner. The terrible locust swarms will be removed and scattered in the desert, the Dead Sea, and the Mediterranean Sea. The prophet visualizes the invasion of the land from the north by the armies of Assyria and Babylon, typified by the locusts. Great things. Two subjects are referred to, an immediate one—the locusts, and a more remote one—the Northerner. The locust army is seen as the instrument of the Lord. As terrible and repulsive as the locusts were, they turned the people to God in repentance. The stink of dead locusts is often referred to as intolerable and the cause of plagues. Augustine quotes from Julius Obsequens to show how a vast cloud of locusts, cast into the African Sea, were rolled up putrid on the shore, and a plague broke out killing 800,000 persons.

21. The beasts, men, and all sufferers of chapter 1 are now called upon to cast away their fear and to rejoice. The Lord hath done great things. A prophetic perfect (completed action). The prophet is so certain, upon Divine authority, of its happening that he speaks as if it has already occurred.

23. Rejoice in the Lord. In the midst of their rejoicing they are to remember that God's mercy made this possible. The early rain in just measure (ham-môreh liṣᵉ dāqâ). There is no doubt that môreh in the last clause of the verse means early rain. But the Targum, the Vulgate, and Jewish writers, followed by Keil, Pusey, and others, translate "Instructor in righteousness"—the Messiah. The leader of the Qumran community bore this title. However, the context does not permit this translation, which Calvin termed "a strange exposition." Early rains and latter rains. The September-October and March-April rains were necessary for the fertility of the land in Palestine. 24,25. The heavens once again will be opened, the drought will end, the locusts will disappear, the harvest will return, and the Lord's presence will be realized.

26. The result of the bountiful restoration: The Jews will recognize the Lord as their God and praise him for his divine intervention. Name of the Lord. Equivalent to the person of the Lord (cf. Amos 2:7; Mic 5:4).

27. I am the Lord your God. Every religious leader from the time of Moses insisted that the Lord was the God of Israel (see, e.g., Ex 20:2; Deut 5:6), but the people too frequently forgot it and hence went "whoring after other gods" (Hos 2:5,8). The Lord, in order to bring them to their senses, had to rain down judgment upon them again and again. However, the present blow will cure them once and for all; they will recognize him as their only God. None else. The gods who in the past lured away the people are worthless. They possess no power to protect or assist. They add loads rather than lift (see Hos 2:7; Isa 1:29-31; 45:5,6,18).

B. The Outpouring of the Divine Spirit. 2:28-32.

In the Hebrew Bible, verses 28-32 constitute chapter 3. The word afterward looks forward far beyond the locust plague and Israel's repentance and restoration. For here the prophet turns from the physical and material to the spiritual and eternal. Through his prophetic vision, Joel rises above the religious experience of the local locust plague to a wider view of history. He dips into the future and sees spiritual revival in Israel and deliverance from all surrounding enemies. His vision thus anticipates a first fulfillment on the day of Pentecost and a final realization in the complete victory of the kingdom of the Lord Christ.

28. I will pour out my spirit. In great abundance (Calvin). The Spirit is the life principle in man (cf. Gen 1:2; Job 33:4), the invisible power to which all external actions are traced, and which endowed Israel's heroes with warlike energy (e.g., Jud 3:10; 11:29). The Spirit produces the prophetic power in its higher and lower forms (I Sam 10:6, 10; 19:20; Isa 61:1). All flesh. Not the animals but all mankind shall prophesy . . . dream dreams . . . see visions. In this coming manifestation of the Spirit, no distinction will be made on grounds of sex, age, or position; but a distinction will be made in the different methods by which the revelation is received and the prophetic gift exercised. That is, their sons, daughters, old persons, and youths will receive the Spirit of the Lord with all his various gifts. Prophesy. They will become "organs of Divine revelation" to all nations!

29. Even (AV, also). Something extraordinary. In the Messianic Age no distinction will be made between the bond and the free. In Ezk 39:29 and Zech 12:10 the Spirit is promised to Israel, to the king's house, and to the favored inhabitants of Jerusalem. But Joel goes further than these and includes all classes, in the spirit of universalism which also characterizes the book of Jonah.

30. There will be wonderful portents of the approach of the judgment. Wonders. Extraordinary phenomena on the earth and in the sky. Blood . . . fire . . . pillars of smoke. Terrors of war, bloodshed, violence, and columns of smoke rising from burned cities. Wars on an unprecedented scale will be forerunners of the Day of the Lord (cf. Isa 13:6; Zeph 1:7). Some scholars view these as "abnormal atmospherical phenomena," or results of a nuclear holocaust. Blood. The red color of the moon. Smoke. Perhaps the smoke clouds filling the air as a result of volcanic eruptions. Fire. Lightning, since thunderstorms often accompany earthquakes.

31. The phenomena of the sky. The darkening of the sun and the extinction of the lights of heaven are frequently mentioned in the Scriptures as harbingers of the Day of the Lord or of approaching judgment (2:2,10; 3:15; Isa 13:10; 34:4; Jer 4:23; Mt 24:29; Mk 13:24; Lk 21:25; Rev 6:12).

32. A great and horrible day to the nations (3:2), but the true worshipers of the Lord need have no fear! Call on the name of the Lord. Not with a cold ceremonial or heartless repetition of phrases but with spiritual, heartfelt worship. The one who calls on the Lord is one who worships him. The way of escape is through membership in the true Israel, not Israel according to the flesh, but Israel according to the Spirit. This membership is evidenced by true, wholehearted devotion to the Lord. Survivors (Heb., p°lêtâ). All who escape (AV, the remnant). The remnant in Jerusalem embraces all who believe or shall believe from all nations, kindred, and tongues! The Apostle Peter quoted 2:28-32 after the outpouring of the Holy Spirit at Pentecost as having been fulfilled at that event. However, the outpouring of the Spirit on the Day of Pentecost was simply the beginning. It will be continued until all flesh will be equipped with Divine illumination.

C. Judgment upon the Nations. 3:1-17.

When the great day announced by extraordinary phenomena (2:30,31) really breaks, its terrors will fall only upon the foes of Israel. This judgment is twofold: first, to consummate a complete and final separation between the faithful and God's enemies; second, to establish the kingdom of the Lord upon the earth in triumphal glory. This conflict is to be waged in the valley of Jehoshaphat (lit., the Lord's judgment; 3:1-3). Perhaps this valley is to be identified with the Kidron. The nations that have exhibited the greatest hostility will suffer the most (3:4-8); regardless of their superior numbers they will be utterly annihilated, and the inhabitants of Jerusalem will experience no harm (3:9-17).

1) The Avenging of Wrongs Committed Against the Jews. 3:1-3.

Verse 1 begins chapter 4 in the Hebrew. For connects 3:1 with 2:32. It introduces the prophet's explanation for the deliverance of the Jews alone; the other nations will be destroyed. In those days and at that time. Refers not back to 2:28, but forward to the time of the deliverance of the Jews (Jer 33:15).

2. Muster all nations. All who have mistreated the people of God. Valley of Jehoshaphat, or the valley of Divine judgment. This name is given to the scene of the final conflict because of the meaning of the name—the Lord judges. Scattered . . . carved up. Two specific charges against the nations: they deported the Israelites; and they divided the land among them.

3. The ignominious treatment of the helpless Jews by the conquerors is pointed out. Cast lots. A common custom with the ancient peoples (cf. Ob 11; Nah 3:10; Thucydides History iii. 50). This made the captives absolute property of their masters. Boy. Since he would be of no immediate use, they exchanged him for a harlot, to satisfy their lust. Girl. Too young for their purpose; or, after they satisfied their lust, they exchanged her for wine, to indulge in licentious revelry.

2) Judgment upon Phoenicia. 3:4-8.

4. The prophet turns aside momentarily to address the nations who have been especially hostile toward the covenant people. He singles out the special mistreatments, and promises the nations swift and righteous retribution for their crimes. Tyre . . . Zidon (Sidon). The two principal cities of Phoenicia. Originally Tyre was located on the mainland, but it was transferred, for safety's sake, to a neighboring rocky island. Territories of Philistia. This district in southwest Palestine, covering an area about forty miles long and fifteen miles wide, was divided between the five chief cities. The Philistines were exceedingly hostile to the Israelites throughout their checkered history.

5. These nations treated the Lord with utter contempt. They stole his silver and gold, filled their temples with his precious things, and sold his children into slavery. My silver . . . gold . . . priceless possessions. These included the things taken from the houses of the rich as well as those taken from the Temple. In ancient times plundering always followed the conquest of a city (e.g., I Kgs 14:26; II Kgs 14:14).

6. The Greeks. Literally, Ionians, or Javan (cf. Gen 10:2-4; Isa 66:19; Ezk 27:13,19). Post-Biblical literature frequently mentions the slave traffic of the Phoenicians (cf. Ezk 27:13; I Macc 3:41). However, Greek writers show that the Phoenicians and Greeks enjoyed commercial intercourse at an early period. Far from their own border. Hence they had no hope of returning. This was a severe blow to the Jews, for they viewed a foreign country or nation as unclean.

7,8. All that the enemies have done will be recompensed lex talionis (i.e., by the law of retaliation). Them. The children of Judah and Jerusalem. They will be aroused into activity and returned to their homeland; the blessings of the Lord will make them strong and powerful. The Jews in turn will be used of God to undo the Tyrians, Sidonians, and Philistines—sell them into slavery! Shebans. A renowned trading race in Arabia. For the Lord hath spoken it. A common formula of asseveration in the OT (e.g., Isa 1:20; 22:25; Ob 18).

3) World Judgment. 3:9-17.

9. Announce this among the nations. The prophet returns to the announcement broken off in verse 3. The nations are urged to equip themselves for conflict and assemble in the valley of Jehoshaphat. There they will muster at the command of the Lord, but they will be annihilated. Prepare (lit., sanctify) for war. Bring the sacrifices, perform the customary religious rites before doing battle. Arouse. Wake up the heroes, for this is not time for sleep. Muster . . . come up. Technical military terms. 10. Plowshares . . . pruning hooks. The agricultural (peace) implements are to be turned into weapons of war. 11. Hurry. On the double! The matter is to be settled speedily. Surrounding nations. Not merely the immediate neighbors but all Gentile nations.

12,13. God's reply to the brief petition is that he will take care of his people. Sit to judge. Not to listen to additional pleas but to pronounce sentence. The judgment is depicted under a twofold figure—the reaping of grain and the treading out of grapes (see also Rev 14:15,16,19,20). Ripe. They are so sinful that they are ready for judgment (cf. Amos 3). Full. An added picture of extreme sinfulness. Vats are overflowing. The grapes of sin are so numerous and ripe that even before they are artificially crushed, the juice is pressed out by their weight.

14. The picture of judgment begins here. Multitudes, multitudes. Literally, tumults. That is, great multitudes. The repetition is for emphasis. Valley of decision. The judgment will be decisive! The nations are assembled because judgment is ready to burst forth.

15,16. This darkness, symbolical of judgment, as at the crucifixion, could mean that before the great light of God, the lesser lights withdraw. But the reference is more probably to the terror of the wrath of God (see 2:10,31; Isa 13:10; Ezk 32:7; Mt 24:29; Mk 13:24). The Lord . . . shall roar. The verb describes the anger of the lion as he springs upon his prey. Under the figure of an angry lion (cf. Amos 1:2; Jer 25:30), the Lord is represented as ready to leap upon the nations. Utter his voice. The appearance of God is frequently described in the OT under the imagery of a thunderstorm. Zion . . . Jerusalem. The Temple on Mount Zion in Jerusalem is the earthly habitation of the Lord, the base of his operation. The fact that God does not leave the Temple is a favorable sign to his people. The heavens and earth will tremble. A severe earthquake will accompany the storm.

17. The present crisis, i.e., the destruction of the nations and the deliverance of Israel, will teach the people of Israel that the Lord is their God. They will now recognize him as supreme (2:27; cf. Hos 2:8; Ezk 28:23). Jerusalem shall be holy. Set apart, consecrated entirely to God. Strangers. Aliens, citizens of foreign countries, who have no interest in or love for the things precious to the redeemed Jews (cf. Hos 7:9; Jer 30:8).

D. The Blessings Following the Judgment. 3:18-21.

After the judgment upon the nations, Judah, under the care and protective hand of the Lord, will enjoy the fullness of divine blessing. The seat of the former world powers will become a barren waste, but in Judah there will be fertility and peace.

18. In that day. The beginning of the Messianic Age—the day of judgment upon God's enemies and of deliverance for the Jews. A hyperbolical picture of extreme fertility now follows. The territory of Judah was covered with limestone rocks, and the soil yielded only a meagre subsistance in return for the most arduous toil. But in this new age the fertility is pictured in terms of the mountains and hills themselves shooting forth wine and milk. Canaan is called "a land flowing with milk and honey" (Ex 3:8). Water was rationed out sparingly in Judah. Most of the brooks dried up entirely during the dry seasons. In the new age there will be no more drought. Water will be plentiful for man and beast. A fountain . . . from the house of the Lord. A fountain shall come forth from Jerusalem, or from the Temple of the Lord (Ezk 47:1-12; Zech 14:8). Valley of Shittim. Literally, valley of Acacias—a dry and thirsty place. This was the name of the last encampment of the Israelites before they entered Canaan (Num 25:1; Josh 3:1). Ezekiel pictures the water flowing eastward across the Jordan.

19. While Judah is prospering, the curse of desolation (cf. 2:3) will fall upon Edom and Egypt because of the crimes they have committed against the Israelites. Egypt. The old oppressor. Edom. The constant thorn in the side of Israel, who triumphed over and benefited by Israel's calamities (Ps 137:7; Lam 4:22; Ezk 25:12; 35:15; 36:5; Ob 10-14). This violence consisted not only of the shedding of Jewish blood during war, but also of the unprovoked massacre of peaceful Jews living in these lands (Amos 1:11; Ob 10).

20. Whereas the surrounding nations shall become desolate, Judah and Jerusalem shall flourish forever. Endure. (AV, abide). Literally, sit—a poetical expression for continual habitation and prosperity. For ever (Heb. 'ôlām). An endless period—synonymous with from generation to generation. Neither the Romans nor the Turks quite reduced the little country of Judah to desolation. Today the Israelis are rebuilding her cities, rejuvenating her land, and restoring her ancient glory!

21. I will avenge (RSV; cleanse, AV). The judgment upon the nations will be decisive proof of their guilt and of the innocence of the Jewish victims. I am He Who dwells in Zion. A reiteration of the greatest of all the promises. With the execution of judgment, the Lord will establish himself forever in Zion. Never again will he forsake his people so that they become a byword among their foes.

In the Book of Joel is portrayed Israel's passage from the City of Destruction to the Celestial City. The bright promise of the closing verses parallels the glorious ending of Matthew's Gospel!

AMOS

INTRODUCTION

The Date and Background. The first verse of the prophecy of Amos, together with 7:10-13, places the prophet in the middle of the eighth century B.C., contemporary with Uzziah of Judah and Jeroboam II of Israel. Uzziah, king of Judah, reigned about fifty years (791–740 B.C.), and was successful in some ways. He defeated the enemies of Judah and strengthened the walls of Jerusalem. The country was prosperous under his leadership, and for a time the influence of Amos was spiritually constructive.

But Uzziah was probably under the influence of Jeroboam, king of Israel. Jeroboam's reign of approximately forty years (793–753 B.C.) was extremely successful, and his influence eclipsed that of Uzziah in practically every area. In his religious leadership, Jeroboam, like the first Jeroboam, the son of Nebat, deliberately encouraged the practices of fertility cults (II Kgs 14:24,25). He did not exclude the worship of Jehovah, but paganized it by adding cultic pillars, images, and teraphim (Hos 2:13,16,17; 3:4; 4:12; 10:2; 11:2). The social life of the nation was characterized by adultery, robbery, and murder. The luxury of the wealthy was built upon injustice and oppression of the poor (Amos 2:6-8; 3:15; 4:1; 5:7-12; 6:3-6; 8:4-6; Hos 4:1,2,11-13; 6:8,9; 12:7,8).

It is generally believed that Amos prophesied about 760 B.C. The period of Amos was a time of political security for Israel, which was reflected in the pride and carelessness of the ruling classes. The struggle with Syria had ended with victory for Israel; Jeroboam had "restored the coast of Israel from the entering of Hamath unto the sea of the plain" (II Kgs 14:25). This mood of carelessness characterized the later years of Jeroboam's reign rather than the early period. The threat of Assyrian power under Tiglath-pileser III (745–727 B.C.; see commentary on Amos 1:14) had not yet developed. The earthquake mentioned in 1:1 does not help in determining more definitely the date of the prophet's ministry.

Life of Amos. Amos was a native of Tekoa, located in the desert of Judah, twelve miles south of Jerusalem. He was a shepherd, who supplemented his income by taking care of "sycomore" (wild fig) trees (1:1; 7:14,15). There is no record of his family. The call of God came to him while he was following the flock. His claim that the Lord called him directly (7:15) puts him in line with all the prophets who experienced a direct revelation from God. Although Amos was a native of Judah, he prophesied in the Northern Kingdom. His preaching aroused such antagonism, however, that he returned to Judah, where he committed his message to writing.

The writing of Amos shows that he was not an untutored rustic, but had a deep knowledge of history and of the problems of his day. His language, rich in figures and symbols, stands with the finest literary style in the Old Testament.

The Message of Amos. The great proclamation at the beginning of this prophecy (1:2) sets the tone of Amos' message. The Lord's voice, like the roar of a lion, will be heard in judgment from Zion. The prophet reveals the spiritual corruption under the religious formalism and material prosperity of the time (5:12, 21). He castigates the leaders for the deterioration of social justice and morality (2:7,8) and points out their total disregard of human rights and personality (2:6). He insists that God's people must seek the Lord and repent, and establish justice if they are to live (5:14,15). But because the people of Israel will not repent, there is nothing left for them but destruction (9:1-8). The Day of the Lord will be an assertion of the claims of God's moral character upon those who have repudiated him. When this is recognized, there will be established the glory of the promised Davidic kingdom; and that day is inevitable (9:11-15). The message of Amos is in large measure a "cry for justice."

COMMENTARY

I. Prophecies Against the Nations. 1:1—2:16.

A. Superscription and Proclamation. 1:1,2. The superscription (1:1) serves as a title for the whole book and identifies the writer. It places the book in its historical setting. The proclamation (1:2) creates the spirit and mood of the prophecy as a whole.

1. The words of Amos. Sometimes a prophet refers to his prophecy as "the word of Jehovah" (e.g., Joel 1:1; Jon 1:1; Mic 1:1). But in this statement (cf. Hag 1:12) the words of the prophecy are declared to be the words of Jehovah. The divine origin of the words of the prophet is emphasized by the phrase, which he saw. The word hāzāh, "he saw," usually characterizes the method of the reception of the divine message as supernatural (cf. Isa 1:1). The message was God's and not that of Amos. Who was among the herdmen. The Hebrew word for herdmen is not the ordinary word for shepherd, rō'eh, but nōqêd, which means that Amos' sheep were not of the common variety. The word refers to one who cares for dwarfed sheep, with short legs. It helps to account for the Arabic expression, "viler than a naqqad." This breed of sheep is prized for its fine, abundant wool. Aside from this reference in Amos, nōqêd is found only in II Kgs 3:4, where it refers to Mesha, king of Moab, and is translated "sheepmaster." Archaeologists have found it in line 30 of the Moabite Stone of Mesha. On the basis of II Kgs 3:4, Jews have insisted that Amos was a wealthy sheep owner, with other interests besides his sheep (cf. Amos 7:14), and that he voluntarily submitted to affliction because of Israel's sins. But this interpretation does not necessarily follow. Tekoa. A village in Judah, six miles southeast of Bethlehem and twelve miles southeast of Jerusalem. The country surrounding the hill upon which Tekoa was located was stony but rich in pastures. Concerning Israel. Although there are allusions to Judah in the prophecy, the words of Amos were intended for Israel. Uzziah . . . Jeroboam. See Date and Background. Two years before the earthquake. The earthquake referred to was intended as a chronological note. It must have been unusually severe to be mentioned thus, since earthquakes are very common in the area. The prophet Zechariah also refers to this earthquake (14:5). Josephus (Antiq. ix 10.4) relates it to Uzziah's sin in acting as a priest (II Chr 26:16).

2. Will roar. The Hebrew verb shā'ag describes the roar of a lion as he leaps upon his prey. It expresses the immediacy of the judgment; for when the shepherd hears the roar, he knows that the attack is already taking place, and it is too late to save the sheep. The word reflects the background of Amos, who, as a shepherd, was familiar with the terror of a lion's leap, and used it symbolically of the coming judgment of the Lord (cf. Joel 3:16). This verse is the text of the book. Zion . . . Jerusalem. To true worshipers of the Lord, these terms represented the center of the theocracy and of national life. The habitations . . . shall mourn. The pastures shall dry up. This again reflects the shepherd life of Amos. Top of Carmel shall wither. Carmel means garden land, and it is the most fertile land in the country. The withering of Carmel indicates how severe the drought would be (cf. Isa 33:9; Nah 1:4).

B. Indictment of the Neighboring Nations. 1:3—2:3. Amos was a prophet to Israel, but he began his preaching with an announcement that judgment was to fall upon the surrounding nations. In this way he was able to show that since the other nations were to be punished, Israel could not expect to escape. Because she had the truth as preached by the prophets of the Lord, she had greater condemnation than the nations that did not have this truth.

3. For three transgressions . . . and for four. The word translated transgressions actually means rebellions, and the expression has reference to the innumerable evil deeds committed, and to the truth that God is longsuffering and does not act hastily in judgment. Damascus. According to the tradition in the area, it is the oldest city in the world, and the Arabs think of it as the world's garden. It was the capital of Syria, the greatest of the Aramaean kingdoms. I will not turn away. Or, I will not intervene. This is a reference to the fact that in the nature of things, because of the rebellions of Damascus, judgment was inevitable, unless God intervened. Have threshed Gilead. The bodies of the victims were torn by the teeth of the threshing sledges.

4. House of Hazael. Hazael, whose coming to the throne was predicted by Elisha (II Kgs 8:7-13), was the founder of the Syrian dynasty that ruled in the time of Amos. He was a contemporary of Joram (II Kgs 8:29), Jehu (II Kgs 10: 31,32), and Jehoahaz (II Kgs 13:22). House of Hazael is a reference to his royal palace, as indicated by the parallelism in the next part of the verse. Ben-hadad. The son and successor of Hazael (II Kgs 13:3,25).

5. The bar of Damascus. Bars were used to lock the gates of ancient cities. By synecdoche they refer to the defenses of a city (Jud 16:3; I Kgs 4:13; Jer 51:30; Lam 2:9). Plain of Aven. A valley about a four-hour journey from Damascus. Him that holdeth the sceptre. The highest officer. Eden. Not the Eden of Gen 2:8, but the summer residence of the king, not far from Damascus. Kir. According to Amos 9:7, it was the original home of the Syrians (Aramaeans), and it was to Kir that they were exiled (II Kgs 16:9). Its location is unknown.

6. Gaza. This judgment is against the Philistines in general, but especially against Gaza, the most important of the five Philistine cities (I Sam *:17). Gaza, which lay on a junction of the trade routes, was guilty of trafficking in slaves. Whole communities of Israelites were sold to Edom, the bitterest enemy of Israel. 7. Wall. A reference to the strength of the city. 8. Ashdod . . . Ashkelon . . . Ekron. Amos omits Gath of the five important Philistine cities, perhaps because it had lost its influence (II Chr 26:6). The remnant . . . shall perish. The destruction will be complete.

9. Tyrus. Tyre, with its island location and two harbors, became very powerful. It was a great trade center (Isa 23:1-3), and it, like Gaza, engaged in traffic in slaves. Remembered not the brotherly covenant. A reference to a covenant between Solomon and Hiram of Tyre (I Kgs 5:12), which had spiritual provisions as well as political agreements (I Kgs 5:7), and perhaps also prohibited the sale of Hebrew slaves. Hiram refers to Solomon as a "brother" (I Kgs 9:13), and various passages indicate that for a long period Israel and Tyre enjoyed friendly relations (II Sam 5:11; I Kgs 5:1-12; 16:31).

11. Edom. Scripture traces the enmity between Edom and Israel back to the rivalry between Jacob and Esau, from whom the two nations were descended. The word means red (Gen 25:25,30). He did pursue his brother with the sword. This is not a reference to any specific instance but a description of the traditional attitude of Edom toward Israel (Num 20:17-21; II Chr 21:8-10; II Kgs 8:20-22). 12. Teman. Another name for Edom (Jer 49:7; Ob 8,9; Hab 3:3). Used in parallelism with Edom in Jer 49:20. Bozrah. One of the important cities of Edom (Isa 63:1; Jer 49:22).

13. Children of Ammon. Descendants of Ben-ammi, son of Lot by one of his daughters (Gen 19:38). They were more nomadic than the neighboring Moabites. Ripped up the women with child of Gilead. These crimes perhaps took place when Hazael (Amos 1:3,4) also attacked Gilead (II Kgs 8:12; 10:32,33). 14. Rabbah. A reference to "Rabbah of the sons of Ammon" (Deut 3:16; II Sam 12: 26-31; Jer 49:2; Ezk 21:20). It was the capital city of the Ammonites. This prophecy was perhaps fulfilled in the Assyrian invasion of Ammon. Tiglath-pileser III (745–727 B.C.), the Pul of II Kgs 15:19, in his inscriptions mentions Sanipu, King of Ammon, in a list of kings who were made to pay tribute to him. Others in the list are Salamanu of Moab, Qaushmalaka of Edom, Mitinti of Ashkelon, Hanno of Gaza, Ahaz of Judah, and Menahem of Samaria. The Assyrian Sennacherib (705–681 B.C.) says that Buduilu of Ammon, Ethbaal of Sidon, Mitinti of Ashdod, and others paid him tribute and kissed his feet.

2:1. Moab. A nation descended from Moab, son of Lot by his elder daughter (Gen 19:37). Moabites were closely related to the Israelites and the Ammonites. Burned the bones of the king of Edom. This perhaps occurred in connection with the events recorded in II Kgs 3, when Mesha, the king of Moab, was at least temporarily successful in his rebellion. The event is also described on the Moabite Stone, inscribed by Mesha, who was king of Moab at the time (II Kgs 3:4). Into lime. Or, to powder. The LXX has to konia, which was the fine dust with which a wrestler's body was covered after it had been oiled. This afforded his opponent the advantage of a firm grip. The Vulgate has to ashes. The Targum indicates that the king of Moab used the powder to plaster his house. 2. Kirioth. Perhaps the capital city of Moab, called Kir of Moab in Isa 15:1. It is named on the Moabite Stone as the site of a temple of Chemosh, a god of the Moabites. 3. Judge. The Hebrew word is shôpēt, which sometimes refers to a judge in the usual sense of the term. It is also used of a king (cf. Mic 5:2) who functions as a judge (II Sam 8:15; Jer 21:12), and may be used of a high officer who functions in the place of a king (cf. II Kgs 15: 5).

C. Indictment of Judah. 2:4,5. The prophecies against the neighboring nations lead up to the prophecies against Israel. The prophet's prediction of punishment against the surrounding nations probably aroused a sympathetic hearing from his fellow Jews, at least in the beginning.

4. Judah. The only specific references to Judah outside this judgment are found in 1:2; 6:1; 7:12; 9:11. 5. The palaces of Jerusalem. Jerusalem, even to the Northern Kingdom, was a symbol of Jehovah, who united the Northern and Southern Kingdoms in worship.

D. Indictment of Israel. 2:6-16. Israel was now to learn that her special relationship to Jehovah did not excuse her from punishment.

6. Sold the righteous . . . and the poor. A picture of the injustice and oppression in Israel. 7. Go in unto the same maid. A reference to the temple prostitute, who carried on her practices as part of the Canaanite fertility cult ritual with which the Israelites had become involved. 8. Clothes laid to pledge. These were garments given for security by the poor. They were being held over night by the creditors in violation of the Law (Ex 22: 25,26; Deut 24:12). The Law said that, because the poor needed the garments to sleep in, they should be returned at the close of the day. Drink the wine of the condemned. The wine actually belonged to those who had pawned it. The verse presents a picture of ruthless foreclosure against honest debtors.

9. Amorite. A general name given to the people east of the Jordan and the Canaanites west of the river. 11. Nazarites. The law of the Nazarite is given in Num 6:1-21. 13. I am pressed. Better: I will press you in your place, as a cart presseth that is full of sheaves (ASV). As a cart presseth. Israel would experience the grinding pressure that a fully loaded wagon exerts on the ground over which it travels. 16. In that day. The Day of the Lord, when God's judgment would fall upon Israel. Verses 14 to 16 describe an overwhelming disaster.

II. Three Sermons Against Israel. 3:1–6:14.

A. A Declaration of Judgment. 3:1-15. This part of the book is an expansion of the theme of the first two chapters. Amos begins by showing what a unique relation to Jehovah Israel enjoys. But under the compulsion of his prophetic responsibility, the prophet also speaks the message of condemnation and warns of destruction.

1. The whole family. Amos makes it clear that judgment is to fall upon all of the twelve tribes. 2. You only have I known. The Hebrew verb translated "to know," when used to express the relation between two people, frequently describes the intimacy of marriage (Gen 4:1). It is Israel above all nations that God has chosen to enjoy a special relation to him and to perform a particular service to the world. This doctrine is peculiar to the prophets of Israel, and has no parallel among other nations. This, of course, places Israel in a position of special responsibility.

3. Except they be agreed? The ASV has except they have agreed, i.e., have made an appointment. 5. Gin. An old English contraction of "engine," referring to the mechanism that releases the trap. 6. Shall a trumpet be blown. The trumpet was blown to warn of an attack or as a summons to battle (cf. Ezk 33:3; Joel 2:1). And the people not be afraid? The warnings of Amos were to be acknowledged. Evil. Not a reference to sin but to calamity and disaster.

7. The Lord God will do nothing. When God sends calamity, he also reveals the purpose of the calamity. 8. The lion hath roared. The prophet heard the roar in the tramp of the Assyrian army.

9. Ashdod . . . Egypt. Sometimes the prophets point out the moral superiority of pagan nations over rebellious Israel. The mountains. Ebal and Gerizim, from which one could look down on Samaria. Samaria. Founded by Omri (I Kgs 16:24). 10. Know not to do right. Have lost all sense of moral direction.

11. An adversary. The king of Assyria. 12. Out of the mouth of the lion. The statement reflects the background of Amos. The remains of an animal were sometimes produced as evidence (Ex 22:13). The insignificance of what remained served to emphasize the comparison. Corner of a bed. The ASV and the RSV have corner of a couch. The corner was the place of honor. In Damascus in a couch. Or, on the silken cushions of a bed (ASV). The picture is that of a council chamber in Samaria where the leaders of the nation rested free from care.

13. House of Jacob. A reference to the ten tribes, as indicated by the mention of Bethel in the next verse. The Lord God, the God of hosts. This is the longest form of the name of God in the Bible, and it occurs only here in the OT. It emphasizes in a special way the omnipotence of God for the purpose of magnifying the effect of the predicted judgment. 14. The horns of the altar. The horns of the altar symbolized power and were sacred to the Israelites (1 Kgs 1:50). They were important because the blood of the sacrifice was applied to them (Lev 4:30). To cut them off was an act of desecration.

B. The Depravity of Israel. 4:1-13. Amos accuses the women of being responsible for much of the evil in Israel. Ironically the prophet urges Israel to continue the paganized formal worship at their shrines. God had repeatedly demonstrated his disapproval of Israel's conduct, but with no result. Consequently, punishment was inevitable.

1. Kine of Bashan. Bashan, which lay east of the Sea of Galilee, was famous for its wheat and its pastures, and especially for its fat, sleek cattle (Deut 32:14; Ps 22:12; Ezk 39:18). This is a rebuke of the well-fed women of Samaria, who were responsible, in part, for the injustice in the land because of the demands they made upon the men for the luxuries of life. 2. By his holiness. God's holiness will be vindicated by his punishment of sin. This is an expression of Amos' ethical monotheism, for holiness describes the essential being of God. With hooks. As animals led by hooks or rings in their noses. Posterity. Read instead with the ASV, your residue, or with the RSV, even the last of you. Fishhooks. Because the regular hooks would be exhausted by the great number of captives, fishhooks would be used for the others. 3. Breaches. The women would be taken captive through the openings made by the enemy in the wall of the city. Into the palace. Read, instead, with the RSV, you shall be cast forth into Harmon, a place of captivity.

4. Transgress . . . multiply transgression. The irony of the statement is intended to show that the more frequently the Israelites visited their shrines, the farther they were from God. Even if they should offer their annual sacrifices (I Sam 1:3,7,21) every morning and their third-year tithe (Deut 14:28; 26:12) every third day (cf. ASV), their sacrifices would be vitiated by their apostasy. 5. With leaven. Leaven was forbidden in Ex 23:18 and Lev 7:12. Free offerings refers to the freewill offering (Deut 12:6, 7), which was the most sincere expression of one's religion. This liketh you. Or, This pleaseth you (ASV).

6. Cleanness of teeth. Nothing to eat. 7. I caused it. This phrase places in sharp perspective the fact that it was the power of God that had been revealed in the affairs of the nation. 8. Yet have ye not returned unto me. This recurring phrase reveals the tenderness of God, who had sought, even in the sternness of judgment, to win his people to a deeper understanding of himself. 9. Palmerworm. Locust.

10. After the manner of Egypt. A reference to the special severity and destructiveness of the Egyptian plagues.

12. Thus will I do. Amos dramatically predicts the final punishment without actually describing what it will be. Prepare to meet thy God. This is not a challenge for Israel to be prepared to endure punishment but a call to repentance (LXX has call upon thy God). Every prophecy of judgment is an exhortation to repentance. 13. He that formeth. Amos again declares that the forces of nature are a revelation of the majesty of God.

C. A Lamentation for Israel's Sin and Doom. 5:1—6:14. Amos exhorts the people to listen to his lamentation over Israel. The prophet emphasizes the need of repentance and specifies some of the sins of which the people were guilty. Since their persistent idolatry had set the pattern of life, punishment in the form of captivity was inevitable.

5:1. Hear ye this word. This introduction to a new discourse was designed to quicken attention and fear in the hearts of the people. 2. Virgin of Israel. Israel is designated as virgin because up to that time she had remained unconquered. The designation points up the contrast between her past and her future. None to raise her up. No power would be able to help her. 3. Shall leave an hundred . . . shall leave ten. The verse describes a terrible slaughter in war, a 90 per cent decimation of the army.

5. Seek not Bethel . . . Gilgal. Centers of corrupt worship. 7. Ye who turn judgment to wormwood. This is addressed to the leaders. The figure is drawn from a bitter, poisonous herb (Jer 9:15; Deut 29:18). Those who had the responsibility of administering justice produced injustice. 8. Maketh the Pleiades and Orion (ASV). These constellations are referred to in the OT (Job 9:9; 38:31) as a demonstration of God's creative power. Calleth for the waters. The verse refers not only to God's control of the forces of nature but probably to the deluge of Noah. 9. Bringeth sudden destruction upon the strong (ASV). God's irresistible power destroys that which is the basis of human pride.

10. Him that rebuketh in the gate. The gate of any city was the place where justice was administered (Deut 22:15). A judge or a prophet who rebuked injustice was unpopular (Isa 29:21). 13. The prudent shall keep silence. The man who understood the nature of Israel's sin realized the futility of speaking out against it. This is in glaring contrast to Amos' direct attacks upon the sinners of his day.

15. The remnant of Joseph. The doctrine of the remnant (i.e., that there will be a saved and purified faithful few, in whom much of OT prophecy will be fulfilled) is prominent in the prophets (Isa 11:11; Mic 2:12; 4:7).

18. The day of the Lord. The day when the God of Israel will reveal himself in mighty power. Some people believed that this day would vindicate Israel against her enemies, but Amos pointed out that the Day of the Lord could mean only destruction for an apostate nation. 19. A bear met him . . . a serpent bit him. The verse emphasizes the sudden coming of catastrophe when and where it is not expected.

21. I will not smell. Read with the ASV, I will take no delight. 22. I will not accept. An unqualified repudiation of the sacrifices of Israel. 24. Judgment . . . righteousness. This was not an appeal to Israel to turn to righteousness but a proclamation that the only thing that was left was judgment and destruction.

25. Have ye offered unto me sacrifices and offerings in the wilderness . . . ? The implication is that the Israelites in the wilderness did not offer mere sacrifices and offerings (cf. Jer 7:22,23). They brought something more than formal ceremonies. Amos does not say that no sacrifices were offered in the wilderness. The connection is with what follows. 26. You shall take up Sakkuth your king and Kaiwan your star-god (RSV). It is impossible at the present time to identify Sakkuth. Kaiwan was a Babylonian god sometimes identified with Saturn. The idols would be carried into exile by the idolators. 27. Beyond Damascus. To Assyria. Stephen uses Babylon instead of Damascus (Acts 7:43).

6:1. At ease in Zion. Amos warns the careless men and women of Judah, as well as those of Israel, that their recklessness will end in disaster. Trust in the mountain of Samaria. This is sometimes understood to mean confidence in the great power of the mountain fortress of the city, but it could equally well be understood as a reference to the feeling of security and confidence in their own strength on the part of those who dwelt in Samaria. To whom. The judges and leaders of Israel, to whom the people of the nation came for justice. 2. Calneh. The site is uncertain. Hamath. An important city on the Orontes River.

3. Put far away the evil day. They acted as though the day of calamity would not come. 4. Lie upon beds of ivory. The framework of their couches was inlaid with ivory. 5. Invent to themselves instruments. At the end of the LXX rendering of the Psalter, David is quoted as saying, "My hands fashioned an instrument, and my fingers fitted together a psaltery" (cf. II Chr 29:26,27). 6. Bowls. The ordinary cup was not large enough; so, in their self-indulgence, they appropriated vessels customarily used for sacrificial purposes (Ex 38:3; Zech 14:20).

8. Hath sworn by himself. The oath was by his holiness. This expression is used elsewhere only in Amos 4:2 and Jer 51:14. For similar expressions see Gen 22:16; Heb 6:13. The excellency of Jacob. This does not refer, as it might seem to do, to what Israel was in herself, but to her cities and palaces, of which she boasted and was proud (cf. Nah 2:2). 9. If there remain ten men. Those not killed in war would perish in a plague. 10. He that burneth him. A reference not to cremation but to the custom of honoring the dead by the burning of spices (Jer 34:5; II Chr 16:14; 21:19). We may not mention the name of the Lord. When a sole survivor of the plague would be found in a house, relatives and friends would take care to avoid mentioning the name of the Lord because of fear of the judgment of God (cf. Amos 8:3; Hab 2:20; Zeph 1:7).

12. Shall horses run upon the rock? There is a spiritual and moral order in the universe that is just as impossible to ignore as the natural order. It is as senseless to pervert justice as it is to expect horses to run on the rocks or for oxen to plow on rock. 13. A thing of nought. The people had confidence in that which existed only in their imaginations. 14. Hamath. On the northern boundary of the land (Num 13:21). The river of the wilderness. Better, the brook of the Arabah (ASV), which flows into the Dead Sea between Edom and Moab.

III. Five Visions of Israel's Condition. 7:1–9:10.

A. The Devouring Locusts. 7:1-3. A vision of destructive locusts, whose devastating invasion was stopped by the Lord when the prophet prayed.

1. Thus hath the Lord God shewed unto me. This formula introduces all the visions that follow except the fifth (9:1). He formed grasshoppers. These were locusts in the larval stage. In 4:9 the Lord says he sent locusts to point out Israel's sin, which was actually a revelation of the mercy of God. Here the mercy of God is revealed in his withdrawing the locusts before they had completely destroyed the corps. The two accounts speak of the same plague and reveal the two sides of God's mercy—in the first instance the active side, and here the passive side. The latter growth. The grass that grows after the late rains of March and April. The king's mowings. The first cuttings of grass were set aside to feed the king's horses, before the people harvested the main crop. The thought of the verse is that "in the beginning of the shooting up of the latter growth," the locusts were in the larva stage; after "the king's mowings," they were fully developed locusts. Thus Amos warned Israel of a complete destruction of the crops when the summer heat was due to begin.

2. As they were about to make an end of eating. The destruction was not completed. By whom shall Jacob arise? Or, Who will raise up Jacob? For he is small. In spite of his boasts (cf. 6:1), Jacob was small. 3. The Lord repented. This is an anthropopathic expression (cf. 7:6; Gen 6:7; I Sam 15:35; Jon 3:9). God did not change his mind, as men do, but changed his course of action, which is consistent with his eternal unchangeableness. This was in response to the cry of Amos, "O Lord God, forgive" (7:2). According to some scholars, Amos had in mind an actual plague of locusts; according to others, he was thinking of the attack of the Assyrians.

B. The Flaming Fire. 7:4-6. A vision of consuming fire, whose work of destruction is stopped by the Lord when the prophet prays.

4. The Lord God called to contend by fire. The Lord was now in open conflict with his people (cf. Isa 66:15-18; 3:13; Jer 2:9; Hos 4:1). He would demonstrate his judgment by fire. Devoured the great deep, and did eat up a part. The summer heat was so severe that it consumed the subterranean sources of the springs and rivers and so affected the land. The fire symbolizes a more severe punishment than that of the locusts. The first two visions are parallel with the chastisements of Amos 4:6-11.

C. The Plumb Line. 7:7-9. A vision of the plumb line and complete destruction.

7. Upon a wall. Beside a wall (ASV) is better. The wall is the kingdom of Israel. 8. I will set a plumbline. The measuring of the wall is a symbol of the testing of Israel's conduct (cf. II Sam 8 2; II Kgs 21:13). I will not again pass by them any more. Or, I shall not pardon. In the previous visions God had listened to the plea of the prophet, but now he did not permit intercession. The just punishment had to come. 9. The high places. The people carried on their worship upon the so-called high places, which were natural hills or artificial mounds. Other nations also used such high places (Deut 12:2; Isa 15:2; 16:12). These high places, with their pagan influence, eventually contributed to the corruption of Israel (I Kgs 12:31-33; 13:32-34). Of Isaac. Many varying interpretations of this passage have been offered, but it is clear that Amos uses the name as a synonym for Israel, the nation. The sanctuaries of Israel shall be laid waste. The parallelism of this statement with what precedes in the verse is evident. The sword. A symbol of the Assyrian army (Amos 6:14).

D. Ecclesiastical Opposition. 7:10-17. Amaziah, the priest of Bethel, accused Amos of being a conspirator against Jeroboam, and ordered him to return to Judah. Amos responded that he spoke by the command of God.

12. And there eat bread. Amaziah told Amos to make his living by prophesying in Judah.

14. But I was an herdman. Amos denied that he was a prophet in a professional sense but said that he was a shepherd and a dresser of sycomore trees (ASV). The sycomore produces a low-grade fig, which has to be opened with a special instrument to release the excess juice within before it will ripen. 15. The Lord took me . . . the Lord said unto me. The repetition of the name of God puts into bold relief the fact that Amos prophesied not by the will of man but by the direct call of God, who had made him a prophet.

17. An harlot. Violated by the invading soldiers.

E. The Basket of Ripe Fruit. 8:1-14. Amos had a fourth vision of destruction, representing Israel's readiness for judgment. This vision was the occasion of the discourse that follows.

1. Summer fruit. The word means late summer or autumn fruit and thus fully ripe. 2. The end is come. A reiteration of the thought of the third vision. Israel was ripe in her sins and the end was now near. 3. Songs of the temple. Some, with the LXX, interpret songs as singing-women rather than songs.

5. New moon . . . sabbath. Sacred days in the sense that ordinary occupations were forbidden. Ephah small . . . shekel great. The merchants used small measures to give less than was right, and by using heavier money weights, they cheated in taking too much money for the purchase. 8. As a flood. Rather, like the River (ASV); or, like the Nile (RSV). The Hebrew text actually has like the light, but scholars are agreed that this is a reference to the Nile. 9. In that day. The Day of the Lord, which will be characterized by changes in the natural world. Darken the earth. This probably refers to an eclipse. 10. An only son. A description of the most intense sorrow (Jer 6:26; Zech 12:10).

11. I will send a famine. The people would long to hear the words they had so long ignored. 14. The sin of Samaria. The Hebrew has the guilt of Samaria, which is a reference to the idolatrous worship carried on there. Some prefer to read Ashimah, the name of the pagan goddess worshiped in Samaria (II Kgs 17:30). The manner of Beersheba. Or the way of Beersheba, referring to the pilgrimages to the pagan shrine.

F. The Judgment of the Lord. 9:1-10. The fifth vision was of the Lord's executing judgment from which it was impossible to escape. There follows a vivid description of the devastation.

1. I saw. The introduction of this vision differs from those of the first four. Here the Lord himself appeared, and so Amos no longer uses symbols. By (AV, upon, the altar. The destruction began at the center of the idolatry. 2. Dig into hell. A reference to Sheol, the place of the dead (Isa 14:9), as a place inaccessible. Climb up to heaven. Heaven and hell are sometimes used as symbols of total opposition (Job 11:8). 3. Carmel. A symbol of inaccessibility. The serpent. A word used for a monster of the deep (Isa 27:1). 5. Like a flood. Cf. 8:8.

6. His stories in the heaven. Or, his chambers in the heavens (ASV). A picture of the vastness of the universe. His troop. Or vault. The Hebrew means bind together. The first part of the verse is a description of the vast arch of the sky, which seems to be firmly established on the earth. 7. Ethiopians. Rather, Cushites. Caphtor. Generally thought to refer to Crete.

IV. The Promise of Israel's Restoration. 9:11-15.

This last section of the prophecy gives a description of the restored Davidic kingdom. It brings into focus the goal of Jehovah's control of history. The idea that God's will must be done in history was an integral part of the thought of Amos.

11. In that day. The Day of the Lord. The hut (AV, tabernacle) of David. In the punishment of Israel the house of David was reduced to a hut. This is a picture of the coming restoration of Israel, when the throne of David will be re-established (cf. Acts 15:15-17). 12. All the heathen. Amos' vision of the Messianic kingdom under the throne of David represents it as universal and including the Gentiles.

13. The plowman shall overtake the reaper. A forecast of the Millennial fertility of the land. 14. I will bring again the captivity of my people. A promise that Israel would be restored to her land, which would be rebuilt and made to prosper. 15. I will plant them upon their land (cf. Jer 24:6; 32:41; 42:10). Israel's return would be a direct act of God. They shall no more be pulled up out of their land. An unconditional promise of permanent possession, which has not yet been fulfilled (II Sam 7:10; Isa 60:21; Joel 3:20). The Lord thy God. The final words of the prophecy were the ground of the assurance to Israel that these things would come to pass.

OBADIAH

INTRODUCTION

Title. The Book of Obadiah neither identifies the prophet (beyond giving his name) nor provides a statement that clearly dates the writing. Approximately a dozen men are called Obadiah elsewhere in the Old Testament, but none corresponds to the prophet whose writing is preserved. His parentage, social status, and occupation in life remain obscure to us. The prophet's name means "Servant of the Lord," or "Worshiper of the Lord." It is a compound of 'ôbed, "servant," and yâ, a shortened form of the four-letter name yhwh, pronounced 'ădônāy by pious Jews, and translated either Lord or Jehovah in English versions.

Authorship. The first nine verses of this shortest of all Old Testament books closely parallel parts of Jeremiah 49, though the sequence of the material is different (cf. Ob vv. 1-4 with Jer 49:14-16; Ob vv. 5,6 with Jer 49:9,10; Ob vv. 8,9 with Jer 49:7,22). The question is: Which prophet is dependent on the other? The most likely situation is that both writers used an earlier, well-known prophecy. Doubtless the present arrangement in this book is the work of Obadiah. Certainly the entire book is the Lord's oracle (1a).

Date. The prophecy of Obadiah alludes to a historical situation in which the Edomites were allied with the enemies of Israel and participated in the sack of Jerusalem (vv. 10-14). Jerusalem was plundered by the Philistines and Arabians during the time of Jehoram (II Chr 21:16,17), about the middle of the ninth century. Edom is referred to here as having more than one ally (vv. 7,11). It is known that Edom was allied with the Babylonians and others at the fall of Jerusalem in 587/586 B.C., and participated in the plunder of the city. Probably the prophecy of Obadiah is best dated in that period.

Summary of Message. The emotional tone of Obadiah's prophecy is strong but not bitter enough to justify the charge that it is a hymn of hate. The intense mood of the poem is undergirded by a keen sense of justice. Kinsmen had violated the bonds that hold related tribes together, and had committed terrible crimes. Their sins had to be punished! The Israelites did not undertake to punish the Edomites themselves. Instead, they recognized their God as the Judge of all the nations, and believed that he would execute justice on the basis of the crimes committed (v. 15). God is here regarded as universal in his power, so that no nation can escape his all-seeing eye. God is concerned for the oppressed and will lift them up, restoring what has been taken from them. There is a strong note of hope and comfort in the prophecy. The sovereignty of God is never far from sight, however. He is Judge at the beginning of the book and King at its end.

COMMENTARY

I. Superscription. Verse 1a (see Introduction).

II. Nations Arrayed Against Edom. Verse 1b.

The prophecy of Obadiah is cast in the form of a criminal trial. An outlaw is identified, brought to justice, and sentenced. The Lord God is the judge who speaks out against the outlaw Edom. We have heard a rumour . . . and an ambassador is sent. Previous to the trial, heralds of the Judge have proclaimed the event to the nations, calling them to attend in order to be prepared for battle (cf. Jer 49:14).

III. Public Enemy Number One Arraigned. Verses 2-7.

The divine Judge makes public his own estimate of the criminal who is here called to account.

2. I have made thee small. Edom regarded herself as a superior nation (vv. 3,4), but in God's sight she was insignificant. It would not be accidental that other nations would despise her; it would be the Lord's doing. The force of the Hebrew verb refers not to past action but to a certain, future action. Ironically, Edom wanted desperately to be an equal among the nations, but none regarded her as such.

3. The pride of thine heart has deceived thee. Edom's estimate of herself was inflated out of proportion to her real power. She had come to depend heavily upon the protection of her mountain fortresses. Clefts of the rock. The inaccessibility of Mount Seir had made that mountain a refuge for the Edomites many times. It is a granite range, with a width of fifteen to twenty miles, oriented north and south, having cliffs as much as 2,000 feet in height. It's stronghold is a lofty, flat-topped rock called Sela' in the Old Testament but more popularly known now as Petra. The stronghold could be approached only through a narrow, rock-walled ravine. Edom had come to believe that no enemy could successfully force its defenses. 4. As the eagle. The fortress was located so high upon the mountain that it is here likened to an eagle's nest among the stars. Yet the Lord declared that Edom was not beyond His reach. He would bring him down and judge him in the presence of the nations.

5. If thieves . . . if robbers . . . if grapegatherers. By drawing upon common practice, the divine Judge strikingly depicts the end of Edom's power. Thieves and robbers (the Edomites were known as thieves and robbers) ordinarily carried off as loot only that which they deemed valuable. Likewise grapegatherers picked only the ripe grapes. But Edom's stronghold would be torn apart and all her possessions would be taken from their hiding places. 7. Men of thy confederacy. Through trickery Edom would be turned over to the Judge by her own allies. The very ones whom Edom had fed would turn against her.

IV. Edom Indicted. Verses 8-14.

A. The Judge's Intention. Verses 8,9. The Judge declares that he intends to expose the shallowness of Edom's vaunted wisdom and power.

8. The wise men will not be able to acquit Edom. They will be confounded by the strength of the prosecution's arguments. 9. And thy mighty men. The cleverness and skill of the warrior would not free Edom this time. Teman was the main Edomite settlement close by the stronghold, Sela', or Petra. Justice would obtain a clear-cut conviction and win a death sentence.

B. The Case Against Edom. Verses 10-14. The exposure of Edom's sins is devastating and overwhelming.

10. Violence against thy brother Jacob. The ancestral father of the Edomites was Esau, the twin brother of Jacob. Though Jacob had grievously wronged Esau (Gen 25:33; 27:36), Esau had forgiven him (Gen 33:4). Now there was violence instead of forgiveness. 11. Thou stoodest on the other side. When strangers carried away the descendants of Jacob into exile and captured the Holy City, the descendants of Esau did not come to help Judah against the enemy, but became allies of the invader. Edom participated in the plunder of the city. This situation best fits the events related to the fall of Jerusalem in 587/586 B.C., and the period that immediately followed.

12. But thou shouldest not have looked on the day of thy brother. In verses 12,13,14 there are seven occurrences of this phrase, thou shouldest not, or its equivalent. They mark out the specific crimes committed by the Edomites.

A kinsman was obligated by blood ties to aid another who faced danger. Edom refused to aid Jacob (Israel) in his need. See Jud 5:23 for an example of condemnation of kinsmen who failed to give aid in a crisis. Rejoiced. Edom had not merely withheld aid, but had actually enjoyed seeing the Israelites go down in defeat. The Edomites had spoken proudly or boasted to others about the fact that the Israelites deserved their punishment. They had thus added insult to injury. 13. Entered into the gate of my people. Edom ceased being a gleeful spectator and began to participate actively in the sack of Jerusalem. This crime is emphasized in this verse by two more parallel statements. 14. Stood in the crossway. The indictment represents Edom as first standing by, a gleeful spectator, then participating in the looting of the city, then serving at the roadblocks on the escape routes from the fallen city, cruelly arresting the fugitives and delivering them to the invader as slaves. A dastardly deed and worthy of the severest punishment!

V. Edom Sentenced. Verses 15-20.

A. Judgment. Verses 15,16. The prosecution has rested its case against Edom, and the Judge now outlines the basis for punishing the criminal.

15. The day of the Lord. The Day of the Lord is the time of God's judgment of wickedness and vindication of righteousness. God is merciful, but he will not forever tolerate sin. When the sinner, whether individual or nation, completely ignores the rule of God, He will step in to judge and to vindicate (cf. Joel 2:1; Amos 5:18-20; Zeph 1:7,8, 14-18; Ezk 25:12-14; 35:1-15). As thou hast done, it shall be done unto thee. The judgments of the Lord will be based upon justice, not upon caprice or vindictiveness. The punishment will not be less than nor more than the crimes committed. (See Hos 8:7 for a picturesque way of stating the same principle.) A sinner's sentence will not be out of proportion to his sins, but he can be assured that he must suffer for his sin.

Historically, Edom came to know the reality of this truth. Soon after this time, Edom was pushed out of her ancient home by the Nabateans, so that she had to move to the west side of the Dead Sea. Hebron was made the capital of her new home in south Judah. The Maccabees, especially John Hyrcanus (c. 125 B.C.), subdued and Judaized the Edomites. They were finally destroyed with the Jews in 70 A.D. by the Roman general Titus.

16. As ye have drunk . . . so shall all the heathen drink. The sorrow attending punishment is sometimes depicted by the prophets as comparable to drinking strong wine. See Jer 25:15-28 for an extended application of this analogy. God would not merely pick out Edom for an example but would equally judge all nations for their sins.

B. Vindication. Verses 17-20. Not only would God punish the wicked; he would also deliver the oppressed from their misery.

17. But upon Mount Zion shall be deliverance. In the destruction of Mount Zion, Israel was punished for her sins; but Israel was also to know deliverance. Back of the judgments of God there is the love of God. Sin must be punished, but God more deeply desires to give deliverance to those who turn to him. The fall of Jerusalem brought the Kingdom of Judah to an end, but God's concern for his people had not ceased. He would bring back a remnant from captivity to Mount Zion. Shall be holiness. In the OT, holiness means primarily separation unto God (Deut 7:6; Jer 1:5), but it also means separation from all that is unclean (Lev 20:7; 21:6; 22:9). The delivered people were to be God's people, but they were also to be cleansed from the idolatrous practices that had brought about the destruction of the nation. House of Jacob shall possess. The promised land would be returned to the exiles who had come back, and the homes and portions of land which belonged to their fathers would be theirs again.

18. Shall be a fire . . . a flame. In the day of the Lord, the relationship between Israel and Esau would be reversed. The house of Jacob and the house of Joseph (synonyms for Israel) would be masters over the house of Esau (Edom) and would be instruments in God's hands to carry out the divine judgment upon Edom.

19. They of the south shall possess the mount of Esau. Another translation reads: They shall possess the Negev: that is, Mount Esau. The boundaries of the Davidic kingdom would be restored in the south and in the plain of the Philistines, which would include the cities of Gath, Ekron, Ashdod, Ashkelon, and Gaza. (All of this region except the Gaza strip is now within Israel territory.) Then, toward the north, the fields of Ephraim and the fields of Samaria would be returned to the repatriated exiles. The tribe of Benjamin would move across the Jordan River and repossess Gilead.

20. The Davidic boundaries would be extended by including the Canaanites (Phoenicians) as far north as Zarephath (Sarepta in Lk 4:26), now known as Sarafand. It is located between Tyre and Sidon on the Mediterranean coast. Sepharad. Most likely Sardis, capital of Lydia in western Asia Minor.

VI. The Lord To Be King. Verse 21.

As the prophecy of Obadiah begins with the Lord dominating the scene, it ends with the proclamation that he is to be King of all. And saviours. The LXX reads, those who have been saved; but the Hebrew seems to refer to victors, that is, the returned exiles, who will again rule from Jerusalem over the land of Edom. The kingdom shall be the Lord's. The returned exiles are to be under a theocratic government ruled by God himself. This was the great vision of Obadiah and other prophets—that the Lord God was to be King over Israel and that he would rule the world from Mount Zion (cf. Zech 14:9-11).

JONAH

INTRODUCTION

Title. The book receives its name from the main character of the narrative. Jonah (dove) is identified as the son of Amittai. A prophet by this same name, who figures in a short narrative in II Kings 14:25, is said to have come from Gath-hepher, located in Zebulon territory, now known as Galilee. This prophet had predicted the successful conquests of Jeroboam II in the first half of the eighth century B.C. There is little doubt that the prophet of Gath-hepher was the same man as the prophet of this small book.

Date and Authorship. Nowhere in the text is there any statement that the prophet himself wrote the book, although the prayer in chapter 2 is in the first person singular. However, tradition has steadfastly maintained that Jonah was himself the author. In recent years many have held that the book is about Jonah rather than by him. This view is based on several observations: chapters 1, 3, and 4 are written in the third person; there are late expressions of the Hebrew and Aramaic languages in the book; the large number of miracles recorded precludes a historical basis; and the emphasis upon God's mercy toward foreign people suggests a post-Exilic date. Conservative scholars have consistently held that these factors, in themselves, are not important enough to rule out the prophet's having lived in the eighth century or having written the book then.

Historical Background. Taken as a historical narrative of a prophet active in the time of Jeroboam II, king of Israel, the events of the book would have occurred sometime between 780 and 750 B.C. Jeroboam II had succeeded in re-establishing the power of Israel over most of the territory north of Judea controlled by David and Solomon. In the previous century the Assyrian empire had been a threat along the eastern Mediterranean coast, and had become well known as a cruel and ruthless oppressor. During the reign of Jeroboam II, though the power of Assyria had subsided, it was still to be reckoned with. Nineveh had not yet become the capital of the empire, but Calah, one of the parts of the old city-state complex that included Nineveh, was the capital between 880 and 701 B.C.

There is no Assyrian inscription stating that a revival like that described in this book ever occurred there; but during the time when Queen Semiramis was co-regent with her son Adad-Nirari III (810–782), there was a brief swing toward monotheism. Whether the fruits of Jonah's ministry and this purifying of Assyrian worship are to be identified is difficult to say. There were two severe plagues in Assyria in 765 and 759 B.C., as well as a total eclipse in 763 B.C., all of which were normally regarded by the ancients as evidences of divine judgment and could have prepared the hearts of the people for the preaching of Jonah.

Interpretations of the Book. Much controversy has been stirred up concerning the meaning of the Book of Jonah, and this has brought forth a wide range of views The book has been interpreted as a legend, a parable, a myth, and a prophetic allegory; and it has also been taken as history with Messianic import.

It has been suggested (R. H. Pfeiffer, Introd. to the OT) that the book is a fiction based on a possible legendary character whose real name has been lost. According to this view, the unknown author drew his miracles from the stories of Elijah and Elisha (cf. Jon 4:3 with I Kgs 19:4b and Jon 4:5,6 with I Kgs 19:4a, 5a) and the scene of mourning from Joel. The book thus was meant to be only a protest against the narrow nationalism of the Jews, who were under the teachings of Ezra. The psalm of Jonah 2 is the thanksgiving prayer of a man saved from drowning.

The interpretation of the book as a parable (IB) is very similar to the view that it is legendary. According to this second view, the character of Jonah is both an analysis and a criticism of post-Exilic Judaism, and the city of Nineveh represents the vast non-Jewish world that awaits the awakening only the true message of God can bring. The parable seeks to portray the justice and mercy of God toward any man or group who will repent of their sins.

Those who understand the story of Jonah as a myth in Jewish dress fancy they detect similarity between it and an ancient Greek fable. A king of Troy chained his daughter Hesione to a rock on the seashore. He intended her for a sacrifice to Neptune, who, as a shark, would come in with the tide and devour her. However, Hercules fought the monster and destroyed him, and so saved the girl.

According to the long-popular allegorical interpretation (see Abingdon Bible Commentary), Jonah is identified with Israel. The true mission of Israel is to declare God's truth to the world, but she has failed to do so. The "great fish" is Babylon, who swallowed the Israelites (took them into exile). The disgorging of Jonah upon the land represents the return of the Jews from exile. Jonah's dissatisfaction over the repentance of the heathen parallels the spirit of Judaism after the return.

Those who have maintained the historical character of the book have held that an actual prophet (Jonah) experienced what is recorded and thus fulfilled, in part, the missionary task of Israel in ancient times. For them (see Unger, Introd. Guide to the OT) the factual story has an underlying significance as well—both Messianic and typical. Important passages that support this view are certain statements in the New Testament made by Jesus regarding Jonah as a sign of His death and resurrection (Mt 12:40; Lk 11:30). Those holding this view use these references in a double sense: to verify the historicity of the story and to set forth its typical meaning. The position of this commentary is that the story of Jonah is a historical account.

The Message of the Book. The narrative itself is uncomplicated, fast-moving, and touching. A prophet, Jonah, is told by the Lord to go preach to the Ninevites. Instead, he flees and takes passage on a ship due to sail to the far edge of the world. He secludes himself and goes to sleep. Soon after the ship sets sail, a severe storm stirs up the sea into mountainous waves, and the sailors in terror throw the cargo overboard and frantically pray to their gods. By the casting of lots Jonah is identified as the culprit who has offended Providence. The storm ceases only after Jonah, at his own suggestion, is thrown into the sea. He is swallowed by a great fish. Now truly penitent, he prays earnestly for salvation, whereupon God delivers him unhurt upon the shore.

This time the prophet obeys the command to go to Nineveh, and cries aloud, throughout the city, his briefly worded message of woe. The people of Nineveh, from king to lowest subject, respond with earnest repentance, even putting sackcloth on the cattle. The Lord hears their cry and lifts the threat of destruction. Jonah, however, sees the deliverance of Nineveh only as a negation of his prophecy, and complains to the Lord in prayer. In order to teach the prophet a lesson, God prepares a fast-growing plant to shade him from the sun, but the next night allows a worm to destroy it. Then He sets a hot east wind blowing. As a result, Jonah faints in spirit and wishes for death. The story closes with a declaration that whereas Jonah is concerned for gourds, God is concerned for the salvation of sinful men.

Some of the basic religious teachings of the book are: (a) God feels concern for the heathen and asks His servants to warn them of judgment. (b) In the face of a difficult task, men are most inclined to evade responsibility. (c) God is powerful and can, at will, use the forces of nature for His own purposes. (d) Though God will punish disobedience, He still desires to show mercy. (e) The most unpromising mission fields are often the most responsive. (f) Above all else, God yearns to deal with man in mercy and kindness.

COMMENTARY

I. Fleeing. 1:1-17.

A. The Lord's Command. 1:1,2.

1. Word of the Lord came. There is no indication of how God spoke to Jonah. To the true OT prophets, the way God spoke to them was not so important as the fact that He spoke. Jonah. See Introduction for comment about the prophet. 2. Nineveh, that great city. Located on the east bank of the Tigris River in Mesopotamia, it had been a dominant city-state from ancient times. A city-state comprised its occupied area and the surrounding territory, including the neighboring villages under its control. In Gen 10:11,12 Rehoboth, Calah, and Resen are mentioned with Nineveh as comprising "the great city." Sennacherib made the city the capital of his empire about 700 B.C., which was some time after Jonah's day. It was more than five hundred miles from Palestine—a long way to travel by foot. Their wickedness. The sins of Nineveh are not described here, but the city was widely known as a center of fertility cult worship, and for its cruelty to the victims of warfare.

B. A Ship to Tarshish. 1:3.

3. Tarshish. Perhaps to be identified with a Semitic mining colony located just west of the Rock of Gibraltar at the mouth of the Guadalquivir River (cf. Gen 10:4; Isa 23:1,6,10; Ezk 27:12). In Jonah's mind, to flee to Tarshish was to run as far away from home as possible. Joppa. The seaport nearest to the central part of Palestine, and, in ancient times, one of the few places along the eastern coastline of the Mediterranean Sea where a port could be established (cf. I Kgs 5:9; II Chr 2:16). From the presence of the Lord. This twice-repeated phrase is to be related to the coming of the word of the Lord to Jonah. Jonah mistakenly thought that by going as far as possible away from Nineveh, he could nullify the Lord's command.

C. A Storm at Sea. 1:4-14. Since storms on the eastern Mediterranean Sea usually do not occur until the late autumn, the sailors must have thought that they had plenty of time to sail to Tarshish without danger (cf. Paul's voyage to Rome centuries later, Acts 27). This storm was out of season, sent by the Lord for a special purpose.

1) Asleep During a Storm. 1:4-6.

4. Lord sent out. Literally, cast or threw upon the sea. Tempest. The word comes from a Hebrew word meaning "to agitate or rage." In those days ships were small and not strong enough to withstand severe storms. 5. Mariners. These sailors were most likely men from the cities of Phoenicia, for that country was the major seafaring power of the ninth and eighth centuries B.C., and Tarshish was a Phoenician colony. They were the remnants of the old Canaanite culture that was widespread over Palestine before the time of Joshua. Because the men were pagans, believing in many gods, in this crisis each began to pray to his own favorite deity. Cast forth the wares. A heavily burdened ship is easily capsized in heavy seas. A lightened ship would ride the waves better. Was fast asleep. Jonah had evidently felt so relieved to be on ship that he immediately found a place to rest his travel-weary body. He had gone down to the most remote part of the lower deck, and lying down, had quickly fallen into a deep slumber. (This is the only place in the OT where a ship is described as having a lower deck and an upper covered deck, both of which facts are clear in the Hebrew text.) 6. The shipmaster came. The skipper, making careful inspection of his ship, found Jonah. Surprised that this man was so unconcerned, he exhorted him to pray. Thy God. Literally, the God, a term often used in the OT for the true God of Israel. The captain was so desperate that he was ready to try any god in order to be delivered from the dangers of the storm.

2) The Culprit Found. 1:7-10.

7. The lot fell upon Jonah. Casting lots was a popular form of divination among pagan nations, and still is. The Hebrews sometimes used lots, under God's guidance, to select people for some position or task (see Josh 7:14; I Sam 10:20,21), and even the apostles used the lot in one instance (Acts 1:26). Special stones were probably cast for the lot. 8. Tell us. Once Jonah had been singled out, he became the center of attention. He was given a close cross-examination. 9. I am an Hebrew. Jonah frankly told the whole story to the sailors. He witnessed to the fact that he was a worshiper of the great universal God of the world and had disobeyed Him. 10. Men exceedingly afraid. Like most pagans, these men were superstitious, and they greatly feared that the wrath of God would fall upon them for their failing to worship Him properly.

3) Sailors in Distress. 1:11-14.

11. What shall we do? The sailors were perplexed about how to solve their problem. They had on board a man with whom God was angry, and they were far from any place where he could be put ashore. 12. Cast me forth into the sea. Jonah finally saw what great calamity he had brought upon the sailors by his disobedience, and, condemning himself, he told them to throw him overboard. 13. Men rowed hard. The sailors, not willing to treat human life so lightly, put themselves to the oars in one last desperate effort to reach shore in the storm. Their concern for one life stands in marked contrast to the attitude of Jonah, who later admitted that he had fled from the Lord because he did not want to see the Ninevites saved from destruction (4:2). 14. Lay not upon us innocent blood. These men were not cruel monsters but men religious enough to pray earnestly when in danger. The sailors finally reasoned that since God had sent the storm to punish Jonah, He was not intent on harming them. Hence, they decided that Jonah alone should suffer for his sins and, following his advice, threw him overboard.

D. Cast Overboard. 1:15-17.

15. Sea ceased . . . raging. The passing of the storm seemed to confirm their decision, and they were shaken to the core of their being when they realized how narrowly they had escaped the wrath of the great God. 16. Offered a sacrifice . . . made vows. The pagans were immediately convinced that the Lord of Israel was the true God. Forsaking their idols, they made a sacrifice of thanksgiving and pledged themselves to Israel's God.

17. Prepared a great fish. Even in punishment, Jonah was not forgotten by God. To be swallowed by a great fish may not seem to the victim an act of divine kindness. But the fish was God's means for bearing Jonah safely ashore. The creature that swallowed Jonah was not a whale. "Whale" is a mistranslation of the Greek in Mt 12:40. We do not know what kind of fish is meant in Jon 1:17. Some hold that the sea dog (shark) is large enough to fit the situation; it has been known to swallow men. The text makes it clear that the fish was specially prepared by the Lord. Three days and three nights. This need not mean seventy-two hours, since any part of a day or night can be considered a whole according to OT reckoning. A total of forty-nine hours would be adequate to meet a literal interpretation of the expression. This is still a long time for a man to be in a fish. Jesus applied the incident to his own burial. If Christ was buried before sundown on Friday (as is traditionally held) and arose before sunup Sunday morning, then a literal rendering of the "three days and three nights" (i.e., seventy-two hours) was not intended.

II. Praying. 2:1-10.

A. Cast Out. 2:1-4.

1. Jonah prayed. Jonah had not prayed while the storm was raging and the sailors were frantically crying out to their gods. Now he felt the desperateness of his situation.

2. I cried. Obviously the prayer was not written down while Jonah was inside the fish praying. It is in the past tense throughout, in keeping with the fact that it was composed after the experience. Unto the Lord. Jonah at least knew to whom to pray. The sailors had their own various gods but forsook them when they found out how powerful the Lord was. Jonah, however, had always known the true God. That was his difficulty. He knew God's concern for man, and yet he had fled. Now that he was in trouble, it was this same understanding of divine love that led him back to God. He heard me. According to the Hebrew way of thinking, genuine hearing involved response. For man, hearing God involved obeying Him. For God, hearing man involved delivering him. Belly of hell. Nothing more is meant here by the Hebrew than that the inside of the fish was a kind of grave.

3. Thou hadst cast me. In the OT a typical feature of a prayer of supplication is the declaration of the cause and nature of the affliction that gives rise to the prayer. Jonah knew why he had been punished, and recognized the justice of God's dealing with him. 4. Yet I will look again. However, Jonah saw more than justice; he saw God's love, also, and hopefully pled for mercy.

B. Brought Up. 2:5,6.

5. Waters compassed me. The experience of being swallowed was so horrible that Jonah here returns to a graphic description of it. He had even become entangled with the other material within the fish. 6. Bottoms of the mountains. Several phrases in this verse are difficult to translate with clear sense. The word bottoms seems to refer to the bases or foundations of the mountains in the ocean. The beating of the sea waves on the shore suggests the existence of bars that prevent the sea's encroaching upon the land (cf. Job 38:4-11). For ever. Jonah could not see any way out of his trouble, yet he looked to God. Yet hast thou brought up my life from corruption. Salvation is an act of God in the face of the impossible, and Jonah, in his words, recognized the concern of God for him personally—my God. Corruption would be better rendered grave.

C. Paying Vows. 2:7-9. Jonah's deliverance begot in his heart a desire to express gratitude to God in some way.

7. Soul fainted . . . I remembered. When the prophet had all but given up hope, he turned to the Lord for help. This theme is repeated several times in the prayer, because the physical impossibility of deliverance stood in stark contrast to the fact of the divine intervention. This was a source of constant amazement to Jonah. Thine holy temple. Ordinarily, prayer was to be offered in the courts of the Temple at Jerusalem. But Jonah knew that God's presence is not limited to any earthly temple and that the Lord is aware of the needs of His children wherever they are.

8. Lying vanities. A descriptive name for the idols and gods of paganism (cf. Ps 31:6; Deut 32:21). In this context, vanity does not have the sense of "superficiality" but of "worthlessness." Mercy. In context the word refers neither to the act of saving another, nor to the spirit of love for man, but rather to the source of salvation—God himself. Jonah reaffirmed his repudiation of idolatry as a way of worship. 9. Sacrifice . . . with . . . thanksgiving. In contrast to pagan concepts, the true act of sacrifice is an expression of gratitude to God, rather than an effort to appease his wrath. With the sacrifice, a complete committal to God's will was made. In the words, I will pay that I have vowed, the prophet indicated that he was yielding to God's desires for him. He had become certain of one thing: Salvation is a gift of God and not an achievement of man.

D. Delivered. 2:10. The inner assurance that God saves by the act of his power was not a fancy nor an abstract idea, but was matched by an actual event. Jonah was delivered from the great fish, and found himself upon land, safe but chastened.

III. Preaching. 3:1-10.

A. The Lord's Second Command. 3:1,2. Now that Jonah had surrendered to God, he was ready for service. The second command was almost identical with the first one (1:2). The content of the proclamation was to be given to the prophet later.

B. Declaring the Message. 3:3,4. This time Jonah's response was immediate.

Following the caravan trail to the area of the upper Tigris River, he arrived at the complex known as Nineveh, that great city (v. 2), having been directed in his travels by the Lord.

3. Nineveh was. Some have maintained that the Hebrew verb translated was is in the pure past tense, which suggests that at the time of this story the city had been destroyed. We know that the destruction of the city occurred in 612 B.C. The Hebrew language has no true past tense, indeed has no tenses in its verb system. The 'perfect' aspect of the verb may at times be translated into an English past tense, but its sense is much broader. The 'perfect' form may also indicate an act (such as the founding of a city) which has been extended into a state of being. Consequently, all that is intended here is: Nineveh existed in Jonah's day as a great city. City of three days' journey. In olden times a city comprised not only its built up area, but also its territory and dependent villages or cities (see comments on 1:2). The descriptive phrase may refer to the circumference of this complex, that is, about sixty to seventy miles. On the other hand, the expression may be only an idiomatic parallelism of "that great city."

4. Began to enter . . . a day's journey. This statement does not mean that Jonah completed a day's journey before he started to preach; it means that he started to preach at the beginning of his visit to Nineveh. A day's journey in open country was about twenty miles, but in an inhabited area the course of such a journey was not likely to lie in a straight line but to weave back and forth through the markets and small streets. Yet forty days. Jonah's message was brief, and at first glance it seemed to be unconditional. It was a cry of woe and calamity.

C. Nineveh's Repentance. 3:5-9.

1) In Sackcloth and Ashes. 3:5,6.

5. People . . . believed God. The people of Nineveh took Jonah's words as a message from God and became greatly concerned about their danger. Semitic people in groups have always been easily swayed, and a man of Jonah's appearance and desolate cry probably attracted the multitudes and stirred them deeply. Mob reactions are still common in the Middle East. Here their natural tendency was no doubt heightened by the Spirit of God. Proclaimed a fast. In times of danger it was considered proper to refuse food and give full time to supplicating deity until danger was past. Put on sackcloth. Sackcloth was regarded as a symbol of humility and utter dependence on God. It was a coarse ugly cloth not fit for normal wear. 6. King of Nineveh. Not the emperor of the Assyrian empire but the ruler of the city-state. He also joined in the fast by making it official. Having put on sackcloth, along with the others, he began to plead for mercy. Sat in ashes (cf. Job 2:8; Jer 6:26; Mic 1:10). A graphic way of declaring that man is nothing in the face of great danger.

2) The King's Decree. 3:7-9.

7. Published . . . the decree. The response of the people was made an act of the state. It has been a common practice among Semitic people to include their animals in their times of mourning and distress. It may seem strange to Western people that the cries of the famished beasts were intentionally added to those of the people; but Orientals regarded this as essential for effective supplication. 8. Beast be covered. By putting sackcloth on the animals as well as on themselves the Ninevites symbolized the unity of man and nature in the humbling and petition. Turn . . . away from his evil way. As is so often the case in times of danger, people who otherwise seem completely indifferent become very conscious of their misdeeds—a sad commentary on man's lack of gratitude for God's blessings in good times. From . . . violence. The people of Assyria were noted for their cruelty to other people, especially prisoners of war. The Ninevites were quickened in conscience to realize that their treatment of other people was about to bring disaster upon them.

9. God will turn and repent. These two verbs do not signify that the Ninevites thought God was fickle. They indicate, instead, that these pagans believed the Lord's greatest desire was not to destroy men but to save them. The word repent, when used of God, does not denote sorrow for sin. It points rather to a decision on God's part to change his method of dealing with his creatures. Thoroughgoing repudiation of sin by man is pleasing to God, and in response He graciously pours out His love.

D. Judgment Withheld. 3:10. Jonah's message apparently was not an "if" sentence; yet in reality it was conditional, because God's threat of punishment can be set aside when real repentance is in evidence. The Lord's promises of salvation take procedence over his threats. God's love is eternal, but his expressions of wrath serve to quicken man to repentance. In the case of Nineveh, the Lord did not change in his essence; only his way of dealing with man changed. This is the wonder of mercy and love.

IV. Learning. 4:1-11.

A. Complaint. 4:1-3. Jonah had obeyed the Lord by going to Nineveh and preaching God's message, but his heart attitude had not been changed to love. He so hated the Ninevites for their cruelty that deep in his heart he looked forward to their destruction. Now the forty days had gone by, and Nineveh was still standing unharmed.

1. Displeased . . . exceedingly . . . very angry. A typical Hebrew parallelism, expressing the extreme reaction of Jonah to the salvation of the city of Nineveh.

2. I knew that thou art a gracious God. At last the secret was out. Jonah was not ignorant of the character of his God. He had fled to Tarshish not because he was afraid of the Ninevites, but because he did not want them to be saved. He knew that every threat of God was conditional, no matter how stated. God was gracious, meaning that He had the welfare of man upon His heart, and passionately desired to lift him from his sin. Even Jonah's own nation could not have come into being if God had not been gracious to the children of Israel at the very beginning (Ex 34:6,7). Any deliverance from slavery, oppression, famine, or destruction is an evidence of God's gracious love toward man (Isa 30:18), and the Lord forgives sins because He is gracious (Hos 14:2). Merciful. A companion word with gracious, pointing to the love of God which is poured upon the undeserving sinner who repents of his sins. God retains the right to help those who show genuine sorrow for sin and who trust in His kindness. Slow to anger. It is not God's first wish to punish the wayward. He endures much of man's wickedness. But when it becomes evident, in any given situation, that men are too proud and headstrong to be guided by easy, agreeable discipline, He begins to teach them the "hard way," by expressing His displeasure toward sin. Of great kindness. To the prophet, the love of God is so great that he can only multiply phrases in trying to express it. Kindness is a translation of the Hebrew word hesed, meaning loyalty to a covenant promise. The expression of kindness is not exhausted when the covenant is broken by the other party, but reaches out after the wayward one to draw him back to an intimate personal relation. God's kindness is so great that He is glad to put aside judgment so that the penitent sinner may re-enter the covenant relation.

3. Jonah did not have in his heart the love of God, and he felt shamed because his prophecy had been nullified by the conversion of those he disliked. The prophet was so downcast that he wished for death.

B. The Gourd and the Worm. 4:4-7.

4. Doest thou well to be angry? The Lord called Jonah's attitude into question. In the light of God's concern for man, how could his servant be so ungodlike?

5. Made him a booth. Though Jonah was aware that a wave of repentance in Nineveh would move God to save the people, he doggedly determined to wait for the destruction he had foretold. Going to higher ground outside the city proper, he set up a booth of branches to shade himself from the sun. Such booths are still used in the open country in the Middle East. A man can be comfortable in their shade even when the sun is blazing hot.

6. The Lord God prepared a gourd. The plant, palma cristi, is common in the Middle East. The speed of its growth in this case is declared to be an act of God. Jonah was suffering from so much inner conflict that he reacted with widely contrasting emotions at various times. Whereas before he had been greatly depressed, now he was overjoyed.

7. God prepared a worm. The destruction of the gourd was also an act of God. The worm, striking at the roots, destroyed the plant, and with it, the blessing of its shade.

C. The Wind and the Sun. 4:8. God prepared a . . . wind. This final act of the Lord robbed Jonah of his last earthly comfort—the cool shade. The east wind is famous for its searing hot temperature, from which not even the shade of a booth can protect a man. When Jonah could not endure the heat, he cried out the second time for the release of death. The first time he wished for death because of his inner despair; this time he cried to God because of his physical distress.

D. The Lesson. 4:9-11. Obviously, the series of divine actions directed toward Jonah had a purpose. God was striving to point up the absurdity of Jonah's spiritual unconcern for human welfare, by contrasting it with his legitimate concern for his own physical welfare.

9. The question of verse 4 is here repeated. From the content of 4:1-3 one can assume that Jonah's answer the first time the question was put would have been the same as the answer here.

10. Thou hast had pity on the gourd. This was a proper concern and probably a reasonable ground for anger. Yet the plant was only a plant, and Jonah had had nothing to do with its growth or destruction. 11. Should not I spare Nineveh. The Ninevites were human beings—men, women, and children—objects of God's special creation, and therefore objects of his love. A mere plant, like the gourd, cannot enter into personal fellowship with God; neither can sin corrupt it. Jonah's concern for the gourd was selfish; he was sorry for its destruction because it served his personal comfort. But God's concern for man is unselfish, for He seeks only to give comfort by delivering from sin. No man has the right to question or resent the outpouring of God's love in saving man—any man—from sin and the destruction of sin. The Ninevites needed Him more than others because they had had no one to show them moral distinctions.

MICAH

INTRODUCTION

Title. The prophecy of Micah receives its title from the name of the prophet himself. The name Mîkâ (LXX, Michaias; Vulg., Michaeas) is an abbreviation for Mîkāyâ. The prophet is called by this latter full name in Jer 26:18. The original and fullest form is Mîkāyāhû, which means, "Who is like Yahweh?" This fullest form was the name of a prince in II Chr 17:7. It is used of both men and women and it is usually abridged. Yahu is an ancient form of the name of the God of Israel, often rendered "Jehovah" (Ex 6:3; Ps 83:18; Isa 12:2; 26:4).

The prophet's name, like those of other prophets, as Elijah, Elisha, Hosea, Joel, Obadiah, and others, is important. Such names coupled with that of God or Yahweh signified the prophet's attitude and allegiance to the true God and, in the case of Micah, was a challenge to false prophets and sinners.

Date and Authorship. The date of the ministry is given in terms of the reigns of Jotham (739–735 B.C.), Ahaz (735–715 B.C.), and Hezekiah (715–687 B.C.), kings of Judah (Mic 1:1). Micah began his work at the time of Jotham and served through the entire reign of Ahaz and perhaps through all of that of Hezekiah. His writings, which show a close relationship to those of Isaiah, were written during the reigns of Ahaz and Hezekiah. Both Micah and Isaiah, though addressing their prophecies primarily to Judah, make it clear that God's judgment will also fall on the Northern Kingdom. That Micah prophesied during the reign of Hezekiah is further attested by Jer 26: 18,19.

There are liberal critics who judge the work objectively, using the historico-critical method. To them the book of Micah is just another human production. Forgetting that we have only parts of his messages delivered at different times, that he was deeply concerned over the political and social conditions of his people, and that he was moved by the Spirit of Jehovah, these critics find what they consider glosses and interpolations which they date as late as the post-Exilic period. They reject the supernatural in prophecy, especially the naming of Babylon in 4:10, in spite of the fact that Assyria was the hostile power of the day. In arrangement and in scope chapters 1–5 are similar to Isaiah's prophecies. In chapters 1–3 Micah announces the coming judgment of sin, and in chapters 4 and 5 he proclaims that Israel is to be comforted by forgiveness and restoration. Hence the 'liberals' assign chapters 4 and 5 to a Deutero-Micah of the post-Exilic period.

We hold that the entire work is that of Micah, who prophesied at the time of Isaiah. Micah was not from a large city, as his older contemporary was, but from the small village of Moresheth, which belonged to Gath. He spoke as a man of the people, whose sympathy was with the country folk, and he sought to protect them against the greedy rich and the nobles of the capital cities. Though the prophet lived and prophesied in the Southern Kingdom, he condemned the sins of the Northern Kingdom; and he prophesied and witnessed its fall. Micah's prophecy is not presented in the form of a systematic treatise. This may be due to the fact that it contains a collection of oracles, subsequently written by the prophet or one of his disciples.

The oratorical style and the play on words in chapter 1 are reminiscent of Cicero. In chapters 2; 6; 7 the literary form is that of a dramatic dialogue.

Historical Background. The Assyrian kings of this period were Tiglath-pileser III (745–727), Shalmanezer V (727–722), Sargon II (722–705), and Sennacherib (705–681). Sennacherib led his army into the northern and western parts of Judah, subjugating cities and villages as he advanced, until he reached Jerusalem, which, though subjected to a long siege, was never taken. The prophecy concerning the eventual capture and destruction of Jerusalem points to the later time of Nebuchadnezzar. Assyria conquered the entire Near East except Egypt and Jerusalem. Her armies, however, did not occupy all of these lands; rather, she required them, as subjugated nations, to pay annual tribute.

When a new successor came to the throne of Assyria, the tributary kingdoms would revolt. Consequently, it would fall to the lot of this new ruler to resubjugate all the previously held land by a series of military campaigns. The most difficult campaigns were against the nations closest to Egypt. These border countries, acting as buffer states in bearing the brunt of war, were encouraged by Egypt in an effort to protect herself.

These were days of unrest, insecurity, and hardship, especially for the peasants and villagers. The harassment of the passing armies, which not infrequently overran the small villages and made slaves of their inhabitants, caused a state of fear. The political conditions in both Israel and Judah could not have been worse. The rulers, the wealthy, the conniving priests and prophets in the capital cities, feeling secure within strong fortifications, made the most of their power to oppress the poor. The peasants had no protection either from the Assyrians or from the "grafters" of their own nation. To these wrongs Micah addressed himself, championing the cause of the oppressed. Fearlessly following the leadership of the Holy Spirit, he preached at the risk of his life. Micah's messages reflect the prevailing corruptions. His allusions to the Assyrians show what was the common topic of the day.

Superscription. 1:1.

The word of Jehovah (ASV). The message was from Jehovah, and hence had divine authority. This was the usual claim of the Hebrew prophets (cf. Jon 1:1; Ob 1:1). Was to. In the sense of "directed to". Thus the word of Jehovah was directed to Micah, given to him to proclaim. Saw, i.e., with mental and spiritual vision, not necessarily with physical eyes. This verb means to see subjectively. Micah had spiritual understanding of the message he was to declare.

I. Approaching Judgment of Israel and Judah Because of Persistent Sin. 1: 2-16.

A. The Call to Attention. 1:2.

Hear or listen. Hear with interest, having mental and spiritual perception, and with a view to obedience. This is a customary word used by the prophets to call attention to their messages (cf. Isa 1:2,10; Amos 3:1; Joel 1:2; Hos 4:1). All people, the earth and her fullness. The message is directed to all peoples. The earth and her fullness are to stand at attention (cf. Isa 1:2; Deut 32:1). Cause to hearken. Literally, cause to point, to sharpen (the ears). The people are to be attentive while the message is being proclaimed. Lord. The enthroned "Lord" or "Master" over the universe. Against or among you (ASV margin). If "against," the reference is to Samaria and Jerusalem. If used in the sense of "among," the pronoun refers to all people. In either case Jehovah is speaking concerning the wickedness of the capital cities of Israel and Judah. He is witnessing from the temple of his holiness. This temple, the context indicates, is in heaven. "Holiness" primarily means "separation." Heaven itself is separated and consecrated to the purposes of the holiness of Jehovah. The Lord's active holiness goes forth into all the earth, in salvation or in judgment.

B. Terrible Coming of the Lord Jehovah Announced and Described. 1: 3,4. These verses introduce a solemn reason why all peoples should hear the message.

3. Goes forth. The form used indicates that Jehovah is continuously sitting in judgment upon sin and sinners. He shall come down and shall tread. The two verbs express repeated action.

4. As the majestic stepping forth of Jehovah touches the tops of the mountains, the mountains shall be dissolved. New valleys will be formed as the hills (valleys) split themselves and, like wax before the fire, pour down like a torrent of water over a precipice. It is to be noted that Orelli (The Twelve Minor Prophets, p. 191) prefers plains to valleys. Others suggest the emendation, hills, to avoid the apparent difficulty of "valleys" being cleft. Similar descriptions of such awe-inspiring manifestations of Jehovah occur in Ex 19:18,19; Jud 5:5; Isa 64:1; Hab 3:6.

C. Sins of the Capital City Representative of Those of the Nation. 1:5.

For the transgression of Jacob. Transgression literally means breaking away or rebellion. Apostasy would be nearer the Hebrew (Cheyne, "Micah," The Cambridge Bible). Israel, the Northern Kingdom, had broken away from Jehovah and rebelled against his righteous requirements. For, i.e., "because of," the transgression is all this—either the witnessing that precedes or the judgments that follow. The phrases may point in both directions. Sins. To sin is literally to miss the mark, as when a marksman shoots and misses. In the NT the Greek word for sin, hamartia, has the same meaning. God had set up a target, and the house of Israel had missed the mark. What is. Literally, Who is. Rebellion and sin are committed by people. The form of the question demands an affirmative answer. High places were locations for idolatrous worship, which was forbidden by the Mosaic law (cf. Deut 13). The prophet charged the two capital cities with being the centers of the nations' sins. This accusation can be made against many capital cities throughout history.

D. Fearful Consequences of This Judgment. 1:6,7.

6. Therefore. Because of the sins of Samaria, Jehovah will do as follows. A heap, i.e., a ruin for plantings of a vineyard. Wars caused the destruction of the city several times, and this prophecy became literally fulfilled (cf. Isa 21:1-3). Jehovah declares that he will cause Samaria's stones to pour down into the valley, completely uncovering its foundations. Today Samaria is heaps of stone, not only on the hill summit but also in the fields below. Archaeological expeditions have extended the uncovering of the foundations to the very palaces of Omri and Ahab.

7. All her graven stone images, Jehovah foretells, he will cause to be beaten into pieces, in his wrath against idolatry (Ex 20:4). All her hires; i.e., wages paid to harlots as the price of their sin. The prophet looked upon the idolatrous civilization of Samaria as the product of the hire of harlots; or upon idolatry as harlotry. Samaria was to be destroyed and the fragments of her images were to be returned to the original usage, the hire of harlots.

E. The Prophet's Reaction and His Vision of This Judgment. 1:8-16.

8. On this account. The prophet declares that he will lament and wail, go stripped or plundered and naked, because of the incurable wounds of Samaria that have come upon his own people, even unto the gate of Jerusalem, the political capital and center of worship. Therefore I. The prophet identifies himself with the nation. The literary form of verse 8 produces a solemn impression. Micah begins, Let me wail . . . with the strength of a jackal. He will lament until he has exhausted himself, so that his voice will become like the "peeping" of a baby female ostrich (ASV, RSV). Nakedness was the common lot of a captive. In his grief the prophet will go stripped and naked.

9. The idolatry and wickedness of Samaria had so influenced Jerusalem that she was guilty of like sin. The descendants of the house of Ahab (king over the Northern Kingdom, husband of Jezebel) ruled in Jerusalem and led the nation away from Jehovah. The resulting wounds, which could never be cured, had infected the political, social, and religious life of Judah, including the very place of counsel, namely the "city gate." In the Near East, gate had come to mean the king's counselors or cabinet, and that meaning persisted even until the fall of the Turkish sultanate in recent years. For centuries the cabinet of Turkey was called "the Sublime Porte." Like sin merits like judgment, whether it be the sin of Samaria or that of Jerusalem.

10. Note, beginning with verse 10, that the listing of the cities shows the route of the invader. Whereas the first five cities are north of Jerusalem, the last five are southwest or south of the city. The prophet, in oratorical style, names the cities according to the sound of their names as well as according to meaning. Not only Jerusalem, but also the surrounding locations would suffer. In Gath (gat) do not announce it (taggîdû). In Beth-le-Aphrah (House of dust) in dust I have rolled myself. Both were heathen cities. The prophet dreaded the outpouring of the scorn of these people when they should learn of the sin and consequent punishment of those who were called the people of Jehovah. To roll in dust signified abject and intense mourning.

11. Dweller is feminine in form. Micah foresees the women of these doomed cities pass before the men. In nakedness and shame they will go into captivity, and the men will be powerless to help against the might of the enemy. In 1:6 the prophet introduces the prophecy against Samaria. In 1:11 the punishment upon Judah is without an introductory statement. The female dweller of Zaanan (Outlet) shall not go out, i.e., out of the house. She will be in terror because of the coming invader. Wailing of Beth-ezel (House of Separation) shall take away from you his stay or strength. This town, which was probably fortified, would be expected to help resist the invader. But its people would lament over the suffering of others until their strength would be gone. 12. For (kî) . . . because (kî). The first kî is a particle—"yea" or "indeed." The second gives the reason for the first clause. The female inhabitant of Maroth, Micah says, will painfully wait for good, but Jehovah will send evil to the gate of Jerusalem. The invasion of the Assyrians was violence sent as judgment from Jehovah (cf. Isa 10:5).

13. Hitch the chariot to the swift racing steed. The female dweller of Lachish (impregnable hill) is so commanded that she may escape the coming invader. Judgment is to come upon Lachish because she was the beginning of sin (i.e., of missing the mark) of the daughter of Zion (Jerusalem). Through her, the transgression (breaking away from God) of Israel—Baal worship with its accompanying abominations—came to Zion. The use of Lākish and rekesh ("swift steed") close together is a characteristic Hebrew play on words. 14. A parting gift. Or, a dismissal present, i.e., the return of the marriage portion of a bride, hence a bill of divorcement. The "daughter of Zion" and Moresheth-gath (the prophet's home town) have been united in sin. Now they are to be separated. Houses of Achzib (place of deceit) will be a deceitful thing to the kings of Israel. This town (eight miles north of Moresheth) rather than serving as a defense against the invaders will be helpless or even turn traitor.

15. Yet the one possessing (thee) I will cause to come to thee. Jehovah will cause the possessor (the Assyrian invaders) to come and take them captive. Mareshah, "hereditary city (of Judah)", now is to become the possession of Assyria. Unto Adullam shall come the glory of Israel. The nobility will flee to Adullam, famous for its caves; men who should be in the battle line will be hiding. 16. Make thee bald and cut off thy hair. This is expressed in the feminine gender. Perhaps Israel as a mother is exhorted to extreme manifestation of grief because her sons, born and reared in luxury (delicately brought up), have gone into captivity. Micah sees the horror as already accomplished.

II. Doom of Corrupt Oppressors and False Prophets. 2:1–3:12.

A. Woe upon the Land Monopolizers. 2:1-5.

1. Woe is pronounced upon those who lie awake at night devising crooked or treacherous methods to gain their selfish ends. When morning breaks they put their schemes into effect, for the power is in their hands. "Might makes right." 2. They seize . . . take away . . . oppress. They take all they covet—fields, houses, and inheritance. Nothing renders a people so helpless as to make the plain people, the core of the nation's strength, homeless and reduce them to servitude (cf. Goldsmith, The Deserted Village). 3. Therefore Jehovah will recompense these oppressors according to their doings. He is preparing a halter for their necks. Instead of going about with their heads haughtily lifted, they will be led into captivity with haltered necks.

4. In that day some mourner will bitterly bemoan the ruin (lit., wail a wail of a wailing) as he sees the fields divided among the enemy. Therefore there will be no prosperity, no land, and for these unscrupulous wealthy people, no further part in the inheritance of the Lord (v. 5).

B. False Preaching of Lying Prophets. 2:6-13.

1) Effort To Stop the Preaching of the True Prophet. 2:6. Prophesy ye not . . . they prophesy. The corrupt leaders, using the false prophets who cater to them, will seek to stop the true prophet from preaching. Prophesy is used in a double sense, "to preach" by the true prophets and "to drivel nonsense" by the false prophets.

2) False Preaching That the Spirit of Jehovah Is Straitened. 2:7. Ought it be said . . . that the Spirit of Jehovah is straitened (impatient)? are these his deeds? The oppressors cannot ascribe the calamities to a God who is accustomed only to punishing. No. To the upright his words are good.

3) Insecurity of Citizens Due to Rule of Oppressors. 2:8-13. Instead of walking uprightly, Jehovah's people are rising up as his enemy. They plunder unsuspecting and helpless society, not only stealing clothing and fraudulently driving women from their homes, but taking from the children (soon to enter captivity) the rights of citizenship and temple worship (vv. 8,9). "Arise," proclaims the prophet, "and go into captivity, for uncleanness completely destroys" (v. 10). The indictment of the prophet is scathing. If a person should come to them preaching in favor of wine and strong drink, these oppressors would be base enough to make him their prophet (v. 11).

Bible students differ as to whether the return from exile is foretold in 2:12,13. Some hold that the abrupt turn from the message concerning the nearer future to one concerning the remote future is often found in the writings of true prophets, and would be expected from one who had hope of ultimate blessing. In this view the breaker (v. 13) refers to Messiah, who will lead forth his besieged remnant as their king, even Jehovah, at his second advent. Others feel that this prophecy was put forth by the false prophets who held out a false hope of a speedy return. As regards the Northern Kingdom of Israel, this prophecy has never yet been fulfilled.

C. Denunciation of the Leaders of the People. 3:1-7.

1) Micah's Answer to the False Prophets and Oppressors. 3:1. Micah calls to the rulers of both nations to hear with understanding so as to heed. First attacking the political leaders, he asks if it is not their duty to know justice by experience. The question implies an affirmative answer.

2) Character of Wicked Oppressors Described. 3:2,3. Instead of knowing justice, they are habitual haters of good and lovers of evil. They treat the poor as cannibals do victims in their feasts.

3) Jehovah's Refusal To Hear Their Prayers. 3:4. Then. When Jehovah's judgment falls, they will repeatedly cry to him, but he in turn will not answer and will hide his face from them. These leaders chose to do evil (2:1-3) and were guilty, so Jehovah could not but hide his face from them and let justice take its course.

4) Character of False Prophets. 3:5. When these prophets had plenty to eat (biting with their teeth), they preached peace. The implication is that the rich oppressors protected and supported the false prophets. And, if the spokesmen did not get their support, a holy war would be declared against the benefactors.

5) False Prophets To Be Discredited. 3:6,7. The false prophets, Jehovah declares, will not have visions nor be able to divine. This frustration will be as the darkness of night to them. The discredited prophets will be ashamed (AV; lit., turn red); they will cover their lips; there will be nothing to say. And the people will be left groping in religious darkness.

D. Micah's Consciousness of Power from the Spirit of Jehovah. 3:8.

Micah here contrasts himself with the false prophets. He is full of heroic might, inner strength, even the Spirit of Jehovah. He is also filled with zeal for administrative justice instead of love of oppression, and with courage instead of cowardice like that of the false prophets. This zeal and courage find expression in this making known to Jacob his transgression (rebellion) and to Israel his sin (missing the mark). Micah, being full of holy passion for the cause of Jehovah, could make the high claim of this verse.

E. Gross Sin and Crime To Bring Destruction Upon Jerusalem. 3:9-12.

Hear ye, I pray thee. Beginning with a compassionate plea, Micah summarizes his charges to the heads (judges), rulers, priests, and false prophets (vv. 9-11) who even dare to say, Is not Jehovah in our midst and evil shall not come upon us? (v. 11), looking to the people for their nod of agreement. 12. Because of such leaders—destruction is to come. No longer a city, Zion will be plowed as a farmer's field, a heap of ruins, and the mountain of the house (Mount Moriah) where Jehovah long has been worshiped will be a deserted woodland hilltop.

III. Vision of Hope Through the Coming One. 4:1—5:15.

A. Final Triumph of Jerusalem. 4:1—5:1.

Verses 1-3 are found nearly word for word in Isa 2:2-4. Though Micah and Isaiah were contemporaries (Jer 26:18; Isa 1:1), it is doubtful that the older, Isaiah, would copy from the younger prophet. Further, the verses fit better and are more complete as found in Micah. Some scholars propose a third source from which the Holy Spirit led both men to gain material for their discourses.

1) Revival of True Religion and Return to Jehovah. 4:1,2.

1. In the latter (or last, lit. after) days. After the days of judgment described in the previous chapter. This phrase is commonly used by the prophets to denote the Messianic era (cf. Hos 3:5). C. F. Keil states: "The predicted exaltation of the temple mountain is assigned to the period of the completion of the kingdom of God" (The Twelve Minor Prophets, II, 456). The mountain of the house of Jehovah shall be spiritually exalted above all mountains. Nations shall flow (like a river) unto it, of their own desire, for God will be there.

2. They will invite and urge others, and Jehovah will be the teacher. The Hebrew word for teach comes from a word meaning "to cast a javelin" or "to shoot as an arrow." It came to mean "to cause to point out," hence "to teach or instruct." The thing pointed out became known as the "torah" or law. This word is used not of the Mosaic law only but of the entire OT; hence the teachings concerning the Messiah are included. All nations shall flow to Jehovah's habitation to learn of the Messiah, for they will desire His ways and . . . his paths. Jehovah will teach his purposes and demands, and it will be possible to walk therein because this law (Heb. tôrâ) shall go forth from Zion.

2) The Return to Jehovah To Bring Peace and Prosperity. 4:3-5.

3. He will judge . . . and decide (lit., arbitrate). Jehovah will act as arbitrator between contending peoples, setting right strong nations from afar. They will cease to war and will change the implements of battle into the tools of peace. This points back to the determination of peoples to walk in the paths of Jehovah, and to the going forth of the Torah from Jerusalem (v. 2). In Jerusalem, the abode of kings, is found the concept of kingship and authority as well as judgment. Peace is the fruitage of the teaching of the Word of God. 4,5. No longer learning war, each man shall sit under his own vine and fig tree, and there shall be no fear (cf. Zech 3:10). This is possible, since Jehovah, the God of Israel, is the eternal, self-existent one. In contrast to Him, heathen gods are without life, and worship of them will perish. Those who walk in the name of Jehovah (v. 5) shall have eternal peace.

3) Return of Those in Captivity Promised. 4:6,7. The oracle of Jehovah is that those in captivity will return, but in the "after" days (v. 1), after suffering and judgment. Jehovah will gather the limping and those cast off, those driven cruelly into captivity, afflicted by God for their sin. These will become a remnant (v. 7) spoken of by the prophets (cf. Isa 37:32; 46:3; Jer 23:3; Amos 5:15). The cast-off ones will become Jehovah's own strong people. And he will rule over them in Mount Zion from their return even to eternity. (See conclusion of ch. 5 for fulfillment of this prophecy.)

4) Jerusalem To Be Restored to Greater Splendor and Power. 4:8. The former dominion. The kingdoms of David and Solomon represent Jerusalem in its glory. Here it is implied that even greater splendor is to come to Zion, to the tower, a portion of the Davidic palace, from which the good shepherd, in figure, watches over his flock.

5) Redemption To Be Preceded by Suffering as Punishment for Sin. 4:9,10. No king will be in Israel. Like a woman in travail (v. 10) the house of Jacob must suffer captivity in Babylon. There she will be set free.

6) Enemies To See Jehovah's Vindication of His People. 4:11,12. Scorn will come from the cruel heathen nations desiring Israel's pollution. But these will not have perceived Jehovah's counsels, that he is to gather them to Jerusalem as sheaves to the threshing floor. Some hold that the enemies are the Assyrians ("Micah," The Cambridge Bible, p. 40), or the army of Antiochus Epiphanes, as described in Daniel and in I and II Maccabees (Cowles, The Minor Prophets, p. 200), or the nations gathered at the final great battle of Joel 3; Ezk 38; 39; Zech 12; and Rev 20:8ff.

7) Final Victory Foretold, with Exhortation To Prepare for a Coming Siege. 4:13–5:1.

13. Arise and thresh. Zion will punish with a horn of iron and hoofs of brass. Her foes will be destroyed as grain is trampled by oxen on the threshing floor. The enemies of Zion will think to make gain for their selfish ends, but, in reverse, the gain is to be consecrated, devoted, to Jehovah.

5:1 (4:14 in the Heb. Bible). Micah abruptly turns to an imminent experience. Israel, here meaning Judah, is to marshal her forces for a siege, in which the ruling king, who is judge, will be humiliated. This was fulfilled in part by the siege of Sennacherib in 701 B.C., by Nebuchadnezzar's capture of Jerusalem in 587 B.C. and his smiting of King Zedekiah, and by each succeeding siege until the destruction of Jerusalem in A.D. 70.

B. Coming Mighty Leader To Be Born in Bethlehem and To Restore the Remnant of Jacob. 5:2-15.

1) The Messiah To Be Born in Bethlehem. 5:2,3.

2. Bethlehem (Heb. House of Bread) in the district of Ephratah was too small to have a place among the thousands (or families) of Judah, yet was destined to be exalted throughout the world; for the Messiah was to be born in this humble place, in the village of his great ancestor David. His goings forth are from everlasting, for this future ruler in Israel is the eternal "Angel-Jehovah" coequal with Jehovah throughout the OT.

3. She who is in travail refers to Israel in affliction, or the personal mother of the coming One; the latter is preferred. Then, there shall be a return of the residue (or remnant) of his brethren (fellow Judeans) to Jehovah and home.

2) The Messiah's Beneficent Reign. 5:4-7.

4. He . . . shall feed his flock (ASV). Messiah is to become the shepherd who works in the strength and majesty of Jehovah (cf. Jn 10:11; Heb 13:20; I Pet 5:4). Enemies will be unable to molest, for his name shall be great to the ends of the earth. 5,6. This man shall be the peace (cf. Eph 2:14) within men's souls, between men, between nations. When Assyria shall come. Assyria was the foe most feared in Micah's day, and it is here used to typify Israel's enemies. In the One who is Peace there is power to raise up leaders who will protect Israel and overcome enemies. Micah points to the victory of the Coming One over world powers.

7. The remnant of Jacob (spiritual Israel) shall be in the midst of many nations as dew . . . showers. Jehovah's true people are refreshing and a blessing like the dew—of God—not made or removed by the sons of men.

3) Spiritual Israel To Become a Great Conqueror. 5:8,9. Israel shall be as a lion from whom none can deliver, as a mighty warrior who shall cut off his adversaries (v. 9). This warfare will be completed when "the One" shall have put all enemies under his feet (I Cor 15:25-28).

4) Spiritual Israel To Be Deprived of Material Strength and Help. 5:10-15. Jehovah proclaims that the time will come when all war equipment upon which his people have depended will be cut off (vv. 10,11). All man-made religions—with their sorceries, diviners, idols, shrines, and cities devoted to idolatry—by which Israel has been led astray, Jehovah will pluck up (vv. 12-14). Israel will then rely on the power and mercy of God as revealed in the One from Bethlehem. Israel and the world must recognize that their dependence is on Him. For the nations which reject Jehovah's message (v. 15) there will be only wrath (the prophet implying the acceptance of the message by some; see ASV which hearkened not).

In chapters 4 and 5 Micah has clearly developed the teaching of the Abrahamic promise as given to Abraham (Gen 12:1-3; 13:14-18; 15:1-21) and as elaborated in the Patriarchal Covenant (Deut 30:1-20):

(1) Israel because of her sin must undergo punishment: (a) Immediate—i.e., pestilence, drought, etc.; (b) Future—an actual captivity.

(2) Israel is to be saved and have a world-wide service: (a) An actual return is to come, he says (and it did come), though for a remnant only. This remnant is to be the seed of the Kingdom and will become great and world-wide. Such seed is to be produced not by natural birth only (natural Israel was only the vehicle for the realization of the spiritual Kingdom), but by spiritual conversion, as at Pentecost, etc.

To Micah the spiritual kingdom is the universal worship of Jehovah, and the ideal Davidic King is the Messiah.

(b) During the Maccabean period Israel actually existed as a nation, with an Aaronic king as ruler. The spirit of Nationalism was strong, and much emphasis was placed on a coming literal restoration of the Davidic ruler. Contrary to God's missionary purpose (Gen 12:3), the nation at this time was highly isolationist in attitude. Micah foretold that the kingdom to be established is to be universal, eternal, and essentially spiritual.

(3) Chapter 5 foretells the birthplace and characteristics of the coming King. This prophecy was fulfilled in Jesus Christ, who proclaimed a spiritual kingdom, to the disappointment of the Pharisees, Sadducees, and others. The Jews rejected Jesus because they held a materialistic conception of the promised kingdom.

(4) Paul in his letters to the Romans and Galatians taught that there is neither Jew nor Greek . . . in the kingdom; all are one and all in Christ are Abraham's seed and heirs of the Promise.

IV. The Lawsuit of Jehovah. 6:1–7:20. Chapters 4 and 5 of the Book of Micah foretell the coming and work of the Messiah. The prophecy extends to the consummation of all things, which Micah saw as being brought about through sin, judgment, and salvation. In these last two chapters the prophet describes the sin of the people, as well as Jehovah's striving with them and His judgment upon them; he also foretells that the people will confess their sin and receive the promised blessings. All this is set forth in the form of a lawsuit. The prophet is represented as the prosecuting attorney for Jehovah, with the mountains and the hills (perhaps symbols of unchangeable justice) as the court and the judges. Jehovah pleads through the prophet; the people reply; the mountains and the hills sit in silent judgment.

A. First Complaint of Jehovah. 6:1-5.

1. Hear ye (with obedience). The prophet calls the court to order; Jehovah demands that his words be heeded. Contend. Legal terminology, meaning, "to plead a case in court." Jehovah calls to Micah to arise and plead his case against his people. 2. There is a lawsuit (controversy) . . . and he will contend. Literally, fully prove.

3. My people, what have I done. Here is Jehovah's formal plea against his people, which should call to mind his faithfulness and their unfaithfulness. 4,5. Jehovah does not wait for an answer, but points out his gracious guidance and protection in their past history. He redeemed them from slavery in Egypt, gave them great leaders, and delivered them from Balak and Balaam (Num 22–24). Can they not learn from experience the Lord's righteousness (v. 5)? The ways of men may be crooked, but in human history Jehovah exhibits his covenant faithfulness in his "straight" ways.

B. Israel's First Reply. 6:6-8.

With seeming sincerity, Israel replies by way of three specific questions, of increasing intensity. Can I please Jehovah–

(1) In ordinary sacrifices of calves? (v. 6)

(2) In sacrifices extraordinary in amount, as "thousands of rams, or with ten thousands of rivers of oil?" (v. 7)

(3) In sacrifice so extraordinary in nature as to be violation of the law of Moses, i.e., of the first-born? (v. 7b; cf. Deut 12:29-31; II Kgs 3:27; Jud 11:30-40)

If salvation could thus be bought, by offering material goods as propitiation for sin, all mankind would be striving for salvation. But true salvation is a surrender of spirit. Israel had forgotten Jehovah's law of the redemption of the first-born (Ex 13:12,13) and the experience of Abraham (Gen 22).

8. What Jehovah requires applies to all men of all time, perpetually and unchangeably:

(1) To do justly. That is, to live right in relation to one's fellow man in social, political, and industrial affairs.

(2) To love mercy. That is, to exhibit that quality of steadfast loving-kindness which is seen in Jehovah and comes from him.

(3) To walk humbly with thy God. That is, to have humility and devotion to God through faith. Such sacrifices–of right attitudes and upright character–are acceptable to Jehovah.

C. Second Complaint of Jehovah. 6:9-16.

9. Jehovah calls out rebuke and warning to the city of Jerusalem. Wisdom sees (or fears) thy name (i.e., Jehovah) and hence takes warning, for the rod of judgment–Assyria–appointed by Jehovah is soon to fall. 10-13. Are there yet the treasures of wickedness? The answer is found in charges of dishonesty in business, scanty measures, false balances (v. 11), oppression of the poor by the rich, lying and deceitfulness (v. 12; cf. Jas 4:1-12). This is the old story of corrupt social, financial, and moral conditions–in spite of the warnings of Jehovah. Therefore–desolation.

14-16. Jehovah is not arbitrary in his judgments. They are the natural results of sin, namely: (1) hunger (lit., thy casting down . . . etc., meaning "a sinking feeling in the stomach due to lack of food", v. 14); (2) toil, without the power to accumulate possessions, which, if accumulated, would be delivered to the sword; and (3) desolation. Would that the people of Israel had walked as carefully in Jehovah's requirements as they had followed the wickedness of Omri and Ahab! (v. 16; I Kgs 16–22) In their persistent wickedness, they were moving into the purposes of Jehovah's judgments. He overrules even sin to accomplish his own ends for his glory.

D. Israel's Second Reply–a Confession of Sin. 7:1-10.

This concluding chapter completes

Jehovah's lawsuit with Israel begun in chapter 6. The section is broken in thought, which suggests with what deep emotion Micah voices the reply of the people—their confession and lamentation.

1-4. Jehovah's blessings under the figure of the fruit harvest have passed Israel by, declares Micah, and the nation is now destitute of moral men and standards. Note the parallelism of godly (good man, AV) with clusters of grapes and upright with first ripe figs (vv. 1,2). Such moral men do not exit, just disappear. All men are bloodthirsty, even against their brothers. The prince continually asks for injustice; the judge is ever ready for a bribe (Heb. "to pay," as in a trade); and the great man speaks his evil desire. Thus they weave (Heb. twist or knit; AV wrap) it together (v. 3) into terrible reality. The watchmen (v. 4), i.e., the true prophets (cf. Isa 62:6; Ezk 3:16 ff.). The day of Israel's watchmen was the day of Jehovah's visitation.

5,6. Society was crumbling at its roots; yea, the enemies of a man were those of his own household. Suspicion, distrust, and enmity prevailed. Considering the modern world, human nature has changed little (cf. Mt 10:34ff.).

7. The stricken nation is represented as turning to the only source of hope—But, I, unto Jehovah I will intently look and cause (my soul) to wait with determination. For my God will hear, "heed and deliver." 8. I shall arise. The enemy, even Assyria, is warned not to rejoice, for Jehovah will shine in the darkness for those who wait for him. 9,10. Anger (lit., boiling indignation). The nation is willing to bear the wrath of Jehovah because she knows she has sinned. Here is real repentance, and also faith that Jehovah himself will settle the case (of sin) and the sinner will be brought forth to the light, to behold and walk in His righteousness. Israel's enemy will see and hide in shame; worse still, she will suffer punishment. Such is the end of those who scoff at Jehovah.

E. Israel's Promised Blessing To Follow Judgment. 7:11-13.

11,12. A day to build thy walls. Here is prosperity, building and extending the boundaries of Israel. Does this foresee the expansion of the Gospel? Israel (perhaps spiritual Israel) is to be the center or rallying point, and people will come to her from far places because of the blessings of Jehovah upon her, which they desire. Or, may these travelers be Israel's own scattered children?

13. But judgment as the fruit of their deeds will come before blessing.

F. Final Plea for Israel—Gathered from Many Nations. 7:14-17.

In this passage Micah prays that Jehovah, the Shepherd, as in the glorious days of old, will feed and guide his people, now dwelling secure in the forest. The answer is a promise of miraculous help, as in the exodus from Egypt. Terror will characterize the heathen nations in the presence of these manifestations of God's power, and they will submit themselves to him in humblest fear and reverence. What a contrast to their boasting and arrogance when they taunted the people of Jehovah (cf. Hos 11:10ff.).

G. Doxology: The Triumph of Grace. 7:18-20.

The prophet begins this doxology with a play on his own name, Who is like God? (see Introd., Title), and in grateful praise he bursts forth in this matchless description of Jehovah.

1) The God of forgiving love (v. 18): He pardons (Heb. to lift or bear sin of another, with the idea of forgiveness) iniquity (Heb. crookedness) and . . . passes over (overlooks; cf. Prov 19:11) transgression (Heb. rebellion). Loving-kindness is the active quality of his yearning love.

2) The God of redeeming power (v. 19): He will have tender compassion, even as a mother for her babe, and will cause to cast into depths of the sea our (versus their, AV) sins (so in LXX, Pesh., Vulg.).

3) The God of perpetual faithfulness (v. 20): He will fulfill the covenant he swore to Jacob and Abraham (cf. Gal 3:29).

Who else is or can be such a God? How graciously he meets and satisfies all human needs! Thus the last words we hear from the prophet's lips are those of this wonderful doxology. Such a doxology was possible only because of his faith in God. God had sworn, and he would fulfill his oath (cf. Heb 6:18-20).

NAHUM

INTRODUCTION

Title. As with every prophetic book in the Old Testament, this one bears the name of its author. Nahum (nāḥûm) means "consolation" or "consoler." The nature of the contents of the prophecy is indicated in the title "burden." When used technically among the prophets, it signifies that which is a weight upon the heart of God and also upon the heart of the prophet; that is, a threatening or judgmental message. The sole theme of the book is Nineveh, the ancient capital of the Assyrian Empire.

Date and Authorship. The Book of Nahum is susceptible of dating within the limits of about half a century. From archaeological research it is known that Nineveh fell in 612 B.C. The prediction of Nahum was penned probably shortly before the destruction of the city. Furthermore, in 3:8 the prophet mentions the captivity of No (No-Amon or Thebes, the capital of Upper Egypt) as a historical event. Ashurbanipal of Assyria (668–626 B.C.) brought about the downfall of the Egyptian city in the year 663 B.C. Hence, the book may be dated between 663 B.C. and 612 B.C., probably closer to the latter date. Although nothing is known of Nahum's life, apart from the statement that he was an Elkoshite, no valid evidence has been presented to establish some other person as author of the prophecy. Even the birthplace of the prophet is not known with certainty. Three principal suggestions as to its identity have been advanced. (1) It was a town north of Nineveh. This view is founded on a tradition coming from the sixteenth century. (2) Jerome, translator of the Vulgate version, identified it with a small village in Galilee. It cannot be maintained with certainty that Capernaum (lit., the village of Nahum) was named after the prophet. (3) A third view locates Elkosh in the territory south of Judah. It may well be that Nahum was born in Galilee, and later ministered in the south.

Historical Background. Along with the prophets Jeremiah, Habakkuk, and Zephaniah, Nahum was a witness to the Southern Kingdom. The Northern Kingdom had been carried into captivity by Assyria almost a century before (722/721 B.C.). Now it was in the purpose of God to visit that nation which had been the rod of God's anger upon Israel. Nineveh had genuinely repented in the days of Jonah the prophet, but she was now ready for judgment because of her cruelty and cupidity. She was ruthless in warfare and greedy for dishonest wealth. The power that had ruled western Asia for some three centuries was now to be broken by the combined might of the Babylonians and the Medes.

IV. The hopelessness of Nineveh's condition. 3:11-19.

COMMENTARY

Chapter I.

I. Title. 1:1.

1. The burden of Nineveh. The designation indicates that the prophecy is a weighty message or judicial sentence upon Nineveh (cf. Isa 13:1; Zech 9:1; 12:1). The vision. The Hebrew word (cf. Isa 1:1) is a technical term for an authoritative revelation from God.

II. The Majestic God of Israel. 1:2-8.

2. God is jealous. The prophet, recalling God's past zeal on behalf of His people when threatened by the Assyrians, is assured that He will now be no less concerned for their protection and vindication. When the Scriptures speak of God as 'jealous,' they do not use the word in the sense in which it is used of men. Here it means, rather, that God is zealous to maintain his holiness and righteous government in the world (cf. Ex 20:5; Num 25:11,13). God loves his people, and he must rectify the wrongs perpetrated upon them in the deportation of the kingdom of Israel and the invasion of the kingdom of Judah, both by the Assyrian kingdom. The Lord revengeth. Three times in this verse the prophet declares that God will take vengeance on his enemies. Solemnity and assurance are given to the pronouncement that at long last the righteous God has determined to move out in judgment against his adversaries.

3. Slow to anger. The fact that the vengeance of God is proclaimed with forthrightness, and repeatedly, is no reason to infer that God's decision has been a hasty one; rather, he is long-suffering. It is folly to imagine that the patience of the Lord stems from a lack of power (see Ex 34:6,7). The Lord cannot be prevailed upon to deal with the guilty as though they were innocent. This would be a denial of his nature. In the whirlwind and in the storm. The omnipotence of God is clearly seen in the phenomena of the natural world, those elemental powers which man, even in this day, is powerless to tame or harness (cf. Ex 19:16-18). The clouds are the dust of his feet. God uses the clouds of the heavens as man does the dust of the earth. In the cuneiform literature from Ras Shamra (Ugarit) in Syria, the heathen poets speak of their gods as riding upon the clouds. But only the true God is capable of such feats of power and majesty (cf. Ps 104.3).

4. Rebuketh the sea. At God's command, rivers and seas are dried up, as were the Red Sea and the Jordan (Isa 50:2). Our Lord Jesus manifested this power at the Sea of Galilee (Mt 8:26). Bashan languisheth. In the land of promise Bashan was famous for its rich pastures, Carmel for its vineyards, and Lebanon for its stately forests. But all could wither through drought at the will of the Lord (cf. Isa 33:9; Hos 14:7). 5. The mountains quake. Earthquakes, which level mountains and hills alike, are at the command of God; fire also serves his irresistible purpose. Moreover, any scorched earth policy applied involves those who inhabit the region. 6. Who can stand. If the omnipotent God can so manipulate the forces and phenomena of nature, how can puny man expect to withstand the indignation of the Lord? These rhetorical questions of the prophet suggest their own powerful reply. Rocks are thrown down. Volcanic activity responds to the mighty hand of God.

7. The Lord is good. Lest the contemporaries of the prophet be given the wrong impression of God, as though he were forbidding and austere, Nahum now emphasizes three comforting truths concerning him. First, he is innately and inherently good. He can never be associated with the opposite attribute. Second, he is the incomparable refuge for his own in the time of their distress, "a bulwark never failing," as Luther put it in his Reformation hymn. Third, he knows, in the sense of loving, covenant care, all who have reposed faith in him (cf. Ps 1:6; 144:3). 8. Darkness shall pursue his enemies. God's solicitous care is never to be interpreted as soft sentimentality. The Lord never compromises his truth or his holiness; therefore, his foes will be dealt with in summary fashion. The blow will be a crushing one. This verse anticipates what Nahum discloses concerning Nineveh in the following chapters of the book. Scripture employs the figure of a river overflowing its banks to represent an invading army that overruns a land and spreads desolation in its path (cf. Isa 8:8; 10:5-19). As a matter of historical interest, Ctesias (a Greek historian of the fifth century B.C.) recounts that while a drunken feast was going on in Nineveh, a sudden inundation of the Tigris River swept away the city gates and washed away the foundations of the palace, thus permitting the Babylonian army to enter and burn the city.

III. God's Judgment on Assyria. 1:9-14.

9. What do ye imagine against the Lord? In this portion of the chapter the prophet predicts the overthrow of the Assyrian forces. Nahum's question in his abrupt address implies his astonishment at the audacity of the foreign enemy in their senseless and futile attempt to gain advantage in any matter over the Lord. In brief, the prophet asks, "How can you hope to contend with such a God as Israel has?" (cf. Isa 37:23-29). An utter end. The punishment God would mete out to the Assyrian would be such that He would never need to repeat it. It would be an irreparable blow. 10. As thorns. An agricultural people, like Israel, would easily comprehend the vivid figure of intertwined thorns and fully dry stubble. The former, though outwardly presenting an invincible front, are as powerless to withstand fire as the dry stubble. Drunken as drunkards. What made the Assyrian army easier to overcome, was the fact that they were in the midst of their revelings during the siege of the capital. According to the historian Diodorus Siculus (The Historical Library 2:26), the king and his courtiers were surprised in the midst of their carousings; and the empire fell.

11. One come out of thee. Although some students of the passage prefer not to identify this person specifically, it is generally held that the one who had devised evil against the Lord was Sennacherib of Assyria (705–681 B.C.), the son of Sargon II (the captor of Samaria). He counseled wickedness (lit., belial, "a thing of worthlessness"); it did not succeed under the restraining hand of God (cf. II Kgs 19:22,23). 12. Though they be quiet. Better, Though they be complete (that is, in complete or full strength). In spite of the fact that the Assyrian host was a formidable one (II Chr 32:7), it would be powerless against the people of Israel. Assyria, who had already decimated many peoples, would herself be cut down (lit., shorn) in her defiance of the Lord. He shall pass through. Rather, he shall pass away. As a matter of fact, the Assyrian king, with 185,000 of his men slain in one night, lifted the siege of Jerusalem and retired to Nineveh (II Kgs 19:35,36; Isa 37:36,37). I have afflicted thee. This section of the passage relates to God's dealing with Israel. Though he had permitted the Assyrian force to chasten Israel, he would do so no more (see v. 9, "the second time").

13. Now will I break his yoke. Assyria had succeeded in reducing Judah to a vassal kingdom, required to pay tribute (II Kgs 18:14), but the Lord had determined to liberate his people. The yoke and bonds of the oppressing power were to be broken permanently (see also Isa 14:25). 14. No more of thy name be sown. The prophet now addresses the king of Assyria, and predicts the tragic end of a God-defying life. The dynasty of Sennacherib was to become extinct, a prophecy fulfilled in the suicide of Sennacherib's great-grandson, Saracus, in the last days of the Assyrian Empire. The graven image. Along with the fall of the dynasty would come the end of their temple worship and idolatry. It is known that the Medes, who, with the Babylonians, destroyed the Assyrian Empire, were enemies of idolatry, who gladly demolished the idols of their captives. I will make thy grave. The place of Sennacherib's death is set forth in the Scriptures (II Kgs 19:37; Isa 37:38). While the king was worshiping his gods in the temple, his sons assassinated him. Thou art vile. When weighed in the balances of divine righteousness, the Assyrian monarch was found vile (lit., light; cf. Dan 5:27).

IV. Judah's Deliverance. 1:15.

15. That bringeth good tidings. This verse begins chapter 2 in the Hebrew text; as far as thought connection is concerned, it can equally well be joined to chapter 1. The scene is one in which messengers herald a long-awaited deliverance. The wording parallels that of Isa 52:7. There the prophet was announcing freedom from Babylon; here it is freedom from Assyria. The fall of Nineveh (in 612 B.C.) would be welcome news to the Judeans. Just as God intervened on behalf of Judah and Jerusalem in 701 B.C. and decimated the army of Sennacherib during the reign of godly Hezekiah, so God would soon destroy the Assyrian Empire completely. Keep thy solemn feasts. Manifestly, it was impossible to carry on the religious ceremonies of the Mosaic law during the protracted siege of the Assyrian, and it was difficult during subsequent decades. With the lifting of that crisis and oppression, the city of Jerusalem was to return to its normal religious life. Thy vows. In the hours of trial many of the godly must have made vows to the Lord. When the trial had passed, these promises were to be executed. The wicked. The reference is clearly to the ungodly Sennacherib and his successors on the throne of Assyria (cf. v. 11). They would harass God's people no more. Romans 10:15 applies this passage to the blessed deliverance procured by the Lord Jesus Christ.

Chapter II.

I. A Taunt Song upon Nineveh. 2:1,2.

1. Come up before thy face. In irony and bitter mockery Nahum addresses Nineveh, advising her to put forth every possible effort and to strengthen every fortification in order to withstand the approaching army of the Mede, Cyaxares, and the Babylonian, Nabopolassar. To be sure, all would be unavailing, for the Lord himself had decreed the downfall of Assyria. The sarcasm and mockery serve to bring out the hopelessness of the enemy of Judah in more forceful manner.

2. The excellency of Jacob. By the excellency of Jacob and Israel are meant the land and Temple of God. These, though favored by the Lord, were brought under the divine chastening rod because of Israel's sin. Marred their vine branches. In OT passages the heritage of the Lord is likened to a vineyard (cf. Isa 5 with Ps 80:8-16). It had suffered from the ruthless Assyrian, who plundered seemingly at will.

II. The Siege of Nineveh. 2:3-7.

3. Red. In this portrayal of the capture of Nineveh, the mighty men are the forces of the Medes and Babylonians. They were particularly fond of red (see Ezk 23:14). They made their shields red by painting them or by overlaying them with copper. Calvin suggested that they did this to frighten the enemy by the bright color, and to hide the blood of their wounds, so that the enemy might not be given confidence thereby. Scarlet. Xenophon claimed that this was a favorite color of the Medes, which they used for their military tunics. The chariots shall be with flaming torches. Better, the chariots flash with steel (ASV). Some war chariots flashed with steel because scythes were fixed at right angles to their axles to form what were called scythe-chariots. One can easily imagine how terrifying were these weapons, which could cut down all who resisted the progress of the army. The fir trees shall be terribly shaken. To inject fir trees at this point yields no good sense to the passage. It is probably better to understand that the prophet is describing the brandishing of the cypress spears (so also ASV, contra RSV) by the spearmen in readiness for the conflict.

4. The chariots shall rage in the streets. The Ninevites would not take the invasion of their capital city without bestirring themselves in her defense. The war chariots, summoned to the battle, would rush to and fro in the beleaguered city. The speeding chariots darting hither and thither in the panic would seem like flaming torches as the sun struck them. Their speed, as Nahum saw them in his vision, could best be likened to the flashings of lightning. This is one of the finest descriptions of a siege in literature, if not the finest. It serves no good purpose to see here a reference to the modern automobile, as some do. Such handling of Scripture is not worthy of the serious student of Scripture.

5. His worthies. The Assyrian military leaders, with the king at the head, would call the bravest of the soldiers to the colors. They would respond, strangely enough, at a stumbling pace; they would be caught completely off guard. In their perplexity they would be scant help in the crisis. The wall. In ancient times it was of utmost importance to protect the wall of the city; hence the ablest defenders took their places there. The defence shall be prepared. For defence, read mantelet (so ASV). It was some form of movable protection, under cover of which the defenders could make ready their counterthrust.

6. The gates of the rivers shall be opened. This has been taken to mean that the Assyrians, in possession of the water gates which controlled the river Chaser that flowed through the capital, opened them, so that the buildings were inundated and the palace was finally undermined by the flood. It is more probable that, after holding out in their fortified city for two years, the Assyrians witnessed heavy rains that broke down the walls of the city. When the canals of the Tigris River were opened, the palace was destroyed.

7. Huzzab. Interpreters are still divided as to whether this word is to be taken as a proper noun, or is the verb meaning "it is decreed" (so ASV and RSV marg.). No queen of Nineveh is known by this name, nor an Assyrian goddess. The passage is clear if the verb form is allowed. Led away captive. As God had determined, the city was to go into captivity, while the handmaids, the people of the metropolis, would lament the fall of their beloved city.

III. The Doom of Nineveh. 2:8-10.

8. Of old. Cf. Gen 10:11. Like a pool of water. Some interpreters have taken this statement to mean that the population of Nineveh was a heterogeneous one, like a pool fed from many tributaries, with one objective in mind, to gain wealth. The literal sense is better. The city was like a pool of water in that the dams about the city formed a water barricade. But instead of providing security, they were no help to the people fleeing in panic. Stand, stand. The command of the military leaders to hold their positions against the invaders, would avail nothing in the hour of confusion.

9. Take ye the spoil. The Lord is represented as addressing the victors, calling on them to spoil the city of silver, gold, furniture, and all wealth. The flooding of the city was to be temporary, because of Nineveh's elevated situation above the Tigris. Ancient writers confirm that there were great treasuries accumulated in Nineveh, the results of repeated campaigns by the Assyrian empire builders.

10. Empty, and void, and waste. The once influential and wealthy city is pictured as left desolate, plundered, and completely destroyed. The words of the original convey the idea of emptiness. Heart melteth. Courage has fled, and none has the heart to continue the struggle. The survivors view with sadness and terror the ruin of their once magnificent city.

IV. The Reason for Nineveh's Fall. 2:11-13.

11. Where is the dwelling of the lions. The prophet, looking ahead, tauntingly asks the proud city where its pride has gone, and where its boasted courage has fled. The figure of the lion indicates the greed of the rulers and people. The comparison is quite appropriate, because lions in different forms, with wings and at times with the head of a man, are frequently seen on the Assyrian sculptures. So literally were the predictions of Nahum fulfilled that for centuries armies marched over the site of Nineveh without realizing what lay beneath their feet. 12. The lion did tear in pieces. The unprecedented cruelty of the Assyrians was the reason for their fall under the stroke of God. Assyrian relics reveal how rapacious were their monarchs. They could boast that they made the blood of their enemies to flow on the high places of the mountains. One even declared that he dyed a mountain red with his enemies' blood.

13. I will burn her chariots. God's answer to this series of atrocities was that he would cut off Assyria's chariots, a primary reliance of her forces. Since Assyria delighted in burning the cities of other nations (almost every description of a battle included such a declaration), she would be recompensed in kind. No more be heard. For years the Assyrian kings had demanded tribute of conquered peoples; now the voice of such messengers would be silenced for ever. The people and their position alike would be destroyed.

Chapter III.

I. The Portrayal of the Overthrow. 3:1-3.

1. The bloody city. Nineveh was founded and maintained on murder, bloodshed, and constant warfare. Full of lies and robbery. Within the realm, as well as without, promises were broken and truce-breaking was all too common. Extortion and violence were the order of the day. The prey departeth not. She never ceased to live by plundering and rapine. The later history of Assyria is one of almost uninterrupted warfare.

2. The noise of a whip. As in chapter 2, Nahum describes in vivid terms the siege of the city. The reader can all but hear the noise of the whips urging on the horses, the rattling of the wheels of the war chariots, the leaping of the horses, the jostling of the chariots. He can almost see flashing swords, and the glittering spears; and then death—everywhere.

3. They stumble upon their corpses. In this siege there is no time for decent burial, so important in the ancient world; the living stumble over the heaps of the slain. No passage of Hebrew literature surpasses this for vividness of description.

II. The Moral Failure of Nineveh. 3: 4-7.

4. The mistress of witchcrafts. Nineveh is compared to a well-favored harlot. Such a figure when used of Israel refers to the Jews' idolatry, because they were in covenant relation with God. In the case of Assyria, the harlotry consisted of trafficking in witchcrafts, the occult. Through her cunning ways she made other peoples subject to her. 5. I will discover thy skirts. Nineveh had brought disgrace upon herself; now God would manifest it (cf. Isa 47:3; Ezk 16:37-41). 6. Abominable filth. Refuse, the token of greatest contempt. She would be the gazingstock of all nations. 7. They that look upon thee shall flee from thee. Those who would behold the desolation of the city would flee in terror, not desiring to partake of her miseries. She would be friendless, the object of both scorn and disgust.

III. The Unheeded Warning from No-Amon. 3:8-10.

8. Art thou better than populous No. Nineveh foolishly had not taken the fate of No to heart. God, who is no respecter of persons, had to treat sin in Nineveh as he had done in No. No-Amon or Thebes, the capital of Upper Egypt, flourished during the reigns of the Pharaohs of the Eighteenth, Nineteenth, and Twentieth Dynasties. Even the Greeks and Romans admired its architecture. The Greeks referred to it as Diospolis, "City of God", because the Egyptian counterpart of Jupiter was worshiped there. Situate among the rivers. It was located on both sides of the Nile River. The great Greek poet Homer spoke of it as having one hundred gates. There Amon (or Amun), the chief god of the Egyptians, was worshiped as a figure with a human body and a ram's head.

9. Ethiopia and Egypt were her strength. No-Amon was much better off than Nineveh, for while the latter had alienated her neighboring nations, the former had formed powerful alliances. The Egyptian capital could depend on a supply of strong Ethiopians on her southern border, as well as on the help of the whole land of Egypt. The aid was so large that the prophet terms it infinite. Put and Lubim. In both the Vulgate and the Septuagint versions Put is rendered Libya. However, Put is distinguished from Libya in this passage. Present consensus equates Put with Punt, the present Somaliland in Africa. The Lubim spoken of here are the Libyans (with their capital at Cyrene) of North Africa.

10. Yet was she carried away. In spite of having every geographical and political advantage, No-Amon suffered dismal defeat at the hands of Ashurbanipal of Assyria (cf. Isa 20:3,4). Such atrocities as are mentioned as perpetrated upon the Egyptian city were common in the conquests of that day (see II Kgs 8:12). The fall of No-Amon was recent enough in the time of Nahum to afford an excellent parallel to the judgment soon to be meted out to Nineveh.

IV. The Hopelessness of Nineveh's Condition. 3:11-19.

11. Thou also shalt be drunken. The Lord writes his lessons large on the pages of human history. Nineveh had failed to discern God's warning in the doom of No-Amon. It was not that she would be overtaken in the midst of a drunk orgy, but she would drink to the full the cup of God's wrath. (For the figure, see Isa 51:17,21-23; Jer 25:15-28; Ezk 23:33, 34). Thou shalt be hid. The prophecy was fulfilled to the letter. Nineveh disappeared from the scene of history — until 1842, when the French Botta and the English Layard and Rawlinson uncovered the site of the once famous metropolis.

12. All thy strongholds shall be like fig trees. In the time of desperate need Nineveh found that none of her fortifications helped her withstand the onslaughts of the enemy. The ripe fig is easily gathered, and offers no resistance; so Nineveh would be in the hands of her foes. 13. Women. In their panic the fighting men would afford no more help than terror-stricken women. The gates of thy land shall be set wide open. Once the entrances to the city were left open without proper defense, the enemy would find it an easy task to enter and burn the besieged capital.

14. Draw thee waters. Again Nahum turns from the description of the coming downfall to heap scoffing and scorn upon the wicked city. To hold out in a long siege, water was a prime necessity. The prophet advises her to lay in a goodly supply. Go into clay. The enemy would doubtless bring battering weapons to the walls of the city in order to make breaches in it. Thus bricks would be needed at once to repair the holes in the walls. 15. There shall the fire devour thee. Useless would be all such measures of desperation, for both the fire and sword would bring Nineveh low. Ancient history and modern archaeological findings both attest to the fact that Nahum's prediction came true and the city was destroyed by fire. Like the cankerworm. The locust is well known for its destructive power. Nineveh would appear as though it had been overrun by a locust plague. Then by a quick turn the prophet compares the people of Nineveh to a locust horde. Even if they were as numerous as a horde of locusts, they could not escape what the prophet was foretelling.

16. Thou hast multiplied thy merchants. No one could doubt the pre-eminence of the city commercially. She was one of the great trade centers of the ancient world. Her commerce with other nations, especially Phoenicia, was lucrative. Fleeth away. What had been heaped up for many years by patient and unremitting toil, would be carried off by the foe.

17. Thy crowned are as the locusts. Of how much help would the great military leaders be in the day of calamity? They are likened to swarms of locusts with wings stiffened by the cold, which, after being warmed by the sun's rays, regain strength and vitality and fly away. Locusts in the Middle East are so destructive that the Hebrew language has almost a dozen names for them. Locusts can fly away without leaving a trace, and this feature is utilized here. 18. Thy shepherds slumber. The slumber of death was to be the portion of the king's officials and governors. Upon the mountains. The people of Assyria would be scattered to the mountains north of their land, with no one to reassemble them.

19. No healing of thy bruise. There would be no redress for the loss and destruction suffered by Assyria. No mention is made of a remnant or survivors. Clap the hands over thee. Those who would hear the news of the calamity would rejoice over the fate of the unfeeling empire. They would applaud the retribution that had finally overtaken their oppressor. Thy wickedness. The question is addressed to the king as the representative of the kingdom. The rule of the tyrant came to an inglorious end in 612 B.C., according to the Babylonian Chronicle. The prophecy of Nahum thus concludes with a strong statement of moral cause and effect: wickedness and woe, cruelty and calamity, crime and catastrophe.

HABAKKUK

INTRODUCTION

The Author. Of Habakkuk, himself, nothing is known except what may be inferred from this book which bears his name. He is described as "the prophet," and it is possible, therefore, that he not only had the gift of prophecy but that he was one of a professional group of prophets. Certain musical notations to the psalm in chapter 3 suggest that he may have prophesied in the Temple, like the men who are mentioned in I Chr 25:1.

It is precarious to say much about the prophet's character on the basis of his writing. His name seems to derive from a Hebrew root meaning "to embrace." Jerome (fifth century A.D.) stated that the prophet was called "The Embracer," either because of his love for God or because he wrestled with God. A rabbinical tradition connects the name with II Kgs 4:16 and says that Habakkuk was the son of the Shunammite woman. This is purely fanciful, of course, and unless it be granted that the prophet's name, like that of Jesus, was given in anticipation of his ministry (Mt 1:21), any conjectures as to its meaning, though interesting, are futile. Habakkuk is mentioned in the Apocryphal legend of Bel and the Dragon as rescuing Daniel from the lion's den a second time. No credence need be given to this or to certain other traditions which state that Habakkuk fled to Arabia when Jerusalem fell and returned to Palestine after the Babylonian exile. The stories do, however, point to the approximate time in which the prophet ministered.

Date. The exact time of the writing of the prophecy has been as much a subject of conjecture as has the person of the prophet. Competent scholarship has suggested dates ranging from 650 B.C. (C. F. Keil, Commentary on the Minor Prophets, p. 410) to 330 B.C. (E. Sellin, Introduction to the Old Testament, p. 183). For various reasons the first date seems to be somewhat too early, since it occurs in the time of Assyrian domination of Judah; while the latter date is closely associated with the opinion that the invading hosts described in the first chapter of the prophecy are not the Chaldeans but the Greek forces under Alexander the Great. The most satisfactory conclusion seems to be that the prophecy was written at a time when the Chaldeans or Babylonians were beginning to become restive against the Assyrian power and had, perhaps, even begun to show their strength. To place the writing of the book much later than this would be to assume that the prophecy is not really a prediction of the invasion of Judah by the Chaldeans but a reference to what had already taken place and is merely an explanation of the presence of the Babylonians in the westlands as the instruments of the Lord. The best conclusion seems to be that the prophecy was written toward the end of the reign of Josiah (640–609 B.C.), preferably after the destruction of Nineveh by the combined forces of the Babylonians, Medians, and Scythians in 612 B.C. This time seems plausible for two reasons. One is that the prophet seems surprised to learn that the Chaldeans are God's choice to punish disobedient Judah; after all, was not good King Josiah pro-Babylonian in his political sympathies in that he sought to hinder Pharaoh-necho's march to fight against the Babylonians in 609 B.C.? The other reason is that the rise of Chaldean power would be sufficiently evident that the prophet's description would have meaning for his hearers. Certainly the book should be dated before 605 B.C., when Nebuchadnezzar made his first invasion of Palestine and took Daniel and others as captives to Babylon.

Problem of Chapter 3. It has sometimes been argued that chapter 3, which is a psalm, was not written by Habakkuk. The musical notations found in the chapter point to its being designed for use in the temple worship. This has led some scholars who prefer to think that the temple worship attained comparative purity and an advanced theology only in the period after the Exile to date the psalm in the post-Exilic period. Further support to the argument seems to be found in the fact that the Habakkuk commentary found among the Qumran Scrolls makes no reference to the third chapter of Habakkuk. This apparent ignorance of Habakkuk 3 may be explained, however, by the fact that the writers of the commentary were attempting to explain the first two chapters not in terms of a Chaldean invasion but in terms of the events of their own day. They did not then find the psalm of Habakkuk germane to their purpose. The use of liturgical annotations in Hebrew poetic literature can scarcely be deciding evidence in favor of post-Exilic origin of any writing. Since some of the oldest of the Psalms bear such annotations, it seems that they were a part of such literature considerably before the Exile.

Uniqueness of the Book. Because the contents of the third chapter provide a triumphant climax to the problems posed in the first two chapters, we have in the whole book a theodicy. The structure of this prophecy is unique in the Old Testament, as is the theological content. In the first two chapters there is a dialogue between the Lord and the prophet, in which the latter not only complains of evil, as do some of the Psalmists, but even challenges the Lord to indicate how He, the Holy One, can tolerate such evil. This dialogue is to be thought of as transpiring in the realm of vision (cf. 1:1 and 2:2). The third chapter is a prayer, in which the prophet begins by asking the Lord to accomplish in history the purpose which he has announced, to make His work live in the midst of the years. Following upon this prayer, Habakkuk is granted a vision of God exerting His power and manifesting His glory in the earth somewhat in the same fashion as He did in the Exodus experiences at Mount Sinai. The result of the vision is mingled fear and confidence on the part of the prophet.

COMMENTARY

I. Introduction 1:1.

The burden. Many prophetic utterances are described as "burdens," particularly where there is an announcement of an ominous or threatening character. Here the prophet deplores the approaching subjugation and devastation of his own people, so that there is a foreboding aspect as far as they are concerned. At the same time the burden is against the proud Chaldeans, whose might is their god (1:11). Did see. The word ḥāzâ, "see," a term somewhat technical, indicates that this is a revelation. The Spirit of God impresses the message upon the inner consciousness of the prophets with as much force and vividness as if they had seen something with the physical eye. In I Kgs 22:17 Micaiah says, "I saw all Israel scattered . . . "

II. The Prophet's Complaint of Unchecked Violence in Judah. 1:2-4.

2. How long. Apparently the prophet had been distressed for some time about the state of affairs in Judah. Through experience he had found that the people seemed to have no conscience, and undoubtedly he had prayed God to correct such wickedness, for he states that he had cried to the Lord. Thou wilt not hear. It should not be assumed that the prophet doubted that the Lord had heard his cry (in the sense that the Lord was aware). He took it for granted that God's hearing would involve God's responding. As yet his prayer had been unavailing (cf. Ps 22:1,2). Violence. The reference is to wild or ruthless wickedness. The question is, Who is responsible for it? It is assumed here that it is the violence of the Judeans. There are those who believe that, because the same word is used in 2:8 and 2:17 to describe the Chaldeans, the violence of which the prophet complains was that of the Chaldeans. Since, however, they were to be the means of punishment and were about to be raised up, they cannot be thought of as the perpetrators. Neither was the violence that of the Assyrian overlord who had controlled Judah for some time, since a part of the prophet's complaint is the fact that the law is slacked and judgment perverted (v. 4). These two words usually have reference in the OT to the Mosaic code, and it seems, therefore, that the violence consisted of the acts of cruelty and injustice which pervaded public and private life in Judah.

3. Why dost Thou show me iniquity, and at mischief Thou thyself lookest? The Lord's apparent unconcern with the distressing situation was bewildering to the prophet. God had not only permitted the prophet to see iniquity, but had, Himself, looked upon it and had apparently been indifferent or inactive. What concerned Habakkuk was that since God is holy he could not understand how God can look upon mischief complacently. The prophet's strong expostulation, therefore, is really an expression of faith. His indignation had been aroused by the sight of abounding sin, and his confidence in a holy God told him that God must do something about it. Strife and contention. These terms point to animosity between members of the Judean community. The Assyrian overlords did not mingle with the local residents. They merely demanded political subjection and a tax, which was collected from the king. These two words, therefore, support the conclusion that the wickedness of which the prophet was complaining was that of his own people.

4. The law is slacked. The law here is the Divine law as expressed in the Mosaic code. The law, as Delitzsch says, is "revealed law in all its substance which was meant to be the soul, the heart, of the political, religious, and domestic life." The two Hebrew verbs translated in the AV slacked and go forth indicate that the contention in Judah was such that law and order were paralyzed. God's rule was a dead issue. Judgment. A judgment is a legal decision based upon precedent or customary law. It, therefore, often means the equivalent of our English common law. The point is that anything which could really be called judgment did not exist and that which went by the name of judgment was a perversion of it. There was no security in public life for person or property. That such a state of affairs existed during the reign of Jehoakim is indicated in Jer 26:1—27:11. The wicked doth compass about the righteous. The righteous man finds himself surrounded by wickedness and godless people. It was a sad condition which presented itself to the prophet's view. God's law was despised everywhere. Even those who ought to have defended the cause of justice and truth were, themselves, given to crookedness. The godly found themselves hopelessly outnumbered and overpowered, so that their testimony was of little use. Surely God could not long endure such things among His people!

III. The Lord's Answer: The Chaldean Is His Instrument of Punishment. 1:5-11.

5. Behold ye among the nations (ASV; AV, heathen). The prophet has expressed amazement that God should so long permit the faults of Judah to go unpunished. The Lord's answer is that he has an instrument at hand which he is about to use. It will be even more amazing than his forbearance has been. The words are addressed in the plural, since God is speaking not to the prophet alone, but rather through him to all the people. The Apostle Paul, quoting from the LXX on this verse, applies the principle of God's dealings in Habakkuk's day to the situation in the church in his own day (Acts 13:41). No doubt God's work of calling the Gentiles into his church would be just as astonishing as his work of using the Babylonian armies to punish Judah. The language of the verse justifies the conclusion that at the time of the prophecy Babylon was not thought of as the great world power. The prophet's hearers were to look among the nations because it was from among them that there would arise the work of God which would be a just recompense to a sinful people. Be astonished and wonder (AV, wonder marvelously). There can be little excuse for those who give no heed, for as Calvin remarks, "He tells them twice to see and twice exhorts them to be astonished." Ye would not believe though it be told. They would not believe that catastrophe could overtake them by Divine determination. They had a false sense of security, thinking that being the chosen people of God was purely a matter of external relation. Under the reign of Josiah there had been a return to the prescribed ceremonies of the Temple, but not necessarily a return to the Lord who dwelt in the Temple. Ceremonialism readily becomes a foe of true spirituality. Israel was ever ready to say, "The temple of the Lord, the temple of the Lord, the temple of the Lord, are these" (Jer 7:4).

6. God now begins to describe at length the nation through which he will punish Judah, the Chaldeans. While this word usually has reference to the Neo-Babylonian empire, which reached its zenith under Nebuchadnezzar in the sixth century B.C., there are indications that, as a group, the Chaldeans were very ancient. Jeremiah 5:15 describes them as a primeval people or ancient nation. They probably had had a loosely knit tribal organization in earlier times, as many Semitic groups did, and gradually infiltrated into Babylon from the outer fringes of the Mesopotamia Valley. Eventually they gained the ascendancy in the city of Babylon. And Merodach-Baladan, who tried to establish the independence of Babylon from Assyria in the days of Hezekiah, was a Chaldean. The Neo-Babylonian or Chaldean empire was established under the leadership of Nabopolassar, a Chaldean general in the Assyrian forces. The most illustrious monarch of the Chaldeans was Nebuchadnezzar, who is described in Ezr 5:12 as "the Chaldean." I am raising up. The Chaldeans were about to be raised up, not merely as a political power, but to perform a special part of the Divine plan. This is the answer to the prophet's question, "How long?" Bitter and hasty nation. The two words point to a ferocious and swift campaign. The Chaldeans had not lost these characteristics in Daniel's time, for he saw the Babylonian empire in vision as a lion having the wings of an eagle (Dan 7:4).

7. Their dignity shall proceed of themselves. The coming conqueror would be arrogant and imperious. He would acknowledge no authority higher than himself and, in effect, would deny God. In character and mien the Chaldean empire was to resemble all later world empires.

8. Evening wolves. This expression is found a number of times in the OT (see Gen 49:27; Jer 5:6; Zeph 3:3). Evening wolves are probably those which have hunted all day without success and are the more ravenous as evening draws on. War is to the invader as the seizing of prey is to a wild beast — a savage delight. They shall fly as the eagle, or better, perhaps, as the vulture. There is some evidence that a careful distinction was not always made between the eagle and the vulture. In Mt 24:28 the words of Jesus are translated, "For wheresoever the carcase is, there will the eagles be gathered together." The eagle is not a scavenger, but the vulture is. Vultures are also known for their ability to see or scent food from great distances. They fly very swiftly to secure it, and in eating it they tear it voraciously.

9. As the east wind. In Palestine the wind from the east blows in from the desert, gathering sand in its path. Such winds were the terror of the inhabitants of Palestine because they blasted the crops and were very destructive.

10. They shall heap dust, and take it. This is, no doubt, a reference to the raising of earthworks by means of which city walls could be overthrown or successfully bridged. Many ancient inscriptions depict such activity.

11. Then shall he change as a wind (AV, his mind change). Here the prophet resumes the metaphor of verse 9 and indicates that the advance of the Chaldeans might be stopped locally by such a thing as a stronghold. But, like the wind, he would quickly overcome it, change his direction, and pass on. But he is guilty, imputing his power unto his god. A ray of hope shone through the gloom, and, for those who trusted God, there was a real hope. However successful the invader might be, he would be guilty before God, and though he would be God's instrument to punish the guilty in Judah, he, himself, would in due time come under Divine judgment.

IV. A Second Problem: The Chaldeans Are More Wicked than the Judeans. 1:12–2:1.

12. It has been suggested that there was an interval of time between the answer of verses 2-11 and the question of verses 12-17. In this interval, supposedly, the Chaldeans had been in Judah and had proved themselves worse than the people they were sent to punish. They had outraged the laws of humanity. Nothing in the text, however, indicates that any period of time elapsed. The prophet has envisioned the Chaldeans as a swift horde gathering captives as one sweeps up sand. The imagery of verses 12-17 suggests a fisherman using every possible means to gather a rich catch. It may be, then, that the prophet's expostulation arose out of what he believed must surely happen if such a vengeful instrument should be used by God. No doubt Habakkuk was distressed not only over the destruction of Judah, but also because the chastisement which was to come upon the wicked in his own country would fall as equally and inevitably upon the faithful. From everlasting. The eternity of God in his dealings with the covenant people from of old is often the ground of confidence for believers (cf. Isa 40:28; Ps 90:2). The accumulation of vocatives, O Lord my God, mine Holy One is similar to those expressions of deep trust which are found so often in the Psalms. What is meant by Holy One is brought out in verse 13. We shall not die. Pusey rightly says that this is the lightning thought of faith. The words of men in moments of crisis often indicate their real and inmost convictions. The use of the pronoun we should be understood to point to the remnant, who are called "the righteous" (1:2-13), or those who live by their faithfulness (2:4).

13. Of purer eyes than to behold evil. God cannot regard iniquity with complacency or toleration, let alone favor. It is not only the outrages of the Chaldeans which are described. God is too pure of eyes to behold any evil. He could not hold his peace at either the violence of the Chaldeans or that which was found in Judah. It was because the prophet had taken for granted that God is pure by nature that there could be any problem for him at all. One who questions the omnipotence of the Lord, or any other of His attributes, would say that God's justice is irreconcilable with such evil, and therefore, either God is not just, or He is not omnipotent. The prophet, however, asked two questions: Why is it so? How long shall it be so? And it was of God, himself, that he sought an answer. At the same time, the problem remained that the godly portion of the nation would have to suffer when the ungodly were punished.

14. Makest men as the fishes of the sea. Here the Lord is said to do what he permits to be done by others. As a result of God's seeming indifference to destruction, men become like fish caught from the sea by a fisherman who uses every conceivable means – fishhook, net, drag (v. 15) – to increase his catch. One commentator says that this thought is the reverse of that of Jesus, who declared even the sparrows to be under God's care. Only a belief in an absolutely comprehensive Providence can produce a statement such as the prophet makes here, however.

16. They sacrifice unto their net. The reference is probably not to any actual practice, although the Scythians are said to have offered animal sacrifices to a scimitar in honor of their god of war. What is meant is that the Babylonians ascribed divine honors to their weapons and, therefore, to themselves. They worshiped and served the creature more than the Creator.

With 2:1, the prophet's expostulation comes to an end. It was not in skepticism that he had presented his complaint to God, but in faith, for he was now prepared to wait upon the Lord, assured that an answer would come. The assertion sometimes made that Habakkuk is the first example in Scripture of an honest doubter is entirely without warrant. Nothing in the language of the prophecy betrays any element of doubt. Indeed, the prophecy ends on a note of sublime faith. It is one thing to face the problems that confront everyone who believes in a good and omnipotent God and ask why things are so, or how they can be so. It is something quite different to question the Divine goodness or justice, or the very existence of God, simply because one cannot answer these questions.

2:1. Watchtower. Several interpreters understand an actual tower or elevation, citing the examples of Moses (Ex 33:21), or Balaam (Num 22:41), and of Elijah at Sinai (Mt. Horeb, I Kgs 19:8ff.). None of these cases is really comparable to that of Habakkuk, who may be using only a figure of speech. Certainly he must have prepared himself by prayerful meditation to receive the Divine answer. Jeremiah waited ten days for an answer to his inquiry (Jer 42:7). Probably some interval of time elapsed between the expostulation of chapter 1 and the answer received. Habakkuk records only his determination to wait for an answer; he does not tell us when it came.

V. The Lord's Second Answer: The Purpose Is Certain, and Faith Will be Rewarded. 2:2-4.

These three verses contain what is perhaps the most difficult section of the prophecy, both from the standpoint of translation and from that of interpretation.

2. Write the vision. Whether or not the prophet actually wrote the vision on tablets for public reading has been disputed, but it is agreed by all that he was told to record the vision. The purpose of recording is twofold: that he may run who reads; the vision is for an appointed time and must be preserved so that its truth may be proved. Upon tablets (ASV). Different kinds of materials were used to make records, since the Jews had contacts with all the Near Eastern cultures. Isaiah and Jeremiah both used scrolls, yet Isaiah was also told to use a tablet (Isa 30:8). It may reasonably be supposed that Habakkuk made a record of his vision on a clay tablet, which he brought to the attention of many persons. In order that he may run. The matter was to be made so clear that whoever read it might run and publish it. In Dan 12:4, also, the words "many shall run to and fro" seem to point to a publication of information, since it is added that knowledge shall increase.

3. For the appointed time . . . at the end. The fulfillment of the vision was to take place in God's own good time. Since the same two words are used in Dan 8:19, some have concluded that it is the end time, or latter days, that are meant. Here the words refer to the design of God with respect to the Chaldeans. We may, however, understand that the vision concerns the destruction of ungodly world power, of which Babylon was the existing manifestation, and that only Messiah's day would see a final fulfillment of such a promise. It hasteth . . . shall not lie (ASV). God's purposes are hastening to fulfillment, though in human estimation there may seem to be unnecessary delays. John Calvin says: "This is the true sacrifice of praise, when we restrain ourselves and remain firm in the persuasion that God cannot deceive nor lie, though he may seem for a while to trifle with us." It will surely come. The Hebrew idiom used here has been translated literally by the Greek version (the LXX), coming he shall come. The reference is to the certainty of the event. The writer of the Epistle to the Hebrews, using the LXX, has adapted the text to the promise of the second coming of Christ, an event equally certain in God's plan, though it may seem in the eyes of men to be unduly delayed. Thus we read in Heb 10:37, "he that cometh shall come."

4. A clear understanding of this verse is of great importance to the Christian. Of the OT passages quoted in the NT, this one occurs three times in very vital contexts. It should be noted that where the verse is used in the NT it is represented as an unchanging principle of the Lord's relation to his people, not as a prediction of events to take place in the NT dispensation. In Habakkuk, the Divine answer is intended to stimulate the hope and confidence of those who are spiritually the children of God, while it spells the doom of Chaldean world power.

Puffed up (ASV). To say that it is the Chaldean, in distinction from the Jew, who is described is too simple an answer. But since the vision is an answer to the question of 1:12-17, the Chaldean is the one primarily in view.

By his faithfulness (AV, faith). One minor problem is: Is it the man who is justified by faith who lives, or is the just man to live by faith? Paul's usage seems to stress the former meaning, though the tenor of his writings allows for the latter. At any rate, the apostle uses the word "to live" with particular force. It does not mean merely to survive, but to live eternally in the grace of God.

A more important question is whether the Hebrew 'ĕmûnâ should be translated as "faith" or "faithfulness." In most places in the OT where it is used it has the second meaning, for example, in II Kgs 12:15; Jer 5:1. It is, however, worth noticing that the root of this word has already been used in Hab 1:5 in the sense of giving credence to God's word or promise. Moreover, faithfulness, even as an aspect of a man's character, does not occur in the void. Faithfulness must be exercised in relation to someone or something. In this case the individual is to be faithful to God, to God's word and covenant. He must rely firmly upon, or have a deep-rooted trust in God himself. The NT use is in complete agreement with this.

It may be pointed out, also, that it may be best to enrich our idea of the NT meaning of "faith" from the OT. Faith is not mere consent to a proposition about God as revealed in Jesus Christ his Son. It is the opposite of swelling pride, of self-trust. It is humility before God, a readiness to conform to his will. It is a conviction that he cannot lie nor fail (2:3), a reliance in spite of outward circumstances (3:17). A deeply religious man such as Habakkuk can scarcely have failed to think of Abraham and to recall that it was said of him that he believed the Lord and it was reckoned to him for righteousness.

Shall live. Undoubtedly in this prophecy the idea of survival is present. Nevertheless, in view of the spiritual relationships involved, this is not the only idea. The real meaning is well brought out by Abraham's request in Gen 17:18, using the same verb, "O that Ishmael might live before thee." To live means not only to have security or protection in this life, but to enjoy the loving-kindness of God, which is better than life. It is to be dear to him, the object of his care.

There remain two questions in connection with Paul's use of Hab 2:4 in Rom 1:17 and Gal 3:11. Does not the apostle use the word "faith" in the distinct sense of an antithesis to law-works as a means of acceptance with God? This antithesis is not present in Habakkuk. Moreover, is not the faith of which Paul speaks a faith in the Messiah, of whom no mention is made in Habakkuk?

It must be acknowledged at the outset that Paul had no intention of teaching that justification by faith in Christ was set forth by the prophet. He does teach, however, that a definite principle has been laid down in Scripture with respect to the relationship of man to God and that this principle operates most clearly in the realm of man's legal standing before God. To put the matter in other words, Habakkuk had laid down a principle by which faithfulness, that is, humble, steadfast reliance upon God's word, was declared to be the instrument to bring about the well-being and security of the covenant people. Paul declares that the same instrument is the means of attaining to justification before God. In doing so he does not in any way deflect the idea of faithfulness, or faith, from its true meaning. Indeed, if many modern evangelical preachers would give to the word "faith" the meaning which the Hebrew word bears, there would be less superficiality in the profession and practice of Christianity.

On the other hand, it must also be acknowledged that Paul, in comparison with Habakkuk, enlarges infinitely the scope of the word "live," for he applies it to the life to come, to the sphere of salvation or eternal well-being in distinction from merely temporal well-being. That the apostle is justified in doing so will readily be granted by Christians, since the NT writers employ many forms and figures of the OT with a fullness of meaning far transcending that which they had for the believers of the older dispensation. Finally, the antithesis between the principle of active faith and that of meritorious law-works as a means of salvation is, of course, a part of the apostle's own argument. It is a logical development from the nature of faith itself.

VI. Five Woes upon Iniquity, Whether Jewish or Chaldean. 2:5-20.

5. Wine is a treacherous dealer. The Hebrew word yayin, "wine," constitutes a problem because it appears in the text as subject of the verb. The LXX interprets it figuratively as the conceited man. Some commentators change the consonants to produce another word, "the oppressor." The Qumran Commentary supports the Hebrew text, however. Probably the meaning is that the conduct of the treacherous dealer is like that which wine produces. We are reminded of the words of Kipling's "Recessional":

"If, drunk with sight of power, we loose Wild tongues that have not Thee in awe."

Enlargeth his desire as hell (she'ôl). Sheol, the abode of the departed, is envisioned as a rapacious creature anxious to swallow humanity.

6. All these. The reference is to the nations and peoples mentioned in verse 5. Parable. The Hebrew word means a resemblance, from which it takes on the sense of a parable. Since, however, there is no parable in this chapter, the word must be understood as the equivalent of taunting proverb. Thick clay. Or pledges (ASV; RSV). The word used here occurs nowhere else in Scripture, but the latter translation is the better one. The significance lies in the Hebrew abhorrence of the usurer and in the Levitical laws against taking pledges of greater value than were needed for security. The Chaldean had robbed the poor, hoarding all he could gain in an illegal fashion.

7. That shall bite thee, could more accurately be translated thy debtors, thus carrying out the idea of the debtor-creditor relationship. The Chaldean, though acting as the creditor, was really the debtor of all; and his turn would come to be shaken to and fro, or vexed (cf. Mt 18:28).

8. The people shall spoil thee. The Babylonians were to be recompensed in the ratio of an eye for an eye and a tooth for a tooth. The law of retaliation which runs through the OT from Gen 9:6 onward is not intended as a rule of revenge but as a principle of justice. Men shall receive the punishment they deserve.

While the Chaldean has been the subject of the first "woe," the woes declared in the remainder of the chapter, verses 9-20, apply more universally, and certainly include the sins of Judah and Israel. To have confined the Divine condemnation to Israel's foes only would have been to confirm in a sense of carnal security the sinners of whom Habakkuk had originally complained.

9. Getteth an evil gain (ASV). Here the extortionist and the grafter are condemned. Basically, of course, it was not specific acts alone which were wicked, but the aims and tendencies of the soul from which they flowed. Nest on high. The eagle and vulture build their nests on high, inaccessible crags. To hope to secure happiness and permanence through dishonest accumulation of power and possessions is to attempt to "set" one's nest "on high." On the other hand, the Lord is the dwelling-place of believers in all generations.

10. Thou hast counselled (AV, consulted) shame. The Chaldean and others had not actually planned confusion for themselves; rather, God would turn to shame what they had contrived. They had, therefore, sinned against their own souls, though it may have appeared that they had sinned chiefly against others.

12. Buildeth a town with blood. Similar expressions in Mic 3:10 and Jer 51:8 point to the fact that the sins of Judah as well as those of Babylon are involved here. In fact, there may very well be here a reference to the misrule of Jehoiakim (cf. Jer 22:13). Strenuous building activities were usually the efforts of the monarch toward self-glorification. In blood [s]. This is a frequent expression meaning blood-guiltiness or strong guilt.

13. Is it not of the Lord. The ultimate cause of the failure of human plans and programs is the sovereign providence of God. It is not restricted in its application to the destruction of Babylon. The terms used are very general and include all who stand opposed to the will of God and his kingdom. The Lord of hosts is not simply the God of battles and, therefore, the one in whom ultimate victory for the Jews is found. He is the Lord of all the hosts of the universe and is able to do his will among the armies of heaven and the inhabitants of earth. Labour in (for) the . . . fire. They will take in hand unprofitable work.

14. The earth shall be filled. Many have considered this verse to be a prediction either of the Gospel era or of the Millennial kingdom of Christ. Unlike Isaiah's prediction, Isa 11:9, which foretells a time when men shall know God, being brought into intimate fellowship with him, this verse says that there will be a manifestation of the glory of the Lord. The reference is to God's power and majesty as these are displayed in judgment against ungodliness and the foes of his people (cf. Num 14:21-23; Ps 97). As water fills the sea in overflowing abundance, so the glory of God shall be manifested to all men in fullest measure.

15. That giveth his neighbour drink. A comparison with several other OT passages, such as Jer 25:15,16; Isa 51:17; Ps 75:8, shows that this statement is not to be taken literally. The concept is that of inducing a state of humiliation and helpless prostration like that of a drunk person. Their nakedness. Sensual lust is used as a metaphor for barbarous lust for power. The use of these figures implies, of course, a strong condemnation of the personal acts which supply the figures.

16. This verse promises that the Chaldean would suffer at the Lord's hand the same kind of shameful exposure which he himself had inflicted on others. Be as one uncircumcised (ASV). To be in such a condition was to be an object of scorn to God's people (Jud 14:3; 15:18; I Sam 17:26) and to be unfit to come before God. The cup of the Lord's hand shall come unto thee. This is not a conviction that somehow right must prevail, or that injustice will be punished in the natural order of things. It is a philosophy of history in which God judges nations and the downfall of empire is the outworking of his will.

17. Violence of (done to) Lebanon. Successive monarchs from several nations had cut down the timbers of Lebanon, hunted its wild beasts, and killed its cattle. In this instance Lebanon is a name used to describe Judea, as it is also in Jer 22:6,23; Zech 10:10; 11:1.

18. Teachers of lies. In what sense may idols, which are said to be dumb, be also teachers of lies? As Calvin remarks, they allured simple souls. They were instruments for deluding men. The image, said Matthew Poole, "was the product of his [man's] art and yet the hope of his soul."

19. That saith to the wood, Awake . . . The language is obviously mockery, like that of Elijah in taunting the priests of Baal. A Babylonian inscription to Bel reads, "How long will the lord who sleeps still sleep?"

20. In his holy temple. While scholars of many shades of theological opinion identify the holy temple as the sanctuary in Jerusalem, a comparison of Ps 11:4; 18:6,9; II Sam 22:7,10 shows that the expression is used with specific reference to heaven. In view of the fact that all the earth is commanded to be silent before the Lord, this conclusion seems best. Keep silence. The Hebrew has a strong imperative, has! very like our expression Hush! Believers, especially, will possess their souls in quietness and confidence, for God has promised that even though the vision tarry, it will surely come.

VII. A Vision of Divine Judgment. 3:1-16.

This chapter is called by the writer a prayer (t^{e}pillâ), though it is universally agreed that the major part of it is the description of a theophany experienced by the prophet. Only verse 2 is a petition. Yet the attitudes of reverent fear, of awe, of faith triumphant over disturbing circumstances are so much in the spirit of prayer that there can be little doubt that the "prayer" includes the whole chapter. The chapter is also called a psalm – though not by Habakkuk – since instructions are given in the heading as to the way it is to be sung, and the subscription tells what instruments are to accompany the singing. Also, the enigmatical Selah, which customarily marks periodical pauses, or perhaps changes of tempo, appears three times.

For various reasons, as has already been mentioned in the Introduction, this chapter has been thought to have been written by someone other than Habakkuk. This would mean, of course, that 3:1, which ascribes the chapter to him is incorrect. The fact that the third chapter does not appear in the Qumran Commentary is no real objection. Neither is the argument that this passage does not have the dialogue form of the previous sections. The very nature of the chapter, which is a prayer, precludes the dialogue style. There are some linguistic evidences to confirm the unity of the book as well as the fact that the theodicy is incomplete without this chapter.

1. Upon Shigionoth. The meaning of the word is so uncertain that the safest course is to transliterate it. The Latin Vulgate renders it pro ignorantiis, "for sins done in ignorance." There is no suggestion in the prophecy that either the sins of Judah or those of the Chaldeans could be thought of as being committed in ignorance. Probably the word indicates the type of music or the tempo in which the psalm may be sung when used in worship.

2. Thy speech, or report. The report is that act of Divine judgment which will likely bring suffering upon Habakkuk and those bound to him by common ties of faith and love. It is the judgment announced in chapter 1.

The rendering of the AV in this verse is not altogether satisfactory. The following translation is suggested:

O Lord, I have heard thy report,
I have feared, O Lord, thy work:
In the midst of the years make it live,
In the midst of the years make it known;
In wrath remember mercy.

Make it live. Though the English versions translate the Hebrew as revive or renew, the prophet is not asking that God should repeat what was done in the great days of old. The verb is used elsewhere with a causative force, e.g., Gen 7:3; 19:32; Deut 32:39, where the meaning is to preserve alive, or to call into existence. God is asked to put his work, that is, his declared program, into operation, to make it a living action. That such is the case is confirmed by the parallelism, "in the midst of the years make it known." Thy work is then the purpose announced in 1:5, together with the judgments pronounced in chapter 2.

In the midst of the years. An older commentator, Bengel, states that this verse points to the birth of Christ and the Christian era. God's work is to be done at a time which divides history, the Old Testament from the New. This proposal has not found ready acceptance. Habakkuk is asking that in the course of the years just ahead God may both chastise and heal.

Some have felt that verses 3-15 describe a theophany, or a manifestation of the Deity to the prophet. Others think that it is simply a poetic recital of the works of God with an Exodus motif, that is, employing the patterns of Divine activity at the time of the Exodus. There is no reason to think that Habakkuk had the kind of theophanic experience given to Abraham. At the same time these verses are more than a poetic celebration.

While the language seems to draw upon the Exodus and subsequent accounts of the dealings of God with Israel, there is also a good deal of originality in the description. The prophet speaks, for example, of mountains as writhing and crumbling and also of a display of brilliant splendor that filled the earth and sky. It is best to think of the entire panorama of cosmic disturbances which are the result of God's presence as being in the prophet's vision.

3. From Teman . . . Paran. Paran was the wilderness area west of the Arabah and near the traditional site of Mount Sinai. Teman was the rocky fortress-capital of Edom, but the name also designates the territory east of Paran. God is represented as approaching in judgment from the district where Israel had not only experienced his redemptive grace but had entered into covenant with him. These were also the districts in which some of the unbelieving generation perished. His praise. Praise, here, refers not to that which is uttered by earth's inhabitants, but rather to the excellence of God which deserves the praise of all creation.

4. Horns out of his hand. The Hebrew word "horns" is also used to describe rays of light, which latter meaning seems obvious here. These rays emanated from either side. The center from which the sunlike brightness came was the hiding place of God's power.

5. Pestilence and flame are phenomena which accompany the approach of the Lord as lightning and thunder accompany an approaching storm. Perhaps the prophet saw the animate creation as withering before God, as though smitten by a blighting wind. Behind him the path was charred as though seared by flame.

6. He stood. Jehovah halted his advance so that he might survey the land, to determine the kind and degree of judgment to be administered. God's mere touching of the mountains crushed and shook them. There is an a fortiori argument here. If the very rocks and hills which have defied the ravages of time sink into nothingness at the touch of the Lord's feet, or the glance of his eye, then who shall abide the day of his anger?

7. Cushan. It is commonly assumed that Cushan is Ethiopia. It is, however, more logical to suppose that Cushan was a part of the territory over which the Midianites roamed, and that it was from here that Zipporah, Moses' wife, who is called a Cushite, came.

8. Is the Lord displeased with rivers? The question is a rhetorical one, calculated to turn the mind to the real reason for the Lord's visitation -- salvation. The Divine salvation constitutes, it may be assumed, the kind of deliverance for which the prophet has prayed in chapter 1. It will include deliverance from the violence and mischief with which the godly are surrounded, so that the law will no longer be "slacked." The salvation is not synonymous with that which is offered in our Lord Jesus Christ, though in several respects it is a foreshadowing of the Messianic work.

9. The oaths of the tribes, even thy word. Of all the clauses in the entire prophecy, this is probably the most difficult to explain. As it stands, it must be an interpolation, meaning that Judah's only hope is in God's covenant promise, particularly of the Sinaitic or Mosaic Covenant. In one small group of ancient manuscripts this phrase reads, "thou dost fill thy quiver with shafts," which makes good sense but does not have support in the best Hebrew manuscripts.

10. The deep . . . lifted up his hands. In his vision the prophet saw huge waves mounting in the sea, and was reminded of the gestures of a terror-stricken man.

11. Sun and moon stood still. The two orbs which give light to the earth and govern its time seemed to stand aghast, along with the rest of creation, at the splendor of the Lord as he appeared in judgment. They looked pale by comparison with the light of God's arrows and his glittering spear.

12. Thou didst march. The Lord marched through the earth as a triumphant conqueror, trampling upon the nations as the peasant thresh[ed] his grain by trampling upon it. 13. Salvation of . . . (with) thine anointed. The anointed must be the faithful remnant among the covenant people. In OT times they were not all Israel who were of Israel (Rom 9:6). God's deliverance is extended to the people who look for the consolation of Israel in the person of her Messianic king.

13. The foundation even unto the neck, or rock. Apparently the text should read rock. The two words are very similar in Hebrew. The figure is that of the conqueror's tearing away the foundation down to the rock. The house of the wicked is utterly demolished.

16. When I heard. Though the vision had been seen, its import had been heard, or grasped, by the prophet. Cf. Isa 55:3, "hear, and your soul shall live." The prophet knew full well what God's going forth in judgment must mean to himself and the people among whom he lived. The immediate effect upon him was one of tremendous astonishment, as the excitement of the internal organs indicates. The ultimate effect, however, was that of assured faith. As Calvin states, "He who in time anticipates the wrath of God and is touched with fear, as soon as he hears that God the judge is at hand, provides for himself the most secure rest for the day of afflictions."

VIII. The Triumph of Faith. 3:17-19.

17. The mention of the fig tree, the grapevine, the olive, the grain, and flocks covers the entire range of agricultural produce upon which the nation was dependent. Presumably the reason for the failure of the crops would be the Chaldean invasion. Enemy troops not only lived off the land but often deliberately destroyed trees and crops. An early Egyptian chronicle boasts that the Egyptian soldiers had ruined the fruit trees in one of the coastal plains of Palestine.

18. Yet I will exult in the Lord. The ruination so vividly described drives the prophet not to despair but to faith in his Lord.

19. My feet like hinds', i.e., gazelles' feet. The gazelle is both swift and surefooted, so that it readily escapes pursuers. The picture is that of one who is supremely confident that he who leads his people into trials is faithful and will with each trial make also a way of escape, that they may be able to bear it.

To the chief musician. This prayer was evidently intended to be used by the Levitical choirs, though the psalm, unlike some others which are found outside the collection, e.g., II Sam 22:2ff., I Chr 16:8ff., was never put in the Book of Psalms.

ZEPHANIAH

INTRODUCTION

Title. The book of Zephaniah receives its name from the prophet whose ministry it records. Ṣᵉpanyâ means "the Lord hides" or "the Lord has hidden." The prophet was born during the ruthless reign of Manasseh (692–638 B.C.), who "shed innocent blood very much, till he had filled Jerusalem from one end to another" (II Kgs 21:16). His name indicates a confidence in the power of God to hide (i.e., protect) his worshiper in time of danger.

The Prophet and His Message. Of Zephaniah very little is known. He was probably of royal descent (Zeph 1:1; presumably Hizkiah was King Hezekiah), and prophesied during the reign of Josiah (637-607 B.C.) between the fall of Nineveh and the Babylonian attack upon Judea. Under Josiah the administration of the Law and the worship of the Lord had been revived briefly, but the people still practiced idolatrous customs in secret. The perception of this hypocrisy stirred the young prophet to action. Even though the king joined the prophet in a reform movement, the evil tide rolled on. The increase of wickedness inevitably led to the moment when God would use Nebuchadnezzar as the rod of his anger.

Zephaniah pinpoints the cause of God's judgment by proclaiming the moral degeneration of the people. He makes clear, however, that the door of mercy is open for those who will sincerely repent. The prophet sees the meaning of all this in the light of God's purpose to send his Son, the Lord Jesus, as Israel's Messiah and the Saviour of all mankind.

Authorship and Date. The first verse of Zephaniah (using the usual formula of the writing prophets) indicates that the book constitutes the message which God imparted to the prophet and which the prophet himself recorded. And there is no reason to consider this indication to be an insertion by some unidentified writer in a later day. Though Zephaniah was born during the reign of Manasseh (692-638 B.C.), he did not assume his prophetic office until the early part of Josiah's reign, probably 627–626 B.C. Presumably the prophecy was written not many years thereafter.

Historical Background. The wicked reigns of Manasseh (692–638 B.C.) and Amon (638–637 B.C.) were over. King Josiah (637–607 B.C.) had ascended the throne of Judah. His reform was still several years away, and the apostate conditions which prevailed for more than one-half century during the reigns of Manasseh and Amon had not yet been challenged. In the early part of Josiah's reign (probably c. 627–626 B.C.), Zephaniah began to warn his people of the impending judgment of God, whose anger they had provoked by their behavior. The fate of Samaria in 722 B.C. was a solemn reminder of God's power and justice. With youthful vigor Zephaniah laid the groundwork for the reforms which took place later in Josiah's reign.

COMMENTARY

I. Introduction. 1:1.

Zephaniah's declaration of his ordination to the prophetic office takes on the familiar form: The word of the Lord . . . came to the prophet. A man took up the prophetic office in response to a direct call; the priestly office, which was restricted to the family of Aaron, was passed down from father to son. Zephaniah's father was Cushi; his grandfather, Gedaliah; his great-grandfather, Amariah; and his great-great-grandfather, Hizkiah, in all probability the godly king, Hezekiah.

II. A Warning of Impending Judgment. 1:2-18.

A. The Judgment Announced 1:2-6.

2. I will utterly consume. The destruction was to be certain and complete. Total destruction suggests the horrible consequences of idolatry or spiritual adultery. Some scholars suggest that the judgment pronounced had both imminent and future reference. Its imminent reference, some think, was to the fact that the barbaric Scythians, who had left their homeland north of the Black Sea, were sweeping over western Asia and might be expected to attack Judah at any moment. The ruthless Scythians employed the scorched earth policy with fury and vengeance. 3. I will consume man and beast. Nothing would escape. Man, beast, the fowls of the air, and the fish of the sea would be subjects of the Lord's wrath. The waters would be infected and the air contaminated.

4. I will cut off the remnant of Baal. Men bowing to Baal, the Canaanite fertility-god, whose worship included acts of ritual prostitution, would be destroyed. The Chemarims. These long-robed priests who represented the idols (cf. II Kgs 23:5) were to be completely exterminated. 5. The host of heaven. Astrology and the worship of the heavenly bodies as practiced by the Assyrians and Babylonians was common among the idolaters of Judah (cf. II Kgs 23:11; Jer 19:13; 32:29; Ezk 8:16). Malcham. Molech, a Semitic deity honored by the sacrifice of children.

6. Them that are turned back. Caught in this mesh of apostasy were those who rejected the claims of the God of Israel and became captive to the sensuous, immoral fertility cult. Those that have not sought the Lord. Some never had availed themselves of the grace and mercy of the Lord. They were self-centered, self-sufficient, living with total disregard for their spiritual needs.

B. The Judgment Defined. 1:7-13.

7. Hold thy peace at the presence of the Lord. The people had apostatized to the point of no return. Punishment was now inevitable. Their vain cry reminds us of the generation that perished in the Flood when the door of the ark was shut. They had refused to offer a burnt offering to the Lord; now they themselves were to become the sacrifice. The day of the Lord is the day of judgment, as in Amos 5:18. The guests are the enemies of Judah, and the sacrifice is Judah (cf. Isa 34:6).

8. I will punish the princes, and the king's children. After the death of Josiah, Judah hastened toward her doom. The evil reign of Jehoahaz (Josiah's successor) lasted only three months, and the rule of idolatrous Jehoiakim only eleven years. The three-month reign of Jehoiachin was quickly followed by the second deportation to Babylon. Then came the final destruction of Jerusalem during the reign of Zedekiah, who was taken to Babylon as a captive, after his eyes had been put out (II Kgs 25:6,7). 9. Here reference is apparently made to the king's attendants, who were constantly at his beck and call. They were evidently the corrupt politicians of that day—selling their influence and position for silver. Jewish rabbinical scholars suggest that those that leap on the threshold were the Philistines, who, after Dagon fell before the ark, would not step over the threshold when they entered his temple, but, rather, leaped over it. Others hold that they were bandits who broke into people's houses and took what they wanted. They may have leaped over the threshold to avoid provoking the gods who were thought to guard the entrances to the houses.

10. That there shall be the noise of a cry . . . an howling. A prophetic picture is here presented of the attacking enemy coming upon Jerusalem from the north. The fish gate opened into the northern end of the Tyropoeon Valley (cf. Neh 3:3; 12:39). This was the direction from which the news of the approaching Chaldean army would come. The sound of the approach of the enemy is described as a great crashing from the hills.

11. Maktesh ("a mortar," "a trough," or "a hollow"). Some commentators identify Maktesh with the section of Jerusalem lying in the Kidron Valley, where rice, corn, and other grain was ground in a mortar. The configuration of Maktesh may have given rise to its name. Prophetically it is used to depict the way the inhabitants would be beaten and pounded to death, as grain is pounded in a mortar. All the merchant people are cut down. More specifically, the merchants and the money changers would be beaten to death without hope, and cut off from all help.

12. Search Jerusalem with candles (lamps). A thorough search, both by day and by night, would be made. None would escape. There would be no corner left unsearched in which sin could escape punishment. Men that are settled on their lees. Lees are dregs or sediment deposited from wine or liquor (cf. Isa 25:6). To settle on one's lees meant to become complacent and self-satisfied with one's character and circumstances—perhaps to be in a drunken stupor (cf. Jer 48:11). 13. Their goods. The things in which they trusted would become a snare to them. Their efforts for material gain would come to nothing. They would not enjoy the fruits of their labor. They would not live in the houses they built, nor harvest the vineyards they planted (cf. Amos 5:11).

C. The Judgment Described. 1:14-18.

14. Is near. After the death of Josiah, judgment approached rapidly. It is here compared to a swiftly moving tempest. While the immediate reference appears to be to the Scythian invasion, ultimate fulfillment will come with the final Judgment, when there shall be "weeping and gnashing of teeth" (Mt 8:12; 25:30, et al.).

15. That day is a day of wrath. When the mercies of the Lord are spurned, wrath surely results. A day of trouble and distress. All the horrible consequences of judgment: the invasion, attack, confusion, torture—suffering and horror of every kind. It would be a day of darkness. The city would be heavily veiled with the smoke and smell of carnage. 16. Day of the trumpet. The alarm would be sounded, and couriers would dispatch the terrible news, but to no avail. The nation had crossed the point of no return. Judgment must take its course. The fenced cities would be invaded, and the high towers would topple at the touch of the battering rams.

17. Distress upon men. A severe state of suffering, pain, and affliction was to come. In their hopeless despair, men would be crazed. They would grope around for help and salvation, but all hope for deliverance from judgment would be gone. Their sin and apostasy against the Lord had triggered his wrath. Blood would cover the streets like dust, and human bodies would be piled on the trash heap as dung. 18. Their silver nor their gold. The time had passed when the privileged could bribe their way. Their money would not buy food, because there would be no food. A judgment of fire would consume their earthly possessions. A universal desolation would seize the land.

III. An Exhortation to Immediate Repentance. 2:1–3:8

A. An Invitation to Repentance. 2:1-3.

1,2. Gather yourselves together. Misery loves company. The people of Judah were to assemble themselves so that they might see their own collective corruption. O nation not desired. Through their apostasy they had forfeited their right to live. They had divorced themselves from the Lord. Before the decree bring forth. The people were invited to a final convocation before the fierce anger of the Lord broke upon them with all its fury. The Lord's agents of punishment, perhaps the Scythians, were to bring immediate judgment, and the Babylonians would finish what the Scythians left undone.

3. Seek ye the Lord. One last plea was extended by the Lord through the prophet. It may be ye shall be hid in the day of the Lord's anger. It was still possible for the repentant to escape judgment if they would only turn to the Lord. As God had warned the hardened among the people to humble themselves, so he now admonished the meek to seek him that they might escape the general calamity (cf. Ps 76:9).

B. A Detailed Warning of Judgment. 2:4–3:8.

1) The Land of the Philistines. 2:4-7.

4. For Gaza shall be forsaken. Even the neighboring Philistine community was to feel the judgment to come. These people had been harassed by the Egyptians; now the Babylonians would bring complete judgment. To reproduce the assonance of this verse exactly in English is impossible, but the rendition of J. R. Dummelow suggests it: "Gaza shall be a ghastly ruin; Ashkelon a deserted ash-heap" (A Commentary on the Holy Bible, in loco). 5. The Cherethites. A people occupying the southern coast of the Philistine country (see I Sam 30:14; Ezk 25:16). The LXX renders this word Cretans (Amos 9:7; Deut 2:23). The Cherethites were probably related to the Philistines and were immigrants from Crete. All of the Philistine coast would feel the wrath of God. No inhabitants would be left; all would be killed or carried into captivity. The invader would be no respecter of persons.

6. The sea coast . . . dwellings and cottages for shepherds. All permanent buildings would be destroyed. Shepherds would build small shelters and folds from the rubble (Isa 17:2). Population and tillage would disappear from the region. 7. The remnant of the house of Judah. A small remnant would be left behind after the Babylonian attack. A remnant, kept by God's power in Babylon, returned at the close of the Exile. Turn away their captivity. Once again they would be free people (cf. Mic 4:6,7).

2) The Land of Moab and Ammon. 2:8-11.

8. Moab and . . . Ammon . . . have reproached my people. Because these enemies had abused the people of Judah, punishment was to be levied against them (cf. Jer 48:27-31; Ezk 25:8-11). 9. Moab shall be as Sodom . . . the children of Ammon as Gomorrah. Sodom and Gomorrah are referred to as symbols of the Lord's fierce judgment. As those towns were utterly destroyed, so God's judgment was to fall on the cities of Moab and Ammon. The whole countryside would be a bed of thorns, and its perpetual desolation would be comparable to salt pits (cf. Isa 15:1ff.).

10. This shall they have for their pride. A haughty spirit precedes a fall (Prov 18:12). The Ammonites and Moabites had paraded their arrogance before the people of Judah. Now their pride was to be reduced to humility and calamity (cf. Ezk 25:8-11). 11. He will famish all the gods. The destruction of Jerusalem by the Babylonians demonstrated the futility of trusting in the gods of Canaan. Baal worship lost its hold on the Jews during the Exile.

3) The Land of the Ethiopians. 2:12.

Ye Ethiopians also. They, too, were to become victims of Nebuchadnezzar's onslaught (cf. Jer 46:2,9; Ezk 30:4,5; Amos 9:7).

4) The Land of the Assyrians. 2:13-15.

13. He will . . . destroy Assyria . . . Nineveh. Nineveh was so completely destroyed that its location was lost to the memory of man until rediscovered by archaeologists during the nineteenth century. Nahum gives a graphic description of its total destruction in 612 B.C. (cf. Isa 10:12; Nah 1:2; 2:10; 3:15). 14. Flocks shall lie down in the midst of her. This prophecy has been literally fulfilled. Sheep graze today on the very site where proud Nineveh once stood. Archaeologists have excavated portions of this great city, including the huge winged figures of bulls with human heads that stood on each side of the main gate and symbolized her power. Today this site is truly the dwelling place of the cormorant (a large bird, cf. Lev 11:17) and the bittern (a porcupine or lizard, or perhaps a bird).

15. This is the rejoicing city that dwelt carelessly (cf. Isa 47:8,9). Once Nineveh was the proud capital of Assyria—the home town of such emperors as Sennacherib and Esarhaddon. This proud city, the capital of western Asia, where emissaries from all over the eastern Mediterranean area presented their royal credentials for favor—would become a place of desolation and ruin. Everyone that passeth by her shall hiss and wag his hand. Both actions are signs of contempt and shame.

5) The Land of Judah and the City of Jerusalem. 3:1-8.

1. Her that is filthy and polluted. As a result of the worship of Baal and Molech, Jerusalem had degenerated. The religious leaders were living in adultery, and they offered their sons as human sacrifices in order to gain favor from the nature gods (Jer 19:5; 23:13,14; 32:35). Jeremiah had difficulty in finding a righteous man in Jerusalem (Jer 5:1). Her civil and religious leaders were on the side of idolatry instead of being spokesmen for God. 2. She obeyed not the voice. Jerusalem had been warned. The prophets had pleaded with the people, but all urgings to repentance were ignored. The rupture between the people and the Lord widened with each passing day (cf. Jer 22:21).

3. Her princes . . . are roaring lions. The people in authority and power had no regard for truth and righteousness. Their arrogant roar was like that of a wild beast. Judges are evening wolves. The judges tore into shreds any vestige of justice. They slunk in the shadows, ready to take a bribe. They practiced the violence and predatory oppression of wild beasts (Ezk 22:27; Mic 3:9-11). 4. Her prophets are light and treacherous. The prophets no longer possessed the serious conviction and integrity of holy men. They betrayed the souls of the blind. Her priests have polluted the sanctuary. The priests had violated the Law by offering animals with spots and blemishes. The sacrifices were devoid of spiritual content (cf. Jer 23:11,32).

5. The just Lord is in the midst thereof. The Lord was still present, and he was keeping a record of their wickedness. Goodness would be the lot of the righteous, but punishment was sure to come to the wicked (cf. Deut 32:4). 6. I have cut off the nations. Evidently Syria and Israel are meant here. This was prophetic of what the Lord was in the process of doing. There is none inhabitant. Every home would be rooted up. Surely thou wilt fear me. The Lord had reason to expect repentance and obedience after the intermittent punishment inflicted upon Jerusalem, but the people persisted in their evil doings. Finally, total destruction came at the hands of the Babylonians.

8. For my determination is to gather the nations. The mercy of the Lord is directed to all peoples and nations. Even Nineveh repented at the preaching of Jonah. But likewise, judgment will come upon all who forsake the Lord. The judgment of fire is always associated with the punishment of nations through war.

IV. A Promise of Future Blessing. 3:9-20.

A. The Promise of Conversion. 3:9-13.

9. Then will I turn to the people a pure language. This is a prophetic reference to the time when the Jews would turn from the blasphemy of idolatry and utter the praises of the Lord (cf. Joel 2:28; Acts 2:16-21). Pure language may refer to the form of religious worship they would practice. They had been idolaters; now God promised to restore his worship among them. 10. From beyond the rivers of Ethiopia. After the judgment the Lord would bring his people back from all the areas of the captivity. Even so remote a land as Ethiopia would experience this act of sovereign grace.

11. Shalt thou not be ashamed. Punishment would end, finally, for those who repented. A remnant would be purged of idolatry and would return. I will take away out of the midst of thee. The wicked leaders would meet their fate. Thou shalt no more be haughty. False pride would turn into humility. 12. An afflicted and poor people. The captivity would reduce many of the people to poverty. As a matter of fact, many of the poor people responded to the liberation under Cyrus, while the wealthy stayed behind. The prophecy also looks beyond the return from Babylon to the time when the poor and humble finally received the Messiah—"The common people heard him gladly" (Mk 12:37). 13. The remnant of Israel. After the Babylonian captivity a cleansed and purified remnant would return. Never again would they bow down to the heathen gods (cf. Mic 4:7).

B. The Promise of Restoration. 3:14-20.

14. Sing, O daughter of Zion. A time of rejoicing would come when the remnant would once again worship in the rebuilt Temple. There will also be a time of rejoicing in the more distant future when Israel will accept her Messiah. 15. The king of Israel, even the Lord, is in the midst of thee. This is a prophetic anticipation of the day when the King-Messiah will rule. Israel has had no Davidic king actually holding the reins of government since the death of Zedekiah.

16. Fear thou not. In the glorious day of the Messiah, all captivities and national afflictions will be removed. 17. The Lord thy God. This is the high tide of Zephaniah's prophecy. The Lord . . . God is the self-existent, divine Being who will stand in the midst of Israel. Is mighty. He is the conquering Hero. This is the character Isaiah gives the Messiah (Isa 9:6). He will save his people. He will joy over thee. After saving them, the Messiah will find in the redeemed Israel his ground of rejoicing (cf. Jn 15:11).

18. I will gather them that are sorrowful. A remnant will repent of their sins, and they will again gather in Jerusalem to see its great splendor restored. The reproach of it was a burden. Jewish people have not been able to enjoy their religion in the countries of their dispersion because o fthe reproach heaped upon them by their heathen neighbors (cf. Ps 137). 19. Undo all that afflict thee. Those who have punished Judah will be punished. 20. I bring you again. They will once again possess their own land and be restored to favor with the Lord. Finally, all nations of the earth will be blessed by the Jews through their Messianic King, the Lord Jesus (cf. Isa 11:12; Ezk 28:25; 34:13; Amos 9:14).

HAGGAI

INTRODUCTION

Date and Authorship. The author of this book is the only person in the Old Testament with the name Haggai (meaning "festive" or "festal"). The name may indicate the faith of the prophet's parents that their son would have the joy of seeing his predictions of restoration fulfilled. It is possible that he was so named because he was born on some feast of the sacred Hebrew calendar. Although he is one of the prophets the details of whose personal life are unknown, he is mentioned by Ezra (Ezr 5:1; 6:14). He was the first of the post-Exilic prophets who ministered to the remnant that had returned from Babylonian captivity. His prophecy is clearly to be dated in 520 B.C., the second year of Darius the king. Haggai was probably born in exile in the early part of the sixth century. His contemporary in the prophetic office was Zechariah (cf. Hag 1:1 with Zech 1:1; see also Ezr 5:1; 6:14).

Historical Background. The prophets before the Exile (586 B.C.) had foretold the fall of the Judean kingdom to the new Babylonian empire. It was also revealed that after seventy years the Lord would restore his people to their homeland (Jer 25:11,12; Dan 9:2). When Cyrus the Persian destroyed the Babylonian power, he favored and promoted the Jews' return to the land of promise to rebuild the sanctuary in Jerusalem. The foundation of the new Temple was laid and the work was begun with high hopes. Soon hostile neighbors employed their devices to stop the work. The work was brought to a halt, but outward opposition to the task was only part of the problem. A state of indifference had seized upon the fifty thousand exiles who had returned with resolve to rebuild the house of God. When Darius Hystaspes came to the Persian throne, the Temple had been untouched for some sixteen years. Haggai (and later Zechariah) was sent by God to awaken the people and bestir them from their lethargy to undertake the work of restoration. It is unfair to Haggai to consider that his messages are solely concerned with matters of building. He does begin from that vantage point, but goes on to speak of the glory of the presence of the Lord Jesus Christ, the future establishment of God's earthly kingdom, the judgment of God on ungodly world powers, and the blessing awaiting the nations that will return to God.

COMMENTARY

CHAPTER I.

I. The Rebuke of Indifference. 1:1-4.

1. In the second year. Cf. Introduction. The prophet dates all his prophecies, as though he kept a strict diary of all the important events in the rebuilding of the Temple. First day of the month. The new moon was a time when the people assembled for worship (as do orthodox Jews today); thus it was an appropriate occasion for the preaching of Haggai's divine message. Sixth month. Called Elul, this month falls about September. The dating of the prophecy in the reign of a Gentile monarch is eloquent testimony that "the times of the Gentiles" had begun (cf. Lk 21:24; Ezr 4:24). As the dates are followed throughout the prophecy, the progress of the work becomes clear. Zerubbabel. His name means "born or begotten in Babylon." In the historical accounts he is called Sheshbazzar (see Ezr 1:8; 5:14,16). He was a scion of the Davidic dynasty, the grandson of Jehoiachin (Jeconiah; I Chr 3:17, 19), and was made governor of Judah by Cyrus (Ezr 5:14). Joshua. He was the son of Jehozadak, who was high priest at the time of the Babylonian invasion (I Chr 6:15). Thus Haggai's prophecy is addressed to the civil and religious heads of the nation.

2. This people. It is not "My" people but "This" people, in order to show the displeasure of the Lord. The time is not come. This was the excuse the people offered for not rebuilding the Temple. According to their way of thinking, the time was not appropriate. Actually, the root of the difficulty lay in them, not in some outward circumstance or time factor. The subterfuge is clear; they did not claim that the work should not be carried on, but that it was not the right hour to do it. One would think that a lapse of about sixteen years would have brought home the need for exertion on their part. But the unwilling heart always finds excuses. It is hardly correct to assume that they were reckoning strictly seventy years from 586 B.C. The impression is rather that they thought a renewal of activity in building would evoke the latent hostility of the Persians and bring them to grief.

4. Is it time for you . . . ? The ASV renders the additional pronoun in the original, you yourselves. Haggai asked the leaders whether the hour was inauspicious only as far as the things of God were concerned. Their activity in personal matters (such as building homes) gave an altogether different impression. What a contrast—the desolate and waste Temple of the Lord alongside the finished and ornate private dwellings of the returned exiles! The question of the prophet, with one masterful stroke, laid bare the indifference, selfishness, and disobedience of the nation. Cieled houses. These were homes paneled, extensively fitted out. Wainscoting with cedar was to be found in the palaces of kings (see I Kgs 7:7; Jer 22:14). Since expensive timber was not common in Judah, its use was a mark of luxury. Waste. Where their hearts were, their treasure was also. Contrast their indifference toward the house of God with the commendable concern of David (II Sam 7:2).

II. Call to Serious Reflection. 1:5,6.

5. Consider your ways. The need of the hour was to consider (lit., set their heart to) their actions. In the OT the heart commonly represents the thought life. To be thankful one must be thinkful. The call to consider is a favorite one with this prophet. He uses it in verse 7 and then twice in 2:18. It is a charge to self-examination and self-judgment. The Jewish people could easily evaluate the nature of their acts by the results which issued from them.

6. Ye have sown much. They expended themselves to the fullest extent in the time of sowing. They spared no effort to insure prosperity. But their returns in the harvest were altogether disappointing. They should have realized that they could not enrich themselves at God's expense (cf. Lev 26:26; Hos 4:10; Mic 6:14). Ye clothe you. Nothing seemed to be in sufficient amount, whether food, drink, or clothing. Bag with holes. Wages were so small that they vanished in the face of daily necessities; the workers' earnings were soon gone. There is no contradiction between the description of poverty here and the description of the ceiled, expensive houses of verse 4. As in other societies, the wealthy were found along with the poorer class. That age, as every age in man's history, proved the truth of Mt 6:33. When God is forgotten, all labor is without profit. Materialistic civilizations of this day need to ponder this truth as much as any other.

III. Israel's Chastenings from God. 1:7-11.

8. Go up to the mountain. After another call to serious comtemplation of their condition, the remedy is stated. The people were to betake themselves to the high lands and wooded areas to obtain timber for the Temple. I will take pleasure. God promised at the outset that obedience would meet with his approval. In brief, Haggai is declaring, "Obey God, and his blessing and approbation will be yours." I will be glorified. Here is proof that God was concerned, as was Haggai, with the spiritual aspects of the rebuilding. Solomon had prayed (I Kgs

8:30) that God might be magnified through the worship of His people. When they neglected this activity of their spiritual life, barrenness resulted. The Babylonian Talmud claimed that five things were lacking in the Temple of Zerubbabel which were found in the first Temple: (1) the Shekinah glory, (2) the holy fire, (3) the ark of the covenant, (4) the Urim and Thummim, and (5) the spirit of prophecy (probably the Holy Spirit). Whatever may have been wanting in the restoration Temple, God unequivocally promised that his blessing would be there.

9. Ye looked for much. Haggai returns to the theme of the disastrous consequences of the indifference of the people in spiritual things. Such neglect had a direct effect upon their temporal concerns. Though they had had high hopes for bumper crops, these expectations were disappointed. There was little to show for the great outlay of their labor. I did blow upon it. Even the little that was garnered was of little help to them. God saw to it that it was unfit for consumption or was scattered. The people were thus informed that they were not to attribute the poor returns from the soil to any other cause, such as long neglect of the land during the captivity period, but to the direct chastening of God. Why? How was God's providence to be explained? God's chastening must have been predicated upon their deeds. Wherein had they failed? Ye run. The reply is clear. In seeking their own fortunes, they had displayed a considerable degree of zeal, had run, as a matter of fact, in furthering their selfish interests, to the utter disregard of the interests of the Lord. A marked contrast is presented between mine house and his own house.

10. Stayed from dew. The Lord withheld the dew that replaced the rain during the dry months of the summer, so that there was no increase from the land. Thus God manifested clearly that he was the supreme administrator of Israel's food. 11. I called for a drought. More than once in Israel's history God saw that there was need to bring the nation to a realization of her utter dependence upon him for all the needs of life. Repeatedly the OT teachers and prophets emphasized that in the path of obedience Israel could know the proper balance of the forces of nature for her benefit and blessing. God had warned the people that if they were disobedient, the very heavens would become as brass to them (Deut 28:23). The drought he sent on the land and the mountains affected the grain (not corn), the new wine, the oil, all the issues of the ground, and all the labor of man and cattle. Famine has ever been a dread scourge in the hand of God. See II Kgs 8:1; Ps 105:16; cf. Deut 11:14; 18:4. Lower creation is always involved in the fortunes of man (Rom 8:19-21).

IV. Obedience of the Nation. 1:12-15.

12. Obeyed the voice of the Lord. Here there is indicated a heartening co-operation between leaders and people. The message of the prophet had its intended effect. The people were quick to evaluate the message of Haggai for what it was—the will of God expressed through his servant. Their God. Twice God is so designated. There appears to be an implication here that the nation had now moved into closer conformity with the relationship she sustained to God as his chosen, covenant people. 13. The Lord's messenger in the Lord's message. With new spiritual insight, the people recognized Haggai as the Lord's spokesman, invested with divine authority. I am with you. The message was short, but it could not have been more comforting or strengthening. In the past this message had been used by God to spur men on to mighty accomplishments (e.g., Ex 3:12; Jer 1:8), and it is still the most reassuring of all promises to the servants of the Lord Jesus Christ around the world (cf. Mt 28:20). The turning to the Lord was heartfelt; otherwise this strong word of assurance would not have been given to them.

14. The Lord stirred up. Every good intention and purpose of the people of God emanates from the Lord. It is he who energizes men to will and do of his good pleasure (Phil 2:13). Spirit. The threefold use of the term indicates that the battle is won or lost in the realm of the spiritual, not in any favorable or unfavorable outward condition. They came and did work. The people began the work of collecting the necessary materials for the structure; the foundations were not laid, however, until three months later.

15. Four and twentieth day. Haggai is careful to give another precise date, so important is the matter upon which his heart is set. There was an interval of twenty-three days between this date and the one given in verse 1. God ever takes note of every feature of the obedience of his children.

CHAPTER II.

I. Encouragement for Building. 2:1-5.

1. In the seventh month, in the one and twentieth day of the month. The second message of the prophet is dated on the seventh day of the Feast of Tabernacles, the final feast of ingathering in the Hebrew calendar (cf. Lev 23:39-44). This feast was marked by much joy (as it is to this day), and the sacrifices of thanksgiving were more numerous on the final day than on any other in the year. However, with the scant harvest and the humble beginnings of the Temple, the contrast with former conditions must have been especially painful. There was need, therefore, for encouragement (cf. Ezr 3:12,13). Often Satan makes his strongest attacks on men just after they have firmly resolved to follow the leading of the Lord. The people stood in need of strong encouragement to guard them from despondency. In the first chapter the need was a message to the consciences and wills of the indifferent people; here there was needed a word of comfort and cheer to the hearts of the awakened nation.

3. Who is left among you . . . ? The words are addressed to the civil and religious leaders and the returned remnant. God was comparing the Temple of Solomon and the one then under construction. Through Haggai he asked the leaders and the people how many of them recalled the glory of the first structure. After the lapse of seventy years of exile, likely there were few left who had seen the former Temple. As nothing? The occasion for the question of the Lord is found in the account in Ezr 3:8-13. The record states that at the founding of the second Temple the priests accompanied the ceremony with the singing of psalms and blowing of trumpets. The younger generation, with no means of comparison in this case, exulted over the achievement. But the older men who had known the first glorious Temple wept openly because of the marked contrast between the two sanctuaries. Haggai directed his query to this latter group. From God's viewpoint there was but one house of the Lord in Jerusalem, whether built by Solomon, Zerubbabel, or later by Herod. Hence God referred to the building of Solomon as "this house in her first glory." God's thoughts are not man's, and his judgments are made on the basis of absolutes.

4-2. Be strong. In the threefold address to prince, priest, and people, the Lord commanded all to be strong. God, who had first drawn a vivid contrast between the buildings, now offered the people spiritual undergirding for the performance of their task. His purpose in setting forth the difference was not to discourage them, but rather to bring them to a realization of the magnitude of the work, their inadequacy to accomplish it in their own strength, and the necessity of relying on his sufficiency. The Lord was their strength. Again, the uplifting word was given that the presence of the Lord would be their constant portion.

5. I covenanted with you. If any nation on earth could have been certain of God's trustworthiness in regard to his promises, it was Israel. He had covenanted (lit., cut a covenant, speaking with reference to the victims that were divided to ratify a covenant; cf. Gen 15:10) to enter into a permanent relationship with the children of Israel when they left Egypt. The covenant at Mount Sinai is in view (cf. Ex 19:5; especially 33:12-14). Since God had been faithful to that promise through all the centuries past of Israel's history, he could surely be relied upon to uphold his pledged word to the contemporaries of the prophet Haggai. My spirit remaineth among you. A pledge of the veracity of the promise was the presence of the Spirit of God then abiding among them. God had not forsaken them, though he had been highly displeased with their indifference to his love and his commands. They had nothing to fear.

II. Promise of Future Glory. 2:6-9.

6. Yet once, it is a little while. The cryptic expression probably means that in but a short time the events set forth would take place. I will shake the heavens. This verse and the three following are distinctly Messianic in thought (see also Isa 61:1-3; Dan 9:24-27; Zech 9:9,10). Here the prophet's message blends together details of the first and second comings of Christ, as other OT prophecies often do. The prediction of the shaking of the heavens, the earth, the sea, and the dry land surely speaks of something more than an unusual display of God's omnipotence in the natural realm; the whole atmosphere of the prophecy brings the reader to apocalyptic times. Here God is seen once again intervening sensibly and manifestly in the affairs of men. What may be the thought relation between the statement in this verse and that in verse 5? The prophet encouraged the Jews to prosecute the work on the Temple with all diligence, for, he assured them, their God, the Lord of the nations, would before long show forth his mighty power in Israel's behalf. He would shake the material universe and overthrow earthly, finite kingdoms in order to set up the final and ultimate kingdom on earth, the kingdom of God's dear Son.

7. I will shake all nations. This prediction has been referred to the uprisings and upheavals in the Persian and Greek empires. No one can reasonably deny that these governments were shaken in the past. But the careful reading of the prophecies of Scripture will convince an unprejudiced student that those occurrences were only preparatory steps in the process whereby God will yet dislodge the kingdoms of this world, to replace them by the righteous rule of the Messiah of Israel and the Redeemer of the world (see Heb 12:26,27; Rev 11:15). The desire of all nations shall come. Translators have not been in agreement in their rendering of the four Hebrew words of this portion of the verse. The LXX translates them, the choice things of all the nations shall come. The ASV prefers the precious things of all nations, with the marginal reading–the things desired (Heb. desire) of all nations shall come. Others have suggested: the Gentiles shall come with their delightful things, or the precious possessions of the heathen. What meaning is to be given to the passage if these translations are followed? The lack of splendor and outward adornment in the Temple of Zerubbabel would be more than compensated for by the precious gifts that all peoples would yet present to make the Lord's Temple a thing of beauty and glory. Of course, such tribute to the Lord would be given out of true homage to him. It is cited in favor of this interpretation that it does justice to the use of the feminine singular subject and the plural verb.

It is well to remember, however, that from earliest days the majority of Christian interpreters followed the Jewish tradition in referring the passage to the coming of Israel's Messiah. It seems clear to these interpreters that the longing all nations have in common must be their yearning for the Deliverer, whether or not they realize the nature of their desire or the identity of its true fulfillment in the Lord Jesus Christ. Moreover, in Hebrew an abstract noun is often used instead of the concrete; thus a reference to the Messiah is not automatically ruled out on the basis of language considerations. The use of a plural verb does not militate against the Messianic interpretation, for there are instances in which the verb agrees with the second of two nouns.

I will fill this house with glory. It is interesting that every earthly abode of the infinite God was filled with glory (see Ex 40:35 for the Mosaic Tabernacle; I Kgs 8:10,11; II Chr 5:13,14 for the Solomonic Temple). The Temple of Zerubbabel was yet to be filled with the glory of the presence of the incarnate God the Son (Jn 1:14), to say nothing of the glory of the Second Advent (Mal 3:1). The Lord foretells that the nations will be shaken (not redeemed). That shaking began preparatory to the first coming and will be completed at the second appearing (Dan 2:35,44; Mt 21:44). Accordingly, God will fill his house, the Temple of the future, with unprecedented glory.

8. The silver is mine. Lest the remnant continue to be surcharged with concern over the lack of precious metals in the restoration Temple, the Lord pointed to his inexhaustible supply. It has been conjectured that in Solomon's Temple some twenty million dollars' worth of gold was used to overlay the innermost compartment of the sanctuary. But what was that in comparison to the supplies of the One who has all? (Ps 50:12) Yea, more than that, God will beautify it in the coming of his Son. The poor exiles had little with which to decorate the Temple, but God assured them that he would supply the lack.

9. The glory of this latter house. The sense is that the latter glory of the house would far exceed all the former glory. It is vital to realize that in the Scriptures the Temple of God in Jerusalem is conceived of as one entity, existing under different forms in different periods of history. Christ's presence would lend a glory to the second Temple which the first Temple never knew. The view has been presented that the latter glory has reference to the Millennial glory of the Temple seen in Ezekiel, chapters 40 to 48. Since there is a continuity in the Temples of different eras, this position cannot be excluded. Though Zerubbabel's Temple was cleared to the foundations by Herod when he renovated it, his Temple was still considered the second Temple. It is so referred to by all Jewish authorities. In this place will I give peace.

Christ accomplished the basis for spiritual peace at Jerusalem (Col 1:20). He grants peace of heart and mind to believers now (Rom 5:1; Phil 4:7). But ultimately he will bring world peace as the Prince of Peace (Isa 9:6,7). Sufficient and more, then, is this answer of God to the unimposing appearances of verse 3. God always reserves the best for last. Only the eye of faith can see it.

III. Clean and Unclean in Levitical Matters. 2:10-14.

10. In the four and twentieth day of the ninth month. The fourth message of the prophecy of Haggai was given two months after the preceding one. It was in the ninth month that the early rain could be expected to water the new crops. Having already experienced scarcity and disappointment in the period before this, the people would have been especially concerned about the produce for the ensuing year. During their former period of disobedience, they had been chastened in temporal matters. Would there be a change now that they had obeyed the command of God through Haggai? This question the prophet now answers.

11. Ask now the priests concerning the law. The people were to seek legal help from the priests of the day. The priests in Israel were the authoritative teachers of the Mosaic Law (see Deut 17:8,9). They were commissioned by God to interpret the Law; the prophets were sent to apply it (e.g., Hag 2:13,14). In verses 11 to 13 the people of Israel are described, indirectly, as they had been in their state of disobedience, a condition not to be repeated.

12. If one bear holy flesh. Two distinct questions are asked. The first is: If a man were carrying holy (sacrificial) flesh, and touched another object, would that object by contact with the flesh become holy or set apart to the Lord? And the priests answered and said, No. The answer in the first case is in the negative (cf. Lev 22:4-6; Num 19:11). 13. Shall it be unclean? The second question was: If a man who was unclean ceremonially by reason of contact with a dead body should touch an object, would the object become unclean because of the man's ceremonial uncleanness? The answer to the second query is in the affirmative. The principle is that moral cleanness cannot be transmitted, according to the Mosaic regulations, but moral uncleanness can be transmitted. Legal impurity is transmitted rather than legal or Levitical purity. A man cannot transmit his health to a sick child, but a sick child can communicate his disease to a man.

14. So is this people. Even though the people had been neglecting the work of the Temple, they had been offering sacrifices on an improvised altar at Jerusalem (Ezr 3:3). These offerings had not been pleasing to the Lord; therefore God had withheld his blessing from the people, as is clearly seen in chapter 1. That which they offer there is unclean. Just as the ceremonially unclean Israelite polluted all he touched, so the people in their disobedience transmitted the results of that disobedience to their work, which rendered it unprofitable. As holy flesh could not communicate its consecration to any other object, so the external good works of the people, even the offerings they were careful to present on God's altar, could not suffice to secure the blessing of God and the joy of holiness. All their past labors partook of their spiritual uncleanness. The conclusion is clear: they were not to return to their former disobedient course, but were to forsake it. Here Haggai is interpreting cause and effect from the angle of the Mosaic Law, just as he explained it earlier (1:6, 9-11) from the viewpoint of sowing and reaping. The parallels are clear between "this people," "this nation" here, and "This people" in 1:2.

IV. Application of These Truths. 2:15-19.

15. From before a stone was laid. The people of God were asked to consider their difficult circumstances during the period when they interrupted the work on the Temple. 16. When one came to an heap of twenty measures. In those days of stringency, when a man came to a heap of grain from which he thought to get twenty measures, he found that, after threshing, it yielded but half that amount. Pressfat. The winevat that was supposed to yield fifty measures of wine had only twenty. Expectations were constantly disappointed, for the prospering hand of God was not with them. 17. I smote you. As in the days of the prophet Amos (cf. Amos 4:9), the Lord smote the fields and vineyards of his people with blasting, a result of excessive drought, and with mildew, a consequence of excessive moisture. The remainder of the work of their hands was destroyed by hail. All nature was arrayed against them. Yet ye turned not to me. These tokens of God's displeasure should have been clear enough warnings of further chastenings, but the people were slow to perceive and did not return to God in repentance and trust.

18. Consider now from this day. This verse issues a double exhortation to consider. How little men apply their minds, their thought, to the relationship they sustain to the Lord! Before the twenty-fourth day the people had not given themselves unreservedly to the work, as they should have done. They were to compare conditions before and after their obedience. 19. Is the seed yet in the barn? The people could easily have checked the truth or falsity of the prophet's conclusions. In doing so they would have discovered before long that there was no seed in the barn, and that the vines and trees had not yielded their produce. From this day will I bless you. But now, standing in the place of obedience, Israel was to find all different. The prophet was not speaking as a clever agricultural expert, forecasting good crops, but as the prophet of God pronouncing blessing on faith, prosperity on trust. The God who could withhold blessing could also bestow it upon his faithful people.

V. God's Future Blessing for Zerubbabel. 2:20-23.

20. In the four and twentieth day of the month. On the same day on which he delivered the previous message (v. 10) Haggai delivered his last utterance, a word of personal encouragement to the civil leader, Zerubbabel. 21. Speak to Zerubbabel. It is possible that Zerubbabel, as the governor and civil leader, had wondered about the previous prediction (vv. 6,7) concerning the revolutions among world powers and kingdoms. He may well have been concerned about how these dealings of God would affect the people over whom he was head. I will shake the heavens and the earth. It will be readily seen and acknowledged that the personal message to Zerubbabel merges with the prophetic utterance concerning God's future judgments on the nations.

22. I will overthrow the throne of kingdoms. By some interpreters the passage has been placed in the time of the overthrow and revolt of the subject nations against the Persian Empire. This took place when Darius Hystaspes ascended the throne in 521 B.C. But the prophecy of Haggai looks to the future; it is not speaking of some historic event known to all. Furthermore, there is significance in the use of the singular "throne." It is best to see here, along with many able expositors, a reference to the ultimate overthrow of this world system, dominated by Satan, when the rightful King, the Lord Jesus Christ, returns to take up the reins of government (cf. Rev 11:15). Chariots. Nations, then as now, will still be depending on carnal forces and weapons to achieve their carnal objectives, but the Lord will utterly destroy their strength and show of force. By the sword of his brother. The destruction begun by the Lord will be brought to a conclusion through the insanity of civil strife (see also Ezk 38:21; Zech 14:13). These events are to be set in the days of the War of Armageddon. By no stretch of the imagination can the events of this verse be twisted to fit into some past conflicts or political movements of once-great empires.

23. In that day, saith the Lord of hosts, will I take thee. The personal note is unmistakable. Zerubbabel was not appointed for judgment, but for a specific mission. God had a special honor reserved for this one of his servants. The promise actually pertains to the office Zerubbabel filled as ruler in Judah; it can not refer to Zerubbabel's own lifetime. In his day the predicted events did not transpire. The meaning is that the Messianic descent was to come through Zerubbabel, of the line of David, just as it did through David himself. David's secure throne is here contrasted with the tottering dynasties of the world. Zerubbabel is found in both genealogies of the Messiah (Mt 1:12; Lk 3:27). Jewish expositors referred this passage in Haggai to the Messiah. In Zerubbabel, then, as the type, is prefigured the person of the antitype, the Messiah. Both were descendants of David; hence the blending in this prophecy. As a signet. The signet was an object of worth and care to the Oriental. Its stamp was a mark of honor and authority (see Song 8:6; Jer 22:24). In olden times, when the signet ring was used to sign letters and documents, it represented the owner, who wore it always (cf. Gen 38:18; Jer 22:24). It was his prized possession. Here the signet prefigures the precious Christ. I have chosen thee. As other OT worthies took their places in Messiah's line of succession by the sovereign selection of God, so Zerubbabel was honored to be placed in this company to point to the Chosen One of God, the Lord Christ.

ZECHARIAH

INTRODUCTION

Date and Authorship. Zechariah, a contemporary of Haggai, began his prophetic ministry in 520 B.C. The latest date indicated in the book (7:1) is 518 B.C., the fourth year of Darius Hystaspis. The name "Zechariah" was a common one in the Old Testament, twenty-nine persons having borne it. It means the Lord remembers. 'Liberal' scholars, observing certain differences in style and subject matter, have maintained that chapters 9 to 14 were not written by the author of chapters 1 to 8. However, chapters 9 to 14 seem to have been written at a later time, and this may well account for the change in style. The difference in subject matter stems from the fact that in the latter part of the book the prophet is commissioned to disclose the apocalyptic events connected with the coming of Messiah and his earthly kingdom. All internal evidence points to single authorship for the book rather than multiple authorship.

Historical Background. Cyrus, the Persian king, issued a decree (about 538 B.C.) that all who desired to return to Jerusalem to rebuild the Temple were permitted to do so (II Chr 36:22,23; Ezr 1:1-4). About 50,000 exiles availed themselves of this lenient policy. With high purpose they determined to resettle in the land and restore the Temple. In the second month of 536 B.C. they laid the foundation (Ezr 3:11-13). Early in the work the Samaritans, denied any participation in the rebuilding, opposed the project (Ezr 4:5). For almost fourteen years the work ceased. When Darius Hystaspis came to the Persian throne in 521 B.C., Haggai and Zechariah, assuming that the decrees of the former rulers were inoperative, aroused their countrymen to take up the task again. Zerubbabel and Joshua, the governor and high priest respectively, led in the rebuilding. An inquiry by Tatnai, Persian governor for the territory west of the Euphrates, halted the work again, but Darius confirmed the original decree of Cyrus. Unfortunately, by this time a change had come about in the attitude of the Jewish people. They judged that hindrances in the reconstruction indicated that God was not in the work. Haggai and Zechariah sought to awaken the nation from its indifference. The people responded, and the building was completed in 516 B.C., the sixth year of Darius' reign. The chronological data in this prophecy fall within the period of the work on the Temple. Although Zechariah begins with the theme of the restoration of the sanctuary, he touches upon many phases of the spiritual life of the nation, and he treats with remarkable fullness the prophetic events leading up to Messiah's return and reign.

COMMENTARY

I. Introduction: The Call To Repent. 1:1-6.

1. In the second year of Darius. The dating of a prophecy according to the reign of a Gentile monarch evidences that the times of the Gentiles, begun in Nebuchadnezzar's day, were in progress (cf. Lk 21:24).

2. The Lord hath been sore displeased. In emphatic language the prophet declares God's displeasure with the fathers of his countrymen. It was more than their neglect of the building of the Temple that distressed Him; it was their general spiritual outlook. Return from exile alone was not enough to please the Lord; they needed a heart return to the Lord. 3. I will turn unto you. Their repentance would find God ready and willing to receive and bless.

4. Be ye not as your fathers. Bad example is so infectious that Zechariah had to warn his co-religionists not to imitate the ways of their predecessors. The latter had failed to heed the authentic messages of the prophets of God, and consequently they had reaped a harvest of misery and woe in the Babylonian captivity. 5. Your fathers, where are they? Fathers and prophets alike were now gone. Man is as grass that withers, but there is an abiding force in the universe (Isa 40:6-8).

6. Did they not take hold of your fathers? Man is mortal, but God's words and statutes are undying. Though the former generation was gone, subsequent events revealed the truth of the message of God in the judgments that befell Israel for disobedience. So hath he dealt with us. God fulfilled every prediction to the letter. Zechariah's contemporaries must learn the lessons of history, and decide to obey God implicitly.

II. The Night Visions of Zechariah. 1:7—6:15.

A. Vision of the Horses and Riders. 1:7-17.

7. Upon the four and twentieth day of the eleventh month. All eight night visions were granted the prophet in one night, three months after the first message. They form a unit which finds its key in the first vision.

8. A man riding upon a red horse. In verses 11,12 the man on the red horse is said to be the "angel of the Lord." The Angel of the Lord throughout the OT is designated as God (see Gen 16:7-13; Ex 3:2-6; Jud 13:9-18,22; and others). The Babylonian Talmud interprets: "This man is no other than the Holy One, blessed be He; for it is said, 'The Lord is a man of war.'" Red horses, speckled, and white. It has been suggested that the colors of the horses represent the distinctive missions of the horses with their riders. According to usage, red signifies war, in this instance judgment on Israel's foes (cf. Rev 6:4). The fact that the Angel of the Lord is riding on this horse, reveals what the purpose of God was for that hour. Sorrel is a mixture of the other colors. White indicates victory (cf. Rev 6:2). The myrtles represent Israel.

9. The angel that talked with me. This angel is the mediating or interpreting angel, commissioned to explain the visions to the prophet (cf. Rev 1:1; 22:16). He does not introduce the visions, but he clarifies their significance to Zechariah.

10. The Lord hath sent to walk to and fro through the earth. The horses, which symbolize divine activity among the nations of the earth, were sent on a mission of reconnoitering. God is always interested in the affairs of earth, especially as they touch the fortunes of his earthly people, Israel. 11. All the earth sitteth still. The report of the riders was an unusual one; they brought word that the earth was in a state of peace. Actually, the early years of Darius' reign had been stormy, marked by repeated rebellions throughout his domain; but in this year all was calm again. But God had foretold that the nations would be shaken (Hag 2:21,22). Why the disparity, and how was it to be explained?

12. How long wilt thou not have mercy. The contrast between the tranquil nations and the downtrodden people of God was painful; so the Angel of the Lord interceded for them. He prayed that mercy might be extended to them after their long period of chastisement under the disciplinary hand of God. These threescore and ten years. The period has been variously reckoned. One calculation sets the terminal dates as 606 B.C. (cf. II Kgs 24:1) and 538 B.C., the year of Cyrus' decree to rebuild (cf. Jer 25:11; 29:10). In this case seventy years would be obtained either by counting both terminal years, an ancient practice, or by considering seventy to be a round number. Here the seventy years seems to refer to the period from 586 to 516, when the Temple ("my house," v. 16) lay in ruins.

13. Good words and comfortable words. In accordance with their need God answered them with words that foretold good and bore comfort. The remainder of the first vision shows what the consoling words were. The comfort consisted of the Lord's assurance of (1) his continued jealousy for Israel; (2) his great displeasure with the nations; (3) his return to Jerusalem with mercy; (4) the rebuilding of the Temple; (5) the restoration of the ruined city; (6) the prosperity of the cities in the land; (7) the comfort of Zion; and (8) the choice of Jerusalem.

14. I am jealous for Jerusalem. It was comfort indeed for Israel to know that God was still actively concerned and zealous for her welfare. 15. I am very sore displeased with the heathen. This is the reverse of the concept of God's jealous love for Israel. By the very nature of the case he must be unalterably opposed to all who seek the hurt of his people. At ease. The fact that the nations were then enjoying peace did not signify that God's blessing was upon them. They helped forward the affliction. It is true that God had commissioned the nations to chastise Israel, but they undertook and carried out the assignment for themselves and not for him. Their evil purpose dominated their actions. They had no thought for God's glory; thus they were carelessly and unfeelingly at ease as well.

16. I am returned to Jerusalem with mercies. Now God's purposes concerning Israel related to their restoration, blessing, and enlargement. My house shall be built in it. The mark of God's returned favor to Jerusalem was the rebuilding of the Temple. The Temple was already being built, but it was not finished until the sixth year of Darius (Ezr 6:15). A line shall be stretched forth. Before a city was devoted to destruction, a line was stretched over it, as though to limit and define the area of desolation (cf. II Kgs 21:13). Now a line was to be stretched over the city of Jerusalem preparatory to building (cf. Job 38:5). A complete reversal of conditions is indicated thereby.

17. Shall yet be spread abroad. The cities of Judah were to realize a remarkable prosperity. Josephus, the Jewish historian of the first century A.D., claimed that the population of the land had increased greatly by the time of the Maccabees (second century B.C.). The Lord shall yet comfort Zion. God's strong consolations for his people would disclose to their understanding hearts the immutability of his choice of them as his own. No one will deny that these predictions were fulfilled in those days of the sixth century B.C., but the larger scope of Scripture shows that they will have their fullest realization in Messianic days.

B. Vision of the Horns and Artisans. 1:18-21.

18. Behold four horns. In the Hebrew canon the second vision begins the second chapter of the book. The English versions follow the LXX and the Vulgate. Neither arrangement affects the sense of the passage. In the Bible the horn is a well-recognized figure for power; horned animals manifest their strength through their horns (cf. Mic 4:13; Dan 8:3,4). Interpreters differ as to the significance of the four horns. It has been suggested that they represent: the four quarters of the earth; the foes of Israel on every side; specific enemies on the fringes of the Promised Land; all the adversaries that Israel encounters until the reign of the Messiah. Taking the broad testimony of Scripture, especially in view of the figures in Daniel and Revelation, a large number of expositors refer the horns to the four world powers of Daniel 2; 7; 8—namely, Babylon, Persia, Greece, and Rome. This is probably the view that is best substantiated. It is not to be denied that in Zechariah's day the third and fourth kingdoms had not yet come into existence, but prophecy is known to gather up in one broad panorama the component elements of the prophetic plan. Compare Isa 61:1-3; Dan 9:24-27; Zech 9:9,10.

20. Four carpenters. The word in the original is employed for any skilled workman, whether in wood, metal, or stone.

21. These are come to fray them. The artisans came purposely to frighten and strike terror into the hearts of the nations that had dealt mercilessly with Israel, leaving them in a prostrate and crushed condition. For every enemy of Israel God has a corresponding instrument of judgment to carry out his punishment upon them.

C. Vision of the Surveyor. 2:1-13.

1. A man with a measuring line. From the analogy of the other visions this is probably an angel in human form. He is not the Angel of the Lord, for he is designated more precisely than that one usually is, and with fuller mention (cf. Ezk 40:3; Rev 11:1,2). 2. Whither goest thou? The prophet's question gains for him the knowledge that the man with the measuring line intended to measure the city of Jerusalem to determine its exact dimensions. This does not mean that the city of Jerusalem was completely restored at that time. It was being surveyed with a view to completion of that task.

3. Another angel went out to meet him. In order that Zechariah may give the intended message to his contemporaries, the interpreting angel goes to receive the message from another angel delegated for that purpose.

4. As towns without walls. The young prophet is informed that Jerusalem will be so enlarged that it will spread beyond its bounds. Because of the multiplication of men and cattle in her, she will be inhabited as villages without walls. Jerusalem was to experience a population explosion unparalleled in her history. For dwelling safely without walls, see I Sam 6:18; Est 9:19; Ezk 38;39. This population increase did not follow the return from exile; it is related to the distant day indicated in the next verse.

5. A wall of fire. Tangible walls would be lacking in Jerusalem, but the Lord himself would be as an impenetrable wall of fire for her protection. The glory in the midst of her. But protection is only part of Israel's need. The return of the Shekinah glory is here promised. The spiritual need of the nation will be met with the return of that glory which Ezekiel saw depart from the city. This prophecy awaits fulfillment in the Millennial day (Ezk 11:23; cf. Hab 2:14).

6. Flee from the land of the north. Some of the exiled Jews, because of the infirmities of age and for other reasons, had chosen to remain in Babylon. The Lord now urgently exhorted them to flee the doomed city. Calamity was again to fall upon that wicked city after her futile attempt to revolt in the reign of Darius. As the four winds of the heaven. They were scattered not to all quarters of the globe, but with great intensity, as though by means of the four winds.

8. After the glory hath he sent me. The glory can hardly refer to the time of glory in verse 5, for in that case more particulars would have been given, as in other references to this time of blessing. Furthermore, God will visit judgment on Israel's enemies after he comes to dwell in Jerusalem, not prior to that era. The verse means, rather, that God will send the Messiah for the vindication of his glory by dealing with the nations who have oppressed Israel. The apple of his eye. The pupil of the eye is most tender, easily injured, irreplaceable, and carefully protected. So is Israel in God's sight. 9. I will shake mine hand upon them. With this threatening gesture (cf. Isa 11:15) God will reverse the condition of Israel, so that their masters will become their servants.

10. Lo, I come, and I will dwell in the midst of thee. Zion's joy will be complete in the return of her Messiah in his visible appearing (cf. 9:9; Mal 3:1). 11. Many nations shall be joined to the Lord. In the hour of his power and glory Messiah will draw many nations to himself. I will dwell in the midst of thee. For the third time in this chapter the prophet declares that Messiah will dwell in the midst of his people (cf. 8:20-23). 12. The Lord shall inherit Judah. The fact that many nations will be blessed in Christ the Lord will not detract from Israel's glory. Israel will continue to be the heritage of the Lord, and the Holy City will still be the place of his abode.

13. He is raised up out of his holy habitation. When the Lord is silent in human affairs, it is as though he were asleep. In his intervention, he is likened to a man awaking to action, or a lion roused from his lair.

D. Vision of Joshua the High Priest. 3:1-10.

1. Joshua the high priest standing before the angel of the Lord. The previous visions have stressed blessing for Israel. But these promises are contingent upon obedience and the cleansing of the nation. The fourth vision reveals that the priestly office of Israel must be reinstated in the favor of God. A polluted priesthood had brought woe upon Israel; it needed purging (cf. Ezk 22:26). Zechariah saw Joshua the high priest, in his official and representative capacity, standing before the Angel of the Lord in the performance of his priestly ministry. Suddenly he found himself the object of the accusations of Satan. If he were cast off, the nation also would be rejected; if he were cleared, the nation would be accepted. Satan standing at his right hand. Satan appeared in order to lodge his condemnation (cf. Ps 109:31).

2. The Lord that hath chosen Jerusalem. Messiah called down the rebuke of the Father on Satan, not because Israel was righteous, not because Satan had exaggerated his claims, not because the nation had already suffered in the fire of exile, but because God had made an eternal and immutable choice of Israel out of love for her (cf. Rom 9:16; 11:5). A brand plucked out of the fire. The figure is used of Israel, because, although she had been under God's hand of chastening, he still had future purposes of blessing for the world through her.

3. Joshua was clothed with filthy garments. The priesthood was besmirched with the filth of sin. How incongruous, then, that a priest should attempt to stand before the holy Angel of the Lord. 4. Take away the filthy garments. Joshua was powerless to remedy the condition; he could do nothing to cleanse himself. The removal of the polluted garments symbolizes forgiveness, acceptance, and reinstatement in the priestly office. 5. Let them set a fair mitre upon his head. This command of the Angel of the Lord involves the complete cleansing and clothing of the priesthood (cf. Ex 28:36-38).

7. Walk in my ways. The basic requirement for God's servants is to exercise care in the matter of personal piety. Keep my charge. This relates to the faithful performance of official duties. Judge my house. The priests were called upon to pronounce on clean and unclean (Lev 10:10). Keep my courts. The courts of the Lord needed to be guarded against defilement. Places to walk among these that stand by. The greatest blessing of all would be the granting of access (lit., walks or paths) among the angels of heaven. Immediate communion with the Lord is indicated.

8. They are men wondered at. Literally, they are men who are a sign, typical men, who point to another. My servant the Branch. It is clear that the antitype is the Messiah of Israel. Both Servant and Branch are designations in the OT for the Messiah. See Isa 42:1; 52:13; Ezk 34:23,24; Isa 4:2; Jer 23:5. The humanity and humility of the Messiah are emphasized.

9. The stone. This is a third name of Messiah (cf. Ps 118:22; Mt 21:42; I Pet 2:6). The graving thereof. The allusion is to all the graces, beauties, and gifts of the Messiah, fitting him for his great work. I will remove the iniquity of that land in one day. Here is the climax of the vision and the purpose of the symbol. Israel's iniquity is to be removed once for all through the work of the Messiah. As Joshua and his companions were cleansed, and the nation with them, so Messiah will accomplish all this for his people in the future.

10. Under the vine and under the fig tree. Repeatedly in the OT, when Israel is in proper spiritual relationship with the Lord, material prosperity is granted her (cf. Mic 4:4 with I Kgs 4:25).

E. Vision of the Golden Lampstand. 4:1-14.

1. The angel that talked with me came again. Just as the vision of chapter 3 was meant for the encouragement of Joshua, so the vision of this chapter is intended for the strengthening of Zerubbabel. The civil leader had been thwarted again and again in his efforts to build the Temple.

2. A candlestick all of gold. The prophet was familiar with the lampstand in the Tabernacle of Moses (cf. Ex 25:31-40) and with that in Solomon's Temple, but this golden candelabrum differed from those in four details – the bowl, pipes, olive trees, and golden spouts. There were seven lamps to the lampstand, and seven conduits to each lamp, suggesting an abundant and unstinting supply of oil.

6. Not by might, nor by power, but by my spirit, saith the Lord of hosts. The revelation from God to Zerubbabel was that all his work for God depended not on human strength, power, or prowess, but upon God's Spirit for fruition. By this passage it is known that oil in Scripture is a symbol of the Holy Spirit.

7. Before Zerubbabel thou shalt become a plain. Any mountainous obstacle in Zerubbabel's way would become as nothing before the power of God's Spirit. The headstone. The civil leader would see the completion of the structure he had begun. Grace, grace unto it. The people of God would call down God's grace and favor upon the completed sanctuary. 9. His hands shall also finish it. In order that Zerubbabel might have strong and unmistakable consolation for the task, the promise of verse 7 is reiterated.

10. The day of small things. From Ezr 3:12,13 and Haggai 2:3 it is known that in Israel many made unfavorable comparisons between the glorious Temple of Solomon and the structure then being built. The time of their rebuilding is here designated as the day of small things. The eyes of the Lord. The eyes of men may have looked with disdain upon the work at hand, but the eyes of the Lord viewed with favor the building activity of Zerubbabel. Furthermore, God's providential care, which takes in the whole earth, was committed to the finishing of the Temple (cf. II Chr 16:9).

14. These are the two anointed ones. The two olive trees at either side of the lampstand represent the anointed ones (lit., sons of oil), who were the channels through whom the grace of God was then mediated to his people. The individuals under consideration were Joshua and Zerubbabel, the religious and civil agents of God. Ultimately, the one through whom all religious or spiritual and civil or governmental blessings are conveyed is the Lord Jesus Christ.

F. Vision of the Flying Roll. 5:1-4.

1. A flying roll. A roll or scroll is employed in Scripture for a pronouncement of judgment (cf. Ezk 2:9,10; Rev 5:1 and 10:2 in context). Before Israel becomes the light of the world (chapter 4), she must be judged individually and nationally for sin. 2. The length thereof. The scroll must have been unrolled in order for its dimensions and contents to be seen. The fact that it was flying indicates that its disclosures were soon to be visited on the wicked.

3. The curse that goeth forth over the face of the whole earth. The Mosaic covenant carried with it a curse upon the transgressor (Deut 27:15-26; 28:15-68). This curse hovered over and threatened the land of the people of Israel, to whom the Law was given (cf. Ex 20:1,2). Stealeth. Stealing was a violation of the middle commandment of the second table of the law; swearing falsely by God's name transgressed the middle commandment of the first table. Men who violated these commandments were false to God and man. These two commandments are used representatively for the entire law of Moses.

4. And shall consume it. The curse will not go astray; it will find the guilty and extirpate him, root and branch.

G. Vision of the Woman in the Ephah. 5:5-11.

6. An ephah. The ephah was the largest measure in use among the Jews. It is employed here to symbolize the appearance of the wicked in the land; as grains are brought together in a measure, so the ungodly of the land will be gathered together for final disposition. 7. There was lifted up a talent of lead. This was done in order to permit the prophet to see the contents of the ephah. This is a woman. A woman is compared to wickedness in Prov 2:16; 5:3,4. The feminine is used in Hebrew to convey abstract ideas. In the NT, wickedness is headed up in the "man of sin" (II Thess 2:3). 8. He cast the weight of lead. Evidently this was done to hinder the escape of the woman from the place of her confinement. 9. There came out two women. They are part of the imagery; two are indicated because of the burden to be carried between them. 11. In the land of Shinar. The reference is to Babylonia (cf. Gen 10:10,11; 11:2; Isa 11:11). This was the area where men had first united in a widespread rebellion against God. Throughout the Scriptures it represents confusion in spiritual matters, idolatry, moral uncleanness (cf. Rev 17:3-5). In Babylon culminates all that defies God and his righteousness on earth. Godlessness of every sort, including that of Israel, will find its place there.

H. Vision of the Chariots. 6:1-8.

1. There came four chariots. The chariot vision completes the series seen by Zechariah in one night. It concludes in thought what was set forth in the first vision. The chariots evidently put into operation the judgment decrees of the Lord. Since chariots were employed in warfare, the purpose of these in the vision is clear. The number four does not refer to the four world powers of Daniel, for the four geographical notations in this passage do not conform to the monarchies of Daniel 2 and 7. Rather, they stand for God's agents by which he is to pour out judgment on Israel's adversaries. Between two mountains. The original employs the definite article, the two mountains; that is, Mount Moriah and the Mount of Olives. The chariots ran through the Valley of Jehoshaphat.

2. Red horses. They represent war. Black horses. Calamity is probably indicated. 3. White horses. Victory and joy are symbolized by this color. Grisled and bay horses. Possibly plagues and pestilence are indicated by these colors. 5. Which go forth from standing before the Lord. Each agency went forth to accomplish God's will in regard to its particular objective.

8. Quieted my spirit in the north country. God's wrath was quieted in the north country, or Babylonia. (Though not actually north of Israel, Babylonia was reached by traveling in a northerly direction.) It is true that the remnant had been delivered from the rule of Babylon by God's judgment on that country through Cyrus. But though Babylon had been subdued by Cyrus, it revolted in the fifth year of Darius, who summarily devastated and depopulated the country.

I. The Crowning of Joshua. 6:9-15.

10. Of Heldai, of Tobijah, and of Jedaiah. As a sort of postscript to the night visions, the prophet concludes with a symbolic act. Three men had come as a deputation from Babylon to the home of Josiah the son of Zephaniah with a gift from the exiles for the building of the Temple under construction. The same day. This is the same day as that of 1:7; that night the prophet was given the series of visions.

11. Crowns. The original indicates one splendid crown made up of several circlets, for it was intended for the head of Joshua alone. As in chapter 3 he is typical of Messiah, both in his name and in his office. The Levitical priesthood stipulated no crowning of the high priest. A crown did not pertain to his ministrations or office. A mitre belonged to the priestly office, a crown to the kingly office.

12. Whose name is The Branch. The picture of the Messiah in 6:12,13 has been acclaimed as the most inclusive in the OT. The idea in Branch is one of humility and lowliness. Out of his place. He will originate, as to his humanity, from his native land; he will not be of foreign extraction. The temple of the Lord. This is not the restoration Temple of that hour, for Zerubbabel was promised he would complete it (cf. ch. 4). It is the Millennial Temple of Ezekiel 40 to 48.

13. He shall be a priest upon his throne. In true Melchizedek fashion (cf. Heb 5:10) he shall be a Priest-King (cf. Ps 110:4). The concepts of permanence, security, and a finished atonement are all here. Counsel of peace shall be between them both. In one person will be united the priestly and kingly dignities; these two functions will be blended in the Person of the Messiah.

14. For a memorial. The crown was to be kept as a memorial of the godly concern of the deputation (and of those whom they represented) for the things of God.

15. They that are far off. Zechariah now sees the deputation that came from Babylon as representative of the Gentiles who will come in the reign of Messiah to build the Temple of the Lord (cf. Isa 60:10,11).

III. Questions Concerning Fasting. 7:1–8:23.

A. The Question. 7:1-3.

1. In the fourth year. The fourth year of Darius' reign was 518 B.C. The people had labored diligently on the Temple, and the work had made much progress. New homes were built in Jerusalem, and the old scars of destruction were being erased. 2. They had sent unto the house of God. The city of Bethel had sent a delegation to Jerusalem for two purposes: to entreat God's blessing, and to ask about certain national fasts. 3. Fifth month.

The question was: With all the marks of new life in the national economy, was it still needful to go on fasting and mourning in the fifth month, as they had done during the days of exile? The fast on the tenth day of the fifth month commemorated the burning of Jerusalem in 586 B.C. (cf. Jer 52:12,13). It is still the greatest fast day of the Jews (except for the Day of Atonement, which has an altogether different purpose in mind). The question would seem to indicate that the fasting was both irksome and burdensome.

B. The Lesson from History. 7:4-14.

5. Did ye at all fast unto me, even to me? With one clear stroke this question tore away all the pretense and hypocrisy in their rites and ceremonies. God had not instituted this fast; neither was it carried out to glorify him. It was done to satisfy the carnal heart and spirit. God was not taken into consideration at all. Then as now God wanted truth in the inward parts. The prophet added the fast of the seventh month in his questioning. Later he adds two other fasts (cf. 8:19). All were connected with the fall of Jerusalem under the Chaldean Nebuchadnezzar. In the tenth month Nebuchadnezzar besieged Jerusalem (II Kgs 25:1); in the fourth month the enemy entered the city (II Kgs 25:3,4; Jer 39:2); in the fifth month the Temple was burned (II Kgs 25:8,9); and in the seventh month Gedaliah, the Jewish governor of Judah, was assassinated (II Kgs 25:23-25). 6. Did ye not eat for yourselves. In their feasting, as in their fasting, their self-centered outlook was manifest. Whether in the one practice or in the other, they were self-righteous and self-satisfied.

7. Should ye not hear. Why should they trouble themselves about something God had not commanded, when they were so heedless of what he had explicitly charged them again and again through the pre-Exilic prophets? It is far better to offer God obedience than to heap up fasts without number (cf. Isa 58:1-9). The carnal conscience seeks to ease itself by formal ordinances, instead of taking warning from God's visitations regarding departures from his revealed will. Sin was the cause of their fasting. If sin were forsaken, the fasting would no longer be necessary.

9. Execute true judgment. The former prophets had all united in their testimony for practical righteousness in everyday life. God delights in the proper administration of justice. Mercy and compassion between brothers delight the heart of the infinitely merciful Creator. 10. The widow, nor the fatherless, the stranger, nor the poor. The less fortunate and the unprotected are always the special charge of the Lord; any kindness shown them is especially pleasing to him. Imagine evil against his brother. Resentment and hatred in the heart against a neighbor are clearly prohibited. Faith and piety must go hand in hand. Religion without morality is useless and a mockery; morality without true religion or piety is without proper foundation and only temporary at best.

11. But they refused to hearken. Here is a summary of the attitude of Israel through the centuries to the ministry of the prophets as they preached faith, piety, and social justice. 12. Therefore came a great wrath. When repeated warnings and loving entreaties failed, there remained only the wrath of God for the impenitent. God cannot abdicate as Moral Governor of the universe. His message had been faithfully delivered through the energizing Spirit by the hands, hearts, and mouths of his servants, the prophets (cf. II Chr 36:16).

13. So they cried, and I would not hear. They experienced retribution in kind. When they would not hear God's pleas for obedience, he sovereignly refused to hear their cries of distress, arising only out of the bitterness of their calamities and not out of true contrition. 14. Among all the nations. Up to that hour they had been scattered primarily to Assyria and Babylonia. If the text is to be permitted to have its full significance and plain sense, it must look on to the world-wide dispersion of the Jews, consequent upon their rejection of their Messiah, the greatest exhibition of their obdurate disobedience to the words of the Lord and his messengers. No man passed through. The land that had formerly been a delight was to be forsaken and without inhabitant. Though the enemy accomplished this destruction, Israel is charged with the responsibility therefor, because her sin had been the procuring cause.

C. God's Purpose of Blessing for Israel. 8:1-23.

2. I was jealous for Zion. The line of thought carried on in chapter 7 is pursued further in this passage. Twice God declares his continuing love and concern for Israel (cf. ch. 1). Great fury. This love must deal in wrath with those who harass God's people. 3. I am returned unto Zion. God is so resolved to return to Zion in blessing in the future, that he speaks of it as though done. A city of truth. This is the result of the Lord's dwelling in her midst.

4. Old men and old women. The picture is one of peace and security. When Israel is properly related to the Lord in spiritual matters, temporal blessings always follow. 5. Full of boys and girls. Wars will not intrude to cut short the lives and expectations of youth (cf. Ex 20:12; Deut 33:6,24). Doubtless some of these features were present in Maccabean times, but conditions of that day will not suffice for the full realization of these promises. They await fulfillment in Messiah's reign (cf. Isa 65:20,22).

6. Should it also be marvellous in mine eyes? Though these predictions may appear impossible with man, nothing is too wonderful for the Lord (Gen 18:14; Mt 19:26). 7. From the east country, and from the west country. Israel must be in the Land of Promise before she can realize God's ultimate purpose for her. Restoration to the land is a basic prerequisite according to the testimony of the prophetic Scriptures. The return will be from all the corners of the earth (cf. Isa 11:11,12; Amos 9:14,15).

9. Let your hands be strong. The words of Haggai and Zechariah were intended to be full of encouragement and hope for the laborers on the Temple.

10. Before these days. Before the people had decided to resume the work of rebuilding, their condition was indeed precarious. Labor was unrewarding, and civil strife accompanied attacks from the enemies without (Hag 1:6, 9-11; 2: 16-19). 11. But now. Their obedience has changed the entire outlook. God has committed himself to bless them and their efforts. 12. To possess all these things. The blessings of nature will no longer be withheld; they will be granted in full measure.

13. A curse among the heathen. When the Lord's hand was heavy upon them, they were an example among the nations when their name was employed to utter a curse. They were a curse among (not to) the nations. Ye shall be a blessing. Their name will be used in a formula for blessing (cf. Gen 48:20; Mic 5:7; Zeph 3:20). 15. I thought in these days to do well. If the Lord chastened them for disobedience as he had warned them he would do, will he not all the more bless them in answer to faith? God delights to bless, not to blast.

17. For all these are things that I hate. Again they must be warned how hateful are social and ethical injustices. No substitute for genuine godliness is possible.

19. Cheerful feasts. Zechariah finally comes to the answer to the questions on fasting. God will turn all the fasts into feasts; he will abrogate them in answer to their obedience.

21. Let us go speedily to pray before the Lord. Israel in fellowship with God will be the channel for blessing to all the world (cf. Ps 67; Isa 2:3; 60:3). Nations will thus be drawn to him who would not be drawn otherwise. 23. We have heard that God is with you. The nations will yearn to know the blessings that Israel will have in their hour of spiritual revival and return.

IV. The Future of the Nations, Israel, and Messiah's Kingdom. 9:1–14: 21.

A. The First Burden. 9:1–11:17.

1) The Victories of Alexander the Great. 9:1-8.
