The uncircumcision; i. e. the uncircumcised; a figurative and frequent way of speaking: see chap. iii. 30; iv. 9. Keep the righteousness of the law; which none of them ever did; but admit they could, or else, which some of them have done, in sincerity, though with manifold imperfections; such as the two centurions, one of which is mentioned in the Gospel of Luke, the other in the Acts: if in this sense the uncircumcised keep the righteousness of the law, shall they not be all one in the account of God as if they were circumcised? See Rom. iv. 10.

27 And shall not uncircumcision which is by nature, if it fulfil the law, judge thee, who by the letter and circumcision dost transgress the law?

Uncircumcision which is by nature; a periphrasis of the Gentiles, who want circumcision, or are by nature without it. Fulfil the law; here is another word; before it was keep, but now it is fulfil the law: though the word be varied, yet the sense is the same: see James ii. 8. Judge thee; i. e. rise up in judgment against thee; or else, shall he not do it by his example? as in Matt. xii. 41, 42, the men of Nineveh, and the queen of Sheba, shall judge the Israelites. The meaning is, the obedient Gentile shall condemn the disobedient Jew. By the letter and circumcision dost transgress the law; i. e. the outward literal circumcision; or, by the letter understand the law; see 2 Cor. iii. 6. The sense is, by means of the law and circumcision, and resting in them, as pledges of the love of God, (so ver. 17,) they are the more secure and bold in sinning against God; it is to them an occasion of transgression.

28 For he is not a Jew, which is one outwardly; neither is that circumcision, which is outward in the flesh:

He is not a Jew; a right or true Jew, who is heir of the promises made to the fathers. That is one outwardly; the word only is to be understood: see 1 Cor. i. 17. Neither is that circumcision; the right and true circumcision, which God principally requires, and is available unto salvation: that circumcision is not much to be accounted of which is only the cutting off an outward skin.

29 But he is a Jew, which is one inwardly; and his circumcision is that of the heart, in the spirit, and not in the letter; whose praise is not of men, but of God.

He is a right and true Jew, an Israelite indeed, that hath taken away the foreskin of his heart, Jer. iv. 4; that is cleansed from all corrupt affections, and hath laid aside all superfluity of unrighteousness; that worshippeth God in the Spirit, rejoiceth in Christ Jesus, and hath no confidence in the flesh. Such are the circumcision and Jews indeed: see Phil. iii. 3.

CHAP. III

The Jew's prerogative, 1, 2; which is not vacated by the unbelief of some, 3, 4; nor is God's justice impeached in punishing their sinfulness, 5—8. The law itself condemneth the Jews also universally of sin, 9—19; so that no flesh is justified by the deeds of the law, 20; but all indiscriminately by God's grace through faith in Christ, 21—30: yet without annulling the obligations of the law, 31.

WHAT advantage then hath the Jew? or what profit is there of circumcision?

What advantage then hath the Jew? an elegant prolepsis or anticipation of what might be objected against the apostle's assertion in the foregoing words. If the Jews (might some object) lie equally exposed to condemnation with the Gentiles, then they have no excellency above them. Or thus, If external things do not commend us to God, (as it is affirmed, chap. ii. 28, 29,) but the Gentiles are brought into the church without them, then the Jews have no prerogative above the Gentiles, though God hath owned them so long for his peculiar people. What profit is there of circumcision? i. e. what is the use of it, or for what end was it instituted, seeing the uncircumcised are brought in and accepted, as being circumcised notwithstanding, and clean in heart?

2 Much every way: chiefly, because that unto them were committed the oracles of God.

He answers the before-mentioned objection by a libera and free concession. The answer doth particularly relate to the first member of the objection, though comprehending the other. Chiefly; this word is not to be referred to the order of speech, as chap. i. 8, for he doth not begin any discourse here; nor to the number of privileges and advantages, for he names but one in all; but to the quality, and so the excellency, of this privilege here spoken of; q. d. It is the chief of all. Unto them were committed the oracles of God: profane writers make this word to signify the answer that was given by the demons, or heathen gods; and yet the Holy Ghost doth not disdain to make use of this word, (as well as divers others,) though abused to heathenish superstition. The sense is, To the Jews were credited, or given in custody, the Holy Scriptures, containing all the books of the Old Testament, in particular the legal covenant, or law of God, given on Mount Sinai, which Stephen calls the lively oracles, Acts vii. 38; more especially yet the fundamental articles of religion, and doctrines of grace, and salvation by the Messias, called the oracles of God, Heb. v. 12, though more hid, it is true, in types, promises, and predictions.

3 For what if some did not believe? shall their unbelief make the faith of God without effect?

If some did not believe; if some did remain in infidelity, Acts xxviii. 24, if they would give no credit to the oracle, and to the promise of a Messiah. The faith of God; i. e. the truth and faithfulness of God, Psal. xxxiii. 4. The whole verse is another prolepsis. The implied objection is this, That the Jews are nothing the better for these oracles, or have no advantage by them, if by unbelief they have rendered themselves unworthy or incapable of benefit by them. The answer to this is anticipated by propounding another question; Can the infidelity of some be any hindrance of God's performing his promise to others, to his chosen ones? The interrogation is a negation, q. d. It cannot be, as the following words show: see 2 Tim. ii. 13.

4 "God forbid: yea, let <sup>h</sup>God be true, but <sup>i</sup>every man a liar; as it is written, <sup>j</sup>That thou mightest be justified in thy sayings, and mightest overcome when thou art judged.

God forbid; the negation that was closely couched in the former verse, is in this expressed by a note of indignation, and of the greatest detestation. Let God be true; let him remain or appear faithful to his promises and covenant; or, let him be acknowledged to be so, according to the frequent testimonies of Scripture: see Numb. xxiii. 19; Tit. i. 2; Heb. vi. 17, 18. But every man a liar; or, although every man should be a liar; or, whatsoever we say of men, who are all mutable creatures, who are liable to mistakes in their own natures, and so may easily deceive others: see Psal. cxvi. 11. That thou mightest be justified in thy sayings; that thou mightest be acknowledged just in thy promises and threatenings; in which sense the word is used in divers places, Matt. xi. 19; Luke vii. 29, 35; x. 29. Mightest overcome; that thou mightest be clear or pure, so it is in the Psalm. The apostle honours the Seventy, which was the common translation, and minds the sense rather than the words. He that is clear, is like to overcome in a just judgment. When thou art judged; or, when thou judgest: the word may be taken actively or passively; i. e. when thou dost execute judgment upon any, or, when any do presume to censure you.

5 But if our unrighteousness commend the righteousness of God, what shall we say? <sup>k</sup>Is God unrighteous who taketh vengeance? (<sup>l</sup>I speak as a man)

i Gal. 3. 15.

But if our unrighteousness commend the righteousness of God; an anticipation of another objection, which might be made upon the preceding words: that if the faithfulness of God, in keeping his promises, doth appear in and notwithstanding the unfaithfulness of men, then we gather thus much, that the fidelity of God is rendered a great deal more commendable by the perfidiousness of man. What shall we say? thus we object, or this will be the inconvenience. Is God unrighteous who taketh vengeance? i. e. then God is unjust in punishing the Jews, or any other wicked men, for that which tends to his own glory, and the commendations of his veracity. I speak as a man; this is the language of carnal men, and such blasphemy they speak; I recite the objection of some men, and speak after their carnal manner.

j Job 4. 3. &
k 34. 17.

6 God forbid: for then <sup>m</sup>how shall God judge the world?

God forbid; he rejects the cavil with his usual note of detestation, as not thinking it worthy of answer. For then how shall God judge the world? q. d. If God were in the least unrighteous, how could he govern the world at present, and judge it at last in righteousness? which is affirmed, Psal. xcvi. 13; xcviii. 9. Or, how could he be God and supreme, if he were not just by his nature and essence, and his will the very rule of righteousness: see Gen. xviii. 25; Job xxxiv. 12.

7 For if the truth of God hath more abounded through my lie unto his glory; why yet am I also judged as a sinner?

By truth he means the faithfulness and veracity of God; as by lie, the perfidiousness and inconstancy of man; ut supra et alibi. Why yet am I also judged as a sinner? q. d. If more glory accrues to the name of God by my wickedness, what reason is there that I should be punished, and proceeded against as an offender, who have occasioned this further glory to God? The apostle doth plainly personate in this place a wicked objector, or he speaks in the name and person of such a one. This way of speaking and writing is very frequent among all authors; and it is found sometimes with the penmen of the Holy Scriptures: see Eccles. iii. 19—22; 1 Cor. xv. 32. The apostle tells the Corinthians, 1 Cor. iv. 6, that in a figure he transferred some things to himself and to Apollos for their sakes, that they might not be puffed up; he counted such schemes and figures as these to be most profitable and efficacious to the reader.

8 And not rather, (as we be slanderously reported, and as some affirm that we say,) <sup>n</sup>Let us do evil, that good may come? whose damnation is just.

The placing of these words makes them sound harshly, and consequently causeth obscurity. Critics make a great stir about them, some including them in a parenthesis, others affirming there is a transposition in them. They seem to be a refutation to the former cavil, and must be accommodated to that sense. It is as if the apostle should have said, If sinners deserve no punishment, because God reaps glory to himself by their sins; then that is a good proverb, or saying, which is in some men's mouths, and we ourselves are slandered with it, as if it were our opinion and doctrine, That we may do evil, that good may come of it. But this saying is generally exploded; none dare to vouch it, and therefore the former cavil is of no force. Whose damnation is just; i. e. their damnation is just, who teach such doctrine, and practise accordingly; who do evil, that good may come of it. The apostle doth not vouchsafe to refute this absurd saying, but simply condemns it, and those that put it in practice. Or else his meaning in these words is this, that they justly deserve damnation, who calumniate the apostles and publishers of the gospel, and raise false reports and slanders of them: their damnation is just, who affirm we say or hold, That evil may be done, that good may come thereof.

9 What then? are we better than they? No, in no wise: for we have before <sup>o</sup>proved both Jews and Gentiles, that <sup>p</sup>they are all under sin;

+ Gr. charged, ch. 1. 23, &c. & 2. 1, &c. 1 ver. 21. Gal. 3. 22.

What then? are we better than they? the apostle here returns to the argument that he had been handling in the beginning of the chapter. He brings in the Jews propounding a question. Seeing it was confessed that the oracles of God were committed to them, then it followed, that they excelled the Gentiles, and stood upon better ground than they. No, in no wise; he doth not contradict himself as to what he had said of the Jews' prerogative, ver. 2. They did indeed excel the Gentiles as to some external benefits, of which you have a larger account, chap. ix. 4, 5, but not upon the account of any evangelical righteousness, or their own supposed merit. We have before proved; viz. separately and apart, in the foregoing chapters; and the same is now to be asserted of both Jews and Gentiles, conjunctly and together; that notwithstanding the Jews boasted of their law, and the Gentiles of their philosophy, yet as to the evangelical faith and righteousness, they were both in the same case. Under sin; under the power of sin, but chiefly under the guilt of sin: see ver. 19.

10 As it is written, <sup>q</sup>There is none righteous, no, not one:

m Ps. 14. 1, 2, 3. & 53. 1.

As it is written; viz. in several places of Scripture, which he quotes in the following verses, giving us the sense, though not so strictly tying himself to the words; and this is a proper proof, to the Jews at least, whom he had called a little before the keepers of these oracles. There is none righteous, no, not one: the more general proof with which he begins, is taken out of Psal. xiv. 11, and liii. 1, upon which places see the annotations.

11 There is none that understandeth, there is none that seeketh after God.

There is none that understandeth; a more particular proof of the corruption of the soul, and the faculties thereof; and first of the mind, taken out of the forecited Psalms, which may be compared with the scriptures which speak of the ignorance and blindness of the mind, Deut. xxxii. 29; Job xxxii. 9; Isa. i. 3; Jer. iv. 22; x. 14. There is none that seeketh after God; a proof of the corruption of the will, which follows also in the forecited Psalms.

12 They are all gone out of the way, they are together become unprofitable; there is none that doeth good, no, not one.

They are all gone out of the way: viz. of truth, or life: see Psal. xiv. 3; xxxvi. 4; lviii. 3. This doth illustrate the former charge. They are together become unprofitable; unuseful, and, which is more noisome, fit only for the dunghill, as the word signifies: this follows also in Psal. xiv.: see Job xv. 16. There is none that doeth good, no, not one; the same as ver. 10, though more exactly according to the words of the Psalm, where also it is twice repeated: see Psal. xiv. 1, 3.

13 Their throat is an open sepulchre; with their tongues they have used deceit; the poison of asps is under their lips:

Their throat is an open sepulchre; he proceeds to instance in the corruption of man with respect to the members of his body; and he mentions the organs of speech in four several expressions, much to the same purpose: the first is allegorical, taken out of Psal. v. 9, upon which see the annotations. With their tongues they have used deceit; this text doth plainly express the corruption of the tongue, because of lies, calumnies, perjuries, flatteries; and it is taken out of Jer. ix. 3-5. The poison of asps is under their lips: the third expression is allegorical, as the first, taken out of Psal. cxl. 3, upon which see the annotations.

14 Whose mouth is full of cursing and bitterness:

This last and very plain expression of the corruption of the tongue, is taken out of Psal. x. 7: see notes there.

15 Their feet are swift to shed blood:

If we consider this member also, we may see the corruption of man; witness that testimony, Prov. i. 16, and Isa. lix. 7; on both which see annotations.

16 Destruction and misery are in their ways: 17 And the way of peace have they not known:

Both which assertions lie together, and follow in that Isa. lix. 7, 8.

18 There is no fear of God before their eyes.

This last assertion gives us one true cause of all the aforesaid evils, taken out of Psal. xxxvi. 1: see notes there.

19 Now we know that what things soever the law saith, it saith to them who are under the law: that every mouth may be stopped, and all the world may become guilty before God.

Another anticipation of an objection, to this purpose: All these testimonies (might the Jews say) do not concern us, they concern the impure and Gentile world only, unless possibly some profane wretches amongst ourselves also. But to this the apostle says, We know (which some think hath the force of an asseveration) that whatsoever the law of God, more especially the Mosaic law, or more generally all that is contained in the Scripture, saith of the wickedness and defection of mankind, it saith to the Jews more particularly, to whom the law was given, and who are under the conduct of it; much the same with that phrase, chap. ii. 12: see chap. vi. 15; 1 Cor. ix. 20. That every mouth may be stopped; i. e. hindered from boasting, to which the Jews were so prone; or rather, that conscience might so press them, that they should silently, or as it were speechless, expect their own damnation, without being able to frame any excuse: see Psal. lxiii. 11; Ezek. xvi. 63; Matt. xxii. 12. And all the world may become guilty before God; that Jews and Gentiles, and all mankind, as depraved, might be obnoxious to the judgment and condemnation of God: see ver. 9, and John iii. 18.

20 Therefore by the deeds of the law there shall no flesh be justified in his sight: for by the law is the knowledge of sin.

Therefore; i. e. Seeing the Gentiles, by the law of nature, and the Jews, by the written law, are thus subject to the judgment of God; and seeing no one is able to fulfil the law, and satisfy for the breach of it; therefore, &c.

By the deeds of the law; he means the moral law, and not the ceremonial law only or chiefly; even that law that forbids theft and adultery, as chap. ii. and concupiscence, as chap. vii.; and by which, as this text says, is the knowledge of sin; to which Gentiles as well as Jews are obliged, and by which therefore they are condemned. No flesh; a common synecdoche: see Gen. vi. 3, 12, and elsewhere. The same with no man living, in the psalmist; especially being depraved with original corruption, which is called flesh in Scripture. Be justified in his sight; or be discharged in the court of heaven: the phrase is taken from Psal. cxliii. 2, see annotations there. For by the law is the knowledge of sin; lest any should think that the law hereupon is useless, he goes on to show its use, but a quite contrary one to what they intended. It convinceth us of our guilt, and therefore is far from being our righteousness, chap. vii. 7; 1 Cor. xv. 56.

21 But now the righteousness of God without the law is manifested, being witnessed by the Law and the Prophets;

But now: q. d. Though justification be not by the law, yet it is to be obtained in another way, as follows. The righteousness of God: see chap. i. 17. Without the law; inasmuch as the law, pressing obedience to be performed by us in our own persons, seems plainly ignorant of the righteousness of another imputed to us. Is manifested; this righteousness nevertheless is revealed plainly, now since the coming of Christ, and in the gospel, as in chap. i. 17. Being witnessed by the law and the prophets; that there may be no suspicion of novelty: see John v. 46, 47. The testimonies he refers to are very numerous: see Gen. iii. 15; xv. 6; xxii. 17, 18; Isa. liii.; Jer. xxxi. 31, 33; Dan. ix. 24, 25. See the same argument used, Acts xxiv. 14; xxvi. 22; xxviii. 23.

22 Even the righteousness of God which is by faith of Jesus Christ unto all and upon all them that believe: for there is no difference:

He mentions the righteousness of God again, that he may further explain it, by the means or instrument by which it is received, viz. faith; see chap. iv. 11, 12; ix. 30; Phil. iii. 9; where there are several expressions to the same purpose, that this righteousness is without the law indeed, but it is by the hand of that faith by which we believe in Jesus, called therefore here, the faith of Jesus Christ. Unto all and upon all them that believe; whether they be Jews or Gentiles, if they believe, excluding the self-justiciaries amongst the one, and the philosophers amongst the other. For there is no difference; they are not justified two several ways: see ver. 9.

23 For all have sinned, and come short of the glory of God;

For all have sinned: q. d. No wonder there is no difference, when both the one and the other have the guilt of Adam's transgression imputed to them, and have original corruption inherent in them, from whence proceed very many actual transgressions. And come short of the glory of God; i. e. of the glorious image of God, in which man was at first created; or, of communion with God, in which the glory of a rational creature doth consist; or rather, of the eternal glory, which they come short of, as men that run a race are weary, and fall short of the mark.

24 Being justified freely by his grace through the redemption that is in Christ Jesus:

Being justified freely by his grace; i. e. Being in this case, they can by no means be acquitted and freed from the accusation and condemnation of the law, but in the way and manner that follows. He mentions the great moving cause of justification first, (which doth comprehend also the principal efficient,) that it is without any cause or merit in us; and by the free favour of God to undeserving, ill-deserving creatures, Eph. i. 6, 7; ii. 8; Tit. iii. 7. Through the redemption that is in Christ Jesus: the meritorious cause is expressed by a metaphor taken from military proceedings, where captives taken in war, and under the power of another, are redeemed upon a valuable price laid

25 Whom God hath set forth to be a propitiation through faith in his blood, to declare his righteousness for the remission of sins that are past, through the forbearance of God ;

Whom God hath set forth ; i. e. God the Father hath proposed this Jesus, in the eternal counsel, and covenant of redemption, Eph. i. 9 ; 1 Pet. i. 20, 21 ; or in the types and shadows of the old tabernacle ; and hath now at last shown him openly to the world. To be a propitiation, or atonement, 1 John ii. 2. He alludes to the mercy-seat sprinkled with blood, which was typical of this great atonement ; and from whence God showed himself so propitious and favourable to sinners, Lev. xvi. 2 ; Numb. vii. 89. Through faith in his blood : he goes on to show the instrumental cause of justification, to wit, faith ; i. e. the close adherence and most submissive dependence of the sinner ; together with the peculiarity of the object of faith, viz. the blood, i. e. the death and sacrifice, of Christ ; in contra-distinction to his dominion, (with which yet on other accounts faith is so much concerned,) and in opposition to the blood of beasts slain and sacrificed. To declare his righteousness ; i. e. for the showing forth either of his goodness and mercy ; see 1 Sam. xii. 7, 8, 10 ; Psal. xxxvi. 10 ; or of his faithfulness in his promises, and fulfilling all types and prophecies ; or else of his vindictive justice, in the just proceedings of God against sin, which he hath condemned in his Son, though he justify the sinner. Or further, it may be understood of the righteousness of faith, of which ver. 22, which is hereby shown to be his ; and to manifest itself in the forgiveness of sins, which is so declared as to be exhibited. For the remission of sins that are past, through the forbearance of God ; he means, either the sins committed before justification, while God bore so patiently with the sinner, and did not presently take the forfeiture ; or else the sins committed under the Old Testament, before the proposed propitiation was exposed to the world, when God so indulged our fathers, as to pardon them upon the account of what was to come : see Heb. ix. 15—18.

26 To declare, I say, at this time his righteousness : that he might be just, and the justifier of him which believeth in Jesus.

To declare, I say, at this time his righteousness ; he repeats the final cause of justification, viz. the making the aforesaid declaration of the righteousness of God, in the time of the gospel, and dispensation and ministry thereof, 2 Cor. vi. 2, which is taken out of Isa. xlix. 8. That he might be just, and the justifier of him which believeth in Jesus ; i. e. that no wrong might be done to the essential purity of his nature, or rectitude of his will ; nor yet to his immediate justice, by which he cannot but hate sin, and abhor the sinner as such ; though in the mean time he gives a discharge to him that is of the faith of Jesus, (as it is in the original,) or of the number of those that believe, and cast themselves upon a Saviour.

27 Where is boasting then ? It is excluded. By what law ? of works ? Nay : but by the law of faith.

Where is boasting then ? the apostle doth, as it were, insult over them : q. d. Where is now the former boasting of the Jews, as if they were so much better than the Gentiles ? or what is become of the ground of boasting, that they, or either of them, might think they had in the law, or philosophy, or any moral performances ? see Jer. ix. 23, 24. It is excluded. By what law ? of works ? if it be inquired upon what account this boasting is excluded, we answer plainly, It cannot be by that law that commands works, as the condition of acceptance and justification, and tells us nothing by whom that condition should be fulfilled ; the law being become weak to us, for such a purpose, by reason of sin, chap. viii. 3. Nay : but by the law of faith ; i. e. the gospel law which requires faith, by which the righteousness of Christ is imputed to us, and attained by us. And this is called a law of faith, as some think, in condescension to the Jews' custom of speaking, who are so much delighted with the name of the law ; and so that he might not be suspected of novelty : but, as most, it is a Hebraism, denoting no more than the doctrine or prescript of faith.

28 Therefore we conclude that a man is justified by faith without the deeds of the law.

Here is the conclusion of the whole matter that he had been discoursing of, from chap. i. 17 to this very place. When he says, we conclude, he means, we have reasoned or argued well, as logicians do ; or this is the full account that we have taken, and summed up, after the manner of arithmeticians. A man is justified by faith without the deeds of the law ; a phrase equivalent to that which is so much spoken against, that we are justified by faith only ; as if we should say, That God is to be worshipped, excluding angels, idols, images, &c., it would be as much as to say, God is to be worshipped only.

29 Is he the God of the Jews only ? is he not also of the Gentiles ? Yes, of the Gentiles also :

By answering his own proposed questions, he plainly shows us, that the covenant of grace, by which God is God of his people, does not belong to the Jews only, that they only should have justification and bliss, but to the Gentiles also, according to the promise, Gen. xvii. 5 ; xxii. 18 ; Psal. ii. 8 ; Isa. xi. 10, 12, and many others ; which promises are more especially to be accomplished, now the wall of partition is broken down, as Eph. ii. 13, 14.

30 Seeing it is one God, which shall justify the circumcision by faith, and uncircumcision through faith.

That it may not be thought that God is variable in the action of justifying sinners, but that it might be known that he is one, i. e. unchangeable, he shows, that both the circumcised Jews and uncircumcised Gentiles are justified by the same God in Christ, and by the same way and manner, viz. by and through faith, with no more difference than there is betwix these two phrases, (by faith and through faith.) which cannot be distinguished the one from the other.

31 Do we then make void the law through faith ? God forbid : yea, we establish the law.

Do we then make void the law through faith ? a very material objection is here to be anticipated and answered, viz. that by establishing justification by faith alone the law is rendered useless, and the obligation thereto destroyed. God forbid : yea, we establish the law : having rejected this objection, by his usual note of abhorrency, he proceeds to show, that nothing more establisheth the law, inasmuch as by faith we attain a perfect righteousness, we are interested in the most complete obedience of Christ to the moral law ; and that hereby every type, promise, and prophecy is fulfilled ; see Matt. v. 17 ; Luke xvi. 17 : and we ourselves also being enabled thereunto by a gospel spirit, have a more exact conformity to the law, though we cannot reach to a fulfilling of it.

CHAP. IV

Abraham himself was justified by faith, 1—8 : which was imputed to him for righteousness before circumcision, that he might be the common father of believers, whether circumcised or not, 9—12. The promise was not given him through the law, else had it been void from the very nature of the law ; but being of faith by grace is sure to all the destined seed, and not to those of the law only, 13—17. The acceptableness of Abraham's faith, 18—22 ; which stands recorded not for his sake only, but for the sake of all who shall profess a like faith in God through Christ, 23—25.

WHAT shall we then say that Abraham, our father as pertaining to the flesh, hath found ?

The apostle proceeds to prove his main conclusion, chap. iii. 28, which is, that a sinner is justified by faith without works, from the example of Abraham. He was a man that had faith and works both, yet he was justified by faith, and not by works ; and who doubts but the children are justifified after the same manner that their father was : there is but one way of justification ; this is the connexion. As pertaining to the flesh : these words may either be referred to father ; and then they import no more but that Abraham was their father according to the flesh, chap. ix. 5. Or else they may be referred to the following word found ; and then the question is, What hath Abraham found, i. e. got or attained, according to the flesh ? The sense is, What hath he got by his righteousness, which stands in works, and are done in the flesh ? Abraham obtained not righteousness by any works, ceremonial or moral. So the word flesh is taken, (see Phil. iii. 3, 4,) when under the word flesh came circumcision, our own righteousness, which is by the law, or whatsoever is or may be opposed to that righteousness which is by the faith of Christ.

27, 28. 2 For if Abraham were justified by works, he hath whereof to glory ; but not before God.

He hath whereof to glory ; he hath cause or matter of glorying and boasting ; he hath something from whence he may take occasion of so doing. But not before God ; something must be supplied to fill up the sense, i. e. he hath nothing whereof to glory before God. The argument of the apostle might be thus formed : If Abraham had obtained justification by works, he should have had somewhat whereof he might glory before God : but he had nothing whereof to glory before God ; therefore he was not justified by works. God's way of justifying sinners is such, as shuts out all glorying and boasting, as he had before laid down, chap. iii. 27.

c Gen. 15. 6.
Gal. 3. 6.
Jan. 2. 23. 3 For what saith the Scripture ? ' Abraham believed God, and it was counted unto him for righteousness.

The scripture referred to is in Gen. xv. 6. The apostle a little varies the words ; in Genesis it is he believed in God, but here he believed God : again, in Genesis it is expressed actively, he counted it to him for righteousness ; but here passively, it was counted to him for righteousness. The answer is, That the apostle in both followed the Septuagint, which was then more in use than the Hebrew text ; and both are capable of an easy reconciliation, the difference being more in sound than in sense. Abraham believed God ; i. e. the promises of God : that he would be his shield and exceeding great reward, Gen. xv. 1 ; that he would give him an heir of his body, ver. 4 ; that he would multiply his seed, ver. 5, whereby he understood not only his fleshly seed, but also the Messiah, the Saviour of the world, which was to come of his loins ; He took on him the seed of Abraham, Heb. ii. 16. And besides these promises in Gen. xv., he believed that promise which was made him, Gen. xii. 3, That in him and his seed all families of the earth should be blessed. That in these promises the Messiah is understood, is evident from Gal. iii. 8, 16 ; and that Abraham had an eye to him is evident, without exception, from John viii. 56. It was counted unto him for righteousness ; i. e. he was justified thereby : to have faith imputed for righteousness, and to be justified by faith, is the same thing. Faith is not our righteousness materially, but objectively and organically, as it apprehends and implies the righteousness of Christ, which is the matter of our justification. Our adversaries the papists oppose the imputation of Christ's righteousness to us ; they cavil at the very word, and call it putative righteousness : and yet the apostle useth the word ten times in this chapter, and in the same sense that we take it. But how shall we reconcile our apostle with St. James, about the manner of Abraham's justification : he says expressly, James ii. 21, that Abraham our father was justified by works, when he offered his son Isaac ; and thence he infers, ver. 24, that by works a man is justified, and not by faith only. They are easily reconciled, forasmuch as the one discourseth of the cause of our justification before God ; the other, of the signs of justification before men. The one speaks of the imputation of righteousness ; the other, of the declaration of righteousness. The one speaks of the office of faith ; the other, of the quality of faith. The one speaks of the justification of the person ; the other, of the faith of that person. The one speaks of Abraham to be justified ; the other, of Abraham already justified.

4 Now <sup>d</sup> to him that worketh is the reward <sup>d ch. 11. 6.</sup> not reckoned of grace, but of debt.

He proceeds to prove, that Abraham was not justified by works, but by faith, and free grace, and so had no cause of boasting. This he illustrates by a comparison betwixt one that worketh, and one that worketh not, but believeth. To him that worketh ; i. e. to him that worketh with a design or intent to obtain or merit justification by his works, for else he that believeth also worketh ; only he is said not to work, secundum quid, after a sort, to the end or intent that he might merit by it. Is the reward not reckoned of grace, but of debt ; he speaks this by way of supposition, in case he should have fulfilled the condition of perfect obedience : and yet, to speak properly, there is no reward, as a due debt from God to him that worketh, Rom. xi. 35 ; only he speaks after the manner of men, and useth a civil maxim, taken from human affairs.

5 But to him that worketh not, but believeth on him that justifieth <sup>e Josh. 24. 2.</sup> the ungodly, his faith is counted for righteousness.

To him that worketh not ; i. e. to him that worketh not to the end or intent before mentioned, or with respect to justification, but takes the other way to be justified and saved, and that is, the way of believing. That justifieth the ungodly ; that makes him, who is wicked in himself, just and righteous in Christ ; or justifies him that was ungodly, but after justification is made godly. By ungodly, some would understand such as want that perfection of godliness, as they may build the hopes of justification upon ; because the proposition is drawn from the instance of Abraham, a man not void of godliness. His faith is counted for righteousness ; not considered in itself as a work, but in relation to Christ, the object of it, and as an act of receiving and applying him ; as eating nourisheth, though it be the meat that doth it.

6 Even as David also describeth the blessedness of the man, unto whom God imputeth righteousness without works,

To the example of Abraham taken from Moses, he adjoins the testimony of David, that so he might more fully prove what he had asserted, chap. iii. 21 : both the one and the other were of great authority amongst the Jews. Here it may be objected, that David no where says, that he is blessed unto whom God imputeth righteousness without works. Answer. Though the words be no where extant in David, yet the sense is, as appears in what follows.

7 Saying, 'Blessed are they whose <sup>f Ps. 32. 1, 2.</sup> iniquities are forgiven, and whose sins are covered.

This testimony is taken out of Psal. xxxii. 1, and it is well enough accommodated to the occasion, for those two, to remit sin, and to impute righteousness, are inseparable. The one is put here figuratively for the other. They mistake, who take occasion from hence to make justification to consist only in remission of sin : the text will not bear it. The apostle's design is, not hereby to declare the full nature of justification, which he had done before ; but only to prove the freedom of it from any respect to works, in the instance of this principal and essential part of it. Remission of sin and the imputation of righteousness differ, as the cause and the effect. Remission of sin presupposeth imputation of righteousness ; and he that hath his sins remitted, hath Christ's righteousness first imputed, that so they may be remitted and forgiven to sinners.

8 Blessed is the man to whom the Lord will not impute sin.

The same thing is expressed three several ways ; there are three things in sin to be considered : 1. There is an offence against God, which is said to be forgiven. 2. There is a filthiness in sin, which is said to be covered. 3. There is guilt in it, which is said not to be imputed.

9 Cometh this blessedness then upon the circumcision only, or upon the uncircumcision also ? for we say that faith was reckoned to Abraham for righteousness.

This word cometh is not in the original, but it is aptly inserted by our translators. Circumcision again is put for the circumcised, and uncircumcision for the uncircumcised: see chap. ii. 28. For we say; q. d. This we have proved, and it is on all hands confessed, that faith was reckoned to Abraham for righteousness: now, therefore, the question is, whether this blessedness of justification belongs to the circumcised only, or to the uncircumcised also.

10 How was it then reckoned? when he was in circumcision, or in uncircumcision? Not in circumcision, but in uncircumcision.

And if this be the question, the way to resolve it, is, to consider in what circumstances Abraham was when his faith was thus reckoned to him for righteousness; it was a long time before he was circumcised. The promise to which Abraham's faith had respect, was made to him fourteen years, at least, before his circumcision: compare Gen. xv. 2, and xvii. 24, 25: also see Gen. xvi. 16. If the blessedness, therefore, of justification was not annexed to circumcision, the Gentiles are no less capable of it than the Jews.

g Gen. 17.10.

11 And <sup>h</sup>he received the sign of circumcision, a seal of the righteousness of the faith which he had yet being uncircumcised: that <sup>b</sup>he might be the father of all them that believe, though they be not circumcised; that righteousness might be imputed unto them also:

h Luke 10. 9.
ver. 12, 16.
Gal. 3. 7.

The sign of circumcision; or, circumcision, which is a sign. Two things are here affirmed of circumcision: 1. That it was a sign. Of what? Of the circumcision of the heart, of original sin and its cure. 2. That it was a seal. Of what? Of the righteousness of faith: of the meaning of which, see the notes on chap. i. 17. This is a periphrasis of the covenant of grace, wherein righteousness is promised, and made over to us in a way of believing: and this is not the only place where the righteousness of faith is put for the new covenant; see chap. x. 6, and the notes there. Circumcision is called a seal, because it was a confirmation of the covenant of grace, and the righteousness therein promised. The common use of a seal amongst men is to confirm and ratify a matter, and make it more firm and sure: it is joined often with an earnest, which is for the same end and purpose. The Corinthians' conversion is said to be the seal of Paul's apostleship; i. e. it was a confirmation of it, and made it more evident that he was sent of God. What the apostle says of an oath, that we may say of a seal; it is for confirmation, and for putting things out of controversy. When God made a promise to Abraham, he confirmed it with an oath; and when he made a covenant with him, and with his seed, he confirmed it by a seal, and that was circumcision, which he calls in Genesis the covenant of God, and here, the seal thereof. And what is said of circumcision is not spoken of it barely as circumcision, but as a sacrament; and it shows the nature and use of all sacraments, both of the Old Testament and New, that they are seals of the new covenant. That which the apostle mentions here of circumcision, hath nothing proper and peculiar in it to circumcision as such; but it may, with equal reason, be applied to any other sacrament: it belongs as well to the passover, yea, to baptism, and the Lord's supper: e. g. The apostle first calls circumcision a sign; so was the passover, so is baptism, and the Lord's supper. Again, he calls it a seal of the righteousness of faith, or of the new covenant, as before; and so is each of the other sacraments: take, for instance, the Lord's supper; our Saviour calls the cup therein the new testament, or covenant, that is, it is a seal and confirmation thereof. And what is here affirmed of Abraham, may be affirmed as well of the eunuch, or the jailer, or any baptized person; he received the sign of baptism, a seal of the righteousness of faith, and of remission of sins, &c. That he might be the father of all them that believe; i. e. that he might be known or declared to be the father of such: see the like phrase, Matt. v. 45. Though many of the fathers did believe before Abraham, yet none of them are said to be the fathers of the faithful, as Abraham was, because God made to none of them the like promise, concerning their posterity, as he did to Abraham. See the next verse.

12 And the father of circumcision to them who are not of the circumcision only, but who also walk in the steps of that faith of our father Abraham, which he had being yet uncircumcised.

The former verse tells you he was the father of the believing Gentiles, for the covenant was made with him, for all his believing seed, when he was uncircumcised, which shows, that righteousness is and may be imputed to them also without any outward circumcision: and then he is the father of the believing Jews; especially of as many of them as unto circumcision do add the imitation of his faith; who, besides circumcision, which they derived from him, do also transcribe his divine copy, and follow his example of faith and obedience; who leave their sins, as he did his country; who believe all God's promises, and adhere to him against all temptations to the contrary.

13 For the promise, that he should be the <sup>i</sup>heir of the world, was not to Abraham, or to his seed, through the law, but <sup>ii</sup>through the righteousness of faith.

i Gen. 17. 4.
29.

Some by the world do understand, the world of the faithful, or believers dispersed over all the world: and so in effect it is the same which he said before, that Abraham should be the father of all that believe, whether of the circumcision or uncircumcision. Others by the world do understand the land of Canaan, under which also heaven was typically promised and comprehended: see Heb. iv. 3; xi. 9, 10, 16. This, by a synecdoche, is put for all the world; and so also Tabor and Hermon are put for the east and west of the whole world, Psal. lxxxix. 12. This was promised to Abraham and to his seed, Gen. xii. 7; xv. 18. Was not to Abraham, or to his seed, through the law, but through the righteousness of faith; i. e. it was not made to Abraham because he had merited it by keeping the law; but because he had believed God, and obtained the righteousness of faith. In the whole verse is couched an argument for justification by faith without works, which is the apostle's drift; and it may be thus formed: If the promise of inheritance to Abraham and his seed was to be accomplished not by legal obedience, but by the righteousness of faith; then it follows, that we are justified by faith, and not by works; but the promise of inheritance to Abraham and his seed was to be accomplished, not by the law, but by the righteousness of faith.

14 For <sup>k</sup>if they which are of the law <sup>l</sup>be heirs, faith is made void, and the promise made of none effect:

k Gal. 3. 18.

i. e. If they that trust to the fulfilling of the law, be heirs of the promise of God, and so the inheritance come by works; then faith is to no purpose, neither is there any use of it; and so also the promises which are made to believers are vain and useless. This is the sum of this verse; a more particular explication follows. If they which are of the law: compare this with Gal. iii. 9, 10. There the apostle sorts them that seek righteousness and salvation into two kinds. First, some are of faith, and they are such as seek salvation in that way. Again, others are of the works of the law, and they are such as seek salvation by means thereof. These phrases, of the law, and of the works of the law, are all one. Be heirs; that is, of the promises of God; of the heavenly rest, of which, as before, Canaan was a type. Faith is made void; i. e. if they which seek the inheritance of the law can by the law obtain it, then there is no use of faith: to what end should we by faith go out of ourselves to seek righteousness and salvation in Christ, if we could obtain it by the legal obedience? See the like, Gal. v. 4. And the promise made of none effect; i. e. the promise itself, which was made to Abraham and his seed, that also is ineffectual, and brought to nought; no man shall be saved by it; forasmuch as the law can bring no man to the obtaining of what is promised.

15 Because <sup>m</sup>the law worketh wrath: for where no law is, there is no transgression.

m 7. 8, 10, 11.
n Cor. 15. 56.
o Cor. 3. 7, 9.
1 John 3. 4.

The law worketh wrath; i. e. the wrath of God: and this it doth not of itself, but occasionally, in respect of our disobedience. This is a confirmation of what was said in the foregoing verse, that the inheritance is not by the law, and the works thereof; he proves it from the effect and work of the law, such as it hath in all men since the fall; it worketh wrath; it is so far from entitling men to the promised blessing, that it exposeth men to the curse and wrath of God, Gal. iii. 10. For where no law is, there is no transgression: q. d. And that it worketh wrath is evident, because it discovers and occasions transgressions, betwixt which and God's wrath there is an inseparable connexion. This assertion is simply true of things indifferent, as were all ceremonial observations before the law required them, for then before the law it was no sin to omit them: but of things which are evil in their own nature, it must be understood respectively, and after a sort; that is, there was no such great transgression before the law was given, as afterwards. The reasons are; Because we are naturally bent to do that which is forbidden us; and so by the reproofs of the law, the stubbornness of man's heart is increased. As also, because by the law comes the clear knowledge of man's duty; and so the servant that knows his master's will, and doth it not, is worthy of the more stripes.

16 Therefore it is of faith, that it might be <sup>m</sup>by grace; <sup>n</sup>to the end the promise might be sure to all the seed; not to that only which is of the law, but to that also which is of the faith of Abraham; <sup>o</sup>who is the father of us all,

Here are two new arguments to prove that the inheritance is not of the law, but of faith. It is of faith, that it might be by grace; for to be justified by faith and by grace are all one with the apostle. Again, that the promise might be sure to all the seed; whereas if it were of the law, it would be unsure and uncertain, because of man's weakness, who is not able to perform it. Abraham's seed is of two sorts. One sort is of the law, to wit, the Jews. Another sort is of such as walk in the steps of Abraham's faith, whether Jews or Gentiles. To all these the promise must be sure; which cannot be, if the law be made the condition or the means of the inheritance.

17 (As it is written, <sup>p</sup>I have made thee a father of many nations,) <sup>q</sup>before him whom he believed, even God, <sup>r</sup>who quickeneth the dead, and calleth those <sup>s</sup>things which be not as though they were.

Before him whom he believed; i. e. in the sight or esteem of God. He was not the father of many nations by carnal generation in the sight of men, but by spiritual cognation in the sight of God. Or, as it may be read, like unto God, after his example: and then the meaning is, that God so honoured Abraham's faith, that he made him a father, in some respects like himself. As God is a universal Father, not of one, but of all nations, so was Abraham. Again, As God is their spiritual Father, not by carnal generation, so was Abraham also. Even God, who quickeneth the dead, and calleth those things which be not as though they were; i. e. Abraham believed in him as omnipotent. His omnipotency is described by two great effects of it. The one in making that to have a being again, which had ceased to be, as in the resurrection. The other, in causing that to be which never was; or to make all things of nothing, as in the creation: he expresseth this by calling things, to intimate the great facility of this work to God: he only spoke, and it was done; he commanded, and all was created. And as Abraham thus generally believed the power of God, so it is likely he made a particular application of it to his own state at present; as he believed that God could raise the dead, so, that he could raise him seed out of his own dead body, and Sarah's dead womb. And as he believed that God could create things out of nothing, so, that he could give him seed that had none; yea, and make the Gentiles a people that were not a people.

18 Who against hope believed in hope, that he might become the father of many nations, according to that which was spoken, <sup>t</sup>So shall thy seed be.

Here the apostle digresseth a little from his principal argument, and falls into a commendation of Abraham's faith. Who against hope believed in hope: Abraham, when he had no natural or rational grounds of hope, either in respect of himself or Sarah his wife, did yet believe and hope he should have a son; and so be a root or stock, from whence many nations should spring: and this faith and hope of his was grounded upon the power and faithfulness of God. So shall thy seed be; so as the stars of heaven for multitude, which must be supplied out of the promise, in Gen. xv. 5.

19 And being not weak in faith, <sup>u</sup>he considered not his own body now dead, <sup>v</sup>when he was about an hundred years old, <sup>w</sup>neither yet the deadness of Sarah's womb:

He regarded not the impotency of his own body, which was as it were dead, because of his age, in respect of any desires or powers of generation. Abraham several years after married Keturah, by whom he had divers children; how then doth the apostle say his body was now dead, or unable for generation? Some say that the deadness of Abraham's body was only in his own opinion. Augustine hath two answers: 1. That his body was not dead simply, but in respect of Sarah; he might be able to beget children of a younger woman. 2. His body was revived, and he received a new generative faculty of God. Another question may be moved, and that is, how the apostle could say that Abraham considered not his own body, being dead; seeing we read, Gen. xvii. 17, that Abraham, upon the promise of a son, fell upon his face, and laughed, and said in his heart, Shall a child be born unto him that is an hundred years old? &c. Some answer, that Abraham at first doubted, but afterwards he recollected himself, and got over that unbelief; his faith overcame all difficulties. Others say, that he doubted not at all of the truth of God's promise, but was uncertain only how it should be understood, whether properly or figuratively: see Gen. xvii. 19. Others say, that these words of Abraham are not words of doubting, but inquiring; they proceed from a desire to be further instructed how that thing should be. It was a question like that of the virgin Mary's, How shall these things be? Augustine says, that Abraham's laughter was not like Sarah's. Hers proceeded from distrust; his, from joy and admiration.

20 He staggered not at the promise of God through unbelief; but was strong in faith, giving glory to God;

The promise of God; viz. in Gen. xv. 5, and xvii. 16. Giving glory to God; as all do that rely upon the power and promise of God, setting to their seals that he is true.

21 And being fully persuaded that, <sup>x</sup>what he had promised, <sup>y</sup>he was able also to perform.

He looked upon God as one that was perfectly able to do whatever he had promised, and as one that was most faithful, and sure never to fail in the performance; collecting nothing else from the difficulty and improbability of the matter, but that it was the fitter for an Almighty power to effect.

22 And therefore it was imputed to him for righteousness.

See ver. 3. By reason of his faith he was as sufficiently disposed and qualified for the obtaining of the promise, as if he had had all the righteousness required by the law.

23 Now <sup>z</sup>it was not written for his sake alone, that it was imputed to him;

24 But for us also, to whom it shall be imputed, if we believe <sup>a</sup>on him that raised up Jesus our Lord from the dead;

Here it may be inquired, If Abraham's faith did justify him, and it was imputed to him for righteousness, what doth this concern us? The apostle answers, it was recorded of him for our sakes; see chap. xv. 4; and to us there shall be the like imputation, if we believe in God, that raised up Jesus our Lord from the dead. This a greater act of faith than Abraham's was. And the nature of justifying faith lies rather in affiance, or in putting trust in God through our Lord Jesus Christ, than in assent, or in giving credit, to the truth of his promise. Quest. Why doth the apostle single out this act of raising Christ from the dead to describe the Father by? Ans. To maintain the proportion betwixt the faith of Abraham and the faith of his seed; that as his respected the power of God, in raising, as it were, the dead, so in like sort should ours. So some. But the apostle speaks as if there were some special reason and ground for confidence in God for justification in this act of raising Christ from the dead; and indeed nothing is more fit to establish our faith in persuasion of our justification than this; for when God raised up our Lord Jesus Christ, having loosed the pains of death, he gave full assurance that his justice is fully satisfied for our sins. Had not Christ Jesus, our surety, paid the utmost furthing that was due for our sins, he had still continued in prison, and under the power of death. Hence it is that the apostle Peter tells us, 1 Pet. i. 3, that God hath begotten us to a lively hope of the heavenly inheritance by the resurrection of Christ from the dead; there being no more effectual means to persuade us of the pardon of sin, of reconciliation with God, and of acceptance to eternal life, than that Jesus Christ, our surety and sponsor, is risen from the dead.

25 * Who was delivered for our offences, and * was raised again for our justification.

Who was delivered; he saith delivered rather than crucified, to lead us by the hand to the first cause thereof, the determinate counsel of the blessed Trinity: see Acts ii. 23; iv. 27, 28; Rom. viii. 32. For our offences; i. e. for the expiating of them, Isa. liii. 10. And was raised again for our justification; not that his death had no hand in our justification; see Rom. iii. 24; but because our justification, which was begun in his death, was perfected in his resurrection. Christ did meritoriously work our justification and salvation by his death and passion, but the efficacy and perfection thereof with respect to us depend on his resurrection. By his death he paid our debt, in his resurrection he received our acquittance, Isa. liii. 8; when he was discharged, we in him, and together with him, received our discharge from the guilt and punishment of all our sins. This one verse is an abridgement of the whole gospel.

CHAP. V

Being justified by faith, we have peace with God, 1; we glory in our hopes, 2, and in present afflictions, 3—5; from the best experience of God's love, looking with more assurance for final salvation, 6—10; we glory in God also, to whom we are reconciled by Christ, 11. As sin and death came upon all men by Adam, so the grace of God, which justifieth unto life, cometh more abundantly unto all mankind through Christ, 12—19. Under the law sin abounded unto death; but grace hath much more abounded unto life, 20, 21.

THEREFORE *being justified by faith, we have <sup>b</sup>peace with God through our Lord Jesus Christ :

Hitherto of the cause and manner of our justification; now follow the benefits and effects. Being justified by faith; as he had before asserted and proved particularly, in chap. iii. 28; iv. 24. We have peace with God; i. e. we have reconciliation with God, who before were utter enemies to him, Col. i. 21; he is now become our Friend, as he was Abraham's. Through our Lord Jesus Christ, who is the only Mediator of reconciliation: see 2 Cor. v. 19; Eph. ii. 14—16; Col. i. 20; 1 Tim. ii. 5.

2 ° By whom also we have access by faith into this grace <sup>d</sup>wherein we stand, and <sup>e</sup>rejoice in hope of the glory of God.

We have not only reconciliation with God by Jesus Christ, but also by faith in him we are admitted to his presence, his grace and favour. One may be reconciled to his prince, and yet not to be brought into his presence: witness Absalom, &c. See Eph. ii. 18; iii. 12; 1 Pet. iii. 18. This grace is either that whereof he spake, chap. iii. 24; or else rather it may be understood of that excellent state of reconciliation, friendship, and favour with God, which God hath graciously bestowed upon us. Wherein we stand; or, in which we stand or abide, not stirring a foot for any temptation or persecution: a metaphor from soldiers keeping their station in fight. A man may obtain his prince's favour, and lose it again; but, &c. And rejoice in hope of the glory of God; in the glory hoped for, a Hebraism; see Luke x. 20; 1 Pet. i. 8, 9; even in that glory which God hath promised, and which consists in the enjoyment of him.

3 And not only so, but <sup>f</sup>we glory in tribulations also: * knowing that tribulation worketh patience;

We glory in tribulations also; as old soldiers do in their scars of honour: see Gal. vi. 17; 2 Cor. xii. 9—11. Believers do not only glory in their future happiness, but in their present sufferings and afflictions: yet not so much in affliction itself, as in the issue and fruitful effects thereof, of which he speaks in what follows. Knowing, finding by experience, that tribulation worketh patience; not as if affliction of itself and in its own nature did this, for in many it hath a contrary operation; but God, who is the author and giver of patience, chap. v. 15, doth make use of it for this purpose; it is a means sanctified of God for the exercising, obtaining, and increasing thereof.

4 <sup>h</sup> And patience, experience; and experience, hope :

And patience, experience; viz. of God's sustentation and care of us, and of his faithfulness in fulfilling his promises, Psal. xci. 15; Isa. xliii. 2; 2 Cor. i. 4, 5; as also of our own sincerity, and strength to endure and persevere, Matt. xiii. 21. And experience, hope; i. e. of the glory of God, as before in ver. 2, or hope of further mercy and seasonable deliverance. Believers find and feel that God hath delivered them, and doth deliver them, and in him they trust and hope that he will still deliver them.

5 <sup>i</sup> And hope maketh not ashamed; <sup>k</sup> because the love of God is shed abroad in our hearts by the Holy Ghost which is given unto us.

And hope maketh not ashamed; it doth not disappoint or deceive us. Frustrated hopes fill men with shame and confusion, Job vi. 19, 20. This passage seems to be taken out of Psal. xxii. 5. Because, &c.; this is either rendered as the reason of all that went before; Therefore the justified by faith have peace with God, access to him by faith, hope of glory, joy in tribulation, &c., because the love of God is shed abroad in their hearts: or else it is a reason of what immediately preceded; Therefore hope maketh not ashamed, because the love of God is shed abroad, &c. The love of God; understand it either actively, of our love to God, or rather passively, of his love to us, (of which he speaks, ver. 8,) and of the sense thereof. Is shed abroad in our hearts; is greatly manifested, or abundantly poured forth: a frequent metaphor, both in the Old and New Testament: see Isa. xlv. 3; Joel ii. 28; Zech. xii. 10; John vii. 38; Acts ii. 17. By the Holy Ghost which is given unto us; not excluding the Father and Son; it is the more proper work of the Spirit, both to make us feel the love of God, and to fill our hearts with love to God.

6 For when we were yet without strength, <sup>l</sup>in due time <sup>m</sup>Christ died for the ungodly.

Without strength; utterly unable to help or redeem ourselves. In due time; some read it, according to the time, and refer this clause to the foregoing words, making this to be the sense, When we were weak in time past, or in the time of the law, before grace appeared, then Christ died, &c. Others rather refer it to the following words, and so our translation carries it, that in due time, i. e. in the fullness of time, as Gal. iv. 4, or in the time that was before decreed and prefixed by the Father. The Scripture every where speaks of a certain season or hour assigned for the death of Christ: see Matt. xxvi. 45; John viii. 20; xii. 27; xvii. 1. Christ died for the ungodly; i. e. for the sake, or instead of, such as were enemies to God, (as ver. 10.) and so could deserve no such favour from him.

7 For scarcely for a righteous man will one die: yet peradventure for a good man some would even dare to die.

He amplifies the love of Christ in dying for the ungodly, and shows that it is unparalleled and without example. By a good man you must understand one that is very kind and bountiful, or one that is very useful and profitable; that is, a public and common good. Instances may be given of those that have sacrificed their lives for such. Lilloe stepped between the murderer and king Edward his master. Nicholas Ribische lost his life to preserve Prince Maurice at the siege of Pista.

8 But <sup>m</sup> God commendeth his love toward us, in that, while we were yet sinners, Christ died for us.

God commendeth his love toward us; i. e. he declareth or confirmeth it by this, as a most certain sign, he makes it most conspicuous or illustrious: see John iii. 16; 1 John iv. 9, 10. In that, while we were yet sinners, Christ died for us; i. e. in a state of sin, and under the guilt and power of sin. Believers in some sense are still sinners, 1 John i. 8, but their sins being pardoned and subdued, they go no longer under that denomination. Sinners in Scripture are said to be those in whom sin dwells and reigns; see John ix. 31. Such we were by nature. Yea, we were not only sinners, but enemies to God, which further commendeth the love of Christ in dying for us: there is no greater love amongst men, than when one layeth down his life for his friends; but herein Christ's love excelled, that he gave his life for his enemies.

9 Much more then, being now justified <sup>o</sup> by his blood, we shall be saved <sup>o</sup> from wrath through him.

The apostle's arguing is cogent, for it is more to justify and reconcile sinners, than to save them being justified; Christ therefore having done the former, he will much more do the latter. By his blood; i. e. by faith in his blood or sufferings. From wrath; the Greek reads it with an article, from that wrath, whereby is meant the wrath to come, or eternal punishment.

10 For <sup>p</sup> if, when we were enemies, <sup>q</sup> we were reconciled to God by the death of his Son, much more, being reconciled, we shall be saved <sup>r</sup> by his life.

We were reconciled to God; put into a capacity of reconciliation, God being by Christ's death made reconcilable, and also actually reconciled, when we believe, through the merits of the death of Christ. We shall be saved by his life; i. e. by the resurrection to life. Salvation is ascribed to the resurrection and life of Christ, because he thereby doth perfect our salvation, he ever living to make intercession for us, Heb. vii. 25; and because by his resurrection and life we shall be raised to eternal life at that day.

11 And not only <sup>s</sup> so, but we also <sup>t</sup> joy in God through our Lord Jesus Christ, by whom we have now received the <sup>u</sup> atonement.

And not only so, &c.: q. d. We do not only rejoice in the hope of glory, and in tribulation, of which he had spoken, ver. 2, 3, (all that fell in between being a long parenthesis,) but we rejoice and glory in God himself, who is become our God and merciful Father in Jesus Christ. By whom we have now received the atonement; this is rendered as the reason why we should rejoice in God through Jesus Christ; for by him God is atoned or reconciled, satisfaction being made for our sins in his blood. The particle now hath its emphasis, to show the privilege of those who live in these times of the gospel.

12 Wherefore, as <sup>v</sup> by one man sin entered into the world, and <sup>w</sup> death by sin; and so death passed upon all men, <sup>x</sup> for that all have sinned:

From this verse to the end of the chapter, the apostle makes a large comparison between the first and Second

Adam, which he joins to what he had said by the causal particle wherefore: q. d. Seeing things are as I have already said, it is evident, that what was lost by Adam is restored by Christ. This verse seems to be lame and imperfect; the reddition is wanting in the comparison; for unto this, as by one man sin entered into the world, there should be added, so by Christ, &c. But the reddition, or second part of the comparison, is suspended, by reason of a long parenthesis intervening to the 18th and 19th verses, where the apostle sets down both parts of the comparison. By one man: viz. Adam. Obj. Eve first sinned, 1 Tim. ii. 14. Ans. He is not showing the order how sin first entered into the world, but how it was propagated to mankind. Therefore he mentions the man, because he is the head of the woman, and the covenant was made with him: or, man may be used collectively, both for man and woman; as when God said, Let us make man, &c. Sin; it is to be understood of our first parents' actual sin, in eating the forbidden fruit; this alone was it that affected their posterity, and made them sinners, ver. 19. Entered into the world; understand the inhabitants of the world; the thing containing, by a usual metonymy, is put for the thing contained. And death by sin; as the due reward thereof. Death here may be taken in its full latitude, for temporal, spiritual, and eternal death. And so death passed upon all men; seized upon all, of all sorts, infants as well as others. For that all have sinned; others read it thus, in which all have sinned, i. e. in which one man; and so it is a full proof that Adam was a public person, and that in him all his posterity sinned and fell. He was our representative, and we were all in him, as a town or county in a parliament man; and although we chose him not, yet God chose for us. The words ἐφ' ᾧ are rendered in which, in other places, and the preposition ἐπι is put for ἐν; see Mark ii. 4; Heb. ix. 10: and if our translation be retained, it is much to the same sense; for if such die as never committed any actual sin themselves, (as infants do,) then it will follow that they sinned in this one man, in whose loins they were: as Levi is said to have paid tithes in Abraham's loins, Heb. vii. 9.

13 (For until the law sin was in the world: but <sup>y</sup> sin is not imputed when <sup>z</sup> there is no law.

For until the law sin was in the world: q. d. It appears that all have sinned, because sin was always in the world, not only after the law was given by Moses, but also before, even from the beginning of the world till that time. But sin is not imputed when there is no law: q. d. It appears there was a law before the law of Moses, for if there had been no law all that while, then sin would not have been imputed to men, so as to make them liable to punishment or death; but sin was imputed or charged upon men before the law of Moses, and death passed upon all. Therefore there must have been a law, by the transgression of which men were sinners, before that time. And that was either the law of nature, or the positive law which God gave to Adam, the transgression whereof is imputed to all, as we shall see, ver. 19. Some think the apostle doth here obviate a cavil: q. d. Let no man think that sin began to have its being together with the law, for there was sin before there was any written law to forbid it. The same acts that were forbidden afterwards by the law, were before committed, and were really sinful in the sight of God. But sin was not so well known, nor so strictly charged upon the sinner, as it is since the law was given. It was not imputed comparatively, though absolutely it was, as may appear by many instances, as the drowning of the world, the destruction of Sodom, &c.

14 Nevertheless death reigned from Adam to Moses, even over them that had not sinned after the similitude of Adam's transgression, <sup>aa</sup> who is the figure of him <sup>ab</sup> that was to come.

He proceeds to prove his assertion in the foregoing verse, that sin was in the world before the law, because death, which is the wages of sin, did reign, and had power over all mankind, from Adam to Moses, which was about two thousand five hundred years. Even over them that had not sinned after the similitude of Adam's transgression; i. e.

over very infants, that had not actually sinned as Adam did. But though infants did not sin like Adam, yet they sinned in Adam; the guilt of his sin was imputed to them, else death could have had no power over them. Infants (as one saith) are not altogether innocents; the very first sheet or blanket wherewith they are covered is woven of sin and shame, of blood and filth, Ezek. xvi. 4, 6. Who is the figure of him that was to come; of his offspring, (so some,) which came of him in after-times; his posterity (as before) was represented in his person: but others better expound it of Christ, who is the Second Adam; and of whom Adam was a figure or type, not in respect of such things as were personal to either of them, but of that which by them re-dounded to others. The first Adam was the original of man's natural and earthly being; the Second Adam, of his spiritual and heavenly. By the first, sin and death came into the world; by the Second, righteousness and life.

15 But not as the offence, so also is the free gift. For if through the offence of one many be dead, much more the grace of God, and the gift by grace, which is by one man, Jesus Christ, hath abounded unto many.

& 25. 26.

But not as the offence, so also is the free gift: q. d. But yet the resemblance betwixt the first and Second Adam is not so exact as to admit of no difference; differences there are, but they are to great advantage on Christ's part: e. g. Compare Adam's sin and Christ's obedience, in respect of their efficacy and virtue, and you will find a great difference. For if through the offence of one many be dead, much more the grace of God, and the gift by grace, which is by one man, Jesus Christ, hath abounded unto many: the obedience of Christ (which is the product of his grace and favour) is much more powerful to justification and salvation, than the sin of Adam was to condemnation. If the transgression of mere man was able to pull down death and wrath upon all his natural seed, then the obedience of one, which is God as well as man, will much more abundantly avail to procure pardon and life for all his spiritual seed. He doth not give the pre-eminence unto the grace of Christ in respect of the number, but of the more powerful efficacy and virtue.

16 And not as it was by one that sinned, so is the gift: for the judgment was by one to condemnation, but the free gift is of many offences unto justification.

q. d. As there is a difference between Adam and Christ in respect of their persons, so also in respect of their acts, and the extent thereof; for one sin of Adam did condemn us; the mischief arose from one offence; but the free gift and grace of Christ doth absolve us not only from that one fault, but from all other faults and offences; it reacheth to the pardon, not only of original sin, but of all other personal and actual sins.

17 For if by one man's offence death reigned by one; much more they which receive abundance of grace and of the gift of righteousness shall reign in life by one, Jesus Christ.)

Here he shows the difference in respect of the effects and consequents of their acts. If by means of one man and his one offence death had power over all mankind, then much more shall the grace and gift of righteousness, which is by Jesus Christ alone, obtain eternal life for all that have received abundant grace and mercy from him.

18 Therefore as by the offence of one judgment came upon all men to condemnation; even so by the righteousness of one the free gift came upon all men unto justification of life.

Here, after a long parenthesis, the apostle returns to what he had begun to say in ver. 12; and now he makes the comparison full in both members, which there, by reason of intervening matter, was left imperfect, as I before hinted. Judgment; guilt, which exposeth to judgment. Came upon all men; all the posterity, or natural seed, of the first Adam. The free gift; that which all along he calls the free gift, seems to be the benefit believers have by Christ's obedience. Came upon all men; not all universally, but all sorts of men indifferently, Gentiles as well as Jews; or all that are his spiritual seed. Or all men here is put for many men; see elsewhere, Luke vi. 26; Acts xxiii. 15. Many is sometimes put for all, as Dan. xii. 2, and again all for many; and indeed these two words, all and many, seem to be used reciprocally by this context in particular, ver. 15, and 19.

19 For as by one man's disobedience many were made sinners, so by the obedience of one shall many be made righteous.

One man's; i. e. Adam's: see the notes on ver. 12. Many; i. e. all, as before; many is here opposed to one, or a few; the meaning is, Though Adam was but one, yet he infected many others, his sin rested not in his own person. Were made sinners; brought into a state of sin. This is more than when all the world were said to sin in him. The word is used to signify great and heinous sinners. The apostle here informs us of that which all philosophy was ignorant of, viz. the imputation of Adam's sin, and our natural pollution flowing from it. Yea, this was more than the naked history of man's fall by Moses did discover; there indeed we see the cause of death, how that came upon all mankind; but that Adam's sin was accounted to us, that by his disobedience we are involved in sin and misery, that is not clearly revealed in the books of Moses. We are beholden to the gospel, and particularly to this text and context, for the more full discovery hereof. By the obedience of one; i. e. of Christ. He leaves out the word man, either for brevity sake, or because Christ was not a mere man, as Adam was. Here the apostle concludes the collation he had made between Adam and Christ, whom he had all along represented as two public persons, or as two common roots or fountains, the one of sin and death, the other of righteousness and life. And indeed there are throughout the context (as one observes) several textual and grammatical obscurities, as also redundant and defective expressions, which are not unusual with this apostle, whose matter runneth from him like a torrent, and cannot be so well bounded by words. Another saith, upon the consideration of the difficulties in this context, We do not need Theseus's twine of thread, but the Holy Ghost, and that light by which this Epistle was wrote, to guide us into the understanding of it.

20 Moreover the law entered, that the offence might abound. But where sin abounded, grace did much more abound:

b John 15.
22. ch. 3.20.
3 & 4. 16. &
7 & 8. Gal. 3.
19. 22.
c Luke 7. 47.
1 Tim. 1. 14.

Here he shows the reason why the law was given; although (as it is in ver. 13) before that time sin was in the world, it was that the offence might abound; either strictly, the offence of that one man, or rather largely, the offence of every man. The particle iva (rendered that;) is to be taken either causally, and so it is interpreted by Gal. iii. 19, where it is said, the law was added because of transgressions, that thereby the guilt and punishment of sin being more fully discovered, the riches of God's free grace and mercy might be the more admired; or else eventually, it so falls out by accident, or by reason of man's corruption, that sin is thereby increased or augmented. The law is holy, just, and good, (as chap. vii. 12,) how then doth that increase sin? Either as it irritates the sinner, chap. iii. 20; and vii. 8, 11, or makes manifest the sin, chap. vii. 7, 13; thereby sin is known to be, as indeed it is, out of measure sinful. But where sin abounded, grace did much more abound: this is added by way of correction, to mitigate the former assertion, and it lays down a second end of giving the law; the former was the increase and manifestation of sin, the latter is the abounding or superabounding of God's grace. There is this difference to be observed; that the first end is universal, for in all men, both good and bad, the law worketh the increase and knowledge of sin; but the other is particular, and peculiar to the elect; to them only the grace of God is superabundant after that they have abounded in sin, and by how much the greater is their guilt, by so much the greater is the grace of God in the free forgiveness thereof.

21 That as sin hath reigned unto death, even so might grace reign through righteousness unto eternal life by Jesus Christ our Lord.

Before he ascribed dominion and reign to death, now to sin; the reason is evident, because death indeed reigneth by sin. Before also he had made the comparison betwixt Adam and Christ, here it is betwixt sin and grace, the power of one and of the other. The sum is, that as sin hath prevailed over all mankind to bring death upon man, not only a temporal but eternal death, so the grace of Christ prevails, and becomes effectual, to confer upon us eternal life. Righteousness; i. e. imputed or imparted. By Jesus Christ our Lord: see how sweetly the end answers the beginning of this chapter, and how Jesus Christ is both the Author and Finisher of all.

CHAP. VI

Though justified by grace, we may not live in sin; since the very figure of baptism requireth us to die with Christ unto sin, that we may lead a new life of holiness unto God, 1—13. The dispensation of grace freeth us from the dominion of sin; but we are still the servants of sin, if we obey it; therefore being freed from sin, we are bound unto holiness, 14—20. The end and wages of sin is death; but the fruit of holiness through God's grace is eternal life, 21—23.

Another anticipation; this Epistle abounds therewith. The apostle here prevents an objection, which might be occasioned, either by the foregoing doctrine in general, concerning justification by the free grace of God, and by a righteousness imputed to us; or by what he said more particularly in the close of the foregoing chapter, that where sin abounded, grace did much more abound. Some might hence infer, that there was no need then of inherent righteousness, that persons might abide and abound in sin, that so grace might be the more exalted in the forgiveness thereof. The apostle Jude speaks, Jude 4, of some that made this ill improvement of the grace of God. Those that draw such inferences from the premises, they put a false construction upon the apostle's doctrine, and a paralogism or fallacy upon themselves. They make the apostle's words more general than he meant or intended them: for the abounding of sin is not the occasion of the abounding of grace in all, but only in some, even in those who confess and forsake their sins. And they apply that to the time to come which the apostle only uttered of the time past. The abounding of sin in men before their conversion and calling, doth commend and exalt the abundant grace of God, in the forgiveness thereof; but not so if sin abound in them after they are converted and called. He propounds this objection by way of interrogation, partly to show his dislike that his doctrine should be so perverted, and partly to show the peace of his own conscience, that he was far from such a thought.

God forbid; be it not, or far be it; he rejects any such inference or consequence, as unworthy of an answer: q. d. Away with all such doctrines, as, under pretence of advancing grace, do promote sin, or obstruct a godly life. This phrase is frequent with the apostle, when he is speaking of any absurdity: see chap. iii. 4, 6, 31. How: by this particle he shows the impossibility, or the incongruity, of the thing: see Matt. vi. 28; Gal. iv. 9. The following argument is very convincing, and may be thus formed: They whose property it is to be dead to sin, cannot any longer live therein; but the justified by faith are dead to sin. They are said to be dead to sin, who do not live under the power and dominion of it; who mortify sin, and suffer it (so far as they can) to have no life or power in it. Fall into it they may, but live and lie in it they cannot. It is not falling into the water that drowns a man, but it is his lying in it; so it is not falling into sin that damns a man, but it is his living in it.

Know ye not? q. d. This is a truth which you ought not to be ignorant of, and which confirms what I say. Baptized into Jesus Christ: to be baptized into Christ, is either to be baptized in the name of Christ; see Acts x. 48, and xix. 5; or else it is, incorporated, ingrafted, or planted into Christ, and so to be made members of his mystical body by baptism. Baptized into his death: to be baptized into the death of Christ, is to have fellowship with him in his death, or to have the efficacy of his death sealed up to us; and that is the blessed privilege of as many as are baptized or planted into Christ; they are not only partakers of the merit of his death for justification, but of the efficacy of his death for mortification. See a parallel place, Gal. iii. 27.

Therefore: q. d. Because we are thus dead with Christ, therefore, &c. We are buried with him; i. e. we have communion with him in his burial also, which represents a farther degree of the destruction of sin, by putting it, as it were, out of our sight, Gen. xxiii. 4, and having no more to do with it. By baptism into death: he seems here to allude to the manner of baptizing in those warm Eastern countries, which was to dip or plunge the party baptized, and as it were to bury him for a while under water. See the like phrase, Col. ii. 12. Baptism doth not only represent our mortification and death to sin, but our progress and perseverance therein. Burial implies a continuing under death; so is mortification a continual dying unto sin. That like as Christ was raised up from the dead; look as, after the death and burial of Christ, there followed his resurrection, so it must be with us; we must have communion with, and conformity to, the Lord Jesus Christ in his resurrection as well as in his death; both these are represented and sealed to us by the sacrament of baptism. By the glory of the Father; i. e. by the power of the Father, which is called, Col. i. 11, his glorious power. God is said elsewhere to have raised him by his power, 1 Cor. vi. 14; and in 2 Cor. xiii. 4, he is said to live by the power of God. Some read it thus, he was raised from the dead, to the glory of the Father. The preposition did is sometimes rendered to: see 1 Pet. i. 3. Walk in newness of life; i. e. live a new life, being actuated by new principles, aiming at new ends, and bringing forth new fruits of holiness: see chap. vii. 6.

He prosecutes what he had before propounded, and illustrates it by an apt similitude, which is taken from grafting or planting. He takes it for granted, that believers are planted together in the likeness of Christ's death, i. e. are made conformable to him in his death: see Phil. iii. 10. Christ died, and believers die; the one a natural, the other a spiritual death: the one by way of expiation, suffering, and satisfying for the sins of others; the other by way of mortification, killing and crucifying their own sins. We shall be also in the likeness of his resurrection: in the original the sentence is elliptical and imperfect, the words running thus, we shall be of his resurrection; our translation therefore fills up the sense with a word borrowed from the preceding clause. See the like, John v. 36, I have a greater witness than of John, i. e. than that witness of John. The sense of the whole is this, That believers are not only dead, but risen with Christ, Col. iii. 1. They partake of such a resurrection as resembles his; as Christ arose from the dead to a new life, so we rise from dead works to walk in newness of life, ver. 4. Moreover, they are raised and quickened by a power and virtue that flows from Christ and his resurrection: this is that virtue which the apostle Paul so earnestly desired to be made a partaker of, Phil. iii. 10. The graft revives with the stock in the spring, and that by a virtue which it receives from the stock; so as a believer is raised to newness of life, by virtue flowing from Christ, into whom he is ingrafted. Quest. Why doth he say believers shall be planted, &c.? Are they not already, upon their believing in Christ? Ans. The apostle rather chooseth to speak in the future, than in the present tense; rather we shall be, than we are, or have been; because the work is only begun; it daily increaseth more and more, until it comes to a full perfection in heaven.

1 Gal. 2. 20. 6 Knowing this, that our old man is crucified with him, that the body of sin might be destroyed, that henceforth we should not serve sin.

By the old man is meant, that corrupt and polluted nature which we derive from Adam, the first man: see Eph. iv. 22; Col. iii. 9, 10. The old and new man are opposites; as then the new man is the image of God repaired in us; so the old man is a depravation of that image of God, and a universal pollution of the whole man. Is crucified with him; by virtue of our union with him, and by means of his death and crucifixion: see Gal. ii. 20. The body of sin is the very same that he called before the old man. The corrupt nature is sometimes called the body, chap. viii. 13, sometimes a body of death, chap. vii. 24, and here the body of sin. It is indeed a mere mass and lump of sin; it is not one sin, but all sin seminally. It is with respect to this body of sin, that particular lusts and corruptions are called members, Col. iii. 5. Might be destroyed; weakened more and more, till at last it be destroyed. That henceforth we should not serve sin; as we did before regeneration, and as they still do who voluntarily commit it, John viii. 34. They do not only act sin, but are acted by it, having as many lords as lusts, Tit. iii. 3. See more of this, ver. 16.

m 1 Pet. 4. 1. 7 For he that is dead is freed from sin.

He that is dead, i. e. to sin, is freed from it; not only in respect of the guilt thereof, which sense the marginal reading of the word seems to respect, but also in regard of the service of it. This agrees best with the context; look, as he that is dead is freed and discharged from the authority of those who had dominion over him in his lifetime, so it is with those that are dead to sin. There is a parallel place, 1 Pet. iv. 1.

n 2 Tim. 2. 11. 8 Now if we be dead with Christ, we believe that we shall also live with him:

i. e. If we have fellowship with Christ in his death, we have reason to believe we shall have fellowship with him also in his resurrection and life: see ver. 5. Though everlasting be not excluded, yet a spiritual life is principally intended; we shall so live with Christ, as no more to return to dead works. The next words show this to be the sense.

o Rev. 1. 18. 9 Knowing that Christ being raised from the dead dieth no more; death hath no more dominion over him.

q. d. Of this you know you have an example or copy in Christ himself; he so rose again, as never more to come under the power of death.

p Heb. 9. 27. 10 For in that he died, he died unto sin once: but in that he liveth, he liveth unto God.

For when he died unto sin, i. e. to take away sin, he died but once; see Heb. ix. 28, and x. 10, 14; but when he rose again from the dead, he lived with God for ever an immortal, endless life. By this phrase is expressed that eternal and indissoluble union which the Son hath with the Father.

r ver. 2. Gal. 2. 19. 11 Likewise reckon ye also yourselves to be dead indeed unto sin, but alive unto God through Jesus Christ our Lord.

So we in like manner must make account, that by virtue of his death we are dead to sin, and by virtue of his resurrection are alive to God, and so alive as never to resume our former courses, or return again to our former sins. Through Jesus Christ our Lord; or, in Jesus Christ our Lord; i. e. after the similitude of Jesus Christ, who so lives as to die no more. Or else this phrase imports that Jesus Christ is the root of our spiritual life; even as the scion lives in the stock, so believers are alive unto God in Jesus Christ, receiving from him that virtue whereby their spiritual life is begun, maintained, and perfected.

12 Let not sin therefore reign in your mortal body, that ye should obey it in the lusts thereof.

Let not sin therefore: q. d. Seeing this is the case, that you are dead to sin, baptized into Christ, are planted together into the likeness of his death, &c., therefore the rather hearken to and obey the following exhortation. By sin he means the sin or corruption of our nature, the same that before he called the old man, and the body of sin. There are remainders thereof in the regenerate; in them it is mortified, but not eradicated; therefore to them this exhortation is not unnecessary. Reign; he doth not say, let it not be or reside, but let it not reign or preside; let it not bear sway or have dominion in you; let it not have the upper hand of the motions of the Spirit of God. In your mortal body; the body (called here a mortal or frail body) is put by a synecdoche for the whole man; and he the rather makes mention of the body, because the parts and members thereof are the usual instruments of sin. Therefore it follows in the next verse, Neither yield your members as instruments of unrighteousness. That ye should obey it in the lusts thereof; i. e. that you should obey sin in the lust of the body. The gender of the relative article of the Greek, requires it should be so read and understood. The meaning is not as if lusts were in the body alone, for Christ teacheth the contrary, Matt. xv. 19, 20; but because all sinful lusts do mostly show and manifest themselves in and through the body, Gal. v. 19.

13 Neither yield ye your members as instruments of unrighteousness unto sin: but yield yourselves unto God, as those that are alive from the dead, and your members as instruments of righteousness unto God.

He fitly compares our bodily members to tools that artificers work, or weapons that soldiers fight withal; for as those, so these, may be used well or ill: e. g. With the hand one man giveth an alms, another stealeth; with the tongue one man blesseth, another curseth. By members here we are not only to understand the parts of the body, as the hands, eyes, ears, &c.; but also the faculties of the soul, as the understanding, will, affections, &c. These bear some proportion to the bodily members, as the understanding to the eye, &c. All of them must be employed by us as weapons to fight, not under the command of Satan for sin, but under the command of God for righteousness. As those that are alive from the dead: these words contain a reason why we should not serve sin and Satan, but bequeath and dedicate ourselves to the service of God, because we are endued with a spiritual life, after a spiritual death; or because we have received so great a benefit as to be raised in Christ from the death and power of sin.

14 For sin shall not have dominion over you: for ye are not under the law, but under grace.

In the 12th verse it was an exhortation, but in this it is a promise, that sin shall not reign in and over us. Rebel it may, but reign it shall not in the regenerate. It hath lost its absolute and uncontrolled power. It fares with sin in such as with those beasts in Dan. vii. 12, who, though their lives were prolonged for a season, had their dominion taken away. It is an encouragement to fight, when we are sure of victory. For ye are not under the law, but under grace: he adds this as a reason of what he had asserted and promised: you are not under a legal, but gospel dispensation; so some expound the words; grace is often put for the gospel: or, you are not under the old but the new covenant. The law and grace thus differ; the one condemns the sinner, the other absolves him; the one requires perfect, the other accepts sincere, obedience; the one prescribes what we must do, the other assists us in the doing of our duty. This last seems to be the genuine sense: q. d. You may be sure sin shall have no dominion over you; for you are not under the law, which forbids sin, but gives no power against it, or which requires obedience, and gives no strength to perform it (like the Egyptian task-masters, who required bricks but gave no straw); but under the gospel or covenant of grace, where sin is not only forbidden, but the sinner is enabled to resist and overcome it. Quest. But what shall be said of the godly in the times of the law; were not they under grace? Ans. They were, Acts xv. 11; Heb. iv. 2; but not in the same degree. The godly had help and assistance under the law, but they had it not by the law. How believers are said not to be under the law: see chap. vii. 4.

<sup>1</sup> 1 Cor. 9. 21. 15 What then? shall we sin, *because we are not under the law, but under grace? God forbid.

What then? doth it follow from hence that we are lawless, and may live as we list? God forbid: q. d. No, by no means, the premises afford no such conclusion; though we are not under the curse and rigour of the law, yet we are under its directions and discipline: the gospel allows of sin no more than the law. The apostle is careful, both here and elsewhere, to prevent licentiousness, or the abuse of Christian liberty: see Gal. v. 13; 1 Pet. ii. 16: see also ver. 1, and the notes there.

He refutes the aforementioned cavil by a common axiom, that every one knows and apprehends. Of obedience unto righteousness; which will be rewarded with eternal life. But why doth he not say of obedience unto life? then the antithesis had been more plain and full. Because though sin be the cause of death, yet obedience is not the cause of life, (as ver. 23,) but only the way to it.

17 But God be thanked, that ye were the servants of sin, but ye have obeyed from the heart <sup>b</sup> that form of doctrine † which was delivered you.

But God be thanked, that ye were the servants of sin: q. d. But as for you, God be thanked, that though once you were the servants of sin, viz. when you were ignorant and unregenerate, yet now you are freed from that bondage, and set at liberty from the power and dominion of sin. But ye have obeyed from the heart that form of doctrine which was delivered you: this phrase expresseth the efficacy of Divine doctrine in the hearts of believers; it changeth and fashioneth their hearts according to its likeness, 2 Cor. iii. 18. Hence in James i. 21, it is called an ingrafted word; it turns the heart and life of the hearer into its own nature, as the stock doth the scion that is ingrafted into it. The doctrine of the gospel is the mould, and the hearer is the metal, which, when it is melted and cast into the mould, receives its form and figure.

Made free from sin; i. e. the servitude of sin; having received a manumission from that hard and evil master, you have given up yourselves to a better and more ingenious service.

19 I speak after the manner of men because of the infirmity of your flesh: for as ye have yielded your members servants to uncleanness and to iniquity unto iniquity; even so now yield your members servants to righteousness unto holiness.

I speak after the manner of men because of the infirmity of your flesh: q. d. I accommodate myself to your capacity, because of the weakness of your understanding in spiritual things; therefore I use this familiar similitude of service and freedom, that by these secular and civil things you might the better understand such as are spiritual: see John iii. 12. For as ye have yielded, &c.: q. d. The great thing that I desire of you (and it is most reasonable) is this, that you would be as sedulous and careful now to obey God, as you have formerly been to obey and serve sin; to do good, as you have been to do evil. To unclean-

ness; to fleshly lusts, which defile you. To iniquity unto iniquity; i. e. adding one sin to another; or else by the former you may understand original, by the latter actual sin. He useth three words about the service of sin, and but two about the service of God; wicked men take great pains for hell; oh that we would take the same for heaven.

q. d. When you served sin, you knew that God and righteousness had no whit of your service; why then should sin have any of your service now, when ye have delivered up yourselves to righteousness, or godliness, to be the obedient followers thereof? Why should not ye now abstain as strictly from all sin, as then ye did from all good?

q. d. And this will be much more equal and reasonable, if you consider these three things: 1. How little fruit and satisfaction your former sins have afforded you in the very time of committing them. 2. How nothing but shame and sorrow doth follow upon the remembrance of them. 3. How death, yea, eternal death and damnation, (unless pardoning grace and mercy prevent it,) will be the certain conclusion of them. And whether these things are true or no, I appeal to yourselves.

22 But now <sup>e</sup> being made free from sin, <sup>f</sup> and become servants to God, ye have your fruit unto holiness, and the end everlasting life.

q. d. But now, on the contrary, being set at liberty from the service of sin, and admitted to be the servants of God, you plainly perceive a difference: for, 1. In your lifetime you increase in grace and holiness, and that is no small fruit or advantage; and then, 2. At your death you shall have everlasting life.

23 For <sup>h</sup> the wages of sin is death; but <sup>i</sup> the gift of God is eternal life through Jesus Christ our Lord.

q. d. Now therefore compare the office of both these services together, and you shall easily see which master is best to serve and obey; the wages that sin will pay you, in the end is death; but the reward that God will freely bestow upon you (if you be his servants) is eternal life through Jesus Christ our Lord. Wages; the word properly signifies victuals. The Romans of old paid their soldiers with provision and victuals in recompence of their service; afterward they gave them money, but still the old term was retained, and now it is used to signify any reward or stipend whatsoever. Is death: by death here we must understand not only temporal, but also and more especially eternal death, as appears by the opposition it hath to eternal life: this is the just and true hire of sin. The gift of God is eternal life; he doth not say that eternal life is the wages of righteousness, but that it is the gracious or free gift of God. He varies the phrase on purpose, to show that we attain not eternal life by our own merits, our own works or worthiness, but by the gift or grace of God; for which cause he also addeth, through Jesus Christ our Lord. See Aug. lib. de Gratia et Libero Arbitrio, c. 9. Let the papists (if they can) reconcile this text to their distinction of mortal and venial sins, and to their doctrine of the meritoriousness of good works.

CHAP. VII

No law having power over a person longer than he liveth, 1—3, we therefore, being become dead to the law by the body of Christ, are left free to place ourselves under a happier dispensation, 4. For the law, through the prevalency of corrupt passions, could only serve as an instrument of sin unto death; although it be in itself holy, and just, and good, 5—13; as is manifest by our reason approving the precepts of it, whilst our depraved nature is unable to put them in practice, 14—23. The wretchedness of man in such a situation, and God's mercy in his deliverance from it through Christ, 24, 25.

KNOW ye not, brethren, (for I speak to them that know the law,) how that the law hath dominion over a man as long as he liveth?

The apostle, having showed in a former chapter how believers are freed from the dominion of sin, proceeds in this chapter to declare, that they are free also from the yoke of the Mosaical law, because that was dead to them, and they to it. This he illustrates, and proceeds by the familiar allegory of a husband and his wife: Look, as a wife is free from her husband when he is dead, and may then marry another, and be no adulteress; so believers are dead to the law, and are free to be married to another, even to Christ, that is raised from the dead, that upon their marriage they may bring forth fruit unto God. By the law here he means the law of wedlock, or the law of Moses about that matter, as appears by the instance given in the next verse. The word man here is common to both sexes, and may be applied to either, for both are subject to the aforementioned law.

<sup>a</sup> 1 Cor. 7. 39. 2 For <sup>a</sup> the woman which hath an husband is bound by the law to her husband so long as he liveth; but if the husband be dead, she is loosed from the law of her husband.

He here exemplifies and illustrates the foregoing assertion. The woman is bound by the law to her husband so long as he liveth: see a parallel place, 1 Cor. vii. 39. This is the general rule, yet there is an exception in the case of fornication or desertion: see Matt. v. 32; 1 Cor. vii. 15. From the law of her husband; from the obligation of the law of marriage.

<sup>b</sup> Mat. 5. 32. 3 So then <sup>b</sup> if, while her husband liveth, she be married to another man, she shall be called an adulteress: but if her husband be dead, she is free from that law; so that she is no adulteress, though she be married to another man.

Ye also are become dead to the law; i. e. ye are taken off from all hopes of justification by it, and from your confidence in obedience to it, Gal. ii. 19. The opposition seems to require that he should have said, the law is dead to us; but these two phrases are much the same. Quest. What law doth he mean? Ans. Not only the ceremonial, but the moral law, for in that he instanceth, ver. 7. The moral law is in force still; Christ came to confirm, and not to destroy it; but believers are freed from the malediction, from the rigid exaction, and from the irritation thereof. Of this last he speaks, ver. 8, 9, and from it we are freed but in part. By the body of Christ; i. e. by the sacrifice of Christ's body upon the cross; thereby he delivered us from the law, in the sense before mentioned. Fruit unto God; i. e. fruits of holiness and good works, to the glory and praise of God.

For: q. d. For bringing forth of which fruit unto God, we have now better helps than formerly we had; or we are in much better circumstances than formerly we were: and so he proceeds to show how our present state doth differ from the former. When we were in the flesh; i. e. in our carnal, fleshy state, before we were regenerated, or under the carnal pedagogy of the law; for in the next verse he speaks of our being now delivered from the law. The motions of sins which were by the law; i. e. the corrupt inclinations to sin, which are drawn forth by the law, as ill vapours are raised out of a dunghill by the sun; or which are irritated by the law; of which by and by. Did work in our members: see chap. vi. 13, 16. To bring forth fruit unto death; i. e. such ill fruit as ends in death, chap. vi. 21.

6 But now we are delivered from the law, || that being dead wherein we were held; that we should serve <sup>g</sup> in newness of spirit, and not in the oldness of the letter.

But now; i. e. being brought out of our fleshy state. We are delivered from the law: see the notes on ver. 4. That being dead wherein we were held; the relative is not in the Greek text, but it is well supplied to fill up the sense. The antecedent must be either sin or the law; by both of these we were held or detained whilst unregenerate; but now neither of these have any power to hold us with. Some read it, he being dead; the old man, of which he spake in the foregoing chapter. That we should serve in newness of spirit; i. e. that we should serve God, or Jesus Christ, our new husband, in true holiness, which is wrought in us by the renewing of the Spirit; or serve him in a new spiritual manner. And not in the oldness of the letter; i. e. not in an outward and ceremonial manner, according to the letter of the law; which service, or way of worship, is now antiquated, and grown out of date. The word oldness insinuates the abolishing thereof, because of insufficiency, Heb. viii. 13.

7 What shall we say then? Is the law sin? God forbid. Nay, <sup>h</sup> I had not known sin, but by the law: for I had not known || lust, except the law had said, <sup>i</sup> Thou shalt not covet.

Is the law sin? God forbid: here is another anticipation of an objection, which might arise from what the apostle had said, ver. 5, that sin was powerful in us by the law. Some might object and say, that the law then was sin, i. e. that it was the cause of it, and a factor for it. To this he answers, by his usual note of detestation, God forbid. Nay, I had not known sin, but by the law; i. e. I had not known it so clearly and effectually, so as to humble and drive me to Christ; for otherwise, nature itself teacheth a difference of good and evil in many things. He adds this as a reason why the law cannot be the cause of sin, because it discovers and reproves sin, it detects and damns it; and that it so doth, he proves from his own experience. For I had not known lust; i. e. I had not known it to be sin. By lust here some understand that concupiscence which the schoolmen call unformed concupiscence, which hath not the consent of the will: for the concupiscence to which we consent, the heathens themselves know to be sinful; but that which hath not the consent of the will, or the first motions to sin, they held to be no sin; as neither did the Pharisees, amongst whom Paul lived; nor do the papists to this very day. Some by lust understand original sin, which is the fountain from whence all particular lusts flow; the hot furnace from which all sinful motions, as so many sparks, continually arise: this is called lust, likewise, in James i. 14; and this is forbidden in every commandment; for where any of sin is prohibited, there the root also is prohibited; but more particularly it is forbidden in the tenth commandment. Except the law had said, Thou shalt not covet: some understand the law in general; but the article used in the Greek seems to restrain it to a particular precept. Besides, they are the very words of the tenth commandment. But why doth he not mention the objects that are specified in that commandment, as, thy neighbour's house, wife, &c.? The answer is, That that was not material; for the apostle speaking of inward concupiscence, which without the law is latent and undiscovered, it was enough to name the sin itself, seeing the objects about which it is conversant are of all sorts, and can hardly be numbered.

8 But <sup>k</sup> sin, taking occasion by the commandment, wrought in me all manner of concupiscence. For <sup>l</sup> without the law sin was dead.

But sin; i. e. the corruption of our nature, the depraved bent and bias of the soul, called before lust. Taking occa- sion by the commandment; i. e. being stirred up or drawn forth by the prohibition of the law. The law did not properly give occasion, but sin took it. The law (as before) is not the cause of sin, though by accident it is the occasion of it. In a dropsy, it is not the drink that is to be blamed for increasing the disease, but the ill habit of body. Such is the depravedness of man's nature, that the things which are forbidden are the more desired: the more the law would dam up the torrent of sinful lusts, the higher do they swell. The law was given to restrain sin, but through our corruption it falls out contrarily. The law inhibiting sin, and not giving power to avoid it, our impetuous lusts take occasion or advantage from thence, the more eagerly to pursue it. Wrought in me all manner of concupiscence; i. e. inordinate affections and inclinations of all sorts. For without the law; i. e. without the knowledge of the law. Sin was dead; i. e. comparatively dead. Sin hath not so much power, either to terrify the conscience, or to stir up inordinate affections; it is like a sleepy lion, that stirs not.

9 For I was alive without the law once: but when the commandment came sin revived, and I died.

For I was alive without the law once: q. d. Take me, if you please, for an instance. Before I knew the law aright, and understood the Divine and spiritual meaning of it, or whilst the law stood afar off, and was not brought home to my conscience, I was alive, that is, in my own conceit; I thought myself in as good condition as any man living; my conscience never gave me any trouble. So it was with me once, or heretofore, when I was a Pharisee, or in an unregenerate state. But when the commandment came; i. e. when it came nearer to my conscience; when I came to know and understand the spiritual meaning and extent of it, that it condemned sinful lusts, affections, and inclinations. Sin revived; i. e. its sinfulness and guilt appeared, and I had a lively sense thereof imprinted upon my soul; or my corruptions began to gather head, and seemed, as it were, to receive new vigour and life. And I died; i. e. in my own opinion and feeling. I felt my conscience deadly wounded. I was convinced I was in a state of death and damnation. I lost the confidence I formerly had of my good estate.

10 And the commandment, <sup>m</sup> which was ordained to life, I found to be unto death.

q. d. So it came to pass, that the commandment, which was ordained to be a rule of life, and, if I could have kept it, a means of life also, chap. x. 5; Gal. iii. 12, I found it to be to me (through my corruption and transgression) an occasion of death; it bound me over to punishment; and so, by accident, it tendeth to death. Some by life and death, here, understand peace and perturbation of spirit.

11 For sin, taking occasion by the commandment, deceived me, and by it slew me.

For sin, taking occasion by the commandment: see the notes on ver. 8. Deceived me; i. e. seduced and drew me aside, Heb. iii. 13; James i. 14. And by it slew me; i. e. it drove me into despair, or delivered me over to death and damnation, and made me obnoxious thereunto.

12 Wherefore <sup>a</sup> the law is holy, and the commandment holy, and just, and good.

Wherefore the law is holy; and so the objection, ver. 7, was a groundless objection: for though the law were the occasion of sin, or were made advantage of by sin, as ver. 8, yet it was not the cause of it; that, on all hands, is acknowledged to be holy, &c. The law; the law in all the branches of it. The commandment; particularly the preceptive part of the law, and every particular precept. Holy, and just, and good: the three epithets here given the law of God may be thus distinguished; it is holy in respect of the ceremonial part, it is just in respect of the judicial part, and good in respect of the moral part of it. Or else the law is holy, as it teacheth us our duty unto God; just, as it showeth us our duty to our neighbour; good, in regard of the effect and end, as it works goodness in the observer thereof, and is conducive to his temporal and eternal good.

13 Was then that which is good made death unto me? God forbid. But sin, that it might appear sin, working death in me by that which is good; that sin by the commandment might become exceeding sinful.

Was then that which is good made death unto me? God forbid: another anticipation. The apostle denies that the holy law was in its own nature deadly, or the cause of death to him; the fault was not in the law, but in his own depraved nature: but the plain case is this that follows. But sin, that it might appear sin, working death in me by that which is good; that sin, that so it might appear every way like itself, wrought death in him, by occasion of that law, which yet itself is holy, just, and good. That sin by the commandment might become exceeding sinful; so as hereupon sin, which in the time of his ignorance and unregeneracy seemed not worthy of any notice, appeared to be exceeding foul and sinful. Sin is so evil, that he cannot call it by a worse name than its own. Jerome thinketh, that the apostle here commits a solecism, by joining an adjective of the masculine gender with a substantive of the feminine; but Beza and Erasmus have observed, that this is usual in the Attic dialect. See the like, chap. i. 20. Some read sinner for sinful, and make the apostle to speak of sin as of a certain person; and therefore all along the context sin is said to work, to be dead, to revive, to deceive, to kill, &c., which is properly attributed to persons, and not to things.

14 For we know that the law is spiritual: but I am carnal, <sup>o</sup> sold under sin.

He goes on to clear the law, and excuse it, giving it another commendation, that it is spiritual; i. e. it requires such obedience as is not only outward, but inward and spiritual; it forbids spiritual as well as fleshly sins. Read Christ's exposition of it, in the 5th of St. Matthew. I am carnal; i. e. in part, because of the remainders of sin and of the flesh that are still in me; in respect of which, those who are regenerated are said to be carnal. Compare 1 Cor. i. 2, with 1 Cor. iii. 1. Sold under sin: he did not actively sell himself to sin, or to commit sin, which is said of Ahab, 1 Kings xxi. 20, 25, and of the idolatrous Israelites, 2 Kings xvii. 17. He was not sin's servant or slave; but many times he was sin's captive against his will; see ver. 23. Against his will and consent, he was still subject to the violent lusts and assaults of sin, and not able wholly to free himself: though he always made stout resistance, yet many times he was overcome. Hitherto the apostle hath spoken of the power of the law and sin in unregenerate persons, even as he himself had experienced whilst he was yet in such a state; but now he cometh to speak of himself as he then was, and to declare what power the remainders of sinful flesh had still in him, though regenerated, and in part renewed. That the following part of this chapter is to be applied to a regenerate person, is evident, because the apostle (speaking of himself in the former verses) useth the preter-perfect tense, or speaketh of that which was past; but here he changeth the tense, and speaketh of the present time. From the 7th verse to the 14th, he tells us how it had been with him formerly; and then from the 14th verse to the end, he relates how it was with him now; I was so and so, I am thus and thus. The changing of the tense and time doth plainly argue a change in the person. They that list to be further satisfied in this point, may find it fully discussed in our own language, by Mr. Anthony Burgess, in his excellent discourse of Original Sin, part iv. c. 3, and by Dr. Willet, in his Hexalta in locum; and they that understand the Latin tongue, may find it argued pro and con, in Synops. Critic. &c., and by Aug. Retractat. lib. i. c. 23; Contra Julian. lib. v. c. 11.

15 For that which I do I <sup>t</sup> allow not: for <sup>p</sup> what I would, that do I not; but <sup>q</sup> what I hate, that do I.

For that which I do; i. e. what I do contrary to the command of God. I allow not: in the Greek it is, I know not: q. d. Many times I am surprised and overtaken, not knowing or considering what I do. Or when he says, I know not, his meaning is, (as our translation renders it,) I allow or approve not. So the word is used, Matt. vii. 23, and elsewhere: q. d. Even now, in my converted and regenerate state, I am many times greatly divided, and feel a strife or combat in myself; so that the good I would do upon the motions of God's Spirit in me, I do not; and the evil that

I hate, and am utterly averse to, so far as I am regenerated, that I do. See a parallel place, Gal. v. 17. But what I hate, that do I: he doth not speak here so much of outward actions, as of inward motions and affections: he doth not speak of gross sins, as drunkenness, uncleanness, &c., but of such infirmities as flow from the polluted nature, and from which we can never be thoroughly cleansed in this life.

16 If then I do that which I would not, I consent unto the law that it is good.

This very thing is an argument, that the law is such as I have before asserted, ver. 12, 14. This shows my consent to the holiness and goodness of the law; I vote with it, and for it, as the only rule of right or righteousness.

17 Now then it is no more I that do it, but sin that dwelleth in me.

It is no more I that do it; i. e. it is not I as spiritual or renewed, it is not my whole self, but it is sin that dwelleth in me, that inhabits in me as a troublesome inmate, that I cannot get rid of, that will not out so long as the house stands; as the fretting leprosy in the walls of a house would not out till the house itself were demolished. It is such an inhabitant as is never from home; it is not in us as a stranger for a season, but it makes its constant abode with us.

18 For I know that in me (that is, in my flesh,) dwelleth no good thing: for to will is present with me; but how to perform that which is good I find not.

In my flesh; i. e. in my fleshly part, or my nature in and of itself. No good thing; no goodness at all, or no spiritual good. For to will is present with me; i. e. I can, so long and so far as I follow the motions of God's Spirit, will that which is good; but how to perform the good that I would, I find no power or might, at least to perform it in that manner that I desire: the meaning is not that he never did the good he desired; but it often so fell out, he began many good things, but he could not go thorough-stitch with them.

19 For the good that I would I do not: but the evil which I would not, that I do.

20 Now if I do that I would not, it is no more I that do it, but sin that dwelleth in me.

These two verses are a repetition of what he had said, ver. 15, 17. Every new man is two men; there is in him an I and an I. The apostle in his unregenerate state, could make no such distinction as now he doth.

21 I find then a law, that, when I would do good, evil is present with me.

This verse hath greatly vexed interpreters. The apostle speaking simply and abstractly of a law, the question is, What law he means? Some take the word improperly, for a decree or condition, which was imposed upon him, and to which he was necessarily subject, that when he would do good, evil should be present with him. Others by law here do understand the law of sin; of which he speaks afterwards, ver. 23, 25. Sin is like a law, and so powerful and imperious in its commands and dictates, that we have much ado, the best of us, to resist it, and shake off its yoke. q. d. I find by sad experience such a forcible power in sin, that when I would do good, I am hindered, and cannot do it so freely and fully as I desire. Others by law here do understand the law of God; and those that so understand it, have given no less than eight interpretations, to make the grammatical connexion: the best is of those that say the preposition κατά is understood, a frequent ellipsis in the Greek tongue, (see James i. 26,) and then the sense is this; I find that when, according to the law or command of God, I would do good, evil is present with me. Evil is present with me; another periphrasis of original sin, of which there are many in this chapter. Just now it was the sin that dwelleth in us, and here it is the evil that is present with us: it inheres and adheres, or hangs upon us continually. It is adjacent, so the Greek word signifies, and always at hand; we carry it about with us at all times, and into all places; whithersoever we go, it follows us; or, as it is here, in our doing of good it is a very great impediment to us.

22 For I delight in the law of God after the inward man:

This shows yet more expressly that the apostle speaketh in the person of a regenerate man, or of himself as regenerate. Certainly, to delight in the law of God is an inseparable property of such a one: see Psal. i. 2, and cxix. 77, 111. The inward man; i. e. the new man, or regenerate part within me: this is called the hidden man of the heart, 1 Pet. iii. 4: see chap. ii. 29; 2 Cor. iv. 16.

23 But I see another law in my members, warring against the law of my mind, and bringing me into captivity to the law of sin which is in my members.

Another law in my members; i. e. a law quite different from the law of God, mentioned in the foregoing verse. By the law in the members understand natural corruption, which, like a law, commandeth and inclineth by sensual rewards and punishments; and by the law in the mind understand a principle of grace, which, as a law, as well as the other, commandeth and inclineth to that which is good. The law in the members and the law in the mind, are the same that are called flesh and Spirit, Gal. v. 17. These two laws and principles are in all regenerate persons, and are directly contrary to one another; hence there is continual warring and combating betwixt them; as is expressed in both these places, as also in James iv. 1; 1 Pet. ii. 11. Bringing me into captivity to the law of sin; i. e. drawing and hurrying me to the commission of sin, against my will and consent. He pursues the metaphor; the flesh doth not only war in the regenerate, but many times it overcomes and hath success: see ver. 15. To the law of sin which is in my members; i. e. to itself. The antecedent is put in the room of the relative: see Gen. ix. 16, and elsewhere. The law in the members and the law of sin in the members are the same.

24 O wretched man that I am! who shall deliver me from the body of this death?

O wretched man that I am! the word signifies one wearied out with continual combats. Who shall deliver me? it is not the voice of one desponding or doubting, but of one breathing and panting after deliverance: the like pathetic exclamations are frequent: see Psal. lv. 6. One calls this verse, gemitus sanctorum, the groan of the godly. From the body of this death; or, from this body of death; or, by a Hebraism, from this dead body, this carcass of sin, to which I am inseparably fastened, as noisome every whit to my soul as a dead carcass to my senses. This is another circumlocution, or denomination of original sin. It is called the body of sin, chap. vi. 6, and here the body of death; it tends and binds over to death.

25 I thank God through Jesus Christ our Lord. So then with the mind I myself serve the law of God; but with the flesh the law of sin.

I thank God; who hath already delivered me from the slavery and dominion of sin; so that though it wars against me, I still resist it, and, by the strength of Christ, do frequently overcome it, 1 Cor. xv. 57. So then with the mind I myself serve the law of God; but with the flesh the law of sin: this is the conclusion the apostle maketh of this experimental discourse. q. d. So far as I am renewed, I yield obedience to the law of God; and so far as I am unregenerate, I obey the dictates and suggestions of the law of sin. Object. No man can serve two contrary masters. Ans. The apostle did not serve these two in the same part, or the same renewed faculty; nor did he do it at the same time, ordinarily; and for the most part he served the law of God, though sometimes, through the power of temptation and in-dwelling corruption, he was enforced, against his will, to serve the law of sin.

CHAP. VIII

Under the gospel we are free from condemnation, walking after the Spirit, 1—4. The evil of being carnally minded, and the good of being spiritually minded, 5—8. Chris- tians have God's Spirit to guide and assist them, 9—11; by which if they mortify the flesh, they shall live, 12, 13. For they that are led by the Spirit are sons of God, and heirs of glory, 14—18; whose manifestation the world hath long earnestly looked for, hoping to be rescued thereby from the bondage of corruption, 19—22. And even they who have the first-fruits of the Spirit do still long after it, 23; being hitherto saved by hope only, 24, 25: the Spirit in the mean time aiding their infirmities in prayer, 26, 27. Nevertheless the final good of them that fear God is all along pursued, being fore-ordained of God, and brought about according to the course of his providence, 28—30. The ground and assurance of the Christian's hope, 31—39.

THERE is therefore now no condemnation to them which are in Christ Jesus, who *walk not after the flesh, but after the Spirit.

22.

There is therefore now; seeing things are so as I have said, since believers do not allow themselves in sin, chap. vii. 15, and are in part delivered from it, as ver. 25, therefore it follows as it is here. No condemnation; or no one condemnation. He doth not say, there is no matter of condemnation, or nothing damnable in them that are in Christ, there is enough and enough of that; but he says, there is no actual condemnation to such: see John iii. 18; v. 24. There is a meiosis in the words, more is understood than is expressed; he means, that justification and eternal salvation is the portion of such. The positive is included in the negative; it is God's condemnation only, from which such as are in Christ are exempted; they are nevertheless condemned and censured by men, and sometimes by their own consciences too. To them which are in Christ Jesus; so we fill it up, but in the original it is only, to them in Christ Jesus. The phrase imports, that there is a mystical and spiritual union betwixt Christ and believers. This is sometimes expressed by Christ's being in them, ver. 10; 2 Cor. xiii. 5; Col. i. 17; and here by their being in Christ: see 1 Cor. i. 30; 1 John v. 20. Christ is in believers by his Spirit, and believers are in Christ by faith. Who walk not after the flesh, but after the Spirit: this clause describes the persons who are united to Christ, or who are exempted from condemnation; they are such as walk not, &c. By flesh understand the corrupt nature that is in man: see chap. vii. 18, 25; John iii. 6; Gal. v. 17: to walk after it, is to be led and guided by the motions of it. That is, it is not their principle and guide, there is another nature or principle in them, by which they are guided and acted; and what that is the next words tell you. By the Spirit some understand the person of the Spirit; others, the grace of the Spirit, the new or divine nature (as it is called) which is implanted in the soul in the work of regeneration: this is called the Spirit, Matt. xxvi. 41; John iii. 6; Gal. v. 17. To walk after the Spirit, is to be led and guided by the counsels and motions thereof. It is to regulate and order the whole conversation according to the rule of the new creature, or according to the line and square of God's word and Spirit. You have the same phrase, Gal. v. 16, 25. To walk after the Spirit, is not only now and then to have some good motions, or to do some good actions, but it is to persevere and go forward therein; walking is a continued and progressive motion. The connexion of these two shows that negative holiness is not enough; we must not only abstain from evil, but do good.

2 For <sup>b</sup>the law of <sup>c</sup>the Spirit of life in Christ Jesus hath made me free from <sup>d</sup>the law of sin and death.

The law of the Spirit of life; some understand hereby the doctrine of the gospel, which is called the law of the Spirit of life, because it is the ministry of the Spirit and of life. Others understand the efficacy and power of that grace and holiness, wherewith the living and quickening Spirit of God hath filled the human nature of Christ. Others rather understand a regenerating and working the new and heavenly life in the soul, with great power and efficacy. In Christ Jesus; i. e. which was poured out upon him, and doth still reside in him after a very eminent manner: see Isa. xi. 2; Luke iv. 1. Or, in Christ Jesus, is as much as by Christ Jesus; it is he that gives and conveys this Spirit, how, when and to whom he pleaseth. Hath made me free from the law of sin: by sin here he aims chiefly at original sin; he doth not say, that those who are in Christ are simply and absolutely delivered from sin, but from the law of sin; i. e. the power, dominion, and tyranny thereof. And death; i. e. from sin that is deadly, or of a deadly nature; as the Spirit of life is the living Spirit, so sin and death is no more, say some, than deadly sin. Others take death to be distinct from sin, and think he speaks of a double deliverance; and then by death they understand eternal or the second death: see Rev. xx. 6. The sense of the whole is this: That the mighty power of the renewing and quickening Spirit did free the apostle, and doth free all believers, from the command and rule of sin, so that it doth not reign over them, as formerly it did; and being thus freed from the power of sin, they are also freed from the power of death and eternal condemnation. So it seems as a proof of the foregoing proposition, That there is no condemnation to them, &c.

ch. 5. 20.
Heb. 7. 18.
19. & 10. 1.
2. 10. 14.
f Gal. 3. 13.
g 2 Cor. 5. 21.
Or, by a sacrifice for sin.

In this verse is a further proof of the main proposition in ver. 1. There are two things in sin that may endanger us as to condemnation, the power and the guilt of it. As to the freeing us from the former, viz. the power of sin, of that he had spoken in the foregoing verse; as to taking away the guilt of sin, of that he speaks in this verse. For what the law could not do: by the law here he means the moral law, the righteousness whereof is to be fulfilled in us, ver. 4. What is it the law cannot do? There are several answers; but this is principally meant, it cannot justify us before God. It can condemn us, but it cannot exempt us from condemnation: see Acts xiii. 38, 39; Gal. iii. 21; Heb. vii. 18, 19. In that it was weak through the flesh: by flesh, as before, we must understand the corrupt nature; that is, every man since the fall. This is that which puts a weakness and inability upon the law. The impotency of the law is not from itself, but from the condition of the subject with whom it hath to do. The law is weak to us, because we are weak to it: the sun cannot give light to a blind eye, not from any impotency in itself, but merely from the incapacity of the subject it shines upon. God sending his own Son: to justify and save fallen man, was impossible for the law to do; therefore God will find out another way, that shall do it effectually. What his own law cannot do, his own Son can; and therefore him he will send. In the likeness of sinful flesh; i. e. such flesh as sin hath made now to be subject to many infirmities and weaknesses. Flesh in this clause carries quite another sense than it did in the first verse; and in the former part of this verse, than it doth in the following verse; there it is taken morally for the corrupt nature of man, here physically for the human nature of Christ. The word likeness is to be linked, not with flesh, but with sinful flesh; he had true and real flesh, but he had only the appearance and likeness of sinful flesh: see 2 Cor. v. 21; Heb. iv. 15; vii. 26; 1 Pet. i. 19. And for sin; either this clause is to be joined to what goes before, and then the sense is, that God sent his Son in the likeness of sinful flesh, that he might take away sin. Or else it is joined to what follows, and then there is an ellipsis in it; something is cut off, or left out, which must be understood. The margin of our common Bibles insert the word sacrifice: q. d. By a sacrifice for sin, or by a sin-offering, he condemned sin, &c. This ellipsis is usual in Scripture. Isa. liii. 10, When thou shalt make his soul sin; that is, (as our translation renders it,) an offering for sin. Ezek. xlv. 19, The priest shall take of the blood of the sin; we read it, of the sin-offering. See the like in Hos. iv. 8; 2 Cor. v. 21; Heb. x. 6. Condemned sin in the flesh; the Syriac reads it, in his flesh. The meaning is, that God severely punished sin, and inflicted the curse and penalty of it, that was due to us, in and upon the person of his own Son; God laid on him the iniquities of us all, and he bore them in his body upon a tree: see Gal. iii. 13; 1 Pet. ii. 24.

4 That the righteousness of the law might

g ver. 1. be fulfilled in us, <sup>g</sup> who walk not after the flesh, but after the Spirit.

That the righteousness of the law might be fulfilled in us : here is another end of God's sending his Son, as before ; it was that he might perfectly fulfil the righteousness of the law in or for us, which for us ourselves to do in our own persons was utterly impossible ; and yet upon which (as being imputed unto them, and accepted of God on our behalf) we shall be accounted just and righteous, as if we had done it ourselves. Christ's being a sacrifice for sin was not sufficient to answer all the ends and demands of the law ; there must be doing of what it commanded, as well as suffering of what it threatened : therefore Christ was sent for both, and both were accomplished by him ; and what he did and suffered is accounted unto us as if we had done and suffered it. This is the imputed righteousness which was so often spoken of, chap. iv. ; and in reference to this he is said to be made righteousness for us, 1 Cor. i. 30, and we are said to be made the righteousness of God in him, chap. v. 19 ; 2 Cor. v. 21. Who walk not after the flesh, but after the Spirit : this was the description before of those that had union with Christ, and exemption from condemnation ; and it is again set down, as the description of those who partake of the righteousness of Christ in this way of imputation ; and it is added here again, to stave off all others from laying claim to this grace. None but holy walkers can warrantably apply Christ's fulfilling or satisfying the law to themselves : because Christ hath fulfilled the righteousness of the law for us, none may infer there is nothing for us to do, we may live as we list ; for though Christ hath fulfilled the law in all respects, yet all those for whom he hath so done, or have benefit thereby, are, and must be, such as walk not after the flesh, but after the Spirit : for the opening of which terms, see ver. 1.

For they that are after the flesh ; i. e. that are carnal and unregenerate persons, in a mere natural state. Do mind the things of the flesh ; either such things as are absolutely evil, and are called, the works of the flesh, Gal. v. 19—21 ; or else such things as are occasionally evil, as riches, honours, pleasures, &c. These are also called the things of the flesh, and are such as carnal persons mind ; i. e. they savour, affect, and take delight in them. But they that are after the Spirit ; i. e. that are spiritual and regenerate, in whom the Spirit dwells. The things of the Spirit ; i. e. they mind spiritual and heavenly things, they relish them most of all ; see Psal. iv. 7 ; lxxiii. 25.

6 For <sup>k</sup>† to be carnally minded is death ; but † to be spiritually minded is life and peace.

<sup>k</sup> ch. 6. 21. ver. 13. Gal. 6. 8. † Gr. the minding of the flesh. So ver. 7. † Gr. the minding of the Spirit. In this verse we have an account of the different end of those that are carnal and spiritual, as in the former we had a description of their different carriage and disposition. For to be carnally minded is death ; i. e. to be of that temper before described, ver. 5 ; to mind and affect the things of the flesh, doth cause death, or will end in it : the second or eternal death is chiefly intended. But to be spiritually minded ; i. e. to mind and savour the things of the Spirit, to find a sweetness and excellency therein, so as that the bent and inclination of the mind shall be thereto. Is life and peace ; it is the way to eternal life hereafter, and to a sound peace here, Psal. cxix. 165 ; Prov. iii. 17 ; Gal. vi. 16.

7 Because † the carnal mind is enmity against God : for it is not subject to the law of God, <sup>m</sup> neither indeed can be.

<sup>q</sup> d. Neither can the carnal man look for any better issue, because the carnal mind is enmity against God. He doth not say it is an enemy, but in the abstract, it is enmity, which heightens and intends the sense : an enemy may be reconciled, as Esau was to Jacob ; but enmity cannot be reconciled ; as black may be made white, but blackness cannot. For it is not subject to the law of God, neither indeed can be : this is rendered as a reason of the foregoing assertion, and it is, taken from the property of enmity. Those that are at enmity, cross each other's wills, and will not submit to one another : and the carnal mind is rebellious in the highest degree against the will of God, unless it be changed and renewed ; it is impossible it should be otherwise ; there is in it a moral impotency to obedience : see John viii. 43 ; 1 Cor. ii. 14.

8 So then they that are in the flesh cannot please God.

So then ; this verse is a consecratory, or it follows from that which went before. They that are in the flesh ; not they which are married, as a pope once expounded it ; the next verse refels such an absurd conception ; but they that are carnal and unregenerate ; the same with those who, in ver. 5, are said to be after the flesh. Cannot please God ; neither they, nor any thing they do, is pleasing unto him ; their best works are dead works, and silken sins (as one expresseth it) : it must be understood with this limitation, so long as they continue in such a state : see Psal. v. 4, 5 ; Heb. xi. 6.

9 But ye are not in the flesh, but in the Spirit, if so be that <sup>n</sup> the Spirit of God dwell in you. Now if any man have not <sup>o</sup> the Spirit of Christ, he is none of his.

Here he applies what he had laid down more generally to the believing Romans in particular. Not in the flesh, but in the Spirit ; i. e. not after the flesh, but after the Spirit, (as in ver. 5.) or not carnally, but spiritually minded. If so be that ; the conjunction here is causal, not conditional ; it may be rendered, seeing that, or forasmuch as : see ver. 17, 31 ; 2 Thess. i. 6. The Spirit of God dwell in you ; the Spirit of God dwells in the regenerate, not only by the immensity of his presence, so he is every where and in all things ; but by the presence and efficacy of his grace. The indwelling of the Spirit in believers denotes two things : 1. His ruling in them : where a man dwells as Lord, there he doth command and bear rule. 2. His abiding in them, and that for ever, John xiv. 16. If any man have not the Spirit of Christ, he is none of his ; if he has not the same Spirit which in the former part of the verse is called the Spirit of God : it is called the Spirit of Christ, because it proceeds from him, and is procured by him, John xiv. 26 : xvi. 7 ; Gal. iv. 6. When he saith such a one is none of Christ's, he means, that he doth not peculiarly belong to Christ, he hath no special interest in him, is no true member of him. As a merchant sets his seal upon his goods, so doth Christ his Spirit upon his followers, Eph. i. 13.

10 And if Christ be in you, the body is dead because of sin ; but the Spirit is life because of righteousness.

If Christ be in you ; before he said, the Spirit of God and Christ dwelt in them ; here, Christ himself. Christ dwells in believers by his Spirit. The body is dead because of sin ; by body some understand the corrupt and unregenerate part in the godly, as if that were as good as dead in them. But others take the word in its proper signification, and think no more is meant thereby than that the bodies, even of believers, are mortal bodies ; so they are called in the next verse : they are subject to death as the bodies of other men. But the Spirit is life : some by Spirit here do understand the Spirit of God ; and he is life, that is, he will quicken and raise up your bodies again to an immortal life. Others by Spirit do understand the soul, yet not simply and absolutely considered, but as renewed by grace ; that is life, or that doth live ; it lives a life of grace here, and it shall live a life of glory hereafter. Because of righteousness ; by righteousness here understand, either imputed righteousness, which gives us a right and title to salvation ; or inherent righteousness, which is a necessary condition required in every person that shall indeed be saved. The sum is, If you be Christians indeed, though your bodies die, yet your souls shall live, and that for ever ; and your dead bodies shall not finally perish, but shall certainly be raised again ; so it follows in the next verse.

11 But if the Spirit of <sup>p</sup> him that raised up Jesus from the dead dwell in you, <sup>q</sup> he that raised up Christ from the dead shall

1 Or, because of his Spirit. also quicken your mortal bodies || by his Spirit that dwelleth in you.

Him that raised up Jesus from the dead; a periphrasis of God the Father. The Son raised himself, John ii. 19; x. 18; and yet the Father is said here to raise him from the dead: see notes on chap. i. 4. Quicken your mortal bodies; raise them from a state of mortality, and all the attendants, to a glorious immortal life. By his Spirit that dwelleth in you: q. d. If you are sanctified by the Spirit, you shall be raised up by the Spirit also, as Christ was. The wicked also shall be raised at the last day. But the righteous shall be raised after a peculiar manner; they shall be raised, as by the almighty power of God, so by virtue of their union with Christ as his members, and by virtue of their relation to the Spirit as his temples. They only shall partake of a resurrection that is desirable and beneficial to them. Therefore it is called emphatically the resurrection of the just, Luke xiv. 14; and these two are joined together, as belonging one to the other; the children of God, and the children of the resurrection, Luke xx. 36.

12 Therefore, brethren, we are debtors, not to the flesh, to live after the flesh.

Therefore; this illative particle sends us to the things before delivered: q. d. Seeing we are not in the flesh, but have the Spirit of God dwelling in us; not only sanctifying and enlivening our souls for the present, but raising and quickening our bodies for the time to come; therefore we are debtors, not to the flesh, to live after the flesh; i. e. we are not debtors to sin, or the corrupt and sinful nature that is in us; we owe it no service, there is nothing due to it from believers, but blows, and the blue eye that the apostle gave it. The antithesis is omitted, but it is necessarily implied and understood; and that is, that we are debtors to the Spirit, to live and walk after it.

13 For *if ye live after the flesh, ye shall die: but if ye through the Spirit do mortify the deeds of the body, ye shall live.

If ye live after the flesh, ye shall die; viz. eternally, and never partake of the glorious resurrection before spoken of. The godly themselves need this caution; they must not think, that because they are elected and justified, &c., that therefore they may do and live as they list. Through the Spirit; i. e. by the grace and assistance of the Spirit. Mortify; i. e. kill and put to death. It is not enough to forbear the actings of sin, but we must kill and crucify it. Sin may be left upon many considerations, and yet not mortified. Evil deeds are called the deeds of the body, because the body is so instrumental in the doing thereof. There are some, that by body here do understand the corrupt nature, the same that before in many places he calls the flesh: this was called, chap. vi. 6, the body of sin, and here it is called the body. Ye shall live; viz. eternally. See a parallel place, chap. vi. 22; Gal. vi. 8: see ver. 6.

14 For *as many as are led by the Spirit of God, they are the sons of God.

This proves the latter part of the foregoing verse: Such as by the Spirit do mortify sin, shall live, for they are the sons of God; and that appears, because they are led by the Spirit of God. He doth not say, as many as live by the Spirit, but, as are led by the Spirit; to show (says one) that the Spirit must be the guide and ruler of our life, as the pilot is of the ship, and as a rider is of his horse. The phrase is borrowed (says another) either from those who are guided and directed as a blind man in his way; or from those who, wanting strength of their own, are borne and carried of others: so we are both ways led by the Spirit, for we can neither see our way, unless the Spirit direct us; nor have we strength to walk in it, unless the Spirit assist and draw us along. The Spirit leads and draws us irresistibly and necessarily, and yet not violently or against our wills; though we were unwilling before, yet we are made willing afterwards; so willing, that we desire and pray to be led by the Spirit. See Psal. xxv. 5; cxliii. 10; Cant. i. 4.

15 For *ye have not received the spirit of bondage again *to fear; but ye have received the *Spirit of adoption, whereby we cry, *Abba, Father.

This verse proves the former, that we are led by the Spirit of God, and are his children, and that by an effect of the Spirit in them, which is to enable them to call God Father. He doth not here speak of two distinct Spirits, but one and the same Spirit of God, in different persons and at different times, is both the spirit of bondage and the Spirit of adoption. The spirit of bondage seems to respect either that state of servitude, which the people of God were under in the time of the ceremonial law; see Gal. iv. 3, 9; or it respects the publishing of the moral law upon Mount Sinai, which was with horror and fear. Compare Exod. xix. 16, with Heb. xii. 18—21: see Gal. iv. 24. Or else it respects that horror and slavish fear, which the Spirit of God doth work in men's hearts and consciences, by the ministry of the law, when he opens the eyes of men to see they are in bondage and slavery to sin and Satan, and that they are subject and obnoxious to the wrath and vengeance of God; this is many times preparatory and introductory to their conversion; but when they are regenerated they are delivered from it: see Luke i. 71; Heb. ii. 15; 1 John iv. 18. Object. Many of God's children are full of doubts and fears. Answer. These are not always from the suggestions of God's Spirit, but the misgivings of their own spirits. Some distinguish between the spirit of bondage and desertion; the children of God are delivered from the former, but exercised with the latter. The Spirit of God is called the Spirit of adoption, both because he works and effects it in us, and because he testifies and assures it to us. He might have said, the Spirit of liberty; the antithesis required it; but he said as much, when he called him the Spirit of adoption, for children are free. Whereby we cry, Abba, Father; or, by whom we cry. Acceptable prayer is wrought in us by the Spirit, ver. 26. Abba is a Hebrew or Syriac word, signifying Father; why then is the word Father added in the Greek? To signify, that God is the Father both of Jews and Gentiles, chap. iii. 29; x. 12; or to show the double paternity that is in God, he is the Father of all men by creation, of believers only by grace and regeneration: or, rather, to denote the importunity and earnestness which ought to be in prayer; and so it agrees with the former word, crying. Ingeniations carry an earnestness with them. There are two places more where these two words are repeated or used together, Mark xiv. 36; Gal. iv. 6.

16 <sup>b</sup>The Spirit itself beareth witness with our spirit, that we are the children of God:

The Spirit of adoption doth not only excite us to call upon God as our Father, but it doth ascertain and assure us (as before) that we are his children. And this it doth not by an outward voice, as God the Father to Jesus Christ; nor by an angel, as to Daniel, and the virgin Mary; but by an inward and secret suggestion, whereby he raiseth our hearts to this persuasion, that God is our Father, and we are his children. This is not the testimony of the graces and operations of the Spirit, but of the Spirit itself. Conceive it thus; A man's own spirit doth witness to him his adoption, he finds in himself, upon diligent search and examination, the manifest signs and tokens thereof. But this testimony of itself is weak, and Satan hath many ways and wiles to invalidate it; therefore, for more assurance, it is confirmed by another and greater testimony, and that is of the Spirit himself; he witnesseth with our spirits, and seals it up unto us; he first works grace in our hearts, and then witnesseth to it. This testimony is not alike in all believers, nor in any one of them at all times; it is better felt than expressed. He witnesseth to our spirit (so some read) by a distinct and immediate testimony, and witnesseth with our spirit (so the word properly signifies) by a conjunctive and concurrent testimony.

17 And if children, then heirs; *heirs of God, and joint-heirs with Christ; *if so be that we suffer with him, that we may be also glorified together.

And if children, then heirs; there is a parallel text in Gal. iv. 7. It is not so with the children of earthly princes: see 2 Chron. xxi. 3. Joint-heirs with Christ; or co-heirs with Christ; he is our elder Brother, and is not ashamed to call us brethren: the inheritance is his by nature, ours by grace. If so be that we suffer with him; the cross of Christ is the condition of our heavenly inheritance. The pronoun him is not in the original, but fitly supplied in our translation. Suffering with him, is much the same with suffering for him: suffering believers do but pledge Christ in the cup that he began to them. That we may be also glorified together; or, glorified with him, not with equal glory, but according to our proportion; he was glorified in this way, Luke xxiv. 26, and so must we. Three things are implied in our being glorified together: 1. Conformity; we shall in some measure be like him in glory: see John xvii. 22; Phil. iii. 21. 2. Concomitancy; we shall be present with him in glory, John xvii. 24; 1 Thess. iv. 17. 3. Conveyance; our glory will be from him; his glory will reflect on us, and we shall shine in his beams.

18 For I reckon that the sufferings of this present time are not worthy to be compared with the glory which shall be revealed in us.

For I reckon; i. e. I make account, I certainly conclude: see chap. iii. 28. The word is borrowed either from arithmeticians, who by casting their accounts do find the true and total sum; or from logicians, who by considering the premises do draw the conclusion. Not worthy to be compared; the word properly signifieth that part of the balance which goeth down: q. d. If the sufferings of this life be weighed with the glory to come, they will be light in comparison. These words, to be compared, are supplied in our translation to make up the sense. Revealed in us; it is revealed to us, and it shall be revealed in us. This text is a confutation of the popish doctrine of merit and human satisfaction.

19 For the earnest expectation of the creature waiteth for the manifestation of the sons of God.

The apostle Peter, speaking of the Epistles of our apostle, in 2 Pet. iii. 16, saith, that there are some things in them hard to be understood; and some think, by reflecting upon some particular passages in that chapter, he doth more especially respect this context; there is indeed a great deal of obscurity in it. The creature: this word is four times used in this and the three following verses, only in the 22nd verse it is rendered creation; that is the subject of which all that followeth is predicated. One main question therefore is this, Of what creature the apostle here speaks? Divers answers are or may be given; I will fix upon two only. 1. By the creature, or the creation, (and, ver. 22, the whole creation, or every creature), is meant all mankind, both Jews and Gentiles, and especially the latter: see Mark xvi. 15; there Christ gives it in commission to preach the gospel to every creature; it is the same word. And in 1 Pet. ii. 13, they are commanded to submit themselves to every ordinance of man: in the original it is, to every human creature, the same word which is in the text before us: he means the Gentile or heathen magistrates in authority over them. In the Scripture the Gentiles are sometimes called the world, chap. xi. 12, 15, and sometimes the creature, or the creation. 2. By the creature is meant the whole world with all the creatures therein, or the whole frame and body of the creation. The creature in this sense, by a prosopopœia, is here spoken of as a rational person; 't is usual with the Spirit of God, in Scripture, to fasten upon unreasonable creatures such expressions as are proper only to those that are reasonable: see Psal. xcvi. 11, 12; Hab. ii. 11; James v. 4. So here the creature (in this sense) is said to expect, wait, &c. Waiteth; the expectation of the creature expecteth: a Hebrew pleonasm: it expecteth with the head lift up or stretched out, Phil. i. 20. The manifestation of the sons of God; i. e. the time when the sons of God shall be manifested. The Arabic interpreter puts the word glory into the text, and reads the word thus, The earnest expectation of the creature waiteth for the manifestation of the glory of the sons of God; their glory for the present is hidden, but it shall be discovered and manifested, 2 Cor. iii. 18. The creature, in the sense of the word as above, waiteth for this, because then it shall be restored to its primitive liberty and lustre, at that time there will be a restitution of all things, Acts iii. 21. But those who understand the creature in the first sense, do put a quite different interpretation upon this last clause: and that is, that the Gentile world are now earnestly expecting and waiting to see what the Jews will do, whether they will discover themselves to be the sons of God, or not, by their receiving or rejecting Christ.

20 For the creature was made subject to vanity, not willingly, but by reason of him who hath subjected the same in hope,

If these words be understood of the world, and all the creatures therein contained, then they show the creature's present condition; it is subject to vanity, and that, either in regard of its insufficiency, it falling short of that for which it was first created and ordained; then a thing is said to be vain, when it doth not answer or reach its proper end: or in respect of its transitoriness and uncertainty, of which see 1 Cor. vii. 31; Heb. i. 11, 12; 1 John ii. 17. The next verse tells us it is subject to the bondage of corruption as well as vanity. Now this must needs be an unwilling subjection, therefore it is here said it is not subject willingly, i. e. of its own accord, or of its proper instinct and inclination. What the will is in those that are rational, the inclination is in those things that are natural; how comes it then into this condition? The next clause tells us, it is by reason of him who hath subjected the same in hope: i. e. God, for the sin of man, hath cursed the creature, and subjected it to vanity and corruption: see Gen. iii. 17; iv. 12; Lev. xxvi. 19, 20. And though he hath done this, yet there is ground to expect and hope that the creature shall return again to its former estate wherein it was created; that it shall be delivered and restored into a better condition, as in the next verse. Those that by the creature understand the Gentile world, give a different interpretation of these words; they say that the Gentiles are made subject to vanity, i. e. to idolatry, or a vain, superstitious worship, (idols are called vainities, Acts xiv. 15,) or to a miserable, wretched estate; that (as Hesychius notes) is the import of the word vanity. And this not so much of their own accord, or by their own free choice, but by the power and malice of Satan, to whom they are justly given up of God; he rules in their hearts, carries them captive at his will, subjects them to all villany and misery. And it is reasonable to suppose of these poor heathens, that they are willing to be rescued (at least some, and a considerable number of them) from under this vanity and slavery, as it is said, ver. 22. Quest. But if he that thus subjects them be the devil, how is he said to do this in hope? Ans. These words, in hope, belong to the end of the former verse; all the rest of this verse being read or included in a parenthesis: q. d. The creature attends the manifestations of the sons of God in hope: meanwhile it is subject to vanity, &c.

21 Because the creature itself also shall be delivered from the bondage of corruption into the glorious liberty of the children of God.

If this verse be understood of the heavens and the earth, and the things therein, the meaning is, that the creatures, in their kind, and according to their capacity, shall be partakers of that liberty and freedom, which in the children of God is accompanied with unspeakable glory; they shall not partake with the saints in glory, but of that liberty, which in the saints hath great glory attending it, and superadded to it. The creature, at the day of judgment, shall be restored (as before) to that condition of liberty which it had in its first creation; as, when it was made at first, it was free from all vanity, bondage, and corruption, so it shall be again at the time of the general resurrection: see Acts iii. 19, 21; 2 Pet. iii. 13. Those that by the creature would understand the Gentile world, give the sense of this verse. That the very heathens also shall, by the gospel and grace of Christ, be rescued from those courses of sin and corruption, to which they have been long enslaved, into that glorious condition not only of free-men, redeemed by Christ out of their bondage to sin and Satan, but even of the sons of God, to have right to his favour, and that never-fading inheritance.

22 For we know that the whole creation groaneth and travaileth in pain together until now.

Or, every creature, Mark iv. 15. Col. 1. 24. 1 Jer. 12. 11.

If here again the heavens and the earth, with what is therein, be understood, then the apostle further enlargeth upon their present state and condition; before they waited and expected deliverance, now they groan and travail in pain. They also are metaphorical expressions; one is taken for a man who hath upon him a heavy burden, another from a woman that is near her delivery. And this they do until now; i. e. from the fall of Adam to this present day. They that understand the words of the Gentile world, thus interpret them: We, the apostles and ministers of Jesus Christ, do find by experience, that the Gentiles are very forward to receive the gospel when they hear it, whilst the Jews generally reject it. The Gentile world is, as it were, in pangs of travail ever since Christ's time till now, ready to bring forth sons and daughters to God.

The apostle had asserted and concluded, ver. 18, that there is a future glory to be revealed hereafter in the saints, such as infinitely transcendeth their sufferings now; and this he had confirmed from the earnest expectation of the creature, (the pronoun they is not in the original,) and now he further confirms it from the expectation which is in believers themselves. The first-fruits of the Spirit; hereby he means that righteousness, joy, and peace, which believers have in this life; these are the fruits of the Spirit, and called first-fruits in regard of their order; and in regard of their quantity, they are but a handful in comparison of the whole, little in regard of the fulness which they shall have in heaven; and in regard also of their signification, the grace and comforts of the Spirit of God in this life are pledges to us of that abundance and fulness of joy, which we shall partake of in the life to come, as the first-fruits of the Jews were an evidence to them of the ensuing crop. Groan within ourselves; among ourselves, say some, but it is better read in our translation, within ourselves. It expresseth the manner of the saints groaning under sin and affliction; it is inward, and from the heart. Waiting for the adoption: now we are the sons of God; why then should we wait for what we have already? Answe. We have the right, but not the full possession, of our inheritance: the apostle himself explains his meaning in the next words. The redemption of our body; i. e. our perfect deliverance from sin and misery; this phrase is used in other places; see Luke xxi. 28; Eph. iv. 30. But why of our body, and not of our souls? Because their souls would be in actual possession of the inheritance before that day, or because the miseries and troubles of this life are conveyed to the whole man by the body, so that the redemption of the body is in effect the redemption of the whole man.

24 For we are saved by hope: but <sup>a</sup>hope that is seen is not hope: for what <sup>b</sup>a man seeth, why doth he yet hope for?

Though we certainly believe there is such a redemption or salvation belonging to us, according to the promise of God, yet for the present we have no possession of it; all the salvation we have at present is in hope, which, according to the nature of it, is of things not yet enjoyed, for vision or possession puts an end to hope; no man hopeth for what he seeth and enjoyeth.

25 But if we hope for that we see not, then do we with patience wait for it.

q. d. If we indeed hope for redemption and salvation, which is out of sight, then it is meet that we do with patience digest and bear all our present evils and sufferings; true hope is accompanied always with a patient waiting for the things hoped for; therefore you read of the patience of hope, 1 Thess. i. 3: see Heb. vi. 12; x. 36.

26 Likewise the Spirit also helpeth our infirmities: for <sup>p</sup>we know not what <sup>q</sup>we should pray for as we ought: but <sup>r</sup>the Spirit itself maketh intercession for us with groanings which cannot be uttered.

Likewise: this referreth us, either to the work of the Spirit, before notcd, ver. 11; he quickeneth, and he likewise helpeth: or rather, to hope, in the foregoing verse; hope helpeth to patience, so also the Spirit. Helpeth our infirmities; the word imports such help, as when another of greater strength steps in, and sustains the burden that lies too heavy upon our shoulders; or it is borrowed from nurses, that help their little children that are unable to go, upholding them by their hands or sleeves. For we know not what we should pray for as we ought: one way whereby the Spirit helps us, is by teaching us to pray. Prayer doth greatly relieve us under the cross, and is a great refuge in trouble: but we knowing not how to pray as we ought, either in regard of matter or manner, herein therefore the Spirit aids or helps us, as it followeth. But how is it said we know not what to pray for, when we have the Lord's prayer, which contains a perfect rule and summary of all things meet to be prayed for? Though the Lord's prayer be a rule in general, yet we may be to seek in particulars: God's own children many times ask they know not what; see Job vi. 8; Jonah iv. 3; Mark x. 38; 2 Cor. xii. 8. But the Spirit itself maketh intercession for us: there is a twofold intercession, one of Christ, of which we read, ver. 34; the other of the Spirit, of which this place speaks. How doth the Spirit make intercession for us? Answe. By making intercession in us, or by helping us to pray. The Spirit is called, Zech. xii. 10, the Spirit of supplications. It is by him, ver. 15, that we cry. Abba, Father: he cries so in our hearts; Gal. iv. 6, God hath sent forth the Spirit of his Son into your hearts, crying, Abba, Father. The Spirit of our Father speaketh in us, Matt. x. 20: he suggesteth to us what we should pray for; he helpeth us to suitable dispositions, and many times to suitable expressions in prayer: see Eph. vi. 18; Jude 20. With groanings which cannot be uttered; with inward sighs and groans, which cannot be expressed by words. There may be prayer, where there is no speech or vocal expression. A man may cry, and that mightily to God, when he uttereth never a word: see Exod. xiv. 15; 1 Sam. i. 13.

27 And <sup>r</sup>he that searcheth the hearts knoweth what <sup>s</sup>is the mind of the Spirit, <sup>t</sup>because he maketh intercession for the saints <sup>u</sup>according to the will of God.

He that searcheth the hearts; this phrase is a periphrasis of God, and is spoken of him after the manner of men. God doth not properly search or inquire into any thing; but because amongst men knowledge comes by searching, therefore, by way of resemblance, this is attributed to God, though that which is intended by it is only this, that God knoweth the heart, Jer. xvii. 10; Acts i. 24. Knoweth what is the mind of the Spirit, both with the knowledge of apprehension and approbation. Maketh intercession for the saints according to the will of God: our prayers shall be sure to speed, if they are of this sort, 1 John v. 14, 15. Praying according to the will of God, respects, 1. The matter of our prayers. 2. The manner of our praying. 3. The end thereof, James iv. 3.

28 And we know that all things work together for good to them that love God, to them <sup>v</sup>who are the called according to <sup>w</sup>his purpose.

Another argument to comfort us under the cross, from the benefits of it; We know that all things, &c. It is not matter of guess only and conjecture, but of certainty and assurance. How is this known? 1. By the testimony of God; the Scripture tells us as much, Psal. cxxviii. 1, 2; Isa. iii. 10. 2. By our own experience; we are assured of it by the event and effects of all things, both upon ourselves and others. All things, even sin itself; because from their falls, God's children arise more humble and careful. Afflictions are chiefly intended; the worst and crossdest providences, those things that are evil in themselves, they work for good to the children of God. Work together; here is their operation, and their co-operation: First, they work together with God. What the apostle says of himself and others in the ministry, 2 Cor. vi. 1, that may be said of other things, especially of afflictions; they are workers together with God. Some read the words thus, God co-operates all to good. Again, they work together with us; we ourselves must concur, and be active herein; we must labour and endeavour to get good out of every providence. Once more, they work together amongst themselves, or one with another. Take this or that providence singly, or by itself, and you shall not see the good it doth; but take it in its conjunction and connexion with others, and then you may perceive it. One exemplifies it thus, As in matter of physic, if you take such and such simples alone, they may poison rather than cure; but then take them in their composition, as they are made up by the direction of a skillful physician, and so they prove an excellent medicine. For good; sometimes for temporal good, Gen. i. 20; always for spiritual and eternal good, which is best of all. All occurrences of providence shall serve to bring them nearer to God here, and to heaven hereafter. According to his purpose: these words are added to show the ground and reason of God's calling us; which is nothing else but his own purpose and good pleasure; it is not according to our worthiness, but his purpose: see 2 Tim. i. 9.

29 For whom <sup>u</sup> he did foreknow, <sup>v</sup> he also did predestinate <sup>w</sup> to be conformed to the image of his Son, <sup>x</sup> that he might be the firstborn among many brethren.

Having let fall a word in the former verse concerning the purpose of God, he thinks good, in what follows, to pursue that subject, and a little to enlarge upon it. Whom he did foreknow; i. e. with a knowledge of approbation; for otherwise, he foreknew all persons and things: or, whom he did foreknow for his own, John x. 14, 27; chap. xi. 2; 2 Tim. ii. 19. This foreknowledge of God is the ground of our election: see 1 Pet. i. 2. He also did predestinate to be conformed to the image of his Son; whom he was pleased to approve of, and to pitch his free love and favour upon, he severed from the common lump and mass of mankind, and did appoint them to be conformed to the image of his Son; i. e. to be conformed to him in holiness and sufferings here, and in glory hereafter: see 1 Cor. xv. 49; 2 Cor. iii. 18; Eph. i. 4—6; Phil. iii. 20, 21; 1 John iii. 2. That he might be the first-born among many brethren; this is the limitation of the forementioned conformity; though there be a likeness in us unto Christ, yet there is not an equality; he still retaineth the dignity of the first-born, and hath a double, yea, a far greater portion; he is Head and Ruler of all the family in heaven and in earth, Psal. xlv. 7, 8.

30 Moreover whom he did predestinate, them he also <sup>a</sup> called: and whom he called, them he also <sup>b</sup> justified: and whom he justified, them he also <sup>c</sup> glorified.

He hath already given them the beginning and pledge thereof in grace; and will in due time bring them to the possession of eternal life and glory. Some, under this term of glorification would have sanctification included; because, otherwise, they think there is a great defect in this chain of salvation, here set down by the apostle, of which sanctification is one special link; but this is rather to be couched and included in effectual calling, which is the third link, and already spoken of.

31 What shall we then say to these things? <sup>d</sup> If God be for us, who can be against us?

What shall we then say to these things? some refer this question to what is said in the verses immediately preceding: others, to what he had said, ver. 28; and others go higher, and refer it to all that he said before. Some by these things understand afflictions and sufferings more especially; What shall we say to these, or what need we be disheartened by these? For if God, &c. If God be for us; i. e. seeing God is for us; it is a note of certainty, not of ambiguity; see ver. 9. He takes it for granted, as that which cannot be denied; see Psal. xlvii. 7, 11; cxviii. 6, 7. Who can be against us? i. e. none can; none can be against us successfully, none can be against us safely; such will harm themselves more than us: see Psal. lvi. 4. Maximilian, the emperor, so admired this sentence, that he caused it to be written over the table where he used to dine and sup; that having it often in his eye, he might have it also in his mind.

32 <sup>e</sup> He that spared not his own Son, <sup>f</sup> he delivered him up for us all, how shall he not with him also freely give us all things?

He that spared not his own Son: this phrase either shows the bounty of God, that he did not withhold Christ; or the severity of God, that he did not favour, but afflict and punish him, Isa. liii. 4, 5, 11. But delivered him up: see Acts ii. 23. This doth not excuse Judas, no, nor Pilate and the Jews; though they executed God's purpose, yet they acted their own malice and wickedness. For us all; this plainly refers to such persons as he had before mentioned, such as God foreknew, predestinated, called, &c., which is not all men in general, but a set number of persons in particular: it is an expression both of latitude and restriction; of latitude, in the word all; of restriction, in the word us. How shall he not with him also freely give us all things? q. d. Without question he will; it may be confidently inferred and concluded, He that hath given the greater, will not stick to give the less. Christ is more than all the world, or than all other gifts and blessings whatsoever.

33 Who shall lay any thing to the charge of God's elect? <sup>g</sup> It is God that justifieth.

Who shall lay any thing to the charge of God's elect? who can implead such, or put in any accusation against them? There is nothing to accuse them of, they are justified; and there is none to accuse them, It is God that justifieth; the Supreme Judge hath absolved them. This seems to be taken out of Isa. i. 8, 9. They were Christ's words there, and spoken of God's justifying him; they are every believer's words here, and intended of God's justifying them. Here seems to be two reasons of their indemnity; one is implied, i. e. God's electing them: the other expressed, i. e. God's justifying and acquitting of them.

34 <sup>h</sup> Who is he that condemneth? <sup>i</sup> It is Christ that died, yea rather, that is risen again, <sup>j</sup> who is even at the right hand of God, <sup>k</sup> who also maketh intercession for us.

Who is he that condemneth? as none can accuse the elect of God, so much less can any condemn them, see ver. 1. It is Christ that died; and it is he that is the Judge, and must condemn them, if they be condemned. His death frees them from condemnation; thereby he hath made a sufficient atonement and satisfaction for all their sins; and that which hath long ago satisfied in heaven for the sins of all the elect, may very well serve to satisfy the heart and conscience of a believing sinner here on earth. Such a one may thrown down the gauntlet, as the apostle doth, and challenge all the world. Let conscience, carnal reason, law, sin, hell, and devils, bring forth all they can, it will not be sufficient to condemnation; and that because of Christ's death and satisfaction. Yea rather, that is risen again: the resurrection of Christ hath a special influence upon our justification; and therefore the apostle puts a rather upon it, and that comparatively to the death of Christ: see chap. iv. 25, and the notes there. Who is even at the right hand of God, who also maketh intercession for us: faith finds matter of triumph, not only from Christ's death and resurrection, but from his session at the right hand of God, and intercession for us.

35 Who shall separate us from the love of Christ? shall tribulation, or distress, or persecution, or famine, or nakedness, or peril, or sword?

Who shall separate us? he continues his triumph; he doth not say what, but who; though he instanceth in things, and not in persons, yet it is expressed personally, because that these things do commonly do us hurt in the improvement of persons, whether of Satan or wicked men, who are instrumental thereunto. From the love of Christ; understand it either actively, from our love of him; or passively, from his love of us: the latter seems to be chiefly intended; Who shall separate us from the love of Christ, or from the sense and manifestation thereof? Shall tribulation, &c. he makes an enumeration of particular evils, of seven in number; and he begins with the lesser, and riseth to the greater; placing them in order, not casually, but by choice. The word tribulation signifies any thing that presseth or pincheth us. Or distress? the word properly signifies straitness of place, and is transferred from the body to the mind, to point out the anguish or perplexity thereof. Or persecution; the word properly signifies a driving from place to place; banishment is implied therein, if not chiefly intended: see Matt. x. 23. Or peril; any danger or hazard of life, in any kind whatsoever: see 2 Cor. xi. 26. Or sword; this is put figuratively for death itself, especially violent death.

1 Pa. 44. 22. 36 As it is written, 'For thy sake we are killed all the day long; we are accounted as sheep for the slaughter.

He cites this testimony to prove that none of the fore-mentioned evils, no, not death itself, can separate believers from the love of Christ: it is taken out of Psal. xlv. 22. The argument seems to be this: The saints of old have endured all manner of sufferings, and yet were not separated from the love of God; therefore such sufferings cannot separate them now. For thy sake; not for our sins' sake, but for Christ's, or for righteousness' sake, Matt. v. 10; x. 18, 39; 1 Pet. iii. 14. We are killed: how could they say this? Killing takes away all complaining, and makes the parties so dealt with incapable of saying how it is with them. This expression notes the danger and desperateness of their condition. It is usual in Scripture to set forth an eminent danger under the notion of death: see 1 Cor. xv. 31; 2 Cor. i. 10; iv. 11. All the day long; i. e. continually, without ceasing: see Psal. xxxviii. 6, 12; lxxi. 24; lxxiii. 14; Prov. xxiii. 17; chap. x. 21. We are accounted as sheep for the slaughter; i. e. we are designed for destruction. Our enemies make account they can destroy us, as men do sheep, that they have by them in the slaughter-house. They reckon they have us at command, and can cut us off when they list. Or rather thus, they make no reckoning of our destruction; they make no more of killing us, than butchers do of killing sheep: our death is very cheap in their account, Psal. xlv. 11, 12. Here let me insert a tragical story of the Christians of Calabria, that suffered persecution, A. D. 1560. They were all shut up in one house together, as in a sheepfold: an executioner comes in, and among them takes one, and blindfolds him with a muffer about his eyes, and so leadeth him forth to a larger place, where he commandeth him to kneel down; which being done, he cutteth his throat, and so leaveth him half dead; and taking his butcher's knife and muffer, all of gore blood, he cometh again to the rest, and so leading them one after another, he despatcheth them, to the number of eighty-eight, no otherwise than a butcher doth his sheep. Fox's Acts and Monuments.

1 Cor. 15. 57. 37th Nay, in all these things we are more than conquerors through him that loved us.

Nay, in all these things; i. e. in tribulation, distress, &c. as before, ver. 35. We are more than conquerors; or, we overcome. We conquer when we ourselves are conquered; we conquer by those which are wont to conquer others; we beat our enemies with their own weapons. The meaning seems to be this: The devil aims, in all the sufferings of God's children, to draw them off from Christ, to make them murmur, despair, &c.; but in this he is defeated and disappointed, for God inspires his children with such a generous and noble spirit, that sufferings abate not their zeal and patience, but rather increase them. "We Christians laugh at your cruelty, and grow the more resolute," said one of Julian's nobles to him. Through him that loved us: a short description of Christ, together with a reason of a Christian's success. The conquest he hath over sin, and over sufferings also, is not from himself, or his own strength, but from Christ, &c.: see chap. vii. 24, 25; 1 Cor. xv. 57; 2 Cor. ii. 14; 2 Tim. iv. 17.

38 For I am persuaded, that neither death, nor life, nor angels, nor principalities, nor powers, nor things present, nor things to come,

For I am persuaded; or, I am fully assured, not by any special revelation, but by the same spirit of faith, which is common to all believers, 2 Cor. iv. 13. Neither death, nor life; i. e. neither fear of death, nor hope of life. Nor angels. 1. The evil angels; for the good angels would not attempt the separating us from the love of Christ. 2. There are some, that think the good angels to be also here intended; and they understand it by way of supposition: q. d. If they should endeavour such a thing, they would never effect it: and thus they make the apostle here to argue, as he doth in another place, Gal. i. 8. Nor principalities, nor powers; some would have the evil angels to be here intended, and the good angels in what went before; in Col. ii. 15, they are thus termed: but others, by principalities and powers, do rather understand persecuting princes and potentates. Nor things present, nor things to come; i. e. the evils and pressures that are upon us now, or that shall be upon us hereafter. He makes no mention of the things past, for they are overcome already.

39 Nor height, nor depth, nor any other creature, shall be able to separate us from the love of God, which is in Christ Jesus our Lord.

Nor height, nor depth; i. e. neither the height of honour and worldly advancement, nor the depth of disgrace and worldly abasement. Some take height and depth for a comprehensive expression, which the Scripture useth, when he takes in all, and leaves nothing out. Nor any other creature; this is added to the rest, as an &c. at the end of a sentence; and to supply whatever our fancies might, in this case, frame to themselves. Or the apostle here makes an end of his induction; and because it had been endless to reckon up all the creatures, he closeth in this manner, If there be any other creature. Shall be able to separate us from the love of God, which is in Christ Jesus our Lord; which he bears to us, as members of Christ, and by faith united to him: see ver. 35, and the notes there.

CHAP. IX

Paul professeth an unfeigned sorrow for the Jewish nation, 1—5; but proveth by instances from Scripture that the promise to Abraham did not necessarily include all his descendants, 6—13; asserting that there is no unrighteousness in God's bestowing his unmerited bounty on whom he pleaseth, 14—18; and that he was unquestionably free to suspend his judgments, where deserved, either for the more signal display of his power in taking vengeance on some, or of his mercy in calling others to glory, 19—24. The calling of the Gentiles, and rejection of the Jews, foretold, 26—29. Accordingly, the Gentiles have attained the righteousness of faith, which the Jews refused, 30, 31. The cause of such refusal, 32, 33.

I SAY the truth in Christ, I lie not, my conscience also bearing me witness in the Holy Ghost,

The apostle being about to treat of the rejection of the Jews and the calling of the Gentiles, before he enters upon it, he premiseth a preface, to prepare the minds of the Jews to a patient reading or hearing the same; and in this preface, he solemnly protesteth his love to his nation, and his hearty grief for their rejection, that so it might the better appear, that these things were not written out of any spleen or malice, but out of conscience towards God and the truth.

I say the truth in Christ; or, by Christ: so the word is taken, Matt. v. 34—36. This is the form of an oath, which the Scripture elsewhere useth in matters of importance: see Gen. xxii. 16; Dan. xii. 7; Eph. iv. 17. I lie not; this is added for confirmation, or to gain the greater credit to what he said or swore. It was the manner of the Hebrews, to an affirmative to add a negative: see 1 Sam. iii. 18; John i. 20. My conscience also bearing me witness; as being for this purpose placed in man by God, and is instead of a thousand witnesses. In the Holy Ghost; i. e. in the presence of the Holy Ghost, who is privy to what I say, and who is a witness also to the truth thereof; or, as some, by the guidance of the Holy Ghost, who cannot lie.

His grief for his nation and people he expresseth, 1. By the greatness of it; it was such as a woman hath in travail; so the word imports. 2. By the continuance of it; it was continual, or without intermission. 3. By the seat of it; it was in his heart, and not outward in his face. The cause he doth not here set down, but it is easily gathered from what follows, viz. the obstinacy and infidelity, together with the rejection, of the Jews.

c Ex. 22. 22. 3 For <sup>c</sup>I could wish that myself were accursed from Christ for my brethren, my kinsmen according to the flesh :

I could wish that myself were accursed from Christ; or, separated from Christ. This verse hath greatly vexed interpreters. Some read it, I did wish myself accursed from Christ: q. d. Before my conversion, I was willing to be accursed from Christ, to be a violent persecutor of the Christians, and so to be held of them as accursed for my brethren's sake. The vulgar Latin, and many Romanists, thus render the word ἠχθόμενος in the text; but the generality of interpreters read it as we do, not indicatively, but potentially; and they make an ellipsis in the words, ἠχθόμενος pro ἠχθούμενος ἄν; the like is frequent; see Acts xxv. 22; 1 Cor. ii. 8; 2 Cor. xi. 1. But then still the difficulty is, how, and in what sense, the apostle wished himself accursed, or separated from Christ. The received opinion is, that out of zeal to the glory of God, and love to his brethren, he was willing to be damned, that they all might be saved. Many of the ancients did thus expound this place: "Christ became a curse for us; and what marvel is it" (says one) "if the Lord would be made a curse for the servants, that a servant should be willing to become an anathema for the brethren." "He doth not wish" (says another) "for his brethren's sake to be separated from the love and grace of Christ, but from the comforts of Christ, and the future happiness that we have by him: he is content to lose his part in the heavenly glory, if that might promote the glory of Christ, which would be more illustrated by the saving a whole nation, than a particular person: q. d. If this might be the fruit of it, if it would gain this end, I could, methinks, be content to part with all my hopes in Christ, even my eternal happiness, upon condition my brethren might be partakers thereof; so passionate and abundant love have I to and for them." This exposition is not satisfactory; therefore some think the apostle here speaks of being accursed only for a season, or of being an anathema in this world. An anathema sometimes signifieth corporal death and destruction: of old, in times of common calamity, they were wont to sacrifice men to their idols and infernal gods, for the pacifying of their anger; such a sacrifice they called anathema, which is the word here used; q. d. For my brethren's sake, that so they might be saved, I could be content to be cut off, to be made a sacrifice, to die the worst of deaths. But if this be admitted, how then is that clause to be understood, from Christ? it is not, I could wish myself an anathema, but an anathema from Christ. To this they answer that favour this interpretation; That instead of from Christ, you may read, by Christ: q. d. I could be content to be cut off or destroyed by Christ, that my brethren might be saved. This sense of the words suits well with the zeal and kindness of Moses to his brethren, Exod. xxxii. 32; rather than they should not be pardoned and spared, he prays, that God would blot him out of the book that he had written: see annotations there. There is yet another, and a more probable, interpretation of this wish of the apostle. It is as if he had said, I could be willing to be separated or excommunicated from the church of Christ, for the sake and salvation of my country and nation. Anathema (says Hesychius) signifies ἀκούμενος, excommunicate; 1 Cor. xvi. 22, If any man love not the Lord Jesus Christ, let him be anathema; let him be removed from the Christian assemblies, deprived of those Christian privileges that are afforded there. Gal. i. 8, 9, Let him be an anathema that teacheth another gospel; i. e. turned out of the church of Christ, and avoided by all true Christians. If this sense be admitted, then from Christ must signify, from the body of Christ; and so the word Christ is used, 1 Cor. xii. 12; Gal. iii. 27. Christ being the Head of the body, he that is cut off from the body may be truly enough said to be cut off from Christ. Thus the apostle Paul, who was accused and persecuted by the Jews, for having made a defection from the law of Moses, and setting up Christian assemblies in opposition to their Judaical service, doth fitly express his kindness and love to them, in wishing himself deprived of those most valuable privileges, on condition they might be partakers thereof. To this it may be added, that in the primitive times, this anathematizing, or excommunicating, was attended with delivering up to Satan, and that with destruction of the flesh, with very sharp and severe punishments upon the bodies of men. And so anathema, in this notion, may be taken with this improvement, and may contain all those temporal calamities that he was willing to endure and undergo for their good: see D. H. in loc. My kinsmen according to the flesh; so the Jews were by natural descent: see Gen. xxix. 14.

4 <sup>d</sup>Who are Israelites; <sup>e</sup>to whom per-taineth the adoption, and <sup>f</sup>the glory, and <sup>g</sup>the covenants, and <sup>h</sup>the giving of the law, and <sup>i</sup>the service of God, and <sup>k</sup>the promises;

In this and the following verse, he rehearseth the privileges and advantages the Jews had from God, above all other nations of the earth; and this he doth to show, that he had good reason to make such a wish, as in the foregoing verse; as also, that what he should declare concerning the Jews, and their ejection, did not proceed from any disrespect or disesteem of them.

Israelites; i. e. the offspring of that holy patriarch Israel: this was the Jews' first title of honour, that they descended from him, who by God himself was surnamed Israel, or a prince that had power with God, and prevailed, Gen. xxxii. 28. The adoption; adoption is not here to be understood as before, in chap. viii. 15, or as in Eph. i. 5, and elsewhere. But thereby we must understand the peculiar privilege of the seed of Jacob; that they, of all the nations of the earth, were pitched upon to be nearly related to God, to be his children (as they are called) and his first-born: see Exod. iv. 22; Deut. xiv. 1; Jer. xxxi. 9, 20; Matt. xv. 26. The glory; the ark and the temple; so called, because in them God did manifest his glorious presence, 1 Sam. iv. 21, 22; Psal. xxvi. 8; lxxviii. 61. The covenants; some understand by covenants, the tables of the law: see Heb. ix. 4. Others rather understand the covenant made with Abraham, Gen. xv. 8; xvii. 2, 7; and with the Jewish nation, Exod. xxiv. 7, 8; xxxiv. 27, &c. Circumcision also may be intended, for that is called God's covenant, Gen. xvii. 10. The giving of the law; the judicial, ceremonial, but especially the moral law. This is spoken of as a great privilege, Deut. iv. 8, 32. It may refer both to the law itself, and to the circumstances, also, with which the law was given. The service of God; the true manner of worshipping God, which was a great privilege. Other nations knew there was a God, and that he must be worshipped, but they knew not how; and so they ran into superstition and idolatry. The promises; of this life, and that to come; particularly of the Messiah, and of the benefits and blessings by him. These are found in Moses and the prophets, and were entailed upon the Jews and their children, Acts ii. 39; Eph. ii. 12, till God at last cut off the entail.

5 <sup>l</sup>Whose are the fathers, and <sup>m</sup>of whom as concerning the flesh Christ <sup>n</sup>came, <sup>o</sup>who is over all, God blessed for ever. Amen.

Whose are the fathers; who are lineally descended of the holy patriarchs, Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob, with other holy fathers and prophets, and of the same blood. This was also a great privilege, of which the Jews boasted. Of whom as concerning the flesh Christ came; or out of whom; understanding the people of the Jews, not the fathers. The meaning is, Christ took his human nature of their stock. It is the great honour of mankind, that Christ took not the nature of angels, but of man; and it is a great honour to the nation of the Jews, that he took the seed of Abraham their

6 <sup>o</sup> Not as though the word of God hath taken none effect. For <sup>o</sup> they are not all Israel, which are of Israel:

An objection is here obviated: the Jews might object and say, If they were cast off and rejected, then God is unfaithful, and all his promises made to Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob, and their seed, are ineffectual. To this he answers by a distinction of Israelites. Some are Israelites only in respect of their carnal generation; and others, again, are true Israelites, children of the promise, and of the faith of Abraham: see chap. ii. 28, 29. Now the promises of God were made to the true Israelites, and in all such it is effectual: and under the name of Israel, or true Israelites, all those are comprehended, who imitate the faith of Abraham, and walk in his steps, whether they descended from him by fleshly generation or not. This he further asserts in the following verse.

7 <sup>q</sup> Neither, because they are the seed of Abraham, are they all children: but, In <sup>o</sup> Isaac shall thy seed be called.

He had before made a difference of Israelites, and now he makes a difference of the seed of Abraham. This was ever and anon in the mouths of the Jews. We are Abraham's seed, John viii. 33. But here he tells them, that all Abraham's seed were not the children of the promise; for it was said to Sarah, Gen. xxi. 12, that the promised seed should be confined to Isaac's line, of his issue should the Messiah come, and all the true seed of Abraham, who are born after the manner of Isaac, by the word and promise of God. And as Ishmael, though Abraham's natural seed, was cast out, and therein was a type of those who are born only according to the flesh; so Isaac is a type of Abraham's spiritual seed, who are born not of the power of nature, but by virtue of the promise of God.

8 That is, They which are the children of the flesh, these are not the children of God: but <sup>o</sup> the children of the promise are counted for the seed.

<sup>q</sup> d. That I may speak more plainly, all those that are the children of Abraham according to the flesh, are not therefore the adopted children of God; it is not their blood, but their faith, must make them such. There are some of Abraham's seed, that are selected from the rest, to whom the promise was made, who are therefore called children of the promise; and of this sort are all they who are born after the Spirit, (as Isaac is said to be, Gal. iv. 29.) whether Jews or Gentiles. The sense of this verse is fully expressed, Gal. iii. 8, 14, 29: see Gal. iv. 28.

9 For this is the word of promise, <sup>t</sup> At this time will I come, and Sarah shall have a son.

The birth of Isaac was a thing extraordinary; for which, neither Abraham nor Sarah had any ground to hope, but only that promise made, Gen. xviii. 10, in these words, At this time, or according to this time, i. e. the time of bearing children after conception, will I come, and Sarah shall have a son; i. e. I will manifest my power in fulfilling my promise of giving thee a son. By which it is clear, that the birth of Isaac was an effect of God's promise, and nothing else. So that they to whom the promise belong, (whosoever they be,) they are the seed of Abraham, and, upon the obedience of faith, shall be accepted for the children of God. The apostle Peter tells women, (whether Jews or Gentiles, it matters not,) that by well-doing they become the daughters of Sarah.

10 And not only this; but when <sup>u</sup> Rebecca also had conceived by one, even by our father Isaac;

And not only this; some read it, And not only she; the particle this is not in the Greek. When Rebecca also had conceived by one, even by our father Isaac: this instance is added, because there might be some objection against the former; as if there were some reason why God chose Isaac, and refused Ishmael. Isaac was born of a free-woman, and when Abraham was uncircumcised: besides, Ishmael no sooner came to years, but he showed some tokens of perverseness, and of a wicked spirit. Therefore, in this and the three following verses, he gives another, which was beyond all exception; and that is in Esau and Jacob, betwixt whom there was no disparity, either in birth or in works: they had both one and the same mother; Rebecca conceived with them at one and the same time, and that by no other person than our father Isaac; and yet the one of these is chosen, and the other refused. This now was an undeniable proof, that the promise belongs not to all the children of Abraham, or of Isaac, according to the flesh; all the seed of neither are the children of the promise.

11 (For the children being not yet born, neither having done any good or evil, that the purpose of God according to election might stand, not of works, but of <sup>o</sup> him that calleth;)

For the children being not yet born: q. d. As there was nothing in the birth of those twins, so neither in their works, that occasioned the difference that God made betwixt them; for when God spake of what should happen to them, they were unborn, and had done neither good nor evil. Neither having done any good or evil; he means, actual good or evil, such as might difference them one from another. As for original sin, they were both alike tainted therewith. That the purpose of God; this purpose of God is to be understood about reprobation, or (if you will) rejection, or preterition, as well as about election. Might stand; be firm or stable. Not of works, either done or foreseen. But of him that calleth; i. e. of the good pleasure and undeserved favour of God, who also effectually calleth those that he hath elected, as chap. viii. 30. See a parallel place, 2 Tim. i. 9.

12 It was said unto her, <sup>v</sup> The  $\parallel$  elder shall serve the  $\parallel$  younger.

This verse is to be read with the 10th, the whole 11th verse being a parenthesis. Then when she resorted to the Lord for counsel, about the struggling of the children in her womb, it was told her, or revealed to her of God, that the elder should serve the younger: of the sense of which words, see annotations on Gen. xxv. 23, where they are recorded.

13 As it is written, <sup>z</sup> Jacob have I loved, but Esau have I hated.

The foregoing oracle is expounded by another, taken out of Mal. i. 2, 3; see the annotations there. Because the foregoing passage of Esau's serving Jacob doth not seem so full and clear, to betoken the election of Jacob, and the rejection of Esau, in the purpose of God, therefore the apostle brings this place to explain the former; and proves that the service or subjection of Esau to Jacob, was accompanied with God's eternal and undeserved love of the one, and his just and righteous hatred of the other. There are some, that by Esau and Jacob do understand their posterity, and not their persons; that say, the love and hatred of God, in the forecited text, doth only or chiefly respect temporal things; God loved Jacob, i. e. he gave him the Land of Promise; but hated Esau, i. e. he gave him a dry and barren country, and made his mountain waste: that by God's hating Esau, is only meant he loved him less than Jacob, &c. Such should consider, that the scope of the apostle is to show, that some are the children of God, and of the promise, and not others; and they must not make him cite testimonies out of the Old Testament impertinently. Much is written pro and con upon this argument. But I remember, he that writes a commentary must not too far involve himself in controversy.

14 What shall we say then? <sup>a</sup> Is there unrighteousness with God? God forbid.

Another anticipation of an objection. Some might object and say, If God elect some, and reject others, their case being the same, or their persons being in themselves equal and alike, then he is unjust and partial. To this he answers, 1. More generally, with his repeated note of detestation, God forbid; the Syriac translator reads it, God forgive; noting thereby the heinousness of such a thought: and then he answers this cavil more particularly; showing, 1. That God is not unjust in electing some, ver. 15, 16. And, 2. That he is not unjust in rejecting others, ver. 17.

15 For he saith to Moses, <sup>b</sup> I will have mercy on whom I will have mercy, and I will have compassion on whom I will have compassion.

q. d. God is not chargeable with any injustice in electing some, and not others; for this is an act of mere mercy and compassion, and that can be no violation of justice. To prove this, he cites a testimony out of Exod. xxxiii. 19, which see. There he tells Moses, that the good pleasure of his will was the only rule of all his favourable and merciful dealings with the children of men. The same thing is intended and expressed in two several phrases: and the im- gemination imports the freeness of God's mercy; nothing moves him thereunto, but his own gracious inclination; and also the arbitrariness thereof: it depends only upon his good will and pleasure. The sum is, if God show mercy to some, and not to others, he cannot be accused of injustice, because he injures none; nor is he obliged or indebted to any.

16 So then it is not of him that willeth, nor of him that runneth, but of God that sheweth mercy.

q. d. God's election is not of Jacob's, or of any other man's, willing or running; i. e. it is not from his good desires or deeds, his good inclinations or actions, or from the foresight thereof; but it is of God's mere mercy and good pleasure. This text wounds Pelagianism under the fifth rib. Nec volenti, nec volanti, was the motto of a noble personage.

17 For the Scripture saith unto Pharaoh, <sup>a</sup> Even for this same purpose have I raised thee up, that I might shew my power in thee, and that my name might be declared throughout all the earth.

This verse shows, that God is not unjust in rejecting others of equal condition with the elect; for the proof of which, he cites a testimony out of Exod. ix. 16. This verse must be joined with the 14th. God forbid; for the Scripture saith, i. e. God saith in the Scripture, Even for this same purpose have I raised thee up; i. e. I have created or promoted thee to be king in Egypt. Or, (as some,) I have raised or stirred thee up to oppress my people. Or, I have hardened thee, as it follows in the next verse, and given thee up to thy own rebellious and obstinate mind. That I might show my power in thee, &c.: I have done what I have done for this very end, that the whole world may ring of my power and glory. And this shows, that it is not unjust in God to reject sinners of the children of men, because thereby he furthers his own glory. For this end all things are made, and all things are accordingly ordered and disposed, Prov. xvi. 4.

18 Therefore hath he mercy on whom he will have mercy, and whom he will he hardeneth.

This verse is a short repetition of the foregoing argument. Therefore hath he mercy on whom he will have mercy: see ver. 15, and the notes there. And whom he will he hardeneth; i. e. in a judicial way. Besides natural hardness, which is in all men, and is hereditary to them; and habitual hardness, which is contracted by a custom in sin, as a path is hardened by the continual trampling of passengers; there is judicial or judiciary hardness, which is inflicted by God as a punishment. Men harden their own hearts sinfully, (so it is thrice said of Pharaoh in Exodus, that he hardened his own heart, Exod. iii. 15, 32; ix. 34,) and then God hardens their hearts judicially: so it is often said of God in Exodus, that he hardened Pharaoh's heart, Exod. vii. 13; ix. 12; x. 1, 20, 27; xiv. 8. God is not said properly to harden the hearts of men; i. e. he doth not make their soft hearts hard, nor doth he put hardness into the hearts of men, (as our adversaries slanderously report us to affirm,) nor doth he barely permit or suffer them to be hardened (which is the opinion of the papists about this matter); but two ways may he be said to harden sinners: 1. By forsaking them, and not softening their hearts: as darkness follows upon the sun's withdrawing of his light, so doth hardness upon God's withholding his softening influence. 2. By punishing them; he inflicts further hardness, as a punishment of former hardness; and this he infuseth not, but it is effected either, 1. By Satan, to whom hardened sinners are delivered up; or, 2. By themselves, they being given over to their own hearts' lusts; or, 3. By God's word and works, which accidentally harden the hearts of men, as might be shown.

19 Thou wilt say then unto me, Why doth he yet find fault? For who hath resisted his will?

Here he obviate a third objection or cavil. The first was, that God is unfaithful, ver. 6; the second, that God is unjust, ver. 14; now the third is, that God is severe and cruel. Some might object and say, If God, in those courses which he takes with men and sinners, doth follow only his own will and pleasure, and all things are done thereafter; why then doth he complain of sinners, and find fault with them? It seems it is his will to reject them; and who hath resisted, or can make resistance thereunto? It seems to be a common saying amongst the Hebrews, that None can withstand God: see 2 Chron. xx. 6, and elsewhere.

20 Nay but, O man, who art thou that repliest against God? Shall the thing formed say to him that formed it, Why hast thou made me thus?

Here follows the answer to this cavil; which is either personal to the caviller, in this and the next verse, or real to the cavil, in the two following verses. Nay but, O man, who art thou that repliest against God? the apostle seems to speak these words with some warmth, as if his spirit and zeal was stirred at the sauciness of the caviller: q. d. Dost thou consider what thou art? Thou art but a man, a piece of living clay, a little breathing dust, a contemptible worm in comparison; and darest thou to word it with God, to dispute with thy Maker, to question or call him to an account? You may argue matters with your fellow creatures, but not with your Creator: see Isa. xiv. 9, 10, from whence this seems to be borrowed, and Job xl. 2. Shall the thing formed say to him that formed it, Why hast thou made me thus? q. d. Shall the wood quarrel with the carpenter, the iron with the smith; or, as it is in the next verse, the clay with the potter?

21 Hath not the potter power over the clay, of the same lump to make one vessel unto honour, and another unto dishonour?

He argueth from the less to the greater, that if a potter hath power over his clay, to form it as he pleaseth, then God hath much more power over his creatures, to form them or order them as he listeth. God's authority over his creature, is greater than that of a potter over his clay. The potter made not his clay; but both clay and potter are made by God. Here is something implied, that as there is no difference in the matter or lump out of which the potter frameth diversity of vessels, so there is no difference in mankind; all men are alike by nature, and in the same corrupt state; both those who are elected, and those who are rejected, that are made vessels of mercy, or vessels of wrath. And here is this expressed, that as the potter maketh vessels of honour or dishonour, of nobler or viler use, out of the same lump, as he listeth, and is not bound to give a reason of his so doing to his pots; so God may choose some, and reject others, and give no account thereof unto his creatures. The potter takes nothing from the clay, of what form soever he makes it; and the Creator doth no wrong to the creature, however he doth dispose of it.

22 What if God, willing to shew his wrath, and to make his power known, endured with much longsuffering the vessels of wrath fitted to destruction?

In this and in the next verse, is a real answer to the cavil in ver. 19. The apostle having spoken before of God's absolute right and power over his creatures, to dispose of them at his pleasure, as the potter doth his clay; lest any should tax God with tyranny and partiality towards his creatures, he subjoineth the reasons of his different proceedings with the one and with the other. q. d. What hast thou to answer or object against God, if he take a severe course with some? seeing, 1. He thereby manifesteth his great displeasure against sin, and his power to take vengeance of sinners. Seeing, 2. He bears long with them in their sins; exerciseth great patience towards them in the midst of their provocations, giving them space to repent, if they can or will. And seeing, 3. They are vessels of wrath, fitted to destruction; partly by themselves, and their own sensual courses; partly by God's righteous judgment, who gives them up thereunto.

23 And that he might make known the riches of his glory on the vessels of mercy, which he had afore prepared unto glory,

q. d. Again, on the other side, what hast thou to say, if he proceed more mercifully with others? seeing, 1. He thereby manifesteth the riches of his glory, or his glorious grace; and seeing, 2. They are vessels of mercy, which he had afore prepared unto glory; i. e. he had done it by election from eternity, and by regeneration and sanctification of the Spirit in time. He speaks here of two sorts of vessels, some of wrath, and some of mercy, as he had before spoken of vessels of honour, and of dishonour. Concerning the latter, he speaks passively, that they are fitted to destruction: see ver. 22. Concerning the former, he speaks actively, that God hath prepared them unto glory.

24 Even us, whom he hath called, not of the Jews only, but also of the Gentiles?

Hitherto he hath been showing, that the promise was never made or meant to the carnal seed of Abraham. This argument he began, ver. 6, 7, and he continues it (using several apostrophes and amplifications, which were to his purpose) till he comes to these words; and here he tells you plainly who are the true seed of Abraham, and the children of the promise, even the called of God of all nations, whether Jews or Gentiles. And he takes occasion to fall into it, by speaking of some in the foregoing verse, that were vessels of mercy, afore prepared unto glory: now here, in this verse, he tells you, who these are; (and to be sure they are the persons he is inquiring after, viz. the spiritual seed of Abraham, and the children of the promise;) he says, they are such as God called; i. e. effectually called, not of the Jews only, but also of the Gentiles; and that this is so, he further proves in the following verse.

25 As he saith also in Osee, °I will call them my people, which were not my people; and her beloved, which was not beloved.

Here the apostle proves, that the Gentiles were children of the promise, or that the promise belonged to them, as well as to the Jews: and because the Jews could not endure to hear of this, he cites two testimonies out of Hosea, to convince them: one is in this verse, and it is taken out of Hosea ii. 23; the other is in the following verse.

26 ¶ And it shall come to pass, that in the place where it was said unto them, Ye are not my people; there shall they be called the children of the living God.

This testimony is taken out of Hosea i. 10; and it is as if he had said, This that I affirm concerning the conversion and calling of the Gentiles, is nothing else but what the prophet Hosea long ago did preach to our fathers. Some think, these places in Hosea do speak primarily of the Jews, and but secondarily, or by consequence, of the Gentiles. Others think, that they speak chiefly of the Gentiles; those terms (not beloved, and not a people) being in Scripture mostly used of them.

27 Esaias also crieth concerning Israel, °Though the number of the children of Israel be as the sand of the sea, °a remnant shall be saved:

In this and the two next verses he proves, that it was foretold of old, by Esaias the prophet, that God should pass by the greatest part of the Jews, and save only a remnant, or a few of them. Crieth; hereby is noted the prophet's zeal, or his openness and plainness. The testimony recorded, is found in Isa. x. 22, 23. As the sand of the sea; for number or multitude, for so the promise was to Abraham. Gen. xxii. 17; xxxii. 12. Shall be saved: Esaias saith, shall return; i. e. from the captivity, or from sin, as it is, Isa. x. 21. This shows, none can be saved but they who return and repent.

28 For he will finish the work, and cut it short in righteousness: °because a short work will the Lord make upon the earth.

This verse is also found in that forecited place, Isa. x. 22, 23. The apostle in this, and in the other citations, follows the Seventy, which was a received translation, and had been in request about three hundred years, though in this, and in other places, it is very different from the Hebrew text. That which God is said to finish, and cut short, is his work; the Greek is λογος, which signifies his word, or the account, as some read it. This is brought in as a reason why a remnant only should be saved; because God would shorten the account, or (as we read it) make a short work, in the Jewish world. He would bring a sudden destruction upon that people. Sennacherib and the Assyrians, or Titus Vespasian and the Romans, shall make a complete and speedy conquest of them; few of them shall remain, the greater part being involved, first in infidelity, then in destruction. The apostle makes those few to be a type of God's elect among that people, that should be saved by faith in Jesus Christ.

29 And as Esaias said before, °Except the Lord of Sabaoth had left us a seed, °we had been as Sodoma, and been made like unto Gomorrha.

As Esaias said before; in Isa. i. 9. The Lord of sabaoth; or, of hosts: the mighty God, whose hosts all creatures are, which execute his will, as soldiers the will of their commander. Had left us a seed: he means by a seed, the same that he meant before by a remnant, a small number. These were left as a little seed, out of a great heap of corn: that which is chosen, and left for seed, is little in comparison of the whole crop. We had been as Sodoma, and been made like unto Gomorrha; i. e. utterly wasted and destroyed as they were, Jer. 1. 40.

30 What shall we say then? °That the Gentiles, which followed not after righteousness, have attained to righteousness, °even the righteousness which is of faith.

This is the conclusion of the apostle's discourse about the election of some and the rejection of others; as also about the calling of the Gentiles and the casting off the Jews. Which followed not after righteousness; that never minded or regarded it; instead of following after it, they fled from it. They were full of all unrighteousness, chap. i. 18, to the end; Eph. ii. 2, 3. The righteousness which is of faith; viz. gospel righteousness, or the righteousness of Christ, which is received by true faith.

31 But Israel, °which followed after the law of righteousness, °hath not attained to the law of righteousness.

Israel, which followed after the law of righteousness; i. e. the unbelieving Jews, who paid great reverence to the law of God, regarding and observing the outward precepts and ceremonies thereof. Hath not attained to the law of righteousness; they came short of that righteousness which the law requires, which God will accept, and which is to be attained, not by works, but by faith, as it follows in the next verse.

32 Wherefore? Because they sought it not by faith, but as it were by the works of the law. For °they stumbled at that stumblingstone;

Here is the reason of the foregoing seeming paradox; why they, who followed after the law of righteousness, should not attain it, rather than other. Because they sought it not aright; they sought it not in a way of believing, but of working. These two are opposed in the business of justification, as before at large, in chap. iii. and iv. As it were by the works of the law; i. e. as if they could have attained righteousness or justification in that way, which it was impossible to do. They stumbled at that stumbling-stone; i. e. the true Messiah: q. d. So far were they from seeking righteousness by Christ, that, on the contrary, they took offence at him, to their own destruction, Mark vi. 3; 1 Cor. i. 23. They thought it impossible that he should give them a righteousness better than their own. This happened to them according to the prophecy that went before them: so it followeth;

Isaiah saith, he that believeth; the apostle, whosoever believeth; which is much the same: an indefinite proposition is equivalent to a universal. The prophet saith, He that believeth shall not make haste; the apostle, he shall not be ashamed. He that is rash and hasty will at last be ashamed and confounded.*

CHAP. X

Paul's prayer for Israel, who were misled by blind zeal, 1—

3. The difference between justification by the law and by faith explained from Scripture, 4—10. Salvation open to all that believe, both Jews and Gentiles, 11—13. The necessity of preaching to the Gentiles inferred, 14—18. God's acceptance of the Gentiles known before to the Jews, 19, 20; as also their own refusal of his offered mercy, 21.

BRETHREN, my heart's desire and prayer to God for Israel is, that they might be saved.

The apostle begins this chapter with another prolepsis, or rhetorical insinuation, professing his unfeigned love of his nation, and his hearty desire of their salvation: q. d. As before, (c. g.) so now again I declare openly, (O ye Christian Jews, my brethren,) that whatever the generality of the Jews do think of me, as if I hated them, or were their enemy; yet there is none more passionately and tenderly affected to them than I am: and from hence it is, that I do so heartily desire and pray to God, for all that people, that they might be saved. That they might be saved; that they may obtain eternal salvation, and escape that deluge of wrath and destruction that hangs over their heads.

2 For I bear them record <sup>a</sup>that they have a zeal of God, but not according to knowledge.

For I bear them record, i. e. I must testify this of them, or of many of them, that they have a zeal of God; that they have a fervent desire to maintain the law of God, with all the Mosaical rites and ceremonies, as thinking thereby to promote the glory of God. But not according to knowledge; i. e. true and right knowledge. Though it be a warm, yet it is a blind zeal. They know not the will of God, or what that righteousness is which he will accept. They know not for what end the law and worship of God, under the Old Testament, was instituted. They knew not that Christ, in, and by whom, that law is fulfilled.

3 For they being ignorant of <sup>b</sup>God's righteousness, and going about to establish their own <sup>c</sup>righteousness, have not submitted themselves unto the righteousness of God.

They being ignorant of God's righteousness: here he shows more particularly what knowledge the Jews wanted. They knew not the righteousness of God; of which see chap. i. 17, with the notes there. This was abundantly manifested, being witnessed by the law and the prophets, chap. iii. 21; and a thing very needful to be known, as being that wherein man's happiness consisted; but they were ignorant of it. Going about to establish their own righteousness; their personal and inherent righteousness, a home-made righteousness, which is of their own spinning; this they designed to set up in the room of God's righteousness. Have not submitted themselves to the righteousness of God; this notes the pride that accompanied their ignorance, and that is in the hearts of men by nature. They will not go abroad for that which they think they have, or may have, at home. They will not be beholden to another for that which they suppose they have in themselves. They have righteousness enough of their own working; and therefore they reject and withdraw themselves from that which is of God's appointing.

4 For <sup>d</sup>Christ is the end of the law for righteousness to every one that believeth.

He proves that the Jews were ignorant of the righteousness of God, because they were ignorant of Christ, the true end of the law. Christ is the end of the law: q. d. The law was given for this end, that sinners being thereby brought to the knowledge of their sins, and their lost and damned estate, by reason thereof, should fly to Christ and his righteousness for refuge; see Gal. iii. 19, 24. Or else, Christ is the end of the law; i. e. the perfection and consummation thereof. The word is taken in this sense, 1 Tim. i. 5. He perfected the ceremonial law, as being the substance whereof all the ceremonies of the law were shadows; they all referred to him as their scope and end. He perfected also the moral law, partly by his active obedience, fulfilling all the righteousness thereof, partly by his passive obedience, bearing the curse and punishment of the law, which was due to us. Whatever the law required that we should do or suffer, he hath perfected it on our behalf: see chap. viii. 4.

5 For Moses describeth the righteousness which is of the law, 'That the man which doeth those things shall live by them.

In this and the following verses, he shows the great difference that is between the righteousness of the law and the righteousness of faith; and this difference is taught us in the books of Moses himself. As for the righteousness of the law, that is plainly described by Moses, Lev. xviii. 5; and it tells us expressly, That the man who doth personally, perfectly, and constantly observe and do whatsoever the law requires, shall be rewarded with eternal life: see chap. ii. 13, and the notes there. And on the contrary, it implies thus much, That whoso fails, or falls short, shall incur death and damnation. This also it declares in other places, Deut. xxvii. 26; Gal. iii. 10. This is a hard saying; who can hear it? It shuts us all out of heaven, it turns us into hell, it lays upon us impossible conditions. Let us hearken therefore to the righteousness of faith; of which in the next.

6 But the righteousness which is of faith speaketh on this wise, 'Say not in thine heart, Who shall ascend into heaven? (that is, to bring Christ down from above:)

The righteousness which is of faith speaketh on this wise: by a prosopopœia (a frequent figure in Scripture) he puts the person of a reasonable creature upon the righteousness of faith, and bringeth it in speaking and declaring itself as followeth; or else the meaning is, that the Scripture, or Moses, speaketh thus of the righteousness of faith. These words are taken out of Deut. xxx. 12, 13. The question is, Whether Paul doth properly allege this place in Deuteronomy, or only allude to it? Some think the latter, that Moses directly speaks of the law, and that the apostle, by an allusion, or by way of accommodation, applies it unto faith; hence it is, that he doth not cite the very words of Moses, but alters and adds to them, as best served his purpose. But others think, that this would extenuate the force of St. Paul's argument, if he should only allude unto this testimony of Moses, and not confirm that which he intended by the same. Therefore their opinion is, that these words are properly cited; and that Moses himself, in that place, doth speak (though very obscurely) of the righteousness of faith; yea, the foregoing words in that 30th chapter of Deuteronomy do belong to the times of the gospel. Some of the Jewish rabbis have confessed, that Moses in that chapter, especially the beginning of it, hath reference to the days of the Messiah. He speaks there of the Israelites being driven among all nations, and unto the utmost parts of heaven, which chiefly happened to them a little after the ascension of Christ, and will abide upon them till their conversion, of which see the 11th chapter of this Epistle; and then God will restore them again to the Land of Promise, to that Jerusalem which is from above, the true church of Jesus Christ; then he will circumcise their hearts, and the hearts of their seed, to love the Lord with all their heart, and with all their soul; then will the Lord rejoice over them to do them good, as he rejoiced over their fathers; then, according to God's covenant promise, the law of God shall be written in their hearts; it shall not be hidden, or afar off, but nigh them, in their mouths, and in their hearts. Thus the apostle convinceth the Jews by a testimony out of Moses, in whom they trusted. Say not in thine heart; i. e. think not anxiously and despondingly within thyself. Who shall ascend into heaven? i. e. to learn the will of God there concerning our righteousness and salvation, and then teach it to us; or, to see if there be any admission or room for such as I am there, and to carry me thither. That is, to bring Christ down from above; this is in effect to deny that Christ has already come down from heaven to reveal it to us; and that he must now come to do it: or else, this is as much as to deny that Christ hath already descended from heaven, to procure and purchase salvation for us; and that he must come down again for that purpose. It were to deny the ascension of Christ into heaven; for he is gone thither, not as a private, but as a public person: he is gone thither as our Head, and thither he will bring all his members; he is there as our forerunner, as one that is gone before to prepare a place for us. For Christians to distrust their going to heaven, is to doubt whether Christ be in heaven; he had never gone thither if he had not perfected our redemption and salvation here.

7 Or, Who shall descend into the deep? (that is, to bring up Christ again from the dead.)

Who shall descend into the deep? by the deep, here, understand hell: see Luke viii. 31; Rev. ix. 1; xx. 1, 3. q. d. Do not inquire distrustfully, and despairingly, whether thou shalt go to hell, or who shall go thither, to see, and bring thee word, if such as thou are there. That is, to bring up Christ again from the dead; this were in effect to frustrate and make void the death of Christ; it is as much as to say, he never died for us, or he must come again, and suffer, and shed his blood for the remission of our sins. He died to deliver us from death and damnation; he endured the wrath of God, that we may escape it. The sense of the whole is this, That the doctrine of justification by faith, doth not propose such difficult and impossible terms, as the doctrine of justification by works. The righteousness of the law, that speaks terror, and puts us into a continual fear of hell, and despair of heaven; but the righteousness of faith, that speaks comfort, and forbids all amazing fear and troubles about our salvation or damnation.

8 But what saith it? *The word is nigh thee, even in thy mouth, and in thy heart: that is, the word of faith, which we preach;

But what saith it? i. e. what saith the text in Deut. xxx. 14? or what saith the righteousness of faith? what is its title and language? In the 6th and 7th verses he did but tell us what it said not, but here he tells us what it saith. The word is nigh thee; i. e. the matter required of thee, in order to life and salvation. He seems in these words to declare the readiness and easiness of the way of salvation, as taught us in the gospel, and by the righteousness of faith. God requires no hard thing of us, to cross the seas, to climb the mountains, to take long and painful journeys, to find it out. The way of salvation under the gospel hath but a short cut; it requires not so much the labour of the hand, as the confession of the mouth, and the belief of the heart: or, The word that teacheth it is at hand, it is as if it were in thy mouth and heart: a proverbial speech, (as some think.) to show the readiness of it. That is, the word of faith, which we preach: by the word of faith, he means the gospel, and the doctrine of it: and the gospel is so called, either effectively, because it works faith; or objectively, because it is a received faith, and is the proper object of it.

9 That <sup>h</sup>if thou shalt confess with thy mouth the Lord Jesus, and shalt believe in thine heart that God hath raised him from the dead, thou shalt be saved.

q. d. There are but these two things, which the gospel principally requires in order to our salvation: the one is, the confession of Christ with our mouths, and that in spite of all persecution and danger, to own him for our Lord, and for our Jesus; and to declare, that we are and will be ruled and saved by him, and by him only. The other is, to believe in our hearts, that God hath raised him from the dead. This article of the resurrection of Christ presupposeth all the rest, and fasteneth together, as by a link, all the antecedents and consequents of it; his ascension, session at the right hand of God, and intercession, which followed after. This article therefore, by a figure, is put for all the rest; and this is mentioned, because the death and passion of Christ had availed us nothing, unless he had risen again; for thereby he obtained a perfect victory over sin, death, and damnation, for all the elect. This is the principal ground of our justification, as hath been said, chap. iv. 25.

10 For with the heart man believeth unto righteousness; and with the mouth confession is made unto salvation.

With the heart man believeth; in the former verse confession was set first; in this, believing. Faith indeed goes before confession; I believed, says the psalmist, and the apostle after him, therefore have I spoken; yet our faith is discerned and known by our confession. Unto righteousness; i. e. unto justification. This phrase may be expounded by chap. iv. 5, or ix. 30. With the mouth confession is made unto salvation: our adversaries the papists make great use of this text, to prove that good works, as confession, &c., are the cause of salvation; whereas confession is required here, not as the cause, but as the means thereof. The apostle makes faith here to be the cause, as well of salvation, as justification; because confession of the mouth, to which salvation is here ascribed, is itself an effect or fruit of faith; and so, according to that known rule in logic, the cause of the cause, is the cause of that which is caused thereby.

11 For the Scripture saith, <sup>i</sup>Whosoever believeth on him shall not be ashamed.

The saving effect of faith and confession, spoken of immediately before, is here proved by Scripture. Either he refers to Isa. xxviii. 16, or Psal. xxv. 3; or else he means, that this is the general doctrine of the Scripture. See notes on chap. ix. 33.

12 For <sup>k</sup>there is no difference between the Jew and the Greek: for <sup>l</sup>the same Lord over all <sup>m</sup>is rich unto all that call upon him.

For there is no difference between the Jew and the Greek; he gives a reason for that universal term, whosoever, which he had added in the precedent verse, and is not found in Isaiah, as was noted before, in chap. ix. 33. The same Lord over all; these words are a reason why there is no difference now betwixt Jew and Greek. This title is to be referred more especially to Jesus Christ, who was called Lord, ver. 9, and is called, Lord of all, Acts x. 36. He is Head of all the elect, in all nations of the world. Is rich unto all; i. e. is bountiful unto all. So that the Jews need not envy the calling or coming of the Gentiles; they have never the less themselves; the Lord hath an inexhaustible store of grace and mercy. The fountain is above our thirst. That call upon him; not to all, hand over head, but to such as call upon him in faith.

That the Lord is rich unto all that call upon him, is confirmed here by a testimony out of Joel ii. 32, which is also cited by St. Peter, Acts ii. 21. The apostle's argument may be thus formed: If whosoever calls on the name of the Lord shall be saved, then the Lord is rich to all that call upon him; for no riches are comparable to salvation; but the former is true, therefore the latter. Whosoever, whether Jew or Gentile, shall call upon the name of the Lord shall be saved; i. e. on him whose name is the Lord. Jesus Christ is principally meant, as appears by many passages in the prophet. Compare this with 1 Cor. i. 2.

14 How then shall they call on him in whom they have not believed? and how shall they believe in him of whom they have not heard? and how shall they hear without a preacher?

The connexion of this verse and the following verses of this chapter is very obscure. Some connect these words with the 12th verse. There he said, There is no difference between Jew and Greek, &c. And this he proves, because the means to attain salvation by the true invocation of God hath been made common to all; and consequently faith, and so, from time to time, the hearing and preaching the word of God, according as the one is occasioned by the other. Others make this the coherence: Seeing the righteousness of faith is the only true righteousness, and doth, in common, by the promise of God, belong to Jew and Gentile (as hath been said); it was therefore necessary, that some must be sent of God to both people, which is the ordinary way and means to beget faith, and to bring men to Christ. His way of arguing is such, as logicians call sorites; rhetoricians, a gradation; and it is very forcible and demonstrative: q. d. God hath, by his prophets, promised salvation indifferently to Jew and Gentile; but without calling on him, there is no salvation; and without faith, there is no prayer; and without hearing, there is no faith; and without a preacher, there is no hearing; and without solemn mission, there can be no preacher. His manner of speaking all along is by way of interrogation, which is the more convincing, because it carries in it a kind of an appeal to the persons spoken to; every interrogation is equivalent to a negation.

How then shall they call on him in whom they have not believed? there is no foundation then for the popish doctrine of invoking saints and angels. How shall they believe in him of whom they have not heard? amongst the elect of God, there may be some that are born deaf; and in these, God doth supply the want of outward means in an extraordinary way: but ordinarily, hearing is as necessary to faith, as faith is to prayer, or prayer to salvation.

15 And how shall they preach, except they be sent? as it is written, How beautiful are the feet of them that preach the Gospel of peace, and bring glad tidings of good things!

How shall they preach, except they be sent? viz. immediately, by God or Christ, as the prophets and the apostles: see Gal. i. 1. Or mediately, by men; i. e. by such as have authority from Christ to separate and ordain others to this work. Without this orderly mission, or ordination, how can they preach? saith the apostle; i. e. how can they do it duly or profitably, or in the name and by the authority of Christ? For otherwise, there were, and still are, those that run before they are sent, Jer. xxiii. 21. How beautiful are the feet of them! their arrival or approach. The persons of such are meant, though their feet be named, because they carried them up and down to do this work. The scripture referred to is found in Isa. lii. 7. The apostle here leaveth the Septuagint, and followeth the Hebrew text; yet he doth not cite the place in all points as the prophet hath it. He leaveth out some words, as upon the mountains, which had respect to the situation of Jerusalem; and he changeth the number, turning the singular into the plural. Object. But the text in Isaiah speaks of such a messenger as was sent to publish the deliverance of the Jews from the bondage of the Assyrians. Answer. Though that be granted, it is applied and accommodated aptly enough to the preaching of peace and salvation by Christ; because that deliverance (as all other temporal deliverances) had its foundation in the redemption purchased by Christ.

16 But they have not all obeyed the Gospel. For Esaias saith, Lord, who hath believed our report?

But they have not all obeyed the gospel: he here preventeth a cavil of the Jews. Thus they might reason: If the apostles and preachers of the gospel are sent with so great authority from God, and bring such a welcome message, how comes it to pass that so few receive it, and yield obedience thereunto? To this he answers, that it need not seem strange, because it was foretold long ago by the prophet, Isa. liii. 1. It is not to be understood as if this was the cause of their unbelief, because Isaiah said thus. The particle for doth not show the cause, but the consequence: it was not because the prophet so said, that they did not believe; but because they believed not, the prophet so foretold. Lord; this is added by the Seventy for explanation. Who hath believed our report? i. e. very few, none in comparison. Compare this with John iii. 32.

17 So then faith cometh by hearing, and hearing by the word of God.

This is the conclusion of the former gradation, ver. 14. He speaketh here of the ordinary means whereby faith is wrought; not confining or limiting the Spirit of God, who worketh, or may work, by extraordinary means, yea, without any means at all. See the notes on ver. 14. By the word of God; by the command of God: q. d. The gospel could not be lawfully preached to them, for them to hear it, but by God's command; and therefore the apostles and others, in preaching the gospel to the Gentiles, had good authority for what they did.

18 But I say, Have they not heard?

Yes verily, their sound went into all the earth, and their words unto the ends of the world.

He answers an objection, that some one might make in behalf of the Jews, to excuse them; that they could not believe, because they had not heard; and faith, as in the foregoing verse, comes by hearing. To this he answers, that the gospel was published to the whole world; therefore the Jews must needs have heard it. That the gospel had been preached all the world over, he proves by a testimony taken out of Psal. xix. 4: q. d. David tells you, that all have heard, or might hear; for the sound of the gospel is gone out into all the earth. Object. But David speaks of the works of God, as the heavens, the firmament, &c. Answer. Some think the apostle only alludes to this place in the 19th Psalm, and doth not allege it. Others think, that the psalmist doth literally and historically speak of the heavens, &c.; and prophetically of the apostles, and preachers of the gospel. By all the earth, in this verse, you may understand the greatest part of it; and by the ends of the world, the remote parts thereof.

19 But I say, Did not Israel know?

First Moses saith, I will provoke you to jealousy by them that are no people, and by a foolish nation I will anger you.

Here he proves by three testimonies out of the Old Testament, that the Jews must needs have heard the sound of the gospel, together with the Gentiles; only they rejected it, when the other embraced it. And so he layeth the ground of what he was purposed to handle in the following chapter, concerning the receiving of the Gentiles, and the casting off, and after calling, of the Jews.

Did not Israel know; here something must be supplied to make up the sense; either God, or the gospel, or the righteousness of faith, or the conversion of the Gentiles. The Israelites could not well pretend ignorance, considering what Moses and Isaiah had said, in whom, or in whose writings, they were conversant. Moses saith; viz. in Dent. xxxii. 21. Still he follows the translation of the Seventy. I will provoke you to jealousy by them that are no people, and by a foolish nation I will anger you; here God threateneth the Jews, that he would punish them with jealousy and anger, by preferring the Gentiles before them; at the sight whereof, their hearts should be sore vexed; to behold all their privileges taken from them, and given to a people whom they accounted most vile and despicable, to be no people in regard of them, to be dogs and beasts rather than men: see Acts xiii. 45. Read the cited place in Deuteronomy and you will find that God speaks of this as a fit punishment upon the Jews for their idolatry. They had chosen to themselves such as were no gods; and therefore, to requite them, God would take to him such as were no people: they had chosen to themselves (as it were) another husband; and God, to be even with them, had chosen another wife.

20 But Esaias is very bold, and saith,

<sup>s Isa. 65. 1.</sup> <sup>ch. 9. 30.</sup> *I was found of them that sought me not; I was made manifest unto them that asked not after me.

Esaias is very bold; i. e. he speaks more boldly concerning the calling of the Gentiles, and the casting off the Jews. He used a holy freedom, though it cost him dear; Jerome saith, he was sawn asunder with a wooden saw. This is a commendable property in a preacher: see Acts iv. 13; xxviii. 31. And saith: viz. in Isa. lxxv. 1. The apostle in this citation differs in some words, both from the Hebrew text and the Seventy, as may appear to him that will compare them together. I was found of them that sought me not; compare this with chap. ix. 30, and see the notes there. I was made manifest unto them that asked not after me; compare this with Eph. ii. 2. The advantage and advancement of the Gentiles was altogether of free grace, and an effect of God's free election.

But to Israel he saith; viz. in Isa. lxxv. 2. In the former verse there is a consolatory prophecy, foretelling the vocation of ignorant and profane Gentiles; and in this, there is a menacing prophecy, threatening the rejecting of the rebellious and stubborn Jews. All day long; from the time of their first calling to their dissipation. I have stretched forth my hands; as a father holds forth his arms to receive a rebellious son. Compare this with Matt. xxiii. 37. Unto a disobedient and gainsaying people; the prophet Isaiah hath but one word, rebellious, and the apostle renders it by these two words, disobedient and gainsaying: they were disobedient in heart, and gainsaying with their tongues, contrary to those two gracious qualifications, mentioned ver. 9, 10, belief in the heart, and the confession of the mouth. Compare this with Acts vii. 51, 52; xiii. 45; ix. 9.

CHAP. XI

God hath not so far cast off all Israel, but that a remnant is saved by grace, not by works, 1—6. The judicial blindness of the rest is prophesied of in Scripture, 7—10. The consequence both of their fall and conversion with regard to the Gentile world, 11—16. The Gentiles are cautioned not to insult the Jews, but to make a proper use of the example both of God's goodness and severity, 17—22. The Jews may, and shall in time, believe and be saved, 23—32. God's judgments and ways are unsearchable, 33—36.

The apostle having shown, in the end of the foregoing chapter, that the Jews were for their obstinacy rejected, and the Gentiles called, he here prevents or answers an objection. Some might be ready to say, If this be so, then God hath cast away his covenant people, which he hath promised not to do; see Psal. xciv. 14. To this he answers, first, by his accustomed form of denial, God forbid; and then he proceeds to show, that the rejection of the Jews was neither total nor final. That it was not total, he proves, first, by a particular instance in the following words. I also am an Israelite; i. e. I am a Jew by descent, of the seed of Abraham according to the flesh, and yet am not cast off by God. Of the tribe of Benjamin: some think this is added to intimate, that he was born of an honourable tribe, out of which king Saul sprang, 1 Sam. ix. 1, and Esther the queen, Esth. ii. 5. Others think this is added for a contrary reason; lest his calling should be ascribed to the dignity of his tribe, he says, he was of Benjamin, the last and least of all the tribes. And others rather think, that this particular recital of his genealogy is only to show, that he was a Jew by nature and nation, and not a proselyte converted to the faith: see Phil. iii. 5.

2 God hath not cast away his people which he foreknew. Wot ye not what the Scripture saith † of Elias? how he maketh intercession to God against Israel, saying,

God hath not cast away his people which he foreknew: here he makes a further answer to the forementioned objection: by way of distinction, he distinguisheth the people of God into such as are foreknown, and such as are not foreknown: and as for the former of these, he says, they are not rejected of God. By such as are foreknown of God, he means those that are elected and predestinated to eternal life, chap. viii. 29: a foreknowledge with approbation is implied and intended, John x. 14; 2 Tim. ii. 19. Wot ye not what the Scripture saith of Elias? here is a third answer to the objection in the last verse, and it is taken from an instance in Elias, which the Jews were well acquainted with. He cites or brings a book case for it. And he the rather brings this instance, lest the Jews should accuse him of insolency, for that he had spoken before only of himself; and therefore he gives them to understand, that there were many other believing Israelites, as well as himself, though possibly they were unknown to them. You know (saith he) what the Scripture saith of Elias, 1 Kings xix. How he maketh intercession to God against Israel: i. e. against the ten tribes, who were generally revolted from God, and fallen to idolatry: against those he complained, or those he impeached, ripping up their impieties, as in the following words.

3 <sup>d 1 Kings 19. 10, 14.</sup> Lord, they have killed thy prophets, and digged down thine altars; and I am left alone, and they seek my life.

See 1 Kings xix. 10, 14. Digged down thine altars: these were not the altars of the high places, for they are commended that cast them down; nor the altars in the temple at Jerusalem, for they were out of the reach of the ten tribes, against whom Elias complains: but such altars (say some) as the godly of the ten tribes did build to serve God with, when they were not permitted to go up to Jerusalem; in which case the building of private altars (as some learned Jews have affirmed) was allowed. Or else by altars you may understand such altars as Elias himself, by the special commandment of God, had erected. Others, by digging down God's altars, do understand their corrupting and destroying the true worship of God; and the words are to be taken synecdochically, or metonymically, the sign being put for the thing signified. I am left alone; so it was, for aught he knew; for few, if any, did publicly own the true worship of God: so general was the defection of the ten tribes in those days.

4 But what saith the answer of God unto him? *I have reserved to myself seven thousand men, who have not bowed the knee to the image of Baal.

The answer of God; the word properly signifieth the oracle, or answer of God given in the tabernacle from the mercy-seat; but it is generally taken for any Divine answer, or direction received from God: see Matt. ii. 12; Heb. xi. 7, where the same word is used. The apostle doth not repeat the whole answer of God, as it is recorded in 1 Kings xix. 15—18, but so much only as was pertinent to his purpose. I have reserved to myself; he saith not, They have reserved themselves, but, I have reserved them: q. d. Of my own free grace I have kept them from idolatry and apostacy. Seven thousand men; a certain number for an uncertain. There were doubtless women amongst them; but they are noted by the more worthy sex. Who have not bowed the knee to the image of Baal; the word image is not in the Greek; but the article being of the feminine gender, it was necessarily understood.

1 Pet. 2. 7. 5 'Even so then at this present time also there is a remnant according to the election of grace.

q. d. As it was in the times of Elias, so it is now; there is a remnant of the Jews, which God hath graciously elected; therefore their rejection is not total, which was the thing to be proved. Though those that believe are few in respect of those that believe not, as a remnant is but little in respect of the whole piece, yet there are many thousands of them, as James said to Paul, Acts xxi. 20, Thou seest, brother, how many thousands of Jews there are which believe.

6 And <sup>g</sup>if by grace, then is it no more of works: otherwise grace is no more grace. But if it be of works, then is it no more grace: otherwise work is no more work.

This verse depends upon the former; and though it doth not seem to appertain to the argument the apostle had in hand, yet, by the direction of the Spirit, he takes the little occasion that is offered, to show, that election and vocation are only by grace, and not by works. This he had spoken to before, chap. iv. 4, 5; ix. 11; but he toucheth upon it again: and here he delivers a truth, which the Jews of old either could not, or would not, understand; i. e. that there is no mixing of the merit of good works and the free grace of God, but one of these doth exclude and destroy the nature of the other; for if election and calling were both of grace and works, (as some that call themselves Christians, as well as the Jews, affirm,) then grace is no grace, and works are no works. For whatsoever proceedeth of grace, that cometh freely, and not of debt; but what cometh by merit of works, that cometh by debt; but now debt and no debt, or that which is free, and by desert, are quite contrary things. Therefore to say, that men are elected and called, partly of grace and partly of the merit of foreseen works, that were to put things together that cannot agree, to make debt no debt, merit no merit, works no works, grace no grace; and so, to affirm and deny one and the same thing.

7 What then? <sup>h</sup>Israel hath not obtained that which he seeketh for; but the election hath obtained it, and the rest were blinded

What then? q. d. My discourse comes to this, or this is the sum of it. Israel hath not obtained that which he seeketh for; i. e. the body of the Jewish nation, seeking righteousness and life by the works of the law, have not obtained it, or they have not hit the mark; they aimed at it, but they shot wide; they took a great deal of pains to little or no purpose: see chap. ix. 31. The election; i. e. the elect; the abstract for the concrete: so before, circumcision for the circumcised. The rest were blinded; i. e. those who are not elected; they are left, by God's just judgment, to their own ignorance and obduracy; as also to Satan, who doth increase it in them, 2 Cor. iv. 4. The antithesis requires that he should have said, The rest have not obtained; but he speaks this of purpose to show the cause of their not obtaining, i. e. their own blindness of mind and hardness of heart.

8 (According as it is written, <sup>1</sup>God hath given them the spirit of slumber, <sup>h</sup>eyes that they should not see, and ears that they should not hear;) unto this day.

It is written; viz. in Isa. vi. 9; xxix. 10. The spirit of slumber; the word signifieth, such a dead sleep, as those have, who are pricked or stung with venomous beasts, out of which they hardly or never awake. Unto this day: q. d. So it was of old, and so it is still. Or else these words (the former being included in a parenthesis) may be joined with the last words of the foregoing verse, thus, the rest were blinded unto this day.

made a snare, and a trap, and a stumblingblock, and a recompence unto them:

10 <sup>m</sup>Let their eyes be darkened, that <sup>m</sup>Ps. 69. 23. they may not see, and bow down their back away.

David saith; viz. in Psal. lxxix. 22, 23. The apostle tieth not himself to the very words of the psalmist, but being guided by the same Spirit by which David wrote, he adds and alters some words, without diminishing the sense. Let their table be made a snare, &c.: some take these words for a prayer; others, a prophecy. David, in the person of Christ, (of whom he was a type,) doth complain and prophecy of the extreme injuries and oppressions wherewith the Jews (his own people) should vex him; as that they should give him gall for meat, and in his thirst, give him vinegar to drink, ver. 21. Therefore, by way of imprecation, he prayeth down the wrath of God upon them: particularly, he prophesies or prays, that all their most pleasant things might be turned to their destruction; that their understandings might be darkened, so as they shall discern nothing of heavenly things; that they might savour nothing but earthly things, and be unable to lift up their heads and hearts to God, and to his gospel. Now David having, by the Spirit of prophecy, prayed down such miseries upon the Jews, they must be fulfilled; therefore the general unbelief and hardness of heart that is amongst that people is not to be wondered at.

11 I say then, Have they stumbled that they should fall? God forbid: but rather <sup>n</sup>through their fall salvation is come unto the Gentiles, for to provoke them to jealousy.

Hitherto he hath showed that the rejection of the Jews is not total. Now he comes to prove that it is not final; that before the end of the world they shall be generally called and converted; that they, together with the Gentiles that believe, shall make one sheepfold, and one flock under one Shepherd, the Lord Jesus Christ. And for the proving of this, divers arguments are brought by the apostle, (who alone plainly handles this secret,) on which he insisteth the longer, for the comfort of the poor Jews, as also for the administration and information of the Gentiles. Have they stumbled that they should fall? God forbid: here is another prolepsis or anticipation. The Jews might say, If the case be thus, that these holy prophets, Isaiah and David, have foretold our blindness and stumbling, then we are in a hopeless condition, and that for ever. To this he answers, that they have not so stumbled as that they should finally fall, so as never to rise again; far be it from me to affirm any such things: God hath revealed the contrary to me; that he will one day call the Jews again, and restore them to his favour. Through their fall salvation is come unto the Gentiles: q. d. Out of the forementioned evil there ariseth this good, that the gospel (being rejected by the Jews) is preached to the Gentiles, and they are thereby called and brought to salvation: see Acts xiii. 42, 46. Because now at first a few Jews only, and a multitude of Gentiles, are converted, it hath so fallen out, that the ceremonial law is the more easily abrogated, and the doctrine of the gospel and the grace of God is the better established. To provoke them to jealousy; i. e. the Jews who embrace not the gospel: q. d. This grace that God hath bestowed upon the Gentiles, he will make use of in his appointed time, as a prick of holy jealousy to the Jews; he will by means thereof stir them up to a holy indignation and emulation, to see themselves so far outstripped by those whom they contemned, and thereupon to embrace the gospel, and become the people of God again. Thus, as God hath ordered that the casting away of the Jews should be an occasion of the calling of the Gentiles; so again, on the other hand, the calling of the Gentiles shall be an occasion of the restoring of the Jews.

12 Now if the fall of them be the riches of the world, and the diminishing of <sup>o</sup>the riches of the Gentiles; how much more their fulness?

Another anticipation. The apostle having showed, that the falling away of the Jews was an occasion of the coming in of the Gentiles, it might be objected, that the conversion of the Jews might likewise be an occasion of the falling away of the Gentiles. To this he answers negatively, and confirms his answer by an argument from the less to the greater; that if their fall and diminution were the riches of the Gentiles, their calling again would be so much more: q. d. If God hath made use of the fall and rejection of the Jews, for an occasion of pouring out the riches or abundance of his grace upon the nations; and if the number of believing Jews, being so very small, (which is meant by their diminishing,) hath occasioned the conversion of such a multitude of Gentiles; then how much more will their fulness have the effect! How much more their fulness! i. e. their general conversion, the coming in of the Jews, shall so fill the world with wonder, and the gospel with lustre, that a much further accession will be made even to the number of the believing Gentiles.

13 For I speak to you Gentiles, inasmuch as I am the apostle of the Gentiles,
I magnify mine office:

i. e. I speak to you of being rich in the faith above the Jews, because I challenge a special interest in you, inasmuch as I am appointed to be the apostle of the Gentiles, and am sent chiefly unto them: see chap. xv. 16; Acts ix. 15; xiii. 2; xxii. 21; xxvi. 17; Gal. i. 16; ii. 7; Eph. iii. 8; 2 Tim. i. 11. And therefore, in thus setting forth your privileges and blessings, I magnify mine office.

14 If by any means I may provoke to emulation them which are my flesh, and might save some of them.

q. d. And I thus extol God's favour and mercy to you, that it may be a means (if God please) to provoke the Jews, that are my own flesh and blood, to a holy emulation or jealousy, (see ver. 11,) when they shall see the Gentiles possess what was promised to them. Quest. How doth he say, that he may save some of them? is not God the author of salvation? Ans. Yes; but he hath given his ministers to be instruments therein, and called them fellow workers with himself, 2 Cor. vi. 1: see 1 Tim. iv. 16.

15 For if the casting away of them be the reconciling of the world, what shall the receiving of them be, but life from the dead?

This verse contains an argument to prove the calling of the Jews; not a new one, but that repeated which you had before, ver. 12; the substance is the same, only the terms differ: there he spake of the fall and diminishing of the Jews, here, of their casting away; there it was the riches, here it is the reconciling of the world: q. d. If the rejection of the Jews brought great profit to the Gentiles, their reception and restoration will bring abundantly more. Be the reconciling of the world; i. e. an occasion of preaching the gospel to the Gentiles, by means of which they were reconciled to God. The gospel is the ministry of reconciliation, 2 Cor. v. 18—20. The receiving of them, into the favour of God and the bosom of the church. Life from the dead; a proverbial speech, to signify a great change for the better. The conversion of that people and nation, will strengthen the things that are languishing and like to die in the Christian church. It will confirm the faith of the Gentiles, and reconcile all their differences in religion, and occasion a more thorough reformation amongst them: there will be a much more happy and flourishing estate of the church, even such as shall be in the end of the world, at the resurrection of the dead.

16 For if the firstfruit be holy, the lump is also holy: and if the root be holy, so are the branches.

Here is another argument to prove the Jews are not finally rejected, because of the covenant made with their fathers. If the first-fruit be holy: some make a difference between the first-fruit, and the root, in the latter part of the verse. By the first-fruit they understand the apostles and other godly Jews, that were at first converted to the Christian faith; and by the root they understand Abraham and the patriarchs. Others take them for the same, and understand Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob, with the rest of the patriarchs, to be both the first-fruit and the root. The lump is also holy; by lump, and branches, he means the people of the Jews that descended of these holy patriarchs, and sprung from them, as branches from a root. The great question is, In what sense they are said to be holy? or of what holiness doth he speak? It is not meant of inherent, but of federal, or covenant holiness; all in an outward and visible covenant with God, were called holy: see Exod. xix. 6; Dan. viii. 24. Many common things are called holy in Scripture, because dedicated to God and to his service; yea, Jerusalem, though a place of great wickedness, is called a holy city, Matt. xxvii. 53. In such a sense as this, the Jews are still a holy people; they have an hereditary kind of dedication to God; they have a federal holiness, and relation to God, as being for ever separated to him, in the loins of their progenitors; this can never be wholly forfeited, as being granted to all the posterity of the holy patriarchs: therefore they are called the children of the covenant, which God made with their fathers, Acts iii. 25: see Acts ii. 39. So then God will remember in his own time, his covenant with the Jews, the posterity of Abraham, &c., who are beloved for the fathers' sakes, ver. 28. Therefore, in the mean time, they should not look on themselves with desperation; nor should the Gentiles look on them with disdain, as it follows in the next words.

17 And if some of the branches be broken off, and thou, being a wild olive tree, wert grafted in among them, and with them partakest of the root and fatness of the olive tree;

In this, and some following verses, the apostle digresseth a little, and takes occasion to prevent the insulting of the Gentiles over the Jews; as also to persuade them to take warning by their example. If some of the branches be broken off; the unbelieving Jews. And thou; a believing Gentile: though he speaks as to a particular person, yet he means the whole body of the believing Gentiles. Being a wild olive tree; a scion taken from a wild olive tree; i. e. from the heathenish and unbelieving world. Wert grafted in among them; the believing Jews. Some read, for them, or in the place of the branches that are broken off. And with them partakest of the root and fatness of the olive tree: by the root he means Abraham, &c. as before: by the olive tree he means the church of Christ; by the root, or sap of the root, and by the fatness of the olive tree, he means, all the promises and privileges, the graces and ordinances, the spiritual blessings and benefits, which belonged to Abraham and his seed, or to the true church of God.

18 Boast not against the branches.
But if thou boast, thou bearest not the root, but the root thee.

Boast not against the branches; i. e. against the Jews, who, because of their unbelief, are broken off; as if by nature thou wert better than they, or more worthy of that grace which is bestowed on thee. The word signifies, Throw not up thy neck, do not carry thyself scornfully and insultingly. But if thou boast, thou bearest not the root, but the root thee: q. d. If any will needs be so insolent, let them know and consider, that as the root is not beholden to the branches, but the branches to the root; so the good things that the Gentiles have, they received from the Jews, and not the Jews from them: the Gentile church is incorporated into the Jewish, and not the Jewish into the Gentile. Or else the meaning is, Despise not the Jews, for they are the natural branches of the root that bears them. If thou insultest over the branches, thou dost in a manner lift up thyself against the root, that once bore them, and now bears thee; even Abraham, who is the father of all them that believe. Abraham is not the root, simply and absolutely, but relatively, or by way of relation to his posterity and offspring.

19 Thou wilt say then, The branches were broken off, that I might be grafted in.

20 Well; because of unbelief they were broken off, and thou standest by faith. Be not highminded, but fear:

insulting over the Jews; because the Jews were broken off, that they might give place, or make way, for them; and the less worthy do always give place to the more worthy. To this he answers, first, by way of concession: Well, (saith he,) it is true, and I do not deny it, that the Jews were broken off, that the Gentiles might be grafted in. But then he further adds, by way of correction or negation, that the worthiness of the Gentiles was not the cause why the Jews were broken off; but it was because of their own unbelief; they would not accept of Christ, John i. 11; they went about to establish their own righteousness, and would not submit themselves to the righteousness of God, as it is in chap. x. 3. Therefore, if you Gentiles shall reason after this manner, you plainly put a fallacy upon yourselves, and take that for a cause which is none: you do not distinguish between the cause and the event; it fell out, indeed, that the Jews, being cast off, the Gentiles were received in, but this was not the cause of that. And thou standest by faith: q. d. Neither is thy worthiness the cause of thy present standing in the room of the Jews, or of having thy station in the church of Christ; but it is thy believing in that Christ whom the Jews rejected. By faith thou wast first ingrafted, and still continuest in the good olive tree. Be not high-minded, but fear: q. d. Be advised, and take heed of being self-conceited and secure; if thou fall into their fault, thou mayst expect the same fate. Therefore stand in awe, and sin not; thou art subject to unbelief and apostacy, as well as they.

21 For if God spared not the natural branches, take heed lest he also spare not thee.

This verse is a reason of the forementioned admonition: q. d. If God proceeded with so much severity against his ancient people the Jews, you Gentiles may in reason expect as great severity, if you take not heed to yourselves, and to your standing.

22 Behold therefore the goodness and severity of God: on them which fell, severity; but toward thee, goodness, if thou continue in his goodness: otherwise

* thou also shalt be cut off.

In this verse, he further persuades the Gentiles to humility and godly fear, and suggesteth several reasons for it. The first is taken from the example of God's severity to the Jews; they falling into apostacy and unbelief, are generally cut off and cast away. A second reason is taken from the free grace and undeserved goodness of God to the poor Gentiles, who were mercifully planted or grafted in the room of the Jews. A third reason is taken from the condition of their present standing, which is, if they continue in his goodness; i. e. if they continue in that state wherein his goodness hath set them. Some think the cause is here put for the effect, the goodness of God for faith, which was wrought in them by the goodness or grace of God. The antithesis, in the next verse, shows this to be the sense; for there he speaks of the Jews not continuing or abiding still in unbelief. A fourth reason is from the danger that would follow; if, through pride and security, they should fall and miscarry, they would be cut off, as the Jews, the natural branches, are. Some observe the change of the word; the Jews are said to be broken off, but the Gentiles would be cut off; they would, as it were, be stocked up by the roots: but that seems too critical and curious.

23 And they also, if they abide not in unbelief, shall be grafted in: for God is able to graff them in again.

Here he adds another argument, to repress the arrogance and insulting of the Gentiles; and it is taken from the hope of the Jews' restoration. Though for the present they seem to be in a desperate and forlorn condition, yet the restoring and re-ingrafting of them into the church is not impossible. The great obstacle is their unbelief, which God is able to remove. The same God that rejected them is able to restore them; to him all things are possible, he can cause dead and dry bones to live. An argument from the power of God (and that in the very words of this text) is frequently made use of in Scripture, to excite hope and assurance, chap. iv. 21; xiv. 4; 2 Cor. ix. 8; 2 Tim. i. 12; Heb. ii. 18; xi. 19.

24 For if thou wert cut out of the olive tree which is wild by nature, and wert grafted contrary to nature into a good olive tree: how much more shall these, which be the natural branches, be grafted into their own olive tree?

He here shows the probability, as well as possibility, of the Jews' conversion, because God hath done that which is more unlikely: q. d. If the Gentiles, which were a kind of wild olive branches, were grafted into a good olive tree, the church of God, which is contrary to nature, seeing men use to graft a good scion into a wild stock, (as an apple into a crab,) and not a wild scion into a good stock; how much more shall the Jews, which are the natural branches, yea, branches of that olive tree into which the Gentiles are now ingrafted, be grafted into their own olive tree, to which formerly they did belong! according to the custom of grafting which was common amongst them, to graft one tree upon another of the same kind; and grounded on Lev. xix. 19.

25 For I would not, brethren, that ye should be ignorant of this mystery, lest ye should be wise in your own conceits; that blindness in part is happened to Israel, until the fulness of the Gentiles be come in.

b ch. 12. 16.

2 Cor. 3. 14.
1. Or.
2. blindness.
d Luke 21.

Here he shows there is not only a possibility and probability, but a certainty of the Jews' conversion and calling. This he calleth a mystery, or a secret; though it was revealed in the Scripture, (as you will hear,) yet it was not understood; nay, the manner, the number, and the time of their conversion, is still concealed and hid from us. The calling of the Gentiles was a mystery, and a great secret; see Eph. iii. 3; and so is the calling and restoration of the Jews. There are three particulars of this mystery, which he makes known to the Gentiles (and he doth it the rather, lest they should swell with a high conceit of themselves, and proudly despise the Jews): two of them are in this verse; and the first is, that blindness is happened to Israel in part only; i. e. they were not all blinded or hardened; or this blindness should not last always, but for a time. The latter sense agrees best with the word mystery; for it was no secret that some of the Jews believed; this was told them before, ver. 2, 5, 7. Secondly, another part of this mystery was, that this blindness of the Jews should continue till the fulness of the Gentiles came in. By fulness here, (as in ver. 12.) understand a great number or multitude of the Gentiles; greater, by far, than was in the apostles' days. There is another exposition of this clause, which I submit to consideration: by the Gentiles, here, you may understand the Romans, or the Roman monarchy and power; (see Acts iv. 27; xxi. 11;) and by the coming in of their fulness may be understood, the full time of their reign and continuance; after which their ruin follows. And so here is foretold the time of the calling of the Jews, which will be soon after the destruction of antichrist and the Roman monarchy. Query, Whether this doth not agree with the prediction of our Saviour? Luke xxi. 24.

26 And so all Israel shall be saved: as it is written, There shall come out of Zion the Deliverer, and shall turn away ungodliness from Jacob:

See Ps. 14. 7.

Here is a third and chief part of the aforementioned mystery, that in the end, all Israel shall be saved. By Israel is not meant the whole church of God, consisting of Jews and Gentiles; so that word is used, Gal. vi. 16, and elsewhere; for then, what he spake would have been no mystery at all: but by Israel here (as in the precedent verse) you must understand, the nation and people of the Jews. And by all Israel is not meant every individual Israelite, but many, or (it may be) the greatest part of them. So all is to be taken in Scripture: see John vi. 45; 1 Tim. ii. 6, and elsewhere. Look, as when he speaks of the conversion of the Gentiles, and the coming in of their fulness, there are many (too many of them) still unconverted; so, notwithstanding the general calling of the Jews, a great many of them may remain uncalled. As it is written; the apostle had this by revelation, but he proves it also by Scripture.

All are not agreed from whence these testimonies are taken; the former is found (with some little variation) in Isa. lix. 20: as for the latter, some think it is taken from Jer. xxxi. 33. Others think, that he joineth two places in Isaiah together, (as he did before, ver. 8,) and the last words are taken out of Isa. xxvii. 9. The Seventy have the very words used by the apostle. These prophecies and promises, though they were in part fulfilled when Christ came in the flesh, (see Acts iii. 26,) yet there will be a more full and complete accomplishment thereof upon the Jewish nation and people towards the end of the world.

f Isa. 27. 9.
Jer. 31. 31.
&c. Heb. 8.

27 For this is my covenant unto them, when I shall take away their sins.

28 As concerning the Gospel, they are enemies for your sakes: but as touching the election, they are beloved for the fathers' sakes.

Here an objection is obviated: the Gentiles might object and say, The Jews can never return and be saved, forasmuch as they have rejected the gospel, and are therefore hated of God. To this he answers by way of concession, that it was true indeed, they had rejected the gospel, and for this they were rejected and hated of God; but this happened well to the Gentiles, and was to their advantage, for the Jews' refusal of the gospel brought it sooner to them: see ver. 11. Or else the meaning is, They are enemies of God, and of his gospel; and the rather reject it, because you Gentiles embrace it; they think the worse of the gospel because you believe and profess it. Then he adds by way of correction, that they were not yet in such desperate circumstances; but in regard of election, they are beloved for the fathers' sakes. By election he means, either God's choosing them to eternal life; or rather, his choosing that nation and people, above all other nations and people of the world, to be his peculiar people: see Deut. vii. 6; Psal. cxxxv. 4; Acts xiii. 46. And by God's love to them, he means his love of good will which he had to that people still, for their fathers' sakes: not because of the merit of their fathers, but because of the covenant made with their fathers; because they are descended of those fathers, to whom God had promised, that he would be their God, and the God of their seed after them; yea, and of their seed's seed for ever; which promises of God, the infidelity of many of them cannot wholly frustrate.

29 For the gifts and calling of God are without repentance.

These words, considered simply and abstractedly, afford this truth; That the special gifts of God, his election, justification, adoption, and in particular effectual calling, are irrevocable. God never repents of giving, nor we of receiving them. It is otherwise with common gifts and graces, 1 Sam. xv. 11. But if you consider these words relatively, as you respect what went before, the sense seems to be this; That the gifts and calling of God, whereby he was pleased to adopt the posterity of Abraham, and to engage himself by covenant to them, are inviolable, and are such as shall never be reversed or repented of.

Col. 3. 7.

30 For as ye are believed God, yet have now obtained mercy through their unbelief:

31 Even so have these also now not believed, that through your mercy they also may obtain mercy.

This is the last argument, to prove the conversion and calling of the Jews, which is further confirmed, ver. 32. The argument is taken from the like dealing of God with the Gentiles; after a long time of infidelity, he received them to mercy; therefore he will also at last receive the Jews. He argues from the less to the greater; If the infidelity of the Jews was the occasion of mercy to the Gentiles, much more shall the mercy showed to the Gentiles be an occasion of showing mercy to the Jews: q. d. There is more force in that which is good, to produce a good effect, than in that which is evil, to have a good event: therefore, if the unbelief of the Jews had so good an event, as to occasion the conversion of the Gentiles, why may we not think, that the calling of the Gentiles will contribute to the conversion of the Jews? see ver. 11, 14. When the Jews shall see the Gentiles' mercy, i. e. God's mercy to them; how the whole world flourisheth under the profession of Christianity; how the Messias is in vain expected by them; how their nation is dispersed, &c.; then they shall at last come in and cleave to Christ, and be mercifully received by him.

32 For God hath concluded them all in unbelief, that he might have mercy upon all.

q. d. God hath, in just judgment, shut up both Jews and Gentiles, equally and successively, in unbelief, as in a prison, that so, in his own time, he might fulfil the counsel of his will, in showing undeserved mercy unto all; i. e. unto both Jews and Gentiles; first the Jews, and then the Gentiles; and then at last, both to Jews and Gentiles. By all here he means, those that shall believe, whether of one sort or of the other, as appears from that parallel place, Gal. iii. 22. Luther, in a very great conflict, had much support from this text.

33 O the depth of the riches both of the wisdom and knowledge of God! how unsearchable are his judgments, and his ways past finding out!

In this and the following verses is the conclusion of all that he had delivered, especially in this and the two preceding chapters. He had spoken of many profound mysteries, and answered many critical questions; and here he makes a pause, and falls into an admiration of God, his abundant wisdom and knowledge. He seems here to be like a man that wades into the waters, till he begins to feel no bottom, and then he cries out, Oh the depth! and goes no farther. Oh the depth of the riches both of the wisdom and knowledge of God! i. e. the unmeasurable, inconceivable abundance of his wisdom and knowledge. Some distinguish these two; others take them for the same: see Col. ii. 3. How unsearchable are his judgments, and his ways past finding out! Some distinguish betwixt the judgments and ways of God; by the former, understanding his decrees and purposes concerning nations or persons; by the latter, the methods of his providence in his dealings with them: others think the same thing is meant, by an ingeneration, which is familiar amongst the Hebrews. He says of God's judgments, that they are unsearchable; therefore not to be complained of, censured, or to be narrowly pried into; and of his ways, that they are past finding out; the same in sense with unsearchable: it is a metaphor from hounds, that have no footstep or scent of the game which they pursue: nor can men trace the Lord, or find out the reason of his doings; as none can line out the way of a ship in the sea, or an eagle in the air, &c. Some restrain the sense to the ways of God in disposing and ordering the election and rejection of men.

34 For who hath known the mind of the Lord? or who hath been his counsellor?

i. e. Who knoweth what God is about to do? or who hath given his advice about the doing of it? This is taken out of Isa. xl. 13, 14.

35 Or who hath first given to him, and it shall be recompensed unto him again?

q. d. If any man hath obliged God, by any thing he hath done for him, he shall have an ample reward: alluding (as some think) to Job xli. 11. But seeing this cannot be, and that God is indebted unto none, therefore the salvation of all is of mere grace and mercy; and there is no cause of complaining, if he deal more bountifully with some than with others.

36 For of him, and through him, and to him, are all things: to whom be glory for ever. Amen.

For of him, and through him, and to him, are all things; i. e. all things are of him, as the efficient cause; through him, as the disposing cause; to him, as the final cause. They are of him, without any other motive; through him, without any assistance; and to him, without any other end, i. e. for his sake alone. To whom be glory for ever. amen: a usual doxology in Scripture: see Gal. i. 5; 2 Tim. iv. 18; Heb. xiii. 21; 1 Pet. v. 11.

CHAP. XII

Paul exhorteth to holiness and conformity to God's will; and to think soberly of the gifts allotted every man respectively, 1—3. We are all members of one body in Christ, 4, 5; and should diligently exercise our several gifts for the common benefit, 6—8. Sundry practical duties recommended, 9—18. Revenge is specially forbidden, and to do good for evil enjoined, 19—21.

a 2 Cor. 10. 1. I <sup>a</sup> BESEECH you therefore, brethren, by the mercies of God, <sup>b</sup> that ye <sup>c</sup> present your bodies <sup>d</sup> a living sacrifice, holy, acceptable unto God, which is your reasonable service.

Hitherto the apostle hath discoursed of matters of faith; in this and the following chapters he sets down precepts of holy life. By the mercies of God: he useth the word in the plural number, to amplify and set forth the manifold mercies of God, in election, justification, adoption, &c.: q. d. Seeing you Gentiles have received so many and so great mercies from God; seeing he hath preferred you to his ancient people the Jews, and hath chosen and called you, when he hath rejected them; as you value these mercies, let the consideration of them engage you to all manner of holiness and new obedience. That ye present; that you give, dedicate, and offer up, as spiritual priests. Your bodies; yourselves, or, your whole man; a part is put for the whole; the body is named, because it is the soul's instrument in the service of God. A living sacrifice; the sacrifices of old were presented alive to God, and their blood was shed at the feet of the altar: a beast that died of itself, or was torn by wild beasts, was not so much as to be eaten, Exod. xxii 31; Lev. xxiii. 8. Conformable hereunto, God will have us offer up ourselves a living sacrifice; i. e. we must be quickened and alive to God, and not dead in sins and trespasses. Holy; as the sacrifices under the law were to be without blemish or defect, Exod. xii. 5; Lev. i. 10; Deut. xv. 21. Acceptable unto God; or, well-pleasing unto God. So were the appointed sacrifices under the law, Lev. i. 9; so was the sacrifice of Christ the Lamb of God, Eph. v. 2; and so are all spiritual sacrifices under the gospel, Phil. iv. 18; Heb. xiii. 16. Which is your reasonable service; or, which is agreeable to reason; nothing is more reasonable, than that you should devote yourselves to God in this manner. Some think this is added, to show a difference between the sacrifice here required, and that of the Jews, which was of unreasonable beasts. Others, by reasonable service, understand spiritual service, and expound this place by 1 Pet. ii. 5, where you read of spiritual sacrifices acceptable to God by Jesus Christ. Others think, that by reasonable you must understand such service as is according to the word of God; and this suits best with the Greek phrase in the text, λογικὴ λατρεία. The same word is used, 1 Pet. ii. 2, and there it is rendered the milk of the word, and not reasonable milk. And so the service or worship here spoken of is opposed to that will worship, of which you read in Col. ii. 23.

2 And <sup>a</sup> be not conformed to this world: but <sup>b</sup> be ye transformed by the renewing of your mind, that ye may <sup>c</sup> prove what <sup>d</sup> is that good, and acceptable, and perfect, will of God.

Be not conformed to this world; do not fashion or accommodate yourselves to the corrupt principles, customs, or courses of worldly and wicked men; and what they are, you will find in chap. xiii. 13; Eph. iv. 18, 19; 1 Pet. iv. 3. You have somewhat the like counsel, Exod. xxiii. 2; 1 Pet. i. 14. Be ye transformed by the renewing of your mind: q. d. Be you regenerated, and changed in your whole man; beginning at the mind, by which the Spirit of God worketh upon the inferior faculties of the soul: see Eph. iv. 23. That ye may prove what is that good, and acceptable, and perfect, will of God: by prove, understand discerning: by the will of God, his revealed will in his word; and so it best accords with the reasonable service, spoken of ver. 1, and with the scope of the text itself; which is, to exhort unto holiness and obedience, which is according to the rule of the word. He annexeth three adjuncts to the will or word of God: it is good; revealed only for our benefit. It is acceptable; i. e. by obedience thereunto we shall be accepted. It is perfect, and the observance thereof will make us so too, 2 Tim. iii. 17. There are different readings of these words, but all to the same sense. Some thus, that you may prove the will of God, which to do, is good, acceptable, and perfect. Others thus, that you may prove what the will of God is, and what is good, acceptable, and perfect.

3 For I say, <sup>a</sup> through the grace given unto me, to every man that is among you, <sup>b</sup> not to think of himself more highly than he ought to think; but to think <sup>c</sup> soberly, according as God hath dealt <sup>d</sup> to every man the measure of faith.

Before he exhorted to a holy life in general, now he comes to more particular exhortations. I say; i. e. I enjoin and command; see Gal. v. 16. I do not only beseech you, as ver. 1, but I also require you, as one that hath authority. Through the grace given unto me: see on chap. i. 5. To every man that is among you; more particularly, to him that hath any particular gift or office in the church. Not to think of himself more highly than he ought to think; i. e. not to be drunk with a proud and overweening conceit of himself, his own wisdom, ability, &c. But to think soberly, or modestly; let him contain himself within bounds, and not take upon him what doth not belong to him; let him not contemn others, and pretend to more than he hath. There is an elegant paronomasia in the Greek, which our language cannot reach. According as God hath dealt to every man the measure of faith: faith here is put for the knowledge of God and Christ, and all other spiritual gifts and graces bestowed upon the faithful; these are called faith, because they are given with faith, and exercised by faith: of these, God deals to every man his measure or portion; not all gifts to one, nor the same gift to every one in the same measure or proportion: see ver. 6; Eph. iv. 7.

4 For <sup>a</sup> as we have many members in one body, and all members have not the <sup>b</sup> same office:

5 So <sup>a</sup> we, being many, are one body in Christ, and every one members one of another.

These verses are a reason against arrogancy. All Christians are members of one and the same body; therefore, they should not pride themselves in their gifts, but employ them for the common good. It is with the church, the mystical body of Christ, as with a natural body that hath many members, and all these have not the same office, or the same action or operation (as the word signifieth); the eye hath one office, the ear another, the hand a third, &c. So the church of Christ, though one body in him who is the Head, hath many members; many in regard of their persons, and many in regard of their offices, which are various and diverse; and which is more, the members are every one members one of another; i. e. they are joint and fellow members; as they have a common relation to the same Head, so a mutual relation to one another. Therefore Christians, especially church officers, should not contemn one another, or intrude upon the office of each other; but all should use their gifts to the good and edification of others.

6 <sup>a</sup> Having then gifts differing <sup>b</sup> according to the grace that is given to us, whether <sup>c</sup> prophecy, let us prophecy according to the proportion of faith;

Having then gifts differing according to the grace that is given to us; or, seeing we have different gifts and offices, according as the grace of God hath bestowed them upon us, let us use them aright. This is added to prevent pride and envy: none should be proud of that he hath himself, or envy what another hath, seeing all is of grace. Whether prophecy, let us prophesy; the words, let us prophesy, are not in the text; but they are put in by our translators, to fill up the sense. There is an ellipsis in the words, and something must be inserted. Some make the supply from the last words in the foregoing verse, Let us be one another's members in prophesying, teaching, exhorting, &c. Others think it ought to be supplied out of ver. 3: q. d. Whether we have prophecy, let us be wise unto sobriety in prophesying; and so in all the rest that follow: in all the several gifts and offices, he showeth how they should behave themselves. The Greek scholiast will have supplied in them all, let us persevere. By prophesying, in this place, you may understand an extraordinary gift that some had in understanding Divine mysteries and Old Testament prophecies, with a wonderful dexterity in applying the same; to which was joined sometimes the revelation of secret and future things: see Acts xi. 27; xxi. 9. According to the proportion of faith; i. e. they that have this gift of prophesying, must exercise it according to the measure of knowledge, in heavenly mysteries, that God hath given them; or else, in their prophesying they must have regard to the articles of Christian faith, and see that they regulate themselves according thereunto. Some think he calls the Holy Scripture in general, an analogy or proportion of faith; by these, the false prophets of old were discerned, if they delivered any thing contrary thereunto, Deut. xiii. 1, &c. Others think he speaks of certain principles, or heads of Christian religion, (see Heb. vi. 1,) from which the prophets and others were not to swerve; yea, some think he aims at the symbol and creed, called the Apostles', which, from the beginning, was called the analogy of faith.

7 Or ministry, let us wait on our ministering: or <sup>a</sup> he that teacheth, on <sup>b</sup> teaching;

Ministry; under this word are comprehended all ordinary ecclesiastical functions, which afterwards divideth into two sorts; the first relating to the word; the second, to other pious works. Let us wait on our ministering: the words, let us wait, are not in the text, but fitly supplied: q. d. Let all that be called to the office of the ministry be diligent in it, and attend to it: see Acts xx. 28; 1 Pet. v. 2. Teaching, in the latter end of this verse, and exhortation, in the beginning of the next, are mentioned as the two great works of those that minister and labour in the word and doctrine. Some think they are distinct offices; see Eph. iv. 11; and that in the primitive church, where they had variety of ministers, some had the office of teachers, and chiefly exercised themselves in instructing their hearers in the principles of religion, in laying down sound doctrine and confuting of errors: others had the office of pastors, and attended chiefly to exhortation and admonition; pressing points of practice, and making application thereof. Others think that they are distinct gifts, but not diverse offices; some have a gift to teach, that have none to exhort, and e contra. The apostle, ver. 6, calls them differing gifts: sometimes these two are found in the same persons, and they are excellently gifted both for teaching and exhorting.

8 Or 'he that exhorteth, on exhortation: 'he that || giveth, let him do it || with simplicity; 'he that ruleth, with diligence; he that sheweth mercy, "with cheerfulness.

Exhortation: see the notes on the foregoing verse. He that giveth, let him do it with simplicity; i. e. he that hath the office of collecting and distributing the church alms, (which was the deacons' work or charge, Acts vi. 1, &c.) let him discharge it with simplicity, or with singleness of heart; (so the word is rendered, Eph. vi. 5;) let him do it faithfully and impartially, and without favour or affection. He that ruleth; or he that is a president, and set over others. There is great difference amongst expositors, who is meant by this ruler. It is not meant of state rulers, (of them he treats in the next chapter,) but of church rulers. Some understand, all church officers in general. Others think, such are meant as were not properly pastors and teachers, but together with them had the oversight of the church, to rule the same; to regulate misdemeanors, to pacify differences, to administer discipline in admonition and censures; these they call seniors or elders, or the censors of manners; and are the same the apostle calls governments, or governors, 1 Cor. xii. 28; see 1 Tim. v. 17. He that sheweth mercy, with cheerfulness: some understand this generally of all Christians, that they should be charitable, and that with cheerfulness. But the apostle is yet speaking of the special offices of the church. It cannot be meant of deacons, forasmuch as he had spoken of them before in this very verse. Such therefore may be intended, as had the care assigned them of the sick and impotent, of prisoners and strangers, &c.; see 1 Tim. v. 10; the same, it may be, that he calleth helps in 1 Cor. xii. 28. This charge he directeth them to discharge with cheerfulness; without being weary of that troublesome work, or being sour and froward to those they had to do with.

Abhor that which is evil; cleave to that which is good.

The former exhortations respect church officers in particular; those that follow concern all Christians in general. He begins with love, because that is a radical grace; other graces, and gracious actions, do spring from it, and must be accompanied with it. By love here, you may understand the love of God, or of our neighbour: the latter seems chiefly to be intended. The great requisite in love is this, that it be without dissimulation, or (as the word is) without hypocrisy; i. e. that it be sincere and unfeigned, 2 Cor. vi. 6; 1 Pet. i. 22. It must not be in word and in tongue only, but in deed and in truth, 1 John iii. 18. Abhor that which is evil; do not only avoid it, but hate it, and that as hell itself. The simple verb imports extreme detestation, and it is aggravated by the composition: see Psal. cxix. 104; Amos v. 15. Cleave to that which is good; be glued to it; so the word signifieth. Things that are glued together are hardly disjoined. The same word is used of the union and conjunction between man and wife: see Matt. xix. 5; Eph. v. 31.

10 * Be kindly affectioned one to another || with brotherly love; * in honour preferring one another;

Be kindly affectioned one to another; Christians ought to have such affection one to another, as parents have to their children, and as all creatures have to their young: so much the word here used imports. In honour preferring one another: this clause is expounded by Phil. ii. 3. It is exemplified in Abraham, Gen. xiii. 9. Most desire preference and honour before others, which is contrary to the good counsel in this text. Some read it, prevent one another; do not tarry till others honour you, but do you go before them in this expression of brotherly love, and be examples to them.

11 Not slothful in business; fervent in spirit; serving the Lord;

Not slothful in business; this clause may be expounded by Eccles. ix. 10: q. d. In all the duties of thy particular and general calling, in every thing that respects the glory of God, thine own or neighbours' good, take heed of slothfulness: see Matt. xxv. 26, 27; Heb. vi. 12. Fervent in spirit; this is added to the former, as the cure of it. Zeal and fervency will drive away sloth. This spiritual warmth is often recommended to us in Scripture; see Gal. iv. 18; Rev. iii. 19. See examples of it in Psal. lxxix. 9; John ii. 17; iv. 34; Acts xviii. 25. Serving the Lord; i. e. diligently performing all things that are required to his service and honour: see Psal. ii. 11; Eph. vi. 7. Some copies read it, serving the times, in such a sense as it is in Eph. v. 16, and Col. iv. 5.

Rejoicing in hope; i. e. in hope of deliverance here in due time, and of eternal salvation hereafter: see on chap. v. 2. Continuing instant in prayer; be instant and constant in the duty. A metaphor from hounds, that give not over the game till they have got it: see Luke xviii. 1; Eph. vi. 18; Col. iv. 2; 1 Thess. v. 17.

Necessity; the word signifieth uses. The saints must be succoured in things useful, as well as necessary. This apostle, in his Second Epistle to the Corinthians, spends two whole chapters about this sort of charity, in relieving the poor saints; viz. the 8th and 9th chapters: see also Gal. vi. 10; Heb. xiii. 16. Given to hospitality; or, as the word may be rendered, pursue hospitality; hunt after it, as Abraham and Lot did, Gen. xviii. 1, 2; xix. 1, 2. Concerning this duty of accommodating strangers, (which is here meant by hospitality,) see Deut. x. 18, 19; Isa. lviii. 7; 1 Tim. iii. 2; Tit. i. 8; Heb. xiii. 2; 1 Pet. iv. 9.

Bless them which persecute you; i. e. pray for them, and wish well to them. This is borrowed from Matt. v. 44; Luke vi. 28: see the like in 1 Pet. iii. 9. This is commended to us by the example of Christ himself, Isa. liii. 12; Luke xxiii. 34; 1 Pet. ii. 23; of Stephen, Acts vii. 60; of Paul, and the primitive Christians, 1 Cor. iv. 12. Bless, and curse not: his doubling the exhortation shows the difficulty of the duty; it is contrary to corrupt nature: and it denotes the constancy of it; we must persevere therein. When he saith, curse not, he means, wish no evil to your enemies. Object. The prophets and apostles went contrary to this: see 2 Kings ii. 24; Psal. lxxix. 22, 23; Acts viii. 20; xiii. 10, 11; xxiii. 3. Answer. These did it by a special vocation and instinct of the Spirit.

i. e. Be touched with your neighbour's good or evil, as if it were your own. The reason of this sympathy, or fellow feeling, is rendered by the apostle, 1 Cor. xii. 26, 27; Because we are members one of another, therefore, if one member suffer, all the members suffer with it; and if one member be honoured, all the members rejoice with it. Examples hereof we have in Luke i. 58; 2 Cor. xi. 29: see Heb. xiii. 3.

Be of the same mind one toward another: this exhortation respects not so much unity in judgment, as in affection: q. d. Bear the same good respect to others, as others bear to thee; let there be a mutual agreement in your desires and good wishes one for another: see chap. xv. 5; Phil. ii. 2; 1 Pet. iii. 8. Mind not high things; i. e. things above your capacities and callings. Take heed of ambitious aspirations: remember what David said (one every way above you) in Psal. cxxxi. 1. Condescend to men of low estate: the word low only is in the Greek; the other words are put in by our translators: and it may be referred, either to things, and so it answers to high things, in the foregoing clause; or it may be referred to persons, according to our translation; and then the sense is, that we should not despise our poor brethren, but stoop to the lowest offices of Christian kindness. Be not wise in your own conceits; this seems to be taken from Prov. iii. 7: see ver. 3.

Repentance to no man evil for evil; our Saviour teacheth the same doctrine in other words, Matt. v. 39, 40: see parallel places in Prov. xx. 22; 1 Thess. v. 15; 1 Pet. iii. 9. See more against retaliating injuries and private revenge in the three last verses of this chapter. Revenge is so sweet to flesh and blood, that men are very hardly dissuaded from it. Provide things honest in the sight of all men: q. d. Look carefully, as to your conscience before God, so to your honour and reputation with men. Let all your words and actions be justifiable, and unexceptionable, that evil men may have no occasion to reproach you as evil-doers. See a parallel place, 2 Cor. viii. 21. See also Phil. iv. 8; 1 Pet. iii. 16.

18 If it be possible, as much as lieth in you, <sup>a</sup> live peaceably with all men.

The duty to which he exhorts in this verse, is a peaceable and quiet behaviour towards all men, as well infidels as Christians; those who are bad, as well as those who are good. The like exhortations we have, Heb. xii. 14. And to the discharge of this duty he annexeth a double limitation; first, If it be possible; secondly, As much as lieth in you: q. d. It may so fall out, that some men are of such froward and unpeaceable tempers, that it is impossible to live peaceably with them, or by them: or such conditions of peace may be offered as are not lawful for you to accept; it will not stand with the truth and glory of God, and with a good conscience, to agree with them. But, however, do your part, let there be no default in you why you should not live in peace with all men whatsoever.

19 Dearly beloved, <sup>a</sup> avenge not yourselves, but rather give place unto wrath: for it is written, <sup>b</sup> Vengeance is mine; I will repay, saith the Lord.

Dearly beloved; he useth this friendly compellation, the better to persuade to the following duty, which is so hard to flesh and blood. Avenge not yourselves: you had an exhortation to this purpose, ver. 17; but considering the proneness of corrupt nature to private and personal revenge, he renews his exhortation, and enlargeth upon it. This seems to be borrowed from Lev. xix. 18. But rather give place unto wrath; i. e. say some, your own wrath: q. d. Be not angry, or suffer not your anger to hurry you to revenge; give way a little, and walk aside, as Ahasuerus did, when his wrath kindled against Haman. Others refer it to the wrath of those who wrong us; decline their wrath, as David did Saul's; put up wrongs and injuries. But it is better referred to the wrath of God, which they seem to prevent who seek revenge: q. d. Suffer God to vindicate and right you, to avenge you of your adversaries; commit your cause to him, and do not take his work out of his hand. This sense agrees well with what follows. For it is written; viz. in Deut. xxxii. 35. This is cited also, Psal. xciv. 1; Nahum i. 2; Heb. x. 30.

20 <sup>a</sup> Therefore if thine enemy hunger, feed him; if he thirst, give him drink: for in so doing thou shalt heap coals of fire on his head.

If thine enemy hunger, feed him; if he thirst, give him drink: q. d. Instead of rendering evil for evil to thine adversary, do him good for evil: see following verse. Thou shalt heap coals of fire on his head; i. e. either make him relent, or bring down the greater vengeance from God upon him. This is taken out of Prov. xxv. 21, 22; see the notes there.

21 Be not overcome of evil, but overcome evil with good.

This verse is a Divine aphorism: therein the apostle anticipates an objection. Some might be ready to say, If we should follow this advice we should be counted cowards and dastards, &c. To this he answers, that it is the ready way to be triumphers and conquerors. By evil, here, he means, the wrongs and injuries of men; and to be overcome of evil, is to be moved and provoked thereby to impatience or malice. When it is thus with a man, he is overcome, or conquered: in revenge of injuries, he is a loser that gets the better. Therefore he exhorts us, rather to overcome evil with good; that is a noble victory indeed: this is the way, not to be even with him that wrongs us, but to be above him. Thus David overcame Saul, and Elisha the bands of Syria. This is the way to overcome ourselves, and our adversaries too: ourselves, in denying our lusts that egg us on to revenge; our adversaries, in winning them to relent and acknowledge their miscarriages.

LET every soul <sup>a</sup> be subject unto the higher powers. For <sup>b</sup> there is no power but of God: the powers that be are <sup>c</sup> ordained of God.

The former chapter is called by some St. Paul's ethics, and this his politics. He having said, in the latter end of the foregoing chapter, that Christians must not avenge themselves, but refer all to God, who says, that vengeance is his, and he will repay it; some might infer from hence, that it was not lawful for magistrates to right the wronged, and avenge them of their adversaries; or for Christians to make use of them to such a purpose; therefore, to set us right in this matter, he falls into the following discourse. Others think, that the apostle having spoken in several places concerning Christians' liberty, lest what he had said should be misconstrued, as if he meant that Christians were freed from subjection to the powers that were over them, he seasonably insists upon the doctrine and duty of obedience to authority; which point is more fully handled in this context than in any other place besides.

Let every soul; i. e. every person. In the first verse of the foregoing chapter the body was put for the whole man; here, the soul; and when he says every person, it is plain that ecclesiastical persons are not exempted. Be subject: he doth not say, be obedient, but be subject; which is a general word, (as some have noted,) comprehending all other duties and services. This subjection must be limited only to lawful things; otherwise, we must answer as they did, Acts iv. 19: or as Polycarpus did; when he was required to blaspheme Christ, and swear by the fortune of Cæsar, he peremptorily refused, and said, We are taught to give honour to princes and potentates, but such honour as is not contrary to true religion. Unto the higher powers: though he speaks of things, he means persons; and he calls them rulers in the 3rd verse, whom he calls powers in this verse. So in Luke xii. 11, Christ tells his disciples, they should be brought before magistrates and powers; it is the same word, and it is plain he means persons in power. Chrysostom notes, that he rather speaks of our subjection to powers, than persons in power; because, that howsoever their power be abused, their authority must be acknowledged and obeyed. He speaks of powers, in the plural number, because there are divers sorts and kinds thereof, as monarchy, aristocracy, democracy: under which soever of these we live, we must be subject thereunto. By higher powers, he means the supreme powers; so the word is rendered, 1 Pet. ii. 13. To them, and to those that are authorized by them, we must submit, for that is all one as if we did it to themselves, 1 Tim. ii. 2; 1 Pet. ii. 14. There are other inferior powers, which are also of God, as parents, masters, &c.; but of these he doth not speak in this place. For there is no power but of God: this is a reason of the foregoing injunction: q. d. That which hath God for its author, is to be acknowledged and submitted to; but magistracy hath God for its author: ergo. He speaketh not here of the person, nor of the abuse, nor of the manner of getting into power, but of the thing itself, viz. magistracy and authority: and he says, it is of God; he instituted the office, and he appointeth or permiteth the person that executes it. This clause is attested and illustrated by Prov. viii. 15; Dan. iv. 32; John xix. 11. The powers that be are ordained of God: this passage is an exemplification of the former. Erasmus thinks it was inserted by some interpreter, by way of explanation; but it is found in all ancient copies, therefore that conceit of his is without foundation. The emphasis of this sentence seems to lie in the word ordained; power and civil authority is not simply from God, as all other things are, but it is ordained by him. This word (as one observes) implieth two things; invention, and ratification. God invented and devised this order, that some should rule, and others obey; and he maintaineth and upholdeth it.

c Tit. 2. 1. 2 Whosoever therefore resisteth <sup>e</sup> the power, resisteth the ordinance of God:

and they that resist shall receive to themselves damnation.

Whosoever therefore resisteth the power, resisteth the ordinance of God: these words are, either an argument to enforce the subjection enjoined in the former part of the foregoing verse; q. d. You may not resist; therefore, you must be subject: or else, they are an inference from the latter part of it; q. d. Seeing the civil power is of God, and of his ordination; therefore, it must not be resisted or opposed. To resist authority, is to wage war against God himself. Damnation; the word properly signifieth judgment, and it is applied in Scripture, either to human and temporal punishment, as Luke xxiii. 40; 1 Cor. vi. 7; 1 Pet. iv. 17; or else to Divine and eternal punishment, as Luke xx. 47; Heb. vi. 2; 2 Pet. ii. 3. Accordingly, it may be understood of eternal punishment, that the resister of authority shall receive from God; or of temporal punishment, that he shall receive from the magistrate.

3 For rulers are not a terror to good works, but to the evil. Wilt thou then not be afraid of the power? <sup>d</sup> do that which is good, and thou shalt have praise of the same: <sup>d 1 Pet. 2. 14. & 3. 13</sup>

This verse contains a further argument for subjection to the higher powers, and it is taken from the benefit thereof, or from the end of magistracy, which is for the punishment of evil, and the encouragement of good works: see 1 Pet. ii. 14. When he says, that rulers are not a terror to good works, he means, they are not so ordinarily; or they were not ordained for that end, but the contrary. Or else, by are not understand they ought not so to be. Wilt thou then not be afraid of the power? do that which is good, and thou shalt have praise of the same: q. d. Wouldst thou be free from fear of being punished by the magistrate? do that which is good, and thou shalt not only be free from fear, but sure of praise and reward: see Prov. xiv. 35; xvi. 13. By good he means, not that which is so theologically, but morally: q. d. Live honestly, hurt no man in word or deed, give to every man his due, &c. This is good in the sight of all men, of heathens themselves.

4 For he is the minister of God to thee for good. But if thou do that which is evil, be afraid; for he beareth not the sword in vain: for he is the minister of God, a revenger to execute wrath upon him that doeth evil.

For he is the minister of God to thee for good: q. d. That is the end of his office, and for this reason God hath invested him with his authority. The Scripture applieth the same title to him that preacheth the word, and to him that beareth the sword; both are God's ministers, and there is one common end of their ministry, which is the good and welfare of mankind. But if thou do that which is evil, be afraid; for he beareth not the sword in vain: this is the reason why he that transgresseth the moral law of God, or the wholesome laws of the country where he lives, should be afraid of the magistrate, because he beareth not the sword in vain. The sword is figuratively put for power and authority: he alludes to the custom of princes, who had certain officers going before them, bearing the ensigns of their authority: q. d. The magistrate hath not his authority for nothing, or for no purpose; but that he may punish the evil, as well as defend the good. For he is the minister of God, a revenger to execute wrath upon him that doeth evil: here is another reason why evil-doers (as before) should be afraid of the magistrate; or rather, the same reason in other and plainer words; because he is God's officer to execute wrath upon him that doeth evil; he is in God's room upon earth, and doth the work which primarily belongeth unto him: see chap. xii. 19. By wrath, here, understand punishment: so in Luke xxi. 23; chap. ii. 8. The word execute is not in the text, but aptly enough supplied by our translators.

5 Wherefore <sup>e</sup> ye must needs be subject, not only for wrath, <sup>f</sup> but also for conscience sake.

q. d. Seeing things are so as I have said; that magistracy is of God, that it is his ordination, that it is for the benefit of mankind, and that it is armed with the sword; therefore there is a necessity of subjection, and that for a double reason: first, from fear of wrath, or punishment from the magistrate. Secondly, and more especially, from the obligation of conscience, because God hath so commanded; and to err in this particular, is to offend God, and to wound our own consciences: see 1 Sam. xxiv. 5; Eccles. viii. 2; 1 Pet. ii. 13.

6 For for this cause pay ye tribute also: for they are God's ministers, attending continually upon this very thing.

For this cause, i. e. in token, or in testimony, of that subjection you owe to magistracy, pay ye tribute: the word is plural in the original, and thereby is intended all taxes and burdens, which are legally and customarily imposed. For they are God's ministers, attending continually upon this very thing: this is a reason why tribute should be paid to rulers; but it is for the support of their authority, and a due recompense for their great care and industry. When he says, they attend continually upon this very thing, the meaning is not, they attend always upon the receiving of tribute; but it is to be understood of the duty of magistrates, which is, to be continually promoting the good and welfare of their subjects; to encourage the good, and punish the evil-doer, which is the very thing he had been before speaking of.

7 Render therefore to all their dues: tribute to whom tribute is due; custom to whom custom; fear to whom fear; honour to whom honour.

This verse concludes his discourse about the civil powers. When he saith, Render to all their dues, he doth not mean all men, but all magistrates, whatever they be for quality, either good or bad; or whatever they be for degree, either supreme or subordinate. Render to them their dues; i. e. whatever of right belongs to them: see Matt. xxii. 21. There are two things that more especially belong to rulers, and are due from those that are under them: the one is maintenance; the other is reverence. The first is expressed here by tribute and custom; if these two differ, then the former is a tax laid upon the substance, the latter upon the person. The second, by fear and honour; fear notes inward, and honour outward, reverence and respect. Fear is the magistrate's due by reason of his authority; honour, by reason of his dignity.

8 Owe no man any thing, but to love one another: for he that loveth another hath fulfilled the law.

Having treated of special duties belonging to superiors, he now comes to that which is more general, and belongs to all. Owe no man any thing; neither your superiors, nor your equals and inferiors; render and pay to every person what is due to him, let his rank and quality be what it will. But to love one another: q. d. Only there is one debt that you can never fully discharge; that you must be ever paying, yet ever owing; and that is love. For he that loveth another hath fulfilled the law: this is a reason why we should love one another, and be still paying that debt; and it is taken from the excellency of love: he that loveth another (i. e. he that doth it in deed and in truth) hath fulfilled the law; he means, the second table of the law, as the next verse sheweth; he hath done what is required therein.

9 For this, Thou shalt not commit adultery, Thou shalt not kill, Thou shalt not steal, Thou shalt not bear false witness, Thou shalt not covet; and if there be any other commandment, it is briefly comprehended in this saying, namely, Thou shalt love thy neighbour as thyself.

This verse proves, that love is the fulfilling of the law. It is done by an induction or enumeration of the particular precepts of the second table. The fifth is not mentioned, because the Jews made that commandment a part of the first table; so some: or because he had treated before of duty to the higher powers and superiors, under which parents are comprehended; so others. It may be, he would only mention the negative precepts, as being most contrary to love. But, why doth he mention the seventh commandment before the sixth? Because of the commonness of adultery amongst the Romans; so some: because of the odiousness of it; so others. Hence adultery is first named amongst the works of the flesh, Gal. v. 19. Possibly it is, because the Seventy, in Exodus, rehearses the commandments in this very order. The tenth commandment is summed up in one word, Thou shalt not covet; it seems, then, it is but one commandment, and their opinion is ridiculous who divide it into two. When he says, if there be any other commandment? he means a commandment of the same nature, requiring us to pay what we owe one to another; ergo, to honour our parents; or he means, any other in the Scripture, though not expressed in the decalogue. All commandments respecting our neighbour are summed up in this one, Thou shalt love thy neighbour as thyself: see Matt. xxiii. 39; Gal. v. 14; 1 Tim. i. 5.

10 Love worketh no ill to his neighbour: therefore love is the fulfilling of the law.

This verse is an argument to prove what was proposed, ver. 8. It may thus be formed: That which worketh no ill, or doth no hurt to our neighbour, fulfilleth the law: but love worketh no ill to his neighbour; ergo. That this is the property of love, see 1 Cor. xiii. 4, 5. When he saith, Love doth no hurt, this is implied, that it doth good to his neighbour. Where only negatives are mentioned, the affirmative also is included; and the negative only is set down in this place, that it may the better correspond with the foregoing verse.

11 And that, knowing the time, that now it is high time to awake out of sleep: for now is our salvation nearer than when we believed.

And that; or, moreover; the speech is elliptical, something must be understood, as, I say, or add: q. d. Unto this exhortation to Christian love, I further add what followeth. Knowing the time; i. e. considering it is a time of great trial, or time of gospel light. Now it is high time to awake out of sleep; i. e. to shake off slothfulness, security, and all former sinful courses. See the like, 1 Cor. xv. 34; Eph. v. 14; 1 Thess. v. 6—8. q. d. Consider, now it is the hour or season to awake or rise up, to lay aside your night-clothes, as it is in the following verse. Now is our salvation nearer than when we believed; or, salvation is nearer to us than when we first began to believe. Some would understand it of temporal salvation, and deliverance from those persecutions which befell the Christians in the infancy of the church; from these they were saved and delivered by the destruction of the Jews their persecutors. This was foretold by Christ, and expected by the Christians; and it was nigher at hand than when they first embraced the Christian faith. But most understand it of eternal salvation, which he says was nearer than when they first believed. In which words is couched another argument to awaken or stir up the believing Romans; the first was taken from the consideration of the time or season; the second, from the nearness of the word. Therefore it should be with them as with those that run in a race; the nearer they come to the goal, the faster they run, lest others should get before them.

12 The night is far spent, the day is at hand: let us therefore cast off the works of darkness, and let us put on the armour of light.

The night is far spent, the day is at hand: some, by night and day, do understand the night of Jewish persecution and, the day of deliverance and salvation; see Heb. x. 25. Others, by night, understand the time of ignorance and infidelity; this, he says, is far spent, or for the greatest part it is past and gone: darkness is not perfectly done away in this life amongst believers themselves, 1 Cor. xiii. 9, 10. By day, they understand the time of gospel light and saving knowledge: so in the next verse, and in 1 Thess. v. 5. This, he says, is at hand, or is come nigh; it was dawning upon the world, and would shine brighter and brighter, till it were perfect day. Let us therefore cast off the works of darkness; i. e. all our former sins, which are called works of darkness, here, and in Eph. v. 11.

They are so called, because they are usually committed by those that are in ignorance and darkness; and because some sins, such as he speaks of in the next verse, were wont to be committed in the darkness of the night, men being ashamed of them in the day time: see Job xxiv. 15; 1 Thess. v. 7. These he exhorts the believing Romans to cast off: the word implieth, haste and hatred, Isa. xxx. 22; xxxi. 7. And let us put on the armour of light; i. e. all Christian graces, which are bright and shining in the eyes of the world, Matt. v. 16; and which will be as so much Christian armour, to defend us against sin, and all the assaults of Satan.

Let us walk honestly, as in the day: q. d. Let us behave ourselves decently, and with a holy shamefacedness, as becomes those to whom the grace of God, and the glorious light of the gospel, hath appeared. This honest walking is expressed by three adverbs in Tit. ii. 12; i. e. soberly, righteously, godly. He enumerates divers vices, which are contrary to this honest walking, and he sets them down by pairs. He makes three pairs of them: the first is rioting and drunkenness; by which he means intemperance, or excess in eating and drinking: see Luke xxi. 34. The second is chambering and wantonness; by which he means actual uncleanness, and all lustful and lascivious dalliances: see Gal. v. 19; Eph. v. 3; Col. iii. 5; 1 Thess. iv. 3—5, 7; 1 Pet. iv. 3. The third pair is strife and envying. All these vices are twisted and connected: intemperance causeth uncleanness, and both cause contention and emulation, Prov. xxiii. 29, 30. The famous St. Augustine confesseth, that he was converted by reading and pondering this text.

Put ye on the Lord Jesus Christ; he exhorted, ver. 12, to put on the armour of light; now, to put on Jesus Christ. This is necessary, for though grace may help to defend, yet it is Christ and his righteousness only that can cover us (as a garment doth our nakedness) in the sight of God. To put on Christ, is to receive him and rest upon him by faith; as also to profess and imitate him. You have the same phrase, Gal. iii. 27. Make not provision for the flesh, to fulfil the lusts thereof: by flesh, here, some understand the corrupt nature; others, the body. When he says, make not provision for the flesh, he doth not mean, that they should not provide things necessary for the body; this is allowed, Eph. v. 29; 1 Tim. v. 23; we are no where commanded to neglect or macerate our bodies; but he means, that we should not gratify it in its sinful lusts or lustings: see 1 Cor. xi. 27. Sustain it we may, but pamper it we may not: we must not care, cater, or make projects for the flesh, to fulfil its inordinacies and cravings.

CHAP. XIV

Directions to treat a weak brother kindly, and not to despise or censure one another in matters of indifference, 1—6. Christ's right to our best services, whether we live or die, 6—9. We must all be answerable for our respective conduct at his judgment-seat, 10—12. We must be careful not to use our Christian liberty to the hurt or offence of tender consciences, 13—23.

In this chapter and part of the next, the apostle treats of some lesser matters of religion, about which there were great contentions in the church of Rome. Some of the Jews, though they embraced the gospel, did stiffly adhere still to the Mosaic ceremonies; and though a difference in meats and days should be conscientiously observed, yet they were ready to censure those that were contrary-minded, as profane persons, and contemners of the law of God.

On the other side, the believing Gentiles, being better instructed about their Christian liberty, when they saw the Jews insisting upon such things as these, that had never any real goodness in them, and were now abrogated by Christ, they were ready to despise them as ignorant and superstitious, and to deny communion with them. The apostle therefore doth seasonably endeavour to arbitrate this matter, and make peace amongst them.

Him that is weak in the faith; that is, wavering and unsettled in some lesser points of faith, particularly in the doctrine of Christian liberty, and freedom from the ceremonial law: he means, the scrupulous and erroneous Judaizer, though yet, in proportion, it may be applied to other scrupulous and doubting Christians. Receive ye; or, receive him to you, take him into your bosoms, admit him to communion with you, bear with his weakness, better instruct him with the spirit of meekness: see chap. xv. 1; Phil. iii. 15, 16. Bucer received all, though differing from him in some opinions, in whom he found, aliquid Christi, any thing of Christ. But not to doubtful disputations: q. d. Do not entertain him with disputes and vain janglings, which will not edify, but perplex and prejudice him. Do not make him question sick, as it is in 1 Tim. vi. 4. This passage may be expounded by Tit. iii. 9. The marginal reading would make this to be the sense, that a scrupulous Christian should be received unto communion; yet not so as to encourage him to judge and condemn the thoughts of those that differ from him.

One believeth that he may eat all things; i. e. one that is informed aright of his Christian liberty, is fully persuaded, and that upon good grounds, that he may eat any thing that is wholesome, though forbidden by the ceremonial law; that there is now no difference of clean and unclean meats: see Matt. xv. 11; Acts x. 12—15. Another, who is weak, eateth herbs; i. e. he that (as before) is weak in faith, and not so well informed, such a one, for fear of offending God by eating any thing that is forbidden, will rather content himself with the meanest diet. The meaning is not, as if any, in those times, thought it lawful only to eat herbs, and so abstained altogether from other meats; but they would rather satisfy themselves with herbs, and other fruits of the earth, in which the law of Moses made no difference, than eat meats that were forbidden, or not cleansed from blood, or offered to idols, &c.: see Dan. i. 8.

3 Let not him that eateth despise him that eateth not; and <sup>e</sup> let not him which eateth not judge him that eateth: for God hath received him. <sup>e Col. 2. 16.</sup>

Let not him that eateth despise him that eateth not; i. e. Let not him that makes use of his liberty in eating any thing indifferently, vilify or contemn him that is of a contrary mind, as one that is ignorant and over-scrupulous; and let not him that forbears such meats as were of old forbidden, judge and condemn him that is contrary-minded, as profane and over-venturous; notwithstanding such little difference in opinion, let one Christian love and communicate with another. For God hath received him: it is disputed, whether this be meant of the weak or strong Christian; the word judge, which immediately goes before and follows after, carries it rather for the latter. But some think it is meant of both. He that eateth, and he that eateth not, is received by God into his church and family, and indifferently accepted with him, upon another and a higher account.

4 <sup>d</sup> Who art thou that judgest another man's servant? to his own master he standeth or falleth. Yea, he shall be holden up: for God is able to make him stand. <sup>d Jam. 4. 12.</sup>

Who art thou that judgest another man's servant? to his own master he standeth or falleth: a sharp reprehension of the forementioned evil. You have the like. James iv. 12. q. d. This phrase is repugnant not only to the law of God, but to the very law of nature, which tells us, that one man must not condemn the servant of another, over whom he hath no right or power; much less may any man condemn him that is the Lord's servant. Every Christian hath Christ alone for his own or his proper Master; and it is his judgment by which he must abide; it is to him that he standeth or falleth, that he doth well or ill. Yea, he shall be holden up: for God is able to make him stand: q. d. If (as thou thinkest) he be fallen or falling, he shall be upheld and supported; for God is able, &c. But how doth this follow, because God can make him stand, therefore he shall be holden up? Answer. It is a rule in divinity, that in all God's promises, his power is joined with his will; so that where the latter is once revealed, there is no question of the former: now of the word of God in this matter, there was no doubt; for he had said, ver. 3, that God had received him. You had the like way of arguing, chap. xi. 23, where the apostle proves the calling of the Jews by an argument taken from the power of God, because he is able to graft them in again: see chap. iv. 21; Heb. x. 23.

e Gal. 4. 10.
Col. 2. 16.

5 * One man esteemeth one day above another: another esteemeth every day alike. Let every man be fully persuaded in his own mind.

f Or, fully assured.

One man esteemeth one day above another: another esteemeth every day alike: there were differences in the church of Rome about the observation of days, as well as the choice of meats; and in this he endeavours an accommodation as well as in the other. The converted Jew was of opinion, that the festival days appointed in Moses's law, were holier than other days, and that they should still be observed: see Gal. iv. 10; Col. ii. 16. On the other side, the believing Gentile was of opinion, that the difference in days under the Old Testament was now ceased, and he (the text says) esteemed or approved of all days. The word alike is not in the original, but it is aptly supplied by our translators. Let every man be fully persuaded in his own mind; i. e. Let every man be satisfied as to the grounds of his practice; let him act by his own, and not another man's, judgment and conscience; let him be so fully assured in his own mind of the lawfulness of what he doth, as to find no doubting or scrupulous hesitations in the doing of it; let him be able to say as the apostle himself doth, ver. 14. The reason of this counsel you have, ver. 23. He that doth what he thinks is a sin, is an offender against God, whether it be a sin or no. And yet a man may sin in that wherein he is fully persuaded he sinneth not. A full persuasion must be had, but it is not sufficient to make an action good or lawful.

g Gal. 4. 10.
f Or, assured.

6 He that regardeth the day, regardeth it unto the Lord; and he that regardeth not the day, to the Lord he doth not regard it. He that eateth, eateth to the Lord, for he giveth God thanks; and he that eateth not, to the Lord he eateth not, and giveth God thanks.

g 1 Cor. 10.
1 Tim. 4. 3.

In this verse you have a reason why Christians should not censure one another, upon an account of different opinions and practices, because they have all the same end and scope, which is the pleasing and glorifying of God. It is with regard to him that they eat, or eat not; that they observe those festival days, or observe them not; and so far they are on both sides to be commended; for that indeed should be our end, in all our actions, to glorify and please the Lord: see 1 Cor. x. 31; Col. iii. 17. He giveth God thanks; i. e. he is thankful unto God for the bountiful and free use of his creatures. Some would ground that laudable practice of giving thanks at meals upon this text, but it hath a clearer warrant from Matt. xiv. 19; xv. 36; xxvi. 26; Acts xxvii. 35. He eateth not, and giveth God thanks; because he hath meat enough besides, which he is not forbidden, 1 Cor. x. 28.

h 1 Cor. 6.
19. 20.
Gal. 2. 20.
1 Tim. 5. 10.
1 Pet. 4. 2.

7 For none of us liveth to himself, and no man dieth to himself.

8 For whether we live, we live unto the Lord; and whether we die, we die unto the Lord: whether we live therefore, or die, we are the Lord's.

Here he proves what he had before asserted, that Christians have regard to God and his glory in their particular actions; and that from their general end and design, which is to devote themselves, and their whole life, and death, to God. He tells them first, in the negative, that none of us, i. e. that none of us Christians and believers, do live or die to ourselves; we are not our own lords, nor at our own disposal: and then, in the affirmative, he shows, that we live or die to the Lord; we spend our lives in his service, and part with them at his appointment. His glory is the white, at which we aim, living or dying: he is the centre, in which all the lines in the whole circumference of our lives do meet, 2 Cor. v. 9; Phil. i. 21. Whether we live therefore, or die, we are the Lord's: this is an inference from what he had said before: q. d. At all times, and in all estates, whether of health or sickness, abundance or poverty, life or death, we are the Lord's property, and at his disposal; he hath an absolute dominion over us, living or dying; in this world, or in the next.

9 For to this end Christ both died, and rose, and revived, that he might be Lord both of the dead and living.

h Acts 10. 36.

To this end Christ both died, and rose: q. d. This is the fruit that accrues to Christ, by his death and resurrection, that he might, &c. And revived: the Vulgar Latin leaves out this word. Chrysostom left out the former word, he cross. Ambrose inverts the order of the words, and reads them thus, To this end he lived, and died, and rose again. Some think the preter tense is here put for the present tense: he revived, i. e. he still lives, to intercede for us, and to exercise dominion over us. Others think that Christ's reviving here doth denote that new state of life which he had after his resurrection. That he might be Lord both of the dead and living; or, that he may govern and lord it (iva kopsivory) over all his, whether dead or alive; that he might obtain dominion, or rather the exercise of his dominion, over them. As God, he hath a universal dominion over all; but as Mediator, he hath a more special dominion over all the Father gave to him: this dominion he purchased at his death, and he had the full exercise of it when he rose again, Matt. xxviii. 18; Phil. ii. 9, 10.

10 But why dost thou judge thy brother? or why dost thou set at nought thy brother? for we shall all stand before the judgment seat of Christ.

Jude 14, 15.

He goes on to persuade them to a mutual forbearance, to dehort them from condemning or contemning one another about indifferent things. He suggests two arguments against it in this verse; one (which is more implied) is taken from the relation they bore one to another; they were brethren, not by natural generation, but by regeneration and adoption; they had the same Father, even God. The second argument is more plainly expressed; and it is taken from the consideration of the day of judgment, when all shall stand before Christ's judgment-seat; see 2 Cor. v. 10; all, both the strong and the weak; and then he will determine who hath done well or ill. In the mean while, who art thou that darest to usurp his place or office? The interrogation hath the force of a strong denial; q. d. Have you no more grace, charity, or wisdom, than so to do.

11 For it is written, As I live, saith the Lord, every knee shall bow to me, and every tongue shall confess to God.

m Is. 45. 23.
Phil. 2. 10.

This verse proves what was before asserted, that all must stand before the judgment-seat of Christ. The proof is from Isa. xlv. 23. The prophet speaks only of God's swearing; the apostle sets down the form of his oath; which form is frequently mentioned in Scripture: see Numb. xiv. 21, 28; Jer. xxii. 24; Ezek. v. 11; xiv. 16, 18; xx. 3. And instead of every tongue shall swear; the apostle, following the Seventy, saith, every tongue shall confess; and we are told, Phil. ii. 11, what it shall confess, viz. that Jesus Christ is Lord. That which is generally spoken of Jehovah being here in a peculiar manner applied to Christ, it evidently sheweth, that he is supreme Judge, and sovereign Lord, unto whom all knees must bow in token of subjection; and before whose tribunal all persons, will they, or will they not, must appear.

12 So then <sup>1</sup>every one of us shall give account of himself to God.

Here you have the end of our standing before the judgment-seat of Christ, which is to give account; see Matt. xii. 36; 1 Pet. iv. 5. He saith, Every one of us shall give account, whether he be great or small, strong or weak; and that he shall give account of himself; i. e. of his own actions, and not another's. He shall give account of himself in his natural capacity, as a man; and in his capacity, as a rich or great man; and in his religious capacity, as one that hath enjoyed such education, such means of grace. &c. Object. Pastors must give account for their flock, Heb. xiii. 17. Answer. Pastors shall give account of their negligence, and want of care, whereby they suffered their sheep or flock to miscarry; but every particular sheep also shall give account of his own personal wanderings.

Let us not therefore judge one another any more: q. d. Seeing all must be judged by Christ, let us no more judge one another, but mend this fault for time to come. But judge this rather: hitherto his counsel was more general, respecting both the strong and the weak. Here he begins, in a more particular manner, to apply himself to the more strong and knowing Christians; counselling them to take heed, lest, by the abuse of their Christian liberty, they should be an offence to them that were weak and more ignorant. He entereth upon this with an elegant transition, making use of the same word in a different sense; for he doth not speak contraries, when he says, judge not, but judge; for the word in the former part of the verse signifies, to condemn and censure; but here, in the following part, to deliberate or consider: q. d. Instead of judging others, let us look upon this as a rule for ourselves, and our own deportment, that we put no stumblingblock, &c. That no man put a stumblingblock or an occasion to fall in his brother's way: q. d. Take heed of offending your brethren in any kind; do not, by an unseasonable use of your liberty, either drive them from their Christian profession, or provoke them to imitate you, and so to sin against their consciences. You have a parallel text, 1 Cor. viii. 9. There he speaks only of a stumblingblock; here he adds an occasion of falling, or, as it is in the original, a scandal. Though these two words do differ in their etymologies, yet they have one and the same signification. The latter word, as Stephanus observes, is peculiar to Holy Scripture, and seldom, if ever, used in any common author: it signifieth, properly, the bridge in a trap, which, by its falling down, catcheth a creature in a snare, and so occasions its ruin; and from thence it is used to denote any thing which is an occasion to others of stumbling or falling; any thing whereby we so offend another, as that he is hindered from good, drawn into or confirmed in evil. Scandal, or offence, is either passive or active. Passive scandal is, when that which is good is, by reason of man's corruption, an occasion of falling to him. So Christ himself, and his doctrine, was a scandal to the Jews: see 1 Cor. i. 23; 1 Pet. ii. 8. Active scandal is, when any thing is done or said which gives occasion of offence to others, when it is an occasion of grief, or of sin to them, ver. 15, 21. This occasion may be administered, either by evil counsel, Matt. xvi. 23; Rev. ii. 14; or by evil example, Isa. ix. 16; Matt. xv. 14; or by the abuse of Christian liberty in things indifferent, 1 Cor. viii. 9.

14 I know, and am persuaded by the Lord Jesus, <sup>3</sup>that there is nothing unclean of itself: but <sup>4</sup>to him that esteemeth any thing to be unclean, to him it is unclean.

Here he obviates an objection. Some might say, they were thoroughly persuaded, that no meat was unclean in itself, and therefore they might, and would, use their liberty in eating any thing that was before them. To this the apostle answers, first, by way of concession; he grants what they say is true, and tells them, that for his own part he knew it full well, and was himself assured of it; and that he had this assurance from the Lord Jesus; i. e. that he was instructed therein by his word and Spirit. That there is nothing unclean of itself; i. e. that no meat was unclean in itself; it was not so in its own nature: see Gen. i. 31; ix. 3. Some creatures might be unwholesome, but none were in themselves unclean: to the Jews they were not unclean by nature, but by a positive law, which law was now antiquated and out of doors: see Col. ii. 16, 17; 1 Tim. iv. 3, 4. But to him that esteemeth any thing to be unclean, to him it is unclean: this he adds by way of restriction, that though no meat was unclean in itself, yet it was so to him that thought it to be unclean. If a man shall believe that there is yet a difference in meats, that some are still unclean, and that by virtue of God's prohibition, it would be evil in him to eat such meats, because he therein acts against his conscience, and doth that which he himself thinks to be a sin: see ver. 23.

15 But if thy brother be grieved with thy meat, now walkest thou not <sup>5</sup>charitably. <sup>6</sup>Destroy not him with thy meat, for whom Christ died.

+ Gr. according to charity.
1 Cor. 8. 11.

In this verse you have two reasons to induce the strong not to offend the weak: First, it is contrary to charity; to grieve a brother upon the score of meats, is to walk uncharitably; it is a violation of the royal law of love, which is against the grieving or offending others, 1 Cor. xiii. 4. Two ways are weak Christians grieved, when others do unseasonably use their liberty. 1. They think such do offend God in eating that which he hath forbidden; and this is matter of grief to those that fear God, to see others transgress his laws. 2. They may be drawn by their example to do the like, against their own light and conscience; and this afterwards causeth grief and trouble; their consciences hereby are galled and wounded, 1 Cor. viii. 12. Destroy not him with thy meat, for whom Christ died: this is the second reason why Christians should not use their liberty to the offence of others; it may occasion their ruin and destruction: q. d. Hereby, as much as in you lies, you take a course to destroy them for whom Christ died. You will alienate and estrange them from the Christian religion, or you will draw them into sin, and induce them (as before) to act against their consciences, and so hazard their salvation. See a parallel place, 1 Cor. viii. 11. Here a question may arise, whether any can perish for whom Christ died? The answer is, They cannot; and for this the Scripture is express, in John x. 28. See also Matt. xxiv. 24; John vi. 39; 1 Pet. i. 5. How then is this text to be understood? The apostle doth not speak of those for whom Christ indeed did die, but of such as, in the judgment of charity, are held to be of that number. We must account all those who confess the faith of Christ, for such as he hath redeemed by his death.

16 Let not then your good be evil <sup>7</sup>spoken of:

Here is another argument against offences; it will cause our good to be blasphemed, or evil spoken of. Some, by good here, would understand the Christian faith, or the gospel in general; but others do rather understand it of our Christian liberty in particular: q. d. Give none occasion for this great privilege of your Christian liberty to be traduced; use it so, as that neither the weak Christian nor the infidel may reproach or accuse you as licentious or contentious: see 1 Cor. x. 29, 30.

This verse contains a new argument to persuade Christians not to strive about meats, or such-like things; and that is, that the kingdom of God doth not consist in these, but in weightier matters. By the kingdom of God, you may understand the gospel, or true religion and godliness; that kingdom which God erects in the hearts of men, Luke xvii. 21; 1 Cor. iv. 20. When he saith, the kingdom of God is not meat and drink, he means, that it doth not stand or consist therein. Meat and drink are put by a synecdoche for all things of an indifferent or middle nature; such things as, the apostle elsewhere says, commend us not to God, 1 Cor. viii. 8:

they are no part of his worship and service; the kingdom of God, or godliness, is not promoted, either by the use or the forbearance thereof: see Gal. v. 6; 1 Tim. iv. 8. But righteousness, and peace, and joy: here he tells you positively wherein the kingdom of God consisteth; not in outward observations, but in inward graces and gracious dispositions. He doth not reckon up all, but contents himself with these three, righteousness, peace, and joy. By righteousness, some understand that which is imputed, of which you read, chap. iv.: others, rather, that which is implanted and inherent; it is the same with holiness, both the habit of it in the heart, and the exercise of it in the life. By peace, some think, he means peace with God, or peace of conscience; others, that he rather means peace with men; or, if you will, peaceableness, or Christian concord and unity. This suits best with what follows, ver. 19, and it is often commended to us in Scripture. By joy may be understood that spiritual comfort, which ariseth from a present feeling of the favour of God, or from a well-grounded hope of future salvation; as also, the comfort and delight which Christians take in the good and welfare of each other. He that loveth his brother, rejoiceth in his welfare, 1 Cor. xiii. 6; and therefore will not offend, or occasion him to sin. In the Holy Ghost; this is added, to show the efficient cause of these graces, which is the Spirit of God; and to distinguish this righteousness, peace, and joy, from that which is merely civil and carnal.

18 For he that in these things serveth u2 Cor. 8. 21. Christ is acceptable to God, and approved of men.

This proves the foregoing assertion, that the kingdom of God consisteth in righteousness, peace, and joy, because he that serveth Christ in and by these things, is accepted of God, and approved of men; this cannot be affirmed of meat and drink, &c. When he says, that the serving of Christ in these things is approved of men, he means of such as are godly, and of sound judgment; for of others they are often hated and reviled for the exercise of these very graces: and yet righteousness and peaceableness have oftentimes their praise from the wicked themselves: see 1 Sam. ii. 26; Prov. iii. 4; Luke ii. 52; Acts ii. 47.

19 <sup>x Pa. 34. 14</sup> Let us therefore follow after the
ch. 12. 18. things which make for peace, and things 1 ch. 15. 2. wherewith <sup>1 Cor. 14. 12.</sup> one may edify another.
1 Thess. 5. 11.

This verse is the application of the foregoing discourse, in which you have an exhortation to the practice of two great duties. The one is peace, or peaceableness; the other is mutual edification. He had persuaded before to peace with all men, chap. xii. 18; and here he speaks more especially of peace and concord amongst brethren: see 2 Cor. xiii. 11; Eph. iv. 3; Col. iii. 15; 1 Thess. v. 13; Heb. xii. 14. This peace is very necessary, and Christians should endeavour all things that will promote it, and avoid all things that will obstruct it. And they must not only live peaceably, but profitably one with another. They should build one another up in grace and knowledge.

20 <sup>z cor. 15.</sup> For meat destroy not the work of 1 Mat. 15. 11. God. <sup>Acts 10. 15.</sup> are pure; <sup>ver. 14.</sup> but
Tit. 1. 15. it is evil for that man who eateth with 1 Cor. 8. 9, offence.
10, 11, 12.

For meat destroy not the work of God: here you have a further argument against scandals: q. d. For so inconsiderable a matter as eating a little meat, or for the use of an indifferent thing, do not destroy the work of God. By the work of God, some understand the soul of a brother; that is styled God's work by way of eminency; it was one of the chiefest works of the creation, and made, as it were, with the consultation of the whole Trinity; the image of God, after a sort, was engraven therein: and if this be the sense, it is a repetition of the argument in ver. 15. But by the work of God, in this place, other things may be understood; e. g. the unity and peace which God worketh amongst believers of different persuasions in indifferent things; or else the work of grace, or faith, which God hath wrought by his mighty power in the hearts of men: see John vi. 29; 1 Thess. i. 3. The work of God, in either of these senses, may be disturbed or hindered by the abuse of Christian liberty; and he that scandalizeth his brother, goes about, as much as in him lieth, to dissolve and demolish that which hath God alone for its author and worker. All things indeed are pure; but it is evil for that man who eateth with offence: here you have a concession and an exception: he granteth, that all things are pure and clean; i. e. in themselves, or in their own nature; see ver. 14; 1 Cor. vi. 12; Tit. i. 15: but then he addeth, that it is evil for, or to, that man who eateth with offence, or that offends another with his eating: it is not evil simply in itself, but accidentally, by reason of scandal.

21 It is good neither to eat <sup>e1 Cor. 8. 13.</sup> flesh, nor to drink wine, nor any thing whereby thy brother stumbleth, or is offended, or is made weak.

The apostle proceedeth to enlarge his doctrine touching this particular, beyond the controversy that occasioned this his discourse; for he showeth, that to avoid the scandal or offence of our brethren, we are to abstain, not only from things prohibited by the law, but also from things that are not prohibited thereby; as from flesh or wine, or any indifferent thing whatsoever. These words, any thing, are not in the original, but they are understood, and well supplied in our translation. Thus to do, he says, is good, as the contrary, in the foregoing verse, was said to be evil: it is good in regard of God, to whom it is acceptable and pleasing; and in regard of our brethren, to whom it is profitable and advantageous; the positive (it may be) is put for the comparative; it is good, for it is better: so Matt. xviii. 8, 9. Whereby thy brother stumbleth, or is offended, or is made weak: some distinguish these three words, stumbleth, is offended, made weak, making the first to be the greater, and the last the lesser injury: others will have the first to be the lesser, and the last the greater injury. But there are those that think they all three do signify the same thing; and the Syriac interpreter renders them all by one word, viz. is offended: and the same thing may be expressed by divers words, to insinuate the great care we should take, that we do not put a stumblingblock (as it is ver. 13) or an occasion of falling into our brother's way. The apostle seems to practise what he here prescribeth, in 1 Cor. viii. 13.

22 Hast thou faith? have it to thyself before God. <sup>d1 John 3.</sup> Happy is he that con-demneth not himself in that thing which he alloweth.

Hast thou faith? have it to thyself before God: some read the first clause without an interrogation, thou hast faith; either way the sense is the same. The apostle here anticipates an objection. The stronger Christian might be ready to say, as it is in ver. 14, I know and am persuaded by the Lord Jesus, that nothing is unclean of itself; I firmly believe, that now, under the gospel, all meats are lawful, and that I have liberty to use or eat what I please; and is it not fit that my practice should be agreeable to my belief, that I should act according to my judgment? To this he answereth, that if a man hath such a faith or persuasion, he should not unseasonably discover it to the offence of his brother, but rather conceal it. He doth not speak of faith in the fundamentals of religion, this must be professed and acknowledged, let who will be offended; but of faith in indifferent things (which are the subject matter he is treating of): our belief or persuasion therein is not to be unseasonably uttered or declared, so as to occasion scandal or contention. Happy is he that condemneth not himself in that thing which he alloweth; an excellent aphorism respecting all, especially the stronger and more knowing Christian: the sense is, He is a happy man, that, when he knoweth a thing to be lawful, he doth so manage the practice of it, that he hath therein no reason to accuse or condemn himself: or else, that doth not inwardly condemn himself, for doing that against his conscience, which he openly alloweth or practiseth: such a one is happy in this respect, because he is free from those terrors that torment those who act against their consciences.

23 And he that  $\parallel$  doubteth is damned
 if he eat, because he eateth not of faith:
 for <sup>1 Cor.</sup> whatsoever <sup>dieremeth</sup> is not of faith is sin.
and putteth
between meats. <sup>Tit. 1. 15.</sup>
 In this verse is another aphorism, respecting especially the weaker Christian. He that doubteth of the lawfulness of any meat, whether he may or may not eat it, is damned if he eat, i. e. his own conscience condemns him, or he makes himself liable to damnation, because he eateth not of faith. The word eateth is not in the original, but it is aptly inserted by our translators. What a man doth doubtfully, he doth sinfully: he showeth a wicked heart, that is not afraid of sin, but in great readiness to commit it. For whatsoever is not of faith is sin; this is a confirmation of the foregoing assertion. By faith here is meant knowledge, or full persuasion, as ver. 22: q. d. Whatever a man doth with a wavering mind, without being persuaded that it is pleasing to God, and warranted by his word, he sinneth in the doing of it. Though we may not nourish doubts and scruples, yet we must not act against them. An erring conscience binds us to act nothing contrary to it: he sins that doth any thing against it, though the fact or thing done should not be sinful. Nature itself teacheth as much: that is a known saying of Cicero, Quod dubitas, equum sit an iniquum, ne feceris. If thou doubtest whether a thing be lawful or not lawful, thou shalt not do it. See Heb. xi. 6.

CHAP. XV

We ought, in condescension to the weak, to give up our own will for our neighbour's good, after the example of Christ, 1—3. The intent of the Scriptures, 4. Paul prayeth for unanimity among Christians, 5, 6. Exhorteth to receive one the other, as Christ did all, both Jews and Gentiles, 6—12; and wisheth them all joy, peace, and hope, 13. He apologizeth for his freedom in admonishing them, as he was the apostle of the Gentiles, 14—16; and shoveth the success and extensiveness of his labours, 17—21. He excuseth his not coming to them before, and promiseth them a visit on his return from Jerusalem, 23—29. He requesteth their prayers, 30—33.

a Gal. 6. 1. WE <sup>a</sup> then that are strong ought to bear b ch. 14. 1. the <sup>b</sup> infirmities of the weak, and not to please ourselves.

We then that are strong: the particle then showeth, that what followeth is inferred from what went before. By the strong, he means those who have attained to a good measure of knowledge and understanding, that are instructed in the Christian faith, and particularly in the doctrine of Christian liberty. He putteth himself in the number, not out of ambition, but that he may propose himself an example of the following duty. Ought; i. e. we are obliged and bound both by the law of God and nature. To bear the infirmities of the weak: by the weak, he means those who are weak in faith and knowledge, chap. xiv. 1. By their infirmities, he means their ignorance, forwardness, censoriousness, &c. He doth not speak of heresies and manifest enormities; but of such errors in doctrine and life, which proceed from ignorance or common infirmity. When he says, we must bear their infirmities, his meaning is, that we must bear with them, as we do with children or sick persons in their waywardness: though it be a great burden to us, yet we must bear it; we must not impatiently contradict them, but prudently instruct them: see Exod. xxiii. 5; 1 Cor. ix. 22; Gal. vi. 2. And not to please ourselves: q. d. We ought not to do what we please in indifferent things, and to act according to our own sentiments without any regard to others; we should not please ourselves in a proud reflecting upon our own knowledge, and in contemning of others because of their ignorance; we should not stand upon the terms of our liberty and contentment, but rather, for the sake of others, depart a little from our own right.

d ch. 14. 19. 2 <sup>e</sup> Let every one of us please his neighbour for his good <sup>d</sup> to edification.

Having said we must not please ourselves, he immediately subjoins, we must please others, viz. every one his neighbour: he means, that we should condescend and accommodate ourselves to others, and give them satisfaction in all things; at least so far as may tend to their good and edification. You had a like passage, chap. xiv. 19. The apostle exhorts the Corinthians to a practice somewhat like this, 1 Cor. x. 24; and he leads them the way by his own example, 1 Cor. ix. 19; x. 33. There is a pleasing of men which is sinful, and there is a pleasing of men which is lawful; and that is, when it is limited, as in this text.

3 <sup>e</sup> For even Christ pleased not himself; but, as it is written, 'The reproaches of them that reproached thee fell on me.

e Mat. 26. 52.
John 5. 30.
A. 6. 38.
1 Pt. 69. 9.

For even Christ pleased not himself: he backs his exhortation in the 1st verse, with an argument taken from the practice of our Lord himself, who is our perfect pattern, and hath left us an example, that we should follow his steps: see John xiii. 15, 34; 1 Pet. ii. 21; 1 John ii. 6; iv. 17. By Christ's not pleasing himself, is meant his not indulging or sparing himself; he did not seek his own ease, nor to satisfy the inclination of the human nature, which abhorreth pain, and the destruction of itself. He took such a course all along as sufficiently demonstrated that he respected our benefit, and not his own. But; here is an ellipsis, something must be supplied to fill up the sense: either the meaning is, he pleased not himself, but others; or, he pleased not himself, but bore our infirmities and reproaches: or else, he pleased not himself, but it happened to him; or he so carried himself that it might be truly applied to him, which is written, &c. As it is written; viz. in Psal. lxxix. 9. That David uttered these words in the person of Christ, or as a type of him, may appear from John ii. 17. Interpreters are divided about accommodating this testimony to the occasion for which it is brought. Either the meaning is, that Christ did willingly expose himself to all the reproaches and contumelies of men, in obedience to his Father's will; or else, that he had the same concerns with God the Father, so that what befell God did also befall him; he was as tender of the Father's honour as of his own: or else, that the sins of men, which are the things that cast reproach upon God, were taken by Christ upon himself, and he bore them in his body upon a tree. Seeing then that Christ hath done so much for our sakes, and hath not sought his own ease and benefit, we ought also to seek the good of others, and to deny ourselves: see Phil. ii. 6—8.

4 For <sup>e</sup> whatsoever things were written aforetime were written for our learning, that we through patience and comfort of the Scriptures might have hope.

Least any should think, that the testimony before alleged concerneth only David or Christ, he showeth that it belongeth also unto us; that we may learn by their example to bear the infirmities of the weak, and not to please ourselves. Yea, he takes occasion from hence to inform us of the general use of the Scriptures, that whatsoever is written, in this or any other place, is written for our learning and instruction; we are concerned not only in all the precepts, but in all the promises, Heb. xiii. 5, menaces, Acts xiii. 40, 41, rewards, chap. iv. 24, and punishments, 1 Cor. x. 11, therein mentioned and declared: and though this passage is more especially to be understood of the Scriptures of the Old Testament, yet it is true also of the Scriptures of the New Testament; they, being written by the same Spirit, are profitable for the same ends: see 2 Tim. iii. 16. That we through patience and comfort of the Scriptures might have hope; he proceeds to show more particularly the use and benefit of the Holy Scripture, which is, to confirm our hope and assurance of eternal life; see 1 John v. 13. He saith, the patience and comfort of the Scriptures, because they are both wrought in us by means thereof: see Rev. iii. 10. We are armed with patience, and furnished with consolations, from the examples and promises contained therein. It may be, the hope he here speaks of is to be understood not only of eternal life, but of salvation and deliverance in this life: q. d. One principal use of the Scriptures is this, that by the examples we find there of the patience of holy men, and of God's relieving and comforting them in their distresses, we might be confident that God will relieve and comfort us also in due time.

Now the God of patience and consolation: he is called, the God of all grace, 1 Pet. v. 10, the God of hope, ver. 13, the God of peace, ver. 33, the God of love and peace, 2 Cor. xiii. 11, and here, the God of patience and consolation: the meaning is, he is the author and worker thereof. You read in the former verse of the patience and comfort of the Scriptures; and here he sheweth that the Scriptures do not work these of themselves, but God doth it in and by them. Grant you to be like-minded one towards another; this is that to which he had exhorted them, chap. xii. 16. See the like, 1 Cor. i. 10; 2 Cor. xiii. 11; Eph. iv. 3; Phil. ii. 2. God is the author, as of patience and consolation, so of peace and concord: the grace of unity and charity is his gift; he maketh men of one mind and of one heart, and for this he should be inquired of by his saints and people to do it for them. According to Christ Jesus; i. e. according to his doctrine, command, or example.

6 That ye may<sup>1</sup> with one mind and one mouth glorify God, even the Father of our Lord Jesus Christ.

That ye may with one mind and one mouth glorify God: q. d. I further pray, that you may not only be like-minded one towards another, but that ye may with one mouth glorify God; that whether you be Gentiles or Jews, strong or weak in the faith, you may agree and be unanimous in his worship and service; that not only with one mind, but with one mouth, or as if you had all but one mouth, you may pray unto God and praise him: that is one way of glorifying God, Psal. l. 23, and it seems to be chiefly intended in this place. See Acts iv. 32, what accord and unanimity there was among the primitive Christians. Even the Father of our Lord Jesus Christ; a usual periphrasis of God in the New Testament: see 2 Cor. i. 3; xi. 31; Eph. i. 3; Col. i. 3; 1 Pet. i. 3. God is the Father of Christ, first, as he is the Son of God; so he begat him by an eternal and ineffable generation, John iii. 16; 1 John iv. 9. Secondly, as he is man; so he created him, Luke i. 35. Thirdly, as he is Mediator; so he appointed him to and qualified him for that office, Psal. xl. 8; John xx. 17. This compellation of God includes all our comfort and happiness, for he is our Father because he is the Father of Jesus Christ. It is added here by way of limitation, to distinguish the true God from the false gods of the earth; and by way of explanation, to show how God will be glorified and worshipped under the gospel, viz. as the God and Father of our Lord Jesus Christ.

7 Wherefore<sup>2</sup> receive ye one another, <sup>1</sup>as Christ also received us to the glory of God.

Wherefore receive ye one another: see chap. xiv. 1, 3. He ends this discourse with the same terms in which he began it. Before, the strong only were charged to receive the weak, but here both are charged alike; the strong must receive the weak, and the weak the strong; they must all have communion one with another, continuing in brotherly love, accounting one another for brethren, exercising mutual forbearance and long-suffering. As Christ also received us; i. e. after the example of Christ, who beareth with the infirmities of his followers, putting no difference betwixt Jews and Gentiles. The particle as noteth quality, not equality; there is no proportion betwixt the infinite love of Christ and the scanty charity of man. See the like, Matt. v. 48; Eph. v. 2. To the glory of God; some join this with the former clause, that we should receive one another to the glory of God: God is glorified by that brotherly love and concord that is amongst his people. Others join it with the latter clause, that Christ hath received us to the glory of God; i. e. to make us partakers of the glory of God, or to declare and manifest the glory of God's truth to the Jews, and mercy to the Gentiles, as he sheweth in the following verses.

8 Now I say that<sup>3</sup> Jesus Christ was a minister of the circumcision for the truth of God, <sup>2</sup>to confirm the promises made unto the fathers:

He explains himself, and declares more at large, how Christ received both Jews and Gentiles, thereby to admonish them to receive one another. As for the Jews, whom he calls here the circumcision, see chap. iii. 30; iv.

9, 12, he saith, Christ became a minister unto them; see Matt. xx. 28. He exercised his ministry in the days of his flesh amongst them only, Matt. xv. 24. He went indeed now and then into the coasts of Samaria to make way for the calling of the Gentiles, but his chief abode was in Jewry. For the truth of God; or, because of the truth of God, that his truth or faithfulness might not fail. To confirm the promises made to the fathers; i. e. the promises of the Messiah, made first to Adam, then to Abraham and to David, that the Messiah should come of their loins, that in their seed all the nations of the earth should be blessed.

9 And<sup>4</sup> that the Gentiles might glorify God for his mercy; as it is written, <sup>5</sup>For this cause I will confess to thee among the Gentiles, and sing unto thy name.

o John 10. 16.
ch. 9. 23.
p Ps. 18. 49.

Here he proves the second part, that Christ hath also received the Gentiles. There is a plain ellipsis in the words; this is understood, that there were promises made of or to the Gentiles, and Christ came to confirm them also. The sum of these promises was this, that the Gentiles should glorify God for his mercy. Some have observed how the truth of God is spoken of in the foregoing verse with respect to the Jews, and the mercy of God with respect to the Gentiles; not that the one was without the other; for the salvation of the Jews, as it was of truth, so of mercy also, Micah vii. 20; and the vocation of the Gentiles, as it was of mercy, so also of truth; for there were many promises of God concerning that matter, but mercy is predicated of the Gentiles, because that attribute of God appeared more eminently in their conversion and calling. You had the like distribution and difference in chap. iv. 25; x. 10. As it is written: because the Jews were hardly persuaded of the mercy of God to the Gentiles, therefore he proves it by divers Scripture testimonies. This first is taken out of Psal. xviii. 49: see the notes there. David speaks this in the person of Christ. In the Psalm it is, I will give thanks to thee; but here, according to the LXX., I will confess to thee, or celebrate thee among the Gentiles. They then are received to mercy, forasmuch as it was foretold they should celebrate or praise God for his mercy.

10 And again he saith, <sup>6</sup>Rejoice, ye Gentiles, with his people.

This is taken out of Deut. xxxii. 43. Here it is evidently implied, that the Gentiles should become the people of God, and join with the Jews in his worship and service, and rejoice in the sense of his goodness and mercy to them. The partition-wall is now taken away, and they both became one sheepfold under one Shepherd.

11 And again, <sup>7</sup>Praise the Lord, all ye Gentiles; and laud him, all ye people.

This is found in Psal. cxvii. 1. There the Gentiles are willed to praise God, which they could not do unless they knew him aright, and had obtained mercy from him.

12 And again, Esaias saith, <sup>8</sup>There shall be a root of Jesse, and he that shall rise to reign over the Gentiles; in him shall the Gentiles trust.

6. & 22. 16.

And again Esaias saith; viz. in Isa. xi. 10: see the notes there. This is a plain prophecy of the conversion of the Gentiles; their being received to mercy is implied in the former testimonies, but here it is expressed. The Son of David (the Saviour) shall rise and spring out of Jesse's root, and reign over the Gentiles by his word and Spirit. He shall gather them by the preaching of his cross, as by an ensign, and they, as it is in the prophet, shall seek to him; or, as it is here, shall trust or hope in him. The apostle, as he is wont, doth follow the LXX., which makes some little variation from the Hebrew text; but it is rather in sound than in sense. You have other prophecies and promises of the Gentiles' mercy, as Isa. xlii. 1, 6; xlix. 22; lx. 3, 5; but the apostle thought, that these he had mentioned were sufficient for his purpose.

13 Now the God of hope fill you with all joy and peace in believing, that ye may abound in hope, through the power of the Holy Ghost.

He finisheth here his long discourse about brotherly love and concord with a short and pithy prayer. Having said before, that the Gentiles should hope in God, he takes occasion from hence to style him, The God of hope. He is so, both objective, as being the only object of our hope, see Paal. cxlvi. 5; Jer. xvii. 7; 1 Tim. vi. 17; and effective, as being the only author of it, 1 Pet. i. 3. With all joy and peace in believing; i. e. with much inward joy and peace, which riseth in the heart through a lively faith in Christ; or else, with all comfort and concord in the Christian faith. In this he prays they may abound; instead of those contentions that had been amongst them, he desires they may be filled with those things, wherein he told them, chap. xiv. 17, the kingdom of God consisted. That ye may abound in hope through the power of the Holy Ghost; he doth not say, that you may have hope, but that you may abound therein, that you may arrive to a plerophory or full assurance of hope, as it is in Heb. vi. 11. Such hope as may be like an anchor to the soul, to keep it safe and steady in the midst of storms and tempests. This hope is wrought in us by no less power and virtue than that of the Holy Ghost. See before.

14 And <sup>u</sup> I myself also am persuaded of you, my brethren, that ye also are full of goodness, <sup>w</sup> filled with all knowledge, able also to admonish one another.

Here begins the epilogue or conclusion of this excellent Epistle, wherein the apostle makes an apology, first for his manner of writing to them, and then for his not coming to them himself. His first apology is ushered in with a singular commendation of the Christians at Rome; he began with their commendation, chap. i. 8, and he ends with the same. There are three things which he commends them for. The first is their goodness; thus it is numbered among the fruits of the Spirit, Gal. v. 22. It may be taken more largely, and so it comprehends all grace and virtue; or else more strictly, and so it is put for kindness, gentleness, and charity, in forbearing and forgiving others. The second is all-knowledge; i. e. in things necessary, or in matters relating to Christian liberty; or, by all knowledge, he means a large measure and proportion of it. The third is ability to admonish one another, to inform others in things about which they were ignorant, or to reprehend others for things about which they were negligent. Though there were many weak and ignorant persons among them, yet there were others of whom he was persuaded and fully assured they were thus qualified: see 1 Cor. i. 5.

15 Nevertheless, brethren, I have written the more boldly unto you in some sort, as putting you in mind, <sup>x</sup> because of the grace that is given to me of God,

q. d. Though I am thus persuaded of you, or of many of you, yet I thought good to write to you in some sort, or in part, or a little the more boldly and freely, that I may stir you up to the practise of that which you know already: see 2 Pet. i. 12, 13; iii. 1. This he speaks to allay the sharpness of his former reprehensions, and that what he had written might be the better digested; for all men more easily endure to be noted of negligence, than of malice or ignorance. And further he tells them, he could do no less, because of the grace that was given him of God; i. e. because of his apostolical office and authority: see chap. i. 5; xii. 3.

16 That <sup>y</sup> I should be the minister of Jesus Christ to the Gentiles, ministering the Gospel of God, that the <sup>z</sup> offering up of the Gentiles might be acceptable, being sanctified by the Holy Ghost.

He proceeds to speak more particularly of his office and calling, which he had mentioned more generally in the foregoing words. The minister of Jesus Christ to the Gentiles: see the notes on chap. xi. 13. See also Gal. ii. 7, 8; 2 Tim. i. 11. Ministering the gospel of God; i. e. preaching of it. Some read it consecrating, or working, in the holy service of the gospel of God. It is an allusion to the work or office of the priests under the law. The Jews and Gentiles, they both boasted of their priesthood and sacrifices: the apostle therefore showeth, that his ministry was far more excellent, being not occupied in sacrificing of beasts, but in offering up living men to be a holy sacrifice to God. That the offering up of the Gentiles might be acceptable: some understand it acutely, that the Gentiles might offer up themselves, as it is in chap. xii. 1; or that they might offer up acceptable sacrifices to God, according to Mal. i. 11. But it is better understood passively, that the apostle, converting them by his ministry, might present or offer them to God, as an acceptable oblation: see Isa. lxvi. 20. Being sanctified by the Holy Ghost; not by any priest on earth, but even by the Holy Ghost himself; as the oblations of old had their external and legal purifyings, so this oblation is purified or sanctified by the Holy Ghost.

17 I have therefore whereof I may glory through Jesus Christ <sup>a</sup> in those <sup>a</sup> things which pertain to God.

q. d. Having received this grace of apostleship, and having had great success in my labours, multitudes being converted by my ministry, I have whereof to glory, or, I have matter of glorying and rejoicing. But then he adds, that this glorying of his was not in himself, but in and through Jesus Christ, by whose grace he did what he did: see 1 Cor. xv. 10. And also, that it was not in any thing that concerned himself, but in things pertaining to God, which concerned his worship and service, and wherein his ministry consisted. In the foregoing verse he described his apostleship in terms that were borrowed from the Levitical priesthood; and here, contriving the same metaphor, he calleth the execution of his function, a performing of things pertaining to God, which is that for which the priests of old were ordained, Heb. v. 1.

18 For I will not dare to speak of any of those things <sup>b</sup> which Christ hath not wrought <sup>b</sup> by me, <sup>c</sup> to make the Gentiles <sup>c</sup> obedient, by word and deed, b A. 14. 21. 19.

Gal. 2. 8.
c ch. 1. 5.

q. d. I dare not speak of more than is true, or of any thing that was not really done by me: or else the meaning is, I dare not speak of any thing that I have done of myself, I acknowledge that, whatever good hath come to the Gentiles by my means, it was wrought by Christ, whose instrument I have only been: see 1 Cor. iii. 5. By word and deed: some join these words to the obedience of the Gentiles; by the preaching of the gospel they were made obedient in word and deed. But they are better joined with the former words; Christ wrought in and by the apostle Paul, both by word and deed. By word is understood his public preaching, and private instruction; and by deed, the example of his good works, or godly life: or else, by deed ye may understand the miracles that he wrought, and the labour and travail that he underwent; of which in the following verse.

19 <sup>d</sup> Through mighty signs and wonders, by the power of the Spirit of God; so that from Jerusalem, and round about unto Illyricum, I have fully preached the Gospel of Christ.

2 Cor. 12. 12.

Through mighty signs and wonders; or, by the power of signs and wonders, which served to confirm my commission from God, and the truth of what I preached, and so helped forward the obedience and conversion of the Gentiles: see 2 Cor. xii. 12. If there be any difference betwixt signs and wonders, it is only gradual. I find them often conjoined in Scripture, Matt. xxiv. 24; John iv. 48; Acts ii. 43; v. 12; vii. 36; xiv. 3. By the power of the Spirit of God; which blessed the words, deeds, and miracles of the apostle, and wrought effectually by them in the Gentiles. The word δύναμις, power, or virtue, is twice used in this verse; it is first applied to signs and wonders, to show their efficacy; and then to the Spirit of God, to show that he was the efficient cause of that efficacy. So that from Jerusalem, and round about unto Illyricum: this showeth the pains and travail of the apostle, to bring the Gentiles to the obedience of faith. Illyricum is said to be in the utmost parts of Greece, bordering upon the sea, which is thereupon called Illyricum Mare. It is thought to be the country now called Sclavonia, and that is distant from Jerusalem about three hundred and fifty German miles, which make above a thousand English miles; yet it seems he did not travel in a direct and straight line, but round about, or in a circle, as the word imports, fetching a circuit. Some writers have given us out of the Acts a particular history of his peregrination from Damascus, where he began his ministry: he went into Arabia, and after three years returned to Damascus, and from thence to Jerusalem; from Jerusalem he went to Cæsarea, and so to Tarsus; from Tarsus Barnabas brought him to Antioch, and from thence to Jerusalem, to carry relief to the Jews. From Jerusalem they returned to Antioch; from Antioch he and Barnabas went to Seleucia, then to Cyprus, and to some cities of Pamphylia, and so to another Antioch in Pisidia; from thence to Lycaonia, and then returned to Antioch, from whence they had been recommended by the church. From Antioch they were sent to Jerusalem about the question of the circumcision, and returned to Antioch with the apostles' decree. From thence he went through Syria and Cilicia, visiting the churches. Then he went through Phrygia, Galatia, and Mysia; then to Troas, where by a vision he was called unto Macedonia, and so came into the parts of Europe; first to Philippi in Macedonia, then to Thessalonica; from thence to Athens, and then to Corinth; from thence to Ephesus; and going to visit the churches of Galatia and Phrygia, returned to Ephesus. From Ephesus he went again to Macedonia; from thence to Troas and Miletus; and thence, by Tyrus and Cæsarea, and other cities, he came to Jerusalem, where he was taken and put in bonds. Thus you have an account of the apostle's travels, which he abridgeth here, when he says, that it was from Jerusalem round about unto Illyricum. I have fully preached the gospel of Christ; i. e. I have filled all these countries with the gospel of Christ. The word signifieth to fulfil; see Col. iv. 17. This he calleth the finishing his ministry, Acts xx. 24.

20 Yea, so have I strived to preach the Gospel, not where Christ was named, *lest I should build upon another man's foundation :

21 But as it is written, 'To whom he was not spoken of, they shall see: and they that have not heard shall understand.

He gives a reason why he chose to preach the gospel in these places, because Christ had not been named or preached there before; this, he saith, was his ambition, and a thing that he greatly coveted; he was unwilling to build upon another man's foundation, to put his sickle into another's harvest, to derive the glory to himself which would be due to others, 2 Cor. x. 15, 16. Again, another reason why he preached the gospel where Christ had not been named, was this, that so by him, as an apostle of Christ, and in his ministry, that scripture might be fulfilled, which you have in Isa. lii. 15, To whom he was not spoken of, they shall see, &c. See the notes there.

22 For which cause also <sup>5</sup>I have been || much hindered from coming to you.

Hitherto he hath excused his manner of writing, now he makes an apology for his not coming unto them. They at Rome might be ready to say, If he had travelled into so many countries, why could he not all this while give us a visit? To this he answers, it was not from any want of respect or good will to them, but for another cause, which he had already assigned, and that was, the preaching of Christ where he had not been named; for this cause, he says, he had been much hindered: he looked upon that as the more necessary work; the planting of churches is more than the watering of them. He told them, chap. i. 13, of his being hindered from coming to them, and now he acquaints them more particularly with the reason, which he concealed before. The word (ἄ πολλὰ) rendered much, signifieth many; and it implies that he was many times hindered, and many ways; but this was the chief.

23 But now having no more place in these parts, and <sup>h</sup>having a great desire these many years to come unto you;

Having given the reason why he came not to them hitherto, in the following words he assures them he would do it hereafter. And here he saith he was the more inclined so to do, first, Because he had no more place in those parts,

i. e. as before, in those places where Christ had not been named, or his gospel preached, he had no new churches there to found, and he had ordained elders in every city to build upon his foundation. The word rendered parts, signifies climates; i. e. places which lie on divers elevations of the pole. And then, secondly, Because he had long longed so to do, he had desired it for many years, chap. i. 10, 11.

24 Whosoever I take my journey into Spain, I will come to you: for I trust to see you in my journey, <sup>i</sup>and to be brought on my way thitherward by you, if first I be somewhat filled †with your company.

Here he sets down the time when he would visit them, i. e. when he took his journey into Spain. He saith, he trusted he should see them then; he was not assured of it, he had no revelation from God concerning it, he could make no absolute promise. See ver. 28. And to be brought on my way thitherward by you; i. e. by some of you; this he did promise himself from them, and indeed it was usually done by the churches he visited; see Acts xvii. 15: not that he affected any train or pomp, but it was done for his guidance and safety, as he travelled through unknown and dangerous ways. If first I be somewhat filled with your company: this he adds, lest they should think he meant to make no stay with them; he gives them to understand, that he did not intend to leave them, till they were mutually filled and satisfied with one another's company and society.

25 But now <sup>1</sup>I go unto Jerusalem to minister unto the saints.

Some might be ready to say, If Paul hath no more place in those parts where he is, and hath such a longing desire to see us, why then doth he not presently come to us? To this he answers, that for the present he could not come, because he had a weighty affair upon his hands, which was to go up to Jerusalem to minister to the saints; i. e. to carry thither certain collections and contributions from the Gentile churches for their relief. He useth a participle of the present tense in the original, to show, that this work is now in hand, and it would not stay or hold him long. Though indeed his work was to preach the gospel, and not to serve tables; yet it seems likely that the churches of the Gentiles, who were moved by him to this contribution, had committed the same to his care, 2 Cor. viii. 4.

26 For <sup>1</sup>it hath pleased them of Macedonia and Achaia to make a certain contribution for the poor saints which are at Jerusalem.

For the understanding of these words, you need only to read 2 Cor. viii. 1, and ix. 2. When he saith, it hath pleased them, it is implied, that it was not extorted or squeezed out of them; but that it proceeded from a ready and willing mind, and that they took delight therein. The word here rendered contribution, properly signifieth communication, which implieth a mutual exchange or intercourse between the givers and the receivers; the one contributing alms, the other prayers and intercessions to God. He speaks elsewhere of communicating concerning giving and receiving, Phil. iv. 15.

27 It hath pleased them verily; and their debtors they are. For <sup>2</sup>if the Gentiles have been made partakers of their spiritual things, <sup>2</sup>their duty is also to minister unto them in carnal things.

It hath pleased them verily; he makes this repetition, as to commend the Grecians, so also to admonish the Romans to the like benevolence. And their debtors they are; i. e. the Gentiles are debtors to the Jews; though what they sent them was a gift, yet it was also a debt, it was due by the law of charity, chap. xiii. 8, and by the law of gratitude and equity; they had received from them, and they were obliged in some sort to make returns to them. For if the Gentiles have been made partakers of their spiritual things, their duty is also to minister unto them in carnal things: by the spiritual things of the Jews, of which the Gentiles were made partakers, you may understand all those things of which mention is made, chap. ix. 4, 5; more particularly, the gospel, with the ministry and ordinances

28 When therefore I have performed this, and have sealed to them ° this fruit, I will come by you into Spain.

When therefore I have performed this, and have sealed to them this fruit; i. e. After that I have despatched this business, and safely delivered the alms of the Greek churches to the Jews, wherewith I am intrusted; it is put into my hands as a treasure sealed in a bag or chest, that it may not be diminished or embezzled: he calls it fruit, because it proceeded from their faith and love, and because it would abound to their account, Phil. iv. 17; it would benefit them that received it, but much more them that gave it. I will come by you into Spain; i. e. I will take you, or your city, in my way thither. But others rather think, that he speaks of what he should bring with him, and not of what he should find there: therefore it may better be expounded by chap. i. 11, 12. He assures himself he should impart unto them much knowledge, grace, and comfort; that he should enrich and fill them with all the blessings of the gospel of Christ.

30 Now I beseech you, brethren, for the Lord Jesus Christ's sake, and ° for the love of the Spirit, ° that ye strive together with me in your prayers to God for me;

In the conclusion, he commends himself to their prayers. This is usual with him in his other Epistles: see Eph. vi. 18—20; Col. iv. 3; 2 Thess. iii. 1; Heb. xiii. 18. I beseech you, brethren, for the Lord Jesus Christ's sake: q. d. If not for my sake, yet for his sake, who is most dear to you. And for the love of the Spirit: q. d. If you love the Spirit of God; or rather, if the grace of love be wrought in you by the Spirit, show it in this thing. This pathetic way of speaking is frequent with this apostle: see chap. xii. 1; Phil. ii. 1. That ye strive together with me in your prayers to God for me; that you strive as those that be in an agony; it is a military word: he bespeaks their earnest and importunate prayers in his behalf. Jacob prayed after this manner; so did Elijah, and Epaphras, Col. iv. 12. He prayed himself, and he desired them to join with him, and help him, as Aaron and Hur helped Moses.

31 ° That I may be delivered from them that || do not believe in Judæa; and that ° my service which I have for Jerusalem may be accepted of the saints;

Here are two things more particularly, which he desires them to beg of God in his behalf. First, That he may be delivered from them that did not believe, or were disobedient and refractory, in Judæa. He knew the Jews were incensed against him; that troubles did abide him or wait for him in Judæa, whither he was going; see Acts xx. 23. And it happened accordingly, for the Jews went about to kill him, Acts xxi. 31. Therefore it is that he desires their prayers, that he might be delivered from them; see 2 Thess. iii. 2. Secondly, That the alms he brought the poor saints at Jerusalem might be taken by them in good part; that they might be reconciled, both to the Gentile churches that sent it, and to him that brought it. It detracts greatly from a gift, when it comes, either from one, or by one, against whom we are prejudiced.

32 ° That I may come unto you with joy ° by the will of God, and may with you be ° refreshed.

That I may come unto you with joy by the will of God: q. d. This would be a means to make me come unto you with the more comfort, if God will, or if God grant it to our prayers. This condition, if God will, he had before inserted upon this very occasion, chap. i. 10. See the like, 1 Cor. iv. 19; James iv. 13, 15. This he did to free himself from the suspicion of inconstancy, in case it should fall out otherwise; as also to show, that always, and in all things, he referred himself to the good pleasure and providence of God. And may with you be refreshed; i. e. with your company and converse. This hath the same sense with chap. i. 12: see the notes there.

33 Now ° the God of peace be with you all. Amen.

The God of peace; this is a frequent title of God in Scripture; he is called the God of peace, chap. xvi. 20; 2 Cor. xiii. 11; Phil. iv. 9; 1 Thess. v. 23; 2 Thess. iii. 16; Heb. xiii. 20. Here it fits his great argument, which was to persuade the believing Romans to be at peace amongst themselves, and not to contend about indifferent things. Be with you all: three times in this chapter doth the apostle lift up a prayer for the believing Romans; see ver. 5, 13; and this is more comprehensive than the other two. If God be with us, no good thing can be wanting to us. God's presence is inclusive of all good, and exclusive of all evil. Amen: see chap. xvi. 27.

CHAP. XVI

Paul commendeth Phebe to the Christians at Rome, 1, 2; and sendeth salutations to many by name, 3—16. He warneth them to take heed of those who cause divisions and offences, 17—20. After sundry salutations, 21—24, he concludeth with praise to God, 25—27.

I COMMEND unto you Phebe our sister, which is a servant of the church which is at Cenchrea:

This chapter is in the nature of a postscript. The apostle begins it with the recommendation of a certain woman to them. She went upon some occasion to Rome, and by her (as some have supposed) this Epistle was sent to the church there. Phebe: the poets called the moon Phœbe, as they did the sun Phœbus. This name is likely to have been imposed by her parents, being Gentiles. Our sister; i. e. in Christ, and by the profession of the same faith: see James ii. 16. Cenchrea; a port or haven belonging to Corinth, on the east side towards Asia: there was another on the west side towards Italy, called Lechea. By reason of this double haven, Corinth was called by the poets, Bi maris. Here Paul paid a vow, which he had made, Acts xviii. 18. Here also he preached and converted many, amongst whom this Phebe (as is probable) was one. When he saith, she was servant of the church, it is not meant she was a deaconness, or one of the college of widows, of whom he speaketh, 1 Tim. v. 9. But she served the church, in harbouring and succouring the saints that were driven out of their country; yea, as appears by the next verse, she was a succourer of the ministers of the gospel, and of the apostle himself. We read, Luke viii. 3, of some that ministered unto the Lord of their substance; there the same word is used. And this Phebe seems to have been employed in the same works; she ministered unto Paul as Onesiphorus did, 2 Tim. i. 18; there the same word is used again.

2 ° That ye receive her in the Lord, as becometh saints, and that ye assist her in whatsoever business she hath need of you: for she hath been a succourer of many, and of myself also.

Receive her in the Lord; i. e. in the Lord's name, or for the Lord's sake: see Matt. xviii. 5. Or else it is as if he had said, Receive her Christianly. As becometh saints; as it is fit that saints should be received, or as it is fit for them, who profess themselves to be saints, to receive one another. That ye assist her in whatsoever business she hath need of you; that you stand by her, and afford her your counsel, or any other assistance. She might have some business in the emperor's court, by reason of fraud, oppression, or some unjust vexations; and there might be those amongst them that could stand her in some stead. There were Christians of Cæsar's household, Phil. iv. 22. For she hath been a succourer of many, and of myself also: the word signifieth a patroness. She had been hospitable to many, and in particular, to the apostle himself. This showeth she was a woman of some account: it was but equal that the saints at Rome should assist her, who had been assistant unto so many others.

c Acts 18. 2, 18, 26.
2 Tim. 4. 19. 3 Greet Priscilla and Aquila my helpers in Christ Jesus:

In the next place, he saluteth several persons by name; the first are Priscilla and Aquila. Sometimes she is called Prisca, 2 Tim. iv. 19; and by a diminutive, Priscilla. This was usual amongst the Romans. So Livia was called Livilla; Tullia, Tulliola; Petrona, Petronella, &c. The wife is named before her husband; so she is, Acts xviii. 18; 2 Tim. iv. 19. Some think she was first called; others, that she was most renowned for her zeal and charity. We need not to be curious in our inquiry after the reason; we find in other places Aquila is set before Priscilla, Acts xviii. 2, 26; 1 Cor. xvi. 12. Hence it may appear how weakly the papists argue for Peter's primacy, because he was placed first on the catalogue of the apostles; for by the same argument, the wife should be preferred before her husband. This Aquila was a Jew of Pontus, and by occupation a tent-maker: with him the apostle Paul abode and wrought at Corinth, Acts xviii. 2, 3. Though Claudius the emperor had commanded the Jews to depart from Rome, yet now, it seems, they were returned thither again; possibly, because Claudius was dead, or because that severe edict was relaxed. My helpers in Christ Jesus; in propagating the gospel in their place and calling, and as they had opportunity. Though they preached not publicly, yet they furthered the gospel many ways privately: see Acts xviii. 26.

4 Who have for my life laid down their own necks: unto whom not only I give thanks, but also all the churches of the Gentiles.

Who have for my life laid down their own necks; i. e. they hazarded their own lives to save mine. The Scripture speaks of this as the duty of Christians, 1 John iii. 16. He refers (it may be) to that uproar that was at Corinth, of which see Acts xviii. 12; or that in Asia, of which see Acts xix. 23. Unto whom not only I give thanks, but also all the churches of the Gentiles; because he was the apostle of the Gentiles, and his preservation redounded to the benefit of them all.

5 Likewise greet the church that is in their house. Salute my wellbeloved Epenetus, who is the firstfruits of Achaia unto Christ.

Likewise greet the church that is in their house; the word greet is supplied to fill up the sense: q. d. Declare my goodwill to them, and desires of their welfare. You have the same salutations, 1 Cor. xvi. 19; and the like in Col. iv. 15; Philem. 2. By the church in their house, is generally understood, their family or household; which he calls a church, because of the godly order and religious worship that was exercised amongst them. May Aquila and Priscilla be a pattern unto other housekeepers; may the families of Christians be every where as little churches. The house of George, prince of Anhalt, for the good and godly order therein observed, was said to be, as well a church as a court. There are some that think, that by the church in their house, is meant the Christians that were wont to assemble there for solemn worship; but this is not likely, because of the particular salutations of so many in the following verses. Salute my well-beloved Epenetus: Epenetus, in the Greek tongue, is laudable and praiseworthy; so was this person, both in name and in deed. Who is the first-fruits of Achaia unto Christ: the same is affirmed of the house of Stephanas, 1 Cor. xvi. 15. The meaning may be this, Epenetus was the first person, and Stephanas's family was the first family, that embraced the faith of Christ in the region of Achaia. This is a singular commendation; God's soul desires such first-ripe fruits, Micah vii. 1.

6 Greet Mary, who bestowed much labour on us.

Greet Mary: this was a common name, but the person here meant was of special note. Ignatius highly commends one of this name, giving her an ample character for wisdom and godliness. Who bestowed much labour on us; this is the commendation the apostle gives of this woman: it is to be understood of her labour and service in providing food and other necessaries for the entertainment of the faithful, especially the preachers of the gospel; which he acknowledgeth as done to himself, though he had not been at Rome, because of the communion of saints. Some think this woman dwelt before at Corinth, or Antioch, or in some other places, where she had ministered unto the apostle Paul himself.

7 Salute Andronicus and Junia, my kinsmen, and my fellowprisoners, who are of note among the apostles, who also were in Christ before me.

Salute Andronicus and Junia; it may be rendered Junius. Some think this Junia was a woman, and the wife of Andronicus; others take them both for men. My kinsmen; so he calls them, either because they were Jews, chap. ix. 3; or because they were of the same tribe; or because they were more nearly related to him by consanguinity and affinity. My fellow prisoners; i. e. they had been imprisoned for the gospel, as well as he: the apostle had been often in prison himself, 2 Cor. xi. 23. We read, Acts xvi. 23, of his being imprisoned at Philippi, and it may be these two were his fellow prisoners, for we read of other prisoners there besides Paul and Silas, ver. 25, 26. Who are of note among the apostles; i. e. they were well known to the apostles, and were in good esteem with them: not only the twelve, together with Paul and Barnabas, but other teachers are sometimes called apostles, or messengers; see 2 Cor. viii. 33; Phil. ii. 25. Some have thought these two, Andronicus and Junia, were of the number of the seventy disciples, who are mentioned Luke x. 1. Others, that they were of the one hundred and twenty, who are mentioned Acts i. 15; or of those that were converted by the first preaching of Peter, and the rest, Acts ii. 41; iv. 4. By what follows, it appeareth they were of considerable standing in Christianity. Who also were in Christ before me: there are three things for which he commends these two persons: the first is, their sufferings for Christ; the second is, their fame among the apostles; and the third is, their forwardness in conversion. This was Mason's commendation, Acts xxi. 16. When he saith, they were in Christ, he intimates the virtue and power of faith, to incorporate us into Christ, as branches into a vine.

8 Great Amplias my beloved in the Lord.

Some translations call him Ampliatius; it is a Roman name. My beloved in the Lord; this is added, to show that he did not love him for his riches, or any outward respect, but for the Lord's sake; for the grace of Christ, which appeared in him.

9 Salute Urbane, our helper in Christ, and Stachys my beloved.

Urbane; this also is a Roman name; it was coveted afterwards by many bishops of Rome. Our helper in Christ; the same that was said of Aquila and Priscilla, ver. 3. Possibly he might be one of their teachers. Stachys my beloved; this is a Greek name, which signifieth an ear of corn. Some have reported, he was the first bishop of Constantinople: he was doubtless a person eminent in grace and gifts, or else the apostle would never have dignified him with this additional commendation, that he was beloved of him, or dear to him.

10 Salute Apelles approved in Christ.

Salute them which are of Aristobulus' household.

Or, friends.
Origen supposeth this Apelles to be Apollos, of whom you read, Acts xviii. 24, and in other places. Epiphanius saith, he was teacher in the churches of Smyrna before Polycarpus. Approved in Christ; one who hath showed himself a faithful and sincere Christian, who hath given many proofs of his sincerity, zeal, and constancy. This is a high encomium; to be in Christ is much, to be approved in Christ is more: tried gold is most precious. In a time of trial, to stand fast, and hold his own, is a Christian's greatest praise. Salute them which are of Aristobulus' household; the word household is not in the Greek, but is added to fill up the sense; you have the like in the next verse, and in 1 Cor. i. 11. Aristobulus himself is not saluted; either he was dead, or as yet unconverted to the faith of Christ; but it seems there were several Christians in or belonging to his family, whom the apostle here salutes. See the next verse.

11 Salute Herodion my kinsman. Greet <sup>Or, friends.</sup> them that be of the household of Narcissus, which are in the Lord.

Salute Herodion my kinsman: see ver. 7. Greet them that be of the household of Narcissus: this Narcissus is reported by Suetonius to have been in great favour with Claudius the emperor, and to have abounded in wealth, so that he was worth ten millions. He was a wicked man himself, yet it seems he had divers good Christians in his family. So we read that there were saints in Nero's house or court, Phil. iv. 22. To what a degree of wickedness are they arrived, who will not suffer a religious person to dwell in their houses! This shows, that good Christians may serve wicked masters with a good conscience. Which are in the Lord; this may be added, because that all in Narcissus's family were not Christians, or members of the church of Christ.

12 Salute Tryphena and Tryphosa, who labour in the Lord. Salute the beloved Persis, which laboured much in the Lord.

He salutes several women as well as men: you read before of Priscilla, ver. 3; of Mary, ver. 6; and now he adds three more in this verse. He saith of the two first, that they laboured in the Lord; i. e. in the service of Christ and his church, according to their place and power. See the notes on ver. 6. Salute the beloved Persis, which laboured much in the Lord; he gives this woman a higher commendation, calling her the beloved Persis; see ver. 8. He saith of the other two, that they laboured; but of this, that she hath laboured much in the Lord, noting some special favour or service for which she is here commended.

Salute Rufus; the same (it may be) of whom you may read, Mark xv. 21. Chosen in the Lord; a choice Christian, one eminent for gifts and graces. So, 2 John 1, you read of an elect lady: he is supposed not to speak here of eternal election. And his mother and mine; his mother by nature, mine by affection: she hath tendered me as a mother herself: see 1 Tim. v. 2.

14 Salute Asyncritus, Phlegon, Hermas, Patrobas, Hermes, and the brethren which are with them.

i. e. The Christians that are their domestics, or that dwell with them.

15 Salute Philologus, and Julia, Nereus, and his sister, and Olympas, and all the saints which are with them.

Julia; probably the wife of Philologus. Olympas; this is thought to be the name of a man, rather than of a woman. All the saints which are with them; that are in their several families: see ver. 14. There were, doubtless, many more Christians in the church of Rome, but either they were of no great note, or else not known to the apostle: and indeed it is matter of admiration, that he, who was never at Rome, should know the name and proper characters of so many there. And because he sendeth salutations to so many brethren at Rome, and makes no mention of Peter, it may be rationally inferred, that Peter was not there at the writing of this Epistle. It is questionable whether ever he were there at all; but it is without question, that he came not thither in the beginning of Claudius's reign, and in the forty-fifth year of our Lord, as the Romanists report; nor was he bishop there for the space of five and twenty years, as they affirm.

From greeting them himself, he proceeds to exhort them to greet or salute one another: this he adviseth them to do with an holy kiss. You have the same exhortation, 1 Cor. xvi. 20; 2 Cor. xiii. 12; 1 Thess. v. 26. This the apostle Peter calls a kiss of charity, 1 Pet. v. 14. Kissing is accounted a great symbol of love and concord: q. d. You have been much troubled with dissensions, about meats and days, &c.; therefore I beseech you that, forgetting all former offences, you would manifest for the future all signs of love to and peace with one another. Kissing was an old custom amongst the Hebrews; we find it used by the patriarchs, Gen. xxvii. 26; xxix. 11. It is still retained more or less in all countries. The primitive Christians did use it in their assemblies; so Tertullian testifieth, Lib. Dec.; and they did it especially in receiving the eucharist. So Chrysostom witnesseth, Hom. 77. in John xvi. "We do well," saith he, "to kiss in the mysteries, that we may become one." This custom, for good reasons, is laid down, and the Romanists, in room of it, keep up a foolish and superstitious ceremony, which is to kiss the pax in the mass. The churches of Christ salute you: he sends, besides his own, the salutations of others also to the Christians at Rome; and that, first, of whole churches, and by and by of particular persons, ver. 21—23. By churches, here, he principally means, the churches in Greece, where he then was, of whose good affection to the Christian Romans he was well assured.

He shuts up the Epistle with a reasonable admonition, which he reserved to the last, that it might be the better remembered: it is, to beware of those that cause divisions and offences. By the former, some understand those that corrupt the doctrine of the church; by the latter, those that violate the discipline thereof: others refer divisions to faith, and offences to manners. There are that like neither of these distinctions, but think he only cautions them against church dividers; and mentions scandal or offences as the effect or fruit of church divisions. He seems to aim more especially at those who, together with the Christian faith, did obtrude upon believers the ceremonies of the law, as necessary to salvation; of these he often complains as enemies to the gospel and cross of Christ: see Gal. i. 7; Phil. iii. 2, 18, 19; Tit. i. 10. Contrary to the doctrine which ye have learned; i. e. that you have learned from those that first taught you and converted you to Christ: q. d. You have been instructed in the true doctrine of Christ; and there are some that would innovate and teach another doctrine, that broach opinions that are contrary, or, at least, beside the doctrine which is pure and apostolical, and so make divisions and factions amongst you: of such as those he speaks what follows. And avoid them; here are two precepts with respect to innovators and church dividers. The first is, that they should be marked. The word signifies such a marking, as a watchman useth that standeth on a tower to descry enemies; he marketh diligently all comers, and giveth notice accordingly, for the safety of the place. The second is, that they should be avoided, or declined: the like counsel is given, 2 Thess. iii. 6, 14; 1 Tim. vi. 3—5; 2 Tim. iii. 5; Tit. iii. 10; 2 John 10. The sum is, the church should excommunicate them, and all sound Christians should turn away from them, and shun their society, that they may be ashamed.

In this verse you have a reason of the foregoing admonition, together with a description of the seducers, whom they should mark and avoid. He says, they are such as serve not our Lord Jesus Christ, but their own belly; i. e. they serve themselves rather than Christ. Though they pretend to be the servants of Jesus Christ, and give themselves out for his ministers, yet they aim at nothing but their own commodity and advantage. A further account you have of such persons in Phil. iii. 19; 1 Tim. vi. 5; Tit. i. 11; 2 Pet. ii. 3. By good words and fair speeches deceive the hearts of the simple: q. d. As Satan insinuated into Eve, by pretending he wished her good; so these seducers pretend they aim at nothing but the good and benefit of those with whom they have to do: with smooth and flattering words, they praise both the persons and doings of those whom they would insnare, (so much the word εὐλογία, here used, imports,) and by this means they impose upon the simple, i. e. the over-credulous and unwary, who do not mistrust any deceit or hurt. The word here rendered simple, properly signifies such as are not evil, or that are incautious, and not suspicious.

n ch. 1. 8. 19 For your obedience is come abroad unto all men. I am glad therefore on your behalf: but yet I would have you wise unto that which is good, and simple concerning evil.

For your obedience is come abroad unto all men: q. d. As for you, your ready embracing of the gospel, and conformity thereunto, is generally taken notice of by all that mind such things: see the like, chap. i. 8; 1 Thess. i. 8. I am glad therefore on your behalf; I rejoice to hear of your soundness and teachableness; I do not therefore speak this to accuse, but to caution you. But yet I would have you wise unto that which is good, and simple concerning evil: q. d. Take heed that you be not cheated by seducers, that they do not abuse your tractableness to draw you into errors. He exhorts them to join prudence with simplicity; to be so harmless and simple as not to invent false doctrine, and yet to be so wise and skilful as to be able to discern truth from falsehood; to be so innocent as not to deceive, and so prudent as not to be deceived: see Matt. x. 16. He prays for the Philippians, that they may have this discretion, Phil. i. 9, 10, and exhorts the Thessalonians thereunto, 1 Thess. v. 21.

p ch. 16. 33. 20 And the God of peace shall bruise Satan under your feet shortly. The grace of our Lord Jesus Christ be with you. Amen.

And, &c.: q. d. And to encourage you to be watchful, I dare promise you shall be successful. The God of peace; so he is called, chap. xv. 33. Shall bruise Satan under your feet: the word signifies to bruise by treading: it imports the conquest that the Lord gives his people over Satan and all his wicked instruments, that divide, seduce, or oppress his people; the promise is that they shall overcome him and them; they shall deal by Satan and his agents, as Joshua and his captains did by those five kings, Josh. x. 24: see Rev. xxii. 11. This promise plainly bears upon the first grand promise, in Gen. iii. 15, that Jesus Christ, the Seed of the woman, should bruise the head of the serpent; for it is by virtue of his bruising the head of Satan, that he is subdued and brought under our feet. The seed of the woman, in their own persons, as well as in their representative, shall bruise the serpent's head. Shortly, or suddenly; though now he rage, yet ere long he shall be thrown down. Some refer this to the day of judgment: others, to the time of Constantine, who overthrew idolatry; and that it is not only a promise, but a prophecy also of the conversion of the Roman empire. There are that think that the apostle doth comfort here the believing Romans, by telling them, that the dissensions raised amongst them by means of Satan's malice and subtlety, should be shortly quenched and reconciled; and that it was effected partly by this Epistle, and partly by the apostle's labours afterwards amongst them. The grace of our Lord Jesus Christ be with you: as he began this Epistle with wishing them grace and peace, so he ends it. He had said, chap. xv. 33, The God of peace be with you; and here he saith, The grace of our Lord Jesus Christ be with you. He was once and again shutting up his Epistle, but having more room and time, he makes some short additions and supplements, as it is usual with those that write epistles. This salutation he was wont in the end of every Epistle to write with his own hand, 2 Thess. iii. 17. It is repeated, ver. 24. Hereby he intimates the necessity of the grace of Christ, therefore he prayeth for it again and again. See the notes on chap. i. 7.

21 Timothy my workfellow, and Lucius, and Jason, and Sosipater, my kinsmen, salute you.

As before he saluted divers persons himself, so now he sendeth the salutation of others to the church of Rome. This he doth to show the mutual amity and love that is and ought to be betwixt Christians; though they are divided in respect of place, yet not in respect of affection and goodwill. He begins with Timotheus, or Timothy, whom he calls his work-fellow, or fellow helper, viz. in preaching and propagating the gospel of Christ. This shows the humility of the apostle, that he dignifies so young a man with this title. This is he to whom he wrote afterwards two Epistles; you may read more of him, Acts xvii., and elsewhere. Lucius: Origen and some others are of opinion that this was Luke the evangelist, who was the inseparable companion of the apostle Paul, and was with him about this very time, as appears by Acts xx. 5; and here he is called Lucius, according to the Roman inflexion. Others think that this was Lucius of Cyrene, of whom you read, Acts xiii. 1. Jason; this was Paul's host at Thessalonica, Acts xvii. 5, 7; the same, as some think, that is called Secundus, Acts xx. 4, the one being his Hebrew, the other his Roman name. Sosipater; the same that is called Sopater of Berea, Acts xx. 4. My kinsmen: see ver. 7.

22 Tertius, who wrote this epistle, salute you in the Lord.

Tertius; this was the apostle's scribe or amanuensis, who wrote this Epistle, either from his mouth, or from his papers: he put in this salutation by the apostle's licence. Salute you in the Lord; i. e. I wish you safety from the Lord.

23 Gaius mine host, and of the whole church, saluteth you. Erastus the chamberlain of the city saluteth you, and Quartus a brother.

Gaius: we read of more than one that bore this name; there was Gaius of Macedonia, of whom you read, Acts xix. 29; there was Gaius of Derbe, of whom you read, Acts xx. 4; he is most likely the person here meant. There was one of this name whom Paul baptized at Corinth, 1 Cor. i. 14; and there was another Gaius, to whom St. John wrote his Third Epistle: whether any of those were the same, or whether they were all different persons, is uncertain. Mine host, and of the whole church; i. e. he entertained the apostle, and all Christian strangers that passed that way. That Gaius to whom the apostle John wrote, is commended for the like hospitality, 3 John 5, 6. Erastus the chamberlain of the city; or the receiver or steward of the city; one that had the management of the city's stock or public treasure. The city was Corinth, from whence the apostle wrote this Epistle. There Erastus is said to abide, 2 Tim. iv. 20, possibly to attend upon his office. Yet we find, Acts xix. 22, that he was one of them that ministered to the apostle, and was sent by him hither and thither, as he had occasion, which would not well consist with his being chamberlain or steward of so great a city; therefore some are of opinion, that he is so called, because that had been his office in time past. So Abigail is called the wife of Nabal, 2 Sam. iii. 3, because she formerly stood in that relation to him. Quartus; this is no word of number, but it was his name; we had Tertius in the foregoing verse; and we read of Secundus, Acts xx. 4. Histories also speak of the name of Quintus, and Sextus, &c.

24 The grace of our Lord Jesus Christ be with you all. Amen.

These words are the very same which you had, ver. 20, only the word all is added. Some have thought, that the former was written with the hand of Tertius, the scribe or notary, and this with the apostle's own hand. He seems to be like a loving and tender father, who bids his children farewell once and again; and being loth to leave them, returns a second and a third time to discourse with them.

25 Now <sup>b</sup>to him that is of power to establish you <sup>c</sup>according to my Gospel, and the preaching of Jesus Christ, <sup>d</sup>according to the revelation of the mystery, <sup>e</sup>which was kept secret since the world began,

He concludes all with an excellent doxology; wherein, first, he describes God, and then he ascribes eternal glory to him. He describes him by two of his attributes or perfections: the first is his power; He is able to establish you; i. e. in grace and in truth; to keep you from falling into sin and into error. The Scripture often attributes our establishment unto God: see 1 Thess. iii. 13; 2 Thess. ii. 17; iii. 3; 1 Pet. v. 10. Our own weakness and Satan's power are such, that unless God did establish us, we should soon totter and fall: see chap. xiv. 4, and the notes there. Our establishment is further amplified by the instrumental cause thereof, which is the gospel; touching which, several things are here to be noted. First, He calls it my gospel, because he was the preacher and publisher thereof: see chap. ii. 16, and the notes there. Secondly, he calls it the preaching of Jesus Christ: which may be taken actively, for the preaching of our Lord himself; so the doctrine of salvation is called, the word that was spoken by the Lord, Heb. ii. 3: see Matt. iv. 23; ix. 35. Or rather passively, for the gospel which was preached concerning Jesus Christ: see chap. i. 1, 3, and the notes there. Thirdly, He calls it a mystery, which was kept secret since the world began, but now is made manifest: see parallel places, 1 Cor. ii. 7; Eph. iii. 9; Col. i. 26. Some restrain this to the calling of the Gentiles; but it is better understood of the whole doctrine of the gospel, concerning the Trinity, the incarnation of the Son of God, &c., which, although it was in some sort made known under the Old Testament, yet, in respect of the present light and revelation, it was a hidden mystery.

26 But <sup>f</sup>now is made manifest, and by the Scriptures of the prophets, according to the commandment of the everlasting God, made known to all nations for <sup>g</sup>the obedience of faith:

Concerning the revelation of this mystery, four things are further recorded: 1. The means whereby it was made known; viz. the Scriptures of the prophets; see Acts x. 43; xvi. 32; xxviii. 23. 2. The authority by which it was made known; the commandment of the everlasting God.

3. The persons to whom it was made known; the Gentiles, or the inhabitants of all nations. 4. The end for which it was made known; viz. for the obedience of faith; i. e. that it may be believed and obeyed: see chap. i. 5; xv. 18.

27 To <sup>h</sup>God only wise, be glory through Jesus Christ for ever. Amen. h 1 Tim. 1. 17. & 3. 16.
Jude 25.

The second attribute in the description of God, is his wisdom; he is said to be wise, and only wise. See the like, 1 Tim. i. 17; Jude 25. So he is said to be only true, John xvii. 3, and to be the only Potentate, 1 Tim. vi. 15, and only to have immortality, 1 Tim. vi. 16. And this doth not exclude the wisdom of the Son, and of the Holy Spirit, but the wisdom of the creatures. He is said to be only wise, because none is as wise as he, and all the wisdom of others is from him; the wisdom of men and angels is but a ray from his light. Again, he is said to be only wise, because he is originally wise; his wisdom is of himself; yea, his wisdom is himself. Be glory through Jesus Christ for ever: here he ascribes eternal glory to God. You had the same before, chap. xi. 36. Only here is added, through Jesus Christ, to show that our praise and thanksgiving is accepted of God through him: see chap. i. 7; Eph. iii. 20, 21. Amen: this word is six times before used in this Epistle; chap. i. 25; ix. 5; xi. 36; xv. 33; xvi. 20, 24. It is a Hebrew word, but retained in all languages. It cannot be translated without losing much of its weight. It may be taken three ways: 1. As a name, and so it is a name of Christ, Rev. iii. 14. 2. As an adverb; so it is used in the beginning of speech, and signifies verily; or in the end of speech, and so it notes assent. Therefore it was used of old by the Jews, not only at prayer, but at all the sermons and expositions of their rabbins, to testify that they assented and agreed to all that they taught: see 1 Cor. xiv. 16. 3. As a verb; and so it is as much as, So be it, having the nature of a prayer: hence Jeremiah said Amen to the prophecy of Hananiah, though false, concerning the sudden return from the Babylonish captivity, to show how earnestly he desired it might be so, Jer. xxviii. 6.

¶ Written to the Romans from Corinthus, and sent by Phebe servant of the church at Cenchrea.

This was not added by the apostle Paul, nor by Tertius his amanuensis, but by a later and unknown hand; yet there is nothing in the Epistle itself, nor in any ancient or modern writer, that may induce us to question the verity thereof.

THE FIRST EPISTLE OF PAUL THE APOSTLE

CORINTHIANS

THE ARGUMENT

CORINTH (the inhabitants of which are called Corinthians) was an eminent city of Achaia, (that Achaia which is now called the Morea,) and was situated on an isthmus, or neck of land, betwixt the Ægean and Ionian Seas; so was very convenient for merchandise, and by merchandise came to great riches, which gave them great temptations to luxury, drunkenness, whoredom, &c. They were very infamous for the latter, as we read in writers, and grown to that impudence, that they made the increase of harlots a part of their prayers to their idols, and made the bringing of harlots into the city a part of their vows. Lais was a harlot amongst them, very famous in civil history. And as pride usually attendeth wealth, so they also were a people very proud and puffed up. They were also anciently famous for pagan learning, and had amongst them Stoics and Epicureans, who laughed at the resurrection of the body, and looked upon incest, adultery, and fornication, as very venial things, if at all unlawful. We read of Paul's first coming thither from Athens, Acts xviii. 1, where, ver. 11, he continued eighteen months; there he converted Crispus, ver. 8, and Sosthenes, and many believed and were baptized. Paul went from thence to Ephesus, ver. 18, 19. To the church thus planted at Corinth Paul writeth this Epistle, at what time is not certain; but he is thought to have written it from Ephesus, whither he came, Acts xix. 1, the second time, and, as appears from ver. 10, was going and coming to and from that city between two and three years. The occasion of his writing this Epistle will appear to any who consideringly reads it. He had heard from some who were of the house of Chloe, chap. i. 11, of factions and contentions that were amongst them, and had heard it reported that they suffered an incestuous person to abide in their communion, chap. v. 1. They had also written to him for his resolution in several cases and questions about marriage, divorce, &c. He had also heard of several disorders amongst them relating to their communion in the Lord's supper, and of some amongst them who denied the resurrection. For the allaying of these heats, and quieting their divisions, and for the direction of them in those cases about which they wrote to him, and the setting them right in the doctrine of the resurrection, and directing them in the true and profitable use of their gifts, and in the right celebration of the Lord's supper, and the quickening the exercise of their charity, he writes this Epistle; which is supposed to be placed in our Bibles next to the Epistle to the Romans, (though plainly written in order of time before,) because that as that Epistle most fully discourseth the doctrine of justification, so this most fully resolves questions concerning church order and government. It is a book of holy writ concerning the Divine authority of which there was never any doubt, nor hath any portion of holy writ (for the quantity of it) a greater variety of matter, nor more of those δυσνόητα, things hard to be understood, which St. Peter (2 Epist. iii. 16) tells us are in this apostle's Epistles; the difficulty of which much ariseth from our ignorance of some rites used in the primitive church, but long since disused, and the usages of that country different from ours.

CHAP. I

After saluting the church at Corinth, 1—3, and thanking God for his grace toward them, 4—9, Paul exhorteth them to unity, 10, and reproveth their dissensions, 11—16. The plain doctrine of the gospel, how foolish soever in the eyes of the world, is the power and wisdom of God to the salvation of believers, 17—25. God, to take away human boasting, hath not called the wise, the mighty, the noble; but the foolish, the weak, the despised among men, 26—29. Christ is our wisdom, righteousness, sanctification, and redemption, 30, 31.

A. D. 59. PAUL, *called to be an apostle of Jesus Christ <sup>b</sup>through the will of God, and *Sosthenes our brother, Paul, called to be an apostle of Jesus Christ: our common custom is to subscribe our name to the bottom of our letters; it seems by the apostolical Epistles, that their fashion was otherwise: he elsewhere telleth us, that it was his token in every epistle, which makes some doubt, whether that to the Hebrews was wrote by him; but others think it is there concealed, for the particular spite the Jews had to him. He had the name of Saul as well as Paul, as we read, Acts vii. 58; ix. 1: whether he had two names, (as many of the Jews had,) or Saul was the name by which he was called before his conversion, and Paul his name after he was converted, or after he was made a citizen of Rome, (for Paul is a Roman name, nor do we read that after his conversion he was ever called by the name of Saul,) is not worth our disputing. He was a man of Tarsus in Cilicia, by his nation a Jew, both by father and mother; an Hebrew of the Hebrews, of the tribe of Benjamin, a Pharisee, bred up at the feet of Gamaliel, one of their great doctors; he was also citizen of Rome, as himself tells us, Acts xxi. 39; xxii. 3, 27; Phil. iii. 5; by his trade a tent-maker, Acts xviii. 3; a great zealot for the Jewish ceremonies and law, and upon that score a great persecutor, consenting to the death of Stephen, and breathing out threatenings against Christians. Of his miraculous conversion we read, Acts ix., as also of his being called to be an apostle, not one of those first sent out by Christ, but yet called: he gives king Agrippa a full account of his calling, Acts xxvi. 12—19. Through the will of God; so as he was an apostle by the will of God, God's special revelation from heaven: he did not thrust himself into the employment, but was sent of God in an extraordinary manner; not only mediately, (as all ministers are,) but by an immediate call and mission. And Sosthenes our brother: in the salutation prefixed to this Epistle, he joineth Sosthenes, whom he calls his brother. Of this Sosthenes we read, Acts xviii. 17; he was a chief ruler of the synagogue, but converted to Christianity; Paul disdaineth not to call him his brother.

2 Unto the church of God which is at Corinth, <sup>d</sup>to them that <sup>e</sup>are sanctified in Christ Jesus, <sup>f</sup>called to be saints, with all that in every place <sup>g</sup>call upon the name of Jesus Christ <sup>h</sup>our Lord, <sup>i</sup>both theirs and our's:

Unto the church of God which is at Corinth; unto those in Corinth who having received the doctrine of the gospel, and owned Jesus Christ as their Saviour, were united in one ecclesiastical body for the worship of God, and communion one with another. Corinth was a famous city in Achaia, (which Achaia was joined to Greece by a neck of land betwixt the Ægean and Ionian Seas,) it grew the most famous mart of all Greece. Paul came thither from Athens, Acts xviii. 1. Crispus, the chief ruler of the synagogue there, believed, upon Paul's preaching; so did many Corinthians, and were baptized, ver. 9. He stayed there eight months, ver. 11; there Sosthenes (mentioned ver. 1) was converted; from thence Paul went to Ephesus, ver. 19. These believers were those here called the church of God at Corinth, to whom he writes this Epistle (as it should seem from chap. xvi. 8) from Ephesus, where Paul stayed three years, Acts xx. 31. The members of this church the apostle calleth such as are sanctified in Christ Jesus, called to be saints: whether by the term the apostle meaneth only such as by the preaching of the gospel were separated from the heathens at Corinth, and professed faith in Christ, (as, Acts xv. 9, the apostle saith the Gentiles' hearts were purified by faith,) or such in Corinth as were really regenerated, and had their hearts renewed and changed, is not easy to determine: both of them are saints by calling; the former are called externally by the preaching of the gospel, the other internally and effectually by the operation of the Spirit of grace. It is most probable, that St. Paul intended this Epistle for the whole body of those that professed the Christian religion in Corinth, though in writing of it he had a more special respect to those who were truly sanctified in Christ by the renewing of the Holy Ghost. Nor doth Paul only respect those that lived in Corinth, but he directs his Epistle to all those who in any place of Achaia called upon the name of Jesus Christ, whom he calleth their Lord, and our Lord: which is an eminent place to prove the Divine nature of Christ; he is not only called our Lord, our common Lord, but he is made the object of invocation and Divine worship: and it teacheth us, that none but such as call upon the name of Jesus Christ our Lord, are fit matter for a gospel church; which both excludes such as deny the Godhead of Christ, and such as live without God in the world, without performance of religious homage to God the Father and the Lord Jesus Christ, and owning him as their Lord.

3 <sup>k</sup>Grace be unto you, and peace, from God our Father, and from the Lord Jesus Christ.

This is the common salutation in all Paul's Epistles, only in one or two mercy is also added. Grace signifies free love. Peace signifies either a reconciliation with God, or brotherly love and unity each with other: see the notes on Rom. i. 7. The apostle wisheth them spiritual blessings, and the greatest spiritual blessings, grace and peace, and that not from and with men, but from God our Father, and the Lord Jesus Christ.

4 <sup>l</sup>I thank my God always on your behalf, for the grace of God which is given you by Jesus Christ;

Lest his former salutation should be misapprehended by them, as signifying that he thought they were without grace, he here clearth his meaning by blessing God for that grace which they had received: but no man hath so much grace, but he is still capable of more, and stands in need of father influences; therefore, as he here blesseth God for the grace of God, which they by Jesus Christ received; so he before prayed for grace and peace for them, from God our Father, and from the Lord Jesus Christ. Christ is both the Author and Finisher of our faith, he giveth both to will and to do. The beginnings, increases, and finishings of grace are all from him. Grace is indeed from God the Father, but by Jesus Christ; it floweth from him who is Love, but it is through his Well-beloved. No man hath the love of God, but by and through Jesus Christ.

In every thing; in every grace and in every good gift, (for he is manifestly speaking of spiritual things,) so as this general particle must not be extended to the things of this life, but restrained either to spiritual gifts, or spiritual, sanctifying habits. Thus we read of the riches of grace, Eph. i. 7, and of the riches of Christ, Eph. iii. 8: nor is the metaphor improper, whether we consider riches as signifying plenty or abundance, or that which accommodateth a man in this life, and is fitted to men's wants, to give them a supply. In all utterance; the word may be translated, in every thing, or, in all speech; but the first having been said before, it seems more proper here to translate it, in all word or speech, or in all utterance, as we translate it. If it be taken in the first sense, the gospel is by it understood, the doctrine of the gospel preached amongst them by Paul and Apollos, who preached among the Gentiles the riches of Christ, Eph. iii. 8. If we interpret it utterance, which our translators prefer, it signifies an ability to utter that knowledge which God hath given us, to the glory of God and the good of others, either in prayer or spiritual discourses. And in all knowledge: some by knowledge here understand the gift of prophecy; but it more properly signifies the ability God had given them to comprehend in their understanding the mysteries of the gospel, the great and deep things of God. The apostle blesseth God both for the illumination of their minds by the ministry of the gospel, so as they knew the things of God, and also for the ability which God had given them to communicate this their knowledge to others.

6 Even as <sup>n</sup> the testimony of Christ was confirmed in you:

By which knowledge and utterance the testimony of Christ, that is, the gospel, which containeth both the testimony which Christ had given of himself, and which the apostles had given concerning Christ; (the gospel is called the testimony of God, chap. ii. 1; 2 Tim. i. 8;) others understand the gifts of the Spirit (for the Spirit is one of the witnesses upon earth, 1 John v. 8); was confirmed in you; by the miraculous operations wrought by the apostles, as some think; but the way of confirmation here spoken of by the apostle seemeth rather to be understood of their knowledge and utterance. The gospel, and the doctrine of it, and the mission of the Holy Spirit, were confirmed to them and to the world by the knowledge which God had given the apostles, and these Corinthians, of the great things of God; and their ability to communicate this knowledge unto others, for the honour of God, and the good of others.

7 So that ye come behind in no gift; <sup>o</sup> waiting for the † coming of our Lord Jesus Christ:

Not that every one of them was filled with all the gifts of the blessed Spirit; but one excelled in one gift, another excelled in another, as the apostle expounds himself, chap. xii. 7, 8; neither doth the apostle assert them perfect in their gifts, but saith that they came behind-hand, or were defective, in no gift; but were all waiting for the second coming of the Lord Jesus Christ to judgment, of which he mindeth them, to encourage them to go on as they had began.

8 <sup>p</sup> Who shall also confirm you unto the end, <sup>q</sup> that ye may be blameless in the day of our Lord Jesus Christ.

Which Lord Jesus Christ, (mentioned immediately before,) or which God who is faithful, (mentioned immediately after, ver. 9,) shall confirm your habits of grace unto the end, approving himself the finisher of your faith (you being not wanting in your duty and endeavour): so as either you shall not fall, or at least not totally and finally, but so as you shall rise again, and appear in the day of our Lord Jesus without blame, so as he will accept you as if you had never sinned against him.

9 <sup>r</sup> God is faithful, by whom ye were called unto <sup>s</sup> the fellowship of his Son Jesus Christ our Lord.

God is faithful: faithfulness is the same with veracity or truth to a man's word, which renders a person fit to be credited. It is a great attribute of God, chap. x. 13; 1 Thess. v. 24. This implieth promises of God for the perseverance of believers, of which there are many to be found in holy writ. But these promises concern not all, but such only whom God hath chosen out of the world, calling them to a communion with Christ, which necessarily supposeth union with him. So as here is another argument to confirm them that God would keep them to the end, so as they should be blameless in the day of Christ; because God had called them into that state of grace wherein they were, and would not leave his work in them imperfect; he had called them unto the fellowship of Jesus Christ; see 1 John i. 3; into a state of friendship with Christ, and into a state of union with him, into such a state as he would daily by his Spirit be communicating the blessed influences of his grace unto them.

10 Now I beseech you, brethren, by the name of our Lord Jesus Christ, <sup>t</sup> that ye all speak the same thing, and <sup>u</sup> that there be no † divisions among you; but <sup>v</sup> that ye be perfectly joined together in the same mind and in the same judgment.

By the name of our Lord Jesus Christ, is as much as, by Christ, by the authority of Christ, for this is his will; or, by the love which you bear to the Lord Jesus Christ, who hath so often recommended to you peace with, and brotherly love towards, one another. That ye all speak the same thing; that in matters of doctrine you all speak the same thing (for it is capable of no other sense); and that you neither be divided in sentiments or opinions, nor yet in affection, that there may be no divisions among you; which is also further evidenced by the last phrase, being joined together in the same mind and in the same judgment. A union in affection is the necessary and indispensable duty of all those that are the disciples of Christ, and such a duty as not only concerns Christians of the same nation, with relation one to another, but also Christians of all nations, and may be attained, if by our lusts we do not hinder it. A union in opinion, as to the fundamental truths of religion, is (though not so easy, yet) what the church of God hath in a great measure arrived at. But for a union in every particular proposition of truth, is not a thing to be expected, though we all are to labour for it: God hath neither given unto all the same means, nor the same natural capacities.

11 For it hath been declared unto me of you, my brethren, by them which are of the house of Chloe, that there are contentions among you.

The apostle cometh to show one reason, as why he wrote to them, so also why in the preceding verse he so zealously pressed unity upon them, because of an information he had received from some of the family of Chloe; for it is far more probable that Chloe was the name of a person, head of a family in Corinth, than of a city or town. There are contentions among you: what their divisions were about, the next verses will tell us.

12 Now this I say, <sup>w</sup> that every one of you saith, I am of Paul; and I of <sup>x</sup> Apollos; and I of <sup>y</sup> Cephas; and I of Christ.

Every one here signifieth no more than many of you, or several of you; so chap. xiv. 26: from whence, those that think they have such a mighty argument from Heb. ii. 9. where is the same particle, to prove Christ's dying for all individuals, may undeceive themselves, and find that they have need of better arguments to prove their assertion. am of Paul, and I of Apollos, and I of Cephas, and I of Christ: we may from hence observe, that the divisions amongst the Corinthians were not in matters of faith, but occasioned from their having men's persons in admiration. This was probably caused either from God's making of Paul the instrument of some of their conversion, Apollos the instrument of others' conversion, and Peter the instrument of others', or else from the difference of their gifts. Of this Apollos we read, Acts xviii. 24; he was a Jew of Alexandria, who (as may be seen there, ver. 28) mightily convinced the Jews, and that publicly, and probably was as useful to the Corinthians. One minister of Christ may be justly preferred to another. We ought to honour those most whom God most honoureth, either by a more plentiful giving out of his Spirit, or by a more plentiful success upon their labours; but we ought not so far to appropriate any ministers to ourselves, as for them to despise others. We are not bound to make every minister our pastor, but we are bound to have a just respect for every minister, who by his doctrine and holy life answereth his profession and holy calling.

<sup>2</sup> Cor. 11. 4. Eph. 4. 6. 13 Is Christ divided? was Paul crucified for you? or were ye baptized in the name of Paul?

How came these parties? there is but one Christ, but one that was crucified for you, but one into whose name, into a faith in whom, and a profession of whom, you were baptized. Peter baptized you into the name of Christ, so did I; I did not list those whom I baptized under any banner of my own, but under Christ's banner. The Head is but one, and the body ought not to be divided.

Concerning the apostle's baptizing Crispus we read, Acts xviii. 8; he was the chief ruler of the synagogue of the Jews: why Paul thanks God that he baptized not many, he tells us, ver. 15.

15 Lest any should say that I had baptized in mine own name.

Because by that providence of God it so fell out, that very few of them could pretend any such thing, as that he had baptized any in his own name.

16 And I baptized also the household of <sup>c</sup> Stephanas: besides, <sup>17</sup> I know not whether I baptized any other.

He correcteth himself, remembering that he also baptized the household of Stephanas, which (chap. xvi. 15) he calleth the first-fruits of Achaia, a family that had addicted themselves to the ministry of the saints. Besides, I know not whether I baptized any other; he did not remember that he had baptized any more at Corinth, though it is very probable he had baptized many more in other parts of the world, where he had been travelling.

17 For Christ sent me not to baptize, but to preach the Gospel: <sup>d</sup> not with wisdom of <sup>e</sup> words, lest the cross of Christ should be made of none effect.

For Christ sent me not to baptize, but to preach the Gospel; baptism was not his principal work, not the main business for which Paul was sent; it was his work, otherwise he would not have baptized Crispus, or Gaius, or the household of Stephanas, but preaching was his principal work. It is very probable others (besides the apostles) baptized. It is hard to conceive how three thousand should in a day be added to the church, if Peter had baptized them all, Acts ii. 41. The apostle goes on, telling us how he preached the gospel, and thereby instructing all faithful ministers how they ought to preach. Not with wisdom of words, or speech. Wisdom of words must signify either what we call rhetoric, or logic, delivering the mysteries of the gospel in lofty, tunable expressions, or going about to evidence them from rational demonstrations and arguments. This was the way (he saith) to have taken away all authority from the doctrine of the cross of Christ: Divine faith being nothing else but the soul's assent to the Divine revelation because it is such, is not furthered, but hindered, by the arguing the object of it from the principles of reason, and the colouring of it with high-flown words and trim phrases. There is a decent expression to be used in the communicating the will of God unto men; but we must take heed that we do not diminish the authority of God's revealed will, either by puerile flourishes of words, or philosophical argumentation.

For the preaching of the cross is to them that perish foolishness: I know (saith the apostle) that plain discourses about a Christ crucified are to some persons foolish things, and accounted canting; but to whom are they so? to those who, if they be not some that shall perish eternally, yet are some of those who at present are in a perishing estate; these indeed count sermons of Christ silly, foolish things. But unto us which are saved it is the power of God; but to those who shall be eternally saved, and are at present in the true road to eternal life and salvation, it is, that is, the preaching of the gospel is, that institution of God by which he showeth his power in the salvation of those who shall be saved. The apostle saith the same, Rom. i. 16.

What Isaiah said of the wise men among the Jews in his time, is applicable to the wise men among the heathen, God will destroy their wisdom, and make their understanding appear to be no better than foolishness. So as it is not at all to be admired, if the philosophers of this world count the gospel, and the preaching of it, foolishness; the taking away the wisdom and understanding of men worldly wise, is but an ordinary dispensation of God's providence, no more than God threatened to do in Isaiah's time to the men of that generation.

Where is the wise? where is the scribe? he alludeth again to that, Isa. xxxiii. 18, Where is the scribe? where is the receiver? Where are the wise men amongst the heathens? where are the scribes, the learned men in the law, amongst the Jews? Where is the disputer of this world? where are those amongst Jews or Gentiles that are the great inquirers into the reasons and natures of things, and manage debates and disputes about them? They understand nothing of the mysteries of the gospel, or the way of salvation, which God holds out to the world in and through Jesus Christ. Or, where are they? what have they done by all their philosophy and moral doctrine, as to the turning of men from sin unto God, from ways of iniquity unto ways of righteousness, in comparison of what we, the ministers of Christ, have done by preaching the doctrine of the gospel, and the cross of Christ? Hath not God made foolish the wisdom of this world? do not you see how God hath fooled the wisdom of the world? making it to appear vain and contemptible, and of no use, as to the saving of men's souls; making choice of none of their doctors and great rabbis, to carry that doctrine abroad in the world; and convincing men that, without faith in Christ, all that can be learned from them will be of no avail to the soul.

21 <sup>m</sup> For after that in the wisdom of God the world by wisdom knew not God, it pleased God by the foolishness of preaching to save them that believe.

For after that in the wisdom of God: some here, by the wisdom of God, understand Jesus Christ, and make the sense thus: When he who is the Wisdom of God came and preached to the world. Others understand the gospel, which is so called, ver. 24, and chap. ii. 7. But I take the wisdom of God in this text to signify the wise administrations of Divine Providence in the government of the world to his wise ends. The world by wisdom knew not God; the unregenerate part of the world would not come to a knowledge of and an acquaintance with God, in that way whereby he chose to reveal himself in and through Jesus Christ, as to which they were hindered by their own reasonings and knowledge, and apprehended skill in things, and capacity to comprehend them. It pleased God by the foolishness of preaching to save them that believe; it pleased God to institute the great ordinance of preaching the gospel, which they count foolishness, as the sacred means by which he would bring all those that give credit to the revelation of it, and receive Christ held forth in it, to eternal life and salvation.

The Jews were not without some true Divine revelation, and owned the true God, and only desired some miraculous operation from Christ, Matt. xii. 38; John iv. 48, to confirm them that Christ was sent from God: without signs and wonders they would not believe; giving no credit at all to the words of Christ. And the Greeks, (by whom the apostle understands the Gentiles,) especially the more learned part of them, (for Greece was at this time very famous for human literature,) they sought after the demonstration of all things from natural causes and rational arguments, and despised every thing which could not so be made out unto them.

But we preach Christ crucified; we that are the ministers of Christ, come and preach to them, that there was one hanged upon a cross at Jerusalem, who is the Saviour of the world, and was not cut off for his own sins, but for the sins of his people. Unto the Jews a stumblingblock; the Jews are stumbled at this, looking for a Messiah that should be a great temporal Prince; and besides, accounting it an ignominious thing to believe in one as their Saviour whom they had caused to be crucified. And unto the Greeks foolishness; and the Greeks, the most learned among the Gentiles, look upon it as a foolish, idle story, that one who was and is God blessed for ever, should be crucified.

Blessed be God, Christ is not to all the Jews a stumbling-block, nor to all the Greeks is he foolishness; for to so many of them as are called, (not by the external call of the gospel, but only by the internal call and effectual operation of the Spirit,) let them be of one nation or another, by their country, Jews or pagans, Christ is so far from being foolishness, that Christ, and the doctrine of the gospel, appear to them the power of God, and the wisdom of God.

25 Because the foolishness of God is wiser than men; and the weakness of God is stronger than men.

The foolishness of God is wiser than men; the least things that are the products of the wisdom of God, or the contrivance of God for man's salvation, which the sinful and silly world calls foolishness, are infinitely more wise, and have more wisdom in them, than the wisest imaginations, counsels, and contrivances of men. And the weakness of God is stronger than men; and those things and means which God hath instituted in order to an end, have in them more virtue, power, and efficacy in order to the production of God's intended effects, than any such means as appear to men's eyes of reason to have the greatest strength, virtue, and efficacy. Whence we may observe, that the efficacy of preaching for the changing and converting souls, dependeth upon the efficacy of God working in and by that holy institution, which usually attendeth the ministry of those who are not only called and sent out by men, but by God, being fitted for their work, and faithfully discharging of it.

<sup>s John 7. 48.</sup> 26 For ye see your calling, brethren, how that <sup>a</sup>not many wise men after the flesh, not many mighty, not many noble, are called:

To prove that this is the method of Divine Providence, to make use of seemingly infirm and weak means to produce his great effects, you need not look further than yourselves; look upon the whole body of your church at Corinth, it is not made up of many that have a reputation for the wise men or the noble men of your city. Some indeed were such; Crispus, the ruler of the synagogue, was converted, and Sosthenes; but the generality were men of very ordinary repute.

<sup>t Mat. 11. 25. Jam. 2. 5. See Ps. 8. 2.</sup> 27 But <sup>a</sup>God hath chosen the foolish things of the world to confound the wise; and God hath chosen the weak things of the world to confound the things which are mighty;

God hath even amongst you chosen persons that are in the account of the world as foolish things, to put the wise to shame; and persons of weak esteem, to confound those that are mighty in the repute of the world.

28 And base things of the world, and things which are despised, hath God chosen, yea, and <sup>a</sup>things which are not, <sup>u Rom. 4. 17. x ch. 2. 6.</sup> <sup>a</sup>to bring to nought things that are:

Things which are not in the world's account, to bring to nought things which are in high esteem.

29 <sup>v Rom. 3. 27. Eph. 2. 9.</sup> <sup>v</sup>That no flesh should glory in his presence.

And God doth this in infinite wisdom, consulting his own honour and glory, that none might say, that God hath chosen them because they were nobler born, or in higher repute and esteem in the world, than others, but that the freeness of Divine grace might be seen in all God's acts of grace.

<sup>x ver. 24. n Jer. 23. 5, 6. Rom. 4. 25. 2nd Cor. 5. 21. Phil. 3. 9. b John 17. 19. e Eph. 1. 7.</sup> 30 But of him are ye in Christ Jesus, who of God is made unto us <sup>a</sup>wisdom, and <sup>a</sup>righteousness, and <sup>b</sup>sanctification, and <sup>c</sup>redemption:

But of him are ye in Christ Jesus; of his grace ye are implanted into Christ, and believe in him. You are of him, not by creation only, as all creatures are, but by redemption and regeneration, which is in Christ Jesus, who of God is made unto us wisdom; the principal means by which we come to the knowledge of God, and an acquaintance with his will; for he is the image of the invisible God, Col. i. 15. The brightness of his Father's glory, and the express image of his person, Heb. i. 3. God hath shined in our hearts, to give the light of the knowledge of the glory of God in the face of Jesus Christ, 2 Cor. iv. 6. So that he who hath seen him, hath seen the Father, John xiv. 9. All the treasures of wisdom and knowledge are hid in him, Col. ii. 3. And no man knoweth the Father, save the Son, and he to whomsoever the Son will reveal him, Matt. xi. 27. Thus, though God destroyed the wisdom of the wise, yet the Corinthians were not without wisdom; for God had made Christ to them wisdom, both causally, being the author of wisdom to them; and objectively, their wisdom lay in their knowledge of him, and in a fellowship and communion with him. And whereas they wanted a righteousness in which they might stand before God justified and accepted, God had also made Christ to them righteousness: Sending his own Son in the likeness of sinful flesh, and for sin, condemned sin in the flesh; that the righteousness of the law might be fulfilled in us, Rom. viii. 3, 4. And sanctification also, believers being renewed and sanctified by his Spirit. And he is also made redemption: where by redemption is meant the redemption of the body, mentioned Rom. viii. 23; so as redemption here signifies the same with resurrection of the body. Christ is the resurrection, and the life, John xi. 25.

31 That, according as it is written, <sup>d Jer. 9. 23. 24. 2nd Cor. 10. 17.</sup> <sup>d</sup>He that glorieth, let him glory in the Lord.

God doth this, or hath done this, for this end, that man should have nothing to glory in, neither wisdom, nor righteousness, nor sanctification, nor redemption, but should glory in the Lord; acknowledging that whatsoever wisdom, righteousness, or holiness he hath, it is all from God, in and through the Lord Jesus Christ.

CHAP. II

Paul declareth that he used not human learning and eloquence in preaching the gospel to his converts, that their faith, being built on the testimony of the Spirit, and on miracles, might be solely ascribed to God, 1—5. The gospel doth contain God's wise, but secret, counsel for bringing men to glory; which no natural abilities could discover, but the Spirit of God only, by which it was revealed to the apostles, 6—13. Upon this account, both the doctrine and its teachers are held in disesteem by the mere natural man, who is not duly qualified to judge of and discern them, 14—16.

AND I, brethren, when I came to you, <sup>a</sup>came not with excellency of speech or of wisdom, declaring unto you <sup>b</sup>the testimony of God.

ver. 4, 13.
2 Cor. 10.
10. & 11. 6.
b cts. 1. 6.

It should seem by the apostle's so often declaring against that vanity, that even that age much admired a style, and ministers in sacred things delivering their minds, not in a mere decent, but in a lofty, high-flown phrase; and that they vilified St. Paul, because his phrase did not so tickle their ears. The apostle had declared against this, chap. i. 17; there he called it the wisdom of words; here he calls it an excellency of speech: ver. 4, the enticing words of man's wisdom: chap. iv. 19, the speech of them which are puffed up; puffed up with conceits of their own parts and abilities. St. Paul declares, that this was not his way of preaching, he came to declare to them the gospel, which he calleth the testimony of God: this needed no fine words, and excellent phrase and language, to set it forth.

2 For I determined not to know any thing among you, <sup>c</sup>save Jesus Christ, and him crucified.

Phil. 3. 8.

I did not value myself upon any piece of knowledge I had attained, saving only that of Christ, and him crucified; or, I determined with myself to carry myself amongst you, as if I knew nothing of arts, or sciences, or languages, but only Christ, and him crucified; not to make any thing else the subject of my public discourses. I was acquainted with the Jewish law, rites, and traditions, with the heathen poets and philosophers; I troubled you with none of these in my pulpit discourses; my whole business was to open to you the mysteries of the gospel, and to bring you to a knowledge of and an acquaintance with Jesus Christ; this was my end, and the means I used were proportionable to it.

3 And <sup>d</sup>I was with you <sup>e</sup>in weakness, and in fear, and in much trembling.

e 2 Cor. 4. 7.
e 10. 1, 10.
& 11. 30. & 12. 5, 9. Gal. 4. 13.

Either in a weakness of style, I used a plain, low, intelligible style, studying rather to be understood by all than admired by any. Or in weakness of state, in a mean and low condition; for we read, Acts xviii. 3, that he wrought with his hands at Corinth; so Acts xx. 34. Or it may be, in a weak state of body; or it may be he means humbleness of mind and modesty, which to worldly eyes looks like a weakness of mind. And in much fear and trembling, either with respect to the Jews, and the danger he was exposed to from them, or with respect to the greatness of his work, lest they should refuse the grace of the gospel, by him brought and offered to them. So as (saith he) you might see that all the work was God's, I but a poor instrument, contemptible with respect to my outward quality, appearing poor and mean in my phrase and style, and whole behaviour amongst you.

4 And my speech and my preaching <sup>f</sup>was not with <sup>g</sup>enticing words of man's wisdom, <sup>h</sup>but in demonstration of the Spirit and of power:

ch. 1. 17.
g 2 Pet. 1. 16.
h Or, persuasive.
g Rom. 15.
19. 1 Thess. 1. 6.

Either here Paul's speech and preaching signify the same thing, (expressed by two words,) or else speech referreth to his more private conferences and discourses with them, and preaching signifieth the more public acts of his ministry; neither of them was with the persuasive or enticing words of man's wisdom. What these persuasive words of man's wisdom are, will quickly appear to any that considers there are but two human arts that pretend to any thing of persuading; rhetoric, and logic, or the art of reasoning. Rhetoric persuadeth more weakly, working more upon the affections than upon the understanding and judgment. Logic, or the art of reasoning, more strongly, working upon the understanding and judgment, and teaching men to conclude from connate natural principles. Now, saith Paul, my preaching was neither of these ways, I neither studied neat and fine words and phrases, nor did I make it my work to demonstrate gospel propositions to you from principles of natural reason. Object. Ought not then ministers now to use such words? Answer. A learned popish writer saith, that "at that time it was the will of God that his ministers should use plain speech; but it is otherwise now; the using of words studiously composed and ordered, being now the ordinary way to persuade others." But, 1. After this rate any thing of the will of God may be evaded; it is but saying, that it was the will of God indeed then, but not now. 2. The thing is false. It was then, as much as now, the ordinary way of persuading to use rhetorical phrases and rational demonstrations. 3. Although now this be the ordinary method of persuading men of learning and capacities, yet for the generality of people it is not so. 4. The apostle's reason holds now as much as ever. It is the way to make Christians' faith stand in the wisdom of men, not in the power of God. Object. Ought then ministers to use no study, but talk whatever comes at their tongue's end, and to use no reason to prove what they say? Answer. By no means. 1. It is one thing to study matter, another thing to study words. 2. Nay, it is one thing to study a decency in words, another to study a gaudery of phrase. It is an old and true saying, Verba sequantur res, Words will follow matter, if the preacher be but of ordinary parts. In the study of words we have but two things to attend: (1.) That we speak intelligibly, so as all the people may understand. (2.) That we speak gravely and decently. All other study of words and phrases in a divine is but folly and vanity. 3. We ought to use our reason in our preaching; but reason works two ways: (1.) Either making conclusions from natural and philosophical principles; (2.) Or, from Scriptural principles. We ought to study to conclude as strongly as we can what we say from principles of revelation, comparing spiritual things with spiritual, but not from all natural and philosophical principles; for so we shall conclude, there is no Trinity in the Unity of the Divine Being, because, according to natural principles, three cannot be one, nor one three; and against the resurrection, because there can be no regress from a privation to a habit, &c. 4. Again, it is one thing to use our natural reason, ex abundantia, as an auxiliary help to illustrate and confirm what is first confirmed by Divine revelation; another thing to use it as a foundation upon which we build a spiritual conclusion, or as the main proof of it. Paul's preaching was in words intelligible to his hearers, and decent enough, and with reason enough, but not concluding upon natural principles, nor making any proofs of that nature the foundation upon which he built his gospel conclusions. But in demonstration of the Spirit; by which Grotius and some others understand miracles, by which the doctrine of the gospel was at first confirmed; but Vorstius and many others better understand by it the Holy Ghost's powerful and inward persuasion of men's minds, of the truth of what was preached by Paul. All ministers' preaching makes propositions of gospel truth appear no more than probable; the Spirit only demonstrates them, working in souls such a persuasion and confirmation of the truth of them, as the soul can no longer deny or dispute, or withstand the conviction of them. And of power: by this term also some understand the power of working miracles; but it is much better by others interpreted of that authority, which the word of God preached by Paul had, and preached by faithful ministers still hath, upon the souls and consciences of those that hear it. As it is said, Matt. vii. 29, Christ taught them as one having authority. And it is said of Stephen, Acts vi. 10, They were not able to resist the wisdom and the spirit by which he spake. So the gospel preached by Paul came to people, not in word only, but also in power, and in the Holy Ghost, and in much assurance, 1 Thess. i. 5: and was quick, and powerful, and sharper than any two-edged sword, piercing even to the dividing asunder of soul and spirit, and of the joints and marrow, and is a discernor of the thoughts and intents of the heart, Heb. iv. 12.

And thus every faithful minister, with whose labours God goeth along in the conversion of souls, yet preacheth in the demonstration of the Spirit and of power. Nor indeed can those miracles, by which Christ and his apostles confirmed the truth of the doctrine of the gospel, though they were a mighty proof, be, in any propriety of speech, called a demonstration; which, properly, is a proof in which the mind fully acquiesceth, so that it no longer denieth or disputeth the thing so proved, but gives a firm and full assent to it: the miracles wrought by Christ himself never had that effect; the Pharisees and the generality of the Jews believed not that Christ was the true Messiah and the Son of God, notwithstanding his miracles. Nothing but the inward powerful impression of the Spirit of God, persuading the heart of the truth of gospel principles, can possibly amount to a demonstration, bringing the minds of men, though never so judicious and prepared, to a certainty of the thing revealed, and a rest, so as they can no longer deny, resist, dispute, or contradict it. With this Paul's preaching was attended, not to every individual person to whom he preached, but to many, even as many as should be saved: he delivered the doctrine of the gospel freely, plainly, and boldly, not resting upon the force of his rhetoric and persuasive words, nor yet upon the natural force of his reasoning and argumentation; but leaving the demonstration and evidencing of the truth of what he said to the powerful internal impression and persuasion of the holy and blessed Spirit of God, who worketh powerfully.

+ Gr. be. 5 That your faith should not stand in h 2 Cor. 4. 7. the wisdom of men, but <sup>h</sup> in the power of a 6. 7. God.

Faith properly signifieth our assent to a thing that is told us, and because it is told us. If the revelation be from man, it is no more than a human faith. If it be from God; and we believe the thing because God hath revealed it to us, this is a Divine faith. So as indeed it is impossible that a Divine faith should rest in the wisdom of men. If we could make gospel propositions evident to the outward senses, or evident to such principles of reason as are connatural to us, or upon such conclusions as we make upon such principles, yet no assent of this nature could be faith, which is an assent given to a Divine revelation purely because of such revelation. An assent other ways given may be sensible demonstration, or rational demonstration, or knowledge, or opinion; but Divine faith it cannot be, that must be bottomed in the power of God. Nor ought any thing more to be the care of the ministers of the gospel than this, as to call men to believe, so to endeavour that their faith may not stand in the wisdom of men: nothing but a human faith can do so. This will show every conscientious minister the vanity of not proving what he saith from holy writ: all other preaching is but either dictating, as if men were to believe what the preacher saith upon his authority; or philosophizing, acting the part of a philosopher or orator at Athens, not the part of a minister of the gospel.

6 Howbeit we speak wisdom among them <sup>h</sup> that are perfect: yet not <sup>k</sup> the wisdom of this world, nor of the princes of this world, <sup>l</sup> that come to nought:

Lest what the apostle had seemed to speak before in defamation of wisdom, should reflect upon the gospel, and give some people occasion to justify against it their impious charge of folly, the apostle here something corrects himself, affirming that he and the rest of the apostles spake wisdom, and what would be so judged by such as were perfect; not absolutely, for so there is no man perfect, but comparatively, that is, persons who have their senses exercised to discern betwixt good and evil, Heb. v. 14, or such as are of a true, sound judgment, and are able to discern what is true wisdom. To such, saith the apostle, we speak wisdom; and it needs must be so; for wisdom being a habit directing men to use the best means in order to the best end, the salvation of men's souls being the best end, that doctrine which directs the best means in order to it, must necessarily be wisdom, and the purest and highest wisdom. Yet not the wisdom of this world, nor of the princes of this world, that come to nought; but, saith he, not what the philosophers, or cunning men, or politicians of the world count wisdom; for all their wisdom is of no significance at all, in order to the best end, the salvation of men's souls, and it will all vanish, and come to nothing at last.

7 But we speak the wisdom of God in a mystery, even the hidden wisdom, <sup>m</sup> which God ordained before the world unto our glory:

But we speak the wisdom of God in a mystery; we preach the gospel, where the righteousness in which alone men can another day appear, and be accepted before God, is revealed from faith to faith. It is indeed a sacred secret, a mystery to many men, but it is the wisdom of God, a doctrine directing the best means to the best end of man. Even the hidden wisdom, which God ordained before the world unto our glory: it is hidden wisdom: it was ordained of God before the world for our glory, the way of salvation for man, which he had from all eternity ordained and decreed; but it lay hidden in the secret counsels of God till the latter ages of the world, when it pleased God to send forth his Son into the world to publish it, and after him to appoint us to be the preachers and publishers of it.

8 <sup>n</sup> Which none of the princes of this world knew: for <sup>o</sup> had they known it, they would not have crucified the Lord of glory.

Which none of the princes of this world knew; which Divine wisdom neither Caiaphas, nor Pontius Pilate, nor any considerable number of the rulers of this age, whether amongst the Jews or amongst the heathens, understood, though they heard of it. For had they known it, they would not have crucified the Lord of glory; for if they had so known it, as to have believed and been persuaded of it, they would never have nailed to the cross that person, who was the Head and Fountain of it, and the Lord of glory; both with respect to his Divine nature, as to which he was God blessed for ever, and also as Mediator, being the Author of glory to those who believe. Nor would this ignorance at all excuse their crucifying of Christ, because it was not invincible, they had means sufficient by which they might have come to the knowledge of him, and have understood what he was; so as their ignorance was affected and voluntary.

9 But as it is written, <sup>p</sup> Eye hath not seen, nor ear heard, neither have entered into the heart of man, the things which God hath prepared for them that love him.

The place where this is written is by all agreed to be Isa. lxiv. 4, where the words are, For since the beginning of the world men have not heard, nor perceived by the ear, neither hath the eye seen, O God, beside thee, what he hath prepared for him that waiteth for him. It is so usual with the penmen of holy writ to quote the sense of texts in the Old Testament, not tying themselves to letters and syllables, that it is mightily vain for any to object against this quotation, as no where written in the Old Testament, but taken out of some apocryphal writings. The sense of what is written, Isa. lxiv. 4, is plainly the same with what he speaketh in this place; the greatest difference is, the apostle saith, them that love him; the prophet, him that waiteth for him (which is the certain product and effect of love). The whole 64th chapter of Isaiah, and some chapters following, treat concerning Christ; so doth this text. Christ and his benefits are to be understood here, by the things which God hath prepared for them that love him; which are set out as things not obvious to sense, nor to be comprehended by reason. It could never have entered into the heart of men to conceive, that God should give his only begotten Son out of his own bosom, to take upon him our nature, and to die upon the cross; or, that Christ should so far humble himself, and become obedient unto death.

10 But <sup>q</sup> God hath revealed them unto us by his Spirit: for the Spirit searcheth all things, yea, the deep things of God.

God hath revealed them unto us by his Spirit; God by his Spirit hath opened our understandings to understand the Holy Scriptures, the types and prophecies of Christ, and what the holy prophets have spoken of him both as to his person and offices. For the Spirit searcheth all things, yea, the deep things of God; for the Holy Spirit being the third person in the blessed Trinity, and so equal with the Father and the Son, searcheth the deep things of God, and so is able to reveal to us all the counsels of God, whatsoever God would have men to understand concerning the Lord Jesus Christ. So as this text is an evident proof of the Deity of the Holy Spirit, he searching the deep things of God, and being alone able to reveal them unto men, so as they shall acknowledge, comprehend, and believe them.

11 For what man knoweth the things of a man, save the spirit of man which is in him? even so the things of God knoweth no man, but the Spirit of God.

27. & 27. 19.
Jer. 17. 9.
s Rom. 11.

Look, as it is with a man, no man knoweth his secret thoughts, and counsels, and meanings, save only his own soul that is within him; so it is as to the things of God, until God by his Spirit hath revealed them to men, none knoweth them but the Holy Spirit of God. It is true as it is with man; when he hath by his tongue discovered his mind to others, they know it so far as he hath so delivered it; but there is no man that discovereth all his thoughts and counsels: so God having in his word revealed his will, so far as he hath plainly revealed it men may know it; but there are deep things of God, mysteries in Scripture, which, till the Spirit of God hath revealed to men, they know not nor understand; for none knoweth them originally, but the Spirit of God, who is himself God, and searcheth the deep things of God.

12 Now we have received, not the spirit of the world, but the spirit which is of God; that we might know the things that are freely given to us of God.

By the spirit of the world some understand the devil, that evil spirit which is in the world, and ruleth those that are worldly, carnal men; others understand a mere human spirit, by which men understand and comprehend mere worldly things. The sense certainly is, we have not a mere worldly instruction and tutoring, we are not taught and instructed from the world; (so the spirit is put for the effects of the spirit of the world;) but we are taught and instructed by the Holy Spirit, by which we are taught and know the things that are freely given to us of God, whether they be Divine mysteries, or Divine benefits, both what God hath done for us, and what God hath wrought in us.

13 Which things also we speak, not in the words which man's wisdom teacheth, but which the Holy Ghost teacheth, comparing spiritual things with spiritual.

Reason and all practice directeth men to speak and write of subjects in a style and phrase fitted to the matter about which they write or discourse. Our subjects, saith the apostle, were sublime, spiritual subjects; therefore I did not discourse them like an orator, with an excellency of speech or of wisdom, (as ver. 1.) or with the enticing or persuasive words of man's wisdom, (as he had said, ver. 4.) nor with words which man's wisdom teacheth, (which is his phrase here,) but with words which the Holy Ghost hath taught us, either in holy writ, or by its impressions upon our minds, where they are first formed. Comparing spiritual things with spiritual; fitting spiritual things to spiritual persons who are able to understand them, or fitting spiritual language to spiritual matter, speaking the oracles of God as the oracles of God, 1 Pet. iv. 11; not declaiming like an orator, nor arguing philosophically like an Athenian philosopher, but using a familiar, plain, spiritual style, giving you the naked truths of God without any paint or gaudery of phrase.

14 But the natural man receiveth not the things of the Spirit of God: for they are foolishness unto him: neither can he know them, because they are spiritually discerned.

There are great disputes here, who is meant by the natural man, ψυχικός άνθρωπος. Some think that by the natural man here is meant the carnal man: thus, chap. xv. 44, the natural body is opposed to the spiritual body; besides, they say, that in the constant phrase of holy writ, man, who is made up of flesh and spirit, as his essential parts, hath constantly his denomination from one of them, and all men in the world are either carnal or spiritual, and that the Greek word ψυχή signifies that soul and life which is common to all men, from whence all common motions and affections are, and is opposed to the Holy Spirit, which dwells in the souls of them that are sanctified, by which they are led and guided, &c. Thus, say they, the natural man is one who is a servant to his lusts and corruption, under the perfect government of his soul considered merely as natural, all whose motions in that estate of sin and corruption are inordinate. Others think that the apostle here speaks of such as are weak in the faith, little ones, babes in Christ, who had need of milk, not of strong meat, and are natural men in comparison of those more spiritual and perfect. In this sense indeed the apostle, chap. iii. 4, calleth them carnal. But there is nothing more plain, than that the apostle, under the notion of ψυχικός άνθρωπος (which we translate natural man) here, understands all such as were not perfect and spiritual, such to whom God hath not by his Spirit revealed the deep things of God, ver. 10; such as had only received the spirit of the world, not the spirit of God, by which alone men come to know the things that are freely given them of God, as ver. 12. Receiveth not the things of the Spirit of God: all these, though some of them are much better than others, having their minds more cultivated and adorned with worldly knowledge and wisdom, yet do not in their hearts (though they may with their ears) receive, that is, believe, embrace, and close with or approve of, spiritual and Divine mysteries, such doctrines as are purely matters of faith, standing upon a Divine revelation. For they are foolishness unto him; for men of wit and reason count them all foolishness, being neither demonstrable by sense or natural reason. Neither can he know them, because they are spiritually discerned; neither can any man, no otherwise taught and instructed, so comprehend them, as to give a firm and fixed assent to them, or in heart approve them, because they are only to be seen and discerned in a spiritual light, the Holy Spirit of God, which is the Spirit of wisdom and revelation in the knowledge of Christ, enlightening their understandings, that they may know the hope of his calling, and what is the riches of the glory of his inheritance in the saints, and what is the exceeding greatness of his power to them that believe, according to the working of his mighty power, &c., Eph. i. 17—19. Thus the apostle gives a reason of what he had said, ver. 8, that none of the princes of the world knew the wisdom of God.

15 But he that is spiritual judgeth all things, yet he himself is judged of no man.

He that is spiritual, in this verse, is opposed to the natural man, in the former verse, ψευματικός to ψυχικός. So that by spiritual here is understood, he that is taught by the Spirit of God, and is by him specially and savingly enlightened. Judgeth or discerneth all things, that is, of this nature, the mysteries of God, which concern man's eternal life and salvation; not that every good Christian hath any such perfect judgment or power of discerning, but according to the measure of illumination which he hath received. Yet he himself is judged of no man; it may as well be translated, of nothing; and the term judged might as well have been translated examined, or searched, as it is in Acts iv. 9; xii. 19; xvii. 11; xxiv. 8; or condemned. The wisdom that is of God is not to be subjected to the wisdom of men, nor to be judged of any man, but only the spiritual man. The truth, which the spiritual man owneth and professeth, dependeth only upon God and his word, and is not subjected to the authority and judgment of men, nor the dictates of human reason: so as the spiritual man, so far forth as he is spiritual, is neither judged by any man nor by any thing. There are some that by he himself understand the Spirit of God; he indeed is judged of no man, nor of any thing; but that seemeth a much more strained sense.

For who hath known the mind of the Lord, that he may instruct him? this phrase is taken out of Isa. xl. 13, and was quoted by our apostle before, Rom. xi. 34: the sense of it, as here used, is, For what natural man, that never was taught and enlightened by the Spirit of God, could ever know the secret counsels of God, and the Divine mysteries of man's salvation? Nor can any instruct him what to do. It is by some observed, that συμβιβάζει signifies, by arguments to bring one over to be of his mind, which indeed is a kind of instruction. But (saith the apostle) we, who have the Spirit of God given to us, dwelling and working in us, and instructing us, we have the mind of Christ; for the Spirit of Christ, which is our teacher, knoweth his mind, and hath revealed it unto us.

CHAP. III

Paul showeth that he could not instruct the Corinthians in the higher doctrines of Christianity because of their carnal mind, 1, 2; which temper discovered itself in their factions, 3, 4. The most eminent preachers of the gospel are but instruments employed by God in building his church, 5—9. Paul hath laid the only true foundation, Christ Jesus; and others must take heed what they build thereon, 10—15. Christians are God's temple, not to be defiled, 16, 17. Worldly wisdom is foolishness with God, 18—20. They that are Christ's must not glory in men, 21—23.

AND I, brethren, could not speak unto you as unto <sup>a</sup>spiritual, but as unto <sup>b</sup>carnal, even as unto <sup>c</sup>babes in Christ.

The apostle plainly returneth in this chapter to reprove them for their divisions and factions, for which he had begun to reprove them, chap. i. 11; and (as some think) here he anticipateth an objection, which they might have made against him, against his reproving and judging of them, whereas he that is spiritual (as he had now said) is judged of no man. I, (saith he,) brethren, could not speak unto you as unto spiritual, that is, as to Christians who had made any great proficiency in the ways of God, and had arrived to any just degrees of spiritual perfection; but as unto carnal, that is, persons who, though you are not under the full conduct and government of your flesh and sensitive appetite, yet are far from being perfect, either in faith or holiness. In Christ, but not as grown men, but as babes, as the apostle fully explaineth this term, Heb. v. 12, 13, such as had need be taught again which are the first principles of the oracles of God; and have need of milk, and not of strong meat: for every one that useth milk is unskilful in the word of righteousness; for he is a babe.

2 I have fed you with <sup>d</sup>milk, and not with meat: <sup>e</sup>for hitherto ye were not able to bear it, neither yet now are ye able.

Milk signifies what the apostle to the Hebrews calls the first principles of the oracles of God, and so is opposed to sublime spiritual doctrines, here set out under the notion of meat; called strong meat, Heb. v. 14, fit for those of full age: as young children's stomachs will not endure strong meat, so neither are sublime spiritual mysteries fit for new converts, until they have senses exercised to discern good and evil; and therefore the apostle gives this as a reason, why he had not communicated the deep things of God to them, because as yet they had not been able to bear the notion of them, nor indeed were they yet able: it should seem that there were many in the church of Corinth, who though they were true Christians, yet were not grown and judicious Christians, but had great imperfections, as indeed it will further appear in this Epistle.

3 For ye are yet carnal: for <sup>f</sup>whereas there is among you envying, and strife, and <sup>g</sup>divisions, are ye not carnal, and walk <sup>h</sup>as men?

For ye are yet carnal; not wholly carnal, but in a great measure so, not having your lusts and corrupt affections entirely subdued to the will of God, nor yet so much subdued as some other Christians have, and you ought to have.

As an evidence of this he mindeth them of the envying, strifes, and divisions that were amongst them. Strife and envyings are reckoned amongst the works of the flesh, Gal. v. 19—21; they are all opposite to love, in which the perfection of a Christian lieth. He told us before what strifes and contentions he meant, and tells us it again in the next verse.

4 For while one saith, <sup>i</sup>I am of Paul; <sup>j</sup>and another, I am of Apollos; are ye not carnal?

Not that Christians in so large a city as Corinth might not put themselves under several pastors, or, as to themselves, prefer one before another, either in respect of the more eminent gifts of God bestowed upon one, (as doubtless Paul was preferable to Apollos,) or in respect of the more suitableness of one man's gifts to their capacities than another: but their adherence so to one minister of the gospel, that for his sake they vilified and despised all others, that were also true and faithful servants of God in the work of his gospel, this was their sin, and spake them to have vicious and corrupt affections, and to walk more like men than like saints, not having a true notion of the ministers of Christ, nor behaving themselves towards them as they ought to do.

5 Who then is Paul, and who is Apollos, but <sup>k</sup>ministers by whom ye believed, even as the Lord gave to every man?

Neither Paul, nor yet Apollos, are authors of faith to you, but only instruments; it is the Lord that giveth to every man a power to believe; or else that latter phrase, as the Lord gave to every man, may be understood of ministers, whose abilities to the work of the ministry, and success in it, both depend upon God. The sense of the words is this, then: God giveth unto his ministers variety of gifts, and different success; but yet neither one nor the other of them are more than the servants of Christ in their ministry, persons whom God maketh use of to call upon and to prevail with men, to give credit to the doctrine of the gospel, and to receive and accept of Christ. The work is the Lord's, not theirs.

6 <sup>l</sup>I have planted, <sup>m</sup>Apollos watered; but God gave the increase.

God honoured me first to preach the gospel amongst you, Acts xviii. &c., and blessed my preaching to convert you unto Christ; then I left you: Apollos stayed behind, and he watered which I had planted, daily preaching amongst you; see Acts xviii. 24—26; he was a further means to build you up in faith and holiness; but God increased, or gave the increase, God gave the power by which you brought forth any fruit. The similitude is drawn from planters, whether husbandmen or gardeners; they plant, they water, but the growing, the budding, the bringing forth flowers or fruit by the plant, doth much more depend upon the soil in which it stands, the influence of heaven upon it, by the beams of the sun, and the drops of the dew and rain, and the internal virtue which the God of nature hath created in the plant, than upon the hand of him that planteth, or him who useth his watering-pot to water it. So it is with souls; one minister is used for conversion, or the first changing of souls; another is used for edification, or further building up of souls; but both conversion and edification are infinitely more from the new heart and new nature, which God giveth to souls, and from the influence of the Sun of righteousness by the Spirit of grace, working in and upon the soul, than from any minister, who is but God's instrument in those works.

7 So then <sup>n</sup>neither is he that planteth any thing, neither he that watereth; but God that giveth the increase.

So that, look as it is in earthly plantations, God hath the greatest influence upon the growth and fruitfulness of the plant, and the husbandman or gardener is nothing in comparison with God, who hath given to the plant planted its life and nature, by which it shooteth up, buddeth, and bringeth forth fruit, and maketh his sun to shine and his rain to fall upon it: so it is in the spiritual plantation, God is the principal efficient Cause, we are little instrumental causes in God's hand, nothing in comparison with God. I have planted, Apollos hath watered; but if we see a soul changed, or grow, and make any spiritual proficiency, we must say, Not unto us, O Lord, not unto us, but unto thy name be given the glory: God hath done the main work; we have not done any thing in comparison with him. These words do no more tend to vilify the ministry of the gospel, or make it useless, than, taking them in their native sense, as they respect earthly plantations, they would prove, that there is no need of the husbandman's or gardener's hand to plant or to water plants, because all that he doth of that nature is to no purpose, unless God first gives to the plant its proper nature and virtue, and then followeth the planting with the influence of the sun, dew, and rain. But yet it is observable, that the apostle doth not say, the man himself gives the increase, from the good use of the power that is naturally in his own will, but God giveth the increase; which argues the necessity of special grace both to conversion and edification, superadded to the best preaching of his ministers. Though Paul himself by preaching plants, and Apollos watereth, yet God must make the soul to increase with the increase of God. Hence the apostle argueth their unreasonableness, in adoring one minister, and magnifying him above another, when indeed neither the one nor the other had any principal efficiency in the production of the blessed effect, but a mere instrumental causation, the effect of which depended upon the sole blessing of God, in comparison with whom, in this working, neither the one nor the other minister was any thing.

8 Now he that planteth and he that watereth are one: and every man shall receive his own reward according to his own labour.

The ministers of Christ, though one be used in planting and another in watering, one in laying the foundation and another in building thereupon, yet are one; one in their office and work, one in their ministry, being all servants to Christ, who is one; all serving one and the same Lord, all doing the same business, proposing the same end, and with all their might labouring towards it; and therefore, as they ought not to divide into parties and factions, so you ought not for their sakes to be so divided. Yet they are not so one, but that one may labour more than another, and be honoured by God with more success than another, and every one shall receive a reward proportioned to his labour: the apostle saith not, according to the success of his labour, (that is not in his power,) but, according to his labour.

9 For we are labourers together with God: ye are God's husbandry, ye are God's building.

Though compared with God we are nothing, yet our station is no mean station; God works as the principal efficient Cause, we work with God as his instruments; God worketh one way, by his secret influence upon the heart, we another way, by publication of the gospel in people's ears, but the scope and end of the work is the same. The Lord is said to work with his ministers, Mark xvi. 20, and they are here said to work with him. Hence he proveth what he had before said, that they should be rewarded; God will not suffer those who work with him to be without their reward: as also that they were one, for they are all labourers together with God. Yet do not think yourselves our husbandry, for you are God's husbandry: thus God's people, Isa. lxi. 3, are called the planting of the Lord. God's building: thus the church is called the house of God, 1 Tim. iii. 15. Still the apostle minds them, that they were God's, not their minister's; it was God to whom they were beholden for their conversion, for their edification, &c.

10 According to the grace of God which is given unto me, as a wise master-builder, I have laid the foundation, and another buildeth thereon. But let every man take heed how he buildeth thereupon.

According to the grace of God which is given unto me:  $\chi\alpha\rho\upsilon$  here signifies either the ability which God hath given

Paul to preach the gospel, or the apostolical office, to which God had called him; he maketh both to proceed from God, and to be the effects of his free love and favour to him. According to this he saith, Look, as a wise master-builder first layeth the foundation, then buildeth upon the foundation which he hath laid; so I, being the first whom God pleased to employ in this his work at Corinth, have laid the foundation, that is, have first preached the gospel in this famous city: thus the first preaching of the gospel is called, a laying the foundation, Rom. xv. 20; Heb. vi. 1. Another buildeth thereon; afterwards Apollos and other ministers further carried on that work of preaching the gospel amongst them. But let every man take heed how he buildeth thereupon; but (saith he) whoever cometh to preach after me had need take heed what he buildeth; for, Gal. i. 8, though we, or an angel from heaven, preach any other gospel unto you than that which we have preached unto you, let him be accursed.

11 For other foundation can no man lay than that is laid, which is Jesus Christ.

Can in this text doth not signify a mere natural power, but a rightful power: No man by any just right or authority can lay any other foundation, can preach any other doctrine of salvation, than that which I have already preached, which is the doctrine of salvation by Jesus Christ. Neither is there salvation in any other; for there is none other name under heaven given among men, whereby we must be saved, Acts iv. 12.

12 Now if any man build upon this foundation gold, silver, precious stones, wood, hay, stubble; The apostle is discoursing metaphorically, he had compared the church of Corinth to a building, ver. 9, and called them there God's building; they were built upon the doctrine of the gospel, the doctrine of the apostles and prophets, who had preached Christ to them, this was the foundation; and had told us, that none, by any pretence of right, could lay any other foundation. But there was to be a superstructure upon this foundation, which might be of various materials: he names six; three very good and excellent, gold, silver, and precious stones; three others vile and invaluable, wood, hay, stubble. By these he either means good or bad works, or rather, good or bad doctrines. Good doctrine is signified by the gold, silver, and precious stones mentioned; bad doctrine by the wood, hay, and stubble mentioned; by which may be understood various degrees of bad doctrine, as some doctrines are more pernicious and damnable than others, though the others also be false, unprofitable, trivial, and of no significance to the good of souls, but bad, as they are unprofitable.

13 Every man's work shall be made manifest: for the day shall declare it, because it shall be revealed by fire; and the fire shall try every man's work of what sort it is.

Now, saith he, there will come a time when every man's, that is, every teacher's, work, or doctrine, shall be made manifest. As the metal is brought to the touchstone to be tried, whether it be gold or silver, or some baser metal; so there will come a time, when all doctrines shall be tried and made manifest, whether they be of God or no. For the day shall declare it: what day shall declare it is not so steadily agreed by interpreters. Some by a day here understand a long time, in process of time it shall be declared; as indeed erroneous doctrines have not used to obtain or prevail long: Dagon falls before the ark. Others understand it of a day of adversity and great affliction, the day of God's vengeance; and indeed thus it is often seen, a false faith, or a lie believed, will not carry a man through the difficulties which he meeteth with in an evil day: the truths of the gospel are of that nature, that they will give a soul relief and support in a day of affliction, and under God's severest dispensations, but errors and falsehoods will not do it. Others understand by the day here mentioned, the day of judgment, which is indeed often called the day of the Lord, chap. i. 8, and described by fire, Joel ii. 3; 2 Thess. i. 8; 2 Pet. iii. 10; but this text saith not the day of the Lord, but only the day. It seemeth, therefore, rather to signify the bright shining out of the gospel; for the text seemeth to speak of such a manifestation as shall be in this life, not in the day of judgment. Because it shall be revealed by fire; the same thing is also to be understood. The fire shall try every man's work of what sort it is: by the fire here mentioned, not the fire of God's wrath, or the fire of affliction and adversity, nor the fire of the last judgment, but the truth of the gospel shining forth in the world, and burning up the dross and stubble of corrupt, false doctrine, that shall bring all the doctrines which men teach, to the trial.

14 If any man's work abide which he hath built thereupon, <sup>b</sup> he shall receive a reward.

If any preacher keeps the foundation, and the doctrine which he hath built upon the true foundation prove consonant to the will of Christ, God will reward him for his labour: he shall hear the voice saying, Well done, good and faithful servant, enter thou into the joy of thy Lord.

15 If any man's work shall be burned, he shall suffer loss: but he himself shall be saved; <sup>c</sup> yet so as by fire.

But if his work do not abide, if it shall appear upon the more clear and bright shining out of the truth of the gospel, that though he hath held the foundation right, yet he hath built upon it wood, hay, and stubble, mixed fables, and idle stories, and corrupt doctrine with the doctrine of the gospel, he shall suffer loss by it, either by the afflicting hand of God, or by a loss of his reputation, or some other way. But yet God will not cast off a soul for every such error, if he keeps to the main foundation, Jesus Christ; he shall be saved, though it be as by fire, that is, with difficulty; which certainly is a more natural sense of this text, than those give, who interpret as by fire, of the fire of the gospel, or the fire of purgatory, of which the papists understand it. For, 1. It is, and always hath been, a proverbial form of speech to express a thing obtained by difficulty; we say, It is got out of the fire, &c. 2. For the fire of purgatory, it is a fiction, and mere imaginary thing, and of no further significance than to make the pope's chimney smoke. 3. That pretended fire only purgeth venial sins; this fire trieth every man's work, the gold as well as the stubble.

16 <sup>d</sup> Know ye not that ye are the temple of God, and that the Spirit of God dwelleth in you?

The apostle, ver. 9, had called the church of Corinth, and the particular members of it, God's building; after this he had enlarged in a discourse concerning the builders, and the foundation and superstructure upon that foundation; now he returns again to speak of the whole church, whom he here calleth the temple of God, with a manifest allusion to that noble and splendid house which Solomon first built, and was afterwards rebuilt by Zerubbabel, Ezra, and Nehemiah at Jerusalem, as the public place for the Jewish church to meet in to worship God according to the precept of the Levitical law: in which house God was said to dwell, because there he met his people, and blessed them, and there he gave answers to them from the mercy-seat. He calls them the temple of God, because they were built, that is, effectually called, for this very end, that they might be to the praise of the glory of his grace, wherein he hath made us accepted in the beloved, Eph. i. 6: and, as the apostle Peter further expoundeth this text, 1 Pet. ii. 5, the people of God are a spiritual house, an holy priesthood, to offer up spiritual sacrifices, acceptable to God by Jesus Christ. And God by his Spirit dwelt in them, both by his person, and by his gifts and graces, which is a far more noble dwelling in them than the dwelling of God was in the Jewish temple. From this text may be fetched an evident proof of the Divine nature, of the Third Person in the blessed Trinity; for he is not only called here the Spirit of God, but he is said to dwell in the saints: which dwelling of God in his people, is that very thing which maketh them the temple of God; and those who are here called the temple of God, are, chap. vi. 19, called the temple of the Holy Ghost.

17 If any man <sup>e</sup> defile the temple of God, him shall God destroy; for the temple of God is holy, which temple ye are.

If any man defile the temple of God, him shall God destroy; the word which we translate defile and destroy (for the Greek word is the same for both) signifieth to violate, corrupt, or destroy. Our translators generally render it corrupt, chap. xv. 33; 2 Cor. vii. 2; xi. 3; Eph. iv. 22; Jude 10; Rev. xix. 2. The people of God, who are here called the temple of God, are defiled, either by imbibing false doctrine, or being tempted to any looseness of life and conversation. Now, (saith the apostle,) if any one goeth about to do this, which all preachers do who teach any false doctrine, or any principles that lead to a liberty for the flesh, or lead to an ill and scandalous life, God shall destroy those men. For the temple of God is holy; for as the temple of God of old was a place built and set apart for holy uses, and therefore not without great peril to be abused and profaned; so those that are the people of God, are by God called and set apart in a more immediate, eminent manner for the honour and glory of God, and therefore cannot be debauched or defiled by any as instruments in that action, without exceeding great peril and hazard to them that endeavour and attempt any such thing.

18 <sup>f</sup> Let no man deceive himself. If any man among you seemeth to be wise in this world, let him become a fool, that he may be wise.

Let no man deceive himself: there are some that, with their eloquence and flourishes of words, or with their philosophical notions and reasonings, (which, Col. ii. 8, the apostle calls vain deceit;) or with their traditions after the rudiments of the world, (as the apostle addeth in that place,) would cheat and deceive your souls, under a pretence of making you wonderfully wise: the wisdom of the world is foolishness with God. If any man among you seemeth to be wise in this world; if any of you seemeth unto others, or seemeth unto himself, that is, thinketh that he is endued with what the world calleth wisdom. Let him become a fool, that he may be wise; if ever he would be truly wise, wise unto God, and to eternal life and salvation, let him be contented, by the wise men and philosophers of this world, to be looked upon as a fool; and let him be willing to deny himself in any notions or opinions of his own, which he hath taken up upon the credit of his natural reason and philosophical principles, which agree not with the Divine revelation, that so he may be truly and spiritually wise, truly understanding, savouring, and believing what God hath in his word revealed, and is alone able to make the man of God wise to salvation, thoroughly furnished unto every good work.

19 For <sup>g</sup> the wisdom of this world is foolishness with God. For it is written, He taketh the wise in their own craftiness.

For the wisdom of this world is foolishness with God; God accounteth that folly which the world calleth wisdom, and indeed it is so (for God cannot err, nor be mistaken in his judgment): the philosophers and wise men of the world propose the happiness of man as their end, which indeed is the true end which all men aim at, and do propound to themselves; true wisdom directeth the best means in order to the best end. Whatsoever directeth not to the best end, or to what is not the best means in order to that end, is not wisdom, but real folly; worldly wisdom neither directeth to the best end, for it looks at no further happiness than that of this life, nor yet to the best means, and therefore is truly, what God accounts it, foolishness. For it is written, He taketh the wise in their own craftiness; and to see the wise and learned men of the world thus err both in their judgment and practice, is no wonder at all; for God is set out of old by Eliphaz, as one that taketh the wise in their own craftiness, Job v. 13.

20 And again, <sup>h</sup> The Lord knoweth the thoughts of the wise, that they are vain.

And again, it was said by the psalmist, Psal. xciv. 11, that The Lord knoweth the thoughts of man, that they are vanity: man's counsels, imaginations, reasonings, they are

23 And 'ye are Christ's; and Christ is God's.

Here are in these two verses three things asserted: 1. The believer's title to all things. 2. The speciality of their title. 3. The force of the apostle's argument from hence, why they should not glory in men. He had said before, All things are yours, which he repeats again, ver. 22: they have a right and title to all things, and all things are for their good, use, and advantage. Amongst these he first reckons ministers: every one of them might lay a claim to Paul, to Apollos, to Peter; for they were all servants of Christ for the use of the church, a part of which they were. Then he goes on, and saith, the world, that is, the things of the world, are theirs; that is, whatsoever portion of them the providence of God orderly disposed to them, they had a true title to it, and it was for their use and advantage; so were the lives and deaths of God's ministers, their own lives and deaths, all things present, and all things that were to come, they were all theirs by a just title; if the providence of God gave them to them in an orderly way, they might comfortably use them. They themselves were Christ's; they were not of Paul, nor of Apollos, nor of Peter. He that had the bride was the bridegroom; these ministers were but the friends of their bridegroom. And Christ is God's, the Son of God by an eternal generation; the servant of God as man, and born under the law, so yielding obedience to his Father; the Messiah or Anointed, and sent of God as Mediator. All things are God's, by God given to Christ, by Christ given to and sanctified for you; that makes the believers' special title to all things. The men of the world derive their title to what they have from God alone, as Creator; they derive not from Christ, as being ingrafted and implanted into him. Hence the apostle rightly concludes their vanity, in glorying in their relation to this or that special apostle or minister, whereas they had a true and just right to the labours of all ministers, and ought to look upon all faithful ministers as God's gifts to his whole church, and for the advantage and benefit of all: yet this hindereth not, but that people ought to have their particular pastors and teachers, to whom they ought ordinarily to attend in their ministry; but they ought not to have their persons in such admiration, as for them to despise or slight any other faithful ministers, nor to make parties and factions in the church of God.

CHAP. IV

Paul showeth in what account such as he should be held, of whose fidelity it should be left to God to judge, 1—5. He dissuadeth the Corinthians from valuing themselves in one teacher above another, since all had their respective distinctions from God, 6, 7. To their self-sufficient vanity he opposeth his own despised and afflicted state, 8—13; warning them, as their only father in Christ, and urging them to follow him, 14—16. For the same cause he setteth Timotheus, and meant soon to follow in person, when he would inquire into the authority of such as opposed him, 17—21.

LET a man so account of us, as of <sup>a</sup> the ministers of Christ, <sup>b</sup> and stewards of the mysteries of God.

The apostle here gives us the right notion of the preachers of the gospel; they are but ministers, that is, servants, so as the honour that is proper to their Master, for a principal efficiency in the conversion and building up of souls, belongeth not to them; they are ministers of Christ, so have their primary relation to him, and only a secondary relation to the church to which they are ministers; they are ministers of Christ, and so in that ministration can only execute what are originally his commands, though those commands of Christ may also be enforced by men: ministers of the gospel, not of the law, upon whom lies a primary obligation to preach Christ and his gospel unto people. They are also stewards of the mysteries of God, such to whom God hath committed his word and sacraments to dispense out unto his church. The word mystery signifieth any thing that is secret, but more especially it signifieth a Divine secret, represented by signs and figures; or a religious secret, not obvious to every capacity or understanding. Thus we read of the mysteries of the kingdom of heaven, Matt. xiii. 11; the mystery of godliness, 1 Tim. iii. 16; the mystery of Christ, Eph. iii. 4. The wisdom of God, Col. ii. 2; the incarnation of Christ, 1 Tim. iii. 16; the calling of the Gentiles, Eph. iii. 4; the resurrection from the dead, 1 Cor. xv. 21; Christ's mystical union and communion with his church, Eph. v. 32; the sublime counsels of God, 1 Cor. xiii. 2, are all called mysteries. Ministers are the stewards of the mysterious doctrines and institutions of Christ, which we usually comprehend under the terms of the word and sacraments.

2 Moreover it is required in stewards, that a man be found faithful.

It is required of all servants, but especially of chief servants, such as stewards are, who are intrusted with their masters' goods, to be dispensed out to others. The faithfulness of a steward in dispensing out his master's goods lies in his giving them out according to his master's order, giving to every one their portion, not detaining any thing from others which it is his master's will they should have; as Paul gloried, Acts xx. 20, 27, that he had kept back from the Ephesians nothing that was profitable for them, nor shunned to declare to them all the counsel of God; not giving holy things to dogs, or casting pearls before swine, contrary to Christ's direction, Matt. vii. 6.

3 But with me it is a very small thing that I should be judged of you, or of man's <sup>+ Gr. day.</sup> judgment: yea, I judge not mine own self. <sup>ch. 3. 13.</sup>

Those who said, I am of Apollos, and I am of Cephas, did at least tacitly judge Paul, and prefer Apollos and Cephas before him; and it is probable, and will appear also from other parts of these Epistles, that they passed very indecent censures concerning Paul: he therefore tells them, that he valued very little what they or any other men said of him. In the Greek it is, of man's day; but it is generally thought that our translators have given us the true sense, in translating it man's judgment, day being put for judgment; as Jer. xvii. 16, where woeful day signifies woeful judgment. So the day of the Lord in Scripture often signifieth the Lord's judgment: the reason of that form of speech seems to be, because persons cited to a court of judgment use to be cited to appear on a certain day. Yea, I judge not mine own self; yea, saith the apostle, I pronounce no sentence for myself, I leave myself to the judgment of God. I may be deceived in my judgment concerning myself, and therefore I will affirm nothing as to myself.

4 For I know nothing by myself; *yet am I not hereby justified: but he that judgeth me is the Lord.

I know nothing by myself; nothing amiss, nothing that is evil; yet this must not be interpreted universally, as if St. Paul knew nothing that was evil and sinful by himself;

himself, Rom. vii., tells us the contrary; but it must be understood with respect to his discharge of his ministerial office: I do not know any thing wherein I have wilfully failed in the discharge of my ministry; yet even as to that I durst not stand upon my own righteousness and justification before God, I may have sinned ignorantly, or have forgotten some things wherein I did offend. But he that judgeth me is the Lord; God knoweth more of me than I know of myself, and it is he that judgeth, and must judge me. Though in this text Paul doth not speak of his whole life and conversation, but only of his conversation with respect to his ministry; yet the conclusion from hence, that no man can be justified from his own works, is good; for if a man cannot be justified from his conscience not rebuking him for his errors in one part of his conversation, he cannot be justified from his conscience not rebuking him for his whole conversation. For he that keepeth the whole law, if he offendeth but in one point, must be guilty of all, because the law curseth him who continueth not in every point of the law to do it.

Therefore judge nothing before the time, until the Lord come; seeing that the judgment of secret things belongs to God, judge nothing before the time, which God hath set to judge all things. The works of the flesh are manifest, and men may judge of them; but for secret things, of which it is impossible that those who do not know the hearts of men should make up a judgment, do not judge of them before the time, when God will certainly come to judge all men. Who both will bring to light the hidden things of darkness, and will make manifest the counsels of the hearts: if men cloak the hidden things of darkness with the cover of hypocrisy and fair pretences, they will at that day be most certainly uncovered, and the secret thoughts, counsels, and imaginations of men's hearts shall in that day be made manifest. And then shall every man have praise of God; and then those that have done well, every of them shall have praise of God; as, on the contrary, (which is understood, though not here expressed,) those that are hypocrites, and whose hearts have been full of evil thoughts and counsels, shall by God be put to shame and exposed to contempt.

6 And these things, brethren, <sup>i</sup> I have in a figure transferred to myself and to Apollos for your sakes; <sup>h</sup> that ye might learn in us not to think of men above that which is written, that no one of you <sup>j</sup> be puffed up for one against another.

And these things, brethren, I have in a figure transferred to myself and to Apollos for your sakes: by these words the apostle lets us know, that though he had said, chap. i. 12, that some of them said, We are of Paul, and others, We are of Apollos, yet the names of Paul and of Apollos were but used to represent other of their teachers, which were the heads of those factions which were amongst them. In very deed there were none of them that said, We are of Paul or of Apollos, (for those that were the disciples of Paul and Apollos were better taught,) but they had other teachers amongst them as to whom they made factions, whom Paul had a mind to reprove, with their followers; and to avoid all odium, that both they and their hearers might take no offence at his free reproof of them, he makes use of his own name, and that of Apollos, and speaketh to the hearers of these teachers, as if they were his own and Apollos's disciples; that those whom the reproof and admonition concerned properly, might be reproofed under the reproof of others. That you might learn in us not to think of men above that which is written; and that (as the apostle saith) all the church of Corinth, as well ministers as people, might learn to have humble opinions and thoughts of themselves, not to think of themselves above what, by the rules of God's word, was written in the Old Testament they ought to think; or above what he had before written in this Epistle, or to the Romans, chap. xii. 3. That no one of you be puffed up for one against another; and that none of them, whether ministers or private Christians, might be puffed up. The word signifieth to be swelled or blown up as a bladder or a pair of bellows, which is extended with wind: it is used in this chapter, ver. 18, 19; chap. viii. 1; Col. ii. 18.

7 For who <sup>k</sup> maketh thee to differ from another? and <sup>l</sup> what hast thou that thou didst not receive? now if thou didst receive it, why dost thou glory, as if thou hadst not received it?

It is apparent that pride was the reigning sin of many in this church of Corinth; pride, by reason of those parts and gifts wherein they excelled, whether they were natural or acquired habits, or common gifts of the Spirit which were infused: to abate this tumour, the apostle minds them to consider, whence they had these gifts from which they took occasion so to exalt and prefer themselves; whether they were the authors of them to themselves, or did receive them from God. Now if thou didst receive it, why dost thou glory, as if thou hadst not received it? it became none of them to glory in what they had received from another, and were beholden to another for. What the apostle here speaketh concerning natural or spiritual abilities, is applicable to all good things; and the consideration here prompted, is a potent consideration to abate the pride and swelling of a man's heart upon any account whatsoever; for there is nothing wherein a man differeth or is distinguished from another, or wherein he excelleth another, but it is given him from God; be it riches, honour, natural or spiritual gifts and abilities, they are all received from the gift of God, who gives a man power to get wealth, Deut. viii. 18; who putteth down one and setteth up another, Psal. lxxv. 7: and, as the apostle saith in this Epistle, chap. xii. 7—9, gives the manifestation of the Spirit to every man to profit withal: to one by the Spirit the word of wisdom; to another the word of knowledge; to another faith; to another the gifts of healing, &c., all by the same Spirit.

8 Now ye are full, <sup>m</sup> now ye are rich, <sup>n</sup> ye have reigned as kings without us: and I would to God ye did reign, that we also might reign with you.

Now ye are full, now ye are rich; you that are the teachers at Corinth, or you that are the members of the church there, think yourselves full of knowledge and wisdom, so as you stand in need of no further learning or instruction. Ye have reigned as kings without us; ye think now you have got a kingdom, and are arrived at the top of felicity. And I would to God ye did reign, that we also might reign with you; I am so far from envying you, that I wish it were so, and we might have a share with you. The apostle speaketh this ironically, not that he indeed thought they were so, but reflecting on their vain and too good an opinion of themselves.

9 For I think that God hath set forth <sup>o</sup> us the apostles last, <sup>p</sup> as it were appointed to death: for <sup>q</sup> we are made a <sup>r</sup> spectacle unto the world, and to angels, and to men.

For I think that God hath set forth us the apostles last, as it were appointed to death; the lot of us who are the apostles of Christ is not so externally happy, but a lot of poverty and misery, as if we were the worst of men, men appointed to death. For we are made a spectacle unto the world, and to angels, and to men; to be a mere sight or gazing-stock to the world, angels, or men. Some think that the apostle here hath a reference to the barbarous practice of the Romans, who first exposed and carried about for a sight those persons that were condemned to fight with wild beasts, that by them they might be torn in pieces. You are happy men, saith the apostle, if you can own Christ, and profess Christianity, and yet be in such credit and favour with the world, so full, and so rich, and so like princes: we are those whom God hath honoured to be his apostles and the first ministers of the gospel; our lot and portion is far otherwise.

Thus it hath been with us from the beginning of our profession of Christ, and thus it is with us at this day, saith the apostle: from whence he gives these Corinthians and their false teachers a just reason to suspect themselves, whether they were true and sincere professors, yea or no, and to consider how it came to pass, that their lot in the world was so different from the lot of those whom the Lord had dignified with the title and office of his apostles. The condition of the most faithful and able ministers and the most sincere Christians that have been in the world, hath always been a mean and afflicted state and condition.

12 And labour, working with our own hands: <sup>a</sup> being reviled, we bless; being persecuted, we suffer it:

And labour, working with our hands; we do not only labour in the word and doctrine, but we labour with our hands, that we might not be burdensome to the church, our hands ministering to our necessities, Acts xx. 34; though, as he saith, chap. ix. 4, they had a power to eat and drink, that is, a right to have demanded meat and drink of them, and might have forborne working; for who goeth a warfare at his own charges? ver. 6, 7. Whence we may observe, that though the ministers of Christ ought to be maintained by the churches to which they relate, and they sin if they neglect it; yet where this either is not done through men's sinful neglect of them, or cannot be done through the poverty of the members of such churches, it is lawful for them to labour with their hands. Being reviled, we bless; we are reviled and spoken ill of, but we do not revile others, but speak well of them, and wish well to them. Being persecuted, we suffer it; though we be hunted and pursued to the endangering of our lives and liberties, yet we do make no resistance, but patiently suffer it. By this the apostle showeth them the duty of Christians, as well as their lot and portion in this life; and also acutely reflecteth on them and their teachers, who were some of those that thus reviled the apostles; and though they did not, it may be, smite them with their hands, yet they persecuted them with their tongues; and leaves it to their consideration, whether the apostles or they lived more up to the rule of Christianity given by Christ, Matt. v. 39—41.

13 Being defamed, we entreat: <sup>y</sup> we are made as the filth of the earth, and are the offscouring of all things unto this day.

Being defamed, we entreat: we are blasphemed, Gr. that is, spoken evil of, which is the same with defamed in our language, men speak all manner of evil of us to take away our reputation; but we entreat God for them: the word signifieth to exhort, entreat, comfort, we exercise ourselves in all pious and charitable offices toward them, who are most uncharitable toward us. We are made as the filth of the earth, and are the offscouring of all things unto this day: here are two words used, which signify the most vile, abject, contemptible things in the world, excrements, sweep-ings of houses. The apostle by these two words signifies, that no persons could be more base, vile, and contemptible than they were, nothing more despised, or in less esteem: he speaketh not this as complaining, or in any discontent at what he saw was the will of God concerning them; but to show them the difference betwixt the apostles, and them and their teachers, and possibly reflecting upon them, as being in some degree guilty of this scorn and contempt of them, or at least, more than they ought, neglecting them under these mean and afflictive circumstances.

14 I write not these things to shame you, but <sup>a</sup> as my beloved sons I warn you. <sup>z</sup> 1 Thess. 2. 11.

I tell you not of this to make you blush, as having had any hand in these indignities which are put upon us, nor yet to shame you (though possibly you have reason to be ashamed, either for your neglect of us, or for your adding to our affliction); I look upon you as my sons, and sons whom I love: I only write to warn you, both of your duty, to have some respect for us, and of your sin, if you have neglected us beyond what was your duty to have done.

15 For though ye have ten thousand instructors in Christ, yet have ye not many fathers: for <sup>a</sup> in Christ Jesus I have begotten you through the Gospel.

The great lesson of this text is, That people ought to have a tender respect for those ministers whom God hath honoured with their first conversion, and bringing them home to Christ. God may make use of a multitude of ministers to instruct Christians, and carry on his work in their souls to perfection; but he maketh use of some particular minister at first to convince them, and be an instrument in the changing of their hearts; such they ought to have a great value for, they are their spiritual fathers in a proper sense. For, saith the apostle, in Christ Jesus I have begotten you through the gospel: where we have regeneration (as it signifieth a new state) set out in its causes. The principal efficient cause is Christ Jesus; the instrumental cause is the minister of the gospel; the means is the doctrine of the gospel, or the preaching of the gospel. In Christ Jesus signifieth here by the grace of Christ Jesus; those who are born again, are not born of flesh or of blood, but of the will of God, John i. 13, and by the influence of Christ upon their hearts; though God makes use of the minister of the gospel as his instrument, and the minister makes use of the word and the preaching of the gospel, as the sacred means which God hath appointed to that end, 1 Pet. i. 23. All these causes unite and concur in the work of regeneration.

I might as a father command you, but I beseech you, be ye followers of me, in preserving the unity and promoting the holiness of the church. He expounds this, chap. xi. 1, Be ye followers of me, as I am of Christ. Holiness of life and conversation is necessary to a true minister of Christ; for their people ought not only to be their hearers, but their followers; they are ensamples to the flock, 1 Pet. v. 3, and ought to be examples of believers, in word, in conversation, in charity, in spirit, in faith, in purity, 1 Tim. iv. 12; in all things showing themselves patterns of good works; in doctrine showing uncorruptness, gravity, sincerity, &c., Tit. ii. 7. Those who teach well and live ill, are no good ministers of Christ; they cannot say unto people, Be ye followers of me.

17 For this cause have I sent unto you <sup>c</sup> Timothy, <sup>d</sup> who is my beloved son, and faithful in the Lord, who shall bring you <sup>e</sup> into remembrance of my ways which be in Christ, as I <sup>f</sup> teach every where <sup>g</sup> in every church. <sup>e</sup> Acts 19. 22. <sup>f</sup> ch. 16. 10. <sup>g</sup> Phil. 2. 19. <sup>h</sup> 1 Thess. 3. 2. <sup>i</sup> 1 Tim. 1. 2. <sup>j</sup> 2 Tim. 1. 2. <sup>k</sup> e ch. 11. 2. <sup>l</sup> f ch. 7. 17. <sup>m</sup> g ch. 14. 33.

This Timothy Paul found at Lystra, Acts xvi. 1. His father was a Greek, his mother a Jewess, therefore Paul circumcised him; her name was Eunice, the daughter of Lois, 2 Tim. i. 5. Paul took him along with him in his travels. He was ordained by the imposition of the hands of the presbytery, 1 Tim. iv. 14; 2 Tim. i. 6. Paul calls him his beloved son, either because he was his spiritual son, or because he was by him instructed in the gospel: he calls him his own son in the faith, 1 Tim. i. 2. Faithful in the Lord, because he was faithful in the work of the Lord, in the business of the ministry. Who shall bring you into remembrance of my ways which be in Christ, as I teach every where in every church; he (saith the apostle) shall bring to your remembrance my ways in the Lord, he shall acquaint you with both what doctrine I have preached and what course of life I have lived; how I have preached to every church, what rules I have given for the ordering of every church, and how I have walked before and toward them.

<sup>h</sup> ch. 5. 2. <sup>18</sup> Now some are puffed up, as though I would not come to you.

I hear that some of your teachers, and some of your members, are so conceited of themselves, that they would persuade you that I durst not see their faces, or come to discourse with them face to face, and therefore would not come unto you.

<sup>1</sup> Aets 18. 21. <sup>19</sup> But I will come to you shortly, <sup>k</sup> if the Lord will, and will know, not the speech of them which are puffed up, but the power.

<sup>2</sup> Cor. 1. 15, 23. <sup>2</sup> Aets 18. 21. <sup>20</sup> For I will come to you shortly: Paul intended in his journey to Rome to pass through Macedonia and Achaia, but he knew that God could hinder him, and therefore he adds, if the Lord will: neither did Paul go to them so soon as he intended, but had time before he went to write another Epistle, as we shall afterwards find. All Christians are bound, when they promise or resolve upon any journeys, to understand, if God will, and to have in their thoughts the power of God to hinder them, and to speak with submission to his pleasure, who counteth their steps and telleth their wanderings, and ordereth their steps; though they be not strictly bound at all times to use this form of speech. And will know, not the speech of them which are puffed up, but the power: and when I come, then I shall understand these teachers of yours, who so vilify me; I shall not regard so much their fine words and philosophical reasonings, as what there is of spiritual life and power in them; either in their doctrine or life, how conducive it is to the ends of the gospel, and how consonant to the truth of the gospel, what good they do amongst you, what manner of lives they live: these are the things that my eyes shall be upon, and which I shall regard.

The kingdom of God in the church, or the kingdom of God in the particular soul. God hath not sent his ministers to subdue souls to himself by fine, florid words and phrases, but by a lively preaching the gospel, while his power attends their plain preaching; and the power and efficacy of the preachers' doctrine appeareth in their holy life and conversation, so as their people cannot say to them, Physician, heal thyself, as to those spiritual diseases which thou wouldst cure us of. So the kingdom of God in particular souls doth not appear in words, but in the power which the word of God hath upon men's hearts, in subduing their lusts and corruptions, and bringing their hearts into a subjection to his will.

<sup>m</sup> 2 Cor. 10. <sup>21</sup> What will ye? shall I come unto you with a rod, or in love, and in the spirit of meekness?

Which will ye rather choose? that I should come unto you as a father cometh to his child under some guilt for which he must punish and correct him, or as a father cometh to his child that hath done nothing provoking his displeasure, in love, and meekly? I am not willing to come to you to correct and punish any of you by ecclesiastical censures, which are a rod which Christ hath intrusted to me; I had rather come in love and meekness, that we might mutually rejoice in each other's society.

CHAP. V

Paul reproveth a scandalous incest committed and protected from censure in the church at Corinth, 1, 2; and by his authority in Christ excommunicateth the offender 3—5.

The necessity of purging out the old leaven, 6—8. Christians guilty of notorious crimes are not to be consorted with, 9—13.

IT is reported commonly that there is fornication among you, and such fornication as is not so much as named among the Gentiles, that one should have his father's wife.

The apostle here giveth a reason of the question which he propounded in the former chapter, whether they would be willing that, when he came to them, he should come unto them with a rod? because such horrid wickedness was committed amongst them, as he, being an apostle to whom Christ had intrusted the government of his church, could not pass over without correction: he instanceth here in one, which he calleth fornication; by which word is often in Scripture to be understood all species of uncleanness, though, in strict speaking, we by fornication understand the uncleanness of a single person, as by adultery we understand the uncleanness of a person married, and by incest the uncleanness of a person with some near relation, as a mother, a sister: in strict speaking, the sin here reflected on was incest; but the Scripture by this word comprehends all species of unlawful mixtures. Such fornication as is not so much as named among the Gentiles: this sin he aggravates by saying, that the Gentiles by the light of nature discerned and declined such an abomination; by whom is not to be understood the more brutish part, but the more civilized part of the heathen, such as the Romans, &c. were. That one should have his father's wife: by having his father's wife, in this place, is not to be understood, the marrying of his father's wife, his father being dead; but the using of his father's wife as his wife while his father was yet alive, (as some judicious interpreters think,) because hardly any nation would have endured a son openly to have married the widow of his father. And in 2 Cor. vii. 12, there is mention made not only of one that had done, but of another that had suffered the wrong; which latter must be the father himself: so as there was both incest and whoredom in this fact.

<sup>d</sup> ch. 4. 18. <sup>2</sup> And ye are puffed up, and have not rather mourned, that he that hath done this deed might be taken away from among you.

And ye are puffed up; you are so conceited of your own parts and gifts, and are so full of your contentions about the preference of ministers, and things of little concernment to your souls and the interest of the church, that you have not been able to find leisure to deal with this scandalous person, as a church of Christ ought to have done. This seemeth rather the reason of their not mourning, than any rejoicing in iniquity, as if they had thought the gospel had opened that door against this licentiousness which the law had shut, or triumphed in this incestuous person, being one of their teachers (which can hardly be thought). And have not rather mourned, that he that hath done this deed might be taken away from among you: they ought rather to have mourned, keeping times of fasting and prayer, on the behalf of this scandalous member amongst them, that his sin might (upon his due sense of it, and repentance for it) have been forgiven him, and the blot upon their church, by their having such a one in their fellowship, might be washed out, by his being cast out of their fellowship and communion. It was no time for them to glory in their gifts, and be puffed up with the parts of their teachers or members, when they had such a blot upon them by a putrid member that was amongst them. They had a great deal more cause for humiliation, than for pride and glorying.

<sup>f</sup> Col. 2. 5. <sup>3</sup> For I verily, as absent in body, but present in spirit, have judged already, as though I were present, concerning him that hath so done this deed,

Though I be absent as to my bodily presence, yet God having intrusted me with a superintendency and care over his church amongst you, out of the care and solicitude which I have for you, as well as the other churches of Christ, and in discharge of that trust which God hath reposed in me, I do determine, and have determined as much as if I were present amongst you, what ought to be done by you concerning this person so notoriously scandalous.

4 In the name of our Lord Jesus Christ, when ye are gathered together, and my spirit, with the power of our Lord Jesus Christ,

In the name of our Lord Jesus Christ; either having solemnly called upon the name of the Lord Jesus Christ for his counsel and direction, or blessing your action, that it may be of spiritual advantage to the party concerned; or according to the command of Christ, or by his authority, or for his glory. It may be referred either to what went before, I have judged or determined by the authority of Christ; or to what follows after. When ye are gathered together, and my spirit; when you are gathered together by the authority, or according to the institution, of Jesus Christ, and my spirit with you, you having my judgment in the case. With the power of our Lord Jesus Christ; and the power and authority of Christ committed to me, and to you, as a church of Christ.

5<sup>a</sup> To deliver such an one unto Satan for the destruction of the flesh, that the spirit may be saved in the day of the Lord Jesus.

What this delivering to Satan is, (of which also we read, 1 Tim. i. 20.) is something doubted by interpreters. That by it is to be understood excommunication, or casting out of the communion of the church, can hardly be doubted by any that considereth. 1. That the apostle speaketh of an action which might be, and ought to have been, done by the church of Corinth when they met together, and for the not doing of which the apostle blameth them. 2. That the end of the action was, taking away the scandalous person from the midst amongst them, ver. 2; purging out the old leaven, that they might become a new lump, ver. 7. 3. It was a punishment inflicted by many. Those, therefore, who interpret the phrase of an extraordinary power given the apostles or primitive churches, miraculously to give up the scandalous person to the power of the devil, to be afflicted, tormented, or vexed by him, (though not unto death,) seem not to have considered, that the apostle would not have blamed the church of Corinth for not working a miracle, and that we no where read of any such power committed to any church of Christ; and one would in reason think, that persons under such circumstances should rather be pitied and helped, than shunned and avoided. The only question therefore is, Why the apostle expresseth excommunication under the notion of being delivered to Satan? Some have thought that the reason is, because God was so pleased to ratify the just censures of his church, delivering such persons as were cast out of it into the hands of Satan, to be vexed and tormented by him; and that this might be in some particular cases, none can deny, but that this was an ordinary dispensation of Providence as to all excommunicated persons, wants better proof than any have yet showed us. It appears to me a more probable account of this phrase which others have given us, telling us, that Satan is called the god of the world, and the prince of the world, as world is taken in opposition to the church of God; so as delivering to Satan, is no more than our Saviour's—If he neglect to hear the church, let him be unto thee as an heathen man and a publican, Matt. xviii. 17. Only for the further terror of it, the apostle expresseth it by this phrase of delivering up to Satan; thereby letting us know, how dreadful a thing it is to be out of God's special protection, and shut out from the ordinary means of grace and salvation, and exposed to the temptations of our grand adversary the devil, which is the state of all those who are out of the church, either having never been members of it, or, according to the rules of Christ, cast out of the communion of it. For the destruction of the flesh, that the spirit may be saved in the day of the Lord Jesus: the end of excommunication is not for the destruction of the person of him who is cast out, but for the destruction of his flesh, that is, his lusts, which are often in Scripture called flesh, or the maceration and affliction of his body through grief and sorrow; for a determination of his fleshly being cannot be here understood by the destruction of the flesh, for that is no effect of excommunication; and those who interpret the delivery to Satan, of an extraordinary punishment, which the apostles or church in the primitive times had a power to inflict, make it to terminate not in the death, but in the torments only, of the person so punished. Again, the apostle mentioneth this punishment as a means to the eternal salvation of this person's soul in the day of Christ. There is no text in Scripture which more clearly asserts and opens the ordinance and nature of excommunication, than this text doth. As to those who are to inflict it, it lets us know, that it is to be done by the church, when gathered together; though the elders of the church may put the church upon it, and decree it, yet the consent and approbation of the whole church must be to it; and indeed it is vain for the officers of a church to cast any out of a communion, when the members of that communion will yet have communion with him or them so cast out. It also lets us know, that it is a censure by which men are not shut out of the fellowship of men as men, but of men as Christians, as a church of Christ, in such religious actions and duties as concern them, considered as such a body: excommunication doth not make it unlawful for persons to buy and sell with the persons excommunicated, but to eat and drink at the Lord's table with them, or have communion with them in acts proper to a church as the church of Christ. The excommunicated person is in something a better condition than a heathen, for he is not to be counted as an enemy, but admonished as a brother, 2 Thess. iii. 15. Heathens also may hear the word; he is only to be avoided in acts of church fellowship; and as to intimate communion, though it be not religious, as appeareth from this chapter, ver. 11, and from 2 Thess. iii. 14. Further, we are taught from hence, that none ought to be excommunicated but for notorious, scandalous sins, nor without a solemn invocation on the name of Christ, inquiring his will in the case. We are further taught, that the person that is duly excommunicated is in a miserable state, he is delivered up to Satan, cast out of God's special protection, which is peculiar to his church, and oftentimes exposed to formidable temptations. Finally, we are from this text instructed, that excommunication ought to be so administered, as may best tend to the saving of the soul of him that falls under that censure: men's end in excommunications should not be the ruin of persons in their health or estates, only the humbling of them, and bringing them to a sense of their sins, and a true repentance; and all means in order to that end should be used, even to such as are cast out of any church, such are repeated admonitions, the prayers of the church for them, &c.

6<sup>a</sup> Your glorying is not good. Know ye not that a little leaven leaveneth the whole lump?

You boast and glory because you have men of parts amongst you, persons whom the world count wise; your glorying is not good; what do you glory for, when you have such a scandalous person amongst you, and take no care to cast him out? Can you be ignorant, that as a little leaven taken into the midst of the meal, and there kept, presently soureth the whole mass, and leaveneth the whole lump; so one notorious, scandalous sinner detained in the bosom of a church, casts a blot upon the whole church?

7 Purge out therefore the old leaven, that ye may be a new lump, as ye are unleavened. For even Christ our Passover is sacrificed for us:

Purge out therefore the old leaven: if the article τῆς in this place be emphatical (as some think) it ought to have been translated this old leaven, that is, the incestuous person, whose communion with you influenceth your whole communion, which is defiled by it, through your church's neglect of their duty with reference to him. If the article be not to be taken emphatically, these words may be understood as spoken to every individual member of this church, and is no more than put off the old man; the lusts and corruptions of our hearts, as well as false doctrine, being compared to leaven, which influence our whole man, as leaven doth the whole mass of meal. The first seemeth to be most proper to this place, if we consider what went before, and that the apostle is speaking to the whole church, and had been before speaking of an act to be done by them not singly, but when they should be gathered together in a church assembly; these he commands to purge out the old leaven, that is, this incestuous person. That ye may be a new lump; that they might be truly a Christian church, reformed from such things as no way agreed with the doctrine and profession of the gospel. As ye are unleavened; as you are or should be unleavened, like the Jews, who at the passover kept the feast of unleavened bread, when for seven days together they might have no leavened bread in any of their houses, Lev. xxiii. 6. For even Christ our Passover is sacrificed for us; for though the feast of the Jewish passover be ceased, and you be tied to none of those Levitical observations, yet you are under as high an obligation; for Christ, who is the true paschal Lamb, is slain or sacrificed for us, and your old man should be crucified with him, and you no longer serve sin.

8 Therefore let us keep the feast, not with old leaven, neither with the leaven of malice and wickedness; but with the unleavened bread of sincerity and truth.

Therefore let us keep the feast: here is a manifest allusion to the feast of the Jewish passover, which was immediately followed with the feast of unleavened bread for seven days. As the passover prefigured Christ, who is our paschal Lamb, whose flesh we eat and whose blood we drink by believing, and sacramentally in the Lord's supper; so the Jewish subsequent feast of unleavened bread prefigured all the days of a Christian's life, which are to be spent, not with the old leaven, neither with the leaven of malice and wickedness; but with the unleavened bread of sincerity and truth: which may be either understood of those evil and good habits which they signify, and so let us know the duty of every particular Christian to take heed of any malice or wickedness; or else (which seemeth most proper to this place) the abstract is put for the concrete, malice and wickedness for wicked and malicious men, and sincerity and truth for persons that are true and sincere. So that we are from hence taught, both the duty of every particular Christian, considering that Christ hath died as a sacrifice for his sin, to live up to the rule which he hath given us, abhorring malice and all wickedness, and acting truth and sincerity; and also the duty of every true church of Christ, to keep their communion pure from the society of wicked and malicious men, and made up of men of truth and sincerity. The latter seemeth to be principally intended.

9 I wrote unto you in an epistle not to company with fornicators:

It should seem that Paul had wrote so in some former epistle which he had directed to this church, which is lost; for we must think that Paul wrote more epistles to the several churches than those left us upon record in holy writ (yet so as not to undermine the perfection of the Holy Scriptures). By fornicators are meant any sorts of unclean persons known to them; and the keeping company with them, which the apostle had prohibited to the Corinthians, was not a mere fellowship with them in their works of darkness, but any intimacy of communion with any such persons.

10 Yet not altogether with the fornicators of this world, or with the covetous, or extortioners, or with idolaters; for then must ye needs go out of the world.

Yet not altogether with the fornicators of this world; I did not intend that admonition as to such persons as were no Christians, no members of the church (so this term world is used, John xv. 19; xvii. 14; and so it is to be interpreted here). He extendeth this admonition to other scandalous sinners, such as covetous persons, by which he understandeth such as by any open and scandalous acts discover their too great love of money, whether by oppression, or by cheating and defrauding, &c.; or extortioners, such as exact more than their due; or with idolaters, by which he understandeth such as worship images: and under these few species of scandalous sinners here mentioned, the apostle understands all others alike scandalous. For then must ye needs go out of the world; for (saith he) you could have no commerce nor trading with men in the world, if you might keep no company with such as these. Which is true at this day, when the world is much more Christianized than it was at that time.

11 But now I have written unto you not to keep company, if any man that is called a brother be a fornicator, or covetous, or an idolater, or a railer, or a drunkard, or an extortioner; with such an one no not to eat.

y Gal. 2. 12.

Of late there have been some disputes what eating is here intended, whether at the Lord's table, or at our common tables. Intimacy of communion is that which undoubtedly is here signified by eating; and the apostle's meaning is, that the members of this church should forbear any unnecessary fellowship and communion with any persons that went under the name of Christians, and yet indulged themselves in any notorious and scandalous courses of life; of which he reckoneth up several sorts. 1. Unclean persons; noted for any kind of uncleanness. 2. Covetous persons; by which he understands all such as, out of their too great love of money, either scandalously sought to add to their heap, or to detain what was others' just due. 3. Idolaters; by which he understands such as out of fear, or to gain favour with the heathen amongst whom they lived, would frequent and perform Divine worship in the idol's temple. 4. Railers, such as used their tongues intemperately and scandalously, to the prejudice of others' reputation. 5. Drunkards; under which notion he comprehends all such as drank hot liquors intemperately, whether they had such an effect upon them as to deprive them of the use of their reason or no. 6. Extortioners, viz. such as, being in any place, exacted more than was their due of those that were under their power. But yet by this interpretation the argument is not lost against eating with such at the table of the Lord, which is no more necessary communion with them, than civil eating is; for neither hath God spread that table for any such, neither ought any church to endure any such persons in its communion: nor are any Christians bound for ever to abide in the communion of that church, which shall wilfully neglect the purging out of such old leaven. Admitting this precept prohibitive of a civil intimacy with scandalous persons, though they be called brethren, it holds a fortiori, as a stronger argument against religious communion with such, in ordinances to which, apparently, they have no proximate right.

But them that are without God judgeth; for heathens that live brutish and scandalous lives, God will judge them; the church hath nothing to do with them, they never gave up themselves to them, and are only under the justice of God in the administrations of his providence. Therefore put away from among yourselves that wicked person: do you, therefore, what belongs to you to do. This incestuous person, besides his subjection to God's judgment, who is the Judge of all, whether within or without the church, is subjected also to your judicature; therefore use that power which God hath given you, and put away from amongst you that evil person. The conclusion of this discourse helps us clearly to understand those former precepts, Purge out the old leaven, ver. 7, and, Let us keep the feast, not with the old leaven, ver. 8; that they are not so properly to be interpreted of particular Christians' purging out their lusts and corruptions, (though that be every good Christian's duty,) as of every Christian church's duty to purge themselves of flagitious and scandalous persons.

CHAP. VI

The Corinthians are reproved for bringing their controversies before heathen judges, which they ought to decide among themselves, 1—6. There would be no occasion for lawsuits, if men acted up to the principles of the gospel, 9; which exclude from the kingdom of God all notorious transgressors of the moral law, 7—11. All lawful things are not expedient, 12—14; but fornication is a gross offence against our bodies, which are members of Christ, temples of the Holy Ghost, and not our own to dispose of otherwise than to God's glory, 15—20.

DARE any of you, having a matter against another, go to law before the unjust, and not before the saints?

The apostle having already sharply reflected upon this church for their pride, and contentions, and divisions, (which were branches from that root,) and for their vilifying him who was their spiritual father, and magnifying their instructors above him, as also for their looseness in their church discipline; he cometh in this chapter to another thing, viz. their going to law before pagan judges; for such was the misery of those times, that they had no other, though some think that they might have had, the pagan persecutions being as yet not begun. The apostle speaks of this as a thing which he wondered that they durst be guilty of, that they should be no more tender of the glory of God in the reputation of the Christian religion, and should not rather choose arbitrators amongst the members of their church, to hear and determine such differences as arose amongst them, than give pagans an occasion to reproach the Christian religion for the contentions and feuds of Christians. The reputation of the gospel and the professors of it being the thing for which Paul was here concerned, and upon the account of which he thus speaketh; it becometh Christians yet to consider, whether what he saith concerneth not them, where either the judges, or the generality of the auditors in such judgments, may probably reproach religion, or that way of God which they own, for their trivial and uncharitable contentions.

2 Do ye not know that * the saints shall judge the world? and if the world shall be judged by you, are ye unworthy to judge the smallest matters?

If indeed the Corinthians had had no other competent judges, they might have been excused in making use of infidel judges; but, saith the apostle, you have other persons competent enough, whom you may (by your submission to them) make judges; for you know that the saints shall judge the world; in the same sense (as some think) as Christ saith the Ninevites and the queen of the south should rise up in judgment against the Jews, and condemn them; but certainly there is something more than that in it; when the apostle said, the saints should judge the world, he intended to say something of them which was not common to some heathens with them. Others therefore think, that the saints in the day of judgment shall judge the world, approving the sentence of Christ pronounced against the world, and as being assessors with Christ, which indeed is what Christ said of the apostles, Matt. xix. 28; Luke xxii. 39. Others think, that the phrase only signifieth a great honour and dignity, to which the saints shall be advanced. A late learned and very critical author hath another notion of the saints' judging the world here spoken of, interpreting it of a time when the secular judgment of the world should be given to the saints, which was prophesied by Daniel, chap. vii. 18, 27, and therefore might be known by them. If this be the sense, it is either a prophecy of God's giving the government of the world into the hands of Christians, (which fell out after this in Constantine's time,) or else it signifies such a time towards the end of the world, as those that expect a fifth monarchy speak of, when those that are true saints, in the strictest sense, shall have the government of the world; which seemeth not probable, considering what the Scripture speaks of persecutions, and wars, and disorders, rather increasing than abating towards the end of the world. The apostle therefore here seemeth rather to speak of the saints judging the world in the last day, approving the sentence of Christ the Judge of the quick and the dead; or else to prophesy of that time, when Christianity should so far obtain in the world, that the government either of the whole world, or of a great part of it, should be in the hands of Christians. From whence the apostle strongly concludeth the competency of Christians to arbitrate and determine little matters of difference amongst Christians, in their commerce and civil dealings one with another.

That the saints shall judge angels, is here so plainly asserted, as a thing within their knowledge, that none can doubt it; but how, or when, or what angels, is not so easily determined. The best interpreters understand it of the evil angels, that is, the devils, whom the saints shall judge at the last day, agreeing with the Judge of the whole earth in the sentence which he shall then give against the evil angels, confining them to the bottomless pit, who, while this world lasteth, have a greater liberty as princes of the air, to rove abroad in the air, and to work mightily in the children of disobedience. Others understand the judging of angels here mentioned, of the spoiling of the devils of the kingdom that they exercise in the world, in the places where the gospel hath not prevailed, by lying oracles, and seducing men to idolatry, and the worshipping of devils: in which sense Christ said, Now shall the prince of this world be cast out, John xii. 31. From hence the apostle argues the competency of their brethren to judge of and to determine those little matters which were in difference betwixt them, being but things concerning this life, and so of far less consequence than the judging of the world and the evil angels at the last day.

4 * If then ye have judgments of things pertaining to this life, set them to judge who are least esteemed in the church.

If then ye have judgment of things pertaining to this life, that is, if you have any cause of suing or impleading one another for things that pertain to this life, be they of what nature they will, set them to judge who are least esteemed in the church; rather commit the umpirage and determination of such little differences to the meanest members of your church, than go to contend before pagans and infidels: or do not employ your teachers about them, who have higher work to be employed in; but employ those who are of a lower order in the church, and whose business and concerns lie in secular affairs.

5 I speak to your shame. Is it so, that there is not a wise man among you? no, not one that shall be able to judge between his brethren?

6 But brother goeth to law with brother, and that before the unbelievers.

I do not speak this, as if I would have you make choice of the meanest persons among you to arbitrate and determine all matters that may be in difference betwixt you; but it would be a shame to you if, amongst you all, there could not be found one man whom you can judge wise enough to determine differences betwixt you about things of this life, without bringing one another into pagan courts, to the reproach and scandal of the religion which you profess: make use of any, yea, the meanest Christians, in such judgments, rather than infidels and unbelievers, who will make use of your differences to the reproaching of the holy name of God.

7 Now therefore there is utterly a fault among you, because ye go to law one with another. <sup>d</sup>Why do ye not rather take wrong? why do ye not rather suffer yourselves to be defrauded?

Now therefore there is utterly a fault among you, because ye go to law one with another; not that it is simply unlawful for men to make use of human laws, and courts, and methods of judicature; for even the laws of men are good, if they be lawfully used: and the word here used by the apostle is ἡττιμα, which signifieth rather an impotency or weakness of mind and affections, a defect or diminution from perfection, than any scandalous sin. Going to law with brethren (though lawful in itself) may be made unlawful by circumstances: 1. When it is before judges that are unbelievers, so as men's going to law before them tends to the reproach of religion, the credit and reputation of the gospel ought to be dearer to us than any little secular concern. This was the case in this place. 2. When it is for little matters, such as a coat or a cloak. It is against the law of charity to do another a great wrong to recover to ourselves a little that is our right. 3. When we cannot do it without wrath, anger, impatience, covetousness, or desire of revenge. It is a thing possible to go to law without sin, but what very few do, through that corruption which cleaveth to corrupt nature. Why do ye not rather take wrong? why do ye not rather suffer yourselves to be defrauded? It is therefore far more becoming conscientious Christians to take a little wrong, and to suffer themselves to be cheated of their right, especially under such circumstances, where the credit of the gospel and religion must lose more than they can get. And to do otherwise speaks ἡττιμα, a defect or imperfection in Christians, and is not without its guilt. If, by their contentiousness, they do not show themselves so bad as some would make them, who hold all contentings at law amongst Christians unlawful, yet they do not show themselves so good as the rule of Christianity requireth them to be, Matt. v. 39, 40; Luke vi. 29; Rom. xii. 19.

8 Nay, ye do wrong, and defraud,

The apostle riseth higher in his charge against them; he had before only charged them for want of self-denial, that they could not bear or suffer wrong; he now chargeth them for doing wrong and defrauding, and that not heathens, (which yet had been bad enough,) but Christians that were their brethren, whom they had the highest obligations upon them imaginable to love, and to do good to. And indeed this charge followeth directly upon the other: for as in war, one army always are murderers, or guilty of the blood which they spill; so in suing at law, (which is a civil war betwixt the two parties,) either the one or the other party suing must do wrong, either putting his brother to trouble and expense, to recover of him what is not his right, or that he might withhold from him what is truly and indeed his right, either of which is indeed a doing of wrong or defrauding.

9 Know ye not that the unrighteous shall not inherit the kingdom of God?

Be not deceived: neither fornicators, nor idolaters, nor adulterers, nor effeminate, nor abusers of themselves with mankind,

That by the kingdom of God is here meant the kingdom of glory, the happiness of another life, is plain, because he speaketh in the future tense; this kingdom, he saith, the unrighteous, that is, those who so live and die, shall not inherit. If we take the term unrighteous here to be a general term, the species, or some of the principal species, of which are afterwards enumerated, it signifieth here the same with notoriously wicked men. But if we take it to signify persons guilty of acts of injustice towards themselves or others, it cannot be here understood as a general term, relating to all those species of sinners after enumerated; for so idolaters cannot properly be called unrighteous, but ungodly men. Be not deceived, (saith the apostle,) either by any false teachers, or by the many ill examples of such sinners that you daily have, nor by magistrates' connivance at these sins. Neither fornicators; neither such as, being single persons, commit uncleanness with others (for here the apostle distinguisheth these sinners from adulterers, whom he mentioneth afterward). Nor idolaters; nor such as either worship the creature instead of God, or worship the true God before images. Nor adulterers; nor such as, being married persons, break their marriage covenant, and commit uncleanness with such as are not their yokefellowes. Nor effeminate persons; nor persons that give up themselves to lasciviousness, burning continually in lusts. Nor abusers of themselves with mankind; nor such as are guilty of the sin of Sodom, a sin not to be named amongst Christians or men.

10 Nor thieves, nor covetous, nor drunkards, nor revilers, nor extortioners, shall inherit the kingdom of God.

Nor thieves; nor such as take away the goods of their neighbours clandestinely, or by violence, without their consent or any just authority. Nor covetous; nor persons who discover themselves excessively to love money, by their endeavours to get it into their hands any way, by oppression, cheating, or defrauding others. Nor drunkards; nor persons that make drinking their business, and use it excessively, without regard to the law and rules of temperance and sobriety. Nor revilers; nor persons that use their tongues intemperately, railing at others, and reviling them with reproachful and opprobrious names. Nor extortioners; nor any such as by violence wring out of people's hands what is not their due. None of these, not repenting of these sinful courses, and turning from them into a contrary course of life, shall ever come into heaven.

but ye are washed, but ye are sanctified, but ye are justified in the name of the Lord Jesus, and by the Spirit of our God.

In the two last verses the apostle had pronounced a terrible sentence, especially to the Corinthians, who, having been heathens lately, had wallowed in a great deal of this guilt; he therefore here, that they might be humbled, and have low thoughts of themselves, and not be puffed up, (as he had before charged them,) mindeth them, that some of them had been guilty of some of these enormous sins, some of them of one or some of them, and others of other of them. But, that they might not despair in their reflections upon that guilt, he tells them, they were washed, not only with the baptism of water, but with the baptism of the blood of Christ, and with the baptism of the Holy Ghost, born again of water and of the Spirit, John iii. 5; yea, and not only washed, but sanctified, filled with new, spiritual habits, through the renewing of the Holy Ghost: having obtained a true righteousness, in which they might stand and appear before God, even the righteousness of Christ, reckoned unto them for righteousness; justified through the merits of the Lord Jesus Christ, and sanctified through the Spirit of holiness. So that the washing, first mentioned in this verse, seemeth to be a general term, comprehending both justification, remission of sin, and deliverance from the guilt of it; and also regeneration and sanctification, which is the proper effect of the Spirit of grace, creating in the soul new habits and dispositions, by which it is enabled and inclined, as to die unto sin, so to live unto God. This the apostle doth not say of them all, (for it is very probable there were in this church some hypocrites,) but of some of them.

12 All things are lawful unto me, but <sup>n</sup> 1 H. b. 10. 23. all things are not || expedient: all things <sup>o</sup> 1 Cor. 10. 23. are lawful for me, but I will not be brought under the power of any.

The words of this text are not so difficult in themselves, as it is to make out the connexion they have with, and the dependence they have upon, what went before and what followeth after. Some, thinking that they refer unto what the apostle had said before about their going to law before infidels in the first seven verses, lest any should say, Is it not then lawful for men to sue at law for their just dues and rights? the apostle answers, Admit it be, yet Christians ought not only to consider what is strictly lawful and just, but they ought to consider circumstances; for, Quicquid non expedit, in quantum non expedit non licet, is an old and good rule; An action that is in itself lawful, may be by circumstances made sinful and unlawful; and that was the case as to the Christians going to law before infidels. But others, and those the most, think that the apostle here begins a new head of discourse to dissuade from the sin of fornication, and from an intemperate use of meat and drink, as being provocative of lust, and disposing them to that sin. Now, lest they should say, Is it not lawful then to eat and drink liberally, must we eat and drink for bare necessity? he answereth, All things are lawful for me; that is, all things which are not forbidden by the law of God may be used, may be done, under fair circumstances; but circumstances may alter the case, all things may not be expedient to be used or done by all persons, or at all times. The Corinthians might possibly conclude too much from what he had told them, that they were washed, justified, and sanctified, viz. that now all things were lawful to them, at least all things not simply and absolutely condemned in the word of God: the apostle correcteth their mistake, by telling them they were to have a regard to expedience, and the profit of others, the neglect of which might make things that were in themselves lawful to become unlawful. Besides that, they must take heed that they did not make such a use, even of lawful things, as to be brought under the power of them; which men are, when they become potent temptations to them to sin against God any way.

13 <sup>1</sup>Meats for the belly, and the belly for meats: but God shall destroy both it and them. Now the body is not for fornication, but <sup>1</sup>for the Lord; <sup>m</sup> and the Lord for the body.

The beginning of this verse seemeth to give a great light to our true understanding of the former verse, and maketh it very probable that the apostle spake with reference to the free use of meats and drinks, when he said, All things are lawful for me. Though God hath ordained meats for the filling of the belly, and hath made the belly for the receptacle of meats, for the nourishment of the body, so as the use of meats and drinks is lawful; yet when we see that the free use of them proveth inexpedient, as too much pampering the body, and disposing it to wantonness, so far as they do so they are to be avoided. Others make the connexion thus: All your contests are but for things which concern the belly, for meats and drinks, for perishing things; now, in things of this nature, all things that are lawful are not expedient. Others say, that the apostle here answereth or obviateth what the Nicolaitanes or the Epicureans held, that all sorts of meats and drinks were lawful, yea, fornication itself. The apostle grants the first, but denieth the second, there being not a parity of reason for the lawfulness of meats and drinks, and of fornication. He tells them, God had ordained meats for the belly of man, and had created the stomach and belly for the reception of meats for the nourishment of man's body, and the preservation of his life; yet they ought to use them lawfully, and to consider expedience in the use of them, and not too eagerly to contend for them, for God shall destroy both the belly, and the use of meats as to the belly. In the resurrection, as men shall not marry, nor give in marriage, so they shall hunger and thirst no more. But God had not created the body of a man for fornication, but for himself, that men by and with it might glorify his name, by doing his will. And the Lord is for the body, as the Head of it, to guide and direct the use of the several members of it; and as the Saviour of it, to raise it up at the last day, as he further declareth in the next words.

14 And <sup>n</sup>God hath both raised up the Lord, and will also raise up us <sup>o</sup>by his own power.

And God hath both raised up the Lord; the Lord Jesus Christ, as the first-fruits of those that sleep, from whose resurrection the apostle largely proveth our resurrection, chap. xv. And will also raise up us by his own power: God will raise up his saints by his own Almighty power.

15 Know ye not that <sup>p</sup>your bodies are the members of Christ? shall I then take the members of Christ, and make them the members of an harlot? God forbid.

Christ is united to the person of the believer, and he is the Head of the church, which is his mystical body; so that the bodies of believers are in a sense the members of Christ, and should be used by us as the members of Christ, which we should not rend from him: but he that doth commit fornication, rends his body from Christ, and maketh it the member of an harlot; for as the man and wife are one flesh by Divine ordination, Gen. ii. 24, so the fornicator and the harlot are one flesh by an impure conjunction.

16 What? know ye not that he which is joined to an harlot is one body? for <sup>q</sup>two, saith he, shall be one flesh.

The conjunction of the husband and wife, mentioned Gen. ii. 24, and the conjunction of the fornicator and the harlot, differ not as to the species of the act, only as to the morality of it; the former is an honest and lawful act, the other a dishonest and filthy act. So that he that is wickedly joined to a harlot, maketh himself one flesh with her with whom he committeth that folly and lewdness, and he must needs by it separate his body from its membership with Christ, whose holiness will admit no such union.

17 <sup>r</sup>But he that is joined unto the Lord is one spirit.

This phrase joined unto the Lord, is thought to be taken out of Deut. x. 20, To him shalt thou cleave. He that hath attained to that mystical union which is betwixt Christ and every one that is a true believer, is not essentially, but spiritually and mystically, one spirit with Christ; his spirit is united to the Spirit of Christ, and he is one by him in faith and love, and by obedience, Christ and he have one will, and he is ruled and governed by Christ: therefore you must take heed what you do in making your bodies the members of harlots, which they cannot be, and the members of Christ also.

18 <sup>s</sup>Flee fornication. Every sin that a man doeth is without the body; but he that committeth fornication sinneth <sup>t</sup>against his own body.

The apostle cometh to a new argument, by which he presseth them to flee the sin of uncleanness. It is observed by some, that this sin is peculiarly to be resisted, not so much by resisting it, and pondering arguments against it, as by flying from it, avoiding all occasions of it, and not suffering our thoughts to feed upon it; but the apostle's argument is, because other sins are without the body, that is, the body hath not such a blemish and note or mark of infamy laid upon it by any other sin as by this: in drunkenness the liquor, in gluttony the meat, in other sins something without a man's self is that which is abused, but the body itself is the thing which is abused in this filthy sin. So he that is guilty of it, sinneth not only against his wife, with whom he is one flesh, but against his body, which he abuseth in this vile and sinful act, and upon which he imprints a mark of infamy and disgrace, a blot not to be washed out but with the blood of Christ. So as though by other sins men may sin against their own bodies, yet by no sin so eminently as by this sin. Other sins have their seat in the mind and soul; the body, and commonly some particular member of the body, is but the servant of the soul in the execution and committing of them; but lust, though indeed it ariseth from the heart, yet it is committed more in the body than any other sin is.

19 What? <sup>u</sup>know ye not that your body is the temple of the Holy Ghost <sup>v</sup>which is in you, which ye have of God, <sup>w</sup>and ye are not your own?

The apostle, chap. iii. 16, had called the church of Corinth, the temple of God, and there made use of it to dissuade them from dissensions and divisions, because by them they defiled and destroyed the temple of God; here he calls the members of that church, the temple of the Holy Ghost, which strongly proveth the Holy Ghost to be God: he makes use of it here as an argument to dissuade them from the sin of fornication. God's temple was built for his habitation upon earth, the place which he chose most to manifest himself in to his people, and for a place wherein his people were to pay him that external homage and worship, which he required of them under the law. So as the apostle's calling them the temple of the Holy Ghost, both minded them of the favour God had bestowed on them, and also of that homage and duty which they with their bodies were to pay unto God; the latter they could not perform, nor hope for the former, while they lived in the practice of a sin so contrary to the will of God. Besides, he mindeth them, that their bodies were not their own, they had them of God: they had them from God by creation; and they were upheld by the daily workings of his providence in their upholding and preservation; God had not given them their bodies for this use, the body was not for fornication, as he had told them, ver. 13. So as in abusing their bodies, they abused what was not their own, nor in their own power to use, as they listed to use them; but to be used only for those ends, and in that manner, that he who had given them had prescribed and directed: and in these abuses there was a kind of sacrilege; as God of old charged the Jews, Ezek. xvi. 17—19, that they had taken the jewels of his gold and his silver, to make images, and commit spiritual whoredom with them; and they had taken his meat, his fine flour, his oil, and incense to set before them, &c.

20 For ye are bought with a price: therefore glorify God in your body, and in your spirit, which are God's.

For ye are bought with a price; what price this is that is here mentioned Peter tells us, both negatively and positively, 1 Pet. i. 18, 19: Forasmuch as ye know that ye were not redeemed with corruptible things, as silver and gold, from your vain conversation received by tradition from your fathers; but with the precious blood of Christ, as of a lamb without blemish and without spot. So he argueth with them against this sin from their redemption, it being suitable to reason, that those who are redeemed out of any slavery or captivity, should be the servants of him who redeemed them, not of those tyrants from whom they are redeemed; such are our lusts and corruptions, from which we are redeemed, as well as from that curse and wrath, which is the consequent of them. Therefore glorify God in your body, and in your spirit, which are God's; therefore, (saith the apostle,) you who are redeemed with a price, and with such a price, are bound to glorify God, as by speaking well of his name, so by obeying his will, Matt. v. 16. And this you are bound to do, not with your bodies or your spirits only, but in or with your bodies and spirits also, that is, with your whole man; for both of them are God's, by a manifold right, not that of creation and providence only, but that of redemption also: with which exhortation the apostle finisheth this discourse, and cometh to give them an answer to some questions about which they had wrote unto him.

CHAP. VII

Marriage is to be used as a remedy against fornication, 1—9. Christ hath forbidden to dissolve the bond thereof, 10, 11. Directions how to act where one of the parties is an unbeliever, 12—16. Every man must abide in and fulfil the duties of the state wherein he was called, 17—24. Directions concerning the marriage of virgins, respecting the distress of the times, 25—38; and concerning the second marriage of widows, 39, 40.

NOW concerning the things whereof ye wrote unto me: It is good for a man not to touch a woman.

It seemeth, that though this church was very much corrupted, yet some of them retained a reverence for this great apostle, and had wrote one or more letters to him about some points, to which he returneth answer. It seemeth that one thing they had wrote to him about, was about marriage; not about the lawfulness of marrying, (that doctrine of devils was not broached so early in the world,) but concerning the advisableness of marriage, and men's use of their wives, in that afflicted state of the church. The apostle answereth, that it is good for a man not to touch a woman. When he saith, It is good, he means only more convenient, or better, with respect to the troubled state of the church, or that persons might be more at liberty for the service of God and the duties of religion. Upon these accounts it were more convenient for a man not to marry, for that he meaneth by touching a woman.

2 Nevertheless, to avoid fornication, let every man have his own wife, and let every woman have her own husband.

Nevertheless, to avoid fornication; in the Greek it is, Because of fornications; the sense of which can be no other than this which our translators give. The word is in the plural number, to signify that that which he meaneth by this term, is all sorts of impurities and uncleannesses, which are the products of the lusts of the flesh. These are sins of that nature and species, that if we cannot choose what in respect of some circumstances would be more convenient, we must balk it, rather than run into such a guilt. The apostle doth therefore determine, that in this case it was every man's duty to marry, and every woman's likewise; the reason of which must be, because God had ordained marriage as a means to bridle men, and restrain them from extravagant lusts. His own wife, her own husband; a clear place against polygamy.

3 Let the husband render unto the wife due benevolence: and likewise also the wife unto the husband.

The word translated due benevolence, signifieth due goodwill or kindness, but from ver. 5, it appeareth what the apostle meaneth: Moses, Exod. xxi. 10, calleth it, the duty of marriage; both of them using a modest term in expressing the conjugal act, as we shall observe the Scripture always doing, when there is occasion to mention what men of profane hearts are ready to make a scoff at. The apostle maketh this the mutual duty both of husband and wife, under due circumstances, therefore useth the word render, which implieth the thing required to be an act of justice.

4 The wife hath not power of her own body, but the husband: and likewise also the husband hath not power of his own body, but the wife.

He gives the reason of it; because marriage takes away from each married person the power over his or her own body, and giveth it to their correlate. The apostle seemeth here to answer a question propounded to him by some members of this church, Whether, though they were married, the husband and wife might not forbear each other's bed, and make use of their society each with other merely for helps in other things, such as getting an estate, looking after the affairs of a family, &c.? which the apostle doth by no means judge advisable.

5 Defraud ye not one the other, except it be with consent for a time, that ye may give yourselves to fasting and prayer; and come together again, that Satan tempt you not for your incontinency.

Defraud not one the other; that is, Withhold not yourselves one from another; which he rightly calls defrauding one another, because he had before declared it a debt; and further declared, that neither the husband nor the wife had a power over their own bodies, but the power of either of their bodies was in their correlate. He adds, except it be with consent, mutual consent, and then it is indeed no defrauding; and for a time, for a religious end, that they might give themselves to fasting and prayer: not that this abstinence is necessary to us by any Divine precept, to prepare us for solemn prayer, (for such only is here spoken of,) for then the apostle would not have made consent necessary in this case; but the Jews were commanded it, Exod. xix. 15, as a preparation to their hearing of the law; and it was a piece of the legal purification, as appeareth from 1 Sam. xxi. 4, as to which Christians were at liberty, and might observe or not observe it, as they agreed. And come together again, that Satan tempt you not for your incontinency: then he requires, that they should return to their former course, not defrauding one another, lest the devil, observing their abstinence, should tempt them to unlawful mixtures, seeing their inability to contain themselves within the bounds of temperance and chastity.

6 But I speak this by permission, and not of commandment.

Some refer these words to all that had gone before in this chapter; but the best interpreters rather refer them to what went immediately before in the preceding verse, declaring, that he had no express command from God, as to those things of abstaining for a time for fasting and prayer, and then coming together again, but he spake what he judged equitable and reasonable; but as to particular persons, they ought to judge and govern themselves according to their particular circumstances.

7 For <sup>f Acts 26, 29.</sup> I would that all men were <sup>g ch. 9, 5.</sup> even as I myself. But <sup>h Mat. 19, 12.</sup> every man hath his proper gift of God, one after this manner, and another after that.

I would that all men were even as I myself: I would, in this place, can signify no more than, I could wish or desire, (if it were the will of God,) that all Christians had the gift of continency, which God (blessed be his name) hath given me: that this is meant, is plain by the next words, and ver. 9: it is apparent that Paul did not will this absolutely, for that had been to have willed the dissolution of the world, as well as the church, within the compass of that age. But every man hath his proper gift of God, one after this manner, and another after that: But, saith the apostle, every one hath not the gift of continency, one hath it, another hath it not; which is the same thing which our Saviour said in reply to his disciples, saying, If the case of the man be so with his wife, it is not good to marry. All men cannot receive this saying, save they to whom it is given, Matt. xix. 10.

8 I say therefore to the unmarried and <sup>i ver. 1, 26.</sup> widows, <sup>1</sup> It is good for them if they abide even as I.

By the unmarried and widows, it is apparent that Paul means virgins that were never married, and such as, having been once married, had lost their husbands: though the first word, in the Greek, had been significant enough of persons in both these states; yet the apostle's using of two words, makes it past dispute; when he saith, it is good for such to be as he was, his meaning is, that it was better with respect to the present circumstances of Christians, or it was convenient, in which notion good is often taken, not for what is absolutely good; and indeed the nature of all good lieth in the conveniency or suitableness of the thing so called to us; and though in the Divine precepts there is always such a suitableness, so as they must be always good, yet in other things, which God hath left to our liberty, (such as is this of marriage,) a thing may be good or evil, as the circumstances of several persons, yea, of the same person, may vary. St. Paul considereth only the circumstances of the world common to all Christians, and upon them, determines this goodness, supposing the circumstances of the particular person not to rule otherwise. His not saying, it is good for them not to marry, but to be as he was, hath bred a question of no great import to be determined, Whether Paul was ever married or no? in the determination of which the ancients could not agree; but it is not worth spending our time about, considering that all agree he was at this time unmarried, which is all he doth here mean: if St. Paul was never married, we are sure Peter was, for we read of his wife's mother sick of a fever, Mark i. 30.

<sup>k 1 Tim. 5. 14.</sup> 9 But <sup>2</sup> if they cannot contain, let them marry: for it is better to marry than to burn.

That St. Paul's saying, It is good, &c. did not signify, it is the will of God, or, (as the papists would have it,) it is my counsel in order to your further perfection, is plain by his precept for them to marry if they could not contain; and this likewise lets us see that second marriages are not only lawful, but may be an incumbent duty, that is, if they who are concerned as to them cannot contain themselves within the bounds and rule of chastity, which must not only be interpreted with reference to acts of uncleanness. This is contradicted by the reason given by the apostle, determining that marriage was much more eligible than burning, which term signifies the inward fervour and eager inclinations of the mind, not the acts only of the outward man.

<sup>l See ver. 12, 26, 40.</sup> <sup>m Mal. 2. 14, 16. Mat. 5. 32, & 19. 8. 9. Mark 10. 11, 12. Luke 16. 18.</sup> 10 And unto the married I command, <sup>1</sup> yet not I, but the Lord, <sup>m</sup> Let not the wife depart from her husband:

The apostle had spoke to the married before, but in another case, he now returneth in his discourse to them again, speaking to another case, which it should seem they had put to him; what it was is not plainly expressed, but it may easily be gathered from ver. 12, 13, as also from the apostle's determination in this verse: or it was this, Whether it was lawful for the husband to depart from his wife, or the wife from her husband, unless it were in the case of adultery; for though here be nothing spoken as to that case, yet it plainly must be excepted, as determined before by our Saviour; but as the Jews, so the heathens amongst whom these Corinthians lived, had entertained much too mean thoughts about the marriage bond, indulging themselves in a liberty to break it for every slight cause; and it should seem by ver. 12, 13, it was judged by them a sufficient cause, if one of them were not converted to the faith of Christ. Now in this case, saith the apostle, I command, and what I tell you is the will of God; it is not I alone who command it, but you are to look upon it as the will of God concerning you, though revealed to you by me that am the minister of God to you. Let not the wife depart from her husband; she may be divorced from her husband in case of fornication, but let her not for any other cause make a voluntary secession.

11 But and if she depart, let her remain unmarried, or be reconciled to her husband: and let not the husband put away his wife.

*How our translators came to translate  $\chi\omega\rho\iota\sigma\tau\eta$ , which is manifestly a verb passive, if she depart, I cannot tell. It signifieth, if she be departed, and so is as well significative of a being parted from her husband by a judicial act of divorce, as of a voluntary departing. The Jews were wont to give bills of divorce to their wives for any trivial cause. The word is to be interpreted as well of any legal divorce, not according to the true meaning of the Divine law, as concerning a voluntary secession; in which case the apostle commandeth that she should marry to no other: the reason is plain, because no such cause of divorce broke the bond of marriage; she was yet the wife of her former husband in God's eye and account, and committed adultery if she married to another, as our Saviour had determined, Matt. v. 32; xix. 9. But he gives her a liberty to be reconciled to her husband. In case that a woman put away by her husband became another man's wife, by the law, Deut. xxiv. 4, she might not (though that latter husband died) return to her former husband; but in case she remained unmarried, she might be reconciled to him. And let not the husband put away his wife; the apostle giveth the same precept concerning husbands.*

12 But to the rest speak I, <sup>n</sup> not the Lord: <sup>n ver. 8.</sup> If any brother hath a wife that believeth not, and she be pleased to dwell with him, let him not put her away.

But to the rest speak I, not the Lord; either as to the other part of your Epistle, or as to the cases of the rest mentioned in your Epistle, I shall give you my advice so far as I am instructed by the Holy Spirit of God, though our Lord Jesus Christ hath set no certain rule concerning them. If any brother hath a wife that believeth not: that believeth not, both here and ver. 13, signifieth, that hath not embraced the Christian faith, but still remaineth a pagan. And she be pleased to dwell with him; if there be no other matter of difference betwixt such persons, save only in matter of religion, let him not for that put her away. If a Christian man or woman had their choice to make, it were unlawful for either of them to make choice of a pagan for their yoke-fellow; but if, after marriage, either the husband or the wife embraceth the Christian faith, the other correlate still abiding a pagan, their difference in religion is not a sufficient ground for a separation: this seemeth to be the apostle's meaning. The case seemeth a little different in the opinion of some divines, when the idolater or idolatress blasphemeth God and the true religion, and is continually tempting the correlate to apostacy: but it is hard to determine against the plain precept of so great an apostle, especially considering the reason by which he backeth his precept.

13 And the woman which hath an husband that believeth not, and if he be pleased to dwell with her, let her not leave him.

14 For the unbelieving husband is sanctified by the wife; and the unbelieving wife is

• Mat. 2. 15. sanctified by the husband: else were your children unclean; but now are they holy.

Sanctifying, in holy writ, generally signifieth the separation or setting apart of a person or thing from a common, to and for a holy use, whether it be by some external rites and ceremonies, or by the infusing of some inward spiritual habits. In this place it seemeth to have a different sense from what it usually hath in holy writ; for it can neither signify the sanctification of the person by infused habits of grace; for neither is the unbelieving husband thus sanctified by the believing wife, neither is the unbelieving wife thus sanctified by the believing husband; nor are either of them thus set apart for the service of God by any legal rites: which hath made a great difference in the notions of interpreters, how the unbelieving husband is sanctified by the believing wife, or the unbelieving wife, by the believing husband. Some think it signifies no more than prepared for God, as sanctified signifies, Isa. xiii. 3. Others think they are sanctified by a moral denomination. I rather think it signifies, brought into such a state, that the believer, without offence to the law of God, may continue in a married estate with such a yoke-fellow; and the state of marriage is a holy state, notwithstanding the disparity with reference to religion. Else were your children unclean; otherwise, he saith, the children begotten and born of such parents would be unclean, in the same state that the children of pagan parents are without the church, not within the covenant, not under the promise. In one sense all children are unclean, i. e. children of wrath, born in sin, and brought forth in iniquity; but all are not in this sense unclean, some are within the covenant of grace, within the church, capable of baptism. But now are they holy; these are those that are called holy; not as inwardly renewed and sanctified, but relatively, in the same sense that all the Jewish nation are called a holy people: and possibly this may give us a further light to understand the term sanctified, in the former part of the verse. The unbelieving husband is so far sanctified by the believing wife, and the unbelieving wife so far sanctified by the believing husband, that as they may lawfully continue in their married relation, and live together as man and wife, so the issue coming from them both shall be by God counted in covenant with him, and have a right to baptism, which is one of the seals of that covenant, as well as those children both whose parents are believers.

15 But if the unbelieving depart, let him depart. A brother or a sister is not under bondage in such cases: but God hath called us to peace.

If the unbelieving husband or the unbelieving wife will leave his or her correlate, that is, so leave them as to return no more to live as a husband or as a wife with her or him that is Christian, let him depart. Such a person hath broken the bond of marriage, and in such cases Christians are not under bondage, they are not tied by law to fetch them again, nor by the laws of God to keep themselves unmarried for their perverseness. But it may be objected, that nothing but adultery, by the Divine law, breaketh that bond. Answer. That is denied. Nothing but adultery is a justifiable cause of divorce: no man may put away his wife, nor any wife put away her husband, but for adultery. But the husband's voluntary leaving his wife, or the wife's voluntary leaving her husband, with a resolution to return no more to them, breaks also the bond of marriage, frustrating it as to the ends for which God hath appointed it; and, after all due means used to bring again the party departing to their duty, doth certainly free the correlate. So that although nothing can justify repudiation, or putting away a wife or a husband, and marrying another, but the adultery of the person so divorced and repudiated; yet the departure either of husband or wife without the other's consent for a long time, and refusal to return after all due means used, especially if the party so going away doth it out of a hatred and abomination of the other's religion, will justify the persons so deserted, after due waiting and use of means to reduce him or her to their duty, wholly to cast off the person deserting; for no Christian in such a case, by God's law, is under bondage. But God hath called us to peace; for God hath called Christians unto peace, and in his ordinance of marriage aimed at the quiet and peace of his people in their service of him in their families and relations; and therefore as Christians ought not to disturb the peace of their own consciences, turning away their relations, though they be unbelievers; yet neither are they bound, if such will leave them, to court their own continual trouble and disturbance.

16 For what knowest thou, O wife, whether thou shalt save thy husband? or how knowest thou, O man, whether thou shalt save thy wife?

The apostle having before determined the lawfulness of a Christian husband's or wife's abiding in a state of marriage with a wife or husband that was an infidel, if she or he were willing to abide with the believer, now argues the great advantage which might be from it, for the glory of God, and the good of the soul of such husband or wife. What knowest thou, O wife? saith he; it is not certain that God will so far bless thy converse with thy husband or wife, as that thou shalt, by thy instruction, admonition, or example, be an occasion or instrument to bring them to Christ; but it is neither impossible nor improbable, and their willingness (notwithstanding their difference from thee in religion) yet to abide with thee, may give thee some hopes that they will hearken to thee. They are often (in the language of holy writ) said to save others, who are instrumental to bring them to Christ, chap. ix. 22; 1 Tim. iv. 16; James v. 20. We ought to bear with many inconveniences to ourselves, where our bearing with them may any way promote the glory of God or the good of souls.

17 But as God hath distributed to every man, as the Lord hath called every one, so let him walk. And so ordain I in all churches.

Calling in this place signifieth that station and course of life, wherein by the providence of God any man is set. Some think, that this precept hath a special reference to what went before, as if the sense were this, If God by his providence hath so ordered it that thy heart be changed, thy wife's or thy husband's heart being not yet changed, but he or she remaining pagans, yet let not this cause any separation betwixt you, but, unless the unbeliever will depart, live yet as man and wife together, mutually performing conjugal offices each to other. But the following verses, (ver. 21, 22,) where the apostle speaks of called being a servant, show this interpretation to be too narrow. The sense of the text is, that the profession of Christianity is consistent with any honest calling or course of life, and it is the will of God that Christians should not pretend their profession of religion, to excuse them from the duties of any relation wherein they are set. And so ordain I in all churches; this is a universal rule, and concerned not the church of Corinth only, but all other churches of Christ, being an apostolical constitution.

18 Is any man called being circumcised? let him not become uncircumcised. Is any called in uncircumcision? let him not be circumcised.

Is any one who was a native Jew, and so circumcised according to the Jewish law, converted (while he is in that state) to the faith of Christ? let him not affect the state of him that, having been formerly a Gentile, was never circumcised. On the other side, is any, being a native Gentile, and so not circumcised, converted to Christianity? let not him affect the state of one converted from Judaism, who was circumcised. This is, doubtless, the sense of the verse, not, (as some would have it,) let him not endeavour by art to make himself uncircumcised, which was the wicked practice of some, (for a better compliance with the Gentiles,) of whom we read, 1 Macc. i. 15.

19 Circumcision is nothing, and uncircumcision is nothing, but the keeping of the commandments of God.

Circumcision was an ordinance of God, a sign of God's covenant, as necessary to salvation in its time, as the fulfilling of any precept of the law contained in ordinances: and uncircumcision also was something; for by the law relating to that ordinance, the uncircumcised male is determined to have broken God's covenant, and determined to a cutting off, Gen. xvii. 10—14. But in the present state of the church, circumcision was of no value or moment in the business of salvation: In Christ Jesus neither circumcision availeth any thing, nor uncircumcision, but faith which worketh by love, Gal. v. 6.

20 Let every man abide in the same calling wherein he was called.

Let every man abide in the same state and condition of life in which he was when he was first converted to the faith of Christ, that is, supposing that he was in an honest course of life; for we read in the Acts that the conjurers burnt their books, and unlawful courses of life must not be adhered to after men have once given up their names to Christ. The apostle's design is only to show, that the profession of Christianity maketh no state of life unlawful, which was before that profession lawful, nor dischargeth any from such as were before the duties of persons in their circumstances and relations. They too far strain this text, who interpret it into an obligation upon all men, not to alter that particular way and course of life and trading to which they were educated, and in which they formerly have been engaged; though such a thing be of too great moment and consequence for any to do without just advice and deliberation. The world is a mutable thing, and trades and particular courses of life wear out, and what will now bring in a due livelihood, possibly seven years hence will not furnish any with bread; and it is unreasonable in such a case to think, that the rule of Christian profession ties up a man under these changes of providence to such a particular course of life, as he cannot, in it, in the sweat of his face eat his bread.

21 Art thou called being a servant? care not for it: but if thou mayest be made free, use it rather.

Art thou called being a servant? care not for it: if while thou art a servant to another in any honest employment, thou art converted to the Christian religion, let it not trouble thee, mind it not. A man may be the servant of Christ, and yet a servant to men in any honest employment. But if thou mayest be made free, by the favour of thy friends, with the consent of thy master, use it rather; that is, (say some,) rather choose to be a servant still, (which indeed in some cases may be the duty of a good Christian,) that is, if thou seest, that in that station thou canst better serve God and the interest of thy master's or other souls. But it is more probable the sense is, make use of thy liberty rather; for certain it is, that the free-man is ordinarily at more advantage for the service of God than he that is a servant.

22 For he that is called in the Lord, being a servant, is <sup>7</sup> the Lord's † free-man: likewise also he that is called, being free, is <sup>8</sup> Christ's servant.

For the state of a servant to men no way prejudiceth a man as to his spiritual liberty; a servant and a free-man, considered with reference to Christ, are both one; a servant may be as near the kingdom of heaven as a free-man; and let a man be in never so good a state of civil liberty, yet, if he be a Christian, he is still a servant of Christ, and bound in all things to obey him. As to the new man, there is neither bond nor free, but Christ is all and in all.

23 *Ye are bought with a price; be not ye the servants of men.

What price we are bought with, we heard, chap. vi. 20: the apostle there pressed it upon us as our duty to glorify God with our bodies and our spirits; here he presseth upon us another duty, viz. upon that consideration not to be the servants of men; by which some think he forbiddeth the selling themselves as slaves to infidels; others think that he only forbiddeth eye-service, as the apostle calls it, Eph. vi. 6; while in the mean time they might be the servants of men, if they served them as the servants of Christ, doing the will of God from the heart; with good will doing service, as to the Lord, and not to men. But the most probable interpretation is, Be not servants to the lusts of men: wherein you can serve men, and in the same actions also serve God, and be obedient to his will, you may be the servants of men; but be not servants of men in such actions wherein, to serve them, you must disobey God.

24 Brethren, <sup>b</sup> let every man, wherein <sup>b ver. 20.</sup> he is called, therein abide with God.

In whatsoever state or condition, whether he be married or unmarried, whether he be a master or a servant, whether he were before circumcised or uncircumcised, let him not think Christianity obligeth him to alter it; he may abide in it, only he must abide in it with God, as one who remembereth God's eye is upon him, and seeth him, and that he is bound to approve himself in it unto God, and to keep a good conscience towards him, as one that is a member of the church of God, and under the laws of it.

25 Now concerning virgins <sup>c</sup> I have no commandment of the Lord: yet I give my judgment, as one <sup>d</sup> that hath obtained mercy of the Lord <sup>e</sup> to be faithful.

He had before spoken to married persons and widows, now he comes to speak concerning virgins; and though he mentions only the female sex, yet the following words show that his advice extended to both. As to them he saith, he had no special direction from Christ, none that would suit the case of every virgin; but yet he would give his advice, what seemed to him best. And he would have them look upon him as one that himself had received mercy from the Lord, and as he desired to be faithful in the discharge of his trust, so might and ought to have credit given him in what he said. In which sense we read in Scripture of a faithful saying, a faithful Creator, a faithful man, &c.

26 I suppose therefore that this is good for the present || distress, I say, <sup>f</sup> that it is good for a man so to be.

Good here signifieth convenient, (as before,) if other circumstances of particular persons make it not sinful; or better with respect to the present distress or necessity: by which, without doubt, the apostle meaneth, not the common necessities of all men that are born once to die, (which is the more easy the fewer relations we have to part from,) nor yet of family troubles and concerns, for there is none who hath a family in this world to look after, but will have trouble in the flesh; but the continual troubles with which the church of God was disquieted, as the ark upon the waters, and the more special troubles of the primitive church; for though their great persecutions from the heathen were not, possibly, at that time begun, yet Christ had foretold them, and the apostles had them in a very near prospect (Paul is thought to have died the tenth or eleventh year of Nero). For this present necessity or distress, the apostle gives his opinion, that it was convenient and better, for those that could honestly abstain from marriage, to keep themselves in their single and unmarried condition.

27 Art thou bound unto a wife? seek not to be loosed. Art thou loosed from a wife? seek not a wife.

Art thou bound by marriage, or bound by contract, do not use any sinful ways to be loosed from that bond, either by divorce or by a voluntary departure: if the unbeliever will depart, he or she may, you are not obliged to court their stay, but do not you put him or her away. Are you free from a wife, either as yet unmarried, or by the hand of God separated, in case you can without sin, abstain. If your circumstances be such as they do not oblige you to marriage, do not seek a wife; the times are like to be full of trouble and difficulty. Our Master said, Woe unto them that are with child, and to them that give suck in those days! Matt. xxiv. 19.

28 But and if thou marry, thou hast not sinned; and if a virgin marry, she hath not sinned. Nevertheless such shall have trouble in the flesh: but I spare you.

I would not have you mistake me, as if I judged marriage sinful for persons in any state or condition, or of any sex; but those that are married in any time, will find troubles about the things of this life, and those that marry in such times as these are, and you are like further to see, will meet with more than ordinary troubles of this nature: I only would spare you, and have you keep yourselves as free as you can: or, I spare you any further discourse of that nature, not willing to torment you before the time cometh.

g Rom. 13. 29 But <sup>1</sup>this I say, brethren, the time <sup>1</sup>is short: it remaineth, that both they that <sup>2</sup>have wives be as though they had none;

He had before spoken to what concerned some, now he comes to what concerneth all. The time (saith he) is short; furred up, like sails when the mariner comes near his port. He either meaneth the time of this life, or the time of the world's duration; we often find the apostles speaking of their times as the last times (and in these senses all are concerned): or the time of the church's rest and tranquillity, which they had hitherto enjoyed in a far more perfect degree than they enjoyed them soon after this, when ten persecutions followed immediately one upon the neck of another. It remaineth, that both they that have wives be as though they had none; therefore (saith the apostle) it is the concernment of all Christians, not to indulge themselves too much in the pleasures and contentments of this life; but if ye be married, or shall marry, you will be concerned to keep your hearts as loose from the contentment and satisfaction men use to take in their wives, as if you had no wives at all.

30 And they that weep, as though they wept not; and they that rejoice, as though they rejoiced not; and they that buy, as though they possessed not;

And they that weep, as though they wept not; this consideration also should weigh with those who have a more afflicted portion in this life, and are mourners for the loss of their near relations; they have but lost what they could not long have kept, and for the time they kept them must have enjoyed them, probably, with a great deal of sorrow and bitterness. And they that rejoice, as though they rejoiced not; and so for any of those who rejoiced in any worldly enjoyments, the shortness of the time they are like to have them to rejoice in, should admonish them to govern and moderate their joy, for it is like to be but like the crackling of thorns under a pot. And that they buy as though they possessed not; and those that have liberal possessions of good things in this life, they should look upon them as none of theirs, and use them as not like to be their possessions long.

31 And they that use this world, as not abusing it: for <sup>1</sup>the fashion of this world passeth away.

And they that use this world, as not abusing it: while you have any thing of this world's goods you may use them, yea, you must use them, without them you cannot live in the world; but the consideration how little the time is you are like to have them to use, should govern you in the use of them, so as you ought to take heed you do not use them to any other purpose, or for any other end, than that for which God hath appointed and given them to you. For the fashion of this world passeth away; for this world is like a stage or theatre where are diversities of scenes, and the present scene abideth but for a little time, then passeth, and another scene or figure of things appeareth: those who appear this day in the form of princes and nobles, to-morrow appear as beggars, and persons of a low estate and degree.

32 But I would have you without carefulness. <sup>k</sup>He that is unmarried careth for the things <sup>l</sup>that belong to the Lord, how he may please the Lord:

But I would have you without carefulness; the reason why I have advised (during the present distressed estate of the church) a single rather than a married life, for those to whom God hath given the gift of continency, is, that those who are Christians might live as free from such cares as divide and distract men's and women's minds, as they possibly can. He that is unmarried careth for the things that belong to the Lord, how he may please the Lord: the single person that hath a spiritual heart, disposed to pious performances, being free from other distractions and cares, caused by worldly occasions, will spend all his thoughts about his duty toward God, and how to please him.

33 But he that is married careth for the things that are of the world, how he may please his wife.

But he that is married hath other things which he must take care about; for besides that he is obliged to provide for his family, husbands and wives are under some obligations to please each other by divertisements, which, though not in themselves sinful, yet take up time, which those free from such relations may spend more religiously.

34 There is difference also between a wife and a virgin. The unmarried woman <sup>1</sup>careth for the things of the Lord, that <sup>1</sup>she may be holy both in body and in <sup>1</sup>spirit: but she that is married careth for the things of the world, how she may please her husband.

There is the same difference betwixt a married woman and a single woman, as there is betwixt a married man and a single man. If a woman be unmarried, and be piously disposed, she hath leisure and opportunity enough to mind the things of God; but if she be married, she will then be obliged to attend secular affairs, to take care for her family, and to please her husband. It is the same thing that was before said of the man. The sense is, that a conjugal relation draws along with it many diversions, from which a single life is free.

35 And this I speak for your own profit; not that I may cast a snare upon you, but for that which is comely, and that ye may attend upon the Lord without distraction.

And this I speak for your own profit; for your advantage both as to your converse in the world, and also for your religious conversation, and the performance of those duties which you owe unto God; for those that are married must meet with more troubles and cares in this life, and cannot have so much time and leisure for religious duties, as others have that are not entangled in the domestic cares of a family. Not that I may cast a snare upon you; yet I would not bring you under a snare, imposing what God hath not imposed, and obliging you where God hath not obliged you. But for that which is comely; the word here is εὐχρημον, it strictly signifies a thing of a good figure, and is translated in Scripture honourable, Mark xv. 43; Acts xiii. 50; xvii. 11; where it signifies what is of a fair and good repute in the eye of the world; which is also the sense of it, chap. xii. 24, where we read of the comely parts of man's body; but in this place the word signifies most largely, the same with profitable and convenient. For marriage is a state which neither is in itself indecent, nor ever was so reputed in the world by any nation, and the Scripture tells us, that marriage is honourable amongst all, Heb. xiii. 4. The word therefore here is of the same significance with συμφέρον, which in the beginning of the verse is translated profit, and chap. vi. 12, is translated expedient. And that you may attend upon the Lord without distraction; the phrase in the Greek is very difficult to be translated properly into our English language, word for word it is, to sit well to the Lord without distraction; our translators render it, attend upon the Lord. We have something like it in our language, when we express our diligent attendance to a thing, under the notion of sitting close to a business; which is opposed to such an attendance to business as we give when we have many avocations and callings away, so as we cannot sit close to it. The apostle saith, that this was the end of his advising those who could contain not to marry under that state of things in the world referring to the church, that they might with more ease and conveniency attend to the great concerns of their souls, without those distracting and dividing thoughts which they must have who were entangled with domestic businesses and relations.

36 But if any man think that he behaveth himself uncomely toward his virgin, if she pass the flower of her age, and need so require, let him do what he will, he sinneth not: let them marry.

But if any man think that he behaveth himself uncomely: there is a general and a particular uncomeliness; some things are uncomely with respect to all persons; of such things the apostle doth not here speak; but of a particular uncomeliness with respect to the circumstances of particular persons. Neither doth uncomely here signify a mere indecency and unhandsoneness, but such a behaviour as suiteth not the general rules of the gospel, which judgment is to be ruled by the circumstances of persons, as they more or less desire marriage. If she pass the flower of her age; if she be of marriageable years, or rather, if she beginneth to grow old, and need so require, and be desirous of marriage, so as the parent seeth reason to fear that, if he gives her not in marriage, she will so dispose of herself without asking her father's advice or leave, or be exposed, possibly, to worse temptations: which two things seem to interpret that term, if need so require. Let him do what he will, he sinneth not: let them marry; in such a case as this a Christian parent shall not sin, if he disposeth her in marriage: let her marry to such a person as she loveth, and her parent seeth proper for her. He speaks in the plural number, because marriage is betwixt two persons. The reason of this determination is, because the apostle, in his former discourse, had no where condemned a married estate during the present distress of things, as sinful or unlawful, but only as inexpedient, or not so expedient as a single life during the present distress; he had before determined, ver. 9, that it was better to marry than to burn. Now no inexpediency of a thing can balance what is plainly sinful. If therefore the case be such, that a man or woman must marry, or sin, through marriage brings with it more care and trouble, yet it is to be preferred before plain sinning.

37 Nethertheless he that standeth stedfast in his heart, having no necessity, but hath power over his own will, and hath so decreed in his heart that he will keep his virgin, doeth well.

Nevertheless he that standeth stedfast in his heart; if a man be resolved to keep his daughter a virgin, not uncertain in his own mind, and wavering what he should do, upon a just consideration of circumstances; having no necessity; and doth not see a necessity to dispose of her, either for the avoiding some sin against God, or for the better providing for himself and the rest of his family; but hath power over his own will; but hath a perfect freedom in his own will, so that his will be not contradicted by his daughter's fondness of a married life; for in such a case the father, though he would willingly not dispose of his daughter in marriage, yet ought to be overruled by the will of his daughter, and so hath not a power over his own will, being forced by the rules of religion to take care of the soul and spiritual welfare of his child; for though the parent hath a great power over his child, and ought to consent to the marriage of his child, yet he hath no such power as wholly to hinder them from marriage. And hath so decreed in his heart that he will keep his virgin; if he be fully resolved, upon a due consideration of all circumstances, and the virgin be satisfied, and yields up herself in the case to her father's pleasure, in such a case, if the father doth not put her upon marriage, but resolves to keep her unmarried, he doeth well; that is, not only he shall not sin against God, but he doth that which is more eligible, considering the present circumstances of things, and better than if he did find out a husband for her, and give her to him (as it is expounded in the next verse).

38 <sup>m</sup> Heb. 13.4. So then he that giveth her in marriage doeth well; but he that giveth her not in marriage doeth better.

So then he that giveth her in marriage doeth well: there is no general rule for all parents in this case, where the duty or sin of parents may arise from their or their children's different circumstances. But supposing that a parent, having duly weighed all circumstances, be fully resolved, and he finds the child's will concurring, that she can forbear, and is willing to do in the case what her parent desires; in such a case as this, if the parent disposeth her in marriage, I cannot say he sinneth, but he doth what he may do. But he that giveth her not in marriage doeth better; but with reference to the present state of things in the church and in the world, and with reference to the young woman's liberty for the service of God, he doth better, if he doth not so dispose her. The thing is in itself indifferent, and Christians must be in it ruled and inclined one way or another from circumstances.

39 <sup>n</sup> Rom. 7.2. The wife is bound by the law as long as her husband liveth; but if her husband be dead, she is at liberty to be married to whom she will; <sup>o</sup> 3 Cor. 6.14. only in the Lord.

The apostle all along this chapter hath been speaking to several cases, which the church of Corinth had put to him concerning marriage; some that concerned persons already married, others that concerned such as were single, having been never married; he shutteth up his discourse with advice which relateth to such as had lost their husbands, with reference to second marriages. As to this he determineth, that no woman might marry again while her first husband lived; that is, unless her husband be legally divorced from her for adultery, or unless her husband, being a heathen, had voluntarily deserted her: but if her husband were dead, she might marry to whom she would; yet she was not at such liberty, as that she might marry an unbeliever. Unbelievers are either heathens, or Christians in name, but such as are idolaters, or profane persons, or heretics, who hold such tenets as are inconsistent with any true faith in Jesus Christ. This phrase, only in the Lord, seemeth to oblige godly women, not only to avoid marrying with heathens, but with nominal Christians; that is, such who, although they have been baptized, and own Christ with their tongues, yet hold such damnable opinions, or live such profane lives, or worship God in such an idolatrous manner, as is inconsistent with any true faith in Christ. The reason of the precept holds as well to the latter as to the former.

40 But she is happier if she so abide, <sup>p</sup> ver. 25. after my judgment: and <sup>q</sup> I think also <sup>1</sup> 1 The. 4.8. that I have the Spirit of God.

But if other circumstances concur, that a widow can abide without marriage without waxing wanton, and running into temptation, and so as to manage her outward concerns without the help of a husband, my opinion is, that she is more happy if she keeps herself a widow, and doth not marry again; not more happy because more holy, or in a fairer road to the kingdom of heaven, but upon the two accounts before mentioned; more happy because free from troubles and distractions, and because she will be more free and at liberty to mind heavenly things. And I think also that I have the Spirit of God; and, saith he, I think I know as much of the mind of the Holy Spirit of God, as either those who teach you otherwise, or who may have opinions contrary to mine in this case.

CHAP. VIII.

The preference of charity to knowledge, 1—3. An idol is nothing in the esteem of those who have right notions of one God, and of one Lord Jesus Christ, 4—6. But it is sin in those, who by an indiscreet use of their knowledge, in eating meats offered to idols, tempt weaker consciences to offend, 7—13.

NOW <sup>a</sup> as touching things offered unto idols, we know that we all have <sup>b</sup> knowledge. <sup>c</sup> Knowledge puffeth up, but charity edifieth.

The apostle proceedeth to a new argument, about which the Corinthians had wrote to him, viz. about the eating of meat offered to idols. Of this meat offered to idols we have this account given us: Feasts upon sacrifices were very usual amongst the heathens; they first offered oxen, sheep, or other cattle to the idol; then the priest offered a part, burning it upon the idol's altar; other part they restored to the offerers, or took it to themselves. The priests made a feast in the idol's temple of their parts, and invited friends to it. The offerers either so feasted with the part restored to them in the idol's temple, or carried it home, and there feasted their neighbours with it; or else carried it into the market, and sold it (as other meat) in the shambles. The question was, Whether it was lawful for Christians, being invited to these feasts by those amongst whom they lived, to go to them, and to eat of such meat, whether it were in the idol's temple, or at the pagans' houses; or if any such meat were bought in the shambles, whether they might eat of that? Some amongst the Christians at Corinth thought any of these were lawful, because they knew an idol was nothing but a block, or piece of wood or stone, so could not defile any thing. The apostle tells them, that he knew very many of them had good degrees of knowledge, and every one understood that an idol was nothing; but yet he warneth them to take heed they were not puffed up with their knowledge, that is, swelled in such a confident opinion of it, that they thought they could not be mistaken, and be betrayed, by their conceit of it, to do that which is sinful; for charity edifieth. Charity signifieth either love to God, or love to our neighbour; here the latter seemeth to be intended, and the sense is, That they were not only concerned in the good of their own souls, but of their neighbours' also, and to do that which might tend to their profit and edification, not to their ruin and destruction.

2 And <sup>d</sup> if any man think that he knoweth any thing, he knoweth nothing yet as he ought to know.

Let it be in this or any other matter, if any man be proud of his knowledge, and be conceited that he knoweth enough, and needeth none to instruct him, he may indeed have a notion of things, but it will do him no good; a man ought to use his knowledge for the glory of God, and the edification of others. Let a man have never so large a notion of things, if he be not humble, if he useth not his knowledge to the honour of God and the advantage of others, he knoweth nothing as he ought to know it. Knowledge is a talent not to be laid up in a napkin.

3 But if any man love God, <sup>e</sup> the same is known of him.

It is of much more advantage to a soul to be known of God, that is, owned, acknowledged, and approved, than to comprehend much of the things of God in its notion. A man may know much of God, and yet be one to whom God will one day say, Depart from me, I know you not, you workers of iniquity: but if any man love God, that man is beloved of God, and shall be owned and acknowledged by him. In this sense know is taken in a multitude of scriptures: see John xvii. 3. Our translators render this word allow, Rom. vii. 15.

4 As concerning therefore the eating of those things that are offered in sacrifice unto idols, we know that <sup>f</sup> an idol is nothing in the world, <sup>g</sup> and that there is none other God but one.

Those things that are offered in sacrifice unto idols; meat which is part of that sacrifice which hath been offered to an idol, whether it be to be eaten in the idol's temple, or in a private house. We know that an idol is nothing in the world; we know that an image, or an idol, the representation of some other thing, though in respect of the matter it be something, either wood, stone, or earth, and in respect of form it be something, yet it is nothing formally, or representatively; though it is set up to represent to us a Deity, there is nothing of a Divine nature, or the representation of a Divine nature, in it. It is nothing of what the poor blind heathen take it to be, and therefore in the Hebrew it hath its name from a word <sup>h</sup> that signifieth nothing, Job xiii. 14; Zech. xi. 17: or it is nothing that can either sanctify or pollute any meat that is set before it. And we know that there is none other God but one: the apostle may be conceived to have spoken these words as from himself, granting what those said who took themselves to be men of knowledge; or else in the language of those who thus spake, repeating their words.

5 For though there be that are <sup>i</sup> called gods, whether in heaven or in earth, (as there be gods many, and lords many,)

There are many whom heathens call gods, and whom God himself calleth gods: the angels that are in heaven are called God's host, Gen. xxxii. 2; the heavenly host, Luke

ii. 13; the sons of God, Job i. 6; ii. 1. Magistrates are also called gods, Psal. lxxxii. 6, because God hath committed a great part of his power unto them. Thus there are many gods and many lords.

6 But <sup>j</sup> to us there is but one God, the Father, <sup>k</sup> of whom are all things, and we <sup>l</sup> in him; and <sup>m</sup> one Lord Jesus Christ, <sup>n</sup> by whom are all things, and we by him.

Whatever the idolatrous heathens think or believe, to us (who are Christians) there is but one who is truly and essentially God, (though indeed there be more than one person in the Deity,) the Father, who is the Fountain of the Deity, communicating his Divine nature to the other two persons, and of whom are all things. It is a term which signifieth the primary Cause and Author of all things: we subsist in him, according to that of the apostle, Acts xvii. 28, In him we live, and move, and have our being; and we are for him, created for his honour and glory, as the phrase may also be translated. And one Lord Jesus Christ, by whom are all things. He is the second person in the holy Trinity. It is the observation of a learned author, That though the name of God be often given to Christ, yet no where by Paul where he maketh mention of God the Father; from whence he concludes, that the term of Lord given to Christ, signifieth his pre-eminence above all things, (the Father excepted,) according to what the apostle speaks, chap. xv. 27. By this Christ, saith the apostle, are all things: All things were made by him, and without him was not any thing made that was made, John i. 3; yet the difference of the phrase is observable, to denote to us the order of working in the holy Trinity. All things are of the Father by the Son. And we by him; and we (saith the apostle) are by the Son created, redeemed, &c.

7 Howbeit there is not in every man that knowledge: for some <sup>o</sup> with conscience of the idol unto this hour eat it as a thing offered unto an idol; and their conscience being weak is <sup>p</sup> defiled.

Though some of you know that there is but one living and true God, and that an idol is nothing in the world, and meat is neither sanctified nor polluted by being set before it; yet every one doth not know so much: and though the gospel have been a long time preached amongst them, yet to this day they may have some superstitious opinion of the idol, and then their conscience will be defiled or polluted. It is much the same case at this day as to the business of image-worship, or veneration of images, and invocation of saints, amongst the papists. The wisest and most knowing of them will declaim against giving Divine adoration to the image, or to the saint, and tell us that they worship the true and living God upon the sight of the image only, and make use of the name of the saint only to desire him, or her, to pray to God for them. Now not to meddle with that question, Whether in our worshipping the true God, it be lawful to set a creature before us as our motive or incitement to worship, or use any Mediator but Christ? yet the things are unlawful, upon the same account that the apostle here determines it unlawful for stronger Christians to eat meat offered to idols, though they knew and professed that an idol was nothing; for all people that come so to worship have not that knowledge; there are, without doubt, multitudes of simple people amongst the papists, that, plainly, in this kind of veneration and adoration venerate and adore the creature; and so their consciences are defiled by idolatry, because they have not such knowledge as others have, supposing that what those others did were lawful as to their practice, which indeed it is not.

8 But <sup>q</sup> meat commendeth us not to God: for neither, if we eat, <sup>r</sup> are we the better; neither, if we eat not, <sup>s</sup> are we the worse.

The apostle here speaketh in the person either of those teachers amongst them, or those more private persons amongst them, who made no difficulty of eating meat offered to idols; they objected, that meat, or the eating of meat, was not the thing which commended any man to God; they were not the better if they did eat, or the worse if they did not eat. The apostle himself had asserted this, Rom. xiv. 17, that the kingdom of God was not meat or drink; but righteousness, and peace, and joy in the Holy Ghost.

q Gal. 5. 13. 9 But <sup>2</sup>take heed lest by any means this || liberty of your's become <sup>2</sup>a stumblingblock to them that are weak.

The word ἐλευθερία is here well translated liberty, though it also signifieth right, and seems in either sense rather to signify a supposed than a real liberty or right; for we shall see in the next verse, that the apostle is here speaking of their eating in the idol's temple, which, chap. x. 21, he determineth to be a having a communion with devils, and therefore could not be lawful; the apostle therefore seemeth here only to suppose (as they pretended) that in their eating simply in the idol's temple they did not sin, because by eating men are not made the worse; yet, as we shall see afterwards, he declareth their action was not free from guilt, as it was a violation of that brotherly love which they were obliged to show to their neighbour.

10 For if any man see thee which hast knowledge sit at meat in <sup>2</sup>the idol's temple, shall not <sup>2</sup>the conscience of him which is weak be † emboldened to eat those things which are offered to idols;

Here the apostle showeth how they sinned in eating meat in the idol's temple, which had been before offered to the idol, admitting the thing in itself lawful, (which indeed it was not,) viz. accidentally, by laying a stumblingblock before their brethren, who either were really weak in their knowledge, or, at least, they were looked upon as such. For (saith he) if any see thee, who, they think, hast knowledge, or who boastest of thy knowledge, sit at meat in the idol's temple, will not he by it be encouraged to do the same, though possibly he judgeth it is not lawful? The word translated emboldened, is the same which is elsewhere often in the New Testament translated edified: it metaphorically signifies to make a progress or proficiency either in good or evil (though this be the only text in the New Testament where it is taken in an ill sense). This the apostle determines sinful; which lets us know the obligation that lieth upon every good Christian, not to use his liberty to the prejudice of others' souls, by doing any actions which we may do or let alone, which done by us may probably become a snare to them.

11 And <sup>2</sup>through thy knowledge shall the weak brother perish, for whom Christ died?

Through thy knowledge, in this place, is, by occasion of thy knowledge. God hath not given people knowledge that they thereby should be a means to harm and to destroy, but to do good, and to save others; it is a most absurd thing for any to use their knowledge, therefore, to the destruction of others. Shall the weak brother perish? by perish is here meant, be led into sin, by acting contrary to the judgment of his own conscience; for, (as the apostle saith, Rom. xiv. 23,) He that doubteth is damned if he eat, for whatsoever is not of faith, that is, done out of a firm persuasion in the party doing that it is lawful, is sin. For whom Christ died; though he be weak, yet if he be a true believer, Christ died for him, and there can be nothing more contrary to the duty of a charitable Christian, than to be a means to damn him whom Christ came down from heaven and died for, that he might save him.

12 But <sup>2</sup>when ye sin so against the brethren, and wound their weak conscience, ye sin against Christ.

But when ye sin so against the brethren: sin is properly against God, for it is a breach of the Divine law; but the violations of that part of the Divine law which concerneth our duty to our neighbour, are called sins against our brethren, that is, sins against God in matters which concern our duty towards our brethren. And wound their weak conscience; the giving the weak judgments of others, by your examples, an occasion of sin, by venturing upon actions which they think sinful, is that which is here called a beating, or a wounding, their weak consciences, because it is indeed a hurting and defiling of them. Ye sin against Christ; this the apostle determineth to be a sinning against Christ; both against the law of Christ, concerning loving one another, and against the love of Christ, who, in dying for the weakest believers, hath showed the highest degree of love imaginable to them; whom they are far from following, who will not abate themselves a small matter of liberty, where the use of it this or that way may very probably be an occasion of sin and ruin to their brethren's souls.

13 Wherefore, <sup>2</sup>if meat make my brother to offend, I will eat no flesh while the world standeth, lest I make my brother to offend.

If meat make my brother to offend; suppose therefore it were lawful for me to eat flesh offered to idols, yet if I cannot do it but I shall make my brother sin, I will forbear. Others understand it more generally, not of the meat before mentioned, but of all flesh: I will rather live upon bread and herbs; by which expression the apostle doth not suppose, that there can ever be such a case when there shall be any such need, but only declares how much a good Christian should do, to prevent his brother's sinning against God. I will eat no flesh while the world standeth, lest I make my brother to offend: those expressions, Matt. v. 29, of plucking out the right eye, and cutting off the right hand, are much of the same nature; both those phrases and this phrase signify only, that we ought to do any thing, and to deny ourselves in any thing, rather than ourselves to sin, or be wilful occasions to others of sin.

From this discourse of the apostle it is very plain, that it is the duty of Christians, in any matters where they are by the law of God at liberty whether they will do a thing or no, to take that part which they see will give least occasion of sin unto their brethren, and to avoid that part which, if they will take, they see they shall by taking it give occasion to others to sin, though they be themselves never so well satisfied as to the lawfulness of their action (provided the action be only lawful, not necessary, and what by the law of God they are bound to do, or to avoid). But here two grave questions arise: 1. Whether the command of superiors doth not here alter the case? Admit a thing be in itself by us judged lawful, what by God's law we may do, or let alone; and our superiors command us to do, or to avoid that thing: we on the other side see, that if we do it, or avoid it, we shall very probably be occasion to make our brethren sin, who doubt of the lawfulness of the thing. The question is, What is to be done in this case? That the law of God commanding love to our brethren equally concerneth high and low, is out of doubt; so that no superior ought more to command any to do what it is evident he cannot do without making his brother to offend, than the inferior ought to do it: but the question is, What is the inferior's duty, if commanded? 2. A second question is, Suppose that, in such a case, I am commanded to do what I judge I may lawfully do, were it not for making my brother, by my example, to offend, and by the command of men I am obliged to do it, or to ruin myself and family; what is my duty in this case? In both these cases there seems to be a collision of precepts. In the first case the precept of loving our neighbours seems to dash against the many precepts for obeying superiors; in the other case, it seems to dash against the precept for providing for ourselves and families; so as the question is, Which precepts lay here the greatest obligation, where both cannot be obeyed? But we leave these questions to casuists. The determination of what is the will of God in either of them, will require a great many more words than what is fit to encumber annotations with, especially considering that neither of them properly falls into the explication of this text, where it is certain that the Corinthians were at a perfect liberty, and had no superiors that commanded them so to eat, (had the thing been in itself lawful,) neither were they under any necessity, either to eat that meat, or to starve themselves or families; they had other flesh besides that to eat. In this case the duty of Christians is plainly determined by the apostle.

CHAP. IX

Paul vindicateth his apostolical character, 1, 2, and right to a maintenance from the churches, 3—14; though he relinquished that right for the furtherance of the gospel, not content with doing only his indispensable duty, 15—18; but voluntarily subjecting himself in many points, where he was otherwise free, in order thereby to win over more converts to Christ, 19—23. Those who contend for a corruptible crown use much labour and abstinence, 24, 25. So doth the apostle strive for one that is incorruptible, 26, 27.

In the greater part of this chapter, the apostle proceedeth in his former discourse, not speaking particularly in the case of eating meat offered to idols, but to the general point, viz. That it is our duty to abate of our liberty, when we see we cannot use it without harm to other Christians. And here he proposeth to them his own example, who had restrained himself in three things, to two of which he had a liberty, and yet avoided it, and that not to prevent their sinning, but only their suffering, and that, too, only by being by him over-burdened: 1. As to eating and drinking. 2. Abstaining from marriage, by which he might have been more chargeable to them. 3. Requiring maintenance of them for his labour amongst them. As to both which he declares he had from God's law a liberty, but had forborne to use that part from which the church in that state might be prejudiced.

Am I not an apostle? some that are puffed up or seduced, will, it may be, deny that I am an apostle, a preacher of the gospel of the greatest eminency, immediately sent out by Christ to preach his gospel; but will any of you deny it? Am I not free? have I not the same liberty that any of you have in things wherein the law of God hath no more determined me than you? What charter of liberty hath God given to any of you more than he hath to me? Have I not seen Jesus Christ? did not I see Christ in my going to Damascus? Acts ix. 5; xxii. 13, 14; and when I was in my ecstasy, when I was rapt into the third heavens? 2 Cor. xii. 2—4; in prison? Acts xxiii. 11. He was the only apostle we read of, who saw Christ after his ascension. Are not ye my work in the Lord? if others will not look upon me as an apostle, God having wrought nothing upon their souls by my ministry, yet you, whose faith is my work, though in the Lord, as the principal efficient Cause, yet by me as God's instrument, cannot deny me to be so: if my having seen Jesus Christ, and being immediately sent out by him, be not enough to prove me so to you, yet the effects of my ministry upon you puts it past your denial.

2 If I be not an apostle unto others, yet doubtless I am to you: for <sup>d</sup>the seal of mine apostleship are ye in the Lord.

He had, ver. 1, told them they were his work in the Lord, from whence he concludes here, that he was an apostle, that is, one sent of Christ to them for the good of their souls, whatever he was to others. You, saith he, as to yourselves at least, are the seal of my apostolical office; it hath a confirmation in you by the effect, as the writing is confirmed by the seal. For how can you think, that the blessing of the Lord should go along with my preaching, to turn you from pagan idolatry, and your lewd courses of life, to the true Christian religion, and to a holy life and conversation, if God had not sent me. There is no such argument to prove a minister sent of Christ, as the success of his ministry in the conversion of souls unto God. It is true, we cannot conclude, that a minister is no true minister if he be able to produce no such seals of his calling; for the spiritual seed may for a time lie under the clods, and changes may be wrought in hearts, which are not published to the world; and even Isaiah may be sent to make the hearts of people fat. But where those seals can be produced, it is a most certain sign that the minister is a true minister, that is, one sent of God; for he could be no instrument to do such works if God were not with him; and if God had not sent him, he would not be with him so blessing his ministry. Yet it is possible the man may have his personal errors; for though some men doubt, whether an instance can be given of one openly and scandalously wicked, whom God ever honoured to be his instrument to convert souls, yet it would be rashly affirmed by any to say, that Judas (though a son of perdition, but not scandalous till the last) was an instrument to convert none.

3 Mine answer to them that do examine me is this,

These words may be understood in a double reference: either to what went before; then the sense is this: To those that examine me about my apostleship, this is my answer; That I have seen the Lord, that you are my work in the Lord, and the seal of my ministry. Or with reference to the words that follow; then the sense is this: If any man examine me, how I myself practise the doctrine which I preach to others, and determine myself as to my liberty for the good and profit of others, I give them the following answer.

4 *Have we not power to eat and to drink? e ver. 14.
1 Thess. 2. 6.
2 Thess. 3. 9.

Could I not eat and drink of such things offered to idols as well as you? Have not I as great a knowledge, and as much liberty? Yet, you see, I forbear. But the generality of interpreters rather incline to interpret it by what followeth: then, though it be here shortly expressed, and more fully opened afterward, yet the sense is, Have not I power to ask a maintenance of you, by which I should be enabled to eat and drink?

5 Have we not power to lead about a sister, a || wife, as well as other apostles, and as the brethren of the Lord, and *Cephas? | Or, woman.
Mat. 13. 55.
Mark 6. 3.
Luke 6. 15.
Gal. 1. 19.
g Matt. 8. 14.

Have we not power to lead about a sister, a wife? those that by those terms, ἀδελφήν, γυναῖκα, understand, not (as we translate it) a sister, a wife, but a woman, that should out of her estate have contributed to the apostle's maintenance, (as Joanna the wife of Chuza Herod's steward, and Susanna, and many others, followed Christ, and ministered to him of their substance, Luke viii. 3,) seem not to consider, 1. That such women would have been no burden, but a help to the church (which is quite contrary to the apostle's sense). 2. That the term lead about, imports a conjugal relation to the woman. 3. That if this had been the sense, it had been enough to have said, to lead about a woman; he should not need have said, a sister, a woman. 4. That such leading about a woman, not their wife, had been scandalous. 5. That the very phrase, a sister, a wife, answers the phrase, Acts xxiii. 1, Men, brethren, which signifies no more than, O ye Christian men; as a sister, a wife, signifies here a Christian wife. 6. That we no where read, that Peter, James, John, Judas, (here called the brethren of the Lord,) or any of the other apostles, ever in their travels carried about with them any such rich matrons, not their wives, who (as those, Luke viii. 3) ministered to them of their substance. Our interpreters have therefore justly translated it, a sister, a wife; and the sense is, Have I not power to marry? Yet the phrase teaches us two things: 1. That Christians have no power, that is, no lawful power, to marry such as are no Christians, their wives must be their sisters also in Christ. 2. That husbands and wives ought to be undivided companions one to another. As well as other apostles, and as the brethren of the Lord, and Cephas: he instanceth in several apostles that were married, Peter, (called Cephas), James, John, and Judas the son of Alphaeus, Christ's kinsmen. Whence we may observe, that ministers may lawfully marry, no law of God hath restrained them more than others. The popish doctrine forbidding to marry, is by the apostle determined to be a doctrine of devils, 1 Tim. iv. 1, 3.

6 Or I only and Barnabas, <sup>b</sup>have not we power to forbear working? h 2 Thess. 3.

Are I and Barnabas the only apostles who are obliged for our livelihood to work with our hands? as Paul did, Acts xviii. 3, making tents. We certainly, as well as the rest of the apostles, if we would run out to the utmost end of the line of our liberty in things, without having any regard to the circumstances of our brethren, might forbear working with our hands, and expect that those amongst whom we labour should maintain us.

Who goeth a warfare any time at his own charges? the work of the ministry is a warfare, the minister's work in that age was so in a more eminent manner, as the opposition to those first ministers of the gospel, both from the Jews and from the heathens, was greater than what ministers have in later ages met with. Now, saith the apostle, none that lists an army, expects that his soldiers should maintain themselves without any pay. Who planteth a vineyard, and eateth not of the fruit thereof? it is like the planting of a vineyard. The church, in Scripture, is called a vineyard, Isa. v. 1, 2. The plants are the Lord's, but he useth ministers' hands in the planting of them: none planteth a vineyard, but in expectation of some fruit; none employeth servants to plant a vineyard, but he resolveth to uphold them with food and raiment, while they are in his work. Or who feedeth a flock, and eateth not of the milk of the flock? the church is compared to a flock: saith the apostle, No man feeds a flock, either personally, or by his servants, but he eateth, or alloweth his servants to eat, of the milk of the flock. By these three instances, commonly known amongst men, the apostle showeth the reasonableness, that the ministers of the gospel should be maintained by the people, to whom they are ministers.

8 Say I these things as a man? or saith not the law the same also?

That is, I do not speak this only rationally, or by a fallible spirit, nor do I build this assertion alone upon instances known and familiar amongst men. As this is highly reasonable, and conformable to what the very light of nature showeth, and the law of nature obligeth men to in other cases, where men take others off their own work to attend theirs; so it is according to the will of God, which is the highest reason.

9 For it is written in the law of Moses, <sup>m</sup>Thou shalt not muzzle the mouth of the ox that treadeth out the corn. Doth God take care for oxen?

Art being not so improved formerly as now, nor in all places as in some places; they were wont anciently, both in the land of Judea, and since in Greece, and (as is said) at this day in some places of France, to tread out their corn by the feet of oxen: and by the law of Moses, Deut. xxv. 4, it should seem that some too covetous persons would muzzle the mouths of their oxen, that while they trod out the corn, they might eat none of it; which God, looking upon as an act of cruelty or unmercifulness, forbade his ancient people the Jews. Now, saith the apostle, Doth God take care for oxen? that is, more for oxen than for ministers or men? For God doth take care for oxen, he preserveth both man and beast; he takes care, as our Saviour elsewhere teacheth us, for the sparrows, for the fowls of the air, for the grass of the field, and therefore for oxen, which are a degree of creatures more noble: but by the same reason we must conclude, that he taketh a greater care for men, especially such as he employeth in his more immediate service.

10 Or saith he it altogether for our sakes? For our sakes, no doubt, this is written: that <sup>n</sup>he that ploweth should plow in hope; and that he that thresheth in hope should be partaker of his hope.

Not that the law, Deut. xxv. 4, did primarily reveal God's will for the maintenance of ministers; for undoubtedly it did primarily oblige them, according to the letter of it, not to deal cruelly and unmercifully with the beasts they made use of; but as they took them off from getting their food, by taking them up to tread out corn for them; so, while they did it, they should not starve them, but give them leave moderately to eat of it. But (saith the apostle) the reason of it doth much more oblige with respect to men, especially such men as are employed in a ministry for your souls. That he that ploweth should plough in hope; that as he who ploweth for another, ploweth in hope to get bread for himself, from the wages for which he covenanteth; and that he that thresheth in hope should be partaker of his hope; and so also doth the thresher thresh in hope: so we that are the Lord's ploughmen, working together with him (though in a far inferior degree of causation) in the ploughing up the fallow grounds of men's hearts, and sowing the seed of righteousness in men's souls; and the Lord's threshers, by our labours, exhortations, arguments, &c., beating the fruits of good works, to the glory of God, out of those amongst whom we labour; might also labour in some hope of a livelihood for ourselves, while we are doing the Lord's work and his people's.

By spiritual things the apostle meaneth the doctrine and sacraments of the gospel; which are called spiritual things, because they come from heaven, they affect the soul and spirit of a man, they tend to make men spiritual, they prepare the soul for heaven. By carnal things he means things which only serve our bodies, which are our carnal, fleshly part. From the inequality of these things, and the excellency of the former above the latter, the apostle argueth the reasonableness of ministers' maintenance from their people, they giving them quid pro quo, a just compensation for such allowance, yea, what was of much more value; for there is a great disproportion between things spiritual and things carnal, the former much excelling the latter: so as the minister of the gospel had the odds of them, giving people things of a much greater and more excellent value, for things of a much less and inferior value.

12 If others be partakers of this power over you, <sup>p</sup>are not we rather? <sup>q</sup>Nevertheless we have not used this power; but suffer all things, <sup>r</sup>lest we should hinder the Gospel of Christ.

If others be partakers of this power over you, are not we rather? those false apostles or teachers, which were amongst the Corinthians, did (as it seemeth) exercise this power, that is, required maintenance of the people; saith the apostle, Are not we by the same right possessed of such a power? might not we as reasonably expect such a maintenance? Object. But might not they have said, No, you are not; they are constantly residing amongst us, and instructing us, &c.? Answer. This arguing of the apostle lets us know, that the primitive churches were not only obliged to maintain their own pastors, but those also who were general officers to the church, and by the appointment of God were not to fix and abide in any one place, but had the care of all the churches upon them. And it may also teach us, that though Christians be in the first place obliged to take care of their own pastors, yet they are not to limit their charity to them, but also to take what care their ability will allow them of others, whose labours have at any time been useful to them, or may be useful to any other part of the church of God. Nevertheless we have not used this power; but suffer all things, lest we should hinder the gospel of Christ: Yet, saith the apostle, though we have this power or liberty, neither I nor Barnabas have made use of it, but suffer all those evils that come upon our not using it, hunger, thirst, labour, lest we should hinder the progress of the gospel, while some might for the charge decline hearing us, or others might charge us with covetousness, &c.

You may understand what is the mind and will of God under the New Testament, by reflecting upon what appeareth to you to have been his mind and will under the Old Testament: God had a ministry under the Old Testament, the tribe of Levi was it; and God there ordained and appointed a livelihood for them, Numb. xviii. 20; Deut. x. 9; xviii. 1, so as they needed not (as other men) to labour with their hands to get bread to eat.

14 Even so <sup>h</sup> hath the Lord ordained <sup>t</sup> that they which preach the Gospel should live of the Gospel.

God's will is the same under the New Testament that it was under the Old; it is not as to the people a matter of liberty, so as men may choose whether they will maintain their ministers or no, there is an ordinance of God in the case: it is the will of God, that those who are taken off from worldly employments, and spend their time in the study and preaching of the gospel, should have a livelihood from their labour.

15 But <sup>u</sup> I have used none of these things: neither have I written these things, that it should be so done unto me: for <sup>it</sup> were better for me to die, than that any man should make my glorying void.

Though I have such a liberty to marry as well as others, and a liberty to demand a maintenance of those to whom I preach the gospel, yet I have done neither. Nor do I now write to that purpose, that I would now impose a burden upon you to raise me a maintenance. I know I am calumniated by some, as if by preaching the gospel I only sought my own profit and advantage: I have gloried in the contrary, Acts xx. 33, 34; so ver. 18 of this chapter; and I look upon it as my great honour, that I can preach the gospel freely, and I had rather die by starving than lose this advantage of glorying. And if I for your profit, and for the advantage of the gospel, abate of my liberty, should not you abate of yours, to keep your weak brethren from destroying their souls by sinning against God?

16 For though I preach the Gospel, I have nothing to glory of: for necessity is laid upon me; yea, woe is unto me, if I preach not the Gospel!

For though I preach the gospel, I have nothing to glory of; though I do preach the gospel, yet I have no reason at all to glory; all that I have to glory in is, that I have preached it freely (which your false apostles and teachers do not); for the preaching of the gospel, considered without that circumstance, I have no reason to glory in that, for I am in it but a servant. For necessity is laid upon me; yea, woe is unto me, if I preach not the gospel! I am under the necessity of a Divine precept to do that, and exposed to dreadful penalties and woes if I do not do that; there is therefore no thanks I can claim upon that account; all that I can glory in is, that I do it without charge to those to whom I preach it. Some make a doubt, whether there lieth the same necessity upon ministers now to preach the gospel, and they be liable to the same dangers and penalties, if they do it not. I see no reason at all to doubt it; for what necessity lay upon Paul, or any of the apostles, but a necessity of precept, that is, they were obliged to obey the command of God in the case, and liable to such penalties in case of neglect, as men are subject to that obey not the command of God, in fulfilling the duties of their relations? The same necessity, the same danger, is yet incumbent upon every minister; or else we must say, that the precepts commanding ministers to preach concerned the apostles only, or that there is now no such order of men as ministers (both which are indeed said by Socinians). If there be such an ordinance of God as the ministry, ministers are under the precepts given to ministers, one of which is to preach: if they be under the same precepts, there is the same necessity upon them of obeying them, that was upon Paul, and they are, in case of disobedience, subjected to the same woes and penalties. Indeed, every minister is not bound to go up and down the world to preach, his relation is to a particular flock; that travelling to carry the gospel about the world was peculiar to the apostles, for the first plantation of the gospel; but so was not preaching; if it had, Timothy and Titus would have had no such charge as to that work. It is true, ministers are not bound to preach in others' houses without their leave; therefore we read very little of the apostles preaching in the temple and synagogues, nor without the leave of the Jews. But Paul judged himself bound to preach in the school of Tyrannus, Acts xix. 9, and in his own hired house at Rome, Acts xxviii.

30, 31. For the circumstance of numbers, to which they are bound to preach, the Holy Scripture hath no where determined, and ministers are left to be guided by their own prudence according to circumstances; but preach they must, if they be called of God; he hath sent them to it, fitted them for the work, and they have taken it upon them, and woe will be to every minister, so called and sent of God, if he doth not fulfil his ministry, as he hath opportunity and wisdom, considering circumstances, in order to the end which he is to aim at and to act for.

17 For if I do this thing willingly, <sup>I</sup> have a reward: but if against my will, <sup>a</sup> a dispensation of the Gospel is committed unto me.

*For if I do this thing willingly, I have a reward; if I who have a liberty to take a maintenance for my labour in the gospel, yet notwithstanding preach it freely, out of a free and cheerful mind, desirous to promote the honour and glory of Christ, I then may expect a reward: but if against my will, a dispensation of the gospel is committed unto me; but if I only preach the gospel because there is a necessity laid upon me, all that can be said of me is, that there is such a dispensation committed to me. The strength of the apostle's argument seems to lie here, That no man can reasonably expect thanks, or any extraordinary reward, for doing what he is obliged by his superior's command under a great penalty to do. The apostle was obliged by such a precept, and under such penalties, to preach the gospel; therefore he desired not only to do it, but to do it willingly and readily, a greater testimony of which could not be, than for him to do it without desiring or expecting any reward for his pains, but what God of his free grace should give him; this made this matter of glorying to him, which he desired might not be in vain. So that though the word ἰκόν here be truly translated willingly, and opposed to ἄκων, which is as truly translated unwillingly, yet it seems to comprehend without charge, and taking nothing for his pains, as a demonstration of his willingness to and cheerful performance of his work; which being a thing as to which God had laid him under no necessity by any precept, was matter of glorying to him against the false apostles, who did otherwise; and also a ground for him to expect a greater reward from God, than those who, though they did the same work, yet did it not from the like free and cheerful spirit.*

18 What is my reward then? Verily that, <sup>b</sup> when I preach the Gospel, I may make the Gospel of Christ without charge, <sup>c</sup> that I abuse not my power in the Gospel.

*What is my reward then? what then is the ground of my expectation of a greater reward? or wherein is the glorying I before mentioned? Not in the performance of the work, for as to that, I am under a necessity to do it, and under a penalty if I neglect it: but it lieth here, that when I preach the gospel, I do it freely, and make it without charge; a thing which, as to the substance of the work, he was not by any law of God bound to do, yet was not this in Paul a work of supererogation; for circumstances might so rule, and, doubtless, Paul apprehended they did so, that it might be his duty so to do. For though the minister may lawfully take maintenance from the people, where he cannot support himself without their assistance; yet if the case be such, that he can subsist without it, and the people be so poor that they are not able to give it; or if he seeth it will hinder the gospel, keeping many from coming within the sound of what must be chargeable to them, and open the mouths of enemies; it is matter of duty to him, under such circumstances, to preach freely. Though, considering the thing in itself, separately from such circumstances, the minister may lawfully enough require and expect such maintenance. That (saith the apostle) I abuse not my power in the gospel. Some think that the word here translated abuse, might better have been translated use, as it signified, chap. vii. 31. But it generally signifies abuse, so as there is no reason to vary from the common usage of it; according to which it teaches us this remarkable lesson, that so to use a liberty which God hath left us as to actions, as that by our use of it the glory of God or the good of others is hindered, is to abuse it, that is, not to use it to that true end for which God hath intrusted us with it. For this is* certain, that God hath intrusted us with no power or liberty to be used to the prejudice of his glory, which is the great end of our lives, or to the prejudice of the spiritual good and advantage of others. All such use of our liberty in any thing is indeed an abuse of it.

19 For though I be <sup>d</sup> free from all men, yet have <sup>e</sup> I made myself servant unto all, that I might gain the more.

For though I be free from all men; the word men is not in the Greek, but is supplied by our interpreters. Some make things the substantive, and restrain it to the things of the ceremonial law. It may be understood both of men and things; he was born no man's servant, nor by God's law made a servant to any men's humours, and as free as to many other things, as he was to have taken maintenance of the churches, for the pains he bestowed amongst them. Yet have I made myself servant unto all, that I might gain the more; yet (saith he) observe my practice, that I might gain men to Christ, (so the apostle several times calleth converting souls, bringing them in love with the gospel, and into a road that may bring them to heaven, which we ought to account the greatest gain in the world, as it appeareth from Dan. xii. 3.) I have become, or made myself, the servant of all; not the servants of their lusts and corruptions, (that is the way to lose men's souls, and destroy them, not to gain them,) but a servant to their weaknesses and infirmities, so far as they were not sinful: I have denied myself in my liberty, and determined myself to that part in my actions, which I saw would most oblige, profit, and endear them to me, and to bring them more in love with the gospel.

20 And <sup>g</sup> unto the Jews I became as a Jew, that I might gain the Jews; to them that are under the law, as under the law, that I might gain them that are under the law;

The ceremonial law died with Christ, Eph. ii. 15, 16, wherefore Christians were not obliged to the performance and observation of it after the death of Christ; but it pleased God for a time to indulge the Jews in the observance of those rites, until they could clearly see, and be fully persuaded of, their liberty from it, with which Christ had made them free; and it was some good time before all those, who from Judaism had turned to Christianity, could be thus persuaded, as we may learn from Gal. iv. 21, they desired to be under the law. To such, saith the apostle, I became as a Jew, (that is, I observed some rites which the ceremonial law (peculiar to the Jews) required; an instance of which we have, Acts xxi. 23—26, where we find Paul purifying himself (according to the rites of the ceremonial law) with four men which had a vow upon them. The Jews before Christ's death were under the law; many of them, though converted to the Christian religion after the death of Christ, apprehended themselves under the law, not as yet seeing the liberty with which Christ had made them free: saith the apostle, I, knowing the will of God, for a time, that the Jews should be indulged as to their weakness, became as one of them under the law, that I might gain them, that is, reconcile them to the Christian religion, and in some measure prepare them for the receiving the gospel. We have an instance of this in Paul's practice, Acts xvi. 3, where he circumcised Timothy, because his mother was a Jewess, that he might not irritate the Jews in those quarters, nor estrange them from the doctrine of the gospel. In all this Paul did nothing that was sinful, but only determined himself as to the liberty which God had given him, when he might do or forbear, either doing or forbearing to do, as he saw the one or the other made most for the honour and glory of God in the winning of souls.

21 <sup>h</sup> To <sup>i</sup> them that are without law, as without law, (<sup>k</sup> being not without law to God, but under the law to Christ,) that I might gain them that are without law.

It is manifest by the opposition of them that are without law, mentioned in this verse, to them under the law, mentioned in the former verse, that as by the latter the Jews are understood, so by the former the Gentiles are to be understood, who were under no obligation to the observance either of the ceremonial law or judicial law, given to the Jews; the one to guide that nation in the matters of worship till Christ should come; the other to guide them in matters of civil justice, as well as criminal causes, as matters of plea and trespass: so that the term ἀνόμους here signifieth differently from what it signifieth in many other scriptures; where it signifieth men that live as they list, without any regard to any laws of God or men, as Mark xv. 28; Luke xxii. 37; Acts ii. 23; 2 Thess. ii. 8; 1 Tim. i. 9, &c. This the apostle makes appear by the next words, where he tells us, he was not without law to God, but under the law to Christ: though to the Gentiles he behaved himself as if he himself had been a Gentile, that is, forbearing the observances of the Levitical law, to which the Gentiles had never any obligation at all, yet he did not behave himself as one that had no regard to the law of God, that was yet in force and obligatory, but acknowledged himself to be under that, though a servant of Christ's; so that he abated nothing of his necessary duty, only denied himself in some things as to which the law of God had left him a liberty, both to the Jews and Gentiles, propounding to himself the same end as to both, that is, the gaining of their souls to Christ.

22 <sup>l</sup> To the weak became I as weak, that I might gain the weak: <sup>m</sup> I am made all things to all men, <sup>n</sup> that I might by all means save some.

To the weak became I as weak, that I might gain the weak; to those that I observed weak in knowledge and faith, who had not such a firm persuasion of the lawfulness of some things, (suppose circumcision, purifyings required by the law of Moses, &c.,) I became as weak, that is, I yielded to them; and the things being to me matters of liberty, which I knew I might do, or not do, and be no transgressor of God's law, they being not able to comply with me, I complied with them, abating my liberty to gratify their consciences; though I knew that it was weakness in them, yet I indulged it, and made my more knowledge serve them in their weakness, so that I might not lose them. I am made all things to all men, that I might by all means save some; thus, that I might be an instrument in any degree to save them, according to the various persuasions of several Christians I behaved myself towards them; doing nothing to gratify them, by doing of which I knew, or had the least jealousy, I should offend God; but not refusing any thing, either as to doing or forbearing, (which by the law of God I saw I might do or forbear,) where I saw the least hopes, by such doing or forbearing, to do the souls of those good, in order to their eternal salvation, with whom I was, and for whose sake I so did, or forbore any thing. Oh the humility and charity of this great apostle! what an example hath he set to all! for none can pretend to a greater superiority over men, as to spiritual things, than he unquestionably had.

23 And this I do for the Gospel's sake, that I might be partaker thereof with you.

Paul had two great ends which he aimed at in this denial of himself in these points of liberty; the one was the doing good to the souls both of Jews and Gentiles, this he had before instanced in; the other was the glory of God, which is that which he here meaneth by this phrase, for the gospel's sake, which he before expounded, ver. 12, lest we should hinder the gospel of Christ. By Paul's tenacious adhering to one part in a thing wherein he had liberty, the gospel, that is, the progress or success of the gospel, might have been hindered, both by the reproaches of enemies, and also by the alienation and estrangement of the hearts of weaker Christians, or laying stumblingblocks before them, at which they might fall, being imboldened by the examples of their guides, to do what, though lawful in itself, yet they judged unlawful. That I might be partaker thereof with you; I did it, saith he, that I might bring you into the fellowship of the gospel: I had rather so interpret it, than of the reward of the gospel, as it pleaseth some. The humility of the great apostle is very remarkable; he disdaineth not to be συγκοινωνός, a partaker in the gospel with the meanest members of the church; he is not ashamed to call those brethren whom his Lord and Master is not ashamed so to call.

24 Know ye not that they which run in a race run all, but one receiveth the prize? So run, that ye may obtain.

The apostle presseth all his former discourse by minding them of the difficulty of getting to heaven, and of the obligation that lay upon them to be the first in the spiritual race. To this purpose he fetcheth a similitude from what they saw daily, in the practice of those who frequented those games by which the Romans and Corinthians were wont to divert themselves. They had several, known by the names of the Olympian, Pythian, Nemean, and Isthmian games, the latter of which were most proper to Greece. At these games there were several that ran races, either on foot or on horseback; and several that wrestled. The reward was a crown, or garland: and for those that ran, we read that the crown or garland was hung up at the end of the race, and those who, running on foot or on horseback, could first lay hold upon it, and take it down, had it, so as though many ran, yet but one had the crown. So, he saith, it is as to getting to heaven; men might think it was a light matter, but they who would have the crown of glory must run for it, and it was a work which required so much striving and labour, that not many would have that crown: which is the same with that which our Saviour saith, Luke xiii. 24. For many will seek to enter in, and shall not be able. 2 Tim. ii. 5. If a man strive for masteries, yet is he not crowned, except he strive lawfully. Therefore, saith the apostle, make it your business, so to run, that you may obtain; not only to do things in themselves lawful or good, but which are so clothed with all their circumstances, and in the best manner, for the glory of God, and the good of others.

25 And every man that striveth for the mastery is temperate in all things. Now they do it to obtain a corruptible crown; but we an incorruptible.

This is not all that is required of men that would go to heaven, that they do not make an ill use of their liberty, using it to the dishonour of God, or to the prejudice of others; but look as it is with wrestlers in those games in practice amongst you, they are temperate in all things; in the use of meats and drinks, or any pleasures, though in themselves lawful, they will so use them, as may best serve their end, upholding the strength of their body for the motion they are to use, and yet not clogging them, or so using them, that they shall indispose them to, or hinder them in, that motion which they are to use. We, that are Christians, and striving for heaven, should also do the like, so behaving ourselves in the use of meats, drinks, apparel, pleasures, as the things, so used by us, may serve us in our business for heaven, and be no clog or hindrance to us. And we have reason so to do, or we shall be shamed by those gamesters; for they in that manner deny, restrain, and govern themselves to get a crown, which, when they have, is a pitiful, corruptible, perishing thing; we do it for a crown that is incorruptible: An inheritance incorruptible, and undefiled, and that fadeth not away, reserved in heaven for you, as the apostle speaketh, 1 Pet. i. 4.

1 2 Tim. 2. 5.

26 I therefore so run, not as uncertainly; so fight I, not as one that beateth the air:

The apostle proposeth his own example. As it is observed in country work, he that only bids his servants do work, and puts not his own hand to it, or at least doth not attend and overlook them in their work, hath little done: so it is as observable in spiritual work, that a minister of the gospel, who only, in the pulpit, dictates duty to others, but, out of it, doth nothing of himself, seldom doth any good by his preaching. People not naturally inclined to any spiritual duty, have the old proverb, Physician, cure thyself, at their tongue's end, and are hard to believe that teacher, who doth not in some measure live up to his own doctrine. Therefore, saith the apostle, I run; I am in the same race with you, and running to the same mark and for the same prize. I give you no other counsel than I myself take; I endeavour so to live, so in all things to behave myself, as I may not be at uncertainties whether I please God by my actions, or shall get to heaven, yea or no. I am a fellow soldier with you, fighting against sin; I make it my great business, not so to fight, so to resist sin, as if I did beat the air; that is, get no more fruit, profit, or advantage by it, than if I threw stones against the wind, or with a staff did beat the air. It is not every running, or every fighting, that will bring a man to heaven; it must be a running with all our might, and continuing our motion till we come to the end of our race; a fighting with all our might, and that against all sin.

27 But I keep under my body, and bring it into subjection: lest that by any means, when I have preached to others, I myself should be a castaway.

Here the apostle informs us how he ran, that he might not run uncertainly; how he fought, so as he might not be like one beating the air: I (saith he) keep under my body, and bring it into subjection. By body, here, we must not understand only the apostle's fleshly part (which we usually call our body); no, nor only our more gross and filthy affections and lusts (as some of the schoolmen have thought); but what the apostle elsewhere calleth the old man, under which notion cometh the sinful inclinations of our will, and corrupt dictates of reason, as it is in man since the fall. All this, as it cometh under the notion of the flesh in many other places of Scripture, and of our members which are upon the earth, Col. iii. 5; so it cometh here under the notion of the body; and, indeed, is that which our apostle calleth the body of death, Rom. vii. 24. This was the object of the apostle's action; the object about which he was exercised. For his action, or exercise about this object, is expressed by two words, ὑποταξάω and δαλαργῶ; the former word (as some think) is borrowed from the practice of those that fought in the afore-mentioned games, who knocked and beat one another till they were black and blue, and forced to yield themselves conquered. The second word signifieth to make one a servant, to bring one under command, so as he will do what another would have him do. By these two words the apostle expresseth that mortification, which he declareth himself to have lived in the practice of, that he might not in his race for heaven run uncertainly, nor in his spiritual fight lose his labour, and reap no more profit than one should reap that spends his time in beating the air. Their sense, who think that this duty of Paul was discharged by acts of mere external discipline, such as fasting, wearing sackcloth, beating themselves, &c., is much too short; these things reach not to the mind of man, his corrupt affections and lusts, which give life to the extravagancy of the bodily members, though indeed they may some of them be good means in order to the greater work. Paul's meaning was, that he made it his work to deny his sensitive appetite such gratifications as it would have; to resist the extravagant motions of his will, yea, of his own corrupt reason, so far as they were in any thing contrary to the holy will of God; though, in order to this, he also used fasting and prayer, and such acts of external discipline as his wisdom taught him were any way proper to this end. And this he tells us that he did, lest, while he preached to others, he himself should be a castaway: from whence we may observe, that Paul thought such a thing possible, that one who all his life had been preaching to others, to bring them to heaven, might himself be thrown into hell at last; and if it had not, our Saviour would never have told us, that he would at the last day say to some, Depart from me, I know you not, you workers of iniquity; who for their admittance had pleaded, We have prophesied in thy name, Matt. vii. 22, 23. Nor must we question but Judas, whom our Saviour calls a son of perdition, was a lost man as to eternity, though it be certain that he, as well as the other apostles, was a preacher of the gospel: yea, so far is this from being impossible, that it was the opinion of Chrysostom, that few ministers would be saved. We may also further observe, that such ministers as indulge their body, giving themselves liberties, either more externally in meats, drinks, apparel, pleasures; or more internally, indulging themselves in sinful speculations, notions, affections, inclinations; take a quite contrary road to heaven than Paul took, and think they have a great deal more liberty to the flesh than St. Paul thought he had, or than he durst use.

The Jews who came out of Egypt had all sacraments typical of ours, yet many of them perished through sin, 1-5. Their examples should serve, as they were intended, for our admonition, 6-12. God will not suffer his servants to be tempted beyond their strength, 13. Christians must flee idolatry, and not by partaking of idol sacrifices own fellowship with devils, 14-22. Even in the use of things lawful we should consult the good of others, 23-30; and refer all we do to God's glory, 31; careful to give none offence, after the apostle's own example, 32, 33.

MOREOVER, brethren, I would not that ye should be ignorant, how that all our fathers were under <sup>a</sup>the cloud, and all passed through <sup>b</sup>the sea;

The apostle saw that many in this church of Corinth were puffed up with their knowledge, and other gifts and great privileges with which God had blessed them; as also with the opinion of their being a gospel church, and some of the first-fruits of the Gentiles unto Christ, and might therefore think, that they needed not to be pressed to such degrees of strictness and watchfulness; therefore, to beat them off from this confidence and vain presumption, the apostle here sets before them the example of the church of the Jews: when he tells them, he would not have them ignorant, his meaning is, he would have them know and remember, he would have them well acquainted with and to reflect upon this, that all the Jews in Moses's time, whom he calls their fathers, not according to the flesh, for the Corinthians were not descended from Jews, but with respect to the covenant, and their relation they stood unto God, as they were the only people God had on earth; these, he saith, were all of them (the whole camp of Israel) under very great privileges, of which he reckoneth divers: they were under the conduct of the cloud, Exod. xiii. 21; and they all obtained the favour of God so far for them, as to divide the Red Sea, so as they passed through it upon dry ground.

2 And were all baptized unto Moses in the cloud and in the sea;

There are two great difficulties in this verse: 1. What is meant by Moses. 2. How and why the Israelites are said to be baptized unto Moses. Some understand by Moses the person of Moses; others, the law or doctrine of Moses. Those who by Moses understand the person of Moses, are divided in their opinions, whether the preposition eis, which signifieth divers things, were better translated by, or into, or unto, or together with. Some think it were better translated by, and thus all the Jews were baptized by Moses in the cloud and in the sea, that is, by his ministry; and thus this very participle is translated, Acts vii. 53; xix. 3. Some think it were better translated into Moses; that is, Moses going before them, when they were under the conduct of the cloud, and when they passed through the Red Sea. Others judge it better translated unto Moses; that is, either Moses going before them; or, as Moses was a type of Christ, Gal. iii. 19. Some would have the participle here to signify together with. Others, even unto Moses. Moses himself not being excepted from that baptism in the cloud and in the sea. Others by Moses here understand the doctrine and law of Moses: thus the term Moses is used, Luke xvi. 29; Acts xv. 21. So they say, that to be baptized unto Moses, is to believe Moses so far, as to follow his conduct through the sea, and under the cloud. The second difficulty is, to resolve what is meant by being baptized. The word signifieth, in the common acceptance of it, a being washed: in the ecclesiastical acceptance, it signifies a holy institution of the New Testament, according to which Christians are initiated into the church of God, by washing them in the name of the Father, Son, and Holy Ghost. Now how could the Jews be said either to be washed (that is, baptized) either in Moses, or by Moses, or with Moses, or into Moses; whereas the history of the Old Testament tells us, that both Moses and all the Israelites went through the sea on dry ground, and we do not read that the cloud, under the conduct of which the Israelites journeyed, ever poured down any water with which the Jews, or Moses their leader, could be washed. Ans. Some think, that the cloud which, passing over the Israelites, was all darkness to their enemies, yet poured down water for the refreshing of the Israelites, as it passed over their heads, and that this is hinted to us by the psalmist, Psal. lxxvii. 7-9. Others think, that the apostle applyeth the term of baptism to a privilege of which the old Israelites had as much reason to glory, as the Corinthians had of their baptism, properly so called. Others say, that the Israelites' walking under the cloud and through the sea, which was darkness and destruction to their adversaries, was a figure of baptism, the seal of the New Testament, by which Christ's victory over our spiritual enemies is confirmed to us, and in that respect the apostle maketh use of this term baptized. Others, most probably, think, that the apostle useth this term, in regard of the great analogy betwixt baptism, as it was then used, the persons going down into the waters, and being dipped in them; and the Israelites going down into the sea, the great receptacle of water; though the waters at that time were gathered on heaps on either side of them, yet they seemed buried in the waters, as persons in that age were when they were baptized; and for being baptized in the cloud, there is a great probability that the cloud did shower down rain, according to what is quoted out of the psalmist.

3 And did all eat the same <sup>c</sup>spiritual meat;

Those of the Jews that perished in the wilderness, did all eat the same manna which Caleb and Joshua ate of, who went into Canaan; or, those Jews that so perished in the wilderness did eat the same spiritual meat that we do, they in the type, we in the antitype. Manna is called spiritual meat: 1. Because it was bread which came down from heaven, the habitation of spiritual beings, John vi. 31. 2. It was miraculously produced. 3. Because it was angels' food, given out by their ministry. 4. But principally, because it signified Christ, who was the true bread from heaven, John vi. 32.

4 And did all drink the same <sup>d</sup>spiritual drink: for they drank of that spiritual Rock that followed them: and that Rock was Christ.

And all the Jews, as well those that perished in the wilderness, as those that were preserved to go into Canaan, they drank of the water which came out of the rock, of which we read, Exod. xvii. 6; Numb. xx. 11; which water was spiritual drink in the same respects that the manna was spiritual meat, being miraculously produced, and being a figure of Christ. For, saith the apostle, that rock was Christ; that is, that rock did signify or prefigure Christ; the rock was Christ in the same sense that the bread in the Lord's supper is the body of Christ, that is, a sign which by Divine institution did signify Christ. Here ariseth a question in what sense it is said, that the rock followed them? That by the rock is to be understood the water that God made to flow out of the rock, is evident; but though we read of water twice fetched out of the rock upon Moses smiting of it; once at Rephidim, before they came so far as Mount Sinai, Exod. xvii. 6; another time at Kadesh, Numb. xx. 7, 8; yet we no where read in the history of the Jewish journeyings to Canaan, that the rock followed them. But this is not the only thing that we read in the New Testament relating to the history of the Old Testament, with some circumstances which we do not find recorded there; it is enough that it is plainly asserted here, and it must be presumed, or how can we imagine that the Israelites were supplied with water for forty years together? Whereas some object, that if the water, which came out of the rock at Rephidim, had followed them, there would have been no need of Moses striking the rock at Kadesh; it is answered, that God, to try them, probably caused the water to stop. For the analogy betwixt the rock and Christ, divines make it to lie in these particulars: 1. That Christ is the firm and unmovable foundation of his church, called therefore a stone, a tried stone, Isa. xxviii. 16; Rom. ix. 33; 1 Pet. ii. 6. 2. As this rock sent out no water for the refreshment of the Israelites, till Moses had struck it; so all the benefit we have from Christ as Mediator, floweth from him as smitten of God, and afflicted. 3. As the water of the rock served both for cleansing, and upholding life in satisfying thirst; so the blood of Christ is useful to the soul, both for washing from the guilt of sin, and the upholding spiritual life in a soul. 4. As the rock that followed the Israelites afforded water not only to that generation that were alive and present when the rock was smitten, but to all the succeeding generations, until the Israelites came into Canaan; so the blood of Christ is useful not only to his people in this or that place or age, but to all that shall believe in him, and that till they shall come into the heavenly Canaan.

For they were overthrown in the wilderness; as an instance of God's being displeased with them, he giveth their falling in the wilderness. It is very possible, that many of these were the objects of God's eternal and special love, and eternally saved, notwithstanding their joining with worse men in their rebellion and murmuring; but that signal judgment of God upon them was enough to prove, that their being baptized unto Moses in the cloud and in the sea, and being made partakers of those great privileges of eating spiritual meat, and drinking spiritual drink, typifying Christ, did not set them out of the danger of God's judgments, which is the use the apostle maketh of it.*

Numb. xxv. 2; so, either worshipped the creature instead of the Creator, or worshipped the Creator in and by the creature. As it is written, The people sat down to eat and drink, and rose up to play; thus it is written in Exod. xxxii. 6; which history mentioneth another idolatry they were guilty of, in worshipping the golden calf. They were wont to have feasts after their sacrifices, and pastimes and diversions after such feasts; and particularly we are told in the history concerning the golden calf, that they danced before it. Stephen saith, Acts vii. 41, they rejoiced in the works of their own hands.*

8 Neither let us commit fornication, as some of them committed, and fell in one day three and twenty thousand.

The story to which this verse relates is that, Numb. xxv. 1—9. When Balaam could not curse the Israelites, he advised the debauching of them by the Moabitish women, first enticing them to fornication and adultery, then to idolatry: and they were enticed, which caused a plague amongst them, which destroyed amongst them in one day three and twenty thousand, saith our apostle: Moses saith, that there died twenty and four thousand. There are many guesses for the clearing of that seeming contradiction. Some say, that Moses mentioneth not one day, there might in all die twenty-four thousand, but not all the same day, nor possibly by the same death. But nothing is in Scripture more ordinary, than to speak of things or persons in round numbers, though something over or under; and also to speak according to the common reckoning of people, who also may talk variously. Some might report twenty-three, some twenty-four thousand: or possibly Paul chose to mention the lesser rather than the greater round number. The sense of Moses might be, about twenty-four thousand, or near up to that number, all of which probably had not been guilty of adultery or fornication. Paul saith, there died twenty-three thousand. If there did die twenty-four thousand, there must needs die twenty-three thousand.

9 Neither let us tempt Christ, as some of them also tempted, and were destroyed of serpents.

To tempt, in the general notion of the term, signifies to make a trial; applied unto God, it signifieth to make a trial of God, either with reference to his power, Psal. lxxviii. 18—20, or to his truth and goodness: not to be satisfied with God's word, but to challenge him to a sensible demonstration, is to tempt God. Or else to tempt may signify more generally, to provoke God; for indeed all notorious sinning against God is a tempting of God, not believing the wrath of God, which he hath revealed in his word against sin, till men feel it. The term Christ here is very remarkable to prove Christ's Divine nature and existence before he was incarnate; for the same person who is here called Christ, is called God, Psal. cvi. 14, and Jehovah also in the same Psalm; neither could they have tempted Christ at that time, if at that time he had not been existent. Were destroyed of serpents; by serpents he meaneth the fiery serpents; we have the history, Numb. xxi. 6—9.

10 Neither murmur ye, as some of them also murmured, and were destroyed of the destroyer.

Murmuring signifies the speaking against a person or thing, out of dislike, impatience, or discontent. It was a sin the Jews were very much guilty of, as may be read, Exod. xv. 24; xvi. 7, 8; xvii. 3; Numb. xiv. 27; xvi. 11, 41. The apostle may either refer to all their murmurings, when he saith they were (as the punishment of their sin) destroyed of the destroyer, or to that more universal murmuring upon the ill report the spies brought up of the land of Canaan, of which we read, Numb. xiv.

11 Now all these things happened unto them for ensamples: and they are written for our admonition, upon whom the ends of the world are come.

Now all these things happened to them for ensamples; all these dispensations of Divine providence in the revelations of Divine wrath against several sorts of sinners, happened to the Jews, who were God's first and ancient people, and enjoyed those great privileges which were before mentioned, not only as just punishments upon them for their sins, but as examples or types, to let the succeeding world know what they should find God towards such kind of sinners. And they are written for our admonition; and God in his wise providence hath ordered the record of them in holy writ, that others who should live afterward might read, and hear, and fear, and take warning, and beware of such wicked actions, as pulled down such vengeance upon a people, than which none can plead a nearer relation to God, or the receiving of greater favours and privileges from him. Upon whom the ends of the world are come: the apostles ordinarily in their epistles speak of the world as nigh to an end in their age, though it hath since continued more than sixteen hundred years; which would incline one to think, that they thought it would have been at an end before this time, but had no such revelation from God. So true is that of our Saviour, that of that day and hour knoweth no man; and it should teach us to beware of too particular determinations in the case, which the apostles did not make, though they spake of theirs as the last times, and themselves as such upon whom the ends of the world were come.

12 Wherefore let him that thinketh he standeth take heed lest he fall.

Let him that thinketh he standeth, either in a right and sound judgment and opinion of things, or in a state of favour with God, or confirmed in a holy course of life and conversation; standeth in grace, Rom. v. 2. A man may stand in these things, and he may but think that he standeth: be it as it will, he is concerned to take heed lest he fall. He may but think he standeth, and if so, he will fall: he may really stand in a right judgment and opinion of things, and be a member of the church of Christ, and yet may fall into errors and some loose practices, so as to bring down Divine vengeance upon himself; he may have God's favour so far as concerns external privileges, and yet perish, as many of the Jews did in the instances before mentioned: nay, he may really stand in a state of justification and regeneration, and yet may fall, though not totally and finally, yet foully, so as to lose his peace, and bring God's severe judgments upon him. Therefore he that thinketh that he standeth, whether his apprehensions be false or true, had need use all means and caution that he may not fall, and that because, if he keepeth his standing, it must be by the use of due means, which God hath appointed in order to that end, though he be also kept by the power of God unto salvation, 1 Pet. i. 5.

13 There hath no temptation taken you but || such as is common to man: but God is faithful, who will not suffer you to be tempted above that ye are able; but will with the temptation also make a way to escape, that ye may be able to bear it.

There hath no temptation taken you: temptation (as hath been said before) signifieth in the general notion of it no more than trials, and is often so used in holy writ. Now, in regard we are tried either by afflictive providences, or by motions made to us, either from God, or our own lusts, or the devil, or men of the world; temptations, in Scripture, sometimes signify afflictions, as James i. 2; 1 Pet. i. 6; sometimes, motions made to us by God, Gen. xxii. 1, 2; both which sorts of temptations are good in themselves. Sometimes the term signifies motions made by the lusts and unrenewed part of our own souls, or by the devil, or by sinful men in the world; these are sinful temptations, and what we most ordinarily call by that name. Whether the apostle here means all or some of these, cannot certainly be determined; what he saith is true of all, and therefore that is the safest interpretation of the term in this place. Though he had not been before speaking indeed of afflictive temptations, he had before affrighted them with minding them of the possibility of their falling, though they did stand, or thought they stood, and cautioned them to take heed: here he comforteth them, by minding them, that no temptation had befallen them, but what was incident and common to man, ἀνθρώπων, and they could not expect to be freed from the common fate of mankind: then he minds them, that that God who had promised strength and assistance to his people, Matt. vii. 11; Luke xi. 13; 2 Cor. i. 18; 1 Thess. v. 4; 2 Thess. iii. 3, was one that would be as good as his word, being faithful, and would not suffer them to be tempted above their strength, and ability to oppose and resist; yea, and would make a way to escape, both the evil of the temptation, that it should not overbear them to a total ruin of their souls, and likewise the burdensome and afflictive evil, that it should not continually lie upon them, provided they used their just endeavours, and (as he had said before) took heed lest they fell.

14 Wherefore, my dearly beloved, flee from idolatry.

The apostle would have them avoid all sin, but idolatry more especially, keeping at the utmost distance imaginable from that, being of all sins in its kind the greatest transgression; upon which account it is often in Scripture compared to whoredom. Though we ought to be afraid of and to decline all sin; yet as God hath revealed his wrath against any particular sin more than other, so every good Christian is obliged more to detest and abhor that sin. How the Corinthians were concerned in this caution, we shall read afterwards, ver. 20. For though idolatry be properly where the failure is in the ultimate or mediate object of our worship, and the creature is made either the ultimate term of our worship, or the medium in and by which we worship the Creator; yet there are many other ways by which we may be partakers of the sins of others, and this sin of idolatry in particular: and idolatry being a sin of the greatest magnitude, from which they were bound to keep the furthest distance, they were bound to take heed of being partakers of other men's sins of this kind.

15 I speak as to wise men; judge ye what I say.

As to the present case, you are persons that understand the principles of Christian religion, I will make you judges in this case.

16 The cup of blessing which we bless, is it not the communion of the blood of Christ? The bread which we break, is it not the communion of the body of Christ?

It is on all hands agreed, that the apostle is here speaking of believers communicating in the sacrament of the Lord's supper. By the cup of blessing, he meaneth the cup there, which he so calleth, because we in the taking of it bless the Lord, who gave his Son to die for us, and Christ, for that great love which he showed in dying for us: we are said to bless it, because we, by solemn prayer in the consecration of it, set it apart for that sacred use, and beg of God to bless it to us. This cup (saith the apostle) is the communion of the blood of Christ. The cup is put for the wine in the cup (which is very ordinary). The cup, or wine, of blessing, signifieth that cup of wine to which the blessing is added, or with which in that holy institution we thankfully remember the death of Christ, and bless his name for that great mercy; and the wine or cup of blessing, also, here signifieth our religious action in drinking of that cup of wine so blessed. This, saith he, is the communion of the blood of Christ; that is, it is an action whereby and wherein Christ communicates himself and his grace to us, and we communicate our souls to him; so that Christ and believers in that action have a mutual communion one with another. And as it is with the one element in that holy sacrament, so it is also with the other. The bread which the minister breaketh (according to the institution and example of Christ) for the church to make use of in the celebration of the Lord's supper, that is, their action in eating of that bread so broken and divided amongst them, is the communion of the body of Christ; an action wherein Christians have a fellowship and communion with Christ.

17 For we being many are one bread, and one body: for we are all partakers of that one bread.

Believers, though many, yet are one body, and declare themselves to be one body mystical, by their fellowship together in the ordinance of the Lord's supper; as the bread they there eat is one bread, though it be made up of many grains of corn, which come into the composition of that loaf or piece of bread which is so broken, distributed, and eaten; and the wine they drink is one cup, one body of wine, though it be made up of many particular grapes. And they declare themselves to be one body, by their joint partaking of that one bread. Some have from hence fetched an argument to prove the unlawfulness of communicating with scandalous sinners at the Lord's table, because we declare ourselves one body with those that communicate: but whether it will (if examined) be cogent enough, I doubt; for one body signifieth no more than one church, and that not invisible, but visible. So as we only declare ourselves to be fellow members of the visible church with those with whom we partake in that ordinance, and the visible church may consist of persons that are bad mixed with the good. So as though, undoubtedly, scandalously wicked persons ought to be excluded from the holy table, yea, and no unbeliever hath a right to it; yet it may reasonably be doubted, whether those that partake with unbelievers, do by it own themselves to be unbelievers; they only own themselves members of that church wherein there are some unbelievers. But the scope of the apostle is from hence to argue, that by a parity of reason, those that communicated with an idolatrous assembly in their sacrifices, declared themselves by that action to be one body with those idolaters.

Israel after the flesh was the whole seed of Jacob, the whole body of the Jewish church; for believers only were Israelites after the Spirit, Rom. ix. 6, called the Israel of God, Gal. vi. 16. Are not they which eat of the sacrifices partakers of the altar? if in the Jewish church any persons ate of the flesh of sacrifices offered upon God's altar, did they not by that act manifest that they were members of the Jewish church, and owned that God to whom those sacrifices were offered, and that way of worship by which God was so worshipped? By the same reason these Corinthians eating of the flesh of those beasts in the idol's temple, which had been offered unto idols, did by that act declare their owning of the idol, and that idolatrous worship which had been there performed, and were really partakers of the idolatrous altar.

g ch. 8. 4. 19 What say I then? * that the idol is any thing, or that which is offered in sacrifice to idols is any thing?

I do not by this contradict what I before said, nor now affirm that an idol is any thing, or the sacrifices offered to it any thing. An idol hath nothing in it of a Deity, nor can it either sanctify or pollute any thing that is set before it; the error is in your action, as you communicate with such as are idolaters; it is your own action that polluteth you, not the idol, nor yet the meat set before it.

20 But I say, that the things which the Gentiles <sup>h</sup> sacrifice, they sacrifice to devils, and not to God: and I would not that ye should have fellowship with devils.

The heathens might not intentionally offer sacrifices to devils, (such a thing can hardly be supposed of men,) but actually they offered sacrifices to devils: for they were devils, that is, evil angels, which deluded the poor heathen, and gave answers from the images and statues which they worshipped, believing the true God to be in them: which answers they accounted for oracles. Besides, the apostle saith, they sacrificed to devils, because in God's esteem it was so, though not in their intention; God judgeth of men's acts of worship and homage pretendedly done unto him, not according to their intention, but according to the truth and reality of the thing: now, really the heathen in their sacrifices paid a homage to devils, though such a thing was far from their intention; and this deserves the consideration, both of the papists, who worship images, and also of those protestants (if any such be) who would excuse the papists in their idolatries from their intentions. The nature of idolatry doth not lie in men's intending to worship the creature instead of the Creator, (there were hardly every any such idolaters in the world,) but in their actual doing of the thing; and except they can find a direct rule in holy writ ordering the adoration of the Creator in the creature, or before the creature, it is much to be feared, that in the last day God will judge their homage performed to the creature, not to him. Now, saith the apostle, you had need take heed that, by this action, you prove not yourselves to have fellowship with devils, instead of Christ and the true and living God.

i 2 Cor. 6. 15. 16. 21 Ye cannot drink the cup of the Lord, and <sup>k</sup> the cup of devils: ye cannot be partakers of the Lord's table, and of the table of devils.

The cup of the Lord: we may either take the phrase as signifying all religious communion under one great act of religion, or as particularly signifying having a communion with Christ in the ordinance of the Lord's supper, which is called the cup of the Lord, either because God hath instituted and appointed the drinking of it, or because it is done for the honour, glory, and remembrance of our Lord Christ, to remember his death until he come, as the apostle speaketh, chap. xi. 26. This the apostle tells them they could not drink of, that is, not rightly, and with a good conscience; or not really; no man that is an idolater, or hath communion with idolaters in their idolatrous acts, can have communion with Christ. The same is meant by the Lord's table, and the table of devils. So as I cannot see how either an idolatrous church can be a true church, or an idolater a true Christian, unless we will assert, that a body of people may be a true church, that can have no communion with Christ; or a man may be a true Christian, and yet have no communion with Christ. Idolatry, doubtless, both divides the soul from Christ, as he is the Head of a believer, and as he is the Head of the church. To call any body of idolaters a true church, either morally, or metaphysically, is to say to those, Ammi, You are the Lord's people, to whom God hath said, Lo-ammi. Let them be what they will, the name of a church belongeth not to them, if (as the apostle affirmeth) they can have no communion with Christ.

22 Do we <sup>l</sup> provoke the Lord to jealousy? <sup>m</sup> are we stronger than he?

Jealousy is a violent passion in a man, not bearing a companion or a rival as to a thing or person which he loveth. It is in holy writ applied unto God, not to signify any such extravagancy, excess, or vehemence, as attendeth that passion in men, but only his just displeasure at the giving that homage to any creature which is due to him alone. It is most applied to God to express his anger against those who give Divine homage to idols; the worship of God being a great piece of his glory which he hath said he will not give to another, nor his praise to graven images, Isa. xlii. 8. Hence divines observe, that jealousy is attributed to God in the second commandment, which concerns the more external worship of God, to deter men from the violation of it, Exod. xx. 5. So Exod. xxxiv. 14; Deut. iv. 24; v. 9; vi. 16, and in many other texts, it signifieth, that the worship of God is a thing that is very tender of, and that his will is to endure no creature to share with him in it, and that his wrath shall flame against that man that offers to make any creature such a sharer. So that it is not safe for any to do any thing of that nature, unless he could fancy himself to be stronger than God; for he that doth it, must expect the power and strength of God to be engaged against him. Thus the apostle had dissuaded them from eating meat sacrificed to idols in the idol's temple, from the impiety of it, it being a species of idolatry, against which God hath signally revealed his wrath. He returns in the following verses to an argument, by which he had before dissuaded it, chap. viii., as it was against charity, and the duty of love, in which they were indebted to their brethren.

23 <sup>n</sup> All things are lawful for me, but <sup>o</sup> all things are not expedient: all things are lawful for me, but all things edify not.

All things here must necessarily signify many things, or, at least, (as some think,) all those things I have spoken of, to eat meat offered to idols, &c. But if we interpret it in the latter sense, it is not true without limitations; for the apostle had but now determined, that to eat meat offered to idols in the idol's temple, was to have communion with devils. I had rather therefore interpret all by many, as that universal particle must be interpreted in a great multitude of scriptures. So as the sense is, There are many things that are lawful which are not expedient; that is, considered in themselves, under due circumstances, they are lawful, but considered in such and such circumstances, are not so, because they are not for the profit or good, but the hurt and disadvantage, of others. Thus the apostle himself expounds it in the latter clause of the verse, where he saith, they edify not, that is, they tend not to promote the gospel, or the faith and holiness of particular Christians.

It is the duty of every one who is a disciple of Christ, not merely to look at his own pleasure or profit, but the profit and advantage of others. Charity seeketh not her own, (saith the apostle, chap. xiii. 5.) that is, it seeketh not its own with the prejudice of another. So as admit that in this practice there were nothing looked like idolatry and impiety towards God, yet charity or love to your brethren ought to deter you.

25 <sup>r</sup> Whatsoever is sold in the shambles, <sup>s</sup> that eat, asking no question for conscience sake:

It is possible that butchers, before they brought their meat into the market, might offer some part of it to the idol; or it is possible that the priests, who had a share in the beasts offered to idols, or the people that had offered such beasts, who also had a share returned them, might out of covetousness come and bring it to be sold in the market. The apostle directeth the Corinthians in such cases to make no scruple, but eat of it, if it were commonly sold in the shambles; which argued, that the thing in itself, considered nakedly, was not sinful. But yet he would have them in that case ask no questions, whence it came? or whether it had not been offered to an idol? for the sake of other men's consciences, lest some others standing by should take notice that they bought and ate such meat. Or their own consciences, lest, though the thing in itself, so separated from a sacred use, and returned to its common use, might be lawfully eaten, yet their consciences should afterwards reflect upon them for the doing of it.

26 For <sup>g</sup>the earth is the Lord's, and the fulness thereof.

This sentence is taken out of Psal. xxiv. 1. The earth is God's, or the Lord Christ's, who hath sanctified all things for the use of man, and all the variety of creatures that are in it are sanctified by him. An idol cannot pollute any kind of meat, it hath no such malign influence upon any thing; you may pollute yourselves by your action, eating it in the idol's temple, at an idolater's feast immediately upon his sacrifice, but the idol itself is no operative thing, nor can cause an ill quality in the meat; let the meat be once returned to its common use, (the idolater's sacred mysteries being over,) it is the Lord's, what he hath appointed for the use of man. In the idol's temple they took the meat out of the devil's hand, that was indeed unlawful; but if it were once returned to its common use, and sold in the market, they took it out of the hand of God's common providence, and every creature of God is good, and nothing to be refused, if it be received with thanksgiving, 1 Tim. iv. 4.

27 If any of them that believe not bid you to a feast, and ye be disposed to go; whatsoever is set before you, eat, asking no question for conscience sake.

The apostle puts another case, in which they might lawfully enough eat of meat offered to an idol; that was in case any of their neighbours, that were heathens, invited them to dinner or supper in a private house (some add, or in the idol's temple, if it were a feast of friendship, not a feast upon a sacrifice; but I doubt that, and also whether in the idol-temples there were any feasts but upon sacrifices): he determineth it lawful for them to go and eat whatsoever was set before them; but in this case he would also have them ask no questions for conscience sake.

28 But if any man say unto you, This is offered in sacrifice unto idols, eat not for his sake that shewed it, and for conscience sake: for <sup>t</sup>the earth is the Lord's, and the fulness thereof:

The meat being out of the idol's temple, and returned to a common use, there could be no impiety in eating it, no communion with devils, and partaking of the table of devils, in and by such an action; but yet there might be a breach of charity in the action, that is, in case one were there present, who knew that it had been so offered to the idol, and declared his offence, by telling the Christian that was about to eat, that that meat had been so offered: in that case the apostle commandeth Christians not to eat, and that partly for his sake that showed it, lest they should lay a stumbling-block before him, and by their example imbolden him that showed it to do the like, though he doubted the lawfulness of it; and likewise for conscience sake, that is, for their own conscience sake, which through weakness might afterwards trouble them for it, though without just cause. He gives them as a reason for it, because the earth is the Lord's, and the fulness thereof, that is, because there was other meat enough to eat. This passage, taken out of the psalmist, had a something different application, ver. 26; there the apostle used it to justify the lawfulness of their eating such meat, returned again to a common use, and exposed to sale in the shambles; here he useth it to dissuade them from eating, if any let them know it had been offered to the idol.

29 Conscience, I say, not thine own, but of the other: for <sup>u</sup>why is my liberty judged of another man's conscience?

By reason of what we had, ver. 28, (where the apostle forbade eating these meats, in case any at the feast told them they had been offered to idols, both for his sake that told him so, and also for conscience sake,) it is most reasonable to interpret those words not thine own in this verse, not thine own only, there being frequent instances in Scripture where the negative particle must be so restrained, as John iv. 42; chap. vi. 27, 38. For why is my liberty judged of another man's conscience? for why should my practice in a thing wherein I have a liberty, be censured or condemned by the conscience of another, he being persuaded that what I do, and judge that I have a liberty to do, and may do lawfully, is done by me sinfully, and I by him accounted a transgressor for it; so as though I do a thing that is honest, yet it is not honest in the sight of all men, or of good report; whereas Christians are obliged, Rom. xii. 17, to provide things honest in the sight of all men, not in their own sight merely, and to do those things that are lovely and of good report, Phil. iii. 8.

30 For if I by <sup>g</sup>grace be a partaker, why am I evil spoken of for that <sup>g</sup>for which I give thanks?

If I by grace be a partaker; if I by the goodness of God, whose the earth is, and the fulness thereof; or by the grace of knowledge, by which God hath given me to understand that I may do that, as to which others less knowing stumble; can eat such meat (out of the idol's temple) as part of it hath been offered to the idol, or with thanksgiving partake of such meat, (for so  $\chi\alpha\rho\iota\varsigma$  signifies, Luke vi. 32; chap. xvii. 9,) why am I blasphemed, or evil spoken of, for that for which I can give God thanks? That is, I ought not to cause another to speak evil of me for using of meat, but rather than run that danger, to abstain from such meat which I could otherwise eat of, and give God thanks: for in so doing I should but abuse my liberty, and instead of giving God thanks, I should grievously offend God, not at all consulting his glory.

31 Whether therefore ye eat, or drink, or whatsoever ye do, do all to the glory of God.

The apostle, in these three last verses, layeth down three rules, to direct Christians how to use their liberty as to things that are of an indifferent nature, neither in themselves commanded nor forbidden in the word of God. His first rule is in this verse, to do whatsoever we do to the glory of God. This is a general rule, not to be restrained to the eating of meat offered to idols, of which the former discourse had been. It is a general rule, not applicable alone to eating and drinking, but to all other human actions. The reasonableness of this rule appeareth from our consideration, that the glory of God was the end of our creation; The Lord hath made all things for himself, Prov. xvi. 4: and indeed it is impossible it should be otherwise; for whereas every reasonable agent both propounds to himself some end of his actions, and the best end he can imagine, it is impossible but that God also, in creating man, should propound to himself some end, and there being no better end than his own glory, he could propound no other unto himself. The glory of God being the end which he propounded to himself in creating man, it must needs follow, that that must be the chief and greatest end which any man can propound to himself in his actions. God is then glorified by us, when by our means, or by occasion of us, he is well spoken of in the world, or by our obedience to his will: this our Saviour hath taught us, John xvii. 4, 6. No man in any of his actions hath a liberty from this rule; so as though a man, as to many things, hath a liberty to marry or not to marry, to eat meats or not to eat them, to wear this apparel or not to wear it; yet he is not even in such things as these so at liberty, but he ought to look about, and to consider circumstances, which will be most for the honour of God, the credit of the gospel, and reputation of religion. And the judgment of this is to be made from circumstances, the 32 Give none offence, neither to the Jews, nor to the † Gentiles, nor to * the Church of God :

We use to say, that men are offended when they are grieved or angered; but these offences are not here meant, (as appears by the Greek phrase, Ἀπόσκόποι γίνεσθε,) but give no occasion of sin or stumbling. This care he commands us, with reference to all men; for at that time all the world fell under one of these denominations, they were either Jews, or Gentiles, (that is, heathens,) or the church of God (that is, Christians). It was always a hard matter, if not a thing impossible, for Christians to carry themselves so as not to anger those that were no Christians; but it was not impossible for them so to behave themselves, as not to be to them any just occasion of sin. Much less ought conscientious Christians to give offence to Christians, that made up the church of God, and were with them members of the same mystical body, of which Christ is the Head.

33 Even as <sup>b</sup> I please all men in all things, <sup>c</sup> not seeking mine own profit, but the profit of many, that they may be saved.

Even as I please all men in all things; that is, in all things wherein the law of God hath left me a liberty; for Paul pleased no man, either in the omission of any thing which God had commanded him to do, or in the doing of any thing which God had forbidden him to do. Not seeking mine own profit, but the profit of many, that they may be saved; not seeking my own advantage, either the satisfaction of my own mind or humour, or my own gain, but the advantage of others, especially in matters that may any way affect them as to their eternal salvation. Thus Paul, like a good shepherd, goeth out before the sheep, and leadeth them, and, as every true minister should be, is himself an example to the flock of Christ. And this is a third rule to be observed by Christians, as to the use of the liberty which God's law hath left them as to any particular actions; notwithstanding that liberty, yet they ought to have respect to the spiritual good and salvation of others, and to do that part which their judgments inform them will be, as least to the spiritual damage and detriment, so most to the spiritual good and profit, of the souls of others with whom they converse.

CHAP. XI

Paul exhorteth the Corinthians to follow him, as he did Christ, 1. He praiseth them for observing the rules he had given them. 2; and forbiddeth men to pray or prophesy with heads covered, and women with heads uncovered; the covering of the head being a token of subjection, 3—16. He blameth them for abuses in their religious assemblies, particularly for their divisions, 17—19, and profanation of the Lord's supper, 20—22. He remindeth them of the first institution thereof, and showeth the danger of partaking of it unworthily, 23—34.

BE *ye followers of me, even as I also am of Christ.

Interpreters judge, that these words do properly belong to the foregoing chapter, in the last verse of which he had propounded his own example to them; but whether they be applied to that chapter or this, is not much material. They teach us, that the examples of the apostles are part of our rule; yet the modesty of the apostle is remarkable, who requires of his people no further to follow him than as he followed Christ; nor indeed ought any man to require more of those that are under his charge, than to follow him so far forth as he imitates the Lord Jesus Christ.

2 Now I praise you, brethren, <sup>b</sup> that ye remember me in all things, and <sup>c</sup> keep the † ordinances, as I delivered them to you.

That ye remember me in all things; that you remember my doctrine, the precepts and instructions that I gave you;

and keep the ordinances: so we translate it; the Greek word is παραδόσεις. The word signifieth any thing that is doctrinally delivered, or taught men, whether it concerns faith or manners. It is thought, that in this text it doth not signify what the apostle had delivered to them with respect to faith, or their moral conversation, but with respect to matters of order, because such is the next instance which the apostle mentioneth, about praying or prophesying with the head covered, or uncovered; and undoubtedly any precepts of that nature from one guided by an infallible Spirit ought to be observed. The apostle doth not command them to keep any traditions, which others should to the end of the world deliver to them, he only praiseth them for keeping those which he had delivered. There is a great question betwixt us and the papists, about the obligation that lieth upon Christians to observe unwritten traditions; that is, such rites and observances as they tell us were apostolical, and the traditions of the primitive church, though they can show us no Scripture for them; but no Christian disputes his obligation to keep apostolical traditions; only we are at a loss to know how to prove those traditions apostolical, of which we find nothing in the writings of the apostles: it is praiseworthy to keep apostolical traditions; but for others, or such as do not appear to us to be so, it is but a work of supererogation: where hath God required any such thing at people's hands?

3 But I would have you know, that <sup>d</sup> the head of every man is Christ; and <sup>e</sup> the head of the woman is the man; and <sup>f</sup> the head of Christ is God.

The abuse which the apostle is reflecting upon in this and the following verses, is women's praying or prophesying with their heads uncovered, against which the apostle strongly argueth. His argument seemeth to be this, That the woman in religious services ought to behave herself as a person in subjection to her husband, and accordingly to use such a gesture, as, according to the guise and custom of that country, testified such a subjection; to this purpose he tells us in this verse, that the head of every man is Christ. Christ, considered as God according to his Divine nature, is the Head of all men and women too in the world; but the text seemeth rather to speak of Christ as Mediator: so the apostle tells us, Eph. v. 23, he is the Head of the church; and the New Testament often speaks of Christ in that notion, and of believers as his members: in this sense, by every man, we must understand no more than every Christian, every member of the church. The head of the woman is the man; the man is called the head of the woman, because by God's ordinance he is to rule over her, Gen. iii. 16; he hath an excellency above the woman, and a power over her. The head of Christ is God; and God is the Head of Christ, not in respect of his essence and Divine nature, but in respect of his office as Mediator; as the man is the head of the woman, not in respect of a different and more excellent essence and nature, (for they are both of the same nature,) but in respect of office and place, as God hath set him over the woman. Nor indeed could those who deny the Divine nature of Christ, easily have brought a text more against their own assertion, than this, which rather proveth, that God the Father and the Lord Jesus Christ are equal in nature and essence, than different; for surely the head is not of a different, but the same nature and essence with the members. Nor doth Christ's subjection to his Father at all argue an inequality, or difference from him in nature and essence, more than the subjection of subjects to a prince argue any such thing. The apostle then determines this to be the order which God hath set: God is the Head of Christ; Christ is the Head of his church, and every one that is a member of it; and man is the head of the woman, he to whom the woman ought to be subject, as the church is subject to Christ, and Christ is subject to his Father; and from hence he argueth as followeth.

4 Every man praying or <sup>g</sup> prophesying, having his head covered, dishonoureth his head.

By every man praying or prophesying, some (amongst whom the learned Beza) understand not only he that mistereth in prayer, or in opening and applying the Scriptures, whether from a previous meditation and study of them, or from the extraordinary revelation of the Holy Spirit, which they had in those primitive times; but also all those that were present at those actions. The reason they give is, Because the reason given by the apostle for his assertion, is such as is common to the people, as well as to him that ministereth; and the woman was forbidden to speak in the church, 1 Tim. ii. 12. But our learned Bishop Hall assures us, he cannot agree with those of this mind. And indeed it is an unreasonable interpretation; for though those who join with others in prayer may be said to pray, yet those that hear one preaching or expounding Scripture, can in no propriety of speech be said to prophesy. Nor is any such usage of the term to be paralleled, neither are the reasons they bring cogent; for though the reason of the precept may concern the people as well as the minister, yet it doth not follow that the rule or precept must necessarily do so too. And although the woman be forbidden to teach in ordinary cases, yet it did not concern those who were immediately and extraordinarily inspired, according to the prophecy, Joel ii. 28, applied, Acts ii. 17. Having his head covered; i. e. with a hat or cap, or such covering of the head as is in use in the country wherein he liveth. It is not to be understood of the natural covering of the head, which is our hair; nor yet of any other covering which is necessary for the preservation of life and health; but such a covering as he might spare, and is ornamental to him according to the fashion of the country. Dishonoureth his head; either dishonoureth Christ who is his Head, and whom he ought to represent, and doth as it were make the church the head to Christ, which is subject to him, while by covering his head he declares a subjection in his ministration. Or he dishonoureth his own head, (so many interpret it,) to wit, he betrayeth his superiority, lesseneth himself as to that power and dignity which God hath clothed him with, by using a posture which is a token of inferiority and subjection. Interpreters rightly agree, that this and the following verses are to be interpreted from the customs of countries; and all that can be concluded from this verse is, that it is the duty of men employed in Divine ministrations, to look to behave themselves as those who are to represent the Lord Jesus Christ, behaving themselves with a just authority and gravity that becometh his ambassadors, which decent gravity is to be judged from the common opinion and account of the country wherein they live. So as all which this text requires of Christian ministers, is authority and gravity, and what are external indications of it. Our learned Dr. Lightfoot observeth, that the Jewish priests were wont in the worship of God to veil their heads; so that Christian ministers praying or prophesying with their heads covered, Judaized, which he judgeth the reason of the apostle's assertion. The heathens also, both Romans and Grecians, were wont to minister in their sacred things with their heads covered. Some think this was the reason why the Christians used the contrary gesture; but the apostle's arguing from the man's headship, seemeth to import that the reason of this assertion of the apostle was, because in Corinth the uncovered head was a sign of authority. At this day the Mahometans (or Turks) speak to their superiors covered, and so are covered also in their religious performances. The custom with us in these western parts is quite otherwise; the uncovering of the head is a sign or token of subjection: hence ministers pray and preach with their heads uncovered, to denote their subjection to God and Christ: but yet this custom is not uniform, for in France the Reformed ministers preach with their heads covered; as they pray uncovered, to express their reverence and subjection to God, so they preach covered, as representing Christ, the great Teacher, from whom they derive, and whom they represent. Nothing in this is a further rule to Christians, than that it is the duty of ministers, in praying and preaching, to use postures and habits that are not naturally, nor according to the custom of the place where they live, uncomely and irreverent, and so looked upon. It is only the general observation of decency (which cannot by any be created, but ariseth either from nature, or custom, and prescription) which this text of the apostle maketh to be the duty of all Christians; though as to the Corinthians, he particularly required the man's ministering in sacred things with his head uncovered, either to avoid the habit or posture used by Jews and pagans; or for the showing of his dignity and superiority over the woman, (whom we shall by and by find commanded to pray or prophesy covered,) or that he represented Christ who was the Head of the church. The uncovering of the head being with them as much a sign of subjection, as it is with us of superiority and pre-eminence.

5 But <sup>h</sup> every woman that prayeth or <sup>b</sup> Acta 21. 9. prophesieth with her head uncovered dishonoureth her head: for that is even all one as if she were <sup>i</sup> shaven. 1 Deut. 21. 12.

But every woman that prayeth or prophesieth: though the woman be forbidden to teach, and commanded to be in silence, 1 Tim. ii. 12; yet that text must be understood of ordinary women, and in ordinary cases, not concerning such as prophesied from an extraordinary impulse or motion of the Spirit. We read of women prophetesses both in the Old and New Testament; such was Huldah in Josiah's time, and Anna, of whom we read Luke ii. 36; and we read that Philip had four daughters that did prophesy, Acts xxi. 9. With her head uncovered: the uncovered head here (as before) must signify not covered with some artificial covering, such as our quiffs, hats, hoods, or veils, &c., or with her own hair, not hanging loose, but artificially used so as to be a covering. Dishonoureth her head; dishonoureth either her husband, who is her political or economical head, for by that habit she behaveth herself as if she were not one in subjection, and seemeth to usurp an undue authority over the man; or her natural head, it being in those places accounted an immodest thing for a woman to appear in public uncovered. It is observed of Rebekah, when she met Isaac, Gen. xxiv. 65, She took a veil, and covered herself. For that is even all one as if she were shaven; for, saith the apostle, yourselves would judge it an uncomely thing for a woman to be shaven; now to pray or to prophesy with the head uncovered, is all one. This last clause will incline us to think, that by the uncovered head in this verse, is not only to be understood uncovered with some other covering besides her hair, but with her hair dishevelled, hanging loose at its length, for else it is not all one to have the head uncovered with a hat, or hood, or quiff, and to be shaven; for the apostle afterward saith, ver. 15, her hair is given to her for a covering or a veil: so that possibly that which the apostle here reflecteth upon, is women's coming into the public assemblies with their hair hanging loosely down, and not decently wound up so as to make a covering for the head; which, we are told, was the practice of those beastly she-priests of Bacchus, who, like frantic persons, performed those pretendedly religious rites with their hair so hanging loose, and were called manades, because they behaved themselves more like mad persons than such as were in the actual use of their reason: something like which, it is most probable, some women in the Christian church at Corinth affected, against which the apostle here argueth.

6 For if the woman be not covered, let her also be shorn: but if it be <sup>h</sup> a <sup>k</sup> Num. 6. 18. Deut. 22. 5. shame for a woman to be shorn or shaven, let her be covered.

For if the woman be not covered, let her also be shorn: nature itself teacheth, that it is a shameful sight to see a woman revealing the mind and will of God, by an extraordinary pretended revelation, in so indecent a manner, as with her hair all hanging down; let her hair be either shaven off, or at least cut after the manner of men's hair, if she will neither tie it up artificially, so as to make it a covering for her head, nor put on a veil to cover her: for though a woman prophesying from an extraordinary impulse, be not under the common law of women not speaking in the public assembly, but keeping silence; yet she is under the law of nature to do no such grave and solemn actions in such a rude manner, that from the light of nature, or the common account of all that live in that place, she should be judged to be irreverent and brutish in her religious action. From this text a question hath been started, Whether Christian women may lawfully go without any other covering upon their heads than their hair? I must confess, I see not how such a question can have any bottom in this text, where the apostle is not speaking of women's ordinary habiting themselves, but only when they prayed and prophesied, and (if I mistake not) when they ministered in prayer and prophecy (as was said before). We now have no such prophetesses; so as I think that question about the lawfulness of women's going without any other covering upon their heads than their hair, must be determined from other texts, not this, and is best determined from circumstances; for God having given to the woman her hair for a covering and an ornament, I cannot see how it should be simply unlawful; accidentally it may, from the circumstances of pride in her heart that so dresseth herself, or lust and wantonness in others' hearts; or other circumstances of ill designs and intentions in the woman so dressing herself. But if it be a shame for a woman to be shorn or shaven, let her be covered; if nature teacheth us that it is a shame for a woman to be shorn or shaven, it also teacheth us that it is a shame for her to be uncovered, either with her hair, or some artificial covering; which latter seemeth rather to be meant in this place, because divines think, that the face is that part of the head which the apostle here intendeth should be covered in their religious actions, which is not covered with the hair, but with a veil, &c.

7 For a man indeed ought not to cover his head, forasmuch as he is the image and glory of God: but the woman is the glory of the man.

1 Gen. 1. 26.
& 9. 6.

For a man indeed ought not to cover his head; covering the head being in those countries a token of subjection, a man ought to uphold the power, pre-eminence, and authority with which God hath invested him, and not to cover his head, further than it is naturally covered with hair. Forasmuch as he is the image and glory of God; because he hath a peculiar cause of glorying in God, as he to whom alone he is subject, and therefore ought by no habits or postures to show himself in subjection to others: or because God glorieth in him, as a most excellent piece of his workmanship: God is represented in man. Paul useth to call that one's glory wherein he glorieth, 2 Cor. i. 12, 14; 1 Thess. ii. 20. So David calleth God his glory; and Solomon tells us, Prov. xvii. 6, that the glory of children are their fathers. So as the apostle here useth a double argument for the man's not covering of his head: 1. Because the man is immediately subject to God, and therefore ought not by any habits, or civil rites, to show his natural subjection to men, that are not by nature his superiors (for we must not think, that the apostle by this argument forbiddeth subjection to natural, economical, or political superiors). 2. Because God glorieth in man. But the woman is the glory of the man, created for the honour of the man, and for his help and assistance, and originally made out of man, so as man may glory of her, as Adam did of Eve, Gen. ii. 23, This is now bone of my bone, and flesh of my flesh. The glory of God ought to be revealed and uncovered, manifested to all: the glory of the man ought to be hidden and concealed.

8 For the man is not of the woman; but the woman of the man.

Here the apostle openeth or proveth what he had before said of the woman's being the glory of the man; the woman was made of the man; the man was not made of a rib taken out of the woman, but the woman was made of a rib taken out of the man; we have the history, Gen. ii. 21, 22; and from hence the apostle argueth her subjection to the man.

9 Neither was the man created for the woman; but the woman for the man.

We have this expounded, Gen. ii. 18, where God said, It is not good that man should be alone; I will make him an help meet for him. God did not first create the woman, and then make man a meet help for her; but he first made the man, and then the woman, that she might be a meet help for him. Now it is a rule in reason, That whatsoever or whatsoever is made for another person or thing, is less excellent than that person or thing for which the other is made. For the man, signifies to serve and help the man.

10 For this cause ought the woman to have power on her head because of the angels.

p That is, a covering, in sign that she is under the power of her husband. q Eccles. 5. 6.

By power on her head is here to be understood (as some think) a covering on her head, in sign that she is under the power of her husband: the thing signified is here put for the sign, as the sign is often put for the thing signified. Thus the ark, which is called, the ark of God's strength, Psal. cxxxii. 8, is itself called his strength, 1 Chron. xvi. 11. But others here by head do not understand the woman's natural head, but her husband, or the man, who is the political head of the woman; and by having power on him, understand her exercising of her power in him, testifying it by covering her head; and think this text well expounded by 1 Tim. ii. 12, where the apostle forbiddeth the woman to usurp authority over the man. He addeth another reason, because of the angels. By angels here some understand God himself, who by the ministry of angels created man and woman in this order, and put this law upon the woman. Others understand those messengers which the man sent sometimes, by whom the woman was betrothed (but this was a custom only in use amongst the Jews). Others here by angels understand the ministers and officers of the church, who are sometimes in holy writ called angels. Others understand the evil angels, who watch to take advantage to tempt men from objects appearing beautiful to unchaste thoughts, &c. But the most and best interpreters understand here by angels, the good angels; for the apostle would hardly have spoken of devils under the notion of angels, especially speaking to deter persons from actions; and so it teaches us, that the good angels, who are ministering spirits for the good of God's elect, at all times have a special ministration, or at least are more particularly present, in the assemblies of people for religious worship, observing the persons, carriage, and demeanour; the sense of which ought to awe all persons attending those services, from any indecent and unworthy behaviour.

11 Nevertheless neither is the man without the woman, neither the woman without the man, in the Lord.

Let the man, upon the apostle's discourse of his pre-eminence and dignity over the woman, should wax proud and insolent, and carry himself too imperiously, the apostle addeth this, that they both stand in need of each other's help, so as neither of them could well be without the other, either as to matters that concern God, or that concern the world; the Lord so ordering and disposing it, that they should be mutual helps one to another. Or else the sense is, they are equal in the Lord as to a state of grace, in Christ there is neither male nor female: though there be a difference betwixt a man and woman in other things, and the man hath the priority and superiority; yet when we come to consider them as to their spiritual state, and in their spiritual reference, there is no difference.

12 For as the woman is of the man, even so is the man also by the woman; but all things of God.

The man hath a priority to the woman, being first created, and a superiority over her upon that account, she being made for him, not he for her, this is indeed the man's advantage; but on the other side, since the creation of the first man, all men are by the woman, who conceives them in her womb, suckles them at her breasts, is concerned in their education while children, and dandled upon her knees; the man therefore hath no reason to despise and too much to trample upon the woman: and all these things are of God, by the wise ordering and disposing of God; so as neither hath the man, by reason of his prerogative, in being first created, and the end for which the woman was created, any cause to insult and triumph over the woman; neither hath the woman any cause, by reason of her prerogative, that the man is by her, any cause to triumph over the man; but both of them ought to look upon themselves as having their prerogatives from God, and in the use of them to behave themselves according to the will of God, behaving themselves in their respective stations as it is the will of God they should behave themselves, the woman being subject to the man, and testifying such subjection by all the signs of it, and the man carrying himself towards the woman as he who is the image and glory of God.

13 Judge in yourselves: is it comely that a woman pray unto God uncovered?

No man is truly and thoroughly convinced of an error, till he be convicted by his own conscience. It is therefore very usual in holy writ for God, by his sacred penmen, to make appeals unto men's own consciences, and put them to judge within themselves, to examine a thing by their own reason, and according to the dictates of that to give sentence for or against themselves. The thing as to which he would have them judge within themselves, and accordingly pronounce sentence, was, whether it were a decent thing for women to pray to God with their hair all hanging loose about their shoulders, or without any veil, or covering for their head and face.

14 Doth not even nature itself teach you, that, if a man have long hair, it is a shame unto him?

He tells them, that they could not judge this as a thing comely, for nature itself taught them, that it is a shame for a man to wear long hair. By nature here some understand the law of nature, according to which it would have an intrinsic evil in it, which it is plain it hath not; for then neither must the Nazarites have used it, (as they did,) neither would it be lawful for the sake of men's health or life. Others understand by nature the law of nations; but neither is this true, for in many nations men wear hair at the utmost length. Others understand common sense, or the light and judgment of that natural reason which since the fall is left in man; but this must be the same in all men, and we know that all men do not judge this shameful. Others therefore by nature here understand a common custom, which (as they say) maketh as it were a second nature; so the term is taken, Rom. xi. 24: but it cannot so signify here; for there neither is, nor ever was, such a universal custom in any place, that none in it wore long hair. Others by nature here understand natural inclination; but neither can this be the sense, for there is in some men, as well as in women, a natural propension and inclination to wear their hair at excessive lengths. Others here by nature understand the difference of the sex, as they take this word to be used, Rom. i. 26; the distinction of the sexes teacheth us this: and this seemeth to be the most probable sense of this text. The apostle arguing, that as the male and female sex are artificially distinguished by garments, and it was the will of God they should be so, so they should also be distinguished by the wearing of their hair; and it was no less shame for a man to wear his hair like a woman, than to wear garments like a woman.

15 But if a woman have long hair, it is a glory to her: for her hair is given her

But, he saith, if a woman have long hair, it is a glory to her. Long hair is comely for the woman, and accounted to her for a beauty or ornament, for God hath given her her hair for a covering. There have been books written about the lawfulness or unlawfulness of men's wearing long hair, and the due or undue lengths of men's hair, the substance of which were too much to transcribe here. That which in these verses seemeth to be commended to us, as the will of God in this matter, is, 1. That men and women should so order their hair, as by it to preserve the distinction of sexes. 2. That men should not wear their hair after the manner of women, either dishevelled, or curled, and tricked up about their heads, which speaks too much of an unmanly and effeminate temper, much more was what became not Christians. And if this be forbidden men, as to the use of their own hair, they stand concerned to consider whether it be lawful for them thus to wear and adorn themselves with the hair of other men and women.

<sup>1 Tim. 6. 4.</sup> 16 But if any man seem to be contentious, we have no such custom, neither the churches of God.

<sup>1 ch. 7. 17. & 14. 33.</sup> If any man seem to be contentious; if any man hath a mind to quarrel out of a love to show his wit in discoursing what may be said on the other side, or out of a desire to hold up a party, and contradict us. We have no such custom, of women's praying or prophesying with their heads uncovered, or men's praying or prophesying with their heads covered; or we have no such custom of contending for these little frivolous things; neither any of the churches of God; and good Christians, in their practices, ought, in things of this nature, to have an eye and regard to the custom of their own church, and also of other Christian churches. Thus the apostle closeth this discourse, and proceedeth in the next verses to tax other abuses which were crept into this famous church.

17 Now in this that I declare unto you I praise you not, that ye come together not for the better, but for the worse.

Now in this that I declare unto you I praise you not; I come now to another thing of greater consequence, as to which I must much blame you; I am so far from being able to commend or approve of what you do, that I must for it smartly reflect upon you. That ye come together not for the better, but for the worse; that when you meet in your church assemblies, for the performance of your religious duties, to pray, preach, hear, or receive the holy sacrament, you so meet and behave yourselves, as your meeting tends to the increase of your sin, rather than to the increase of your grace, and the promoting the work of God in yourselves and the souls of others.

18 For first of all, when ye come together in the church, "I hear that there <sup>u ch. 1. 10, 11, 12. & 3.3.</sup> be divisions among you; and I partly <sup>1 Or, schisms.</sup> believe it.

In the church, here, must signify the religious assembly; for at this time there were no temples built for Christians, but they met in private houses, as the iniquity of those times would bear: yet others think the place is here meant where the church was wont to meet, and say, that the Christians had a certain stated place, though in a private house, where they used to meet. But it is not very probable that they should, in the midst of heathens, be so quiet and secure as to meet either constantly, or ordinarily, in any one certain and stated place, so denominated. What schisms, or divisions, the apostle meaneth, he expoundeth in the following verses; either they quarrelled about meats, or drinks, or their order in sitting down, or the time when they should begin, or did not stay till they were all met.

19 For there must be also heresies among you, that they which are approved may be made manifest among you. <sup>1 Mat. 18. 7. Luke 17. 1. Acts 20. 31. 1 Tim. 4. 1. 2 Pet. 2. 1, 2. 1 Or, sects. 2 Luke 2. 35. 1 John 2. 19. See Deut. 13. 3.</sup>

There must be; it is not simply and absolutely necessary that there should be such divisions amongst you, (they are caused from the free acts of men's corrupt wills,) but yet these things do not fall out by chance, but through the providence of God, who hath so immutably ordered and decreed, to suffer Satan to show his malice, and men to discover the lusts and corruptions of their own hearts. Heresies: though hereby be a term that, by ecclesiastical usage, is restrained to signify perverse opinions in matter of doctrine, as to which men are stubborn and tenacious; yet it is manifest, that the word is not natively so to be restrained, neither can it reasonably be here so interpreted, but signifies the same thing with schisms and divisions before mentioned: for though (as will appear from chap. xv.) there were corrupt opinions amongst them in matters of doctrine, yet it is unreasonable to understand the apostle here, as speaking with reference to them, these words being brought as a reason why he was inclined to believe that there were such schisms or divisions amongst them, because there must be heresies. That they which are approved may be made manifest among you: God hath his wise end in suffering breaches and divisions, that such as are true and sincere Christians, opposing themselves to such violations of charity, might appear to you to be true and sincere, and to have the love of God dwelling, working, and prevailing in them.

20 When ye come together therefore into one place, this is not to eat the <sup>1 Or, ye cannot eat.</sup> Lord's supper.

The Greek words do not necessarily signify into one place, they may as well be translated, for the same thing, and possibly that were the better translation of them in this place; divisions appearing the worse amongst persons that met as one and the same body, and for one and the same grave action, and that such an action as declared them one body, and laid upon them the highest obligation to brotherly love imaginable. This is not to eat the Lord's supper: some words must be here supplied to complete the sense. This is not to eat; that is, as you do it is indeed not to do it; to eat the Lord's supper in an unlawful manner, is not to eat it. It is called the Lord's supper, either because he ordained and instituted it, or because it was instituted for the remembrance of his death, ver. 26; Luke xxii. 19. Some think that the sacrament of the Lord's supper is here meant, and so one would think, by comparing what is here with ver. 23, 24. Others say, that the love feast is here intended, which ordinarily preceded the Lord's supper; the reason they give is, because the abuses here mentioned, viz. not staying one for another till the whole church were met, one eating plentifully, another sparingly, some being hungry while others had ate and drank enough, could not be at the Lord's supper, where the minister beginneth not till the whole church be assembled, and where there is no such liberal eating and drinking. To this purpose we are told, that by an ancient custom in Greece (within which Corinth was) the rich men offered some things to their idols, (which after that action the poor had for their relief,) and made feasts in the idol's temples, of which all had a liberty to eat. That the Christians imitated this practice of theirs, and the rich amongst them upon the Lord's days made feasts, at which both poor and rich Christians might be, and the poor carried away what was left. But this church growing corrupt every way, and having got teachers to their humours, they at these feasts neglected the poor, inviting only the rich to them, and also exceeding in their provision for their rich guests. These feasts were called feasts of love, or love feasts, either because, 1. Love to God was that which (pretendedly at least) caused them. 2. Or because they were representations of our Lord's last supper, in which he first ate the paschal lamb, then instituted what we call the Lord's supper; or because they immediately preceded or followed the administration of the Lord's supper, from whence the love feast, being immediately before or after it, had also the same name. But if we allow this, we must make the love feasts also Christ's institution, and instituted in remembrance of him, neither of which can be proved. The meaning must be, You cannot rightly communicate at the Lord's table, when immediately before or after that table, at your love feast, you are guilty of such disorderly actions. In the mean time, only what Christ instituted for remembrance of his death is what the apostle calls the Lord's supper.

There was at this time in most of the Christian church a Jewish party, viz. such as were converted from Judaism to Christianity, and had a tang of the old cask, being too tenacious of some Jewish rites. These looked upon the Lord's supper as an appurtenance to the passover, immediately after which we know that Christ at first instituted his supper. As therefore Christ did eat the paschal supper before the Lord's supper; so they, in imitation of him, though they forbore the paschal lamb, yet would have a supper of their own to precede the Lord's supper, and having provided it at home, would bring it to the place where the church was to meet; and their poor brethren contributing nothing to the charge of that supper, they would not stay for them, but took this their own supper: so it came to pass, that the poorer Christians were hungry, had none or very little share in their feast, while others, the richer part of the church, had too much; for I take our translation of this word, μεθύει, to be very hard and uncharitable. Hard, because the word doth not necessarily so signify, only drinking beyond what is strictly necessary, and our translators themselves, John ii. 10, render it well drunk. Uncharitable, because it certainly must be very uncharitably presumed of this church of Corinth, that they should suffer persons, at that time actually drunk, to come to the Lord's table.

22 What? have ye not houses to eat and to drink in? or despise ye <sup>a</sup> the Church of God, and <sup>b</sup> shame  $\parallel$  them that have not? What shall I say to you? shall I praise you in this? I praise you not.

What? have ye not houses to eat and to drink in? hence evidently appears, that these love feasts were kept in the place where the assembly met for the public worship of God; for the apostle would have them (if they would continue them) kept in their private houses: and he doth not only blame the abuses of these feasts, but the feasts themselves as kept in the place where the church met, or as having in them any pretence to any thing of religion: meet they might, friendly to eat and to drink, but their private houses were the fittest places for that. Or despise ye the church of God? or do you despise the place (as some think) where the church of God meeteth, or the people met in that place, by carrying yourselves so disorderly in such a grave assembly; or the poorer part of the church, who, though poorer, are a part of the church, redeemed by the blood of Christ? the next words would incline us to think that the sense; for it followeth, and shame them that have not, that is, that have not estates to contribute to such feasts, and so are forced to go away without any due refreshment.

23 For <sup>c</sup> I have received of the Lord that which also I delivered unto you, <sup>d</sup> That the Lord Jesus the same night in which he was betrayed took bread:

About these love feasts preceding the Lord's supper, I have received nothing from the Lord, you have taken the practice up from the Jews or heathens: I do not know that it is unlawful for you civilly to feast, and eat and drink in your private houses; but to come to make such feasts immediately before you religiously eat and drink at the Lord's table, I have received no order from the Lord for any such practice. I have told you what I received from the Lord, which is no more than, That the Lord Jesus the same night in which he was betrayed took bread: see this in the evangelists, Matt. xxvi. 26; Mark xiv. 22; Luke xxii. 19; where all these words are opened. Some think that Paul received this from the Lord by immediate revelation (as it is thought Moses received the history we have in Genesis and part of Exodus, which relates to a time before he was born, or arrived at man's estate). Others think that he received it from St. Luke's writings (for the words are quoted according to his Gospel). Others think he received it from some other of the apostles. Certain it is, that he did receive it from the Lord; how, is uncertain.

24 And when he had given thanks, he brake it, and said, Take, eat: this is my body, which is broken for you: this do  $\parallel$  in remembrance of me.

25 After the same manner also he took the cup, when he had supped, saying, This cup is the new testament in my blood: this do ye, as oft as ye drink it, in remembrance of me.

These words we also met with, Luke xxii. 19, 20, and in the other evangelists' narration of the institution of the supper. See the explication of them in the notes on those texts.

26 For as often as ye eat this bread, and drink this cup,  $\parallel$  ye do shew the Lord's death <sup>a</sup> till he come.

From hence it appears, that the bread and wine is not (as papists say) transubstantiated, or turned into the very substance of the flesh and blood of Christ, when the communicants eat it and drink it. It is still the same bread and cup it was. The end of the institution is but to commemorate Christ's death; and upon that account the waiting upon God in this ordinance, will be a standing duty incumbent upon Christians, until Christ shall come to judgment. Some think, show ye, is a better translation of the verb, than (as we translate it) ye do show; wherefore so behave yourselves at this ordinance, as those who know what they have to do in it, that is, to show forth the death of the Lord Jesus Christ.

27. ch. 10.

27 Wherefore whosoever shall eat this bread, and drink this cup of the Lord, unworthily, shall be guilty of the body and blood of the Lord.

Divines agree, that the unworthiness here spoken of, respecteth not the person of the receiver so much as the manner of the receiving; in which sense, a person that is worthy may receive this ordinance unworthily: it is variously expounded, without due religion and reverence, without faith and love, without proposing a right end in the action, under the guilt of any known sin not repented of, &c. Shall be guilty of the body and blood of the Lord; shall incur the guilt of the profanation of this sacred institution; for an abuse offered to a sign, reacheth to that of which it is a sign; as the abuse of a king's seal, or picture, is justly accounted an abuse of the king himself, whose seal and picture it is. Some carry it higher; he shall be punished, as if he had crucified Christ, the profanation of Christ's ordinance reflecting upon Christ himself.

g 2 Cor. 13.
8. Gal. 4. 4.

28 But let a man examine himself, and so let him eat of that bread, and drink of that cup.

He is to examine himself about his knowledge, whether he rightly understands what Christ is, what the nature of the sacrament is, what he doth in that sacred action; about his faith, love, repentance, new obedience, whether he be such a one as God hath prepared that holy table for; it is the children's bread, and not for dogs; a table Christ hath spread for his friends, not for his enemies. And so let him eat, &c.; having so examined himself, not otherwise. Whence it appears, that neither children in age or understanding, nor persons not in the use of their reason, nor unbelievers, nor persons under the guilt of sins not repented of, have any right to the Lord's supper: accordingly was the practice of all the primitive churches, and all rightly reformed churches. Whether they ought, if they will presume to come, to be kept away by the officers of the church, and how, and by whom? whether good Christians may communicate with such at the holy table? and after what previous duty performed? are questions that belong not to this text.

i Or,
judgment,
Rom. 13. 2.

29 For he that eateth and drinketh unworthily, eateth and drinketh || damnation to himself, not discerning the Lord's body.

He that eateth and drinketh unworthily; in the sense before mentioned, either having no remote right or no present right to partake in that ordinance, being an unbeliever, or a resolved unholo or ignorant person; or irreverently and irreligiously. He eateth and drinketh κρίμα, damnation, or judgment, it is no matter which we translate it; for if he bringeth God's judgments upon him in this life, they will end in eternal damnation, without a timely repentance; but it is to himself, not to him that is at the same table with him, unless he hath been guilty of some neglect of his duty to him. Not discerning the Lord's body; and his guilt lieth here, that he doth not discern and distinguish betwixt ordinary and common bread, and that bread which is the representation of the Lord's body, but useth the one as carelessly, and with as little preparation and regard to what he doth, as he useth the other.

30 For this cause many are weak and sickly among you, and many sleep.

You, it may be, are not aware of it, but look upon other causes why so many amongst you are sick, and weak, and die immaturely; but I, as the apostle of Jesus Christ, (and so know the mind and will of God,) assure you, that this your irreverent and irreligious profanation of this holy ordinance, is one great cause of so many among you being sick, and weak, and dying in unripe age. Some think that the word sleep argues that they were godly, penitent Christians that so died, (for the death of wicked men is hardly called sleeping any where in holy writ,) to let us know, that even good people, who yet may be saved, may bring judgments in this life upon themselves, as by the profanation of God's name in other ordinances, so more especially by their profanation of it in this ordinance of the supper.

31 For <sup>h</sup>if we would judge ourselves, <sup>h</sup>we should not be judged.

h Pa. 32. 5.
1 John 1. 9.

This word judge in Scripture signifies all parts of judgment, examining, accusing, condemning, &c.: here it signifies accusing ourselves, condemning ourselves; discriminating ourselves, by the renewings of faith and repentance, from unbelievers, impenitent and profane persons; if we would thus judge ourselves, God would not accuse or condemn us.

32 But when we are judged, <sup>i</sup>we are chastened of the Lord, that we should not be condemned with the world.

Lest they be terrified at what he had said, and look upon their afflictions as indications of God's displeasure against them to that degree, that he would not look any more upon them as his children; he tells them, that when God's people are afflicted with the evils of this life, sickness, &c., God doth not deal with them so much as a Judge, as a Father, who chasteneth the child whom he loveth, and scourgeth whom he receiveth, Heb. xii. 6—8; and doth it for a good end, to prevent the eternal condemnation of the soul with the impenitent sinners of the world, giving us our hell in this life, that we may escape it in the life to come.

33 Wherefore, my brethren, when ye come together to eat, tarry one for another.

The apostle concludes this discourse with an exhortation to them, for the time to come to take heed of these irreligious and irreverent behaviours, with relation to the Lord's supper; that they should not take the sacrament before the whole church were met together, the rich should stay for the poor, and not receive it in parties, but as one body eat that one bread.

34 And if any man <sup>k</sup>hunger, let him eat at <sup>l</sup>home; that ye come not together unto || condemnation. And the rest <sup>m</sup>will I set in order when <sup>n</sup>I come.

Lastly, he minds them, that if there were any other things of this nature, which he had not spoken to, he did design suddenly to give to them, and then he would set them in order, by giving them rules about them.

CHAP. XII

Paul teacheth that none can own Christ but by the Holy Ghost, 1—3; whose gifts are diverse, 4—6, and dealt out to different persons to profit withal, 7—11. As many members make up one natural body, so Christians in general form one mystical body, 12, 13: and as every member is equally a part of the natural body, and hath a necessary function allotted it, 14—26; so is it with Christ's body, the church; to the several members of which God hath assigned different gifts and offices for the general good, 27—31.

NOW <sup>o</sup>concerning spiritual gifts, brethren, I would not have you ignorant.

The word gifts is not in the Greek, but supplied by our interpreters. In the Greek is no more than concerning spirituals, which is equally applicable to spiritual offices, or administrations, operations, and gifts; of all which he afterward treateth something, but mostly concerning gifts, which are chiefly spoken of in this chapter: and our translators agree with the best interpreters, in supplying the text with the word gifts. This church eminently abounded in these abilities to spiritual actions given them of God (for spiritual gifts signifies nothing else); and as they abounded in them, so they erred much in the abuse or ill use of them, as we shall afterward read in this chapter. Therefore the apostle tells them, that as to them, he would not have them ignorant, either of the favour of God in enriching them with them, as he had said, chap. i. 5, or yet in the due and right use of them, so as God might have glory from their good use of them: or of the errors that they had ran into, or might further run into, in the ill use of them.

2 Ye know <sup>b</sup> that ye were Gentiles, carried away unto these <sup>c</sup> dumb idols, even as ye were led.

Ye know that ye were Gentiles; so they were still in respect of their birth and country; but he speaketh with reference to their religion and way of worship. Carried away unto these dumb idols; carried away by your idol-priests, and by the examples of your friends and neighbours, to idols, which, though they seem to you to speak, and to tell you of things to come, yet indeed have mouths and speak not, only the devil spake from them. Even as ye were led; wherein you acted not under the conduct of reason, nor as became reasonable creatures, but you were blindly led by the dictates of priests, or by the examples of others. This the apostle puts them in mind of, to let them know, that all those excellent gifts with which they were now endued, as he had told them, chap. i. 5, 6, they had received from God since their conversion to Christianity, and from the Spirit of Christ; for before their conversion they were like brute beasts, knowing nothing, but led by others.

3 Wherefore I give you to understand, <sup>d</sup> that no man speaking by the Spirit of God calleth Jesus <sup>e</sup> accursed; and <sup>f</sup> that no man can say that Jesus is the Lord, but by the Holy Ghost.

The apostle proveth that they had received their spiritual gifts from the Spirit of God, because when they had not received this Spirit, they blasphemed the Christian religion, and called Christ accursed, which could not be done by any that spake by the Spirit of God; for there being but one God, and the Holy Spirit being one of the three persons in the Divine Being, and Jesus Christ another, and the eternal Son of God, it could not be but he that called Christ accursed, as the Jews and the heathens did, must blaspheme God, which none could do by the influence of that Holy Spirit, who was one of the persons in the blessed Trinity; and as by this the apostle lets them know, that they were now acted by another spirit than they were in their Gentile state; so he also lets them know, that those heathens, amongst whom they lived, were not acted by the Spirit of God, but by the evil spirit. On the other side, he saith, that no man can say that Jesus is the Lord, but by the Holy Ghost. There is a double saying that Jesus is the Lord: 1. When men only say it with their lips, but do not believe it in their hearts, are not affected with what they say, nor do pay that homage of faith and obedience to him, which should correspond with such a profession: thus men say Christ is the Lord, who preach him or discourse of him as men, though they do not in heart believe in him, receive or embrace him, or live up to the holy rules of life which he hath given; thus Judas, Caiaphas, and others, said Christ was the Lord; thus they could not do but by the Holy Ghost, that is, the gifts of the Holy Ghost, which are common, which those might have who were never renewed by the Holy Ghost. So these Corinthians generally going thus far verbally to acknowledge Christ the Lord, it was an argument they had thus far been influenced by the Holy Ghost. 2. There is a serious and saving saying that Jesus is the Lord, when men do not only with their lips speak these words, and other words to the same sense, but heartily acknowledge him, believe in him, love him, obey him, and call upon him, professing him as they ought to do, and so as may be of advantage to them to life and salvation. No man now doth this but by the Holy Ghost renewing and sanctifying him, and blessing him with and helping him in the exercise of such habits. We shall observe in holy writ, that some verbs signify not the action only, but the action with its due quality: thus, hearing sometimes signifieth to hear so, as withal to believe. Calling upon the name of the Lord, Rom. x. 13, signifieth a calling aright. Confessing, 1 John iv. 15, signifies a confessing with faith and love. So the verb say in this text may signify such a saying or speaking, as is attended with faith, love, and due obedience.

4 Now there are diversities of gifts, but the same Spirit.

Gifts signifieth the same thing with habits, or powers, or abilities to actions; our actions being either natural, as eating, drinking, sleeping, &c., or moral, or spiritual. These powers are either natural, which are in an ordinary course of providence bred with us, as the infant hath a power to eat, drink, sleep, cry, &c.: or acquired, and that by imitation, or human learning, as the child gets a habit of speaking, or a power to write, understand languages, arts, and sciences: or infused; and those are either merely infused, as faith, love, and all habits truly spiritual are, and therefore called graces, or spiritual gifts of the highest natures; or else such as are obtained by the use of means on our parts, but yet not without the influence of the Holy Spirit of God; such are abilities to pray, preach, &c. There are some common powers, that is, such as those might have, who should never be saved, which might be merely infused, and were extraordinary in those first times of the gospel; such as the gift of tongues, prophecy, healing, &c. These powers, especially such as are not natural and common to all in an ordinary course of providence, nor acquired merely by imitation, or study, or the teaching of others, but infused either in whole or in part, are those which the apostle here calleth gifts: and he saith there is a diversity of them; there was the gift of prophecy, of healing, of tongues, &c.; but he tells them, this diversity of gifts flowed all from one and the same Spirit, the Spirit was not diverse, though his influences were divers.

5 And there are differences of administrations, but the same Lord.

There are divers offices or ministries in the church of God; one ministereth in the office of an elder, another in the office of a deacon; one in one service of the church, another in another service; but there is but one Lord to whom they minister; they all serve the great Lord of the church, Jesus Christ, though in divers orders and places of ministration.

6 And there are diversities of operations, but it is the same God which worketh all in all.

Operations and administrations both differ from gifts, as acts from habits. Habits and powers, by which men performed holy offices in the church, or wrought miracles, are called gifts. The acts or exercise of these powers are called administrations and operations. These latter differ one from another, as the former signify standing and continuing acts in the church; operations, ἰεργήματα, rather signify miraculous effects, such as healing the sick without the application of ordinary means, speaking with divers tongues, &c. The apostle tells them, that as there was a diversity of gifts, or powers, and a diversity of acts in the constant service of the church, by which men exercised those gifts or powers they had in the performance of them; so there were diversities of operations, by which men used those extraordinary gifts or powers, which God gave some in the first plantation of the church, for the sake of such as believed not. But it was the same God that wrought them all, and in all, though all did not do, or could not do, the same things.

7 But the manifestation of the Spirit is given to every man to profit withal.

He here calleth gifts, the manifestation of the Spirit, partly to let them know, that these powers flowed from the Holy Spirit apparently, they having no such powers while they were heathens, and carried after dumb idols, as they were led; and partly to let all know, that these gifts and powers were evident proofs both of Christ's ascension, and of the promise of the Father and of Christ in sending the Holy Spirit, Acts i. 4; xvi. 7, 8; Eph. iv. 8. These gifts he tells them were given to every man; where every signifieth each one; for the same gifts or powers were not given to all, but to those to whom they were given, they were given not to puff them up, or to give them matter to boast of, but to do good withal to the church of Christ. No man hath any power or gift given him of God, either for his own hurt, or the hurt of others, but only for his own good, and the good of others.

1 ch. 2, 6, 7. 8 For to one is given by the Spirit <sup>1</sup>the word of wisdom; to another <sup>2</sup>the word of knowledge by the same Spirit;

There are different apprehensions as to the particular gifts here enumerated, and it is no wonder, these extraordinary gifts being ceased, if we be now at a loss to determine what is to be understood by the terms whereby they are expressed. Some by the word of wisdom, here, understand a faculty to deliver grave sentences; others, an ability to open the deep mysteries of religion; others, a singular knowledge of spiritual things, joined with a great authority, &c.; others, an ability to explain the deep wisdom of God. But it is most probable, that he meaneth by it what we ordinarily understand by wisdom, viz. a faculty, from a good judgment of the circumstances of actions, to do them at the best time, and in the best manner, wherein they may be serviceable to their ends. It is as uncertain, whether by the word of knowledge he meaneth a capacity to comprehend things in our knowledge, or to communicate it to others, or the actual communication of it by preaching, which was the work of the pastors and teachers; or the prophetic knowledge of future contingencies; or an ability to speak of spiritual things doctrinally, without any great faculty of applying them.

To another, he saith, is given faith: by which cannot be understood that faith which is common to all Christians, for he is speaking of such gifts as were given to some Christians, not to all; he must therefore mean, either a faith of miracles, that is, a persuasion that God would work a miracle in this or that case, or a great knowledge in the matters of faith, or a great confidence and boldness in the discharge of their office. To another the gifts of healing, of healing diseases miraculously, without the application of ordinary rational medicines.

To another the working of miracles, of other sorts, such as the inflicting punishments on sinners, casting out devils, &c. To another prophecy, which in the general signifieth the revelation of the will of God, whether by the foretelling future contingencies, or opening the Scriptures by preaching or teaching. To another discerning of spirits; a power wherein God, for the further authority and credit of his gospel in the primitive times, communicated to some men something of his own prerogative to discern men's inward thoughts and hearts, and to make up a judgment of their truth and sincerity, or contrariwise of their falsehood and hypocrisy. To another divers kinds of tongues, that is, a power to discourse with men in their several languages, as we read in Acts ii. 8. To another the interpretation of tongues: this is made a diverse gift from an ability to speak with divers tongues; possibly some of those that spake with divers tongues could not interpret what they said.

 ch. 7, 7. the selfsame Spirit, <sup>6</sup>dividing to every 2 Cor. 10, 13. man severally <sup>7</sup>as he will.

Though the Spirit of God be but one, from whom these several powers and abilities flow; yet he doth not give all this variety of gifts to all Christians, but one to this man, another to another, as the same Holy Spirit pleaseth, for the glory of God, or the good of the church.

x Rom. 12. 12 For <sup>8</sup>as the body is one, and hath 4, 5, Eph. 4. many members, and all the members of 4, 16. that one body, being many, are one y ver. 27. body: <sup>9</sup>so also is Christ.
 Gal. 3, 16.

For as it is in the body natural, the integral parts, or members of it, are many, yet the body is but one; so it is in the spiritual body, the church, which is that mystical body of which Christ is the Head. The members of the church may be many, and there may be in several members of the church a diversity of gifts, of administrations, and operations, yet the church is but one, yea, Christ and the church make up but one mystical body, of which he is the Head, and they are the members; and therefore the several members, having several gifts, or several offices, or several powers and operations, had no reason, for their difference in such gifts, or powers, or offices, to envy one another, or to despise each other, or glory over one another; for they were but one body, and had all the same Head, though they had from the same Spirit divers abilities, offices, and powers for several operations.

 2 Gal. 3, 28. or <sup>12</sup>Gentiles, whether we be bond or
 Eph. 2, 13, 14, 16. free; and <sup>13</sup>have been all made to drink
 Col. 3, 11. into one Spirit.
 1 John 6, 63.
 & 7, 37, 38, 39.

The apostle proveth the oneness of the church, as the body of Christ, from the same sacraments of the New Testament instituted for all Christians, and wherein they jointly partake. He saith, we are baptized into one body, by which he must mean the universal church, for Christ is the Head of that; particular churches are but parts of that church, of which Christ is the Head. Let men be of what nation they will, whether Jews or Gentiles, turning to the Christian religion, and of what condition they will, when they are baptized they are by it made members of that one body, of which Christ is the Head; though for the more convenient administration of, and participation in, the ordinances, they are divided into smaller societies, which also have the denomination of churches; as the smallest drop of water may be called water, though there be but one element of water. And, saith the apostle, we have been all made to drink into one Spirit; which some interpret as if it were, we have all drank of one Spirit, that is, been made partakers of one Spirit, whose benefits are sometimes set out under the notion of water, living water, John iv. 10, 14; vii. 38, 39; and so in the Old Testament, Isa. xii. 3; Ezek. xlvii. But many others choose rather to interpret drinking in this place, of drinking at the table of the Lord, partaking of that whole action being set out here by one particular act there performed. This is probable, considering that the apostle, in the former part of the verse, had been speaking of the other sacrament of the gospel, and that he, speaking of the Lord's supper, chap. x. 17, had used this expression, For we being many, are one bread, and one body.

14 For the body is not one member, but many. As the natural body is totum integrale, a whole consisting of many members; so the body spiritual, the mystical body of Christ, is not made up of one single member, but of many members.

15 If the foot shall say, Because I am not the hand, I am not of the body; is it therefore not of the body?

16 And if the ear shall say, Because I am not the eye, I am not of the body; is it therefore not of the body?

It should seem by these expressions, that one great cause of those divisions, which the apostle had charged the church of Corinth with, was their difference in gifts, administrations, and operations; which was to that degree, that either those who were higher in gifts and administrations, and more famous for their miraculous operations, despised and vilified those that were inferior to them; or those who were lower in gifts, or in their stations in the church, or their power to work miracles, would not own themselves members of the church at Corinth, because they were in those low and inferior orders and degrees. The apostle argueth the unreasonableness of this, by a further comparing of the natural with the spiritual mystical body, the church, and showeth, it was altogether as unreasonable for men to disclaim the church, and their relation to it, because they had not the most eminent gifts, or were not in the most eminent places and offices, as for the foot to say, it was not of the body, because it was not the hand; or for the ear to say, it was not of the body, because it was not the eye.

17 If the whole body were an eye, where were the hearing? If the whole were hearing, where were the smelling?

There are several actions to be performed by the body of a man, either for the support and the upholding of it in life, or for the accommodation of it while it lives; seeing, hearing, and smelling (which are the three actions here mentioned) are not indeed necessary for the upholding of life, but they are highly useful for a man's better being, and the accommodation of bodily life; therefore there is need of a variety of bodily members, organs or instruments of sight as well as of hearing, and organs of smelling as well as hearing; the wise God hath created no member of man's body in vain, each one hath its use in order to the being or well-being of the body: so it is in the church of God, as the apostle, ver. 27, argueth; but he goeth yet further on, first, in his comparison of the natural and mystical body.

c ver. 28. 18 But now hath God set the members every one of them in the body, <sup>d</sup>as it hath pleased him.

The infinitely wise God, who hath made the body of man, and ordered all the members of the body for several uses and offices, either for the upholding or accommodating the life of man, hath likewise appointed the order in the body in which every member shall stand; that the head should be uppermost for the better guidance of the whole body; the feet lowermost to tread upon the earth, and to bear the weight of the whole body: and none must repine at the wisdom of God, which hath not only created man's body, (consisting of a variety of members,) but also appointed every member its place, and there setteth it, that it cannot shift its station or office.

19 And if they were all one member, where were the body?

The body is a whole consisting of many members, it could not therefore be a body if there were but only one member. Or how could the body perform the several actions necessary either for the being or the well-being of it, if it consisted but of one member?

20 But now are they many members, yet but one body.

The multiplicity of members, having several uses and offices for the service of the whole body, do not make a multiplicity of bodies, the body still is but one.

21 And the eye cannot say unto the hand, I have no need of thee: nor again the head to the feet, I have no need of you.

He names two of the most noble and useful members of the body, the head and the eye, which yet cannot tell the hands or the feet they have no need of them: the wise God having created nothing in vain, but made every member in the body of a man for use, as to the whole, so to the several parts of the body; the hand is useful to the eye, and the feet are of use to the head. The application of this similitude, which the apostle so much enlargeth upon, we shall have, ver. 27, &c.

22 Nay, much more those members of the body, which seem to be more feeble, are necessary:

By feeble the apostle here doth not only mean most weak, but which seem to us most abject and contemptible; in which sense the word is used, 2 Cor. xii. 10; such are the belly and the entrails; the eye also is a feeble member, &c.; yet these parts are most necessary for the use of the body, being such without the use of which the body cannot live.

23 And those members of the body, which we think to be less honourable, upon these we  $\parallel$  bestow more abundant honour; and our uncomely parts have more abundant comeliness.

All know what those parts of the body are, which are commonly judged less honourable and less comely; upon these we bestow more abundant honour and comeliness, by hiding them and covering them, that they are not, as the hands, and face, and head, (which we esteem more honourable parts of the body,) exposed to the public view of those with whom we converse.

24 For our comely parts have no need: but God hath tempered the body together, having given more abundant honour to that part which lacked:

God hath, in the wisdom of his providence, so ordered it, that as we have some parts of our body which are judged uncomely, and not for those noble uses that others are; so we have other parts that are, for use, more noble, yet in common repute more ignoble and uncomely: and the same wise God hath so built the body of man, as of both these to make a temperament so as they all concur in the composition of the same body, and more abundant honour in covering and clothing them is given to those parts, that, in the judgment of men, seemed most to lack honour, that their uncomeliness might by some artificial means be taken away.

25 That there should be no  $\parallel$ schism in <sup>1 Or, division.</sup> the body; but that the members should have the same care one for another.

By schism is here meant division, and that also must be expounded figuratively, and it is expounded in the next words, that the members should have the same care one for another; that though the members differ in honour and office, yet they might mutually take care for each other, as if they were all in an equal degree of honour.

26 And whether one member suffer, all the members suffer with it; or one member be honoured, all the members rejoice with it.

From this union of the members in the body natural, of all the members proceedeth a natural sympathy, that if one member suffereth, all are afflicted, and ready to contribute to the relief and help each of other; and likewise the honour that is reflected on the body, is reflected on all the parts, and all rejoice in the good that affecteth any one single member.

27 Now ye are the body of Christ, and <sup>e Rom. 12. 5. Eph. 1. 24. & 4. 12. & 1 Eph. 5. 30.</sup> members in particular.

Considering you in the whole as a church, so ye are the body of Christ: considering you particularly as individual believers, so ye are members of Christ. Some think ἐκ μέλους signifies in part, intending that true believers amongst them were members of Christ, but not others. The apostle, in these words, beginneth to apply to them what he had before discoursed concerning the body natural, and the parts thereof; you are the mystical body of Christ, which hath a great analogy with that natural body which you carry about with you.

28 And <sup>f Eph. 4. 11. 1 Eph. 2. 20. & 3. 5. 1 Acts 13. 1. Rom. 12. 6. & ver. 10. 1 ver. 9. m Num. 11. 17. n Rom. 12. 8. 1 Tim. 5. 17. Heb. 13. 17, 24. 1 Or, kinds, ver. 10.</sup> God hath set some in the Church, first <sup>g</sup>apostles, secondarily <sup>h</sup>prophets, thirdly teachers, after that <sup>i</sup>miracles, then <sup>j</sup>gifts of healings, <sup>k</sup>helps, <sup>l</sup>governments,  $\parallel$  diversities of tongues.

The apostle, Eph. iv. 11, seemeth to make a different enumeration; there he saith, And he gave some, apostles; and some, prophets; and some, evangelists; and some, pastors and teachers. He mentioneth here only three of those there mentioned, viz. apostles, prophets, teachers. He reckoneth up there evangelists, whom he doth not here mention. He here first mentioneth apostles, by whom he meaneth those servants of God who were sent out by Christ to lay the first foundations of the gospel church, and upon whom a universal care lay over all the churches of Christ, having not only a power in all places to preach and administer the sacraments, but to give rules of order, and direct in matters of government; though particular churches had a power of government within themselves, otherwise the apostle would not have blamed this church for not casting out the incestuous person. Prophets signify persons (as I have before noted) that revealed the mind and will of God to people, whether it were by an extraordinary impulse and revelation, or in an ordinary course of teaching; whether they revealed things to come, or opened the mind and will of God already revealed. But in this text, and in Eph. iv. 11, prophets seem to signify, either such as from the Spirit of God foretold future contingencies, (such was Agabus, of whom we read in the Acts of the Apostles, and others in the primitive church,) or else such as interpreted Scripture by extraordinary and immediate revelation. Some think that prophets signify the ordinary pastors of churches; but they seem rather to be comprehended under the next term of teachers, unless we had better grounds than we have to distinguish betwixt pastors and teachers, making the work of the teacher to speak by way of doctrine and explication, and the work of the pastor to speak practically. Thirdly teachers: some by these understand governors of schools; others, such ministers whose work was only to expound the Scriptures, or the mysteries of salvation: but the apostle, in this enumeration, (which is the largest we have in Scripture,) not mentioning pastors, it seemeth to me that he means the fixed and ordinary ministers of churches, or the elders, whom the apostles left in every city, which by their ministry had received the gospel. After that miracles; after that such as he empowered to work miraculous operations, and those of more remarkable nature, for otherwise the healings next mentioned come under that notion also. Then gifts of healings; then such persons as he gave a power to in an extraordinary way to heal the sick. Who the apostle means by helps, and by governments, is very hard to determine. Certain it is, that he doth not mean the civil magistrates; for the time was not yet come for kings to be nursing fathers, and queens nursing mothers to the gospel church. But whether he meaneth deacons, or widows, elsewhere mentioned, as helpful in the case of the poor, or some that assisted the pastors in the government of the church, or some that were extraordinary helps to the apostles in the first plantation of the church, is very hard to determine. Diversities of tongues; such as spake with divers tongues, that faculty being a gift, as we heard before, not given to all, but to some in the primitive church. The apostle, by this enumeration, showeth what he meant by those diversities of gifts, differences of administrations, and diversities of operations, of which he spake in ver. 4-6.

29 Are all apostles? are all prophets?

Or, powers. are all teachers? are all workers of miracles?

30 Have all the gifts of healing? do all speak with tongues? do all interpret?

That is, all are not, nor can be, any more than all the body can be an ear, or an eye, or a hand, or a foot: you cannot expect, that in a governed body all should be governors; and you see by experience, that all cannot work miracles, prophesy, speak with tongues, or heal those that are sick.

31 But covet earnestly the best gifts: and yet shew I unto you a more excellent way.

But covet earnestly the best gifts: the word may be translated indicatively, Ye do covet the best gifts; or as we translate it, imperatively, Covet ye; I would have you be covetous to excel in the best gifts, that is, those which will make you most useful and profitable to the church of God. And yet show I unto you a more excellent way; but yet (saith he) gifts are not the best things, the habits of saving grace are much more valuable than gifts; love to God and your neighbour ought to be by you preferred before gifts. To a discourse of which the apostle thus shortly passeth.

CHAP. XIII

All gifts, how excellent soever, without charity are nothing worth, 1-3. The praises of charity, 4-12; and its preference to faith and hope, 13.

THOUGH I speak with the tongues of men and of angels, and have not charity, I am become as sounding brass, or a tinkling cymbal.

The apostle had promised, in the close of the former chapter, to show them a more excellent thing than gifts, or a more excellent course than that they were so hotly pursuing, in their emulation of the best gifts; he now cometh to show them that way, that course: the way was that of love; the course was the study and pursuing methods how to show their love to God and to one another. For (saith the apostle) though I speak, that is, if I could speak, or admit I did speak, with the tongues used in all the nations of the world, and with the tongues of angels; by which some understand the best and most excellent ways of expressing ourselves. Angels have no tongues, nor make any articulate audible sounds; by which they understand one another; but yet there is certainly a society or intercourse among angels, which could not be upheld without some way amongst them to communicate their minds and wills each to other. How this is we cannot tell: some of the schoolmen say, it is by way of impression: that way God, indeed, communicates his mind sometimes to his people, making secret impressions of his will upon their minds and understandings; but whether angels can do the like, or what their way is of communicating their minds each to other, is a great secret, and we ought to be willingly ignorant of what God hath not pleased, in any part of his revealed will, to tell us. Neither do I judge it a question proper to this place, where the tongues of angels unquestionably signify the best and most excellent ways of expressing and communicating ourselves to others; as manna is called angels' food, Psal. lxxviii. 25, that is, the most excellent food, for angels, being spiritual substances, need no food, have no mouths to eat, nor bellies to fill; and this the apostle meaneth. Though I could express myself, or communicate my mind to others, in the most excellent way, or in the greatest variety of expression, yet if I have not ἀγάπη, which we translate, charity, but possibly might be better translated love, because we usually by charity (in common speech) understand that indication of brotherly love, which is in act so soft bounty, feeding the hungry, clothing the naked, giving to those that are in want; which it is possible that men do out of mere humanity, or a superstitious opinion of meriting thereby, without any true root of love to our neighbour, which is never true if it doth not grow out of a love to God. If I want love, (saith the apostle,) a true root of love to men, flowing from a true love to God, and out of obedience to his precept, I am but as sounding brass or a tinkling cymbal, that is, I only make a noise, but it will conduce nothing to my salvation, it will be of no use to me; but if I have this true root of love, then it will be of avail to me. And thus the apostle proveth, that the habit of love to God and man in the heart, is far more excellent than the gift of tongues, which many of the Corinthians had, or coveted, or boasted in, despising those who had it not.

2 And though I have the gift of prophecy, and understand all mysteries, and all knowledge; and though I have all faith, so that I could remove mountains, and have not charity, I am nothing.

a ch. 12. 8, 9, 10, 28. & 14. 1. See Matt. 7. 22.

b Mat. 17. 20. Mark 11. 23. Luke 17. 6.

And though I have the gift of prophecy: it hath been before showed, that the gift of prophecy, signifieth an extraordinary power or faculty, by which men in those primitive times were enabled to reveal the mind and will of God, either as to future contingencies, or things which should afterwards come to pass in the world, or by further explication or application of the mind and will of God already revealed in holy writ. And understand all mysteries, and all knowledge: though, saith the apostle, I have a vast knowledge, and could in any notion comprehend the most sublime and hidden things, whether Divine or human. And though I have all faith (except that which is saving and justifying). So that I could remove mountains: he further opens what faith he meant, viz. faith of miracles, a firm persuasion that God would upon my prayer work things beyond the power, and contrary to the course, of nature: the apostle alludeth to the words of our Saviour, Matt. xvii. 20. And have not charity, I am nothing; yet, saith he, if I have not love, that true love to God and men, by which that faith which is profitable to salvation worketh and showeth itself, it will all signify nothing, be of no profit nor avail unto me in order to my eternal salvation; I may perish for ever, notwithstanding such gifts.

3 And though I bestow all my goods to feed the poor, and though I give my body to be burned, and have not charity, it profiteth me nothing.

c Mat. 6. 1, 2.

The apostle proceedeth from common gifts, powers, and habits, to actions, and instanceth in two; the first of which might be a great service to men; the latter, an appearance of a great service to God. Though I bestow all my goods to feed the poor; though, saith he, I feed the poor with my goods, and that not sparingly, but liberally, so as I spend all my estate in that way, and make myself as poor as they: and though I give my body to be burned; though I die in the cause of Christ, for the testimony of his gospel, or for owning of his ways; and that by the sharpest and most cruel sort of death, burning; and be not dragged to the stake, but freely give up myself to that cruel kind of death: and have not charity, it profiteth me nothing; yet if I have not a root and principle of love to God in my heart, that carrieth me out to these actions and these sufferings, they all will signify nothing to me, as to my eternal salvation and happiness. From whence we may observe, that, 1. The highest acts of beneficence or bounty towards men, (which we usually call good works,) are not meritorious at the hand of God, and may be separated from a true root of saving grace in the soul. 2. That the greatest sufferings for and in the cause of religion, may be separated from a true root and principle of saving grace. 3. That no actions, no sufferings, are sufficient to entitle any soul to heaven, further than they proceed from a principle of true love to God, and a desire to obey and to please him in what we do. Faith and love must be the roots and principles of all those works which are truly good, and acceptable to God, and which will be of any profit or avail to us with reference to our eternal happiness.

Lest the Corinthians should say to the apostle, What is this love you discourse of? or how shall we know if we have it? the apostle here gives thirteen notes of a charitable person. Charity suffereth long: by love or charity he either meaneth a charitable person, a soul possessed of that love, which he had been commending; or if we take the term plainly, to signify the habit itself, the meaning is, it is a habit or power in the soul, enabling and inclining it to do these things: to suffer long, not to be too quick and tetchy with brethren that may offend or displease us; the charitable man will withhold and restrain his wrath, not be rash in the expressions of it, and hasty to revenge. And is kind; it disposeth a man to desire to deserve well of all, and to do good to all, as he hath occasion and opportunity; so as it is impossible there should be in a man any thing more opposite to this grace, than a currish, churlish temper, with a study and desire to do others mischief. Charity envieth not; though a charitable person seeth others in a higher and more prosperous condition than himself, yet it doth not trouble him, but he is glad at the preferment, good, and prosperity of other men, however it fareth with himself. Every envious man, that is displeas'd and angry at another's faring well, is an uncharitable man, there is no true root of love to God or to his neighbour in his heart. Vaunteth not itself; he doth not prefer himself before others, ambitiously glorying or boasting, and acting rashly to promote his own glory, and satisfy his own intemperate desires or lusts. He is not puffed up, proudly lifting up himself above others, and swelling with high conceits of himself.

Doth not behave itself unseemly; he doth not behave himself towards any in an uncomely or unbecoming manner, and will do nothing towards his brother, which in the opinion of men shall be a filthy or indecent action. Seeketh not her own; he doth not seek what is his own, that is, what is for his own profit or advantage only; he hath an eye to the good and advantage of his brother, as well as his own profit and advantage. Such a man is not easily provoked; he is not without his passions, but he is not governed by his passions, and overruled by them to fly out extravagantly against his brother upon every light and trivial occasion; he knows how to bear injuries, and is willing rather to bear lesser wrongs, losses, and injuries, than to do any thing in revenge of himself, or to the more remarkable prejudice of his neighbour. He thinketh no evil, that is, no mischief, nothing that may be hurtful and prejudicial to his neighbour. Or else, he doth not rashly suspect his neighbour for doing evil (which possibly may be the better interpretation); and so it teacheth us, that lightly to take up evil reports of our neighbours, is a violation of charity; for the man that hath a true love to his brother, though he may believe evil of his brother, and charge him with evil, when it evidently appears to him that he is guilty; yet before that be evident to him, he will not suspect, nor think any such things of him.

He doth not rejoice in the sinful falls of others, but he rejoiceth in all truth, and the success and prospering of truth in the world; or in the manifestation of any person's truth, or innocency, and righteousness.

7 <sup>h</sup> Beareth all things, believeth all things, hopeth all things, endureth all things.

The charitable man beareth all injuries with patience; he believeth all things that are good of his brother, so far as he is from being credulous to his prejudice; endureth all things that a good man ought to endure, that is, any evils done to himself. In the same sense Solomon saith, Prov. x. 12, Love covereth all sins.

8 Charity never faileth: but whether there be prophecies, they shall fail; whether there be tongues, they shall cease; whether there be knowledge, it shall vanish away.

The apostle, from another argument, commendeth the grace of love, viz. its never failing; it shall go with us into another world, and have its use and exercise there, where there will be no prophesying, no speaking with divers tongues, but there the saints shall love God. And this maketh it evident, that by charity, or love, (before mentioned,) the apostle doth not singly mean bounty or beneficence to those that stand in need of those good things of this life, in which we can help them. Whether there be knowledge, it shall vanish away: by knowledge, here, some understand the communicating of knowledge to the church by preaching: others, the means we now have by meditating in and study of the Scriptures: others, better, of the imperfect degrees of our knowledge, or the way of our procuring it: the following verses would incline us to interpret it of the former, though it be true also of the latter.

9 <sup>i</sup> For we know in part, and we prophesy in part.

For we know in part; it was truly said, as to things human, that the greatest part of those things that we know, is the least part of those things which we are ignorant of. A great measure of Divine things is also unknown to us, and the knowledge of them reserved for the resurrection and day of judgment, John xiv. 20. And we prophesy in part; nor can the communication of our knowledge to that, be larger than what we by prophecy communicate; we having ourselves but a short and imperfect communication of Divine things, we can communicate but an imperfect degree of knowledge to others.

10 But when that which is perfect is come, then that which is in part shall be done away.

But when we come to heaven, we shall be in such a state, as nothing shall or can be added to us; then our partial and imperfect knowledge shall be swallowed up in a knowledge perfect and complete.

11 When I was a child, I spake as a child, I understood as a child, I || thought as a child: but when I became a man, I put away childish things.

The apostle compareth the state of believers in this life, compared with their state in another life, to the state of a child, compared to that of a man. Look, as one, when he is a child, knoweth things imperfectly, and discourseth of them in the style and according to the knowledge of a child; but when he is grown up, he discourseth of them at another rate, according to the degree of knowledge which he hath acquired by instruction of others, or his own experience and observation: so it is with all of us; in this life we, like children, have a poor, low, imperfect knowledge of spiritual things, and accordingly discourse of them; but when we come to heaven, we shall know them and discourse of them in a more perfect manner.

12 For now we see through a glass, †darkly; but then <sup>1</sup>face to face: now I know in part; but then shall I know even as also I am known.

The apostle pursues his former theme, comparing the imperfect state of believers, as to knowledge in this life, with what shall be in the life that is to come. In this life it is as in a looking-glass, (where we only see the images and imperfect representations of things,) and darkly, in a riddle; it is but a little knowledge that we have, and what we have we get with a great deal of difficulty; but in heaven we shall have such knowledge as two men have who see one another face to face, and shall know God fully, in some measure, though not in the same degree, of the fullness and perfections wherein God knoweth us.

13 And now abideth faith, hope, charity, these three; but the greatest of these is charity.

Take us according to our state in this life, we have, and shall have, the exercise of three graces: faith, to evidence unto us those things which we do not see, either by the eye of sense or reason; hope, by which we wait for the receiving of them; and love, by which we delight ourselves in God, and show obedience to the will of God. But of all these, love is the greatest, either in respect of its use and profitableness unto men, or in respect of its duration and abiding (which last the apostle seemeth chiefly to intend). Faith shall cease when we come to the vision of God; and hope, when we come to the fruition of God in glory; love also will cease, as to some acts, but never as to a pleasure and a delighting in God; that will be to eternity.

CHAP. XIV

Prophecy, for its greater tendency to edification, is preferred before speaking with tongues, 1—5. Tongues not understood, like indistinct musical sounds, are of no service to the hearers, 6—11. All gifts should be referred to edification, 12—20. Tongues are of use for the conviction of unbelievers, 21, 22; but in the assemblies of the church prophecy is more useful, 23—25. Rules for the orderly exercise of spiritual gifts in the church, 26—33. Women are forbidden to speak there, 34—38. An exhortation to use each gift freely, but with decency and order, 39, 40.

a ch. 12. 31. FOLLOW after charity, and * desire spiritual gifts, <sup>b</sup>but rather that ye may prophesy.

Follow after charity; that love to God and your brethren, concerning which I have been speaking so much, as preferable to all common gifts, follow that with your utmost diligence, as the persecutors follow you; for it is the same word that is ordinarily used to signify the violent prosecution of persecutors, though it be applied also to things which we ought eagerly to follow, Rom. ix. 31; xiv. 19. But rather that ye may prophesy; but rather, or principally that you may be able to reveal the mind and will of God unto others. Some think, by foretelling things to come; but that is not very probable, such an ability of prophesying being given but to few under the New Testament: it is therefore more probable, that he speaketh of an ability to open the Scriptures, either by immediate revelation, (as to which they could use no means but prayer and a holy life,) or by ordinary meditation, and study of the Scriptures. For though the former species of prophesying, by prediction of future things, when the truth of it was justified by such prophecies' accomplishment, was of great use to confirm the doctrine of the gospel; yet the latter was of greater and more general use for the good of others, which makes the apostle put them upon the coveting and earnest desire of that faculty or ability, because, of all others, it made them most eminently and generally useful to others, as well those within the church, as those without; and thus the apostle expoundeth himself, ver. 3.

2 For he that speaketh in an unknown tongue speaketh not unto men, but unto God: for no man †understandeth him; howbeit in the spirit he speaketh mysteries.

For he that speaketh in an unknown tongue; by a tongue (for unknown is not in the Greek, but necessarily added by our translators, for he speaketh of such a language) he meaneth a language not known to all, or at least not to the most of them that hear him. It may be asked, what unknown language the apostle here meaneth? Shall we think that any pastors or teachers in the church of Corinth were so vain, as to preach in the Arabic, Scythian, or Parthian language to a people who understood only the Greek? Our learned Lightfoot thinks this not probable, and that if any had been so vain for ostentation, the apostle would rather have chid them for suffering such an abuse, and have forbidden such further practice, than have given direction, than if any so spake he should interpret, as he doth, ver. 5. He rather thinks, therefore, that the apostle meaneth the Hebrew tongue; the use of which, though it was by this time much lost through the Jews' mixture with other nations, yet was restored in a great measure to the guides of churches, for their better understanding the Scriptures of the Old Testament; and continued amongst the Jews in their reading of the law in the synagogues. Now there being many Jews in this church, and the service of God being ordinarily in the Jewish synagogues performed in that language, it is very probable, that some of these Jews that were Christianized (to show their skill) might, when they spake to the whole church of Corinth, use to speak in Hebrew, though few or none understood that language. The apostle saith, he that did so, spake not unto men, that is, not to those men who did not understand that language, not to the generality of his hearers, though possibly here and there some might understand him, but unto God, who being the Author of all languages, must necessarily know the significance of all words in them: for (he saith) scarce any man understood him. Howbeit in the spirit he speaketh mysteries; howbeit he may speak mysterious things to himself, and to the understanding of his own soul and spirit. Others think that it was possible, that some who thus spake, being but the instruments of the Holy Spirit, might not themselves understand all which they said; but that is hardly probable.

3 But he that prophesieth speaketh unto men to edification, and exhortation, and comfort.

Speaketh unto men; that is, to the understanding of men, and for the good and profit of men. To edification; for their increase in knowledge and all habits of grace. And exhortation; to quicken them in the exercise and practice of such duties as God hath, in his word, required of them. And comfort; and for the relief of them under their burdens, to support and uphold their troubled or wounded spirits. These expressions make it probable, that the apostle, by prophecy in this text, understands ministerial preaching; which more properly tends to edification, exhortation, and comfort, than the foretelling of things to come.

4 He that speaketh in an unknown tongue edifieth himself; but he that prophesieth edifieth the church.

He that speaketh in an unknown tongue edifieth himself; knowledge or understanding of the things that any man speaketh, is necessary to the improvement of them, by their being a means to promote faith and love; for how shall what men say in the least promote, either my faith in God or Christ, or my love to him, if I understand not what they say? How shall they believe in him of whom they have not heard? Rom. x. 14. So that, though he that speaketh in an unknown tongue may (if he understand what he says) have his own heart affected with what he saith, yet it is not possible he should affect another. But he that prophesieth edifieth the church; but he that preacheth in an intelligible language and style to all that hear him, he doth what in him lieth to edify all those that hear him.

5 I would that ye all spake with tongues, but rather that ye prophesied: for greater is he that prophesieth than he that speaketh with tongues, except he interpret, that the church may receive edifying.

I would, in this place, signifies no more than either. I could wish, or I could be content that you could all speak with tongues, if God pleased. It should seem by this speech of the apostle's, that this speaking in unknown tongues was that extraordinary gift, which, above all others, this church, or the several members of it, were proud and ambitious of. St. Paul tells them, that if God pleased he wished they could all do it. But of the two, he rather wished them all a power to open and apply the Holy Scriptures to men's understandings and conscience. He addeth the reason, because it was a more honourable gift and work, and made men truly greater. But he adds, except he interpret, for then he prophesied also. That, saith he, the church, that is, those that heard him prophesying, may receive edifying. Whence we learn, 1. That spiritual growth, and proficiency in Divine knowledge and habits of grace, ought to be the great end of all preachers; and whoso doth not propound this as his end, abuseth his office, and trifles in a pulpit. 2. That whoso maketh this his end, will make it his business, to the best of his skill, to use such a language, style, and method, as the generality of his hearers may best understand; for without their understanding, there can be no edifying. And this lets us see the vanity of using much Latin, or Greek, or a lofty style, or a cryptic method, not obvious to poor people in popular sermons, where the people understand not those languages; or philosophical ratiocinations before a plain people that understand none of these things. Such preaching is neither justifiable by reason, nor by the practice either of Christ or his apostles.

6 Now, brethren, if I come unto you speaking with tongues, what shall I profit you, except I shall speak to you either by <sup>d ver. 24.</sup> revelation, or by knowledge, or by prophesying, or by doctrine?

God hath given me an ability to speak with tongues; suppose I should come to you speaking in the Arabian, Scythian, or Parthian language, what good would it do you? how should it any way profit you, except I shall speak to you either by revelation, or by knowledge, or by prophesying, or by doctrine? Some make these four things distinct each from other; others think that they all signify no more, than the interpreting mentioned in the former verse. Those who distinguish them say, by revelation is meant the explication of the types and figures of the Old Testament; or some such revelation as John had in Patmos; or the expounding the mysteries of the gospel. By knowledge they understand the knowledge of history, or any other ordinary knowledge. By prophesying, the explication of the difficult texts of Scripture. By doctrine, catechetical or practical doctrine. But these are all but uncertain guesses; the sense is plainly no more, than, if I should come speaking with unknown tongues, and no way by interpretation make what I say intelligible unto you.

7 And even things without life giving sound, whether pipe or harp, except they <sup>1 Or, tunes.</sup> give a distinction in the || sounds, how shall it be known what is piped or harped?

In the sounds which are artificially made by the use of wind music, or other music, nothing could be understood, if art had not also devised a distinction in the sounds; that one sound should signify one thing, another sound should signify another thing: so unless the voice of the teacher be significant to, and understood by, the person instructed or taught, the sound is of no use at all.

8 For if the trumpet give an uncertain sound, who shall prepare himself to the battle?

The trumpet is made use of in battles, and that variously; it is used to give soldiers notice to march on against the enemy, and also to sound a retreat: if there were not a distinction in the one sound, and in the other, how should the soldier know when to go forward, and when to come back, by the sound of it? To instruct them what to do, the trumpet must not only sound, but sound intelligibly to those that hear it, which it could not, if there were no distinction in the sound.

9 So likewise ye, except ye utter by the tongue words <sup>+ Gr. signifi- cant.</sup> easy to be understood, how shall it be known what is spoken? for ye shall speak into the air.

By λόγον εύσημον is meant words which signify well to those that hear them; for words may be significant enough in themselves, yet nothing at all significant to them that hear them, being unlearned; such sounds of words can contribute nothing to people's knowledge, but are so much lost labour. This is a text that deserveth the thoughts of those who affect in preaching, if not the use of languages, yet the use of a style, or method, which not one of many of those who hear them understand. It is all one to speak in an unknown tongue, as in a style or method that people do not understand; and truly, such are the generality of ministers' hearers, that words most significant in themselves, and to learned ears, are least significant to them, being hardest to be understood; so as they know nothing of what they say, and the minister doth but, as to the far greater number of people, beat the air (which is a dreadful meditation).

10 There are, it may be, so many kinds of voices in the world, and none of them is without signification.

The whole earth was originally of one language, and of one speech, Gen. xi. 1; but upon the building of Babel, ver. 7, God confounded their languages, so as they did not understand one another. They being scattered abroad, had different languages; so as now there are in the world many languages, and the words in every language are significant to those that understand that language.

11 Therefore if I know not the meaning of the voice, I shall be unto him that speaketh a barbarian, and he that speaketh shall be a barbarian unto me.

But if a man doth not understand the language, the words are not significant unto him, I shall neither understand him, nor will he understand me; for a barbarian cannot understand one of another nation, till he hath learned the language of that nation; nor can a man of another nation understand a barbarian till he hath learned his language.

12 Even so ye, forasmuch as ye are zealous <sup>+ Gr. of spirits.</sup> of spiritual gifts, seek that ye may excel to the edifying of the church.

This proves that the members of the church of Corinth were very ambitious of spiritual gifts. The particle ερω, which our translation here renders so, plainly signifies therefore in this place. In the Greek it is, because, or forasmuch as ye are zealous of spirits; the efficient is put for the effect, the Spirit, which is the author of those gifts, for the gifts themselves. Seek that ye may excel to the edifying of the church; seek that ye may excel in them, and that will be, if you most desire those which tend to the edifying the church, and use those with which God hath blessed you in the best order and manner for that end. From whence it is observable, that the improvement of the people to whom we preach in the knowledge of God, and in faith and obedience, is the great end which we ought to propose to ourselves in the discharge of our office, and in the use of our gifts.

13 Wherefore let him that speaketh in an unknown tongue pray that he may interpret.

To interpret here signifieth no more, than to render that intelligible to people, which he first uttereth in an unknown tongue. But what need he pray for that? Hath not every man that can speak a power to speak his native language, as well as a foreign language? Some say, therefore, that λα in this place signifies also, let him pray and also interpret; but this seemeth hard: nor can I think those that had a faculty to speak in an unknown tongue, might some of them not themselves understand what they said, and so had need to pray that they might interpret: but they might be puffed up with their gift, and think it beneath them to interpret, and then they had need to pray that they might have humility enough to interpret. Others think, that by interpreting in this place, is meant something more than bare translating, or turning the words into the common language of the place, viz. the opening and applying of the Scriptures, an ability to which was a distinct gift: which they who would have, had need pray that God would open their eyes to understand the mysteries of his law.

14 For if I pray in an unknown tongue, my spirit prayeth, but my understanding is unfruitful.

From this and the former verse, the papists would justify the lawfulness of their Latin service, which none or few of the common people understand; and they seem to have a little advantage from the opinion of some of the ancients, That some of those who spake with tongues, did not themselves understand what they uttered, but the Spirit of God only made use of their tongues as machines. But these are apprehensions much beneath the Spirit of light and truth, that it should make use of the tongue of a man for an end neither profitable to the man himself, nor others. Besides, how is it then true which we had, ver. 4. that he who spake in an unknown tongue edifieth himself? Nay, how can it be true, which is here said, that such a man's spirit prayeth? nor is it here said, my understanding is dark or blind, but unfruitful; that is, though myself understand, yet my knowledge bringeth forth no fruit to the advantage or good of others. My spirit prayeth, but others cannot pray with me.

15 What is it then? I will pray with the spirit, and I will pray with the understanding also: I will sing with the spirit, and I will sing with the understanding also.

e Eph. 5. 19.
Col. 3. 16.
f Ps. 47. 7.

What is to be done then? I will (saith the apostle) pray with the spirit; that is, either use the extraordinary influences of the Spirit of God upon me; or with my own spirit, with the inward attention of my thoughts, and the utmost intension of my mind, and the greatest devotion and fervour of affections. And I will pray with the understanding also; but I will so pray, that myself and others may understand what I say; I will neither so pray, that myself shall not understand what I say, nor yet so, that others shall not understand me. Understanding is here taken in a passive sense, though the active sense of the term be not to be excluded. The same thing he also saith of singing, to let us know, that all our religious acts in public assemblies ought to be so performed, that others may be benefited by them, which they cannot be, if they do not understand what we say, whether it be in preaching, praying, or singing.

16 Else when thou shalt bless with the spirit, how shall he that occupieth the room of the unlearned say Amen at thy giving of thanks, seeing he understandeth not what thou sayest?

Else when thou shalt bless with the spirit: blessing is expounded in the latter part of the verse, giving of thanks to God, which is either in prayer, (for thanksgiving is a part of prayer,) or in singing of psalms. Blessing with the spirit either signifieth giving of thanks with the inward man, or giving of thanks in an unknown tongue, by the extraordinary influence of the Spirit of God. How shall he that occupieth the room of the unlearned say Amen at thy giving of thanks? it is plain from hence, 1. That the teachers had in the apostolical churches distinct places and seats from the common hearers, for their better convenience in speaking, that they might so speak as all might hear, understand, and be profited. 2. That in those churches there was one only who used to speak audibly, and the work of the others was only from a devout heart to say Amen, wishing or praying that God would do what, in the name of all, he that ministered had asked of God for them. So 1 Chron. xvi. 36; Neh. v. 13: viii. 6; Psal. cvi. 48. Seeing he understandeth not what thou sayest: people ought not to say Amen to any thing, unless they understand that petition, or those petitions, to which, in the worship of God, they add their Amen, which word makes the petitions theirs, being a particle of wishing, as well as affirming.

17 For thou verily givest thanks well, but the other is not edified.

Otherwise, saith the apostle, it is possible that thou mayst give thanks well; but others get no good by it, nor can make any good and spiritual improvement of it.

18 I thank my God, I speak with tongues more than ye all:

Our Saviour, in the parable of the good shepherd, gives us this as his character, that the sheep hear his voice, and follow him, John x. 4; and we shall observe this great apostle every where propounding himself for imitation to them. They are bad shepherds over God's flock, that must only be heard, but not followed. The apostle lets them know, that God had not left him without the gift of speaking with divers tongues; nay, he had it in a more eminent manner than they all; put them all together, they could not speak with so many tongues as he did.

19 Yet in the church I had rather speak five words with my understanding, than by my voice I might teach others also, than ten thousand words in an unknown tongue.

Yet he had so great a regard to the end of his ministry, teaching others, and communicating Divine knowledge to them, that he had rather speak a little tending to that end, than never so much in a language which those to whom he spake did not understand.

20 Brethren, be not children in understanding: howbeit in malice be ye children, but in understanding be ye men.

Be not children in understanding; in understanding the differences of gifts, and which are more excellent, or of the right use of gifts. Howbeit in malice be ye children, but in understanding be men; you are commanded indeed in something to be like little children, Matt. xviii. 3, but it is not to be understood with relation to knowledge and understanding, but with reference to innocence and malice, which is opposite to it; ye ought to study to be men in understanding, though with respect to innocence ye ought to be as little children.

21 In the law it is written, With men of other tongues and other lips will I speak unto this people; and yet for all that will they not hear me, saith the Lord.

In the law it is written: by the law here is meant the Old Testament, (as in many other texts, John x. 34; xv. 25,) so called (as some think) in opposition to the words of the scribes. The words following are quoted out of Isa. xxviii. 11, 12, For with stammering lips and another tongue will he speak to this people. To whom he said, This is the rest wherewith ye may cause the weary to rest; and this is the refreshing: yet they would not hear. But there is nothing more ordinary, than for the penmen of the Scriptures of the New Testament to quote passages out of the Old, keeping not so much to the words as to the sense; nor quoting them all, but so many of them as serve for their purposes. The words in the prophet are a threatening, that because God had brought the Jews into Canaan, and promised them rest there, upon their obedience to his commandments, and they would not hear, he would now take another course with them, speaking to them with men of stammering lips, and of another language; meaning the Chaldeans and Babylonians, with whom in captivity they conversed afterwards for seventy years. The sense is much the same (as some think); for they that speak to others in and with strange tongues, are like those that stammer at others, which looks more like a mocking them than an instructing them. Others make the gift of tongues, under the New Testament, to be within the prophecy of Isaiah; as if the prophet's words contained both a threatening, to speak to the Israelites with the strange tongues of the Chaldeans; and a promise under the gospel, to speak to them with the tongues of the apostles and others, tuned to various tunes, as men of several nations could understand. Others make this the sense, as if the prophet complained, that the people were so mad, that they regarded no more God speaking to them, than they would have regarded one chattering with a strange tongue. And they think, the apostle checks them for being so ambitious of speaking with strange tongues, whereas their being so spoken to was by the prophet threatened as a judgment upon them. And yet they will not hear me, nor hearken to and obey me.

22 Wherefore tongues are for a sign, not to them that believe, but to them that believe not : but prophesying serveth not for them that believe not, but for them which believe.

Wherefore tongues are for a sign, &c. ; that is, an eminent product of Divine providence for the confirmation of the truth of the doctrine of the gospel ; signifying that the doctrine which was so delivered in every nation's language, must be from heaven, from whence the first ministers must have their power so to speak ; yet, doubtless, they were not only for a sign, being also a means, by which the knowledge of the gospel was conveyed unto those who could not have understood what the apostles and first ministers of the gospel said, had they not spoken to them in the language of the hearers. When he saith, prophesying serveth not for them that believe not, the meaning is, not only for them that believe not ; for prophesying is certainly of us to them that believe not, for their conversion, as well as for them that believe, for their edification.

23 If therefore the whole church be come together into one place, and all speak with tongues, and there come in those that are unlearned, or unbelievers,

Be come together into one place ; the phrase signifieth to one place, or for one and the same work ; the first seemeth to be meant here by what followeth. And all speak with tongues : some think that the apostle here, by all speaking with tongues, understands all, or many of them, confusedly talking together ; and indeed that is an error we shall find the apostle afterward reflecting upon them for ; but here I do not think it is intended, but only, many of you, one after another, because of what the apostle speaketh of prophesying, ver. 24. For if all prophesied in that sense, talking at the same time together confusedly, and unbelievers came in and heard, they would also, instead of being convinced, say they were mad. And there come in those that are unlearned, or unbelievers ; those that are heathens, or that did not understand the language you discoursed in. Will they not say that ye are mad ? would they not say you were men that had lost the use of your reason, to talk to men in a language you yourselves knew they understood nothing of ?

24 But if all prophesy, and there come in one that believeth not, or one unlearned, he is convinced of all, he is judged of all :

But if all prophesy : all here certainly is not to be understood of every one in the assembly, for all were not prophets, chap. xii. 29, nor could the speaking of a great number be judged orderly by the light of nature : it here must signify any, one or more, successively, interpret or apply the Holy Scriptures. He is convinced of all ; the heathens will see an order in this, and will stand still to hear and be convinced. He is judged of all ; seeing their wicked life and false religion judged and condemned by all those that so prophesy.

25 And thus are the secrets of his heart made manifest ; and so falling down on his face he will worship God, and report

God either, by an extraordinary providence, discovering to him that prophesieth the secrets of such a sinner's heart, and causing him that prophesieth to make them manifest ; or, by a more ordinary providence, (often experienced at this day,) directing the preacher to such subjects and discourses, as he that cometh to hear shall think directed to himself, and confess that he is the man, and be convinced of his errors, and converted, and turn to the Christian religion, and report that God indeed is amongst you. So as prophesying will have these two great advantages of speaking with tongues, God will be more glorified, and the souls of others will be more profited ; which makes the gift of prophesying much preferable to the gift of tongues.

26 How is it then, brethren ? when ye come together, every one of you hath a psalm, <sup>c</sup> hath a doctrine, hath a tongue, hath a revelation, hath an interpretation. <sup>p</sup> Let all things be done unto edifying.

By what followeth in the two next verses, one would think that some of them, in their church meetings, were so absurd, as, being endued with several gifts, they would be using them all together, one singing, another preaching, a third speaking with tongues, &c. ; but this is so apparent a confusion, that one must be very uncharitable to this famous church, to presume that they should be so absurd. Others therefore rather think, that those endued with several gifts, (of which he reckoneth five, under which he comprehendeth all others,) were every one contending for his course to exercise his gift ; one, for spending the time in singing the psalm he had made ; another, for spending the time in hearing his doctrinal discourse ; a third, for the spending it in hearing him discourse in an unknown tongue ; a fourth, for the spending it in hearing his revelation ; a fifth, for the spending it in hearing his interpretation ; or at least desiring the time might be protracted, until they had been all successively heard. Let all things be done unto edifying : to prevent this and other disorders, the apostle giveth several rules. The first is, That all things should be so done, as might tend best to promote in men faith and holiness ; that is and ought to be the main and chief end of those who any way minister in sacred things.

27 If any man speak in an unknown tongue, let it be by two, or at the most by three, and that by course ; and let one interpret.

Concerning the use of their gift of tongues, he directeth three things : 1. That every one that had it should not be ambitious to show it at all times, but two or three at most at a time. 2. That they should do it by course, not together, confusedly. 3. Not without one to interpret, that people might understand. For though these were extraordinary gifts, flowing from a more than ordinary influence of the Spirit of God, yet they were abiding habits, not coming upon them at some certain times, by an impulse ; for then they would not have been under human government, as it is apparent this gift of tongues was, else Paul could not have so governed himself in the use of it, as he lets us know he did, ver. 19.

28 But if there be no interpreter, let him keep silence in the church ; and let him speak to himself, and to God.

If he hath a mind to use this gift, he may use it to God, who understands all languages, by himself ; but let him keep silence in the assembly of Christians, where he is not understood.

29 Let the prophets speak two or three, and let the other judge.

That is, two or three successively, the one beginning to speak when the others have done, and two or three at the same church assembly ; and if there be more present, let them sit still and judge of the truth of what he saith.

30 If any thing be revealed to another that sitteth by, let the first hold his

There were two modes or sorts of prophecies ; the one ordinary, when the teacher came to those assemblies furnished with a revelation from some previous impression of God upon him, enabling him to give the sense of some scripture, or to open some Divine truth ; not as we are, but by some influence of the Holy Spirit upon him, without the use of such means as we use. The other was, by some present afflatus or impression. The apostle seems not to speak of the latter ; or if of both, he plainly lets them know, that even such a one was under the government of natural order, and obliged to do nothing confusedly and tumultuously, but might, without any offence to God, stay until the other had finished his discourse.

31 For ye may all prophesy one by one, that all may learn, and all may be comforted.

Ye may not all prophesy in the same day, or hour, or moment of time, but orderly and successively ye may all prophesy, the end of it being for the instruction and consolation of all; which may mind you so to govern yourselves in the exercise of that gift, as not to lose your end, but that all may learn, and all may be comforted. Which lets us know, that though their receiving the gift of prophecy obliged them to an exercise of it, yet it did not oblige them to an exercise of it in or at this or that particular time.

1 John 4. 1. 32 And <sup>a</sup>the spirits of the prophets are subject to the prophets.

By the spirits of the prophets the apostle either meaneth their spiritual gifts, as to the use and exercise of them, and the actions to be done by them; or, the actions themselves, or interpretations pretendedly done and given by the exercise of those gifts, their doctrines; or, that instinct, or impetus, by which they pretend themselves to be moved to prophesy: these (he saith) are subject to the prophets themselves, so as they may themselves govern their gifts, or (which most think is the rather here intended) they are subject to the judgment and censure of others that are endued with the same gift. But here ariseth a difficulty, how the gifts of the Holy Spirit, flowing immediately from the Spirit, should be subject to any human judgment or censure? This indeed they could not, if the Divine revelation to this or that man were full and perfect, and ran as clearly in the stream always, as it was in the fountain. But God giveth his Spirit to us but by measure, and in the exercise of our gifts there is always aliquid humani, something of our own; and this maketh them subject to the prophets, viz. whether what they pretended to have from the Spirit of God were indeed from it, yea or no? Prophets were obliged to prophesy, Rom. xii. 6, but according to the analogy of faith: now, whether they did so or no, might be judged by other prophets, according to that rule. Others think this text is to be interpreted restrainedly, viz. as to this thing in this matter of plain, natural order, commanding, while one speaks, all the rest to hold their peace.

33 For God is not the author of †confusion of the saints.

Here he showeth the principle upon which he said, that the spirits of the prophets are subject to the prophets: what any prophets speak is not so certain, or at least not more certain, than this, that nothing which is confusion can be from God. Now, for two or three to speak together in a public assembly, is a confusion, and a breach of order, of which God cannot be the author: therefore, in such a thing as that, the spirits of the prophets must be subject to other prophets; and there is a general rule which concerneth not only the church of Corinth, but all churches.

u 1 Tim. 2. 11, 12.
34 <sup>a</sup>Let your women keep silence in the churches: for it is not permitted unto them to speak; but <sup>b</sup>they are commanded to be under obedience, as also saith the <sup>c</sup>law.

This rule was to be restrained to ordinary prophesyings; for certainly, if the Spirit of prophecy came upon a woman in the church, she might speak. Anna, who was a prophetess, in the temple gave thanks to the Lord, and spake of him to all them that looked for redemption in Jerusalem, Luke ii. 38: and I cannot tell how Philip's daughters prophesied, if they did not speak in the presence of many, Acts xxi. 9. The reason that is given why women should keep silence, is, because they are commanded to be under obedience. This apostle speaketh much the same thing, 1 Tim. ii. 11, 12, because it looked like a usurping authority over the man; which indeed is true, if it had been the ordinary practice of women to speak in the assemblies of the church; but not so, if some particular women sometimes spake upon an extraordinary impulse or impression: The law to which the apostle here refers, is thought to be that, Gen. iii. 16, where the woman is commanded to be subject to her husband, and it is said, that he should rule over her; yet that law did neither restrain Miriam from prophesying, Exod. xv. 20, nor yet Huldah, to whom Josiah himself sent, 2 Chron. xxxiv. 22, of whom it is also said, that she dwelt in the college. But setting aside that extraordinary case of a special afflatus, it was, doubtless, unlawful for a woman to speak in the church.

35 And if they will learn any thing, let them ask their husbands at home: for it is a shame for women to speak in the church.

This must be understood of speaking to the congregation, for the instructing them, or speaking in the congregation to the minister, or any of the people, for her own instruction, for the woman might, doubtless, say Amen to the public prayers, and also sing with the congregation to the honour and glory of God. But for her to speak in an ordinary course of prophecy to instruct people, or to call aloud to the minister, or any members in the assembly of the church, to be satisfied in any thing wherein she was in doubt, this she is forbidden.

36 What? came the word of God out from you? or came it unto you only?

These words look like a smart reflection upon divers members of this church of Corinth, who thought themselves wiser than all the world besides; and the apostle might foresee, that out of the high opinion they had of themselves they would much contemn and slight his directions. He therefore asks them, what they thought of themselves? whether they thought themselves the only churches in the world, or were the first that believed in Christ, so that the gospel went out from them, and they might give law to all churches? There were churches at Jerusalem, and in several other places, before there was any church at Corinth, so as the gospel came unto them from other churches, and did not go out from them to other churches.

37 <sup>a</sup>If any man think himself to be a prophet, or spiritual, let him acknowledge that the things that I write unto you are the commandments of the Lord.

If there be any amongst you who hath a conceit that he is inspired by God, and from that inspiration understandeth the mind and will of God, he must acknowledge, that I also am an apostle, and know the mind and will of God as well as he; and being so, that what I tell you are the commandments of the Lord.

38 But if any man be ignorant, let him be ignorant.

If any one will pretend ignorance in this, he is wilfully ignorant; for my own part, I will concern myself no further about him, but leave myself and him also to the judgment of God; let him be ignorant. In some copies it is, he shall not be known: in the day of judgment Christ shall say unto him, Depart from me, I know you not.

39 Wherefore, brethren, <sup>a</sup>covet to prophesy, and forbid not to speak with tongues.

The apostle concludeth his discourse, summarily repeating all that he before had said. He had, ver. 2, encouraged their desire of spiritual gifts; all along the chapter he hath been magnifying the gift of prophecy above the gift of tongues, as being of much more general use, and more for the profit of others; but he minds them here, that he did not forbid those to whom God had given the gift of tongues, to make use of it at due times, and in a due manner and order.

40 <sup>b</sup>Let all things be done decently and in order.

He forbade them not to speak with tongues, provided they did it decently and orderly, as all other things ought to be done in so grave an assembly as that of the church, and so grave an action as the worship of God. For women to prophesy in the public assemblies, was an indecent thing; he had said, ver. 35, that it was a shame. For many of them to speak together, confusedly, making a noise, that was disorderly. Nor did this decency or indecency, order or disorder, arise from obeying or disobeying the apostolical constitution, but from the law of God, the light of nature, the common usage of all the churches of Christians, as ver. 33. All things ought so to be done, (especially in religious assemblies and actions,) as they may not be judged by the law of God, or the light of nature, or the common custom of other churches, to be done indecently or confusedly, without order. It is very observable, that though the apostle, in these things, hath given rules, yet he hath determined nothing shameful or uncomely, but what he hath made to appear so, either from the Divine law, (as in the case of the women's prophesying, ver. 34.) or from nature and reason, (as in the case of many speaking at the same time,) it being useless to the end, which was teaching and instructing those to whom they spake, and what unbelievers would count the effect of madness, ver. 23.

CHAP. XV

From the truth of Christ's resurrection Paul inferreth the necessity of our own, 1—19. Christ the first-fruits, being raised, shall be followed in due order by those that are his, 20—23; till having subdued all enemies, he shall give up the kingdom to God the Father, 24—28. If there be no resurrection of the dead, in vain is it for any one to risk his life, as the apostle did continually, 29—34. The manner of the resurrection, 35—50. The change which shall be wrought at the last day in the bodies both of the dead and the living, 51—57. An exhortation to steadfast faith and perseverance in our duty, 58.

MOREOVER, brethren, I declare unto

The apostle, towards the conclusion of his Epistle, comes to reprove the Corinthians for an error in the doctrine of the resurrection from the dead; an error, though last mentioned, yet of all the most momentous. The resurrection of the body in the last day is an article of faith, to the firm belief of which reason speaketh not sufficiently, and therefore it was denied by many philosophers and worldly wise men, Acts xvii. 18. It should seem, that some in the church of Corinth had sucked in some of their notions; the apostle, therefore, in this chapter setteth himself to confirm that article of the Christian faith. To this purpose he begins, telling them, that that which he declared unto them was the gospel, that is, that doctrine of the gospel which he had before preached to them, and which they had heard, and believed, and embraced as the truth of God, and wherein the greatest part yet stood firm to their former profession, though some of them had been seduced and warped.

<sup>c</sup> Rom. 1. 16. <sup>2</sup> * By which also ye are saved, if ye
unto you, unless <sup>d</sup> ye have believed in vain.

By which also ye are saved; by the believing, receiving, of which doctrine, you are already in the way to salvation (as it is said, John iii. 18, He that believeth on him is not condemned; and ver. 36, He hath everlasting life, and shall be eternally saved): but not unless ye persevere (for that is meant by keeping in memory the doctrine which I have preached unto you); and this you must do, or your believing will signify nothing, but be in vain to your souls.

3 For <sup>e</sup> I delivered unto you first of all that <sup>f</sup> which I also received, how that Christ died for our sins <sup>g</sup> according to the Scriptures;

For I, in my preaching, delivered it to you as one of the principal articles of the Christian faith, which I received, either from Christ by revelation, (as he saith, Gal. i. 12.) or from Ananias, Acts ix. 17, how that Christ died for our sins, Rom. iv. 25, that is, that he might satisfy the Divine justice for our sins, and make an atonement for us. And this is according to the Scriptures of the Old Testament, where it was foretold, Isa. liii. 5, He was wounded for our transgressions, and bruised for our iniquities; and Dan. ix. 26, that the Messiah should be cut off, but not for himself.

4 And that he was buried, and that he rose again the third day <sup>h</sup> according to the Scriptures:

Not the death only, but the burial of Christ, and his resurrection again from the dead, were (though more darkly) revealed in the Scriptures of the Old Testament. Jonah and Isaac were both of them types of this; David prophesied, that God would not leave his soul in hell, nor suffer his Holy One to see corruption. Psal. xvi. 10; which Peter applieth to Christ, Acts ii. 31: so chap. xiii. 35. So that the doctrine of the New Testament in these things agreeth with the doctrine of the Old; with this only difference, that the Old Testament contained the New Testament in a mystery, and the New Testament was the Old Testament more fully and plainly revealed.

5 <sup>i</sup> And that he was seen of Cephas, <sup>k</sup> then <sup>l</sup> of the twelve:

We read not in the history of the gospel of Christ's appearing unto Peter, unless he were one of those to whom Christ appeared, as they were going to Emmaus; for which there is this probability, because when they came to Jerusalem, they told the rest, that the Lord was risen, and had appeared unto Simon, Luke xxiv. 34 (if Simon Peter be there meant). His appearance to the whole number of the disciples we have recorded, John xx. 19: they are called twelve, (though Judas was now dead, and Thomas at that time was not there,) because twelve was the number that God had appointed the college of apostles to consist of; so, Gen. xlii. 13, the children of Jacob said they were twelve brethren, though they thought at that time that Joseph (who made the twelfth) was dead. This is much more probably the sense, than the fancy of some, that Barnabas, who was afterward chosen to supply the room of Judas, being at that time a disciple, might at that time be with them; for admit he were, yet Thomas, we are sure, was at that time absent.

6 After that, he was seen of above five hundred brethren at once; of whom the greater part remain unto this present, but some are fallen asleep.

Of this appearance to above five hundred brethren at once the Gospels say nothing; but it is probably thought to be understood of that great meeting of the disciples in Galilee, where our Saviour promised to meet them, Matt. xxvi. 32; xxviii. 7, after his resurrection. Wherever it was, the apostle saith, that the greater part of them were yet in a capacity to give a living testimony to the resurrection of Christ, though some of them were dead.

7 After that, he was seen of James; then <sup>m</sup> of all the apostles.

The Scripture tells us nothing, in the history of the gospel, of Christ's appearing to James; but we read of two appearances to the apostles besides these, which the apostle had before mentioned.

8 <sup>n</sup> And last of all he was seen of me also, as of <sup>o</sup> one born out of due time.

Last of all the apostles, or, it may be, last of all persons; for after Stephen we read of none but St. Paul who saw Christ. Stephen, as they were stoning him, cried out, Behold, I see the heavens opened, and the Son of man standing on the right hand of God, Acts vii. 56. We read of Paul's hearing a voice from him, Acts ix. 4, and no doubt but he had a bodily sight of him, for he here reckoneth himself amongst those that were eye-witnesses. Nor is it any objection against it, that he was struck blind, for that was after his sight of Christ, not before. He calls himself an abortive, or one born out of due time, either because he was added to the number of the twelve; or in respect to his new birth, he being converted (as he tells us afterward) after that he had been a persecutor of the church of Christ, after the descending of the Holy Ghost; or, it may be, because his conversion was sudden, like the abortive birth of a woman.

9 For I am <sup>p</sup> the least of the apostles, that am not meet to be called an apostle, because <sup>q</sup> I persecuted the Church of God.

The least, not in dignity, or gifts, or labours; (he tells us, that he had laboured more than all, he had made the gospel to abound from Jerusalem to Illyricum; he hath in this Epistle let us know, that he spake with tongues more than they all;) but deserving the least esteem, as he afterward expoundeth himself, telling us, that he was not worthy of the name of an apostle. He gives the reason, because he had before been a persecutor of the church of God, the history of which we have, Acts ix. 1—3.

10 But <sup>q</sup>by the grace of God I am what I am: and his grace which was bestowed upon me was not in vain; but <sup>r</sup>I laboured more abundantly than they all: <sup>s</sup>yet not I, but the grace of God which was with me.

By the grace of God I am what I am; by the free love and goodness of God, I, that was before a blasphemer, and a persecutor, and injurious, have obtained mercy; and though it was impossible for me any more to requite and answer, than at first to merit, that love, yet his grace in me hath produced some fruit, and hath not been wholly in vain; for in the discharge of my ministry, as an apostle, I have abundantly laboured, though not more than all the rest of the apostles taken together, yet more than any one of them all, who were my fellow apostles: what these labours were, he told us, Rom. xv. 19; and more fully, 2 Cor. vi. 4—10. But lest he should be thought to arrogate any thing to himself, and the power or good use of his own will, he addeth, yet not I, but the grace of God which was with me. Grace seemeth, in the latter part of the verse, to be taken in something a different sense from what it was in the former part: here it signifies the free love and favour of God; though it may also there be understood of those gracious habits, which were the effects of that free love and mercy; here it plainly signifies those gracious habits which were infused into Paul, together with the gracious influences of the Holy Spirit, by which he was enabled to reduce those habits into acts. Paul had something in the acts he had done considered as a man, but yet so little, as in these spiritual acts he denieth his own efficiency, and attributeth all to Divine grace, either exciting him to his actions, or preventing, or working in and with him, and assisting him, and giving him all that success he had had.

11 Therefore whether it were I or they, so we preach, and so ye believed.

Whether it were I or they; whether I or any other of the apostles preached amongst you. So we preach, and so ye believed: this was one great point that we preached amongst you, that Christ was risen again from the dead. This we held forth to you as the object of your faith, this you received and closed with as the object of your faith; we did not only preach to you, that Christ died for our sins, but that he rose again for our justification. Neither was your faith objected only in Christ, as one that was crucified and had died, but as one that was risen from the dead. Thus Peter preached, Acts ii. 31; iii. 15; iv. 10; v. 30; and Stephen, Acts vii. 56; and Peter, Acts x. 40; and Paul, Acts xiii. 37; xvii. 3, 31; and so all the apostles.

12 Now if Christ be preached that he rose from the dead, how say some among you that there is no resurrection of the dead?

The apostle having laid a good foundation, proving the resurrection of Christ by a plentiful testimony of those who saw him after that he was risen from the dead; and minded them, that this was the doctrine of the gospel, which both they and all the rest of the apostles had with one consent preached to them; he comes to build upon it, and from this, as a main argument, to prove, that there must needs be a resurrection from the dead; and beginneth with a reflection upon some in that church who denied it. Who those were we are not told: some think they were Hymeneus and Philetus, mentioned 2 Tim. ii. 17, 18, who held that the resurrection was past; others think he reflects on Cerinthus, who was one of the leaders of those heretics we read of, who after Simon Magus denied the resurrection; others think they were some of the Sadducees, of whom we read in the Acts, that they denied the resurrection, or some of the Pharisees, who denied the resurrection of Christians, looking on them as apostates; others think they were some who had been tinctured, at least, with the doctrine of the pagan philosophers. We cannot certainly determine who, but certain it is some there were; and the apostle argues them in this thing to assert absurdly, upon this supposition, that Christ was risen.

13 But if there be no resurrection of the dead, <sup>1</sup>then is Christ not risen: <sup>14</sup>

If (saith the apostle) there be no resurrection of the dead, then is Christ not risen. But some will possibly say, How doth this follow? Suppose it true, that Christ be risen, how doth it follow, that the dead shall rise? The force of it lieth in several things: 1. Christ, as he saith, ver. 20, is the first-fruits of them that slept, the exemplary cause of our resurrection. 2. If we consider Christ as the Head, it is unreasonable, that the Head should be risen from the dead, and the members yet held of death, when it is the office of the Head to communicate sense, life, and motion to the members. Again, the argument is strong from the consideration of the end of Christ's resurrection, which was to show his victory over death, that the dead might hear his voice and live, and that he might be the Judge of the quick and the dead (which he could not have been, if the dead did not rise). Now though it be true, that Christ's headship to his church, and the apostle's argument from thence, will not prove the resurrection of the wicked, yet, (besides that the resurrection of believers is the main thing the apostle here proveth, having elsewhere abundantly proved the general resurrection,) the consideration here of Christ's being raised, that he might be the Judge both of the quick and of the dead, will prove the resurrection of the wicked, as well as of believers.

14 And if Christ be not risen, then is our preaching vain, and your faith is also vain.

Now, (saith the apostle,) if Christ be not raised, in what a case are you! and we also, who have preached his resurrection to you! Our preaching is vain and false, and your faith is so also, for the object of it faileth, which is a Christ risen from the dead.

15 Yea, and we are found false witnesses of God; because <sup>1</sup>we have testified of God that he raised up Christ: <sup>2</sup>whom he raised not up, if so be that the dead rise not.

16 For if the dead rise not, then is not Christ raised:

There is nothing in these two verses but what the apostle had before said, viz. That if Christ were not risen, the apostles' preaching and the Corinthians' believing were both of them vain and false. Only what the apostle, in the former verse, called preaching, he here calleth witnessing, We are (saith he) false witnesses of God. To be false witnesses for men, or in the name of men, is against the ninth commandment, and a sin of no ordinary magnitude; but to be a false witness of God, is a much higher sin. This title of witnesses was at first given to the apostles by Christ, Acts i. 8; afterwards often (especially in the Acts) applied to them, Acts i. 22; ii. 32; iv. 33; v. 32; x. 39, 41; particularly Paul applieth it to himself, Acts xxii. 15; xxvi. 16. It is true, the apostles, who either saw Christ while he was on earth after his resurrection, or in heaven, as Paul did, Acts ix., were in the strictest sense eye-witnesses; but yet in a larger sense this notion agreeth to all ministers, who testify, upon the hearing of the ears, and upon reading the Scriptures, the same thing which the apostles testified, though not upon the same evidence. Now to affirm a thing, as from God, for truth, which is in itself false, is a very high transgression; which (saith the apostle) we must be guilty of, if Christ be not raised; and if the dead rise not, then is not Christ raised.

17 And if Christ be not raised, your faith is vain; <sup>u</sup>ye are yet in your sins. <sup>25</sup>

That is, ye are yet in your estate of nature, under the guilt and condemning power of your sins, which are not yet pardoned to you; for no sins are remitted, but upon believing in the Lord Jesus Christ, which none can do, if Christ be not risen from the dead; for by that he was declared to be the Son of God with power. Rom. i. 4 : his death declared him to be truly man, it was his resurrection that manifested him to be truly God, God over all blessed for ever, and so the proper object of people's faith.

18 Then they also which are fallen asleep in Christ are perished.

Some think that the term in Christ in this text, is of the same significancy with for the sake of Christ, which would restrain it to martyrs; but I know no reason for that, because what is said is true of all; for it is plain, from what was said before, that if Christ be not risen from the dead, all that die must die in their sins, there being no object for their faith to work or lay hold upon; the door of salvation remaineth as fast shut as ever, so as those whom they looked upon as being asleep in Christ, must necessarily perish, if Christ be not risen; there is no forerunner entered into the heavens for us.

19 *If in this life only we have hope in Christ, we are of all men most miserable.

The apostle here argueth the resurrection of believers from a new head. It is not reasonable for any to imagine, that those who believe in Jesus Christ should of all others be the most miserable; but this they must be, if there be no resurrection from the dead. He enlargeth upon this head or argument further, ver. 30, 31. The reason of it is, because it must then follow, that they could have no hope in Christ beyond this life; and the condition of the apostles, and the generality of Christians, at least in those first and furious times, was a most afflicted state and condition. The apostle was in jeopardy every hour, ver. 30, he died daily, ver. 31. If any say, How doth this follow? for their souls might be in glory, though their bodies, once dead, were not raised? It is answered, 1. That it still must hold as to their bodily, fleshy part. 2. That those who denied the resurrection of the body, denied also the immortality of the soul. 3. That Paul speaketh upon the supposition of the Divine ordination; God having so ordered it, that the death of Christ, without his resurrection, should be of no avail to us to save either soul or body; and that our souls and bodies should not be separately, but jointly, glorified upon their re-union in the end of the world: 1 Pet. i. 3, we are said to be begotten to a lively hope by the resurrection of Jesus Christ from the dead.

20 But now <sup>y</sup> is Christ risen from the dead, and become <sup>z</sup> the firstfruits of them that slept.

The apostle returneth to his former argument, to discourse concerning the resurrection of Christ, who is by him called the first-fruits of them that slept; not of all that shall rise, (as some think,) for it will be hard to prove, that any benefit of Christ's death or resurrection, after this life, belongs to wicked men: nor is it usual for the penmen of holy writ to express the death of unbelievers under the gentle notion of a sleep; and, Col. i. 18, Christ is called the first-born from the dead, as he is the Head of the church. It is rather spoken with reference to believers; the resurrection of wicked men, flowing rather from God's providence, in order to the manifestation of his justice in the last judgment, than from the mediation of Christ. But here a question ariseth, How Christ is said to be the first-fruits of those that sleep, whereas we read of divers in Scripture that were raised from the dead before Christ was so raised? Answer. 1. Christ was the first that rose again by his own power and virtue. 2. He was the first who rose again, and died no more. 3. He was the first in respect of dignity. 4. He was the first-fruits of them that sleep, by his resurrection making a way for the resurrection of others, even of all such as were members of him; as the offering of the first-fruits, under the law, sanctified the whole crop.

21 For <sup>a</sup> since by man came death, <sup>b</sup> by man came also the resurrection of the dead.

Since by one man, viz. Adam, (who is also styled the son of God, Luke iii. 38, because he had neither father nor mother,) came man's subjection to mortality, sicknesses, and death here, and eternal death and misery in another world; it pleased God that by one, who though he was the eternal, only begotten Son of God, yet was also made man, and was flesh of our flesh, the resurrection of those that are believers, and asleep in Christ, should come, Heb. ii. 14.

22 For as in Adam all die, even so in Christ shall all be made alive.

As in the first Adam all men, that were in him, became subject both to temporal death, and all the afflictions and miseries of this life, which are so many little deaths, Rom. viii. 36, and forerunners of natural death, or attendants upon it; and also to that eternal death, which is the consequent of the guilt of sin, Rom. vi. 23: so in Christ, that is, through the merits of his death, and through his resurrection, all that are in him, being chosen in him, given to him, and by faith implanted into him, are not only spiritually made alive, (being passed from death unto life, 1 John iii. 14,) but shall be raised from the dead unto eternal life. But though this text doth not prove the general resurrection, (being only intended of believers, that are members of Christ,) yet it doth not oppose it. But that the all here mentioned is no more than all believers, appeareth not only from the term in Christ in this verse, but from the whole following discourse; which is only concerning the resurrection of believers to life, not that of the wicked to eternal condemnation.

23 But <sup>c</sup> every man in his own order: <sup>d</sup> Christ the firstfruits; afterward they that are Christ's at his coming.

In his own order, either with respect to time, or dignity, lest any should say, If Christ's resurrection be the cause of the resurrection of believers, then why did not all the saints, that were in the graves, rise with Christ? The apostle saith, God had appointed an order, and this order was, that they that were dead, or should be dead, before Christ's second coming, should not prevent one another, 1 Thess. iv. 15, &c. Besides, the order which God had set was, That Christ should be the first-fruits of this harvest, rising first from the dead, so as to die no more. Afterward they that are Christ's at his coming; then believers, that are members of Christ, by faith implanted into him, should also rise, but not before his second coming.

24 Then cometh the end, when he shall have delivered up <sup>e</sup> the kingdom to God, even the Father; when he shall have put down all rule and all authority and power.

Then cometh the end; the end of all the miseries and afflictions which believers meet with in this life, or the end of all our preaching and ministry, the end of the world, or the end of man; or rather, (as the next words seem to interpret it,) the end of that mediatory kingdom of Christ, which he now administereth instead of his Father, and shall manage to the end of the world. When he shall have delivered up the kingdom to God, even the Father: Christ shall then deliver up those keys of life, and hell, and death to his Father, yet shall not Christ's kingdom cease (for the prophet saith, Isa. ix. 7, that of it there shall be no end): Christ's essential kingdom, which is his dominion, which he hath and exerciseth over all created beings, together with his Father, and the Holy Spirit, (all being but one Divine essence,) that shall hold and abide for ever; but his mediatory kingdom, by which he ruleth over his church in the midst of his enemies, that shall cease, and be delivered up unto the Father. So that Christ's delivering up the kingdom to his Father, proveth no inferiority of Christ to his Father, more than his Father's committing that mediatory kingdom to him can prove his Father's not reigning, or inferiority to him, which it certainly doth not. It signifieth only the ceasing of that dispensation, or Christ's exercise of his mediatory kingdom on earth, in the rule and government of the church, and subduing his and his people's enemies. When he shall have put down all rule and all authority and power; then shall all rule and authority of kings and princes of the earth cease, and all the ministration of good angels, and power of evil angels; so shall all ministrations and governments in the church militant here on earth, and all those that are the enemies of the church shall be subdued and brought under.

The term until doth not signify the determination of Christ's kingdom then, though his mediatory kingdom on earth will then be determined. He shall still reign, but not as now, in the midst of his enemies, and in the exercise of his kingdom in the conquest and subduing of them.

If death be an enemy, (as we usually judge,) that also must be destroyed; and there is no other way to destroy death, but by the causing of a resurrection from the dead. So that the apostle proveth the resurrection from the necessity of Christ's reigning until all his enemies be destroyed, of which death is one; for it keeps the bodies of the members of Christ from their union with their souls, and with Christ, who is the Head of the whole believer, the body as well as the soul.

The apostle referreth to Psal. viii. 6, where the psalmist adotheth God for the privileges given man in his creation; amongst which this is one, that God had put all things under his feet: the psalmist afterward expounds that universal particle, ver. 7, 8, by all sheep and oxen, yea, and the beasts of the field, the fowls of the air, and the fish of the sea. But that that psalm, or some passages at least in it, are to be understood of Christ, appeareth from Heb. ii. 6—8, where the penman applieth it to him, as doth the apostle here; under whose feet all things are put in a much larger sense, and therefore the apostle expounds the affirmative, Heb. ii. 8, by a negative, he left nothing that is not put under him. But lest men of perverse minds should conclude, that then the Father also is put under Christ, the apostle addeth, that when he saith, he hath put all things under his feet, the Father himself, who is the person that put all things under him, is not to be included.

h Phil. 3. 21.

28 <sup>h</sup> And when all things shall be subdued unto him, then <sup>i</sup> shall the Son also himself be subject unto him that put all things under him, that God may be all in all.

i ch. 3. 23.

The Son's subjection to his Father, which is mentioned in this place, doth no where prove his inequality of essence or power with his Father; it only signifieth what was spoken before, that Christ should deliver up his mediatory kingdom to his Father; so manifesting, that whatsoever he had done in the office of Mediator, was done in the name of his Father, and by his power and authority; and that as he was man, he was subject to his Father. Suppose (saith Pareus) a king should have one only son, whom he should take into a partnership with him in his majesty and kingdom; but yet so, that the king should still have the pre-eminence of a father, the son only the dignity of a son in such power and authority: after which this king, having some subjects risen up in rebellion against him, should send his son with armies and his authority against them; he should despatch the work, and at his return yield up his commission to his father, yet still retaining the same nature he had, and authority with which his Father had before clothed him, as a partner in the kingdom and government with him. That God (saith the apostle) may be all in all; instead of all things which the heart of man can wish; or that God may exercise a full and perfect empire and government over all things; that the incomprehensible glory of God may fill all the elect. But is not God in this world all in all? Answe. He is; but he doth not so appear ruling in the midst of his enemies here. 2. The government will be altered; God here is sole King of the world, but he partly ruleth it by Christ, as Mediator, whose mediatory kingdom shall then cease, and nothing shall appear but the essential kingdom of God; the power by which the Father, the Son, and the Holy Ghost (three persons, though but one God) shall govern and rule all things, when all this sublunary world shall cease.

29 Else what shall they do which are baptized for the dead, if the dead rise not at all? why are they then baptized for the dead?

A very difficult text, and variously expounded. The terms baptize, and baptism, signify no more in their original and native signification, than to wash, and a washing: the washing of pots and cups, in use amongst the Jews, is, in the Greek, the baptisms of pots and cups. But the most usual acceptation of baptism in Scripture, is to signify one of the sacraments of the New Testament; that sacred action, by which one is washed according to the institution of Christ, in the name of the Father, the Son, and the Holy Ghost. It is also metaphorically used by our Saviour in the Gospels, Matt. xx. 22, 23; Mark x. 38, 39; Luke xii. 50, to signify a suffering for the name of Christ. And it is also used thus metaphorically, to signify the action of the Holy Ghost in cleansing and renewing our hearts, Matt. iii. 11, 12; John iii. 5. The last usage of the term is by no means applicable here. The question is, Whether the apostle meaneth here only, Why are men washed for the dead? or why are men baptized religiously for the dead? or why are men baptized with blood for the dead? For the popish notion, that baptism here signifies any religious actions, as fastings, and prayers, and penances for those that are in purgatory, there is no such usage of the term in Scripture; for though in Scripture it signifies sometimes sufferings from the hands of others, as in Matt. xx. 22, 23; Mark x. 38, 39, yet it no where signifies penances, or such sufferings as men impose upon themselves for the dead. Nor doth Paul here say, To what purpose do men baptize themselves? but why are they baptized for the dead? 1. Those that think the term here signifies washing, what shall they do who are washed for the dead? tell us, that it being a custom in many countries, for neatness and cleanliness, to wash dead bodies, the primitive Christians used that ceremony as a religious rite, and a testification of their belief of the resurrection. That such a custom was in use amongst Christians, is plain from Acts ix. 37: but that they used it as religious rite, or a testimony of their faith in the resurrection, appeareth not. And though it be ὑπὲρ τῶν νεκρῶν, yet they say ὑπὲρ is so used, Rom. xv. 8, for the truth of God, expounded by the next word, to confirm the promises. 2. Those that think, that by baptizing, in this text, the sacrament of baptism is to be understood, give us more than one account. Some say, that whereas they were wont in the primitive church, before they admitted persons into a full communion with the church, to keep them for some time under catechism, in which time they were called catechumeni; if such fell sick, and in danger of death, they baptized them; or if they died suddenly, they baptized some other for them, in testimony of their hope of the joyful resurrection of such a person to eternal life. Now admit this were an error of practice in them, as to this ordinance; yet if any such thing were in practice in this church, the argument of the apostle was good against them. But how shall any such thing be made appear to us, that there was such an early corruption in this church? Others say, that some, believing the resurrection, would upon their death-beds be baptized, in testimony of it, from whence they had the name of clinici. Others say, To be baptized for the dead, signifieth to be baptized when they were dying, and so as good as dead. Mr. Calvin chooseth this sense: but the question is, Whether the Greek phrase ὑπὲρ τῶν νεκρῶν will bear it? Others tell us of a custom in use in the primitive church, to baptize persons over the graves of the martyrs, as a testimony of their belief of the resurrection. That there was anciently such a custom, I doubt not; and I believe that the custom with us in reading of prayers over dead bodies at the grave, doth much more probably derive from this ancient usage, than the papists' praying for the dead; but that there was any such custom so ancient as the apostles' times, I very much doubt. There are yet two other senses given of this difficult phrase, either of which seemeth to me much more probable than any of these. To the first we are led by the next verse, And why stand we in jeopardy every hour? which inclineth many good interpreters to think, that the baptism here mentioned, is that baptism with blood mentioned by our Saviour, Matt. xx. 22, 23; and so the sense is no more than, if there be no resurrection of the dead, why do we die daily? why are we killed all the day long? for we do that in hope of a blessed resurrection. The only objections against this are, 1. That none but Christ himself useth the word in this sense (which seemeth a light exception). 2. That ἡπίρ των νεκρών is hardly capable of that sense; but yet our learned Dr. Lightfoot brings parallels of such a usage of the preposition out of the LXX. Others observe, that the apostle, in this whole chapter, is discoursing of the resurrection of believers unto life, and they are such dead alone, that he here speaketh of, for whom he saith any were baptized. Now, it is plain from Scripture, that baptism is a seal of the resurrection, signifying to believers, that they shall be made partakers of the death and resurrection of Christ (the resurrection being strongly proved from God's covenant, of which baptism is a seal, Luke xx. 37, 38); and being so, it confirmed the covenant, not only to the persons baptized, but to the whole church, as well the triumphant as the militant part of it; as well with reference to those of it that were dead, as those that were living. So that so often as baptism was administered in the church, so often God repeated the covenant made to his whole church, that he was the God of believers and of their seed: so that all who to this day are baptized, are baptized for the dead, that is, for the confirmation of God's covenant to his whole church, as well that part of it which is dead, as that part which is yet alive; and it testifieth, that those that sleep in Christ (although dead) yet live in the promise of the resurrection, because God is their God, and he is not the God of the dead, but of the living, as our Saviour speaketh in Luke xx. 38. In this variety amongst learned men about the true sense of this place, I shall leave the reader to his own judgment, although to me the two last seem to be most probable.

2 Cor. 11. 22. Gal. 5. 11. 30 And <sup>h</sup>why stand we in jeopardy every hour?

We are the veriest fools in nature, if there be no resurrection of believers unto life; for it is in the firm belief and hopes of that, that we are in danger of our lives, and all that we have, every hour of our lives.

31 I protest by ||your rejoicing which I have in Christ Jesus our Lord, <sup>m</sup>I die daily.

What is meant here by your rejoicing which I have, is something doubted; some understanding it of the apostle's rejoicing in them as believers, whom he had been an instrument to convert, and bring home to Christ; others, of their rejoicing in him (which seems not probable, many of them so much despising and vilifying him): others understand it of their glorying against him, and triumphing over him, and that this was one of his sufferings which he instanceth in, which he underwent in hope of a resurrection. The words are not an oath, (for here God is not called to witness,) they are only an attestation. As the prophets sometimes call heaven and earth to witness, so here he calls their rejoicing to witness; and this rejoicing seems to be the joy of those who amongst them truly rejoiced in Jesus Christ, for which also he rejoiced daily, they being the seal of his apostleship. That which he solemnly affirms, is, that he died daily; not only was ready to die daily, but in the same sense that he elsewhere saith, he was in deaths often, and that they were killed all the day long; suffering such afflictions as were near akin to death, and led on to death, as their end.

32 If ||after the manner of men <sup>n</sup>I have fought with beasts at Ephesus, what advantageth it me, if the dead rise not? <sup>o</sup>let us eat and drink; for to morrow we die.

Concerning this fight of the apostle with beasts at Ephesus, there are two opinions; some thinking that he indeed fought with beasts, and we know that in those countries such a punishment was in use, to bring out malefactors to fight with wild beasts; but as we read in the Acts of no such dealings with Paul, so that being a punishment rather for their slaves and vilest men, it can hardly be thought that Paul, who was a free-man of Rome, should be exposed to it. They seem therefore better to understand it, who interpret it of his conflict with men, who in their conditions and manners were like beasts; and that he doth not speak here of his scuffle with Demetrius, mentioned Acts xix., but some other conflict he had there, of which the Scripture giveth us no large account, but it seems to be generally and obscurely mentioned in the next Epistle, chap. i. 8, for this Epistle was wrote after his contest with Demetrius. By that phrase, after the manner of men, some think he means, as men use to fight; some have other notions of it: the sense seems to be plainly this, If I have fought with beastly men at Ephesus after the manner that men fight with beasts, exposing my body to their rage and fury, what profit is it to me, if the dead rise not? I have opposed myself to their fury out of a hope for a joyful resurrection; but if there shall be no such resurrection, the epicures, that resolve to stick at nothing, nor to deny themselves in any sensual satisfaction from meat and drink, have the best of it; all men had then best sing their song, Let us eat and drink, for we have but a little time to eat and to drink in; we know that we shall die, and there will be an end of us.

Do not suffer yourselves to be abused with evil and corrupt discourses of those philosophers amongst whom you converse, who argue from innate principles of reason against articles of faith; though you may judge that they talk but for discourse sake, yet their communication or discourse is naught, and will influence men as to things of practice, and debauch men in their morals. It is a verse or saying taken out of, or at least found in, one of the pagan poets; but containing in it much truth.

34 <sup>q</sup>Awake to righteousness, and sin not; <sup>r</sup>for some have not the knowledge of God: <sup>s</sup>I speak this to your shame.

Awake to righteousness, and sin not: sin is in Scripture compared to sleep, Rom. xiii. 11; Eph. v. 14, and that very properly; for as the natural senses are bound up in natural sleep, so the sinner's spiritual senses are locked up, so that he doth not exercise them to discern betwixt good and evil; and as he that is asleep is void of all care and fear, is secure, so the sinner is secure and void of fear. And repentance is set out under the notion of awaking; we are not only concerned to eschew evil, but to do good; not only to awake from sin, but to righteousness, that is, to a holy life and conversation, that is it which is here called righteousness, all spiritual rectitude being to be judged from the soul's conformity to the Divine rule; hence sin is called a crooked way, because it will not agree with the rule of God's word. For some have not the knowledge of God; for some amongst you have not a due and saving knowledge of God, or a right apprehension of the things of God; I speak this to your shame; though it be a shame for them that have it not, considering the light and means of knowledge which you have had by my ministry, and the ministry of others who have been amongst you.

35 But some man will say, <sup>t</sup>How are the dead raised up? and with what body do they come?

Some of your vain philosophers, who are resolved to give credit to nothing upon the account of a bare Divine revelation, unless they can give a further rational account of it in the circumstances, will be ready to object and say, How is it possible, that those very bodies which are putrefied, and turned into dust, and that dust, it may be, scattered to the four winds, should be raised up? And if the same bodies shall not again rise, what kind of bodies shall the believers have in the resurrection? Shall they be bodies that will need meat, and drink, and clothes, as our present bodies do? or what other bodies shall they be?

36 Thou fool, "that which thou sowest is not quickened, except it die :

He saith not, Thou fool, in anger, (which is that using of this term which our Saviour saith, Matt. v. 22, brings a man under the danger of hell fire,) but in the way of a grave and authoritative reproof, calling them fools for their want of a due understanding of the things and ways of God. He lets them know, that they might as well ask, how the grain of wheat, which they ordinarily sowed in their field, did rise again ; for that grain also rotteth under the clods of the earth, under which it is buried, before it again riseth.

37 And that which thou sowest, thou sowest not that body that shall be, but bare grain, it may chance of wheat, or of some other grain :

And when it again riseth, or shooteth up, it is not bare grain, without either stalk or ear, which was the body by them sown.

38 But God giveth it a body as it hath pleased him, and to every seed his own body.

But God giveth to every grain, or kind of seed, such a kind of body as it pleaseth him, and a several body, according to the nature of the grain ; yet none will deny, but it is the seed sown which cometh up, though with a different body, in respect of some qualities.

39 All flesh is not the same flesh : but there is one kind of flesh of men, another flesh of beasts, another of fishes, and another of birds.

Flesh is a kind of body, but it is of various degrees of dignity and excellency, in respect of the qualities of it : the flesh of men is of a differing excellency from the flesh of beasts ; and there is a difference in natural qualities betwixt the corporeal substances of beasts, and of fishes, and birds ; yet they are all bodies, they are all flesh ; our distinction betwixt flesh and fish, is but according to our idiom or propriety of speaking ; we read of the flesh of fish, Lev. xi. 10, 11.

40 There are also celestial bodies, and bodies terrestrial : but the glory of the celestial is one, and the glory of the terrestrial is another.

There are also celestial bodies ; such are the sun, the moon, and the stars. And bodies terrestrial ; men, beasts, birds, fishes, the elements, stones, &c. But the glory of the celestial is one, and the glory of the terrestrial is another ; now betwixt these two species of bodies, in respect of qualities, there is a very great difference ; the glory of the heavenly bodies is much greater than the glory of the earthy bodies that are compounded of the elements.

41 There is one glory of the sun, and another glory of the moon, and another glory of the stars : for one star differeth from another star in glory.

Amongst the celestial bodies there is a great deal of difference with respect to the qualities ; one of them is in glory much differing from another, the glory of the moon is not like the glory of the sun, and the glory of a star is much beneath the glory both of the sun and of the moon ; yea, one star is more glorious than another : yet they are all bodies, though of different species and qualities.

42 *So also is the resurrection of the dead. It is sown in corruption ; it is raised in incorruption :

So also is the resurrection of the dead ; that is, so shall it be, as to the bodies of the saints, in the resurrection. The same bodies of the saints shall rise, though with qualities, and in a condition, much different from what they were when they fell ; as the same grain of wheat shooteth up, though with another body : and as there is a difference betwixt celestial and terrestrial bodies, and betwixt celestial bodies themselves ; so there will be a difference betwixt the bodies of the saints, now that they are only of the earth, earthy, from what they shall be in the resurrection ; which difference he openeth in several particulars. It is sown in corruption, it is raised in incorruption : it is sown, that is, it dieth and is buried in such a state, that it is subject to putrefaction ; but when it shall be again raised from the dead, it shall be subject to no putrefaction or corruption : so ver. 52, The dead shall be raised incorruptible.

43 'It is sown in dishonour ; it is raised in glory : it is sown in weakness ; it is raised in power :

It is sown in dishonour ; it is raised in glory : there is nothing more uncomely, unlovely, and loathsome than a dead body ; but it will not be so when it shall be raised again, then it shall be a beautiful, comely body. We shall rise in a full and perfect age, (as is generally thought,) and without those defects and deformities which may here make our bodies appear unlovely. Daniel says, chap. xii. 3, the righteous shall shine as the stars : Christ saith, Matt. xiii. 43, they shall shine like the sun : the apostle saith, Phil. iii. 21, we shall be made like unto his glorious body. Three things make the body beautiful, a perfection of parts, the well putting them together and proportioning them one to another, and a well-tempered, cheery spirit ; all these will concur in the bodies of saints in the resurrection. The schoolmen determine, that much of the beauty of the saints' bodies in the resurrection, will flow from their perfect sight of God, and the reflection of God upon them. It is sown in weakness ; it is raised in power : when it dieth it is a frail, weak body, unable to resist injuries ; but it shall rise a strong body, with quick senses, and subject to no more weaknesses.

44 It is sown a natural body ; it is raised a spiritual body. There is a natural body, and there is a spiritual body.

It is sown a natural body ; such a body as all living creatures have by nature, which is upheld by the actions of the soul that quickeneth it ; both the vegetative powers, by which it is nourished by the use of meat and drink, the eating, concocting, and digesting it, &c. ; and the sensitive powers, &c. But it shall be raised a spiritual body ; spiritual, not as to the substance of it, (for in that sense a spiritual body is a contradiction,) but in respect of the qualities and conditions of it, Matt. xxii. 30 ; Luke xx. 35, 36. Bodies which, in respect of many new qualities they shall have, shall be more like angels and other spirits, than human bodies ; beautiful, incorruptible, free from infirmities, not subject to hunger, or thirst, or injuries from cold or heat, &c. ; not using meat, drink, clothes, physic, or marriage ; free, active, and nimble as spirits, 1 Thess. iv. 17. Spiritual, because they shall perfectly obey the soul made perfect, and be by it commanded to spiritual actions only ; of subtle, spiritual, refined constitutions.

45 And so it is written, The first man Adam was made a living soul ; the last Adam was made a quickening spirit.

The first part is written in Gen. ii. 7, God breathed into man's nostrils the breath of life, and so he became a living soul ; that is, a living substance, living an animal, natural life, by virtue of that breath of life which God breathed into him. The last Adam, by which he meant Christ, who in time was after the first Adam, and was born in the last days, and was the last common Head ; as Adam was the first, with respect of natural and carnal propagation, so Christ was the last Head, in respect of grace and spiritual regeneration, he was made a quickening spirit : he was made so, not when he was conceived and born, for he had a body subject to the same natural infirmities that ours are ; but upon his resurrection from the dead, when, though he had the same body, in respect of the substance of it, yet it differed in qualities, and was much more spiritual ; with which body he ascended up into heaven, clothed with a power, as to quicken souls with a spiritual life, so also to quicken our mortal bodies at his second coming, when he shall raise the dead out of their graves.

46 Howbeit that was not first which is spiritual, but that which is natural ; and afterward that which is spiritual.

Christ, the spiritual Adam, was not first in order of time, but the natural Adam, God in his providence rising from more imperfect to more perfect dispensations : and so it is as to God's providences relating unto us ; we have first natural bodies, we are born with such, we grow up and

Adam, who was the first man, was of the earth. Gen. ii. 7, and was of an earthy constitution, like unto the earth out of which he was formed; but Christ had another original: for though his body was formed in the womb of the virgin, and he was flesh of her flesh, yet she conceived by the Holy Ghost overshadowing her, and Christ had an eternal generation (as to his Divine nature) from his Father.

48 As is the earthy, such are they also <sup>f</sup> Phil. 3. 20, that are earthy: ° and as is the heavenly,
21. such are they also that are heavenly.

Such a body as Adam had, (which was earthy,) such all the sons of Adam have; and such a body as Christ now hath since his resurrection, (which is a heavenly body,) such a body also shall believers, who are heavenly, have in the resurrection.

And as believers, being the natural sons of the first Adam, have borne his image, had such bodies as he had while they lived here; so they shall also in the resurrection bear the image of the heavenly, the image of Christ; that is, have such bodies as was Christ's body after that he was again risen from the dead.

50 Now this I say, brethren, that ° flesh

Flesh and blood do not here signify sin, the unrenewed nature, (as some would have it,) but our bodies, in their present natural, corruptible, frail, mortal state; so the terms signify, Eph. vi. 12; Heb. ii. 14. Flesh and blood shall inherit the kingdom of God, (else our bodies could not be glorified,) but our body, as in its present state, till changed and altered as to qualities, till it be made a spiritual body, shall not inherit the kingdom of God. The latter words give a reason why flesh and blood cannot inherit the kingdom of God; because it is corruption, that is, subject to natural corruption and putrefaction, and the heavenly state of incorruption; the bodies of believers therefore must be raised up in that state of incorruption mentioned ver. 42, before they can be capable of inheriting the kingdom of God.

51 Behold, I shew you a mystery;

They might object, How can this be? there will be many saints alive in the world at the day when Christ shall come to judge the world, they will have natural bodies, such as they were born with, and grew up with in the world until that time. Saith the apostle, I now tell you a secret thing; for so the term mystery signifieth, Rom. xi. 25; xvi. 25, and in many other texts. We shall not all sleep any long sleep: some think all shall die, but some for a very short time, and then they shall revive. But we shall all be changed, either dying for time, or by some other work of God, their natural, corruptible bodies shall be turned into spiritual bodies, not capable of corruption.

52 In a moment, in the twinkling of

This change will be on the sudden, in a moment; either upon the will and command of Christ, which shall be as effectual to call persons out of their graves, as a trumpet is to call persons together; or rather, upon a sound made like to the sound of a trumpet, as it was at the giving of the law upon Sinai, Exod. xix. 16. We read of this last trump, Matt. xxiv. 31; 1 Thess. iv. 16. There shall (saith the apostle) be such a sound made; and upon the making of it, the saints, that are dead, shall be raised out of their graves; not with such bodies as they carried thither, (which were corruptible,) but with such bodies as shall be no more subject to corruption; and those who at that time shall be alive, shall one way or another be changed, and be also put into an incorruptible state.

53 For this corruptible must put on incorruption, and ° this mortal must put

God hath so decreed, that our flesh and blood, in the state wherein now it is, shall not be glorified; it shall be the same body as to the substance, but not as to the qualities; it is now corruptible and mortal, it must be put into ° state of incorruption and immortality, before it can enter into the kingdom of heaven.

54 So when this corruptible shall have put on incorruption, and this mortal shall have put on immortality, then shall be brought to pass the saying that is written, ° Death is swallowed up in victory.

That is, in an eternal and continuing victory; the saints shall die no more. The quotation which the apostle bringeth, is out of those two texts, Isa. xxv. 8; Hos. xiii. 14; which two texts, the apostle saith, at that day will have a more full, perfect, and eminent accomplishment, than ever they before had.

55 ° O death, where is thy sting? ° O

The apostle, in the contemplation of this blessed day, triumpheth over death, in a metaphorical phrase, Where is thy sting? what hurt canst thou now do unto believers, more than a wasp, or hornet, or bee, that hath lost its sting? O grave, or O hell, (the same word signifieth both,) where now is thy victory? The conqueror of all flesh is now conquered, the spoiler of all men is spoiled; it had got a victory, but now, O death, where is thy victory?

56 The sting of death is sin; and ° the

The sting of death is sin; if it were not for sin, death could have no power over man; sin is that which giveth death a power to hurt the children of men: The wages of sin is death, Rom. vi. 23. And the strength of sin is the law; and without the law there could be no transgression. The law is so far from taking away the guilt of sin, that, through the corruption of our natures, strongly inclining us to what is forbidden, it addeth strength to sin; sin (as the apostle saith, Rom. vii. 8) taking occasion by the commandment, and working in us all manner of concupiscence.

57 ° But thanks be to God, which giveth

The victory over sin and over death, we have both through the death and the resurrection of our Lord Jesus Christ; who by his death both delivered us from the guilt of sin, and also from the power of sin; and who through death destroyed him who had the power of death, even the devil.

58 ° Therefore, my beloved brethren, <sup>ae</sup> 2 Pet. 3. 14. be ye stedfast, unmoveable, always abounding in the work of the Lord, for-asmuch as ye know ° that your labour is

The apostle concludeth his discourse, proving the resurrection of the body from the dead, founding upon it an exhortation to holiness, which is here called the work of the Lord, because it is made up of works done by us at the command of Christ, and with direct respect to his glory in obedience to his will. He mindeth them not only to do these things, but to do them stedfastly, not by fits, but never turning aside from them either one way or another; and unmovably, so as no temptations, either from dangers, or rewards, or false teachers, should shake their faith, as to the principles that lead unto such a holy life, this especially of the resurrection from the dead. For as much as ye know that your labour is not in vain in the Lord; because they knew, that through the grace of God, and the merits of Christ, such works as these should not want their reward; for though the work of God be wages to itself, and Christians should not serve God merely for wages, yet it is lawful for them (as for Moses) to have an eye to the recompence of reward; and a greater reward than this of the resurrection of the body to eternal life, and that in a state of immortality and incorruption, in a spiritual and honourable estate, could not be.

CHAP. XVI

Paul directeth the Corinthians how to proceed in their collections for the relief of the brethren at Jerusalem, 1—4. He mentioneth his design of visiting them, 5—9; and commendeth Timothy, who was coming to them, 10—12. After some seasonable admonitions, 13—18, he closeth the Epistle with divers salutations, 19—24.

NOW concerning <sup>a</sup>the collection for the saints, as I have given order to the churches of Galatia, even so do ye.

The business of relieving the poor members of the church, is a moral duty, a sacrifice with which God is well pleased, Phil. iv. 18; our faith must work by this love. The apostle, in several Epistles, was very solicitous about this; he mentioneth it. Rom. xv. 26; Gal. ii. 10, as well as in this Epistle. Besides that our Saviour had foretold, that the state of the church would be such, that they should have the poor always with them; Agabus, Acts xi. 28, had prophesied of a famine, which (some think) raged at this time; and besides, the persecution at Jerusalem had scattered the brethren abroad, and being out of their country and employments, they could not but be at a loss for a livelihood, and so need the charitable contribution of other churches under better circumstances, as they were at this time in Greece. The churches of Galatia and Macedonia had been very liberal this way; and the apostle, by their example, quickens the churches both at Rome and Corinth, Rom. xv. 26; 2 Cor. viii. 4. As to this he had (as he saith) given order to the churches of Galatia, which, it is thought, he did in his journey through Galatia, Acts xvi. 6; and he ordereth the church at Corinth to follow that order, which followeth.

<sup>b</sup> Upon the first day of the week let every one of you lay by him in store, as God hath prospered him, that there be no gatherings when I come.

From hence both divers of the ancients, and very many late divines, argue for the change of the sabbath from the seventh day of the week to the first. It is plain from hence, that the gospel churches were wont to assemble upon that day; nor do we read in Scripture of any assembly of Christians for religious worship on any other day. On this day the apostle orders collections for the poor saints to be made, accordingly as God had prospered any in their employments; he directeth that they should every one lay by him something, not doing what he did with any ostentation, but having it ready when it should be called for: this he calls a treasuring (so it is in the Greek); monies laid by for charitable uses are treasures, both with respect to those for whom they are laid up, and also for ourselves; for he that giveth to the poor, layeth up for himself treasures in heaven. He would have no gatherings when he came, either to avoid the scandal of his being chargeable to them, or that he would have no delay, but when he came it might be in a readiness to be presently sent away.

The word here translated liberality, is the same which signifieth grace; their charity is called by that name, either because it flowed from their free love towards their poor brethren, (though living at a great distance from them,) or because their sense of the free love and grace of God to them, was that which moved them to that charitable act, 2 Cor. viii. 9.

<sup>d</sup> And if it be meet that I go also, <sup>e</sup>they shall go with me.

To encourage them to the more free and liberal contribution, he promiseth them himself to go along with those that carried it, if it were thought meet.

<sup>f</sup> Now I will come unto you, <sup>g</sup>when I shall pass through Macedonia: for I do pass through Macedonia.

Whether Paul, according to this promise, did go to Corinth, some question, because of what we read, 2 Cor. i. 15, 16. But others think, that he speaketh there of another journey, which he intended thither; and that he did go in a fulfilling of this promise, because we read, Acts xx., that he went into Greece, and spent there a considerable time; during which it is very probable that he did not omit to visit the church of Corinth.

<sup>h</sup> And it may be that I will abide, yea, and winter with you, that ye may bring me on my journey whithersoever I go.

He did stay in Greece three months, Acts xx. 3, but it is believed some things hindered him, that he did not winter at Corinth. It was the custom for some members of the gospel churches, to accompany the apostles some part of their way when they went from them to any other places, in token of their kindness and respect to them, Acts xv. 3; xvii. 15; xx. 38.

<sup>i</sup> For I will not see you now by the way; but I trust to tarry a while with you, <sup>j</sup>if the Lord permit.

I will not see you in my passage into Macedonia, for then I shall have no time to stay long with you; and I hope to gain a time when I shall stay longer with you; but all this must be understood with submission to God's will, who can hinder, and order my journeys, and determine my purposes, as he pleaseth. James teaches us, when we declare our resolutions to go to this or that place, to add, If the Lord will; and our apostle observeth that rule, Rom. i. 10.

He altered this resolution afterward, for, Acts xx. 16, he hasted, if it were possible, to be at Jerusalem the day of Pentecost. Pentecost was a Jewish feast, and not named here as a feast then celebrated by Christians, but as a known period of time; for the Jews computing time from their festivals, Christians who lived amongst them, and had some of them been converted from their religion, computed also their time from the Jewish festivals.

For God hath opened to me at Ephesus a great opportunity to preach the gospel, which I have reason to hope will also be effectual for the conversion of many souls. What this door of hope was, whether God had let him know there were many souls in that place prepared for receiving the gospel; or that some eminent persons for authority or learning, whom many were like to follow, were there already converted; or that he looked upon that famous city as like to be a place where many might be converted; is not told us. And (saith the apostle) there are many adversaries, (as it will appear to those that read Acts xix. and xx.,) therefore there was need of the presence of the apostle himself, whose authority might better stop their mouths, than the more inferior pastors could. What would have affrighted others from going or staying there, this great apostle mentions as an argument to cause him to make haste to go thither, and to tarry there for some time.

<sup>o</sup> Now <sup>p</sup>if Timotheus come, see that he may be with you without fear: for <sup>q</sup>he worketh the work of the Lord, as I also do.

He had told them, chap. iv. 17, that he had sent Timothy unto them, whom he there calleth his beloved son, and faithful in the Lord. Here he bespeaketh his welcome and security. It is probable he had it in commission from Paul to visit divers other churches in his journey to them, and therefore he speaketh of his coming as uncertain, but chargeth them, that if he did come, they would take care of him, that he might not be exposed to danger or trouble from any party amongst them. For he worketh the work of the Lord, as I also do; for (saith he) he is a minister of the gospel, and engaged in the same work of the Lord that I am.

<sup>m</sup> 1 Tim. 4. <sup>n</sup> Acts 15. 33. <sup>11</sup> Let no man therefore despise him: but conduct him forth in peace, that he may come unto me: for I look for him with the brethren.

Let no man therefore despise him; either because he is a very young man, 1 Tim. iv. 12, or upon any other account. But conduct him forth in peace, that he may come unto me; but when he cometh away, show him the respect you use to show me, conduct him in his way. For I look for him with the brethren; for I have need of his help here, in carrying on the business of the gospel; and therefore I, with the brethren here, expect him; or, I expect him with the rest of the brethren, who are in like manner employed abroad in carrying about the gospel.

<sup>o</sup> ch. 1. 12. & 3. 5. <sup>12</sup> As touching our brother ° Apollos, I greatly desired him to come unto you with the brethren: but his will was not at all to come at this time; but he will come when he shall have convenient time.

Apollos (as may be seen, Acts xviii. 27) was known to them, and had been a preacher amongst them, and was grateful to many of them; he was an eloquent man, mighty in the Scriptures, instructed in the way of the Lord, and fervent in the spirit, Acts xviii. 24—28; he was one of those from whom some of this church denominated themselves, chap. iii. 4. For these reasons Paul would have persuaded him to go and visit this church, (which some think that he had left, because of those contentions and divisions which were amongst them,) but he had no mind to go at that time; though it is said, that he afterwards did return again to them, when Paul, by his Epistle, had quieted those divisions, and allayed their heats.

Watch ye: watching, in its usual acceptation, signifieth a forbearing of sleep; and that in order to some end. Sin is set out under the notion of sleep, Eph. v. 14; so that spiritual watching signifies a diligent abstaining from sin, and from whatsoever may be to us a temptation to sin against God, in order to the perfecting of holiness, and the obtaining life and immortality. Stand fast in the faith; be steady in the profession of the truth, and holding close to the doctrine of faith. Quit you like men, be strong; you are as soldiers fighting against the world, the flesh, and the devil; do not behave yourselves like children, whom the least opposition will terrify and throw down; but like men, with a spiritual courage and fortitude, becoming such who have so good a Captain, and so good a cause.

Charity (as hath been before discoursed) is a term comprehensive both of love to God, and to our neighbour; the failure of this in their divisions and contentions, and satisfying their own judgments and humours, without regard to the consciences of others, and having no regard to the profit of others, is that which the apostle, in this Epistle, had once and again blamed in the members of this church; in the conclusion of his Epistle, he therefore again recommends to them the getting and exercising of this habit.

<sup>t</sup> ch. 1. 16. <sup>u</sup> Rom. 16. 5. <sup>15</sup> I beseech you, brethren, (ye know the house of Stephanas, that it is the firstfruits of Achaia, and that they have addicted themselves to the ministry of the saints,)

Of this Stephanas we read before, chap. i. 16; his family was one of those few families which Paul baptized: he is here called the first-fruits of Achaia, because (as it should seem) he was one of the first of all those who in that country received the gospel. He further saith of him, that he had given up himself to the ministry of the saints, either in preaching the gospel, or (which is more probable) in the proper employment of a deacon, in relieving such amongst the saints (whether of that or other churches) as were in want.

<sup>v</sup> Heb. 13. 17. <sup>16</sup> That ye submit yourselves unto us, and to every one that helpeth with us, and laboureth.

He adviseth them to reverence him, and all such as were helpers and labourers of that nature, and wrought with the apostles in the work of the gospel.

<sup>y</sup> 1 Thess. 5. 12. <sup>18</sup> For they have refreshed my spirit and your's: therefore acknowledge ye them that are such.

It should seem that this church had sent these three persons to Paul at this time (as most think) at Ephesus, to acquaint him with the state of their churches; these men supplied the want of that whole church's coming, or they made a report to the apostle of the Corinthians more fully than they had done in their letters. He adds, that they had refreshed his spirit, not with bringing him any money, (for the apostle hath told us, chap. ix. 15, that he gloried in this, that he had preached the gospel to them freely, without being any charge to them,) but by their visit, and the conference that he had had with them about the state of that church. The apostle addeth, that they had refreshed their spirits also; intimating, that their joy was his, and that what was a refreshing to him, ought also to be so to them; he therefore recommendeth these men, and such as they were, to be revered and respected by this church.

<sup>z</sup> Rom. 16. 5, 15. <sup>19</sup> The churches of Asia salute you. Aquila and Priscilla salute you much in the Lord, with the church that is in their house.

He meaneth the Lesser Asia, in which was Ephesus; from whence it is more probable (according to the Arabic and Syriac opinion) that this Epistle was written, than from Philippi (according to the copy followed by our translators). And that which further adds to that probability is, that the apostle mentioneth the salutations of Aquila and Priscilla, as persons that were at that time with him; now, that they lived at Ephesus, or at least went thither with Paul, and tarried there, appeareth from Acts xviii. 19: their saluting the church of Corinth in the Lord, signifies their wishing them all spiritual blessings in and from Christ. But what is meant by the church in their house, which joined with Paul in this salutation, is not so plain: we read the like, Col. iv. 15, of the church in Nymphas's house; and in Philemon's house, Philem. 2; and the same again of this Aquila and Priscilla, Rom. xvi. 5. Some think that it signifieth no more, than that their whole families had received the Christian faith; others think, that divers other Christians sojourned with them; others, that the church was wont to meet in some room in their house: but the last is not probable, either that in those times the church kept their meetings in any one stated place, or that Christians then had such spacious houses as could afford a room large enough for the whole church to meet in.

This proveth no more, than that as it is in use with us to salute one another with a kiss when we meet; so it was in use in those times and countries to do the like, in token of love and friendship. It is called the kiss of charity, 1 Pet. v. 14. The apostle requireth, that in these salutations they should have chaste and holy thoughts. This seemeth to be all meant by the holy kiss, mentioned Rom. xvi. 16; 2 Cor. xiii. 12; 1 Thess. v. 26, and here.

These words are judged to signify to us, that though the former part of the Epistle was written out of Paul's copy by some others, yet the three last verses were written by him with his own hand.

g Eph. 6. 24. 22 If any man <sup>e</sup>love not the Lord
h Gal. 1. 8, 9. Jesus Christ, <sup>b</sup>let him be Anathema i Jude 14, 15. <sup>i</sup>Maran-atha.

If any man love not the Lord Jesus Christ: love is an affection of the heart, but discernible by overt acts: the meaning is, If any man, by any notorious acts, declareth that he loveth not the Lord Jesus, whether he be a hypocrite, owning the name of Christ, but living in a contempt of and disobedience to his commandments; or an apostate, who showeth his want of love to Christ by denying him in an hour of danger and persecution, or an open enemy and persecutor of Christ and his gospel. Let him be Anathema Maran-atha; let him be accursed, let him be looked upon as a detestable and abominable person. Some tell us, that the Jews having three excommunications, this word signifieth their highest degree, by which the person was given up to the judgment and vengeance of God; but others say, there is no such term to be found among them, and that the term Maran-atha signifies no more than, The Lord is come. Let the Jews and other vain persons say what they will, the Lord is come; and if any love him not, let him be looked on as a detestable person.

Christ <sup>m</sup>be with you.

That is, The Lord Jesus favour you, and bless you with all spiritual blessings: this is the apostle's ordinary salutation, Rom. xvi. 24.

24 My love <sup>n</sup>be with you all in Christ Jesus.
Amen.

As I love you, so I desire to be again beloved of you in Christ sincerely. Or, I love you all in Christ, and for Christ's sake; or, I wish that my love may abide in and with you.

¶ The first epistle to the Corinthians was written from Philippi by Stephanas, and Fortunatus, and Achaicus, and Timotheus.

These words are no part of Scripture; and (as was said before) it is much more probable, that this Epistle was written from Ephesus than from Philippi, though it might be sent by these, or some of these, men named.

THE SECOND EPISTLE OF PAUL THE APOSTLE

TO THE

CORINTHIANS

THE ARGUMENT

CONCERNING the sacred penman as well of this as the former Epistle, and the church to whom this as well as that Epistle was sent, enough hath been said before. It is plain, that the apostle, when he wrote it, was in Macedonia; probably at Philippi, which was the first city of Macedonia, Acts xvi. 12, whither Paul went after the uproar that Demetrius had made at Ephesus, of which we read, Acts xx. 1. The occasion of his writing this Second Epistle seemeth to be, partly the false teachers' aspersing him, 1. As an inconstant man, because he had promised to come in person to Corinth, and was not yet come; the reason of which he showeth, chap. i., was not levity, but the troubles he met with in Asia, and his desire to hear they had first reformed the abuses he had taxed them for. 2. As an imperious man, because of the incestuous person against whom he had wrote; which charge he avoids, by showing the necessity of his writing in that manner, and giving new orders for the restoring him, upon the repentance he had showed. 3. As a proud and vain-glorious man. 4. As a contemptible person; base in his person, as he expresseth it. The further occasions of his writing were, To commend them for their kind reception of and compliance with the precepts and admonitions of his former Epistle, and their kind reception of Titus: as also to exhort them to a liberal contribution to the necessities of the saints in Judea, to which they had showed their forwardness a year before: and his hearing that there was yet a party amongst them bad enough, that went on in vilifying him and his authority, as well as in other sinful courses; against whom he vindicateth himself, magnifying his office, assuring them he was about to come to Corinth; when they should find him present such as, being absent, he had by his letters declared himself, if they were not reformed. The substance therefore of this Epistle is partly apologetical, or excusatory, where he excuseth himself for his not coming to Corinth so soon as he thought, and for his so severe writing as to the incestuous person: partly hortatory, where he persuadeth them, more generally, to walk worthy of the gospel; more specially, chap. viii. and ix., to a liberal contribution to the saints: partly minatory, or threatening, where he threateneth severity against those whom, when he came amongst them, he should find contumacious and impenitent offenders. He concludes the Epistle (as usually) with a salutation of them, pious exhortations to them, and a prayer for them.

CHAP. I

Paul saluteth the Corinthians, 1, 2; and blesseth God for the comforts and deliverances given him, not solely for his own sake, but for the comfort and encouragement of others also, 3-7. He telleth them of a deliverance he had lately had from a great danger in Asia, and expresseth his trust in God's protection for the future through their prayers, 8-11. He calleth both his own conscience and theirs to witness his sincerity in preaching the gospel, 12-14; and excuseth his not coming to them, as not proceeding from lightness, 15-22, but from levity towards them, 23, 24.

PAUL, <sup>a</sup>an apostle of Jesus Christ by <sup>A. D. 60.</sup> the will of God, and Timothy <sup>b</sup>our brother, <sup>a 1 Cor. 1. 1.</sup> unto the church of God which is at Co- <sup>Eph. 1. 1.</sup> rinth, <sup>c</sup>with all the saints which are in all <sup>Col. 1. 1.</sup>
Achaia: <sup>1 Tim. 1. 1.</sup>
<sup>2 Tim. 1. 1.</sup>

The will of God here doth not signify the bare permission, but the calling and precept of God; he was called to be an apostle, Rom. i. 1; 1 Cor. i. 1, making him a minister and a witness, Acts xxvi. 16. His joining of Timothy with him, showeth both the great humility of the apostle, and his desire to give him a reputation in the churches, though he was a very young man. The Epistle is not directed only to the church of God which was at Corinth, (the metropolis of Peloponnesus,) but also to all those Christians which lived in Achaia: by which name probably he doth not understand all Greece, (though that anciently had that name, from one Achaus, that was king there, from whom the Grecians had the name of Achivi,) but that region of Peloponnesus which lay in a neck of land between the Ægean and Ionian Seas; which obtained that name in a more special and restrained sense.

<sup>Col. 1. 2.</sup>

This was the apostle's common salutation, Rom. i. 7. See the notes on the former Epistle, chap. i. 3; where it is observable, that not the Father only, but the Lord Jesus Christ is invoked, and made the Author of grace, which is the free love of God, and of peace, which signifieth either reconciliation with God upon the free pardon of our sin, or union with men, and brotherly love amongst themselves. The heathens used to begin their epistles with wishing one another health and prosperity; but the apostle hath shown us a more Christian way, and more suited to the faith of Christians, who believe the love and favour of God the greatest and most desirable blessings.

mercies, and the God of all comfort;

It is a usual form of thanksgiving, Rom. i. 25; ix. 5. It is in use with us, signifying our sincere and hearty desire that both we ourselves might be enabled, and others by our examples might be quickened, to speak well of God, and to praise his name. This God is called the Father of our Lord Jesus Christ, that is, by eternal generation: he is also called the Father of mercies, because he is the Fountain of all that good which floweth to poor creatures. And upon the same account he is also called the God of all comfort.

4 Who comforteth us in all our tribulation, that we may be able to comfort them which are in any trouble by the comfort, wherewith we ourselves are comforted of God.

Who comforteth us in all our tribulation; us, who are the ministers of the gospel, (as it may appear by what followeth,) for the apostle saith, that God doth it, that ministers might, from the comforts wherewith God had comforted them, be able to comfort his people when they are under any trouble, either of body or mind, by the same methods and arguments which the Holy Spirit had used and brought to their minds under trouble to relieve any of them. Two things are observable from this verse: 1. That the apostle attributeth all the support, relief, and comfort, which he had under any tribulation, to God, as the Fountain and Author of all mercy; for though possibly our comforts may be caused from the application of some promises in holy writ, either called to our minds by the act of our own minds, or brought to our remembrance by some others; yet it is God who must make those plasters to stick, and to become healing and sanative to our souls: so that he is the principal efficient cause, though the Scriptures, or men, may be instrumental causes. 2. That the gifts, graces, and mercies that God bestowed upon his ministers, are bestowed upon them, not merely for their own use, but for the use and good of others; to enable them to be serviceable in doing good to others' souls.

abound in us, so our consolation also aboundeth by Christ.

He calleth his and the other apostles' sufferings, the sufferings of Christ, either because they were sufferings for Christ, that is, for doing the work which Christ had given them to do; or his and their personal sufferings, as members of that body of which Christ is the Head. Christ calleth Saul's persecuting the saints, a persecuting of himself, Acts ix. 4. Thus we read of Paul's filling up that which is behind of the afflictions of Christ, Col. i. 24. So our consolation also aboundeth by Christ; but, saith the apostle, blessed be God, as we have many sufferings for Christ, so also we have many consolations by Christ. Christ, as God, is the efficient cause of the saints' consolation; as Mediator, dying for us, he is the meritorious cause; and it is by his Spirit (who is called the Comforter) that they are applied to us.

6 And whether we be afflicted, <sup>f ch. 4. 16.</sup> it is for your consolation and salvation, which || is effectual in the enduring of the same sufferings which we also suffer: or whether we be comforted, <sup>|| Or, is wrought.</sup> it is for your consolation and salvation.

And whether we be afflicted, it is for your consolation and salvation; our sufferings tend to your consolation and salvation, your souls being upheld and supported by the sight of our boldness, and courage, and confidence in our sufferings: thus, Phil. i. 13, 14, My bonds in Christ are manifest in all the palace, and in all other places; and many of the brethren in the Lord, wazing confident by my bonds, are much more bold to speak the word without fear. And his sufferings also were for their salvation, as they encouraged them to suffer also; and, if we suffer with him, we shall reign with him; and our light and momentary afflictions shall work for us a far more exceeding and eternal weight of glory, chap. iv. 17. Which is effectual in the enduring of the same sufferings which we also suffer; and (saith the apostle) our suffering hath had a good effect amongst you, while you, with faith and patience, endure sufferings of the same sort which we endure and suffer. Or whether we be comforted, it is for your consolation and salvation; and if we be supported, upheld, and comforted under our sufferings, the advantage of this also redoundeth to you, as you are encouraged to suffer for the gospel and profession of Christ, from seeing how God supporteth us under our sufferings.

7 And our hope of you is steadfast, knowing, that <sup>g Rom. 8. 17.</sup> <sup>2 Tim. 2. 12.</sup> as ye are partakers of the sufferings, so shall ye be also of the consolation.

We have a steadfast hope of you, that as you have endured sufferings for Christ and his gospel, so you will still endure them, as we have done. And we know, that as you are partakers of the sufferings of Christ and his gospel, so you shall also share in those Divine consolations that those feel who endure such sufferings.

8 For we would not, brethren, have you ignorant of <sup>h Acts 19. 23.</sup> <sup>1 Cor. 15. 32.</sup> <sup>& 16. 9.</sup> our trouble which came to us in Asia, that we were pressed out of measure, above strength, insomuch that we despaired even of life:

We are at a great loss to determine what these troubles were in Asia, of which the apostle doth here speak. We read of several troubles Paul met with in Asia: it was there he was in danger through the tumult raised by Demetrius, Acts xix. 23. It was there (at Ephesus) where he fought with beasts after the manner of men, as he told us in the former Epistle, chap. xv. 32. Whoso readeth chap. xix. and xx. of the Acts, will find the largest account we have in Scripture of the troubles Paul met with in Asia. But this Epistle is thought to have been written at a time that will not agree to the time of those troubles; therefore they are thought to have been some troubles of which we have a mention no where else in holy writ. We were pressed out of measure, above strength, insomuch that we despaired even of life: whatsoever they were, this text tells us they were very great, and above his natural strength to have borne; some think, above the strength of ordinary Christians, insomuch that if the apostle had not found the more than ordinary assistances of the Spirit of God, he could not have stood under them.

9 But we had the || sentence of death in ourselves, that we should <sup>i Or, answer.</sup> <sup>1 Jer. 17. 5, 7.</sup> not trust in ourselves, but in God which raiseth the dead:

But we had the sentence of death in ourselves; we verily thought we should have been killed; and so it is expounded by the last words of the former verse, we despaired even of life. And this God did to teach us, that we should, when we are in dangers, look above the creature, and have no confidence in created means, but only look up to him, who raiseth the dead; as Abraham offered up Isaac, Heb. xi. 17—19, accounting that God was able to raise him up, even from the dead. Abraham had a promise to bottom such a faith upon; God had told him, That in Isaac his seed should be called: so had Paul, God having revealed to him, that he had a further work for him to do. So have not all Christians; we do not know our courses, nor what work God hath in his eternal counsels laid out for us, and therefore cannot be confident of deliverances in this life by the Almighty power of God; but yet we, under our greatest trials, may trust in God, who will certainly raise us from the dead; of which faith we have an instance in Job, chap. xix. 25—27. However, for our comfort in our distresses we may observe, That God, in his great deliverances of his people, useth to suffer them first to be brought to the greatest extremities; that in the mount of the Lord it may be seen, and that they may learn to know that their salvations are from him; more from his Almighty power, than from the virtue of any means they can use, though yet it be our duty to use what lawful means his providence affordeth us.

13 Pet. 2. 9. 10 <sup>a</sup>Who delivered us from so great a death, and doth deliver: in whom we trust that he will yet deliver us;

So great a death, in this text, signifies no more than so great a trial of affliction; as he elsewhere saith, he was in deaths often, that is, in dangers of death. Nor (saith the apostle) were we only at that time in danger of our lives, nor had we only at that time an experience of God's power, goodness, and faithfulness in our deliverance; but we are in jeopardy every hour, and experience the power of God in our deliverance yet every day. And it being for the advantage of the church of Christ, that our lives should be prolonged, (though we desire rather to be dissolved, and to be with Christ,) we are confident that he will yet deliver. Former experiences of God's goodness in delivering us out of troubles, ought to increase our faith, and beget a confidence in us, that God will yet deliver us, if it may be for his own glory, and our good.

11 Ye also <sup>h</sup>helping together by prayer for us, that <sup>m</sup>for the gift bestowed upon us by the means of many persons thanks may be given by many on our behalf.

Ye also helping together by prayer for us: faith ought not to hinder prayer; nor doth God's principal efficiency, as to any mercy or deliverance bestowed upon us, give a supersedeas to us, as to the use of any means, whether natural or spiritual, by which the mercy may be obtained. Nor are the prayers of the meanest saints useless for the greatest, or beneath their desires; men and women's favour with God depends not upon their order, station, and repute in the world. That for the gift bestowed upon us by the means of many persons thanks may be given by many on our behalf: by the gift here he means the deliverance before mentioned; which he calls a gift, to denote, not only God's principal efficiency in it, but his free bestowing of it: this gift (saith he) is bestowed by the means of many, because obtained upon the intercession or prayers of many. God doth therefore bestow mercies upon particular persons at the intercession of many others on their behalf, that he may not only have the praises of those persons upon whom he so bestoweth the mercy, but of those who have been so praying. The apostle hereby hinteth to us, that we ought no more to forget to give thanks for others, for whom God hath heard us, than to pray for them when in distress.

12 For our rejoicing is this, the testimony of our conscience, that in simplicity and <sup>n</sup>godly sincerity, <sup>o</sup>not with fleshy wisdom, but by the grace of God, we have had our conversation in the world, and more abundantly to you-ward.

He declareth the confidence that he had, that he should not want their prayers, because his own heart told him, to his joy and satisfaction, that however others might reproach him, as if he had carried himself deceitfully, or craftily, yet he had not done so, but had lived in the world in all simplicity and sincerity of God (so the Greek is). Simplicity is opposed to double-mindedness; where there is a composition in a man, a mixture of truth and falsehood, fairness in speech and falsehood in heart or action. Sincerity is opposed to hypocrisy. It is said to be of God, because he is the God of truth, hath commanded it, approveth it, worketh it, and disposeth the heart of man to it. This is opposed to fleshy wisdom, which prompteth a man to seek his own ends any way, good or bad. But (saith the apostle) we have had our conversation in the world, not by the guidance of any such corrupt habit or principle, but by the grace of God, the love and fear of God dwelling in us; or, we have done this, not of ourselves, but by the guidance and assistance of Divine grace, helping us so to live, and to have our conversation in the world. And more abundantly to you-ward; and more especially you are our witnesses of this, amongst whom we have preached the gospel freely, so as we have not made it chargeable to you.

13 For we write none other things unto you, than what ye read or acknowledge; and I trust ye shall acknowledge even to the end;

I do not tell you stories; the things which I write, and which you read, either in my Epistles to you, or to the churches of Christ, are what you know, must own and acknowledge, to be truth; and I hope you shall acknowledge them to be so to the end both of my life and yours.

14 As also ye have acknowledged us in part, <sup>p</sup>that we are your rejoicing, even as <sup>q</sup>ye also are our's in the day of the Lord Jesus.

In part, may either refer to persons or things; part of you have so owned and acknowledged us, though others of you have abused us. Or you have in part, or at some times, owned us, that you had cause to bless God for us, and to rejoice that God ever sent us to preach the gospel amongst you. And as some have owned us as their joy, or all of you have at some times acknowledged us as such, so you are also our rejoicing; we rejoice that God hath made our labour successful to your souls, and I trust, in the day when the Lord Jesus shall come to judge the world, you shall be more our rejoicing.

15 And in this confidence <sup>r</sup>I was minded to come unto you before, that ye might have <sup>s</sup>a second <sup>t</sup>benefit;

Being confident that my presence with you would be matter of rejoicing both to you and also to me, I purposed to come unto you before I went into Macedonia, visiting you shortly in my journey thither, that so you might have a second longer visit in kindness to you. We find, Acts xvi. 9, that Paul received his first call into Macedonia in a vision; we read again of his passing through Macedonia to go to Jerusalem: the apostle seemeth to speak here of the latter.

16 And to pass by you into Macedonia, and <sup>u</sup>to come again out of Macedonia unto you, and of you to be brought on my way toward Judæa.

He had purposed to take Corinth in his way unto Macedonia, and after he had finished his business in Macedonia, his resolutions were to have come back to Corinth, and to stay with them some time, hoping to have some of their company some part of the way toward Judæa: but it seems, though he thus purposed, yet God had otherwise ordered his motions.

17 When I therefore was thus minded, did I use lightness? or the things that I purpose, do I purpose <sup>v</sup>according to the flesh, that with me there should be yea, and nay nay?

When I therefore was thus minded, did I use lightness? though the apostle doth not in so many words tell us so, yet it is apparent from this verse, that some of the Corinthians had taken occasion from his not coming at this time to Corinth, to charge him with levity and inconstancy, as if his words were not to be regarded. It is very observable, how little things the men of the world will take advantage from, to vilify and lessen the reputation of God's faithful ministers and people. How many others might have promised to be in such a place at such a time, and have failed, without the reproach of the men of the world! who would have been so charitable to them, as to have excused them, by saying, They spake according to their present intentions and resolutions, but they were hindered by the providence of God; but if Paul fails, they will interpret it to be from the lightness and inconstancy of his mind: so charitable is the world to its own; so uncharitable to those who are not of the world, but by God called out of the world. From this imputation the apostle clearth himself, denying that he used lightness, and that his not coming proceeded from any levity or inconstancy of mind; for he did fully purpose to have come. Or the things that I purpose, do I purpose according to the flesh? or (saith he) did I purpose after the manner of carnal men, who make no conscience of their word, who promise and deny both in a breath? That with me there should be yea yea, and nay nay; should there be in me such a spirit, as to speak a thing with my lips which my heart doth not agree to? This lets us know, that truth and steadiness are things which do highly commend either a minister or a Christian, but especially him who is a minister of the gospel.

<sup>1</sup> Or, preaching. 18 But as God is true, our || word toward you was not yea and nay.

As God is true to his promises, so he hath taught me to be true to mine. Some make these words not to be merely declarative of the truth of God, but a kind of an oath, or calling the God of truth to witness, that his word toward them; by which some understand the gospel, or the word which he had preached amongst them (and of that indeed he speaketh in the next verse); but to me it seemeth much less strained, to interpret Paul's word, in this verse, of that word of promise of which he had before spoken, the promise which he owned before that he had made them of his coming to them. That word, he saith, was not yea and nay, that is, he did not make it with a quite contrary intention; but when he promised, he faithfully intended to have justified his word, and indeed to have come; but the providence of God, to which all men are subjected, had otherwise ordered him and disposed of him; which was the cause why he had not yet been as good as his word. It is very observable, how careful this great apostle was to clear himself from any imputations of levity and falsehood; and it should teach us to be careful to maintain our reputation in the world for truth and steadiness.

<sup>2</sup> Mark 1. 1. <sup>3</sup> Luke 1. 35. <sup>4</sup> Acts 9. 20. 19 For *the Son of God, Jesus Christ, who was preached among you by us, even by me and Silvanus and Timothy, was not yea and nay, but in him was yea.

The apostle here giveth a reason why he had made truth and sincerity so much his business (which reason obligeth us also, who are as much bound as he to study a conformity to Christ); saith he, The Son of God, who was preached among you, that is, Jesus Christ; who, though (as some observe) he is in these Epistles no where called God, but Lord, is here called the Son of God; which can be understood in no other sense, than by eternal generation; for those who are only the sons of God by adoption, are not the subjects of ministers' preaching. We read of this Silvanus, 1 Thess. i. 1; 1 Pet. v. 12: some think that he was the same person who is called Silas, Acts xvi. 19. Of Timothy we have heard before. They were both ministers, who (as well as Apollos before mentioned) had laboured in the gospel amongst the Corinthians. Was not yea and nay, but in him was yea: now (saith the apostle) that Christ, whom both I, and other ministers of the gospel, have preached to you, is not uncertain and unconstant, one thing at one time, and in one place, another thing at another time, and in another place. He was only one and the same; his doctrine was always certain and uniform, and consistent with itself; and our conversation ought to be suitable to him and his doctrine.

<sup>5</sup> Rom. 15. 8, 9. 20 *For all the promises of God in him are yea, and in him Amen, unto the glory of God by us.

As Christ was yea, and all his doctrine certain and uniform, so all the promises of God are yea; the promises of the Messiah have their yea and Amen in him; all the promises of grace, whatsoever is promised to believers, shall be verified by him, that so God may be glorified, and have from men the honour of being always esteemed a true and faithful God, one that cannot fail and falsify his word. But how are the promises of God yea and Amen in Christ by us? Answ. As the ministers of the gospel are the ministers of Christ for the explication and application of them. The promises are from the Father, through Christ as the meritorious cause, and internally applied by the Holy Spirit, while they are more externally applied by the ministers of the gospel.

21 Now he which stablisheth us with you in Christ, and *hath anointed us, is <sup>a</sup> 1 John 2. 20, 27. God;

The anointing here mentioned is, doubtless, the same mentioned by St. John, 1 John ii. 20, 27, by which is understood the Holy Spirit: so as God's anointing his people signifies his giving them his Holy Spirit, to dwell and to work in them; which Holy Spirit diffuseth itself throughout the whole soul of the believer, as the oil of old poured out upon the heads of the kings, high priests, and prophets. Believers are said to be anointed, because God hath, by his Spirit given to them, declared, that he hath set them apart to be kings and priests, a royal priesthood. The same God also establisheth their souls both in faith and love, and all in Christ; in him as our Head, and through him as the meritorious cause of all that grace wherein we stand. It is observable, that how much soever vain man may ascribe to the power of man's will, yet the blessed apostle attributeth all to God; both our anointing, the first infusion of gracious habits, and also our establishing. It is grace by which we stand.

22 Who <sup>b</sup> hath also sealed us, and <sup>c</sup> given the earnest of the Spirit in our hearts.

The use of a seal is for confirmation of the thing to which it is affixed; the effect of it is the making the impression of itself upon the wax: so as sealing us, both in this and other texts, signifies both the confirmation of the love of God to our souls, and also the renewing and sanctification of our natures, imprinting the image of God upon our souls, making us (as the apostle Peter saith, 2 Pet. i. 4) partakers of the Divine nature; but the first seemeth probably to be most intended here. And given the earnest of the Spirit in our hearts: we have the same expression, chap. v. 5; Eph. i. 14. We read of the first-fruits of the Spirit, Rom. viii. 23. The giving unto believers the Holy Spirit, and those saving spiritual habits which are his effects in the soul, are both the first-fruits and an earnest; for as the first-fruits assured the harvest, and the earnest is a sure pledge of the bargain, when those who give it are honest and faithful; so the sanctifying habits, wrought in the soul by the Spirit of holiness, are a certain pledge of that glory which shall be the portion of believers.

23 Moreover <sup>d</sup> I call God for a record upon my soul, *that to spare you I came not as yet unto Corinth.

Here is a perfect form of an oath, which is nothing else but a solemn calling of God to witness the truth of what we speak, whether promising or asserting. Those words, upon my soul, also have the force of an imprecation; but it is in a very serious thing: the apostle was deeply charged with levity, for not making good his promise in coming; and because he reasonably presumed, that some amongst them would be difficult to believe the true cause, to gain credit with them, he takes a voluntary oath, which in weighty matters is lawful (though sometimes it be done not before a magistrate). The thing he thus attests is, That he hitherto had forborne to come out of kindness to them; to spare them, (as he phraseth it,) which may either be understood of their purses, for he could not have gone without some charge to them, though he took no standing salary from them for preaching: or (as others possibly judge better) to spare their persons; for if he had come before they had reformed those abuses that were amongst them, he must (as he before spake) have come unto them with a rod.

24 Not for that we have dominion over your faith, but are helpers of your joy: for by faith ye stand.

Not for that we have dominion over your faith; not (say some) that we pretend or boast of any dominion over you because of your faith, as if upon that account we would be chargeable, and exact monies of you. But their interpretation is better, who think that by these words the apostle removes from himself, and much more from all inferior ministers, any power of imposing upon people to believe any thing, but what God had in his word revealed as the object of faith. He had in the verse before used the phrase spare you, which he thought might sound harsh in their ears, and give some occasion to carp at him, as if he designed some lordly power over them: No, (saith the apostle,) though I speak of sparing you, I intend no exercise of lordly power, but only to promote your joy, by removing those things which hinder your true rejoicing. Your present glorying is not good, while these disorders, contrary to the will of God, are amongst you; and you are full of contentions and divisions, which hinder your comfortable society and communion together, as one body. For by faith ye stand; the most of you stand in the faith (so some interpret this). I should rather make this the sense, by faith you must stand; if you err in matters of faith, (as some of this church had done in the business of the resurrection, as the apostle told us in the 15th chapter of the First Epistle,) you fall; you no longer stand than you keep the faith pure and uncorrupt. For, because of their errors as to the resurrection, I cannot tell how to make the apostle's sense to be what some learned men make it to bear, that he had nothing to blame in them in matters of faith, but only in some things referring to order; and therefore they need not to suspect his exercise of any dominion over their faith.

CHAP. II

Paul, having shown a motive of tenderness for not coming to Corinth, as also for writing his former Epistle, 1—5, declareth himself satisfied with the censure inflicted on the incestuous person, and desireth them to forgive and comfort him, 6—9; as he himself had forgiven him in Christ's name, 10, 11. His uneasiness for not finding Titus at Troas had caused him to go forthwith into Macedonia, 12, 13. He blesseth God for the successfulness of his labours every where, 14—16; professing his sincerity and disinterestedness before God, 17.

BUT I determined this with myself, that I would not come again to you in heaviness.

& 13. 10.

One reason why I put off my formerly intended journey to you, was, that I might give you time to repent, and reform those disorders that were amongst you, that my coming to you might neither cause heaviness in you, seeing me come with a rod, to chide and reprove you; nor yet in myself, who do not delight in censures and chidings, but must myself have been sad to have seen such errors and disorders amongst you, as I must by my paternal and apostolical authority have corrected.

2 For if I make you sorry, who is he then that maketh me glad, but the same which is made sorry by me?

When I am there, I have no refreshment or joy in that part of the citizens who are pagans, all my joy is in that part which are Christians, and constitute the church of God in that city: so as I could have had no pleasure or joy in my being there, if I had had nothing but occasion of sadness and heaviness from you, in whom was all my expectation of any joy or refreshing.

3 And I wrote this same unto you, lest, when I came, I should have sorrow from them of whom I ought to rejoice; having confidence in you all, that my joy is the joy of you all.

Gal. 5. 10.

This hath been the cause of my writing this Second Epistle to you, before I myself came in person, that you might have a time more fully and perfectly to reform such things as are amiss amongst you, and I have formerly given you notice of; lest when I come, instead of rejoicing in you, as I ought to do, or having any just occasion so to do, I might meet with that would give me nothing but trouble and sadness; which would not only be grievous to me, but would be contrary to your duty, for I ought to rejoice in you, and you ought so to behave yourselves, that I may have cause to rejoice in you. And I have confidence in the most of you, or in all you who are sincere, that you would all be glad to see me glad and cheerful, rejoicing in my society with you.

4 For out of much affliction and anguish of heart I wrote unto you with many tears; not that ye should be grieved, but that ye might know the love which I have more abundantly unto you.

Every man that deriveth from God, is in this made partaker of the Divine nature, that like as God doth not grieve willingly, nor willingly afflict the children of men, so neither will he; but if, by reason of his office or trust reposed in him, he be under an obligation sometimes to speak smartly, or to chastise and punish others for their errors, yet he will so do it as one that hath no pleasure and delight in it. Thus the good judge weepeth, or at least showeth sorrow and compassion, when he giveth sentence against malefactors. So, this great apostle, to whom God had committed a care over all the Christian churches, saw a necessity of reproving this church that was at Corinth, for enduring the incestuous person in their communion, and not casting him out; for their errors about the resurrection, for their divisions, schisms, and contentions, &c.: but he professeth that he did this with many tears; and those not shed in hypocrisy, but forced from the anguish and affliction of his heart; that he had nothing less in his design, than to put them to any excessive grief or trouble, but what he wrote was out of a principle of love and good will, both to the welfare of their whole church, and to the good of the particular souls of those that were the members of that church. Ministers or others do no good by their censures or reproofs, if they do not so dispense them, as people may see that what they do, or say, is out of their abundant love to their souls.

5 But if any have caused grief, he hath not grieved me, but in part: that I may not overcharge you all.

f Gal. 4. 12.

The particle if doth not here signify any doubting or uncertainty (for the incestuous person, of whom the apostle here, and in the following verses, speaks, had certainly caused grief both to the apostle, and also the church whereof he was a member). It is as much as although; or the apostle speaketh in this form, because by his repentance his grief was much allayed. But how doth the apostle say, that he had grieved him but in part? Some think he saith so, because the apostle's grief for his sin was now turned into joy by his repentance: others think, that those words, in part, signify that it was not the whole church that had grieved him, but only a part of it, viz. this incestuous person, and those who took part with him. Others say, the apostle saith, in part, to let us know, that it was not a grief to him only, but to them also. The last would bid very fair for the sense of the place, if the apostle had not in his First Epistle, chap. v. 2, said that they were puffed up, and had not mourned. So as I judge the second more like to be the sense of the apostle; viz. that it was not the whole church that had grieved him, but a part of it only; and therefore the next words are added, that I may not overcharge you all, that is, that I might not lead you all with that imputation, as if you were all involved in it.

6 Sufficient to such a man is this punishment, which was inflicted of many.

g Or, censure. h 1 Cor. 5. 4, & 1 Tim. 5. 20.

This verse maketh it clear, that by any, ver. 5, he mean-eth the incestuous person, mentioned in the First Epistle, chap. v., whom he had ordered to be cast out, and delivered to Satan; which (as appeareth from this verse) they had done, which is the punishment mentioned in this verse. They who think, that the punishment here mentioned was not excommunication, but another being delivered to Satan, and vexed by him, 1. Beg a grave question, viz. Whether delivering to Satan in this place signifieth any more than a casting of the person out of Christ's kingdom on earth, (which is his church,) and making him one of the world again, of which Satan is the god? 2. They seem not to consider, that if this church had delivered him to Satan, they could have done no more: so as the apostle would not have said, Sufficient is this punishment, when it was the greatest that they could inflict. Some object, that it is not probable that the apostle (had he been cast out of the communion of the church, for so notorious a crime) would have given order for his being restored in so short a time, as was that betwixt his writing the First and this his Second Epistle. 1. Some think, that he was as yet only under a suspension, and the church had not proceeded to excommunication: this opinion is favoured by the Greek word here used, which is ἐπιτίμια, the gentlest of all the words in use in that language to express punishment by. 2. Though in the times following the apostles', a longer time was set after excommunication, for testifying the repentance of sinners notoriously scandalous, before the church did again admit them into her fellowship; yet that it was so in the apostles' time, is more than appears. Possibly it might be so ordered afterwards, when, as the church multiplied, so sin more abounded; and they might, from many experiences of relapses, be quickened to make such orders. 3. The gift of discerning spirits was more usual in the apostles' times than afterward; so that though in following times, when the apostles were dead, and the extraordinary gift of discerning spirits was failed or abated, the church being not able any other way to judge of the truth of sinners' repentance, than from their changed life and conversation, which asked time, might set a longer time for such penitents; yet there might not be the same reason for the apostles doing it. 4. Notwithstanding any thing that appears, there might be the distance of a year or two betwixt Paul's writing these two Epistles. Which was inflicted of many: who these many were, by whom the apostle saith this punishment was inflicted, is a little disputed; whether the presbytery, or the community. Their opinion seemeth (to me) best, who think that the officers of the church of Corinth heard and judged of matters of faith, and reported it to the community; but he was not cast out without the consent and approbation of the community.

<sup>h Gal. 6. 1.</sup> 7<sup>h</sup> So that contrariwise ye ought rather to forgive him, and comfort him, lest perhaps such a one should be swallowed up with overmuch sorrow.

So that contrariwise ye ought rather to forgive him, and comfort him: forgiveness in this place doth not signify the taking away or remitting of the guilt of sin, (that is God's work, not man's,) but remitting of the punishment. And this maketh that probable, that they had not as yet proceeded with this person to excommunication, only kept him (like a suspected leper, without the camp) out of a communion with the church: or if they had actually cast him out, forgiving here can signify nothing but restoring him again to a full communion with them; which is also the comforting which is here mentioned. Lest perhaps such a one should be swallowed up with overmuch sorrow: it is plain from hence, that the apostle had intelligence that this person expressed abundant sorrow; otherwise he would not have expressed his fear of his being drowned in his own tears. Though the condition of such, at this day, is sad enough, who are regularly cast out of the communion of any true church of Christ, for crimes which deserve such a punishment, yet we must imagine it much sadder then. Now churches are multiplied, whole cities and nations are Christianized, and though a person be cast out of a church, yet it is not so taken notice of, but he may yet have converse with other Christians, &c.: but there, the greater part of the city being heathens, and the whole countries of Achaia and Greece (contiguous to it) being heathens; one cast out of the communion of the church (if he had the least sense of religion) could not but be deeply afflicted to be in such a case, as none but heathens and professed idolaters would keep him company, or have any intimacy with him.

8 Wherefore I beseech you that ye would confirm your love toward him.

That you would restore him to a communion with you in your church assemblies, and take him into the bosom of your church again, and be (as before) friendly towards him. The word which we translate confirm, is κυρώσαι, which signifieth authoritatively to establish or confirm. Some observe, that the apostle speaks to them as judges, to gain their good opinion, and make them more pliable, whereas he might authoritatively have absolved him. It is hard to say what authority the apostles had, or had not, to excommunicate; but we want a precedent in holy writ of the apostles, or any of them, exercising such a power, as being absent, and so in no capacity to hear the proof of any fact against scandalous persons. Paul (1 Cor. v.) writes to the church of Corinth to do it, and doth only himself command them to do their duty; and here again he writeth to them to forgive him, and restore him. There being no mention, either in the former Epistle, or here, of any command that the incestuous person should put away his wife taken unlawfully, or that he did any such thing in testification of his repentance, makes it very probable, that his crime was not using his father's wife as his wife, but as his harlot; had it been otherwise, we should, very probably, have read of something in the one or the other place, signifying such a command of the apostle, or the thing done by him.

9 For to this end also did I write, that

I might know the proof of you, whether ye be <sup>i ch. 7. 15.</sup> obedient in all things. <sub>& 10. 6.</sub>

As for other ends, so for this also I wrote my former Epistle to you, and I now write this Second Epistle to you also, that I might have an experiment of you, what regard you would show to that apostolical authority wherewith God hath invested me.

10 To whom ye forgive any thing, I forgive also: for if I forgave any thing, to whom I forgave it, for your sakes forgive I it || in the person of Christ;

The word so often repeated in this verse, and translated forgive, is χαρίζουμαι, which signifies to give, or gratify, or do a kindness, as well as to forgive; so as it needeth not always to be interpreted of any judicial act of absolution. If you see reason to remit any thing of the punishment inflicted upon the incestuous person, I am satisfied with what you do, I shall take no offence at you for it. If I have showed any favour to any person amongst you that hath fallen under my reproof and chastisement, it hath been for your sake, for the good and advantage of your church, or upon their motion and intercession; and I have done it sincerely in the sight of Christ (the Greek is, in the face of Christ).

11 Lest Satan should get an advantage of us: for we are not ignorant of his devices.

As I have done it in kindness to you, so I have also done it for the advantage both of that person, who is so forgiven, and of your whole church, which is concerned in the welfare or miscarriage of every individual member. Lest Satan should get an advantage of us: the Greek is, That we be not overcome by Satan; πλεονεκτείν properly signifies to get again, or to gain a superiority, to get the upper hand. The advantage Satan was like to get by their continuing severity to this offender, was either by his over-much grief, or by the hardening of his heart; so as he, seeing no probability to be restored again to his communion with the church, should be exposed, either to temptations to some desperate courses, (which are often the effects of minds full of sorrow and discontent,) or else to courses of idolatry or looseness, in giving up himself to the devil's kingdom in the world, because he could not be admitted into the church, which is the kingdom of Christ. For (saith the apostle) we are not ignorant of his devices, νοήματα, his thoughts and counsels, how he continually walketh about both like a roaring lion, seeking whom he may devour; and like an old serpent, seeking whom and how he may deceive. This lets us know, with how much prudence those who are trusted with the souls of others, ought to manage their reproofs, or severe dealings with others: the end of all these is the amendment and reformation of such persons, not their spiritual ruin and destruction; and all reproofs and censures must be given, and made, and managed with reference to that end. We have not only the concern of God's glory (which is the main) to be looked at, but the good also of their souls, whom we so reprove, censure, or alienate ourselves from: and indeed, without consulting this, we cannot consult God's glory; who hath told us, that he desireth not the death of a sinner, but rather that he should turn from his wickedness and live: and therefore we must have an eye about us, and beneath us, to the devil, as well as above us, to God; and prudently judge how such afflictive and harsh actions may be so done by us, that in the mean time Satan get no advantage, and we lose the souls of those with whom we so deal, instead of gaining them to God; which is the main and principal end we ought in all those actions to aim at, 1 Cor. v. 5; so 1 Tim. i. 20.

This Troas was either the city, or the whole country, called Troy or Ilium, or the lesser Phrygia. We read of Paul's going thither by sea from Philippi, Acts xx. 6, and of his having been there, 2 Tim. iv. 13. He tells us, that the business why he went thither, was to preach the gospel; for it was not the apostles' business to stay, as fixed ministers, in any one place, but to carry the gospel up and down the world to several places; which they did by virtue of their general commission to go, preach, and baptize all nations; though sometimes they had a more special call and commission, as Paul had to go into Macedonia. The door opened, either signifieth the free liberty he had there to preach, or the great success which God gave him in his work; which he elsewhere calleth an effectual door.

<sup>n</sup> ch. 7. 5, 6. 13 <sup>n</sup> I had no rest in my spirit, because I found not Titus my brother: but taking my leave of them, I went from thence into Macedonia.

He tells us, that when he came there, he was much troubled because he did not find his brother Titus; where the humility of this great apostle is considerable, in that he disdained not to call Titus (a person, though a minister, yet much inferior to him as an apostle) brother. Several reasons are given of Paul's trouble. That which is most probable is, that he did expect at Troas to have met with Titus come from Corinth, from whom he might more perfectly have understood the affairs of that church: not finding him there, he tells us he went forward into Macedonia; whither, after the uproar at Ephesus, he designed to go, (as we read, Acts xx. 1,) but went first into Greece, and stayed there three months, intending to come to Macedonia in his return, ver. 3.

14 Now thanks be unto God, which always causeth us to triumph in Christ, and maketh manifest <sup>n</sup> the savour of his knowledge by us in every place.

<sup>n</sup> Cant. 1. 3. Now thanks be unto God, which always causeth us to triumph in Christ: the translation of the Greek here is not certain; for to translate it word for word, it is, But thanks be to God always, triumphing us in Christ; which makes it uncertain, whether there be not a defect of a preposition, upon the supply of which it would be, who triumpheth over us in Christ, having subdued our hearts to the kingdom and obedience of Christ. But the most interpreters rather agree with our translators, and think the sense of the apostle is, who maketh us to triumph. In the Hebrew there is a conjugation, where the active verb signifieth to make another to do a thing; and there are several instances brought by learned men out of the Septuagint, where the active verb in the Greek also hath that sense; that which cometh nearest it in the original in holy writ, is that, Rom. viii. 26, where the Spirit is said to make intercession for us, because it causeth us to make intercession. According to this, the sense is, Blessed be God, who though we meet with many enemies, yet through Christ he maketh us more than conquerors, Rom. viii. 37, so that we are not overcome by any of them, but, on the contrary, we triumph over them as conquered by us. And maketh manifest the savour of his knowledge by us in every place; and this by manifesting by us in every place the savour of the knowledge of Christ; that is, of the gospel. He calleth it a savour, either with allusion to that sweet perfumed ointment, with which the high priest, under the law, was anointed, Exod. xxx. 23; Psal. cxxxiii. 2; or with reference to the incense used also under the law; or with relation to Solomon's expression, Cant. i. 3, where we read of the savour of Christ's good ointments, and that his name is as an ointment poured forth. By the savour of the knowledge of Christ here mentioned, the apostle plainly meant the reputation or good report that the gospel had in every place: see Hos. xiv. 7.

15 For we are unto God a sweet savour of Christ, <sup>o</sup> in them that are saved, and <sup>p</sup> in them that perish:

For the God whom we serve doth not judge of us, nor will reward us, according to our success, but according to our faithfulness and diligence in his work. We give unto all a good savour by our doctrine; and our labours are a sweet savour in the nostrils of God, whatever effects they have upon souls. God accepteth of our labours as to good men, to whom we are instruments of eternal life and salvation; and though others despise the gospel, and refuse the sweet sound of it, yet as to them also we are a sweet savour in the nostrils of God: Though Israel be not saved, (saith the prophet, Isa. xlix. 5,) yet I shall be glorified. It is not for any neglect in us, as to our duty, if any perish, but from their own wilfulness and perverseness.

16 <sup>q</sup> To the one we are the savour of death unto death; and to the other the savour of life unto life. And <sup>r</sup> who is sufficient for these things?

As sweet smells, which are to some pleasant and comfortable, are to others pernicious and deadly; so it is with the sweet savour of the gospel. The report which we in all places make of Christ, to some, through their unbelief and hardness of heart, and fondness of their lusts, proveth but the savour of death unto death, hardening their hearts to their eternal ruin and destruction; but to such who, being ordained to eternal life, believe our reports, and embrace the gospel, and live up to the precepts and rule of it, our preaching proves a cause of spiritual and of eternal life, to which that leadeth. And who is sufficient for these things? and oh how great a work is this! What man, what angel, is sufficient for it? It is a mighty work to preach the gospel as we ought to preach it.

17 For we are not as many, which <sup>s</sup> corrupt the word of God: but as <sup>t</sup> of sincerity, but as of God, in the sight of God speak we <sup>u</sup> in Christ.

Lest the false apostles and teachers in this church should slight this exclamation of the apostle's, and the pretended difficulty he made of the ministerial work, the apostle adds these words: I confess (saith he) it is no very difficult thing to speak of Christ, and pretend to preach and do as much as I do; but there are many κατηλείουρες, we translate it, corrupt the word; the Greek word signifies, to sell wine or victuals for money; and because such kind of people make no conscience to deceive, cheat, and deal fraudulently with their customers, it is sometimes used to signify corrupting or deceiving. We are not (saith the apostle) of the number of those who in preaching merely serve their own bellies, and turn the church into a tavern or victualling-house, making a gain of the gospel, and discouraging a little while in a pulpit for gain; and so making no conscience, either what they speak, or how they speak. But we speak by authority from Christ, and in Christ's name; clothed with his authority, and as his ambassadors; and so dare not say any thing unto people, and deliver to his people what he never gave us any commission to speak, nor yet to speak whatever cometh at our tongue's end; but we must remember that we are in the sight of God, and speak as from God of God; and that not fraudulently, but sincerely; sincerely aiming at the glory of God in what we do, and the salvation of the souls of them to whom we speak. This is a great work, first to consult the mind and will of God, and find it out by study and meditation; then faithfully to communicate it unto people, without any vain or corrupt mixtures (which do but adulterate the word preached); then to apply it to the consciences of those that hear us. Who is sufficient for these things? that is, to discharge the office of the ministry in the preaching of the gospel, as men ought to preach it.

CHAP. III

To obviate the imputation of vain-glory, Paul sheweth that the gifts and graces of the Corinthians were a sufficient commendation of his ministry, 1—3, the efficacy of which he uscribeth entirely to God, 4, 5. He proveth the superior excellency of the gospel ministry to that of the law, 6—11; and thereupon justifieth his plain speaking, as under a dispensation of greater light and liberty than that of Moses, 12—18.

DO * we begin again to commend ourselves? or need we, as some others, a ch. 5. 12. & 10. 8, 12. & 12. 11.
b Acts 18. 27. epistles of commendation to you, or letters of commendation from you?

The apostle, in the former Epistle, had spoken much in the vindication of himself and of his office; he seeth reason to return again to something of the like discourse, being provoked by the many imputations which the false apostles and teachers, in this church, had laid upon him: therefore he saith, Do we begin again? Or else these words may have a special reference to the last verse of the former chapter; where he had commended himself, as being none of those who corrupted the word of God, but had preached as of God, and in the sight of God. No, (saith the apostle,) though some others stand in need of commendatory letters, and are very careful to procure them, (by which others he very probably means the false apostles and teachers, which were Paul's great enemies,) yet I trust I need not any letters commendatory to recommend me to you, any more than letters of recommendation from you to commend me unto any other churches of Christ.

Ye are our epistle written in our hearts, known and read of all men:

Your Christianity, and embracing of the gospel of Christ, your faith and holiness, are instead of an epistle to me, to let the world know, both with what faithfulness, and with what blessing of God, and success upon my labours, I have preached the gospel; and you are such an epistle as I do not carry about in my pockets, or lay up in my closet, but it is written in my heart, where I carry continually both a thankful and honourable remembrance of you. Nor are you only taken notice of by me as a famous church, to the planting and watering of which God hath blessed my labours, and the labours of other ministers; but, as he saith to the Romans, chap. i. 8, Your faith is spoken of throughout the whole world, so he saith here. Ye are our epistle, known and read of all men; that is, all Christians take notice of you as a church to which God hath particularly blessed my ministry; so as I need no other recommendation than what I have from your receiving, and the proficiency you have made in, the gospel. Nothing so commends a minister as the proficiency of his people.

Forasmuch as ye are manifestly declared to be the epistle of Christ ministered by us, written not with ink, but with the Spirit of the living God; not * in tables of stone, but † in fleshy tables of the heart.

He had told them before that they were his epistle, his epistle recommendatory, the change which God had wrought in their hearts did more recommend him than all the epistles in the world could; but here he tells them that they were the epistle of Christ, it was Christ that wrote his law in their hearts, (which writing was that which commended the apostle, who himself had but a ministration in the work,) nor was it a writing with ink, but the impression of the Spirit of the living God. An epistle not written in tables of stone, but in the fleshy tables of the heart: he alludeth to the writing of the law, which was written in tables of stone, Exod. xxxi. 18, and also to the promises, Ezek. xi. 19; xxxvi. 26. That work of grace in the hearts of these Corinthians, which recommended the apostle, was wrought by Christ, and the apostles were but ministers in the working of it; it was a work more admirable than the writing of the law in tables of stone, and this work (he saith) was manifestly declared.

And such trust have we through Christ to God-ward:

We are not infallible in the case; but I tell you what confidence we have, hoping in God concerning you, through the merits of Jesus Christ.

Not that we are sufficient of ourselves to think any thing as of ourselves; but † our sufficiency is of God;

I would not have you think that we judge ourselves sufficient to work a change in the hearts of men; we are so far from that, that we have no sufficiency so much as to think one good thought, which is the lowest human act. Though the subject, upon which the apostle is here discoursing, be a sufficiency to work a work of grace in the hearts of men; yet here is a strong proof to prove the impotency of man's will unto any thing that is truly and spiritually good: for though the apostle declares here his own and all other ministers' insufficiency to the change of any man's heart, yet he proveth it by an argument, concluding from the lesser to the greater; for if they be not sufficient of themselves, and as of themselves, to think any thing which is truly and spiritually good, they are then much less sufficient for so great a work as the conversion of souls. Nor doth that term, as of ourselves, any thing alter the matter; for if we can think good thoughts, in any sense, as of ourselves, it is not of God, in the sense which the apostle is speaking of; who is not here speaking of God as the God of nature, (from whom indeed we derive our power of thinking,) but as the God of grace, from whom we derive our power of thinking holy thoughts, and such as are truly and spiritually good. The apostle determineth all our sufficiency to spiritually good actions to be from God, our sufficiency to the lowest (which is thinking good thoughts) as well as to those of the highest sort; amongst which must those actions be accounted, by which men are made workers together with God, in the bringing of souls out of darkness into marvellous light; opening their eyes, turning them from darkness to light, and from the power of Satan unto God, Acts xxvi. 18. Our sufficiency to think any thoughts, or to do any natural or moral actions, is from God, as he is the God of nature. But it appeareth from all the preceding discourse, that our apostle is here speaking of that sufficiency which floweth from God through the mediation of Christ: our power of thinking floweth from the providence of God towards all men; and if that had been all which the apostle had meant in saying, our sufficiency is from God, it had been no more than what they might have learned from the heathen philosophers, who would have acknowledged, that all men's sufficiency to natural actions is from the Divine Being, or the first Mover.

Who also hath made us able † ministers of the new testament; not † of the letter, but of the spirit: for † the letter killeth, † but the spirit † giveth life.

This verse plainly openeth what he had said before, and lets us know what sufficiency of God that was of which he there spake. He hath (saith the apostle) not found, but made us sufficient. We were men before, and, through the creating power and providence of God, we had an ability to think and to speak; but God hath made us sufficient, by a supervening act and influence of his grace, to be ministers of the new testament, that is, of the gospel; which being the new revelation of the Divine will, and confirmed by the death of Christ, is called the new testament. Not of the letter, but of the Spirit: by the letter, here, the apostle understandeth the law; for the law is called the letter, Rom. ii. 27; vii. 6: Who by the letter and circumcision dost transgress the law; that is, While thou, by some external acts, professeth a subjection to the law (particularly by circumcision) in a multitude of other actions, (which are more valuable in the sight of God than those external acts,) thou transgresseth the law. The law, in opposition to the gospel, is called the letter, sometimes a dead letter; because it was only a revelation of the will of God concerning man's duty, no revelation of God's grace, either in pardoning men their omissions of duty, and doing acts contrary to duty, or assisting men to the performance of their duty. As the gospel is also called the Spirit, both in opposition to the carnal ordinances of the law, and because Christ is the matter, subject, and argument of it; and chiefly because, that the preaching of it is so far attended by the Spirit of grace, that where men do not turn their ears from the hearing of it, nor shut their eyes against the light of it, nor harden their hearts against the precepts and rule of it, it becomes (through the free grace of God) effectual to change their hearts, and to turn them from the power of Satan unto God, and to make them truly spiritual and holy. For the letter (that is, the law) killeth; the law showeth men their duty, accuseth, condemneth, and denounceth the wrath of God against men for not doing their duty, but gives no strength for the doing of it. But the spirit (that is, the gospel) giveth life: the gospel, in the letter of it, showeth the way to life; and the gospel, in the hand of the Spirit, or with the Spirit, working together with it, (the Holy Spirit using it as its instrument,) giveth life; both that life which is spiritual, and that which is eternal, as it prepareth the soul for life and immortality.

o Rom. 7. 10.

7 But if ° the ministration of death, p written and engraven in stones, was glorious, ² so that the children of Israel could not stedfastly behold the face of Moses for the glory of his countenance; which glory was to be done away :

The apostle is manifestly comparing the ministry of the gospel with the ministry of the law, and showing the excellency of the former above the latter. In the former verse he had called the law, the letter; and the gospel, in opposition to it, he had called, the spirit: here he calleth the ministration of the law, the ministration of death; because it only showed man his duty, or things to be done, but gave no strength or help by which he should do them; only cursing man, but showing him no way by which he might escape that curse: so it did kill men, and led them to eternal death and condemnation, without showing them any means of life and salvation. He also undervalueth the law, in comparison with the gospel, as being only written and engraven in stones; whereas (as he had said before) the gospel is written in the fleshy tables of men's hearts. Yet (saith he) the ministration of the law (which was indeed but the ministration of death) was glorious: there was a great deal of the glory and majesty of God attended the giving of the law, of which we read, Exod. xix. So that the children of Israel could not stedfastly behold the face of Moses for the glory of his countenance: of this we read, Exod. xxxiv. 29, 30. When Aaron and all the children of Israel saw Moses, behold, the skin of his face shone; and they were afraid to come nigh him. So as it was glorious to be but a minister of the law, that is, of the revelation of the will of God, as to man's duty, which glory (saith the apostle) was to be done away: Moses's face did not always so shine, neither was the glory of his ministration to abide always, but to cease by the coming in of the new covenant.

8 How shall not ³ the ministration of the spirit be rather glorious ?

How shall not that ministration, which is more spiritual, and the effects of which are much more spiritual, be accounted much more glorious? Thus the apostle doth not only magnify the gospel above the law, but he also magnifieth his offices in the ministration of the gospel; which ministration he reasonably concludeth to be a more glorious ministration than that which Moses had, in whom the Jews so much gloried.

9 For if the ministration of condemnation be glory, much more doth the ministration ⁴ of righteousness exceed in glory.

What the apostle before called the ministration of death, he here calleth the ministration of condemnation; and therein gives us a reason why he called it the ministration of death, because it led unto eternal death, as showing men sin, so accusing and condemning men for sinful acts. If it pleased God (saith the apostle) to make that ministration glorious, that the minister of the law (Moses) appeared so glorious in the eyes of Aaron and of the people; the ministration of righteousness (by which he means the gospel) must needs be more exceedingly glorious. He tells us, Rom. i. 16, 17, that he was not ashamed of the gospel—for therein is the righteousness of God revealed from faith to faith; that is, the righteousness wherein a soul must stand and appear righteous before God. The ministration of righteousness signifieth the ministration of that gospel, that doctrine, which revealeth righteousness. Righteousness is here opposed to condemnation; and therefore signifieth that which is opposed to it, viz. justification. For God doth not so freely remit sins, but that he declares his righteousness in the remission of them; and will show himself just, while he showeth himself the justifier of him that believeth in Jesus, Rom. iii. 26. And from hence it appeareth, that the gospel is called the ministration of righteousness, because he that ministereth in it exhibiteth the righteousness to Christ to be reckoned to the soul, as that whereby it must be justified; for God could not otherwise declare his righteousness in the remission of sins, nor show himself just in justifying the ungodly. This ministration (he saith) must needs be more glorious in the eyes of men than the ministration of the law; for that ministration afforded nothing but terror and death, this affordeth relief, and comfort, and life.

10 For even that which was made glorious had no glory in this respect, by reason of the glory that excelleth.

The law had in it something of intrinsic glory and excellency, as it was the revelation of the will of God to and concerning his creatures; there was an inseparable glory attending it upon that account: and it was made glorious in the ministration of it; as it pleased God that the giving of it should be attended with thunder and lightning, fire and smoke, and an earthquake, and a voice like to the sound of a trumpet, as we read, Exod. xix. 16—18: this was an accidental and adventitious glory, and made that which was glorious in itself, glorious also in the eyes of the people, that saw and heard these things. But yet, saith the apostle, if we compare it with the glory of the gospel, it had comparatively no glory; so much doth that excel. For though the law was the revelation of the Divine will, as well as the gospel, yet the law was the revelation of the Divine will but as to duty, and wrath, in case of the non-performance of that duty: but the gospel is the revelation of the Divine will, as to grace and mercy, as to remission of sin, and eternal life. And although the gospel came not into the world as the law, with thunder, and lightning, and earthquakes; yet that was ushered in by angels, foretelling the birth and office of John the Baptist, and of Christ; by the great sign of the virgin's conceiving and bringing forth a Son; by a voice from heaven, proclaiming Christ the Father's only begotten Son, in whom he was well pleased. But that which the apostle doth here principally intend, is the exceeding excellency of it, in regard of its further usefulness and comfortable nature.

11 For if that which was done away was glorious, much more that which remaineth is glorious.

The apostle, by another argument, proveth the ministration of the gospel to be much more glorious than the ministration of the law, because it is more durable and abiding. The strength of the argument dependeth upon this principle, that any durable good is more excellent and glorious than that which is but transitory, and for a time. The ministration of the law is done away; the law, contained in ordinances, is itself done away, and therefore the ministration of it must needs cease. There are now no priests and Levites, no worldly sanctuary, nor any ministrations in it, or relating to it. But our Saviour hath told us, that the gospel shall be preached to the end of the world; so that ministration must (according to all principles of reason) be more glorious, as that which is eternal is more glorious than that which is fluid and vanishing.

12 Seeing then that we have such hope,
1 ch. 7. 4.
Eph. 6. 19.
1 Cor. bold-
ness. we use great plainness of speech :

Hope here signifieth nothing but a confident, certain expectation of something that is hereafter to come to pass. The term such referreth to something which went before : the sense is, We being in a certain confident expectation, that our ministration of the gospel shall not cease, as the ministration of the law hath done; and that the doctrine of the gospel brings in not a temporary, but an everlasting righteousness; that there shall never be any righteousness revealed, wherein any soul can stand righteous before God, but that which is revealed in the gospel to be from faith to faith; we are neither ashamed nor afraid to preach the gospel with all freedom and boldness. We do not, as Moses, cover ourselves with a veil when we preach the gospel to people, but we speak what God hath given to us in commission to speak, unconcernedly as to any terrors or afflictments from men : we know, that great is the truth which we preach, and that it shall prevail and outlive all the rage and madness of the enemies of it.

13 And not as Moses, “which put a veil over his face, that the children of Israel could not stedfastly look to the end of that which is abolished :

We have the history to which this passage of the apostle relateth, in Exod. xxxiv. 33, 35, where we read, that when Moses had done speaking, he put a veil on his face. The apostle here elegantly turns that passage into an allegory, and opens to us a mystery hidden under that piece of history. That shining of Moses's face, in a type, prefigured the shining of Him who was to be the light of the world; as he was from eternity the brightness of his Father's glory. Moses's covering himself with a veil, signifies God's hiding the mystery of Christ from ages. Moses did not put a veil on his face for that end, that the children of Israel might not look upon him; but this was the event of it, which also prefigured the blinding of the Jews; they first shut their eyes and would not see, then God judicially sealed their eyes that they should not see, that Christ was the end of the law for righteousness, the true Messiah, and the Mediator betwix God and man; they could not (as the apostle expresseth it) see to the end of that which is abolished; to the end of the legal dispensation, to the end of all the types of Christ which were in the Levitical law. Now, (saith the apostle,) we do not do so, but make it our business to preach the gospel with as much openness, and plainness, and freedom, as is imaginable. The whole history of the gospel justifieth what this text affirmeth concerning the Jews; that they could not see that Christ, by his coming, had put an end to the law, and the righteousness thereof. We find upon all occasions how much the Pharisees, and those who adhered to that sect, stuck in the law, to the hinderance of their receiving of, or believing in, the Lord Jesus Christ.

14 But their minds were blinded :
 for until this day remaineth the same veil untaken away in the reading of the old testament; which vail is done away in Christ.

Here the apostle expoundeth what he meant before by the mystical veil, viz. the blinding of the eyes of the Jews; of which we read often in the New Testament, Matt. xiii. 14; Mark iv. 12; Luke viii. 10; John xii. 40; Acts xxviii. 26; Rom. xi. 8 : see the notes upon all those texts. And (saith the apostle) to this day the veil remaineth not taken away; that veil, which was signified by the veil with which Moses covered his face. In the reading of the Old Testament, is, when the Old Testament is read : some part of which was wont to be read in the synagogues every sabbath day. But we shall meet with this in the next verse more fully. But (saith he) this veil is done away in Christ. It is really taken away upon the coming of Christ; that is, the veil, that covered the face of Christ, is now truly taken away upon his coming; the types are fulfilled in him, as their complement and antitype; the prophecies are fulfilled in him, as he whom they concerned, and of whom the prophets spake. But the veil, that is drawn over men's hearts, is not taken away, till they come to receive Jesus Christ, as the end of the law for righteousness, to close with him, and to believe in him. God hath taken the veil off from Christ, by sending him personally to fulfil all righteousness; but Christ profiteth nothing particular souls, until they come to believe in him, then it is taken away from their souls, and not before. Which was the reason that it remained still upon the Jews, among whom he came, as among his own, but they received him not.

15 But even unto this day, when Moses is read, the veil is upon their heart.

The veil, mystically signified by the veil upon Moses's face, which hindereth them from seeing or discerning the Messiah to be come. But why doth he say, when Moses, that is, the books of Moses, or rather of the Old Testament, are read? Possibly he thereby hinteth, that it was their duty, when in the synagogues they heard the chapters of the Old Testament read, which contain the types and prophecies of Christ, they ought to have looked through those veils, and have considered Christ as the end of those things; so the law, as a schoolmaster, should have led them to Christ; but it was quite otherwise. When they heard those portions of the Old Testament read, through the veil upon their hearts, they could not see through the veil of those types, prophecies, and ritual performances, but rested in them as things in the performance of which they laid their righteousness. Or, if they before had some little convictions upon their spirits, yet when they again came into the synagogues, and heard the law read, the veil again appeared over their hearts, so as they could not see Christ.

16 Nevertheless when it shall turn to the Lord, the veil shall be taken away.

When it shall turn, may be understood of the whole, or of the generality (at least) of the Jews; when they shall be converted to the faith of Christ, or when any particular person shall be converted to Christ, then the veil shall be taken away; not the veil with which God covered and veiled the mysteries of the gospel. (that was already taken away upon Christ's coming in the flesh.) but the veil of blindness, which they had drawn over their own souls. Though the light of the gospel shineth clearly, and Christ be unveiled, yet until men, by a true faith, receive Christ, and turn from sinful courses to the obedience of the gospel, they see little or nothing of Christ. The taking away of this veil, and the turning to the Lord, are things done in souls at the same time; therefore nothing is to be concluded here, from the apostle's naming the removal of the impediment, after the effect of which that is a cause.

17 Now the Lord is that Spirit : and where the Spirit of the Lord is, there is liberty.

The Lord Christ was a man, but not a mere man; but one who had the Divine nature personally united to his human nature, which is called the Spirit, Mark ii. 8. But some think, that the article here is not merely prepositive, but emphatical; and so referreth to ver. 6, where the gospel (the substance of which is Christ) was called the Spirit. So it is judged by some, that the apostle preventeth a question which some might have propounded, viz. how the veil should be taken away by men's turning unto the Lord? Saith the apostle, The Lord is that Spirit, or he is that Spirit mentioned ver. 18; he is a Spirit, and he gives out of the Spirit unto his people, the Spirit of holiness and sanctification. And where the Spirit of the Lord is, (that holy, sanctifying Spirit, which is often called the Spirit of Christ,) there is liberty; for our Saviour told the Jews, John viii. 36, If the Son make you free, then shall ye be free indeed : a liberty from the yoke of the law, from sin, death, hell; but the liberty which seemeth here to be chiefly intended, is a liberty from that blindness and hardness which is upon men's hearts, until they have received the Holy Spirit.

18 But we all, with open face beholding as in a glass the glory of the Lord, are changed into the same image from glory to glory, even as by the Spirit of the Lord.

Some by we here understand all believers; others think it is better understood of ministers: but the universal particle all rather guideth us to interpret it of the whole body of believers, of whom the apostle saith, that they all behold the glory of God with open face; that is, not under those dark types, shadows, and prophecies; that he was of old revealed under, but as in a looking-glass, which represents the face as at hand; not as in a perspective, which showeth things afar off. We behold him in the glass of the gospel, fully opened and preached; and this sight of Christ in the gospel is not a mere useless sight, but such a sight as changeth the soul into the image and likeness of Christ, from glory to glory; carrying on the souls of believers from one degree of grace to another; or making such a glorious change in the heart, as shall not be blotted out until a soul cometh into those possessions of glory which God hath prepared for his people. And all this is done by the Spirit of the Lord, working with the word of God in the mouths of his ministers, but so as the Spirit hath the principal agency and efficiency in the work.

CHAP. IV

Paul declareth his unwearied zeal and integrity in preaching the gospel, 1, 2; so that if any see not the truth of it, it must be owing to their corrupt hearts, not to want of clear light, 3-6. The weakness and sufferings he was exposed to redounded to the praise of God's power, 7-11. That which animated him in undergoing them for the church's sake, was the assurance of a more exceeding and eternal reward, 12-18.

<sup>a</sup> ch. 3. 6. THEREFORE seeing we have <sup>a</sup>this ministry, <sup>b</sup>as we have received mercy, we faint not;

It is the opinion of Beza, that the traducers of this great apostle took advantage from his great trials and afflictions, by reason of them, to conclude him no such man as he was by some represented; and that the apostle upon that takes advantage to magnify his office. God (saith he) having intrusted us with so glorious a ministration, as I have proved that of the gospel to be, according to the measure and proportion of gifts and graces which God hath bestowed upon us, or by reason of that infinite grace and mercy which God hath showed us, in calling us to so honourable a station and office, though we meet with many adversaries, many afflictions, many difficulties, yet we bear up and sink not under them, nor faint in our spirits because of them.

But have renounced the hidden things of dishonesty; though we be exposed to many sorrows and sufferings, it is not for any dishonest or unwarrantable behaviour amongst men; nay, we have not only declined openly dishonest actions, but any secret or hidden dishonest behaviour. Possibly he reflecteth upon those, whether teachers or others in this church, who, though they behaved themselves very speciously in their more external conversation, yet it was a shame to speak what things were done of them in secret. We (saith the apostle) have renounced all secret, dishonest, shameful actions. Not walking in craftiness; it hath not been our design to carry ourselves craftily, to cheat people with a fair outside and external demeanour. Nor handling the word of God deceitfully; nor in our ministry have we cheated and deceived people, instead of instructing them in the truth; crying, Peace, peace, when God hath said, There is no peace to the wicked, and tempering our discourses to all men's humours, not speaking right things, but smooth things. But by manifestation of the truth commending ourselves to every man's conscience in the sight of God; our business, in the course of our ministry, hath been to commend ourselves to every man's conscience, as in the sight of God, by manifesting to them the truth of God.

The apostle call the gospel his gospel, because of his instrumentality in the promoting and publishing of it. His meaning is, If the doctrine of the gospel, which I am an instrument to preach, be hidden, so as there yet be any souls that do not understand, receive, and believe it, the fault is not in the word we preach, nor yet in our preaching of it, (which hath been in all simplicity and plainness, without craftiness or deceit,) but in themselves, who favour and indulge their lusts to that degree, as that they deserve to be lost, or are at present in their sinful state; in which sense all men are in the parables compared to the lost sheep, or lost groats; and Christ is said to have come to seek and to save those that are lost. Men, mad upon their lusts, may not understand the doctrine of the gospel which we preach; but others understand and believe it. I had rather understand the term lost in this sense, than as expressing reprobrates; for it seemeth something harsh to make this phrase to signify that God had no more in Corinth at this time that belonged to the election of grace, than those that were already converted; or that all those that were at this time hypocrites in this famous church, were such as perished eternally. Yet the words of the next verse seem rather to favour their notion, who by lost here understand reprobrates.

Though some, by the god of this world, understand the true and living God, the Lord of heaven and earth; yet the notion of the most interpreters, that it is the devil who is here called the god of this world, because he ruleth over the greatest part of the world, and they are his servants and slaves, is most consonant to Scripture: for though we no where else find him called the god of this world, yet our Saviour twice calls him the prince of this world, John xii. 31; xiv. 30; and our apostle, Eph. ii. 2, calls him the prince of the power of the air. The effect also doth more properly belong to the devil, than unto God, who no otherwise blindeth the eyes of them than either permissively, by suffering them to shut their own eyes, or judicially. And the apostle declares, that those who are so blinded are such persons as believe not. He further declareth the end of the devil's agency in blinding men's eyes with errors, malice, and prejudice, lest the light of the glorious gospel of Christ, who is the image of God, the express image of his person, (considered as to his Divine nature,) should shine unto them, that is, into their hearts.

<sup>5</sup> For we preach not ourselves, but Christ Jesus the Lord; and <sup>m</sup>ourselves your servants for Jesus' sake.

For we preach not ourselves: for a man to preach himself, is to preach the devices and imaginations of his own heart, instead of the revealed will of God; to make his discourses the evolutions of his own lusts and passions; or to make himself the end of his preaching; preaching merely for filthy lucre sake, or to supply himself with bread, or for the ostentation of his own wit, and learning, and parts. But we preach Christ Jesus the Lord; we preach what he hath commanded us to preach, and he is the subject of our discourses; we either preach what Christ is, or declare in our preaching what he hath done and suffered for sinners, or what he hath commanded us to do in order to our and your obtaining of life and salvation through him. And in our preaching, though in the first place we are Christ's servants, who hath commanded us to go and preach, and who is the subject matter of our preaching, and whose honour and glory is the end of all our preaching; yet we are also your servants: really so, not in that we serve your lusts and humours, and speak smooth things, such as may be pleasing to your humours; but for Jesus' sake, because in revealing the will of God to you, and in publishing the grace of the gospel to you, we do you the highest service we can in your eternal concerns.

knowledge of the glory of God in the face of Jesus Christ.

The Holy Ghost in the New Testament often compareth the work of the new creation by Jesus Christ, to the work of God in the old creation; intimating to us, that the latter is as great a work of providence and Divine power, as the former: Eph. iv. 24, the new man, after God, is said to be created in righteousness and true holiness. For as that is a creation which is a making of something out of nothing, (as God created the heavens and the earth,) so the production of one thing out of another, which hath no fitness or aptitude to receive such a form, is also a true creation, and requireth an Almighty power. God made light to shine out of darkness, Gen. i. 2, 3: so (saith the apostle) he hath made Christ (who is the Light of the world) to shine into our hearts, to give us the true knowledge of God, and of his glory, the glory of his grace. In the face of Jesus Christ; that is, by which we attain the clear and certain knowledge of God: as a man is distinctly known by or from his face, God is clearly and distinctly known only in and by Christ.

q ch. 5. 1. 7 But we have this treasure in earthen vessels, that the excellency of the power may be of God, and not of us.

By the treasure here mentioned, the apostle meaneth either his ministration, or apostolical office, which he before had proved glorious, more glorious than that of the law; or else, that light of the knowledge of the glory of God, which (as he had before said) God had made to shine into their hearts in the face of Jesus Christ. This treasure (saith he) we, even we that are the apostles of the Lord, have in our souls, which are clothed with bodies; and these not made of iron, or stone, or any other matter not capable of impressions of violence, but made of earth, like earthen pots or shells, that easily receive impressions of violence, and are presently broken in pieces. That the excellency of the power may be of God, and not of us; that the world may see, that whatsoever powerful effects are wrought by us, they are the work of the excellent power of God; not done by us, but by him; that he, not we, might have all the glory.

8 We are troubled on every side, yet not distressed; we are perplexed, but not in despair;

We are troubled on every side; we are many ways, indeed every way, afflicted, afflicted with all sorts of afflictions; yet not distressed; but yet we are not like persons cooped up into a strait place, so as they are not able to turn them, nor know which way to move (so the word signifies). We are perplexed; the word signifies doubting, uncertain what shall become of us, or how God will dispose of us; full of anxious, troublesome thoughts about what shall be our lot in the world; but not in despair; but yet not despairing of the help, presence, support, and assistance of God.

9 Persecuted, but not forsaken; cast down, but not destroyed;

Persecuted; violently pursued and prosecuted by such as are the adversaries of the gospel, and enemies to our Lord Jesus, because of our profession of him, and preaching his gospel; but yet not forsaken of God, nor wholly of men; God, by the inward influences of his Holy Spirit, supporting, upholding, and comforting us; and also, by his providence, raising us up some friends that stick by us. Cast down, either in our own thoughts, (as it is the nature of worldly troubles and afflictions to sink men's thoughts,) or cast down by the violence of men, thrown to the earth; but not destroyed; but yet we live, and are by the mighty power of God preserved, that we are not utterly destroyed.

10 Always bearing about in the body the dying of the Lord Jesus, that the life also of Jesus might be made manifest in our body.

A Christian beareth about with him the dying of the Lord Jesus in his mind and soul, while he fetches strength from it to deaden his heart unto sin; being buried with Christ into death, and planted in the likeness of his death; having his old man crucified with him, that the body of sin might be destroyed, that henceforth he may not serve sin, Rom. vi.

4-6. He also beareth about with him the dying of the Lord Jesus in his body; either in a representation, while in his sufferings he is made conformable to the death of Christ, Phil. iii. 10; or in his own real sufferings, which he calleth the dying of the Lord Jesus, because they were for Christ's sake, and because Christ sympathizeth with them therein, he being afflicted in all their afflictions; yea, and Christ (as the apostle expresseth it, Phil. i. 20,) is magnified in their body, by death, as well as by life. This the apostle tells us he did, that the life also of Jesus might be made manifest in his body: by the life of Christ must be here understood, either the resurrection of Christ, and that life which he now liveth in heaven with his Father; or that quickening power of the Spirit of Christ, which then mightly showeth itself in believers, when they are not overwhelmed by the waters of affliction, nor conquered by their sufferings; but in, and over all, are more than conquerors, through that mighty power of Christ which showeth forth itself in them: or (as some think) that lively virtue and power of Christ, which showeth itself in the efficacy of the apostles' ministry; by which so many thousands of souls were brought in to Christ, which was not the effect of their own virtue, but of the life of Christ manifested in their body. But the apostle having before spoken of his sufferings, it seems best interpreted of that living power put forth by Christ, in upholding the earthly vessels of his apostles, notwithstanding all the knocks they met with, to carry about that heavenly treasure with which God had intrusted them.

11 For we which live are always delivered unto death for Jesus' sake, that the life also of Jesus might be made manifest in our mortal flesh.

We who are yet alive, as having breath still in our bodies, in another sense we do not live, viz. as life signifies prosperity and happiness; for we are always delivered unto death, that is, under continual threats and dangers of death, so that we have always the sentence of death in ourselves; for Jesus' sake, for our owning, preaching, and professing Christ, and the doctrine of the gospel. We are not delivered to death for evil-doing, nor merely as innocent persons, but for well-doing; and that in the noblest sense, for obeying the commands and for publishing the gospel of Christ. That the life also of Jesus might be made manifest in our mortal flesh; and the infinitely wise providence of God permitteth this, that he might make manifest in our mortal flesh, that Christ is risen from the dead, and liveth for ever, making intercession for us; and, as a living Head, giving necessary influences of strength, support, and comfort, as to all those who are his members, so more particularly to us, who are some of the principal members of that mystical body, of which he is the Head. So that our sufferings are so far from being an evidence against the truth of our doctrine and of our ministration, that they are rather an evidence of the truth of both; as testifying, that he whom we preach, having died for our sins, is also risen for our justification, and exalted at the right hand of God; from whence he dispenseth his spiritual influences, as to the souls of all his people, so to our souls in particular, by which we are enabled, without fainting, to suffer such things with boldness, courage, and patience.

12 So then death worketh in us, but life in you.

You see the difference betwixt us and you; either the real difference, or the fancied difference. We are killed all the day long, in deaths often, delivered to death always; you are rich, and full, and want nothing; life, that is, security, happiness, and prosperity, attends you. Or the fancied difference: You bless yourselves, that you are not in so much jeopardy as we are, and some of you are ready to curse us, because vipers stick to our hands, and we are in continually renewed and repeated troubles. Very good interpreters think these words a smart ironical expression, by which the apostle reflecteth upon a party in this church, who from his sufferings concluded against the truth of his doctrine, or his favour with God; and for themselves, because of their immunity and freedom from such sufferings. Others think the sense this, our death is your life; our sufferings are your spiritual advantage.

The same spirit of faith signifieth the same faith, or faith proceeding from the same spirit; thus, Isa. xi. 2, the spirit of wisdom and understanding, the spirit of counsel and might, the spirit of knowledge and of the fear of the Lord, signifieth wisdom, understanding, counsel, might, knowledge, &c. It is a question whom the apostle meaneth when he saith, We having the same faith. Some think he meaneth the saints under the Old Testament, whose faith was the same with the faith of believers under the New Testament; and that which guideth them to that interpretation, is the apostle's following quotation out of Psal. cxvi. 10. But the scope of the quotation seemeth to be, to prove that all good men will speak as they believe; they therefore seem better to interpret the text, that make this the sense of it: Though God, in the wisdom of his providence, hath assigned us in this world a different lot from you, that you are full, we empty; you in prosperity, we in adversity; yet we are partakers of the same faith with you, and are acted from the same spirit that you are; and as David's spirit guided him to a profession of his faith, and a speaking what he believed; so we also speak, and must speak, according to what we believe. And this is manifestly the sense of the words, if we consider what followeth in the next verse.

Knowing that God the Father, who raised up the Lord Jesus from the dead, as the first-fruits of them that sleep, shall likewise, by the virtue of his resurrection, and by a power flowing from him, as now alive, and sitting at the right hand of God, quicken our mortal bodies; that both our souls and bodies may be presented with you, to be both eternally glorified: this maketh us that we do not fear death, but are unconcerned, although by wicked men we every day be delivered to it, and brought within the danger and sight of it; still the resurrection of Christ is made the foundation of our resurrection, and a firm ground for our faith of it. And we are from this text confirmed in the truth of this, that although the lot of God's people in this life be very different, (some are poor, some rich, some in prosperity, some in adversity, and encompassed with sorrows and afflictions,) yet if they have all the same faith, they shall all meet in the resurrection, and shall, by Christ, be all presented unto God as persons redeemed by him, and washed with his blood, and who shall be glorified together.

Because of this double advantage which accrueeth from our sufferings, viz. the furthering of the good of your souls, and the promoting the glory of God from the thanksgivings of many, though we suffer many harsh and bitter things, yet we do not faint nor sink under the burden of our trials; but though, as to our outward man, we are every day dying persons, daily decaying as to the strength, and vigour, and prosperity of our outward man, yet the strength and comfort of our souls and spirits reneweth day by day; we are every day stronger and stronger as to the managing of our spiritual fight, and every day more cheered and comforted in our holy course.

g Matt. 5. 12.
 Rom. 8. 18.
 1 Pet. 1. 6.
 & 5. 10.

The apostle in these words wonderfully lesseneth his own, and the rest of the apostles', and all other Christians' sufferings for the gospel: he calleth them light, not that they were so in themselves, but with respect to that weight of glory which he mentioneth in the latter part of the verse: he calleth them momentary, but for a moment, with reference to that eternity which is mentioned. The afflictions are light, the glory will be a weight; the afflictions are but for a moment, the glory shall be eternal. And (saith the apostle) our affliction worketh for us this glory: the glory will not only be a consequent of these afflictions, but these afflictions will be a cause of it; not a meritorious cause, (for what proportion is there betwixt momentary afflictions and eternal glory? betwixt light afflictions and a weight of glory, an exceeding weight of glory?) but a cause in respect of the infinite goodness and mercy of God, and in respect of the truth and faithfulness of God.

 Heb. 11. 1.

Two things support the spirits of Christians under trials; 1. The eyeing of him who is invisible; this supported Moses, Heb. xi. 27, He endured, as seeing him who is invisible. 2. The seeing by the eye of faith the things which are invisible; the things which God hath prepared in another world for those that love him; the things which eye hath not seen, nor hath it entered into the heart of man to conceive. For (saith the apostle) the things which are seen, which fall under the senses of men, they are but temporal, and of a temporary duration; but the invisible things, the exceeding and eternal weight of glory, which are before mentioned, they are of an eternal duration, and therefore much to be preferred before those things which endure but for a moment.

Paul declareth that, in assured hope of a blessed immortality hereafter, he was indifferent to life, and laboured only to approve himself to Christ, 1—9: that knowing the general judgment that would follow, and the terrors of it, he was solicitous to persuade men, 10, 11: that this was said not by way of boasting, but purely to furnish the Corinthians with a reply in his justification against false pretenders, 12, 13: that, moved by the love of Christ, he was become dead to all former regards, 14—16; and all things being now made new by God in Christ reconciling the world to himself, 17—19, he, as ambassador for Christ, besought men to embrace the offered reconciliation, 20, 21.

The apostle had before said, that he looked at the things not seen; in this verse he openeth himself, and sheweth what those unseen things are: We (saith he) know, we have a certain persuasion, we doubt not of it, but that if our body were dissolved. This body he calleth an earthly house, either because it is made of the dust of the earth, into which it must again be resolved; or because it is only the habitation of the soul, so long as the soul is on this side of heaven; and therefore he calleth it also, the earthly house of this tabernacle. A tabernacle is a moving house or booth built up for a time. This tabernacle (saith the apostle) must be pulled down, and taken in pieces; and we are certain, that if it be dissolved, we have a building of God, either a blessed, eternal mansion, (according to that of our Saviour, John xiv. 2, In my Father's house are many mansions,) or else, God will give us a spiritual, glorious, incorruptible body; not a house made with hands, nor a house that shall be dissolved and any more pulled down, but which shall be eternal in the heavens; in such a state, as that it shall be incorruptible, and no more subject to any corruption or decay.

We are so confident of such a blessed state, that we passionately desire to be invested into it; and this groaning is also an evidence of it, for the desire of grace shall not be made frustrate; desirous that our mortality may put on immortality, and our corruption may put on incorruption. It is against the nature of man to desire death, which is the stripping or unclothing the soul of flesh; but not to desire that the garment of immortality may be put upon mortality, which is that our house from heaven, which is mentioned in v. r. 1.

<sup>c</sup> 1 Cor. 3. 18. & 15. 15. 3 If so be that <sup>c</sup> being clothed we shall not be found naked.

Some make the clothing here spoken of different from the clothing before mentioned; and make this verse restrictive of what the apostle had before said, of the certainty which some have of being clothed upon with a glorious body. If so be (saith the apostle) we shall not be found naked, but clothed, i. e. with the wedding-garment of Christ's righteousness; for concerning those that do not die in the Lord, that do not watch, and keep their garments, it is said, Rev. xvi. 15, they shall walk naked, and men shall see their shame. But considering the clothing before mentioned was not this clothing, but the superinducing of an immortal, incorruptible, glorious state of body, upon our mortal, corruptible state, some judicious interpreters think, that the clothing here mentioned is the clothing of the soul with the body. It is manifest that the apostles apprehended Christ's second coming much nearer than it hath proved. Therefore he saith, 1 Thess. iv. 15, We that are alive (supposing that generation might live) to Christ's second coming; and 1 Cor. xv. 51, We shall not all sleep, but we shall all be changed. This some think (and that not improbably) is the cause of this passage; the sense of which they judge to be this: If so be that we be, at the resurrection, found in the flesh, clothed still with our bodies, and shall not be found naked, that is, stripped of our flesh, and dead before that time.

4 For we that are in this tabernacle do groan, being burdened: not for that we would be unclothed, but <sup>d</sup> clothed upon, that mortality might be swallowed up of life.

<sup>d</sup> 1 Cor. 15. 53, 54. By tabernacle, he meaneth (as he had before expounded it) the earthly house of our body. Do groan; both a groaning of grief, and also of desire. Being burdened; either with the body of flesh; or with sin, the body of death, Rom. vii. 24; or with the load of trials and afflictions. Not that we would be unclothed, that is, die, be unclothed of our flesh, (nature abhorreth death, and flieth from it,) but clothed upon; which is expounded, 1 Cor. xv. 54, our corruptible having put on incorruption, and our mortal having put on immortality. And this confirmeth what was observed before, that the apostles had some persuasion, (though not from any Divine revelation of that hour,) that the resurrection, and day of judgment, would be before the determination of that age and generation; that so we might come into the possession of eternal life (for that the apostle meaneth by mortality being swallowed up of life). Death is not desirable for its own sake, but upon the account of that immortal life into which it leadeth the souls of believers; nor (as was said before) doth the apostle here directly desire death, (which is that which in this verse he calleth unclothing,) but rather the change mentioned 1 Cor. xv. 52, which he here calleth a clothing upon.

<sup>e</sup> 15. 22, 23. Eph. 2. 10. 1 Rom. 8. 22. ch. 1. 22. Eph. 1. 14. & 4. 30. 5 Now <sup>e</sup> he calleth that hath wrought us for the selfsame thing is God, who also <sup>f</sup> hath given unto us the earnest of the Spirit.

The selfsame thing is the life, the eternal life, mentioned in the former verse; the house in the heavens, not made with hands, ver. 1. God hath wrought us for it (as some interpret the text) in creation, and by his providence, forming our bodies in the womb: but it is much better interpreted by others concerning regeneration; for in the first birth (without respect to the decree of election) God hath no more wrought us for it, than the worst of men. The apostle therefore is, doubtless, to be understood, as speaking concerning the work of grace, which is here attributed to God; we have not wrought ourselves into or up to any fitness or any grounded expectation of the future blessed and glorious estate; but it is God who hath prepared us for it, and wrought such a lively hope of it in us. Who also hath given unto us the earnest of the Spirit; and hath also given us his Holy Spirit as the pledge and earnest of it; (concerning this, see chap. i. 22;) he hath given us his Spirit to dwell and to work in us, and to assure us of what we speak of, viz. the house in the heavens, the building of God, that is not made with hands. The Spirit of grace given to the people of God, working and dwelling in them, is a certain pledge of that glory and life eternal, which he hath prepared for them.

6 Therefore we are always confident, knowing that, whilst we are at home in the body, we are absent from the Lord:

We are always full of courage and comfort, being confident of this glory, and the swallowing up of mortality in life: for we know, that while we are in our earthly home (which is our body) we are farthest off from that which is our true home, (which is heaven,) from the vision and fruition of God; for believers are but strangers and pilgrims on the earth, desiring a better country, that is, an heavenly, Heb. xi. 13, 16.

7 (For <sup>g</sup> we walk by faith, not by sight:)

<sup>g</sup> Rom. 8.24, 25. ch. 4. 18. 1 Cor. 13. 12. Heb. 11. 1. That is, we live, and order our conversations, not by sight, or any evidence of sense, but by faith, which is described by the apostle, Heb. xi. 1, to be the substance of things hoped for, the evidence of things not seen. We see nothing here by the eye of sense but mortality, corruption, and misery; but by faith we see another more excellent and glorious state, and we order our life according to our faith, and sight of things that are invisible: or sight here may be taken more strictly for the beatific vision prepared in heaven for the saints.

8 We are confident, I say, and <sup>h</sup> will- <sup>h</sup> Phil. 1.23. ing rather to be absent from the body, and to be present with the Lord.

We are confident of such a blessed state, and this makes us willing to be out of this body, that we might have the glorious presence and enjoyment of God to all eternity.

9 Wherefore we <sup>i</sup> labour, that, whe- <sup>i</sup> 1 Cor. endeavour. ther present or absent, we may be accepted of him.

Having such a hope, yea, not such a hope only, but such an assurance and confidence, we labour, both actively, doing the will of God, and passively, submitting to the will of God in all afflictive providences; that while we are in the body, and absent from the Lord, we may be accepted of him; as we know we shall be, when we shall be present with him, in another sense than we now are.

10 <sup>i</sup> For we must all appear before the judgment seat of Christ; <sup>j</sup> that every one may receive the things done in his body, according to that he hath done, whether it be good or bad.

<sup>i</sup> Matt. 25. 31, 32. Rom. 14. 10. k Rom. 2. 6. Gal. 6. 7. Eph. 6. 8. Col. 3. 24, 25. Rev. 22. 12. The apostle declareth, either the ground of his confidence, or, rather, the reason of his and other believers' labour, so to behave themselves, as that, both in life and death, they might be accepted of God; that was, his knowledge and firm belief of the last judgment. It is called the judgment-seat of Christ, because he it is whom God hath appointed to be the judge both of the quick and the dead, Acts x. 42. The word translated appear, is τεφανερωσθαι, which signifieth to be made manifest, and so signifieth not only to appear, but to be inquired into, searched, and examined, and narrowly sifted : and this lets us know, that those texts which speak of believers not being judged, or not coming into judgment, must not be understood of the judgment of inquiry, (for all shall come into that judgment,) but of the judgment of condemnation. And it lets us also know the vanity of their opinion, who think that pagans shall not rise again in the last day. That every one may receive the things done in his body, according to that he hath done, whether it be good or bad : the end of this judgment is declared, that every man may receive according to what he hath done in his body ; that is, according to the thoughts he hath thought, the words that he hath spoken, the actions which he hath done, during the time that his soul dwelt upon the earth in his body ; whether the things which he did in that state were good, and such things as God required ; or sinful, and contrary to the revealed will of God. What this receiving means, we are told, Matt. xxv. 46, These shall go away into everlasting punishment, but the righteous into life eternal. Hence we read, John v. 29, of a resurrection of life, and a resurrection of damnation.

11 Knowing therefore <sup>1</sup>the terror of the Lord, we persuade men ; but <sup>m</sup>we are made manifest unto God ; and I trust also are made manifest in your consciences.

We believing and being fully persuaded, that there shall be such a great and terrible day of the Lord, when there shall be such a narrow inquiry and search into whatsoever men have thought, spoke, or done in the flesh ; we persuade men to believe in the Lord Jesus Christ, to walk according to the rule of the gospel, to be charitable towards us, and not to censure or judge us, or use against us hard speeches. If any will not be persuaded to think well of us, yet the sincerity of our hearts and ways is made manifest unto God ; he knoweth what we are, and how we have behaved ourselves : and I trust we have so behaved ourselves, that we are not only made manifest unto God, but we are made manifest in your consciences ; so as your consciences will bear us a testimony, how we have behaved ourselves amongst you.

12 For <sup>n</sup>we commend not ourselves again unto you, but give you occasion <sup>o</sup>to glory on our behalf, that ye may have somewhat to answer them which glory †in appearance, and not in heart.

I do not speak this to commend myself unto you ; he had before declared, that he trusted that he was made manifest to their consciences, and so needed not further to commend himself. But (saith he) I speak it only to give you occasion to glory, to glory in me as the apostle of Christ unto you, or to defend me against the scandals and reproaches of those that reproach me, when themselves have no true inward cause of glorying, though they have in outward appearance, in respect of their riches, wit, wisdom, or the like.

13 For <sup>p</sup>whether we be beside ourselves, it is to God : or whether we be sober, it is for your cause.

It should seem, that some amongst the Corinthians, amongst other reproaches, had reproached Paul for a madman ; either taking advantage of the warmth and fervour of his spirit, or of those ecstasies in which he sometimes was ; or of his speaking things which they could not apprehend and understand : as the Roman governor, in the Acts, told him, Much learning hath made thee mad. The apostle tells them, that if indeed he was beside himself in any of their opinion, it was to God, that is, for the honour and glory of God : or if he was sober, it was for their sake ; in what temper soever he was, it was either for service to God, or them.

14 For the love of Christ constraineth <sup>q</sup>us ; because we thus judge, that †if one died for all, then were all dead :

The love of Christ signifieth either that love towards the sons of men which was in Christ before the foundation of the world ; for even then (as Solomon telleth us, Prov. viii. 31) he was rejoicing in the habitable part of the earth, and his delight was with the sons of men : which love showed itself in time, in his coming and assuming our natures, and dying upon the cross for us ; John xv. 13, Greater love hath no man than this, that a man lay down his life for his friends. Or else it signifieth that habit of love to Christ, which is in every believer ; for it is true of either of these, that they constrain a believer's soul. Because (saith the apostle) we thus account, or reason, that if one died for all. All here is interpreted according to the various notions of men, about the extent of the death of Christ. Some by the term understanding all individuals ; some, all the elect, or all those that should believe in Christ ; others, some of all nations, Jews or Gentiles. Be it as it will, that point is not to be determined by this universal particle, which is as often in Scripture used in a restrained sense, as in a more general sense. The apostle here concludeth, that if one died for all, then were all dead ; which is to be understood of a spiritual death, as Eph. ii. 1. And the apostle's argument dependeth upon this, that if all, for whom Christ died, had not been dead in sin, there then had been no need of his dying for to expiate their sin, and to redeem them from the guilt and power of it ; but be they what they would, for whom Christ died, whether all individuals, or all the elect only, his dying for them was a manifest evidence that they were dead.

15 And that he died for all, <sup>r</sup>that they which live should not henceforth live unto themselves, but unto him which died for them, and rose again.

And he died for all those for whom he died, not only to redeem them from the guilt of sin, but also from their vain conversation ; that they which live by his grace, might not make themselves the end of their life, and live to serve themselves, and gratify their own corrupt inclinations ; but might make the service of Christ, the honour and glory of him who died for them, and also rose again from the dead, the end of their lives ; arguing the reasonableness of a holy and Christian life, from the love and end of Christ in dying for them ; according to that, Rom. xiv. 7, 8, For none of us liveth to himself, and no man dieth to himself. For whether we live, we live unto the Lord ; and whether we die, we die unto the Lord : whether we live, therefore, or die, we are the Lord's. This is one way by which a believer fetcheth strength from the death of Christ to die unto sin, and from his resurrection to live unto newness of life ; he concluding, If Christ died, and rose again for him, that then he was once dead in trespasses and sins ; and therefore he judgeth himself obliged, now that he is made spiritually alive, not to live to himself, or serve his own profit, honour, reputation, lusts, or passions, but to live in obedience to him, and to the honour and glory of him, who died to redeem him from the guilt and power of sin, and rose again to quicken him to newness of life and conversation, to the honour and glory of his Redeemer.

16 <sup>s</sup>Wherefore henceforth know we no man after the flesh : yea, though we have known Christ after the flesh, <sup>t</sup>yet now henceforth know we him no more.

Wherefore henceforth know we no man after the flesh : words of sense in Scripture ordinarily signify more than the act of that sense which they express ; particularly this term know ordinarily signifieth to approve and acknowledge ; and so it signifies here. We know, that is, we regard, we acknowledge no man in the discharge of our office ; we regard no man with respect to any external fleshly consideration. Under which notion he comprehends all things not spiritual, whether carnal relations, riches, &c. Yea, though we have known Christ after the flesh ; not from any sight of him, for we read not that Paul at any time saw Christ, but, Acts ix., when he saw him, not according to the flesh, but as exalted at the right hand of God : but by the hearing of the ear Paul had known Christ, as one that had lived in the flesh, and who had conversed with men for above thirty years ; yet (saith he) we know him no more, we shall neither see nor hear him any more in the flesh ; we now only know him as he hath a glorious body, with which he sitteth at the right hand of God.

17 Therefore if any man <sup>u</sup>be in Christ,

If any man be in Christ, is as much as, if any man be implanted or ingrafted into Christ, by faith united to him, he is a new creature ; (the Greek is, a new creation) ; a phrase which argueth the greatest change imaginable, and such a one as can be wrought in the soul by no other power than the power of God. We have the same expression, Gal. vi. 15. The ellipsis of the verb makes some translate it, Let him be a new creature, supplying εω for εσθι. But the next words show us, that the apostle is speaking of what is past, Old things are passed away, old affections, passions, notions, &c. He hath the same soul, but new qualities, new apprehensions in his understanding, new inclinations in his will and affections, new thoughts, counsels, and designs. The predicate showeth, that the term, be in Christ, cannot be understood of those that are only in the church, and turned from paganism to the Christian faith ; for there are many such in the world, in whom there is no new creation, and who have in them nothing of this new creature.

18 And all things are of God, <sup>a</sup>who hath reconciled us to himself by Jesus Christ, and hath given to us the ministry of reconciliation ;

And all things are of God ; this change, which is wrought in our hearts, is not of ourselves, but wrought in us by the great and mighty power of God : so John i. 13, Which were born, not of blood, nor of the will of the flesh, nor of the will of man, but of God ; of God, as the principal efficient Cause. Who hath reconciled us to himself by Jesus Christ ; who, by the blood of his Son Jesus Christ, meritoriously, and by the Spirit of Christ, actually, hath reconciled us unto himself ; of enemies hath made us friends. And hath given to us the ministry of reconciliation ; hath intrusted us with the preaching of the gospel. It is God that hath reconciled us ; it is Christ by whom we are reconciled, his blood is the price of our reconciliation ; but he committed to his apostles, and so to the successive ministers of the gospel, the ministry of reconciliation, that is, the ministry of the gospel, by which this reconciliation is published to such as are yet enemies to God. They have but a ministration in it ; God hath appointed them to publish and to declare it, and to entreat men to be reconciled unto him.

19 To wit, that <sup>a</sup>God was in Christ, reconciling the world unto himself, not imputing their trespasses unto them ; and hath †committed unto us the word of reconciliation.

God was in Christ, reconciling the world unto himself ; by world, here, some would understand all mankind, and by reconciling, no more than making God reconcilable ; but this proceedeth from an over-fondness of their principle of Christ's dying for all, and every man. For as it is manifest from a multitude of scriptures, that world is many times taken in a much more limited and restrained sense ; so there is nothing here that guides us to interpret it in such a latitude ; nay, that which followeth, doth manifestly so restrain it ; for God was not in Christ, reconciling the world to himself, that is, every man and woman in the world, so as not to impute their sins to them. This the apostle here affirmeth ; which makes it manifest, that by world here is meant many, some of all sorts, as well Gentiles as Jews ; even so many as he pleaseth not to impute their sins unto. And hath committed unto us the word of reconciliation : now, (saith the apostle), the dispensing and publishing that word, by which this reconciliation is made known to the children of men, God hath committed to us ; to us, that are apostles, and so to the ministers of the gospel that shall succeed us in the work of the ministry. This mightily commendeth the gospel, and the preaching of it, that it is the word by which, as a means, soules are reconciled unto God.

20 Now then we are <sup>b</sup>ambassadors for Christ, as <sup>c</sup>though God did beseech you by us : we pray you in Christ's stead, be ye reconciled to God.

The apostle here giveth us a true notion, not only of apostles, which were the first and principal ministers of the gospel, but of all other ministers ; teaching us what all ministers should be, and what all true ministers of the gospel are. They are ambassadors for Christ. There is by nature an enmity betwixt the creature and God ; he naturally hateth God, and God is angry with him. Those that were sometime alienated, and enemies in their minds by wicked works, Christ hath reconciled in the body of his flesh through death, Col. i. 21, 22 ; he hath purchased a reconciliation for them. But yet, till they have received Christ as their Lord and Saviour, they are not actually recovered to God by him. God does by men, as great princes do by such as they are at enmity with ; he sends his ministers to them, who are his ambassadors ; and as all ambassadors represent the person of him whose ambassadors they are, and speak in his name, and as in his stead, persuading to peace ; so these speak as in Christ's name, and in God's stead ; their business is to beseech men to be reconciled unto God, to lay down their arms, and to accept of the terms of the gospel for peace and reconciliation.

21 For <sup>d</sup>he hath made him to be sin for us, who knew no sin ; that we might be made <sup>e</sup>the righteousness of God in him.

For he hath made him to be sin for us, who knew no sin : Christ knew no sin, as he was guilty of no sin ; Which of you (saith he, John viii. 46) convinceth me of sin ? 1 Pet. ii. 22, He did no sin, neither was guile found in his mouth : but God made him to be sin for us. He was numbered with the transgressors, Isa. liii. 12. Our sins were reckoned to him ; so as though personally he was no sinner, yet by imputation he was, and God dealt with him as such ; for he was made a sacrifice for our sins, a sin-offering ; so answering the type in the law, Lev. iv. 3, 25, 29 ; v. 6 ; vii. 2. That we might be made the righteousness of God in him ; that so his righteousness might be imputed to us, and we might be made righteous with such a righteousness as those souis must have whom God will accept. As Christ was not made sin by any sin inherent in him, so neither are we made righteous by any righteousness inherent in us, but by the righteousness of Christ imputed to us ; as he was a sinner by the sins of his people reckoned and imputed unto him.

CHAP. VI

Paul entreateth the Corinthians not to frustrate God's grace, 1, 2 ; setting forth his own inoffensive, painful, and patient demeanour in the discharge of his ministry, 3—10 : of which he telleth them he spake more freely out of the great love he bare them, 11, 12 ; challenging the like affection from them in return, 13. He dissuadeth from any intimate connexions with unbelievers, 14, 15. Christians are the temples of the living God, 16—18.

WE then, <sup>a</sup>as <sup>b</sup>workers together with him, beseech you also <sup>c</sup>that ye receive not the grace of God in vain.

We then, as workers together with him : ministers of the gospel are fellow workers together with Christ ; though but as instruments, serving him as the principal Agent, and efficient Cause : he trod the wine-press of his Father's wrath alone, and had no partner in the purchase of man's salvation ; but in the application of the purchased salvation, he admits of fellow workers. Though the internal work be his alone, and the effects of his Spirit upon the souls of those whose hearts are changed ; yet there is a ministerial part, which lieth in exhortation and argument, by the ear conveyed to the soul ; thus ministers work together with Christ. And without him they can do nothing : they are workers, but they must have Christ work with them, or they will find that they labour in vain. Beseech you also that ye receive not the grace of God in vain : grace signifieth any free gift ; and it is in the New Testament variously applied ; but here it signifies, the doctrine of the gospel, held forth in the preaching of it, which these Corinthians had received with the ears of their bodies. And this was Paul's, and should be every godly minister's, work, not with roughness, but with all mildness and gentleness, to beseech those to whom they preach the gospel, that they would believe and embrace it, and live up to the holy rules of it; without which, (as to their souls' benefit,) all the kindness of God, in affording them the gospel and means of grace, is in vain, and lost: though God yet hath his end, and his ministers shall be a sweet savour to God, as well with reference to them that perish, as those who shall be saved. For the effectual grace of God in the heart, that cannot be received in vain; nor is that here spoken of.

d 1s. 4s. s. 2 (For he saith, <sup>d</sup>I have heard thee in a time accepted, and in the day of salvation have I succoured thee: behold, now is the accepted time; behold, now is the day of salvation.)

For he saith, I have heard thee in a time accepted, and in the day of salvation have I succoured thee: the words here quoted, are taken out of the prophet Isaiah, chap. xlix. 8, according to the Septuagint's translation. Though some think, that the apostle here doth but accommodate to the spiritual salvation brought in by Christ, a temporal salvation mentioned, and primarily intended; yet the most and best interpreters rather judge that whole chapter in Isaiah to refer to Christ, and that the salvation there mentioned, is to be understood of the spiritual salvation of the gospel; of which also the apostle speaketh here, and maketh these words (as in the prophet) the words of God the Father to Christ his Son; testifying both his assistance of him in the accomplishment of the work of man's redemption, and his acceptance of him; according to which sense, the accepted time is the same with what the apostle calls, the fulness of time, Gal. iv. 4; (though it may also be so called in the same sense that the apostle calleth the gospel a faithful saying, worthy of all acceptation, 1 Tim. i. 15;) in which sense the gospel time was prophesied of as an acceptable time, Gen. xlix. 10; Hag. i. 8. Behold, now is the accepted time; behold, now is the day of salvation; now is that accepted or acceptable time, now is that day of salvation, spoken of by the prophet; therefore you are concerned to receive this grace of the gospel, and to live up to the rule of it.

e Rom. 14. 13. 1 Cor. 9. 12. & 10. 32. 3 *Giving no offence in any thing, that the ministry be not blamed:

Giving no offence in any thing: to give no offence signifies, to avoid all actions which may be occasion of spiritual stumbling unto others, i. e. to make them to sin against God, or estrange their hearts from Christ, and the owning and profession of his gospel. These words may be understood as a general precept given to all Christians; so it agreeth with 1 Cor. x. 30, 32; or (which the following verses seem most to favour) as referring to himself and Timothy, and other ministers of the gospel; like true pastors of the church of Christ, going out before the flock, and showing in their example what they ought to be. That the ministry be not blamed; the ministry here may either signify the office of the ministry, or the subject of it, the gospel, which, chap. v. 18, is called the ministry of reconciliation: not only the office of the ministry, but the gospel itself, suffereth by the scandalous conversation of ministers and private Christians; ignorant persons being not able, or not willing, to distinguish betwixt the faults of persons and the faults of a doctrine or office.

+ Gr. commending. ch. 4. 2. f 1 Cor. 4. 1. 4 But in all things †approving ourselves †as the ministers of God, in much patience, in afflictions, in necessities, in distresses,

But in all things approving ourselves as the ministers of God: ministers of the gospel are in the first place to be considered as the ministers of God; secondarily, as ministers and servants of the church; which they ought to serve so far, as in serving it they do obey Christ. None can approve or commend themselves for ministers of God that live a scandalous life; God hath not sent them to lay stumblingblocks in, but to remove them out of, the way of men. In much patience; patience signifies an enduring of evils quietly and cheerfully, at the command of God; or when we see it is the will of God, we should patiently submit to put our necks into the heaviest yokes. The apostle goes on reckoning up several species of those evils: afflictions is a general term, signifying any evils that wear out our bodies. Necessities signify any bodily wants of food, or raiment, or whatever is for the use of man's life. Distresses signify, properly, a man's being straitened, or thrust up in a place, so as that he knoweth not how to steer himself; and, metaphorically, a want of counsel, not knowing what to do, or which way to turn ourselves.

5 *In stripes, in imprisonments, †† in tumults, in labours, in watchings, in fastings;

In stripes: the apostle, chap. xi. 23, tells us he was in stripes above measure; and ver. 24, that of the Jews he five times received forty stripes save one: we read of his many stripes, Acts xvi. 23. In imprisonments: of the imprisonment of him and Silas, Acts xvi. 23, which was not the only time before the writing of this Epistle, as appeareth by this verse. In tumults, or seditions raised by the Jews and the heathens; we have a record of one at Ephesus, Acts xix., caused by Demetrius: others, by tumults, here, understand unfixed and uncertain habitations, tossing to and fro, so as they could be quiet in no place; but the former seemeth rather the sense of the word, as Luke xxi. 9; 1 Cor. xiv. 33. In labours; he either means labours with his hands, (which Paul was sometimes put to, as Acts xviii. 3; xx. 34,) or travels and journeys. The word is a general word, significative of any pains that men take. In watchings; religious watching, chap. xi. 27. In fastings, as acts of discipline, by which he kept under his body, and brought it into subjection, as he told us, 1 Cor. ix. 27.

6 By pureness, by knowledge, by longsuffering, by kindness, by the Holy Ghost, by love unfeigned,

By pureness: as the apostle in the former words had declared the patience of his conversation, in the enduring of the afflictions of the gospel; so in this verse he declares the more internal holiness of it, under the general notion of pureness; showed in his knowledge, faith, gentleness, kindness, or goodness towards all men. The word translated pureness, signifieth rather the universal rectitude of his heart and ways, than (as some think) the habit or exercise of any particular virtue. In or by knowledge; a right understanding and notion of spiritual things; if it doth not here signify faith, which is a superstructure on this foundation, and that habit which hath a special influence upon purifying the heart, Acts xv. 9. Without knowledge there can be no purity, Prov. xix. 2. By long-suffering; the apostle means, not being easily provoked by such as had offended him, or done him wrong. By kindness; the word translated kindness, signifies generally any goodness by which a man may show himself either sweet and pleasant, or useful and profitable, unto his neighbour. By the Holy Ghost: thus the apostle showeth how he behaved himself; but not through his own strength, but through the influence and assistance of the Holy Ghost. By love unfeigned; the love unfeigned here mentioned, is a general term, signifying that habit of grace wrought in his soul by the Holy Spirit of God, which was the principle of the long-suffering and kindness before mentioned.

7 <sup>h</sup> By the word of truth, by <sup>i</sup> the power of God, by <sup>k</sup> the armour of righteousness on the right hand and on the left,

By the word of truth; living up to and keeping our eye upon the word of God, which is the word of truth: this seemeth to be the sense, rather than speaking truth to every one, as some have thought. By the power of God; by the efficacious working of the Spirit of God upon our hearts, enabling us to live up to the doctrine we preach. Some understand here, by the power of God, that extraordinary power of working miracles, which God gave the apostles; others, the gospel, which the apostle calls the power of God unto salvation, Rom. i. 16. It may be understood of the first and the last joined together; for the gospel is no otherwise the power of God to salvation, than as it is attended to the souls of those to whom it is so made powerful, with the inward, powerful, efficacious working of the Holy Spirit. By the armour of righteousness; he means a good conscience, (which cannot be without a universal rectitude, or uprightness of life,) which is a defence against all temptations, either from prosperity or from adversity. In which sense that of Solomon is true, He that walketh uprightly, walketh surely, Prov. x. 9: and David prayeth, Psal. xxv. 21, Let integrity and uprightness preserve me.

8 By honour and dishonour, by evil report and good report: as deceivers, and yet true;

By honour and dishonour; we depart not from our integrity, whether we be honoured or dishonoured. By evil report and good report; well or evilly reported of. This hath from the beginning been the lot of all the faithful ministers of Christ; some have given them honour, others have cast reproach upon them; some have given a good report of them, some an evil report. As deceivers, and yet true; some have represented them as impostors, and such as deceived the people; others have spoken of them as true men: their business is to go through good report and bad report, honour and dishonour, still holding fast their integrity.

9 As unknown, and yet well known; as dying, and, behold, we live; as chastened, and not killed;

As unknown, and yet well known; dealt with by Jews and heathens as persons wholly unknown to them, though we be sufficiently known; or being such whom the world knoweth not, as to our state towards God, and interest in him, though it knows us well enough as to our other circumstances. As dying, and, behold, we live; so hunted and persecuted, as that we appear every day dying; yet such hath been the power of God's providence, that we yet live. As chastened, and not killed; and though our heavenly Father chasteneth us, yet we are not utterly consumed: the apostle alludeth to that, Psal. cxviii. 18, The Lord hath chastened me sore; but he hath not given me over to death.

10 As sorrowful, yet always rejoicing; as poor, yet making many rich; as having nothing, and yet possessing all things.

As sorrowful, yet always rejoicing; appearing to others as persons drowned in griefs and sorrows, yet we are always rejoicing in God, (Hab. iii. 17, 18,) and in the testimony of a good conscience, chap. i. 12. As poor, yet making many rich; in outward appearance poor, having no abundance of the good things of this life; yet making many rich in knowledge and grace, God by us dispensing to them the riches of his grace. As having nothing, and yet possessing all things: as having nothing, no houses, no lands, no silver or gold, Acts iii. 6; yet being as well satisfied and contented, as if all things were ours; as well satisfied with that little which we have, as the men of the world are with their abundance; possessing all things in Christ, though having little in the creature.

11 O ye Corinthians, our mouth is open unto you, our heart is enlarged.

Our mouth is open to speak freely to you, and to communicate to you the whole will and counsel of God; our heart is enlarged both by the love that I have towards you, and by the rejoicing that I have in you. This enlargement of my heart is that which openeth my lips, and makes me speak freely to you, both in admonishing you of your errors, and in exhorting you to your duty.

12 Ye are not straitened in us, but ye are straitened in your own bowels.

Ye are not straitened in us; if you cannot mutually rejoice in me, and what I write, or if you do not repay me the like affection, the fault is not in me; I have done my duty, and that too from a true principle of love to you. But ye are straitened in your own bowels; but it is through mistakes and misapprehensions in yourselves, your not aright conceiving of me in the discharge of my apostolical office. Or the cause of your trouble and sorrow is from yourselves, upon your suffering the incestuous person, and other scandalous persons, to abide in your communion; which was an error I could not but take notice of, according to that apostolical authority which God hath committed to me.

13 Now for a recompence in the same, (I speak as unto my children,) be ye also enlarged.

Be ye also enlarged, both in love to me, and also in obedience; it is but a just recompence for that great affection which I have borne, and upon all occasions showed to you; and also for that faithfulness which I have showed in discharging the duty of my relation to you. For I speak as a father unto children, it being but reasonable, that children should recompense to their fathers their love to them, and be as exact and faithful in their duty to their parents, as their parents are in their duty towards them.

14 Be ye not unequally yoked together with unbelievers: for what fellowship hath righteousness with unrighteousness? and what communion hath light with darkness?

Be ye not unequally yoked together with unbelievers: they too much restrain the sense of this general precept, who either limit it to religious communion with idolaters, or to civil communion in marriages. The precept is delivered in a term of more general significancy, than to be limited by either of these, though both of them, unquestionably, be comprehended in it: μή γίνεσθε ἑτεροζυγῆτες, do not become such as in the same yoke draw another way. It is a metaphor drawn from horses or oxen; which should draw together, being in the same yoke, neither standing still, nor yet holding back. It is a general precept, prohibitive of all unnecessary communion and intimate fellowship with such, as either in matters of faith or worship, or in their lives and conversations, declare themselves to be unbelievers; for why we should expound ἀπίστοις of infidels merely, I cannot tell, especially considering that the apostle, 1 Cor. v. 9—11, seems to allow a further communion with a heathen, than with a notoriously scandalous Christian. So as this precept may reasonably be interpreted by those in the former Epistle, of marrying with such, eating with them at idol-feasts, or at the Lord's table, (as chap. v.) maintaining intimate communion with them, &c. For what fellowship hath righteousness with unrighteousness? and what communion hath light with darkness? the reason he giveth, is, because they could have no comfortable communion with such; they were righteousness, those persons were unrighteousness; they were light, such persons were darkness, that is, full of the darkness of sin and ignorance. In the mean time, this precept ought not to be extended to a total avoiding of commerce with, or being in the company of, either heathens, or scandalous persons; for as to that, the same apostle had before determined it lawful, 1 Cor. v. 11. Whatever communion with such persons is either necessary from the law of God or nature, or for the support and upholding of human life and society, is lawful even with such persons; but all other is unlawful.

15 And what concord hath Christ with Belial? or what part hath he that believeth with an infidel?

And what concord hath Christ with Belial? by Belial, in this text, very good interpreters understand the devil; judging that the apostle here opposeth Christ, who is the Head of believers and of the church, to him who is the head of all unbelievers, and the god of the world. The term is used only in this place in the New Testament, but very often in the Old Testament, to express men notoriously wicked and scandalous, Deut. xiii. 13; Judg. xix. 22; 1 Sam. i. 16; ii. 12; xxv. 17; 2 Sam. xvi. 7; 2 Chron. xiii. 7. The Hebrews themselves are not agreed in the etymology of it; Psal. ci. 3, a wicked thing is called a thing of Belial (as may be seen in the margin of our bibles); so as the argument is drawn from our duty of conformity to our Head; Christ hath no fellowship with the devil, therefore we ought to have no unnecessary communion with such who manifest themselves to be of their father the devil, by their doing his works; nor hath Christ any communion with the sons of Belial. Or what part hath he that believeth with an infidel? what part or portion, that is, what society or communion, hath a believer with one that believeth not? what hath he to do with him? It was a usual phrase amongst the Jews, Josh. xxii. 25, 27. Some by this part understand, what portion in the life to come? in which sense it teacheth us, that we should maintain intimate and elective communion in this life only with such as we would gladly have our portion with in another life. But the most judicious interpreters think this is not intended in this place.

16 And what agreement hath the temple of God with idols? for ye are the temple of the living God; as God hath said, "I will dwell in them, and walk in them; and I will be their God, and they shall be my people."

And what agreement hath the temple of God with idols? this particular instance giveth some expositors occasion to interpret ver. 14, of communion with idolaters in such acts of religion as are proper to them; but nothing hinders but that that precept may be interpreted more generally, though the apostle gives this as one particular instance, wherein he would have them avoid communion with unbelievers. For ye are the temple of the living God; the argument is drawn from what the apostle had before asserted, 1 Cor. iii. 16; vi. 19, their being the temples of the Holy Ghost; which he proveth from Lev. xxvi. 12; Ezek. xxxvii. 26, 27. As God hath said, I will dwell in them, and walk in them; and I will be their God, and they shall be my people: not that what the apostle meaneth here, is the literal meaning of Lev. xxvi. 11, 12; for it is manifest, that God by Moses there is speaking not of God's dwelling in the persons of believers, or in his church, but of that gracious presence and manifestation of himself to his people in the tabernacle erected by his order. Some therefore think, that the place here alluded to, though not quoted verbatim, is that, Ezek. xxxvii. 26, 27, which is a promise respecting the kingdom of Christ; where God promiseth to make a covenant of peace with his people, and saith, I will place them, and multiply them, and will set my sanctuary in the midst of them for evermore. My tabernacle also shall be with them: yea, I will be their God, and they shall be my people. The words, as they are here quoted, are entirely to be found in no one text of holy writ; it is sufficient that they are to be found there in parts. Nor doth this text so properly speak of God's dwelling in particular believers, as of his dwelling in the churches of his people; therefore, though he speaks of many, ye are, yet temple is in the singular number. These many are but one body; the church in which God dwelleth, and with which he hath communion, which is expressed by walk in them; as in Rev. ii. 1, he is said to walk in the midst of the golden candlesticks. Nor is the term living vainly added to God; for besides that he is usually so called, as being ever-living, and the Fountain of all life; it also showeth the opposition betwixt him and idols, which are dead things: and therefore God could have no more communion with idols, than the living can have with the dead; nor could they have communion with the living God and dead idols. Nor could they be the people of the living God, and the people or worshippers of dead idols; so as those that were idolaters must lose the advantage of that covenant wherein God had said, I will be their God, and they shall be my people.

17 Wherefore come out from among them, and be ye separate, saith the Lord, and touch not the unclean thing; and I will receive you,

The apostle here quoteth words out of the Old Testament, no where to be found there syllabically, without variation, but keeping to the sense of them, which is a thing very usual with the penmen of the New Testament. The first quotation seemeth to be taken from Isa. lii. 11, Depart ye, depart ye, go ye out from thence, touch no unclean thing; go ye out of the midst of her; be ye clean, that bear the vessels of the Lord. Interpreters are not agreed as to the term from whence the prophet there admonisheth the Jews to depart: some make it to be their former sinful courses; others make it to be the kingdom of the devil and antichrist; others make it to be literal Babylon; the prophet foreseeing, that when the Jews should have a liberty given them to leave Babylon, (which happened in the time of Cyrus the Persian monarch,) some of them (now as it were incorporated with the Chaldeans) would linger, and find a difficulty to pluck up their stakes in Babylon, though it were in order to their return to Jerusalem, heretofore the joy and praise of the whole earth. Whatever was the prophet's meaning, certain it is, the apostolical precept cannot be interpreted of a leaving literal Babylon, for neither the Christian Jews, nor Gentiles, were at this time there; he must therefore be understood of a mystical Babylon. And the sense must be this, Come out and be ye separate from those with whom your souls will be in as much danger as the Jews were in the literal Babylon. But whether by these are to be understood idolaters only, or all notorious scandalous livers, is the question. The true determination of which, I conceive, dependeth upon the sense of those words, Come out, be ye separated; which words, I think, are not fully interpreted by those that follow, touch not the unclean thing; for, doubtless, the former words are a precept concerning the means to be used in order to that as an end, it being a hard thing to touch pitch, and not to be defiled therewith. On the other side, they interpret it too rigidly, who make it to be a prohibition of all commerce or company with such persons; for this is contrary to the apostolical doctrine in his former Epistle to this church, where he had allowed, chap. v., a civil commerce and traffic with the worst of men; and, chap. vii., had forbidden the separation of Christians and heathens, once joined in marriage, unless the unbeliever first departed. The text therefore must be understood only of elective and unnecessary, intimate communion; and is much the same with that, ver. 14, Be ye not unequally yoked with unbelievers. So as that it doth by no means justify the withdrawing of all civil or religious communion from those whose judgments or practice in all things we cannot approve; it only justifieth our withdrawing our communion from idolaters, and from notorious scandalous sinners in such duties and actions, or in such degrees, as we are under no obligation to have fellowship and communion with them in; and our forbearing to touch their unclean things in that fellowship and communion which we are allowed with them, having no fellowship with them in their unfruitful works of darkness, but reproving them, even while in civil things, and some religious actions, we have some fellowship with them.

18 And will be a Father unto you, and ye shall be my sons and daughters, saith the Lord Almighty.

The latter words, which are a promise of God's reception of them who for his sake withdraw from a sinful communion with idolaters and scandalous persons, are taken out of Jer. xxxi. 1, 9, and teach us this, That none can reasonably expect that God should fulfil his covenant with them, who make no conscience of fulfilling their part in it with him; nor claim the benefits of a Father, who perform not the duties of his children: but on the contrary, those who are conscientious in the discharge of their duties of filial obedience, may expect from him both the kindness and the protection of a Father; which is the more valuable because he is the Lord God Almighty, who wants no power to protect them, or so to influence them, as to make them in all things happy, as the children of so great a Father.

CHAP. VII

Paul exhorteth the Corinthians to purity of life, 1; and to receive him, who had done nothing to forfeit their esteem, 2. He repeateth the assurance of his love for them, and showeth what comfort he had received in all his troubles from the report which Titus had brought of their good dispositions toward him, 3-7; so that, upon the whole, he did not repent of having grieved them a little by letter, considering the good effects which that godly sorrow had produced, 8-12. Above all, he rejoiced to observe the good impressions which their behaviour, so answerable to his former boastings of them, had left in the mind of Titus, 13-16.

HAVING therefore these promises, dearly beloved, let us cleanse ourselves from all filthiness of the flesh and spirit, perfecting holiness in the fear of God.

1 John 3. 3.

Having therefore these promises; i. e. of God's dwelling in us, and walking with us; of God's being our Father, and making and owning us as his sons; which promises are made to true penitents that will touch no unclean thing. Let us cleanse ourselves from all filthiness of the flesh and the spirit; let us, through the assistance of Divine grace, endeavour to cleanse ourselves, or keep ourselves clean, not only from fleshly filthiness, such as are sins of intemperance, drunkenness, uncleanness; but also from spiritual filthiness. extravagant passions, corrupt affections, pride, envy, rash anger, idolatry, contention, division. Perfecting holiness in the fear of God; and that, because we are not only obliged to holiness, but to perfect holiness, in, or through, the fear of the Lord; awing our hearts, lest we should profane the temple of the Lord, or behave ourselves as undutiful sons to so good a Father. So far are God's promises, and our belief of them, or affiance in God for the fulfilling of them, from hindering us in the practice and exercise of holiness, that there can be no more potent motive to persuade the perfection of holiness; and that not only from the argument of Divine love, contained in the promises, but from the consideration of the persons to whom, and the conditions upon which, the promises are made.

2 Receive us; we have wronged no man, we have corrupted no man, <sup>b</sup> we have defrauded no man.

Receive us; let us have a room in your hearts and esteem, or (more generally) accept us, as you ought to receive and accept the ministers of Christ. As our heart is enlarged towards you, so let your hearts be enlarged towards us; we have done nothing to alienate your hearts from us. We have wronged no man; we have done no harm to any of you, we have not been like the shepherds that merely take the fleece, and eat the flesh of the flock: Acts xx. 33, I have coveted no man's silver, or gold, or apparel. We have corrupted no man; we have corrupted none by any false doctrine, or by flattering speeches, or by bribes or gifts. We have defrauded no man; we have cheated or defrauded no man. By which vindication of or apology for himself and his fellow labourers, it is not improbably judged, that the apostle reflecteth upon those false apostles and teachers that were crept into this church, who had wronged him, corrupted them, and been too busy in other ways to pick their pockets. Nothing becometh more a minister of the gospel, than innocence and righteousness; nothing more commends him unto his people: for though they are easily persuaded that an innocent and just man must be a pious man, yet they are difficultly persuaded, (and there is no reason for it,) that an unjust or mischievous man can be so. Men are so mad of their lusts, that oftentimes teachers who will favour them in them, though never so unjust and unrighteous in their actings, shall find more favour with them, than the most righteous person that will not spare them as to their Herodias. But he who will entertain the least hopes to bring men off from their lusts and sinful practices, is concerned above all men to be innocent and righteous.

3 I speak not this to condemn you: <sup>c</sup> for I have said before, that ye are in our hearts to die and live with you.

The apostle deals very tenderly with this church, which was (as he knew very well) full of many touchy members; who upon all occasions were ready to reflect upon him, and to take occasion from any expressions of his in letters, as well as other things, to that purpose; to obviate whose whisperings, the apostle tells them, that he did not speak this to reflect upon or expose them, as if they had wronged or defrauded him; for the love which he bare to them was such, as would admit of no such thing; he so loved them, as that he could live and die with them.

4 <sup>d</sup> Great is my boldness of speech toward you, <sup>e</sup> great is my glorying of you: <sup>f</sup> I am filled with comfort, I am exceeding joyful in all our tribulation.

Great is my boldness of speech toward you; because I so dearly love you, therefore I speak so boldly and freely to you (as men use to speak most freely to those whom they most love). Great is my glorying of you; I boast of your obedience to others, and therefore would be far from exposing you. And this I do not feignedly, for I am filled with comfort on your behalf (a further account of this he giveth us afterward). I am exceeding joyful in all our tribulation; yea, (saith he,) the report I have received of your carriage and behaviour, upon your receipt of my former Epistle, hath filled me with a joy that balanceth all the affliction and tribulation that I meet with for the gospel. So good news to a faithful minister is the repentance and reformation of any member or members that belong to his flock; whereas the hireling, or false teacher, is not much concerned whether the souls of his people do well or ill.

5 For, <sup>g</sup> when we were come into Macedonia, our flesh had no rest, but <sup>h</sup> we were troubled on every side; <sup>i</sup> without <sup>j</sup> were fightings, within <sup>k</sup> were fears.

Of this motion of the apostle's into Macedonia, what he did and suffered there, we have a short account, Acts xx. He saith his flesh had no rest, he met with incessant storms of persecution; and was troubled both by Jews and Gentiles in all places where he came. Without were fightings; by persons that were without the Christian church; such were the generality of the Jews and Gentiles; within were fears; and by false brethren within, or with his own fears, lest those violent dealings should be temptations to Christians, being yet tender and young in the faith, to relapse and apostatize.

6 Nevertheless <sup>l</sup> God, that comforteth <sup>m</sup> those that are cast down, comforted us by <sup>n</sup> the coming of Titus;

God, that comforteth those that are cast down: it is observable, how careful the apostle is to ascribe all the supports and reliefs of his spirit unto God. Nor is this notion, or name, of God unuseful to any that fear him, who through any casualties or contingences of this life shall happen to be cast down. It advantageth our faith in prayer, in any such straits, to consider God as having taken to himself the name of him that comforteth those that are cast down. Comforted us by the coming of Titus: it is only the coming of Titus, his fellow labourer, and one dear to him, that he mentioneth in this verse, as the means of his support and relief; yet he entitleth God to his comfort under his dejection. God comforteth his people variously, sometimes by his good word, sometimes by his providence; he what will the instrumental cause, God is the principal efficient.

7 And not by his coming only, but by the consolation wherewith he was comforted in you, when he told us your earnest desire, your mourning, your fervent mind toward me; so that I rejoiced the more.

And not by his coming only, but by the consolation wherewith he was comforted in you: I was glad to see Titus, but that was the least of that consolation which he brought me. You had before much comforted and rejoiced him, and he being come to me, made me a partaker of his consolation, upon his beholding or being a witness to your earnest desire, to give me satisfaction in the things about which I wrote to you; your mourning, either for those scandals amongst you, of which I have given you notice; or for my afflicted state and condition; or for the offence you had given me, which caused me to write that sharp letter to you. Your fervent mind toward me; so that I rejoiced the more: your earnest desire to give me satisfaction, and yield obedience to my admonitions, or to maintain and defend my honour and reputation against such as had impeached and wounded it; these things much augmented my rejoicing in and over you. Nothing so much rejoiceth the heart of a conscientious, faithful minister of Christ, as to see his people's obedience to the doctrine of the gospel, which he is an instrument to communicate to them.

8 For though I made you sorry with a letter, I do not repent, <sup>o</sup> though I did re- <sup>p</sup> pent: for I perceive that the same epistle hath made you sorry, though <sup>q</sup> it were but for a season.

For though I made you sorry with a letter; the apostle doubtless meaneth the former Epistle to this church. I do not repent, though I will repent: as to which, he saith, that although he was sometimes troubled, because (probably) he understood that some truly pious persons in this church were troubled at it, as thinking themselves intended in the reprehensions of it; for which effect, or mistake, (he saith,) he was once sorry, being troubled that he should do any thing to grieve them, whom he so affectionately loved; yet now he tells them he was not sorry. The same epistle hath made you sorry, though it were but for a season; and their sorrow was but a temporary sorrow, until they could reform those abuses, which they were made sensible of by that Epistle, and give the apostle that wrote it just satisfaction.

9 Now I rejoice, not that ye were made sorry, but that ye sorrowed to repentance: for ye were made sorry || after a godly manner, that ye might receive damage by us in nothing.

¶ Or, according to God.

Now I rejoice, not that ye were made sorry, but that ye sorrowed to repentance: the apostle takes all advantages to insinuate himself into the good opinion and affections of the members of this famous church, and to obviate any misrepresentations of him to them from those false teachers that were crept in amongst them. Lest they should take some advantage from his saying, that he repented not that he had made them sorry, he here openeth himself, and tells them, he did not rejoice in their sorrow, but in the blessed product and effect of it; which was their reformation of those abuses and errors which he had reproved them for, the effect of which reproof was this their sorrow for a little season. And that they were made sorry after a godly manner; they did not sow in tears, they reaped in joy; they had a wet seed-time, but a fair harvest. They sorrowed with a sorrow according to God; the cause of their sorrow was their sin, the root of it a love to God, the manner of it such as was agreeable to the will of God. That ye might receive damage by us in nothing; the wise God so governing things by his providence, that nothing which the apostle spake or wrote should prove detrimental, but rather advantageous; to this church which he so loved.

Godly sorrow; that sorrow which is according to God, either commanded by him, (as sorrow for our own or others' sins, or for the judgments of God, as they are the indications of God's wrath and displeasure for sin,) or which he, as the God of grace, worketh in the soul, touching the heart by the finger of his Spirit, Zech. xii. 10. Or that sorrow whose end is the glory of God, in the reformation of the person sorrowing, by a hatred and detestation of sin, and a hearty turning from it. Worketh repentance to salvation not to be repented of; it is not repentance, but it produceth that change of heart and life which is repentance; and shall not be imperfect, but perfect, which shall issue in the salvation of the soul, and will never be repented of. Never did any when he came to die repent of true repentance; nor is it possible that reasonable souls should repent of what issueth in their eternal salvation. But the sorrow of the world worketh death; but all sorrow except this is but the sorrow of the world, the effect of which is oftentimes natural death; while men bow down under their burdens, and through impatience destroy themselves, or at least so fix their thoughts upon sad objects, and so afflict themselves with them, that they bring themselves into diseases tending to death. It also worketh spiritual death; as it indisposeth men for their duty, (as it was in the case of Elijah,) and is a temptation to them to be angry against God, (as in the case of Jonah,) to fret, murmur, and repine against God's providence: and by this means it also worketh towards eternal death, which is the wages belonging to sin.

11 For behold this selfsame thing, that ye sorrowed after a godly sort, what carefulness it wrought in you, yea, what clearing of yourselves, yea, what indignation, yea, what fear, yea, what vehement desire, yea, what zeal, yea, what revenge! In all things ye have approved yourselves to be clear in this matter.

The apostle having showed the mischievous effects of worldly sorrow, all which he comprehended under the word death, here showeth the blessed effects of that sorrow which is according to God. What carefulness it wrought in you! the first he mentioneth is great carefulness, both to make our peace with God for our former violations of his law, (using all means he hath prescribed and directed thereunto,) and also to preserve our peace, by avoiding the like breaches for the time to come. What clearing of yourselves! the Corinthians' sorrow might work in some of them a clearing or purging themselves of that guilt which other members of that church had incurred. But there is another clearing of ourselves, which true repentance worketh, not by denying the fact, but by confessing it, with taking shame to ourselves; which, though it be not a clearing of a person from the fact, yet, through Divine grace, joined with a reformation, it is a clearing him from the guilt thereof. What indignation! what a displeasure against yourselves for your follies! What fear! not so much of the wrath of God, as lest you should again fall into the like temptations, and be overcome by them. What vehement desire! what hearty prayers to God, that for the time to come you might be kept from the like temptations! What zeal! what warmth and great degrees of all sanctified affections; love to God, hatred of sin, fear of offending God, desire to please him! What revenge! what acts of discipline, fasting, denying of yourselves in some lawful things wherein you may have offended, or the too free use of which may have been to you occasions of offending. In all things ye have approved yourselves to be clear in this matter; by these acts, though some of you have been to be blamed, yet the body of you have showed yourselves clear of this matter; or though all of you have been formerly too guilty of some things I have charged you with, yet you have cleared yourselves both to God, who imputeth no sin to him that confesseth his sin and forsaketh it, and to me, who am abundantly satisfied with your declared sorrow, repentance, and reformation.

12 Wherefore, though I wrote unto you, I did it not for his cause that had done the wrong, nor for his cause that suffered wrong, <sup>2</sup>but that our care for <sup>2</sup>ch. 2. 4 you in the sight of God might appear unto you.

I did it not for his cause that had done the wrong; for the cause of him that had abused his father's wife, not out of any particular hatred or ill-will I had to him; nor for his cause that suffered wrong; nor for the sake of him whose wife was so abused; nor for my own sake, who had been so abused, and suffered wrong by you. But that our care for you in the sight of God might appear to you; but only out of a love to your souls, and a care I had for you, that in all things you might approve yourselves unto God. Or possibly this text is more generally be interpreted, without respect either to the incestuous person in particular, or to his father; and the sense of the verse no more than this: Though in my former Epistle I wrote something sharply to you, yet I did it not in any passion, nor was I drawn aside by any prejudice or hatred of any person, nor out of any partial affection to any, as to any thing for which I blamed you; but out of that general love and affection which I have to you all, which produceth in me a care of and a solicitude for you, that you might do no evil; which care I was willing should appear to you.

13 Therefore we were comforted in your comfort: yea, and exceedingly the more joyed we for the joy of Titus, because his spirit <sup>3</sup>was refreshed by you all. <sup>3</sup>2 Rom. 16.

We were comforted in your comfort; the comfort which your letters brought us, and so came from you; or the comfort which you received upon your reformation of those things which were amiss amongst you. And we also joyed for the joy that Titus conceived, upon his understanding of your affairs, and your ready obedience to the Epistle which I wrote to you: such is the union betwixt the true members of Christ, that they are comforted with one another's comforts, and afflicted with one another's sorrows and griefs.

14 For if I have boasted any thing to him of you, I am not ashamed; but as we spake all things to you in truth, even so our boasting, which I made before Titus, is found a truth.

The apostle here multiplieth expressions to sweeten the Corinthians, by all manner of ways declaring his value for and affection towards them. It appeareth by this, that the apostle had at some time before spoken something to Titus in commendation of this church of Corinth, which he here calleth a boasting of them; he now again boasted, that he had said nothing but the truth, which Titus had experienced, and reported to him.

15 And his † inward affection is more abundant toward you, whilst he remembereth the obedience of you all, how with fear and trembling ye received him.

By your obedience to my admonitions and exhortations, you have not only obliged me in a debt of love to you, but Titus also; who joyfully remembers, with what fear and trembling you received him, lest he should find any thing amongst you that should grieve and offend him.

16 I rejoice therefore that I have confidence in you in all things.

That I can write and speak to you with confidence that you will hearken to my admonitions and exhortations, and that I can confidently boast and glory concerning you.

CHAP. VIII

Paul extollet the liberal contributions of the Macedonian churches for the relief of the brethren in Judea, 1—5; and recommendeth the like charity to the Corinthians, as well beseming their other graces, 6—8; enforced by Christ's example, 9; consistent with the aiaerity they had already expressed therein, 10—12; and a precedent which might in time be of use to themselves, 13—15. He letteth them know the willingness of Titus to come and further this good work among them; and commendeth him to their love, together with the brethren, men of special worth, who were sent with him on the same errand, 16—24.

MOREOVER, brethren, we do you to wit of the grace of God bestowed on the churches of Macedonia;

The apostle in this chapter proceedeth to a new argument, viz. the pressing of this church to acts of charity. This is that which he here calleth the grace of God bestowed on the churches of Macedonia, putting the cause for the effect. Bounty or liberality to the poor saints and members of Christ, as such, floweth from that habit of love by which men are taught of God to love one another; for though men, from a natural goodness, or habits of moral virtue, may relieve men as men, compassionating persons in misery; yet none, from any such principle, do good to any members of the household of faith, as such; such rather feel from them the effects of their hatred, in taking what is their own from them.

2 How that in a great trial of affliction the abundance of their joy and their deep poverty abounded unto the riches of their † liberality.

In a great trial of affliction; how great the afflictions of the churches in Macedonia were, both from the Jews and pagans, may be read in chap. xvi. and xvii. of the Acts. Afflictions are called trials, because under them God maketh a trial of our faith, patience, and constancy; and the devil also, ordinarily, by them trieth to draw out our lusts and corruptions. The abundance of their joy and their deep poverty abounded unto the riches of their liberality; God made their inward peace and joy in the Holy Ghost so to abound in them under their trials, that though they were poor, (deeply poor,) yet they abounded in the riches of liberality; not ministering to the necessities of their poor brethren in proportion to their abilities, or as might have been expected from men under their circumstances, but showing themselves rich in their liberality, though poor in their estates, and as to what they had of this world's goods.

3 For to their power, I bear record, yea, and beyond their power they were willing of themselves;

Two things the apostle commendeth in the charity of the churches of Macedonia: first, the quantity of their gift, which, he saith, was to their power, yea, (on his knowledge,) beyond what they were able. Secondly, their freedom in the action; so as they did not need the apostle's exhortations and arguments, but did it of themselves freely and cheerfully.

4 Praying us with much intreaty that we would receive the gift, and take upon us the fellowship of the ministering to the saints.

Bringing what they had freely collected amongst themselves to the apostles, and importuning them to receive it at their hands, and to take upon them the work of distributing it.

5 And this they did, not as we hoped, but first gave their own selves to the Lord, and unto us by the will of God.

We might have hoped for something from them, though they were in that poor afflicted condition; but what they brought was much beyond what we could hope for, or expect from them. Or else this phrase may refer to what followeth: they did not only bring us their gift, but they also gave up themselves to us, to be disposed of for the good of the church, according to the will of God; for they first gave themselves up to the Lord, devoting themselves to his service and glory, and then to us, the will of God so ruling and directing them.

6 Insomuch that we desired Titus, that as he had begun, so he would also finish in you the same || grace also.

The same grace, in this place, signifieth no more than the same gift, or the same good work, in collecting in the church of Corinth. If by grace here be understood the grace of God, the cause is put for the effect (as we had it in the first verse); but τὴν χάριν being not here added, possibly it had been better translated gift, or free contribution; for how a minister should finish the grace of God, is hard to conceive; and the phrase is at best very hard, but he may be an instrument for completing a good work, which is done from a habit of Divine grace, by exhortations and arguments, which he may use to press the performance of it. Titus (it seemeth) had been diligent in some other places to make this collection; going to Corinth, the apostle presseth him to go on with it there also.

7 Therefore, as ye abound in every thing, in faith, and utterance, and knowledge, and in all diligence, and in your love to us, see that ye abound in this grace also.

Though the apostle made little use of oratory in his ordinary discourses and epistles, yet he knew how to use it when it might be of probable advantage for the ends which he aimed at, viz. the glory of God, and the good of the souls that were under his care. He did not turn divinity into mere words and rhetorical flourishes; yet he made use of these sometimes, as a waiting-maid to divinity. Being therefore to press upon these Corinthians this great duty of charity, he insinuateth himself into them, by telling them, that they abounded in all other spiritual habits: Faith, by which they had both steadily assented to the truth of gospel propositions, and also received Christ. Utterance, by which they were enabled either to speak with tongues, or to God in prayer, or to men by prophecy and exhortation. Knowledge, both of things Divine and human. And in love to the ministers of the gospel, which if it did not appear in all, yet it did in many of them. And from hence he fetcheth an argument to press them to be complete in this habit of grace. The force of the apostle's argument lies, in the duty of all Christians to strive after perfection, and that natural desire, which is in all ingenuous people, to be perfect in that good of which they have a taste in less perfect degrees.

1 Cor. 7. 6. 8 'I speak not by commandment, but by occasion of the forwardness of others, and to prove the sincerity of your love.

I do not speak in an imperious way, as one that commandeth you; or rather, God hath no where given an express command as to the quantum of what you should give; but the forwardness of others makes me thus speak to you, as not being willing you should in good works come behind any churches; and that I might prove the sincerity of your love, to God, to me, and to the poor afflicted saints that are in Judea. Though God hath not directed the particular sums we should give to those that are in need, yet he hath given us general rules; That we should give as God hath prospered us, 1 Cor. xvi. 2; and so as there may be some equality, as the apostle speaketh, ver. 14. So, as the sincerity of our love to God dependeth in some measure upon the proportion of what we give at his command, so doth also the sincerity of our love to those poor members of Christ that are in want; that there may be a moderate supply for their want, from our abundance.

9 For ye know the grace of our Lord Jesus Christ, * that, though he was rich, yet for your sakes he became poor, that ye through his poverty might be rich.

For ye know the grace of our Lord Jesus Christ; call to mind the free love of your Lord and Master Jesus Christ, which you know, believing the gospel, which gives you a true account of it, and having in your own souls experienced the blessed effects of it. He was rich, being the Heir of all things, the Lord of the whole creation, Heb. i. 2, all things were put under his feet. Yet for your sakes he became poor; yet that he might accomplish the work of your redemption, and purchase his Father's love for you, he took upon him the form of a servant, stripped himself of his robes of glory, and clothed himself with the rags of flesh, denied himself in the use of his creatures, had not where to lay down his head, was maintained from alms, people ministering to him of their substance. That ye through his poverty might be rich; and all this that you might be made rich, with the riches of grace and glory; rich in the love of God, and in the habits of Divine grace; which was all effected by his poverty, by his making himself of no reputation, and humbling himself. If after your knowledge of this, by receiving and believing the gospel, and experiencing this, in those riches of spiritual gifts and graces and hopes of glory which you have, you shall yet be found strait-hearted in compassionating the poverty and afflicted state of his poor members, or strait-handed in ministering unto them, how will you in any measure answer this great love, or conform to this great example?

10 And herein <sup>b</sup> I give my advice: for <sup>c</sup> this is expedient for you, who have begun before, not only to do, but also to be <sup>d</sup> forward a year ago.

Giving to those that were in want, was matter of precept (it being what the law of God and nature did require); but giving as the Macedonians had given, not only to, but beyond, their ability, was not so. Or, possibly, the apostle's saying, I give my advice, doth not suppose what he advised to be no commanded duty; friends may advise us to what is our duty to do. For, saith the apostle, this is expedient for you; for your profit, or for your honour and reputation. A precept alone ought to oblige us to this doing of the thing commanded, but the profit, credit, and honour of the action adds an edge to the duty, and layeth us under a double obligation; the first, of obedience to God; the second, of being wise for ourselves. Who have begun before, not only to do, but also to be forward a year ago: the apostle proveth the expediency of it from the concern of their reputation in it; that they might not be thought to have gone backward, or to become weary of well-doing, in regard they had begun this charitable work some time before. Object. But how cometh he here to put doing before willing (for so it is in the Greek, not only to do, but also to will)? Some tell us these hystero-logies, or putting things after which should in order be before, are usual in holy writ; but possibly it is better answered by others, that ἑλπίω here doth not signify the mere inclination of the will, but a forwardness, (thus our translators understood it, and therefore translate it to be forward,) or a spontaneous willingness, without arguments used by others to persuade them to it. So as the sense is this, You not only began to do the thing a year ago, but you did it of your own accord, without our exhortations and arguments, of your own free mind and will; so as if you should now be behind-hand, it would be a reproach to you. This sense is favoured by the next verse, what he here calls a willing, he there calls a readiness to will.

11 Now therefore perform the doing of it: that as there was a readiness to will, so there may be a performance also out of that which ye have.

Ye showed yourselves some time since free to will the thing which I am now pressing you unto, you have now opportunity to do it, and the example of other churches going before you in the doing of it; show yourselves now constant by the doing of it; that seeing God hath given you something of this world's goods, and that in proportions beyond your poor brethren, as you pretended a great readiness a great while since to relieve them, so you may by your performance justify that it was not all a mere pretence.

12 For <sup>1</sup> if there be first a willing mind, <sup>2</sup> it is accepted according to that a man hath, and not according to that he hath not.

He had before directed them to give out of that which they had, that is, in a proportion to what God had blessed them with; for he tells them that it is the willing mind which God accepteth, not the quantity of the gift. God doth not require of people things not in their power, yet bare velleities, or pretended willings, are not accepted; there must be an acting according to our power to justify the sincerity of our willing mind, and men vainly pretend to will that towards the performance of which they never move. Though God requireth not of us things that are not within our power, yet he requireth of us the putting forth of our power in doing what he hath commanded us, so far as we are able; which indeed can alone justify the willingness of our mind to be more than a mere pretence. A present impotency, if contracted by our own fault, will not excuse us from the performance of those acts as to which it doth extend, to which some are bound by the just laws of God or men; but it is very unreasonable to think it should excuse us as to those acts to which it doth not extend, and as to which it cannot be pleaded.

13 For I mean not that other men be eased, and ye burdened:

I do not press you to such proportions in giving as should make your afflicted brethren rich, and you poor.

14 But by an equality, that now at this time your abundance may be a supply for their want, that their abundance also may be a supply for your want: that there may be equality:

But by an equality; but only to bring you and them to some equality, that they might not starve while you have plenty, and what you may well enough spare. That now at this time your abundance may be a supply for their want; I do not urge you to make your necessaries a supply for others' wants; I would only have a supply for their wants out of your abundance. That their abundance also may be a supply for your want: some by their abundance understand their aboundings in the good things of this life: they are now in distress by reason of the great famine that is in Judea, or by reason of the great storm of persecution that is there raised against Christians; yet God may turn the scales, he may send a famine in those parts where you live, and there may be plenty in Judea; then their abundance may supply your wants. Others interpret their abundance of the aboundings of their grace, which may quicken them up to pray for you, for the supply of such grace to you as you stand in need of. That so there may be an equality, they being instruments of spiritual blessings to you, as you are instruments of temporal blessings and good things to them.

15 As it is written, <sup>m</sup> He that had gathered much had nothing over; and he that had gathered little had no lack.

This quotation would incline us to think, that the abundance mentioned in the latter part of the former verse, as also the equality mentioned in the end of it, is rather to be understood with reference to the good things of this life, than with reference to spiritual blessings, or to temporal and spiritual put together, balancing one another to make an equality. For certain it is, that this quotation referreth to manna, which was the bread God afforded for the bodies of his people in the wilderness, though, considered typically, it is rightly by the apostle called spiritual meat, 1 Cor. x. 3; signifying that bread which came down from heaven, which Moses could not give, as Christ tells us, John vi. 32, 58. These words are quoted from Exod. xvi. 18, though more agreeably to the Septuagint than to our translation. The history is this: The manna being fallen, the text saith, ver. 17, that some gathered more, some less; but it so fell out, by the providence of God ordering it, that when they came and measured what they had gathered, he that gathered much had nothing over, and he that gathered little had no lack. Now of this the apostle makes an argument to press the Corinthians to this charitable act. The force of which lies in this: As it was in the case of manna; there were some that gathered more, others that gathered less, yet all had enough; so it will be as to the riches of the world that men gather, though some gather more, and others gather less, yet men will find, that those that have gathered little, (have less estates than others,) using what they have to the glory of God, and according to the Divine rule, will have no lack; and those that have gathered much, if they do not distribute it according to the will of God, will find that they have nothing over; God will shrink their heap into some equality to those whom at God's command they would not relieve: Eccles. v. 10, He that loveth silver shall not be satisfied with silver. The wisdom of the Divine providence hath not ordained levelling, nor made all men equal in their portions of the good things of this life; but he hath willed such an equality as every one may eat, (unless he or she that will not work,) either from the sweat of their own faces, or from the charity of others. Besides, nature craveth no great things, but is satisfied with a little; so that he that hath gathered little shall have no lack, if he can but moderate the excesses of his appetite; and he that hath gathered much hath nothing over, what is either necessary for himself and his family, or what he ought to part with for the relief of others at the command of God.

16 But thanks be to God, which put the same earnest care into the heart of Titus for you.

17 For indeed he accepted <sup>n</sup> the exhortation; but being more forward, of his own accord he went unto you.

The apostle, by his exhortation, put Titus upon this employment of making at Corinth an extraordinary collection for the poor Christians that were in Judea; but it should seem, that when he did it, Titus let him know, that he was before resolved upon it: so as, though he went at the entreaty of the apostle, yet he went also of his own accord, having resolved upon the work before the apostle spoke to him of it. To let us know, that we are not sufficient of ourselves so much as to think one good thought, he gives thanks to God for putting this earnest care into the heart of Titus.

18 And we have sent with him <sup>o</sup> the brother, whose praise is in the Gospel throughout all the churches;

Who this other brother was, whether Luke, or Barnabas, or Silas, or Apollos, or Mark, is not much material; it is plain, whoever he was, that he was a brother and a minister, one who had a good repute for preaching the gospel.

19 And not that only, but who was also <sup>p</sup> chosen of the churches to travel with us with this grace, which is administered by us <sup>q</sup> to the glory of the same Lord, and declaration of your ready mind:

And that he was chosen by the churches to go along with Paul and Titus, to carry the charity of other churches to the distressed Christians in Judea; which charity is here again called grace, for the reason before mentioned, ver. 1. He declares that their end in this administration, was the glory of God, and the proof and declaration of these Corinthians' sincerity of brotherly love, and ready mind to yield obedience to the will of God declared to them.

20 Avoiding this, that no man should blame us in this abundance which is administered by us:

I have sent more than one as witnesses of what is done in this service, that none might reflect upon those trusted with the charity of divers churches, as if they converted any part of it to their own private use, and did not distribute it to those for whom it was given. The apostle here commendeth to all ministers and Christians, a prudent foresight of such scandalous imputations, as they may be exposed to (be their sincerity what it will) from the men of the world, who have no good-will towards them; and a provision against them. Paul could have trusted Titus in the distribution of these alms, but he did not know what the world might say, had he discharged the trust alone; he therefore takes in one with him, to be a witness of his actions.

21 <sup>r</sup> Providing for honest things, not only in the sight of the Lord, but also in the sight of men.

He had said the same, Rom. xii. 17. In both places he instructeth us, what is the great duty of all Christians, but of ministers especially, (who are as cities built upon a hill, and cannot be hid, and against whom ill men are much more ready to open their mouths, than against private Christians of a more obscure condition.) viz. to provide things honest, not only in the sight of God, (having an eye, that in our actions we do nothing which God hath forbidden us, nor omit any thing which God hath commanded us,) but also looking that in our conversation we (as much as in us lies) do those things which have a good report amongst men, Phil. iv. 8. For besides that we are obliged to give no offence to Jews or Gentiles, nor any way to alienate them from the ways of God, we are also obliged to do what in us lieth to win and gain them to Christ; to which, the doing of actions which they account dishonest (though, it may be, some are not so upon a strict inquiry) is no fitting mean.

22 And we have sent with them our brother, whom we have oftentimes proved diligent in many things, but now much more diligent, upon the great confidence which I have in you.

This brother is uncertainly guessed at, nor is it at all material for us to know whether it were Epenetus, or Apollos, or Sosthenes, or any other; it is sufficient for us to know, that he was a brother, and one of whose diligence and faithfulness the apostle, and the churches where Paul now was, had had experience; and that he was now very ready and forward to be employed in this service, upon the apostle's recommendation of this church unto him.

23 Whether any do enquire of Titus, he is my partner and fellowhelper concerning you; or our brethren be enquired of, they are <sup>s</sup> the messengers of the churches, and the glory of Christ.

This verse contains the apostle's credential letters, given to Titus, and the other two persons, sent about the business of making this collection in the church of Corinth. Many, in matters where the drawing of their purses is solicited and concerned, are very scrupulous and inquisitive, seeking all advantages to excuse themselves; one while pleading their own poverty, another while objecting against the state, or want, or quality of those for whom they are solicited; again, questioning whether their charity shall ever come to those persons for whom it is desired, objecting against the persons intrusted with the conveyance or distribution of it. The apostle having, therefore, before obviated some objections, he here obviateth the last mentioned, letting them know, that the persons intrusted with this service were unexceptionable persons. He calleth Titus his partner and fellow-helper concerning them, that is, in the business of the gospel, and promoting the salvation of their souls. For the others, he tells them they were such as the churches had thought fit to make their messengers; so had the credit of the churches, whose messengers they were, who would not have intrusted them if they had not judged them faithful. He calleth either the churches, or them, the glory of Christ. If the words be to be understood of the messengers. (which seemeth the fairest application of them,) the meaning is, that they were instruments of the glory of Christ: or persons who, by their grace, did bring much glory to Christ. Every one that excelloth in the habits or exercise of grace, is the glory of Christ, because without Christ he can do nothing of that nature: I live; yet not I, but Christ liveth in me, Gal. ii. 20. The acts and exercises of grace are indeed our acts, but the power by which we do them is from Christ: we glory in Christ, and by our holy conversations glorify Christ; and Christ glorieth in every pious and holy person, as God did concerning Job, chap. i. 8; ii. 3.

24 Wherefore shew ye to them, and before the churches, the proof of your love, and of our 'boasting on your behalf.

The chapter concludeth with an exhortation to their liberality, backed with a heap of arguments. 1. It would be an evidence of their love to God, to their afflicted brethren, and to the apostle. 2. It would be a proof of it to those messengers of the churches, and to the churches whose messengers they were. 3. It would evidence that the apostle had not, to Titus and others, boasted on their behalf in vain.

CHAP. IX

Paul sheweth the reason why, though he knew the forwardness of the Corinthians, he had sent the brethren beforehand to make up their collections against his coming, 1—5. He stirreth them up to give bountifully and cheerfully, as a likely means to increase their store, 6—11; and as productive of many thanksgivings unto God, 12—15.

FOR as touching *the ministering to the saints; it is superfluous for me to write to you:

I should think the particle γὰρ, here translated for, had been better translated but, as in 1 Pet. iv. 15, and 2 Pet. i. 9, our translators do render it. So these words contain an elegant revocation of himself from the argument he had dwelt upon in the whole former chapter, and the sense amounts to this: But to what purpose do I multiply words to you, to persuade you to minister to the saints in distress? as to you, it is superfluous. By this art letting them know, that he had no doubt, but a confident expectation, concerning them; the suggesting of which hath also the force of another argument, that they might not deceive the apostle's good opinion and confidence of them.

2 For I know <sup>b</sup>the forwardness of your mind, <sup>c</sup>for which I boast of you to them of Macedonia, that <sup>d</sup>Achaia was ready a year ago; and your zeal hath provoked very many.

He gives them the reason why he judgeth it superfluous to write to them, because they had a forward mind of themselves, and needed not to be spurred on. This the apostle tells them that he knew, (he had told them of it, chap. viii. 10.) he knew it either from themselves, or from some that came from them unto him; and he had boasted of them for this their forwardness in this good work to the churches of Macedonia. And your zeal hath provoked very many; he tells them, that their warmth unto, and in, this work, had kindled a heat in many in those parts where he was. Having therefore been so forward in this good work, and so good instruments to kindle a heat in others, he would not have them now come behind others, or grow cold in it.

3 *Yet have I sent the brethren, lest our boasting of you should be in vain in this behalf; that, as I said, ye may be ready:

I did not send the brethren so much to move you to this work, or quicken you to it, for you yourselves purposed it a year ago, and showed a forwardness in it; the motion proceeded from yourselves, and you showed a readiness to it, which gave me occasion to boast of you to the churches of Macedonia; but I thought you might forget it, and I would not have our boasting in vain on this behalf. And besides, I would have the work done, that your alms might not be to gather when I come, (as he had said, 1 Cor. xvi. 2.) but might be in a readiness to be taken and carried away; for that is signified here by being ready, not that readiness of mind of which he had before spoken, and which he had before mentioned as what he had found in them.

4 Lest haply if they of Macedonia come with me, and find you unprepared, we (that we say not, ye) should be ashamed in this same confident boasting.

For if I should come, and any of the members of the churches of Macedonia, who have heard me boasting of you as a people very forward in this charitable work, and when they are come they should find you had done nothing, only talked much of your readiness, both I should be ashamed, and you also might see some cause to blush, which I, who consult your honour and reputation equally with my own, would prevent.

5 Therefore I thought it necessary to exhort the brethren, that they would go before unto you, and make up beforehand your † bounty, † whereof ye had notice before, that the same might be ready, as a matter of bounty, and not as of covetousness.

This was the cause why I judged it reasonable to send the three brethren, before mentioned, unto you, that they might make up your bounty; προκαταρίωσθε, not so much to move, quicken, or exhort you to it, as to hasten the despatch and perfecting of it, that your money might be ready gathered. The word which we translate bounty, in the Greek signifieth blessing, which agreeth with the Hebrew dialect. Abigail's present to David in his distress is called בְּרָכָה, a blessing, 1 Sam. xxv. 27: so Jacob called his present to his brother Esau, Gen. xxxiii. 11. Such kind of reliefs are called a blessing in both the Hebrew and the Greek tongue: 1. Because they are a part of God's blessing upon him that gives, Psal. xxiv. 5. 2. Because the giving of them is a recognition or acknowledgment how far God hath blessed persons, they giving as the Lord hath prospered them, 1 Cor. xvi. 2. 3. Because they are an indication of the blessing, or well-wishing, of him that giveth to him that receiveth the gift. 4. Because they are a real doing good to the person that receiveth them, an actual blessing of him. 5. Possibly they are (in him that gives) an effectual, real blessing of God; for we then bless God with what we have, when we use and improve it for the ends for which he hath given it to us. It is very observable, that a liberal, free giving to the relief of the servants of God in distress, is called χάρις and εὐλογία, grace and blessing; a heart to it being created in us from the free grace of God, and the work itself being a real, actual blessing of God with our substance, and the fruit of our increase: which two things well digested, will be potent arguments to charity with every soul that knoweth any thing of God, or hath any love for God. That the same might be ready; that the same may be ready gathered, not to gather when I come. As a blessing, we translate it, as a matter of bounty: the sense is the same. Not as of covetousness: the meaning is, I have also sent the brethren, that they may persuade you to a free and liberal contribution, a giving that may look like a blessing, not as proceeding from a narrow heart, in which the love of money prevaileth above the love of God. Giving to the distressed saints of God sparingly, and disproportionately to what estate we have, no ways looks like a blessing; he that so gives, doth not, according to the apostle's phrase, give ὡς εὐλογίαν for he neither gives as the Lord hath blessed and prospered him, nor yet according to what God requires of him; for he withholdeth a part of what he ought to part with: neither doth he bless his brother; he doth him some little good, but blessing another signifies a more liberal doing good to him.

6 <sup>f Prov. 11. 24. & 19. 17. & 22. 9. Gal. 6. 7. 9.</sup> But this I say, He which soweth sparingly shall reap also sparingly; and he which soweth bountifully shall reap also bountifully.

Whereas covetous persons think all lost which they give to charitable uses, the apostle correcteth their mistake, by letting them know, that it is no more lost than the seed is which the husbandman casteth into his ground, which bringeth forth thirty, sixty, or sometimes a hundred-fold; though with this difference, that whereas the husbandman's crop dependeth upon the goodness and preparedness of his ground, it is not so with this spiritual crop; a man shall not reap according to the nature of the soil in which he casts his seed; for he that giveth to a prophet or to a righteous man, in the name of a prophet or a righteous man, (though he may be mistaken in the person to whom he so giveth,) yet shall he receive the reward of a prophet and of a righteous man. But this spiritual sower shall receive according to the quantity of seed which he soweth: he that soweth niggardly and sparingly shall reap accordingly; he that soweth liberally shall reap liberally: from whence we may be confirmed, that the rewards of another life will not be equal, but bear some proportion to the good works which men have done here.

7 <sup>g Deu. 15. 7. i Ex. 25. 2. & 35. 5. f Prov. 11. 25. Eccles. 35. 9. 10. Rom. 12. 8. ch. 8. 12.</sup> Every man according as he purposeth in his heart, so let him give; not grudgingly, or of necessity: for God loveth a cheerful giver.

Let not any give out of any awe of us, nor as it were forced by our authority, but as God shall put it into his heart, and as he hath purposed in himself, and is inclined from himself, without any grudging or unwillingness; not because he thinks he must give, but out of choice: for God loveth one that giveth with freedom and cheerfulness, not him that giveth as it were by constraint, or upon force; it is the will and affection of the giver, not the quantity of the gift, that God looks at. The apostle, by naming God and his acceptance in the case, lets the Corinthians know, that God was concerned in what they thus gave, it was not given to men only; according to that, He that hath pity upon the poor lendeth unto the Lord; and that which he hath given will he pay him again, Prov. xix. 17.

8 <sup>i Prov. 11. 24. 25. & 28. 27. Phil. 4. 19.</sup> And God is able to make all grace abound toward you; that ye, always having all sufficiency in all things, may abound to every good work:

Having made God, in the verse before, a debtor to those who, by giving to poor distressed saints, would make him their creditor, he here proveth him to be no insolvent debtor, but able to do much more for them, than they in this thing should do at his command out of love to him. He is (saith he) able to make all grace to abound toward you: the word translated grace, signifieth all sorts of gifts, whether of a temporal or spiritual nature; and being here applied to God, (who is the Author of all gifts,) it may very properly be interpreted concerning both. God is able to repay you in temporal things what you thus lend him, and so to pay you in specie; and he is able to pay you in value, by spiritual habits and influences. That ye, always having all sufficiency in all things, may abound to every good work; that you may have a sufficiency in all things, so as that you may abound to and in every good work.

9 (As it is written, <sup>a Ps. 112. 9.</sup> He hath dispersed abroad; he hath given to the poor: his righteousness remaineth for ever.

As in the former verse the apostle had asserted God's sufficiency to repay them what they should lend him, so he here asserteth God's readiness and willingness. This he confirmeth from a promise taken out of P'sal. cxii. 9, where also is further added, his horn shall be exalted with honour. Concerning the merciful man, it is true that Solomon saith, Prov. xi. 24, There is that scattereth, and yet increaseth. The psalmist saith, His righteousness endureth for ever: by which term some understand his bounty or liberality: I had rather understand by it here his obedience to the command of God in his free distribution to the poor; this remaineth in God's book of remembrance for ever, God will not forget this labour of love, Heb. vi. 10. The friends which he maketh with his mammon of righteousness, shall receive him into everlasting habitations, Luke xvi. 9. A man's riches cannot remain for ever, but his righteousness, in the distribution of them according to the command of God, that shall remain for ever.

10 Now he that ministereth seed to the sower both minister bread for your food, and multiply your seed sown, and increase the fruits of your righteousness; <sup>b Ho. 10. 12. Matt. 6. 1.</sup>

The God, whose providence and blessing maketh rich, and who giveth this seed to the sower, supply you with whatsoever you stand in need of for this life, and give you a heart to multiply that spiritual seed, by which the fruits of your righteousness shall be increased. Some Greek copies read these words in the future tense, according to which reading they are a formal promise, both of good things, whereby they might show their charity, and also of a free and large heart, disposing them to that exercise of grace. Our translators render it in the form of a prayer; which yet being the prayer of the apostle, put up in faith, doth virtually contain a promise both of a temporal and a spiritual increase.

11 Being enriched in every thing to all <sup>c Or. liberality. + Or. simplicity.</sup> † bountifulness, which causeth through us thanksgiving to God. <sup>n ch. 1. 11. & 4. 15.</sup>

The word here translated bountifulness, signifies simplicity, in opposition to deceit and fraud. We had it before, chap. viii. 2; so Rom. xii. 8: so, James i. 5, God is said to give ἀπλως, simply (we translate it liberally). We have in these two chapters met with three words, by which the bounty of Christians to persons in distress is expressed; grace, blessing, simplicity, χάρις, εὐλογία, ἀπλότης. The first lets us know the true root of all acceptable giving to those who are in distress, that must be free love: the second expresseth the true end, blessing God and our neighbour; serving the glory and commands of God, and the necessities of our brethren: this third expresseth the manner how we must give, that is, with simplicity. It is no true liberality where simplicity is wanting, that a man doth not what he doth with a plain heart and design to obey God and do good to his brother. Which causeth through us thanksgiving to God; as a further argument to press them to this liberality, he tells them, that it would cause them that were the apostles and ministers of Christ, to offer thanksgiving unto God.

12 For the administration of this service not only <sup>o ch. 8. 14.</sup> supplieth the want of the saints, but is abundant also by many thanksgivings unto God;

No man ought to live to himself; the two great ends of every Christian's life ought to be, the glory of God, and the good of others, especially such as belong to the household of faith. This service (saith the apostle) serveth both those ends: 1. It supplieth the necessities of the saints; and, 2. It causeth thanksgivings to God by many persons, and upon many accounts; which he further openeth in the following verses.

13 Whiles by the experiment of this ministration they glorify God for your professed subjection unto the Gospel of Christ, and for your liberal distribution unto them, and unto all men; <sup>p Matt. 5. 16. q Heb. 13. 16.</sup>

Whiles by the experiment of this ministration, upon their receiving of what you sent them, they glorify God for your professed subjection unto the gospel of Christ; they will see how ready you are to obey the gospel of Christ, (which hath in so many places called you to this duty,) and this will give them occasion of blessing God, who in the day of his power hath made such a willing people, willing at God's command, and in consideration of the love of Christ, to strip themselves to clothe his naked members, to restrain their own appetites to feed them. The grace of God bestowed on others, is matter of great thanksgiving to every gracious heart. And for your liberal distribution unto them, and unto all men: another cause of thanksgiving will be God's moving your hearts towards them; they will see reason to bless God, who hath raised them up such friends in their great straits; so as they will both bless God on your behalf, for his grace bestowed on you, that out of the Gentiles he hath picked out a people so subject to the law of his gospel; and also on their own behalf, that God hath stirred up a people to compassionate them in their deep distresses.

14 And by their prayer for you, which long after you for the exceeding grace of God in you.

Another way by which the glory of God will be promoted, by your simple, free, and liberal contribution, is, that by this he will have more prayers, which also will redound to your advantage, for it will procure prayers for you; and not prayers only, but a great deal of fervent love; so as they will long after your good, and after your acquaintance, when they shall receive such an experiment of the exceeding grace of God in you.

15 Thanks be unto God for his unspeakable gift.

Interpreters are not agreed what the apostle here meaneth by God's unspeakable gift. Some by it understand Christ, who is the gift of God, and the Fountain of all grace; and to this the epithet unspeakable doth best agree. Others understand the gospel, by which the hearts of men are subdued, effectually disposed, and inclined to obey the will of God. Others think it is to be understood of that habit of brotherly love, which from the Spirit of Christ, by the gospel, was wrought in the hearts of these Corinthians. If the last be meant, (to which the most incline,) the apostle declareth his firm persuasion of them, that they would obey him in this thing, and giveth God thanks for giving them such a heart. Seeing the contribution was not yet made, though a year before they had declared their readiness to it, I should rather incline to interpret it concerning Christ; and that the apostle concludeth this whole discourse about contributing to the relief of these poor members of Christ, with a general doxology, or blessing of God for Jesus Christ, who is the Author and Finisher of all grace, without such a particular reference to the preceding discourse; yet hereby hinting to them, that without the influence of his grace they would, they could do nothing.

CHAP. X

Paul entreateth the Corinthians not to leave him cause to exert against them that spiritual power, with which he was armed, and meant to chastise those who undervalued his person and apostolical character, 1—11. He pointeth out the difference between those who, for want of looking beyond themselves, were arrogant and vain, intruding into, and taking merit from, the labours of others, and himself, who kept strictly within the province allotted him by God, and, avoiding self commendation, sought honour from the commendation of Christ, 12—18.

Hitherto the apostle, who in his former Epistle had blamed this church for so many things, and dealt sharply with them, in this Epistle hath treated them as if they had been a people that had had no faults, or none but what, in obedience to his former Epistle, they had reformed, and become a new lump: which argueth, that the major part of the members of it were a good and an obedient people, by whose prevalent vote they had reformed much that was amiss. But in these four last chapters, to let us know that there was yet some of the old leaven amongst them, he useth another style; taking notice, that he understood there was amongst them another (though possibly the lesser) party who had much vilified him; and justifying himself against their whisperings and calumnies, not without some sharp reflections upon them.

NOW I Paul myself beseech you by the meekness and gentleness of Christ, who in presence am base among you, but being absent am bold toward you:

Now I Paul myself beseech you by the meekness and gentleness of Christ: meekness respecteth the spirit or inward man, being a virtue that moderateth inward anger and rash passions. Gentleness more respecteth the outward conversation. The apostle mentioneth both these virtues, as eminent in Christ, who is our great example, and to whom all Christians are bound to be conformable. Who in presence am base among you, but being absent am bold toward you: he here repeateth the words of those who, in this church, reproached him; they reported him a man, who, when he was there in presence with them, was lowly and humble enough; but when he was absent from them, then he wrote imperiously and confidently enough. The sense of the words is plainly this: I Paul, (of whom some amongst you say, that when I am there with you I am low and humble enough, even to some degrees of baseness; but when I am absent, then I write like a lord, boldly and confidently,) I beseech you to consider the temper of our common Lord and Saviour, to remember how free he was from rash anger and passion, how gentle he was in his conversation; and by the obligation that is upon you, to love and practise those virtues which you saw, or have heard of, in him.

2 But I beseech you, that I may not be bold when I am present with that confidence, wherewith I think to be bold against some, which I think of us as if we walked according to the flesh.

It is true, (saith the apostle,) when I have been with you I have made it my business to behave myself with all obliging sweetness, not using that authority which I might have used; and I beseech you, as not to blame me for that, (remembering the meekness and gentleness of Christ,) so by your conversation not to force me to another kind of conversation amongst you; that you would not constrain me to a severer behaviour towards you when I am present with you, to be so free with some of you, as at present I am resolved to be; such, I mean, as have traduced me, as if I walked according to the flesh, that is, not guided by the Holy Spirit of God, and the directions of his word, but by some external, carnal considerations, respecting my own profit, pleasure, or reputation, indulging my own passions or corrupt affections. Walking after the flesh is opposed to a walking after the Spirit, Rom. viii. 1. He walketh after the flesh, to whom the fleshly appetite is the principle, rule, and end of his actions; as he, on the contrary, to whom those habits of grace which are wrought in the soul by the Holy Spirit, or the Spirit himself more immediately by his motions or impulses, are the principle of his actions, and the word dictated by the Spirit is the rule of his actions, and the glory of God is the end of his actions, is truly said to walk after the Spirit.

3 For though we walk in the flesh, we do not war after the flesh:

There is a great difference betwixt walking in the flesh, and warring after the flesh. The best of men in this life walk in the flesh, as their souls are not in a state of separation from, but union with, the body; but they do not walk after the flesh, as their fleshly appetite is not the principle of their actions, nor the satisfaction of it the end of their actions. The apostle, in the latter part of the verse, changeth the verb; in the former part he called our conversation, a walking; in the latter part he calleth it a warring; which he describeth negatively in this verse, positively in the following verses. In calling it a warring, he lets us know that it is, and will be, a life of opposition, in which a Christian will have many enemies; though his hand be against none, yet many hands will be against him. But though they be men of strife and contention, in a passive sense, yet they are not so in an active sense, according to the usual notion of warring; for they war not after the flesh, neither as fleshly men, nor in a carnal, fleshly manner, nor yet for fleshly ends. The men of the world war for their honour and glory, or for revenge and satisfaction of their lusts, or

As our end is spiritual, so are our means; the means by which we manage our spiritual fight are spiritual. Whence by these weapons he meaneth the word of God, and his preaching the gospel, or the censures of the church duly administered, it is true, they are not of a carnal nature, or fitted to the subduing of men's bodies, and bringing them into subjection; they are of a spiritual nature, and have their effects upon the mind and inward part of a man; yet, through the concurrence of Divine grace, there is in them a mighty force and power, to pull down strong holds: by which metaphorical expression he understands whatsoever opposeth the gospel, and seemeth to defend and uphold men in their sinful courses; subduing the will of man, which is so strong a hold that all the power of hell cannot storm it.

5 <sup>h</sup> Casting down || imaginations, and every high thing that exalteth itself against the knowledge of God, and bringing into captivity every thought to the obedience of Christ;

Casting down imaginations; λογισμοις, reasonings; and every high thing, every height of reasoning, that exalteth itself against the knowledge of God. The great troublers of this church of Corinth were the heathen philosophers, and such as had sucked in their principles; with whose notions, which were conclusions drawn from reason not sanctified and subdued to the will of God, divers doctrines of faith would not agree. St. Paul tells them, that the gospel, (which was the great weapon of his warfare,) through the power of God, was mighty to pull down the strong holds which unbelief had in the carnal understanding of men, to overthrow their reasonings, the heights of them, which exalted themselves against the doctrine of faith; and to bring πᾶν νόημα, every thought, or counsel, into a captivity to the obedience of Christ: so as whatsoever was revealed by the apostles from the Spirit of God, men readily agreed and yielded obedience to; whatever their thoughts or reasonings about it were, they gave credit to it; not because it appeared rational to them, but upon the Divine authority of the revelation; submitting their reason to that, and believing it the most rational thing in the world, that they should believe what God affirmed, and do what God commanded; and this blessed effect the gospel had in all those who heartily embraced it: for indeed to give an assent to a proposition, merely upon a sensible or rational demonstration, is no faith, that is, no Divine faith. Truly to believe, in a Divine sense, is to assent to a proposition upon the credit of the revelation, though we cannot make it out by our reason: and this it is to have our thoughts brought into a captivity to the obedience of Christ. That whereas reason, as it is since the fall subjected in man, riseth up in arms against several Divine propositions, and saith, How can these things be? how can one be three, and three one? how could the Divine and human nature unite in one person? how can the dead rise? &c.: the believer audit verbum Dei et tacet, readeth these things, and others of the like nature, plainly asserted in holy writ, and chides down his reason; resolving to give credit to these things merely because God hath said them, who cannot lie. Thus our νοήματα, thoughts, counsels, reasonings, deliberations, conclusions, all the product of our understanding, is brought into a captivity to the obedience of Christ; and reason itself, which is the governess and mistress of the soul of man, is made a captive to revelation. And in this appeared the mighty power of the weapons of the apostle's warfare.

6 <sup>i</sup> And having in a readiness to revenge all disobedience, when <sup>h</sup> your obedience is fulfilled.

The apostle certainly means by this, excommunication; which was the rod which he had before mentioned, asking them if they would he should come unto them with a rod. This rod he here threateneth them with; telling them, that he had another weapon of his warfare, of a spiritual nature too, to be used against such as preferred themselves to be believers, but walked disorderly; only he at present spared them, because though a great part of them were obedient, yet there were some amongst them of whose obedience he could not yet glory; but yet he hoped well, and therefore should wait until, by the use of all fair means, (such as exhortations and arguments,) he had reduced as many of them as he could unto obedience. But that being done, God had intrusted him with another weapon, with which he would, in the name and by the authority of God, revenge his glory upon the disobedience of others. Herein the apostle hath set a rule and a pattern to all churches, where are multitudes that walk disorderly; not to be too hasty in excommunicating them, but to proceed gradually; first using all fair means, and waiting with all patience, for the reducing them to their duty, who will by any gentle and fair means be reduced; and then revenging the honour and glory of God only upon such as will not be reclaimed.

7 <sup>j</sup> Do ye look on things after the outward appearance? <sup>m</sup> If any man trust to himself that he is Christ's, let him of himself think this again, that, as he <sup>n</sup> is Christ's, even so <sup>o</sup> are <sup>p</sup> we Christ's.

Are ye so weak as to judge of persons and things merely from their faces, pretences, or outward appearances? and to magnify these false apostles and teachers, merely because they set forth and magnify themselves, or because they take up a great breadth in the world, and live in a little state and splendour? If any of them do judge that he is the servant or the minister of Christ, why should he not think the same of me? what hath he to say to prove his relation to Christ more than I have? what hath he to glory in upon that account more than I have?

8 For though I should boast somewhat more <sup>q</sup> of our authority, which the Lord hath given us for edification, and not for your destruction, <sup>r</sup> I should not be ashamed:

Here is a remarkable maxim, a rule from which all ecclesiastical superiors ought to measure their actions: God hath given to no superiors a power for destruction of the flock, but only for edification; so as that no such can pretend to a power received from God, to do or exact any thing which may any ways hinder the salvation of the souls put under their trust; they ought to command or exact nothing, nor to do any thing, but what may probably tend to the promoting of people's faith, and holiness, and eternal salvation. This maxim the apostle puts in in a parenthesis in this verse, to sweeten what he had before spoken, concerning his readiness to revenge the disobedience of such who should appear to be stubborn and contumacious. But he tells them, he should not be ashamed if he did boast somewhat more of a just and due authority than the false apostles and teachers had, who vilified him; for he was an apostle, and had a more immediate authority than they who were ordinary teachers.

9 That I may not seem as if I would terrify you by letters.

This was one imputation upon the apostle, as we may learn by the next verse. I tell you, saith the apostle, that I have an authority, and a further authority than those who vilify me can pretend unto: but I also tell you, I have no authority to do any harm to any of you; all the authority I have is for your edification, as much as lieth in me to promote the business of your salvation; so that I need not be reported as one that went about to terrify you by my letters; yet I know there are some who so represent me unto you.

There are some amongst you that tell you, that indeed (when absent) I write severely, and with authority; but when I am there with you, neither my behaviour, nor my speech, speaks any such authority.

I would have no such person think so of me, for he shall find me the same in deed when I come, that I have spoken myself to be by my letters. I do not write vainly, merely to terrify you, but what I truly intend to do, and when I come he shall find that I will do.

12 'For we dare not make ourselves of the number, or compare ourselves with some that commend themselves: but they measuring themselves by themselves, and comparing themselves among themselves, || are not wise.

|| Or, understand it not.

This whole verse is a reflection upon the false teachers of the church of Corinth, from whose manners Paul purgeth himself. I (saith he) durst not, as some others, magnify myself, nor compare myself with those that do so. Neither is it any wisdom in them to contemn and despise others, in comparison of themselves; for observe what measures they take, they only measure themselves by themselves, and compare themselves amongst themselves, that is, with birds of their own feather, such as are like unto themselves, and of their own faction and party; which no wise men would do.

13 'But we will not boast of things without our measure, but according to the measure of the || rule which God hath distributed to us, a measure to reach even unto you.

f Or, line.

The apostle may be understood as speaking both of spiritual gifts, and also of his travels to the several places whither he had gone preaching the gospel. He reflecteth still upon the false teachers who were crept into this church; who (as it should seem) had much boasted of their gifts and abilities, and of their labours and successes. In opposition to whom, he saith, that he boasted not without his measure, or, (as it is in the Greek, τὰ ἀμετρητά,) unmeasurable things; but he kept himself within the measure of the rule; that is, according to that regular measure which God hath set us. Which measure extendeth even to you. You have those amongst you who boast unmeasurably of the gifts which they have, and of the great things which they do; I durst not do so (saith the apostle); God hath given me a measure and a rule, according to that I have acted, and of those actings only I will glory. And in my so doing I can boast of you, for to you my measure and line hath reached; God hath made me an instrument to raise him up a church amongst you.

14 For we stretch not ourselves beyond our measure, as though we reached not unto you: "for we are come as far as to you also in preaching the Gospel of Christ:

u 1 Cor. 3. 5, 10, & 4. 15. & 9. 1.

For in our boasting of you as our converts, amongst whom I have preached the gospel, and God hath made my preaching successful; we stretch not ourselves beyond our measure, and arrogate that to ourselves which belongeth not to us: for the thing is true, and ye know that in our preaching the gospel we have come as far as unto you, and that God hath given our labours success amongst you.

15 Not boasting of things without our measure, that is, of other men's labours; but having hope, when your faith is increased, that we shall be || enlarged by you according to our rule abundantly, x Rom. 15. 20.

|| Or, magnified in you.

So that although we have boasted of you, we have not boasted of things without our measure; that is, of things that are not, or (as the apostle expounds himself) of things that were not done by him but by other men; for his line did reach unto them, and his labours had been employed and made successful amongst them. And he declares his hope, that when the gospel should have had its full success amongst them, and their faith should be increased, (either by the addition of more persons to the church amongst them, or by the perfecting of their faith, and other graces,) they, who were apostles and the ministers of the gospel to them, should by it be magnified, or made great; to wit, by their means, who using much navigation, would have opportunities to commend the gospel, and the ministry of it, to other people, amongst whom they should come: wherein yet they should not exceed their rule; for though ordinary ministers be fixed in particular churches and places, yet the apostles' rule was to go and preach the gospel over the whole world, being tied to no certain people or places.

16 'To preach the Gospel in the regions beyond you, and not to boast in another man's || line of things made ready to our || hand.

To preach the gospel in the regions beyond you; the apostle here expoundeth what he meaneth by the term magnified, or enlarged, in the preceding verse, viz. to have a door opened to preach the gospel in places whither it was not yet come. God honoureth persons when he maketh them instruments to bring any to an acquaintance with, and to the embracing of, his gospel, who formerly had been ignorant of it, and not acquainted with it. And not to boast in another man's line of things made ready to our hand: he here seemeth to reflect on the false teachers crept into this church, who had nothing to boast in but a pretended building, upon other men's foundations, and carrying on a work by others made ready to their hands; and seemeth to prefer the work of conversion, and an instrumentality in that, before an instrumentality merely in edification, and carrying on the work of God already begun in people's souls.

17 'But he that glorieth, let him glory <sup>y Is. 65. 16.
Jer. 9. 24.
1 Cor. 1. 31.</sup> in the Lord.

But we have none of us any thing to glory in, neither I Paul who plant, nor Apollos who watereth; whether God maketh use of us as the first planters of the gospel, or as instruments to carry on the work of the gospel already planted, we have nothing of our own to glory in. God giveth the increase; we have therefore no reason to glory in ourselves, or in our own performances, but only to give thanks to God, who maketh use of us, poor earthly vessels, to carry about and distribute that heavenly treasure, by which he maketh souls rich in faith and good works: all that we do is only instrumentally; God is all, and in all, as to primary efficiency.

18 For 'not he that commendeth him- <sup>s Prov. 27. 2.
a Rom. 2. 29.
1 Cor. 4. 5.</sup> self is approved, but 'whom the Lord commendeth.

Solomon saith, Prov. xxvii. 2, Let another man praise thee, and not thine own mouth; a stranger, and not thine own lips. Self-commendation is an ungrateful sound to ingenuous ears; no man thinks another a jot the better for his commending himself, but always hath the worse opinion of him for such boasting; but this text speaketh of a higher approbation, viz. from God. No man is approved of God for his speaking well of himself; the business is, who they are who approve themselves in the work which God hath committed to them; to whom the Lord will say, Well done, good and faithful servants: to whom the apostle refers both himself, and those who magnified themselves, but vilified him.

CHAP. XI

Paul unwillingly entereth upon a commendation of himself, out of jealousy lest the Corinthians should be perverted by false apostles from the pure doctrine of Christ, 1—4. He showeth that he was in all respects equal to the chiefest apostles, 5, 6: that he declined being chargeable to them, not for want of love towards them, but to cut off occasion from those deceitful workers of taking shelter under his example, 7—15: that he was not inferior to those, whom they so patiently submitted to, in any of their boasted prerogatives, 16—22; but as a minister of Christ, in labours and sufferings for the gospel's sake, was abundantly their superior, 23—33.

a ver. 16.
1 Cr.
ye do bear
with me.

WOULD to God ye could bear with me a little in <sup>a</sup>my folly: and indeed || bear with me.

That which the apostle here calls his folly, was his speaking so much in his own commendation; which indeed is no better than folly, unless there be a great reason; which was here, for it was the false teachers, vilifying his person and office, that put him upon it. The verb in the latter part of the verse, may be read either imperatively, (and so we translate it,) as if it were an entreaty of them to excuse him in speaking so much good of himself; or indicatively, you do bear with me.

b Gal. 4. 17. 2 For I am <sup>b</sup>jealous over you with godly jealousy: for <sup>c</sup>I have espoused you to one husband, <sup>d</sup>that I may present you <sup>e</sup>as a chaste virgin to Christ.

Jealousy is a passion in a person which makes him impatient of any rival or partner in the thing or person beloved. The apostle tells them, that he was jealous over them, and thereby lets them know, that he so passionately loved them, as that he was not patient that any should pretend more kindness to them than he had for them; and withal, that he had some fear of them, lest they should be perverted and drawn away from the simplicity of the gospel; upon this account he calls it a godly jealousy. For (saith he) I have been instrumental to bring you to Christ; this he calls an espousing of them, the union of persons with Christ being expressed in Scripture under the notion of a marriage, Eph. v. 23, &c. And he expresseth his earnest desire to present them to Christ uncorrupted, like a chaste virgin.

3 But I fear, lest by any means, as <sup>f</sup>the serpent beguiled Eve through his subtilty, so your minds <sup>g</sup>should be corrupted from the simplicity that is in Christ.

In all jealousy there is a mixture of love and fear: the apostle's love to this church, together with his earnest desire to present them in the day of judgment unto Christ pure and uncorrupted, caused him to write; because he was afraid, lest that as the serpent by his subtilty deceived Eve, so some subtle seducers should corrupt them, and so withdraw them from the simplicity of their faith in Christ, and obedience to him. This danger was partly from the pagan philosophers, mixing their philosophical notions with the plain doctrine of the gospel; and partly from some that were tenacious of the Judaical rites, and would not understand the abolition of the ceremonial law.

4 For if he that cometh preacheth another Jesus, whom we have not preached, or <sup>h</sup>if ye receive another spirit, which ye have not received, or <sup>i</sup>another Gospel, which ye have not accepted, ye might well bear || with <sup>j</sup>him.

How our translators have interpreted καλῶς ἠνείχεσθε, ye might well bear, I cannot tell: the words manifestly are to be interpreted, you have well borne, and so are plainly a reflection upon some in this church, who had patiently endured false teachers, who had preached other doctrine than what Paul had preached. And this the apostle giveth as a reason of his fear, lest they should be corrupted and drawn away from the simplicity of the gospel. This certainly is more obviously the sense of the words, than what others incline to, who make the sense this: If any other could come to you, who could preach to you a better Jesus, a more excellent Saviour, than we have done; or a more excellent spirit than him whom you have received; or a more excellent doctrine than the doctrine of the gospel, which we have preached; you might bear with him. For I see no pretence to interpret the verb as in the potential mood, it is manifestly the indicative mood; and declareth, not what they might do, but what they had done; which made the apostle jealous of them, lest they should be perverted. And our Saviour, John v. 43, hath taught us, that those who with the most difficulty receive those who come to them in God's name, are always most easy to receive those who come in their own name, without any due authority or commission from God.

5 For I suppose <sup>k</sup>I was not a whit behind the very chiefest apostles.

The apostle, doubtless, meaneth those that were the true apostles of our Lord, those who were immediately sent out by him to preach the gospel, behind whom the apostle was not, either in respect of ministerial gifts and graces, or in respect of labours, or in respect of success which God had given him in his work. One method that false teachers used to vilify Paul, was by magnifying some others of the apostles above him, and preferring them before him; which makes him, both here, and in Gal. ii., and Rom. xi. 13, to magnify his office, by showing them, there was no reason why they should make a difference betwixt him and other apostles; for he had the same immediate call, was intrusted with the same power, furnished and adorned with the same gifts, in labours (as he elsewhere saith) he had been more than they all; nor had God been wanting in giving him success in his labours, proportionable to the chiefest of them: so as he was not a whit behind them.

6 But though <sup>l</sup>I be rude in speech, yet <sup>m</sup>not <sup>n</sup>1 in knowledge; but <sup>o</sup>we have been thoroughly made manifest among you in all things.

But though I be rude in speech; admit (saith the apostle) that I be no orator, speaking to you in high language, or in a neat style and phrase; either having no faculty that way, or, if I have, yet choosing rather to speak plainly, and home to your consciences, than floridly, to tickle your ears with a fine sound and chiming of words. Yet not in knowledge; yet, I bless God, I am not defective in knowledge; and, as God hath enlightened me with a large knowledge of his will, so I have communicated to you the whole counsel of God. But we have been thoroughly made manifest among you in all things; and in all things, which may declare me an apostle, one sent of Christ about the business of the gospel, I have been made manifest amongst you; preaching amongst you the whole doctrine of the gospel, and having been an instrument to convert many of you from paganism to Christianity.

7 Have I committed an offence <sup>p</sup>in abasing myself that ye might be exalted, because I have preached to you the Gospel of God freely?

What is it that hath made you take such offence at me; seeing you cannot say, that either in my call, or in my gifts and graces, or in my labours, or in the success of my labours, I have been inferior to the chiefest of the apostles? Doth this offend you, that for your sake I have veiled my authority, and departed from my right? which makes some of you say, I am base in presence. Is it by my putting you to no charge in my preaching the gospel? This was a thing wherein he gloried, and told them, 1 Cor. ix. 6, 12, 15, that he would rather die, than have his glorying void in this particular.

8 I robbed other churches, taking wages of them, to do you service.

He interpreteth the term of robbed other churches, by a taking wages of them; which indeed is no robbery, as he had proved, 1 Cor. ix. All the robbery that was in it lay in this, that his maintenance, in strictness of right, should have been proportionably from this, as well as from other churches; but for some reasons (which he thinks fit to conceal) he refused to receive any thing from this church; but spared them, and lived upon the maintenance he had from other churches, while he was doing them service. Either he saw the members of this church were poor, or that there were some in this church who would sooner have taken advantage to reproach him for it, and so have hindered the success of the gospel. Whatever it was that caused the apostle to do it, certain it is, that he did it, and make it a great piece of his glorying.

9 And when I was present with you, and wanted, <sup>q</sup>I was chargeable to no man: for that which was lacking to me <sup>r</sup>the brethren which came from Macedonia supplied: and in all things I have kept myself <sup>s</sup>from being burdensome unto you, and so will I keep myself.

The word which we translate chargeable, signifies to be-numb; I benumbed no man: or, (as others,) I was not myself more benumbed in any thing. If we take it in the first-mentioned sense, it lets us see a reason why Paul refused to take wages of the church of Corinth, lest he should cool and benumb them as to the receiving of the gospel, when they saw it would prove chargeable to them. If in the latter sense, the apostle seems to reflect upon such whom wages only edged to their work, who preached merely for gain and filthy lucre. To distinguish himself from such hirelings, he tells them, that when he was with them, and laboured amongst them in preaching the gospel, he put them to no charge; yet he was not slothful in his work, but as laborious as those who did take wages. As to himself, he had want enough whilst he was amongst them; but the providence of God ordered him a supply from the churches of Macedonia, and by that means he kept himself from being burdensome to them; and, he tells them, so he was resolved that he would still be.

10 'As the truth of Christ is in me, <sup>r Rom. 9. 1.</sup> <sup>† Gr. this boasting shall not be stopped in me.</sup> † no man shall stop me of this boasting in the regions of Achaia. <sup>u 1 Cor. 9. 15.</sup>

The apostle often repeateth this, glorying much in it, that in this region of Achaia he had preached the gospel without charge to the hearers: he did so also at Thessalonica, 1 Thess. ii. 5, 6, 9; but concerning them, he saith, what he no where saith of the Corinthians, that they received the word in much affliction; which might, probably, be the cause. It is most likely that he either discerned this people to be more covetous, and too much lovers of their money; or that there was a generation among them, who, if he had taken wages for his labours, would have reproached him as one that was a hireling, and who did all that he did for money. And, indeed, himself seemeth in the next verses to give this as a reason.

11 Wherefore? 'because I love you not? God knoweth. <sup>t ch. 6. 11. & 7. 3. & 12. 15.</sup>

Can you possibly interpret my not being chargeable to you, as proceeding from a want of love in me to you? God knoweth the contrary.

12 But what I do, that I will do, "that I may cut off occasion from them which desire occasion; that wherein they glory, they may be found even as we. <sup>u 1 Cor. 9. 12.</sup>

I know (saith the apostle) that there are some amongst you who, out of their hatred to me, would seek any occasion to asperse me to justify themselves. If I had (as I might) have taken wages amongst you for my labours, they would either have taken occasion from it to have aspersed me, (as doing what I did from a mercenary spirit,) or at least to have justified themselves in their exactings upon you. I had a mind to prevent any such occasions of boasting. That wherein they glory, they may be found even as we: it should seem by these words, that some teachers in this church, being (possibly) men of estates, required no maintenance of the people; and would have taken advantage against the apostle, if he had taken any: or, possibly, some others exacted upon them unreasonably, who, had Paul taken wages, would have justified themselves by his example. The apostle therefore was resolved to cut off from them any pretence or occasion of boasting, and to do whatever any of them did, in sparing the Corinthians as to the business of their purses.

13 For such <sup>x Acts 18. 24.</sup> <sup>Rom. 16. 18.</sup> <sup>Gal. 1. 7. & 6. 12. Phil. 1. 15. 2 Pet. 2. 1. 1 John 4. 1. Rev. 2. 2. y ch. 2. 17. Phil. 3. 2. Tit. 1. 10. 11.</sup> <sup>z</sup> are false apostles, 'deceitful workers, transforming themselves into the apostles of Christ.

For such are false apostles; that is, persons pretending to be sent of Christ, but were indeed never sent of him. Deceitful workers; persons whose work is but to cheat and deceive you; and that both with reference to their call and authority which they pretend to, and also to the doctrine which they bring. Transforming themselves into the apostles of Christ; they were never apostles of Christ, only they put themselves into such a shape and form, that they might have more advantage to deceive.

14 And no marvel; for Satan himself <sup>u Gal. 1. 8.</sup> is transformed into 'an angel of light.

It is not at all to be wondered, that the emissaries of Satan dissemble, and pretend themselves to be what they are not, for even Satan himself, who is the prince of darkness, in order to the deceiving and seducing of souls, transformeth himself into an angel of light; that is, puts on the appearance and form of a good angel. He calls them angels of light, because they were wont to appear in a lightsome brightness; or because of that glory in which they behold the face of God; or because of those great measures of heavenly knowledge which those blessed spirits have. All tempted souls have an experiment of this; for none is tempted to evil under the appearance of evil, (evil as evil being what a reasonable soul cannot be courted to). The devil therefore, in all his temptations to sin, though his end be to ruin and destroy, yet appeareth as an angel of light; moving the soul to evil under the notion and appearance of good.

15 Therefore it is no great thing if his ministers also be transformed as the 'ministers of righteousness; <sup>a ch. 3. 9.</sup> <sup>b Phil. 3. 18.</sup> whose end shall be according to their works.

It is no wonder if there be like servants, like masters: and as the devil, in order to the deceiving of souls, pretends to what he is not, viz. a friend to them; so those who seek their own profit, not your good, show themselves to be his ministers, driving the same design with him, also do the like, and change their shapes, pretending themselves to be ministers of the gospel, and to aim at the good of your souls, by teaching you the way of righteousness; but God will one day judge of their works, and their reward at last will be according to their works.

16 'I say again, Let no man think me <sup>c ver. 1.</sup> <sup>ch. 12. 6. 11.</sup> a fool; if otherwise, yet as a fool || receive <sup>d Or, suffer.</sup> me, that I may boast myself a little.

I say again, Let no man think me a fool: I know that he, who is much in magnifying and praising himself, ordinarily is judged to be a fool; but though I do so, let me not lie under that imputation. There is a time for all things; a time for a man to cease from his own praises, and a time for him to praise himself. The time for the latter is, when the glory of God, or our own just vindication, is concerned; both which concurred here: the apostle was out of measure vilified by these false apostles; and the glory of God was eminently concerned, that so great an apostle and instrument in promoting the gospel, should not be exposed to contempt, as a mean and despicable person, or as an impostor and deceiver. If otherwise, yet as a fool receive me, that I may boast myself a little; but if you will judge me a fool, be it so; yet receive me as such, while I boast a little.

17 That which I speak, 'I speak it not <sup>d 1 Cor. 7. 6. 12.</sup> after the Lord, but as it were foolishly, 'in this confidence of boasting. <sup>e ch. 9. 4.</sup>

That which I speak, I speak it not after the Lord; I do not pretend to have any special command of God, to speak what I shall now say in my own commendation; God hath left that to our liberty, which we may use, or not use, as circumstances of time, place, and occasion direct. Or, I do not speak according to the ordinary practice of Christians and ministers of the gospel; whose ordinary practice is to abase and vilify, not to exalt and set forth themselves, according to the more general rules of the word. Yet what the apostle saith was not contrary to the Lord, or to the directions of his word, which hath no where commanded us to vilify ourselves, or to conceal what God hath wrought in us and by us. But as it were foolishly, in this confidence of boasting: this my confident boasting hath an appearance of foolishness in it, though really it be not so; for nothing can be truly called foolishness, which hath a direct and immediate tendency to the glory of God, and is designed for that end.

18 'Seeing that many glory after the <sup>f Phil. 3. 3. 4.</sup> flesh, I will glory also.

By the flesh is meant, carnal and external things; which though they be the gifts and favours of God, yet do not at all commend a man to God. The apostle saith, there are many that glory after the flesh; and there needs must be such in all places, because there are many that walk after the flesh: now, it is but natural for men to boast and glory in those attainments, which it hath been the business of their lives to pursue after. Such there were, doubtless, in this famous church, who gloried that they were native Jews, or in their riches, or in their knowledge and learning. Now, though (saith the apostle) I know there is nothing in these things truly to be gloried in, yet, others glorying in them, I will glory also; and let them know, that if I thought these things worth the glorying in, I have as much to glory in of that nature as any of them have.

1 Cor. 4. 19 For ye suffer fools gladly, <sup>g</sup> seeing ye yourselves are wise.

Ye freely suffer others foolishly glorying and boasting of themselves, therefore do ye suffer me therein to judge yourselves wise, and it belongs to the wise to bear with such as are not so wise as themselves.

Gal. 2. 4. 20 For ye suffer, <sup>h</sup> if a man bring you into bondage, if a man devour you, if a man take of you, if a man exalt himself, if a man smite you on the face.

If any domineer over you, as if you were their slaves, or if any bring you into subjection to the rites of the ceremonial law; if they devour and make a prey of you, take wages of you, and do nothing without hire; if they carry themselves proudly, exalting themselves above you; nay, if they smite you, you will suffer and bear with such: this is more than to bear with a little folly and indiscretion in me. This is observable, that men of corrupt hearts and loose lives will better bear with teachers that will humour and spare them in their lusts, than with such as are faithful to their souls in instructing and reproving them, though they carry themselves with the greatest innocency and justice towards them.

1 ch. 10. 12 I speak as concerning reproach, <sup>i</sup> as though we had been weak. Howbeit <sup>k</sup> whereinsoever any is bold, (I speak foolishly,) I am bold also.

I speak as to those reproaches they cast on me, who am by them represented to you as though I were weak and contemptible; as indeed I am, as to my person, but not as to my doctrine, and the miracles I have wrought amongst you. And being some of them are so confident in boasting what they are, and what they have done and suffered; let me be a little bold as well as they, in telling you what I am, and what I have done and suffered.

1 Acta 22. 3. Rom. 11. 1. Phil. 3. 5. 22 Are they Hebrews? <sup>l</sup> so am I. Are they Israelites? so am I. Are they the seed of Abraham? so am I.

Are they Hebrews? so am I: this would incline us to think, that some, at least, of those corrupt teachers, upon whom the apostle hath so much reflected, were Jews; who had endeavoured to corrupt the Gentile churches with their traditions, and imposing on them the ceremonial rites of the Jewish church. Others think otherwise, and that the words import no more than this; Do they glory in the antiquity of their stock and parentage, as descending from Abraham? I have as much upon that account to glory in as they; for although I was born, not in Judea, but in Tarsus, a city of Cilicia, Acts xxii. 3, yet I was a Jew, an Hebrew of the Hebrews, Phil. iii. 5. Are they Israelites? will they derive from Jacob, to whom God gave the name of Israel, from whence all his posterity were called Israelites? so am I, (saith he,) I can derive from Jacob as well as they. Are they the seed of Abraham? so am I: will they glory in this, that they are the seed of Abraham? (this was a great boast of the Jews, as we learn from Matt. iii. 9, and John viii;) saith the apostle, I have on that account as much to glory in as they. Some here inquire, What difference there is in these three things? for to be a Hebrew, and an Israelite, and of the seed of Abraham, seem all to signify the same thing. Nor indeed have we any need to assign any difference, it seemeth to be but the same thing amplified in three phrases. But others distinguish more subtly, and think the first may signify a glorying in the ancientness of their pedigree, or in their ability to speak in the Hebrew tongue; the second, may refer to the nation of which they were; the third, to the promise made to Abraham and his seed.

23 Are they ministers of Christ? (I <sup>m</sup> speak as a fool) I am more; <sup>n</sup> in labours more abundant, <sup>o</sup> in stripes above measure, in prisons more frequent, <sup>p</sup> in deaths oft.

Will they glory in this, that they are ministers of Christ, employed as the servants of Christ in preaching the gospel? I should not boast about this, (in that I may seem to speak as a fool,) but I am much more a minister than they, both with respect to my call to the work, and also my performing of it. I had a more immediate call and mission to the work than what they can boast of, and I have done more in that work than any of them have done. In labours more abundant; I have travelled more to preach it, I have laboured more in the propagation of it. In stripes above measure, in prisons more frequent; I have suffered more for the preaching of it, I have been oftener whipped, oftener imprisoned, than any of them ever were: see chap. vi. 4, 5. In deaths oft; I have been oftener in hazard of my life: he calls dangers threatening death, deaths, as chap. i. 10.

24 Of the Jews five times received I <sup>p</sup> forty stripes save one.

God, to restrain the passions of his people, which might carry them out to cruelty in the punishments of malefactors, forbade the Jewish magistrates to give any malefactor above forty stripes; (so many they might give them by the Divine law, Deut. xxv. 3;) but they had made an order, that none should receive above thirty-nine. This was amongst their constitutions which they called septeminta legis, hedges to the Divine law; which indeed was a violation of the law: for that did not oblige them to give every malefactor, that had not deserved death, so many stripes; it gave them only a liberty to go so far, but they were not to exceed. Some think, that they punished every such malefactor with thirty-nine stripes: others, more rationally, think, that they did not so, but thirty-nine was the highest number they laid upon any. And it is most probable, that, out of their hatred to the apostle, they laid as many stripes upon him as their constitution would suffer them to do.

25 Thrice was I <sup>q</sup> beaten with rods, <sup>r</sup> once was I stoned, thrice I <sup>s</sup> suffered shipwreck, a night and a day I have been in the deep;

Thrice was I beaten with rods; this was by the pagans, for the Jews whipped malefactors with a whip which had three cords. We read of one of these times, Acts xvii. 23; and of a second, Acts xxii. 24. when the captain commanded he should be so punished, but he avoided it, by pleading he was a citizen of Rome. Once was I stoned: of his stoning, read Acts xiv. 19, it was by a popular tumult at Lystra. Thrice I suffered shipwreck: we read but of one time that Paul suffered shipwreck, Acts xxvii. 18; which was none of the three times here mentioned, for it was after the writing of this Epistle. But though many of the acts and sufferings of this apostle were written, yet all were not. A night and a day I have been in the deep: some by the deep here understand the inner prison, mentioned Acts xvi. 24, or some deep dungeon; but more probably he means, some time when, after a shipwreck, he might be put twenty-four hours to swim up and down the sea upon some broken part of the ship. It refers to some eminent danger Paul was in, of which the Scripture in no other place maketh mention particularly.

city; in many cities where he preached the gospel, as we find in the Acts of the Apostles. In the wilderness; in wildernesses through which he was forced to pass. In the sea; storms and shipwrecks. Among false brethren; false teachers and private persons, who corrupted the Christian religion, and were as great enemies to the apostle as any he had.

27 In weariness and painfulness, <sup>x</sup>in watchings often, <sup>y</sup>in hunger and thirst, in fastings often, in cold and nakedness.

The apostle reckons up several afflictive evils, ordinarily incident to such as travel in foreign countries. Of this nature were the weariness and painfulness, the hunger and thirst, the cold and nakedness, here mentioned. He also mentioneth watchings and fastings, as voluntary acts of discipline, which he used for the end mentioned, 1 Cor. ix. 27, for the keeping under his body, and bringing it into subjection, and that he might the better attend and discharge the work of the ministry.

28 Beside those things that are without, that which cometh upon me daily, <sup>z</sup>the care of all the churches.

By the things that are without, the apostle meaneth either those evils which happened to him from persons that had no relation to the Christian church, but were persons without, (as the phrase is used, 1 Cor. v. 13.) or else such kinds of troubles and afflictions as very little influenced his mind, but only affected his outward man: such were his labours, travels, journeyings, imprisonment, stripes, before mentioned. Beside these (he saith) there lay upon him an inward care and solicitude for all the Christian churches; and this was a daily care. For an apostle differed from an ordinary pastor, not only in his immediate call from Christ, but also in his work; there lay an obligation upon such to go up and down preaching the gospel, and they further had, both a power, and also an obligation, to superintend all other churches, and to direct the affairs of them relating to order and government: and thereupon they were mightily concerned about their doing well or ill.

29 <sup>a</sup>Who is weak, and I am not weak? <sup>b</sup>who is offended, and I burn not?

Who, may be either, what church? or, what particular Christian in any church? Is weak, ἀσθενεί, through outward afflictions, or in respect of inward spiritual troubles, and I am not weak, and I do not sympathize with that church, or with that person? Who is offended, or scandalized, under temptations to be seduced and fall into sin, and I burn not, and I am not on fire with a holy zeal for the glory of God, and the good of his soul, if possible to keep him upright? By which the apostle doth not only show us what was his own holy temper, but what should be the temper of every faithful minister, as to his province, or that part of the church over which he is concerned to watch; viz. to have a true compassion to every member of it, to watch over his flock, inquiring diligently into the state of it; to have a quick sense of any evils under which they, or any of them, labour. This is indeed the duty of ever private member, but more especially of him whose office is to feed any part of the flock of Christ, Rom. xii. 15. In this the members of the spiritual, mystical body of Christ should answer to the members of the body natural, to which our apostle before resembled it.

30 If I must needs glory, <sup>b</sup>I will glory of the things which concern mine infirmities.

The apostle here calleth the things which he had suffered for the gospel, and the propagation of it, his infirmities; and saith, that he chose those things to glory in. He would not glory of the divers tongues with which he spake, nor of the miracles which he had wrought; but being by the ill tongues of his adversaries put upon glorying, he chose to glory of what he had suffered for God. For as the mighty power of Christ was seen in supporting him, and carrying him through so many hazards and difficulties; so these things, probably, were such as his adversaries could not much glory in. Besides, that these things had not that natural tendency to lift up his mind above its due measures, as gifts had, which sometimes puff up (as the apostle saith concerning knowledge); and also these were things which flesh and blood commonly startleth at, and flieth from: that his gifts and miraculous operations spake the power of God in him, and the kindness of God to him, in enabling him to such effects, rather than any goodness in himself; but his patient bearing the cross spake in him great measures of faith, patience, and self-denial, and love to God; and so really were greater and truer causes of boasting, than those things could be.

31 <sup>c</sup>The God and Father of our Lord Jesus Christ, <sup>d</sup>which is blessed for evermore, knoweth that I lie not.

Whether this phrase be the form of an oath, or a mere assertion of God's knowledge of the heart, is a point not worth the arguing. If we look upon it in the former notion, it is no profane oath, because made in the name of God; nor no vain oath, because it is used in a grave and serious matter, and for the satisfaction of those who were not very easy to believe the apostle in this matter. But I had rather take it as a solemn assertion of God's particular knowledge of the truth of his heart in what he had said. The term blessed for evermore, may either be applied to the Father, or to Jesus Christ. It is applied to the Creator, Rom. i. 25, and to Jesus Christ, Rom. ix. 5. It is here so used, as that it is applicable either to the First or Second Person. The usage of it in these three texts, is an undeniable argument to prove the Godhead of Christ. The apostle, in these words, seemeth rather to refer to what he had said before, of his various labours and sufferings, than to that which followeth; which was but a single thing, and a danger rather than a suffering.

32 <sup>e</sup>In Damascus the governor under Aretas the king kept the city of the Damascus with a garrison, desirous to apprehend me:

33 And through a window in a basket I let down by the wall, and escaped his hands.

Luke hath shortly given us the history of this danger, Acts ix. 23—25. Soon after Paul was converted from the Jewish to the Christian religion, he, disputing with the Jews which dwelt at Damascus, confounded them by his arguments, proving Jesus was the Christ, as we read there, ver. 21. This so enraged them, as that they sought to kill him, ver. 23. And (as we learn from this text) to effect their design, they had by some acts or other brought over the governor to favour their design; which governor was a substitute under Aretas the king, who was father-in-law to Herod; for (as Josephus tells us) Herod put away his wife, the daughter of this Aretas, when he took Herodias. The Jews had got this deputy heathen governor so much on their side, that he shut up the gates, keeping his soldiers in arms. But (as St. Luke tells us, Acts ix. 24) Paul coming to the knowledge of this design, though they watched the gates day and night, yet he found a way of escape by the help of those Christians, who at that time were in Damascus; ver. 25, The disciples took him by night, and let him down by the wall in a basket. Two questions are started upon this passage of Paul's life: 1. Whether it was lawful for him to flee? But besides the particular licence our Lord, in this case, had given his first ministers, Matt. x. 23, Paul did in this case no more than what divines make lawful for a more ordinary minister, viz. to flee, when the persecution was directed against him in particular, leaving sufficient supply behind him. The second question raised is, Whether, it being against human laws to go over the walls of a city or garrison, Paul did not sin in this escape? But that is easily answered; for, 1. This was lawful in some cases. 2. God's glory, and the good of souls, were more concerned in Paul's life, than to have it sacrificed to a punctilio of obedience to a human law made upon a mere politic consideration.

signs of an apostle. for forcing him to such vain boasting, 11—13. He telleth them of his design of visiting them again with the same disinterestedness and fatherly affection as before, 14, 15. He justifieth himself from any crafty extortion by his messengers, 16—19; and expresseth his fears, lest, both to his sorrow and theirs, he should find many notorious disorders still unredressed among them, 20, 21.

IT is not expedient for me doubtless to glory. † I will come to visions and revelations of the Lord.

+ Gr. For I will come.

It is not expedient for me doubtless to glory; it is neither comely, nor of any advantage to myself, to glory; nor would I do it but in this case of necessity, where glorying is necessary for the glory of God, and for your good, to vindicate myself to you from the imputations that some others lay upon me. I will come to visions and revelations of the Lord: do any of them boast of visions and revelations from God? I have something of that nature to glory in as well as they. Some make this difference betwixt visions, and revelations; that visions signify apparitions, the meaning of which, those that see them do not understand; revelations signify the discoveries of the mind and will of God to persons immediately, either by dreams, or by some audible voice, which may be without any object represented to the eye. Pharaoh and Nebuchadnezzar seem to have had such visions as they did not understand, till interpreted by Joseph and Daniel; but undoubtedly Paul's visions were not such. The difference therefore seems rather to be, that in all visions which good and holy men had, there was a revelation; but every revelation did not suppose a vision.

2 I knew a man <sup>a</sup>in Christ about fourteen years ago, (whether in the body, I cannot tell; or whether out of the body, I cannot tell: God knoweth;) such an one <sup>b</sup>caught up to the third heaven. Some doubt whether ἐν Χριστῷ, in this place, be so well translated in Christ, (so signifying, that the person spoken of was a Christian, one that had embraced the gospel,) as by Christ, (as the particle is sometimes used,) so signifying, that this vision was given to him by the grace and favour of Christ. The man he speaketh of was, doubtless, himself, otherwise it had been to him no cause or ground of glorying at all. Thus several times in Scripture, the penmen thereof speaking in commendation of themselves, they speak in the third person instead of the first. In his saying, it was about fourteen years ago, and in that we do not read that he did ever before publish it, he avoids the imputation of any boasting and glorying; and showeth, that had he not been now constrained, for the glory of God, and the vindication of his own reputation, to have spoken of it, he would not now have mentioned it. Whether in the body, I cannot tell; or whether out of the body, I cannot tell: what the circumstances of the apostle were in this ecstasy, he professeth not to know; and therefore it seems too bold for us curiously to inquire, or positively to determine about it. It is not very probable that his soul was separated from his body; but whether his body was, by some angel, carried up to the sight of this vision, or things absent were made present to him, the apostle himself, being deprived of the use of his senses, could not tell. But such an one (he saith) he knew, caught up to the third heaven; by which he means the highest heavens, where God most manifesteth his glory, where the blessed angels see his face, and where are the just souls made perfect. The Scripture, dividing the world into the earth and the heavens, calleth all heaven that is not earth or water; hence it mentioneth an aerial heaven (which is all that space betwixt the earth and the place where the planets and fixed stars are); hence we read of the fowls of the heaven, Dan. iv. 12, of the windows of heaven, Gen. vii. 11, of a starry heaven, where the stars are, which are therefore called the stars of the heaven, Gen. xxii. 17; and then the highest heaven; which was meant in the Lord's prayer, when we pray, Our Father which art in heaven; and is called the heaven of heavens. This is the heaven here spoken of.

3 And I knew such a man, (whether in the body, or out of the body, I cannot tell: God knoweth;)

4 How that he was caught up into <sup>c</sup>paradise, and heard unspeakable words, which it is not <sup>d</sup>lawful for a man to utter.

c Luke 23. 43.

d Or, possible.

How that he was caught up into paradise: some by paradise understand a place distinct from the third heaven before mentioned, and think the apostle here speaks of more visions than one; but they speak much more probably, who interpret it of the third heaven before mentioned, called paradise, in regard of the delight and pleasures of it. Thus the term is used by our Saviour to the thief upon the cross, Luke xxiii. 43, and thus it is used, Rev. ii. 7. And heard unspeakable words; what these unspeakable words, or things, were, which the apostle heard in this ecstasy, is vainly inquired; whenas the apostle hath told us twice, that he could not tell whether he was in or out of the body; and that the words or things were such as were unspeakable. Which it is not lawful for a man to utter; such as were either impossible to be uttered, or at least which he was prohibited to utter; so they could be made known to none but only to him that heard them. If any inquireth, for what purpose God showed them to Paul, if he might not communicate them for the good of others? the answer is easy; that this vision might be for his own confirmation, as sent of God, and for his consolation under all those hazards and dangers which he was to undergo in the ministry of the gospel, to which God had called him.

5 Of such an one will I glory: <sup>e</sup>yet of myself I will not glory, but in mine infirmities.

e ch. 11. 30.

Of such an one will I glory: the apostle, as appeareth by what followeth, speaketh of himself; but he does it in a third person. The meaning is, that that man who had been thus dignified of God, in such revelations and visions, might well glory of such a favour; but yet (saith he) of myself will I not glory. But how doth the apostle say, that of himself he will not glory, if he were the person intended? Ans. Some say, he distinguisheth concerning himself; as to his inward man, his soul, (which was rapt into the third heavens,) he did glory; but as to his body, or outward man, he would not glory in any thing which he had done, but only in what he had suffered. I should rather interpret it thus: In this the Lord greatly dignified me; but here was nothing of myself; of myself therefore I will not glory in any thing, except those things which I have suffered for the name of God.

6 For <sup>f</sup>though I would desire to glory, I shall not be a fool; for I will say the truth: but <sup>g</sup>now I forbear, lest any man should think of me above that which he seeth me to be, or that he heareth of me.

If I should have a mind to glory, I should not be a fool; for I would not glory in things that were not true. And though a man, in speaking things of himself which are true, may sometimes betray folly (viz. where he doth it merely to set forth himself, and make himself to appear a greater person than indeed he is); yet for a man to glory of himself, where the honour of God is concerned in the vindication of himself from reproaches and calumnies, speaks not any folly. But (saith the apostle) I forbear, having no desire that any should think of me above what he seeth in me, or heareth of me from others' mouths, and not mine own.

7 And lest I should be exalted above measure through the abundance of the revelations, there was given to me a <sup>h</sup>thorn in the flesh, <sup>i</sup>the messenger of Satan to buffet me, lest I should be exalted above measure.

h See Ezech. 28. 24. Gal. 4. 13. 14. g Job 2. 7. Luke 13. 16.

The best of God's people have in them a root of pride, or a disposition to be exalted above measure, upon their receipt of favours from God not common to others; of which nature extraordinary revelations are none of the meanest, especially when they are multiplied, as it seems they were here to Paul. To prevent the breaking out of which, the apostle here tells us, that he had a thorn in the flesh given him. It is variously guessed what this was; he calleth it a thorn in the flesh; but whether (supposing flesh to be here strictly taken) he meaneth some disease affecting his body with pain and smart, and if so, what that specific disease was, is no where revealed, and very uncertainly conjectured: or whether (taking flesh in a large sense, for his state in the flesh) he meaneth some motions to sin made to him from the devil; the impotunity of which made them very grievous and afflictive to him, being in the flesh: or (as others think) motions to sin from his own lusts; which God suffered to stir in him, withholding such influence of his grace, by which he ordinarily kept them under, and in subjection; is very uncertain. The last mentioned seem to be least probable. For although the devil hath an influence upon our lusts, to excite and educe them into acts, yet it seems not according to the language of holy writ, to call these messengers of Satan; neither is it probable, that St. Paul would have reckoned these amongst the gifts of God unto him: nor was this an infirmity which he would have gloried in, or which would have commended him; nor doth the term buffet so well agree to this sense. It seems therefore more properly to be interpreted, either of some great bodily affliction, or some diabolical importunate temptation, with which God, after these abundant revelations, suffered this great apostle to be infested; that he might be kept humble, and not lifted up upon this great favour which God had showed him; which, considering the danger of pride, might well be reckoned amongst the gifts of God to this great apostle. And so he here gives another reason why he would not glory in the abundance of his revelations, because God by this providence had let him know, that his will was, that he should walk humbly notwithstanding them; and it had been very improper for him, being immediately upon this favour humbled by such a providence, to have lifted up himself by reason of it.

8<sup>h</sup> For this thing I besought the Lord thrice that it might depart from me.

For the removal of this affliction, (of what nature soever it was,) for the taking of this thorn out of my flesh, I prayed often. It is lawful for us to pray for the removal of bodily evils, though such prayer must be always attended with a due submission to the wisdom and will of God; they being not evils in themselves, but such trials as God intendeth for our good, (as it was here in Paul's case,) and which issue in our spiritual advantage.

9 And he said unto me, My grace is sufficient for thee: for my strength is made perfect in weakness. Most gladly therefore will I rather glory in my infirmities, that the power of Christ may rest upon me.

1 ch. 11. 30.

1 Pet. 4. 14.

And he said unto me, My grace is sufficient for thee: Paul prayed, and God answered, not in specie, (doing the very thing for him which he asked,) but in valore, giving him what was every whit as valuable. His answer was, My grace (my love and favour, not that which the apostle had already received, but which God was resolved further to show him, strengthening and supporting him under his trials, as also comforting and refreshing him) shall be enough for thee, to uphold thee under the present trial which is so burdensome to thee. For my strength is made perfect in weakness; for my Divine power, in upholding and supporting my people, is never so glorious as when they are under weaknesses in themselves. When they are sensible of the greatest impotency in themselves, then I delight most to exert and put forth my power in them and for them, my power then is most evident and conspicuous, and will be best acknowledged by my people. Therefore (saith the apostle) I will choose to glory in my infirmities, that the power of Christ may rest upon me. Those dispensations of providence, in which the souls of men have the greatest experiences of the power and strength of Christ, are most to be gloried in; but such are states of infirmities. This text confirmeth Christ to be God blessed for ever; for by his power it is that we are supported under trials, his strength it is which is made perfect in the weakness of poor creatures.

1 Rom. 5. 3.

10 Therefore I take pleasure in infirmities, in reproaches, in necessities, in persecutions, in distresses for Christ's sake: for when I am weak, then am I strong.

1 ch. 13. 4.

Amongst other reasons why I rather choose to glory in what I suffer for Christ, (which is what he here calleth infirmities, and further openeth by reproaches, necessities, persecutions, and distresses for Christ's sake,) this is one; that I never find myself more strong in the habits and acts of the grace that is in me, than when I am thus made weak. What the apostle here saith of himself, the people of God have ever since his time ordinarily experienced: then it is that they are made strong in the exercises of faith, and patience, and love to God. A child of God seldom walks so much in the view of God as his God, and in the view of his own sincerity, as when, as to his outward condition and circumstances in the world, he walks in the dark and seeth no light.

11 I am become a fool in glorying; ye have compelled me: for I ought to have been commended of you: for nothing am I behind the very chiefest apostles, though I be nothing.

I am become a fool in glorying; I may amongst some of you (who interpret all things I say into the worst sense) gain nothing but the reputation of a weak man, wanting understanding, for speaking so much in my own commendation (contrary to the rules of modesty in ordinary cases). Ye have compelled me; but it is not matter of choice, but of necessity to me; the ill-will which some amongst you have to my honour and reputation, and continual defaming me as a vile and contemptible person, hath constrained me, for the honour of Christ, (whose apostle I am,) and the vindication of my own reputation, to boast in this manner; at least to relate what God hath done for, and in, and by me. For I ought to have been commended of you; it was your duty to have vindicated me from the aspersions cast upon me; so others' mouths should have praised me, and not my own: I must speak, because you hold your peace, or do worse in calumniating me. For in nothing am I behind the very chiefest apostles, though I be nothing; for you cannot but say that I, neither in my apostolical call and commission, nor yet in my gifts and graces, nor in my labours, nor in my sufferings, come behind those that are commonly thought to be the chiefest of the apostles; though (in some of your opinions) I be nothing; or indeed, of or from myself, am nothing; doing all that I do through Christ that strengtheneth me, and by the grace of God being what I am.

12 Truly the signs of an apostle were wrought among you in all patience, in signs, and wonders, and mighty deeds.

9 Rom. 15. 18, 19.
ch. 4. 2. & 8. 4. & 11. 6.

I had not only a call to my apostleship, (of which indeed you were no witnesses,) but I amongst you evidenced my call by such signs, as were sufficient to declare me to you to be a true apostle. Amongst these, he reckons, 1. Patience; 2. Miracles. The first refers to those many labours which he had, in travelling to propagate the gospel, in preaching, writing, &c.; this manifested him called of God to the work. 2. Miraculous operations were another sign; for though the working of miracles was not restrained to the apostolical office, yet when they were wrought in confirmation of the doctrine which the apostle had first preached, and so were a seal of his ministry, they were truly signs of his apostleship; it being no way probable, that the God of truth would have communicated his power to men for the confirmation of lies, or of an employment to which he had never called them.

13 For what is it wherein you were inferior to other churches, except it be that I myself was not burdensome to you? forgive me this wrong.

Wherein have not you been used as any other gospel churches were, where Peter, or James, or any other of the apostles have laboured? Hath not the same doctrine been preached to you? Have not as great miracles been wrought amongst you? Hath not the Holy Ghost been as plentifully shed abroad amongst you, to enrich you with all spiritual gifts, so as you have come behind in no gospel benefit? I know of nothing in which it hath not fared with you as with other churches, except in this; that whereas in other churches the apostles, or their pastors, have been burdensome to them, taking stipends and salaries for their pains, I have forborne it, and have not at all charged you. If this be a wrong to you, I hope it is not of that nature, but I may obtain a pardon for it. The reasons of the apostle's thus sparing the church of Corinth more than some other churches, we have before guessed at.

14 "Behold, the third time I am ready to come to you; and I will not be burdensome to you: for I seek not your's, but you: for the children ought not to lay up for the parents, but the parents for the children.

Behold, the third time I am ready to come to you: we read in holy writ but of two journeys which the apostle made to Corinth, Acts xviii. 1; xx. 2, and the latter is believed to have been after the writing of this Epistle. We must not think that all these motions are set down in Scripture. It is manifest that Paul had thoughts of going oftener, Acts xix. 21; 1 Cor. xvi. 5; chap. i. 15. Man purposeth, but God disposeth. For which reason, James adviseth us to add, If the Lord will, to our expressions testifying our resolutions. And I will not be burdensome to you; he lets them know, that he was coming to them with the same resolutions he had before taken up, not to put them to any charge. For I seek not yours, but you; for that, which should be the design of every faithful minister, was his design; viz. the gaining of their souls to Christ, and protecting of them, that in the day of judgment he might present them as a pure and chaste virgin unto Christ. His business was not to enrich himself by them; he sought the good of their souls, not their estates. For the children ought not to lay up for the parents: he looked upon them as his children, upon himself as their parent. And though indeed children ought to relieve their parents, if in want, yet it is not the course of the world for children to lay up for their parents. But the parents for the children; but, on the contrary, it is the course of parents to maintain their children, and to lay up for them.

15 And I will very gladly spend and be spent for you; though the more abundantly I love you, the less I be loved.

And I will very gladly spend and be spent for you; I am so far from desiring your money, that, if I had it, I would willingly spend it for you; and I do spend my strength for you, willing to die in your service, labouring for the good of your immortal souls. Though the more abundantly I love you, the less I be loved; but I am very unhappy as to some of you, who will not rightly understand me, but love me the less, the more they see my love to them.

16 But be it so, I did not burden you: nevertheless, being crafty, I caught you with guile.

I hear what some say, It is true, that when I was myself with you, I laid no burden upon you, did not put upon you any collection for me; but, like a crafty man, I set others to take money of you for my use; so as, what I did not by myself, I did by those whom I employed. This appeareth to be the sense by what followeth in the next verse, where he appealeth to them for his vindication of this particular.

17 Did I make a gain of you by any of them whom I sent unto you?

e ch. 8. 6, 16,

18 I desired Titus, and with him I sent a brother. Did Titus make a gain of you? walked we not in the same spirit? walked we not in the same steps?

The apostle, to avoid or wipe off this imputation, appealeth to themselves to name any person (whom he had sent unto them) that had taken any thing of them for his use. He saith, that he desired Titus to come to them: of this desire we read before, chap. viii. 6, 16, 18, 22. With him (he saith) he sent another brother: this is that brother, of whom he had said, ver. 18, that his praise was in the gospel throughout all the churches. Some guess it was Luke, but there is no certainty of that. He appeals to them, whether either of these made a gain of them? that is, took any thing of them: and whether they did not walk in the same spirit, and in the same steps? whether they did not show the same generosity and freedom? and by their behaviour amongst them did not show, that they did not seek what was theirs, (to be enriched by their estates,) but them; to communicate the riches of grace to their souls? The circumstances of God's providence may be such towards faithful ministers, as that they may be constrained to make use of others to do their work; but such, so near as they can judge, will never make use of any therein, but such as are of the same spirit with themselves, and walk in the same steps.

19 Again, think ye that we excuse ourselves unto you? we speak before God in Christ: but we do all things, dearly beloved, for your edifying.

Think ye that we excuse ourselves unto you? some of you may think, that I speak all this in my own defence, and seek only my own credit and reputation amongst you. I do not so. We speak before God in Christ; I speak as a Christian, as one who knows that God knoweth, seeth, and observeth what I say; searching my heart, and trying my reins. But we do all things, dearly beloved, for your edifying; all that I say I speak for your good, that you may be built up in faith, and love, and all other graces: a great hinderance to which, is prejudice against me, and such as are the ministers of the gospel to you; which I therefore desire (what in me lieth) to prevent and obviate. The apostle, not only here, but in several other parts of these and other his Epistles, declares what ought to be the great end of him, and all other ministers, viz. the edification of people; the conversion of the unconverted, and the perfecting of those in whom the foundation is laid, building them up in all good spiritual habits; both of these come under the notion of edification. If we consider Christ as the Foundation, conversion is edification; the building up of souls upon Christ, who is the gospel foundation; and other foundation can no man lay. If we consider the infusion of the first habits of grace into the soul as the foundation, edification signifies a going on from faith to faith; a growing in grace and in the knowledge of the Lord Jesus Christ, a going on to perfection. The true minister of Christ ought to make edification in both of these senses his end, and his great end; for by this means is God glorified, the souls of his people benefited, and eternally saved.

20 For I fear, lest, when I come, I shall not find you such as I would, and that I shall be found unto you such as ye would not: lest there be debates, envyings, wraths, strifes, backbitings, whisperings, swellings, tumults:

For I fear, lest, when I come, I shall not find you such as I would; a good man, especially a faithful minister of the gospel, will be concerned at the sins of others, and as to their spiritual welfare. A profane person either rejoiceth in the sins of others, or at least is unconcerned for them; but a good man cannot be so, as knowing the sins of others reflect dishonour upon God. And that I shall be found unto you such as ye would not; he also cannot delight in the punishments of others, or doing any thing which may be ungrateful to them. Paul feareth lest the miscarriages of this church should enforce from him some acts of severity. He instanceth in some particular disorders in the members of this church, which he feared that he should find amongst them not amended; all the effects of pride and passion. Debates, or contentions, such as he had taxed them for, 1 Cor. i. 11; iii. 3. Envyings, or heats of passion; envying of one another for their gifts, &c. The other things which he mentioneth, are all sins against that brotherly love which ought to be found amongst Christians, and tending to ruptures amongst them; and teach us how contrary these are to the duty of Christians, who are one body.

21 And lest, when I come again, my God will humble me among you, and ma ch. 12. 2. that I shall bewail many <sup>m</sup> which have sinned already, and have not repented of the uncleanness and <sup>n</sup> fornication and lasciviousness which they have committed.

From hence it appeareth, that this church of Corinth, though it had many in it, without doubt, who were true and sincere Christians, yet had also many it which were otherwise; yea, many that were scandalous; for such are those mentioned in this verse. Again, the apostle's mentioning of many that had committed uncleanness, fornication, and lasciviousness, and not repented; wheras he had only given order for the excommunication of one incestuous person, 1 Cor. v., and in this Epistle, chap. ii., had given order for the restoring him upon his repentance; lets us know, that the governors of churches ought to use a great deal of prudence in the administering of church censures. We are also further taught, that nothing more afflicteth a godly person, who hath the charge of the souls of others, than to see them go on in courses of sin without repentance. Whether bewailing, in this verse, implieth proceeding to ecclesiastical censures, (as several interpreters think,) I doubt; for as the word doth not necessarily imply it, so his sparing use of that rod, which he could (though absent) have as well used against other unclean persons as one incestuous person; and choosing rather that the sentence should be declared against him by the church in his absence, than by himself when present; inclineth me to think, that by bewailing, here, he only means a Christian, afflictive sense of their miscarriages; wheras his desire was, that he might have a cheerful, comfortable journey to and abode with them. But yet, in the next chapter, he seemeth to threaten something more against some particular offenders.

CHAP. XIII

Paul threateneth to vindicate his authority at his coming by punishing severely unreclaimed offenders, 1—4. He adviseth the Corinthians to try if they had as good proofs of their faith, as he trusted to have of his mission, 5, 6. He wisheth that by a blameless conversation they might prevent him from using sharpness toward them, whatever became of his proofs, 7—10. He concludeth with an exhortation, salutation, and prayer, 11—14.

<sup>a</sup> THIS is <sup>b</sup> the third time I am coming to you. <sup>c</sup> In the mouth of two or three witnesses shall every word be established.

Not the third time when he was upon his journey, (for he was not now travelling,) but the third time that he had taken up thoughts of, and was preparing for, such a journey: which, it may be, he hinteth to them, that they might be the more afraid to continue in those sinful courses which he had blamed them for. In the mouth of two or three witnesses shall every word be established: he alludeth to the law of God, Deut. xix. 15, concerning witnesses in any case. God ordered, that the testimony of two or three persons should determine all questions in their law; and that should be taken for certain and established, which such a number of persons asserted. The apostle would from hence have them conclude, that he would certainly come, because this was the third time that he had resolved upon it, and was preparing for it.

<sup>e</sup> ch. 10. 2. <sup>2</sup> I told you before, and foretell you, as if I were present, the second time; and being absent now I write to them <sup>d</sup> which heretofore have sinned, and to all other, that, if I come again, <sup>e</sup> I will not spare:

I told you in my former Epistle, and now (though I be yet absent) I tell you beforehand, as though I were present amongst you. I write to them which heretofore have sinned, and to all other; I write this for the sake of those who have already sinned scandalously; and not for theirs only, but for the sake of others, who may have temptations so to offend. That, if I come again, I will not spare; that, if I do come, and find any such who walk in courses of sin, and are hardened in them, so as all that I have said will not bring them to remorse and reformation, I will not spare them, either as to sharp reprehensions, or as to ecclesiastical censures; according to the trust which Christ hath reposed in me. Some extend this further, to a power of inflicting bodily pains; but it is not clear that the apostles were intrusted with any such power ordinarily, though sometimes they did exert such a power; as appeareth, both from the instances of Ananias and Sapphira, Acts v., and that of Elymas, Acts xiii. 8—11.

<sup>3</sup> Since ye seek a proof of Christ <sup>f</sup> speaking in me, which to you-ward is not weak, but is mighty <sup>g</sup> in you.

Christ (saith the apostle) hath openly showed his power in my ministry, speaking to you; how else came your hearts to be turned from dumb idols to serve the living God? how came you to be furnished with those excellent gifts wherewith you abound? But, seeing all this is not judged a sufficient proof of Christ's speaking in me to you, but you are yet doubting whether I am an apostle or no, and calling for a proof of Christ in me; I will, if I come, and find any that have lived scandalously, and are impenitent, show you another proof of that power and authority with which Christ hath trusted me. Which must be understood, either of his miraculous power to inflict some bodily afflictions upon them, or (which is more probable) of his power as an apostle to cut them off from the communion of gospel churches.

<sup>4</sup> For though he was crucified through weakness, yet <sup>h</sup> he liveth by the power of God. For <sup>i</sup> we also are weak <sup>j</sup> in him, but we shall live with him by the power of God toward you.

He had before said, that Christ in him was not weak, but mighty; here he showeth, that there was a time when Christ himself was weak, in a low and contemptible state, in which state he was crucified; his state of weakness subjected him to a death upon the cross: but, by the power of God, he rose again from the dead, ascended up into heaven, where he liveth for ever to make intercession for us. For we also are weak in him; in conformity to Christ (he saith) he and the rest of the apostles were weak; in a low, abject, contemptible condition, exposed to reproaches, deaths, &c. But we shall live; which some understand of life eternal, consequent to the resurrection of believers; but others better, of the life and vigour of the apostle's ministry. Through the mighty power of God, flowing from a living Christ, who hath ascended up on high, and given gifts unto men, our ministry shall be a living, powerful, efficacious ministry toward you.

Examine yourselves: it is most commonly seen, that those who are most busy to desire or inquire after a proof of Christ in others, are tardiest in making an inquiry after Christ's being in themselves. The apostle therefore calleth the censorious part of this church, who desired a proof of Christ in him, to examine themselves. Whether ye be in the faith; whether they had any true faith; such as works by love, and purifies the heart. For he knew that they were baptized, and Christians in outward profession; nor is he blaming them for any apostasy from the doctrine of faith, only for an ill life, which evidenceth their faith not to be the faith of God's elect, a faith of the operation of God, &c. Prove your own selves: he doubleth the exhortation upon them, possibly for this end, to let them know, that if they found themselves in the faith, they could not reasonably doubt whether he himself was in the faith, or no, whom God had made the instrument to convert them. Know ye not your own selves: he commends to them the knowledge of themselves, as being a far more desirable piece of knowledge than the knowledge of other men; as to what they are, or what their state is towards God. How that Jesus Christ is in you, except ye be reprobates? in the inquiry after this, he bids them to inquire, whether Christ was in them, yea or no? The name of Christ was named upon them in their baptism, Christ had been preached to them; this the apostle knew; but all this might be, and yet Christ not dwell in their hearts by faith. This is the great point the apostle directs them to examine and prove themselves about, whether Christ was in them by a lively faith? apprehended and applied as their Saviour, ruling and governing them as their Lord and King? He lets them know the importance of this inquiry, telling them that Jesus Christ must be in them, if they were not reprobates. But (some might say) how could the apostle conclude this? though at present Christ was not in them, and they as yet were no more than formal professors, yet might not God open their eyes, and work in them afterwards a more full and effectual change?

Ans. 1. The apostle might be allowed to know more than ordinary ministers can know. He had before said, If our gospel be hid, it is hid to them that are lost. 2. When the gospel and the means of grace have been for some considerable time in a place, it is much to be feared, that those who have not in that time felt the saving power and effect of it upon their hearts, never shall. It is ordinarily observed, that where God blesseth the ministry of any to convert souls, their greatest harvest is in the first years of their ministry. 3. Some think, that the word ἀδόκιμοι should not be translated reprobates, but rather, not approved by God. If Christ be not in the soul by faith, it cannot be approved of God, because without faith it is impossible to please God. But we generally translate the word by reprobate, rejected, cast-away, 1 Cor. ix. 27; 2 Tim. iii. 8; Tit. i. 16; Heb. vi. 8. It seemeth to signify persons given over by God to a stupidity of mind, &c. So as the apostle here useth a very close argument, to put them upon a search into their own hearts and states, to see if they could find Christ dwelling in them; for otherwise, (considering their long profession, and the revelation of Christ to them,) it would be a ground of fear, that they were such as God had cast off for ever. However, as to their present state, they had no ground to conclude better, whatever mercy God might afterwards show them. Men's sitting and continuing long under the means of grace, and an outward profession, without a saving knowledge of Christ, and true savour of the truth, and a reformation of their lives according to the rules and directions of the gospel, is not indeed an infallible sign that he who formed them will never show them any favour; but it is a very great presumption that it will be so with such. Which should therefore strongly engage them to be very often and very seriously proving themselves, as to this thing, whether they be in Christ, and whether they have a true, saving faith?

6 But I trust that ye shall know that we are not reprobates.

You make a doubt whether Christ be in us, and you would fain know how it may be evidenced that he is so. If Christ be not in us we must be reprobates. But I trust that ye shall know, either in this life, by the evident signs of my apostleship, (which when I come I shall give you,) and by the life and power of my ministry amongst you; or in another life, when the sheep shall stand at God's right hand, and the goats at his left; that (whatsoever you think or say of us) we are none of those who are rejected and disapproved of God.

7 Now I pray to God that ye do no evil; not that we should appear approved, but that ye should do that which is honest, though we be as reprobates.

Now I pray to God that ye do no evil; I do not desire that when I come I may find objects for my severity, upon whom I may show a proof of Christ in me, by exercising that authority upon them with which Christ hath intrusted me: no, on the contrary, I heartily pray that ye may be holy and blameless, without spot or wrinkle. Not that we should appear approved; neither do I desire this for my own sake, that I may be approved, but I singly desire it for your good. But that ye should do that which is honest, though we be as reprobates; that you may do that which is good; and then do you, and let the world, think of me as a reprobate, or what they will.

8 For we can do nothing against the truth, but for the truth.

Truth in this place notes integrity of life and conversation; truth in action, opposed to hypocrisy, or scandalous living. He had before prayed, that they might do no evil; which if they did not, they need not fear his coming with a rod; for though he had a power from Christ to punish, yet he had no power to punish such as did well; his power was to be used for them, not against them. As the law was not made for the righteous, and the civil magistrate is not ordained of God for the terror of those that do well, but only of those that do evil; so neither did Christ ever ordain ecclesiastical censures for the punishment of good and holy men. And indeed here is the just boundary of all civil and ecclesiastical power; no magistrate or minister, acting as Christ's servants, can (lawfully, or as by any commission from him) do any thing against the truth, or those that own, defend, and practise it; the power with which they are trusted is for edification, not destruction.

9 For we are glad, when we are weak, and ye are strong: and this also we wish, even your perfection.

Some by weak here understand a moral impotency; as the apostle had said, he could not do any thing against the truth, that is, rightly and justly he could not: and by strong here, a spiritual strength, a reformation, growth, and proficiency in grace. These make the sense to be this; I am so far from coming with a desire to show amongst you my apostolical power in punishing offenders, as that I should be glad to find you so strong in the exercise of grace, that I should find none to punish; that men be made weak (as to the putting forth that power) by your spiritual strength. I incline to a more general interpretation. The apostle by this purgeth himself from any thing of vain-glory, or seeking himself; Though (saith he) I be weak, (as some amongst you report me,) yet if you be truly strong, I shall heartily rejoice therein. For I wish nothing more than your perfection; my reputation is nothing to me compared with that.

10 Therefore I write these things being absent, lest being present I should use sharpness, according to the power which the Lord hath given me to edification, and not to destruction.

The apostle here lets them know with how much tenderness he dealt with them; and whereas they might have charged him with sharpness in his letters, he assures them, that he therefore had so wrote, that he might prevent sharper dealings with them when he should come to them, by their hearkening to the admonitions of his letter; for otherwise, he tells them, that after he came he must deal more sharply with them in the execution of that power with which Christ had intrusted him. Yet he further tells them, that that power was for their good, not for their harm; for their edification, not for their destruction: which is the same with what he had said, chap. x. 8, and in the verse immediately preceding.

11 Finally, brethren, farewell. Be perfect, be of good comfort, be of one mind, live in peace; and the God of love and peace shall be with you.

Finally, brethren, farewell: the apostle shutteth up his Epistle according to the ordinary form of conclusions of letters, wishing all happiness to them: but he addeth something as a Christian, and a minister of the gospel. Be perfect: the word καταρτιζεσθε signifies to be compact, or united, as members of the same body, or parts of the same house; the perfection of a society lying much in the union of it. The perfection the apostle presseth here, seemeth to be the perfection of the body of the church, by the restoring of such as were separated from its communion, or had, through a spirit of contention, withdrawn themselves, rather than the perfection of the particular members of it, in the habits and exercises of grace. The Greek word seemeth that way to carry the sense; it properly signifies, the putting of members loosed from their joints into their proper place again, and such a perfection as followeth upon such an action, or any action proportionable to it. Be of good comfort: the word imports exhorted, comforted, confirmed: be exhorted to yield obedience to my precepts, or counsels; be comforted in all the trials or afflictions you do meet with, or may further meet with, for your profession of the gospel; be confirmed in the truths and holy ways of God. Be of one mind; if possible, of one and the same judgment in the truths of God; however, as pursuing the same scope and end; be one in affection. Live in peace, free from those contentions and divisions, those debates, and strifes, and wraths, and envyings, which I have before told you of as faults among you. This is the way for to have the presence of God with you, for he is not the God of hatred and strife, but the God of love and peace; who hath commanded love and peace amongst those that are brethren, and will be present among them only who live in obedience to his royal law of love.

him as the Fountain of grace, or cometh by him as the Mediator between God and man; the actual love of God; that good-will by which God the Father embraceth creatures in Christ, and for his sake; and all the gracious communications of the Holy Spirit of God, (by which he strengtheneth, quickeneth, or comforteth the souls of God's people,) be with you all. Whether you value me or no, I heartily wish you well, and all the best things. In this text is an eminent proof of the Trinity, all the Persons being distinctly named in it (as in the commission about baptism). The apostle calleth the Father, God; the Son, Lord: he attributeth love to the Father; (moved by which he sent his only begotten Son into the world, John iii. 16;) grace to the Son, who loved us freely, and died for the fellowship or communion of the Holy Ghost, by whom the Father and Son communicate their love and grace to the saints. Amen is here used as a particle of wishing or desiring the thing before mentioned; it is the same with, Let it so be. Whether added by the apostle, or subjoined by the church of Corinth, upon the reading this Epistle among them, (as some think,) is not material.

¶ The second epistle to the Corinthians was written from Philippi, a city of Macedonia, by Titus and Lucas.

If the subscriptions to the apostolical Epistles were parts of the text and holy writ, we have it here determined, who that other brother was, mentioned chap. viii. 22, sent along with Titus to carry this letter, and the benevolence of the churches of Macedonia. But it is observed, that even in this subscription there is a certain evidence, that the subscriptions of the Epistles are no part of canonical writ; for in some Greek copies it is said to be sent by Paul and Timothy; whereas Paul was the writer of it, not the messenger, and in Macedonia when it was sent; and Timothy is joined with him in the writing, chap. i. 1.

THE EPISTLE OF PAUL THE APOSTLE

TO THE

GALATIANS

THE ARGUMENT.

GALATIA (to the churches in which country this Epistle is directed) is by all agreed to be a part of Asia the Lesser, now under the power of the Turks, and by them called Chiangare. Geographers tell us, it is bounded on the west by Phrygia the Greater, (now called German.) Bithynia, (now called Becksangel,) and Asia Propria, a country of Anatolia; on the south, with Pisidia, (now called Versageli,) and Licaonia (now called Cogni); on the east, with Cappadocia (now called Amasia); and on the north, with Paphlagonia (now called Bolli). The whole country was anciently called Gallo-Grecia, from some French, who, leaving their country and coming to inhabit there, gave it that name. It had in it several cities, amongst which geographers reckon Ancyra, Synopa, Pompeiopolis, Claudiopolis, Nicopolis, Laodicea, to which also some count Antioch. When or by whose ministry this people first received the gospel, we do not read. Paul travelled thither, Acts xvi. 6, but was at that time forbidden of the Holy Ghost to preach there; but, Acts xviii. 23, it is said, that when he had spent some time at Antioch, he departed, and went over all the country of Galatia and Phrygia in order, strengthening all the disciples. This was about two years after that he was forbidden to preach there, in which time the gospel was planted and disciples made in this country.

At what time Paul wrote this Epistle to them is very uncertain; some think that it was written much at the same time when the Epistle to the Romans was written (the argument being much the same with that of that Epistle). Others think it was written at Rome during his last imprisonment, because he saith, chap. vi. 17, that he bare in his body the marks of the Lord Jesus. It is manifest that it was written at some distance of time after the first plantation of the gospel there, for the enemy had had time to sow tares.

The occasion of writing it, was partly to reprove the members of this church, for their apostacy from the doctrine of the gospel, as to justification; partly to set them right again in it, and to vindicate himself from the aspersions and imputations which their false teachers had cast upon him, in order to their better success with their new doctrine.

The new doctrine brought in by these false teachers, was the necessity of circumcision, and other works of the law, as well as faith in Christ, in order to the justification of the sinner before God; which they pressed rather upon a politic, than any religious consideration, as being the way to avoid that persecution which at that time attended all Christians; from which imputation, those who were circumcised, though they also professed faith in Christ, saved themselves. To buoy up themselves they vilified the apostle Paul to these churches, as being no apostle, one that had learned all which he knew from James, and Peter, and John; yet varied from them as to his doctrine and practice, yea, from himself also.

The two first chapters of this Epistle are mostly spent in the apostle's vindication of himself; proving himself to be a true apostle, and not to have learned what he taught from Peter, or James, or John, but that he had it by revelation from Jesus Christ. In the two following chapters he proves the doctrine of justification by faith in Christ, (in opposition to the justification taught by these false teachers, by the works of the law;) by various arguments. In the two last chapters, he presseth their standing fast in the liberty wherewith Christ had made them free, together with several other things, which are the common duties of all Christians. Then closeth his Epistle, with praying grace, mercy, and peace, to be their, and all true Christians', portion.

CHAP. I

After saluting the churches of Galatia, 1—5, Paul testifieth his surprise that they should so soon have forsaken the truth of the gospel which he had taught them, 6, 7; and pronounceth those accursed who preach any other gospel, 8, 9. He showeth that his doctrine was not concerted to please men, but came to him by immediate revelation from God, 10—12: to confirm which he relateth his conversation before his calling, 13, 14, and what steps he had taken immediately thereupon, 15—24.

A. D. 58. PAUL, an apostle, (*not of men, neither by man, but<sup>b</sup> by Jesus Christ, and God the Father,<sup>c</sup> who raised him from the dead;)

The term apostle, in its native signification, signifieth no more than one sent; in its ecclesiastical use, it signifieth one extraordinarily sent to preach the gospel; of these some were sent either more immediately by Christ, (as the twelve were sent, Matt. x. 1; Mark iii. 14; Luke ix. 1,) or more mediately, as Matthias, who was sent by the suffrage of the other apostles to supply the place of Judas, Acts i. 25, 26, and Barnabas, and Silas, and others were. Paul saith he was sent not of men, neither by man, that is, not merely; for he was also sent by men to his particular province. Acts xiii. 3; but he was immediately sent by Jesus Christ, (as we read, Acts ix., and xxvi. 14—17,) of which also he gives us an account in this chapter, ver. 15—17,) and by God the Father also, who, he saith, raised Christ from the dead. By this phrase the apostle doth not only assert Christ's resurrection, and the influence of the Father upon his resurrection, (though he rose by his own power, and took up his own life again, and was also quickened by the Spirit,) but he also showeth a speciality in his call to the apostleship. As it differed from the call of ordinary ministers, who are called by men (though their ministry be not merely of men); so it differed from the call of the rest of the apostles, being made by Christ not in his state of humiliation, (as the twelve were called, Matt. x.,) but in his state of exaltation, after he was raised from the dead, and sat down on the right hand of God.

2 And all the brethren<sup>d</sup> which are with me,<sup>e</sup> unto the churches of Galatia:

He writeth not only in his own name, but in the name of all those other Christians that were with him in the place where he now was (whether Rome or Corinth, or some other place, is uncertain); with whose consent and privacy probably he wrote, possibly at their instigation, and whose common consent in that doctrine of faith which he handleth, (as well as in other things about which he writeth,) he here declareth. Some think that the apostle forbears the term saints, or sanctified in Christ Jesus, &c., commonly used in his other Epistles, because of that apostacy for which he designed to reprove them; but it is implied in the term churches. Galatia was a large country, and had in it many famous cities; it was neither wholly Christian, nor yet such as to the major part; but there were in it several particular congregations of Christians, which he calleth churches; every congregation of Christians using to meet together to worship God, being a church, a particular church, though all such congregations make up but one universal visible church. Nor, being guilty of no idolatry, though corrupted in some particular points of doctrine, and those of moment, doth the apostle deny them the name of churches, though he sharply rebuketh them for their errors.

3 Grace be to you and peace from God the Father, and from our Lord Jesus Christ,

1 Thess. 1. 1. 2 Thess. 1. 2. 2 John 3.

A common, as well as religious and Christian, form of salutation; Paul's mark in every Epistle, and used by him without any variation, (except in his Epistles to Timothy and Titus, where he only adds mercy &c.,) the want of which, as also of his name, offers some grounds to doubt whether he wrote the Epistle to the Hebrews. Paul had used it in the beginning of his Epistle to the Romans, and both the Epistles to the Corinthians: see the notes on Rom. i. 7; 1 Cor. i. 3; 2 Cor. i. 2. It teaches us, in our common discourses, whether epistolary or otherwise, to speak to our friends like Christians, who understand and believe that the grace, mercy, and peace from God, are the most desirable good things.

4 Who gave himself for our sins, that he might deliver us<sup>b</sup> from this present evil world, according to the will of God our Father:

Which Christ, though he was put to death by Pilate and the Jews, yet he was not compelled to die; for he laid down his life, no man took it from him, John x. 17, 18. Sometimes it is said, he died for our sins, as Rom. v. 8; sometimes, that he gave himself, (meaning, to death,) as in Eph. v. 2, 25; 1 Tim. ii. 6; Tit. ii. 14: he was given by his Father, and he gave himself by his own free and spontaneous act. For our sins, must be interpreted by other scriptures: here is the defect of a word here, which the Socinians would have to be remission; others, expiation (of which remission is a consequent). Both, doubtless, are to be understood, and something more also, which is expressed in the following words of the verse. Remission of sins is granted to be the effect of the death of Christ, but not the primary and sole effect thereof; but consequential to the propitiation, mentioned Rom. iii. 25; the redemption, Eph. i. 7; the sacrifice, Heb. x. 12: both which texts show the absurdity of the Socinians, in quoting those texts to favour their notion of Christ's dying for the remission of our sins, without giving the justice of God satisfaction. And though some other texts mention Christ's dying for our sins, without mention of such expiation, propitiation, redemption, or satisfaction; yet they must be interpreted by the latitude of the end of Christ's death (expressed in other scriptures) relating to sin. Which is not only expiation, and remission, but the delivery of us from the lusts and corruptions of this present evil world. The apostle here deciphereth this world, by calling it present and evil: by the first, he hinteth to us, that there is a world to come; by the latter, he showeth the sinful practices of the greatest part of men, (for by world he means the corruption of persons living in the world,) they are evil; and this was one end of Christ's death, to deliver his saints from their evil practices and examples; thus, 1 Pet. i. 18, we are said to be by the blood of Christ redeemed from a vain conversation received by tradition from our fathers. This (he saith) was done according to the will of God; the Greek word is θέλημα, not διαθήκη: the will of God is his decree, purpose, or good pleasure, so as it signifieth both his eternal purpose, (according to Eph. i. 4,) and his present pleasure or consent. I see no ground for the Socinian criticism, who would have us understand by it, God's testament, or present will for things to be done after death; the word importeth no more than God's eternal purpose, as to the redemption of man by the blood of Christ, and his well-pleaseness with his undertaking and performance of that work; this God he calleth our Father, not with respect to creation so much as adoption.

5 To whom be glory for ever and ever. Amen.

To which Father, (yet not excluding the Son,) for so great benefits bestowed upon us, be honour, and praise, from age to age, and to all eternity. The term Amen, being always used in Scripture either as a term of assertion, to aver the truth of a thing, or as a term of wishing, may here be understood in either or both senses; the apostle using it either to assert the glorifying of God to be our duty, and a homage we owe to God; or to signify his hearty desire that this homage may from all hands be paid unto him.

6 I marvel that ye are so soon removed <sup>1 ch. 5. a.</sup> from him that called you into the grace of Christ unto another Gospel:

The apostle here beginneth the matter and substance of his Epistle, with a reprehension of this church; which in some things is much qualified, in other things much aggravated. His expressing his reproof by the word marvel, hath in it something of mitigation, and signifieth his better hopes concerning them. The term removed, also, mollifies the reproof, the apostle thereby rather charging their apostacy upon their seducers, than upon them who were seduced; though they were not to be excused for their so yielding to the temptation, and that in so short a time, either after their first conversion, or after the first attempts upon them to seduce them; and herein was the aggravation of their guilt, that they very little resisted the temptation, but were presently overthrown by it. But it was a greater aggravation of their guilt, that they suffered themselves to be removed from him that called them. Interpreters doubt whether this be to be understood of God, or of Paul; and if of God, whether of the First or of the Second Person. That which inclineth some to think that Paul meant himself, was his instrumentality in the conversion of these Galatians; and his complaints of them in this Epistle, for their deserting his doctrine, and alienation from him; but then the substantive to the participle must be understood, and the call must be understood of the external call only, by the ministry of the word. It therefore seemeth rather to be understood of God; the apostles generally ascribing calling to God, chap. v. 8; 1 Thess. v. 24; 2 Thess. ii. 14; 1 Pet. i. 2, 15; 2 Pet. i. 3. Nor doth it seem proper to refer the action to Christ, because the apostles ordinarily ascribe calling to the First Person in the Trinity, calling us by Christ, as Rom. viii. 30; 2 Thess. ii. 13, 14, 16; 2 Tim. i. 9; 1 Pet. v. 10; besides, the grace of Christ is here made the term to which they are called. And though this would supply the participle with a substantive in the text, without understanding one, yet it seems both too remote, and also to alter the sense of the text; making it to run thus, from Christ that called you unto grace, instead of him that called you into the grace of Christ. By which grace the apostle doubtless means not the doctrine of the gospel only, (though that be sometimes called grace,) but all the benefits of the gospel, justification, reconciliation, adoption; which are all properly called the grace of Christ, as being the purchase of his blood. Unto another gospel; that is, to the embracing of other doctrine, differing from the doctrine of the gospel, though it be brought to you by seducers under that notion; showing you another pretended way of salvation than by the merits of Jesus Christ, whereas God hath given no other name under heaven, neither is there salvation in any other, Acts iv. 12.

7 <sup>k</sup> Which is not another; but there be some <sup>l</sup> that trouble you, and would pervert the Gospel of Christ.

Which is not another; another doctrine it is, but another doctrine or glad tidings of salvation, or another gospel of Christ, it is not; for there is no other. In and by the new notions they bring they do but trouble you, and pervert the true doctrine of the gospel; though they use the name of Christ, and of his gospel, they do it falsely; for by making the works of the law, and the observance of them, necessary to be by you observed in order to your salvation, they quite destroy and pervert the glad tidings of salvation; viz. that we are saved by Christ alone and faith in him, and by a righteousness without these works.

8 But though <sup>m</sup> we, or an angel from heaven, preach any other Gospel unto you than that which we have preached unto you, let him be accursed.

9 As we said before, so say I now again, If any man preach any other Gospel unto you <sup>n</sup> than that ye have received, let him be accursed.

The apostle, by this vehement expression, doth no more suppose it possible that a heavenly angel should publish to them any other way of salvation than what he had published, than that he himself might so contradict his own doctrine. He only by it declares his certainty of the truth, which he had delivered to them; it was not to be contradicted either by man or angel; and further teacheth us, that additions to the doctrines of the gospel make another gospel; God neither allowing us to add to, nor to diminish from, Divine revelations; for of this nature were the corruptions crept into this church. These seducers owned Christ and the doctrine of the gospel: only teaching the Jewish circumcision, and other ceremonial rites, as necessary to be observed in order to people's salvation, they made the pretended gospel (which they taught) to be another gospel than that which Paul had preached, and which believers in this church had received. In saying let him be accursed, he also saith that he who doth this shall be accursed; for the apostle would neither himself curse, nor direct others to curse, whom he did not know the Lord would curse, and look upon as cursed. These two verses look dreadfully upon the papacy, where many doctrines are published, and necessary to be received, which Paul never preached, nor are to be found in any part of Divine writ.

10 For <sup>o</sup> do I now <sup>p</sup> persuade men, or God? or <sup>q</sup> do I seek to please men? for if I yet pleased men, I should not be the servant of Christ.

For do I now persuade men, or God? there is an emphasis in the particle now, since I became a Christian, and was made an apostle; while I was a Pharisee I did otherwise, but since I became an apostle of Jesus Christ, do I persuade you to hear what men say, or what God saith? Or (as others) do I persuade the things of men, their notions and doctrines, or the things of God? Or do I in my preaching aim at the gratifying or the pleasing of men, or the pleasing of God? The last is plainly said in the next words, do I seek to please men? which must not be understood in the full latitude of the term, but restrainedly, do I seek to please and humour men in things wherein they teach and act contrary to God? It is the duty of inferiors to please their superiors, and of all good ministers and Christians, to please their brethren, so far as may tend to the advantage of their souls; or in civil things, so as to maintain a friendly and peaceable society; but they ought not to do any thing in humour to them, by which God may be displeased. In which sense it is that the apostle adds, For if I pleased men, that is, in saying as they say, and doing as they do, without regard to pleasing or displeasing of Christ, I should not show myself the servant of Christ; for his servants we are whom we obey, and our Lord hath taught us, that no man can serve two masters, that is, commanding contrary things.

11 <sup>r</sup> But I certify you, brethren, that the Gospel which was preached of me is not after man.

He calls them brethren, though some of them were revolted, because they owned Christ, and makes known or declares to them, (so the word is translated, Luke ii. 15; John xv. 15; xvii. 26,) that the doctrine of the gospel, which he had preached unto them, was no human invention or fiction, nor rested upon human authority, but was from God, immediately revealed to him: and herein he reflecteth upon the false teachers that had seduced them, and, in order to that, vilified him, as being but a disciple to some other of the apostles, yet teaching otherwise than they taught. I would have you know (saith he) that it is otherwise; the gospel which I preached is not after man. He fully openeth his own meaning in this phrase, in the next words.

12 For <sup>s</sup> I neither received it of man, neither was I taught it, but <sup>t</sup> by the revelation of Jesus Christ.

second-hand, from Peter, James, or John, as the false teachers had suggested, nor was I taught it otherwise than by the immediate revelation of Jesus Christ. Revelation signifieth the discovery of something which is secret (as the gospel, and doctrine of it, is called a mystery hid from ages). It may be objected, that Paul was instructed by Ananias, Acts ix. 17. But this prejudiceth nothing the truth of what the apostle saith in this place, neither do we read of much that Ananias said to him in a way of instruction; it is only said, that he laid his hands on him, and he was filled with the Holy Ghost. When, or where, he had these revelations, the apostle saith not; probably while he lay in a trance, blind, and neither eating nor drinking for three days, Acts ix. 9. Others think it was when he was caught up into the third heaven, 2 Cor. xii. 2. Certain it is, that St. Paul had revelations from Christ, Acts xxii. 17, 18; xxvi. 15—18. Revelation signifies an immediate conveying of the knowledge of Divine things to a person, without human means; and in that Paul ascribes the revelation of the gospel to Jesus Christ, he plainly asserts the Divine nature of the Lord Jesus Christ.

13 For ye have heard of my conversation in time past in the Jews' religion, how that "beyond measure I persecuted the Church of God, and "wasted it:

It will be no difficult thing for you to believe, that I had never preached the gospel without a Divine revelation of the truth of it, if you do but reflect upon my former conversation; for you cannot but have heard, that I was born a Jew, educated in the Jewish religion, and was a zealous defender of it, so as I persecuted the Christians beyond measure. This unmeasurable persecution is expressed by Luke more particularly, Acts viii. 3, He made havoc of the church, entering into every house, and haling men and women, committed them to prison; and Acts ix. 1, He breathed out threatenings and slaughter against the disciples of the Lord, &c. He wasted the church like an enemy that useth fire and sword, and all means to destroy. The word here used is ἰσόρροον, which signifies to make a devastation; the word used in Acts viii. is ἐλυμαίνετο both words signify the most ruining hostile actions. And this he saith was his conversation, or constant practice, so as they might reasonably think, that something more than human had made a change in him, that he should now be a preacher of that doctrine, which he had before so abominated as that his whole business was to root out those that professed it.

14 And profited in the Jews' religion above many my †equals in mine own nation, †being more exceedingly zealous † of the traditions of my fathers.

The word here used, and translated profited, may be interpreted either of his own personal proficiency, and going on in the Jewish religion, or of his propagating of it, and making that to go on, which seemeth to be the sense of the same word, 2 Tim. ii. 16. And it is observed, that active verbs in the Greek in imitation of the Heb. con. Pihil., sometimes signify to do an action oneself, sometimes to make others do it; and Paul's wasting the Christian church had a rational tendency to uphold and propagate Judaism, the propagation of which was the end designed by it; this he saith he did above others of his countrymen, that were his equals in years. By this also he lets them know, that his persecuting the Christian church was not a passionate act, or for a gain to himself, but from an erroneous judgment, he verily thought that he ought to do what he did against Jesus of Nazareth, and his disciples. He addeth, that he was more exceedingly zealous of the traditions of the fathers; by which he understands not only the rites of the ceremonial law, but the whole body of their constitutions, which the rulers of that church had made, under the notion of seppimenta legis, hedges or fences to the laws of God, to keep men at a distance from the violation of them; and other constitutions also, of which they had innumerable. Paul was a Pharisee, (the son of a Pharisee, Acts xxiii. 6.) bred up at the feet of Gamaliel (one of the doctors of their law); this was the strictest sect (for ceremonies) of their religion: and this his zeal for traditions, is that which he calleth a progress, or profiting in the Jewish religion, and was a cause of the propagation of that religion.

15 But when it pleased God, "who separated me from my mother's womb, and called me by his grace,

Here are two acts predicated of God, with relation to Paul: the first is a separating of him from the womb; the same was said of two of the great prophets, Isaiah and Jeremiah, Isa. xlix. 1; Jer. i. 5. The apostle here is not speaking of God's decree, predestinating him to eternal life, but of his determining him to the work of an apostle. God predetermineth men to the stations they shall take up in the world; especially such who are to take up stations wherein they are to be eminently useful and serviceable to him. The second act predicated of God is his calling of Paul: this is an act in time, and lieth much in the preparing of persons for the work allotted to them, and in inclining the heart to it. Thus God called Paul, fitting him for the work of the ministry, and inclining him to it; to which he added his immediate command from heaven, that he should go and preach the gospel. Both these acts of God are ascribed to his good pleasure and grace, nothing but his mere free love and favour moving him, either to separate, or to call Paul to this high and great employment.

16 "To reveal his Son in me, that "I might preach him among the heathen; immediately I conferred not with <sup>d</sup>flesh and blood:

When it pleased God to discover Christ his Son (by an eternal generation) to me, whom neither naturally, nor from any instruction in my education, was acquainted with any thing of Christ, but, according to the common prejudices of those of my own country, looked upon him as a mere man, and an impostor; and also revealed to me the end of that discovery, not only that I myself should receive and embrace him, but that I should publish him amongst the heathens (where he intimates the speciality of his separation and call); I, saith he, immediately advised with no mortal man living, (for that is signified by flesh and blood, Matt. xvi. 17; 1 Cor. xv. 50,) but resolved with myself to address myself to that work and employment to which I had such a special call from God.

17 Neither went I up to Jerusalem to them which were apostles before me; but I went into Arabia, and returned again unto Damascus.

As Jerusalem was the place for the oracle of the law, under the Old Testament; so it also was for the gospel upon the first publication of it. There the disciples were; they returned thither after they had seen Christ ascend to heaven, Luke xxiv. 52; from thence they were not to depart, but to wait there for the promise of the Father, Acts i. 4. There the Holy Ghost came down upon them, Acts ii.; there they continued till the persecution scattered them; there was the college of the apostles. Paul saith, that, upon his conversion, he did not go up thither, nor till three years after (as he tells us in the next verse); but he went into Arabia, amongst the heathens, and the most wild and barbarous heathens, for such were the Arabians. Luke, in the Acts, tells us nothing of this. From hence it was easy to conclude, that Paul had not his commission from the other apostles that were before him, for he saw none of them till he had been a preacher of the gospel to the wild Arabians three years. And then he returned to Damascus: the word is ὑπιστρέψα, which is by some observed to signify his being compelled to return, (as they judge,) by some persecution raised amongst the heathens; but of this the Scripture saith nothing.

18 Then after three years "I || went up to Jerusalem to see Peter, and abode with him fifteen days.

These three years were spent partly in Arabia, partly at Damascus, whither he returned; and he, being there, was not idle, but, as Luke informs us, preached Christ in the synagogues, confounded the Jews, proving that this was the very Christ, which made the Jews take counsel to kill him: here it was that he escaped them, by being let down over the wall in a basket, Acts ix. 20, 22—25. Then he went to Jerusalem, where his conversion, and call to preach the gospel, was not heard of, (possibly in regard of the remoteness of Arabia, where he had spent most of those three years; or in regard of the troubled state of the church at Jerusalem at this time,) insomuch that the disciples were afraid to admit him to join with them, until Barnabas had given testimony concerning him, Acts ix. 27. He tells us here that he stayed there but fifteen days; during which time Luke tells us, Acts ix. 29, he spake boldly in the name of the Lord Jesus, and disputed against the Grecians.

The apostles were at this time scattered, either through the persecution, or for the fulfilling of the work of their apostleship; so as probably there were at this time no more of the apostles at Jerusalem, except Peter, and James the less, the son of Alphaeus, who is here called the brother of our Lord, as is generally thought, according to the Hebrew idiom, who were wont to call near kinsmen, brethren. Upon another journey which Paul made to Jerusalem, he saw others (as we shall hear in the next chapter); but that was several years after this his first journey thither.

20 Now the things which I write unto <sup>h</sup> you, <sup>h</sup> behold, before God, I lie not.

Whether those words, before God, make this sentence an oath, is not material to determine; they are either an oath, or a very serious asseveration. If the apostle designed to call God for a witness, to the correspondence of his words with the truth of the things he had spoken, they make up an assertory oath, which was lawful enough (though privately taken) in so serious a matter as this, where the apostle is vindicating his apostleship from some acts, of which probably he had no witnesses at hand to produce; but they may be understood (by the supplement of, I speak, or, I say this) only as a form of serious assertion, to confirm the truth of what he asserted. He minds them, that he was sensible of God's presence in all places, and particular taking notice of the things spoken; as being spoken before him, who knew that what he spake was truth.

After that I came from Jerusalem, I came into the country of Syria; probably not to Damascus, the chief city of Syria, (where he had so narrow an escape in a basket,) but into the country parts of Syria; for Syria lay in the way betwixt Judea and Cilicia. It appeareth by Acts ix. 30, that Paul was designed for Tarsus, his native place; where we are also told, that the brethren conducted him to Cæsarea, which stood upon the confines of Syria. It is probable that he stayed some time at Tarsus; for there Barnabas found him, Acts xi. 25, 26, and brought him to Antioch; so that Paul had but fifteen days at Jerusalem to converse with the apostles, and in that time he saw none of them, but Peter, and James the son of Alphaeus.

To be in Christ, signifieth, 1. Their being Christians indeed; they having received Christ by a true and lively faith, and given themselves to the obedience of his precepts. In this sense the apostle saith, If any man be in Christ he is a new creature. 2. Their being Christians in name, by baptism and outward profession. These churches are said to be in Christ in this latter sense. We have a parallel text, 1 Thess. ii. 14. They do not judge improperly, who think that by Judea here is not meant the province, but the whole country of Judea; as comprehended not Judea only, but Samaria and Galilee. John Baptist and our Saviour (who both mostly preached in Galilee) had prepared their due matter for gospel churches. Peter, and John, and Philip, preached the gospel in many villages of the Samaritans, Acts viii. 25, 40. Of all these churches Paul speaks, telling us he was personally unknown unto them; so far he was from learning the Christian doctrine from the apostles or them.

23 But they had heard only, That he which persecuted us in times past now preacheth the faith which once he destroyed.

Though those churches in the country of Judea had never seen Paul's person, yet they had heard of him: 1. That he had been a persecutor of those which professed the doctrine of the gospel, which he here calleth the faith, it being the object and the means of faith. 2. That there was such a change wrought in him, as that he was now become a preacher of that doctrine, for the profession of which he had formerly wasted and destroyed the churches of Christ.

24 And they glorified God in me. And they praised God on his behalf, for working so great a change in him.

CHAP. II

Paul sheweth for what purpose after many years he went to Jerusalem, 1, 2: that Titus, who went with him, was not circumcised, and that on purpose to assert the freedom of the Gentile converts from the bondage of the law, 3—5: that no new knowledge was added to him in conference with the three chief apostles, but that he received from them a public acknowledgment of his Divine mission to the Gentiles, 6—10: that he openly withstood Peter for dissimulation with respect to Gentile communion, 11—13; expostulating with him, why he, who believed that justification came by the faith of Christ, acted as though it came by the works of the law, 14—20; which was, in effect, to frustrate the grace of God, 21.

THEN fourteen years after <sup>A. D. 52.</sup> I went up again to Jerusalem with Barnabas, and <sup>a</sup> Acts 15. 2. took Titus with me also.

Fourteen years after; either fourteen years after the three years before mentioned, and the fifteen days; or fourteen years after the conversion of Paul, or fourteen years after the death of Christ. This journey seeming to be that mentioned Acts xv. 2, it seems rather to be understood of fourteen years after the death of Christ. I went up again to Jerusalem: motions to Jerusalem are usually in Scripture called ascendings or goings up; either because of the mountains round about it, or in respect of the famousness of the place: see Acts xv. 2; xxi. 4. The occasion of this journey we have, Acts xv. 1, 2. It was to advise with the apostles and elders, about the necessity of circumcision; some that came from Judea having taught the disciples at Antioch, that except they were circumcised they could not be saved. With Barnabas, and took Titus with me also; Barnabas was chosen to go with Paul, Acts xv. 2, and some others, whom Luke nameth not, but it is plain by this text Titus was one.

2 And I went up by revelation, <sup>b</sup> and <sup>b</sup> Acts 15. 12. communicated unto them that Gospel which I preach among the Gentiles, but || privately to them which were of reputation, lest by any means <sup>c</sup> I should run, or had run, in vain. <sup>l</sup> Or, secretly. <sup>c</sup> Phil. 2. 16. <sup>l</sup> Thess. 3. 5.

And I went up by revelation; revelation signifieth God's immediate declaration of his will to him, that he would have him take this journey; which is not at all contradicted by Luke, saying, Acts xv. 2, 3, that their journey was determined by the Christians at Antioch. God, to encourage Paul, had let him know it was his will he should go; and also put it into the Christians' hearts at Antioch, to choose him to the journey. His motions from one place to another were much by revelation, or immediate order and command from God, Acts xvi. 9; xxii. 18; xxiii. 11. And communicated unto them that gospel which I preach among the Gentiles; he saith, he communicated, or made a report or relation of, (in which sense the word is used, Acts xxv. 14,) that doctrine of the gospel which he had preached amongst the Gentiles; he, doubtless, more particularly means, the abolition of circumcision, and no necessity of the observance of the law of Moses contained in ordinances. But privately to them which were of reputation; but he saith that he did it privately, and to men of reputation; by which he meaneth the apostles, or some other Christians of greatest eminency. Lest by any means I should run, or had run, in vain; lest he should have prejudiced himself, as to the course of the gospel, which he metaphorically compareth to a race: see 1 Cor. ix. 26. Object. If any ask how this influenced Paul, so as to make him privately to communicate the doctrine which he had amongst the Gentiles preached publicly? It is easily answered, 1. That the consent of those who were apostles before him to the doctrine which he preached, was of great moment to persuade all Christians to embrace it; and by this means he obviated the scandal of being singular in the doctrine which he preached. 2. Besides that Paul was now at Jerusalem, which was the chief place of the Jews' residence, to whom God indulged a greater liberty for the ceremonial usages, than to the churches of the Gentiles, who had not been educated in that religion. And had Paul openly there declared the liberty of Christians from circumcision, and the ceremonial usages, he had both enraged those who as yet continued in the Jewish religion, and possibly given no small offence to those who had been educated in that religion, though they were converted to the faith of the gospel, they not fully yet understanding the liberty of Christians from that yoke. By one or both of which ways, had Paul openly at Jerusalem published the doctrine which he had publicly preached in Damascus and Arabia, and other places of the Gentiles, his labours might have been rendered useless, and he might also have been less successful in his further course of preaching it.

3 But neither Titus, who was with me, being a Greek, was compelled to be circumcised :

The apostle brings this as an instance of the apostles at Jerusalem agreeing with him in his doctrine, as to the non-necessity of circumcision; for though Titus was with him, who was a native Gentile, being a Greek, and a minister of the gospel, (and possibly Paul carried him with him for an instance,) yet the apostles at Jerusalem did not think fit to impose upon him circumcision; no, not upon a solemn debate of that question. If any shall object that Paul himself circumcised Timothy, who was a Greek, Acts xvi. 1, 3; the answer is easy, the same text letting us know that his mother was a Jewess, and that he did it because of the Jews in those quarters. As to the Jews, it was matter of liberty at this time, they might or might not be circumcised. Now in matters of this nature, where men have a liberty, they ought to have regard to circumstances, and to do that which they, from a view of circumstances, judge will be most for the glory of God, the good of others, and give least offence, 1 Cor. x. 28—31.

4 And that because of <sup>d</sup> false brethren unawares brought in, who came in privily to spy out our <sup>e</sup> liberty which we have in Christ Jesus, <sup>f</sup> that they might bring us into bondage :

He gives the reason why circumcision was not urged upon Titus, viz. because there were some got into that meeting, where Paul debated these things with the apostles that were at Jerusalem, who, though they had embraced the Christian religion, (and upon that account were brethren,) yet were soured with the Jewish leaven, and were very zealous for all Christians to observe the Jewish rites of circumcision, &c.; upon which account it is that he calleth them false brethren. These (he saith) came in privily, to spy out that liberty which all Christians had, and Paul had preached and used, as to these Jewish ceremonies; who, could they have obtained to have had Titus circumcised, they had had a great advantage to have defamed Paul, as teaching one thing to the Gentile churches, and practising the contrary when he came to Jerusalem to the apostles, and amongst the Jews. And this being a liberty which he and all Christians had, in and from Jesus Christ, he would not part with it, for they aimed at nothing but the bringing of Christians again under the bondage of the ceremonial law. Some may say, It being a thing wherein Christians had a liberty, why did not St. Paul yield to avoid their offence; becoming all things to all men to gain some? Answer. In the use of our liberty, all circumstances are to be considered, as well as that of scandal and offence. The valuable opposite circumstance in this case, seemeth to be the validity and success of the apostle's ministry, the efficacy of which would have been much weakened, if his enemies had from hence gained an advantage to represent him, as doing one thing in one place and the quite contrary in another. Besides, though at this time the use or not use of the ceremonial rites, by the Jews, was a matter of liberty, by reason of God's indulgence to them for the prejudices of their education, yet whether they were at all so to the Gentile churches, may be doubted: see chap. v. 2, 3. Further yet, these brethren urged the observation of these rites, as necessary to salvation, (as appears from Acts xv. 1,) for they were of the sect of the Pharisees, ver. 5. And to use them under that notion, was no matter of liberty.

5 To whom we gave place by subjection, no, not for an hour; that <sup>g</sup> the truth of the Gospel might continue with <sup>h</sup> you.

To these Judaizing Christians the apostle did not think fit to yield one jot, not for the least time, nor in so much as one precedent; having a desire that these Gentile churches might not be perverted. Or, (as others think,) to which men of reputation we yielded not in the least. It is very probable, that Peter and James, upon their first arguing the case, to avoid the scandal and offence of the Jews, would have had Titus circumcised: St. Paul would not yield to it, that he might preserve the doctrine of the gospel, which he had planted amongst the Galatians, and other Gentiles, pure, and not encumber those churches with the Mosaical rites. But the most and best interpreters rather judge the persons here mentioned, to whom Paul would not yield, to be some Judaizing Christians, rather than the persons of reputation, mentioned ver. 2.

6 But of those <sup>i</sup> who seemed to be somewhat, whatsoever they were, it maketh no matter to me: <sup>j</sup> God accepteth no man's person: for they who seemed to be somewhat <sup>k</sup> in conference added nothing to me :

But of those who seemed to be somewhat: the word translated seemed, is the same with that ver. 2, which we there translate of reputation. The apostle meaneth the same persons that were of the greatest reputation, and so the following words, to be somewhat, do import, Acts v. 36; viii. 9. We must not understand the apostle, by this expression, to detract from the just reputation that the apostles, and these eminent Christians at Jerusalem, had; he only taketh notice here of them, as magnified by the false teachers of this church, to the lessening of himself; and as those who seemed to be somewhat, must be interpreted as relating to these men's estimation of them; that seemed to you to be somewhat, though I seem nothing to you. Whatsoever they were, it maketh no matter to me; whatsoever they were formerly, suppose (as probably some of these Galatians had said) that they saw Christ in the flesh, were immediately called by him, when I was a Pharisee, &c. God accepteth no man's person; hath no regard to what a man hath been, but to what he is. For they who seemed to be somewhat in conference added nothing to me; when I came to confer and discourse with them, about the doctrine which I and they had taught, I learned no new doctrine from them, different from what I had before taught, neither did they reprove or correct me, for any thing which I had taught amiss; we were all of the same mind.

7 But contrariwise, <sup>l</sup> when they saw that the Gospel of the uncircumcision <sup>m</sup> was committed unto me, as the Gospel of the circumcision <sup>n</sup> was unto Peter ;

But contrariwise, when they saw; they were so far from contradicting any thing that I had preached, that when they understood from me, and Barnabas, (who, Acts xv. 12, declared in the council what miracles and wonders God had wrought among the Gentiles by them,) that the gospel of the uncircumcision, that the business of preaching the gospel to those who were no Jews, (for that is meant by uncircumcision; not simply those that were not circumcised, for some of the heathens were circumcised, yet all go in Scripture under the name of uncircumcised,) was committed unto me, as the gospel of the circumcision was unto Peter; as the preaching of the gospel to the Jews was committed to Peter, and not to him only, but to James and John. It must not be so understood, as if Paul might not preach to the Jews, or Peter might not preach to the Gentiles, (for the contrary is evident from Acts ix. 15, as to Paul, and from Peter's preaching to Cornelius, Acts x.) but because God designed the Gentiles to be more especially the province for Paul to exercise his ministry in, Acts xxvi. 17, (and accordingly he was specially sent out by the church, Acts xiii. 3,) as Peter's chief work was among the Jews.

<sup>n</sup> Acts 9. 15. <sup>8</sup> (For he that wrought effectually in Peter to the apostleship of the circumcision, "the same was mighty in me toward the Gentiles:)

As Paul's call was equal to that of Peter, both of them being Divine, so, saith the apostle, my ability and success was equal; as God wrought effectually in and by Peter in the discharge of his apostleship in the province intrusted to him, (which was preaching to the Jews,) so he wrought effectually and mightily in me, or by me, in the province wherein I was employed, viz. carrying the gospel to the Gentiles. This efficacious working of God, both by Paul and Peter, was seen in the conversion of multitudes by their ministry, as well as in their miraculous operations, by which they confirmed the doctrine of the gospel which they preached.

<sup>p</sup> Mat. 16. 19. <sup>9</sup> And when James, Cephas, and John, who seemed to be pillars, perceived the grace that was given unto me, they gave to me and Barnabas the right hands of fellowship; that we should go unto the heathen, and they unto the circumcision.

James, (called, the less,) the son of Alphaeus, before called the Lord's brother, as is thought, because he was the son of the virgin Mary's sister; whose naming here in the first place spoileth the papists' argument for Peter's primacy, because in some other places he is first named. Cephas; that is, Peter, called here Cephas in the Syriac, possibly because he is named with others who had Syriac names; in most places he is by this apostle called Peter. John, the apostle and evangelist, who is also known by the name of the beloved disciple. Who seemed to be pillars; Paul, in saying they seemed to be pillars, doth not deny them to be so; being such as God made use of in the first founding and building of the gospel church; as also to bear it up, (in the same sense that the church is called the pillar and ground of truth,) and as by them the gospel was carried out into the world; but he useth the word seemed, because the false teachers had magnified their ministry, but disparaged his. When these, he saith, perceived the grace that was given to me; by which, he either understands his office of apostleship, or the crown and seal of his office in the blessing which God had given to his labours amongst the Gentiles. They gave to me and Barnabas the right hands of fellowship; they looked upon him and Barnabas as much pillars as themselves; and in token of it gave them their right hands, (a token of admitting into fellowship, 2 Kings x. 15; Jer. l. 15.) and agreed that we should go unto the heathen, and they unto the circumcision; that it should be their special work to go and preach to the Gentiles, as they (viz. James, and John, and Peter) would make it their special work to preach the gospel to the Jews.

<sup>r</sup> Acts 11. 30. <sup>10</sup> Only they would that we should remember the poor; the same which I also was forward to do.

These pillars and apostles, which have among you the greatest reputation, added no new doctrine to us, gave us nothing new in charge; they only desired us that we would be careful, wheresoever we went, to make collection for the poor Christians in Judea, who either by selling all they had to maintain the gospel in its first plantation, or by the sharp persecution which had wasted them, or by reason of the famine, were very low; nor was this any new thing, I had before done it, and was very forward to do it again, had they said nothing to us about it.

Antioch, I withstood him to the face, because he was to be blamed.

Of this motion of Peter's to Antioch the Scripture saying nothing, hath left interpreters at liberty to guess variously as to the time; some judging it was before, some after, the council held at Jerusalem, of which we read, Acts xv. Those seem to judge best, who think it was after; for it was at Antioch, while Barnabas was with Paul; now Paul and Barnabas came from Jerusalem to Antioch, to bring thither the decrees of that council; and at Antioch Barnabas parted from Paul; after which we never read of them as being together. While Paul and Barnabas were together at Antioch, Peter came thither; where, Paul saith, he was so far from taking instructions from him, that he withstood him to the face. Not by any acts of violence, (though the word often expresseth such acts,) but by words reproving and blaming him; for, (saith he) he deserved it, he was to be blamed. Though the word signifies, he was condemned, which makes some to interpret it, as if Peter had met with some reprehension for his fact before Paul blamed him, yet there is no ground for it; for though the Greek participle be in the preterperfect tense, yet it is a Hebraism, and put for a noun verbal, which in Latin is sometimes expressed by the future, according to which we translate it; see 1 Cor. i. 18; 2 Cor. ii. 15; 2 Pet. ii. 4: so our interpreters have truly translated it according to the sense of the text.

<sup>t</sup> Acts 10. 28. <sup>12</sup> For before that certain came from James, he did eat with the Gentiles: but when they were come, he withdrew and separated himself, fearing them which were of the circumcision.

It should seem that Peter had been at Antioch some time; while he was there, there came down certain Jews from James, who was at Jerusalem: before they came Peter had communion with those Christians at Antioch, which were by birth Gentiles, and at meals eat as they eat, making no difference of meats, as the Jews did in obedience to the ceremonial law; but as soon as these zealots for the Jewish rites (though Christians) were come, Peter withdrew from the communion of the Gentile Christians, and was the head of a separate party; and all through fear of the Jews. lest they should, at their return to Jerusalem, make some report of him to his disadvantage, and expose him to the anger of the Jews.

<sup>u</sup> ver. 5. <sup>13</sup> And the other Jews dissembled likewise with him; insomuch that Barnabas also was carried away with their dissimulation.

The fact was the worse, because those Christians which were of the church of Antioch, having been native Jews, followed his example, and made a separate party with him. Nay, Barnabas, my fellow labourer, who was joined with me in bringing the decrees of the council in the case, was carried away with their dissimulation. So dangerous and exemplary are the warpings and miscarriages of those that are eminent teachers.

<sup>x</sup> 1 Tim. 5. <sup>14</sup> But when I saw that they walked not uprightly according to the truth of the Gospel, I said unto Peter before them all, If thou, being a Jew, livest after the manner of Gentiles, and not as do the Jews, why compellest thou the Gentiles to live as do the Jews?

Uprightly, here, is opposed to halting. Peter halted betwixt two opinions, (as Elijah sometime did the Israelites,) when he was with the Gentiles alone, he did as they did, using the liberty of the gospel; but when the Jews came from Jerusalem, he left the Gentile church, and joined with the Jews; this was not according to that plainness and sincerity which the gospel required; he did not (according to the precept he held, Heb. xii. 13) make straight paths to his feet, lest that which is lame be turned out of the way. Paul not hearing this from the report of others, but being an eye-witness to it, doth not defer the reproof, lest the scandal should grow: nor doth he reprove him privately, because the offence was public, and such a plaster would not have fitted the sore; but he speaketh unto Peter before them all, rebuking him openly, because he sinned openly; and by this action had not offended a private person, but the church in the place where he was, who were all eye-witnesses of his halting and prevarication, 1 Tim. v. 20. If thou, being a Jew, livest after the manner of Gentiles, and not as do the Jews; if thou, who art a Jew, not by religion only, but by birth and education, hast formerly lived, eat, and drank, and had communion with the Gentiles, in the omission of the observance of circumcision, and other Jewish rites, generally observed by those of their synagogues; (as Peter had done before the Jews came from Jerusalem to Antioch;) why compellest thou the Gentiles to live as do the Jews? why dost thou, by thy example, compel the members of a Gentile church to observe the Jewish rites? for compelling here doth not signify any act of violence, (Peter used none such,) but the example of leaders in the church, who are persons of reputation and authority, is a kind of compulsion to those that are inferiors, and who have a great veneration for such leaders. So the word here used, ἀναγκάζεις, is used in 2 Cor. xii. 11, as also to express the force of exhortations and arguments. Of such a compulsion the word is used, Luke xiv. 23. Peter, by his example, and possibly by some words and arguments he used, potentially moved those proselyted Jews, who were in communion with the churches of Galatia, to observe the Jewish rites: so that by this fact he did not only contradict himself, who by his former walking with the Gentile church had practically asserted the gospel liberty; but he also scandalized those Christians in these churches who stood fast in the liberty which Christ had purchased for them, and Paul had taught them; and also drew others away from the truth they had owned and practised. This was the cause of Paul's so open and public reproof of him.

15 <sup>a</sup> We who are Jews by nature, and not <sup>a</sup> sinners of the Gentiles,

Jews by nature; born Jews, not only proselyted to the Jewish religion, (and so under an obligation to the observance of the Jewish law,) but of the seed of Abraham, and so under the covenant made with him and his seed, as he was the father of the Jewish nation. Not sinners of the Gentiles: the Gentiles were ordinarily called by the Jews sinners; though it appeareth that there were divers of them worshippers of the true God, and came up to Jerusalem to worship; for whose sake there was a peculiar court allotted in the temple, called The court of the Gentiles. Yet not being under the obligation of the Jewish law, they went under the denomination of sinners by the Jews; and the most of the Gentiles were really sinners, and that eminently, (for such the word here used ordinarily signifieth,) as the apostle describeth their manners, Rom. i. 29—31.

16 <sup>b</sup> Knowing that a man is not justified by the works of the law, but <sup>c</sup> by the faith of Jesus Christ, even we have believed in Jesus Christ, that we might be justified by the faith of Christ, and not by the works of the law: for <sup>d</sup> by the works of the law shall no flesh be justified.

Knowing that a man is not justified; we knowing that a man is not absolved from the guilt of sin, and declared righteous in the sight of God; by the works of the law; by any kind of works done in obedience to the law of Moses, whether ceremonial or moral. For it is manifest, that although this question about justification by works began about circumcision and works done in obedience to the ceremonial law, yet the determination of it extended further. For the apostle, by the law, understands that law by which is the knowledge of sin, Rom. iii. 20. Now the knowledge of sin, is neither only nor chiefly by the ceremonial law; nor did ever any of those, against whom the apostle argueth, think, that men could be justified by obedience only to the law contained in ordinances; nor could boasting be excluded, (which the apostle showeth, Rom. iii. 27, was God's design in fixing the way of a sinner's justification,) if men might be justified by works done in obedience to the moral law; nor was it the ceremonial law only, the violation of which worketh wrath, Rom. iv. 15, or disobedience to which brought men under the curse, chap. iii. 10. But by the faith of Jesus Christ; but we are justified by believing in Christ: not by faith as it is a work of ours, for that was denied before; nor by faith as a principal efficient cause, for in that sense it is God that justifieth; nor as a meritorious cause, for so we are justified by the blood of Christ; but by faith as an instrument apprehending and applying Christ and his righteousness. Even we have believed in Jesus Christ, that we might be justified by the faith of Christ, and not by the works of the law; we (saith the apostle) that are Jews, knowing this, have not only assented to the truth of the gospel proposition, but accepted of this way of salvation, and received the Lord Jesus; that we so doing, not trusting to the law, or any obedience of ours to it, might be absolved from the guilt of sin, and declared righteous before God. For by the works of the law shall no flesh be justified; for no mortal man shall ever be absolved or declared righteous upon his own personal obedience to the law of God; being in the best imperfect, and much short of what the law requireth.

17 But if, while we seek to be justified by Christ, we ourselves also are found <sup>e</sup> sinners, <sup>f</sup> is therefore Christ the minister of sin? God forbid.

Some interpreters think, that the apostle here begins his discourse to the Galatians upon the main argument of his Epistle, viz. justification by faith in Christ; though others think it began, ver. 15. If, while we seek to be justified by Christ, we ourselves also are found sinners; if (saith the apostle) you make us grievous offenders in our expectation of being justified by Christ, and not by the works of the law, you make Christ the minister of sin, who hath taught us this. But others think that the apostle here obviateth a common objection which was then made, (as it is also in our age,) against the doctrine of justification by faith in Christ; viz. That it opens a door of liberty to the flesh, and so makes Christ a minister of sin, as if he relaxed men's obligation to the law of God; which is the same objection which the apostle answered in his Epistle to the Romans, chap. vi. If, while we plead for justification by Christ, we live in a course of notorious disobedience to the law of God, then Christ must be to us a minister of sin, and come into the world to purchase for us a possibility of salvation, though we live in never so much notorious disobedience to the law of God. As if there were no obligation upon men to keep the law, unless by their obedience to it they might obtain pardon of sin and justification. This calumny the apostle disavows, first, by a general aversion, God forbid!

18 For if I build again the things which I destroyed, I make myself a transgressor.

By the things which he destroyed; some understand the state of sin; and from hence conclude the mutability of a state of justification: but there is no need of that, it may as well be understood of a constant course and voluntary acts of sin. If I teach a doctrine that shall encourage a sinful life, or if I should live in a course of sin, these are the things which I, as a minister of Christ, have in my preaching and doctrine destroyed, teaching you, that not only the guilt of your sins was removed upon your justification by Christ, but the dominion of sin also destroyed; and they are things which justification destroyeth; God never saying to any soul, Thy sins are forgiven thee, without adding, sin no more. So as, if a justified state would admit of a going on in a settled course of sin, it would build what it destroyed. I make myself a transgressor; now should I, or any one, do any such thing, we should thereby make ourselves great transgressors. So as the apostle's argument here seemeth to be the same with that, Rom. vi. 2, How shall we, that are dead to sin, live any longer therein? He strives at the same thing here, viz. to prove that the doctrine of justification by faith in Christ, could not give a liberty to any to sin, because it shows persons made partakers of that grace, that they are freed, not only from the guilt, but also from the power and dominion of sin, so as that none can from it receive any comfort as to the former, nor find the latter wrought in them.

19 For I <sup>g</sup>through the law <sup>h</sup>am dead to the law, that I might <sup>i</sup>live unto God.

Through the law of Christ, as some say; or rather, through the law of Moses, of which he had been before

This Epistle is much of the same nature with that to the Romans, and the substance of what the apostle saith in the latter part of this chapter, agreeth much with the 6th chapter of that Epistle; where we find an expression much like to this, ver. 6, Our old man is crucified with him, that the body of sin might be destroyed, that henceforth we should not serve sin. I am (saith the apostle) crucified with Christ; not only by justification made partaker of the benefits coming by a Christ crucified, but also as having communion with the death of Christ, in the mortification of my lusts. A figure of which (as he informeth us, Rom. vi. 4) we have in baptism, buried with him by baptism into death. Nevertheless I live; yet (saith he) I live a holy, spiritual life; though dead to the law, and though crucified with Christ. Yet not I, but Christ liveth in me; but I cannot say so properly that it is I, for my motions are not according to my natural propensions and inclinations; but Christ, by his Spirit, liveth in me, having renewed and changed me, made me a new creature, and begot new motions and inclinations in me. And though I live in the flesh, yet I live by the faith of the Son of God; all my natural, moral, and civil actions, being principled in faith, and done according to the guidance of the rule of faith in Jesus Christ. Who loved me, and gave himself for me; of whom I am persuaded that he loved me, and from that love gave himself to die upon the cross for me.

21 I do not frustrate the grace of God: for if righteousness come by the law, then Christ is dead in vain.

I do not frustrate the grace of God; I do not despise, reject, make void, (for by all these words the word here used is translated, Mark vii. 9; John xii. 48; chap. iii. 15; Heb. x. 28.) the free love of God, in giving his Son to die for our sins: from whence is easily gathered, that those who live a loose life, and take a liberty to sin, from their justification, or from the free grace of God in Christ, they do contemn and despise the grace of God: or rather, (if we refer it to the following words,) those who assert justification by the works of the law, they do reject and despise the free grace of God in the gospel, and (as much as in them lies) make it vain and frustrate. For if righteousness come by the law; for if it be possible, that a man by works done in obedience to the law should arrive at a righteousness, in which he may stand before God, then is Christ dead in vain; then Christ died to no purpose, or without any just cause: the reason of this must be, because it was the main and principal end of Christ's death, to procure or purchase a righteousness wherein sinners might stand before God, to bring in an everlasting righteousness, Dan. ix. 24. If the most proper effect of the death of Christ be taken away, then his death is made causeless, and to no purpose. Thus the apostle concludeth his thesis, laid down ver. 16, That none shall be justified by the works of the law, from two absurdities that would follow upon the contrary, viz. justification by the works of the law, the rejecting of the grace of God, and the frustration, or making void, of the death of Christ.

CHAP. III

Paul asketh what had moved the Galatians to depend on the law, having already received the Spirit through faith, 1—5. As Abraham was justified by faith, so they who are of faith inherit his blessing, 6—9. The law brought men under a curse, and could not justify, 10—12. Christ hath freed us from the curse, and laid open the blessing to all believers, 13, 14. Supposing that the law justified, God's covenant with Abraham would be void, 15—18. But the law was only a temporary provision against sin till Christ's coming, and in no wise contrary to God's promises, 19—22; serving as a schoolmaster to prepare men for Christ, 23, 24. But faith being come, the law is at an end, and all believers are, without distinction, become children of God, and heirs of the promise, 25—29.

O FOOLISH Galatians, who hath bewitched you, that ye should not obey the truth, before whose eyes Jesus Christ hath been evidently set forth, crucified among you?

O foolish Galatians, who hath bewitched you? the apostle beginneth the further pursuit of the argument he was upon, with a smart reprehension of them, as men of no understanding, and bewitched. The word translated bewitched, signifies vitiating the eyes, or spoiling the sight, so as that men cannot discern an obvious object in a due position. The meaning is, Who hath seduced you, who hath so corrupted your understanding that your actions are as unaccountable as the effects of witchcraft? That ye should not obey the truth: the word translated obey, signifies also to believe: in general it signifies to be persuaded; which may refer either to an assent to the truth, or obedience to the precepts of the gospel. Before whose eyes Jesus Christ hath been evidently set forth, crucified among you; whereas Christ hath been plainly preached before you, and his death, with the blessed end and effects of it, hath been so made known amongst you, as if you had seen him crucified. Or else Christ may be said to be crucified amongst them, because it was in their time, so as they could not but hear of it, and there was no more reason for them to doubt of the truth of the thing, than if he had been crucified in their country.

2 This only would I learn of you, Received ye the Spirit by the works of the law, or by the hearing of faith?

By the Spirit here is understood the gifts of the Spirit, which were either such as were common to all believers, (such as faith, love, &c.) or else such as were peculiar to some, and those not all believers; such were those abilities for miraculous operations given to some. Some understand this text of the former, some of the latter: it is best to take in both; all the manifestations of the Spirit then given out, either for the sanctification and eternal salvation of those to whom they were given, or for the confirmation of the truth of the gospel. Did you receive the Spirit by the works of the law? that he knew they could not say they did; for they were heathens, strangers to the commonwealth of Israel, so as they could pretend to no works of the law. Did you receive this Holy Spirit upon hearing the gospel (which is the doctrine of faith) preached to you? Men should take heed of vilifying that ministry, or that doctrine, which God hath blessed to the change of their own hearts, or the hearts of others. We also may observe from hence, that the hearing the gospel faithfully preached is a blessed means by which men's hearts are changed, and they receive the Holy Spirit; not enabling them (as it did some, and but some, in the beginning of the gospel) to work signs and wonders, but enabling them to the operations of a spiritual life. The strength of the apostle's argument is this, You have the greatest reason to own that doctrine as the truth, which God hath blessed to own that doctrine as the truth, which God hath blessed to your souls to produce spiritual effects there.

3 Are ye so foolish? having begun in the Spirit, are ye now made perfect by the flesh?

The doctrine of their false teachers was, that to faith in Christ, an obedience also to the law of Moses was necessary to justification; they did not deny Christ, or the doctrine of the gospel, only they pleaded for the works of the law as necessary to be superadded. The apostle calls this first owning of Christ, and embracing the doctrine of faith, a beginning in the Spirit; their adding the necessity of obedience to the law of Moses, a being made perfect in the flesh; and argueth the unreasonableness of it, that their justification should be begun by a more noble, and made perfect by a more ignoble cause. He calls the doctrine of the gospel, Spirit, because (as he said in the former verse) they had received the Holy Spirit by the hearing of faith; that is, by hearing and receiving the gospel. The works of the law he calls flesh, because the ordinances of the law were (as the apostle calls them, Heb. ix. 10) carnal ordinances, imposed on the Jews till the time of reformation. He elsewhere calls them the rudiments of the world, Col. ii. 8, 20; and in this Epistle, chap. iv. 9, he calls them beggarly elements. For though the ordinances of the law were in their season spiritual, they being commanded by God; yet they being but temporary constitutions, never intended by God to continue longer than the coming of Christ, and the law being but a schoolmaster to lead to Christ; Christ being now come, and having died, and rose again from the dead, they became useless. Besides that God never intended them as other than rudiments and first elements, the end of which was Christ; and the observance of which, without faith in Christ, was weak and impotent, as to the noble end of justification. It spake great weakness, therefore, in the Galatians, to begin with what was more perfect, (the embracing of the gospel, and Christ there exhibited for the justification of sinners,) and to end in what was more imperfect, thinking by that to be made perfect; or else the apostle here chargeth them with a defection from Christ, as chap. iv. 9—11, and v. 4; and so calleth them foolish, for beginning in the Spirit, (the Holy Spirit inwardly working in them the change of their hearts, and regenerating them,) and then apostatizing from their profession to a carnal life. But I had rather interpret Spirit in this text, of the doctrine of the gospel, dictated by the Spirit; and with the receiving of which the Holy Spirit was given. And so their folly is argued from their thinking to be made perfect by the beggarly elements and worldly rudiments of the law, whereas they had first begun their profession of Christianity with embracing the more perfect doctrine of the gospel.

4 * Have ye suffered || so many things in vain? if it be yet in vain.

There is no doubt but these churches in the regions of Galatia had their share in the sufferings of Christians by the Jews, for their adherence to and profession of the doctrine of the gospel, which they might either wholly, or in a great measure, have avoided, would they have complied with the Jews in the observance of those legal rites. Therefore, (saith the apostle,) to what purpose have you suffered so much for the owning of the Christian religion, if you now bring yourselves under the bondage of circumcision, and other legal observances? If it be yet in vain; by which words he either correcteth himself, as if he had said, But I hope better things of you, that I shall find that you did not suffer them in vain; or else he hinteth that their suffering so much would not be in vain, because, by their apostasy from the true faith for which they suffered, they would in effect deny it, as if it had been false, and their former suffering would rise up in judgment against them.

h 2 Cor. 3. 5. 5 He therefore <sup>h</sup> that ministereth to you the Spirit, and worketh miracles among you, doeth he it by the works of the law, or by the hearing of faith?

He had asked them, ver. 2, whether they had received the Spirit by the works of the law, or by hearing the gospel? Some think what he saith here to be a continuation of the same argument, but it rather seems a new one: there he spake of their receiving the Spirit, here he speaks of the ministration of the Spirit. Some understand it of God, who gives his Holy Spirit to them that ask him, and who was the Author of those miraculous operations wrought by the Spirit. I should rather understand it of the ministers of the gospel, to whom God hath committed the ministration of the Spirit; and to some of whom God, in the primitive times, gave a power to work miracles. Doeth he it by the works of the law, or by the hearing of faith? doth God concur with our ministry upon our preaching the law, or upon our preaching the gospel? So that though there be a great cognation betwixt the apostle's arguing, ver. 2, and his arguing in this verse, yet there is some difference; the apostle there arguing from the success of preaching the gospel, here from the ministration itself.

6 Even as <sup>i</sup> Abraham believed God, and it was || accounted to him for righteousness.

As Abraham was justified, so must all the children of Abraham; but Abraham believed God, (that is, agreed to the truth of all those promises which God gave him, and trusted in God for the fulfilling of them; for both those acts of the mind are included in believing God,) and so was justified alone. And it was accounted to him for righteousness: his faith itself was not imputed to him; those that put this sense upon the words, either forget that faith itself is a work, or that the apostle here is arguing for justification by faith in opposition to justification by works, and cannot be imagined to have gone about to prove that justification is not by works, by proving that it is by a work. The meaning is no more than that he was upon it accounted righteous; not that God so honoured the work of faith, but that he so rewarded it, as being the condition annexed to the promise of justification. His faith was not his righteousness, but God so rewarded his exercise of faith, as that upon it he reckoned (or imputed) that to him which was his righteousness, viz. the righteousness of him in whom he believed as revealed unto him in the promise.

7 Know ye therefore that <sup>k</sup> they which are of faith, the same are the children of Abraham.

They which are of faith; those who are believers, and receive Jesus Christ, as exhibited and tendered to them in the gospel, trusting not to any righteousness of their own, arising from their obedience to the works of the law; they are the children of Abraham, considered as the father of the faithful, that is, they are justified as Abraham was justified; who was justified, not by his circumcision, but upon his believing in Christ exhibited to him in the promise; not by working, but by imputation. This argument came very close to the Jews, whose great glorying was in having Abraham to their father; for it is in effect a saying, that they were no true children of Abraham, none of that seed to whom the promise was made, if they expected justification from the works of the law, which Abraham never had nor expected.

8 And <sup>l</sup> the Scripture, foreseeing that God would justify the heathen through faith, preached before the Gospel unto Abraham, saying, <sup>m</sup> In thee shall all nations be blessed.

The Holy Ghost in Scripture (by whose inspiration the Scripture was written) foreseeing, or knowing, the counsels and designs of God, that the heathen (when the fulness of times as to them should come) should be justified through faith in Christ, preached the same doctrine before unto Abraham; so as it is no new doctrine; the gospel which we now preach unto you, was long since revealed unto Abraham, who saw Christ's day, and rejoiced, John viii. 56. To prove which, he quoteth the promise, Gen. xii. 3, where God tells Abraham, that in him all the nations of the earth should be blessed; which quotation of it by the apostle in this place informeth us, that it is to be understood of those spiritual blessings which are in Christ Jesus. For all the nations of the earth were no otherwise blessed in Abraham, than as Christ (who is called the desire of all nations, and he in whom the Gentiles should trust, and a light to enlighten the Gentiles) descended from Abraham.

9 So then they which be of faith are blessed with faithful Abraham.

Those that believe in Jesus Christ with such a faith as the gospel doth require, they, and they alone, are blessed with spiritual blessings, justified from the guilt of sin, with Abraham; that is, in the same manner that Abraham, the father of the faithful, and who himself was a believer, was justified; which was not (as was before said) by his circumcision, or by any works that he did, but by imputation upon his believing in the Lord Jesus Christ. exhibited and held forth in the promise made to him.

10 For as many as are of the works of the law are under the curse: for it is written, <sup>u</sup> Cursed is every one that continueth not in all things which are written in the book of the law to do them.

The argument is this: Those that are under a curse cannot be under the blessing of justification: but those that are under the law are under the curse. This he proves out of the law, Deut. xxvii. 26, where those are pronounced cursed, who continue not in all things written in the book of the law to do them. To be under the law, is, under the covenant of works, or under the expectation of life and salvation only from obedience to the works of the law. These (he saith) are under the curse: the reason of which the apostle gives us, Rom. viii. 3, because it is made weak through the flesh. Could man perfectly fulfil the law, he might expect life from it, and salvation from his obedience to it; but the law curseth him that continueth not in all that is written in it: If a man keep the whole law, and yet offend in one point, he is guilty of all, James ii. 10, and as liable to the wrath of God as if he had broken it in many things. Hence it necessarily followeth, if no man can keep the law of God perfectly, that all under the law must be under the curse, and consequently cannot be blessed in faithful Abraham.

11 But <sup>o</sup> that no man is justified by the law in the sight of God, it is evident: for, <sup>p</sup> The just shall live by faith.

The apostle, by another argument, proveth that sinners are not justified by works. He grants, they may be justified by their good and blameless living before men, so as that they may have nothing to say against them, but he says they cannot, by such works, be justified in the sight of God. His argument is from the opposition that is between faith and works. He proveth, from Hab. ii. 4, that we are justified by faith; where the prophet saith, that the just (or righteous man) shall live by faith; fetch his life from faith, live his spiritual life by faith, and obtain eternal life by faith, the life of his righteousness shall be by faith.

12 And <sup>q</sup> the law is not of faith: but, <sup>r</sup> The man that doeth them shall live in them.

The law saith nothing of faith in the Mediator; though faith in God be commanded in the first precept, yet faith in Christ is not commanded by the law as that by which the soul shall live. For that which the law saith is, Do this and live: The man that doeth the things contained in the law, shall live in them; life, in the law, is promised to those who do the things which it requireth; not to them who, have failed in their performances, yet accept of the Lord Jesus Christ as the Redeemer which God hath sent, and believe in him who justifieth the ungodly. For that by the life promised to the observation of the law, not a temporal life only is to be understood, but eternal life also, is plain from our Saviour's application of it to the young man, inquiring about the way to eternal life, Matt. xix. 16, 17; Luke x. 28.

13 <sup>s</sup> Christ hath redeemed us from the curse of the law, being made a curse for us: for it is written, <sup>t</sup> Cursed is every one that hangeth on a tree:

If the law curseth all those who continue not in all things contained in the law, (as the apostle had said, ver. 10, and proved from Deut. xxvii. 26,) it might be objected, How will believers then escape more than others; for none of them continue in all that is written in the law? The apostle here obviateth this objection, by telling the Galatians that, as to believers, Christ had redeemed them from this curse. The word generally signifies delivering; here it signifies a deliverance by a price paid. This was by being himself made a curse for us, not only execrable to men, but bearing the wrath and indignation of God due for sin: for so it was written, Deut. xxi. 23, He that is hanged is accursed of God; that is, hath borne the wrath or curse of God due to him for his sin. The apostle applying this to Christ, teacheth us, that Christ also, hanging upon the cross, bare the curse of God due to the sins of believers; in whose stead, as well as for whose good and benefit, he died. And indeed he could no other way redeem believers from the curse of the law, but by being made himself a curse for them. Some think, that under the law he who was hanged was made a curse, not only politically, but typically, as signifying that curse which Christ should be made on the behalf of the elect.

14 <sup>u</sup> That the blessing of Abraham might come on the Gentiles through Jesus Christ; that we might receive <sup>v</sup> the promise of the Spirit through faith.

The apostle, by the blessing of Abraham, here, understands those spiritual blessings of justification, reconciliation, and adoption, which came to Abraham upon his believing, and the imputation of righteousness thereupon unto him. Christ (he saith) was made a curse for us, that all those blessings through him might come on the Gentiles; and so all the nations of the earth might be blessed in him. Particularly, that the Gentiles might receive the promise of the Spirit; which promise is not to be interpreted so narrowly, as only to signify its miraculous gifts, but to be extended to all those gifts and habits of grace which are the effects of the Holy Spirit in the hearts of believers, whether sanctifying or sealing them; which Holy Spirit is received upon persons' believing; see chap. iv. 6; Rom. viii. 13.

15 Brethren, I speak after the manner of men; <sup>y</sup> Though it be but a man's covenant, yet if it be confirmed, no man <sup>z</sup> disannulleth, or addeth thereto.

Though it be but a man's covenant: the word here translated covenant, διαθήκη, is ordinarily translated testament; see Matt. xxvi. 28. It signifies in the general, an ordering or disposing of things; more specially, a testament; which is the disposition of the testator's goods after his death. Now, (saith the apostle,) I here argue according to the ordinary methods and doings of men, who have such a respect for a man's testament, as that, if it be once confirmed, according to the methods of law and civil sanctions of men, or rather by the death of the testator (for a testament is of no force while the testator liveth, Heb. ix. 17); nor will men alter the will or last testament of a deceased person, though it be not as yet confirmed according to the methods of human laws. No man disannulleth, or addeth thereto; no man, that is, no just man, will go about to disannul it, or add to it, nor will any just government endure any such violation of it. Hence the apostle argueth both the certainty and unalterableness of the covenant of grace with Abraham, and until the death of Christ it was but a covenant, or a testament not fully confirmed, but yet unalterable, because the covenant of that God who cannot lie, nor repent; but by the death of Christ it became a testament, and a testament ratified and confirmed by the death of the person that was the testator; therefore never to be disannulled, never capable of any additions. Those words, or addeth thereto, are fitly added, because these false teachers, though they might pretend not to disannul God's covenant, holding still justification by Christ; yet they added thereto, making circumcision, and other legal observances, necessary to justification; whereas by God's covenant, or testament, confirmed now by the death of Christ, faith in Christ only was necessary.

16 Now <sup>a</sup> to Abraham and his seed were the promises made. He saith not, And to seeds, as of many; but as of one, And to thy seed, which is <sup>b</sup> Christ.

Now to Abraham and his seed were the promises made; the promises, Gen. xii. 3; xxii. 18; in the one of which places it is said, In thee; in the other, In thy seed shall all the nations of the earth be blessed. He saith, promises, either because of the repetition of the same promises, or taking in also other promises. He saith not, And to seeds, as of many; but as of one, And to thy seed, which is Christ: some may object against the apostle's conclusion, that the promise respected only one, and that was Christ; because God said not seeds, as of many, but seed; whereas the term seed is a noun of multitude, and signifieth more than one; besides that the Hebrew word, which is used Gen. xxii. 18, admitteth not the plural number. But it is answered, that though the word translated seed admitteth not the plural number, yet had God intended more than one, he could have expressed it by words signifying children, or generations, &c. 2. That the term seed, though a noun of multitude, yet is often applied to a single person; as Gen. iii. 15, where it also signifieth Christ; Seth is called another seed, Gen. iv. 25; and so in many other places. Some think that by seed he meaneth believers, and so interpret it of Christ mystical; and that the scope of the apostle in this place is to prove, that both the Jews and Gentiles were to be justified the same way; because they were justified in force and by virtue of the promise, which was not made to many, but to one church, which was to consist both of Jews and Gentiles, for (according to the prophecy of Caiaphas, John xi. 52) Christ died, that he might gather together in one the children of God that were scattered abroad. The promises made to Abraham, were but the exhibition of the eternal covenant of grace, made between the Father and his Son Christ Jesus (who was in it both the Mediator and Surety); which covenant was promulgated, as to Adam and Noah, so to Abraham, in these words, In thy seed shall all the nations of the earth be called, that is, in Christ. From whence the apostle proveth, that there is no justification by the works of the law, but in and by Christ, and the exercise of faith in him.

17 And this I say, that the covenant, that was confirmed before of God in Christ, the law, <sup>b</sup> which was four hundred and thirty years after, cannot disannul, <sup>c</sup> that it should make the promise of none effect.

The covenant, that was before confirmed of God in Christ: the word translated covenant, is the same as before; ordinarily signifying one's disposal of things in his last will and testament. Which name is given to the covenant of grace, with respect to the death of Christ; for though Christ as yet had not died, yet he was, by virtue of the covenant of redemption, and in God's counsels, The Lamb slain from the foundation of the world, Rev. xiii. 8. This (he saith) was in Christ, (as Abraham's promised seed,) confirmed of God to Abraham, by God's oath, Heb. vi. 17, 18; by frequent repetitions of it; by such solemn rites as covenants use to be confirmed by, Gen. xv. 17, 18; by the seals of circumcision, Gen. xvii. 11; Rom. iv. 11; by a long prescription, &c.; though it received indeed its final and ultimate consummation by the death of Christ, yet it was before many ways confirmed. The law, which was four hundred and thirty years after, cannot disannul: the law was given four hundred and thirty years after the giving this promise to Abraham: though, Gen. xv. 13, the round number of four hundred years only be mentioned, which are to be counted from the birth of Isaac; yet, Exod. xii. 40, they are reckoned (as here) four hundred and thirty years, from Abraham's going out of Canaan, Gen. xii. 4; from whence to the birth of Isaac were twenty-five years, Gen. xxi. 5, compared with chap. xii. 4; from the birth of Isaac till Jacob was born, sixty years, Gen. xxv. 26; from thence till Jacob went down into Egypt, one hundred and thirty years, Gen. xlvii. 9, where they abode two hundred and fifteen years. Hence the apostle concludes, that it was impossible that the law, which was not given till four hundred and thirty years after the confirmation of the promise, should make the promise confirmed of no effect.

18 For if <sup>d</sup> the inheritance be of the law, <sup>e</sup> it is no more of promise: but God gave it to Abraham by promise.

earthly Canaan, the promise of which was made to Abraham, be to be obtained by the fulfilling of the law, and yielding obedience to it, then it is no more of the promise. It is much the same with what the apostle said before, Rom. iv. 14; and with what he had said, Rom. xi. 6, If by grace, then it is no more of works, otherwise grace is no more grace. But if it be of works, then it is no more grace; otherwise work is no more work. He shows, that there is an opposition betwixt grace and work, the law and the promise; that which is of grace, and of the promise, is of free love; that which is of works, and the law, is wages, and a reward of debt. But (saith the apostle) God gave the inheritance to Abraham by promise; he of his free love engaging himself thereunto.

19 Wherefore then serveth the law? <sup>f</sup> It was added because of transgressions, till <sup>g</sup> the seed should come to whom the promise was made; and it was <sup>h</sup> ordained by angels in the hand <sup>i</sup> of a mediator.

Wherefore then serveth the law? some might say, To what purpose was the law given? as if there could be no use of it unless it were available to justification. It was added because of transgressions; it was (saith the apostle) given after the promise, not to supply something wanting as to justification, to prescribe some works that must be added; but either to restrain sin, 1 Tim. i. 9, or to show and discover sin, to make men see that they stood in need of Christ: see Rom. vii. 13. Till the seed should come to whom the promise was made: till Christ the promised Seed should come, who is the end of the law for righteousness to every one that believeth, Rom. x. 4; upon whose coming the law contained in ordinances ceased. That Christ is here to be understood by the seed, is plain by the addition, to whom the promise was made. Some here understand by the seed, Christ and the church, (which both make up Christ mystical,) and interpret this text by Eph. ii. 14, till the Jews and Gentiles should be both made one. This law (he saith) was ordained by angels. Luke, Acts vii. 38, speaks of the law as published by one angel: the apostle, Heb. ii. 2, calls it, the word spoken by angels. We read of no angels, Exod. xix. xx., nor of any of the saints; yet, Deut. xxxiii. 2, Moses saith God came from Sinai, with ten thousand saints. The law was given either by the ministry of an angel, or by God attended with angels. In the hand of a mediator; that is, (say some,) under the power of Christ the Mediator; but by the mediator is rather to be understood Moses, which agreeth with Deut. v. 5, where Moses telleth the Jews, that he stood between the Lord and them at that time, to show them the word of the Lord; nor is Christ any where called the Mediator of the old, but of the new testament, Heb. viii. 6; xii. 24.

20 Now a mediator is not a mediator of one, <sup>k</sup> but God is one.

This is a text acknowledged by all interpreters to be very obscure; not so much as considered in itself, (for all know, that a mediator speaks one that goes in the middle betwixt two persons that are at odds, so cannot be of one,) as in regard of the connexion of it with what went before; where he had told us, that the law was given in the hand of a mediator. There are various senses given of this verse, and the variety much ariseth from men's different understanding of the mediator in whose hand the law was given. To me the apostle seems to magnify the promise above the law, in that the promise was given to Abraham immediately by God, (who is one in essence,) but the law was given not immediately by God, but by Moses as mediator, who in that action was a type of Christ. And God thereby showed, that the law would bring no man to life and salvation without the one and only Mediator Christ Jesus. Christ, indeed, is the Mediator of the new testament, he mediated for it, he mediates in it; but it was men's transgression of the law that brought them in need of a Mediator, sin being the only thing that separateth between God and man. God is one; and there had been no need of mediating between him and man, but for the law which man had transgressed. Those that by the mediator, ver. 19, understand Christ, make this the sense: That as a mediator supposeth two parties at odds, so Christ's being Mediator speaks him to have respect to Jews and Gentiles. But this interpretation seems to make Christ the Mediator between Jews and Gentiles, whom (the apostle saith) he made both one, breaking down the partition-wall, Eph. ii. 14; but we do not find the name of Mediator upon this account any where given unto Christ. Many other senses are given, but the first mentioned seemeth the most probable, viz. that God made use of no mediator in giving the promise, but only in giving the law, which evidenced that justification was not to be by it; nor had there been need of a true Mediator under the gospel, but for the law, men's transgression of which brought in a need of a Mediator; which proved that justification could not be by the law.

21 Is the law then against the promises of God? God forbid: 'for if there had been a law given which could have given life, verily righteousness should have been by the law.

Is the law then against the promises of God? God forbid: though it be thus, yet there is no such opposition betwixt the law and the promises, as that either of them make the other useless. Far be it from me (saith the apostle) to assert any such thing! they are not contrary to one another, but subservient to one another. For if there had been a law given which could have given life; for if there had been a law which could, by our perfect performance of it, have given us a righteousness, wherein we might have stood righteous before God, then righteousness should have been by the law; then men might have hoped to have been justified and accepted of God by me for such obedience; then indeed the law had been against the promises, they holding forth another righteousness, viz. the righteousness of God from faith to faith.

22 But the Scripture hath concluded all under sin, that the promise by faith of Jesus Christ might be given to them that believe.

But the Scripture hath concluded all under sin: it pleased God to give a law, which, if Adam had continued in his estate of innocence, might have given life; but considering man in his lapsed state, that now is not possible: Rom. iii. 10, There is none righteous, no not one: and Eph. ii. 3, We are all children of wrath. That the promise by faith of Jesus Christ might be given to them that believe; that the promises of life and salvation might be given to those who, according to the new covenant of the gospel, should receive and accept of the Mediator, and the terms of salvation which God offers to us in the gospel; where these promises are exhibited upon condition of believing. Though, upon our first reflection upon it, it may seem strange to us, that God, having in his eternal counsels fixed the salvation of man upon a covenant of grace, and his believing in Jesus Christ, should in time first propound a covenant of works, Do this, and live; yet, upon second thoughts, this will appear necessary; for till man was a transgressor by breaking the law, and violating the first covenant, there was no room for a Mediator, no cause for men's applying themselves to a Mediator. God therefore first gave out the covenant of works, and suffered man to break it; and then he revealed the Mediator to lapsed man; that so they who should believe in him might obtain the promise of life, to which by the fall they had forfeited their right.

23 But before faith came, we were kept under the law, shut up unto the faith which should afterwards be revealed.

Before faith came; before the covenant of grace, or the doctrine of the gospel, or Christ himself, was revealed. We were kept under the law; the apostle either speaks of all mankind, of whom it is true, that until God's revelation of the covenant of grace, they had no other way of salvation made known to them than by the law of works; or else of the Jews, to whom, though before Christ there was a revelation of the gospel, yet it was more dark and imperfect, so as they were kept under the law, but few apprehending any other way of justification than by the works of the law. Shut up unto the faith which should afterwards be revealed; but the apostle saith they were but shut up under it; God never intended it as that by the observance of which they should be saved; but as even then, to those whom he intended to save, he made a more secret revelation of his gospel, so he had now more fully and plainly revealed the way of salvation which he had from eternity established.

24 Wherefore the law was our schoolmaster to bring us unto Christ, that we might be justified by faith.

The law, both the law contained in ordinances and the moral law, was our schoolmaster; serving us in the same stead that a schoolmaster in a school doth, who only fitteth children for higher degrees of learning at universities. To bring us unto Christ: the ceremonial law showed us Christ in all his types and sacrifices; the moral law showed us the absolute need of a Mediator, as it showed us sin, accused and condemned us for it; and it showed us no help either for the guilt of sin contracted, or against the power of it. That we might be justified by faith; so that God's end in giving us the law was, that we might be fitted for Christ, and obtain justification by believing in him.

25 But after that faith is come, we are no longer under a schoolmaster.

After that Christ, the object of saving faith, was in the fulness of time revealed, and the gospel, which is the doctrine of faith, was fully revealed and published, the time of our nonage was over.

26 For ye are all the children of God by faith in Christ Jesus.

All you that believe, whether native Jews or Gentiles, are the children of God by adoption, through faith in Jesus Christ, John i. 12: so that you need not run back to the law to look for help and salvation from that; but only look unto Christ, to whom the law was but a schoolmaster to lead you; who being fully and clearly revealed, you may have immediate recourse to, by faith; and need not to make use of the Jewish schoolmaster, as hoping for justification from the observances of the law.

27 For as many of you as have been baptized into Christ have put on Christ.

Baptized into Christ, may either be understood of receiving the sacrament of baptism; which who receiveth, is not only baptized in the name of Christ, and into the profession of Christ; but is sacramentally, or in a sign, baptized into Christ; or else (which, considering what followeth, seemeth much more probably the sense) it may signify a being not only baptized with water, but with the Holy Ghost and fire. Of those thus baptized, he saith, that they had put on Christ; they had accepted of and received Christ for their justification, and for their sanctification. We have the like phrase, Rom. xiii. 14.

28 There is neither Jew nor Greek, there is neither bond nor free, there is neither male nor female: for ye are all one in Christ Jesus.

There is neither Jew nor Greek; in the business of justification, the case of Jews and Greeks is the same. This he saith, that the Galatians might not think themselves disadvantaged from their not being under the law, as the schoolmaster that should lead them unto Christ. There is neither bond nor free; neither doth Christ consider the qualities and circumstances of persons, whether they be servants or free-men; for though they be servants, Christ hath made them free, 1 Cor. vi. 22; Eph. vi. 8; Col. iii. 11. There is neither male nor female: for ye are all one in Christ Jesus: neither hath Christ any respect to sexes: the male children under the law had many privileges; but it is all a case under the gospel, whether persons be males or females, Jews or Gentiles, rich or poor, servants or masters, bond-men or free-men.

29 And if ye be Christ's, then are ye Abraham's seed, and heirs according to the promise.

Lest these Galatians should be discouraged, because the promise was made to Abraham and his seed, and they were not the seed of Abraham; he tells them, if they were Christ's, that is, if they truly believed in him, and were implanted into him, that then they were the seed of Abraham, that

CHAP. IV

The Jews were for a while held under the law, as an heir under his guardian till he be of age, 1—3. But Christ came to redeem those that were under the law, and to give both to Jew and Gentile the adoption, and consequently the freedom, of sons, 4—7. Paul therefore reproveth the Galatians, who from serving idols had been received of God, for falling back to the bondage of legal observances, 8—10. He expresseth his fears and tender regard for them, and calleth to mind their former respect and good will to him, from which he admonisheth them not to be seduced in his absence, 11—20. He allegorically describeth the Jewish and Christian churches under the types of Agar and Sara, and inferreth that we, being children of the free-woman, are free, 21—31.

NOW I say, That the heir, as long as he is a child, differeth nothing from a servant, though he be lord of all;

The apostle had before determined, that the whole body of such as believed in Jesus Christ; were that seed of Abraham to which the promise was made, and so heirs of the promises made to him; yet so, that, as it is among men, though a child be a great heir; and lord of a great estate, yet while he is under age he is used like a servant; so the time of the law being as it were the time of believers' nonage, those who lived in that time were used like servants.

2 But is under tutors and governors until the time appointed of the father.

The heir, (mentioned in the former verse,) though he be an heir of a great estate, yet is not presently possessed of it; but he is by his father kept under tutors and governors, until the time which he hath appointed when he will be pleased to release him from his pupillage, and settle some part of his inheritance upon him.

3 Even so we, when we were children, <sup>a</sup>were in bondage under the || elements of the world:

Such children were all believers, the seed of Abraham; from the first designed to a gospel liberty, but that was not to be fully enjoyed, until the fulness of time should come when God intended to send his Son into the world; and during the time of their nonage they were kept under the law, as a tutor and governor, leading them unto Christ. He chiefly intendeth the ceremonial law, which, Acts xv. 10, Peter calleth a yoke, which neither they nor their fathers were able to bear. He calls these ordinances the elements of the world; so also Col. ii. 20: he means that discipline by which God instructed, and under which God by Moses at first tutored, the world, that is, the Jews, who were that part of the world to whom God pleased to make his oracles known. He calls those ritual observances, elements, or rudiments, because they were the first instructions God gave believers, leading them to Christ; like the first elements or rudiments in grammar learning.

4 But <sup>b</sup>when the fulness of the time was come, God sent forth his Son, <sup>c</sup>made of a woman, <sup>d</sup>made under the law,

But when the fulness of the time was come; the time, which answered the time appointed of the earthly father, mentioned ver. 2; when that time came in which God had designed to bring his people into the most perfect state of liberty, which in this life they are capable of. God sent forth his Son, who was existent before, (being brought forth before the mountains or hills were settled, Prov. viii. 25,) but not sent forth until this fulness of time came. And then made of a woman, conceived in the womb of the virgin, by the power of the Holy Ghost overshadowing her. Made under the law; to which, as God, he was not subject, (being himself the lawmaker,) but he subjected himself. He was born in a nation, and of a parent, under the law; he was circumcised, and submitted to the ceremonial law;

he in all things conformed his life to the rule of the law, and subjected himself to the curse of the law, being made a curse for us. Nothing of this is questioned, except the last; which yet appears also to have been necessary by what followeth in the next verse, for how else could he have redeemed those who were under the law; and this agreeth with what we had, chap. iii. 13.

5 'To redeem them that were under the law, <sup>f</sup>that we might receive the adoption of sons.

This makes it appear, that Christ's being under the law must be understood as well of the moral as of the ceremonial law, that is, subject to the precepts of it, as well as to the curse of it; for if the end of this being born under the law, was to redeem those that were under it, that he had not reached by being merely under the ceremonial law; for the Gentiles were not under that law, but only under the moral law; and they also were to be redeemed, and to receive the great privilege of adoption, or rather, the rights of adopted children; which (some think) is to be understood here, rather than what is strictly to be understood by the term of adoption, viz. a right to be called and to be the sons of God. Others, by adoption, understand that full state of liberty of which the apostle had been before speaking, in opposition to that state of childhood and nonage in which believers were until the times of the gospel; for, chap. v. 1, we shall find that that was a liberty wherewith Christ made us free: and indeed this last sense seemeth best to agree with what the apostle had before said, ver. 1—3, though the other senses are not to be excluded.

6 And because ye are sons, God hath sent forth <sup>h</sup>the Spirit of his Son into your hearts, crying, Abba, Father.

Let the Jews should claim the adoption as peculiar to them, the apostle tells them that these Gentiles were also sons; and in confirmation of that, he saith, that God had sent the Spirit of his Son into their hearts: not that the Holy Spirit is not the Spirit of the Father, as well as of Christ; but he calleth him the Spirit of Christ, because he had made adoption the end and fruit of redemption; and redemption is every where made the work of the Son. The apostle saith, Rom. ix. 4, that the adoption belongeth to the Israelites: the Jews were the first people whom God dignified with the name of his sons, his first-born, Exod. iv. 22; and so many of them as believed also received the Spirit, Ezek. xxxvi. 27; but the full effusion of the Spirit was reserved to gospel times, and until the time that Christ ascended, John vii. 39; xvi. 7. After which the Spirit was poured out in the days of Pentecost, Acts ii, whose effects were evident, not only in power to work miracles, and speak with divers tongues, (which were not common to all believers,) but also in a variety of spiritual gifts and habits, amongst which this was one, teaching them to cry, Abba, Father. Crying, (it is expounded, Rom. viii. 15, wheremy we cry, that is, through whose influence and working in us we cry,) Abba, Father, that is, Father, Father: which not only signifieth the Spirit's influence upon believers' words in prayer, first conceived in the heart, then uttered by the lips; but chiefly those habits of grace, by which we pray acceptably; faith and holy boldness, by which we call God Father; zeal and fervency, by which we are importunate with God, and say, Father, Father. Which were now not the privileges of Jews only, but of these Galatians also, who were by nature Gentiles, and strangers to God; and a certain evidence of their concern in the redemption of Christ, and that they also might expect salvation from him.

7 Wherefore thou art no more a servant, but a son; <sup>i</sup>and if a son, then an heir of God through Christ.

Thou that art a believing Gentile, as well as the believing Israelites, art no more a servant, not in that state of servile subjection to the law; but a son; but in a more excellent state of liberty, like unto that of sons that have attained to a full and ripe age. Christ told his disciples, John xv. 15, that he did not call them servants, for servants knew not what their lord did; but he had freely communicated to them what he had received from the Father. The apostle here saith, they were sons, sons by adoption; which is the highest notion of freedom and liberty. And this entitled them to an inheritance: if a son, then an heir of God through Christ: which agreeth with Rom. viii. 17. And as it is with sons and heirs, though the inheritance cometh not fully to them till the death of the parent, yet while they live they are in a far better condition than servants; so the believing Gentiles, being made sons and heirs of God through Christ, though they were to stay a while for the inheritance reserved for the sons of God in the heavens, yet their state was much better than that of servants; for though they were obliged to serve the Lord, yet they served him without servile fear, and were no otherwise servants than sons are also servants to their father.

8 Howbeit then, <sup>k</sup> when ye knew not God, <sup>l</sup> ye did service unto them which by nature are no gods.

When ye knew not God, as he is, or as ye ought to have known him, or as, since, you have known him; for even the heathen have some knowledge of God, Rom. i. 21. Ye did service unto them which by nature are no gods; you paid religious homages unto idols; which are gods, not by nature and essence, but only in the opinion of idolaters. Which was a more miserable bondage and servitude than the Jews were under, who knew the true God; though in the time when the church was like the heir under age, it was subject to the law contained in ordinances, and under the yoke of the law.

9 But now, <sup>m</sup> after that ye have known God, or rather are known of God, <sup>n</sup> how turn ye <sup>o</sup> again to <sup>p</sup> the weak and beggarly <sup>q</sup> elements, whereunto ye desire again to be in bondage?

After that ye have known God; after that you are come to a true and saving knowledge of God in Christ, and know God as he is. Or rather are known of God; or rather after you are received of God, approved of him, made through Christ acceptable to him, which is much more than a true comprehension of God in your notion and understanding. How turn ye again to the weak and beggarly elements, whereunto ye desire again to be in bondage? how turn you back again to the legal services of the ceremonial law? which he calleth elements, or rudiments, because they were God's first instructions given to his church for his worship, to which he intended afterward a more perfect way of worship. He calls them weak, because they brought nothing to perfection; and the observance of them was impotent as to the justification of a soul, as all the law is. He calls them beggarly, in comparison of the more rational, spiritual way of worship under the gospel. He saith that they desired to be in bondage unto these, because they would not see and make use of the liberty from them which Christ had purchased. Object. It may be objected, that the Galatians were not educated in Judaism; how then doth the apostle charge them with turning back to them? Answ. This hath made some think, that, by the weak and beggarly elements, mentioned in this verse, the apostle meaneth their Gentile superstitions and idolatries; but this is not probable, the apostle, all along the Epistle, charging them with no such apostacy. Others think, that he in this verse chiefly reflecteth on the believing Jews, who afterwards returned again to the use of the law. But why may not we rather say, that he calleth their fact a turning back, not so much with reference to their personal practice, as to the state of the church; which was once under those elements, but by the coming of Christ was brought into a more perfect state. So that for them who were called into the church in the time of this its more perfect state, for them to return to the bondage of the law, that was truly to turn back; if not to any practice of their own, which they had cast off, yet to a state of the church which the church of God had now outgrown.

10 Ye observe days, and months, and times, and years.

If we had any evidence that these Galatians were re-lapsed to their Gentile superstitions, these terms might be understood of such days, &c. as they kept in honour to their idols. But the apostle, throughout the whole Epistle, not reflecting upon them for any such gross apostacy (as returning to the vanities of the heathen in which they formerly lived); but only for Judaizing, and using the ceremonies of the Jewish law, as necessary to be observed, besides their believing in Christ, for their justification; it is much more probable that he meaneth by days the Jewish festivals, such as their new moons, &c.; by months, the first and the seventh month, when they religiously fasted; by times, their more solemn times, such as were their feasts of first-fruits, tabernacles, &c.; and by years, their years of jubilee, the seventh and the fiftieth year. His meaning is, that they took themselves to be under a religious obligation to observe these times as still commanded by God.

11 I am afraid of you, <sup>r</sup> lest I have bestowed upon you labour in vain.

*Paul knew that, with reference to himself, he had not laboured in vain; he might say with Isaiah, chap. xlix. 5, Though Israel be not gathered, yet shall I be glorified. He had told the Corinthians, that he knew he should be a sweet savour to God, as well in them that perished as in them that should be saved, 2 Cor. ii. 15. But he speaks with reference to them. A faithful minister accounteth his labour lost when he seeth no fruits of it upon the souls of his people. Nor was Paul afraid of this as to the sincerer part of this church, who truly believed, and were justified, but he speaketh this with reference to the whole body of this church. That which he feared, was their falling back from their profession of Christianity to Judaism; as judging the observation of the Jewish days necessary by Divine precept to Christians. Nor doth he speak of the observation of such days, as it was their duty in obedience to the moral law to observe, which commandeth the observation of a seventh day for the weekly sabbath, and gives a liberty for setting apart other days, and the commanding the observation of them, to take notice of and acknowledge God in emergent providences. But he only speaks of days imposed by the ceremonial law, and men's religious observation of them, as being tied to it by a Divine precept, by which they made them a part of worship. We have a liberty to set apart any day for God's worship, and magistrates have a liberty to set apart particular days for the acknowledgment of God in emergent providences, whether of mercy or judgment; but none hath a power to make a day holy, so as that it shall be a sin against God for all to labour therein, much less hath any a liberty to keep Jewish holy-days.*

12 Brethren, I beseech you, be as I am; for I am as ye are: <sup>s</sup> ye have not injured me at all.

Be as I am; for I am as ye are; be as friendly to me as I am to you: see the like phrase, 1 Kings xxii. 4. But how doth the apostle say they had not injured him at all, when it is manifest they had defamed him? Answ. He had forgiven, or was ready to forgive, this to them; he had no desire or design to be revenged on them. Or in this particular thing of Judaizing, for which he had been reflecting upon them, they had done him no personal injury; it was only his care for and love to their souls, which had drawn out this discourse from him; not any particular prejudice to them, or any desire he had to take any revenge upon them, for any personal injury done to himself.

13 Ye know <sup>t</sup> through infirmity of the flesh I preached the Gospel unto you <sup>u</sup> at the first.

*The Scripture having not given us a particular account of Paul's circumstances when he first preached the gospel to the Galatians, we are at a loss to determine what those infirmities were which Paul here speaketh of, more than that he calls them infirmities of the flesh: by which may be understood, either the baseness and contemptibleness of his presence, (which the false teachers at Corinth objected to him, 2 Cor. x. 10,) or some bodily sickness which Paul had at that time, (as some of the ancients guess,) or his sufferings for the gospel, which were those infirmities wherein he chose to glory, 2 Cor. xi. 30.*

And my temptation which was in my flesh ye despised not, nor rejected; the apostle saith they were so far from injuring him, (as he had said, ver. 12.) that they had expressed great kindness to him: for though, when he first came amongst them to preach the gospel, he was a man of no great presence; but, in the judgment of some, vile and base; or was full of bodily weakness and disease, was persecuted by men; yet they did not reject nor despise him, for those temptations he had in the flesh: by which he means, the same things he before meant by infirmities, for both bodily weaknesses, and sufferings for the gospel, are temptations, or, as the word signifieth, trials. But received me as an angel of God, even as Christ Jesus; nay, (saith he,) you were so far from rejecting or despising me upon that account, that (on the contrary) you received me as if I had been an angel; yea, if Jesus Christ himself had come amongst you, you could not have been more kind to him than you were to me. This he tells them, partly, to let them know, that what he had spoken was not out of any ill will or prejudice to them; partly, to retain their good will, that they might not show themselves uncertain and inconstant in their judgments and affections; and partly, (as the following verse testifieth,) to show the levity of some of them, who had too much forgotten their first judgment of him, and value for him.

1 Or, I was was then?

15 || Where is then the blessedness ye spake of? for I bear you record, that, if it had been possible, ye would have plucked out your own eyes, and have given them to me.

Some understand the blessedness here spoken of in a passive sense; you were then a blessed and happy people, receiving the doctrine of the gospel in the truth and purity of it; what is now become of that blessedness? But both the preceding and the following words seem to rule the sense otherwise, viz. Where is that blessedness which you predicted of me? you called me then blessed, and showed me such a dear affection that you would, if it would have done me good, have parted with what was dearest to you.

16 Am I therefore become your enemy, y<sup>ch</sup> 2. 5, 14. because I tell you the truth?

What hath now altered your mind, or made you have a worse opinion of me? wherein have I offended you or done you any harm? I have done nothing but revealed to you the truth of God; am I therefore become your enemy? or do you account me your enemy on that account?

17 They <sup>a</sup>zealously affect you, but not well; yea, they would exclude || you, that ye might affect them.

They; the false teachers, that have perverted you as to the faith of the gospel. Zealously affect you; pretend a great warmth of affection for you. But not well; but in this they do not well, nor for a good end. They would exclude you from our good opinion and affection. That ye might affect them; that they might have all your love and respect; and so, by the ruin of our reputation with you, they might build up their own reputation.

18 But it is good to be zealously affected always in a good thing, and not only when I am present with you.

It is good to be zealously affected always in a good thing: the apostle, in the former verses, had been speaking of a great zeal, or warmth of affection, (for that zeal signifieth,) which these Galatians had for and declared towards him, when he first preached the gospel amongst them; and also of a great warmth and degree of affection which these false teachers had pretended to this church. These words are so delivered that they are applicable to either of these; but the latter words seem to make them most properly applicable to the former; so the term always is emphatical: There was a time, when you were very warm in your love to me; the cause being good, your warmth of affection ought not to have abated, but continued always, and not only while you saw me, and I was present with you.

19 <sup>a</sup>My little children, of whom I travail in birth again until Christ be formed in you,

a 1 Cor. 4. 13.
Philim. 10.
Jam. 1. 18.

By calling them little children, he both hints to them that he was their spiritual father, and had begotten them to Christ; and that they were as yet weak in the faith, not grown men, but as yet little children: and also hints to them, the tender affection he had towards them, which was the same as of a mother to her little children: though they did not own and honour him as their spiritual father, yet he loved them as his little children. Of whom I travail in birth again; for whom I am in as great pain, through my earnest desire for the good of your souls, as the woman is that is in travail for the bringing forth of a child. Until Christ be fully and perfectly formed in you; that is, till you be brought off from your Judaism, and opinion of the necessity of superadding the works of the law to the faith of Christ in order to your justification, and be rooted in the truth and established in the liberty of the gospel, with which Christ hath made you free.

20 I desire to be present with you now, and to change my voice; for || I stand in doubt of you.

1 Or, I am
for you.

I desire to be present with you now; I wish circumstances so concurring that I could be present with you. And to change my voice; that I might use my tongue towards you as I saw occasion; either commending, or reproving, or exhorting, as I saw cause. For I stand in doubt of you; for I do not know what to think of you; I am afraid of your falling away from the profession of the gospel to Judaism.

21 Tell me, ye that desire to be under the law, do ye not hear the law?

Tell me, ye that desire to be under the law; you that cannot be content to receive Jesus Christ alone, for justification; but have a mind to maintain a necessity of obedience to the law of circumcision, and other Judaical rites; do ye not hear the law, that law which curseth every one who continueth not in all that is therein written to do it? or rather, the story which follows; which is taken out of one of the books of the law, which the apostle makes a mystical revelation of the Divine will, that there should come a time when circumcision should be cast out.

22 For it is written, that Abraham had two sons, <sup>b</sup>the one by a bondmaid, <sup>c</sup>the other by a freewoman.

b Gen. 16. 15.
c Gen. 21. 2.

The substance of this is written, Gen. xvi., where we read of Abraham's having Ishmael by Hagar his bondwoman; and Gen. xxi. 2, where we read of the birth of Isaac, whom he had by Sarah, who was his wife.

23 But he who was of the bondmaid <sup>d</sup>was born after the flesh; <sup>e</sup>but he of the freewoman was by promise.

e Gen. 18.
10, 14. & 21.
11. 11.

They were both (in a sense) born after the flesh, viz. in a natural way and course of generation: but after the flesh is plainly, in this verse, opposed to by promise; and the meaning is, that Ishmael, the son of Hagar, was not that son of Abraham to whom the promise was made, that in him all the nations of the earth should be blessed: see Gen. xv. 4; xvii. 19. Isaac is said to have been born after the promise, either because God gave Isaac to Abraham, in completion or fulfilling of the promise made to him, that he should have an heir out of his own loins; or because the mighty and miraculous power of God was seen in his production, enabling Abraham at those years to beget, and Sarah to bear, a child, when both their bodies were as dead.

24 Which things are an allegory: for these are the two || covenants; the one from the mount <sup>f</sup>Sinai, which gendereth to bondage, which is Agar.

1 Or,
testaments.
f Gr. Sinai.
f Deut. 33. 2.

Which things are an allegory: that is called an allegory, when one thing is learned out of another, or something is mystically signified and to be understood further than is expressed. The Scripture hath a peculiar kind of allegories, wherein one thing is signified by and under another thing. The thing here signifying, was Abraham's wife and concubine, Sarah and Hagar. For these are the two covenants; the apostle saith, these signified the two covenants, for that is the meaning of are: so as here we have one text more where the verb substantive is put for signifieth; and it will be hard to assign a reason why it should not be so interpreted in the institution of the Lord's supper, notwithstanding the papists' and Lutherans' so earnest contending to the contrary. The very word is here used, διαθήκαι, that is used in the institution of the Lord's supper. Here it is, these are the two covenants or testaments; there, this is the new covenant. The apostle calls them two covenants, (whereas they were but one,) with reference to the time of their exhibition, and manner of their administration, in which they much differed. Nor must we understand the apostle as signifying to us by these words, that Moses wrote the history of Sarah and Hagar with such a design and intention; but only that that history is very applicable to the two covenants, and we shall find, ver. 27, the apostle justifying this application from the authority of the prophet Isaiah. And herein he complied with the general sense of the Jews, who judged that there was not only a literal, but a mystical sense also, of those histories of the patriarchs. The one from the mount Sinai, which gendereth to bondage, which is Agar: the one covenant was that of the law delivered from mount Sinai, this was like Hagar; for as Hagar was herself a bondwoman, and so her child did partake of the condition of the mother, and Hagar bare a bondman or servant; so the law (which he calls a covenant, because of the stipulation of obedience from the people to the will of God revealed and declared) left those that were under it in a state of bondage or servitude.

25 For this Agar is mount Sinai in Arabia, and answereth to Jerusalem which now is, and is in bondage, with her children.

Agar, the bondwoman, fitly represented Mount Sinai, the mountain in Arabia, from which the law was given: and Jerusalem which now is answereth to Mount Sinai; for as in Mount Sinai the law was given in a terrible manner, so now Jerusalem is the seat of the scribes and Pharisees, who are the doctors of that law, and rigidly press the observation of it, by which the Jews are kept in bondage. The apostle speaketh not here of the civil servitude that the Jews were in under the Romans, to whom they were now tributaries, but of that religious servitude in which the scribes and Pharisees kept them to their legal services.

26 But Jerusalem which is above is free, which is the mother of us all.

The new covenant, or the dispensation of the gospel, or the Christian church, which is above, or from above, which answereth to Sarah, and is said to be above, because revealed from heaven by Christ, sent out of the bosom of the Father, not as the law was revealed upon earth, upon Mount Sinai. Hence apostates from the doctrine of the gospel, are said to turn from him who speaketh from heaven, Heb. xii. 25. Or else it is said to be above, because it is the assembly of the firstborn written in heaven, ver. 23: hence the gospel church is called the heavenly Jerusalem, ver. 22. Of this gospel church the apostle saith, that it is free; i. e. free from the yoke and bondage of the ceremonial law, or from the covenant and curse of the law. Which church, he saith, is the mother of all believers, they embracing the same faith, and walking in the same steps; from whence it was easy for the Galatians to conclude their freedom and liberty also from the law.

27 For it is written, Rejoice, thou barren that bearest not; break forth and cry, thou that travailest not: for the desolate hath many more children than she which hath an husband.

It is written, Isa. liv. 1. Some think that the apostle doth but allude to that of the prophet; and that the sense of the prophet was only to comfort the Jews, whose city, though it should be for a present time barren, thin of inhabitants, during the time of the Babylonish captivity; yet it should be again replenished with people, and be more populous than other cities. But the apostle seemeth rather to interpret that prophecy, than merely to allude to it; so that verse is one of those prophetic passages about the calling of the Gentiles, of which are many in that prophet. In this sense, the Gentiles are to be understood under the notion of the woman that was barren and desolate. The church of the Jews is represented under the notion of a woman that had a husband and children. The prophet, by the Spirit of prophecy, calleth upon the Gentiles, that brought forth no children to God, and to whom God was not a husband, to rejoice, and to cry out for joy, for there should be more believers, more children brought forth to God, amongst them, than were amongst the Jews: so as the church of the Gentiles are compared to Sarah, who was a long time barren, but then brought forth the child of the promise, the seed in which all the nations of the earth were to be blessed.

28 Now we, brethren, as Isaac was, are the children of promise.

Isaac was the promised seed, Gen. xxi. 12; Rom. ix. 7: the apostle tells the Galatians that the believing Gentiles were (as Isaac) the children of the promise. Isaac being born, not by virtue of any procreative virtue in his parents, which was now dead in them, Rom. iv. 19, but by virtue of the promise, and by a power above nature, was a type of the believing Gentiles, who are a spiritual seed, and that seed to whom the promise was made, being the members of Christ by faith: so as the Jews had no reason so much to glory as they did, that Abraham was their father, for those amongst them that believed not were but his carnal seed, believers only were the spiritual seed, the children of the promise; to which the believing Gentiles had the same claim with the believing Jews, and a much better than those of them that believed not in Christ.

29 But as then he that was born after the flesh persecuted him that was born after the Spirit, even so it is now.

As it was in Abraham's time, Ishmael, who was born in a mere carnal and ordinary way of generation, persecuted Isaac, by mocking at him, Gen. xxi. 9, who was born by virtue of the promise, and the mighty power of God, enabling Sarah at those years to conceive, and Abraham to beget a child; even so it is now, the carnal seed of Abraham, the Jews, persecute the Christians, which are his spiritual seed. From whence we may observe, that the Holy Ghost accounteth mockings of good people for religion, persecution. So Heb. xi. 36, Others had trial of cruel mockings; and we know these were one kind of the sufferings of Christ. By this also the apostle doth both confirm what he had before said, in making Hagar a type of the Jews, and Sarah a type of the Gentiles, the Jews persecuting the seed of Christ, as Hagar's seed persecuted Isaac.

30 Nevertheless what saith the Scripture? Cast out the bondwoman and her son: for the son of the bondwoman shall not be heir with the son of the free-woman.

We read, Gen. xxi. 10, that when Sarah saw Ishmael mocking at her son Isaac, she was not able to bear it, but speaketh to her husband Abraham, saying, Cast out this bondwoman and her son; for the son of this bondwoman shall not be heir with my son, even Isaac. The principal design of the apostle seems to be, by that type of the ejection of Ishmael out of Abraham's family, to let them know the mind and will of God, 1. Concerning the exclusion of the law from a partnership with Christ and the gospel, in the justification of sinners before God. 2. Concerning the rejection of the Jews, upon the calling of the Gentiles. 3. Concerning the total destruction of the Jewish church and nation, for their persecution of Christ and the Christian church.

31 So then, brethren, we are not children of the bondwoman, but of the free.

The church of the Gentiles was not typified in Hagar, but in Sarah; from whence the scope of the apostle is to conclude, that we are not under the law, obliged to Judaical observances, but are freed from them, and are justified by faith in Christ alone, not by the works of the law.

By this conclusion the apostle maketh way for the exhortation in the following chapter, pressing them to stand fast in their liberty.

CHAP. V

Paul exhorteth the Galatians to maintain their Christian liberty, 1, and sheweth that by being circumcised they would forfeit their hopes in Christ, 2—6. He disclaimeth the preaching of circumcision himself, and condemneth it in others, 7—12. He adviseth them not to abuse their liberty, but to serve one another in love, which comprehendeth the whole law, 13—15. The opposition between the flesh and the Spirit, 16—18: the works of the flesh, 19—21; the fruits of the Spirit, 22—24. Advice to walk in the Spirit, and not in vain-glorious emulation, 25, 26.

STAND fast therefore in <sup>a</sup>the liberty wherewith Christ hath made us free, and be not entangled again <sup>b</sup>with the yoke of bondage.

The liberty here spoken of, is a right which a person hath to action, that he may do or forbear the doing of things at his pleasure, as he apprehends them suitable or not, without the let or hinderance of another. This is either in things of a civil nature, or of a spiritual nature. The former is not understood here, for it is none of the liberty wherewith Christ hath made us free, for subjects to be free from the lawful commands of princes, or children to be free from the laws of their parents, or servants to be free from the commands of masters. There is hardly any book in the New Testament wherein obedience of this nature, in things that are lawful, is not either exemplified as our duty in Christ and the apostles, or urged by very strong arguments. The liberty here, is that freedom from the law, of which the apostle hath been speaking all along this Epistle: from the curse of the moral law, and from the coaction of it; and principally from the ceremonial law contained in ordinances. This is the liberty which Christ hath purchased for us, and in which the apostle willeth all believers to stand fast; not being again entangled with a yoke, which God had taken off from their necks. The apostles, in their synod, Acts xv. 10, had called it a yoke, which neither they nor their fathers were able to bear.

2 Behold, I Paul say unto you, that <sup>c</sup>if ye be circumcised, Christ shall profit you nothing.

It is manifest that the apostle is speaking here concerning circumcision, looked upon as necessary to justification, now under the gospel state. For under the Old Testament undoubtedly Christ profited the fathers, though circumcised; yea, Christ undoubtedly profited Timothy, even under the gospel, though he was circumcised, Acts xvi. 3, that being done to prevent a scandal, and during a time whilst, for the gaining of the Jews to the Christian faith, the Jewish ceremonies, though dead, were (as it were) kept above ground, unburied for a time. But for men, after a sufficient time indulged them for their satisfaction concerning the abolition of the ceremonial law, still to adhere to it, and religiously to observe the rites of it, as in obedience to a Divine precept, and as necessary, over and above faith in Christ for justification, was indeed to deny Christ, and disclaim his sufficiency to save, who is able to save to the utmost them that come to God by him, Heb. vii. 25; and besides whom there is no name given under heaven, by which men can be saved, neither is there salvation in any other, Acts iv. 10, 12; and who is the end of the law for righteousness to every one that believeth, Rom. x. 4. So that to join any thing with Christ, and faith in him, for the justification of the soul before God, is plainly to deny and disclaim him, and to make him insignificant to us. This Paul affirms with an apostolical authority and gravity, I Paul say unto you.

3 For I testify again to every man that <sup>d</sup>is circumcised, that he is a debtor to do the whole law.

This must be understood either of the Gentiles only, who were never under any obligation to circumcision, or of such as were circumcised, with an opinion that it was necessary at this time to justification and salvation. Of these the apostle saith, that by this they made themselves debtors to do the whole law; they were obliged to one part of the law, they must also be obliged to all the other parts of it. Besides that circumcision was an owning and professing subjection to the whole law; as the receiving the sacrament of baptism is a professed subjecting ourselves to the whole gospel. Object. But (may some say) ought not then all Christians to observe the law? Answer. 1. Not the ceremonial and political law, which were peculiar to the Jewish church and state. 2. It is one thing to be under an obligation to our utmost to fulfil the law, another thing to acknowledge ourselves debtors to the law. Object. But did not the fathers, then, by being circumcised, acknowledge themselves debtors to the law? Answer. Yes, they did acknowledge themselves bound to the observation of the law, and to endure (upon the breaking it) the curse of it: but they were discharged from this obligation by believing in the Lord Jesus Christ, who was made a curse for them, that he might redeem them from the curse of the law. But if any disclaimed Christ, (which, whosoever added any thing to his righteousness and to faith in him, as to the justification of the soul, did, as the apostle had said in the former verse,) they laid themselves under an obligation to fulfil the whole law of God, if they would be saved.

4 Christ is become of no effect unto <sup>e</sup>you, whosoever of you are justified by the law; <sup>f</sup>ye are fallen from grace.

The word here translated become of no effect, is used Rom. iii. 3. By those who are justified by the law, are to be understood such as seek or desire to be justified by the law, for actually none is so justified. The sense is, Whosoever seeketh to be justified by the works of the law, he disclaimeth the righteousness of Christ; to him Christ's death signifieth nothing, nor is of any virtue at all. For he had told us before, chap. ii. 21, If righteousness come by the law, then Christ is dead in vain: and Rom. viii. 3, 4, What the law could not do, in that it was weak through the flesh, God sending his own Son in the likeness of sinful flesh, and for sin, condemned sin in the flesh; that the righteousness of the law might be fulfilled in us, &c. The very end of Christ's coming and dying was to supply us with a righteousness, which (apprehended by faith) should be reckoned to us as ours, wherein we might stand before God. Which end of Christ's death had been frustrated, if, through our flesh, there had not been such a weakness or impotency in the law as to justification. So as if any still looked for justification by performance of the law, as such made the death of Christ in vain, because if such a thing could have been done that way there had been no need of Christ's dying; so they also made it, which was not in vain in itself, yet in vain and of no effect to their souls, because Christ would not be a partial cause in the justification of a soul. Ye are fallen from grace; and they, by this, renounced the grace of God exhibited in the gospel, and fell from the grace of it. For by grace here is not to be understood a state of grace, (from which none can fall totally and finally,) but the grace of the gospel; by which is signified the free love of God in it exhibited, offering Christ to sinners for righteousness.

5 For we through the Spirit <sup>g</sup>wait for the hope of righteousness by faith.

For we; we Christians, who have truly embraced Christ; or, (as others think,) we that are turned from Judaism to Christianity, and so are more concerned in the law, which was not given to the Gentiles, but to us Jews: yet, through the Spirit, by the guidance and direction of the Spirit, or through the operation of the Spirit in us, we wait for the hope of righteousness; that is, we hope for righteousness; that righteousness whereby we shall be made righteous before God; or, (as some will have it,) the crown of righteousness: I had rather understand it of righteousness itself, that having been all along the argument of the apostle's discourse here. By faith; not by our observance of the law, but by faith in Jesus Christ.

6 For <sup>h</sup>in Jesus Christ neither circumcision availeth any thing, nor uncircumcision; but <sup>i</sup>faith which worketh by love.

Under the new testament established in Christ, and confirmed by the death of Christ, there is no difference betwixt

Jew and Gentile; there is but one way of justification, one of salvation, for them both; and that is, by believing in Christ Jesus; which faith is not an idle, inactive, inoperative faith, but such a faith as worketh by love, both towards God and towards men, in an obedience to all the commandments of God: yet is not the soul justified, nor shall it stand righteous before God, in and for this obedience, which neither is faith, nor goeth before it, but followeth it, as the true, proper, and necessary effect of it.

7 Ye <sup>1</sup>did run well; <sup>1</sup>|| who did hinder you that ye should not obey the truth?

This was once your faith, your profession, and according to this you directed the course of your life and actions; who hath hindered you in your course, or turned you out of your way, or given you a check in your race; and hath made you disobedient to, or to swerve from, the truth which you formerly owned and professed.

8 This persuasion cometh not of him <sup>m</sup> that calleth you.

This persuasion; this new opinion into which seducers have misled you, which, by embracing it, you have made yours. Cometh not of him that calleth you; is not from God, who hath called you out of darkness into marvellous light, unto fellowship with himself, into a state of grace and favour with him, and to the hopes of eternal life; and who yet calleth you by his gospel: it must therefore be from the devil and his instruments, who go about to seduce and pervert you.

9 <sup>a</sup> A little leaven leaveneth the whole lump.

This is a proverbial expression, which (as others of that nature) is applicable in more cases than one. The apostle made use of it, 1 Cor. v. 6, to persuade that church to purge their communion, by casting out the incestuous person: he maketh use of it here to persuade them to take heed of admitting any principles of false doctrine, which he compareth to leaven, (as our Saviour does, Matt. xvi. 6, 12,) and that very fitly, both in regard of the sour and of the diffusive nature of it; the latter of which is here chiefly intended; the truths of God having such dependence one upon another, that he who erreth in any one doctrine of faith, seldom continueth long sound as to other points.

10 <sup>o</sup> I have confidence in you through the Lord, that ye will be none otherwise minded: but <sup>p</sup> he that troubleth you <sup>q</sup> shall bear his judgment, whosoever he be.

I have confidence in you through the Lord, that ye will be none otherwise minded: the apostle (according to his usual method) sweeteneth his sharp reproof of this church for their deviations from the faith of the gospel, with a declaration of his good opinion of them; declaring that he had a confidence in them, that through the grace of God they would be reduced to the truth, or kept from wandering from it, and that in matters of faith they would be all of the same mind. But he that troubleth you shall bear his judgment, whosoever he be; and for those who endeavoured to seduce and pervert them, God should reward them according to their works. He seems to aim at some particular false teacher, (whose name he concealeth,) who gave this church this trouble.

11 <sup>r</sup> And I, brethren, if I yet preach circumcision, <sup>s</sup> why do I yet suffer persecution? then is <sup>t</sup> the offence of the cross ceased.

It should seem by what the apostle saith in this verse, that some of these false teachers had quoted the apostle for them, as if he himself had preached circumcision; possibly taking advantage from his circumcising Timothy, not distinguishing betwixt what was done by Paul as of liberty, and to avoid the offence of the Jews, and what they pressed as necessary to be done (besides believing in Christ) for justification. Now, (saith the apostle,) if I yet preach up circumcision as necessary to be observed, why do I yet suffer persecution? why am I then persecuted by the Jews, as one apostatized from their religion? Then is the offence of the cross ceased: by the cross, he either means the cross of Christ; then the sense is, It is my opposing the observance of their law, that more offendeth them than my preaching of Christ crucified. Or else he meaneth the afflictions which he suffered for the sake of Christ and the gospel; (in which sense the term is used, Matt. xvi. 24; Luke ix. 23; xiv. 27;) then the sense is, that all sufferings for the owning and preaching of Christ are at an end; let us but yield the Jews that point, (that Christians are obliged to the observance of the law of Moses,) the great quarrel between them and us is at an end; but their daily persecuting of me is a sufficient demonstration that I do not preach up circumcision.

12 <sup>u</sup> I would they were even cut off <sup>v</sup> which trouble you.

I wish that God would some way or other put an end to these that trouble you. This Paul speaketh not out of hatred to their persons, but out of a zeal to the glory of God, and a just indignation against these men, who had so much hindered the salvation of the members of this church. And it is not improbable that the apostle here spake by the Spirit of prophecy, as knowing God would cut them off; so that his and the like imprecations of holy men in Scripture are not to be drawn into precedents, or made matters for our imitation, unless we had the same discerning of spirits which they had, or the same Spirit of prophecy and revelations from God as to future things. But how far it is lawful or unlawful for ordinary persons, whether ministers or private Christians, to pray against God's or his church's enemies, is a question for the arguing which this place is too narrow.

13 For, brethren, ye have been called unto liberty; only <sup>w</sup> use not liberty for an occasion to the flesh, but <sup>x</sup> by love serve one another.

Ye have been called unto liberty; a liberty from the covenant of the law, and the curse of the law, as chap. iii. 13; from servile fear, as Luke i. 74; and from sin, Rom. vi. 7. Only use not liberty for an occasion to the flesh; but you must take heed that you do not abuse this liberty by making it an occasion for sin, so as from thence to conclude, that you may give your flesh more liberty in obeying the lusts of it: you must not think, that the gospel hath set you at liberty from the obedience of the law; the gospel liberty to which you are called, doth not set you free from the duty of love, either to God or men. Therefore by love serve one another. Our Christian liberty neither freeth us from the serving of God, nor from our mutual serving each other by love, according to Rom. xiii. 8, Owe no man any thing, but to love one another.

14 For <sup>y</sup> all the law is fulfilled in one word, <sup>z</sup> even in this; <sup>a</sup> Thou shalt love thy neighbour as thyself.

The whole will of God, containing our duty towards men, is reducible to this one thing, love; for whatsoever God hath commanded us to do towards men, is but a branch from this root, and must flow from love as its principle. Or, the whole will of God concerning man is fulfilled in this one thing of love; where love to God is not excluded, but supposed, as the root of our love to our neighbour; for our neighbour is to be loved for God. Thus Rom. xiii. 8, He that loveth another hath fulfilled the law: and 1 John iv. 20, the apostle proveth, that a man cannot love God unless he loveth his brother: and 1 Tim. i. 5, The end of the commandment is charity. Yet what the papists would conclude from hence, (viz. that it is possible for a man to fulfil the law because it is possible for him to love his neighbour,) doth by no means follow; for the apostle (1 Tim. i. 5) telleth us, this love must proceed out of a pure heart, and of a good conscience, and of faith unfeigned. Mr. Calvin observeth well, that the apostle here mentioneth love to men as the fulfilling of the law, in opposition to the false teachers; who made the fulfilling of the law to lie in the observance of the ceremonies of the law, whereas the great thing which the law of God requireth is love, out of a pure heart, good conscience, and faith unfeigned. So that he who believeth with a faith unfeigned, and, out of that principle, with a pure heart and a good conscience, loveth his neighbour as himself, shall be by God accounted to have fulfilled the law; for love is the end of the law.

15 But if ye bite and devour one another, take heed that ye be not consumed one of another.

This lets us know, that there were great contentions and divisions amongst the members of this church, whether (which is probable) occasioned by their differences in and about the doctrine of justification, or upon other accounts, we are not told; but upon whatever account they were raised, they were contrary to that serving one another in love, to which the apostle had exhorted them. Nor did they terminate in a mere dislike of and displacency to each other, but broke out into overt acts, more becoming dogs than Christians, and therefore it is expressed under the notion of biting and devouring. The issue of which, the apostle prophesieth, would be a consuming one another; they being actions that had a natural tendency to this end.

<sup>c Rom. 8. 12. & 1. 4. 12. & 13. 14. ver. 25.</sup> 16 This I say then, Walk in the Spirit, and ye shall not fulfil the lust of the flesh.

<sup>1 Pet. 2. 11. Or, fulfil not.</sup> Walk in the Spirit; the apostle having, ver. 13, cautioned them against turning the grace of God into wantonness, by using their liberty as an occasion to the flesh; here he directeth them to the best means for the avoiding thereof, viz. walking in the Spirit. Where by Spirit he doth not mean our own spirits, or the guide and conduct of our own reason; for the term Spirit, set (as here) in opposition to the flesh, is in no place of Scripture understood of any other than the Holy Spirit of God, which dwelleth in and influenceth believers, guiding them both by a rule from without, (which is the word of God, given by its inspiration,) and by its inward motions and operations. Walking, signifieth the directing of their whole conversations. The phrases in the Spirit, and after the Spirit, Rom. viii. 1, seem to be of the same import, unless the alteration of the preposition signifieth, that Christians are not only to look to the word of God dictated by the Holy Spirit as their rule, and to listen to its dictates, but also to look up to the Holy Spirit for its strength and assistance; and implieth a promise of such assistance. The sense is, Let your whole conversation be according to the external rule of the gospel, and the more inward motions, directions, and inclinations of the Spirit of Christ, dwelling and working in you, and moving you to the obedience of that word. And ye shall not fulfil the lust of the flesh; this doing, though the flesh be yet in you, and you will find the lustings and warrings of it, yet you shall not fulfil the sinful desires and lustings of it; that is, sin, though it be in you, shall not be in dominion in you; it shall not reign in your mortal bodies: Rom. vi. 12, Let not sin reign in your mortal body, that ye should obey it in the lusts thereof.

<sup>d Rom. 7. 23. & 8. 6, 7.</sup> 17 For <sup>e Rom. 7. 15, 19.</sup> the flesh lusteth against the Spirit, and the Spirit against the flesh: and these are contrary the one to the other: so that ye cannot do the things that ye would.

By the flesh and the Spirit, we cannot so much understand the sensitive and rational appetite; for these two appetites are not so contrary, but that in many things they agree well enough; and we are enemies not only in our sensitive part, to spiritual things, but ἐν τῇ διαvoίᾳ, in our mind and rational part also, Col. i. 21. And some of the works of the flesh, which are afterward mentioned, ver. 19—21, (such as idolatry, heresies, &c.) cannot be referred to the sensitive part. But by these terms are either to be understood the unregenerate part of man; or rather, that carnal concupiscence which we derived from Adam, and is seated in our rational as well as sensitive appetite; which opposeth itself to the Divine rule, and to the dictates and motions of the Spirit of God. The flesh lusteth against the Spirit; this concupiscence moveth strongly against the directions of the Spirit. And the Spirit against the flesh; and the Holy Spirit of God, dwelling in the saints, moveth us potently against the propensions and inclinations of the flesh. And these are contrary the one to the other; for they are two contrary principles, and work contrarily in their motions and inclinations. So that ye cannot do the things that ye would; so that even the best of God's people cannot at all times do either what they should do, (according to the precept of the word,) or what they would do, according to the bent of their regenerate part.

18 But if ye be led of the Spirit, ye are not under the law. <sup>f Rom. 6. 14. & 8. 2.</sup>

To be led of the Spirit, and to walk in the Spirit, are the same thing; and differ only as the cause and the effect. To be under the law, is to be under the curse of it, or co-action of it, and an obligation to the performance of the ceremonial law. The reason is, because the Spirit is a Spirit of adoption and liberty; and where it is, it teacheth to serve the Lord without fear from a principle of freedom and ingenuity.

19 Now <sup>g 1 Cor. 3. 3. Eph. 5. 3. Col. 3. 5. Jam. 3. 14, 15.</sup> the works of the flesh are manifest, which are these; Adultery, fornication, uncleanness, lasciviousness,

The works of the flesh; the products of the natural inclinations and propensions in the heart of man. Are manifest, which are these; he saith, these are manifest, the filthiness of them appears by the light of nature, by the checks of conscience men meet with for them; or else, it is manifest that these actions are not from the Spirit of God, (because of their contrariety to the Divine rule,) but are from the corrupt part of man. These (he saith) are adultery, or the defiling of our neighbour's bed; fornication, which is the uncleanness of single persons each with other; and all other species of uncleanness, or unclean conjunctions: lasciviousness; whatsoever wanton carriage, gestures, or behaviour lead to these acts.

20 Idolatry, witchcraft, hatred, variance, emulations, wrath, strife, seditions, heresies,

Idolatry; either the worshipping of the creature for God, or the worshipping of God in and by the creature, as by images, &c. Witchcraft; the product of compacts with the devil; by virtue of which, the persons so contracting are assisted by the power of evil spirits to produce effects beside the ordinary course and order of nature, and for the most part mischievous to others. And not these gross crimes only are the fruits of the flesh, but also abiding hatred of our brethren in our hearts, enmities to others, as the word signifieth. The result of which are, variance; men's quarrelling and contentings one with another for little or no cause: emulations; people's endeavouring to hinder others of such good things as they see them desirous of: wrath; heats and immoderate passions of men one against another: strife; a continual readiness and proneness to quarrelling: seditions; dividing into parties, which in the state is called sedition, in the church, schism: heresies; that is, differing and false opinions in the grand doctrine of religion.

21 Envyings, murders, drunkenness, revellings, and such like: of the which I tell you before, as I have also told you in time past, that they which do such things shall not inherit the kingdom of God. <sup>h 1 Cor. 6. 9. Eph. 5. 5. Col. 3. 6. Rev. 22. 15.</sup>

Envyings; repinings at that good which is enjoyed by our brethren: murders; unjust taking away the lives of others, with any actions tending or subservient thereunto: drunkenness; immoderate drinkings: revellings, and such like; immoderate eatings; all abuses of the creatures of God beyond necessity, or a moderate delight. Of the which I tell you before; I tell you of it before the day of judgment comes, when you will find that which I tell you to be truth. As I have also told you in time past; as you know I have in my preaching to you in times past told you. That they which do such things shall not inherit the kingdom of God; that they who ordinarily do these things, and do not only live in such practices, but die without repentance for them, shall never be saved: see 1 Cor. vi. 9, 10; Rev. xxi. 7, 8.

22 But the fruit of the Spirit is love, joy, peace, longsuffering, gentleness, goodness, faith. <sup>i John 15. 2. Eph. 5. 9. k Col. 3. 12. Jam. 3. 17. l Rom. 15. 14. m 1 Cor. 13. 7.</sup>

The fruit of the Spirit; those habits which the Holy Spirit of God produceth in those in whom it dwelleth and worketh, with those acts which flow from them, as naturally as the tree produceth its fruit, are, love to God, and to our neighbours: joy; the soul's satisfaction in its union with God, as the greatest and highest good; with an actual rejoicing in Christ, and in what is for his honour and glory, called a rejoicing in the truth, 1 Cor. xiii. 6; and in the good of our brethren, Rom. xii. 15: peace; quietude of conscience, or peace with God, (of which peace of conscience is a copy,) and a peaceable disposition towards men, opposed to strife, variance, emulations, &c.: long-suffering; opposed to a hastiness to revenge, and inclining us patiently to bear injuries: gentleness; sweetness and kindness of temper, by which we accommodate ourselves, and become mutually useful to each other: goodness; a disposition in us to hurt none, but to do all the good we can to all: faith; by faith seemeth here to be meant, truth in words, faithfulness in promises, and in dealings one with another.

n 1 Tim. 1. 2. 23 Meekness, temperance: <sup>a</sup> against such there is no law.

Meekness; forbearance of passion, rash anger, and hastiness of spirit: temperance; a sober use of meats, drinks, apparel, or any thing wherein our senses are delighted. Many of these are moral virtues, and such as some have attained to by moral discipline, the cultivating of their natures by education, and moral philosophy: yet they are also the fruits of the Spirit of God; such as it doth always work in the souls wherein it dwelleth (though in different measures and degrees): only the moral man thus comporteth himself from principles of reason, showing him the beauty and comeliness of such a conversation, and aims no higher in it, than a happiness of converse in this life, his own honour and reputation. But the spiritual man, doing the same things, aimeth at a higher end (the glorifying of God, and saving his own soul); and doth these things from a fear of God, out of love to him, and out of faith, as seeing in them the will of God. Against such (saith the apostle) there is no law; no law to accuse or to condemn them; for these are things which the law commandeth to be done, and are acts of obedience to the law. So as those who do these things are led by the Spirit, and are not under the condemning power or curse of the law.

o Rom. 6. 6. & 13. 14. ch. 2. 20. 1 Pet. 2. 11. 1 Cor. 7. 23. 24 And they that are Christ's <sup>o</sup> have crucified the flesh with the || affections and lusts.

They that are Christ's; those who are ingrafted into Christ by faith, united to him, and so his members; have crucified the flesh; by virtue of a power derived from the cross of Christ, have got their unregenerate part in a great measure mortified; with the affections and lusts; with the inordinate desires, affections, and passions of it: not that they have wholly put off these, (they are men still,) but the inordinateness of them is corrected, mortified, and subdued.

p Rom. 8. 4. & ver. 16. 25 <sup>p</sup> If we live in the Spirit, let us also walk in the Spirit.

If we live in the Spirit; if (as we profess) there is a union betwixt the Holy Spirit of God and us, so as that Holy Spirit is to us the principle of our life, and we live more from him than from any principle in ourselves; let us also walk in the Spirit; let us manage all our conversation according to the guidance and direction of the same Spirit. Operations naturally follow the principle of life from which they proceed, so that as those who only live in the flesh, walk in and after the flesh, and its inclination; so those who live in the Spirit ought to produce, and will produce, effects suitable to the cause of them, and the principle from which they flow.

q Phil. 2. 3. 26 <sup>q</sup> Let us not be desirous of vain glory, provoking one another, envying one another.

Let us not be desirous of vain-glory: ambition or vain-glory is a natural corruption, disposing us to boast and commend ourselves, and to seek the honour and applause of men. Provoking one another; this is an effect of the former, disposing us, out of hope of victory, to challenge others to a contest with us. Or it may be understood of provoking others by injuries and wrongs done them; which is contrary to the duty of love. Envying one another; not repining at the good of others; either desiring their portion, or being troubled that they fare so well. Possibly this verse might more properly have been made the first of the next chapter, (as Luther maketh it,) where the apostle goeth on, pressing further spiritual duties common to all Christians.

CHAP. VI

Paul adviseth them to reform the faulty with gentleness, 1, and to bear one another's burdens, 2. A caution against vanity, 3—5. He exhorteth to be liberal toward spiritual instructors, 6—8; and not to be weary in doing good, 9—11. He showeth the carnal views of those who preached circumcision, 12, 13, and his own professed dependence on Christ only, regardless of the world, 14—17. He concludeth with a prayer, 18.

BRETHREN, <sup>a</sup> if a man be overtaken in a fault, ye <sup>b</sup> which are spiritual, restore such an one <sup>c</sup> in the spirit of meekness; considering thyself, <sup>d</sup> lest thou also be tempted.

In the term brethren, there is a secret argument persuading the duty which he is pressing, because Christians, particularly members of the same church, are all brethren. By persons overtaken in a fault, he means such as do not make a trade of open and scandalous sinning, (for such must be rebuked sharply,) but such as may be sometimes through infirmity overcome, and run down with a temptation to sin. By those that are spiritual, he means not only the pastors and governors of the church, (though this care and duty is much incumbent upon them,) but such as have received the Spirit of Christ; more especially such as were more knowing in the ways of God, and had spiritual habits more confirmed in them; in which sense spiritual is used in 1 Cor. iii. 1. Restore such an one in the spirit of meekness: the word translated restore, signifies to put again into joint, or into right order and place. Sin is an inordinate action, and putteth the soul that committeth it out of its due order and place. He willeth the brethren that are spiritual to use all due means to put such a member in joint again, but not to do this roughly, and with passion, and severe correction, but meekly, so as may be most probable to win the sinner's soul. Considering thyself, lest thou also be tempted; having an eye and respect to themselves, as neither being free from sin, nor from temptations to sin, dealing with others as they would have others deal by them.

2 <sup>e</sup> Bear ye one another's burdens, and so fulfil <sup>f</sup> the law of Christ.

Bear ye one another's burdens; it is a general precept, and may be either understood with reference to what he had said in the former verse, so it hints our duty: though we discern our brethren to have fallen into some sin or error, yet if we discern that they are sensible of their lapse, and their sin is not a pleasure, but a burden to them, though we ought not to bear with them or connive at them in their sins, yet we ought to sympathize with them when we see their sin is become their load and burden, under which they groan and are dejected. Or else more generally, as a new precept commanding us to sympathize with our brethren under any load of trials and affliction which God shall lay upon them. And so it agreeth with that precept, Rom. xii. 15. By the law of Christ, he means the will of Christ revealed in the gospel; particularly the law of love, so much enjoined by Christ, John xiii. 15, 33—35; xv. 12. Which is not called the law of Christ because first given by him, (for himself maketh it the sum of the ten commandments,) but because he received it and vindicated it from the corruption of the Pharisees' interpretation, Matt. v. 43, 44; because he so often urged it, and so seriously commanded and commended it to his disciples; and set us the highest precedent and example of it, and hath by his Spirit written it in the hearts of his people.

3 For <sup>g</sup> if a man think himself to be something, when <sup>h</sup> he is nothing, he deceiveth himself.

It is a general maxim, and the truth of it is obvious to every one that readeth it, for supposing a man to be nothing of what he thinks himself to be, he must needs deceive himself in nourishing and entertaining such an opinion of himself. For the dependence of it upon what the apostle had said before, it is obvious. Pride, and men's high opinions of themselves above what they ought, are the cause of their censoriousness and morosity in dealing with other offenders; which modesty would not suffer in them, if they apprehended themselves to be as weak, and as much exposed to temptations, as others are. It is pride and overweening opinions of ourselves, that make us despise or neglect others under their burdens, and so forget the law of Christ; the apostle therefore properly addeth this precept for humility and modesty to those former precepts.

4 But <sup>1</sup>let every man prove his own work, and then shall he have rejoicing in himself alone, and <sup>2</sup>not in another.

Let every man prove his own work: the apostle, by a man's own work here, understands his own actions and manners, which he would have every man to busy himself to search, try, and examine by the Divine rule, whether they be conformable to the will of God, yea or no; and then, he saith, shall he have rejoicing in himself alone, and not in another; a man shall (if he findeth his work such as is agreeable to the will of God) have a cause to rejoice in himself; not in the merit or perfection of his works, but in his own works; not in others; that is, he shall rejoice in something which God hath wrought in and by him, and not in others. This the apostle wisely propounds, as a means to bring a man to know his own measures; it being a great error for men to measure themselves by the measures of other men, their perfections by others' imperfections.

1 Cor. 2. 1.

5 For <sup>1</sup>every man shall bear his own burden.

That is, God will judge every man in the last day, according not to what others have done, but to what he himself hath done, 1 Cor. iii. 8. Therefore every one is concerned to prove his own work; for at last his eternal joy and rejoicing, or sorrow and mourning, shall be according to what he himself hath wrought, not according to what others have wrought. If ever they enter into the joy of heaven, they shall rejoice in their own work. And if eternal sorrow be their portion, they shall groan under their own burdens; they will not be the sins of others, but their own sins, which will sink them into eternal misery. For though superiors shall answer to God for the sins of their inferiors, yet it shall not properly be for their inferiors' sins, but for their own sins, in neglecting to warn and to reprove them, and to do what in them lay to have hindered them in their sinful courses.

6 <sup>m</sup>Let him that is taught in the word <sup>n</sup>communicate unto him that teacheth in all good things.

Let him that is taught in the word: the word here translated taught, signifieth catechised; and is the same word from which that word is derived; but it here signifieth taught, catechising being but a mode or species of teaching. Communicate unto him that teacheth in all good things; the precept is concerning the maintenance of ministers, which is fitly expressed by the term communicate, because as the people distribute to their ministers things temporal, so the ministers distribute things spiritual. The good things here mentioned are temporal good things, such as may be useful to the teacher for him to uphold himself and family. The text teacheth us, that it is the will of God that ministers should be maintained at the charge of the church to which they minister, and it is but an act of justice, for they do but communicate temporal things to those who communicate to them much more valuable things.

7 <sup>a</sup>Be not deceived; <sup>o</sup>God is not mocked: for <sup>p</sup>whatsoever a man soweth, that shall he also reap.

Be not deceived; God is not mocked: the apostle addeth this to terrify those who find out vain and false excuses to save their purses; he adviseth them not to cheat themselves, for though they might deceive men, yet they could not deceive the all-seeing and heart-searching God. For whatsoever a man soweth, that shall he also reap; further to encourage them to this communicating, he mindeth them, that what they distributed in this nature, was no more lost than the seed in which the husbandman casteth into the ground; which in its season springs up, and returneth into the husbandman's hand with increase. This metaphor of sowing is made use of also, Prov. xi. 18; 2 Cor. ix. 6, to express men's actions; and lets us know, that our actions, when done, are not done with; but as our bodies shall rise again, so what we have done in the flesh shall be revived and judged; whatsoever, either for quantity or for quality, men sow, the same shall they reap: as to quantity, he had said in 2 Cor. ix. 6, that he who soweth sparingly should reap sparingly, and he who soweth bountifully should reap bountifully: as to quality, he here further addeth, 8 <sup>q</sup>For he that soweth to his flesh shall <sup>r</sup>of the flesh reap corruption; but he that soweth to the Spirit shall <sup>s</sup>of the Spirit reap life everlasting.

For he that soweth to his flesh; he that layeth out his estate, or spendeth his time and talents, for the gratifying of the flesh; shall of the flesh reap corruption; shall or may reap some carnal satisfaction, of a corruptible, dying, perishing nature. But he that soweth to the Spirit; but he who layeth out his estate, or spendeth his time, strength, talents, whatsoever God hath given him, for the glory of God, in obedience to the commands, motions, and dictates of the Spirit, or the revelations of the Divine will; shall of the Spirit reap life everlasting; he shall not of merit, but of grace from the Spirit, reap everlasting life, reward, and satisfaction. So that as in the world, that man doth not suffer loss that layeth out his money, time, or strength about good things of a valuable and enduring nature; but he only who layeth them out about things perishing, and transitory, and of a corruptible nature: so that man shall not lose his estate that layeth it out for the maintenance of the gospel, and upholding the ministry of it; for he soweth to the Spirit, and shall therefore reap eternal life and salvation: he only loseth his estate, &c., who spendeth it to gratify his lusts, and please his flesh, for all the return which he shall have, will be in poor, sensible, perishing good things, which perish with the using, and will be of no significance to him beyond this life.

9 And <sup>t</sup>let us not be weary in well doing: for in due season we shall reap, <sup>u</sup>if we faint not.

Let us not be weary in well doing: we have the same precept, 2 Thess. iii. 13. As the not executing of judgment speedily emboldens sinners, and encourageth them to go on in courses of sin, so God's delaying the rewards of the righteous, often proveth a temptation to good men to be weary of well doing. Against this the apostle cautioneth us here, by minding us, that there is a due season for all things (which is best known to the wise God); and assuring us, that though, as we see not the husbandman presently reaping as soon as he hath sown, but waiting patiently in hope that in a due season he shall reap; so we, though we be not presently rewarded, yet in God's season shall as certainly reap as he doth. But he also mindeth us, that if we will reap we must not faint, but go on and persevere in our course of well doing; otherwise we can no more expect to reap, than the husbandman can that hath sown well, but out of impatience, before the time cometh for him to reap, shall go and plough up again all that he hath sown: see Ezek. xxxiii. 13.

10 <sup>v</sup>As we have therefore opportunity, <sup>w</sup>let us do good unto all men, especially unto them who are of <sup>x</sup>the household of faith.

As we have therefore opportunity; as we have objects before us, or as God gives us time and ability. Let us do good unto all men; let it be our business to harm none, but to supply the necessities of all men; either with our spiritual advice and counsels, with all the assistance we can give them that may any way be of spiritual profit or advantage to them; or with our worldly goods, ministering to their necessities. Especially unto them who are of the household of faith; but all in an order, preferring Christians before others; those that belong to the church, (which is called the house of God, 1 Tim. iii. 15; 1 Pet. iv. 17, and the household of God, Eph. ii. 19,) before such as have no such relation to the church.

11 Ye see how large a letter I have written unto you with mine own hand.

Paul made use of the hands of others in the writing some others of the Epistles, as appears from Rom. xvi. 22, and sometimes he himself only wrote the salutation, 1 Cor. xvi. 21: but he tells them he wrote this Epistle to them wholly with his own hand, that he might thereby more commend his love to them and care over them.

12 As many as desire to make a fair show in the flesh, they constrain you to be circumcised; only lest they should suffer persecution for the cross of Christ.

The apostle here reflecteth upon those false teachers who had perverted this church, and discovereth their hypocrisy under all their pretences of good will to them. These are those who (he saith) desired to make a fair show in the flesh; that is, to make a fair show to the world, as men very devout, which formalists and persons over-zealous for rituals ordinarily do. These would constrain, were very urgent to persuade, these believers to be circumcised; not out of any love they had to the law of God, or to the souls of these Galatians, but only to avoid persecution; for as the Jews were more favourable to such Christians, who, together with the doctrine of Christ, observed also their rites and legal ceremonies; so we are told by some of the ancients, that some of the Roman emperors, by their edicts, gave liberty to the Jews, in the provinces subject to them, to use their own religious rites: now all who were circumcised went under that notion, so had more liberty than those who were not circumcised, who were persecuted both by the Jewish and the heathen magistrates. The apostle saith, that these false teachers, who so zealously urged circumcision upon this Gentile church, did it for the avoiding the danger of persecution; which they saw would follow their standing fast in their gospel liberty, and not bringing themselves under the law: which persecution, he tacitly hinteth, ought not to be so industriously shunned and avoided, because it was for Christ's sake, who had endured the cross for them.

13 For neither they themselves who are circumcised keep the law; but desire to have you circumcised, that they may glory in your flesh.

In this the hypocrisy of your false teachers discovereth itself, that whereas, by their being circumcised, they had declared themselves debtors to the whole law, and under an obligation entirely to keep it if they would be saved, yet they themselves did not keep it; only they were very zealous for this one thing, not out of any love they had to the law, but that they might glory of you, as their converts, being by them persuaded to be circumcised.

14 But God forbid that I should glory, save in the cross of our Lord Jesus Christ, by whom the world is crucified unto me, and I unto the world.

For my part I have no such ends, I have no ambition to glory in you as my converts; all that I desire to glory in, is in the doctrine of the gospel, and my sufferings for the propagation of it, and my conformity to Christ in suffering for preaching the gospel. By the cross of Christ the world is crucified unto me, and I unto the world; I care no more for the world than it careth for me; the world despiseth and contemneth me, and the doctrine of the cross which I preach and publish in it, and I contemn it, with all its vain pomp and splendour. And this I do through the cross of Christ, remembering how the world dealt with Christ, and how little he regarded the world: or, through the grace of Christ, who hath enabled me to it, for the particle translated by whom, may be indifferently translated by whom or by which.

15 For in Christ Jesus neither circumcision availeth any thing, nor uncircumcision, but a new creature.

Under the gospel state as settled by Christ, with reference to salvation, it is of no moment whether a man be a Jew or a Gentile; but whether a man be regenerated or no, and be renewed by the Holy Ghost, so as old things with him be passed away, and all things be become new. He had said the same, chap. iii. 28; v. 6. See also 2 Cor. v. 17. Under the law, indeed, there was something in circumcision, as it was God's covenant in the flesh to that people to whom he gave it, and the uncircumcised were strangers to the covenants of promise, and aliens to the church of God; but under the gospel, circumcision and uncircumcision are of no significancy; God neither regardeth any for the former, nor rejecteth any for the latter, he only looketh at the heart and inward man, whether that be renewed and sanctified, yea or no.

16 And as many as walk according to this rule, peace be on them, and mercy, and upon the Israel of God.

And as many as walk according to this rule; he either meaneth the rule of Scripture, the whole word of God; or the doctrine which he had taught them throughout this Epistle, or what he had said in the words immediately going before, where the apostle had given them this rule, not to regard either circumcision or uncircumcision, or any thing in the flesh, but only the change of their hearts. To these he either prophesieth peace and mercy, or he prayeth peace and mercy for them; under which large terms he comprehendeth all good things, whether internal or external. Upon the Israel of God; upon the true Israelites, whom he calleth the Israel of God; hereby intimating and confirming the truth of what he had said, Rom. ii. 28, 29, and what our Saviour had said of Nathanael, John i. 47, calling him an Israelite indeed, because in him was no guile; and establishing a distinction between such as were so really, and those who were only Israelites in name, because descended from Jacob, to whom God gave the name of Israel. Hereby also checking the vanity of the Jews, who gloried in the name of Israelites, and thought there could no water come out of the fountains of Israel which God would cast away. The apostle doth not promise, or prophesy, mercy and peace to all Israelites, but only to the Israel of God; that is, to believers, that received and embraced Jesus Christ offered in the gospel.

17 From henceforth let no man trouble me: for I bear in my body the marks of the Lord Jesus.

Let no man trouble me, either with questions about circumcision, or with imputations as if I were a friend to their opinion, of the necessity of adding to the doctrine of faith, circumcision and other observances of the law. For I bear in my body the marks of the Lord Jesus; I sufficiently declare my judgment to the world, suffering for my profession, and preaching the gospel. These sufferings he calls the marks of the Lord Jesus, because he endured them in testimony to the gospel, as well against the Jews as against the Gentiles.

18 Brethren, the grace of our Lord Jesus Christ be with your spirit. Amen.

The apostle closeth this Epistle with this prayer, as he generally concludeth all his Epistles, with wishing them grace, the grace of our Lord Jesus Christ; under which he comprehendeth all the effects of the free love of God upon believers' souls, for the sake, and in and through the merits, of the Lord Jesus Christ: this he prayeth that they might feel in their hearts, and that it might be in their spirits, to quicken, strengthen, comfort, and establish them, according to the different manifestations of the Spirit of grace.

¶ Unto the Galatians written from Rome.

It hath been said before, that we are not to look upon these dates of apostolical Epistles as part of holy writ, for in some of them there are manifest mistakes; but most think that this Epistle was written from Rome, while Paul was a prisoner there, who are in part guided to it from ver. 17, thinking that it was written at a time when Paul was there suffering imprisonment. But of this there is no certainty.

y ch. 2. 3, 14. shew in the flesh, they constrain you to be circumcised; only lest they should suffer persecution for the cross of Christ.

z Phil. 3. 18. a ch. 5. 11. The apostle here reflecteth upon those false teachers who had perverted this church, and discovereth their hypocrisy under all their pretences of good will to them. These are those who (he saith) desired to make a fair show in the flesh; that is, to make a fair show to the world, as men very devout, which formalists and persons over-zealous for rituals ordinarily do. These would constrain, were very urgent to persuade, these believers to be circumcised; not out of any love they had to the law of God, or to the souls of these Galatians, but only to avoid persecution; for as the Jews were more favourable to such Christians, who, together with the doctrine of Christ, observed also their rites and legal ceremonies; so we are told by some of the ancients, that some of the Roman emperors, by their edicts, gave liberty to the Jews, in the provinces subject to them, to use their own religious rites: now all who were circumcised went under that notion, so had more liberty than those who were not circumcised, who were persecuted both by the Jewish and the heathen magistrates. The apostle saith, that these false teachers, who so zealously urged circumcision upon this Gentile church, did it for the avoiding the danger of persecution; which they saw would follow their standing fast in their gospel liberty, and not bringing themselves under the law: which persecution, he tacitly hinteth, ought not to be so industriously shunned and avoided, because it was for Christ's sake, who had endured the cross for them.

13 For neither they themselves who are circumcised keep the law; but desire to have you circumcised, that they may glory in your flesh.

In this the hypocrisy of your false teachers discovereth itself, that whereas, by their being circumcised, they had declared themselves debtors to the whole law, and under an obligation entirely to keep it if they would be saved, yet they themselves did not keep it; only they were very zealous for this one thing, not out of any love they had to the law, but that they might glory of you, as their converts, being by them persuaded to be circumcised.

THE EPISTLE OF PAUL THE APOSTLE

TO THE

EPHESIANS

THE ARGUMENT

EPHESUS was the most considerable city of the lesser Asia; famous, first for sin, witchcraft, Acts xix. 19, idolatry (especially the worship of Diana, ver. 24,) and persecution, 1 Cor. xv. 32; xvi. 9; then for piety, having received the gospel by Paul's preaching, Acts xviii., and showed great zeal, Acts xix. 17, 18, &c.; Rev. ii. 2, 3; but, lastly, it was noted for coolness and declining, Rev. ii. 4, leaving her first love. The apostle seems to have foreseen this as like to come to pass among them by means of false teachers, grievous wolves that would not spare the flock, Acts xx. 29, and some that would arise from among themselves speaking perverse things, ver. 30. Hereupon he not only admonished the elders of the church to look to themselves and all the flock, ver. 28; but afterward, when a prisoner at Rome, out of his care of these Ephesians, and concern for them, he writes this Epistle to them, to confirm and settle them in the faith they had received, and persuade them to a holy conversation, as best suited to a holy gospel. In the Epistle there are two principal parts: 1. Doctrinal, in the first three chapters, where he lays down and commends to them the doctrine of the grace of God in election, redemption, vocation, justification, adoption, chap. i., illustrating it by the deplorable condition in which before their conversion they had been, chap. ii., and assuring them of the truth of their call, by asserting, against all objectors and cavillers, his apostleship with respect to them Gentiles, and his commission from God to preach among them the unsearchable riches of Christ, chap. iii. 2. Practical; in which he exhorts them to walk worthy of their calling in the diligent practice of Christian duties, whether more general, and which concern all believers, or special, such as belong to them in their several relations, especially economical, chap. v. and vi.

CHAP. I

After saluting the Ephesians, 1, 2, Paul bleaseth God for his spiritual blessings on those whom he had chosen in Christ, and predestinated to the adoption of children, 3—6; for our redemption by his grace, according to his revealed purpose of gathering together all in one under Christ, 7—10; for the inheritance already obtained by those who first trusted in Christ, 11, 12; and for the Spirit given to after believers, as an earnest of the same, 13, 14. He declareth his continual thankfulness to God for their faith, and his prayers that God would perfect them in the knowledge of those things which concerned their state in Christ, 15—19; whom God had raised up, and exalted to be the supreme Head of his body the church, 20—23.

A. D. 64. PAUL, an apostle of Jesus Christ <sup>a</sup> by the will of God, <sup>b</sup> to the saints which are at Ephesus, <sup>c</sup> and to the faithful in Christ Jesus:

The faithful; this may be understood either, 1. By way of restriction, of those that are sincere and constant to Christ, and so not only saints by profession, but true to their profession; or rather, 2. By way of explication: he defines those saints he spake of, and calls them faithful in Christ here, whom he called saints before. Christ Jesus; the Author and Fountain of that holiness which denominates them saints.

<sup>d</sup> Gal. 1. 3. Tit. 1. 4. 2<sup>d</sup> Grace be to you, and peace, from God our Father, and from the Lord Jesus Christ.

<sup>e</sup> 2 Cor. 1. 3. 1 Pet. 1. 3. 3<sup>d</sup> Blessed be the God and Father of our Lord Jesus Christ, who hath blessed us with all spiritual blessings in heavenly || places in Christ:

Blessed be; i. e. thanked, praised. We bless God when we praise him for, and acknowledge him in, his excellencies or benefits. Who hath blessed us; hath vouchsafed or communicated all spiritual blessings to us. God bleaseth us when he doeth good to us: and so the word blessed is taken in a different sense from what it was in the former clause. With all; of all sorts or kinds. Spiritual blessings; in opposition to temporal and worldly, which the carnal Jews principally expected, and the law mostly promised, (Deut. xxviii. 1—14,) and which were but types and shadows of those spiritual blessings which immediately relate to the spiritual life and salvation of believers. In heavenly places; Gr. supercelestial, or heavenly: understand either, 1. Things; and then it seems to be the same as spiritual blessings, only in other terms. Or, 2. Places, in opposition to earthly places, particularly the land of Canaan, in which God had formerly promised to bless his people. These spiritual blessings are in heavenly places, because, though they reach us here on earth, yet they are derived to us from God and Christ in heaven, and in heaven only have their full perfection and consummation hereafter. In Christ; by or through Christ; upon the account of whose merit, and by whose efficiency, these spiritual blessings are derived from God to us. Or, in Christ as our Head, the repository and seat of all Divine blessings, from whom they flow down upon us as his members, receiving all we have out of his fulness. He seems to have respect to the promise made to Abraham, Gen. xxii. 18, That in his seed all the nations of the earth should be blessed; pointing out Christ as that seed, and those blessings as spiritual. See Acts iii. 25, 26.

4 According as <sup>f</sup> he hath chosen us in <sup>g</sup> him <sup>h</sup> before the foundation of the world, that we should <sup>i</sup> be holy and without blame before him in love:

God bleaseth us with all spiritual blessings according as he hath chosen us; election being the fountain from whence those blessings come, so that God doeth nothing for us in carrying on the work of our salvation, but what he had in his eternal counsel before determined. Chosen us; separated us in his purpose and decree from others, (whom he left out of that gracious act of his will,) and determined that we should be holy and unblamable, &c. In him; either, 1. By and through Christ, (as in the former verse,) for his sake, and upon the account of his merit as the procuring cause, not of our election, but sanctification; q. d. God hath chosen us, that we should be made holy and unblamable by Christ. Or rather, 2. In Christ, as the foundation on which he would build us, (his spiritual house,) and by which both we might be united to God, and he communicate his influence and grace to us; or as our Head, by which he might convey grace, and strength, and life to us as Christ's members. Before the foundation of the world; either before God's decree of creating the world, or rather, before his executing that decree in the actual creation of it; i. e. from eternity, when neither we nor the world had a being. That we should be holy and without blame; by inherent grace begun in regeneration, and carried on in sanctification and mortification in this life, though not perfected till the other. Holiness in us is declared here to be not the cause, but the effect of our election; we are chosen that we may be holy, not because we are, or God foresees we will be holy. Before him; in the sight of God, who is not deceived with an outward appearance, but looks to the heart. In love; as a principal part of our sanctification, and the best evidence of the fear of God in us, and our obedience to the whole law.

5 <sup>l</sup> Having predestinated us unto <sup>k</sup> the adoption of children by Jesus Christ to himself, <sup>m</sup> according to the good pleasure of his will,

Having predestinated us unto the adoption of children; having appointed us unto a state of sonship and right to glory. This seems to be more than the former, a greater thing to be the sons of God, and heirs of heaven, than to be holy. By Jesus Christ; as Mediator, and Head of the elect, and the foundation of all spiritual blessings vouchsafed them, and so of this relation into which they are brought, by being united to him. The adopted children come into that state by the intervention of the natural Son. To himself; either, 1. In himself, i. e. looking no farther than to himself for the cause of and motive to his adopting them. Or, 2. To himself, (according to our translation,) i. e. to God. Or, rather, 3. For himself (as the Syriac renders it); God would have the honour of having many adopted children that shall all call him Father. According to the good pleasure of his will; his sovereign grace and good will, as the only spring from which predestination issued, God being moved to it by nothing out of himself.

6 To the praise of the glory of his grace, <sup>m</sup> wherein he hath made us accepted in <sup>n</sup> the beloved.

To the praise of the glory of his grace: glory of his grace, by a usual Hebraism, for glorious grace, i. e. large, abundant, admirable. The praise of this grace the apostle makes the end of God's choosing and predestinating us to the adoption of children. God hath chosen us, &c. and therein manifested his grace to us, that such as it is in itself, such it may be acknowledged to be; and therefore praised and adored by us. Wherein; in, or through, or by the same grace out of which he chose us. He hath made us accepted in the beloved; having chosen us in Christ, he likewise favours us, is well pleased with us in Christ, to whom we are united, whose members we are, and in whom God looks upon us. We are hateful in ourselves as sinners, but accepted in Christ as sons.

7 <sup>o</sup> In whom we have redemption through his blood, the forgiveness of sins, according to <sup>p</sup> the riches of his grace;

In whom; in Christ, God-man, the immediate worker of this redemption; for though the Father and the Spirit concurred to it, yet the redeeming work was peculiarly terminated in the Second Person. The other two Persons have a right of propriety to redeem us; Christ only a right of propinquity, as assuming our nature, and being of kin to us. We; we elect, before mentioned. Have redemption; freedom from the wrath of God, and curse of the law, to which we are obnoxious, and consequently the power of sin and tyranny of Satan, as the effects of the former. Through his blood; i. e. by the sacrifice of his death upon the cross, where his blood was shed. This was the price of redemption paid to God for us, and wherewith his justice being satisfied, we could no longer be detained under the custody of the devil, or the dominion of sin. Even the forgiveness of sins; redemption is not formally forgiveness, but causally, forgiveness being the effect of it; and it is mentioned not as the only or adequate, but the primo and principal fruit of redemption, and upon which the other depend. According to the riches of his grace: what he called glorious grace, ver. 6, here he calls riches of grace, meaning plentiful and superabundant grace, by a phrase frequently used by him elsewhere in the same sense, Rom. ix. 23; chap. ii. 4, 7.

8 Wherein he hath abounded toward us in all wisdom and prudence;

Wherein, in which grace before mentioned, he hath abounded toward us; i. e. out of abundance of grace in himself, (called riches of grace, ver. 7,) he hath bestowed upon us wisdom and prudence. The like expression we have, 1 Tim. i. 14. In all wisdom; this denotes either, the perfections or excellency of it, being instead of all other wisdom, and more excellent than all else; or all in comparison of what was under the Old Testament. They then had Divine truths revealed but by parts and parcels, and so a more sparing measure of spiritual wisdom; but under the gospel, believers have it more fully and largely, the Spirit of wisdom and revelation being poured out on them. Wisdom and prudence; either the doctrine of the gospel, which contains more perfect and higher wisdom than that the Greeks sought after, 1 Cor. i. 22, and for lack of which they counted the gospel foolishness; or rather, by wisdom is understood that knowledge or faith whereby we receive spiritual truths revealed to us, and to be believed by us, so as to their excellency, and have our hearts affected with them; and by prudence, the knowledge of the rule of our duty, with skill to govern ourselves according to it: and so wisdom is no other than faith, and prudence the same in effect with holiness; the former relates to the things we are to believe, the latter to the things we are to do. In the working these two in the soul, consists inward and effectual calling, which the apostle mentions in this verse, as he doth the outward likewise, by the preaching the word of the gospel, in the next.

9 <sup>q</sup> Having made known unto us the mystery of his will, according to his good pleasure <sup>r</sup> which he hath purposed in himself:

Having made known unto us; having revealed to us outwardly by the preaching of the gospel; inwardly, by the illumination of the Spirit. The mystery of his will; the whole doctrine of grace and salvation by Christ, which is a secret to others, and had still been so to us, had not God discovered it to us in the gospel. According to his good pleasure; the good pleasure of God is the fountain of all spiritual blessings which flow out to us, as well as it is of our being first chosen and appointed to be the subjects of them. Which he hath purposed in himself; this signifies a firm, settled will in God, either merely of God, and moved by nothing out of himself, or his keeping this purpose in himself till the time appointed for the publication of it.

10 That in the dispensation of <sup>u</sup> the fulness of times <sup>v</sup> he might gather together in one <sup>w</sup> all things in Christ, both which are in <sup>x</sup> heaven, and which are on earth; <sup>y</sup> even in him:

Some copies join the last clause of the former verse with this, leaving out the relative which, and concluding the sentence at good pleasure, and then read, He purposed in himself, that in the dispensation, &c.; but most read it as our translators have rendered it, only some understand an explicative particle, to wit, in the beginning of this verse, to wit, that in the dispensation, &c.; but either way the scope of the words is the same, viz. to give the sum of that mystery of God's will, mentioned before.

In the dispensation; in that administration or distribution of the good things of God's house, which he had determined should be in the fulness of time. It is a metaphor taken from a steward, who distributes and dispenseth according to his master's order to those that are in the house, Luke xii. 42. The church is the house of God, God himself the Master of the family, Christ the Steward that governs the house; those spiritual blessings, mentioned ver. 3, are the good things he gives out. These treasures of God's grace had been opened but to a few, and dispensed sparingly under the Old Testament, the more full communication of them being reserved till the fulness of times, when they were to be dispensed by Christ. The fulness of times; the time appointed of the Father for the appearance of Christ in the flesh, (according to former promises,) the promulgation of the gospel, and thereby the gathering together in one all things in Christ. It is spoken in opposition to the times and ages before Christ's coming, which God would have run out till the set time came which he had pitched upon, and believers expected: see Gal. iv. 2, 4. Gather together in one; to recapitulate; either to sum up as men do several lesser numbers in one total sum, which is the foot of the account, but called by the Greeks the head of it, and set at the top; or as orators do the several parts of their speeches in fewer words; thus all former prophecies, promises, types, and shadows centred, and were fulfilled, and as it were summed up, in Christ: or rather, to unite unto, and gather together again under, one head things before divided and scattered. All things; all intellectual beings, or all persons, as Gal. iii. 22. In Christ; as their Head, under which they might be united to God, and to each other. Which are in heaven; either saints departed, who have already obtained salvation by Christ, or rather the holy angels, that still keep their first station. Which are on earth; the elect of God among men here upon earth in their several generations. The meaning of the whole seems to be, that whereas the order and harmony of God's principal workmanship, intellectual creatures, angels and men, had been disturbed and broken by the entering of sin into the world; all mankind, and many of the angels, having apostatized from him, and the remnant of them being in their own nature labile and mutable; God would, in his appointed time, give Christ (the Heir of all things) the honour of being the repairer of this breach, by gathering together again the disjointed members of his creation in and under Christ as their Head and Governor, confirming the good angels in their good estate, and recovering his elect among men from their apostate condition. Though it be true, that not only believers under the Old Testament were saved, but the elect angels confirmed before Christ's coming, yet both the one and the other was with a respect to Christ as their Head, and the foundation of their union with God; and out of whom, as the one, being lost, could not have been restored, so the fall of the other could not have been prevented, nor their happiness secured.

In whom we; we apostles and others elect of the Jewish nation, we who first trusted in Christ, ver. 12. Have obtained an inheritance; are called, or brought into the participation of an inheritance, or have a right given us to it as by lot: in allusion to the twelve tribes having, in the division of the land of Canaan, their inheritances assigned them by lot. He shows that they did not first seek it, much less deserve it, but God cast it upon them: their lot fell in the heavenly inheritance, when others did not. Being predestinated; this, as well as the forementioned privileges, was designed to us by eternal predestination, and though it be free, and without our procuring, yet in respect of God it is not casual, but of his ordering. Who worketh all things, powerfully and effectually, after the counsel of his own will; i. e. that infinite wisdom of God, which is always in conjunction with his will, whereby he acts wisely as well as freely, and though not by deliberation, which falls beneath his infinite perfection, yet with his greatest reason and judgment.

12 <sup>a ver. 6, 14. 2 Thess. 2. 13. 1 Cor. 1. 17. 1 Cor. 1. 17.</sup> That we should be to the praise of his glory, <sup>b</sup> who first <sup>c</sup> trusted in Christ.

That we should be to the praise of his glory; either, 1. Passively, that the excellency and greatness of God's wisdom, power, grace, mercy, &c. might be shown forth in us by our being predestinated, called, sanctified, saved: or rather, 2. Actively, that we, by the holiness, obedience, and fruitfulness of our conversations, suitable to such privileges, might manifest and set forth the glory of him that vouchsafed them to us. Who first trusted in Christ; who were the fruits of the New Testament church, the gospel having been first preached to the apostles by Christ himself, and by them to the Jews, (their own nation,) and having been first believed by them.

13 In whom ye also trusted, after that ye heard <sup>c</sup> the word of truth, the Gospel of your salvation: in whom also after that ye believed, <sup>d</sup> ye were sealed with that holy Spirit of promise,

In whom ye also; here is a defect of the verb in the Greek, which may be supplied either from ver. 11, which seems to be the principal verb in the sentence, and then it must be read, In whom ye also have obtained an inheritance; or from ver. 12, trusted, which is the nearest verb; so our translation, In whom ye also trusted; but neither way makes any difference in the scope of the words. Ye; ye Ephesians and other Gentiles. The word of truth; the gospel, so called, either, 1. By a usual Hebraism, from the true word; or, 2. By way of eminency, as containing the most excellent and necessary of all truths, the doctrine of righteousness and life by Jesus Christ; or, 3. With respect to the law and its shadows, the truth and substance of which is held forth in the gospel. The gospel of your salvation: both in respect of the matter contained in it, the doctrine of salvation, and in respect of its efficiency, as being the means whereby God works faith, and brings to salvation, Rom. i. 12; Heb. ii. 3. In whom also after that ye believed: in whom either is to be referred to believers; q. d. After ye believed in Christ: or to sealing; and then it shows by virtue of whom this benefit of sealing is bestowed, viz. by virtue of Christ. Ye were sealed with that holy Spirit; ye were secured and ascertained of your right to the inheritance; which we may understand to be done either by the Spirit's impressing upon the soul the image of God in the work of regeneration, or (because that cannot so well be understood to be after believing) rather by his testimony in men's own consciences afterward; whether immediate, by an overpowering light shining into the soul, and filling it with assurance of its interest in Christ and heaven; or mediate, enabling a man to discern that image of God in his soul, by which the Spirit bears witness to his interest in the inheritance, and assures him of it: see chap. iv. 30; Rom. viii. 16; Gal. iv. 6. Of promise; because the Spirit's coming was before promised, or because he verifies and confirms the promises in and to the hearts of believers.

14 <sup>e 2 Cor. 1. 22. 2. 5. Luke 21. 28. Rom. 8. 23. ch. 4. 30. g Acts 20. 23. h ver. 6, 12. 1 Pet. 2. 9.</sup> Which is the earnest of our inheritance <sup>f</sup> until the redemption of <sup>g</sup> the purchased possession, <sup>h</sup> unto the praise of his glory.

Which is the earnest of our inheritance: the Spirit, given to and dwelling in believers by his gifts and graces, is the earnest or pledge whereby their inheritance is secured to them; as men are secured the payment of a promised sum, by a part given beforehand in earnest for the rest. Until the redemption of the purchased possession; either, 1. The redemption of the possession is put for the possessing of the redemption, (by an hypallage,) viz. full and final redemption from sin, and death, and hell, and Satan; which redemption though perfectly wrought by Christ, is but in part applied in this life, and is to be fully enjoyed in the other: or rather, 2. (though to the same sense,) To the full and final redemption in the end of the world, of all God's people, who are here called his purchased possession: see the same word so taken, Acts xx. 28; 1 Pet. ii. 9. Unto the praise of his glory; the final salvation and complete redemption of God's people, will be especially for the glory of God, 2 Thess. i. 10.

15 Wherefore I also, <sup>i</sup> after I heard of your faith in the Lord Jesus, and love unto all the saints,

After I heard; he was an eye-witness of their first believing, but here he speaks of their increase and constancy in the faith since, of which he had heard by others. Of your faith in the Lord Jesus; i. e. not barely a belief of Christ's excellencies, but a belief of his being their Saviour, their receiving and relying on him as such, and so a believing in him as the immediate object of their faith, and him by whom they believed in God, 1 Pet. i. 21. And love unto all the saints; this is added to show the truth of their faith, which works by love. Love to the saints is mentioned, as an evidence of their love to God; and to all the saints, to show the sincerity of that love, in its not being partial, but respecting all saints, and therefore saints as saints.

16 <sup>1</sup> Cease not to give thanks for you, making mention of you in my prayers;

Cease not to give thanks for you; for your faith and love, and all the spiritual blessings God hath bestowed upon you. Making mention of you in my prayers; I not only acknowledge what ye have received, but pray that what is yet lacking in you may be made up.

17 That <sup>1</sup> the God of our Lord Jesus Christ, the Father of glory, <sup>2</sup> may give unto you the spirit of wisdom and revelation || in the knowledge of him:

That the God of our Lord Jesus Christ; he is the God of Christ not according to Christ's Divine nature, but his human, and as Mediator, in which respect he was subject to the Father. The Father of glory; the most glorious Father, and the Author of all glory and glorious things, and to whom all glory is due. May give unto you the spirit of wisdom; a greater measure (for some they already had) of faith, (as ver. 8, where it is called wisdom.) or of the knowledge of the things of God, whereof the Spirit is the Author. God is said to give or send the Spirit, where the Spirit works effectually; and, so to give the Spirit of wisdom, where the Spirit effectually works that wisdom. And revelation: by revelation he means not extraordinary, such as the prophets had, but ordinary, such as was common to believers, and expresseth the manner of the Spirit's working in this wisdom, that he doth it by removing the covering or veil of natural ignorance, (Psal. cxix. 18; Luke xxiv. 45,) shining into the mind, and making it see what before it saw not; sometimes new objects, sometimes new excellencies in objects before known. Thus the Spirit works not only in the beginning of faith and spiritual knowledge, but in its further progress he lets in new light into the mind, and removes some remaining degree of natural darkness. In the knowledge, or acknowledgment, which may imply an owning, approving, and embracing things before known. Of him; i. e. God or Christ, or God in Christ: and so either he declares here wherein the wisdom he mentioned consists, viz. the knowledge of God and Christ, in whom are hid all the treasures of wisdom and knowledge: or rather, the end of that wisdom and revelation, viz. the acknowledgment of God or Christ, when we so know him, as to own him as ours, to embrace, and love, and wholly subject ourselves to him, Col. i. 9, 10.

18 <sup>a</sup> The eyes of your understanding being enlightened; that ye may know what is <sup>b</sup> the hope of his calling, and what the riches of the glory of his <sup>c</sup> inheritance in the saints,

The eyes of your understanding being enlightened, viz. by that spirit of revelation: and so this clause explains the former. What the eye is to the body, that the understanding is to the soul. He prays for a further degree of illumination for them. That ye may know what is the hope of his calling; either, 1. The object of hope, the thing hoped for, as Col. i. 5; Gal. v. 5; and then the meaning is, what it is to the hope of which God hath called you by the gospel. Or, 2. The grace of hope: q. d. That ye may know how great, and sure, and well grounded that hope is, which by the gospel is wrought in you. And what the riches of the glory; the glorious riches, or the abundant glory; riches of glory, and riches of grace, ver. 7, and riches of glory, Rom. vi. 23. Of his; because he is the Father of it: he gives this glory as the Father of glory. As men give inheritances suitable to their estates, so God, as the God of glory, and Father of glory, gives a glorious inheritance. Inheritance; heaven, called an inheritance both in respect of believers' title to it by virtue of their adoption, being heirs of God; and in respect of the perpetuity of their enjoying it, on which account it is called an eternal inheritance, Heb. ix. 15. In the saints; or, among the saints, those, namely, that are perfect, who alone are possessed of the inheritance, which saints on earth have only in hope.

19 And what <sup>is</sup> the exceeding greatness of his power to us-ward who believe, <sup>a</sup> according to the working <sup>b</sup> of his mighty power,

And what is the exceeding greatness of his power to us-ward who believe; he means that power of God which is put forth in the whole of our salvation, from first to last: not that absolute power whereby he can do whatsoever is possible to be done; but his ordinate power, or power joined with his will, whereby not only he will work in raising us up at last, and finally saving us, but hath wrought in begetting faith in us, and doth work in still preserving that faith, (1 Pet. i. 5,) and carrying us on in the way of salvation. And this he speaks for the encouragement of the Ephesians, that they should not fear falling short of the riches of the glory of the inheritance mentioned, seeing God, who hath by his power brought them to Christ, is able likewise by the same power to bring them to glory. According to the working of his mighty power: some point the words after us-ward, and read them, who believe according to the working of his mighty power, &c.; and then the meaning must be, that the working faith in believers, is an instance of his mighty power: he hath shown his power in working faith, and therefore will show it in the remainder of salvation which is to follow. But our translation favours the former sense, and then, as in the preceding clause he shows the greatness of God's power, so in this latter the efficacy of it in its actual operation, particularly the raising up Christ from the dead.

20 Which he wrought in Christ, when <sup>c</sup> he raised him from the dead, and <sup>d</sup> set him at his own right hand in the heavenly places,

Which he wrought in Christ, when he raised him from the dead; i. e. the power God exerciseth toward believers is such as that was whereby he raised up Christ from the dead. And set him at his own right hand; hath invested him with the greatest honour, dignity, and power, as princes set the next in honour and authority to themselves at their right hands: see Matt. xx. 21. In the heavenly places; in the highest heaven, called the third heaven, 2 Cor. xii. 2, and paradise, ver. 4.

21 <sup>e</sup> Far above all <sup>f</sup> principality, and power, and might, and dominion, and every name that is named, not only in this world, but also in that which is to come:

Principality, and power, and might, and dominion: these terms are sometimes applied to magistrates and men in authority here in the world, Tit. iii. 1; Jude 8: sometimes to angels; to good ones, Col. i. 16; to evil ones, chap. vi. 12; Col. ii. 15; though with allusion to powers in the world, or because by them God puts forth and exerciseth his power and dominion. By these, then, the apostle understands good angels, as chap. iii. 10; or, comprehensively, all sorts of powers, both visible and invisible, as Col. i. 16; 1 Pet. iii. 22. And every name that is named; lest any might think he had not named all above whom Christ is exalted, he adds this, to take all in. Every name, that is, every person, and every thing which hath a name; whatever hath any dignity or excellency. Not only in this world, but also in that which is to come; because, though it hath a being at present, yet it is future to us who are not yet possessed of it. Either this clause relates to Christ's sitting at his Father's right hand, and then it notes the perpetuity of his reign, that his kingdom is an everlasting kingdom, Luke i. 33; or rather, to the words immediately going before: q. d. If there be any name, any dignity, or excellency, not known in this life, and which shall be known in the other; yet, be they what they may, Christ is above them all.

22 And <sup>g</sup> hath put all things under his feet, and gave him <sup>h</sup> to be the head over all things to the Church,

All things; either all his enemies, as Psal. cx. 1, all except the church, which is said to be his body; or all things more generally, of which he spake before, angels and men; all are made subject to Christ, 1 Pet. iii. 22. Hath put all

Or, 2. Over all things may be meant, for the communication of all good things to the church, and performing all offices of a Head to her; a Head to the church, with a power over all things for her good. To the church; the catholic church, or whole collection of believers throughout the world, and in all ages of it.

The head is incomplete without the body; Christ in his relative capacity as a Head, would not be complete without his mystical body the church. That filleth all in all: lest Christ should be thought to have any need of the church, because of her being said to be his fulness, it is added, that she herself is filled by Christ. Christ fills all his body, and all the members of it, with the gifts and graces of his Spirit, chap. iv. 10.

CHAP. II

Paul setteth before the Ephesians their former corrupt heathen state, 1—3, and God's rich mercy in their deliverance, 4—7. We are saved by grace, not of works, yet so as to be created in Christ unto good works, 8—10. They who were once strangers, and far from God, are now brought near by Christ's blood; who having abolished the ritual law, the ground of distinction between Jew and Gentile, hath united both in one body, and gained them equal access to the Father, 11—18. So that the Gentiles are henceforth equally privileged with the Jews, and together with them constitute a holy temple for the habitation of God's Spirit, 19—22.

AND <sup>a</sup> you hath he quickened, <sup>b</sup> who were dead in trespasses and sins;

And you hath he quickened; this verb quicke.ed is not in the Greek, but the defect of it may be supplied from chap. i. 19, thus, The greatness of his power to us-ward, and to you that were dead in trespasses and sins; the remaining part of that chapter being included in a parenthesis, which, though long, yet is not unusual. Or rather, as our translators and others do, from ver. 5 of this chapter, where we have the word quicken. It imports a restoring of spiritual life by the infusion of a vital principle, (in the work of regeneration,) whereby men are enabled to walk with God in newness of life. Who were dead; spiritually, not naturally; i. e. destitute of a principle of spiritual life, and so of any ability for, or disposedness to, the operations and motions of such a life. In trespasses and sins: the preposition in is wanting in the Greek by an ellipsis, but the expression is full, Col. ii. 13; this dative case therefore is to be taken in the sense of the ablative. By these words he means either all sorts of sins, habitual and actual, less or greater; or rather, promiscuously and indifferently, the same thing several ways expressed. Sin is the cause of spiritual death; where sin reigns, there is a privation of spiritual life.

2 <sup>a</sup> Wherein in time past ye walked according to the course of this world, according to <sup>d</sup> the prince of the power of the air, the spirit that now worketh in <sup>e</sup> the children of disobedience:

Wherein in time past ye walked; conversed in a continual course of life. They were alive to sin, when dead in sin; or by sin dead to spiritual good. According to the course of this world; either according to the age of the world that then was, or men then in the world, or according to the custom and mode, the shape and fashion, of the world. The same word here translated course is rendered world, Rom. xii. 2. Be not conformed (configured or fashioned) to this world, i. e. to the ways and manners of it. So here, according to the course, is, according to the ways of men in the world, both in manners and religion. According to the prince; the devil, or, as Matt. xii. 24, 26, the prince of devils. Of the power; power for powers, as they are called, chap. vi. 12: those devils, or powers of darkness, are marshalled under him as their prince, who sets up a kingdom to himself in opposition to Christ. Of the air; that are in the air, this lower region, (by God's permission,) that they may be ready and at hand to tempt men, and do mischief in the world. Or, that work so many effects in the air, raise storms and tempests, &c., as in the case of Job and his children. The spirit that now; even at this time, since the coming of the gospel, still continues to work. Worketh in; effectually works in; rules, and governs, and acts them, 2 Tim. ii. 26. The children of disobedience, by a Hebraism; they that are addicted to disobedience, i. e. obstinate sinners.

3 <sup>a</sup> Among whom also we all had our conversation in times past in <sup>b</sup> the lusts of our flesh, fulfilling <sup>c</sup> the desires of the flesh and of the mind; and <sup>d</sup> were by nature the children of wrath, even as <sup>e</sup> others.

Among whom also we all; we apostles and believers of the Jews. Either Paul by a cœnosis reckons himself among them, though not guilty with them; or rather, though he were not an idolater as the Ephesians, yet he had been a blasphemer, and a persecutor, 1 Tim. i. 13; and though he were blameless as to the righteousness of the law, Phil. iii. 6, yet that was only as to his outward conversation, and still he might fulfil the desires of a fleshly mind. Had our conversation; walked in the same way after the course of the world, &c. In the lusts of our flesh: flesh is here taken more generally for depraved natures, the whole principle of corruption in man. Fulfilling the desires of the flesh; the inferior and sensitive faculties of the soul, as appears by the opposition of the flesh to the mind. And of the mind; the superior and rational powers, to denote the depravation of the whole man even in his best part, and which seems to have rectitude left in it: to the former belongs the filthiness of the flesh, to the latter that of the spirit, 2 Cor. vii. 1: see Rom. viii. 7; Gal. v. 19—21. And were by nature; not merely by custom or imitation, but by nature as now constituted since the fall. The children of wrath, by a Hebraism, for obnoxious to wrath; as sons of death, 1 Sam. xxvi. 16, for worthy of or liable to death.

4 But God, <sup>a</sup> who is rich in mercy, for his great love wherewith he loved us,

Rich in mercy; abundant. Riches of mercy here, as riches of grace, chap. i. 7; see Psal. li. 1; lxxxvi. 5. For his great love; the fountain from whence his mercies vouchsafed to us proceed; riches of mercy from great love: God shows mercy to us miserable creatures in time, because he loved us from eternity, viz. with a love of good will. Wherewith he loved us, both Jews and Gentiles; there being the same original cause of the salvation of both.

Hath quickened us; hath raised us up from the death of sin to the life of righteousness, not only in our justification, in which God frees us from our obnoxiousness to eternal death, and gives us a right to eternal life, who before were dead in law. (though this may be included,) but especially in our regeneration, by the infusion of a vital principle. Together with Christ; either, 1. God, in quickening Christ, hath also quickened us; Christ's quickening, or receiving his life after death, being not only the type and exemplar of our spiritual enlivening or regeneration, but the cause of it, inasmuch as we are quickened, as meritoriously by his death, so effectually by his life: Christ, as having died and risen again, exerciseth that power the Father gave him of quickening whom he will, John v. 21. Or, 2. In Christ as our Head virtually, and by the power of his resurrection actually. Or, 3. By the same power whereby he raised up Christ from the dead, chap. i. 20. See the like expression, Col. ii. 13. (By grace are ye saved;) some read the words without a parenthesis, supplying by whose, and so refer them to Christ, quickened us together with Christ, by whose grace ye are saved; but if the parenthesis stand, yet here seems to be a connexion with the foregoing words, at least a reason of the apostle's bringing in these; for having mentioned God's great love, ver. 4, as the cause of their spiritual enlivening here, which is the beginning of their salvation, he infers from thence that the whole of their salvation is of grace, i. e. alike free, and as much out of God's great love, as the beginning of it, viz. their quickening, is.

6 And hath raised us up together, and made us sit together <sup>m</sup> in heavenly places in Christ Jesus:

And hath raised us up together; either this may be understood of a further degree of spiritual life in the progress of sanctification vouchsafed to believers in this world; or rather, of the resurrection of the body, which is said to be raised together with Christ, because it is to be raised by the same power that raised him up, and by virtue of his resurrection, in which we have fellowship with him, as being united to him. And made us sit together in heavenly places in Christ Jesus, as our Head, and representative. Our spiritual enlivening (ver. 5) we have not only fundamentally in Christ when restored to life, but actually begun in ourselves in our effectual calling; but the resurrection of our bodies, and our sitting in heaven, we have not as yet actually fulfilled in ourselves, yet have it in Christ our Head, who rose for us and we in him, and sits in heaven for us, and we in him may be said to sit there too, by reason of our union with him, and being members of him.

7 That in the ages to come he might shew the exceeding riches of his grace in <sup>n</sup> his kindness toward us through Christ Jesus.

That in the ages to come; in all succeeding generations while the world continues. He might show, &c.; as in an instance or specimen, 1 Tim. i. 16; q. d. God's kindness to us believers in this age, since Christ's coming, is such an instance of the exceeding riches of his grace, as may be an encouragement to future generations to embrace the same Christ in whom we have believed. Through Christ Jesus; by and through whom God conveys all saving benefits to us.

8 ° For by grace are ye saved <sup>p</sup> through faith; and that not of yourselves: <sup>q</sup> it is the gift of God:

For by grace, the free favour of God, as ver. 5, are ye, even ye Ephesians, Gentiles, who had not such promises made to you as the Jews had, ver. 12, saved, from first to last, from your calling, ver. 5, to your glorification, ver. 6. Object. How are believers said to be saved, when they are not yet glorified? Ans. 1. Because Christ their Head is glorified. 2. Because their salvation, begun in their effectual calling, shall be as certainly accomplished in them as it is begun in them, and perfected in their Head, Christ. Through faith; by which ye lay hold on the grace offered you in the gospel. Faith is not considered here as a work done by us, but as an instrument or means applying the grace and salvation tendered to us. And that not of your- selves; not for your own worth, nor by your own strength. It is the gift of God; that ye are saved is the gift of God, and therefore free and purely by grace. God is opposed to self: gift relates not merely to faith immediately preceding, but to the whole sentence.

9 ° Not of works, lest any man should boast.

Not of works; any works whatever, and not only works of the ceremonial law: for if they only were excluded, the opposition between God and man, grace and works, were not right, which yet we find so often elsewhere; (see Rom. xi. 6;) men might not be saved by works of the ceremonial law, and yet still be saved by works, and of themselves. Lest any man should boast; glory in their own works or worth, as men are apt to do when they think they have any thing of their own which contributes to their salvation - see Rom. iii. 27; iv. 2.

10 For we are <sup>r</sup> his workmanship, created in Christ Jesus unto good works, <sup>s</sup> which God hath before ordained that we should walk in them.

For we, we believers, both Jews and Gentiles, are his workmanship; not only as men, but especially as saints, which is the proper meaning here. The Israelitish people formerly were God's work, Deut. xxxii. 6; Isa. xliii. 21; xlv. 21; so are believers under the gospel, being new creatures, Gal. vi. 15. The apostle confirms what he said before, that by grace we are saved, and not of works, in that we are God's workmanship, and are formed by him ere we can do any good work; and his forming us in our regeneration is a part of the salvation mentioned ver. 8. Created in Christ Jesus; who, as our Head, enlivens us, as members united to him by faith. As the first creation was by Christ as the Second Person in the Trinity, John i. 3, so the second creation is by the same Christ as Mediator, the Lord and Head of the new creation, in whom we live, and move, and have our new being, and not in ourselves, 2 Cor. v. 17. Unto good works; as the immediate end for which we are new-created. We receive our new being that we may bring forth new works, and have a carriage suitable to our new principle. Which God hath before ordained; or rather, as the margin, prepared, i. e. prepared and fitted us for them, by enlightening our minds to know his will, disposing and inclining our wills, purging our affections, &c. That we should walk in them; i. e. that we should glorify God in a holy conversation, agreeable to that Divine nature, whereof we are made partakers in our new creation.

11 Wherefore <sup>t</sup> remember, that ye being in time past Gentiles in the flesh, who are called Uncircumcision by that which is called <sup>u</sup> the Circumcision in the flesh made by hands;

In the flesh; either, 1. Carnal, unregenerate, as Rom. viii. 8, 9. Or rather, 2. Uncircumcised in the flesh, as well as in heart, Ezek. xlv. 7; such as neither had the grace signified, nor the sign representing it. Who are called Uncircumcision, by way of reproach; to be uncircumcised being the badge of them that were not Israelites, and so were not in the number of God's people. By that which is called the Circumcision in the flesh made by hands; i. e. by those that are circumcised; the abstract here, as in the former clause, being put for the concrete. He means the carnal Jews, who had the circumcision of the flesh which was made with hands, but not that of the heart, Rom. ii. 29, made without hands, Col. ii. 11.

12 ° That at that time ye were without Christ, <sup>v</sup> being aliens from the commonwealth of Israel, and strangers from <sup>w</sup> the covenants of promise, <sup>x</sup> having no hope, and without God in the world:

That at that time ye were without Christ; i. e. without knowledge of him, or interest in him. This is the foundation of all other miseries, as Christ is the foundation of all saving good, and therefore the apostle begins with this. Being aliens from the commonwealth of Israel; the church of God, confined formerly to the Israelites: their church and state was the same body, and God the founder of and lawgiver to them in both respects. And strangers from the covenants of promise; those covenants in which the great promise of Christ and salvation by him was made. The covenants were several, as that with Abraham, and that by Moses, and differ in some accidents, but the promise in them was one and the same, which was the substance of each. Having no hope; viz. beyond this life; as they could not but be who were without Christ, and without the promises. And without God; not without some general knowledge of a God, but without any saving knowledge of him, as not knowing him in Christ: or they lived as without God, neglecting him, and being neglected by him, and suffered to walk in their own ways. In the world; which is the congregation of the wicked, and is here opposed to the church.

d Gal. 3. 28. 13 <sup>a</sup>But now in Christ Jesus ye who sometimes were <sup>e</sup>far off are made nigh by the blood of Christ.

But now in Christ Jesus; either in the kingdom of Christ, or gospel administration, Gal. v. 6; or, ye being in Christ, united to him by the Spirit and faith. Being in Christ, here, is opposed to being in the world, ver. 12. Ye who sometimes were far off; far from God, from his church, from his promises, &c., having no communion with him by his Spirit. He means a spiritual distance, yet seems to allude to Isa. xlix. 1, 12; those Gentiles there mentioned being estranged from God in their hearts, as well as removed from his people in place. Are made nigh; brought into a state of communion with God and his people, and participation of their privileges, and right to the promises. By the blood of Christ; the merit of his death expiating sin, (which caused this distance,) and so making way for their approach to God, and enjoyment of gospel blessings.

For he is our peace; i. e. Peace-maker, or Mediator of peace, both between God and man, and between Jew and Gentile. He is called our peace, as elsewhere our righteousness, redemption, salvation. God is said to reconcile us, 2 Cor. v. 19, but Christ only to be our peace. Who hath made both one; i. e. one body, or one people, or one new man, ver. 15. And hath broken down the middle wall of partition between us; having taken away the ceremonial law, which was as a wall of separation between Jew and Gentile, as appears in the next ver. It seems to be an allusion to that wall of the temple which parted between the court of the people into which the Jews came, and the outmost court, that of the Gentiles, who, when they came to worship, might not come into the other court, and were excluded by this wall.

h Col. 2. 14. i Col. 1. 22. k 2 Cor. 5. 17. Gal. 6. 16. ch. 4. 24. 15 <sup>h</sup>Having abolished <sup>i</sup>in his flesh the enmity, even the law of commandments contained in ordinances; for to make in himself of twain one <sup>k</sup>new man, so making peace;

Having abolished; abrogated, taken away the power of binding men. In his flesh; not the flesh of sacrificed beasts, but his own flesh: before he mentioned his blood, and now his flesh, to imply the whole sacrifice of Christ, comprehending his flesh as well as blood. The ceremonies had their accomplishment in Christ, and so their abolishment by him. The enmity; by a metonymy he so calls the ceremonies, which were the cause and the sign of enmity between Jew and Gentile: the Jews hated the Gentiles as uncircumcised, and the Gentiles despised the Jews for being circumcised. Even the law of commandments contained in ordinances: either, by the law of commandments, the apostle means the law of ceremonial rites, and by the word which we render ordinances, he means doctrine, and then (the word contained not being in the Greek) the sense is, that Christ, by his doctrine or commandments, abolished those ceremonial rites: the word commandments seems thus to be used, Deut. xvi. 12; 1 Kings ii. 3; Ezek. xviii. 21.

Or else (which yet comes to the same) the word rendered ordinances signifies such ordinances as depended upon the sole will of the lawgiver; and is, Col. ii. 14, taken for ceremonial ones, and so is to be taken here. This the apostle seems to add, to show what part of the law was abrogated by Christ, viz. nothing of the moral law, but only the ceremonial. For to make, or create, or form, in opposition to abolish. In himself; by union with himself, as the Head, in which the several members agree. Of twain; two bodies, or two people, Jews and Gentiles. One new man; i. e. new body, or new (viz. Christian) people. As the body of a commonwealth is one civil person, so the body of the church is in a like sense one person. So making peace, between Jew and Gentile, having taken away those ceremonial laws, which were the cause of the difference between them.

16 And that he might <sup>l</sup>reconcile both unto God in one body by the cross, <sup>m</sup>having slain the enmity || thereby:

And that he might reconcile both unto God; another end of Christ's abolishing the ceremonial law, viz. that he might reconcile both Jew and Gentile (all the elect together) unto God: and in this respect especially he is our peace. In one body; either both people united as one mystical body, or rather this one body here, is the body of Christ offered up to God as the means of reconciliation, Col. i. 22. By the cross; i. e. by the sacrifice of himself upon the cross. Having slain the enmity thereby; the enmity between God and man, by the expiation of sin, the cause of it. Of this enmity the ceremonial law was a witness, Col. ii. 14, as well as a sign of that between Jew and Gentile.

17 And came <sup>n</sup>and preached peace to you which were afar off, and to <sup>o</sup>them that were nigh.

And came; partly in his own person, as to the Jews, and partly by his apostles, whom he appointed to preach the gospel to the Gentiles: so 2 Cor. xiii. 3. And preached peace to you which were afar off; far from the knowledge of the truth, from Christ, and salvation by him, as ver. 13. And to them that were nigh; nigh in comparison of the Gentiles, nigh by the knowledge of God and his law, and the promises of the Messiah: see Isa. lviii. 19.

18 For <sup>p</sup>through him we both have access <sup>q</sup>by one Spirit unto the Father.

For through him, as our Mediator and Peace-maker, who hath reconciled us to God, we both have access, are admitted or introduced, by one Spirit unto the Father; by the Holy Ghost, who is our Guide to lead us to the Father, as Christ is the way by which we go to him, John xiv. 6. As there is but one Mediator through whom both Jews and Gentiles come to God, so but one and the same Spirit, chap. iv. 4.

19 Now therefore ye are no more strangers and foreigners, but <sup>r</sup> fellow-citizens with the saints, and of <sup>s</sup>the household of God;

Now therefore ye are no more strangers and foreigners; such are they that may dwell in a city, but are not free of it. He means the same as ver. 12, they were not now all us from the commonwealth of Israel, &c. But fellow citizens with the saints; members of the same spiritual society or corporation with other saints, patriarchs, prophets, &c. The church of God is compared to a city, of which every saint is a member or free-man, Phil. iii. 20. And of the household of God: the church is here compared to a house, as 1 Tim. iii. 15. They are said to be of the household that belong to it, but especially the children. Among men, servants are counted domestics; but with God, none but his children.

as the only Mediator between God and man, the only Saviour and head of the church: see 1 Cor. iii. 11. Foundation, in the singular number, to imply the unity of their doctrine centring in Christ: apostles and prophets, whose office was to preach, not kings and patriarchs. Jesus Christ himself being the chief corner-stone; as both supporting the building by his strength, and uniting the several parts of it, Jew and Gentile: see Matt. xxi. 42; Psal. cxviii. 22. They that are of chief authority are called the corners of a people, as sustaining the greatest burden, 1 Sam. xiv. 38; Isa. xix. 13. Object. If Christ be the corner-stone, how is he the foundation? Ans. The same thing may have different denominations in different respects; Christ is called a foundation, 1 Cor. iii. 11, a corner-stone, 1 Pet. ii. 6, a temple, John ii. 19, a door, John x. 7, a builder, Matt. xvi. 18; so here again a corner-stone, and yet laid for a foundation, Isa. xxviii. 16.

21 *In whom all the building fitly framed together groweth unto *an holy temple in the Lord :

In whom; or upon whom, viz. Christ the foundation. All the building; whatsoever is built on Christ the foundation, and so all particular believers, as the several parts of the building. Fitly framed together; joined and united both to Christ the foundation by faith, and to each other by love. Growth; either, 1. Ariseth; the building goeth on till it comes to be a temple. Or, 2. It notes the stones or materials of the house to be living ones, receiving life from Christ, 1 Pet. ii. 5. Growth supposeth life. The verb is in the present tense, to signify that the builders are still at work, and this temple not yet finished. Unto an holy temple; in allusion to the temple at Jerusalem; whereas the holy of holies was a type of heaven, so the temple itself was a type of the church, both as it was the place of God's presence, and of his worship. In the Lord: either this must be joined to growth, and then it is a pleonasm, the antecedent being here repeated, though the relative had been expressed, and it implies the growth of believers (the materials of this spiritual building) to be from Christ; or it may be joined with holy, and then it signifies that they have their holiness from Christ; or it may be read, holy to the Lord, and then it expresses the nature of this temple, that it is undefiled, consecrated to the Lord, and meet for him.

22 *In whom ye also are builded together for an habitation of God through the Spirit.

An habitation of God; a temple where God may dwell. Not only the whole collection of believers is called the temple of God, but particular churches and particular saints are so called, because of God's dwelling in them by his Spirit: see 1 Cor. iii. 16, 17; vi. 19. Through the Spirit: this may relate either to the words immediately going before, an habitation of God, and then the meaning is, an habitation or temple in which God dwells by his Spirit; or to the verb builded, and then they import the building of them into a temple to be the operation of the Spirit, working that faith and love in them whereby they are united to Christ the foundation, and to the several parts of the building.

CHAP. III

Paul, in bonds for preaching Christ to the Gentiles, showeth that the mystery of their calling, heretofore hidden, had been revealed to him, 1-6; that by his ministry God's gracious purpose might be universally known, and the Gentiles be assured of their acceptance by faith, 7-12. He desireth his Ephesian converts not to be discouraged at his sufferings on their account, 13; and prayeth that God would strengthen their faith and knowledge of the infinite love of Christ, 14-19. He giveth glory to God for his power in the church by Christ Jesus, 20, 21.

FOR this cause I Paul, *the prisoner of Jesus Christ <sup>b</sup> for you Gentiles,

For this cause; i. e. that ye may be further confirmed in the faith of Christ, and more and more built up in him as an habitation of God, chap. ii. 22. The prisoner of Jesus Christ; for Christ's sake, for asserting his cause and honour: see 2 Tim. i. 8; Philem. 1, 9. For you Gentiles; for your cause and salvation; having preached and declared the grace of God to be free, and to belong to you Gentiles as well as to the Jews, (the middle wall of partition being taken away,) and so equalled you with them. There is no small difference among expositors about the connexion of these words: the fairest and easiest seems to be, either, 1. That the substantive verb am be here supplied, and the word read, I Paul am the prisoner of Jesus Christ; q. d. I have for some time been and still am the prisoner of Jesus Christ. Or, 2. That this verse be joined to the 14th. (all the rest, ver. 2-13, being included in a parenthesis,) where he begins with the same words as here; and so we may read it thus, ver. 1. For this cause I Paul, the prisoner, &c.; and then, ver. 14, I say, For this cause I bow my knees, &c., viz. praying that ye may be strengthened with might by his Spirit, &c.; i. e. that they might be more and more built up on Christ, on whom they were founded, and had begun to be built.

2 (If ye have heard of *the dispensation of the grace of God <sup>d</sup> which is given me to you-ward :

If ye have heard; this doth not imply doubting, but rather the apostle takes the thing for granted; q. d. Seeing ye have heard; and so some render it. See the like, 1 Pet. ii. 3. Of the dispensation of the grace of God: either by grace he means his apostleship, as Rom. i. 5; Gal. ii. 9; or the free grace of God for salvation revealed in the gospel which he was to preach; and then by dispensation we must understand his commission or ordination of God to that work, viz. to publish that grace whereof the ministers of the gospel are the dispensers, 1 Cor. iv. 1. Which is given me to you-ward; to you Ephesians and other Gentiles, for whom particularly I am appointed an apostle, Acts ix. 15; xvi. 17, 18; Gal. ii. 7.

3 *How that <sup>e</sup>by revelation <sup>e</sup>he made known unto me the mystery; (<sup>b</sup>as I wrote <sup>f</sup> afore in few words,

That the Gentiles should be fellow heirs; i. e. have an equal right to the heavenly inheritance with the believing Jews. And of the same body; the same mystical body whereof Christ is the Head. And partakers of his promise; the great promise of the covenant, which comprehends all the rest under it. In Christ; in whom all the promises

7 <sup>p</sup>Whereof I was made a minister, <sup>q</sup>according to the gift of the grace of God given unto me by <sup>r</sup>the effectual working of his power.

According to the gift of the grace of God; either according to the free gift of God, and which was given merely of grace; or by gift he understands all those several gifts (as of knowledge, utterance, &c.) which were the necessary qualifications and furniture of an apostle for the due discharge of his office, all which were freely given to him. Given unto me by the effectual working of his power; whereby God made him a preacher of the gospel, who had been a persecutor of believers, and wrought effectually by the Spirit with his preaching for the conversion of thousands, and spreading the gospel in many countries; and likewise wrought miracles for the confirmation of the truth, and conviction of hearers, Acts xix. 12; xxviii. 8.

8 Unto me, <sup>s</sup>who am less than the least of all saints, is this grace given, that <sup>t</sup>I should preach among the Gentiles <sup>u</sup>the unsearchable riches of Christ;

Who am less than the least of all saints; this the apostle speaks considering his former estate in Judaism, when he persecuted the church of Christ: so 1 Cor. xv. 9; 1 Tim. i. 13, 15. Thus modest is the apostle, when speaking of himself, and not of his office. The unsearchable riches of Christ; all that grace of Christ which he was to make known to the Gentiles in his preaching, wisdom, righteousness, sanctification, redemption, 1 Cor. i. 30.

9 And to make all <sup>v</sup>men see what <sup>w</sup>is the fellowship of <sup>x</sup>the mystery, <sup>y</sup>which from the beginning of the world hath been hid in God, <sup>z</sup>who created all things by Jesus Christ:

To make all men; all those to whom the apostle was sent. See; or, to enlighten them; i. e. ministerially, Acts xxvi. 18; as to enlighten them principally belongs to Christ, John i. 9. What is the fellowship of the mystery; or communication of the mystery, viz. concerning the salvation of the Gentiles without circumcision, or the works of the law, which God now made known by Paul's ministry, contrary to what the Jews believed. Which from the beginning of the world hath been hid in God; not revealed to men as to the circumstances and manner of it, but hid in the mind and purpose of God: see the like, chap. i. 9. Who created all things by Jesus Christ; this may be understood either of the first creation, or the second, or immediately of the first, and by that of the second; as God created all things at first, (and so both Jews and Gentiles,) and gave them their being, by Christ, John i. 3; so he recreates, regenerates, and gives them a new being, by Christ, that they may be of the same body under him: see the like, 2 Cor. iv. 6.

10 <sup>a</sup>To the intent that now <sup>b</sup>unto the principalities and powers in heavenly places <sup>c</sup>might be known by the Church the manifold wisdom of God,

Principalities and powers in heavenly places; good angels, Col. i. 16; 1 Pet. iii. 22. Might be known by the church; not effectually, as a teacher or instructor of angels present in church assemblies; but objectively, as a mirror in which they might behold and contemplate the manifold wisdom of God. The manifold wisdom of God: exceedingly, or many ways, various. The Divine wisdom is in itself one simple thing, but appearing in so great variety of works, it is said to be various. This may be best understood of the whole economy of men's redemption, and God's governing his church in several ages, the several forms of the church, the various ways of revealing the Divine will, the different measures of light let out in different times, the different dispensations of the covenant of grace before the law, under the law, under the gospel, to the Jews, to the Gentiles, &c.

11 <sup>d</sup>According to the eternal purpose <sup>e</sup>which he purposed in Christ Jesus our Lord:

According to the eternal purpose: all that God doeth in the work of our redemption, whereby he sets forth his manifold wisdom, he doeth according to what he had from eternity purposed to do, and therein likewise shows his wisdom, to which it belongs to order and determine things before the doing of them, and then to do them as they have been ordered. Which he purposed in Christ Jesus our Lord; not only as the eternal Wisdom of the Father, but as designed in God's decree to be the Head of the church, and he by whom God would in time execute his eternal purpose.

12 In whom we have boldness and <sup>f</sup>access <sup>g</sup>with confidence by the faith of him.

In whom; or by, or through whom, or into whom being ingrafted and incorporated. We have boldness, or freeness of speech. It signifies that liberty and spiritual security, whereby we come to God as to a Father, in the freedom of children, not the fear of slaves, Rom. viii. 15; Gal. iv. 6; 1 John iii. 21. And access; not only in prayer, but all the communion we have with God by faith in Christ, 1 Pet. iii. 18. With confidence; either securely without fear, (as before,) or with confidence of acceptance with God, and obtaining what we ask. By the faith of him; i. e. faith in him, as Rom. iii. 22: see the like, Mark xi. 22.

13 <sup>h</sup>Wherefore I desire that ye faint not at my tribulations <sup>i</sup>for you, <sup>j</sup>which is your glory.

Wherefore I desire; I pray you. This is an exhortation to the Ephesians, not a prayer to God, for that follows, ver. 14. That ye faint not at my tribulations for you; the truth I have preached to you being the cause of my sufferings, and your salvation (to which they tend as a means to confirm your faith) being the end of them. Which is your glory; either he means, that their not fainting, or not falling away from Christ, by reason of his sufferings, was their glory; or rather, that his sufferings were their glory, in that he did by them seal the truth of the doctrine he had preached, being still ready to suffer for what he delivered to them.

14 For this cause I bow my knees unto the Father of our Lord Jesus Christ,

For this cause; this may be referred either to the former verse, For this cause, viz. that ye faint not, &c.; or rather to the 1st verse, the apostle here resuming what he had been beginning there.

15 Of whom <sup>k</sup>the whole family in heaven and earth is named,

Of whom; either of God, or rather of Christ, last mentioned. The whole family, or kindred, the church of God being his household, chap. ii. 19. In heaven and earth; all the saints, both which are already in glory, and which yet live upon the earth, wherever or whoever they be, Jews or Gentiles. Is named: to be named, or called, implies the thing as well as the name. Isa. vii. 14; Luke i. 35. The whole family is named of Christ; i. e. of him they are, as well as are called, Christians, and the church of God. The Jews boasted of Abraham as their father; but now all believers, even Gentiles, are one family of God's people, and upon them the name of Christ is called.

16 That he would grant you, <sup>l</sup>according to the riches of his glory, <sup>m</sup>to be strengthened with might by his Spirit in <sup>n</sup>the inner man;

The riches of his glory; i. e. the abundance of his power: see Rom. vi. 4. To be strengthened with might; further degrees of spiritual strength, proceeding from God's power as the fountain. By his Spirit; as the immediate worker of all inherent grace. In the inner man; the reasonable powers of the soul as renewed by grace, the same as heart in the next verse, and spirit, 1 Thess. v. 23: see 2 Cor. iv. 16.

That Christ; on whom this Spirit (who must strengthen you, as being a Spirit of might, Isa. xi. 2) resteth, Isa. lxi. 1. May dwell in your hearts; may intimately and continually possess and fill, not your heads only with his doctrine, but your affections with his Spirit: see John xiv. 23. By faith; whereby ye not only believe Christ's truth, but receive and apprehend himself, and which is the means by which ye have union and communion with him. That ye, being rooted and grounded in love: either he means, 1. Our love to God and our neighbour; and then he prays that their love might not be slight and superficial, but strong and firm. Or, 2. God's love to us; and then he prays that the Ephesians, who had already tasted God's love to them in Christ, might be more fully strengthened in the persuasion of that love.

<sup>q</sup> ch. 1. 18. 18 <sup>a</sup> May be able to comprehend with Rom. 10. 3, and Phil. 1. 12, 13, all saints what is the breadth, and length, and depth, and height;

May be able to comprehend, more fully and perfectly to perceive and understand, with all saints, which are or have been, what is the breadth, and length, and depth, and height, the immense vastness, dignity, and perfection; either, 1. Of redemption by Christ, extending both to Jew and Gentile, and so the mystery before mentioned. Or rather, 2. Of the love of Christ, as follows.

19 And to know the love of Christ, which passeth knowledge, that ye might be filled with all the fulness of God.

And to know, sensibly and experimentally to perceive in yourselves, the love of Christ, which passeth knowledge; which, though it may in a greater degree than hitherto be known and experienced, yet never can be in this life fully and absolutely understood and comprehended: see ver. 8, and the like expression, Phil. iv. 7. That ye might be filled with all the fulness of God; all that fulness of knowledge, faith, love, holiness, and whatsoever it is with which God fills believers gradually here, and perfectly hereafter, when God shall be all in all, 1 Cor. xv. 28.

20 Now unto him that is able to do exceeding abundantly above all that we ask or think, according to the power that worketh in us,

Now unto him; i. e. God the Father. That is able to do exceeding abundantly above all that we ask or think; and therefore is able to establish you to the end, and do all for you that hath been desired. According to the power that worketh in us; the exceeding greatness of his power, chap. i. 19; whereby God works faith, and preserves to salvation, 1 Pet. i. 5, and enables to bear afflictions, 2 Tim. i. 8.

21 Unto him be glory in the Church by Christ Jesus throughout all ages, world without end. Amen.

Unto him be glory in the church; the whole church of Jews and Gentiles. The church only knows the mystery and partakes of the benefits before mentioned, and therefore the church only can rightly glorify God for them. By Christ Jesus; either in Christ, in whom the Father hath displayed all his love to us; or rather by (according to our version) Christ, as the Mediator between God and us; by whom we offer up our services to God, praises as well as prayers, Rom. i. 8; vii. 25. Throughout all ages; or, through all generations.

CHAP. IV

Paul exhortheth to those virtues which become the Christian calling, particularly to unity, 1—6; declaring that Christ gave his gifts differently, that his body the church might be built up and perfected in the true faith by the co-operation of the several members with one another, and with him their Head, 7—16. He calleth men off from the vain and impure conversation of the heathen world, 17—21; to renounce the old, and to put on the new man, 22—24; to discard lying, 25, and sinful anger, 26, 27; to leave off dishonest practices, and to gain by honest labour what they have occasion for, 28; to use no corrupt talk, 29, nor grieve God's Spirit, 30; to put away all expressions of ill-will, and to practise mutual kindness and forgiveness, 31, 32.

I THEREFORE, the prisoner of the Lord, beseech you that ye walk worthy of the vocation wherewith ye are called,

The prisoner of the Lord; marg. in the Lord, a Hebraism: it is as much as, for the Lord: see chap. iii. 1. Beseech you that ye walk worthy; proceed constantly and perseveringly in such ways as suit with and become your calling, 1 Thess. iv. 7; 1 Pet. i. 15: see the like expression, Rom. xvi. 2, and in the places in the margin. Of the vocation wherewith ye are called; both your general calling, whereby ye are called to be saints, and your particular callings, to which ye are severally called, as chap. v. and vi.

2 With all lowliness and meekness, with longsuffering, forbearing one another in love;

With all lowliness, or humility; submissiveness of mind, whereby we esteem others better than ourselves, Phil. ii. 3. A virtue peculiar to Christians, unknown to philosophers: see Acts xx. 19; Col. iii. 12, 13. And meekness; whereby we are not easily provoked, or offended with the infirmities of others: this is opposed to peevishness, as the former to pride. With long-suffering; whereby we bear with greater or repeated injuries, 2 Cor. vi. 6. Forbearing one another; or supporting, i. e. bearing with the infirmities, frowardness, or moroseness of others, so as not to cease to love them, and do them good. In love; not out of any carnal affection, or for our own advantage, but out of love, which is wont to make men patient and long-suffering, 1 Cor. xiii. 4.

3 Endeavouring to keep the unity of the Spirit in the bond of peace.

The unity of the Spirit; either unity of mind, or spiritual unity, as being wrought by the Spirit, and then he means that unity he spoke of, chap. ii. 14—16, and iii. 6, whereby is intended the mystical body of Christ. In the bond of peace; i. e. in peace as the bond which keeps the members or parts of the church together, which by dissensions are dissipated and scattered. The first step to this unity is humility, for where that is not, there will be no meekness nor forbearance, without which unity cannot be maintained.

4 There is one body, and one Spirit, even as ye are called in one hope of your calling;

There is one body; i. e. the church of Christ, chap. i. 23: see Col. iii. 15. And one Spirit; the self-same Spirit of Christ in that body by which all the members live and act, 1 Cor. xii. 11, 13. Even as ye are called in one hope of your calling; one inheritance in heaven, to the hope of which ye are called, Col. i. 12. Hope, for the thing hoped for, as Col. i. 5: see 1 Pet. i. 3, 4.

5 One Lord, one faith, one baptism, one Lord; Christ, viz. as Redeemer, Head, and Husband of the church, to whom, by God's appointment, she is immediately subject, 1 Cor. viii. 6; John xiii. 13; Acts ii. 36. One faith; i. e. one object of the faith of all believers, viz. the doctrine of salvation, which is but one. One baptism; both as to the outward symbol, and the thing signified by it.

6 One God and Father of all, who is above all, and through all, and in you all.

One God; God is here taken personally for the Father, the other two Persons being before mentioned, ver. 4, 5. And Father of all; of all believers. Who is above all; not only in the excellencies of his nature, but especially in his sovereign dominion over the church. And through all; by his special providence, through all the members of the church. And in you all; by inhabitation, and the conjunction of believers with him. Though the former two may be applied to God's universal dominion and providence over all the creatures, yet, the apostle speaking of the conjunction of believers in one Father, they are both to be restrained according to this last clause.

n Rom. 12. 3, 6. 1 Cor. 12. 11.

7 But <sup>a</sup>unto every one of us is given grace according to the measure of the gift of Christ.

But unto every one of us is given grace; either by grace he means gifts which are not common to all believers, but proper to some, according to their various functions and places in the church, Rom. xii. 6; 1 Cor. xii. 11. Or rather, more generally, it comprehends also those graces which are common to all believers as such, faith, hope, love, zeal, &c.; which, though they are of the same kind in all, and have the same object, yet they are received in different degrees and measures. According to the measure of the gift of Christ; in that measure in which it pleaseth Christ to give them, who gives to some one gift, to some another; to some one degree of grace, to some another: all have not the same, but need the help of those that have what they want.

o Pa. 68. 16. p Judg. 5. 12. Col. 2. 15. q Or, a multitude of captives.

8 Wherefore he saith, <sup>o</sup> When he ascended up on high, <sup>p</sup> he led captive, and gave gifts unto men.

Wherefore he saith; the psalmist. When he; Christ, God manifested in the flesh: and then what was spoken by the psalmist prophetically in the second person, is spoken by the apostle historically in the third. Ascended up on high; Christ ascended up on high after his death, both as to place, in his human nature, into heaven; and chiefly as to his state, in his being glorified. He led captive; either led those captive who had taken us captive, or rather led them captive whom he had taken captive; captivity being here put for captives, as elsewhere poverty for poor, 2 Kings xxiv. 14. This Christ did when, having conquered sin, death, Satan, he triumphed gloriously over them in his ascension, Col. ii. 15. It is spoken with allusion to conquering princes or generals, who in their triumphs had their captives attending upon their chariots. And gave gifts unto men; he alludes in this likewise to the custom of conquerors casting money among the people that were the spectators of their triumphs, or giving largesses to their soldiers. Christ upon his ascension sent the Holy Ghost on the disciples, Acts ii., and continues ever since to furnish his church with gifts and graces: see on Psal. lxxviii. 18.

q John 3. 13. & 6. 32.

9 <sup>q</sup> (Now that he ascended, what is it but that he also descended first into the lower parts of the earth?)

Now that he ascended, what is it but that he also descended first? the apostle interprets the psalmist, and concludes, that David, when he foretold Christ's glorification, or ascending up to heaven, did likewise foresee his humiliation and descent to the earth: q. d. When David speaks of God in the flesh ascending up on high, he doth thereby imply, that he should first descend to the earth. Into the lower parts of the earth; either simply the earth, as the lowest part of the visible world, and so opposed to heaven, from whence he came down, John iii. 13; vi. 33, 38, 41, 42, 50, 51; or the grave and state of the dead; or both rather, implying the whole of his humiliation, in opposition to his ascending, taken for the whole of his exaltation.

r Acts 1. 5, 11. s Tim. 3. 16. Heb. 4. 14. & 7. 26. & 8. 1. & 9. 24. t Acts 2. 33. u Or, fulfil.

10 He that descended is the same also that ascended up far above all heavens, that he might fill all things.)

He that descended is the same also that ascended: he saith not, he that ascended is the same that descended, lest it should not be thought that Christ brought his body with him from heaven; but, on the contrary, he that descended is the same that ascended, to show that the Son of God did not by his descent become other than what he was, nor the assumption of the human nature add any thing to his person, as a man is not made another person by the clothes he puts on. Christ descended without change of place as being God, but ascended by changing place as man, yet, by communication of properties, whole Christ is said to have ascended. Far above all heavens; all visible heavens, into the third heaven, or paradise. Acts iii. 21; Heb. ix. 24. That he might fill all things; all the members of his church, with gifts and graces. This began to be fulfilled, Acts ii., and still will be fulfilling to the end of the world: see John vii. 39; xvi. 7.

v 1 Cor. 12. 28. ch. 2. 20.

11 And he gave some, apostles; and some, prophets; and some, evangelists; and some, pastors and teachers;

u Acts 21. 8. v Tim. 4. 6. x Acts 20. 23. y Rom. 12. 7.

And he gave; distributed several gifts, (which are spoken of in general, ver. 7.) according to his Father's appointment, who is said to set in the church what Christ is here said to give. 1 Cor. xii. 28. Object. Nothing is here said of gifts, but only of offices. Answ. Christ never gave offices without suitable furniture; this diversity therefore of offices includes diversity of respective gifts. Apostles; extraordinary officers, with an immediate call, universal commission, infallibility in teaching, and power of working miracles, appointed for the first founding the Christian church in all parts of the world, Matt. xxviii. 19; Acts xix. 6. Object. The apostles were appointed by Christ before his death. Answ. The apostle here speaks not of Christ's first calling them, but, 1. Of his fully supplying them with gifts necessary to the discharge of their office, which was after his resurrection, Acts i. 4; John vii. 39. And, 2. Of their solemn inauguration in their office, by the pouring out of the Holy Ghost upon them in a visible manner, Acts ii. Prophets; extraordinary officers who did by immediate revelation interpret the Scriptures, 1 Cor. xiv. 4, 5, and not only such as did foretell things to come, Acts xi. 27; xxi. 10. Evangelists; these were likewise extraordinary officers, for the most part chosen by the apostles, as their companions and assistants in preaching the word, and planting churches in the several places where they travelled. Such were Timothy, Titus, Apollos, Silas, &c. Pastors and teachers; either two names of the same office, implying the distinct duties of ruling and teaching belonging to it; or two distinct offices, but both ordinary, and of standing use in the church in all times; and then pastors are they that are fixed to and preside over particular churches, with the care both of instructing and ruling them, 1 Thess. v. 12; Heb. xiii. 17; called elsewhere elders, and bishops, Acts xx. 28; Phil. i. 1; 1 Tim. iii. 1; Tit. i. 5, 7; 1 Pet. v. 1, 2. Teachers; they whose work is to teach the doctrine of religion, and confute the contrary errors.

12 For the perfecting of the saints, for the work of the ministry, for the edifying of the body of Christ:

z 1 Cor. 12. 7. a 1 Cor. 14. 26. b ch. 1. 23. Col. 1. 24.

For the perfecting of the saints; either for the restoring and bringing them into right order, who had been, as it were, dissipated, and disjointed by sin; or rather the knitting together and compacting them more and more, both in nearer union to Christ their Head by faith, and to their fellow members by love: see 1 Cor. i. 10. For the work of the ministry; or, for the work of dispensation, i. e. for dispensing the word, and all those ordinances which it appertains to them to dispense; and so it implies their whole work. But there may be a trajection in the words, and then this clause is to be read before the former, and the meaning plainly is, For the work of the ministry, which is to perfect the saints, and edify the body of Christ. For the edifying of the body of Christ; the same in effect as perfecting the saints, viz. the building up the church, both in bringing in new members to it, and strengthening those that are brought in already, in faith and holiness.

13 Till we all come in the unity of the faith, and of the knowledge of the Son of God, unto a perfect man, unto the measure of the stature of the fulness of Christ:

1 Or, into the unity. c Col. 2. 2. d 1 Cor. 14. 20. Col. 1. 28. e Or, age.

Till we all come, or meet; all we believers, both Jews and Gentiles, (who while in the world not only are dispersed in several places, but have our several degrees of light and knowledge,) meet, or come together, in the unity of, &c. In the unity of the faith; either that perfect unity whereof faith is the bond, or rather that perfect uniformity of faith in which we shall all have the same thoughts and apprehensions of spiritual things, to which as yet, by reason of our remaining darkness, we are not arrived. And of the knowledge of the Son of God; or acknowledgment, i. e. not a bare speculative knowledge, but such as is joined with appropriation and affection. Unto a perfect man: he compares the mystical body of Christ to a man, who hath his several ages and degrees of growth and strength, till he come to the height of both, and then he is a perfect man, or a man simply, in opposition to a child, 1 Cor. xiii. 11. The church of Christ (expressed by a man, in the singular number, to show its unity) hath its infancy, its childhood, its youth, and is to have hereafter its perfect manhood and state of consistency in the other life, when, being arrived to its full pitch, it shall be past growing. Unto the measure of the stature of the fulness of Christ; either actively, that measure of stature or age which Christ fills up in it, or hath allotted to it, ver. 7; or rather passively, that measure which, though it do not equal, yet it shall resemble, being perfectly conformed to the fulness of Christ. As in the 12th verse he showed the end of Christ's appointing officers in his church, so here he shows how long they are to continue, viz. till their work be done, the saints perfected, which will not be till they all come to the unity of the faith, &c.

14 That we henceforth be no more <sup>c</sup>children, <sup>t</sup>tossed to and fro, and carried about with every <sup>w</sup>wind of doctrine, by the sleight of men, and cunning craftiness, <sup>w</sup>whereby they lie in wait to deceive;

That we henceforth be no more children; i. e. weak in the faith, unstable in judgment, children in understanding, 1 Cor. xiv. 20; such as need teaching, and strengthening; see Rom. ii. 20; 1 Cor. iii. 1; Heb. v. 13. Tossed to and fro; light and unconstant, like ships without ballast, tossed with every wave. And carried about with every wind of doctrine; not only shaken and staggering as to our faith, (as in the former clause.) but carried about to errors for want of judgment, by false doctrines, here compared to violent winds. By the sleight of men; their sophistry, whereby they easily seduce those that are unskilful, as men easily cheat children in playing at dice, from whence this metaphor is taken. Cunning craftiness; their skillfulness in finding out ways of deceiving, whereby they can make any thing of any thing. Whereby they lie in wait to deceive, viz. as in ambush; the word here used, is translated wiles, chap. vi. 11, against which the apostle would have them fenced with the whole armour of God, and seems to signify a laying in ambush, or assaulting a man behind his back; a secret and unseen way of circumventing, a laying wait to draw them that are weak from the truth.

15 But <sup>i</sup> speaking the truth in love, <sup>m</sup>ay grow up into him in all things, <sup>o</sup>which is the head, even Christ;

But speaking the truth in love; or, following the truth in love; q. d. Not only let us not be seduced by the craftiness of men, but constantly adhere to, and persevere in, the belief of the truth, joining love with it, in which two the sum of Christianity consists; and this will be a means of our growing up, and being no more children. May grow up; this is opposed to being children; we are not to stand at a stay, but grow to maturity, Heb. vi. 1. In all things; in knowledge, faith, love, and all the parts of the new man. Into him which is the head, even Christ; our growth must be with respect to Christ our Head, as the end of it; we must grow in our acknowledgment of him, and dependence on him, as he by whom we are influenced, and from whom all our proficiency and strength proceeds; so that whatever increase we make, must tend not to the magnifying ourselves, but exalting our Head.

16 <sup>m</sup>From whom the whole body fitly joined together and compacted by that which every joint supplieth, according to the effectual working in the measure of every part, maketh increase of the body unto the edifying of itself in love.

From whom; Christ the Head, ver. 15. The whole body; the mystical body, or church of believers, whereof every true saint is a member, Rom. xii. 4, 5. Fitly joined together; viz. in the right place and order, both in respect of Christ the Head, and of the members respectively. Some are eyes, some ears, some hands, some feet, 1 Cor. xii. 15, 16. And compacted; firmly knit, so as not to be separated. By that which every joint supplieth; or, by every joint or junction of administration; i. e. whose office is to administer spirits and nourishment to the body. Bands are added to joints, Col. ii. 19, which signifies the ligaments by which the joints are tied one to another, as well as the joints in which they touch. Quest. What are those joints and bands in the mystical body? Ans. Every thing whereby believers are joined to Christ, or to each other as Christians; especially the Spirit of Christ, which is the same in the Head and all the members; the gifts of the Spirit, chiefly faith, whereby they are united to Christ, and love, whereby they are knit to each other; the sacraments, likewise, church officers, ver. 11, &c. According to the effectual working; either the power of Christ, who, as a Head, influenceth and enliveneth every member; or the effectual working of every member, in communicating to others the gifts it hath received. In the measure of every part; according to the state, condition, and exigence of every part, nourishment is conveyed to it meet for it; yet more to one and less to another, according as more is required for one and less for the other, and so to all in their proportion. Or else as each part hath received, so it communicates to others; all have their use and helpfulness to others, but not all alike, or in the same degree. Maketh increase of the body: either body here redounds by a Hebraism, and the sense is, the body (mentioned in the beginning of the verse) maketh increase of itself; or, without that redundancy, increase of the body is an increase meet and convenient for the body. Unto the edifying of itself: the apostle here changeth the metaphor from that of a body to this of a house, but to the same sense, and shows the end of this nourishment they ministered from one member to another, viz. not its own private good, but the good of the whole body, for the benefit of which each part receives its gifts from Christ the Head. In love; either by the offices of love, or it denotes the impulsive cause, whereby the members are moved thus to promote the common increase of the body, viz. love to the Head and each other.

17 This I say therefore, and testify in the Lord, that <sup>y</sup>e henceforth walk not <sup>n</sup> as other Gentiles walk, <sup>o</sup>in the vanity of their mind,

This I say therefore, and testify in the Lord; I beseech or adjure you by the Lord: see the like, Rom. xii. 1; Phil. ii. 1. That ye henceforth walk not as other Gentiles walk, in the vanity of their mind; their minds themselves, and understandings, the highest and noblest faculties in them, being conversant about things empty, transient, and unprofitable, and which deceive their expectations, and therefore vain, viz. their idols, their worldly enjoyments, &c.

18 <sup>p</sup>Having the understanding darkened, <sup>q</sup>being alienated from the life of God through the ignorance that is in them, because of the <sup>r</sup>blindness of their heart:

Having the understanding; the mind as reasoning and discoursing, and so their ratiocinations and discourses themselves. Darkened; as to spiritual things. Being alienated from the life of God; not only strangers to it, (for so are those creatures which are not capable of it,) but estranged from it; implying, that in Adam originally they were not so. The life of God; a spiritual life; that life which God commands, and approves, and whereby God lives in believers, and they live in him, Gal. ii. 19, 20; and that both as to the principle of life, and the operations of it. Through the ignorance that is in them; that ignorance which is naturally in them is the cause of their alienation from the life of God, which begins in light and knowledge. Because of the blindness of their heart; or rather hardness: the Greek word signifies a callum or brawniness in the flesh, which is usual in the hands of labourers. Either this is set down as another cause of their estrangement from the life of God, or as the cause of their ignorance, which, though in part it be natural to them, yet is increased to further degrees by their own hardness and obstinacy, shutting their eyes voluntarily against the light.

If so be that ye have heard him; either heard Christ speaking to you in the gospel, Heb. xii. 25, and then the sense will be the same as in the following clause; or heard him preached to you, and then it may refer to the outward hearing of the word. And have been taught by him; or taught in him; in for by, as Col. i. 16; Heb. i. 2; and then this relates to the power of the word, and the impression made by it upon the heart: q. d. 22 That ye "put off concerning "the former conversation "the old man, which is corrupt according to the deceitful lusts;

That ye put off; a usual metaphor, taken from garments (implying a total abandoning, and casting away, like a garment not to be put on again): it is opposed to putting on, ver. 24, and is the same as mortifying, Col. iii. 5, crucifying, Gal. vi. 14. Concerning the former conversation; the former heathenish life and manners, chap. ii. 2. He shows how they should put off their old man, viz. by relinquishing their old manners; the same as putting off the old man with his deeds, Col. iii. 9. The old man; the pravity of nature, or nature as depraved. Which is corrupt; or, which corrupteth, i. e. tends to destruction, Gal. vi. 8; or, which daily grows worse and more corrupt by the fulfilling of its lusts. According to the deceitful lusts; i. e. which draw away and entice men, James i. 14; or which put on a show and semblance of some good, or promise pleasure and happiness, but lurch men's hopes, and make them more miserable.

23 And "be renewed in the spirit of your mind;

And be renewed; viz. more and more, being already renewed in part. In the spirit of your mind; i. e. in your mind which is a spirit: see 1 Thess. v. 23; 2 Tim. iv. 22. He means the superior powers of the soul, where regeneration begins, and which the philosophers magnified so much, and thought so pure.

24 And that ye "put on the new man, which after God "is created in righteousness and "true holiness.

And that ye put on; the same metaphor of a garment as before, to show the intimateness of the new man with us, and its being an ornament to us. The new man; i. e. a new disposition or constitution of the whole man, called the new creature, 2 Cor. v. 17, and a divine nature, 2 Pet. i. 4. Which after God; after God's image. Is created in righteousness and true holiness; either righteousness may relate to the second table, and holiness to the first, and so both contain our duty to man and to God; or righteousness may imply that Divine principle in us, whereby we perform our whole duty to God and the creature, and holiness that which denieth all mixture of corruption in our duty to God and man. True; sincere and sound. As righteousness and holiness are opposed to lusts, ver. 22, so true here, to deceitful there.

25 Wherefore putting away lying, "speak every man truth with his neighbour: for "we are members one of another.

Wherefore putting away lying; all fraudulency and dissimulation, and whatever is contrary to truth. Speak every man truth; not only speak as things are, but act sincerely and candidly. For we are members one of another; i. e. to or for one another, and therefore must be helpful to each other.

26 "Be ye angry, and sin not: let not the sun go down upon your wrath:

f Ps. 4. 4.
& 37. 8.

Be ye angry and sin not: by way of concession, rather than by way of command: q. d. If the case be such that ye must be angry, yet see it be without sin. Let not the sun go down upon your wrath; if your anger is excessive, (for so this word signifies, being different from the former,) yet let it not be lasting; be reconciled ere the sun go down.

Do not give advantage to the devil to possess your hearts, and put you upon more and greater evils: see Luke xxii. 3; John xiii. 27; Acts v. 3.

Let him that stole steal no more; stealing is understood largely for seeking our own gain by any way, defrauding others, whether by taking away, or unjustly detaining what is theirs. But rather let him labour; i. e. diligently and industriously, as the word imports. Idleness is condemned as tending to theft. Working with his hands; as the only instrument by which most arts and trades are exercised. The thing which is good; not in any unlawful way, but in an honest calling. That he may have to give to him that needeth; that he may have not only whereupon to live, and prevent stealing, but wherewith to help those that want, Luke xxi. 2.

proceed out of your mouth, but "that which is good "to the use of edifying, "that it may minister grace unto the hearers.

Let no corrupt communication; unprofitable, unsavoury, not seasoned with the salt of prudence, Col. iv. 6: see Mark ix. 50. To the use of edifying; Gr. to the edification of use, by an hypallage, for, to the use of edifying, as our translators render it, implying, that the great use of speech is to edify those with whom we converse. But the same word translated use, signifies likewise profit, and necessity, and, by a Hebraism, this (as the latter substantive) may be instead of an adjective, and the words translated, to useful, or profitable, edifying, or, (according to the marginal reading,) to edify profitably, with little difference of sense from the former: or, to necessary edifying; and then it respects the condition and necessities of the hearers, to which our discourse must be suited by way of instruction, reprehension, exhortation, or consolation, as their case requires. That it may minister grace to the hearers; by which some grace may be communicated to or increased in them, by instruction, reprehension, exhortation, &c.

tion; see chap. i. 14; 2 Cor. i. 22: so, Ezek. ix. 4, they are marked that are to be delivered; and Rev. vii. 3, the servants of God are sealed that were to escape the following plagues. Unto the day of redemption; i. e. full and final salvation at the resurrection: see Luke xxi. 28; Rom. viii. 23.

31 <sup>q</sup> Let all bitterness, and wrath, and anger, and clamour, and <sup>r</sup> evil speaking, be put away from you, <sup>s</sup> with all malice:

Let all bitterness, and wrath, and anger; these all seem to relate to the inward affection, as the two following to the effects of it in the words. Bitterness may imply a secret lurking displeasure at another, or rather a confirmed and permanent one; wrath, the first boiling up of the passion, which affects the body in the commotion of the blood and spirits; and anger, a greater height and paroxysm of the same passion, or an eager desire of revenge: see Col. iii. 8. And clamour; such inordinate loudness as men in anger are wont to break out into in their words. And evil speaking; either with respect to God or man, though the latter seems particularly meant here; railing, reviling, reproaching, &c., the ordinary effects of immoderate anger. With all malice; maliciousness, or malignity of heart, in opposition to kindness and tenderness, ver. 32: see Rom. i. 29; 1 Cor. v. 8; xiv. 20; Tit. iii. 3.

32 <sup>t</sup> And <sup>u</sup> be ye kind one to another, tenderhearted, <sup>v</sup> forgiving one another, even as God for Christ's sake hath forgiven you.

And be ye kind; sweet, amiable, facile in words and conversation, Luke vi. 35. Tender-hearted; merciful, quickly moved to compassion: so we have bowels of mercies, Col. iii. 12. Forgiving one another, even as God for Christ's sake hath forgiven you; be placable, and ready to forgive, therein resembling God, who for Christ's sake hath forgiven you more than you can forgive to one another.

CHAP. V

Paul exhorteth to the imitation of God, and of the love of Christ, 1, 2: to avoid fornication and all uncleanness, 3, 4; which exclude from the kingdom of God, and draw down God's wrath on unbelievers, 5, 6; with whose works of darkness Christians, that have better light to inform and influence them, should have no fellowship, 7—14: to walk with prudence and circumspection, 15—17: not to drink wine to excess, but to be filled with the Spirit, singing psalms, and giving thanks to God, 18—20; and being in due subordination to one another, 21. The duty of wives toward their husbands, 22—24; and of husbands toward their wives, enforced by the example of Christ and his church, 25—33.

BE <sup>a</sup> ye therefore followers of God, as dear children;

Be ye therefore followers of God; particularly in being kind, and forgiving injuries, Matt. v. 45, 48; so that this relates to the last verse of the former chapter. As dear children; viz. of God. Children should imitate their fathers, especially when beloved of them.

2 <sup>b</sup> And <sup>c</sup> walk in love, <sup>d</sup> as Christ also hath loved us, and hath given himself for us an offering and a sacrifice to God <sup>e</sup> for a sweetsmelling savour.

And walk in love; let your whole conversation be in love. As Christ also hath loved us, and hath given himself for us; viz. to die for us, Gal. ii. 20, as the greatest argument of his love, John xv. 13; Rom. v. 8. An offering and a sacrifice to God: either offering signifies a meat-offering, which was joined as an appendix with the bloody sacrifice; or rather more generally, all the oblations that were under the law; and the word sacrifice either restrains it to those especially in which blood was shed for expiation of sin, or explains the meaning of it: q. d. Christ gave himself an offering, even a sacrifice in the proper sense, i. e. a bloody one. For a sweet-smelling savour; i. e. acceptable to God; alluding to the legal sacrifices, (see Gen. viii. 21; Lev. i. 9.) and intimating those other to have been accepted of God, only with respect to that of Christ; and that as Christ dying to reconcile sinners to God was acceptable to him, so our spiritual sacrifices are then only like to be accepted of him, when we are reconciled to our brother, Matt. v. 23, 24.

3 <sup>e</sup> But <sup>f</sup> fornication, and all uncleanness, or covetousness, <sup>g</sup> let it not be once named among you, as becometh saints;

But fornication; folly committed between unmarried persons, especially men's abuse of themselves with common strumpets, a sin not owned as such among the heathen. And all uncleanness; all other unlawful lusts whereby men defile themselves. Or covetousness; either an insatiable desire of gratifying their lusts, as chap. iv. 19; or rather an immoderate desire of gain, which was usual in cities of great trade, as Ephesus was: see ver. 5. Let it not be once named among you; not heard of, or not mentioned without detestation: see Psal. xvi. 4; 1 Cor. v. 1. As becometh saints, who should be pure and holy, not in their bodies and minds only, but in their words too.

4 <sup>h</sup> Neither filthiness, nor foolish talking, nor jesting, <sup>i</sup> which are not convenient: but rather giving of thanks.

Neither filthiness; obscenity in discourse, filthy communication, Col. iii. 8. Nor foolish talking; affectation of foolish, vain speech, (whether jocose or serious,) unprofitable, to the hearers. Nor jesting; either the same as the former, as may seem by the disjunctive particle nor, which may be by way of explication; or (which is of kin to it) scurrility in discourse, which is many times, by them that are addicted to it, called by the name of urbanity, or jesting: for all that jesting is not here condemned appears by 1 Kings xviii. 27; Isa. xiv. 11. Which are not convenient; viz. for saints. But rather giving of thanks; i. e. to God for mercies received, which will better cheer up and recreate the mind than foolish talking and jesting can.

5 <sup>j</sup> For this ye know, that <sup>k</sup> no whoremonger, nor unclean person, nor covetous man, <sup>l</sup> who is an idolater, <sup>m</sup> hath any inheritance in the kingdom of Christ and of God.

Nor covetous man, who is an idolater; because he serves Mammon instead of God, loves his riches more than God, and placeth his hope in them. Hath any inheritance; without repentance; for he speaks of those that persevere in such sins, whom he calls children of disobedience, ver. 6. In the kingdom of Christ and of God; not two distinct kingdoms, but one and the same, which belongs to God by nature, to Christ as Mediator. By this phrase he intimates, that there is no coming into the kingdom of God but by Christ.

6 <sup>n</sup> Let no man deceive you with vain words: for because of these things <sup>o</sup> cometh the wrath of God <sup>p</sup> upon the children of disobedience.

Vain words; false and deceitful, which cannot secure to you the impunity they promise you, bearing you in hand, either that those things are not sins, or not so dangerous. The wrath of God; viz. in the other world.

7 <sup>q</sup> Be not ye therefore partakers with them. With those children of disobedience, who continue in the forementioned sins: see Job xxxiv. 8; Psal. i. 18.

For ye were sometimes darkness; the same as in darkness, Rom. ii. 19; 1 Thess. v. 4; viz. the darkness of sin, ignorance, unbelief. The abstract being put for the concrete, shows the greatness of that darkness in which they were. But now are ye light in the Lord; either now, being in Christ, ye are light, or rather, ye are enlightened or made light by Christ, being furnished with spiritual knowledge, faith, purity, and holiness. Walk as children of light; a Hebraism; children of light, for those that are

Gal. 5. 22. 9 (For *the fruit of the Spirit is in all goodness and righteousness and truth ;)

The fruit of the Spirit ; either in the fruit or work of the new nature, or of the Holy Ghost, by whom we are made light in the Lord : see Gal. v. 22. In all goodness ; either a general virtue in opposition to wickedness, or benignity and bounty. Righteousness ; in opposition to injustice, by covetousness, fraud, &c. Truth ; in opposition to error, lies, hypocrisy. He shows what it is to walk as children of light.

10 *Proving what is acceptable unto the Lord.

Searching what the will of the Lord is, and approving it by your practice as the rule of your walking, Rom. xii. 2.

11 And *have no fellowship with *the unfruitful works of darkness, but rather *reprove them.

Have no fellowship with ; not only do not practise them yourselves, but do not join with others in them, by consent, advice, assistance, or any other way whereby ye may be defiled by them. The unfruitful ; by a meiosis, for bringing forth evil fruit, destructive, pernicious, Rom. vi. 21 ; Gal. vi. 8. Works of darkness ; wicked works, so called because they proceed from darkness in the mind, the ignorance of God, and men are put upon them by the devil, the prince of darkness, and because they are afraid of the light. But rather reprove them ; or convince them, viz. not only by your words, Lev. xix. 17 ; Matt. xviii. 15, but especially by your actions, which being contrary to them, will both evidence them to be, and reprove them as being, works of darkness.

12 *For it is a shame even to speak of those things which are done of them in secret.

For it is a shame even to speak of those things ; much more to have fellowship with them in them. Which are done of them in secret ; the darkness adding boldness, as if what men did not see, God did not observe.

13 But *all things that are || reprov'd are made manifest by the light : for whatsoever doth make manifest is light.

But all things ; or all those things, viz. those unfruitful works of darkness, which are to be reprov'd. Are made manifest ; i. e. in the minds and consciences of the sinners themselves. By the light ; the light of doctrine in verbal reproofs, and of a holy life in real and practical ones. For whatsoever doth make manifest is light ; or, it is the light which manifests every thing, viz. which was before in the dark. The apostle argues from the nature and office of light ; q. d. It is the property of light to discover and manifest what before was not seen, and therefore it becomes you who are light in the Lord to shine as lights in the world, Phil. ii. 15, that ye may by your holy conversation convince wicked men of their wickedness, and deeds of darkness, which they did not before perceive in themselves.

14 Wherefore || he saith, *Awake thou that sleepest, and *arise from the dead, and Christ shall give thee light.

He saith ; either God by the prophets, of whose preaching this is the sum ; it may allude in particular to Isa. lx. 1. Or, Christ by his ministers, in the preaching of the gospel, who daily calls men to arise from the death of sin by repentance, and encourageth them with the promise of eternal life. Awake thou that sleepest, and arise from the dead ; the same thing in two different expressions. Sinners in some respects are said to be asleep, in others, to be dead. They are as full of dreams and vain imaginations, and as unfit for any good action, as they that are asleep are for natural ; and they are as full of stench and loathsomeness as they that are dead. Here therefore they are bid to awake from sin as a sleep, and to arise from it as a death. The meaning is, that they should arise by faith and repentance out of that state of spiritual death in which they lie while in their sins. And Christ shall give thee light ; the light of peace and joy here, and eternal glory hereafter. The apostle intimates, that what is the way of Christ in the gospel should likewise be the practice of these Ephesians, whom he calls light in the Lord, viz. to reprove the unfruitful works of darkness, and awaken sleeping, dead sinners, and bring them to the light of Christ.

15 *See then that ye walk circumspectly, not as fools, but as wise,

See then that ye walk circumspectly ; being called to reprove the evil conversation of others, see that ye walk exactly and accurately yourselves, avoiding extremes and keeping close to the rule. See the same word rendered diligently, Matt. ii. 8, and perfectly, 1 Thess. v. 2. Not as fools ; who are destitute of spiritual wisdom, and through carelessness fall into sin or error, though in the light of the gospel. But as wise ; those that are taught of God, and are ended with wisdom from above.

16 *Redeeming the time, 'because the days are evil.

Redeeming the time ; or, buying the opportunity : a metaphor taken from merchants, that diligently observe the time for buying and selling, and easily part with their pleasure for gain ; q. d. Deny yourselves in your ease, pleasure, &c. to gain an opportunity of doing good. Because the days are evil ; either wicked, by reason of the wickedness of those that live in them, or troublesome, full of difficulties and dangers, by reason of men's hatred of you, and so either depriving you of the opportunity of doing good, or exposing you to hazards for doing it.

17 *Wherefore be ye not unwise, but *understanding 'what the will of the Lord is.

Understanding, diligently considering, what the will of the Lord is, in the understanding of which your chief wisdom consists.

18 And *be not drunk with wine, wherein is excess ; but be filled with the Spirit ;

Wherein, in which drunkenness, is excess ; profuseness, lasciviousness, and all manner of lewdness, as the effects of drunkenness, Prov. xxiii. 29, &c. But be filled with the Spirit ; the Holy Spirit, often compared to water ; or the joy of the Spirit, in opposition to being filled with wine, Acts ii. 13, and that carnal mirth which is caused by it : q. d. Be not satisfied with a little of the Spirit, but seek for a greater measure, so as to be filled with the Spirit. See Psal. xxxvi. 8 ; John iii. 34 ; iv. 14.

19 Speaking to yourselves 'in psalms and hymns and spiritual songs, singing and making melody in your heart to the Lord ;

Speaking, &c. ; in opposition to the vain chaff and lewd talkativeness of drunkards over their cups. To yourselves ; Gr. in yourselves, i. e. among yourselves, both in church assemblies and families. In psalms, and hymns, and spiritual songs ; under these names he comprehends all manner of singing to mutual edification and God's glory. The particular distinction of them is uncertain, but most take psalms to be such as anciently were sung with musical instruments ; hymns, such as contained only matter of praise ; spiritual songs, such as were of various matter, doctrinal, prophetic, historical, &c. : see on Col. iii. 16. Singing and making melody in your heart ; not only with your voice, but with inward affection, contrary to the guise of hypocrites. To the Lord ; to the glory of God, not for the pleasure of the sense, or for gain, &c.

20 *Giving thanks always for all things unto God and the Father *in the name of our Lord Jesus Christ ;

Giving thanks always : God still by fresh mercies gives fresh occasion for thanksgiving, and we must accordingly continue our thanksgiving through the whole course of our lives without weariness. For all things ; all sorts of mercies, among which afflictions may be reckoned, as working for good to them that love God, Rom. viii. 28. Unto God and the Father; i. e. unto God even the Father, the Fountain of all our good. In the name of our Lord Jesus Christ; in whose name, and by whose merit, all good things are given to us, and by whom we offer up all our prayers, and praises, and spiritual services, that they may be accepted of God.

21 <sup>o Phil. 2. 3.</sup> <sup>1 Pet. 5. 5.</sup> Submitting yourselves one to another in the fear of God.

Submitting yourselves one to another, viz. to those to whom ye ought to be subject in natural, civil, or church relations. In the fear of God; either for fear of offending God, the Author of all power, who commands this subjection; or so far as is consistent with the fear of God, and so in those things which are not forbidden of him.

22 <sup>p Gen. 3. 16.</sup> <sup>1 Cor. 14. 24.</sup> <sup>Col. 3. 18.</sup> <sup>Tit. 2. 5.</sup> <sup>1 Pet. 3. 1.</sup> <sup>q ch. 6. 5.</sup> Wives, submit yourselves unto your own husbands, <sup>a</sup> as unto the Lord.

Wives, submit yourselves unto your own husbands; yielding honour and obedience to them. As unto the Lord; for the Lord's sake who hath commanded it, so that ye cannot be subject to him without being subject to them: see 1 Tim. ii. 12.

23 <sup>r 1 Cor. 11. 3.</sup> For <sup>s</sup> the husband is the head of the wife, even as <sup>t</sup> Christ is the head of the Church: and he is the saviour of <sup>u</sup> the body.

For the husband is the head of the wife; superior to her by God's ordination in authority and dignity, as the head in the natural body, being the seat of reason, and the fountain of sense and motion, is more excellent than the rest of the body. Even as Christ is the head of the church: see chap. i. 22; Col. i. 18. The particle as notes not equality, but likeness, Christ being the Head of the church in a more excellent way than the husband is of the wife. And he is the saviour of the body; i. e. Christ is the Saviour of his church, implying that so likewise the husband is given to the wife to be a saviour to her, in maintaining, protecting, and defending her; and therefore the wife, if she regard her own good, should not grudge to be subject to him.

24 Therefore as the Church is subject unto Christ, so let the wives <sup>v</sup> be to their own husbands <sup>w</sup> in every thing.

As the church is subject to Christ, viz. with cheerfulness, chastity, humility, obedience, &c. So let the wives be to their own husbands; in imitation of the church's subjection to Christ, as a pattern of their subjection to their husbands. In every thing; understand, to which the authority of the husband extends itself.

25 <sup>x Col. 3. 19.</sup> <sup>1 Pet. 3. 7.</sup> <sup>y Acta 20. 28.</sup> <sup>Gal. 1. 4.</sup> <sup>z 2. 20. ver. 2.</sup> Husbands, love your wives, even as Christ also loved the Church, and <sup>a</sup> gave himself for it;

Husbands, love your wives, even as Christ also loved the church, viz. with a sincere, pure, ardent, and constant affection. As they resemble Christ in the honour they have of being the heads of their wives, so they must likewise in performing the duty of loving them, under which all matrimonial duties are comprehended. And gave himself for it; whereby he testified the greatness of his love.

26 That he might sanctify and cleanse it <sup>b</sup> with the washing of water <sup>c</sup> by the word,

That he might sanctify; purify from its filth, and consecrate unto God: implying the whole translation of it out of a state of sin and misery into a state of grace and life, consisting in the remission of sin, and renovation of nature. And cleanse it; or, cleansing it, importing the means whereby he works the former effect. With the washing of water, viz. in baptism, in which the external washing represents seals, and exhibits the internal cleansing from both the guilt and defilement of sin by the blood of Christ, Heb. ix. 14; Rev. i. 5. By the word; the word of the gospel, especially the promise of free justification and sanctification by Christ, which received by faith is a means of this sanctification, and without which the external washing is ineffectual; the sign, without the word whereof it is a seal, being no sacrament

27 <sup>b 2 Cor. 11. 5.</sup> <sup>Col. 1. 22.</sup> <sup>c Cant. 4. 7.</sup> <sup>d ch. 1. 4.</sup> That he might present it to himself a glorious Church, <sup>e</sup> not having spot, or wrinkle, or any such thing; <sup>f</sup> but that it should be holy and without blemish.

That he might present it to himself; hereafter in heaven; that the whole church of the elect may be present with him, 2 Cor. v. 6, 8; 1 Thess. iv. 17. A glorious church; perfect in knowledge and holiness, shining with a heavenly glory, and fully conformed to himself, 1 John iii. 2. Not having spot; spot of sin, in allusion to spots in garments. Or wrinkle; any relic of old Adam, in allusion to wrinkles in the body, which are signs of old age, and imply deformity. Or any such thing, viz. which is contrary to the beauty of the church, and might make her displeasing to Christ her Husband. Without blemish; without any fault to be found in her. He seems to allude to the sacrifices, which were to be without blemish, Lev. i. 3: see Cant. iv. 7.

28 So ought men to love their wives as their own bodies. He that loveth his wife loveth himself.

So ought men to love their wives as their own bodies; with the same kind of love wherewith they love their own bodies. The woman at first was taken out of the man, and on that account the wife may be said to be a part of her husband. He that loveth his wife loveth himself; either this explains the former, and himself here is the same as their own bodies before; or it adds to it, and is as much as, his own person, the wife being another self, one flesh, the same person (in a civil sense) with her husband.

29 For no man ever yet hated his own flesh; but nourisheth and cherisheth it, even as the Lord the Church:

No man; none in his right senses; or no man hates his flesh absolutely, but the diseases or miseries of it. His own flesh; his body. Nourisheth and cherisheth it; feeds and clothes it, and supplies it with things necessary for it. Even as the Lord the church, which he furnisheth with all things needful to salvation.

30 For <sup>e</sup> we are members of his body, <sup>f</sup> of his flesh, and of his bones.

We are members of his body; his mystical body. Of his flesh, and of his bones; as Eve was of Adam's, Gen. ii. 23; only that was in a carnal way, this in a spiritual, as by the communication of Christ's flesh and blood to us by the Spirit we are united to him, and members of him.

31 For this cause shall a man leave his father and mother, and shall be joined unto his wife, and they <sup>g</sup> two shall be one flesh.

For this cause; because the woman was formed of the flesh and bones of the man. He refers to Adam's words, Gen. ii. 24. Shall a man leave his father and mother; as to cohabitation, and domestic conversation; or, let a man rather leave his father and mother than not cleave to his wife. The apostle doth not cancel the obligations of other relations, but prefers this before them. They two shall be one flesh; i. e. one body, or one man, viz. by the marriage bond, whereby each hath power over the other's body, 1 Cor. vii. 4.

32 This is a great mystery: but I speak concerning Christ and the Church.

This is a great mystery; either, this that was spoken before of a marriage union between Christ and the church, and its being of his flesh and of his bones, is a great mystery, and so in the latter part of the verse the apostle explains himself. Or, this that was said of the conjunction of Adam and Eve was a great mystery, (i. e. a great secret in religion,) as being a type of Christ's marriage with his church; though not an instituted type appointed by God to signify this, yet a kind of natural type, as having a resemblance to it.

33 Nevertheless <sup>h</sup> let every one of you in particular so love his wife even as himself; and the wife <sup>i</sup> see that she <sup>j</sup> reverence her husband.

Nevertheless; q. d. Setting aside this mystery; or, to return to my former exhortation. Love his wife even as himself; as her that is one flesh with him. Reverence her husband; or fear, yet not with a servile, but ingenuous fear, and such as proceeds from love.

CHAP. VI

The relative duties of children, 1—3, and parents, 4; of servants, 5—8, and masters, 9. Paul exhorteth the brethren to resist spiritual enemies by putting on the whole armour of God, 10—17, and by perseverance in prayer, which he requireth for all saints, and particularly for himself, that he might preach the gospel with due boldness, 18—20. He commendeth Tychicus, 21, 22; and concludeth with good wishes to all sincere Christians, 23, 24.

CHILDREN, *obey your parents in the Lord: for this is right.

Obey your parents; with inward reverence and promptness, as well as in the outward act. In the Lord; either, because the Lord commands it; or, in all things agreeable to his will: see chap. v. 21; Acts v. 29. For this is right, or just, every way so, by the law of nature, of nations, and of God.

2 <sup>b</sup> Honour thy father and mother; which is the first commandment with promise;

Mal. i. 6. Ecclus. 3. 8. Matt. 15. 4. Mark 7. 13.

1. e. A special promise annexed to the particular duty commanded. There being promises added to only two commandments, viz. the second and this fifth; that which is annexed to the second commandment is a general one, and which relates to the whole law, but this a special one, and which respects this commandment in particular.

3 That it may be well with thee, and thou mayest live long on the earth.

That thou mayest live long and happily. This promise is still fulfilled to believers, either in the thing itself here promised, or in a better way, God's giving them eternal life.

4 And, <sup>e</sup> ye fathers, provoke not your children to wrath: but <sup>d</sup>bring them up in the nurture and admonition of the Lord.

Provoke not your children to wrath; viz. by unreasonable severity, moroseness, unrighteous commands, &c. But bring them up in the nurture; or correction, as the word signifies, Heb. xii. 6—8. And admonition; this denotes the end of the former; instruction in their duty must be, as well as correction to drive them to it. Of the Lord; the Lord Jesus Christ; and so it is either that admonition which is commanded by him, or whereby they are brought to be acquainted with him.

5 <sup>e</sup> Servants, be obedient to them that are <sup>f</sup>your masters according to the flesh, <sup>f</sup>with fear and trembling, <sup>g</sup>in singleness of your heart, as unto Christ;

Servants; these servants were generally slaves: Christian liberty doth not take away civil servitude. Be obedient to them that are your masters; whether good or bad, as, 1 Pet. ii. 18, is expressly said. According to the flesh; as to your outward state, not as to your souls and consciences. With fear and trembling; either with reverence and fear of offending them, and being punished by them, see Rom. xiii. 4; or rather, with humility, as appears by Psal. ii. 11; 1 Cor. ii. 3; 2 Cor. vii. 15; Phil. ii. 12: compare Rom. xi. 20. In singleness of your heart; sincerity, and without guile. As unto Christ, who hath commanded this obedience, and whom ye obey in yielding it to your masters.

6 <sup>h</sup> Not with eyeservice, as men-pleasers; but as the servants of Christ, doing the will of God from the heart;

Not with eyeservice; not merely having respect to your masters' presence, and looking upon you in your work. As men-pleasers; such as make it their only business to please their masters, right or wrong, and ingratiate themselves with them, though by offending God. But as the servants of Christ; as becomes the servants of Christ, or as those that are the servants of Christ, and seek to please him. Doing the will of God; performing obedience to your masters not barely as their will, but God's will, who requires it, as ver. 5.

7 With good will doing service, as to the Lord, and not to men:

With good will doing service; not grudgingly or as of constraint, but freely and cheerfully. As to the Lord, and not to men; not only regarding men your masters, but Christ your great Master. That which is done for the worst masters, and in the hardest things, is service done to Christ, when out of love to him servants bear their masters' folly or cruelty.

8 <sup>i</sup> Knowing that whatsoever good thing any man doeth, the same shall he receive of the Lord, <sup>k</sup> whether he be bond or free.

Whatsoever good thing any man doeth; viz. as the servant of Christ and as unto the Lord. The same shall he receive of the Lord; the reward of the same, by a metonymy. Whether he be bond or free: Christ regards not those differences of men at the present, nor will in the day of judgment, 1 Cor. vii. 22; xii. 13: Gal. iii. 28; Col. iii. 11.

9 And, ye <sup>l</sup>masters, do the same things unto them, <sup>m</sup> forbearing threatening: knowing that <sup>n</sup>your Master also is in heaven; <sup>o</sup> neither is there respect of persons with him.

And, ye masters, do the same things unto them; not the same in special, which belong only to servants, but in general, which concern you no less than them, viz. do your duty to them with good will, with an eye to God and Christ, &c.; or rather, do your duty mutually to them, according to your condition and calling, Col. iv. 1. Forbearing threatening; or rather, (as in the margin,) moderating, or remitting; i. e. do not carry yourselves angrily to them, (which appears in vehemence and frequent threatenings,) when ye may otherwise maintain your authority over them. Knowing that your Master also is in heaven; and therefore too strong for you, though you may be too hard for your servants. Neither is there respect of persons with him; he is just as well as powerful, and will neither spare you because you are masters, nor punish them because they are servants: see Acts x. 34; Gal. ii. 6; Col. iii. 25.

10 Finally, my brethren, be strong in the Lord, and <sup>p</sup>in the power of his might.

Be strong; or, strengthen yourselves; i. e. be courageous, and constant in the practice of your duty, against the devil and all his assaults. In the Lord: not in yourselves, but in the Lord Jesus Christ, in whom your strength lies, and from whom by faith you may obtain it: see Phil. iv. 13; 2 Tim. ii. 1. And in the power of his might; or mighty power, see chap. i. 19: q. d. Though your own strength be but weakness, yet Christ's power is mighty, and he can communicate enough to you.

11 <sup>q</sup> Put on the whole armour of God, that ye may be able to stand against the wiles of the devil.

Put on the whole armour; get yourselves furnished with every grace, that none be wanting in you, no part naked and exposed to your enemies. Of God; i. e. not carnal, but spiritual, and given by God: see 2 Cor. x. 3, 4; 1 Thess. v. 8. That ye may be able to stand; either to fight, or rather to overcome. He that loses the victory is said to fall; he that gains it, to stand: see Psal. lxxxix. 43. Against the wiles of the devil: the devil useth arts and stratagems, as well as force and violence, and therefore, if any part of your spiritual armour be wanting, he will assault you where he finds you weakest.

So that the dark world here seems to be opposed to children of light, chap. v. 8. Against spiritual wickedness; either wicked spirits, or, emphatically, spiritual wickednesses, for wickednesses of the highest kind; implying the intenseness of wickedness in those angelical substances, which are so much the more wicked, by how much the more excellent in themselves their natures are. In high places; or heavenly, taking heaven for the whole expansum, or spreading out of the air, between the earth and the stars, the air being the place from whence the devils assault us, as chap. ii. 2. Or rather, in for about heavenly places or things, in the same sense as the word rendered heavenly is taken four times before in this Epistle, chap. i. 3, 20; ii. 6; iii. 10; being in none of them taken for the air; and then the sense must be, that we wrestle about heavenly places, or things, not with flesh and blood, but with principalities, with powers, &c. Object. The Greek preposition will not bear this construction. Ans. Let Chrysostom and other Greeks answer for that. They understood their language best, and they give this interpretation.

In the evil day; times of temptation, and Satan's greatest rage: see chap. v. 16. Having done all; all that belongs to good soldiers of Jesus Christ, all that we can do being little enough to secure our standing. To stand; as conquerors do that keep the field, not being beaten down, nor giving way.

 14 Stand therefore, having your loins girt about with truth, and having on the breastplate of righteousness;

Stand therefore: standing here (in a different sense from what it was taken in before) seems to imply watchfulness, readiness for the combat, and keeping our places, both as to our general and particular callings: if soldiers leave their ranks they endanger themselves. Having your loins girt about with truth: having exhorted to put on the whole armour of God, he descends to the particulars of it, both defensive and offensive. We need not be over-curious in inquiring into the reason of the names here given to the several parts of a Christian's armour, and the analogy between them and corporal arms, the apostle using these terms promiscuously, 1 Thess. v. 8, and designing only to show that what bodily arms are to soldiers, that these spiritual arms might be to Christians; yet some reason may be given of these denominations. He begins with the furniture for the loins, the seat of strength, and alludes to the belt or military girdle, which was both for ornament and strength; and so is truth, understood either of the truth of doctrine, or rather, (because that comes in afterward under the title of the sword of the Spirit,) of soundness, and sincerity of heart, than which nothing doth more beautify or adorn a Christian. He alludes to Isa. lix. 17: see 2 Cor. i. 12; 1 Tim. i. 5, 19. And having on the breastplate of righteousness; righteousness of conversation, consisting both in a resolvedness for good, and repentance for evil done, which is as a breastplate (that piece of armour which covers the whole breast and belly) to a Christian; that resolvedness against sin fencing him against temptation, and the conscience of well-doing against the accusations of men and devils: see 1 Cor. iv. 3, 4; 1 John iii. 7.

 15 And your feet shod with the preparation of the Gospel of peace;

Your feet shod; in allusion to the greaves or military shoes with which soldiers covered their feet and legs. A Christian's way lies through rough places, through briars and thorns, and therefore he needs this piece of armour. He must be prepared to hold the faith, and confess Christ in the most difficult times. With the preparation of the gospel of peace; with that furniture which the gospel affords him, which being a gospel of peace, and bringing the glad tidings of reconciliation to God by Christ, prepares men best to undergo the troubles of the world: see John xvi. 33.

16 Above all, taking the shield of faith, wherewith ye shall be able to quench all the fiery darts of the wicked.

Above all; chiefly, Col. iii. 14: this he sets, as the principal part of the Christian armour, against the greatest temptations, fiery darts, 1 Pet. v. 8, 9; 1 John v. 4. Taking the shield of faith: faith, as receiving Christ and the benefits of redemption, is compared to a shield, (under which soldiers were wont to shelter themselves against their enemies' darts,) as being a sort of universal defence covering the whole man, and guarding even the other parts of our spiritual armour. Fiery darts; it seems to be an allusion to the poisoned darts some barbarous nations were wont to use, which inflamed the bodies they hit. By them he means all those violent temptations which inflame men's lusts. These fiery darts of temptations faith is said to quench, when, by the help of grace obtained of Christ, it overcomes them. Of the wicked; the devil, Matt. xiii. 19.

17 And take the helmet of salvation, and the sword of the Spirit, which is the word of God:

Take the helmet of salvation: salvation, for the hope of salvation, 1 Thess. v. 8. This follows faith, and is of kin to it. Soldiers dare not fight without their helmet: despair, to which the devil tempts us, makes us quit our combat; whereas hope of salvation makes us lift up our heads in the midst of temptations and afflictions. This likewise alludes to Isa. lix. 17. The sword of the Spirit; either the spiritual sword, the war being spiritual, and the enemy spiritual, or rather the sword which the Spirit of God furnisheth us with, and makes effectual in our hands. Which is the word of God; the doctrine of God in the Scripture, called a two-edged sword, Rev. i. 16; ii. 12; which enters into the soul, and divides between the most inward affections, Heb. iv. 12, and cuts the sinews of the strongest temptations, Matt. iv. 4, 7, 10; and conquers the devil, while it rescues sinners from under his power. This relates to Isa. xlix. 2.

18 Praying always with all prayer and supplication in the Spirit, and watching thereunto with all perseverance and supplication for all saints;

Praying always; i. e. in every opportunity, so often as our own or others' necessities call us to it, 1 Thess. v. 17. With all prayer and supplication; prayer, when opposed to supplication, seems to signify petitioning for good things, and supplication the deprecating of evil, 1 Tim. ii. 1. In the Spirit; either our own spirit, with which we pray, so as not to draw nigh to God with our mouth only, as Isa. xxix. 13; or rather, the Holy Spirit of God, by whose assistance we pray, Rom. viii. 26, 27; Jude 20. Watching thereunto; to prayer, in opposition to sloth and security: see Matt. xxvi. 41; Col. iv. 2; 1 Pet. iv. 7. With all perseverance; constancy and continuance in prayer in every condition, adverse as well as prosperous, though prayer be not presently answered, Luke xviii. 1. And supplication for all saints; not only for ourselves, but for our brethren in the world, none being in so good a condition but they may need our prayers.

19 And for me, that utterance may be given unto me, that I may open my mouth boldly, to make known the mystery of the Gospel,

Utterance, or speech, viz. both the things I am to speak, and the faculty of speaking as becomes the matter I deliver. That I may open my mouth; or, in or unto the opening of my mouth, i. e. full and free profession of the

TO THE

PHILIPPIANS

THE ARGUMENT

PAUL, being called of the Lord to preach the gospel in Macedonia, having touched at Neapolis of Greece, came to Philippi, the first city, in regard of its situation, within that part of Macedonia, on his way from Samothracia (Acts xvi. 11, 12) into that country, through Amphipolis and Apollonia, to Thessalonica. Appian describes this Philippi to be seated on a little hill near the foot of the Pangæan mountain, in old time called Crenides, from the fountains and gold mines adjoining, and Datus or Dathus, from the treasure, agreeing with the island Thasus near it; afterwards enlarged and fortified by Philip king of Macedon, who therefore gave it the name of Philippi, as a frontier town within his dominions on the confines of Thracia. Yet afterwards it fell into the hands of the Romans, and became memorable for the victory which Augustus and Antony obtained there over Brutus and Cassius; and in Paul's time it was a colony, Acts xvi. 12, 21. But there is no evidence from Scripture, or the most authentic civil history, that it was (as a learned man would have it) the metropolis of Macedonia when this Epistle was written to it. For it doth not appear that it had so much as a proconsul, or deputy, (as in some other colonies of Macedonia,) Acts xvi. 12, but rather that the magistrates and military officers (ver. 20, 22, 35, 36, 38) show themselves to be of an under city, which (some affirm) did depend on the great mother city Thessalonica, in a civil sense, and some centuries after (say others) in an ecclesiastical. However, it received Paul, who planted the gospel here; who now being prisoner at Rome, (probably the first, not second time,) chap. i. 7, 13, 14, 16, with 2 Tim. iv. 6, and having received by Epaphroditus, their messenger, chap. ii. 25, their acceptable and liberal present, chap. iv. 18, and understood from him their constancy in the doctrine they had received, (though it seems some affecting pre-eminencies did trouble them,) he doth most pathetically, as full of paternal affections towards them his dear children, move them to persevere in faith and godliness; and not to be at all discouraged by his present sufferings, but to live as becomes the gospel, in humility and unity; intimating his tender love and care of them in designing to send Timothy to them, and then to come and visit them; whom he cautions to beware of seducers, who might else pervert them in mingling the law and gospel: whereupon he quickens them to a heavenly conversation in the exercise of several graces; and, expressing his thankfulness for their repeated bounty, concludes with his salutations and apostolical blessing.

CHAP. I

Paul saluteth the Philippians, 1, 2; and testifieth his thankfulness to God for their uninterrupted fellowship in the gospel, 3—7; his affection for them, 8, and prayers for their spiritual improvement, 9—11. He informeth them that his bonds at Rome had turned out to the advancement of the gospel, which many were thereby induced to preach, though with different views, 12—20; that, considering how serviceable his life might be to the cause of Christ, though for himself it were happier to die, he was doubtful in his choice, 21—24; but that he knew he should soon be at liberty to visit them again for their comfort, 25, 26. He exhorteth them to walk worthy of their profession, and to be steady and unanimous in the faith, for which they had already been fellow sufferers with him, 25—30.

A. D. 64. PAUL and Timotheus, the servants of
 1 Cor. 1. 2. Jesus Christ, to all the saints in Christ Jesus which are at Philippi, with the Bishops and Deacons :

Paul and Timotheus ; i. e. the author and approver, intimating the good agreement betwixt Paul and Timothy, whom they well knew, to gain their fuller assent to what should be written, Matt. xviii. 16 : see 1 Cor. i. 1 ; 2 Cor. i. 1. The servants of Jesus Christ ; in a special manner, being wholly and perpetually dedicated to his more immediate service in the ministry of reconciliation, Acts xiii. 2 ; Rom. i. 1 ; 1 Cor. iv. 1 ; 2 Cor. v. 18 ; Gal. i. 1 ; James i. 1. To all the saints in Christ Jesus ; i. e. all the community of church members at Philippi, called out of the world to Christ, sanctified, separated, and dedicated to him, by a credible profession of faith in him and obedience to him. 1 Cor. i. 2 ; Eph. i. 1 ; Col. i. 2 ; the apostle now being well persuaded of their perseverance, ver. 6. 7. With the bishops and deacons : from the Syriac version it is rendered presbyters and ministers. And there appears no cogent reason why we should not adhere to the exposition of ancient and modern interpreters, who understand the apostle writing in the plural number, particularly, to the church and her officers living in this city, as meaning the two orders of ordinary standing officers, which are appointed for the church, and not the church for the officers. By the former of which are meant such pastors and teachers as did agree in name, office, and power with the bishops during the apostles' times, as they collect from several other scriptures besides this, compared together, viz. Acts xx. 17, 20, 25, 28, with xi. 30 ; 1 Cor. iv. 1 ; xii. 28 ; 1 Thess. v. 12, 13 ; 1 Tim. iii. 1—8 ; v. 17 ; Tit. i. 5, 7 ; Heb. xiii. 17 ; James v. 14 ; 1 Pet. v. 1, 3 ; 3 John 1, 9 : these, whether bishops or elders, having the oversight, rule, guidance, feeding of the people, preaching of the word, and administration of the sacraments or mystical ordinances of the gospel, committed to them in common. By the latter, those to whom the special care was committed for serving of tables, the Lord's table and the poor's, together with a receiving and orderly disposing and distributing the collected alms and other goods of the church given to pious uses, according to their own discretion, taking advice of the pastors, for the support and benefit of the poor members of the church who needed as to this temporal life, to orphans, widows, yea, and strangers, especially of the household of faith, that their bodily necessities might be supplied, Acts vi. 2, &c. with Rom. xii. 7, 8 ; xv. 25—27 ; xvi. 1 : 1 Cor. xii. 28 ; 2 Cor. ix. 1, 2, 12 ; 1 Tim. iii. 8, with 1 Pet. iv. 11 ; Gal. vi. 10, 11 ; chap. ii. 1, 25, 30, with iv. 18 ; Jude 12. "But two learned doctors amongst us have opposed this and made it difficult, the one by restraining the word bishops to diocesan, and the other by enlarging the word deacons to note their presbyters. He would have no such order of presbyters as now in the apostles' days ; this would have deacons then to be only temporary, not standing officers in the church ; and so they agree not. The former finding Clement and Polycarp agreed with the apostle here, as to two distinct orders of bishops and deacons, going upon an unproved supposition that Philippi was then a metropolis, he would, without any satisfactory evidence to one that doubted, infer the bishops here were diocesans ; however, the forementioned scriptures compared, all prove the words bishop and elder in the apostles' days, to be used promiscuously, only the word elders, or presbyters, more frequently than that of bishops ; conceiving that the office of presbyters was not in use till after-ages, though he assigns not the time how and when it came in. So that in effect he would have Philippi to be a mother church (that then had several daughter churches) in her infancy. Whereas the apostle writes to those who were church officers in that city, yet he would have them none of that order which we now call presbyters ; thinking, whatever the apostle writes of laying on the hands of the presbytery, there were then no presbyters ordained in the church : which is a singular opinion, of holding all the places in the New Testament where presbyters are named, precisely to intend diocesan bishops in distinction from them who are only deacons, allowing the office of deacons, and the continuance of it, to be appointed therein, when that of elders (acknowledged to be superior) is not. But if, according to this novel tenet, there were not then preaching presbyters, that were not metropolitans or diocesans, how could diocesans have presbyters under them ? and if they had none, what should denominate them properly diocesans ? when it seems to be of the formal reason of a diocesan, to be chosen out of presbyters, or to have them to govern. And if the diocesan bishops were then as the apostles, who must the pastors and teachers be ? 1 Cor. xii. 28, 29 ; Eph. iv. 11, 12. Exhorting, teaching, ruling were then present offices, which the apostles ordained in every church, Acts xiv. 23. Cenchrea was no diocess or metropolis, neither was Aquila's and Priscilla's house, Rom. xvi. 3, 4 ; 1 Cor. xvi. 19, yet are said to be churches, in the plural number, 1 Cor. xiv. 33, 34. If metropolitanical or diocesan, how hath not the Scripture the name or thing ? This appears not to be agreeable to the apostle's way, who writes particularly to churches in cities, towns, and countries, as to the Hebrews. He distinguisheth Thessalonica, in directions from Macedonia and Achaia, 1 Thess. i. 7, 8 ; Colosse and Laodicea, Col. iv. 13. And as there were bishops, plural, in this city of Philippi, so more doing the office in Thessalonica. 1 Thess. v. 12, which was in Macedonia too. And would it not look oddly, Ye Christians of Macedonia are examples to all the Christians of Macedonia ? In Colosse were more bishops or presbyters, because there is mention made of Epaphras and Archippus, Col. iv. 12, 17. And would it not appear strange, when they were charged, upon persons being sick, to send for the elders of the church, to conclude the intent of the injunction was to send for all the diocesans of the metropolis ? James v. 14. If so, he would likely have enjoined them to have called the elders of the churches, not of the church, of which, in the singular, at Jerusalem Paul and Barnabas were received, and of the apostles and elders, Acts xv. 4, who were all present at Jerusalem, Acts xxi. 18, which, under the Roman power, was not the metropolis of Palestine, but Cæsarea was chief. The latter, contradictory to the former doctor, and to the office of the Church of England for ordaining of deacons, would have the term deacons to note the order of presbyters, looking upon deacons only as temporary and occasional trustees, whose office Paul in his Epistle did not so much as hint, thinking it unreasonable by deacon in those Epistles to understand any other office than that of presbyters as now used. Whereas the word deacons being analogous and put absolutely here, in contradistinction to bishops, should, according to right reason, be expounded in the most famous and distinctive signification, wherein, no doubt, Luke, a good Grecian, and Paul's companion at Philippi, used it in the Acts, (chap. vi. 3, 4, &c.) written after this Epistle ; unto which special import we should rather understand Paul using it here, for those who were not mere occasional and prudential temporary officers, but such as were to abide in the church : wherein, upon the multiplying of disciples, the bodily necessities of the poor saints, always with us, John xii. 8, did require such who should have the peculiar care of these committed to them, Acts xx. 34, 35. We find the apostle in his Epistles evidently enough appointing and describing such a special ministry, yea, and giving directions about it as a distinct branch from prophecy and teaching, if we compare places, Rom. xii. 6—8, with xv. 26, 27 ; xvi. 1 ; 2 Cor. viii. 19 ; ix. 1, 2, 12 ; and what is said in this Epistle, chap. ii. 25, 30 ; iv. 18 ; answerable to Luke's history of the Acts, and to what is written by Peter, 1 Pet. iv. 11 ; taking in what Paul wrote to Timothy about this office, in distinction from his who was to be apt to teach, that he should be grave, temperate, giving proof of freedom from covetousness, of conversation blameless, having a faithful wife, and governing his family (that he may be hospitable) orderly, 1 Tim. iii. 8—13, qualified to distribute, as in the texts forementioned, &c. The Church of England, in her ordination, hath reference to this special office, when yet it calls deacons, ministers ; declaring there, 'It appertaineth to the deacon's office to assist the presbyter in distribution of the elements, gladly and willingly to search for the poor, sick, and impotent, that they may be relieved. Praying that they may be modest, humble, and constant in their ministration.'"

Upon every remembrance of you; intimating that he ever bore them upon his heart to God with delight.

Your being joined with us and other Christians in the communion of Christ, and glad tidings of salvation by him, 1 Cor. x. 16, 17; 1 Pet. iv. 13; 1 John i. 3, 7; evidenced by the communication of your bounty, Gal. vi. 6; Heb. xiii. 16; your steadfastness and perseverance in all Christian duties from the first time of your receiving the gospel.

6 Being confident of this very thing, that he which hath begun a good work in you will perform it until the day of Jesus Christ;

Being confident of this very thing; i. e. having thanked God for what he had done and did for them, he expresseth his firm persuasion and charitable hope of their perseverance for the future. That he which hath begun a good work in you will perform it; not from any thing in themselves more than others, but because God the Father, (who is not weary of well-doing,) having begun the work of faith in them, chap. ii. 13, with John vi. 29, who else were dead in sins, as the Ephesians, chap. ii. 1, he would preserve and carry on that internal and spiritual work in the fruits of real Christians, and not leave it imperfect, Psal. cxxxviii. 8; Isa. lxiv. 8; but would make it perfect, or perfect, stablish, strengthen, and settle them in it, those words being of the same import in Scripture with perform it, connoting the difficulty of it. Until the day of Jesus Christ; i. e. either until the day of their death, when the spirits of just men are made perfect, and Christ appears to their particular judgment, Heb. xii. 23, not as being perfect while here in this state, chap. iii. 12; or rather, until the day of Christ, or latter day, at judgment, 1 Cor. i. 8; 1 Thess. iv. 15; when they shall be acknowledged to be blameless, to the glory of Christ, who hath carried them through all, and fulfilled the work of faith in them, and glorified them, 2 Thess. i. 11, and who are his glory, 2 Cor. viii. 23.

Even as it is meet for me to think this of you all; i. e. consonant to the law of equity and charity, Acts iv. 19; 1 Cor. xiii. 7; Col. iv. 1, with 2 Pet. i. 13. It behoves me to pass this judgment on you all, upon good grounds. Because I have you in my heart; not barely in that he had them as it were engraved upon his heart, 2 Cor. iii. 2, 3; vii. 3; for he could live and die with them, whom he did continually present unto God (as before). Inasmuch as both in my bonds, and in the defence and confirmation of the gospel, ye all are partakers of my grace; but in that (for which they had gotten so much of his cordial affection) they were co-partners with him in the like precious faith, 2 Pet. i. 1; and holy brethren, partakers of the heavenly calling, Heb. iii. 1; as children of light, 1 Thess. v. 5; walking in faith and love, 2 Thess. i. 3; maintaining the communion of saints, in showing the reality of the same grace with him, in that, as ver. 29, it was given to them in the behalf of Christ, not only to believe on him, but also to suffer for his sake. Which he reckoned they did in compassionately and seasonably supporting and relieving of him in his imprisonment, whereby the gospel was defended, and what he had preached of it was confirmed, by his becoming a real patron of it, in holding fast the profession and ratifying the confession of his faith, in glorying that he was counted worthy to suffer them for the name of Christ, Acts v. 41; 1 Pet. iv. 15, 16; wherein they did by all honest means succour him, and showed themselves companions with him, chap. iv. 14; Heb. x. 33.

8 For God is my record, how greatly I long after you all in the bowels of Jesus Christ.

Confirming what he had before written, he appeals to God in the heavens, who searcheth the heart and trieth the reins, as in some other Epistles, Rom. i. 9; 2 Cor. i. 23, with xi. 31; Gal. i. 20; 1 Thess. ii. 5, 10; and as Job, chap. xvi. 19; by making a solemn protestation, or oath, to put the matter out of doubt, Heb. vi. 16, and giving them assurance, (as he lawfully might in this way for God's glory, and their good, Deut. vi. 13,) of the sincerity and intenseness of his hearty affections towards every one of them, chap. ii. 26; iv. 1; with 2 Cor. ix. 14. In the bowels of Jesus Christ; not out of any carnal, selfish, or worldly respects; but a really Christian, spiritual, and tender love, seated in the inward parts of this sanctified apostle, Jer. xxxi. 33; by the same Spirit that united him unto Christ, who loves his spouse with no common love, but is the spring and procurer, and great exemplar, of that affectionate Christian love, which, like him, they are to exert from the very root of their hearts, purely, unfeignedly, and fervently, without dissimulation, Rom. xii. 9; 1 Pet. i. 22; imitating God and Christ, (Luke i. 78,) as Paul here, in the highest degree of dearest affection, did love the Philippians, and elsewhere the Thessalonians, 1 Thess. ii. 7, 8, 11.

9 And this I pray, that your love may abound yet more and more in knowledge and in all judgment;

And this I pray; having praised God for their attainments, he returns, (as ver. 4,) in token of his love, to his great petition for them. That your love may abound; viz. that their love both to God and man, showed in their bounty to him, might, as a rising stream from its springing fountain, yet further flow out, and more abundantly communicate itself in all Christian offices, and not abate, (as it seems it afterwards did among the Ephesians, Rev. ii. 4,) as our Saviour foretold it would do in some, Matt. xxiv. 12, (see 2 Tim. i. 13; iv. 10,) but continue increasing to the end, 1 Thess. iii. 12. Yet more and more in knowledge; being founded on a sound and saving understanding of the things of God, and ourselves, John xvii. 3; Rom. iii. 20; Eph. i. 17, with iv. 13; 2 Pet. iii. 18; and an acknowledgment of the truth which is after godliness, Tit. i. 1. And in all judgment; in the practical judgment, or internal sense, and particular experience, taste, and feeling the testimony of the Spirit in the heart concerning the grace of God, and adoption, Rom. v. 1, 5; viii. 16, 17; xiv. 17; when there is not only a right notion in the head, but a true sense and savour of spiritual things in the heart, Heb. v. 14; which is when knowledge is not only an empty cloud in the air, but becomes effectual by falling down in a kindly shower upon the heart, warmed with the love of God, and the virtue of Christ's resurrection, as he after gives his own experience, chap. iii. 10, like David's, Psal. xxxiv. 8.

These are such good works as are not (whatever the papists conceive) causal of righteousness, but are, through the Spirit, (who regenerates the persons, and directs the internal and external actions of those who walk in the steps of the faith of their father Abraham, Rom. iv. 12.) wrought by supernatural grace in the heart joined unto the Lord, with whom they are one spirit, 1 Cor. vi. 17. Which are by Jesus Christ; and without whom, from their own stock and strength, till they be ingrafted into him, John xv. 1, 5, trees of righteousness, of the Lord's planting, Isa. lxi. 3, and his workmanship, created unto good works, Eph. ii. 10, they cannot bring forth fruits, and do such good works as are acceptable unto God, 2 Cor. xiii. 5; but Christ living and dwelling in them by faith, Gal. ii. 20; Eph. iii. 17, and God working in them both to will and to do, chap. ii. 13, they can do all through Christ, chap. iv. 13, so that they shall be accepted in him. Unto the glory and praise of God; not being empty vines, bringing forth fruit to themselves, Hos. x. 1, but to the eternal honour of him who hath called them, Matt. v. 16; 1 Cor. x. 31; Eph. i. 6, 12, 14; 1 Pet. ii. 12; iv. 11; Rev. v. 13.

But I would ye should understand, brethren: to obviate the insinuations which false teachers and others might make use of from Paul's sufferings, to obstruct the cordial entertainment of those glad tidings he had brought, and to discourage those who did obey the truth, he doth by this friendly compellation (which he often useth) kindly entreat them to consider well, that the things which happened unto me have fallen out rather unto the furtherance of the gospel; that his imprisonment, and what other troubles from without did befall him in his apostolical office, whereby the overruling providence of God so ordered, that they did (contrary to the intention of his persecutors) rather advantage than hinder the progress of the gospel, increase than decrease the church, since he had opportunity two years, in his own hired house, of teaching with freedom the things of Christ, Acts xxviii. 30, 31; whereupon he would not have the Philippians discouraged, but rather comforted, as the Corinthians, 2 Cor. i. 5—7: for, 1. His iron chain in the cause of Christ was more an honour to him, even in the emperor's court, chap. iv. 22, or guard chamber, Acts xxviii. 16, or judgment hall, Matt. xxvii. 27; Mark xv. 16; John xviii. 28, 33; than those glittering golden ones which others were ambitious to wear, Acts v. 41; James ii. 2; it being apparent there, and elsewhere, to courtiers, citizens, Jews, and foreigners, that he did not suffer as an evil-doer, 1 Pet. ii. 19, 20; iii. 14; only for the Lord's sake, Eph. iii. 1; iv. 1; whose power in his confinement did work in and by him, who approved himself faithful, which, when inquiry was made concerning his suffering, gave occasion to communicate some notions of Christ, and glad tidings of salvation by him.

13 So that my bonds in Christ are manifest in all the palace, and in all other places;

1 Or, for Christ.
2 ch. 4. 22.
3 Or, Caesar's court.
4 Or, to all others.

14 And many of the brethren in the Lord, waxing confident by my bonds, are much more bold to speak the word without fear.

And many of the brethren in the Lord, waxing confident by my bonds; and here again, contrary to the expectation of those persecutors, who designed to make havoc of the church, his innocent carriage and constancy in bearing the cross, had an influence upon the greater part of the brethren (not according to the flesh, Rom. ix. 3, but) in the service of Christ. Are much more bold to speak the word without fear; pastors, and teachers, who had been timorous at the first, were greatly emboldened to shake of carnal fear, and to profess and preach Christ crucified, or the cross of Christ, 1 Cor. i. 18, 23, which is the power of God to salvation, Rom. i. 16, more confidently than ever; as he and Barnabas had done elsewhere, Acts xiii. 46; and as Joseph of Arimathea and Nicodemus, who were but secret disciples before Christ's sufferings, upon his death owned him openly for their Lord, Matt. xxvii. 57, with John xix. 39.

15 Some indeed preach Christ even of envy and strife; and some also of good will:

u ch. 2. 3.

He doth here tacitly answer an exception which might be made; It were better some of them were silent, than preach so boldly as to procure him hatred, and lessen his reputation; 1. By granting there was somewhat in the allegation, yet it did not conclude against this, that his suffering was advantageous to promote the gospel. 2. By distinguishing of those who were hollow-hearted and false, from an envious principle, designing to disparage this excellent person, who having done much in the lesser Asia and Greece, did now, in the head city of the world, when in prison, also gain proselytes, courtiers and others, for the receiving of Christ; and those were sincere and true-hearted brethren, joining with him in the cause of Christ, and assisting him from true love to Christ, and him his apostle, to get the truth of Christianity entertained in the love of it. The former were evil works, both as to their principle and end, chap. iii. 2; the latter acted sincerely in both respects, 2 Cor. ii. 17.

16 The one preach Christ of contention, not sincerely, supposing to add affliction to my bonds:

This distinction he did amplify and explain here, by particularly showing the ill motive, manners, and end of the worst sort of preachers, from an ill affection of hatred, emulation, and wrath, 2 Cor. xii. 20; Gal. v. 20; with an intemperate zeal to render Paul suspected and despicable in the eyes of the church; and to occasion in the emperor a more severe persecution, and heighten the accusers' rage against Paul, and to gain applause to themselves, and vex his soul under outward troubles.

17 But the other of love, knowing that I am set for the defence of the Gospel.

Then intimating the genuine principle and good end of the better sort, who were moved from a prevailing affection to God, the edification and salvation of souls; cordially joining with Paul in carrying on the same design that he did, who was appointed of God, Acts xxiii. 11; 1 Thess. iii. 3; both by doctrine and obedience, active and passive, to defend the gospel, unto which he was admirably called to be a minister, yea, and here a patron, Rom. i. 1; Eph. iii. 7; with 1 Cor. i. 1; and, as it were, to tread the devil under foot (as Tertullian speaks) in his own house. Intimating from all this, that however the former did with an ill mind, in man's judgment, as circumstances then were with Paul, (some of which we are ignorant of,) the latter with a pious desire, preach the gospel; yet the event proved, by the good hand of God, beneficial to promote the gospel: and so it may happen still, when some false brethren, moved by blind ambition and intemperate zeal, may snatch a weapon out of the gospel to vex good and godly pastors in their promulgation of it.

18 What then? notwithstanding, every way, whether in pretence, or in truth, Christ is preached; and I therein do rejoice, yea, and will rejoice.

What then? notwithstanding, every way, whether in pretence, or in truth. Christ is preached: q. d. It doth not follow, that these different intentions of the preachers should hinder the spreading of the gospel, and therefore it should not abate either your confidence or mine in the cause of Christ, since, by the overruling providence of God, that is carried on, both by the one and the other; not only by those who in truth preach the word faithfully, Jer. xxiii. 28; Matt. xxii. 16, from a principle of love, (as before,) to the same good intent with myself; but also by those who, though they act (as in ver. 15) out of envy and ill-will to me, for base ends under a fair show, 1 Thess. ii. 5, yet they occasionally and accidentally, not by any direct causality, do promote the interest of Christ. And I therein do rejoice; and upon this account, that there is so good an effect, as the making known of Christ for the salvation of sinners, I have matter of present joy. Yea, and will rejoice; yea, and hereupon for the future, though some should continue to do that in itself which might aggravate his affliction, yet it should not take his joy from him eventually; however directly and of itself it tend to it, yet indirectly and by accident, God disposing, it should issue well for the furtherance of the gospel.

19 For I know that this shall turn to <sup>2</sup>Cor. 1. 11. my salvation <sup>7</sup>through your prayer, and <sup>8</sup>Rom. 8. 9. the supply of the Spirit of Jesus Christ,

For I know that this shall turn to my salvation: rendering a reason of what went before, (as the causal particle notes,) he doth here oppose his knowledge to the envious preachers' opinion, and his salvation to the affliction they did exercise him with; so that he was fully persuaded, that the trouble they had given, or should give to him, (though in the nature of the thing it had a tendency to take him off from the defence of the gospel, and so to hazard his soul, or, if he stood in defence of it, Nero would persecute him to death,) would, upon sure ground, work for his good, Rom. viii. 28, even the great good, the salvation of his soul; yea, and for some time, (compare ver. 25,) the safety of his life here, Acts xxvii. 34; Heb. xi. 7. His prison should be an ark to him resting on God's promise, so that he could go on boldly and cheerfully in bearing his testimony to Christ with the helmet of salvation, Eph. vi. 17. Through your prayer; having an interest in their prayers as a means of support, which he intimates they would continue to help him with, 2 Cor. i. 11, as much as if he had downright asked an interest in them, Heb. xiii. 18. And the supply of the Spirit of Jesus Christ; yea, in the use hereof, that he might have a great measure of the Spirit, promised to those that ask him, Luke xi. 13, he looks higher, not doubting but he shall have a renewed subsidy of grace continued to him from the same Spirit, which is in Christ Jesus his Head, Rom. viii. 9; Gal. iv. 6; thereby he should be helped in his infirmities, Rom. viii. 26; 1 Cor. xii. 11; and receive grace for grace, John i. 16, out of his fulness, who had not the Spirit by measure, John iii. 34; whereupon, whatever his enemies conceived, he should have under-supplies secretly communicated, like those from the head to the members, which would be effectual and victorious to deliver him from every evil work, and preserve him to the heavenly kingdom, 2 Tim. iv. 18.

ness, as always, so now also Christ shall be magnified in my body, whether it be by life, or by death.

According to my earnest expectation and my hope; he allegeth and explaineth the ground and certainty of his knowledge and persuasion of his enemies' disappointment, and all succeeding well with him, trusting in the living God, 1 Tim. iv. 10, who in all death-threatening afflictions hath upon his word engaged himself to support all those that hope in his mercies, Psal. xxxiii. 18, 19; xxxvii. 7, 9; cxlvii. 11. Then be sure, when his sincere servants, assisted by his Spirit, wait for his deliverance with their necks stretched out, (as the word here notes,) being raised from past experience, intensely and wistly looking for his appearance, shall be able each to say as the apostle intimates. That in nothing I shall be ashamed; negatively, he shall not be left to do any thing which may justly bring him under reproach. His well-grounded hope would not make him ashamed, Rom. v. 5, with viii. 25; but upon this account he shall have wherewith to answer him that should reproach him, Psal. cxix. 41, 42, 46; Luke ix. 26; 2 Tim. i. 12. But that with all boldness; positively, that he should continue constant in a courageous owning of the truth, and acknowledging of his Lord every way, whether he was delivered from or to death. As always, so now also Christ shall be magnified in my body, whether it be by life, or by death; as in the former years of his ministry he had been supported, yea, and victorious, in freely speaking for Christ, preaching and defending of his gospel, Acts ix. 27; xiv. 3, with as much courage as any other, Acts iv. 13, 29, 31, with 2 Cor. xi. 21; Gal. vi. 17: so now he was humbly confident, in his present sad circumstances, Christ should be magnified. (not that himself can become greater,) i. e. before men, his glory should be rendered greater and more illustrious, and acknowledged with praise, whether he lived or died, Rom. xiv. 8; yea, in the earthen vessel of his body, 2 Cor. iv. 11, (about which he was not solicitous, having resigned it entirely to Christ,) either in his enlargement and preaching of the doctrine of Christ, or in his being offered up and sealing it by his martyrdom.

21 For to me to live is Christ, and to die is gain.

Some read it, For Christ is my gain in life and in death; or, For Christ is to me both in life and in death advantage. Both acknowledge it to be brought in as a reason of Paul's hope in life and death; and of his indifference, in submission to God's pleasure, in life and death, intimating it was all one to him, so Christ was magnified in his body, whether it were by life or by death. They who follow our translation, do expound the proposition disjunctively; the former referring to the honour of Christ, and the latter to the salvation of Paul, which is understood by the name of gain. Some understand the former branch efficiently, q. d. I derive myself from Christ, unto whom I am united, he being the principle of it, as Gal. ii. 20; but others rather objectively and finally, q. d. As I have hitherto made it the business of life to serve Christ in preaching his gospel, so, if he continues my life, I purpose that in my living body, by preaching his gospel, and suffering for his name, as he requireth, he shall be glorified. Then, for the latter branch, if I die, in bearing testimony to Christ, it will be gain to myself, in that I shall be with Christ, which is better for me, ver. 23, being present with the Lord, 2 Cor. v. 8, in whom my life is hid, Col. iii. 3. So that death would not impoverish, but enrich him. They who choose the latter reading, take the proposition conjunctively, to the sense that he accounted gain to him, to have the honour of Christ magnified in his body, whether it happened to him to live or die, since he faithfully served him living or dying, and owned himself to be his both ways, Rom. xiv. 8. He was not (as he saith elsewhere, Acts xx. 24) moved with accidentals; neither counted he his life dear to him to testify the gospel of the grace of God; reckoning he had no life, but from Christ, whom he made it his business to serve and enjoy; so that if he continued in the body, Christ would gain, in that he designed to spend his life for the edification of his church; and if he died in that cause, Christ would gain by his death, in that his truth would, by the blood of him, who was a martyr, be further sealed, and his interest promoted, and his glory advanced; and he himself would gain, since upon his departure he should be advanced to be with Christ, ver. 23, who alone makes his faithful servants happy in life and death.

22 But if I live in the flesh, this is the fruit of my labour: yet what I shall choose I wot not.

But if I live in the flesh, this is the fruit of my labour: some, from the various use of the Greek participle, render this first clause interrogatively; But whether to live in the flesh were worth the while? or more profitable? (understand, than to die). The apostle having intimated the equality and indifferency of his mind in an entire submission to the will of God, whether that glorifying of Christ by his life or that by his death were more eligible, is upon deliberation, finding the advantage to Christ and himself, upon expense of circumstances either way, in an equal balance, weighing one thing with another: living in the flesh, i. e. abiding here in this mortal body, which he thus expresseth by way of diminution, Gal. ii. 20; 1 Pet. iv. 1; in opposition to, and comparison of, dying for and in the Lord, and so being with him, ver. 23. Yet what I shall choose I wot not; he seems, loving the Philippians as himself, to be at a loss what to determine, if God should permit him his choice, whether by labouring in his ministry for the good of their souls he should bring more fruit to Christ, or by suffering, that which would arise from the blood of a martyr, who himself should receive a crown, 2 Tim. iv. 8.

23 For I am in a strait betwixt two, having a desire to depart, and to be with Christ; which is far better:

For I am in a strait betwixt two; because he knew not what to choose for the best, he was held in suspense, Luke xii. 50; Acts xviii. 5, as one drawn both ways with weighty reasons, which he amplifies with respect to himself and the church, that Christ might be honoured in both: his love to the enjoyment of Christ and the edification of his members constraining him on each hand; the former was more delightful to him, and the latter more profitable for them. Having a desire to depart; being held not only with a bare inclination, but an ardent and perpetually active desire, to loose from this clayey tabernacle, Psal. xlii. 1, 2; Eccles. xii. 7; Luke ii. 29; xii. 36; 2 Cor. v. 1, 4; 2 Tim. iv. 6: so to depart as to abide in a better place. And to be with Christ; which is far better; upon being absent from the body to be present with Christ, 2 Cor. v. 8, in paradise, Luke xxiii. 43; 1 Thess. iv. 17; so to leave the body as to live with and enjoy him in heaven, is by far much better for me.

24 Nevertheless to abide in the flesh is more needful for you.

However, with respect to the church, by his staying here in this mortal body he persuades himself, knowing the subtlety of false apostles, who would enter in as grievous wolves, Acts xx. 29, it was necessary to strengthen them and other churches in the faith of Christ.

25 And having this confidence, I know that I shall abide and continue with you all for your furtherance and joy of faith;

And having this confidence; viz. being persuaded of what went immediately before, how useful the continuance of his life, for a further time in this world, would be to the church of Christ, and particularly to them, he determines (as should seem) with more than probable conjecture; though, upon supposition it should be otherwise, he gives them abundant satisfaction in their adhering to Christ, ver. 27; chap. ii. 17. I know; even with a well-grounded knowledge, either by a prophetic Spirit, from a particular revelation such as he had sometimes before had, Acts xvi. 9, 10; xxiii. 11, or the sanctifying Spirit witnessing with his spirit, Rom. viii. 16, strengthening his faith and persuasion, helped by their faith and prayer, ver. 19, compared with 1 Pet. i. 8. I shall abide and continue with you all for your furtherance and joy of faith; to these ends, that, by his personal presence with them, he might by his ministry further their faith in Christ, their joy in the Holy Ghost, and more abundant glorying in the power of Jesus Christ, for his safety, and being restored to them, as we see in what follows; and Eph. iv. 1, with 2 Tim. iv. 17, we find, from his first imprisonment at Rome, (when likely this Epistle was written.) he was delivered, and for some years restored to the churches which he had planted.

26 That your rejoicing may be more abundant in Jesus Christ for me by my coming to you again.

Here, in confidence of being again with them, and staying with them, he expresseth an admirable affection to them, that he can be content for a time to be deprived of the glorious sight of Christ, that he might see and serve them, and that under persecution; that they might, upon his return to them, more abundantly glory together, not in themselves, but, Christian-like, in Christ Jesus, the author of that doctrine he had preached to them, the Captain of their salvation, and the common Head of Christianity.

27 Only let your conversation be as it becometh the Gospel of Christ: that whether I come and see you, or else be absent, I may hear of your affairs, that ye stand fast in one spirit, with one mind striving together for the faith of the Gospel;

Only let your conversation be as it becometh the gospel of Christ: q. d. In the mean time, whatever becomes of me, that which is for your part solely incumbent on you, who are brought into the fellowship of the gospel, is to demean yourselves truly agreeable to that state. The original phrase, as afterwards in this Epistle, chap. iii. 20; iv. 8, and elsewhere, Acts xxiii. 1, imports, that their deportment should be answerable to their citizenship, that they should behave themselves as might be most to the public good of the society to which they do relate, not being of the world here, any more than their Head, John xv. 19; xvii. 16. Their course of life should be every way answerable to their high calling, Eph. iv. 1; Col. i. 10; 1 Thess. ii. 12; bringing forth fruit meet for repentance. That whether I come and see you, or else be absent, I may hear of your affairs; intimating, that it did behove them constantly to adorn the gospel, in the exercise of Christian courage, unanimity, and patience, as well when he was distant from them, as when among them to oversee them: not as if he doubted of returning to them for their greater edification, but further to satisfy them as to his entire submission unto God's pleasure on his journey, or at home, 2 Cor. v. 6, 8; and to excite them to shake off sloth, and to discharge their duty with all diligence, which would greatly cheer his heart. That ye stand fast in one spirit, with one mind striving together for the faith of the gospel: 1. By their stedfast endeavour after a sweet, close, holy, lasting union amongst themselves. For one spirit, one soul or mind, here seem to imply one understanding enlightened by the sanctifying Spirit, and one heart, as an inward, uniting principle, which must upon no temptation be changed: compare chap. ii. 2; iii. 16; iv. 2; with Rom. xii. 16; 1 Cor. i. 10; 2 Cor. xiii. 11; Eph. iv. 2, 3; 1 Pet. iii. 8; according to our Saviour's prayer, John xvii. 11, 20—23, which was heard, Acts i. 14; ii. 46; iv. 32; v. 12. Nor only by their union in heart and mind, but, 2. Their mutual helpfulness in action, as spiritual champions joining their forces together, for the defence of their royal charter, the maintenance of the main principles of Christianity, against all troublers of the church, and subverters of the evangelical faith, 1 Cor. ix. 24, 25; Gal. v. 13; Eph. vi. 14, with 2 Tim. iv. 7. 3. A courageous spirit under sufferings from their most malignant gainsayers and persecutors, who do wittingly and willingly oppose the truth, and them professing of it, as Simon Magus and others did, Acts viii. 18—21; 1 Tim. i. 20; 2 Tim. i. 15.

28 And in nothing terrified by your adversaries: which is to them an evident token of perdition, but to you of salvation, and that of God.

And in nothing terrified by your adversaries: the original word which the apostle useth, imports, they should not be appalled or affrighted, as men and horses are apt to be when furiously charged by their deadly enemies, but stoutly receive them, keeping their ground, Matt. x. 28; Luke xii. 32. Which is to them an evident token of perdition; considering, on the one hand, their most pertinacious rage, it is no other than an evident and convincing argument, or certain forerunner, of the adversaries' utter ruin, Exod. xxii. 22—24; Rom. ii. 8, 9; 2 Thess. i. 5—9. But to you of salvation; but, on the other hand, to sound believers, who behave themselves as becomes the gospel, a manifest demonstration of their everlasting welfare and glory, Matt. v. 10; x. 32, 39; Rom. ii. 7, 10; Eph. iii. 13; 2 Thess. i. 6, 7. And that of God; by the disposal of the all-wise and righteous Governor, who may for a time permit his or his people's adversaries to domineer, Job i. 12; Prov. xvi. 4; but being a rewarder of them that diligently seek him, Heb. xi. 6. will of his grace lenify the sharpness of the cross, enable believers to hold out against all the opposition of their enemies, make them partakers of his holiness, and bring them to glory, Heb. xii. 10, 11; 2 Tim. ii. 11, 12: which might abundantly comfort the Philippians, as others, Gal. vi. 17.

29 For unto you °it is given in the behalf of Christ, ° not only to believe on him, but also to suffer for his sake;

For unto you it is given; he adds a further argument to move them unto that he had exhorted, from God's freely bestowing, of his mere grace, what he had required of them. In the behalf of Christ; upon the account of Christ's merit and mediation; not that they could have either evangelical faith, or patience, by virtue of their own strength, chap. iv. 13. Not only to believe on him; that they did not only believe Christ, but believe on him, was not from any power of their own, John vi. 37, 44, but of God's free gift, Eph. ii. 8, as they had an instance amongst them in Lydia, Acts xvi. 14; unto her and others was this victorious grace of faith freely given by the hearing of the word, which was not unto many others that heard, Matt. xiii. 11; 2 Thess. iii. 2; Tit. i. 1; and as the grace itself was given, so was the exercise of it. But also to suffer for his sake; upon the account of Christ, patience was given; so that to suffer, here, doth not only import a power to suffer, but actual suffering; not only the habit of faith, but the act of believing, even as the fruits of trees at the first creation were produced, as well as the trees which had a power to bear them: wherefore, if, by the grace of God, and Spirit of faith, they were empowered actually to believe, Mark ix. 24; 1 Cor. xv. 10; 2 Cor. iv. 13, having trust through Christ God-ward, 2 Cor. iii. 4; and upon the same account they were continually enabled to suffer, not simply, but in bearing testimony to Christ, Acts v. 41; 1 Pet. iii. 14; iv. 16; they might be of good comfort and courage, to the daunting of their adversaries.

30 °Having the same conflict ° which ye saw in me, and now hear to be in me.

And be heartened to partake with him in the like trials he sustained when amongst them, Acts xvi. 19—24, and which he now was enduring at Rome, ver. 13; an example of suffering unto them, if they would but await the blessed issue of his agony.

CHAP. II

Paul earnestly recommendeth to the Philippians mutual love and union, 1, 2; lowliness of mind, 3; and that charitable condescension for the good of others, exemplified in the life and death of Christ, 4—8, for which God had exalted him to be Lord of all, 9—11. He exhorteth them to carefulness in working out their own salvation, 12, 13; to obey the will of God cheerfully and universally, that so they might distinguish themselves from the rest of the world by a bright example of virtue, 14, 15; and by their steadiness give him cause to rejoice in the success of his labours, who would gladly lay down his life to serve them, 16—18. He hopeth to send Timothy to them shortly, whom he greatly commendeth, 19, 20; as he doth the affection and zeal of Epaphroditus, whom he sendeth with this Epistle, 21—30.

If there be therefore any consolation in Christ, if any comfort of love, ° if any fellowship of the Spirit, if any ° bowels and mercies,

The apostle, reassuming his exhortation in the former chapter to unanimity, ver. 27, doth here, by way of inference from what went immediately before, press them in a very affectionate manner, with a kind of rhetorical relation, and obtestation, as it were, adjure them. If there be therefore any consolation in Christ; if any such exhortation, (as the word is rendered, Acts xiii. 15; 1 Thess. ii. 3; 1 Tim. iv. 13,) in the name of Christ, might avail with them to cheer him and one another by their loving concord and being unanimous. Or as we, rendering it consolation; (so Rom. xv. 4; 2 Cor. i. 4;) If, which he may well suppose, and strongly affirm that he took it for granted, the main body of them had in some measure found by his ministry, what he here moves them to complete, (compare chap. i. 6, 7, 27,) in expectation to find more of what they had experimented, whatever indisposition might have crept upon some by the insinuations of the false apostles; yet, this consolation in Christ may be considered either, 1. Actively: q. d. If ye would comfort me afflicted, in the concerns of Christ, or if ye have any Christian comfort which doth only proceed from those that are in Christ, (not from moral philosophy,) or which is wont to be in those who worship the same Christ, let me his apostle be a partaker thereof. Or, 2. Passively, 2 Cor. vii. 4, 6; Philem. 7: If you, being in Christ, find any consolation against your afflictions, forasmuch as you have received it by my ministry, we, being both in suffering circumstances, should be further comforted by a sweet agreement. If any comfort of love; the Syriac renders it, any speaking to the heart, any solace from good and comfortable words did reach your hearts, John xi. 19, 31; 1 Cor. xiv. 3; 1 Thess. ii. 11; v. 14, cheered with the love of God or Christ, or the brethren: or refreshed with my love to you, chap. i. 8, 9; or would that I should be comforted with your love to me, (as he himself and others were with the gracious affections of the Corinthians, 2 Cor. vii. 7,) which ye ought unfeignedly. If any fellowship of the Spirit; if ye have any communion with me in the graces of the Spirit, and stand fast in one spirit, chap. i. 27, and would show that you do persevere in the same Spirit, 1 Cor. xii. 4, which acts in all the members of the mystical body of Christ, that do in him their Head partake of it. If any bowels and mercies; if ye are duly affected with any real sympathy and commiseration towards me in my bonds for Christ, such inward affections as were moving in him towards them; chap. i. 8, with Luke i. 78; 2 Cor. vii. 15; Col. iii. 12; the latter word emphatically expressing the sense of the metaphor in the former. Then he, having thus pathetically urged these arguments, and closely followed them to embrace the matter proposed, puts them upon.

2 ° Fulfil ye my joy, ° that ye be like-minded, having the same love, being of one accord, of one mind.

Fulfil ye my joy; viz. the exercise of those graces he had been joyful for, which would be an addition to that joy he had for them, and the making of it much more abundant, contributing as much as the friends of the Bridegroom here can to the completing of it, John iii. 29. That ye be like-minded; which is when they believe and affect the same things, agreeable to the mind of God, chap. iii. 15; Acts iv. 32; Rom. xii. 16; 2 Cor. xiii. 11. Having the same love; having the same mutual sincere charity, Eph. iv. 2; Col. iii. 14. Being of one accord; being unanimous in their honest designs, John xvii. 22; 1 Pet. iii. 8. Of one mind; agreeing as to the main in the same judgment and opinion, to promote the interest of Christ, 1 Cor. i. 10; Gal. v. 7, 10.

3 ° Let nothing be done through strife or vainglory; but ° in lowliness of mind let each esteem other better than themselves.

Here, the better to engage them to embrace what he had so pathetically exhorted them to, he doth dissuade them from animosity, an affectation of applause, and self-seeking; and direct them to modesty and self-denial. Let nothing be done through strife or vain-glory; intimating, they should by no means indulge an inordinate affection to strive and quarrel with one another, provoking each other by an ambitious emulation to cross or excel others; this arguing a carnal temper, opposite to true Christianity, ver. 14; Rom. ii. 8; Gal. v. 16, 24, 26, being the very bane of true Christian concord, Rom. xiii. 13; James iii. 16, and destructive to faith, John v. 44; 2 Cor. xii. 20. But in lowliness of mind let each esteem other better than themselves; but cherish and exercise true Christian modesty and meekness, (which is of another kind than that the heathen philosophers did prescribe,) in a due preference of each other, Matt. xi. 29; Rom. xii. 10; Eph. iv. 2; v. 21; 1 Pet. v. 5; as the apostle himself gave example, 1 Cor. xv. 8, 9. Quest. If any say, How is this consistent with what the apostle writes to them to think of praise and good report, chap. iv. 8, and of himself, not a whit, and nothing, behind the very chiefest apostles? 2 Cor. xi. 5; xii. 11; and further, how can some think others better than themselves in truth, unless they reckon good evil and evil good? I answer, 1. Be sure Christian modesty and real humility, with prudence and mildness, are very commendable graces, and in the sight of God of great price, 1 Pet. iii. 4. And therefore what he doth afterwards exhort to in this Epistle, doth very well agree with what he doth write here; where, 2. He is treating of grace and godliness, whereas in those places to the Corinthians he writes of some certain gifts, which, by reason of the insinuations of false apostles against him, he was necessitated, in magnifying of his apostolical office and authority, 2 Cor. x. 8, to mention, being as it were compelled to it by the ingratitude of some of them at Corinth who had been influenced by the false apostles, 2 Cor. xii. 5, 6; yet you may see there, he doth not glory of himself, or his person, but acknowledges his infirmities, 2 Cor. xi. 30, and that unfeignedly, speaking the truth every where, 2 Cor. xii. 6, which he makes evident to them from the nature of the thing itself, 2 Cor. x. 12, 13, 15, 16; xii. 12; appealing to God, as witness in the case, 2 Cor. xi. 31, referring all the glorying they put him upon, to the grace of God through Christ, 1 Cor. xv. 10; 2 Cor. xi. 31, when they had cast contempt on his ministry, 2 Cor. x. 10—13, 18. So that in respect of gifts and external privileges, wherein are distinctions of superiors and inferiors, chap. iii. 4, he doth not urge that every Christian should prefer every other to himself, wherein it is evident there is a real difference; but in respect of the persons, the honesty and piety of others in God's sight, (lest a man, by thinking himself something when he is nothing, should deceive himself, Gal. vi. 3,) since in his judgment they may be endowed with some hidden quality we know not of, and be accepted with him. Hence, 3. Our estimation and preference of others to ourselves, who as Christian brethren are obliged to serve one another, Gal. v. 13, is not taken simply, and with an absolute judgment, as if it were necessary to give them the pre-eminence in all things: but, as to this, that a man may think there is some defect in himself, which it may be is not in another; or with a suspense; Perhaps he is not better in truth, but considering my heart is deceitful, and possibly he may be more without guile, I judge it not meet to prefer myself to him God-ward; but seeing mine own black legs, and being bound in love to confess mine own and cover the infirmities of my brother, who labours to walk answerably to his profession, it is safe for me to prefer him, who may have some good latent which I have not, and whereupon he is to be esteemed by me. Wherefore, 4. The right management of the duty which the apostle calls for to preserve unanimity, depends upon a right and due estimation of God's divers gifts and graces which flow from the same Spirit, 1 Cor. xii. 4, and a humble sense of our own infirmities: so that however one Christian may excel with some singular endowments, yet he ought to think they were not bestowed upon him that he should be puffed up, or value himself above what is meet upon that account before God, being he hath received them of God, 1 Cor. iv. 7, but judge himself for his own defectiveness and faultiness, which will afford himself matter of abasement and humility; when yet with respect to others, whose hearts he knows not, he in charity thinketh the best, 1 Cor. xiii. 4, 5; and if in this case he should be mistaken, his modest apprehensions would be acceptable to God (designing to approve that which he doth) and profitable to himself. To engage them further unto Christian concord, he here directs them as to their aim and scope, (according to the import of the word,) that it should not be their own private interest, but the common good of Christianity, becoming those who have true Christian love, 1 Cor. x. 24; xiii. 5; not as if he did disallow providing for their own, 1 Tim. v. 8, or studying to be quiet, and doing their own business, 1 Thess. iv. 11; but that every member of Christ, while he considers his own gifts, graces, honour, and advantage, would remember that he is not born only to serve himself or Pharisaically to conceit well of himself in the contempt of others, Luke xviii. 11; but also, and that much rather, he should consider his relation to the Head, and every other member of the body, and so consult the gifts, graces, honour, and edification of others, especially when more eminently useful, knowing that members should have the same care one for another, 1 Cor. xii. 24—28.

4 <sup>g</sup> Look not every man on his own things, but every man also on the things of others. 1 Cor. 10. 24, 33. & 13. 5.

5 <sup>h</sup> Let this mind be in you, which was also in Christ Jesus: h Mat. 11. 29. John 13. 18. 1 Pet. 2. 21. 1 John 2. 6.

Let; most translations do express the causal or rather illative Greek particle, which ours doth here omit as an expletive. However, the apostle doth urge them to the exercise of self-denial, mutual love, and a hearty condescension to one another, from the great example of Jesus Christ, 2 Cor. viii. 9: that so the mind which was in Christ may be perceived in us, who, if spiritual, judge all things and have the mind of Christ; being enlightened by the same Spirit, we do judge as he coming in the flesh did: or, Let the same affection be found in you that was really in Him, Matt. xi. 28; John xiii. 15.

6 Who, 'being in the form of God, thought it not robbery to be equal with God': 1 John 1. 1. 2. & 17. 1. 2 Cor. 4. 4. Col. 1. 16. Heb. 1. 3. k John 5. 18. & 10. 33.

Who, i. e. relative to Christ Jesus, the eternal Son of God by nature, very God extant with his Father before the beginning, John i. 1; Gal. iv. 4; 1 Tim. iii. 16; vi. 14—16; Tit. ii. 13; the express image and character of his Father's person, which implies a peculiar subsistence distinct from the subsistence of his Father, John viii. 42; 2 Cor. iv. 4; Col. i. 15; Heb. i. 3; concerning whom, every word that follows, by reason of the Socinians, and some Lutherans, is to be well weighed. Being; i. e. subsisting, in opposition to taking or assuming, ver. 7; and therefore doth firmly prove Christ pre-existing in another nature to his so doing, namely, his actual existing of himself in the same essence and glory he had from eternity with the Father, John i. 1, 2; xvii. 5; 2 Cor. viii. 9; Rev. i. 4, 8, 11. In the form of God; to understand which clearly, 1. The word form, though it may sometimes note somewhat outward, and so infer the glory of Christ's miracles, yet we do not find it any where so used in Scripture: it is true it is once used there for the outward visage, Mark xvi. 12, which had excellent splendour and beauty, giving occasion to conceive majesty in the person, Matt. xvii. 2; 2 Pet. i. 16, (however, his resplendent garments could not be accounted the form of God;) yet being, Luke saith, chap. xxiv. 16, the eyes of the persons which saw were holden, that for a time they could not acknowledge him, it argues that the appearance Mark speaks of noted only an accidental form. Whereas the being or subsisting Paul here speaks of, respects (what the best philosophers in their most usual way of speaking do) the essential form, with the glory of it, since the verbs, in other scriptures of the same origin, signify somewhat inward and not conspicuous, Rom. xii. 2; 2 Cor. iii. 18; Gal. iv. 19; especially when there is a cogent reason for it here, considering the form of God, in opposition to the form of a servant afterward, and in conjunction with equality to God, which implies the same essence and nature, Isa. xl. 25; xlvi. 5, it being impossible there should be any proportion or equality betwixt infinite and finite, eternal and temporal, uncreate and create, by nature God and by nature not God, Gal. iv. 4, 8, unto which the only living and true God will not suffer his glory to be given. Neither indeed can he deny himself who is one, and besides whom there is no other true God, or God by nature, Dent. iv. 35; vi. 4; 2 Tim. ii. 13; who only doeth wondrous things, Psal. lxxii. 18: for to all Divine operations a Divine power is requisite, which is inseparable from the most simple essence and its properties. Being, or subsisting, in the form of God, imports not Christ's appearance in exerting of God's power, but his real and actual existence in the Divine essence, not in accidents. wherein nothing doth subsist: neither the vulgar nor learned do use to say any one doth subsist, but appear, in an outward habit; why then should any conceit the apostle means so? The Gentiles might speak of their gods appearing; but then, even they thought the Deity was one thing, and the habit or figure under which, or in which, it appeared was another, Acts xiv. 11: so that subsisting in the form intimates in the nature and essence of God, not barely, but as it were clothed with properties and glory. For the apostle here treats of Christ's condescension, proceeding from his actual existence, as the term wherein he is co-eternal and co-equal to God the Father, before he abated himself with respect unto us. For he says not the form of God was in Christ, (however that might be truly said,) that the adversaries might not have occasion to say only there was somewhat in Christ like unto God; but he speaks of that wherein Christ was, viz. in the form of God, and so that form is predicated of God, as his essence and nature, and can be no other thing. None can rationally imagine that God was an external figure, wherein Christ was subsisting. For subsistence implies some peculiarity relating to the substance of a certain thing, whence we may conclude the Son to be of the same (not only of like) substance with the Father, considering what significantly follows. He thought it not, esteemed, counted, held (so the word is used, ver. 3; chap. iii. 7, 8; 1 Thess. v. 13; 2 Thess. iii. 15; 1 Tim. i. 12; vi. 1; Heb. x. 29; xi. 26,) it not robbery, it being his right by eternal generation; i. e. he did not judge it any wrong or usurpation, on that account of his being in the form of God, to be equal to his Father, being a subsistent in the same nature and essence with him. From openly showing equal majesty with whom he did not for a time abstain, in that he could reckon this robbery, as if such majesty were that which did not agree to his nature, ever presupposing this inherent right, to his great condescension, or abasing himself, which follows as the term to which: or, he resolved for a time not to show himself in that glory which was his own right, but freely condescended to the veiling of it. He did not really forego (neither was it possible he should) any thing of his Divine glory, being the Son of God still, without any robbery or rapine, equal to his Father in power and glory, John x. 33; 1 John v. 7, 20. Thought it not robbery; Paul doth not say, (as the Arians of old would pervert his sense,) he robbed not, or snatched not, held not fast equality with God; or, (as the Socinians since,) Christ thought not to do this robbery to God, or commit this rape upon God, so as that he should be equal to him, but acknowledged he had it of the free gift of God, chopping in the adversative particle, but, where it really is not: whereas we read not in the sacred text, he thought not to do this robbery, but, he thought it not robbery to be equal to God; which two are vastly different, even as much as to have the Godhead by usurpation, and to have it by nature. In the former it is, q. d. Christ did not rob or snatch away the equality; in the latter, the equality which Christ had with God, he thought it no robbery; he reputed not the empire he might have always continued in the exercise of, equal with the Father, as a thing usurped, or taken by force (as one doth hold that he hath taken by spoil, making show of it). For when he had said he had subsisted in the form of God, he could (before he condescended) say also, he was equal to God, i. e. the Father, without any robbery, rapine, or usurpation. And if Socinus urge that it is absurd and false in any sense to say, God thought he had robbed, or taken by robbery, the Divine essence; then this contradictory, God thought not he took by robbery the Divine essence, is rational and true; as when it is said, God cannot lie, or God changeth not, as 1 Sam. xv. 29; Isa. lv. 8; Mal. iii. 6. What things are denied of God, do not imply the opposites are affirmed of him. The particle but, which follows in its proper place before made himself of no reputation, may be fairly joined with this sense. For if Christ should know that by rapine and unjust usurpation he was equal to God, (as likely the attempt to be so was the sin of our first parents, which robbery of theirs Christ came to expiate,) he had not emptied himself, nor vouchsafed to abase himself. To be equal with God; neither is Christ said to be equal to God only in respect of his works, (which yet argue the same cause and principle, John v. 19, 21, 23, 26, 27; x. 37,) but absolutely, he thought it not robbery to be altogether equal with God, as subsisting in the same nature and essence, the original phrase connoting an exact parity. All the things of Christ (though he chose to have some of them veiled for a time) are equal to God; so some expound the neuter plural emphatically, (as usual amongst the Greeks,) to answer the masculine singular foregoing, to express the ineffable sameness of the nature and essence of the Divine subsistents. It may be read, He counted it no robbery that those things which are his own should be equal to God, i. e. the Father; or rather, that he himself should in all things be equal or peer to God. For had Christ been only equal by a delegated power from God, why should the Jews have consulted to kill him, for making himself equal with God? which with them was all one as to make himself God, John v. 18; x. 33. But that he spake of his eternal generation, as owning him for his own Father, with whom he did work miracles, even as the Father did in his own name, by his own power, of himself, for his own glory: neither will the evangelist's saying, The Son can do nothing of himself, John v. 19, infer an inequality with the Father, when what he doth is equally perfect in power and glory with the Father's, whence, as son, he hath it by nature. For (looking lower) though every son receives from his father human nature, yet he is not less a man than his father, or his father more a man than he; the son having a being of the same perfection which is naturally in both. However the Father, to whom Christ is in subordination as the Son, and in office a servant, undertaking the work of mediation, may be said to be greater than the Son, that can only be understood with respect to the order of their working, if we compare texts, John xiv. 28; xvi. 13—15. Neither, when Christ accounted it not robbery to be equal with God, is he said (as the adversaries urge) to be equal to himself, but to another person, viz. God the Father. Things may be equal which are so diverse, that yet they may be one in some common respect wherein they agree: wherefore when Christ is said to be equal with the Father, he is distinguished from him in person and subsistence, yet not in essence, wherein it is his due to be his equal, and therefore one.

But; some expound this particle as a disjunctive, others an adversative, or redditive. Made himself of no reputation; i. e. most wittingly emptied himself, or abated himself, of the all-fulness of glory he had equally with God the Father, that, considering the disproportion betwixt the creature and the Creator, he, in the eyes of those amongst whom he tabernacled, appeared to have nothing of reputation left him, Dan. ix. 26. It is not said the form of God was cut off, or did empty itself; but he who did suffer in the form of God, made himself of no account, did empty, abate, or abase himself, (so the apostle elsewhere actively and passively useth the word, 1 Cor. ix. 15, with 2 Cor. ix. 3,) and that indeed while subsisting in the form of God, (according to agreement, Zech. vi. 15; xiii. 7,) not by laying aside the nature of God, but in some other way, i. e. his own way, kept secret till he was pleased to manifest it, Rom. xvi. 25; Col. i. 26; by freely coming in the flesh, 1 Tim. iii. 16; Heb. x. 7; which is such an astonishing wonder, and mysterious abasement, as gains the greatest veneration from his saints. Thus for a little time laying aside, at his own pleasure withdrawing, and going aside from his glorious majesty, he lessened himself for the salvation of his people. He had a liberty not to show his majesty, fullness, and glory during his pleasure, so that he could (as to our eyes) contract and shadow it, John i. 14; Col. ii. 9. His condescension was free, and unconstrained with the consent of his Father, John iii. 13; so that though the Scripture saith, The Most High dwelleth not in temples made with hands, 1 Kings viii. 27; Isa. lxvi. 1; Mark v. 7; Acts vii. 48, yet the Son of the Highest can, at his own pleasure, show or eclipse his own glorious brightness, abate or let out his fulness, exalt or abase himself in respect of us. However, in his own simple and absolute nature, he be without variableness or shadow of turning, James i. 17, being his Father's equal, and so abides most simple and immutable; yet respectively to his state, and what he had to manage for the redemption of lost man, with regard to the discovery he made of himself in the revelation of his Divine properties, the acknowledgment and celebration of them by the creatures, he emptied himself, not by ceasing to be what he was before, equal with his Father, or laying down the essential form of God, according to which he was equal to God; but by taking the form of a servant, wherein he was like to men, i. e. assuming something to himself he had not before, viz. the human nature; veiling himself, as the sun is said to be veiled, not in itself, but in regard of the intervening cloud, Matt. xxvii. 39—45; what could hinder that he should not manifest his excellency now more, then less clearly; men one while acknowledging and praising it, another while neither acknowledging nor praising of it, then again praising of it, yet more sparingly? He, by taking the form of a mean man, might so obscure the dignity of his person, as to the acknowledgment of him to be the Son of God, equal with his Father, that in vouching himself to be so he might be accounted a blasphemer, John x. 36; and, during that appearance, not seem to be the Most High; even as a king, by laying aside the tokens of his royalty, and putting on the habit of a merchant, when all the while he ceaseth not to be king, or the highest in his own dominions. Hence the Most High may be considered, either in regard of his nature, wherein he holdeth the highest degree of perfection, or in regard of those personal acts he performs in the business of our salvation. In the former, Christ is the Most High; in the latter, our Mediator. So the form of God was the term from which, and the form of a servant the term to which, he moved in his demission, or abasement; which did not simply lie in an assumption or union of the human nature to the Divine, for this doth abide still in Christ highly exalted, but in taking the form of a servant, which with the human nature he took, by being sent forth, made of a woman, under the law, Gal. iv. 4, but by his resurrection and glorification, lest that relation or habit of a servant, (being such a one who was also a Son, and a Lord, Heb. i. 2, with iii. 6.) when yet he retains the human nature still. As therefore he was of the seed of David according to the flesh, Rom. i. 3, though before he had not flesh; so he took the form of a servant in the likeness of man, according to his human nature, although before he took that form he could not have human nature: he did not annihilate any thing he was before, only, of his own accord, bowed down himself, and veiled his own glory, in taking our nature, therein to be a servant unto death. And took upon him the form of a servant; taking, (in the Greek, without any copulative and before it,) in opposition to being, or subsisting; he was in the form of God, which he had before, and took this, which he had not then, into the unity of his subsistence, by a personal union, Heb. ii. 16. He was the servant of God, Isa. xlii. 1; Matt. xx. 28, in the whole work of his condescension, which was gradual, else the apostle's art to engage the Philippians to condescension had not been cogent from Christ's example. For, 1. He being increate, did assume to himself a created (not angelical, but) human nature with no reputation, in that regard taking the form of a servant, wherein he was like a man, as the next clause explains this. It was an infinite, inconceivable condescension of the Son of God, to take our nature into union with himself, whereby he who was very God, in all things like unto his Father, became like unto us in all things, sin only excepted, Rom. viii. 3; Heb. ii. 17. Hence, 2. He did not immediately advance the nature he took into glory, but became a servant in it to his Father, to perform the most difficult service that ever God had to do in the world; he was not only in the likeness of sinful flesh, as soon as a man, Rom. viii. 3, of the seed of Abraham, Heb. ii. 11—16; but subject to the law, Luke ii. 42, 51; Gal. iv. 4, in a mean condition from his birth, despicable in the judgment of the world, his mother poor, &c., Isa. liii. 2, 3; Matt. ii. 14; viii. 20; xiii. 55; Mark vi. 3; Luke ii. 7, 22, 24; xxii. 27; so that in finishing his work he was exposed to scorn, Psal. xxii. 6, 7; Isa. liii. 1, 2; however, all the relation of his service was to God the Father, as his antecedent correlate. To the further clearing of what went before, the apostle adds, in the likeness, or habit, of men, without any copulative particle, by apposition for fuller explication, (compare forced parallel places,) connoting his employment, (rather than condition,) having a true body and a reasonable soul for this purpose, according to the prophecy, to be servant to his Father, Isa. xlii. 1. And if the adversaries say, He only took on him the form of a servant, when he suffered himself to be beaten, &c.; it is easily answered, These were only consequents upon the form of a servant; one may be a servant, and yet not beaten; and when they so treated our Saviour, he accounted it dealing with him as a malefactor, Luke xxii. 52. Christ obeyed not men, but God the Father, to whom alone he was servant, when made man, Psal. xl. 6—8. It is the nature of lord and servant, to relate to each other. Every servant is a man (brutes are not servants). Labouring in service accompanies the human nature, which is common to Christ with other men, on whom it crept by the fall: Christ regards none others' will but the will of his Father, how hard soever it was, even to the laying down of his life for the reconciling of his church to him. And be sure he died as a man, and not only in the habit of a servant. Only in human nature could he (as it follows without a particle in the Greek) be made like unto men, or in the likeness and habit of men. The Hellenists do use words of similitude, when they design sameness, or the thing itself, and that indeed essentially. For however it be urged, that likeness be opposed to the same, and that which is true, John ix. 9, yet not always; as one egg is like to another, there is convenience in quality, and that in substance is included. Christ is like to other men in human properties, and an afflicted state, so that sameness of nature cannot be denied, Rom. viii. 3; Heb. ii. 16, 17; or rather sameness of kind, though not of number, it being by a synecdoche to be understood generally, Gen. i. 3; Matt. i. 16; John i. 14; Heb. iv. 15; 1 John i. 1; iv. 2, 3. The properties of human nature are of the essence he took, who was found in habit as a man, when yet he was separate from sinners, 2 Cor. v. 21, with Heb. vii. 26; yet the apostle's business here, is not of Christ's sinlessness in that condition, but of his condescending love, in taking on him that condition, being sent in the likeness of sinful flesh, yet without sin. It is a likeness of nature to all men, and not a likeness of innocency only to the first, Gen. v. 1, that Paul here speaks of. And as it is said, John i. 14, The Word was made flesh; so here, Christ is made in the likeness of men, that we may understand it is the same numerical person, who was in the form of God, that was made man; the abasement of God-man being so great, that he was made like to man, i. e. to mere and bare man, though he was more. Nor only did he appear in many forms, (as might be under the Old Testament,) or was joined to man, but personally assumed a true body and a reasonable soul, and so was very man, as well as very God. For when it is not said simply made man, but with that addition, in the likeness, it is done to a notable limitation of his station on each part; on God's part it imports, Christ did not lay aside the Divine nature, but only (veiled) his majesty and power; on man's, to exclude sin, viz. that he was true man, yet only like to all other men. But what is now the natural affection of all men from the fall of Adam, and is an infirmity and abatement, as to that, he was without sin, and only in the likeness of sinful flesh.

8 And being found in fashion as a man, he humbled himself, and became obedient unto death, even the death of the cross.

o Mat. 26. 39,
42. John 10.
18. Heb. 5.
8 & 12. 2.

To be found is a mere Hebraism, not unusual in the New Testament, not importing any question of the thing, but only the thing certainly happening beyond expectation. It notes here, not his being apprehended of the soldiers when betrayed by Judas, being before his humble obedience, but his being, and really appearing to be, (as the Greek word is elsewhere used, chap. iii. 9; Gen. v. 24; 2 Cor. v. 3; Gal. ii. 17; Heb. xi. 5, with 1 Pet. i. 7,) as a man, simply considered, among men, which was before his being scourged, &c. consequent upon his apprehension. Now being made man, not reserved for a time, like the angels, for heaven itself and the view of angels; neither, from the privilege of the first man, (which Adam could not keep,) did he reserve himself for the inhabiting of Paradise only: but, after the manner of men, he stayed in this earth amongst and conversed with them, and therefore is said to be in the fashion of men, or as a man; whereby his habit and deportment is more especially expressed, as his essence in the foregoing phrase. Man, here, is considered according to what is proper unto human nature, not having the article prefixed, as if it connoted the first man, Adam, only man as man; the particle as, here, not intimating only likeness, without reality of nature, (as the Marcionites conceived,) but as a confirming and assuring particle, noting certainty, John i. 14. Some indeed take fashion more strictly, as noting only the external figure of Christ's body; others, more largely and commodiously, for the whole outward species of human nature: whence the truth of the human nature shined out, not only in the figure and matter of the body, with true flesh and bones, the habit of his members, mouth, eyes, &c., that he might be seen and touched, 1 John i. 1, as he himself allegeth, Luke xxiv. 39; John xx. 20, 27, growing in wisdom and stature, Luke ii. 52; but his labouring with hunger, thirst, and weariness, eating, drinking, sleeping, watching, speaking, gestures, being moved with pity, sorrow, joy, weeping, in all which his human nature was evidenced of God, and easily found of men who conversed with him, John iv. 29; ix. 11; xviii. 22. What the Socinians urge, that this gainsays his being incarnate, from Samson's saying, I shall be weak, and be as another man, Judg. xvii. 7, 11; there is no strength in the allegation, that Samson, of Dan's tribe, Judg. xiii. 2, should be compared with Christ coming from heaven, (as they themselves do not deny,) found in fashion as a man: because Samson, being stronger than a hundred men, if he were dealt so and so withal would become as other men, (for that is the import of the words,) no stronger than any other man, Judg. xvi. 17; whereas here, it is not said as one, any, or every, but simply as a man: and from those in power dying as other men, Psal. lxxviii. 7. When they scoffingly ask, Doth it evidence these to be incarnate? it is answered, Though he who was strong as many became weak as any one man; they who live in power die in weakness, as other men do, and are not said to be incarnate: yet he who, being equal with God, took on him the form of a servant, and was in this world a very man, may very well be said to be incarnate. 1 Tim. iii. 16. He humbled himself; he doth not say he was humbled or depressed by the just judgment of God, but of himself, voluntarily, on his own accord, without any constraint. He did really submit himself to the will of his Father, unto whom he was a servant, both in regard of the Divine nature, which he veiled, and also the human in his whole life, Luke i. 48, both outwardly and inwardly, ver. 5, in thoughts and affections, as well as actions and passions: wholly yielding his own will and appetite to God, by a patient subjection to affliction, not in showing humility only, but really undergoing it. For we find this low degree of his humiliation opposed to his super-exaltation, in the following verse, and agreeing with what Isaiah prophesied of him, Isa. liii. 7, expounded by Philip, Acts viii. 32. And became obedient unto death; without the copulative in the Greek, and expressing the manner of his humiliation, being of his own free will, and not by any force; made obedient, i. e. to God, (Not my will, but thine be done,) to others, parents and magistrates, for God, according to the precept of his law and will, in his life-time unto death, and in death; unto being taken here, not exclusively, but inclusively, for the further amplification of the obedience, Matt. xxvi. 42; John iv. 34; viii. 29, 46; Heb. x. 9. Had he staid in his life for degrees of obedience, his condescension had been admirable, but that he should submit to a penal and painful death, (taking in his burial, and abiding in a separate state till the third day,) this is stupendous: aggravated by the shame of dying on the cross, willingly and meekly yielding himself, though a Son, to that ignominious, cursed death, Deut. xxi. 23; Acts v. 30; Gal. iii. 10, 13; Heb. xii. 2; far more reproachful than beheading, hanging, or burning; out of unspeakable love, to bring us nigh unto God, Rom. v. 19; Col. ii. 14; 1 Pet. ii. 24; iii. 18. Upon these considerations, how should Christians in mutual love condescend to each other!

9 Wherefore God also hath highly exalted him, and given him a name which is above every name:

Acts 2. 33.
Heb. 2. 9.
q Eph. 1. 20.
21. Heb. 1. 4.

Wherefore; some take this particle illatively, connoting the consequent of Christ's exaltation, upon his antecedent humiliation, as elsewhere, John x. 17; Acts xx. 26; Heb. iii. 7; 2 Pet. i. 10; the apostle showing the sequel of his sufferings to be glory, according to that of Luke xxiv. 26. This the Ethiopic version favours. Christ respecting not himself, but us, and our good, the glory that he had eternally, but veiled for a time, emerging (as the sun out of a cloud) upon his finishing the work his Father gave him to do, John xvii. 5; Rom. ix. 5. Others take the particle causally, intimating Christ's meriting his own exaltation and our salvation, and his accepting of superexcellent glory as a reward of his unparalleled obedience, though he might have challenged it by virtue of the personal union, Heb. xiii. 20, with xii. 2: obedience superior to angels' required a recompense superior to their glory, and Christ might, upon his exquisite obedience, demand his own mediatory glory, as being our Head, and that being the beginning and cause of ours. However, whether the particle of order note that of consequence, or causality, or both, there is no need of controversy, (because of the communication of properties,) since the person of Christ, as God-man, was glorified. God also hath highly exalted him; the Greek elegance imports superexalted, or exalted with all exaltation, answering to his gradual humiliation; above the grave in his resurrection, the earth in his ascension, and above the heavens, at his Father's right hand, upon the throne of his glory, to judge the world, Eph. i. 20—22; iv. 10. And given him a name: some take name literally, restraining it to Jesus, but those letters and syllables are not above every name, it being common to others, Ezra ii. 2; x. 18; Hag. i. 1; Acts vii. 45; Col. iv. 11; Heb. iv. 8, though upon a different account it was to Christ, even before his incarnation, Luke i. 31. Others, for the name of the only begotten Son of God the Father, John i. 14, (with Heb. i. 4, and v. 8,) who was more eminently manifested in his exaltation, to angels and to men, than before. Others, not for any title, but the thing consequent upon his humiliation, surpassing that of all creatures, potentates on earth, and angels in heaven, Eph. i. 20, 21. Name imports power, Acts iii. 6; iv. 7; Rev. v. 12; of the Christ, the Saviour, Matt. xii. 21; John iv. 42; Acts iv. 11, 12; x. 43, at God's right hand, where he living to intercede, makes all comfortable to us, who in his name alone do believe, pray, praise, and do all that shall find acceptance, Matt. xviii. 20; xxviii. 19; John i. 12; iii. 18; xiv. 13; Rom. x. 13, 14; Col. iii. 17. Power to confer all for the good of his church being given him upon his death, when with respect to the creatures he received a glory, not in regard of himself, and in itself, but in regard of its patefaction to others; from which glory, during the time of his humiliation, he had by a voluntary dispensation abstained; and the exercise of that authority conferred upon him as Mediator in that human nature, he had so obediently subjected himself to the cross. Though as God there was a manifestation, yet there was no intrinsic addition of glory; he did as man receive the name, or glory, he had from all eternity as God. So that the name or glory given relates to him according to both natures, as Mediator, God-man: not as God, so he could not be exalted at all, being the Most High; not as mere man, so a creature is not capable of Divine worship, which in what follows is expressly required to be given to him, who is superexalted by God's right hand, above every name, and every thing known by any name, Acts ii. 24, 33, 36; v. 31; 1 Cor. xv. 25; Rev. xvii. 14, with xix. 16.

Mat. 28. 18.
Rom. 14. 11.
Rev. 5. 13.

At the name of Jesus; in the old translation by bishops in Queen Elizabeth's time, (and some say in the manuscripts of this,) it is in the name. However, in ours now, it is not appositively, at the name Jesus; but constructively, of Jesus, intimating, that the power, glory, and majesty of him who hath that name, unto which every knee is bowed, is that name which is above every name; which would not hold true, if the name were taken for the very word Jesus, that (as before) being common to others in Hebrew, Greek, and Latin, yea, and English. Besides, neither in letters, nor syllables, nor sound, nor time, hath that word any thing above other words. Every knee should bow: bowing of the knee is meant metonymically, and metaphorically, because some of those hereafter named, from whom the homage is due, have neither knees nor tongues, yet must, either willingly or by constraint, yield subjection and obedience to the sovereign authority of Christ, here and hereafter, Matt. xi. 27; xxviii. 18; John v. 22, 23; Acts iii. 15; all creatures being made subject to him, Heb. ii. 8. Some of the papists, searching for their subterraneous, fictitious purgatory, would restrain it to men, but that would straiten and diminish the august glory of Christ, exalted above every name, who had, even here in his humiliation, homage from unclean spirits, Mark v. 6, 7, 10, 12; Luke viii. 31; James ii. 19; how much more when at his tribunal his consummate glory shall be manifest to all! which the apostle hath ultimately a reference to, according to the evangelist, Matt. xvi. 27; xxiv. 30. Then shall his equality with his Father, and his superlative glory as Mediator, be manifested to all, good and bad, angels as well as men, who shall be subjected to his sovereign Majesty, as the Lord God omnipotent; the good willingly, and the bad by constraint, Isa. xiv. 23; Acts xvii. 31; Rom. ii. 16; xiv. 10, 11; 2 Cor. v. 10. Of things in heaven; good angels, from whom he had homage and service here, Psal. xcvi. 7; Matt. ii. 13; iv. 11; Luke i. 30, 31; ii. 13; Heb. i. 6; at his resurrection, and ascension, Matt. xxviii. 6; Acts i. 11; much more in his glory, Matt. xxiv. 31; xxv. 31; Eph. i. 21, 22; Col. i. 16; ii. 10; 2 Thess. i. 7: and the spirits of just men made perfect, Heb. xii. 22, 23; Rev. iv. 6, &c.; v. 9, 10. And things in earth; good men willingly, Psal. cx. 3; Acts x. 33; 1 John v. 3; and bad by force, Psal. ii. 9; Luke xix. 27; Heb. ii. 14. And things under the earth; either the dead, who are hid in the earth, and shall be raised by the power of Christ, in, or upon them, Acts xxiv. 15: or, devils, and wicked souls; for though devils move in the air by God's permission, Eph. ii. 2; yet hell is the place prepared for them, and the wicked, Matt. vii. 23; xxv. 41; Luke viii. 31; 2 Pet. ii. 4; Jude 6. Upon Christ's exaltation, all things above, and in the world, are subjected to his dominion. If it be said, On the earth, and under it, they rebel; I answer, They are bound to obey, Matt. iv. 9, 10, and will be forced to submit to the penalty for disobedience. Christ doth at present exercise a sovereignty over bad men and devils, in limiting and punishing them as he pleaseth, Job i. 11, 12; Luke iv. 34, 35; viii. 32; xix. 27; 2 Pet. ii. 6; Rev. ii. 10.

11 And <sup>John 13. 13.</sup> <sup>Acts 2. 36.</sup> <sup>Rom. 14. 9.</sup> <sup>1 Cor. 8. 6.</sup> <sup>2. 12. 2.</sup> that every tongue should confess that Jesus Christ is Lord, to the glory of God the Father.

By tongue, not only every language, people, and nation is meant; because it is to be understood, as before particularized, of angels as well as men, for though angels properly, and by nature, want tongues, (as well as knees, which are both here joined, and must not be severed, in the worship given to Christ,) yet in their manner of speaking to men, under an extraordinary dispensation, they may use them, (or that which is equivalent,) 1 Cor. xiii. 1; and, in a way proper to them, can confess, or express, their adoration of Christ, Rev. vii. 9—12, either with delight, or by a forced subjection, Rev. vi. 16, and acknowledge that he is Lord, i. e. of glory, Rom. xi. 36; 1 Cor. ii. 8; viii. 6, the Son of God, 2 Cor. iv. 5; Heb. i. 2, 4, having only power to command the soul and conscience, James iv. 12, and to save, Heb. vii. 27, being Lord both of the dead and of the living, Rom. xiv. 9. To the glory of God the Father; some render, in the glory of the Father. Either in that the honour of Christ redoundeth to the honour of the Father, Prov. x. 1, with John v. 23; Eph. i. 6; or the Father doth most glorify the Son in his exaltation, who had most glorified him in his humiliation, John xii. 28, with xvii. 5, 6.

12 Wherefore, my beloved, <sup>1 Cor. 1. 5.</sup> 'as ye have always obeyed, not as in my presence only but now much more in my absence, work out your own salvation with <sup>1 Eph. 4. 8.</sup> fear and trembling.

Wherefore, my beloved, as ye have always obeyed: having confirmed the example of Christ's admirable condescension and affection from the glorious issue of it, he doth here re-assume his exhortation, with a friendly compellation, commending their former sincere endeavours to obey the gospel (so chap. i. 5; and ver. 15 of this) in following Christ, Matt. xi. 28, and moving them to persevere in obedience and love to God and man. Not as in my presence only, but now much more in my absence; that it might be evident, whether the eyes of their pastor were upon them or no, a prevailing love to Christ, and their own souls' welfare, was prevalent with them; but especially, being he was now detained from them, and might be jealous of some defects in them, James iii. 2; 1 John i. 8, did engage them more than any thing to embrace his exhortation, which he enlargeth in other words. Work out your own salvation: he moves them as saints, chap. i. 1, in whom God would perfect his work begun, ver. 6, having given them to believe and suffer, ver. 29, that they would seriously and earnestly busy themselves in those things, which on their parts are necessary to salvation, as John vi. 27; Heb. vi. 9, and without which it cannot be had, as chap. i. 10; Matt. xxiv. 13; Col. iii. 10, 12, &c.; 1 Tim. i. 18, 19; vi. 19; 2 Tim. ii. 5; iv. 7, 8; 2 Pet. iii. 17; yea, press on in the way to their own salvation, as he moved, 1 Tim. iv. 16, not that they should not be solicitous about others, for that mutual care is implied, as elsewhere required, Heb. iii. 13; x. 24; but that every one should strenuously go on towards the mark with a special regard to himself, and the temptations he may meet with, knowing he must bear his own burden, Gal. vi. 1, 5, and therefore should take heed lest he fall. The papists' arguings hence that our actions are sufficient and meritorious causes of salvation, are altogether inconsequent. For the apostle doth not say our actions work out salvation, but, Work out your own salvation, which is much different. It were absurd to say, because the Jews were enjoined to eat the passover with loins girt, that loins girt were eating of the passover. Indeed, what the papists urge is contrary to this doctrine of Paul, who doth elsewhere place blessedness in remission of sins, and shows eternal life is the gift of God, Rom. iv. 6, 7; vi. 23; and we are saved by grace, not of works, Rom. iii. 20, 24, 25; iv. 16; Eph. ii. 8; Tit. iii. 5; and contrary to the main scope of the apostle, which is to beat down pride and conceit of deserving, and persuade to humility. He drives at this, that we should not be idle or lazy in the business of salvation, but work together with God, (yet as instruments, in whom there is no strength which is not derived from him,) that we may evidence we do not receive his grace in vain, 2 Cor. vi. 1, 2. But this co-operation doth not respect the acquiring or meriting of salvation, which is proper to Christ alone, and incommunicable to any others, Acts iv. 12, who cannot be said to be their own saviours: this co-operation, or working out, respects only the application, not the performing of the payment, which Christ hath abundantly perfected: but the embracing of the perfect payment, is not that which can be the cause and foundation of right for which it is deservedly conferred; but only the way and means by which we come to partake of salvation. With fear and trembling; i. e. with a holy care to do all acceptably: he doth by these two words mean not any servile fear and slavish despondency, arising from doubting, chap. iv. 4, but only a serious, filial fear, implying a deep humility and submissiveness of mind, with a reverential awe of the Divine Majesty, and a solicitude to avoid that evil which is offensive to him and separates from him. We find these words used to the like import, Psal. ii. 11; Dan. v. 19; vi. 26; Rom. xi. 20; with 1 Cor. ii. 3; 2 Cor. vii. 5; Eph. vi. 5; connoting that, after the example of Christ, we should be humble, and though we distrust ourselves, yet we are to trust solely to God, (as an infant may be afraid, and yet cling fast to and depend upon, begging help of, the parent, going over a dangerous precipice,) for the accomplishment of our salvation.

13 For <sup>2 Cor. 3. 5.</sup> <sup>Heb. 13. 21.</sup> 'it is God which worketh in you both to will and to do of his good pleasure.

That they might not be negligent in working out their salvation with humility, from any conceit or carnal confidence any might have that they could believe and repent when they pleased, imagining their wills to be as pliable to good as evil; the apostle urgeth the effectual grace of God, as a powerful inducement and encouragement to embrace his exhortation. For it is God which worketh in you: they should not despond of any attaining salvation, or think they did labour in vain in the diligent use of means, and should altogether fall under the dominion of sin, considering, though they were free agents, yet the efficiency and sufficiency was of God, Rom. vi. 13, 14; 1 Cor. iv. 7; 2 Cor. iii. 5; who worketh within them powerfully and effectually, carrying on the work through all difficulties and obstacles, with victorious efficacy, till it be wrought, chap. i. 6; Isa. xli. 4; Heb. xiii. 20, 21: God worketh not only by suasion to gain assent, but by a special energy effecting what he would have us to do. Both to will: and not only in a general way, Acts xvii. 28, but in a special way, making us willing, Psal. cx. 3, remotely in regard of the principle, nextly in regard of the act: circumcising the heart, Deut. xxx. 6; taking away the heart of stone, and giving a heart of flesh, Ezek. xi. 19; xxxvi. 26, 27; causing light to shine out of darkness, 2 Cor. iv. 6; and so renewing the will, to choose that which is savingly good, the natural bent of which, before the influence of this insuperable grace, stands another way, John viii. 44, viz. to will and do contrary: yet he doth not necessitate by any compulsion, but powerfully, yet sweetly, and suitably to man's free faculty, incline the will to that which is good, John vi. 37, 44, i. e. to a certain effect. For the will influenced to will that it doth perform, it undoubtedly wills somewhat that is certain, and so is determined by God. And to do: to do that which is savingly good. Whereupon being made willing, it hath not only an inclination, and doth not only exert a wouling, but, being moved by God's insuperable grace, 1 Cor. iii. 7, that will is effectual, and is the very deed, where the command of the will is executed to the glory of God, as the author. As in alms, not only doth God incline the will to relieve the poor, but further contributes special gracious aids to perform what was deliberated, which evinceth that it is from another principle than ourselves. It is not, that ye may be able to will, and may be able to do: but he worketh both to will and to do: which connotes the very act itself; that ye will to believe, obey, pray, persevere, and that ye do believe, obey, pray, persevere: of unwilling, he makes willing; and further, to will and to do. It is true, to will, as it is an act of the will, is ours by creation; and to will well is so far ours, we being made effectually willing by God's grace: yet not ours, as though of ourselves we begin to will, or go on, but it is of him who worketh in us. Not that we cannot will well, but that of ourselves we cannot will well. The precept therefore requiring our obedience does not show what we can or will of ourselves, but what we ought to will and to do by God's special help. But though God work in us obedience, yet we obey, we ourselves act, being acted of God. Of his good pleasure; not for any previous disposition in any of us, but of, or according to, his own good pleasure, Luke x. 21; Eph. i. 5, 9, 11; ii. 8; 2 Thess. i. 11, with 2 Tim. i. 9. In working out our own salvation, the very beginning in the will, as well as the perfection, is ascribed to the efficacy of God; his good pleasure is the procreating and helping cause of this work on the will, and not the will's good pleasure.

Do all things without murmurings; the apostle here subjoins to his exhortation to condescension and humility, a dissuasive from the opposite vices, moving them to do all that was incumbent on them as Christians without private mutterings, secret whisperings, and complainings, which might argue their impatience under the yoke of Christ, while put upon doing or suffering such things; either reflecting on God's providence, as the Israelites of old, Numb. xi. 1, &c.; 1 Cor. x. 10; reckoning they had hard measure: or rather, (here considering the context,) grudging at others, as the Greeks and Jews had done, Luke v. 30; John vi. 41, 42; Acts vi. 1; yea, and some of the disciples were found guilty of this ill temper against their Master, John vi. 61. Christian charity disallows grudgings, 1 Pet. iv. 9; Jude 10; and also disputings; hot and eager contests and quarrellings about those things wherein the life and main business of religion is not concerned, but the unity of the Spirit of holiness is opposed, Matt. xviii. 1; Mark ix. 33; Luke ix. 46; Rom. xiv. 1; 2 Cor. xii. 20, with 1 Tim. i. 6; ii. 8.

15 That ye may be blameless and harmless, the sons of God, without rebuke, in the midst of a crooked and perverse nation, among whom ye shine as lights in the world;

That ye may be blameless and harmless; that ye behave yourselves so that none can justly reproach you, Luke i. 6; and though you cannot altogether put to silence foolish men, John xv. 25; 1 Pet. ii. 15. yet they cannot have any just cause to stain your reputation; but you may be found sincere, simple, void of guile, Matt. x. 16; John i. 47; Rom. xvi. 19; 1 Pet. ii. 1, with i. 14. The sons of God, without rebuke; without such spots and blemishes as are inconsistent with your adoption, or sonship, Eph. v. 27. Sons of God, in regard of their relation, should be careful, as much as may be, that they do not expose themselves to the biting reproofs of those carping neighbours who are not of their Father's family, Cant. iv. 7; Matt. v. 48; Eph. i. 4; Jude xxiv. In the midst of a crooked and perverse nation; who show by their lying in wickedness, 1 John v. 19, and the uncurd spots, yea, even plague sores, upon them who have notoriously corrupted themselves, that they are a perverse, crooked, untoward and adulterous generation, Deut. xxxii. 5; Psal. cxxv. 5; Matt. xii. 39; Acts xiii. 8, 10. Among whom ye shine as lights in the world; in conversing with such a sort of men, ye either do, or ought, unanimously to show yourselves to be light in the Lord, Matt. v. 14, 16; Eph. v. 8, 15; enlightened by the Sun of righteousness, Mal. iv. 2, to give a more clear light, that however the uncivil wicked would bespatter you, and cast reproach upon you in the necessary exercises of religion; yet, you not suffering as murderers, thieves, busybodies, &c., 1 Pet. iv. 4, 15, 16, you will then, especially if Christ's faithful ambassadors, show yourselves to be not such lantern or torch-bearers as accompanied treacherous Judas, John xviii. 3, (however the ill men you live among may reckon you no better,) but such light-bearers under Christ, (the Seventy use the word for stars, Gen. i. 16; Dan. xii. 3; Rev. i. 16, 20,) as irradiate the world; not a house, as a candle doth, but the world, as stars do, Rev. xii. 1.

16 Holding forth the word of life; that I may rejoice in the day of Christ, that I have not run in vain, neither laboured in vain.

Holding forth the word of life; carefully bearing before you, and stedfastly showing, not only by your profession, but conversation, the Lord Jesus Christ, 1 John i. 1, whose gospel is the word of life, in that it is the power of God to salvation, Acts xiii. 26; Rom. i. 16. He doth not say, holding forth carnal institutions, nor human traditions; but that word, wherein is to be had eternal life, John v. 39; vi. 68. That I may rejoice in the day of Christ: he quickens them from the consideration of the glorious joy he should have in their salvation, at the day of Christ, (see chap. i. 6,) when he and they should, of God's free grace, receive an abundant reward, viz. of his ministry and exhortation, and of their embracing it, and working out their salvation by God's special assistance. That I have not run in vain, neither laboured in vain; for it would be evident to his, as well as their, everlasting comfort, when he should see them, that his laborious ministry amongst them had not been frustrate, or fruitless in the Lord, Matt. xxv. 21; 1 Cor. iii. 8, 9; xv. 58. Then, in a more glorious way they would be his joy and crown, than they were at present, chap. iv. 1.

17 Yea, and if I be offered upon the sacrifice and service of your faith, I joy, and rejoice with you all.

Yea, and if I be offered: that he might further confirm and encourage them in their duty, he doth not here conclude the certainty of his death, at his first imprisonment, having expressed before some confidence of his surviving it, chap. i. 19, 25; but, in imitation of Christ, the good Shepherd, John x. 11, to demonstrate his constant affection to them, (as he doth to others, 2 Cor. xii. 15; 1 Thess. ii. 8,) he argues upon supposition of his own death, which might afterwards happen, 2 Tim. iv. 6; using an elegant allegory, borrowed from legal offerings, Lev. ii. 6; Numb. xv. 5, 7; xxiii. 4; Judg. ix. 13; to show that he could cheerfully lay down his life for their salvation; not for reconciling them to God, for that was done before by Christ's own offering up himself, Heb. vii. 27, a sacrifice of a sweet smell unto God, Eph. v. 2; but whereby they might be confirmed in the faith sealed with his blood, for bearing witness to Christ, precious to God, Psa. cxvi. 15. The Greek word he hath here, is borrowed from the usage in sacrificing, of pouring wine or oil upon the victim, Exod. xxx. 9; 2 Kings xvi. 13; Jer. xix. 13, when that which was poured forth was called the drink-offering, to the confirming of covenants. Upon the sacrifice; by sacrifice, he means either specially their alms, prepared by them, and presented by Epaphroditus, for supporting him in his sufferings, and in the person of the apostle offered up unto God, chap. iv. 18; 2 Cor. ix. 12; or, more generally, the Philippians' conversion, because sanctified by a principle of faith, and so made a sacrifice. For he doth more than once write of believers being offered, and resigned to God, under the notion of a sacrifice, Rom. xii. 1; xv. 16; and so doth another, 1 Pet. ii. 5. And service of your faith; to bring them unto which by his ministration, was a very pleasing service to him, who by pouring out his blood in this martyrdom, would confirm the doctrine of the gospel, or new covenant, and fix it more strongly in the hearts of them and others of God's chosen people. I joy; whereupon he expresseth his joy and delight in that, which, upon this supposition, would in the issue be so much to their honour and advantage, when it should seem good to the Lord. They would reckon it no small honour, to have him, the apostle that planted the gospel amongst them, satisfied in their vouching of the truth, which therefore could not but be profitable to the establishing of them in it, who had cordially embraced it. And rejoice with you all; whereupon he doth heartily congratulate with each of them, the meanest as well as the greatest of them, who would be so privileged.

18 For the same cause also do ye joy, and rejoice with me.

For the same cause also do ye joy; he expects the like affection and sympathy in every one of them, that upon the account of his sufferings they would the more readily, cheerfully, and courageously believe in and suffer for Christ: considering the difference betwixt death threatened by man, for our sticking close to God, Matt. x. 28, and denounced for slipping aside from God, in whole or in part, 2 Thess. i. 5. And rejoice with me; and that would be a congratulation of him, who should account their being established in the faith with mutual love and unity, a fulfilling of his faith, as before, ver. 2.

19 || But I trust in the Lord Jesus to send <sup>Or, messenger.</sup> <sup>1 Cor. 16.</sup> <sup>2 Tim. 1.</sup> <sup>1 Thess. 3.</sup> <sup>2.</sup> Timothy shortly unto you, that I also may be of good comfort, when I know your state.

But I trust in the Lord Jesus; diverting from his former exhortation, the more to comfort them, he expresseth his good hope (which in respect of the object we translate trust) in the Lord Jesus, exalted above every name, that he would be pleased, some way or other, to afford him such liberty, notwithstanding his restraint. To send Timothy shortly unto you; that he should, within a little while after the arrival of Epaphroditus, now upon his return, despatch Timothy to them. That I also may be of good comfort; not for their further benevolence, but for the composing of their spirits, and settling of their affairs, which to him, solicitous of their souls' welfare, (as in a like case for others, 1 Thess. ii. 19, with iii. 5,) would be great satisfaction. When I know your state; when he should be certainly acquainted how things went with them; who might justly expect his sympathy, Rom. xii. 15; 1 Cor. xii. 26; 2 Cor. xi. 28, 29.

20 For I have no man <sup>1 Pt. 55. 18.</sup> <sup>1 Cr, so dear unto me.</sup> || likeminded, who will naturally care for your state.

For I have no man likeminded; for which purpose I have designed Timothy, who joins with me in this Epistle, and is most of the same mind with myself, endued with the same Spirit, faith, and love; finding none of like soul to him with myself, in desiring your prosperity, and so have pitched upon him. Who will naturally care for your state; who, being cordial to me and you, will, without regard to lucre, ingenuously and sincerely, above all the rest I have here, propagate the kingdom of Christ amongst you, and promote your salvation in watching for your souls, as one that must give an account, that he may do it with joy, Heb. xiii. 17.

21 For all <sup>m 1 Cor. 10.</sup> <sup>24, 33, & 18.</sup> <sup>2 Tim. 4.</sup> <sup>10, 16.</sup> seek their own, not the things which are Jesus Christ's.

He doth here further commend Timothy, compared with the generality of those who with him did attend the ministry of the gospel at Rome, where it seems (whatever the papists pretend) Peter did not then preside as metropolitan. When he saith all, he doth not necessarily imply every individual besides Timothy, (though, as before, he knew not one like-minded as he was,) but almost all, (as the universal sign is elsewhere synecdochically taken, Jer. vi. 3; Matt. x. 22; Mark i. 5,) or the most part of those then employed in the ministry, who were then at liberty, and whose inclinations, probably, he had inquired into. Seek their own; did, though not simply and absolutely, yet after a sort, seek their own profit, ease, safety, pleasure, and satisfaction; called their own, in regard of their civil right, and the world's opinion, but yet at God's disposal, Hag. ii. 8. These they did (as John Mark in another case) prefer to a long and tedious journey, for the service of Christ, unto Philippi. Not the things which are Jesus Christ's; so that they did postpone the glory of Christ, the safety and edification of the church there, to their own things. Wherefore he doth not mean it absolutely, that they did not seek the things of Christ, or that they did deny Christ, for it is apparent, even when he penned this Epistle, chap. i. 13, 14, with Acts xxviii. 14, 15, and Rom. i. 8, there were many that did seriously seek Christ; but comparatively, and in a sort, they did not seek the things of Christ so intently as they should, 1 Cor. x. 24, 33, but failed as others did in other cases, Matt. xxvi. 58; 2 Tim. iv. 16: not as if all minding of their own things were denied to Christ's ministers, 1 Tim. iii. 4, 5; v. 8; but they did slip their necks from under the yoke, and did not mind the glory of Christ in the church of Philippi, as he did.

22 But ye know the proof of him, <sup>n 1 Cor. 4.</sup> <sup>17. 1 Tim.</sup> <sup>1. 2 Tim.</sup> <sup>1. 2.</sup> that, as a son with the father, he hath served with me in the Gospel.

However others were found in some respects defective to the service of Christ, yet he appeals to their experience of the integrity and fidelity of Timothy in conjunction with himself, when he preached the gospel amongst them, and afterwards, Acts xvi. 1; xvii. 15; xviii. 5; xix. 22; xx. 4; which he amplifies and illustrates by a simile, when he saith, as a son with the father; q. d. Just as a genuine and obedient son is wont to retain the spirit of his father that begat him: and Paul doth metaphorically call Timothy his own son, begotten by the gospel, 1 Tim. i. 2, his dearly beloved Son, 2 Tim. i. 2, and faithful in the Lord, 1 Cor. iv. 17, likeminded with himself, ver. 20; with whom he had not only preached, but served in the gospel, chap. i. 1, given himself wholly to the thing. He doth not say, served me, or under me, but with me in the gospel, i. e. to advance the glory of Christ in promoting the gospel, by helping with Paul, and labouring, working the work of the Lord, as Paul also did, and being sometime a sufferer under restraint for that service, as Paul himself, Heb. xiii. 23, for the gospel, which is not a domination, but ministration, wherein this great apostle owns Timothy as his fellow minister.

23 Him therefore I hope to send presently, so soon as I shall see how it will go with me.

Him therefore I hope to send presently; seeing the matter was thus, he thought not of any other to employ in the service of their faith, but hoped, i. e. in the Lord Jesus as ver. 19, in a short time after his present writing, to send this excellent, humble, and approved young man, who would naturally care for their concerns, ver. 20. So soon as I shall see how it will go with me; even without any delay, (though as yet, to accompany Epaphroditus, he could not spare him, who was so useful to him in his bonds, to take care for things necessary to the propagation of the gospel, in the ample city of Rome,) from the hour he should come to a certainty what would be the issue of his present imprisonment, which if it should end in his being offered up, he had satisfied them before, as it would be for his own advantage, chap. i. 21, so, by the providence of God, no disservice to their faith, ver. 17, 18; from which, with ready submission to God's will, whatever occurred, it seems he had a greater inclination to conceive a good hope of freedom.

But I trust in the Lord; so he expresseth his strong persuasion, as the word we translate trust, being seldom used, but when the thing trusted imports the object. In the Lord; i. e. Jesus, whom he doth absolutely and eminently call Lord, being so highly exalted above all others, ver. 9, not only here, but elsewhere, ver. 29; chap. iii. 1; iv. 1, 4, 10; on whom he doth wholly depend, and to whom he doth submit for the issue. That I also myself shall come shortly: before he had suggested his persuasion of abiding with them, chap. i. 25, and here, that he might satisfy them he had not changed his mind, he adds for their comfort, that they might not be discouraged in their sufferings, what apprehensions he had, after a while, of being set at liberty (if God pleased); and if so, he would have them conceive, soon after he had done what was necessary at Rome, (for him who had care of all the churches,) he designed to follow Timothy to them.

Yet I supposed it necessary to send to you Epaphroditus; in the mean time he gives them an account why he esteemed it needful to send back Epaphroditus (whom some, but without sufficient warrant, would have to be the same with Epaphras, Col. i. 7; iv. 12; Philem. 23) unto them, not as if he had failed in doing what he was intrusted with, but for other weighty reasons. My brother and companion in labour; he would have them to know he had nothing to blame him for, but all in his commendation, whom in the common faith he owned to be his Christian brother, and fellow helper, or fellow worker in the business of the gospel, as he calls others in the like circumstances, Rom. xvi. 3, 21; 2 Cor. viii. 23; Col. iv. 11; 1 Thess. iii. 2; Philem. 24. And fellow soldier; and a faithful and a constant associate with him in the Christian warfare, 2 Cor. x. 4; 1 Tim. i. 18; Philem. 2, under Christ their Captain, against all the assaults of the devil, and the carnal world, which are continually warring to destroy real Christianity. But your messenger; but your apostle, which must be understood largely, as it is sometimes put for any evangelist, deacon, or minister of the gospel, Rom. xvi. 7, 9, well rendered by us in this place messenger, compared with chap. iv. 18; 2 Cor. viii. 22, 23; not being a special apostle of Christ, Matt. x. 2, but an officer of the church at Philippi, delegated by them to carry relief to Paul. And he that ministered to my wants; unto whom, it seems, he did not only deliver the present for his support according to his trust and commission, wherein he faithfully served the church, but also, as their public minister, greatly help Paul the prisoner in what he stood most in need of, which Paul could not but value, being the Romans were so mild as to permit him, a captive, so good attendance and assistance; yet, to declare his affections to the church at Philippi, he chose rather to deny himself his necessities, than not to comfort them in remitting their faithful messenger, so greatly desiring their welfare, with this letter to them.

<sup>t ch. 1. 3.</sup> 26 For he longed after you all, and was full of heaviness, because that ye had heard that he had been sick.

For he longed after you all; he gives them the first reason of his present sending, not that Epaphroditus was unwilling to stay longer with him, but because he was greatly concerned for all of them of the church at Philippi, who had his heart, as they had Paul's, chap. i. 8; iv. 1; Rom. i. 11; solicitous to be with them to do their souls good. And was full of heaviness; especially, considering their great affection to him, whom they had intrusted in this service, he was in such distress for them, that his spirits were even ready to fail him (as Matt. xxvi. 37) from sympathy, 2 Cor. xi. 29. Because that ye had heard that he had been sick; knowing how much the certain report of his dangerous sickness in those circumstances, when they could understand nothing of his recovery, would affect them.

27 For indeed he was sick nigh unto death: but God had mercy on him; and not on him only, but on me also, lest I should have sorrow upon sorrow.

For indeed he was sick nigh unto death; by reason he was really taken with such a disease, as in its own nature was mortal, and in its tendency brought him even to death's door, as Isa. xxxviii. 1. But God had mercy on him; but God, who is the great Physician, and unto whom it belongs to show mercy unto those who address to him, (without whom bodily physicians can do nothing,) by compassionating of him in his misery, was pleased to restore him to health, as 2 Kings xx. 5, 6. But if any say, Would it not have been great mercy to have taken him from the miseries of this life, which are here prolonged? consider chap. i. 21. It may be answered, 1. Death itself, as it is a privation of life, and opposite to nature, was not desirable by Paul any more than by our Saviour, but might be looked upon as a kind of misery, not to be preferred to life looked upon in itself, but with respect to another, viz. as it is a passage to eternal life; so it is desirable for that life into which it leads the godly, and so is to be preferred to the miserable condition of this life. Paul speaks here of mercy respecting the former, considering that this life itself is a favour of God, for the service of him, and our neighbour. Further, 2. God's mercy here respects not only the grievous sickness of Epaphroditus, but the joint affliction that the loss of him would be both to the Philippians and to Paul, in thus juncture, as we may see from what follows. And not on him only, but on me also; what power had Paul for working of miracles, was chiefly to convince infidels, and he could only exert it when God saw good for his own glory. Therefore he magnifies God's mercy here in a more ordinary way, as a return to prayer, when he was so afflicted for his colleague's illness; being upon an office of kindness and compassion, his loss would be in its tendency a ground of so much sorrow to the church, as well as to himself. Lest I should have sorrow upon sorrow; his Christianity had not extinguished his natural affections, but if the church had then been bereft of Epaphroditus, it would have added the affliction for his loss to his affliction by his suffering for Christ, it would have doubled his affliction, (yet somewhat in a different sense from that, chap. i. 16,) it being an ill temper not to be grieved for the affliction of the church, Amos vi. 6; yet all our affections are to be moderated according to the will of God.

28 I sent him therefore the more carefully, that, when ye see him again, ye may rejoice, and that I may be the less sorrowful.

I sent him therefore the more carefully; after his recovery, without delay, denying myself the comfort of his society, I have despatched him away to you. That, when ye see him again, ye may rejoice; to the end that he whom you looked upon as dead might seasonably appear among you in person, and cheer you up in your troubles for him and me. And that I may be the less sorrowful; and that I, who, by reason of your kindness to me, have occasioned his absence from you, might upon his safe return to you have somewhat to alleviate my grief, 2 Cor. vi. 10.

29 Receive him therefore in the Lord with all gladness; and || hold such in reputation:

Receive him therefore in the Lord with all gladness:

<sup>1</sup> Or, honour such,

hereupon, having given his due character, he chargeth them all, officers and people, to entertain him as a servant of the Lord, (as Christ would have them receive his servants, Matt. x. 40, 41, even with all spiritual joy,) as sometimes the Galatians had received him, Gal. iv. 14. And hold such in reputation; yea, as it becometh saints, Rom. xvi. 2, to have such in esteem very highly for their work's sake, 1 Thess. v. 13.

30 Because for the work of Christ he was nigh unto death, not regarding his life, *to supply your lack of service toward me.

1 Cor. 16.
17. ch. 4. 10.

Because for the work of Christ he was nigh unto death; by reason he was so zealous about the work of the ministry in the general, or in special to carry on that service, as the church's messenger, he was intrusted with, chap. iv. 18, not only in conveying their benevolence on so long and hazardous a journey, for the relief of the Lord's prisoner, which Christ would own and reward as his work, Matt. xxv. 39, 40, but in attending him (whom he was sent to visit) in his confinement, both within doors and abroad, as occasion required, (for it seems the Romans were so generous as to give free egress and regress to his visitants, Acts xxviii. 30,) whereby he contracted that forementioned disease that hazarded his life. Not regarding his life; the preservation of which with respect to the work he was about, he did not consult, (John xii. 25, 26,) but made little account of it, (as Esth. iv. 16,) yea, did even despise it in the service of Christ, as the original word doth import, being borrowed from those whose lives are hazarded in being cast to be devoured by beasts in the theatre, which he himself, by sad experience, sometime knew the meaning of, 1 Cor. xv. 32. To supply your lack of service toward me; so faithful was he to his trust for the honour of his Lord, that to the very utmost of his strength, yea, and beyond it, that which he reckoned those who sent would have done themselves had they been present, (considering what the gospel requires, Gal. vi. 2; Heb. xiii. 3,) that he, Onisephorus-like, 2 Tim. i. 16, according to his measure made supply of in their absence.

CHAP. III

Paul exhorteth to rejoice in the Lord, and to beware of the false teachers of the circumcision, 1—3: showing that as a Jew he had better grounds of confidence than they, 4—6; but that he disclaimed them all, trusting only to the justification which is of God by faith, and hoping to partake of the resurrection through Christ, 7—11. He acknowledgeth his present imperfection, and that he was still anxiously striving for the prize, 12—14: exhorting others to be like-minded, 15, 16, and to follow his example, 17; for many were enemies to the gospel, being earthly-minded, 18, 19; but his conversation and views were heavenly, 20, 21.

2 Cor. 13.
11. ch. 4. 4.
1 Thess. 5. 16.

FINALLY, my brethren, *rejoice in the Lord. To write the same things to you, to me indeed is not grievous, but for you it is safe.

Finally; moreover, or as to what remains, i. e. by way of conclusion to the antecedent matter, and transition to the general exhortation, he here premiseth to the subsequent admonition. My brethren; willingly repeating the title of brethren, to show the respect he had for them, and to sweeten that he was about to subjoin. Rejoice in the Lord; he moves them (as we, with almost all, do translate it) not as saluting or bidding them farewell, Luke i. 28; 2 Cor. xiii. 11; but to rejoice in the Lord, as chap. iv. 4, either connoting the object matter of their joy, compared with ver. 3, or rather the efficient, importing for and according to the will of the Lord, in a manner agreeable to the pleasure of him who affords a ground of rejoicing in the midst of your tribulations and afflictions; considering his mercy, chap. ii. 18, 27, 29, they might taste how good the Lord is, as elsewhere, Psal. xxxvii. 4; Jer. ix. 24, with Rom. v. 11; 2 Cor. x. 17; 1 Thess. v. 16; 1 Pet. i. 8; and so not after a carnal and worldly, but spiritual and Christian manner, to cheer up themselves in him, when the world frowns most, Psal. iv. 6, 7. To write the same things to you; writing of the same things cannot be referred to any other epistles which he wrote to the Philippians, but to those things which, while present with them, he had delivered to them by word of mouth, as chap. iv. 9: compare Isa. xxviii. 10; Rom. xv. 15; 2 Pet. i. 12; 1 John ii. 21. To me indeed is not grievous; for my part, I do not do it with regret, nor account it tedious, (as some teachers do,) as if I were ashamed of it, that I should do any thing superfluous, or not necessary, in writing again the same things for the matter of them, that I had before preached to preserve you from falling, as others have done, ver. 18. But for you it is safe; because this repetition of the same doctrine, though in another way, is pertinent to your edification, (yea, as some read, it is necessary,) it is greatly advantageous for your stability in the faith, and to caution and keep you in safety, from the insinuations of false teachers, that I now give you a brief memorial in writing of those things, that you may be cautioned, and they may not, especially in this day of adversity, slip out of your memories, or be lost.

Beware; he cautions all, both officers and people: and though the original word doth signify to look with mind and eye, yet it is also frequently rendered, to take heed, Mark viii. 15; xii. 38; xiii. 9, 23, 33; 1 Cor. xvi. 10; 2 John 8. Of dogs; of those dogs, (with the article emphatically proposed,) a metaphor borrowed from those voracious, fierce, impure animals, whose price was not brought into the Lord's house, Deut. xxiii. 18; Prov. xxvi. 11; Isa. lxvi. 3; 2 Pet. ii. 22; to connote the false apostles, who endeavoured to corrupt the gospel with Judaism and profaneness, even antichristianism; compare Psal. xxii. 16, 20; Matt. vii. 6; xv. 26; Rev. xxii. 15. Some think the apostle may allude unto the proverbial speech, Take heed of a mad dog, forasmuch as false teachers, being acted as with a certain madness, would bite Christ and his apostles, and tear his body; and these mad dogs were the more dangerous, in that they did not bark so much as bite. Hence they say, Take heed of a dumb dog and sit <sup>f</sup>watcher. There were of several sorts, enemies to the cross <sup>g</sup>Christ, Gal. v. 12; 1 Thess. ii. 14, 15; some more secret, as Absalom against Amnon, 2 Sam. xiii. 22, pretending contrary to their practice, 2 Kings viii. 13; xiii. 22. Our Saviour bade his disciples beware of such, Matt. x. 17, which he found to be of this temper, Psal. xxii. 16, 20; lv. 15; though some of them were but dumb dogs, Isa. lvi. 10: some such there were amongst the Philippians, who, notwithstanding their fair pretext, were enemies to the cross of Christ, did secretly disparage his true apostle, and tear his flock: see ver. 18 of this chapter, with chap. i. 15, 16. Beware of evil workers; such as pretended to labour in promoting the gospel of Christ, but secretly were doing mischief amongst Christians, not serving the glory of Christ, but their own bellies, ver. 18, 19; being, as he elsewhere calls them, deceitful workers, 2 Cor. xi. 13, glorying in the flesh, Gal. vi. 13. Beware of the concision; by an elegant allusion to the name circumcision, which rite the Jews did glory in, and some false teachers of Christianity, after the time of reformation, did urge as necessary to salvation, and require it from others, Acts xv. 1; Gal. v. 2, 4; vi. 12. These Paul here, in a holy sarcasm, charges the Philippians to take heed of, under the contemptible name of the concision, or cutting off, intimating that the exterior part of that typical work, which was done in the cutting off the foreskin, was now, from the coming of Christ, altogether made a mere cutting off the skin, condemned by God in the heathens, as a profane incision, Lev. xix. 28; xxi. 5, where the LXX. use the same preposition in the compound word, the apostle here doth in contempt of the thing; which could now bring nothing of profit, nothing of holiness, nothing of honour to any Christian, could no more avail or advantage a man now, than if it were conferred on a beast, being no seal of the covenant now, but a sticking for that rite (when abolished by Christ) which was a mere rending of the church, and in that effect a cutting off from it, Gal. v. 10, 12. And the apostle doth three times significantly repeat this word, beware of these enemies to Christian purity and unity, to show how necessary it was to avoid their insinuations, against which he is more sharp in his Epistle to the Galatians.

3 For we are <sup>c</sup>the circumcision, <sup>f</sup>which worship God in the spirit, and <sup>e</sup>rejoice in Christ Jesus, and have no confidence in the flesh.

In opposition to and confutation of the concision, he speaks of himself, and all true believers in the fellowship of the gospel, partakers of the same grace and Spirit with him, chap. i. 5, 7; ii. 1; and saith, ve. Are the concision; using a metonymy, are the circumcision now acceptable, and not displeasing to God, i. e. we are what is really signified by it, and therefore as to the main intent of it are the circumcised (it being usual to put circumcision for circumcised, Acts xi. 2; Rom. iii. 30; iv. 12; xv. 8; Gal. ii. 7, 8, 9, 12; Col. iv. 11; Tit. i. 10): he doth not mean with respect to carnal circumcision, i. e. which is outward in the flesh, but which is inward in the Spirit, Rom. ii. 28, 29, made without hands by the circumcision of Christ, with whom we are buried in baptism, Col. ii. 11, 12; and being Christ's are Abraham's spiritual seed, and heirs of the promise, Gal. iii. 29. Which worship God in the spirit; i. e. who have cut off all carnal confidence of salvation in any external services, (which they of the concision contend for,) and do worship God, not with carnal, but spiritual worship, such as now under the gospel he doth require, John iv. 23, 24; Rom. i. 9; from a renewed heart, John iii. 8; 1 Pet. iii. 15; yielding peculiar adoration to the Lord our God, with a sincere mind, and by the assistance of his Spirit in the exercise of faith and love, Rom. vii. 5, 6, 26, 27; Eph. iii. 16, 17; vi. 18; Heb. x. 22; according to the same rule he hath prescribed, ver. 16, with Rom. xii. 1, 2; Gal. vi. 16, in and through Christ, Heb. xiii. 15. And rejoice in Christ Jesus; in whom alone (not in Moses also, as false teachers would join them) glorying we trust for acceptance with God, 2 Cor. v. 9; Gal. vi. 14; in communion with whom is ground of rejoicing through Christ, who is the substance or body of Mosaic shadows, ver. 9. And have no confidence in the flesh; and not rest, or trust, or place our hope in any carnal or external privilege or performance, or any other besides Jesus Christ, to commend us to God, Gal. iii. 2, 11—13.

4 Though <sup>h</sup>I might also have confidence in the flesh. If any other man thinketh that he hath whereof he might trust in the flesh, I more :

Though I might also have confidence in the flesh: to prevent any cavil about what he said, as if he did magnify Christ, and forbear glorying in those external privileges they did so much bear themselves upon, out of envy to them for what they had; he here argues upon supposition, (as elsewhere, to cut off occasion from boasters, 2 Cor. xi. 12, 18, 21, 22,) that, if it were lawful, and would turn to any good account, to confide in the flesh, he had the same ground the impostors had, and might build up that in himself which he had destroyed in others, Gal. ii. 18. If any other man thinketh that he hath whereof he might trust in the flesh, I more: yea, and to compare things by a just balance, if any of those he had justly taxed, or any other in conceit might hold his head higher in that way, he could produce not only as much, but much more ground of trust in those external rites, &c. as he that was most excellent; only that it was in vain, and of no value, ver. 7.

Circumcised the eighth day; or, there was, or I had, the eighth day circumcision; so it may by a usual supply of the verb be read, (as also what follows,) without a metonymy. He begins with his birth privilege, intimating that he was not proselyted, but born within the pale of the church, and dedicated to God under the seal of the covenant at the day of God's appointment, Gen. xvii. 12. Of the stock of Israel; not sprung from ethnic parents, not an Ishmaelite, or Edomite, but a genuine Israelite, Rom. xi. 1; 2 Cor. xi. 22. Of the tribe of Benjamin; of that more honest division where the temple stood, Josh. xviii. 28, of the tribe of Benjamin, the son of beloved Rachel, and his father's darling, Gen. xiv. 20; under God's special protection, Deut. xxxiii. 12, forward in the reformation, Ezra i. 5. An Hebrew of the Hebrews; a true descendant by Jacob from Abraham the father of the faithful, called an Hebrew, (Eber joined not in building Babel,) Gen. x. 21, 25; xiv. 13; 1 Sam. iv. 6; signifying that he was of the truly ancient lineage which retained the Hebrew tongue, John viii. 33, 39; Acts xxii. 2; Rom. iv. 12; 2 Cor. xi. 22. As touching the law, a Pharisee; by religion and stricter observation of the law, according to the prescript most in vogue, of that sect which for learning, knowledge of the Scripture, and reputation for holiness, was the most eminent, Acts xxvi. 5; yea, and his father was of this order before him, Acts xxiii. 6.

Concerning zeal; not lukewarm, but exceedingly fervent in the strictest observances of the Pharisaic order, which was much in external devotion, Luke xviii. 12, very solicitous for proselytes, Matt. xxiii. 15, 25. Herein he was above his equals for years, being exceedingly zealous of the traditions of the fathers, Gal. i. 14, (and his zeal had been very commendable had it been in a good matter, Gal. iv. 18,) that which the false apostles contended much for. Persecuting the church; which he showed all manner of ways in his rage against the church of Christ, conceived by the Pharisees to be opposite to the law of Moses, Acts ix. 1; xxii. 3, 4; xxvi. 9—12; Gal. i. 13. Touching the righteousness which is in the law, blameless; he rises higher yet in his personal obedience; he might have been a zealot in his sect, and yet a hypocrite, if not of a scandalous life; but it seems, in the external observation of those things which the ceremonial or moral law did prescribe, he was, in the eye of man, of a blameless conversation, resembling Zacharias and Elisabeth, Luke i. 6. Men could not tax him, he had behaved himself so conscientiously, Acts xxiii. 1; yet when he had his eyes opened, he found here was no such matter of confidence for him before God, 1 Sam. xvi. 7; 1 Cor. iv. 4. This external performance he found, when enlightened, was far short of internal and perfect obedience, Rom. vii. 7; and therefore he saw it necessary to change the ground and foundation of his confidence, all that he before rested on, unto Christ alone, 1 Cor. iii. 11; 2 Cor. v. 17; not seeking to receive honour from men, but that from Christ only, John v. 44.

7 But <sup>s</sup>what things were gain to me, <sup>t</sup>as that I counted loss for Christ.

Having argued how he might have had as great a plea for confidence of his acceptance with God as any, if it would have held from the recited particulars, he now shows, how advantageous soever they had, in the judgment of others as well as himself, been reckoned to be, before he was effectually called, yet, since the scales fell off his eyes, that he could discern the truth, he was so far from accounting them profitable, that indeed he accounted them prejudicial; so far from an advantage, that they were a damage to him, looking for salvation by Christ alone, Matt. xxi. 31; Rom. ix. 30. They were but as pebbles that hide the Pearl of price, Matt. xiii. 46; as ciphers to this figure, that can make any thing valuable, therefore by Paul preferred to all before.

8 Yea doubtless, and I count all things <sup>u</sup>but loss <sup>v</sup>for the excellency of the knowledge of Christ Jesus my Lord: for whom I have suffered the loss of all things, and do count them <sup>w</sup>but dung, that I may win Christ,

Yea doubtless; he very emphatically, in the Greek, expresseth his stronger resolution upon further deliberation. And I count all things; as he had reckoned and rated when he was first wrought upon to entertain Christ, so at present he did not alter his judgment, in the valuation of any thing he had rejected; yea, he speaks universally, what he did but indefinitely, using the present tense with a discretive particle: he disesteemed, not only his Jewish privileges and exercises before, but his Christian after conversion, as of any worth to commend him to God, or as any matter to be rested on for his justification before God; showing he did not ascribe his being accepted to eternal life, unto his own works after he was renewed, and now had so many years served God in his apostolical ministry, performed such excellent works, planted so many churches, gained so many souls to Christ, passed through perils for the name of Christ. He remarkably puts in all, not only which he had before recited, but to all works as such whatsoever, yea, and to all whatsoever could be thought on besides Christ. But loss; whatever they be in themselves, they are but loss or damage, of no worth to me, as to any dependence on them for acceptance with God. For the excellency of the knowledge of Christ Jesus my Lord; compared with the surpassing worth and excellency in the fiducial, experimental (as is plain from what follows) knowledge of Jesus Christ, in his person, offices, and benefits, wherein an eye of faith can discern transcendent mysteries, Isa. liii. 11; John xvii. 3; 1 John v. 20; 1 Tim. iii. 16; 1 Pet. i. 12; to be adored by the sincere servants of so excellent a Lord, Mark v. 30, 33; to have an interest in whom, and to enjoy whom, every thing besides is despicable. For whom I have suffered the loss of all things; for whom (he adds) he did not only account them loss, (as ver. 7.) in his judgment and readiness to lose them, but he actually sustained the loss of them, Acts xx. 23; 1 Cor. iv. 13; 2 Cor. xi. 23, &c.: as to any plea for his acceptance, he suffered them all to go in this case, which he could not do till God, of his rich and insuperable grace, wrought this resolution in him, by his Holy Spirit; then he willingly did it. And do count them but dung; yea, and upon a right stating of the accounts he reckoned he was no loser by the exchange, in that he did esteem them, in a just balance, comparing spiritual things with spiritual, 1 Cor. ii. 13, in point of trust, those excellent things with an excellent Christ, to be no better than dung, as we with the Syriac and others translate the word; or dogs' meat, refuse cast to the dogs, with others; and might agree with the gust of those, ver. 2, whom he calls dogs, Matt. xv. 26; Mark vii. 27. Those much conversant in Greek authors do criticise largely upon the word, which is acknowledged on all hands to import things, if not loathsome, yet vile and contemptible, as chaff, &c.; and so not absolutely, but in their respect, did Paul account all things in comparison of Christ, even our good works proceeding from a heart sanctified but in part; he doth not mean of the substance, but quality of the trust or merit placed in them; not in themselves, but in regard of confidence in them, as to pardon and acceptance with God: not in point of sanctification, but justification, the apostle is here speaking to. So to rely upon them would not only comparatively, but positively, be greatest loss, as keeping from Christ, who is the greatest gain, for which the loss of all besides was to be sustained. That I may win Christ; that he might gain him, and be assured of an interest in him, whom he had above described in his state of humiliation and exaltation. and enjoy communion with him, Matt. xi. 28; Luke xiv. 26, 33; 2 Cor. iv. 6; 1 John v. 12; of whom he would receive more, and for whom he would do more, aiming at the making of Christ himself his own, by some kind of propriety, 1 Cor. i. 30.

"mine own righteousness, which is of the law, but * that which is through the faith of Christ, the righteousness which is of God by faith:

And be found in him; a learned interpreter reads it actively, and may find, or recover, in him, all my losses. But following our own translation: by winning of Christ, the apostle doth not only mean the profession of the faith of the gospel, but his union with Christ, and participation of him, which, in the judgment of the all-seeing God, will answer all damages, when a man comes to stand in judgment at his tribunal here or hereafter, Rom. viii. 1; this being the only course can be taken to be found of him in peace at the last, 2 Pet. iii. 14, for out of him is to be under the curse, Gal. iii. 10; Eph. ii. 3, 12, 13. It is necessary, therefore, that a man be implanted into him, who in his priestly office acted in our name towards God, Heb. v. 1;

x. 7; and that he abide in him, our Head, John vi. 56; xv. 4; Eph. v. 30; Col. ii. 6, 7; 1 John v. 12, and not be found in himself. Not having mine own righteousness; that we might more fully understand his meaning of being found in Christ, he defines it negatively and positively, by distinguishing of a twofold righteousness, supposing one necessary to his acceptance with God: 1. Inherent, within him, which he called his own, as being personally performed by him. Which is of the law: he describes it to be in a conformity to the law, and the righteousness which the law requires, and those works of it, which if a man do, loving God with all his heart, he shall live in them, Rom. ii. 13; iii. 27, 28; x. 5. He makes no distinction of any works done by him before or after conversion, but declares he dare not adventure to be found in any personal inherent righteousness of his own, as to the special end of his justification before God, Gal. iii. 10—12. He doth not say, not having good works, unto which he was created in Christ Jesus to walk in them, Eph. ii. 10; but, not having mine own righteousness; he could not trust to any thing within him, as to his standing before God; however he was now enlightened, and acted by a better principle, having a better end than while a Pharisee, he could not upon that account have confidence towards God, no more than Noah, who was a prophet and preacher of righteousness, and in his generation, as to his inherent righteousness, the most perfect and just man; or Abraham, Gen. xv. 6; Rom. iv. 3; or David, Psal. cxxx. 3; cxliii. 2. But, 2. He stays upon a righteousness without him, which is not his own by any acquisition of his, but the righteousness of another, Tit. iii. 5—7, viz. of Christ, without which he would not be found, and in which he would be found, i. e. that which is through the faith of Christ, having him for its object; which he doth elsewhere oppose to the deeds of the law, or works of righteousness that he had done, Rom. iii. 28; Gal. ii. 16; Tit. iii. 5; as he doth believing unto doing, which describe these two sorts of righteousness, in the one of which he would be found at his trial for justification, in the other he would not, Rom. i. 17; x. 5, 10, 11. Hence, he doth by the following expression signify more clearly the righteousness he stays himself upon, and wherein he would be found at God's tribunal, viz. the same righteousness which Noah had an eye upon (typified by the ark) when, by preparing an ark, he became heir of the righteousness which is by faith, Heb. xi. 7: the righteousness which is of God by faith; not his own, but counted unto him for righteousness; as unto Abraham, who believed God, Rom. iv. 3; as unto David, unto whom God imputed righteousness without works, Rom. iv. 6. This righteousness of God which he imputes upon believing, is not originally the believers' own inherent righteousness, but the righteousness of another in another, and theirs only derivatively from him, in whom believers are made the righteousness of God, 2 Cor. v. 21 (who are not said to be made the mercy of God): unto them, being in Christ Jesus, he is made righteousness, 1 Cor. i. 30, yea, the righteousness of God, Rom. i. 17, (these are spoken of by the apostle distinctly, as here, so elsewhere, Rom. x. 3, with ix. 30, 31,) as not only freely given and imputed of God, but as being only of value in the judgment of God to justify, because performed by him, who is not only man but God, Acts xx. 28; Rom. iii. 21, 24, 25; x. 3. Not that it can be meant of the essential righteousness of God; for the righteousness by the faith of Christ, Rom. iii. 22, or that which constitutes them righteous in God's sight, upon their receiving of Christ and being implanted into him, was that obedience which he yielded unto God for them, voluntarily doing and suffering his will, John xv. 13; Rom. v. 6—8; Phil. ii. 9; 1 Tim. vi. 13; Heb. ix. 14. For this obedience in their stead being fully performed by him who had the Divine and human nature conjoined in himself, was of infinite value, so that his mediatorial righteousness being some way imputed to those who are found in him, they are found righteous before God in his just judgment, as living members of Christ, to whom they are united by the Spirit and faith, John vi. 56; xv. 4; Eph. v. 30, 32; Col. i. 27. This mystical head and body making but one Christ, and thereupon his righteousness is reputed theirs (and thereby they are set right with God) in such a measure as is meet for it to be communicated from Head to members, who partake of the thing imputed, the righteousness which satisfied the law, and therefore most proper to justify against it, and answer the demands of it. And in that it is said to be the righteousness of God by faith, we consider faith as the means whereby we came to be interested in it. Faith itself is not the righteousness, which is upon, not in the believer, Rom. iii. 22, entering into judgment with God; but the righteousness which believers find in Christ, which was ordained of God to denominate them righteous. The law (which requires obedience) having its end in nothing but the righteousness which satisfied it, called the righteousness of Christ, Rom. x. 4, with Tit. ii. 13; 2 Pet. i. 1; wherein the law is established, Rom. iii. 31, and its righteousness fulfilled, Rom. viii. 4; inherent graces are not called the righteousness, but our own, Matt. v. 20; Luke xxi. 19; Rom. x. 8; 2 Cor. viii. 8; Col. i. 4; 1 Pet. i. 21. Christ is so far righteousness as he is the end of the law, and that he is in the satisfaction itself, not in remission, which is an effect of it.

10 That I may know him, and the power of his resurrection, and the fellowship of his sufferings, being made conformable unto his death;

That I may know him; as consequent upon the former he had by winning of Christ, he doth here insist upon sanctification, which would result from faith's exerting itself in a further saving, experimental knowledge of Christ, to be found in whom, he undervalued all besides conformity to Christ in holiness, being to have communion with him in righteousness, 1 Cor. i. 30; God having appointed those who are found in Christ, to be conformed to his image in holiness, Rom. viii. 29; 2 Cor. iii. 18. This saving knowledge is expressed elsewhere in Scripture by the senses, John x. 4; 2 Cor. ii. 14; iv. 6; Eph. i. 18; 1 Pet. ii. 3. All and only those found in Christ, do so know him, John v. 20; vi. 46, 69; Heb. viii. 11; and desire so to know him, chap. i. 9, that they may have a lively sense of his power, communion, and conformity. The power of his resurrection; the power of his resurrection in us; i. e. from the death of the soul, under a privation of spiritual life, and the image of God, unto newness of life, by the effectual working of the same Spirit which raised Christ himself from the dead, Rom. vi. 4, 10; Eph. i. 20; ii. 5, 6; called the first resurrection, Rev. xx. 5; when the soul is raised from under the dominion of sin where it lay. The fellowship of his sufferings; by communion of Christ's sufferings, is not meant of bearing a part in the merit of his personal sufferings, but of being partaker of his sufferings in his members, or mystical body, whether inward or outward, (though this chiefly,) Matt. xx. 23; Acts ix. 4; Rom. viii. 17; 2 Cor. i. 7; iv. 10, 11; Gal. v. 24; Col. i. 24; 2 Tim. ii. 11, 12. Being made conformable unto his death; some read, while made conformable to his death, not only in dying to sin, Rom. vi. 5, 6, but in being conformed to his image in suffering, Rom. viii. 29; dying daily, or always living ready to be delivered to death for Jesus' sake upon his call, Rom. viii. 18; 2 Cor. iv. 11. Such was his Christian temper, that he could cheerfully go through sufferings by reason of some communion and conformity he had in them with Jesus Christ.

11 If by any means I might attain unto the resurrection of the dead.

Being found in whom, after justification and sanctification, he doubts not to be glorified, (by a figure of a part, resurrection of the body, for the whole,) though he expresseth himself as one that must pass through difficulties ere he attain not only to a spiritual resurrection from sin, but a glorious one of the body from the grave, even such a one as will be an elevation or ascension of the body united to the soul, not only exempted from the grave, but exalted into the air, to be for ever with the Lord, 1 Thess. iv. 14, 17; from whom he was assured no death should separate him, Rom. viii. 38, 39; 2 Tim. iv. 8; who lived by faith in expectation of the time and the manner of it, 1 Cor. xv. 14, 19, 30, 32; 1 Pet. i. 6, 7, that he should be then completely holy in his measure as Christ himself is.

12 Not as though I had already attained, either were already perfect: but I follow after, if that I may apprehend that for which also I am apprehended of Christ Jesus.

Not as though I had already attained, either were already perfect: by an elegant anticipation and correction, lest any should conclude from what he had written, as if he were now arrived at the height he aimed at in the excellency of the knowledge of Christ, and a full and perfect stature in that body, or almost at the very pitch, he doth here make a modest confession of his not attainment, (whatever false apostles might pretend to,) 2 Cor. x. 12; xii. 6, 7; but of his earnest desire and utmost endeavour to be raised to the complete holiness he was designed to, in heavenly places in Christ Jesus, Eph. ii. 6. But I follow after; he did pursue with all vigour, as those labouring in the agonistics, with all his might and main, not desponding of obtaining the goal, 1 Cor. ix. 26, with 2 Cor. iv. 8; with groanings and longings after utmost perfection, 2 Cor. v. 4, 6, 7; 2 Pet. iii. 12; as those perfected in glory, Heb. xii. 23. If that I may apprehend that; if that, or whether that, (not as intimating any uncertainty, but his more earnest contending for holiness in the Christian race.) I may lay hold on that attainment to be as holy as men shall be at the resurrection. For which; even as, or for which, (as we render it well so, chap. iv. 10,) i. e. for which end, or for this purpose, to be perfectly sanctified and glorified at the resurrection. I am apprehended of Christ Jesus; he was at his effectual calling laid hold on by Christ, being found in whom, he was striving after perfection. This apprehended is a metaphor borrowed from those that run in a race, one taking hold of another to draw him after to win the prize as well as himself. He eyed Christ having taken him into his hand, as one that would not suffer him to be plucked out by any opposers, John x. 28. He knew that Christ, having brought him nigh unto God, and undertook to work such a measure of holiness in him, one day would completely glorify him, so that, whatever he passed through, nothing should be lost, John vi. 39.

13 Brethren, I count not myself to have apprehended: but this one thing I do, forgetting those things which are behind, and reaching forth unto those things which are before,

Brethren, I count not myself to have apprehended; he repeats, in somewhat a different manner of expression, what he had written in the former verse, with a friendly compellation, gently and kindly to insinuate a caution against the false teachers' suggestion about perfection in this state, from the instance of himself, so eminently called to be an apostle of Christ, (1 Cor. x. 12,) who, after all his labours and sufferings for his sake, did reckon he had not yet arrived to the height of what he was called to. But this one thing I do; but he would have them to understand that he was so intent upon this one thing, for which he was brought by the Spirit into communion with Christ, as if there were not any thing else worthy of his thoughts: as Psal. xxvii. 4; Luke x. 43. Forgetting those things which are behind; like a true spiritual racer, not minding what he had received by grace from him who had took hold of him, or how much he had run of his Christian race, reckoning it was much short of the whole, or the main intended by Christ in taking hold of him. And reaching forth unto those things which are before; but straining forward, as it were, with all his force and skill, casting himself like a dart towards the mark, so running that he might obtain (1 Cor. ix. 24) all and the whole, that was his particular portion for ever, to be received from God, as the purchase of Christ, even the total that God had in and by Jesus Christ designed him, and in Christ bestowed upon him, out of his rich grace, as his special allotment.

14 I press toward the mark for the prize of the high calling of God in Christ Jesus.

I press toward the mark; he did not look back, Luke ix. 62, nor was lazy, but did follow hard, with an eager pursuit, (Matt. xi. 12,) after the perfection that was in his eye; not erring from his main scope; considering what he had received was but in part, he did still press for more, upon that ground that Christ had apprehended him for more, as if he were stretching out his hands to lay hold of it. For the prize of the high calling of God in Christ Jesus; trusting he should, through grace, be kept all along, maugre all difficulties, in the hand of Christ, till upon his account he should be fully possessed of all that was aimed at, even that which is styled the prize, or victorious palm of our high calling; and the Christians' may well be termed a high calling, considering their heavenly birth when called, and laid hold of by Christ, John i. 13, and the purchased inheritance eternally settled upon such spiritual, high-born princes, Eph. i. 14; Rev. i. 6; who are by one oblation perfected for ever, Heb. x. 14; which will appear most glorious when they are raised up in Christ, who will then give out all the salvation he hath called us unto.

15 Let us therefore, as many as be perfect, be thus minded: and if in any thing ye be otherwise minded, God shall reveal even this unto you.

A learned man reads it from the Greek to this purpose: As many therefore as are perfect, let us think this; and if ye think any thing otherwise, even this also God will, or may, reveal to you, (besides what we have attained to,) to walk by the same rule, to think the same thing: conceiving it not congruous to the sense, or syntax, but alien from all manner of speaking, to translate it imperatively, Let us walk by the same rule. But following our own translation: Let us therefore, as many as be perfect; from the instance of himself, imitating Christ, in loving condescension and lowliness of mind, chap. ii. 3, 5, worshipping God in the spirit, and not having confidence in the flesh, chap. iii. 3, in the fellowship of Christ's sufferings, ver. 10, pressing forward to absolute perfection, he here doth with himself encourage as many rulers and ruled who were settled in the fundamentals of Christianity, and who had made progress in holiness, to mind that main business of religion, for the prevention of what might ensue upon exasperating differences; whereupon he styles them comparatively perfect in the way, not in the heavenly country, 1 Cor. xiii. 10; which doth not disagree with what he said before, if we further distinguish of a perfection, 1. Of integrity and sincerity, which some call of parts; as a perfect living child, that hath all the parts of the parent, so, upon the new birth, every real believer receiving grace for grace, John i. 13, 16. 2. Of maturity, proficiency or degrees where grown to a full stature in Christ; here relatively and comparatively to others, who are more rude, ignorant, and weak brethren, since, in regard of their progress in godliness, they are not taken up with childish things, 1 Cor. xiii. 9—11, with xiv. 20; but are grown more adult, and no more children, 1 Cor. ii. 6; Eph. iv. 13, 14; Heb. v. 13, 14; vi. 1; which he doth elsewhere, in regard of their experimental knowledge, call spiritual, Gal. vi. 1, who here worship God in the spirit, ver. 3: as many as are sincere, of whatsoever stature, whether bishops, deacons, or private Christians. Be thus minded; he would have them to be so minded as he himself was, in renouncing all carnal confidence, acknowledging their gradual imperfection, and still to be striving and contending to a fuller measure of holiness, till they come to be consummate in Christ. And if in any thing ye be otherwise minded; and if any, through ignorance of Christ and themselves, conversing with those ready to mislead them, should be of any other persuasion in some things only, considering the different attainments of the strong and weak, and thereupon the variety of sentiments, whence would spring some differences not only in opinions but practices amongst them, (which yet hindered not their agreement in what they were attained to,) God shall reveal even this unto you; he hoped Christ, who had already called or apprehended those sincere ones, would in due time rescue them from so dangerous an error, 1 John i. 20, 27, if they would attend upon him in the use of means to come to the knowledge of the truth, with faith and prayer, yielding up themselves to be taught of him.

16 Nevertheless, whereto we have already attained, let us walk by the same rule, let us mind the same thing.

Nevertheless, whereto we have already attained; however, let us, or we ought to, walk in obedience to Christ, love to him and each other, according to the light we have already received, trusting he would make known his mind more clearly to us. Our using the light we have well, is the ready way to have more: it behoves us, then, to live suitably to that degree of the knowledge of Christ we have attained, 1 John. ii. 3—5 but still within our lines, with regard to the same rule. Let us walk by the same rule: whether in this metaphorical allusion the apostle do borrow his phrase from architects, soldiers, or racers, is not much material. Be sure he had an eye to that same rule which was well known to them, and by which he regulated himself, and therefore it was such a canon as really had a Divine stamp upon it, that very canon in exact conformity whereunto God's Israel might be sure of the best peace, Gal. vi. 16; Phil. iv. 7. The unerring word of God, exemplified in the condescending love of Christ, whom he had proposed to their imitation, in whom he was found, and the fellowship of whose sufferings he desired to know more perfectly, being heavenly-minded, in opposition to those who became enemies to his cross, ver. 18, 19, with Gal. vi. 14, 15; the rule of faith, love, and a Christian life, or heavenly conversation, which he doth elsewhere call a walking in the Spirit, and according to the Spirit, in opposition to walking in and after the flesh, Rom. viii. 1, 5; Gal. v. 16. Let us mind the same thing: in like manner, all of us who are spiritual, grown Christians, should be so affected, being of one accord, one mind, and one judgment, in imitation of Christ; so far that the adult, or better grown Christians, should not despise the weak or less grown, neither should they judge the adult; but in the fundamental articles, those main principles of the Christian institution wherein we all agree, in that common salvation towards which we all press, agreeable to the analogy of faith, we should still be perfecting holiness in the fear of God, by the same rule of faith, and loving and mutual condescension, by the unity of our judgments in the main business of religion, the concord of our affections, the concurrence of our ends, our consent and delight in the same truth: we should declare to the church of God, in our differences Christ is not divided, but in the variety of persuasions in lesser matters, (not fundamental,) the purity, holiness, and peace of the church is still preserved, chap. ii. 14. The main principles attained wherein dissenting parties agree, being the measure of all other doctrines, to hold nothing inconsistent with the majesty or truth of the foundation; to walk circumspectly, and in order, according to that wherein is a harmony; not to break our rank, or leave our station, contrary to received precepts; wherein every Christian is to exercise a judgment of discerning for himself, Rom. xiv. 23, and not impose on each other, (as that sort of Christian Jews who did compel the Christian Gentiles, Gal. ii. 14, 15, &c.) superadding no preter-evangelical doctrine, Gal. i. 8, 9; to live godly, agreeably to known truths; to serve God soberly and prudently, (with due moderation,) in our places, consonantly to the measure of the rule God hath distributed to us, 2 Cor. x. 13, holding the truths wherein we agree in love, unity, and constancy. It being more reasonable that the many truths wherein we agree, should cause us to join in love, which is a Christian duty, rather than the few opinions wherein we disagree, should cause a breach in affection, which is a human infirmity.

17 Brethren, be followers together of me, and mark them which walk so as ye have us for an ensample.

Brethren, be followers together of me; he doth here not only propound his own single example to the brethren at Philippi, as he doth to others elsewhere, 1 Cor. iv. 16, implying the limitation there expressed, viz. as he and others were followers of God and Christ, 1 Cor. xi. 1; Eph. v. 1; 1 Thess. i. 6; ii. 14; but, by a word expressing joint consent, he would have them to be fellow imitators or fellow followers of him and others in what he had exhorted them to, yea, with one heart. And mark them which walk so as ye have us for an ensample; so they would be like other churches which he had planted, that had an eye upon his example; whom he would have them accurately to observe, following their faith, and considering the end of their conversation, Heb. xiii. 7, agreeing with his, and Timothy's, (who joined with him in this Epistle,) and other's, in opposition to those who were causal of division, Rom. xvi. 17; 1 Cor. i. 12, even such as he describes, ver. 18, 19; who did not lord it over God's heritage, but were ensamples (in faith, love, and humility) to the flock, 2 Cor. i. 24; 1 Tim. iv. 12; Tit. ii. 7, 8; 1 Pet. v. 3.

<sup>o</sup> Gal. 1. 7. that they are ° the enemies of the cross of Christ:

He doth, as in a parenthesis, according to our Bibles, allege reasons for his proposals. For many walk; there were not a few who did at present walk otherwise, being evil workers, ver. 2, not to be imitated or followed, Matt. vii. 22, 23. Of whom I have told you often; of which, as a faithful watchman, he had again and again given them warning. And now tell you even weeping; and now also by this present writing, out of great compassion to their immortal souls, he did repeat it again with tears in his eyes. That they are the enemies of the cross of Christ; they were such who did in the general (whatever they might under a fair show pretend) oppose the gospel of Christ, yea, did in effect under the cloak of profession, that which was in a tendency to evert the true Christian doctrine, discipline, and holiness. They did go about to mingle the law and the gospel, to join Moses with Christ for justification, as ver. 4, &c.; Gal. ii. 21, and so undervalue redemption from the curse, Gal. iii. 13; v. 2, 4. In special, these Epicureans (as it should seem they were by the following character, rather than real Christians) might rightly be called enemies, because they did seem by their sensuality to restore the kingdom to those whom Christ had on his cross openly spoiled of it, Col. ii. 15, that they might gratify the Jews in urging the necessity of circumcision; so undermining the virtue and merit of Christ's passion, defaming the end of it, as the Jews did him in it, and in times of trial avoid persecution, Gal. vi. 12, 14, they showed themselves by interpretation really to be enemies to Christ crucified, 1 Cor. i. 23, 24; ii. 2.

Whose end is destruction; their condition will at last be miserable, as he had limited above, chap. i. 28, of their being under the dismal token of perdition; their end will be according to their works, 2 Cor. xi. 15. However they may live delicately at present, in gratifying their sensual appetites, be free from persecution, admired and respected by many, and please themselves in their present course, yet their fruit and wages at the last cast will be dreadful, Rom. vi. 21, 24; Gal. vi. 8; Rev. xviii. 8; xix. 20, 21. Whose God is their belly; the great business of these is, their sensuality, their good eating and drinking; they mind the pleasing of their carnal appetite, as if it were their God, 2 Pet. ii. 13, 18; iii. 3; instead of our Lord Jesus Christ, really they serve their own belly, Rom. xvi. 18, love their pleasures indeed more than God, 2 Tim. iii. 4. And whose glory is in their shame; yea, they boast of those things whereof they ought to be ashamed, thinking it reputation they have got many to imitate them, John v. 44; xii. 43; they are puffed up with that which should rather make them to blush, 1 Cor. v. 2, as being attended at last with confusion. Who mind earthly things; however under the colour of Christianity, they at present are taken up in the pursuit of their sensual and earthly enjoyments. The Greek word comprehends the actions and operations of the mind, will, and affections, importing they did inordinately mind, favour, and relish subluxatory accommodations, Rom. viii. 5, the profits, ease, bounty, pleasure, and glory of this world, preferring them in their hearts to the things of Christ.

For our conversation is in heaven; he here adds a further reason why he would have them to be fellow followers of him, and such-like as he, because though they were not already in heaven, yet their citizenship was there, the privileges of that city did belong to them, who, according to the municipal laws of that corporation (which cannot lose its charter or be disincorporated) whereof they were free denizens, made it their business to demean themselves with minds above the earth, chap. i. 27; 2 Cor. iv. 18; Eph. ii. 6; Col. iii. 1; accounting nothing inconvenient to any one of them, which was for the advantage of the whole community; they set their affections on things above, John xiv. 2; 2 Cor. xii. 25; Heb. xiii. 14. From whence also we look for the Saviour, the Lord Jesus Christ; and reason good, for from thence, or from that place, in the heavens, or heaven, they steadfastly expect him who is both Lord and Christ, Acts i. 11; 1 Cor. i. 7; 1 Thess. i. 10; 2 Tim. iv. 8; Tit. ii. 13, to come not only as their judge, 2 Tim. iv. 8, but as their heart-comforting Saviour, Heb. ix. 28.

21 <sup>a</sup> Who shall change our vile body, <sup>b</sup> that it may be fashioned like unto his glorious body, <sup>c</sup> according to the working whereby he is able even to subdue all things unto himself.

Who shall change our vile body; who shall transform the body of our humility, or our lowliness, i. e. our low-brought body, the singular for the plural, our humble and mean bodies, which depend upon and are beholden to our eating and drinking, and the actions which follow thereupon, that go humble and lower them, Luke i. 48; now, it may be, languishing with pains, sickness, and many infirmities, perhaps cooped up in a noisome prison, and, it may be, an unclean dungeon, sown in dishonour and weakness in the grave, 1 Cor. xv. 43. That it may be fashioned like unto his glorious body; that they may be conformed to Christ's incorruptible, impassible, and immortal body, and so glorious, 1 Cor. xv. 51—53, in their proportion agreeing with the blessed body of our Lord when he shall appear, 1 John iii. 1—3, and they shall see him with the eyes of their bodies, made like unto his, Job xix. 26, 27; Col. iii. 4, not in equality, but only in respect of the same qualities that his body hath, 1 Cor. xv. 51, 52; 1 Thess. iv. 17. A conformity agreeable to that of head and members, that like as the sun is the fountain of all that glory which the stars have, so shall our Lord and Saviour Christ's glory be of all our glory, Dan. xii. 3; Matt. xvi. 27; 1 Cor. xv. 40, 41; 2 Cor. iv. 14; Rev. xxi. 11, 23. But we must not imagine that our bodies shall be raised to the same height and degree of glory that his is: and therefore in regard of that power and majesty which is included in the body of Christ from the hypostatical union, our bodies will not be conformable, or made like to his; but in glory which he obtained from his resurrection. For the body of Christ may be considered either, 1. In its nature, and so there will be an agreement betwixt the bodies of saints and Christ's body; or, 2. In regard of its subsistence in the person of the Word, and so there will be none. For it is impossible that the saints should be raised up to the same union with the Godhead which Christ hath. But however their bodies may be tormented here, by unreasonable persecutors, then they shall be like to his glorious body. According to the working whereby he is able even to subdue all things unto himself: how incredible soever this may appear to be unto carnal reason, Acts xvii. 32; xxvi. 8, yet he who thought it no robbery to be equal with God the Father, and therefore can do what he pleaseth, Luke xviii. 27, can, by the same Divine power whereby he himself was raised from the grave, John v. 21, 26, 29; Eph. i. 19, 20, subject all things to himself, destroy death and the grave, 1 Cor. xv. 24—27; Heb. ii. 8, 14, raise them up to the throne of his glory, Matt. xix. 28, and make them like the angels in glory.

CHAP. IV

Paul exhorteth to steadfastness in Christ, 1; and after some particular admonitions, 2, exhorteth generally to religious joy, 3, 4, moderation, 5, trust in God with prayer, 6, 7, and to every branch of moral goodness, 8, 9. He testifieth his joy in the care shown by the Philippians for his supply in prison, though being always content he was above want, 10—14; and commendeth their former liberality to him, not for his own sake, but for the good that would redound to them from it, 15—17. He acknowledgeth the receipt of their late bounty, assuring them that God would both accept and reward it, 18, 19. He giveth glory to God, and concludeth with salutations, and a blessing, 20—23.

Therefore; this participle connotes that which follows to be inferred by way of conclusion from what he had premised in the close of the former chapter, in opposition to the shame of the earthly-minded, concerning the glory of the heavenly-minded. My brethren; he affectionately owns them to be his brethren in the common faith, Tit. i. 4. Dearly beloved; those who, not being enticed by the insinuations of seducers, did adhere to him, had his sincere affections, chap. ii. 12. And longed for; whose safety and felicity every way he most heartily desired, chap. i. 8; ii. 26; with Rom. i. 11; 1 Thess. iii. 6. My joy; intimating how their faith and holiness did at present afford matter of rejoicing to him, chap. i. 4, 7, 8, with 1 Thess. ii. 19, 20. And crown; he was not ambitious of man's applause, but accounted them his honour and glory, the great ornament of his ministry, whereby they were converted to Christ, (as elsewhere in Scripture a crown is taken figuratively, Prov. xii. 4; xiv. 24; xvi. 31; xvii. 6.) 1 Thess. ii. 19; the reward which had some similitude with the honour they had who were victorious in a race, chap. ii. 16, 17: as James i. 12; 1 Pet. v. 4; Rev. ii. 10; iii. 11. So stand fast; he exhorted them not barely to stand, but so to stand that they did not fall, 1 Cor. x. 12. Hereupon he adds, in the Lord; i. e. considering their relation unto Christ, they would derive power and virtue from him; into whom they were implanted, to persevere, conformably to his will, in Christian concord, till they were made like to him, chap. iii. 21, with i. 27; John xv. 4, 7; 1 Cor. xv. 58; xvi. 13; Gal. v. 7; Eph. vi. 11, 14. My dearly beloved; in whom looking upon them, (the more to fix them,) he pathetically and rhetorically repeats his endearing compellation beloved.

2 I beseech Euodias, and beseech

d. ch. 1. 2. Syntyche, that they be of the same
e. 2. 15. mind in the Lord.

I beseech Euodias, and beseech Syntyche: after his general persuasive to perseverance, he doth here particularly by name with great affectionateness importune two women, who had been very useful in that church for the furtherance of the gospel, that they would come to a better understanding of each other, and the interest of religion amongst them, who received the gospel upon Paul's preaching, Acts xvi. 13. That they be of the same mind in the Lord; as he had moved all to love, unity, and amity, (as it became disciples of Christ,) chap. ii. 2; so he doth here especially move them unto unanimity, according to the mind of the Lord, and his way, for the sake of him whose honour is to be preferred to all private concerns, Rom. xv. 5.

3 And I intreat thee also, true yoke-

f. Rom. 16. 3. fellow, help those women which 'laboured

f. Ez. 32. 32. also, and with other my fellowlabourers,
Ps. 68. 28. whose names are in 'the book of life.

And I intreat thee also, true yoke-fellow; he subjoins his most importunate request to some eminent person who did faithfully and sincerely draw in the same yoke of Christ with him, even such another in that church at Philippi, (whom they well knew from the freedom he used when he planted the gospel amongst them, or might more distinctly know from Epaphroditus,) as he had represented Timothy to be, chap. ii. 20. Some, both ancient and modern, would have this to be Paul's own wife, whom he left behind; but seeing it doth not appear that when he wrote this Epistle he had ever staid above two months at Philippi, he elsewhere reckons himself amongst the unmarried, 1 Cor. vii. 8, and wished those who had the gift of continency to continue so, under the sharp persecution of the church, for which he was frequent in journeying, labours, and prisons, 2 Cor. xi. 23, there is no cogent argument to evince that he was then married, however he had liberty to have had a wife, as well as Peter and others: see Matt. xix. 29; xxii. 28, with 1 Cor. ix. 5. Some conceive by yoke-fellow here is meant the lawful husband of one of the forenamed honourable matrons: others, one called by that proper name in Greek; but the epithet annexed doth not so well suit. It may suffice to say it was an intimate colleague and sincere companion of Paul's, who was alike affected with him, drawing in the same yoke, for the furtherance of the gospel, his genuine helper; whose special aid, by advice, prayer, and otherwise, he solicited on the behalf of those pious women, who aforesaid (though not by public preaching in the church, which he elsewhere disallowed, 1 Cor. xiv. 34, 35; 1 Tim. ii. 12, but privately) had not only wrought, but earnestly striven together with him, by teaching youth, and other women, good things, Tit. ii. 3, 4; putting themselves in hazard with him, in that difficult work he had amongst them, and enduring troubles with him for the propagation of the gospel, chap. i. 27; Acts xvi. 13; as Phebe, and Priscilla, and Mary, elsewhere, Acts xviii. 2, 3, 26; Rom. xvi. 1-3; 1 Tim. v. 10; 2 Tim. iv. 19; in offices proper to their sex. Clement, probably, was some church officer of Roman extract in that colony at Philippi; whether he, about whose order in the catalogue of Roman bishops historians dispute, there is no certainty. And with other my fellow labourers; the rest, whom he doth not name, but only describe by the assistance they gave him in the holy work of the gospel, probably were other church officers. Whose names are in the book of life; whose names he did in charity apprehend to be enrolled in heaven, as our Saviour speaks to the rejoicing of his seventy disciples, Luke x. 20. We are not to think there is any material book wherein their names were written, but that he useth it as a borrowed speech, intimating his persuasion of them, (as of the election of others, 1 Thess. i. 4, with 1 Pet. i. 2,) that their life was as certainly sealed up with God, as if their names had been written in a book for that purpose; looking upon them by their fruit as truly gracious persons, whom God had effectually called according to his purpose, Rom. viii. 28, 29, 33, which is a book written, Exod. xxxii. 32; Isa. iv. 3; Ezek. xiii. 9; Dan. xii. 1; Rev. iii. 5; xiii. 8; xx. 12; xxi. 27; wherein the Lord knows who are his, 2 Tim. ii. 19.

4 'Rejoice in the Lord alway: and again I say, Rejoice.

He doth here, considering the importance of Christian cheerfulness, which he had twice before put them upon, chap. ii. 18; iii. 1, stir them up to true rejoicing, not only by repetition of the injunction, but by extending the duty to all times, and under all conditions. For though there be woe to the enemies of Christ's cross, who laugh at his followers, Luke vi. 25; yet they who are really found in him, have evermore ground of rejoicing, for all the benefits of God they have through him, and the far more excellent they do expect to receive upon his account, John xvi. 33; 1 Cor. i. 31; 1 Thess. v. 16; 1 Pet. i. 8.

5 Let your moderation be known unto all men. The Lord is at hand.

Let your moderation be known; exercising an even temper of mind, in governing the sensual appetite, with modesty, patience, and gentleness, in opposition to all impetuousness and inordinacy of affections, yea, to all excess and exorbitances in words and actions. Unto all men; both in the eye of the church, and those without, according to our Saviour's sermon and example, Matt. v. 16, 39-41; xvii. 27; not rigorously insisting upon our own rights, but with due self-denial putting the best construction upon the words and deeds of others; not troubling our hearts, John xiv. 1; banishing that solicitude about the good things of this life, which he doth in the next verse caution against: so 1 Cor. vii. 29-32. The Lord is at hand; considering the cogent motive of the Lord's approach, as Heb. x. 25; James v. 8; not only in regard of his Deity, whereby he reigns amongst his enemies, Acts xvii. 27; Jer. xxiii. 29; nor in regard of his special aids to his servants, Psal. xv. 5; but in regard of his coming to judgment, and setting all things right in a just distribution of rewards and punishments, to comfort his children, and confound those that disobey him, Matt. xviii. 34, 35; Mark x. 29, 30; Col. iii. 24; iv. 1; Heb. x. 37; 1 Pet. iii. 8, 9; Rev. xxii. 20. But still we must remember, when we conceive of the Lord's being at hand in regard of death and judgment, we must not take our own but God's measures, in waiting our appointed time during his pleasure, Matt. xxiv. 36; Acts i. 7.

Be careful for nothing; he dissuades not from a spiritual care, arising from a good principle, according to a right rule, for a good end; this care of diligence, in a due manner, within our own sphere, is incumbent on us, both for spirituals and temporals; as chap. ii. 20; with Rom. xii. 11; 2 Cor. xi. 28; xii. 14; 2 Thess. iii. 10; 1 Tim. v. 8; 2 Tim. ii. 15: yet he earnestly dissuades from and prohibits all carnal solicitude, or carking, distrustful, worldly care, which doth divide and, as it were, split the heart in pieces; that anxious solicitude, which doth torture the mind with such thoughts as our blessed Lord will not allow so much as one of them to be predominant in his real disciples, Matt. vi. 25, because such immoderate, distracting care, is on our part a disparagement to our heavenly Father's good providence, Matt. vi. 32; with Psal. lv. 22; cxvii. 1, 2; Matt. iv. 18, 19; 1 Pet. v. 7. The remedy against which he doth here subjoin. But in every thing; but in all things, or in every occurring necessity, whether prosperous or adverse; sacred or civil, public or private: some render it, every time, in every condition, on every occasion. By prayer; by petition or appreciation of good to ourselves or others; mercies, or blessings, temporal, spiritual, and eternal. And supplication; and by a deprecation of evils felt or feared, wrath and judgments deserved. With thanksgiving; with a grateful acknowledgment of mercies received, benefits conferred, and deliverances vouchsafed; implying that no prayer is acceptable to God, without this ingredient of thankful resentment of his favours. Let your requests be made known unto God: our affectionate desires should be opened to God, and poured forth before him; not that he is ignorant of us or our wants in any circumstances, but that he accounts himself glorified by our addresses to him, in seeking to be approved and assisted of him in every condition.

Col. 3. 15.

7 And <sup>1</sup> the peace of God, which passeth all understanding, shall keep your hearts and minds through Christ Jesus.

He adds, as an encouragement to prayer, the peace of God, who was in Christ reconciling the world unto himself, so that upon believing and obeying the gospel, they who really do so are reconciled to him, 2 Cor. v. 19, 20, and at peace with him, Rom. v. 1, through Christ, who leaves and gives peace to his, John xiv. 27. It is then the peace of God, in that he is the object, the donor, the author of it, by his Spirit, to those who persevere in the communion of Christ, as in ver. 9, have the God of peace with them, and a sense thereof in their own spirits. Which passeth all understanding: how it transcends a finite understanding, may be answered, 1. In that he who hath perceived it, before he had done so, could not sufficiently conceive in his own mind what at length it might be, 1 Cor. ii. 9: hence, 2. After it is perceived, it cannot be that any one should esteem and express the power and virtue of it, according to the worth and excellency of the matter. Not that the peace should affect the heart, the will without the intervention of the understanding; since it is said to keep the heart and mind; and, Rev. ii. 17, the white stone given to believers (whereby this peace is signified) is of that kind, which no man knoweth save he that receiveth it; and it is no new thing in Scripture, to say that doth exceed all understanding, which human understanding doth not so distinctly conceive as to be able to express it, as Eph. iii. 19. So man's mind doth receive that which is taken into admiration, that it perceives something always to remain, which it hath notice of, yet cannot so perceive as to express the whole of it. Shall keep your hearts and minds through Christ Jesus; wherefore they who are really interested in this peace shall be kept as in a garrison, 1 Pet. i. 5. So their whole souls shall be in safety against the assaults of Satan, their affections and reasoning shall be so kept in order, that, through Christ, they shall not finally fall.

venerable.

8 Finally, brethren, whatsoever things are true, whatsoever things are honest, whatsoever things are just, whatsoever things are pure, whatsoever things are lovely, <sup>1</sup> whatsoever things are of good report; if there be any virtue, and if there be any praise, think on these things.

As to what remains, he doth, with the fair compellation of brethren, furthermore propose to their serious consideration, living in the neighbourhood of the Gentiles, what he doth here, hastening to a conclusion, heap up and fold together: especially, whatsoever things are true, agree with truth and doctrine, in word and conversation, which show candour and sincerity of conscience, both with reference to believers and to infidels, Psal. xv. 2; Eph. iv. 14, 15, 25. Honest; venerable and grave, as becometh the gospel, chap. i. 27, to adorn the gospel of God our Saviour, Rom. xii. 17; xiii. 13; Tit. ii. 10; avoiding what may argue levity or dishonesty in gesture, apparel, words, and deeds, 2 Cor. vii. 2. Just; giving what is due to every one by the law of nature, or nations, or the country, without guile, and not injuring any one, Ruth iii. 13; Neh. v. 11; Matt. xxiii. 21; Rom. xiii. 7, 8; Col. iv. 1; 1 Tim. v. 8; Tit. i. 8; ii. 12. Pure; keeping themselves undefiled in the way, Psal. cxix. 1, from the pollution of sin, 1 John iii. 3, and the blemishes of filthy words and deeds, Eph. iv. 29; v. 3—5. Lovely; whatsoever may gain the real respect of, and be grateful to, good men, in an affable deportment acceptable to God, Tit. iii. 2. Of good report; whatsoever is in a tendency to maintain a good name; not to court vain-glory or popular applause, Gal. i. 10, but that which may be for the honour of Christ, and the reputation of the gospel among the Gentiles, Rom. xv. 2; 1 Pet. ii. 12; in agreement with the word of God; otherwise we must pass through evil as well as good report, Luke xvi. 15; 2 Cor. vi. 8. If there be any virtue, and if there be any praise; and upon supposition there be really any other commendable practice amongst any, any praiseworthy deportment. Think on these things; diligently consider and prosecute these things.

9 <sup>m</sup> Those things, which ye have both learned, and received, and heard, and seen in me, do: and <sup>n</sup> the God of peace shall be with you.

Those things, which ye have both learned; he recommends to their serious practice not new things, but those weighty matters which they had before learned of him when preaching amongst them. And received, and heard; yea, and approved as worthy to be kept. And seen in me; and that all things might be more lively and affecting, with an increase of words, he moves with this, that his doctrine was exemplified by his own practice when amongst them, (as he had hinted before, chap. iii. 17,) expressing the same thing by his life which he did by his word, 1 Tim. iv. 12; 1 Pet. v. 3. Do; whereupon he would have them to be doers also of the same things, 1 Thess. i. 6; ii. 13; Heb. xiii. 7; James i. 22. And the God of peace shall be with you; and in this practice you have comfort from the presence of the God of peace, (as above, ver. 7,) who will embrace and prosper you, being reconciled to you in Christ, and at peace with you: so Rom. xv. 5, 33; xvi. 20; 2 Cor. xiii. 11; 1 Thess. v. 23.

10 But I rejoiced in the Lord greatly, that now at the last <sup>o</sup> your care of me <sup>p</sup> hath flourished again; wherein ye were also careful, but ye lacked opportunity.

But I rejoiced in the Lord greatly; he signifies that he had been much raised in true spiritual (not carnal) joy, that the Lord had by his Spirit wrought in them such enlargement of heart, as did show itself in their care of him for the sake of Christ. What follows, a learned man writes, may be rendered, that now at last, ye could bring to maturity the care of me; for whom indeed ye had been careful, but had not the ability. The apostle's phrase is borrowed from trees, which in the winter season keep their sap within the bark, in the spring and summer grow green, and yield their fruit: so was the Philippians' care of Paul, suffering in Christ's cause; for the Greek word we translate flourished again, or revived, is sometimes used actively, and transitively. So in the Seventy, Ezek. xvii. 24; with the apocryphal writer, Eccles. i. 18: xi. 22; i. 11: and so it may be expounded here, not only of reviving, growing green, and budding again, (which is less than the thing is,) but of bringing forth fruit. For their care of Paul was in their heart, but by reason of troubles it could not exert itself, or yield fruit, but only in the season, (as Matt. xxi. 34.) which the apostle, softening his speech, allegeth as an apology for them: he doth not say there was not any opportunity in respect of himself, but a seasonableness in respect of them; they being destitute of a faculty of bringing forth fruit, ver. 17. (which yet they always nourished in their most intimate affections towards him,) till the present, when at length they had a seasonableness and an ability given them of God, to the perfecting of that fruit for the apostle. For ~~which~~ we translate wherein, may, as chap. iiii. 12, be translated, for where: compare the use of the particle and article, Matt. xviii. 4, with xxvi. 50; Rom. v. 12.

11 Not that I speak in respect of want: for I have learned, in whatsoever state I am, <sup>to be</sup> therewith to be content.

Not that I speak in respect of want: he doth anticipate any conceit they might have, as if he had a mean soul, and his joy were solely for the fruit of their care he had received in the supply of his want, as the same word is elsewhere used, Matt. xii. 44. For I have learned, in whatsoever state I am, therewith to be content; because he knew better things; being instructed at a higher rate, he had practically learned to rest satisfied with his own lot, 2 Cor. xi. 27, accounting God's allowance a sufficiency to him in any condition, 1 Tim. vi. 6, 8. How adverse soever his state was, he had attained to such equanimity that he could be content with such things as he had, Heb. xiii. 5, and cheerfully and patiently submit to God's most wise disposal of him, knowing his most righteous and tender-hearted Father would never leave nor forsake him, having already given him greater things than any of these sub-lunary ones he could stand in need of, Rom. viii. 32.

12 <sup>I</sup> know both how to be abased, and I know how to abound: every where and in all things I am instructed both to be full and to be hungry, both to abound and to suffer need.

He explains the equality of his mind he had through grace attained to, in a free submission to God, either in the absence or affluence of external good things. I know both how to be abased; in a mean and ignominious state, he had spiritual skill to exercise suitable graces without murmuring, or repining when trampled on, 1 Cor. iv. 11; 2 Cor. xi. 27; having entirely resigned his will to the will of God. And I know how to abound; in a higher state, had in much esteem, and well accommodated. Every where and in all things I am instructed; yea, in all circumstances religiously initiated and taught, fortified against temptations on all hands. Both to be full and to be hungry, both to abound and to suffer need; when faring well, and having a large revenue, to be temperate, 1 Cor. ix. 25, humble, and communicative, 1 Tim. vi. 18. When hungry and poor, not to be distressed, but confident our heavenly Father will provide enough in his season, Matt. vi. 32; vii. 11; 2 Cor. iv. 8, giving an elixir at present that will turn all into gold.

13 I can do all things through Christ which strengtheneth me.

Having written of the great things he had learned, that it might not be attributed to his proud conceit, or give occasion to any others' vanity to boast, (as he had recourse before to the Divine efficiency to will and do, chap. ii. 13,) he rests solely for power upon Christ, being found in whom, when he saith he can do all things, we are not to understand it absolutely, but restrictively to the subject matter he had before mentioned in the precedent verses, intimating he could by the Lord's help use well both prosperity and adversity: or, all those things the Lord called him to and put him upon. Not, as the papists urge, that any mere man since the fall is able in this life perfectly to keep the commandments of God; but that he by faith being united to Christ, by the power of his Spirit dwelling in him, hath in the Lord righteousness and strength, Isa. xlv. 24; and thereupon hath a sincere respect to all God's commands, as David had, Psal. cxix. 6; so also had Zacharias and Elisabeth, Luke i. 6; in opposition to Pharisaical obedience: not by any power he had of himself, but through Christ strengthening of him, so that God would accept of his sincere performance (though not every way perfect) of what was incumbent on him.

14 Notwithstanding ye have well done, that ye did communicate with my affliction.

Least any should suspect, from what he had suggested of his contentment, that he was not much affected with their liberality, but might have done as well without as with it, and they might have spared their bounty and labour, he doth prudently commend their Christian commiseration, (as the phrase is, Acts x. 33,) and give them to understand how acceptable their reasonable supply was to him, who did so joyfully resent their kindness to him, in that it was well-pleasing to God, Rom. xii. 15; they did so effectually sympathize and take a share in the oppression he sustained for the cause of Christ, 2 Cor. i. 7, and remember him in his bonds as if it were their own case, Heb. xiii. 3; Rev. i. 9.

15 Now, ye Philippians, know also, that in the beginning of the Gospel, when I departed from Macedonia, no church communicated with me as concerning giving and receiving, but ye only.

He amplifies the present favour the Christians at Philippi had vouchsafed to him, by a thankful recollection of their former liberality. In the beginning of the gospel; soon after he had preached and planted the good things of salvation amongst them, chap. ii. 22; Acts xvi. 12, 13, 40. When I departed from Macedonia; comparing their first benevolence with other churches, when leaving of Macedonia, Acts xviii. 5; 2 Cor. xi. 9. No church communicated with me as concerning giving and receiving, but ye only; none of the rest of the churches had, for the spiritual things received of him in his ministration, distributed of their carnal or temporal, (though that was their duty beyond dispute, 1 Cor. ix. 7, 11, 13, 14; Gal. vi. 6; 1 Tim. v. 17, 18,) but they alone: which might at once commend their Christian liberality, and evince that he in preaching of the gospel was not mercenary, not having exacted a reward from others, but preached the gospel freely, 2 Cor. xi. 7.

16 For even in Thessalonica ye sent once and again unto my necessity.

They, for their parts, were most commendable in this matter, that when he was in Thessalonica, the mother city, (not above twenty-five miles distant,) their care for his comfortable livelihood was more than once manifested, he passing again and again through Macedonia, 1 Cor. xvi. 5; 2 Cor. i. 16; which argues his thankful resentment of the constant purpose of their mind to succour him upon all occasions.

17 Not because I desire a gift: but I desire fruit that may abound to your account.

Neither would he have any of them to think, as if his commendation of them were any oblique insinuations, with design to draw something more from them; he would have them to understand he did not seek himself, or theirs for his use, (as elsewhere, 1 Cor. x. 33; 2 Cor. xii. 14,) but his great intent was, that they themselves might of God's grace have the fruit of their charity they had showed to him, chap. i. 11; iv. 10; which, in the balancing of the accounts, (by accepting as it were of Christ's will, Prov. xix. 17; Matt. x. 42; xxv. 35, 36, 40,) will turn to their best advantage.

18 But I have all, and abound: I am full, having received of Ephroditus the things which were sent from you, an odour of a sweet smell, a sacrifice acceptable, wellpleasing to God.

He further testifies his thankfulness from the effect their gratuity had upon him, by three words here which declare the same thing, viz. that he was abundantly satisfied, having all that he could wish, even enough and more; so that he did not expect any thing more than what he had already received by their faithful messenger Epaphroditus; which he further commends from its great acceptableness to God, in allusion to the sweet odours in the sacrifices that God himself took pleasure in, Lev. ii. 1, 2; iii. 16; Heb. xiii. 16; so that that present God himself would accept through Christ, as if it had been offered to himself, 1 Pet. ii. 5. It is true, the Socinians, to lessen the meritoriousness of Christ's sacrifice of himself, which the apostle mentions, Eph. v. 2, with respect to Gen. viii. 21, would by this text corrupt that: but the truth is, it hath nothing like with that, for the benevolence and gratuity of the Philippians is said by Paul to be an odour of a sweet smell, a sacrifice acceptable, &c.; but it is not said that the Philippians themselves did give themselves and do give of a sweet smell, as it is said Christ gave himself for us an offering and a sacrifice to God for a sweet-smelling savour; which being once offered for all, was sufficient to take away sin, Heb. x. 10, 12. And therefore their reasoning is fallacious from that parity they suggest. It is true, believers and their good works are as sweet odours, Rom. xii. 1, acceptable, but in Christ, 1 Pet. ii. 5, because they please God only for him, for his sake and merit. But Christ, because he doth appease God himself, who smells a savour of rest in his sacrifice, which all others under the law did but shadow, receiving their efficacy from his: Christ did it by himself, believers and their services are only acceptable in him.

20 <sup>e</sup> Now unto God and our Father <sup>f</sup> be glory for ever and ever. Amen.

From thanking of the Philippians, the holy man passeth to a giving of thanks unto God, the first cause, that they might not be elated. He had my God, ver. 19; now, our Father; not only adoring him as Maker of all, but as Father of all the faithful as well as of Paul, being born of him in Christ, John i. 12, 13, through whom he takes a fatherly care of them, Matt. vi. 32. Christ saith, my Father, John xx. 17, as being his only Son by eternal generation; and he allows believers to say our Father, as being his children by adoption. Unto whom they are obliged to ascribe praise, and always to give thanks in the name of our Lord Jesus Christ, Eph. v. 20. And this indeed hath been their practice, which should be ours, Rom. i. 25; ix. 5; xi. 33, 36; xvi. 25, 27; Eph. iii. 21; 1 Tim. i. 17; 1 Pet. iv. 11; v. 11; 2 Pet. iii. 18; Jude 25; Rev. i. 6, &c. It intimates, their hearts being full with the glory of God, their pens and mouths were enlarged accordingly, exciting others to the like doxologies. To almost all which in the forecited places (as here) ever and ever is added, connoting absolute eternity, and joining past, present, and future ages together. This form of Amen, affixed in the close, doth signify how his heart did give, and rejoiced to give, all blessedness to our Father in Christ, as rejoicing that he is so blessed a God.

21 Salute every saint in Christ Jesus. The brethren <sup>a</sup> which are with me greet <sup>d</sup> Gal. 1. 2 you.

He doth friendly embrace and wish happiness to all and every sanctified one who is a member of Christ, hath entirely resigned up to him, and doth abide in him. Then shows, that most probably his colleagues and fellow labourers in the Christian church at Rome, (calling such elsewhere brethren, 1 Cor. i. 1; Col. i. 1; iv. 7; Philem. 1, 7, 20,) chap. i. 14; ii. 25; 1 Cor. xvi. 20, do so likewise.

22 All the saints salute you, <sup>e</sup> chiefly <sup>e</sup> ch. 1. 12. they that are of Cæsar's household.

The rest of the Christians at Rome do the same; more especially they of Nero the emperor's own family and court, his domestics, chap. i. 13. It seems there were some there truly pious and Christian: but however some conceit, there is no real evidence that Seneca was of that number; he being not a courtier, but a senator, who left no real token (we know of) that he was a Christian.

23 <sup>f</sup> The grace of our Lord Jesus <sup>f</sup> Rom. 16. Christ <sup>g</sup> be with you all. Amen.

He concludes this (like his other Epistles) much as he began, (see on chap. i. 2,) praying the same grace of the Lord might abide with them, which he had prayed to them all, chap. i. 1. Amen; not at all doubting, but with full confidence trusting, all should be firm, as he had prayed.

¶ It was written to the Philippians from Rome by Epaphroditus.

THE EPISTLE OF PAUL THE APOSTLE

TO THE

COLOSSIANS

THE ARGUMENT

God having a church planted in the city of Colosse, (by some since called Chone,) situated at the conflux of the rivers Meander and Lycus, in the neighbourhood of Laodicea and Hierapolis, chap. iv. 13, in Phrygia of the lesser Asia; whether at first only by the preaching of Epaphras, one of them who was a servant of Christ, and faithful minister, chap. i. 7; iv. 12; or by Paul himself, who (we learn from Luke that accompanied him) had gone throughout Phrygia, Acts xvi. 6, and again, over all the country of Phrygia in order, Acts xviii. 23, having staid for a season in Asia, where he wrought miracles, and was complained of for turning away much people from idolatry almost throughout all Asia, Acts xix. 11, 22, 26; we may leave undetermined. But whoever was God's prime instrument in planting the gospel here, upon Paul's being advertised by Epaphras, (chap. i. 8; iv. 12; Philem. 23,) that weeds sprang up to choke the good seed; as he was careful for the Philippians during his imprisonment, so for the Colossians, that they might not be perverted by those Judaizing false teachers who mingled Moses with Christ, stickling for the necessity of abrogated ceremonies to salvation, chap. ii. 4, 8, &c., varnishing their doctrines with notions of vain or abused philosophy, did seek to introduce a superstitious worship grounded on human traditions, chap. ii. 8, 18, &c.; but, reposing all their hope of salvation in Christ alone, persevere in that doctrine they had received according to his mind, and in the practice of real holiness with heavenly affections, both personally and relatively in heart and life, craving help of God; unto whom, having blessed God for the grace wrought in them, he doth recommend them in his own and brethren's salutations, contracting as it were the matter he had more fully written to the Ephesians, that Epistle and this, as the Evangelists, explaining each other.

CHAP. I

After saluting the saints at Colosse, 1, 2, Paul testifieth his thankfulness to God for the good account he had heard of their faith and love, 3—8; and his continual prayers for their improvement in spiritual knowledge, right practice, and thanksgiving to God for the benefits of redemption by his Son, 9—14. He sheweth them the exalted nature and mediatorial office of Christ, 15—20, by whom they, who were once enemies, were now reconciled, if they continued true to the gospel, 21, 22, whereof he Paul was made a minister to preach to the Gentiles, 23—29.

A. D. 64. PAUL, <sup>a</sup>an apostle of Jesus Christ by the will of God, and Timotheus our brother,

Paul; he who of a persecutor was become a preacher, and that amongst the Gentiles laid aside his Hebrew name Saul, and made use of this, which was more familiar amongst the Gentiles, viz. Paul, Acts xiii. 2, 3, 9. An apostle of Jesus Christ by the will of God; one of those extraordinary persons immediately deputed by the special command of our Lord himself, with sovereign authority to preach the gospel, and establish his church, which is the highest charge God ever gave to men, Matt. x. 2; Luke vi. 13; 1 Cor. xii. 28; Gal. i. 12: see on Eph. i. 1; iv. 11. And Timotheus our brother; he joins Timothy, as elsewhere Sosthenes, 1 Cor. i. 1, by the title of brother, as being of the same faith, labouring in one and the same work, which might be more for their satisfaction.

<sup>b</sup> 2 To the saints <sup>c</sup>and faithful brethren in Christ which are at Colosse: <sup>d</sup>Grace be unto you, and peace, from God our Father and the Lord Jesus Christ.

To the saints: see on Phil. i. 1. And faithful brethren in Christ: see on Phil. iv. 21. Which are at Colosse: see the Argument. Grace be unto you, and peace, from God our Father and the Lord Jesus Christ: see on Eph. i. 2, and Phil. i. 2.

<sup>e</sup> 3 <sup>f</sup>We give thanks to God and the Father of our Lord Jesus Christ, praying always for you,

We give thanks to God: see on Phil. i. 3. He doth here take in Timothy and others, in acknowledging of God's grace to them, which might express his great good-will to them. And the Father of our Lord Jesus Christ; describing God, to whom they render thanks both absolutely and relatively, as the Father of Jesus Christ, according to both natures: see on 2 Cor. i. 3, with Eph. i. 3. Praying always for you; always when they did address themselves to God by prayer making mention of them, as he also wrote to the Philippians: see on Phil. i. 3, 4.

<sup>g</sup> 4 <sup>h</sup>Since we heard of your faith in Christ Jesus, and of <sup>i</sup>the love which ye have to all the saints,

He instanceth in principal graces, as the matter of his thanksgiving, beginning with faith, described and differenced from the special object of it, Christ Jesus, implying not a bare knowledge or assent, but a trust in him alone for salvation; so Rom. i. 8. Understanding this saving grace with the consequent was wrought in them, as he heard it was in the Ephesians, and Philemon, it was a cogent motive to engage them in solemn thankfulness to God: see on Eph. i. 15, compared with Philem. 5. He joins love, or charity, to all the saints, with faith to our Saviour, because they are in effect inseparable, there being no real embracing of Christ without loving of him, and all his mem- bers for his sake, Gal. v. 6; 2 Tim. i. 13: not as if believers were not to show love or charity to others, who are of the same nature, and so bear the image of God, for this Christ requires of them, Matt. v. 44, 45; but by how much the nearer any are brought to God by sanctification, by so much the more a special love is to be showed to them, as fellow citizens, of the household of God, and the household of faith, Rom. xv. 26, with Gal. vi. 10; Eph. ii. 19.

<sup>j</sup> 5 For the hope <sup>k</sup>which is laid up for you in heaven, whereof ye heard before in the word of the truth of the Gospel;

For the hope which is laid up for you in heaven: hope here, in this description of it, seems chiefly by a metonymy to be put for the glorious eternal salvation hoped for, Rom. viii. 24; Eph. i. 18; which may also include that lively grace whereby we lay hold of eternal life contained in the promise, Tit. i. 2. This indeed is set before believers here to encourage them to fly unto Christ for refuge, Heb. vi. 18, and reserved in heaven for them, 1 Pet. i. 4; which may well quicken in Christian love all the members of Christ in every condition; yet not with a mercenary affection, 2 Cor. v. 14, as if any by offices of Christian love to brethren could merit what is laid up for those who exercise faith, love, and hope, but that God of his mere grace and undeserved love is pleased to reward such as diligently seek him, and thereby gives an exact evidence of his admirable liberality, Heb. xi. 6, which will abundantly weigh down those light afflictions they sustain here, 2 Cor. iv. 17. Whereof ye heard before in the word of the truth of the gospel; hereupon he puts them in mind of the means whereby they attained to this good hope when they first embraced the gospel, viz. by hearing, Rom. x. 14, the word of truth, eminently, 2 Cor. vi. 7; Eph. i. 13; not only because it is the word of Jesus Christ, who is the truth, and the life, John xiv. 6, but because the gospel (which is here put appositively) is the most excellent of all truths, surpassing all in philosophy, and the law, John i. 17.

<sup>l</sup> 6 Which is come unto you, <sup>m</sup>as it is in all the world; and <sup>n</sup>bringeth forth fruit, <sup>o</sup>as it doth also in you, since the day ye heard of it, and knew <sup>p</sup>the grace of God in truth:

Which is come unto you, as it is in all the world; and passing the narrow bounds of Judea, unto all or most of the regions of the world, ver. 23; Matt. xxiv. 14; Acts ii. 5; Rom. i. 8; x. 18. So admirable was the progress of it east, west, north, and south, well nigh over the world as it was then known to the Greeks and Romans; whereupon the apostle might well write, Christ was believed on in the world, 1 Tim. iii. 16: as Christ had said he was the light of the world, and, by a figure of part for the whole, would upon his death draw all men to him, John xii. 32, 46. Yet let not the Rhemists, or any other Romanist, think that the promulgation of the mysteries of the gospel then is any proof of the verity of the Romish religion in these latter ages, when by tyranny they impose for doctrines the traditions of men: they do not bring forth that genuine fruit which the Colossians did. And bringeth forth fruit; viz. becoming the gospel, (as the Philippians did, chap. i. 27.) and true repentance, Matt. iii. 8; xiii. 23; John xv. 16; and real holiness, abiding in the hearts and lives of men, and effectually working in them that believe it, Isa. lv. 10; Acts v. 14; vi. 7; xii. 24; xvi. 17; xvii. 19; xx. 1; 1 Thes. ii. 13; which the practical religion of the papists generally bears no proportion to, being contrary to that. As it doth also in you, since the day ye heard of it; which from the first receiving of the gospel, was found growing amongst the true converts at Colosse, though it should seem false teachers crept in to choke the good fruit with their tares. And knew the grace of God in truth; however, they who had real experience of the grace of God and the excellency of the knowledge of Christ, Psal. iii. 8, did hold, bringing forth fruit in old age, Psal. xcii. 14.

7 As ye also learned of <sup>1</sup>Epaphras our dear fellow-servant, who is for you <sup>m</sup>a faithful minister of Christ;

As ye also learned of Epaphras: to maintain the truth, it did much concern them to have a good opinion of him, who was an eminent instrument in communicating it to them, and therefore Paul doth here very opportunely commend Epaphras, in opposition to those false teachers, who likely might insinuate somewhat to his disparagement. Our dear fellow-servant; the respect they bare, and relation he stood in to them, being dearly beloved of him for his sincerity in promulgating the gospel; and being engaged with them in the service of the same Master, chap. iv. 7; Rev. vi. 11. Who is for you a faithful minister of Christ; his office, which he discharged with fidelity and affection unto them. He did with all honesty and integrity, as became one intrusted by his Master Christ, discharge what was incumbent on him for their good, chap. iv. 13; John xii. 26; 1 Cor. iv. 1, 2; Eph. iv. 12; 1 Tim. iv. 6; Heb. xiii. 17.

8 Who also declared unto us your <sup>n</sup>love in the Spirit.

Having with kindness and delight reported to Paul and Timothy, &c., what a spiritually fervent affection, not moved by carnal considerations, but inwrought by the Spirit, Gal. v. 6, 22, arising from a renewed heart, 1 Tim. i. 5; 2 Tim. i. 7, they had for Christ, for the gospel, the apostle, and all that did love the Lord Jesus in sincerity, Gal. vi. 10; 1 Pet. i. 22, 23.

9 <sup>o</sup>For this cause we also, since the day we heard it, do not cease to pray for you, and to desire <sup>p</sup>that ye might be filled with <sup>q</sup>the knowledge of his will <sup>r</sup>in all wisdom and spiritual understanding;

For this cause we also; he doth here suggest the motive mentioned in the precedent verses, viz. their faith and love, ver. 4, 5, and their special love to him, ver. 8, why he and his brethren had them so much upon their hearts: see on Eph. i. 15—17. Since the day we heard it, do not cease to pray for you: it seems, from the time they were refreshed with these tidings they did (as he exhorts the Colossians here, chap. iv. 2) always upon all solemn occasions wait upon God for the Colossians' spiritual prosperity, as Paul himself did for the Philippians: see on Luke xviii. 1; Rom. xii. 12; Phil. i. 4, 9; with 1 Thess. v. 17. And to desire that ye might be filled with the knowledge of his will; and the subject matter of their instant prayer was, that they might attain to a more distinct, clear, and practical knowledge of the mind of God in Christ, and a greater measure of conformity to what he requires in the gospel, ver. 6; Eph. v. 15—17. In all wisdom; in (rather than with) all necessary knowledge of the things of faith and manners, according to the prescript of the gospel: for sapience or wisdom doth properly respect the most excellent things, and such we learn most distinctly and satisfactorily from the revealed will of God, which we have in the Bible: this is that which Paul and other holy men spake as taught of God amongst the perfect or grown Christians, in opposition both to the wisdom of man and of the world, 1 Cor. ii. 4, 6, being agreeable to the will of God, Job xxviii. 28; Prov. xxviii. 7; John vi. 40; 1 Thess. iv. 3. And with this Christian wisdom some would render the following words, in spiritual prudence, but if we render it understanding, or intelligence, it may be expounded to the same sense; for which there may be very good reason, for the philosopher doth sometimes by the Greek word mean that power or habit whereby men judge aright of things presented conducing to happiness, so as upon a due expense of circumstances to discern the good from the evil, the true from the false, and the real from the apparent: such a gift as Paul prays the Lord would give unto Timothy, 2 Tim. ii. 7, compared with 1 Cor. i. 5, that they might rightly distinguish betwixt the simplicity and purity of the gospel, and those false glosses and colours that false teachers went about to sophisticate it with; not be without understanding (as some who followed our Saviour, Matt. xv. 16) what course they should take in the practice of piety, but be able to discern the times, 1 Chron. xii. 32, and other circumstances, Psal. xxxix. 1; 1. 23; Eccles. v. 1; Luke viii. 18; for the ordering their actions aright, so as they may adorn the doctrine of God our Saviour in all things, as becomes the gospel, Eph. i. 8, with Phil. i. 10, 27; Col. iv. 5; Tit. ii. 10. Ignorance then can be no mother of true devotion, nor the inventions of men acceptable service to the living God, whose will alone is the rule of his worship.

10 <sup>s</sup>That ye might walk worthy of the Lord <sup>t</sup>unto all pleasing, <sup>u</sup>being fruitful in every good work, and increasing in the knowledge of God;

That ye might walk worthy of the Lord: they prayed for the above-mentioned gracious habits, that the Colossians might exercise them in a course of life as it becomes those who are effectually called by the gospel to be the sons of God, and the servants of Christ; suitable to the members of the body of Christ: see on Eph. iv. 1; Phil. i. 27; compared with Rom. xvi. 2; 1 Thess. ii. 12; 2 Thess. i. 11. As the word God alone ordinary connotes the Father, so Lord doth Christ; answerable to whose wisdom, holiness, and example, Christians professing a relation to him, and expecting benefit by his purchase, should behave themselves; so that the papists cannot from this walking worthy of the Lord justly infer a merit of condignity, behaving ourselves as Christians being so far from any merit or desert of ours, that it is a debt, we being indispensably obliged to do so, practice being the end of our knowledge. And this end we are to respect unto all pleasing, i. e. designing and endeavouring not in one thing only, or in few things, but in all things whatsoever are incumbent on us, we may find acceptance with our Lord and Master, chap. iii. 20; 1 Cor. vii. 32; x. 31; 1 Thess. ii. 4; Heb. xii. 28: all should be great and generous, such as may best like our Lord, keeping themselves from the defilements of the age, Rev. iii. 4. Being fruitful in every good work; particularly fructifying, which in the sense may be joined with being filled, ver. 8: being fruitful is a metaphorical expression borrowed from fruit-bearing trees, unto which godly men and real Christians are compared, Psal. i. 3; John xv. 8; and every good work is the fruit which these plants of the Lord, having his Spirit as the seed remaining in them, 1 John iii. 9, do bring forth of every sort from a right principle, 1 Tim. i. 5, according to rule warranted by God, Isa. xxix. 13; Gal. vi. 16; or having a call from him, for his glory: see 2 Cor. ix. 8; Phil. i. 11; 2 Thess. ii. 17; Heb. xiii. 21. And increasing in the knowledge of God: the Colossians were not yet perfect in knowledge, and therefore they prayed that they might go on, and grow in grace and knowledge of God and Christ, 2 Pet. iii. 18, the best here knowing but in part, 1 Cor. xiii. 9; therefore they desired these Christians, as the Philippians, Phil. iii. 10, 12, and the Ephesians, Eph. iv. 13, might come to their stature: see on the texts.

11 <sup>v</sup>Strengthened with all might, according to his glorious power, <sup>w</sup>unto all patience and longsuffering <sup>x</sup>with joyfulness;

*Strengthened with all might, according to his glorious power: whereunto that they might be enabled, it was needful to pray for a power from above, for the best Christians here below are but infirm as well as imperfect, not able to perform what is required of them for doing and suffering the will of God till strengthened: see on Phil. iv. 13, compared with Rev. vii. 17. We have here great need of all might, special aids of God, to discharge difficult duties, to mortify strong corruptions, to contemn worldly allurements, to repulse frequent temptations, to bear manifold crosses, and to improve daily mercies, derived from exceeding great and mighty power; see on Eph. i. 19, 20, with iii. 16; an excellent glorious power, 2 Cor. iv. 7, 13, needful to consummate and complete, as well as begin, the work of grace, 2 Thess. i. 11; a great reality (and not a metaphor) to sincere converts and sound believers. all patience; every way to bear the things which come hard upon them or continue long. Philosophy, with all its prescriptions, is ineffectual to form the soul to true patience and contentment under sufferings, it must be given on the behalf of Christ, Phil. i. 29, to a believer, to suffer patiently in tongue and heart, without a prevailing mixture of passion, so that evils do not make an impression upon him, but he doth possess his soul with patience to the end. And long-suffering with joyfulness; which he could not do with a becoming Christian cheerfulness, when, surcharged with a weight of troubles, he finds himself sinking, if he were not supported with the hands of Heaven, which relieve with present comfort, and raise up to believe a future reward, Matt. v. 12; Acts v. 41; Rom. v. 3; 1 Cor. xi. 32; 2 Cor. i. 5; Heb. xi. 27; xii. 10, 12; James i. 2, 4.

a Eph. 5. 20. ch. 3. 15. 12 *Giving thanks unto the Father, which hath made us meet to be partakers of the inheritance of the saints in light:

Giving thanks unto the Father; he passeth from petitioning, ver. 9, to thanksgiving to God the Father, upon the consideration of his grace manifested in his Son for our redemption. In the Ephesians, chap. i. 3, 4, he began with election, here with effectual vocation; he acknowledged God the Father to be the object and author of what was wrought for us by his Son, and in us by his Spirit. Which hath made us meet; who hath made us capable of communion with himself, or ready and fit, which implies that by nature we are unready and unfit; so that merit cannot be drawn hence, and the Rhemists have done ill, contrary to the translation of the Syriac, to translate it, made us worthy: one copy hath, who hath called us. The original word, in that we follow, seems to be an idiom of the apostle (as the learned think) borrowed from the Hebrew; we find it used only in one other text by the apostle, 2 Cor. iii. 5, 6; and there he shows we are insufficient for, and incapable of, saying good things, till God do capacitate us by making us accepted in the beloved, Eph. i. 6; we cannot understand things of the Spirit of God, nor affect God, John xii. 39; Rom. viii. 5; 1 Cor. ii. 14, till God do draw and capacitate us, John vi. 44, 45; Phil. ii. 13, and form and work us by his Spirit unto this selfsame thing, Rom. iv. 17; 2 Cor. v. 5. To be partakers of the inheritance of the saints in light; to have a part in the lot of the purchased inheritance with them that are sanctified, Acts xxvi. 18; Eph. i. 14. The apostle seems to allude to the land of Canaan, wherein a portion was assigned to every one by lot for his inheritance, that being a type of the rest which remaineth to the people of God, Heb. iv. 9; and this is here said to be of the saints in light, as allegorically connoting the joy and glory of that state and place, in opposition to the power of darkness.

c Eph. 6. 12. Heb. 2. 14. 1 Pet. 2. 9. d 1 Thess. 2. 12. 2 Pet. 1. 11. 13 Who hath delivered us from the power of darkness, and hath translated us into the kingdom of his dear Son:

The power of darkness, which signifies the sadness and despair of the damned, Eph. vi. 12; Jude 8, that they who are made meet to walk in the light as children of the light, Eph. v. 8, are eternally freed from. The word which the apostle useth to express God's delivering of believers from the power of sin and Satan is very emphatical, signifying a gratuitous freedom, where a stranger hath delivered him from slavery who did not deserve it, nor then desire it, Mark iii. 27; Luke i. 74, 79; Eph. ii. 2, 5, 6; Heb. ii. 14, 15, though he was held fast as in fetters of iron. And which is more, he adds another word, hath translated us into the kingdom of his dear Son; intimating he did not leave us as Adam was before the fall, but transport us without any precedent will of ours, by the effectual call of his insuperable grace, John vi. 44; 1 Thess. ii. 12; 1 Pet. ii. 9, from the dominion of Satan, into that of his own Son, the Son of his love, Matt. iii. 17; xvii. 5; Eph. i. 6, amongst his subjects and servants, where he reigns, in his kingdom of grace, Matt. xiii. 11, where Christ dwells in the heart by his Spirit, that is united to him by faith, Eph. iii. 17; iv. 12, 13; Heb. xii. 22, 23; and of glory indeed in our Head, ver. 24, with Eph. ii. 6, by right of adoption,

Rom. viii. 17, and hope of salvation through him promised by the omnipotent and true God, Rom. viii. 24; 1 Thess. v. 23, 24; Tit. i. 2; who may well call it the kingdom of his dear Son, in that he admits none into it but by the mediation of his Son, who makes his subjects willing, Psal. cx. 3, and received this government of his Father, Matt. xxviii. 18; Luke xxii. 29; Eph. i. 6, 7; of whose dear Son Paul hath more to say, to the comfort of his faithful subjects at Colosse, and every where.

14 *In whom we have redemption through his blood, even the forgiveness of sins:

In whom; i. e. in the person of Christ alone God-man, deputed of his Father to die for our salvation, Acts iv. 12; xx. 28. We; as we are in him, made meet, ver. 12. Have redemption; we have eternal deliverance, Heb. ix. 12, effected by a full ransom paid, 1 Cor. vi. 20; vii. 23; 1 Pet. i. 18, 19, for the freeing us indeed out of a state of sin and misery, John viii. 36, or eternal death the wages of sin, Rom. vi. 23; xvii. 20; so that by redemption here is not meant barely laying down the price, Luke ii. 38, nor consummate redemption at the last, Eph. i. 14; iv. 30, but efficacious redemption. Through his blood; upon the account of Christ's offering himself an expiatory sacrifice to God, without which is no remission, Heb. ix. 22; Rev. v. 9; effusion of his blood, by a synecdoche, takes in his humiliation to the death of the cross, and the pains of the second death he underwent for us, Isa. liiii. 5, 6; Acts ii. 24; Gal. iii. 13; Phil. ii. 8. Even the forgiveness of sins; plenary remission of offences is by apposition to, or follows, redemption as a necessary effect, chap. ii. 13; Luke i. 77; Acts x. 43, by a metonymy transferring the cause to the effect: see more on Eph. i. 7.

15 Who is the image of the invisible God, the firstborn of every creature:

Having touched on the benefit of Christ's sacrifice, which implies his human nature, he doth here rise higher, to set forth the dignity of his person, (which made it satisfactory,) both with respect to his Father and the creature. As to the former, he styles him his image, which is not to be understood of an artificial, accidental, or imperfect image, as that of the king on his coin, or as man was the feeble image of God, Gen. ix. 6; 1 Cor. xi. 7; Col. iii. 10; for the apostle's arguing Christ's dignity to redeem, would have no force in it, if Christ were no more than a mere man; but of a natural, substantial, and perfect image: as Seth was the natural image of his father Adam, of the same substance with him, Gen. v. 3; so Christ, the eternal Word, the only begotten Son of God by nature, John i. 1, 18, (see on Phil. ii. 6,) very God of very God, John xvii. 3, 5, doth exactly resemble, perfectly and adequately represent, his Father, of whose person he is the express character, or perfect image, Heb. i. 3. Yet more distinctly Christ is the image of God, either, 1. As he is the Second Person in the blessed Trinity, from an intrinsic relation to the Father, in regard of the same essence with him by eternal generation before the world was made. He being eternally in the Father, and the Father in him, John xiv. 10; so he is in respect of his Father his essential image, and in regard to us as invisible as the Father himself; no creature could be the eternal image of the Creator, as that Son of the only true God, the living God, was, and is, Matt. xvi. 16; John vi. 69, in respect of his Father. 2. As he is God-man, in whom the fulness of the Godhead dwells bodily, chap. ii. 9, whereby he doth infinitely exceed and surpass angels and men at first, Heb. i. 5, 6; ii. 5. The apostle in this place doth not say simply Christ the image of God, but of the invisible God, (considered personally,) i. e. the Father; because the Father cannot be known to us but in his Son, as in an image, in which he would represent or manifest himself to be seen or known, John i. 14, 18; xiv. 8, 9; 2 Cor. iv. 4. And in this latter respect (which imports the manifestative, not essential image) is Christ the image of his invisible Father unto us; unto whom, in all his offices and works of mediation, the attributes, affections, and excellencies of God clearly shine forth, they being otherwise incomprehensible and invisible by a creature: but Christ is the complete image of them, in a transcendent way; for as they are in him, they are incommunicable to any mere creature, and therefore he is the image of the invisible God, in that he makes him visible unto us. God is a pure Spirit, without body, or bodily parts, but yet was clearly manifested in Christ tabernacled amongst us, John i. 14; 1 Tim. iii. 16: he represents him to us in his understanding and wisdom, Prov. viii. 14, 15: almightiness and eternity, Isa. ix. 6; John i. 1: viii. 58, permanency and unchangeableness, Heb. i. 11, 12; xiii. 8, omnipresence and omniscience, John ii. 24, 25; xiii. 18; Rev. ii. 13. Not (as the Lutherans strangely imagine) that Christ is omnipotent with the omnipotency of the Divine nature, or omniscient with that omniscience, as if the manhood did instrumentally use the attributes of the Godhead; but such perfections are really inherent in and appertaining to the manhood, by virtue of its union with the Divine nature in the Second Person of the Trinity, that though they are vastly short of the attributes which are essential to the Godhead, yet they are the completest image of them, and such as no mere creature is capable of. Hence it is said, we beheld his glory, the glory of the only begotten Son of God, who did further represent and manifest his Father to us, in the works of creation and preservation which he did, John i. 3; v. 19; Heb. i. 10. Hence the apostle in this verse considers the dignity of Christ, with respect to the creature, adding to the forementioned intrinsic, an extrinsic royalty, the first-born of every creature, which a learned man would render, begotten before all the creation, or born before every creature, which is a Hebrew phrase. The Greek scholiast and several of the Greek fathers go this way; not as if the ineffable generation of Christ had any beginning, as some falsely conceived Christ to be made in time, just in the beginning before the world, by whom as an instrument all the rest were created; but the apostle doth not say he was first made, or first created; but, ver. 17, was, or did exist, before all things besides; (as John Baptist said, he was before me, John i. 15;) and therefore none of the rank of all them, but of another, viz. equal with his Father, whose image he was, above all that was made or created: he was not created at all, though first-born, or first-begotten, yet not first-created. (being distinguished here from created, as the cause from the effect.) as it refers to him that begets, so it may to only begotten, Christ being so begotten as no other was or could be, Prov. viii. 22; Micah v. 2; Heb. i. 5, 6, even from eternity. The word first may either respect what follows, and so notes order in the things spoken of, he who is first being one of them, 1 Cor. xv. 47; or things going before, in which sense it denies all order or series of things in the same kind: as God is first before whom none, Isa. xii. 4; xliiii. 11; Rev. xxi. 6; so Christ may be said to be first-born because the only begotten Son of his Father, John i. 14: so the apostle may consider him here, in order to establish the consideration of him as Mediator and Head of his church, ver. 18; he speaking before, ver. 16, of those things more generally whose creation are assigned to him, in contradistinction to those of the church or new creation, ver. 18. Agreeably to our translation, first-born of every creature, (note, here is a difference in the Greek, betwixt first-born of and for, ver. 18,) we may consider, 1. Negatively. It is not to be understood properly for the first in order, so as to be one of them, in reference to whom he is said to be the first-born. But, 2. Positively, yet figuratively in a borrowed speech: so primacy and primogeniture may be attributed to him in regard of the creatures, (1.) By a metonymy of the antecedent for the consequent; he who hath the privileges of enjoying and disposing of his father's goods and inheritance, is accounted the first-born, Gen. xxvii. 29; Gal. iv. 1; so is Christ, being Owner, Lord, and Prince of every creature, as he is God-man, or ordained to human nature, he hath the pre-eminence of the whole creation, and is the chief, Psal. ii. 7, 8; Heb. i. 2, 6. The heir amongst the Hebrews was reckoned the prince of the family, and so amongst the Romans the heir was taken for the lord: so God said he would make David his first-born, Psal. lxxxix. 27, compared with Job xviii. 13; Isa. xiv. 30; Jer. xxxi. 9. This sovereign empire which Christ hath over all the creation, and the parts of it, is by his primogeniture, or that he is first-born, since there is left nothing that is not under him, Heb. ii. 8, (as Adam in this lower world, in regard of his dominion, the state of innocence, might be first-born of them created for him.) for the apostle brings in the next verse as the fundamental reason of this assertion. (2.) By a consideration of Christ in God's eternal decree and purpose, as the common womb of him who is God-man, and all creatures; being fore-ordained before the foundation of the world, 1 Pet. i. 20, he may be looked upon as the first-born amongst those who are predestinated to be conformed to his image, Rom. viii. 29, with Eph. i. 4, 5; for upon this account he is the first-born of the first-born creatures or church, (but this, as hinted before, is considered more specially, ver. 18.) Heb. xii. 23, therefore the first-born of all others: and this may be one respect in which he is before them, ver. 17, with Prov. viii. 22; yea, all of them of the old, as well as the new creation. The Socinians are so daringly bold as to restrain this extensive expression of every creature, or all the creation, to the new creation of men or the faithful only, by perverting some texts of Scripture to strain them that way; when it is plain by what follows, the Spirit of God means all created beings, either in the first or second world, Christ being the principal cause both of the one and the other; the apostle, by the general term every creature simply, without any addition, doth import all created things, viz. the heavens and the earth, with all that is made in them: neither angels, nor inanimate and irrational creatures, are excluded; as in the apostle's reason immediately following this expression.

16 For<sup>a</sup> by him were all things created, that are in heaven, and that are in earth, visible and invisible, whether they be thrones, or dominions, or principalities, or powers: all things were created<sup>b</sup> by him, and for him:

For by him were all things created: he proves Christ to be before and Lord over every creature, more excellent than them all, with a prerogative other princes want, for none of them is a creator of his subjects, who were not made by him or for him, as all creatures without exception were made by and for Christ. The apostle here is as cautious as may be, lest by speaking of Christ as the first-born of every creature, he should seem to put him in the order of creatures, which he shows do depend upon him for their creation and preservation, since he brought them out of nothing into being, and therein doth sustain them. By him; in whom they have their beings, live and move, Acts xvii. 28. Some render the particle in, rather than by. But they disclaim the philosophical notions about Platonic ideas, only conceive all to be made in Christ, as the exemplary cause, whom God had in his eternal decree set up as the pattern of all perfections, being his image, according to which it was agreed, in the council of the Trinity, man should be made, Gen. i. 26. But the most do, according to our translation, render it (as a Hebrew phrase) by, (being of the same import with that in the end of the verse,) or through, which is expressive of the principal efficient, not the instrumental cause, for all the things made were produced out of nothing into being immediately by him, John i. 3, 10; Heb. i. 8, 10: he might well be Lord over them all, who was the first founder of them, Acts x. 36; 1 Cor. viii. 6; and whatever the adversaries allege, it is plain in Scripture that by is used of the principal cause, ver. 1; Rom. xi. 31, 36; 1 Cor. i. 1; xii. 8, 9; 2 Cor. i. 1; Gal. i. 1; 1 Thess. iv. 2; 2 Thess. iii. 12. Were all things created: creation is simply, universally, and absolutely attributed to him; for whatever subtilties some would suggest, all things created by him is equivalent to he created all things; compare Psal. xcvi. 5; cii. 25, with Isa. xlv. 24; xlvi. 13; Jer. x. 12; Acts xvii. 24, with Rom. xi. 36: (like 1 Cor. i. 9, with 1 Thess. ii. 12.) That are in heaven, and that are in earth: the apostle speaks extensively of all proceeding from not being into being, both generally and distributively, agreeably to the common expression of all things that were made at the beginning, Acts iv. 24: though in Scripture, where mention is made of the creation, heaven and earth be not always expressed, Isa. xl. 26; Mark x. 6; xiii. 19; Acts xvii. 24; Rom. i. 20; 2 Pet. iii. 4; Rev. iv. 11; but here, where all things in heaven and earth, visible and invisible, are expressed, it is evident that heaven and earth are together comprehended. Visible and invisible : these two adjuncts of visible and invisible do divide all creatures whatsoever, there being nothing made that is not one or the other. Whether they be ; an enumeration is particularly made of the latter, which for their excellency (if any) might seem to be exempted (by those in danger of being beguiled to the worshipping of angels) from the state and condition of being created by Jesus Christ ; particularly, thrones, or dominions, or principalities, or powers ; those he here names, as elsewhere, Rom. viii. 38 ; Eph. i. 20, 21 ; iii. 10 ; vi. 12, in the abstracts for the concretes, the invisible inhabitants of the world. I know some would have dignities in human policy to be meant, as Tit. iii. 1 ; 2 Pet. ii. 10 ; Jude 8 ; but it is more rational, with the generality of ancient and modern interpreters, as chap. ii. 15, to expound these titles of incorporeal and angelical creatures, whether by an emphatical synonyme, angels generally, by a metonymy, being ministers of the heavenly state ; or more probably, as should seem from the scope of the place, by such a subdivision of invisibles as the apostle did conceive there was, according to the properties wherein they were eminent, and the offices whereunto they were delegated of God, which he expresseth disjunctively by borrowed titles from the distinctions of men in dignities and offices here below, as dukes, earls, lords, and other magistrates ; the Scriptures elsewhere intimating distinctions amongst the spiritual ministers attending the commands of the heavenly Majesty upon his throne, represented shadowed by the cherubims, Gen. iii. 24 ; Exod. xxv. 18, 22 ; 1 Sam. iv. 4 ; 2 Sam. vi. 2 ; 1 Chron. xxviii. 18 ; Psal. lxxx. 1 ; Isa. xxxvii. 16 ; Ezek. i. 13 ; denominated archangels and princes, Dan. x. 13, 21 ; 1 Thess. iv. 16 ; Jude 9 ; which imply some distinctions and orders amongst angelical beings, but what that is we know not, (whatever is disputed in the Roman schools from the spurious Denys.) and therefore having no ground from Scripture, account it no better than curiosity to inquire, and rashness to determine. All things were created by him : after his enumeration and distribution of things created, the apostle doth, for further confirmation, repeat the universal proposition or assumption, with a preposition expressive of the same absolute efficiency of causality that is attributed to God the Father and the Holy Ghost ; all created things being made by him, i. e. by Christ, whose works without are undivided from those of the other Persons in the Trinity ; they were all brought out of nothing into being by him, not by angels. And for him ; which is more fully proved from his being the final (as well as efficient) cause of them ; they all had their being in respect of him or for him, i. e. his glory, Rom. xi. 36, to manifest his Divine power and infinite goodness, John v. 17, 23 ; xvii. 5 ; he is their end as well as founder, Rev. v. 13 ; the apostle affirms the same of him that is affirmed of the Father, Job ix. 8 ; Prov. xvi. 4 ; Isa. xlv. 24 ; he made them all for his own sake. The Socinians, in derogation to Christ's Divinity, would restrain, limit, and narrow what Christ saith here in this verse to the new creation, or reparation, but against manifest reason. For, 1. The words creature and creation in the foregoing verse and this, are used absolutely, as was before suggested, and so created, here repeated twice, and joined with the word all, and therefore to be understood, as elsewhere, absolutely of the old or first creation, Mark x. 6 ; xiii. 19 ; xvi. 15 ; Rom. i. 20, 25 ; 1 Cor. xi. 9 ; 1 Tim. iv. 3 ; Heb. iv. 13 ; 2 Pet. iii. 4 ; Rev. x. 6 ; for when it is used of the second creation, or restoration, the restrictive additament of new is joined with it, Isa. lxxv. 17, 18 ; 2 Cor. v. 17 ; Gal. vi. 15 ; Eph. ii. 15 ; iv. 24, not left indefinitely as here. 2. In parallel places, the making and founding of the old creation is ascribed to Christ, both negatively and positively, John i. 3 ; Heb. i. 3, 10 ; not one thing is excepted, and therefore should not be restrained to men. 3. It is most evident from the context the apostle doth in this verse discourse of creation, in contradistinction to what he speaks of afterwards in the 18th and 20th verses, when he comes to treat of Christ as Head of his church, and we have no reason to charge the apostle with a useless repetition further. 4. The apostle's significant enumeration and distinction of things created, doth evidence that he understood the subject, the creation, in the most extensive and unlimited consideration of it. He reckons up material as well as immaterial things, and those in heaven, which needed no restoration, as well as those on earth, which did, being polluted with sin. Those angels who had not put off the honour of the first, did not belong to the new creation ; having not divested themselves of their original integrity, they needed not to be reinvested with that they never lost : and devils cannot be ranked among new creatures, neither can wicked souls, Matt. xxv. 41 ; Rev. xxii. 15 ; neither are there new and old orders of angels ; so that the dominion Christ is here (as elsewhere) asserted as founder of, is the whole, not only the new creation, Rev. v. 13.

17 And he is before all things, and by him all things consist. 1 John 1. 1.
3. & 17. 5.
1 Cor. 8. 6.

And he is before all things : to obviate all exceptions to what he had said before, the apostle doth expressly assert (what was implied before) Christ's pre-existence to all the things that were created, and therefore that he himself was not made, but eternally begotten, and so did exist, and was actually before all creatures in causality, dignity, and time ; which proves his eternity, (consonant to other scriptures, Prov. viii. 22 ; Isa. xlv. 6 ; Micah v. 2 ; John i. 1 ; xvii. 5 ; Rev. i. 8, 11, 17 ; xxii. 13,) because before all things there was nothing but proper eternity, Psal. xc. 2. And by him all things consist : then follows this further argument of Christ's excellency and perfection, that he is not only the Creator or Founder, but likewise the Supporter or Upholder, of all things whatsoever are created, yea, even of the most excellent and useful of them, who in him do live and move, Acts xvii. 28 ; Heb. i. 3 : he being the conservant as well as procreant cause of the heavens and earth, with all things therein, because in respect of God it is the same action which is continued in conservation and providence which was in creation, not breaking off the same influence which was exerted in producing them out of nothing into being, Isa. xlvi. 4 ; John v. 19.

18 And he is the head of the body, the Church : who is the beginning, the firstborn from the dead ; that in all things he might have the preeminence. m Eph. 1. 10,

And he is the head of the body, the church : having spoken of Christ in reference to the creatures in general, or old creation, showing how he is the Creator, Preserver, and Governor thereof, the apostle doth here speak of him with a special reference to his church, or the new creation, whereof he shows here, (as elsewhere, see on Eph. i. 22, 23, with iv. 15, and v. 23,) that he is the Head and Governor, his chosen and called being the proper subjects of his special kingdom, the choice body, unto which he doth more peculiarly relate, ver. 24, for the guiding and governing of it, he being that to it which the head is to the natural body, and more especially in the two former respects : 1. Of their union to God, which was chiefly designed and expressed in those words, who is the beginning, i. e. the first foundation or principle of their union to God, whereupon the first corner-stone of the church's happiness is laid, he being the beginning of the second creation, as of the first, Rev. iii. 14. And, 2. Of their restoration from sin and death, being brought into that first-designed happiness, which is the great intention of that union, as appears from the following expression, the firstborn from the dead, in a special distinction from the dead, here too of the creature, ver. 15. The apostle doth not tautologize, but what he spoke of Christ there with respect to the creature, he doth here speak of him with respect to his church, as 1 Cor. xv. 20, 23 ; Rev. i. 5. By the particle from is implied not only that he was before the dead, but that he was numbered amongst the dead in respect of that nature wherein he was once dead ; from which he was demonstrated to be first-born ; his resurrection with a glorious body (Phil. iii. 21) being a kind of new birth, whereby upon the reunion of his holy soul and body he was born from the womb of the grave, the Head in regard of the members : resurrection is called a regeneration, Matt. xix. 28 ; and as there is a gracious resurrection of the soul upon effectual calling in conversion, so there is a glorious regeneration of the body in the resurrection, Luke xx. 36, in contradistinction to ver. 34. Christ is the first-born of these, in reference to God, Acts xxvi. 23 ; 1 Cor. xv. 20, 23 ; as the first-fruits, or first ear of this blessed harvest, that was carried up into the sanctuary, and offered in due season to the eternal Father, until the rest do become ripe: and in reference to the dead, i. e. in the Lord, 1 Cor. xv. 18; 1 Thess. iv. 14; Rev. xiv. 13; from whom he first rose in regard of time fully and perfectly; and of whom, in regard of dignity and dominion, Psal. lxxxix. 27; Gal. iv. 1, he is chief, and Lord, (hath the pre-eminence, as it follows,) and is first in regard of causality of those dead in him, standing in relation to him their Head, Rom. xi. 15, with 1 Cor. xv. 20, who shall be perfectly raised by virtue of his resurrection. And however it be said, both in the Old and New Testament, some were before raised; yet he was the cause of his own resurrection, as none others were, or can be. He properly rose, and that by his own power, Psal. cx. 7; John x. 17, 18; others were and will be raised by his. In regard of the sort and kind of resurrection, he it was first which was not imperfect, as others, or Lazarus, who was raised but to return to his former state of mortality; but perfect, Christ rose to die no more, Rom. vi. 9; Heb. ix. 28. He was the first that rose as a public person, Head of his church, the Second Adam, representing all his members, 1 Cor. xv. 21, 22, who are raised together with him spiritually, virtually, and representatively, Eph. ii. 6; 1 Pet. iii. 21: those actually raised before in another sort were like singular ears of corn, by occasion more timely gathered for a special instance of Divine power, but Christ was the first that ever rose in the nature and quality of the first-fruits duly gathered, to sanctify and consecrate the whole harvest of the dead in him, who shall one day be raised to a conformity unto him, Phil. iii. 21. The Socinians, from this metaphorical expression of Christ's being the first-born from the dead, and fetching in that passage where it is said, Thou art my Son, this day have I begotten thee, Acts xiii. 33, do oppose Christ's natural and eternal Sonship, but very inconsequently and absurdly; for, 1. Christ was properly the Son of God before his resurrection from the dead, he did not then receive that relation by it, as other texts clearly prove, Psal. ii. 7; Prov. xxx. 4; Micah v. 2; John i. 1; xvii. 5. 2. If his resurrection had been a begetting of him, then would he have begotten himself, so been Father and Son to himself, because he raised himself. As to that other text they allege, things are sometimes said to be done then, when only manifested and declared to be done: then was Christ the first of all the dead that was born, and raised again in incorruption, declared to be the Son of God with power, Rom. i. 4, according to the prophecy: q. d. This day I have manifested thee by raising of thyself to be my natural Son, whom I begat from everlasting. Be sure he hath the primacy and pre-eminence, as it follows. That in all things he might have the pre-eminence; which some expound as the end and intention of Christ the agent, that he might obtain the primacy, Rom. xiv. 9; 2 Cor. v. 15, or hold the first place in all things; whether more generally, according with the common scope of the apostle in the precedent verses, compared with chap. ii. 10; John v. 25, 29; Eph. i. 22; or more specially, amongst his brethren and all the members of his mystical body, Rom. viii. 29, with 2 Cor. v. 17, 18; but this is not material, because all things are brought under his empire. Others, because the primacy doth belong to him by undoubted right, and that he, being Head of his church, did ultimately design to save it, and so to glorify his Father, do expound it rather as the event, consequent, and conclusion from the antecedent, which is the end of the work, so as that, or in such a sort as, he actually is declared to be the first, or he holds the primacy in the old and new creation. According to the agreement with his Father, he is such a one as not only hath all manner of privileges, that any in this or the other world do, or may be supposed to, excel in; but also with a pre-eminence, a primacy in all, above what any one hath in any thing he may glory of.

19 For it pleased the Father that °in him should all fulness dwell;

A learned man reads it, For all fulness pleased to dwell in him. Others, He liked, or approved, that all fulness should dwell in him, bringing instances for that construction of the word it pleased. For it pleased the Father; it is true the word Father is not in the Greek text, nor in the oriental versions, but is well understood and supplied from the context, ver. 12, where the apostle gives thanks to the Father, and then describes his dear Son in the following verses, and here in this adds a cogent reason why he should be the Head of his church, since the Son of his love, (in whom he is well pleased, Matt. iii. 17,) is he alone in whom he likes to dwell with all fulness, or all fulness doth will to abide. That in him should all fulness; here is another all, and a fulness added to that all; an all for parts, a fulness for degrees; a transcendency in all, above all. It is of the Father's good pleasure that Christ, not here considered simply, as the Son of God, but respectively, as Head of his church, and Mediator, should be the subject of this all fulness, which is not directly that of his body mystical, Eph. i. 23. But, 1. Originally, the fulness of the Godhead, whereby he hath an all-sufficiency of perfections for his mediatory office upon the mystical union, which none other hath or can have, chap. ii. 9; John i. 14: of which more distinctly in the next chapter. 2. Derivative-ly, a fulness of the Spirit and habitual grace, Luke i. 80, with John i. 16, 33; iii. 34; holiness, wisdom, power, perfectly to finish his work, John xvii. 4; xix. 30, and other excellencies for the reconciling (as it follows) and actual influencing of his body, Psal. cxxx. 7, 8; Matt. xxviii. 18; John v. 20; Rom. i. 4; 1 Cor. v. 4; with 2 Cor. xii. 9; Eph. i. 20—22; Heb. vii. 25, 26; Rev. v. 6, 12. Dwell; and this all fulness doth not only lodge in him for a time, but resideth and abideth in him; it is not in him as the Divine glory was awhile in the tabernacle of Moses, and the temple of Solomon, but dwells constantly in him, not as a private person, but a universal principle; as Head of the body, (as well as reconciler,) to fill up the emptiness of man with the abundant grace that perpetually resideth in him.

20 And, ¶<sup>p</sup> having made peace through the blood of his cross, ° by him to reconcile ° all things unto himself; by him, I say, whether they be things in earth, or things in heaven.

Or, making peace.
p Eph. 2. 14, 15, 16.
q 2 Cor. 5. 18.
r Eph. 1. 10.

Some, from the Greek, would (not have that clause we read in a parenthesis to come next the copulative and, but) have it, And by himself he should reconcile unto himself (in or to himself) all things, (having made or obtained peace through the blood of his cross,) I say, &c. But the reading of that sentence in the parenthesis after, or before the reconciliation of all things, as we do, because of the next following distribution, is not very material as to the sense of the thing, redemption, ver. 14, or rather, the manner or means of reconciliation unto God by Christ, in whom the fulness of all Divine and human perfections was seated for the bringing of heaven and earth together. Having made peace through the blood of his cross: God the Father, for bringing enemies nigh unto himself in the kingdom of his dear Son, ver. 13, 19, 21, was in him, 2 Cor. v. 18, 19, who having took on him the seed of Abraham, Heb. ii. 16, and because without shedding of blood there could be no remission, or being brought nigh, Eph. ii. 13; Heb. ix. 12, 22, 23, according to his Father's ordination and agreement with him for the expiation of sin, became obedient unto death, that cursed death of the cross, Isa. liii. 5; Gal. iii. 13; Phil. ii. 8; and by that bloody sacrifice of himself, there once perfected, Heb. ix. 14; x. 10, 14, obtained peace: that by a figure being put to express his most perfect merit, as being the finishing of his obedience and passion, chap. ii. 14; Rom. iii. 25; v. 10; Eph. ii. 16; Heb. ix. 12. By him; which alone could satisfy his offended-Father's demands: angels could not shed blood which was necessary to make peace and reconcile enemies; and though some false apostles might seduce to the worshipping of them, their obedience could not be meritorious. To reconcile all things unto himself: God designing an atonement to himself, i. e. God the Father, (and, by consequence, to the whole Trinity,) did it by Christ, in whom all fulness dwelling there was a proper fitness upon his Father's call, Isa. xlii. 1, 4, 6, with Heb. ix., for so perfect a work as to take away the enmity of those alienated from God, and to bring them into favour again. The great inquiry is about the extent of this reconciliation, because the apostle mentions all things (rather than all persons); and then, having emphatically repeated by him, viz. Christ as God-man, and none other, Acts iv. 12, he adds a distribution of all things, whether they be things in earth, or things in heaven. 'To answer which, all things may be understood, either, 1. Restrictively to the subject, the universal church of which Christ is the Head; so he doth not mean all things whatsoever, unlimitedly, but with respect to the subject matter, as, ver. 21, all things which being alienated from God are reconciled to him; i. e. whatsoever things are reconciled, are by him reconciled, all relating to the subject matter of reconciliation, (as all made to creation, ver. 16.) all the real subjects of his kingdom, whether gathered and gone to heaven before in hope of the Messiah to come, or now and hereafter shall be gathered, Acts xv. 11; Rom. iii. 25; Eph. iii. 15; Heb. xi. 39, 40; xii. 23: yet this doth not altogether satisfy some, by reason of the sublimity of the apostle's word in the distribution; and ordinarily in Scripture, by things in heaven are meant the angels, whose natural seat it is, spirits of just men made perfect being advanced thither only by God's gracious vouchsafement. Or, 2. Largely, as comprehending the good angels, especially if upon the foundation of reconciliation considered strictly, we take reconciliation here more generally, (as the apostle doth in his Epistle to the Ephesians, expatiating more upon this matter there than he doth here, writing more concisely and contractedly,) for recapitulation, (or analogical reconciliation,) bringing all under one head, the recomposing or reuniting of creatures terrestrial or celestial, upon the atonement for sinners by Christ; so that all his subjects, those that divide the state of his kingdom, are at an agreement amongst themselves and with each other; God did so by Christ conjoin miserable men with himself, that now also the holy angels are conjoined, they come under the same Head, Christ, chap. ii. 10; Eph. i. 22, whom they worship as at his first, so second coming, Luke ii. 13, 14; Heb. i. 6. As men cleave to him by faith, so the angels by vision (1 Tim. iii. 16) look upon him their Head; yet is he not their Redeemer, ver. 14; Eph. i. 3; not partaking of their nature, they are not his members as believers are (as God is the Head of Christ, yet is not he a member of God, 1 Cor. xi. 3); Christ beareth a more special relation to them, than he doth unto these principalities and powers, Eph. v. 23, 30, 31; however, they, being under a hypothetical possibility of falling, should seem to have need of a preventive kind of reconciliation, upon that account, if their standing is otherwise secured to them, they abiding in their purity could not be friends to impure creatures, Gen. iii. 24; but upon the satisfaction of their Lord, their distaste and dissatisfaction is removed, they being reduced into a corporation, under Christ, with those whom he hath reconciled, Eph. i. 10. As they, to the glory of the supreme Majesty, rejoiced when Christ came to seek these lost ones, so they are ministers to them that he hath made willing, Heb. i. 14; they delight in the ministry of reconciliation, Eph. iii. 10; 1 Pet. i. 12, attend the service with their brethren, (in doing their office,) Rev. xix. 10; xxii. 9, further the work, Acts viii. 26, rejoice when it takes effect, Luke xv. 10, and carry those that are perfected to the place of their own residence, Luke xvi. 22, to their own innumerable assembly in the heavenly Jerusalem, Heb. xii. 22; waiting on Christ, (according to the typical representatives, Exod. xxv. 19; xxvi. 1; 1 Kings vi. 23, 29,) with those that are with him, and made like to him at his throne, Matt. xxii. 30; Mark xii. 25, where he sits as the Son of man, and the holy angels (as he saith) are continually ascending and descending upon him, John i. 51: he fills them, as the rest of his subjects, all in all, Eph. i. 21, 23; they have grace by way of participation, having it from him their Head, who hath it of himself, John v. 26. So that upon the matter, this reconciliation of things in heaven, seems most to accord with Eph. i. 9, 10, and is not much unlike that in Eph. ii. 13, 16; that which is separately said there by his blood, ver. 13, and by the cross, ver. 16, is here conjoined by the blood of his cross. There is making peace in one simple word; here, (in the Greek,) in a compounded one. There, that he might reconcile both unto God; here, that he might reconcile all things unto himself, i. e. God. There he speaks only of men on earth being reconciled amongst themselves, because they had also been reconciled to God; if we take in angels also under those all, we have an allowance from that forecited Eph. i. 10; yea, and in favour of the larger acceptation of reconciliation here, it may be considered that the whole creation, which was put into disorder and subjected unto vanity, is in earnest expectation of the fruits of this gracious reconciliation, in being brought to a perfect harmony, to the glory of him who is all in all, Rom. viii. 19—23, with 1 Cor. xv. 58.

21 And you, <sup>† Eph. 2. 1, 2, 13, 18. ‡ 4. 18. § 1 Cor. by your mind in wickedness.</sup> that were sometime alienated and enemies <sup>† Tit. 1. 15, 16.</sup> in your mind by wicked works, yet now hath he reconciled.

And you, that were sometime alienated: the particle and, by a Hebraism, is put for therefore, or wherefore, leading the Colossians from the doctrines he had proposed, to consider their own estrangement from God and the things that please him, before they were effectually called by the gospel, being then in such a miserable condition as others were in a state of corrupted nature. See Psal. v. 9; Rom. vi. 19; 1 Cor. vi. 11; Eph. ii. 1, 3, 11, 12. And enemies; not only in their outward deportment had they no communion with the true God, but inwardly they hated God as an enemy, and they were hated of him as his enemies; by their willing and nilling that which was contrary to him and his pleasure, in opposing his revealed will, John xv. 18, 24; Rom. i. 29, 30; v. 10; viii. 7; James iv. 4. In your mind by wicked works; this enmity was predominant in their mind, or cogitation, or carnal reasoning, not receiving or comprehending the things of the Spirit of God, 1 Cor. ii. 14; that leading power of their souls being darkened, Eph. iv. 18, there was an enmity against God, so that they neither could be subject to God's law, Rom. viii. 7, under the prevalence of that corrupt reasoning which was so intent upon their corrupt courses, Gen. vi. 5, that then they thought not of peace with God. Yet now hath he reconciled; yet such was the unconstrained compassion of God, that now while sinners, (in a divided sense,) Rom. v. 10, they were actually reconciled; now, not before, not from eternity in his decree, nor meritoriously when upon the cross, 2 Cor. v. 19: he doth not mean simply the action, of such virtue, necessary and efficacious to make reconciliation, and the appeasing of God's displeasure; but compriseth the effect of it also when it is wrought in time, 2 Cor. v. 20, and the enmity in the subject is actually removed.

In the body of his flesh through death; the means whereby their reconciliation to God was purchased, (which they had particularly applied by faith, ver. 4,) was the sacrifice of that fleshy (not fantastical) body which Christ had assumed, subject to the condition of an animal life, being capable of suffering and mortal, (not refined and immortal, as after his resurrection, Rom. v. 10; 1 Cor. xv. 44, 53,) 2 Cor. v. 14; Eph. ii. 16, with Heb. x. 5, 10; 1 Pet. ii. 24; iii. 18. Christ's death was not only for our good, but in our stead thereby offering himself to God, he satisfied Divine justice, and his sacrifice, giving himself for us, was a sacrifice of a sweet smell to God, Eph. v. 2. To present you holy and unblameable and unreprouvable in his sight; before whom believers cannot make themselves to stand holy, but Christ doth upon the account of his sacrifice for them; so that through the veil of his flesh, Heb. x. 19, 20, God doth look upon such as having neither spot nor wrinkle, without blame or blemish: see Eph. i. 4; v. 27. Unto whom Christ is made righteousness, he is also made sanctification, 1 Cor. i. 30. Those who are washed are sanctified, 1 Cor. vi. 11. The end of reconciliation is restoration or sanctification, Luke i. 74, 75; 2 Cor. v. 15; Tit. ii. 14; 1 Pet. ii. 24; inchoatively here, with a perfection of parts, Heb. xiii. 21, and consummatively hereafter, with a perfection of degrees, 1 Cor. xiii. 10; Eph. iv. 13; Phil. iii. 11, 12.

mercy upon their own free-will, or a carnal doubting of being kept to salvation, 1 Pet. i. 5, but infers that they are then reconciled to God when they do indeed persevere in the faith; implying that by reason of the seducers amongst them all and every one might not really have that sound faith they would be thought to have. Wherefore the apostle engageth them to prove their faith, whereby only they can have peace with God, Rom. v. 1, to be real, by taking care it be well founded and firm, Matt. xiii. 23, as a house built on a sure foundation, a tree well rooted, Eph. iii. 17, 18; Heb. xiii. 9. And be not moved away from the hope of the gospel; and be not as temporary believers which have no root, Luke viii. 13, or as those who want anchor-hold are tossed to and fro, Eph. iv. 14, and put off from that hope of eternal life, set before us in the gospel, which is sure and certain, Heb. vi. 18, 19, built upon the foundation of the prophets and apostles, Eph. ii. 20, the sweet promises of eternal life. Which ye have heard; not the works of vain philosophy which leave the minds of men unsettled, but the plain and solid doctrines of Christ, wherein the believers at Colosse had been instructed, ver. 7. And which was preached to every creature which is under heaven; and which the faithful apostles, according to the commission of Christ, had promulgated to every creature beneath the heavens, i. e. every rational creature here below, i. e. to all men, collectively, or nations in the world, as ver. 6; Matt. xxviii. 19; Mark xvi. 15. Creature with the Hebrews doth eminently signify man, by an antonomasia, or a synecdoche, putting the general for a particular. In the original it is, in all the creature; and so it may be, in all the world, (creature being sometimes used for the system of the world, Rom. viii. 19—21,) in opposition to Judea, i. e. in those other parts of the earth which the Greeks and Romans knew to be then inhabited: under heaven, which is a pleonasm, but of the greatest emphasis, as Acts iv. 12. Whereof I Paul am made a minister; and the more to confirm them in what he had said, he adds, of this gospel of reconciliation so spread, he was immediately called, Gal. i. 1, and constituted to be a minister for the promulgation of it amongst the Gentiles, it being, with others, most notably committed to him, 2 Cor. v. 19; 1 Tim. i. 11.

Who now rejoice in my sufferings for you; he confirms his call to the ministry of the gospel from his cheerfulness in his present sufferings, so that they should not be discouraged, being it highly contented him to witness and seal his doctrine by bearing his cross for them, Rom. v. 2, 3; 2 Cor. vii. 4: see Phil. i. 14, 20; ii. 17. The Jews hated him and persecuted him because of his communion with the Greeks and other Gentiles, which occasioned his imprisonment at Rome, chap. ii. 1; iv. 3, 18; Acts xxi. 28, 29; xxvi. 17, 18; Eph. iii. 1; yet this did not deter him from his office, but he took pleasure in doing his duty. Acts v. 41; 2 Tim. ii. 10, gladly spending himself and being spent for their souls, 2 Cor. xii. 15, for their edification and consolation, 2 Cor. i. 6, 7; Phil. i. 13, 14. And fill up; and, the copulative, is used as causal; fill up, not simply, but in one's turn, implying a contradistinction betwixt what Christ suffered for the apostle, and what the apostle suffered for Christ. Christ in his rank suffered what was necessary for my redemption; now I, in my turn, (by his gift, Phil. i. 29,) undergo what afflictions are useful for his glory. He purchased salvation by his cross, I advance his kingdom and cause by my combats. That which is behind of the afflictions of Christ in my flesh: one learned man renders this clause, what remains concerning the afflictions for Christ in my flesh; however, if we conceive of things distinctly, we may retain our own translation, considering Paul's filling up is either, 1. With respect to Christ; so he doth not mean what Christ suffered in his own proper person during his tabernacled here; for neither Paul nor any other penman of the New Testament doth use the term affliction, to express the sufferings of Christ whereby he appeased God's wrath and satisfied his justice: that he finished in his own person when he gave up the ghost, John xix. 30, he perfected all completely, ver. 14, 22; nothing will be required from any believer upon that account, Rom. vi. 9, 10; Heb. x. 14; there be no remains upon that account, all was filled up by Christ himself. All can be imagined that Paul should mean in this respect, would be only from Christ's leaving an example, 1 Pet. ii. 21: q. d. As Christ hath suffered for my salvation, so in like manner, following him, I bear his cross, suffering for his gospel and glory. Or, 2. With respect to Paul himself: the sense is, q. d. As I have borne a great part of afflictions for the name of Christ, and in his glorious communion, 2 Cor. i. 5; Gal. vi. 17; 2 Tim. i. 8, 10; so in like manner I fill up the remains of them assigned to me a member of the mystical body, in conformity to the image of him who is the Head, Rom. viii. 18; 1 Pet. iv. 13. I do by little and little accomplish in my present sufferings (which make a part of it) the portion allotted to me in the same afflictions, which are accomplished and accomplishing in our brethren that are in the world, 1 Pet. v. 9, in time and degree according to God's counsel, (whereby the Head was preordained to suffer, Acts iv. 28; 1 Pet. i. 20.) which apportioned to every member what share it is to bear, till it be perfectly conformed to Christ. Phil. iii. 10, 12, 21. These sufferings as Christians. 1 Pet. iv. 13, 14, 16, (which the members undergo in their causes,) may be said to be the afflictions of Christ: (1.) Being for his cause and glory, the troubles they receive upon his account may be called his, the badges of his family and followers, Gal. vi. 17; Heb. xi. 26. (2.) Because of the union betwixt Head and members, 1 Cor. xii. 12; they being given to the whole body, the wounds of his members are his, Acts ix. 4, 16, he doth sympathize with them; but as he finished his work of proper sufferings while in the flesh, so the apostle's expression intimates here, their sufferings shall not last longer than they are in the body, they need not fear any purgatory afterwards. For his body's sake, which is the church: and while Paul suffered here, he adds another reason for the supporting and cheering of him, viz. the usefulness of his sufferings for the whole church, the mystical body of Christ, as ver. 18; which consideration might sweeten his bitterest afflictions, not only because it was in their service, to further their faith, that he was so persecuted, but for their edification and consolation; this was the scope of his patience, Phil. i. 12—14, to encourage those who knew his testimony to embrace the truth, 2 Tim. ii. 10. What the Rhemists and other papists infer hence, that the apostle satisfied for the sins of other believers by his sufferings, contributing to the church's treasury of satisfactions for temporary punishments, is altogether groundless. It is brutish to conclude, because he sustained afflictions for the edification of the church, that therefore he satisfied for the sins of the church; because he was spent for the Corinthians, that he answered for their faults, 2 Cor. xii. 15: he was not crucified for any, 1 Cor. i. 13. To make Paul's sufferings satisfactory is to derogate from Christ's merit; none is without sin as Christ was, and as it is necessary for him that satisfieth, Prov. xx. 9. Christ's sacrifice became expiatory, being offered by the eternal Spirit, Heb. ix. 14; he having borne the sins of believers in his own natural body upon the cross, and that by himself, there needs no supplements (could any be found) from others, John i. 29; Heb. i. 3, 8; 1 Pet. ii. 24; 1 John ii. 2. To conceit there is any need of human satisfactions as supplies to Christ's sufferings, is to cross the apostle's main drift here, ver. 12—14, 20—22; he was far from satisfying for himself, Phil. iii. 9, 12, and shows that every man shall bear his own burden. Gal. vi. 5, however he should endeavour to honour Christ, and edify his church, 2 Cor. xii. 10.

Whereof I am made a minister; see under what title he suffers for the church, because a minister, (in the more general acceptation of the word,) as ver. 23, not (as one of the ancients saith) to give the price of redemption, but to preach. He looked not on his apostleship as a domination, but ministration, 2 Cor. v. 18; and though in regard of his call he was an extraordinary apostle, yet he, (remembering his Master's injunction, Matt. xx. 26.) no more than Peter, did affect dominion or a lordship over Christ's heritage, 2 Cor. i. 24; 1 Pet. v. 1—3, according to his singular and eminent call to be a minister and a witness, Acts xxvi. 16. As he doth elsewhere make mention of the minister of God, 2 Cor. vi. 4; 1 Thess. iii. 2; of the New Testament, gospel, word, reconciliation, Acts vi. 4; 2 Cor. iii. 6; v. 18, 19; Eph. iii. 7; of Jesus Christ and of the Lord, Rom. xv. 8; 1 Cor. iv. 1; Eph. vi. 20; 1 Tim. iv. 6; so he doth here, by reason of the union betwixt the Head and the body, own himself to be constituted a minister of the church, which some, of a lower rank, like not now to be called. According to the dispensation of God; and that by Divine vouchsafement and commandment, being called from persecution of the church to this ministry, Acts ix. 15, 16; 1 Cor. iv. 1; 2 Cor. v. 19; Eph. i. 1. To whom God would make known; he refers the manifestation purely to God's good will and pleasure, as Christ himself doth, Matt. xi. 26, 27; Luke x. 21; so in the like case, Rom. ix. 18; that having mentioned saints, none might conceit it was for foreseen faith, but the Colossians might value their privilege, reverently receive that grace which was not given to all: in short, to restrain curiosity why God would not do it otherwise or sooner, he cuts the knots of all questions, only by signifying his sovereign pleasure, he would make it known to them; elsewhere, this mystery of his will, according to his good pleasure, Eph. i. 9, which was not to be touched till he thought meet to make it known. What is the riches of the glory of this mystery among the Gentiles: some refer the glory to mystery, as glorious mystery, because it lets forth Divine glory, and promiseth it to believers, Luke ii. 14; others, and the most, rather to riches, and that either as its epithet, (ver. 11,) the glorious riches of this mystery, or noting the subject, for salvation of the church amongst the Gentiles, Eph. i. 18; iii. 7, 8. It is usual with the apostle to use the word riches to set forth abundance, Rom. ii. 4; xi. 33; Eph. i. 7; here, for the praise of the gospel, he would signify a very great and most abundant glory, far surpassing any former ministration, 2 Cor. iii. 8, 18. In the law those riches (Eph. ii. 7) were not only imperfectly and obscurely discovered, but scatteredly with broken beams, as the sun in water when the water is disturbed; one attribute shining out in one work, another in another; but now the harmony of the Divine attributes in man's redemption shines out most fully, clearly, and gloriously, contracted in Christ, who is the object and revealer of the mystery by his Spirit, the glory whereof breaks forth with much more splendour amongst the Gentiles, Rom. xv. 7—9; 1 Cor. ii. 10; 2 Cor. iii. 9, 18; all glory before was but a shadow to this, chap. ii. 17; 2 Cor. iii. 18; Gal. iii. 1; Heb. x. 1. Which is Christ in you; which is Christ, amongst, for, or in them, i. e. who not only was preached amongst them, but whom they possessed, and who dwelt in them by faith, Eph. iii. 17; the revelation being accompanied with the power of the Spirit in the translating them by his glorious power from the kingdom of darkness into his kingdom, ver. 13; Luke xvii. 21; Gal. ii. 20; iv. 19; Eph. iii. 5, 7. The hope of glory; so is not only the object, 1 Tim. i. 1, but the ground of their expectation of glory, he in whom the mystery begins and ends, 1 Tim. iii. 16; out of whom all are hopeless of being happy, Eph. ii. 12, and in whom all have strong consolation, Heb. vi. 18.

<sup>o Acts 20. 30.</sup> <sup>27, 31.</sup> 28 Whom we preach, warning every man, and teaching every man in all wisdom; *that we may present every man perfect in Christ Jesus :

Whom we preach: here he shows that the subject of his and other ministers' preaching was Christ, (as he had before described him,) in whom alone hope of glory was to be had, Acts iv. 12; 1 Cor. ii. 2; Gal. v. 4; 1 John i. 3. Warning every man, and teaching every man in all wisdom; the manner of it was by admonishing and instructing all, in all the Christian wisdom that Christ required, that they might avoid sin and do their duty. He means all collectively, not distributively; of the generals of each, not each one of those generals; excluding none from the communion of so great a benefit, having no acceptance of nations or persons, making no exception of any condition, but inviting all men to Christ, holding forth this light of the gospel to whosoever would receive it, while God did vouchsafe life and strength to them, in the most taking way, Acts xx. 21, 27, 31; Rom. i. 14—16; 1 Tim. iii. 2; 2 Tim. ii. 24; iii. 16; iv. 2; Tit. i. 9. That we may present every man perfect in Christ Jesus; and the end and aim he and others of his mind had in preaching of this matter in such a manner was the same with Christ's, ver. 22, to put them into such an estate by their labours that they might, through Christ, appear at a throne of grace without confusion, 2 Cor. xi. 2; Phil. iii. 12, 15; Heb. v. 14.

CHAP. II

Paul testifieth his solicitude for the churches which had not seen him, that they might be united in love, and attain a perfect knowledge of the Christian revelation. 1—3, not being seduced from their steadfastness in the faith. 4—7, nor corrupted through philosophy and human traditions, 8. He sheweth that they were already complete in Christ, having attained the true circumcision figured in baptism, 9—12; that God had quickened them with Christ, and both abolished the law of ordinances, that was against them, 13, 14, and also spoiled principalities and powers, 15. He therefore urgeth them not to submit to legal ordinances, which were but a shadow of Christ; nor to the worship of angels, and other vain practices of human devising, 16—25.

<sup>For</sup>; this causal particle refers to what he had said just before in the former chapter. I would that ye knew what great conflict I have for you; the certainty of which truth, for the evidence of his unfeigned affection to them, he heartily wishes they might be certified what a combat he sustained for them, by reason of that opposition he met with in his ministerial labours. This filled him with inward fears and cares, and encompassed him with outward troubles, as 2 Cor. xi. 23—30; 2 Tim. ii. 10, wherein he addressed himself to God for them by earnest prayers, as chap. iv. 12; 2 Thess. i. 11, desiring the assistance of their prayers, Rom. xv. 30; Heb. xiii. 18: these, with his travels, writings, &c., might well be called a conflict, Phil. i. 30. And for them at Laodicea; which he had not only for the saints at Colosse, but for their neighbours, liable also to the impression of the same or the like seducers, at Laodicea, definitely, to whom he designed this Epistle might be imparted, chap. iv. 16. And for as many as have not seen my face in the flesh; and indefinitely, for as many Christians, especially in Phrygia, as had not seen him bodily present amongst them, or heard him preach with a lively voice; whether, because it is said he twice passed through all Phrygia, where Colosse and Laodicea were situate, Acts xvi. 6; xviii. 23, he had been personally at these cities, is not determinable from the copulative here, (which possibly may be used as a particle to separate these from those who had not conversed with him,) neither is it of much importance. It should seem Paul was acquainted with Philemon, (a Colossian or Laodicean,) his wife and family, Philem. 1, 2.

2 <sup>b</sup> That their hearts might be comforted, <sup>a</sup> being knit together in love, and unto all riches of the full assurance of understanding, <sup>d</sup> to the acknowledgement of the mystery of God, and of the Father, and of Christ;

That their hearts might be comforted: whereas false teachers did endeavour to adulterate the Christian institution, the striving of the apostle's holy soul here was, as in the former chapter, ver. 28, to this end, that they might be complete and established Christians to the last. Being knit together in love; and as a proper means conducive to this good purpose, he would have them be joined or compacted together, be all of a piece, in the affection and exercise of love. And unto all riches of the full assurance of understanding; and to attain to a well-grounded, powerful, evangelical faith, which he sets forth lively by an elegant increase of words, both in regard of the acts and the object of it, which is called a mystery to be believed, 1 Tim. iii. 9, upon its being revealed. The sense of that which he heartily desires is that they might have, 1. All abundance of understanding with full satisfaction in these main principles of the gospel they are called to assent to. Signifying faith is no blind, but a certain intelligent persuasion; to distinguish it from uncertain opinion, John vi. 69; Rom. iv. 21; 1 Thess. i. 5; Heb. vi. 11; x. 22. To the acknowledgement: 2. An inward consent, and vital owning, a cordial embracing of the fundamental truths of the gospel, Eph. iv. 13, 14; Heb. vi. 1, in opposition to those vain speculations and traditions which deluded many. He calls this the mystery of God, or a Divine mystery, (no human invention,) as before, chap. i. 26, 27; and so vindicates the dignity of faith and the excellency of the gospel, asserting it to be a mystery of God, not only as the object, but revealer of it; for the Father reveals Christ, chap. i. 27; Matt. xvi. 17; Eph. iii. 3, as Christ doth the Father, Matt.

xi. 27; John i. 18. Whereas it is said, and of the Father, and of Christ; this first and here needs not be rendered as a copulative, but as exegetical, or as expletive, and may be read, even, or to wit, or both, as (a learned man observes) the Greeks and Latins usually do when the copulative is to be repeated, the name of God referring commonly to the Father and the Son; as elsewhere, God, even the Father, chap. i. 3; 1 Cor. xv. 24; 2 Cor. xi. 31; Eph. i. 3; Phil. iv. 20. So the former and here may be read; q. d. The mystery not of God, abstractedly considered; but, I would have you be united and all one, in the acknowledgment of the whole mystery of God, i. e. both of the Father and of Christ.

In whom: this may relate either to the Divine mystery, wherein are in abundance all necessary doctrines to consolation and salvation stored up, respecting the foregoing verse; compare 1 Cor. ii. 7; Eph. iii. 3, 4; in opposition to the vain show of wisdom seducers did boast of; or, (as the most ancient and modern take it,) to Christ, the immediate antecedent: in whom, (as we render it,) i. e. in Christ, considered either, 1. As the object, which being rightly known, we may have all wisdom and perfect knowledge to salvation: he speaks not here of all that Christ knoweth, he reveals not all that in the gospel to us, but what we must know of him that we may be saved. Or, 2. As the subject, because all the treasures of wisdom in order to salvation, are not only known and found out in Christ, but also are hid, do dwell and abide in him as the fountain, what he can give to us for our consolation and perfection. It had been little pertinent for Paul to have said that all these deep things of God (1 Cor. ii. 10) were known to our Lord; but that they are found in him, do dwell in him, are all stored up, displayed, and set forth in him, to be seen through the veil, that is to say, his flesh, Heb. x. 20, or the infirmity of his cross. The series of the apostle's discourse, comparing ver. 8 and 9, shows it to be thus understood of Christ as the subject and fountain of all saving wisdom, in opposition to the comments of human wisdom which the false doctors did boast of. Continuing the metaphor, he shows from what fund the treasures of saving knowledge may be drawn: by treasures intimating the excellency and abundance thereof; there was some store in the tabernacle of Moses, but very small compared to the abundance certainly to be found in Christ, all else of no worth to the excellency of the knowledge of Christ for consolation, ver. 2; Phil. iii. 8: things to be believed and practised are, by way of eminency, Christian wisdom and knowledge. The treasures of which, how and when hid, is to be well considered, because in our translation, and in almost all others, the Greek word we render hid is by trajectory put next to the relative whom, whereas it is indeed in the original the last word in the verse, and seems to be expressive rather of what was hid before Christ than what is hid in him. For, as a learned man saith, hidden treasures, as such, seem to be like hidden music, of no regard; or like the hidden talent, Luke xix. 20. It not being so easy to think that the apostle in this Epistle teaches, that the secrets which had lain hid from the wise men of the world, in the ages past, now were made bare, brought into light, and made known even to babes by Christ, chap. i. 26, 27, with Luke x. 21; and having just before, ver. 2, spoken of the understanding and acknowledgment of the mystery of the Father and the Son, what should the riches of glory to the knowledge of the mystery be, but the treasures of wisdom now revealed, heretofore hid, of which continuedly a little after he says that all the fulness of the Godhead dwells in him bodily, i. e. personally, not in a shadow, as it were hid in a cloud, but in flesh that may be really seen and touched? So that it should seem best to retain hid as it is placed in the Greek, to this sense; q. d. In Christ are, and dwell in the greatest fulness, all the treasures of wisdom, hid under the law, which are therefore called a mystery, secret, or hidden thing from ages and generations, chap. i. 26, 27, now made manifest to his saints, they are now not hid in Christ, but made known amongst the Gentiles as God willed. Not then hidden riches, i. e. treasures of wisdom and knowledge of this mystery as of hid treasure, but out of Christ, and before Christ amongst the Jews: for e 1 Cor. 1. 24.

Christ himself is that mystery, chap. iv. 3, not hid after his appearance, but manifested, and manifesting the Father, John i. 18. However, if any will rather choose to read, as if in Christ were at present hid all treasures, it is to be understood, stored up, not exposed to the view of every eye, being as in a rich cabinet, not to keep them from being known to men, but rather to make them more precious and desirable. For Christ came when sent of his Father to spread this heavenly wealth. He is the Sun of righteousness, John i. 9: the unbelieving must thank themselves if, where he is truly preached, he be hid to them, and his arm be revealed but to a few, Isa. liii. 1; 2 Cor. iv. 3, 4: it is their own blinding that they do not savingly discern what is displayed in Christ. Wherefore both may be true in divers respects: 1. Consider the thing in itself, objectively; so treasures of wisdom are evidently laid up in Jesus Christ, and manifested upon his appearance, 1 Tim. iii. 16; Tit. ii. 11. But, 2. With respect to the eyes and perceptions of men, subjectively, as naturally obscured and corrupted by sin; so natural men, or mere animal men, perceive not in Christ the riches of wisdom and knowledge which are in him as our Mediator, when they look upon him as having no beauty or comeliness for which they should desire him, Isa. liii. 2; he, as crucified, being to the Jews a stumbling-block and to the Gentiles foolishness, when he is to those of them who are called, the power of God, and the wisdom of God, 1 Cor. i. 23, 24. The Lutherans' inference hence, that omniscience agrees to Christ's human nature, is altogether inconsequent; both (as before) because the apostle's business here is not to acquaint us what Christ himself knoweth, but what is to be known by us, which may be found treasured up in him. Treasures here in him not being considered absolutely, but comparatively to all the knowledge of men and angels. Yet, from a supposal of an infinite knowledge in Christ, who is God-man in one person, it followeth not that the soul of his human nature knoweth all things.

4 And this I say, <sup>f</sup>lest any man should beguile you with enticing words.

And this I say; here he suggests the ground of his insisting upon the excellent treasures of the saving knowledge of Christ, and the ample description of him. Lest any man should beguile you; to this end, that he might fortify them against delusion by paralogisms, or sophistical and false reasonings, fallacious arguing, (as the word notes, James i. 22,) under a colourable pretence and show of wisdom, ver. 8, 18, 23. With enticing words; set off with rhetorical suasions and embellishments, intimating the prevalence of such blandishments, with fair words and good speeches to seduce the simple, if the heart were not established with grace, Rom. xvi. 18; Eph. iv. 14; v. 6; Heb. xiii. 9; and therefore, esteeming the excellent knowledge of Christ, and being found in him, Phil. iii. 8, 9, they should beware of whatever, under a show of religion, is introduced to seduce them from the simplicity that is in Christ, 2 Cor. xi. 3.

5 For <sup>g</sup>though I be absent in the flesh, yet am I with you in the spirit, joying and beholding <sup>h</sup>your order, and the <sup>i</sup>steadfastness of your faith in Christ.

For though I be absent in the flesh, yet am I with you in the spirit: to prevent any surmise that his distance at Rome might take him off from minding of them at Colosse, he shows that the great affection he bare to them did oblige him to interest himself in all their concerns, (the care of all the churches being incumbent on him, 2 Cor. xi. 28,) and therefore that his bodily confinement at Rome did not hinder his presence with them in spirit. Not that we can conclude, that by some extraordinary operation of the Holy Ghost God gave him now and then a clear prospect of what they did, as he did to Elisha of Gehazi's behaviour, 2 Kings v. 26; and to Ezekiel in Babylon of the secret actions of the Jews in Jerusalem; but that he was with them as with the Corinthians, 1 Cor. v. 3, when distant in body his thoughts and affections were exercised about them. Joying and beholding your order; as it follows there is moving of fears lest they should be insnared, so of joy understanding their order, i. e. their good estate, constitution, and consent in orderly walking and discipline, 1 Cor. xiv.

40; 1 Thess. iv. 1; v. 14. And the steadfastness of your faith in Christ; and the firmament of their faith in Christ, it being (if genuine) as firm as the firmament itself; stable as the heavens and heavenly bodies, keeping their constant stations and regular courses, and admitting nothing heterogeneous into them: all heavenly truths are as fixed stars in this orb. Seeing all grace, because Divine, hath an establishing property; so faith coming from the eternal mountains, all graces being connected in faith, which is a kind of firmament to them all, it comes to pass that faith, in actuating any one grace, gives a strength and further growth to every other grace.

6 <sup>k</sup>As ye have therefore received <sup>l</sup>Christ Jesus the Lord, <sup>m</sup>so walk ye in him:

Having cautioned them against sophistical seducers, and commended them for that order and sound faith he understood to be amongst them, he here infers an exhortation to continuance in both, especially in the latter, with respect to the person of Christ, according as he had before described him; for he doth not say, As ye have received the doctrine of Christ, or concerning Christ, but, As ye have received Christ himself, as John i. 11, 12; 1 John v. 11, 12, in whom is all treasured up for salvation. He adds not only Jesus, (who came to save his people from their sins,) but the Lord, intimating they should not therefore suffer any rules of faith or life to be imposed upon them by any other whatsoever, but should be persuaded to abide in him, whom they had embraced, and order their conversation according to his mind, 1 Thess. iv. 1, knowing that he is the way, the truth, and the life, John xiv. 6; being led by his Spirit, and deriving virtue to go on in this orderly walk and persevere in the faith.

7 <sup>n</sup>Rooted and built up in him, and <sup>o</sup>established in the faith, as ye have been taught, abounding therein with thanksgiving.

Rooted and built up in him; showing how they should abide and persevere in the faith, by continuing in him as branches do in the root, John xv. 4, and resting upon him as a building upon the foundation, Isa. xxviii. 16; 1 Cor. iii. 11; Eph. ii. 22. And established in the faith; and being firm and settled in the faith, as 1 Pet. v. 10: he adds this, not only to clear the metaphorical expressions before, but to show that they should be growing stronger as to the internal habit, Psal. xcii. 13, 14. He repeats as it were in a parenthesis, as ye have been taught; upon the matter, the same with as ye have received Christ in the former verse; for greater caution to them, who might be apt to have itching ears, that they should not be listening to any novel doctrines, but abide in the faith of Christ. Abounding therein with thanksgiving; setting down with themselves, according to the superabounding grace they had, Rom. v. 20, with 1 Cor. iv. 8, to abound and increase therein, 1 Cor. xv. 58; 2 Pet. i. 8; having herein all the saving knowledge desirable, without need of the addition of aught any other way; being thankful to God that he had revealed such a Christ, his Christ, to them, for they could not have a better or another.

8 <sup>p</sup>Beware lest any man spoil you through philosophy and vain deceit, after <sup>q</sup>the tradition of men, after <sup>r</sup>the rudiments of the world, and not after Christ.

Beware: the apostle, after his exhortation, considering their danger from seducing spirits lying in wait to deceive by their sleight and craftiness, 1 Tim. iv. 1, 2, doth here reinforce and enlarge his caution he had before suggested, ver. 4, to engage to a heedful avoidance of all seduction from Christ. Lest any man spoil you; lest their souls should be made a prey, and they be carried for a spoil by those worst of robbers that beset Christ's fold, 2 Cor. xi. 20; Gal. vi. 13. Through philosophy; either through the abuse of true philosophy in bringing the mystery of Christ under the tribunal of shallow reason, or rather through erroneous, though curious, speculations of some philosophers, as Plato, Pythagoras, Hesiod, &c. then in vogue, which the Gnostics afterwards (who, thinking themselves
