however, that thinking requires the assumption of comprehensively real being, though the circumstance that we cannot avoid assuming it does not prove it. Hegel (1770–1831) affirms the ontological argument in holding Being as the presupposition of all thought and existence. Josiah Royce (1855–1916) develops a variation based on Augustine and argues that the existence of God can be derived from the possibility of error. Charles Hartshorne (1897– ), in Man's Vision of God and The Logic of Perfection, provides the most extensive contemporary version of the ontological argument. Bertrand Russell (1872–1970) rejects the ontological argument, based on the dubious assumption of a dichotomy between thought and things, and on the naive epistemology of logical atomism. The pattern of the argument from Plato, through Anselm and Kant, to Royce and Hartshorne, based on implications of intelligibility, shows that it is actually an epistemological argument with ontological meaning.

The cosmological arguments appear in ancient philosophy but are given most explicit formulation by AQUINAS. In the Summa Theologica (Isa. 2, 3), he offers five arguments for the existence of God, the first three of which are cosmological: from motion, from efficient cause, and from the contingency of things. In each case, he begins with human experience (of motion or change, of a chain of efficient causes, of everything we experience as contingent). Because an infinite regress is in his view impossible, motion must be traced to a prime mover, causation to a first cause, and contingency to necessary being, each of which, he concludes, "we call God."

The moral argument holds that the moral experience of humanity confirms the existence of God. Implied in Plato's discussion of the Good, it receives explicit formulation in Thomas Aquinas' fourth argument, from the gradation of goodness, which necessarily implies the existence of the Good as the standard of better and worse. In his Critique of Practical Reason, Kant holds that God is a necessary postulate of moral reason. Alfred E. Taylor (1869–1945) combines insights from Plato, Aquinas, and Bergson in The Faith of a Moralist (1930), where he holds that moral experience points beyond itself to theism. C. E. M. Joad (1891–1953) turns the moral argument around and holds that the experience of evil demonstrates the existence of God.

Teleological arguments, also found among Greek and Roman thinkers, rely on the notion that the presence of purpose in the world demonstrates the existence of Deity. The fifth argument of Aquinas is teleological: from the governance of things. The existence of God is demonstrated by the order and purpose of the world. Teleological arguments may draw on historical or scientific materials to show developmental patterns in human affairs and nature, patterns to be attributed to divine power and intention. Based on the notion of emergent evolution, C. Lloyd Morgan (1852–1936) affirmed God as purposively directing activity in world events, and Samuel Alexander (1859–1938) posited a notion of immanently creative Deity. On similar grounds, the thought of Alfred North Whitehead (1861–1947) requires God as the Principle of Concretion. Drawing on evolutionary science, Pierre Lecomte du Nouy asserts that "our entire organized, living universe becomes incomprehensible without the hypothesis of God" (Human Destiny, 1947).

The psychological argument rests on the clinical evidence that human activity and welfare require the integration that belief in and worship of God provide. Viktor Frankl (1904– ) represents this perspective in emphasizing the necessity of meaning for human health and survival. Here, as with the other arguments, it is a matter of demonstration rather than proof.

The arguments for the existence of God, taken individually or collectively, offer impressive evidence that faith in God can be given rational justification, but they are persuasive in relation to what people already believe. If Kant is correct that all the arguments rest on the ontological, then they become most clear in Anselm's perspective as "faith seeking understanding." (See FAITH AND KNOWLEDGE.)

C.Mc.

GOETHE, JOHANN WOLFGANG VON (1749–1832). German novelist, poet, dramatist, and scientist. Born in Frankfurt on the Main, he studied law at Leipzig and Strasbourg, and began practice in Frankfort (1772). However, his consuming drive was to find life's meaning. Influenced by Johann Gottfried von Herder, he studied art, literature, music, anatomy, and chemistry. In a dramatic tragedy, Götz von Berlichingen (1773), he used a Robin Hood character to rebel against injustice, and in The Sorrows of Young Werther (1774), he probed suicide as a solution to life's seeming meaninglessness. These successful works launched the romantic "storm and stress" movement in German literature.

Courtesy of the German Information Center

Goethe

In 1775 Goethe became secretary to Prince Karl August of Saxe-Weimar. He moved to Weimar, Germany's intellectual center, where he lived until his death. For ten years he wrote little, immersing himself in practical science, official public duties, wider literary interests, and illicit love affairs. Yet in his restless quest for meaning, he perceptibly moved beyond his "storm and stress" period of rebellion against everything, including God. A trip to Rome (1786–88) brought classical influences and balance to his writings, and saw the beginning of Germany's classic literary period. He wrote Egmont (1788), Torquato Tasso (1790), Contributions to Optics (1791–92), and encouraged by Friedrich von Schiller worked on Faust, the first part published in 1808, the second in 1832. Faust strikes a bargain with Satan, but finally discovers that real pleasure is in striving and helping others—the key to the meaning of life. Among his many works, Faust stands preeminent.

C.M.

GOG AND MAGOG. Originally the name of a legendary ancestor of the tribe of Reuben (I Chr. 5:4), Gog was later used by the prophet of the Exile, Ezekiel, to symbolize kings in opposition to Israel (Ezek. 38:1 ff., 14, 16, 18; 39:1, 11). Apparently, Gog stands for northern nations or tribes, such as the Scythians, who periodically swept down on Israel and its neighbors. Efforts to identify Gog with actual rulers seem fruitless. Centuries later, the author of the Revelation to John (Rev. 20:8) also spoke of enemies of the kingdom of God as "Gog and Magog," also used symbolically. Revelation may draw its symbolism from the son of Japheth, Magog, in Genesis 10:2.

Sectarians since the eighteenth century and modern Fundamentalists often literalistically associate Gog and Magog with certain nations and political leaders such as Stalin and the Soviet Union or Hitler and the Nazi state. Contemporary Fundamentalists lean toward the precise identification of Gog and Magog with Soviet Russia and predict that Russia will invade Israel and precipitate the battle of Armageddon and the end of the world.

J.C.

GOGARTEN, FRIEDRICH (1887–1967). German Lutheran theologian, educated at Berlin, Jena, and Heidelberg. After a period of years as a pastor, he taught theology at Breslau (1931–35) and Göttingen (1935–55). After World War I, Gogarten was allied with KARL BARTH and others in the movement known as the "theology of crisis" or DIALECTICAL THEOLOGY. He joined in the attack on the assumptions of liberal culture and theology in the journal Between the Times. Later he broke with Barth, and with Rudolf Bultmann championed an existentialist theology.

The key to Gogarten's theology lies in his interpretation of Luther's "existential" understanding of faith. According to Gogarten, Christian theology was, until Luther, bound to a static Greek metaphysics, which reasserted itself again in seventeenth-century Protestant orthodoxy. However, for Luther faith is a radically existential reality, in that it involves risk and the awareness that humans are responsible for their own history. Gogarten contends that modern theologians, while rejecting an outmoded Greek metaphysics, still attempt to establish Christian belief on the scientific objectivity of certain historical events recorded in the Bible. Gogarten considers this both scientifically hazardous and, more importantly, contrary to the very nature of faith.

The Bible as God's Word cannot be established by philosophy or by scientific demonstration; it can be appropriated only existentially, that is, by faith that God's Word is spoken in and through the Bible. Gogarten had, with Bultmann, an important influence on American theology in the 1950s and 1960s. J.L.

GOLDEN CALF. See CALF, GOLDEN.

GOLDEN MEAN. A translation from Horace of the Latin phrase aurea mediocritas, it refers to a moderate position between extremes, to a happy medium between polar alternatives, and to a prudent, safe course of action. The notion that the way of moderation represents what is good in human life appears in such Socratic dialogues of Plato (427–347 B.C.) as the Laches (on courage) and the Charmides (on temperance and self-control). Aristotle (384–322 B.C.) formulated the notion into an ethical principle in the Nicomachean Ethics. "Virtue," he writes, "is a state of character concerned with choice of a mean relative to us . . . between two vices. . . . Virtue finds and chooses what is intermediate." Roman writers turned this Hellenic notion into the Golden Mean, an ideal of moderate behavior recommended by moralists in all ages, yet an ideal that appears pedestrian and dull when compared with the possibilities of heroic sacrifices on behalf of a great cause.

C.Mc.

GOLDEN RULE. Basically this phrase sums up the ethical maxim or moral imperative—live so as to treat others as you wish they would treat you. It is found as early as in the Greek historian Herodotus, who showed the influence of the Sophists, a group of Greek moralists who delighted in expressing moral ideals in an aphoristic form, and in Isocrates in the fourth century B.C.

In Jewish literature the rule appears in a negative way: "Do to no one what you would not want done to you" (Tob. 4:15, as well as in Philo and rabbinic literature).

In the Gospels the statement appears in its positive form in the common sayings source that embodies the teaching of Jesus in Matthew and Luke, with a more affirmative thrust. It is not so much, Do not injure others lest they retaliate, but treat others irrespective of how they choose to treat you. So Luke has put the saying in a context of love to one's enemies, which seems its logical place (Luke 6:27-36). In Matthew the words are used to form the conclusion of the main part of the Sermon on the Mount (7:12). Typically Matthew sees in the rule the epitome of the "law and the prophets" of the OT.

The Golden Rule appears in Acts 15:20, 29 (according to some texts), in the Didache (an early compendium of moral instruction) as well as later in Confucius' Analects. R.M.

GOLGOTHA. There are three references to Golgotha in the NT: Matthew 27:33; Mark 15:22; John 19:17, each mentioning the place where Jesus was crucified. The Greek translation is "the place of a skull"; the last word in Latin is calva, whence the term Calvary in Luke 23:33 (KJV). The site is described as outside the city of Jerusalem (Heb. 13:12, but this allusion may be only symbolic), yet near to it (John 19:20). Tradition locates it on a hill, either because it was on a high elevation to be seen from a distance (Mark 15:40), or because the ground was shaped like a human skull or, with the church father Origen, because of the idea that Adam's skull was supposedly found there.

The exact location of Golgotha is uncertain. There are two rival views, now hardened into ecclesiastical and doctrinal persuasions. (1) The place of the Crucifixion, connected with the burial site (John 19:41) lay within the area now occupied by the Church of Holy Sepulchre. This tradition is traced back to the fourth century, but the fall of Jerusalem in A.D. 70 and again in A.D. 135 means that no one can trust tradition as late as Eusebius (A.D. 337), who makes the identification, and Constantine, who had a church built at the original site just before A.D. 340. Recent excavation of Jerusalem's walls have revealed that in Jesus' day the line of the second city wall ran south of the proposed site. This would endorse the witness of Jesus' death "outside the gate," marked by the present Russian Alexander Hospice.

(2) The other proposal begins with the shape of a raised prominence, thought to be skull-shaped. It is near the Damascus Gate, and close to "The Garden Tomb" (John 19:41). Two British army officers, Conder and Gordon, proposed this chiefly on the ground of the natural setting and the popular idea of "There is a green hill" hymn. This identification is less convincing, and we have to remain in uncertainty as to the precise site. R.M.

GOLIATH. The Philistine giant from Gath, said to have been slain by the boy David (I Sam. 17). Goliath was declared to be nine feet tall. His defeat was seen as a religious victory for Israel, and Goliath's sword was placed in the Yahweh shrine at Nob (I Sam. 17:43, 45). While the association of Goliath's death with David gave impetus to his popularity and eventual ascent to power, the OT honestly records a parallel and different account of the defeat of Goliath. Second Samuel 21:19 declares that Elhanan, also from Bethlehem, killed Goliath (compare I Chr. 20:5). Excavations of Canaanite graves tend to support the belief that people of great height lived in Canaan at the time of the Hebrew conquest. Historical probability would hold that the unknown Elhanan defeated Goliath, and later the victory of the man from Bethlehem was associated with the most famous son of Bethlehem, David. J.C.

GOMER. The name of two people in the OT, one a man and one a woman.

Gomer, son of Japheth and grandson of Noah, founded a people, probably the Cimmerians (Gen. 10:2; I Chr. 1:5; Ezek. 38:6).

Gomer, a woman of Samaria in the eighth century B.C., became the wife of HOSEA, the prophet of God's mercy and love. Hosea believed that Yahweh directed him to marry Gomer, who later proved unfaithful to him to such an extent that he doubted the paternity of his children. The Lord told Hosea to name these children "Not pitied" and "Not my people" (Hos. 1:6-8). However, even after Gomer ran away and fell to the depths of degradation, Hosea still cared for her and ultimately purchased her from slavery and restored her to his house on the condition that she not stray again. Hosea then saw (had a revelation) that Gomer was a symbol of faithless Israel, who committed adultery (idolatry) with the Baals over and over, forsaking the true worship of Yahweh. However, God would forgive Israel and restore her to favor if she gave up the Baals. J.C.

GOMORRAH. A legendary city at the western border of Canaan (Gen. 10:19), which has become synonymous with corruption and wickedness. Gomorrah is never mentioned apart from the name of its sister city in sin, SODOM. In Genesis 14, Birsha, king of Gomorrah, was one of five kings of the Vale of Siddom or Dead Sea region who was defeated by a coalition of four eastern kings, only to be rescued by Abram. The only other memory of Gomorrah is the story of its destruction (Gen. 18:16-19:29). Because of their notorious lasciviousness, Yahweh destroys the twin cities with fire and brimstone rained from heaven (Gen. 19:24).

All other references to Gomorrah are simply reflections of the Genesis 19 account of its destruction and, with one exception, add no new information. The exception is Jude 7, which adds the idea that the fire that punished Gomorrah was "eternal." W.S.T.

GOOD FRIDAY. The day commemorating Jesus Christ's death on the cross, which is probably to be dated April 3, A.D. 33. In the liturgical calendar of the Western church, the Friday before EASTER. "Good," as an adjective applied to the day, is an Old English expression for "holy." Good Friday services lasting from noon to three in the afternoon are traditional, commemorating the hours Christ spent on the cross. In recent decades, these services have been ecumenical. An evening rite, stressing the Passion of Christ, adoring the cross, and celebrating mass, has long been observed in the Roman Catholic church. Reception of Communion is encouraged.

J.C.

GOOD NEWS. See GOSPEL.

GOOD NEWS BIBLE (TODAY'S ENGLISH VERSION or TEV). The American Bible Society, with a goal of reaching a wider span of literates, was the sponsor of a translation of the Scriptures in "common English." This level of literacy is a step above the earlier concept of "basic English."

The TEV, as it was known at first, was largely the work of one man—Robert E. Bratcher, a one-time missionary to South America. The New Testament in Today's English Version was first published in 1966. The entire Bible was released in 1976 as the Good News Bible—The Bible in Today's English Version. In a very short time many millions of the new version had been distributed. Now similar Bibles, based on the same philosophy of translation, have appeared in a number of modern languages.

R.H.

GOOD SAMARITAN. The figure in Jesus' familiar parable in Luke 10:29-37, who helps a man lying wounded in the ditch. Traditionally he has become the symbol for hearers of the parable, who are called to replicate his acts of kindness for needy people: "Go and do likewise" (10:37).

Another interpretation of the passage, however, reverses the point of contact by noting the hostility between Jews and Samaritans during the time of Jesus. The lawyer whose question evoked the parable could hardly identify with a despised outsider like a Samaritan, but rather must see himself in the wounded man needing help. "And who is my neighbor?" he asks (10:29). "The one who showed mercy," he later answers (10:37). From the vantage of the ditch he learns that the neighbor is the one who helps. Having discovered this, he can then "go and do likewise."

C.B.C.

GOODSPEED, EDGAR J. (1871-1962). American Greek scholar. Born in Quincy, Illinois, he was graduated from Denison University and received a B.D. and Ph.D. from the University of Chicago in 1897 and 1898. He taught at the University of Chicago from 1898 to 1937, pioneering in the collation of NT manuscripts and studying Greek papyri. He is principally known for his translation of the Bible in contemporary language. The New Testament—An American Translation appeared in 1923 and The Complete Bible—An American Translation (with J. M. Powis Smith) appeared in 1939. He taught history at the University of California, Los Angeles, from 1938 to 1951.

R.H.

GORE, CHARLES (1853-1932). Controversial Anglo-Catholic English theologian and bishop and an advocate of social reform based on traditional orthodoxy. Educated at Oxford, he became a Fellow in 1875; priest, 1878; and bishop, 1902. He resigned his bishopric in 1919 to write and teach, serving as dean of theology, London University (1924-28). Lux Mundi (1889) and other works sought to interrelate Christian thought, science, history, and social reform without compromising historic orthodox creeds or rational thought. Christ and Society (1928) espoused a Christian social order through associations of dedicated Christians. The three-volume Reconstruction of Belief (1921-24) most fully stated his views.

C.M.

GOSHEN. (1) This is the name by which the Bible designates that part of Egypt in which the Israelites were supposed to have been settled in the time of Joseph (Gen. 45:10; 46:28-34), "the best of the land" (Gen. 47:6). What is meant, apparently, is the fertile pastureland in the northeastern Nile Delta, north of the Wadi Tumilat, which runs eastward from the delta to Lake Timsah, which is now part of the Suez Canal. These and the other sites associated with the Israelites' sojourn in Egypt and their subsequent exodus (Zoan, Rameses, Succoth, Pithom, etc.) all seem to have belonged to the same region. "Goshen" is not an Egyptian name, nor does any such name occur in Egyptian records of any time.

(2) Goshen was probably a Canaanite name that got transferred into the Israelite epic of eisodus/exodus by the natural process of anachronism and association (similarly with Rameses, Succoth, etc.). "The land of Goshen" is the designation of a territory in the southland of Judah that fell prey to the Israelites in their conquest (Josh. 10:41; 11:16), apparently getting its title from a city of the same name in the hill country (Josh. 15:51).

B.V.

GOSPEL. The English word derives from an Anglo-Saxon term meaning "God's story" (godspel). But the word enters the language of the Bible as a translation of the Greek euangelion, "good news." The verb behind the noun means to announce or publish news as a herald (Greek keryx, from which we get kerygma, public preaching; there is no distinction in meaning between this latter word and euangelion: both mean "good tidings"). It is very important to observe that in the NT period the verb "to evangelize" or "preach the gospel" was an activity of public or private speaking. The gospel was the content of what was uttered, not what was written down or read. The use of "gospel" in the sense of written documents (for example, the Four Gospels) came much later, first found in Justin's description of Sunday worship at Rome, A.D. 150. The plural "gospels" is not a NT usage (see Gal. 1:6-9 for opposition to more than "one gospel").

Background. Euangelion in Greek meant originally a reward offered for good news brought by a messenger. Then it came to be linked with the content or substance of the message that was brought. Thus news became "good news," for example, victory in battle.

The Roman emperors, especially Augustus, used a form of the term "gospel" to announce a new age of prosperity and world peace, which their reign promised. Some scholars trace the NT use to this setting (especially in Luke 2:1-14; Acts 17:7). More likely, the first preachers got the term from the OT, especially second Isaiah's announcement that a new age would come when God is acknowledged as King (Isa. 40:9; 52:7-10). Thus "gospel" is linked with the reign of God, and this connection prepares the way for the terms as used in Jesus' proclamation of God's kingdom (Mark 1:14-15).

New Testament Use. Several books have a special interest in attaching "gospel" to a different aspect of the Christian message. Luke and John studiously avoid the term (except in one special instance, Rev. 14:6ff.). The main users of the word are Mark and Matthew, with Paul appropriating the term "gospel" as a central idea in his vocabulary (sixty times in his letters, excluding the Pastorals, which have four instances). Mark chooses "gospel" to sum up Jesus' proclamation of the imminent rule of God (1:14 ff.). Indeed the term is the title of his entire Gospel book (1:1) and summarizes all that the church preaches (13:10; 14:9). Matthew editorializes the verses he borrows from Mark and gives an instructional flavor to the term in keeping with his idea of the church as a "school of Christ." The gospel is to be learned and obeyed (Matt. 11:28-30; 13:52; 28:18-20).

Paul's witness is the clearest of all. For him "gospel" means "the death and resurrection of Jesus as saving events," to be proclaimed (vv. 1-5) and believed (I Cor. 15:11). His apostolic task can be summed up in this one word: to preach the gospel (Gal. 1:15-17; I Cor. 1:17; 9:16). And he can lay claim to "my gospel" (Rom. 2:16), set over rival versions of the Christian message, which he repudiated (II Cor. 2:17; Phil. 1:12-18; Gal. 1:6-9). The gospel became for Paul the touchstone of his ministry as "apostle to the Gentiles," a designation picked up in later tributes (Eph. 3:1-9; I Tim. 2:7). There is also an ethical standard implied in "living according to the gospel" as Christians are thereby summoned to live out their faith (Phil. 1:27; Gal. 2:14).

Summary. "Jesus Christ, risen from the dead, descended from David, as preached in my gospel" (II Tim. 2:8), may well stand for an epitome of what the NT writers, mainly in the Pauline tradition, meant by "gospel." Both the person and saving achievement of Christ are involved as he fulfilled OT prophecy and brought messianic salvation to the church. This news is to be published to all peoples (Rom. 10:5-15), since God in Christ has reconciled the world (II Cor. 5:18-21) and brought in a new age. R.M.

GOSPEL OF TRUTH. An Apocryphal work used, according to the church father Irenaeus (second century A.D.) by Valentinian GNOSTICISM. It is a mystical-homiletical writing that claimed to be based on secret traditions of Jesus' teachings, but it actually was a mixture of Christian doctrine and Gnostic speculations of Jewish origins. It is believed that one of the fragmentary Coptic Gnostic manuscripts discovered at NAG-HAMMADI in Egypt is the Gospel of Truth.

The authors of apocryphal gospels tried to convince their readers that they, and not the canonical Gospels, were giving the true history and teachings of Jesus. They did this by professing to teach secret doctrines that Jesus had taught only to a few, select disciples. They then mingled together portions of the canonical Gospels and their own teachings. The church fathers recognized the hidden purposes of the authors of such works and rejected them. (Compare APOCRYPHA, NT.) J.C.

GOSPELS, THE FOUR. The historical problem of "the four Gospels" is sharply posed by the fact that Paul, in his lifetime, had more than once opposed the idea of there being more than one GOSPEL (Gal. 1:7-9; II Cor. 11:4) (see SYNOPTIC GOSPELS). Yet by the time of Justin (A.D. 150) Christian worship at Rome is described as including a public reading of "the memoirs of the apostles . . . called gospels." About the same time the church was driven to do two things, paradoxically interconnected: it had to delimit the number of "gospels" to the canonical four we know in the face of apocryphal and gnostic gospels gaining currency; and it had especially to oppose MARCION's attempt to appeal to an abbreviated Gospel of Luke as solely authoritative in his CANON. And it had to resist the temptation, in a third course of action inspired by TATIAN's Diatessaron or Harmony (A.D. 170), which ran together the four Gospels into a single account, to ignore or deny the plurality of four Gospels, each with its own distinctive way of telling the story of Jesus.

In the end the view that prevailed was that which attributed each Gospel to an apostolic source, whether direct (as in the case of Matthew and John, believed to be disciples-apostles who wrote down their eyewitness reports) or indirect (Mark, a follower of Peter according to PAPIAS, A.D. 130, and Luke, a companion of Paul the apostle). This is Tertullian's ground for affirming that the church's appeal to the four Gospels rests on apostolic authority.

Traditional Symbols for the Four Gospels

Yet, from earliest times, Christians recognized that each Gospel had a distinctive pattern and emphasis.

MARK is traditionally believed to be the first of the Gospels to appear. The novelty of this Gospel lies in its appropriation of the title "gospel" (1:1), which before the evangelist's time meant the public preaching, to apply to a written composition.

MATTHEW is clearly constructed with a view to its use in a pedagogical (educational) situation. The evangelist's church is like a school in which the occupation of study is led by Christian teachers (13:52).

LUKE, drawing on a source of Jesus' words common to Matthew and other written compositions in his day, presumably Mark, has written what may rightly be called a "life of Jesus" (Luke 1:1-4). His purpose is chiefly pastoral.

JOHN is the most distinctive of the four Gospels, ostensibly published as an apostolic document (21:24) and intended to awaken or confirm the faith of its readers in Jesus as Messiah and Son of God (20:30-31). The transcendental dimension is explained by Clement of Alexandria: John, seeing that the outward facts had been set down by the other evangelists composed a "spiritual Gospel" (cited in Eusebius, Church History).

R.M.

GOTHIC. A style of art, particularly distinct in architecture, that evolved from the Romanesque style in the twelfth century and became dominant in western Europe in the thirteenth century. The name "Gothic" was originally pejorative, given to it by Renaissance enthusiasts of classical art for whom the centuries immediately preceding were the Middle Ages and their highest artistic expression "Gothic"—that is, derived from the barbaric Goths. One of the main characteristics of Gothic architecture is its vertical lines, achieved through the repetitive use of pointed arches, ribbed vaults, and buttressing systems (usually flying buttresses) that allow great height without massive walls. The large windows that were made possible by the buttressing system gave opportunity for the extensive use of stained glass, which in turn made the interiors much lighter than the earlier Romanesque churches. Among the greatest examples of Gothic architecture are the cathedrals of CHARTRES, Cologne, and Paris (Notre Dame).

J.G.

GOTTSCHALK (805–868). A ninth-century monk noted for his theories on PREDESTINATION, which led to an extended controversy. Gottschalk had carefully studied the teachings of AUGUSTINE and on that basis declared that God has predestined some to salvation and others to damnation, and that in our present fallen state there is nothing we can do to please God. Upon learning of these teachings, several contemporary theologians were convinced that Gottschalk was a heretic. Foremost among these were Rabanus Maurus and Hincmar of Rheims, two of the most respected leaders of the church in the ninth century. Hincmar, in particular, sought the support of a number of theologians. But most of these had to agree that what Gottschalk taught was very close to the teachings of Augustine, and Hincmar found himself in a difficult position. Defeated in the field of theological debate, Hincmar made use of his personal influence with Charles the Bald. At the king's command, a council declared that Hincmar's position was in full agreement with Augustine's, which was historically false. Gottschalk, who had earlier been condemned as heretical, deposed from the priesthood, and imprisoned by his superiors, died in captivity, where he went mad shortly before his death. The entire controversy was one more example of the ambivalent attitude of medieval theology toward Augustine, whose authority all affirmed, but whose teachings few followed. A work by Gottschalk, Predestination, was discovered in Switzerland in 1930.

J.G.

GRACE. The language and literature of the Bible are especially rich in words for grace, just as there are several other terms, such as FORGIVENESS, SALVATION, LOVE, which convey the idea behind grace. Basically grace is God's free and loving regard for humankind expressed in all God has done and continues to do for men and women as sinners and as God's people.

Old Testament. Two Hebrew words are significant. Hesed (in the RSV, "steadfast love," but best translated by incorporating the idea of covenant favor, that is, God freely chose Israel to make them a special people) can refer both to God's favor shown to Israel and to Israel's response in loyalty and obedience to the covenant relationship (Hos. 6:6). The idea of praising God for free favor runs through the Psalms (5:7; 57:3; 89:1, 2, 33), especially when the writers have been in trouble and have known deliverance. Hen is a more general term, but is used unilaterally, that is, a superior's condescending attitude to a subordinate (Gen. 33:8ff. of Esau's attitude to the servile Jacob). In that sense ben describes God's loving decision to select and claim Israel as chosen of God (Deut. 7:7, 8; Jer. 31:2).

New Testament. The Greek word used in the Septuagint to translate hen is charis. The corresponding verb charizesthai means "to show favor" in the sense of "forgive" (Col. 2:13; 3:13). A second NT translation word is eleos, meaning "mercy," often used to render hesed in the OT Greek Bible. But charis is the dominant NT term. In classical times it meant "beauty," "charm," a meaning that may survive in Luke 4:22 and Colossians 4:6.

Ordinarily "grace" for the NT writers carries the specialized meaning of God's kindly attitude to men and women, bestowing on them pardon and receiving them into God's family as unworthy but beloved children. It is thus part of the vocabulary of salvation, and may be said to be a Pauline term par excellence (see Rom. 3:21-26). Hence the phrase "saved by grace" is a faithful summary of Paul's teaching (Eph. 2:5, 8). Grace thus stands in antithesis to LAW, when the latter term denotes a human effort intended to gain acceptance with God, usually by placing confidence in one's unaided strength (Phil. 3:4), or through the Torah religion thought of as a merit-conferring system (Rom. 10:3-4; Phil. 3:9). Paul vehemently opposed both ways of achieving salvation, since it can only be received from God as a gift in grace (Rom. 5:2; 6:23). Attempts to gain favor with God in other ways imply that we have fallen from grace (Gal. 5:4).

Several derivative senses of this primary meaning of grace are also important for Paul: grace means strength (II Cor. 12:9) for him to fulfill his apostolic tasks; it is used of the SPIRITUAL GIFTS, that is, gifts of God by the Holy Spirit to equip the Christian congregation for practical service both in the church's ministry of worship and in the world (Rom. 12:3-8; I Cor. 12:4-11); and in one special way Paul expected the Corinthians to excel in the charis (that is, "virtue") of a generous contribution to the collection for the poor in Jerusalem (II Cor. 8:7). The "grace" of the incarnate Lord is held out as a model for such sacrificial giving (II Cor. 8:9).

Later writers, both in the Pauline school (Tit. 2:11-14; I Tim. 1:12-17; II Tim. 2:1) and elsewhere (I Pet. 3:7; 4:10; 5:12; Heb. 2:9; 12:14, 15; John 1:17), echo these lines of teaching whose capstone is placed by yet one further variation of charis, namely thanksgiving for God's gracious action in Jesus Christ, both past and present (Rom. 7:25; II Cor. 9:15) as well as "grace over food" referred to in a few places (I Tim. 4:3; compare Mark 14:22, 23 and parallels; Acts 27:35). R. M.

GRACE, CHARLES E. (1881-1960). Known as "Sweet Daddy Grace," he was the charismatic founder of a Pentecostal holiness group, the United House of Prayer for All People. Born in the Cape Verde Islands, of Portuguese and African descent, he did not claim divinity as did FATHER DIVINE, but he emphasized his personal mediation of the Divine. Services were often enthusiastic and included faith healing and speaking in tongues. In addition to worship centers, his organization ran church cafeterias, low-income housing, and retirement homes. He published Grace magazine, which could be applied to one's body for healing. He also sold toothpaste, soap, and cold cream with alleged medicinal value. Grace died January 12 and was buried in New Bedford, Massachusetts. His mantle passed to Elder Walter McCollough, who then became known as Sweet Daddy Grace McCollough. The group, headquartered in Washington, D.C., but strongest in the Southeast, has more than 130 congregations coast to coast and some 27,000 members. N.H.

GRADUAL. In the liturgy of the eucharist, a psalm or sentence from a psalm read or sung between the first lesson and the gospel lesson for the day. The term comes from the Latin gradus or "step," since this reading was originally given from a raised portion of the chancel. J.C.

GRAHAM, BILLY (1918- ). American evangelist and one of the best-known religious figures of his day. He was born November 7 in Charlotte, North Carolina, and named William Franklin Graham; his parents were William Franklin and Morrow Coffey Graham. Educated at Florida Bible Institute, and Wheaton College, Graham received no seminary training. Although he had been reared in a Presbyterian home, Graham dates his conversion at age sixteen to a tent revival meeting in his home city conducted by Baptist evangelist Mordecai Ham. After serving as a lay preacher while attending the Florida Bible Institute, Graham was ordained as a Southern Baptist in 1939. Married on August 13, 1943, to Ruth McCue Bell, daughter of a medical missionary to China, Graham served for a time as the pastor of the Western Springs (Ill.) Baptist Church, which he called the Village Church.

Courtesy of the Billy Graham Evangelistic Association

William F. (Billy) Graham

In 1943 he became the first evangelist of the newly founded Youth for Christ movement. He was elected president of Northwestern College, Minneapolis, in 1948, and conducted an evangelistic crusade in Los Angeles in 1949, springing instantly into national prominence.

He founded the Billy Graham Evangelistic Association with headquarters in Minneapolis. His first London Crusade in 1954 catapulted him to world fame. Thereafter he conducted meetings in major United States cities and in Europe, Africa, South America, Asia, New Zealand, and Australia.

The weekly "Hour of Decision" radio broadcast was launched in 1950. Later he began to produce evangelistic films and appeared on television specials. Graham has a weekly syndicated column, "My Answer." In 1956 he was one of the founders of the biweekly magazine Christianity Today, and in 1960 he started the monthly magazine Decision. Graham has authored a number of books, many of which have reached the best-seller list.

He was the major force behind several international gatherings: the World Congress on Evangelism at Berlin in 1966, the International Conference on World Evangelization at Lausanne in 1975, and a conference for itinerant evangelists at Amsterdam in 1983. He has appeared on the platform of general assemblies of the World Council of Churches.

Graham was invited to the White House by all the presidents of the United States from Truman on, but he was particularly close to Eisenhower, Johnson, and Nixon. The Grahams have three daughters, Virginia (Gigi), Anne Morrow, and Ruth (Bunny), and two sons, William Franklin and Nelson Edman.

R. H.

GRAIL, HOLY. A legendary cup supposed to have great powers, whose quest inspired several romantic tales beginning late in the twelfth century. In some cases, it was identified with the cup that Jesus used at the Last Supper. In general, however, the legend of the holy grail, while having a profound influence in literature, made little impact in theology or even in the popular religious views of the time. J.G.

GRANT, ROBERT (1779-1838). The British hymnwriter was born in Bengal, where his father, Charles, was a well-known philanthropist. Robert was sent home to England in 1790. He graduated from Magdalene College, Cambridge (B.A. 1801; M.A. 1804) and was admitted to the bar at Lincoln's Inn in 1807. He was elected to Parliament, representing Elgin in 1818, Inverness in 1826, and Norwich in 1830, and became a privy councilor in 1831. Noted for his attempts to repeal all civil disabilities for Jews, he initiated a bill to remove civil restrictions imposed against them in 1833. Knighted and appointed governor of Bombay in 1834, he assumed the post in March 1835. Grant died at Dalpoorie, India, on July 9. His hymns, published posthumously by his brother Charles in the volume Sacred Poems (1939), include "Saviour, When in Dust to Thee," "O Worship the King," "By Thy Birth and by Thy Tears," and "When Gathering Clouds Around I View." N.H.

GRATIAN. The twelfth-century author of the Decretum Gratiani, a compilation of texts from popes, councils, and ancient Christian writers, arranged according to various issues in canon law. Although very little is known of Gratian's life, his work has been credited with having founded the discipline of CANON LAW, and was eventually incorporated into the Corpus Juris Canonici. During the late Middle Ages, it was widely used in debates on the authority of popes, councils, bishops, and others. J.G.

GRATITUDE. The basic human response corresponding to God's GRACE is gratitude. It permeates the life and worship of the community of faith in both the OT and NT. "It is good to give thanks to the Lord" is a prominent theme (Ps. 92:1; compare Pss. 42:4; 95:2; 100:4; Col. 2:7; Eph. 5:20). Ingratitude is the essence of sin (Rom. 1:21; compare Luke 17:11-19).

Gratitude Is Offered to God. In the Bible the predominant number of references to thanksgiving specify or imply that it is God to whom words of appreciation are spoken. God is the source of "every good endowment and every perfect gift" (Jas. 1:17). The prayers of thanksgiving in most of the NT epistles are directed to God, even as they celebrate the faithfulness and love of the epistles' recipients (for example, II Thess. 1:3-4).

Gratitude Is Offered for God. Thanksgiving is not quantified to correspond to specific material or even spiritual blessings, as if God were a capricious deity and gratitude were only appropriate when one became sufficiently prosperous. Instead, God is faithful to promises made and is reliable. God's goodness and trustworthiness become occasions for thanksgiving; all other reasons for thanksgiving are derivative. It is not surprising that a repeated refrain in Israel's liturgy ran, "O give thanks to the Lord, for he is good; for his steadfast love endures for ever!" (Pss. 106:1; 107:1; 118:1, 29; 136:1-3).

Gratitude Is Offered "in All Circumstances." It is not merely in response to desired benefits that thanks are given, nor only when one's lot in life appears blessed, at least more blessed than that of others (compare the prayer of the Pharisee in Jesus' parable: "God, I thank thee that I am not like other men," Luke 18:11). The gracious character of God shapes the human response; therefore, praise can be the mark of every situation (I Thess. 5:18). Paul even spoke of rejoicing in sufferings, not in a masochistic mood but because the presence of God led to hope (Rom. 5:3-5).

Gratitude is the context out of which the life of obedience is lived. "And whatever you do, in word or deed, do everything in the name of the Lord Jesus, giving thanks to God the Father through him" (Col. 3:17). The Heidelberg Catechism appropriately considers "good works" and the demands of the Ten Commandments under the rubric of "thankfulness." Gratitude to God expresses itself in the responsible ways neighbors and needy people are treated.

C.B.C.

GRAVEN IMAGE. An IDOL or likeness of a human being or animal used as an object of worship; the use of which is expressly forbidden by the Second Commandment of the Mosaic Decalogue (Exod. 20:4). Specifically, graven images are three-dimensional, cultic idols made of poured molten metal (Exod. 34:17). Throughout the OT, idols are opposed, condemned, and ridiculed, as the purely spiritual nature of Yahweh is stressed. Perhaps at first, in their wilderness wanderings, the Israelites were not seriously threatened by the widespread idolatry of Egypt, Canaan, Assyria, and Babylonia, but after settling in Canaan and feeling the attraction of and pressure from their neighbors, idolatry became a severe threat that had to be fought constantly. Additionally, intermarriages with idolaters, the need to show respect to powerful neighbors like Egypt, Assyria, and Babylonia, and the popular belief that local GODS controlled their territories and had to be respected and appeased, contributed to widespread attempts to serve Yahweh and other gods. The great prophets rose up again and again to denounce this idolatry, which they termed spiritual adultery. As the OT books were written, opposition to idols was seen as a prime mission of the Hebrew people. According to Joshua 24:2, Abraham left Ur because he wished to escape from the idolatry of his fathers. J.C.

GREAT AWAKENING (First and Second). As defined by William McLoughlin in Revivals, Awakenings, and Reform, awakenings are occasioned by crises in beliefs and values that lead to cultural revitalization and reorientation, often marked by religious REVIVALS. Puritanism was one such revival. There have been four awakenings in American history: the First (1730-60), Second (1800-30), Third (1890-1920), and Fourth (1960- ).

The First and Second Great Awakenings were seen as spontaneous works of the Holy Spirit, visitations of God's grace for the renewal of America's sacred mission. Socially the First contributed to the founding of the American republic; the Second to the bonding of the Union and the rise of Jacksonian participatory democracy. The revivals were integrated into the awakenings. The Third and Fourth were more secular, with the revivals more often being attempts to stabilize the status quo rather than formulating creative solutions to society's new challenges.

The First Great Awakening is usually dated from the 1734 revivals at JONATHAN EDWARDS' Northampton, Massachusetts, church. His account, A Faithful Narrative of the Surprising Work of God (1737), influenced John Wesley and his colleague George Whitefield, whose 1739 and 1740 tours of the eastern seaboard gathered many conversions. Local itinerants Gilbert Tennent and James Davenport continued the work.

The awakening was characterized by highly emotional preaching, such bodily effects as weeping and fainting, and an emphasis on conversion as a single soul-shaking experience. Church membership increased by about fifty thousand members. It also divided Old Lights from New Lights among Congregationalists, Old Side from New Side among Presbyterians, and created the Separate Baptists. Revivalists formed such coalitions as the 1801 Plan of Union and the Benevolent Empire.

The Second Great Awakening had two phases. It began with the 1800 camp meeting revivals of Gaspar River and CANE RIDGE, Kentucky. Marked by extreme enthusiasm and bodily "exercises," it spread to the Carolinas and south into Georgia, spawning such churches as the Disciples of Christ. The second wave began in 1826 with CHARLES FINNEY's work in upstate New York. His New Measure—protracted meetings, the anxious bench, praying for people by name, colloquial preaching, and allowing women to pray and testify—set new standards for revivalism, routinized by his Lectures on Revivals (1835).

The Second Great Awakening was based on an "arminianizing" of Calvinism, a shift away from original sin to moral responsibility, a renewed emphasis on conversion as an act of the will rather than God's gift to the elect. An emphasis on "usefulness" led to attacks on such social ills as slavery, sexism, poverty, prostitution, alcoholism, and war. Presbyterians split between Old School and New School, which led to an actual schism in 1837. A corollary emphasis on perfection led to the formation of the Wesleyan and Free Methodist churches, from the Methodist Episcopal church, which benefited most from the revival. N.H.

GREAT COMMISSION. See COMMISSION, GREAT.

GREAT SCHISM. The period from 1378 to 1423, when there were two rival popes—and three at times—claiming the allegiance of a divided Europe. Gregory XI had brought the Papacy back to Rome after the long period of its residence at AVIGNON. At his death, the cardinals elected Urban VI to succeed him. But Urban soon alienated most of the cardinals, who then left Rome, declared that Urban's election had taken place under coercion and was therefore invalid, and elected a rival pope, who took the name of Clement VII. After an unsuccessful attempt to take Rome by force of arms, Clement settled his residence in Avignon. Urban named a new group of cardinals, and thus there now were two rival popes with two rival colleges of cardinals. After the death of each of the two claimants, others were elected to succeed them, thus perpetuating the schism. This state of affairs, as well as the prevalence of such evils as simony, absenteeism, and pluralism, gave added impetus to CONCILIARISM, which aimed to reform the church and end the schism by means of a universal council. In 1409 the Council of Pisa declared the two rival popes deposed and elected a third in their stead. But since the other two claimants refused to accept the conciliar decision, there were now three popes. The Council of Constance finally forced the abdication of the Roman Pope Gregory XII and the the Pisan Pope John XXIII. Although the pope of the Avignon line, Benedict XIII, refused to abdicate, he lost most of his followers, and for all practical purposes the schism came to an end. With his death in 1423, the last remnant of the Great Schism was healed. By then, however, the Papacy had lost much of its prestige and power.

J.G.

GREAT SEA. See MEDITERRANEAN SEA.

GREAT TRIBULATION. See TRIBULATION, GREAT.

GREECE (Biblical). The point of contact between Greek history and biblical narrative and chronology is the fourth century B.C. The war between the city states of Athens and Sparta, lasting twenty-seven years, left both important centers impoverished and exhausted. The immediate result was the rise of Macedonia under the leadership of Philip II, who had energy and access to natural resources along with numerical strength—all factors denied the Greeks in the south. The upshot was that Greek hegemony passed to Macedonia in a war against Persia, and in particular threw into prominence Philip's brilliant son, ALEXANDER THE GREAT.

Alexander's meteoric campaign from Greece to India and China brought HELLENISM onto the scene, but also led to a confrontation between Judaism and Greek polytheistic and naturalistic culture (seen in Dan. 7-12, where Alexander is referred to, for example in 8:21).

On Alexander's death in 323 B.C. Greek influence became expressed in the rising Seleucid power, which later led to Syrian expansionism and the Maccabean revolt (168 B.C.), which marked its virtual decline. World power passed over to the Romans, but Greek legacy lived on in the concept of "one world" (oikoumenē: Luke's word in Luke 2:1, rendered "all the world" in RSV) and a common language (koinē or spoken Greek as a hallmark of civilization: see Acts 21:37-39)—both important factors in the spread of the Christian mission in Greco-Roman society, as well as in the memory of classical civilization, which later Christians exploited in their insistence that the best aspirations of Greece in its golden period were met in a "natural theology" (seen in the second century A.D. Apologists, but also in Acts 17: the speech given to the Areopagus with its allusion to Aratus and Cleanthes, Greek poets who celebrated human kinship with the Divine).

R.M.

GREEK ORTHODOX CHURCH. See ORTHODOX CHURCHES.

GREEK RELIGION, PHILOSOPHY, LANGUAGE. Greek language and culture served as the prime media through which Judaism and Christianity spread throughout the Mediterranean world in the three centuries before and after the birth of Jesus.

Courtesy of the Metropolitan Museum of Art. Purchase 1890. Levi Hale Willard Bequest

Model of the Parthenon in Athens, Greece

The Letter of Aristeas (first century B.C.) claims that there was so great an interest in Judaism among Greeks in the reign of Ptolemy II Philadelphus (255–246 B.C.) that the monarch ordered a translation of the Jewish Torah into Greek for the royal library in Alexandria. The legend goes on that six men were chosen from each of the twelve tribes to journey to Egypt, where they completed the project in seventy-two days. The work was probably done by Alexandrine Jews in the early third century. The number of translators was rounded off to seventy, for which the later Latin designation was SEPTUAGINTA (LXX). The existence of this translation stimulated study of the Bible in Alexandria in correlation with Greek literature and philosophy. Books were written that claimed to be by earlier writers—such as Ezra or Solomon or the sons of Jacob—which clearly show the influence of Greek philosophy. The use of the LXX and the process of adaptation to Greek literature and philosophy were carried further by the early Christians, including the NT writers. Indeed the existence of the LXX is one of the most important factors that made possible the rapid spread of Christianity and the grounding of its adherents in biblical tradition.

The language level used by Jewish and Christian writers varied from the awkward, yet vivid style of common speech (koinē) in the Gospel of Mark (where traces of Semitic linguistic features are apparent) to the more sophisticated narrative and discourse style of Acts, Hebrews, and the Wisdom of Solomon (in the Apocrypha). The author of Acts was obviously familiar with the literary strategies of contemporary historians and writers of romances, just as the writers of documents like Hebrews and the Wisdom of Solomon knew technical Greek philosophical language.

The dominant philosophical systems that most directly influenced Jewish and Christian writers in this period were Stoicism, Platonism, and Cynicism. The method of spreading the faith by itinerant preachers-teachers was similar to that of the CYNICS, whose propagandists wandered from town to town, addressing crowds gathered in the marketplaces, living from whatever food or lodging was offered them. But instead of the Cynic appeal to free oneself from any personal or social obligation, the Christian itinerants announced the end of the age and called for commitment to the inbreaking rule of God.

The Stoic influence on Jewish and early Christian ethics was pervasive. STOICISM regarded the universe as operating by the inherent law of nature. Conscience was what made one conscious of this universal law. Courage and wisdom led one to overcome lower urges and live according to nature. The story of the Maccabean triumph over the Seleucids is retold in IV Maccabees as though it were chiefly a matter of victory of self-control over unworthy motivations. In the Testaments of the Twelve Patriarchs, a document which purports to have been written by Jacob's sons,

New Testament Greek Alphabet

Capital letter	Small letter	Name	Latin
A	α	alpha	a
B	β	beta	b
Γ	γ	gamma	g, n
Δ	δ	delta	d
E	ε	epsilon	e
Z	ζ	zeta	z
H	η	eta	ē
Θ	θ	theta	th
I	ι	iota	i
K	κ	kappa	k
Λ	λ	lambda	l
M	μ	mu	m
N	ν	nu	n
Ξ	ξ	xi	x
O	ο	omicron	o
Π	π	pi	p
P	ρ	rho	r, rh
Σ	σ, ς	sigma	s
T	τ	tau	t
Υ	υ	upsilon	y, u
Φ	φ	phi	ph
X	χ	chi	ch
Ψ	ψ	psi	ps
Ω	ω	omega	ō
			h

New Testament Greek Alphabet

the sin of one of the sons in committing incest is denounced, not by reference to a legal precept from the law of Moses, but because it is contrary to the law of nature. Paul in Galatians enumerates the "fruit of the Spirit," that is, the good works that the Spirit enables the faithful to perform. Among them are "gentleness and self-control" (Gal. 5:23). When he asks how non-Jews, who lack the revealed law of Moses, can know what God demands of them, his answer is "conscience" (Rom. 2:14-15).

The basic claim of PLATO—that the world of the senses was comprised of imperfect, impermanent copies of the forms of reality—directly influenced both Judaism and Christianity as they sought to gain credibility in the Greco-Roman world. In the Wisdom of Solomon, for example, a writer near the turn of the Christian Era depicts Wisdom as the mediating agent through whom ultimate reality is disclosed in the material world: "She is a reflection of eternal light, a spotless mirror of the working of God" (Wisd. of Sol. 7:26). As an emanation of the transcendent God, she reveals God's power, purpose, and ultimate reality to a transitory world, subject to corruption and decay.

Philo of Alexandria (30 B.C.—45 A.D.) so stressed the transcendent and otherness of God in his allegorical interpretations of the five books of Moses (the PENTATEUCH) that he had to posit the existence of the Divine Word (LOGOS) through which God created the physical world and by which natural order was maintained within it. Exodus 25:40 reports God as instructing Moses to make the Ark of the Covenant and the equipment of Israel's central sanctuary "after the pattern for them, which is being shown you on the mountain." Philo interpreted this to mean that Moses had been privileged to glimpse the eternal forms in the divine presence, and that the tabernacle built for Israel was the earthly copy of the heavenly reality. The Letter to the Hebrews quotes this passage from Exodus 25 to make precisely the same point (Heb. 8:15), but adds the distinctive Christian claim—basically Platonic in its point of view—that Christ's sacrificial offering of himself has been present in the true ideal heavenly sanctuary so that his offering is the ideal sacrifice. The whole Jewish sacrificial system consists of transitory copies of the eternal reality, which is embodied in Christ's offering.

Greek popular religion also deeply affected both Judaism and Christianity. Most pervasive was the role of ISIS. She became identified by Hellenistic times with Wisdom (Maát, the Egyptian goddess). But her role was more personal than intellectual. Although she was venerated as the divine agent by which the stars were kept in their courses and the cycle of seasons and fertility were maintained, she was also the personal beneficiary of those who turned to her in need. She was therefore the object of deep personal devotion, so that many dedicated their lives to her service. Inscriptions have been found telling of benefits her faithful followers received. By the late first and early second century, in the writings of Plutarch and Apuleius respectively, Isis is portrayed as the symbolic figure by which one may find meaning in life, and as the mistress of the universe in whose service are freedom, fulfillment, and renewal of life. Biblical portraits of Wisdom include one in Proverbs 8, where she is God's companion, and in Sirach 24, where she is the instrument through whom beauty of nature and harmony in human relations are brought about. The three roles of Isis—agent of creation, beneficiary of the needy, central figure around whom are gathered those with faith and true insight—are assigned in the Gospel of John to Jesus as the Logos made flesh.

Similarly, Asclepius, the god of healing, was regarded in Hellenistic times as the one to whom the blind, the crippled, or those who had lost children should turn in order to regain health or to find the loved one who had disappeared. He was thought to dwell in a shrine at Epidaurus in Greece. Visitors spent the night in his sanctuary and were visited during the night by sacred dogs or sacred snakes whose touch might restore them. If they were especially blessed, the god himself might appear. Testimonies to the effectiveness of his cures survive on carved slabs found in the ruins of the Asclepion. By the second century, however, Asclepius was turned to, not merely to heal the body, but to give encouragement to the frustrated, direction to the perplexed, and a sense of kinship with the divine to those who felt alienated or aimless. Aelius Aristides, who lived for ten years adjacent to Asclepius' shrine in Pergamum on the Aegean coast of Asia Minor, described in detail in his Sacred Discourses how the god enriched his native gifts as orator and gave him a sense of importance in his world.

The religion of Dionysus, which probably originated in Asia Minor, but soon gained a popular following in Greece and Rome was a dynamic cult that promised direct participation in the life of the god. Incited by wine and rhythmic music, the devotees of Dionysus entered a trance-like state in which they shared a sacred cup and food with the god. Our knowledge of the Dionysiac movement derives largely from those who scorned it (Livy, the Latin historian; Euripides, the Greek dramatist), but enough has survived to show that the cult promised a renewal of life through participation in the sacred ceremonies. Over a period of centuries throngs flocked to his shrine at Eleusis, near Athens, to share in the divine life. That kind of longing finds expression in the Gospel of John, where the writer builds on the OT story of the bread from heaven (John 6; Exod. 16; Num. 11) that fed Israel in the wilderness. The sacred bread and wine of the Christian Eucharist (John 6:11) recall that experience, but John described its effects as bringing transformation of life (John 6:41, 50-51). Instead of an invisible divine figure who offers the transforming cup, John sees it as presented by "Jesus of Nazareth, the son of Joseph" (John 1:45), a thoroughly historical figure whose earthly parentage, suffering, and death are recounted by John.

Thus, the traces of Greek religion that have survived enable us to see what human aspirations were in the culture of the Roman world as the claims made in behalf of various divine agents—including

Jesus—competed for the loyalty and devotion of seeking men and women. Greek language, philosophy, and religion have provided basic questions; the religious answers to these were offered by Jews and Christians, who addressed their contemporaries as they set forth their own distinctive claims.

H. K.

GREGORIAN CHANT. The traditional musical form of Roman Catholic liturgical texts, deriving its name from collections made by Pope GREGORY I (590–604). Of very early origins in Antioch and Jerusalem, the Gregorian chant (also known as plainsong) was standardized and enhanced by Gregory's Schola Cantorum (school of singers). This chant was introduced into England by Augustine of Canterbury at the end of the sixth century. English missionary monks carried it back to the Continent, and it dominated medieval musical forms by the eleventh century. With the development of contrapuntal music, madrigals, and polyphony, the Gregorian chant rapidly declined to virtual non-use by the sixteenth century.

Revivals fared poorly until popes Pius IX, Leo XIII, and Pius X showed interest during the nineteenth and twentieth centuries. Efforts of the Benedictine Abbey of St. Pierre de Solesmes, France, to recover the true Gregorian chant form received papal approval in 1903. Pius X ordered use of the Gregorian chant in 1904. The chant's modal melody, sung by one or more voices in unison, is traditionally unaccompanied and elaborates the Latin biblical text with pauses, flourishes, and a flow appropriate to its meaning.

C. M.

GREGORY I, THE GREAT (540–604). Pope from 590 to 604, and one of the four great Latin DOCTORS OF THE CHURCH. He belonged to an aristocratic Roman family and had a high position in the government of the city when he decided to become a monk. By then, he had disposed of most of his wealth by giving it to the poor and to various monastic foundations. A period as the pope's representative in Constantinople convinced him that the Byzantine Empire was weak and corrupt, and that the West should expect no hope from it as it sought to rebuild after the Germanic invasions. In Italy, the Lombards were ravaging the land, and Gregory decided that the West, and the papacy in particular, would have to respond to that challenge on the basis of its own resources.

Back in Rome, he was elected pope, a post he accepted only after great hesitation and soul searching. As pope, he followed the policies that his stay in Constantinople had led him to espouse. Instead of awaiting support from the East against the Lombards, he simply moved ahead in negotiations with them and eventually reached an agreement on his own authority. Since this agreement involved the disposition of several territories in Italy, it was a major step in the development of the temporal power of the popes.

As a result of the Lombard wars, Italy was in chaos. The neglect of aqueducts and drainage systems and the disruption of trade had led to widespread disease and famine. It was Gregory's task to organize the public works and the trade necessary to restore a measure of health and well-being, and this also contributed to the growing power and prestige of the Papacy.

Gregory had always been an ardent supporter of MONASTICISM. Shortly before he became pope, the Lombards destroyed the monastery of Monte Cassino, the result being that many Benedictine monks fled to Rome. Through contacts with them, Gregory became a staunch advocate of the RULE OF ST. BENEDICT, which he helped spread throughout western Europe. A significant episode in this process was his sending of Augustine, later to become archbishop of Canterbury, on a mission to England. Gregory's biographers tell us that he had wished to go on such a mission himself, but was prevented from doing so by his admirers in Rome. Also, through extensive correspondence, and with the support of monks in various areas, Gregory sought to improve the life of the church in Gaul and Spain—thus adding to the prestige of the papacy.

As a theologian, Gregory was not original. His own goal was to be no more than the mouthpiece for earlier teachings, particularly those of Augustine of Hippo. But in truth his theology differed from that of Augustine on two major points: first, it reflected the age in which Gregory lived, with its superstitious fascination for miracles and legends; second, what for Augustine had been no more than possibilities, Gregory took as facts, mostly on the grounds that Augustine had spoken of them. A case in point is purgatory, of which Augustine spoke with hesitation, and which for Gregory was an established fact. Also, Gregory laid great stress on penance, which he discussed and systematized in a way that would be influential throughout the Middle Ages.

J. G.

GREGORY VII, POPE (1020–85). Pope from 1073 to 1085, but a highly influential person in the life of the church for years before his election as pope. A man of humble origins named Hildebrand, he was serving as chaplain for Gregory VI, who died in exile. He then retired to monastic life, until the newly elected Leo IX asked him to accompany him in his pilgrimage to Rome. Once there, first under Leo and then under his successors, Hildebrand became the leading force behind a vast program of reformation. Although historians have at times described him as hungry for power and a tyrant, more recent opinion is that he was a sincere reformer, and that his seemingly harsh measures were the result, not of a thirst for power, but rather of a zeal for reformation. Finally, in 1073, he was unanimously elected pope.

Gregory's program of reformation was directed against simony, the practice of lay investiture, and clerical marriage. It was he who most promoted the ideal of clerical CELIBACY, which eventually became the practice of the entire Western church. In his struggle against lay investiture, he clashed with a number of sovereigns, notably those of France, England, and Germany. In France, he was able to push through his reforms in spite of the opposition of Philip I. In England, he was willing to compromise with William the Conqueror, who refused to obey his decrees on lay investiture, but was actively reforming the church and even using his powers of investiture to that end. It was in Germany that his policies were most openly rejected. Henry IV refused to yield to the pope's entreaties and threats, and had two German synods declare Gregory deposed. The latter responded by excommunicating Henry, declaring him deposed, and freeing all his subjects from their vows of allegiance to him. Threatened with the loss of his throne, Henry submitted to the pope at Canossa. But this did not bring peace, and eventually Henry marched on Rome and forced Gregory into exile, where he died.

J.G.

GREGORY OF NAZIANZUS (329–389). Also known, particularly in the Eastern church, as Gregory the Theologian. With BASIL THE GREAT and GREGORY OF NYSSA, he is also one of the great Cappadocians who led the battle against ARIANISM in the second half of the fourth century. He befriended Basil the Great at Athens, where they were fellow students, and some time later decided to withdraw from the world and become a monk. But the church demanded his leadership, and he was made a priest against his will. After an unsuccessful attempt at flight, he returned to his priestly duties and on that occasion delivered his famous sermon "On the duties of a priest," which has become a classic. When the struggle against Arianism required it, Basil made him bishop of the hamlet of Sasima, which he never visited. He resented this action by Basil, and for this reason their friendship was strained until Basil died. He continued serving as a priest in Nazianzus, where his father (also named Gregory) was bishop, and after his father's death he again retired to the monastic life.

Once again Gregory was required to fight against Arianism and in 379 went to Constantinople, where all churches were in Arian hands, and began celebrating orthodox worship. Pressured by the authorities and mocked and pelted by the mobs, he persisted in this ministry. Finally, when the faith of Nicaea triumphed, he was made bishop of Constantinople, and as such presided over the Council of Constantinople in 381. But his enemies said that he could not be bishop of Constantinople, since he was already bishop of Sasima, and Gregory took the opportunity to resign and return to the monastic life.

Among his works are the Five Theological Orations, in which he developed his doctrine of the Trinity, and particularly of the PROCESSION OF THE HOLY SPIRIT; several other theological treatises, including some against Apollinarians; and hundreds of poems, some of which have become classics of Christian hymnody.

J.G.

GREGORY OF NYSSA (331?–396). One of the Great Cappadocians, and a younger brother of BASIL THE GREAT. His was a profoundly religious family, of which several members are officially listed as saints, notably his brothers Basil and Peter, and his sister Macrina. Although for a time he pursued a career in rhetoric, he was a mystic and a man deeply devoted to his monastic vocation. The Arian controversy, however, came to trouble his rest, for his brother Basil and others required him to employ his great intellectual gifts in the struggle against ARIANISM. For the same reason, much against his will, he was made bishop of Nyssa. His works and his sanctity eventually gained him great fame, and by the time of the COUNCIL OF CONSTANTINOPLE he was generally considered one of the great champions of the Nicene faith. At that council he played an important role, and Emperor Theodosius, profoundly impressed by his wisdom, made him one of his advisers in theological matters. In that capacity he traveled to various areas of the empire, and even as far as Arabia. But he still longed for the contemplative life and finally was allowed to fade once again into obscurity. In this he succeeded to such a degree that the manner and time of his death are not known. His extant works fill several volumes; but the most valued and influential throughout the history of the church are those on MYSTICISM. Since his piety and theology were profoundly shaped by NEOPLATONISM, these works were instrumental in the growing Neoplatonic influence on Christian faith and theology.

J.G.

GROUND OF BEING. A phrase referring symbolically to God made prominent in current theological discussion by PAUL TILlich (1886–1965). Drawing on the mystical tradition represented in Jakob Boehme (1575–1624) and Friedrich Schelling (1775–1854) to overcome the limitations of critical rationality, Tillich affirmed God as beyond theistic concepts, subject-object categories, and symbolic utterance. The one nonsymbolic statement about God is that God is BEING itself. As being itself, God is the ground of being, a phrase already symbolic in character. "Ground," says Tillich, "oscillates between cause and substance and transcends both of them" (Systematic Theology).

Ground of being means for Tillich the creative source of all that has being. God is the religious term for this depth of being, the ABYSS into which all tracing of the finite by reason disappears; God is at once power of being and burning fire. All human concern, or FAITH, has its ultimate ground in this depth of our own being. Reason is extended by Tillich beyond "technical" reason to "ontological" reason and at last to "ecstatic" reason that participates in and reflects the depth of being, which is its source. God as being itself is the ground of REVELATION, both its origin in the divine life and its manifestation in human faith and action.

In the phrase "ground of being," Tillich is attempting to relate theology and philosophy, the "abyss" of inexhaustibility and ineffability to the "logos" of meaning and structure, the depth of the Divine to the form of human experience in a mysterious and dynamic unity called "Spirit."

C.Mc.

GUARDIAN ANGELS. In ancient thought every nation, people, and religious group had its guiding and guarding spirits. Paul speaks of principalities and powers, meaning the angels, or from the Christian view, demons, who stood behind the Roman Empire or the pagan religions (Rom. 8:38; Eph. 3:10; 6:12; Col. 1:16; 2:15). The archangel Michael was thought to be the protector of God's chosen people. Acts 12:15 implies that one's personal angel was a spiritual double, reflecting a popular belief. Guardian angels protect people and facilitate their prayers to God. Such beliefs show the need for a mediator between humanity and God and are consequently criticized by Hebrews 1:4-14.

J.C.

GUILT. See SIN.

GUNKEL, HERMANN (1862-1932). German biblical scholar who taught at the universities of Halle (1889-94, 1920-27), Berlin (1894-1907), and Giessen (1907-20). A pioneer investigator of biblical literary genres, Gunkel defined the form-critical and history-of-religions task in which much twentieth-century OT scholarship has engaged. Not discounting the gains of J. Wellhausen's source criticism, Gunkel concentrated on the preliterary history of the OT. He listened carefully to the distinctive rhythms of biblical texts in which the ongoing life of individuals and communities was reflected. Thus he posited the Sitz im Leben (life setting) that triggered specific oral formulations. Collecting specimens of a given Gattung (literary type), Gunkel often drew from available ancient Near Eastern literature. Convincing illustrations of his methodological insights appear in two monumental commentaries on Genesis (1901) and Psalms (1926). His introduction to the former is available in English under the title The Legends of Genesis: The Biblical Saga and History (1964).

J.K.K.

GURDJIEFF, GEORGES IVANOVITCH (1872-1949). Colorful leader of a religious movement that sought to bring its members to "higher planes of consciousness." He based his beliefs on the teachings of a "hidden brotherhood" in central Asia. The movement had its center in the Institute for the Harmonious Development of Man, located in Fontainebleau, France. The Gudjjeff Foundation of New York continues his work.

K.C.

GURU. In Hinduism, the term "guru" (from the Sanskrit word meaning literally "weighty") is today usually used to refer to a spiritual teacher, especially one believed to be "God-realized," or in special communication with the Deity. The guru thus has more than an intellectual relationship with disciples, initiating and otherwise transmitting spiritual power to them according to their ability to receive it, and imparting to them techniques for reaching the same state as the guru's. Gurus are often credited with supranormal insight regarding the spiritual needs of others, as well as other psychic powers. The worship of one's guru as a vessel of God, whether in person, or at a distance in the form of a picture, or the imprint of the guru's footprints, is a standard practice in Hinduism.

R.E.

GUTENBERG, JOHANN (about 1397-1468). German printer and inventor of movable type. Born in Mainz, he moved early with his family to Strassburg. In Strassburg in 1438, he joined three others to experiment with printing. In 1450, in Mainz, he formed another partnership with lawyer Johann Fust to print a large Latin Bible. Fust loaned venture money, and in 1455 he sued for repayment. Gutenberg lost his press. Peter Schöffer, Fust's partner, then printed the famed forty-two-line Gutenberg Bible, the first book known to be printed with movable type. Only forty-eight copies still exist, one of the finest being in the Library of Congress. Gutenberg died blind and destitute.

C.M.

GUTMANN, BRUNO (1876-1966). One of history's most outstanding missionaries to the African continent, distinguished in ethnology and the scientific study of missions. Gutmann served as a missionary of the Leipzig mission from 1902 to 1938. He did extensive research on ideas of tribal and racial psychology and operated on the basic principle that a person is to be understood as a member of an organic whole, not just as an individual. Many of his ideas were opposed by Christian and mission leaders, but he made many significant contributions to the nature of the meeting between the gospel and African societies.

W.G.

GÜTZLAFF, KARL FRIEDRICH AUGUSTUS (1803-51). The first Lutheran missionary to China. Trained at the Jänicke Mission School in Berlin and in the Netherlands, Gützlaff was influenced by the Moravians and by a meeting in London with Robert Morrison, an early missionary to China. Gützlaff first went to Indonesia as a missionary and there learned the language of the Chinese to work among members of the dispersion there. He later worked in Thailand, where he translated the Bible into Siamese, took a Chinese name, wore Chinese clothing, and traveled along the coast of China. He later traveled into the interior of China and made several contacts, which later developed into mission fields. He trained evangelists and was an early pioneer in the indigenization of the church in China. Although most of his projects might be termed failures, Gützlaff was a pioneer of great influence who has sometimes been called the "grandfather of the CHINA INLAND MISSION."

W.G.

GUYON, MADAM (1648–1717). The mystic writer and exponent of QUIETISM was born Jeanne Marie Bouvier de la Motte on April 13 in Montargis, France. She was educated in convent schools. At age sixteen she married Jacques Guyon, a man of wealth and nobility twenty-two years her senior, yet sickly and still dominated by his mother. Jeanne Marie bore him five children. At age twenty she gave up all worldly amusements. When she was twenty-eight, her husband died. She devoted her life to God and her fortune to good works. At thirty-four she began an apostolic mission of travel and teaching. Church authorities harassed her, accused her of heresy, cast aspersions on her character, and finally had her imprisoned. She spent most of seven years in prison, the last four in the Bastille. She was released in 1703 under house arrest. Fenelon, archbishop of Cambrai, defended her views in his writings and at a trial in 1695 at which quietism was officially condemned. Guyon published a number of books on prayer and the inner life. John Wesley called her "a pattern of true holiness."

N.H.

Hh

HABAKKUK. A cultic prophet of Judah whose career likely dates from a period immediately following the battle of Carchemish in 605 B.C., which elevated the Babylonians to political supremacy throughout the Near East. Although the legend of Bel and the Dragon in the Apocrypha mentions a certain Habakkuk being miraculously transported to Babylon to feed Daniel in the lion's den, details about the ancestry and life of this OT prophet are unavailable. His name, however, may derive from an Akkadian plant name—hambakukū—and his thinking is partially revealed in the OT book that bears his name.

The Book of Habakkuk. Employing the style of an individual lament, which often raised the anguished question "How long?" the book opens with a twofold sequence of prophetic complaint and divine oracle. In 1:2-4 Habakkuk poignantly voices an objection to Yahweh that the ruthless (domestic?) behavior of the wicked goes unchecked. Indeed, "the law is slacked and justice never goes forth" (v. 4). Is God indifferent toward social violence? In 1:5-11 Yahweh answers that a virtually unbelievable deed is being planned. God is raising up the powerful Chaldeans (Babylonians), "that bitter and hasty nation" (1:6), to punish the oppressor.

But the emergence of this new world power, "whose own might is their god" (1:11), was for this Judean prophet an outrageous extension of the evil already perpetrated by the hated Assyrians. Renewed complaint was his only option. Thus in 1:12-17 Habakkuk puts this question before the "everlasting" and "holy" Deity: "Why . . . art [thou] silent when the wicked swallows up the man more righteous than he?" (1:13). Both the enemy without (the Chaldeans) and within (wicked Judeans and their recalcitrant king, Jehoiakim) weigh heavily on the prophet's mind. Again Habakkuk challenges Yahweh to abolish human tyranny.

Stationing himself at a site propitious for a revelation (2:1), Habakkuk awaits the divine reply. It unfolds in 2:2-4. He is granted an assurance, which he is commanded to write succinctly and in large letters on tablets "so he may run who reads it" (2:2). The prophet and his contemporaries are met with instruction and challenge. Though the vision be protracted, "it will surely come" (2:3), and in the face of history's enigmas, "the righteous shall live by his faith" (2:4).

Five rather cryptic woes now issue against the enemy (both outside and within Judah), who engages in oppressive greed (2:6-8), unprincipled gain (2:9-11), policies of violence (2:12-14), needless cruelty (2:15-17), and idolatry (2:18-20). The third chapter offers a sublime hymn portraying God's majestic coming to avenge the people (3:2-16) and a bold assertion of faith defending God's goodness in the face of a manifestly imperfect environment

(3:17-19). Though lacking in the Dead Sea Scroll of the Habakkuk Commentary, chapter 3 confers a thematic unity on the entire biblical book.

Religious Significance. Partly due to its autobiographical style, this book compellingly raises the issue of theodicy—how can a just God condone rampant EVIL in the world? The human-divine dialogue is intense. The answering oracle in 2:3-4 clarifies that the world's governance does reside in God's hands, and that righteousness does not depend on human mental capacity to understand divine intentions within the historical arena. Rather, it depends on a sure posture of obedience that believes in Yahweh's promise. This dramatic theology of expectation insists that ultimately, treachery rebounds upon the doer. Divine justice is inexorable. Thus the righteous need only rely on Yahweh's ability and integrity. The personal trust here manifested reappears in bold relief in the writings of Paul (Rom. 1:17; Gal. 3:11). J.K.K.

HABDALAH. A home ceremony of prayer among Jews signifying the end of the SABBATH or of other festivals. It concludes the time of rest of the Sabbath or festival and marks the distinction between the sacred character of the Sabbath or festival and the work days of the week. J.C.

HABIRU. A rootless people of mixed race and language attested all over the Near East throughout the second millennium B.C. They appear to have been less an ethnic entity than a stratum in society. Some texts portray them as vagrants who disrupted settled town populations, especially in Palestine in the Amarna period (fourteenth century B.C.) Other texts from ancient sources present them as indigents who improved their social position by hiring themselves out as mercenaries, or who, in times of dire need, became voluntary slaves. Though no easy equation between "Habiru" and "Hebrew" is possible, the roving Hebrew patriarchs may have been members of the wide-ranging Habiru social stratum. J.K.K.

HABIT. The robe, head covering, or other distinctive clothing worn by members of religious groups, which often identifies the religious order to which the person belongs. Special dress for the religious was provided by the rules of St. Basil, as a way of reminding religious of their monastic obligations. J.C.

HACHIMAN. A Japanese deity worshiped in both BUDDHISM and SHINTO. He has been honored as the god of war, and represented as riding on horseback and wearing a war helmet. He was also the friend of children, to whom he appeared as a simple, honest monk. Buddhists identify him with Jizo, a popular BODHISATTVA. K.C.

HADES. See GEHENNA.

HADITH. A tradition concerning something that MUHAMMAD said or did, or concerning his appearance or character. The term may refer to an individual item of tradition or to the entire collection of such traditions. Each Hadith contains a text (the content of the tradition) and a record of the chain of those who transmitted the text from the time of the prophet to the time of the latest transmitter. Much effort was devoted to investigating the chain of transmission in order to make certain it was genuine. This was necessary in order to weed out false Hadith that had been circulated in the first two centuries of Islam.

Especially in Sunnite Islam the Hadith have been used as a major source of religious authority. The QUR'AN is the most important authority, but it is often hard to interpret, and on many issues it is silent. In those cases, answers are sought first of all in the Hadith.

SUNNIS have nine collections of Hadith, and SHI'ITES have three. Many Shi'ite traditions concern various IMAMS, especially ALI, whom Shi'ites honor as the first iman.

The contents of the Hadith provide much historical information, especially details of the life of Muhammad. What Muhammad did or did not do often became a legal precedent. Hadith also contain stories about God, angels, prophets, and the last judgment. Some give rules about personal hygiene and ritual practices.

The Hadith are believed to be divinely inspired, but only in content, not word for word, as is the Qur'an. They have influenced the major genres of Islamic writing and have always been of the highest importance for Islamic faith. K.C.

HADRIAN I. Pope from 772 to 795. The most important feature of his pontificate was his continued alliance with CHARLEMAGNE against the Lombards, whose King Desiderius was eventually deposed by Charlemagne. He also appealed to Charlemagne for help against the adoptionism of several Spanish bishops. In the iconoclastic controversy, however, he and Charlemagne disagreed, for Hadrian accepted the decisions of the Second Council of Nicea, and the Frankish king rejected them. J.G.

HAGAR. An Egyptian maid of Sarah. The P stratum in the PENTATEUCH refers to Hagar for chronological purposes (Gen. 16:3, 15-16), but J and E offer moving accounts of Hagar's expulsion from Abraham's household.

The J Tradition. In Genesis 16:1b-2, 4-14, the Yahwist reports that in an effort to realize Yahweh's promise to Abram (12:1-3), Sarai gave Hagar to him so that he might secure a son (a practice attested in fifteenth-century B.C. Nuzi texts). Once pregnant, this concubine of Abram forgot that she was still Sarai's slave. When she acted arrogantly, Sarai obtained Abram's consent to treat her harshly. Hagar fled to the Wilderness of Shur in northern Sinai. The angel of Yahweh appeared to her at a well. He urged her to return to Sarai and promised her a long generation of descendants through her unborn child, the fierce Ishmael ("a wild ass of a man," 16:12).

The E Tradition. In Genesis 21:8-21 the Elohist likewise mentions Sarah's jealousy, the expulsion, and divine concern. The crisis, however, occurs after the births of Ishmael and Isaac. The disturbed Sarah, unable to tolerate the two boys playing together as equals, demanded that ABRAHAM expel Hagar and Ishmael, who threatened her own son's inheritance. Upon learning that God approved of this tactic, Abraham acceded. In their flight to the wilderness of Beer-sheba, the two were spared an untimely end by virtue of an appearance of the angel of God who showed Hagar a well. Moreover, Hagar was assured that from Ishmael "a great nation" would emerge (21:18).

Significance. Through these traditions, the Israelites acknowledged that the wild Bedouins inhabiting the southern wilderness were in fact their relatives. Moreover, in Galatians 4:21-31, Paul interprets the Hagar narrative allegorically. Ishmael, a slave's son, and Isaac, a free woman's son, respectively symbolize the old and new covenants.

J.K.K.

HAGGADAH. The book that occupies the attention of the participants in the Jewish PASSOVER SEDER. Interwoven with the ritual for the Seder service are readings from the Bible, selections and legends from the TALMUD and MIDRASH, prayers and blessings, hymns and songs.

The spirit pervading the Haggadah is one of longing for redemption and freedom, a belief in the survival and continuity of the Jewish people, and an unyielding confidence in divine salvation. According to Maimonides, the reading of the Haggadah is reckoned as one of the positive commandments that are incumbent upon all Jews: "It is a positive commandment of the Law to narrate the miracles and wonders that happened to our ancestors in Egypt on the night of the fifteenth of Nisan, as it is said: 'Remember this day, in which you came out from Egypt'" (Exod. 13:3).

The pivotal passage of the Haggadah—"Every person in every generation must regard himself as having been personally freed from Egypt"—is based on the MISHNAH. The prologue to the Haggadah, an invitation to the needy and a prayer for redemption, reads:

Behold the bread of poverty which our forebears ate in the land of Egypt. Let all who are hungry come and eat with us; let all who are needy come and celebrate Passover. This year we are here; next year may we be in the land of Israel. This year we are slaves; next year may we be free.

Endeared to Jews, the Haggadah has appeared in thousands of editions—printed, illuminated, illustrated. Many translations have been made, and it has been adapted to meet different needs and interests.

L.K.

HAGGAI, BOOK OF. A prophetic book consisting of only thirty-eight verses, which offers a narrative account of Haggai's five prose oracles and the response they evoked within the postexilic Jewish community. With his prophetic colleague, ZECHARIAH, Haggai successfully motivated the Jews, who had returned from Babylonian exile to finish rebuilding the Jerusalem Temple, and predicted a brilliant future for Yahweh's people.

Historical Context. Abundant date formulae (1:1, 15; 2:1, 10, 18, 20) indicate that Haggai spoke his oracles in 520 B.C., during the second year of the reign of Darius I Hystaspis, king of Persia. Everyday existence within the Jewish community was grim. Poverty resulting from drought and meager harvests called into serious question the stirring vision about Jewish restoration that Second Isaiah had articulated two decades earlier (Isa. 40-55). Overwhelmed by economic hardship, many of the returned exiles projected an indifference toward things religious. Though the Temple foundations had been laid (Ezra 3:8-13), building efforts had ceased for fifteen years. Clearly, the morale of the Jewish community, and its two leaders, ZERUBBABEL (governor) and JOSHUA (high priest), had plummeted. Informed by both political and theological insights, the spirited Haggai advanced a positive message, which called forth an immediate, energetic response. Mindful that the Persian Empire was rife with revolt during these opening months of Darius' rule, Haggai believed that Persia's future was far from certain. Moreover, he regarded Yahweh's decisive intervention as imminent. Accordingly, God's people must be prepared.

Oracles. In his first oracle (1:1-14), Haggai castigates those who preferred working on their own paneled houses instead of rebuilding Yahweh's Temple. Perceiving the present drought as a manifestation of divine punishment, Haggai promised that prosperity would return once first things were put first. Zerubbabel, Joshua, and "the remnant of the people" (1:14) responded positively to the challenge and resumed work on the Temple. Seven weeks later, Haggai spoke an encouraging oracle (1:15b-2:9) to those who lamented that the new Temple could not possibly measure up to Solomon's Temple. He predicted imminent political convulsions that would usher in a new world order, and tribute from all nations would pour into the Temple. The new edifice would eclipse the old in splendor, and poverty would be lifted from Judah. In a third oracle (2:10-14), Haggai instructs that evil is more contagious than good. In referring to "this people" (2:14), he may have leveled a criticism against Samaritans, who opposed the endeavors of the postexilic Judean community. Or Haggai may simply be insisting that for the sake of their religious well-being, the Jews should not waver in their resolve to rebuild the Temple. A fourth oracle (2:15-19) highlights the economic blessings that will accrue once Yahweh's house is rebuilt. (This is probably a misplaced component, since it appears to have been introduced by the suspended date formula in 1:15a.) In his last oracle (2:20-23), Haggai again anticipates the arrival of the new age by speaking anew about the overthrow of the nations. By referring to Zerubbabel as Yahweh's "signet ring" (2:23), Haggai was promising a special divine power to the governor, who represented the royal line of David.

On balance, this book usefully reflects some of the historical configurations within the restored Jewish community as well as the political and theological optimism of one of its prophets, who insisted that Yahweh's people need not despair about their future.

J.K.K.

HAGIA SOPHIA. The largest surviving church of ancient times, sponsored by the Eastern Roman Emperor Justinian and built between A.D. 532-537. Designed by Anthemius of Tralles and Isidorus of Miletus, Hagia Sophia was damaged by an earthquake in A.D. 558. The building was rebuilt in 563. After the Turks conquered Constantinople in 1453, they converted the church into a mosque, adding four minarets (towers) to the building. In February, 1935, Hagia Sophia was converted again, this time to a museum.

The church was originally named Hagia Sophia meaning "Holy Wisdom" in Greek and was sometimes called Sancta Sophia (Latin) or St. Sophia. The original building is a rectangle 79 by 73 meters (260 by 240 feet), divided longitudinally into the nave proper and side aisles. There is a dome over the nave, 30 by 32 meters (100 by 106 feet), rising fifty-six meters (184 feet) high. There are also half domes to the east and west that abut the main dome.

J.C.

HAGIOGRAPHIA. See CANON.

HAGIOGRAPHY. The writing of lives of saints. In the Middle Ages, such lives followed standard patterns, and edification was more important than historical accuracy. In more recent times, a critical hagiography has developed, which seeks to discover the historical facts behind traditional hagiographic materials.

J.G.

HAGRITE, HAGARENE. A Bedouin tribe residing east of Gilead, whose ethnological association with HAGAR, Ishmael's mother (Gen. 16), is uncertain. These pastoralists were conquered by the tribe of Reuben during Saul's reign (I Chr. 5:10, 19-22). Among David's officers was "Jaziz the Hagrite," who oversaw the flocks (I Chr. 27:30). In a national lament, the Hagrites are mentioned as one of Israel's Transjordanian enemies (Ps. 83:6).

J.K.K.

HAIKU. A Japanese poetical form, generally in seventeen "sound units," or syllables, arranged in groups of 5, 7, 5 lines. Each haiku stands by itself, although haiku on the same theme are sometimes grouped together. The subject matter varies widely, but a haiku should reflect an immediate experience of nature, seeing beauty or truth in everyday sights.

While many followers of ZEN have written haiku, few of their poems are narrowly religious. Instead they express a fusion of nature and spirit, reflecting loneliness and mystery. In many of the best haiku there is a surprise, often a sudden awareness of the presence of ultimate reality.

Courtesy of G. E. Kidder Smith

Hagia Sophia, Istanbul

Buddha Is the cherry blossoms
On a moon-lit night.
Hōitsu (1760–1828)

It has often been said that in Zen the doer and the deed are undivided, the perceiver and the perceived are one. Bashō (1644–94) wrote:

This autumn— Old age I feel,
In the birds, the clouds.

Bashō was also sensitive to the fusion of Buddhism and SHINTO, in which Shinto gods were identified with manifestations of the Buddha. At Isé, the holiest of Shinto shrines, he saw

On the fence around the shrine, Unforeseen,
The Buddha entering Nirvana.

K.C.

HAIL MARY. See AVE MARIA.

HAJJ. The pilgrimage to MECCA, one of the five PILLARS, or basic requirements, of ISLAM. Every Muslim must perform the pilgrimage at least once, unless prevented by poverty, poor health, or some other problem that cannot be overcome. A person who has made the pilgrimage is known as a Hajji, a title of honor.

The pilgrimage must be made during the twelfth month of the Muslim calendar. This is a lunar calendar that is not coordinated with the solar calendar, so the month of the Hajj comes at different times of the solar year.

There are specific qualifications for pilgrims. A pilgrim must be an adult; must ask permission of his or her parents, especially if they are old or sick; and must make a will concerning property and other important matters. All debts must be paid before setting out, enough money must be left behind for the family, and enough taken along to meet all expenses.

The city of Mecca and the surrounding area is holy. Only Muslims may enter the area, and they must observe strict rules. Pilgrims must not comb their hair, use perfume, or wear fine clothing. Hunting is prohibited, vain and vulgar talk must be avoided, and sexual intercourse is forbidden. There is a prayer to be said during every rite that is performed. Since no pilgrim can be expected to know all the things to do and not to do, local guides make a profession of conducting groups on the pilgrimage.

During the Hajj huge crowds gather in the courtyard surrounding the KA'BA, with its sacred black stone that fell from heaven. Pilgrims kiss the stone if they can get close enough to do so. They move counterclockwise seven times around the Ka'ba, offering prayers during each circuit.

Other rites include visits to various holy places, offering animal sacrifices, and casting stones at a column that represents Satan. Pilgrims drink water from the sacred well of Zamzam, which refreshed Ishmael, ancestor of the Arabs, and Hagar, his mother, after Abraham sent them away from home.

Since pilgrims come in increasing numbers from all parts of the world, communicable diseases have always been a threat. In recent years, the government of Saudi Arabia has provided sanitary facilities and health care for the pilgrims. Lodging ranges from modern hotels to tents or to sleeping in the open.

K.C.

HALAKAH. The legal side of JUDAISM. It embraces not only the practices and observances of the Jewish religion but personal, social, national, and international relationships as well. The word comes from the Hebrew for "to go." In the Bible the good life is frequently spoken of as a way in which persons are "to go." Deuteronomy 1:32–33 (JPS) reads in part: ". . . the Lord your God, who went before you in the way . . . to show you by what way ye should go. . . ." (See also Exod 18:20.)

Halakhah is the distinctive feature of Judaism as a religion of obedience to the word of God. It includes jurisprudence, worship, ethical injunctions, and ceremonial observances.

The chief differences between Orthodox and Reform Judaism depend on their different attitudes to the halakhah. Orthodox Judaism considers the halakhah to be absolutely binding since it emanates from God. Reform Judaism, while guided by the legal decisions of the past in some areas, rejects the absolute binding force of the traditional halakhah. Conservative Judaism has a midway position. It treats the traditional halakhah as binding, but it feels somewhat free to interpret it. It attempts to preserve the dynamic principle of legal development which, it claims, is typical of the talmudic period. L.K.

HALDANE, JAMES ALEXANDER (1768–1851) AND ROBERT (1764–1841). Scottish evangelists. James was born in Dundee, Scotland, and Robert in London, of a distinguished Scottish family. Both were educated in Dundee schools and at Edinburgh University. The brothers both served in the British navy, James becoming an officer. Robert left the navy to return to his Stirlingshire home, where he became a widely known landscape gardener. Both brothers were converted about 1794. Robert sold his estate and sought to serve as a missionary to India but was thwarted in this ambition by the East India Company. He was also blocked from a missionary career by the Church of Scotland, at that time opposed to overseas witness. Robert employed his fortune in building preaching tabernacles and theological seminaries. James began preaching all over Scotland and in 1797 founded the Society for Propagating the Gospel at Home. Disenchanted by the Church of Scotland's lack of interest in both evangelism and overseas work, James became the first Congregational minister in Scotland in 1799. Two years later he was installed as pastor in a new three-thousand-seat tabernacle in Edinburgh, where he served for nearly half a century.

Both of the Haldanes sought to restore the spirit and form of the apostolic church. In this they wielded wide influence on other Christian leaders of the day, including ALEXANDER CAMPBELL, one of the founders of the Disciples of Christ and the Churches of Christ. Campbell embraced the restorationist views of the Haldanes during the year he studied theology in Scotland. Robert Haldane wrote a number of books including Evidences and Authority of Divine Revelation and a commentary on the Epistle to the Romans. Both brothers penned the lyrics of several hymns.

R.H.

HALF-WAY COVENANT. The Cambridge Synod of 1662 declared that baptized parents could have their children baptized, even though the parents themselves had not experienced saving grace. Such parents were banned from Holy Communion, and they were allowed only some of the privileges of church membership. This controversial decision was denounced by many as a serious sign of DECLENSION.

N.H.

HALLELUJAH ("praise Yah," meaning "praise the Lord"). A doxology summoning the entire congregation to praise the Deity. The OT attests both secular and religious uses of the intensive stem of the Hebrew root (hll) for praise. Pharaoh's servants praise Sarah's beauty (Gen. 12:15). The newly acclaimed king is the object of the people's praise (II Chr. 23:12), as are the works of the good wife (Prov. 31:31). As the Philistines celebrate their god Dagon (Judg. 16:24), so the Israelites celebrate Yahweh (I Chr. 23:5), Yahweh's name (Ps. 135:1), or Yahweh's word (Ps. 56:4).

Eleven Psalms open with a "Hallelujah" exhortation (106, 111-113, 117, 135, 146-150), and thirteen conclude with it (104-106, 113, 115-117, 135, 146-150). The presence of "Hallelujah" at both extremities of Psalms 146-150 ensures that the Psalter appropriately terminates on an emphatic liturgical note. These five so-called "Hallelujah Psalms" comprehensively praise divine activity, be it past, present, or future. Moreover, as the Hallel ("praise"), Psalms 113-118 were recited in synagogue worship on such joyous holy days as Passover, the Feast of Tabernacles, and Pentecost, when Yahweh's sovereignty over both nature and the nations was celebrated. Ordinarily in the Jerusalem cult, the "Hallelujah" was given antiphonal expression by the several choirs and the congregation there assembled (Ps. 135:19-21).

J.K.K.

HAM. Noah's second son (Gen. 5:32). Along with his parents, wife, two brothers (Shem and Japheth), and their wives, Ham survived the Flood and partook in divine blessing (Gen. 9:1-17). A prose text then reports that Ham saw his father's nakedness during the latter's drunken sleep (Gen. 9:20-22). Yet on awakening, NOAH pronounces a poetic curse against Canaan (9:25). Presumably an ancient poem attested Canaan, not Ham, as the subordinate brother of Shem and Japheth. By identifying Canaan as Ham's son (9:18, 22), an editor harmonized the prose and poetic traditions.

J.K.K.

HAMATH. A prominent city located on the Orontes in Syria, some 120 miles north of Damascus. During much of its history, Hamath was the nucleus of an independent kingdom whose southern border constituted Israel's northern border (Num. 13:21; Josh. 13:5; Judg. 3:3). Numerous Hittite hieroglyphic inscriptions found there reveal that for a time Hamath was a significant Hittite center.

During the tenth century B.C., Hamath's king, Toi, and David were allies. The former sent the latter handsome gifts after his triumph over King Hada-dezer of Zobah, their mutual enemy (II Sam. 8:3-10). Though Damascus and Hamath claimed territory at Israel's expense during the early decades of the divided monarchy, in the mid-eighth century, Jeroboam II presumably extended Israel's border northward to Hamath's southern frontier (II Kings 14:25).

At the battle of Qarqar (853 B.C.), Hamath supported the successful Ben-hadad II of Damascus and Ahab of Israel against Shalmaneser III of Assyria. A century later, Hamath was subjugated by Assyria (II Kings 19:13). In 720 B.C., following Assyria's capture of Samaria, Hamath joined Samaria's remaining inhabitants in revolt. King Sargon of Assyria soon mastered the situation. He mandated a population shift that moved some of Hamath's colonists into Samaria (II Kings 17:24) and some of the Israelite exiles into Hamath (Isa. 11:11). Still an important city during the Hellenistic Age, Hamath became known as Epiphania.

J.K.K.

HAMMURABI. The sixth king (about 1728-1686 B.C.) of the First Dynasty of BABYLON (about 1830-1530 B.C.), when it reached the zenith of its power. He is never mentioned in the Bible ("Amraphel," in Gen. 14:1, 9, cannot be equated with Hammurabi), yet the impact of his famous law code is felt in OT legislation.

Sources. Though our knowledge about Hammurabi's reign is sketchy, the following sources are useful: royal inscriptions such as stelae and foundation tablets, administrative correspondence, and official names assigned to the forty-two years of Hammurabi's Babylonian rule. Of considerable interest is the poetic, yet historically oriented section of the preamble to the Code of Hammurabi, which celebrates the king's social accomplishments and lists the major cities over which he held sway. Moreover, various inscriptions reflect Hammurabi's concern for Babylon's canals, walls, temples, and divine statues.

Early Conquests. The five Babylonian monarchs who preceded Hammurabi were largely unimpressive. If their efforts sometimes assured Babylon's independence, Babylon was repeatedly forced to recognize the sovereignty of Isin or Larsa. Yet during the reign of Sin-muballit, Hammurabi's father, Babylon's strength increased. Still, a strong Assyria kept Babylon from pressing northward. Mari to the northwest and Larsa to the south were likewise worthy opponents. Assyria's waning strength, however, enabled Hammurabi to engage in military expansion between his seventh and eleventh regnal years. He overtook Uruk, and, with the help of Rim-Sin of Larsa, conquered Isin.

Peacetime Achievements. Since the period from the twelfth through the twenty-ninth years of Hammurabi's reign mentions no wars, Hammurabi was presumably active in consolidating and organizing his empire. Babylon enjoyed governmental efficiency, economic stability, and intellectual attainment. Numerous texts dealing with magic, astrology, grammar, and mathematics were written. In the religious sphere, Babylon's patron deity, Marduk, was promoted to the summit of the Mesopotamian pantheon. The king's most outstanding achievement was the Code of Hammurabi, which normalized the diverse legal traditions current within various regions of the kingdom.

Courtesy of the Oriental Institute, University of Chicago

Stele containing the Code of Hammurabi. At the top the sun-god Shamash extends the ring and rod to Hammurabi, who stands as a worshiper before him. The original of the stele is in the Louvre, Paris.

Renewed Warfare. During the last dozen years of his rule, Hammurabi was regularly required to return to the battlefield, often to confront entire coalitions of enemies. Hammurabi's territorial holdings sometimes suffered reduction, though in his thirty-second year he seized Mari from his former ally, Zimri-Lim. If the extent of Hammurabi's military influence at his death is unclear, the overall effectiveness of his rule is symbolized by the fact that all successive Babylonian kings chose Babylon as their capital. This dynasty endured for another 130 years, but often tasted defeat.

J.K.K.

HANDS, LAYING ON OF. The belief that the power resident in certain people can be transmitted through touch or the laying on of hands is widespread in ancient and modern cultures. It figures importantly in the NT and carries a range of meanings. The most common significance of this act in the Gospels and Acts is the touch that effects healing. In Mark's Gospel, Jesus' touch cures a man of leprosy (1:40-42) and restores the sight of another (8:22-26). The synagogue ruler, Jairus, asks Jesus to come touch his daughter in order to heal her, and the hemorrhaging woman touches him and is healed (Mark 6:5; Luke 4:40). But he also places his hands on those whom he wishes to bless, as in the cases of the little children (Mark 10:13-16; Matt. 19:13-15).

In Acts, there are similar healings by the laying on of hands: Paul has his sight restored (9:17) and heals a man who is sick (28:8). But the imposition of hands also conveys the Holy Spirit, in the case of Paul (9:17). And God is implored to stretch out the divine hand in order to perform miracles through Jesus (4:30). Those who have received only water baptism are granted the Spirit through the laying on of hands, in Samaria (8:16-17) and in Ephesus (19:1-5). Paul never mentions the practice in his own letters, however.

In Acts and the later books of the NT, laying on of hands has an important function: as the instrument of commissioning people for specific forms of ministry or service. The seven who are chosen at Jerusalem for a ministry of service, probably linked with the diaconate ("serve" in Acts 6:2), are designated for their new roles by the laying on of the apostles' hands (6:6). Barnabas and Paul are sent out on their mission after performance of a similar rite by the hands of the leadership of the church in Antioch (13:1-3). The rite accomplishes the communication of the Spirit and the gift (charisma) of ministry for the work of the church in the Pastorals (I Tim. 4:14; II Tim. 1:6). At the same time, the younger generation of church leaders is forewarned against hasty ordination of potential workers (I Tim. 5:22). In the opening part of Revelation, John's vision is of "one like a son of man," who commissions him to carry the message of doom and deliverance to the seven churches of Asia Minor by laying his hand upon the messenger (Rev. 1:17). With such importance attached to this rite in the later NT writings as a whole, it is surprising that the "laying on of hands" is listed by the writer of Hebrews among the "elementary" features of Christian instruction (Heb. 6:2). H.K.

HANIFITES. One of the four traditional schools of Islamic law. It is named after Abu Hanifa, founder of the school, who died in A.D. 767.

His starting point for legal practices was the teachings of the QUR'AN, and he paid little attention to the HADITH. Since the situation in Iran, where he lived, was different in many ways from that in Arabia in Muhammad's time, he sought to find ways to apply the teachings of the Qur'an in ways appropriate to Iran. He did this by drawing analogies. If the analogy proved to be contrary to the public good or to justice, he considered the opinion of the time and made a legal ruling on that basis. This school has followers today in many parts of Asia. K.C.

HANKEY, A. CATHERINE (1834–1911). Hymn writer. Daughter of a wealthy English banker, during an illness she wrote a long poem on the life of Christ. Later she adapted the words from the first section of her poem for the children's hymn, "Tell Me the Old, Old Story." Subsequently she adapted the second section of her poem for the text of the even more famous hymn, "I Love to Tell the Story." The Hankey family were members of the celebrated Clapham Sect, made up of wealthy Anglicans who were influenced by the evangelical movement that swept over nineteenth-century Britain. Miss Hankey organized Sunday school classes for rich and poor throughout London. From these classes many of those trained became zealous Christian workers. Catherine, or Kate as she was affectionately called by many, being musically inclined, set many of her hymns to music. However, the best known tune to "I Love to Tell the Story" was written by William G. Fischer, of Philadelphia, a musician and piano dealer. R.H.

HANNAH ("grace"). Favorite wife of Elkanah the Ephraimite and mother of the prophet Samuel (I Sam. 1:2-20). Hannah endured years of barrenness, which triggered taunts from Peninnah, the rival wife. Hannah directly faced her problem during one of the family's annual visits at the Israelite sanctuary of Shiloh. She vowed that if she gave birth to a son, she would consecrate him as a Nazirite to God (1:11). Hannah returned home to Ramah, and with Samuel's birth, her wish was fulfilled.

As soon as possible, Hannah delivered the boy to Yahweh's service at the Shiloh sanctuary (1:24-28). Since it poorly reflects Hannah's personal circumstance, the highly lyric thanksgiving psalm spoken by Hannah at the moment of Samuel's dedication (2:1-10) is surely of secondary origin. Emphasizing the triumph of the lowly, the poem theologically foreshadows the Magnificat of Mary (Luke 1:46-55). Subsequently, Hannah had three other sons and two daughters (I Sam. 2:21). J.K.K.

HANUKKAH. The eight-day Jewish festival of "dedication" that recalls the first fight for religious freedom in recorded history.

The Syrian king Antiochus IV, who reigned 175–163 B.C., was especially bitter toward the Jews since they had rejected his claims to divinity. He instituted a violent anti-Jewish policy. Circumcision, the keeping of the Sabbath, teaching the Torah, and observance of the commandments were all punishable by death. Books of the Law were burned, the altar of the Temple in Jerusalem was desecrated by idol-worship, and orders were issued to erect altars to Zeus and other Greek gods throughout the country. Jews who resisted were mercilessly slaughtered, and many were sold into slavery.

In the village of Modin, the Hasmonean priest Mattathias raised the standard of revolt in 168 B.C. against Antiochus and the Hellenists, as those who were attempting to spread Greek culture and religion were called. Upon Mattathias' death in 166 B.C., his son Judah the Maccabee succeeded him as leader of the revolt. Judah succeeded in recapturing Jerusalem and purifying the Temple, which was rededicated on the twenty-fifth day of the Hebrew month Kislev in 165 B.C. (see MACCABEAN REVOLT).

"Then Judas and his brothers and all the assembly of Israel determined that every year at that season the days of the dedication of the altar should be observed with gladness and joy for eight days, beginning with the twenty-fifth day of the month of Chislev" (I Macc. 4:59). In a poetic embellishment of the historical reason for the length of Hanukkah, the Talmud states that the festival was instituted for eight days because the pure oil found in the Temple, though sufficient for only one day, miraculously burned for eight days.

Hanukkah is celebrated by kindling lights in an eight-branched Hanukkah MENORAH from a "servant" light on each of the eight nights, generally followed by singing the Maoz Tzur ("Rock of Ages") hymn and other Hanukkah songs. Beginning with one candle on the first night and ending with eight candles, the light of freedom is said to overpower the darkness of idolatry. The Hanukkah menorah is supposed to be placed in a prominently visible place "to advertise the miracle." Blessings accompany the lighting of the candles.

Hanukkah is the only non-biblical Jewish festival in which Psalms 113–118 are recited. The special scriptural reading consists of the passage that describes the gifts brought by the princes for the dedication of the sanctuary in the wilderness (Num. 7).

Work is not prohibited on Hanukkah. The prophetic portion read on the first Sabbath of Hanukkah is from Zechariah, including the verse, "Not by might, nor by power, but by my Spirit, says the Lord of hosts" (Zech. 4:6).

Hanukkah customs include gift-giving, spinning a dreidel, a four-sided top with Hebrew initials of the phrase "A great miracle occurred there," eating potato pancakes (latkes) and other foods dipped in oil, putting on Hanukkah plays, and singing.

L.K.

HARAN. A northern Mesopotamian city located within a region called Paddan-aram in the OT. Haran was famous for its aggressive role in caravan trade (Ezek. 27:23) and religious devotion to the Mesopotamian moon god, Sin.

Haran in Patriarchal History. Though the tradition that Terah, his son ABRAHAM, and other relatives migrated northward from Ur of the Chaldeans to Haran (Gen. 11:31) may be historically suspect, their sojourn in Haran and Terah's death there (Gen. 11:32) are widely accepted. Haran was the starting point of Abraham's southwestern journey of faith into Canaan (Gen. 12:4-5). Long after his arrival, and Isaac's birth, Abraham kept in touch with Haran. Rebekah, Isaac's wife, was secured from Haran's neighbor city Nahor (Gen. 24). Later, their son Jacob fled to Paddan-aram to obtain asylum with his uncle Laban, whose daughters, Leah and Rachel, he married (27:43; 28:10; 29:21-29).

Haran in Assyro-Babylonian History. When Assyria's capital, Nineveh, fell to the Babylonians and Medes in 612 B.C., Assyria's last king, Ashur-uballit II (612-609), retreated with a reduced army to Haran and established a refugee government. It expired in 610 B.C. when the enemy overtook the city. Assyria's attempt to reclaim Haran a year later was abortive. Babylon's last king, Nabonidus (556-539), hailed from Haran. His rebuilding the lunar temple there incurred the wrath of Babylon's priesthood and laity alike.

J.K.K.

HARDNESS OF HEART. A phrase denoting human defiance, callousness, or lack of understanding. Though some texts emphasize that God hardens the heart (Exod. 4:21; Josh. 11:20; Isa. 63:17), others claim that it is of a person's own doing (Exod. 9:34-35; Deut. 15:7; Prov. 28:14). If in the Exodus story God hardens Pharaoh's heart (Exod. 7:3), Pharaoh is also presented as hardening his own heart (8:32). Less interested than we in distinguishing between cause and effect, the biblical authors did not think that attributing such behavior both to God and humanity was inconsistent. Indeed, God's will was unwittingly honored in the enterprises of self-willed humanity. In Mark 6:52, the imperceptiveness of Jesus' disciples is explained as hardness of heart.

J.K.K.

HARE KRISHNA. See KRISHNA CONSCIOUSNESS, INTERNATIONAL SOCIETY FOR.

HARIJAN. See UNTOUCHABLE.

HARLOT. See PROSTITUTION.

HARMONIALISM. This describes those forms of religion in which spiritual well-being, physical health, and even economic prosperity are seen to depend on a person's harmony with the universe.

Of ancient lineage, its modern examples include New Church, CHRISTIAN SCIENCE, NEW THOUGHT, POSITIVE THINKING, Unity, and the Emmanuel Movement. Charismatic leaders include EMANUEL SWEDENBORG, MARY BAKER EDDY, Ralph Waldo Trine, Emmet Fox, Charles and Myrtle Fillmore, Charles Poyen, and NORMAN VINCENT PEALE.

N.H.

HARMONY OF THE GOSPELS. See SYNOPTIC GOSPELS.

HARNACK, ADOLF VON (1851-1930). Protestant German theologian, dogmatician, and patristic historian, who sought to uncover and discard Hellenistic influences on early Christianity. Born in Dorpat, Estonia, and educated at the universities of Dorpat and Leipzig, Harnack distinguished himself in successive professorships at Leipzig, Giessen, Marburg, and Berlin, in addition to directing the Prussian National Library (1905-21) and the Evangelical Congress (1902-12). His reputation was worldwide, and in 1914 he was made a noble. Outstanding as a patristic scholar, Harnack published his Lehrbuch der Dogmengeschichte (3 vols.; 1886-89), translated as History of Dogma (7 vols.; 1894-99). He regarded Greek thought as an alien intrusion on Christianity. Heavily influenced by both Kantian and Ritschlian idealism, Harnack stressed human possibilities, brotherhood, and the moral side of Christianity in his famous Das Wesen des Christentums (1900), translated as What Is Christianity? (1901), which won global attention. In his NT studies he argued early dates for the Gospels, Acts, and the enigmatic Q source. Other works included Luke the Physician (1907), The Sayings of Jesus (1908), and The Acts of the Apostles (1909), all translated from Beiträge zur Einleitung in das Neue Testament (1906-11).

C.M.

HARRIS, WILLIAM WADE (Waddy) (1865-1929). A native Liberian Christian who later worked as a charismatic evangelist among the people of the Ivory Coast. Raised as a Methodist but later a member of the Anglican church, Harris was a leader of a revolt in Liberia. After release from prison, where he claimed a mystical vision that he was to be the "prophet" to convert West Africa, he spent his time preaching and converting in French territory, the Ivory Coast. Later Methodist missionaries built their work on his foundations. Many Christians today in Liberia, the Ivory Coast, and Ghana claim to be his true followers, emphasizing spiritual healing and suspicious of European influence. W.G.

HARTSHORNE, CHARLES (1897– ). American philosophical theologian and the most important influence, after A. N. Whitehead, on PROCESS THEOLOGY and on the conception of God referred to as panentheism. Hartshorne completed his doctorate in philosophy at Harvard and served as an assistant to Whitehead, appropriating important aspects of Whitehead's process philosophy at this time. Hartshorne taught at the University of Chicago from 1928 to 1955, where he had great influence on the faculty and students of the university's divinity school. He later taught at Emory University and the University of Texas. In Man's Vision of God and the Logic of Theism (1941) and in Divine Relativity: A Social Conception of God (1948), he criticizes traditional supernaturalism and defends PANENTHEISM, which declares that no being, including God, is in all respects absolutely perfect. Hartshorne argues that God is absolutely perfect in some respects but relatively perfect in others, for example, in power. Hence in certain respects God is capable of changing and surpassing the divine nature in the future. God's power is maximal, the greatest possible, but it is not the only power. There is nothing illogical about a God who cannot be surpassed but who can grow in experience. Hartshorne argues that panentheism preserves human freedom and spares God responsibility for evil. He also argues that only panentheism makes genuine sense of the Christian doctrine of divine love, since love is meaningless apart from free relationships of giving and receiving. Hartshorne's works include Philosophers Speak of God (1953), Reality as Social Process (1953), The Logic of Perfection and Other Essays in Neoclassical Metaphysics (1962), and Creative Synthesis and Philosophic Method (1970). J.L.

HASIDEANS. Mentioned in I Maccabees 2:42 as a group that joined the Maccabees (that is, the sons of Mattathias), led by Judah (I Macc. 3:1) in the revolt against the Seleucid ruler, Antiochus IV Epiphanes. This king, in keeping with his empire-wide policy, converted local cities into models of Greek culture, complete with theaters, gymnasia, and temples to the gods worshipped by the Greeks. For centuries before this, some Jews had adopted a policy of quiet resistance to the imposition of pagan culture, whether Persian or Greek, and strove to maintain their separate identity as the covenant people by preserving the purity of the Temple, observing the Sabbath and feasts decreed in the Law of Moses, as stated in II Maccabees 6:6. Their attitude toward the foreign corrupters of the Temple and the land is powerfully expressed in Psalm 79, as well as their longing for God to intervene in their behalf. Psalm 149:1 calls for a new song to be sung "in the assembly of the hasidim" (pious, devout, faithful).

As the MACCABEAN rulers became increasingly secular, to the point of dependence on foreign powers for their appointment as high priest and their assumption of the title of king, though they were not from the Davidic line, the Hasidim became disillusioned and withdrew completely from society. They then took up life in the Judean desert, where they could live in ritual purity, in devotion to God and the Scriptures, and where they waited until God intervened and purified the temple. These were the Dead Sea sect. Another group remained in the towns and cities of Israel, but shifted their concerns for purity to the family. Groups of the pious met for prayer and Bible study. These were the Pharisees.

H.K.

HASIDISM. A mystical revivalist movement. Its followers are known as Hasidim—the "pious ones." Hasidism originated in Poland in the eighteenth century as a reaction to physical persecution, disillusionment with the false messiah Shabbethai Tzvi and the spiritual bewilderment and moral chaos that followed, extreme poverty, and religious ignorance. Its founder, Israel ben Eliezer, was known as the Baal Shem Tov ("Master of the Good Name"). His message was "serve God with joy." He taught that sincere devotion, zeal, and heartfelt prayers are more acceptable to God than great learning. Known widely as a healer and a miracle worker, the Baal Shem Tov taught by parables and sayings. He wrote no books.

The Hasidic doctrines of joy, enthusiasm, and communion with God all come from Jewish sources. But in Hasidism these were not only interpreted more radically, but they were also expressed in song, dance, feasting, and rejoicing, to a degree that seemed inappropriate to other Jews.

Hasidism emphasized inwardness both in life and in learning. Underlying all Hasidic thought was the kabbalistic concept of the world as an emanation and reflection of "higher worlds" (see KABBALAH). The Hasidim held that meditation on the doctrine, "There is no place empty of God," would dispel all fear and sadness. How can there be fear or sadness if God is with you wherever you go? How can evil exist if there is no place empty of God?

More important than the outer act of work or prayer was kavanah, the inner devotion with which it was carried out. God will accept even the prayers of an ignorant person so long as they are accompanied by inner sincerity.

Hasidism has no articles of faith. It does not demand adherence to a formal code. Hasidim are known not by the beliefs they hold but by the lives that they lead. In the Bible, the Hasid connotes a person of piety. "Let the faithful [Hasidim] exult in glory: let them sing for joy on their couches. Let the high praises of God be in their throats . . ." (Ps. 149:5, 6).

Hasidism produced a type of leader unique in the Jewish religious hierarchy—the tzaddik ("rebbe"). Acting as teacher, counselor, and confessor, the tzaddik is perceived as a friend in this world and as an advocate in the world to come. Viewed as heretics by the Mitnagdim led by the scholar Elijah ben Solomon of Vilna, the Hasidim were subjected to a bitter campaign that included a ban on marriage between members of the two groups. But the threat of a common enemy, "modern Enlightenment," made them close their ranks.

The great centers of Hasidism were destroyed by the Nazi HOLOCAUST. A number of dynasties have reestablished themselves in Israel and the United States. Among the largest of these are the Sarmarer and the Lubavicher. Hasidim still wear the clothes favored by their ancestors. These include the kapote, a long, black overcoat; the shtreimel, a fur hat; and the gartel (girdle). They button their coats from right to left. They do not countenance trimming their beards and sidelocks. Many rituals distinguish Hasidim from their fellow Jews.

L.K.

HASMONEANS. The name given to John Hyrcanus and his successors as priestly and political leaders of the Jews in Palestine. The Hasmonean dynasty lasted from 134 to 63 B.C., when the Romans under Pompey assumed direct control of the land.

Since both kingship and the high priesthood in Israel were hereditary (the kings, from David; the high priests, from Aaron), the move by the Maccabean family to claim both titles was a source of conflict among Jews. Finally in the reign of Simon (143–134), the last surviving son of Mattathias, the dual role was recognized by the Jews. They were so impressed by Simon's diplomatic negotiations with the Romans and with the relative security this relationship brought that they acclaimed him as "leader and high priest for ever, until a trustworthy prophet should arise" (I Macc. 14:41). The dynasty was later given the name of "the Hasmoneans," apparently derived from the name of Mattathias' great-grandfather, Asamonaeus (in Hebrew, Hasmonah) as Josephus attests in Antiquities.

The preoccupation of the Seleucid ruler Antiochus VII with the Parthians, who were pressing him on the northeastern border of Syria, enabled John Hyrcanus to capture extensive territory and flourishing cities east of the Jordan and down into the southern desert (Negev). He destroyed the temple of the Samaritans as well as their capital city.

An important new factor was the rise of two sharply divided religious-political parties in this period: the SADDUCEES and the PHARISEES. The former, as wealthy traditionalists, exercised considerable power, while the latter with their emphasis on the contemporary relevance of the Law had a wider popular appeal and influence with the masses. The Hasmonean rulers had to reckon with these forces in shaping internal and external policies. The requirement that some of the subject peoples, such as the Idumeans in the east Jordan territory, submit to circumcision and other Jewish requirements was to have profound significance for the future of Palestine, when the Idumeans moved into position of power. The Pharisees' demand that John Hyrcanus abandon the priesthood, because of some doubts about the purity of his ancestry, was rejected by him, and led him to side with the Sadducees. At his death he was succeeded for a brief period (104–103) by his son, Aristobulus I, who was the first in the Maccabean line to take the title of king, in addition to his role as high priest.

Out of the fratricidal struggle for power under Aristobulus, Alexander Jannaeus emerged as king and high priest. His long reign (103–76) was marked by conflict with the Ptolemaic, Seleucid, and Nabatean (Arabian) monarchs. The series of defeats wrought by Ptolemy Lathyrus in the coastal cities and in the Jordan Valley nearly deprived Alexander of much of his domain. By flattering Cleopatra, Ptolemy's mother, and showering her with gifts, he was able not only to regain control, but also to capture additional cities and lands on the Mediterranean and east of the Jordan. Many of the Jews were opposed to him, however, charging that he was unfit for office by reason of the impurity of his ancestors. When he appeared at a feast in the Temple, he was pelted with citrons. In retaliation, he slaughtered six thousand of them. So unpopular was he that he had to hire foreigners as soldiers in order to maintain order. On another occasion, while feasting with his concubines, he had eight hundred Jews crucified, and then had their wives and children killed as the fathers watched from the crosses. Before he died from alcoholism, he counseled his wife, Salome Alexandra, to ingratiate herself with the Pharisees.

Relationship of Important Hasmoneans

After Jannaeus' death, Alexandra reigned as queen (76–69) and her son, Hyrcanus II, became high priest. Josephus (Antiquities of the Jews) remarks that "she had the title of sovereign, but the Pharisees had the power." Internal conflict and decadence in the Seleucid dynasty enabled Armenians to move into Syria—a development that led the Romans under Pompey to interfere directly, eventually converting Syria into a province of Rome. In order to put down unrest on the eastern border, Pompey subdued Asia Minor all the way to the Caucasus. Alexandra had fallen ill, and her son, Aristobulus II, began to plot and fight to assume royal power—a goal that he achieved at his mother's death in 69. His struggle with his brother Hyrcanus II for the throne gave Pompey the occasion to invade Palestine. Both sides tried to bribe the Roman leaders, but Pompey marched on Jerusalem. Partisans of Hyrcanus opened the city gates to him; Aristobulus, backed by the Sadducees, retreated to the Temple mount, which fell to Pompey in 63 B.C. Pompey horrified the Jews by entering the Holy of Holies, where only priests were permitted. Hyrcanus' son married Aristobulus' daughter; their daughter Mariamme married Herod, son of the Idumean (Arab) opportunist Antipater, who had been adviser to Hyrcanus and who helped the Romans consolidate power over Palestine and the east Jordan territories. By reason of his descent from the Hasmonaeans, Herod claimed a right to the royal title, which the Romans bestowed on him, 37–34 B.C. (See MACCABEAN REVOLT.)

H.K.

HAVERGAL, FRANCES RIDLEY (1836–79). Hymn writer. Born in a Worcestershire rectory, she was the daughter of the Reverend Henry Havergal (1793–1870), who had written many hymns. Frances began writing poetry when she was seven. Her first accepted poem was "I Gave My Life for Thee," but the best known of all her hymns was "Take My Life and Let It Be." Endowed with both musical and literary ability Miss Havergal published several volumes of hymns. In Victorian England, few young women pursued higher education, but Frances had a good working knowledge of Latin, Greek, and Hebrew and could speak French, German, and Italian. She knew whole books of the Bible by memory and could play through Handel and much of Beethoven and Mendelssohn without the score. Most of her life was plagued by ill health, but she was engaged in a very active life—mostly in Christian service. Some of her other hymns are "Who Is on the Lord's Side?," "O Savior, Precious Savior," "I Am Trusting Thee, Lord Jesus," and the English Keswick Convention favorite. "Like a River Glorious." R.H.

HAWKS, ANNIE SHERWOOD (1872–1918). Hymn writer. Unlike other writers of sacred verse, Annie Hawks had no great claims to fame. She was a contented Brooklyn housewife. She was born in Hoosick, New York, and in 1857 moved to Brooklyn, where she joined the Hanson Place Baptist Church. Her pastor was the Reverend Robert Lowry, author-composer of many notable hymns. He encouraged Mrs. Hawks in the writing of Christian poetry. Thus it was that she showed her poem "I Need Thee Every Hour" to her pastor, who wrote a chorus and set the hymn to music. Then Lowry published it in his songbook, Royal Diadem. The hymn caught on and soon became very popular. Then Ira Sankey sang it at the revivals held by Dwight L. Moody in England and America. This increased the popularity of the hymn. She wrote over four hundred hymns, but only this one remains in common use. When her husband died in 1888, the woman who previously had known only "hours of sweet security and peace" suffered great loss. R.H.

HAZEL ("God sees"). King of Damascus (about 842–806 B.C.). When Hazael, an officer under Ben-hadad II of Damascus, was told by the prophet Elisha that he was king-elect of Damascus, he promptly assassinated Ben-hadad and mounted the throne (II Kings 8:7–15; compare I Kings 19:15). Immediately this usurper reclaimed Ramoth-gilead from Israel and amid the battle severely wounded Jehoram, king of Israel (849–842 B.C.; II Kings 8:28–29).

In 841 B.C. Hazael sustained Assyrian aggression under Shalmaneser III (859–825), who attacked Damascus and devastated its environs. Nevertheless, Hazael was not forced to capitulate. Assyria's army was soon required elsewhere, which gave Hazael ample occasion to harass Israel and Judah.

Unable to resist Hazael, Israel's king, Jehu (842–815 B.C.), lost all Israelite holdings in Trans-jordan (II Kings 10:32–33; Amos 1:3). Jehu's son, Jehoahaz (815–802), likewise fell victim to Hazael and suffered a radical reduction of his army (II Kings 13:1-3, 7, 22). Subsequently, Hazael penetrated southward into Philistia and conquered Gath (12:17). By awarding Hazael extensive Temple and palace treasure, Joash, king of Judah (837-800 B.C.), spared Jerusalem a similar fate (12:18). At death Hazael was succeeded by his son, Ben-hadad III.

J. K. K.

HAZOR. (1) Tell el-Qedah, located in the Jordan Valley ten miles north of the Sea of Galilee. Hazor's occupation began in the early Bronze era. To the north of the tell (the 26-acre Upper City) its Middle Bronze residents constructed an extensive 175-acre plateau, called the Lower City, which was defended by a massive bank. Though this installation may have served as a Hyksos compound for horses and chariots, various buildings erected within the plateau attest its function as a suburb when Hazor's population outgrew the walled Upper City.

Excavations in the Lower City have uncovered six late Bronze Era temples in use until the thirteenth century. One contained a row of small stelae and a seated figure on whose breast was an inverted crescent, presumably representing the moon god Sin. Another temple was tripartite in plan. Its inner room, the Holy of Holies, housed altars, libation tables, and offering vessels. The well-attested destruction of Hazor's Upper and Lower cities in the latter part of the thirteenth century recalls the biblical claim that Joshua destroyed Hazor, "the head of all those kingdoms," as he triumphed against a northern Canaanite coalition headed by Jabin, king of Hazor (Josh. 11:10-11). Though the Lower City was permanently abandoned, an insignificant settlement emerged in the Upper City.

In the tenth century, Solomon fortified Hazor as one of his military centers along the nation's perimeter to repel enemy attacks (I Kings 9:15-19). He equipped Hazor with a defensive casemate wall (a double wall joined by cross walls) and a four-entryway gate system, which are also in evidence in Solomonic levels at Megiddo and Gezer. An imposing public building (royal storehouse?), whose roof was supported by two rows of pillars, witnesses to Hazor's significance as a provincial administrative center during the ninth century under Ahab's rule. In 732 B.C. the city suffered full-scale destruction by the Assyrians under Tiglath-pileser III during his campaign against Pekah, king of Israel (II Kings 15:29). The Israelite city never recovered, yet above its ruins a citadel was erected, which served as a military and administrative center until about 400 B.C.

(2) A Judean city in the Negeb (Josh. 15:23) identified with el-Jebariyeh.

(3) Keriath-hezron, a Judean village in the Negeb (Josh. 15:25) identified with Khirbet el-Karyathein.

(4) A village of the Benjaminites located north of Jerusalem (Neh. 11:33).

(5). A region in the Arabian Desert plundered by Nebuchadnezzar in 598 B.C. and the focus of Jeremiah's oracle (Jer. 49:28-33).

J. K. K.

HEALING/HEALTH. The Hebrew shālôm, meaning "peace," and shālēm, meaning "healthy," "whole," are cognate terms. From this one may infer a belief that peace (a consequence of right relations with God) was an essential condition of good health and physical vigor. Throughout the history of the people of the Bible a popular notion prevailed that sickness and an early death were concrete signs of God's judgments. A corollary was the belief that only God can forgive sins and deal with the causes of illness (Ps. 103:1-5). It is often noted that the dominance of these beliefs inhibited the development of medical science in ancient Israel. The professionals nearest to physicians were the priests, but their functions were limited to instruction in health care and the certification of the existence or nonexistence of certain social diseases. The book of Job is a protest against a crude expression of the old dogma that all sickness and misfortune are God's punishment for, and an exposé of, sin. It is twice reported in the Gospels that Jesus also rejected this notion, still current in his time (Luke 14:1-5; John 9:1-3). The corrections are not to be understood, however, as a denial of all connection between health and salvation or between illness and sin. The metaphorical reference to disease as characterizing a culture's spiritual malaise, expresses a belief in an inner relationship between sin and sickness, that God willed the physical as well as the spiritual renewal and well-being of his people (Isa. 1:4-6, 16-20).

The Mosaic Law and Health. Israel's Torah (especially the book of Leviticus) contains principles and legislation concerning health care that were a great advance over those of other Near Eastern cultures. Emphasis is placed upon the prevention of disease rather than its cure. For example, the institution of the Sabbath prevented the overexertion of labor as well as provided occasions for spiritual growth. It also extended the idea of Sabbath rest to the land, so that its mineral resources were preserved. Laws regarding edible foods and their preparation were safeguards against food poisoning and parasite infestation. Laws governing sexual relationships prevented the deleterious effects of incest and served to curb promiscuity and bestial behavior. Sexual hygiene, like other rules pertaining to cleanliness and public sanitation, prevented the spread of common communicable diseases.

Healing and Health in the NT. All of the Gospels, especially Luke, use "to heal" with reference to Jesus' mission (Luke 5:17; 6:19; 13:32). Jesus is reported to have called himself a physician (Luke 4:23). As noted above, Jesus rejected the dogma of retribution in its non-exceptional form, but he perceived that in some cases illness was attributable to sin, that his power over disease was evidence of his power to forgive sin (Mark 2:1-12 and parallels; John 5:14), and overcome evil (Mark 3:27 and parallels). Casting out demons and performing cures were essentially a part of his divine commission (Luke 13:32).

The accounts of Jesus' healing ministry stress the importance of faith, of belief that the hoped-for kingdom of God was being manifested in "signs and wonders" (Matt. 12:25-29; Luke 11:17-23; also Matt. 11:20-24; Luke 10:13-15). While there is no explicit demand that the persons healed acclaim Jesus' messiahship, his citation of Isaiah 35:5-6 implies that an essential connection existed between his healing ministry and his messianic mission (Matt. 11:2-6; Luke 7:18-25). Whether John the Baptist and/or the disciples saw this connection during Jesus' lifetime is uncertain, but after his passion, death, and resurrection, this faith was an essential part of the Christian gospel (Acts 20:38; also 3:1-10; etc.).

Historians of religion have held that although Jesus' cures are not an isolated phenomenon in late antiquity, the miracle stories of the Gospels may be distinguished from their "parallels" with respect to the form and content of the narratives and to the motives attributed to their healer. No magical formulas are employed by Jesus, the common means of healing is Jesus' word of power (Mark 1: Luke 4:36; Mark 2:10 and parallels; Matt. 8:8-10; Luke 7:6-9).

This power Jesus gave to his apostles as part of their mission heralding the imminent coming of the Kingdom, a mission they began before Jesus' death but continued afterward with great effectiveness (Mark 3:14-15; Matt. 10:1; Acts 3:1-10; 8:4-8). The apostles declared that the cures they wrought were operations of the exalted Christ or evidence of the power of the Holy Spirit (Acts 3:16; 9:34; Rom. 15:18-19). In Paul's letters one reads that members of the Gentile churches exhibited "gifts of healing" that, along with other charismatic powers, were to be employed not for self-glorification but for the common good (I Cor. 12:4-11). The apostle Paul was plagued with a persisting, debilitating illness. He earnestly prayed to be delivered from it, but Paul's own gift of healing was not to benefit him: God's power was to be manifested in the apostle's weakness (II Cor. 12:7-10.) J.P.

HEART. Physical. The heart is referred to more than seven hundred times in the Bible but almost never as a physical organ. The clearest such use is in II Kings 9:24, where Jenu shot an arrow through the heart of Joram. Only one or two other such references may be found in the entire Bible (for example, I Sam. 4:13ff., which may refer to a heart attack, and Ezek. 11:19; 36:26). Almost all other occurrences to the heart are metaphorical.

Religious. One of the most important uses of the term is to express the Israelite's total devotion to monotheism. This is stated as serving God "with all one's heart and soul" (Deut. 13:3; 26:16; 30:2, 6, 10; Josh. 22:5; II Kings 23:3; II Chr. 15:12; Jer. 32:41).

When Jesus emphasized this point to a scribe on one occasion, he gave a standard Jewish reply to the question of what the greatest commandment was by quoting the Shema (Deut. 6:4-5), which is an expansion of the formula "heart and soul" to include also mind and strength (Mark 12:30). King Solomon's idolatrous wives are described as having turned his heart away from the Lord (I Kings 11:2-13). That this is an intellectual activity is indicated in verse eleven. The expression "heart and mind" is frequent in the Scripture (I Sam. 2:35; Pss. 26:2; 64:6; Jer. 17:10; 20:12). From the Jewish perspective, to be lacking in monotheistic religious conviction is to be "uncircumcised in heart and flesh" (Ezek. 44:7-9; Acts 7:51). They who are spiritually dull are described as being slow of heart to believe (Luke 24:25).

Intellect. In general, it may be observed that the range of meanings given to the term in Scriptures is essentially the same as that found in modern society. At times the word "heart" refers to the intellect, as in the following passages: "The fool says in his heart, 'There is no God,'" (Ps. 14:1); "Let the words of my mouth, and the meditation of my heart, be acceptable in thy sight" (Ps. 19:14); "A heart that devises wicked plans" (Prov. 6:18); "you shall indeed hear but never understand . . . for this people's heart has grown dull" (Matt. 13:14ff); "And his mother kept all these things in her heart" (Luke 2:51). The heart is the source of wicked thoughts as well (Matt. 15:19).

Emotion. Another use of the term is to refer to human emotion. First Peter speaks of a "tender heart" (3:8) and Paul asks "what are you doing, weeping and breaking my heart?" (Acts 21:13). Jesus spoke to his doubting disciples on the Sea of Galilee: "Take heart, it is I; have no fear" (Matt. 14:27). The idea is more fully expressed in Proverbs where one of the authors says, "A glad heart makes a cheerful countenance, but by sorrow of heart the spirit is broken" (15:13). Similarly Jeremiah says, "My heart is broken within me" (23:9).

Volition. At times the human will is intended by the term. A vivid example is the response of Simon Peter to Simon the Sorcerer: "Repent therefore of this wickedness of yours, and pray to the Lord that, if possible, the intent of your heart may be forgiven you" (Acts 8:22). The author of Hebrews writes that the word of God discerns "the thoughts and intentions of the heart" (4:12). Other instances may be found in Psalm 24:4; Proverbs 3:1; and Galatians 6:9.

Conscience. Occasionally the conscience is referred to by the term "heart" as when David writes: "Create in me a clean heart, O God, and put a new and right spirit within me" (Ps. 51:10). The anonymous author of Psalm 94:15 speaks of the "upright in heart," while David insists on "integrity of heart" (Ps. 101:2). Paul exhorts Timothy to "call upon the Lord from a pure heart" (II Tim. 2:22). J.R.M.

HEAVEN. In the ancient world, among peoples of the Bible and their neighbors, "heaven," or "the heavens," had a double reference. Basically heaven denoted the visible sky. Nearest to sight was "the firmament," perceived to be a bell-shaped covering, enclosing the earth, and supported by pillars, dividing the upper waters from the flat earth and from the watery depths below the earth (II Sam. 22:10-13; Job 38:4-11; 26:11-13; Isa. 40:22). Affixed to this (metallic?) firmament were the moon and starry hosts; rain fell through the gates of heaven, snow and hail, and through this lower heaven clouds formed and birds flew (Gen. 1:20; Ps. 8:3-4). Stretching beyond the firmament lay the vastness of space, "the highest heaven," or "the heaven of heavens" (Deut. 10:14; I Kings 8:27).

Closely allied to this common view concerning the near and distant heavens was the other belief that in a space or spaces above the earth the gods and other superterrestrial beings dwelt. For Jews and Christians there was but one God, the creator of heaven and earth and all that in them is (for example, Isa. 45:18, 22-23; Exod. 20:1-6; I Cor. 8:3-6; Ps. 102:25-27). As the High and Holy One, God is depicted as enthroned in heaven or above the heavens (Pss. 11:4; 57:5; 108:5; Isa. 57:15). Yet, God is not a solitary being, in splendid isolation from creation, unchanging and impassive. In several OT passages God's throne-room is the setting for a council of living creatures who serve God in the governance of the world (I Kings 22:19-23; Pss. 82:1; 91:11-13; compare Luke 12:8; Rev. 3:5). In Jewish and early Christian apocalypses this "angelology" receives a remarkable development. Jewish apocryphal and pseudepigraphical texts, which lie behind Christian tradition, are replete with angels and archangels, lords, authorities, guardian angels, and princes of nations. The Christian book of Revelation is a fine example of this rich profusion of "living creatures" populating heaven. Besides the good angels who sing praises to God and the Lamb (Jesus Christ), there is in heaven a host of evil spirits, arch-rebels under the command of Satan, who are able to war in heaven and wreak havoc on earth (Rev. 1:4; 20:4; 12:1-12; compare I Cor. 5:3-5; 7:5; I Pet. 5:8-11; II Cor. 11:13-15). These evil "principalities and powers in the heavenly places" (Eph. 3:1-10) remain the enemies of Christ and his church, even after he had triumphed over them (Col. 2:11-15; Luke 10:17-20) and exposed their true nature. Thus a new heaven must appear as well as a new earth. Before this cosmic re-creation, Satan and his minions will be destroyed by God (Rev. 20:1-3, 7-10; I Cor. 15:23-28).

In both the OT and the NT the God of heaven is concealed from human sight. Yet references to the opening of (the door of) heaven manifest God's purpose to be revealed, God's plan of salvation and judgments, to the Lord's earth-bound creatures. In such passages the biblical doctrine of God's transcendence stands in tension with that of God's immanence

(for example, Deut. 4:32-40; 10:14-22; 30:12-14; Isa. 57:15). A poignant aspect of the ESCHATOLOGY of the Bible is the yearning for a full disclosure of God's power and glory, among those who have received God's former revelations through the agency of Israel's prophets and visionaries, and, for Christians, in and through Jesus the Christ (Isa. 64:1; Ps. 11:4-7; Dan. 2:19-23; John 1:18, 51; 3:13; 6:30-33; Heb. 1:1-14; 12:25-29; Rev. 4:1-2; 21:1-4). The apostle Paul writes that Christians "wait for [God's] Son from heaven, whom he raised from the dead, Jesus who delivers us from the wrath to come" (I Thess. 1:10). Belief in Christ's RESURRECTION was the basis for belief in his present and future lordship. For the present, Christ's authority is concealed by his heavenly session; it is, however, nonetheless real (Acts 3:21; Matt. 28:18-20). The opening of heaven is directly related to the Messiah's revelation, from its beginning to its consummation.

The diversity of the word-pictures in our sources concerning the life of the blessed after their deaths prevents the formulation of logically consistent views. It is, however, clear from the NT that not only Jesus and the first Christians, but also the Pharisees believed that by God's power the elect would be raised from death. This miracle is often associated with the Last JUDGMENT, after which the redeemed will enjoy everlasting life (Dan. 12:1-3; Isa. 35:3-10; Matt. 25:31-46). Sayings of Jesus and of Paul exclude the notion that the human physical organism survives; the resurrection of the believer's "spiritual body" takes place with the final Coming of Christ to judge and save his own (I Thess. 5:2-11; I Cor. 15:47-57; Phil. 3:20-21). But alongside this hope is the expectation that after death Christ's own are "at home with the Lord" (II Cor. 5:8). The meaning of these statements of the apostle Paul have been variously interpreted, but it is certain that he believed that the ultimate destiny of the redeemed is that they have "a house not made with hands, eternal in the heavens" (II Cor. 5:1; see also I Cor. 2:9; Rom. 8:34-39; I John 3:1-3).

J.L.P.

HEAVE OFFERING. Translation of Hebrew terumah signifying diverse sacrificial portions and offerings that were set apart (dedicated) from a larger mass and taken up ("heaved") initially for Yahweh and later for the priesthood. Among these sacred gifts were thank offering cakes (Lev. 7:12-14), the first yield of baked bread (Num. 15:19-20), the flesh of redeemed fatlings (Num. 18:15-18), and the tithe (Num. 18:24-29).

J.K.K.

HEBER, REGINALD (1783-1826). Anglican clergyman and prolific hymn writer. Heber, who was born in Cheshire, England, and educated at Brasenose College, Oxford, became one of the foremost nineteenth-century hymn writers. He wrote fifty-seven hymns, most of which are still in use. Throughout his ministry, Heber was particularly interested in overseas missions. Thus it can be understood that he would pen the popular missionary hymn, "From Greenland's Icy Mountains." In 1822, because of his involvement in world missions, he was made bishop of Calcutta. After three years in India, his health failed and he died at the age of forty-three. Some of his other widely known hymns are "Holy, Holy, Holy," "Brightest and Best of the Sons of the Morning," "God, That Madest Earth and Heaven," "Hosanna to the Living Lord," "The Son of God Goes Forth to War" "By Cool Siloam's Shady Rill," and "Bread of the World in Mercy Broken." R.H.

HEBREW. Meaning "one from beyond, passing through." Biblical tradition presents the Hebrews as people from the other side of the Euphrates (Gen. 12:5; 14:13; Josh. 24:2-3). The name either indicates that the Hebrews were not indigenous Canaanite inhabitants or denotes their descent from Eber, who is introduced in the Table of Nations (Gen. 10) as their ancestor (vv. 21-24). Popularly derived from the name "Eber," the noun "Hebrew" closely resembles the noun "HABIRU," which denotes a rootless social stratum of mixed race and language widely known in the Near East throughout the second millennium B.C. Though some connection between the two nouns is probable, a precise etymological equation is unwarranted.

With few exceptions, the noun "Hebrew" is confined to OT narratives depicting the earliest phases of Israelite history. It is mainly found in the speech of foreigners, notably Egyptians and Philistines, who refer to the Israelites (Gen. 39:14, 17; 41:12; Exod. 2:6; I Sam. 4:6, 9; 14:11), or in the speech of Israelites concerned to identify themselves as foreigners (Gen. 40:15; Exod. 3:18; 5:3; 7:16). By the time of David (tenth century B.C.), the noun no longer enjoyed general use. In the NT, Paul uses it to emphasize the authenticity of his Jewish heritage (II Cor. 11:22; Phil. 3:5), and Luke refers to early Aramaic-speaking Christians as Hebrews (Acts 6:1).

J. K. K.

HEBREW BIBLE. The basic and most sacred collection of books of the Jewish people. In Hebrew the Bible is most commonly called TaNaKh—an acronym made up of the first letters of Torah ("Instruction," "Law"), Nevi'im ("Prophets"), and Ketuvim ("Writings"). According to Jewish tradition, the Bible contains twenty-four books. The Torah is made up of the five books of Moses, the Hebrew designations of which are based on the first significant word of each book: Bereshtis ("In the beginning"); Shemos ("Names"); Vayikra ("And he [the Lord] called"); B'Midbar ("In the wilderness"); and Devarim ("Words"). Nevi'im is divided into two parts: (1) Nevi'im Rishonim ("Former Prophets"): Joshua, Judges, I, II Samuel, I, II Kings; and (2) Nevi'im Abaronim ("Later Prophets"): Isaiah, Jeremiah, Ezekiel, and the twelve (minor) Prophets. Ketuvim contains Psalms, Proverbs, Job, the five Megillot ("Scrolls"), Daniel, Ezra (including Nehemiah), and I, II Chronicles. If each volume is counted separately, the total number is thirty-nine. While Christians refer to the Hebrew Bible as the OT, Jewish believers feel that there are no interpolations in the Hebrew Bible that point the way toward Jesus.

Some Jewish scholars maintain that the differences between Christianity and Judaism may be contingent on the translations of the Bible into Greek. The original Hebrew words took on, in the Greek translation, connotations that were not intended by the Hebrew authors, with the result that they suggested views and ideas entirely alien to the Jewish spirit. One of the many examples is the origin of the virgin-birth dogma in Christianity, a concept that is associated with the mistranslation of the word almah (Isa. 7:14). In Hebrew, almah merely means "young woman." The Greeks mistakenly rendered it parthenos, which means "virgin." Another example is the Hebrew word ruah, which, in the Greek translation, connoted the non-Jewish concept of spirit versus body.

The Hebrew Bible occupies a central place in Jewish life and tradition. Its original texts were guarded zealously and scrupulously. The rabbis admonished against tampering with the original text of the Bible. They were opposed to translations, but within the Hebrew displayed considerable latitude with regard to interpretation. The Torah was likened by them to "a hammer that breaketh the rock in pieces" (Jer. 23:29), that is, just as the rock is split into many pebbles, so also may one biblical verse convey many meanings.

The traditional faith in the unlimited meaningfulness of the Hebrew Bible is expressed in the rabbinic exhortation: "Turn it over again and again, for everything is in it." (See HEBREW LANGUAGE.)

L. K.

HEBREW CALENDAR. The Hebrew calendar is largely linked to the cycle of the moon. Since Jewish festivals must be kept in their proper season, however, the calendar is adjusted every few years to the cycle of the sun.

According to the Bible, the first month is the spring month of Abib, or Nisan, as it is now known. The Jewish year, however, begins with the first day of the seventh month, Tishri. Apparently at one time there were two calendars, now reconciled in one.

The Jewish year is dated from what is believed to be the year of Creation. The time span between this and the year of the Christian Era is 3,760 years. The first of Tishri in A.D. 1985 will begin the Jewish year 5746.

Each month begins with the new moon. Generally, the Jewish year has twelve months of twenty-nine or thirty days each. This totals approximately 354 days. To keep the festivals from "wandering" through the seasons, an extra month is inserted in every Jewish leap year. This occurs seven times in every moon cycle of nineteen years.

The Bible records only four original Hebrew names of the months. The Hebrew names were dropped, however, and all twelve months now have names of Babylonian origin established after the Babylonian Exile.

Following are the months of the Hebrew calendar, their equivalents, and major holy days:

Tishri (September–October)

ROSH HASHANAH (New Year) Tishri 1 and 2

“... in the seventh month, on the first day of the month, ye shall have a holy convocation: ye shall do no manner of servile work; it is a day of blowing the horn unto you” (Num. 29:1, JPS).

YOM KIPPUR (DAY OF ATONEMENT) Tishri 10

“And on the tenth day of this seventh month ye shall have a holy convocation; and ye shall afflict your souls; ye shall do no manner of work” (Num. 29:7).

SUKKOT (Feast of Tabernacles) Tishri 15-21

One of three Jewish pilgrim festivals (Exod. 23:16; Lev. 23:34, 39; Deut. 16).

Heshvan (October–November)

Kislev (November–December)

HANUKKAH (Feast of Dedication) Kislev 25–Tevet 2 or 3

Hanukkah celebrates the rededication of the holy Temple by the MACCABEES. The Temple had been defiled by the forces of the Syrian king Antiochus Epiphanes, who had tried to suppress the Jewish religion.

Tevet (December–January)

Shevat (January–February)

Adar (February–March)

PURIM (Feast of Lots) Adar 14

Purim celebrates the narrow escape of the Jews of Persia from being destroyed according to the plot and plan of Haman. God intervened through MORDECAI and Queen Esther.

Nisan (March–April)

Pesach (Feast of the Passover) Nisan 15-22

PASSOVER is a pilgrimage festival that celebrates the Jewish people’s deliverance from Egyptian slavery through the intervention of God.

“In the first month, on the fourteenth day of the month at dusk, is the Lord’s passover. And on the fifteenth day of the same month is the feast of unleavened bread unto the Lord; seven days ye shall eat unleavened bread” (Lev. 23:5, 6 JPS).

The “feast of unleavened bread” is called a SEDER. The Last Supper was a Seder.

Iyar (April–May)

Sivan (May–June)

SHAVUOT (Pentecost) Sivan 6 and 7

Shavuot is a pilgrim festival that comes seven weeks after Passover. One of its names is the Feast of Weeks. It celebrates God’s giving of the TORAH (which includes the Ten Commandments) on MOUNT SINAI.

Tammuz (June–July)

Av (July–August)

Elul (August–September)

(See also JEWISH HOLIDAYS.)

L.K.

HEBREW LANGUAGE. The language of the religion, culture, and civilization of the Jewish people since ancient times. In the Bible, Hebrew is called sefat Canaan, the “language of Canaan” (Isa. 19:18). A member of the northwest Semitic family of languages, Hebrew is the only one of the ancient tongues spoken in the Near Eastern cradle of civilization that has survived to the present day.

The earliest literary records of the Hebrews, such as the Song of Moses, after passing through the Sea of Reeds (popularly known as the Red Sea), as well as the Song of Deborah, dating back probably to the thirteenth and eleventh centuries B.C., respectively, are written in pure Hebrew, as are the later Prophets. The first use of the term in Hebrew in referring to the Hebrew language is in the Book of Jubilees, which probably dates back to about the third century B.C.

Hebrew, as the language of the Scriptures, is known as “the holy tongue.” The term is used because even when Aramaic displaced Hebrew as the spoken language of the people during the time of the Second Temple, Hebrew remained the language used for sacred purposes such as the liturgy in the Temple and later in the synagogue.

The Hebrew language, the literature of which covers a period of more than three thousand years, has gone through many changes in grammatical form and vocabulary content. During the first thousand years of Jewish history, Hebrew was a spoken language. During the next two thousand years Hebrew was mainly used for literary purposes and as the language of worship. In modern times, Hebrew has once again become a living language, and is the official language of the State of Israel.

The language may be classified according to the following categories: Biblical Hebrew, Haskalah Hebrew, Medieval Hebrew, Mishnaic Hebrew, and Modern Hebrew. The tongue continually absorbed outside influences such as Babylonian, Egyptian, Aramaic, Greek, Ugaritic, and Arabic.

The classical Hebrew of biblical literature has a unique stylistic and grammatical pattern. It is succinct, but rich in imagery and picturesqueness. For example: When a house is built by evil and sin, “the stone shall cry out of the wall, and the beam out of the timber shall answer it” (Hab. 2:11 KJV); “The heavens declare the glory of God” (Ps. 19:2 KJV); “The floods clap their hands; let the hills sing for joy

Biblical Hebrew Alphabet

Hebrew	Name	Latin
א	aleph	.
ב	beth	b, bh
ג	gimel	g, gh
ד	daleth	d, dh
ה	he	h
ו	waw	w
ז	zayin	z
ח	heth	h̄
ט	teth	ṭ
י	yod	y
כ,ך	kaph	k, kh
ל	lamed	l
מ,ם	mem	m
נ,ן	nun	n
ס	samekh	s
ע	ayin	.
פ,ף	pe	p, ph
צ,ץ	sadhe	ṣ
ק	qoph	q
ר	resh	r
ש	sin	ś
שׁ	shin	sh
ת	taw	t, th

Biblical Hebrew Alphabet

together" (Ps. 98:8). When God was angry, "smoke went up from his nostrils" (Ps. 18:8). When the sun rises, it is "like a bridegroom leaving his chamber, and like a strong man runs its course with joy" (Ps. 19:5).

The ancient Hebrew texts of the Bible were transmitted in a consonantal form of writing. There were no signs, or very scanty and inadequate signs, to indicate vowel sounds. When the MASORETES of the seventh and eighth centuries A.D. undertook to fix the Hebrew vocalization, they treated the texts all alike, regardless of how old the texts were, in accordance with the traditional pronunciation prevalent in Palestine during the age of the Talmud. The system was adopted as the norm for Hebrew texts and has remained the basis for Hebrew grammar down to modern times.

The Hebrew alphabet consists of twenty-two letters. Transliterated, they are: aleph, bet, gimel, dalet, he, vav, zayin, het, tet, yod, kaph, lamed, mem, nun, samekh, ayin, pe, zade, koph, resh, shin, and tav. (See chart.)

According to Hebrew tradition, the text of the Torah that was given to Moses at Mount Sinai had no vowel signs. The Torah Scrolls to this day are unvocalized so that the commandment in the Bible, ". . . thou shall not add thereunto" (Deut. 13:1), is not violated.

A number of vowel systems developed. Three systems are not extant: the Babylonian, the Palestinian, and the Tiberian. The first two are preserved only in a few ancient manuscripts. The Tiberian system is the one now in use. The basic unit is the dot. The varying position, as well as the change in the arrangement and the number of the dots, determines the sound values of the vowels in their variations. The system also includes one short line. With two exceptions, the vowel signs are below the consonants.

Hebrew is read from right to left. The source of the original Hebrew script is shrouded in obscurity. The square script now used in printed Hebrew has been in vogue only since the time of Ezra and Nehemiah (about 430 B.C.).

The one person who must be given credit for the modern revival of Hebrew as a spoken tongue and for enriching its vocabulary is Eliezer ben Yehudah (1858-1922). Born in Lithuania, he settled in Jerusalem in 1881, where he began his fanatic fight to introduce Hebrew as the language of instruction in the schools. A journalist and editor of several Hebrew journals, he strongly urged that Hebrew be used as the spoken language by young and old alike. In this he never compromised, and in his private life he would refuse to speak any other language to members of his family or to his friends. He organized and built the Vaad Ha-Lashon (Council for the Development of Hebrew) and devoted himself stubbornly and heroically to his life work, the Dictionary of the Hebrew Language.

Because of the unique experiences of the Jewish people, Hebrew has incorporated a great many religious ideas and concepts that have been adopted by other people. Hebrew has influenced English, largely through the process of translating the Bible into the King James Version and through Shakespeare. Many of the early American settlers were good Hebraists and were deeply rooted in the original biblical literature. Samuel Johnson, the first president of King's College, now known as Columbia University, declared in 1759 that "Hebrew was a gentleman's accomplishment." He further asserted that "as soon as a lad had learned to speak and to read English well, it is much the best to begin a learned education with Hebrew . . . the mother of all languages." A number of Hebrew words and expressions are interspersed in the writings of Cotton Mather. Ezra Stiles, president of Yale University, assigned to Hebrew a predominant place in the college curriculum. Hebrew likewise ranked high in the curriculum of Harvard. The lower schools also attempted to provide instruction in Hebrew. Governor William Bradford, second governor of Plymouth Colony, was said to have studied Hebrew most of all languages so that "he would see with his own eyes the ancient Oracles of God in their native beauty." (See also LANGUAGES OF THE ANCIENT NEAR EAST AND OF THE BIBLE.) L.K.

HEBREWS, LETTER TO THE. One of the most obscure letters in the NT Canon, posing still unresolved questions about its author, its first recipients, its date, and even its genre as a letter, Hebrews still claims the attention of Bible readers. Two factors make this so. One is that this lengthy document stands out as a unique specimen in the NT collection; it reads like a sermon, or at least a spoken utterance (see 2:5; 8:1; 9:25; and 13:22 for marks of an oral style), employing rhetorical (11:32) and elegant features (1:1-4, which is a remarkable opening to any document). (We can well imagine how the author framed his words to catch and hold the hearers' attention.) The second distinctive lies in its contents. Passages from the OT are often used in full quotation, with twenty-nine actual citations and about seventy allusions, and the author's purpose is clear: to use the ceremonies and rites of the Jewish religion as a foil to proclaim the excellence of the Christian gospel. In his estimation, Judaism existed to prepare for and point to the religion of the new COVENANT, so that with the dawn of the New Age of Christ's coming Jewish practices no longer have validity or meaning (8:1-13; 10:1-18; 11:39, 40; 13:10). We may infer that there was a historical circumstance for this position, and most scholars find it in the threat facing the letter's readers as they were in danger of lapsing into the Jewish faith, which they had left on becoming believers in Jesus the Messiah of Israel.

The Recipients. The traditional view is that this document was intended as a warning to Hebrew Christians who were on the point of apostatizing and slipping back into their ancestral faith. They had been disowned by their fellow Jews (10:32-34) and were wistfully looking back in a time of persecution to their former life. The letter, in this view, is essentially a call to go forward, not back (6:1), and the appeals that punctuate the letter's theoretical argument (for example, 4:1, 14: 10:22; 12:28) are intended to awaken and alert the recipients to their present duty.

The problem with this older interpretation lies with the nature of the Judaism from which the readers had turned. There are signs that it cannot have been Palestinian Judaism as we normally understand that term, admittedly vaguely defined. The links with Alexandrian Judaism, that is, the Hellenistic features that are found in the Judaism of the Dispersion, notably in Egypt as represented by Philo, are too numerous to ignore, and they suggest a readership in the Greek-speaking, Hellenistic culture where Jews lived in the first century A.D. The ties between the Jewish ceremonials and those of the Dead Sea Scrolls are tenuous; and the most we can say is that the first addressees were a body of people who were threatened to abandon their Christian faith and embrace a type of Christianity, partly Jewish, partly pagan (3:12; 10:26; both texts suggest a lapse into irreligion, even atheism), which the author sees as totally inferior to the Christian message.

One or two other matters need to be mentioned in an attempt to pinpoint the clear and present danger overhanging the readers. The letter places strong emphasis on the full humanity of Jesus (whose human name is especially noteworthy in the document, occurring by itself ten times, and placed at the close of the sentence for emphasis). His real incarnation (2:14), his genuine temptation (2:17, 18; 4:15), his fidelity to death (2:9; 13:12), and his being obedient through suffering (5:7-9)—these are all telltale signs that the readers were neglecting the human side of Christ's person, probably on the mistaken idea that he was a semidivine character. The presence of Docetism (that is, denying Christ's real humanity) may be suspected as in the background of the recipients' embrace of a heterodox faith.

The other side is the stress this letter places on the promise of Christ's parousia or return in glory (9:28). The readers were evidently puzzled over the nonappearance of their Lord and the windup of the age; hence the author has to reassure them, on the basis of the OT (Hab. 2:3-4), that the Lord will soon come and that they should not abandon their hope (10:35-39; see 10:25 for the practice effect of what the jettisoning of this hope entailed).

Reasons for Writing. We have already touched on some of the reasons why this composition was sent out, on the basis, it may be, of a homily the author had given (13:22). In essence, the point of the letter is to call the congregation—possibly a set of house fellowships—to recognize their identity as the pilgrim people of God and to live accordingly. Their overlooking of the true marks of the church brought on two disfiguring features, which the author warns against. First, the ethical laxity that had afflicted the community is obvious from 12:16; 13:4; coupled with a reluctance to face the rigors of Christian discipleship (12:3-11). Hence, the writer's stern call to holiness of living. Second, the author's severest words are directed against the slide into apostasy on the part of the readers (6:4-9; 10:26-31). These sections have given rise to serious questions about whether Christians may be readmitted to the church's fellowship.

The insistence of our epistle is to be persevering (12:1) and not to allow its readers to quit the race (2:1; 4:1). The author's great fear is that his friends will fail to reach the heavenly city (13:14) which, to the vision of faith (11:1), already exists (12:12-18). He summons the people to obey their leaders (13:7, 17, 24) and to remain true to their baptismal pledge (3:1; 4:14; 10:23) as they fix their minds on the example of Jesus, who endured suffering and won through to find victory because he was obedient and faithful (4:14-16; 5:7-10; 12:2).

Dating. The critical issue is whether the fall of the Jerusalem Temple in A.D. 70 is already a thing of the past for the author. If it is, it is surprising he never refers to it as a proof of God's judgment on Israel. On the other hand, his preoccupation is rather with the tabernacle in the wilderness in Moses' time than with the actual Temple, whether past or present. References to suffering in "former days" (10:32) may look back to Nero's persecution in A.D. 65—if the church in question is at Rome. More decisively, in one place (2:3) the author puts some distance between himself and the apostles whose memory is invoked (13:7). It seems that several decades separate the letter's composition from the age of Paul and Peter; and we place the date around A.D. 80. But nothing is certain in this inquiry, and the message of Hebrews does not depend on a precise setting.

R.M.

HEBRON. An OT city, located near Mamre and probably identical to the contemporary city of El Kahlil (Arabic), which lies eighteen miles southwest of Jerusalem. Hebron was a royal city, built seven years before Zoan in Egypt (Num. 13:22). The ruler of Hebron in the fourteenth century B.C., Shuwardata, is mentioned in the letters found at Tel-el-

From Atlas of the Bible (Thomas Nelson & Sons Limited)

Aerial view of the setting for the ancient city of Hebron

From Atlas of the Bible (Thomas Nelson & Sons Limited)

The town of Hebron

Amarna. Abraham bought a field near Hebron, Machpelah, and buried his wife Sarah in a cave there. During the Hebrew conquest, Joshua destroyed Hebron. The site was given to Caleb and later to the Levites, for a city of refuge.

Hebron is closely connected with David, as he was anointed king of Judah there, and six of his sons were born there during his seven-year reign. Later, during his rebellion, David's son Absalom used Hebron as his headquarters. At the time of the Exile (586 B.C.), the Idumeans (Arabs) occupied Hebron. Judas Maccabeus destroyed it in 164 B.C., after which time it was rebuilt. Herod the Great constructed elaborate memorial buildings over the cave of Machpelah in honor of Abraham. The city was destroyed again during the Roman-Jewish war in A.D. 68.

J.C.

HECKER, ISAAC THOMAS (1819–88). The founder of the PAULIST FATHERS was born December 18, in New York City, the youngest son of John and Caroline Freund Hecker. Baptized a Lutheran and associated for a while with the Methodists, he met Orestes Brownson in 1841, and became active in the Workingmen's Party. Toying with transcendentalism, he visited Brook Farm in 1843, Bronson Alcott's Fruitlands, and lived for a time with the Henry David Thoreau family.

He was baptized a Roman Catholic August 1, 1844, and was confirmed in 1845. He began a novitiate in the Redemptorist order in St. Trond, Belgium, in 1845. Ordained a priest on October 23, 1849, in London, he returned to the United States in 1851, and wrote Questions of the Soul (1852) and Aspirations of Nature (1857).

With four other converts, he felt the need for an English-speaking order to evangelize American Protestants. Applying to Rome in 1857 they were encouraged by Pius IX to form the Missionary Priests of St. Paul the Apostle in July 1858 in New York City. Keen on communications, Hecker founded the Catholic World in 1865, organized the Catholic Publication Society in 1866, and founded the Young Catholic in 1870. He died on December 22.

N.H.

HEDONISM. From the Greek word for pleasure, (1) an ethical theory holding that pleasure alone is desirable and the highest criterion for human action, and (2) a psychological theory affirming that pleasure and pain—past, present, or anticipated—determine human behavior.

Ethical hedonism teaches that only pleasure is desirable in itself, and that only pain is undesirable. Achieving the highest degree of pleasure and avoiding as much pain as possible provide the norms for action that can be called right and good. In various forms, hedonism has been taught by thinkers from the Hellenic period to the present. The teaching that pleasure is the highest good was already strong in the time of Socrates (469–399 B.C.). Plato (427–347 B.C.), in the Philebus, raises questions about hedonism that remain basic: What is meant by “pleasure”? Are there pleasures that are better than others? Does this not require criteria beyond pleasure alone? and Does this not lead beyond hedonism toward a wider conception of happiness and fulfillment?

UTILITARIANISM as formulated by Jeremy Bentham (1748–1832) teaches that the highest good is the greatest happiness for the greatest number, calculated according to what produces the most pleasure and the least pain. John Stuart Mill (1806–73), influential philosopher and social reformer of the nineteenth century, expanded the utilitarian criteria of happiness to include self-realization and general societal welfare.

Psychological hedonism affirms that the goal of pleasure actually determines human behavior. Though difficult to verify or falsify, psychological hedonism tends to use the circular argument that people seek pleasure, and that what people seek gives them pleasure.

Ethical hedonism and psychological hedonism do not entail each other; nor does either provide support for the other. Hedonism will persist in variant forms, especially popular ones, but persuasive arguments questioning its adequacy have existed since the earliest periods of human thought.

C.Mc.

HEGEL, GEORG W. F. (1770–1831). The greatest of the German idealist philosophers and one of the most fertile minds in the history of European thought. Hegel had a profound influence on Christian theology in the nineteenth century. Born in Stuttgart, he studied theology at Tübingen and served as a private tutor in Berne and in Frankfurt. Hegel joined the faculty at Jena in 1801 and was appointed professor in 1805. From 1808 to 1816 he served as rector of a gymnasium at Nuremberg in Bavaria. He returned to professorships in philosophy at Heidelberg (1816–18) and Berlin (1818–31), by which time he had gained unrivaled prominence in Germany. Chief among his books are The Phenomenology of Mind (1807), The Science of Logic (1812–16), The Encyclopedia of the Philosophical Sciences (1817), The

Courtesy of the Library of Congress

Georg Wilhelm Friedrich Hegel

Philosophy of Right (1821), and Lectures on the Philosophy of Religion (1832).

Hegel brought the insights of Enlightenment RATIONALISM and nineteenth-century ROMANTICISM together into a grand synthesis. During the early years as a private tutor he came under the influence of Kant and wrote a “Life of Jesus” (1795) under his inspiration. However, in The Spirit of Christianity and Its Fate, Hegel broke with Kant and depicted Jesus as departing from the estrangement inherent in Hebrew religion—what he called “the contrite consciousness”—and restoring humankind’s original unity through love, a love that heals the division between duty and inclination. Here the beginnings of Hegel’s concern to reconcile dialectically the opposites of experience are apparent.

Between 1800 and 1807 Hegel developed a philosophy capable of accounting for a synthesis of intellect and emotion and of thought and life. He also came to a greater appreciation of the positive and historical nature of Christianity whose truth, he now believed, needed to be grasped and justified on a higher philosophical level. “The universal,” he wrote, “must pass into actuality through the particular” or the historical, so that it might be seen in its rational necessity. Hegel thereafter sought to demonstrate that Christianity was the actualization of the unity of the divine and the human in the historical coming into being of Absolute Spirit. Hegel sees humanity’s contrite or unhappy consciousness depicted in mythopoetic form in the biblical story of the Fall of Adam. However, for Hegel the Fall is a necessary movement from innocence to self-consciousness, that is, to the knowledge of good and evil and freedom. It is also the necessary step toward reconciliation.

In God's Incarnation in Jesus Christ, the movement of reconciliation is begun. The implicit unity of God and humanity is made explicit in a concrete historical event. God passes from transcendent abstract idea into the historically immanent and finite. But the death of Christ actually symbolizes the destruction of finitude, that God's finitude is only a transitional moment in the emergence of Absolute Spirit. God dies as a being standing over us, the transcendent God of traditional theism. The coming of the Holy Spirit and the spiritual community of church represents the universal reconciliation of the Divine and the human implicit from the beginning. It is the goal of history, the advent of the Absolute Religion.

For Hegel the Holy Trinity is the symbolic representation of the entire dialectical process of the coming of Absolute Spirit. God becomes fully actualized only in the kingdom of the Spirit. God comes to full consciousness in and through the world, through the spiritual community. Hegel concludes that "the spirit of man which is to know God is only the spirit of God Himself." For Hegel it is the very "translation" of Christianity into philosophy that justifies and preserves it. The right-wing disciples of Hegel agreed and found in his philosophical translation a means of reconstructing Christian theology in the face of scientific criticism. Left-wing Hegelians, such as D. F. STRAUSS, Bruno Bauer, and L. FEUERBACH, discerned in Hegel the process of rationalizing and ultimately overcoming the Christian religion. Hegel's ambiguous relation to Christianity is a matter of dispute even today.

J.L.

HEGIRA. See HIJRA.

HEIDEGGER, MARTIN (1889–1976). A German philosopher, considered one of the leading exponents of EXISTENTIALISM, although his philosophy went far beyond what is commonly called existentialism. He believed that the central philosophical question is, What is the meaning of being? In his major work, Being and Time (1927), he sought to answer this question by inquiring into the being of the one who asks the question, that is to say, the human being. The question of being can be asked only because the DASEIN (or human being) already has some pre-conceptual understanding of being, given in its very existence.

Heidegger's account of Dasein given in the work cited has been a major contribution to philosophical anthropology and has influenced theologians, psychiatrists, educationists, and others. But this first approach to the question of being broke off, and in later writings Heidegger sought a more direct confrontation with being, which he could describe as "wholly other" to beings. His later style is obscure and verges on the mystical. He taught for most of his life at Freiburg and caused controversy by serving for a year as rector under the Nazi regime. He was the major philosophical influence behind BULTMANN's demythologizing.

J.M.

HEIDELBERG CATECHISM (1563). A German Reformed confession combining Calvinistic, Lutheran, and Zwinglian elements. PHILIP MELANCTON helped reorganize Heidelberg University and introduced Lutheranism in the Palatinate. However, violent disputes erupted over the Lord's Supper. Desiring a conciliatory reformation, Frederick III, Elector of the Palatinate (1559–76), commissioned Zacharias Ursinus, a disciple of Melancton, and Caspar Olevianus to write a harmonious catechism. Adopted in January 1563, the Heidelberg Catechism weathered stormy criticism to become one of the Reformation's most widely accepted statements of faith. Its 129 questions systematically treat misery, human redemption, and new life under thankfulness. It modifies predestination and stresses the Ten Commandments and devotional prayer.

C.M.

HEILSGESCHICHTE. A German expression, meaning "salvation history." Although it was already used in the nineteenth century, it is more commonly associated with the movement known as "biblical theology," which flourished in the middle decades of the twentieth century. BIBLICAL THEOLOGY was an attempt to expound Christian faith in concepts and even language drawn from the Bible itself, and salvation history was held to be one of the key concepts. On this view, the Bible is primarily the record of the "mighty acts" of God—the calling of Israel and its subsequent history, the sending of Jesus Christ in the "fullness of time," the founding and mission of the church, leading to the final consummation. One of the clearest expositions of salvation history was given by Oscar Cullmann in his book Christ and Time. He claims that at the heart of the biblical revelation is its understanding of time and history, and that theologians must put aside any other conceptions of time. In Cullmann's view, salvation history is coterminous with general history, but it is much narrower—it is like a scarlet thread running through the fabric of universal history. Unlike the cyclic understanding of time characteristic of paganism, biblical time is linear, with a beginning and an end and a mid-point (Jesus Christ). This conception of salvation history and its accompanying biblical theology has been severely criticized (see, for example, James Barr, Semantics of Biblical Language, 1961) and is no longer influential.

J.M.

HELIOPOLIS. One of the great cities of ancient Egypt, located in the Nile Delta, northeast of modern Cairo. It was a religious center rather than a political center, although it was a capital of lower Egypt. Heliopolis means "City of the Sun" in Greek, which is translated Beth-shemesh, "House of the Sun," in Hebrew. It was the center of Heliopolitan theology, which originated in the Third Dynasty. Its god, Atum, was identified with Re as Atum-Re, the god of the sun. Other deities included Isis, Osiris, Seth, and Nephthys, the gods of birth, death, hades, and rebirth. It was destroyed by Cambyses, the Persian emperor, according to the historian Strabo. The ruins contain the original Obelisk, which symbolizes the hill on which Atum-Re stood after emergence from chaos. Jeremiah declared that the sacred pillars of Beth-shemesh would be smashed, thus pronouncing Yahweh's judgment on Egyptian religion. J.C.

HELL. See GEHENNA.

HELLENISM/HELLENISTIC. The term "Hellenism" is difficult to define. It is best regarded as the goal and fulfillment of Alexander's dream of "one world," embracing a single culture—chiefly urban—and speaking a common language, koine, a form of GREEK.

The Maccabean revolt of 168–165 B.C. can be seen best as the conflict between adherents of Torah Judaism and those who professed to be Jews but had imbibed the spirit of Hellenism. The actual term "hellenization" or adopting "the Greek way of life" is met in the literature of this period (II Macc. 4:10, 13). From this history we can itemize what Hellenism meant: a freedom in regard to the human body expressed in athletics and concern for physical prowess; social life centered on the stadium and theater, borrowed respectively from the Greek games at Olympia and Corinth, and the Athenian love of dramatic and pictorial art; and above all, a city-oriented type of living, with a love of learning in the fields of philosophy, science, and culture, for which the symbol was the library, the debating hall, and the covered walkways in which the philosophers conversed and from which the Stoics got their name.

All this posed a threat to traditional Judaism, which saw God's revelation to Moses (in Torah) as the essence of all wisdom and knowledge (a thought expressed in Sirach's writings) and its final embodiment.

Hellenists in the NT (see Acts 6:1) were evidently bilingual Jews or, better, Jews who spoke only Greek, but even more, Jews who were open to Greek influences from the world of the DISPERSION and were represented by the liberal outlook of Stephen (Acts 7) and his followers (Acts 11:19-20), leading to Saul of Tarsus, a Hellenistic Jew who became a missionary to the Greco-Roman cosmopolitan world (Rom. 1:14-16). R.M.

HELVETIC CONFESSIONS. Two ecumenical Swiss Reformed confessions. The First Helvetic Confession (1536) compiled by Heinrich Bullinger and others, united Switzerland's Protestant cantons. The Second Helvetic Confession (1566), written by Bullinger and published by Palatinate Elector Frederick III, skillfully combined Calvinistic and Zwinglian theology. It united Reform churches in Switzerland and beyond.

C.M.

HENRY, CARL F. H. (1913– ). Evangelical theologian and journalist. He was born in New York City on January 22 to Karl F. and Johanna Vaethroeder Henry. Carl Henry received a B.A. from Wheaton College (Ill.) in 1938 and an M.A. in 1940. His B.D. from Northern Baptist Theological Seminary came in 1941 and a Th.D. in 1942. Boston University conferred the Ph.D. degree in 1949. He was married to Helga Bender on August 17, 1940, and ordained to the Baptist ministry in 1941.

Henry was an assistant professor, then professor, at Northern Baptist Theological Seminary from 1942 to 1947. In 1947 he became acting dean of Fuller Theological Seminary, Pasadena, and professor from 1947 to 1956. He gained worldwide fame through his career as founding editor in 1956 of the newly launched Christianity Today, which was a major factor in acquainting the Christian world with a resurgence of evangelical theology. He continued with the magazine until 1977.

Courtesy of the National Association of Evangelicals

Carl F. H. Henry

His book The Uneasy Conscience of Modern Fundamentalism (1948) revealed that EVANGELICALISM was concerned with social as well as personal ethics. Thereafter, a number of books have come from his prolific pen including his magnum opus, the six-volume God, Revelation and Authority.

Recognized as author, lecturer, educator, and theologian, Henry has spoken at gatherings on America's most prestigious campuses and in countries of every continent. For a number of years he has served as lecturer-at-large with WORLD VISION INTERNATIONAL.

R.M.

HENRY, MATTHEW (1662–1714). English non-conformist, famed for the devotional commentary Exposition of the Old and New Testaments (1708–10), which was left unfinished but was completed by thirteen of his colleagues. His father, Philip Henry, was deprived by the Act of Uniformity (1662). Educated at Islington Academy and Gray's Inn, Henry chose theology over law and pastored Presbyterian congregations at Chester and Hackney.

C.M.

HENRY VIII (1491–1547). King of England from 1509 who broke papal authority in England, made himself head of the church, and tentatively approached Protestantism. Henry was Henry VII's second son. Arthur, the first son, died shortly after marrying Catherine of Spain. In 1503 a papal dispensation set aside the restrictions of Leviticus 21:14, allowing Henry's betrothal to Arthur's widow. After becoming king, Henry married Catherine. Henry supported papal supremacy; his children's succession depended on the legitimacy of the pope's dispensation. In 1521 he eagerly published Assertion of the Seven Sacraments against Martin Luther. For this Pope Leo X rewarded him with a new title, "Defender of the Faith." By 1527 Henry sought papal invalidation of his marriage to Catherine "for reasons of state," but Pope Clement VII refused. Emperor Charles V's army controlled Rome, and Catherine was Charles's aunt. At THOMAS CRANMER's suggestion, Henry sought a decision "out of God's Word" from Europe's universities. The answers favored Henry's plans. Cranmer immediately became a court favorite.

Henry then moved to break all papal ties. In 1530 he accused chancellor Cardinal WOLSEY of treason for breaking a 1353 statute of Praemunire, forbidding papal appointments in England. In 1532 he used the same statute to force the clergy to name him supreme head of the Church of England and give him a huge "gift" as well. The clergy also agreed to withhold from the pope the annates (first year's income) of each English benefice. By threatening to take those annates (which he later did), Henry got the pope to name Cranmer archbishop of Canterbury. Cranmer then nullified Henry's marriage to Catherine. Henry had already secretly married Anne Boleyn, mother of Elizabeth, born that same year, 1533. Parliament supported Henry in a series of new laws—made appeals to Rome illegal (1533), forbade papal dispensations and payment of Peter's pence (1534), passed the SUPREMACY ACT making Henry "supreme head" of the Church of England (1534), declared Princess Mary illegitimate, and named Elizabeth heir to the throne (1534). For refusing to affirm Henry's supremacy, THOMAS MORE and John Fisher were both executed (1535). In 1536 and 1539 Henry seized and dissolved England's 645 monasteries, using their assets for his own royal purposes.

Henry was by no means Protestant. Except for royal supremacy, his views were Catholic. Henry made political overtures to the Germans in 1536 and issued his partially Protestant Ten Articles. But Henry could not accept the Augsburg Confession. The Six Articles (1539) clearly reaffirmed his Catholicism.

Henry's marriages were hardly satisfying. Anne Boleyn was beheaded for adultery in 1536. That same year Henry married Jane Seymour; she died in giving birth to Edward in 1537. Thomas Cromwell attempted an alliance with Germany through the marriage of Henry to Anne of Cleves in 1540, but Anne was ugly; Henry had not previously seen her. The marriage was quickly nullified, and Cromwell was beheaded for favoring the Protestants. That same year Henry married Catherine Howard; she was beheaded for adultery in 1542. He married Catherine Parr in 1543; she survived him.

Henry allowed some religious changes. For instance, Cranmer brought out several Bibles. Henry read much of Tyndale's translations. Coverdale's Bible (1535), the first complete Bible in English, received tacit sanction. Matthew's Bible (1537) also bore the king's authorization. However, in 1543 and 1546 Henry proscribed lay Bible reading, fearing such would produce radicalism. Before his death Henry appointed a committee, half Protestant, half Catholic, to guide his son EDWARD VI. Under Edward, with Cranmer leading, Protestantism flourished.

C.M.

HERDER, JOHANN GOTTFRIED VON (1744–1803). German philosopher, clergyman, and man of letters, Herder was a pioneer of the romantic revolt against Enlightenment rationalism. He studied at Königsberg, where he got to know both Kant and Hamann. He was unattracted by the prevailing emphasis on reason and stressed instead feeling and spontaneity. Because of this, he found Hamann congenial and was influenced also by the pantheistic tendencies in Bruno and Spinoza. Herder's own thinking ranged over such wide fields that it is impossible to summarize it. His main work was on the philosophy of history, but almost equally important were his researches into the origins and nature of language. These researches led him in turn to the study of Slavonic philology, on which he became an authority. Among his latest writings were severe criticisms of Kant's critical philosophy.

J.M.

HERESY. A Greek term for a peculiar philosophical position, which is used in a pejorative rather than a neutral way in the later books of the NT. In face of the Judaizing controversy and the Gnostic systems of DOCTRINE, the apostles denounced "other gospels" as divisions and threats to the truth of the gospel and the unity of the church. By the second century, several heresies were identified by the church fathers. Augustine declared later that heretics violate the faith by thinking falsely about God.

Not every error in doctrine was considered heresy, for human beings are subject to misunderstanding and most people do not oppose the church's true teachings, even when they also hold some erroneous views. A heretic is one who thinks falsely about the faith and who also opposes the church's teaching, and moreover seeks to overthrow the church's position and replace it with his or her own. Many church fathers wrote extensively against various heresies, and lists of heresies were drawn up by Justin Martyr, Irenaeus, Hippolytus, Epiphanius, Augustine, and John Chrysostom. In the contemporary ecumenical era, most mainstream Protestants and Roman Catholics refrain from speaking of other denominations' beliefs in terms of heresy.

J.C.

HERRMANN, WILHELM (1846–1922). Professor of theology at Marburg, Herrmann had both Barth and Bultmann among his students. A follower of Ritschl, he tried to exclude metaphysics from theology, holding that theology is "only to be understood as the expression of new personal life." The "inner life" of Jesus, as attested in the NT, impresses modern readers in the same way as it did the first disciples, bringing them into communion with God. The witness of the NT is confirmed by the moral consciousness belonging to every human being. These teachings are expressed in Herrmann's book The Communion of the Christian with God.

J.M.

HERMAS, SHEPHERD OF. See SHEPHERD OF HERMAS.

HERMENEUTICS. Derived from the Greek term hermeneutikos (of or for interpreting), it means "the science of INTERPRETATION" or "the principles utilized for discovering the meaning of a text." Applied before the nineteenth century mainly to interpreting Jewish and Christian Scriptures, hermeneutics now includes methods for interpreting any text or situation.

Early Centuries A.D. Jewish interpretation of Scripture took the text in its plain meaning, with a continuing reinterpretation informed by (a) prominent events in Hebrew history, (b) stories called the "haddada," (c) applications of the Law called the "halakah," and (d) apocalyptic writings of postexilic Judaism. Hellenic interpretation of Homer and Hesiod developed the allegorical method in order to make these classics meaningful to later generations. Drawing on both these traditions, early Christian hermeneutics emphasized allegory (ALEXANDRIAN school) and a plain reading of Scripture (ANTIOCHENE school), with Jerome favoring the latter and Augustine the former.

Middle Ages. In the early Middle Ages, the allegorical method for interpreting Scripture was more prominent, though it was controlled by doctrine and patristic authority. Renewed influence from rabbinical sources led to modification of this tradition and the emergence of a fourfold hermeneutic combining historical, allegorical, moral, and spiritual principles.

Renaissance and Reformation. Humanist scholars emphasizing classical studies brought knowledge of Greek and Hebrew back to scriptural interpretation. Martin Luther (1483–1546) attacked ecclesiastical control of the Bible by the papacy and affirmed the competence of all Christians to interpret Scripture within the community of faith. In the wake of these influences, biblical studies developed and flourished. Johannes Cocceius (1603–69) utilized philology, history, Oriental studies and archaeology, and rabbinical sources for interpreting Scripture in a hermeneutic that foreshadowed the development of the modern study of the Bible.

Modern Hermeneutics. As critical methods became dominant in biblical studies following the Enlightenment, much creative work was done in the literary and historical study of the Bible. But the principles of interpretation tended to become restricted to the narrow horizons of positivistic objectivism. Hermeneutics in historical and philosophical studies has increasingly emphasized the presuppositions of the interpreter, the audience to whom interpretation is addressed, and the location of both interpreter and audience within particular communities of interpretation and sociocultural contexts. Hermeneutics in the post-critical era gives promise of combining the strengths of critical scholarship with the comprehensive horizons of pre-critical wholeness. (See also BIBLICAL CRITICISM.)

C.Mc.

HERMES. A god worshiped by the ancient Greeks as a giver of fertility and as the messenger of the gods. He was often identified with the Roman god Mercury. The people of Lystra in Asia Minor wanted to worship the apostle Paul as Hermes, because he was the chief speaker of the group (Acts 14:12).

K.C.

HERMETISM. An outlook or school of mystical religious thought related to the Hermetica, a series of religious and philosophical treatises attributed to Hermes Trismegistus, or Thoth-Hermes, scribe of the gods and god of wisdom. Containing material written by various authors between the second and fourth centuries A.D., the tracts include astrological elements from the Egyptian tradition, interest in secret rites and lore from Persia, and concern with regenerative experience and religious ecstasy from Hellenistic sources. Affinities with Judaism appear in some of the earlier treatises and with Gnosticism in the later ones. Though it was not a movement with cultus and organization, Hermetism had continuing influence in the Middle Ages and during the Renaissance.

C. Mc.

HERMIT. One who retires to a solitary life of asceticism and contemplation. Etymologically, hermit refers to one who lives in the desert, for in the early years of monasticism the Egyptian desert was a favorite place of retreat. In the East, eremitical monasticism still exists, while in the West it disappeared after the sixteenth century.

J. G.

HERMON, MOUNT. The great snow-covered mountain that forms the southern spur of the Anti-Lebanon range and is visible in Galilee and throughout northern Israel. Today it is called Jebel esh-Sheikh. Mount Hermon has three peaks, rising 9,232 feet above sea level. It is the highest mountain in the area of Syria and Israel. Historically, it formed the northern boundary of Hebrew conquest east of the Jordan River. In Judges 3:3, Mount Hermon is called Baal-hermon, showing its use as a center of Baal worship. References to majestic mountains in the Psalms and the Prophets of the OT probably reflect the awe the Israelites felt for Mount Hermon. Since it lies close to Caesarea Philippi, many commentators hold that it is the location of Jesus' transfiguration.

J. C.

HEROD. Readers of the NT may expect to meet no fewer than five people belonging to the generic family name of Herod, a powerful dynasty in Palestinian politics and religion from the middle of the first century B.C. to the end of the first century A.D.

Herod the Great is surnamed "king of the Jews" from 40 B.C. to A.D. 4, though he was only half Jewish. During the Roman occupation of Judea he played a significant role, aided the Romans, and was awarded an honorary title, "king." Never popular, he became obsessed with fear at losing his position and conducted a reign of terror against even his family, whom he regarded as rivals. He contributed much, however, to consolidating Israel through friendship with the Romans and magnificent building programs and expansion of his territory. He is the Herod referred to in Matthew 1 and 2, where the slaughter of the Bethlehem babies is at least "in character" with his morbid fears.

At his death in 4 B.C. the kingdom was divided. One son, Archelaus, known as the ethnarch (Matt. 2:22), but not king, controlled Judea and Samaria (4 B.C.—A.D. 6). His repression of his people led to a revolt that was only averted by his being deposed and exiled, leaving Judea under direct Roman rule.

Herod the tetrarch (Luke 3:1, 19) is known as Antipas. Another son of Herod the Great, he was given Galilee as his domain in 4 B.C. This is the ruler whose role is seen in the imprisonment and death of John the Baptist (Matt. 14:1-12 and pars.), and in his encounter with Jesus, according to Luke 23:7-12. His character may be judged from the description "that fox" (Luke 13:32); yet he was the most capable of all Herod's sons, and built several important cities, for example, Tiberias on Lake Galilee. In A.D. 39 he was denounced to the emperor and banished from his realm.

Herod "the king" (Acts 12:1) carries the subtitle Agrippa; he was a grandson of Herod the Great. Already having been appointed the lands of northeast Palestine, he was awarded Antipas' kingdom in A.D. 39, when the latter was exiled. To these Judea and

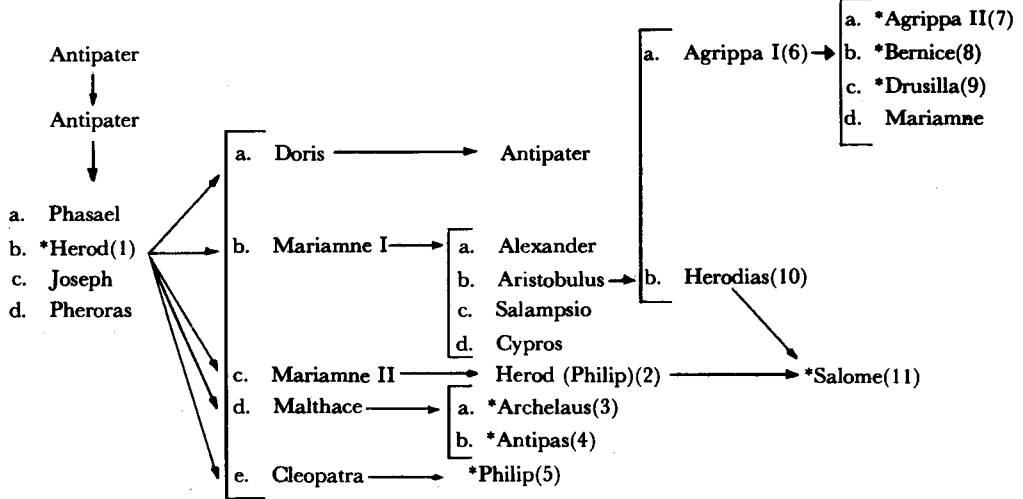

Courtesy of the Museum of Fine Arts, Boston. Edwin L. Jack Fund

Herod

A Partial Genealogy of the Family of Herod

*Mentioned in NT

- (1) Herod had ten wives. Names of two are unknown. Three names, in addition to the five listed, are Pallas, Phaedra, and Elpis. (2) The first husband of Herodias and the father of Salome. Herodias later married Antipas. Salome married her uncle Philip, the son of Herod the Great and Cleopatra. (3) King of Judea. (4) Tetrarch of Galilee. (5) Tetrarch of Ituraea. (6) King of Judea. (7) King of Judea. (8) Mistress of Titus. (9) Wife of Felix. (10) First the wife of (2), then of (4); the mother of (11)

Samaria were added in A.D. 41. Thus he ruled over a wide realm. Acts 12:19-23 dramatically records his horrible death, an account to be supplemented by Josephus. This was in A.D. 44.

His only son, also known as Agrippa, was born in A.D. 27 and succeeded to his father's position in later life, receiving more territorial power at the bequest of Nero in A.D. 56. He was king in Israel during the tempestuous years of A.D. 66 onward, when the Great Jewish rebellion against Rome occurred. He tried to prevent this, and was later rewarded by the Romans, surviving until A.D. 100. His meeting and dialogue with Paul is in Acts 25:13-26:32.

R. M.

HERODIANS. The Herodians are mentioned three times in the Gospels: Mark 3:6; 12:13; Matthew 22:16. There are two separate incidents: (1) toward the beginning of Jesus' ministry, when his powers of healing so alarmed the Pharisees and the Herodians that they joined in laying a plan to destroy him; (2) a joint attempt between these groups to force Jesus to take a public stand on the touchy issue of paying taxes to the Romans. If he recommended paying it, he would be considered a traitor to the cause of Jewish nationalism. If he refused to pay it, he could be reported to the civil authorities as a subversive. Instead he forced his interrogators to determine what is to be rendered to Caesar and what rendered to God (Mark 12:17). The Herodians were not a religious group; they were the supporters of the Herodian rulers, especially of Herod Antipas, who was tetrarch of Galilee from 4 B.C. to A.D. 34. They were presumably secularized people whose jobs or whose personal welfare depended on the continuance of the Herods in power.

H. K.

HERODIAS. The wife of Herod Antipas, tetrarch of Galilee from B.C. to A.D. 39, she was in part responsible for the death of JOHN THE BAPTIST (Mark 6:17; Luke 3:19). She was the daughter of Aristobulus, the son of Herod the Great and Mariamne. Her first husband was her uncle, Herod Philip, son of Herod the Great by another Mariamne. They had a daughter, Salome, though she is not necessarily the daughter mentioned in Mark 6:22. Herodias also urged Herod Antipas to move against her own brother Herod Agrippa I, tetrarch of Batanaea and Trachonitis (Acts 12:1). This effort brought down the wrath of Emperor Caligula, who banished them in A.D. 39.

N. H.

HERODIUM. A conical hill crowned by a palace, about nine miles southeast of Jerusalem. It was fortified by Herod the Great and designated by him as his place of burial. The architectural style was Hellenistic, with colonnades, baths, pools, and porticoes. This grand structure served as administrative center for this section of Judea. Herod apparently designed this enormous artificial cone in conscious imitation of the monumental mausoleum that Augustus had recently built for himself in Rome. Its facilities included pleasure rooms. It not only offered grand vistas across the Judean desert and the Jordan valley to the mountains eastward, but it also included a synagogue. Herod was careful to avoid any pictorial representations of humans or animals, since these would have offended pious Jews, whose laws forbade any "graven images." H.K.

HERODOTUS. Greek historian of the fifth century B.C. whose wide travels and keen observation can be seen in his nine books on History. Although his main theme is the war between Greece and Persia, he had also traveled to Egypt, to the east as far as Babylonia, and to other regions, and his narrative includes data from all those areas. His observations in the field of religion have long been a source for those who seek to reconstruct the beliefs of antiquity. J.G.

HERRNHUT. Meaning "Watch of the Lord," this is a village on Count Nicolaus Ludwig von ZINZENDORF's Saxon estate near Dresden, East Germany, established by refugee Moravian United Brethren in 1722. Zinzendorf, a Lutheran Pietist, became the Moravians' leader in 1727. A. G. Spangenberg in Georgia and Peter Böhler in London greatly influenced the Wesleys. John Wesley visited Herrnhut in 1738. C.M.

HERZL, THEODOR (1860–1904). The Austrian Jewish writer who was the founder of political ZIONISM. Born in Budapest, Herzl studied for the bar in Vienna but practiced journalism as his profession and was successful both as journalist and as playwright. The famous "Dreyfus affair" in Paris, involving a Jewish captain in the French army who was falsely accused of selling military secrets to Germany, created such an anti-Jewish agitation that Herzl was aroused to seek a solution to the plight of the Jewish people. In 1896, he published The Jewish State: An Attempt at a Modern Solution to the Jewish Question. The following year he called into being the first Zionist Congress in Basel, Switzerland. The result of the deliberations was a platform calling for a Jewish national home in Palestine recognized by international law. His campaign to influence European statesmen in behalf of the Zionist cause was unsuccessful, but Herzl persisted. As a result of his visit to Palestine, he wrote Altneuland, a novel depicting a modern Jewish state in the ancient land of Israel. It ended with the words, "If you will it, it is no dream," which became the slogan of political Zionism. Herzl's dream came true posthumously when the State of Israel was proclaimed in 1948.

L.K.

HESCHEL, ABRAHAM JOSHUA (1907–72). Jewish scholar and theologian. Born in Warsaw, Heschel received a thorough Jewish education in Poland. In 1934 he received his doctorate from the University of Berlin for a study on the biblical prophets. Deported by the Nazis in 1938, Heschel came to the United States in 1940 to teach at Hebrew

Courtesy of Lotte Jacobi

Abraham J. Heschel

Union College. He later became professor of ethics and mysticism at the Jewish Theological Seminary in New York. His published works range from studies on the piety of East European Jewry and the inward character of Jewish observance to religious symbolism, Jewish views of humanity, and contemporary moral and political issues. A descendant of two Hasidic dynasties, Heschel drew on both Hasidic tradition and modern existentialism. He described his teaching as "depth theology." Among his published works are Man Is Not Alone (1951), Man's Quest for God (1954), and God in Search of Man (1956). He was respected among American religionists of various faiths not only for his writings but also for his active role in the civil rights and peace movements of the 1960s and in the Judeo-Christian dialogue.

L.K.

HESYCHASM. A form of MYSTICISM prevalent on Mount Athos in the fourteenth century. The term "hesychasm" is derived from the Greek word for "silence," since the hesychasts practiced sitting in silence for long periods. One of the earlier hesychasts, Gregory of Sinai, recommended sitting with the chin resting on the chest, looking at one's navel, and holding one's breath as long as possible, while repeating "Lord Jesus Christ, have mercy on me." This drew the ridicule of some who also supported closer ties with the Western church, and therefore the controversy over hesychasm soon became also a controversy over relations with the West. Gregory Palamas, one of the foremost Byzantine theologians of the time, came to the support of hesychasm—although not of its more extreme practices—and in 1351 a council declared itself in favor of hesychasm as an approved method of contemplation and condemned those who had ridiculed it. J.G.

HETERONOMY. From the Greek words hetero (other or different) and nomos (law), meaning "subjection to external authority or law." Heteronomy is opposed to AUTONOMY, the condition of being self-governing. In the thought of Immanuel Kant (1724–1804), heteronomy refers to the limitations imposed on humanity by nature in the form of passions and desires as opposed to the autonomy of humans governed by reason. Paul Tillich (1886–1965) contrasts heteronomy as the imposition of alien laws on the human mind with THEONOMY, which provides a solution to the problems presented by human autonomy and fulfills human life with religious substance and ultimate meaning. C.Mc.

HEXAPLA. A compilation made by Origen (A.D. 185–253) of the Hebrew text of the OT and five Greek translations in order to promote the study of the Bible. It is in six columns. Composed about A.D. 240, it contains a transliteration in Greek and the translations of Aquila, Symmachus, the Septuagint (LXX), and Theodotion. J.C.

HEZEKIAH. The Hebrew name meaning "Yahweh [is] my strength."

(1) King of Judah (about 715–687 B.C.), who succeeded his father, AHAZ, to the throne (II Kings 18:2; II Chr. 29:1). In II Kings 18, the Deuteronomist lavishly praises this able monarch for his nationalistic bent in foreign policy and impressive religious reform, which advocated the centralized worship of Yahweh in Jerusalem (vv. 3, 5–6). He was the antithesis of his anxious father, Ahaz, who was a submissive, tribute-paying vassal of Assyria.

Hezekiah's Religious Reform. Judah's loyal Yahwists found Ahaz's syncretic policies intolerable. If heavy taxation designed to raise ample Assyrian tribute struck them as odious, so did Ahaz's willingness to install an Assyrian altar in the Jerusalem Temple (II Kings 16:10–18). Early in Hezekiah's reign, Judah's response to the Assyrian yoke became more restive. Perhaps under Hezekiah's lead, ancient covenant traditions, once maintained at the northern sanctuaries, were transferred to Jerusalem and became the basis of the king's reform program.

In any event, Hezekiah instituted a thorough cultic reform (II Kings 18:3–6; II Chr. 29–31). Presumably spanning many years, the reform likely began circumspectly and gained momentum after it appeared that Assyria was in no position to interfere. Hezekiah destroyed the paganizing high places, which hitherto had enjoyed Ahaz's patronage. Moreover, Hezekiah shattered the bronze snake image (Nehushtan), a popular cult object allegedly fashioned by Moses, which rested in the Jerusalem Temple (II Kings 18:4). Given Hezekiah's resolve to purge Judah's worship of any foreign dross, his reform ultimately must have involved a repudiation of the Assyrian gods, which implied outright rejection of his vassal status.

According to the Chronicler, Hezekiah cleansed the Temple of its idolatrous cult paraphernalia (II Chr. 29:3–17), rededicated the venerable edifice with requisite offerings (29:18–30), and sponsored a Passover observance to which he invited pilgrims from the defunct northern state of Israel (30:1–27). Apparently, Hezekiah's hopes included the reunification of northern and southern Israel, which again would find in the Davidic throne and Jerusalem Temple its religio-political nucleus. Though Hezekiah evoked a favorable response from some inhabitants of the Galilean region and Manasseh, he was rebuffed by Ephraim. This reaction undoubtedly reflected sectional jealousies and a lack of nerve to abandon the sanctuary of Bethel, which had been reestablished by the Assyrians to rival Jerusalem (II Kings 17:27–28). Hezekiah's dream of a united Israel went unrealized, and the local shrines were only temporarily closed. Nevertheless, Hezekiah's reform made a difference. Indeed, with its defense of the ancestral Israelite faith, it must have improved the health of Judean society by appreciably reducing the economic exploitation against which Hezekiah's prophetic contemporary, Micah, railed (Jer. 26:16–19; Mic. 3:12).

Hezekiah's Political Activity. Signs of Assyrian weakness and Egyptian resurgence significantly shaped international relations during Hezekiah's tenure. Early in his Assyrian reign, SARGON II (721–705) failed to suppress a Babylonian rebellion headed by the Chaldean prince, Marduk-apaliddina ("Merodach-baladan" of II Kings 20:12). Campaigns that kept Sargon busy for a decade there and elsewhere offered Palestine needful respite from Assyrian intrusion. Also, under an emerging Twenty-fifth (Ethiopian) Dynasty, Egypt consolidated its power and sought anew to influence affairs in western Asia. When the Philistine city of Ashdod rebelled against Assyria in about 714, help was sought from Egypt and Judah. Though Egyptian envoys visited Hezekiah to enlist his cooperation in this rapidly expanding conspiracy, he apparently took seriously Isaiah's stern warning to remain aloof (Isa. 20). It was an astute move, for Egyptian assistance disintegrated, and by 712 Sargon crushed the rebellion and transformed Ashdod into an Assyrian province. Judah, however, was left undisturbed.

Sargon's death in 705 and the accession of his son, SENNACHERIB (704–681), afforded Assyria's enemies fresh opportunities to conspire. Marduk-apaliddina reestablished himself as king over Babylonia and for several years resisted Assyria's efforts to overthrow him. When he sent envoys to enlist Judah's participation, they were graciously received by Hezekiah, who showed them his Jerusalem armory (II Kings 20:12-19). Moreover, Hezekiah joined rulers of several Phoenician and Philistine cities in withholding tribute (18:7). Then, impressed with the vigorous Ethiopian king, Shabako, Hezekiah negotiated a treaty with Egypt, which evoked Isaiah's censure (Isa. 30:1-7; 31:1-3). That Hezekiah was a leader in the anti-Assyrian rebellion is clear from Sennacherib's own record that Hezekiah consented to the Jerusalem imprisonment of King Padi of Ekron, one of Assyria's few remaining western friends. Realizing that a showdown with Assyria was inevitable, Hezekiah soon repaired Jerusalem's walls and enlisted his engineers in cutting the impressive 1750-foot Siloam tunnel underneath the hill of Jerusalem so that water from the Gihon spring might flow directly into the city (II Kings 20:20; II Chr. 32:30).

Having regained control over Babylonia in 701, Sennacherib advanced westward. Though some historians argue that Sennacherib conducted two separate invasions of Judah (the second in about 688), a second invasion is neither readily discernible in the relevant, but confusing, biblical text (II Kings 18:13-19:37) nor attested in Assyrian records. Therefore the following reconstruction is plausible.

Sennacherib met little resistance as he strode through Syria and Phoenicia. He took the Philistine cities of Ashkelon and Ekron, defeated a large Egyptian army allied with Ekron, and overran Judah. According to his annals, Sennacherib seized forty-six of Hezekiah's fortified cities, and by cutting off Jerusalem from all outside assistance, he confined Hezekiah inside his royal city "like a caged bird." While Sennacherib was still leveling Lachish, Hezekiah dispatched a message of surrender (II Kings 18:14a). Sennacherib's demands were high. He ordered Hezekiah to render such enormous tribute that he had to relieve the Temple of its gold and silver, and surrender his royal treasures (18:14b-16). Jerusalem, however, was spared. Sennacherib's sudden withdrawal from Judah may be understood as his response either to a devastating epidemic that crippled his army (II Kings 19:35), or, more likely, to a "rumor" that reached him and required his attention elsewhere—undoubtedly renewed rebellion in Babylonia (19:7). Hezekiah's bid for Judah's independence had failed, and his son, Manasseh, who succeeded him in 687, did not challenge Assyria on the matter of Judah's vassalage.

(2) An ancestor of the prophet Zephaniah (Zeph. 1:1).

(3) A member of the royal family of Judah (I Chr. 3:23).

(4) A man who, together with his descendants, returned with Nehemiah from the Babylonian exile and later subscribed to the covenant (Ezra 2:16; Neh. 7:21; 10:17). J.K.K.

HIERAPOLIS. A city in Phrygia, near Colossae and Laodicea, on the Lycus River. It is mentioned in Colossians 4:13, but is not said to have been visited by Paul. Hierapolis was early converted to Christianity and by the fourth century had four churches and was recognized as a Christian center. J.C.

HIGH CHURCH. The party within the Anglican Church that emphasizes the Catholicity of the Church of England, and so sometimes is referred to as the ANGLO-CATHOLIC party. The name originated in the seventeenth century to designate those people who stressed the continuity of the Church of England with the undivided Catholic church, before the Reformation, and interpreted the sacraments in a way conformable to Catholicism.

The High Church movement represents a theological school of thought and never became a separate church. Typically, it means elaborate ceremonies. The tendency to exhibit LOW CHURCH, BROAD CHURCH, and High Church opinions within one communion is characteristic of the worldwide Anglican Communion, including The Episcopal Church in the United States. Among Episcopalians, High Church people are sometimes called "Spikes" as opposed to Low Church people or "Prots" (Protestants). Historically, the High Church movement often took political positions, especially promoting the concept of the divine right of kings. J.C.

HIGHER CRITICISM. See BIBLICAL CRITICISM.

HIGH MASS. The pre-Vatican II tridentine mass of the Roman rite, known in Latin as the Missa Cantata, "the chanted mass." It is sung by one priest accompanied by a chanter and choir along with the congregation. Since it is more elaborate than some other ("low") masses it became known as "High Mass." It is celebrated on Sundays, holy days, and on other occasions. The Low Mass is recited, and the solemn mass is assisted by a deacon and subdeacon, thus distinguishing them from High Mass. Since solemn masses are celebrated on festivals, the High Mass became the usual form of service for the parish priest. Originally, High Mass was derived from the pontifical mass, which bishops celebrated with the lower clergy and parishioners. Since Vatican Council II's revisions of the Roman liturgy and the offering of the Mass in the vernacular, distinctions between masses no longer apply. J.C.

HIGH PLACES. Open-aired and roofed sanctuaries established by the Canaanites, which the Israelites regarded as both abhorrent and attractive after their settlement in Palestine.

Herbert G. May

Canaanite high place at Gezer with cult pillars (Micah 5:13)

Though a high place (Hebrew bāmā) might well consist of a hilltop shrine, it could also be situated in a valley (Jer. 7:31), within a town (I Kings 13:32), or at a city gate (II Kings 23:8). "High place" basically denotes a natural or artificially constructed elevation for cultic use. Equipped with round rock altars, unhewn stone pillars, and wooden poles, high places invited worshipers to engage in diverse activity. Here they ate (I Sam. 9:13), wept (Isa. 15:2), prayed (Isa. 16:12), burnt incense, and offered sacrifice (I Kings 11:8).

The biblical portrayal of high places is often pejorative. Yahweh commands their destruction as the Israelites overtake Canaan (Num. 33:52). Faithless Israelites who frequent Canaanite high places and erect some of their own incur God's wrath (Ps. 78:58). Because Deuteronomic legislation advocated the pure worship of Yahweh at a centralized sanctuary (Deut. 12), the attitude of specific Israelite and Judean kings toward high places determines their final assessment. Solomon is criticized for installing high places to support the worship practices of his foreign wives (I Kings 11:6-8). Conversely, the war that Asa (II Chr. 14:3, 5), Hezekiah (II Kings 18:4), and Josiah (II Kings 23:8) waged against high places is favorably viewed. Manasseh is condemned for rebuilding previously destroyed high places (II Kings 21:3), and a complaint is lodged against six Judean kings for failing to remove them—Asa (I Kings 15:14), Jehoshaphat (I Kings 22:43), Jehoash (II Kings 12:3), Amaziah (II Kings 14:4), Azariah/Uzziah (II Kings 15:4), and Jotham (II Kings 15:35).

Nevertheless, some prophets (I Sam. 10:5-13) and priests (II Kings 17:32) function at high places without censure. Moreover, the priestly tabernacle (I Chr. 16:39) and tent of meeting (II Chr. 1:3) are positively associated with Gibeon's high place, as is Solomon, who goes there to petition Yahweh for regal wisdom (I Kings 3:4-15). Since such public and private devotion transpired prior to the establishment of the Jerusalem Temple on Mount Zion, its legitimacy was unquestioned. As Zion-centered worship of Yahweh intensified, idolatrous practices at high places received a crescendo of criticism (Ezek. 6:3, 6). Cultic installations at Megiddo, Gezer, and Dan, dating respectively to about 2700, 1600, and 920 B.C., are the most outstanding high places thus far excavated in Palestine.

J.K.K.

HIGH PRIEST. The head of the priestly hierarchy whose origins trace from Eleasar, the son of Aaron (Num. 3:32; 25:11-13). As Israel's supreme spiritual leader, he is aptly described in the Holiness Code as "chief among his brethren" (Lev. 21:10). Since the designation "great priest" (that is, high priest) is used sparingly in both preexilic and postexilic biblical texts, the development of the office cannot be readily traced. That the investiture and duties of the high priest are only clearly delineated within postexilic texts constitutes no denial that the high priesthood was a well-established institution several centuries earlier.

Centrality in Postexilic Israel. Following the sixth-century B.C. return of the exiles from Babylon, the reconstituted Judean community was no longer a monarchy. Rather, it became a hierocracy, with much of the king's dignity transferred to the high priest. According to the early postexilic writings of Haggai and Zechariah, the rule of the restored Jewish community was shared equally by Zerubbabel, the governor, and Joshua, the high priest (Hag. 1:1, 12, 14; 2:2, 4). The rebuilding of the Temple progressed under their joint leadership (Ezra 3:1-13), and these "two anointed" (Zech. 4:14) were expected to cultivate a relationship of "peaceful understanding" (Zech. 6:13). Concerning Temple affairs, however, authority resided in the high priest (Zech. 3:6-7).

With the disappearance of the office of governor, the high priest assumed civic as well as religious responsibilities. The dignity of the expanded office is evident in the eulogy on Simon II (about 218-192 B.C.) offered in Ecclesiasticus 50:1-24. During the second century B.C., the high priest presided over the "senate" (I Macc. 12:6; II Macc. 4:44) from which the Sanhedrin evolved (Mark 14:55). Two unprincipled individuals greatly discredited the high priesthood. In 175 B.C., Jason bribed the Seleucid ruler, Antiochus Epiphanes, into deposing Onias so that he might grab the office (II Macc. 4:7-10). Three years later, Jason was supplanted by Menelaus, who resorted to both bribery and murder (4:23-26, 33-35). The Maccabees returned the high priesthood to its former dignity, and the Hasmonean dynasty of high priests (142-63 B.C.) procured for Judea a brief interval of independence.

Investiture and Vestments. Priestly legislation presents the consecration into the high priesthood as a three-stage ritual (Exod. 29:4-7; Lev. 8:6-12). It involved ceremonial washing, putting on official vestments, and anointing with oil. The instructive account of the consecration of the first postexilic high priest, Joshua, mentions no anointing (Zech. 3:1-9). Perhaps this practice was introduced into the investiture ceremony shortly thereafter.

In Joshua's office, the high priest wore distinctive vestments (Exod. 28:4-39; 39:1-31; Lev. 8:7-9). These included (a) a long blue robe with alternating pomegranates and golden bells affixed to its hem; (b) a colorful, gold-threaded EPHOD, with each of its two shoulder straps carrying an onyx stone bearing the engraved names of six tribes; (c) a pouched breastpiece, made of material identical with the ephod, which was set with four rows of three precious stones each, with the names of the twelve tribes inscribed thereon, and serving as a receptacle for the sacred dice URIM AND THUMMIM; and (d) a linen turban to which was fastened a golden plate bearing the inscription "Holy to Yahweh." These ceremonial vestments highlighted the mediatory function of the high priesthood. Their luxurious quality denoted God's glory, and the twofold inscription of tribal names ensured that all Israel would be represented by the high priest in the sanctuary. On the DAY OF ATONEMENT, however, the high priest set aside these vestments and entered the Holy of Holies wearing simple linen garments (Lev. 16:4, 23).

Duties. The high priest was the chief administrator of the sanctuary, its cultic service and treasure (II Kings 12:7-8; 22:4-6). He consulted the Deity by manipulating the Urim and Thummim (Num. 27:21). He presided over the Sanhedrin as it addressed religious issues (Mart. 26:57; Acts 5:21). The most crucial function of the high priest was to enter the Holy of Holies on the annual Day of Atonement to expiate the people's sin by sprinkling blood on the mercy seat (Lev. 16:14-15). (Compare also LEVITES.)
J.K.K.

HIJRA. Also spelled Hegira, this is the term used for the migration of MUHAMMAD from MECCA to MEDINA in A.D. 622, the first year of the Muslim era. In European languages the years of that era are identified by the initials A.H. (anno hegirae).

By 620 the Prophet had met with considerable opposition in Mecca. That year a group of six pilgrims from Medina came to Mecca and became convinced that Muhammad could help them solve the problems they faced in their home city. Muhammad saw Medina as a haven for his followers and a secure base for the expansion of Islam. Two years later arrangements had been completed and Muhammad quietly sent most of his followers ahead. He and his close friend Abu Bakr slipped out of the city and remained hidden nearby until they had thrown their Meccan enemies off their track.

Medina lay 250 miles to the north. Traveling on camel back by devious and unfrequented routes, Muhammad and Abu Bakr arrived safely at the oasis town of Medina on September 24. A new period in the prophet's career had begun.
K.C.

HILARY OF POITIERS. A convert to Christianity from Neoplatonism who became bishop of Poitiers in the mid-fourth century. During the Arian controversy he was the foremost Western theologian in the defense of the faith of Nicaea. Like many others, he was exiled by Emperor Constantius, who sought to impose Arianism. His main work is On the Trinity, in twelve books. He was also influential as the teacher of Martin of Tours.
J.G.

HILDEGARD. A German abbess of the twelfth century, noted for her mysticism, and admired by many of her contemporaries, including several crowned heads. Her main work is Scivias, in which she recorded twenty-six mystical experiences and spoke of great evils to come. But she also wrote on theology, commenting on the Gospels, the Athanasian Creed, and the Rule of St. Benedict. To a degree unusual in her time, she was a keen observer of nature and wrote on medicine, zoology, and other similar subjects.

J.G.

HILLEL. Jewish spiritual leader and scholar of the latter part of the first century B.C. and the beginning of the first century A.D. Born in Babylonia, Hillel went to Palestine when he was forty and enrolled in an academy of learning. Because of his brilliant scholarship, he was appointed president of the SANHEDRIN (high court). He established his own academy, the House of Hillel, which became known for its liberal interpretation of the laws of the Torah. One of the legal reforms he introduced kept private debts alive, even though the Torah canceled them at the end of each six-year period. Hillel's reform allowed the poor to borrow money since the lender was guaranteed full payment even after the sabbatical year.

Hillel was known for his extreme patience. When a skeptic asked him to teach him the Torah while he stood on one foot, Hillel replied: "What is hateful to you, do not unto others. That is the whole Torah. All the rest is commentary. Go and learn."

L.K.

HILTNER, SEWARD (1909–84). An early leader in pastoral psychology, Hiltner was born November 26, 1909. He received his A.B. from Lafayette College (1931), his Ph.D. from the University of Chicago (1952), and was ordained by the United Presbyterian Church in 1935.

After serving as executive secretary of the Council for Clinical Training in New York City (1935–38) and the Federal Council of Churches' department of pastoral services (1938–50), he began to lecture at Union and Yale (1945–50). From 1950 to 1961 he was professor of pastoral psychology at the University of Chicago. From 1961 to 1980 he was professor of theology and personality at Princeton Theological Seminary. Hiltner is the author of many books, including Religion and Health (1943), Pastoral Counseling (1949), Sex and the Christian Life (1957), Preface to Pastoral Theology (1958), The Christian Shepherd (1959), Ferment in the Ministry (1970), Theological Dynamics (1972), and Toward a Theology of Aging (1976).

N.H.

HINAYANA BUDDHISM. See BUDDHISM.

HINDUISM. General Features. The word Hindu is a variant of "India"; hence, Hinduism simply means "India-ism"—the religion and culture of India. It is thus a very broad term, embracing all those beliefs and practices of various peoples of the Indian subcontinent who are not self-assigned to religious traditions other than the mainstream: ISLAM, BUDDHISM, JAINISM, SIKHISM, PARSISM, Christianity, or JUDAISM. Hinduism thus includes an immense gamut of religiosity, from the folkways of simple villagers to highly sophisticated metaphysical systems, from the lavish festivals of popular temples to the yogic meditations of ascetic recluses.

However, Hinduism is not merely a catch-all concept; despite its diversity, some common features run through it. First, all Hindus would accept, at least implicitly, the authority of the VEDIC scriptures and of the priestly caste known as Brahmins. Second, most Hindus would see themselves as part of a social order in which the caste system has had a major structural role and would know what their caste background is, even though many would now reject its conventions as binding. Third, most Hindus would acknowledge that the worship and the mythology of such great deities as VISHNU, KRISHNA, SHIVA, and KALI are part of their spiritual world; however, they interpret the meanings of these deities themselves. Finally, most thoughtful Hindus would see religion as presenting two paths: a way of life in this world and a way to liberation from this world through realization of union with the divine.

These last two levels can be thought of as DHARMA, the form or order of this world, including the social order and one's obligations within it; and MOKSHA, liberation, the ultimate goal of life. Philosophical Hindus tend to see God or the Absolute, often called BRAHMAN but also identifiable with one of the great gods, as the sole Reality underlying all other things, and so actually found in dharma as much as in moksha. But moksha is its full internalization, the goal of true spiritual seekers. It is reached in several ways. Modern sources talk particularly of three, drawn from the ancient BHAGAVAD GITA: jnana-yoga, intellectual and meditative insight into the true nature of reality; karma-yoga, selfless service and doing of duty within the dharma of the social order; and BHAKTI, love and devotion toward the gods as manifestations of the universal divine Reality.

History. The roots of the Hindu tree reach back to two disparate cultural strata: the indigenous civilization that found its climax in the ancient territories of the Indus Valley, and the culture of the Aryans or Indo-Europeans who invaded India between 2,000 and 1,000 B.C. The Indus Valley civilization, an agricultural people who built great urban centers, is thought by many scholars to have stressed fertility cults, yoga, mother goddesses, and water. These are all features that have found their way into developed Hinduism. The Indo-Europeans, on the other hand, brought in such formal structural features as the brahmin priesthood and its fire sacrifices, and above all the Vedic scriptures. The Vedas (not actually committed to writing until fairly recently, but transmitted orally and memorized) contain hymns, often of considerable poetic power, chanted by brahmins in their rituals; ritual instructions; and in the last and most philosophic portion, the UPANISHADS, a metaphysical discourse culminating in the realization that the ATMAN, one's innermost nature, is one with Brahman, the universal Reality.

The rise of Buddhism and Jainism after the fifth century B.C. spurred development within the Vedic tradition as it became what is now known as Hinduism. The new spiritual paths taught by the Buddha and MAHAVIRA emphasized wisdom and meditation over Vedic or Brahminical authority. These teachings undermined the caste system and soon embraced temple devotion to enlightened beings. Hinduism responded in such texts, usually dated between 200 B.C. and A.D. 200, as the Bhagavad Gita, inculcating devotion to God and the ideal of karma-yoga; the LAWS OF MANU, which offers a rationale of the caste system, and a life devoted first to the ideal of dharma or righteousness as a householder, then to moksha as a renunciant seeker; and the Yoga SUTRA of Patanjali (dated later than A.D. 200 in their final form by some), providing a philosophy and guide for the practice of yoga leading to liberation. Yoga combines physical and mental techniques for stilling movements of the mind to allow the true self, purusha or atman, to shine through. Yoga has been associated with Hinduism in some form for millennia.

The early centuries A.D. saw the rise of bhakti or devotionalism. Texts called PURANAS extolled the lives and merits of deities introduced, or considerably modified, from non-Vedic sources, just as Hinduism incorporated more and more of spiritual India into a broad synthesis. Bhakti theoreticians advocated devotion as not only a means to divine boons, but also as a way to salvation through the selfless love of unstinting faith and fervent, uncalculating piety. Bhakti movements, colorful and easily accessible to the simple as well as the learned, quickly won mass support as well as brahminical endorsement and aristocratic patronage, overshadowing Buddhism, Jainism, and more conservative forms of Hinduism. They did much to preserve India for that faith.

Other movements were also influential. Advaita (nondualist) VEDANTA philosophy, founded by the great Shankara (about A.D. 788–820) emphasized the late Vedic (that is, Vedanta) Upanishadic teaching that Brahman is the sole Reality. It sees the gods benignly but relativistically as manifestations or accommodations of the ineffable one, in whom the world of Maya or phenomena rises and falls like waves on an infinite sea. The movement known as TANTRISM, which also has a Buddhist wing, originated in more or less "underground" spiritual circles to practice a "short path" to power and liberation through radical initiations, use of mantras, visualization, and sexual yogas. It was often antinomian.

After the twelfth century, Islamic religious influence, following Muslim invaders, was potent in north India. Over the subsequent centuries some 20 percent of the subcontinent's population became Muslim, a segment now largely concentrated in Pakistan and Bangladesh, though also represented by a minority of about 10 percent in the Republic of India. Hinduism itself was affected by the Islamic presence in two basic ways. First, the rigorous conservatism on social and religious matters, which characterized the Hindu world until quite recently, was really an understandable counterpoint to rule by non-Hindu conquerors, first Muslim and then British. As elsewhere in the world, people of one faith subjugated by overlords of another clung to their religion all the more tenaciously, as one remaining realm of separate dignity and identity. Second, other people have been challenged by the presence of two faiths to go beyond them both, seeking a truth transcendent to all institutional forms of expression. This was the burden of the poet Kabir (1440–1518), who sang of a God neither in the mosque nor the Hindu image, but rather found within the heart and breath of all. That vision of a God greater than in the existing faiths was also proclaimed by NANAK (1470–1540), founder of the Sikh religion.

UNIVERSALISM, combined paradoxically but creatively with Indian nationalism, has been a dominant theme of modern Hinduism. As India in the nineteenth and twentieth centuries has had to deal with full-scale encounters with the West, it has, as in the earlier encounter with Islam, taken many turns. Ram Mohun Roy (1772–1833), perhaps the first modern Hindu intellectual, founded the Brahmo Samaj as a reform movement based on a universal ethical monotheism uniting all religions. Swami Dayananda (1824–83), on the other hand, through his Arya Samaj, urged his countrymen to go back to the Vedas and in the process to reform numerous abuses and corruptions he perceived in later Hinduism. The Theosophical Society, brought to India a few years after its founding in New York in 1875, encouraged the confidence of Hindus in the worth and world value of their own tradition.

But the most influential strand of modern Hinduism has been Neo-Vedanta, associated with the Hindu Renaissance of the late nineteenth century and especially with the teachings of the mystic RAMAKRISHNA (1834–86) and the Ramakrishna Mission, an educational and service monastic order, founded by his disciple Swami Vivekananda (1863–1902). Its basic premise has been Shankara's Advaita Vedanta, augmented by a modern emphasis on viewing all religions as alternative paths to the mountaintop of seeing Brahma/God as the Sole Reality. The Ramakrishna Mission's centers in Europe and America, often called Vedanta Societies, have been quite influential in disseminating the Hindu classics and this philosophical perspective. Numerous other modern Hindu spiritual leaders, from the yogin Swami Sivananda (1887–1963) to the advaitin mystic Ramana Maharshi (1879–1951), and the academic philosopher and president of India SARVEPALLI RADHAKRISHNAN (1888–1975), have taught essentially the same message.

The Hindu Renaissance went hand in hand with rising Indian nationalism. While it affirmed a generous spiritual universalism, it also projected India and Hinduism as a particularly clear reservoir of the timeless wisdom underlying it, and so promoted pride on the part of Indians in their heritage.

It was the work of the great MOHANDAS K. GANDHI (1869–1948), leader of the independence movement and apostle of nonviolence, to draw from that heritage both ideals and a practical program for achieving independence. Combining the yogic and Jain ideal of ahimsa, harmlessness, with the Bhagavad Gita's karma yoga, and inspired also by such Western writers as THOREAU, Ruskin, and TOLSTOY, Gandhi made nonviolent resistance and principled civil disobedience highly effective tools for political change.

Intellectual Expression of Hinduism. Hinduism, like all religions, is expressed conceptually through both philosophy and myth. We have already spoken of Shankara's Advaita Vedanta, considered the best-known school of Hindu philosophy. But just as important in Hindu religious life is the modified non-dualism (Visista Advaita) of Ramanuja (about 1017–60), which endeavored to bring together Advaita and the bhakti experience. According to Ramanuja, the universe is not simply Maya, as "God in disguise," but bears a relation to God like that of the body to the head. While the universe is sustained by divine energy, and selves possess divinely derived immortality, God is a loving, personal deity distinguishable from universe and having the ability to receive the ardent devotional love bhakti loves to bestow.

Another kind of Hindu intellectual expression is through its deities and their mythology. Although at first glance a baffling array, the great gods of devotionism can be comprehended through understanding their relationships. They each belong to one of two great families, the Vishnu (or Vaishnava) and the Shiva (or Saiva). Vishnu, the chief deity of his family, can be thought of as something like the God of Christianity, a personal, loving deity who, when righteousness declines, takes AVATAR or "incarnate" (literally, "descent") form in the world to defeat the forces of evil. His wife is Lakshmi, or Sri, goddess of fortune, wealth, and prosperity; he often has a second consort also, Bhudevi, the earth. The creator-god Brahma is associated with Vishnu; according to myth he appears on a lotus growing from Vishnu's navel when the world is to be constructed anew. His consort is Sarasvati, the popular goddess of culture and wisdom. Vishnu's most popular avatar forms are Rama, the hero of the great epic the RAMAYANA, whose consort is Sita; and Krishna, accompanied by Radha. Krishna is beloved in his various forms as divine infant, young lover of Radha and other of the gopis—his milkmaid-devotees; as hero; and as sage of the Bhagavad Gita. Some Krishnaites make Krishna himself the supreme lord, and Krishna is the most popular of all objects of bhakti. Another favorite Vaishnava figure is the monkey-god Hanuman, prominent in the Ramayana.

Shiva, more than Vishnu, simply represents the totality of all things, the oneness and power that lies beyond all dualities. Shiva's representations include the lingam, the quasi-phallic pillar suggesting the life-force; the nataraja or "Lord of the Dance," whose movements dance out the universe; the Mahayogin, or great yogi, whose meditations sustain the world, and who is also the great teacher of ineffable wisdom, youthful but surrounded by disciples. Shiva is the universal Absolute. His consort is the Great Goddess who represents the phenomenal world, also eternal but eternally changing. She is his shakti or power, and has many forms ranging from the beautiful to the horrible: as Parvati, the lovely maiden; Durga, the dragon-slaying woman warrior; and Kali, the dark, blood-drinking terrible mother, receiving sacrifices of male goats, but in an ultimate sense benign, embodying the universe's awesome cycle of birth and destruction. Also associated with Saivism are two sons of Siva known, among variant names, as Ganesha, the elephant-headed god of fortune and remover of obstacles; and Skanda, a warrior seen also as personification of Siva as teacher.

Hindu Worship. For most traditionally devout Hindus, the most significant place of worship is not the temple but the home. In such homes, the family priest or head of household arises early and, opening the small family shrine, honors the image of its deity with chants, bathing, and simple offerings, including food which will be consumed by the family during the day. A very pious worshiper will also put the marks of the deity on the forehead.

Temple worship, though popular, has a more optional character. The sanctuary of a temple is essentially seen as the throne room of a deity, and its procedures are like those of a royal court, the priests being servants and the worshipers petitioners. Although festivals and major ceremonies are held, a worshiper generally approaches the temple as an individual, buying and presenting an offering such as flowers, or a coconut, with the help of a priest. Yet the great temples are also splendid repositories of Hindu art and symbols and centers of community identity and celebration.

Pilgrimage is very important in Hinduism. Certain temples and sites draw millions from all over India, above all the holy city of Varanasi (Benares) on the banks of the sacred Ganges River, in whose waters believers purify themselves.

Yoga exercises combining physical posture, breath control, and meditation, are practiced by numerous Hindus (as well as non-Hindus), religious specialists, and lay people alike. The use of MANTRAS, sacred words of power repeated less for meaning than for the spiritual effect they impart, is widespread in both ritual and meditational settings. Emerging from Vedic and SANSKRIT origin, the store of mantra has come to include phrases from sectarian, Tantric, and other sources.

Hindu Sociology. Hinduism as actually experienced in India is bound up with the sociology of the Hindu community. The way it is known and practiced by any individual is heavily influenced by that person's sex, family, and caste background, as well as by geographical region.

In traditional India, and to no small extent today, family and caste go together. The traditional caste system is basically a matter not of occupation but of purity and is expressed most definitively in who can eat with or prepare food for whom, though it also involves marriage and occupation, since marriages have to be at proper levels of purity and some occupations are much purer than others. Higher castes are vegetarian and avoid work involving products of human or animal bodies. The highest are BRAHMINS, ideally priests, scholars, and religious specialists (though most are not such professionally), who alone perform the most sacred Vedic rites. The caste system has been justified on the basis of classic Hinduism's organic, dharma view of society, but today is weakening, and is under political attack in modern India, while only the most ultraconservative religious spokespersons defend its traditional form.

A significant class within Hinduism is the sadhus, or "holy men." These are persons who, renouncing worldly goods and the privileges and responsibilities of family and caste, seek to realize and exemplify moksha. A sadhu may live as a hermit, a wanderer, or follow a semi-monastic life in an ashram or spiritual community, whether as master or disciple. A sadhu is usually recognizable by distinctive garb and symbols, though these may vary. Generally beginning his religious career as the disciple of an established sadhu who serves as his GURU or teacher and initiator, he may in time be authorized by the latter to become a guru himself, and receive both religious and lay disciples. Sadhus manifest an immensely important dimension of the Hindu religion, for they keep continually alive its vision of the divine within all and the possibility of now realizing it, through renunciation of all that is less than God. R.E.

HIPPOLYTUS. Third-century theologian and priest in Rome. He clashed with Bishop Zephyrinus and his successors over the doctrine of the Trinity and over the tendency of the bishops of Rome to be more lenient toward those who had sinned than Hippolytus thought proper. His view of the Logos, developed against the Patripassian doctrines of Noetus, tended toward subordinationism. He also refused to call the Holy Spirit a person. Eventually he broke with Bishop Callistus and took the title of bishop. Some ancient authorities assert that he and Pontianus—his rival bishop at the time—were reconciled while both were exiled in Sardinia. Later the bodies of the two rivals were returned to Rome, and Hippolytus was considered a martyr. His most important works are Refutation of All Heresies, Against Noetus, and the Apostolic Tradition. The latter is particularly significant as a source for our knowledge of early Christian worship. J.G.

HIRAM. The king of Tyre, a city-state in Phoenicia, the coastal settlements made by the "sea peoples," who probably originated in Cyprus. Hiram ruled Tyre from approximately 970 to 935 B.C. He was famed for his magnificent buildings in Tyre and for his great merchant navy and overseas commerce. Hiram was a faithful friend to both David and Solomon. Indeed, he literally built Solomon's Temple of Yahweh in Jerusalem, since he furnished the craftsmen and the cedar wood ("the cedars of Lebanon") essential to its construction. In payment, Solomon furnished Hiram with wheat and oil and also ceded a small district of Israel to him. Hiram assisted Solomon in building a merchant marine for Israel, and Solomon's sailors sailed with Hiram's on their journeys to the Middle East and Africa (to "Ophir"). The Jewish Midrash declares that Hiram began as a pious man, but his many successful ventures caused him to become filled with pride. He then built an artificial "heaven," and for this presumptuousness he was given defeat and death by God. J.C.

HISTORICAL CRITICISM. See BIBLICAL CRITICISM.

HISTORICISM. In its variety of usages, historicism represents the conviction that human experience cannot be understood or evaluated apart from the particular social, historical context of development and change in which it appears.

In the nineteenth century, the term historicism was used to depreciate theories of society dependent upon historical knowledge. Wilhelm Dilthey, Heinrich Rickert, and others, developed the distinction between natural sciences and historical sciences, the latter appropriate for human, societal phenomena, the former for the study of nature. Ernst Troeltsch (1865–1923), convinced that skepticism resulted from viewing knowledge and experience as subject to change, spoke of the crisis of historicism, which can be overcome only through historical involvement, not by resort to transhistorical perspectives. Josiah Royce (1855–1916), as he modified his early idealism, developed a social theory of reality with a changing community of interpretation moving toward universal community, a view contributing much to historicist perspectives. Karl Mannheim (1893–1947), asserting that static epistemologies are outdated, founded the sociology of knowledge, which viewed all knowledge as inescapably related to particular socio-historical contexts.

Michael Polanyi (1891–1976) and H. Richard Niebuhr (1894–1962) give historicism its most significant contemporary statements. Polanyi, moving toward a post-critical philosophy, demonstrates that the natural sciences, no less than the humanities, have tacit, fiduciary dimensions rooted in social and cultural contexts. Niebuhr affirms that humans must conceive all things as temporal and historical, not in terms of abstract time, but rather in terms of time that is "particular and concrete . . . the time of a definite society with distinct language, economic and political relations, religious faith and social organization" (The Meaning of Revelation). C. Mc.

HISTORICITY OF THE BIBLE. This title raises questions of wide-ranging concern and ongoing debate among biblical scholars, both Jewish and Christian. Indeed, students of the ancient Near East and Greco-Roman society have contributed to the discussion. Moreover, there are philosophical issues that are involved, raised in BULTMANN'S probe that, following KIERKEGAARD and Lutheran theologians, led to a detachment of the Christian faith from empirical history in the interest of an existential appeal of the NT message. Bultmann did not deny a foundation of historical facts to the ministry of Jesus and his death on the cross. But he did not attach much theological value to these events because, in his view, faith can never be at the mercy of HISTORICAL CRITICISM and suspend its activity while the historians debate the problematic question surrounding the events recorded in the Gospels: "Did they happen exactly as reported?" Christian faith for Bultmann and his followers can find no resting place in historical uncertainties since "history" for us, looking back over two thousand years to the recorded happenings of the Gospels, can offer no more than approximations to "what really took place." We must seek, it is said, faith's point of reference in a life-changing encounter with the living Christ of the church's proclamation. Later followers of Bultmann have been more positive in their assessment of historical data in the Gospels, but their philosophical position remains much the same.

On the other side, classical scholars and conservative writers have been more confident in appealing to the witness of external corroboration of NT events, such as the findings of archaeology, the supportive evidence of ancient Greek and Latin authors, and the internal consistency they find in the NT documents. Often this approach has led to a degree of forced harmonization and special pleading. But also many of the arguments brought forth have probative appeal. Thus the historical accuracy of the record in the Acts of the Apostles is often argued for by scholars (for example, Martin Hengel) who theologically are by no means traditionalists. But it is now generally conceded that the author of Acts is more a theologian than an impartial historian. Indeed, he uses history for his own purposes, which are theological.

The debate over OT history is more straightforward, since it is now widely held that the Hebrew mind was less interested in detailed factual reports than was earlier believed to be the case. The presence of oral tradition in Israel and the community's recall of the past in its festivals and ceremonies have indicated how Israel's "history" came to be written down much later than the events reported. The era of Israel's history writing may not have begun until David's reign. Distinctive ways of reading history are seen in Deuteronomy and the books of Chronicles as well as the Priestly editor of the Pentateuch. Nonetheless, Israel's faith rests on certain dramatic events that form the nodal points of the OT history: the Exodus, the entry into Canaan, the prophetic movements of the eighth and seventh centuries in particular; some would also include a tradition centered on the call of Abraham.

Both OT and NT serve as libraries of historical data that bear witness to Israel's faith preserved in liturgical dramas of Israel's celebrations and the church's sacraments and the church's assurance that God works in history and personal life as a divine arena and workshop. In all cases, however, it is history as seen through the eyes of belief and interpreted to display what God did in the lives of people. R. M.

HISTORY OF CHRISTIAN DOCTRINE. By the time EUSEBIUS OF CAESAREA wrote his Church History, it was generally believed that Christian doctrine did not (or at least should not) change or evolve. This was in part due to the acceptance within the Christian church of a static view of truth, derived mostly from the Greek philosophical tradition. Therefore, Eusebius took pains to show that what the church believed at his time was what it had always believed. Such was also the view of the opponents of Augustine's innovations, particularly of Vincent of Lerins, who argued that one should hold fast to what has been believed "always, by all, and in every place." Therefore, during the Middle Ages there was little interest in the history of doctrine, except in the sense of claiming ancient authorities in support for one's position, or against one's opponents.

The Protestant REFORMATION, and the studies of the Humanists at the same time, challenged this view. Protestants held that doctrine had indeed developed, and had done so in a way that contradicted the original faith. At Magdeburg, under the leadership of Matthias Flacius, a group of Protestant scholars began publishing a history of the church and its doctrine, devoting one volume to each century, and which therefore became known as the Centuries of Magdeburg. This in turn prompted Cardinal Cesar Baronius to refute the Protestant view in twelve volumes of Ecclesiastical Annals, which he published between 1588 and his death in 1607—at which point he had brought his history to the end of the twelfth century. From that point on, Catholic historians usually stressed continuity in the development of dogma, while Protestants took the opposite tack.

This tendency was aggravated by the contrasting attitudes of ROMAN CATHOLICISM and of many Protestant scholars in relation to the developments of the modern world. Catholicism condemned many of those developments and became increasingly rigid—a process that culminated in the time of PIUS IX with his Syllabus of Errors. Many Protestants, on the other hand, welcomed such developments, often to such a point that they were accused of abandoning the essentials of the traditional faith. In that setting, Catholics insisted on the uniform development of dogma, and even such moderate works as Cardinal John Henry Newman's Essay on the Development of Christian Doctrine (1845) were regarded askance. Therefore, Protestants took the lead in the exploration of the development of doctrine, and their work culminated in ADOLF HARNACK's seven volumes on the History of Dogma (1886–90), where he sought to show that Christian dogmatic development was the history of the progressive Hellenization of the faith, and of the abandoning of a living faith for the sake of fixed DOGMAS.

In more recent times, both Protestants and Catholics have moderated their positions, thus reapproaching each other in their understanding of doctrinal development. This is particularly true of the contemporary efforts to see such development in the light, not only of its intellectual setting, but also of its socio-political setting, and of the sociopolitical agendas involved. Although a number of monographs on this subject have been published in recent times, these inquiries have not yet resulted in a work reviewing the entire development of doctrine from this perspective.

J.G.

HISTORY OF RELIGIONS. See WORLD RELIGIONS.

HITTITES. An Indo-European people, who in about 1600 B.C. formed a state in east-central Anatolia (present-day Turkey), which expanded into a vigorous empire and fell around 1200 B.C.; also, their descendants (Neo-Hittites) in southeastern peripheral regions from about 1200 to 700 B.C.

Hittites in the Bronze Age. Originally the name "Hatti" denoted the indigenous non-Indo-European inhabitants of central Anatolia, whose language resembles no known linguistic family. Before 2000 B.C., newcomers speaking closely related Indo-European languages, such as Luvian, Nesian, and Palaic, settled there among the older inhabitants. Displacing Hattian, Nesian became recognized as the Hittite language, and its speakers as Hittites. Though (cuneiform) Hittite, patterned after Mesopotamian prototypes, became the official language of the Hittite Empire and of its capital, Hattusas (Boghazköy), hieroglyphic Hittite and Akkadian are also well attested.

Tradition credits Labarnas with founding the Old Kingdom in the late seventeenth century B.C. Under his son and successor, Hattusilis I (about 1570– 1540), the Hittites mounted a concerted campaign to annex northern SYRIA. By 1530 B.C., Hattusilis' impressive son and successor, Mursilis I, had overtaken Aleppo and sacked Babylon, thereby terminating the three hundred years of rule that the First Dynasty of Babylon had enjoyed. For a full century thereafter, external pressure from the expanding Hurrian kingdom of Mitanni and frequent anarchy over throne succession forced the steadily weakening Hittite power to retreat into Asia Minor.

Courtesy of Staatliche Museen, Berlin

Hittite prisoners, probably from the time of Ramses III (about 1195–1164 B.C.)

In about 1400 B.C., the founding of the new kingdom led to Hittite resurgence. Mindful of Egypt's weakness under Akhenaton, Shuppiluliuma (about 1370–1335) wrested northern and central Syria from Egyptian control and established a protectorate over Mitanni. Inevitably, his successors became involved in wars with the Egyptians, who were trying to reclaim Syria. In about 1286 B.C. this culminated in an encounter near Kadesh in which the Hittite king, Muwattalis (about 1306–1282), secured an indecisive victory over Pharaoh Ramses II (about 1290–1224). Due to the escalating Assyrian menace, Hattusilis III (about 1275–1250), brother of Muwattalis, concluded a peace treaty with Ramses II. Though the Hittites continued as masters in Syria, they could not stop Assyria from annexing Mitanni.

Late in the thirteenth century B.C., the Hittite Empire collapsed under the impact of invading Sea Peoples consisting of coalitions of displaced Aegeans. With this telling defeat, Anatolia entered a dark age.

Neo-Hittites and the Old Testament. From about 1200 to 700 B.C., Hittite culture and traditions were kept alive within the independent states that emerged in the mountainous Taurus area and northern Syria. With an influx of Anatolian refugees, the Hittite population intensified. Though cuneiform Hittite disappeared, hieroglyphic Hittite became widespread. As the Arameans gradually gained control over the Syrian states, they transmitted the Neo-Hittite tradition. By the end of the eighth century B.C., Assyria had annexed numerous Neo-Hittite territories. And with the advance of Assyria's militia, the name "Hatti" spread to southern Syria and all of Palestine. The annals of Shalmaneser III (859–825) and Esarhaddon (680–669) aptly disclose that the kings of Hatti, over whom the Assyrian monarchs triumphed, ranged over a vast stretch of western Asia.

Accordingly, the tendency for the OT to refer to the early inhabitants of Palestine as Hittites directly derives from ninth-century B.C. Assyrian practice. In six lists enumerating Palestine's ancient settlers, the Hittites appear first (thus Deut. 7:1) and in nine cases they occupy second place (thus Josh. 3:10). Unfortunately, the lists offer no specifics about the localization of the Hittites in Palestine. As occupants of Syria, the Hittites are counted as Canaan's offspring in the Table of Nations (Gen. 10:15, with the mention of Heth). In Abraham's day, Hebron's inhabitants are presented as Hittites (Gen. 23). Esau and Solomon married Hittite women (Gen. 26:34; I Kings 11:1). The Palestinian hill country is described as hosting both Hittite and Amorite occupants (Num. 13:29). Moreover, Ahimelech (I Sam. 26:6) and Uriah, Bathsheba's first husband (II Sam. 11), are introduced as Hittite contemporaries of David.

Clearly, Palestine's Hittite population was never large, and Hittite conquests failed to extend southward into Palestine. In the OT, "Hittites" consistently denotes the Neo-Hittites of northern Syria, and individual Hittites bear Semitic names betraying a thorough assimilation into Semitic culture. The Hittite label for Ahimelech and Uriah may merely indicate that northern Syria was their homeland. Certain princes in that region undoubtedly figure behind the references to Hittite kings in the monarchical narratives about Solomon (I Kings 10:29) and Joram (II Kings 7:6). Moreover, the transaction between Abraham and Ephron the Hittite in Genesis 23 reflects Neo-Babylonian rather than Hittite business custom. Finally, Ezekiel's metaphorical statement that Jerusalem's mother was a Hittite (Ezek. 16:3, 45) simply mirrors contemporary geographical terminology that locates Jerusalem in the land of Hatti.

If it be remembered that by "Hittites" the OT means "Neo-Hittites deriving from northern Syria," and that the biblical writers appropriated the Assyrian practice of including all of Palestine under the "Hatti" appellation, the biblical portrayal of Hittite presence in Palestine ceases to be a disconcerting enigma. J.K.K.

HIVITES. A Canaanite tribe that inhabited the northern section of Palestine in the Lebanon and anti-Lebanon ranges, around Mount Hermon and at Hamath, but who also were located at Shechem and Gibeon, to the south (see Josh. 11:3; Judg. 3:3; II Sam. 24:7; Gen. 34:2 and Josh. 9:7). There were seven traditional tribes in Canaan, and the Hivites were traditionally said to descend from Eve. Other theorists hold that the Hivites were actually the HORITES, or that they were kinsmen to the ancient Achaeans of Greece. The Hivites were supposed to have migrated to western Asia and the Achaeans to have gone into Greece. After the Hebrew conquest the Hivites were friendly to the Israelites. Solomon made them servants in the Jerusalem Temple.

Many other scholars believe that the Hivites (and Horites) are the same people as the HURRIANS, who entered Palestine from the Indo-Iranian area of Asia. We know the Hurrians were settled over the whole Middle Eastern area by the second millennium B.C. Recently many clay tablets written by the Hurrians that date from 1500 B.C. were discovered. These tablets, chiefly from Ras Shamrah in northern Syria, give much information about religion, magic, and ancient society. While still in process of translation, many parallels to ancient Israelite customs have already been found. J.C.

HOCKING, WILLIAM ERNEST (1873–1966). American philosopher and professor at Harvard. In the idealist tradition, he opposed both the idea of an evolving God and that of an impersonal Absolute, holding that there is no higher category for the understanding of God than that of personality. Nature is to be known not only through the sciences but also in a more mystical fashion, as God's self-communication to us. Hocking was a pioneer in promoting dialogue among the great religions. His writings include The Meaning of God in Human Experience (1912) and Living Religions and a World Faith (1940). J.M.

HODGE, CHARLES (1797–1878). American theologian, born December 27, in Philadelphia, the son of a Princeton physician. He was a protégé of ARCHIBALD ALEXANDER, who was the first president of Princeton Theological Seminary, which he helped found. Hodge graduated from the College of New Jersey (1815) and Princeton Theological Seminary (1819), and was licensed to preach in October, 1819. In 1822 he married Sarah Bache, great-granddaughter of Benjamin Franklin.

Hodge was a developer and defender of theology at Princeton. In May 1820, he was appointed instructor in the original languages of Scripture at Princeton Seminary, and in 1822 he was named professor of Oriental and biblical literature. He later (1840) became professor of exegetic and didactic theology with polemic theology added in 1851. Hodge taught Bible and theology at the seminary for fifty-eight years.

For forty years he edited the Biblical Repertory and Princeton Review, founded in 1825. His books include a Commentary on the Epistle to the Romans (1835), The Constitutional History of the Presbyterian Church in the U.S. (1839–40), and his classic defense of Old School Calvinism, his three-volume Systematic Theology (1871–73).

N.H.

HOLINESS CHURCHES/HOLINESS MOVEMENT. See PENTECOSTAL CHURCHES.

HOLL, KARL (1866–1926). German Protestant historian who helped spark a Luther renaissance by exploring justification by faith. He is known widely in America for The Cultural Significance of the Reformation, translated by Wilhelm Pauck (1959). Born and educated in Tübingen, Holl held professorships there and at Berlin, distinguishing himself in early church and Reformation studies.

C.M.

HOLMES, OLIVER WENDELL (SR.) (1809–94). American poet, essayist, novelist, and physician. Son of Abdiel Holmes, a noted divine, Oliver Wendell Holmes was born August 29 in Cambridge, Massachusetts. Holmes, who throughout his life represented the most urbane and polished aspects of New England culture, was educated at Phillips Academy, Andover, and Harvard College. He spent a year reading law before studying medicine in Cambridge, in Paris, and at Harvard Medical School. He began his career as a general practitioner but shifted later to the academic field. He served as professor of anatomy and physiology at Dartmouth College from 1838 to 1840, dean of Harvard Medical School from 1847 to 1853, and Parker Professor of Anatomy and Physiology at Harvard from 1847 to 1882. His first important poem, "Old Ironsides," was written in 1830. A collection of his witty poems was published in 1836. In 1857 he began to contribute to the Atlantic Monthly, in which his famous "Breakfast-table" sketches appeared before they later were incorporated into The Autocrat of the Breakfast Table (1858). He also wrote several novels and biographies. He was father of the famed jurist who bore his name.

Reared in a Calvinist household, Holmes became a Unitarian. His hymn "Our Father! While Our Hearts Unlearn," records his change in belief. His hymns that have become accepted in the wider church are "Lord of All Being, Throned Afar," and "O Love Divine, That Stooped to Share."

R.H.

HOLOCAUST. The term generally applied to the methodical murder of approximately six million Jews in Europe by the Nazis under Adolf Hitler.

Between 1933 and 1939, Nazis set the ground work for what was to happen later, in several stages, to the Jews. At first, they passed measures eliminating Jews and other non-Aryans from the civil service, the legal and medical professions, and schools and other public institutions. Then came the Nuremberg Laws of 1935, which deprived the Jews of Germany of the rights of citizenship, wiping out a century and a half of "emancipation." Germans were forbidden "illegal intercourse" with Jews. Anyone with a Jewish grandparent was considered Jewish. In 1938, the third stage began when Jews were ordered to register their property, and Jewish communal organizations were put under the control of the Gestapo (German secret police). The assassination of a German diplomat by a Jewish youth in Paris was used as the excuse for a government-organized program and Kristallnacht—"night of glass"—during which Jewish shop windows were smashed, their synagogues burned, and Jews themselves were tortured and murdered. Jewish buildings and holdings were expropriated. Of Germany's little more than 500,000 Jews, 300,000 had fled by 1939, and most of them had no place to go. The Nazis discovered that except for verbal protests by the Western democracies, nothing would be done to oppose their anti-Jewish policies. The stage was set for the Holocaust.

Complete control of communications and transportation provided the cover of secrecy. Total mobilization of resources, including ruthless exploitation of what was called "human material," provided the general economic framework. The expansion of the SS (German guard troops) into a state within a state provided the instrument. The SS received the cooperation of other branches of the German bureaucracy, the German army, and the Nazi puppet governments in the satellite countries. Under Heinrich Himmler, the administrative apparatus for the elimination of "undesirable" populations was constructed. An impersonal bureaucratic jargon freed the Nazis from any residual moral inhibitions and at the same time hid their real intentions from their victims. "Evacuation," "resettlement," "transport," "actions," "special treatment," "final solution"—all were euphemisms for the torture and murder of two-thirds of the Jewish people in Europe.

Beginning with the lightning conquest of Poland in 1939, the Nazis occupied one country after another. The Jewish leaders were interned or shot. Other Jews were ordered into walled ghettos. A large network of transit, concentration, and forced labor camps were set up. During the summer of 1941 orders were given for the construction of death camps. The largest of the camps was at Auschwitz, where one to two million Jews were killed by hydrogen cyanide gas (Zyklon B) between January 1942 and November 1944. The gas chambers—the chief instrument of death—were called “shower rooms” to deceive the victims.

When it was over in 1945, approximately three million Jews in Europe out of a total population of nine million remained alive. One million of those slain were children. Millions of non-Jews were also killed by the Nazis. L.K.

HOLY/HOLINESS. The Hebrew scriptures contain several words formed from the root q-d-sh: the verb, “to be holy” or “make holy,” “to sanctify”; the adjective, “holy” (for example, holy temple); and the substantive, “holiness.” The primary meaning of this group of words (which have near parallels in other Semitic cultures) is uncertain, but most scholars agree that the terms convey the notion of separation. Holy is that person or thing that is separated from all that is profane, common, or defiling. Israel’s conceptions of holiness are most clearly presented in the book of Leviticus, especially chapters 17–26, the so-called “code of holiness,” and the books of the prophets Isaiah and Ezekiel.

One may say first of all that holiness is ascribed to Yahweh, the God of Israel; Yahweh alone is “the Holy One” (Ps. 71:22; Jer. 50:29; Isa. 1:4; 5:19; also 40:25; 41:14-16; Ezek. 39:7). Second, those persons, places, or things that belong to God are holy—they are sanctified by God for divine use or they manifest God’s presence or activity (Exod. 29:42-46; Lev. 21:1; II Kings 4:9; Exod. 3:1-5; 19:3-6; Ps. 15:1; Isa. 11:9).

The testimony of ancient Israelites is that various people or groups have from time to time been confronted by an incalculable energy or power—wholly Other than human—a Presence perceived to be at once terrible and deadly and beneficent and life-giving. Those who experience this overwhelming force are often painfully aware of their creatureliness and are moved to worship. An example of the destructive effect of q-d-sh is the narrative concerning the fate of Uzzah (II Sam. 6:6-7). Uzzah’s sudden death was a result of his steadying the ark to prevent harm to it when the oxen bearing it began to stumble; however, the same ark that brought death to Uzzah, brought a blessing to the household of Obed-edom (II Sam. 6:11-12). It would be a mistake to regard these stories concerning the ark as an example merely of Israel’s primitive conception of holiness as an impersonal, quasi-materialistic phenomenon. Holiness was not inherent in the ark; its holiness consisted in the presence of the invisible Redeemer-King enthroned above it, who was revealed to Moses and the children of Israel (compare I Sam. 6; II Chr. 26:19; also Lev. 10:1-3; Num. 4:17-20).

Stories from the OT, such as those above, teach that one does not treat a holy object as one would treat a common one, since in some way or other it is a manifestation of God’s holy Name (or Person), or an expression of God’s holy will. The whole of the Priestly legislation in the Hebrew bible is based on these premises: the faithful Israelite must know what is holy and what is profane, what makes holy and what defiles or renders one unclean (Lev. 10; 16; 22:17-33). Much of this “code of holiness” presupposes the teaching of the major prophets of Israel-Judah who lived in the eighth century B.C. Their proclamation “Yahweh our god is holy” was accompanied by the demand that Israel’s conduct be consistent with the divine nature. The moral content of q-d-sh is summarily stated by Isaiah of Jerusalem: “the Lord of hosts is exalted in justice, and the Holy God shows himself holy in righteousness” (Isa. 5:16). The account of Isaiah’s call reflects earlier accounts of the external effects of an encounter with holiness, but the significance of the narrative in Isaiah 6:1-5 lies less in the awesome setting of Isaiah’s call than in the prophet’s conviction of his own and of his people’s sinfulness deriving directly from his vision of the thrice HOLY ONE. The prophets’ legacy is also found in some of the cultic Psalms that reflect a spiritual world in which the moral and personal quality of holiness, as conceived by the prophets, is expressed. Those who are saints (sanctified) praise the person of the Holy One of Israel (Pss. 71:22; 22:3; 89:5, 18).

Because of the prophets’ teaching, the ritual and external manifestations of holiness were given a secondary status, but this did not diminish the growth and importance of the purity laws. The expansion of the oral law had the effect of ensuring the cultic purity of priests and people. Distinctions between the clean and the unclean were carefully drawn; holy days and seasons were carefully observed. Visions of the holiness of the Temple, of the Temple mountain, and of the holy city, Jerusalem, figure prominently in Jewish eschatology. Ezekiel’s prophecies are especially noteworthy (Ezek. 36:16-36; see also Isa. 27:13; 52:7-12; 65:25; Joel 3:17; Jer. 31:23-25).

Early Christians reaffirmed Israel’s confession: The Lord our God is holy (Ps. 99:1-3; Rev. 15:3-4; 16:5). The Christian prophet of the Apocalypse combines Isaiah 6 and Ezekiel 1 as he describes the heavenly throne room: living creatures sing unceasingly, “Holy, holy, holy, is the Lord God Almighty, who was and is and is to come!” (Rev. 4:8). As often in the OT, so in the NT, the reality of God’s holiness confronts worshipers with moral demands (compare Isa. 5:16; I Pet. 1:15-16; Lev. 11:44-45). Again as in the OT, the hallowing of the “Name” is associated with the end-time, with the coming of the Kingdom of God (Matt. 6:9-10). In the Gospel of John, Jesus affirms the personal holiness of his Father (John 17:11).

When in the Gospels Jesus is declared to be “the Holy One,” a messianic ascription is intended (Mark 1:14; Luke 1:35; 4:34; compare Mark 8:27-29; John 6:69; I John 2:20). Possibly other messianic appellations are more frequently employed in the Gospel tradition because the revelation of holiness is almost universally associated with the Spirit’s activity, Jesus' gift to his disciples, thus fulfilling the proclamation of John the Baptist (Mark 1:8).

Paul was a major contributor to the spiritualization of the cultic character of holiness, espoused especially by the Pharisees. To the Roman Christians he writes: "I appeal to you therefore, brethren, . . . present your bodies as a living sacrifice, holy and acceptable to God, which is your spiritual worship" (Rom. 12:1). Those who are "sanctified in Christ Jesus" are able to do this (I Cor. 1-2; 6:11; II Thess. 2:13; Rom. 15:16). Or as the writer of I John declares, believers in Jesus the Christ "have been anointed by the Holy One" (v. 20); or as the writer of the book to the Hebrews proclaims: "Jesus . . . suffered outside the gate in order to sanctify the people through his own blood" (13:12). "For by a single offering he has perfected for all time those who are sanctified" (I John 2:20; Heb. 13:12; 10:14). For this reason alone Christians are addressed in the NT as "the saints." J.P.

HOLY CITY. A designation for JERUSALEM, a city sacred to three world faiths—Judaism, Christianity, and Islam. In Revelation, Jerusalem is specifically called the Holy City (Rev. 10; 11:2; 21:2; 22:19). The Holy City referred to is the heavenly or new Jerusalem (Rev. 21:2), in distinction from the historical city, however. J.C.

HOLY CLUB. A group of Oxford students, originally gathered by CHARLES WESLEY and soon headed by JOHN WESLEY, who came together in 1729 to study the Greek NT, pray, and engage in good works. They were also called Bible Moths, the Godly Club, Enthusiasts, and Methodists. They fasted on Wednesdays and Fridays, kept regular hours of prayer and Bible reading, took Communion weekly, and ministered to those in a local prison. N.H.

HOLY GHOST. See HOLY SPIRIT.

HOLY KISS. The greeting of the faithful during the Eucharistic liturgy. It is a sign of love and unity in Christ. Greeting one another with a holy kiss is of apostolic origin, as it is mentioned in Romans 16:16; I Corinthians 16:20; II Corinthians 13:12; I Thessalonians 5:26, and I Peter 5:14 (where it is called "the kiss of love"). J.C.

HOLY OF HOLIES. See TABERNACLE.

HOLY ONE, THE. One of the names attributed to YAHWEH, Israel's GOD. The title is often extended by the addition of the phrase "of Israel," especially in Isaiah, who uses the title twenty-nine times (1:4, etc.). The term "Holy One" denotes God's transcendence above the earth that God has made and over which God rules (Isa. 6:1-5). The notion of "apartness" is basic; but the prophets also remind the people that God is righteous (Isa. 5:16) and requires a "holy people," that is, a people both separated from evil practices and dedicated to God. R.M.

HOLY ORDERS. Ordination to the priesthood in the Roman Catholic, Old Catholic, and Eastern Orthodox churches, said to confer special spiritual powers and graces on the person. In the Roman Catholic view, an INDELIBLE CHARACTER of priesthood is obtained through holy orders. Orders comes from the Latin ordo, meaning "rank." J.C.

HOLY ROMAN EMPIRE. The name usually given to the institution that claimed to be the heir of the Roman Empire in the West and that existed from the crowning of CHARLEMAGNE in A.D. 800 to the abdication of Francis II in 1806. During that time, it took many different shapes, for under Charlemagne, and later under the Ottos, it was the greatest power in Western Europe, while at other times it was little more than an empty title. Its relationship to the papacy was never clear, for Popes tended to see it as the secular arm of the church, on the grounds that Charlemagne and his successors, up to CHARLES V, were crowned by Popes. But the stronger emperors resisted attempts on the part of the papacy to intervene in their affairs. This led to repeated clashes, of which the most notable was the INVESTITURE CONTROVERSY. After the Reformation, the empire became an increasingly empty title. J.G.

HOLY SEPULCHRE, CHURCH OF THE. A large basilica in Jerusalem, portions of which date to A.D.

Courtesy of the Philosophical Library

Court and facade of the Church of the Holy Sepulchre

335, built on the traditional site of Christ's crucifixion, burial, and resurrection. The Romans built a Temple of Venus on the hill of Calvary or Golgotha ("the place of a skull") in A.D. 135, after the second Roman-Jewish war or Bar-Kochba revolt. The emperor Constantine destroyed this temple and excavated down to the rock. A cave tomb and its stone covering were discovered. Constantine built a basilica with three aisles over this tomb and, supposedly, the site of Christ's crucifixion. The surrounding rock was hewn away and the sites incorporated into the building. In A.D. 624, the Persians destroyed this basilica, and later another church was raised by Modestus. Within the rotunda of this building the two sites can now be seen in two chapels. This is one of the most sacred sites in the Christian world.

J.C.

HOLY SHROUD. See SHROUD OF TURIN.

HOLY SPIRIT. In Christian theology the Holy Spirit is ranked within the Godhead as divine and, since the early creeds, worshiped as a member of the Holy TRINITY. The stages of evolution of this belief are complex and belong to the history of Christian doctrine. What follows surveys the biblical data to do with "spirit," and here again a long line of development is traceable.

The Old Testament. The Hebrew term rûah occurs nearly four hundred times in the OT and is rendered generally by "spirit" or "wind," from a verb meaning "to blow or breathe." It is thus associated with the principle of life or "center of activity" (see Gen. 2:7; 6:17; 7:15; etc. when used of a person as a human being). Creation itself is the product of divine activity described as God's breath (Gen. 1:2; Ps. 33:6), but an earlier understanding of Spirit as applied to God thought of it as an invading or violent power that came upon people and took possession of them. If the Spirit was diminished or lost, they faded away and died (Josh. 5:1; Ps. 143:7; Isa. 19:3). When God's Spirit came forcefully upon the leaders of Israel, they were "persons of spirit" and did exploits, such as the Judges (Judg. 3:10; 6:34; 11:29; 13:25; 14:6; the classic example is of Samson in 15:14-17) or the early ecstatic prophets described in I Samuel (10:6, 10; 19:20, 23, 24) who, possessed by the divine Spirit, did strange things as a sign of their being considered "holy persons." The basic meaning of divine Spirit in this period is something like a driving force that gave to special persons a supernatural dynamic for what they did, usually eccentric, in the service of God. Spirit was thus a manifestation of divine power, put forth in a visible, tangible, and experiential way. The hallmarks were ecstasy, often induced by music (I Sam. 10:5ff.; II Kings 3:15), and a superhuman ability of leadership, whether of the crassly physical (Samson) or overtly moral (Samuel) kind. Divine and human "spirit" tended to merge in this literature, with no clear distinction drawn.

In the period of the early monarchy (such as the reigns of David and of Solomon) the Spirit was brought into association with the anointing of kings and elaborated in a later time (I Sam. 16:13ff. God's Spirit left Saul, and David was later idealized as a man of the Spirit, Ps. 89:20, 21, who set the pattern for the coming perfect king on whom the Spirit would rest, Isa. 11:2; 61:1; Pss. of Sol. 17:37; 18:7, and the Dead Sea Scrolls). The preexilic prophets showed a remarkable reluctance to claim divine inspiration through the Spirit (only Mic. 3:8), and this fact may be explained by their disdain of ecstatic experiences associated with either popular or cult prophets (Isa. 28:7; Jer. 5:13; 6:13; Mic. 2:11).

In the exilic and postexilic periods attributing claims of prophetic authority returned, especially in Ezekiel and Isaiah (Ezek. 2:2; 3:22-24; Isa. 42:1; 44:3), and two important developments took place. First, the divine Spirit became more openly related to creation (Gen. 1:2) and to a moral sense of personal responsibility of people to God (Ps. 51:13; Isa. 63:1ff.). The Spirit was consciously dignified with the title "holy," that is, God's power set men and women apart from evil and enlisted them in a crusade to make Israel a holy nation. The second development arose out of a sense of frustration and failure in the postexilic era. Already in the exilic prophets (for example, Jer. 31:31-34; Ezek. 36:26-27, 37) there was the promise of a new beginning, called a "new age," when the Spirit would be in evidence in human experience (Isa. 59:21; 61:1-4; 63:11) and create a new people (Ezek. 39:29; Joel 2:28ff.; Zech. 12:10), sometimes offering the promise of a new world order (Isa. 66:18, 22). This eschatological expectation brings us to the threshold of the NT with a further reminder that in the period between the Testaments, the Holy Spirit was believed to have forsaken apostate Israel until the new age should arrive.

The New Testament. The clearest sign Jesus reportedly gave of what he came to do was a claim to usher in God's kingdom (Mark 1:14-15), whose presence and power were certified by his "mighty works," that is, healings, exorcisms, and concern for the religiously and socially outcast. His ministry was attributed to the Spirit at work in him (Luke 4:18-19; Matt. 12:28; Acts 10:38). Jesus came to fulfill the expectations of a new age of the Spirit, seen and felt to be present in Jesus' person as divine Son (Mark 1:10-12) and in ministry as one who would also grant that Spirit to his followers (Mark 1:8 and pars.). While Jesus spoke only reservedly about the Spirit, the later church came to see that the signs of this messianic presence could only have been the work of the Spirit in him.

At Pentecost Jesus' promise was made good (Acts 1:4-5). The Spirit came on the apostles in consequence of Jesus' exaltation (Acts 2:33), and ancient prophecies (Joel 2:28ff.; Ps. 110:1) were realized. The new society that gathered around the name of the Risen Lord was full of the Spirit's tokens—in mighty deeds, convincing proclamation, and in a community spirit (koinōnia) of mutual regard and sharing (Acts 2:44-45; 4:32-37). Preachers and leaders, such as Stephen (Acts 6:10), Philip (Acts 8:26-40), and Saul (Acts 9:17), are described as "full of the Spirit" who led the Christian mission ever onward and outward, from Jerusalem to Rome (Acts 1:8), according to sixty-two times in Acts, a tribute to the narrator's belief in the church's life setting in the eschatological age.

Paul is the great NT exponent of the Christian life as "living in the Spirit" (Rom. 8:14-17; Gal. 4:6). For Paul Christian experience originated in a receiving of the Spirit (I Cor. 12:3; Gal. 3:2ff.), who initiated men and women into the fellowship of the church (I Cor. 12:13; this is the "baptism of the Spirit" associated with baptism in water, Rom. 6:3; Gal. 3:27; and following the usual pattern in Acts 8:12-17; 10:44-48; 18:25-19:6).

For Paul the gift of—and subsequent life in—the Spirit had strong ethical dimensions, empowering believers to live no longer under the power of sin ("the flesh"), but rather in the energy of the Spirit (Gal. 5:16-26). But there is no separate experience different from living "in Christ" (Rom. 8:9-17; II Cor. 5:17; 12:1). The reason for this equation lies in Paul's apparent linking of the Spirit with the Risen Christ (II Cor. 3:17-18), so that having the "fruit of the Spirit" is identical with living "in accord with Christ" (Rom. 15:5-6), and the SPIRITUAL GIFTS (I Cor. 12:4-11; Rom. 12:3-8) are practiced under the lordship and inspiration of Christ (I Cor. 12:3; 13:1-13).

The other NT writers, with varying terminology, agree with these main Pauline emphases. The Spirit is the author of new life for the believer and the community (John 3:3, 5-6; 20:22; Heb. 2:4; I Pet. 1:12; I John 4:13; 5:6-7), usually connected with the exaltation of the Risen Lord and an initiatory rite of baptism. The Johannine literature stresses the inner meaning of such sacramental action, making the Spirit the presence of God or Christ in the individual (John 6:53-63: the Spirit gives life to the eucharistic elements and makes possible a "spiritual" communion). The Spirit is given distinct personality as Jesus' gift of the PARACLETE (or helper, in John 14-16); and the way is thereby prepared for ascribing to the Holy Spirit an independent "center of consciousness" (persona), which was later incorporated into the creeds of the church, with their formula of "three persons, one God."
R.M.

HOLY WATER. A sacramental in the Roman Catholic Church; water blessed for religious use. It is used to bless people (when entering the church) and things (by sprinkling). Its use dates from the second century A.D. Water is a natural symbol for purification of the profane and consecration to God.
J.C.

HOLY WEEK. The most sacred portion of the Christian liturgical year; the week preceding EASTER. Consecrated to the central mysteries of the Christian faith, Christ's sufferings, death, and resurrection, Holy Week began in the third century A.D., as a three-day celebration of the Passover season and the institution of the Lord's Supper. By the fourth century, the commemoration was expanded to a full week and Holy (or MAUNDY) THURSDAY was especially honored. Holy Week developed naturally out of the practice of Christian pilgrimages to Jerusalem yearly, where they could celebrate the Lord's Supper and reenact the events of Jesus' last week in liturgical drama and solemn processions. Holy Week eventually came to embrace the whole period from Palm Sunday (or the Sunday of the Passion) to Easter. Later, the commemoration was expanded to forty days, with the designation of Ash Wednesday, and the Lenten season was complete.

In the liturgical revival of the twentieth century, the observance of Lent, and especially of Holy Week, spread to embrace the free churches of Protestantism as well as the liturgical churches. Today it is almost universally celebrated in America.
J.C.

HOLY YEAR. A special period of piety proclaimed by the pope, in which he grants plenary indulgence to Catholics who visit Rome to venerate the tombs of Peter and Paul. The most recent Holy Year was proclaimed by Pope Paul VI on Christmas, 1974, to pray for reconciliation among peoples.
J.C.

HOMER. A measure of capacity in OT times. Most measurements were informal, such as a "handful" (I Kings 20:10); however, there were formal designations. The homer was a pile of grain, often one donkey-load. After the Exile such measures were standardized. The homer was about six and one-fourth United States bushels.
J.C.

HOMOIOUSION/HOMOIIOUSION. Two words that held center stage during the controversy over ARIANISM. The first means "of the same substance (or essence)," and the latter "of a similar substance (or essence)." The NICENE CREED had declared that the Son was homoousios with the Father. There were many, however, who were afraid that this could be interpreted as meaning that there is no distinction between the Father and the Son, thus leaving the way open for Sabellianism. As an alternative, they proposed the term "homoiousios," which they felt would do justice to both the unity and the distinction between Father and Son. These theologians have been mistakenly called semi-Arians, when in fact they were anti-Arians who were also concerned with the danger of Sabellianism. After long negotiations, in which ATHANASIUS as well as the CAPPADOCIAN FATHERS played an important role, most of the homoiousian leaders agreed to the Nicene formula, "homoousios."
J.G.

HOMOSEXUALITY. Having a sexual orientation toward those of the same sex. The word has been used in many different ways, but here it will be used to refer to adult sexual preference for those of the same sex.

Background. It is not known with certainty whether sexual orientation is determined by genetic inheritance or by the chemistry of the mother during pregnancy. Or whether psychological, sociological, and other factors play the predominant role in shaping sexual orientation. Adolescents go through a stage in which they prefer to associate with those of their own sex. Do some people remain in this stage into adulthood? Is homosexuality a psychiatric issue? Or a moral issue? Or does it have a physical origin that is not yet understood?

Social Acceptance. There are those who argue that all conduct, even when the motivations are unconscious, is the result of choice. They say, therefore, that people are ultimately responsible for whatever they do. Such people would try to help those with a homosexual orientation understand that they are not victims of something beyond themselves. Rather, choices they have made in the past, however unconsciously, have brought them to this position. To them, these choices can be reviewed and new decisions can be made. Others see homosexuality as an orientation that one is born with or that develops in the first two or three years of life. They would urge society to look on homosexuals in the same way that it does all other people—that they are individuals created by the same God. Some draw a distinction between practicing homosexuals and those who are inclined toward homosexuality but do not practice it. Still others would distinguish those who are loyal to one other person in a homosexual relationship from those who are homosexually promiscuous. Estimates are that 10 percent of the population has a homosexual orientation. Thus most families can be expected to have at least one person with this orientation somewhere in the relationship.

Old Testament. In the OT, the men of SODOM demanded that Lot bring out his two male guests to them, apparently for sexual purposes. Not realizing that the guests were messengers from God, the men called out, "Bring them out to us that we may know them" (Gen. 19:5). Here the word "know" probably has the meaning of having sexual relations with. Two other OT passages speak against a man lying with another man as he would with a woman (Lev. 18:22 and 20:13).

New Testament. There are no clear references in the Gospels to homosexuality. Either Jesus offered no teachings on the subject or the Gospel writers did not consider them of enough importance to preserve them.

Summary. There is much confusion in our society today among Christians regarding homosexuality. Some denounce only promiscuous practice; others are judgmental toward anyone with a homosexual orientation.

The biblical call is toward responsible use of one's whole life, including one's sexuality. Our bodies are to be the temple of the Holy Spirit. And underlying all, needs to be the awareness that all people are sinners in need of God's gracious forgiveness.

B.J.

HOOKER, RICHARD (1553?–1600). Exponent of Anglican theology and author of The Laws of Ecclesiastical Polity; born in late 1553 or early 1554 near Exeter. John Jewel, bishop of Salisbury, became his patron and sent him in 1568 to Corpus Christi College, Oxford, where he received his M.A. in 1577.

In 1585 he was elected master of the Temple Church. On February 13, 1588, he married Joan Churchman, and her dowry enabled him after 1591 to devote himself to writing. His Polity was the last salvo in the "admonition controversy," in response to the June 1572 publication by certain Puritans of An Admonition to the Parliament.

Hooker's magnum opus was to be eight volumes, though only five appeared in his lifetime. He defended the ELIZABETHAN SETTLEMENT against both Roman Catholics and Puritans. He argued that the English tradition has a threefold base—the Bible, the church, and reason. A proponent of sound constitutional government, he believed in the unity of church and state.

N.H.

HOOKER, THOMAS (1586–1647). Puritan cleric born on July 7 in Marfield, England. At Emmanuel College, Cambridge, he received the B.A. (1608), the M.A. (1611), and served as a fellow (1611–18). After serving two parishes, his PURITAN views brought him into conflict with the government, and he fled to Holland in 1630.

From Holland he sailed for New England in 1633. A powerful preacher and a sensitive pastor of souls, he was chosen in 1635 to argue against Roger Williams and in 1637 to be co-moderator of the trial of Anne Hutchinson. He also presided at the Cambridge Synod. After serving the Newtown (Cambridge), Massachusetts, congregation for three years, he helped found Hartford, Connecticut, and served there until his death July 7.

His writings include The Soules Preparation for Christ (1632), Four Godly and Learned Treatises (1638), A Survey of the Summe of Church Discipline (1648), The Saints Dignitie and Dutie (1651), and the two-volume Application of Redemption (1656–57).

N.H.

HOPE. In Christianity faith, love, and hope are the three theological virtues. In the biblical religions, hope is understood in terms of hope in God and in God's covenant promises and is associated with ESCHATOLOGY. Hope would appear to be a natural, human, as well as a theological, exigence or need.

Immanuel Kant maintained that human reason concerns itself with three questions: (1) What can I know? (2) What ought I to do? and (3) What may I hope? Emil Brunner points to the universal significance of human hope when he writes that "what oxygen is for the lungs, such is hope for the meaning of human life . . . the fate of humanity is dependent on its supply of hope." Hope means the presence of a future. Without hope there can be no openness to a future, only a fatedness that brings a sense of purposelessness and paralysis. Here, however, we are concerned with hope in its biblical and theological context.

A recurring question in the OT is: on whom should one's hope and confidence rest? If one's hope rests on what is not secure, it is doomed to futility and disappointment (Ps. 49:6-12; Isa. 36:4-9; 44:9-20). For the OT writers, God alone is the firm ground, the rock and fortress, of the "hope of Israel." Israel's trust in and fidelity to its God, Yahweh, is grounded in the covenant established between God and the people at Sinai. While the covenant promises are partially fulfilled in the promised land of Canaan and in the Davidic kingdom, events such as the Babylonian Exile leave Israel's hope for the kingdom of God unfulfilled and future-oriented. Delays in the fulfillment of God's promise teach Israel patience, courage, and a confident expectation in God's salvation, undiminished by historical disappointments and disasters.

In the NT the ground of hope is also "the God of hope" (Rom. 15:13); it, too, rests on God's promise (Rom. 4:17-21), and is expressed in faith, patience, and endurance. However, in the NT hope is centered on the indwelling Christ who, Paul says, is "in you, the hope of glory" (Col. 1:27). For the NT writers, hope is grounded in Christ's resurrection and victory over death, perceived as the fulfillment of God's PROMISE to the fathers (Acts 26:6-7). Paul's hope, for example, stands or falls with the trustworthiness of God's resurrection of Jesus from the dead (Acts 26:8). Paul associates human hope in God's promise in Christ with confidence (Rom. 4:18), rejoicing (Rom. 5:2), endurance (Rom. 5:4), freedom (Rom. 8:21; Gal. 5:5), and with love (I Cor. 13:7). The NT hope is both personal and corporate and is perceived as both a present reality and a hope that will consummate in the future eschaton. Eschatological hope in the NT is already present in Christ—what the NT scholar C. H. DODD calls "realized eschatology." Jesus announces, for example, that the "time is fulfilled" and that the kingdom of God is "at hand" and in our midst (Mark 1:15). John speaks of the Christian as having "passed out of death into life" (I John 3:2). Yet it is also true that hope in the NT is, as Albert Schweitzer demonstrated, a forward-looking expectation of a future consummation in the parousia, the general resurrection, the final judgment, and the new creation, "a new heaven and a new earth" (Rev. 21:1).

One of the formative contributions of theology in this century is the rediscovery of the radically eschatological, and even apocalyptic, character of much of the Bible. This was brought to light by NT scholars such as Johannes Weiss and SCHWEITZER, as well as by more recent scholars who have shown the importance of the themes of PROMISE and fulfillment and apocalypticism in the OT. After World War I, KARL BARTH and other Neo-orthodox theologians appropriated the rediscovery of biblical eschatology and made it central to their theology, especially to their sense of cultural crisis, their rejection of all liberal ideas of historical progress, and their appeal to an entirely transcendental hope. In returning eschatology to the center of theological reflection, the Neo-orthodox theologians focused attention once again on the theme of hope. In 1954 the World Council of Churches, in its Second Assembly in Evanston, made hope the central theme of its deliberations. This theme in the council's report, The Christian Hope and the Task of the Churches (1954), stimulated an unprecedented discussion of and numerous books and studies on Christian hope.

Concurrent with this new attention on Christian hope, there appeared philosophical studies on the theme, for example, Ernst Bloch's Das Prinzip Hoffnung (1959), and Gabriel Marcel's Homo Viator: Introduction to a Metaphysics of Hope (1951). Bloch's work has been an especially important influence on post-Neo-orthodox theologians such as Jürgen MOLTSMANN and Johannes Metz, both of whom have made eschatology, and especially the theme of Christian hope, central to their theological work. Bloch sees the principle of hope as the driving force of all human activity, since it is the future, not the past, that is decisive in determining both the present and the coming of any new creative initiative in history. Bloch's this-worldly, historical focus on hope has turned theologians such as Metz and Moltmann away from "other-worldly" and purely transcendental ideas of Christian hope to embrace a radically horizontal and historical one, without endorsing earlier liberal ideas of inevitable historical progress. According to these theologians, God must be viewed not statically but eschatologically, as the power of the future. So conceived, God does not rob humans of their freedom or their historical responsibility, and yet, God alone possesses power to liberate lives and to release forces that can overcome and save the present.

The new theology of hope claims to overcome the traditional opposition between religion and revolution or between reliance on salvation and responsibility for the world. This has made possible a new dialogue and rapport between the theology of hope and Marxist and humanist concerns for liberation from oppression and for socioeconomic change and progress. Such a Christian hope refutes the notion of hope as bad faith (Sartre) or an opiate (Marx), that is, the idea that "he who lives by hope dies of hunger." A theology of hope rejects all Promethean "attempts at self-redemption or self-production" and, at the same time, the quietist's refusal to accept responsibility for the world, in the belief that all will be resolved or redeemed in the end without human effort. For a theologically grounded hope, day-to-day self-sacrifice "becomes possible and becomes human within that horizon of expectation which transcends this world" (Moltmann). Hope is a virtue, for it is what gives life its sense of the holy, what keeps life open to new possibilities, to the transcendent or what Marcel calls "the absolute recourse." J.L.

HOPE, THEOLOGY OF. See MOLTSMANN, JÜRGEN.

HOPKINS, JOHN HENRY, JR. (1820–91). Designer, musician, and hymn writer. Hopkins was born in Pittsburgh, Pennsylvania, and graduated from the University of Vermont. He moved to New York City, where for a time he worked as a newspaper reporter and at the same time prepared himself for a law career. Later however, he received a master of arts degree from the University of Vermont (1845), then studied for the ministry at General Theological Seminary, New York. He remained at the seminary after graduation and became its first teacher of music. He also was founder and editor of the Church Journal. He expressed his abilities in art by designing stained glass and other art objects. He later was ordained priest and served as rector of churches in Plattsburg, New York, and Williamsport, Pennsylvania. In 1863 his Carols, Hymns and Songs, in which he demonstrated his gifts as poet and musician, was published. His carol, "We Three Kings of Orient Are," became very popular. His hymns included "Alleluia! Christ Is Risen Today," "God of Our Fathers, Bless This Our Land," and "Like Noah's Weary Dove." R.H.

HOPKINS, SAMUEL (1721–1803). Disciple of JONATHAN EDWARDS and exponent of Hopkinsian theology, Hopkins was born September 17, in Waterbury, Connecticut, to Timothy and Mary Judd Hopkins. After earning his degree at Yale in 1741, he studied theology with Edwards in Northampton, an association that continued during Hopkins' tenure as a minister at Housatonic (Great Barrington), Massachusetts, from 1743 to 1769. From 1769 until his death on December 20, 1803, he served First Congregational Church, Newport, Rhode Island.

Inheritor of Edwards' library and his principal systematizer, Hopkins propounded the New Divinity, emphasizing the sovereignty of God, a governmental theory of the Atonement, love as the greatest human virtue, obligation that involves ability, and sin and holiness as matters of the will. His works include Sin . . . an Advantage to the Universe (1759), The True State and Character of the Unregenerate (1769), An Inquiry into the Nature of True Holiness (1773), and System of Doctrines Contained in Divine Revelation, Explained and Defended (1793). In A Dialogue Concerning the Slavery of Africans (1776), he became one of the first Congregationalists to oppose it.

N.H.

HOPPER, EDWARD (1818–88). Presbyterian minister and hymn writer. Born in New York City, Hopper attended New York University and Union Theological Seminary. He held pastorates in Greenville, New York, and Sag Harbor, then a whaling port on Long Island, before serving the Church of the Sea and Land, New York City. This accounts for the nautical themes of some of his hymn texts, best known of which was "Jesus, Savior, Pilot Me," published anonymously. He also was the author of "They Pray the Best Who Pray and Watch," and "Wrecked and Struggling in Mid-ocean." R.H.

HOR, MOUNT. In Hebrew, "hor" means "mountain." The name first appears in Numbers 20:22-28, where it is said to be the place where Aaron was buried. Hor was on the route of the Israelites' wilderness wandering, but its exact location is unknown. Perhaps it was north of Kadesh-barnea. Some scholars have identified Hor with the highest mountain in the ancient kingdom of Edom, now called Jebel Harun. Others dispute this identification. It has also been said to be one of the mountains on the northern border of Israel, near Hamath. This would make it a part of either the Lebanon or anti-Lebanon range. Some indications in Numbers 34 could lead to such an identification, but it is far from certain.

Very clearly, Mount Hor is said to be near the frontier of Edom in Numbers 20:23; then, in the description of the frontiers of the Promised Land, we read: "This shall be your northern frontier: you shall draw a line from the Great Sea to Mount Hor and from Mount Hor to Lebo-hamath . . ." (Num. 34:7-8 NEB). It seems probable that two different mountains are involved here. Since "Hor" means mountain, it probably was used to designate the highest, largest peak in any mountain range. It meant something like "the mountain" (or a "real" mountain) in the popular speech of the day. J.C.

HOREB. See SINAI, MOUNT.

HORITES. The ancient inhabitants of Syria and Mesopotamia in the second millennium B.C. The Horites may be the same people as the HURRIANS. They lived at Seir at the time of Abraham and later were driven away by the Edomites. The name may mean "cave-dwellers," but this is doubtful. J.C.

HORNEY, KAREN (1885–1952). Trained under Karl Abraham, a close associate of FREUD, Horney criticized Freud's reliance on sexual libido and refused to accept Freud's view that female psychology was just a corollary of male psychology. She theorized that social and environmental factors largely determine individual personality and cause neurosis. She authored The Neurotic Personality of Our Time (1937), Our Inner Conflicts (1945), and Neurosis and Human Growth (1950). A native of Hamburg, West Germany, she moved to New York City in 1934 to enter private practice and teach at the New School for Social Research. She founded the Association for the Advancement of Psychoanalysis. N.H.

HORNS OF THE ALTAR. Extensions from the four corners of the altars on which the sacrifices and incense were burned. These were the altars of holocaust and of incense. The horns were considered their most sacred parts. The blood was smeared on them. Fugitives who grasped them were protected from harm. J.C.

HORUS. Egyptian sky god, whose cult arose in the Nile Delta and spread throughout the country in prehistoric times, taking many forms. He has the head of a falcon and his eyes are the sun and moon. The kings of upper Egypt, who unified the country, were considered his incarnations. When the cult of OSIRIS spread over Egypt around 2425 B.C., Horus became identified as his son. The Greeks identified him with the god APOLLO. K./M.C.

Courtesy of the Brooklyn Museum, Charles Edwin Wilbour Fund

A hawk, wearing a crown, represents the Egyptian god Horus

From Minoru Ooka, Temples of Nara and Their Art (John Weatherhill, Inc.)

Aerial view of the West Precinct, Horyu-ji

HORYU-JI. A Buddhist temple at the city of Nara, Japan, dating from the seventh century A.D. It is the oldest surviving temple in Japan. Its buildings are prized as the finest example of the combination of Chinese and Korean traditional architecture with native Japanese elements. They contain unique art treasures, including paintings, sculpture, and textiles.

Horyu-ji, like other temples in the Far East, is a complex of buildings of varying sizes and functions. The West Precinct is a rectangle surrounded by a cloister three hundred by two hundred feet. It is built of wooden columns covered by a tile roof. In the south side of the cloister there is a large two-story gateway of similar construction. Inside the compound on the right is the main hall, and on the left a five-storied PAGODA, twice as high as the main hall. Beyond them is the main lecture hall.

The temple was founded by Prince Shotoku (A.D. 573–621) near his own palace. He was probably the person most responsible for the establishment of BUDDHISM in Japan. From A.D. 710 to 784 Nara was the capital of Japan, and during this time Buddhism flourished. A new compound and temple buildings were erected on the former site of Prince Shotoku's palace. It is known as the East Precinct.

Because the main structural material is wood, fires have been a constant threat, and several of the buildings have burned and been rebuilt. Even so, many works of art from the earliest period have survived.

K. C.

HOSANNA. Consisting of two Hebrew words, the imperative of the verb yasha, "save!" followed by the particle of entreaty, na', "please!" this expletive seems to belong to the realm of worship in ancient Israel. This is confirmed by its appearance in Psalm 118:25, "Save us, we beseech thee, O Lord! O Lord, we beseech thee, give us success!" and many other places in the psalter (for example, Pss. 12:1; 20:9; 28:9; 60:5; 108:6). However, few of these and other OT contexts of the phrase resemble each other, and by no means are all laments and entreaties for help. In fact, some are occasions of the glad announcement of divine help and salvation.

In the NT the term is used exclusively as a cry of triumph almost perfectly synonymous with the term HALLELUJAH. The only six occurrences of the term all occur in the context of the triumphant entry of Jesus into Jerusalem on Palm Sunday (Matt. 21:9, 15; Mark 11:9-10; John 12:13). It is significant that in these texts, the term is never translated but only transliterated, indicating that it had become meaningful in its own right. No longer did the people intend to shout, "Please save us!" Now they intended to praise and bless "the Son of David," the very one to whom they believed Psalm 118:26 was referring when it continued, "Blessed is he who enters in the name of the Lord."
W. S. T.

HOSEA. According to the superscription of the book of Hosea (1:1), the prophet who gave us the first in the order of the twelve so-called minor prophetic books lived and worked during the days of JEROBOAM II (786–746 B.C.), ruler of the northern kingdom of Israel, where Hosea worked. More is known about him as a person than is the case with most of the prophets of the OT because of the account contained in chapters 1–3 of the prophet's symbolic marriage to a "wife of harlotry." From this marriage with Gomer, three children were conceived who were given the symbolic names Jezreel ("for yet a little while, and I will punish the house of Jehu for the blood of Jezreel," 1:4), Not Pitied ("for I will no more have pity on the house of Israel," 1:6), and Not My People ("for you are not my people and I am not your God," 1:9). The first three chapters understand this strange marriage as a metaphor for Yahweh's relationship with Israel.

Assuming that the same woman is spoken of in all three chapters, the married life of Hosea consisted of five stages: (1) Hosea made a covenant with a woman; (2) the covenant was broken; (3) she is to be punished; (4) he cannot let her go; and (5) she will finally return, and their covenant will be renewed. Clearly these are the very things that Hosea wishes to say about the relationship between Israel and God: God made a covenant with Israel at Sinai and there God chose Israel to be his bride, but Israel was faithless and whored after other gods. So God is going to punish the faithless Israel by returning Israel to the wilderness. There God will start afresh with Israel with a new salvation history.

More than date and symbolic marriage, we can say little else about the prophet Hosea except that the word of God in his mouth glows with an intensity and intimacy matched in the OT only by the later prophet Jeremiah. This passion was no accident but sprang directly up from the context in which the prophet worked. The kingdom of Israel was deeply infused by the practices of Canaanite religion, which may even have been mistaken for authentic Yahwism at local sanctuaries. Part of the practice of the fertility cult of Canaan was cult prostitution through which men and women alike sought to achieve union with God and to activate the growth of the crops through sexual union with the god Baal. When Hosea accused Israel of leaving God to play the harlot, he meant it literally (see, for example, 4:11-14). But precisely against such a background, Hosea was willing to draw upon the language of human intimacy; he was the first to speak of the covenant relationship between Yahweh and Israel as one of love (11:1) and to refer to Israel as a wife (Hosea 1–3) or an infant son (11:1-4) of God.

The Book of Hosea. This OT book can be divided into two major sections. Chapters 1–3 contain both the biographical account of Hosea's marriage to GOMER (chaps. 1–2) and a first-person autobiographical account of that marriage (chap. 3). The remainder of the book (chaps. 4–13) consists of an extended collection of oracles describing Israel's unfaithfulness to Yahweh, not any longer under the metaphor of marriage, but nonetheless highly charged with the imagery of "whoring" after Baal. This collection of oracles culminates in chapter 14 with a call to repentance and a promise of forgiveness.

A Theological Summary of the Book of Hosea. The burden of the message of Hosea is contained in his indictments. These fall into four categories. (a) Ethics. Hosea says with passion that Israel has transgressed the covenant (4:1-4; 12:7-8). Unlike his contemporary Amos, who viewed the ethical failure of Israel as a legal transgression, Hosea sees it as a failure of a right relationship with Yahweh. God's people have turned their backs upon the gracious one who gave them the covenant. What God in Amos took as a justification for a death sentence on Israel, in Hosea God takes as a personal affront and the occasion for the most intense divine suffering (9:10-14; 11:1-5). (b) Politics. Hosea also condemns the political machinations of the Israel of his day (7:3-7). He is against political intrigue which, during his lifetime, led to the rise and fall of six kings, most of whom came into power by coup d'etat. (c) Cult. Hosea does not simply indict Israel for the transgression of particular cultic laws but calls the whole practice of religion into question. Against the Canaanized religion that in fact existed, Hosea calls Israel back to the religion that it ought to have observed. The Decalogue, which he knew and proclaimed, laid heavy stress against idolatry; "you shall not make for yourself a graven image, or any likeness of anything . . . you shall not bow down to them or serve them" (Exod. 20:4-5). But in the Israel of Hosea's day, graven images were everywhere, depicting not only Baal but even Yahweh in the golden calves that Jeroboam I had placed in Dan and Bethel (II Kings 16:2-4). Every place had its local BAAL, and in the OT alone we hear of Baals of Samaria, Carmel, Ekron, Herman, Peor, Tabor. The name of Baal's game was fertility, fertilizing the land on an annual cyclical basis and fertilizing people through sacred prostitution. Hosea thunders against such practice as an abomination and calls religion like that, even if intended to strengthen the economy of the land, "harlotry" (see 4:12-14; 9:1-3).

(d) The priesthood. The final topic of indictment in Hosea centers on the priests of the land. The attack is not upon priesthood as such but upon priests who are responsible to convey to people the knowledge of God but who do not do so (4:6). Such a failure means that the people perish because they no longer know the sacred traditions of the past, the account of God's saving activity and the covenant with Israel. The life of the people of God stands or falls as they are successfully related to the objective facts of the faith. Hosea teaches that the recitation of the saving acts of God toward Israel results in the people's inner acknowledgment and their personal bonding with God. Only the people who can acknowledge Yahweh's self-description through Hosea, "I am the Lord your God from the land of Egypt; you know no God but me, and besides me there is no savior" (Hos. 13:4) can understand their past and trust their future.

W.S.T.

HOST. The bread used in Holy Communion, to become Christ's Body; usually a wafer of very thin, unleavened flour. Often, unconsecrated wafers are referred to as hosts, although the consecrated remnant of the Mass kept on the altar of a Roman Catholic church is also called a reserved host. J.C.

HOSTS OF HEAVEN. The "twelve legions of angels" referred to by Jesus in Matthew 26:53; God's heavenly army. The "heavenly hosts" are mentioned in I Kings 22:19 and Luke 2:15, where the angelic host praises the newborn Christ child. Yahweh is known as "the Lord of Hosts" (or armies) in the OT (I Sam. 17:45).

According to Psalm 46:7 and Amos 4:13, as well as Judges 5:20, the hosts of heaven included the stars, heavenly bodies, and all the powers of nature. The song of Deborah (Judges 5) declares: "The stars in their courses fought against Sisera." In popular Christian piety and religious art the angels (or messengers of God) are often represented as armed with swords and viewed as protectors of the weak and the faithful. In Jesus' teaching about the judgment, angels are said to divide the righteous from the wicked, and in Revelation 12:7-9, Michael, the archangel (or general of God's armies), is said to fight the devil and his fallen angels and to defeat them. Revelation 19:11-16 shows the triumphant Christ riding as a warrior at the head of the heavenly host during the final battle of good and evil, decisively and finally winning victory over Satan. J.C.

HOURS, CANONICAL. The set prayers in the DAILY OFFICE of the Roman Catholic church and the Eastern Orthodox church. These include the eight services of prime, lauds, terce, sext, none, vespers, compline, and matins. (The hours have been extensively revised by the canons of Vatican II.) Recitation of the daily office (the Breviary) is a duty of every priest, as part of his spiritual growth. Monasteries regularly observe the full rituals of each of the canonical hours. J.C.

HOWE, JULIA WARD (1819-1910). The author of the "Battle Hymn of the Republic" was born on May 27 in New York City. Howe studied languages, religion, and philosophy, wrote poetry and drama with autobiographical themes—violent love, betrayal, and suicide. Her poem, written during a visit to Washington, D.C., and published in the Atlantic Monthly (February 1862), was unnoticed until it was set to the tune "John Brown's Body."

Later Howe became very active in public life as director of the American Peace Society, founder of the Woman's Peace Association, founder and officer of the New England Women's Club, the New England Woman Suffrage Association, the American Suffrage Association, the Association for the Advancement of Women, and the General Federation of Women's Clubs. She often preached in Unitarian and Universalist pulpits. For twenty years she edited the Woman's Journal. N.H.

HSÜAN TSANG (596?–664). Chinese Buddhist monk and scholar, famous for his pilgrimage to India (A.D. 629–645) in search of Buddhist scriptures, images, and relics. Unable to get permission of the reigning Chinese emperor, Hsüan Tsang slipped away secretly and traveled through central Asia, across the Hindu Kush mountains into India. On the journey he faced many perils and on several occasions almost lost his life.

In India, Tsang traveled widely, studying with famous scholars, visiting places sacred to the memory of the Buddha, and receiving honors from monarchs. Indian monks tried to persuade him not to return to China. At Bodhgaya he saw the bodhi tree, under which the Buddha was enlightened, and a famous statue of Avalokitesvara. According to legend, by the time that this statue had sunken completely into the ground, Buddhism would have disappeared from India. It had then sunk as far as the chest.

On his return to Ch'ang-an, the capital of China, he received a tumultuous welcome. He wrote an account of his travels and spent the remaining years of his life translating into Chinese the scriptures he had brought back with him. He also translated Indian Mahayana texts and founded the "consciousness only" school of BUDDHISM.

In the sixteenth century Wu Ch'eng-en wrote an account of Hsüan Tsang's travels, combined with satire and allegory into a rollicking folk tale known in English as Monkey. K.C.

HSUN TZU. From the Chinese word for "Master Hsun." A Chinese philosopher of the third century B.C., Hsun is the leading spokesman of the extreme rationalistic and naturalistic wing of CONFUCIANISM. Little is known about him apart from the book that bears his name. Rejecting the importance of both supernatural entities and the authority of the past, Hsun Tzu contended that all that is worthwhile to humans is made by humans and transmitted through human culture, which must be continually adapted to changing conditions. Directly countering the assertion of Mencius that human nature is essentially good, Hsun Tzu said that it is evil in the sense of being self-centered originally, but can be made good through education and a good social environment. He thus affirmed in his own way the high value Confucianism places on those factors. He also affirmed the great importance the tradition gave to rites, but taught that for the wise their worth was not really connected to gods or heaven but lay in their power to embellish or release human feeling, channel it into socially valuable forms of expression, and so help hold human society together. Hsun Tzu is of general interest for his early and brilliantly argued attempt to find meaning within a naturalistic world view for traditionally religious values and practices. R.E.

HUBMAIER, BALTHASAR (1485–1528). German ANABAPTIST martyr who wrote the Reformation's first plea for complete religious toleration. A protégé of John Eck at Freiburg and Ingolstadt, he received a doctorate in theology and became cathedral chaplain at Regensburg in 1516. Although anti-Semitic, he thought abuse of Regensburg's Jews was excessive. In 1521 he accepted a parish at Waldshut. He supported Zwingli, and began reforms. Yet in 1524 he defended believers' baptism and published Concerning Heretics and Those Who Burn Them, advocating full toleration. In 1525 he repudiated infant baptism, was rebaptized, and published On the Baptism of Believers, in which he called infant baptism idolatry. Siding with the peasants in 1525, he helped write the Twelve Articles. In December 1525 Austrian troops occupied Waldshut. Hubmaier fled to Zurich, where Zwingli arrested and forced him to recant Anabaptism. In 1526 he renounced the recantation and successfully preached around Nikolsburg, Moravia. Austrian authorities burned him at the stake in Vienna in 1528. C.M.

HÜGEL, BARON FRIEDRICH VON (1852–1925). British Roman Catholic modernist theologian and biblicist. Born in Italy, son of an Austrian diplomat, he received a broad education and developed interests in mysticism, geology, history, and biblical criticism, which he tried to reconcile with his Catholicism. From age fifteen, he lived in England, married, and became naturalized. Modernism racked Catholicism despite Pius IX's Syllabus of Errors (1864), Leo XIII's Providentissimus Deus (1893) upholding biblical inerrancy, and Pius X's Oath Against Modernism (1910). In 1897 Hügel openly propounded multiple sources for the Hexateuch, thus questioning established doctrine on the inspiration, inerrancy, and Mosaic authorship of the Pentateuch. He was a close friend of Alfred Loisy and George Tyrrell, both condemned for their modernism; but Hügel, whose influence extended far beyond Roman Catholicism, escaped official condemnation. Among his books are The Mystical Element of Religion (1908), Eternal Life (1912), and Essays and Addresses on the Philosophy of Religion (1921). C.M.

HUGH OF ST. VICTOR. The main figure of the theological school of St. Victor, which flourished in the outskirts of Paris in the twelfth century. His principal work, The Sacraments of the Christian Faith, is also known as De sacramentis Christianae fidei. His main thesis there is that all knowledge, even that which is not directly theological, is valuable inasmuch as it relates to creation and restoration. To this, Hugh added a mysticism of the type espoused by DIONYSIUS the pseudo-Areopagite. By thus combining theology with general science and with piety, he became one of the main forerunners of SCHOLASTICISM. J.G.

HUGUENOTS. A name given French Protestants after 1560. Before JOHN CALVIN, Protestantism made limited progress in France and enjoyed some royal favor. But in 1533 Francis I began persecuting Protestants, prompting Calvin to dedicate the Institutes to him. Calvin's doctrines spread rapidly, and in 1559 French Protestants meeting in Paris organized along Calvinistic lines. By 1561 Calvinists were a significant political minority. Violent Catholic resistance ensued. War raged between Catholics and Huguenots from 1562 to 1594, almost continuously. On St. Bartholomew's Day (1572) an infamous massacre of Protestants occurred. Following bitter fighting, Huguenot Henry of Navarre became King Henry IV, 1589, and accepted Catholicism in 1593 to secure his kingship. He issued the Edict of Nantes (1598) granting Huguenots toleration. Louis XIV revoked this edict in 1685, causing over 300,000 Huguenots to flee, many to America. Huguenots again won legal standing under Napoleon's concordat with Pope Pius VII (1801). C.M.

HUMANAE VITAE. An encyclical issued by Pope Paul VI, July 29, 1968, that condemned all forms of artificial contraception, leaving abstinence and the rhythm method, approved by Pius XI's encyclical Casti connubi (1930), as the only sanctioned means of birth control for Roman Catholics. The encyclical cited no scriptural texts, went against the study committee's recommendations, and evoked angry protests from Roman Catholics throughout the world. This pronouncement, seen by many as a deliberate show of papal authority, asked world governments to ban all birth control means contrary to divine and natural law and jeopardized Vatican Council II's principle of collegiality. C.M.

HUMANISM. A cultural movement usually identified with the Renaissance and Reformation (1350-1600) revival of Greco-Roman-Hebraic antiquities. It represents a gradual shift from other-worldly to this-worldly concerns, symbolized in Protagoras' statement that "man is the measure of all things." With the rise of modern rationalism and science, the transcendent element in humanism greatly weakened. "The Humanist Manifesto" (1933), issued by John Dewey and other social leaders, discarded belief in God as a helpful ingredient for living.

Originating in fourteenth-century Italy when papal credibility was low, humanism revived the classical sources of Western culture and exalted literature and art as ends in themselves. Early proponents include Francesco Petrarch (1304-74), who promoted classical literature and philosophy for personal, human enrichment; Poggio Bracciolini (1380-1459), who reveled in the paganism of old; and Coluccio Salutati (1330-1404), who saw in humanism a means of social betterment. Humanism was called the New Learning in sharp contrast to scholasticism's Old Learning. Before the fall of Constantinople to the Muslims (1453), hundreds of classical manuscripts were collected and translated. The printing press made wide circulation possible. Florence, a leading humanistic center, soon boasted a full translation of Plato's works into Latin. Nobility an clergy alike became patrons. Many humanists worked within the church, but a subtle denigration of ecclesiasticism emerged, particularly in the celebration of paganism and materialism as laudable goals, in Lorenzo Valla's forgery exposure in 1440 of The Donation of Constantine (a self-serving papal document), and in Machiavelli's The Prince, which glorified self-interest.

Northern humanism exemplified in Johann Reuchlin, Philip Melancthon, and Jacques LeFèvre greatly extended Hebraic studies and education. The acknowledged prince of northern humanism was Desiderius ERASMUS, who sought to advance piety and culture with his Greek NT (1516), "philosophy of Christ," and humorous satires of cultural inadequacies. William Grocyn and Thomas Linacre introduced humanism into Oxford University, and Erasmus and John Fisher influenced the humanistic blossoming of Cambridge University. Humanism in its many facets is especially known for stressing human reason, education, freedom, optimism, anticlericalism, and belief in progress. C.M.

HUMAN NATURE. Human beings have long been aware that they occupy a peculiar place in the world. Obviously they are, in some degree, a part of nature, and the theory of evolution has made it clear that we are descended from animal ancestors and share many characteristics with the animals. Yet we differ from even those animals that stand nearest to us on the evolutionary scale in ways that are not merely quantitative but qualitative. A leap into a new manner of existence has taken place, even in matters like sexuality and death, which on the surface seem to be very similar in human and animal life. For human beings, sex has become a personal, not a merely biological relation, while the fact that we know we are going to die makes possible a relation to time that an animal cannot have.

In addition, human beings have developed a whole range of activities that are simply unknown at the lower animal level or, at the most, are only very dimly foreshadowed. Such activities are language, art, science, religion, politics, and dozens of others. This special place of the human being finds expression in the theological statement that we are made in the image of God (Gen. 1:26). Admittedly, there has been much debate over the meaning of this affirmation. Some have seen the image in dominion, in human responsibility for the Creation, so that humans are in some sense God's steward or vice-regent; others have seen the image in rationality, but this may be too narrow a reading of the relation. Perhaps the most satisfactory interpretation is that the image of God in the human being is the capacity for a limited measure of freedom and creativity.

It is this in human existence that makes a difference from the animals and suggests a similarity, however distant, to God as the Creator of all that exists. Some of the early Christian writers, including Irenaeus, noted that in the Genesis story God had made the man and woman "in our image, after our likeness," and they supposed that the image was the potentiality for growth toward God, while the likeness would be the completion of the process, a relation so close to God that they spoke of "deification." Although their reading of Genesis was exegetically improbable, it nevertheless afforded a genuine insight into biblical anthropology. The Bible sees our human nature as unfinished and embarked upon a pilgrimage, the end of which will be a full communion with God.

This insight accords very well with modern conceptions of human transcendence, a continual crossing of new horizons without any end in sight. Many other principles of Christian and Jewish anthropology can be derived from the early creation stories. The fact that we are dealing with the couple, man and woman, points to the fundamentally social nature of the human being, often expressed in modern times by the statement that there is no "I" without a "thou." (See I-THOU AND I-IT.)

Again, the human being is from the beginning embodied. The body is prior to any mention of a fall, so that in opposition to GnosticisM and its modern equivalents, the Judeo-Christian tradition has had respect for the body and has been concerned about the material conditions of life, and has never represented SALVATION as an escape from entanglement in the material world. The story of the Creation is succeeded by that of the Fall. Though humanity may have been created in the image of God, the humanity that we know is disordered. It is important to note, however, that although SIN enters the human story very near the beginning, the story makes it quite clear that there is a goodness and righteousness that is more original than the most original sin. So sin is not itself a part of human nature, but rather its perversion. However, the Fall into sin is an inescapable element in the human condition, and the NT even more strongly than the OT insists on its universality (Rom. 3:23). Some theologians have held that the spiritual sin of pride is fundamental, for although humanity is called to the closest union with God, it wishes rather to usurp God's place—so the original temptation was, "You shall be like God" (Gen. 3:5). Others, in view of the unmistakable sexual overtones of the story of the Fall, have stressed the sins of sloth and sensuality.

Actually, both types of sin can be seen as following from the biblical understanding of the human being as compounded of freedom and finitude. Humans are tempted to deny their finitude and seek to be God, and on the other hand to reject their freedom and descend to being creatures of the appetites.

The OT anthropology is taken over by the NT, and there are still many allusions to it, but it is transformed by the central place given to Jesus Christ. He is the one in whom the image of God has been fulfilled and who has overcome sin, so that he is the archetype of the new humanity. The distinctively Christian anthropology is worked out most fully by Paul. He introduced new concepts, such as conscience, and stresses the place of faith and grace. Love is set forth as the highest of the Christian virtues. Paul also develops teaching about the resurrection life and human destiny beyond death, far beyond anything in the earlier tradition.

Much of the Christian and biblical anthropology was expressed in a terminology that has now become outmoded and that was in any case pictorial and inexact. Modern writers on the subject have made use of new terminologies offered by psychology, sociology, existentialism, and other philosophies of human nature. The Christian teaching accords very closely with many modern insights. We have seen that the basic notion of pilgrimage corresponds to the modern idea of transcendence, and parallels have been drawn also between sin and alienation, between faith and commitment, between salvation and integration, and so on. J.M.

HUME, DAVID (1711–76). Scottish philosopher, skeptic, and historian. Born in Edinburgh and educated at Edinburgh University, Hume failed to secure a professorship, yet distinguished himself through writing. He lived most of his life in Edinburgh, but held several government posts and became a popular British embassy secretary in Paris. Jean Jacques Rousseau was a close friend. Hume's outstanding works include Treatise of Human Nature (3 vols.; 1739–40), Essays Moral and Political (2 vols.; 1741–42), Philosophical Essays, containing "Essay on Miracles" (1748), An Enquiry Concerning Human Understanding (1751), Political Discourses (1752), History of England (5 vols.; 1754–61), and Dialogues on Natural Religion (posthumous, 1779).

Hume maintained that human knowledge comes from experience, from impressions. We can relate ideas logically, but cannot know actual reality. Cause-and-effect is the product of customary association, not logic. The existence of material things, God, and an experiencing "I" cannot be proved. This incisive skepticism shook metaphysics and science. Concerning miracles, Hume argued it is more likely that reporters of miracles are deceived or deceivers than that nature's regularity, which we experience, has been interrupted. Hume's skepticism left human knowledge in shambles and directly inspired IMMANUEL KANT'S famous critiques of reason. C.M.

HUMILITY. Judaism and Christianity teach that humility characterizes the proper attitude of human creatures toward God and one's fellows. Greek literature exposes the folly of hubris (PRIDE, arrogance), and the triumph of the gods is sometimes consequent upon their humiliation; but the concept of humility in Western civilization has its primary roots in the OT.

Humility in the Old Testament. The remembrance of Israel's humble origin provided a restraint upon the creation of social structures based on military might and wealth. Israel's God was revealed as one who delivers the humble, the poor, and the afflicted, and brings down the haughty (I Sam. 2:6-8; Deut. 7:7-8). In much of Israel's history humility or humiliation, a condition of material poverty and oppression, becomes a spiritual trait of "the righteous" or devout (Pss. 22:22-26; 25:6-9; Prov. 16:5-9, 18; 22:4, 22-23).

Humility in the New Testament. The OT background of the Gospels' teaching concerning humility is given prominence in the Beatitudes of Jesus ("blessed are you poor," Luke 6:20; "poor in spirit," Matt. 5:3-6), and in Mary's Magnificat (compare Luke 1:52 and I Sam. 2:7). The old expectation is affirmed, but most references to humility in the NT relate not to a spiritual self-abnegation but to objective states of poverty and affliction (Jas. 4:6; I Pet. 5:6). Above all else, the divine condescension of Jesus exemplified humility (John 3:1-17; Phil. 2:3-8; II Cor. 10:1; I Cor. 13:4-5; Rom. 12:3). J.P.

HURRIANS. An ancient, powerful nation, originating in Armenia, and moving into the Near Eastern area around 2500 B.C. These people, also known in the OT as the HORITES and HIVITES, flourished in the middle Euphrates Valley from about 2500 to 1000 B.C. The Hurrians were the overlords of the Assyrians, and Assyria was not able to develop until the Hurrians' Mitanni Empire declined. The Hurrians were so widespread that they were present in Canaan when the Israelites arrived at the time of the conquest. They are mentioned in Genesis 14:6; 36:30; Deuteronomy 2:12, 22; and Joshua 9:1.

Significant literary remains of the Hurrians have been discovered at Ugarit, Nui, and Mari. These writings show that many myths and legends of the Assyrians, Babylonians, and the Israelites originated among the Hurrians. The Hurrians fell under the rule of the Hittites from Asia Minor in the fourteenth century B.C. and became part of the Assyrian Empire in the thirteenth century B.C. J.C.

HUSS, JOHN (1373?-1415). Bohemian Czech reformer, martyred at the Council of CONSTANCE for Wyclifite views. Born a peasant at Husinec, he earned an M.A. at Prague University (1396), lectured in theology, was ordained (1400), and became rector at Prague (1402). Despite the condemnation of WYCLIFFE's views, Huss continued translating and preaching them in his Czech sermons at Prague's Bethlehem Chapel. Huss insisted on scriptural guidance, God's sovereign ownership, responsible stewardship, Christlike poverty, abolition of priestly immoralities, and a predestinated church of the elect. His popularity combined with growing Czech nationalism to make him a hero.

The GREAT SCHISM (1378) had left Christendom with popes at Avignon and Rome. To remedy this situation the Council of Pisa (1409) elected Alexander V pope, but the other two popes did not quit. Christendom now had three popes, each of whom had significant political backing. Alexander V and John XXIII (his successor) both condemned and excommunicated Huss. Bohemia's ruling authorities went along, but the followers of Huss, called Hussites, supported him. Two conferences during 1412-13 failed to achieve peace. Huss's On Simony and On the Church (largely dependent on Wycliffe) declared the pope was Antichrist and appealed to a general council. Emperor Sigismund granted Huss safe-conduct for the Council of Constance (1414-18), but once there Huss was betrayed, imprisoned, and burned at the stake—a victim of political-religious intrigue. His death sparked over fifty years of Czech revolution and directly influenced the REFORMATION. C.M.

HUSSERL, EDMUND (1859-1938). Successively professor at Hälle, Göttingen, and Freiburg, and celebrated as the principal exponent of PHENOMENOLOGY. His aim was to make philosophy a strict science. That would mean that it must differ from the empirical sciences, whose results can be only approximate, and from any form of philosophy depending on chains of argument, which are always liable to error.

Phenomenology is intended to be a purely descriptive science. It describes what shows itself in consciousness as it shows itself and seeks to exclude both distorting presuppositions and dubious deductions. If this program is to be carried out, it demands a rigorous discipline on the part of the investigator. The investigator has to concentrate on universal essences, and to do this must "bracket" or exclude from consideration elements that belong to the particular instance and likewise exclude from the mind influences that come from earlier philosophical theories. Husserl himself moved toward an idealist metaphysics, recognizing consciousness as the fundamental reality. However, his descriptive method can be employed apart from his own philosophical conclusion, and it has in fact been widely used in investigating various areas of conscious experience, including religious experience. J.M.

HUTCHINSON, ANNE MARBURY (1591-1643). The woman who first questioned NEW ENGLAND THEOLOGY. Her mother was Bridget Dryden, her father Francis Marbury, an outspoken

Church of England cleric repeatedly censured for his views.

The family moved to London in 1605, where on August 9, 1612, Anne married William Hutchinson. Influenced by JOHN COTTON, the Hutchinsons emigrated to Massachusetts Bay in 1634. They soon became leaders: William as a merchant and landowner; Anne as nurse and midwife.

Anne, as she had in England, conducted semi-weekly classes for women to discuss Scripture and sermons. Elaborating on Cotton's "Covenant of Grace," Hutchinson taught the indwelling witness of the Spirit, which made external evidence of sanctification superfluous. She was labeled ANTINOMIAN.

Soon the colony was divided between the Hutchinsons and Governor John Winthrop. Condemned by a church synod in September 1637, the General Court in November 1637, and a church trial in March 1638, she was excommunicated and banished to Rhode Island. After William's death in 1642, she and six children fled Puritan harassment and went to Dutch territory on Long Island, where they were murdered by Indians in 1643. N.H.

HUTTERIAN BRETHREN. Oldest surviving Anabaptist group, originating in Moravia (1529). Swiss refugees led by Jacob Wiedemann pooled their resources (Acts 4:32-37) and settled at Nikolsburg, Austerlitz, and Auspitz. The Hutterites' name derives from Jacob Hutter, a Swiss minister who joined them (1529), became their charismatic leader and reorganizer (1533), and was martyred (1536). Despite severe persecution, the Hutterites survived. The communities, called Bruderhofs, resembled disciplined monasteries: they allowed marriage, held property in common, stressed crafts, and practiced pacifism. At their height, 1556-1620, they had one hundred communities and numbered twenty thousand. (During the Thirty Years' War, persecution reduced this number to two thousand.) Many, known as Habaner, were forced into Catholicism; others fled east. In 1802 many settled in Russia. The first Russian Bruderhof was established in 1857. Fearing military conscription, in company with Russian Mennonites, the brethren emigrated to South Dakota (1874-79). Abuse during World War I caused them to flee to Canada, Paraguay, and England. Many have since returned. They preach old sermons, use modern machinery, and speak English and German (compare RADICAL REFORMATION). C.M.

HUXLEY, THOMAS (1825-95). English biologist and advocate of evolution. Born in Ealing, Middlesex, he studied medicine and was admitted to the Royal College of Surgeons in 1845. Becoming an assistant surgeon on HMS Rattlesnake (1846-50), he studied tropical life-forms while touring Australasian waters, and was made a Fellow of the Royal Society on returning to England. In 1854, after publishing several scientific papers, he became professor of natural history and paleontology at the Royal School of Mines. For him scientific study was a way to solve human needs. He enthusiastically endorsed DARWIN'S Origin of Species (1859) and lectured widely in support of evolution. His Zoological Evidences as to Man's Place in Nature (1863) defended humanity's descent from lower animals. He published a favorable study of Hume in 1879 and subsequently abandoned belief in a personal God in favor of an abstract unknowable impersonality. He heightened his attacks on Christian orthodoxy and extended his agnosticism to knowing little about Christ with certainty. The lucidity of his writings helped make evolution palatable to both scientists and commoners. His writings also include Lay Sermons (1870), Science and Culture (1881), and Evolution and Ethics (1893). Aldous and Julian Huxley were his grandsons.

C.M.

HYKSOS. Invaders from Asia who ruled Egypt during the Fifteenth and Sixteenth Dynasties (1720-1550 B.C.). The term "Hyksos" was given this vigorous people by the Egyptian historian of the Ptolemaic period, Manetho. The name is derived from Kikau-Khoswet, Old Egyptian for "rulers of foreign countries," and actually was used before Manetho to apply to chiefs of Nubian tribes and nomadic leaders. Some have seen the meaning "shepherd kings" (or nomadic tribal chiefs) behind the name. We have Manetho's assessment of the Hyksos only through Flavius Josephus' Contra Apionem. Actually, Josephus misconstrued history, identifying the Hyksos with the Hebrews (from Joseph to Moses). Josephus wanted to show that the Jews had a longer history than the Greeks and declared that the Hyksos were Hebrews who subjugated Egypt until driven out at the time of the Exodus.

What is sure is that the Hyksos, who ruled Egypt from Avaris-Tanis rather than the capital at Thebes, controlled Egypt during the time of Joseph. The stories in Genesis fit in well with a Hyksos (foreign) domination of the country. The Hyksos introduced the use of horses and armored chariots and the powerful compound bow to Egypt, and the use of these weapons spread throughout the Middle East. This warlike people worshiped Baal and the mother goddess, Anat.

J.C.

HYMENAUS. A teacher in the early church, mentioned in the Pastorals (I Tim. 1:20; II Tim. 2:17). In both instances he is associated with doctrines and practices adjudged false by the Pauline writer, namely a denial of the future resurrection and consequent relaxing of morality. Both features were attributed to later Gnostic teachings.

R.M.

HYMNS. See the individual authors.

HYMNS, ANCIENT AND MODERN. This volume, first published in 1861 and last revised in 1950, represents the beginning of modern English hymnody. Characterized by an austerity of style and conformity to the Book of Common Prayer, this book sets each hymn to a proper tune. Its publication represented a milestone because the Church of England, spurred by the Wesleyan revival, only accepted hymn singing as part of its services in the 1820s. Prior to hymns, metric and chanted psalms were used. The book was influenced by the OXFORD MOVEMENT.

N.H.

HYPOCRISY. The terms "hypocrisy" and "hypocrite" are derivatives of Greek words for acting, actor. Metaphorically, in Greek literature they refer to a person's appearing to be what one is not. The predominant usage is moralistic; thus the hypocrite is one who pretends to be good or upright when one really is not so. It is often noted that there were no comparable Hebrew or Aramaic words. The RSV correctly registers this fact by eliminating from earlier English versions of the OT the words hypocrisy, hypocrite.

Since Jesus spoke in Aramaic, it is improbable that he rebuked the Pharisees of feigning piety. Several passages in the Synoptic Gospels provide alternative readings. For example, "their hypocrisy" in Mark 12:15 is corrected by Matthew by using a Greek term that is translated "their malice" (Matt. 22:18). In Luke 20:23 another Greek synonym is used, which is translated "their craftiness."

In Galatians 2:13 the verb and noun translated "acted insincerely" and "insincerity" refer to the refusal of Peter and Barnabas, under pressure from Judaizers, to continue to have table fellowship with Gentile Christians. Paul accuses them, not of playing a false part but for exhibiting a "lack of principle" (NEB), a breach of faith!

In view of the above it may be concluded that Jesus accused certain scribes of being outwardly religious while inwardly profane (Mark 7:6). In this context

Jesus quoted Isaiah 29:13: "this people . . . honor me with their lips, while their hearts are far from me. . . ."

J.P.

HYPOSTATIC UNION/HYPOSTASIS. The term hypostasis, which can be translated literally as "substance," played an important role in the controversies having to do with the TRINITY and with CHRISTOLOGY. In the trinitarian context, it was used by the Greeks to distinguish between Father, Son, and Holy Spirit, and therefore they spoke of "one ousia (or essence) and three hypostases." This in turn led to confusion, for the Latin-speaking West, which preferred the formula "one substance and three persons," feared that the Greeks were speaking of what would be three "substances" to the Latins. It was only after these matters of terminology were clarified that the Greek and Latin branches of the church could agree on the final trinitarian formulas, "one substance [or ousia] in three persons [or hypostases]."

In the christological controversies, the term "hypostasis" was used to refer to the person in which the divine and the human natures are united. The phrase "hypostatic union," first used by CYRIL OF ALEXANDRIA in the NESTORIAN controversy, meant that in Christ the divine and human natures subsist in the one divine "hypostasis." In other words, that Christ is fully human, but that Christ's humanity subsists in Christ's divine hypostasis, or person. Cyril's views on this matter, variously interpreted and adapted, became standard christological orthodoxy.

J.G.

HYSSOP. Origanum maru or marjoram, a member of the mint family; a small shrub grown in Palestine. It has hairlike leaves and stiff branches, which made it suitable for sprinkling water or blood in ceremonies and sacrifices. Hyssop is mentioned as being used to convey water to Jesus on the cross in John 19:29, but Matthew 27:48 and Mark 15:36 refer to this as a reed. John may be using symbolism here, as hyssop is connected with sacrifices.

J.C.

I AM. As soon as Moses had received his call from God while standing in awe before the burning bush on Horeb, the mountain of God (Exod. 3:1-12), he urgently asked the Holy One for his name (v. 13). Although God did very shortly disclose to Moses the sacred personal name YAHWEH, God elected first to propound to Moses a riddle: "I am who I am" (v. 14). Through all the ensuing ages the faithful have struggled to grasp the meaning of this cryptic utterance. At one level it seems to propose an etymological connection between the name YHWH and the verb HYH, "to be"—as though God's personal name were "being" itself. This is what the Septuagint translators of Exodus 3:14 understood the puzzle to mean: "I am Being." Most interpreters have understood verse 14 as a commentary upon Yahweh's name, but even then questions remain. Is Yahweh's answer to Moses an affirmation of his immutability and eternity: I AM WHAT I AM (RSV margin)? Is it an assurance of his utter steadfastness: I AM WHO I AM (RSV text)? Or is God teaching Moses that the profile of the divine character will be disclosed in the history of salvation, which lies ahead; I WILL BE WHAT I WILL BE (RSV margin)? Any of these three meanings is possible grammatically, and each of them conveys an important theological truth. W.S.T.

IBN 'ARABĪ (1165–1240). A Muslim mystic. He wrote a total of 270 works, most of which dealt with SUFISM. In The Wisdom of the Prophets, he describes the way each of the twenty-seven major prophets approached the question of the unity of God. The contents of this book were revealed to him in a single night when he was sixty-five years old.

K.C.

IBN HANBAL (780–855). A scholar of Islamic law and founder of one of the four legal schools accepted by SUNNI Muslims. Since Islam was from the beginning a total way of life, legal decisions in every area were based on the principles of the religion. The Hanbalite school is conservative, basing its teachings on the QUR'AN and the Sunna (traditions) that had been handed down from the time of the Prophet Muhammad. Ibn Hanbal rejected the two other bases for Islamic legal decision: (1) reasoning by analogy, and (2) opinions given by qualified jurists and accepted by the believing community as expressing a general consensus.

The Hanbalite school had been declining in influence until the rise of the WAHABI movement in Saudi Arabia in the nineteenth century, when it began to gain new importance.

K.C.

IBN TAYMĪYYA (1263–1328). A scholar of Islamic law in the Hanbalite school (see IBN HANBAL). He was often involved in controversy and as a result spent much of his adult life in prison. He interpreted the QUR'AN literally, including the descriptions of God in anthropomorphic terms, and rejected any customs lacking a basis in the Qur'an or the SUNNA (tradition). One such custom was the veneration of saints. K.C.

ICHABOD. The son of Phinehas and grandson of Eli, priest of the shrine at Shiloh. He was born on the day that the Philistines defeated Israel and captured the ark, the news of which caused Eli's death (I Sam. 4:17-22). In Hebrew, Ichabod means "no glory." J.C.

I CHING. The ancient Chinese Book of Changes, one of the five Confucian classics and a book of divination. It assumes a cosmic order of growth, degeneration, and renewal that can be tapped into through the religious or magical rite of divination. Confucian scholars study the I Ching to obtain a fuller understanding of the underlying processes of the world and of how to take advantage of them.

The text describes the eight trigrams, each composed of three broken or solid lines, and the sixty-four hexagrams formed by all possible combinations of two trigrams. The broken lines represent yin, the feminine principle, and the solid lines yang, the male principle. The trigrams and hexagrams are symbolic of the various states of nature, society, and the individual. The circular arrangement of the trigrams represents the cycle of time.

The creation of the trigrams and their first circular arrangement is attributed to Fu Hsi, a figure of ancient Chinese legend. The sixty-four hexagrams are attributed to King Wen (reigned 1191-1122 B.C.), who also made the second circular arrangement of the trigrams. Fu Hsi's arrangement is easily grasped, as opposite trigrams are also opposite in the arrangement of broken and solid lines: broken, solid, broken is across from solid, broken, solid, etc. However, the King Wen arrangement of the trigrams has puzzled scholars. Furthermore, the only order apparent in the arrangement of the hexagrams is that each even-numbered one is either the preceding hexagram upside down, or its opposite (exchanging solid and broken lines).

To consult the I Ching the inquirer should phrase a question such as, What will the consequences be if I take the action I have in mind? The diviner then constructs a hexagram line by line from the bottom up. The traditional method uses stalks of yarrow (achillea millefolium) in a complicated ceremony to arrive at a number from six to nine: six is a yin line, seven is an "old" yang, eight is an "old" yin, and nine is a yang line. The faster method, popular with diviners who work at fairs and on the street, uses three coins to produce each line. Interestingly enough, the two methods result in different probabilities of producing "old" lines, a fact that has not affected the accuracy of the prophecies. After the hexagram is complete, "old" yang lines are changed to yin and "old" yin lines are changed to yang to produce a new hexagram. The commentaries on both hexagrams are then consulted to find an answer to the question. Because the meaning is expressed in vague and symbolic language, it requires considerable interpretation. (See YIN/YANG.)

King Wen wrote the first commentaries: the "Judgments," expressing the good or bad consequences of the action recommended, and the "Images," describing the meaning of the hexagrams in archetypal terms. King Wen's son, the Duke of Chou (died 1094 B.C.), wrote the "Appended Judgments," the last addition to the book before the time of CONFUCIUS (551-479 B.C.). There is a tradition that Confucius said, "If some years were added to my life, I would give fifty to the study of the Yi [I Ching], and might then escape falling into great errors." Confucian scholars added commentaries to the I Ching down to the first century A.D., when the present edition took final form. K./M.C.

ICHTHUS. See ACROSTIC.

Courtesy of the National Gallery of Art, Washington, D.C. Andrew W. Mellon Collection

Madonna and Child on a curved throne, an example of a Byzantine icon

ICON/ICONOGRAPHY. The word "icon" means "image," but since the ICONOCLASTIC CONTROVERSY icon has been used to refer specifically to the Eastern images, which are flat, and usually paintings or mosaics. Iconography, on the other hand, studies not only icons in this narrow sense, but all representation of Christian ideas, events, and legends. The iconography of the early church was both symbolic—the fish and the shepherd, for instance, represented Jesus—and pictorial, in paintings of the Last Supper, Noah in the ark, and others. After Constantine I, Christian art took on a triumphant character, often representing Christ enthroned in glory, and decorating crosses with precious stones. It also became didactic, particularly in the West, where it was seen as a way to teach Christian doctrines and stories to the illiterate masses. Romanesque and Gothic architecture made ample use of iconography, both as a didactic and as an ornamental device. At the time of the Reformation, many rejected the use of images altogether, although other Protestants saw value in them as long as superstition was avoided. The Council of Trent reaffirmed the use of images, but also sought to avoid superstitious abuses. J.G.

ICONIUM. A town in Asia Minor visited by Paul and Barnabas on their first missionary journey (Acts 13; 14). Its place in the later tradition of Paul's mission cities is seen in II Timothy 3:11. Timothy is said to be recommended by the leader of the church at Iconium (Acts 16:1-2), and it became the scene, in the apocryphal literature, for the encounter between Paul and Thecla, a female convert from Iconium. R.M.

ICONOCLASTIC CONTROVERSY. A controversy regarding the use of images, or ICONS, in worship, which raged in the Eastern church during the eighth century, and also involved the West. It began in A.D. 725, when Byzantine Emperor Leo III ordered the destruction of a much venerated image of Christ. This was followed by other decrees against images. The iconoclasts (destroyers of images) based their actions on the biblical injunctions against images and also on the criticism of their Moslem neighbors. Political and economic interests were added, which the iconoclastic emperors sought to further by curtailing the power of the monks, who were the main defenders of images.

The controversy eventually led to persecution of defenders of images in the East, and to the excommunication of the emperor by Pope Gregory II. In 787, the seventh ecumenical council gathered at Nicaea under the auspices of Pope Adrian I and regent Empress Irene. This council upheld the use of images, although distinguishing between the "respect and veneration" due them and the "true worship" (latría) to be reserved for God. Even after the council, there was a revival of iconoclasm in the East, until the images were finally restored by regent Empress Theodora on March 11, 842—still celebrated in the Eastern churches as the Feast of Orthodoxy. In the West Charlemagne refused to accept the decrees of the council, terming them "idolatry," but the decline of Carolingian power finally brought the Frankish church to agreement with the use of images. J.G.

ID. See FREUD, SIGMUND.

IDEALISM. One of the basic philosophical streams in Western thought, affirming that what is not seen is more real than what is seen. Idealism is the theory that affirms that ideas are more real than concrete observable phenomena. It gives a central role to the ideal or the spiritual. Abstractions and principles are considered more fundamental than sensory experiences.

Ethical idealism puts emphasis on moral principles and frequently universalizes and accents moral freedom. Metaphysical idealism, in opposition to MATERIALISM, affirms that the idea is the real. Epistemological idealism asserts that the mind grasps only what can be perceived—in opposition to REALISM.

PLATO is credited with being the originator of idealistic thought in the Western world. He believed, as did his teacher Socrates, that truth could be found through the development of the mind. Greek thought early influenced Christianity, and NT ideas are sometimes couched in Greek terms, although perhaps not with Greek meanings: Logos (Word), truth, light. The struggle with Neoplatonic thought occupied the early centuries, and heresy was often synonymous with GNOSTICISM. The soul or spirit was viewed as superior to the flesh and the Hebrew concept of body/soul synthesis was obscured. AUGUSTINE, a seminal theologian writing during the period of the fall of Rome, combined Greek and Christian thought in ways that became basic to the medieval philosophical tradition.

Modern idealism takes its rise from RENÉ DESCARTES (1596–1650), whose famous dictum "I think therefore I am" reaffirmed the mind as the primary force in human existence. The process of thinking and the intellectual life took on a transcendent quality. In IMMANUEL KANT idealism was interpreted as moral philosophy, going beyond "pure reason" to postulate the "categorical imperative" with the thesis that moral law is written into the universe. In Kant the search for truth takes on a moral dimension.

Still working in the realm of ideas, HEGEL developed his theory of dialectical thinking: thesis, antithesis, and synthesis, through which opposites become reconciled to achieve wholeness and rationality. Paradox and ambiguity do not exist in the idealistic realm.

The American form of idealism is PERSONALISM, as developed by E. S. BRIGHTMAN. His thesis states that the person, or human personality, is the true reality; not the physical being, but the inner person who thinks, purposes, and holds ideals.

Idealism has always been a strong note within Eastern philosophy, particularly in India. Idealistic schools were earlier found in China. Idealism strongly influenced nineteenth-century Protestant theology in England, Germany, and the United States, particularly through the transcendentalist movement in New England. I.C.

IDOLATRY. Both in the Bible and in modern usage, this term ranges in meaning from the narrow sense of offering sacrifice and prayer to a material representation of deity (an "idol") to the broad sense of treating as of ultimate importance some person, thing, or concept other than God. The actual term "idolatry" (eidōlōlatreia) is used most frequently in the NT, where it is listed among the "works of the flesh" (see Gal. 5:20; I Pet. 4:3). In Colossians 3:5, the figurative sense appears in the phrase "covetousness, which is idolatry." The same equation (though with the term "idolator") is also offered in Ephesians 5:5 and indirectly in Philippians 3:19, "their god is the belly." The more literal sense, worship of idols, is treated at some length by Paul in I Corinthians 8:1-13 and 10:14-33. In these passages the apostle makes light of idols as such ("we know that 'an idol has no real existence,' and that 'there is no god but one,'" 8:4). The issue is whether or not a Christian believer is wrong to be present at the festival table of a non-Christian friend at which food blessed in the name of pagan deities is eaten. While acknowledging that the idolatrous practice is of no effect, being based upon no reality whatever, Paul cautions against letting "this liberty of yours somehow become a stumbling block to the weak" (8:9).

The term "idolatry" as such occurs only three times in the RSV of the OT. In I Samuel 15:23, it is a translation of the Hebrew term teraphim, elsewhere taken to mean a household god image (see Gen. 31:19-35; Judg. 17:5-18:20; II Sam. 19:13-16; II Kings 23:24; Ezek. 21:21; Hos. 3:4; Zech. 10:2). In Ezekiel 23:49 the very common term gillulim, "idols," is translated abstractly as "idolatry." Ezekiel 43:9 reads "now let them put away their idolatry" (zenuth, KJV, "whoredom"). However, the concept, if not the actual term, is richly pervasive. In addition to those already mentioned, a whole repertoire of synonymous terms and euphemisms is employed to indicate the presence of misplaced allegiance in worship. Hebrew and Aramaic terms sometimes translated "idol" can also mean iniquity, terror, horror, grief, abomination, form, graven image, pillar.

Now it is not in the least surprising that Israel should have had to contend with the lure of idolatry. The ancient Near Eastern context out of which Israel emerged at the end of the thirteenth century B.C. was replete with cults and state religions that stressed the presence of deity in all aspects of nature. Egyptian religion identified the sun as AMON-RE, the king of the GODS; other deities were shown in animal forms, including the jackal-headed god of the dead, Anubis, and Hathor, the cow goddess. Mesopotamian religion, with which Israel had contact in its formative periods but again during the period of Assyrian domination and the Babylonian exile, represented the greater and lesser gods in both animal and human forms and permitted worship in local sanctuaries with the use of crude images and amulets.

Above all, Israel had to contend with the religion of Canaan that preceded and surrounded Israel throughout its ancient tenure in the land of Palestine. The chief god in the Canaanite pantheon, El, was entitled "the bull," and the rain god, the cloud-rider Baal, was seen as a warrior who wore a bull-horned helmet. The fertility goddess ASTARTE (alluded to in the OT by the terms ashtaroth, Judg. 2:13, and sometimes asherah, Judg. 6:25-32; I Kings 18-19; II Kings 21:7) was widely and crudely pictured in statuettes and amulets throughout the Near East, even in Israel. In fact, it is clear that the popular religion of Israel, in contrast to the pure Yahwism described by the pentateuchal writers and proclaimed by the prophets, was deeply affected by the idolatrous practices of Canaan. This is explicit in the account of the establishment at Samaria by King Ahab of Israel of the BAAL cult of his wife, the Sidonian princess Jezebel (I Kings 16:31-32). It is equally explicit in the much later account of the reforms of Hezekiah (II Kings 18:3-4) and Josiah (II Kings 23). The latter text speaks specifically of idolatrous priests "who burned incense to Baal, to the sun, and the moon, and the constellations, and all the host of the heavens" (23:5). It speaks of the ASHERAH that was in the house of the Lord, the male cult prostitutes, the high places all over the country, and the place called Topheth in the vale of Hinnom near Jerusalem where people burned their children as offerings to Molech. It speaks of the chariots of the sun and the altars on the roof, and even of the high places that "Solomon the king of Israel had built for Ashtoreth the abomination of the Sidonians, and for Chemosh the abomination of Moab, and for Milcom the abomination of the Ammonites" (v. 13).

If popular religion in Israel was so deeply penetrated by the practices of Canaan, it is no wonder that the first commandment—like the rest of the Decalogue probably incorporated into the Sinai account by the Elohist writer who is believed to have worked in the northern kingdom of Israel in the ninth century B.C.—makes a fundamental distinction: "You shall have no other gods before me" (Exod. 20:3; compare Deut. 5:7). "Other gods" may exist; the commandment does not deny that possibility. But they must not interfere in the complete bonding that is to take place between Yahweh and the chosen people, Israel. This commandment is a demand for total allegiance and bears a direct relationship to Israel's most fundamental confession, "Hear, O Israel; the Lord our God is one Lord" (or perhaps even better, "the Lord is our God, the Lord alone," Deut. 6:4).

The account of the reform of Josiah (about 621 B.C.) already alluded to concludes with the remark that Josiah pulled down "the altar at Bethel, the high place erected by Jeroboam the son of Nebat, who made Israel to sin" (II Kings 23:15). This is a reference to the cult established as a rival to that of Jerusalem by the first king of the northern kingdom of Israel after its secession from the united monarchy of Solomon (I Kings 12:25-33). Many now suggest that the two golden calves that Jeroboam placed, one in Dan and one in Bethel, were actually either footstools or representations of Yahweh. If so, the king may have been speaking of Yahweh when he dedicated them with the words, "Behold your gods, O Israel, who brought you up out of the land of Egypt" (v. 28). However, the establishment of an image, even an image of Yahweh, was regarded by the deuteronomic writers as a sin that affected the entire history of Israel (see I Kings 14:7-16). In forbidding graven images, the second commandment (Exod. 20:4-6; Deut. 5:8-10) probably intends to forbid exactly the kind of thing represented by Jeroboam's golden calves, or for that matter the original golden calf (Exod. 32:4). To localize and concretize God, creator of all that is, in an object is not only absurd, but it is also a self-serving act because it suggests that God can be manipulated to the advantage of those who own the shrine. Yahweh will not permit this, because God discloses truth and direction not through the ministrations of priests before an idol but to those faithful servants to whom God freely chooses to speak.

Iconoclasm (the abhorrence of graven images and likenesses of deity) and opposition to idolatry in general survived the strife with Baal that permeated the period of Elijah and Elisha, Hosea, and Jeremiah. In and after the Babylonian exile, it became a hallmark of Judaism. The latest OT testimony to the revulsion of Israel against the practice of idolatry is found in Daniel 3, the story of the three young Jews who refuse to fall down before the golden image that Nebuchadnezzar, king of Babylon, placed upon the plain of Dura. Just before they are to be cast into the fiery furnace, Shadrach, Meshach, and Abednego make this memorable assertion of their liberty from the bondage of idolatry: "If it be so, our God whom we serve is able to deliver us from the burning fiery furnace; and he will deliver us out of your hand, O king. But if not, be it known to you, O king, that we will not serve your gods or worship the golden image which you have set up" (Dan. 3:17-18).

This utter refusal to acknowledge any legitimacy whatever to the representation of Deity in an idol points directly toward the tendency of both the Pharisaic rabbis and the writers of the NT to regard idolatry as a silly, vacuous sin based upon no reality whatever. In a sense, the demise of idolatry and the triumph of the living and imageless religion of the Judeo-Christian tradition was summed up by Paul on the Areopagus hill. As he stood there among the fading splendor of pagan worship, he proclaimed that the unknown god whom the Athenians acknowledged and who "made the world and everything in it, being Lord of heaven and earth, does not live in shrines made by man, nor is he served by human hands, as though he needed anything, since he himself gives to all men life and breath and everything" (Acts 17:24-25).

W.S.T.

IDUMEA. This is a Greek word, used to render EDOM, but in regard to a geographical region in western Palestine. The strife between the Israelites and the Edomites became acute at the time of Jerusalem's fall in 587 B.C., and this explains the condemnation in such places as Jeremiah 49:7-22, Obadiah, and Psalm 137:7. Later the area was occupied by Nabateans and conquered by the Maccabees, thereby explaining how Herod the Great came from Idumea. It is referred to once in the NT (Mark 3:8).
R.M.

IGNATIUS OF ANTIOCH, EPISTLES OF. Seven letters written by Bishop Ignatius of Antioch on his way to martyrdom early in the second century and now included among the writings of the APOSTOLIC FATHERS. Five of them were addressed to churches in Asia Minor, one to Bishop Polycarp of Smyrna, and a seventh to Rome. They are one of the most important sources for our knowledge of early Christian theology. In them, Ignatius shows that one of the great dangers of the time was the DOCETISTS, against whom he stresses the doctrine of Incarnation, the Eucharist, and the authority of Bishops. He is also the earliest Christian writer to employ the terms "Christianity" and "Catholic church."
J.G.

IGNATIUS OF LOYOLA (1491-1556). Founder of the JESUITS (Society of Jesus), author of the Spiritual Exercises, and a powerful figure in the CATHOLIC REFORMATION. Born into Spanish nobility, he planned on a military career, but at Pampeluna (1521) a cannonball fractured his right leg. During recovery he read books on Christ and the saints and resolved to be a soldier for Christ. In 1522 at Montserrat's Benedictine abbey, he confessed and vowed chastity, poverty, and service to Christ. During further recovery at Manresa, he sketched Spiritual Exercises (completed 1548), a manual for dedicating oneself to Christ. After an abortive trip to Jerusalem, he vowed to fight Protestant heretics. Within four years he advanced from a boys' school to the University of Paris. His charisma attracted others, and the Inquisition investigated him three times. In Paris he and six followers vowed lives of poverty, chastity, and service. They did hospital work in Venice, were ordained (1537), and placed themselves at the pope's disposal. Paul III hesitantly approved the Jesuits (1540), with a note about special obedience to the pope. Initially limited to sixty, the Jesuits grew phenomenally and soon dominated Catholic education, missions, and the Catholic Reformation. C.M.

I.H.S. An abbreviation or monogram for Jesus. ("IHS" stands, in Latin and English, for the letters iota, eta, sigma in Greek.) This monogram often occurs in ecclesiastical art, as in stained-glass windows. It also is used as an emblem by the Society of Jesus. IHS may also serve as a symbol for the sign Constantine supposedly saw before he attacked the Roman army in his bid for the throne of Caesar. Constantine is said to have adopted the Christian cross as his insignia after seeing a cross and the legend "In Hoc Signo Vinces," meaning "In this sign conquer" in the sky. Christianity was made a legal religion by Constantine after his victory in A.D. 312. J.C.

IJMA. From the Arabic word for "settling, resolving." In ISLAM, the "consensus" of the Islamic community that, together with the KORAN and the SUNNA or tradition, especially of the Prophet MUHAMMAD, is one of the three major sources of authority in SUNNI law. In practice ijma is determined by legal scholars, with early precedent given definitive weight by conservatives. R.E.

ILLUMINISM. The doctrine or practice of people or groups who believe themselves to possess special spiritual, moral, or intellectual enlightenment. The term has been associated with various groups of "illuminati" in history, for example, people related to the Enlightenment of the eighteenth century and religious sects claiming knowledge of truth. C.Mc.

ILLYRICUM. A land mass extending from modern Yugoslavia, across Albania, and into northeast Italy. It took its name from one of the tribes that settled in the area. The Romans made it part of the empire in the first century. It is referred to in Romans 15:19 as the outer limit of Paul's mission in the eastern Mediterranean. R.M.

IMAGE OF GOD. The doctrine of an image of God (imago dei) in humanity seems to imply that in the human creature there is some finite reflection of the divine nature. The point is made several times in the opening chapters of Genesis. "Then God said, 'Let us make man in our image, after our likeness; and let them have dominion over the fish of the sea, and over the birds of the air, and over the cattle, and over all the earth, and over every creeping thing that creeps upon the earth.' So God created man in his own image, in the image of God he created him; male and female he created them" (Gen. 1:26-27). A second passage repeats the substance of the one just quoted: "When God created man, he made him in the likeness of God. Male and female he created them" (Gen. 5:1-2). A third passage is of interest, because it appears to assert clearly that the divine image was not lost by the FALL: "Whoever sheds the blood of man, by man shall his blood be shed; for God made man in his own image" (Gen. 9:6).

It is perhaps somewhat surprising to find this teaching in the OT. Does the idea that in some way the likeness of God is reflected in the finite creature not infringe the transcendence of the creator God and blur the line, so clearly marked, between Creator and the creature? At least, it seems to qualify the distinction. We have also to remember that in the alternative Creation story, when God makes Adam of the dust of the ground, God also breathes into his nostrils the breath of life, and this "breathing" is a very different activity from "making" and implies that in some way God imparts to Adam something of God's own being. If the Hebrew scriptures insist on the difference between God and the Creation, they also insist on the difference between the human creature and all other creatures, and it is this difference that finds expression in the doctrine of an image of God.

What is the content of the image? A variety of answers have been given. In the first two passages of Genesis quoted above, the creation of the human pair is joined to the granting to them of dominion over the other creatures, and some theologians have claimed that the image of God is dominion or rule. The human race exercises rule over the earth, in the place of God. But many theologians would question whether power is the basic attribute of God, and whether it is in exercising dominion that human beings are most like God. In more rationalistic times, it has been claimed that it is in possessing reason and the powers of mind that human beings resemble God. But again it may be felt that this is inadequate. There is more plausibility in a third view, that creativity is the essential attribute of God, and that this is mirrored in the limited creativity of the human race, whereby they are able to "co-operate" with God in the continuing work of creation. Karl Barth, drawing attention to the fact that the image is represented by the human couple together, not by either of them individually, sees the image in sociality and fellowship. Human beings are made for one another, and their loving relations reflect the inner life of God.

There is a fundamental disagreement among theologians about the extent to which the divine image has been damaged or even destroyed through human SIN. The Reformers and, more recently, Barth, have maintained that the image of God has been completely obliterated by the Fall. Such a view is hard to defend. As we have seen, it contradicts the biblical teaching, and it also makes it difficult to see how there could be any human response to the grace of God. The human being would be reduced to the level of those other creatures that do not share in the image of God.

A much better interpretation was given by Irenaeus. He distinguished between the image of God and the likeness, though it is improbable that any such distinction was intended in the Hebrew. In Irenaeus' view, the image is the potentiality in the human person for spiritual growth and development; the likeness is the goal of this process, when the full spiritual potentialities of humanity have come to fruition and mirror the divine nature on the finite level. This visualizes the creation of humankind in two stages: the first stage endows them with the possibility for growth, the second is the process by which this growth comes to its goal. This makes a great deal of sense, for a human being cannot be created fully mature, but can only come to maturity through a process of many-sided experience, including testing and suffering.

When we turn to the NT, we find that something very close to the Irenaeian understanding of the image is presupposed in its teaching. In several passages, we find what may be called an "image Christology," that is to say, an elucidation of the person of Christ in terms of the man in whom the divine image has been fully manifested. He is called "the likeness of God" (II Cor. 4:4), "the image of the invisible God" (Col. 1:15), and it is declared that "he reflects the glory of God and bears the very stamp of his nature" (Heb. 1:3). Christ is in a unique and original way the bearer of the image of God brought to maturity as likeness to God, but the goal of the Christian life is that every Christian is also to be brought to this fullness: "And we all . . . beholding [or reflecting] the glory of the Lord, are being changed into his likeness from one degree of glory to another; for this comes from the Lord who is the Spirit" (II Cor. 3:18). (Compare HUMAN NATURE.) J.M.

IMAM. (1) In SHI'ITE Islam, a religious leader in the line of succession from MUHAMMAD, starting with ALI. In his lifetime only he can pass authoritative judgment on law and theology. He is considered infallible. A dispute over the number of imams (seven or twelve) has split the Shi'ites into two major groups, the SAB'IYYA and the IMAMIYYA. Both groups expect the return of the last imam as the MAHDI, who will restore justice and Islamic purity. Sunni Islam rejects the Shi'ite concept of imam, but honors Ali.

(2) In Sunni Islam, the leader of worship in the MOSQUE. K./M.C.

IMAMIYYA. In ISLAM those SHI'ITES who accept twelve IMAMS as successors to MUHAMMAD the Prophet, and thus differ from Shi'ites who are followers of seven imams (see ISMA'ILIYYA). Shi'ites believe that God revealed a testament to Muhammad, which announced the names of those who were to succeed him. The testament also gave instructions for each imam to follow.

The first imam was ALI, and the others followed him in a line of succession in which each imam designated his successor. There is agreement on the first six, but differences arose over who was the seventh. This caused a division between the two groups.

The Imamiyya are often known as "Twelvers" in contrast to the "Sevens." The twelfth imam, Muhammad al-Muntazar, went into a state of "complete concealment" in A.D. 940. It is believed that he will continue in this state as long as God wills. Then he will reappear as the MAHDI take control of the world and restore justice. Twelvers are the dominant religious group in Iran today.

The imam is regarded as infallible, and because of his prophetic heritage true religion will survive through him. While he is in concealment he works through the learned jurists who are his spokesmen. They can guide the Shi'ites in matters of religion and in social and practical issues.

Devotion to the imams finds expression in the annual commemoration of the wrongs committed against the household of the Prophet Muhammad, especially his grandson, al-Husayn, who fell as a martyr in battle at Karbala, Iraq, in A.D. 680. Special visits are regularly paid to his tomb and to the tomb (MASHHAD) of each imam. K.C.

IMITATION OF CHRIST, THE. A classic Christian devotional book, one of the most widely read writings of the Middle Ages, and a guidebook for achieving spiritual piety. Its acknowledged author was Thomas à Kempis (1380-1471), a student of the BROTHERS OF THE COMMON LIFE at Deventer, who spent most of his life at the Augustinian monastery of Mount St. Agnes, near Zwolle, in the Netherlands. Many others, especially Gerhard Groote (1340-84), have also been suggested as the author of this book, which appeared in Latin early in the fifteenth century. It quotes Scripture frequently and was part of the DEVOTIO MODERNA reform movement. It counsels true Christians to imitate Christ as their model by turning away from worldly matters and truly seeking to live inwardly and spiritually. This means humility, contemplation of things invisible, and conquest of the self's desires and passions. It means rooting out one's faults, resisting temptations, enduring hardships, and disciplining both body and mind. It means surrender to and dependence on God. The author exhorts, admonishes, and directs the reader to cultivate the inner life, converse with Christ, commune devoutly, and finally to place all hope and trust in God. C.M.

IMMACULATE CONCEPTION. The belief that the Virgin Mary, the mother of Jesus Christ, was free from ORIGINAL SIN from her conception. The Immaculate Conception was defined as a dogma of the Roman Catholic church by Pope Pius IX in 1854. Orthodox Christianity teaches that all humans inherit a nature infected with sin as a result of the Fall of Adam. The Roman Catholic church, however, teaches that the BLESSED VIRGIN MARY, by a unique grace, was preserved from original sin and, therefore, is said to have been conceived immaculate. While holding that the Immaculate Conception is a doctrine entrusted to the original apostles, Catholic scholars acknowledge that the doctrine is not referred to explicitly in Scripture nor, perhaps, was it even a part of the early oral tradition. Rather, it is taught implicitly in Scripture and was made explicit in the church as an inference drawn from Mary's special holiness.

The early Church Fathers considered Mary to be holy but not sinless. Nevertheless, the doctrine was given imperus in the East as early as the third ecumenical council, held at Ephesus (A.D. 431), which gave to Mary the title MOTHER OF GOD. The doctrine was greatly disputed in the high Middle Ages. Thomas Aquinas opposed it on grounds that it detracted from Christ's dignity as Savior of all people. John Duns Scotus favored the teaching, and his support appears to have turned the tide in its favor. During the seventeenth century and again in the early decades of the nineteenth century, there were expressions of popular support in favor of a definition. The dogma, as it was defined by Pius IX, was published and explained in the bull Ineffabilis Deus.
J.L.

IMMANENCE. The term "immanence" derives from the Latin in manere, meaning "to dwell within." It denotes an indwelling that is either inherent or that has an abiding quality. Immanence may be contrasted with TRANSCENDENCE, understood as being above and apart from.

Though it may be used to characterize any presence within, immanence has been most often applied by theologians and philosophers to Deity as permeating and sustaining the world. The immanence of God in the universe is distinguished from the concept of a creator or ruler external to and transcendent of the universe.

In Plato, both the Form of the Good and the Best Soul are understood as within the world. In Aristotle, God becomes a transcendent Unmoved Mover unaware of the world. In Stoicism, God is the immanent, indwelling Logos. Neoplatonism affirms the One as pervading Being, yet transcending it.

Though transcendence has had its representatives in Christian thought, the immanence of God has been emphasized by mystics, who verge on pantheism; by evangelicals and pietists, who focus on God's effective presence in human hearts; by the romantics and idealists, who understand God as the inner meaning of the universe; and by process thinkers, who view God as the vital force within the world as an organism.
C.Mc.

IMMANUEL. A Hebrew phrase, used as a personal name in Isaiah 7:14; 8:8, meaning "God (is) with us," so rendered in Isaiah 8:10 and in the Gospel fulfillment of Matthew 1:22, 23.

The historical setting gives the key to the naming of this child. At its simplest level the announcement was a prophetic assurance that God's presence was a "sign" (Isa. 7:11-14) of the abiding protection of God's people at a time when Judah was threatened by the Syro-Ephraim coalition and tempted to turn to Assyria for help. Ahaz of Judah was invited to trust God in a time of crisis, and Isaiah's promise to the wavering king was an assurance, seen in the birth of a child, that God was the nation's hope. Such is the strictly historical context. In a Christian reinterpretation of the OT text, Matthew seized on this name as pointing to Jesus the Messiah born of Mary a virgin (Greek parthenos, which is more precise than Isaiah's Hebrew term 'almā; RSV states "a young woman"), he sees the pledge of God's presence in Jesus with his people—a characteristic Matthean idea (18:20; 28:20).
R.M.

IMMERSION. See BAPTISM.

IMMORALITY. That which does not conform to the moral expectations or requirements of a particular society or of a social or religious group with moral rules. Immorality is the opposite of or sharply at variance with morality. Though morality and legality are related in societies, immorality is distinguished from illegality in that it is defined in relation to moral directives rather than in relation to laws. Amorality refers to a condition of being without moral awareness, as exemplified in sociopaths or in animals in relation to human morality. Nonmorality is that which is without moral significance. In ordinary usage, immorality often refers specifically to violation of sexual mores.
C.Mc.

IMMORTALITY. The concept of immortality, of not dying, of RESURRECTION, especially in the OT, was not yet nearly so developed in the age of the patriarchs as at the time of the Babylonian exile. Immortality was directly related to the concept of a living Jehovah, the Lord of LIFE, who did not die like pagan gods or pagan idols, and who also would not allow the people of Israel to die (Ps. 18:46; Jer. 23:36; II Kings 19:16).

There is no doubt that at least in the popular imagination many ideas about life after DEATH were borrowed from the Semitic cultures in which the people of Israel lived. In Egypt, for example, the cult of the dead was highly developed, with elaborate preparation of embalmed bodies, and for the pharaohs, pyramids, food, and servants to accompany them in the afterlife. Similar expectations existed in the Aramaea and Canaan of Abraham's day, of a heaven and hell, an upper world and a lower world, of reward and punishment.

Both in Hebrew and in Greek thought there was considerable speculation whether a human being consisted of three elements, body, soul, and spirit, or only two, body and soul. Dichotomists point to the story of Adam and Eve, with bodies formed by God and souls breathed alive by the breath of God. Trichotomists use such passages as Mark 12:30, "You shall love the Lord your God with all your heart, and with all your soul, and with all your mind, and with all your strength" (compare I Thess. 5:23).

The body was of course the material and the physical element of a human being. The soul, in Hebrew nephesh, in Greek psyche, was the animal principle of life, heartbeat and breath. The spirit, in Hebrew ruach, in Greek pneuma, was the thoughtful or rational element that controls reason, will, and conscience. Exactly which of these elements continued to exist after death, or at the time of resurrection, and in what form, and when resurrection would occur, is not as clear in either the OT or the NT as many believers would like.

In the OT there are several examples of people who never died. Elijah (II Kings 2:11), who still has a popular role in the Passover and in Jewish tradition, especially for children, moved into the presence of Jehovah alive and riding a chariot of fire. Enoch (Gen. 5:24) walked alive into eternity with God. Though the biblical evidence is scant, popular tradition also made of Moses a prophet who joined God without first dying.

Even people who came in contact with a living Jehovah through one of the prophets sometimes came back to life, like the Moabite marauder whose body was thrown into the grave of Elisha, or the son of the widow of Zarephath and Elijah, whose prayer brought back the boy's "soul" (I Kings 17:17-23). Though these five stories do not speak directly to the immortality of everyone, they do provide at least some insight into the popular understanding of the times.

References to an afterlife or to being raised from the dead appear more frequently in the prophets of the Exile, as contact with the more sophisticated and urban Babylonian-Assyrian culture intensified. The most famous story is probably Ezekiel's vision of the dry bones (chap. 37), where "the whole house of Israel" has been cut off and Jehovah promises to "open your graves, and raise you from your graves, O my people; and I will bring you home into the land of Israel" (v. 12).

The prophet Hosea (6:2) says God will raise up the dead on the third day so that they "may live before him." The famous passage from Job (19:26), "And though after my skin worms destroy this body, yet in my flesh shall I see God" appears a stronger proof text in the KJV translation of the Bible than in the Hebrew original. The authors of Psalms 16, 17, 49, and 73 identify with Jehovah as a living God who will not allow death to be a force that forever wipes them from the face of the earth or separates them from God.

The NT expresses somewhat more firmly developed concepts about immortality and resurrection than the OT. In Christ's day the Pharisees actively taught immortality, but the Sadducees rejected it. The Talmud was careful to separate resurrection of the body from that of the soul. In the Apocrypha, the underworld, Hades, lay somewhere in the west, and heaven, paradise, somewhere in the east.

Paul, Jesus, and John often use phrases like "eternal life" or "everlasting life" (Matt. 19:29; Mark 10:30; John 6:47). The resurrection of Christ was a popular testimony to the resurrection of all believers, though Paul's view that Christ's Second Coming was likely to occur in the lifetimes of those to whom he was writing tended to emphasize an eternal life in which many people would continue living without first dying. Paul does, however, also allow for a new glorified body based on the frame of the old physical body (II Cor. 4:16; Phil. 1:23; I Cor. 15:51).

In Paul's celebrated chapter on death (I Cor. 15) and how human beings relate Christ's death to their own, he takes to task those who deny the resurrection of the dead. "If there is no resurrection of the dead, then Christ has not been raised. . . . If Christ has not been raised, your faith is futile and you are still in your sins. Then those also who have fallen asleep in Christ have perished. . . . For as in Adam all die, so also in Christ shall all be made alive."

In the book of Revelation John pictures a peaceful repose for the blessed who die in the Lord, an end of suffering, an early awakening from the dead for some and a later one for others. In his figurative language depicting the times of the Christian martyrs under Roman persecution, his words express pious understanding and trust, as much as strongly formulated dogma.

Those hopes and that trust of wanting to be near the Lord at the time of resurrection probably explain why tens of thousands of Christians, Arabs, and Jews have chosen to be buried on the slopes of the Kidron outside Jerusalem's Golden Gate, where the Lord is by ancient tradition expected to return on Judgment Day, just as he did on the first Palm Sunday.

T. J. K.

IMPRIMATUR. Certification, by Roman Catholic ecclesiastical authority, that a book bearing on religion or morals contains nothing damaging to the faith or morals of believers. A NIHIL OBSTAT ("nothing poses impediments to faith") from the church censor is required first. Notice of this decision is printed in the book. J. C.

IMPRIMI POTEST. A pre-permission from a bishop or other religious superior in the Roman Catholic church for a subject's seeking an imprimatur for a book bearing on faith or morals. The imprimi potest may or may not be printed in the book. It is not required. J. C.

INCARNATION. The most central, but perhaps also the most complex, of all Christian doctrines. It teaches that in Jesus Christ the divine LOGOS or second person of the TRINITY assumed humanity, that he was and is truly and fully human and truly and fully God, and that this HYPOSTATIC UNION (as it is called) will never cease.

This doctrine, of course, took time to formulate. When the disciples first began to follow Jesus, they presumably thought of him as no more than a charismatic prophet. Perhaps at some point they began to think of him as the promised prophet who would be like a new Moses (Deut. 18:15), then as the Messiah (Mark 8:29), though still as a human Messiah. But after the cross and the Resurrection, new dimensions are added to the understanding of Christ's person. The earliest belief was probably adoptionist, to use a later terminology: Jesus had been "designated Son of God in power according to the Spirit" (Rom. 1:4) or "God has made him both Lord and Christ" (Acts 2:36). Moves toward a more definite view of the Incarnation may be noted in Paul's words that "God was in Christ" (II Cor. 5:19) and in the Epistle to the Hebrews: "God spoke of old to our fathers by the prophets; but in these last days he has spoken to us by a Son" (1:1-2).

However, the full Incarnation position is reached only in the late writings of the NT, especially in the famous words of the prologue to John's Gospel: "The Word became flesh and dwelt among us" (1:14). This already presupposes an understanding of God that permits the distinction between the Father and the Word or Logos. Notice the subtle language of the prologue, which asserts both distinction and identity: "The Word was with God, and the Word was God" (1:1).

Actually, the NT is very cautious of directly saying that Christ is God. But already in the early second century Christian writers like Ignatius were frankly calling Christ God, and this does not seem to have caused them any discomfort or to have offended their MONOTHEISM. The belief that a man was also God was so extraordinary (Kierkegaard was later to call it the "absolute paradox") that it was almost impossible not to stress one side at the expense of the other or to slide into sheer contradictions. It is impossible here to give more than the barest outline of the confused controversies that went on over the meaning of incarnation.

Some reduced the divinity to the point where Jesus was simply a specially inspired human being (Ebionitism); others declared him a divine being whose humanity was only appearance (Docetism). Many of the early Christian writers thought of Christ as a kind of second God, subordinate to the Father, and it was only after the Arian controversy that the Council of Nicea declared Christ to be "one in being" or "of one substance" (HOMOIOUSIOS) with the Father. Christ's oneness with the Father having been established, the next phase of the controversy concerned the relation of the humanity and the divinity within the person of Christ. Apollinarius (condemned in 381) thought of Christ as a hybrid being, partly human and partly divine, but not fully either; Nestorius (condemned in 431) was alleged, perhaps wrongly, to have separated the divine and the human in Christ to the point of a double personality; Eutyches (condemned in 451) was so opposed to Nestorius that he let the humanity of Christ be swallowed up in the single nature of his divinity, a view called MONOPHYSITISM and still held in the Coptic and other churches. The COUNCIL OF CHALCEDON (451) tried to sort out the confusion. It was stated that in Jesus Christ there are two natures, the human and the divine, each complete and entire; they are unmixed, yet they are not separated and concur together in one person.

Though there were still some sterile disputes over the question of whether Christ had one will or two wills, the Chalcedonian definition became the classic statement of the doctrine of incarnation and the touchstone of Christological orthodoxy. With various refinements, it persisted through the Middle Ages and was adopted by the major Protestant churches at the time of the Reformation.

Of course, it should be remembered that the Chalcedonian definition was not intended to be a final statement, but some explanation of the question of incarnation. It was meant to exclude certain ways that had been found misleading and to establish a terminology drawn from the philosophical language prevailing at that time. In the past two hundred years, however, the Chalcedonian formula has been called in question. Even those who believe in the Incarnation, in the sense of a genuine union of the human and divine in Jesus Christ, have in many cases come to ask whether we must look for new ways of expressing the matter.

Schleiermacher in The Christian Faith (1821) sharply criticized the Chalcedonian formula on logical grounds, holding that its key terms, "person" and "nature," were ambiguous and had been used in an inconsistent way. He himself proposed a radically new approach, which would begin from the humanity of Jesus. He believed that in Jesus alone do we see a perfect or mature humanity, and that this includes a full God-consciousness, which he also declares to be a veritable indwelling of God in that person. So although he rejected the traditional formula, he believed himself to be restating a full doctrine of incarnation.

Later in the century, Ritschl attacked Chalcedon because of its scholastic or academic character. (Actually, Luther and Melancthon had raised similar objections in the sixteenth century, but they did not press them.) Ritschl sought to replace the traditional doctrine with a theory based on the idea of value. In calling Christ God, we are asserting that for us the mysterious word "God" has been given a definite value and is to be understood in terms of Christ. This is an eminently practical solution, but it betrays Ritschl's positivist tendencies and hardly delivers us from the task of inquiring what is the ontological relation of Christ to God that would justify our value judgment.

Later still, Harnack criticized incarnational Christology as a Hellenizing of the gospel, which had the unfortunate result of putting the person of Christ at the center of the proclamation, rather than the kingdom of God as in Jesus' original gospel. So Harnack would have reverted to a preincarnational understanding of Jesus. Meanwhile, a somewhat different and more conservative attempt was being made to restate the meaning of incarnation. A number of scholars, first in Germany and then in England, put forward "kenotic" theories. Appealing to the NT passage, which says of Christ that he "emptied himself, taking the form of a servant, being born in the likeness of men" (Phil. 2:7), they claimed that incarnation of the divine in the human, the infinite in the finite, was made possible by a voluntary self-emptying (kenosis) in which the divine Logos laid aside those attributes that are incompatible with a truly human existence (for example, omniscience) while retaining others that are essential to a truly divine being (for example, perfect love). The theory had its attractions, such as explaining the limitations of Christ's knowledge. But critics felt that it was too speculative, and some saw in it a revival of the rejected views of Apollinarius.

The main thrust of contemporary thinking about the Incarnation seems to have gone back to the way pioneered at the beginning of the modern period by Schleiermacher. That is to say, it begins from anthropology and in particular from the human reality of Christ. Humanity has an openness toward God, so that the unfolding of humanity is a progressive realization of the image of God in which, according to the Bible, human beings were created.

Christ himself is the fulfilled image of God on the human level, bearing "the very stamp of his nature" (Heb. 1:3). This is reminiscent of patristic teaching about the deification of man and also harmonizes well with many modern views of human nature. If it is objected that this approach is a reversion to ADOPTIONISM, it may be replied that the original Christology of the earlier parts of the NT should not simply have been swallowed up by full-blown incarnationalism, since this has probably led to an unconscious Docetism in the church and an undervaluing of the true humanity of Christ.

There is a determination among theologians of many schools that no doctrine of incarnation can be satisfactory if it obscures the full humanity of Jesus Christ, hence the tendency to begin from an unambiguous assertion of the human reality. But it is also conceded that adoptionism tends to complete itself in some form of incarnationalism, for there could be no ascent of the human to the divine without a descent of the divine into the human.

J.M.

Courtesy of The University Museum, University of Pennsylvania

Cylindrical incense stand from Beth-shan (about eleventh century B.C.)

INCENSE. The Hebrew word qetoret, commonly translated with the English term "incense," in its earliest OT occurrences has to do with the smoke rising from an animal being sacrificed upon the altar (Deut. 33:10). However, in time this general term and others referring to more specialized forms of incense came to refer specifically to the aromatic compound of gums, herbs, and oils used in the Temple worship. (For the recipe, see Exod. 30:34-38.) According to Exodus 30:1-10, the priest (Aaron) was to burn fragrant incense on the altar of incense every morning and every evening (compare Luke 1:8-11); and upon the horns of the altar of incense he was to make atonement with blood once a year. According to Leviticus 16:12-13, this latter act on the Day of Atonement could be accomplished only after a cloud of incense had been raised adequate to cover the mercy seat, for to stand unprotected in the divine presence meant death even for the high priest. (The warning is underscored by the report in Lev. 10:1-2 of the death of Nadab and Abihu, the sons of Aaron, whose incense was laid upon unholy fire and who were consumed by divine fire.)

Most of the pentateuchal legislation regarding the use of incense is found in materials emanating from the latest stratum, the Priestly source. But this should not be taken to suggest that the introduction of incense into the cultus of Israel was only a late development. Ancient Near Eastern sources show that incense had long been associated with holy and numinous occasions. Its sensuous odor and the purity of its smoke had functioned since time immemorial to ward off evil spirits (and perhaps noxious fumes) and to invoke divinity. Its great value made it an ideal gift with which to honor God, or a lover (Song of S. 3:6), or a personage of great importance (Dan. 2:46). Such a treasured substance could obviously be abused, and the historians and prophets alike accused their fellow countrymen of offending God by burning incense to foreign deities (compare II Kings 22:17; Ezek. 6:13). But it was obviously also a valued adjunct to the experience of Israel with God, an accompaniment to visions of the Holy One (Luke 1:8-12), and one of the three gifts most suitable to lay before the baby whom the magi from the East perceived to be the Anointed One of Israel (Matt. 2:11). W.S.T.

INCEST. Sexual intercourse between close relatives or those considered related within degrees wherein marriage is prohibited by law or custom. The OT prohibitions against incest are outlined in Leviticus 18 and 20, though they frequently occur elsewhere as individual stories. The Lord instructs Moses that the people should not follow the marriage practices they had experienced in Egypt and Canaan. For example, one was forbidden to have intercourse with one's mother, another wife of one's father, a sister, the daughter of one's father or mother, a granddaughter, an aunt, a niece, a daughter-in-law, a mother-in-law, or a sister-in-law. One penalty for incest was barrenness (Lev. 20:21) or sometimes death by fire to all involved if a man slept with both a woman and her mother.

Genesis 19:31-35 tells how the daughters of Lot got their father drunk and after sleeping with him bore sons who founded the tribes of the Moabites and the Ammonites. Genesis 20:12 records that Abraham said that his wife Sarah was a half sister. Amnon raped his beautiful half sister Tamar (II Sam. 12:7-14) even though she argued that their mutual father, King David, would give her to Amnon if asked. In the OT period a king often inherited his father's harem.

In the NT Paul advises that a man who married his father's wife (I Cor. 5:2) be cast out of the congregation so that both parties would not lose their souls. In the early Middle Ages the taboo against incest forbade marriage between people related to the seventh degree (seventh cousins, for example) or even those in the seventh degree of relationship as godparents or godchildren. T.J.K.

INDELIBLE CHARACTER. In Roman Catholicism, indelible character refers to a belief that divine grace confers a permanent spiritual mark on a person when the sacrament of baptism, ordination, or confirmation is duly administered, even though the administrator might be immoral. This imprint makes repetition of the sacrament a sacrilege. Many Protestants so regard baptism. C.M.

INDEPENDENTS. This is the name given British Congregationalists, also called Separatists. These were people who in the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries wanted to separate from the Church of England and found local independent congregations of professing believers. One group left for Holland in 1608 and came to New England in 1620 as the Pilgrims. Oliver Cromwell was an Independent; thus they were most influential during the Commonwealth in 1649-60. N.H.

INDEX OF PROHIBITED BOOKS. In Roman Catholicism, a list of books containing views on faith and morals that Catholics are forbidden to read except in special cases where permission to do so is granted for purposes of refutation and so forth. In 1557 the Congregation of the Inquisition under Pope Paul IV published the first list of prohibited books. The Council of Trent (1545-63) anathematized anyone who printed, sold, or possessed books without episcopal approval, and in 1571 Pope Pius V created a special Congregation of the Index to oversee censorship. In 1917 Pope Benedict XV placed supervision of the Index in the holy office. Prohibition of heretical or unfit books was not uncommon in the early and medieval church, so that the Index represents the formalizing of a old practice. In the twentieth century, bishops have assumed much responsibility for censorship of books, and in 1966 the Index was discontinued. C.M.

INDRA. In HINDUISM, a god very important in the VEDAS, though much diminishing in importance after the end of the Vedic period and the rise of the ISVARA or salvation-giving deities. Indra is supremely a god of the Indo-European mythology of the Vedas. He is patron of the Aryan warrior class and dwells in the atmosphere between heaven and earth. Accompanied by the Maruts, his band of warrior companions, he defeats demons and powers of darkness. His weapon is the vajra or thunderbolt. He is gigantic, boisterous, and prodigious in his capacity for food and drink, consuming countless cattle and lakefuls of the sacred drink SOMA.

But he is friendly to humankind. He stole the soma plant from heaven—himself often experiencing the sacred hallucinations the plant's liquor affords—and destroyed the drought-giving demon Vrtra. But late mythology, in a time of changing gods and spiritual tension between warrior and brahmin castes, portrayed Indra in a less favorable light. R.E.

INDUCTION. A process of reasoning from particulars to the general, the reverse of DEDUCTION, which is a process of reasoning from the general to particulars. Aristotle described the inductive process but did not develop it. Francis Bacon extended induction by ampliative inference, which uses analogy to draw general conclusions about a group from observing a single specimen. David Hume doubted "necessary connections" in inductive cause and effect, and John Stuart Mill further refined rules for using induction. While science employs induction to build hypotheses and theories, the difficulty (or perhaps impossibility) of strictly observing and controlling all or even limited particulars results in a high degree of verifiable probability rather than certainty. Variant forms of induction are widely used in scientific experimentation and especially in social statistics, which allow for margins of error. Darwin's use of induction to arrive at evolution illustrates both the possibilities and inadequacies of the process.

C.M.

INDULGENCE. The remission by the church of the penalty for sin. This developed from earlier practices of PENANCE for post-baptismal sins, which required that sinners atone for their sins in various ways. In principle, an indulgence was the commuting of one form of penance for another, although there was little theological reflection as to the bases for such practices. By the eleventh century, Pope Urban II, in promoting the First Crusade, made use of the term "plenary indulgence," which applied to post-baptismal sins in general, without specifying the sin in question. In the thirteenth century, two new ideas appeared: that in granting indulgences the church was using its treasury of merit, and that this could be done, not only for the living, but also for the dead who were in PURGATORY. These ideas, combined with the possibility of commuting penalties, led to the sale of indulgences, which was then employed to raise funds. By the late Middle Ages, such sales had become scandalous, and several reform-minded Christians—Luther among them—protested against them. The Council of Trent reaffirmed the doctrinal grounds for indulgences and their sale, but the practice fell into general disuse.

J.G.

INERRANCY. "Freedom from error" as applied especially to the Holy Scriptures. Obviously, God does not make mistakes, so if the Bible is the Word of God, must it not be free from error? But when one actually turns to the Bible, the doctrine of verbal inerrancy is very hard to maintain. In both the OT and the NT, there are inconsistencies, especially when more than one account is given of the same incident, and these are found to differ on points of detail.

Examples from the OT would be the accounts of the Flood and of the crossing of the Red Sea. An example from the NT would be the all-important story of the resurrection of Jesus. The points of detail may not be in themselves very important, but since such divergences destroy the theory of inerrancy, those who hold that theory have gone to great (and quite unconvincing) lengths in trying to "harmonize" the different accounts. Sometimes the Bible is in contradiction with views derived from secular sources, but widely held in the modern world. Here one recalls the controversies, still going on, between upholders of inerrancy and those who accept the theory of evolution.

In this case, inerrancy can be maintained only by rejecting a well-established scientific theory and sometimes in addition by the suggestion that God

"planted" the evidence for evolution! Other discrepancies in the Bible, such as the wrong attribution of a quotation, are less easy to explain, yet even one such contradiction is fatal to the theory. But the main objection to a doctrine of inerrancy lies in its inadequate understanding of revelation and INSPIRATION. These are not mechanical processes that result in a set of propositions directly derived from God. They are in the first instance personal encounters between God and people, and when these people report them in words, they do so as human beings who may be faithful witnesses but are not exempt from error. The faithfulness of these witnesses is not enhanced by claiming for them the negative character of inerrancy.

J.M.

INFALLIBILITY. The inability to err in teaching divine truth or, put positively, fidelity to revealed truth. Infallibility is one of the most misunderstood doctrines. It does not imply the sinlessness of the church or the pope, nor should it be confused with INSPIRATION. The latter is uniquely attributed to the revelation attested to in the canonical books of the OT and the NT. Through the centuries many Christians have held the church to be infallible. It is argued that it is a necessary teaching of any doctrinal religion, for such a religion must hold that some truths are "guaranteed." The simple declaration "Jesus Christ is Lord and Savior" is a case in point. It is a proposition essential to Christian identity. The Christian churches are agreed that the church is infallible or indefectible, in the sense that the church cannot, in the long run, teach error—and with the guidance of the Holy Spirit persists in the truth. Numerous NT passages point to Christ's promise that the Spirit will lead his disciples into all truth and that the church is "the pillar and ground of the truth" (1 Tim. 3:15 KJV).

The churches have, however, differed as to where the seat of infallibility resides. Some would argue that it lies exclusively in an inerrant Bible, others that it rests in the teaching authority of the MAGISTERIUM or the episcopate. Conciliarism insisted that infallibility resides in the decisions and definitions of the great ECUMENICAL COUNCILS, such as Nicaea (A.D. 325). At the First Vatican Council (1869–70) the Roman Catholic church declared the pope infallible when, under certain conditions, he defines doctrines concerning faith and morals. The infallibility of the pope has remained the focal point of the discussion of infallibility during the past century, especially since VATICAN II (1962–65).

Defenders of papal infallibility traditionally have produced biblical and patristic proof texts, as well as practical arguments, in favor of the 1870 dogmatic declaration. They argue that, while not formulated in the early church, the doctrine unfolded organically in the post-apostolic age. Opponents of papal infallibility, both within and outside the Roman Church, argue on historical grounds that papal infallibility did not form any part of the church's theological or canonical tradition before the thirteenth century. While the infallibility of the church was universally taught in the Roman church through the mid-nineteenth century, the infallibility of the pope remained an open question. Supported by the modern popes because it suited their interests, the doctrine had long been opposed, for example by the strong Gallican tradition during the early modern period. The growing movement of Ultramontanism in the early decades of the nineteenth century and the distinctive authority of Pope Pius IX (1846-78) seen, for example, in his definition of the Immaculate Conception of the Blessed Virgin Mary (1854), strengthened both popular and episcopal support for the 1870 definition.

The First Vatican Council opened on December 8, 1869, and the majority of bishops, led by Archbishop Edward Manning of Westminster, favored a declaration of papal infallibility. A minority party, led by bishops Dupanloup and Hefele, was assisted by the eminent Catholic historians J. J. I. von Döllinger and John (Lord) Acton. The minority party argued that as GALLICANISM had separated the church from the pope, so would papal infallibility separate the pope from the church. They also argued that the doctrine had no foundation in Scripture, tradition, or in the ecumenical councils. Furthermore, they insisted that a definition could not be written that avoided ambiguity. They feared that extreme infallibilism would mean that infallibility would attach to any and every utterance of the pope. A number of bishops, known as "inopportunist," favored papal infallibility but felt that the historical circumstances did not favor a definition at the time. Some American bishops argued that a definition would forever alienate Protestants and would be a permanent setback for Catholicism in the United States. On July 13, 1870, a vote was taken on a conditional draft and 451 bishops voted in favor; 88 against; 62 were in favor conditionally; and 91 abstained. When the final outcome was seen as inevitable, many minority bishops left Rome rather than oppose the wishes of the pope or possibly risk anathema for rejecting a dogmatic teaching of the church. On July 18, 533 fathers voted in favor of papal infallibility; only two opposed. Pius IX then confirmed the First Dogmatic Constitution on the Church, entitled Pastor aeternus. Those, like Döllinger, who continued to oppose the dogma were excommunicated; many among the opposition established a separate Old Catholic church.

Pastor aeternus affirms that the pope possesses infallibility when he speaks ex cathedra, that is, in his office as pope, when he defines a doctrine regarding faith and morals to be held by the universal church. Such definitions "are irrefragable of themselves and not from the consent of the Church." Extreme infallibilists considered most papal teachings to be infallible, including, for example, Pius IX's Syllabus of Errors (1864). However, moderate infallibilism has prevailed in the Roman church during the past century. According to the moderate interpretation of the Dogmatic Constitution, certain conditions must be met by any infallible teaching: (1) the pope must speak in his office as pope, ex cathedra, not simply as a theologian; (2) the utterance must be a doctrine of faith and morals, a divinely revealed truth; (3) the utterance must not be merely advice or warning; it must terminate controversy by pronouncing a dogmatic definition; (4) it must be a truth necessary to salvation; and (5) while it need not be addressed to all believers, it must be intended for the universal church.

The difficulty that the dogma has raised for the Roman church is posed by the question: what particular papal decrees are infallible, since no pope has said, "This is an infallible declaration." There is no infallible list of infallible decrees. This uncertainty and lack of guidance led to a severe crisis of authority in the church with the issuance of Pope Paul VI's encyclical Humanae vitae (1968) concerning birth control. The encyclical's teaching was widely opposed by both clerical and lay Catholics and sparked an extended debate on papal authority and the meaning of infallibility. In Lumen Gentium, Vatican II reaffirmed the doctrine of Vatican I; nevertheless, it integrated papal infallibility into the doctrine of the collegial magisterium (teaching office) of the bishops united with the pope. It affirmed that the Roman pontiff can exercise his power freely, but together with the consent of the pope, the bishops are the subject of supreme and full power over the church. It is now understood that the church always acts in the union of the bishops with their head, the pope.

How is this to be reconciled with the Vatican I declaration that infallible decisions of the pope are "irreformable of themselves, not from the consent of the Church"? The present view of most Catholic theologians is that infallibility implies the agreement of a dogmatic definition with the Word of God in Scripture and tradition. Infallibility is always exercised in the service of the Word. Furthermore, its binding character assumes a consensus in the church. This view is stated by Joseph Cardinal Ratzinger, head of the Congregation of the Faith: "Where there is neither consensus on the part of the universal Church nor clear testimony in the sources, no binding decision is possible." Finally, it must be recognized that while Vatican II underscored the need for a "religious submission of will and of mind" to the pope's authentic teaching authority, absolute infallibility belongs to God alone. The Roman church teaches that the conscience of the Christian before God remains the final resort for the individual's decision.

J.L.

INFANT BAPTISM. See BAPTISM.

INFERENCE. A process whereby one passes from one statement regarded as true to another statement whose truth is derived from and dependent on the truth of the first. Aristotle inferred universals from many particulars. Francis Bacon related inference to INDUCTION by describing analogy that draws general conclusions about a group from observing a single specimen as ampliative inference. Modern logic allows inference as a kind of independent source of inductive hypothesis, its reliability being dependent on the recurrence of particular characteristics. This was a great help to science, for example, in reconstructing animals from a few fossil remains. This assumes a uniformity of nature or correspondence of cause and effect in identical circumstances, but changing circumstances make final conclusions untenable. Kant justified analogical inference with the maxim that many characteristics do not unite in one thing without a reason. He speaks of inference as a function of thinking in the interplay of sensibility and understanding by which one judgment or conclusion is derived from another. John Stuart Mill and modern thinkers modify inference by isolating agreements and differences that become important for refinements of inference. God's existence may be inferred from various "proofs," but not with finality.

C.M.

INHERITANCE. In its most basic sense, in the Bible as elsewhere, this term refers to that portion of property assigned to an heir. Naturally this can be thought of as a transaction between an individual and the next generation in the family:

A good man leaves an inheritance to his children's children, but the sinner's wealth is laid up for the righteous (Prov. 13:22).

Not only sons but also daughters could receive inheritances as individuals (Num. 27:1-11). But even more frequently the OT thinks of inheritance in a collective vein. A large section of the book of Joshua, for example, is devoted to the allotment (the word is well chosen, because the divisions were made by the casting of divinely guided lots; see Num. 36:2; Ezek. 45:1; 47:22) of the land of Canaan into the "inheritances" of the tribes that descended from the twelve sons of Jacob (Josh. 13-19). These tribal allotments were considered inalienable, and marriage between the tribes is discouraged in Numbers 36:1-13, lest transfers of tribal lands take place through individual bequests. Only Levi received no share of the land; his people were to serve the Lord in priestly functions and find in the Lord their inheritance (Deut. 10:9; Ezek. 44:28). In fact, the entire land promised by God to Abraham and his descendants and conveyed to Israel in the conquest is often described by the metaphor of "the inheritance" (see Deut. 4:21; I Kings 8:36; I Chr. 28:8; Ezra 9:10-12). From this sense it is only one additional metaphorical step to refer to the people as Yahweh's inheritance (Deut. 4:20; Isa. 19:25), a usage frequently found in the Psalms (28:9; 33:12; 78:62-71; 106:5).

The same variety of meanings of the term "inheritance" can be discerned in the NT, all derived from the Greek word klēros, "a lot, possession." (Our English terms "cleric" and "clergy" are derived from this root: klērikos, a lot-caster or an allotter.) Family property is of course an inheritance (Mark 12:7) and so is the land promised to Abraham (Heb. 11:8). However, in the NT the term acquires a rich new significance. Often it is the eternal kingdom of God, "the inheritance of the saints in light" (Col. 1:12; see also Eph. 1:15; Heb. 9:15; I Pet. 1:4), and even that portion of the world to come that is given to a righteous individual (Eph. 5:5). W.S.T.

INIQUITY. See SIN.

INITIATION. See BAPTISM.

INNATE IDEAS. Certain concepts and ideas that various philosophers have insisted are inborn, being implanted in the mind at birth or derived from the constitution of the mind, in contrast with ideas and perceptions derived from experience through the senses. Such intuitive rather than empirical ideas might be of a circle (a Platonic form as distinguished from perceptible particulars), or of right and wrong in the sense of Aquinas' infallible synteresis, which indicates a difference between right and wrong but does not specify particulars. In modern philosophy, Descartes argued for the innateness of God, mind, and matter (extension). These are not copies of sense experience; they are pre-reflective, pure ideas used to comprehend experience. Leibnitz further developed Cartesian views into principles of innateness, which are unlearned from experience, while both Locke and Hume argued against innate ideas in favor of empirical, sensory experiences. Kant set forth a priori intuited concepts of space and time and twelve categories that the mind uses in transforming empirical sensations into knowledge. The argument over innate versus empirical ideas continues into the present despite the overwhelming impact of the empirical sciences. The controversy is religiously important especially if one assumes God cannot be derived from sense data. C.M.

INNER LIGHT. The term used by GEORGE FOX to denote the Spirit of God that exists in every person. The Light functions in two ways. It illumines the darkness (that is sin) indicating to a person the existence of evil so that the person might turn toward goodness. This understanding is basic to the morality and life-style of members of the Society of FRIENDS. The Light is also power. God and Christ are the Light and are in the Light. Salvation lies in turning to the Light. To have faith is to accept the Light into one's life. The Light gives inspiration beyond that of Scripture and church and is the true and ultimate source of authority. The inner Light is also the transcendent Light. It is not a part of God but a gift from God and the source of revelation. The inner Light unites people to one another. Although Fox includes scriptural references in his teaching, he lays less emphasis on the Gospel story of Jesus and more on the living presence of Christ in the believer. This presence convicts people of sin, enables them to live righteously, and empowers them for unity within the Society of Friends. I.C.

INNOCENT III. Pope from 1198–1216, in whom the PAPACY reached the apex of its political power. Claiming that the pope ruled over souls and the emperor over bodies, as the sun rules over days and the moon over nights, and that this made him superior to the emperor, he intervened in the internal affairs of the HOLY ROMAN EMPIRE, deposing an emperor and placing another in his stead. England's John Lackland and the young king of Sicily made their kingdoms fiefdoms of the papacy. The pope's political power was felt also in France, Spain, Portugal, Bohemia, Hungary, Denmark, Iceland, and as far as Bulgaria and Armenia.

Although this was done without the pope's consent, the Fourth CRUSADE took Constantinople in 1204 and established the Latin Empire of Constantinople, thus temporarily and forcefully reuniting the Greek East and the Latin West under the pope's authority.

The Fourth LATERAN COUNCIL gathered in 1215 under Innocent's direction. In three days it approved a long series of measures dictated by the pope, who was in truth the power behind the council. These included the promulgation of the doctrine of TRANSUBSTANTIATION, decrees against the WALDENSES, ALBIGENSES, the followers of JOACHIM OF FIORE, Muslims, and Jews, the order that all the faithful must make confession at least once a year, and a number of administrative matters. This was part of Innocent's program to clarify and codify the law of the church and to promote uniformity throughout Europe.

It was also under Innocent's rule that the orders of the FRANCISCANS and the DOMINICANS were founded. Although Innocent did not wish to see a proliferation of new orders, he saw the potential in these movements and approved them somewhat reluctantly. J.G.

INQUISITION. A name given Roman Catholic tribunals established to deal with heresy and related offenses. As far back as 313 church-state partnership had virtually equated heresy and treason, and formal tribunals to ensure religious unity materialized about 1150. French Cathari and Italian Waldensians threatened social stability, and, consequently, popes, councils, and civil rulers used severe penalties to exterminate them. In 1184 Pope Lucius III required bishops to examine all their subjects under oath for heresy. In 1199 Pope Innocent III declared heresy a capital crime. The Fourth Lateran Council (1215) provided secular punishment for heretics, which included the confiscation of property and excommunication for non-cooperation. In 1220 the Dominicans took charge of the Inquisition. In 1229 the Synod of Toulouse systematized inquisitorial rules, leaving alleged heretics virtually no rights. In 1252 Innocent IV authorized the torture of witnesses and the accused. Inquisitors were often ruthless; they were not subject to the law, only to the papacy. They accused, prosecuted, and judged. Victims had to prove their innocence and could have no counsel.

The marriage of Ferdinand and Isabella in 1469 inaugurated the infamous Spanish Inquisition, aimed especially at Marranos (converted Jews), Moriscos (converted Muslims), illuminists, and witches. This inquisition also included Spain's New World colonies. Each nation's sovereign controlled its inquisitions, for Pope Sixtus IV in 1478 gave rulers the power to name Inquisitors—with little accountability to the church. Spain's first Grand Inquisitor was Dominican Tomás de Torquemada (1483–98); the second, Cardinal Ximenes (1498–1517). Thousands were executed and a hundred thousand imprisoned. It was medieval in procedure with the accused practically helpless. Church and state seized the victim's properties. Sentences were announced in public worship celebrations. In 1492 Spain's Jews were given the choice of conversion or exile. In 1502 the Moriscos were victimized.

In 1542 Pope Paul III created the Holy Office of Inquisition to combat Protestantism. Its domain extended throughout Catholicism, and its directing committee of cardinals was independent of episcopal control. It became excessive under popes Paul IV (1555–59) and Pius V (1566–72), was suppressed in 1834, revived in 1908, and renamed the Congregation for the Doctrine of the Faith by Pope Paul VI (1965). It now deals mostly with heretical writings. C.M.

I.N.R.I. The first letters of the inscription Pilate had written and nailed to Jesus' cross; in Latin: Jesus Nazarenus Rex Iudaeorum, meaning, "Jesus of Nazareth, the King of the Jews" (John 19:19; Matt. 27:37; Mark 15:26; Luke 23:38). This abbreviation is generally used in Christian art, appearing on a plaque above Jesus' head. J.C.

INSPIRATION AND REVELATION. When it is claimed that the knowledge of God is revealed, it is meant that this knowledge is not gained by unaided human effort but is a gift from God. God has taken the initiative in establishing the divine-human relation and has communicated the knowledge of himself to human beings. Clearly, there is an analogy between the way in which anyone receives a revelation of God and the way in which anyone comes to know another person. No doubt one may learn quite a lot about fellow human beings just by observing them and inquiring about them. But we come to know people as people only when they are willing to know us and open up to us in conversation and social intercourse. Only if people open themselves and show themselves can we truly know them, and such opening and showing are like a gift. Some theologians have spoken as if God's revelation is exactly like the I-thou relation between two people, but in fact the analogy should not be pressed quite so far. Knowing God is much more like knowing a human being than it is like knowing some impersonal fact that we have investigated, but it is not quite the same. In the case of knowing another human being, we meet that person on a level of equality, and the process of getting to know each other is mutual and reciprocal. In the case of knowing God, the weight of the relation is overwhelmingly on God's side and God's gift to the human recipient completely surpasses any contribution from the human side. Furthermore, when human beings get to know one another, the relation is mediated by their bodies—they see and hear one another, they use audible language, they may even touch one another. But God is not manifested in these ways.

Can we say then how God is revealed or manifested? The religions testify that there are many ways in which human beings have claimed that a revelation of God has come to them.

Some people have claimed that God is revealed to them in the depths of their own souls. This is the mystical awareness of God, and it is the most direct. It would seem that only a small minority of the human race have known the mystical experience, but that minority is found among all races and all religions and has included many of the most spiritually sensitive of men and women. The form of this experience in which God is made known in the innermost depth of a person is very similar in all cultures, and there is certainly a prima facie case for the validity of the mystical experience. There have been many Christian mystics, but also Jewish ones and Greek ones, together with representatives in Islam and in the religions of Asia. When mystics retire into their own souls, they are not getting lost in narcissism, but find that the depth or ground of their own being is continuous with the depth or ground of all being—the reality called "God." However, it is typical of mystics to say that this experience is really inexpressible in words, and thus they may even find the word "God" too restrictive for the mysterious being that has touched their lives. This kind of experience is at the furthest distance from that popular misunderstanding of revelation, which infers that it consists of propositions that have fallen ready-made from heaven.

A second type of revelation comes through nature. The revelation is mediated through some inner-worldly reality that is seen as not just a natural phenomenon but as a manifestation of God. Much primitive religion arose from a sense of the divine in nature and so did the more sophisticated religion of nature found in poets like Wordsworth. For them, the things of nature are a vehicle in and through which a divine Presence manifests itself. In such cases, God is not an inference from nature, but rather is intuited as a spiritual reality interfused with nature. This is properly called a revelatory experience and is quite different from any human attempt to argue from the phenomenon of nature to the reality of God (the argument from design).

A third type of revelation is the THEOPHANY, the self-communication of a god in a vision or verbally or both together. No doubt accounts of theophanies are elaborated by the imagination, but some genuine revelation may underlie the stories. Usually theophanies occur after long periods of meditation, when some incident, perhaps trivial in itself, is experienced as an encounter with God. A famous case was the theophany granted to Moses at the burning bush. This incident focalized his thoughts about his people and their God, and he believed that God was in the bush, addressing him and calling him.

More typical of the OT is a fourth type of revelation, seen in the large-scale events of history. In the course of the world's history, it is claimed that one can read the character of the God who governs the world. The classic case is the event or series of events connected with the deliverance of Israel from slavery in Egypt, the formation of a new nation under God, and their pilgrimage toward the Promised Land. This event was taken as the manifestation of what God is doing in the world—casting down tyranny, delivering the oppressed, and building up a genuinely human community. This historical revelation impressed itself so deeply on the minds of the Israelites that their successors celebrate it to this day, and it has also inspired other groups and been taken as a revelation of God.

In the NT, we find still another type of revelation. Here a human person, Jesus of Nazareth, who is also the center and inspirer of a new human community, is taken as the revelation of God. Soon those who had received this revelation began to speak of an incarnation, an actual personal embodiment of God in the midst of creation. If indeed humanity is made in the image of God, then it would seem natural that the fullest revelation of God that can be given would be revelation in and through a human person or community of persons. It is worth noting that although the idea of incarnation is most fully worked out in Christian theology, related ideas are found in Hinduism and in Buddhism.

In all the cases mentioned, revelation was given first of all not in verbal formulations, but in a total experience, much more inclusive than the hearing and understanding of words. But since human beings are fundamentally linguistic, attempts are inevitably made to put revelation into words. Still, the revelation itself will always be more than the words can express. This point is important when we consider the role of scriptures and dogmas. Though we sometimes speak of the "revealed" word of the Bible, this is not the primary revelation. The propositions of scriptures, dogmas, creeds, and the like, are witnesses or testimonies to revelatory encounters that elude complete verbalization.

This brings us from revelation to the closely related subject of inspiration. The Bible is said to be inspired, and so it is, but this does not mean that every word and sentence comes directly from God, still less that they are inerrant—that would be far too mechanical a way of understanding inspiration. Inspiration occurs first in people, and only in a secondary sense can one speak of "inspired" writings. Men and women have been inspired in the sense that they have been illuminated by the divine Spirit and made recipients of revelation. But we have seen that revelation does not come first in the form of words and sentences. Even in the case of the OT prophets, when we read that "The word of the Lord came to . . ." we need not suppose that the encounter was in the first instance verbal, though the prophet has to put it into words in order to communicate it. (An interesting sidelight comes from Islam at this point. Muhammad is reported as saying that when he was receiving a revelation, it began like the sound of a bell, and this sound gradually resolved itself into words. The words are important, but they are derivative from a more original experience.)

When we speak of the inspiration of the Bible or some other writing, we mean that when its words are read or preached today, they have the possibility of awakening in the hearer the same kind of revelatory experience that was known to the inspired writer who first set down these words as an attestation of his experience. There are many stories of men and women from Anthony of Egypt to Albert Schweitzer for whom, in the course of reading or preaching, the words of the Bible came alive and spoke with revelatory force. It was not a mere repetition, but a reenactment in new circumstances of the original revelation, summoning to a new self-understanding and a course of action appropriate to the situation. Great religious writings are inspired in the sense that they can still speak to the human condition and be the instrument for divine revelation. J.M.

INSTITUTION, WORDS OF. The NT texts of Jesus' institution (or consecration) of the Last Supper (I Cor. 11:23-26 and parallels in Matt., Mark, and Luke) later called the Lord's Supper, the Eucharist, the Holy Communion, or the Mass.

The Pauline words of institution in I Corinthians 11, "This is my body which is for you"; "This cup is the new covenant (or testament) in my blood"; along with the Lord's injunction to "Do this . . . in remembrance of me," are solemnly recited in both the Catholic and Protestant Eucharist services. Luther believed in the absolute necessity of announcing these words over the elements. J.C.

INTERCESSION. See INTERMEDIARY.

INTERDICT. In the Roman Catholic church, an ecclesiastical penalty imposed by the pope or a bishop over his diocese, barring those interdicted from religious rites, such as Holy Communion. However, persons under interdict may receive the sacraments if in danger of death, and interdicts on places (such as a city or nation) are suspended on Christmas, Easter, Pentecost, and the Assumption of Mary.

Interdicts may be personal—on one person—or on a locale or group, for example, on a city or an organization. A personal interdict excludes that person from the sacraments, church services, and from burial as a Christian (that is, in consecrated ground). The interdict is almost never used in modern times, and it has been suggested that it should be abandoned entirely in the post-Vatican II church. J.C.

INTERMEDIARY. One who acts as a mediator or peacemaker between people or groups. Paul writes, "There is one God, and there is one mediator between God and men, the man Christ Jesus, who gave himself as a ransom for all" (I Tim. 2:5-6).

Jesus Christ is the one who, through his death on the cross and his resurrection, has opened the way to his Father's kingdom. Paul underscores the need for such an intermediary. He sees humankind's sin and need for deliverance and writes, "None is righteous, no, not one" (Rom. 3:10).

In the OT Moses served as a mediator, bringing God's law to the people. As such he was allowed to see more of God than any person had ever seen. The Law itself also was regarded as a mediator. In the OT the word "law," torah, usually refers to all of God's teachings. Psalm 1 stresses that the person who delights in the Law (the teachings) of the Lord will be known by God.

The prophets also served as mediators, delivering God's newly revealed Word to their people. The priests on the other hand, interpreted God's Word that had previously been revealed. Kings were to represent the people before the Lord.

OT prophets spoke the Word of God, but Jesus embodied it. OT priests offered sacrifices on behalf of the people to God, but Jesus offered his own life. OT kings were expected to rule the people well on God's behalf, but selfishly did not always do so; Jesus, the king of all creation, gave his life as a ransom for all.

The reference to an intermediary by Paul in Galatians 3:19-20 is difficult to interpret. He writes, "The law . . . was ordained by angels through an intermediary." He goes on, "Now an intermediary implies more than one; but God is one." He may be speaking of Moses as the intermediary between humankind and the angels, who in turn were intermediaries for the Lord. Or he may be speaking of the "offspring" mentioned in preceding verses, Jesus Christ, the great intermediary. B.J.

INTERNATIONAL MISSIONARY COUNCIL.

This worldwide missionary body had its beginnings in the World Missionary Conference in Edinburgh in 1910 and had a continuous evolution until its formal constitution in 1921. In principle the IMC was the first worldwide ecumenical council of churches. Among its accomplishments were the creation of a network of councils of churches in many nations, the convening of major world missionary conferences, and the formulation of major policies for mission, support of orphaned missions during World War I and II, and a major contribution to the emergence of the WORLD COUNCIL OF CHURCHES. In 1961 the IMC merged with that larger body and continued to function as the WCC's Commission on World Mission and Evangelism. W.G.

INTERPRETATION, HISTORY AND PRINCIPLES OF.

Understanding the Bible and biblical texts, like all other texts, requires interpretation that is based on certain principles and methods for reading texts. Generally such principles and methods, or what might be called hermeneutical guides, are derived, not directly from the texts themselves, but from the contexts in which the texts are interpreted and the reasons for their interpretation. As a rule, the Bible and biblical texts have been interpreted within the context of Jewish and Christian communities, although in recent centuries, nonreligious and academic settings have become contexts for biblical interpretation and thus have introduced new emphases into the picture.

Pre-biblical Interpretation of "Biblical" Materials. During much of what might be called "the biblical period," there was no such thing as the Bible, either in its Jewish or Christian form. During this period certain traditions and collections of material, which eventually came to be part of the Bible, were employed and interpreted in the life of the religious communities that used them. Although such material was treated as authoritative or "scriptural," it was subject to interpretation and reinterpretation in contexts different from the situations in which the materials originated or were first utilized. This earliest type of interpretation may be spoken of, with some license, as inner-biblical or pre-canonical interpretation.

Numerous examples of this inner-biblical interpretation may be seen in both the OT and NT. Such interpretation of earlier material could be the result of desires to extend its frame of reference, to clarify or modify its content or meaning, to reapply the material to new contexts, to read some hidden meaning out of the material being interpreted, to supply what was felt to be missing in the earlier form, and so on. Such interpretation might be made by supplementing the initial text in the form of editorial additions or glosses or by completely recasting. Additions were made to prophetic texts to make them apply to new contexts (see the reference to Judah in Hos. 5:5) or to modify the original material (see the appendix in Amos 9:11-15). The law of the Hebrew slave (Exod. 21:2-6) was reinterpreted in two other texts (Deut. 15:12-18; Lev. 25:39-46). The story of why David did not build the Temple in II Samuel 7:1-13, has been supplemented in I Chronicles 22:8 and 28:3 to explain the reason for his failure. Jeremiah's reference to seventy years for Jerusalem's desolation (Jer. 25:11-12; 29:10) is reinterpreted in Daniel 9:24-27 to mean seventy weeks of years or 490 years and so forth. In the sayings of Jesus, his statements about divorce in Mark 10:1-12 have been reformulated in Matthew 19:1-9 to provide an interpretation with an "exception clause." The emphasis on the immediacy of the Second Coming found in numerous Synoptic texts has been reinterpreted in II Peter 3:8 to extend the time frame considerably.

Early Jewish Interpretation. Within the early Jewish communities, it was generally assumed that the OT was divine in origin and that the words and contents of the texts had some form of immediate relationship to their own life and faith. Since they tended to assume that God's truth was a unity, what was taught in scripture and what was believed and practiced in the community had to be in agreement. Interpretation, or MIDRASH (from darash meaning "to seek, investigate"), of texts occurred in various contexts in the communities: synagogue preaching, translation activity, law courts, and scholarly academies. In all of these, an effort was made to uncover the timeless truth and significance of scripture in response to and under the guidance of contemporary issues, opinions, and beliefs.

Most all branches of early Judaism interpreted the scriptures to determine, or to produce support for, their systems of beliefs and legal practices. Some of the earliest forms of this interpretation can be seen in the Qumran scrolls dating primarily from the last century B.C. and first century A.D. Like rabbinic Judaism, the Qumran community interpreted the Torah and other texts to establish its HALAKAH ("legal rules") and developed paraphrases and commentaries on texts. A special emphasis in the interpretation of scripture at Qumran was its reading of texts, especially those in the prophetic books, as predictions about the community's own life and history and the coming end of the present world orders. They developed a special genre of literature to give exegetical expression to this perspective. This is the so-called PESHER (from a word meaning "to interpret"), in which a biblical book is quoted continuously, a section or verse at a time, and then its "peshet" or interpretation given.

Classical rabbinic interpretation, coming from a later historical period, was far less oriented to the predictive and eschatological reading of the materials than the Qumran community, being more concerned with establishing legal rulings such as one finds in the MISHNAH and TALMUD and in producing midrashim on the scripture, which might be either legal (halakah) or nonlegal, homiletical, or story-like (haggadah) in character. In all cases, however, the desire was twofold: (1) to make the contents of the Bible, even those most obscure, which had come from another age, provide directives and supports for practices and beliefs in a new situation, and (2) to stress the unity of the biblical world and text with the contemporary world of the community and its beliefs and practices.

In establishing halakic and haggadic interpretations, rabbinic scribes, believing everything in the text to be important, frequently sought to read significance into any unusual features: linguistic peculiarities, the formation of letters, modes of expression, and so forth. One rabbi declared: "Search it [Torah] and search it, for everything is in it." In order to preserve some regularity in interpretation, however, rabbis drew up rules or guidelines. Seven such hermeneutical rules are attributed to Hillel, thirteen to Ishmael, and thirty-two to Eliezer.

Translations have always been a form of interpretation. This was certainly the case when the Hebrew text was translated into Aramaic to produce the Targums, and various forms of Greek translations came into being. Some of the Targums and Greek translations are more literal than others. In places, the Targums are more paraphrase than translation and contain major additions not found in the Hebrew. Throughout they try to harmonize contradictions in the text, clarify and modernize obscure points and terminology, emphasize messianic predictions, and reduce the amount of language that speaks of God in human terminology.

Finally, it should be noted that quite early in places like Alexandria, in allegorical reading of texts the plain sense was bypassed or modified, so that a more modern or philosophical or less embarrassing interpretation might be read into the text. The most famous Jewish allegorical interpreter in antiquity was PHILO OF ALEXANDRIA, who died about A.D. 50.

Old Testament Interpretation in the New Testament. In the early church of the first century, the Bible of the Christians, if it is possible to speak of one at this stage, was the scriptures that came to make up the OT. The church's interpretation of the OT, in its emphasis on predictive and eschatological reading of the material, tended to parallel that of Qumran. Paul, for example, could declare that "whatever was written in former days was written for our instruction" (Rom. 15:4). This perspective assumes a basic principle of interpretation, namely, the OT was written for the benefit of the church, not merely or even primarily for the original contexts in which it was composed. Thus early Christians were willing to appropriate the OT in a rather free and charismatic fashion. They believed themselves to be endowed with insight by being Spirit-filled. They used Jesus as the key for understanding many OT passages; they used the OT to understand the NT proclaimed in Jesus. Since Christianity was offering something that went beyond Judaism and the OT, this NT was often read into OT texts through schemes based on prophecy-fulfillment (see Matt. 1:22-23, etc.), typology (for example, Christ as the second Adam; Rom. 5:12-21), or even allegory (see Gal. 4:21-31). On at least one occasion, Paul denies the straightforward meaning of a text about oxen (Deut. 25:4), relating it instead to the question of payment for Christian preachers (I Cor. 9:3-12).

The NT shows Jesus taking a rather critical attitude toward the OT and the secondary traditions or oral laws built on OT texts. He ascribed the permission of divorce to Moses not God (Mark 10:4-5) and contrasted his teaching with that of the OT: "You have heard that it was said . . . but I say to you" (Matt. 5:21-48).

Interpretation in Late Antiquity and Medieval Times. Throughout this period, most interpreters, but especially Christian ones, operated with the assumption that biblical texts could have more than one meaning. Paul's statement that "the written code kills, but the Spirit gives life" (II Cor. 3:6) was taken to mean, among other things, that the literal or plain meaning of a text was not all there was in a text. Exegetes thus searched behind the literal, surface meaning to discover deeper spiritual meanings. The Alexandrian ORIGEN, influenced by Greek and Hebrew allegorical treatment of texts, argued that many passages were never intended to be taken at face value, for example, much of the material in Genesis 1-2. For him, the contents of many narrative texts were figurative expressions that indicated certain mysteries through a resemblance to history but without referring to actual events. For him, what was unbelievable or unedifying was to be understood allegorically.

AUGUSTINE (354-430) applied a more theological argumentation about how to handle the literal meaning of texts. Since the message of the Bible was primarily about love (but also hope and faith) "whatever appears in the divine Word that does not literally pertain to virtuous behavior or to the truth of faith you must take to be figurative," that is, one must search for a secondary or hidden meaning behind the actual statements of many parts of Scripture. Thus Augustine allegorizes literal texts and in the Psalms, for example, has Jesus, the church, or Christians as the speaker.

The search for hidden or secret meanings in the texts was not unopposed in the early church. The so-called school of Antioch—whose most famous theologian was Theodor of Mopsuestia (about 350-428)—argued against excessive allegorical interpretation. In the debates and discussions between the Alexandrians (the allegorists) and the Antiochenes (the more literalists), JEROME (331–420) occupied a middle position.

Eventually, with the triumph of Origen's and Augustine's method, Christian exegetes sought for at least four meanings in a text—literal or historical, allegorical, tropological, and anagogic. In offering the example of Jerusalem, John Cassian (360–425) wrote that historically or literally the name refers to the city of the Jews, allegorically it denotes the church of Christ, tropologically it indicates the human soul, and anagogically it signifies heaven or the eschatological Jerusalem. Thus any text about Jerusalem could be interpreted with all four significations. As a rule, Christian figurative or nonliteral interpretation of biblical texts to discover their spiritual meaning was applied more to the OT than the NT. Exegetical conclusions based on the fourfold meaning of texts practically always remained within the accepted faith of the church.

Within medieval Judaism, a similar fourfold scheme was employed to discover various senses in a text. The four meanings of a text were called pesbat (the plain meaning), remez (allusion or allegory), derash (the homiletical), and sod (the mystical or secret).

During the eleventh and twelfth centuries, a great renaissance of Jewish learning took place. Among the scholars of the time were Ibn Ezra (1092–1167) and Rashi (1040–1105). A renewed emphasis on the plain meaning of the text (the pesbat) was stressed in most of their work. Many Christians were influenced by this focus on the literal meaning and stressed this as of primary importance. Among these were scholars at the Abbey of St. Victor in Paris (founded in 1110) and the later Nicholas of Lyra (1270–1349).

The Renaissance and Reformation Periods. During the Renaissance, interest in classical antiquity and ancient texts blossomed and gave rise to a number of concerns that influenced biblical interpretation. (a) The roots of a true historical perspective began to develop. Whereas medieval art, literature, and thought tended to see the past and the present as homogeneous, Renaissance scholars emphasized the past as truly different from the present. When applied to the Bible, this meant that one could not assume that contemporary issues and viewpoints were identical with those of the biblical writers. (b) The analysis of ancient sources and documents became a primary concern so that the later documentary analysis of biblical materials has its antecedents here. (c) Renaissance scholars argued for an understanding of texts based on grammatical analysis, textual criticism, and other methods that would allow the texts to speak on their own rather than be primarily a sounding board for later tradition and beliefs. Such a perspective challenged the idea of a fourfold meaning in every biblical text.

New approaches and principles of interpretation came out of the Reformation. The Reformers stressed the importance of Scripture, arguing that Scripture alone (sola scriptura) was to be the final judge of the faith of the church and believer. In addition to this central emphasis on the Bible, the Reformers also stressed the plain sense of the text and that Scripture should be compared with Scripture to determine its meaning rather than appealing to church tradition. The Reformers used the Bible to criticize the traditions of the Catholic church as well as its teaching. This meant that the Reformers viewed the contents and the teachings of the Bible as different from what the church had come to claim. What this did was to put a historical and theological gap between the Bible and the church of their day. Such a separation between the Bible and contemporary faith and practice had built into it the need for a critical and historical approach to Scripture, since the "biblical" had to be established in order to use it to critique post-biblical developments.

Although many of the principles of modern approaches to the Bible had their roots in the Renaissance and Reformation, it was not until later, and then partially influenced by people and movements outside the church, that critical and historical methods came to be clearly articulated. Protestant scholasticism, which developed in the late sixteenth century and dominated most of the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries, argued for the inspired infallibility of the Bible and treated it as a source book of doctrines, thus ruling out most critical-historical analysis.

The Modern Period. Developments in various nonreligious fields, as well as developments within the church and synagogue—a shift to more scientific world views and liberal outlooks—challenged the authority of the Bible and its orthodox interpretation in the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries. Questions were raised about the world view of the Bible; its presentation of world history; the claims about its inspiration; contradictions, repetitions, and conflicts in its content. The consequence of these developments was a number of methodologies that have come to be called the historical-critical interpretation of the Bible.

Several principles underlie this approach. First of all, historical criticism argues that the books of the Bible should be interpreted, as far as possible, like any other documents from antiquity. The same sort of questions should be asked about the Bible or the biblical books as about any other document. Who wrote it? When? For what purpose? In what context? How reliable is the material? What special interests did the author have? Second, critical research, not religious beliefs or tradition, must be relied upon to engage and answer these questions. Third, biblical texts have one meaning and that was the meaning intended by the author, which must be arrived at through grammatical, philological, and critical analysis. Fourth, interpretation must seek to understand what the author wrote in terms of the ancient historical context within which it was written. All of these principles assume that the books of the Bible were humanly written, intended for particular audiences in the ancient world, and composed to serve particular purposes.

In recent years, the historical-critical approach and the principles on which it rests have been challenged by other methods such as structuralism and new literary criticism. The basic position of this challenge is the assumption that all literary texts may be read and appreciated in a number of legitimate ways. A portion of the Bible, like a play by Shakespeare, may be read, interpreted, and appreciated merely as an independent text without reference to its original historical context and without the employment of special critical tools.

In the present situation, we appear to be moving toward multi-faceted approaches in biblical interpretation. Such approaches certainly include the historical-critical but also include interpretations based on aesthetic and literary appreciation of the material.

(Compare HERMENEUTICS, CANON, BIBLICAL CRITICISM.) J.H.

INTERTESTAMENTAL. Strictly speaking, between the OT and NT. The term is used to speak both of a period of time and of literature. Chronologically speaking, it is the time extending from the conclusion of the OT to the beginning of the NT. When used of literature, the term has a wider reference denoting many works, some written even earlier than the last books of the OT. J.H.

INTERVARSITY CHRISTIAN FELLOWSHIP. An interdenominational ministry among students in secular colleges and universities. The movement had its beginnings in 1939 under the leadership of C. Stacey Woods, one of its major goals being the recruitment of foreign missionaries. In 1945 IntersVarsity was united with the Student Foreign Missions Fellowship, which had its beginnings among students in American Christian colleges and Bible institutes. Chapters of the united group have been formed in approximately 750 colleges, including nursing schools. Area missionary conferences are held under the sponsorship of the SFMF. Its headquarters is in Madison, Wisconsin, and a publishing operation, IntersVarsity Press, is maintained in Downers Grove, Illinois. W.G.

INTROIT. The opening chants or responses at the beginning of the Roman Catholic mass or the Lutheran service. It takes place at (or symbolizes) the entrance of the ministers for the service. It is to give a feeling of community to the worshipers. The introit was made part of the Mass by Pope Celestine I (mid-fifth century), as a psalm. Later it was reduced to several psalm verses and a refrain. In services without music, the refrain alone is recited by the priest. The Latin text of the introit often supplies the name for the Sunday (for example, "quasi modo geniti," "as newborn babes"). This usage was retained by the Lutheran and Anglican churches after the Reformation. J.C.

INTUITION. An immediate insight into reality or truth that transcends ordinary cognitive and experiential means of gaining knowledge. Although controversial, intuition is often said to be more valid than other methods of discovering truth. René Descartes observed that reason is based on intuitively known presuppositional beliefs, and Blaise Pascal spoke of such fundamental truths as "intuitions of the heart," first principles that reason cannot attain. Benedict Spinoza considered intuition one of the highest forms of knowledge, more reliable finally than knowledge gained from experience and science. Immanuel Kant regarded his own apprehension of the mind's forms of space and time as pure intuitions. Henri Bergson maintained intuition has revealed that relations can never be absolutely constant because reality itself is not constant, thus making intuition essential for completing the knowledge gained by scientific observation. Edmund Husserl likewise insisted that intuitive metaphysical truth is necessary to complete science. C.M.

INVESTITURE CONTROVERSY. The dispute between the civil and the ecclesiastical powers regarding who had the right to name and invest the occupants of high ecclesiastical office, who also wielded great political power. Although the debate continued over a long time, it turned into heated controversy in the clash between Pope GREGORY VII and Emperor Henry IV, who eventually was humiliated by the pope at Canossa. But the dispute continued for years, until a compromise was reached in the Concordat of Worms (1122). J.G.

INVISIBLE CHURCH. See CHURCH: Visible and Invisible.

IOTA. The smallest letter of the Greek alphabet. Iota corresponds to the Hebrew letter yodh and to the English letter i, also the smallest letters. Thus iota has come to mean "a very small quantity." The RSV translates Matthew 5:18, "Not an iota . . . will pass from the law" (KJV, "jot"). B.J.

IRENÆUS OF LYON. Bishop of Lyon in the last quarter of the second century, and one of the most significant theologians of his time. He was born in Asia Minor (probably in Smyrna) about A.D. 135. There he knew Bishop POLYCARP, whom he always held in high regard. Around the year 170, and for unknown reasons, he migrated to Gaul and settled in Lyon, where there was already a Christian community. In A.D. 177, persecution broke out in Gaul, and Irenaeus was elected to succeed Bishop Pothinus, who suffered martyrdom. In A.D. 202, persecution broke out again, and we are told that Irenaeus suffered martyrdom at that time.

Irenaeus was above all a pastor, and as such he wrote several works whose purpose was to guide his flock to a deeper understanding of the Christian faith, and away from error, particularly Gnosticism. Two of his works survive: the Denunciation and Refutation of the So-called Gnosis—best known as Against Heresies—and the Demonstration of Apostolic Preaching.

Irenaeus' theology is pastoral in the deepest sense, for he conceives of God as a shepherd leading humanity through history toward the divine goals. Thus, history, and God's action in it, are his main interests. The divine goal for humanity is for us to have close communion with God. The highest point of this communion is God's incarnation in Jesus Christ, who is both the model after which humans were created (the "divine image" of Genesis) and the goal of our creation. Thus, the Incarnation is not the contingent result of sin, but rather something that God had always intended and which now, because of sin, has the added dimension of redemption. Christ was made human so that we may be made divine, that is, so that we may grow in communion with God. From the very beginning, humans were intended to "grow in justice" under the guidance of the Word, and even though sin has intervened, God is still working to that end.

Irenaeus' theology, which has enjoyed a revival in the twentieth century, represents a very early tradition, and it is likely that the study of it will lead to a better understanding of the NT. J.G.

IRRESISTIBLE GRACE. A doctrine developed from the writings of JOHN CALVIN and stabilized by the Synod of Dort in 1619 as a rebuttal to the Remonstrant, or Arminian viewpoint, that human beings have a part in their salvation.

Calvinists hold a high doctrine of God's sovereignty that leaves no room for free will. All things are ordered by God, and God's saving purpose will be fulfilled in spite of anything humans might do to prevent it (see PREDESTINATION). Since all humanity is born in TOTAL DEPRAVITY, the ELECTION of some to salvation by God's sovereign grace is an act of unmerited love.

Only God knows who have been elected, but those who love God and are seeking to do God's will should assume their election. There is no way that they can fall from grace, because if this could happen, God's sovereign power would have been successfully challenged by a human being. The Synod of Dort quotes Romans 8:29-30 to defend its position.

I.C.

ISAAC. The second of the three founding fathers or patriarchs of Israel; the son born to ABRAHAM and SARAH in their old age. The name Isaac is interpreted by the pentateuchal writers as having to do with the phrase "to laugh." In Genesis 18:9-15 Sarah laughs when the heavenly visitors announce that God's promise of progeny to Abraham will be fulfilled through the hitherto barren and now aged Sarah. In that passage the laughter is subject to the Lord's criticism: "Is anything too hard for the Lord?" (Gen. 18:14.) In Genesis 21:6 the laughter is interpreted as the joy of the community at the miraculous birth to the aged Sarah of a son: "And Sarah said, 'God has made laughter for me; every one who hears will laugh over me . . . who would have said to Abraham that Sarah would suckle children? Yet I have borne him a son in his old age.'"

The birth of Isaac occasioned the casting out of the slave woman HAGAR and her son ISHMAEL, fathered by Abraham at the suggestion of Sarah (Gen. 21:8-21). During the childhood of Isaac, the severe testing of Abraham on Mt. Moriah recounted in Genesis 22 takes place. Abraham is ordered to sacrifice his only son as a burnt offering and evidences his faithfulness in his willingness to do so. But God spares Isaac by providing a ram as a substitute sacrifice and so guarantees the continuance of the progeny promised to Abraham in Genesis 12:1-3. (Many modern commentators take this story to be not so much a historical account as an explanation for why Israel rejected the practice of human sacrifice.)

Genesis 24 recounts the father's effort to find a wife for Isaac among Abraham's kinspeople in the Mesopotamian land of his origin. In answer to the prayer of Abraham's servant, the Lord guides REBEKAH, Abraham's great niece, into his line of sight, while his caravan was drawn up outside the city walls. The servant takes it as a sign that this fair maiden alone draws water for him and his camels to drink. At last, Rebekah leads Abraham's servant to her brother Laban, and after suitable negotiations, Laban grants Rebekah permission to return to Canaan to become Isaac's wife.

As compared to the much longer accounts of Abraham and Jacob, the Isaac saga is relatively brief and fragmentary. We learn in Genesis 25:19-34 of the twin brothers Esau and Jacob, who were born to Rebekah when Isaac was sixty years old. In Genesis 26 Isaac is located in Gerar in the lands of Abimelech, king of the Philistines. It is there that he repeats the deception already recounted twice about his father and mother (see Gen. 12:10-20 and chap. 20); that is, he attempts to pass off Rebekah as his sister rather than his wife in the hope of saving his life. In the end, Isaac takes up his residence in Beersheba (Gen. 26:23-35), where he pronounces his final blessing upon his sons. Tricked by his wife and son Jacob into imparting the irrevocable fatherly blessing upon the younger son rather than the elder, he can give Esau only the bitter legacy, "By your sword you shall live, and you shall serve your brother" (Gen. 27:40). He is said to have died at Hebron at the age of one hundred eighty years and to have been buried there by his sons Esau and Jacob in the tomb of his father and mother, Abraham and Sarah (Gen. 35:28-29; compare 49:31).

Many modern scholars believe that the stories of Isaac belonged to the sanctuary at Beersheba, and that he was the founding father venerated at that place before Israel ever appeared in the land of Canaan. The Isaac stories came to be part of the patriarchal tradition preserved in the Genesis 12–50 saga, when the indigenous legends of the land coalesced into a unified account of the origins of Israel during the formative period between the conquest and the beginnings of kingship under David and Solomon.

W.S.T.

ISAIAH. The Prophet. Isaiah, the son of an otherwise unknown Amoz (Isa. 1:1), received a call to prophecy to his people in the final year of King UZZIAH (Azariah) of Judah (Isa. 6:1-8), that is, about 742 B.C. It is conceivable, though the matter must remain conjectural, that he had a previous career in another prophetic capacity, as a "professional" prophet of cult or court. Such a conjecture rises from the circumstances of his call in the Jerusalem Temple, the evident ready access that he had to the king (Isa. 7:1-9; II Kings 20), the nationalistic tenor of some of his prophecy (compare II Kings 19:21-28), the fact that he apparently had a consort who was also a "prophetess" (Isa. 8:3), and his occasionally eccentric behavior (Isa. 20), among other things that imply that he must have had a former prophetic career.

This guess about Isaiah's possible origin is typical of what can only be surmised about him from inferences derived from his own words and other scanty biographical details. What can be said with fair certainty is that he was born and raised in Jerusalem. Of all the canonical prophets of Israel and Judah, Isaiah is virtually alone in paying no attention to the Mosaic traditions of the Sinaitic law and covenant to provide the bases of moral and social imperatives. Rather, he reverts to an ancient ethos, even a pre-Israelite ethos, of the city Jerusalem, once known (Isa. 1:21) as the dwelling place of righteousness and justice. In basing his prophecy on such premises, Isaiah might be compared with more recent religious thinkers who have forgone the "standard" paradigms in the search for a more indigenous and ethnically identifiable version of the common faith.

One aspect of this distinctive interpretation of Yahwistic religion, however, Isaiah certainly shares with other streams of Israelite tradition, even though the connections may be casual. Jerusalem, after all, as far as Israel was concerned, was the creation of David. Isaiah is the one prophet above all who in his authentic words looked to the Davidic dynasty as embodying the hope of an eventual king who would be the chief political and judicial officer of Israel, fulfilling the Canaanite ideal of kingship (Isa. 7:10-17; 9:1-6; so also in "royal" Psalms, such as Pss. 2, 21, 45, 72, 110). It is Isaiah, virtually alone of the traditional prophets of Israel and Judah, to whom an original "messianic" teaching can be ascribed. Later prophetic messianism is largely secondary, derivative, and imitative.

It has been mentioned that Isaiah was married. He had children, though it may be questioned whether their highly symbolic names (Isa. 7:3; 8:3) have been designed for the purposes of prophecy or if they were actually born of an unusual father. It would appear that he did not long outlive the devastation of Judah by the Assyrian king SENNACHERIB in 701 (the background, probably, presupposed by Isa. 1). All else that is said of Isaiah's further life is legend.

His value as a prophet, which must be garnered from his own words, is both quantitative and qualitative. Quantitative, to the extent that he adds to the account of social abuses that were chronicled by earlier prophets for his documentation of such antisocial activities as land-grabbing (Isa. 5:8-10). Qualitative to the extent that Isaiah, who is presumably an urbane and cultivated citizen of the eighth-century capital city of Jerusalem, agrees fundamentally with the presumably rural MICAH of Moresheth, that the evils perceived by prophecy extended throughout Judah without distinction of class, and that divine judgment was eminently deserved by city and country alike.

The Book. The book of Isaiah is possibly the most complicated of all the OT literature. The first thing to be recognized is that only Isaiah 1–39 can be considered the work of the eighth-century prophet whom we have been discussing above. But the question is not that simple. Isaiah 1–39 is a composite of diverse works.

Proto-Isaiah. This consists, in large part, of the prophecies of Isaiah, from various periods. (1) Chapter 1. Aside from 1:1, which is a standard postexilic chronological indexing of the prophet according to what was to be derived from his own words and the tradition that had grown about him, this chapter is a collection of mostly Isaianic oracles. They probably date from the last period of his ministry, the devastation of Judah (compare vv. 7-9) that accompanied the invasion of Judah by Sennacherib in 701 B.C. This collection of prophecies was doubtless prefaced to the rest of the book by an editor who wished thereby to sum up the prophet's most important themes: observance of social justice rather than verbal honor of God in the cult, retribution of crimes through foreign invasion, the centrality of the Jerusalem ideal, and repentance as the price of restoration.

(2) Chapters 2–5. The introductory verse 2:1 indicates that what follows was originally an independent collection of Isaianic oracles that probably preceded that of chapter 1. It, too, is a summary collection of Isaianic preaching from indeterminate times in the prophet's career, treasured up, like chapter 1, by his disciples, doubtless not without occasional commentary and amplification.

(3) The so-called book of Immanuel: 6:1–9:6. This may have been the first nucleus about which the Book of Isaiah eventually grew. It begins with the prophet's own account of his call to prophecy (though in an edited form that envisages its results as well as its beginnings), continues with the circumstances of the Syro-Ephraimite war, embodies some Isaianic "signs" and exposes Isaiah's acceptance of the "messianic" character of the scion of the Davidic dynasty. Noteworthy is 8:16-23, a passage by which we are informed how the prophetic "literature" of the OT was preserved for us through the memory and literary activity of prophetic disciples.

(4) From 9:7 to 12:6 appear oracles against the northern kingdom of Israel (from the time of the Syro-Ephraimite war?), against the social sins of Judah itself, against ASSYRIA—the scourge of the Lord, interspersed with messianic promises. This complex seems to be another parallel Isaianic collection that has been thoroughly edited and expanded by some of the prophet's disciples.

(5) Chapters 13-23: The oracles against the (foreign) nations. Most of the prophetic books contain such oracles. In the postexilic editing of these works such oracles usually have been collected at midpoint between prophecies of doom and of salvation to signify that although it was by means of the nations that Israel had been chastised, still the Lord held these instruments of his wrath equally accountable for their own sins. The postexilic editors also tended to build on these oracles and extend them down into their own times, envisaging the contemporary enemies of Israel. There is no doubt that the preexilic prophets, though their primary mission was to Israel or Judah and that alone, did also on occasion prophesy against foreign nations (so Isaiah against Assyria, so Amos 1:3-2:3, so Nahum, etc.). Thus there is no problem about acknowledging an Isaianic nucleus to this collection, which concerns traditional enemies like Egypt, Moab, Assyria, and others. But it is also obvious that later amplifiers are responsible for texts like chapter 13, against Babylon (read "Chaldea"), which was not to exist as a threat to Israel till more than a century after the prophet's death.

(6) Chapters 24-27: the Apocalypse of Isaiah. This is a highly complicated mass of material of various stages of development and authorship, which for the first time regarding the Isaianic passages we have been considering probably has nothing whatsoever to do with the eighth-century prophet Isaiah. It is of postexilic composition, doubtless the very last segment to be inserted into this book, and probably for no better reason than that Isaiah had been chosen to be one of the repositories of miscellaneous prophetic and para-prophetic material of late origin that was being distributed over the existing body of literary prophecy.

(7) In chapters 28-33 we rejoin the prophet Isaiah. Here we have a collection of "woe" oracles, which date from the latter part of his career, the years prior to 701. Interspersed is non-Isaianic material, some of it imitative of Isaiah, some of it salvation prophecy of a later time.

(8) The two chapters 34-35 are also late and of different, though related, character. The first is prophecy of doom for Edom, in the spirit of exilic detestation of this predatory enemy of Israel (compare Ps. 137). The second is salvation prophecy reminiscent and probably imitative of Deutero-Isaiah.

(9) Chapters 36-39 form a historical supplement taken, with some modifications, from II Kings 18:13-20:19.

Deutero-Isaiah. There is no longer any critical doubt that Isaiah 40-55 is the work of a prophet or prophets from exilic times composed long after the eighth-century Isaiah for whom the book is named. For lack of a better designation, the anonymous prophet or prophets is conveniently titled Second Isaiah. It is not impossible, of course, that the fairly routine name Isaiah ("Yahweh is salvation") was borne by more than one person within the prophetic tradition of Israel and Judah. The argument that Deutero-Isaiah's place in the prophetic collections is to be accounted for as the work of Isaianic "disciple(s)" is not as easy to maintain. While there are inevitably some traits that were shared in common by all these Judahite and Yahwistic prophets, still the circumstances of the exile and exilic theology have separated Deutero-Isaiah from the career and thought of Isaiah ben Amoz in quite essential ways.

It may be debated whether one or several hands are responsible for Isaiah 40-55. Probably the prevailing scholarly consensus today would favor single authorship. The composition is a unity, not developed on logical lines but rather through the reiteration of certain key ideas. Its leitmotiv is expressed in 40:1-2: it is the Book of Consolation of Israel, preaching the good news of pardon and salvation (52:7) after the days of punishment and travail during the Exile. It celebrates the power of Yahweh not only as superior to the gods of the Gentiles but as the only God. A theoretical monotheism is professed, along with a sustained polemic against the idols of the nations.

Correspondingly, the destruction of Babylon the oppressor is cheerfully prophesied, at the hands of the up-and-coming CYRUS of Persia, whom the prophet does not hesitate to call the Lord's anointed, his Messiah (45:1). Cyrus did, of course, in 539 B.C. conquer Babylon, and in the following year he proclaimed the freedom of the Jews exiled there to return to Judah and rebuild the city and the temple (II Chr. 36:22-23). Deutero-Isaiah's openness to the pagan Cyrus as Israel's savior is matched by his universalism in relation to the extent of the salvific design of the God of Israel (55:1-14). It is true, this is a universalism of proselytism and triumphatism (45:14; 54:1-3), a glorification of Judaism and of Jerusalem. Similarly, though the Lord's mercy is extended to all freely, for his own sake (43:25), Deutero-Isaiah continually refers to Israel's ancient traditions (see 43:3 and note the patriarchal traditions, for example, 41:8, little invoked by earlier prophets) as precedent for his here-and-now dispensation.

Deutero-Isaiah's prophecy is of a new dispensation of God, which amounts to a new creation (43:1). This connection of redemption with the notion of creation has influenced the doctrine of the Priestly story of Creation in Genesis 1:1-2:4a.

The so-called Servant Songs of Deutero-Isaiah, usually designated as Isaiah 42:1-4; 49:1-6; 50:4-6; and 52:13-53:12, are from a body of material whose relation to Deutero-Isaiah continues to be disputed. For some critics the Servant Songs, with their doctrine of a prophetic "messianism" of vicarious atonement, are an addition to Deutero-Isaiah by a later author; for others they were a prior complex adapted by the exilic prophet. In part, the dispute is further complicated by the lack of agreement concerning the identity of the Servant (an individual? of what character? historical, symbolic, eschatological? a collectivity? etc.) and therefore the compatibility of the doctrine of the Songs with the rest of Deutero-Isaiah's convictions. As far as the adapted position of the Songs is concerned, it would appear that Isaiah 41:8-10 (not one of the putatively independent Servant Songs) has deliberately incorporated them into the concept of "Israel, my servant," and for still other critics, therefore, that is the figure that they originally had in mind as part of Deutero-Isaiah's own work. The Israel that is redeemed is also the Israel in which has been made manifest an undeserved suffering that is an atonement for others (compare Isa. 40:2, where it is said that Israel has received from the Lord's hand "double for all her sins").

Trito-Isaiah. Isaiah 56-66 is another segment of prophetic literature that is judged today to be separate, not only from Proto-Isaiah, but also from Deutero-Isaiah as well. Internal considerations would make it fairly evident that we are no longer in contact with a prophet who was preaching on the eve of an anticipated glorious restoration of Judah after its exile, but rather with the situation of far less romantic reality of resettlement and reorganization, which is documented by the chronicles of Ezra-Nehemiah and such postexilic works as Zechariah, Haggai, and Malachi.

Trito-Isaiah is not the work of a single author. Rather, like Deutero and Trito-Zechariah, as well as the Book of Malachi, it is anonymous, postexilic prophecy produced by various sources, sometimes at cross purposes, which in the final editing of the Hebrew Bible was used to supplement the prophetic literature and to adjust it to prevailing theological positions.

Trito-Isaiah occasionally agrees with Deutero-Isaiah and frequently goes beyond it. Its universalism is more generous (56:3-8) though it is no less triumphalistic (60:1-22) and can be fiercely vengeful, especially in relation to Edom (63:1-6). Like Deutero-Isaiah it is a book of consolation and glad tidings (61:1-4) proclaiming an entirely new order (65:17-19), a new creation. Frequently it is evocative of the language and the particulars of preexilic social prophecy, but it threatens as sanction not foreign devastation but rather delay in restoration of the land and of the city (58:8-12). Also, it appeals very specifically to the legalistic imperatives of postexilic religion (65:1-7) just as readily as it asks the reader to reflect on the spiritual and internal religion that alone gives significance to external observances (58:1-9a).

The attentive reader finds in Trito-Isaiah a continuity not only with Deutero-Isaiah but also with Isaiah, Ezekiel, other preexilic prophets, and the concerns of the postexilic prophets in the restored Judah of Ezra and Nehemiah. It is not, in the main, an unworthy conclusion to the more than half a millennium of the flowering of Israelite prophecy.

B. V.

ISAIAH, ASCENSION OF. See PSEUDEPIGRAPHIA.

The main sanctuary of the Ise Shrine from the northwest

ISÉ SHRINE. In Japanese, the Ise Daijingu, the "Grand Shrine of Ise." Ise is the most important SHINTO shrine, being the principal place of worship of Amaterasu, the sovereign solar goddess and ancestress of the imperial house. Located on the Eastern seaboard of Japan some two hundred miles southwest of Tokyo, Ise is actually comprised of two shrines about five miles apart, the Naiku of "Inner Shrine" dedicated to Amaterasu, and the Geku or "Outer Shrine" of Toyouke, goddess of food. Dating back to prehistoric times, the shrines are constructed of unpainted wood and celebrated for their austere, archaic architecture. They are ritually rebuilt every twenty years. Associated with the main Ise shrines are a number of auxiliary shrines. Ise is a popular magnet for pilgrimage, and during the Tokugawa period (1600-1868) visits to its holy places sometimes became mass enthusiasms.

R. E.

ISHBOSHETH. The Hebrew word for "man of shame." Son of King SAUL, who reigned for a period over the northern tribes of Israel after the death of his father (about 1000 B.C.). In I Chronicles 8:33 and 9:39 Ishbosheth's name is given as Eshbaal, Hebrew for "Baal exists." Many scholars have concluded that this is the original form of the name and that someone associated with the authors of I and II Samuel, a party sympathetic to the Davidic dynasty, altered the form of the name, thus slandering its owner.

Ishbosheth/Eshbaal was apparently placed on the throne by the commander of Saul's army, Abner, after the Hebrew defeat at Mt. Gilboa at the hands of the Philistines. The fact that Ishbosheth/Eshbaal reigned from Mahanaim, a site east of the Jordan, suggests that the central hill country (the location of Saul's former stronghold) was now in the hands of the Philistines. There was protracted warfare between forces loyal to Ishbosheth/Eshbaal and those loyal to DAVID, whose center of power was Hebron, in the south (II Sam. 2:1). The effort to perpetuate the Saulite dynasty collapsed when Abner defected to David (II Sam. 3:17-21), and Ishbosheth/Eshbaal was murdered by two Benjaminites (that is, members of Saul's own tribe) named Rechab and Baanah (II Sam. 4). In a bloody climax to this series of events, Abner was killed by Joab, while the Benjaminites were condemned to death by David. J.D.N.

ISHMAEL. The name of Isaac's half brother, which means "God hears" or possibly "May God hear!" As is true of so many biblical names, the name is intimately related to the story about the man who bears it. The barrenness and advanced age of Sarah, Abraham's wife, threatened the fulfillment of Yahweh's promise to make of Abram a great nation (Gen. 12:2); furthermore, it deprived Sarah of the joy of child-rearing. Therefore, according to Genesis 16:1-2, Sarah invited her husband to impregnate her Egyptian handmaid HAGAR, saying, "It may be that I shall obtain children by her." In fact Hagar did conceive and then "she looked with contempt on her mistress" (v. 4). Driven out of the household by an angry Sarah, Hagar experienced the first of her saving encounters with the "angel of Yahweh." At a wilderness oasis he assured her of the greatness of the child's destiny—through him her progeny would be innumerable. At his instruction she named the infant Ishmael, because, as the story explains the name, "the Lord has given heed to your affliction" (v. 11).

Yahweh's continued gracious favor toward Ishmael, whom later tradition understood to be the progenitor of the Arabian peoples, is exhibited again and again in the cycle of stories in Genesis 16-28. He participates in the original covenant act of circumcision (Gen. 17:22-27); he is saved from death once again in the wilderness by the angel of God after Sarah, jealous of his friendship for her own child of the promise, Isaac, casts him and his mother out for the final time (Gen. 21:8-21); he becomes the father of twelve sons in his own right (Gen. 25:12-18), thus enfleshing the promise made to his mother that God would "greatly multiply your descendants so that they cannot be numbered for multitude" (Gen. 16:10).

Of the other five Ishmaels mentioned in the OT, only Ishmael son of Nethaniah, a member of the royal family (II Kings 25:25), needs mention here. According to Jeremiah 40:7-41:15, he led an uprising against the provincial administration left behind in Jerusalem by the Babylonians after the conquest and deportation of 587 B.C. W.S.T.

ISHMAELITES. The name of those neighboring tribes whom the Israelites regarded as having descended from ISHMAEL, the half brother of Isaac. In Genesis 37:25-28 they are pictured as camel caravaneers, plying a trade in gum, balm, myrrh, and slaves between the east bank of Jordan and Egypt. The Ishmaelite band to whom Joseph was sold by his brothers ultimately retailed him to the Egyptian officer Potiphar (Gen. 39:1). Genesis 37:28 and 37:36 appear to identify the Ishmaelites with Midianites (another nomadic people centered in southern Palestine), but some critics contend that the Elohistic writer simply favored the latter term over the term "Ishmaelites" employed by the Yahwistic writer.

Elsewhere in the OT the (con)fusion of the Ishmaelites and Midianites continues. The spoil of the armies of Midian destroyed by Gideon included golden earrings, a fact that a glossator explains cryptically as follows: "They had golden earrings, because they were Ishmaelites" (Judg. 8:24b).

Individual Ishmaelites who receive passing notice in the OT include Jether (I Chr. 2:17), the husband of David's sister Abigail and father of David's nephew Amasa, who became one of his trusted military commanders. Another Ishmaelite who served David was Obil, the steward of the king's camels (I Chr. 27:30). These brief notices suggest that relations between Israel and the Ishmaelites were amicable enough; only once, in Psalm 83:6, are they listed among the enemies of Israel alongside a southern border people, the Edomites. W.S.T.

ISHTAR. In the ancient world of Babylon and Assyria, Ishtar was the goddess of love, fertility, motherhood, and war. In Canaan, Arabia, Phoenicia, Aramaea, and Egypt her name was usually spelled Astarte, and she sometimes also appears in the OT as ASHTORETH. King Solomon built an altar to her, perhaps because of the foreign wives in his harem, and King Josiah destroyed it. In Greece she was known as Aphrodite, and in Rome as Venus. T.J.K.

ISIDORE OF SEVILLE. Archbishop of Seville from about A.D. 600 to 636. The leading figure of the Spanish church at the time, and a scholar whose writings were widely read in later centuries.

Isidore succeeded his brother Leander as archbishop of Seville shortly after King Recared had abandoned ARIANISM in favor of orthodox Christianity. Then came a period of political chaos in which the church sought to restore order. The Fourth Council of Toledo (A.D. 633), under Isidore's leadership, declared who was the rightful king, ordered clerical celibacy (with minor penalties for offending clerics and harsh punishment for their wives), and put Jews under severe handicaps.

His main work, the Etyologies, summarizes the knowledge of his time on all subjects, including not only theology, but also astronomy, agriculture, zoology, and medicine, to name a few. Many of the etymologies Isidore suggests are quite fanciful, as is also some of the information he offers. In another work, he sought to bring up to date the chronicles On Illustrious Men by JEROME and Gennadius. His History of the Kings of the Goth, Vandals, and Suevoi is still an important source. Through these writings Isidore, who was not an original thinker, left his mark on the course of science and theology throughout the Middle Ages. J.G.

ISIS AND OSIRIS. Gods in the religion of ancient Egypt. Isis was the wife of Osiris and the mother of Horus. From the earliest period of prehistoric Egypt, Isis was worshiped as the supreme mother god, symbol of the fertility of the soil. In the course of time she became identified with various Semitic, Greek, and Roman gods. Osiris was identified with the waters of the Nile and the sun.

According to one form of the myth, Osiris was killed by his brother Set, who stole Osiris' "third eye," a symbol of kingship. Isis found the corpse, embraced it, and when Osiris revived he impregnated her. She bore their son Horus, who later set out to avenge his father's murder. Horus found his father's corpse and defeated Set, regaining the "third eye."

Osiris came to be regarded as the lord of the realm of the dead and the judge before whom the dead must appear. Thus the myth reflects the "death" and "rebirth" of vegetation and the hope for new life for the dead. Osiris was often identified with the bull god Apis and known as Osiris-Apis. This became the name Serapis, by which he was known in the Roman world. The cult of Isis and Osiris flourished there around the beginning of the Christian Era as one of the so-called MYSTERY RELIGIONS. K.C.

ISLAM. The monotheistic religion that had its beginnings with the prophet MUHAMMAD (A.D. 570-632), but lays claim to the whole history of the people of the One God. The prophets of the OT—Adam, Abraham, Moses, David, Solomon, Jonah, and the rest—are honored as forerunners of the last and greatest prophet of all, Muhammad. So too is Jesus, son of the Virgin Mary, who, according to Islamic belief, foretold the coming of Muhammad.

The word "Islam" means "submission (to God)," and a person who professes Islam is a Muslim. From its origins in Arabia, Islam spread west across North Africa into Spain and east through Syria, Iraq, and Iran to India, and later to Indonesia and the Philippines. Large Muslim populations are found in the Soviet Union and in China. Under the Turks, Islam ruled large areas in southeast Europe for centuries. By the eleventh and twelfth centuries Islam was strong in many parts of Africa south of the Sahara, and it continues strong there today.

As a major cultural force, as the inspiration of rich traditions in literature, philosophy, and art, and as the power behind the splendor of some of the world's great empires, Islam has shaped the civilization of large areas of the world.

Origins. At the beginning of the seventh century A.D., the old pagan religion of Arabia was still strong. Various gods and goddesses were worshiped, and their images were honored. The city of MECCA was a center of this religion. Pilgrims came long distances to worship at the Ka'ba, a shrine filled with idols. At the same time, there were large and flourishing Jewish communities in Arabia, and contacts with Christians were common. Thus there was knowledge of the other two monotheistic faiths from the start.

Muhammad was born in Mecca. Orphaned at an early age, he grew up under the care of an uncle. He entered the employ of a wealthy widow, Khadijah, and although he was fifteen years younger than she was, they were married. She bore him several children, all but three of whom died in infancy. Only one, his daughter FATIMA, outlived Muhammad. Khadijah was a loving wife, loyal to Muhammad, and an encouragement during the early years of his career as a prophet.

Around 610 Muhammad began to receive revelations, which he was certain came from the one true God. Over the next twelve years they continued to come, but his efforts to establish the worship of God in Mecca bore little fruit. Finally, in 622, accompanied only by his closest friend, Abu Bakr, Muhammad left Mecca to escape the threats of his enemies. He took refuge in the city of MEDINA, 280 miles to the north, and there his movement steadily gained strength. Other revelations came to him there. Before his death in 632 he was able to enter Mecca in triumph and put an end to the worship of idols. The migration to Medina is known as the HIJRA, or Hegira, and marks the first year of the Islamic calendar.

Major Beliefs. (a) The first half of the Muslim creed, "There is no god but God," affirms the oneness of God, without equal, without partners. He stands alone and supreme. He is the Creator of all that exists, and on the last day he will be the sole judge of the living and the dead. The QUR'AN was created by God and given to Muhammad by direct revelation. All of its chapters except one begin by affirming that God is "merciful and compassionate." He is known by "ninety-nine beautiful names." These names include the Knower, the Seer, the Truth, the Sustainer, and the Wise. It has been customary in English to use the name Allah to designate God as he is worshiped by Muslims. The Arabic name is used, however, of God as he is known and worshiped by other monotheists as well. Thus to use it only in speaking of Muslim beliefs is misleading. The similarity of Jewish, Muslim, and Christian concepts of God is striking, but the differences are significant and should not be overlooked.

(b) "And Muhammad is the apostle (prophet) of God." This completes the basic creed and affirms the supreme role of Muhammad. The word translated "apostle" is rasul. It expresses Muhammad's role as God's messenger and as the head of the community of God's people. In general, rasul refers to a special task given to a prophet, and prophet is the broader term. Muhammad is the greatest of the prophets and the "seal" of the prophets. That is, he authenticated the message of the earlier prophets and brought to completion their mission. After him there can be no successor to the office of prophet. While God has highly favored him above all other humans, Muhammad is not more than human.

Major Practices. Muslims are required to perform five duties, known as the Five Pillars of Islam.

(a) The first Pillar is the affirmation of the creed "There is no god but God, and Muhammad is the prophet of God." It is recited each time the call to prayer is given and also on many other occasions. To sincerely affirm this makes a person a Muslim, and he or she is then obligated to observe the other Pillars.

(b) Second is ritual prayer, which must be performed five times each day (at dawn, noon, midafternoon, sunset, and evening). There are strict prerequisites. Purification must be performed with water, or, lacking water, with clean sand or a stone. Specific parts of the body are cleansed in a specified order. The body must be properly covered; males must be covered from the navel to the knees, and females must cover the entire body, except for face, hands, and feet. The place of prayer is also important. Any clean and tranquil place will do, but most community prayers are performed at a MOSQUE. Finally, wherever they are, worshipers must face Mecca. In a mosque the direction of prayer (qiblah) is indicated by a special prayer niche in one wall.

(c) Third, alms must be given to the poor and certain other classes of recipients. Often these alms have been collected as a tax on property and distributed by the government.

(d) Fourth, every Muslim is required to fast from dawn until sunset each day during the month of RAMADAN. Since the Muslim world follows a lunar calendar, this month moves through the solar year, occurring a little earlier each year in relation to the seasons.

(e) The fifth Pillar is the only one not absolutely required. It is the HAJJ, or pilgrimage to Mecca, which must be made once in a lifetime if the individual's health and resources permit.

The Struggles to Succeed Muhammad. (a) The first caliphs. When Muhammad died unexpectedly at the age of 63, there were no procedures for choosing a successor as leader of the community of faith. Should the successor be a member of the prophet's family, a close associate, or a person of strict orthodoxy? ALI, Muhammad's cousin and son-in-law, had a good claim, but he was passed over for Abu Bakr, who lived only two more years. He was the first caliph (successor) in a line that continued until the office of caliph was abolished in Turkey in 1923.

Again Ali was passed over, this time for Umar, a brilliant leader, who was caliph from A.D. 634 to 644. During these years the Muslim armies won overwhelming victories in Syria and later in Egypt. Jerusalem and Damascus were conquered, and the Byzantine Empire was pushed out of territories that had been under Greek rule since Alexander the Great, nearly a thousand years earlier. Egypt was conquered in A.D. 639-41, and the victorious armies pushed on across North Africa. To the east, Iraq was conquered and the ancient Persian Empire crushed. Many of the people of these lands welcomed the change in government, even though not all of them embraced the new religion.

Umar began the transition to empire by establishing controls over the military and over provincial administrators. Assassinated by a disgruntled slave, he was the first of three successive caliphs to meet a violent death. His successor was Uthman (in office A.D. 644-56), another close associate of Muhammad. His greatest achievement was the establishment of the standard text of the Qur'an. Until then there had been disagreement over its precise contents. Uthman aroused hostility by appointing too many of his relatives to office. He was mortally wounded by Egyptian army rebels who had grievances against him.

Finally Ali became caliph in 656, but he was already about sixty years old, and events were beyond his control. The governor of Syria, Mu'awiya, was a member of the Umayyad clan, a clan that had resisted Muhammad almost to the end. Ali dealt weakly with Mu'awiya and lost the chance to assert his authority. Some of Ali's supporters deserted him in disgust, and soon afterward one of them struck him with a sword, mortally wounding him. This left Mu'awiya the unchallenged ruler of the Muslim world.

(b) The rise of the Shi'ites. Those loyal to Ali felt that terrible injustice had been done and refused to recognize either the legitimacy of the first three caliphs or the authority of the new Umayyad dynasty. They formed the shi'a, or party of Ali, causing the most serious division ever to arise in Islam. The SHI'ITES have developed distinctive practices and beliefs over the centuries, and they are often at odds with Sunnites, followers of the Sunna (tradition), who comprise the vast majority of Muslims today.

Shi'ites honor Ali as the first IMAM and trace his successors through a line of infallible imams. The IMAMIYYA is the largest group of Shi'ites. They recognize twelve imams, the last of whom is in "concealment." He will return as the MAHDI, when God so wills, and set up the perfect reign of justice. They are the dominant force in Iran today.

The ISMA'ILIYYA recognize only seven imams, the seventh of whom is to return as the Mahdi. They have split into a number of smaller sects and are scattered throughout the Muslim world.

The Umayyad Dynasty (A.D. 661–750). From their capital city of Damascus, the caliphs of this dynasty ruled the vast new Muslim Empire. They extended its boundaries to Spain in the West and to India in the East. Their rule was efficient, and they encouraged the development of literature and of translations from Greek into Arabic. This preserved much of Greek culture and enabled Muslims to transmit this culture to Europe in later centuries. Many great buildings stand today as evidence of their skill in architecture.

Two problems plagued the Umayyads. First, they were unable to deal effectively with the non-Arab peoples who had been added to the empire. Second, they could not reconcile those who regarded them as having betrayed Ali and his family and as being unfaithful to the purity of early Islam. Their dynasty collapsed, but in Spain Umayyad rulers continued in power until 1031.

The Middle Period. (a) The political scene. The ABBASID dynasty ruled from A.D. 750 to 1258. All the Abbasid caliphs claimed authority as descendants of al-Abbas, the prophet Muhammad's uncle. They moved the capital from Damascus to the new city of Baghdad in Iraq. From there they presided over an age of great splendor. The powerful invasions of the Mongol armies from central Asia put an end to this dynasty.

In the meantime a Fatimid dynasty had ruled Egypt (A.D. 909–1171). In the East, the Seljuk Turks, invaders from central Asia, overran Persia, Iraq, and Syria, and were converted to Islam. The Mongol invaders were also converted.

(b) Schools of law. Islam has always been a total way of life, and religious leaders sought to show the way to serve God in everything that a person or a community did. An elaborate system was developed for deciding disputed questions. There came to be four different schools of thought as to how to interpret the law (SHARIA).

The first of these was the HANIFITE school, which uses speculation liberally. It began with the teachings of the Qur'an and then tried to see how those teachings apply in different circumstances. Legal scholars of this school are also careful to consider the public good and general principles of justice.

Next, the Malikite school uses the traditions about Muhammad's teachings and practice (HADITH) along with the Qur'an. They lean heavily on the consensus of public opinion, and finally they consider issues of what would be to the general advantage of the community.

The third school is known as Shafi'ite, after AL-SHAFI'I (A.D. 767–820), the first person to study previous legal rulings and to develop a scholarly, systematic method of interpreting the law. Because of his vast knowledge he was able to analyze the practices of his time in terms of the Qur'an, the SUNNA, or practice of Muhammad as seen in the Hadith, the consensus of the community, and reasoning by drawing analogies.

The fourth school, the Hanbalite, is the most conservative. Everything is to be decided by reference to the letter of the Qur'an and to the Hadith. This school was a reaction to the loose standards that prevailed under some of the Abbasid caliphs.

(c) The mystics. In the early centuries of Islam there were great individuals who emphasized the inward life of religious devotion. They stressed love for God and proclaimed the goal of oneness with God. Some of them seemed to stray too far from the standard faith, but they kept alive a warm, personal experience in religion. They came to be known as Sufis, a name derived from the simple wool garments many of them wore.

SUFISM's contribution to Islam was made permanent by the work of AL-GHAZALI (1058–1111), a mystic, but also a theologian. He felt driven to investigate all the schools of thought and to understand their strengths and weaknesses. The fruit of this mature reflection was a book of over a thousand pages, The Restoration of the Sciences of Religion. It surveyed the whole range of Muslim thought in the Middle Ages and imparted a mystical fervor.

Among the mystics were some of the greatest poets of the Islamic world. Jalal ad-Din Rumi (A.D. 1207–73) wrote not in Arabic but in Persian. His most famous poem, the Maihnavi, has been called the "Qur'an of the Persian language." In one of his songs he compares the voice of a reed flute, sorrowing over separation from the place where it grew, to the mystic's voice longing to be united with God.

Many Sufis belonged to groups or religious orders, headed by a gifted master. Rumi founded an order popularly known as Whirling Dervishes, because of the physical activities they used to bring on a religious state. Other Sufis were eccentrics who flouted the normal rules of behavior. Europeans called them fakirs.

The Modern Period. The expansion of European power in Asia and the Middle East brought much of the Muslim world under non-Muslim dominance. This was a theological problem as well as a political problem. How could God permit this to happen to those who were submissive to him? One response was extreme conservatism, as seen in the WAHHABI movement in Saudi Arabia from the eighteenth century to the present. Wahhabis have sought to return to the pure Islam of Muhammad's lifetime. They attacked such unorthodox practices as the veneration offered at the graves and shrines of people regarded as saints.

In the twentieth century the Abmadiyya movement in India sought to evangelize non-Muslims and has sent missionaries to Europe and Africa. Its own orthodoxy has been suspect, however, and in Pakistan one branch has been declared a non-Muslim minority, and its members are barred from holding public office.

The Iranian revolution of the late 1970s marked the rise to power of militant Shi'ites, and the prolonged war between Iran and Iraq was made more bitter by hostility between Shi'ites and Sunnis.

Muslims, Jews, and Christians. In spite of their common origins in the Bible and their monotheistic faith, these three religions have often misunderstood and failed to appreciate each other. The Qur'an speaks of Jews and Christians as "People of the Book" and expresses respect for them. At the same time it condemns their failure to accept Islam. The belief that Jesus is the "Son of God" is particularly offensive, since it places a partner beside God and appears to violate monotheism.

Christians have regarded Muhammad as a heretic, charging him with departing from the true faith. They have also condemned Muhammad for having more than one wife and have accused him of lechery. During the CRUSADES (eleventh to fifteenth centuries), feelings were high on both sides as European armies sought to establish Christian kingdoms in the Holy Land. In 1453 Ottoman Turks conquered Constantinople, destroying the ancient Christian Empire of Byzantium and bringing the Crusades to an end. The Turks advanced as far as the gates of Vienna during the Protestant Reformation in the next century, and Protestants and Catholics alike feared the continuing expansion of Islam. It was only after Ferdinand and Isabella drove the last Muslim armies out of Spain in 1492 that they could turn their attention to expeditions across the Atlantic.

Ironically, at the end of World War I, when France and Britain were dividing up the Muslim Middle East between them, Turkey, the defeated Muslim power, was massacring Christian Armenians. The hostility between Druses (a Muslim sect) and Christians in Lebanon has perpetuated ongoing blood feuds. Because Iranians view America as a Christian nation, it was easier to denounce America as the "great Satan" in the 1970s and 1980s.

Jews have generally fared better at the hands of Muslims through the centuries. When they were expelled from Spain after 1492, along with the Muslims, they took refuge in Muslim lands. Large Jewish communities lived for centuries in Muslim societies. Only with the rise of modern ZIONISM did relations turn bitter. The basis for understanding is there. It is usually the will that is lacking on all sides.

K.C.

ISMĀ'ILIIYYA. In Islam, the group of SHI'ITE sects that are loyal to the seventh IMAM, Muhammad, son of Isma'il (late eighth century A.D.). They are therefore also known as "Seveners." They believe that the seventh imam is in concealment and will return as the MAHDI, a messianic figure who will be the culmination of the mission of all the prophets. They emphasize that the secret meaning of all religious statements is known only to Ali and those descended from him.

In the tenth century A.D. a Sevenser named 'Ubaydullah claimed to be the Mahdi and the legitimate ruler of all Muslims. He based his claim on being a descendant of Fatima, the daughter of MUHAMMAD the prophet. He founded the Fatimid caliphate, which ruled Egypt A.D. 909-1171, a period of great cultural achievement.

Several of the Isma'iliyya sects were quite radical. The Qarmatians flourished in the ninth century A.D., and at one point raided the holy city of MECCA and stole the sacred Black Stone from the KA'BA. The Assassins (Hashishiyya) were so called because of their use of hashish to gain a taste of paradise. The crusaders made the name "Assassins" well known in Europe, and it came to be used in various European languages. Marco Polo wrote of the "Old Man of the Mountains," the leader of the sect's mountain fortress at Alamut, south of the Caspian Sea. They survive in the Nizāris, whose present leader is Agha Khan IV. They are scattered in Syria, Iran, India, and East Africa. Another sect has continued to be dominant in Yemen, and others exist in India.

K.C.

ISRAEL. The name given to Jacob at the brook Jabbok just prior to his inevitable confrontation with Esau (Gen. 32:28; compare 35:10). Also the name for the entire body of Jacob's descendants (34:7), and subsequently, for the ten northern tribes which, after the schism of the Hebrew people in 922 B.C., functioned independently of Judah (I Kings 12:16).

Overview. Our main task involves summarizing the history of biblical Israel in a manner that takes account of crucial social and economic developments. Israel's self-awareness, however, constitutes a prior issue demanding our attention. Historical honesty invites the assertion that the collective corporate Israel did not emerge until various related Hebrew tribes had firmly established themselves in the land of Canaan, otherwise known as Palestine. Yet theologically, Israel traced her origins to Yahweh's call of Abraham (Gen. 12:1-3), which required his migration from Haran in upper Mesopotamia to a new homeland in Canaan. That land would be the heritage of his many descendants.

The gift of land and progeny was viewed as a special manifestation of divine love that eluded rational explanation. Though Israel was "the fewest of all peoples" (Deut. 7:7) and lacking in moral worth (9:4-6), she knew that she was the people of God in a special sense. Her God said, "You only have I known of all the families of the earth" (Amos 3:2a). Yet if Israel were Yahweh's "own possession" (Exod. 19:5) chosen for God's unique purpose, she was given no license to live capriciously (Amos 3:2b). While merciful, Yahweh expected uncompromising fidelity from her. As a "light to the nations" (Isa. 49:6), Israel was charged to welcome outsiders who would join her. Yahweh's plan for universal salvation necessarily involved Israel. Even so, this chosen nation must resolutely shun all idolatry. Any compromise would spell disaster as the people fell victim to their enemies. Thus Israel saw herself as the descendants of Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob-Israel, who were charged to serve Yahweh faithfully in the land that God had awarded them (Josh. 24:14). And regularly the OT presents Israel thinking of herself as a worshiping community meaningfully linked with the deity in ongoing covenant fellowship.

In the NT, "the Israel of God" label is attached to Christianity with its unmistakable Jewish roots (Gal. 6:16). Gospel genealogies (Matt. 1:1-17; Luke 3:23-38) affirm the early church's OT ancestry. In the preaching of John the Baptist (Matt. 3:7-9), spiritual lineage surpasses physical lineage. In God's economy, Jews are therefore regarded as having been supplanted by Christians as "God's own people" (I Pet. 2:9-10). In defense of this position, Paul resorts to a Sarah-Hagar allegory wherein Christians are regarded as free and Jews as slaves (Gal. 4:21-31). Nevertheless, Paul also holds that at some future moment, the Jews will be restored to the divine favor they hitherto have known (Rom. 11:25-27).

Pre-monarchic Israel. (a) Patriarchal era. In biblical tradition, the Genesis patriarchs are regarded as Israel's earliest ancestors. Though Hebrew origins are sufficiently complex to have incorporated both Semitic and non-Semitic elements, the patriarchs appear to be well linked with Syria and northwest Mesopotamia, the locus of the Semitic Arameans. One of Israel's confessional liturgies properly recalls, "A wandering Aramean was my father" (Deut. 26:5).

Regrettably, not even one individual or event narrated in Genesis can be confidently equated with its counterpart in the numerous ancient extra-biblical texts now available. Even so, the patriarchal traditions are ordinarily set against the broad cultural horizon of the Middle Bronze II Era (about 2000-1550 B.C.), though sometimes the Late Bronze Era (about 1550-1200 B.C.) is preferred. Patriarchal names, customs, life-styles, and religion make sense in such a context. The patriarchal groups, including those large families (clans?) led by Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob, seem to have originated in upper Mesopotamia as part of the Amorite and Aramean migrations respectively attested in the Middle and Late Bronze eras.

If Israel's founding fathers roamed about Canaan's hill country with relative ease, they were not simply self-sufficient pastoralists as once supposed. Rather they were members of a mixed society in which urban and agricultural-pastoral components coexisted. As persons who farmed (Gen. 26:12), owned land (23:17-18; 33:19), and possessed heavy livestock (including oxen, 12:16; 21:27), the patriarchs kept company with Canaan's settled farmers and villagers. With its patriarch as authority figure, the family was the sole identifiable unit in patriarchal society. Canaanite drought sometimes necessitated Semitic migrations to the Egyptian Delta. Undoubtedly the Joseph narrative, which witnesses to the relocation of Jacob's family in Egypt (46:1-47:12), telescopes several such movements.

(b) Moses and the Exodus. During the Nineteenth Dynasty, a confident Egypt existed under Seti I (about 1305-1290 B.C.) and Ramses II (about 1290-1224 B.C.). Though their archives mention neither Moses nor the flight of Hebrew slaves, the report that Jacob's descendants substantially fell out of favor with the Egyptian court is likely authentic (Exod. 1:8ff.). Significant confessional liturgies (Deut. 6:20-24; 26:5-9; Josh. 24:2-13) and the ancient Song of Miriam (Exod. 15:21) speak for the historicity of Israel's formative exodus event. The embellished biblical saga in Exodus 1-15, however, reflects the life experience of but one ancestral strain of later Israel.

The Exodus 1:11 allusion to Hebrew slave labor at the store-cities of Pithom and Raamses suggests a thirteenth-century B.C. date for the EXODUS. Indeed, Seti I and Rameses II are remembered in Egyptian history as ambitious builders in the Nile Delta. Moreover, the stela of Marniptah (about 1224-1211 B.C.), son of Rameses II, attests Israel's presence in Canaan in about 1220 B.C.

Israel's deliverance at the "Sea of Reeds" (yam suph in the Hebrew of Exod. 15:4) cannot be pinpointed, but the southern extension of Lake Menzaleh in the eastern part of the Nile Delta is likely. Since the linking of the Exodus and Sinai traditions need not be secondary, Moses presumably led his marvelously delivered people to Sinai, located by tradition at the southern apex of the Sinai Peninsula. Having received Yahweh's law and entered into covenant relation with Yahweh (Exod. 19-24), the people trekked through the wilderness to the Kadesh Oasis (Num. 10:12-20:22). Failing to penetrate Canaan from the south (Num. 13-14), they advanced eastward to a Transjordanian position in the Moab plain to await the proper moment to ford the Jordan into the Land of Promise.

(c) Rise to power in Canaan. Diverse biblical, sociological, and archaeological data have elicited conflicting answers to the question, How did the Hebrews successfully come to occupy Canaan? Three differing models have been posited involving conquest, immigration, and revolt. The conquest model, accepting the fundamental integrity of Joshua 1-11, argues that various Hebrew tribes, united under Joshua's leadership, often tasted victory as they waged war on Canaan's citizens. The military conflicts are dated to the last decades of the Late Bronze Era (late thirteenth century B.C.), when Canaan experienced sweeping cultural shifts. Such geographically distant cities as Hazor, Bethel, Lachish, and Debir sustained extensive destruction before being rebuilt by a people—presumably hailing from the desert—whose material culture was inferior to what was previously there. The archaeological evidence, however, does not specifically confirm that Israelite energies were here involved.

Assuming that Joshua played a more circumscribed role than Joshua 1–11 projects, and that combined tribal effort was more the exception than the rule, the immigration model holds that for many decades Canaan hosted numerous migrations of seminomadic herdsmen who peaceably quested pasture. As they occupied sparsely inhabited areas in the hill country, they cleared the forests and moved toward an agrarian life-style. Intermittent warfare only erupted toward the end of the era of the Israelite Judges (mid-eleventh century B.C.), when these immigrants, pressing for more space, met Canaanite city-states head on. Recent perceptions about the interrelatedness of pastoral, rural, and village life in the ancient Near East, however, have partially rendered this model inoperative.

The revolt model posits a sociopolitical upheaval wrought by disgruntled Canaanite peasants who fought against the injustices of a feudalism that the city-state overlords had imposed on them. Among the varied lower-class people this revolution attracted were restive free farmers and belligerent serfs. When newly arrived Israelites joined their egalitarian cause and recounted their own rescue from Egyptian servitude and Yahweh's promise of salvation, new advances were realized. The imperialistic yoke of the Canaanite overlords was overthrown in favor of more democratic tribal rule (Judg. 21:25). The emphasis on social process rather than on exact historical reconstruction makes this model attractive. But it entertains egalitarian goals nowhere implied by the biblical record, and in the Canaanite urban oppressor it assumes a shadowy villain. In any event, Israel's rise to power in Canaan, which ultimately involved an intertribal confederacy to answer both religious and defense needs, was assuredly a multi-faceted phenomenon.

Israel as United Monarchy. (a) SAUL. Eventually the intertribal Israelite confederacy proved incapable of dealing effectively with increasing enemy pressure. The eastward advance of Philistine power was particularly menacing. After the Philistines' triumph over Israel at Aphek, a monarchy was established. As one who decisively overwhelmed the Ammonites who were besieging Jabesh-gilead, Saul was installed by the prophet Samuel as Israel's first monarch (about 1020–1000 B.C.). A rustic king who ruled from his Benjaminite hometown of Gibeah, Saul was constantly required to address the Philistine problem. Even lacking the services of a standing army, he died fighting the enemy at Mount Gilboa.

(b) DAVID. Unmistakably talented, popular, and calculating, David (about 1000–961 B.C.) became king over his native Judah. Then following the murder of Saul's ineffectual son, Ish-baal, David was soon acclaimed monarch over all Israel. Unlike Saul, David reduced the Philistines to vassalage. He then took the hitherto impregnable Jebusite city of Jerusalem and made it his capital. By transferring Israel's sacred ark of the covenant there, David made certain that politics and religion would coalesce to his own advantage. Without neighboring nations strong enough to thwart him, David soon headed a kingdom greater than that ruled by any subsequent Israelite monarch. Nevertheless, David did not always evoke tribal support. Judah backed Absalom's rebellion against him and Benjamin, through such trouble-makers as Shimei and Sheba, rejected him as a throne usurper.

(c) SOLOMON. In David's son, Solomon (about 961–922 B.C.), the United Monarchy had its last king. If Solomon enjoyed the blessing of international peace, his subjects suffered from the curse of oppressive court policy. Under Davidic instigation and ready Solomonic endorsement, Israelite society moved speedily from a pattern of decentralization and social egalitarianism characteristic of the Judges Era to one of urban centralization and social stratification. By founding the Jerusalem Temple to serve as royal dynastic chapel as well as national sanctuary, sponsoring courtly wisdom in imitation of imperialistic Egypt, maintaining a standing army and court harem, establishing an ambitious taxation program that consciously violated earlier tribal boundaries, using forced labor to implement his many building enterprises, and engaging enthusiastically in both overland and sea trade, Solomon ruled Israel with a heavy hand.

With expenses regularly exceeding income, Israel's economy was sick and Solomon's splendor hollow. Moreover, international alliances with an unnamed Egyptian pharaoh and with Hiram, king of Tyre, sealed by marriages with foreign princesses, introduced alien cultural and religious influences that offended many Israelites of village and rural orientation. Nor were they enamored with the emergence of an urban aristocracy of governmental bureaucrats, military dignitaries, and well-to-do merchants. Clearly, the liberating aspects of the earlier Mosaic tradition fell under serious threat.

Israel as Divided Monarchy. (a) The independent kingdoms of Israel and Judah. When Solomon's son and successor, Rehoboam (922–915 B.C.), refused to loosen the reigns of government (I Kings 12:14), the United Monarchy split into the two rival kingdoms of Israel/Ephraim (north) and Judah (south). Beginning with JEROBOAM I (922–901 B.C.), who enjoyed Ahijah's prophetic support, Israel was governed for exactly two centuries by a succession of nine different dynasties until Assyria leveled its capital, Samaria, in 722 B.C. Apart from Athaliah's intrusive presence (842–837 B.C.), Judah knew only the dynasty of David.

With the collapse of the United Monarchy, the state's imperialistic ambitions were frustrated. Yet this was no return to Israel's tribal past. Indeed, under such self-serving monarchs as AHAB (869–850 B.C.)

and Jeroboam II (786–746 B.C.), urban centralization and social stratification revived. Lower-class individuals were ruthlessly exploited. From both central and peripheral positions within their society, however, several prophets attempted to redress monarchy. Ahab and Jeroboam were respectively challenged by ELIJAH and AMOS, who deftly advanced the liberating consciousness of the Mosaic tradition. And in his confrontation with AHAZ (735–715), king of Judah, ISALAH behaved similarly.

(b) Judah after Israel's demise. Though regularly incapable of steering an independent course, the southern kingdom survived for 135 years following Assyria's conquest of northern Israel. Notably under Ahaz and MANASSEH (687–642 B.C.), Judah was essentially an Assyrian satellite. The religion of Yahweh was necessarily compromised by Assyrian influence. Traces of extremes of wealth or poverty were relatively rare in Judah, though corrupt judges and selfish landlords manifested social and moral indifference. This triggered stern rebuke from such prophets as Isaiah, MICAH, and JEREMIAH, who sought to restore their people to a social and religious unity.

Favorable international circumstances allowed HEZEKIAH (715–687 B.C.) and JOSIAH (640–609 B.C.) to launch reform programs that reversed earlier syncretic policies and centralized Judah's religion in Jerusalem (II Kings 18:3-7; 22:1–23:25). In Josiah's case, the claims of the socially liberating Mosaic Torah were advanced ahead of the imperialistic claims of the Davidic state. But Judah soon succumbed to Babylon, which had wrested world dominion from Assyria. After Jerusalem's fall to the Babylonians in 587, many Judeans were ushered into BABYLONIAN CAPTIVITY.

Post-monarchic Israel. (a) Israel in exile. While some Jews resumed agrarian life as best they could in a ravished Judah, and others, having fled to northern Egypt, established there an ongoing colony, Judaism's nucleus endured a dark interval of Babylonian exile (587–538 B.C.). Obviously shaken by abrupt relocation, many Jews, under the prophetic leadership of Ezekiel and Second Isaiah, embraced their ancestral faith with new zeal and looked forward to restoration in Judah. Indeed, this was a theologically creative moment for Yahweh's people. After Persia's takeover of Babylon under CYRUS (550–530 B.C.), the exiles were allowed to return to their homeland. Some of the exiles who were not encumbered by successful business ventures courageously accepted the invitation.

(b) Restoration and beyond. Amid physical hardship, the Jews rebuilt Jerusalem and its Temple. Thanks to such able governors as NEHEMIAH and dedicated priestly leaders as EZRA (about 450–400 B.C.), a viable restoration community was established. The peasant masses, however, sustained new economic hardship (Neh. 5:1-13) when the Samaritan elite, recently descended into Judah, competed for positions of power with the Jewish elite, who saw themselves as the true Israel now returned from Babylon.

New challenges came when the conquests of Alexander the Great in 332 B.C. subjected Palestine to Greek rule. After Syrian-based Seleucid monarchs annexed Palestine and reactivated Alexander's policy of imposing Hellenic culture on non-Greek subjects, Jewish revolt under the Maccabees broke out in 167 B.C. Though an interval of Jewish independence ensued, Rome overtook Palestine in 63 B.C. Thereupon Jewish-Roman relations generally deteriorated until the Jewish Revolt erupted in A.D. 66. Four years later, Jerusalem and its Temple were destroyed. Yet thanks to its indomitable spirit, Judaism, the Israel of God, assuredly did not expire.

J.K.K.

ISSACHAR. One of the twelve sons of JACOB, whose name appears to mean "May God show mercy." According to the earliest tradition, he was one of the sons of Leah born in her later years, and so he is nearly always mentioned together with Zebulun, Leah's sixth and final son. The shady circumstances of Issachar's conception, involving Leah's purchase from Rachel of Jacob's affections for one night for the price of some sought-after mandrakes, gave rise to the popular interpretation of the meaning of his name, "God has given me my hire" (Gen. 30:18)—assuming that the name contains the two Hebrew words ish, "man," and sakar, "price."

The tribe of Issachar was assigned territory between Mt. Tabor and the Jordan River just south of the Sea of Galilee according to the division of Joshua 19:17-23. Perhaps this reflects an identity at best only semi-differentiated from the Canaanite tribes whose cities stood in that area. The Canaanite connection may be reflected in the judgment against the tribe preserved in the Blessing of Jacob (Gen. 49:1-28). Mentioned after his younger brother Zebulun (as is also the case in Joshua 19 and Judges 5), Issachar is described as "a strong ass" who "became a slave at forced labor" (Gen. 49:14-15). And yet the assessment of Issachar's role in the battle celebrated by Deborah (Judg. 5:15) is altogether positive. The tribe of Issachar is ultimately assigned one of the twelve full provincial administrations during the reign of Solomon (I Kings 4:17). In the only NT reference to the tribe (Rev. 7:7), Issachar has recovered his rightful place in the order of Leah's sons, for his twelve thousand are sealed unto salvation before those belonging to Zebulun.

W.S.T.

ISVARA. From the Sanskrit word for "Master" or "Lord." In religion Isvara is a common term in HINDUISM for a supreme personal god, usually one which, in one way or another, facilitates his worshiper's salvation or liberation. The Isvara deity therefore contrasts on one hand with the DEVAS or finite cosmic gods of Vedic religion, and on the other with the impersonal spirit of SAMKHYA or VEDANTA philosophy. In the YOGA sutras of Patanjali, the student is admonished to worship Isvara at early stages of the path, apparently as an ideal or symbol of his purusha, or true spiritual nature. It is in BHAKTI, however, that Isvara deities, such as Vishnu or Shiva, come into great prominence. Many bhaktas think of them as genuinely supreme personal gods. But in philosophical Vedanta, a personal god is ultimately of Maya, an accommodation of BRAHMAN shaped by the mind of a worshiper still unfree of Avidya, or ignorance. R.E.

ITALY. A long, boot-shaped peninsula in the Mediterranean Sea.

Biblical. Paul lived in ROME, the capital of Italy, the last two years of his life as recorded in the book of Acts. He may have written the "prison letters"—Philippians, Philemon, Colossians, and Ephesians—while imprisoned there. He had been brought to Italy when Roman soldiers rescued him from an angry temple mob. Paul, asserting his Roman citizenship, asked to be tried before Caesar. Acts 28 indicates that Paul stopped at two Italian cities, Rhegium and Puteoli, on his journey from Jerusalem to Rome. It also notes that Christians came from the Italian cities known as Forum of Appius and Three Taverns when they learned that Paul was in Rome. Two Jewish Christians who worked closely with Paul, Priscilla and Aquila, had earlier fled Rome when the emperor Claudius had commanded all Jews to leave the city.

Italy is also mentioned in the NT book of Hebrews. In the closing words the writer says, "Those who come from Italy send you greetings."

Historical. The ROMAN EMPIRE controlled the Mediterranean world and Western Europe from about 30 B.C. to the fifth century A.D. It was within the Roman Empire that Christianity arose and developed. The book of Acts shows Roman officials as either protecting or ignoring Christians. But later Roman emperors ordered many Christians to be put to death. Then the Roman Emperor Constantine, after his conversion in 312, declared Christianity the state religion. Rome remains today a principal city of the Christian faith. B.J.

I-THOU/I-IT. Phrases that came into currency through the title of MARTIN BUBER's seminal book, I and Thou (1924; Eng. trans. 1937; new trans. 1970). Steeped in the biblical tradition, he explored forms of address as indicative of relationships. I-I represents the person who knows only the self. I-it represents the person who knows people or things objectively. Some have little "I" and cannot relate to another. Others live in an undivided world of only "we." Still others divide the world into "us" and "them."

I-Thou is the language of relationship. In the original German, "thou" is the familiar form used between friends, lovers, and family. To see the other as you (thou) is to live in relationship. It is an act of grace, a personal encounter, where neither is looking for something from the other. Buber writes that "all actual life is encounter." This is also the relationship to God. Yahweh is the One who is always present. To study about God is to see God as "it." To know God is to be encountered by God as "thou."

Buber's epigrammatic style gives the book a unique quality, and it must be read slowly in order to be understood. It is deeply expressive of the Hasidic tradition, which richly recognizes the warmth of the divine-human relationship. I.C.

ITURAEA. A geographical region in present-day Lebanon, north of the land of Israel. It is uncertain whether the term comes from Jetur, a son of Ishmael (Gen. 25:15, 16; I Chr. 1:31), or the tribe named after him when it migrated to northeast Galilee from an area to the east of Jordan (I Chr. 5:19). In the early Roman period the descendants of the Itureans had extended south to Upper Galilee. Their leader, Ptolemy (85–40 B.C.), had control of a vast area of territory around Damascus, according to the geographer Strabo. He paid a tribute to the Roman general Pompey in 64 B.C. and passed on his rule to his son Lysanias (40–36 B.C.), who was murdered by Antony, who gave the lands to Cleopatra. These domains of Lysanias augmented by regions of Trachonitis and parts of Galilee passed eventually to Herod the Great. After Herod's death (in 4 B.C.) his kingdom was divided and the region of Ituraea passed to Philip his son. At this juncture Ituraea enters the NT story, according to Luke 3:1. The kingdom remained in the family of Herod in the person of Herod Agrippa I, who was confirmed as ruler of the region by the emperor Gaius (A.D. 38). On the death of Agrippa the land of Ituraea came, by annexation, into the Roman province of Syria and was controlled by procurators. R.M.

IYAR. See HEBREW CALENDAR.

IZANAGI AND IZANAMI. The primal parents in the Japanese creation myth, as recorded in the Kojiki and Nihonshoki (eighth century A.D.). Descending from the high plain of heaven on a floating bridge, they made the first land by churning the primordial ocean with a spear, then proceeded to procreate the many KAMI and islands of Japan. Izanami, the female figure, eventually died giving birth to the fire god, and went to the underworld. Izanagi pursued her there, but could not retrieve her because she had already eaten of its food. Although widely known as mythological figures, Izanagi and Izanami are worshipped in only a few SHINTO shrines. R.E.

J DOCUMENT. One (and probably the earliest) of the literary sources of the PENTATEUCH, so called because of the author's frequent use of the Hebrew personal name of God (Jahveh or Yahweh). J was probably written in or near Jerusalem in the tenth century B.C., perhaps during the reign of David or Solomon. (See also DOCUMENTARY HYPOTHESIS.)

J.D.N.

JABBOK. A river flowing through a deep gorge of the same name in a rough semicircle for fifty to sixty miles, east from the mountains near Amman, Jordan. It converges with the Jordan River twenty miles north of the Dead Sea. Its modern name is Nahr ez-Zerqa (zerqa meaning blue). Once the Israelites had defeated the Ammonite king Sihon (Num. 21:21-24), it formed the boundary between the Ammonites and Gadites (Deut. 3:16; Josh. 12:2). Jacob forded it with his family just before he wrestled with the angel (Gen. 32:22). Its name may be a play on the word for "wrestle." It is sometimes spelled "Jaboc." N.H.

JABESH-GILEAD. An Israelite town in Gilead, east of the Jordan River. Its citizens were not among the Israelites who swore at Mizpah not to give their daughters as wives to the Benjaminites, so the other Israelites killed all its inhabitants except four hundred virgins whom they gave as wives to the tribe of Benjamin (Judges 21). Here King Saul routed the Ammonites (I Sam. 11). The grateful citizens later rescued his body (I Sam. 31:11-13; I Chr. 10:11-12) and gave it a decent burial.

Eusebius says it is a town on high ground six miles from Pella in the Jabesh Valley (modern Yabis). Glueck identifies it with Tell Abu-Kharaz on the north side of Wadi Yabis, two miles inside the Jordanian border, nine miles from Bethshan.

N.H.

JABNEEL ("God [El] causes to be built"). A city near Mt. Baalah, close to the Mediterranean Sea, thirteen miles south of Joppa (Josh. 15:11). It is probably the same as Jabneh, a Philistine city captured by Uzziah (II Chr. 26:6). In the Greco-Roman period it was called Jamnia (see I Macc. 4:15, 5:58; and Josephus). Here, after the fall of Jerusalem in A.D. 70, the Sanhedrin reconvened. While they discussed whether or not certain books were acceptable, there is little historical evidence that a specific council about A.D. 100 established definitive parameters to the Jewish canon. Today the village is called Yebna. The name is also applied to a town in Naphtali (Josh. 19:33), to be identified with the modern Khirbet Yamma.

N.H.

JACHIN AND BOAZ. Twin bronze ornamental pillars that stood at the entrance to Solomon's temple (I Kings 7:21; II Chr. 3:15-17). When Jerusalem was destroyed in 587 B.C., they were broken up and their metal was taken to Babylon (II Kings 25:13).

Cast by Hiram of Tyre, they were hollow cylinders about one meter in diameter, topped with solid capitals for a total height of about twelve meters. The spherical bowl or knob at the top was decorated with "lily work" or four open, downward "petals," and with chains adorned with pomegranates. Similar columns have been found in tenth-century Palestinian shrine models and in an eighth-century B.C. ruin.

The names may have commemorated David's ancestry, Boaz being a member of his paternal line (Ruth 4:21-22). Jachin was a Simeonite name (Num. 26:12), perhaps David's maternal line. Others conjecture that the names are derived from an oracle assuring the throne to the Davidic line.

N.H.

JACOB. The third of the founding fathers or patriarchs of Israel whose family saga is recorded in Genesis 12-50. The Jacob cycle begins as a grace note in the story of ISAAC and REBEKAH, his parents, with the account of the birth of Jacob and his twin brother ESAU in Genesis 25:19-34. From the very beginning of the sibling rivalry between the two sons, Jacob had the edge: Not only did his mother prefer him to his brother (25:28), but even in their youth Jacob was able to deprive Esau of his primacy ("birthright") by purchasing it for some bread and lentil soup on a day when Esau was famished (25:29-34). The younger brother practiced deceit upon the older one once again when their dying father was ready to make his last will and testament. Jacob disguised his hands with hair so as to resemble Esau (who was "a hairy man," Gen. 27:11) and claimed the blessing that Isaac intended for the other. Even though the deceit was soon revealed, the last blessing could not be reversed, and the name Jacob (which the writer understands to mean "he supplants") is actualized once again: "Esau said, 'Is he not rightly named Jacob? For he has supplanted me these two times. He took away my birthright; and behold, now he has taken away my blessing'" (Gen. 27:36).

Duplicity and sharp dealing continue to characterize the life of Jacob, whose story dominates Genesis 28-35. Yet it is through exactly such a very human and ambiguous figure that Yahweh's promise to the grandfather Abraham is carried out. Just as that promise was threatened in the case of Abraham and Sarah by barrenness and in the case of Isaac by the possibility that the young lad might be sacrificed (Gen. 22), so also in the case of Jacob the promise is threatened. The dangers are of his own making, and it is his own kindred who are outraged at his deceit and seek revenge (for example, Laban in Gen. 31). But alongside these unattractive qualities in Jacob are also displayed a willingness to follow the divine call (the story of the vision of the ladder in Bethel, Gen. 28), persistence in winning the hand of Rachel, the daughter of Rebekah's brother Laban (Gen. 29), and courage in wrestling with the "man" beside the river Jabbok in order that he obtain divine blessing (Gen. 32:22-32). When that blessing is given, God also changes Jacob's name to Israel, "he who strives with God."

Jacob/Israel was the father of the twelve tribes that bear his name. The story of Jacob's several marriages and other sexual relationships explain how this came about. From the very beginning Jacob loved RACHEL, the younger daughter of Laban, and served his future father-in-law seven years for her. At the completion of this period of indentured servitude, Laban tricked Jacob by bringing to him in the darkness of the wedding night his older daughter, the weak-eyed Leah. Though the deception was discovered in the morning (Gen. 29:25), Jacob found himself compelled to serve yet another seven years for Rachel. Leah was fertile and bore Jacob a total of six of his twelve sons. In her later years Leah gave Jacob her handmaid Zilpah, who bore him two more (Gen. 30:9-13). Rachel could only present Jacob her handmaid Bilhah, who bore Jacob yet two more sons (Gen. 30:1-8). At long last Rachel bore to Jacob his eleventh son, JOSEPH (whose name means "he adds"). In giving to Jacob his twelfth son, Benjamin, Rachel died in childbirth and was buried in a tomb on the way to Bethlehem, "which is there to this day" (Gen. 35:20). Leah also bore to Jacob a daughter, Dinah, who was seduced by Shechem, the son of the prince of the land, Hamor. Shechem also fell in love with the girl and proposed a formal marriage agreement to the brothers of Dinah. They were offended by this proposal, but through deceit appeared to agree to it on the condition that these native dwellers of the land of Canaan be circumcised and thus made part of Israel. When this was accomplished on the third day, "when they were sore" (34:25), Simeon and Levi, Dinah's brothers, killed all the males in the city of Shechem and plundered their possessions.

Jacob is particularly associated with BETHEL. He is presented as founding this cult center by erecting there a pillar in response to his dream of angels ascending and descending and by naming it Bethel, "the house of God" (Gen. 28:10-22). He is also commanded to return there near the end of his life (Gen. 35). According to that account, at that time those who followed Jacob put away all the amulets and likenesses of foreign gods and affiliated themselves exclusively with the God of Israel, Yahweh. Many scholars now believe that the Jacob cycle was preserved and repeated at Bethel and that it legitimated the sanctuary at that place. Jacob became linked in a familial way with Isaac before him and Joseph and the eleven brothers after him only when a unified Israelite tradition emerged out of the stories that individual tribes contributed to the whole nation as that nation coalesced during the period of the judges.

The Jacob cycle really ends with the account of the death and burial of Isaac in Genesis 35:29. Following the Priestly genealogies in chapter 36, attention turns to the proudest of Jacob's sons, Joseph. At the end of his life, however, Jacob returns briefly to the center of the stage (Gen. 48-49). In Egypt with his family now, the dying Jacob settles questions of status and announces the destiny of each of the twelve sons (tribes), which were his issue. After this blessing, he asks that he be buried with his grandparents Abraham and Sarah, his parents Isaac and Rebekah, and his first wife Leah in the cave of Machpelah near Mamre (Hebron; Gen. 49:28-33). Genesis 50:1-14 records the elaborate funeral ceremonies: forty days of embalming and seventy days of mourning followed by a ceremonial procession back to Canaan, which had been personally authorized by Pharaoh.

W.S.T.

JACOBITE CHURCH. The old Syrian church born in reaction to the Council of Chalcedon's declaration that Christ is One Person, truly divine and truly human in nature. Large factions of Syrian and Egyptian Monophysites who exalted Christ's divine nature threatened the Roman Empire's unity. When Emperor Zeno in 482 issued his Henotikon to reconcile the various factions, Pope Felix III anathematized him for presuming that the state could settle religious questions. Jacob Baradaeus organized the Jacobite Monophysites in the sixth century. During the Muslim conquests in the mid-seventh century, the Jacobites suffered great losses but have survived into the twentieth century.

C.M.

JACOB'S WELL. About half a mile east of Tell Balatah, near Sychar, on the south edge of the plain at the foot of Mt. Gerizim. Here Jesus met the Samaritan woman (John 4:5-42). There is no evidence that Jacob actually dug the well, but he did purchase the land (Gen. 33:19; Josh. 24:32). The well is now in an underground crypt that was part of a crusader church destroyed in the twelfth century. On the surface stands an unfinished Greek Orthodox church.

N.H.

JAHANNAM. In Islam the place where the wicked are punished after death. The Arabic word is derived from the Greek gebenna, the place of punishment mentioned in the NT (Matt. 5:22, 29-30, etc.).

According to the Qur'an, it is like a huge pit, a place of fire and intense heat, into which the wicked are thrown. It has seven gates through which those who are condemned enter to suffer there. An angel named Malik is the keeper of jahannam. Passages in the Qur'an indicate that punishment in jahannam is eternal.

K.C.

JAHWEH. See YAHWEH.

JAINISM. A religious minority in India numbering some four million in the 1980s. Emphasizing asceticism and harmlessness, Jainism is a spiritual tradition which, all in all, has remained remarkably unchanged over twenty-five centuries.

History. Jainism began as a movement with the teaching of Vardhamana Jnatrputra (sixth century B.C.), called MAHAVIRA, "the great hero." Jains view him as the last in a series of twenty-four great teachers or Tirthankaras ("bridge-builders"); next to the last was the quasi-historical Parsva (around 850 B.C.), but the earlier names on the list are legendary. Mahavira, a contemporary of the BUDDHA, shared with him a milieu conducive to the founding of new religions. It was a time of spiritual ferment, philosophical questing, and ascetic experimentation. Mahavira taught a path of rigorous self-denial designed to liberate the spirit from the flesh. He often wore nothing, fasted for long periods, and lived the life of a wandering mendicant.

Mahavira attracted many disciples, both monastic and lay, and the movement continued after his death. Like BUDDHISM, it was patronized by the Mauryan dynasty (321-185 B.C.). Around the first century A.D., the monks were divided into two orders, chiefly on the issues of nudity and admission of women. The more rigorous order, the Digambaras, asserted that monks should be free of clothing, that women cannot enter orders and, in fact, cannot attain liberation until reborn as males. The Svetambara order, conversely, is clothed, admits women to an order of nuns, and makes no spiritual distinction between the sexes. These two divisions, with their respective lay followers, have persisted to the present. Despite their asceticism, Jains have maintained a long tradition of learning. Jain monks have been among India's most influential grammarians, philosophers, and men of letters.

Doctrine. Jains believe that the universe is infinite and eternal, though passing through immense cycles. Within it an infinite number of jivas, or souls, are trapped in material bodies and held in bondage by KARMA. In Jainism, Karma is a subtle kind of matter engendered by action, especially action based on attachment, including mental agitation. The way to liberation of the jiva lies in reducing negative activity and doing mortifications, which counter attachment and wear down karma. This results in the great asceticism of monastic Jainism, which can even culminate, in rare cases, in self-starvation. At the time of liberation, or kaivalya, the jiva is separated from matter, attains perfect knowledge and bliss, and moves to the top of the universe.

According to Jainism, souls are in everything, even the stones and air particles most others would consider inanimate matter. Sensitive to the suffering of all entrapped beings, the ethics of Jainism emphasize ahimsa, or harmlessness. Jains accept and pray to a number of gods, mostly borrowed from Hinduism, but see them as subordinate to the Tirthankaras and Siddhas who are liberated souls.

Practices. Jainism puts more emphasis on asceticism than meditation to liberate the jiva, and together with stilling the mind through concentration, monks daily vow and undertake acts of mortification, such as fasts or exposure. Laypeople are supposed to live as closely as possible to the ideal of the monk. They are strict vegetarians and may undertake fasts or other ascetic practices for periods of time. PUJA, or worship through prayer, hymns, washing of images, and simple offerings is also presented to images of Tirthankaras or deities at home altars and in the clean, richly ornamented Jain temples. Jainism has several annual festivals, and pilgrimage to major sacred sites is popular.

Sociology. While the Jain world is clearly divided into monks and laity, the two are closely interlinked. Rather than living in cloisters, the monks frequently travel from one Jain community to another, teaching. But rites such as weddings are usually performed by Hindu clerks and officials, since the monks do not undertake priestly functions. The Jain community in India is generally prosperous and close-knit. Its charities, especially humanitarian work on behalf of animals, are famous. The Jain concept of ahimsa—harmlessness to all beings—was an important influence on the thought of MOHANDAS K. GANDHI, and also indirectly on such Western advocates of nonviolence as Martin Luther King, Jr.

R.E.

JAIRUS. A ruler of a synagogue whose daughter Jesus healed (Mark 5:21-43; Luke 8:41-56; compare Matt. 9:18-26). Jairus may be derived from the Hebrew name meaning "Yahweh enlightens."

N.H.

JAMES I (1566-1625). King of England as James I (1603-25) and King of Scotland as James VI (1567-1625). Son of Mary, Queen of Scots, and Henry Stuart (Lord Darnley), James became king of Scotland on his mother's abdication in 1567. JOHN KNOX preached the coronation sermon. Groups of Protestant and Catholic nobles sought to control the young James, who gradually asserted royal independence by pitting religious factions against each other and establishing a strong central government. In 1598 he published The Trew Law of Free Monarchies in which he stressed the DIVINE RIGHT of kings over all laws and Parliaments, accountable only to God. His motto, "No bishop, no king," developed from a conviction that objections to episcopacy were attacks on his right to appoint bishops.

On Queen ELIZABETH's death he became James I of England. On his way to London he rejected PURITAN demands for ridding Anglicanism of Roman vestiges in the Millenary Petition (1603). However, he authorized a new translation of Scriptures—the King James Bible of 1611. It included the Apocrypha, which Puritans eliminated from their editions by 1629. In 1610 James persuaded the Scottish church to accept episcopacy, but English Puritans in large numbers resisted. Many Separatists left England for Holland and in 1620 sailed to Plymouth, Massachusetts; they were the vanguard of thousands a few years later. James married Protestant Anne of Denmark (1589), but his treaty with France in 1624 caused many to suspect him of Roman Catholic tendencies. James was a scholar, writing especially on poetry, demonology, and politics. C.M.

JAMES, APOSTLE. The Greek name translated as James is Iakobos, from the Hebrew JACOB, the father of the twelve sons of ISRAEL. All our information about the apostle James comes from the Gospels and Acts.

James first appears (Mark 1:19) among the group from Galilee, whom Jesus is calling to be his disciples. The others first mentioned are Simon Peter and Andrew, and James' brother John. All four are fishermen, and all leave their families and means of livelihood in order to follow Jesus. According to Mark 1:16-20 and Luke 5:10, the four had a partnership in the fishing business. Here and elsewhere in the Gospels, James and John are designated as "sons of Zebedee." This may imply that their father was also a well-known figure in the early church. The departing brothers leave the prospering business to their father and "the hired servants." Later (Mark 3:17) James is named among the Twelve whom Jesus chose to be with him and to be sent out with his message and with his power over the demons. James' priority over his brother is suggested by John's identification as "the brother of James."

In the course of Jesus' ministry, James—along with Peter and John—is granted special information and insight, such as witnessing the raising to life of Jairus' daughter (Mark 5:37-43); at the transfiguration of Jesus (Mark 9:2); at his predictions about the end of the age (Mark 13:3). On the other hand, they boldly ask Jesus for special places in the kingdom of God (Mark 10:35-45) and foolishly propose calling down fire from heaven on an unrepentant village (Luke 9:54). James is listed among the disciples who gather in the upper room after the Resurrection (Acts 1:12-14). He was put to death by Herod Agrippa I in A.D. 44 (Acts 12:2). H.K.

JAMES, BROTHER OF JESUS. This James (in Hebrew, Jacob) is to be distinguished from other NT figures who bear this familiar name: JAMES THE APOSTLE, James the Younger (Mark 15:40), and the father of Judas (Luke 6:16; Acts 1:13). Our information about Jesus' brother James derives from four sources: the Gospels, the letters of Paul, Acts, and from Josephus, the Jewish historian. Each portrays James in a different light.

James is first identified in the Gospels as Jesus' brother in Mark 6:3 (also in Matt. 13:55). The incident is the rejection of Jesus as an offensive person by his fellow townspeople of Nazareth. His humble family, with a carpenter at its head, and several sisters and brothers included in it, are well-known to them.

But the local people are not prepared to accept the words and works of Jesus. Luke omits this passage in his story of Jesus' rejection at Nazareth, possibly to safeguard the reputation of James, who was to figure so importantly in Luke's later account of James as leader of the Jerusalem church.

The mother, sisters, and brothers of Jesus—presumably including James—appear in the story of the coming of his family (mistakenly translated as "friends" in KJV, Mark 3:21) to take him away because they think he is crazy. The story shifts to the discussion of Jesus' exorcisms (Mark 3:22-30), but he asserts that he has a new definition of family: those who do the will of God (3:31-35). Evidence of a misunderstanding with his brothers appears in John 7:3-8, where we read that they try to persuade him to go and perform miracles in Jerusalem in order to increase the circle of his followers. He is going to Jerusalem, but not for that kind of display.

Paul (I Cor. 9:5) contrasts his own bachelorhood, his refusal to accept support from others, and his insistence on working for a living with the life-style of "the other apostles and the brothers of the Lord and Cephas [Peter]." In I Corinthians 15:3-8, where Paul is listing the appearances of the risen Christ to his followers, he includes James among the apostles, but differentiates him from "the twelve." Presumably these were those who followed Jesus from the beginning of his ministry, while James became a follower somewhat later, though before Paul. James and Paul were numbered among the apostles, however. Indeed, James had moved into the prime position among the apostles based in Jerusalem since Paul felt it necessary to consult with him about requirements for Gentile admission to the church. In Acts, that leadership role is heightened. Peter's escape from prison is reported to James (Acts 12:17). Paul reports to him on the occasion of both visits to Jerusalem (Acts 15:13-19; 21:17-18), and agrees to accept his formulation of the requirements for accepting Gentiles in the church (15:28-29; 21:25).

H.K.

JAMES, LETTER OF. One of the NT general Epistles. Only the opening lines of this "letter" are written in the style one would expect in an actual letter from around A.D. 100. The rest of the writing consists of a string of ethical exhortations in the style of a philosophical diatribe of the period. The diatribe was a philosophical tract, written to challenge and provoke the reader to moral responsibility. By means of vivid illustration, based on everyday life, the author scoffs at those who take pride in their moral achievements. The specifics of some of James's illustrations would be appropriate for people with some knowledge of the Jewish Bible, since Job, Abraham, Elijah, and Rahab are set forth as examples. Jesus is mentioned by name only in the opening greeting (1:1) and in 2:1. He is referred to as "the Lord" in 5:7-8, where his coming at the end of the age is predicted, and in 5:10, 14, 15, where the power of his name is mentioned. Unmentioned are the cross, Resurrection, or the redemptive role of Jesus.

Origins of the Letter. Some scholars have suggested that the book is basically a Jewish document, with a few Christian additions. But its moral appeals show clear kinship with the SERMON ON THE MOUNT at several points: compare 1:22 with Matthew 7:24; 4:12 with Matthew 7:1, for example. These similarities suggest the writer is drawing on a common Jesus tradition. The references to the coming of the Lord confirm that conclusion.

The clearest evidence that the book comes from a Christian group is the direct attack in 2:14-26 on Paul's teaching of justification by faith (Rom. 3:28). One can argue that James has misunderstood Paul, but that Paul's doctrine is the target of James is unmistakable. James understands Paul to be promoting moral irresponsibility, which a careful reading of Romans and Galatians shows not to be the case. See, for example, Romans 3:31, where Paul claims to "uphold the law."

Authorship. Which of the persons named James in the NT is responsible for this book? Although the writer apparently wants to present himself as the brother of Jesus, who came from Galilee to head the Jerusalem church, his excellent Greek style makes this most unlikely (see JAMES, BROTHER OF JESUS). His extensive vocabulary, including technical, philosophical, and even astronomical terms (1:17), seems impossible for an uneducated, Aramaic-speaking son of a village craftsman. Furthermore, the presumed audience for this book must have been relatively sophisticated and accustomed to rhetorical style that would be unfamiliar to the impoverished Christian circles of which James became the leader.

Aims. James's concept of the Law, as evident in this letter, is a mixture of Stoic natural law, Jewish morality, and Jesus tradition. At its center is the "royal law": love of neighbor (based on Lev. 19:18; quoted in 2:8). Similar blending of pagan and Christian features is evident in the image of the new birth (1:18), which resembles that theme in John 3 ("you must be born anew"), and which uses the Christian term for Word (Logos), but employs an entirely different word for birth—one that is found only here in the NT. This writing is evidently produced in a segment of the early church and is concerned chiefly with steadfastness and wisdom (1:2-5). Its members live as aliens in the world ("tribes in the Dispersion" 1:1), but have primary concern for mutual responsibility within the community (2:1-17; 4:11; 5:9).

H.K.

JAMES, PROTEVANGELIUM OF. See APOCRYPHA.

JAMES, WILLIAM (1842-1910). American philosopher and psychologist. James was born in New York

Courtesy of Harvard University News Office

William James

City into a cultivated family who educated him in schools or by tutors abroad: England, France, Switzerland, Germany. At the age of eighteen he decided to study painting but soon realized that while he had aesthetic perceptions he was not vitally interested in art as a career.

He graduated from Harvard (M.D., 1869) but because of ill health did not practice. He began to teach at Harvard in the fields of anatomy and physiology in 1872, but his real interest was in the developing field of psychology. It was at Harvard that he started the first psychological laboratory in the United States. His marriage in 1878 to Alice H. Gibbins was a turning point in his physical and psychic life. Imbued with new energy, he turned to the writing of the Principles of Psychology (1890).

James affirmed that consciousness includes the whole person—psycho/physical—and that choice (free will) is part of consciousness. Habits are developed within the structure of people and not through memorization. In his book Talks to Teachers on Psychology (1899), he demolished the theory of transfer of training.

His interests turned from psychology to philosophy, where he is best known for the theory of PRAGMATISM: truth is important only as it is in coherence with life and is worthwhile insofar as it is effective for living. James was aware of the evils in society but affirmed that human effort could improve social conditions.

His famous work on religion, The Varieties of Religious Experience, given as the Gifford Lectures in 1902, places the healthy-minded and sick-souled person side by side. He affirms that each expresses a valid dimension of life. The healthy-minded may have an illusory notion of the goodness of the world, which is corrected by the sick-minded person's realization of the power of evil. The latter is made whole through the process of regeneration.

James was interested in psychical research and for two years was president of the Society for Psychical Research of which he was a member from 1884 until his death. His openness, tolerance, and appreciation of other viewpoints were unusual in his time.

I.C.

JAMNIA. See JABNEEL.

JANNA. In ISLAM the place where the righteous are rewarded after death. It is a paradise full of delights. The images of pleasure would be particularly attractive to a desert people. There will be trees and gardens yielding their fruits. Refreshing rivers flow through paradise, with places for repose and rest.

The heavenly books in which human deeds are recorded are kept there. There also is the heavenly archetype of the QUR'AN, the original of the revelations that were dictated to MUHAMMAD. Later traditions teach that the original KA'BA is in heaven, directly above the earthly Ka'ba in MECCA.

Particular interest has been aroused by the houris, perpetual virgins of great beauty, who are there for the pleasure of righteous men. According to some commentators, they are the wives of the righteous, restored to their original youth and beauty. The most important of all rewards is being in the presence of God himself and being able to behold him.

Janna is also the abode of angels, of whom Michael and Gabriel are mentioned in the Bible. Israfil, celebrated by Edgar Allan Poe in his poem of that name, has a trumpet always at his lips, ready to blow it and announce the day of judgment. K.C.

JANNES AND JAMBRES. Names of two Egyptian magicians who opposed MOSES, according to II Timothy 3:6-9 (some mss. read "Jannes and Mambres"). Although the OT does not name them, the Talmud, Targums, and various Rabbinic writings had made these names traditional and familiar. Origen knew a written work about them. By the fifth century A.D. their alleged tombs were tourist sites. N.H.

JANNEUS. Jonathan, the king of Judea from about 103 to 76 B.C., also called Alexander. According to Josephus, he was the son of John Hyrcanus and half brother of Aristobulus I, who on becoming king imprisoned him. But when Aristobulus died within a year, Janneus married his widow and became high priest. Backed by the Sadducees, he feuded with the Pharisees and massacred thousands of them. The Pharisees opposed his military attempts to increase the boundaries of Judea. His wife Salome ran the civil government during his final three-year illness, and she succeeded him. N.H.

JANSENISM. A seventeenth-century revival, primarily among French and Dutch Roman Catholics, of the ancient AUGUSTINE-PELAGIUS controversy over grace and free will. In 1640 Cornelius Jansen's Augustinus appeared posthumously. It countered Jesuit views that effective grace requires the recipient's assent and cooperation. Jansen argued that efficacious grace does not require such cooperation, and that human beings cannot alter God's predestination. The convent of Port-Royal, France, emerged as a popular symbol of the controversy when Antoine Arnold became its leader in 1643 and vigorously defended Jansenism. The Sorbonne (1649) and Pope Innocent X (1653) declared five summary propositions culled from Jansen's book heretical. Jansenists maintained the propositions were distortions, but Pope Alexander VII in 1656 ruled otherwise and demanded that Jansenists submit.

Blaise Pascal, whose sister was at Port-Royal, excoriated the Jesuits in his famous Provincial Letters (1656-57). In 1679 King Louis XIV exiled Arnold and forced Port-Royal to close. A shaky peace prevailed until Pasquier Quesnel's Moral Reflections (1692) revived the controversy. It climaxed in 1713 when Pope Clement XI's Unigenitus condemned 101 propositions drawn from Quesnel's work. Jansenism virtually died out in France but gained wide support in Holland and marked the beginning of the Old Catholic church. C.M.

JAPANESE RELIGION. Although modern industrialized Japan is a fairly secularized society, its present religious heritage is complex, ranging from practices going back to archaic agricultural society to recently born "new religions." SHINTO, the "Way of the KAMI" or gods, is the perpetuation of the ancient deities of Japan; it is practiced in innumerable shrines where offerings of food and prayer are presented. BUDDHISM, introduced into Japan in the sixth century A.D., has taken many denominational forms, of which the best known in the West is probably ZEN, and has deeply intertwined itself with Japanese culture. CONFUCIANISM, while it has seldom taken explicitly religious form in Japan, has had a pervasive influence as an articulation of moral values. "New religions" founded in the nineteenth and twentieth centuries have helped many Japanese interpret spiritually the crises associated with modernization by, typically, combining teachings about the dawn of a new age with such familiar themes as Shintoistic worship, reincarnation, and Confucian morality.

Amid its diversity, Japanese religion enjoys several common themes that partly explain how Japanese live comfortably with the diversity and partly unify the culture spiritually despite it. Some common attitudes are these.

Relativism and Pluralism. Supported by much of Buddhist philosophy and the particularism of Shinto, as well as the tendency of Japanese language and manners to be highly "situational," Japanese tend to look at actual religious perspectives and practices as offering only partial truth. Appropriate as each may be to a particular need, it can be supplemented by others. Most Japanese have a relation to more than one spiritual tradition.

Traditionalism. Japanese religion tends to be very conservative in organization, ritual, and links to families and communities. Thus, in a rapidly changing society, it provides an access to stability and "roots."

Charismatic Leadership. Traditionalism is countered, however, by another trait: the tendency of Japanese religion to produce dynamic, charismatic leaders. This tradition goes back to ancient shamanism, which was most often feminine, and has engendered a succession of god-possessed or enlightened men and women, from medieval Buddhists like Kobo Daishi or Shinran, down to founders of modern "new religions," who have drawn enthusiastic disciples and started mass spiritual movements.

Practice and Experience. A final general characteristic of Japanese religion is an orientation toward practice, experience, and sociology rather than ideology. Propositional belief, for most Japanese, is less significant than what religion communicates wordlessly through its practices and sociological role.

Japan has been called a living laboratory of religion. Certainly its rich blend of old and new, in which the old never seems to quite disappear while new religions keep spawning, presents a remarkable panorama. The wide religious pluralism, however, is in large part a result of the fact that the real center of values lies elsewhere, in Confucian morality and the family relationships it exalts. (See map on following page.) R.E.

JAPHETH. The son of NOAH usually named last (Gen. 5:32; 6:10; 7:13; 9:18; etc.), though his descendants are listed first in Genesis 10 and I Chronicles 1:5-7. He, along with Shem, covered their father's nakedness (Gen. 9:20-23). Noah prayed that God might enlarge him and that Canaan might be his slave (Gen. 9:27). His descendants are associated with regions north and west of the Mediterranean, especially Anatolia and the Aegean. N.H.

JAPJI. In SIKHISM, a prayer composed by the religion's founder, Guru NANAK, which is believed to sum up the essence of Sikh teaching and which also comprises the opening passage of the Sikh scripture, the Adi Granth. The prayer is recited daily by the

Japanese Religions

- Mountain
- Other places of religious importance
- ○ Places of importance in Shinto
- ● Places of importance in Buddhism
- ● Places of importance in both religions
- ★ Headquarters of "New Religion"

Reprinted with permission of Macmillan Publishing Company, from Historical Atlas of the Religions of the World, edited by Isma'il Ragi al Faruqi and David E. Sopher. Copyright © 1974 by Macmillan Publishing Company faithful as their morning devotion. Its first lines, called the Mul Mantra, are the most important of all. According to Sikh tradition, they were first recited by Nanak when, in his thirtieth year, he was called by God to his work of religious reconstruction. He then sang:

There is one God
 He is the Supreme Truth
 He, the Creator, is without fear and without hate . . .
 He, the Omnipotent,
 Pervades the Universe.
 He is not born,
 Nor does He die to be born again.
 By His Grace shalt thou worship.

The remaining thirty-four stanzas emphasize that God is unapproachable except through a good life and with the help of divine grace, and they praise both God's greatness and the joy of God's faithful worshippers.

R.E.

JASHOBEAM. David's leading warrior, whose real name may have been Ishbosheth or Eshbaal, "man of Baal." According to II Samuel 23:8, he slew eight hundred people at one time, though the number three hundred in I Chronicles 11:11 is considered more likely. A Hachmonite or Tachemonite, he was chief of the three captains.

N.H.

JASON. A Greek name adopted by many as the equivalent of the Hebrew name JOSHUA and preferred by some Greek-speaking Jews to the more identifiably Jewish name Jesus. (1) The name of Paul's host in Thessalonica (Acts 17:5-9). He was probably a Jew and a Christian. (2) A Christian at Corinth (Rom. 16:21) described as "kin," probably a fellow Jew. Could be the same person as (1) if Sosipatros is the same as Sopater of Acts 20:4. (3) The name of the leader of the Greek Argonauts.

N.H.

JASPERS, KARL (1883-1969). One of the great philosophers of the twentieth century, born in Oldenberg, Germany. He studied medicine at Heidelberg, Berlin, and Göttingen. After receiving his degree, he carried out volunteer research at the Heidelberg Psychiatric Clinic in order that he might work without restraints imposed by a paid position. In this role he brought phenomenological methods into the field of clinical psychiatry; heretofore observations had been less systematic. In 1911 he published a basic book, General Psychopathology (Eng. trans. 1965).

Jaspers joined the faculty of philosophy (which included psychology) at Heidelberg in 1913 and soon became interested in philosophical issues. For purposes of comparison, he defined science as the knowledge of facts and philosophy as a subjective interpretation of being. Philosophy illuminates human existence.

This viewpoint was developed in Philosophy, 1932 (Eng. trans. 1969) as EXISTENTIALISM. Jasper's thesis is that personal existence in the world is more important than the state of "being" there. People are the center of reality. They need to know their freedom to exist and to think. This is subjectivity, not philosophical objectivity. Jaspers, with MARTIN HEIDEGGER, was a founder of the philosophy of existence.

When the Nazis came to power, Jaspers remained in Germany with his wife, who was Jewish. They were saved from deportation by the arrival of American troops on April 13, 1945. For several years he dedicated himself to helping rebuild the university, intellectually and morally, but in 1948 accepted a professorship at the University of Basel. His later interests were in world philosophy and world federation.

I.C.

JATAKA. From the Sanskrit and Pali words meaning literally, "having to do with birth." In BUDDHISM, the Jataka Tales, found in several collections of varying length, are stories of the BUDDHA as a BODHISATTVA, or Buddha-to-be, in previous lifetimes. As many as 547 of these tales are found in the largest collection. They are very popular, especially in the THERAVADA Buddhist countries of southeast Asia.

In these stories, the future Buddha appears sometimes as an animal, sometimes as a human. Some stories are obvious adaptations of animal fables comparable to those of Aesop. Others show greater length and depth. But in any case, the Bodhisattva emerges as the wisest, most generous, and most courageous figure who saves a desperate situation or exemplifies great virtue, commonly displaying such distinctive Buddhist attributes as nonattachment, self-control, and compassion. These stories have done much to popularize Buddhism by putting such ideas as rebirth, and such values as the preceding, into an idiom accessible to ordinary men and women.

R.E.

JEALOUSY. The biblical usage of the word covers two contrasting ideas. On the one hand, it is a moral term used pejoratively to denote an emotion combining PRIDE and envy when one's rights are infringed or when our neighbor seems to be favorably treated at our expense. In this sense the reaction is universally condemned in both OT and NT as a sinful attitude based on human pride. So the sons of Jacob are envious of their brother Joseph on account of his dreams (Gen. 37:11; Acts 7:9). Dathan and Abiram are jealous of Moses' authority (Ps. 106:16-18; Num. 16:12-40). The book of Proverbs condemns jealousy as the antithesis of wisdom and contentment (Prov. 6:34; 27:4). The same condemnation passes over into the NT, especially in catechetical sections of the Epistles (Rom. 13:8-14; Gal. 5:20). The Corinthian church was beset by this problem (I Cor. 3:3; compare 1:12). Love is the Christian antidote to the jealous spirit (I Cor. 13:4) also evident in II Corinthians 12:20. The wisdom tradition of the OT is picked up by James (3:14; 4:5).

The other side of jealousy is seen in those places where both Hebrew and Greek use the word in the sense of "zeal." In the OT God is often called a "jealous God" (Exod. 20:5; 34:14; compare Deut. 4:24; 5:9; 6:15; Josh. 24:19; Ps. 79:5). The meaning must be that God is devoted to honor and will not compromise it by sharing worship with idols. No emotional content is assumed, and "jealousy" in this sense is part of the covenantal relationship by which God and Israel are bound together (Exod. 20:3). Failure on Israel's part to rise to their loyalty evoked God's judgment on the part of divine "jealousy" to preserve the integrity of the covenant (see Ezek. 36).

R. M.

JEALOUSY, ORDEAL OF. One special case of a use of "jealousy" as a moral term is based on Numbers 5:11-31, where, at verse 25 (RSV) the words run, "the cereal offering of jealousy." But it is likely that the Hebrew word ought to be translated "cereal offering of suspicion."

The issue at stake is the case of a woman in Israel suspected of adulterous relationships, which she seeks to hide from her husband. She is to be brought to the sanctuary and to undergo certain rites designed to prove her innocence or guilt. She is "under suspicion"; hence it is the "ordeal of suspicion." The chief rite is the taking of a mixture of water and dust, coupled with a solemn oath. If abortion or stillbirth of a child follows, she is plainly held to be guilty. If her drinking "the waters of testing" (Num. 5:24) brings no curse and has no ill effect, she is cleared. The ceremonial with a cereal offering runs parallel and is not easily disentangled from the earlier account of the water and dust concoction, which the woman has to drink. The story, evidently from the Priestly source, has one point: the author regards marital infidelity as a serious business and seeks to elicit a response, determined by a good or bad conscience.

20594

Courtesy of the Library of Congress

Jefferson's "Wall of Separation" letter, 1802

R.M.

JEBUSITES. One of six pre-Israelite ethnic groups of Canaanites living in the Palestinian hills around Jerusalem (Num. 13:29; Josh. 15:63). They were descended from the third son of Canaan (Gen. 10:15-16; I Chr. 1:13-14). Jebus was the name given to Jerusalem, the principal city of their territory (Judg. 19:10, 11; I Chr. 11:4, 5). Jebusites sometimes refers simply to the inhabitants of the city (Gen. 15:21). Unless Melchizedek as king of "Salem" was its ruler (Gen. 14:18), its earliest ruler named is Adoni-zedek (Josh. 10:1), who rallied Amorite allies to defend the city (Josh. 10:5). The Israelites burned the city (Judg. 1:8), but its former inhabitants regained it until David permanently captured it (II Sam. 5:6). The Jebusites were then absorbed into the Israelite population.

N.H.

JEFFERSON, THOMAS (1743–1826). Third president of the United States (1801–1809) and defender of religious freedom, Jefferson was born April 13, at "Old Shadwell" in Albemarle County, Virginia, to Peter and Jane Randolph Jefferson. He graduated from the College of William and Mary in 1762 and was admitted to the bar in 1767. On January 1, 1772, he married Martha Wayles Skelton, who bore him six children before her death in 1782.

In May 1769 he was elected to the Virginia house of burgesses and served until 1774. Serving in the Continental Congresses of 1775 and 1776, he drafted the Declaration of Independence. After serving as minister to France (1785–89), secretary of state (1790–93), and vice-president (1796–1800), he was elected president (1800–1808).

After 1764 he began applying historical tests to the Bible and lost faith in conventional religion, though not in conventional morality. He became a Deist. While governor of Virginia (1779–81), he proposed a bill for establishing religious freedom, which was adopted in 1785 and completed in 1799. He opposed all forms of "tyranny over the mind."

About 1803 Jefferson began selecting passages he believed to be authentically part of Jesus' message; these he published as parallel texts in four languages in The Life and Morals of Jesus of Nazareth. He loathed Calvinism and leaned toward Unitarianism. Distinctly anticlerical, he favored strict separation of church and state. Jefferson supported education and helped found the University of Virginia. He served as president of the American Philosophical Society (1797–1815) and contributed to the development of paleontology, geography, botany, and architecture. His library became the basis of the Library of Congress.

N.H.

JEHOAHAZ ("God has grasped"). (1) The king of Israel (about 815–800 B.C.), son of and successor to Jehu. His religious policies brought his people impoverishment. Thus the military invasions of Hazael and Ben-hadad of Syria, which took a heavy toll in life and property (II Kings 13:2-7), were seen as evidence of God's wrath. He reigned for seventeen years (II Kings 13:1). Deliverance came under his son Joash.

(2) The king of Judah (608 B.C.), anointed on the death of his father, Josiah (II Kings 23:30). He reigned for three months. Jeremiah calls him Shallum (Jer. 22:11-12). Perhaps his name was changed when he became king. Pharaoh Neco deposed him. He was taken to Riblah, then to Egypt, where he died (II Kings 23:33-34; II Chr. 36:4).

(3) A variant form of Ahaziah, son of Jehoram, king of Judah (II Chr. 21:17; 25:23).

(4) Ahaz's full name according to an inscription of Tiglath-pileser III.

N.H.

JEHOIACHIN. A king of Judah, whose name (meaning "Let God establish") also appears as Jeconiah, Coniah, Jechonias, or Yaukin. In 598 B.C., at the age of eighteen, he succeeded to the throne of his father, JEHOIAKIM, who had apparently been put to death and left to rot after a palace revolt by advance agents of Nebuchadnezzar.

Jehoiachin ruled only three months before the full invading army arrived, sacked the temple and the palace, and carried away all treasures. This time the Babylonians took not just hostages but the whole ruling party. Jeremiah 52:28 reports the number of captives sent to Babylon at 3,023. Second Kings 24:14 reports 10,000. Jeremiah predicted correctly that Jehoiachin would never return to his throne, nor would his offspring—he might just as well have been childless. In Babylon the royal family appears for many years to have lived under house arrest (I Chr. 3:17). A Babylonian tablet dating from 592 B.C. talks about Yaukin, the king of Judah, and his five sons, listing their rations of olive oil and grain. Under Nebuchadnezzar's son, Evil-merodach, Jehoiachin's status improved. He was now about fifty years old. From then on he was treated as a king, above other kings, and dined at Evil-merodach's table. Under these improved conditions the Jewish exiles in Babylon dreamed of a messianic return to Jerusalem, which had lain in ruins for a long time.

In his first listing of OT genealogy, Matthew skips the evil Jehoiakim, Jehoiachin's father, and makes Jehoiachin the son of Josiah, not the grandson. First Chronicles 3:17 lists seven sons of Jehoiachin. One of them, Shenazzar, was probably the first governor of Jerusalem after the return from Babylon. The second governor, Zerubbabel, was a grandson of Jehoiachin.

T.J.K.

JEHOIADA. (Meaning "God knows, God discerns"). There are five Jehoiadas in the OT, or four if one regards as a scribal error a confusion over one who is once described as the father, once as the son, of Benaiah. Of the two best-known Jehoiadas, one recruited 3,700 troops for King David at Ziklag and served as the captain of the royal bodyguard (I Chr. 12:27). As a respected advisor to the king, he is also known as "prince Jehoiada of the clan of Aaron."

The better-known Jehoiada was probably the high priest at the Temple in Jerusalem who established the boy king JOASH on the throne. After the death of Ahaziah, king of Judah, in 842 B.C., the queen mother, Athaliah, killed off Ahaziah's children and took over the throne. Jehoiada hid one princeling, Joash, and thus preserved the line of David from extinction. Seven years later he organized a coup d'etat (II Kings 11:4-20), assassinated the queen mother, and crowned young Joash. As chief priest he served a leading role in counseling the young king, in restoring services at the Temple, and in limiting the worship of Baal. Because of his high regard in court and with the people, on his death Jehoiada was buried as if he were a king, in the tombs beside the kings of Judah.

T. J. K.

Jehoiakim. The Hebrew word for "Yahweh raises up." Son and successor (after his brother Jehoahaz) of JOSIAH upon the throne of Judah. His reign lasted from about 609 to 598 B.C. The fact that Jehoiakim was initially passed over in favor of his younger brother may reflect popular suspicion that, unlike the independent-minded Josiah, Jehoiakim was disposed to strengthen Judah's ties with Egypt. It is clear that he was placed on the throne by Pharaoh Necho as an Egyptian puppet (II Kings 23:24). Close ties between Judah and Egypt continued for some time, as the story of the prophet Uriah indicates (Jer. 26:20-23).

Following an Egyptian defeat by the Babylonians in 605 B.C., Jehoiakim's allegiance was claimed by the latter nation. However, a Babylonian military setback in 601 inspired Jehoiakim to revolt, probably in expectation of Egyptian aid. King Nebuchadnezzar of Babylon did not act to suppress this insurrection until 598, but before Jerusalem fell, Jehoiakim died, leaving his eighteen-year-old son JEHOIACHIN to be carried into captivity in Babylon. Jehoiakim's policies, and the king himself, were bitterly denounced by the prophet Jeremiah. The latter's indictments of the king portray Jehoiakim as greedy and oppressive (Jer. 22:13-19), and there may have been lingering popular resentment against him throughout his reign. However, there is no evidence that Jehoiakim, as some have speculated, was murdered by nationalists or by pro-Babylonian elements within his court.

J. D. N.

Jehoshaphat. Hebrew for "Yahweh judges." Son and successor of ASA upon the throne of Judah, Jehoshaphat's reign embraced the period about 873-849 B.C. He is depicted in a favorable light by two primary OT sources: I Kings 22 and II Chronicles 17-20. Jehoshaphat was a contemporary of the powerful AHAB of Israel (northern kingdom) and sealed an alliance with the latter monarch by permitting his son to marry Ahab's daughter. This alliance brought an end to hostilities between Judah and Israel that had marred their relations since the breakup of the old Davidic Empire (about 920 B.C.). It also led to a disastrous joint military campaign against Ramoth-Gilead that resulted in Ahab's death. Relationships with Ahab's successor, AHAZIAH, were less cordial, and the proposal of a cooperative effort to establish maritime trade routes for the benefit of both nations was rejected by Jehoshaphat (I Kings 22:48 ff.).

The account of Jehoshaphat's reign in II Chronicles provides additional details not found in I Kings. The monarch's concern for the teaching of the Law by itinerant Levites resulted in spiritual renewal throughout Judah, and, Chronicles seems to imply, in peace from Judah's traditional enemies, including the Philistines (II Chr. 17:7-11). The peace doubtless also was enhanced by Jehoshaphat's extensive measures to increase Judah's fortifications and the nation's standing army (II Chr. 17:12-19). Chronicles also reports, in an extended narrative, a victory won by Jehoshaphat over an army of Moabites, Ammonites, and Meunites. This account is interesting not only for its description of military matters, but perhaps more so because of the portrait it contains of Jehoshaphat as a pious ruler. Second Chronicles 20:5-12 contains a long prayer by the king. A campaign by Jehoshaphat and Jehoram of Israel against Moab is related in II Kings 3. Jehoshaphat apparently died in peace, passing a strong and united Judah to his son Jehoram (not to be confused with the Jehoram above).

J. D. N.

Jehovah. An assumed pronunciation of the personal name of the Hebrew God YHWH. This form, which made its appearance in late medieval times was widely used from then until modern times. Jehovah is actually a composite of the consonants for one word and the vowels for another. When only consonants were written in ancient Hebrew texts, the divine name was written YHWH (or YHVH, depending on the transliteration). Later, vowels were added to texts by a series of dots and dashes written below, within, or above the consonants. By this time, the name of the deity had become so sacrosanct it was no longer pronounced in reading the text. Instead, the word ADONAI was generally read. Thus the scribes wrote the vowels for Adonai with the consonants YHVH. When the vowels of Adonai are combined with the consonants YHVH, the form "Yehovah" results. Since many languages, such as German, seldom use the letter y but use j instead, the form "Jehovah" resulted. There is no evidence that the personal name of the Israelite deity was ever pronounced Jehovah in antiquity.

J. H.

JEHOVAH'S WITNESSES. An indigenous American religious movement launched in 1872 by "Pastor" CHARLES TAZE RUSSELL (1852-1916), a Pittsburgh Congregationalist haberdasher. Russell found it difficult to accept the doctrine of everlasting punishment. He was also troubled about the reliability of Holy Scripture. He reported that the Seventh-Day Adventists restored his faith, particularly pertaining to the Bible. The ADVENTIST teaching on the imminence of Christ's Second Coming and the total annihilation of the wicked appealed to Russell. Soon his International Bible Readers Association, as the enterprise was first known, began to grow, under Russell's dynamic leadership, and he became a popular lecturer who dealt primarily with what he said the Bible taught about future events. Soon the movement was referred to as Millennial Dawn, for Russell declared that the MILLENIUM had begun and Christ would return again and usher in his kingdom in 1914. His followers were colloquially known as Russellites.

In 1879 Russell founded a publication he called Zion's Watch Tower, which is known today as The Watchtower Announcing Jehovah's Kingdom and has a multimillion copy circulation in the United States and overseas. To publish the growing number of pamphlets that have been used extensively by the group in its proselytizing efforts, the Watchtower Bible and Tract Society was founded.

Theologically, Jehovah's Witnesses are often described as Arians because they believe that Christ was the first and highest created being on the same level essentially as Michael the Archangel. When he became man, he became only man, and although at his resurrection he was exalted above the angels as a spirit being, his body remained dead, although it was removed from sight by Jehovah, the Supreme Being. Witnesses believe that Satan is the invisible ruler of the world.

The sect has continually expected Armageddon, the final battle when Christ will defeat Satan. Only 144,000 faithful Witnesses will go to heaven to rule with Christ over the earth. Their refusal to submit to government authority, including refusal to do military service, has brought Jehovah's Witnesses much persecution. They have also received adverse publicity for refusing blood transfusions for ill members of their families.

"Pastor" Russell was succeeded as president of the organization by his attorney, Judge Joseph Franklin Rutherford (1869-1942), who gave the movement its current name. Rutherford, a prolific author of books and pamphlets and a popular radio speaker, had as much influence on the growth of the work as its founder. He was succeeded by Nathan K. Knorr (1942), who was followed by the current (1983) president, Frederick W. Franz. During the Franz administration there have been reports of a huge loss in membership, which was reported to be 588,503 in 1982. One of the principal causes for these losses was the more recent prediction by leaders that the world would end in 1975. R.H.

JEHU. Probably Hebrew meaning "Yahweh is he." King of Israel (northern kingdom) from about 842 to 815 B.C. Jehu was the son of an otherwise unknown Jehoshaphat (not to be confused with the Judean king of that name) and is also remembered as the descendant of his grandfather Nimshi, also otherwise unknown (II Kings 9:2, 20).

Jehu, who was a commander in the Israelite army, came to the throne as a result of a bloody coup d'etat described in II Kings 9, the background of which was both economic and religious. Large numbers of people in the northern kingdom had become alienated from the ruling dynasty of Omri because of the royal house's close identification with the moneyed mercantile class and their frequent exploitation of the peasant farmers and because of their close identification with the worship of the Canaanite deity Baal. This conflict had grown especially sharp during the lifetime of the prophet Elijah, who often clashed with his contemporary, the Omride king of Israel, Ahab.

One aspect of this struggle is illustrated by the story of Naboth in I Kings 21. AHAB coveted the vineyard of the peasant farmer Naboth, but the king's offer to buy the land was rejected by Naboth on the grounds that it was an inheritance from his ancestors. Ahab's wife, Queen JEZEBEL, who was the daughter of the Canaanite king of Tyre, upon learning of her husband's frustration arranged to have Naboth murdered and his land seized, an arrangement that Ahab gladly accepted. ELIJAH responded to the news of the atrocity with a fierce denunciation of Ahab and a promise of the king's death. This story also highlights the connection between the Israelite royal court and Canaanite (Phoenician) maritime centers along the Mediterranean coast. The marriage of Ahab and Jezebel cemented political and economic ties between the two groups, which allowed the Israelite entrepreneurs to profit greatly from trade with Phoenicia and, through the use of Phoenician ships, with the larger world beyond. This economic activity led to the polarization of society between merchants and farmers.

The other aspect of the crisis of which Jehu's revolt was an important expression, the religious, is also to be seen in Elijah's conflict with Ahab. The worship of the Canaanite-Phoenician deity BAAL was widespread in Israel and, among other things, led to the famous contest on Mt. Carmel between Elijah and the prophets of Baal (I Kings 18). As a result of Elijah's slaughter of the latter, he was persecuted by Ahab and forced to flee to Mt. Horeb (the term current in the northern kingdom for Mt. Sinai). There, in a theophany, Elijah was directed by God to intervene in the political affairs of both Syria and Israel, in the latter instance by anointing Jehu king (I Kings 19:16). However, it remained for Elijah's disciple and successor, ELISHA, to carry out the divine command.

Photo by H. T. Frank

The Black Obelisk of Shalmaneser III, showing King Jehu of Israel prostrating himself before the Assyrian king and bringing tribute

At some time subsequent to the death of King Ahab, Elisha arranged the anointing of Jehu as king, an act that inaugurated a bloody revolt against Ahab's son and successor, Joram (II Kings 9). Not only was Joram killed, along with the members of his family (including the Queen Mother, Jezebel), but Judean King Ahaziah, who was visiting in the north at the time, was also assassinated. In addition, there was a widespread slaughter of Baal worshipers and destruction of shrines where Baal was worshiped. Jehu's reference to the memory of Naboth (II Kings 9:26) reveals the spirit in which these bloody purges were carried out.

Jehu's revolt was effective, but it left the northern kingdom politically and militarily isolated. Thus, there was little to prevent the subjugation of Jehu's kingdom by the mighty Assyrian army of Shalmaneser III (about 840 B.C.), and the duration of Jehu's reign seems to have been carried out in the capacity of an Assyrian vassal. He is portrayed on an Assyrian victory monument, the so-called Black Obelisk of Shalmaneser, groveling before the Assyrian monarch, the only contemporary artistic representation of a personality from the Bible known to exist. Jehu is denounced by the authors of the books of Kings because "he did not turn from the sins of Jeroboam, which he made Israel to sin" (II Kings 10:31). Jehu's violence is also vigorously condemned a century later by the prophet Hosea (Hosea 1:4-5). J.D.N.

JEPHTHAH. Transjordanian warrior who rescued Gilead from Ammonite oppression, sacrificed his daughter to fulfill a needless vow, and defeated troublesome Ephraimites.

Jephthah's Origins. Born of a harlot, Jephthah suffered banishment from his home and denial of any share in his father's inheritance. He lived as a fugitive near Tob, a site thought to be about forty miles east of the Jordan on Ammon's northern border. There Jephthah became the leader of an outlaw gang and subsequently was visited by the elders of Gilead, who had earlier condoned his eviction (Judg. 11:7). Through a canny bargain, Jephthah moved swiftly from bandit to ruler status.

Ammon's Challenge. Westward pressure from the Ammonites in possibly the early eleventh century B.C. produced crisis conditions in Gilead. Discerning divinely empowered leadership in Jephthah, the elders pleaded with him to return home as "head over all the inhabitants of Gilead" (Judg. 11:8). Jephthah agreed. Through messengers Jephthah spoke at length with the Ammonite king. This passage (11:12-28) constitutes a perplexing interpolation whose main body (11:16-26) reviews former Israelite relations with Moab, not Ammon. Perhaps it dates to the seventh century B.C., when Ammon was absorbing Moabite territory. Thus Judges 11:24 mentions Chemosh, Moab's national deity, rather than Milcom, his Ammonite counterpart. When the conversation between leaders proved unproductive, warfare erupted. Visited by Yahweh's Spirit (11:29), Jephthah led his men in a decisive triumph over the Ammonites, who bothered Israel no more until Saul's lifetime (I Sam. 11).

Jephthah's Daughter. Jephthah doubted the sufficiency of Yahweh's abiding Spirit. Preferring manipulation by oath, he rashly bargained that if Yahweh would ensure his victory, he would, on his return, offer as a human holocaust whoever came out of his house to meet him (Judg. 11:30-31). His only child, a nameless daughter, greeted him in the manner that the Israelite women later received their triumphant warriors, Saul and David (I Sam. 18:6-7). Jephthah's intense grief was outdistanced by his daughter's self-denial. Holding her father to his vow, she merely asked permission to leave with her companions for a two-month vigil of lamentation over her virginity (Judg. 11:37). While her death was tragically premature, she was annually remembered in a four-day lamentation ceremony (11:39-40).

Jephthah and Ephraim. Quarrelsome Ephraimites falsely protested that Jephthah had slighted them in the call to arms for the Ammonite campaign (Judg. 12:1-3). Not at all a diplomat like Gideon (8:2-3), Jephthah waged war against them. Though the number of slain Ephraimites (42,000) is surely exaggerated, this episode attests to dialectical variations among the Israelites. Ephraimite fugitives were detected by their inability to pronounce the "sh" sound in "Shibboleth" (12:5-6). Jephthah remained Gilead's leader until his death six years later.

J.K.K.

JEREMIAH, BOOK OF. The second book in the order of the so-called Major Prophets of most English-language Bibles, the book of Jeremiah occupies a similar place in the Latter Prophets of the Hebrew Bible (Isaiah, Jeremiah, Ezekiel, The Book of the Twelve). Modern literary scholarship has demonstrated that the final form of Jeremiah is the result of a long and complex history of which the details are only imperfectly understood. Even the casual reader will sense anomalies in the structure of the book as, for example, in the fact that the prophet's important "Temple Sermon" of about 609 B.C. is reported twice (Jer. 7 and 26) and in very different fashions. There is no doubt that the book contains genuine words of the PROPHET and accurate records of his deeds, but it is also beyond question that a number of editorial hands have been at work on this material. The task of distinguishing the words of the prophet from the reflection of later editors is often quite difficult. At the same time, however, it should be noted that the book of Jeremiah is the most autobiographical of the prophetic books in the sense that the inner struggles of the prophet are verbalized in passages of great pathos (see the Confessions of Jeremiah below).

The literary material in Jeremiah contains both prose and poetry. Much of the prose is biographical narrative, but there are also sermons (7:1-8:3), visions (24:1-10), and a letter (29:4-28). The poetry is largely in the nature of prophetic oracle, although within this broad category are many different types of material reflecting a wide variety of moods: pleading (3:11-14), lament (4:13-22), introspection (11:18-20), judgment (46:3-12), and others.

The structure of the book is as follows:

1. Visions and oracles, perhaps from Jeremiah's early ministry (627-622 B.C.): chapters 1-6.
2. Other declarations reflecting primarily the years 605 B.C. and after: chapters 7-25.
3. The Memoirs of Baruch: chapters 26-29.
4. Further oracles and biographical references: chapters 30-45.
5. Oracles directed against foreign nations: chapters 46-51.
6. A historical appendix: chapter 52.

While it is not possible to establish with absolute certainty that the material in the first sections (chaps. 1-6) is limited to the early years of Jeremiah's active life, there is much to suggest that this may be the case. The account of the prophet's call (1:4-10), the influence of an older generation of prophets, and the lack of precision in identifying the "foe from the north" (1:14; 4:5-8; 5:15-17 [compare the prophet's later identification of Nebuchadnezzar of Babylon, 32:28]), suggest the activity of the years before the reforms of King JOSIAH in 622 B.C. (II Kings 22-25). The material in this section contains an emphasis on the sin of the people of God, often described in terms of idolatry (2:20-25) and an absence of justice and truth (5:1-3), and upon the judgment that God will send, if there is no repentance (6:1-8).

The second section (chaps. 7-25) is composed of sermon and oracular literature, which seems to come from a number of different moments in time, but which probably all reflect the period after the death of Josiah in 609. The passage with which this section begins, 7:1-15, is the earliest in point of time (the so-called Temple Sermon delivered in 605), but other materials are to be dated well into the reign of King Zedekiah (21:1). The reader finds here a variety of material: oracles, parables, prayers, poems, and narrative prose.

The third section (chaps. 26-29) is entirely prose and, in terms of chronology, reaches back again to the prophet's "Temple Sermon" of 605 (26:1-9), although most of the material reflects the period of ZEDEKIAH's reign (597-587 B.C.). A number of scholars have concluded that these narratives are from some person close to the prophet, probably his friend and scribe BARUCH. Primary attention is given here to the conflict between Jeremiah and the contemporary religious and political establishment.

The fourth section (chaps. 30-45) is also made up of biographical information (again, the likely source is Baruch) punctuated by summaries of Jeremiah's sermons. There is no consistent chronological pattern to this material, and references are found to both Jehoiakim and Zedekiah, as well as to the period following the second fall of Jerusalem in 587 B.C. Jeremiah's messages here reflect his growing pessimism that God's judgment can be avoided, but there are also important passages dealing with hope for the future (Jer. 31, 32).

The fifth section (chaps. 46-51) consists of oracles against foreign nations, a feature also found in other prophetic books (Isa. 13-23; Ezek. 25-32). Some of this material may come from Jeremiah, but much of it is by later hands. The historical appendix (chap. 52) is reproduced with very little change from II Kings 24:18 to 25:30.

Although they do not constitute a separate section as such, the so-called Confessions of Jeremiah deserve comment, for they constitute a distinctive element within this literature. These texts are usually identified as 10:23-24; 11:18-12:6; 15:10-21; 17:9-10, 14-18; 18:18-23; and 20:7-12. The appellation is something of a misnomer, for the prophet's confession of sin is only one of several autobiographical elements to be found here. There is also anger at God over Jeremiah's call to bear the prophetic word, sorrow over God's word of judgment to the nation, and joy over the presence of God in Jeremiah's and the nation's life. Because of the Confessions, the complex personality of the prophet is expressed with unparalleled vividness.

The history of the composition of this book has been of interest to scholars, both because of the structural complexity of the book and also because in 36:1-32 we seem to have an account of the circumstances under which the nucleus of the book was composed. Many scholars feel that the second scroll mentioned here (the first having been burned by King Jehoiakim) formed a kind of "first edition" of the book. To this first edition were later added (again, likely by Baruch) other sermons, prayers, poems, and the like composed by the prophet after the incidents recorded in chapter 36. Subsequent to this, the book came into the hands of a group of editors who were, in some fashion, associated with the editors of the Deuteronomistic History (the biblical books of Joshua-Kings). These people probably contributed to the present arrangement of the book and introduced material of their own that continued their own particular theological understanding (for example, Jer. 9:12-16). J.D.N.

JEREMIAH, LETTER OF. An anonymous composition originally composed in Hebrew, Aramaic, or Greek of which the oldest extant copies are in Greek. Inspired by Jeremiah 29:1-23, the document presents itself as a letter from the prophet to the Jews in Babylonian exile. It contains an attack upon pagan idolatry, and it has been variously dated from the late fourth to the early first centuries B.C. Modern scholarship has demonstrated that Jeremiah could not have been the document's author. J.D.N.

JEREMIAH, PROPHET. One of the most important of the OT prophets, Jeremiah was active from about 627 B.C. to sometime after 587 B.C. He lived through the turbulent years surrounding the fall of the kingdom of JUDAH, and his words and deeds provided a theological perspective to the events of this time and also provided insights of an enduring nature into the divine-human relationship. Because the book that bears his name is, in many respects, the most autobiographical of the OT prophetic books, we know a great deal about the experience and personality of Jeremiah, even if there is some disagreement among scholars concerning details.

Jeremiah was the son of a priestly family from the Benjaminite village of Anathoth, a few miles from Jerusalem (Jer. 1:1). Of his father, Hilkiyah, nothing is known, for it is beyond doubt that he was not the same Hilkiyah who served as high priest during Jeremiah's lifetime (II Kings 22:4). We cannot be sure if Jeremiah ever actively filled the priestly office himself.

Early Ministry (627-622). Jeremiah's call to the prophetic office came in 627 or 626 and the prophet's later reflection on this experience reveals his conviction that it was part of a divine plan laid before his birth. This experience occurred at about the same time as the death of the last great Assyrian emperor Ashurbanipal, an event that seems to have signaled the imminent decline of this most powerful of the Near Eastern states and the increasing independence of the Assyrian's former colonies, including Judah.

The Judean king, JOSIAH, took advantage of the new political situation by extending his nation's influence into areas of the old northern kingdom (Samaria), territories that had not been controlled by a Davidic king since the death of Solomon in about 920

B.C. (II Chr. 34:6-7). More importantly, Josiah inaugurated a program of religious reforms according to which idolatrous practices, many of which had been encouraged by his grandfather Manasseh, were suppressed. During this time the prophetic activity of Jeremiah bore close similarities to that of earlier prophets such as Amos, Hosea, and Micah, his reliance upon Hosea being especially apparent (compare Jer. 2:2 with Hos. 2:15; 9:10; 11:1-2). Idolatry, greed, and injustice are denounced, and the destruction of the nation by a "foe from the north" (1:13-15; 4:5-8) is promised, if the people do not repent.

Period of Withdrawal (622-609). Jeremiah's reaction to the reform movement led by King Josiah at the time of the finding of the "book of the law" (II Kings 22:1-23:23) is unclear. Some scholars are of the opinion that the prophet supported the reforms because its ideals were very close to Jeremiah's own. Others believe that he was less sympathetic, seeing the reforms as superficial and temporary. In any event, it is likely that Jeremiah was silent during the later years of Josiah's reign, a judgment based on the absence of oracles or sermons in the book of Jeremiah that can be dated specifically to this period.

Ministry under Jehoiakim (609-597). The death of Josiah at the hands of the Egyptians in 609 resulted in a profound theological crisis, since the principles of Josiah's reformation appeared to die with the monarch. The new king installed by the Egyptians, JEHOIAKIM, was a son of Josiah, but the circumstances of his enthronement make it clear that he was little more than an Egyptian vassal (II Kings 23:31-35). Typical of Jeremiah's response to the changed religious and political fortunes of the nation is his so-called Temple Sermon, preached at or near the time of Jehoiakim's coronation (Jer. 7:1-15; 26:1-19). The prophet denounces a series of personal and corporate sins and warns of the destruction of the nation, if the people do not repent. In a violent reaction to this sermon, the people threaten the prophet with death, and Jeremiah is saved only by the timely intervention of a group of officials at Jehoiakim's court (Jer. 26:16-19).

In 605, four years into Jehoiakim's reign, Judah's Egyptian masters are soundly defeated by the Babylonian army under Nebuchadnezzar at Carchemish, and Jehoiakim is forced to acknowledge a new overlord. In the meantime, Jeremiah has continued to denounce the people, and especially the king, for their sins, a confrontation that places the prophet's well-being in ever greater jeopardy. When he is banned from the grounds of the Temple and the royal palace, Jeremiah dictates a message to his scribe Baruch, who carries the scroll to the Temple where he reads it aloud (Jer. 36). Royal officials, alarmed at this denunciation of the king and people, force Baruch into the presence of Jehoiakim. There, as the scroll is read, the king cuts it up bit by bit and feeds it to a fire burning nearby.

Undaunted, Jeremiah simply dictates another message, which Baruch places on a new scroll, a document that may have formed the nucleus of our present book of Jeremiah. It is clear that by this time Jeremiah, who in the days of Josiah had spoken of a "foe from the north," identifies Babylon as the agent of God's judgment, a declaration that only increases the hostility of Jehoiakim (Jer. 36:27-31). It may have been about this time that many of Jeremiah's so-called Confessions were written. These are not confessions in a literal sense, but are passages in which the prophet opens his soul to the reader, displaying both his joy over the presence of God in his life and his anguish that God has called him to bear such pain and speak such terrible words (Jer. 10:23-24; 11:18-12:6; 15:10-21; 17:9-18; 18:18-23; 20:7-12). When Jehoiakim revolts in 597 and the Babylonian army enters Jerusalem a few months later, Jeremiah's promises achieve a fruitful realization.

Ministry Under Zedekiah and Beyond (597-587). The new king whom the Babylonians placed on the throne is a brother of Josiah. Jehoiakim is now dead, but other members of the royal family and many of Jerusalem's leading citizens are exiles in Babylon. In order to dispel any false sense of security on the part of the new administration Jeremiah reports his vision of the figs (Jer. 24:1-10), the point of which is that those left in Jerusalem will meet the same fate as the Jews now in exile. Jeremiah warns ZEDEKIAH against the folly of rebellion against Babylon, and he reaffirms his view of Nebuchadnezzar as the agent of God (Jer. 27:1-11). Jeremiah also writes to the exiles in BABYLON, advising against their expectation of an early release (Jer. 29).

These and other statements earn the prophet the continuing enmity of Judah's officials, and Jeremiah is beaten and placed in the stocks (Jer. 20:1-6), while on another occasion he is cast into a dungeon to die (Jer. 38). Zedekiah's revolt against the Babylonians in 598 results in a siege of Jerusalem that was to last for a year and a half. In spite of bad relations between the prophet and the king, Zedekiah seems to have harbored a quiet respect for Jeremiah and, on at least one occasion, has the prophet secretly brought to him from his prison cell in order that he may benefit from the prophet's sense of God's will. In a dramatic confrontation, Jeremiah reveals his own faithfulness to his vision of God's future for Judah, and he reveals his own sufferings as well (Jer. 37:16-21). When Jerusalem falls, the Babylonians torture Zedekiah and carry him to Babylon, placing a governor over the country, while Jeremiah is released from prison (Jer. 39). Shortly thereafter, the governor is murdered by a group of Jewish zealots who take Jeremiah hostage and flee to Egypt for safety. Jeremiah's last recorded words are a denunciation of the sin of his captors (Jer. 44).

An evaluation of the life and work of Jeremiah will recognize the fact that, although his prophetic message was often gloomy, thus earning him the later reputation as the "weeping prophet," Jeremiah also held out hope for a new and brighter day for the people of God (Jer. 31, 32). When the tragedy that he foresaw and feared finally took place, Jews of his and succeeding generations were able to see a divine logic in their suffering and, therefore, were able to survive it. Because of Jeremiah's own suffering, brought about by his faithfulness to God, the prophet is frequently identified as the most Christlike figure in the OT. J.D.N.

JERICO. A city prominent in events related in both the OT and the NT, Jericho is located in the southern JORDAN Valley. The area has been the subject of important archaeological excavations, some of the more valuable work including that done in the 1930s by John Gatzang and in the 1950s by Kathleen Kenyon.

The earliest settlement at Jericho has been dated to about 7000 B.C. It was located at modern Tell es-Sultan, where an abundant spring still flows and provides water for the region. This astonishingly early date for Neolithic Jericho (which has been confirmed by, among other things, Carbon 14 tests) means that it was one of the first settlements in the region and a thriving center for the development of early civilization. Architectural remains of a variety of types have been discovered, including houses and a fortified stone tower. The artistic skills of the inhabitants of neolithic Jericho are reflected in pottery, decorated bricks, and, curiously, human skulls covered with plaster in which facial features were sometimes reproduced.

During the Early and Middle Bronze Age (about 3000–1500 B.C.) Jericho became a thriving center, but its size and importance seem to have weakened considerably by the Late Bronze (1500–1200 B.C.) and Early Iron (1200–1000 B.C.) Ages. This has presented biblical historians with a complex problem because the Late Bronze Age is generally considered to be the time of the Israelite conquest under JOSHUA. The story of the Hebrews marching around Jericho, blowing their rams' horns, and of the subsequent collapse of the city walls (Josh. 6:1-21) is one of the more dramatic narratives in the Bible. This inability of scholars to reconcile the biblical account with the available archaeological data has given rise to a number of proposals, including the suggestion that the Hebrew conquest may have taken place in several stages over a considerable span of time. To further compound the problem, the archaeological evidence also suggests that the city that would have been built atop "Joshua's" Jericho is missing. Jericho was repopulated at least as early as the time of David (II Sam. 10:5) and probably earlier (the "city of palms" in Judg. 3:13 is probably a reference to Jericho). Yet no trace of this later city can be found at Tell es-Sultan. (See also II Chr. 28:8-15, which may have inspired Jesus' parable of the good Samaritan.)

The Jericho of the NT period was founded by Herod the Great, one of a number of examples of the energy of this ruler as a builder. The NT city was located at modern Talul Abu el-'Alayiq, approximately one mile south of the older city. Because of its lower elevation, Jericho experienced a warmer climate than Jerusalem, a fact that caused Herod to use the city as his winter capital. It thus enjoyed a prestige and a quality of architectural beauty that would not otherwise have been the case. Jericho was the destination of the traveler in the parable of the good Samaritan (Luke 10:30-35), an individual who presumably would have been traveling down to the city through the steep-sided Wadi Qelt, a terrain well suited for ambush. Jericho was also a stopping place for Jesus on his final journey to Jerusalem, the occasion for his remarkable conversation with Zacchaeus (Luke 19:1-10). The economic strength of NT Jericho suggests that this tax collector would have been a very wealthy person. As Jesus left the city for Jerusalem, his route would have been along the same road suggested in the parable of the good Samaritan.

With the Roman destruction of Jerusalem (A.D. 70) Jericho declined in importance. The city enjoyed new prosperity during the Byzantine (A.D. 324–640) and Umayyad (A.D. 661–750) periods. J.D.N.

JEROBOAM (I and II). Hebrew for "the people will increase" (or "may the people increase"). The name of two of the kings of Israel.

Jeroboam I (who ruled from about 922 to 901 B.C.) was a member of the tribe of Ephraim, his father being a certain Nebat and his mother Zeruah (I Kings 11:26). According to the account in I Kings, Jeroboam was the master of a corvee, a group of forced laborers, during the time of SOLOMON. Such labor seems to have been used on many of Solomon's extensive building projects, and in his position, Jeroboam would have had an opportunity to witness the cruelty inflicted upon the laborers, many of whom were probably native Hebrews. It is reported that a prophet named AHIJAH approached Jeroboam and predicted that, because of Solomon's worship of false gods, the kingdom would be divided after his death and that he, Jeroboam, would rule over the ten tribes of Israel (I Kings 11:29-39). It is not recorded what seditious acts Jeroboam then committed, if any; nevertheless "Solomon sought therefore to kill Jeroboam" (v. 40), but the Ephraimite fled to Egypt for safety.

Following Solomon's death Jeroboam was among the leaders of the northern tribes who approached the new king, Rehoboam, and asked for a more lenient treatment from the Jerusalem monarchy (I Kings 12:2-4; II Chr. 10:2-4). When the answer was returned in the negative, the northerners repudiated their allegiance to the Davidic family and chose Jeroboam as their new king. The mettle of Jeroboam was soon to be severely tested. First, there was fighting with Judah, which, quite naturally, was reluctant to see the northern tribes go their own way. First Kings 12:21-24 and II Chronicles 11:1-4 seem to suggest peaceful relations between the two Hebrew kingdoms at this time, but I Kings 15:6 and II Chronicles 12:15 are probably nearer the mark: "There was war between Rehoboam and Jeroboam all the days of his life." Also, both Hebrew kingdoms suffered the severe devastation inflicted by the invading Egyptian armies of Pharaoh Shishak about 918 B.C. The reference in I Kings 14:25 refers to an invasion of Judah only, but the northern kingdom was doubtless also subjected to the Egyptian attack. In spite of these and other, unrecorded, perils, Jeroboam and his kingdom survived.

In order further to assert the political independence of the north and to overcome the traditional importance of Jerusalem as a place of worship and seat of government, Jeroboam took measures that were to have lasting effects. He made the city of Shechem his capital (I Kings 12:25), but later he appears to have moved the seat of his government to Tirzah (I Kings 14:17), perhaps because the latter was a more defensible location. Jeroboam also established cultic centers at Bethel and at Dan, sites that perhaps had been places of Canaanite worship long before the Hebrews entered the land (I Kings 12:26-33). In each of these centers Jeroboam erected a golden calf, probably as a representation of Israel's God, Yahweh (compare Exodus 32). He also appointed a non-Levitical priesthood to preside over these centers of worship and, on occasion, he functioned in the priestly role (I Kings 33).

Jeroboam I was a strong and capable leader, yet one who was viewed as evil in the eyes of the southern writers from whose hands we have received Kings and Chronicles. The story of the denunciation of Jeroboam by the same prophet, Ahijah, who had appointed him to his task in the beginning (I Kings 14:1-16) undoubtedly reflects the viewpoint of devout individuals in the Jerusalem community. The evil deeds of Jeroboam I were often used as a standard by which the evil of subsequent Israelite rulers was measured (I Kings 15:34).

Jeroboam II (who ruled Israel from about 786 to 746 B.C.) was not related to Jeroboam I, but was a descendant of King Jehu, who had overthrown the ruling Omride dynasty in a bloody coup (II Kings 9-10). It was Jeroboam's good fortune to preside over the northern kingdom during a period of relative strength and prosperity, the last such period the nation was to experience before its collapse in 722.

What little information the OT gives us about Jeroboam II is found in II Kings 14:23-29, from which we infer that he was a vigorous monarch who expanded the borders of Israel toward the north (at the expense of the Aramean power centers of Damascus and Hamath) and toward the south as far as the Dead Sea (the "Sea of the Arabah"). This military expansion is confirmed by the book of Amos (6:13), which refers to the capture of the cities of Lo-debar and Karnaim, both to the east of the Jordan. These successes were due, in part, to the fact that both Egypt and Assyria were momentarily occupied elsewhere.

Israel's military and political power under Jeroboam II resulted in increased commerce and wealth. Yet it was not a wealth that was shared equally by all classes in society. The prophet AMOS, who was a contemporary of Jeroboam II (as was the prophet Hosea), portrays an economic polarization that produced a very wealthy class of merchants and rulers who "feel secure on the mountain of Samaria" (the capital of Jeroboam II, Amos 6:1), but who "oppress the poor" and "crush the needy" (4:1). This state of affairs undoubtedly contributed to the following judgment concerning Jeroboam II on the part of those responsible for II Kings: "And he did what was evil in the sight of the Lord; he did not depart from all the sins of Jeroboam the son of Nebat, which he made Israel to sin" (II Kings 14:24). J.D.N.

JEROME (about 340-420). Christian scholar and monk, translator of the official Roman Catholic Latin

VULGATE Bible, and promoter of scholarship and service in MONASTICISM. Born in Stridon, Dalmatia, he studied in Rome, and then traveled in Gaul, Greece, and Asia Minor. While visiting Antioch in 373, he became ill and had a vision that turned him to "God's books." He spent six years as a hermit in the Syrian desert, returned to Antioch, and was ordained a priest in 379. After studying in Constantinople under Gregory of Nazianzus, he became secretary to Pope Damasus who commissioned the Vulgate. Jerome completed the NT and Psalms by 384, the year Damasus died.

Many people in Rome sought Jerome's spiritual guidance, including rich women who turned their homes into monasteries. Among these were Saint Paula, her daughter Eustochium, and Melania the Elder. Paula followed Jerome to Bethlehem in 385, founding three convents for nuns and one for monks. Jerome presided over the latter, laboring there for thirty-five years. In Egypt and Palestine Jerome collected biblical materials that helped him in translating the OT from Greek and again from Hebrew, finally completing the Vulgate by 405. Despite controversy, Jerome's Vulgate became accepted. He also wrote commentaries and letters, and ecclesiastical defenses against PELAGIUS and others. His asceticism, interest in relics, and studies influenced monasticism and the Middle Ages.

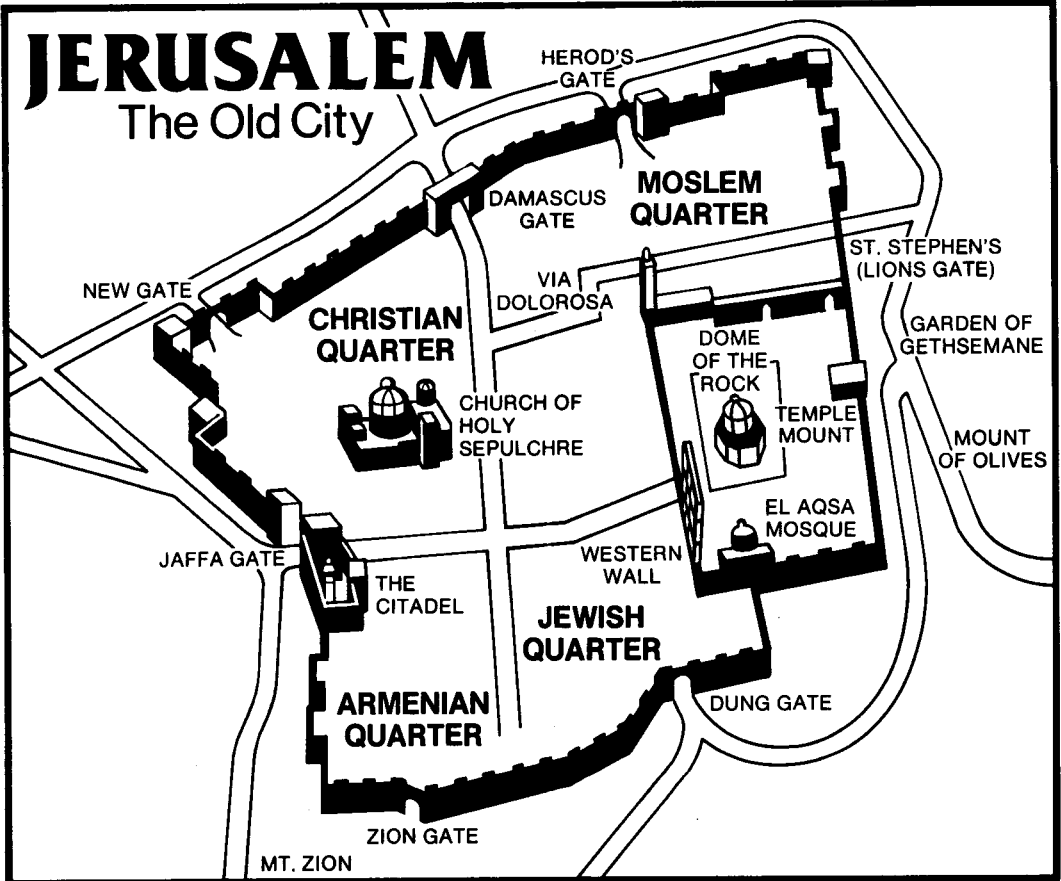

C.M.

JERUSALEM. A city of unique significance in world history, occasioned partly by its geographical locale in Israel and its central place in three major world religions—Judaism, Christianity, and Islam—all faiths that believe in one God and are related. Jerusalem stands on an elevation (Ps. 122:3-4) that slopes toward the southeast. It is thus easy to fortify and defend, since access to the city is limited, and the entrances are difficult to approach except on the north side. As a drawback there has always been a problem with Jerusalem's water supply; hence the importance of rainfall and manmade aqueducts in addition to springs inside the city area (for example, Bethesda, referred to in John 5).

History. The name "Jerusalem" antedates Israelite occupation, and it appears in Egyptian texts of the nineteenth-eighteenth centuries B.C. and the Amarna tablets. An even earlier reference is found according to the discovery of the name for "peace" (shalom or shalem, a Canaanite god) in the Ebla tablets, to be dated around 2500 B.C. (See Gen. 14:17-24 for Melchizedek, king of Salem, a name that is often linked with Jerusalem; Heb. 7:2.) There is a tradition both Jewish and Muslim that Moriah (Gen. 22:2) is the site of the future Temple.

When the Israelites came to the land of Canaan, Jerusalem was occupied by Semitic nomads called Jebusites, under their king Adoni-zedek. He was defeated by Joshua, according to Joshua 10:1-28. The city later fell to the tribe of Judah (Judg. 1:8; see also KENITES), though it appears from Judges 1:21 that the allied tribe of Benjamin occupied Jerusalem, at least in part, in association with the Jebusites.

Courtesy of the Trustees of the British Museum

DAVID became king first in Hebron, but he quickly realized the strategic importance of Jerusalem as a neutral city set midway between Hebron in the south and the northern tribal center of Shechem. He therefore launched an attack on Jerusalem and overwhelmed the occupants by surprise (II Sam. 5:6-10). He made the city his national capital as a focus of unity and gave it its distinctive title "the CITY OF DAVID"; it was also called Zion at this time, a term that seems to relate to the fortress of the city. Here David planned to erect the Temple as a counterpart to his royal palace. It was left to his son SOLOMON, however, to undertake both major building projects, with the palace becoming more extensive and costly than the Temple of Yahweh to which the Ark of the Covenant—a symbol of the divine presence—was eventually brought.

As a center of national wealth and prestige, Jerusalem was naturally open to prey. Egyptian invaders looted the area in Solomon's son's time (I Kings 14:25-28). Two large-scale invasions occurred later, the first in the reign of Hezekiah when the city resisted the siege and was spared (II Kings 18, 19). A century later, Jerusalem was twice invaded, first in 597 B.C. and then in 587-586 B.C. by the Babylonians. It was taken and sacked, with the main population either scattered or deported into exile. Nearly a century later, with the Persians becoming world masters, some Jews were permitted to return and rebuild the Temple. NEHEMIAH, in the middle of the fifth century, was the chief agent for the rebuilding of the city walls, and he set the city on a new course of civic life and eventual prosperity.

The next serious threat to Jerusalem came in 168 B.C., when the Syrian leader ANTIOCHUS IV, having been defeated in Egypt, turned aside on his homeward route to plunder the Temple and defile it. He set up a Syrian garrison, but this combined endeavor only provoked armed resistance by the Maccabean family, a revolt that led to the recapture of the city in 165 B.C. The Maccabees were given a taste of freedom, and under the later Hasmonean dynasty they strove for territorial expansion. Jerusalem became a metropolis at the center of an empire that rivaled the kingdom of David for size and importance.

The Romans came on the scene in 63 B.C., when Pompey entered the Temple area; then after a Parthian invasion in 40 B.C., HEROD the Great regained its control. He goes down in history as the one who made Jerusalem an architectural and aesthetic center, with his massive building programs and a refurbishing of the Temple. Henceforth the latter is known as Herod's Temple, exceeding the splendor of Solomon's edifice.

The Jewish War of A.D. 66-70 led to a Roman siege in Jerusalem which, in turn, was followed by the city's utter ruin by Titus, the Roman general. He left only a few towers erect, and the population was again dispersed. It regathered in the following years, only to suffer a final crushing blow in A.D. 132-35 when, at the close of another rebellion against Rome, Jerusalem was leveled and its place as a sacred shrine destroyed. An altar to Jupiter, the Roman deity, was put up on the Temple site.

The Jews were banished, and not until Constantine's reign in the fourth century A.D. were they permitted to return. The city was now a Christian venue, filled with churches and monasteries. Subsequent centuries witnessed invasions by Persian, Arab, Turkish, Crusader, and British armies, until the mandate after World War I. The creation of the State of Israel after World War II led to an Israeli longing to repossess Jerusalem, and after the Six-Day War in 1967, they eventually gained access to their most treasured locale, the western wall. The Temple area still remains under the shadow of Islam with the Dome of the Rock mosque dominating the landscape.

Significance. It is difficult to overestimate the role of Jerusalem in Hebrew narrative and poetry, Christian history and hymnody, and Muslim aspiration where it remains with Mecca and Medina a "holy city," as its Arab name implies.

In the OT Jerusalem stands for the guarantee of God's presence with the people and was often thought to be inviolate—a notion that the prophets had to oppose (Jer. 7:4-15; Mic. 3:9-12). They preached that Jerusalem needed to be a holy city (Isa. 1:21-26), filled with social righteousness and faithful religion.

Courtesy of Religious News Service

Jerusalem. At the center is the Dome of the Rock, where tradition says Abraham bound Isaac for sacrifice. The rock sheltered by the dome is in the center of Mount Moriah, upon which the Bible says the Temple of Solomon was built. The Garden of Gethsemane, with its onion-domed Russian church, is just to the left beyond the Dome of the Rock.

Jesus' attitude follows this pattern, since he revered the city and its Temple as his Father's house (Matt. 5:35) but cried against Jerusalem's follies and rejection of his message (Luke 19:41-48). His prophecy against the Temple (Mark 13) was fulfilled in A.D. 70. Yet Christian theology has seen in Jerusalem a picture of the heavenly city, a new Jerusalem, which epitomizes the reign of God and the claims of righteousness and peace (Gal. 4:25-28; Heb. 12:22; Rev. 21:1-22:5).

R.M.

JERUSALEM BIBLE (JB). This Bible is the English version (1966) of La Bible de Jerusalem, which was produced by French scholars at the Dominican Biblical School in Jerusalem. Under the general editorship of Père Roland de Vaux, this version was published first in 1961. While the Jerusalem Bible is an approved Roman Catholic version, it has been accepted widely by non-Catholics both in Britain and the United States.

R.H.

Courtesy of the Trustees of the British Museum

Bronze coin of the period of the Jewish revolt led by Simon Bar-Kokhba (A.D. 132-135)

Courtesy of the Trustees of the British Museum

Silver tetradrachma of the period of the Jewish revolt against Rome (A.D. 132-135). The portal of the Temple is shown.

JERUSALEM, SYNOD OF (1672). The ecclesiastical council of 1672 that clarified Greek Eastern Orthodox Church beliefs in an attempt to combat Cyril Lucar's accommodating tendency toward Calvinism early in the seventeenth century. Synods at Constantinople (1638) and Jassy (1643) condemned Cyril Lucar's Calvinistic tendencies, but European Calvinists continued to quote Eastern church writers in support of Calvinistic views. Jerusalem Patriarch Dositheus promoted the Jerusalem Synod, which rejected subtle false claims made by Calvinists who appealed to Greek theologians and gave a declaration of orthodox faith in eighteen decrees and four questions. It declared that predestination and foreknowledge do not exclude works, justification is by faith and works, the church and Scripture are equally infallible, God is not the cause of evil, people who fall from grace can be purified after death, and sacraments do not depend on the receiver's faith. It treated other topics and accepted the Apocrypha, images, and veneration of saints. Wide acceptance made the synod's statements virtually definitive.

C.M.

JESHUA ("Yahweh is salvation"). A later form of the name JOSHUA, used frequently by Ezra and Nehemiah. Haggai and Zechariah call some of the same people Joshua. It is also used for a place name in Judah (Neh. 11:26), which may have been the Shema of Joshua 15:26 or the Sheba of Joshua 19:2

Those bearing the name include the head of a division of priests (I Chr. 24:11); a Levite mentioned in Hezekiah's reorganization (II Chr. 31:15); a high priest (Ezra 2:2); a man of Pahath-moab who returned from the Exile with Zerubbabel (Ezra 2:6); the head of a house of priests associated with the "children of Jedaiah" (Ezra 2:36); the father of Ezer, ruler of Mizpah (Neh. 3:19); and the son of Nun (Neh. 8:17); a Levite, the son of Azaniah (Neh. 10:9); a chief of the Levites, the son of Kadmiel (Neh. 12:24). Some of these, of course, may be the same people.

N.H.

JESSE. The grandson of Boaz and the father of King David (I Sam. 16:10-11). An Ephrathite from Bethlehem in Judah, he had eight sons (I Chr. 2:13-15). Nahash was at least the mother of his daughters (II Sam. 17:25). He is last mentioned at the cave of Adullam in Moab, where David sent his parents for safety (I Sam. 22:3-4).

N.H.

JESUITS. Members of the Society of Jesus (SJ), Roman Catholicism's strongest order in the twentieth century, organized in 1534 by IGNATIUS OF LOYOLA, confirmed in 1540 by Pope Paul III. They were mainstays of papal power at the Council of Trent (1545-63), led in the Roman Catholic Reformation, and became renowned worldwide for education and missions. Thwarted by war in their desire to convert Muslims, Loyola and his original group committed themselves to be missionaries under absolute obedience to the pope, to go wherever sent.

Originally the order was limited to sixty members, but it proved so effective in the Catholic Reformation, education, and missions that this limitation was lifted. By 1626 the Jesuits had 15,000 members and 803 houses; their missions had spread all over the world, and they dominated Roman Catholic education with 476 colleges, 36 seminaries, and thousands of lower schools.

Their very success aroused formidable reactions. They attacked the Augustinian theology at PORT-ROYAL, France, which stressed divine grace over human works in salvation, saying it affronted their achievements. Blaise Pascal mercilessly exposed the Jesuits' casuistry, and Port-Royalists argued that the Jesuit doctrine of free will denied God's omnipotence and that their good works denied the efficacy of grace. Nevertheless, the papacy condemned the writings of Port-Royal leaders Cornelius Jansen (1653) and Pasquier Quesnel (1713). Port-Royal was destroyed. Refugees established the Jansenist Old Catholic Church in Holland.

This episode was not an isolated one. Many Catholics feared the enormous wealth and political power of the Jesuits. Catholic princes expelled them from Portugal, Spain, and France for subversion, and in 1773 pressured Pope Clement XIV to dissolve the order. However, it survived in Prussia and Russia, where the pope's power was limited. Forty-one years later, in 1814, Pope Pius VII reconstituted the Jesuits. They continued their phenomenal growth and spearheaded Roman Catholic reforms at Vatican Council II (1962-65). In 1980 they numbered about 35,000.

To promote the church, all Jesuits swear absolute obedience to the pope, all go through Loyola's Spiritual Exercises to deepen their religious dedication and resolve, and all must have extensive educational training. Novices normally spend two years in seclusion and prayer before taking their usual monastic vows of poverty, chastity, and obedience. As scholastics the candidates study classical subjects, mathematics, physical sciences, and philosophy for five years. Candidates then teach five years in Jesuit schools, study theology four additional years, and devote a year to prayer and introspection before ordination and final vows. Their special vow is absolute obedience to the pope. They have no special habit and are not ascetic. The order, with substructures in various countries and provinces, is administered by a general. Ignatius Loyola was the first; other early generals included ROBERT BELLARMINE, Peter Canisius, Claudio Aquaviva, and Matteo Ricci.

The early Jesuit schools were tightly structured to promote church views. Studies centered on grammar, philology, poetry, and rhetoric; texts were expurgated, and extra readings had to be approved in advance. History and mathematics received little attention. Latin was the official language; no modern languages were officially taught until 1832. Despite shortcomings, the Jesuit schools proved highly successful, especially through the gifted leadership of Bellarmine, Canisius, and Aquaviva.

The Jesuits scored spectacularly in missions. Led by FRANCIS XAVIER and Matteo Ricci in the Orient, the Jesuits have established missions in India, Japan, China, the Philippines, Indochina, the Congo, Morocco, Ethiopia, Brazil, Peru, Paraguay, the United States, and Canada. Many suffered martyrdom. In Paraguay, the Jesuits established their Reductions of Paraguay, a communal Christian nation of native Indians that lasted two hundred years.

C.M.

JESUS CHRIST, LIFE AND TEACHINGS OF.

The basic sources for the life and teachings of Jesus are the four Gospels of the NT. Since these were written by Christians for the purpose of informing members of the church about the beginnings of Jesus and the movement he launched, they have been challenged as biased and therefore historically suspect. Careful search for information about Jesus in Jewish and Roman sources from the first and second centuries of our era has provided a basic confirmation of, but no significant supplement to, the Gospels. In Josephus, the Jewish historian, and in the rabbinic traditions that probably go back to the first century, we learn only that Jesus was put to death under the Roman governor of Palestine during the reign of Tiberius (probably in A.D. 29), and that his message was being propagated and followers were rallying to the movement from the villages and towns of Galilee to the capital of the empire. Attempts have been made to link Jesus with the ESSENE movement at QUMRAN that produced the Dead Sea Scrolls, but if he ever had connections with that group, he must have repudiated its views completely in later life, since his message of inviting the ritually impure and the religious outcasts to join his group stands in sharpest contrast to the intense ritual exclusivism of the Qumran community. More probably, he never had any associations with this group of ritual purists.

From other writings of the NT and the early centuries of the church, we learn nothing substantive to supplement what is presented in the Gospels. Paul has only oblique references to Jesus' teachings, as in the command to love one's neighbor (Rom. 13:9-10). He does quote in a form close to that of the Gospel tradition the report of Jesus' actions and statements on the occasion of the Last Supper (I Cor. 11:23-25). Of the details of the life and teachings of Jesus, we learn from Paul nothing new or in conflict with the Gospels. From later writers, in the body of material now known as the Apocryphal NT—coming from a wide range of settings and written in the second and subsequent centuries—we have only gross speculation and crass propaganda about Jesus' childhood and career. In the Infancy Gospel of Thomas, for example, Jesus is reported to have responded to those who charged him with breaking the Sabbath law when he made some clay pigeons by clapping his hands, whereupon the pigeons flew away. Or again, when his father cut a board too short, Jesus stretched it to the proper size. These late, fantastic narratives offer no reliable additions to the canonical Gospels, which are indeed our basic sources of information about Jesus' life and teachings.

Perhaps the oldest Jesus tradition that has been preserved is embodied in the source that was used by MATTHEW and LUKE to supplement the first complete Gospel, MARK, as they were writing their respective Gospels. Known to scholars as Q (from the German word for source, quelle), this non-Markan—and probably pre-Markan—material presents a vivid picture of Jesus as the messenger of the rule of God, which is already breaking into the present age through Jesus' acts and words. The three major themes of the Q material (given here in the form that Luke preserves) are: (1) Jesus as the prophetic revealer and agent of God's Rule; (2) the call to discipleship; (3) the warning of repentance or judgment. In the Q source there seems to have been no report of either Jesus' birth or death.

It is in association with JOHN THE BAPTIST that Jesus launches his activity. John is linked with the prophets as messengers of God whose word of judgment the covenant people as a whole have rejected (Luke 3:16-17; 11:49-50). A major factor in this rejection is that John announced a new basis on which God would constitute the covenant people, abandoning the notion that a genetic link with Abraham was a sufficient qualification (Luke 3:8-9). Even so, Jesus mourned over Jerusalem's rejection of God's messenger (Luke 13:34-35). Important as John is in his role of the one who prepares the way for Jesus (Luke 3), his work marks the end of the old era, while Jesus' work is pictured as the beginning of a new age in which God's rule is already visible and active (Luke 16:16-17) through the successful conflict with evil in which Jesus and his followers are engaged.

From the outset of his public career, Jesus is described as accomplishing the defeat of the attempts by the devil to lure him into using his extraordinary powers for the purpose of mere publicity or in the service of the devil (Luke 4:2-12). Although John is reported to be puzzled about what Jesus has undertaken, Jesus is quoted as sending to the imprisoned John the explanation that his acts of liberation and his extension of benefits to the economically and religiously deprived are signs that God's rule is coming, and that it is in fulfillment of what was promised through the prophets of Israel (Luke 7:18-35; compare Isa. 29:18-19; 35:5-6; 61:1). Just as ancient Israel was delivered from slavery in Egypt by God's hand (Exod. 8:19), it is by God's "finger" that Jesus has performed his exorcisms, as a sign of the inbreaking of God's kingdom in the present (Luke 11:20).

To become a follower of Jesus, according to the Q tradition, requires a break with the ordinary human ties of family (Luke 9:57-62) as well as the creation of conflicts within families (Luke 12:51-53; 14:26-27). It is not the religiously and socially respectable, but those who are in need and know it who are invited to share in the kingdom of God, as the Q parable of the messianic banquet describes the situation (Luke 14:16-24). His followers are to carry forward the work for which Jesus called them (Luke 10:2-20). To them has been granted special insight into God's purpose in the world (Luke 10:21-23) and a promise of participation in God's rule in the New Age (Luke 22:28-30).

The first narrative account of Jesus' career to have been written was the Gospel of Mark, which begins its story with the baptism of Jesus, including his divine acclaim as God's son (Mark 1:11), and continues through the account of his seizure by the authorities, his death, and the discovery of the empty tomb (16:1-8). Mark describes Jesus' call of his followers as having begun with the summons of two pairs of brothers to leave the family fishing business behind in order to become his followers (1:16-20). Later, when the number of the immediate circle of his followers reached twelve (3:13-14), he commissioned them to carry forward the work that he had begun, including preaching and healing of the sick (6:7-13). For this work they were to have neither funds nor organized support, but rather were to go out in dependence on the hospitality and response of the hearers as they moved from village to village. He had set the pattern for them by traveling throughout all Galilee, preaching in their synagogues and casting out demons (1:39). The exorcisms are seen as manifestations of his power over the work of Satan (2:19-27), whose hold on human beings is already being broken by the control that Jesus exercises over the demons.

The work to which he called the disciples is not to be seen as immediately producing spectacular results. Rather, its effects will be unobtrusive, like a mustard seed growing or like the sowing of grain on the ground (4:1-32): modest beginnings but spectacular results. Only those privileged by God will be able to discern the meaning and the outcome of what Jesus began and what is being continued by his chosen followers (4:10-12). The disciples are also granted insight into the special relationship to God that Jesus enjoys and his unique place in the purpose of God. These insights are disclosed through the incidents told by Mark, such as Jesus' walking on the water, stilling the storm, and feeding the hungry five thousand (4:35-41; 6:30-52). All the public sees is that they received a free meal and that they might benefit from his healing powers (6:53-56). Only the inner circle of his followers recognized him as God's Messiah (8:27-30), and even they did not yet understand what his messianic office involved, as Peter's rebuke of him on his mention of suffering and death reveals (8:31-33). The disciples continue to think of the Messiah as a figure of power, rather than of obedience and suffering in behalf of others (9:33-37; 10:35-45).

In the first century, the PHARISEES were chiefly concerned with defining the covenant community in terms of ritual purity, Sabbath observance, and obedience to those laws that preserved the separate identity of Jews as the people of God. In Mark it is clear that Jesus disagreed with the Pharisees on these points and sought instead to define the community on non-ritual, inclusive lines. What Jesus declared essential for purity was moral, rather than ritual, since what defiles is not what comes from without but what arises within the individual (Mark 7:1-23). This attitude is apparent in the fact that he befriended and healed those who were non-Jewish, like the demoniac from Gerasa (Mark 5), the child of the woman from the region of Tyre and Sidon (7:24-30), which lay outside Jewish territory, and the blind beggar in Jericho (10:46-52). His challenge to the religious authorities and the movement on the part of the crowds to acclaim him as king (11:1-10), as well as his actions in cleansing the Temple (11:15-19) and his predictions of the destruction of the Temple (13:2) and the turning over of the "vineyard" to others (non-Jews) in the parable of 12:1-12, led those leaders to accuse Jesus before the civil authorities as a subversive. It was on the ground of seeking to be king (15:2, 18, 21-32) that he was arrested and executed by the Roman governor's order. In the final hours of his life, he gathered his followers to share a meal of bread and wine, which he told them symbolized both his own impending death in their behalf and the vindication of him and them by God, which would take place when the kingdom of God fully came (14:22-25). They forsook him in the hour of his agony, and in spite of having had a vision of his ultimate glorification by God on the Mount of Transfiguration (9:2-8), they are portrayed by Mark as perplexed when the messenger at the empty tomb tells them to return to Galilee. There the risen Jesus will meet them, and from there they are to resume the work for which he called and commissioned them (16:1-8).

Matthew adds important elements to Mark's basic story. The account of his birth in Bethlehem is pictured as accompanied by cosmic events, such as the unusual course of a star (2:1-3). His lineage is traced back through David, and his birth is depicted as in fulfillment of scripture, including his having been born of a virgin (1-2). Matthew has arranged the teachings of Jesus in several large blocks: the SERMON ON THE MOUNT (5-7), the instructions to the Twelve (chaps. 10), the PARABLES of Jesus (13), advice to his followers about regulating their common life (chap. 18), judgments on the Pharisees (chap. 23), and the combination of predictions of the destruction of the Temple and the violent events that will precede the coming of the end of the age (chaps. 24-25). The tensions between Israel and the church are heightened, as in the sad outcry of Israel's leaders accepting responsibility for the death of Jesus (27:25), as well as in the sharp contrast between Jewish understanding of God's law through Moses and Jesus' understanding of divine will for his people (5:21, 27, 31, 33, 38, 43). There is a heavy emphasis on both the authority of Jesus and on his assignment of authority to the disciples (16:15-19; 18:15-20), which reaches a climax in the post-Resurrection commissioning of the disciples by Jesus in 28:18-19, "All authority in heaven and on earth has been given to me. Go therefore . . ."

By contrast, Luke stresses throughout his Gospel the open, inclusive attitude of Jesus toward those who are ritual, ethnic, or social outsiders to the Jewish covenant standards. Luke's genealogy is universal in implication, since it traces Jesus' lineage back to Adam, the progenitor of the human race (3:23-38). His first public statement in his hometown announces his aim to reach with the good news of redemption "the poor"—that is, those who are deprived on whatever grounds of sharing in the riches of God's grace (4:16-21). And he defends this policy by appeal to the precedents of the benefits bestowed on non-Israelites by the prophets of Israel, Elijah and Elisha (4:25-30). There is in Luke a second story of Jesus sending out his followers on a mission. This time they are seventy in number—which the Jews believed to be the number of the nations of the world (Luke 10:1-12). His teachings praise the humane concerns of a Samaritan (10:29-37) and the right priorities of a woman who seeks to learn from him, in defiance of then-current norms, which excluded women from full participation in the religious communities (10:38-42). His parables in Luke 15 depict God as the shepherd who seeks the wanderer, as the woman who looks for what has been lost, and as the father who is concerned only for reconciliation with the estranged son. Repeatedly in Luke, it is the tax collectors—regarded by Jews as unscrupulous collaborators with the Romans—who are welcomed into the fellowship of Jesus' followers (5:27-30; 7:29-34; 15:1; 18:10-13). In this final instance, Jesus defies social and ritual norms of first-century Judaism by inviting himself to eat a meal with Zacchaeus the tax collector (19:5). Women figure prominently among his followers in Luke (7:36-50; 8:1-3; 21:1-4), especially in the scenes depicting his death, burial, and Resurrection (23:27-31; 23:55-56; 24:1-11). As a foreshadowing of the church's subsequent celebration of the presence of the living Christ in its midst, Luke alone reports that Jesus was known by his followers after the Resurrection through the interpretation of the scriptures (24:32) and in the breaking of the bread (24:35). These inclusive features of Luke serve to prepare the reader for the launching of the world mission of the church that he will recount in the second volume of his work, the book of Acts.

Although in broad outline JOHN's Gospel tells the same basic story of Jesus as do the other three Gospels, there are fundamental differences in detail as well as in overall style of John. His prologue begins, not with the birth or baptism of Jesus, but with the realm of eternity, in which the divine Word (Logos) is always with God, sharing the divine nature, and in time coming down into the human sphere—"the Word made flesh" (1:14). Jesus' purely human birth is assumed, however, since he is spoken of as the "son of Joseph" without mention of Mary (1:45; 6:42). The background influencing the book seems to lie in the Hellenistic religions, such as the cult of Isis, whose devotees saw in her the divine agent through whom the creation was kept in order, as well as the personal benefactor through whom individual needs were met (as by healings) and direct knowledge of the divine was possible, especially through her pronouncements in the first person singular: "I am Isis. . . ." What John has done is to adapt and transform this pattern of pagan piety by showing that the miracles, or "signs" that Jesus performs, attest to his role as revealer of the glory of God (2:11; 20:30-31). He was in past eternity the instrument through whom God created the world (1:3), just as he is the one through whom the light and life that come from God are revealed to the faithful (8:12; 14:6) and the central figure around whom the new people of God is gathered, under the OT images of shepherd (10:11) and vine (15:1). John's account of Jesus' activities and his teachings are filled with rich symbolism, so that they are intended to be understood at both the literal level of human event and the spiritual level of divine redemptive disclosure. The oneness of Jesus with God that is implied in the other Gospels is made explicit in John: "I and the Father are one" (10:30).

The community that is represented by John's Gospel seems not to have been concerned for questions of structure or discipline, as in Matthew. Rather, the recurrent emphasis in Jesus' teaching according to John is on the mutuality of relationships within the community. The members' love for one another is the chief sign of their identity as disciples of Jesus (13:34-35). It is remarkable that in John, love for neighbor has been supplanted by love for one's fellow disciple. The outward expression of that love is given in the ceremony of washing of feet, symbolizing mutual forgiveness and humility (13:1-20). Both the details of Jesus' public career and his style of teaching and action are depicted differently in John from the other Gospels, but it is clear that John is more interested to convey his theological understanding of the significance of Jesus for faith as the creative-redemptive agent of God than in passing on historical tradition. Yet his conviction is that, unlike the pagan deities that promised communion with the Divine, Jesus' role as revealer of God was in genuinely human form, in the midst of the social, political, and cultural factors that condition all human existence.

H.K.

JESUS PEOPLE. A counter-cultural religious movement made up chiefly of young people who embraced Jesus Christ but maintained many of their anti-establishment mores. Known also as Jesus Freaks or Street Christians, the revivalistic phenomenon had its origin in 1967 and 1968, chiefly on the West Coast and particularly in California. Later some groups moved to other parts of the country to set up communes to engage in various forms of unconventional Christian witness. Various clusterings of young people, often led by strong leaders, sprang up, seemingly spontaneously, which has caused some self-appointed chroniclers to regard the Jesus Movement as a part of the American revivalistic tradition that dates back to the Great Awakening of the colonial period.

It is true that some of the converts had been drug users and had adopted the transient life-style of dropouts from straight society, but some were young people influenced more or less by the cultural norms of the turbulent 1960s. Lonnie Frisbee, who left the San Francisco Academy of Art to conduct a witness to street people, had a novel explanation for the movement. He suggested that the Six-Day War between Israel and adjoining Arab nations had set the stage for the last days before Christ's Second Coming. Ted Wise, a Sausalito sailmaker, became a Christian and soon began talking to people on the streets of Haight-Asbury about Jesus Christ. This brought him into contact with Jim Heefner, a disc jockey, and Jim Doop, a cigarette salesman, who became Christian converts. They were joined by Danny Sands, an old friend of Wise and his wife, Elizabeth. This quartet of men and their wives established a coffeehouse called the Living Room in Haight-Ashbury. There they rapped with thousands of street people about the claims of Christ and the authoritative place of the Bible. Later they were joined by Frisbee and his wife and established a communal family of five couples in a farmhouse, at Novato, California, some miles north of San Francisco. The Frisbees later moved to southern California and with a new acquaintance, John Higgins, rented the House of Acts. Later they moved to Santa Ana and opened a home they called the House of Miracles. Heefner and Doop, after a time, left Novato and joined up with Victor Wierwille of The Way, an ultra-dispensationalist ministry, headquartered in New Knoxville, Ohio. Similar movements developed in Oregon and Washington, and some of their converts moved to Midwest and East Coast locations.

The theology of the Jesus People generally was fundamentalistic and, more often than not, charismatic. Yet sociologically they did not align themselves with the straight churches of FUNDAMENTALISM until later years. Most of the Jesus People, with their strong reliance on the King James Version of the Bible, were anti-intellectual and anti-cultural. By the 1980s the Jesus People movement had been either formed into house churches or absorbed into more conventional churches such as Calvary Chapel of Costa Mesa or the Peninsula Bible Church of Palo Alto.

R.H.

JESUS PRAYER. "Lord Jesus Christ, Son of God, have mercy on me!"; the traditional prayer accompanying meditation in the Greek Orthodox church and orthodoxy generally, especially among monastics. This prayer is said to be from the heart, a motion to be "hid with God through Christ," drawn from the Christ mysticism of Paul. In orthodoxy, such mystical prayer is known as HESYCHASM.

The Greek monks devoted themselves to the remembrance of the name of Jesus. From repetition of the name "Jesus," the prayer developed to its present form by the twelfth century. It also became part of various meditation exercises and positions that are supposed to focus the mind on the Divine. Hesychasm has a long history in orthodoxy, from Origen, Athanasius, Gregory of Nyssa, the Hermits such as Simeon Stylites, and a multitude of practitioners in the thirteenth and fourteenth centuries.
J.C.

JETHRO. Moses' father-in-law, sometimes called Reuel and Hobab (Exod. 3:1; 4:18; Judg. 4:11). He was a priest of Midian of the Kenite clan (Exod. 18:1). He brought Moses' wife Zipporah and their sons to meet MOSES at Mt. Horeb and held a sacrifice of thanksgiving for the Israelites' safe exodus from Egypt. He also advised Moses to delegate the administration of justice, which became the institution of judges (Exod. 18). His son Hobab joined the Israelites. Descendants of the family settled in Negeb and were friendly with David. Some have suggested that Yahweh was the name of the Kenites' god.
N.H.

JEW. A member of the Hebrew people; particularly, of the tribe of Judah. The term "Jew" is used for members of Judea who were taken to Babylon in captivity (586-539 B.C.) and their descendants who returned to restore Jerusalem, and to all those through history who descended from them. The reforms of Ezra and Nehemiah set the standards as to who is a Jew, emphasizing birth from a Jewish mother.

Historically, Jews are part of the Hebrew family, an Aramaean (Syrian) branch of the northwest Semitic group, which originated in Arabia. The closest living racial relatives of the Jews are the Arabs, which is reflected in the Genesis stories of Ishmael and Isaac (Gen. 15-26) and Jacob and Esau (Gen. 27-36). Originally, the Hebrews were known as 'Apiru or "outsiders" (river crossers) because of their wandering nomadic ways of life.

Although "Hebrew," "Jew," and "Israelite" are generally used interchangeably, Israel was only one branch of the larger Hebrew movement in history, and Judah ("the Jews") was only one of twelve Israelite tribes.

The history of the Jews is one of God's initiative in dealing with humankind. Yahweh ("I Am") appeared to Moses and brought the Israelites out of Egypt to freedom, gave them the covenant at Mt. Sinai (Exod. 19-23), and helped them conquer Canaan. Much of Jewish history was conflict, defeat, occupation, and suffering. But Jews came to see that there is only one God, and even the defeats of history are God's attempt to redeem them and all humankind. J.C.

JEWISH HISTORY AND THOUGHT. See JUDAISM, MODERN THOUGHT OF.

JEWISH HOLIDAYS. The Jewish holidays are of several kinds. The Bible commands the observance of the following: The Sabbath and the New Moon; the "day of blowing the trumpets," which today is ROSH HASHANAH or the Jewish New Year; the DAY OF ATONEMENT (Yom Kippur); and the three pilgrimage festivals—PASSOVER, the Feast of Weeks (SHAVUOT), and the Feast of Tabernacles (SUKKOT).

Rosh Hashanah and Yom Kippur are celebrated solely as religious occasions of judgment, atonement, and reconciliation with God, while historical and agricultural motifs combine in each of the pilgrimage festivals. Thus Passover, which commemorates the Exodus from Egypt and slavery, is the spring festival, Shavuot, which is a reminder of the revelation at Mount Sinai and the receiving of the Ten Commandments, is the festival of the firstfruits. Sukkot, a reminder of the Israelites wandering in the wilderness, is the fall harvest festival. The seventh day of Sukkot is distinguished as the "great Hoshana" (the Gospel accounts of Jesus' entry on Palm Sunday seem to have confused this with Passover). The eighth day, Shemini Atzeret (Eighth Day of Assembly), is treated as an independent holiday from the point of certain rabbinical prescriptions, such as mourning. The ninth day is Simhat Torah (joy of the Torah). It marks the conclusion of the annual cycle of Torah readings and the beginning of a new cycle.

Holidays of later origin than the Torah (and which therefore do not have the force or prohibitions of the biblically ordained holidays) include HANUKKAH and PURIM. Hanukkah, the Festival of Dedication (25th of Kislev to 3d of Tever, corresponding to December), celebrates the victory over those who try to destroy the Jewish religion such as the Syrian King Antiochus. It marks the rededication of the Temple. Purim celebrates the deliverance of the Jewish people from the threat of extinction in Persia because of the slanders of Haman.

Fast days besides the Day of Atonement include Tisha b'Av (9th of Av), which marks the destruction of the first Temple in Jerusalem by the Babylonians in 586 B.C. and the destruction of the second Temple by the Romans in A.D. 70; the Fast of Gedaliah (8th of Tishri), which commemorates the climax of the disasters that befell the first Jewish commonwealth in 586 B.C.; Asarah b'Tever (10th of Tever), which marks the day when the Babylonians began their siege of Jerusalem in 586 B.C.; the Fast of Esther, which commemorates the time when the Jews of Persia fasted and prayed that they be spared the massacre planned by Haman; and Shiva Asar b'Tammuz (17th of Tammuz), which marks the day when the Babylonian army made the first breach in the wall of Jerusalem in 586 B.C.

Tu b' Shvat (15th of Shvat) is the Jewish Arbor Day, also called the New Year of Trees. Lag b' Omer (33d day in the counting of the Omer between Passover and Shavuot) is called the scholars festival.

Yom HaShoa (27th of Nisan) is Holocaust Day. Yom HaAtzmaut (5th of Iyar) is Israel Independence Day. Yom Yerushalayim (28th of Iyar) marks the anniversary of the unification of Jerusalem during the Six-Day War on June 7, 1967 (see also HEBREW CALENDAR). L.K.

JEWISH THEOLOGY (MODERN). See JUDAISM, MODERN THOUGHT OF.

JEZEBEL. (1) Queen of Israel. The daughter of Ethbaal, priest-king of Tyre and Sidon. She married AHAB about 880 B.C. to cement the alliance which Omri, Ahab's father, proposed to offset the hostility of Damascus. Her prenuptial agreement allowed her to continue to worship Baal (I Kings 16:31). She was a particular devotee of Melqart, the Tyrian Baal. During the time she and Ahab were full rulers (about 874-853 B.C.), her retinue included 450 of his prophets and 400 prophets of the goddess Asherah (I Kings 18:19). This led to the confrontation at Mt. Carmel with the prophet Elijah in which her priests were slaughtered (I Kings 18:17-40). This did nothing to diminish her religious zeal (I Kings 19:2).

It was her concept of the monarchy that alienated the people, since it was at variance with the Hebrew concept of a religious covenant between God, the king, and the people. Her part in the seizing of Naboth's vineyard led to the downfall of Ahab and his house (I Kings 21), though she continued in power for ten years as queen mother of Ahaziah and Joram. When Jehu killed Joram, she attired herself regally and awaited her death with dignity (II Kings 9:30-37).

(2) The name given to the prophet of Thyratira (Rev. 2:20), who was advocating idolatry. Though the name has become an epithet for sexual laxity, it is doubtful if either woman was sexually immoral since biblical writers often used the metaphor of "adultery" for idolatry. Both women were simply adherents of a religion different from that of the men writing about them. N.H.

JEZREEL. A city in Issachar and the valley or plain where it stood (Josh. 19:18; Hos. 1:5). The east end of what is also called the Plain of Esdraelon, it formed an ancient trade route between the Jordan valley and the coastal plain. Mt. Carmel and Mt. Gilboa were to the south and Mt. Tabor to the north. The Israelites assembled at the fountain in the city of Jezreel before facing the Philistines at Gilboa (I Sam. 29:1). It was the location of Naboth's vineyard (I Kings 21:1). The city is identified with the modern Zer'in, about fifty-five miles north of Jerusalem. N.H.

Courtesy of the Israel Government Tourist Office, Houston, Texas

The valley of Jezreel, with Mount Gilboa in the background

JIHAD. In ISLAM, the struggle for righteousness and the spread of the faith. The struggle can be against personal ungodliness or against the enemies of Islam. In the latter case jihad can mean a "holy war," waged with the military means available in order to defeat and subjugate the enemies of the faith. Those who are slain in a holy war are martyrs, assured of salvation in heaven (JANNA).

While it was always advantageous for defeated peoples to become Muslims, conversions were not forced, and significant minorities of Jews, Christians, and others have always existed in the Islamic world.

K.C.

JIMÉNEZ DE CISNEROS, FRANCISCO, CARDINAL (1436–1517). Roman Catholic Spanish cardinal, humanist scholar, grand inquisitor, defender of orthodoxy. A Castilian native, Jiménez studied at Alcalá, Salamanca, and Rome. Returning to Spain in 1465, he encountered opposition and was briefly imprisoned. After serving in Sigüenza as vicar general under Cardinal Mendoza, he retreated to a Franciscan convent in Toledo. His extreme asceticism attracted notice, and he withdrew to a remote monastery to be a hermit. In 1492 he reluctantly became confessor to Queen Isabella, who maneuvered his appointment as Provincial of the Franciscans in 1494. Despite opposition he drastically reformed the Franciscan Conventuals, using force and moral severity. He became archbishop of Toledo and high chancellor of Castile (1495), and in 1507 was made a cardinal and appointed grand inquisitor (1507–17). Subsequently he was heavily involved in politics and religion. As grand inquisitor he executed over 2,500 victims in efforts to purify the church and promote orthodoxy. During his last two years he ruled Castile as regent for Charles V. A humanist scholar, Jiménez promoted education, established the University of Alcalá (1500), and issued his Complutesian Polyglot Bible (1522) in original languages. His repressive measures helped prevent a full Renaissance and Reformation in Spain. C.M.

JIVA. From the Sanskrit word meaning literally "life, life-principle." In philosophical HINDUISM and JAINISM, Jiva refers to the mental/spiritual nature of the separate individual self. Hindu VEDANTA thought speaks of the Jiva or "ego self" as what a person regards himself to be when in a state of AVIDYA, ignorance, concerning the ATMAN or true self, which is one with BRAHMAN, unqualified Reality. In actuality the Jiva is atman, but regards itself as something finite and separate, and experiences several states of consciousness. In Jainism, Jivas are the souls that animate the universe; ordinarily, they are trapped in matter by KARMA, but upon liberation as mukta-jiva they enjoy their full potential for consciousness and bliss. R.E.

JNANA MARGA. See VIDYA.

JOAB. A Hebrew name meaning "Yahweh is father." (1) Son of Zeruijah, DAVID's sister, brother to Abishai and Asahel (II Sam. 2:18), and commander of David's army (8:16). Joab strengthened David's position following Saul's death. In a war game staged beside the pool of Gibeon (2:12-17), Joab's forces triumphed over Abner's, who were serving Ish-baal, Saul's son, whom Abner had installed as monarch over a refugee government in TransJordan. The fleeing Abner was pursued by Asahel, who ignored Abner's warning to desist. Suddenly Abner speared him to death. Though Joab and Abishai continued the pursuit, Abner's pleading and the reassembly of his soldiers influenced them to withdraw. Joab buried his brother and returned to Hebron.

After Abner's rift with Ish-baal, he made overtures with David. When the absent Joab learned how well Abner had been received at Hebron, he arranged a private audience with Abner. Joab avenged his brother's death by killing Abner, which ensured that Abner would never supplant him as commander of Judah's army (II Sam. 3:27).

Joab contributed significantly to David's conquests. He starred in David's capture of Jerusalem and was entrusted with its repair (I Chr. 11:5-8). Manifesting excessive cruelty, Joab was active in David's campaign against Edom (II Sam. 8:13-14; I Kings 11:15). He triumphed against Syrian (Aramean) forces who assisted the Ammonites in their campaign against Israel (II Sam. 10:6-14). After capturing Rabbah, the Ammonite capital, he magnanimously invited David to leave Jerusalem and wield the final blow so that credit for the triumph would be his (12:26-28).

In David's dealing with his obstinate son, Absalom, Joab acted decisively. Employing a wise woman from Tekoa, Joab orchestrated Absalom's return to Jerusalem and uneasy reconciliation with his father (II Sam. 14:1-3, 23, 31-33). During Absalom's rebellion, Joab supervised a third of David's troops (18:2). Defying David's orders, Joab slew Absalom and left him hanging by his hair from an oak (18:5, 9-15). When he judged that David had grieved long enough, Joab forcefully jolted the king back to the realities of statecraft (19:4-8). His rash behavior, however, was not ignored. David appointed Amasa, leader of Absalom's rebel forces, to replace Joab as army commander. When Amasa proved ineffective in dealing with Sheba's rebellion against David, Joab slew Amasa, reclaimed his position, and quelled the rebellion (20:1-22).

Joab also served David by conducting a census of which he did not approve (II Sam. 24:1-9) and cooperating with the king's stratagem, which wrought the murder of Uriah, Bathsheba's first husband (11:14-24). For having supported Adonijah in the dispute over throne succession during David's last days, Joab incurred Solomon's wrath. The new king readily complied with David's deathbed orders to avenge Joab's murder of Abner and Amasa. Though Joab sought sanctuary at the altar, he was slain there by Benaiah, who inherited his position (I Kings 2:5-6, 28-35).

(2) Son of Seraiah and descendant of Kenaz, within the tribe of Judah (I Chr. 4:13-14).

(3) The founder of a family, some of whose children joined Zerubbabel in the return from Babylonian exile (Ezra 2:6; 8:9; Neh. 7:11). J.K.K.

JOACHIM OF FIORE (about 1132–1202). Italian mystic, monastic biblical scholar, famed for his apocalyptic Age of the Spirit to begin in 1260. Born in Cosenz, Italy, he became a Cistercian monk after visiting Palestine and was elected abbot in 1177. After about eleven years, he withdrew to Fiore, founded his own monastery of San Giovanni, and provided direction for about thirty more. Intensely ascetic and loyal to the church, he devoted himself to biblical studies. He divided history into three ages: that of the Father governed by OT laws, the Son governed by NT grace, and the Spirit governed by the "eternal gospel," with humanity living in spiritual freedom. Ushered in by monastics, the Age of the Spirit would bring the conversion of Jews and Gentiles, union of the Greek and Roman churches, overthrow of Antichrist, and inauguration of the Sabbath of God. Many in the Middle Ages, especially Franciscans, welcomed his biblically based ideas. His writings were submitted posthumously to the papacy for approval and condemned by the Lateran Council (1215) and the Council of Arles (1263). The papacy could not accept Joachim's implied censure and displacement of the OT and NT by the "eternal gospel." C.M.

JOAN OF ARC (about 1412–31). Soldier, martyr, and saint, Joan of Arc was born in Domremy-la-Pucelle near Lorraine. From age thirteen she heard voices and saw visions, particularly of MICHAEL the archangel and saints CATHERINE OF SIENA and Margaret. The French crown was in dispute between the dauphin Charles, alleged son of Charles VI, and the English King Henry VI, whose armies occupied most of northern France. In 1428 the British put Orleans, key city of the Loire Valley, under siege. Joan met Charles at Chinon and convinced him he was the rightful heir. She told him of her voices' instructions to attack Orleans and to help him be crowned officially at Rheims, the sacred seat of French kings now under British rule.

Armed and dressed as a knight, she led a force into Orleans, attacked the besiegers, and liberated the city in May 1429. It was the turning point of the Hundred Years' War. She then urged Charles to Rheims and prophesied his victory at Patay on June 17, 1429. When her mission was accomplished, Joan had wished to return home, but Charles urged her to stay. His inertia involved her in petty warfare, and she was captured at Compiègne on May 23, 1430. Though she answered her interrogators with skill and sincerity, she was condemned for heresy and burned at the stake May 30, 1431. Her remains were thrown in the Seine River. After Charles VII's ultimate victory, a French court annulled the verdict in 1456. She was canonized by Pope Benedict XV on May 16, 1920. Her feast day is May 30. N.H.

JOASH. In Hebrew, Jo'ash, a shortened form of Jehoash, meaning "Yahweh has given" or "Yahweh has come to help." Joash is the name of eight people in the OT, from Judges to II Chronicles.

The first Joash was Gideon's father (Judg. 6:11) who put up an altar to Baal (vv. 24-25). The second Joash was one of King Ahab's sons in Samaria, to whom his father sent the prophet Micaiah for imprisonment (I Kings 22:26; II Chr. 18:25 ff.)

The third was a Judean of the Shelah family (I Chr. 4:22). The fourth was a supporter of David in Ziklag (I Chr. 12:3). The fifth and sixth men named Joash were kings, one of Israel and one of Judah, who actually ruled at the same time. Number seven was one of the sons of Becher (I Chr. 7:8), and number eight was a steward in David's service (I Chr. 27:28).

Joash, son of Ahaziah, was the eighth king of Judah, ruling in the ninth century B.C., for about forty years (II Kings 11; 12; II Chr. 22:11; 24:1). Joash was saved from murder by his aunt, the wife of the high priest Jehoiada. He was hidden in the Temple for six years and at the age of seven was presented to Jerusalem's leaders by Jehoiada. A covenant of loyalty was made, and the usurper, Athaliah, was slain. The priest guided the king's career (II Chr. 24), and until Jehoiada's death, Joash was declared a good king, although he did not fully root out Baal worship (II Kings 12). Once the priest died, Joash turned for the worst (II Chr. 24). He was finally murdered and denied burial in the royal tombs.

Joash, the twelfth king of Israel, followed Jehoahaz (II Kings 13). While an apostate, because of his encouragement of the worship of the golden bull in Samaria, he was spoken of favorably because he recovered lands lost to Syria. He also showed respect for Elisha (II Kings 13:14) and told the fable of the cedar and the thistle (II Kings 14:9-10; II Chr. 25:18-19), as an attempt to discourage King Amaziah of Jerusalem from attacking Israel. When that didn't work, he attacked Amaziah, captured him, pushed on to Jerusalem and broke down 540 feet of its wall. He looted the Temple and took treasure and hostages home to Samaria. He was succeeded by Jeroboam II (II Kings 14:16).

J. C.

JOB, BOOK OF. One of the OT "The Writings" (books of wisdom), that addresses the perennial problem of absurd and excessive human suffering (see EVIL). The narrative medium employed is an old folktale about an extraordinarily righteous foreigner named Job, who enters into dialogue with four friends regarding his fate. The book ends without a clear-cut solution; however, following a confession of repentance and renewal Job experiences restoration of his fortunes.

The Composition of the Book. It is quite easy to analyze the structure of the book of Job into four distinct parts.

(a) Prologue and epilogue (chaps. 1-2; 42:7-17). In a folktale that can be paralleled in various ways by similar tales of righteous sufferers both in ancient Egypt and in Mesopotamia, the original tale of Job presents the hero of the story as so selfless that he would "rise early in the morning and offer burnt offerings" for his sons in case they had sinned in their hearts (1:5). According to the tale, Satan (who is not yet the devil, but simply that member of the heavenly court whose task it is to probe and test those humans whose hearts might conspire to do evil), suggests that no one serve God disinterestedly, not even righteous Job. God permits Satan to put Job to the test by means of a series of incredible torments, culminating in the loss of his family and fortune, and including personal suffering in the form of disease and rejection by the community, including his wife. This is the story of the patient Job (James 5:11), whose teaching has become proverbial: "The Lord gave, and the Lord has taken away; blessed be the name of the Lord" (1:21). In the epilogue Job receives double indemnity for all of his losses, and vindication before the eyes of the community because of his steadfast faithfulness.

(b) The dialogues (chaps. 3-31). At some point in the evolution of the story of Job, an Israelite theologian split the ancient folktale in two and inserted three lengthy cycles of dialogues between Job and his friends Eliphaz the Temanite, Bildad the Shuhite, and Zophar the Naamathite. Included in this section as well is the lovely soliloquy on wisdom, the subject of chapter 28, which culminates in a teaching that in many ways is the slogan of the wisdom writers of Israel: "Behold, the fear of the Lord, that is wisdom; and to depart from evil is understanding" (28:28). In the dialogues, the friends confront Job relentlessly with what may have been the typical religious position of the day regarding suffering. Suffering must be regarded as a punishment for some hidden sins, for to regard it in any other way would be to make God unjust. Certainly Job's suffering does have the outer and public appearance of punishment, for he had experienced many of the very elements of the curse pronounced in Deuteronomy 28:15-32 against those who disobey the covenant of God. However, Job staunchly resists the suggestion that his suffering is a punishment and protests his innocence time and again (compare 31:16-23). Eliphaz is, of course, correct in saying, "Can a man be pure before his Maker? Even in his servants he puts no trust, and his angels he charges with error; how much more those who dwell in houses of clay, whose foundation is in the dust, who are crushed before the moth" (4:17-19). Nevertheless, it is a universal premise that the punishment should fit the crime, and Job has committed no crime warranting such treatment.

Throughout the dialogues, Job presses a legal claim against God and seeks to bring him into court: "Behold, I have prepared my case; I know that I shall be vindicated. Who is there that will contend with me? For then I would be silent and die . . . how many are my iniquities and my sins? Make me know my transgression and my sin" (13:18-23). In this connection Job calls for a "witness" (9:33-35), also termed a "redeemer." The most famous of these calls is that which in older translations appeared to suggest the possibility of immortal life: "For I know that my Redeemer lives, and at last he will stand upon the earth; and after my skin has been thus destroyed, then from my flesh I shall see God, whom I shall see on my side, and my eyes shall behold, and not another" (19:25-27).

In the long series of dialogues, the friends also raise the idea that God inflicts suffering for pedagogical purposes: "Behold, happy is the man whom God reproves; therefore despise not the chastening of the Almighty. For he wounds, but he binds up; he smites, but his hands heal" (5:17-18). Like all of the other proposals for making sense of absurd evil, however, this one too is rejected by the writer, speaking through Job.

(c) The Elihu speeches (chaps. 32-37). A fourth friend, mentioned nowhere else in the book, appears in this section to reiterate much of the discussion of the previous speakers. Considered by some scholars to be of little theological and literary worth, and late in date, the Elihu cycle nonetheless concludes with the important observation that one cannot know the transcendent God, but only as God turns toward humans with the relational qualities of justice, power, and righteousness (37:22-24). Even if it is a later insertion, this teaching wonderfully prepares the way for God's own speeches, which follow immediately.

(d) The Yahweh speeches (38:1-42:6). At last Yahweh answers Job out of the whirlwind. In spite of Elihu's strictures against trying to understand the transcendent Deity, God speaks to Job about the role of Creator. God dazzles Job with visions of the great cosmic order and suggests that every aspect of the world is beloved to Yahweh. God even dares to touch upon the ostrich (39:13-18), Behemoth, the hippopotamus (40:15-24), and Leviathan, the crocodile (41:1-34)—ungainly creatures, positive aberrations in the created order, and yet beloved of God. In the aftermath of this speech, Job makes his famous confession: "I had heard of thee by the hearing of the ear, but now my eye sees thee; therefore I despise myself, and repent in dust and ashes" (42:5-6).

A Theological Summary of the Book of Job. Although the book ends without offering a clear account of why Job suffered and what role God had in that suffering, at least the answers of the traditional religion are confounded. God can affect events, and yet profound evil does exist in the world. Such evil is not punishment sent from God, in spite of its appearance. Suffering is neither meaningless, nor is it a chastening unto perfection, nor is it an avenue to heavenly reward. Although God's ways are unfathomable, God also speaks out of the whirlwind. In the midst of such paradoxes, the meaning of the book of Job emerges in three parts. (a) Job is forced by a process of radicalization through sharp painful outer pressure and hard inner intellectual activity to recognize his own creaturehood and mortality. (b) He is also forced to recognize the ultimate inaccessibility of the transcendent God whose perfect attributes of justice, power, and omnipresence must be affirmed, but cannot be used to explain the suffering that Job has experienced. In no way can God's absolute justice ever be made to account for Job's situation on the dunghill. (c) Job also comes to see that God's presence with people is real: God is accessible, God is immanent. When people confess God's power and trust in God as one who will be alongside them in their struggle to overcome the suffering they face, then a victory can be obtained. That surely is the key to the words with which the book of Job culminates: "I had heard of thee by the hearing of the ear"—I had my doctrine in order, and could say the right things about God's absolute attributes. "But now my eye sees thee"—and I know that you are with me and I am yours. Thus is the concept of God in the OT enriched with the motifs of presence, intimacy, and the shared experience of suffering, which are so richly dramatized by the book of Job. W.S.T.

JOCHEBED ("Yahweh is glory"). Although her name is not in the account of Moses' birth (Exodus 2), she was the mother of Moses, Aaron, and Miriam (Exod. 6:20; Num. 26:59). Their father was Amram. Jochebed was sister to his father Kohath (Exod. 6:18, 20), and thus a daughter of Levi (Num. 26:59).

N.H.

JOEL. Hebrew for "Yahweh is God." A prophet who was active in Jerusalem about 400 B.C. Joel's message consisted in the affirmation that God will punish those who commit evil and will vindicate Israel. Apocalyptic elements within the book of Joel in the OT profoundly affected both Jewish and Christian authors, including some writers of the NT.

Nothing is known about Joel, the son of Petheul, who is mentioned in 1:1. The name was somewhat common among Hebrews of the OT period, but it is not possible to connect the prophet with any other person of the same name who is mentioned in the OT. Joel worked in Jerusalem in the period following the Exile (3:2). The Temple (1:14) and the walls of the city (2:9) had been rebuilt, and the priests were a prominent group within the community (1:13).

The prophet was a very literate person, not only in the sense that he knew and used previous prophetic writings, but also in that his powers of language were especially keen. With respect to his references to previous prophetic literature, (1) his concept of the DAY OF THE LORD (2:1) draws upon a prophetic tradition that goes as far back as the time of Amos (Amos 5:18); (2) at one point (2:32) Joel acknowledges that he is quoting from another prophet (Obadiah 17); (3) the statement that is found in both Isaiah 2:4 and Micah 4:3 is reproduced by Joel (3:10), but its meaning is inverted so that what was a cry for peace has become a promise of war.

Joel's literary skills may also be seen in the graphic manner in which he describes the locust plague (2:3-11) and the drought (1:15-20). Swarms of hungry insects darken the sky and lay waste to the countryside, while the drought has caused the fields to burn and watering places to become dry so that both human being and beast are in anguish. Just as remarkable is the manner in which the prophet uses this natural disaster as a conceptual springboard by which he moves into his various images of the coming Day of Yahweh.

Two divisions may be identified within the book of Joel: oracles concerning the locust plague and the drought (1:1-2:27) and oracles concerning the Day of Yahweh (2:28-3:21).

Some scholars have suggested that the locust plague and the drought may be only symbolic in nature, but the vividness of their description makes that unlikely. The prophet and his compatriots probably experienced genuine disasters of this type, and Joel understood these as signs of the Lord's displeasure. His initial response is to call the people to repentance for the sin that has roused God's anger (1:14). He promises that, when the people have repented, the Lord will respond graciously. The locusts will be driven away (2:20), and there will be rain to restore the health of the land. Joel's concern, however, is not limited to these natural disasters, for he sees them as symbols of a deeper significance, the coming of the Day of the Lord. It may be that the hordes of locusts that covered the sky and blotted out the sun, moon, and stars (2:10) caused the prophet to reflect upon the "day of darkness" when the Lord would judge the earth (2:1-2).

In the second section of the book, 2:28-3:21 (in the Hebrew text this constitutes chaps. 3 and 4), the prophet's interest in the Day of the Lord is paramount. The day is described in frightening terms: blood, fire, smoke, and darkness (2:30-31). But there will be two aspects to this day, the first of which is that it will be a time for an unprecedented outpouring of God's grace. The prophetic spirit will be rekindled, as in days of old (2:28-29), and those Jews who call upon the Lord will be saved in Jerusalem (2:32-3:1). The Lord will reign there (3:16), while foreigners who have inflicted great suffering upon God's people will be excluded from the Holy City (3:17). The other aspect of the Day of the Lord will be that of terrible judgment. The nations that have oppressed God's people will be gathered into the valley of Jehoshaphat (3:2), and there will be a final conflict in which the Lord confronts those nations and their evil (3:9-15). They will be destroyed, while faithful Jews will be gathered into a Jerusalem where the Lord reigns (3:19-21).

In addition to its anticipation of a final Judgment Day, the book of Joel influenced in other ways the writers of the NT, some of whom saw the Pentecost experience (Acts 2, see especially vv. 17-21) as the fulfillment of Joel's prophecy concerning the outpouring of God's spirit.

J.D.N.

JOHN, APOSTLE. One of the Twelve whom Jesus called to follow him and who became a central figure in the later apostolic church. His call is recorded in all the Gospels, with the Fourth Gospel (John 1:35-42) adding the detail that he was a disciple of John the Baptist at the first. This information is known only by inference, as John does not name himself. He is elsewhere identified as Zebedee, and brother of James, with his mother's name, Salome, known again by inference (Mark 16:1; Matt. 27:56). He may even have been related to Jesus as cousin, if Salome was a sister of Mary, Jesus' mother (John 19:25).

His trade was fishing (Mark 1:19-20), which he shared along with his brother. The family home was at Capernaum on the banks of Lake Galilee (Matt. 4:21, 22; Mark 1:19, 20; Luke 5:10), and the fishing trade was evidently prosperous, since the family took on hired help (Mark 1:20). At this point in the Gospel story they became disciples of Jesus. It may be gauged from the nickname "Boanerges" ("sons of thunder" or "wrath," Mark 3:17) that their temperament was energetic, and Luke 9:51-56 (RSV marg.) suggests that they were quick-tempered and aggressive. They were certainly ambitious (Mark 10:35, 41). John was one of the favored three companions of Jesus (Mark 5:37; 9:2; 14:33). He was also one of those disciples who questioned Jesus about the fall of Jerusalem (Mark 13:3, 4). Although he is not mentioned as such in the Fourth Gospel, his family name is referred to in 21:2, which may be an appendix to the GOSPEL OF JOHN.

In the Acts of the Apostles, John lives in the shadow of Peter (4:13; 5:33, 40; 8:14), and Paul mentions him only incidentally (Gal. 2:9). Later tradition links him with an exile on Patmos (Rev. 1:9) and with the Ephesian church where the Fourth Gospel was published. There is a well-attested notion (found in Eusebius, the church historian) that at the beginning of the Jewish war in Palestine in A.D. 66, John migrated to Asia Minor and took up residence with Mary, the Lord's mother, at Ephesus (John 19:26, 27). He became a leader of the church in that city, and there he died in ripe old age, having composed the Fourth Gospel. He may well be referred to obliquely in that Gospel (21:20-24) as the disciple whom Jesus loved. But the "elder," also called John, is the person spoken of in the Epistles of JOHN (II John 1; III John 1), and he was evidently a different person from John the apostle, though some scholars dispute this.

A separate source of tradition outside the NT and the orthodox Christian writers of the first few centuries offers another portrait of John. A Gnostic document bears the title the Acts of John, dated in the mid-second century. It is full of miracles and speeches linked with John. Its understanding of Jesus' person is docetic, that is, it denies his full humanity. It is interesting that the Gnostic writers of the second century, such as Ptolemaeus and Heracleon, were drawn to John and found in his Gospel much material that served their purpose. These items have to do with the teaching on Jesus' divine origin, his earthly glory, and his apparent indifference to suffering. The Nag Hammadi library contains books (Apocryphon [Secret Book] of John, the Gospel of Philip), which also hold John in high esteem.

The Orthodox writers tried to counter this tendency by associating John with the beloved disciple who "leaned close to Jesus' breast" at the supper (John 3:23; 21:20). Polycarp, bishop of Smyrna, is said to have heard the gospel from John's own lips, according to Irenaeus. The Orthodox tradition then started to grow with the claim of Polycrates, bishop of Ephesus (A.D. 189-98), that John was both a priest and a martyr, a double distinction that history does not endorse. Eusebius reports, and apparently accepts, this embellishment, probably because he is opposing heretical endeavors that wanted to turn John into a proto-Gnostic.

R.M.

JOHN, EPISTLES OF. The three Epistles of John range in size from about six pages to less than a page. The first is not a letter but a tract on doctrinal and moral issues. The other two are apparently actual letters, offering advice, encouragement, and warning. All three are anonymous, but resemble each other—and the GOSPEL OF JOHN—in style and vocabulary. For example, the term "Paraclete"

("counselor" or "helper") is found in the NT only in John 14:16; 15:26; 16:7, and in I John 2:1. The emphasis on love and the centrality of the love command are shared by the Gospel and the Epistles of John. One can speak of a Johannine community, or group of communities, as that segment of Christianity through and for whom these writings were produced.

At least two major shifts are evident from the time of the Gospel to that of the letters, however. The Gospel's portrayal of Jesus as one who is preexistent and one with the Father (John 1:1, 14; 10:30), but who also hungers, thirsts, and suffers, has created a problem. Now members of the group affirm his unity with God, but see no need for his earthly life and death. Against this position, I John affirms the tangible reality of the Jesus whom his followers saw, heard, and handled (I John 1:1). And he denounces as a "deceiver" and an "antichrist" (II John 7; I John 4:1-2) anyone who refuses to acknowledge his full humanity and the benefits of his death. The second new factor in the letters is the insistence on excluding from the fellowship of the group anyone whose standards of faith and morality do not measure up to those laid down by "the elder." Rather than primary conflict with the Jews about Jesus' messiahship, as in the Gospel (John 9:22), former members are now separated from the group because of their faulty views of Jesus as the Christ (I John 2:18-23; II John 7). Nevertheless Christians are to be bound together in mutual love and support (I John 3:11-24; II John 5), and are to offer hospitality to those of similar persuasion (III John 5-8). H.K.

JOHN, GOSPEL OF. Introduction. This account of the ministry of Jesus stands as one of the Four Gospels accepted as canonical, but it is clear, even from a cursory glance, that this Gospel is in a class by itself and unlike the Synoptic Gospels. To be sure, both sets of Gospels describe in general outline the course of Jesus' earthly life, but they diverge also in a remarkable way. John has consciously prefaced his Gospel with a lengthy prologue (1:1-18) tracing back the heritage of Jesus Christ not to David, Abraham, or Adam, but to his life in God in eternity. His title of Jesus as LOGOS (the Word) is unique, though it is later picked up in the EPISTLES OF JOHN. Also remarkable is the clear ascription of Deity to the incarnate Christ in titles such as "I am" (8:58) and "my Lord and my God" (20:28).

At a lower level, John's narrative stands apart from the other Gospels: he remarks that Jesus visited Jerusalem five times (2:13; 5:1; 7:10; 10:22-23; 12:12) over against a single visit in Mark (11:1 ff.). The Temple is cleansed at the outset of Jesus' ministry (2:13 ff.), not at the close as in Mark 11:15-19. There is no Last Supper with teaching on "This is my body and blood" in John; instead he has a Eucharistic discourse set in the synagogue at Capernaum (6:25-59). Then, the date of the Crucifixion is different. In the Synoptics, Jesus died after Passover had commenced (Mark 14:12); in John his death coincided in time with the sacrifice of the Passover lambs in the Temple (John 18:28; 19:30 ff.). The last piece of evidence puts us on the track of John's purpose. He is less interested in strict historical detail than in drawing out the theological significance of the historical events, for it is part of his plan to depict Jesus as the lamb of God (1:29). Events that have created historical difficulties (for example, the changing of water into wine, 2:1-10, and the raising of Lazarus, 11:1-53, which are both absent from the Synoptics) may well be seen as symbolic in the evangelist's intention, even if they do rest on some historical reminiscence. Clearly John is looking back on the life of Jesus through the prism of the Resurrection and exaltation of his Lord and casting back his heavenly glory onto the canvas of what the evangelist sees and describes. (See 2:21-22; 7:39; 11:51, 52; 12:16 for data to support this conclusion, which is really the key to an understanding of this "spiritual Gospel," as Clement of Alexandria rightly called it).

Purpose. No one is absolutely sure why John wrote this Gospel—except for the one clue he has left us in 20:31: "These are written that you may believe that Jesus is the Christ, the Son of God, and that believing you may have life in his name." Strictly speaking, the verse as quoted refers to the witness of selected "signs" that Jesus performed throughout his ministry, beginning with 2:10. C. H. Dodd and R. T. Fortna have helpfully postulated a "Book of Signs" as the first draft of the Gospel that the evangelist had enriched, and we may infer from 20:30 that he had other data on which he might have drawn. The simplest view is to see John as writing to convince his fellow Jews that Jesus was the true Messiah of Israel and so to encourage them to accept him as such; he therefore appealed to OT prophecy as fulfilled in Jesus. At the same time, John passed a negative judgment on Abraham (8:48-59) and Moses (1:17), whose time as religious authorities had now been superseded (5:45-47). By his "signs" (John's word for Jesus' miracles), he is shown to be the rightful Messiah and the true hope of Israel's expectation.

At the opposite end of the spectrum others, such as Bultmann, have argued that John's Gospel has to be read on its contemporary background, which is said to be the Hellenistic world of Gnosticism, that is, an amalgam of various religious and philosophical movements in the Greco-Roman world of the first century, all seeking to meet the human quest for unity with the Divine and to explain life's mysteries. Hence Jesus is seen as universal "reason" (logos), a Stoic term, enlightening the world (1:9), and as "the truth" (14:6), replacing all that is shadowy and unreal. The contrast between the two worlds—one above (heaven), the other below (earth)—is basic to the Gnostic world view and plays a significant role in the Fourth Gospel (8:23). One other suggestion that Jesus in this Gospel moves through history as a Greek hero without real contact with earthly realities—a tenet in docetism (a belief that denied Christ's full humanity)—has been made, but not convincingly. See, on the contrary, the evidence in 1:14; 11:25; 12:20-36, as well as the fact that Jesus died a true death, a point John wants to establish (19:31-37).

A mediating view that has much to recommend it sees John as using the material he has drawn from a Palestinian tradition of Jesus' conflict with the Jewish leaders of his day in order to defend the gospel in a Jewish-Hellenistic society in Asia Minor. We should therefore see the Johannine Gospel as having two editions: an earlier statement of Jesus' life in Galilee and Jerusalem, in debate with the Jewish hierarchy, his rejection in Jerusalem, his teaching to the Twelve, leading to his death and resurrection; and a final redaction as the material is edited and employed to assist the church in Ephesus in its dialogue with the Jewish-Hellenistic synagogues of the Roman province of Asia. In this view we can explain why the form of the Gospel is cast as a trial narrative, with witnesses (John the Baptist, Moses, Jesus' works, the disciples, the various men and women on the scene in chaps. 3, 4, 5, 11) for the defense called to bear witness. The final version was written as a Gospel and so made available to John's church in Asia.

Author and Date. If there is plausibility in the third option (above), we can also explain the ambiguous church tradition that (a) associated this Gospel with John the apostle and located his final residence at Ephesus; (b) knew of another person called "John the elder," who was also linked with the apostles but was not one of them. He too was located at Ephesus. So it becomes feasible to see the first draft of the Gospel as emanating from an eyewitness source—JOHN THE APOSTLE—but subsequently taken over, edited, and published by a church leader named "the elder," whose similar influence in the community at Ephesus is seen in 21:24-25 as well as in those key places where Jesus or the narrator speaks in the first person plural (1:14, 16; 3:11; 4:22; 9:4). The date for the final work is around A.D. 90-100, and the place of publication is almost certainly Ephesus.

Theology. This Gospel has always had a treasured place in Christian thought, devotion, and esteem. Its main contribution is Christological, since we are reading in John the distillation of NT teaching on the person and achievement of Jesus Christ after some decades have elapsed since the Incarnation, death, and glorification of the church's Lord. Two key terms are Logos (word) and parakletos (helper, advocate, comforter). Logos means that the revelation of God is expressed in the coming to this world of one who was with God and existed as God in eternity (1:1-18). "Paraclete" (14:15-17, 26; 15:26-27; 16:7-11, 13-14) is used of the Holy Spirit who, sent by the Father, is Jesus' alter ego after his leaving the disciples. The paraclete abides with the church to ensure Christ's unseen, yet real, presence, and to evoke Christ's reality through his words (6:63; 14:26) and works, notably in the sacraments (6:48-51, 53-58; 13:10).

R.M.

JOHN OF DAMASCUS (about 675-749). Authoritative Greek Orthodox theologian, defender of images, early advocate of the Virgin Mary's sinlessness and assumption into heaven. Born in Damascus, he lived under Moslem rule and succeeded his father in financial services for the caliph of Damascus. Sometime between 715 and 730 he joined the Monastery of St. Sabas near Jerusalem. He was ordained and under Moslem protection wrote against Byzantine Emperor Leo III's edict in 725 condemning icons and images in worship and against the subsequent destruction of images by Leo III and his son Constantine V.

His greatest theological work, Source of Knowledge, comprehensively synthesized six hundred years of Greek theology. Part I dealt with Aristotle's philosophical terms, in preparation for theology. Part II identified over one hundred heresies and touched on iconoclasts. Part III presented GREEK ORTHODOX faith—Trinity, Christology, hypostatic union of God and man in Jesus, Mariology, images, Resurrection, etc. He disclaimed originality and subordinated reason to faith, the state to the church, and human learning to Scripture. He praised images, saying God used the visible incarnation to reveal the invisible Divine, but declared images of saints must not be worshiped. This work became standard for the Greek Church. His Sacred Parallels was a collection of patristic passages on vices and virtues. In his final years John preached throughout Syria against iconoclasts. His poetry influenced Greek liturgy, and two hymns survive: "Come, ye faithful, raise the strain," and "Day of Resurrection." Both Rome and Constantinople canonized him.

C.M.

JOHN OF THE CROSS (1542-91). Spanish mystic, and founder of Discalced Carmelites, part of the CATHOLIC REFORMATION. Of poor parentage, he was schooled by the Jesuits, became a Carmelite monk in 1563, and studied at Salamanca from 1564 to 1568. Ordained in 1567, he grew increasingly dissatisfied with lax monastic discipline and soon joined in TERESA OF AVILA's monastic reforms. He assisted Teresa in establishing fourteen Discalced Carmelite branches for men, who stressed ascetic exercises, self-mortification, and mystical ecstasies. John was master of the Discalced Carmelite College at Alcala (1571-72). He aroused enmity there and was imprisoned by unreformed Carmelites in 1577. Nine months later he escaped. Amid bitterness, the Discalced Carmelites and the unreformed separated. Later John established a college at Breza and was rector from 1579 to 1582. He was prior at Granada and later at Segovia, but rival factions of Discalced Carmelites forced him from office. Finally he was banished to remote Andalusia in 1591, where he died.

His devotional, mystical masterpiece, Dark Night of the Soul, appeared about 1587. It sought to guide seekers through purging stages of darkness to union with God. Sensual darkness comes from relinquishing all desires for earthly goods, spiritual darkness from relinquishing all spiritual desires, even the desire to be with God. Both stages are painful preludes to complete surrender in faith to God's love and grace. This brings triumph over the dark nights of the soul and union with the Divine. His commentaries on his poetry provide a rare record of the mystical process.

C.M.

JOHN PAUL I, POPE. Albino Luciani (1912–78), pope, September 3–28, 1978. The son of an Italian socialist bricklayer, he was ordained in 1935, earned a doctorate in theology, taught briefly, and rapidly rose from bishop (1958) to archbishop (1969) to cardinal (1973). He opposed Marxism and in doctrine and discipline was a traditionalist.

C.M.

JOHN PAUL II, POPE. Karol Wojtyla (1920– ), chosen pope in 1978, is the first Polish pope and the first non-Italian pope in 455 years. He is known for his journeys abroad, traditional doctrines, friendly personality, and concern for human rights and justice. Born in Wadowice, Poland, to working-class parents, Wojtyla attended the University of Krakow, which the Nazis closed in 1939. While working in a quarry and factories, he studied at an underground seminary. Ordained in 1946, he received a doctorate in philosophy at Rome's Angelicum University in 1948. Returning to Poland, he taught at Lublin, published several books, and became auxiliary bishop of Kraków (1958), archbishop (1964), and cardinal (1967). Popular with Polish workers, he demonstrated practical negotiating skills with Communists. By taking the name John Paul as pope, he signaled admiration for three predecessors, but has acted independently. Proficient in six languages, John Paul has demonstrated concern for people and traditional views on doctrine and discipline.

Courtesy of Religious News Service

Pope John Paul II

During his first year as pope, John Paul visited the Dominican Republic and Mexico, speaking out against Marxist influences and warning against identifying the church with one political system; in Poland, he said the Mass in Warsaw and Kraków, conferred with Communist leader Edward Gierek, and stopped briefly at Auschwitz. Huge crowds greeted him everywhere. In the fall of that same year, John Paul visited Ireland and the United States, speaking before the United Nations General Assembly in New York, talking with President Jimmy Carter and journeying to Boston, Philadelphia, Des Moines, and Chicago. Also during his first year John Paul issued his first encyclical, Redemptor Hominis, in which he criticized both capitalist and Communist materialism and excoriated governments that stifle human freedom and dignity.

In 1980 John Paul journeyed to six African nations, France, thirteen cities in Brazil, and West Germany. In 1981 he was seriously wounded by an assassin's bullets on May 25, in St. Peter's Square. That same year he visited Pakistan, the Philippines, Guam, Japan, and Alaska en route, speaking for fundamental human rights and against nuclear arms. Another encyclical, on God's mercy, said that divine favor already received should motivate social justice; and another, aimed at Poland, said labor unions are indispensable.

In 1982 John Paul again visited West Africa, Portugal, Great Britain, Scotland, Wales, and Argentina. He also received Ronald Reagan and the PLO's Yasir Arafat in Rome.

John Paul marked Luther's five-hundredth anniversary by preaching in a Lutheran church in Rome in December. He also journeyed to Central America and Haiti and returned to Poland for eight days, where he conferred with General Wojciech Jaruzelski and labor's Solidarity leader Lech Walesa. In January 1983 he approved a new canon law code that granted more authority to bishops but curbed the authority of councils.

John Paul stands opposed to a married priesthood, abortion, birth control, polygamy, ordination of women, secular dress for nuns, and clerical involvement in politics, and has censured Swiss theologian Hans Küng and cautioned Dutch theologian Edward Schillebeeckx. The full impact of his pontificate remains yet to be assessed.

C. M.

From Atlas of the Bible (Thomas Nelson & Sons Limited)

Remains of the fortress of Machaerus, where tradition says John the Baptist was imprisoned and suffered death

JOHN THE BAPTIST. The ministry of Jesus began with the mission of John the Baptist for, in the preaching and baptism of John, Jesus received his first impulse to public action. No man exerted a greater influence over Jesus; for him, John was the greatest of the prophets. Yet he was more than a prophet. John's career marked the boundary between the Old Age and the New Age (Matt. 11:7-15; Luke 7:24-30; 16:16; Acts 1:21; 10:36-37).

John was a wonder-child, born to a priestly couple in their old age. For some years before his "manifestation to Israel," John lived "in the wilderness of Judea" (Luke 1:5-25; 2:57-80). Since the discovery of the Dead Sea Scrolls, it has been thought probable that John's wilderness sojourn was not solitary; perhaps he lived for a time in a community of the ESSENES. Josephus, first-century Jewish historian, writes that the Essenes "adopted other men's children" and "molded them according to their principles." All speculation aside, the locale of John's ministry and the residence of these dissident priests were inspired by the same summons of Isaiah: "in the wilderness prepare the way of the Lord" (Isa. 40:3; Mark 1:3). John's eschatological message of imminent judgment closely resembles that held by the Dead Sea sect, but John's rite of baptism differs in meaning from the "purifying waters" of the Essenes.

John's public proclamation demanded "a baptism of repentance for the forgiveness of sins" (Mark 1:4; Luke 3:3). He also "preached, saying, 'After me comes he who is mightier than I, the thong of whose sandals I am not worthy to stoop down and untie. I have baptized you with water; but he will baptize you with the Holy Spirit [and with fire]' " (Mark 1:7-8; compare Matt. 3:11 and Luke 3:16). In the Synoptic Gospels there is a tendency to identify John with (in Jewish eschatology) the Elijah who is to come (Matt. 11:14; 17:10-12; also Mal. 4:5-6). In the Fourth Gospel, John is merely the "voice" of Isaiah 40:3, and John's identity with Elijah or the Messiah is sharply denied (John 1:6-8, 19-22; 3:25-36).

John's preaching was intensely eschatological. He heralded the imminent day of judgment; God's retributive punishment would soon fall upon the apostate within Israel. The merits of the patriarchs would provide no escape and descent from Abraham would afford no advantage. Only sincere repentance would avert "the wrath to come," and this must lead to baptism. Moreover, those who confessed their sins and received John's baptism as a sign of this repentance were commanded to "bear good fruit," following in "the way of righteousness" taught by John. Luke reports that John's preaching aroused the conscience of special groups, tax collectors and soldiers, who were especially susceptible to expropriating goods belonging to others (Luke 3:10-14). All of his disciples were taught the disciplines of prayer and fasting (Luke 5:33; 11:1; Mark 2:19-20).

First-century Jewish sources provide no exact antecedents for or parallels to John's baptism. Cleansing ceremonies, using the waters of purification, are prescribed in the Torah, and the priest-prophet Ezekiel declared that God, at the endtime, will purify the people from their defilement with clean water and give them a new heart and a new spirit (Ezek. 36:22-36). At the time of John, conditions in the land promoted an elaboration of the purity laws. The Pharisees who did not retreat into the wilderness, but lived among the corrupt, attached great importance to ceremonial bathing. The custom of baptizing Gentile converts to Judaism is closer to John's rite, although it cannot be proved that proselyte baptism antedates John. If the practice was current it is possible that John deliberately applied to the "children of Abraham" a rite devised by them to benefit pagans, thus evidencing his conviction that the whole Jewish nation needed to be reconstituted as the people of God. It seems that the form of John's baptism was determined by the nature of his proclamation. Whatever partial parallels existed in Jewish practice, John's imagery was drawn from Jewish apocalyptic eschatology, which represented divine judgment as a stream of fire, sometimes issuing from the throne of God or as the fiery breath of the Messiah (Dan. 7:10-11; II Esd. 13:10-11; II Thess. 2:8; Rev. 8:5; 20:9-15). Repentant individuals were called to enact in advance their acceptance of the eschatological judgment of God. The uniqueness of John's baptism consists in the fact that it dramatized the substance of his eschatological proclamation.

From the perspective of the Gospels, the climax of John's mission was his baptism of Jesus. Given the significance of the rite as a confession of sin, it is not surprising that some early Christians were puzzled by this event. Only Matthew, among the three early Gospels, offers an explanation. In defense of his baptism, Jesus' response to John's hesitation is: "we do well to conform in this way with all that God requires" (Matt. 3:15 NEB). The Son's perfect obedience, and the Father's choice of his "beloved Son" foretell the significance of Jesus' work (compare John 5:20, 30).

Following Jesus' baptism, John carried his campaign to Samaria. Jesus remained in Judea and conducted a brief baptismal ministry of his own. Some of John's disciples attached themselves to Jesus: was Jesus' withdrawal to Galilee prompted by a wish to avoid potential rivalries? (John 3:22-24; 1:35-37.) Upon his return to the original locale of his ministry, John was arrested by Herod Antipas, whose territory included Perea as well as Galilee. Antipas may have feared the rapid expansion of the Baptist movement, as Josephus says. The Synoptic evangelists report that John had denounced Antipas's marriage to his sister-in-law, a denunciation that also had political fallout (Mark 6:7-29; Luke 3:19). While in prison (at the remote Perea fortress, Machaerus), John sent a message to Jesus: "Are you he who is to come, or shall we look for another?" (Matt. 11:2-6; Luke 7:18-23). John's reaction to Jesus' reply is not recorded.

John's influence extended beyond his martyrdom. Six years later Herod Antipas was defeated by a Nabatean army, an event regarded by some as a divine punishment for Herod's murder of the Baptist. From Acts 19:1-7 we learn of a group in Ephesus who claimed to have been baptized with John's baptism. The fourth evangelist's treatment of the Baptist suggests the presence of persons ascribing to John a messianic status. The historical connection between John's followers and the Mandaeans, surviving today in Iraq, is uncertain. In spite of the existence of these later rivalries, it is clear that from earliest times Christians have believed that John was the divinely appointed "forerunner" of Jesus the Christ, that in his life and death he prepared the way of the Lord.

J. L. P.

JOHN XXIII, POPE (1881-1963). Born Angelo Giuseppe Roncalli, John XXIII was one of Catholicism's most active and independent popes (1958-63). He convoked the twenty-first Ecumenical Council, VATICAN II (1962-65), which brought a new spirit of openness, cooperation, and collegiality to Roman Catholicism, but no major doctrinal changes. Born in a small village near Bergamo, Italy, into a tenant farm family of thirteen children, Roncalli began training for the priesthood at an early age. He studied at Bergamo seminary and the Pontifical Seminary in Rome, receiving ordination and a doctorate of theology in 1904. Until World War I he worked in his home diocese as secretary to the bishop. During the war he served in the Italian medical corps and as a military chaplain. Afterward he taught religious history at the Bergamo seminary and published several works. For sixty-seven years he kept a spiritual diary, published in English in 1965 as the Journal of a Soul.

Recalled to Rome in 1921 to help reorganize the Congregation for the Propagation of the Faith, Roncalli soon began serving as a Vatican diplomat when Pope Pius XI in 1925 made him an archbishop in Greece and appointed him apostolic visitor to Bulgaria. He rose rapidly in the diplomatic service, was elevated to apostolic delegate in Bulgaria (1930), went to Istanbul as apostolic delegate to Turkey and Greece (1934), and became papal nuncio to Paris, France (1944). Roncalli's diplomatic service prepared him for papal leadership. The approach of World War II while he was in Turkey forced him to deal with different warring factions without losing their respect. In France he had to deal with difficult post-war problems.

Courtesy of Religious News Service

Pope John XXIII

In 1953 Archbishop Roncalli was made a cardinal and patriarch of Venice. There he became widely known for his accessibility, his concern for ordinary people, and his staunch stand against Communism in Italy.

On October 28, 1958, he became Pope John XXIII on the eleventh ballot of the College of Cardinals. Almost seventy-seven years old when elected, Pope John XXIII was expected to be an interim caretaker of the papacy. Yet during his four and a half years as pope, he revitalized Roman Catholicism. Without departing from traditional doctrine, Pope John encouraged liberal trends. He explored ways to improve relations with other churches, and in 1961 he sent official observers to the World Council of Churches at New Delhi. A major encyclical, Mater et Magistra (1961), dealt with post-war colonialism and problems of labor. Fifty million Catholics in a changing world had been caught in the orbit of Communism in Russia and China. An outstanding encyclical, Pacem in Terris (1963), pleaded with the nations of the world to promote peace and better living conditions. John created twenty-three new cardinals and increased the College of Cardinals from seventy to seventy-five. He also revived the custom of papal visits to prisons and hospitals in Rome. Widely beloved as a pastor, he convoked Vatican II to prepare the church for its complex role in society. Many Protestant theologians were invited as official observers and consultants. C.M.

JOHNSON, PAUL E. (1898–1974). Psychologist and author, born at Niantic, Connecticut. He graduated from Cornell University in 1920, received an A.M. from the University of Chicago (1921), a S.T.B. (1923), and a Ph.D (1928) from Boston University School of Theology.

Johnson taught at Brown University, West China Union University, Hamline University, and was dean and professor of philosophy and religion at the Boston University School of Theology (1941–57). He then became professor of psychology and pastoral counseling (1957–63) and director of pastoral counseling services. He had a long association with the American Association of Pastoral Counselors and was influential in its work. His basic books are Psychology of Religion, 1945 (rev. 1959), Psychology and Pastoral Care, 1953; Personality and Religion, 1957. I.C.

JOHNSON, SAMUEL (1709–84). Poet, essayist, and critic. He was born in Lichfield, Staffordshire, the son of Michael Johnson, a bookseller and sheriff, and Sarah Ford, a devout woman with Calvinist leanings. Educated at Pembroke College, Oxford, he married Elizabeth Porter in 1735. In 1737, with his pupil David Garrick, Johnson went to London, where he wrote criticism of Shakespeare. His eight-volume edition of the bard was published in 1765.

After eight years of work Johnson published his Dictionary of the English Language in 1755. From 1750 to 1752 he edited the Rambler and thereafter the Idler. His other major work was the Lives of the English Poets (1781). His Prayers and Meditations (1785) included such hymns as "Life of Ages, Richly Poured," "City of God, How Broad and Far," "Father, in Your Mysterious Presence Kneeling." Johnson met his biographer James Boswell, then twenty-two, in 1763. A champion of the poor and oppressed, debtors, prostitutes, and blacks, Johnson in his religious life was given to melancholy and heart-searching. N.H.

JONAH. The name of a prophetic figure whose story is told in an OT book that bears his name. The book of Jonah is different from other prophetic literature in that it is not a collection of the oracles, visions, or sermons of a prophetic figure, but rather is a narrative about an episode in the life of such a figure. In fact, the only prophetic oracle in the book of Jonah is the eight-word message of 3:4b.

Jonah, the son of Amittai, is otherwise known to us only from a reference in II Kings 14:25, in which we are told that he was a native of the northern community of Gath-hepher. We also learn there that he was a contemporary of King Jeroboam II of Israel (about 786–746 B.C., which means that he was also a contemporary of AMOS and HOSEA), and that he predicted a favorable outcome for Jeroboam's military adventures.

In the book of Jonah the Lord commands the prophet to preach repentance to NINEVEH, the capital of the great Assyrian Empire. Instead, however, Jonah refuses and flees on a ship bound for Tarshish. Once on the high seas, the ship encounters a storm and the members of the crew conclude that some deity has been offended. By means of the casting of lots it is determined that the guilty party is Jonah. Jonah admits that he is fleeing from the Lord, and he suggests that the sailors cast him overboard in order to appease the Lord's wrath. When this is done the storm dies away. In the meantime, Jonah has been swallowed by a great fish and, after he cries for mercy from the belly of the fish, he is vomited upon the shore.

Once more the Lord commands Jonah to proceed to Nineveh to preach to the people. This time the prophet obeys and discovers that, when he preaches, his words result in the repentance of the Ninevites. Yet Jonah is bitter because he had hoped that these despised people would be destroyed. In anger Jonah retreats to the countryside, where the Lord causes a plant to grow up so that the prophet is shaded from the sun. Later the Lord sends a worm to destroy the plant, and Jonah's anger is intensified. When Jonah expresses his feelings, the Lord responds by pointing out that the welfare of a city is of far more importance than a plant to whose growth Jonah had contributed nothing.

There are several important reasons for concluding that the tale of Jonah is not based on historical record. For example, in 3:3 the statement is made that Nineveh is so large that it takes the traveler three days to cross through it. On the other hand, archaeologists have determined that the diameter of the city walls was about two miles. Another problem is related to the "great fish." The difficulty here is not so much that of the ability of the fish to swallow a man, but whether a person could survive three days and nights in the stomach of a fish (1:17) and compose there a psalm in the style of classical Hebrew poetry (2:2-9).

For these reasons and others (some of which have to do with matters of literary style and vocabulary), many scholars have concluded that the story of Jonah is either a parable or an allegory that borrowed the figure of Jonah from II Kings 14:25. Whichever literary genre the story fits, however, its central message is clear: the love of the God of Israel extends to all peoples upon the earth, even those who are as different and as hated as the citizens of Nineveh. Moreover, God's people Israel are under special responsibility to be the means by which God's love is made known.

It is not possible to establish with precision the date or location of the writing of the book of Jonah. Nor do we know its author. It is likely, however, that it was written well into the postexilic period by someone in the Jerusalem community who wished to counteract the prevailing mood of exclusivism (see Ezra 10; Neh. 13) with a reminder of Israel's international missionary obligation expressed so eloquently by the Second Isaiah in the period before the restoration (see Isa. 42:5-9).

One other word is in order about the nature of this literature. A great deal of heat has been expended in the argument over whether the story of Jonah "really happened," and in the midst of that controversy reference has been frequently made to Jesus' statement in Matthew 12:39-41. It should be remembered that literary authorship was viewed by ancient men and women (including those to whom Jesus spoke) in a manner different from that in which it is viewed today. One should not stumble over whether the book of Jonah is "historical" any more than over whether Jesus' parable of the good Samaritan or the prodigal son are "historical." The truth to which the narratives point lies within the narratives themselves.

J.D.N.

JONATHAN ("Yahweh has given"). The oldest son of King SAUL and Ahinoam (I Sam. 14:49-50), whose relationship with David became an ideal of what friendship can be. The fact that Jonathan was heir to the throne and yet supported David for it, and even agreed to be his advisor (I Sam. 23:16-18), makes it even more unusual.

Jonathan first appears as victor at Geba, a Philistine fortress (I Sam. 13:3). He and his armor-bearer then successfully attacked another garrison alone (I Sam. 14; note in v. 14 the devotion of the armor-bearer). His pact of love and loyalty with David (I Sam. 20:12-23) led him to defiance and deception of his father at risk to his own life.

Jonathan died with his father Saul in battle with the Philistines at Mt. Gilboa (I Sam. 31:1-13). His body, rescued by the citizens of Jabesh-gilead, was buried at Jabesh, but David later reburied the remains in the land of Benjamin (II Sam. 21:12-14). When David learned of his death, he uttered a moving elegy (II Sam. 1:17-27).

N.H.

JONES, E. STANLEY (1884-1973). Renowned Methodist missionary and educator in India. Born in Clarksville, Maryland, Jones was educated at City College, Baltimore, and Asbury College, Wilmore, Kentucky. In 1907 he became a missionary of the Methodist Episcopal Church in India, serving as pastor, superintendent, teacher, and evangelist in the Lucknow area, especially among the low castes of India. Convinced that Christianity had a valid message that complemented Indian culture and in turn gained enrichment, Jones became a missionary to virtually all of India, educated and uneducated alike. His first book, The Christ of the Indian Road (1925), received world acclaim and was translated into twelve languages. In 1926 Jones, a keen observer and scholar of Indian life, studied at the Bengal school of Rabindranath Tagore (1861-1941), Indian poet and winner of the Nobel Prize in 1913. Jones was elected Methodist bishop in 1928 but chose instead to continue his missionary work. Among his many publications are Christ and Human Suffering (1933), Christ's Alternative to Communism (1935), Christ and Present World Issues (1937), The Christ of the American Road (1944), Mahatma Gandhi—an Interpretation (1948), How to Be a Transformed Person (1951), and Mastery (1955).

C.M.

JONES, RUFUS M. (1863-1948). Noted American Quaker, author of fifty-seven books on Quaker spiritualism, history, mysticism, and practical Christianity. He was educated at Haverford College; traveled widely; served as principal of Oak Grove Seminary, 1889-93; professor of philosophy at Haverford College, 1904-34; editor of The American Friend, 1893-1912; and chairman of the American Friends Service Committee for European Reconstruction, 1917-28 and 1933-44. Jones took a strong interest in education and served on several college boards of trustees, including Yenching University in China. Theologically, he was a critical liberal who believed the vitality of religion was not in ritualism or doctrine but in an immediate inward experience of God expressed outwardly in holy living and active love. He remained open to new truths in philosophy and science, convinced that new discoveries could not undermine a genuine direct experience of God's love. Among his many publications were Practical Christianity: Essays on the Practice of Religion, 1902; A Dynamic Faith, 1900; Studies in Mystical Religion, 1909; Spiritual Reformers in the Sixteenth and Seventeenth Centuries, 1914; The Faith and Practice of the Quakers, 1927; Rethinking Religious Liberalism, 1935; The Eternal Gospel, 1938; The Flowering of Mysticism in the Fourteenth Century, 1939.

C.M.

JOPPA. A port city in Israel, south of Tyre and Sidon and thirty-five miles northwest of Jerusalem. Joppa is ancient, having been inhabited from prehistoric times. It is mentioned in ancient Assyrian and Egyptian writings, and in the OT (Josh. 19:46) it is connected to the tribe of Dan, although the Philistines controlled it until the time of David.

Joppa is from the Hebrew YAFO, meaning "beauty." It is now a suburb of Tel Aviv. Excavations begun in 1955 have uncovered a fortress dating to the eighteenth century B.C. Captured by the Egyptians in the sixteenth century B.C., Joppa served as a military outpost until the Philistines conquered it after the twelfth century B.C.

The prophet Jonah left on his journey to Tarshish from Joppa (Jonah 1:3). According to Acts 9:36-42, Peter raised Tabitha from the dead in Joppa, and he stayed at the house of Simon the tanner (Acts 9:43). It was in Joppa that Peter received the vision of clean and unclean foods, which revealed that all foods are clean for the Christian, and Peter also was directed to visit the centurion Cornelius in Caesarea. J.C.

JORAM. An abbreviated form of Jehoram, which means "Yahweh is exalted"; the name of both a king of Israel (Ephraim) and a king of Judah, whose reigns overlapped (about 849–842 B.C.).

(1) Jehoram (Joram) of Judah is mentioned in I Kings 22: 50; II Kings 1:17; and II Chronicles 21: 1, 3. He was the oldest son of King Jehoshaphat and shared power with his father for five years before becoming king himself. He ruled eight years and was a bad king; he permitted Baalism to be practiced. Elijah predicted he would die miserably and he did, according to II Chronicles 21:18 ff. Before that, Jehoram lost all his wives and sons, except Ahaziah, in war against the Philistines (II Chr. 21–22).

(2) Jehoram (Joram) of Israel was the son of Ahab and is mentioned in II Kings 3:1. His reign overlapped that of three kings of Judah—Jehoshaphat, Jehoram, and Ahaziah (II Chr. 22:1). The prophet Elisha preached during this period and helped with Jehoram's war against Moab. Jehoram was wounded at Ramoth-gilead and was later murdered at Gezeel by Jehu, who then took the throne (II Kings 8:29). The siege of Samaria by the Syrians (II Kings 6) under Benhadad may have taken place during Jehoram's reign. J.C.

JORDAN RIVER AND VALLEY. The Jordan is the most important river of Palestine, flowing southward from its headwaters in the region of Mount Hermon to its mouth at the northern end of the Dead Sea. This is a distance by air of little more than one hundred miles, yet the course followed by the river is much more than this due to its frequent bends and twists. As its headwaters lie more than a thousand feet

Courtesy of the Israel Government Tourist Office, Houston, Texas

The Jordan River in Upper Galilee, showing Mount Hermon in the background

From Atlas of the Bible (Thomas Nelson & Sons Limited)

The Jordan Valley, near the Dead Sea, south of Jericho, looking west above sea level and its mouth at nearly thirteen hundred feet below sea level, the river passes through a variety of climatic zones, as well as types of terrain. The Jordan lies in the bed of an extended geological rift that may be traced into East Africa.

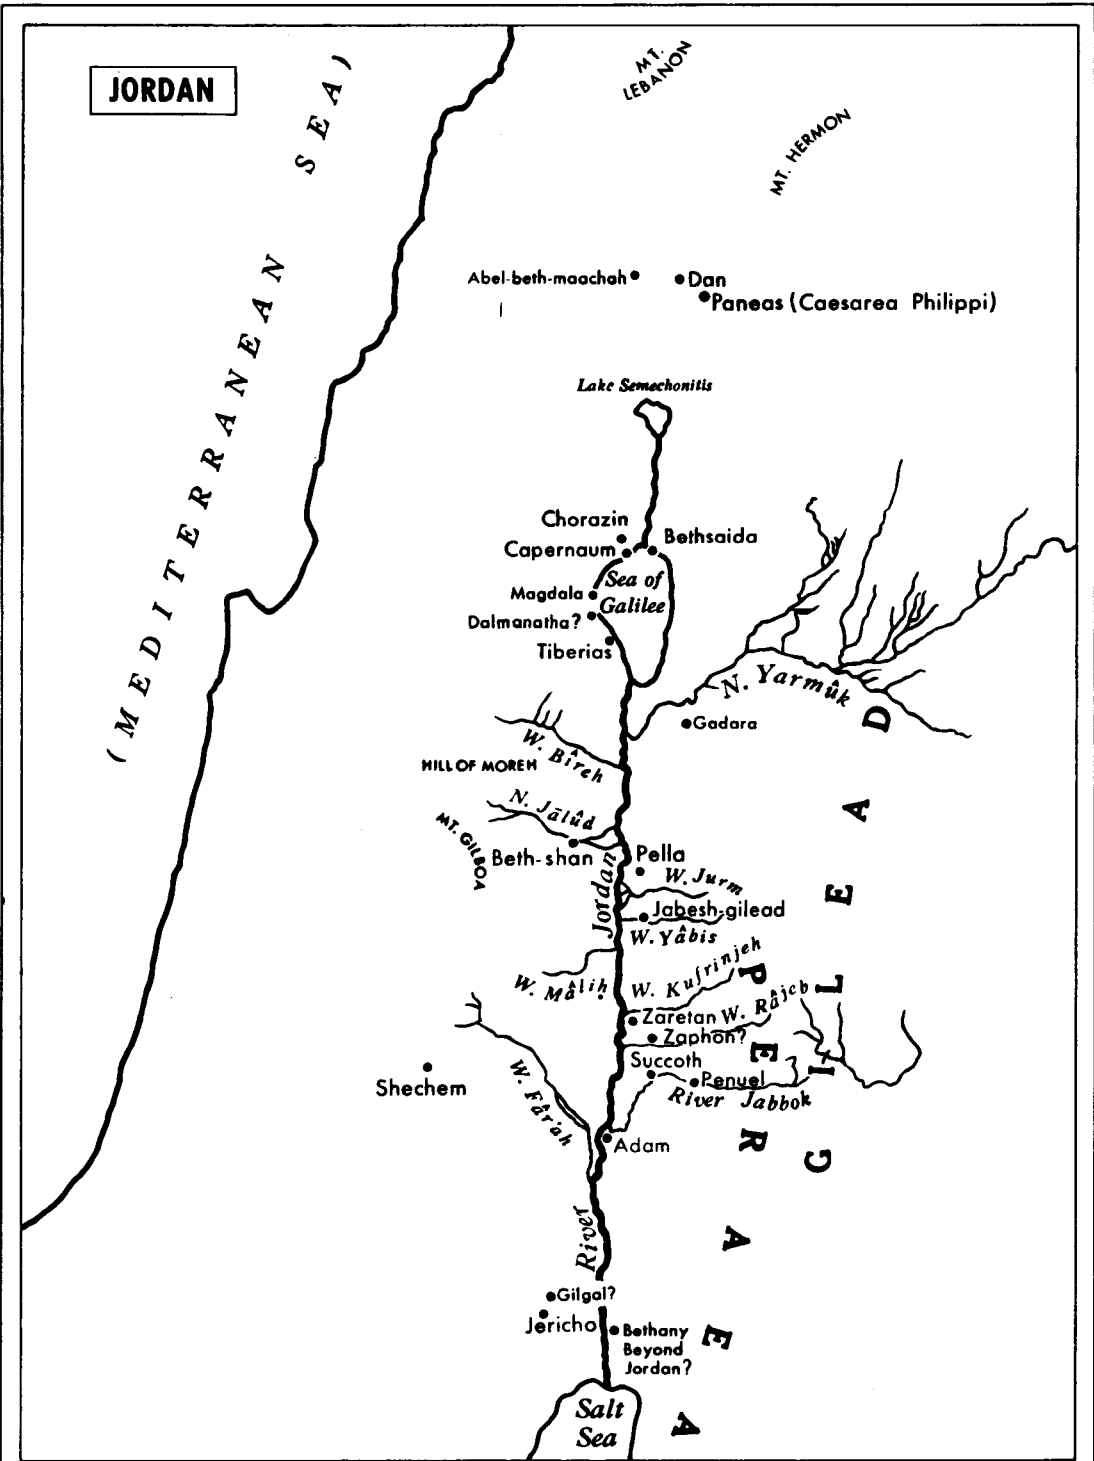

The stages of the river may be described as follows:

(1) From its headwaters to the area of former Lake Huleh. This is a distance of less than ten miles, and the course of the river here makes its way through areas of marsh where reeds and grasses grow in abundance. Lake Huleh, a body of water of some two or three miles in diameter has been drained in recent years for agricultural purposes.

(2) From the area of former Lake Huleh to the Sea of Galilee. Over this ten-mile course the river level falls nearly a thousand feet, thus much of its course is characterized by precipitous descent through rocky gorges. Just north of its entrance to the Sea of Galilee the river slows in order to traverse a plain near the village of Bet Zayda (Bethsaida).

(3) From the Sea of Galilee to the Dead Sea. For about twenty-five miles after the river leaves the Sea of Galilee it passes through an especially fertile region, one that has supported a variety of agricultural enterprises in both ancient and modern times. In this stretch of the Jordan, the river is joined by the Yarmuk, one of the important tributaries that feed the Jordan from the Transjordanian Plateau. During the rainy season the volume of water can be doubled at this confluence. Further along, the river enters successive geographical areas that grow increasingly hot and arid until it finally passes through the salty wasteland that embraces the northern approaches to the Dead Sea.

Because of its conspicuous nature the Jordan River and valley played a role in a number of memorable events from both OT and NT. Lot, upon his separation from Abraham, "chose for himself all the Jordan valley" (Gen. 13:11). Jacob wrestled with his adversary at the ford of the Jabbok, the Jordan's chief tributary in its final run to the Dead Sea (Gen. 32:22). Moses prayed in vain that the Lord would permit him to cross the river "and see the good land beyond [that is, to the west of the Jordan" (Deut. 3:25). When Israel, under the leadership of Joshua, arrived to cross the river, the flow of water stopped so that the people crossed over on "dry ground" (Josh. 3:17). When David and those loyal to him fled from his son

Absalom, the crossing was accomplished at night in order to avoid detection and "by daybreak not one was left who had not crossed the Jordan" (II Sam. 17:22). The most important NT event relating to the Jordan is the baptism of Jesus, which was performed by John the Baptizer, traditionally, but not certainly, near Jericho (Mark 1:5 and pars.). At several points in his ministry Jesus crossed the Jordan, perhaps the most celebrated such incident being his retreat with the disciples to the region of Caesarea Philippi, the occasion of Peter's confession of faith (Matt. 16:13 ff and pars.) The springs in the area (modern Banyas) form one of the sources of the Jordan.

Courtesy of the Israel Government Tourist Office, Houston, Texas

The southern part of the Jordan River

J.D.N.

JOSEPH, HUSBAND OF MARY. Surprisingly he is not named in Mark's Gospel, and the two allusions to him in the Fourth Gospel (John 1:45; 6:42) are indirect. This fact is usually explained by suggesting that Joseph was already deceased when Jesus began his public ministry. It is in the birth and infancy narratives of Matthew and Luke that Joseph figures most prominently. In Matthew 1:20 his ancestry is traced to David's family, and Luke recites Joseph's genealogy (Luke 3:23-37) mentioning him as the putative father of Jesus.

Both evangelists incorporate stories of a conception of Jesus by the Holy Spirit, without the agency of Joseph, who is said to be betrothed to MARY at that time (Matt. 1:18; Luke 1:27). The mystery of the birth of Jesus is communicated to Joseph in Matthew, whereas Luke records a visitation of God to Mary, and Joseph is passed over.

Joseph, however, fulfilled a parental role in taking Jesus to Jerusalem for purification rites (Luke 2:22), and led the family into Egypt, according to Matthew's version (Matt. 2:13-15), and back to Nazareth where they settled (Matt. 2:19-23). Joseph took Jesus to the holy city for Passover (Luke 2:41); at this point he fades from the Gospel picture.

The other family members, referred to in Mark 3:31, with parallels in Matthew 12:46 and Luke 8:19, may show how Joseph and Mary lived together as man and wife and produced children, both sons and daughters (Mark 6:3). But Christian conviction is divided on the status of these siblings as to whether they were genuine offspring of Mary and Joseph, or children of a former marriage of Joseph, or adopted children—all depending on one's attitude to the Catholic dogma of Mary as "ever virgin."

R.M.

JOSEPH OF ARIMATHEA. The fourfold Gospel tradition ascribes a role to this man as the one who took care of Jesus' body after it was lifted down from the cross (Matt. 27:57, 59; Mark 15:43, 45; Luke 23:50; John 19:38). He is said to be a native of Arimathea, a village in Judah but, as a member of the Jewish council or the Sanhedrin, he would be resident in Jerusalem at the time. He is called a rich man (Matt. 27:57, but Matthew's interests in OT fulfillment may reflect a dependence on the messianic prophecy of Isaiah 53:9) and a prominent citizen of the community (Mark 15:43). His wealth is seen not only in his provision of burial rites for Jesus' body but in his possession of a rock tomb in Jerusalem.

His Joseph is spoken of as a disciple who cherished messianic expectations (Luke 23:50-51) but secretly because of "fear of the Jews." This may mean a fear of being ostracized socially by his compatriots; it may also imply that contact with a corpse would render him unfit to share in the Passover celebrations (Num. 19:11).

In the NT apocryphal literature he is named as a friend of Pilate, and the one who cared for Mary, the Lord's mother, a role that other traditions, stemming from John 19:26-27, associate with John. Legend that dates from William of Malmesbury tells how the apostle Philip sent him to Britain in A.D. 63, where he founded the first Christian settlement in England, to be known as Glastonbury. A later tale, dated in the thirteenth century, describes him as bringing the holy grail to England and ridding Ireland of a plague of snakes.

R.M.

JOSEPH, SON OF JACOB. The eleventh son of JACOB by his favorite wife, Rachel. The account of the birth of Joseph to his hitherto barren mother and the significance of his name (which is derived from the Hebrew "he adds") is given in Genesis 30:22-24. However, the Joseph cycle itself begins only in Genesis 37. It then continues with the single interruption by the story of the levirate marriage of Judah and Tamar (Gen. 38) through the end of the book of Genesis. The very last verse of Genesis (50:26) records the death, embalment, and burial of Joseph in Egypt—a notice that is alluded to once again in the haste of the night of Exodus, when Moses is reported to have taken the bones of Joseph with Israel for subsequent reburial in the Land of Promise (Exod. 13:19).

The Joseph story differs from those of his forebears, the patriarchs, Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob, in many respects. Unlike them, Joseph has no real setting in the land of Palestine, but belongs above all to Egypt.

His story is one of the longest continuous, coherent narratives in the OT. With setting, plot, and character development, it has all the marks of a literary piece that did not undergo the same kind of oral transmission as was the case with most of the earlier material in Genesis. Furthermore, Joseph is presented in the narrative as a kind of ideal wise man, a dream interpreter, counselor to Pharaoh, as judicious as Solomon was in his day. For all these reasons, some recent scholarship has tended to see Joseph as a portrait of the ideal courtier and wise man in the court of the united monarchy, perhaps during the reign of Solomon. That Joseph did effectively serve as a role model can be proved very simply by comparing him to Daniel, and particularly the account of Daniel's interpretation of Nebuchadnezzar's dream in Daniel 2. Daniel is a new Joseph in that chapter. Just as Joseph did in Genesis 41, Daniel succeeds in making sense of the king's dream when all the indigenous wise men and dream interpreters failed. He offers wise counsel to the king and helps him come to terms with the prophecy contained in the dream, and he does all this on the basis of empowerment by God, which grew out of his own life of faithfulness.

Perhaps, therefore, the Joseph cycle of Genesis 37-50 should be understood as a kind of romance, emanating from those courtly wisdom circles that first set down Israel's religious tradition in writing, which was designed to depict the best of all possible governors at a time when kingship had reached its fullest flower in Israel itself.

Of course, it is also the task of the Joseph story to transport Jacob's sons to Egypt, from which they would reappear centuries later as refugees and heirs of a promise. That part of the story begins with a dream. It was a dream guaranteed to get Joseph into trouble with his eleven brothers, who were already jealous of him because his father Jacob preferred him to all the others and had given him "a long robe with sleeves" (Gen. 37:3). He dreamed that the sheaves that they were binding in the field all stood up and that the eleven sheaves of the brothers bowed down to his sheaf. He dreamed that the sun and the moon and eleven stars bowed down to him. Dreams like these are the fuel of family feuds; even his father rebuked him for the implication that he and Rachel would bow down to this second youngest of all the sons (Gen. 37:10).

Not long afterward the brothers had an opportunity to punish this upstart. As they were tending the flocks near Dothan, they saw him coming from his father's house and plotted to kill him. Only the intervention of Reuben spared his life, but the compromise resulted in Joseph's being cast into a pit and ultimately sold to a passing caravan of ISHMAELITES who in turn sold him to the Egyptian captain of the guard, Potiphar. The brothers returned to Jacob with the torn and bloody robe of Joseph and told him that a wild beast had killed his beloved son (37:35).

Because he was wise and witty, Joseph rose quickly in Potiphar's household to become his chief overseer. Because Joseph was "handsome and good-looking" (39:6), he became the object of the lust of Potiphar's wife and the victim of a blackmail scam. But even in the prison in which he was cast he stood out, and the Lord gave him favor in the sight of the keeper of the prison (39:21). It was here that he earned his initial reputation as a dream interpreter as well, correctly understanding the dreams of Pharaoh's chief butler and chief baker. The same butler later told Pharaoh himself of the existence of a Hebrew who could interpret dreams, and because Joseph wisely understood that Pharaoh's dream of seven fat cattle and seven lean cattle represented years of plenty and years of famine respectively, he came to be the vizier in charge of all of Pharaoh's lands. Joseph rode in a chariot second only to Pharaoh and before him they cried, "Bow the knee!" (Gen. 41:43). Pharaoh even gave Joseph a wife, Asenath, the daughter of an Egyptian priest (Gen. 41:45). She bore him his sons Manasseh and Ephraim (41:50-52).

The grain that was laid aside from the seven years of plenty ultimately brought Joseph back into contact with his father and his brothers. The seven lean years affected not only Egypt but Canaan as well, and when Jacob heard that there was grain in Egypt, he sent ten of the brothers to buy some (42:1-3). Only Benjamin stayed at home. In the chapters that follow, the Joseph saga spins out the theme of the gradual disclosure of hidden identity of the ex-slave to his brothers. When the latter came before the governor to apply for grain purchases, they could not recognize him, but he immediately knew who they were and knew that his youngest brother Benjamin was not with them. They were then imprisoned for three days on suspicion of spying. Joseph released them with their grain purchases but kept back his brother Simeon as a hostage. As proof of their credibility, he ordered them to come back again with their youngest brother. On the way home, they were horrified to discover their purchase money in the mouths of their sacks of grain, and of course could not imagine returning to Joseph for fear of being charged with theft. But the food supplies could not suffice for seven years of famine, so in time, in spite of the great reservations of their father Jacob, they returned to Joseph in Egypt with their youngest brother Benjamin. Joseph was secretly overjoyed to see his youngest brother and reassured his brothers that the money that was found in their sacks was a gift of God (43:23). A great feast was mounted, and Joseph could not control himself for weeping and had to excuse himself lest his joy be discovered (43:30).

The story concludes with another case of deception. Joseph orders his silver divining cup to be embedded in Benjamin's sack of grain. Not long after the brothers leave the city, they are pursued by a servant of Joseph and accused of stealing the silver cup. Judah offers to take the place of Benjamin for whatever punishment awaits him, because, he says, "When I come to your servant my father, and the lad is not with us . . . he will die; and your servants will bring down the gray hairs of your servant our father with sorrow to Sheol" (44:30-31). At that Joseph can bear the deception no longer; he sends everyone out and makes himself known to his brothers (45:1-3). In spite of their terror, they are forced to recognize that he is alive and that his life has meant life for all of the family in Canaan, and that all was according to the will of God (45:7-8). In the end Jacob is sent for and enriched with the material goods that constitute "blessing" in the OT—the choicest land in Egypt, flocks and cattle. In time he dies there, but only after blessing his descendants and watching them grow into a mighty people (Gen. 49-50).

The last chapter of the Joseph story (Gen. 50) recounts the return of the family to Canaan to bury their dead father Jacob in the cave of Machpelah near Hebron alongside his parents and grandparents. Following the period of mourning the brothers express fear that Joseph would now at last take revenge upon them for their evil deeds. But Joseph reassures them with the famous slogan that many regard as the theological key to the entire Joseph cycle: "Fear not, for am I in the place of God? As for you, you meant evil against me; but God meant it for good, to bring it about that many people should be kept alive, as they are today" (Gen. 50:19-20). This richly suggestive theological assessment appears to be saying that in the events of Joseph's life a kind of double causality was at work. That the brothers' intention in selling him into slavery was evil cannot be denied, and they are fully responsible for it. But in that very same evil act commissioned by human beings, God could commission good. God's intention could override the evil intention of the brothers and transform the story of the treacherous elimination of a troublesome younger brother into the story of the salvation of a whole people. By God's mysterious working in the words and deeds of Joseph, the stage was set for the emergence from Egypt of the Israel of a subsequent generation, a people ready to receive the land of their inheritance and capable of changing the course of human history.

W.S.T.

JOSEPHUS, FLAVIUS. A Jewish history writer, born about A.D. 37 and died around the turn of the century. He was born of noble and priestly ancestry in spite of his acquired Roman name. His personal history is recounted in his Life, which includes the information that he became pro-Roman in his outlook and remained so to the end of his life. For services to the empire he was rewarded with citizen rights as a client of the emperor, whose family name Flavius he took on.

Josephus' firm attachment to the Roman power explains the bias that runs through his writings. He opposed the Jewish uprising against Rome in A.D. 66, which led to an all-out war, though he was drawn in on the side of his nation and given a military command in Galilee. After being taken prisoner by the Roman army, he agreed to go over to the invaders' side and sought to win the favor of the commander VESPASIAN by foretelling that the latter would soon be emperor. At the siege of Jerusalem he acted as interpreter for the Roman leader TITUS, who was in charge of the operation. Following the fall of the city Josephus went to Rome, where he later died.

His writings are voluminous, including the account of The Jewish War of A.D. 66-73/74, whose outbreak he attributed to Zealot or nationalist pressure, which he dismissed as no better than gangsterism. In twenty books he published a vast history of the Jewish people, The Antiquities, in A.D. 93, and wrote this as a propaganda piece to commend the Jews to their pagan neighbors. An even stronger apologetic work is Against Apion.

Allowing for the partisan nature of Josephus' historic writings, he still remains an indispensable source of information, chiefly on the Herodian and Roman background to the politics of the centuries just prior to and extending into the NT period.

R.M.

JOSHUA. The successor to Moses (Num. 27:18-23; Deut. 31:7-29), whose leadership of Israel in the conquest of Canaan is recounted in the BOOK OF JOSHUA. His name, sometimes spelled Hoshea (compare Num. 13:8, 16), means "Yahweh is salvation." A Greek equivalent is "Jesus" (compare Acts 7:45; Heb. 4:8 KJV). In many ways, the OT writers present Joshua as a new Moses—prophet, priest, and king. As prophet, Joshua had a "spirit of wisdom" like Moses (Deut. 34:9; see Eccles. 46:1 of the Apocrypha, where he is called "successor of Moses in prophesying"). As priest, like Moses, he called upon the people to sanctify themselves and commanded the priests in the movements of the Ark of the Covenant (Josh. 3:5-6). As king, like Moses, he led Israel in the definitive covenant ceremony at Shechem (Josh. 24:1-28). From beginning to end, however, Joshua is preeminently a military figure. He first appears as the leader of Israel's war against Amalek (Exod. 17:8-16). With Caleb, he spied out the land of Canaan (Num. 13:16-29) and correctly argued, though failed to convince, that it should be taken (14:6-10). After Moses' death at the border of the Promised Land, Joshua led the attack on Canaan, beginning with the crossing of the Jordan (Josh. 3:7-4:24) and the destruction of Jericho (Josh. 6). The main thrust of his conquest, and that best supported by archaeological evidence, must have been toward the southern foothills and the Negev (10:28-43), with one major incursion into the north against Hazor (11:1-15). Joshua is reported to have died at the age of 110, and to have been buried at Timnath-serah in central Palestine (Josh. 24:29-30).

W.S.T.

JOSHUA, BOOK OF. The sixth book of the OT, which recounts the story of how, under the leadership of JOSHUA, son of Nun, Israel came into possession of the Promised Land. From one point of view the book may be seen as the necessary completion of the account of Israel's beginnings contained in the Pentateuch. Since the promise of the land to the fathers is fulfilled in the conquest, it may be most correct to think of the Hexateuch, or the first six books of the Bible, as the opening unit of the OT. On the other hand, Joshua can also be regarded as the first part of the great historical account, Joshua-II Kings, which describes the rise of Israel into a nation-state within the borders of the land of Canaan. Clearly its concern with both the fulfillment of ancient promise and the continuation of the Mosaic leadership tradition, and with the details of the history and geography of Canaan, make it a unique and transitional work.

Contents. The structure of the book of Joshua may be analyzed as follows: (a) Israel crosses the Jordan River and sacks Jericho, chapters 1-6; (b) the capture of Ai, chapters 7-8; (c) the alliance with Gibeon, chapter 9; (d) the conquest of the south, chapter 10; (e) the triumph in the north, chapter 11; (f) a summary of Joshua's victories, chapter 12; (g) division of the land, chapters 13-22; (h) Joshua's farewell address, chapter 23; (i) the covenant ceremony at Shechem, chapter 24.

As this analysis immediately shows, a major change in the contents of the book occurs at chapter 13. Whereas the first half of the book presents a highly schematized picture of total conquest under Joshua, part two (chaps. 13-19) begins with long lists of borders and towns belonging to the twelve tribes, followed by a list of the cities of refuge, chapter 20, and another of the Levitical cities, chapter 21. Conquest is no longer really the issue in these chapters, though 21:43-45 records the completion of the conquest of Canaan and sets the stage for the dismissal of the tribes of Reuben and Gad and the half-tribe of Manasseh to return to their inheritances on the east side of the Jordan (compare Josh. 22). The boundary lists given for Judah and Benjamin (15:21-62; 18:21-28) are relatively precise and are thought to represent the actual administrative lines of the period of the Judean monarchy. The lists given for the northern tribes, on the other hand, are vague and sketchy and may thus be the work of writers who worked long after the conquest and perhaps even after the northern kingdom of Israel had ceased to exist.

Authorship and Redaction. The foregoing evidence supports the contention that the book of Joshua as we now have it emanates from circles of writers living after the composition of the book of DEUTERONOMY (about 621 B.C.). It is seen to reflect the holy war concept and the reward-and-punishment theology so typical of Deuteronomy and the rest of the Deuteronomistic history. This theory of authorship might put the date of the composition of the book as we now have it as late as the time of the Babylonian exile (597-538 B.C.). It would explain the following phenomena: (a) the idealized picture of total conquest presented in chapters 1-12 contrasts sharply with the so-called "negative conquest list" of Judges 1:21, 27-35, which specifically excludes from the area captured by Joshua a number of the places here alleged to have been taken by him; (b) the relative obscurity of the tribal boundary lists given in chapters 13-22, especially touching those groups associated with the north; (c) the centrality assumed by Shechem and the covenant-making ceremony reported in chapter 24 and anticipated in 8:30-35 (a passage that may once have been the conclusion of the ceremony in chap. 24).

The account of recitation and sacrifice contained in Joshua 24 has great affinities with the combination of "little historical credo" and its affiliated religious rites preserved both in Deuteronomy 6:20-23 and in 26:1-11. The combination of these three passages may reflect an idealized picture of an annual "covenant renewal ceremony" in premonarchal times which was cherished in Deuteronomistic circles. Such a ceremony would have been the glue that held together the covenant federation of twelve tribes led by charismatic leaders like Joshua, the twelve "judges," and Samuel, whose federation was a conception about the distant past favored by later OT writers.

Unfortunately, Shechem figures not at all in Joshua outside these two texts; the principal sanctuaries in view seem to have been Gilgal (5:9) and Shiloh (18:1ff.). Coming as it does rather anticlimactically after Joshua's farewell speech, Joshua 24 may for all these reasons have to be understood not as a record of the polity actually established by Joshua, but as an expression of later idealism about how Israel's community life was organized in the golden age of pristine Yahwism.

Historical Reliability. Given the relatively late redaction of the book of Joshua and even acknowledging the presence in it of older sources, it would appear quite unlikely on the face of it that the book would provide a reliable guide to the actual history of the conquest of Canaan by the Israelites. G. Mendenhall doubts that a sweeping military victory of Israel over the Canaanite city states ever took place, but prefers to describe the conquest as a series of uprisings of oppressed and landless elements under the impetus of a small band of Hebrew outlaws coming across the Jordan. The German biblical scholar Martin Noth envisions a gradual infiltration of Israelite tribes from various directions and their slow rise to dominance in the land. The only extra-biblical testimony to the events reported in the book of Joshua has been brought up out of the soil by archaeologists, and that evidence is mixed. Just as Joshua would suggest, extensive destruction layers of the late Bronze Age (about 1300-1200 B.C.) have been found at Lachish (10:3ff.) and Hazor (11:1ff.). On the other hand, no evidence of any occupation whatever from the time of Joshua has come to light at the sites of Jericho, Ai, and Gibeon—all cities that figure prominently in the narratives of conquest in chapters 1–9. The conclusion must be drawn, then, that the book is best viewed not as a contemporary historical record, but as a theological work written in narrative form, which comes to provide a normative interpretation of the historical fact that Israel did emerge from utter marginality into a people who possessed a land of their own.

Theology of the Book of Joshua. The conquest of the land is understood by the Deuteronomistic writers to be the final act of a great history of salvation, which sweeps from promise to fulfillment. The book of Joshua announces that in the conquest God completed the work of liberation and enfranchisement that was first promised to the patriarchs (for example, Gen. 28:13–15), and that was always recounted in the brief statement of Israel's faith recited in cultic occasions (Josh. 24:11–13). All this was God's work; the victory of the conquest was God's, not Joshua's or Israel's. Only a perspective such as this can cope with the difficult theme of "holy war," which portrays Yahweh as ordering the absolute destruction of cities like Jericho and Ai, together with their men, women, children, oxen, sheep, and asses (compare Josh. 6:21). Although we cannot express it in their way, the narratives of Joshua can support our deep conviction that God is absolutely sovereign. The drama of God's sovereign work in human history is brilliantly played out in God's selection of a weak and scattered people bent under the servitude of Pharaoh to receive an inheritance in Canaan and from thence to become the mediators of God's saving purpose throughout the world.

W.S.T.

JOSIAH. "Good King Josiah" of Judah, whose name means "healed by God," ruled from 640–609 B.C. He succeeded his father AMON when he was only eight years old. At that time Zephaniah was prophesying the collapse of the kingdom. In the eighteenth year of his reign, as he was consolidating his territory and rebuilding the temple, his high priest Hilkiah discovered in the temple a book of the law, probably the Deuteronomy code. The king celebrated with public readings, conducted the first countrywide Passover "since the time of the judges," and carried out drastic religious reforms. The altars of Baal and Asherah in the temple were hammered to pieces, as were the Assyrian ones dedicated to the sun, moon, and stars. The rubble was dumped into the Kidron Valley. Live sacrifices of children to Molech in the Hinnom Valley just outside Jerusalem were ordered stopped. Wizards and sorcerers were put out of business, as were the sacred prostitutes.

Josiah had sufficient power to carry out these reforms even in the Baalistic high places of the north, which was under the dominance of Assyria. But Zephaniah and his prophecies foretelling serious troubles for Israel proved correct. Though Assyria had only recently attacked Egypt, the newest common enemy was now Babylon, and an Egyptian army marched north up the Via Maris, the way of the sea, to assist the Assyrians. Josiah attempted to resist the Egyptians at the fortress of Megiddo, where the highway swings inland. His army was sorely defeated and he was sorely wounded. Rushed back home in his chariot, he died in Jerusalem, much loved and long mourned for his wisdom, uprightness, and justice.

T.J.K.

JOTHAM. King of Judah, who began to rule as co-regent about 750 B.C. when his father, Uzziah (Azariah), contracted leprosy (II Kings 15:5). His mother was Jerushah, the daughter of Zadok (II Chr.

Courtesy of Nelson Glueck

Impression of the seal of Jotham from Ezion-geber

27:1). He ruled as sole monarch from about 740 to 732 B.C. A godly man, he built and ornamented the high gate of the Temple, subdued the Ammorites, and fortified and extended the land of Judah (II Chr. 27).

N.H.

JOY. As a human emotion joy runs through the biblical literature corresponding to the various occasions and circumstances in which the writers found themselves. There is a flexibility and mobility about this term for this reason, yet one fact remains a settled conviction: human joy is not dependent on fluctuating feelings or changing conditions of prosperity and adversity. Rather it is grounded in God, who is the giver of joy. The term also has both an individual and societal aspect. It is not easy to separate the two because the speaker who rejoices is often reflecting the sentiments of the community, whether of Israel or the church.

Old Testament. At times of national feasts and festivals joy is a characteristic feature, the obvious exception being the Day of Atonement (Yom Kippur), when Israel confessed its sins with fasting and contrition. Yet, even today, the week (based on Lev. 23:34: "for seven days is the feast of booths") in the fall of the year (when the Atonement comes) is known as the Feast of Booths and is linked with the glad "rejoicing in the law" celebration that occurs on its final day. Worship at the Temple in Solomon's day was a joyful affair (Ps. 42:4; 81:1-3) according to I Kings 8. The disasters that befell the Temple in the sixth century B.C. only made the task of rebuilding and restoring more gladsome (Neh. 8:13-18; compare Ps. 126). The prophet of Isaiah 56-66 looks ahead to a new Temple in a city of cosmic size with a new dimension of joy to herald in an age of God's triumphant Kingdom (Isa. 65:17-25).

New Testament. The NT writers invariably connect their joy with the onset of the messianic era heralded by the coming of Jesus Christ—his birth (Luke 2:10), his entry into Jerusalem on Palm Sunday (Mark 11:1-11), and his post-resurrection appearances (Matt. 28:8-9). The descent of the Holy Spirit at Pentecost likewise is an occasion of joy; in fact, in the Acts of the Apostles, joy is one of the visible and sentient effects of the Spirit's presence (2:28, 46; 8:39; 13:52). This "exultation" (Greek agalliasis) has overtones of joy at living in the days of eschatological renewal, when God's kingly presence is known and experienced, with an awareness that looks back to Christ's resurrection and enthronement as Lord. This belief gave the early church an ability to rejoice even when they were called to suffer persecution and loss (Heb. 10:32-34; Jas. 1:2-4).

Paul associates joy with the fruit of the Spirit (Gal. 5:22) and traces its source to God's gift of Christ (Rom. 5:2-11) and the achievement of human salvation. This is the primary reason for rejoicing in the Pauline churches. But also Paul as mission preacher and pastor can call on his converts to rejoice over their standing in the church (I Thess. 2:19-20; Phil. 2:2). Even when his congregations are called on to endure hardship, they are summoned to be glad (Phil. 2:17-18) as Paul sets the example. The same holds true for I Peter (4:13-14), and even the dramatic scenario of the Revelation includes the call to joy in time of testing, though the writer evidently expected some direct intervention of God to defeat hostile evil powers (Rev. 18:20). The anticipation in the final reign of God is yet another cause for joy in the NT, whether death supervenes (Phil. 1:19-26) or the Kingdom comes in power (I Thess. 2:19).

R.M.

JUBILATE DEO. The third Sunday after Easter, in the Roman Catholic, Anglican, and Lutheran church year. The name is from the opening words in Latin of the Sixty-sixth Psalm, sung as the introit on that day. It means "Shout for joy unto God" or "Make a joyful noise unto God."

J.C.

JUBILEE, YEAR OF. A sacred year, ordained in the Bible, in which the land was to be returned to its original owners or to their descendants.

"And thou shalt number seven sabbaths of years unto thee, seven times seven years; and the space of the seven sabbaths of years shall be unto thee forty and nine years . . . And ye shall hallow the fiftieth year, and proclaim liberty throughout all the land unto all the inhabitants thereof; it shall be a jubilee unto you; and ye shall return every man unto his possession, and ye shall return every man unto his family" (Lev. 25:8, 10).

The Jubilee was a safeguard against continued slavery and against poverty. The Hebrew slaves and their families were to be freed. Property, with the exception of houses in walled cities, was to revert to its original owner. Houses and lands were thus kept from accumulating in the hands of the few, pauperism was prevented, and a race of independent freeholders assured. The land was to lie fallow during the Year of Jubilee; nothing was to be sown or reaped; not even grapes were to be gathered.

According to the Talmud, the law of the Jubilee, which represented a rare and striking introduction of morals into economics, was observed as long as the entire territory of the Holy Land was inhabited by Israelites. When a portion of the tribes went into exile, the law lapsed.

L.K.

JUBILEES, BOOK OF. See PSEUDEPIGRAPHIA.

JUDAH. (1) The fourth son of JACOB and Leah, whose name is interpreted by Leah's words, "I will praise Yahweh" (Gen. 29:35), and eponymous ancestor of the tribe of Judah. In Jacob's deathbed testimony, Judah is generously blessed through highly eulogistic poetry (49:8-12). Said to be a "lion's whelp," his strength is celebrated. Also the possessor of scepter and staff, he will be the object of his brother's praise. Paternal favoritism is not the main issue here. Rather, the Judah oracle likely reflects an era when Judah enjoyed preeminence over the other Israelite tribes. This blessing probably received its present shape during the tenth-century B.C. Davidic monarchy.

Twice in the JOSEPH story, with its heightened interest in family conflict and reconciliation, Judah expresses authentic concern for another's welfare. First, Judah persuades his brothers that selling Joseph, whom they do not love, to a passing Ishmaelite caravan is preferable to causing him physical harm (Gen. 37:26-27). Second, knowing how shattering it would be on his father if his youngest son, Benjamin, should not return home from Egypt, Judah offers to take Benjamin's place, to remain as a slave in Egypt, while his brothers return to Jacob (43:8-10; 44:18-34).

In complete isolation from his brothers, Judah is portrayed to his disadvantage in Genesis 38 as an uncooperative father-in-law who defied the custom of levirate marriage. That custom ensured the continuity of the name and family of a man dying without a male descendant. Reflecting Judahite-Canaanite clan interaction, this story turns upon Judah's refusal to give his youngest son to Tamar in marriage and upon Tamar's vindication when, disguised as a harlot, she attracts Judah and bears twins by him.

(2) A Levite who took part in the Jewish return from Babylon to Jerusalem (Neh. 12:8).

(3) A Levite who helped oversee the rebuilding of the Jerusalem Temple during Zerubbabel's governorship (Ezra 3:9).

(4) A Benjaminite, second in command over Jerusalem during Nehemiah's governorship (Neh. 11:9).

(5) A participant in Nehemiah's dedication of Jerusalem's walls (Neh. 12:34).

(6) A Levite who, following Ezra's mandate, divorced his Gentile wife (Ezra 10:23).

J. K. K.

JUDAH, KINGDOM OF. The southern kingdom of the dual monarchy, consisting of the tribes of Judah and most of Benjamin, which remained loyal to the Davidic house when the ten northern tribes defected in 922 B.C.

Judah Prior to the Schism. This tribe, which claimed JUDAH, the fourth son of Jacob and Leah (Gen. 29:35), as its ancestor, steadily took possession of southern Palestine (Judg. 1:1-21). Consigned to historical obscurity until the time of David, Judah was a manifestly diverse tribe that encompassed Simeonite, Calebite, Othnielite, and Kenizzite elements. The rocky, barren territory occupied by most of Judah's residents incorporated a north-south geographical stretch of about fifty miles, and an east-west distance of about forty-five miles, bounded by the Philistine plain and the Jordan rift.

Judah often confronted pressure from hostile neighbors. Othniel, of the Kenizzite clan situated at Debir, presumably delivered his people from Edomite threat (in Judg. 3:8-11 "Mesopotamia" as the enemy is likely a textual corruption). Increasingly, the tribes of Judah and Benjamin felt the brunt of Philistine pressure. This led to the appointment of a Benjaminite named SAUL (about 1020-1000 B.C.) as Israel's first king, whose realm embraced Judean as well as Benjaminite territory. Following Saul's death, Judah successfully campaigned to place its own son, DAVID (about 1000-961 B.C.), on the throne. Establishing his capital at Jerusalem, a city near the Judah-Benjamin border, David excelled in the ways of statecraft. At his death, a substantial kingdom passed over to his son SOLOMON (about 961-922 B.C.) The concept of "big government" that he implemented evoked opposition when his son, Rehoboam, succeeded him on the throne. When Rehoboam refused to curb the ambitions of monarchy, the ten northern tribes seceded (I Kings 12:1-20). Israel's united monarchy suddenly terminated.

Judah after the Schism. Consisting of Judah and most of Benjamin, the southern kingdom persisted as an entity unto itself from 922 to 587 B.C., when Jerusalem fell to the Babylonians. During this interval, the people were governed by nineteen kings boasting Davidic ancestry and one outsider, Queen Athaliah (842-837 B.C.), from Samaria. The first half of the century of dual monarchy witnessed intermittent civil war with its attendant depletion of life and goods. When Jehoshaphat of Judah allied himself with Ahab of Israel, the political and social climate became more tranquil and prosperous. But the marriage of Ahab's sister (daughter?), Athaliah, to Jehoram, son of Jehoshaphat, did more than formally seal that alliance. It led to the installation of the Baal cult in Jerusalem and the consequent dissipation of Judah's Yahwistic religion. While such kings as Hezekiah and Josiah were worthy defenders of the ancestral faith, others such as Ahaz and Manasseh, who ruled during politically tense periods, manifested syncretistic tendencies that favored the worship of Baal and other deities.

If religious deviation and social abuse were generally less extreme in Judah than in the northern kingdom, they nevertheless evoked sustained attention from such prophets as Isaiah, Micah, Zephaniah, and Jeremiah, who labored, often unsuccessfully, to correct them. Judah's internal difficulties, however, were balanced by oft-related external difficulties occasioned by far stronger nations locked in struggle for dominion of the ancient Near Eastern world. Egypt, Assyria, and Babylon all affected Judean existence. In 918 B.C. Pharaoh Shishak's armies seized numerous Judean cities, and in 609 B.C. Pharaoh Necho killed Josiah in battle at Megiddo. On occasion, Egypt joined Judah's cause in countering eastern aggressors, but the support actually rendered was often so negligible as to be unworthy of the trust given to it by the pro-Egyptian party in Jerusalem.

Though the southern kingdom outlived the northern by 135 years, during much of that interval Judah was condemned to Assyrian vassalage. Judah's religion was much diluted with Assyrian accretions, and its land was noticeably scarred by the invasion of Sennacherib's army in 701 B.C. If Assyria's gradual demise during the second half of the seventh century afforded Judah some respite, with Babylon's ascendancy under Nebuchadnezzar, Judah's political ruin was imminent. A final deportation of Judah's citizens to BABYLON was realized in 597 B.C., only to be followed by a second, and Jerusalem's full-scale destruction, in 587 B.C. (II Kings 25:1-21). Thus the nation of Judah expired.

J. K. K.

JUDAISM, HISTORY OF. The history of the Jewish people begins with the covenant the Lord made with Abraham:

And I will make of thee a great nation, and I will bless thee, and make thy name great; and thou shalt be a blessing: And I will bless them that bless thee, and curse him that curseth thee: and in thee shall all families of the earth be blessed (Gen. 12:2-3 KJV).

It was in the time of Moses that monotheism became the faith of the entire nation of Israel. It was an entirely new religious idea, an original creation, and one that had no roots in polytheistic civilization. The people of Israel conceived a different world view from paganism. The pagan idea was that everyone, gods included, was subjected to a supernatural, primordial realm. Paganism did not accord ultimate freedom to its gods, nor were they, in the final analysis, sovereign; they emerged out of a preexistent realm. Judaism's idea, on the other hand, is that the will of God is transcendent and sovereign over all. There is only one God, Judaism believes, and God created the universe, guides history, commands justice and mercy, and has chosen the Jews to be God's people.

The institution of the Judges was succeeded by the monarchy, a prophetic creation. Samuel was the last representative of the old order of prophet-judges. The people turned to him with the plea to give them a king, an idea he opposed for its lack of faith in God; ultimately, he yielded and anointed Saul as king. The books of Kings fix the beginning of Israel's decline and fall after the close of Solomon's reign. For two hundred years (from 922 to 722 B.C.) there were two kingdoms—ISRAEL in the north, JUDAH in the south. The northern kingdom was destroyed by the Assyrians. With the last rays of the northern kingdom's setting sun, classical prophecy emerged. Its first representatives were the Judean Amos and the northerner Hosea. Its last spokesman was Malachi. Classical prophecy lifted the Jewish religion to new heights. The prophets taught that what God requires of the human being is morality rather than ritual. The revolutionary idea of classical prophecy is that Israel's history is determined by two factors, the moral as well as the religious, and that both are equally decisive.

The southern kingdom fell in 586 B.C., and the people were exiled to Babylonia. Since the first Temple had been destroyed, what was to become of Israel's religion? Until the EXILE, it had been a national religion, rooted in the Holy Land. By the end of the Babylonian Exile it had become clear that the people and the religion had stood the test. Judaism began to reveal its universal significance. The Exile in no way weakened the loyalty of the people to YHWH (God). Their worship consisted of prayer, confession, fasting, honoring the Sabbath, and the study of sacred texts.

In 538 B.C., Cyrus gave the exiles permission to return to Jerusalem and reconstruct the Temple. ". . . And all the people shouted with a great shout, when they praised the Lord, because the foundation of the house of the Lord was laid" (Ezra 3:11).

The TEMPLE was completed around 516 B.C. About a century after the return under Zerubbabel, in the time of Ezra and Nehemiah, an event of enormous significance took place: the TORAH was fixed and canonized. On New Year's Day in 444 B.C. the completed Torah was publicly read before the assembled throng in Jerusalem. In this solemn act, the Torah was given anew to Israel. Now, however, it was no longer the special possession of the priests, but was the property of the entire people, who participated in its study.

Confrontation with Hellenism. During the very period in which the edifice of Judaism was being consolidated, the culture of Greece was reaching its climax. Jewish and Greek culture were destined to conflict with each other and to influence each other, but they forever remained two worlds. Judaism embodied the idea of divine revelation, of prophecy, and the Holy Spirit. It aspired to mold life in accordance with the inspired utterances of its ancient prophets. Greek culture was distinguished by its idea of scientific reason. It aspired to perfect a system of thought, a world view based on rational awareness.

ALEXANDER THE GREAT's victorious campaign in Palestine, Egypt, and Syria had an immediate impact upon Judea. As part of his plan to merge the conquered peoples into one cultural unity, he left garrisons in Samaria and other cities. The Macedonian kings who followed him built a network of Hellenistic cities on the very borders of Judea. Hellenistic influences made themselves felt soon after the Ptolemies began their hundred-year rule of Palestine in 300 B.C. There was a considerable amount of Hellenization among the ruling classes of Jews. While many of the masses learned the Greek language and adopted Greek customs and ideas, they insisted on remaining Jews, so well had the scribes, successors to the prophets in the religious life of the Jews, done their work. While almost all the ancient peoples whose names are mentioned in the Bible disappeared completely, swept away by the flood of Greek influence, the Jews remained steadfast in their own faith.

The Seleucid king Antiochus III conquered Palestine about 200 B.C. When Antiochus IV came to power, Judaism was declared illegal, and the Maccabees began their fight for survival and religious freedom—the MACCABEAN REVOLT. A permanent result of the conflict was the unfading memory of Jewish heroism. The conflict strengthened loyalty to the Jewish faith and widened the breach between Jewish and Greek thought.

HELLENISM had a decided impact on Jewish life, however. The language of Judaism in the Hellenistic-Roman diaspora—including the language of prayer—was predominantly Greek. The Bible was translated into Greek—the Septuagint. Even the burial inscriptions of the Roman Jews and their personal names were mainly Greek. And some of the books of the Bible, such as Ecclesiastes, with its pessimistic outlook, have a markedly Greek influence.

In his famous essay "Hebraism and Hellenism," Matthew Arnold noted that to the Jews virtue meant righteous life, while to the Greeks it meant physical excellence. Jews sought the knowledge of God, while Hellenists sought the knowledge of nature. For Hebraism, virtue is beauty; for Hellenism, beauty is virtue. The Jews welcomed the ideals of the Greeks but refused to be assimilated into the Greek ideal.

It was not long before Rome became the ruling power and became directly involved in Judea's political affairs. Pompey reduced the size of Judea and demanded an annual tax. Judea had become a vassal state of Rome. Procurators were overtly hostile to the Jews. Open rebellion broke out in A.D. 66. It took five years before the Romans could lay siege to Jerusalem. The siege lasted from April to September, every section of the city being taken with great effort and loss of life. During the fighting on August 28 in A.D. 70 (the ninth day of the Hebrew month of Av), the second Temple went up in flames.

Once again the Jews were faced with the problem of preserving Judaism. They still had the Torah. Yohanan ben Zakkai was given permission to develop an academy of higher learning at Yavneh, which became the center of Jewish religious life. The SYNAGOGUE replaced the Temple, prayer replaced sacrifice, and Jewish study became more important than it had ever been before. The aristocrats were replaced by the spiritual nobility, who came to be known as RABBIS.

Rabbinic Judaism. Rabbinic Judaism undertook the further development of the Torah and its laws. It was also the fulfillment of an essential implication of classical prophecy: that the religious life does not depend on a functioning sacrificial system but on ethical and penitent action in the here and now.

The sages at Yavneh summarized the teachings of the earlier schools of HILLEL and Shammai. They completed the canonization of the Scriptures, gave a more precise form to the daily prayers, and transferred to the synagogue and the Sanhedrin (rabbinical assembly) some of the observances associated with the Temple in Jerusalem. The Yavneh Sanhedrin was high court, supreme legislature, and an assembly of peers. The rabbis collectively constituted a new religious leadership class. They attracted students who came to learn their oral traditions and scriptural interpretations and to see them actualize the Torah in their daily lives. The new sages settled throughout Judea and Galilee with their circles of disciples. During the first decades of the second century, the most prominent figure was Rabbi AKIBA, the pioneer of an extremely flexible method of biblical interpretation based on the assumption that no word in Scripture is redundant. Akiba's system made it possible to extract infinite levels of meaning from the texts of the Bible.

The orally transmitted teachings of the Scribes and sages were crystallized into the Mishnah. Law code, textbook, and repository of traditions deemed most authoritative, the Mishnah assumed a status in rabbinic Judaism not unlike the NT in Christianity, although their contents are vastly different. The Hebrew Bible and Mishnah together constitute the matrix of the developing rabbinic Judaism. The scholars interpreted and applied the Mishnah and other rabbinic teachings to everyday situations. These oral teachings and opinions were eventually written down and compiled into the TALMUD, one in Babylonia, the other in Palestine. The Talmud is made up of the MISHNAH and its exposition, the GEMARA.

Rabbinic thought can be divided into two types: alakhah and haggadah. HALAKHAH refers to the required action, the practical rule of ritual or civil law, the way that a Jew guides his or her life. HAGGADAH is theological speculation, general ethical teachings, parables, maxims, legends, and folklore. Aggadah seeks to inspire and enlighten; halakhah seeks to apply God's will to specific situations.

In its Talmudic stage, Judaism became a universalist religion, which welcomed into its fold—and what is more astonishing, into the community of Jews—all who would accept its discipline. For the first time in recorded history a closed society opened its doors to all with an invitation to equal membership. The change from the religion-of-one-people to the people-of-one-religion enabled Jews and Judaism to transcend the limitations of land, language, and even conflicting economic-political interests.

A method of rabbinic teaching was midrash—getting meanings from biblical verses beyond the literal. MIDRASH interprets a biblical text or group of texts according to their contemporary relevance. Talmudic civilization was to become the basis of Jewish—and to a large extent Christian and Muslim—communal life in the Middle Ages.

Judaism in the Middle Ages. Jews were deeply affected by the Muslim conquests of the seventh century. The extension of internal autonomy to the Jewish communities under Islam made possible the continuance of a Jewish way of life, the cultivation of Jewish learning, and patterns of behavior that remained rooted in Talmudic literature, though they underwent an evolution and modification. The gradual shift from Aramaic to Arabic as the language of the Jews was a change of radical importance. By the tenth century most of them used Arabic as their vernacular. Great works written in Arabic by Saadiah Gaon, Judah ha-Levi, Moses ibn Ezra, MAIMONIDES, and others, had a profound influence on Jewish life. The greatest Jewish legal authority of his time, Saadiah Gaon played a decisive role in two major controversies in Jewish life. He fought the disrupting influence of the Karaites, who rejected the authority of the Talmud. He also prevented the acceptance of revisions of the Jewish calendar advocated by Ben Meir, the head of an academy in Palestine. Judah ha-Levi, a poet and philosopher, wrote the Kuzari as a philosophic dialogue in defense of Judaism. Moses ibn Ezra wrote a number of penitential poems, which became part of the Jewish liturgy. Maimonides' greatest philosophic work, the Moreh Nevukhim (Guide for the Perplexed), was written in Arabic and tried to harmonize the teachings of Judaism with the philosophy of Aristotle.

The great codes of Jewish law were compiled during the Middle Ages. The KABBALA, which teaches about the hidden nature of God, was produced. The emphasis in medieval Jewish thinking among the philosophers was on the impersonal aspects of the Deity. In reaction, the kabalists developed the doctrine of the sefirot, the ten divine emanations by which the world is governed. The kabalists also developed, however, the doctrine of the Ein Sof ("The Limitless"), God as God is in God's self.

In Europe, Jews and Judaism did not fare well. Jewish rights were restricted, Jews were threatened with death or expulsion if they did not convert to Christianity, false accusations were leveled against them, and they were persecuted in many ways. Many Jews believed that the Messiah would come to rescue them. They were bitterly disillusioned when Shabtai Zvi was proven to be a false messiah. A fear of new tendencies in Judaism became pronounced. At the same time, the revivalist trends in other religions led to the rise of HASIDISM and the worship of God through joy and fervor.

Through outer pressures and inner fears, the Jews had grown inward. It took the philosopher Moses Mendelssohn to bring the Jews face to face with the modern world.

The Modern Period. Under the impact of philosophies and ideologies critical of revealed truth, the concept of Judaism underwent striking modifications. MENDELSSOHN, the first eminent Jewish figure to make the transition from the ghetto to modernity without breaking away from the Jewish people, inspired generations of young Jews looking for new moorings. His greatest impact was to foster a Jewish Enlightenment, the Haskalah. The rationality of Jewish belief, the uniqueness of Israel, the impact of a historical perspective, the need for rejuvenation and reformulation—all were issues in the ideological controversies that surfaced in mid nineteenth-century German Jewry, producing the three modern forms of Judaism that came to be known as Reform, the Positive-Historical School, and Neo-orthodoxy.

The early phase of the Reform movement sought to bring the externals of Judaism into closer harmony with contemporary European standards of decorum. The sermon and many of the prayers were in German; choral singing was accompanied by an organ. References to a national restoration were deleted in prayer books. By the beginning of the nineteenth century the term Orthodox had come into general use for those who maintained, contrary to the Reformers, that the entire written and oral Torah was divinely revealed and immutable. For the Orthodox, the Shulhan Arukh—the sixteenth-century code of law compiled by Joseph Caro—together with commentaries and later decisions, constituted a fixed and binding standard for proper Jewish practice. The great divide between Orthodoxy and Reform was on the question of Jewish law. Reform Judaism rejects the idea of a permanently binding religious law. A middle-of-the-road position was advocated by the followers of the Positive-Historical School and later by Conservative Judaism in the United States. This school believes that Reform Judaism is in error in rejecting Jewish law, but it also believes that Orthodox Judaism is mistaken in wedding adherence to Jewish law to a fundamentalism that rejects changes or development in Judaism.

Judaism's main influence on civilization has been in the realm of religion. The church and mosque are direct descendants of the synagogue. Words such as "amen" and "Hallelujah" have become part of the religious vocabulary of a large portion of humanity. The Sabbath, the Psalms, the prophetic readings, the weekly sermon are, through Judaism, the common heritage of the Christian world. (See also HANUKKAH; JUDAISM, MODERN THOUGHT OF; SABBATH; WISE, ISAAC MAYER; and ZIONISM.)

L.K.

JUDAISM, MODERN THOUGHT OF. Modern Jewish philosophy begins with MOSES MENDELSSOHN (1729–86). Mendelssohn tried to reconcile traditional Judaism with the ideas of the eighteenth-century ENLIGHTENMENT in Europe. He was the first eminent Jewish figure to make the transition from the ghetto to modernity. His view was that because God is the most perfect Being, the divine will must be directed toward producing the highest moral perfection. Judaism, Mendelssohn said, possesses a divine legislation—commandments, statutes, rules of conduct, instruction in God's will, and ways to attain temporal and eternal salvation. The doctrines and ethical teachings of Judaism are those of reason and hence universal. Israel's unique heritage is a specially revealed ceremonial law. Mendelssohn insisted that Jews must be integrated into civil society in such a way that their right to observe the ceremonial law is not infringed. His greatest impact was to foster a Jewish Enlightenment, the Haskalah.

A modern thinker who dealt with Jewish peoplehood was Nachman Krochmal (1785–1840). His main thesis was that Israel (the people) is devoted to what he called the Absolute Spirit—God, who is the source of all spiritual ideas. Israel must be dedicated to the furtherance of the spiritual in its most absolute and eternal form. Therefore, Israel's work is never done. Israel may have its ups and downs, but it will never disappear completely because it is wedded to the God-idea, which is eternal. Krochmal's concept of the Jewish mission influenced Reform Jewish thinkers.

Hermann Cohen (1842–1918) was particularly taken with Judaism as an ethical religion. The Messiah, he believed, cannot come and the world cannot be redeemed unless human beings know all the miseries of existence and learn to fight against them. Cohen taught that the prophets interpreted suffering as a stage in the evolution of the human condition. The separation of suffering from guilt and punishment is one of the most significant consequences of the belief in One God. Cohen also believed that the pauper is the symbol of the human race. Far from being outcasts, poor people are the favorites of God—living witnesses to the truth that compassion matters.

Franz Rosenzweig (1886–1929) and MARTIN BUBER (1878–1965) are considered religious existentialists. Rosenzweig emphasized the religious, trans-historic quality of Jewish existence. Of the three dimensions of existence—creation, revelation, and redemption—the most crucial to Rosenzweig is revelation. God gives the individual the Divine Presence, and the experience of divine love takes the form of a command to love God in return. Redemption is the turning toward others of one who has experienced revelation. Rosenzweig saw Judaism and Christianity as mutually exclusive yet complementary. Both traditions are authentic communities of love through which eternity enters the stream of time.

To Buber, relationship is everything. Every relationship is either an I-THOU relationship or an I-It relationship. In the I-It relationship, there is no real personal involvement—one studies, one observes, one uses. The I-Thou relationship goes beyond experience and feeling. It is an encounter, a basic dimension of human existence and the key to what Buber calls the realm of relation. The “absolute relation” is the human being’s relationship with God. The only way we can know God is through the I-Thou relationship. God is “the eternal Thou.” If you hallow this life, you meet the living God. Whenever we attain an I-Thou relationship with other human beings, God speaks to us too. A balance between the I-Thou and the I-It is essential for the recovery of meaning and fulfillment in private and social life.

THEODOR HERZL (1860–1904) is considered the father of modern political ZIONISM. He saw ANTI-SEMITISM as a constantly growing menace. If they wanted to preserve themselves it was necessary for Jews to have a homeland. At first his idea was for a Jewish state anywhere in the world, but eventually he saw that this dream could only be realized in Palestine, the home of the Jewish people.

Ahad Ha-Am (1856–1927) developed the idea of Palestine as a spiritual center for Jews everywhere. He opposed Herzl, who he felt had a too political and uncultural view of Zionism. Jews should be concerned with more than physical survival. Zionism cannot confine itself to the work of rebuilding Palestine. Jews must do what is necessary to make Palestine a permanent and freely developing center of their national culture, their science and scholarship, art, and literature. He advocated the establishment of a single great school of learning in Palestine, which would be a source of inspiration and generate a revival of Jewish culture.

Can Jews believe in God in the face of the HOLOCAUST? Richard Rubenstein says that we live in the time of the DEATH OF GOD. By this he means that the thread uniting God and the human being has been broken. Despite this, he thinks that Judaism still has meaning and power, that it is the way Jews share the decisive times and crises of life through the traditions of their inherited community. Emil Fackenheim asserts that Jews must cope with the contradiction of confronting the Holocaust and yet not despair. If they do not have faith enough to live in the Jewish tradition, they hand Hitler a posthumous victory, and that they are forbidden to do. Buber talked about “the eclipse of God,” which occurred in certain dark, historical hours like the Holocaust. He foresaw the possibility of a renewed divine-human encounter.

The most striking difference between modern thought of Judaism and that which was before is the shift in emphasis from an otherworldly to a this-worldly approach to the religious life. The ancient rabbis taught that this life is a preparation for the afterlife, for the Olam Haba (world to come). Louis Jacobs argues that it is indeed possible for a religion to be both this-worldly and otherworldly, for viewed from the aspect of eternity this world and the world to come are one. L.K.

JUDAIZING (Judaizers). A term, used pejoratively, to refer to Christians in the early church, mentioned in Acts and Galatians (and perhaps in I Corinthians 1), who observed the Jewish law, especially dietary customs and circumcision. The first apostolic council, recorded in Acts, decided that the Jewish law (especially circumcision and food prohibitions) was not binding upon Christians. One did not have to become a Jew before becoming a Christian, for by this time (about A.D. 50) the majority of converts to Christianity were Gentiles. Paul, too, in Galatians, shows the theological groundlessness of holding people saved by Christ to the need for circumcision and dietary rules. However, Judaizers remained part of the Christian scene until after the fall of Jerusalem in A.D. 70, and the gradual decline of Palestinian Christianity, which moved across the Jordan River to Pella.

The term was also used in a negative sense during the Middle Ages, especially at the time of the Spanish Inquisition, to refer to the “Moriscos” or Spanish Jews who were forcefully converted to Christianity, having accepted baptism to avoid persecution or being driven from their homes in Spain. These outwardly Catholic, but inwardly still Jewish, people were called Judaizers as they either practiced Jewish ceremonies in secret or were suspected of doing so. J.C.

JUDAS ISCARIOT. Probably the original form of this name was Judah Ish-Keriot, meaning Judah from Kerioth in southern Judea. Some scholars have tried to trace Iscariot to the term sikarios, meaning “dagger,” which is used by Josephus to refer to the fanatical nationalists who vowed to murder any who stood in the way of achieving political independence for the Jews. Some interpreters have supposed that Judas was disillusioned when Jesus announced the coming of God's Rule but refused to take any action to bring it about.

The Gospels all attest that Judas was one of the original twelve followers of Jesus (Matt. 10:4; Mark 3:19; Luke 6:16; John 6:71). But he plays no part in the activities of Jesus until the final days, except that in John 12:4-5 he complains because the costly ointment poured out on Jesus might have been sold and the money realized thereby given to the poor. The Gospels agree that Judas is the one foreseen as the betrayer of Jesus and describe that process of betrayal as set in motion at the Last Supper (Matt. 26:14; Mark 14:10; Luke 22:3; John 13:2).

What Judas actually betrayed was, apparently, where Jesus might be seized outside the city and therefore away from crowds that might have rallied to his support. The guards seize him in Gethsemane, and Jesus offers no resistance (Matt. 26:47, 57; Luke 22:47-50; John 18:12). Only in Luke (22:48) does Jesus address Judas. Matthew reports that guilt-ridden Judas hanged himself (27:3-5), while Acts describes a divine judgment that results in Judas' bursting apart in a ghastly death, to be replaced by Matthias through drawing lots (Acts 1:16-26).

H.K.

JUDAS MACCABEUS. See MACCABEAN REVOLT.

JUDE, LETTER OF. This brief letter claims to have been written by one Judah (Jude), a brother of James. In Mark 6:3, James and Jude are listed as brothers of Jesus. There are several indications, however, that the work is from a considerably later period in NT times, perhaps as late as A.D. 100. The apostles are referred to as a venerated group of authorities, rather than as contemporary co-workers (v. 17). Faith is used to refer to a body of fixed doctrines rather than in the sense of trust or reliance on God, as in Paul and the Jesus tradition. There are references to the passage of time since the promise of Jesus' return (vv. 17-22). And Jesus is directly identified as God (v. 25), which Paul never does. The letter is almost certainly late and by someone writing in the name of "Jude."

All the illustrations used by the writer to warn of divine judgment on those who depart from the truth are drawn from the OT or related documents. This does not require us to suppose that its first readers were from a Jewish background, since the Jewish scriptures had from the outset been the Bible of all the Christians. But Jude also quotes or refers to Jewish apocalyptic writings, which did not make it into either the Jewish or Christian canon: the Ascension of Moses and the Book of Enoch (Jude 9, 14-15). These writings were treasured by Christians, who regarded them as providing special information about God's plan for the end of the age. Most remarkable about

Jude is that a later writer expanded this book to form what we know as II Peter.

H.K.

JUDEA. A geographical name, initially attested in Greek in Ezra, Nehemiah, and Maccabees, which denotes the postexilic Jewish state. During Nehemiah's governorship, Judea was a small province claiming limited territory around Jerusalem. After Persian rule had given way to Greek, Judea strove for independence. Maccabean rulers won extensive territorial holdings, including Samaria and Galilee to the north, Idumea to the south, much of the coastal plain to the west, and Perea to the east.

These rulers did not claim that they had dramatically enlarged Judea. Rather, they saw themselves as holding sway over extensive subject lands. Nevertheless, under Roman rule, Herod the Great was called king of Judea when he controlled roughly the same area. The rule of his son, Archelaus, who became ethnarch of Judea, however, embraced Idumea and Samaria, but no longer Galilee and Perea. Subsequently, various Roman procurators of Judea dominated Idumea and Samaria, though the seat of their government moved northward from Jerusalem to Caesarea.

As a geographical division of Palestine, Judea contained about two thousand square miles, most of which lay south of Jerusalem and half of which was desert. It included the rugged Judah plateau (Luke 1:39), the lowland or Shephelah (Josh. 15:33-43), and the coastal plain. Well-populated JERUSALEM was Judea's nucleus. The economy, however, was mainly pastoral with shepherds traversing a rocky terrain and being sustained by its vineyards and olive groves. Understandably, the most frequent biblical mention of Judea occurs in the NT Gospels, which locate the birth, baptism, temptation, crucifixion, and resurrection of Jesus there.

J.K.K.

JUDGES. Although many civil and religious leaders of the Bible are called judges, it is preeminently the twelve military leaders of the book of JUDGES who are known by the title. These heroes arose to meet specific threats from enemy peoples during the approximately two centuries of the tribal confederation that preceded the monarchy in Israel (about 1200-1000 B.C.). They achieved their fleeting prominence because of their courage and charisma. As soon as a judge's task was completed, the judge receded into obscurity and Israel languished until a new "judge" arose.

Six of the judges are minor figures of whom only very brief accounts are given: Shamgar (Judg. 3:31; 5:6); Tola and Jair (10:1-5); Ibzan, Elon, and Abdon (12:8-15). Many interpreters regard these figures as local in origin and folkloristic in literary record, and some even suggest that they were invented in order to fill up the number twelve. On the other hand, the six major judges become heroes to be cherished in memory and even emulated. The least significant of these is Othniel, known only for his victory over Cushanrishathaim of Mesopotamia (3:7-11). After him came EHUD, a left-handed Benjaminite lad who assassinated Eglon, the king of the Moabites, while the latter was sitting in his private roof chamber (3:12-30). DEBORAH, the prophetess-judge, whose call for strong measures against the Canaanites is celebrated in marvelous poetry as well as prose (Judg. 4-5), conducted her business from her seat under a palm tree halfway between Ramah and Bethel. GIDEON exhibited legendary courage and faithfulness in his victory over the Midianites (Judg. 6-8). JEPHTHAH delivered Israel from the Ammonites, but only at the tragic cost of his virgin daughter's life. Because of his ill-advised vow to offer to Yahweh the first thing that greeted him following his victory, his daughter became one of the rare cases of human sacrifice in Israel (Judg. 11). The last judge, SAMSON, is described more fully than any other (Judg. 13-16). His life was haunted with tragedy, mostly centering on his love for the treacherous Delilah.

A thirteenth figure, ABIMELECH (Judg. 9), the son of Gideon, is not described as a judge even though he ruled over Israel for at least three years. Undoubtedly this is because he is regarded as a murderer and usurper. On the other hand, Samuel, who "judged Israel all the days of his life" (I Sam. 7:15), matches all the qualities of charismatic military leadership possessed by the greatest figures of the book of Judges. However, he is a man for all seasons, because he is also described as priest (I Sam. 2:35; 3:1ff.) and prophet (I Sam. 3:20). Through him the transition from the episodic leadership of judges to the permanent rule of kings is made, first with Saul (I Sam. 10:1) and then with David (I Sam. 16:1-13).

W.S.T.

JUDGES, BOOK OF. This seventh book of the OT preserves tales and traditions coming down from that period in the life of Israel before the rise of kingship when it maintained a somewhat tenuous existence in the land of Canaan as a tribal confederation. Most of the book chronicles the story of twelve charismatic JUDGES who rose up for brief careers of leadership against the military threats of neighboring peoples during the two centuries after the conquest under Joshua (about 1200-1000 B.C.).

Composition of the Book. The book of Judges falls into three principal parts: (a) a résumé of the conquest of Canaan, which deviates in some respects from the picture presented by the book of JOSHUA (1:1-3:6); (b) the stories of the twelve individual judges (3:7-16:31); (c) an appendix that details the migration of the tribe of Dan from the southwestern part of Palestine to the extreme north, to which account are also appended miscellaneous narratives about primitive Yahwistic idolatry and civil war with the tribe of Benjamin (chaps. 17-21).

(a) The résumé (1:1-3:6). Modern commentators generally assume that the structure of the book was given it by editors working in the theological tradition of the book of DEUTERONOMY, between the late seventh and middle sixth centuries B.C. Although they utilized many ancient traditions, they also inserted interpretive material, such as Judges 2:11-3:6, which contains their typical apostasy-punishment-supplication-deliverance scheme. The traditions with which they worked were not always pliant, so they were left with discrepancies such as that between the so-called "negative conquest list" of Judges 1:27-36 and the idealized picture of total victory, which they had already presented in Joshua 1-12. Yet the editors do not hesitate to comment theologically on the historical record that they had received. In 2:1-5 the angel of the Lord attaches a negative theological evaluation to the failure of Israel to complete absolutely the task of holy war with the root-and-branch extermination of Canaanite civilization. He threatens, "they shall become adversaries to you, and their gods shall be a snare to you" (2:3).

(b) The lives of the judges (3:7-16:31). Six of the judges are known by little more than their names, while the lives of six others are described at varying lengths. One of the two most extensive cycles of stories gathers around the figure of GIDEON (chaps. 6-8, supplemented in chap. 9 with an account of the abortive attempt of a non-judge, ABIMELECH, Gideon's son, to establish a royal dynasty in Israel). In a scene reminiscent both of Moses at the burning bush and Mary at the annunciation, Gideon, the weak and lowly son of the least important clan in Manasseh, is called by an angel to deliver his people Israel from Midianite oppression (6:11). By following Yahweh's directions, Gideon accomplishes the incredible rout of 135,000 Midianite warriors through a strategy that ultimately involved only 300 of his own men (7:19-23). His combination of military prowess and refusal to usurp the ultimate authority of God (8:23) causes the author(s) of the book to regard Gideon as the best of all the judges.

The other extensive cycle of stories concerns the last of the twelve judges, SAMSON, of the tribe of Dan (Judg. 13-16). Samson was a Nazarite, pledged from the moment of his miraculous birth never to cut his hair or to touch strong drink. Devoid of any great theological significance, but rich in folkloristic details, the stories of Samson present him as the Paul Bunyan of the OT. His magnificent wit and strength are manifested when he tears a live lion apart with his bare hands (14:6), and when he takes revenge upon the Philistines by setting fire to their crops, using the tails of live foxes as torches (15:4-5). He slays one thousand men with the jawbone of an ass (vv. 14-16), and interrupts a quiet night with a harlot to tear the gates off the wall of the city of Gaza (16:1-3). His lustiness is finally his undoing, when his tragic love affair with the Philistine woman Delilah leads him to allow her to cut the hair protected by his sacred vow (16:15-22). Even so, Samson redeems his life through his final act of heroism, when he pulls the temple of Dagon down upon the heads of the Philistine lords and himself.

The accounts of tribal affairs with which the book concludes (chaps. 17–21) betray the growing need for strong leadership. The abominable household shrine of Micah (chap. 17), its seizure by the tribe of Dan, and the death and dismemberment of the Levite's concubine with the resulting slaughter of the tribe of Benjamin, all lead to the expressive conclusion of the book of Judges. Its final sentence is not to be understood as a positive statement, but rather as a sad acknowledgment of the failure of the primitive polity: "In those days there was no king in Israel; every man did what was right in his own eyes" (21:25).

Historical Reliability. During the two centuries in which the people of Israel lived in Canaan as a loose confederation of tribes, it would seem likely that some kind of charismatic judge figures did in fact provide leadership from time to time. On the other hand, no secular or extra-biblical sources are available that would throw light on the nature of the Israelite community during that period, much less confirm the biblical account of the life or work of any of the individual judges. It does seem quite unlikely that the present "all Israel" perspective of the book of Judges would actually have prevailed in that early period, for the tribes were only then discovering one another, and cementing their allegiance to one another around the common traditions of Yahwism preserved and reenacted at the sanctuaries. But editorial perspective and older source material are two different matters. The older stories of the book reflect real cultural conditions and institutions, such as weddings and human sacrifice, pagan festivals and giants, blood revenge, and the telling of riddles. They ring with the authentic voice of ancient people speaking in their coarse but very human tongue.

The Theology of the Book of Judges. Because of its coarse and human spirit, the book of Judges confronts us in a special way with the incarnate nature of the Bible as the Word of God. God took the great risk of disclosing a purpose in human history through the words of people, and nowhere is this fact felt more keenly than here. Although Israel is still in its formative stages, the cult of Yahweh is well established. In fact, Yahweh is depicted in a silver statuette, the object of worship in the household shrine of Micah (17:1-5)! The battle with Baal is being joined in full force for the first time during this period. Jephthah's sacrifice of his daughter suggests that Israel had not yet fully differentiated itself from the rituals and sympathetic magic of Canaan; however, Gideon's fierce attack upon the altar of Baal at Ophrah suggests that a clear judgment had already been made about things that do not pertain to Yahweh. Faith in Yahweh's leadership in holy war is evidenced in the song of Deborah, where even the stars, the visible manifestation of the Lord's "hosts," fight against the enemies of Israel (5:20). The capacities of the judges to win victories in the face of overwhelming odds (7:7; 16:28-31), to elicit miraculous signs from Yahweh (6:36-40), and to outwit all opposition (14:10-20) bespeak a deep confidence in Yahweh's sovereignty in human history. But human history is also the history of disobedience and apostasy. Israel's repeated lapses into slavery and suffering represent, in the theology of the Deuteronomic editors of the book of Judges, Yahweh's constant retributive response to Israel's faithlessness. Far from a golden age, then, the period of the judges is presented as a history constantly oscillating between the two poles of human treachery and divine trustworthiness.

W.S.T.

JUDGMENT. A characteristic part of the Bible's teaching is that all people are accountable for their moral actions, and that they will be summoned to a time of reckoning. This is the basis for the Jewish and Christian teaching under the heading of judgment.

It is an axiom for OT writers that God is "judge" (Gen. 18:25), and that God's dealings both now and in the future are on the basis of fairness and truth (Isa. 5:16). So God may be appealed to vindicate the righteous cause of people, especially when they are oppressed. The negative side of such vindication and deliverance is divine judgment passed on Israel's enemies (Amos 1:3-2:3; Hab. 1:5-2:5, and prophetic oracles against the nations in Jer. 47-51).

The eighth-century prophets, however, introduced a novel idea centered on their interpretation of the "day of Yahweh." In popular religion, it was evidently a day for national SALVATION of Israel and the doom of Israel's foes. Amos (5:18-20) reverses this to announce that Israel will be judged for its infidelities to the covenant and its neglect of social justice in the land (4:1-5; 5:12-13). He calls the nation to REPENTANCE; otherwise it will be judgment for Israel. This then is renewed in Isaiah, Jeremiah, and Ezekiel in later times.

Courtesy of the Metropolitan Museum of Art, Rogers Fund, 1924

Part of an early Christian sarcophagus, symbolizing the theme of the Last Judgment: Christ separating the sheep from the goats

The NT writers stand in the OT Jewish tradition. God is impartial and will punish all wickedness (Rom. 1:18; Heb. 12:23; I Pet. 1:17; Rev. 16:5-7). The moral basis for such judgment is laid in God's character, but with the extra dimension that the "light" of the coming of his Son Jesus Christ has shown up all "darkness" as evil. This theme is particularly clear in the Fourth Gospel (John 3:19-21), which sees the Judgment as a present reality (5:24).

The Judgment is associated elsewhere in the NT with the PAROUSIA of Christ, or his coming in power (Matt. 25:31-46; I Cor. 4:3-5; Heb. 10:36-39). The scenario differs, but the essential fact of a future day of reckoning is clear in the different parts of the NT (plainly described in Acts 17:31). Judgment is thus part of NT eschatology, and in Christian theology it took its place as one of the four "last things"; the other parts are death, heaven, and hell. R.M.

JUDITH, BOOK OF. The Apocryphal book of Judith is a highly inventive and patriotic appeal to the people of Israel to rise up and defend their country. The heroine is a young widow, Judith, which means "a woman from Judah." General Holofernes of the Assyrian army has put under siege the imaginary city of Bethulia in the Esdraelon Valley, trying to starve it out. The high priests plan to surrender as soon as the water gives out. But Judith takes off her widow's weeds, puts on her best finery and perfume, and at nightfall visits the tent of Holofernes. She persuades him she will show him an unguarded entrance to the city and in fact guide him all the way to Jerusalem. Instead, as he lies in half-drunken sleep, she uses his own scimitar to cut off his head and carries this in secret to the high priests of Bethulia. The next morning the enemy army flees in terror as it discovers the headless body of its leader.

In many ways the story reminds one of Jael's murder of Sisera (Judges 4:17-22). The book probably dates from the Maccabean times when Israel was being encouraged to throw off an oppressor. It is filled with anachronistic inconsistencies and badly spelled or nonexistent place-names. Nebuchadnezzar is wrongly cited as king of Nineveh, not Babylon. The oldest manuscript of the book is in Greek, but there probably was also an older Hebrew or Aramaic version. Judith has proved to be a popular subject for classical painting, for example, Caravaggio's Judith with the Head of Holofernes. T.J.K.

JUDSON, ADONIRAM (1788-1850). American Baptist, one of the pioneers of the modern missionary movement. Born the son of a Congregational minister in Massachusetts, Judson was stimulated to consider foreign missions at Andover Seminary. He sailed for India in 1812 under the sponsorship of the American Board of Commissioners for Foreign Missions, but while aboard ship he was convinced of the Baptist position and was baptized in Calcutta. He later received the support of American Baptists and went to Burma in 1813. A brilliant linguist, Judson did much translation work into the Burmese language, and traveled extensively in the cause of the unification of Baptist missionary work in Asia. W.G.

JULIAN OF NORWICH (about 1342-1423). English mystic, author of Revelations of Divine Love. At age thirty, during grave illness, she received sixteen revelations. Revelations taught that God sees all things as good, sin is part of God's purpose, our sufferings preface bliss, and we are to rejoice now in Christ's great love. C.M.

JULIAN THE APOSTATE (331-63). Roman emperor (361-63) who attempted to turn the Roman Empire from Christianity to paganism. CONSTANTINE the Great died in 337, and his son Constantius became ruler in the East. He murdered possible rivals, including Julian's father, a half brother of Constantine, but spared young Julian. Born in Constantinople, Julian grew up in a remote part of Asia Minor. At twenty he received permission to study in Greece, where he turned toward Greek philosophy and pagan traditions and immersed himself in ancient Greek culture. Made Caesar in 355, Julian was sent to govern Gaul, Britain, and Spain. His troops successfully resisted barbarian incursions, defeated the Alamanni, and stopped the Franks. To check Julian's rising popularity, Constantius ordered Julian's troops to the East. Instead, the army proclaimed Julian emperor in 360. Civil war loomed, but Constantius died in 361 before Julian reached Constantinople. Julian renounced Christianity, discontinued the church's special privileges, placed pagans in high offices, and wrote pamphlets against Christianity. He also allowed Athanasius and other exiles to return, hoping to weaken the church, but Athanasius' frequent conversions of pagans caused Julian to banish him again. On a campaign against Persia, Julian died. He was Rome's last openly heathen emperor. C.M.

JULIUS CAESAR. See CAESAR, GAIUS JULIUS.

JUNG, CARL GUSTAV (1875-1961). Son of a Swiss Reformed pastor, Jung was early interested in religion, but adolescent experiences left him uncomfortable with the prospect of studying theology. He turned to psychiatry, graduating from the University of Basel (1895-1900) and receiving the M.D. from the University of Zürich in 1902. He first worked at the university psychiatric clinic, then at the Bergholze Asylum in Zürich, where he had the unique experience of working under the direction of Eugen Bleuler, who was engaged in foundational research into mental illness.

While working with small groups probing associational memories, Jung became conscious of clusters of words that seemed to trigger hesitant responses from patients because of "forbidden" content. Out of this experience he coined the word "complex" to suggest the kinds of responses made.

He collaborated with SIGMUND FREUD from 1907-12, after which they parted over differences concerning the role of sexual bases in neuroses. Jung established a school at Zurich and named his approach to the field "analytic psychology." One of Jung's important contributions was the identification of two personality types: the extrovert, who is warm, outgoing, and most at ease in the company of other persons; and the introvert, who is quiet, inward-looking, preferring to work alone or be in the company of a few people. He identified also four functions of the mind: thinking, feeling, sensation, and intuition, affirming that one or more might predominate in a person.

As a child Jung had a rich fantasy and dream life. In developing his approach to psychiatry he permitted this side of his personality to function freely and began to keep notes on his dreams. From this research developed another area in which he made significant contributions. He affirmed that dreams arise from the collective unconscious, that reservoir of memories in each person that precedes historical memory.

His theory of archetypes is important for the study of the psychology of religion. An archetype is an instinctive pattern, a basic universal image that appears in the dream life of people in many unrelated cultures. He saw these images expressed in heretical traditions from Gnosticism to alchemy and believed that the Christian tradition limited its own self-expression by eliminating these insights from its collected experience. Jung's theories about archetypes and the collective unconscious point to the importance he attached to history. Individuation (another of his technical terms) referred to discovering one's own myth and dream as a way of most fully knowing the self.

Jung affirmed that religion can help the process of individuation by bringing archetypal images into consciousness. He had an appreciation for religious symbolism, noting that dream symbols were indications of intuition and revelation. He found among many religious traditions the symbols of quaternity, trinity, and duality. The animus-anima, or male-female components of existence, together expressed the interaction and wholeness that belong to being human. Jungian theories have become influential in the area of religious studies. I.C.

JUSTICE. The term justice is rarely used in modern English translations of the Bible. There are no OT terms that convey the usual meaning of "justice" (from the Latin justitia): all members of society receiving from the gods or other persons their just deserts—retributive justice. The Hebrew term sometimes translated "justice" should read "righteousness," which is not to be equated with "strict justice," for it includes mercy, reflecting God's dealings with people according to covenant love or faithfulness. Where the English word "justice" is retained in modern versions it should convey this meaning (see, for example, Amos 5:24).

The Greek term for "justice" (dikē) appears only three times in the NT (for example, Acts 28:4). Paul is chiefly responsible for establishing the theological importance of the OT concept, in the light of the person and work of Jesus Christ. Whether "justice" should ever be preferred to the term "righteousness"—God's, and one's own—is an open question. Compare the following passages in the RSV and the NEB: Matthew 6:33; Romans 3:21-26; 5:17-18; 10:1-4; Philippians 3:8-11. Roman Catholic English translations reflect the influence of the Vulgate: justitia is translated "justice," justus, "just."

J.L.P.

JUSTIFICATION. Justification is the free acceptance of sinners into God's favor and the forgiveness of their sins, on account of the sacrifice of Christ, appropriated by faith.

Overview. Traditionally, in Protestantism, this doctrine is stated as "justification by faith," or better, as "justification by grace through faith," or even more comprehensively, as "justification by grace through faith on account of Christ."

"Justification" or "to be justified" is from the Greek verb Dikaioo. Generally, in both the OT and the NT the verb is translated "to be made righteous" and other forms of the word are translated "righteousness" or "righteous." Paul, for example, uses the verb Dikaioo twenty-five times and other forms of the word seventy-three times, of which "righteousness" is used fifty-two times. In the OT the Hebrew words tsaded and tsedaqah are translated "righteousness" or "justice." The basic Hebrew meaning is "conformity to the character of God" who is wholly righteous.

Justification is the act of becoming a Christian. It is not earned by any merit or works on the person's part, but is a gracious gift of God. One cannot justify oneself. Only God can do it, and God does it as a gift to us (Rom. 3:24).

It is erroneously held by many that Roman Catholics and Protestants differ widely on justification. For centuries Protestants believed that Catholics felt they could justify themselves by good works. While there are different emphases in the two traditions, both have always held that a sinner is justified by the grace of God that comes through the Lord Jesus Christ. For Catholics, Christ's work for us has made the Holy Spirit available to people. First, people must receive an infusion of righteousness by the HOLY SPIRIT. Once repentance occurs, God then pronounces the believer justified because of the Holy Spirit's work. Here Protestantism in general, following MARTIN LUTHER's lead, developed by JOHN CALVIN and later by JOHN WESLEY, diverges from the Catholic position. Although Luther was close to the Catholic doctrine at first, he later developed the concept of imputed righteousness, that is, people are justified by the righteousness of Jesus Christ—won on the cross—when they are in faith, a relationship of trust, in Christ. For Luther, this faith, or trust, is itself the gift of God (as it is for Paul, Rom. 3:24; 5:15-17). This faith, then, justifies without any good works, as Paul declares in Romans 4:6, "God reckons righteousness apart from works" and Romans 3:28, "For we hold that a man is justified by faith apart from works of law."

Justification is a term taken from law courts and means "to be declared righteous or blameless." This is the forensic (or declared) meaning of the term. We are said to be blameless by God even though we are actually sinners. This God does for us out of love and grace, basing the divine action on (that is, by imputation) the atoning work of Christ. To be justified is tied directly to trust in the sacrificial death of Christ, as the objective reason for our being declared righteous. Christ's death shows the integrity of God. God does not simply ignore our sin; Christ paid the penalty for our sin. Therefore, by believing in him we share in the righteousness that belongs only to him. "While we were still weak, at the right time Christ died for the ungodly. . . . But God shows his love for us in that while we were yet sinners Christ died for us" (Rom. 5:6-8).

Biblical. Justification is clearly related, as a biblical concept, to the other major biblical ideas of RECONCILIATION, FORGIVENESS, GRACE, FAITH, ATONEMENT, and SALVATION. All of these concepts have to do with the relationship of the human person to God—and in both the OT and the NT they are cast in terms of the activity of a loving God who acts decisively to restore persons to full enjoyment of love and trust, and to active participation in God's plans for humanity.

To be justified means to be righteous or clothed in righteousness in both the OT and the NT, carrying the connotation of being brought into right relationship with God or humans. The OT clearly states (Ps. 143:2; Job 25:4) that human beings can do nothing to become justified or righteous in relation to God. Isaiah 57:12 and 64:6 state that one is not justified by works as clearly as Paul says in Acts 13:39; Galatians 2:16; Romans 3:28, and Romans 4:1-25. People may, of course, justify or make themselves righteous in their dealings with other people.

To be reconciled means "to have removed barriers that prevent a close relationship from developing between people." Forgiveness means "the setting aside of the actions that constitute those barriers." Grace is unmerited divine favor that forgives and reconciles people, so that they are justified. Such a conception of justification is the equivalent of salvation, the moment of being saved from the wrath of God. In the NT, such justification, chiefly developed by Paul in Romans and Galatians, is based upon the atonement of Christ, the saving act of his death, which pays the penalties that humans rightly incur by their sinfulness. The objective results of this atonement (also called propitiation, from the analogy to OT sacrifices) are subjectively appropriated by faith. Yet this faith is not the human will to believe but is a trust and confidence given to persons by God. This saving faith is the power to hold on to Christ firmly, with full conviction and confidence. As Paul declares in Romans 9:16: ". . . it depends not upon man's will or exertion, but upon God's mercy."

Theological. In selecting a few of the more important studies of justification and related concepts throughout the eighteen or more centuries of serious Christian theology, one naturally thinks of Martin Luther, since the REFORMATION of the sixteenth century grew out of Luther's experience of justification by faith. Yet the great reformer never wrote a specific work on the subject. John Calvin covers justification in The Institutes of the Christian Religion but is everywhere dependent upon Luther's later views, as elaborated and systematized by PHILIP MELANCHTHON. The infusion theory is rejected and the imputation of Christ's merits to the sinner is stressed by both Melanchthon and Calvin.

Most interesting is the 1957 study of HANS KÜNG, Justification: The Doctrine of Karl Barth and a Catholic Reflection. This warmly accepting study goes far to demonstrate the genuine Catholic teachings on justification and to reconcile them to the theology of the Reformed thinker KARL BARTH. Indeed, Barth, in a letter to Küng (Jan. 31, 1957) says that what he holds about justification objectively concurs on all points with the correctly understood teaching of the Roman Catholic church. Barth goes on to say that while Protestants and Catholics are divided in faith, they are divided within the same faith.

According to Barth, the most comprehensive Protestant theologian of this century, Luther was right in holding that justification is "the article [of faith] by which the church stands or falls." Nevertheless, both Protestant Barth and Catholic Küng see that justification is only one aspect of the message of Christ's salvation. In the NT, only the Fourth Gospel is easy to harmonize with Paul's teaching. The early church and the Eastern Orthodox churches never developed a full-blown doctrine of justification. Even in the post-Reformation period Calvin made the predestination of the Sovereign God more central than justification by faith. Along with justification, theologians have always, even in the Lutheran churches—following Luther—developed a doctrine of sanctification, or of the progressive growth in holiness of the Christian.

Additionally, in all theologians, including Luther and Calvin, and especially in the Roman Catholic and Eastern churches, there is the development of the doctrine of Christian calling or vocation. Because of this insight both Barth and Küng agree that the article by which the church stands or falls is not justification but the confession of faith in Jesus Christ.

This attempt at irenicism, or peacemaking, between Christian communions on justification is not new. The basic document of the Lutheran churches, the AUGSBURG CONFESSION, was written by Melancthon in such a cordial spirit: "Our churches also teach that men cannot be justified before God by their own strength, merits or works but are freely justified for Christ's sake through faith when they believe that they are received into favor and that their sins are forgiven on account of Christ, who by his death made satisfaction for our sins. This faith God imputes for righteousness in his sight" (A.C., 4).

Throughout the Confession, Melancthon seeks to create the impression that the controversy between Wittenberg and Rome was not over doctrine but only over certain abuses. While this may have been too optimistic a position for the sixteenth century, it may be a genuine reflection of the growing appreciation of Catholics and Protestants for each other in the late twentieth century. (See SANCTIFICATION.) J.C.

JUSTIN MARTYR (about 100–165). Early Christian apologist and martyr who united Christian thought with philosophy and helped preserve the OT for Christians. Little is known about his life. Greek in culture and education, he was born in Flavia Neapolis in Palestine and was drawn to Platonism, but finally found true philosophy in the wisdom of the prophets. He became a Christian teacher and was martyred in Rome for his faith. Justin regarded Christianity as a superior philosophy—the LOGOS of the OT was prophesied of and made incarnate in Christ. His First and Second Apology were briefs for Christianity, the first written about 155, the second shortly before his death. In both apologies Justin asked a fair hearing for Christians. Justin explained traditional Christian truths as handed down from the apostles, who taught that God cares and loves humanity. This is shown in the OT and in the dying and rising Savior. Christians live in gratitude for all of God's gifts and show this in their actions. Dialogue, with Trypho the Jew, was written after the First Apology and concentrates on Jesus as the promised Messiah. Justin was orthodox in belief but wrote little about Jesus' life. He opposed Gnosticism, regarded Christianity as a philosophy, and continued to wear the philosopher's gown.

C.M.

JUST WAR. See WAR.

Kk

KA'BA. A cube-like building, the house of ALLAH (God) in ISLAM, and the goal of the HAJJ (pilgrimage). Five times daily Muslims turn toward it in prayer. It is about forty feet long, thirty-three feet wide, and fifty feet high, and is made of Meccan granite. It is empty except for gold and silver lamps hanging from the ceiling and is cleaned every year. A thick black covering (Kiswa, or "robe") embroidered with verses from the Qur'an covers the entire building; it is remade every year. Around the Ka'ba stands the MOSQUE of MECCA, separated from the Ka'ba by a wide courtyard. Fire, flood, and war have damaged the Ka'ba many times throughout its history, and the current structure dates from the seventeenth century. The oldest part of the Ka'ba is the black stone, referred to as "the right hand of God on earth." It was part of the Ka'ba long before Islam arose; myths claim that it fell from heaven and is the only extant part of the original structure built by Abraham. Today it is encased in silver and is a focus of attention during the pilgrimage. MUHAMMAD cleansed the Ka'ba in A.D. 630, casting out the idols and consecrating the building to the worship of the one God.

K./M.C.

KABBALA. Traditional name for MYSTICISM in JUDAISM. Although esoteric doctrines have a long history in Jewish thought, the Kabbala proper only arose around the twelfth century A.D.

The first four hundred years of the Kabbala, through the expulsion of Jews from Spain and Portugal in 1492, followed three traditions: rabbinic Judaism, Jewish Gnosticism, and Neoplatonic philosophy. One of the earliest Kabbalist books, the Sefer Babir, was written in southern France in the late twelfth century, before NEOPLATONISM began to influence the Kabbala. The Zohar, written in Spain around 1285, used Gnostic and Neoplatonic language to describe cosmic unity. It linked much of orthodox theology in a complex net of symbols, particularly the sefirot. These were ten revealed aspects of God (such as Wisdom, Beauty, etc.), which pointed toward the One, who is "en sof," or "without end." After 1492 the Kabbala took on a more apocalyptic and messianic tone. Isaac Luria, who wrote in Safad, Galilee, embraced theism and a dualism of God and the universe. He taught that the actions of the mystic could lead to the reunification of God with himself, away from the illusory world of things. His theory fit well with the experience of the Diaspora—the scattering of Jews throughout Europe, Africa, and Asia—and influenced the pietistic revivalism of the eighteenth-century Hasidic movement.

K./M.C.

KABIR. An Indian holy man (A.D. 1440–1518?) who brought together elements of Islam and Hinduism in order to overcome sectarian disputes and divisions.

His teachings influenced Guru NANAK, founder of the SIKH religion. Some of his hymns are included in the Granth, the Sikh scriptures. Born of working class Muslim parents, he held firmly to the concept of the one true God and rejected such outward forms of religion as worship of images, elaborate rituals, scriptures, and the Hindu caste system. He declared that anyone, of any caste or race, who loved God freely could escape the power of KARMA and the cycle of rebirth. He also taught the importance of following a spiritual master, or guru, as the only way of developing right attitudes toward life.

K./M.C.

KADDISH. A special Jewish prayer of praise to God, recited with congregational responses at the close of individual sections of the public service and at the conclusion of the service itself. Although there is no reference to the dead in the kaddish, it is also used as a mourner's prayer. It is recited by the mourner at the graveside of parents or close relatives, and during the three daily prayers in the synagogue for the first eleven months following the death of a parent or relative and on each anniversary of the death. Written in Aramaic, the kaddish is characterized by an abundance of praise and glorification of God and an expression of hope in the speedy establishment of God's kingdom on earth. "May He establish His kingdom" in the Ashkenazi version is broadened by Sephardic Jews with the additional "May He make His salvation closer and bring the Messiah near." The congregational response, "May His great name be blessed forever and to all eternity," is the kernel of the kaddish. The opening phrase, "Magnified and sanctified be His great name in the world . . ." has some resemblance to the opening phrases of Ezekiel 38:23 and the Lord's Prayer (Matt. 6:9).

L.K.

KADESH-BARNEA. An oasis important to certain OT narratives, located between the Wilderness of Zin and the Wilderness of Paran. Several sites have been suggested as the location of the biblical settlement, with perhaps that of 'Ain el-Qudeirat having the best claim. The springs there are among the most abundant in the Sinai Desert.

The Kadesh mentioned in Genesis 14:7 is probably the same as Kadesh-barnea (also here called En-mishpat or Spring of Judgment). The rebellious kings (whom Abram was soon to fight) conquered the settlement and the surrounding territory.

Kadesh-barnea was the location in which the Hebrew tribes under Moses settled for a period (Num. 13) during the WILDERNESS WANDERINGS. From there twelve spies were sent into the land of whom only Joshua and Caleb returned to advise the people to proceed, the other ten discouraging any attempted invasion. This caused many of the people to grumble that they wished to return to Egypt, a timidity that so angered the Lord that the older generation was sentenced to die in the desert without ever entering the Land of Promise (Num. 14). In desperation, the Israelites, against the advice of Moses, launched an assault against the Canaanites but were thrown back to Kadesh, where they remained for some undetermined period.

It was at Kadesh-barnea that Miriam, the sister of Moses, died and was buried (Num. 20:1). It was here also that the people complained for lack of water, leading Moses to strike the rock in order to cause the water to gush forth. The narrative of this incident connects the name Meribah or Meribath ("contention") to Kadesh (see below). For his act Moses was condemned by the Lord and not permitted to lead the people into the Land of Promise (Num. 20:2-13).

At a later period Kadesh-barnea was considered to mark the extent of Judah's southern territory. It is referred to in this manner in Joshua 15:3 and Ezekiel 47:19 and 48:28. (In these latter two references it is termed Meribath-kadesh.)

J.D.N.

KAFKA, FRANZ (1883-1924). Writer of philosophical novels and stories, Kafka was born at Prague, then within the Austro-Hungarian Empire. More than one interpretation of his writings is possible, but he is most commonly taken to express the sense that human beings are thrown into a world that they do not comprehend and in which there is no obvious purpose for their lives. His best-known novels, The Trial (Eng. trans. 1956) and The Castle (Eng. trans. 1965), were both published posthumously. In the former, the hero's life is suddenly interrupted by his arrest. He experiences great frustration trying to discover what the charges are, and who are his accusers. The theme of The Castle is similar. A land surveyor arrives in a village and tries to contact the people at the castle for his instructions. But he cannot discover who is in charge up there—the telephone rings unanswered, or he gets a cryptic message, which breaks off. Appropriately, the novel is unfinished. While Kafka's writings can be read as a literary expression of what EXISTENTIALISM calls the "facticity" or even "absurdity" of human existence, he was deeply concerned with his Jewish inheritance, the Bible, and Hasidic mysticism. It has been claimed that there is a profoundly religious significance in his thought.

J.M.

KAGAWA, TOYOHICO (1888-1960). One of the outstanding modern Christian witnesses in Asia. The son of a wealthy Japanese businessman and his geisha wife, Kagawa was baptized in 1903 and promptly disowned by his family. He went to live in the slums of Kobe and experienced the desolation of the poor in the age of Japan's change from a medieval state to a modern industrial economy. He strongly believed that the Christian witness must find expression in social service. His views on social and political matters expressed in his writings made him an object of suspicion, and he was arrested and jailed during the early 1940s. After World War II he was invited to enter politics and rebuild Japan. He refused but continued to preach and work for social justice among the people. His influence was probably greater in the West than in Japan, but he is rivaled by few in the art of making the authentic voice of Asian Christianity heard outside of that continent.

W.G.

KÄHLER, MARTIN (1835–1912). German theologian who taught for many years at the University of Halle. He is remembered chiefly for his book The So-Called Historical Jesus and the Historic Biblical Christ (1892). This was an attempt to liberate theology from dependence on historical research, and it had a profound influence on a whole generation of theologians, including Paul Tillich. Kähler argued (as many others were to do after him) that the many biographies of Jesus produced by the nineteenth-century "quest for the historical Jesus" had no claim to be scientifically objective studies but simply reflected the subjective interests of the biographers. They were, he claimed, just as much products of the human imagination as had been "the notorious dogmatic Christ of Byzantine christology." The Gospels are misinterpreted if they are taken as either history or dogma. They are kerygma or proclamation. Hence the real Christ is the preached Christ, Christ as apprehended and proclaimed by Christian faith. One cannot get behind or beyond the kerygmatic Christ. Kähler's work not only dealt a blow to the quest for the historical Jesus but led scholars to reconsider what kind of writings the Gospels are and what we may reasonably expect to learn from them.

J.M.

KAIROS. One of two words in Greek to designate time. The other word is chronos, which refers to clock or calendar time, which is quantitative, measurable, and repetitive. Kairos is "fulfilled time" or "the right time." It points to unique temporal moments that are related to but are qualitatively different from other time and are filled with special meaning. The word kairos appears frequently in the NT and refers most specifically to the unique appearance of Christ who came "in the fulness of time." PAUL TILlich has made special use of the concept of kairos in his theological reflections on history, particularly concerning his early involvement in and writings on the movement of Religious Socialism in Germany. Throughout Christian history, prophets and Reformers have interpreted their time as a special kairos, dependent however on the central kairos, the appearance of Christ. Tillich saw Religious Socialism after the First World War as such a special kairos. It rejected both the historical pessimism of traditional Lutheranism and the optimism of secular socialism. It was a special time (kairos) for creating a new social order, but one continuously judged by the criterion of the central kairos, Jesus Christ.

J.L.

KAIVALYA. From the Sanskrit word meaning "isolation, detachment." In JAINISM, and the Samkhya and YOGA schools of HINDUISM, the term "Kaivalya" is used for the ultimate liberation of the soul or self, termed in this connection jiiva in Jainism and purusha in the Hindu schools. In both, the soul is seen as entrapped in KARMA (Jainism) or matter (Samkhya and Yoga), from which it can be released by asceticism and spiritual experience.

R.E.

KALAM. In ISLAM, theological doctrine and the means by which it was developed. Kalam has never been the dominant concern of Muslim scholars. They have accorded much more attention to legal and ritual issues, because Islam is more a religion of doing what is right than of solving speculative issues.

Even so, doctrinal issues arose early. One was the question of human free will in relation to God's sovereign will, by which he controls everything. Another was the question of who should hold political power in the Muslim world, and what his qualifications should be. A third was the question of the status of a Muslim who has committed a grave sin. All these questions had political as well as purely religious aspects.

Greek philosophy influenced much of Islamic theological thought. For instance, does God do good because it is good, or is everything he does good because he is the one doing it? The solution arrived at was that God is absolutely one, he is sovereign, and humans cannot comprehend him by rational means. The QUR'AN is eternal, and everything that it contains is literally true, even the anthropomorphic statements that speak of God sitting on a throne and having human attributes and features.

Theologians objected to painting, especially paintings that show the human form. In spite of this, Muslim rulers in many ages commissioned great works of art. Theological issues continue to challenge Muslim thinkers, and there have been new developments in the present century.

K.C.

KALI. From the Sanskrit word for "The Black One." An important goddess of HINDUISM, Kali represents the terrifying aspect of the earth mother. Often identified with the consort of SHIVA, in this capacity she is the phenomenal world, both productive and destructive, over against the god as the Absolute. Kali is frequently portrayed as black with eyes bulging and tongue hanging out, wearing a necklace of skulls. Her worship includes animal sacrifice. But while fearsome, Kali is ultimately good, for what she represents must be confronted by those who would seek liberation, and she has received the devotion of such noted saints as Ramakrishna. Kali is particularly popular in Bengal, the Kalighat temple in Calcutta, after which that city is named, being her best known place of worship.

R.E.

KALLEY, ROBERT REID (1809–88). Medical doctor, ordained clergyman, and hymnwriter, Kalley, born in Scotland, was a “missionary to the Portuguese of three continents.” Unable to go to an assigned mission in China because of his wife’s health the couple began an independent medical mission in the Madeira Islands in 1838. The mission, which included a program of literacy and Bible study, flourished. Persecution of Protestants beginning in 1842 forced Kalley to flee the islands. He served brief terms in the British West Indies, Malta, and Palestine, and then went to Brazil, where he made a notable contribution to the cultural and religious life of the nation. He composed a Portuguese hymnbook that became a standard for church singing. Authorities have termed the work done by Kalley “the greatest achievement of modern missions.”

W.G.

KAMA SUTRAS. From the Sanskrit phrase meaning “Aphorisms on Erotic Love.” The Kama Sutras are a class of textbooks on the arts of love, of which the best known is that attributed to Vatsyayana, who lived in north India around the beginning of the fourth century A.D. According to such texts as the Laws of Manu, kama, pleasure, especially erotic, is one of the four human goals, along with material gain, righteousness (DHARMA), and liberation (MOKSHA). Its cultivation is appropriate as part of the role of the householder who has not yet turned to the renunciant quest for liberation, but who is committed to the dharma of perpetuating human life and maintaining the social order. Thus kama and its skills have religious significance.

R.E.

KAMI. From the Japanese word for “god or deity.” The objects of worship in SHINTO —the polytheistic religion that embraces a vast number of kami, ranging from the solar goddess Amaterasu and the primal parents IZANAGI and IZANAMI to tiny spirits worshipped at wayside shrines. Kami are conceived of as finite, particularized spirits within a pluralistic universe who have traditional associations with places, occupations, or families. Some are connected with natural phenomena such as mountains or waterfalls; others are figures from the ancient mythology of the Kojiki and Nihonshoki; still others are deified historical figures, including the Meiji emperor (1868–1912), whose shrine is a prominent Tokyo landmark. Most Shinto shrines contain, usually behind the closed doors of the honden or inner sanctuary, an object such as an ancient mirror or sword called the shintai, which is said to manifest the presence of the kami. Kami are worshiped by priests with offerings of food and prayer and are celebrated in periodical matsuri or festivals.

R.E.

KANT, IMMANUEL (1724–1804). German philosopher whose influence on theology is greater than that of any other philosopher in the modern period.

Immanuel Kant

Born in Königsberg in East Prussia, Kant was nurtured in the tradition of devout PIETISM. Later he came to abhor Pietism’s emotional fervor, but its strict morality was enduring and is reflected in his thought. Kant attended the University of Königsberg, became a tutor to a private family, and in 1755 joined the faculty of the university, where he became a professor in 1770 and where he remained for the rest of his life. Kant’s works include: Critique of Pure Reason (1781), Prolegomena to Any Future Metaphysics (1783), Principles of the Metaphysics of Ethics (1785), Critique of Practical Reason (1788), Critique of Judgment (1790), and Religion Within the Limits of Reason Alone (1794).

Critique of Pure Reason is one of the great works in the history of thought. It ushered in the Kantian “Copernican Revolution” in philosophy and theology. The empiricist tradition had conceived of the mind as passive, receiving sense impressions from the external world. From these impressions the mind “collects” ideas based on these impressions. With Hume empiricism led to skepticism regarding our knowledge of the external world. Kant began with a new hypothesis: the external objects that we perceive are already in some respects constituted by a priori forms of cognition imposed upon those objects by the mind itself. The raw material of experience is molded and shaped by such cognitive forms as space, time, substance, and causality, which are not themselves observable. These a priori categories of human understanding ensure our scientific knowledge of phenomena, the world of sense experience. However, we cannot know noumena, supersensible objects that transcend space, time, and perception. Kant’s revolution was thus twofold. He established the possibility of a science of nature but also denied that such metaphysical concepts as God and the immortality of the soul are matters of empirical experience. Such beliefs, if rational, must be established by some other means.

In the next section of the Critique, Kant extends Hume's criticism of the ontological, cosmological, and physicotheological (design) proofs for the existence of God. While some aspects of Kant's critique of these proofs are disputed today, generally they remain compelling. While metaphysical beliefs are not objects of scientific knowledge, they do, according to Kant, have a regulative use. For example, the idea of God as a supreme intelligence and cause of the world assists us in conceiving of nature as a systematic whole, under the guidance of intelligible, causal laws. Kant's defense of a rational theism did not, however, rest primarily on the regulative use of metaphysical concepts. In Critique of Practical Reason (1788), he sought to establish theistic belief as a postulate of practical reason. Kant denied that morality is founded on theology. On the contrary, freedom, God, and immortality are all postulates, that is, logically required by our moral reasoning. Moral responsibility, for example, must assume freedom. Since the perfect good, the distribution of happiness in exact proportion to morality, is not achieved in this life, we can reasonably postulate the immortality of the soul and God as cause adequate to effect perfect justice. Religion, then, is founded on moral faith, on the rational requirements of our practical reason.

Kant believed that Christianity came closest to approaching a pure, rational, moral faith. Religion Within the Limits of Reason Alone sets out to demonstrate how human free will, though radically evil, can regenerate itself and how Christianity, rationally conceived, exemplifies this process. Worshiping God is synonymous with obeying the moral law. Christ is the archetype of humanity, the ideal of a Son well-pleasing to God. Yet the historical example of Christ is not required as our pattern. Since we ought to conform to this moral ideal, we must be able to do so. In all of this, Kant shows his kinship with Enlightenment DEISM. Kant's contribution to modern theology lies in the suggestiveness of the first two Critiques, rather than in his own theological doctrine. Kant's Critique of Pure Reason contributed to the demise of natural theology, and liberal theology has followed the lead of the Critique of Practical Reason in constructing an ethical theism. J.L.

KAPLAN, MORDECAI M. (1881–1983). Rabbi, scholar, founder of the Jewish Reconstructionist movement in America. Kaplan called for a rational and democratic reformulation of Jewish religious identity in harmony with a modern scientific world view. Born in Lithuania in 1881, Kaplan came to the United States at the age of eight. He attended New

Courtesy of Religious News Service

Mordecai M. Kaplan

York public schools and Columbia University, where he absorbed a modern critical approach to religion and to the Bible. Ordained by the Jewish Theological Seminary of America in 1902, Kaplan served as rabbi of an Orthodox synagogue in New York. In 1909, he was appointed dean of the newly established Teachers Institute of the seminary. Soon after he became professor of homiletics, Midrash, and philosophies of religion. During more than fifty years on the seminary faculty, he attracted a devoted following of students.

In 1917, Kaplan became the leader of the first synagogue to incorporate a broad range of cultural and recreational activities into its program. After a split developed in the congregation over his innovative views, he and his supporters left to organize the Society for the Advancement of Judaism, a synagogue and Jewish center based on Kaplan's position that worship is only one of the functions that a congregation should foster. His first major book, Judaism as a Civilization (1934), criticized existing Jewish movements and called for a "reconstruction" of Jewish life. The Reconstructionist, a journal of Jewish affairs, which first appeared in 1935, has had a considerable impact on the leadership of non-Orthodox American Jewry.

Originally, Reconstructionism was an ecumenical position cutting across Jewish denominational lines; later it was transformed into a small, separate movement.

Kaplan agreed with Conservative Judaism's commitment to the scientific study of the Jewish past, its sympathy for Zionism, and its concern for the unity of the Jewish people. Later he came to feel that the Conservative movement remained too closely bound by the traditional methods and contents of Halakhah and was not adequately responding to new conditions and needs. The solution, he felt, was to redefine JUDAISM as "an evolving religious civilization." Kaplan called for the reestablishment of a network of all-embracing, "organic" Jewish communities around the world. Membership would be strictly voluntary, its leadership would be democratically elected, and private religious beliefs would not be infringed upon. Kaplan, a strong advocate of cultural and religious pluralism, maintained that American Jews should participate fully and creatively in both Jewish and American civilization. He was against authoritarianism in religious life, dogmatic claims of infallibility, and recourse to supernatural revelation. He defined God as "the Power that makes for salvation." He insisted that the traditional notion of the Jews as a chosen people be eliminated from Jewish theology and from the liturgy. L. K.

KARMA. From the Sanskrit word meaning "action." Karma is an important concept in HINDUISM, BUDDHISM, and JAINISM. It asserts that a universal law of cause and effect, or action and reaction, called karma, operates in the moral and personal sphere just as such laws operate in the physical universe. Karma is closely associated with belief in REINCARNATION. One's state in life, whether high or low, rich or poor, happy or trouble-plagued, is said to be determined by one's behavior in previous lives. According to many sources, karma may even determine whether one is born human, animal, or insect. However, the concept of karma embraces more than just personal rebirth. Karmic consequences can also be received in the same life and in intermediate states between earthly births. We also share in the collective karmas of the larger communities to which we belong.

Karma is usually seen as inexorable, impersonal law. Every thought, word, and deed bears its necessary fruit. But in BHAKTI Hinduism, God's grace, given in response to fervent devotion, can burn away bad karma. In some Hindu circles it is also said that a person of great spiritual development can vicariously assume the karmic debt of another, as a GURU might take on the karma of a disciple, fostering the latter's growth by releasing the disciple from it.

In any case, one can always prepare now for a better karmic fate in a later life while working off the karma of past sins in this life, through good works, spiritual practice, and the patient acceptance of one's present DHARMA, or duty and station. For whatever fate karma sends one, at least in the case of human births, it does not destroy free will, so the opportunity to do better is always there. So is the opportunity to obtain release from the realm of samsara, or rounds of rebirths caused by karma, altogether through MOKSHA, or ultimate liberation.

Buddhist views of karma differ somewhat from the Hindu in theory, though the impact of the concept is much the same in the end. Since Buddhism holds there is no separate individual self (ANATTA), no actual entity is reborn. The notion is instead kinetic; the karmic "waves" created by the life of one composite "self" make another composite which, as it were, takes up where the first left off after its dissolution, and so can roughly be spoken of as its reincarnation. Buddhism, with its characteristic psychological emphasis, stresses that one's thoughts and mental attachments are as potent as deeds in weaving one's karmic net. Final release from karmic samsara is through becoming a BUDDHA or arhat, that is, realizing NIRVANA.

In Jainism, karma is a subtle material substance, attracted by ignorance and attachment and removed by asceticism, which coats the JIVA, or soul, and holds it to this material world of suffering, clearing oneself of it is KAIVALYA, or liberation. R.E.

KARMA MARGA. From the Sanskrit word for "the path of action." In HINDUISM, marga means the path to ultimate salvation or liberation, and karma is here used in a very broad sense. As presented in its classic source, the BHAGAVAD GITA, Karma Marga or Karma Yoga entails doing one's work in the world—that is, accepting one's given station and clear duty in life—without attachment to the fruits of the work. One is then simply an instrument of God (BRAHMAN) or moral law (DHARMA) working through one impersonally. In this way, the same detachment and inner freedom may be found in the midst of worldly life as the reclusive yogi finds in the cave, and so the same MOKSHA, or ultimate liberation. Traditionally, the Karma Marga concept was commonly seen as a support of the established Hindu social order, including the caste system, since it offered a way of liberation within its structures. However, many modern leaders such as MOHANDAS K. GANDHI, have made it instead the spiritual foundation for the life of the activist reformer or even revolutionary, since it frees one to wage the struggle one knows must be engaged in, without debilitating anxiety over immediate success or failure, or whether one will receive praise or persecution. Either way, one is inwardly free. R.E.

KEBLE, JOHN (1792–1866). A leader of the OXFORD MOVEMENT, he was born April 25, in Gloucestershire. He entered Corpus Christi College, Oxford, at the age of fourteen and graduated with high honors. He became a fellow at Oriel in 1811 and a tutor from 1818 to 1823. Keble was ordained priest in 1816. From 1831 to 1841 he was professor of poetry at Oxford.

Keble initiated the Oxford movement with his sermon "National Apostasy," delivered in July 1833. Of the ninety "Tracts for the Times," Keble wrote nine. He edited the works of Richard Hooker and in 1838 translated the works of Irenaeus to inaugurate the Library of the Fathers. His poetry published in The Christian Year (1827), The Oxford Psalter (1839), and Lyra Innocentium (1846) includes the hymns "New Every Morning Is the Love," "Blest Are the Pure in Heart," "Sun of My Soul, Thou Savior Dear," and "God, the Lord, a King Remaineth."

Keble College, Oxford, was named in his honor in 1869. N.H.

KEDAR. The word means "black" or "swarthy" and usually refers to a nomadic tribe living in the Syro-Arabian desert east of Palestine named for a son of Ishmael (Gen. 25:13; I Chr. 1:29). Sometimes in Scripture and rabbinic literature the word is applied to Bedouins in general. They were skilled archers (Isa. 21:16-17) who bred sheep (Isa. 60:7), traded with Tyre (Ezek. 27:21), and lived in beautiful tents (Song of S. 1:5). Jeremiah's comment (49:28-29) refers to an attack by Nebuchadnezzar, king of Babylon, on the Arabs southeast of Damascus in 599 B.C.

N.H.

KEN, THOMAS (1637-1711). English bishop, hymnologist, and the author of the DOXOLOGY. Ken was educated at Winchester and New College, Oxford (B.A. 1661), and was ordained and held several positions before joining the staff of Winchester Cathedral in 1669. In 1680 he became chaplain to Charles II and in 1684 bishop of Bath and Wells. In 1688 he was imprisoned for refusal to publish James II's Declaration of Indulgences and accused of sedition but was acquitted. Still loyal to James, he was deprived of his office in 1691 by William of Orange. He spent his last twenty years in retirement.

In 1674 he published A Manual of Prayers for the Use of the Scholars of Winchester College. It mentions three hymns for morning, evening, and midnight, the texts of which were appended to the 1695 edition. Best known is the evening hymn, set to the Tallis Canon, "Glory to Thee, My God, This Night." The morning hymn is "Awake, My Soul, and with the Sun." For midnight he wrote "My God, Now I from Sleep Awake." N.H.

KENITES. An ancient nomadic tribe, originating near the Gulf of Aqaba, that moved into southern Judah. Numbers 24:21-22 implies that the term derives from Cain. The name means "coppersmiths," as the Kenites worked in metal. Israel probably got its use of metal and knowledge of making tools from this wandering band of artisans.

The Kenites were related to Moses by marriage and were part of the larger group called the MIDIANITES. The clans of Kenites who joined the people of Israel during their wilderness wandering moved into Canaan with the early "conquest" tribes (Judg. 1:16), but later moved back to the wilderness south of Judah. Kenites lived with the Amalekites during Saul's reign. This was also true at the time Balaam's prediction and forced blessing was given. One family, that of Heber the Kenite, lived in Ephraim, or the north of Palestine (Judg. 4:11). Apparently, the Kenites always resisted urbanization or becoming farmers and remained nomadic shepherds throughout Israel's history. This attachment to the old ways was a symbol of their devotion to the Mosaic covenant and their resistance to Balaam. Indeed, the Kenites are identified as the Rechabites, fanatical devotees of Yahweh, in I Chronicles 2:55. J.C.

KENNEDY, JOHN F. (1917-63). First Roman Catholic and youngest person elected president of the United States. Born on May 29, at Brookline, Massachusetts, John was the second of nine children. He descended from Irish forebears who immigrated to Boston. Kennedy was graduated cum laude from Harvard University (1940). His thesis, Why England Slept, became a best-selling book (1940). He served in the U.S. Navy (1941-45), was elected to the U.S. House of Representatives (1946), and to the Senate (1952). His book Profiles in Courage (1957) won the Pulitzer Prize. He shattered anti-Catholicism in politics by defeating Richard Nixon for the presidency in 1960.

As president he promoted civil rights for blacks and women, created the U.S. Peace Corps (1961), and ordered an end to discrimination in federal housing (1962), but failed to get medical aid for the aged. When Freedom Riders tested Alabama segregation laws in 1961, he used troops to restore order. In 1962 he again used troops to have James Meredith, a Negro, enter the University of Alabama. The Bay of Pigs invasion to wrest Cuba from Fidel Castro in 1961 failed, but later that year he forced Russia to withdraw nuclear missiles from Cuba. In 1963 he helped bring one hundred nations to outlaw atomic testing. He was assassinated in Dallas, Texas, November 22, 1963, having served only two years and ten months. C.M.

KENOSIS. This Greek term is formed from the verb heauton ekenōsen, "he emptied himself" (Phil. 2:7). As a substantive it is used of the christological theory that sets out to show how Christ could enter human life and live there in a genuinely human experience. In its classic form this CHRISTOLOGY goes back no farther than the middle of the last century to the time of the German philosopher Thomasius, about the beginning of the eighteenth century.

The essence of the original kenotic view is that "the Divine LOGOS by His Incarnation divested Himself of His divine attributes of omniscience and omnipotence, so that in His incarnate life the Divine Person is revealed and solely revealed through a human consciousness," according to J. M. Creed. This christological statement is open to exegetical and theological objections.

The use of kenoun, "to empty," in Philippians 2:7 in the active voice is unique in the NT, and the whole phrase with the reflexive is not only non-Pauline but non-Greek too. This fact supports the suggestion that the phrase is a rendering into Greek of a Semitic original. Recent scholars have found this original in Isaiah 53:12: "He poured out his soul to death." Thus, the kenosis is not that of his incarnation but the final surrender of his life on the cross. Even if this novel interpretation is regarded as somewhat forced, it puts us on the right track. The words "he emptied himself" in the Pauline context say nothing about the abandonment of the divine attributes. Linguistically the self-emptying is to be interpreted in reference to the preincarnate renunciation, which took place at the same time as the act of taking the form of a servant. His taking of the servant's form involved the necessary limitation of the glory, which he laid aside that he might be born "in the likeness of men." It led inevitably to the final obedience of the cross when he did, to the fullest extent, pour out his soul unto death (see Rom. 8:3; II Cor. 8:9; Gal. 4:4-5; Heb. 2:14-16; 10:5 ff.).

R.M.

KERYGMA. The Greek word transliterated into English, which in the NT means "preaching." It sometimes designates the event of preaching (I Cor. 2:4); at other times the content of preaching (I Cor. 1:21).

The term became a prominent topic in biblical discussions partly due to the work of C. H. Dodd, an English scholar (The Apostolic Preaching and Its Development, 1936). Dodd isolated various statements of the kerygma in the early speeches in Acts and in the letters of Paul (for example, Acts 2:14-39; 3:13-26; I Cor. 15:1-7) and detected common themes running throughout: the fulfillment of OT prophecies and the inauguration of the New Age by the coming of Christ; Jesus' descent from David, his crucifixion, burial, resurrection, exaltation to the right hand of God, and his future return as Judge and Savior; and an appeal for repentance and an offer of forgiveness. Dodd also sharply distinguished kerygma, which was an announcement of good news, from teaching (didache), which described the instruction given to converts in the NT churches.

More recent scholarship has challenged the narrowness of Dodd's definitions and is prone to employ the term kerygma to mean God's word as it confronts human beings or to mean simply "saving message."

C.B.C.

KETHE, WILLIAM. Sixteenth-century Scottish minister and writer of twenty-five metrical versions of the Psalms in the Anglo-Genevan Psalter of 1561, which later became the Scottish Psalter. The dates of Kethe's birth and death are not known, but he was among those who fled from England when Queen Mary ("Bloody Mary") ascended the throne in 1553. In 1558 he worked with English refugees in Basel and Strasbourg. After Mary's death he became the rector of Childe Okeford, near Blanford, in 1561. He remained that post until about 1593. Kethe's paraphrases of the Psalms in the psalter of 1561 were made at Geneva. This edition produced such celebrated numbers as "All People That on Earth Do Dwell" (Psalm 100—Tune: Old Hundredth), "Such As in God the Lord Do Trust" (Psalm 125), "Thy Mercies Lord, to Heaven Reach" (Psalm 36).

R.H.

KETHUBIM. Various spelled kesubim, ketuvim, and chetubim, the word is used for the Jewish sacred Writings (hagiophaphia in Greek) beyond the Pentateuch and the Prophets. As the third division of the OT canon, it includes Psalms, Proverbs, Song of Solomon, Job, Ruth, Lamentations, Ecclesiastes, Esther, Daniel, Ezra, Nehemiah, and I and II Chronicles.

N.H.

KETURAH ("The perfumed one"). Abraham's wife after the death of Sarah (Gen. 25:1-4), she was the mother of Zimran, Jokshan, Medan, Midian, Ishbak, and Shuah, ancestors of various northern Arabian peoples (I Chr. 1:32-33).

N.H.

KEYS OF THE KINGDOM. The expression is used only in Matthew 16:19, in connection with Matthew's much more elaborate version of the confession by Peter that Jesus is the Messiah, or Christ (compare Mark 8:29). Following the declaration by Jesus that Peter's perception of who Jesus is has come to him as a revelation of God (Matt. 16:17) and that Peter—or his confession—is the foundation on which the new community will be built and prevail against opposition (16:18), Jesus goes on to assign the keys to Peter. As symbols of authority, they represent the responsibility to determine who may become participants in the life of the community. Further, the obligations of membership are to be determined by the Apostolic leaders (compare Eph. 2:20 and Rev. 21:14, where all the twelve apostles have a foundational role in the church).

These details are appropriate to Matthew's Gospel, since he is concerned throughout to define the differences between the Christian and the Jewish communities. In the late first century, Judaism's leaders are reported to have gathered at Yavneh to draw up the guidelines for covenant participation—a program that developed into what we know as rabbinic Judaism. Matthew portrays Jesus as doing the same through his apostles, although the law of Moses (Matt. 5:17-48) is radically reinterpreted by Jesus, and all nations are invited to share in the new covenant (Matt. 28:18-20). The apostles are given responsibility to control this new undertaking, as symbolized by the "keys of the kingdom."

H.K.

KEYSSER, CHRISTIAN (1877–1961). Lutheran missionary to New Guinea and teacher of missions. Born in Bavaria, Keysser came under the influence of the YMCA as a young man and received missionary training at the Institute at Neuendettelsau. He was sent to New Guinea in 1899, where he distinguished himself as a missionary and in several fields of endeavor, including studies of botany and zoology, and as an ethnographer and geographer. He began a new approach of tribal conversions in his missionary endeavors, which met with much success. He also contributed to the worship life and hymnody of the church of New Guinea. In 1920 he returned to Germany, where he spent the rest of his active life as a teacher of missions at Neuendettelsau and he had a profound influence on the preparation of missionaries. He also wrote books about his work that were influential in mission approach. W.G.

KHAJURAHU. A village in the state of Madhya Pradesh, India, where there is a cluster of eighty-five temples that were built around A.D. 850–1150. They are dedicated to SHIVA, VISHNU, and other beings that are sacred in HINDUISM or JAINISM. Twenty temples survive today.

The most unusual of the sculptured figures at Khajuraho are those that show couples in a great variety of sexual embraces. Several explanations have been offered as to why these images were created. They may have been designed to give sexual instruction, or as a spiritual test to see if a person can look at them and not feel lust.

It is more likely that they express religious ideas. Since the faces express contentment rather than lust, they may teach that one can find the transcendent world even in the midst of this world. Or they may express the unity of opposites, such as matter and spirit, male and female, human and divine. In any case they are a popular tourist attraction. K.C.

KHIDR. From the Arabic word for "The Green One." A popular figure in Islamic folklore, Khidr is a miracle-performing, immortal saint associated with spring and vegetation, and regarded by some mystics as an initiator into divine mysteries. Commentators have identified him with a servant of Moses mentioned in the KORAN (Sura 18:60-82). Scholars have also seen possible origins of the figure in GILGAMESH and Jewish legends concerning ELIJAH. R.E.

KIDDUSH. A Jewish ceremony and prayer proclaiming the holiness of the Sabbath or festival. It is recited, standing up, over a cup of wine on the eve of the Sabbath or festival. The person chanting the kiddush takes the kiddush cup in the palm of his right hand, chants the kiddush, and drinks, after which others at the table also sip the wine. If no wine is available, the kiddush may be recited over bread. L.K.

KIDRON, BROOK OF. Kidron means "a torrent valley or roiled valley." The Kidron, now almost completely dry except after a heavy downpour, runs for about three miles along the eastern wall of the Old City of Jerusalem. It begins northwest of the city on Mt. Scopus, runs between the Mt. of Olives and the temple mount, intersects the village of Silwan (Siloam) and the City of David, continues past the spring of Gihon (Pool of Siloam), merges into the Tyropean Valley and the Valley of Hinnom and eventually flows into the Dead Sea.

The valley played a prominent part in the history of the people of Israel and in the life of Christ. The upper part of the valley opposite the temple mount is often called the Wady Sitti Miriam, the Valley of the Lady Mary, from a church and monastery built there to honor her in the fifth century. Another name for the whole area is the Valley of Jehoshaphat.

The valley has always been the traditional burial ground for Jerusalem. Archaeological explorations indicate that the level of the valley floor is thirty-five to fifty feet higher now than in biblical times, which may explain why water seldom flows in the stream bed now. The area contains tens of thousands of tombs, including elaborate Hasmonean ones by legend connected with Absalom, Jehoshaphat, James, and Zechariah.

King David crossed the Kidron with the ark of the covenant during his troubles with his son Absalom. Christ crossed the Kidron often—for example, when he wept over the city, when he visited the home of Lazarus in Bethany, when he entered Jerusalem on a donkey, and when he prayed at Gethsemane on Maundy Thursday.

Jews and Muslims alike believe that the Valley of the Kidron, especially near the Golden Gate, will be the site for Judgment Day and prefer to be buried there so that they will not have to be transported there again for judgment. Orthodox Jews resist any road repairs on the main highway from Jerusalem to the Jordan Valley or any archaeological research near the Kidron because they fear it will disturb those who are awaiting Judgment Day. T.J.K.

KIERKEGAARD, SØREN (1813–55). Danish philosopher and man of letters, generally regarded as the founder of EXISTENTIALISM. Kierkegaard was in violent reaction against the RATIONALISM that had dominated Europe since the ENLIGHTENMENT, and in particular he abhorred the philosophical system of HEGEL, who had tried to embrace all reality within a rationally structured world view. Kierkegaard believed that only someone standing outside of the world could see it in that way. But even philosophers are themselves part of the world and part of history. So over against the speculative philosopher Kierkegaard set what he called the "existing thinker." For such a thinker, everything is much less tidy. There is no coincidence of thought and reality, nothing is finished and complete, for we are always on our way from one thing to another, truth is not spread out objectively for our contemplation but has to be appropriated inwardly in passionate subjectivity. This does not mean that truth is an arbitrary matter, but that the deepest truths cannot be reached by argument or learned from textbooks. For instance, like PASCAL, Kierkegaard thought poorly of attempts to prove God's existence. That is something that can be known only in the inward appropriation of faith.

Courtesy of the Danish Ministry of Foreign Affairs

Søren Kierkegaard

Another way in which Kierkegaard expounded his philosophy was in terms of the stages of life—not so much chronological stages as stages of deepening. In the aesthetic stage (typified by Mozart's Don Juan) a human being lives for the immediate satisfaction of each situation of his life. Such a life is a series of episodes. The ethical stage introduces the seriousness of resolve and helps to unify life. But even the ethical is not the last word. Sometimes the ethical is suspended in the face of the higher demand of faith, as when Abraham resolved to sacrifice Isaac at the command (as he believed) of God. As already mentioned, faith cannot be proved. In the last resort, it demands what Kierkegaard calls a "leap." In that leap, the believer embraces the paradox, the unresolved contradiction that is nevertheless the truth of God. Hegel and the rationalists tried to resolve the contradiction and make it all acceptable to reasonable people. Kierkegaard teaches that "reason makes a collision," at which point one either takes offense and turns away or else makes the LEAP OF FAITH. The absolute paradox is the teaching that in Jesus Christ God has become human. There is no way that human reason can make sense of this. Yet, for Kierkegaard, this is the central truth of Christianity—that God has come among us as a servant.

Even critics of Kierkegaard who are put off by what they consider to be his irrationalism do not deny the perceptiveness and subtlety of many of his analyses of human existence, including such elusive phenomena as anxiety and sin. Though his works were neglected for many decades, Kierkegaard has turned out to be one of the most influential figures in the making of twentieth-century theology. Karl Barth, the Niebuhr brothers, Bultmann and the existentialist theologians, and Marcel and other Roman Catholics, have all been deeply indebted to him. J.M.

KIMBANGUISM. The Church of Jesus Christ on Earth by the Prophet Simon Kimbangu, to give this religion its full name, is the most successful of the numerous African nativist forms of Christianity that have appeared since the beginning of modern missionary endeavor on that continent, and was, in 1969, the first admitted to the World Council of Churches. Founded in the former Belgian Congo, it is now an influential though non-partisan force in Zaire.

The founder, Simon Kimbangu (1889–1951), was first converted by Baptist missionaries, but after an increasingly independent work as evangelist and healer established his own movement in 1921. Fearing the sect's anti-European overtones, the Belgian colonial authorities arrested Kimbangu and sentenced him to death, though the sentence was commuted to life imprisonment. His followers compared his life and alleged miraculous healings to those of Jesus, and the imprisoned prophet was regarded as a living martyr until his end thirty years later.

Headed by sons of the founder, the church combines a Baptist form of worship with some ecstatic phenomena and extensive social service work. Its membership was over three million in several countries by the 1980s. R.E.

KING. Supreme, male ruler or sovereign over an independent nation or territory, often centered on a state or city, a permanent head of state, at times acclaimed as a sacred or divine person.

Kingship in the Ancient Near East. The styles of kingship, worldwide and throughout history, have developed differently. In Egypt, the pharaoh or king was believed to be a god or son of a god. His will was accepted absolutely as identical with the divine will. In Mesopotamia, only rarely was this pattern followed. Usually, the Mesopotamian king, while human, was accepted as uniquely the earthly agent of the nation's chief deity, possessing the god's unqualified authority and power. In both Egyptian and Mesopotamian culture, the king was thought to be solely responsible for the people's welfare in war and peace, and in the administration of justice. He also was considered to be in charge of the regularity of the seasons, fertility of the soil, rainfall, and freedom from epidemics and pestilences. At his inauguration, the divine king was required to be a model human being but, should he be judged by the people later to be out of touch with the god by age or sickness, he could be removed from office by assassination, suicide, or retirement. The petty monarchs of Syria-Palestine, as seen at Ebla, Ugarit, and among the Philistines, imitated the divine king pattern as closely as possible. They were often of foreign origin and ruled absolutely and independently with the support of a military aristocracy.

Kingship Among the Hebrew People. From their beginnings as a people, Israel had a tradition of THEOCRACY. Whatever their leaders might be called, supremacy belonged to Yahweh. Theocracy was the ideal, however far from it certain leaders and "kings" might deviate. The Ten Commandments begin with this acknowledgment. Recent studies find striking parallels between biblical covenants and extra-biblical "suzerainty treaty" forms, as that of vassal to lord, which are theological as well as political in character.

The most extensive early experience Israel had with kings was with the Egyptian god-king, the pharaoh. The Joseph and Exodus accounts highlight Pharaoh's arbitrary, irrational abuse of his absolute authority. In the settlement of Canaan, Israel knew well what Canaanite kings were like (I Sam. 8:11-18; the disaster of Abimelech, Judg. 9:6; Jotham's fable, Judg. 9:7-15; Samson's and David's experiences with the Philistine kings).

In early OT writings, YAHWEH is referred to as King only occasionally (Deut. 33:5; I Sam. 12:12; Exod. 15:18). With the connotation the term "king" had, it is understandable that Israel hesitated to call Yahweh King. The regular designation of Yahweh as King appears in Isaiah 6:5; Micah 2:13; and repeatedly in Jeremiah and the Psalms, long after the monarchy was well established.

The PATRIARCH was the earliest kind of leader Israel knew. The patriarch had power through inheritance and popular support, and was accorded respect almost to the point of absolutism. The role model of the patriarch was the shepherd. The ideal shepherd projected theologically, as in Psalm 23; Micah 5:12; and Ezekiel 34:12-23, was a self-sacrificing man whose primary concern was for the well-being of his sheep. The shepherd ideal was the hallmark of Israel's expectations of a leader, whether he was called patriarch, judge, prince, prophet, priest, messiah, or king. Whenever Israel's kings adopted absolutism (as Ahab, Athaliah, Ahaz, and Manasseh), the traditional ideal sparked strong revolutions that attempted the reinstitution of theocratic principles. Thus, throughout the monarchy, the king-as-shepherd theology came to serve as the nation's "constitutional" safeguard against tyranny.

Moses and Joshua functioned as patriarchs. During the early settlement in Canaan, the tribes were ruled by village chieftains or elders who, in times of war, chose a person to lead the militia against the enemy, as Jephthah (Judg. 11:9), Deborah (Judg. 4-5), Gideon (Judg. 8:2), and Abimelech (Judg. 9:6). The writer of Judges attributes the social chaos of the time to the lack of a king (19:1; 21:25).

Samuel ruled as a trusted PROPHET-JUDGE. Saul, first in Israel to bear the title of king, arose as a charismatic leader and was mainly, though only partially successfully, a military commander.

David, the first widely accepted king, was so successful in fulfilling the ideal that, even long afterward, he was regarded as the model Hebrew king. He instituted succession by inheritance, beginning a dynasty that remained virtually unbroken for four hundred years, to the destruction of the nation. The theocratic character of David's reign was symbolized by his bringing the ark and the tabernacle into Jerusalem in order to reinstitute sacrificial worship and by his making plans for the Temple. The "covenant with David" (II Sam. 7:11-16) describes David's adherence to Israel's ideal of kingship as theocracy.

In sum, there seem to be in the OT two opposing answers to the question, Should Israel have kings? There are warnings against absolutism, as in I Samuel 8:5-18; there are directives for the king Yahweh directs Israel to have (Deut. 17:14-20; Ezek. 45:7-9). Basically, these are a negative and a positive description of Israel's traditional ideal for its leaders, essentially theocratic and characteristically patriarchal and paternalistic. Israel's ideal provided a hope for better kings and kingdoms yet to come (see KINGDOM OF GOD and MESSIAH). In the Maccabean period (165-37 B.C.) certain high priests assumed the title of king and were acclaimed Messiah, such as John Hyrcanus (135-105 B.C.).

Kingship in the New Testament. The message of the NT is that the Messianic hope is fulfilled in Jesus Christ. Although, during his ministry, Jesus declined to be made king (John 6:15) and refused the title "King of the Jews" (Matt. 27:11; Mark 15:2 and pars. Luke 23:3; compare Matt. 27:37 and pars.), he chose to enter Jerusalem as a king (Matt. 21:5; Isa. 62:11; Zech. 9:9) and claimed allegiance above all earthly kings (Matt. 6:33). His kingdom is an everlasting kingdom (Rom. 14:10-11; compare Isa. 45:23; II Pet. 1:11), yet to be consummated (Luke 22:16; I Cor. 15:24-28). He is "Lord of lords and King of kings" (Rev. 17:14) to whom every knee must bow on the Day of the Lord (Phil. 2:9-11).

P.L.G.

KINGDOM OF GOD/KINGDOM OF HEAVEN.

This is a typically Jewish phrase to denote the new order of human life in society set up by God's saving activity as King. A background in the OT and intertestamental literature is indispensable for an appreciation of this term in Jesus' ministry and the early church.

The Old Testament. The phrase "kingdom of God" or "of heaven" (which is synonymous with it) is, contrary to appearance, a tribute to God's role as King rather than a statement of human affairs under divine rule. It is thus a dynamic, not a static, concept, and could well be translated as "God ruling." The rule of God is celebrated in many ways by the OT writers at all periods of the nation's history and pilgrimage, but especially in the Psalms. God is hailed as "eternal king" (125:13) since God is Creator from the beginning (95:3-5). God rules the nations (22:28; Jer. 46:18; 48:15; 51:57), and controls both all nature (33:13ff.) and the heavenly world (I Kings 22:19), where God sits on a royal throne (29:10; 93:1-4). As such the Creator is worthy of praise by all creation (97:1; 98:6ff.), and especially by Israel, the chosen nation, who are called to live under kingly authority and to obey God and God's word (48:2; 99:1; Jer. 8:19).

Israel's kings, notably David and Solomon, were to reflect the nation's dependence on its God, Yahweh, since they ruled in God's name (II Chron. 9:8). But the story of the OT is one of national disobedience and rebellion against their rightful Lord. Hence the two periods of exile (in the ninth and sixth centuries B.C.) simply confirmed the sad verdict that Israel had thrown off the pledge of submission to Yahweh. Their later kings had sought worldly power and political status in the face of various imperial forces that surrounded them, the Assyrians and the Babylonians. This bitter experience of exile and the collapse of Israelite theocracy gave rise to a new dimension in understanding the kingdom of God.

In the Babylonian exilic period, the hope became articulate that Israel's secure future would be found in a coming of God to establish a new age, often called the Messianic Era, but better described as God's reign exerted over all peoples by a supernatural intervention into mundane affairs. The precise terms of this hope vary, and it was refined in the second century B.C. with the rise of the apocalyptic seers who set world history on a cosmic canvas, looked beyond political changes, and greeted the arrival of a new world, wholly divine and miraculous in its coming, destined to come at a time when God would appear and break upon earth with catastrophic force. Daniel's chapters 2 and 7 are the best example of this literature, which spawned a new genre of writing, seen also in I Enoch, the Assumption of Moses, and Jubilees. There is a clear distinction drawn between "this age" and "the age to come." The advent of God's kingdom marks the boundary (Dan. 2:44).

The New Testament. Central to Jesus' proclamation was the announcement of the kingdom of God ("of heaven" is found chiefly in Matthew, where it occurs thirty-two times, whereas he has "of God" only four times, but with no appreciable change of meaning). It is found about eighty times in Jesus' reported teaching in the four Gospels.

More than these statistics, the Synoptic Gospels show how Jesus' whole ministry was modeled on the assumption that he both proclaimed the nearness of the rule of God (Mark 1:15; Matt. 4:17; Luke 4:43) and acted in such a way as to bring the power of the new age into human experience (Luke 11:20). The "sign" of the kingdom's power, which Jesus regarded as a force at work, was his confrontation with Satan by which the latter's "kingdom" was being invaded and his power neutralized (Matt. 12:22-32) as Jesus drove out demons and healed the sick. To that extent the kingdom of God was already present in Jesus' ministry, and he both announced its imminence and embodied its reality. As Origen's phrase put it, "He is himself the kingdom" (autobasileia). The parables Jesus told all illustrate the nature of the kingdom's scope and significance (Mark 4; Matt. 13) and warn against false notions, such as the Zealot determination to bring in the kingdom of God by a holy war against Rome (see Mark 12:17-17). Jesus moreover invited men and women to enter the kingdom here and now (Mark 10:17-27).

Yet there is equally another strand to Jesus' teaching. He promised that the kingdom would come in power beyond his death and resurrection (Mark 9:1), and associated this promise with the coming of the Son of man in glory (Mark 8:38; 14:62 as well as the apocalyptic chapter, Mark 13; Matt. 24). The parables of the kingdom, notably in Matthew (for example, chap. 25), all point forward to a future climax at which the kingdom will come as a cataclysmic intervention in world history and lead to both resurrection and judgment (see Luke 14:14). It is not easy to relate these two parts of Jesus' teaching and expectation, but the most satisfactory view sees them both as true to Jesus' announcement with the special sense given to the kingdom's present reality, namely that the signs are anticipatory of a future and fuller disclosure of the kingdom's presence beyond the cross. This is to be linked with the coming of the Spirit at Pentecost, but may also include future events, such as the fall of Jerusalem in A.D. 70 (Mark 13:14-23) and, some maintain, point to the coming of Christ as Judge at the end of the age (13:26) when the kingdom will be consummated.

The apostles' teachings continued these two strains, though with new terminology. For Paul, the kingdom is a present reality (Rom. 14:17; I Cor. 4:20), and Christ is now reigning in the church (I Cor. 15:25). Yet Paul anticipates a future kingdom of God (15:24; 27, 28), when the present reign of Christ merges into the ultimate rule of God and the kingdom is universally acknowledged. The latter aspect is fleshed out in the dramatic scenario of the book of Revelation (1:8; 4:8; 11:17; 15:3; 17:14; 19:6, 15). R.M.

KINGDOMTIDE. The portion of the Protestant church year after PENTECOST and before ADVENT (the Sundays after Pentecost or the Sundays after Trinity in other liturgical calendars) in which no major festivals of the life of Christ occur, and which centers on the teachings of Jesus, especially on the Kingdom of God.

J.C.

Photo by H. T. Frank

The title page of the original King James Bible (1611)

KING JAMES VERSION (KJV). This is the principle English translation of the Holy Scriptures, which for more than three centuries has had impact on the spiritual life of the church and has influenced the literature of many generations. It was preceded by several earlier translations, particularly the heavily annotated Geneva Bible, beloved by the Calvinists, and the Bishops' Bible, authorized by the ecclesiastical authorities for use in church, but never widely accepted by the people.

At the Hampton Court Conference, which was convened in 1604 by James I "for the hearing, and for the determining of things pretended to be amiss in the church," Puritan John Reynolds, president of Corpus Christi College, Oxford, made a motion that a new translation of Scriptures be made. The king seized upon the suggestion and the project was approved immediately.

The work of translation was entrusted to three panels of scholars, a total of forty-seven. Instructions were given that the Bishops' Bible was to be followed, and that no marginal notes were to be employed. The regulation pertaining to the Bishops' Bible was not scrupulously observed, for the translators worked with the original texts before them and checked the previous versions in English and other languages.

Although the KJV has been long called the Authorized Version, the records do not confirm this. The Privy Council Records from 1600 to 1613 were destroyed by fire. Yet it became the Authorized Version because of its general acceptance in Great Britain and throughout the English-speaking world. No other Bible has quite captured the cadence of the KJV, and even those unmoved by its spiritual message are strong in their praise of its literary merit. Even in the 1980s, with the plethora of contemporary translations, sales of the KJV have held up better than any single version.

R.H.

KING, MARTIN LUTHER, JR. (1929–68). Martin Luther King, Jr., American clergyman and civil rights leader, was born January 15, in Atlanta, Georgia, the second of three children. Named at birth Michael Luther King, his father decided to change his own and his son's first name when Martin was six years old to honor the great reformer. King received a bachelor's degree in sociology from Morehouse College (1948), a bachelor of divinity degree from Crozer Theological Seminary (1951), and a doctor of philosophy degree from Boston University (1955). While studying in Boston, he married Coretta Scott, a fellow student, in 1953. During his first pastorate at the Dexter Avenue Baptist Church in Montgomery, Alabama, he inaugurated the year-long bus boycott, which had been launched by Mrs. Rosa Parks when she defied the municipal ordinance requiring segregated seating on buses. This action thrust the young black pastor into national prominence in the civil rights movement.

King had been greatly influenced by the writings of Mahatma Gandhi, especially his espousal of passive resistance and nonviolent civil disobedience. King formed the Southern Christian Leadership Conference (SCLC) with a program to promote desegregation. In 1960 he became the associate pastor, with his father, at Ebenezer Baptist Church in Atlanta. From that point he became an even more active campaigner and demonstrator in the cause of racial equality. He organized the March on Washington, August 28, 1963, when he gave his famed speech, "I Have a Dream." In January, 1964, he was Time magazine's "Man of the Year," the first black to receive this honor. Later the same year he was the recipient of the Nobel Peace Prize. In behalf of black voter registration, he was involved in the march from Selma to Montgomery, Alabama. Because he felt economics and poverty had a deep relationship with racism, on April 4, 1967, he declared: "The Great Society [President Lyndon Johnson's anti-poverty program] has been shot down on the battlefields of Vietnam."

Early in 1968 he was planning for a multiracial poor people's march on Washington. After flying to Memphis to support the cause of striking sanitation workers, he was killed on April 4, 1968, by an assassin's bullet. James Earl Ray, an escaped convict, pleaded guilty to the slaying and was sentenced to ninety-nine years in prison. Late in 1983 Congress passed legislation, subsequently signed by President Ronald Reagan, marking the third Monday in January as a national holiday in memory of King. (See also BLACK THEOLOGY.)

R.H.

I AND II KINGS. The books of Kings may be viewed as part of a major story that begins with the account of the creation of the world (Gen. 1) and extends to the report of the release from prison of the exiled Judean king Jehoiachin (II Kings 25:27-30). In the divisions of the Hebrew Bible, I, II Kings are classified as part of the "former prophets," that is, they conclude the section containing the books of Joshua, Judges, I, II Samuel, and I, II Kings.

Unity and Title. The two books were originally considered as one work in the Hebrew tradition. That they form a single unit can be seen from the fact that stories about the prophet Elijah are found both at the end of I Kings and the beginning of II Kings. The division into two books goes back to the Greek tradition. The title for the work is based, of course, on the contents of the books—material about the Israelite and Judean kings.

Contents. The material in the books covers three main periods: (a) the end of DAVID's reign, which continues the story line of II Samuel 20, and the rule of SOLOMON (I Kings 1–11); (b) the separation of Solomon's kingdom into ISRAEL and JUDAH, and the history of the two kingdoms (I Kings 12–II Kings 17); and (c) the history of the state of Judah after the destruction of the state of Israel by the Assyrians (II Kings 18–25).

Much of the books is concerned with the reigns of the various kings. For each Judean king, after the division of the kingdom, we are told the following: (a) the year of rule of the Israelite king when the Judean ruler became king, (b) facts about his age, length of reign, and the name of the queen mother, (c) evaluation of his rule in comparison with David, (d) events during his reign, (e) reference to where further information may be found in the book of Chronicles of the kings of Judah, and (f) concluding statements about his death and successor. For Israelite kings, we are told: (a) the year of the rule of the Judean king when the Israelite king began to rule, (b) statements about the length and place of his reign, (c) a condemnation of the ruler for his doing evil and walking in the way of the first Israelite king, Jeroboam, (d) events during his reign, (e) reference to further material related to his reign in the book of Chronicles of the kings of Israel, and (f) concluding statements about his death and successor. These two schemes are expanded when the author wished to report special material and events, particularly that associated with religious life and especially matters concerning the Temple in Jerusalem.

In addition to the material about the kings, the books contain special material about certain prophets, especially Elijah and Elisha (I Kings 17–II Kings 13), Isaiah (II Kings 19–20), Micaiah (I Kings 22), but also less significant prophetic figures. In many ways, the material has been edited to give prominence to the prophets, perhaps to suggest that the prophets as divine spokesmen possessed a special importance over against the political monarchs. In Solomon's reign, for example, the prophet Nathan plays a role in its beginning (I Kings 1) and the prophet Ahijah at its end (I Kings 11).

Composition. One thing seems clear about the composition of the two books. They were composed by editors whose sympathies lay with Judah and Jerusalem. All the kings of Israel are condemned for failure to remain loyal to the Judean family of David and to the Jerusalem Temple. Only two Judean kings, other than David and Solomon, are praised, namely Hezekiah (II Kings 18:5) and Josiah (II Kings 23:25), both of whom emphasized and purified worship in the Jerusalem Temple.

Various sources seem to have been available to those who produced the books. References are made to the "book of the acts of Solomon" (I Kings 11:41) as well as to the chronicles of the kings of the two states. Since the book concludes after the fall of Jerusalem in 587 B.C., undoubtedly the books were given their final editing after this event. Perhaps some form of the chronicles of both Israel and Judah survived the fall of Jerusalem and served as source material. Difficulties in the various versions, and even in the Hebrew text about the chronology of the kings and their reigns, suggest that the two state chronicles were probably kept without much cross reference to events in the other state. This means that the synchronisms between Israelite and Judean reigns were the work of the editors and not part of the original archives. In addition, the editors seem to have possessed collections and cycles of stories about various prophets, most Israelite, which they incorporated into their history. Much of the material at the end of II Kings has parallels in the book of Jeremiah (compare especially Jer. 52 with II Kings 25).

The Purpose of the Books. In addition to continuing the narrative story of history begun in Genesis, several specific interests can be noted in I, II Kings. (a) The reign of Solomon and the building of the Temple are presented as a major highpoint in the people's history. (b) History is shown to happen according to the will and word of God proclaimed through the prophets. (c) The books offer explanations for the tragic fall of both Judah and Israel. (d) The books were no doubt written for the benefit of those who survived the end of the state of Judah. Thus they could be read as lessons from the past, both as warnings and as promises for the people in thinking about and planning their future. J.H.

KIPLING, RUDYARD (1865–1936). The celebrated British novelist, short story writer, and poet is also the author of several hymns including "Non nobis, Domine!" "Father in Heav'n, Who Lovest All," and "God of Our Fathers, Known of Old." Born December 30, in Bombay, India, Kipling was sent home to England for schooling at Westward Ho in Devon, which he immortalized in Stalky and Company (1899). He returned to India in 1882 to work as a journalist but went back to England in 1889. Kipling received the Nobel prize for literature in 1907. Most famous of his works are The Light That Failed (1890), The Jungle Book (1894), The Second Jungle Book (1895), Captains Courageous (1897), and Kim (1901). N.H.

KIRIATH-JEARIM. This town, identified with a site near the modern Arab village of Abu Ghosh, 8½ miles northwest of Jerusalem, was the Baalah of Joshua 15:9-10 and I Chronicles 13:6. It was also known as Baale-Judah (II Sam. 6:2), Kiriath (Josh. 18:28), Kiriath-baal (Josh. 15:60; 18:14), and Kiriatharim (Ezra 2:25). As these names suggest, the place must have had a strong identification with indigenous religion before it submitted to the conquering Israelites under Joshua (Josh. 10:17). It is assigned to Benjamin in Joshua 15:60 and 18:28, but in Judges 18:12 (see I Chr. 2:50-53) it belongs to Judah. From biblical times to the present day it has been known as the place in which the ARK OF THE COVENANT resided after it was returned first to Beth-shemesh by its harassed Philistine captors and then hurried on from there by an awed Judean populace (I Sam. 5:1-7:2). Only David dared to remove the holy object from the house of Obed-edom the Gittite in Kiriath-jearim, forever setting the village free from its burden and its glory (II Sam. 6; I Chr. 13; 15). W.S.T.

KIRTANA. From the Sanskrit word meaning "praise." In HINDUISM, a BHAKTI devotional activity especially practiced by Vaisnavas of Bengal. It consists of ecstatic singing, and sometimes dancing, in praise of KRISHNA, usually regarded by its practitioners as the supreme God. Accompanied by drum and cymbals, kirtana is most frequently performed in homes or temples, but on occasion devotees may process with kirtana singing and dancing through the streets of towns and cities. The practice has been brought to the West by the International Society for KRISHNA CONSCIOUSNESS. R.E.

KISHON. A river that drains the western part of the valley of Jezreel (Esdraelon) in central Galilee. Several water sources converge in the center of the valley at a point about four miles northeast of Megiddo to form

Herbert G. May

The Kishon River

the Kishon. The course of the river follows the Carmel ridge all the way to the Mediterranean just east of present-day Haifa. For all but the last four of its approximately twenty-three-mile length, the Kishon is an intermittent stream, sometimes in flood after the winter rains but dry by mid-summer.

The most important event connected with the Kishon in the OT was the defeat of a force of nine hundred Canaanite chariots commanded by Sisera. According to Judges 4, the prophetess Deborah ordered Barak to summon ten thousand men from the northern tribes of Zebulun and Naphtali to challenge Sisera by the Kishon (vv. 7, 13). Whether because of divine intervention or because the spring flood had made the Kishon impassible to chariots (both possibilities seem to be raised in Judg. 5:19-21), the Canaanites were routed. Later Israel came to regard this as a classical example of God's saving intervention on Israel's behalf (Ps. 83:9).

The only other reference to the Kishon is also a bloody one. After his decisive victory in his contest with the prophets of Baal on top of Carmel, Elijah brought the losers down to the river and executed them there (I Kings 18:40). W.S.T.

KISLEV. See HEBREW CALENDAR.

KISS OF PEACE. The kiss of peace, or Christian greeting, a part of the Roman Catholic Mass, the Orthodox Eucharist, and the Lutheran Communion. It is often observed as a kiss or handshake in Protestant services. Of apostolic origin, the holy kiss is mentioned in Romans 16:16; I Corinthians 16:20; II Corinthians 13:12; I Thessalonians 5:26; and I Peter 5:14 (called "the kiss of love"). Other references to kissing in the NT include Luke 15:20 and Acts 20:37. The action symbolizes the unity of Christ and love that binds Christians together. The precise manner in which the action is performed varies, from a kiss on the mouth, to a kiss on the cheek, to an embrace or a handshake. It is usually called the pax or the peace, and the activity is known as "passing the peace" or "greeting one another in the name of the Lord." The sentence, "Peace be with you," often accompanies the kiss of peace. J.C.

KITTEL, GERHARD (1888–1948). A NT scholar, son of the famous OT scholar Rudolf Kittel, who edited the Biblia Hebraica, a standard edition of the Hebrew Bible. After studies at various German universities, including Leipzig, where he received his doctorate, Gerhard Kittel was appointed to Tübingen, where he spent most of his academic life (1926–1948).

His fame links him with the Theological Dictionary of the New Testament, whose German original version began to appear in sections from 1933 on (Eng. trans. 1964–76). He was its first and formative editor. His labor as editor is stamped on the early volumes (there are ten in all) and is recognized by the various contributors, one of whom paid tribute to him as "a genius of an editor." His views, like those of his father, on the Jewish people, the so-called Judenfrage ("question of the Jews") in Hitler's Germany, provoked much controversy and gave support to the racist "German Christian" movement in the 1930s. R.M.

KITTIM. See CYPRUS.

KNIGHTS (Templar and Hospitaler). Medieval religious orders to aid crusaders and pilgrims in the Middle East. The Order of the Poor Knights of Christ and of the Temple of Solomon, called Knights Templar for their site at Solomon's Temple, were a military order formed in Jerusalem in 1119 by French knight Hugues de Payens and companions to protect Holy Land pilgrims. Granted papal approval in 1128, the Templars lived austere under modified Cistercian rules and spread throughout Christendom. Headed by a Grand Master, their ranks included knights, sergeants, squires, and chaplains. Only knights wore their distinctive white mantle with a red Latin cross on the back. Faced with increasing Muslim victories, they moved from Jerusalem in 1187 to Acre, Caesarea, and finally to Cyprus. The Templar's depots between Europe and Palestine served as conduits for supplies and funds, and gradually became banks for Europe's trade, bringing the Templars great wealth. In 1307 when Pope Clement V was transferring the papacy to Avignon, he and Philip IV of France charged the Templars with Satanism, immorality, and heresy. Grand Master Jacques de Molay and many others confessed under torture and were burned. Clement suppressed the order in 1312. The Knights Hospitaler received some of their property, but Philip IV seized most. England's Edward II also appropriated some. The Templars' innocence is now generally conceded.

The origin of the Knights Hospitaler or Knights of the Order of the Hospital of St. John of Jerusalem (also called Knights of Rhodes and Knights of Malta) is uncertain. Beginning with hospital work in Jerusalem, the Hospitalers were organized about 1100 under Master Gerard and approved in 1153 by Pope Eugenius III. Members took vows of poverty, obedience, and chastity, some caring for the sick, others safeguarding pilgrims. In the eleventh century the Hospitalers established houses throughout Europe. On the Moslem capture of Acre (1291), they transferred to Cypress and in 1309 to Rhodes. Defeated by the Turks in 1522, they moved to Malta, later helping defeat the Turks at Lepanto (1571). Internal laxity prompted their decline and surrender to Napoleon in 1798. Although the order still has knights, its work today is largely hospital related.

C.M.

KNIGHTS OF COLUMBUS. A fraternal benefit society of Roman Catholic men founded by the Reverend Michael J. McGivney, curate of St. Mary's Church, New Haven, Connecticut. The organization was chartered by the state of Connecticut on March 29, 1882. Since then the society has spread to every state in the Union, as well as to Canada, Mexico, the Philippines, and several Latin American countries. More than 1,300,000 members had been listed by 1980, with more than 60 state councils and more than 5,000 subordinate councils serving under the supreme council, with headquarters in New Haven, Connecticut. The chief officer is the supreme knight.

The organization seeks to further charity, unity, brotherly love, and patriotism. It has promoted social welfare, war and disaster relief, parochial education, veterans' benefits, historical studies, and a number of other projects. The society operates an extensive insurance program for its membership.

Since 1947 the Knights of Columbus has sponsored an advertising program employing the major media that encourages listeners and readers to become involved in religious instruction. During recent wars in which the United States has been involved, the society has engaged in war relief, including setting up clubhouses for servicemen, and afterward has provided for veterans' training in a variety of fields. Scholarships have been supplied for children of knights killed in battle.

As an advocate of Catholic parochial education, the Knights of Columbus have been active in lobbying efforts seeking to influence Congressional legislation. The organization has fought for the revision of textbooks that it feels have misrepresented historical facts, particularly pertaining to the Catholic faith.

Other projects and programs undertaken by the society include the promotion of the priesthood as a vocation and underwriting the costs for telecasting papal ceremonies throughout the world by satellite. One churchman described the Knights of Columbus as "the American expression of Catholic Action."

R.H.

KNOWLEDGE. When we say that we know something, we are claiming to have a well-grounded understanding of it. In the history of philosophy, there have been many theories of knowledge, and in modern times, philosophy has been very much occupied with the theory of knowledge. One type of knowledge has come to be esteemed above all others, or has even come to be considered as the only genuine knowledge. This is the kind of knowledge exemplified in the natural sciences and is sometimes called empirical knowledge, because it is based on experience interpreted by reason. It is expressed in propositions, often of a high degree of generality. Of course, if one accepts that only empirical knowledge deserves the name of knowledge, then one has gone far along the road toward POSITIVISM. There is no way by which the knowledge of God or any other supersensible reality could be brought within a strictly empiricist EPISTEMOLOGY.

But many theologians and philosophers would challenge the present exaltation of empiricism. It would be pointed out that as well as knowledge of facts, which for empiricism is the paradigmatic case of knowledge, there is also knowledge of people, and in some ways this is more fundamental. In the experience of every individual, knowledge of people is earlier than knowledge of things, and, more than this, while we can know things only from the outside, our knowledge of people is more direct and intimate, for it is based on our immediate experience of living as human beings. Again, while knowledge is usually put into words or propositions, there is a vast penumbra of unspoken or tacit knowledge that provides the context for the propositions. Still another point is that there is a personal dimension in all knowledge, which reflects to some degree the interests and values of the knower. When knowledge is understood in this wider sense (and it would be arbitrary to restrict it in the way that the positivist does) then the way lies open to those types of knowledge that enter into religion and theology. (Compare FAITH AND KNOWLEDGE.)

J.M.

KNOX, JOHN (about 1515–72). Scottish religious reformer and architect of Scotland's Presbyterianism. Born in Haddington and educated at the University of Glasgow and St. Andrews, Knox was influenced by George Wishart, an early evangelical preacher in Scotland. About 1545 Knox converted to REFORMATION principles. In 1546, Wishart was burned by Cardinal David Beaton. A small group of men then invaded St. Andrews Castle, killed the cardinal, and for fifteen months resisted civil and church authorities. Knox's role is unclear, but he joined these resisters in 1547, serving as their pastor and preaching powerful evangelical sermons at St. Andrews Castle. That same year, French Catholic forces captured St. Andrews, and Knox was a prisoner for nineteen months, serving much of the time as a galley slave chained to an oar.

Released in 1549, he went to England to become a pastor at Berwick and in 1551 became a royal chaplain under Edward VI, whose Second Prayer Book he helped revise. On Mary's accession in 1553 to the English throne he fled to the Continent, met JOHN CALVIN, and briefly served an English refugee church at Frankfurt. A dispute over worship—he believed kneeling at Communion was idolatrous worship of the elements—resulted in his dismissal. In 1555 he briefly served an English congregation in Geneva. Late that year he was again in Scotland, successfully preaching forbidden Reformation views. In 1556 he married Marjorie Bowes; they had two sons. Hounded by Catholic authorities, he returned to Geneva in 1556 to pastor an English congregation. He published The First Blast of the Trumpet against the Monstrous Regiment of Women (1558) against Scotland's Mary of Guise. According to Knox, feminine rule was against both natural and divine law. Queen Elizabeth resented this and would not allow Knox to return to Scotland via England in 1559.

As head of Scotland's reforming party, Knox helped incite an uprising against Mary of Guise and her French allies. Knox asked the English for help, but Mary of Guise on her deathbed requested the withdrawal of foreign troops. After Mary of Guise died in 1560, Scotland's Parliament adopted Knox's "Scots Confession," the First Book of Discipline, and forbade performing or attending mass on pain of death. Mary, Queen of Scots, returned to Scotland in 1561 as a widow of nineteen. Knox denounced her immorality and practice of Catholicism and resisted her attempts to reinstate Roman Catholicism. She abdicated in 1567 and fled to England in 1568, leaving Protestant forces in control. Knox preached the coronation sermon of her infant son, James VI, and worked closely with the regent earl of Moray to entrench Protestantism. However, Moray was murdered in 1570 and Knox's influence diminished. He died in Edinburgh without living to see his work triumph. After Knox's death, however, Presbyterianism prevailed in Scotland. History of the Reformation of Religion within the Realm of Scotland, posthumously published, and a Treatise on Predestination (1560) stressing strict predestination, are Knox's two best writings.

C.M.

KOAN. Japanese term derived from the Chinese word kung-an, meaning literally "public record," in the sense of a precedent in law that serves as a test case or standard example. In ZEN Buddhism, koans are exercises in the form of puzzles or enigmatic statements used as a focus for meditation and for dialogue between a Zen master and a disciple, to bring the student up against the limitations of the rational mind and facilitate a breakthrough to satori or enlightenment. The use of koans originated in the "golden age" of Chinese Zen during the T'ang Dynasty (A.D. 618–906). They were recorded most importantly in the Blue Cliff Records by Setchō (980–1052) and the book called the "Gateless Barrier" of Mumon Ekai (compiled 1228). In Japan, to which Zen was transmitted in the thirteenth century, koans were systematized into a course by the priest Hakuin (1685–1768). They are now used primarily in the Rinzai school of Zen to which he belonged.

Koans are formally assigned one at a time by a Zen master to a student. In subsequent interviews, the teacher will ask the student to demonstrate its meaning, perhaps wordlessly, until he is satisfied. Famous koans include "What is the sound of one hand?" "What was your face before you were born?" and anecdotal questions and answers such as, "What is the Buddha? Three pounds of flax," said by a monk who was weighing flax when asked.

R.E.

KOHELETH. See ECCLESIASTES.

KOINE GREEK. See LANGUAGES OF THE ANCIENT NEAR EAST; GREEK RELIGION, PHILOSOPHY, AND LANGUAGE.

KOINONIA. See FELLOWSHIP.

KOL NIDRE. The Hebrew phrase meaning "all vows." The opening words of the evening service that begins the Jewish DAY OF ATONEMENT, also called Yom Kippur. The declaration states that all rash and unfulfilled vows made during the year be counted as null and void. It refers only to vows made between the individual and God, not between person and person; these can only be canceled by mutual agreement.

L.K.

KONARAK. A famous temple of the sun god of HINDUISM, Surya, located in Orissa state, India. Constructed in the thirteenth century A.D., this temple is in the form of a gigantic chariot, the sun's vehicle as he rides across the sky. It is celebrated also for its beautiful, and often erotic, sculpture. The explicit nature of some of this work is probably related to the Tantric notion of the ultimate oneness of the material and the spiritual, with its implication that the one can be found experientially through the other.

R.E.

KONKO KYO. A Japanese term meaning "religion of golden light." One of the "new religions" of Japan, Konko Kyo was founded by the peasant Kawate Bunjiro (1814–83), known by his followers as Konko Daijin, in 1859. After a series of misfortunes ascribed to the demonic god Konjin, Kawate believed himself directed by a benevolent high god, Tenchi Kane no Kami, to mediate between heaven and earth. He devoted the remainder of his life to this ministry, which after his death eventuated in the Konko Kyo church.

The most distinctive practice of Konko Kyo is toritsugi, "mediation," an occasion for individual spiritual guidance by a clergyman of the church, which has been compared with confession in the Roman Catholic Church. Liturgical worship, offered daily in most churches, is SHINTO in character although presented to the monotheistic Konko Kyo deity rather than to Shinto Kami.

For practical reasons the religion was registered as a Shinto sect until 1945. It is headed by two chief officials, a spiritual leader, the Kyoshu, who is a descendant of the founder, and a Kyokan or chief administrator. Konko Kyo has churches in Japan and abroad, educational and welfare work, and some 500,000 adherents. Many of its priests are women.

R.E.

KORAH. There are at least six individuals in the OT with this name, sometimes also spelled Kore or Core. One was a son of Esau and Oholibamah, who founded a tribe or clan in Edom. Another was the grandson of Esau, also an Edomite sheik. Probably the best-known Korah, together with Dathan and Abiram, was the leader of a rebellion against Moses and Aaron in the desert over the spiritual and political leadership of the people of Israel. Though several different rebellions seem to be woven together in the OT account, Numbers 16 tells how this Korah argued that the whole people of God were holy, not just the spiritual leaders appointed from the tribe of Levi. When Moses invited Korah to a trial by ordeal, Yahweh ordered Moses and Aaron to separate themselves from the Korathites and then burned them up with fire. Apparently the story was included to emphasize the spiritual authority of the priestly party and to silence opposition to their leadership. Other biblical Korahs include a son of Hebron, a grandson of Kohath, and a son of Imnah. At a later period, men known as Korathites from a Levitical family served the temple as gatekeepers, bakers of sacred bread, and under King David, as cited in several psalms, as sacred singers and musicians.

T.J.K.

KORAN. See QUR'AN.

KOREAN RELIGION. Through the centuries the ancient and enduring Korean folk religion has coexisted with Confucian, Taoist, and Buddhist beliefs and practices introduced from China. Roman Catholicism entered Korea in the late eighteenth century as an underground movement that produced many martyrs. Protestants, at first chiefly Methodists and Presbyterians, began work in 1884. Under Japanese rule, 1910-45, Shinto was propagated, only to disappear when Korea regained independence at the end of World War II. In addition, various new religions have flourished during the last hundred years.

Folk religion has honored and feared a wide variety of supernatural beings, including the spirits of mountains and rivers, ghosts of the dead, werewolves, and the legendary founder of Korean society, Tangun. Tangun was the descendant of a high god and a she-bear, and he taught the people to worship Hanunim (or Hananim), the one supreme God, whose name the early Protestants adopted as the name of the Christian God.

The practitioners of folk religion included exorcists, geomancers, and fortune tellers. Various rites guard against evil, hostile forces, and invoke the favor of forces that can be persuaded to give blessing. Even after Korea was liberated from Japanese rule, "Spirit Posts," large logs carved and painted with grotesque features, were placed upright at the entrance to villages and were honored with traditional rites.

From as early as 1100 B.C. Korea was influenced by Chinese culture. CONFUCIANISM was introduced during the Han dynasty (206 B.C.—A.D. 220) and has remained the dominant intellectual and moral force down to the present. Early in the fifth century A.D., BUDDHISM was introduced and produced a rich heritage of art and architecture. It became the main source of beliefs about life after death and the standard for burial customs. Buddhist monks and nuns, however, were seen as a threat to ancestor veneration. Tensions between Confucian emphasis on the family and the Buddhist quest for individual salvation often spilled over into the political realm. The Koryo dynasty (A.D. 936-1392) was dominated by Buddhist ideology, and in reaction to this the succeeding Yi dynasty (1392-1910) was strongly Confucian and anti-Buddhist.

In the 1890s a movement called Tong-hak (Eastern Learning) arose in protest against Western influences and Japanese encroachment. It is officially known as Ch'undo-ky (Religion of the Heavenly Way). Other new movements have appeared from time to time. Only one, the UNIFICATION CHURCH of Sun-Myung Moon, has spread beyond Korea. It emphasizes the evil of Communism and foretells the coming perfect era of peace and material prosperity, under the "Lord of the Second Coming," usually thought to be Moon himself.

Catholicism is a strong force with a well-trained Korean clergy and sophisticated lay leadership. The church leaders have often protested against authoritarian government practices. Presbyterians constitute the largest Protestant group, though they are divided into separate denominational organizations. Together with the Methodists they have stressed higher education, health care, and participation in worldwide Christian activities. Many have been active in politics.

K.C.

KOSHER. The state of being fit to eat or drink, according to the Jewish dietary laws. The laws appear in Leviticus and again in Deuteronomy. Clean and unclean four-legged creatures are characterized in Leviticus 11:1-8; clean and unclean fishes are described in Leviticus 11:9-12; unclean birds are listed in Leviticus 11:13-19; forbidden and permitted winged insects are dealt with in Leviticus 11:20-23; and other unclean creatures are enumerated in Leviticus 11:29-43. The characteristics of clean and unclean beasts, fishes, and birds are repeated in Deuteronomy 14:3-20.

To be kosher, four-legged animals must chew their cud, have parted hooves, and be cloven-footed. Thus pigs (and their products—pork, ham, bacon, lard, etc.), hares, camels, donkeys, horses are not kosher. Cows are kosher, and sheep, goats, and oxen are also kosher, with the exception of part of their abdominal fat and hip sinew. Animals that are defective, diseased, crippled, mauled, shot dead, or die of natural causes are forbidden. So are creatures that have paws or travel on their bellies.

Fishes that have fins and scales while in the water are kosher. Thus catfish and other scaleless fish and all shellfish (lobsters, clams, crabs, oysters, shrimp, scallops) are not kosher. Neither are seals or whales. All birds of prey and those that live in dark places or marshy land are not kosher. Only those insects with jointed legs (for example, crickets, grasshoppers) are permitted.

Animals and poultry permitted by the Bible must be killed according to Jewish law. Moreover, since the blood of beasts and birds is forbidden (Lev. 17:12-14), their meat must be made kosher for eating by soaking (for half an hour) and covering with salt (leaving it for one hour) before cooking.

Any mixture of meat and dairy products is strictly forbidden. This is based on the threefold repetition of the biblical prohibition against seething a kid in its mother's milk (Exod. 23:19; 34:26; Deut. 14:21). Separate dishes and utensils are required for preparing and serving meat and dairy meals.

According to the Bible, God differentiated the clean from the unclean creatures to set the Jews apart as a holy people. God concludes the commandments: "For I am the Lord who brought you up out of the land of Egypt, to be your God; you shall therefore be holy, for I am holy" (Lev. 11:45). Attempts have been made to explain the dietary laws on the basis of hygiene. This explanation, however, has been criticized as missing the basic intent of the laws, which is to instill holiness in a people. Nor all Jews keep kosher. In 1885, a conference of United States Reform rabbis in Pittsburgh affirmed that "all laws regulating diet are apt to obstruct modern spiritual elevation." L.K.

KRAEMER, HENDRIK (1888–1965). For three decades in the middle of the twentieth century, Kraemer, a Dutch layman, probably exercised as great an influence on missionary thinking as any other single person in the Protestant world. He served the Netherlands Bible Society from 1922 to 1936 in Indonesia, where he acquired an expert knowledge of the relation of Christianity to other faiths and cultures. He was asked to write a book in preparation for the third World Missionary Conference in 1936 and produced the influential volume The Christian Message in a non-Christian World. He served for a while as professor at Leiden but was interned by the Germans in a concentration camp toward the end of World War II. In 1947 he became the first director of the Ecumenical Institute at the Chateau de Bossey, where his extensive knowledge of theology and his genuinely ecumenical outlook, contributed greatly to the reputation of the institute.

W.G.

KRISHNA. In HINDUISM, Krishna is the BHAKTI god par excellence. Regarded by some schools as an AVATAR of VISHNU and by others as the supreme God in his own right, Krishna's combination of incomparable charm and omnipotent divine might makes him a peerless ideal and object of devotional love for millions. The Krishna mythology, as collated from several sources such as the MAHABHARATA (including the BHAGAVAD GITA) and the Srimad Bhagavatam, tells us that the god was born in human form into a royal house, but when the wicked king, Kamsa, tried to slay him, he was smuggled into the country to be brought up by a cowherd, Nanda, and his wife Yasoda. Many stories are told of him as a mischievous infant who nonetheless contained within him the eternal godhead. Once, for example, he put some clay in his mouth, and when his exasperated mother tried to take it out, she saw within the entire universe. As a child he also destroyed demons and humbled the Vedic god INDRA.

On becoming a youth of irresistible appeal, Krishna engaged in much amorous play with the gopis, or milkmaids, of his community, who on hearing his flute of an evening would leave their legitimate husbands to dance and entertain the young god. Sometimes he would hide, and they would search for him in tears; at other times, he might multiply himself so that each would think she was dancing with him alone. His favorite was Radha, often worshiped as his consort. The gopis, in the utter abandonment of their love for the Lord, are seen as the ideal of the Krishna devotee.

In time Krishna, with his brother Balarama, left this paradisaical life at Vrindavan (where he lived as a youth and a major place of pilgrimage today), killed King Kamsa, and set up court as a ruler in Dvaraka. He then took part in the great war recounted in the Mahabharata as King Arjuna's charioteer, in which capacity he delivered the mighty discourse of the Bhagavad-Gita. But upon his return to Dvaraka, his men fell to quarreling. Saddened and unable to stop them, Krishna wandered into a forest, where he was accidentally shot by a hunter, the only Hindu god to die a tragic death before returning to his eternal home.

Though undoubtedly drawn from several sources, this composite Krishna myth explains his appeal. He fills at once several major divine archetypes. He is marvelous child, divine lover, actor in history, mature sage, and tragic hero. His worship is characterized by PUJA and by such ecstatic singing and dancing as in KIRTANA.

R.E.

KRISHNA CONSCIOUSNESS, INTERNATIONAL SOCIETY FOR. Commonly called the Hare Krishna movement, this organization promoting devotion of the BHAKTI type to Krishna as the "supreme personality of Godhead" was founded in America by A. C. Bhaktivedanta Swami (Abhay Charan De, 1896–1977) in 1965. In the tradition of the medieval Bengali saint Caitanya, it emphasizes KIRTANA, devotion through singing, dancing, and chanting the Hare Krishna MANTRA. Colorful and sometimes controversial, this movement has made bhakti visible throughout the world.

R. E.

KRISHNAMURTI (1895– ). Jiddu Krishnamurti has been a leading spiritual figure of the twentieth century. Born of a BRAHMIN family near Madras, India, he was raised by theosophists who expected that he would fulfill the role of world teacher. When he was a young adult, however, a series of mysterious inner experiences changed his view of his vocation. In 1929 he left the Theosophical Society, rejecting any formalized role or religion for himself. He has since traveled about the earth as a lecturer and teacher, presenting a path of "choiceless awareness" beyond ordinary thought. Many of his talks have been published, and he has attracted a devoted following.

R. E.

KSHITIGARBHA. From the Sanskrit word meaning literally "earth-womb." A BODHISATTVA of MAHAYANA BUDDHISM whose worship became especially popular in China and Japan, where he is known respectively as Ti-ts'ang and Jizō. He is considered protector of souls of the departed. In Japan he is especially regarded as guardian and guide of dead children in the other world and is often invoked on their behalf. He is also perceived as one who watches women in childbirth, travelers, and all in need. Wayside shrines to Jizō are very common in Japan, as are images in temple courtyards. He is usually portrayed as a shaven-headed monk of benign countenance.

R. E.

KUBERA. In HINDUISM, the mythological king of the yakshas, or nature spirits. He is also god of the North and of wealth. In Sanskrit his name means literally "ugly body," and he is portrayed as a paunchy, misshapen dwarf holding a moneybag or a pomegranate. He is said to live in great luxury in a palace near Himalayan Mount Kailas, where SHIVA dwells. A popular figure in the Hindu epics and PURANAS with very deep roots in Indo-European folklore, his image is frequently carved on temples as a guardian, though he has no extensive devotional cultus today. In the literature of BUDDHISM he sometimes appears as an attendant of the BUDDHA.

R. E.

Courtesy of Religious News Service

Kathryn Kuhlman

KUHLMAN, KATHRYN (1910?–76). A charismatic evangelist and faith healer who through her preaching services, television and radio programs, and books became widely known in the United States, Canada, and in many parts of the world. She was an ordained Baptist minister (American Baptist churches).

Miss Kuhlman did not discuss her age. She was born in Concordia, Missouri, presumably in 1910. Her father, Joe, was mayor of Concordia and was greatly admired by his daughter, although he despised members of the clergy so heartily that he would cross the street to avoid meeting them. Her mother, Emma Walkenhorst, was a devout Methodist.

The young Kathryn was only thirteen when she underwent an intense religious experience, followed by a feeling she had been called to the ministry. Dropping out of high school at the end of her sophomore year, she began preaching at the age of seventeen. She was first ordained by the Evangelical Church Alliance, starting her itinerant preaching career in Idaho.

For twenty years she worked among poor farming congregations in the Midwest. In that period, she recounted, she attended a number of healing services and became very disillusioned by the practices of many faith healers. She felt their healing lines were manipulative and impersonal.

In 1946, while minister of a congregation in Franklin, Pennsylvania, she received what she called "the baptism in the Holy Spirit." In one of her services in the Franklin church, unbeknownst to her, a woman in the congregation was cured of a tumor. Pittsburgh became the center of her ministry in 1947. For many years she refused to travel. But in the 1960s and 1970s she accepted invitations to other parts of the country and soon was drawing large crowds in the major cities on the East and West coasts.

In conducting a healing service, she would designate who were the ones in the audience who would be healed and these individuals would be escorted to the platform by ushers. When she laid her hands on the head of an individual, that person would (literally) fall to the floor. Miss Kuhlman attributed this reaction to the "power of the Holy Spirit."

While professing believers were healed in the services conducted by other faith healers, it was just as likely that atheists and unbelievers would be healed in Miss Kuhlman's meetings. Allen Spraggett, psychic researcher and former religious editor of the Toronto Star, once said that Kathryn Kuhlman was the "greatest faith healer since biblical times." Miss Kuhlman died February 27, 1976 from complications following open heart surgery in a Tulsa, Oklahoma, hospital.

R.H.

KU KLUX KLAN (KKK). Several secret organizations advocating white supremacy, starting just after the Civil War. The name is fashioned from the Greek word kyklos, circle, and the English word "clan" and spelled phonetically.

The first Klan was a secret society established in the South during the Reconstruction Period. The organization was launched in the fall of 1865 in Pulaski, Tennessee. Wearing white robes and hoods with white sheets covering their horses, the Klan members set out to keep blacks from voting, a privilege granted by the Reconstruction Acts of 1867, and the Fourteenth Amendment of the Constitution. Many blacks and their white sympathizers were beaten by members of the Klan.

The first organized meeting was in Nashville in 1867. It resulted in the election of the KKK's first leader, or Grand Cyclops, Nathan Bedford Forrest, a former Confederate general. The Klan spread into the Carolinas, Georgia, Alabama, and Mississippi. In Louisiana a similar organization was known as the Knights of the White Camelia. Other groups were called the White League or the Invisible Circle. Congress passed "Force Laws" in 1871 and 1872, which gave President Grant the authority to use federal troops against the Klan and related groups. The societies soon disappeared.

In 1915 William J. Simmons, a former Methodist clergyman, organized a new Klan at a meeting on Stone Mountain, near Atlanta. In general, it followed the principles of the earlier Klan although it operated ostensibly as a patriotic, Protestant fraternal society. It directed its activities not only against blacks, but against immigrants, Jews, and Roman Catholics. Its appeal reached beyond the South to other parts of the country. By the 1920s the revived Klan had enlisted more than two million members. But public criticism of the movement and internecine quarrels weakened the organization. By World War II this phase of Klan history came to an end.

Samuel Green, an Atlanta physician, revived the Klan again in 1945. Green died in 1949, and the Klan split into several conflicting groups, although all opposed racial integration. Increased civil rights activities during the 1960s started a new wave of Klan violence. Klansmen were involved in a string of terroristic attacks, including the bombing of a Birmingham church in which four little black girls were killed. President Lyndon B. Johnson used the F.B.I. to investigate the Klan; as a result several Klan members received prison terms.

Membership fell to about six thousand in the 1970s. In 1979 five persons were killed in a shootout between Klan members and anti-Klan forces at Greensboro, North Carolina. Later in the same decade and into the 1980s middle class whites became alarmed about job competition and special programs for blacks and other minority groups. This fueled new interest in the Klan, which reportedly had attracted some ten thousand members.

R.H.

KUMARAJIVA. Buddhist monk and scholar of Indo-Iranian background who lived A.D. 350-413, whose extensive translations of the literature of MAHAYANA BUDDHISM played a key role in the development of that religion in China. Born in central Asia, Kumarajiva became a monk at age twenty, and in 383 he was taken to China by a conquering Chinese army. Detained there but lavishly patronized by Chinese rulers, Kumarajiva and a large staff of Chinese scholars working under his direction translated from Sanskrit to Chinese and edited such important texts as the Lotus, Heart, Diamond, and Vimalakirtinirdesa Sutras, and the works of the great Mahayana philosopher Nagarjuna. In addition, his correspondence vividly portrays the life of the Chinese Buddhism of his time.

R.E.

KÜNG, HANS (1928- ). Born in Switzerland, after Vatican II he speedily emerged as one of the leaders of the new breed of Catholic theologians. His pronouncements have often been controversial and have led to conflicts with the ecclesiastical authorities. Although he is a professor at the University of Tübingen (West Germany), he has been deprived of the status of a Catholic teacher. His work has followed three main directions: (1) ecumenics, in which he has reached out especially to the churches of the Reformation; (2) fundamental theology or apologetics, in which he has tried to state basic Christian beliefs in conversation with the thinking of a secular age; and (3) a critique of some of the authoritarian structures within the Roman Catholic church.

Courtesy of The Westminster Press

Hans Küng

His ecumenical interest became apparent in the early work Justification (Eng. trans. 1964), based on his doctoral thesis done under the supervision of the distinguished Catholic theologian Louis Bouyer. In this book Küng addressed himself to the doctrine that had been at the heart of the differences between Catholics and Protestants at the time of the Reformation. Küng's method is to compare the teaching on justification by the Council of Trent with the restatement of the Protestant position by Karl Barth. The book is clear proof of Küng's power as a theologian—indeed, judged from a strictly theological point of view, it contains some of his best work. His conclusion is that the differences between the Catholic and Protestant understandings of justification are not so fundamental as to justify the separation of the two groups into different churches. In his later book The Church (Eng. trans. 1967), Küng continued to seek common ground within a broadly based concept of the church. The book was dedicated to the archbishop of Canterbury, but the dialogue partners in the argument seem rather to be the Protestants of northern and central Europe. Like Justification, The Church contains much fresh and perceptive theology.

But critics have claimed that in both books there are oversimplifications and even superficialities that allow Küng to leap to conclusions beyond what his argument can support. Lutherans have been upset by a passage in Justification that implies that their differences with Catholics have been "imaginary," while in the discussion of apostolic succession in The Church, it is said that "we are all successors of the apostles"—a remark that is true in a very general sense but contributes nothing to the ecumenical problem of apostolic succession and merely blurs the issues.

Küng is at his best as a Christian apologist. It is ironical that he has been disciplined by the church, for his writings in which he sets forth the Christian faith as a live and credible option for men and women living in a secular time have been very influential and of great service to the church. They have probably brought many people into the church and have certainly kept within the church many who were thinking of leaving. We may notice two books commending the Christian faith, both of them quite long and demanding on the general reader, yet both of them read by hundreds of thousands of people. One is On Being a Christian (Eng. trans. 1976). It begins with the challenge of modern humanism, leads into the question of transcendence, and surveys virtually every aspect of Christian doctrine and practice. His aim is to present Christianity as a radical humanism, as indeed the truly human fulfillment. He has to acknowledge, of course, that this has often been obscured in Christian history. His treatment of the relation of Christianity to other religions is particularly well done, being more penetrating and more dialectical on this particular topic than Rahner's. While the book is a model of free inquiry, its conclusions are, in the main, orthodox. On such fundamental questions as the doctrines of the Trinity and the person of Christ, Küng tells us that we must neither thoughtlessly accept nor thoughtlessly reject the traditional teachings, but seek to interpret them discriminatingly for our own time.

Küng's other major work of apologetics followed soon afterward—Does God Exist? (Eng. trans. 1980). This massive volume discusses the central problems of theism and atheism in a depth of detail that was not possible in the earlier volume. The treatment is basically historical, beginning with the radical doubt of Descartes and his attempt to found certainty on the conscious human subject. Küng continues with an eminently fair account of the rise of atheism, with detailed discussions of such leading representatives as Feuerbach and Marx. He dwells particularly on the significance of Nietzsche. Admittedly, this philosopher can be interpreted in more than one way, but Küng sees him as the one who brought atheism to its most extreme expression in nihilism. He speculates whether Nietzsche may not represent the turning point in the controversy with atheism. On the affirmative side, Küng points to the deep human confidence in the worthwhileness of existence, and this is at least an important element of belief in God. Inevitably this book does not reach any indubitable conclusion, but it is one of the most sustained attempts in recent years to show the credibility of theism and at the same time to expose the weaknesses and incoherences of atheism.

Finally, we turn to those writings in which Küng has criticized some of the structures and concepts in his own church. Infallible? (Eng. trans. 1971) is a short book that deals with the thorny problem of papal infallibility. Küng states bluntly that "in every century the errors of the church's teaching office have been numerous and indisputable." He also points to the fact that at certain periods of history there seems to have been a craving for precise dogmatic formulations, and the nineteenth century was such a period in the Roman Catholic church. It was against that background that the Vatican Council of 1870 proclaimed the dogma of papal infallibility, thereby turning into a formal article of faith the profound authority that had for many centuries attached to the teaching of the pope. Küng, as might be expected, is unhappy with this concentration of authority in the pope, and he has been something of a gadfly under successive popes. But he still wants to retain a watered down infallibility for the whole church and identifies it with the "indefectibility" of the church. But this identification is not convincing, for indefectibility is an eschatological idea and means that in the end, in spite of all its lapses, the church will be true to its destiny, whereas infallibility, whether of the pope or of the whole church, implies that even now, in the course of history, certainty is attainable on specific questions of faith and practice.

Another small book, Why Priests? (Eng. trans. 1972), discusses the role of the priesthood in the modern church. While recognizing the abiding place of an ordained priesthood in the church, Küng is opposed to clerical dominance. He makes the valuable distinction between "constants" and "variables" in the ministry. The former are theologically grounded, the latter are sociological accidents and have to be challenged when they have outlived their usefulness.

J.M.

KYRIE ELEISON. Meaning "Lord, have mercy," this is one of the oldest forms of Christian litany, representing profound penitential supplication, used traditionally in offices of the Greek Orthodox and Roman Catholic church, and also in other Christian churches. Originating in the OT and often considered the germ of all litanies, Kyrie Eleison appeared very early in the liturgies of St. James, St. Mark, and the Greek Fathers, as well as in Armenian, Syrian, and other rites. The Apostolic Constitutions record its use in fourth-century worship, and the Benedictine Rule used it in the fifth century. Pope Gregory I (590-604) supplemented it with Christe Eleison and placed it at the beginning of the Mass. Although varied, the historic ninefold form (three Kyrie Eleison, three Christe Eleison, three Kyrie Eleison) prevailed until modern times. Now Roman Catholics often use the vernacular sixfold form of "Lord, have mercy" and "Christ, have mercy," each repeated three times.

C.M.

L1

LABAN. The word means "white," probably a common name of the moon-god. Laban appears in the patriarchal narratives (Gen. 24:29-61; 28:2-32:1) in a dual capacity. First as a person bound up in the complicated family relationships of the Terahites, the larger clan of which ABRAHAM and his descendants represent the segment that had migrated to Palestine; then as a personification of the Arameans in their various conflicts and agreements with the Israelites, particularly regarding border disputes.

As a person Laban is represented as grandson of Nahor, Abraham's brother, and proximately as both uncle and father-in-law of the patriarch JACOB. All of Nahor's descendants had elected to remain in the Terahite ancestral homeland (Gen. 12:1) of Paddan-Aram or Aram-Naharaim, that is, that part of northern Mesopotamia surrounding the ancient city of Haran. There is no doubt that Laban was regarded by the author(s) of Genesis as a genuine person involved in the patriarchal history, following and enforcing laws and customs that were at home in Mesopotamia rather than in later Israel. However, given the longevity of these customs in the Near East through the centuries, scholars are no longer as disposed as they once were to argue from their presence to an early (second millennium B.C.) historical memory in these stories.

The fact that Laban also personifies the Arameans (in Gen. 28:5; 31:24 he is called "the Aramean") no doubt accounts for the traits of wiliness and untrustworthiness that are ascribed to him in these stories. The account in Genesis 31:45-54 doubtless reflects an ancient agreement recognizing Gilead as a border between Israel and Aram at the beginning of the first millennium B.C. B.V.

LACHISH OSTRACA. During the 1932-38 archaeological excavations of biblical Lachish, one of the most significant finds consisted in the discovery of a number of ostraca, sherds of pottery that were commonly used for casual correspondence in lieu of expensive papyrus or parchment. The exact number of the Lachish ostraca is not known, since some sherds found in the same place that are now blank may have lost their ink through weathering. Those that can definitely be identified as incised ostraca number twenty-one, but of these only the first six yield satisfactorily to decipherment; the rest are fragmentarily preserved and problematical. From internal evidence the legible ostraca can be dated between 597 and 587 B.C., the period of the Judean resistance of the final Babylonian conquest and destruction of Jerusalem under Nebuchadnezzar II.

These ostraca hold considerable value for the specialist in historical linguistics and comparative Semitics, but for specialist and layman alike their chief value lies in their content. More precisely, they are to be prized for the light they shed on the events that were being experienced in the Judah of the prophet JEREMIAH and for their Jeremian flavoring that helps to illustrate the prophetic book. For the most part, if not all, they appear to be reports from one or more military commanders addressed to the governor of Lachish from nearby fortresses (possibly Azekah or Debir).

Courtesy of the Trustees of the British Museum

Sennacherib (705–681 B.C.) receives booty as he sits on his throne, at Lachish; from the Lachish Relief

Courtesy of the Trustees of the British Museum

Lachish attacked by Sennacherib (704–681 B.C.) and siege engines, which are protected by warriors who shoot from behind shields

About twenty proper names of persons occur in the correspondence, most of them compounded with the name of Yahweh and almost all of them found in the book of Jeremiah or contemporary writings. Ostrakon number three mentions a certain anonymous prophet whose word is commended to the governor by his correspondent, who we may be confident was one of those nationalistic prophets with whom Jeremiah found himself so often in conflict (compare Jeremiah 28). On the contrary, the letter of ostrakon number six possibly speaks of another anonymous prophet who is "weakening the hands" of the defenders of Judah against the Babylonians. (The exact expression is used as a reproach against Jeremiah in Jer. 38:4.) There is no possible identification of this passage with Jeremiah, of course. But the prophet in question—if it was a prophet, for the text is not entirely clear—would have been one doing Jeremiah's work. Finally, the writer of the letter of ostrakon number four is hauntingly evocative of Jeremiah 34:7—"Lachish and Azekah . . . were the only fortified cities of Judah that remained"—when he reports that he has seen the fire signals of Lachish, "but Azekah we do not see."

B.V.

LAITY. From the greek word laos, meaning "people." The term is first used in the Epistle of Clement, the early church father. It refers to Christians, members of the church, who are not clergy. The view of the laity as the PEOPLE OF GOD in mission to the world is scriptural and has long been the Protestant understanding of church membership. This is expressed in Luther's doctrine of the PRIESTHOOD OF ALL BELIEVERS, which is accepted by most Protestants. The idea of the people of God is now central to the post-Vatican II Roman Catholic church, but traditionally and doctrinally Catholicism understands the laity to be those who have membership in the church without authority. The belief expressed in this is that the distinction between laity and clergy is of divine institution. Only the clergy of the highest orders—deacons, priests (or presbyters), and bishops—have governing power in the church. The laity in the Catholic church have been incorporated into ruling bodies and given wider ecclesiastical functions since Vatican II, but the clergy-laity distinction is still maintained. The three types of religious associations for laity in the Catholic church are Third Orders, Confraternities, and Pious Unions.

In Protestantism, laity and clergy share governing power, and lay people play larger roles in ecclesiastical affairs. There is no insistence on the divine institution of holy orders in most Protestant churches. The ministry is seen as an office, a function, for the good order of the church and as a means of carrying out the mission of the church.

J.C.

LAMA. From the Tibetan word meaning literally "superior one." A monk in Tibetan BUDDHISM. Originally employed as the Tibetan equivalent of the Sanskrit GURU or spiritual preceptor, the word has come to be used as a title of respect for any worthy monk. But the term "Lamaism," sometimes used by Westerners to designate Tibetan or VAJRAYANA Buddhism, is incorrect. R.E.

LAMB. Biblically, the chief symbol of innocence and sacrifice, applied by the evangelists to Jesus Christ, "the Lamb of God who takes away the sin of the world."

In the OT, the lamb is the major sacrificial victim, offered up at major feasts, daily offerings at the temple, and at the Passover. The figure of the lamb taken to slaughter awoke feelings of sympathy in those who watched. God, too, was called the Shepherd of Israel (Ps. 23), and the pious comforted themselves that Yahweh would care for them as the shepherd protected his lambs. In the NT, Jesus appears as the great Shepherd of the sheep in the Gospel of John as well as the letters of Peter. The images of care, innocence, and sacrifice remain intertwined, as in the case of Jeremiah, who, threatened with death, spoke of himself as a lamb led to slaughter. In the Suffering Servant Songs of Isaiah 42-53, the same metaphor is used for the Servant of the Lord. The church applied this metaphor to Jesus Christ.

The Suffering Servant texts and the Passover tradition were utilized by the church to make the lamb the major symbol of Jesus' passion: his suffering, innocence, and obedience unto death. John, especially, uses this motif, from John the Baptist's declaration, "Behold, the Lamb of God who takes away the sin of the world" to the hour of Jesus' death on the cross, the very hour when the Passover lambs were sacrificed.

The Revelation, too, uses the image of the lamb to expound the office and ministry of the now risen and glorified Christ. In John's visions he is the exalted Lamb, both victim and priest, who carries out God's judgments on the wicked. The lamb is the commander of God's army, which wars at the end of the age against Satan. He is also the shepherd who leads God's saints into the heavenly kingdom. This identification of Christ and the lamb is shown to be Jesus' own conception, since, at his last Passover he reinterpreted the lamb and bread and wine, saying, "This is my body." J.C.

LAMBETH CONFERENCES. Gatherings of worldwide ANGLICAN bishops about every ten years at Lambeth Palace, under the direction of the archbishop of Canterbury, to consider pressing religious concerns. Suggested officially by the Anglican Church in Canada in 1865, the first Lambeth Conference of seventy-six bishops met in 1867 and dealt with the controversy over the liberalism of Bishop John Colenso and Essays and Reviews (1860). It issued a non-binding "Address to the Faithful." Successive conferences in 1878, 1888, 1897, and 1908, grew in episcopal attendance and influence in Anglicanism. The 1888 conference recommended a basis for Christian unity: Scripture, Apostles' and Nicene creeds, Baptism and the Lord's Supper, and episcopal continuity in history. The 1920 conference of 252 bishops issued its significant "Appeal to All Christian People" for reunion, which was sent to all Christian communities. Conferences in 1930, 1948, 1958, and 1968, discussed ecumenism, marriage, ministry, peace, Bible, churchmanship, and other matters. In 1968, observers from other churches were officially present. The conference of 1978 dealt largely with the ordination of women. Women were being ordained in the breakaway Anglican Church in North America, organized in 1978. The conference advised "mutual respect" among all Anglican provinces, but did not legislate any binding stance. C.M.

LAMECH. The identity of Lamech is confused. In Genesis 4:17-24, the Yahwistic writer presents Lamech as a direct descendant of Cain and the son of Methusael. Through his wife Adah he was the father of Jabel, the progenitor of nomads, and Jubal, the father of all musicians (vv. 20-21). Through his other wife, Zillah, he fathered Tubal-cain, the original metalworker. Besides being remembered for originating these well-known communal functions, Lamech sang a strange song, a fragment of which is preserved. In it he praises vengeance by bragging about having slain a young man who had hurt him (Gen. 4:23-24), and says, "If Cain is avenged sevenfold, truly Lamech seventy-sevenfold" (Gen. 4:24).

In Genesis 5:25-31, the Priestly writers make Lamech the son of Methuselah and the father of Noah. In this tradition, Lamech shared with his father the quality of extreme vigor and longevity; at the age of 182 he became Noah's father, then went on to have other children until his death at the ripe old age of 777.

Lamech's parentage is recalled in the genealogies of I Chronicles 1:3 and Luke 3:36, following the order of Genesis 4:25-31. That ancient Israel had more to say about Lamech than is acknowledged by the OT is demonstrated by additional information about him contained in the Book of Jubilees (4:28) and in the Genesis Apocryphon from Qumran (II:1-26).

W.S.T.

LAMENTATIONS, BOOK OF. The traditional attribution of this collection of five poems to the prophet JEREMIAH is underscored not only by its location immediately after the book of Jeremiah in the Greek, Latin, and modern versions, but by the subheading in the English versions, "the lamentations of Jeremiah." This deeply rooted tradition of authorship is reflected in Michelangelo's treatment of Jeremiah on the ceiling of the Sistine Chapel in Rome as a brooding, sorrowful figure. The connection makes sense when one considers that only Jeremiah, among all the classical prophets, gives voice to his personal grief at the terrible misfortune of Judah and Jerusalem, using his characteristic poetic genre of "prophetic lament" (see Jer. 11:18-12:6; 15:10-21; 17:14-18; 18:18-23; 20:7-18). Furthermore, Jeremiah personally witnessed the greater disaster in response to which the book of Lamentations was written, namely, the downfall of Jerusalem and the destruction of the Temple by the Babylonians in 587 B.C.

However, in spite of the statement in II Chronicles 35:25 that Jeremiah composed a "lament" on the death of Josiah, other considerations lead most interpreters to conclude that these five poems were written by persons other than the prophet, possibly on separate occasions, and were collected into the present book to serve as a text suitable for recitation on a day of remembrance for all the tragedies that ever befell Jerusalem and the Jews. Indeed, Ikab ("How?"—the first word of the book, which became its name in the Jewish tradition) is the scroll (megillab) read even today on the ninth of Ab, when Jews remember the tragedies of their history. In Christian lectionaries, passages from Lamentations are designated for Holy Week and are affiliated with the Passion of Christ.

Authorship is given to others than Jeremiah both on grounds of style and date. The style is much too literary and contrived to have emanated from the mouth of an impassioned preacher. Chapters 1-4 are acrostic poems, each of the twenty-two stanzas of each chapter being introduced by a succeeding letter of the Hebrew alphabet. Chapter 5, while not acrostic, also contains twenty-two stanzas. In the central chapter 3, the only one of the poems spoken entirely by a single individual, each line of each stanza begins with the appropriate Hebrew letter. Except for the last chapter, which is essentially a communal psalm of lament (compare Pss. 74; 79), the limping meter of the dirge (qinab) predominates: a line of three beats is followed by a line of two beats.

Besides these evidences that the book was carefully composed, perhaps even written rather than preached, the point of view is that of people living in the neighborhood of the ruined Temple and in a desolated and starving city after years of oppressive occupation. Jeremiah, it will be remembered, is supposed to have been taken by Judean fugitives to Egypt about 582 B.C. and to have concluded his work there (see Jer. 43:1-7).

If chapters 1 and 5 are seen as general descriptions of the plight of fallen Jerusalem, and chapters 2 and 4 are nested within them as more specific descriptions of the pitiable situation of the people (the end of worship, 2:6; famine, 2:12; 4:8, leading to cannibalism, 2:20; 4:10), then chapter 3 becomes the climactic utterance of the book. In 3:1-21, the poet, like the writer of Job, confesses the belief that the violence which he has experienced is divine retribution. But in verses 22-51, he looks at God's other side and cries, "great is thy faithfulness" (v. 23); suffering is seen as remedial in its effect. The psalm closes with the cry of a man who, though like Jonah is drowning in affliction (v. 54), expresses confidence in God's ultimate self-vindication through the redemption of the righteous and the destruction of the destroyer.

W.S.T.

LANDMARKISM. A movement, originating in the 1850s in Nashville, Tennessee, which claimed that since the kingdom has always prevailed, and since Baptist churches are the only true churches, Baptist churches have existed throughout all Christian history. Based on James M. Pendleton's work, An Old Landmark Reset (1854), which declared there is no universal church in the NT, local churches are independent and a succession of properly baptized Christians is essential for the ministry. J.C.

LANFRANC (about 1010-89). Archbishop of Canterbury, theologian, defender of TRANSUBSTANTIATION. Born and educated in Pavia, Italy, Lanfranc went to northern France to teach, and about 1040 became a monk at the abbey of Bec, where he established a celebrated school. Anselm of Canterbury and Pope Alexander II studied under him there. Prior of Bec by 1045, he counseled Duke William of Normandy (William the Conqueror). Among the first to counter BERENGER OF TOURS' opposition to transubstantiation, in On the Body and Blood of Christ, Lanfranc argued that the bread and wine in the Mass contain the invisible human body of Christ. Lanfranc won over Berenger at Tours (1054) and the Lateran Council (1059).

About 1063 he became the first abbot of St. Stephens, and in 1070, archbishop of Canterbury. With William the Conqueror he reorganized the English Church, removed civil cases from clerical courts, curtailed appeals from England to Rome, and won lands and privileges for the church. He held several English synods, regulated monasteries, brought in Norman bishops, and bent the bishop of York to his control. C.M.

LANGUAGES OF THE ANCIENT NEAR EAST AND OF THE BIBLE. The major languages of the Near East and the Bible may be classified broadly in two types: Semitic and Indo-European. The Semitic languages are subdivided into three groups: Northwest Semitic—HEBREW, Aramaic, Ugaritic, Canaanite, Phoenician, and Moabite; East Semitic—primarily Akkadian (in Babylonia and Assyria); South Semitic—Arabic and Ethiopic. Of the many languages of the Indo-European family, those of chief interest for biblical history (which include those spoken from India to western Europe) are Old Persian and GREEK. Nearly all the OT was written in Hebrew, though parts were written in Aramaic, and some of the later so-called apocryphal or deuterocanonical OT writings were written in Greek.

One of the distinctive features of the Semitic languages is that the verbs, and many nouns derived from them, consist of three basic consonants. Both conjugated forms of these verbs and other words of associated meaning retain in their spelling the three basic consonants, but there are various vowels placed within the consonants, and other letters added at the beginning or the end of the words. The consonants alone remain constant. For example, the Hebrew root, M-L-K, means "rule" or "reign." With one set of vowels inserted, melek, it means, "king." With another set, malkah, it means "queen." As mablak, it means "he rules," but as himlik, it means, "he makes someone king." Since the title melek had been given to a Canaanite god, the Israelites would not honor him by pronouncing his name correctly. Instead they used the vowels from the Semitic word for "shame," bosheth, and referred to this pagan deity as Molek (or Molech).

The name "Hebrew" was probably given to the speech of the ancient Israelite in a derogatory sense, since the term seems to be based on a Semitic word meaning "nomad" or "wandering brigand." Thus they must have been regarded by the Canaanites, whose land they invaded and occupied. Their language may earlier have been closer to South Semitic dialects, but the literature we have from ancient Israel is closely akin to the other Northwest Semitic languages.

An important development was the emergence of alphabetic writing, as distinguished from other more cumbersome modes of writing, such as the wedge-shaped impressions in clay or stone tablets known as CUNEIFORM used by Semites farther to the north and east. An ancient inscription, written in what has been called Proto-Sinaitic (since it was found in the Sinai desert), appears to be the oldest known form of alphabetic writing, dating from the fifteenth century B.C. Whoever invented this style of writing matched each sound made by one speaking the language with a tiny stylized pictorial representation of a common object, the name of which began with the sound that the symbol was to represent. Thus, a small box stood for the sound "b," because it suggested a house, which in Hebrew is beth. An ox-goad, aleph, was represented by a line with a small hook at the end, and served as the first letter, "a," of what we still know as the alphabet—a term derived directly from these ancient Semitic roots. Similarly, a few wavy lines represented water, which in Hebrew is mayim, and which served as the equivalent of "m." The development of the alphabet was a major contribution of the Semites to world culture and to communication down to the present day.

In the sixth and fifth centuries B.C., when the Jews were taken into captivity in Babylon, which was soon dominated by the Persians, the common language of commerce and international exchange in the Middle East was Aramaic. Aramaic words show up in the OT writings, and parts of Ezra and Daniel are written in Aramaic. This became the common language of the Jews when they returned to Palestine and continued to be widely used down into NT times. From the late fourth century on, however, following the spectacular military and political successes of Alexander the Great, Greek became the dominant international language throughout the eastern Mediterranean and the Near East. Loanwords from Persian, Aramaic, and Greek appear in the later Hebrew OT writings.

By the third century B.C. most Jews lived outside Palestine. For them, Hebrew was a little-understood liturgical language, so that it became necessary to translate the Bible into Greek. The early version of the Bible in Greek is known as the SEPTUAGINT, meaning "seventy," on the basis of an old legend about the miracle of its origin (in the Letter of Aristeas). The Greek of this edition shows the strong influence of the Semitic original, but is written on the whole in the common language of the era, known by scholars as koinē Greek (meaning "common").

Although some of the Jesus tradition may have been preserved orally in Aramaic, the oldest NT writings—including the letters of Paul and the Gospel of Mark—were written in Greek. Most literate people in Palestine would have understood Greek, and it was the only possible means of communicating the Christian message to Jews and Gentiles living in the wider Mediterranean world. The literary level of these writings ranges from the extreme simplicity and awkwardness of John and Mark to the more sophisticated later books, such as Hebrews.

H.K.

LAODICEA. A city in southeastern Asia Minor, mentioned in the NT as the recipient of a letter from Paul (Col. 4:16) and of one of the seven letters to the "seven churches" in Revelation 1-3 (Rev. 3:14-22). The location of the city in the Lycus Valley, the fine quality of the wool produced nearby, and the generosity and political connections of some of its citizens made it a place of considerable wealth and considerable distinction at the turn of our era. It produced a famous line of rhetoricist-politicians, who were helpful to the Romans as they were taking charge of this part of the world, and who were accordingly rewarded by Rome.

It is perhaps that attitude of wealth and complacency that is the basis of the angel's denunciation of the church there for its vanity and self-satisfaction. No evidence has survived of the circumstances of the founding of the church there or of its leadership. There were evidently close links, however, between the church at Laodicea and the Christians at nearby Colossae, to which Paul (or someone writing in his name) addressed the Letter to the Colossians. In Colossians 1:7 we read that Paul had sent Epaphras there to evangelize and instruct the converts. The Laodicean Christians are the subjects of concern of Paul and his emissary (Col. 2:1-3; 4:15). In Colossians 1:16 the writer refers to a letter to the Laodiceans, which some scholars have suggested is what we know as the Letter to the Ephesians, but which is more likely simply a letter of Paul that did not survive.

H.K.

LAODICEANS, EPISTLE OF THE. See APOCRYPHA.

LAO TZU. Semi-legendary sage of TAOISM, author of Tao Te Ching (dou dajing; literally, "The Classic of the Way and Its Power"), also called simply The Lao Tzu. Tradition holds that Lao Tzu was an older contemporary of Confucius, which would place him in the sixth century B.C. Many modern scholars hold that the Tao Te Ching was written between 350 and 275 B.C., although parts of it may be much older. These scholars regard Lao Tzu as completely legendary and the Tao Te Ching as an anthology of wise sayings. Some traditionalists also reject the authorship of Lao Tzu, while accepting the dating of the Tao Te Ching to the sixth century. So much legend and apocryphal tradition surround his life (if he existed) that we can only guess whether anything said about him is true.

The Tao Te Ching is a small book of only 5,227 to 5,722 words, depending on the edition. The present standard edition is dated A.D. 708 and has two parts: part one called the "Classic of Tao (the Way)," with thirty-seven chapters, and part two called the "Classic of Te (the Power)," with forty-four chapters. The number of chapters varies with different editions, depending on how the material is divided. The two earliest extant editions (discovered in 1973) have no chapter divisions and, moreover, reverse the order of the sections on Tao and Te. This and other textual problems create difficulties in interpretation. By far the greatest problems are the cryptic nature of its poetic language and the use of archaic words. Translation is so difficult, yet so enticing, that over forty translations have been made into English.

Chinese scholars have long been entranced by the Tao Te Ching. Over 350 commentaries and annotated editions exist in Chinese, and there are many in Korean and Japanese. The most popular are interpretations in terms of religious Taoism—the Taoism of the common people, closely related to the traditional Chinese world view and to SHAMANISM. These commentaries emphasize internal alchemy and physical immortality through the use of elixirs. Other commentaries emphasize breath control (T'ai Chi) and the importance of a moral life for longevity. Finally, there is philosophical commentary. Most modern translations follow this line, although they differ from one another in the way they translate cryptic passages.

Some scholars see Tao as a being who created the world, a view derived from a more or less literal interpretation. Most interpreters, however, choose a more symbolic understanding of Tao as natural law or the way of all things.

A more concrete application of the symbolic understanding of Tao is seen in the concept of time. Some scholars interpret the Tao Te Ching as advocating coordination with the cycles of life: taking action or remaining quiet as the situation indicates. Others disagree and see the Tao as advocating holding to the negative, soft, YIN pole and not striving for greatness—the YANG pole. The great always decline, but the weak do not always rise. Thus to succeed whatever the situation, one seeks an unassuming place. This idea was brought out explicitly by Chuang Tzu, another important sage of Taoism.

Finally there are two views of Lao Tzu's conclusions on the proper way to act. Many emphasize the idea of nonpurposiveness in the Tao Te Ching. Actions should be taken without deliberate thought, through "non-action" (wu-wei). Attention must be paid to the gaps, the spaces between things; it is the door and windows that make a room useful. Those are the principles behind Oriental art, music, military strategy, and martial arts. However, the Tao Te Ching also indicates that the Tao can be used to bring things about. "He who is to be made to dwindle (in power) / Must first be caused to expand. / He who is to be weakened / Must first be made strong, / He who is to be laid low / Must first be exalted to power. / He who is to be taken away from / Must first be given—This is the Subtle Light" (chap. 36). Other translations of this passage are less Machiavellian.

The influence of the Tao Te Ching has been enormous. It has touched all parts of Chinese thought. In religion it exercised considerable influence not only on Taoism but also on CONFUCIANISM and BUDDHISM. Ch'an Buddhism, which became Zen in Japan, was in large part a synthesis of Buddhism and Taoism. The inexpressible nature of the Tao was identified with the Buddhist idea of Shunyata, or "nothingness," and Chinese Buddhism adopted the Taoist ideal of non-action, passive resistance, and retreat from the world.

K./M.C.

LAPSI. Lapsed Christians who denied their faith during persecution, especially under Decius (249–51) and Diocletian (303–305). CYPRIAN, who was martyred in 258, inclined toward readmission of the lapsed in On the Lapsed and his letters. NOVATIAN left the church at Rome, refusing to readmit the lapsed. This problem occasioned the Donatist schism in 311.

C.M.

LAST SUPPER. The LORD'S SUPPER or Holy Communion; the central feature of Christian worship instituted by Christ the night before his death (I Cor. 11:23-26; Matt. 26:26-28; Mark 14:22-24; Luke 22:17-19; I Cor. 10:16).

Christian worship from the beginning (Acts 2:46) centered in the presence of the Risen Christ. This living presence was experienced especially at mealtime. In the breaking of bread, the Resurrection was made real to Christians (Mark 16:14; Luke 24:35, 42; John 21:12-13; Acts 10:41).

The earliest account of the supper (in time) is in I Corinthians 11:23-26. Paul gives his account in a reproof of the Corinthians for unruly common meals (I Cor. 11:17-22, 27-34) that deny Christ and love for one another. The supper was first celebrated on the night of the Lord's betrayal. Christ broke bread and said, "This is my body which is given for you. Do this in remembrance of me" (Luke 22:19). Christ then took the cup after supper and called it "the new covenant in my blood." Paul connects celebration of the supper with proclaiming the Lord's death until he returns.

Mark 14:22-24 gives the earliest account of the supper in the Gospels. Mark calls it a Passover meal (Mark 14:14). John reports that it took place "before the feast of the Passover" (John 13:1) and omits the words of institution. Some scholars think the "Bread of Life" sermon in John 6 refers to the words of the Last Supper—that the bread is his body, and the wine is his blood (John 6:53-56). Mark's account is similar to Paul's, but adds the promise that Jesus will drink wine again in the kingdom of God (Mark 14:25).

J.C.

LAST THINGS. See ESCHATOLOGY.

LATERAN COUNCIL. The name given five Roman Catholic ecumenical gatherings held in a group of Rome's historic buildings known as the Lateran. The First Lateran Council (1123), under Pope Calixtus II, forbade simony and clerical marriages, and ended the church-state investiture conflict by confirming the Concordat of Worms (1122). The Second (1139), under Innocent II, healed the schism of antipope Anacletus II by excommunicating his followers. The Third (1179), under Alexander III, condemned the Cathari, forbade Waldensian preaching, and established papal election rules, requiring a two-thirds vote of the college of cardinals. The Fourth (1215) and most important, under Innocent III, condemned the Cathari and Waldensians, made transubstantiation official, forbade new monastic orders, required yearly Communion, and sanctioned another crusade against Moslems to rescue the Holy Land. Over twelve hundred church leaders, secular representatives, and two Eastern church patriarchs attended. The Fifth (1512-17), under Julius II and Leo X, regulated and abrogated many Gallican Church privileges by approving a concordat between Leo X and French King Francis I, and decreed printed books had to have ecclesiastical approval. Other Lateran councils, such as in 649 on monothelism, 769 on iconoclasm, and 1059 to form the college of cardinals, were not ecumenical.

C.M.

LATHBURY, MARY ARTEMISIA (1841-1913). Hymn writer. Mary Lathbury was born August 10 at a Methodist parsonage in Manchester, New York. Her father and two brothers were Methodist ministers. She began early in life to compose verses and illustrate them. For a time she taught art in the schools of New York and Vermont and contributed material to children's periodicals. Increasingly involved with religious journalism, in 1874 she became an editor of Methodist Sunday school lessons, serving under Dr. John H. Vincent, secretary of the Methodist Sunday School Union. Through her work with Bishop Vincent she became active with him in the Chautauqua movement. The Chautauqua Assembly was located on the old Methodist camp meeting grounds at Lake Chautauqua, New York. Soon Miss Lathbury was known as the Poet Laureate and Saint of Chautauqua. When the leaders of the assembly expressed the need for an evening vesper hymn in 1877, she was asked to write the text. That was when she wrote "Day Is Dying in the West." She was also the author of "Break Thou the Bread of Life."

R.H.

LATIMER, HUGH (about 1485-1555). English preacher, bishop of Worcester, reformer, and Protestant martyr. Born in Thurcaston, Leicestershire, and educated at Cambridge, he embraced humanistic ideals, was ordained, and in 1522 was commissioned to preach throughout England against social injustices. Converted to Lutheran views by Thomas Bilney about 1524, he had to stop preaching. He supported Henry VIII's bid for divorce from Catherine of Aragon, and was made a royal chaplain in 1530. In 1531 he was appointed to West Kington, Wiltshire, but was excommunicated in 1532 for opposing ecclesiastical authority. Thomas Cranmer's appointment to Canterbury in 1533 improved Latimer's status. He subsequently became an adviser to Henry VIII and in 1535 was made bishop of Worcester. He also promoted Henry's dissolution of the monasteries and approved Henry's Ten Articles (1536).

However, the political situation changed. Henry moved toward Catholicism in his Six Articles (1539). For not approving these, Latimer lost his bishopric, was imprisoned briefly, and forbidden to preach. Jailed again in 1546, he gained freedom when Edward VI became king. Latimer's famous sermon "On the Plough," attacking social immorality, was preached at St. Paul's Cross (1548). However, Queen Mary (1553-58) had him arrested along with other Protestants. Refusing to recant, he was burned to death.

C.M.

LATIN RITE. The ritual of worship, especially for the MASS, associated with the Roman Catholic church. It is distinct from but shares common features with the Antiochene, Alexandrian, and Gallican liturgies that emerged by the fourth century. Under Pope Pius V (1566–72) the Latin Rite was standardized but has been periodically revised.

C.M.

LATITUDINARIANS. Term applied in the seventeenth century to Church of England clerics favorable to the "liberal" or Arminian views of Dutch theologian JACOBUS ARMINIUS. In the Church of England and in America it led to an openness to Enlightenment rationalism and eventually Unitarianism. Adherents continued as members of the church but attached little importance to doctrinal distinctions, ecclesiastical organization, or liturgical practices. The Latitudinarians were precursors of the Broad Church party in nineteenth-century England.

N.H.

LATOURETTE, KENNETH SCOTT (1884–1968). American historian of missions. Latourette was born in Oregon and educated at McMinnville College, where he came under the influence of the STUDENT VOLUNTEER MOVEMENT, and Yale University. An ordained Baptist minister, he went to China in 1910 as a teacher, but illness forced his return in two years. He taught at Reed College and Denison University before assuming a teaching position at Yale in 1921, where he taught until his retirement. His major contributions were the education of several generations of students in world missions and his writings on East Asia history and the history of the Christian mission. His major books are A History of the Expansion of Christianity, History of Christianity, and Christianity in a Revolutionary Age: A History of Christianity in the Nineteenth and Twentieth Centuries. He was an active participant in international and ecumenical affairs and organizations as well as the mission activities of the American Baptist Convention. He also served as president of the American Society of Church History and the American Historical Association.

W.G.

LATTER-DAY SAINTS. See CHURCH OF JESUS CHRIST OF LATTER-DAY SAINTS.

LAUD, ARCHBISHOP (William Laud, 1573–1645). Anglican archbishop of Canterbury and an opponent of Puritanism. Laud's "popish" rules on ritual, clerical dress, and worship caused thousands of PURITANS to migrate to Massachusetts. Born in Reading and educated at St. John's College, Oxford, Laud was ordained (1601) and chosen president of St. John's (1611). He resigned from St. John's to become bishop of St. David's in Wales (1621). Against Fisher the Jesuit (J. Percy), he argued that Rome and Canterbury were equally parts of the universal (catholic) church.

As a supporter of King James I's divine-right-of-kings views and an adviser to Charles I, Laud rose rapidly to become bishop of London (1628), chancellor of Oxford University (1629), and archbishop of Canterbury (1633). As chancellor he promoted manuscript collection and scholarship. As archbishop he advised Charles, helped administer the nation, and strove to enforce liturgical uniformity in part to support Charles' royal absolutism. Laud abolished the popular Puritan lectureships, emphasized Communion over preaching, and enforced compliance. Hostility mounted.

Charles had dismissed Parliament in 1629, saying he alone would rule, but his arbitrary taxes aroused resentment, and Laud's attempt in 1637 to Anglicize Scottish Presbyterianism prompted Scottish riots and rebellion. To raise money to suppress the rebellion, Charles reconvened the Long Parliament (1640). Dominated by Puritans, Parliament did not comply. It maneuvered to imprison and behead Laud, a prelude to beheading Charles himself (1649). Laud was an early controversial Anglo-Catholic who secured some political-economic gains for Anglicanism, and before his execution repudiated charges of "popery."

C.M.

LAUDS. The morning hour of worship in the Catholic divine office. The name means "praise," drawn from the three psalms of praise that formerly were invariably part of the office. Lauds includes five psalms, scripture, a hymn, the Benedictus, a homily, as well as opening and concluding versicles.

J.C.

LAVER. A basin used in both ancient Jewish and continuing Roman Catholic worship for the ritual cleansing of the hands (and in ancient times, the Hebrew priests' feet) before prayer and sacrifice. Lavers are still in use in Orthodox Jewish synagogues for washing the hands, as far up as the wrists, before prayer. A laver is used for ritual ablutions. In the ancient Hebrew tabernacle (tent), the laver was in two parts—a basin and a stand. Aaron and his sons washed their hands and feet before entering the tabernacle.

In Solomon's temple, there were five bronze lavers on the right and five on the left sides and a huge laver, "the brazen (or bronze) sea," in which the priest washed before sacrifices were offered. The smaller lavers were used to wash the parts of the sacrificed animals. These lavers were basins resting on wheeled bases and were ornamented with engravings of lions, oxen, and cherubim.

The second temple had only one laver, in which the priests washed before sacrificing animals. Since the destruction of the temple in A.D. 70, prayer has replaced sacrifice in Judaism, and all the people share in the holiness of the priests and Levites. For this reason, Orthodox Jews wash before prayers.

For the Catholic church, the laver or lavabo is an ancient part of the Mass. The priest uses water, from a laver, usually set on a stand to the left of the altar (facing the altar) to symbolically wash his hands before the Mass.

J.C.

LAW. A collection of moral, ethical, civic, and religious rules or precepts, regarded among the early Hebrews as having originated with God, or at least from priestly interpreters of God's laws.

Law in the Old Testament. The basic word for Law in the OT is TORAH, a term that may also refer to the five books of MOSES (the Pentateuch) or even to the collective religious teaching and instruction of the whole people of Israel. Torah really means "instruction" or "guidance" and is still used in that sense in the synagogue. When the writers of the Septuagint translated the Torah in Egypt, the word in Greek came out as nomos, which is somewhat narrower in meaning than Torah.

In Hebrew tradition all law originates with God, not with human beings. Apparently Abraham and his clan brought with them at least some concept of law when they migrated from the Tigris-Euphrates Valley to Canaan, but the vast bulk of their ethical code did not develop until after the sojourn in Egypt. In Babylon the most famous and highly developed code of laws had been the Code of Hammurabi, probably dating from the eighteenth century B.C. The Babylonians had had much greater need for a complex code of laws in their urban society than did the Hebrews, who even at the time of immigration to Egypt were still a wandering band of herdsmen numbering less than a hundred souls.

Even before the giving of the TEN COMMANDMENTS on Mount Sinai, there are already indications that the people were coming to Moses for a determination of what was wrong and what was right (Exod. 18:15). This apparently had also been the case in the age of the patriarchs, when the head of the clan was also by tradition the lawgiver and the interpreter of the Law. Moses writes that he served as judge and arbiter in disputes, though also applying the teachings of God at his hearings. More difficult cases were brought to a sanctuary for judgment, where the name of God was first invoked and where specially trained priests would be available (compare I Sam. 2:25). From these early and rather primitive kinds of law and courts developed the more sophisticated systems of law found in the five books of Moses.

The dramatic delivery of the Ten Commandments on Mount Sinai highlights the covenant relationship between the people of Israel and their God. The lightning, the thunder, the sound of the trumpets, and the theophany of God all accent the importance of this relationship and the importance of the laws that God was promulgating.

The collection of detailed laws that follows the giving of the Ten Commandments as cited in Exodus 20:22-23:33 is often called the Book of the Covenant, a term found in Exodus 24:7. Many of these laws are not unlike those found elsewhere in the ancient Near East, but they focus on a life that is still largely agricultural and nomadic. These laws deal with worship, slavery, bodily harm, the owning of property, relationships to God, and support for travelers and widows. They have much in common with the Code of Hammurabi, especially in relationship to servants, slavery, marriage, property, personal injury, and the care of animals.

The book of Deuteronomy (which means the second Law or set of laws) is by rabbinic tradition the code of laws delivered by Moses to the people at the end of their forty years of wandering in the desert, probably given on the plains of Moab as they were about to cross the Jordan. In its present form, at least, DEUTERONOMY more likely dates from the eighth century B.C., with at least a few additions that come from a still later period. Likely this is the book of the Law discovered in the temple, which caused the great religious reforms in the reign of Josiah (II Kings 22-23), even though the text as we have it now was not yet so developed at that time. During the period of the prophets there was a major attempt to codify and write down the teachings, precepts, and interpretations of the prophets as a living addition to already existing law.

The Deuteronomic Code deals with a broad and detailed variety of needs: kings, priests, sacrifices, war, cultic practices; the interests of citizens and town dwellers and members of the family; concern for the poor, the widowed, the parentless, and the stranger; the use and care of animals.

What is remarkable about the Deuteronomic legislation in an age when the reigning philosophy was an eye for an eye and a tooth for a tooth was its kindly and humanitarian outlook. To mistreat slaves, for example, was to repeat the evils the people of Israel had suffered in Egypt. To cut down fruit trees or burn crops after a successful battle was forbidden. To bring in foreign idols was to corrupt the people and destroy their relationship with Jehovah. All worship was to be focused in a central place, most often Jerusalem but earlier also at Dan or Bethel, a settled place where God could cause the sacred name to dwell. After the fall of the northern kingdom the focus of worship at the holy of holies in the Temple at Jerusalem came to be a central tenet of the Deuteronomic Code.

The Priestly Code appears largely in Exodus, Numbers, and Leviticus (which means "of Levi," relating to the priestly tribe of Levi). The oldest part of this code is probably the Law of Holiness in Deuteronomy 17-26. Other parts may come from the time of the Babylonian Captivity (587-538 B.C.) or perhaps even later. Once King Josiah had taken a stand against the Egyptians at Megiddo, dying in battle, the hopes for new laws and the development of old religious laws ground to a halt. Up till this time the Temple of Solomon had been a strong and enduring symbol of religious and COVENANT law. Now it lay destroyed. As one prophet put it, "The law is no more" (Lam. 2:9).

Priestly or levitical law had been developing ever since the first legal system was put together, when the tribes were still in the desert. Some of the place-names in the semi-arid grazing land near Kadesh-barnea indicate that even during the sojourn in the wilderness the priests had actively begun formulating and administering courts of law. Though God was perceived as the original lawgiver, the interpretation of those concepts and precepts often fell to the LEVITES. These levitical courts dealt with a broad variety of human and religious experience: murder, circumcision, Passover, the tabernacle, sacrifices of every sort, holy days, consecration of priests, clean and unclean animals, keeping of vows, marriage relationships, personal injury, inheritance, holy wars, and refuges for those who were fleeing their enemies.

The hundreds and hundreds of times in which the concept of Law keeps recurring in almost every book of the OT stresses again how firmly the people of Israel were the people of the Law and the people of the book. In the Prophets (Amos 5:18; Isa. 2:12) the phrase "the day of the Lord" emphasizes again and again how divine wrath will consume those who do not heed the Law. Jeremiah, Isaiah, Ezekiel, and Hosea all speak of a NEW COVENANT of law God will make with the people in the latter days. These prophecies come largely from the time of the Exile, but they nonetheless look forward to a time not merely of the rebuilding of the Temple in Jerusalem but even to a golden age far beyond, when the people of God will once again be God's chosen people.

This idealized vision is summed up in the words of Psalm 19:7-9:

The law of the Lord is perfect,
reviving the soul;
the testimony of the Lord is sure,
making wise the simple;
the precepts of the Lord are right,
rejoicing the heart;
the commandment of the Lord is pure,
enlightening the eyes;
the ordinances of the Lord are true, and righteous altogether.

Though the period of the Exile cut off for a time the formal religious practices of the Jews at the Temple, it did establish a more informal kind of worship and of gathering together in private homes to celebrate the Sabbath. The old laws of the Sabbath and of circumcision helped the people of Israel retain their distinctiveness as children of Jehovah. Such study of the Law in small groups in the Diaspora may well have been the reason for the development of the synagogue system (Ezek. 33:30-33).

In summary, the Law of the OT originated with God, helped people understand how they were to live and worship, and helped them understand what hopes they could one day have of a messiah and of an eschatological "day of the Lord."

Law in First-Century Judaism. The ceremonial laws of the OT tended to stamp into the awareness of the people the conviction that Jehovah was the true God and that they were Jehovah's people. At the time of the Exile the ceremonial law went largely by the boards, and when the people once more returned to the Promised Land, their loyalties were in some ways less worship-related and ceremonial, and perhaps more focused on the local synagogue and less on the national Temple.

As seen from the viewpoint of the writers of the NT Gospels, the more important functions of religious law—stressing sin, forgiveness, faith, trust—were overlooked in favor of more mundane subtleties and refinements. The strenuousness with which Christ denounced the scribes, Pharisees, Sadducees, and Essenes for their focus on religious trivialities and their total disregard for important truths reflects at least some of the developments that were occurring in first-century Judaism. His concern for real worship and a real understanding of the Sabbath, not mere keeping of the ceremonial law, is a good example, as is his anger at those who viewed the Temple as a place to make money, not a place to deepen one's spiritual relationships to God.

The vast number of writings and traditions that came out of the rabbinic schools in this period reflect an activist and intellectual approach to OT law, such as one finds in the Mishna, Midrash, Talmud, and Halakah. There was a broad range of religious views in the period, and there is some danger in focusing too closely on any one interpreter, no matter how well known and revered, such as Rabbi Johanan ben Zakkai at Jamnia and his many Pharisal colleagues. The apocryphal scriptures of the time, plus the writings of Josephus, Philo, and the Qumran community, shed further light on first-century attitudes toward Mosaic law.

Sacred writings read in the synagogues included most of the canon of the OT. The sections known as the Law and the Prophets were especially honored and revered, although the Writings (for example, Ruth or Jonah) were in some quarters questioned and were not normally read as a part of public worship. Luke 16:16 and Matthew 11:13 confirm the reading of the Law and the Prophets at the synagogue. As proof texts, made to prove a point in a debate, a quotation from the Torah was beyond reproach, often bolstered by a quotation from the Prophets or from the Writings, to assure that Jehovah had not changed the Law since first giving it on Mount Sinai. At Jamnia such books as Ecclesiastes and the Song of Songs were not accepted as scripture, because they were written late, at a time when the Holy Spirit was deemed to have departed the land of Israel.

Another major development of the period was the rise of ORAL TRADITION as law, a concept that goes back to the learned rabbinical schools of Hillel and Shammai. Through such learned interpretations, new answers could be found to questions that would never have been raised in Mosaic or Deuteronomic times. Cultural conditions changed materially as the Babylonian rulers were superseded by the Persians, then the Greeks, then the Romans. In fact, the whole concept of SCRIBES, the sopherim or teachers, developed to interpret changing cultures and changing ways, though the scribes were often disliked and belittled. In brief, in the various views of parties like the scribes, Pharisees, Sadducees, and Essenes, in the rabbinical schools of Hillel, Shammai, or Zakkai, the believer was forced to look at the Law and measure oneself against it as God might do the measuring, even if there was a good deal of misgiving and ignorance about the precise outcome.

Law in the New Testament. The use of the word "law" more than one hundred times in the NT usually refers to the Mosaic code or to the books of the Pentateuch, not to contemporary or civic laws of the Greeks or Romans. Usually Christ refers to "the law" or to "the law and the prophets" (Matt. 5:18; 11:13; Luke 16:16) or simply to the "scriptures." He distinguishes clearly between OT law and "the traditions of the elders," the "tradition of men," or "oral law," and in fact often downgrades such interpretations when he adds, "But I say to you" (Matt. 5:22).

The concept of religious law and of Christ as the living fulfillment of that law occurs much more frequently in the epistles than in the Gospels. Yet Christ makes his case very plain in his own words in Matthew 5:17-18 when he says, "Think not that I have come to abolish them but to fulfill them. For truly, I say to you, till heaven and earth pass away, not an iota, not a dot, will pass from the law until all is accomplished." Christ's coming has become a new revelation of the Law, a law incarnate. As Mark (2:22) explains it, one can't put new wine in old wineskins, because they will burst from the fermenting.

One reason that Christ appears at times to resist OT law is his personal contact with hordes of sinners, of tax collectors, of the lame and the blind. One of the continuing refrains of the miracle stories is, "Son, your sins are forgiven you; take up your bed and walk." His authority as "Son of man" and "Son of God" allowed for the forgiveness of sin, even though that status to alter OT law was not accepted by most of the scribes and Pharisees. Although for the most part he did uphold OT law, he actively resisted codes of oral law and interpretation that he regarded as out of harmony with the basic concepts of the law of Moses.

In dealing with what was "clean and unclean," he insisted that the intent of the heart and the conscience was primary (Mark 2:13-17), not outward appearances. And if he associated with unsavory tax collectors, it was because "Those who are well have no need of a physician, but those who are sick." The Pharisaical interpretations of the laws of the Sabbath were a special target of his attack. Mark (2:23-27) explains how he and his disciples picked ears of grain on the Sabbath and ate them, and when they were confronted by the Pharisees, he uses a starving David for his model. He concludes, "The sabbath was made for man, not man for the sabbath."

In another confrontation with the Pharisees over his right to cure a man with a withered hand in a synagogue on the Sabbath, he asks rhetorically, "It is lawful on the sabbath to do good or to do harm, to save life or to kill?" (Mark 3:1-6). As a boy in synagogue school he had memorized huge portions of "the law and the prophets" in preparation for his bar mitzvah. It is clear that Jesus' treatment of OT law flowed not out of ignorance but out of deep understanding.

In Christ's role as the fulfiller of the Law, both Matthew (10:32-40) and Mark (8:38) make it clear that what now counts is the believer's relationship to him as the Son of God, not a relationship to an older covenant with Jehovah under OT law. A similar reinterpretation of OT law appears in Christ's stance toward divorce or the ceremonial cleanliness of various foods, which later came to be a cornerstone of missionary teaching in the Greek and Roman worlds.

Even the method and timing of Christ's death appear to have replaced the OT Passover laws for a new order in which Christ himself became the lamb and the sacrifice. Caiaphas as high priest may not have realized the full implications of his pronouncement when he declared, "You know nothing at all; you do not understand that it is expedient for you that one man should die for the people, and that the whole nation should not perish" (John 11:49-50).

The writings of Paul, who was trained as a Pharisaical LAWYER, are loaded with more than one hundred references to the Law. He emphasized especially how Christ's death in obedience to the will of the Father was the fulfillment of the Law. In a special sense Christ's death was a return to the final jurisdiction and judgment of his Father. The course law took in which the crucifixion of Christ established a new covenant and disestablished a considerable portion of Deuteronomic law troubled Jewish-Greek Christians more than a little in the early church, as the detailed account of the conflicts in the synagogues in Jerusalem (Acts 2-3) points out, at the time when Stephen was stoned.

Practicing Judaism and the Deuteronomic Code was no longer the path of salvation. In the decades following the death and resurrection of Christ there early seems to have been agreement that salvation came by faith in Christ, not through fulfillment of the ceremonial law. Paul stresses this as a recurring theme throughout the letters to the Ephesians, Romans, and Corinthians. In this sense Christ put an end to the Law, even though he sometimes also demanded loyalty to certain elements of the old Law. But the system of priests and of sacrifices came forever to its end.

In summary, the NT showed how Christ was the fulfillment of the old Law and how the old Law had passed away. Yet in the figure of Moses, Christ still proclaimed God's will and God's law, made alive again for a New Age, fine tuned for a new culture, still the best summary of God's will and God's love for all people whether on earth or in heaven.

T.J.K.

LAW OF MOSES. See LAW.

LAW, WILLIAM (1686–1761). English devotional and controversial writer. Born at Kingscliffe, Northamptonshire, he was educated at Cambridge, becoming a Fellow in 1711. Refusing allegiance to King George I, because, he regarded the exiled Stuarts as England's rightful rulers, Law lost his Fellowship. Between 1727 and 1737 Law tutored the father of Edward Gibbon, the historian, and counseled the family. In 1740 he returned to Kingscliffe, and with two prosperous women, he established and supervised schools and almshouses and lived a devout life of regular prayer and strict rules.

Three Letters to the Bishop of Bangor (1717–19) displayed his sharp wit; he satirically criticized making sincerity the only Christian standard. The Case of Reason (1732) debunked finite reason as a final guide in religion. A Practical Treatise upon Christian Perfection (1726) exhorted Christians to practice Christian virtues—marks of true repentance and renewal. The Serious Call to a Devout and Holy Life (1729), his best-known work, summoned Christians to serious devout living in every aspect of life. Law urged internal spiritual guidance through disciplined daily prayer and meditation, and in external affairs he urged disciplined service to God and others—as preparation for life eternal and joy and satisfaction now. Law directly influenced John Wesley.

C.M.

LAWYER. A term used in the NT in two distinct ways. According to Titus 3:13, Zenas, a friend of Paul, is commended on his journey, and he is described as a "lawyer," presumably an expert trained in Roman legal procedures. The second meaning of the same noun refers exclusively to those trained in Jewish and rabbinical laws, and the Greek term nomikos is a synonym for "scribe" (grammateus). Matthew (2:4; 13:52; 16:21; 23:2) uses the title "scribe," where Luke prefers nomikos, with apparently the same meaning intended (see Luke 10:25 in comparison with Mark 12:28; Matt. 22:35). The word thus designates a person proficient in deciding the intricate meaning of the Jewish law.

R.M.

LAY BROTHERS, LAY SISTERS. An unordained religious or permanent member of an order, such as a monk or a nun. Lay brothers and sisters are not clerics but are regular or true religious and rank higher than lay people. Lay sisters generally did the domestic work of convents and did not recite the divine office daily. In the Cistercian reform a distinction was made between the conversi, or lay brothers, and choir religious. The lay brothers were inferior to the choir religious, doing mostly manual work. The same distinction held true for lay sisters and choir sisters.

J.C.

LAYING ON OF HANDS. See HANDS, LAYING ON OF.

LAYMEN'S FOREIGN MISSIONS INQUIRY. An investigation of the status and methods of foreign missions on behalf of seven denominations in the 1930s. The impetus for the investigation came from a committee called together by John D. Rockefeller, Jr., and John R. Mott, who had become aware of the difficulties of missionaries around the world. The inquiry was carried out by a fifteen-member commission of which WILLIAM HOCKING was chairman. Their report "Re-thinking Missions" was presented to representatives of foreign mission boards at a meeting in 1932. The report, which recommended the continued coexistence of other religions along with Christianity, met with much criticism because it suggested a rethinking of the approach of foreign missions. The controversy diverted attention from the great wealth of information that the committee had gathered, which was subsequently published in seven volumes in 1933.

W.G.

LAYMEN'S NATIONAL BIBLE COMMITTEE. An organization of Christian and Jewish laity formed in 1940 to "encourage belief and faith in God, daily reading of the Bible, and to strengthen religious life in America." Since 1941 the major activity of the organization has been the promotion of National Bible Week at Thanksgiving time. A governing board of thirty-four directors and one hundred national associate chairmen supervise the distribution of thousands of packets of materials about the Bible, radio and TV ads, billboard advertising, and other means through which the country is alerted to the importance of the Bible and its message. The work of the committee, headquartered in New York City, has regularly been endorsed and promoted by the presidents of the United States, several congressmen, governors, and mayors throughout the country.

W.G.

LAY READER, LECTOR. In the early church a lector was a clergyman in minor orders, appointed to read the Scriptures and inspirational works during public worship. This was an important post due to the great stress placed on oral reading of Scripture. In early days, the lector may have preached also, but by the fourth century, reading the gospel was restricted to priests and deacons. In modern times, the lay reader is an honored post for lay men and women in the Anglican and Episcopal churches. With the adoption of lectionaries in other Protestant churches, lay readers or lectors are now becoming quite common in many denominations. "Lay ministers of the word" are recent ministries promoted by the Roman Catholic church since Vatican II.

J.C.

LAZARUS (of Bethany.) Lazarus of Bethany is mentioned in the Gospels only in John 11-12 as the brother of Mary and Martha (the sisters also appear in Luke 10:38-42). In the account Lazarus dies and has been entombed for four days when Jesus arrives. Jesus raises Lazarus from the dead as a demonstration of his statement, "I am the resurrection and the life" (John 11:25). In John's presentation of the event it is clear that the raising of Lazarus is meant to confirm belief in Jesus as the revealer of God's glory (see John 1:14; 11:4, 15, 40-42). In the Johannine account the raising of Lazarus from the dead occasions the belief of many Jews in Jesus (11:45; 12:11). The event also is the point at which the chief priests and Pharisees determine to put to death both Jesus (11:47-53) and Lazarus (12:10). Since this dramatic event is not mentioned in the Synoptic Gospels and since the Synoptic Gospels note other events as the turning point against Jesus, some scholars have argued that the story of the raising of Lazarus is a Johannine "parable."

D.S.

LAZARUS (the beggar). Lazarus, a common Jewish name that means "one whom God helps," is the poor man in the parable of the rich man and Lazarus (Luke 16:19-31). He is not to be identified with Lazarus of Bethany. Lazarus' fate is reversed in the afterlife. The parable illustrates Luke's concern for the rich and the poor (for example, Luke 1:53; 4:18; 6:20, 24; 7:22; 12:13-34; 14:13, 21, 33; 16:1-13).

D.S.

LEAH. The story of Leah, the elder daughter of LABAN, begins in Genesis 29. When Jacob followed the orders of his father Isaac to return to the ancestral seat in Mesopotamia to obtain a wife from the family of his mother's brother, he first encountered Laban's younger daughter, the lovely Rachel. He willingly served Laban seven years in exchange for the promise of her hand in marriage, but on the night of the wedding feast Laban substituted his "weak eyed" daughter Leah for Rachel. Unable to recognize her, perhaps because of her nuptial veils, Jacob acted in good faith in having intercourse with Leah. When by morning light the deception was discovered, Jacob had no choice but to keep Leah as his wife—though after the week of wedding feasting was completed, he also was promised Rachel in return for another seven years of service. Though Jacob loved Rachel more than her sister, Leah was the more prolific, and bore to Jacob six sons and a daughter, Dinah (Gen. 30:1-21).

W.S.T.

LEAP OF FAITH. An idea especially associated with KIERKEGAARD. The truth of Christianity, he believed, is above reason and is a paradox. Reason cannot arrive at the paradox and comes into collision with an unknown, which surpasses it. Then two courses are possible. Reason may take offense and turn away from the paradox, or there may occur the leap of faith. Faith is said to be the happy passion that unites reason and the paradox.

One may agree with Kierkegaard that reason can never establish the truth of Christianity and that a leap beyond what is demonstrable is necessary. One might also agree with him that the multiplication of historical knowledge about Jesus could never bring one to the point of believing that he is the God-man—that is a belief of a different order—and to arrive at this point would still require a leap of faith even if we had a perfect historical knowledge about Jesus. But what is less easy to accept is Kierkegaard's apparent dismissal of all evidential claims in the matter. Suppose, for instance, evidence came to light that Jesus had been a fraud or a hypocrite; would that not prevent the leap? And if negative evidence can have that effect, then must not affirmative evidence be allowed to have some relevance also? Does it not provide a basis of probability for the leap?

At this point, one might compare Kierkegaard's view with the related view of NEWMAN. The latter also believed that in matters of religion one has finally to make a leap beyond what the evidence warrants, and he even thought that there comes a point where one is justified in claiming certitude. But in this progression to the leap of faith, Newman allowed an important role to probability. He suggested that it is like inscribing a polygon in a circle. As one keeps adding sides, the polygon approaches ever more closely to the circle. It will never turn into a circle, yet there comes a point when one sees with certitude that this is the end of the progression. Here, however, a definite role is given to probability which Kierkegaard denies to it. Theologians remain divided between those who approve the decisive leap of Kierkegaard and those who favor the more cautious approach of Newman.

J.M.

LEAVEN. Popularly considered in the ancient world to be a form of corruption (as indeed it is). It is this concept that prevails mainly in constituting it as taboo for religious purposes. The taboo did not extend into secular life. Leavened bread was always preferred to unleavened because of its superior taste and texture, and the same yeasting process was widely employed in the brewing of beer and wine (though the process was probably not recognized to be the same).

In the OT the instances are rare in which leavened bread is brought into conjunction with religious ritual. It forms a part of the so-called "peace offering" (Lev. 7:11-18), which is to ask a blessing on what is destined for human consumption. Otherwise, liturgical bread had to be unleavened, on the "corruption" principle.

Sometimes, as in the Passover ritual (Exod. 12:15-20), a rationalization is given out of salvation history for the insistence on unleavened bread: it is to commemorate the Israelites' hasty departure from Egypt when there was no time to wait for the bread to leaven (Deut. 16:3). Even here, however, the provision that houses must be thoroughly purged of leaven prior to the feast (Exod. 12:17-20) shows that its original import involved the ritual impurity of leaven.

In the NT the notion of leaven as corruption also prevails, no longer in a ritual but still in a religious sense. Only a couple of times (Matt. 13:33; Luke 13:21) does it appear as a positive ferment: the dynamism of the proclamation of the kingdom of God. Otherwise it is a pejorative metaphor: symbolizing the deleterious influence of the Sadducees and Pharisees (Matt. 16:6, etc.), of the "Judaizers" opposing Paul (Gal. 5:9). In I Corinthians 5:2-8 Paul also characterizes the "incestuous man" of Corinth as a corruption and evokes the Passover ritual in calling on the Corinthians to purge themselves.

Though the Synoptic Gospels (but not John) have described the Last Supper of Jesus and his disciples as a Passover meal, the technical term for unleavened bread (azymos), which was and is the essential component of that feast, never appears in their texts. Instead, the word for ordinary or leavened bread (artos) invariably is featured in the "Eucharistic" texts of the NT. This might indicate that an earlier stage of the Last Supper story had not yet identified it with the Passover, despite the Synoptic redaction. Partly as a result of the Gospel ambiguity, the liturgical traditions of the Eastern and Western churches have long divided over the propriety of leavened or unleavened Eucharistic bread.

B. V.

LEBANON. From the Hebrew word meaning "white," Lebanon was probably thus named because of the snow-capped Mount Hermon, also known as Sirion (Ps. 29:6), visible throughout the year and dominating the horizon of northern Palestine. Actually, Mount Hermon forms a part of the anti-Lebanese range, a higher sierra that parallels the coastal mountain chain of Lebanon, separated from it by the Biqua' ("Valley"), which constitutes much of the modern Republic of Lebanon. The Biqua' is a rift or geological fault that continues southward in the Jordan Valley and the Ghor south of the Dead Sea to the Gulf of Aqabah, whence it travels beneath the gulf and the Red Sea to terminate in the Great Rift of Africa.

Herbert G. May

Cedars of Lebanon with summer snow on hill in background

Lebanon is featured frequently in the OT (Deut. 11:24; Josh. 1:4; etc.) as in a general way the northern boundary of Palestine, dividing it from Phoenicia and Syria. More precisely, the border was defined by Mount Hor on the west, a peak in the Lebanese range, to Lebo Hamath in the east (Num. 34:7; Ezek. 47:15). These designations are rather vague and can only uncertainly be identified today. The gorge of the Nahr el-Litani forms a more enduring and defined separation of Phoenicia and Lebanon from Galilee.

In the Bible Lebanon is celebrated in various capacities. Its imposing range was emblematic of natural strength and solidarity, therefore a perfect poetic foil to the majesty of God revealed in a thunderstorm so powerful that it "makes Lebanon to skip like a calf" (Ps. 29:6). It was a proverbially lush land, noted for its fragrance and the abundance of its vineyards (Hos. 14:6-8). Above all, however, "the glory of Lebanon" consisted in its magnificent forests (Isa. 60:13), especially "the cedars of Lebanon" (Judg. 9:15; Isa. 2:13), which for the tree-poor Palestinians symbolized the ultimate in natural wealth and beauty. In Psalm 104:16 the psalmist calls these ancient and beautiful cedars "the trees of the Lord . . . which he planted." Cedars as well as other woods of Lebanon were used in great abundance in the construction of Solomon's Temple and palace buildings (I Kings 5:13-18; 7:2), and Ezra 3:7 says that Lebanese cedar was obtained also for the building of the second Temple or Temple of Zerubbabel.

The forests of Lebanon had been exploited by Egypt and Mesopotamia long before biblical times, and they continued to supply precious timber well into the Roman Era. Only in the comparatively modern period of Lebanon, under the Ottoman Empire, did they disappear almost entirely, victims of human greed and irresponsibility.

B. V.

LECTION. One of a systematic series of readings from the Scriptures, arranged according to the church year. A lection is one individual reading, while a lectionary is a list or group of readings from the OT, the Epistles, and the Gospels. The practice of reading systematically through the Scriptures throughout the year was taken from the Jewish synagogue by the early church. From ancient times the books of Moses were read every Sabbath. By Jesus' time, the prophetic books were divided into lections, as is shown by Jesus' reading from Isaiah in Luke 4:16-21. The church began reading the OT and added the Epistles and Gospels. Fixed lessons were used by the third century. The Third Council of Carthage (A.D. 397) forbade the reading of anything but the Bible in church services. Traditionally, the liturgical churches (Catholic, Lutheran, Episcopalian) have used lectionaries and the free churches have not. Recently many non-liturgical churches have begun to use the lectionary. J.C.

LECTOR. See LAY READER.

LEE, MOTHER ANN. See SHAKERS.

LEGALISM. A technical term referring to law. Canon law is the legal system of the church, specifically used among Roman Catholics and Anglicans. It defines and describes the ecclesial structures, the responsibilities of lay and clerical officers, and the conditions under which a person might be admitted to or barred from receiving the sacraments.

Orthodox Jews pattern their lives by a system of law that gives them a sense of identity under the covenant. The rigid interpretation of Torah by the Pharisees as reflected in the NT has become a prototype of legalism, used pejoratively by many Protestants. Some Protestant traditions have careful prescriptions mandating the life-style of a Christian, and members are expected to conform or leave the church. The juridical nature of canon law is mitigated by the exemptions possible under extenuating circumstances. Legalism leaves no such loopholes. Legalism frequently implies a power of judgment on the part of humans that ignores motives and looks only at acts. For this reason the word has come to have a negative meaning. By contrast, a flexible attitude toward religious rules would seem to exemplify the grace of God and to suggest that mercy befits fallible humans better than judgment does. I.C.

LEGGE, JAMES (1815–97). A native Scotsman, missionary, and teacher, best known for his research into and translation of the texts of Taoism and of the Confusian classics. He first went to Malacca in 1839 for the London Missionary Society. After Hong Kong became a British possession in 1842 he was moved with other missionaries to Hong Kong and the Treaty Ports in China. He served as minister of the First Union Church in Hong Kong and was head of the Anglo-Chinese College, a theological college and boy's school, which he developed. His translation work opened up a new field of study of the Chinese classics. He retired from Hong Kong and was subsequently made the first professor of Chinese at Oxford, a position that he held until his death. W.G.

LEGION. A Latin loanword that first appeared in Greek in the first century B.C. It refers to the basic unit of the Roman army. In Imperial Rome a legion, the symbol of Roman power, comprised about 6,000 foot soldiers and 120 cavalry. This term does not appear in Josephus and is not used in the NT to refer to the Roman army. The NT borrows this term to refer to powers in the spiritual world, both demons (Mark 5:9, 15; Luke 8:30) and angels (Matt. 26:53). In the Matthew text Jesus claims that God could send more than twelve legions of angels to help him, a powerful symbol in the Roman context. D.S.

LEIBNITZ, GOTTFRIED WILHELM (1646–1716), German philosopher, mathematician, ecumenist, and statesman. Born in Leipzig, he studied law, philosophy, and mathematics at Leipzig, Jena, and Altdorf. In 1666 Leipzig said Leibnitz was too young for a doctorate in law, but Altdorf granted it. By age twenty-one Leibnitz had written several philosophical works on individuation, symbolic logic, and philosophical method. Regarded as a genius, Leibnitz entered the employ of the Elector of Mainz in 1667 and during the last forty years of his life resided in Hanover, serving the Duke of Brunswick-Lüneburg. Diplomatic missions took him to Paris, London, Berlin, and Amsterdam, enabling him to meet Malebranche, Huygens, Spinoza, Newton, and Boyle. In 1672 he invented a calculator that could multiply, divide, and extract square roots, and in 1673 was made a Fellow of London's Royal Society. In 1675 he discovered the basic principles of differential and integral calculus, and in 1700 was elected to the French Academy and helped found Prussia's Academy of the Sciences. He tried unsuccessfully to unite Protestant and Roman Catholic churches.

His Essais de Théodicée (1710) partially developed a philosophy of a universe of infinite monads in preestablished harmony and argued this was the best of all possible worlds, a view Voltaire satirized in Candide. His Monadology (published 1720) postulated a universe of monadic centers of force, each an individual mirror of the whole universe, arranged in ascending order with God as the highest monad. Leibnitz defended traditional proofs for God, but his monadology did not harmonize well with traditional Christian doctrine. C.M.

LENT. "Lent" is derived from the old Anglo-Saxon word "Lencten," for spring. In the Christian year, Lent is the forty-day period of prayer and spiritual self-examination that prepares for the festival of the Resurrection, EASTER. Lent is thus identified with the passion or suffering of Christ, who died for our sins. Forty days is reflective of the forty days Jesus fasted in the wilderness, tempted by the devil.

Lent is not merely concerned with remembering the suffering of Christ, but is designed to prepare the Christian to celebrate the death and resurrection of Christ. The object of such Lenten observance is a participation, a reliving of the events of our historical atonement, the life, suffering, rejection, death, and triumph over death of Jesus Christ. Lent does not include the Sundays in Lent. These "Lord's Days" are themselves weekly celebrations of the Resurrection. Lent, therefore, is made up of forty week days and Saturdays. These forty days point to Jesus' forty days of testing, immediately after his baptism by John the Baptizer. Lent is a time when Christians renew their baptism, deepen their conviction, and complete their conversion to Christ. In liturgical churches this period of renewal may be marked by fasting as well as attendance at special worship services. Such special services include Ash Wednesday, services on Wednesdays throughout Lent, Holy Week services (from Palm Sunday to Easter), and especially the celebration of Holy Communion on Maundy Thursday and commemorative services on Good Friday. Communal worship is particularly appropriate since Lent is the worship of the church, the universal Body of Christ, and not simply a matter of individualistic piety, sentimentalism, or emotionalism.

Lenten observance began very early, as both Irenaeus and Tertullian refer to it, but it was originally very brief, only gradually growing to forty days. At first, a fast of forty hours was observed, then a week. But by A.D. 325, the Council of Nicaea recognized forty days of Lent. These forty days included Sundays, but by the seventh century Lent was extended to forty days, excluding Sundays, and Ash Wednesday was established.

J.C.

LEO I (390?-461). Pope (440-461) Leo the Great, the most important of Rome's early bishops. Born probably in Rome, he was early involved in church affairs and was on a mission in Gaul, France, when chosen pope. He asserted the primacy of the Roman bishop over all other ecclesiastics and secular rulers, and he had annual sermons preached on Peter's confession of Christ as God's Son (Matt. 16:13 ff.). Leo believed Christ delegated authority specifically to Peter and only generally to the other disciples. He resisted Manichaeism and Pelagianism, and in 451 insisted that the Council of Chalcedon accept without debate his Tome on the fully divine and fully human Christ, with each nature fully preserved in the historical Christ. He personally confronted Attila the Hun (452) and Genseric the Vandal (455), saving Rome from destruction. With administrative skill Leo fed thousands, ransomed prisoners, promoted celibacy, and initiated issuing papal encyclicals.

C.M.

LEO XIII (1810-1903). Pope (1878-1903) who sought to reconcile Roman Catholic ULTRAMONTANISM to a modern world dominated by LIBERALISM, democratic trends, and science. He left a legacy of eighty-six encyclicals. Born Vincenzo Gioacchino Pecci in Carpineto, Italy, he studied in Jesuit schools, and gained a doctorate in canon law and practical experience as a police chief and governor. Ordained in Rome in 1837, he rose rapidly from nuncio to bishop to cardinal in 1853.

His first significant encyclical, Aeterni Patris (1879), required the teaching of Thomas Aquinas in all Catholic schools. On Marriage (1880) warned against marriages between Catholics and non-Catholics and asserted the church's control of marriage. On Civil Government (1881) said political power must be guided by Catholic doctrine. The Christian Constitution of States (1885) asserted states should profess Roman Catholicism as the only true religion, but that Catholics could tolerate religious error in a state for the sake of securing some good or avoiding a greater evil. On Human Liberty (1888) rejected liberty of speech, press, teaching, conscience, and tolerance, except as determined by the pope, because truth and error should not have equal privileges. Rights and Duties of Capital and Labor (Rerum novarum, 1891) urged better treatment of laborers and sanctioned unions of workers.

Leo achieved better relations in Belgium and Germany, established an Apostolic Delegation in Washington, and made contacts with Japan and Russia. However, relations with England foundered when Anglican ordinations were declared invalid in 1896. His censure of "Americanism" in 1899 hampered American Catholic developments. He never accepted the Italian Republic, and forbade Catholics to participate in Italian politics.

C.M.

LEONARDO DA VINCI (1452-1519). Italian artist, sculptor, engineer, architect, scientist, mathematician, and inventor—a genius among RENAISSANCE geniuses. Born in the Tuscan town of Vinci, the illegitimate son of Ser Piero da Vinci, a noted Florentine notary, and Catarina, a peasant woman, he was raised in the paternal home in Vinci. The family settled in Florence about 1469, and da Vinci was apprenticed to Andrea del Verrocchio to study painting and sculpturing. By 1472 he was a guild master, by 1478 had his own studio, and by 1482 completed his first masterpiece, Adoration of the Magi, followed in 1483 by St. Jerome, both considered unfinished.

Lacking formal philosophy, he pursued practical projects, mathematics, natural sciences, and anatomy. He valued personal experience and observation above accepted authority, experimented with color, and brought new insights to nature and life through his artistry. He was a leader in the Renaissance emphasis on life now. From about 1482 to 1499, he worked in Milan as the chief military engineer of Duke Lodovico Sforza, helped build the cathedral of Milan, gathered a group of aspiring artists, wrote his Treatise on Painting, and labored for years on a colossal, unfinished bronze monument to the father of Lodovico.

Four masterful paintings date from this period:

Virgin of the Rocks, Lady with an Ermine, A Musician, and The Last Supper. When France invaded Milan, he returned to Florence. In 1502 he served as military engineer to Cesare Borgia, mapped central Italy, and studied mechanics. From 1503 to 1506, he was again working in Florence. He painted portraits, but only one, that of the wife of Francesco del Giocondo, survives—the famous Mona Lisa at the Louvre. Da Vinci considered it unfinished.

Invited to Milan by French King Louis XII and later to France by Francis I, da Vinci spent most of his last years in Milan and France, but maintained a studio in Florence. His virtually illegible notebooks on numerous subjects contributed later to biology, optics, and mechanics. Famous at his death, he influenced his own time and generations of artists following.

C.M.

LEPROSY. An infectious disease that by an extraordinary paradox, though pervasively mentioned in both the OT and NT (over fifty instances of the term in the OT, a round dozen in the NT), probably never existed in the Near East during biblical times. The affliction, which is now commonly called Hansen's disease, was known to the Greeks as elephantiasis. It is a bacterial disease that takes various forms, all degenerative, and slowly eats away the body's tissue or nervous system. It was one of the plagues of medieval Europe, whence it was doubtless introduced into the Near East (not endemically). It occurs today especially in hot, humid climates, is arrestable but fatal, and is not contagious; the leper has no cause to be shunned.

Biblical and modern confusion over leprosy stems from the accident of translation, together with subsequent misconceptions. The Septuagint Greek translators of the Hebrew Bible, confronted by the more than fifty instances there of the Hebrew sar'a't did not—could not—translate it by elephantiasis, a disease that they knew very well and that they knew would not fit the Hebrew. So they used the word lepra, which in Hellenistic medicine referred to just about any unpleasant or unaesthetic skin disease. From the Greek OT via the NT and into the Latin came lepra and "leprosy" and eventually its identification with a disease wholly unknown to the Bible.

It is not hard to see why it is that the "lepers" of the OT could suffer from temporary rather than degenerative disease (Exod. 4:6; Num. 12:10). Furthermore, as the Priestly laws of Leviticus 13–14 make quite plain, "leprosy" is an ailment that can encompass all kinds of skin eruptions and disfigurements (eczema, warts, and the like) all the way to "leprosy" of garments (mildew) and houses (mold, dry rot).

The Greek translators did not choose lepra without thought to translate the Hebrew word, however. They chose a word that expressed that which was aesthetically unpleasant to make the equivalent of what in the Hebrew was ritually unacceptable. For that is the ultimate sense of "leprosy" in the OT: it is not so much a physical evil to be endured as it is a ritual defilement to be expiated under the sometimes rather arbitrary rules of ritual rectitude.

In the NT leprosy has almost precisely the same contours as it possesses in the OT: in this respect, at least, the transition from OT to NT has been imperceptible. Leprosy is an affliction frequently cured, and its curability is part of the Apostolic mission (Matt. 10:8). This is to remember, among other precedents, the story of Elisha, Naaman, and Gehazi in II Kings 5. Lepers are kept at a distance according to the ritual laws (Luke 17:12; probably Mark 1:40–41). When Jesus appears as a guest in the house of Simon the leper (Matt. 26:6), he is obviously being entertained by a host whose leprosy is of the past. Though there is, for obvious reasons, no perpetuation in the practice of early Christianity of the ritual law surrounding leprosy, it is evident that the same concepts governed the physical phenomena and that the same rudimentary medicinal judgments were derived.

B.V.

LESSING, GOTTHOLD EPHRAIM (1729–81). German Lutheran dramatist, critic, biblical scholar, and advocate of religious toleration. Born into a Lutheran minister's family in Kamenz, Saxony, he studied theology, medicine, and philosophy at Wittenberg and Leipzig, and chose drama as a vocation. In 1748 he published his first play, Der Junge Gelehrte, followed by other plays and numerous essays published in Berlin's Vossische Zeitung. By extolling William Shakespeare he helped stem the influence of French writers Corneille, Racine, and Voltaire on German literature. During his final eleven years, he was ducal librarian at Wolfenbüttel. A blank-verse drama, Nathan der Weise (1779), portraying a wise Jew, pleaded for enlightened tolerance, as did his theological polemic, Erziehung des Menschengeschlechts (1780), which helped pave the way for German liberalism. Lessing was a leader in the German Enlightenment; his perceptive, critical essays set standards for painting, drama, theology, poetry, and sculpture. The Wolfenbüttel Fragments, from H. S. Reimarus, edited by Lessing, appeared in seven parts (1774–78) and widened the Enlightenment's understanding of NT origins. Lessing believed Matthew was based on an earlier Aramaic writing. An interest in archaeology led to his discovery of a Berengar manuscript on the Eucharist in 1770.

C.M.

LESSON. A selection from Scripture chosen to be read during worship services. These passages are taken from a lectionary. Lessons may be from the OT, the Epistles, or the Gospels. Occasionally, other portions of Scripture such as Acts or the Revelation are used as lessons.

J.C.

LEVELLERS. This party arose about 1645 during the English Civil War among radical Parliamentarians who wished to "level men's estates." Their progressive social and economic reforms included manhood suffrage and regular sessions of Parliament. Their 1647 manifesto, Agreement of the People, was debated until their leader John Lilburne was imprisoned in 1649 and his followers suppressed. They appealed to reason rather than arguing from tradition and the Bible. Some of their ideas were later adopted by the Quakers. N.H.

LEVI. The third son of JACOB and LEAH (Gen. 29:34) and the ancestor of the priestly clan that bore his name. As an individual, he is presented as a violent avenger of his sister's honor (Gen. 34:25-31). This violence earned Levi the deathbed "blessing" of his father, Jacob, to be scattered in Israel (Gen. 49:7). This "scattering" occurred when, after standing with Moses at the crisis of the golden calf, the LEVITES were ordained to the service of the Lord (Exod. 32:25-29). Their tribe received no allotment of the Promised Land (Josh. 13:14). They were to be substitutes for the firstborn sons of all of Israel, dedicated to serve the Lord at the sanctuary as a lower order of priests (Num. 3:5-51; 8:5-22). W.S.T.

LEVIATHAN. Although mentioned only five times in the Bible, this sea monster is well known in Canaanite texts. Its many heads are alluded to in Psalm 74:14, where, representing both God's primordial cosmic enemies and the human adversary Egypt, it is subdued at the sea (see Isa. 47:1). In Psalm 104:26 it is a friendly monster, possibly a whale, and in Job 41 it is more like a crocodile. The curious reference in Job 3:8 suggests that Leviathan caused eclipses. W.S.T.

LEVITES. The meaning of the word Levite is unknown. Many ingenious explanations have been offered, and each has its probability. As for the real and historical meaning, it may be best to begin with the final and most certain knowledge that we have of the Levites and thence to work back to earlier and more problematical indications.

In the postexilic Jewish community, those designated "Levites" were appointed to be the minor ministers overseeing the upkeep of the sacred fabric of the restored Temple and serving as acolytes to the priesthood (Ezek. 44:9-14). They replaced in this function the Canaanite serfs ("Solomon's servants," Ezra 2:43-58), who had fulfilled this hereditary office in the days of the monarchy. The reference in Ezekiel makes it quite clear that this assignment of the Levites represented a downgrading, a new development in the Torah elaborated in Babylon that was to govern the community, which "returned" to Judah. This reduced status of the Levites doubtless explains in part the difficulty that Ezra experienced in persuading "the sons of Levi" to accompany him to Jerusalem, necessitating compromise in a man not lightly given to compromise (compare Ezra 8:15-20).

The postexilic demotion of the simple Levites was accompanied by a restriction of Priestly status in the Jewish community to only one group within the Levites, those who were putatively descended from AARON, the brother of Moses. In the Priestly law and narrative (Exodus 28-29 for example), this late development is portrayed as though it had been the rule from the beginning, but other biblical sources reveal the much more complicated history. In Deuteronomy and the Deuteronomic history, "priest" and "Levite" are interchangeable terms (compare Deut. 18:1), pointing to a time when all Levites made up the professional and hereditary Priestly class in Israel.

Ezekiel (44:15) refers to the Levitical PRIESTS as "the sons of Zadok." This reference doubtless signals a final development that had also taken place in Babylon, whereby the Zadokite priesthood of Jerusalem, favored by David (II Sam. 8:17) and Solomon (I Kings 2:35), was now regarded as the only legitimate one of the restored Israel. Whatever their actual origins, by the Chronicler (I Chr. 24:1-3) the Zadokites are accorded a Levitical and Aaronite ancestry. They were without doubt the priesthood most represented among the influential families deported from Judah and brought to Babylonia by Nebuchadnezzar II in 597 and again in 586 B.C. This Zadokite monopoly of the priesthood was anticipated, surely, by the Deuteronomic reform of King Josiah about 621 B.C. (II Kings 22-23), in which the old shrines and sanctuaries outside Jerusalem were shut down, thus leaving their local priesthoods largely without employment. This situation explains why the lawcode of Deuteronomy so frequently commends the Levite, along with resident aliens, orphans, and widows, to the charity of the Israelites (Deut. 14:29, among numerous other examples). Landless in a society in which possession of the land was all, and now deprived of the priestly tithes and perquisites that had provided their living, those Levites who could not find a place within the newly reorganized religious establishment—and these were probably most of the Levites—were reduced to the status of dependents subject to public mercy.

The Levitical character of Israel's traditional priesthood is doubtless very ancient. One would expect something of this kind initially in any case, for in the Near East of which Israel was only a minor part most callings and occupations were hereditary, restricted to designated classes and families. Thus the stories in Judges 17-18 make a great deal of sense. According to these stories an Ephraimite named Micah first installed one of his own sons to be priest in his household, following the ancient patriarchal practice (or even that of David in II Sam. 8:18) on whose terms the head of the family was in charge of all matters of religion. However, as soon as Micah encounters a wandering Levite looking for "a place" for a living, he quickly seizes the opportunity to engage him for his priest, replacing his son. Micah expresses his confidence in the Lord's blessing, "because I have a Levite as a priest."

Thus it is evident that while other priesthoods existed—well into the time of David—the Levitical was preferred. Micah's Levite, according to Judges 18, went on to found the priesthood of the sanctuary of Dan, one of the two royal shrines that were refurbished by Jeroboam I of Israel at the time of the division of the United Kingdom after Solomon's death (I Kings 12:29). Non-Levitical priests, however, continued to exist into the days of the early monarchy, and not always for lack of Levites. Not to mention David's sons and the Zadokites and others who may have been inherited from pre-Israelite Canaan, there were Eli (I Sam. 1:3) and his sons at Shiloh, ancestor of David's priest Abiathar, who was deposed by Solomon, and the great Samuel (I Sam. 3:18; 7:9-10; etc.), an Ephraimite. First Chronicles 24:3 and 6:18-28 supply Eli and Samuel, respectively, with Levitical genealogies to accommodate to the later theology. Other non-Levitical priests as well can be discerned in the sources.

What is the historical origin of the Priestly caste of the Levites in Israel? One theory has it that they were originally a secular tribe or clan that formed part of the Israelite tribal confederation, which either failed to secure a territory for itself in the Promised Land or later lost the one that it had initially secured, and thus was destined to reside in no fixed geographical region but to have its members scattered throughout the land, finding a way of living where they could. Some credence might be given to this theory by Genesis 49:5-7, part of a poetic collection generally considered to be quite old, which indicates that both the tribes of Simeon and Levi, for undisclosed reasons but probably alluding to the story of Genesis 34, were doomed to disappear as distinct geographical entities in Israel. It is true, the ethnic name Simeon did disappear quite early in Israelite history; it was absorbed into the orbit of Judah. And LEVI, as far as we know, was never a geographical entity. But this fact does not explain why the Levites should precisely have become priests, unless on the premises of medieval Europe, which dedicated the last, unprovided son to the church. Furthermore, Deuteronomy 33:8-11, in a poem that has equal claim to antiquity with Genesis 49, celebrates the Levites' priesthood rather as its glory than as its last resort, and has nothing pejorative to say about Levi.

Our information about the origins of the Israelite tribes is far too scanty for us to say a great deal concerning the tribe of Levi and its relationship to the Levites. Traditionally, the Levites are the descendants of Levi, one of the "Leah" tribes (along with Reuben, Simeon, Judah, Issachar, and Zebulun) generated by the patriarch Jacob (Gen. 35:23). These tribal names are sometimes geographical, sometimes ethnic, and as already was stated, we do not know in which category, or some other perhaps, "Levi" belongs. Some scholars have professed to find in the early genealogies attached to Levi a preponderance of Egyptian names. If this is true, it possibly has something to say with regard to the tradition that has persistently connected Moses with the Levites and the priesthood, and all of these in turn with the Exodus from Egypt at the beginning of Israel.

B. V.

LEVITICAL CITIES. According to the standard history of Israel's election by Yahweh in its liberation from the bondage of Egypt and its taking possession of the Canaanite Land of Promise, the LEVITES, destined to be the priestly caste of the Israelite people, were assigned no territory of their own but were rather distributed throughout the other tribal areas into various cities, where their separate clans would dwell with sufficient pastureland to support their families. Numbers 35:1-8 ascribes this determination to Moses, and Joshua 21 details the specific assignments of the cities, not all of which are named. The cities add up to forty-eight in all, of which six (Kedesh in Galilee, Shechem, Hebron, Bezer, Ramoth-Gilead, and Golan-in-Bashan; compare Josh. 20:7-9) are also designated "cities of refuge," that is, sanctuaries where people who had inadvertently incurred the peril of blood-vengeance might plead their case before an impartial court.

The question rises whether the Levitical cities are a figment of theology or point to some historical reality. And, if historical, to what period do they properly belong? The "cities of refuge," which probably pertain to a tradition older than that of the Levitical cities, make good historical sense. The distribution of the Levitical cities, at least in the eventual form in which we read them, is romantic rather than real. Some of them are the major cities of Israel, and they have been mechanically assigned to the various tribal areas. Yet there were in later Israel certain priestly cities (for example, Anathoth, Josh. 21:18; Jer. 32:7-9). It is a good guess that in the Deuteronomic reform of King Josiah (640-609 B.C.) certain cities were set aside for Levitical priests who exceeded the number of priests needed after the centralization of the cult in Jerusalem under the Zadokite priesthood, and that the tradition of "Levitical Cities" is the result.

B. V.

LEVITICUS. A name first given to the third book of the Bible in its Latin (Vulgate) version. This in turn derives from the title of the Greek (Septuagint) version, Leuitike Biblos, meaning "the Levitical book," a writing primarily concerned with the responsibilities of Levitical priests. Known in Hebrew as wayyiqra' ("and he called") after its opening word, this book schooled Israel's priests in the proper techniques of official public worship and informed the laity about their religious and civil duties as Yahweh's holy covenant people.

Organization and Basic Content. Though Leviticus is a separate book in the PENTATEUCH, it belongs to a larger body of priestly legislation (Exod. 25:1–Num. 10:28, minus Exod. 32–34). The contents of this relatively uncomplicated book divide into six parts: the sacrificial system (chaps. 1–7); consecration of the priesthood (chaps. 8–10, a logical extension of Exod. 35–40); laws enjoining ritual purity (chaps. 11–15); the Day of Atonement (Yom Kippur) ceremony (chap. 16); precepts directing Israel's existence as a holy people (chaps. 17–26); and an appendix on religious vows (chap. 27).

Composition. The process whereby Leviticus achieved its present form is lengthy and complex, for its full legislation originated across several centuries. As a literary product, however, Leviticus fully belongs to the Priestly (P) stratum of the Pentateuch and presumably was completed during the sixth-century B.C. Babylonian exile (see DOCUMENTARY HYPOTHESIS). In content, style, and outlook, chapters 17–26 are distinguishable from chapters 1–16 and 27. For more than a century, this special unit in P has been labeled the Holiness Code (H). Its ethical and ritual precepts, alternately addressed to PRIESTS and laity, are continuously punctuated with an appeal for holiness. Unlike chapters 1–16 and 27, the intentionality of the legislation is frequently articulated, and the phrase, "I am Yahweh," appears nearly fifty times as a fitting means for motivating Israel's fidelity to the Torah. Nevertheless, the Holiness Code has been well accommodated to the overall legislative perspective of the finally edited book.

Legislative Centers of Gravity. There are five "centers." First, the opening legislation distinguishes between (a) spontaneously motivated sacrifices (the burnt offering {olah}, the cereal offering of grain or cakes {minhab}, and peace offerings {shelem}, enumerated in chapters 1–3) and (b) mandatory sacrifices for the expiation of sin that ruptures the individual's relation with deity and threatens communal well-being (the sin offering {hatta'ah} and guilt offering {asham} mentioned in chapters 4–5). Second, in the legislation on priestly consecration in chapters 8–10, the spotlight falls more on Moses than Aaron. As the unique mediator of Yahweh's law, Moses conducts the consecration service and assigns the priests their duties. Third, the differentiation between clean and unclean in chapters 11–15 is considered a vital priestly task. Ritual impurities involving animals (chap. 11), childbirth (chap. 12), various skin diseases (chaps. 13–14), and genital discharges (chap. 15) assume a rationale now lost in oblivion; yet originally this legislation undoubtedly fostered in Israel a proper appreciation of the divinely ordered natural world. Fourth, with its use of the scapegoat that symbolically receives the nation's transgressions and is driven into the wilderness for Azazel (a desert demon?), the Day of Atonement legislation in chapter 16 provides Yahweh's people a solemn occasion for returning to spiritual wholeness. Finally, with its heterogeneous stipulations on such matters as animal sacrifice, unlawful marriage, sexual offenses, necromancy, blasphemy, and the sabbatical and jubilee years designed to curb economic exploitation, the precepts in chapters 17–26 assist Israel in honoring the divine mandate, "You shall be holy; for I [Yahweh] your God am holy" (19:2).

Religious Significance. Notwithstanding its proclivity for legislative detail, Leviticus espouses a theological position most congenial to Israel's fundamental covenant faith. It freely recognizes that in Yahweh's ineffable purity and glory, Yahweh chose Israel as a special people. God separated and sanctified them by securing their liberation from Egypt (22:32–33). Presently Israel's incomparable Deity challenges the chosen to pursue a life-style that will reflect Yahweh's own holiness. Everything profane must be shunned. Only so can Israel shoulder its covenant duty to be like Yahweh. Having received its final editing after Jerusalem's destruction and Israel's loss of nationhood, Leviticus challenges Yahweh's people to learn from past tragedy and embrace the future, armed with full knowledge of the covenant claims of the God of Sinai, which are ever normative. These claims include ethical as well as cultic obligations. Most celebrated among the former is 19:18, "You shall love your neighbor as yourself," which reappears in Mark 12:31 within Jesus' teaching about the Great Commandment. J.K.K.

LEWIS, CLIVE STAPLES (1898–1963). Noted literary critic and urbane Christian apologist whose writings have attracted a wide following. Born on November 29, in Belfast, Ireland, C. S. Lewis spent most of his life in the rarified atmosphere of Oxford and Cambridge. Following his youth and early education, which was poignantly described in Surprised by Joy (1955), Lewis entered Oxford University in 1917. He soon left to serve as a second lieutenant with the Somerset Light Infantry. He was wounded in the fighting near Lillers, France, hospitalized, and ultimately discharged in December 1918. Back at Oxford in 1919, he received a bachelor's degree in 1923 and later a master's degree.

He became a lecturer at University College, Oxford, in 1924, and the following year he became a Fellow and tutor of Magdalen College, Oxford. There he remained until 1954. In that year he was given the chair of Medieval and Renaissance Literature at Cambridge.

Lewis began his writing career with a two-volume book of verse, Spirits in Bondage, published under the pen name of Clive Hamilton. In 1936 he made a name in scholarly circles with The Allegory of Love: A Study in Medieval Tradition. He also wrote A Preface to Paradise Lost (1942) and English Literature in the Sixteenth Century (1955). The latter volume is a part of the Oxford History of English Literature.

But Lewis is known to the Christian world for his witty, sophisticated apologetics, starting in 1941

Courtesy of Wheaton College, Marion E. Wade Collection

C. S. Lewis

when Screwtape Letters, consisting of correspondence from Screwtape, a senior devil, to his nephew, struck the Christian world. The letters were instructions on tripping up a Christian convert. He had written The Problem of Pain in 1940.

Then followed The Abolition of Man (1944), dealing with the basic philosophy of education, The Great Divorce (1945), and Miracles (1947). Later works include Mere Christianity (1952), Till We Have Faces (1956), Reflections on the Psalms (1958), The World's Last Night (1959), The Four Loves (1960), and Christian Reflections (1967), which was published posthumously. His trilogy of novels include Out of the Silent Planet (1938), Perelandra (1943), and That Hideous Strength (1945).

Many of his followers, who have become a sort of cult, hold in highest esteem his seven "Narnia" books for children. They include The Lion, the Witch, and the Wardrobe; The Magician's Nephew; and The Last Battle.

Lewis had remained a bachelor most of his life but in 1956—at the age of fifty-eight—he married Joy Davidman Gresham, an American Jew who had been converted to Christ. She was already suffering from cancer when they were married. She lived only four years but she brought great joy to the distinguished author. His tribute to her, A Grief Observed, was published in 1963, the year of Lewis' own death.

On both sides of the Atlantic, C. S. Lewis is esteemed as one of the greatest writers of this generation. R.H.

LEX TALIONIS. Drawn from the common law of the ancient Near East, the law of retaliation, "eye for eye, tooth for tooth," which receives its earliest OT formulation in Exodus 21:23b-25 (see Lev. 24:19-20; Deut. 19:21). Harsh as it seems, it embodies the principles of proportionality and equal treatment before the law. In Matthew 5:38-42, Jesus approaches the law from the point of view of the victim, substituting for an exact retaliation a principle of confrontative nonviolence, which responds to a slap on the cheek with an offer of the other cheek (see Luke 6:29-30; Rom. 12:17-21; I Per. 3:9). W.S.T.

LI. Two different terms in CONFUCIANISM spelled li in English. The first means "proper conduct," or "good form," in keeping with rules and traditional standards; it is the outward expression of true goodness. The second term has two related meanings: (1) the individual principles that bring order to matter and energy and produce all the variety in the world, and (2) that supreme principle, which unites all individual principles in itself. K.C.

LIBERALISM. Liberalism as a theological movement—distinct from a general spirit of religious liberality and tolerance—is the creation of the nineteenth century. It reached its zenith early in the twentieth century. Liberal Catholicism must be distinguished from Protestant Liberalism, although they share a commitment to critical inquiry.

The beginning of political Liberal Catholicism is identified with Félicité Robert de Lamennais (1782–1854). He and his associates called upon the pope to "baptize" the liberal ideals of the French Revolution. In his newspaper, L'Avenir, Lamennais called for separation of church and state, freedom of religion, press, and association. Political Liberal Catholicism was condemned by Pope Gregory XVI in the encyclical Mirari vos (1832). In Germany two centers of theological Liberal Catholicism were especially important. The earliest is associated with the Catholic theological faculty at Tübingen, led by J. S. Drey (1777–1853) and J. A. Mohler (1796–1838). They were influenced by German ROMANTICISM and IDEALISM and, contrary to SCHOLASTICISM, sought to interpret dogma in more experiential and historical terms. After 1840 the center of Liberal Catholicism shifted to the University of Munich and to the leadership of the learned ecclesiastical historian Johann Ignaz Döllinger (1799–1890). Döllinger denounced Scholasticism and the dogma of papal INFALLIBILITY and upheld the use of the sciences in the study of church history and doctrine. Liberal Catholicism in England is identified with the historian John (later Lord) Acton (1834–1902), a disciple of Döllinger's. While sharing certain common aims, Liberal Catholicism is a movement distinct from Catholic MODERNISM.

Protestant Liberalism is a rather general term for several theological movements of the past two centuries which, while distinguishable, share a temper of mind and certain tenets. The fathers of Protestant Liberalism are F. SCHLEIERMACHER and A. RITSCHL. Liberals hold in common a suspicion of natural or speculative theology; consider dogma an illegitimate mixture of religion and metaphysics, therefore secondary or dispensable; cherish human freedom and reason; endorse the application of critical scholarship to the Bible and ecclesiastical tradition; and emphasize the practical side of religion, especially the ethical imperatives of the Hebrew prophets and of Jesus. A classic expression of Liberalism is found in ADOLF VON HARNACK's (1851-1930) popular What Is Christianity? (1900), where he summarizes Jesus' gospel as "the kingdom of God and its coming; God the Father and the infinite value of the human soul; and the higher righteousness and the commandment of love."

The most characteristic expression of Protestant Liberalism in America was the SOCIAL GOSPEL movement associated with WALTER RAUSCHENBUSCH, which rejected individualistic and pietistic forms of Christianity. An important distinction can be made between Protestant Evangelical Liberalism and a more radical form of American Protestantism appropriately called Liberal Modernism. The former stood squarely within historic Christianity; the latter was concerned less with preserving the historic doctrines and traditions of the faith. Liberalism's conception of the historical Jesus was shaken by ALBERT SCHWEITZER's Quest of the Historical Jesus (1907). Its optimistic view of human reason and freedom and its progressive vision of history were profoundly challenged by KARL BARTH and REINHOLD NIEBUHR. While certain tenets of earlier Liberalism are obsolete, its legacy endures. Many of its principles and commitments inform theological work today. J.L.

LIBERATION THEOLOGY. Liberation theology designates various Christian theologies emphasizing social justice, freedom from oppression, and God's liberating action in history, and calling for empowerment of the oppressed rather than charity from oppressors. In different forms, liberation theology has become a point of ecumenical convergence, relating diverse groups seeking economic and political justice. The movement can be understood through its background, major manifestations, and appraisal.

Background. Liberation and salvation, with theological/ethical dimensions, are central in most world religious traditions. Hinduism and Buddhism seek liberation from the round of rebirth. The Judeo-Christian-Muslim tradition promises liberation from sin, oppression, and the fear of death. Greco-Roman thought speaks of liberation from life's ills and limitations, for example, Plato's myth of the cave. Biblical traditions have been the primary historical source for Western movements of liberation.

As Western society emerged from the Middle Ages seeking liberation from ecclesiastical, political, and economic oppression, power shifted from autocratic rulers to the rising middle class. Revolutions usually took a federal form, with governments not overthrown but changed from centralized to republican control. Federalism (from the Latin foedus, meaning "covenant") developed from federal theology and ethics and must be distinguished from liberalism, which is individualistic, optimistic about human nature, and dedicated to ideal democracy.

In the nineteenth century, federal revolution as transformation of power structures was eclipsed by the Marxist conception of revolution as the overthrow of government. Whereas federalism sought liberation of oppressed middle classes, Marxism intended liberation of oppressed lower classes. Marxist revolutions have immediate liberating impact but tend to become static around gains achieved, whereas federal revolutions provide for continuing social change.

Federalism and related biblical traditions produced many social reforms: abolition of slavery, protection of labor, assistance to farmers, conservation of the natural environment, rights of women and children, improved treatment of racial and ethnic minorities, etc. In Protestant Christianity, these concerns merged into the SOCIAL GOSPEL and informed the ecumenical movement as it developed into the World Council of Churches. Roman Catholicism, allied with remnants of feudal autocracy until the late nineteenth century, began with Leo XIII (Rerum novarum, 1891) to develop social teachings that since 1960 have emphasized liberation.

A major milestone on the way to recent liberation theology is the civil rights movement in the United States. Based on concern for unjust treatment of blacks, this movement forged tactics of protest against racial discrimination in the 1930s and 1940s, gained national attention in the 1950s as MARTIN LUTHER KING, JR. applied those tactics in the Montgomery bus boycott, won political success in the sweeping civil rights legislation of the early 1960s, and achieved international recognition when he received the 1964 Nobel Peace Prize.

Major Manifestations. Liberation theologies build on traditions of social justice and experiences of oppression. Forms considered here are: (a) black, (b) third world, (c) feminist, and (d) white. More extensive treatment might include political theology and the theology of hope, for example, JÜRGEN MOLTMANN, Johann-Baptist Metz, and Dorothee Soelle.

(a) Black liberation theology emerged from the shift in the 1960s from civil rights to black power. Civil rights goals were political and economic equality in an integrated society. Limited success brought increased power to blacks and also disillusionment.

Black power advocates rejected integration and affirmed "black is beautiful." For black theologian James Cone (A Black Theology of Liberation, 1970), theology explicates "the meaning of God's liberating activity so that those who labor under enslaving powers will see that the forces of liberation are the activity of God" and takes "the oppression of black people as a point of departure for analyzing God's activity in contemporary America." For Gayraud Wilmore oppression and blackness exemplify a "singular religiosity" present in many religions and point beyond Christian theology (Black Religion and Black Radicalism, 1972). Liberation theology comes also from other ethnic perspectives, for example, Vine Deloria in God Is Red, 1973.

(b) Third world liberation theology emerged from situations of oppression and exploitation in Latin America, Africa, and Asia. In the writings of Gustavo Gutierrez, Jose Miguez-Bonino, Juan Luis Segundo, Allen Aubrey Boesak, and Kim Yong Bock, an understanding of biblical Christianity appears unlike that in most Western theology. First, theology must start with the poor and the oppressed because the God of biblical faith is on their side. Second, Marxist social analysis aids Christian theology and ethics by disclosing social conflict, systemic evil, and the necessity of commitment to societal change. Third, human liberation defines eschatological hope and historical reality as given in Christian faith.

(c) Feminist liberation theology developed in interaction with black and third world movements, emerging from women's experience of oppression, "the oldest form of oppression in human history" (Rosemary Radford Ruether, Liberation Theology: Human Hope Confronts Christian History and American Power, 1972). Some feminist theologians reject biblical faith as hopelessly patriarchal and turn to goddess symbols and traditions, for example, Mary Daly. Other feminist theologians seek to recover the prophetic, messianic power of the Bible as the basis of critique and theology, for example, Rosemary Ruether, Letty M. Russell, and Elisabeth Moltmann-Wendel.

(d) White liberation theology responds to and interprets black, third world, and feminist liberation theologies. White liberationists emphasize that North Atlantic white theologies are not normative for Christian theology and that the experience of oppression must be central. Frederick Herzog (Liberation Theology: Liberation in the Light of the Fourth Gospel, 1972) writes: "Theology today must begin with an identification with the wretched of the earth, . . . the marginal figures of life who are still struggling for personhood and dignity." Benjamin Reist asserts that whites must learn to be white with a sense of particularity and ethnic consciousness, knowing that all human groups are "equally present in the historical space that is human liberation" (Theology in Red, White and Black, 1975). For Charles S. McCoy (When Gods Change: Hope for Theology, 1980), liberation has plural meanings related to different experiences of oppression, and pluralism is viewed as having liberating power within the faithful action of the covenant God.

Appraisal. Liberation theology is making many contributions to Christian thought and action. First, it emphasizes anew salvation as deliverance, with God leading humanity out of bondage. God's faithful action incarnate in Jesus Christ reveals a future filled with divine justice and love. Second, liberation theology affirms that solidarity with the poor, the perspective of the oppressed, and empowerment of the powerless are required to achieve social justice. Third, liberation theology relates Christian faith and Marxism so that both are useful for critique of feudal, capitalist, and socialist forms of oppression.

Liberation theologies have difficulties. First, the theology of revolution, by opposing military power with eschatological dreaming, often has aided oppressive regimes. Second, some liberation theologies have used Marxism not only for social analysis but have permitted it to displace biblical faith as an encompassing world view. Third, some view one liberation theology as the only one (for example, black, Latin American, feminist, or some other), ignoring the oppression of other groups and the long history and diverse stories of human liberation throughout the world and among all peoples. Liberation theology was not invented by this generation, nor does it come from only one situation of oppression. Its differing manifestations in the past and around the globe today add richness to the liberation theme and power to the liberation movement.

The significance of liberation theology lies in its protests against injustice, its articulation of the pain and hopes of oppressed peoples, and its continuing rediscovery of the eschatological anticipations of newness, change, and liberation as the shared experience of all humanity. Martin Luther King, Jr., informed by GANDHI as well as the prophets and Jesus, articulated clearly that liberation of the oppressed means liberation of the oppressor; that black liberation will accomplish white liberation; that the liberation of women will also free men; and that only as liberation is the cause of God can it be the hope of humanity. C.Mc.

LIBER PONTIFICALIS. Latin for "The Papal Book," a collection of papal biographies from the early church through the fifteenth century. The first compiler drew heavily from the Catalogus Liberianus, containing a list of popes that ended with Liberius (352-366) and apparently continued the biographies to Stephen V (885-891). Subsequent writers under papal sponsorship continued the Liber pontificalis through Sixtus IV (1471-84). Some popes received little attention, others a great deal. Generally the style is formalized and stereotyped. Pope Damasus is often credited with originating the Liber pontificalis, but such is not entirely clear. It was not printed until early in the seventeenth century. C.M.

LIBERTY, RELIGIOUS. Unrestricted freedom to practice religious beliefs; often called toleration, meaning "an established authority allows such practices," limited by the liberty of others. The Edict of Milan (A.D. 313) granted freedom to Christians and all others to follow their religious convictions. However, after 385, when Theodosius I made Christianity the only legal religion in the Roman Empire, religious liberty and toleration ceased. The partnership of church and state made disfavored religions heretical and intolerable. During the Reformation Luther seemingly advocated toleration but soon perceived social anarchy in individual religious liberty and opted for territorialism. Territorialism allowed limited toleration for Lutherans and Catholics following the Peace of Augsburg (1555), with neither side conceding truth or full privileges to the other. Both persecuted the Anabaptists, believing that individual liberty would lead to social anarchy. Anabaptist Balthasar Hubmaier in 1524 issued Concerning Heretics and Those Who Burn Them, the Reformation's first plea for full religious toleration. Anabaptists passively resisted civil government saying that Christians did not need magistrates. Calvin staunchly opposed toleration.

Separatist Robert Browne took a large step toward religious liberty in Reformation without Tarrying for Any (1582). He argued that magistrates should not interfere with religious practices. John Smyth, a Separatist exiled in Holland, advocated the SEPARATION OF CHURCH AND STATE, as did his Baptist associate, Thomas Helwys, whose Mystery of Iniquity (1612) openly called for full religious freedom. English Baptists pressed for liberty and gained relative religious equality under Oliver Cromwell, for all except Unitarians, Anglicans, and Catholics.

In America neither New England's Calvinistic Puritans nor Virginia's Anglican establishment allowed religious freedom. However, Roger Williams established Rhode Island (1636), permitting freedom of conscience; and other Baptists, and freethinkers like Jefferson and Madison, eventually secured freedom of religion in Virginia and adoption of the church-state separation amendment to the U.S. Constitution. The United States experiment with VOLUNTARISM influenced most of western Europe's countries eventually to adopt toleration. Roman Catholicism, claiming to be the true church, has traditionally maintained that untruth should not have equal privileges with truth. It has accommodated itself to modified religious toleration without officially repudiating its traditional stance. Totalitarian regimes that subordinate the individual to the state by their nature cannot allow religious liberty (Compare DENOMINATIONALISM.) C.M.

LIBIDO. See FREUD, SIGMUND.

LIBNAH. (1) A wilderness site mentioned in Numbers 33:20-21.

(2) A Canaanite town sacked by Joshua (Josh. 10:29-39), later described in Joshua 15:42 as a Judean community on the border of Philistia and one of the cities given to the Levites (Josh. 21:13). Though it revolted against Jehoram (II Kings 8:22), it supported Hezekiah in his struggle against Assyria (19:8). It is the modern Tell es-Safi, twenty air miles west southwest of Jerusalem. W.S.T.

LIBYA. The well-known central North African nation of modern times encompasses only part of what the biblical and ancient Near Eastern records meant by the geographical term "Libya." Called Cub in Ezekiel 30:5, Libya is listed among other peoples in league with Egypt who are destined to be destroyed by Yahweh. One of those peoples is Put, itself translated "Libya" in Ezekiel 38:5, where it is a hostile power in league with the eschatological enemy Gog of the land of Magog. The ancestor of Put is described in Genesis 10:6 as a son of Ham and brother of Ethiopia, Egypt, and Canaan. In II Chronicles 12:3; 16:8; Daniel 11:43; and Nahum 3:9, we hear of Lubim, "Libyans," always in association with Egyptians and Ethiopians. The Chronicles texts (and I Kings 14:25-26) report the conquest of Judah by the Egyptian Pharaoh Shishak, about 917 B.C., during the reign of Rehoboam. This pharaoh was a Libyan and founder of the two-hundred-year Libyan dynasty in Egypt. In Acts 2:10, Libyans were among those who witnessed the miracle of Pentecost. W.S.T.

LIFE. The quality of animation, of living; the opposite of DEATH and loss of being. The Bible clearly states that God creates life, and that the life of each person is God's gift. In the OT (Gen. 2:7) God is said to breathe life into people, and the Psalms praise God as the preserver of life (Ps. 66). The ancient Hebrews thought of a long life as a reward for a godly life and saw Yahweh's blessing in the attainment of old age. However, the Wisdom literature was more pessimistic and spoke of the shortness of life (Job. 7:6; 9:25).

Above all, the Hebrews, along with the rest of the ancient world, identified the animating principle of life with BLOOD. Life is in the blood according to Deuteronomy 12:23 and Leviticus 17:11. Because of this belief, blood was splashed upon the altar during sacrifices and also sprinkled on the worshipers. Blood was shed in making (or "cutting") a covenant by sacrificing animals and also in ritual circumcision. The need to drain all blood from meat slaughtered for food (the dietary laws) also derived from this ancient belief.

In the NT, life is used both in the physical and the spiritual sense, with the major use (in the writings of John) referring to life in communion with God (John 1:4; 14:6; 20:31). Jesus is said to be "life"; physical existence apart from faith in Jesus as the Christ is called "death" or "darkness." Regularly, the term "life" in John might be translated "eternal life." This ETERNAL LIFE is not something the believer enters into only at death, rather it begins now, in this world, when one is born anew through faith in Jesus Christ. Jesus declares, "I am . . . the truth, and the life" (John 14:6), and John proclaims that the faithful move from death into life (John 5:24). Life, then, for John, and also for Paul (Rom. 8:6), is more than animation, movement, consciousness. It is to be filled with the power of God's endless life, which flows into the redeemed from the risen, living Savior.

J.C.

LIFE CYCLE RITES. The rituals performed at the time of a person's transition from one stage of life to another; also called "rites of passage." The rituals and the life stages they mark vary between cultures, but certain similarities can be found nearly everywhere in the world.

The stages in the life cycle define each individual. In America, the eighteenth and twenty-first birthdays mark the individual's progression into adulthood, bringing with them increasing rights and responsibilities. Many non-European cultures have elaborate ceremonies to mark the transition to another status. These rites redefine the individual socially, putting him or her in the next-older category. Many cultures define the lifespan with three or four familiar-sounding stages: childhood, adolescence, adulthood, and sometimes elder. All cultures, but especially those that practice ANCESTOR VENERATION, add the stage of ancestorhood, for which the transition is death. Some cultures subdivide the stages, and some, especially in eastern and southern African tribes, practice age grouping. That is, all individuals born in a seven-year or ten-year interval undergo the rituals of transition together. Thus ten and twenty-year-olds may undergo the puberty ritual at the same time.

The rites of transition protect the individual and the people around him or her from the danger involved. Anthropologists have pointed out that things that are between categories are considered uncanny and dangerous. Individuals between age categories are dangerous to themselves and to others, vulnerable to sorcery, and create bad luck around themselves. Accordingly people perform life cycle rites carefully to remove individuals from their previous status, to protect them during the transition period, and then to bind them into their new roles and identities. These rites are rarely so clear-cut, but those elements can be found universally.

Life cycle rites take many forms. Scholars have argued whether confirmation and baptism are life cycle rites. Circumcision is a common ritual performed when an infant has lived the first few days and can be considered a "real" child, destined to stay. Some cultures perform circumcision at adulthood.

Other adulthood rituals include symbolic death and rebirth. Naming or renaming can occur at any stage. Filing of the canine teeth is performed on all Balinese at puberty. Other symbols of transition include cutting or tying up the hair, knocking out of teeth, new clothes, and new residence.

Death rituals—not only funerals but later commemorations such as death-day offerings, All Souls' Day, and reburial—separate the individual from this world. This transition may be to rebirth (REINCAR-NATION), an eternal afterlife, or the spirit world. Frequently these rituals separate the survivors from the dead person, allowing them to go on. In China, a red string is tied to the corpse, and all the survivors line up, holding a part of the string. A priest then cuts the string between each person. In many cultures, casting handfuls of dirt onto the casket signifies the separation of the deceased from the living.

Some cultures practice reburial of the deceased's bones after a period of years. Tibetans observe a forty-nine day period after death, during which the soul may achieve release from rebirth, or at least birth into the Pure Land paradise.

K./M.C.

LIGHT. The symbol for God's presence in both the OT and the NT. According to Psalm 4, Yahweh is the light of the believer's face, that is, God gives life and also that discernment by which the human being can "see" what is real and true.

Psalm 119 says that God's word spoken through the prophet Moses and the other prophetic witnesses, is a light to enlighten the path of the believer. Genesis 1 affirms that God created the light and the universe by separating light from the darkness of chaos. God's presence in the tent of meeting (tabernacle) and later in the temple was marked by the eternal light and the menorah (seven-branched candlestands; I Sam. 3:3; II Chr. 4:7).

In the NT, John the Baptist spoke of the coming messiah as the light that would enlighten everyone (John 1:4) and Jesus spoke of himself as the light of the world (John 3:19-21; 8:12). In the Synoptic Gospels, Matthew records that Jesus called his followers the light of the world and warned them not to hide their light (Matt. 5:14-16). Both Paul (Eph. 5:8) and John (I John 1:5-7; 2:11) use "light" as their term for the salvation brought into the world by Jesus Christ.

The common practice of lighting candles on the altar during Christian worship services preserves the biblical symbolism of God's presence. Traditional candlelighting ceremonies on Christmas Eve affirm the faith that in Jesus, God became incarnate and brought divine light into a world darkened by sin and unbelief. The Jewish Festival of Lights (Hanukkah) also symbolizes God's presence, in particular, the return of the desecrated temple to the worship of Yahweh by Judas Maccabeus (I Macc. 4:52).

J.C.

LIGHTFOOT, JOSEPH BARBER (1828–89). An important leader within the Anglican church in England and a significant scholar in the fields of NT, especially Pauline studies and patristics, specifically the Apostolic Fathers. Lightfoot was ordained deacon in 1854 and priest in 1858. He became Hulsean professor of divinity in 1861, Canon of St. Paul's in 1871, Lady Margaret professor of divinity, Cambridge, in 1875, and Bishop of Durham in 1879.

Lightfoot was an outstanding NT and patristics scholar whose influence and value still remain in the late twentieth century. Among his many scholarly achievements, the three most important and lasting are these: (1) membership from 1870–80 in the Company of Revisers, which produced the English Revised Version of the NT (1881); (2) his major commentaries on various letters of Paul, especially Galatians, Philippians, Colossians, and Philemon (1865–75); and (3) his massive text, translation, and commentary on the Apostolic Fathers (2nd ed. 1889–90 in 5 vols.). D.S.

LILA. From the Sanskrit word for "sport" or "play." Key term in the teaching, emphasized by the Vaisnava school of HINDUISM, that God's creation of the universe is like sport or play. Because God, being infinite, could need nothing outside of God, it cannot be said that God's eternal acts of creation stem from any necessity or are a form of divine "work." Rather, we are told, God's creativity is analogous to those forms of self-expression in which humans engage out of sheer delight: games, artistry, the playtime acting out of imaginative fantasies. The term "lila" is also used of particular acts of gods and AVATARS, such as the charming activities of KRISHNA as an infant or youth engaging in dalliance with his gopis, or milkmaid companions. These are major focuses of BHAKTI and well express the theme of divine playfulness encapsulated in the word "lila." R.E.

LILY. A flower mentioned often in the Bible, in both the OT and the NT, as in Jesus' reference to the "lilies of the field" in his Sermon on the Mount (Matt. 6:28 ff.; Luke 12:27). The "lilies" to which Jesus referred may, however, be a general term for a variety of flowers that bloom in springtime in Israel, Egypt, and the Middle East. In the OT, the lily is mentioned in the Song of Solomon (5:13; 6:2), as well as in Hosea 14:5. The lily family includes the lotus, perhaps the most commonly seen flower in the Nile Valley of Egypt. The lotus became the model for numerous artistic and architectural designs, including the capitals, or tops, of columns. Solomon's famous Temple, designed and built by the craftsmen of Hiram, king of Tyre, had many decorations based on the lily motif. These lily-shaped column capitals and embellishments on the huge ceremonial wash basin ("the molten sea") are mentioned in I Kings 7 and II Chronicles 4:5. During the period of Jewish independence under the Maccabees, the coins issued by several kings pictured the lily. J.C.

LIMBO. The place and spiritual state of departed souls who do not deserve hell, or yet merit heaven, according to traditional Roman Catholic theology. Limbo includes the place just before the atonement of Christ as well as the state of unbaptized children, who suffer from original sin alone. J.C.

LINCOLN, ABRAHAM (1809–65). The "Great Emancipator" was born February 12, 1809, to Thomas and Nancy Hanks Lincoln. Though his father was a hard-shell Baptist, the couple was married by a Methodist. In his youth Lincoln shunned the frontier camp meetings and avoided church membership.

He served in the Illinois state legislature from 1834 to 1841 and was licensed as an attorney September 9, 1836. He married Mary Todd on November 4, 1842. In 1847 he was elected to the United States House of Representatives over Methodist Peter Cartwright. He opposed the Mexican-American War and proposed abolition of slavery in the District of Columbia.

Returning to Illinois, he was a successful lawyer. His "House Divided" speech on June 17, 1858, denouncing the Dred Scott decision, and his debates with Stephen Douglas in 1858 won him national attention. He became president of the United States in 1860, precipitating the secession of the South and the Civil War. On January 1, 1863, he issued the Emancipation Proclamation and on November 19,

Gentlemen,
In response to your address, allow me to attest the accuracy of its historical statements, endorse the sentiments expressed, and thank you, in the nation's name, for the sure promise it gives.

Nobly sustained as the government has been by all the churches, I shall utter nothing which might, in the least, appear injurious against any. Yet, without this, it may fairly be shown that the Methodist Episcopal Church, not less devoted than the best, is, by its greater numbers, the most important of all. It is no fault in others but the Methodist Church sends more soldiers to the field, more nurses to the hospitals, and more prayers to heaven than any. God bless the Methodist Church—bless all the churches—and I beseech the God, who in this our great trial, sustains us the churches.

Abraham

May 13, 1864

Courtesy of the Library of Congress

Lincoln's letter to the Methodists

1863, he gave the Gettysburg Address. He was assassinated by John Wilkes Booth on April 15, 1865.

A man of deep piety who regularly attended Presbyterian services, he kept a very private faith.

N.H.

LINGA. From the Sanskrit word meaning literally "sign." An upright pillar, frequently rounded on top, which serves as the main object of worship representing SHIVA in the temples and shrines of HINDUISM. Clearly phallic in origin, the linga often has an elliptical base that stands for the yoni, or female organ. However, modern Saivas do not ordinarily describe the linga as phallic, and it can also be compared to a flame or the axle of a wheel. Sometimes a human form of Shiva is carved on the side of the stone column. Worship of the linga is done in PUJA manner, with offerings of flowers, grass, fruit, leaves, and rice. Water is poured over it, or allowed to drip on it, as a devotional act of cooling.

R.E.

LINGAYAT. A sect of HINDUISM that has some four million followers in south India. The name comes from the practice of its adherents always wearing a small LINGA, symbol of SHIVA, on a cord around their necks. The movement originated in the twelfth century A.D. in the teaching of a GURU called Basava. It regards Shiva as the only god. He is worshiped in BHAKTI manner. Worship is offered primarily in the home, temples being not highly regarded. Each member is expected to have a personal guru, who generally comes from a special class of Lingayats. These gurus are held in great regard, and their visits to a home are the occasion of major ceremonies, including the ritual washing of the teacher's feet.

The Lingayats, also called Virasaivas, are in an anomalous relation to Hinduism, rejecting many of its normative tenets. They are antipathetic to the BRAHMIN priesthood, accept the authority of their own scriptures rather than that of the VEDAS, and do not believe in reincarnation. Typically liberal in their attitudes toward caste and family, the Lingayats anticipated many modern reforms in Hindu society and have made significant contributions toward education and social welfare.

R.E.

LINGUISTIC ANALYSIS. Known also as ANALYTICAL PHILOSOPHY, this movement focuses on the function and uses of language as central for philosophy. Originating in England as a reaction to absolute idealism, linguistic analysis in varied forms has exercised wide influence in twentieth-century philosophy.

Language in Traditional Philosophy. A pervasive theme in Plato's dialogues, language receives sustained analysis in the Cratylus. Aristotle, in the Metaphysics, distinguishes subject from predicate and, on this basis, assigns fundamental ontological position to substances. After the medieval debate between realists and nominalists, critical philosophy distinguished analytic from synthetic statements, limiting the latter to the phenomenally verifiable. Language as symbol has, in the twentieth century, received attention in its cultural (Cassirer, Langer) and logical (Whitehead and Russell) significance.

Reaction to Idealism. Linguistic analysis began as a common sense attack by G. E. Moore (1873–1958) on absolute IDEALISM, which denigrated ordinary thinking as representing appearance rather than reality. Moore held that philosophy should clarify the obvious meaning of what we say. As proof that things exist external to us, he said, "Here is one hand, and here is another." Moore influenced English philosophy to turn from ideal abstractions to the analysis of ordinary truisms.

From Logical Atomism to Ordinary Language. Pushing further, Bertrand Russell (1872–1970) seeks simple, atomic propositions that state atomic facts, a basic language yielding complex propositions corresponding to reality. For Russell, linguistic analysis becomes the path to truth.

Ludwig Wittgenstein (1889–1951), a Russell disciple, at first locates meaning in atomic propositions depicting atomic facts (Tractatus logico-philosophicus, 1919). He later rejected this narrow view of language. Ordinary language is as varied as tools in a toolbox (Philosophical Investigations, 1953). "Don't think, but look!" he insisted.

Released from the confines of atomism and positivism, linguistic analysis developed in directions represented by Gilbert Ryle (1900–76), J. L. Austin (1911–60), P. F. Strawson (1919– ), and others whose work shows renewed attention to history and traditional philosophical concerns.

Continuing issues and problems for linguistic analysis include: Whose ordinary language is the norm for analysis? Can meaning be separated from particular contexts? Can precision emerge from the ambiguity of ordinary language apart from the analyst's presuppositions? Can clarification of relations of language to thought, meaning, or reality go beyond making explicit meanings implicit in the analyst's own community of interpretation?

C.Mc.

LITANY. An ancient prayer form consisting of the presiding minister's invocation or petition and the worshippers' responses. The congregational responses are fixed, such as "Lord, have mercy," "Pray for us," or "Hear our prayer." Examples of traditional litanies include the AGNUS DEI (Lamb of God), the KYRIE ELEISON (Lord Have Mercy) and the Litany of the Saints. The Kyrie Eleison forms a portion of the worship preceding the actual Mass itself in the Roman Catholic liturgy. The Agnus Dei immediately precedes the Holy Communion, in both the Roman and Lutheran Mass.

Approved litanies are those appointed for public worship services. Such litanies are liturgical litanies. The term litany may also designate a religious procession, such as the Greater or Lesser Litany. The Litany of the Saints, in two parts, then is used.

In free church Protestant services, litanies written by the worship leader for special occasions such as Christmas, Easter, or Pentecost are often used. These litanies often use parts of the traditional ones. Often such litanies are so clearly designated for a specific occasion, such as the desire for peace, or the need to work for civil rights, that they have little future usefulness.

J.C.

LITERARY CRITICISM. See BIBLICAL CRITICISM.

LITURGY. From the Greek word for "the work of the people," meaning "the public worship of the church" in the Orthodox, Roman Catholic, Anglican, and Lutheran traditions. By extension, liturgy refers to the public worship of Protestant congregations and the worship of the Jewish synagogue.

"Liturgy" derives from the ancient Greek term for community service done for the common good without pay. The Greek translation of the OT, the Septuagint (LXX) used the term for worship. At first, Christians used "liturgy" for any form of prayer, but the word soon came to designate public rather than private worship. By the time of the Reformation "liturgy" was used as a title for mass or service books.

Liturgy is worship, specifically the worship of the gathered Christian community. It is active, not passive. In worship believers recognize the sovereignty of God and submit themselves to God's rule. Liturgy consists of prayer, praise, and thanksgiving, including the bringing of tithes and offerings, all of which come from the human side; and of the reception of the sacraments, which communicate gifts and graces from the divine side. In Christian worship both God and humankind are active. Praise most often takes the form of hymns. Congregational singing, in fact, may combine prayer, praise, and thanksgiving in one supreme, beautiful act of human devotion. In Roman Catholic liturgies there are also the elements of sacrifice, in the sense of the sacrifice of the Mass, and, occasionally, the making of vows or oaths. All such actions are counted as liturgy if done publicly with the approval of the church. In the Catholic tradition, followed also by Anglicans and Lutherans, the liturgy is held only when a community of believers gathers under the leadership of a regularly called (ordained) minister of the church.

In the Catholic tradition, all liturgical actions are considered sacramental. This means every symbol expresses the life given the church by Christ, and the offering of the people of worship to the Father through Christ. Indeed, all true Christian worship is based in the Incarnation of Christ and in Christ's sacramental, spiritual presence in the community of faith. The congregation worships as the Body of Christ, praying through its glorified head to the Father. As it is called, gathered, and enlightened it is animated in its prayer, praise, and thanksgiving by the Holy Spirit.

The liturgy of the church is chiefly seen in the great Sunday service, the Mass, and the Eucharist or Holy Communion. However, among most American Lutherans and Protestants, other than Episcopalians, the Sunday service does not always include the Holy Communion. Other forms of liturgy include matins, vespers, and special offices such as the baptismal rite, confirmation, ordination, marriage, and the burial of the dead. In the Eastern Orthodox churches there is a rich liturgical tradition, parallel to but more elaborate than the rituals of the West. In the twentieth century there has been a growing richness of liturgy in America, first among the Episcopalians and Lutherans, and now extending to the free churches also.

J.C.

LIVING BIBLE. (LB) This paraphrase of the Bible in colloquial American English, which has made publishing history, started out humbly. While commuting between his home in Wheaton, Illinois, and his office in Chicago, Kenneth Taylor, a seminary-trained publisher, began translating the Scriptures in order to make them more comprehensible to his large family of children, who were having trouble with the King James Version.

Taylor's first segment covering the NT Epistles was a slim self-published volume called Living Letters (1962). Because his translation effort failed to find acceptance with publishers, Taylor, with very little capital, launched his own publishing firm in Wheaton called Tyndale House Publishers. This was followed by other biblical portions until The Living Bible was released in 1971. Within short order The Living Bible became a best seller.

Later Taylor devoted himself to the creation of adaptations of The Living Bible in the major languages of the world. To achieve this goal, he created a separate corporation, Living Bibles International. Meanwhile Tyndale Publishing House has become a major force in the evangelical publishing field, releasing books on a wide spectrum of subjects.

R.H.

LIVINGSTONE, DAVID (1813–73). One of the world's best-known missionaries to the African continent. His accomplishments as a missionary, explorer, geographer, and ethnographer displayed a heretofore unseen Africa. He first left his native Scotland in 1841 as a missionary of the London Mission Society. He is best known for his travels throughout Africa to open up the heart of the continent to mission work. After sixteen years in Africa, he returned to Britain a popular hero. For the next several years he led expeditions to Africa. Much of his effort was spent in trying to wipe out the slave trade. He died in Africa, where his heart was buried, and his emaciated body was buried in Westminster Abbey. His life work directed the attention of the world to Africa. After his death the great missionary expansion of the late nineteenth century began.

W.G.

LOCKE, JOHN (1632–1704). English philosopher, political theorist, advocate of toleration, and defender of Christianity's reasonableness. Born in Wrington, Somerset, educated at Christ Church, Oxford, Locke studied for the ministry, then turned to philosophy, science, and politics, and devoted his final years to religious writings. His first book was his Essay Concerning Toleration (1666). The following year he went to London as secretary to the Earl of Shaftesbury, upon whose political downfall he fled to Holland (1683–89) and returned a celebrity on the accession of William and Mary. From 1691 he lived with the Cudworths at Oates Manor, Essex.

Locke eschewed promoting Christianity by force and vigorously defended toleration. Letters Concerning Toleration (1689–92) advocated a broadly tolerant national church that excluded atheists for nonbelief in God, and Roman Catholics for subversive political activities. Locke's influential Two Treatises of Government (1690) rejected inherited divine right rule and argued that individuals have inalienable rights to life, liberty, and property and that governments that do not safeguard such rights may be overthrown. Locke's Essay Concerning Human Understanding (1690) depicted the mind as a tabula rasa or blank slate where sensations leave impressions that the mind reflects on. He rejected innate ideas and maintained that knowledge of empirical reality via the senses is probable rather than absolute. The Reasonableness of Christianity (1695) depicted the NT as inherently credible, probable, and in full harmony with reason. However, he declared that miracles and dogmas could not be proved. C.M.

John Locke

LOCUSTS. Various species of winged insects of the family of Acrididae are indicated by a number of Hebrew and Greek terms in the Bible, some of which are usually rendered "locusts" in the RSV. Modern readers may not share John the Baptist's predilection toward these insects as food (Matt. 3:4; Mark 1:6), though even today they are prepared in various ways to be eaten by Bedouins and certain Oriental Jews. (Lev. 11:22 excepts various species of locusts from the general ban on eating winged insects.) But many of us, particularly people who live in arid lands such as Nebraska and Wyoming, can share the ancient dread of a plague of locusts. Joel 1:4 pictures the desolation left by such an infestation: "What the cutting locusts left, the swarming locust has eaten. What the swarming locust left, the hopping locust has eaten, and what the hopping locust left, the destroying locust has eaten." Indeed, the entire first part of the book of Joel (1:1–2:27) is a description of a locust disaster, interpreted as the very day of the Lord's judgment upon the people (2:1). The locusts are pictured as a powerful, relentless army (2:5–9), and like crackling flame devouring the stubble (2:5). For the book of Deuteronomy, a plague of locusts is one of the curses with which God threatens a disobedient people (Deut. 28:38, 42). In Revelation 9:1–12, a plague of horrible humanoid locusts is one of the tribulations of end-times.

The earliest plague of locusts to be mentioned in the OT was not directed against Israel at all, but against Egypt (Exod. 10:3–20). The infestation of this eighth plague brought by God against Pharaoh and his people "covered the face of the whole land, so that the land was darkened" (v. 15). The affiliation of this memory with North Africa is not inappropriate, for the desert locust begins its life cycle in the Sudan. After reaching its gregarious phase, it can migrate in three days of unbroken flight as far as 1240 miles from its place of origin. When rain and temperature conditions are favorable, huge swarms can develop, such as took place in 1927–30, when much of the fresh vegetation of the Near East was destroyed.

W.S.T.

LOGIA. The Greek term for "sayings" or "words." According to Papias, there was a document containing the Logia of Jesus circulating in the early church. This is generally considered to be the Gospel of Mark, or an earlier version of Mark (Proto-Mark or Ur-Mark). The hypothetical "second source" used by Matthew and Luke (in addition to Mark) has been called the Logia or Q (from the German quelle, or "source"). "Logia" is also used to refer to possible sayings of Jesus not recorded in the four canonical Gospels, such as quotations in Paul's letters or other parts of the NT, as well as in noncanonical "gospels," such as the Gospel of Thomas. Primarily, however, "logia" is used to refer to the hypothetical Q, since it is chiefly a collection of "sayings" or discourses of Jesus recorded in a similar manner by Matthew and Luke, but not found in Mark. J.C.

LOGICAL POSITIVISM. A type of philosophy that combines language analysis with an extreme form of empiricism. The classic statement was given by A. J. Ayer in Language, Truth and Logic (1936).

On this view, there are two types of meaningful propositions. There are the A PRIORI propositions of logic and mathematics. These yield no information about the real world, but simply draw out the implications of the definitions constituting the foundation of a logical or mathematical system. Their truth or falsity is determined by rules of logical inference. The second class of propositions are A POSTERIORI and do yield information about the world. If they are to be meaningful, there must be some empirical state of affairs that is relevant to their truth or falsehood. "Verification by sense experience" became, therefore, the central plank in the edifice of logical positivism.

It is obvious that this philosophy greatly reduced the area of meaningful discourse. Metaphysics, ethics, and theology were all dismissed as strictly meaningless, for they are incapable of verification by sense experience and can, therefore, be neither true nor false. Ayer pointed out that the logical positivist cannot be rightly described as either an atheist or an agnostic, for, since the assertion of God's existence is meaningless, it cannot be denied, nor can we suspend belief about it.

The most serious weakness of this philosophy was the fact that its own central tenet, the verification principle, does not itself fall within either of the two categories of meaningful propositions. It is in itself a metaphysical principle and is therefore condemned by the very theory based upon it. Not for the first time in the history of philosophy has an extreme skepticism been found to be self-destroying. We are indeed forced to ask the questions: What is the scope of human experience? Is it confined, as the positivists allege, to sense experience, or is it much richer than that so that we are not confined to the narrow world of the positivist? These, however, are questions that logical positivism has, by its own principles, rendered incapable of discussion.

J.M.

LOGOS. A Greek word with various meanings, which in its religious context is associated especially with the divine Word, reason, or wisdom. In the Greek Septuagint translation of the OT, the Hebrew term "Word" of God is translated as Logos or reason. It is this use of Logos as "Word of God" that plays such a formative role in Jewish and especially in Christian theology, where it refers to the second Person of the Trinity—Christ. In the OT, God's word is both the medium of communication, especially of God's will or law, and the agent of creative power (Gen. 1:3, 6, 9) by which God calls all things into being. By the time of the Hebrew prophets (ninth-eighth centuries B.C.), the "Word of the Lord" had almost achieved the status of an independently divine hypostasis or substantial reality.

The Stoic philosophers (fourth-third centuries B.C.) taught that the universe is governed by a divine Logos, "reason," or "law." When Hellenistic Judaism came under the influence of Stoic ideas, the "Word of the Lord" was assimilated to the Stoic Logos and also associated with the originally distinct Hebrew concept of WISDOM (Wisd. Sol. 9:1-2). The Hellenistic emphasis on the absolute transcendence of God resulted in the interposing of divine intermediaries between God and creation. Thus in Judaism the divine "Word" and "Wisdom" were further personified and conceived of as God's divine agents in creation. In PHILO OF ALEXANDRIA the OT Word and the Stoic Logos are identified. The Logos is both the divine "pattern" from which the creation is copied and the divine power in the creation, the intermediary between the transcendent God and humanity. Philo uses a variety of titles to describe the Logos as mediator. The Logos is God's "first-born son," the "image" and "ambassador," and humanity's "advocate" and "high priest." In identifying the preexistent Logos with Christ, it is clear that the NT Pauline and Johannine writings are influenced by the same background of ideas as is Philo. In the concept of the preexistent Christ, Paul joins the Jewish ideas of the preexistent Messiah and the preexistent Wisdom and Law. In the prologue to the Johannine Gospel, the Logos is identified with the eternal God as God's creative Word, by whom all things are made, and who becomes incarnate in the man Jesus of Nazareth.

The theologians of the early church found in the Logos the perfect concept for expressing the relationship of Christ to God, as well as an apologetic point of contact with Hellenistic philosophy. The orthodox Christian teaching held that the preexistent Logos (Christ) is eternally begotten or generated of the Father, not made, and thus is of the same substance of God and coeternal. Before this orthodox position was worked out explicitly in the Christian creeds, two divergent heretical views were supported by church theologians. One tendency, that of the school of Alexandria, was to view the Logos as subordinate to the Father. The extreme form of this view was ARIANISM, which said that "there was a time when the Son was not." It held that the Logos was created by God out of nothing, and thus was not God. This view was condemned at the Council of Nicaea (A.D. 325).

The other tendency identified the Father and the Logos (Son) so closely as to deny any distinctions in the being of God. The Logos was considered only a power of God. This view had many exponents in the third century and is known as MONARCHIANISM or Sabellianism, after Sabellius who taught that Father, Son, and Holy Spirit are only names applied to the modes of God's action. This latter view was condemned at the Council of Constantinople in A.D. 381. The contest between these two heretical tendencies led to the orthodox formulation of the TRINITY. J.L.

LOHAN. In MAHAYANA BUDDHISM a disciple of the BUDDHA. The word is the Chinese form of the Sanskrit term arhant.

In early Buddhism the lohans were the ideal followers of Buddha, but in Mahayana they lost this position to the BODHISATTVAS. A bodhisattva is a being who has vowed to work for the salvation of every living being, and thus could be seen as the model of mercy and compassion. A lohan, on the other hand, worked only for his own salvation and was therefore considered selfish.

As a result, Mahayana paintings and images show bodhisattvas as serene, beautiful beings, beyond human ills, but show lohans as merely human and at times even grotesque. Their features are distorted by loneliness and old age. At the end of their quest they have not reached NIRVANA but are caught in a lesser realm from which there is no escape.

On the positive side, lohans came to be honored as protectors of the Buddhist DHARMA, or teaching. Many holy persons have been regarded as living lohans in disguise. K.C.

LOINS. As an anatomical term referring to that section of an animal torso below the rib cage and above the hips, this word still enjoys current English usage and is employed in current Bible translations in this sense to render several Hebrew terms and one Greek term. In Leviticus 3:4-15; 4:9; 7:4, the fat attached to the kidneys at the loins of beasts is specified for use in burnt offerings. In Genesis 37:34, Jacob puts sackcloth on his loins in mourning for Joseph; a "girdle" or belt of leather (II Kings 1:8) could be fastened around the same part of the lower torso, and a soldier would keep his sword there (II Sam. 20:8). In preparation for a journey (II Kings 4:29; 9:1), a foot race (I Kings 18:46), or a meeting with God (Job 38:3; 40:7), one prepared by "girding up one's loins."

The loins could be girded metaphorically as well. In Proverbs 31:17, the good wife girds her loins with strength; in Isaiah 11:5 the coming messiah's loins are girded with faithfulness; and in Ephesians 6:14, the loins of the spiritually armored believer are girded with truth.

The proximity of the loins to the sexual organs extended some of the Hebrew terms to mean the source of progeny. Because this sense is archaic in modern English, the RSV usually declines to make the literal translation, but it is still employed to render the Greek term osphus in Hebrews 7:10.

W.S.T.

LOIS. The name, evidently uncommon in antiquity, of Timothy's grandmother who is commended for her sincere faith as an example to Timothy (II Tim. 1:5). Presumably, Lois was the mother of Eunice, Timothy's mother, and a Jew, since Acts 16:1 states that Timothy's mother was a Jewish believer. D.S.

LOISY, ALFRED (1857-1940). French Roman Catholic biblical scholar, excommunicated for modernist views. Born a commoner at Ambrières, educated at the Catholic seminary at Châlons-sur-Marne and the Institut Catholique in Paris, Loisy was ordained in 1879 and briefly served a country parish. Historical criticism of the Bible prompted him and others (Louis Duchesne, Maurice D'Hulst, George Tyrrell, Herman Schell, and Baron von Hügel) to advocate modernizing the church's traditional biblical views. In 1890 he became the controversial professor of Sacred Scripture at the Institut Catholique, a post he lost in 1893 when Pope Leo XIII condemned modernism in his Providentissimus Deus. Leo upheld biblical inerrancy, saying the Bible was dictated by the Holy Spirit. In 1903 Pius X, who succeeded Leo, placed two of Loisy's books on the Index. Loisy formally submitted to papal authority in 1904, but in 1907 Pius X's Lamentabili sane condemned sixty-five modernist propositions (fifty drawn from Loisy's writings) and Pascendi gregis condemned misguided reformers as instigators of schism. In 1908 following the publication of volume two of his Les Evangiles Synoptiques, Loisy was excommunicated. He later taught at the College de France (1909-30), but his writings lacked much of their reforming power. C.M.

LOLLARDS. Followers of JOHN WYCLIFFE, who helped prepare England for Lutheran Reformation ideas. Wycliffe, appealing directly to Scripture, advocated a theology of good stewardship and sharply criticized English prelates, the Avignon papacy, and the Great Schism's two popes. Using personal faith and Scripture as authorities, Wycliffe and his Lollards condemned transubstantiation, celibacy, exorcism, greed, clerical immortality, prayers for the dead, pilgrimages, relic veneration, auricular confession, indulgences, premature vows of continence, and religious endowments. Pope Gregory XI in 1377 condemned Wycliffe's writings, and in 1382 the Blackfriars London Council and Archbishop Courtenay condemned ten Wycliffe beliefs, causing Lollards to lose their academic base at Oxford even before the Council of Constance condemned Wycliffe's views in 1415. In 1401 Parliament's De Haeretico Comburendo authorized burning Lollards as heretics. Sir John Oldcastle in 1414 led a Lollard uprising and was hanged and burned three years later. Driven underground, but still preaching two by two from English biblical translations made by Wycliffe and Purvey, the Lollards suffered suppression and persecution, especially under Kings Henry V, VI, and VII, who wanted papal support for their dynastic claims. However, Lollardy remain potent and eventually merged with the English Reformation in the sixteenth century. C.M.

LONDON MISSIONARY SOCIETY. The LMS, founded in 1795 by evangelical churchmen from several denominations in England, was established to "spread the knowledge of Christ among the heathen and not to propagate Episcopacy, Presbyterianism, or Independency" or any particular form of church government about which the founders and their churches had serious differences of opinion. This fundamental principle was carried out and made it possible for the society to send many missionaries, among whom are a distinguished list of pioneers: Ellis and Williams in the Pacific; Moffat and Livingstone in Africa; Morrison in China; and Lawes and Chalmers in New Guinea. The main support for the LMS churches has come through the years from Congregational churches. In 1966 the society's constitution was revised and it became the Congregational Council for World Missions, the members of which are seven Congregational Unions of the British Isles and Commonwealth countries. W.G.

LOOSING. See BINDING AND LOOSING.

LORD. With roots in feudal class structure, this English title acknowledges the nobility and authority of the addressee. Several Hebrew, Aramaic, and Greek biblical terms are rendered by this single word.

Old Testament Usage. The term ba'al has the generic sense of "lord, master," and is used of secular nobility in Numbers 21:28 and Isaiah 16:8. However, it was also the personal name of the most important Canaanite deity, and because of this association this term was specifically rejected as a title for the God of Israel (Hos. 2:16).

The term 'adon, "Lord," while doubtless originating in the secular sphere (for example, Sarah calls her husband "lord" in Gen. 18:12; Aaron refers to his brother and superior Moses as "my lord," Num. 12:11), becomes the most important single title by which YAHWEH is addressed or described. Yahweh's throne is the "ark of the covenant of the Lord" (Josh. 3:11-13), the Lord's name is excellent in all the earth (Ps. 8:1, 9); indeed, the Lord can be called "God of gods and Lord of lords" (Deut. 10:17). In Psalm 110:1, God's lordship is juxtaposed with the human authority of the king in such a way as to suggest that the latter is derived solely from the former: "The Lord says to my lord: 'Sit at my right hand, till I make your enemies your footstool.'"

The process of exaltation of God by title and of precluding any untoward familiarity or misuse of the name of God (see Exod. 20:7) is visible in the use of the term 'adon, "Lord." When referring to God, the word is typically used in its plural form with a possessive pronoun attached, 'adonai ("[my] Lord[s]"). Though never rendered this way in English, this form of the title occurs in the dialogue between Abram and God in Genesis 15:2, 8; in the calls of Gideon (Judg. 6:15-22), and Jeremiah (Jer. 1:6); in the standard formula of Ezekiel; and countless times elsewhere in the Prophets and in the Psalter. The process of distancing the individual Israelite from the powerful name of God reaches yet a third stage when the title 'adonai altogether supplants Yahweh, the proper name of God. This development must have occurred after the biblical period itself, because the consonants YHWH continue to be used even in the latest OT writings. But the Masoretes routinely supplied these four consonants (the Tetragrammaton) with the vowels for 'ADONAI, indicating that the sacred name itself was never to be pronounced, and that the title "Lord" was to be read in every instance. The term "JEHOVAH" is the hybrid result of the consonants of Yahweh and the vowels of 'adonai; it is not and never was a Hebrew word or the name of God.

New Testament. The Septuagint routinely translated both the name Yahweh and the terms 'adon/adonai with the single term kyrios, "lord." Like the Hebrew term, this word had its use in secular communication among human beings: the slave owner was kyrios to the slave (Acts 16:16, 19), and Jesus taught that no one can serve two "masters" (Matt. 6:24; Luke 16:13). But the NT radicalized this term, which was, of course, the primary title for God in the Greek OT, by applying it as a title to Jesus of Nazareth. The most original Christian message contained in the church's first sermon is "God has made him both Lord and Christ" (Acts 2:36). Paul ceaselessly repeats the formula, "The Lord Jesus [Christ]," and asserts that no one can say, "Jesus is Lord," except by the Holy Spirit (I Cor. 12:3). For doubting Thomas, the essence of his newfound faith was summed up in the phrase, "My Lord and my God" (John 20:28).

An Aramaic term of address to a person of nobility, marā', which occurs in that sense in Daniel 4:19, 24 (and as a title of God in Dan. 2:47; 5:23), reappears as a title of the Christ who is to come in the prayer "maranatha" ("Our Lord, come!") in I Corinthians 16:22 (compare Rev. 22:20). W.S.T.

LORD OF HOSTS. The title, "Lord of Sabaoth" (KJV) used for God in Romans 9:29 and James 5:4 accurately reflects the Greek transliteration of the OT epithet for God, Yahweh sebbā'oth, "Lord of [angelic] hosts." The title is not used in the Pentateuch but is favored by the Prophets—Malachi uses it twenty-three times in four chapters! Although Israel itself can be described as "the hosts of the Lord" in Exodus 12:41, the more normative sense is that preserved in the account of Joshua's confrontation with the angelic "commander of the army [host] of the Lord" on the eve of God's great victory over Jericho (Josh. 5:13-15). Like a king of flesh and blood, the king of heaven had an army, too! The heavenly host created by God in the beginning (Gen. 2:1) is not that army. The sun and moon and stars were not divine beings, and certainly were not to be worshipped in their own right (Deut. 4:19; 17:3; II Kings 23:4-5). No, the hosts were the myriads of heavenly beings who served God in the divine court (Dan. 7:10), and who accompanied God in battle and at the great event in Bethlehem (Luke 2:13). W.S.T.

LORD'S DAY. Sunday, the first day of the week, upon which Jesus Christ rose from the dead. It is the special day of Christian worship from NT times to the present, sanctified by the Resurrection. The early church gathered to proclaim the announcement of Christ's coming to deliver humanity from sin, to celebrate the Lord's Supper, and to make offerings. Every Lord's Day is a celebration of the first EASTER, of the Resurrection, although once a year there is also the celebration of the "Great Easter," fixed as closely to the date of the original Easter as the peculiarities of the lunar calendar allow.

The Lord's Day is one of victory and joy. Even during Lent, Sundays are referred to as "in" not "of" Lent. The suspension of the celebration of the victory of Christ over death is not allowed even for Lent. For this reason, the early Christians did not fast or kneel when praying on SUNDAY. The connection of Sunday and the Resurrection is demonstrated in the early liturgies of Ireland, Gaul, and Spain.

The Lord's Day is explicitly mentioned only in Revelation 1:10, where John the Prophet is caught up in a vision on the Lord's Day. There is much evidence in the NT that, taken together, shows the early church observed Sunday as its official day of worship. Since there is dispute over the "proper" day of Christian worship, we summarize this evidence here:

All the Gospels stress that the Resurrection took place on the first day of the week. Luke connects the breaking of bread with the Resurrection day in 24:13-35. In Acts 20:7 (often said to be by Luke), the breaking of bread is connected with the first day of the week. This is further buttressed by Acts 2:42 and I Corinthians 10:16. Paul (I Cor. 16:2) shows that alms for the poor are to be collected at the Corinthians' church services on the first day of the week. The writings of the early church fathers confirm that the Sabbath was almost immediately replaced by Sunday as the Christian day of worship. J.C.

LORD'S PRAYER. The prayer of Jesus known among English-speaking Christians as the Lord's Prayer is found in the Gospels in two different versions: Luke 11:2-4 and Matthew 6:9-13. Both have probably derived it from a body of Jesus tradition that Matthew and Luke used, in addition to Mark, and which seems to have contained mostly sayings of Jesus rather than narratives about him. In general, this Q source, as it is called by scholars, is more faithfully preserved in Luke than in Matthew, who tends to expand the tradition. This observation applies to their respective versions of the Lord's Prayer as well.

In Luke the prayer begins with a direct address to God as "Father." That sense of intimacy (which is also reflected in Paul's use of the affectionate term, Abba, in Rom. 8:15 and Gal. 4:6) is further evident in Mark 14:36, where Jesus uses this endearing term for God (equal to the Aramaic equivalent of Papa, or Daddy) at the hour of his seizure by the authorities on the eve of the Crucifixion. Jewish piety would have used "my Father" or "our Father," as Matthew does (6:9). The strong likelihood, however, is that Jesus used this term of immediacy of relationship to God, which would have offended his Jewish contemporaries. Throughout his teaching in all the Gospel tradition, "Father" is Jesus' favorite designation for and address to God.

To hallow God's name means to ascribe to God the honor that is appropriate to God's very nature. In Semitic culture, the name is the essence of power as well as the basis for personal identity, so that to honor God's name is to attribute to God the majesty, power, and saving purpose, which are the essence of the divine being. Linked with this, therefore, is the prayer that God's rule will become effective in the world. As Creator, it is God's design that all the created order should be obedient to the divine will. Jesus' hope for and dedication to that goal is focused in his announcement that the kingdom of God is about to be established, and that its powers are already evident in the present through his defeat of the evil powers, his pronouncement of divine forgiveness, and his founding of the obedient covenant community.

Before that promise is fulfilled, however, the community must survive, and he instructs his followers to pray for "bread"—the basic item of survival. The word used to define this bread, epiousion, may have several meanings: (1) what is necessary for existence; (2) day-by-day necessity; (3) for the day following—that is, enough to make it until tomorrow; (4) future—that is, the bread or food that will be eaten when the new age comes. The Dead Sea community had a ceremony in which the sharing of bread and wine was an anticipation of the day when the kingly and priestly messiahs would be in the midst of the community, and there would be elements of this future reference of the Communion in the Eucharistic tradition of the Gospels (Mark 14:25; Luke 22:30).

The petition for forgiveness of sins is a challenge to God to be as forgiving of the sins committed by people as they are to forgive those who are indebted to them. The word usually translated as "debts" refers to unfulfilled obligations, or what are sometimes described as "sins of omission," rather than financial debts. The final prayer to be spared being led into temptation or testing may refer to God's protective care in general terms, or it may be pointing to the final ordeal, which would try the fidelity of the people of God in the last days before the New Age came. In that view of the future, Matthew's addition (6:13), the deliverance from "evil" may refer to the last violent effort of Satan and the evil powers before God triumphs and the hosts of evil are defeated. The prayer would then ask for special divine protection in this future time of testing.

In Matthew's version of the prayer there are liturgical expansions throughout. It is Our Father who is addressed, and God is identified as a resident "in heaven." The coming of the kingdom is explained as accomplishing the fulfillment of God's will on earth, just as it is already effective in heaven. The result of this change is to generalize the petition, so that the emphasis on the future coming of God's rule is replaced by the petition for an on-going actualization of God's rule. Reference to sins is replaced by the double use of "obligation," with a slight shift in meaning: instead of God's being asked to match human forgiveness (as in Luke), there is the simple statement that there is a match between human and divine forgiveness (Matt. 6:12).

Although in Matthew's version of the prayer, the best ancient manuscripts conclude with the prayer for deliverance from (the) evil (one), it is clear that as early as about A.D. 100, a liturgical conclusion was added, beginning with the words, "For thine is the kingdom. . . ." Probably these lines are adapted from the conclusion of a prayer attributed to David in I Chronicles 29:11, reportedly uttered on the occasion when he announced that Solomon would build the Temple in Jerusalem. Since these lines were not appended to the Greek manuscripts of Matthew used by Jerome when he made the standard Latin translation of the Bible (known as the Vulgate), they did not find their way into Roman Catholic tradition. Later Greek manuscripts did include them, however, and so they found their way into Protestant translations based on the Greek, as in the King James Version. H. K.

LORD'S SUPPER/LORD'S TABLE. The celebration of Jesus' last meal with his disciples before his betrayal, arrest, trial, and death on the cross. Early evolved from an actual meal (called "the Agape" or "Love Feast") into a symbolic meal (by the time of the Didache or Teaching of the Twelve Apostles), the LAST SUPPER, called the Lord's Supper or Eucharist ("the Thanksgiving") or Holy Communion (COMMUNION with God through Christ and with fellow Christians), from the beginning became the central act of Christian worship. In the Roman Catholic tradition, the celebration is called the MASS, from the final words spoken by the priest, "ite missa est," "go, it is finished." Since the sixteenth century, Protestants have differed from Catholics and often from one another in their understanding of the Lord's Supper.

In contemporary theological and churchly circles, the Lord's Supper has become more and more prominent for three interrelated reasons: the liturgical movement, the advances of biblical research, and the theological maturity of the ecumenical movement in its several manifestations.

Theological Developments—New Testament. In the NT there are four reports of the institution of the Lord's Supper (I Cor. 11:23-26; Mark 14:17-26; Luke 22:14-23; Matt. 26:20-30). Additionally, the presence of the risen Christ is connected with breaking bread (meals) in Mark 16:14; Luke 24:35, 42; John 2:12-13; and Acts 10:41. There is a split witness as to the original significance of the meal in which the Lord's Supper was instituted. The Synoptic Gospels present it as a PASSOVER seder (especially the longer text in Luke 22), while John declares it to be held on the night before Passover. In all events, the texts stress the presence of Christ with the followers who continue to observe this meal; the sacrifice of Christ for human sin; the participation of the believer in the forgiveness so accomplished; the memorial aspect of the meal and the proclamation of Jesus' death to the world, until such time as Jesus returns and gathers believers together for an eschatological meal in the kingdom of God. Overall, it is clear that Christian celebration of this meal testifies to faith in Christ and to thanksgiving for what Christ has done.

Ancient Church. Several kinds of sacred meals were celebrated in the early church, including full meals or agapes. Gradually, the meal was reduced to bread and wine, taken at the conclusion of worship services, probably every morning. The connection to the Jewish Passover and to looking for the soon coming of the kingdom of God was also developed.

Middle Ages. During the Middle Ages, by the thirteenth century, an increasing realism in theology resulted in the concept of TRANSUBSTANTIATION. Based on Aristotelian categories, this doctrine held that the bread and wine became the actual Body and Blood of Christ, except for the surface appearance (or "accidents"). Also, the ancient idea of sacrifice was stressed, seeing the priest's consecration of the elements as an actual reenacting of Christ's sacrifice on the cross—an offering of God to God.

Reformation. The Reformers reacted against the idea of sacrifice and the concept of transubstantiation in various ways. Luther, Zwingli, and Calvin all rejected—in different terms—transubstantiation and the belief that the Eucharist is a sacrifice. Basically, Zwingli saw the Eucharist as simply a memorial of the death of Christ and a testimony before people of the faith of the Christian who participates. It is thus not a sacrament or means of grace. Luther rejected sacrifice but saw the meal as a SACRAMENT. In it the believer actually receives Christ, and therefore the forgiveness of sins. While denying transubstantiation Luther held to the REAL PRESENCE of Christ in the bread and wine—a mystery of faith that likens Christ's presence in the elements to the presence of fire in red hot iron (see CONSUBSTANTIATION). Calvin later tended more to the sacramental ideas of Luther but attempted to phrase his ideas of "spiritual presence" in terms agreeable to the remaining influence of Zwingli's thought on the Reformed church. There were many disputes between the Lutherans and the Reformed churches over the Eucharist, beginning with Luther's and Zwingli's confrontation at Marburg in 1529.

From the Sixteenth Century to Today. The Reformation was followed by a period of rigid orthodoxy in both Catholic and Protestant churches. Numerous disputes between churches took place. A period of rationalism and pietism caused the loss of traditional ritual and a sentimental interpretation of Christian doctrine in Lutheran and Reformed churches. While the Catholic church stressed sacrifice and transubstantiation, the meaning of the Lord's Supper—and its frequent practice—was lost in Protestantism. The rise of the liturgical movement, in Catholicism, Anglicanism, and Lutheranism, stimulated by new developments in biblical research, slowly reversed this trend. Increasingly, the results of this renaissance informed all communions, so that the Eucharist is more frequently observed today than it has been for centuries in Protestantism. Many Protestant communions have agreed on common statements on the meaning of the Lord's Supper and there is an increasing tendency among Catholic theologians to speak of transfiguration instead of transubstantiation. The recent declaration that Anglicans may commune at Lutheran altars and vice versa (New Orleans Episcopal Convention and Louisville American Lutheran Church and Lutheran Church in America Conventions, 1982) symbolizes the growing unity of Christians on the Lord's Supper.

Since the early decisions of Vatican Council II, the traditional Latin Mass has been translated into the vernacular languages of countries around the world. The Mass in English is very similar in structure, content, and even wording to the Eucharistic liturgy of the Episcopal and Anglican communions and to the Holy Communion service of the American Lutheran churches. The free churches have also enriched their Eucharistic liturgies and moved toward more frequent communion than the standard Lenten observance of four-times-a-year usage, which was widespread several decades ago.

Of particular interest in contemporary eucharistic celebration is the presence of "lay ministers," or lay men and women, who assist the priest by distributing the wine at Catholic masses in many parishes. The old controversy over giving the laity only the bread and reserving the cup to the priest alone is completely over. Along the same line, the very recent view by some free church Protestants that only grape juice should be used at Communion instead of wine, seems to be correcting itself. This view, which has no historical basis (grape juice is a modern product; the Jews drank wine in the first century), arose during the prohibition era, when abstinence from alcohol assumed the proportions of an article of faith for some Protestants. Fortunately, the growing influence of the liturgical revival, the publicized results of scientific biblical studies, and the growing ecumenical closeness of the Protestant denominations to one another and to the Roman Catholic church, have given most Christians today a better historical and theological grasp of the meaning and practice of the Lord's Supper. J.C.

LOT. A son of Haran and nephew of ABRAHAM, with whom he migrated from the Sumerian city of Ur to Haran in upper Mesopotamia and then to Canaan. Lot's story in Genesis 11:27–14:16 and 19:1–38 associates him with the magnanimous Abraham, the perverse citizens of Sodom, and his two nameless daughters.

Lot and Abraham. Lot accompanied Abraham as he initially entered Canaan (Gen. 12:5) and made camp at Shechem. According to Genesis 13:1, Lot joined Abraham and Sarah in their journey to Egypt (Gen. 12:10–20). Later they settled in Benjaminite hill country, but its pastures proved inadequate for their increased livestock (13:6–7). When Abraham offered Lot the fertile Jordan basin, Lot accepted without qualm. Then Lot settled in Sodom (13:12). Subsequently, Lot was captured by an alliance of four eastern kings, headed by Chedorlaomer, who subdued five rebellious Canaanite kings from the Sodom-Gomorrah vicinity (14:12). But Abraham with 318 retainers pursued the alliance and rescued Lot (14:16).

Lot, Sodom, and his daughters. In Genesis 19 Lot is visited by two angels who announce Sodom's imminent destruction and urge his family to flee. Lot and his daughters reach the city of Zoar. For having glanced back toward their lost property, Lot's wife is changed to a pillar of salt (conspicuous salt masses in the region account for this legend). Genesis 19 concludes with an ethnic etymology explaining in unflattering terms the origins of the Moabites and Ammonites. Now dwelling in the Moab plateau (v. 30), Lot's daughters orchestrate incestuous relations with their father, leading to the births of Moab and Ben-Ammi. J.K.K.

LOTS, CASTING OF. A method of DIVINATION of appeal to God (or the gods) used to decide matters or choose someone for a job or position. In the time of both the OT and the NT, the casting of lots (that is, drawing out a ball or pottery shard or slip of paper placed in a container) enjoyed wide respect as a means of learning God's will. Apparently, the Jews never considered casting lots as magical, so it escaped the condemnation of the occult made so forcefully in Deuteronomy 18:10–12. According to the Wisdom writer (in Prov. 16:33), "the lot is cast into the lap, but the decision is wholly from the Lord." Lots were resorted to in many important religious matters. The early disciples used them to elect a replacement for Judas (Acts 1:23-26), and the high priests seemed to have consulted God's will by way of lots with some regularity. The high priest drew the lots (probably smooth stones, perhaps of different colors or marked with symbols) out of his ephod or priestly apron. Such an event was done in the context of prayer, with the decision left to God's will. Thus, lots were cast "before the Lord."

J.C.

LOTUS POSTURE. In HINDUISM and BUDDHISM, the padmasana, as it is called in Sanskrit, is the most popular pose for meditation. The back is straight, and the knees are bent with the feet placed on the thigh of the opposite leg. The Buddha and the Hindu god Shiva are often portrayed in this posture. R.E.

LOTUS SUTRA. A major scripture of MAHAYANA BUDDHISM. The oldest of the twenty-seven chapters of this work were probably composed in Sanskrit in the first century of the Christian Era; a version of it was translated into Chinese as early as the third century. The book has been immensely influential in China and Japan, where it was the textual basis for important Buddhist movements.

The Saddharma-Pundarika Sutra, to give it its Sanskrit title, stakes out the spiritual terrain of Mahayana Buddhism in visions of awesome cosmic grandeur combined with vivid parables reminiscent of the NT. It presents itself as the teaching of the Buddha in his ultimate nature as the infinite, eternal being of the universe itself, a reality beyond all words and concepts, from out of which he calls into visibility innumerable worlds, each with its own Buddha. His grace falls like rain on all beings in all realms. But out of compassion for human finitude he comes over and over again in conditioned form, as in the historical Buddha, to teach and, as an example, to appear to become enlightened and enter NIRVANA.

Thus the Theravada teaching that one can seek no higher goal than becoming an arhat, or the idea of becoming a pratyeka-buddha ("private buddha," one who becomes a Buddha for one's own sake without regard for others), are shown to be only accommodations for the benefit of those not ready for the fullness of truth. In reality there is but one path, that to Buddhahood; all beings are potentially Buddhas. The theory of accommodation is presented in a parable of a father who, coming home to the house containing his children and seeing it on fire, calls out that he has toy carts for them to play with; rushing delightedly from the house they are saved from the flames. Once out, we can realize our eternal Buddha nature; it is like a jewel sewn into the coat of a desperate man unaware of it. This enlightenment does not depend on following an ascetic path but is simply letting go of egocentricity by whatever means avail. Justifying the growing practice of devotionalism in Mahayana, the Sutra tells that a child presenting a handful of flowers to a Buddha-image may be closer to enlightenment than a proud supposed arhat or pratyeka-buddha.

In China and Japan the Lotus Sutra was the cornerstone of the highly influential T'ien-T'ai (Japanese: Tendai) school, which viewed it as the supreme expression of Buddhist doctrine, all other sutras being more or less partial accommodations. In medieval Japan, NICHIREN preached that the Lotus is the sole scripture for the present age, founding a denomination based on it alone, in which chanting Nam Myoho Renge Kyo, "Hail the Marvelous Teaching of the Lotus Sutra," is a central practice. The important SOKA GAKKAI movement, which grew rapidly in mid-twentieth-century Japan, is a product of Nichirenism that demonstrates that the Lotus Sutra retains its vitality as a religious force. R.E.

LOURDES. A town in southwest France, where, in 1858, the BLESSED VIRGIN MARY is said to have appeared to Bernadette Soubirous. Located in the foothills of the Pyrenees Mountains, Lourdes was unknown to the world before the fourteen-year-old Bernadette reported that the Virgin appeared to her eighteen times between February 11 and July 6, 1858. Since that time Lourdes has grown into one of the largest shrines to Mary on earth. Bernadette visited the grotto of Massabulle with a crowd of twenty thousand on March 4, 1858. However, only Bernadette received the visions. On March 25, Bernadette reported that the Virgin declared "I am the Immaculate Conception"—a dogma proclaimed only by Pope Pius IX in 1854. The last appearance was on the Feast of Our Lady of Mount Carmel. Today two million pilgrims visit Lourdes. There have been five thousand healings, of which eight are declared miraculous. Bernadette was canonized by Pope Pius XI in 1933; her feast day is February 18 in France and April 16 (the day she died) elsewhere. J.C.

LOVE. In the Christian understanding of God's nature, love ranks as the superlative quality. This fact is seen not only in that the only formal definition of who God is has love as its content (I John 4:8, 16), but also that in Jesus Christ, Christians have always recognized the sign of the divine regard for our human race (John 3:16; Rom. 5:8). To that extent love takes on a unique quality since it draws its meaning from the Christian claim that God's action in Christ—supremely his cross and resurrection—is one of a kind (I John 4:9-10). Yet this statement does not imply that the character of God as love is without precedent. The evidence of the OT prepares the ground for the coming of Christ, even if his life and teaching imparted a new meaning to the term, and his death and victory crowned the revelation. But it remains true that the NT terminology (especially AGAPE, "love") marks out love as in a class by itself. Other terms are found, to be sure, but their meanings stand on a lower level than agapē. Thus PHILIA, while used only once in the NT (James 4:4), expresses a social relationship based on affection and affinity uniting friends or family. The Greek storgē has a similar sense in Romans 12:10, but the two remaining instances of NT use are negative (Rom. 1:31; II Tim. 3:3). Eros, implying sexual attraction, is remarkably absent from biblical literature; even in the Song of Solomon and Hosea, where the term erōs for sexual passion may well have been expected, the term is not found, and the Greek translators have used agapaō as a verb meaning "to love." It is also remarkable that the noun agapē is almost entirely missing from pre-biblical Greek. So we conclude that the verb agapaō takes pride of place as the outstanding word used by Christians to express all that they meant and had experienced by fellowship with a God whose name and nature are best described by love.

Love in the Old Testament. The OT verb equivalent agapaō, "to love," is used by the Greek Bible to translate the Hebrew ahēb, with its noun ahābāh. In English these terms are uniformly expressed as love. Some other words are important, however. We should note the Hebrew rāham, "to have pity" or "compassion" (Exod. 33:19, there are thirty-four occurrences in all), and hesed, "loving-kindness, mercy," which is often linked with the verb. Hesed is such an important OT word—it is found 245 times there—that we should note its wide range of meaning and translation (RSV gives "steadfast love" in 178 places, but NEB has 33 different ways of rendering hesed, using 85 times the noun "love" and adjectives such as "true," "unfailing," "constant," "faithful"). The last named, "faithful love," is the most suggestive, since researchers show how basic to hesed is God's choice of Israel in love and God's resolve to maintain a covenant relationship with God's people (Lam. 3:22, 31ff.). The Jewish people, on their side, are called to pledge "loyalty" (hesed) to their God, Yahweh (Exod. 19:4-6; 24:1-8; Hos. 4:1; 6:6; 10:12; 12:6).

The verb rāsāb, "to be pleased with," "to accept with favor," should also be included here, since God's choice of Israel in love is linked with the thought of God's acceptance of the nation as the divinely chosen people. The noun rāson means "good-will" and is significant as a background to the NT teaching of Jesus as the Father's Son whom God loves (Mark 1:11; Col. 1:13; Eph. 1:6) and the church as God's new Israel (I Pet. 2:1-10).

OT writers invariably trace back God's concern for Israel to the Exodus from Egypt (see Deut. 26:5-9, an Israelite creed, confessing its faith in all that Yahweh did in calling the nation into existence. See also Amos 3:2; 7:15). Interestingly, there is no reference to God's love in this connection in the Exodus narrative, but Deuteronomy (notably at 7:6-11) makes the point: God chose you because God loved you. And there was no attraction in Israel to cause God's love to flow. God loved Israel because God would love this people. The prophet Hosea picks up this same theme, mirrored in his own experience with Gomer, an unfaithful wife whom he rescued from shame and restored to dignity and honor (Hos. 3:1-5). The lesson of Gomer is applied to Israel's case, and the argument for Israel's return from apostasy is based on God's unchanging hesed, which calls for a corresponding love on the nation's part.

After Hosea, the celebration of divine love for Israel as a husband for life is repeated (Jer. 2:2, 32ff.; 3:1, 14; 31:32; Ezek. 16:8; 23:1-49; Isa. 50:1-3; 54:5; 62:4). In all this corpus of teaching we can detect certain salient motifs: (a) God's love is an expression of the divine self-giving nature (Hos. 11:8, 9; Jer. 31:20; Isa. 63:15); (b) God's calling of Israel is one of free choice when there was no merit or goodness on Israel's part to warrant it (the book of Deuteronomy echoes this sentiment repeatedly, as it links divine love with God's election); (c) yet the action of God lays a claim on Israel, as divine love evokes a response of gratitude and obedience—both expressed by the nation's hesed and central to Deuteronomy, for example, 5:10; 26:18—and such love is expressed in a moral union between Yahweh and Israel. Unlike the Canaanite baals (see Hosea), Yahweh was a moral agent who could and would judge and punish Israel as an expression of love (Amos 3:2). Yahweh's love is unwearying (Isa. 7:13) and never gives Israel up. But it will chastise and correct the nation in the bitter experiences of exile and dispersion until Israel regains her sense of destiny as God's "light to the nations" (Isa. 49:6). (d) There is not much said in the OT about God's love for either individuals (one such exceptional reference is the case of Solomon whom "the Lord loved," II Sam. 12:24; in the Psalms the speaker who is loved by God, for example, Ps. 91:14, may well represent the nation or the remnant within the larger group) or for all nations (the books of Ruth and Jonah are universalistic in their teaching, and God's love for the Moabite woman or the Ninevites may be inferred but it is not explicitly stated). This limitation is typical of OT religion, which in the postexilic period became increasingly moralistic and exclusivist. "Love your neighbor" in Leviticus 19:18 relates to one's fellow Jew. Divine love in the covenant became a ground on which Israel forgot that the nation had no claim on God. God's gift of his law (Torah) was understood—at least by some sections of Judaism—as a mark of God's favor to be boasted in and to be kept exclusively for Israel as though the nation were bounded by a fence. The NT shows how with the coming of Jesus as the world's Savior such boundaries were broken (Eph. 2:11-22), and God's love became truly worldwide (John 3:16; I John 4:14).

Love in the New Testament. The chief features that distinguish the NT picture of love from that of the OT are three in number. First, a religious outlook that is essentially incarnational is drawn to express love in terms of God's presence in Jesus Christ, the beloved Son and the image of God's person (Col. 1:13-15; Heb. 1:1-3; II Cor. 4:4-6). The NT writings resonate with this theme in several ways, sometimes polemically, as when the love of God in Christ is seen to offset the Jewish claim that the fullness of God's gift is in the law of Moses (John 1:17; Gal. 3:2-4:7), or as when Paul and John and their disciples oppose Gnostic limitation of love to a group of elite believers. Then a truly universalist tendency making God's love freely and widely known and available to all people is clear (II Cor. 5:14-6:2; I John 4:1-16). Second, it is in the NT that God's truest nature is expressed simply in terms of love in such a way that love reveals the divine being without remainder (I John 4:8, 16). That statement, "God is love," implies, as C. E. B. Cranfield observes, that the equation is true independently of our being able to be loved. Yahweh's love in the OT is bound up with Israel as the chosen people. God's love in the NT is shown similarly in what has been done for the church, but such love existed prior to, and apart from, the expression of God's love to humanity. God is eternally love, with the object of that love being Christ (John 17:5, 24); or more properly, God's nature is love from all eternity, and even if there were no object, God would be self-existing love. This metaphysical statement is perhaps one of the most philosophical in the NT and marks a clear advance on the highest OT teaching.

Third, it is a corollary of what was said above that God's love will be all-embracing and is in no way confined to a favored nation or chosen people. The church, to be sure, inherited the promises made to ancient Israel (see Gal. 3:26-29; 6:16; I Cor. 10:32), but it is set apart as a supra-nationalistic, multi-ethnic society, since God's redeeming action embraces all races (Rev. 5:9) and its borders are as wide as the world itself (I John 2:2). At the heart of this assertion is the conviction that the love of God is a universal reality, not bounded by national or tribal religion or limited to cultic observance (this argument for universality and finality of God's self-revelation in the Messiah of Israel, who is universal Lord, runs through the Epistle to the Hebrews).

So long as these three caveats are borne in mind, much of the OT teaching is reproduced in the NT writers. God's love is seen in the choice of people, though it is found in the mission of Jesus who came to restore them to God. So God's love and Christ's love merge (Eph. 5:25).

In the Gospels, Jesus embodies the divine initiative in seeking a wayward people. Modern NT study has isolated this feature as one of the obviously unique elements in Jesus' ministry: he actively reached out to those whom official Judaism rejected, in particular, the tax collectors and "sinners" (Luke 15:1-2, and the three parables of Luke 15; 19:1-10). The tribute of Luke 7:34 is typical. Moreover, Jesus' distinctive name for God as Father (Abba) is on the same order, since the Father shows no discriminating regard for all his creatures (Matt. 5:45). In so acting and teaching, Jesus was claiming to be making known the true nature of God and bringing Jewish exclusiveness to an end, a point that Paul was later to theologize as "Christ is the end of the law, for every one who has faith may be justified" (Rom. 10:4).

The cross is the historical focus of God's loving nature (Rom. 5:8). The chief NT writers see the death of Christ as revelatory of divine love, however they interpret the effect of that event and no matter what diverse categories (sacrificial, cultic, legal, dramatic, personal) they use to explain what the cross achieved. Nor is the personal element missing (Gal. 2:20) alongside the cosmic reality that, according to Paul especially, Christ's death brought an end to the regime of malevolent spirit-forces (demons) that held in bondage the first-century world (I Cor. 2:8; 15:24; Col. 2:8, 15, 20; Heb. 2:14, 15; Rev. 1:18).

The proclamation of a new age that came with Christ's advent is linked with the announcement that God's love is manifested in setting prisoners free (Luke 4:18-19) and delivering men and women from servitude to evil. The goal is the restoration of humanity to God's family in freedom (Gal. 4:1-7), with the image of God renewed (II Cor. 3:17-18). But that image is nothing less than Christ himself (Col. 1:15), so we are drawn back to the relationship between God and Jesus—one of filial love—as the prototype of the union into which believers are invited and expected to enter as their share in the new age (Rom. 8:14-23), along with the promise of new creation. The fact is set out in the phrase that we may "be conformed to the image of his Son" (Rom. 8:29), as Christ is himself the image of the Father, who has loved him from all eternity.

Human response to God's offer is strangely, for NT writers, not expressed in a reciprocating love. To be sure, the twin OT commandments to "love God/love one's neighbor" (Deut. 6:4 ff.; Lev. 19:18) are taken up in Mark 12:29 ff., and echoed in Paul (Rom. 13:9-10). So love becomes the ethical norm of Christian behavior, and I Corinthians 13—the hymn to love—has always been regarded as the high peak of the Christian's calling. Paul placed great emphasis on agapē as the spirit that should motivate believers in their personal and social relations (Gal. 5:14). The fruits of the Spirit are, for him, the essential qualities of Christian living, and love stands at the head of the list (Gal. 5:22). The Holy Spirit's gift is indeed agapē (Rom. 5:5), reminding us that this love is no native virtue or ethical ideal to be achieved in our own strength.

Yet it remains the case that the believer's response to God's love is more adequately called "faith," and the exhortation to "love God" is found only peripherally in Paul (Rom. 8:28; I Cor. 2:9; 8:3). Perhaps this is intentional. If so, it highlights the uniqueness of agapē as a divine quality and God's gracious gift to be received; for such a response "faith" would be the normal term. Or maybe Paul did not draw a hard-and-fast line between love and faith, as we can see from Galatians 5:6.

Love is to be the badge of all Christians in the Johannine community (John 13:35), and it is the mark that they belong to God (I John 4:7), having passed from life to death (I John 3:14). Such love is more than lip service; it is essentially practical and sacrificial (I John 3:17 ff.; James 1:27; 2:14-26). The call is "Love one another, as I have loved you"; and that may be said to be the hallmark of biblical teaching on love. R.M.

LOVE FEAST. Meals shared by the early apostles and disciples with one another, beginning in the Upper Room immediately after the Resurrection. These common meals became known as agape, from the Greek term for love preferred by Paul and other early Christians, and so are designated "love feasts." The agape either preceded or included the more sacred and formal celebration of the LORD'S SUPPER, as is clear from Paul's discussion of certain excesses of the agape in connection with Holy Communion (I Cor. 11). Love feasts are also mentioned in Jude 12 and II Peter 2:13 (marg.), where the authors also stress the warnings of Paul that agapes must be shared in sobriety and with unselfishness and a lack of social and class distinctions. It is likely that the practice of these congregational meals died out because of the actions of the wealthier members who egotistically displayed their wine and luxurious foods before the poorer members of the church. Paul strongly attacked this in I Corinthians 11, and James also denounced the humiliation of the poor by church people who were overly impressed by rich men.

The practice of sacred meals, or meals taken in the temple in the presence of a god, was common in both Judaism and the pagan cults that flourished in the Mediterranean area in the first century. The PASSOVER meal was a full meal and not just a symbolic one like the bread and wine of the Lord's Supper. Pagan worshipers dined together in their temples and ate meat that had been sacrificed to their idols. It was natural that Christianity incorporate congregational meals in its practices. However, the high moral demands of Christianity seemed to be more than recently converted pagans could live up to. Paul made it clear that the church was no place to display one's social status (I Cor. 11). J.C.

LOW CHURCH. A term originating among pietistic members of the Church of England who objected to churchly ritual and denied that bishops were essential to the nature of the church and so rejected apostolic succession. The Low Church party held strictly to a literal interpretation of the THIRTY-NINE ARTICLES of religion. This party continued within the Anglican communion but more and more people migrated to non-conforming congregations, that is, toward Presbyterian, Congregational (Independent), and Baptist churches. Their "meetinghouses" were usually called "chapels," in distinction from the Anglican cathedrals or churches. Low Church services, which are characteristic of many fellowships in Great Britain, Canada, and the United States, as well as across the modern world, generally emphasize preaching more than Holy Communion. These "low" or less formal services are the mark of free-church Protestantism (See FREE CHURCHES). The priesthood of all believers, a less sacramental worship, and congregational singing are elements of this form of worship. J.C.

LOWELL, JAMES RUSSELL (1819-91). American poet, essayist, and diplomat. A product of New England's golden age, Lowell was a contemporary of Longfellow, Emerson, and Holmes. Born on February 22 at Cambridge, Massachusetts, Lowell was graduated from both Harvard College and Harvard Law School before starting his career as poet and editor. He succeeded Longfellow as professor of modern languages at Harvard. He also became editor of Atlantic Monthly and later of the North American Review. He served as United States minister to Spain from 1877 to 1880. Like other American poets such as Longfellow and Whittier, Lowell turned his hand to writing hymns. These were contained in A Book of Hymns for Public and Private Devotion, edited by Longfellow's brother Samuel and Samuel Johnson while they were students at Harvard Divinity School. This work became a landmark in Unitarian hymnody. One of Lowell's best-known hymns, written in 1845, is "Once to Every Man and Nation." The hymnbook in which it first appeared gave new prominence to the humanitarian aspect of religion. R.H.

LOWER CRITICISM. See BIBLICAL CRITICISM.

LOW MASS. A simple form of celebrating Holy Communion in the Roman Catholic Church. MASS was offered only to a congregation in the early church, but with the requirement that a priest offer mass every day, it became necessary for some priests to say mass for a few people or by themselves. J.C.

LOWRY, ROBERT (1826-99). Baptist minister and gospel hymn writer and composer. Lowry was born in Plainfield (N.J.), joined a Baptist church at an early age, and soon became an active Christian worker, serving in the Sunday school and in the choir. At age twenty-one he decided to enter the ministry and subsequently obtained bachelor of arts (1854) and master's degrees (1857) at Bucknell University. He then served pastorates in West Chester (Pa.), New York City and Brooklyn (N.Y.), and Lewisburg (Pa.). During the Lewisburg pastorate he was professor of belles-lettres at Bucknell. His last pastorate was at Plainfield. He traveled extensively from 1880 to 1885 in Europe, Mexico, and the southwestern United States. Upon the death of William Bradbury, Lowry became the music editor of Bigelow and Main publishing company, where he produced a series of songbooks. He wrote both words and music for "Shall We Gather at the River?" and the tunes for "I Need Thee Every Hour," "One More Day's Work for Jesus," "Savior, Thy Dying Love," and "Five Were Foolish." R.H.

LOYOLA, IGNATIUS DE. See IGNATIUS LOYOLA.

LSD. Lysergic acid diethylamide, a hallucinogenic drug derived from ergot alkaloids that, when ingested, produces psychological states similar to the functional psychoses such as schizophrenia and mania. It was discovered in 1938 by Dr. Albert Hofmann in Basel, Switzerland.

Of course, various psychologists differ on the evaluation of the "high" or drug-induced state produced by LSD (or "acid," as it is commonly called). Some see these states (or "trips," as they are popularly referred to) as being of a different order than schizophrenic trances, while others see the drug as mimicking stages of insanity. Among those who see LSD as non-pathological are Dr. Timothy Leary, who declared "acid trips" are a religious experience in which one "sees God." He was dismissed from Harvard University and eventually imprisoned for his evangelistic use and spread of LSD to others. The Reverend Walter Clark has advocated controlled research on LSD. J.C.

LUCIFER. See SATAN.

LUKE, EVANGELIST. Our knowledge of this NT person is limited to what Paul says of him and what we may learn by inference from the two sets of writing (the GOSPEL OF LUKE, the ACTS OF THE APOSTLES) traditionally ascribed to him. The prologue (Luke 1:1-4) is written in the first person, and the opening verse of Acts refers to the "first treatise," presumably the Gospel, thus binding the two books together in a common authorship.

Luke's part in Paul's Apostolic career is seen in Colossians 4:10-14 (compare Philem. 24). From this evidence we may conclude that Luke shared Paul's imprisonment (perhaps the same as in II Tim. 4:10-11, where his name reappears), and that he was a physician. The idea he attended to Paul's medical needs is fanciful, even if it is proposed by E. Lohmeyer. His role as a doctor became part of church tradition. The anti-Marcionite prologue to Luke's Gospel (about A.D. 170) calls him "a physician by profession" and places his native city in Antioch. The medical language that some scholars have found in his writings is hardly a confirmation of this fact, as it can be paralleled with the writing of other non-medical authors in his day.

It is also doubtful if we should conclude from these verses that he was a Gentile Christian, as is popularly thought mainly on the basis of the way Paul separates him (in Col. 4:14) from Jewish Christians referred to in earlier verses. There is considerable evidence to argue the case that Luke was a Hellenistic Jew. If so, it becomes feasible that he is to be identified with Lucius (Rom. 16:21). R.M.

LUKE, GOSPEL OF. This Gospel, though anonymous like the other Gospels, is traditionally ascribed to LUKE and has the unusual distinction of carrying a full preface (1:1-4) in which the author states several things.

Luke's Prologue. First, he acknowledges that he had other writers before him, on whose work he drew. This reference is customarily taken to include Mark and the hypothetical "sayings-source" comprising two hundred or so verses found in both Matthew and Luke. Second, Luke pays tribute to his fellow Christians ("eyewitnesses and servants of the word"), who were yet another source on which he has drawn, though in an undefined way. Possibly Luke had access to catechetical material of Jesus' teaching, used in training new converts. Third, Luke professes to have researched his subject with care and in detail in order to produce "an orderly account" (perhaps in contrast to—as some church fathers say—Mark's Gospel, which was written "not in order," according to Eusebius' Church History). Finally, the purpose of the Gospel is seen in the use of Theophilus' name as its prime addressee, though it is quite impossible to say who Theophilus may have been. That he was a high-ranking Roman official in a position to influence state policy regarding the church of Luke's day has been proposed. Perhaps he was regarded by the evangelist more in a representative sense as a symbol of the great Gentile world to which Luke would send his Gospel. If the latter, the Gospel is best described as evangelistic, that is, intended to awaken faith. The designation of Theophilus as one who "had been taught" the Christian message suggests rather that he was a catechumen, and so the Gospel was intended more to confirm his already held faith. How this may happen may be understood from the phrase "the things that have been fulfilled among us" and refers to the feature of Luke's appeal to the "proof-from-prophecy," which characterizes his Gospel. He wanted to point to the theme of "promise-and-fulfillment" as confirming to his initial readership that God's age-old plan of salvation in the OT has surely come to fruition in the ministry, life, teaching, death, resurrection, and ascension of Jesus of Nazareth.

Luke's Emphases. So far we have taken Luke's prologue at its face value. Not all scholars are willing or able to do this. They argue that we should treat the entire Gospel as revealing Luke's purpose, along with his "second volume," the ACTS OF THE APOSTLES. Such an attempt to encompass the comprehensive range of Luke's writing, in recognizing that "the writings of no other single author in the NT occupies (sic) the amount of space that Luke-Acts does" (J. A. Fitzmyer, The Gospel According to Luke I-IX, Anchor Bible, 28 [p. 3]); this commentary is by far the most complete repository of pertinent information on Luke's Gospel) has produced a bewildering crop of theories. They fall into two main areas.

(a) Understanding Luke as an early Christian "apologist." Under this head the major influence has been H. Conzelmann's Theology of St. Luke, and the leading motif in Luke's books has been identified as a revising of ESCHATOLOGY. According to Conzelmann and others Luke achieved a rewriting of theology appropriate to a new situation in which he found himself. The earliest decades of the church were filled with a fervent hope that history would soon end with the return of Christ. When this expectation failed to materialize, the church was faced with several problems, namely what to make of a protracted interval before the end and how to relate the gospel it proclaimed to the ongoing flow of human history.

Luke's effort matched those needs as he proposed a philosophy of history in which God's plan embraced three stages, the time of the OT climaxing in John the Baptist (Luke 16:16); the time of Jesus, so called the "middle period," the reason for Conzelmann's original title being The Middle of Time; and the time of the church. Luke made the church part of world history and gave the believers of his day an agenda in terms of witness (Luke 24:45-49; Acts 1:8) and suffering. He therefore contributed significantly to the church's self-identity as a social community with a future in this world and an institution with history to make as well as to look back upon.

One of the weaknesses of Conzelmann's influential theory has been his virtual overlooking of Luke's use of the OT. An alternative way of viewing Luke (taken by C. H. Talbert, Luke and the Gnostics) stresses how Luke wrote to defend the Gospel against Gnostic tendencies. The latter are seen in Luke's defense of historical detail, particularly to do with Jesus' birth, baptism, death, burial, and resurrection events, which are all described in a literal fashion (see 2:7; 3:32; 24:37-43). His appeal to the OT (1:5-80; 24:44-45) is part of this anti-Docetic thrust, since Gnostic teachers both denied Jesus' full humanity and disdained the OT revelation. While there may be some basis in Luke's apology for historical reality, it is difficult to see this as the sole category of his purpose.

Yet another apologetic purpose in Luke's Gospel is more widely approved. It is clear from the data that Luke wanted to stress how the early church was not a politically dangerous movement, and in particular it was not to be confused with Judaism. Since the war with Rome in A.D. 66-73, the Jews were in bad repute throughout the empire, and Luke wanted to show the distance between ethnic Jewry and the fulfillment and completion of the Jewish hope in a now ecumenical church. There is much truth here, especially when the Acts data are brought into the discussion. But even from the Gospel alone we can see how Jesus' story and teaching highlight interest in Gentile races, particularly the Romans (Luke 7:1-10). In the Passion narrative the innocence of Jesus and the impartiality of the Roman authorities are repeatedly attested.

(b) The universal scope of Luke's Gospel is well known, and this feature has been taken to mean that Luke wrote simply to proclaim the gospel of salvation to his readers. The worldwide character of the Gospel is sometimes explicit (2:1; 2:32; 3:1-2). Sometimes it is cryptic (as in 10:1, where the number seventy or seventy-two disciples reflects and parallels the number of nations listed in Gen. 10:1-32). Sometimes the emphasis is made by what is said on the surface of the narrative (Jesus' appeal to women, to sinners, and social outcasts, like lepers and tax collectors, to Samaritans, a race despised by the Jews, to the economically poor). Yet in other places the emphasis lies just beneath the text itself (4:16-30; 5:1-11).

Searching for some sort of umbrella term or terms to label Luke's purpose, S. G. Wilson describes Luke's aim as "a combination of historical and practical elements." Luke wanted to write history, but history with a special slant (often called salvation history) "that had a message for his contemporaries." Wilson wisely chooses the title "pastor" for Luke's role as a Gospel writer. His chief interest was to aid the church in his lifetime by proclaiming the substance of Jesus' preaching and by offering pastoral counsel and encouragement to his fellow believers who, to be sure, may well have needed some corrective teaching and have required a fresh retelling of the earthly life of their Lord. Luke has played the part of a pastor-teacher seen in the way he assembled the traditions at his disposal (the sayings-source and some special matter he alone uses. They were joined to form a "mini-Gospel" called Proto-Luke before Luke saw Mark and slotted into his framework the Markan additions).

Other examples of Luke's editorial work are the use he made of liturgical and catechetical elements (in chaps. 1, 2: the hymns of Jewish Christianity are traced back to such sources as Mary's Magnificat and Simeon's Nunc Dimittis, and chap. 7—the Sermon on the Plain), the prominence he ascribed to the character of the truly human Jesus as man among people, and especially his emphasis in the tradition about Jesus on those elements that figured so prominently in Paul's kerygmatic message, for example, the kindness and compassion of God in Christ, the call of salvation (a key Lukan word), and Jesus' offer of free grace to the undeserving. This closely paralleled series of teachings, even if the idiom is different (though occasionally it is strikingly identical—Luke 18:13 and Rom. 3:24-26), is best viewed in a special part of this Gospel: the central section (9:51-18:14), which plays another important part in Luke's overall composition.

Luke's Gospel and Christian Living. In Luke's central section we meet several special motifs that run like a core through his entire Gospel book but are chiefly accentuated here. Jesus' purpose is clear (9:51): it is to go to Jerusalem, where salvation has to be accomplished (13:31-35). On the road to the Holy City Jesus teaches the true nature of the kingdom of God, whose coming is soon but not "to appear immediately" (19:11). He reaches out to touch and bless the lives of non-Jews and the socially disadvantaged

(9:52-56; 16:19-31; 18:1-14, 35-43). But one aspect should not be forgotten: here Jesus' teaching is oriented to the cost of Christian discipleship, whose motto is summed up in the word "Take up [the] cross daily" (9:23). The price to be paid in terms of sacrifice for God's kingdom is renewed (9:57-62); the disciple is summoned to a life of prayer (11:1-12) and trust (12:13-34); the road is hard, and there is much suffering to be endured (12:49-53) if a person is to be saved (13:22-30); and the follower of Jesus must show the same forgiving spirit as has been offered to him (17:1-10). These are particular emphases found in Luke, and they constitute the church's first efforts to build up a pastoral theology out of the tradition of Jesus' teachings. Yet again our designation of Luke's Gospel as the work of a pastor-theologian is reinforced. R.M.

LULL, RAYMOND (about 1235–1315). Medieval mystic, poet, missionary to Muslims, advocate of local languages for Christian missionaries. Born in Majorca, trained as a knight, he served Majorcan King Don Jamie II from 1246 until his conversion vision about 1263. For nine years he studied Arabic and Christian thought preparing for Arabic missions. In 1276 he established Miramar College in Majorca to train Franciscans and others in Oriental studies. He lectured and traveled widely, promoting language studies for missionaries and finally persuading the Council of Vienne (1311–12) to sanction Oriental languages in five universities. His missionary enterprises took him to Asia, Armenia, and four times to Africa. On his last African mission he was stoned in Tunisia and died four years later.

Lull was prolific as a writer. His Grand Art uses rational arguments to convince Muslims that Christian truth is irrefutable. The Great Book of Contemplation discusses stages in the ascent to God—the sensible, intellectual, and final mystic stage of union. The Blanquerna is reminiscent of St. Francis' joy in things of nature created by God. The Book of the Lover and the Beloved presents Lull's mysticism in brief form. Lull influenced St. Teresa of Avila, St. John of the Cross, and Nicholas of Cusa. C.M.

LUNDENSIAAN THEOLOGY. A name applied to a school of Swedish theologians centered on the University of Lund and active in the middle decades of the twentieth century. Among its representatives were G. AULÉN and A. NYGREN. Its adherents practiced the method of MOTIF RESEARCH. They believed that one must penetrate beneath the outward form of a doctrine to its fundamental motif, understood as a distinctive and dynamic idea. Thus Aulén claimed that the conflict/victory motif underlies the Christian doctrine of atonement and is essential to a right understanding of it, while Nygren found the central Christian motif in agape or disinterested love, to be distinguished both from eros as the motif characteristic of Greek philosophy and from nomos, which has a corresponding role in Judaism. J.M.

LUST. One of the traditional SEVEN DEADLY SINS. Lust is an unhealthy sexual appetite that desires not love or spiritual union but only physical satisfaction. Lust goes beyond the normal desire for relief from sexual tension in that it is an inordinate, all-consuming desire for sexual activity. Lust is not related either to the Platonic EROS, which is the drive for union with the beloved person or object, or to AGAPE, the NT love that seeks the good of the loved one even at the expense of one's own needs. It is not related to PHILIA, the brotherly love that binds the citizen to his or her fellow citizens, or to storge, which is patriotism or love of country. Lust is a distortion of the good sexual drive in an utterly selfish manner. Lust may be, in the modern world view, a psychological addiction, similar to alcoholism or drug abuse. In the traditional view, derived from Aristotle's ethics, lust is a sin of excess, of exceeding the mean or measure of moderation that alone can lead one to true happiness. Lust, in the Platonic view, is the allowance of the base, animal, or instinctual nature to dominate the intellectual nature and so to lead the soul away from the highest good. J.C.

LUTHER, MARTIN (1483–1546). German church reformer who began PROTESTANTISM. Born November 10 at Eisleben into a peasant family experiencing an economic decline, Luther attended lower schools at Magdeburg and Eisenach, and received B.A. and M.A. degrees from the University of Erfurt in 1501 and 1505. He was ready to enter law school when a bolt of lightning made him so fearfully conscious of death that he vowed to become a monk. On July 17, 1505, Luther entered the Augustinian cloister at Erfurt in order to save his soul. He scrupulously fulfilled all requirements for monkhood, and on May 2, 1507, he said his first mass. Luther underwent a long religious crisis, doing everything the church prescribed to acquire divine favor. He performed religious works, chastised his body, made lengthy confessions, and even tried mystical contemplation but found no spiritual peace. He taught one semester at Wittenberg University in 1508 and went to Rome (November 1510–April 1511) to represent the Augustinians in a dispute. On returning he transferred to Wittenberg, studied theology, and received a Th.D. on October 19, 1512.

Courtesy of the Museum of Fine Arts, Boston, Henry D. Parker Collection

Martin Luther. A portrait by Heinrich Aldegraver

Later, saying he had not yet seen the light, Luther began lectures on Psalms, Romans, and Galatians. Luther's experience of justification by faith alone, traditionally dated 1513, forced him to disavow all attempts to merit favor from God. God freely forgives our sins; sinful human beings do not earn forgiveness by their works. Christ's atonement is based on God's love, not on our merits. This was the insight, though not fully formulated, out of which Luther wrote and posted his ninety-five theses, October 31, 1517, regarded as the inauguration of the REFORMATION. Luther's theses questioned Johann Tetzel's selling of papal indulgences, which the church said wiped out sins but which Luther said were sold so that St. Peter's Church in Rome could be rebuilt. He desired not schism but a truer understanding of Christian living and repentance more in keeping with Scripture. Others saw his theses as an attack on the authority of the pope and the church's treasury of merits. Within weeks Luther became the center of a European controversy.

The papacy ordered Luther to Rome, but Elector John Frederick of Saxony circumvented that. Various attempts through Cardinal Cajetan and others to silence Luther culminated in the Leipzig debate with Johann Eck, July 4–14, 1519. At Leipzig Luther acknowledged agreement with JOHN HUSS, a condemned heretic, and on June 15, 1520, Pope Leo X issued his Exsurge Domine bull branding Luther a wild boar in the Lord's vineyard and giving him sixty days to recant.

While awaiting the bull, Luther published three influential essays. The Appeal to the German Nobility attacked church abuses, developed the sacredness of all vocations and the priesthood of all believers, and urged secular rulers to reform the church. The Babylonian Captivity argued from Scripture for only two sacraments—baptism and the Lord's Supper—though Luther wondered about penance. The Freedom of the Christian elaborated justification by faith alone acting in love. On December 10, 1520, Luther publicly burned the pope's bull, and on January 3, 1521, was formally excommunicated in the bull Decret.

At the imperial Diet of Worms (1521) Luther, with his life at stake, made his "Here I Stand" speech, saying he would not recant unless proved wrong by Scripture and right reason. Emperor Charles V placed him under the imperial ban, but friends of Luther hid him at the Wartburg Castle for ten months. He returned to Wittenberg in March of 1522 and quelled rising disturbances by preaching eight sermons on faith and love. That same year he published the New Testament in German, and the entire Bible, including the Apocrypha, by 1534. He quietly began implementing his views in ritual. In 1523 he produced On the Order of Worship, in 1524 an evangelical hymnbook, and in 1525 a German Mass. In 1524 he also urged civil authorities to establish public schools, a task carried out by PHILIPP MELANCHTHON.

In 1524–25 Luther and ERASMUS clashed over free will. Erasmus, prodded by Catholic leaders, wrote On the Freedom of the Will (1524), saying human beings are moral agents who can make righteous choices. Having a deep sense of human sinfulness, Luther replied with On the Bound Will (1525), saying human choices originate in a disoriented sinful center and cannot be meritorious before God. Justification is therefore by faith, not works. Luther lost the support of many humanists who believed in human goodness.

Luther's belief in social order prompted him to write against the rebellious peasants in 1525. In his first essay he chided the princes for being unjust, even though he believed the peasants had misconstrued faith. In a second essay, Against the Robbing and Murdering Horde, Luther urged the princes to stab and kill as if among mad dogs. He believed the rampant peasants had usurped the political prerogatives given by God to the established authorities. At Frankenhäusen, May 15, 1525, some fifty thousand peasants were slain.

In 1525 Luther married Catherine von Bora, a nun who had left her convent. Five children were born of the marriage, which set a precedent of non-celibacy in Protestantism. In 1529 Lutherans protested the limiting of evangelical freedom at the Second Diet of Spire, thus inaugurating the term "Protestant." Despite Luther's influence, the Protestants found little unity. In 1529 Luther and Ulrich Zwingli failed to agree on the Lord's Supper, and in 1536 the agreement with Martin Bucer and the South Germans on the "real presence" of Christ in the Lord's Supper proved abortive. Luther did not frame Protestantism's basic creed, the Augsburg Confession (1530). He later composed a less conciliatory doctrinal statement in his Schmalkald Articles (1536).

During his final years Luther had poor health and was irascible. He wrote a bitter essay on the Jews (1543), which Hitler later used, and a sharp tirade against the papacy. He died at Eisleben trying to settle a dispute between two counts of Mansfeld. Through his life and writings he founded Protestantism. C.M.

LUTHERAN CHURCHES. Lutherans form the oldest and third largest branch of Protestant Christianity in the United States, part of a worldwide communion numbering more than seventy million. The name derives from the great figure of the Protestant REFORMATION, MARTIN LUTHER. The major tenet of Luther's theological position was justification by grace alone through faith in Jesus Christ. It is significant that in 1983, the five-hundredth anniversary of Luther's birth, a panel of United States Roman Catholic and Lutheran scholars announced their agreement on the teaching of justification. "Only by God's grace do we have justification," they unitedly declared.

Luther and his followers have always insisted that their movement was a continuation of Christianity, not a new church. Except for the strong emphasis Luther placed on justification by faith and his denial of the primacy of papal authority, Lutherans are in many ways closer to Catholicism than they are to the FREE CHURCHES of Protestantism. One theologian has said that Roman Catholics are their first cousins. The Lutheran liturgy was shaped largely by that of the medieval church, to which Luther added great hymns and solid expository preaching. The Lutheran doctrine of the Eucharist is closer to that of Rome than to the "memorial" concept of many Protestant groups.

Lutheranism's confessional position is contained in the BOOK OF CONCORD, which contains the three ecumenical creeds—Apostles', Nicene, and Athanasian—plus the AUGSBURG CONFESSION and its Apology, Luther's Small and Large Catechisms, the Smalcald Articles, and the Formula of Concord.

Luther reasoned that because of original sin, people need to be reconciled to God. Reconciliation and forgiveness of sins are the essence of justification, and the righteousness of God in Christ is imputed to the believer by the action of the Holy Spirit. It is not by one's works or merit but solely the grace of God that justifies one before God. Luther often used the expression, simul iustus et peccator ("justified but still a sinner") to emphasize the progressive aspect of sanctification. The redeemed sinner needs the means of grace—baptism, the Word, and the Lord's Supper.

Lutheran theology is always Christocentric: Christ's redemptive work is the central teaching of the Scriptures. Baptism is regarded as the water of regeneration. The Eucharist permits the believer to partake of the Body and Blood of Christ, who is there as a Real Presence. Lutheranism also emphasizes the difference between law and gospel—the law condemns; the gospel saves.

In polity there is a wide divergence in various parts of the Lutheran ecclesiastical world. Some churches, such as those in Sweden and Denmark, and more recently some of the major churches in the United States, give the title of bishop to the person occupying the highest ministerial office. Other Lutheran communions emphasize the congregational or presbyterial form of organization.

Lutheran churches have been established in all fifty states of the U.S.A., but their membership is now concentrated in the contiguous states of the upper Midwest—the Dakotas, Minnesota, Wisconsin, Iowa, and Nebraska. North Dakota is heavily Lutheran; 35 percent of the population is of this faith. Pennsylvania, once the matrix of Lutheranism, has now yielded first place to Minnesota.

Despite the numerical prominence of Lutherans, other Christian groups in the United States know relatively little about them. Restricted by edicts from abroad, the first Lutheran settlers were prohibited from having their own clergy until 1664. Due in large measure to unique customs and practices that Germans and Scandinavians developed in the nearly two hundred years between the time of the Reformation and major migrations to the New World, Lutherans became a somewhat excluded and exclusive denomination. Their common languages and cultural bonds served to unite them and provide them with a distinct identity when they came to America. Like their ancestors before them, a large share of the Lutheran population settled in rural communities. This, together with the language barrier, often resulted in enclaves of Lutherans living as religious foreigners in their adopted land.

More than evangelistic outreach, it was the tide of immigration—especially in the latter half of the nineteenth century—that served to enlarge the ranks of the Lutheran church. Before long the Lutherans debated over maintaining their parental tongues and traditions. Some felt it was important to become Americanized as citizens of the new land, while others felt maintaining their ethnic identity would preserve their theological and spiritual conformity.

There are perhaps three or four streams of varying emphasis discernible in United States' Lutheranism: (1) the nominalistic type that follows the tradition of the European state churches; (2) the scholastic conservatives who are rigid in their doctrinal orthodoxy; (3) the pietistic emphasis found in both Scandinavian and German streams; and perhaps (4) Lutheranism that has been influenced by contemporary theological liberalism. Lutheran scholars have been heavy contributors to textual criticism and higher criticism, as well as form and redaction criticism.

In the last decade or so there is a sizable charismatic renewal movement that has had an impact on many churches, particularly in the American Lutheran church. To the astonishment of staunch Lutherans, who are not noted for demonstrative religion, the charismatic movement has gained headway in many congregations. Like the historic Pentecostals, charismatics stress the gifts of the Spirit (charismata), which enable those so endowed to speak in tongues or to exercise various ministries within the church.

It was inevitable that each of the Lutheran groups would develop its own congregations and synods. As a result, as many as one hundred separate and autonomous bodies have appeared at one time or another in this country. In the last two decades continuing mergers have reduced the ecclesiastical diversity to two major groupings and at least nine smaller ones. The largest of these smaller groups is the Wisconsin Evangelical Lutheran Synod, with more than 400,000 members. In 1983 the American Lutheran church, the Lutheran church in America, and the Association of Evangelical Lutheran Churches (a recent breakoff from the Lutheran church—Missouri Synod) voted to merge into one synod. The only other large segment of Lutheranism—the Lutheran church—Missouri Synod—did not join the merger.

Throughout their history in America, Lutherans have placed a strong emphasis on education and intellectual achievement. All synods have maintained denominational colleges and universities, as well as seminaries for the training of their clergy and theologians. In addition, the Missouri Synod has a tradition of providing high quality parochial schools for primary and secondary education.

Because of their strong emphasis on parochial life, Lutherans in the past tended to be slow to engage in the cause of social justice and mission. In recent years, however, they have made up for lost time. Vast sums have been raised to extend their ministry and mission. Millions of dollars have been contributed annually, for example, to the cause of world hunger. Lutheran thinkers envision "a church of catholic comprehensiveness, confessional integrity . . . with structures flexible enough to embrace ethnic distinctives, regional differences, variety of piety." To this they add, "and movements of the Spirit . . . resulting in a more diverse and dynamic Lutheranism. . . ."

Lutheranism, concentrated in Germany and Scandinavia, now can claim to be a worldwide communion with vital autonomous churches in Africa, South and Central America, Japan, India, Korea, the U.S.S.R., and mainland China.

The international voice of the church is the Lutheran World Federation, which is an association of Lutheran churches in about one hundred countries. The federation does not exercise church functions on its own authority, nor does it have authority over member churches. The LWF is successor to the Lutheran World Convention organized in Eisenach, Germany, in 1923. World War II inflicted such damage on the Lutheran churches in western Europe and elsewhere, that it was felt necessary to establish a more functional organization. Thus, the LWF was organized July 1, 1947, at Lund, Sweden, and plunged immediately into programs of emergency relief, interchurch aid, and studies. Currently it functions through major departments of studies, church cooperation, and world service. It maintains its headquarters in Geneva, Switzerland.

In 1983 the five-hundredth anniversary of Luther's birth was celebrated around the world not only by Lutherans but by Protestants, Roman Catholics, and even the authorities of Marxist East Germany. During the Advent season, Pope John Paul II participated in a Lutheran church service in Rome. It was the first time such an event had occurred in almost five centuries, since the Reformation. R.H.

LXX. See SEPTUAGINT.

LYCAONIA. A high tableland north of the Taurus Mountains in ancient Asia Minor. It became part of the kingdom of Galatia in 35 B.C., and, along with Galatia, part of the Roman Empire in 25 B.C. Derbe and Lystra, two cities visited by Paul (Acts 14:6, 11) were in Lycaonia. J.C.

LYDIA. A woman from Thyatira (Asia Minor), whom Paul met at Philippi (Acts 16:11-15). Possibly her name was taken from the adjective phrase "a woman of Lydia," for Thyatira was a Lydian city. Paul does not refer to Lydia in his Letter to the Philippians, but the munificence of this church, so dear to Paul, must have owed much to this generous woman. After Lydia's conversion, and the baptism of her household, Paul and his companions were prevailed upon to stay at her place. Paul was therefore relieved of the necessity of earning his living in Philippi as he needed to do elsewhere (compare II Cor. 11:8-9; I Thess. 2:9-12; Phil. 4:15-16).

Luke's incidental reference to Lydia as "a seller of purple goods" comports with inscriptions that record that the region of Lydia was famous for its dyeing. Some capital was needed to maintain this trade, which leads one to surmise that Lydia was a woman of considerable means. J.L.P.

LYDIA. In the seventh century B.C., Lydia developed into a significant geopolitical entity in west central Asia Minor, centered around its capital city of SARDIS. The architect of Lydian nationhood, Gyges (about 680-652 B.C.), sought the aid of the Assyrian king ASHURBANIPAL to ward off raids by the Cimmerians (marauders known in Ezek. 38:6 as "Gomer and all his hordes"). A record of this negotiation was made in the annals of the Assyrian king, where Gyges is known as Guggu of Luddu (that is, Gog of Ezek. 38:2). Gyges was killed fighting the Cimmerians, but his son Ardys (about 652-615 B.C.) inaugurated a policy that culminated in their defeat and in Lydian control of all of Asia Minor from the Greek coastal cities (except Miletus) to Phrygia as far as the Halys River. The most renowned king of the independent Lydia was also its last, Croesus (560-546 B.C.). A man of wealth and Hellenized sophistication, he made splendid gifts to the sanctuary at Delphi and to the temple of Artemis at Ephesus. His defeat and imprisonment by Cyrus in 546 B.C. reduced Lydia to a satrapy of the Persian Empire, and it remained a mere province in Greek and Roman times. Little is known about the culture, language, or religion of Lydia, although ancient tradition held that the Etruscan nobility of Italy were Lydians in their origin. Tradition also credits Lydians with the invention of coinage, the fables of Aesop, and the enhancement of music, textiles, and perfume. W.S.T.

LYING. In both the OT and the NT, telling lies is equated with the devil and telling the truth with God. God's holy people were not to suppress or pervert the truth (Lev. 19:11). When Cain lied about killing his brother, or Abraham said that Sarah was his sister, not his wife, the tone of the OT writer is one of total disapproval. Perjury was condemned outright (Exod. 23:1). Jehovah was considered to be the fountain of all truth, and his followers were expected to demonstrate continuing truthfulness. On the other hand, for proper cause, Rehab is not condemned for lying to protect the spies who were sent into Jericho.

In the NT, Christ says that Satan is "the father of lies" (John 8:4). Ananias and Sapphira are put to death because of their selfishness and their lies (Acts 5:1-10). Paul points out that what is worst about the mystery cults of his world is that they are based not on truth but on lies (Rom. 1:22-25). And John says that what is worst about those who lie is that it permanently cuts them off from the One whose word is truth (John 17:17). T.J.K.

LYON, COUNCILS OF. Roman Catholicism's thirteenth and fourteenth ecumenical councils (1245 and 1274). Pope Innocent IV called the first council of Lyon to curb Holy Roman Emperor Frederick II, who had driven him from Rome, and also to deal with clerical immorality, the Saracens, the Greek schism, and the Tartars' invasion of Hungary. The council formally deposed the already excommunicated Frederick II. Frederick's envoy accused the council of irregularity for allowing the pope to both accuse and judge. The recently approved Dominicans and Franciscans were charged with publicizing the council's decrees, but politically and ecclesiastically the council was ineffective.

The second council of Lyon, called by Pope Gregory X, effected reunion with the Greek church, which lasted until 1289. Many medieval leaders attended, including Albert the Great and Bonaventure. Aquinas died while journeying to the council. The Greeks agreed to accept Roman Catholic doctrines, especially agreeing that the Holy Spirit proceeds from the Father and the Son, and reunion was temporarily achieved. The council also deposed several undesirable ecclesiastics and suppressed some mendicant orders, while reapproving the Dominicans and Franciscans. In addition the council confirmed Gregory's previous acknowledgment of Rudolf I as Holy Roman Emperor, thus ending a twenty-year hiatus. C.M.

LYSANIAS. The governor of Abilene, a region of ancient Palestine north of Mount Hermon, lying between Damascus and Baalbek (or Heliopolis). The title given the governor in that period was tetrarch. According to Luke 3:1, Lysanias was tetrarch during the time of John the Baptist. Many modern scholars believe that this was not the case, since John's period was not the same as Lysanias'. J.C.

LYSTRA. A city in Lycaonia, a section of the Roman province of Galatia in Asia Minor. Lystra lay twenty-five miles southwest of Iconium on the Roman imperial road that ran to Pisidian Antioch. Lystra was the scene of Paul and Barnabas' tremendous reception by citizens who were so impressed by Paul's miraculous healings that the two disciples were declared to be gods (Acts 14:6-19). When the people called them "Jupiter and Mercury" (in the Latin fashion; "Zeus and Hermes" in the Greek manner), Paul declared that he and Barnabas were only men like themselves. Paul sometimes visited Lystra (Acts 14:6, 21; 16:1; 18:23). J.C.

LYTE, HENRY FRANCIS. (1793-1847) Poet, musician, and minister. Born in Scotland on June 1, Lyte was educated at Trinity College, Dublin. Throughout most of his life, Lyte suffered from poor health, but he persisted in serving Christ faithfully. Indeed he is said to have coined the expression, "It is better to wear out than to rust out." For the final twenty-three years of his short life, Lyte served as curate of an Anglican parish at Lower Brixham in Devonshire. When his health became progressively worse, he decided to go to Italy where the weather would be milder. However, he never reached Italy. He died at Nice, France, and was buried there on November 20. Lyte was said to have written the text for his most famous hymn, "Abide with Me," shortly before his last Sunday in the Lower Brixham Church. The text for his great hymn was taken from the account of Christ's appearance to the two disciples on the way to Emmaus, who said "Abide with us, for it is toward evening and the day is now far spent" (Luke 24:29). Lyte also wrote "Praise, My Soul, the King of Heaven," and "Jesus, I My Cross Have Taken." R.H.

Mm

MACCABEAN REVOLT. In 167 B.C., a Jewish priest, Mattathias, launched an uprising against the efforts of the ruler of Syria, Antiochus IV, to force the Jews in Palestine to abandon their distinctive worship and purity laws, and to adopt instead a Greek style of life. Antiochus IV, who called himself Epiphanes ("manifestation of the Divine"), was eager to unify his kingdom culturally, economically, and religiously. By claiming a kinship with Zeus, the supreme god of the Greek pantheon, he hoped to add both prestige and legitimacy to his rule. By insisting that all his subjects honor Zeus, he was claiming their loyalty and devotion to himself.

Ever since the Persians permitted the Jews to return from the EXILE in Babylon in the sixth century, the acknowledged head of the Jewish people was the high priest. After the death of ALEXANDER THE GREAT in 323 B.C., his generals and those he had placed in charge of the conquered regions began to carve up his vast empire, which stretched from mainland Greece to India, and from Egypt to the Black Sea. Palestine was first claimed by the Egyptian rulers, the Ptolemies, but in 198 B.C., the Syrian king (of the Seleucid dynasty) had added Palestine to his territory, and such it continued down into the reign of Antiochus IV.

On assuming control over the land of the Jews, Antiochus III decided to allow them to live by their traditional law, with Torah as the law of the land and the high priest as head of state. Antiochus and his son were so pressed by the Romans, militarily and financially, as they extended their power into the eastern Mediterranean, that in desperation they seized the silver and gold that had been placed for safekeeping in the treasury of the Temple at Jerusalem. Understandably, the Jews were horrified at this desecration of their shrine (II Macc. 3:1-21).

From the time of Alexander onward, the Ptolemaic and Seleucid rulers of Syria and Palestine had founded or rebuilt cities according to the Greek model, with theaters, baths, schools, and geometrical layout. Greek-type citizenship was offered to those Jews who welcomed and conformed to this way of life. The rulers saw in these strategies a means of welding alien peoples into a unified citizenry, whose culture and personal allegiances would serve to unify the kingdom. In an effort to persuade Jews to conform to the pattern of Greek life, including honoring the Greek gods, Antiochus IV accepted a bribe from Jason of Cyrene and removed from the post of high priest Onias III, who had been faithful in obeying the Jewish sacred law. Unlike Onias, who had favored the Ptolemies, Jason ingratiated himself with the Syrian ruler by building a gymnasium in the city. These institutions were for the instruction of male youths and placed the major emphasis on participation in Greek-style sports. As the word gymnasium (from Greek, gymnos, "naked"), implies, those engaged in these athletic activities did so in the nude, in violation of Jewish custom. And further, they even sought to have operations performed that would cover up their circumcision. Both priests and populace lost interest in the sacrifices and worship ceremonies that had traditionally been carried on in the Temple at Jerusalem.

Antiochus was not content to have the process of "Hellenization" (conforming people to Greek or Hellenic ways; compare II Macc. 4:13) move ahead at its own pace. In 169 B.C., on his return from a plundering expedition in Egypt (I Macc. 1:16-20), Antiochus entered the Temple at Jerusalem and stripped it of its sacred vessels and its gold and silver decorations, motivated in part by financial pressures and in part by resentment of the Jews who resisted Hellenization. Two years later his agents attacked the city, destroying houses, slaughtering many of its inhabitants, and carrying off women and children into slavery (I Macc. 1:30-32). At the same time Antiochus established a garrison in a tower overlooking the Temple, and in a final act of scorn, erected a shrine—probably to Olympian Zeus—within the Temple itself (I Macc. 1:54; Dan. 11:31). Further, he decreed that all the Jewish subjects must join in divine honors to him, and that the sacrificial program at the Jerusalem Temple must be stopped under penalty of death (I Macc. 1:41-50). Many Jews conformed to the royal orders, but in the town of Modein, northwest of Jerusalem, a priest named Mattathias could not bear to see his fellow Jews taking part in sacrifices to the pagan king. When a man stepped forward to do so, Mattathias ran and killed not only the one about to make sacrifice, but also the Syrian officer who had been set to enforce the decree (I Macc. 2:23-25). Calling for all who were zealous for the Law and the covenant to follow him, he and his sons fled to the desert. Others went out into the desert from cities in order to destroy them, and so he and his followers resolved to take up arms if attacked on the Sabbath (I Macc. 2:29-41).

Mattathias and his supporters were joined by the HASIDEANS (I Macc. 2:42), or HASIDIM, who sought to maintain loyalty to Torah, the traditional law of Moses, at the cost of their lives if necessary. Their policy initially was one not of passive resistance, but of active warfare against those, like Antiochus and his agents, who were trying to force them to abandon the Law, and thereby to lose their covenant identity as the pure and true people of God. Together with Mattathias's guerrilla fighters, they attacked not only the Syrians but their fellow Jews who were submitting to the Hellenizing pressures. They went so far as to circumcise forcibly all the uncircumcised Jewish boys they found in their land (I Macc. 2:46).

In 166 B.C., Mattathias died, after designating his son Simon as the one to provide counsel for the people and another son, Judah, to lead the armies of the insurrectionist movement. Judah (or Judas) had been given the nickname of "Maccabee," which probably means "hammerhead," as an indication of his drive and toughness. The Syrians were joined in suppression of the Jews by the Samaritans, a Semitic people living in north-central Palestine, who claimed descent from the northern tribes of Israel, and whose central shrine was located on Mount Gerizim, overlooking their major city, Shechem. Later their capital was relocated at the foot of Gerizim, and called the New City, which in Greek is Neapolis (modern, Nablus). The shrine was originally dedicated to the God of Israel, but later was the seat of worship of Olympian Zeus, perhaps in conformity with the decree of Antiochus IV. Against overwhelmingly superior numbers, Judah and his followers met and defeated the Syrians and their allies, who fled down the slopes of the Judean hills to the safety of the Philistine cities on the Mediterranean coast (I Macc. 3:1-24). The reputation of Judah and his army was made in the first engagement under his leadership.

Antiochus poured additional funds and troops into the effort to defeat the Maccabean hosts, but Judah's courage and strategic skills defeated the Syrian forces repeatedly. By 164 the Jews were in effective control of their lands and were able to purify the Temple in Jerusalem, restoring the proper worship of Israel's God in the rededicated Temple—an event still remembered in the Feast of Hanukkah (I Macc. 4:36-59). Judah was able to extend his power over adjacent territories, including Ammon and Gilead east of the Jordan, Idumea to the south, Galilee to the north, and the coastal regions to the west. After the death of Antiochus IV and the brief reign of Antiochus V, Demetrius became king of Syria. In his reign, Alcimus, an advocate of Hellenization, sought to be appointed to the high priesthood, even though he was not a member of the family for whom this office was hereditary (I Macc. 7:21-23). He tried to ingratiate himself with the king by reporting on Judah's nationalistic actions. But Demetrius' attempt to destroy Judah through yet another attack on Jerusalem met with disaster for the Syrians (I Macc. 7).

With the aim of gaining support from a powerful third party, Judah entered into an alliance with the rising power to the west: Rome (I Macc. 8). But continuing pressure from Syria weakened Judah's forces, with the result that his supporters were routed and he fell in battle (I Macc. 9). Another brother, Jonathan, assumed command of the nationalist troops and defeated the Syrians. A dynastic struggle in Syria led to the offer of support for Jonathan, and even his appointment as high priest, by a new claimant of the Syrian throne: Alexander Balas. He and Demetrius vied with each other to gain the support of the Jews. Alexander, who was favored by the Romans, became king in 150, and honored Jonathan by appointing him as general and governor of the province of Judea. As the dynastic struggles among the Seleucids in Syria and with the Ptolemies in Egypt continued, the descendants of the Maccabees relied increasingly on their alliances with the Romans to maintain themselves in power. With the death of Jonathan and Simon, the last sons of Mattathias, power passed to Simon's son, John Hyrcanus, who served as high priest from 134 to 104 B.C. Increasingly, the leaders of the HASMONEAN family, while maintaining the title of high priest, assumed a royal role and life-style, with the result that the champions of the original goal of the Maccabean revolt—the purity of the covenant people—became disillusioned with the nationalistic leaders and turned their hopes and energies instead to the promotion of personal piety. Chief among those fostering this development were the PHARISEES.

H. K.

MACCABEES, BOOKS OF. Esteemed as fully authoritative writings in the Catholic tradition, I and II Maccabees are considered apocryphal by Protestants and Jews. Two other books of Maccabees are reckoned among the pseudepigraphical writings. Third Maccabees deals with the problems of the Alexandrian Jewish community around the turn of the second century B.C., and IV Maccabees presents Judaism as a religion of reason in the Hellenistic mode.

First Maccabees. This book is our most important source for the history of the rise of the HASMONEAN house, which dominated Israelite life from 164 B.C. to A.D. 70. Led by Mattathias, the father of Judas, surnamed the Maccabee (the "Hammerer"), and his brothers, this family of rebels arose in opposition to the first pogrom ever launched against Judaism, namely, that of Antiochus IV Epiphanes (175–163 B.C.), the Greco-Syrian ruler of the Seleucid kingdom descended from the empire of Alexander the Great. The book begins with an account of the excesses of Antiochus' program of Hellenization, which culminated in the desecration of the Temple in 167 B.C. This terrible event, accompanied by violent suppression of Jewish customs, is also reported in Daniel 11:31 and 12:11. In fact, the books of Maccabees provide indispensable information about the environment in which the book of Daniel was written.

After describing the onset of an armed revolt against imperial oppression in chapter 2, I Maccabees offers a detailed record of the military achievements of Judas (3:1–9:22). The greatest of these accomplishments was, of course, the recapture of Mount Zion and the liberation of the Temple from the profanation to which it had been subjected by the Syrian garrison. The rededication of the Temple was celebrated in 164 B.C., and is the basis of the Jewish feast of Hanukkah, "The Feast of Dedication" (I Macc. 4:52–58). The book concludes with narratives of the military and political careers of Judas' brothers Jonathan (9:23–12:53) and Simon (chaps. 13–16). Most scholars believe that it was originally written in Hebrew (though it is now known only in the Greek text), and date it about 110 B.C., shortly after the death of Simon.

The book stands in the tradition of OT historiography and tells the story of the insurrection of faithful Jews against the Seleucids and their Hellenizing Jewish allies as a history of salvation. So pleased were the writers of the book with the success of the powerless, observant Jews against a powerful empire that they endorsed expansionism and wars of conquest (15:33) and spoke of the later leaders almost in the language of messianism (see the poetic exaltation of Simon in 14:4–15).

Second Maccabees. Though it deals with the same dramatic history, this book surveys only the fifteen years from the accession of Antiochus IV Epiphanes in 175 B.C. to the death of Nicanor, the general of Antiochus, at the hands of Judas in 160 B.C. For various reasons its composition is assigned to about the year 120 B.C.

Second Maccabees is a theological work as much as it is a historical one, and it is believed to reflect the piety of early Pharisaism. It acknowledges the role of angels in history and believes in the resurrection of the dead. Its firm confidence in the efficacy of martyrdom reaches its height in chapter 7, the morally edifying story of the martyrdom of seven brothers and their mother. As King Antiochus personally oversees the frying of these martyrs in a giant frying pan, he hears one brother cry out the words that have inspired generation of readers ever since, "You dismiss us from this present life, but the King of the universe will raise us up to an everlasting renewal of life, because we have died for his laws" (7:9). Hebrews 11:35 may have this account in mind when it says of faithful people, "Some were tortured, refusing to accept release, that they might rise again to a better life."

W. S. T.

MACCABEUS, JUDAS. See MACCABEAN REVOLT.

MACEDONIA. A country that stretched across the peninsula from the Adriatic to the Aegean Sea on the northern limits of what is now GREECE. Its population was probably not Hellenic, but its royal family was. It rose to world prominence under Philip II, who in 338 B.C. defeated the combined forces of Athens and Thebes, and launched his aggressive plan by which he came to dominate the Greek mainland and islands, as well as Asia Minor. In 336 B.C. he was succeeded by his son, Alexander, who went on to conquer the Middle East, Egypt, Mesopotamia, Persia, and took his armies as far as India—all in the name of Macedonia.

Both the letters of Paul and Acts attest to the effectiveness of Paul's mission to the people of Macedonia. In Acts 16:9, it is a vision of a man from there that moves Paul to extend his evangelism to the mainland of Europe. He and his companions passed through this area frequently, visiting the cities of Philippi (Phil. 4:15), which had been named in honor of Philip of Macedon, and Thessalonica (I Thess. 1:7; 4:10; Rom. 15:26), where the Christians were exemplary as to their faith and their generosity. Paul's movements through Macedonia are reported in the Corinthian letters (I Cor. 16:5; II Cor. 1:16; 7:5; 8:1) and in Acts (16:10, 12; 18:5; 19:21; 20:1, 3).

H.K.

McGIFFERT, ARTHUR CUSHMAN (1861–1933). American liberal theologian, prominent professor of church history at Union Theological Seminary (1893–1927), where he was also the president (1917–26). Conservatives forced him to leave the Presbyterian ministry in 1900, during the biblical inerrancy controversy. His many books include The Apostles' Creed (1902) and A History of Christian Thought (1932).

C.M.

MACINTOSH, DOUGLAS CLYDE (1877–1948). Liberal theologian, who studied at Chicago and taught at Yale. He was impressed by the success that had attended the application of empirical methods to the sciences of human behavior and with the empirical spirit of the Chicago Divinity School. The character of his theology is expressed in the title of his best-known book, Theology as an Empirical Science (1919). He had himself undergone significant religious experiences in his youth, and believed that in such experiences there is a perceptual element that is amenable to empirical investigation. Critics, however, have maintained that, like many other "empirical" theologians, Macintosh stretched the meaning of "empirical" to such an extent that it loses definition and comes to cover virtually any kind of inquiry. In addition, he took over many presuppositions and valuations from traditional theology without obviously giving to them an empirical grounding.

J.M.

MACHPELAH, CAVE OF. The cave at Hebron where the three patriarchs—Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob—and three of the four matriarchs—Sarah, Rebekah, and Leah—are buried, according to tradition. The Bible states that Abraham, wanting to bury Sarah, bought Machpelah from Ephron the Hittite for four hundred silver shekels. Genesis 23:17 describes Machpelah as "the field of Ephron." Following the Six-day War in 1967, the cave became a popular point of pilgrimage; and Jews, after a period of seven hundred years, were once more able to visit the tombs of the patriarchs and matriarchs and pray there.

L.K.

McPHERSON, AIMEE SEMPLE (1896–1944). Founder of the International Church of the FOUR-SQUARE GOSPEL. Born October 9, near Ingersoll, Ontario, Canada, Aimee Elizabeth was the only child of James Morgan Kennedy, farmer and Methodist church choir member, and Mildred Pearce Kennedy, a member of the Salvation Army.

At the age of seventeen she experienced conversion in a Pentecostal revival meeting and proceeded on August 12, 1908, to marry the Irish evangelist Robert James Semple. In 1909 she was ordained as a preacher by the Full Gospel Assembly in Chicago. Semple felt called to China, but he died within three months of their arrival in Hong Kong. A month later their daughter Roberta Starr Semple was born. Aimee and her daughter returned to the United States. On February 28, 1912, she married Harold Stewart McPherson, a bookkeeper from Providence, Rhode Island. Rolf Kennedy McPherson was born in 1913. The stormy marriage ended in divorce in 1921.

After a long illness, which she felt was God's punishment for leaving evangelism, McPherson felt called again to preach in 1915. She emphasized crisis conversion, speaking in tongues as evidence of baptism by the Holy Spirit, faith healing, and the premillennial return of Christ—the "foursquare gospel." In 1917 she began publishing Bridal Call.

Arriving in Los Angeles about 1918, she began construction of Angelus Temple in 1921. It was dedicated in 1923, and the church became a denomination in 1927. Scandal arose in May 1926 when she said she had been kidnapped while swimming. Some said she simply vacationed with Kenneth Ormiston, a former employee. In 1931 she married David Hurton, though that marriage also ended in divorce four years later. Her later years were marred by estrangements from her mother and daughter. She died on September 17, after an overdose of sleeping pills, which was ruled accidental. She is buried in Forest Lawn, Glendale, California.

N.H.

MĀDHYAMIKA. A Buddhist meditational exercise, later a school of thought, meaning "the middle way." The school of thought was founded by the monk Nagarjuna (about A.D. 150–250) in India, and spread to China in the fifth century, where it was called San-lun ("Three Treatise School," in reference to its three most important scriptures). It also spread to Korea, Japan, and finally to Tibet. The Indian school divided into two factions in the late fifth century. Later, the school as a whole died out but continued to influence Buddhist thought through its texts.

The Mādhymika school taught that it is dangerous to become entangled in concepts, opinions, and emotions. The way to enlightenment begins with realizing that there is no eternal reality either in the self or in any ultimate reality. All things are empty of any reality. "Nothing becomes real, nothing becomes non-real; nothing is eternal, nothing is extinct; nothing is identical, nothing is different; nothing comes, nothing goes." Critics charged that Nagarjuna was a nihilist, a charge that he denied.

K./M.C.

MADISON, JAMES (1751–1836). The fourth president of the United States was born March 16, 1751, to Eleanor "Nelly" Rose and James Madison of Orange County, Virginia. He graduated from the College of New Jersey at Princeton in 1771, and spent a year studying for the Church of England ministry.

A member of the Virginia convention in 1776, he helped frame its constitution and declaration of rights. He tried unsuccessfully to make the free exercise of religion a right rather than a matter of toleration and to disestablish the Anglican Church. He later completed those tasks as a member of the Virginia House of Delegates 1786–89.

As a member of the Continental Congress, Madison helped frame the Constitution and the Bill of Rights and defended them in The Federalist Papers. He served Thomas Jefferson as secretary of state and succeeded him as president of the United States in 1808, serving two terms. He later succeeded Jefferson as rector of the University of Virginia in 1826.

Madison married Dolly Payne Todd on September 15, 1794; they had no children. A slaveholder who abhorred slavery, he proposed the three-fifths rule of representation and supported the American Colonization Society.

N.H.

MADONNA. A sculptured figure of wood, stone, or other material of the VIRGIN MARY. A Madonna may also be an icon or painting of the Virgin. The Virgin is usually depicted with the Christ child or in a scene from Jesus' ministry. In Italian, madonna means "my lady."

J.C.

MADRASA. A school, college, or university in Islam, sometimes associated with a mosque. Although some madrasas provided primary education in the Qur'an and in grammar and poetry, madrasas were most important in the Middle Ages as centers of studies in jurisprudence. Professors and students also studied Qur'anic interpretation (tafsir), theology (kalam), and other fields: logic, linguistics, mathematics, music, and medicine. The madrasas contended with the followers of philosophy who studied the Greek classics. European universities borrowed from the madrasas the long robes of the professor and the practice of endowing a "chair" in each subject. In modern times, madrasas have westernized.

K./M.C.

MAGDALA. An ancient Jewish fishing town (from the Hebrew midgal meaning "tower"), probably the medieval and modern Mejdal, on the western shore of the Sea of Galilee just a little northwest of Tiberias. The Greek name in Josephus was Tarichea. It is referred to in the Gospels as Magadan (Matt. 15:39; some manuscripts read Magdala) or Dalmanutha (Mark 8:10; some mss. read Magadan or Magdala). One of Jesus' prominent women disciples was Mary Magdalene (that is, the one from Magdala; Matt. 27:56, 61; 28:1; Mark 15:40, 47; 16:1; Luke 8:2; 24:10; John 19:25; 20:1, 10-18). Limited archaeological work reveals that there was a harbor, possibly a few first-century A.D. Roman structures, and perhaps a very small synagogue. D.S.

Star of David

MAGEN DAVID. From the Hebrew phrase for "Shield of David." The term applied to a six-pointed star, or two interlaced equilateral triangles, which has come to be an accepted symbol of Judaism. It has neither biblical nor Talmudic authority, and its origin as a Jewish symbol is obscure. The Magen David is a part of the blue and white flag of the State of Israel. The Red Magen David in Israel corresponds to the Red Cross in other countries.

L.K.

MAGI. From inscriptions, literary evidence, and ancient art, it is known that a magus was a member of the Persian priestly caste, which had responsibility for daily fire worship and other sacrificial and liturgical duties in Persia from at least as early as the sixth century B.C. Later, the term came to be used in two distinctly different ways: (1) a diviner, who by studying the movement of the stars was able to predict the course of events in the future; (2) a magician, especially if regarded as a quack or one who exploited the gullible. Careful study of the movement of the stars, combined with the belief in the determinative effects of the heavenly bodies on earthly affairs lay at the basis of the pronouncements of the magi in the former sense. People claiming to possess this knowledge and the insight to divine the future were called magi, whether they were actually from the eastern lands or not. On the other hand, those who claimed to be able to shape the lives and destinies of others through secret formulae and magical processes were called magi in the second sense of the term. This is the signification of the terms used in Acts to describe SIMON, who wanted to buy the secret of the apostles' power (8:9-24), as well as Elymas (or Bar-Jesus), who tried to dissuade the proconsul in Cyprus from believing Paul's message (13:4-12). Simon Magus figures importantly in the apocryphal writings, such as the Acts of Peter, which describe elaborate public contests of power between Simon and the apostles in Rome. The single positive presentation of magi is in Matthew 2:1-16 where, on the basis of the movement of a star (planet?), these interpreters of the stars predict when and where the one destined to rule Israel would be born. Belief in the interpretation of the stars and their motions was widespread among various ethnic groups, including the Jews, among the cultured and the simple. From the basic order of the stars was deduced the divine ordering of events in human history. H. K.

MAGIC. In primitive society, magic can be described as an attempt to set aside the normal laws of the universe. In biblical terms, magic, and the superhuman powers that go with it, can be thought of as good when it originates with God or furthers God's purpose but evil when it does not. Thus Moses casting down a staff before Pharaoh and turning it into a serpent has accomplished something God-pleasing and miraculous. But Saul talking to the Baalitic witch of Endor is misusing her to call up the ghost of Samuel and speak to the dead.

Magic appears in such forms as sorcery, DIVINATION, soothsaying, wizardry, conjuring, incantation, casting of LOTS, curses, blessings, spells, numerology, dreams, visions, augury, ASTROLOGY, OMENS, necromancy, EXORCISM, charms, amulets, potions, ordeals, and SIGNS. Both the NT and the OT are filled with references to such kinds of magic, both among the people of God and the pagans among whom these people lived. Yet Gerhard von Rad makes a valid case that the children of Israel, in their worship of Jehovah, were unique, compared with other peoples of the Near East, for how little they used magic, invocations, incantations, charms, images, and other magical forms of worship. God's name also sufficed, without physical intervention.

The word "magic" originates in Persia, with the magi or magoi, as cited in the story of the wise men who visited the infant Jesus. Their ability to divine, to prophesy, to interpret the stars, to tell dreams, to advise royalty, and to perform sorcery to some degree defined our concept of magic. Similar professional diviners and sorcerers are cited in biblical passages like Micah 5:3-11; Genesis 41:8; Daniel 2:2. The Hebrew word for priest, coben, and even more its cognates in other Semitic languages, carried the meaning not just of an individual who tends the altar and offers sacrifice but also one who foretells the future, a function in Israel that was usually reserved for major prophets, and even then, often only as a result of a special vision. Such prophets or soothsayers generally were set apart by the special clothing they wore, the special food they ate, and the special oaths they swore (II Kings 1:8).

In the days before the Exile the people of Israel carried on a continuous religious struggle to ward off the worship practices of the other Semitic peoples among whom they lived. Jacob's wife Rachel stole the teraphim or household gods when she left her family home (Gen. 31:19), in the hope that these would bring continued blessing to the family and flocks. In the wilderness, the people of Israel did not think Jehovah alone adequate to solve their problems and wanted to improve their chances by adding local gods, like the golden calf (Exod. 32). Not much later Moses, on Jehovah's instructions, cast a brazen serpent, perhaps a brazen mockery of the Canaanitic serpent god, as a response to the people's complaints. Later, as the Assyrians gradually dominated the north of Israel, their religious practices more and more swamped the true worship of Jehovah, with household gods, sacred groves, high places, divination, and witchcraft. In one attempt to wipe out false religion, Saul put to death "the mediums and the wizards" (I Sam. 28:3).

The giving and interpreting of dreams and visions is another form of God's intervention with people, as recorded in biblical accounts. Sometimes these involved mystical words and images, as was the case with Joseph in Egypt or Daniel in Babylon, almost as if the biblical pattern was to be a later encouragement for Jewish Cabalism and Muslim Sufism. Usually the dreams were more straightforward, like Joseph's in Bethlehem or Peter's in Joppa. Casting lots or picking marked arrows was an accepted practice, and the Scriptures generally speak positively of such actions. The mystical urim and thummim that most scholars think were small stones or bones carried in the priest's breastplate are frequently cited as a means of seeking a God-pleasing outcome, for example, in dividing up the land of Canaan among the tribes or in choosing out soldiers for a given assignment (Judg. 20:9; Num. 26:55).

Generally, amulets and incantations are condemned in Scripture. At Ephesus, Paul considered magical books, statuary, and amulets as worthy only of the fire and as misleading true believers in their search for God. In the same way, those who practiced magical or occult sciences, common throughout the Egyptian world, were strongly condemned, like Simon Magus and Elymas (Acts 8:9; 13:8).

Foretelling the future by omens was also generally condemned. Some of the commoner methods were to observe water in a dish or glass, to watch the formation of clouds, to determine the confluence of stars and planets, or to examine the flight of birds or the entrails of animals (Dan. 2:48; Gen. 30:27; Isa. 2:6). Scriptures for the most part approved of ordeals. Numbers 5:12-31 describes how a suspected wife proves her fidelity to her husband by bringing a sacrifice and mingling it with water and dust from the floor of the tabernacle. In fact, trials of one sort or another were so popular in the Scriptures that they persisted in Christian practice right through the Middle Ages. Even in our present culture, separating that which is religious, magical, superstitious, or merely cultural is an almost impossible task.

T.J.K.

MAGISTERIUM. A term used in the Roman Catholic Church referring to the teaching authority of the church. The pope and the bishops are regarded as direct successors of the apostles (see APOSTOLIC SUCCESSION), hence as continuing witnesses to and interpreters of the apostolic faith. This authority is deemed to have been conferred on the apostles and their successors by Jesus (Luke 22:31; Matt. 16:19; John 21:15-17). "Extraordinary magisterium" is exercised by the pope and ecumenical councils, whose pronouncements are regarded as infallible. "Ordinary magisterium" refers to doctrinal interpretations capable of revision as the bishops exercise their teaching role.

I.C.

MAGNIFICAT. Mary's hymn of thanksgiving and praise for the mighty acts of God and the revelation of God's salvation to Israel, in Luke 1:46-55. It is called the Magnificat because of its first word in Latin, "magnifies": "My soul magnifies the Lord." The song of Mary identifies Israel and Mary and stresses the love of God for the poor and humble. Its theme is the great reversal, the special favor of God shown to the weak of the earth. God's salvation comes to the wretched of the earth; rulers and the wealthy are cast down from their thrones and power. The Christ who is to come turns the world upside down.

The first two chapters of Luke are full of elevated poetry, songs, and hymns of spiritual power, beloved by the church in every generation. In these hymns Luke reconciles the majesty of the Christ-event with the lowly origins of Jesus among the poor. The Magnificat is Luke's synthesis of these two themes. Liturgically, the Magnificat is used as a canticle in the vespers service of the Catholic, Lutheran, and Episcopal churches. It is generally sung. Many musicians have elaborated on the Magnificat for church use.

J.C.

MAGOG. See GOG AND MAGOG.

MAHABHARATA. With the RAMAYANA, one of the two principal epics in the literature of HINDUISM. The Mahabharata is of great importance to students of religion for the light it casts on such ancient Hindu concepts as DHARMA, for the rich mythological material found in it, and for the immensely influential BHAGAVAD GITA, incorporated into the epic as its sixth book. Ascribed to Vyasa, the Mahabharata was probably composed in large part between 200 B.C. and A.D. 200.

The epic's nearly 100,000 verses center around rivalry between two branches of the royal house of Kuruksetra (the area of modern Delhi) for the throne. The great god KRISHNA, in AVATAR form, is an ally of the Pandava house against their cousins, the Kauravas. The Pandavas win after many vicissitudes to reign over an era of peace and justice before setting out toward the Himalayas to enter Indra's heaven.

Sections of the Mahabharata gave impetus to the exaltation of Krishna and VISHNU, and so to the rise of BHAKTI. But its supreme message is of the power of dharma, the eternal ordering of the world and the righteousness that accords with it.

R.E.

MAHANAIM. Said in Genesis 32:1-2 to have been named by Jacob, this village became the provincial capital of Gilead in Transjordan in later times (Josh. 13:26-30). Saul's son Ishbosheth was proclaimed king in exile there (II Sam. 2:8). Years later, when Absalom led a coup against him, David also fled across the Jordan to safety in Mahanaim (II Sam. 17:21-29).

W.S.T.

MAHARISHI MAHESH YOGA. See TRANSCENDENTAL MEDITATION.

MAHĀSATIPATTHĀNA SUTTA. A SUTRA that appears twice in the canon of scriptures in the Pali language. It gives a meditation technique for the production of an awareness of DUKKHA (human suffering), one of the FOUR NOBLE TRUTHS OF BUDDHISM. Through constant analysis of the motions of his body, the monk following this sutra becomes aware of, but detached from, his material form. For example, when breathing, the monk thinks to himself, "Breathing occurs." Meditation may concentrate on the body of the monk, or on the various stages in the processes of a corpse's decay. When this is mastered, the monk focuses his attention on his own emotions and perceptions. Gradually, craving can be eliminated, and the Buddha's Eightfold Path is followed to enlightenment.

K./M.C.

MAHAVIRA. The common title, meaning "Great Hero," of Vardhamana, founder of JAINISM. A contemporary of the BUDDHA, and like him of Kshatriya or warrior caste, Mahavira was born about 550 B.C. or 599 B.C. by traditional accounts. At age thirty he left the householder life to become a wandering religious mendicant. He practiced great asceticism, including nudity and prolonged fasting. After thirteen years he is said to have attained KAIVALYA, or full liberation, as understood in the teaching of Parsva (about the ninth century B.C.), whose successor Jains consider Mahavira to be. He became a jina, "conqueror," and TIRTHANKARA, or great teacher. Thereafter he occupied himself instructing and organizing disciples to lay the foundations of the Jain movement. He died at the age of seventy-two of the advanced Jain ascetic practice of self-starvation.

R.E.

MAHAYANA BUDDHISM. See BUDDHISM.

MAHDI. The messiah in ISLAM; especially important for SHI'ITES, who have always felt persecuted. Consequently, the coming of the Mahdi has long been a focus of their desire for justice. The Shi'ites believe that God commanded the last IMAM (a descendant of MUHAMMAD) to go into hiding until the proper time comes. He will return as Muhammad al-Mahdi and establish a just society under the guidance of God. However, various sects disagree as to who it is that will return (see IMAMIYYA; SAB'YYA). From time to time various people have been acclaimed as the Mahdi. Two of them led revolts against British colonialism. In late SUNNI tradition, the Mahdi is Jesus, who will return to earth to slay the ANTICHRIST.

K./M.C.

MAIMONIDES, MOSES. Considered the greatest Jewish philosopher and codifier of the Middle Ages. He was popularly known as RaM.BaM, from the initials of his Hebrew title and name, Rabbi Moses ben Maimon. Born in Cordoba, Spain, in 1135, Maimonides lived most of his life in Egypt, where he became the personal physician of Saladin, the sultan of Egypt. He became known for his great scholarship and as the greatest Talmudic authority of his time. His principal religious writings are a commentary to the Mishnah, a code of Jewish law, and The Guide for the Perplexed. His Mishnah commentary is a religious code of fourteen books, designed as a systematic summary of the legal formulations of the Talmud and other rabbinic writings. It was accepted as an authoritative code by most Jewish communities in Europe, Africa, and the Near East, and later was used by all codifiers and other scholars as the basis for their own works.

The Guide for the Perplexed attempted to harmonize the teachings of Judaism with the philosophy of Aristotle. The guide has exercised considerable influence on both Jewish and Christian thinkers. Maimonides' theology is summed up in his thirteen principles of faith. These affirm that (1) God is Creator and Guide; (2) he is uniquely One; (3) he is incorporeal (does not have a physical existence); (4) he is eternal; (5) God and God alone is to be worshiped; (6) God revealed his will through the prophets; (7) Moses was the greatest of all the prophets; (8) the Torah was revealed to Moses; (9) the Torah is eternal and unchangeable; (10) God is all-knowing; (11) he rewards and punishes; (12) the Messiah will surely come; and (13) the dead will be resurrected. L.K.

MAJOR ORDERS. See ORDERS AND ORDINATION.

MAJOR PROPHETS. See PROPHETS (MAJOR AND MINOR).

MALACHI. The Hebrew term for "my messenger," a title extracted from Malachi 3:1. Also the last of the so-called Minor PROPHETS of the Hebrew Bible.

Along with the so-called Deutero-Zechariah (Zechariah 9-11) and Trito-Zechariah (Zechariah 12-14), Malachi forms a work of anonymous prophecy that owes its present form to careful editorial work, which has made of them the final retouches of the book of the twelve minor prophets. Each of these three units is roughly the equal of the others, and each has the editorial introduction "an oracle" (compare Zech. 9:1; 12:1; Mal. 1:1). Regardless of the editorial work, it appears that the book of Malachi records, in substance, the voice of a single prophetic figure who was active in the postexilic Judea of restoration sometime during the Persian period after the rebuilding of the Temple in 516 B.C. and probably before the era of Ezra and Nehemiah, which began in 432 B.C. This prophetic collection has been divided into six dialogues between Yahweh (or the prophet speaking for Yahweh) and people, in which there is an intermingling of charges, responses, counter-responses, and threats. The six dialogues are: (1) Yahweh's love of Israel and rejection of Edom, which had proved to be the jackal to the lion of Babylon in the conquest of Judea (1:2-5); (2) Yahweh's condemnation of the Jerusalemite priesthood for its unworthy conduct of the cult and dereliction of its other duties (1:6-2:9); (3) Yahweh's condemnation of the people for the repudiation of the ancient covenant concerning alien marriages (2:10-17); (4) Yahweh's announcement of a coming purification of Temple and priesthood (2:1-5); (5) Yahweh's rebuke of the people's niggardly response to the cult, corresponding with the slovenliness of the priests (3:6-12); and (6) Yahweh's decree of a coming day of judgment, when the just will be vindicated and the wicked punished (3:13-21; 3:13-4:3 in the AV/RSV enumeration). A final 3:22-24 in the Hebrew Bible (Eng. Bible, 4:1-6), in which the messenger of the covenant of 3:1 is identified with a returning Elijah, is generally thought to be a later addition.

The prophetic level of Malachi is hardly that of the great figures who had appeared in the Israel and Judah before the Exile. It tends to repeat old formulas and to dwell on paltry shortcomings without much seeking of the underlying evils of which they were merely symptoms. It is as equally concerned with external proprieties as with the internal dispositions and moral conduct that defined true religion for the preexilic prophets. It is not certain whether 2:13-16, which on the surface seems to adopt an attitude toward monogamous marriage and an abhorrence of divorce rather superior to that of the rest of the OT and of subsequent Judaism, is not rather an idealized figure of speech referring to cultic purity. Even 1:11, which speaks of pure offerings made to Yahweh by the Gentiles, is less a prediction or affirmation of any such thing than it is a rhetorical device to underscore the inadequacies of the Jerusalem cult. It must be admitted, nevertheless, that in even entertaining the possibility of such offerings it shares something of the openness to universalism that was manifested by some elements of postexilic Judaism and rejected by others.

B. V.

MALCHUS. The name, given only in John (18:10), of the Jewish high priest's slave whose ear was cut off by a follower of Jesus at the time of Jesus' arrest (see Matt. 26:51; Mark 14:47; Luke 22:50-51—only Luke notes that Jesus healed him; Luke and John note it was the right ear; only John names Peter as the one who cut it). Noting the specific name in John may indicate either an early tradition or a tendency to name people as tradition develops. Malchus is a Syrian or Nabatean name, datum which may be relevant for social identification of slaves in ancient Judaism.

D. S.

MALTA. According to Acts 27:39-28:11 Malta, an island sixty miles south of Sicily, was the place Paul and his friends beached after their shipwreck. Here Paul did miracles and stayed three months (through the winter; compare 28:2, 11). Publius, the chief official (prōtos), a title attested by Greek and Latin inscriptions from Malta, entertained Paul. Ancient sources (for example, Scylax' Periplus, Diodorus of Sicily, and Cicero) attest the importance and excellence of Malta's harbors.

D. S.

MAMMON. An Aramaic Jewish term meaning "wealth" or "property," which occurs in the NT only in the words of Jesus (Matt. 6:24; Luke 16:9, 11, 13). Although in Jewish texts the term can be used neutrally, mammon (used frequently in the Targums) often connotes a sense of dishonesty or censure. Thus, it is not surprising that the two passages in the Gospels in which mammon occurs (Matt. 6 and Luke 16) imply a materialistic, anti-godly sense. In fact in the first two occurrences in Luke (16:9, 11) the expression used is "unrighteous mammon." The Gospel sayings concerning mammon stress the priority of one's devotion to God over money and one's responsibility to use one's money for others, especially the poor (Luke 16:9, 11; compare 12:33; 14:33; 16:19-31; 18:22).

D. S.

MAMRE. We first hear of this sacred grove in Genesis 13:18, when Abram camped by the "oaks" (or terebinths) of Mamre and built an altar to Yahweh there. The name is briefly understood to be that of an Amorite who owned the "oaks" (Gen. 14:13, 24), but subsequently it is always the name of the place of the altar and the oaks. Abraham and Sarah were camped there when the Lord's messengers brought the news of Sarah's impending conception (Gen. 18:1). The place, traditionally located just under two miles north of Hebron, achieved its lasting importance from its association with the tomb of the patriarchs, for the cave of Machpelah purchased by Abraham as a burying place for Sarah was "east of Mamre" (Gen. 23:17, 19). In Genesis 25:9, Abraham is buried there by his sons Isaac and Ishmael, and in due course, Isaac and Rebekah, their son Jacob, and his wife Leah are all interred there (Gen. 35:27-29; 49:30; 50:13).

W. S. T.

MAN. See HUMAN NATURE.

MANA. In many traditional religious cultures, an impersonal force believed to adhere to certain sacred places, objects, and persons. Mana gives power to those who possess it or are qualified to manipulate it, such as kings or priests, but can curse or destroy the incautious.

R. E.

MANASSEH. Originally, Manasseh seems to have been a most vital element in the formation of the Yahwistic Israelite federation in Palestine. It was composed of a people who inhabited both the east and the west banks of the Jordan (the two "half-tribes" who received their double share of the Promised Land according to the Deuteronomistic scheme of Josh. 13:29-31; 17:1-12). Whatever their origin and pre-Israelite history, the Manassehites were destined to recede in the accession of their cousins of EPHRAIM, at least on the west bank. The indications are that prior to the more warlike gestures inaugurated by the Ephraimites, Manasseh as a Yahwistic group sought a modus vivendi with the Canaanites (compare the story of Shechem in Judg. 9ff., etc.). As far as the east bank (Gilead) was concerned, something similar took place. In Judges 5:14 it is Machir rather than Manasseh who is a tribe in Israel: the Machir who according to Joshua 17:1-2 was the firstborn (that is, successor) to Manasseh and "father" of Gilead. Manasseh, in these acceptations, seems to have been a people doomed to a secondary memory in Israel's annals, despite nostalgic recollections to the contrary.

Manasseh was also the elder son of JOSEPH, according to the traditions of the Pentateuch, and thus the eponymous ancestor of one of the "Joseph" tribes (compare Gen. 49:22-26; Deut. 33:13-17).

Manasseh was also the longest-lived of all the kings of Judah (887-642 B.C.), the twelfth of the line of David, a source of embarrassment to the Deuteronomistic author of Kings for whom only good men should prosper while evildoers should perish quickly. There is no doubt about Manasseh's evildoing. He set out systematically to undo the reforming work in Judah initially achieved by his predecessor Hezekiah. The ease with which he was able to accomplish this was probably due to the disillusionment felt over Hezekiah's policy of resistance to Assyria, which had brought on invasion and devastation of the land under the Assyrian king Sennacherib. Under Manasseh, Judah became even more subservient to Assyria than it had been in the earlier days of Ahaz. Political alliance carried with it much else: erecting pagan altars in the house of the Lord in Jerusalem, worshipping the "host of heaven" (the astral deities of Assyria), resuming the Canaanite practice of the sacrifice of infants, and the fostering of other practices abominated by Yahwistic tradition (II Kings 21:1-9). Along with such alien ways of religion, alien morality went hand in hand (compare Jer. 7:9; Zeph. 1:8-9). The annals of the contemporary Assyrian kings Esarhaddon and his son Ashurbanipal confirm the fact of Manasseh's total subjection to their rule, and the pagan name given to his son and successor Amon speaks eloquently of the father's disposition. Second Kings 21:16 also claims that Manasseh was responsible for much bloodshed, without giving details.

It must be noted, however, that from the material standpoint, Manasseh's reign seems to have been a prosperous one for Judah. Assyrian domination guaranteed the peace, and Palestinian archaeology (of such sites as Mizpah and Debir) suggest economic and commercial well-being. It is difficult to evaluate the historical reliability of the story of II Chronicles 33:11-17, which tells of an exile and later conversion of Manasseh. Modern scholars no longer dismiss the Chronicler's deviations from Samuel-Kings as necessarily the product of a revisionist imagination, but this account can hardly be credited precisely as it stands; it probably has noted some events that were susceptible to other interpretations. B.V.

MANASSEH, PRAYER OF. This beautiful example of penitential prayer stands in the RSV Apocrypha just before I Maccabees. It was not part of the original Septuagint of the OT, so there is no reason to assume that this work enshrines any authentic memory of the life of the wicked Judean king MANASSEH (687-642 B.C.). The abominations and idolatries of Manasseh's long reign in Jerusalem are recounted in II Kings 21:1-18; indeed, the Deuteronomic historian blames the subsequent destruction of Jerusalem squarely on him (vv. 10-15). Oddly, however, Manasseh's image is refurbished somewhat in the later parallel account given in II Chronicles 33:1-20. There we learn that in Assyrian captivity Manasseh "humbled himself greatly before the God of his fathers" (v. 12). We are also told that the acts of Manasseh "and his prayer to his God" (v. 18) were recorded in the chronicles of the kings of Israel and in the chronicles of the seers. It seems evident that a devout Jew of some later generation provided the text of that missing prayer so that his people could see what kind of contrition would induce God to forgive so great a sinner. The prayer begins with an ascription to God the creator and motivator of repentance (vv. 1-8). The petitioner then acknowledges his sin (vv. 9-10), and beginning with the striking sentence, "And now I bend the knee of my heart," he earnestly asks forgiveness (vv. 11-13). He concludes with an expression of trust "that thou wilt save me in thy great mercy" (vv. 14-15). W.S.T.

MANDEANS. Early sect of Gnosticism of uncertain origin of which a small community survives in Iraq. Mandeans could be pre-Christian but probably originated in the first or second century A.D. Sometimes called St. John's Christians, because their literature exalts John the Baptist, they are also called Sabeans, from their repeated baptizings and the Aramaic word saba "to baptize," and Nasoraean, based on an esoteric commentary about generation, purification, and rebirth containing the name. Although hostile to Christians and Jews, they could be an early Christian sect. Mandeans believe in a dualism of soul (light) and body (darkness), respectively good and evil. Salvation is freeing the imprisoned soul. They believe their redeemer, Manda da Hayyé, the personified "Knowledge of Life," was victorious over earthly darkness and can guide souls through the heavenly realms. Frequent baptisms prepare one for ascension after death. They practice polygamy and allow female priests. Their sacred writings include the Ginza, which gives several conflicting creation accounts; Sidra de Yabya or John's Book, which claims John the Baptist was a Mandaean and Jesus a false messiah; the Qolasta, a collection of liturgies; and Sfar Malwašia, a collection of horoscopes and magical remedies. Mandeans differ markedly from Gnostics in making marriage and procreation sacred duties. C.M.

MANDALA. Mandalas are Hindu or Buddhist paintings in which deities or Buddhas and other sacred figures are arranged in geometric patterns, most commonly circular, to indicate their interrelationships, and to serve as focuses of meditation. (Mandala means "circle" in Sanskrit.) They are fundamental to the ritual and thought of the Tantric traditions (see TANTRISM) of both HINDUISM and BUDDHISM. Usually a mandala will center on a particular major deity or Buddha, then surround it with concentric circles or ranks of other divinities emanating from it, all with their appropriate symbols. Some mandalas, particularly Hindu, are abstract, like the well-known Sriyantra displaying the relation of SHIVA and his consort, who represents Shiva's energies and the phenomenal world, in the form of interlocking triangles.

Meditators use mandalas to aid concentration, to clear and steady the mind through the orderly vision of the transcendent world they impart, and above all to prepare one for the Tantric practice of evoking and visualizing deities in meditation. More broadly, mandalas can be thought of as graded passageways from this world to the supernal realms represented by divine or enlightened beings, as avenues from the particular to the universal, for the god-packed diagrams portray the intermediate, blissful level of reality between this world and Nirvana.

Temples are often constructed in mandala form, with the sacred images positioned to form what might be called a three-dimensional mandala. In the West, C. G. JUNG and his followers have shown considerable interest in the mandala as a symbol of psychological wholeness. R.E.

MANI. See MANICHAISM.

MANICHAISM. A syncretism of Gnosticism, Zoroastrianism, Buddhism, and Hinduism, originating in Persia through the teachings of Mani (about 216-276). Mani, a Persian scholar, received a divine call to preach his religious views when about thirty years old. He journeyed to China and India, and his views spread in the Roman Empire in the fourth and fifth centuries. Augustine of Hippo was a Manichaean for nine years. Mani, whose writings are now lost, was crucified by Persian rival religious factions. Manichaeism posed a universe of good light (spirit) and evil darkness (created world), ruled respectively by God and Satan locked in conflict. It represented human beings as bits of spirit imprisoned in bodies made by Satan. Liberation of the spirit meant salvation. Manichaeism considered sex an evil activity of the body, not of the real person. The Manichaean perfecti, expecting imminent liberation, took vows of vegetarianism and abstinence from sex and flesh. The hearers lived normal lives, expecting to be reincarnated eventually as perfecti and finally liberated with all spirit. They taught that since the body is evil, Christ was never really incarnated. After his Christian conversion Augustine wrote fourteen major works and other pieces against Manichaeism. C.M.

MAÑJUŚRĪ. A BODHISATTVA who embodies insight and wisdom; the object of popular veneration in MAHAYANA BUDDHISM. He is apparently an invention of later Buddhist thought and became popular in writing and art only after the third century A.D. He is depicted as a young man with a five-pointed headdress or tiara. In his right hand he holds a sword for slaying ignorance and in his left hand a copy of the Prajñāpāramitā SUTRAS. He has been associated with the mountain Wu-t'ai-shan in Shansi province, northeast China. In Japan he is important only in the TENDAI school. Sometimes Mañjuśrī appears in dreams and meditative visions to help those who seek enlightenment. K./M.C.

MANNA. Of uncertain origin, in Exodus 16:14 it is given a popular etymology man hu, meaning, "what is it?" Manna was the miraculous food on which the Israelites were fed during their journey from Egypt into Canaan according to the biblical history of the EXODUS and conquest.

Those who seek a historical reason for the biblical story of the Exodus point to the fact that a desert plant known as the tamarix mannifera (named, of course, from the biblical story of the manna) produces, under certain conditions, an edible discharge, which with a certain tolerance could be termed "bread from heaven" (the expression customarily used for the manna in the OT). Whatever may be the "natural" accounting for the manna, it is certain that the vagrant droppings of the tamarisk could never have sustained a sizable population in the desert.

In any case, the later strata of the Pentateuchal history have so enlarged upon the original fact, if fact there was, that there is no possibility of retrieving it for history. The manna, in these acceptations, fell every day except on the Sabbath: on the day before, a double amount would fall, and the manna would rot if it were preserved contrary to ritual prescriptions (Exod. 16:4-8, 22-30). It was a food of infinite taste (Exod. 16:31), a prelude to Wisdom 16:20-21: "providing every pleasure and suited to every taste . . . ministering to the desire of the one who took it . . . changed to suit every one's liking." Here and elsewhere there is no purpose in trying to separate fact from interpretation. "Manna," whatever may have been its beginnings in historical experience, has become a wholly theological note.

In the NT the "bread from heaven" of the OT is contrasted principally in John 6 with the "heavenly bread," which Jesus alone can give. This is Johannine irony, part and parcel of a subtlety that runs throughout the Fourth Gospel. While the manna only (apparently) fell from heaven and sustained natural life only, the bread that Jesus gives is truly heavenly, for it is to heavenly life that it leads.

B.V.

MANOAH. This Israelite of the tribe of Dan figures only in connection with the miraculous birth and tragic death of his son Samson. Except for the report in Judges 16:31 that Samson was buried with his father in a tomb somewhere between "Zorah and Eshtaol," Manoah is mentioned only in Judges 13. There we learn that his barren wife received word from a "man of God" that she would conceive and that the son would become a man of destiny (compare Gen. 18:1-15; 21:1-7; I Sam. 1-3; Luke 1-2). In due course Manoah also met "the man of God" who had spoken to his wife (Judg. 13:8-10). After questioning the "man" about the Nazirite discipline into which the son was to be raised, he asked the stranger for his name. When the "man" said, "Why do you ask my name, seeing it is wonderful?" (v. 18), and then ascended on a flame, Manoah knew that it was "an angel of the Lord" (v. 21). W.S.T.

MAN OF SIN. See ANTICHRIST.

MANTRA. The word mantra, meaning literally "instrument of thought," is used in both HINDUISM and BUDDHISM to indicate verbal formulas—chants, hymns, or words—recited primarily because of the power of the sound itself to evoke spiritual force or to align oneself with a particular deity. In the VEDIC world view, sound was the fundamental constituent of the universe. Sounds that harmonized, as it were, with major lines of force—the great gods and reality itself—could unite one's sacrifice and mind to that same reality. The hymns of the RIG VEDA were such mantras. According to the UPANISHADS, the supreme syllable is Om, the sound that evokes BRAHMAN, the universal Sole Reality.

In later devotional Hinduism, mantras with specific references to the great bhaktic gods emerged. In Tantric Hinduism and Buddhism alike, mantras are of immense importance (see TANTRISM). Their recitation is usually an essential feature, combined with visualization techniques of evocational meditation—a prominent aspect of the path of Tantric YOGA. Non-Tantric yoga has also found mantra recitation to be of great value in its exercises. On the other hand, the ease with which the simple, nontechnical use of mantras can be pursued has made them prevalent in popular religion as well.

The Tantric Buddhist mantra Om mani padme hum, "Hail the jewel in the lotus," is chanted and found on countless prayer flags and prayer wheels wherever Tibetan Buddhism has spread. Characteristically, it has several levels of meaning. The Pure Land Buddhist chant, Namu Amida Butsu (Japanese; "Hail Amida Buddha"), is essentially a mantra, and the saving Amida Buddha it invokes is ultimately to be identified with Reality itself.

Apart from its Judeo-Christian parallels, such as the Eastern Orthodox JESUS PRAYER, mantra recitation has found some modern following in the West, especially among practitioners of YOGA and TRANSCENDENTAL MEDITATION.

R.E.

MANUAL OF DISCIPLINE. See DEAD SEA SCROLLS.

MANU, LAWS OF. This work, the Manavadharma-sastra or Manu Smṛti in its original Sanskrit, is a very important Hindu legal manual dating from between 200 B.C. and A.D. 100. It is ascribed to Manu, the Hindu primal man. Its twelve chapters span a very wide range of political, ethical, and ritual topics, offering an invaluable insight into classical Hindu society and mentality, as well as delving into such philosophical matters as KARMA and MOKSHA.

In particular, the book establishes clear links between Hindu religious views and society. In part, the Laws of Manu may be a Hindu response to the challenge of BUDDHISM and JAINISM, which tended to undercut belief in such social expressions of HINDUISM as CASTE and sacred kingship by emphasizing liberation as the only significant goal of life. But the Laws of Manu stress observing caste as necessary to the smooth ordering of the world and the gaining of merit for this world and the next rebirth. The problem of reconciling one's obligation to the social order with the quest for individual liberation is dealt with by the doctrine of the four ashramas, or stages of life: student, householder, forest-dweller, wandering ascetic. The influence of the Laws of Manu on subsequent Hindu thought and life has been immense.

R.E.

MANUSCRIPTS OF THE BIBLE. See BIBLE, TEXT OF.

MĀRA. A demon who represents death in BUDDHISM and HINDUISM; also known as Namuci, the Tempter. In Hinduism, he is a common figure in the VEDAS and the later epic poems. In Buddhist scriptures, he represents the temptations of pleasure and attachment to the world, which lead to death (and endless rebirth). Māra is depicted as tempting Gautama the BUDDHA, trying to lead him away from enlightenment. Mara tried to lead the Buddha into the sensual life of health and comfort involved in Hinduism. The Buddha responded by steadfast dedication to truth and goodness. The Buddha triumphed and achieved enlightenment, but later Māra tempted him again. This time Māra presented the way of asceticism and self-denial. The Buddha rejected this path as ineffective and unworthy and as encouraging attachment to the world. He followed instead the middle way between asceticism and indulgence.

K./M.C.

MARANATHA. An Aramaic expression meaning "Our Lord, come!" used by Paul in I Corinthians 16:22. From the Didache (or Teaching of the Twelve Apostles) we gather that maranatha was a liturgical expression like the Hebrew "Hosanna" or "Amen." It is probably an invocation or prayer for the Second Coming of Christ.

J.C.

MARCEL, GABRIEL (1889–1973). French Catholic philosopher with affinities to EXISTENTIALISM. He was not, however, content with any narrow restriction of philosophy to human existence alone, and his views stand in sharp contrast to those of SARTRE. Human existence, Marcel believed, merges into mystery, a term he used for a reality that can never be grasped objectively or exhaustively, because we ourselves are involved in that reality. The sciences deal with manageable problems, which can be grasped and analyzed, but philosophy treats the mystery of human existence and its place in the scheme of things.

Parallel to the distinction between mystery and problem is that between being and having. The fulfillment of the human being is to be, but we are sidetracked by our concern with having, though in fact the increase of possessions leads to increasing anxiety and is finally enslaving. Marcel differs from Sartre also in his rejection of individualism. Human existence takes place not in the isolated "I" but in the "we," and Marcel stresses the role of engagement and fidelity in encouraging the transcendence and enhancement of human beings. Also, he does not believe that God puts a block in the way of human transcendence but is rather its goal.

He has summarized the connection of his thought in the words "person—engagement—community—reality." We must transcend the limits of a narrowly egocentric existence to join with others, and this transcendence does not stop short until it arrives at the wider being of God. Marcel's method is to engage in detailed and subtle phenomenological analyses of aspects of human existence, such as hope or fidelity, and to show that these carry ontological implications pointing us in the direction of theism (see PHENOMENOLOGY and ONTOLOGY).

Courtesy of the Trustees of the British Museum

Assyrian relief of Marduk fighting Tiamat, from Kalakh

J.M.

MARCION (about A.D. 85–160). Founder of the Marcionite church and compiler of an early NT canon. Born in Sinope, Asia Minor, probably of Christian parentage, Marcion became a rich ship-owner and gave the congregation at Rome a large gift when he joined. Controversy arose when he rejected the OT and preached against Rome's moral laxity. Excommunicated about A.D. 144, he started his own church in Asia Minor. Marcion was Gnostic in outlook, regarding this world and human affairs as evil. According to Marcion a demiurge created this earth, not God. Jesus was not incarnate; he merely seemed to be human. There was no resurrection; the body is evil. Salvation is spiritual liberation from this world. Marcion's followers rejected earthly things, festivities, marriage, meat, wine, and adornment. Only celibates were baptized. Marcion compiled a NT canon consisting of his own Antitheses (contrasting the OT to the NT on love, justice, and so forth), an expurgated Gospel of Luke, and ten expurgated letters of Paul. He omitted what did not promote love. Marcionism flourished, rivaled Rome, but faded in the fifth century when Manichaeism was popular. Marcion forced Christianity to declare a canon and to compose the Apostles' Creed over against GNOSTICISM.

C.M.

MARDUK. The chief god of the Babylonian pantheon. Marduk was the son of the creator god, En-lil, but he rose to the status of king of the gods by leading them to victory over the ocean dragon, Tiamat. Marduk was known to OT writers as Bel and Merodach (Jer. 50:2; see also the Apocryphal addition to Daniel, "Bel and the Dragon").

W.S.T.

MARI. An ancient crossroads city on the Euphrates, halfway between Babylon, Harran, and Damascus. It is now known as Tell Hariri. Abraham doubtless passed this way with his flocks en route from Ur to Harran, though the city is not mentioned in the Bible. It flourished between about 3000 and 1700 B.C., and in its heyday was more important than Babylon.

W. F. Albright surveyed the tell for excavation in 1932, and M. A. Parrot began excavating it for the Louvre in 1935. The site sheds significant light on the culture of the patriarchal period. Some of the more significant finds include a huge temple or ziggurat dedicated to ISHTAR, a royal palace of more than three hundred rooms, and a library of twenty thousand tablets in Sumero-Akkadian. These tablets describe the trade, religion, and customs of Sumeria and remarkably parallel accounts in the OT.

Courtesy of The University Museum, University of Pennsylvania

Istput-ilum, of Mari

Genesis 11:2 may refer to the culture of Mari when it speaks of men who came from the east and "found a plain in the land of Shinar and settled there," making their buildings of burned brick. Marians were skilled at carpentry, stone carving, masonry, and pottery. They grew grain and fruit. They fished and tended flocks. They brought new techniques of building dams, dikes, and canals, both for irrigation and navigation. They developed high levels of mathematics, astronomy, literature, law, and religion. Mari was a central melting pot between the Indo-European cultures of Persia and India, like those of the Hurrians and Hittites, and their west Semitic neighbors farther up the Fertile Crescent, and Akkadians and Arameans.

Once ruled by the kings of Ur, Mari became independent about 2020 B.C. Hammurabi conquered it in 1765 B.C., but when it tried to regain independence, it was totally leveled. T.J.K.

MARIJUANA. Cannabis sativa (Linnaeus, 1753), a weed-like plant, also known as Indian hemp, which grows widely and has psychoactive properties. The first use of hemp as an euphoriant (that is, a drug giving psychological pleasure) is recorded in the Herbal, (fourth century B.C.).

Marijuana has been widely used and abused in North America and the West generally since the 1960s, when its use spread from criminals and musicians' circles to college students. Severe legal penalties for its sale have been the rule, although more recent legislation has reduced the punishment for simply using it. A vast literature on the plant exists. In 1971, the Commission on Narcotic Drugs produced a bibliography of two thousand titles and the list still grows. Known popularly as "weed" or "grass," marijuana is connected with hedonism today. Some historical data seem to show the plant was used in mystical religious practices in ancient India. J.C.

MARIOLOGY. See BLESSED VIRGIN MARY.

MARITAIN, JACQUES (1882–1973). Roman Catholic philosopher, who led the neo-scholastic revival of THOMISM and became one of the foremost contemporary interpreters of Thomas Aquinas. Born in Paris of Protestant parents, he was influenced by Henri Bergson while at the Sorbonne and, with his Jewish wife, Raissa, his close intellectual and spiritual collaborator, was converted to Roman Catholicism by Léon Bloy. Maritain became professor of philosophy at the Institut Catholique de Paris in 1914 and taught also at Toronto, Columbia, Chicago, Notre Dame, and Princeton. His books in English include: True Humanism (1938), A Preface to Metaphysics (1939), Existence and the Existent (1948), Approaches to God (1954), St. Thomas Aquinas (1958), and The Degrees of Knowledge (1959).

Maritain bases his thought on ARISTOTLE and AQUINAS but draws also on the social and physical sciences. The object of human thought is being itself, but metaphysics must not eclipse sense experience in knowing, nor should preoccupation with human existence obscure our relation to the existent, to being, and to God. In moral and social philosophy, Maritain maintains that Christian faith discloses a true humanism fulfilling that which is perceived by natural reason. He strongly affirms democracy as the best political order but believes the inspiration of the gospel is needed. Art for Maritain continues the divine work of creation and will become sterile if, in seeking "pure art," it cuts itself off from experience, nature, and God. Though profoundly intellectual, Maritain remained a very spiritual person who was, like his mentor Bloy, "a pilgrim of the absolute." C.Mc.

MARK, GOSPEL OF. The earliest of the four Gospels to be written, according to the most generally accepted understanding of the SYNOPTIC GOSPELS and their interrelationships.

The Traditional View sees this Gospel as the product of John Mark acting as Peter's interpreter and associate when the Apostle was in Rome, A.D. 65, at the time of Nero's persecution. The simplest way of looking at the Gospel's life setting is to regard it as a deposit of Peter's teaching. Jerome, for example, so regarded it in his celebrated phrase, "Peter spoke, he [Mark] wrote it down"; and more than one commentator has followed C. H. Dodd's lead in viewing the Gospel as an elaboration of the historical details given in Peter's speech in Acts 10:36-43.

In this view the Gospel was put together after Peter's martyrdom, and it stresses, above all, the cost of discipleship, as that price had been paid by the martyrs of the Roman church. Irenaeus, bishop in Gaul (around A.D. 200), wrote, "After their deaths [Peter's, Paul's], Mark, the disciple and interpreter of Peter, himself also handed down to us in writing the things which Peter had proclaimed." The appeal of the Gospel, according to this proposed life setting, is essentially that of a historical narrative, traced back to an eyewitness and intended to convey through this narrative an encouragement to a persecuted church at a time of trial.

The New Look at Mark's Gospel. Three sets of inquiry in the present century have combined virtually to demolish this simplistic understanding of Mark's Gospel. They are: (a) the literary analysis of Mark associated with form criticism, which had its avowed object in placing each section (or pericope) of Mark in a suitable life setting in the early church. This analysis suggested that the stories and sayings of Jesus first circulated as small independent units before being brought together into the final edition of the Gospel. Coupled with this approach was the contention that the connecting links or seams that joined the isolated units of Mark's Gospel do not rest on historical reminiscence or geographical or temporal fact, but are editorial additions supplied by the evangelist who often gathered his material on the topical basis of common subject matter, like the collections of "controversy stories" (chaps. 2, 3) or "miracle stories" (chaps. 4, 5).

(b) A second consequence directly followed. The earlier view of Mark's Gospel as a transcript of uninterpreted history gained its support from the use made of the Gospel in the so-called "Life of Jesus" research. The liberal "quest of the historical Jesus," as ALBERT SCHWEITZER chronicled it, set its aim as the recovery of a life of Jesus in history, largely free from miraculous happenings and with a sequence of one event in Gospel history following another in a cause-and-effect pattern. In the hands of some of our modern writers this somewhat naïve understanding of Jesus as a simple Galilean peasant-preacher was shattered, and his image was remade as an apocalyptic herald of a cataclysmic kingdom. Mark's Gospel, with its MESSIANIC SECRET, became a book of profound (Markan) theology in which history was made subservient to a dogmatic theory, namely that only after the Resurrection was the messiahship of Jesus revealed. The liberal portrait of Jesus was shown to be a piece of idealistic speculation. BULTMANN was to reject all use of Mark as a way of access to the inner life of the historical Jesus.

(c) W. Marxsen brought the form critic's skepticism to a more positive position with an epoch-making theory, which introduced redaction criticism in 1956 with a book on Mark the Evangelist. This newer approach to Markan studies had the effect of assessing the role of the evangelist as a theologian in his own right. It saw him less as a faithful scribe and reporter of Petrine memoirs and much more as a theological teacher in the church. To be sure, Mark is thought to have used traditions about Jesus but to have stamped them with his own theological and pastoral imprint, whether by selective emphasis or by editorial adaptation (hence the name redaction or compositional criticism marking a distinct advance on form criticism, which was content to think of John Mark as a faceless, "anonymous" scribe). (Compare BIBLICAL CRITICISM.)

These three influences, particularly the advent of redaction criticism, have been generally applauded. There would be scholarly agreement that henceforth Mark must be read as a theological book addressing a set of serious problems in the church of his day. Much less consensus is evident when we press the inquiry about the nature of the catalyst that provoked this Gospel's publication and give a reason for its leading themes.

The agreements are first worth rehearsing. They include the following items: (a) Mark collected a body of isolated paragraphs, and he was the first person we know to have published them in connected sequence to form a narrative of Jesus' life. Mark is usually taken to be the first Gospel to be written. Recent challenges to Mark's priority still lack full persuasive power to overthrow this conviction. (b) The title of "Gospel" (1:1) for his book is also his own creation; he innovated this, since before his time "gospel" meant the oral proclamation of the apostles. (c) The story of Jesus' passion occupies a disproportionate amount of space for a special reason. Evidently Mark wanted to emphasize the "theology of the cross," partly to encourage the martyr church of his own day but chiefly to show how central Jesus' death was in the church's ministry, liturgy, and service, possibly in the face of false ideas current in his time. Marxsen's theory has focused on this unusual but undeniable feature of Mark's storyline: he composed his Gospel "backwards," that is, with the end in view right from the beginning, seen in 1:14; 2:20; 3:6. (d) Mark the evangelist is much more than a historian offering a biography of Jesus (though this term has recently been reclaimed in the light of Hellenistic society's interest in the "lives" of famous persons). Mark stands out preeminently as a theologian whose use of traditional materials to do with Jesus' earthly career served a pointed intention, namely to proclaim the good news—the gospel—in written form. His literary activity raises the fascinating question, What was it that compelled Mark to set down this report of Jesus' ministry as a basis for his preaching of the gospel?

In some new studies the question has been considerably broadened. What kind of person in what kind of primitive Christian group would have been motivated to produce this kind of writing? Answers fall under three main headings.

(a) Apologetic interest. Mark is believed to have a concern for his fellow Christians in Syria or Rome who were puzzled over the political events preceding the Jewish war of A.D. 66-73. The apologetic thrust of this Gospel has taken the shape of a philosophy of history offered to sustain the faith of bewildered Christians, upset by the threat of persecution or confused by the claims of nationalist Jews, the Zealots who urged armed rebellion against Rome. Mark's chief retort is to assert Jesus' teaching on the divine kingdom, which is peaceable and yet will soon be established by Jesus' return in power. There is also a revival of interest in Jesus' role as apocalyptic Son of man in this theory.

(b) Pastoral motives. The inner life of Mark's church was, in this view, split by faction and strife and was faced by a variety of pressing pastoral needs. These were caused mainly by the tension of Jewish Christian believers in Jerusalem who clung to their association with the earthly family of Jesus and his first disciples. Some have studied Mark to find therein echoes of pastoral disputes centered on missionary preaching and living, family ties and earthly possessions, and above all the claims of a Davidic messianism (10:46-52; 11:10; 12:35-37) and a veneration of the Jerusalem Temple. Peter's role as spokesperson of a "theology of glory," which Mark strongly opposes, has been accentuated and rightly calls our attention to the theological issues that are debated in the various dialogues of this Gospel, especially in 8:27-33.

(c) Christological disputes. More promising is the appreciation of Mark's Gospel as a proclamation of the person of Jesus Christ in narrative form. We are to think of his Gospel as refuting false notions of a Davidic messiah or, more adequately, as stressing Jesus' person as truly human, set over against the idea that he was a "divine man" or a Hellenistic magician. His full share in our human life even to death repels the idea of a phantom-like figure cherished by some Christian groups called Gnostics or Docetists (I John 4:2-3). Above all, the picture of Jesus as obedient Son of God and Suffering Servant provided a model for authentic Christian living in terms of self-denial and sacrifice (8:34-37). The last mentioned emphasis brings us to the heart of this Gospel. We are encouraged to read the "good news according to Mark" as a transcript in story form of Paul's teaching of "dying to live" with Christ, whose earthly career is cast by Mark in the pattern of rejection-vindication, a two-beat rhythm also used by Paul in his statements of Christian existence (for example, II Cor. 4:7-12).

R.M.

MARK, JOHN. The traditional author of the Second Gospel, based on the earliest known allusion to the Gospel.

Mark's Association with Peter. Early church testimony says three things that have formed the substance of much modern debate on the relation of Mark to the Gospel that bears his name. First, it traces back to Peter's teaching one of the sources that Mark used. Then, it remarks that Mark himself had no firsthand knowledge of the sayings or deeds of Jesus but was dependent on eyewitnesses. Third, the information Mark picked up was gleaned in the course of his work as Peter's hermeneutês, "translator" or "interpreter."

Modern discussion has generally been skeptical about PAPIAS' testimony, regarding it as either a fiction or highly biased; but it still has its supporters.

Mark's Identity in the Early Church. On a traditional understanding of the evidence, John Mark is the person known to us from the record of Acts (12:12, 25; 13:5, 13; 15:37, 39) and the writings ascribed to Paul (Col. 4:10; Philem. 24; II Tim. 4:11) and Peter (I Pet. 5:13).

On leaving Jerusalem, Mark spent some time with Paul as a member of his team (Acts 13:5). Relations with Paul were later broken off, with some bitterness (Acts 15:39). The result was that BARNABAS, out of loyalty to his cousin Mark, separated from Paul and went off with Mark to Cyprus.

Later Mark was restored to Paul's favor, according to Colossians 4:10, and the tradition reflected in II Timothy 4:11 speaks similarly of a reinstatement to Apostolic service. If this occurred at the time Paul was in Rome, the datum of I Peter 5:13 attests Mark's link with Peter, if that verse is correctly understood as referring to the imperial city.

Later church tradition brought Mark to Alexandria, where he died. At a much later period his memorial was taken to Venice, where he became the patron saint under the figure of a winged lion.

R.M.

MARK OF CAIN. According to the primeval legend of Genesis 4, when Yahweh condemned Cain for slaying his brother Abel, Cain cried out, "My punishment is greater than I can bear. . . . I shall be a fugitive and a wanderer on the earth, and whoever finds me will slay me" (Gen. 4:13-14). The Lord then made provision for Cain's safe passage by putting a mark on him and by threatening sevenfold vengeance upon anyone who would slay the marked Cain (v. 15). Since time immemorial, those who study the Bible have speculated on what the protective mark might have been. Extrapolating backward from the customs of modern Bedouins, many scholars now argue that the narrator had a tattoo in mind. If Cain was connected in the popular mind with the Kenites, those original Yahwists who dwelt along the southern borders of Judah (Judg. 1:16), perhaps his mark provided an explanation or etiology for body adornment practiced by that tribe. Be that as it may, like other biblical "marks" (the blood of the Passover lamb on the doorpost of Israel in Egypt, Exod. 12:13; the mark that the Lord commanded Ezekiel to make on the foreheads of the righteous, Ezek. 9:4, 6), this one was designed to ward off evil. W.S.T.

MARKS OF THE CHURCH. Understood traditionally as unity, holiness, catholicity, and apostolicity, the marks of the church derive from the Nicene Creed, adopted at Nicea (325) and modified at Constantinople (381). The Roman Catholic church claims to be the one true Church of Christ because it possesses these four attributes: unity as a single society professing one faith and in communion with the pope; holiness as imparted by Christ through the Roman Catholic church; catholicity as universality through time and around the world belonging to those in communion with Rome; and apostolicity through the uninterrupted succession of popes from Christ and Peter.

The Lutheran, Reformed, and Anglican traditions affirm the same marks of the church, emphasizing the presence of Jesus Christ in the church as his body that gives unity, holiness, catholicity, and apostolicity. The Anglican interpretation is closer to that of Rome, while Lutheran and Reformed teachings underscore the preaching of God's Word, the right administration of the sacraments, the presence of the Holy Spirit, and the response of faith in the covenant community of Christ. In varying ways, these latter characteristics manifest the marks of the church in free-church and sectarian sectors of Protestantism. (For recent expositions of the marks of the church, see Karl Barth, Church Dogmatics and Hans Küng, The Church.) C.Mc.

MARRANOS. A term applied to "new Christians," Jews who were forced to convert by persecutions in Spain and Portugal. Suspected of practicing Judaism in private and Christianity in public, they were targets of the Spanish INQUISITION, a religious court established in 1480 by Ferdinand and Isabella to root out heresy. The property of heretics was confiscated, and they were condemned to various penances. Those who refused to repent were burnt at the stake. In the late 1480s, inquisitors using threats of torture extracted confessions concerning a blood libel (the case of the "infant of La Guardia"—although no corpse was ever discovered), which set the stage for the expulsion of Jews from Spain in 1492.

But not all Marranos were secret Jews. Many were devout Catholics and had no intention of changing their faith; others were religiously ambiguous or apathetic; still others were passive Jews. Eventually they escaped to more tolerant countries, and the secret Jews publicly embraced Judaism. The SEPHARDIM communities of the West were founded mainly by escaping Marranos. L.K.

MARRIAGE. The union of a man and a woman. In the Bible, marriage also symbolizes the relationship of God and people.

The Marriage Covenant. In the Bible, marriage is a COVENANT, a relationship of a special type, entered into by two people. In the ancient Near East there were no hospitals, doctors, police, or paramedics. Each FAMILY, therefore, had to take care of all the needs of each of its members. It was understood that all the members of a family would share whatever they had with any other family member who was in need. All family members would risk their own lives to protect the life of another family member. Thus those who were members of a family knew that they could count on their family to help them whenever necessary. They in return would help family members when necessary. This sort of relationship made life possible in a geographic area where just surviving could be difficult.

But what about the traveler, the person too far from family to be helped by them? Or the young man or woman who married someone in a different family? This is where the covenant came in. The biblical covenant is an agreement between those who have not previously been members of the same family. They agree that they will, from now on, be to each other as family and do for each other as they would for any other family member. The making of such a covenant usually involved the shedding of the blood of an animal, as when Abraham covenanted with God (Gen. 15). This cutting in two of an animal could have the meaning, "May the Lord so do to me if I am not as faithful to you as a brother or sister, parent or child, husband or wife."

The marriage covenant between a man and a woman was that they, who had not been of the same family, would now be family to each other. They would love each other and care for each other, even to the giving of their lives. The families of the bride and groom also covenanted that they would be as family to the newcomer. Thus the lives of the young couple and their children could have stability and permanence.

Faithfulness is also part of the marriage covenant. The prophet Malachi speaks to his people who are complaining that the Lord does not seem to be looking on them favorably. Malachi (2:14) explains to them why this is: "Because the Lord was witness to the covenant between you and the wife of your youth, to whom you have been faithless, though she is your companion and your wife by covenant."

The Marriage Arrangements. Planning for the Marriage. When Isaac reached the age to be married, his father, Abraham, was afraid he might marry a Canaanite woman who did not follow the living God. So he asked a servant to go back to their home country to find a wife for Isaac from among their own people (Gen. 24:1-67). This servant was afraid that the young woman would not choose to come with him. "Perhaps the woman may not be willing to follow me to this land," he said. But Abraham assured him that the God who had spoken to him and made promises to him would send an angel to prepare the way. So the servant went to the city of Nahor in Mesopotamia and asked the Lord to give him a sign by having the young woman of the Lord's choosing come to the well and draw water for him. Rebekah came to the well, drew water for him, and invited him to spend the night with her family. When the servant reached her home and explained his mission, Rebekah's family believed this to be the work of the Lord. They were willing that she should go, but they wanted to make sure that she was also willing. They said, "We will call the maiden, and ask her." And they called Rebekah and said to her, "Will you go with this man?" She said, "I will go."

The Betrothal. In the NT, Mary is spoken of as a virgin who is betrothed to Joseph: "Now the birth of Jesus Christ took place in this way. When his mother Mary had been betrothed to Joseph, before they came together she was found to be with child of the Holy Spirit" (Matt. 1:18). Luke speaks of her as "a virgin betrothed to a man whose name was Joseph" (1:27). To be betrothed meant to have made an agreement that a marriage would take place in the future. Betrothal was a time of preparation for the marriage.

The Marriage Ceremony. A procession often started the festivities. The groom and his family and friends left his home to meet the bride, who was approaching with her family and friends (I Macc. 9:39). Musical instruments and singing may have added to the gaiety (Ps. 78:63). The marriage ceremony might be held in the house of the bride (Gen. 29:22) or of the groom (Matt. 22). The wedding feast often went on for days. Judges 14:12 mentions a wedding feast that lasted seven days. Tobit 8:20 mentions one that lasted two weeks.

Marriage Customs. Monogamy. The marriage of one man to one woman seems to be basic in the Bible. The Creation story in Genesis tells of the first marriage in clearly monogamous terms (2:24): "a man leaves his father and his mother and cleaves to his wife." The love of one man for one woman is also celebrated in the Song of Solomon. The Ten Commandments warn against looking beyond one's own marriage toward others (Exod. 20:17): "You shall not covet your neighbor's wife." Leviticus states (20:10) that if a man commits ADULTERY with the wife of his neighbor, both the adulterer and adulteress shall be put to death. The man who serves as a priest must be married to only one woman, a woman who is a virgin at the time of her marriage (Lev. 21:13). Psalm 128 speaks of the happiness of the person who fears the Lord and walks in his ways: "Your wife will be like a fruitful vine within your house. . . . Thus shall the man be blessed who fears the Lord." Proverbs 31:10-31 speaks of the good wife who manages her household well: "She is far more precious than jewels; the heart of her husband trusts in her; . . . strength and dignity are her clothing, and she laughs at the time to come."

All the marriages in the NT seem to be of one man and one woman: Mary and Joseph, Elizabeth and Zechariah, Priscilla and Aquila. A bishop is to be above reproach, the husband of one wife (I Tim. 3:2). Deacons also must be the husband of only one wife (3:12). The writer of I Timothy goes on to warn against those "who forbid marriage . . . which God created to be received with thanksgiving. . . . For everything created by God is good" (4:3-4). The apostle Paul apparently felt that it was best for him to remain unmarried in order that he might devote his time to the furtherance of the gospel. He even expresses a wish that others might do the same (I Cor. 7:7). He apparently spoke in this way because he felt that the Lord might return any day, that there was much to be done to prepare, and that there were many difficult times to get through before that day. He writes (I Cor. 7:26-27): "I think that in view of the impending distress it is well for a person to remain as he is. Are you bound to a wife? Do not seek to be free. Are you free from a wife? Do not seek marriage." But he does encourage those who feel that they should marry to do so (7:9). Paul urges each husband to love his wife as he loves his own body (Eph. 5:28) and each wife to respect her husband (5:33). The writer of Hebrews (13:4) urges, "Let marriage be held in honor among all, and let the marriage bed be undefiled; for God will judge the immoral and adulterous."

Polygamy. The Bible also speaks of situations in which a man had more than one wife or had a wife plus CONCUBINES. The dangers of the seminomadic way of life in Israel's early days often resulted in there not being enough men for each woman to have a husband. The wealthier men might therefore take additional wives. This gave them the chance to have more children to love and to be loved by. The children could by their labors further increase the family's well-being. Children were considered a gift of the Lord (Ps. 127:3).

The writer of Genesis (29:9-28) recounts how Jacob worked seven years to gain Rachel as his wife because he loved her, only to find that he had been tricked into marrying her older sister Leah. He then worked another seven years to win his beloved Rachel, and thus had two wives. David, after he had reigned over Judah for seven years, captured the city of Jerusalem from the Jebusites and began to reign over all Israel. At that time, according to the writer of II Samuel (5:13), David added to his household more concubines and wives from the city of Jerusalem. The writer of I Kings (11:3) states that Solomon had seven hundred wives and three hundred concubines. Rehoboam had, according to II Chronicles 11:21, eighteen wives and sixty concubines.

But the practice of having more than one wife was never advocated by biblical writers. Through the prophet Malachi (2:15) the Lord says: "let none be faithless to the wife of his youth." Provisions were made, however, so that when a man did take more than one wife his property might be divided rightfully. Deuteronomy 22:15-17 states that if a man has two wives, one liked and the other disliked, he cannot favor the son of the favored wife to the detriment of the son of the other wife.

Intermarriage. Intermarrying with persons who worshiped idols would pose a threat to the covenant relationship of God's faithful people. Abraham was very concerned to secure a wife for his son Isaac from among his faithful kinfolk (Gen. 24:4, 10). Similarly Isaac charged his son Jacob not to marry one of the Canaanite women but to go back to the same kinfolk to find a wife (Gen. 28:1-2). Moses warned the people of Israel that when they entered the Promised Land they must not marry the people there who worshiped false gods (Exod. 34:11-16). When Samson asked his parents to arrange a marriage for him with a Philistine woman, they urged him rather to marry an Israelite woman (Judg. 14:1-4).

Solomon's wives included many foreign women: Moabites, Ammonites, Edomites, Sidonians, Hittites. The Lord had said to his people concerning these nations, "You shall not enter into marriage with them . . . for surely they will turn away your heart after their gods (I Kings 11:1-2). Later, when the people of Israel returned from captivity in Babylon, many men brought with them foreign wives and children. After much deliberation it was agreed that the men must separate themselves from these women and children (Ezra 10:1-44).

In the NT Paul speaks against marrying outside the faith: "Do not be mismatched with unbelievers. . . . What has a believer in common with an unbeliever? . . . For we are the temple of the living God; as God said . . . I will be their God, and they shall be my people" (II Cor. 6:14-16). But some people come to faith after their marriage to an unbeliever. In such an instance, Peter advises them, in this case women, to be patient, reverent, and chaste so that their husbands, seeing the work of the Lord in their lives, may also come to faith (I Pet. 3:1-2).

Levirate Marriage. If a man died without leaving a child to continue his name, the law of Israel provided that the man's brother should help his widow to gain an heir for him. If the brother refused to do this, he could be called to account by the elders gathered at the gate. The woman so spurned could pull the sandal off his foot and spit in his face (Deut. 25:5-10).

The term "levirate" comes from the Latin word "levir" meaning "husband's brother." An example of the levirate marriage is found in Genesis 38, the story of Tamar and Judah. When Tamar's husband died without leaving any children, her father-in-law Judah ordered another son, Onan, to perform the duty of a brother-in-law. Onan refused, and when she was not given the other brother when he came of age, Tamar tricked Judah into having intercourse with her, and she gave birth to twins, Zerah and Perez.

In the book of Ruth, Naomi seeks to secure a new husband for her widowed daughter-in-law. In this case there are no remaining brothers, so Naomi has her approach a close male relative, Boaz. Boaz, realizing that there is a man even more closely related, speaks to him about making Ruth his wife. When this relative announces that he cannot enter into such a contract with Ruth, Boaz declares that he will marry her. Later they are blessed with a son, Obed, who becomes the father of Jesse, the father of David. It is interesting to note that it is through Perez, the child of the levirate marriage mentioned above, that Boaz himself was born. The line of descendants was: Perez, Hezron, Ram, Amminadab, Nahshon, Salmon, Boaz. It is also interesting to note that through Obed, Boaz's child of a levirate marriage, Jesse, David, and later Jesus the Christ were born. Jesus' life depended on two levirate marriages.

Marriage as a Symbol of the Lord and People. Marriage is one of the best ways of describing the relationship that the Lord seeks to have with people. God covenants with us, making us who were no people God's people. God makes us family through the blood of the covenant, through Jesus' gift of himself to us. God promises to do for us all that we need, and calls us to pledge ourselves to the same type of relationship with each other and with God.

Isaiah writes, "your Maker is your husband" (54:5) and adds, "as the bridegroom rejoices over the bride, so shall your God rejoice over you" (62:5). Jeremiah contrasts the desolation of the people that have forsaken the Lord and the Lord's ways with the joy of those related to God who are attending a wedding feast (7:30-34). The Song of Solomon likens the Lord's love for people to that of a newly married young man and young woman: "He brought me to the banqueting house, and his banner over me was love" (2:4).

Jesus tells a parable about marriage (Matt. 22:1-14) in which he says, "The kingdom of heaven may be compared to a king who gave a marriage feast for his son." The dinner is made ready, but when those who are invited do not appear, the king sends out his servants into the streets to compel others to come in. Jesus also compares the kingdom of God to ten young women who were to provide light for the wedding procession (Matt. 25:1-12). Five were prepared but five were not. Like some of the guests in the previous parable, those who were unprepared were excluded from the great marriage feast.

Conclusion. In the OT the prophet Hosea is called by God to marry a woman who proceeds to be unfaithful to him. He entreats her to return to their marriage covenant, but she prefers to go her own way. The Lord says that Israel is like an adulterous marriage partner. Though God has loved them tenderly, they have strayed far away. As they continue to wander, God continues to call them back. Because of their wickedness God withdraws from them, waiting for them to acknowledge their guilt and seek God's face, waiting for them to say, "Come, let us return to the Lord" (Hos. 6:1). Then the Lord says, "I will heal their faithlessness; I will love them freely" (14:4).

In the NT, Paul says to the people of the church in Corinth, "I betrothed you to Christ to present you as a pure bride to her one husband. But I am afraid that as the serpent deceived Eve by his cunning, your thoughts will be led astray from a sincere and pure devotion to Christ" (II Cor. 11:2-3). In the book of Revelation, John likens the coming of Christ to be united with his people, the church, to a great wedding feast: "Let us rejoice and exult and give him the glory, for the marriage of the Lamb has come, and his Bride has made herself ready" (19:7). The angel said, "Blessed are those who are invited to the marriage supper of the Lamb" (19:9). Thus, in his kingdom, the marriage of Christ and his people takes place, his new and joyous creation.

B.J.

MARS. Ancient Roman god, protector of the city. By historical times he was considered the god of war and identified with the Greek god Ares. The cult of Mars flourished under the emperors, who made him their personal guardian. The festivals of Mars fell in the months of March (named for him) and October.

K./M.C.

MARS HILL. See AREOPAGUS.

MARTHA. A woman who, along with her sister Mary, had a brief encounter with Jesus, according to Luke's Gospel (10:38-42). The sisters lived in Bethany and were dear friends of Jesus. They witnessed Jesus' raising of their brother Lazarus from death, narrated in the Gospel of John (11:1-12:8).

According to both accounts, Martha was a no-nonsense, domestic type, a responsible hostess who busied herself to meet the physical needs of her remarkable guest (Luke 10:40; John 12:2). Her sister Mary, a contemplative type, subordinated all other interests to give rapt attention to Jesus' teaching. Consistent with her nature, Martha leaves the scene of the sisters' bereavement to welcome Jesus and to explain events surrounding the death of their brother. In visiting his tomb she warns that the decomposing body will add unpleasantness to sorrow (John 11:39).

The Fourth Gospel notes that Jesus loved Martha as he loved Mary and Lazarus (John 11:5). He didn't disparage Martha's practical interests, nor slight her hospitality; but neither should Martha disparage Mary's choice. Jesus would not rebuke her for not helping in the kitchen (Luke 10:41-42). A question deserving discussion: does John represent Martha's confession as being fully adequate, or is her faith, like that of his disciples, incomplete until the event and proclamation of Jesus' resurrection? (John 11:21-27 and 16:26-33; also 20:30-31).

J.L.P.

MARTIN, CIVILLA DURFEE (1867-1948). Gospel hymn writer. Civilla Martin, wife of Dr. W.

Stillman Martin, a Baptist evangelist, usually accompanied her husband on his preaching tours. When they were visiting an invalid couple in Elmira (N.Y.), by the name of Doolittle, Dr. Martin asked them how they endured twenty years of illness. Mrs. Doolittle answered: "His eye is on the sparrow, and I know He watches me." Soon after, Mrs. Martin wrote the words of "His Eye Is on the Sparrow." A native of Nova Scotia, Mrs. Martin had collaborated with Dr. Martin to write the hymn "God Will Take Care of You." She wrote the words, and her husband composed the music.

R.H.

MARTIN OF TOURS (about A.D. 317-397). Patron saint of France; he was born at what is now Szombathely, Hungary. A member of the Roman army as his father had been, he gave half his cloak to a naked beggar, whom he then recognized as Christ. He was baptized, and about A.D. 339, he petitioned Julian the Apostate to be released from army service.

He settled in Poitiers under the guidance of Hilary. He was a missionary to the Balkan Peninsula, he opposed the Arians who forced his retreat. In 360 he rejoined Hilary and founded a community of hermits at Liguge, the first monastery in Gaul.

In about 371 he was made bishop of Tours, but he lived in a monastery he founded at Marmoutier outside the city. He opposed the execution of Bishop Priscillian of Avila, Spain, by the imperial court about 385, raising important questions of church and state. His feast day is November 11. He was one of the first non-martyrs venerated as a saint. His biographer was Sulpicius Severus.

N.H.

MARTYR. The English word is a transliteration of the Greek word meaning "witness." The word is used in Acts 1:8 of the apostles as witnesses to Christ's life and resurrection. But as PERSECUTION spread, the term became reserved for those whose witness for their faith had cost them their lives. Those who were persecuted and survived were called confessors.

The first martyr was the deacon Stephen (Acts 7:54-60). Then James the Apostle was executed by Herod Agrippa, who ruled A.D. 41-44. The age of the martyrs as classically understood closed with Constantine's adoption of Christianity in 324, though the classic Foxe's Book of Martyrs centers on the English Reformation.

Early Christians embraced martyrdom, believing that it would aid the Christian cause and that they would be spared the agonies of death (see the letters of Ignatius). Martyrs soon became venerated as powerful intercessors before God. Their bones and other relics were used to sanctify places of worship. Accounts of their lives, often embellished with legend, were popular forms of devotional literature. The formal origins of the cult of martyrs can be traced to a custom begun in Smyrna about A.D. 156, commemorating the death of Polycarp with a celebration at his tomb.

N.H.

MARX, KARL (1818–83) AND MARXISM. In all its varieties, Marxism derives in differing degrees from the teachings of Karl Marx, German philosopher, economic theorist, socialist, and professed revolutionary. Through political movements influenced by his thought, Marx and Marxism rank among the most powerful forces in the twentieth century. Communist movements represent both a continuation and an extension of Marx's ideas, and most socialist movements of the contemporary period bear the imprint of his views.

Life of Marx. Karl Heinrich Marx was born in Trier, in the German Rhineland, on May 5, the second child and oldest son of Heinrich and Henrietta Marx. After the defeat of Napoleon, the Rhineland had been given by the Congress of Vienna to Prussia. Marx's family had been Jewish, and his father had been born Herschel Levi, son of Rabbi Marx Levi. Under the influence of the Enlightenment and a rationalist education, Herschel Levi, a lawyer, left that heritage behind and changed his name to Marx. In the wake of the Prussian anti-Jewish statutes of 1816, to avoid being denied the right to practice law, he joined the Lutheran Church in 1817, the year before Karl was born, and changed his first name to Heinrich.

A neighbor, Freiherr Ludwig von Westphalen, befriended Karl in his teen years, contributed to his rapid intellectual development, and eventually gave the hand of his daughter Jenny to Karl in marriage. In 1835, Marx became a law student at the University of Bonn, and the following year transferred to the University of Berlin. There he came under the spell of HEGEL's philosophy, the most important intellectual influence of his life. In 1841, he received a doctorate from the University of Jena, with a thesis on Epicurus and Democritus dedicated to von Westphalen. After his marriage to Jenny von Westphalen in 1843 and the suppression of the Rheinische Zeitung, which he edited, Marx went into exile in Paris, where he began a lifelong friendship with Friedrich Engels, became a dedicated social radical, and embarked upon a career as a revolutionary publicist.

His Economic and Philosophic Manuscripts of 1844 provide a sketch of the historical materialism that he would elaborate in later writings. Expelled from France in 1845, Marx moved to Brussels. There he made his first contacts with actual movements of working people, and, at the request of a laborers' league, Marx and Engels wrote the Communist Manifesto (1848) as a critical analysis of capitalism and false socialisms and as a call to revolutionary action. Expelled from Brussels, Marx returned to Paris and then to Cologne. Arrested for sedition, Marx was expelled from Germany and went to London, where he spent the remainder of his life. Throughout the London years, his only regular work was for a brief period when he wrote articles for the New York Tribune. For the most part, he and his family lived in poverty, supported by gifts from Engels with funds from family textile interests and made bearable by the courageous sacrifices of Jenny Marx.

Karl Marx spent most of his time in the British Museum writing political pamphlets and doing research for his analysis of capitalism, Das Kapital. He was able to complete and publish (in 1867) only the first volume of this massive undertaking before his death. Engels completed the work, publishing the second volume in 1885 and the third volume in 1894.

Jenny died of cancer in 1881. Karl Marx died in London on March 14, 1883. In the eulogy at his funeral, Engels said: "His mission in life was to contribute in one way or another to the overthrow of capitalist society . . . to contribute to the liberation of the present-day proletariat. . . . Fighting was his element. And he fought with a passion, a tenacity which few could rival . . . and consequently was the best-hated and most calumniated man of his time. . . . He died beloved, revered and mourned by millions of revolutionary fellow workers from the mines of Siberia to the coasts of California, in all points of Europe and America. . . . His name and his work will endure through the ages."

The Marxism of Karl Marx. At the core of Marx's teaching is the theory of dialectical or historical materialism. The material conditions of human life and the basic modes of production provide the context shaping decisively other aspects of consciousness and society. The struggle between oppressors and oppressed occurs in every era. The dialectic appears today as the class conflict between capitalism and the proletariat, a conflict that of necessity produces revolution and change. The conflict is rooted in economic realities. Goods are priced on the basis of the labor going into their production, a view called the labor theory of value. Workers, however, are paid on a subsistence level, and the additional value created by the workers' labor is kept by the capitalists. This exploitation of workers by the ruling class will be overcome through revolution and the establishment of a socialist state.

Marxism Today. The continuing influence of Marxism is exhibited in the Communist parties around the world, in nations where the Communist party controls the government, in socialist parties and governments, and in the impact of Marxist teaching on such movements as Christian LIBERATION THEOLOGY.

As one of the most dynamic and powerful currents of the twentieth century, Marxism provides the central teaching for political parties in many nations of the world. Whether legal or underground, these Communist parties are a major force in shaping the political alternatives for contemporary societies in the industrialized world and in the Third World.

As represented in the Communist parties of the Soviet Union and the People's Republic of China, Marxism informs the rulers of two of the most populous and important nations of the world today, as well as the governments in their spheres of influence. In the Soviet Union, the form of Marxism providing the basis of the Communist party is the extension and revision of Marxian teaching known as Leninism. In the People's Republic of China, Marxism rose to power in the version known as Maoism and continues in pragmatic revisions of Maoist doctrine.

Through a great variety of thinkers and political leaders, Marxism has had decisive though differing influences on socialist movements around the globe. Socialism existed before Marx, and many socialist movements and political parties arose with little or no relation to Marxian teaching. Even where the overall historical and philosophical views of Marx are not accepted, his economic analysis and social goals have influenced socialist thought and programs.

More recently Marxism has emerged as an important influence on Christian liberation theologues. It is particularly surprising and noteworthy that Marxist economic and social analysis has found a receptive hearing among theologians of the Roman Catholic Church, which in the past had a strong aversion to most forms of socialism and has regarded Communism as a dangerous enemy of Christian faith. The influence of Marxism on Protestant Christian liberation theologians is less surprising in the light of Christian socialist movements related to Protestant groups in many countries of Europe and America and the use made of Marxist thought by SOCIAL GOSPEL leaders and by such neo-orthodox thinkers as Karl Barth and Reinhold Niebuhr. The crucial issue in the relation of Marxism to Christian liberation theologues—Catholic or Protestant, black or feminist, first world or Third World—is whether Marxist analysis is used within biblical Christian faith for prophetic critique of social injustice or whether Marxist historical and philosophical views have displaced the overall Christian perspective. C.M.

MARY. Since the name Mary is derived from Miriam, the sister of Moses and Aaron (Exod. 15:20), it was widely used among Jews throughout history. At least four women of that name appear in the NT, in addition to the mother of Jesus (Mark 6:3; Luke 1:27). All four Gospels picture women by the name of Mary among the faithful followers of Jesus, who witness his Crucifixion and then go to the tomb to prepare his body for proper burial after the Sabbath has passed, since only then was such labor of love permitted by Jewish law. It is they who go to anoint him (Mark 16:1; Luke 24:10), and who in one or more of the Gospels meet the Lord, risen from the dead (Matt. 28:9; John 20:1-18). In addition, women by this name are described as followers of Jesus (Luke 8:2), as cordial hostesses to Jesus on his journeys (Luke 10:38-42), as special beneficiaries of his miraculous powers (John 11), and as the mother of Mark, one of Paul's associates (Acts 12:12-25).

The Mary of whom we hear the most is Mary Magdalene. This designation derives from her place of origin, Magdala, a city on the western shore of the Sea of Galilee. She is linked in the Gospel accounts with Mary, the mother of "James the Younger" (Mark 15:40, meaning that he was younger or of lesser rank than another James). These women, together with another named Salome, had been followers and supporters of Jesus from the days of his activity in Galilee (Mark 15:41). In Luke 8:2-3 Mary Magdalene is listed along with women having connections with the Herodian administration who provide from their financial means to support Jesus' itinerant ministry of preaching and healing. The other Mary's son is named Joses, or in some ancient manuscripts, Joseph. Since the list of Jesus' brothers in Mark 6:3 includes both these names, some scholars have inferred that this Mary was actually Jesus' mother. The evidence is complicated by the fact that in John 19:25, the witnesses at the cross include Jesus' mother and her sister, who is called "Mary the wife of Clopas." It is not very likely that the mother of Jesus would have a sister by the same name, although curiously John never mentions the name of Jesus' mother. On the other hand, only John describes her as present at the Crucifixion and the empty tomb. The common element in the Gospel tradition is that Mary Magdalene and another Mary had been his supporters in Galilee and continued to serve in this way until his death and burial (Mark 15:40, 47; 16:1; Matt. 27:56, 61; 28:1, 9; Luke 24:10; John 19:25; as elsewhere and especially John 20:1-18). Only Luke (8:2, followed by the late unauthentic ending of Mark 16:9) adds the detail that Mary Magdalene had demons expelled from her by Jesus.

Almost certainly the village where Mary and Martha make their home (according to Luke 10:38-42) is Bethany (John 11:1-45). There the sisters wait in vain for Jesus to come across the Jordan and heal their desperately ill brother, Lazarus. His delay becomes the occasion for raising Lazarus from the dead. In Luke's narrative, Mary takes her place in Christian history as the one who has her priorities straight: she values more highly learning from Jesus than providing him the hospitality demanded by Middle Eastern custom.

H.K.

MARY, MOTHER OF JESUS. Mary, the young maiden or VIRGIN chosen by God to be the mother of Jesus Christ (Luke 1:26-38; 2:7-14; Matt. 1:18-25). She may equally be descended from David with Joseph, although the genealogies in Matthew and Luke trace Jesus' descent from David only through Joseph. After Jesus' birth, in the Protestant view, Mary and Joseph led a normal married life in which they produced a number of children (Acts 1:14). Jesus is, after all, referred to as Mary's firstborn son in Luke 2:7. Between the angelic announcement of Jesus' coming miraculous birth and the nativity, the scripture is clear that Joseph and Mary were married in name only.

Mary is mentioned throughout the Gospel story: at Jesus' circumcision; his visit to the Temple at the age of twelve; at the wedding at Cana; during his preaching ministry (where she and Jesus' brothers and sisters are rebuked for not believing in Jesus' mission); and at the Crucifixion, where she is given into the care of John by the dying Lord (John 19:25-27). In Acts, Mary is part of the apostolic group gathered in the upper room (Acts 1:14).

Gradually, the early church developed a devotion to Mary as the virgin mother of Christ that tended to increase in depth and scope over time. She was venerated because of the worshipful awe in which the God-man, the Christ, was held by believers. Much of this religious awe came to attach itself to the BLESSED VIRGIN MARY, who was the earthly means by which Christ entered the world. In the fourth century A.D., the Western church declared it a heresy to teach that Mary had other children by Joseph, after Jesus' birth. Numerous legendary stories arose glorifying Mary, and several apocryphal "gospels" concerning her were composed and circulated. By the end of the fourth century, a cult of devotion to Mary arose, quite probably due to the large accessions of pagans to the now-established Catholic church. These former pagans were familiar with mother-goddesses, and there is some similarity in the devotion of women to Mary to the ancient worship of the goddess.

J.C.

MARY, QUEEN OF SCOTS (1542-87). Mary Stewart, daughter of James V and Mary of Guise, became queen when she was one week old. Her life was lived amidst warring factions, English and French, Protestant and Catholic.

At HENRY VIII's death, Somerset, hoping to unite England and Scotland by marrying young Edward VI to Mary, invaded Scotland. This angered the Scots, who sent Mary at age six to France and eventually married her to the dauphin, Francis II, who became king of France in 1559. In 1554 her mother became regent, surrounding herself with French advisors. John Knox returned from exile in 1559 and strengthened Protestant positions. Since Mary laid legitimate claim to the English throne, ELIZABETH I invaded Scotland, expelled Mary of Guise, and encouraged Parliament to repudiate the authority of the pope, abolish the Mass, and adopt a confession of faith written by Knox.

By the time Mary returned to Scotland in 1561, following the deaths of her mother and her husband, the country was firmly in the control of Protestants allied with England. Although she agreed to tolerate the new religious state of affairs, she alienated her subjects by attending a private Mass. Then despite English pressure to marry Robert Dudley, Earl of Leicester, in 1565 she suddenly married her cousin

Henry Stuart, Lord Darnley, also in line for the English throne since both were great-grandchildren of Henry VII. Their son James VI of Scotland became JAMES I of England. In 1567 Darnley was assassinated, some thought by the Earl of Bothwell, whom Mary then married. An uprising of the Protestant lords followed.

Mary was imprisoned, and in late 1567 she was forced to abdicate. She escaped and fled to England. Elizabeth I, fearing for the security of her throne, kept Mary in captivity. After Mary was implicated in the Babington Plot against Elizabeth, she was executed on February 8, 1587.

N.H.

MARYKNOLL FATHERS. The more popular name of the Catholic Foreign Mission Society of America, Inc., a society of brothers and secular priests established by the archbishops of the United States and approved by Pope Pius X in 1911. The Congregation of Maryknoll Sisters is an order whose work and aims are similar to those of the Maryknoll Fathers. The first four missionaries left for China in 1918. The work grew rapidly, spreading to Korea, Japan, Manchuria, and the Philippines. Work began after the Second World War in Latin America and Africa. A heavy emphasis in the work of the Maryknoll Fathers and Sisters is placed on social service work, educational institutions, and the operation of cooperatives and credit unions designed to bring up the level of life in the communities in which they work. The society accepts members from the United States and attempts to build up an indigenous clergy to whom the work of the Maryknoll Fathers can be transferred.

W.G.

MARY TUDOR (1516-58; "Bloody Mary"). Queen of England from 1553 to 1558. The daughter of HENRY VIII and his first wife, Catherine of Aragon, Mary was declared illegitimate in 1534, after Henry divorced her mother. She was excluded from succession on the birth of Elizabeth, but in 1544 she was given second place in line after Edward VI.

She succeeded to the throne on July 19, 1553, after the death of Edward and only after the failure of an abortive attempt to put Lady Jane Grey on the throne. Her 1554 marriage to Philip II of Spain was opposed by her subjects and precipitated Wyatt's Rebellion. Until then she had been tolerant of her Protestant subjects, though proscribing their religion. But in 1555, Cardinal Reginald Pole reconciled England to the papacy, and heresy trials began. Four bishops were eventually burned, and about 270 others executed. Philip, never a devoted husband, left her after his campaign against France failed in 1557. They had no children. A swelling, which she thought to be a pregnancy, turned out to be a fatal malignancy.

N.H.

MASADA. A historically famous fortress on the top of a mountain in the Judean desert overlooking the Dead Sea. It was on Masada that Jewish patriots made their last heroic stand in the Roman-Jewish War, which began in A.D. 66. The immediate cause of the hostilities was a conflict over the respective rights of Jews and the pagans in Caesarea, the headquarters of

Courtesy of Paul Gross

Masada, Herod's rock fortress close to the Dead Sea

Courtesy of the Israel Exploration Society (Masada by Yigael Yadin)

One of the large cisterns, excavated from solid rock, which supplied water to Masada. Sunbeam is coming through a hole through which water filled the cistern; staircase is on the right

Courtesy of the Israel Government Tourist Office, Houston, Texas

Masada, where Jewish Zealots in A.D. 73 chose suicide rather than surrender to Roman troops

Courtesy of the Israel Exploration Society (Masada by Yigael Yadin)

Site plan of Masada

the Roman administration in Judea. Provoked by the Roman administrator Florus, who permitted his troops to pillage Jerusalem and crucify a number of prominent Jews, the Jewish patriots killed pro-Roman Jews and members of the Roman garrison in Jerusalem. In August of A.D. 66 the patriots halted sacrifices in behalf of the emperor, an act tantamount to a declaration of war. In October, the governor of Syria marched to Jerusalem and laid siege to the Second Temple. Meeting fierce resistance, he retreated. In the same mountain passes where the MACCABEAN REVOLT had won its first victories, the Jews mauled the Roman forces, and Judea was left free of Roman soldiers.

But the Romans had might on their side. By the end of A.D. 67, Jewish resistance in Galilee and northern Transjordan was crushed. The Roman general VESPASIAN subjugated southern Transjordan, western Judea, and Idumea, as well as Samaria and Jericho. All that was left in Jewish hands were Jerusalem, its environs, and several Herodian fortresses. Vespasian, one of three generals elevated to the throne, appointed his son TITUS as head of the Judean campaign. In April of A.D. 70, Titus set up camp outside the walls of Jerusalem. Jerusalem was in the hands of the Jewish Zealots, who had overthrown the moderate government during the winter of A.D. 67–68. The siege by the Romans lasted from April to September. During the fighting on August 28, the Temple went up in flames. After all resistance ceased, Titus ordered Jerusalem razed, except for the towers of Herod's palace. He arranged celebrations in various cities, highlighted by throwing Jewish prisoners to wild animals and forcing them to fight in gladiator shows. In A.D. 71 Titus and Vespasian crowned their victory with a triumphal procession in Rome. But it took the Romans several more years to capture the remaining fortresses. Masada, the last to hold out, fell in April of A.D. 74. When the Romans breached the wall on top of the mountain, they found that the defenders had committed suicide rather than be taken captive.

Masada has become a symbol of Jewish heroism.

L. K.

MASHHAD. (1) The shrine at the grave of an IMAM who SHI'ITES believed died a martyr (shahid). Since all of the imams were persecuted or killed by the CALIPHS of SUNNI Islam, there are many such shrines. The first and most important is that of the second imam Husayn, the son of Ali, who was murdered by the forces of the Umayyad Caliph Yazid I at Karbala (Iraq) in A.D. 680. The shrines are the objects of annual pilgrimages, during which ritual salutations (ziyara) are performed. The pilgrimage to Karbala is of such importance that, in years of strife with the Sunnis, it has been a substitute for the pilgrimage (HAJJ) to Mecca.

(2) A city in northern Iran; burial place and shrine of Harun al-Rashid (died in A.D. 809) and his son-in-law, the imam Ali al-Rida. (See also ABBASSID CALIPHS.)

K./M.C.

MASLOW, ABRAHAM (1908–70). An American psychologist best known for his studies in motivation. His doctoral dissertation at the University of Wisconsin, a study of simians, affirmed that dominance is usually established by visual contact without any need to fight. This research was so carefully done that no further work was begun on the subject for thirty years.

Maslow's work on motivation was first enunciated in A Theory of Human Motivation (1943). He established a hierarchy of motives, based on needs. He distinguished these in order as: physical (food), safety (security, freedom from anxiety), belonging (being accepted), and esteem (achievement). He later (1950) added "self-actualization." The self-actualized person has cognitive and aesthetic goals. Such people have "a more efficient perception of reality and a more comfortable relation to it." Maslow also affirmed that, for most people, some satisfaction of "lower" needs (physical, safety, and belonging) needed to be met before they could work toward the needs for esteem and self-actualization. He coined the phrase "peak experiences" to describe high moments in life that came to self-actualized persons. They feel less need to conform to expected norms and to have more identity with humanity. He linked this kind of life experience to religion in the book Religions, Values, and Peak Experiences (1964). I.C.

MASON, LOWELL (1792–1872). American hymn composer and musical editor; regarded by many as the greatest single influence upon Protestant church music in the nineteenth century. Born on January 8 in Medfield, Massachusetts, as a young man (1812) he served as a bank clerk in Savannah, Georgia. He played the organ, led the choir in the Independent Presbyterian Church, and helped develop the Sunday school in that city. He also found time to study under a capable German musician, Frederick L. Abel. He collected a number of psalm and hymn tunes, which were published in 1832 by the Boston Handel and Haydn Society Collection of Church Music. The book was a success, and Mason moved to Boston, where he became a leader there in both public school and church music. In 1838 he introduced music in the curriculum of Boston public schools. He also led the choir in Bowdoin Street Church, where Lyman Beecher was the minister. Mason, active in the Handel and Haydn Society, founded the Boston Academy of Music. Some of the best known of Mason's hymn tunes were "Nearer, My God, to Thee," "My Faith Looks Up to Thee," "From Greenland's Icy Mountains," "When I Survey the Wondrous Cross," and one of the tunes to "More Love to Thee, O Christ." R.H.

MASORETES. Without the work of these "transmitters" (from the Aramaic term mesorab, "to hand down, transmit") the ancient books of the HEBREW BIBLE would never have reached us in the full and comprehensible form in which we have them. Beginning about A.D. 500, the Masorettes carried on the scribal tradition of scrupulous reproduction of the sacred texts accompanied by supporting grammatical and critical notes. But the Masorettes did not merely continue to copy texts, for they were innovators as well. In their centers in Tiberias in Palestine and in Sura and Nehardea in Babylon, they began to write down the textual notations that they had received from the past in oral form and to enlarge upon them. Their notes were inserted in the margins and at the top and bottom of the columns on a scroll, and at the end of a book. Although the Masorettes were disinclined to emend the received form of the consonantal text, they indicated known corruptions by raising letters, writing one letter smaller than the rest, putting dots over words, or simply by putting the correct reading in the margin. In at least twenty places, the so-called tiqqune-soferim, "the corrections of the scribes," they actually changed a text, usually on dogmatic grounds. In Genesis 18:22, for example, the text originally read, "But Yahweh still stood before Abraham"; the Masoretes found that picture theologically objectionable and changed the text to read, "But Abraham still stood before Yahweh."

Perhaps the most significant single contribution of the Masoretes to the textual preservation of the Hebrew Bible was their development of a system of vowels that could be superimposed upon the hitherto strictly consonantal Hebrew text. This system of vocalization enabled a reader to reproduce accurately all types of vowel sounds, even murmured ones, in a language that was no longer anyone's vernacular. Different types of notations were developed in Babylon and in Tiberias, but ultimately the Tiberian system of the Masoretic family of ben Asher prevailed. The last member of the ben Asher family, Aaron ben Moshe ben Asher, was the copyist of the oldest full manuscript of the Hebrew Bible still extant. Dating from the first half of the tenth century A.D., this Aleppo Codex is now at the Hebrew University of Jerusalem, and is the basis of a new critical edition of the Masoretic text of the Hebrew Bible, which is now being issued.

W.S.T.

MASS. This term is derived from the Latin word missa for the celebration of the Lord's Supper or Holy Communion in the Roman Catholic church. The EUCHARIST or Communion is the main focus of all Christian worship and is especially characteristic of the Roman Catholic church. According to the Council of Trent (sixteenth century), the bread and wine used in the Mass are miraculously transfigured into the actual Body and Blood of Jesus Christ, except for the surface appearance of the elements. This is known as TRANSUBSTANTIATION. In recent decades some Catholic theologians have moved to other terms to explain this central mystery of faith.

The Mass includes the Eucharist, which is a SACRAMENT by which God's GRACE is conveyed to human beings. It is also a sacred meal, although the Communion has been only a symbolic meal since the end of the first century A.D. The whole action of public worship in the Mass is called the sacrifice of the Mass.

The Mass is divided into the Liturgy of the Word, which involves OT and NT readings, the Gospel, and the Creed. Then follows the Liturgy of the Eucharist. Here the offertory, the canon, and the Communion itself take place. In the canon, the priest recites the rite of consecration, and in the Communion the priest (and lay ministers of the Eucharist) distributes the elements.

J.C.

MASSA. The seventh of Ishmael's twelve sons (Gen. 25:14; I Chr. 1:30). Because Israel believed that Ishmael was the father of the Arab tribes (see Ezek. 27:21), we can assume that the Priestly authors of this genealogy knew Massa as a North Arabian clan. So did the Assyrian king Tiglath-pileser III, who lists it in his annals as one of his tributary nations.

W.S.T.

MASSACHUSETTS BAY COLONY. During the 1620s, groups of English people founded several small communities in Massachusetts, north of Plymouth and independent of the Pilgrims, most notably SALEM, which was founded in 1626. The sizable influx of landowners and merchants arriving during the next decade wanted to purify the Church of England, not to separate from it.

In 1629 Charles I chartered the Massachusetts Bay Colony with authority to trade and colonize between the Charles and Merrimack rivers. Members of the company organized about a thousand emigrants to found a PURITAN commonwealth. A group arriving in 1630 joined with earlier settlers to found Boston. The charter and administration was transferred to America with Governor JOHN WINTHROP and his court of assistants responsible to a general court of stockholders. By 1640 there were fifteen thousand settlers.

A strict theocracy designed to be a "light on a hill," the colony was riddled with theological disputes in the 1630s, with ROGER WILLIAMS leaving for Rhode Island, THOMAS HOOKER for Connecticut, and ANNE HUTCHINSON for Long Island.

The original charter was revoked in 1684. From 1686 to 1689 Massachusetts and Plymouth became part of the Dominion of New England. A new charter in 1691 joined it to the Maine territory and ended the theocracy, though the Congregational Church was not formally separated from state government until 1833.

N.H.

MATERIALISM. A philosophy that holds that matter is the primary or only reality, mind and will being dependent upon and reducible to physical causes and processes. Materialism opposes philosophies that assert that there are spiritual beings, gods, or powers at work in the world. It also opposes idealism, which reduces matter to mind. Since materialism teaches that everything can, in principle, be explained by physical causes and conditions, materialists have usually been determinists, insisting that there is a physical cause for every event.

Materialism was taught by some of the early Greek philosophers, including the atomists Leucippus and Democritus (fifth century B.C.), who sought to explain all things through the movement of material atoms. Epicurus (342-270 B.C.) taught that nothing comes from nothing and that composed bodies are the result of the collision of simple atoms in motion. Lucretius developed Epicurean materialism in his poem De rerum natura (On the Nature of Things), which argued against the immortality of the soul and thereby sought to assuage the religious fear of the gods and of death. In the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries, philosophers such as Thomas Hobbes and the Frenchmen La Mettrie, Diderot, and d'Holbach championed materialism and applied it to human psychology. Materialist ideas were given further impetus with the rise in popularity of DARWINISM in the nineteenth century, and of materialist biology, biochemistry, and cybernetics in this century. The dialectical materialism of MARX and Engels shares with classical materialism its belief in one reality, matter, and its claim that all true knowledge derives from the natural sciences. However, Marxism rejects extreme forms of mechanistic materialism and allows for genuine dialectical or historical openness and progress.

J.L.

MATHER, COTTON (1663–1728). Puritan cleric and historian. He was born February 12, 1663, to Increase and Maria Cotton Mather, grandson to Richard Mather and John Cotton. He enrolled in Harvard at age twelve, the youngest student ever admitted, and graduated in 1678. He became assistant to his father at Second Church, Boston, which he served until his death February 13, 1728. He received an M.A. from Harvard in 1681 and was ordained in 1685. In 1686 he married Abigail Phillips.

In all he wrote about 450 books. Against royal Governor Edmund Andros he wrote The Declaration of Gentlemen . . . (1689). Memorable Providences Relating to Witchcraft and Possessions (1685) warned judges against reliance on "spectral evidence" and counseled mild sentences. Wonders of the Invisible World (1693) was his account of the Salem trials. His master works were the Magnalia Christi Americana, "Christ's Deeds in America" (1702), and Christian Philosopher (1721), which tended toward Deism and revealed his lifelong interest in science. He defended inoculation for smallpox.

Courtesy of the American Antiquarian Society

Cotton Mather

Identification with unpopular government policies and arrogance in his arguments made Mather unpopular, but he supported schools for slaves, the building of churches in needy communities, missions to the Indians, and work with children. N.H.

MATHESON, GEORGE (1842–1906). Hymn writer and Church of Scotland minister. Born March 27 in Glasgow, George Matheson even as a small child suffered from poor vision. Nevertheless he entered Glasgow University where he was a brilliant student. At age eighteen he became totally blind, but was aided in his university work by a sister who learned Latin, Greek, and Hebrew to help him in his studies. Despite his handicap he was able to complete undergraduate work and also studies at the theological college of the Church of Scotland. He subsequently became one of Scotland's most eloquent preachers, serving for twelve years at the parish church in the seaport of Inellan and later at St. Bernard's Church in Edinburgh. He wrote the words to the hymn "O Love That Wilt Not Let Me Go" on the day of a sister's wedding. There seems to be no documented basis for the story that the hymn was written after his fiancée refused to marry him because of his blindness. He was the author of several devotional books and other hymns including "Make Me a Captive, Lord, and Then I Shall Be Free."

R.H.

MATHEWS, SHAILER (1863–1941). The American Baptist educator and champion of the SOCIAL GOSPEL was educated at Colby College and Newton Theological Institute. He taught at Colby (1887–94), interrupted by a year's study at the University of Berlin (1890–91). In 1894 he joined the faculty of the University of Chicago Divinity School, serving as dean from 1908 until he became professor emeritus in 1933.

An advocate of theological liberalism, his Social Teaching of Jesus (1897) was followed by twenty more influential volumes. Active in ecumenical affairs, he was president of the Northern Baptist Convention in 1915 and of the Federal Council of Churches from 1912 to 1916.

N.H.

MATINS. From the Latin word for "the morning hours." Originally an early morning worship service, which is now called LAUDS. In modern usage matins celebrates the end of the night and thus precedes the prayers at dawn, lauds. Prayers during the night are of ancient usage, going back to the third century.

The form of matins on festivals is extremely long, since the Roman liturgy has nine psalms and nine scripture readings and the monastic liturgy, twelve psalms, and twelve readings from scripture. Matins is divided into three parts, or nocturns, of three psalms and three readings each. The length of the service has caused a steady shortening of it by several popes, and Vatican II completely revised it. This shorter version will make the use of matins for spiritual growth more possible for parish priests. Matins is known as morning prayer in the Anglican and Episcopal churches. The Lutheran matins, or early morning service, has recently been revised in The Lutheran Book of Worship. J.C.

MATTHEW. Mentioned in the various lists of the disciples (Matt. 10:3; Mark 3:18; Luke 6:15) and apostles (Acts 1:13) Matthew also appears in a story of Jesus calling a tax collector to become one of his followers (Matt. 9:9). Mark and Luke both tell the same story, but give his name as Levi (Mark 2:14; Luke 5:27). In some ancient manuscripts of Mark, he is called James. Only the Gospel of Matthew links the converted tax collector with Matthew. Besides this puzzling information, we learn from the NT nothing further about Matthew.

The fourth-century church historian Eusebius of Caesarea reported in his Ecclesiastical History a claim made by Papias (a church leader in Asia Minor in the early second century) that our First Gospel originated as a collection of sayings of Jesus, which Matthew interpreted from the Hebrew. But since what we know as the Gospel of Matthew gives no hint as to its authorship, and since it depends upon a Greek document, the Gospel of Mark, Papias' claim must be dismissed as an uninformed guess. Later tradition assigned to each of the supposed writers of the Gospels a symbol. Matthew's was an angel.

H.K.

MATTHEW, GOSPEL OF. The first of the four canonical Gospels in the received order of the NT.

Most modern biblical scholarship has concluded that Matthew was written after MARK, as also was LUKE, since all of Mark's contents, in the order Mark gives them, are included in both Matthew and Luke. A considerable conservative scholarship insists that Matthew is the earliest Gospel to be written; a position recently defended by the scholar William Farmer. However, the demonstrated dependence of Matthew and Luke on Mark, plus another large body of material (called Q; from the German quelle or "source") common to both Matthew and Luke, gives strong credence to "the Markan hypothesis" or "the two document hypothesis" of Gospel construction. Matthew also contains materials peculiar to this Gospel alone, known as "M," just as Luke contains unique materials known as "L."

Matthew's special material (besides Mark and Q) include a collection of OT passages specifically developed to show that Jesus fulfilled all the promises and predictions of the Messiah, which was used by early Christians in controversies with other Jews who rejected Jesus' messiahship. Scholars have hypothesized that this collection of "sayings" was written in Hebrew but was translated into Greek before Matthew used it. This could be the Logia or "sayings" that may refer to the words of Jesus, originally written in Aramaic.

Matthew early received first place in the lists of Gospels, that is, the SYNOPTICS—Matthew, Mark and Luke—plus the Fourth Gospel, JOHN, since it makes such a close connection of early Christian origins with the Hebrew scriptures. The early church saw Matthew as the most comprehensive, and thus, the most authoritative, of the accounts of Jesus' life and ministry. For early Christians, Matthew shows how the life of Jesus is the fulfillment of Hebrew prophecy and the Law.

Indeed, Matthew treats the entire OT as prophecy and pays particular attention to the Law (Torah), to Jesus' many miracles ("mighty acts of God"), and explicitly mentions the church (Matt. 16), all of which were key interests of the developing church after A.D. 70, when the Gospels were written. Matthew shows a detailed knowledge of the fall of Jerusalem to the Romans (as does Luke), and his quotations of the OT come, in many instances, direct from the Septuagint or Greek translation that was popular among Jews, and Christians, of the Diaspora. Matthew thus originated around A.D. 80, among Greek-speaking Jews.

None of the authors of the Gospels is named in the manuscripts, but ancient tradition ascribed the First Gospel to an apostle, the tax collector called Levi in Mark 2:14 and Luke 5:27, and called MATTHEW in 9:9. Papias, bishop of Hierapolis in Asia Minor around A.D. 130, tells us that "Matthew collected the words (Logia, that is, the sayings of Jesus) in the Hebrew language and each one interpreted them as he was able." Most modern scholars agree that Matthew was originally written in Greek, and so Papias cannot be referring to Matthew as we have it. At most, due to the writer's dependence on Mark and other written sources, we can say Matthew was written by a Jewish Christian who was not an early disciple. The Christian-Jewish nature of Matthew is revealed in the intense interest in prophecy, the genealogy of Jesus, which is traced to David and Abraham, the prominence of the Law in Matthew's rendition of Jesus' teaching, and the high regard for the blessings given the Jews by the covenant God. The Sermon on the Mount is presented, in fact, as a parallel to Moses at Sinai, and Jesus is shown to give a new law. Yet, at the same time, Matthew is extremely negative toward "the Jews" who did not accept Jesus as the Messiah. Only in Matthew do the priests say, at Jesus' condemnation, "His blood be on us and on our children." Scholars have thus called Matthew the most anti-Semitic of the Gospels.

While the place of origin is unknown, internal evidence, such as the Jewish interests, on the one hand, and interests in Gentiles like the Roman centurion (8:5-13), suggests a place like Antioch of Syria, where Jewish and Gentile influences were both present.

Most commentators point out Matthew's fondness for structure. The genealogy is arranged in sets of fourteen generations, and the main portion of the book is divided into five sections (perhaps corresponding to the five books of Moses), each of which ends with a formula phrase such as "when Jesus had finished these sayings . . ." (7:28; 11:1; 13:53; 19:1; 26:1). Each of these five sections begins with a narrative of Jesus' activities and ends in a long discourse or sermon. The Gospel opens with the birth narratives and ends with the passion and resurrection of Jesus.

A possible outline of Matthew is:

- I. The Coming of the Messiah (chaps. 1-2)
- II. The Ministry of the Messiah (chaps. 3-25)
  - A. Preparation for the Ministry (chaps. 3-7)

Narrative: Baptism, Temptation, and Call of Disciples

Discourse: The Sermon on the Mount
  - B. Jesus' Authority (chaps. 8-10)

Narrative: Healings and Forgiveness

Discourse: The Mission of the Apostles
  - C. The Coming Kingdom (chaps. 11-13)

Narrative: Failure to Discern the Kingdom's Coming

Discourse: Parables of the Kingdom
  - D. Life in the Community of the New Covenant (chaps. 14-18)

Narrative: Warnings of Hostility to the New Community

Discourse: Rules for Life in the New Community
  - E. The Consummation of the Present Age (chaps. 19-25)

Narrative: Conflict with "the Jews"

Discourse: The Synoptic Apocalypse—The End of the Age
- III. The Passion and Resurrection of the Messiah (chaps. 26-28)
  - A. Jesus' Betrayal, Trial, Death, and Resurrection
  - B. The Commissioning of the Disciples for a World Mission

While Matthew does not completely follow such an orderly scheme (section B of Division 2 is quite undifferentiated), in the main it is clear that Matthew intends such a presentation because of his summary sentences, such as: "And Jesus went about all the cities and villages, teaching in their synagogues and preaching the gospel of the kingdom, and healing every disease and every infirmity" (9:35).

The peculiarly Jewish viewpoint of Matthew makes it likely that his intended audience was made up not of Gentiles but of Jewish Christians. His purpose must be considered to be a demonstration of Jesus' credentials as the Messiah, promised by God and predicted both by the Torah and the great Prophets of Israel and Judah. In Jesus all the great promises have been fulfilled, so that the Christian church must be seen as the New Israel, the successor to the people of the old covenant who have forfeited their place in God's kingdom because of their refusal (symbolized by the priests, scribes, and Pharisees) to receive Jesus as the Messiah. Indeed, Matthew carries his theme, "that the Scripture might be fulfilled," so far that he combines bits of various verses in unique ways and even quotes one source that is unknown to scholarship (Matt. 2:23). Matthew proceeds to show that Jesus is the fulfillment of the Torah, the fulfillment of prophecy, and the eschatological basis for true righteousness. He then shows the need for believers to be watchful, for the delayed but coming Kingdom that will usher in the end of the age. Matthew shows this need for constant preparation for the Kingdom's breaking into history in the three apocalyptic parables of the wise and faithful servant (24:45-51), the wise and foolish maidens (25:1-13), and the parable of the talents (25:14-30).

For Matthew, the church, which in his time probably was consciously separated from the rest of Judaism and was subjected to hostility by the synagogue and the possibility of persecution by the Roman government, was nonetheless the community of the New Covenant, the new and true Israel. As such a people in struggle dwelling in the expectation of Christ's return to judge the earth, the church has a strong responsibility to preach the gospel to the whole world. There is a catholic, universal dimension to Matthew's thought, then, that lifts it far above any narrowly Jewish-Christian interest despite Matthew's setting in such a situation in life.

Matthew, standing as it does at the head of the NT, is probably the most widely read book in Christendom. Its lovely birth story and inspiring resurrection narratives make it the favorite of millions at Christmas and Easter. The very size and detailed structure of the book make it authoritative in tone and keep alive and convincing to many the tradition that it is the First Gospel to be written, despite two centuries of critical biblical scholarship.

The appeal of Matthew can be gleaned from the fact that the Church of the Nativity in Bethlehem, alone of Constantine's basilicas, escaped destruction at the hands of the Muslims because it contained a painting showing the three (Persian) magi following the star to worship Jesus. Such is the universal appeal of the only Gospel to recount that wondrous journey.

J. C.

MATTHIAS. The apostle chosen by casting lots to fill the office vacated by JUDAS ISCARIOT. Along with the other apostles, he helped to manage the first business of the church in Jerusalem following the ascension of Jesus, according to Acts 1:15-26. Peter declared that the Scriptures, which had prophesied

Judas' betrayal, provided that his place be filled by another (Ps. 109:8; Acts 1:20, 22). A qualified candidate must have "accompanied" Jesus and his disciples "beginning from the baptism of John until the day when he [Jesus] was taken up." (This profile marks off the Twelve as the only apostles. This alone explains Luke's denial of this office to Paul, who so vehemently claimed it for himself. Acts 14:14 is the exception that proves the rule.) When places among the Twelve were later vacated, no successor was needed; the martyred James would sit on one of the "thrones judging the twelve tribes of Israel" for, unlike Judas, James had continued with Jesus in his trials (Acts 12:1-2; Luke 22:28-30). J.L.P.

MATZAH. Unleavened bread eaten by Jews during the festival of PASSOVER. The ingredients are specially prepared flour and cooled water. After the first two nights, matzah prepared with other ingredients may be eaten, but it must not have any leaven. The dough must not be allowed to ferment, a symbol of the haste with which the Jews left Egypt. The Bible calls matzah "the bread of affliction." Spiritually and allegorically, leaven is regarded as the symbol of impurity. L.K.

MAUNDY THURSDAY. Thursday in HOLY WEEK, commemorating the institution of the LORD'S SUPPER or Holy Communion. "Maundy" is a corruption of the Latin mandatum, meaning "command." This is derived from John 13:34, where Jesus declared, "A new commandment I give to you."

Holy Week is one of the earlier developments of the CHRISTIAN YEAR, stressing preparation for remembrance of the crucifixion of Christ and the Lord's resurrection. Maundy Thursday was instituted early in the so-called Great Week of the Eastern Orthodox churches. It not only commemorates the Last Supper, but also includes the reenactment of the foot washing done by Jesus on that evening. From the Middle Ages until today many churches, including the Roman Catholic, washed feet as part of the humility proper for Lent. Recently, Protestant churches have revived the rite, and the Catholic church has stressed it by the participation of the pope in its observance. J.C.

MAURICE, FREDERICK DENISON (1805-72). The Anglican divine's given name was John Frederick Denison Maurice. Under the influence of Samuel Taylor COLERIDGE's theological and philosophical thought, he went to Trinity College, Cambridge, in 1823. Leaving the Unitarian faith of his parents, he was baptized into the Church of England in 1831 and was ordained January 26, 1834, after a preparatory course at Exeter College, Oxford.

In 1846 he became professor of theology at the newly created theological school of King's College, London. His leadership among Christian socialists led to questions about his orthodoxy, and publication of Theological Essays (1853), in which he questioned the endlessness of future punishment among other things, led to his dismissal from King's College.

He was closely associated with Charles Kingsley, and they together published a series of Tracts for Priests and People, beginning in 1854, concerned with the problems of society in the throes of industrialization. They also founded a Working Men's College. In 1866 he became Knightsbridge Professor of Moral Theology at Cambridge. His other works included The Kingdom of Religion (1842) and The Claims of the Bible and of Science (1863). N.H.

MAXIMUS THE CONFESSOR (about 580-662). Greek ascetical writer and chief theologian of the seventh century. Formerly an imperial secretary under Emperor Heraclius, about 614 he became a monk at Chrysopolis (Scutari), near Constantinople. With the Persian invasion of 626 he fled to Carthage. From 640 on he opposed Monothelitism and defended the doctrine of the two wills of Christ. Taken to Constantinople in 653, he refused adherence to the "Typos" of Constans II and so was banished to Thrace. In 661 he was tried for treason. One tradition says his tongue and right hand were cut off before he was banished to the Caucasus Mountains.

His mystical works include The Ascetic Life, Four Centuries on Charity, and the Mystagogia, a mystical interpretation of the liturgy. A Christian Platonist, he believed that sin entered the world because of human desire for pleasure, which destroyed the dominion of reason over the senses. Redemption is through return to our true nature, which the perfect exercise of human will by Christ illustrates. His feast day is August 13. N.H.

MAY, ROLLO (1909- ). Born April 21 in Ada, Ohio, May attended Michigan State University and graduated from Oberlin College. He taught literature for three years at Anatolia College, Thessaloniki, Greece, and attended summer institutes with Alfred Adler in Vienna. After a brief stint in student counseling, he entered Union Theological Seminary (New York). Upon the completion of two years in a Congregational parish, he enrolled at Columbia University, where he received the Ph.D. in 1949.

His dissertation formed the basis for The Meaning of Anxiety. Influenced by PAUL TILLICH, about whom he wrote in Paulus (1973), and by existentialists KIERKEGAARD, NEITZSCHE, and CAMUS, he has become known for his existentialist psychotherapy outlined in Existence: A New Dimension in Psychiatry and Psychology. (See EXISTENTIALISM.)

Adler's emphasis on individual responsibility was another factor in his thought. Acknowledging potential benefits from free-floating ANXIETY, brought on by the normal uncertainties of societal living, he counseled that people should develop self-responsibility and self-affirmation through personal motivation instead of looking for outside approval. During a bout with tuberculosis in his early thirties, he found that life depended on his own struggle against death. In 1948 he joined the faculty of the William Alanson White Institute of Psychiatry, Psychoanalysis, and Psychology (New York) and later became a training and supervisory analyst. He has taught at Yale, Princeton, and Harvard universities and is the author of Love and Will and Man's Search for Himself. I.C.

MAYA. Sanskrit, related to "magic," often translated "illusion." In HINDUISM, this important term has two distinct but related meanings. In the VEDAS, maya refers to the wizard-like power of the gods to create bodies for themselves and otherwise work miracles. In Vedanta thought, especially the Svetasvatara UPANISHAD and its interpretation by the great philosopher of Advaita VEDANTA (non-dualist Vedanta) SAMKARA, maya is the power by which BRAHMAN or God creates the world, and it is that phenomenal world seen in its misleading manyness rather than its unity.

Maya is frequently rendered "illusion," but that term easily leads to misconceptions. To say that the world is maya does not mean that all is illusion in the sense of being a hallucination, but that it is not perceived correctly owing to ajñana or avidya, ignorance. We see it as separate and transitory things, as we see ourselves, rather than as the power and being of Brahman. With full enlightenment, according to Advaita, the false realities of maya dissipate, and Brahman alone is seen to be real. R.E.

MAYFLOWER COMPACT. Dated November 11, 1620, the Mayflower Compact is an instrument of government drawn up by the Separatist majority of pilgrims before disembarkation from the Mayflower, hailed as the first step of the American colonists toward framing a constitution. The Mayflower sailed from Plymouth, England, in September 1620. Its 101 passengers were led spiritually and politically by their ruling elder, William Brewster. Not all the passengers were Separatists, however, and the grumbling of non-Separatists occasioned the writing of the compact. On the day the Mayflower dropped anchor off Cape Cod, forty-one adult male Separatists, including John Alden, William Bradford, William Brewster, John Carver, Myles Standish, and Edward Winslow, composed and signed the Mayflower Compact. Beginning with "In the name of God, Amen," the signers of the compact affirmed loyalty to King James and covenanted before one another and before God to form a political body to promote the glory of God, advance the Christian faith, and establish a colony. The signers further committed themselves to enact just and equal laws and promised all due submission and obedience. This compact, America's first written constitution, formed the basis of government for Plymouth Colony until it merged with Massachusetts in 1691. C.M.

MEAD, GEORGE HERBERT (1863–1931). A social psychologist whose theories have become basic to many research areas. He studied physiological psychology in Germany and later at Harvard with William James, Josiah Royce, and Charles Sanders Peirce. Philosophically a pragmatist, he, with John Dewey and Charles H. Cooley, developed a psychological system called symbolic interactionism. He believed that human personality is not innate, but is formed by interaction with other people, primarily through gestures and word symbols. The mind evolves and self-consciousness emerges through social processes. This is how a child becomes differentiated from others in the environment and develops a sense of self. Throughout life, this self is tested by reference to the regard of other people and in this way the self-image is maintained.

People work out their own purposes and modify one another's behavior through social activities. Such interaction can change environments. Mead believed that progress could take place and an improved society evolve when people use their minds to solve problems by intelligent planning and action. For him social acts were determinative of the development of culture. Feedback was given through interaction and this enabled an individual to develop a sense of self.

Mead's teaching career was at the University of Chicago, where his ideas were disseminated through extemporaneous lectures and articles in the fields of education, psychology, and sociology. I.C.

MECCA. The holiest city of ISLAM and birthplace of MUHAMMAD. Mecca is located in western Arabia near the Red Sea, and lies midway between the Indian Ocean and the Mediterranean, on an important caravan route. Its present importance is due to its religious significance and the presence there of the KA'BA, the center of the Muslim world. Five times daily all Muslims face the kiblah, the direction of the Ka'ba, for prayer. At least once in their lives, all Muslims who are able to do so must make the pilgrimage (HAJJ) to Mecca and the area around it. Mecca is so holy that non-Muslims cannot enter it.

Despite the hostile climate and infertile soil, Mecca had been important for a long time before the birth of Muhammad. The Ka'ba was the most important religious center of Arabia. Tribes from many areas made seasonal pilgrimages to it. The Quraish tribe, inhabitants of Mecca, grew rich both from trade and from the pilgrimage. Muhammad was born into the Quraish, but into a poor clan, the Hashimites. The most powerful of the dozen clans was the Omayyad, which later became the first ruling dynasty of CALIPHS. However, during Muhammad's ministry, the Omayyad and other important clans ridiculed him. After the HEGIRA, they organized economic and military opposition to him. In A.D. 630, Muhammad's forces from MEDINA conquered Mecca. Muhammad destroyed all the idols in the city, and established Mecca as the religious center of Islam, but returned to Medina, his temporal capital. Muhammad made one last pilgrimage to Mecca in 632, just before he died. Later Muslim rulers improved the city and expanded the MOSQUE around the Ka'ba. The Karmathians, a Ishi'ite sect, sacked Mecca in 930, carrying away the sacred black stone of the Ka'ba. Twenty years passed before it was returned. In 1925, 'Abd-al-'Aziz Ibn-Saud', founder of modern Saudi Arabia, took control of Mecca and Medina.

Courtesy of the Royal Embassy of Saudi Arabia

The Holy Mosque at Mecca

K./M.C.

MEDIA. The Priestly genealogists (Gen. 10:2; I Chr. 1:5) associate the "Madai" with other Indo-Europeans, including "Javan," the Greeks. That the Medes were subject to the Assyrians in the eighth century B.C. is confirmed by the notices in II Kings 17:6; 18:11 that Sargon II exiled the Israelites captured in 721 B.C. to the cities of the Medes. Isaiah regarded the Medes as a ferocious nation (Isa. 13:17; 21:2). Their empire reached its zenith during the time of Jeremiah's ministry (see Jer. 25:25; 51:11, 28), and under Cyaxares (about 625–585 B.C.) they controlled an area reaching from central Asia Minor to central PERSIA, centered on the capital city of Ecbatana (Ezra 6:2). However, Cyrus defeated Astyages, the last independent Median king, in 539 B.C., and incorporated Media as a province into the Persian Empire. Late OT writers tended to view the two kingdoms as a pair, as is evident in the phrase "the law of the Medes and the Persians" (Dan. 6:8, 12, 15). Daniel's "Darius the Mede" (Dan. 5:31; 9:1; 11:1), never existed; he must be confused with some later Persian king. Jewish "Parthians and Medes and Elamites" (Acts 2:9) were among those present in Jerusalem on the day of Pentecost.

Courtesy of the Oriental Institute, University of Chicago

Head of a Mede, with his high rounded hat and his beard and mustache; from the stairway of the Apadana, Persepolis (521–465 B.C.)

W.S.T.

MEDIATOR. This term is used in the NT, as well as in Greek legal and literary documents in the centuries before and after the birth of Jesus, to designate one who arbitrates between two parties in order to resolve a dispute or to achieve a common purpose. It is found in technical legal usage in secular material arising from legal controversy and from the attempt to settle competing claims. But it also appears in both pagan and Jewish writings with reference to those divine or divinely ordained figures who adjudicate disputes between the gods, or God, and human beings.

In Plutarch's treatise on Isis and Osiris, for example, the Iranian god, Mithra, mediates between the divine and the human. In Jewish apocalyptic writings the term is found as well. For example, in the Testaments of the Twelve Patriarchs (Test. Dan. 6:2; Test. Levi 5:7) there is an angel who intercedes in behalf of suffering Israel in the presence of God. In I Enoch 89:76, the seer himself takes up to God the record of the difficulties through which God's people have passed, in an effort to move God to intervene in Israel's behalf.

The term "mediator" is used in three of the NT writings. Paul describes Moses as the mediator through whom the Law was given to Israel (Gal. 3:19). In keeping with the heightened notion of the remoteness and transcendence of God within first-century Judaism, Paul notes that it was angels (rather than God alone) who transmitted the Law to Moses, but Moses is clearly the mediator in the transaction. Then follows an enigmatic remark that "a mediator implies more than one, but God is one" (Gal. 3:20), which probably means that the covenant of law is inferior to the covenant of promise, since the former was made indirectly through multiple agents, while the latter was made directly between God and Abraham (Gen. 18:1-10).

In I Timothy 2:5 and Hebrews 8:6; 9:15; and 12:24, Jesus is the mediator of the new covenant, the one who bridges the gulf between the seeking, saving God and disobedient, estranged people. First Timothy stresses that Jesus is the sole mediator between God and human beings, while Hebrews in all the passages where the term occurs makes a sharp distinction between the old covenant and the new. The old is merely transitional, and has already become obsolete (Heb. 8:13). It could only cover human sin; Jesus, as mediator of the new covenant, removes sin (9:6-15). The community of faith has been brought by this new and final mediator into the presence of God (Heb. 12:23-24).

H.K.

MEDINA. A city in western Arabia, about 280 miles north of MECCA. MUHAMMAD's journey there in A.D. 622, known as the HEGIRA, marks the beginning of the Islamic calendar. In Medina, Muhammad built the first MOSQUE and established the UMMA, or community of believers. He lived the last ten years of his life there and is buried there.

Unlike Mecca, Medina was a city with a large and fertile oasis and a favorable climate. The population consisted of several Jewish tribes that had come from the north and several Arab tribes that had come from the south. Because of conflict among the tribes, an arbiter was needed. Muhammad was invited, and he settled many of the conflicts within the city. He wrote the "Constitution of Medina," which set forth the basic ideas of the Islamic state. However, most of the Jews did not accept his claims to be a prophet, so Muhammad had them expelled. Meanwhile, Muhammad's forces fought the Meccans. Medina was besieged in 627; Muhammad ordered a trench dug across the only safe access to the city, and the Meccan force, mostly cavalry, could not cross it. Eventually, the siege was lifted.

Although Muhammad captured Mecca in 630, he returned to Medina shortly afterwards, making it his capital as he spread Islam throughout Arabia. After his death, Medina continued to be the capital of Islam until Ali, the fourth caliph, moved the capital to Kūfa in Iraq. Medina declined in importance, but remained the second holiest city in Islam.

K./M.C.

MEDITATION. Methodical reflection, deep thought on eternal truths, which becomes a religious exercise because of its spiritual goals and reverent approach. Meditation plays a role in all religions, ancient and modern, major and minor, from the contemplative exercises of Tibetan Buddhist monks to the vigils before the consecrated Eucharistic hosts of certain orders of Roman Catholic nuns.

Meditation is called discursive prayer or mental prayer. Among Eastern Orthodox, Roman Catholic, and some Protestant circles (Anglican monks, as well as a small number of Reformed and Lutheran monks), meditation is engaged in for seeking deeper insight into the will of God. Among Buddhists, meditation may be followed to achieve the state of "non-self" or Nirvana, the nothingness that is considered the real under the appearances of the material world. Meditation, by whomever practiced, is an attempt to still the ordinary thoughts of the human mind, to explore the depths and, if possible, to break through the bounds of the finite into the infinite. In the spiritual formation of priests and religious in the Roman Catholic church, meditation is urged by canon law and manuals used by spiritual directors. The Practice of the Presence of God by Brother Lawrence and Ignatius' Spiritual Exercises both see meditation as necessary for the development of faith and a deep prayer life.

Meditation is subject to several meanings and has changed in meaning over the centuries. Aids to meditation are prominent in some traditions (icons, crucifixes, mandalas, mantras [sounds], bodily poses [yoga], celibacy, and fasting) and absent in others.

J.C.

MEDITERRANEAN SEA. "The Sea at the Middle of the Earth" to the Romans, who called it Mare Nostrum ("our sea"). Most of the important nations of ancient times were either on the Mediterranean's shores or else operated in its 2,300 miles of water: Israel, Syria, Greece, Rome, Egypt, Philistia, and Phoenicia. The Israelites called it "the sea of the Philistines" and feared it. Indeed, when Solomon built a navy and merchant marine, he furnished it with ships and seafarers from Tyre in Phoenicia. When the author of Jonah wished to show utter terror, he wrote of Jonah's being cast overboard and swallowed by a great fish.

The Mediterranean plays a large role in the NT, especially in the ministry of Paul. Paul made three missionary journeys plus a final voyage under Roman arrest to Rome across the Mediterranean. He was particularly active at the northeastern edge of the Mediterranean, in the Aegean Sea, working for years in Ephesus and Corinth. Paul's work involved Mediterranean cities: Caesarea, Antioch, Troas, Corinth (and its port of Cenchreae), Ptolemais, Tyre, Sidon, Syracuse, Rome (and its port of Puteoli), as well as Ephesus. He was involved in at least one unrecorded ship sinking as well as the foundering of the Roman galley on Malta on his final voyage to Rome.

J.C.

MEDIUM. See DIVINATION; SPIRITUALISM.

MEDLEY, SAMUEL (1738–1806). Baptist minister and prolific hymn writer. Medley was born June 23 in Hertfordshire, England. As a rebellious youth, he joined the Royal Navy, where, while serving aboard a naval vessel engaged in a sea battle off the coast of West Africa, he was severely wounded in one leg. The surgeon aboard expressed fear that the leg would have to be amputated. Young Medley, who had been reared in a devout home, prayed for many hours that the Lord would forgive his sins. The next morning the doctor said his leg was healing, and he would not have to remove it. On his release from the navy, Medley studied for the ministry and was ordained as a Baptist. His first church was at Watford. During the early period of his ministry there, he wrote his famous hymn, "O Could I Sing the Matchless Worth." Subsequently he wrote a number of hymns, which first appeared in leaflets or were published in religious periodicals. The last twenty-seven years of his fruitful life were spent serving a Liverpool church.

R.H.

MEGIDDO. Usually identified with modern Tell el-Mutesellim in central Palestine, Megiddo has been a traditional battle site throughout known history, the result of its strategic location at a crossroads of international traffic, involving it inevitably and deeply in the politics of the ancient Near East. It was a fortress city in control of the Wadi Ara, the pass through the Carmel range separating the plain of Esdraelon from the Palestinian coastal plain, thus the entrance to the "way of the sea," which was the all-important trade route connecting Egypt with Syria and then with Mesopotamia.

In pre-Israelite Palestine, Megiddo was alternatively a center of resistance to the Egyptian domination of CANAAN and, at other times, a faithful vassal of the Egyptian pharaoh. It is mentioned among the conquests of Thutmose III (1468 B.C.) and Seti I (about 1300 B.C.), at which time Canaan was a province of Egyptian rule. During the Amarna period of Amenophis IV (1377–1358 B.C.) it is clear from correspondence from the "king" of Megiddo directed to the pharaoh that it was a city crucial to Egypt in its recurring warfare against the nomadic tribes that continually threatened its domination of the Canaanite city-states. Such written sources corroborate the archaeological evidence, which testifies to a very ancient history of settlement at the strategic site of Tell el-Mutesellim. Remains both from the Neolithic (8300–4000 B.C.) and the Chalcolithic (fourth millennium B.C.) periods abound, prelude to the many levels of habitation that belong to several phases of the Canaanite period (third and second millennia), which display massive walls and fortifications, sophisticated dwellings, and temples. Megiddo is, in fact, a parade example of urban opulence during the late Canaanite period. Here the archaeologists found gold implements, ivory plaques, jewelry, and art objects of various precious materials—the richest collection of such luxury items ever unearthed in Palestinian archaeology.

Though Megiddo is named in Joshua 12:21 as one of the cities taken in the initial phase of the Israelite conquest of Canaan (contrast Josh. 17:11–12), it is likely that it did not become Israelite until a somewhat later period. "Taanach by the waters of Megiddo" is mentioned in Judges 5:19 as the site of the battle waged under Deborah and Barak against a coalition of Canaanites, the success of which presumably made possible the union of northern and central Israelite tribes to form a confederation. The

Herbert G. May

Stalls with mangers, from Megiddo stables

Courtesy of the Oriental Institute, University of Chicago

Reconstruction of stables at Megiddo, probably from the time of Ahab. A walkway about eight feet wide ran down the center of each unit; rows of pillars on each side of the passage supported the roof and served for hitching; between the pillars were mangers and stalls. Compare Solomon's cities for his chariots and horses (I Kings 9:19 and 10:26) battle may have taken place between 1150–1050 B.C., a time during which the habitation of Tell el-Mutesellim was suspended. Who occupied the site immediately after 1050 B.C. is the subject of debate, but there is no doubt that from about 950 B.C. on Megiddo was an important Israelite stronghold.

Here Solomon established one of his administrative centers (I Kings 4:12; 9:15) of his highly consolidated and bureaucratic kingdom. The Bible evidently regards Solomon's building at Megiddo as one of the marvels of his flamboyant reign, and the archaeology of the place would tend to confirm this judgment. The massive city gate, wall, storehouses, and the expert masonry represent some of the best efforts achieved by Israelite architecture.

Megiddo's Israelite history seemed to have ceased in 732 B.C., when it was destroyed by the Assyrian conqueror Tiglath-pileser III, only to be made by him into a center for Assyrian administration. Its strategic importance continued: in 609 B.C. King Josiah perished there in a futile attempt to stop Pharaoh Neco in his march to aid the foundering Assyrian Empire in its final days (II Kings 23:29). (Josiah's effort, in fact, may not have been in vain. He may have delayed Neco sufficiently to render his aid ineffective.) As a strategic stronghold, Megiddo seems to have been definitively abandoned only in Roman times. Revelation 16:16 reflects the legendary character of Megiddo as the "valley of decision" by making Armageddon (Hebrew, har megiddon) "the mount of Megiddo," the scene of God's final judgment. B.V.

MEGILLOTH. Plural of megillah, Hebrew for "scroll." In Judaism, five scrolls are read in the synagogue on special occasions. They are the biblical books Song of Songs, Ruth, Ecclesiastes, Esther, and Lamentations. The Song of Songs is read during Passover week (on the Sabbath); the Book of Ruth is read on Shavuot (Feast of Weeks), when God gave the Commandments on Mount Sinai; Ecclesiastes is read on Sukkot (Feast of Tabernacles); Esther is read on Purim, and Lamentations is read on the ninth day of the Hebrew month Av (Tisha b'Av), when both the First Temple and the Second Temple were destroyed. L.K.

MEHER BABA (1894–1969). Indian guru, born Merwan Sheriar Irani in Poona, India, to Persian parents. Reared in Zoroastrianism, exposed to Hinduism and Christianity, Merwan converted to Sufi Muhammadism in 1913, influenced by Hazrat Babajan of that mystical sect. He adopted the name "Meher Baba," which means "compassionate father," when he decided he was God. He said "There is no doubt of my being God personified . . ." In 1921, he founded a colony, Meherabad, and decided to stop speaking, communicating by spelling out words. In 1931 he traveled to England and the United States and made disciples that continue to worship him. He died in a car accident in Oklahoma. J.C.

MELANCHTHON, PHILIPP (1497-1560). Lay colleague and friend of MARTIN LUTHER for twenty-eight years, author of the AUGSBURG CONFESSION and its Apology, founder of Germany's Protestant public school system, and leader of Lutheranism after Luther's death. Born in Bretten and orphaned at age ten, Melanchthon nevertheless became a distinguished linguist, teacher, and theologian. Educated at Heidelberg University (B.A., 1511) and Tübingen (M.A., 1514) he joined the faculty at Wittenberg University in 1518 to teach Greek. Influenced by Luther, he studied theology and received a Bachelor of Theology in 1519. Thereafter, he taught both classics and theology. In 1521 Melanchthon published his Loci Communes, Protestantism's first systematic theology. His published writings were enormous—textbooks, translations, classical treatises, theological works, commentaries. He authored Lutheranism's basic creedal statement, the Augsburg Confession (1530), and defended it in his Apology to the Augsburg Confession (1531). Basically Melanchthon agreed with Luther, but his humanism, irenic attitude, and desire for peace led many to believe that he compromised Luther's views on justification by faith alone. After Luther's death (1546) and the Lutheran military defeat at Mühlberg (1547), Melanchthon yielded to Roman Catholicism on "non-essentials" in the Augsburg-Leipzig Interims (1548) and was accused of betraying Luther. His final years were embittered by controversy. C.M.

MELCHIZEDEK. This name first appears in Genesis 14:18-20 as the priest-king of Salem (Jerusalem) who blessed Abraham on his successful return after pursuing the kings of the East and whose God (El elyon, "God Most High") Abraham recognized as his own (Gen. 14:22). At the very least, the purpose of this story is to bring into close conjunction one of Israel's remote ancestors with the city, the royalty, and the priesthood of that place that historically, only in the time of David, became Israelite. At the most, there may be an effort to evoke the circumstances of the relationship established between David and the Jebusite priesthood of Zadok after his conquest of the holy city (II Sam. 5:8-10; 8:17; I Sam. 2:35).

In Psalm 110:4 the same traditional figure of Genesis 14 appears, this time as the name for a Judahite king, who in a prophetic oracle is pronounced "a priest for ever, in the manner of Melchizedek." While we cannot be sure of the precise circumstances that dictated the wording of the oracle, it is clear that the priestly character of the kingship is being affirmed (II Sam. 8:18), even as the king's predecessor in ancient Jerusalem had been a priest-king. This sacral dimension of the monarchy (compare Pss. 45 and 72, for example) was obviously of great theological significance to important elements in Israelite society.

Hebrews 5-7 in the NT introduces Melchizedek as a type of Christ, utilizing the texts of both Genesis and the Psalms in a purely midrashic and arbitrary fashion. The author exploits the popular etymology of the name ("king of justice," "king of peace"), the fact that he is introduced without ancestry or progeny and therefore "continues for ever," that he blessed Abraham, in whom was the seed of Levi, the Jewish priesthood, and was therefore its superior. This was done in order to establish from scriptural precedent a priestly character of Jesus independent of and greater than that of the Jewish tradition from which Jesus had admittedly sprung.

This NT treatment of Melchizedek is independent of but also correlative with parallel developments in Jewish speculation (Philo of Alexandria, the Qumran literature), which delighted in seizing on the "mysterious" figures of Scripture (Enoch is another prime example) and making of them objects of unbridled imagination. In Hebrews, Melchizedek remains a type, significant only as a foreshadowing, real or contrived. In the Jewish speculation he easily becomes an eschatological figure, the personification of good versus evil, or the embodiment of a heavenly priesthood in which allegorism has taken the place of reality. B.V.

MELITO OF SARDIS. Late-second-century bishop and vigorous defender of orthodox Christianity who directly addressed Emperor Marcus Aurelius. Data about him are few, and only fragments of his numerous writings were known before Campbell Bonner in 1940 published a liturgical work preserved on papyrus. He scorned gnosticism and upheld Christ's true humanity. C.M.

From Atlas of the Bible (Thomas Nelson & Sons Limited)

Palm trees at Memphis, where once stood the palaces of the pharaohs of the Old Empire

MEMPHIS. This ancient metropolis of lower Egypt was located on the banks of the Nile about fourteen miles south of present-day Cairo. Known in the OT as Moph (Hos. 9:6) and Noph, it figures largely in the oracles of the prophets against Egypt. Isaiah taunts "the princes of Memphis" as deluded (19:13). Jeremiah announces Yahweh's threat: "Memphis shall become a waste, a ruin, without inhabitant" (46:19; compare Jer. 2:16; 44:1-10; Ezek. 30:13).

Memphis did come to ruin, of course, but not before it enjoyed a long and brilliant career. It was the capital of all of Egypt during the Old Kingdom, from the Third through the Fifth Dynasties (about 2686 to about 2160 B.C.). It never regained its central position after the reunification of Egypt by the pharaohs of the Eleventh Dynasty because the capital shifted to THEBES, but the presence of the major pyramids of Egypt near the site of Memphis gives evidence of its long importance. Fortunately, the founder of the so-called Ethiopian (XXV) dynasty, Shabaka (about 716 B.C.), ordered a record of the theology of the Memphitic cult inscribed upon a black granite stele. From this text we know that Ptah was revered there as the oldest god and as the creator of humankind. The sacred name of Memphis, "the house of the Ka of Ptah," was transliterated from the Egyptian into Greek as aiguptos; from thence it reached our Western languages as the word "Egypt." W.S.T.

MENAHM. The entire account of the reign of this sixteenth ruler of the northern kingdom of Israel is found in II Kings 15:14-23. Menahem became king by assassinating Shallum, who had attained the throne only one month earlier by killing Zechariah. According to verse 17, Menahem ruled ten years, but secular sources suggest that eight years (about 745-738 B.C.) is a more accurate time span. He came from Tirzah, the original capital of the northern kingdom (I Kings 16:23-24), about nine miles east of Samaria. In connection with his coup against Shallum, Menahem sacked the neighboring town of Tappuah and disemboweled the pregnant women whom he found there. Menahem was also remembered for paying a thousand talents of silver to the Assyrian king Pul (that is, Tiglath-pileser III), which he raised by taxing all the wealthy men of Israel fifty shekels each (II Kings 15:19-20; it has been estimated that about sixty thousand men would have had to contribute in order to raise the full sum). This report squares with Tiglath-pileser's own annals, which report receipt of tribute from Menahem of Samaria in about 738 B.C. W.S.T.

MENCIUS. The Latinized form of the name Meng Tzu (372-289? B.C.), a Confucian scholar second only to CONFUCIUS himself in importance. Mencius was born in the state of Ch'i and studied with a disciple of Confucius' grandson. Like Confucius, he wandered the country, searching for a just ruler who would put into practice his ideas of government. His ideas met with scorn, and he retired to teach his philosophy to a group of disciples.

The compilation of his works (called the Book of Mencius) was probably accomplished by his disciples after his death, although tradition credits Mencius with that work. Like the Analects of Confucius, it is a collection of statements, dialogues, and anecdotes.

Mencius insisted that human nature is basically good. Anyone seeing a child about to fall into a well will rescue the child without thinking. Evil is merely the result of a misdirection of original goodness.

Mencius counseled rulers to be virtuous and benevolent, because "the benevolent man has no enemies." He saw four beginnings that lead to virtue: the feeling of distress at the suffering of others is the beginning of humanity; the feeling of shame and dislike is the beginning of righteousness; the feeling of deference to others is the beginning of propriety; and the feeling of right and wrong is the beginning of wisdom. K./M.C.

MENDELSSOHN, MOSES (1729-86). Jewish philosopher who tried to reconcile the teachings of traditional Judaism with the ideas of the eighteenth-century ENLIGHTENMENT in Europe. Born in Dessau, Germany, he received a traditional Jewish education and later studied European languages, literature, and philosophy along with further studies of Jewish classical literature, especially the works of MAIMONIDES. He argued for the belief in the immortality of the soul and asserted that there is no conflict in JUDAISM between belief and reason. Faith in God's wisdom, righteousness, mercy, and, above all, faith in God's goodness are Mendelssohn's most fundamental religious convictions. For the celebrated dramatist Gotthold Ephraim Lessing and other liberal Germans, Mendelssohn was the realization of the Enlightenment ideal that non-Christian peoples could also produce people of innate refinement, profound knowledge, and cosmopolitan rationality. At the height of his literary fame, Mendelssohn was called the "Jewish Socrates." L.K.

MENDICANT FRIARS. Members of Roman Catholic religious orders who vow poverty, live by begging, and are forbidden as individuals to own property. The mobile medieval begging friars contrasted sharply with MONASTICISM'S stable counterparts who were bound to monastic houses. The friars' poverty was a serious criticism of monastic institutional wealth. Exempt from episcopal control, active chiefly in towns, friars preached, heard confessions, and aroused the enmity of more stationary monks and clergy. The principal early mendicant friars included the Franciscans (1210), Dominicans (1215), Carmelites (1245), Augustinians (1256), Servites (fifteenth century), and others. As feudalism disintegrated, the mendicant friars greatly influenced the growing urban centers. Many became renowned teachers, for example, Aquinas. When various bishops and princes restricted begging, friars were forced into corporate ownership of property, living chiefly by accepting group gifts and bequests. Some friars, particularly Franciscans, attempted to adhere to the original individual begging. C.M.

MENE, MENE, TEKEL, PARSIN. These words, found in Daniel 5:24-28, are the Aramaic equivalents of the mina (fifty shekels), the shekel, and the peres (a half-mina). These were units of weights and measurements which, according to the story of Daniel 5:1-6, were inscribed on the wall of the royal palace by a mysterious hand in the midst of a feast given by Belshazzar of Babylon, when blasphemous use was being made of the sacred vessels that had been pillaged from the Jerusalem Temple. When the king's wise men proved to be incapable of interpreting the writing, the Jewish hero was called in. Daniel's reading of the inscription was a prediction of the downfall of Belshazzar's kingdom, fulfilled that very night in the accession of Darius the Mede (Dan. 5:7-30).

Daniel's interpretation depends on some elaborate wordplays. Mene equals menah, meaning "numbered": "God has numbered the days of your kingdom." Tekel equals tekitab, meaning "weighed": "You have been weighed and found wanting." Peres/Parsin, "division," "Persians": "Your kingdom is divided and given to the Medes and Persians." B.V.

MENNINGER, KARL AUGUSTUS (1893– ). Founder of the Menninger Foundation, headed its School of Psychiatry as dean from 1946 to 1969, and is chairman of the board. Born in Topeka, Kansas, Menninger attended Washburn College, the University of Wisconsin (M.S., 1915), and Harvard (M.D., 1917).

He has been active in the Association for Clinical Pastoral Education. The Menninger School has long had a training program designed for clergy. Among his books are Man Against Himself (1938), Love Against Hate (1942), The Crime of Punishment (1968), and Whatever Became of Sin? (1973). I.C.

MENNONITES. The name given to a number of denominations that descended from the radical Anabaptist movement of the Protestant Reformation. The first Anabaptist congregation was established in Zurich, Switzerland, in 1525 by Conrad Grebel (1489–1526) and others influenced by the Swiss Reformer Ulrich Zwingli. They called themselves "Brethren" (Swiss Brethren) but were known popularly as Taufers (the term applied to a candidate for baptism). The appellation Anabaptist (meaning rebaptizer) came from their rejection of the practice of infant baptism and their insistence on the baptism of believers. Since Zwingli was willing to settle for reforms in the Roman Catholic church and maintenance of a church-state relationship, Grebel and his friends withdrew from Zwingli's leadership. In 1534 the first Anabaptist congregations were organized in Holland by Obbe Philips. Two years later Obbe baptized Menno Simons (1496–1561), a converted Roman Catholic priest. Soon Simons became the most prominent leader of the "Obbenites," and by 1550 the name Mennonite began to be used. (Actually the name was not used much in Holland, where the terms employed were Doopgezinden or Doopers, the Dutch equivalents of "Baptists").

Persecution of the dissenting sect in the countries

Courtesy of Paul M. Schrock

Menno Simons

of continental Europe with their established churches drove Mennonites from their homelands. The roll of Mennonite martyrs was great. After the founder of the Dutch Republic, William of Orange, had embraced the Reformed faith, he ordered the cessation of the persecution in 1577. In Switzerland the persecution continued well into the seventeenth century. After the Thirty Years' War, Mennonites were permitted to settle in the Palatinate in south Germany.

When William Penn acquired Pennsylvania from the English crown, he offered a home to all who were persecuted for their faith. The Mennonite pioneers in America were thirteen families from Crefeld, Germany, who came on the ship Concord, in 1683, and settled at Germantown, now a part of Philadelphia. During the seventeenth century many Swiss Mennonites emigrated to Pennsylvania. As their numbers increased early in the eighteenth century, the Mennonites spread northward and westward from Germantown into the surrounding counties of southeast Pennsylvania, and southward into Virginia. Later settlers moved westward into Ohio, Indiana, and Illinois, and also to Canada. Except in Holland, where they have been urban and upper class, Mennonites generally have settled in rural communities.

The beliefs of Mennonites include a strong conviction that church and state should be separated, freedom of conscience, voluntary membership in a "brotherhood" church, a discipleship that stresses the literal following of Christ and his teachings, rejection of war and violence, the practice of love and nonresistance, and practical holiness in life. Mennonites are one of the three historic peace churches, the others being the Quakers and the Church of the Brethren.

In the United States and Canada, Mennonites have established a number of colleges and secondary schools and have been involved in a variety of charitable enterprises and missionary work. While Mennonites are now concentrated in North America, particularly the United States, there are enclaves of Mennonites in Holland, Switzerland, Germany, and the U.S.S.R. (including Siberia), as well as India, Japan, Africa, and South America.

The Mennonite Central Committee is the relief and service agency of North American Mennonite and Brethren in Christ churches. All of the major Mennonite church bodies of the world participate in the program of the Mennonite World Conference. (See also AMISH and RADICAL REFORMATION.)

R.H.

Courtesy of the Israel Government Tourist Office, Houston, Texas

This giant menorah, the symbol of the State of Israel, stands in the plaza facing the Knesset

MENORAH. The Hebrew name for the seven-branched candlestick originally made by the biblical artisan Bezalel and placed in the sanctuary of the tabernacle. In the first Temple, built by Solomon, there were ten golden menorahs; in the second Temple, there was one. The menorah has since become an important symbol of Judaism and is the official symbol of the State of Israel. The one used at Hanukkah is eight-branched, with an additional socket for the "servant" light used to kindle the Hanukkah candles.

L.K.

MEPHIBOSHETH. The deliberate corruption in the text of the books of Samuel of the name Meribbaal (compare I Chr. 8:34), done because for later readers the element Baal ("Lord"), originally applied to the Israelite God Yahweh, now was referred only to the chief deity of Canaanite mythology. (Bosheth means "shame.") The name was borne by two of the descendants of King Saul.

(1) So named was one of the sons of Saul by his wife RIZPAH. David delivered this son over to the Gibeonites demanding blood vengeance and human sacrifice in recompense for the wrongs that Saul had committed against them (II Sam. 21:7-9).

(2) A nephew of the same name, a son of JONATHAN, David's friend, was spared in this slaughter, but the biblical record of his subsequent relationship to David is somewhat ambiguous. This Mephibosheth, a cripple, was taken into David's household, and his estates were protected by royal decree (II Sam. 9). This solicitude was probably also dictated by political prudence, that the last survivor of a supplanted dynasty be kept under close observation. During the insurrection of Absalom, Mephibosheth was charged with abetting the revolution in the hope of regaining Saul's throne (II Sam. 16:1-4). The charge was later refuted by Mephibosheth, who laid it to an act of treachery on the part of his servant Ziba (II Sam. 19:24-30). David's response on this occasion may indicate his inability to decide where the truth lay.

B.V.

MERCERSBURG THEOLOGY. This movement toward historic catholic traditionalism flourished from 1840 to 1860 at the German Reformed seminary at Mercersburg, Pennsylvania. Theologians JOHN W. NEVIN and PHILIP SCHAFF rejected American revivalism in favor of Reformed-Lutheran vitality, medieval piety, sacramental theology, and liturgy. They stressed Christology and the historical development of the church in their Mercersburg Review and numerous books.

N.H.

MERCURY. Ancient Roman god, patron of merchants. His worship became important only after Greek influence became widespread, when he was identified with the Greek god Hermes. However, the two gods seem to have little in common except a penchant for acquiring money. His major festival fell on May 15—the ides of May.

K./M.C.

MERCY. Jesus, quoting Hosea 6:6, declared, "Go and learn what this means, 'I desire mercy, and not sacrifice,'" (Matt. 9:13). Mercy, in the sense of compassion, not only on the old, the weak, the sick, and the poor, but also in forgiving sinners and withholding punishment for sins, is the chief characteristic of God in much of the OT and the NT. While God will surely finally allow sinners who fail to repent to find their own place outside God's fellowship with the fallen angels, nonetheless, God does not desire the death of the sinner and goes to extreme lengths to call the wicked to repentance. Yahweh, above all, is merciful. This quality of the biblical God is evoked in the great Western religions to this day.

To show mercy, an empathy for other people, despite what they may have done to us, is a cardinal virtue for Jew, Christian, and Muslim, and is equally recommended by Hinduism and Buddhism. "Love your enemies" is Jesus' extension of the practice of mercy to the furthest limits.

In the OT, Hosea is the great spokesman for God's mercy. His figure of Yahweh as the husband who cannot leave his wife (Israel), despite her sins, shows the mercy of God. Micah tells us that since we have received mercy, we must pass it on to others (Mic. 6:8). Not ceremonies and religious works, but mercy shown to others by those he has redeemed is the true wish of God (Hos. 6:6).

J.C.

MERIT. In Roman Catholic theology, the concept of a work or action that rightly deserves reward from God. While even traditional Catholic teaching on merit recognized that good works (or merits) are possible only because of God's grace, Protestantism, from Luther's 95 Theses to today, criticized the concept of merit on the basis of the Pauline doctrine of JUSTIFICATION by grace through faith on account of Christ's merits, not our own.

The idea of merit for good WORKS, especially for prayer, virginity, charity, and martyrdom, goes back to the Apostolic Fathers and is based on implications in Scripture. The classical passages cited include statements in the NT as well as the OT: Proverbs 19:17; Exodus 23:20-22; Deuteronomy 5:28-33; Matthew 5:3-12; 3:26; 6:1, 18; 7:21; 11:29; 25:34; Luke 12:8; John 4:36; Romans 2:2, 6; I Corinthians 3:8; II Timothy 4:8; Revelation 2:10; 14:3.

In this case, as in the question of good works, much of the conflict in the past grew out of a failure to recognize the development of doctrine within Scripture itself, written as it was over many centuries. The idea that good works merit a reward is an ancient one. Its major critique was in the OT, in the book of Job, which demolished the bookkeeping idea that righteous conduct automatically brings reward.

J.C.

MERKABA MYSTICISM. The earliest phase of Jewish mysticism in post-biblical times. The name is derived from the golden chariot (merkabah) of the cheubim (I Chr. 28:18). This movement emphasized God's grandeur and majesty, far removed from ordinary human affairs. To bridge this gap and reach the throne of God, humans need special methods, such as ascetic practices and special hymns. The journey toward God took the believer through a series of seven heavens and various angelic realms. On the way, there were hostile angels and other perils, but at last the mystic would achieve an ecstatic vision of God.

K./M.C.

MERODACH-BALADAN. The Hebrew distortion of an Akkadian name that means "Marduk [the god of Babylon] has given a son." The bearer of the name was a Chaldean prince who was often a thorn in the side of the Assyrian kings in the heyday of their empire and is frequently mentioned in their annals. He first appears as a vassal of Tiglath-pileser III (745-728 B.C.), but shortly after was a rebel king of Babylon resisting Sargon II of Assyria until about 710 B.C., when he was forced to flee into exile in Elam. Again under Sennacherib (704-681), he returned from exile, reassumed briefly the throne of Babylon, and reigned there until 689, when Sennacherib destroyed the city. After that he disappears from history.

In the OT Merodach-baladan appears in II Kings 20:12-19 (Isa. 39:1-8) as the king of Babylon who sent an embassy to HEZEKIAH, the king of Judah, apparently to compare resources for a possible joint resistance to the Assyrian domination of the Near East. This embassy must have taken place before 701 B.C., when Sennacherib devastated Judah (though he was unable to conquer the capital city of Jerusalem). The embassy evidently came to nothing; Assyria was not yet ready to be successfully toppled. The biblical authors who have transmitted the historical recollection of this embassy have put it into prophetic refraction and seen it as a foreshadowing of the Chaldean conquest of Jerusalem that occurred nearly a century and a quarter later. B.V.

MEROM, WATERS OF. Merom was the site of JOSHUA'S great conquest over Jabin of Hazor and the other kings of northern Galilee. Traditionally, the site of Merom was thought to be Lake Huleh, a broad marshy plain in the Jordan Valley north of the Sea of Galilee. Nineteenth-century Zionists drained this area so that Lake Huleh is now mainly farmland. Unfortunately, this site does not match the description of the battle scene in Joshua 11, nor is it reasonably close to Hazor, King Jabin's fortress city.

The more likely location of Merom is on a lesser trade route a few miles northwest of Safed. In this once-wooded area Joshua's foot soldiers would have had a much better chance to outmaneuver the chariots of the Canaanites, and to entangle them in the trees, or, as Joshua reports, to hamstring the horses and burn up the chariots. Wadi Meiron at this place carries off a considerable amount of water from a year-round spring, where the wadis eventually pass Safed heading toward the Sea of Galilee. There are in fact significant archaeological ruins at Meiron, including an ancient synagogue. Perhaps because of its fame as a shrine in Jewish history, Meiron played host to such famous first- and second-century rabbis as Hillel and Shammai, both of whom are buried there. Meiron is also twice cited in lists of cities conquered by the Egyptian kings. T.J.K.

MERTON, THOMAS (1915-68). A French-born, American TRAPPIST monk, famous as a poet and spiritual writer. Born January 31, in Prades, France, of a New Zealand father and American mother, Merton studied literature in Europe (Cambridge) and America (Columbia University), especially concentrating on poetry. He was early recognized for his free verse and blank verse creations. Strong social concerns and religious feelings moved Merton to become a Roman Catholic in 1938 and to enter the Trappist Abbey of Our Lady of Gethsemani in Kentucky, in 1941. This abbey was operated by the Reformed Cistercians of the Strict Observance (Trappists). He served as master of students, 1951–55, and as master of novices, 1955–65.

Courtesy of Religious News Service

Thomas Merton

Merton became internationally famous with the publication of his autobiography, The Seven Storey Mountain, in 1948. He continued writing, emphasizing the contemplative life, social concerns, and scholarship. Although he lived as a hermit, he was constantly sought out for advice by people of all social stations. During his twenty-seven years as a monk, Merton wrote three hundred articles and almost fifty books. Besides contemplation, Merton's major topics were pacifism and social justice. He particularly supported civil rights during the struggle of blacks in the 1960s. Above all, he championed nonviolence at home and peace among nations. Merton also investigated ways of developing the inner life, studying Eastern mysticism for clues. He became interested especially in Zen Buddhism and was given permission to attend a conference of Buddhist and Catholic monks in Bangkok, Thailand, in 1968. This conference delighted him, but was the cause of his death. He accidentally touched an electric fan with a faulty wire and was electrocuted on December 10. J.C.

MESCALINE. A substance made from the peyote plant that grows in Mexico and the southwestern United States. Discovered by Native Americans, it has been used in religious rituals to induce hallucinations. It usually requires two to three hours before taking effect and the results may last beyond twelve hours. Results include mystical visions, an experience of total unity, a sense of eternity, or an experience of the holy. Among groups using it in religious ceremonies, no evidence has been found that it is addictive. I.C.

MESHA. King of Moab. According to II Kings 3:4-27 (see also 1:1), Mesha successfully revolted against Israel after the death of Ahab, ending a subjugation that had begun a century earlier as part of the conquests of David (II Sam. 8:2). The king of Israel enlisted the aid of the kings of Judah and Edom in an attempt to bring Moab back under Israelite control. They are said to have been victorious in their attacks from the south and to have conducted an effective siege of the capital city, but they withdrew, for some reason not fully explained, after the king of Moab sacrificed his son and heir on the city wall. Extrabiblical information about Mesha is found on the MOABITE STONE. B.V.

MESHECH. A geographical/ethnic name that occurs several times in the Bible. It first appears in Genesis 10:2 (see also I Chr. 1:5) in the "table of nations" after the Flood, where Meshech is listed as one of "the sons of Japheth," along with Gomer, Magog, Madai (the Medes), Javan (the Greeks), Tubal, and Tiras. Other certain occurrences are in Ezekiel 27:13 (again with Tubal and Javan); 32:26 (with Tubal); 38:2 (with Magog and Tubal); 38:3 and 39:1 (paired with Tubal). These associations make doubtful the textual tradition of I Chronicles 1:17 and Psalm 120:5, where Meshech is otherwise related. Meshech is generally identified with the Mushku of Assyrian sources, a people associated with the Tabali (Tubal). Tiglath-pileser I (1112–1074 B.C.) claims to have conquered them, but they appear again in the time of Sargon (722–705 B.C.). They may have been the people known as Phrygians by classical authors. B.V.

MESOPOTAMIA. "(The land) between the rivers" was the name given in Hellenistic times to this great plain bounded by the Tigris and Euphrates rivers, a region that now lies mainly in Iraq, partly in Syria. In the Bible it is called, or at least the northern portion of it is called, Aram-naharaim, "Aram (Syria) of the two “rivers” (compare the title to Psalm 60), or Paddan-aram (Gen. 25:20). This was regarded as the ancestral homeland of the patriarchs.

Directly and indirectly Mesopotamia exercised enormous influence on the course of biblical history.

Palestine, the land of the Bible, lay at the crossroads of the two great centers of ancient Near Eastern civilization, Mesopotamia and Egypt, and inevitably partook of the culture of both. Whether from the time of Sumero-Akkadian Ur (around 2000 B.C.), with which biblical tradition associates the ancestry of Abraham (Gen. 11:28), or the Old Babylonian period (nineteenth to sixteenth century), with its famous law code of Hammurabi, archaeological and epigraphical evidence confirms the many cultural affinities of Palestine and Mesopotamia.

Political interference in the affairs of Syria, Canaan, and Israel did not take place from Mesopotamia until the time of the New Assyrian Empire. Under Shalmaneser III (858–824 B.C.) the Assyrians began a series of westward conquests that culminated in the destruction of the northern kingdom of Israel in 721 B.C. The successors of the Assyrians were the Chaldeans, or New Babylonian Empire, who sacked Jerusalem in 586 and carried off its chief citizens into exile. The Babylonian captivity (597–537 B.C.) was the matrix of postexilic Judaism. B.V.

MESSIAH. The English transliteration of a Semitic term meaning "anointed." It was used in the religion of ancient Israel and in other religions, ancient and modern, in connection with a rite by which a person was formally and publicly designated as having been divinely chosen and commissioned for a task or role. In early Israelite tradition, the anointed one could be a priest, a prophet, or a king. In later Jewish thinking, these roles are combined, as they were by early Christians who identified Jesus as Messiah, or God's Anointed One. In addition to using the term of those functioning in these various ways in situations contemporary with the biblical writers, hopes for renewal of Israel and defeat of its enemies were often expressed in terms of messianic expectations, or divinely commissioned agents who were yet to come. There was no single, uniform pattern for these figures, either historically or as their roles were projected into the future.

In the older biblical writings, the rite of anointing Aaron and his sons as high priests reaches its climax in the pouring of oil on the head of the one commissioned for the priesthood (Exod. 29:7; Lev. 16:32). The scene is vividly pictured in Psalm 133:2, where the precious oil runs down on Aaron's beard and the collar of his robe. Similarly, Israel's first king, Saul, is described as "the Lord's anointed" (I Sam. 24:6). Samuel had been instructed to anoint Saul (I Sam. 9:16), and soon did so (10:1), explaining to him "the word of the Lord," that he was chosen by God to reign over Israel and to deliver them from their enemies. When Saul was divinely disqualified, David was chosen to succeed him, and was anointed to replace Saul (16:6-13). In Psalm 2 the king (v. 2:6), who is described as the Lord's anointed (v. 2:2) is acclaimed as God's son (v. 2:7). This matches precisely with the divine promise to David that God has chosen him and his posterity as a "kingdom forever," and that the kings are sons of God (II Sam. 7:8-14). In Psalm 110:4, however, the one who rules over the earth in God's behalf is also described as a "priest forever." Thus even in the historical situation of Israel, the anointed agents of God are depicted as having their authority extend without limit into the future.

That implication is made explicit in the words of the prophets of Israel, especially those writing at times when the future survival of the nation seems humanly impossible. These prophetic hopes are expressed with reference to the future kings and prophets of Israel, though frequently without direct use of the term "messiah." The first stage in this development of messianic hope is to be seen in the prophecies of Isaiah of Jerusalem, who was living at a time when the northern tribes of Israel had already been carried off into captivity, and when it seemed that Judah was soon to experience the same disaster. Isaiah's visions disclose that a woman is already pregnant with the child who will grow up to see the nation's enemies defeated and the Davidic dynasty still in power (Isa. 7). Indeed, the Davidic kingdom will survive forever, as symbolized by the one whose counsel is wonderful, whose might is divine, whose paternal care endures throughout all time, and whose rule is characterized by peace (Isa. 9:6). Although this prophecy may originally have spoken of the next occupant of the throne of David, it soon came to be understood of an ideal, future king, or coming Messiah. At about the same time (eighth century B.C.), Micah was predicting that Judah's deliverance from its assailants would come through someone of lowly shepherd origins from the insignificant town of Bethlehem, which had been the birthplace of David (I Sam. 17:12). In the prophecies of Haggai and Zechariah, however, the deliverance and renewal of Israel are seen as taking place through the agency of two anointed figures: Joshua the high priest and Zerubbabel the king (Hag. 2:1-9; Zech. 3:1-10).

The messianic expectations developed to yet another stage in the sixth century B.C. after the fall of Babylon to the Persians, which resulted in the Jews being permitted to return from captivity to their own land. The Persian king who allowed them to go back to the land of Israel is called the Lord's anointed in Isaiah 45:1, since through him the restoration of God's covenant people and the transformation of their land is in process of occurring (Isa. 40:1-11). It is God who will renew the covenant people, beginning with the act of this pagan ruler, and who will bring about the triumph of God's purpose throughout the whole of creation. The instrument through whom the renewal will be consummated is not Cyrus, however, but an anonymous servant (Isa. 42:1-4), who will achieve God's purpose not by force, but by compassion and justice. Echoing the language of the servant prophecies of Isaiah 42-53, Isaiah 61 records the divine anointing of one who is the instrument of God to meet the needs of the afflicted, the imprisoned, the oppressed. In the power of God's Spirit, he effects the restoration and renewal of the land and its people, and brings to share in this new time of blessing people from alien lands and cultures (61:5-7), with the result that non-Israelites share in the worship of its God. It is this passage that Jesus is reported in Luke 4:16-21 as having first quoted and then declared to be in process of fulfillment through him.

Another term used in the OT to announce the coming of God's rule over his people and the whole of creation is the SON OF MAN (Ps. 8:4). But then the psalmist goes on to declare that God has given to this one a place of honor next to God's own and has assigned "dominion over the works of thy hands" (8:6). In Daniel 7 the term appears once more. After a vivid description of a succession of horrible beasts, which symbolize the successive pagan empires that have dominated the Middle East in the centuries down to the time of the writer (early second century B.C.), Daniel describes the throne of God and God's assignment of a universal and everlasting rule over the creation (7:14) to a mere human being ("one like a son of man," 7:13). Although Daniel goes on to identify the "one like a son of man" as the faithful remnant of God's people, or "the saints of the Most High" (7:18, 22, 27), subsequent Jewish understanding identified the Son of man as a single individual: God's agent to defeat the powers of evil and to establish God's rule on the earth.

Another anointed figure of ancient Israel's tradition was the prophet. In I Kings 19:16 Elijah is instructed to anoint, not only the kings of Syria and Israel, but Elisha, who was to be his successor. The promise of God in Deuteronomy 18:15-18 that he would raise up a prophet for Israel came to be understood as a kind of messianic expectation of a prophet, whose coming would prepare his people for the final judgment. Thus in Malachi 3:1 and 4:5, a messenger, or even Elijah, is awaited to call the faithful to repentance, "before the great and terrible day of the Lord" comes on all the earth.

Out of this range of hopes and promises, Judaism, by the time of Jesus, had formulated several messianic ideas. One of them was that God would send a nationalistic leader, who would organize Jewish armies to drive out the Romans, as Joshua had defeated the Canaanites and Judah the Maccabee had freed Jews from pagan domination in the second-century revolt. Those claiming to be messiah appeared in the A.D. 60s and again in the A.D. 130s, when two unsuccessful attempts were made to establish an independent Jewish state. Clearly, this was the "messianic" charge that the Romans brought against Jesus, since he was crucified as a pretender to the Jewish throne (15:16). Even Jesus' disciples are pictured in the Gospels as expecting him to stage a power play in establishing the kingdom of God, rather than submitting to crucifixion (8:33; 9:34; 10:37). Though the disciples are represented as acknowledging him to be the Messiah (for which the Greek equivalent is Christos, also from a word for anointing), they cannot understand a messiah who suffers and dies (10:45).

At Qumran, the Dead Sea community expected two messiahs: messiah of Aaron was a priestly figure; messiah of Israel was a lay figure, whose role was one of royal authority. Their central act of corporate worship was a meal eaten in anticipation of the banquet to be celebrated in the end time, when the two messiahs would be among them, and God's purpose for and through them would be fulfilled.

In the NT, different writers draw on different messianic titles or images to portray Jesus as Messiah or CHRIST. For Mark, Jesus is the suffering, soon to be vindicated Son of man (15:16). For Luke, Jesus is the one anointed by the Spirit to bring the good news of God's grace to the poor (4:16-21). For John, Jesus is both Lamb of God and Messiah (1:41). For Paul, Jesus is both SON OF GOD and Son of David (Rom. 1:1-4). In Hebrews, Jesus is eternal priest (5:5-6). And in Revelation he is King of kings and Lord of lords (19:11-16). That he is the Messiah, all agree. The nature of his messianic role is variously described, as the writers and the Christian communities they represent draw on and transform the rich range of messianic images in the tradition of Israel.

H.K.

MESSIANIC SECRET. It is difficult to explain the fact that in Mark, Jesus is reported as frequently forbidding both the demons (1:23-25, 34; 3:12) and the people whom he helped (1:43-45; 5:43; 7:36; 8:26) to disclose his identity as MESSIAH or agent of God. His purpose in speaking in parables is said to be in order to keep his teachings secret (4:11-12, 33-34). Near the end of his earthly career, even the disciples are forbidden to tell anyone of his identity as Son of God, "until the Son of man should have risen from the dead" (Mark 9:9).

In 1901 William Wrede, professor of NT at Breslau, published his Das Messiasgeheimnis in den Evangelien (Eng. trans. The Messianic Secret, 1881), which Albert Schweitzer in his Quest of the Historical Jesus (Eng. trans. 1910) declared to have brought that quest to a dead end, since Wrede regarded all the appeals to secrecy in Mark as contrived by him as a means of concealing the fact that Jesus had never actually claimed to be Messiah. Subsequent study has pointed out: (1) that the evidence about secrecy in Mark is far more complex than Wrede's theory assumed; (2) that in the apocalyptic world view from which Mark writes, and which was that of Jesus, it is assumed that however public the message and acts of God's prophet may be, only the elect community will grasp the truth; and (3) that Jesus' strategy as Mark portrays it is to prevent the crowd—or even his disciples—from drawing false conclusions about his messiahship until they have witnessed the central factors in that role: the cross and the Resurrection.

H.K.

METAPHOR. A metaphor is a comparison that is implied by using a word or phrase that is ordinarily linked with one thing, but is now applied to something else. For example, in Isaiah 64:8, the prophet describes Israel's relationship to God in the words, "We are the clay, and thou art our potter." In the NT Jesus tells his followers, "You are the salt of the earth" (Matt. 5:13).

In the Bible, the subject matter and the aims of metaphorical language vary widely. Some metaphors are in the realm of human relations, as in the extended portrayal of Israel as a disobedient child (Hos. 11:1-4), or the nation as an unfaithful wife (Hos. 2; Ezek. 16). Other metaphors are based on natural phenomena, such as Jude 12-13, where the faithless Christians are called "waterless clouds," "fruitless trees," and "wild waves of the sea." Elsewhere the metaphors are architectural, as in Ephesians 2:19-20, where the church is pictured as a building, although the metaphor is mixed, since it is also said to grow. Paul's favorite metaphor for the church is the body, of which Christ is the Head (I Cor. 12). H.K.

METAPHYSICS. Metaphysics refers to the analysis of the necessary and universal causes and structures of being. The word originally referred to the fourteen books of Aristotle "after the writings on physics," that is, to those works that went beyond the investigation of the several aspects of the natural world to those permanent "first causes and principles" of being, such as God, the world, and the human soul.

Inquiry into the first causes of being linked metaphysics with NATURAL THEOLOGY and, until the ENLIGHTENMENT, metaphysics was considered the natural ally of Christian theology. The philosophers DAVID HUME (1711-76) and IMMANUEL KANT (1724-1804) challenged the scientific claims of metaphysics and sought to demonstrate that it went beyond our analysis of existence, thus beyond experience, and therefore was unverifiable. For many philosophers today, metaphysics represents mere speculation or ideology. Also, since Kant, many Protestant theologians, for example, KIERKEGAARD, RITSCHL, and BARTH, have dissociated themselves from metaphysics and have appealed to biblical revelation as the only source of a true knowledge of God and man. Most Roman Catholic theologians and exponents of PROCESS THEOLOGY argue that the Kantian critique is not compelling and that metaphysics remains an important, even essential, foundation of Christian theology. J.L.

METHODIST CHURCHES. The denomination of churches that adhere to the beliefs and practices of Methodism—a revival movement sparked by the PIETISM and EVANGELICALISM of the European continent in the early eighteenth-century CHURCH OF ENGLAND. Its greatest leaders were JOHN WESLEY, CHARLES WESLEY, GEORGE WHITEFIELD, and Countess Selina Hastings, of Huntingdon.

The term "Methodist" was originally a derogatory nickname for the extremely pious Oxford students who formed the Holy Club in 1729. The leaders of the Holy Club were John and Charles Wesley, who led the group in worship and acts of charity. The club broke up in 1735, but the name continued to be applied to the Wesleys' followers. John Wesley made use of the term himself, saying that a Methodist lived according to the method of life given in the Bible.

Anglicanism was heavily infiltrated with RATIONALISM, DEISM and religious indifference during Wesley's time. The House of Bishops had been subject to the Royal House since the split from Rome under Henry VIII. The church was highly ritualistic, but the piety the laypeople saw in the Separatists and in Moravians and other German Pietists was not characteristic of the Church of England. An evangelical wing developed in the church, and many of these Anglican evangelicals became Methodists, adopting Wesley's piety.

The Wesleys hoped to remain within the established church and sought to direct their followers to evangelical Anglican priests. This hope was crushed by the opposition of the bishops and much of the clergy. All pulpits were denied to Methodist "preachers." John Wesley then embarked upon itinerant preaching, in fields and on commons, and even in work areas near factories and mines. The dimension and depth of church life in England and Wales in Wesley's time was narrow and shallow. There was little active religious observance among the poor, and among the upper classes an empty ritualism. The fervent emotionalism of the new Methodist converts and Wesley's denunciation of loose living did nothing to make the Methodist revival popular among the ruling classes. Methodism was forced, then, against Wesley's will, into an independent stance over against the Anglican church. The outbreak of revolution in the American colonies, which meant the cutting of communications with the Wesleys on the part of American Methodists, propelled John Wesley into a formal break with the established church. He ordained bishops and elders to work in America, although only a priest in the Anglican communion himself. Wesley was concerned for the mission in America, although, as a devout conservative, he supported the crown.

The Church of England had an evangelical wing before John and Charles Wesley; indeed, their father, Samuel, was part of it. There had been a system of "societies" for various pious works since 1678. These societies were, in fact, divided into "classes" of twelve people; both Anglicans and dissenters belonged, the class leader visited the class members weekly, and the group met every week for prayer. The Methodists simply adopted this system and built on it. A new tier of the organization was the circuit. Wesley and others constantly traveled to visit the societies in the circuits. After Wesley died, the next tier of the system was developed, the district. Ultimately, the districts were organized into the conference, the highest level of authority. This system of society—circuit, district, conference—became the famed Methodist “connectionalism.” Methodist polity to this day is very similar to the original organization. Contemporary Methodism is governed by a series of conferences, from the quarterly meetings of the circuit, to the district assembly, to the annual meeting of the conference. At conference meetings, three hundred lay people and three hundred ministers represent the whole conference and deal with the budget and expenditures of money. In a pastoral session, pastoral and disciplinary matters are discussed. The United Methodist church (formed 1968) has a Council of Bishops as well as a general conference.

In doctrine, the Methodist movement stood in the Protestant tradition. Wesley accepted the THIRTY-NINE ARTICLES of Anglicanism, with certain omissions and modifications. Ultimately, the Methodists embraced about twenty-four of the Thirty-nine Articles of Religion. Wesley, and his followers, modified the Protestant Reformation and the Anglican position due to Wesley’s emphasis on some particular NT passages and on his own religious experience—an experience of inspiring power communicated to Wesley by the Moravian Pietists who met in London. Interestingly, Wesley’s deep-felt assurance of salvation came not in an emotional revival but in a Bible study—while the German Pietists were reading Martin Luther’s preface to his commentary on Paul’s Epistle to the Romans. Wesley remained a pious intellectual throughout his life.

Wesley’s doctrine caused him serious problems with the Anglican clergy, and these controversies disturbed him personally and deeply. It was his stress on the necessity of cooperation with God’s grace in order to achieve salvation and especially his conviction (later surrendered, to some degree) that it was possible for the Christian to achieve the state of perfection in this life, that made Wesley the target of ecclesiastical criticism. Add to these theological positions Wesley’s urging of rigorous behavioral norms on a rather loose-living age, and one can see that Wesley’s road was a difficult one to follow.

But Wesley’s theology was heavily indebted to the Protestant Reformation. From it he took his reliance on the Bible as the Word of God and as the chief rule of faith and practice, along with rejection of the cult of the saints, relics, and purgatory. From Pietism he took his puritanical ideas on personal behavior, his emphasis on preaching, and his stand on the sacraments. He did not see regeneration as taking place in baptism, as the Catholics and Lutherans did, but saw it as a sign of a regeneration that had already occurred. He did not, however, like the sectarians, deny baptism to infants, feeling that it would strengthen their faith. Wesley emphasized the memorial aspect of the Eucharist, stressing the passion and death of Jesus rather than the real Presence.

Fundamental Methodist doctrines include: universal redemption as a possibility, since Christ died for all, not just a portion (or the elect) as held by Calvinism; justification by faith, which brings the new birth (“born again”). In this justification, Wesley thought human free will played a large role, as did good works. In justification, Wesley believed, there is freedom from outward sin, but the victory over inward sin comes only in the new birth, which renews the fallen nature of humanity. Throughout this process the Holy Spirit bears witness to the human spirit that we are adopted children of God. Ultimately, the Christian may attain to PERFECTI-ONISM, a state of complete holiness or sanctification, which means the believer will not voluntarily commit sin. This emphasis on holiness caused so much scandal (and was theologically problematic) that Wesley backed down somewhat and the later Methodist church considerably modified Wesley’s claims. It is said to be the inherent righteousness of the justified that gives the power to resist sin in contemporary Methodism. The holiness sects split away from the Methodists as the SANCTIFICATION doctrine was de-emphasized.

Wesley did not so much stress doctrine as he did the love of God and the living of a religious life through the observance of worship, festivals, and personal codes of conduct. To the traditional holy days of Anglicanism, Wesley added love feasts (the Agape) and the Moravian Watch Nights. From the beginnings of the Methodist revivals, the singing of hymns was emphasized. Charles Wesley wrote many beautiful hymns, which sparked the revival and are sung by most Christians to this day.

There was no designated creed for the early Methodists, but Wesley told American converts to adapt the Thirty-nine Articles for their use and the British preachers to use his four volumes of sermons and his notes on the NT as standards.

The Methodist movement was never unified, since the Arminian Wesleys and the Calvinistic George Whitefield did not really agree on doctrine; this division persisted after Whitefield’s death. The Calvinistic Methodists divided into three sects: Lady Huntingdon’s connection; the tabernacle connection (or Whitefield’s Methodists); and the Welsh Calvinistic Methodists, organized in 1743. The first two groups mingled with the congregational groups, and the third persisted and grew.

Among the various early Methodist bodies formed was the Methodist New Connection of Alexander Kilham in 1796, which gave the laity an equal voice with the clergy in conference affairs. Another was the primitive Methodists, who arose from the camp meeting revivals of Lorenzo Dow in 1810. This was a Presbyterian-style church. The Protestant Methodists split off in 1828 in a conflict over the installation of an organ in a chapel at Leeds. This body no longer exists.

In 1857, in Great Britain, the United Free church was formed by the merger of the Protestant Methodists, the Wesleyan Methodist Association, and the Arminian Methodists with Welsh Independent Methodists. In 1907, a union of the United Methodist Free church, the Methodist New Connection, and the Bible Christians resulted in the United Methodist church. This was accomplished by an act of Parliament. Thus three Methodist bodies emerged in Great Britain and northern Ireland in the twentieth century: the Wesleyan Methodists, the Primitive Methodist church, and the United Methodists in Great Britain.

In America the Methodist Episcopal church originated in the work of Philip Embury, who migrated to the colonies in 1766. Methodist revivalism spread along the eastern seaboard. In 1779 a controversy broke out among Methodist preachers in the South over their inability to give Communion or even administer baptism under Wesley's Anglican restrictions. These preachers proceeded to ordain themselves and set up a church organization. North of Virginia, such measures were opposed and the conference of 1780 declared the Southerners out of fellowship. The difficulties of administration by Wesley, in Britain, of colonies in revolt against the crown, caused Wesley to instruct FRANCIS ASBURY not to receive any preachers from Britain not recommended by him, and not to retain any ministers who would not agree to the disciplines of the conference. In 1784, Wesley took it upon himself to ordain THOMAS COKE and sent him to America to ordain others and set up a church organization. In December 1784, at the Baltimore Conference, preachers were elected and ordained, thus establishing the Methodist Episcopal church.

In 1844, the Methodist Episcopal church split over slavery, years before the nation divided over the same issue. Bishop James O. Andrew of Georgia became a slave owner, through marriage. The conference discipline forbade ownership of slaves, but Georgia state law prohibited setting the slaves free. The southern districts protested the conference law, but were turned down. They then signed a separation agreement, and in May 1845, the Methodist Episcopal church, South, was organized. Both northern and southern churches grew until 1861, when the Civil War devastated the Methodist Episcopal church, South. However, the southern group recovered, and in 1866 almost half the Protestants in the United States were Methodists.

A number of black Methodist churches were founded, beginning with the earliest days of mission work. The African Methodist Episcopal church dates to 1787. It grew out of Bethel Church, an all-black congregation in Philadelphia, under the leadership of Richard Allen. This establishment was due to the blacks' experience of discrimination in white churches. In 1816, the A.M.E. church became an independent church, severing ties with the Methodist Episcopal church.

The African Methodist Episcopal Zion church was begun in 1796 after friction developed between whites and blacks at John Street Church in New York City. Other black congregations joined with "Zion Church" to form an independent body in 1822.

The Christian Methodist Episcopal church was founded in 1870 as the Colored Methodist Episcopal church. The black Methodist churches quadrupled their membership in the South between 1860 and 1870.

The Methodist Protestant church was organized in 1830 in Baltimore after protests against the autocratic authority of bishops. It entered the merger in 1939 that founded the Methodist church.

The Wesleyan Methodist church was formed in 1843 over objections to compromises over slavery. It was a church "free from episcopacy and free from slavery."

The Free Methodist church was formed in 1843 over objections to compromises over slavery. It was a church "free from episcopacy and free from slavery."

The Free Methodist church was organized in 1860 by preachers and laypeople disfellowshipped by conferences in western New York. These people loudly condemned pew rents, liquor, tobacco, the use of musical instruments in church services, and what they called neglect of the preaching of entire sanctification. The name "free" was adopted to stand for free seats, freedom from clerical domination, freedom from sin, and freedom in worship.

In 1939, after long negotiations, the Methodist Episcopal church, the Methodist Episcopal church, South, and the Methodist Protestant church merged to form the Methodist church. The Methodist church had six jurisdictions: five geographical and one racial. Each had the power to elect and assign its own bishops.

The Primitive Methodist church is a transplant from England. It is divided into three annual conferences. Congregations in Maryland, Tennessee, and the District of Columbia make up the Independent Methodist churches. Among blacks, there is the Evangelist Missionary church (1886), formed in Ohio by dissidents from the A.M.E. Zion church. The New Congregational Methodists were formed in 1881 in Georgia. Also in Georgia, the Congregational Methodists were established in 1852. In 1816, the African Union Methodist Protestant church was formed by members of the A.M.E. church who disagreed on paid ministers, itinerant evangelists, and bishops. The A.M.E. Zion church was organized in 1801 in New York. The Zion Union Apostolic church was founded in Virginia in 1869.

The Evangelical United Brethren church and the Methodist church merged in 1968 to form the present United Methodist church. The U.M.C. is very large, with over nine million members, the second largest Protestant body in the United States. It is a complex mix of rural and small-town conservatism and urban and intellectual liberalism. It is, in fact, the middle of mainstream Protestantism. In recent years the U.M.C. has suffered a decline in membership due to the inroads of resurgent fundamentalism ("the Moral Majority") and the secularism that has affected most mainline churches for decades. The U.M.C., a member of both the National Council of Churches and the World Council of Churches, is ecumenical and is very active in refugee and relief work around the world.

J.C.

METHUSELAH. In the genealogy of Genesis 5, Methuselah appears as the longest-lived of the pre-Flood patriarchs, having attained an age of 969 years (Gen. 5:27). The precise rationale of the numbers in this genealogy eludes present-day interpretation; its general purpose is to indicate the passing of considerable time between the Creation and the Flood. Methuselah is probably the same as the Methushael of Genesis 4:18, who appears in a parallel genealogy employing ancient traditional names.

B.V.

METROPOLITAN. The bishop of the provincial capital, exercising jurisdiction over a whole church province and not merely a diocese. The metropolitan presides over a see approved by the pope, and exercises authority over suffragan bishops in the province. Diocese and province are church structures derived from the Roman Empire.

J.C.

METROPOLITAN COMMUNITY CHURCHES.

An association of liberal Protestant churches that are either wholly homosexual in membership or else consist of both homosexual and heterosexual members. Many of their clergy are homosexual and believe this life-style is Christian. The group was denied membership by the National Council of Churches in 1984.

J.C.

MICAH. The abbreviated form of Micaiah, meaning "who is like Yahweh," the name of a quite different PROPHET of northern Israel (the son of Imlah; see I Kings 22:8-9; Mic, 1:1). Micah, a native of Moresheth in Judah of the south, for whom the title of the sixth book of the twelve MINOR PROPHETS of the Hebrew OT is named, prophesied during the reigns of the Judahite kings Jotham, Ahaz, and Hezekiah (742-687 B.C.), partly overlapping the prophetic career of Isaiah. Micaiah ben Imlah was active in Israel to foresee the death of its king Ahab in 850 B.C.

Micah has the rare distinction of being recalled in another prophetic book: in Jeremiah 26:18 he is named as a prophet of the time of Hezekiah, and a citation is made of Micah 3:12. As is usually the case with Israel's prophets, however, few or no biographical data are supplied, and we are forced to rely on what can be conjectured from his prophetic oracles for details of his personality and career. Unlike some other prophets, he has recorded nothing about the circumstances of his call to prophecy. The Moresheth with which both Jeremiah 26:18 and Micah 1:1 identify him, also called Moresheth-gath in 1:14, was one of the towns of the hill country of southwest Judah, which along with the others mentioned in 1:10-15 undoubtedly define the neighborhood in which he lived and where he exercised his ministry.

Though he sometimes alludes to Samaria in his condemnations, a fact that dates at least part of his words prior to the demise of the northern kingdom in 721 B.C., the burden of his message is denunciation of the Judean leadership centered in Jerusalem whom he holds responsible for the exploitation and social injustice that have happened to his familiar countryside. The degree of Micah's involvement with the sufferings of the peasants and urban proletariat, whose rights he defends, has raised the question of the prophet's situation within the society for which he became a spokesman. It was frequently assumed in the past that he was one of the oppressed whose cries for redress we hear in his oracles. On the other hand, the proprietary interest that he shows in his appeal for justice enraged (3:8; compare 1:9; etc.; "my people"), together with the lofty style of so much of the prophecy, exhibit a man who was of some standing in his community, one who could confront the civil and religious establishment of Jerusalem as a social equal.

The exact significance of Micah's prophecy as well as its exact duration are questions that cannot be answered adequately, as long as it cannot be determined how much of the seven chapters of the canonical book is really, in substance at least, the utterances of the eighth-century prophet that bears his name. Hardly anyone will question that chapters 1-3 (with the exception of 2:12-13, an obvious postexilic supplement) belong to Micah. About chapters 4-5 and 6-7, respectively, however, a more censorious verdict must be rendered. In both cases, it can be argued plausibly that there is a Mican nucleus that has been progressively augmented and supplemented by later prophetic authors who kept alive in the faith community a message whose continuing relevance they recognized. Whether successive strata can be isolated and identified with precise redactional eras in later Jewish history is another question.

In its present form, whatever its redactional history, the book of Micah consists of four parts: (1) the condemnation of (Samaria and) Judah for violation of the ancient traditional laws of equality and brotherly solidarity (chaps. 1-3); (2) the future glory of a restored Zion, heir to the promises made to the Davidic dynasty (a concept shared by Isaiah, chaps. 4-5); (3) a further condemnation of Jerusalem's injustice and social anarchy, including the magnificent "prophetic lawsuit" encapsulating the essence of prophetic religion in 6:1-8 (6:1-7:6); and (4) a prophetic liturgy of future glory (7:7-20), probably mostly of a later date.

B. V.

MICAHIAH. The son of Imlah who appears in I Kings 22:8-28 as a prophet of the ninth century B.C. According to this story, he was summoned to reveal the word of the Lord concerning what was to be expected from the military campaign contemplated by AHAB the king of Israel and Jehoshaphat the king of Judah against the Arameans of Ramoth-gilead. Already Ahab's court prophets, "about four hundred men," had been consulted, and predictably they had assured the king of certain victory. Micaiah (also spelled MICAH), whom the king consulted only reluctantly, because "he never prophesies good concerning me," at first mocked the king's prophets by reiterating their words, but eventually prophesied the evil that the king had anticipated: Israel would be defeated. He accounted for the contrary predictions of the court prophets not by denying their prophetic credentials, which consisted of symbolic gestures and probably ecstatic speech, but by attributing their prophecy to a lying spirit sent deliberately to deceive and destroy the king.

Micaiah may be thought of as a kind of bridge or link between the "spirit" prophecy of the older period and the classical prophecy of word and vision characteristic of Amos and his successors in the prophetic tradition. Unfortunately we have no further information concerning him, save that he was imprisoned pending the return of the king of Israel in triumph, something that never occurred.

B. V.

MICHAEL (the archangel). In Daniel 10:13 and 10:21, in an apocalyptic vision Michael is described as "one of the chief princes" and "your prince" who struggled with "the prince of Persia," who was trying to prevent the messenger of the Lord from reaching Daniel. In Daniel 12:1 he is again characterized as "the great prince who has charge of your people." Taken together these texts reflect the late Jewish belief that every nation had its own guardian protector in the spirit world that lay behind the world of the visible. Angelology was slow in developing in OT thought, and even slower was the practice of endowing ANGELS with personality and names. The apocryphal literature was to carry the development much further.

Jude 9, which calls Michael an archangel, speaks of him as contending with the devil over the body of Moses, which is probably an allusion to the apocryphal Assumption of Moses, a midrash inspired by Deuteronomy 34:5 referring to the unknown burial place of Moses. In Revelation 12:7-8 Michael and his angels appear, again in apocalyptic vision, in combat with the dragon (Satan) and his angels, who are defeated and cast out of heaven. This passage is doubtless responsible for the later Christian theology of Michael as angelic protector of the church.

B. V.

MICHAL. A daughter of king Saul; the first wife of David, given to him after SAUL had reneged on his promise to marry David to her elder sister Merab (I Sam. 18:17-27). This was at first a love match, at least on Michal's part. She was loyal to David rather than to her father. Having learned of Saul's plan to have David killed, she arranged for his escape and concealed his absence until he was safe (I Sam. 19:11-17). However, after David's flight and during the period when he lived as the head of an outlaw band, he took other wives and Michal was given by Saul to a certain Palti or Paltiel (I Sam. 25:39-43). David's demand that Michal be returned to him as the condition of his contending for the throne after Saul's death (II Sam. 3:12-16) was doubtless motivated by his desire to legitimize his succession as heir to Saul. Michal may have had for her new husband the same devotion Paltiel so touchingly showed for her according to II Samuel 3:16. At any rate, the episode of II Samuel 6:20-23 indicates that she now despised David as a vulgar upstart, which led to the end of their marriage in all but name.

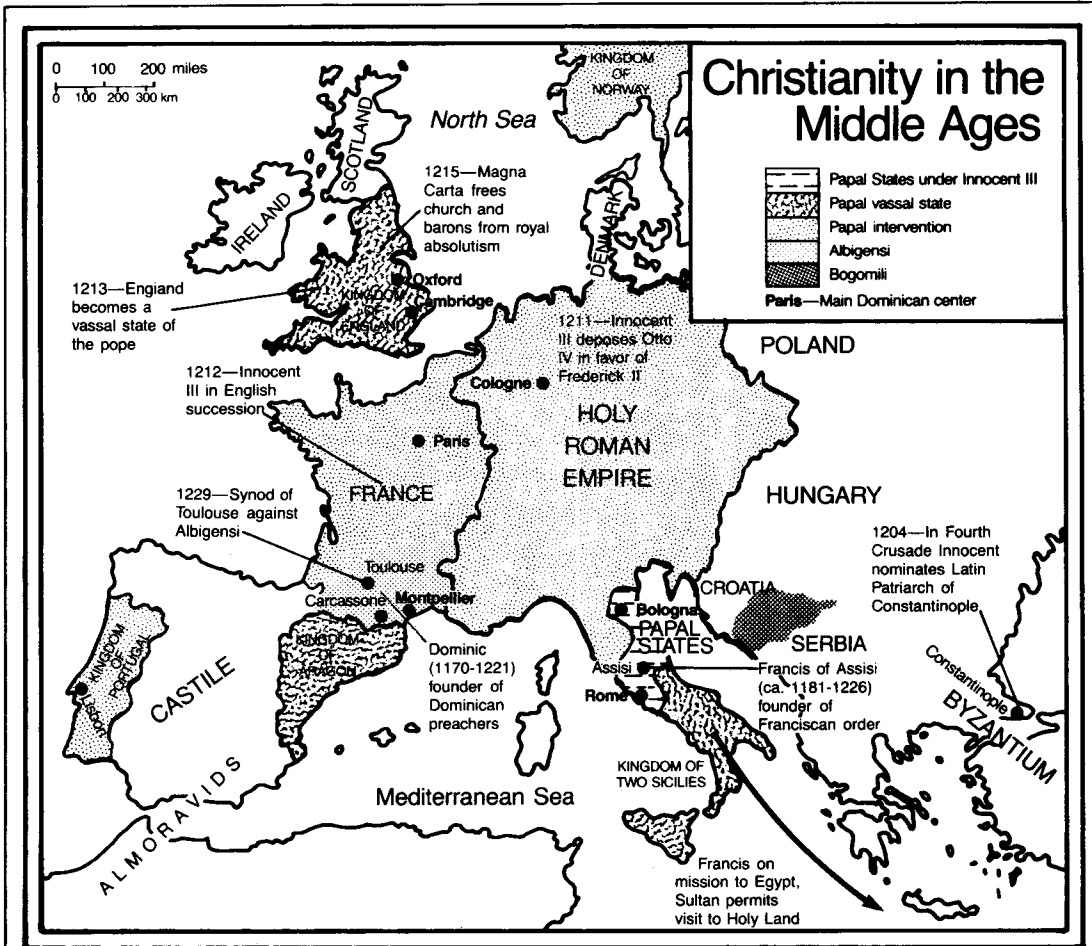

B. V.

MICHELANGELO (1475-1564). Italian Renaissance artist, renowned as a sculptor, painter, architect, and poet. Few people have reached the pinnacle achievements of Michelangelo Buonarroti. He set standards for his day and the future. Born in Caprese, Tuscany, he was raised in Florence in a stonemason's family and was apprenticed to painter Domenico Ghirlandaio at thirteen. Noticing his ability, Lorenzo de' Medici took Michelangelo into his house, allowing him to study classical sculpture and meet leading humanists. These influences and SAVONAROLA's preaching inspired the harmonizing of classical humanism and Christian austerity in his works: Bacchus, 1497; Pietà, 1499; David, 1502-1504; and many others.

Summoned to Rome by Pope Julius II, Michelangelo planned a grand sculpture of Law, Grace, and Nature for the pontiff's tomb, but Julius changed his mind. The tomb was completed on a much smaller scale after Julius' death. The famous statue of Moses, majestically angry, is part of this tomb. Although Michelangelo preferred sculpture, Julius II had engaged him to paint the SISTINE CHAPEL ceiling, 1508-12, resulting in the magnificent Creation of Light and Creation of Man frescoes. Leo X and Paul III engaged him for architecture. Under popes Clement VII and Paul III he painted The Last Judgment, 1534-41, on the altar wall of the Sistine Chapel. It displays the tragedy and gloom of much of his later work. His painted and carved nudes later created moral controversy. In the final period of his life he wrote impassioned poetry. In each artistic field Michelangelo excelled.

C. M.

Reprinted with permission of Macmillan Publishing Company, from Macmillan Atlas History of Christianity, by Franklin H. Littell. Copyright © 1976 by Carta Ltd.

Christendom in 1215

MICHMASH. Today known by the Arabic name Mukhmas, Michmash was a town about seven miles northeast of Jerusalem. In the territory of Benjamin, it was probably founded early in the Israelite occupation of Canaan. It was militarily a strategic site and figures frequently in this capacity in the OT. Perhaps it is best known as the scene of the battle of Saul and Jonathan with the Philistines and their eventual victory, even though it was temporary (I Sam. 13-14).

B. V.

MIDDLE AGES, CHRISTIANITY IN THE. The Middle Ages are usually considered to have begun with a series of momentous events that took place in the fourth and fifth centuries A.D., the most dramatic of which was the series of Germanic invasions, culminating with the fall of Rome in 410. In 476, the last Western Roman emperor was deposed. Thereafter, the West would be divided among a series of Germanic states, which would be the forerunners of modern states: the Visigoths in Spain, the Franks and Burgundians in France, the Angles and Saxons in Great Britain, and the Ostrogoths and Lombards in Italy. Meanwhile, the Eastern Roman Empire, with its capital in Constantinople, would continue existing for another thousand years.

The power vacuum left in the West by the demise of the empire was partially filled by the church; particularly by the bishop of Rome, who gradually gained dominance over the entire Western church, and a measure of political authority over most of Western Europe. When, in 800, the Western Empire was revived in the person of CHARLEMAGNE, the new emperor was crowned by the pope. This in itself was a sign of the growing power of the papacy, which would repeatedly clash with secular rulers.

The early centuries of the Middle Ages were marked by chaos and a loss of many of the achievements of classical civilization. In that situation, monasteries played an important role as the main guardians and transmitters of the wisdom of antiquity, both Christian and classical. In that process, increasing authority was given to the ancient Christian writers, to the point that eventually they came to be seen as practically infallible and possessing an authority similar to that of Scripture.

The eleventh and twelfth centuries saw the offensive against Islam in the form of the CRUSADES in the East, and the Spanish reconquista in the West. They were also a time of sharp conflict between the emperors and the popes, leading to the Concordat of Worms in 1122.

The thirteenth century was the high point of the Middle Ages. It was then that the two great mendicant orders of FRANCISCANS and DOMINICANS were founded, that GOTHIC art reached its peak, and the papacy attained its greatest power, during the reign of INNOCENT III. The thirteenth century was also the time of SCHOLASTICISM's theologians BONAVENTURE and THOMAS AQUINAS.

The fourteenth century saw the beginning of changes that some would consider a decline, and others the birth of modernity. In 1303 Pope BONIFACE VIII, who had made unprecedented claims for the papacy, was humiliated by his enemies. From that point on, with some minor exceptions, the papacy continued a decline that would only be interrupted after the Reformation of the sixteenth century. From 1309 to 1377 the popes resided at Avignon, under the shadow of France. Since this was the time of the Thirty Years' War, which involved most of Western Europe, and in that conflict the popes generally served the interests of France, their prestige throughout Europe suffered. Then, in 1378, the GREAT SCHISM began, in which there were two parallel claimants to the papal throne, and two colleges of cardinals—and at times three—until 1423. That was the heyday of CONCILIARISM, a movement claiming that a general council of the church had more authority than the pope. Eventually, conciliarism itself was divided, with two rival councils, each claiming to be the legitimate one. When the papacy finally came out of the Great Schism, most of the popes were so imbued with the spirit of the RENAISSANCE that they spent more time waging war and supervising great works of art than at their proper functions.

Meanwhile, Scholasticism had become so subtle in its distinctions that it had lost its initial power; a new sense of nationality had emerged, eclipsing the former unity of Western Christendom; Gothic art had fallen from its heights; and many of the ancient documents considered authoritative until recent times had been shown to be spurious. The Middle Ages were coming to an end.

The end of the Middle Ages is usually set at a time toward the end of the fifteenth century and the beginning of the sixteenth, when a series of events took place that would change the face of Christendom: the fall of Constantinople in 1453; the invention of the movable type printing press at about the same time; the discovery of the New World in 1492; the end of Muslim power in Western Europe in the same year; and the Protestant Reformation, early in the sixteenth century. Eventually, overenthusiastic admirers of classical times and of the Renaissance would dub the intervening thousand years the "Middle Ages," as if they had been of no significance. The truth, however, is that modern Europe was shaped during the Middle Ages, which blended the contributions of antiquity with those of the Germanic invaders.

J.G.

MIDDLE WAY. See EIGHTFOLD PATH.

MIDIANITES. The biblical name of a nomadic tribe or tribes with whom the Israelites acknowledged kinship through Abraham (Gen. 25:1-2). They are represented, as one might expect of nomads, inhabiting various rather widely separated areas, each of which could be designated "the land of Midian" (see Gen. 37:28; Exod. 3:1; Num. 22:4-7; etc.).

As with other related peoples who figured in Israel's early history, a love-hate connection was part of the tradition, according to which Midian was alternatively at the origins of Israel's religion and genius or the source of some of its most disastrous downfalls. Thus Moses is represented as having fled to Midian out of Egypt, where he wed a Midianite woman, and where he also received from her father, a Midianite priest, vital instruction in statecraft and lawgiving (Exod. 2:15-19; 18:15-27).

On the other hand, the Israelites remembered that the Midianites had harassed them in the desert (Num. 25), in the time of conquest of the Promised Land (Judg. 6-8), that they had been allied with their Moabite enemies (Josh. 13:21), and that they had sold their ancestor Joseph into slavery (Gen. 37:28).

There are no extra-biblical sources that testify to the existence of any group called "Midianites" or to any territory designated "Midian." However, the late Israeli archaeologist Yohanan Aharoni has denominated "Midianite" a distinct type of pottery from the late Canaanite period that was found in an area that at least one biblical tradition (Gen. 36:35) identifies as Midianite prior to an Edomite conquest. This ware, of geometric patterns and decorations unparalleled elsewhere in Palestine, is reminiscent of the Hurrian pottery of Nuzi in Mesopotamia. What makes this fact especially intriguing is the biblical datum that the Hurrians (in biblical language the HORITES) were aboriginal in Edom (Gen. 36:20-30). The Hurrians were, in some of their manifestations, a venerable powerful, cultivated, major non-Semitic people of the ancient Near East.

B.V.

MIDRASH. A literary creation used by rabbis to interpret passages of the Bible. The use of the midrash is a special technique or method of learning through rigorous study and painstaking inquiry into biblical verses. One type of midrash aims to define the full meaning of biblical laws; the second type seeks to derive a moral principle or lesson from the biblical text.

A midrash can take the form of a parable, saying, legend, story, or the like. For example, Genesis 12:5 reads: "And Abram took Sarai his wife, and Lot his brother's son, and all their possessions which they had gathered, and the persons that they had gotten in Haran . . ." (the Hebrew refers to "the souls they made").

How does one "make souls"?

A midrash answers that someone who brings a person near to God is as though that "someone" had created that person.

Soon after Terah and his family settled in Haran, the Haranites heard of Abram and his good works. Because he was hospitable, gave freely to the needy, and executed righteousness, Abram's name was blessed.

"Everything that you do prospers," the Haranites said to Abram. "Teach us, that we may do that which is right before God and our fellow human being."

Thus Abram "made souls."

This is a midrash.

L.K.

MILETUS. An important commercial city of Ionia on the west coast of Turkey, which reached its height in the Hellenistic period just before Christ. Like Ephesus, it had two marketplaces and a theater, which was rebuilt at the end of the first century A.D. Paul spoke to the elders of the church of Ephesus here on his third journey (Acts 20:15-35).

J.R.M.

MILLENNIUM/MILLENARIANISM. A period of one thousand years; and the teaching regarding the thousand-year period mentioned in Revelation 20:2-7. There are many forms of millenarianism or millennialism, which in earlier years was known as chiliasm. Both orthodox and heterodox segments of the church have adhered to some form of millenarianism throughout the centuries—and this is still true today. Some forms of the doctrine were taught by the Gnostics and Montanists, and many of the early church fathers were promulgators of some form of millennial teaching. Justin Martyr, Irenaeus, and Hippolytus are said to have been premillennialists.

There are three major views of the thousand-year period of blessedness—postmillennialism, premillennialism, and amillennialism. Within each of these positions there are variants.

Postmillennialism. The proponents of this view, once widely held, declare that the Second Advent of Christ, the PAROUSIA, will occur after the millennium. Those holding to this position have taught that as a result of the preaching of the gospel by the church, a period of peace and righteousness would ensue for the thousand-year period. World War II disillusionment seemed to dampen the concept that society was making moral progress. The day when the knowledge of the Lord would fill the whole earth seemed to be a wistful ideal.

Premillennialism. This is a major view held by many evangelicals, especially in the United States and Great Britain, who hold that the millennium is the time when Christ will literally reign over the earth. This, of course, means that the Second Advent must occur before Christ supernaturally sets up his millennial rule.

Premillennialists, as opposed to both postmillennialists and amillennialists, interpret the Revelation passage quite literally. Opponents of the view state that since the book of Revelation falls into the genre of apocalyptic literature, this is an indefensible approach to its interpretation. Detailed descriptions of the millennial state are provided by citations from the OT prophets who predict the restoration of a divinely ordained kingdom, when the Messiah will rule with peace and righteousness (see APOCALYPTICISM).

One of the major schools of premillennialism is called DISPENSATIONALISM, because the advocates of this viewpoint believe God has been revealed in a series of seven, more or less, dispensations. They teach that "the Kingdom" will be Jewish in orientation and will be the reestablishment of David's kingdom. In the plan of God, Christ will establish this Kingdom, postponed at his First Advent because it was spurned by the Jews.

In recent years, the variants of this position date the return of Christ as pre-tribulation, mid-tribulation, or post-tribulation. They agree that there is a period of approximately seven years called the Great Tribulation, which occurs just before the millennial reign of Christ. The pre-tribulation position, espoused by JOHN NELSON DARBY and C. I. SCOFIELD, declares that Christ will come for his church before the TRIBULATION period and thus believers will be delivered from a time of great persecution and sorrow. The alternate views place Christ's return in the middle or after the Tribulation. Dispensationalist premillennialism received a major boost through the widely distributed best seller by Hal Lindsey entitled The Late Great Planet Earth.

An increasing number of British and American evangelicals hold to what is called historic premillennialism. In so describing themselves they disavow much of the minutiae of Dispensationalism and particularly the concept that Christ's kingdom is not initiated until his Second Advent.

Amillennialism. This view is based on a symbolical interpretation of Revelation 20. Thus the figure one thousand is symbolic of fullness and completeness. Some of this school date the beginning of the millennium at Christ's First Advent. They do not accept an earthly thousand-year reign of righteousness but believe that the next eschatological event will be the return of Christ to inaugurate his reign after the present earth is destroyed in judgment and a new heaven and a new earth are revealed. The chief argument against the amillennial position is that it interprets Revelation 20 symbolically.

Many of the major communions of the church ignore or spurn all millenarian teaching. (See also ESCHATOLOGY.) R.H.

MILLER, WILLIAM (1782–1849). An early American leader of the ADVENTIST movement, Miller was born in Pittsfield, Massachusetts, to Captain William and Paulina Phelps Miller. A radical Jeffersonian and Deist, Miller was converted in 1816 as a "Calvinist" Baptist.

In order to answer his former Deist friends, he began to study the Bible. After fifteen years of study, particularly of Daniel and Revelation, he concluded that if Nehemiah 2:1 refers to 457 B.C. in Bishop USSHER's chronology, then "seventy weeks" comes out to A.D. 33, Christ's crucifixion. Thus 2,300 "days" (years) later would be 1843—Christ's SECOND COMING.

Ordained a Baptist minister in 1833, Miller began to preach his discoveries two years later. He published his lectures in 1836 as Evidence from Scripture and History of the Second Coming, dating the Second

Coming of Christ between March 1843 and March 1844. The final date he set was October 22, 1844. When this date passed, Miller, sick, discouraged, and rejected by the Baptists, returned to a small Adventist church in Vermont. In 1845 he and others formed the Adventist Association. N.H.

MILTON, JOHN (1608–74). English poet, independent religious thinker, controversial defender of freedom of the press, divorce, and separation of church and state. Born in London, educated at St. Paul's School and Christ's College, Cambridge, Milton prepared for Anglican orders, but Archbishop Laud's stringent rules turned him instead to literature.

During his early literary years (1625–40), he published "Ode on the Morning of Christ's Nativity" (1629), "L'Allegro" and "Il Penseroso" (1632), and the elegy "Lycidas" (1637) on a friend's death. Turning to politics and Presbyterianism about 1641, Milton for nineteen years wrote mostly political-social tracts, plus twenty-one sonnets, one being "On His Blindness." In 1641 he wrote Reformation of Church Discipline in England and The Reason of Church Government Urged Against Prelaty, extolling individual liberty over ecclesiastical control. The Doctrine and Discipline of Divorce (1643) argued that incompatibility was a sufficient ground for divorce, despite priestly inventions about marital sanctity. In 1644 Milton's pamphlet Areopagitica defended freedom of the press. When Parliament executed Charles I (1649), Milton repeatedly defended the action in The Tenure of Kings and Magistrates (1649), Eikonoklastes (1649), Pro Populo Anglicano Defensio (1651), and Defensio Secunda (1654). He argued for separation of church and state in A Treatise of Civil Power in Ecclesiastical Causes (1659).

Collection of the New York Public Library, Astor, Lenox and Tilden Foundations

The blind John Milton dictating Paradise Lost to his daughters

Imprisoned briefly on the restoration of Charles II, Milton returned to poetry, and during his third literary period (1660–74) produced acknowledged great pieces. Paradise Lost (1667) dealt with cosmic themes: God, humanity, creation, evil, justice. Paradise Regained (1671) dealt with Christ's wilderness temptations and reconciliation for humanity. Samson Agonistes (1671) depicted the blind biblical Samson and Milton's own struggle with blindness.

In 1643 Milton married Mary Powell, who soon left him. They were reconciled in 1645, and she died in 1652, the year Milton became totally blind. His second wife (1656) died in 1658. His third wife (1660) survived him. From 1649 to 1660 Milton was foreign secretary under CROMWELL, corresponding with foreign governments in Latin. Milton is best known for his poetry, independent views, and advocacy of intellectual freedom. He was a Puritan, but highly individualistic. De Doctrina Christiana, published posthumously, rejected the orthodox Trinity and creation ex nihilo. C.M.

Courtesy of Wayne Denny

The Qutb minaret at Delhi (thirteenth century)

MINARET. A tower attached to a MOSQUE, from which the muezzin delivers the call to prayer (adhan) in ISLAM.

The earliest mosques did not have minarets, and the call to prayer was delivered from the roof of the mosque or of a house. Everywhere that Islam spread, it adopted the native architectural style for the construction of minarets. In formerly Christian areas in the Middle East, North Africa, and Europe, square bell towers became minarets, and new minarets were built in similar shapes. In Iraq, spiral minarets were built. In Persia (Iran), cylindrical minarets with balconies became the style. Some minarets, such as the beautiful and imposing Qutb minaret in Delhi, are symbols of political power. K./M.C.

MINISTER. A minister is ordinarily understood, in both the OT and NT, as a person set apart and authorized to conduct or assist in conducting public worship. The term is from the Latin, meaning "servant." In a broader sense, the term is used for anyone in public life who oversees some business for society, as in a prime minister or minister to the king.

Old Testament. In the OT Joseph was a minister at Pharaoh's court (Gen. 39:4). In I Kings 1 and 10, ministers at the courts of David and Solomon are mentioned. In the religious sphere, Joshua was a minister to Moses (Exod. 24; 33; Josh. 1), as was Elisha to Elijah (I Kings 19; II Kings 3). The PRIESTS and LEVITES (often called Levitical priests) who served first in the tabernacle (or tent of meeting) and in the First and Second Temples were called ministers (that is, servants) of God (Exod. 28; I Kings 8; Ezra 8). It is clear that the term minister, while still used for secular governmental positions (as it is used to this day in parliamentary systems), soon came to denote a religious official of settled, recognized authority. From the time of the building of the Temple a hierarchy of high priest, priests, and Levites was established (although Moses' supposed sermons in Leviticus and Deuteronomy place the development as early as the wilderness wandering).

New Testament. In the incident when Jesus read scripture and spoke in the synagogue at Nazareth, a "minister" of the synagogue is mentioned (Luke 4:20 KJV). This was the attendant who assists the teacher or RABBI by carrying the Torah scroll from its case to the lectern. Here, the servant or assistant theme is established. John Mark (Acts 13:5) was a minister to the older Paul and Barnabas, in this sense.

Perhaps most place-names in the NT that we translate "minister" actually read diakonos in Greek, that is, slave or servant. The humble nature of serving God by serving others is the major characteristic of Christian ministry in the NT. "Whoever would be great among you must be your servant" (Matt. 20:26). This characteristic is due to the humble, selfless example of Jesus Christ, to be sure, but it may also be a rejection of the pride and officiousness of the Temple priesthood. Mary and Martha, interestingly enough, are said to minister to Jesus, and so are other women. Diakonia is the term used (Luke 10:40; Matt. 27:55; John 12:2). Paul was ministered (diakonia) to by the slave Onesimus, showing that ministry meant physical assistance as well as spiritual encouragement.

Undoubtedly, the various names applied to people clearly carrying out the functions of leading public worship, instructing others in the faith, and administering the affairs of the congregation in NT churches developed in different locales and originally meant the same thing. The terms "minister," ELDER, DEACON, BISHOP, probably pointed to the president of the congregation, the one who officiated at the daily celebration of the Eucharist. But before even this development, there was a recognized ministry of the church: the APOSTLES. These original fellow servants of Jesus came to be called "those sent" because they were empowered and "sent" by Jesus to proclaim the Kingdom of God. Whether these were only the Twelve mentioned by name or included the seventy (or even larger number) is unclear, but the limitation of the apostolate to only twelve seems a later development in the Gospel tradition. What was absolutely required (according to the church, only a few years after the Resurrection, when Paul was converted) was that the person had followed Jesus during his earthly ministry. This apostolate was to preach the gospel of the Kingdom, to cast out demonic spirits, and to bear witness to the reality of the resurrection of Christ.

By the subapostolic age (mid-first century), bishops and elders (that is, presbyters or priests) were found in most churches. In the second century, the office of bishop was elevated above presbyters, and over the next century, the monarchical bishop (or single ruling bishop) developed in most cities. From this development, the office of PATRIARCH grew, and the patriarch of the West became the POPE in Rome.

By the subapostolic age, ordination to the ministry by the laying on of hands became a fixed rite. As early as the missionary ministry of Paul and Barnabas, believers were set apart for the Lord's work by a public rite of the laying on of hands (Acts 13:3). The Pastoral Epistles mention Timothy's ordination by the laying on of the elders' hands (I Tim. 4:14). The early church's ideal portrait of the minister is given in I Timothy 4, and Paul's concept is given in II Corinthians 6.

Over the centuries the minister became a more formal, even legal, official, as canon law in the Catholic Church developed. By the late third century the ministry was hierarchically divided into bishops, priests (presbyters), and deacons. The originally equal bishops (overseers) and elders (presbyters, priests) now had quite different functions, although both bishops and priests proclaimed the gospel, officiated at the Holy Communion and baptism, led public worship, ministered to the poor and ill, and buried the dead. However, later, the right to govern the church, to ordain other ministers, and to confirm members was reserved to the bishop alone. This was one of the factors that led to the rise of the papacy and its ultimate dominance of the Western church. Eventually, the demand for reformation of the church arose in Europe in the late fifteenth and early sixteenth centuries as a direct consequence of the concentration of authority in the church in episcopal hands—especially in the bishop of Rome—alone.

After the Protestant Reformation, the power of bishops was severely curtailed and the Lutheran and Reformed churches reorganized the churches in their territories with a one-level ministry. The powers of the bishops were given to the Lutheran and Reformed synods, consistories, and presbyteries. The Church of England alone retained episcopal polity and was followed in this, in modified form, by the Methodist movement in the late eighteenth century. Although some Lutheran churches (as in Sweden) retained bishops—and several in America have recently restored the title to use—the Catholic-type episcopal power was removed from the offices. J.C.

MINOR ORDER. The lower orders of the Roman Catholic clergy, below the major orders of priest (presbyter) and bishop. The contemporary Roman Catholic Church does not believe minor orders to be sacramental since they were not instituted by Christ or the apostles. Clergy in minor orders have all the ecclesiastical privileges but are not bound by celibacy and may marry. However, with the exception of the contemporary permanent diaconate since Vatican II, if someone in minor orders marries he gives up his privileges. Minor orders are conferred by presenting the candidate with the instruments of the task to be performed. J.C.

MINOR PROPHETS. See PROPHETS (MAJOR AND MINOR).

MIRACLE. Reports of miracles appear in ancient sources—biblical (Jewish and Christian) as well as non-Israelite, Greek and Roman. Even the contents are frequently the same: healing the sick, restoring the dead to life, movements of heavenly bodies in conjunction with important earthly events. The question to be raised is not, "Do miracles happen?" but "What do they signify?" The ancients, with very few exceptions, were not troubled by the notion that a miracle was a violation of the laws of nature. Rather, miracle was a special manifestation of divine power or purpose. What that purpose was would have been understood in a variety of ways, given the changing cultural and religious context of the one reporting the miraculous occurrence.

In the OT, for example, the older layers of tradition depict miracles as signs of divine confirmation of a leader of the nation, especially in a time of crisis. In Exodus 4, Moses has been commissioned by God to lead the people out of slavery in Egypt and into the land of the Canaanites, which God has promised to give them. When Moses asks how he can persuade the people that he has indeed been called of God for this task, God provides him a series of signs intended to persuade any doubters: his rod turns into a snake and then back into a rod; his hand is stricken with, and then loses, leprosy; when he pours out the water of the Nile it becomes blood (Exod. 4:1-10). In I Kings 18, where Elijah is engaged in a contest with the priests of Baal, "the fire of the Lord" (18:38) fell and consumed the burnt offering, the wood, the stones of the altar, the dust, and the water in the trench around it. All the onlookers proclaim that Yahweh is God. Other miracles are signs of divine judgment, as when the prophet warns the wicked king Jeroboam that the pagan priests and their altar will be consumed, as indeed they quickly are. Still other miracles are signs of divine compassion, as when God, through the prophet Elisha, feeds the poor widow and her guest (II Kings 4:1-7).

In the later OT tradition, miracles are promised as signs of God's coming deliverance of the people from their oppressors and of God's special care for the faithful during their times of difficulties before the promise is fulfilled. Thus in Isaiah 35:1-7, the restoration of the nation will be accompanied by the renewal of the whole created order, with the result that the desert blossoms, new streams of water appear in it and transform it, the blind see, the deaf hear, the lame leap about, the dumb sing. In Daniel 1-3, the assurance of the divine protection of the faithful few is symbolized in the stories of God's nurturing those who refuse to eat impure food, God's preservation in the fiery furnace of those who refuse to worship the pagan king as a god, and God's protection from the lions of those who defy the royal prohibition against prayer to the God of Israel. The point is clear: God will act directly in behalf of those who stand firm against the forces of evil and their schemes to corrupt or destroy God's faithful people.

In the Gospel tradition, there is a further development of this motif, which sees miracle as a sign of God's intention to restore the creation and vindicate the divinely chosen people. In the story of Jesus' controversy with both the scribes and his own family over his ability to expel demons from those possessed of these evil powers (Mark 3:19-35; Matt. 12:22-50; Luke 11:14-16; 8:19-21), there is no question that Jesus does indeed possess this power. The issue is, What is the source of his power? Is he in league with Satan (Beelzebul)? The clear answer (Luke 11:20) is that his exorcisms are manifestations of God's power, preparing for and already bringing into reality the divine rule over the creation: "If it is by the finger of God that I cast out demons, then the kingdom of God has come upon you." Elsewhere in the Gospels, Jesus' miracles are seen as signs of divine forgiveness, as in the story of the paralytic who is both cured and pronounced forgiven (Mark 2:1-12). In Mark 5:21-43, the raising to life of Jairus' daughter is clearly a sign of triumph over death. In Acts 10:38-43 and in Paul's Letter to the Romans 1:1-4, it is the resurrection of Jesus that is presented as the sign of God's vindication of Jesus as the Son and the ground of human hope for the resurrection (I Cor. 15:20-24).

Elsewhere in Acts, miracles are represented as fulfilling a range of functions. In Acts 1:18, Judas is destroyed by an act of divine judgment, as a consequence of his having betrayed Jesus to the authorities. In Acts 5:1-11, a theme is sounded that will figure importantly in the post-NT writings, such as the so-called apocryphal Acts: failure to fulfill one's obligation to the Christian community on the part of its members may result in their sudden death. Here in Acts 5, Ananias and his wife, Sapphira, withhold part of their possessions when the Christians are to share all things in common, and accordingly they both are struck dead. In the popular romances of the period, people making a religious pilgrimage are guided on their way by visions. Just so, in Acts 10 Peter has a vision that leads him to go to the household of the Roman centurion Cornelius, and the Roman officer in turn has a vision that Peter is to visit him. This theme, which is paralleled in religious propaganda of the Roman world, is used by the author of Acts to show that God is behind the spread of Christianity from its initial center in Jerusalem to the center of the pagan world, Rome itself (Acts 28).

Similarly, the Gospel writers have accounts of divinely granted portents, through which discerning eyes can see the hand of God shaping history. Thus, the magi are led by a strange star to visit the birthplace of Jesus. Earthquakes occur (only in Matthew) at the moment of Jesus' death and of the opening of his tomb on the morning of the Resurrection (Matt. 27:51-54; 28:1-6). The Synoptic Gospels agree that the sun was darkened as the hour of Jesus' death approached (Mark 15:33; Matt. 27:45; Luke 23:44). These and similar reported occurrences are narrated by the Gospel writers as a way of pointing out that the hand of God is at work in the events that are being portrayed.

In the Gospel of John, the miracles are told in such a way as to point beyond the incidents themselves to some higher significance (20:30-31). Thus, the story of the feeding of the five thousand (6:1-14) is told in a way not dissimilar to the accounts in the other Gospels (Mark 6:30-44; Matt. 14:13-21; Luke 9:10-17), but it is followed by a lengthy discourse on Jesus as the Bread of Life (John 6:25-59). In this section, Jesus makes explicit the contrast between the benefits and limitations of God's having fed Israel through Moses in the desert of Sinai on the one hand, and God's sustaining the people through the life and ministry of Jesus on the other: "If anyone eats of this bread, he shall live forever" (6:51). Spiritual communion under the image of eating the flesh of Jesus and drinking his blood brings the promise of eternal life (6:52-59). Similarly, the story of Jesus' raising Lazarus from the dead is more than another anticipation of a resurrection: it is a guarantee of the resurrection of all the faithful to share in eternal life (11:25-26). Important as the miracles are as events in themselves, they are more significant as symbols of the new resources and rewards that are available to the community of faith.

In the eighteenth and nineteenth centuries, in both Britain and on the Continent, rationalistic thinkers began to question the possibility of miracles, on the ground that they were contrary to or violations of natural law. Some well-meaning apologists sought to show that, rightly understood, the miracles were no more than natural occurrences. For example, the explanation of the feeding of the five thousand was that everyone had brought food, but they kept it up their sleeves until the little boy shamed them by sharing his lunch with Jesus (John 6:9). The seeming miracle of Jesus' walking on the water was only a matter of his tramping through the shallows of the lake, but the misty surface led the credulous disciples into thinking Jesus was walking on the deep. Such explanations miss the point in at least two ways: the ancient world had no problem with the notion of divine intervention in human affairs; and the rationalistic explanations ignore the clear significance that these miracles were seen to have had for those who first reported them, or who passed on the older tradition. Miracle was understood to be a sign of God at work. H.K.

MIRIAM. The sister of MOSES and AARON, the daughter of Amram and Jochabed (Num. 26:59). If she is to be identified with the sister who figures in the story of Exodus 2:4-9, then she was older than Moses. However, the details of Moses' life, his family, his wife and children, and so forth, have been drawn from various strands of tradition that have not always been harmonized, and the same holds true for the figures of Miriam and Aaron.

In Exodus 15:20-21 she is called a prophetess and pictured as leading the women of Israel in dance and song, rejoicing over the destruction of Israel's Egyptian pursuers with "the Song of the Sea," thought to be one of the oldest pieces of poetry in the Bible. In Numbers 12 the story is told that she and Aaron, using Moses' marriage to a Cushite woman as a pretext, challenged the authority of Moses, putting their prophetic character on a level with his. For this presumption Miriam was temporarily afflicted with what the Bible calls leprosy. The story reflects the tendency to portray Moses as the unique person responsible for Israel's formation and may conceal the larger role that was played historically by Miriam and Aaron. In Micah 6:4 they are mentioned equally with Moses as leaders of the Exodus. According to Numbers 20:1, Miriam died during the Israelites' wandering and was buried at Kadesh. B.V.

MISHNAH. The oldest post-biblical collection of Jewish laws. The Mishnah, arranged and edited by Rabbi Judah the Prince, includes the vast mass of oral interpretation and application of the biblical laws and the decisions based thereon that had accumulated from the days of Ezra (about 450 B.C.) until about A.D. 200. Originally handed down by word of mouth through the generations, the laws became too numerous to remember unless they were organized in some logical way, and so it was necessary to compile the Mishnah. The Mishnah both lays down decisions and gives contrary legal opinions of various scholars. It is arranged in six major sections, called Orders. They are:

1. Zera'im ("Seeds"), which deals primarily with the laws of agriculture.
2. Mo'ed ("Appointed Time"), which deals with the laws of the Sabbath and the festivals.
3. Nashim ("Women"), which deals with the laws of marriage and divorce and with problems of family life.
4. Nezikin ("Damages"), which includes civil and criminal statutes and court procedures.
5. Kodashim ("Sacred Matters"), which deals with laws of sacrifice and Temple rituals.
6. Tohorot ("Purities"), which deals with laws of ritual uncleanness.

Once the Mishnah was published, it in turn became the basis for further study in the academies of learning in Palestine and Babylonia. After many centuries, these discussions were compiled to form the GEMARA. Both the Mishnah and Gemara make up the TALMUD. L.K.

MISSAL, ROMAN. The office (or worship service) book of the Roman Catholic church. The Mass is included in this book, which was called the "sacramentary" until the eighth century. The missal, as a standardized text of the various rituals of the Mass, dates from the sixteenth century. The first printed missal was issued July 14, 1570. It was revised in 1604, 1634, and 1884. Since Vatican II (1962-65), the Missal has been extensively revised because of the decision to offer the Mass in the vernacular of each country. J.C.

MISSA SOLEMNIS. A sung mass held in parish churches on Sundays and in cathedrals on a daily schedule. It is marked by the presence of a priest, a deacon, a subdeacon, and other assistants. A large number of candles are lit and incense is used. J.C.

MISSIOLOGY. This is a comparatively recent term dealing with the science of the Christian church's cross-cultural ministry. This discipline, elevated to a more scholarly level than the approach of nineteenth-century missionary philosophy, explores the nature, the purpose, and the methods of MISSION in the contemporary world. Missiology employs the discoveries of anthropology, linguistics, comparative religions, and sociology. The journal Missiology serves the interest of experts in various aspects of this field. R.H.

MISSION, HISTORY OF. Carrying the Christian message to others has been an important part of Christianity since its origin. Mission was implicit in the message of Christianity and practiced by Paul in his journeys before the appearance of specific injunctions (Matt. 28:19; Luke 24:47-49; Acts 1:4-6). By A.D. 313, despite persecutions, Christianity had penetrated the entire Roman Empire and beyond. Legends persist that some early Christians went to Arabia, Persia, and India. Ulfilas (about 311-383) invented the Gothic alphabet and translated the Bible into Gothic, and Frumentius (about A.D. 330) went to Abyssinia in Africa. Roman church missions predominated in the West; Greek Orthodox church missions in the East. The Nestorian church, begun by Nestorius, sent missionaries to India and China. Christian missions to the East and in Africa virtually ceased with the rapid expansion of the Muslims in the seventh century. The Muslims were stopped by Charles Martel at Tours in 732 and did not take Constantinople until 1453. Greek Orthodox missions expanded among the Slavs and Russians in the ninth and tenth centuries, particularly through the work of Cyril and Methodius. The Benedictine monks, founded by BENEDICT of Nursia (about 480-542), spearheaded missions in the West. Benedictine rural self-sufficiency and stability proved remarkably effective in the Middle Ages.

In the fifth century, St. PATRICK carried the gospel to Ireland, and his successors expanded to Iona, Lindisfarne, Scotland, England, and the Continent, through the work of Columba, Aidan, and Columbanus. This Irish monasticism melded with Benedictine monasticism in the eighth century, exemplified in Boniface, the greatest missionary in this period. Europe's barbarian tribes did not convert easily and often only after military conquest. In the thirteenth century the Dominicans and Franciscans arose to further Roman Catholic missions in Europe and afield. Franciscan John de Monte Corvino worked for thirty years in China, translating the Bible and winning thousands of converts.

Franciscans, Dominicans, Recollects, and Jesuits had missions in the Americas. Bartholomé de las Casas, Eusebio Kino, Jacques Marquette, Junipero Serra, and others did heroic work, converting millions to Catholicism in the Southwest, Mexico, South America, and Canada. Soon after the highly mobile and adaptable Jesuits were officially approved (1540), they began dominating Catholic education and missions. They won back much of the territory lost during the Reformation, and through Francis Xavier and Matteo Ricci extended Catholicism in India, Japan, China, and Africa. In 1622 Gregory XV formed the Congregation for the Propagation of the Faith to direct all missionary work, and Roman Catholic missions, greatly aided by the use of women religious, were very active worldwide in the eighteenth and nineteenth centuries. In 1919 Pope Benedict XV directed Roman Catholics to develop native, self-sufficient congregations, a stance that gained further recognition in Vatican II (1962-65).

Protestantism struggled for survival against the Catholic Reformation in the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries, and Protestant missions were largely to nearby localities. Calvinistic Reformed churches vigorously evangelized along the Rhine, as far east as Poland, in the British Isles, and in New England. Puritans in America began missions among the Indians with the work of John Eliot (1604-90), who translated the Bible into the Mohican language, and David Brainerd (1718-47), whose brief career inspired many later missionaries. A Protestant mission in India was established as early as 1706 by Bartholomäus Ziegenbalg (1683-1719), who was sent out by the Pietists at Halle University, Germany. Christian Friedrich Schwartz (1726-98) continued this mission with great success. Heavily influenced by Pietism, the Moravians of Germany dedicated themselves to missions, and under Count Zinzendorf, despite persecution and hardship, established self-sustaining missions throughout the world.

The Wesleyan-Whitefield evangelical revivals in England and America in the eighteenth century were springboards for numerous missionary societies that blossomed in the nineteenth century. The Methodist Missionary Society was organized in 1786, and the Baptist Missionary Society was organized in 1792 to support William Carey (1761-1834), who sailed with his large family for India in 1793. The London Missionary Society (1795), Netherlands Missionary Society (1797), Church Missionary Society (1799), British and Foreign Bible Society (1804), and the American Board of Commissioners for Foreign Mission (1810) were forerunners of scores of missionary societies in Europe and America. They sent missionaries to almost every country in the world. David Livingstone (1813-73) made African explorations that prompted the forming of the Universities' Mission to Central Africa (1859). Robert Morrison (1782-1834) distinguished himself as a translator and spearheaded Protestant work in China, and J. Hudson Taylor (1832-1905) of England founded the CHINA INLAND MISSION (1865). William Martin (1827-1916), Timothy Richard (1845-1919), and many others did significant work in China.

The powerful London Missionary Society began missionizing the South Pacific (Tahiti) in 1797 and had notable success in the work of John William (1796-1839), who was killed in New Hebrides. The Methodists won the Tonga Islands and Fiji. American Congregationalists concentrated on Hawaii. American Baptists backed the work of Adoniram Judson (1788-1850) in Burma, and the Rhenish Missionary Society supported Ludwig Nommensen (1839-1918) in Sumatra. Alexander Duff (1806-78) of Scotland pioneered educational missions in India, and education gradually became a major thrust of missions. Henry Martyn (1781-1812) became widely known for his evangelism among the Muslims in India. These early missions were almost always fraught with great danger.

The diminishing returns of competitive missions led to cooperation and division of territory among Protestants. Missionary conferences beginning in New York in 1854 resulted in forming the World Missionary Conference for ecumenical evangelism at Edinburgh in 1910 and eventually the forming of the International Missionary Council in 1921. These groups inspired twentieth-century ecumenical movements, and in 1961 the International Missionary Council united with the World Council of Churches. Missions focused on evangelization in the eighteenth and nineteenth centuries, but this focus slowly shifted to social assistance in education, medicine, agriculture, housing, etc. Outside direction has largely been displaced by the development of self-directed, indigenous leadership and sustenance. C.M.

Courtesy of the General Direction of the Vatican Museums

Mithras sacrificing a bull

MITHRAISM. The worship of Mithra, an Iranian deity, was prevalent at various periods from 1400 B.C. to 400 B.C. In Persia, from the eighth to the sixth centuries B.C. and in the Roman Empire in the second and third centuries A.D., the cult was especially prominent. Mithra was the only Iranian deity to be assimilated in the West, brought there in all probability by the Roman legions. The religion was especially appealing to the military because of its strict discipline, hierarchic series of grades, and the central motif of Mithra killing the primordial bull, which was the first act of creation. In 1973 a medallion was found in the excavation of a Mithraeum in Caesarea Maritima, Israel, depicting the bull scene. In the West the cult became a MYSTERY RELIGION and a strong rival of Christianity because of its emphasis on blood atonement, fellowship, a strong moral code, strict discipline, and a distinctive emphasis on dualism. Like many religions of the time, Mithraism taught that the soul ascended through seven realms (heavens; compare Eph. 4:9-10; Heb. 4:14), a personal salvation after death for the faithful, and punishment for the wicked. Mithra was sometimes identified with Sol Invictus, the sun god worshiped by the Romans on December 25.

J.R.M.

MITRE (Miter). A headdress of satin worn by bishops and abbots in the Roman Catholic church, while Greek Orthodox bishops wear crowns. Originally mitre meant turban. These badges of office are also worn by Anglican bishops. There are three kinds—the precious mitre, the golden mitre, and the simple mitre.

J.C.

MITZVAH. From the Hebrew term that is usually translated into English as “commandment.” The religious experiences of the Jewish people and their feeling of exultation in the performance of religious responsibilities have invested the word with a cluster of associations and connotations not inherent in it. Technically, a mitzvah is an injunction in the Bible. In addition to the biblical mitzvot, there are many mitzvot of rabbinic origin. In a general sense, the word “mitzvah” is also used for any good deed or act of piety or kindness.

L.K.

MIZPAH/MIZPEH. A fairly commonplace name in the OT, referring to at least five different sites. (1) The best-known Mizpah, probably the excavated site known as Tell en-Nasbeh, in the territory of Benjamin about eight miles north of Jerusalem, played a significant part in Israel's history from the very beginning. It was probably also built by Israelites, after the area had remained unoccupied for some time by the Canaanites. It was a place of tribal and religious assembly, where important decisions were made. Here Samuel had Saul proclaimed king (I Sam. 10:17-24), and it was one of the holy places in the circuit of Samuel's judgeship. It was spared in the devastation wrought by the Chaldeans and became the seat of government under Babylonian control (II Kings 25:23). It remained a religious center after the exile and well into Maccabean times.

(2) Another Mizpah, in southern Judah, is listed in Joshua 15:38. Its location is unknown, but the biblical context suggests that it was near Lachish.

(3) There was a Mizpah of Gilead on the Israelite-Aramean border (Gen. 31:49). This is the Ramath-mizpeh of Joshua 13:26, also the Mizpah of Judges 10:17 and, probably, the headquarters of Jephthah (Judg. 11:11).

(4) Still another Mizpah, a scene of Israelite conquest, lay south of Mount Hermon in northern Galilee (Josh. 11:3).

(5) Finally, there was a Mizpeh in the land of Moab (I Sam. 22:3), where David deposited his father and mother for safekeeping during the time of his struggle with Saul.

B.V.

MOAB/MOABITES. Geography. The land of Moab encompassed in biblical times the fertile tableland that extends eastward from the Dead Sea about thirty miles to the western edge of the Arabian desert. On the south it was bordered by Edom, divided from it by the Wadi el-Hesa (probably "the brook Zered" of Deut. 2:13). Its northern boundary was always in dispute, but nominally the Arnon gorge (the modern Wadi el-Mojib) separated it first from the Amorite kingdom of Sihon and later from the Transjordanian Israel. The distance between the two wadies north and south is about sixty miles. The Moabite plateau, rising all the way from two thousand to four thousand feet, was largely a pastureland, since climatic conditions and the proximity of the desert render agriculture difficult.

History. Surface archaeology has indicated that at the end of the Early Bronze and beginning of the Middle Bronze periods (2400–2100 B.C.), the Moabite region enjoyed a sizable sedentary population, presumably the result of incursions of the nomads out of the desert who settled the surrounding inhabitable land east and west, which makes up the so-called Fertile Crescent. It is also likely that Moab as referred to is included in the tribal name of Shutu in the Egyptian execration texts of the twentieth-nineteenth centuries B.C. (compare Num. 24:17, which parallels Moab with "the sons of Sheth"). (The execration texts, semi-magical incantations by which the pharaohs of the Twelfth Egyptian Dynasty consigned to perdition their enemies in Phoenicia, Canaan, and the Transjordan, contain numerous contemporary geographical and ethnic names and also help to document in those regions the transition from nomadic to sedentary society.) On the contrary, the Amarna correspondence (letters written to the pharaohs Amenophis III and IV in the fifteenth and fourteenth centuries B.C. from Egyptian vassals in these same regions), which in more than 350 communications thoroughly accounts for many sites in Phoenicia, Lebanon, Syria, Gilead, and all parts of Palestine, is totally silent with regard to Moab. This fact may confirm some archaeological opinion that maintains that this land was virtually uninhabited during this period.

In the time of the pharaohs Ramses II and Merneptah, Moab once again shows up on Egyptian inscriptions. Correspondingly, in the biblical story of the Exodus, which is conventionally dated to this period (1200s B.C.), the Israelites coming into Palestine from the Transjordan side after the desert wandering found there a flourishing and well-developed society with a complex history of recent development (Num. 21–24). According to this story, Moab possessed a well-established monarchy, even though its borders were insecure, like those of many other local kingdoms, in this case because of the incursions of "Amorites" and "Midianites," that is to say, some of their aggressive Semitic neighbors.

At the beginning of the Israelite monarchy, Moab seems to have been a well-stabilized kingdom enjoying good relations with the Israelite confederation on its frontiers and probably acknowledging some kind of ethnic relationship. According to I Samuel 22:3–5, David in his flight from Saul was able to take refuge there and to leave there his parents for safekeeping. A tradition transmitted by the late book of Ruth even ascribes to David a Moabite ancestry (Ruth 4:17–22). The relationship, however, did not prevent David from incorporating Moab into his little empire when he came into full power (II Sam. 8:2; Pss. 60:8; 108:9). This subjugation of the neighboring little kingdom could hardly survive the dissolution of the united kingdom after the death of Solomon.

As far as we can judge from the Moabite stela of Mesha, Moab took advantage of the breakup of the united kingdom to regain its independence only to be subjugated again under the powerful rule of Omri, king of northern Israel. But under Ahab, Omri's successor, who was otherwise occupied with other wars, and in his aftermath, Moab again successfully shook off the Israelite yoke and regained its independence (II Kings 1:1; 3:4–27). Not only did it attain autonomy, however, it also extended itself to some of its ancient frontiers, incorporating into its territory some sites that had long been considered Israelite. The neighboring land of Edom, long subject to Judah, also took the occasion of this period of weakness to become independent. Independence of Israel and Judah, however, probably counted for little in these times of rival hegemonies in Syria/Palestine.

The Arameans (centered first at Damascus, then at Hamath) were perennial marauders, but they were succeeded by the Assyrians, who subjugated the entire region in a far more businesslike fashion and submitted it to tribute. In the lists of the kingdoms subject to the Assyrian king Tiglath-pileser III (745–727 B.C.), Moab features as one. It seems to have been sufficiently pacified by the Assyrians to have escaped the devastation that Sennacherib visited upon the countryside in the 700s, and it is credited with having been a dutiful vassal to Esar-haddon (681–669) and Ashurbanipal (668–633).

The final fate of Moab is somewhat obscure. The Chaldeans, who succeeded the Assyrians as overlords of the Near East, probably put an end to Moabite polity and nationalism once and for all. The Moabites were, at all events, engulfed along with the Edomites in the Nebatean incursions of the fourth century B.C., forming part of that "Arabia" that bordered the Roman Empire in this area of the world after 63 B.C.

The People. The Moabites were a people with whom the Israelites acknowledged an ethnic relationship but whom they also rejected for historical reasons. The ethnic relationship appears, for example, in Genesis 19:30–38, an etiological story that purports to account for the origins of both Ammonites and Moabites, peoples who were forever excluded from acceptance into the communion of Israel (Deut.

23:3-4). The Genesis story is scurrilous, surely, admitting kinship only reluctantly and pejoratively. The historical circumstances that distanced Moab from Israel are stated or alluded to in numerous OT passages, beginning with the story of Numbers 21-24, which represents the Moabites as attempting to interfere with the Israelites in the initial stages of their conquest of the Promised Land. Persistent prophetic oracles against Moab (Amos 2:1-3; Isaiah 15-16; Jeremiah 48; etc.) testify to a continuous anti-Moabite animus, for reasons not clearly defined. Ezekiel 25:8-11, also an oracle against Moab, indicates that the animosity was reciprocated, and that the Moabites had taken pleasure in Judah's defeat and devastation by the Chaldeans.

Unfortunately, our knowledge of the Moabite people is virtually limited to the data supplied by the Bible. Archaeology, however, does tend to confirm the cultural affinity of Israelites and Moabites by revealing no significant differences between the two, while the stela of Mesha shows that the Moabite language was practically identical with biblical Hebrew. B.V.

MOABITE STONE. In 1868 nomadic Arabs in the Transjordan unearthed a basalt stela, over a meter in height, which proved to be a record of the exploits of MESHHA, king of Moab, written in the first person. Unfortunately the nomads shattered the stone, thinking that an object that attracted so much interest from the scholars to whom it had been shown must contain treasure, but not before a squeeze had been made of the inscription. Though imperfect, the squeeze has permitted restoration of the major part of the stela, which now stands in the Louvre museum.

The inscription appears in the Phoenician or old Hebrew script and is beautifully incised. The language differs very little from the biblical Hebrew of the period and contains some of the same idioms. Linguistically the stela confirms what the archaeology of ancient sites has suggested, that Israelites and Moabites shared much the same culture.

In the text Mesha boasts of having liberated MOAB from "the son of Omri," an evident reference to the revolt under Jehoram, Omri's grandson, described in II Kings 3:4-27. He also claims to have regained for Moab various cities occupied by Israel. Among these was Dibon, claimed by the tribe of Gad (Num. 32:34; Mesha also mentions Gad), but indeed later on proverbially Moabite (see Isa. 15:2). Dibon is doubtless to be identified with the site called Dhiban, where the stela was found, and it is likely that this city, rebuilt and renamed by Mesha, was constituted his capital. The circumstances of the geographical details and developments chronicled in the inscription lead to the conclusion that it dates from a later period in Mesha's reign than that described in the book of Kings.

The text of the Moabite Stone speaks of "devoting" conquered peoples and cities, that is, consecrating

From Atlas of the Bible (Thomas Nelson & Sons Limited)

The Moabite Stone, stela of Mesha, king of Moab

them to the national deity by total destruction even as the Israelites are represented as doing on occasion (see Josh. 6:17). It also confirms that Yahweh, mentioned by name, was and remained the God of northern Israel's worship, although the text of I Kings 13:25-33, written from a later Judahite standpoint, insinuates that the actions of the first Jeroboam resulted in wholesale apostasy from Yahwism.

B.V.

MODEIN. A town, identified with Khirbet el-Midya, about fifteen miles southeast of Tel Aviv, Israel, where the Maccabees began their desperate revolt against the Syrian monarch Antiochus IV in the second century B.C. Here the Maccabean family was born and buried (I Macc. 2:1, 70; 9:19; 13:25). Josephus saw the tomb (Antiquities), and Eusebius says it was still present in his time (Onomasticon).

J.R.M.

MODERATOR. The presiding officer of any of several Protestant denominations or Christian organizations. The term is employed particularly by churches of the Reformed or Presbyterian family. Thus, the moderator of the Presbyterian Church (U.S.A.) presides over the denomination's General Assembly for a one-year term. The nomenclature is used also for the presiding officers of the lower courts of Presbyterian churches, synods, presbyteries, and sessions. Reformed doctrine has always opposed the concept of permanent moderators or any ecclesiastical office corresponding to that of a bishop. R.H.

MODERNISM. This term is used for a variety of religious and theological movements, all of which have been critical of traditional ideas and have consciously sought to adapt Christianity to the modern world.

In the context of American Protestantism, modernism, also called scientific modernism, flourished in the early decades of the twentieth century. It stood opposed, not only to conservative biblicism, but also to middle-of-the-road LIBERALISM and advocated a more radical acceptance of modern scientific ways of thinking. SHAILER MATHEWS, author of The Faith of Modernism, defined the movement as "the use of the methods of modern science to find, state, and use the permanent and central values of inherited orthodoxy in meeting the needs of a modern world." An empirical philosophy of religion, drawing on the natural, social, and historical sciences, was to be the basis of modernist theology. The movement had its center in Chicago, but its influence was felt throughout the United States.

In the Roman Catholic church, modernism was the center of much controversy in the closing years of the nineteenth century and the opening decade of the twentieth. It included many strands: radical biblical criticism, evolutionary philosophy, and a strongly pragmatic approach to the interpretation of dogma. Among its leaders were Alfred Loisy, Lucien Laberthonniere, and GEORGE TYRRELL, who defined a modernist as "a churchman of any sort who believes in the possibility of a synthesis between the essential truth of religion and the essential truth of modernity." The modernists were condemned by the pope in 1908 and their leaders excommunicated or silenced.

In the Church of England, the word "modernism" would often be taken to mean the Modern Churchmen's Union, founded in 1898 to promote liberal ideas and maintain the comprehensiveness of the Anglican churches. In its great days it included the biblical scholar H. D. A. Major, who founded its journal, The Modern Churchman, and is often regarded as the arch-modernist of Anglicanism, and also such distinguished philosophical theologians as Hastings Rashdall and W. R. Inge. The history of the movement has been marred by its hostility to Catholicism, and though it still exists, it no longer has much influence. J.M.

MOFFATT, JAMES (1870–1944). Born in Scotland and educated at Glasgow University, James Moffatt served as a minister in the United Free Church of Scotland (1896–1912) before assuming academic posts at Mansfield College, Oxford, where he was professor of Greek (1912–15) and then at United Free College in Glasgow as professor of church history (1915–27). In 1927 he came to Union Theological Seminary in New York as Washburn Professor of Church History, and remained at Union until his death. In addition to filling distinguished lectureships (Jowett, Cunningham, Hibbert), he produced many books on a wide range of subjects, including Primer to the Novels of George Meredith (1909), Introduction to the Literature of the New Testament (1911), the International Critical Commentary on the Epistle to the Hebrews (1924), Presbyterianism (1928), Love in the New Testament (1929), Day Before Yesterday (1930), Grace in the New Testament (1931), First Five Centuries of the Church (1938), The Books of the Prophets (1939). He is perhaps best remembered today, however, for his translation of the Bible (the New Testament in 1913; the whole Bible in 1925) and for the Moffatt Commentary Series, which was based on his translation. H.K.

MOHR, JOSEPH (1792–1848). Austrian Roman Catholic priest and author of the famed Christmas carol "Silent Night! Holy Night!" Mohr was born in Salzburg, Austria, where as a youth he was a chorister in the Cathedral of Salzburg. In 1815 he was ordained a priest. While serving as the vicar of the Church of St. Nicholas in the Tyrolean village of Obendorf, high in the Austrian Alps, he was preparing for the Christmas Eve mass in 1818. To his consternation the church pipe organ broke down just before the festive occasion. That evening the young pastor wrote the poem "Stille Nacht, Heilige Nacht." He prevailed on the local schoolmaster and church organist, Franz Grüber, to write music for guitar accompaniment. On Christmas Eve, the young priest and organist sang the song for the first time. It met with quick success in the surrounding villages. When Kare Maurachen of Zillerthal, a widely known organ builder, came to repair the Obendorf organ, he heard the song played by Grüber. Through Maurachen's influence, the Strasser Children's Quartet sang "Stille Nacht" throughout Austria and Germany and even in a concert performed in the Royal Saxon Court Chapel in Pleissenburg Castle. Before long the song was being sung in many languages and versions around the world. R.H.

MOKSHA. In terms of the Hindu world view, moksha means "release, freedom, liberation," in the sense of leaping free of all constraints into unlimited being; release from bondage to the endless rebirth wrought by KARMA, and so from the toils of MAYA.

Although the particular path to liberation varies from school to school, most Hindus would regard moksha as the supreme goal of human life and would hold that it is obtained by desisting from activity that generates Karmic retribution, and above all by wisdom that sees into the true nature of reality.

Moksha's ultimate nature is one with BRAHMAN, the timeless Sole Reality, and so is unconditioned by birth, death, or grasping. Meditation is the royal road to this realization, though it can also be attained by devotional love and, according to the BHAGAVAD GITA, selfless pursuance of duty in the world. A jivan-mukta, a person believed to have attained moksha in this life, is afforded great veneration in HINDUISM and sought as a spiritual teacher. R.E.

MOLECH. It is generally thought that this word is a contemptuous deformation (using the vowels of bosheh, "shame") of the Semitic malk, melek, "king," a title sometimes bestowed on various deities (in Isa. 6:5 Yahweh is called "the King"). This explanation is preferable to that of a few scholars who point to the fact that in some languages cognate with Hebrew molk has the meaning "sacrifice," and therefore propose that the frequent expression "to Molech" (II Kings 23:10; Jer. 32:35) merely means "to offer sacrifice." Passages like Leviticus 20:1-5 seem to indicate clearly that Molech was a deity to whom human sacrifice was offered, specifically the sacrifice of infants and, even more specifically, the sacrifice of the firstborn. It is possible that the cult of Molech was a perversion of Yahwism: though human sacrifice was forbidden by the Mosaic law and attacked by the prophets, passages like Genesis 22 and Judges 11:30 show that in earlier times it was conceived as acceptable to the Lord. Much more likely, however, is that it was the resurrection of a Canaanite practice, encouraged by Judah's subjection to foreign domination. Human sacrifice was a commonplace of Israel's Semitic neighbors (see II Kings 3:27). King Ahaz, who became the vassal of Assyria, imported a foreign cult into the Jerusalem Temple (II Kings 16:10-18) and offered his own son as a burnt offering (II Kings 16:3). In the final days of the Assyrian Empire, the cult of Molech seems to have been particularly prevalent in Jerusalem, carried out at Topheth ("fiery place"), in the valley of Hinnom alongside the city (Jer. 7:31; 19:6; II Kings 21:6). B.V.

MOLTMANN, JÜRGEN, (1926– ). A leading German Protestant theologian in the period following that of KARL BARTH and RUDOLF BULTMANN. Educated at Göttingen University, Moltmann taught there and at Wuppertal, Bonn, and Hamburg, and presently serves as professor of systematic theology at Tübingen. He has focused attention on ESCHATOLOGY as the central principle in theological reconstruction. Moltmann was thrust into prominence with the publication of his Theology of Hope (1964; Eng. trans. 1967), a book that concentrated on such themes as God's promise and fulfillment, the coming of God's kingdom, and the calling of Christians to historical responsibility as the starting point for thinking about God, Christ, salvation, and the church.

Like Wolfhart Pannenberg's theme of revelation as

Courtesy of Religious News Service

Jürgen Moltmann

history, Moltmann's concentration on eschatology reasserts theology's fundamental connection with history and a rejection of all supra-historical conceptions of knowledge of God, faith, and hope. Revelation is given in and through historical existence—especially in the record of God's promise and covenant faithfulness and in the eschatological hope that quickens human openness and responsibility for history. Human obedience in facing the risks of history "between the times" is the other side of God's promise. Moltmann's "theology of hope" is profoundly influenced by and a response to the philosopher Ernst Bloch, who, in Das Prinzip Hoffnung, speaks of a "God who has the future as the mode of his being."

Moltmann's "theology of hope" leads to his second theme: political theology. The arena of Christian obedience is politics. Moltmann sees the beginning of political theology in the criticism of theology's cultural and ideological commitments. Here he is dependent on the critical theory of the Frankfurt school of social criticism, especially that of Theodor W. Adorno and Max Horkheimer. Theology must disavow subjectivism and individualism and ask what effect it has in the fields of politics, economics, and social life. Here the Calvinist tradition, with its emphasis on Christ's transformation of culture, is dominant in Moltmann's thought, in contrast to the Lutheran teaching regarding the "two realms" of church and state. Much of his writing is directed to the struggles for liberation from racism, sexism, war, and to defending human rights. Identification with the captive, the dispossessed, and the suffering focuses on Moltmann's third theme: a theology of the cross.

Hope for a politics of human liberation is, paradoxically, grounded in the cross, the sign of God's own abandonment and suffering. According to Moltmann, there is no hope for humanity in the hands of the "apathetic man of action" and the suffering that he causes. Only "Christian pathos," leading to genuine sympathy, sensitivity, and sacrificial love—and rooted in the vivifying memory of the suffering God on the cross—can be truly liberating. Pathos is the pattern of empathetic suffering, both the suffering of God for the people Israel and the church, and God's people's suffering love in solidarity with humankind. Through suffering one lives in God. For Moltmann there is no true theology of hope that is not first of all a theology of the cross.

Moltmann has lectured widely throughout Europe and North America and regularly engages in dialogue with Jewish and Roman Catholic thinkers, as well as with Marxists and secular humanists. Among his writings, in English, are Religion, Revolution, and the Future (1969), Hope and Planning (1971), The Crucified God (1974), The Experiment Hope (1975), The Church in the Power of the Spirit (1977), The Future of Creation (1979), and The Trinity and the Kingdom (1981).

J.L.

MONARCHIANISM. A term designating a theological movement in the early church (second-third centuries) that sought to safeguard the unity of the Godhead over against charges of tritheism on the one hand and on the other against Gnostic emanations of the one Deity which separated God from the world. Adoptionist or Dynamic Monarchians maintained the man Jesus was God only in the sense that the power of God the Father resided in him, thus detracting from the Incarnation. Theodotus of Byzantium and Paul of Samosata fall into this category. The Modalist Monarchians believed that Father, Son, and Holy Spirit were different modes of the one God. Noetus, Praxeas, and Sabellius fall into this typology. Tertullian modified Monarchianism by saying God is One and that Father, Son, and Holy Spirit are roles or functions of the one Godhead. His view helped shape the orthodox view expressed at Nicaea (325) and CHALCEDON (451) (See NICENE CREED/COUNCILS OF NICAEA.).

C.M.

MONASTICISM. A movement within the ancient and medieval Catholic church, developed out of early Christian asceticism, some elements of GNOSTICISM (dualism), and late Greek philosophy (Neoplatonism). The monastic movement stressed separation from the world, celibacy, strict observance of worship, and a moral, ascetic life. Gradually, earlier Anchorites (hermits) who lived alone in the desert drew together into communities, where a development of communal rules of living and an emphasis on work, study, and contemplation developed. The high point of this communal development, which became dominant in the West, was under BENEDICT of Nursia in the sixth century, whose rule remains the foundation for later monastic life in the Roman Catholic Church. In the East, hermits continued to flourish, although gradually, monks in the Orthodox churches drew together in monasteries also.

Monasticism is thus an institution formalizing the ascetic life of celibacy, poverty, and obedience (to the abbot or ruler of the order, and to the pope), which regulates the conditions of work, prayer, study, and contemplation of those committed to a life of religious devotion.

Monasticism drew on early Christian roots; the sense of being a small, saving minority in a pagan world of the NT era, the high honor given virginity and celibacy that derived from Paul and the early veneration of Mary, and the sharing of goods in the apostolic community in Acts. Early asceticism was drawn from the intense belief in the Second Coming of Christ and the soon end of the age that animated the early church. It does not derive from Manichaeism (absolute dualism), but is influenced by the philosophy of Neoplatonism current in the first five Christian centuries. Upon the elevation of Christianity to the chief religion of the Roman Empire, after Constantine, and the influx of pagans into the church, a reaction against worldliness set in. Monasticism began to grow as a moral reform movement. Augustine (fifth century) was drawn to it, also, because of his struggle to control his sexuality. After Benedict's reform, monasticism stabilized and spread throughout the West.

J.C.

MONEY CHANGERS. Two different Greek words in John 2:14-15 are used to refer to those who exchanged foreign currency and currency of different denominations. Since the time of Moses the people, rich or poor, had been required to pay a half-shekel as atonement money for the service of the tabernacle (Exod. 30:15-16). This was continued until the time of Jesus, who along with Peter is recorded as having paid the tax (Matt. 17:24-27). It was required of every male Israelite who was at least twenty years old (Exod. 30:14). According to the Mishnah, tables of money changers were set up in the provinces a month before Passover and then ten days later they were moved to the Temple in Jerusalem. Money taken up in a city was gathered together and sent on to Jerusalem as a unit. Although Roman currency prevailed at the time, the tax was to be paid in Syrian drachmae or Hebrew half-shekels (Matt. 17:27). In the last week of his life Jesus cleansed the Temple's outer court, the Court of the Gentiles, and drove out the money changers, who were also selling doves and animals (John 2:15-16). This outer Court of Gentiles was supposed to be a house of prayer for "all peoples"

(Isa. 56:6-8), not just Jews. It had been made a den of thieves (Jer. 7:11; Matt. 21:13). J.R.M.

MONICA (331-387). Mother of AUGUSTINE of Hippo. Determined and ambitious for her gifted son to be both educated and Christian, Monica was a dominant influence in Augustine's life. He regarded her as "the voice of God" in his development and wrote a moving tribute on her death (Confessions, IX). C.M.

MONOPHYSITISM. A term denoting that Christ had only a divine nature after the Incarnation—mono meaning "one," and physite meaning "nature." This controversial view about the relation of Christ's divine-human nature agitated the Eastern churches from the fourth through sixth centuries and prompted formation of the Coptic, Abyssinian, Jacobite, and Armenian churches.

The long theological-political contention in the fourth century over Christ's humanity-divinity in relation to the Father was seemingly settled at the Council of CONSTANTINOPLE in 381. However, the mode of the union of the divine-human natures in Christ soon inflamed the East. Leaders who stressed Christ's divinity at the expense of his humanity became stereotyped as Monophysites. Apollinarius, Gregory of Nazianzus, Eutyches, Jacobus Barbadeus, and Julian of Halicarnassus were so vilified. The orthodox view of the two natures in Christ reflected Cyril of Alexandria's thought and was championed by Pope Leo I, who sent his famous Tome to the Council of Chalcedon in 451. Dominated by Leo, Chalcedon declared that Christ was truly human and truly divine without any confusion, division, separation, or loss of the two natures in the single person of Christ. Many Eastern church leaders who desired to exalt the divinity of Christ rejected this declaration and formed Monophysite churches. (See also MONOTHELITISM.)

C.M.

MONOTHEISM. Literally, a belief in one god. The idea is more complicated, however, because the statement has many variants. It may be asserted that there is but one God who created and continues to sustain the world. History continues to reveal this creative will, and the ethical viewpoint of human beings arises from God who is holy. Judaism, Christianity, and Islam view God as personal.

Judaism and Islam strictly affirm that God is One. This is spelled out in the Shema (Deut. 6:4). The Qur'an emphatically voices the theme as contradicting the Christian assertion about God as TRINITY. Christianity has viewed God as being One, but having three persons or aspects. During the first few centuries of the Christian Era, theologians wrote voluminously in explication of this basic affirmation. The Nicene Creed (325) was the church's official statement to explain the relationship between the first two Persons of the Godhead.

PANTHEISM affirms that God is in all creation, in contradistinction to the idea that God created but is a Being separate from creation. Panentheism, usually connected with the thought of TEILHARD DE CHARDIN, combines pantheism with classical monotheism in saying that God is completely present in the world but has individual being apart from the world.

Some religions, including Hinduism, have affirmed that God is One but has many names. Henotheism is the belief that there are many gods, but that a particular people worship and give allegiance to one God while recognizing that other peoples act similarly in worshipping another deity. This is also referred to as monolatry. Pluriform monotheism may be described by saying that God has many forms, not simply many names or several aspects. An early form of monotheism may be found in the belief of preliterate peoples in one high God who is beyond the lesser gods in power.

Monotheism must deal with the problem of theodicy whenever it recognizes the existence of evil. Zoroastrianism solved this problem with a dualistic approach that personified evil as a force constantly at war with the good. This theme entered Christianity through Manichaeism with the assertion that the God who created the world was evil, but was superseded by the God and Father of Jesus Christ. This view was rejected by the church. (See also POLYTHEISM.)

I.C.

MONOTHELITISM. A term designating the belief that Christ had only one will. The CHALCEDON (451) statement that Christ had divine and human natures did not settle the controversy over Christ's nature. MONOPHYSITISM, a belief that Christ had only one nature (divine), embroiled the East in schisms. To unite the empire against possible Persian and Muslim invasions, Emperor Heraclius issued a statement about 624 intended to reconcile Chalcedon and Monophysite adherents. The statement declared that Christ had two natures but only one will or activity. Patriarch Sergius of Constantinople approved, after finding a similar view in Cyril of Alexandria. Some Monophysites returned to the church. When consulted, Pope Honorius loosely used the term "one will," saying the human and divine wills were indistinguishable. Honorius then approved Heraclius' Ecthesis (638), which not only used "one will" but forbade other expressions. Two councils in Constantinople (638 and 639) accepted the Ecthesis. However, popes after Honorius condemned Monothelism as a form of Monophysitism. Emperor Constans II withdrew the Ecthesis in 648 and prohibited further discussion. The Roman Lateran Council of 649 condemned this action, causing an East-West rift. After the Muslims conquered Syria and Egypt, the Council of Constantinople in 680 condemned the Monothelites, including Honorius, and declared that Christ had two wills, divine and human. C.M.

MONSIGNOR. A clerical member of the papal household, but also a title of honor used (in French) for cardinals and vicars—generals of dioceses, who are honorary Prothonotaries Apostolic. The title is French, derived from the exile of the papacy in Avignon and means “my lord.” J.C.

MONTANISM. A Christian lay movement in Asia Minor in the second and third centuries that proclaimed the age of the Holy Spirit had come as promised in John 15:26 and that all Christians should prepare for the eschaton and the establishment of the New Jerusalem at Pepuza. According to Epiphanius, Montanus began preaching about 156, saying the Spirit had seized him. He often spoke as if he were the Holy Spirit, thus giving his pronouncements a divine sanction greater than that of established church authorities, many of whom were morally lax. Two women, Prisca and Maxmilla, joined Montanus and prophesied ecstatically. Montanism stressed ascetic living, celibacy, fasting, vegetarianism, and plain dress, and denounced art, ornaments, pleasures, second marriages, and flight to avoid persecution. TERTULLIAN, its greatest convert, joined the movement shortly after A.D. 200. With its universal priesthood, moral strictness, and direct spiritual inspiration, Montanism troubled the clerical establishment and caused schismatic rifts. C.M.

MOODY, DWIGHT L. (1837–99). Evangelist. D. L. Moody was born February 5 in Northfield, Massachusetts, to Edwin and Betsey Holton Moody. His father died when Dwight was four, leaving his mother to rear nine children. He was baptized a Unitarian. At seventeen Moody went to Boston to clerk in his uncle's shoe store. Through a Sunday school teacher, he was converted and joined Mount Vernon Congregational Church on May 3, 1856.

Courtesy of the Moody Museum, Northfield, Massachusetts

Dwight L. Moody

That fall he migrated to Chicago, where he joined Plymouth Church, organized a Sunday school, evangelized among Civil War soldiers, and became president in 1866 of the YMCA. About 1860 he began to preach full time. With organist and singer IRA D. SANKEY, he conducted revivals in the British Isles in 1860, 1870, 1873–75, 1881–84, and 1891. His literal interpretation of the Bible and simple, sincere offers of salvation brought immediate response. His messages in American cities were often filled with anecdotes stressing themes of children, home, and mother's love.

Moody used funds from his and Sankey's popular hymnal to build Northfield Seminary for girls (1879), Mount Hermon School for boys (1881), Chicago (now Moody) Bible Institute (1889). His Northfield conferences for college students (1886) led to formation of the Student Volunteer movement. On August 28, 1862, he married Emma C. Revell, sister to Fleming H. Revell, who built a religious publishing empire. She gave Moody social graces and three children. N.H.

MOON, SUN MYUNG. See UNIFICATION CHURCH.

MOONIE. See UNIFICATION CHURCH.

MORALITY PLAY. An allegorical, medieval religious play very popular in the fifteen-sixteenth centuries in which characters were personifications of abstract moral qualities such as gluttony, hope, envy, love, and so forth. The anonymous Everyman, deserted by all but Good Deeds as Death looms, and Christopher Marlowe's Dr. Faustus are classic examples of morality plays. C.M.

MORAL MAJORITY. A political coalition of conservative Protestants, Roman Catholics, Jews, and Mormons banded together to exert influence on the United States government on behalf of various social, political, and economic issues. The movement was founded by the fundamentalist pastor and television evangelist Jerry Falwell, of Lynchburg, Virginia. Moral Majority, organized in 1979, along with a number of other conservative groups, was credited with aiding the election of Ronald Reagan to the presidency in 1980.

However, Moral Majority leaders claim that the organization is not a political party itself nor identified with any particular party. Moral Majority insists that it favors the separation of church and state and is committed to the principle of a pluralistic political and religious society. Its leaders declare that they do not endorse political candidates and do not attempt to elect “born again” candidates, although they have been charged by their opponents with this activity.

Moral Majority supports a number of issues, such as anti-abortion. It favors the traditional family and is opposed to homosexual practices and "special rights for homosexuals." It is opposed to the illegal drug traffic and pornography, yet insists it does not favor censorship. Moral Majority supports the State of Israel and a strong national defense. It supports equal rights for women; but has been opposed to passage of the Equal Rights Amendment. The movement boasts of a following "made up of millions of Americans, including 72,000 ministers, priests, and rabbis."

R.H.

MORAL REARMAMENT. The name given to an international moral and religious movement that developed in 1938 from the OXFORD GROUP MOVEMENT, founded by Frank Nathan Daniel Buchman (1878-1961). Buchman was born at Pennsburg, Pennsylvania, and after being educated at Muhlenberg College and Philadelphia's Lutheran Theological Seminary was ordained as a Lutheran clergyman. He was involved for a time in youth work and for three years served a Lutheran parish in Philadelphia. Somewhat disillusioned by what he felt was a lack of success in his work, he left and went to England. There, while attending the Keswick convention, he reported that he had been converted. He returned to the United States to engage in work among college students at Pennsylvania State University. Subsequently he visited India and the Far East.

Then in 1920 he met some undergraduates at Cambridge University who accompanied him on a visit to Oxford University. This was the beginning of the movement known as the Oxford Group. Employing house parties as a means of recruiting followers, Buchman promoted "conversions" through confession, surrender, guidance, and sharing. Then he stressed a life of four absolutes in purity, unselfishness, honesty, and love. Critics objected to the subjective character of his teaching with little emphasis on biblical teaching or orthodox theology. Yet the Oxford Group grew rapidly during the 1930s. The Group metamorphosed into Moral Rearmament in 1938, on the basis that Group principles could change societies as well as individuals. It soon became international in its influence, especially in Switzerland, Germany, and Africa, as well as in England and the United States.

On Buchman's death Peter Howard became his successor. Howard died in 1965 but the work has continued under a board of directors. The world headquarters is based in New York.

R.H.

MORAL THEOLOGY. A more restrictive term than Christian ethics. While both expressions refer to the study of the significance of Christian faith for the moral life, moral theology refers particularly to the practically oriented work of Catholic theologians in working out a kind of basic or minimal Christian morality for the faithful. This traditional moral theology also had a definite method. It began from the study of human nature and the question about the end of humanity, and from this it deduced a basic NATURAL LAW. It then went on to discuss the virtues and vices. An important part of moral theology was casuistry, the application of general laws to particular cases. This, in turn, was closely connected with the penitential system.

In recent years, there has been a major rethinking of moral theology. While it is still agreed that the study of human nature provides the obvious starting point, it is now seen that human nature is not, as it was long conceived, an unchanging nature set in the midst of an unchanging hierarchically ordered universe, but is a changing nature in a dynamic process of transcendence. This in turn affects the concept of natural law, which is to be understood not as an unchanging universal absolute, but as itself changing in line with developments in the human being. Also, it has been thought that the place given to natural law in the traditional scheme had a minimizing effect in the presentation of Christian morals and that a larger role has to be found for love and other distinctively Christian values and virtues.

There are questions too about CASUISTRY. Traditional casuistry often seemed excessively moralistic and legalistic, and even more it seemed to be concerned with the laxest position one could take and get by as "Christian," rather than with the radical demands of the full Christian ethic. On the other hand, the sentimentalism and generalization of so-called SITUATION ETHICS has demonstrated the need for some form of casuistry, in the sense of a detailed study of concrete moral problems. This need is reinforced when we consider how technological advance keeps raising problems that are unprecedented.

J.M.

MORAVIAN BRETHREN. An evangelical church that came into being in Bohemia and Moravia among the followers of JOHN HUSS, the Reformer, who was martyred in 1415. Huss' disciples formed an organization that came to be known as Unitas Fratrum (Unity of Brethren), which remains today as the official name of the Moravian church.

The Catholic Reformation virtually destroyed Protestantism in Bohemia and Moravia. Yet some of the believers managed to survive clandestinely until well into the eighteenth century. In 1722 Christian David gathered a few of the "hidden seed" and escorted them to the Saxony estate of Count NIKOLAUS LUDWIG VON ZINZENDORF, a German Pietist.

In combination with German Pietists the stragglers from Moravia and Bohemia worshiped at the Bertholdsdorf Lutheran Church. They called their settlement Herrnhut (literally, "the Lord's keeping"). Zinzendorf became deeply interested in the Moravians and was consecrated in 1737 as their

"bishop." Under Zinzendorf's leadership the Herrnhutes experienced a great spiritual awakening. Zinzendorf broke away from the strict legalism of AUGUST HERMANN FRANCKE, the German Pietist who had taught him at the University of Halle. He was also opposed by orthodox Lutherans and unbelieving rationalists who were suspicious of Zinzendorf's "religion of the heart," based on intimate fellowship with the Savior.

Evangelism was a dominant note in the Moravian movement. They were missionaries from the start. In 1732 two of their number were sent as missionaries to the West Indies, and in the following year a mission was begun in Greenland.

Then a group of Moravians was sent to America under the leadership of Augustus Gottlieb Spangenberg. The objects of their mission were the Creek and Cherokee Indians of Georgia. It was on a second voyage to America in 1735 that Spangenberg met a High Church Anglican, John Wesley, who was also bound for Georgia to preach to the colonists and convert the Indians. In 1738 Peter Bohler, another Moravian, established a "religious society" at Fetter Lane, London, and exercised a deep religious influence on Wesley when he returned to London. Subsequently on May 24, 1738, Wesley testified to a conversion experience as he listened to the reading of Martin Luther's Preface to the Epistle to the Romans at a meeting in Aldersgate Street.

Spangenberg's party was escorted from Georgia to Philadelphia by George Whitefield. The great Calvinistic Anglican evangelist employed the Moravians to build a school at Nazareth, Pennsylvania. Later the Moravians clashed with Whitefield over doctrine and moved to another site. Zinzendorf, newly arrived in the colonies, named the new Moravian settlement Bethlehem on Christmas Eve in 1741. Soon the Moravian missionaries moved into various parts of the world—Lapland, South America, South Africa, among the Australian aborigines, and even to the Tibetan border. They established their mission to the Miskito Indians of Nicaragua in 1849.

Theologically, the Moravians have refused the confinement of a formal creed. They are broadly evangelical, insisting upon a principle of "in essentials unity, in nonessentials liberty, and in all things charity." Their main doctrinal emphasis may be said to be upon the love of God manifested in the redemptive life and death of Jesus, the inner testimony of the Spirit, and Christian conduct in everyday affairs. The Moravian Church in America is divided into two provinces—the northern headquarters in Bethlehem and the southern in Winston-Salem, North Carolina. Membership in the United States was 54,710 in 1983. Moravians compiled the first Protestant hymnbook.

R. H.

MORDECAI. A hero in the book of ESTHER who helped save Persian Jewry from destruction. According to the story (Esth. 2:5–10:3), Haman, the prime minister, conceived a plan to kill the Jews because they would not bow down to him. Mordecai, an older cousin of Esther, the Jewish queen of Persia, found out about the plot and persuaded Queen Esther to intervene with King Ahasuerus. The king permitted the Jews to defend themselves and they were saved. According to the book of Esther, Mordecai became prominent in the court of King Ahasuerus, whose life he had saved by discovering a plot against the throne. Jews celebrate the festival of PURIM to mark the saving of the Jews.

L. K.

MORE, SIR THOMAS (1478–1535). More has been both canonized as a saint and listed among the heroes of the Russian Revolution in Red Square. Born February 7, 1478, son of Sir John More, he attended Oxford University and studied law at Lincoln's Inn. About 1504 he married Jane Colt, and after her death in 1511 he married Alice Middleton.

Truly a Renaissance man, More was friend and host to ERASMUS, wrote a history of Richard III (1518), edited HENRY VIII's Defense of the Seven Sacraments, and responded to LUTHER's criticism with seven books against heresy (1529–33). In Utopia (1516), which continues to inspire readers, More outlined an ideal society. Henry VIII named him Lord Chancellor in 1529 to succeed THOMAS WOLSEY. After the Submission of the Clergy (1532) More resigned, hoping to keep silent and avoid trouble despite Henry's break with Rome. But after the Act of Supremacy, which appointed Henry, a layman, head of the church, and the Act of Succession (1534) designated Anne Boleyn's offspring as heirs to the throne, More refused to sign the oath of supremacy and thus was beheaded July 1, 1535. His last words were, "I die the king's good servant, but God's first." He was beatified in 1886 and canonized in 1935.

More was the subject of Robert Bolt's 1960 play A Man for All Seasons and a 1966 movie version.

N. H.

MORIAH, MOUNT. In his paraphrase of I Kings 6, the author of Chronicles gives this name to the area formerly used by one Ornan (Araunah in II Sam. 24) the Jebusite as a threshing floor (II Chr. 3:1), the level crest of one of the hills of Jerusalem. It was on this site that David had had a vision of the Lord, and he had built an altar and offered sacrifice that plague might be averted from Jerusalem. This site, which had become part of the royal patrimony by David's purchase, was in turn chosen by Solomon as the place where he was to build his Temple. It is to be identified with the hilltop site in the Old City of present-day Jerusalem, bounded by the Western Wall of Herodian masonry, all that remains of the Temple that replaced Solomon's after the destruction of the latter in 586 B.C.

In Genesis 22:2 "the land of Moriah" is given as the locale of Abraham's intended sacrifice of his son Isaac. Some scholars have thought that the author of Chronicles borrowed the name from Genesis to suggest a continuity of Israelite sacrificial cult with that of the patriarchs. It is much more likely that the word is original in Chronicles and that its presence in Genesis is due to a later Jerusalemite redaction, replacing another place-name previously there, perhaps "Amorites." B.V.

MORMON. See CHURCH OF JESUS CHRIST OF LATTER-DAY SAINTS.

MORMON, BOOK OF. See BOOK OF MORMON.

MORTAL SIN. According to Roman Catholic moral theology, a mortal sin is one of such magnitude that it separates the sinner from God. While forgiveness for a mortal sin is possible through the sacraments of the church, a person dying unforgiven is condemned to hell. Such sins are contrasted with VENIAL SINS, which are not as serious in nature or else have been committed out of ignorance or in the heat of passion. PENANCE is the remedy for such sins, and at death, purgatory is available for the purging of venial sins.

In Protestantism, no such distinctions between sins are made. Sin, for Lutherans, Reformed and Anabaptists, is pride, a state of revolt against God and God's will. One is under either the power of sin or the power of God. Forgiveness cannot be obtained by acts of penance but only through the acceptance of God's freely forgiving love. J.C.

MOSES. One of the most dominant figures in the religious and historical traditions of ISRAEL, popularly regarded as the founder of its religion and chief institutions and mediator of its formative revelation of God.

His Life. The only source material for the life of Moses is the traditions preserved in the Bible, of varying age and intrinsic reliability but all remote in time from the Mosaic era and all partaking of the quality of legend. They present a composite picture of an idealized Moses that must be critically examined for its elements of internal plausibility.

The birth and origins of Moses are a case in point. In Exodus 2:10 his name (Hebrew, Mosheh) is ascribed to his having been drawn out (mashab) from the water, an obvious folk etymology. It is generally agreed nowadays that the name is actually the residue of an Egyptian proper name containing an element meaning "born of," represented in such common Egyptian names as ThutMOSE ("born of Thoth"), RaMSES ("born of Ra"), etc. At the very least, then, Moses bore an Egyptian name, which probably identified him as under the protection of a deity such as Thoth or Ra. For obvious reasons, Israelite tradition later abbreviated the name.

If he was Egyptian by name, was he also Egyptian by birth? This is not an extraordinary question. Exodus 12:38 acknowledges that the Israelites who fled Egypt in the EXODUS were a "mixed multitude," that is, combined with "foreign" elements (compare Neh. 13:3, where the same word is used). Also Genesis. 48 records the "naturalization" into Israel of the two sons of Joseph, Ephraim and Manasseh, ancestors of two of the most important tribes at the time of the Israelite confederation, born in Egypt of an Egyptian mother (Gen. 41:50-52). Moses' Israelite genealogy in Exodus 6:20 may represent another such "naturalization." In other traditions he is said to have had a foreign wife and in consequence to have been heavily influenced by his priestly father-in-law, variously called Jethro or Reuel or Hobab, a Midianite (Exod. 3:1; 2:18-21; Num. 10:29), or a Kenite (Judg. 4:11), or, perhaps, a Kushite (Num. 12:1). The story in Exodus 2:1-22 has been designed to account for Moses' Egyptian and other foreign background in later Israelite terms.

Whatever his origins, there can be little doubt that Moses became the leader of a mixed but largely Semitic population of oppressed slave-laborers engaged in the massive building projects of the Egyptian pharaohs around their capital, at that time in the Nile Delta. The message that Moses brought to this people was one of liberation in the name of a desert God whom they were able to identify with the worship of their nomadic past (Exod. 3:2-18). To what extent, if any, the Mosaic revelation was influenced by the "monotheistic" experiment of the pharaoh Amenophis IV over a century before cannot be determined. More likely, the primary influence came from Moses' Midianite/Kenite connections, which indeed the Bible suggests. Midianites and Kenites appear indifferently throughout the OT as Semitic allies, adversaries, but always close relatives of the Israelites. How many of the tribal components of what would later become in Palestine the Israelite confederation and eventually a nation formed of that mixed populace of which Moses became the leader is also uncertain. Probably there were at least the "Joseph" tribes of Ephraim and Machir (later Manasseh).

Having polarized the "Hebrews" (Exod. 1:15-20) in Egypt with the message of God's liberation and election, Moses is credited with having effected their exodus from Egypt, despite official opposition, by the working of prodigies in which the power of the Lord was made manifest (Exod. 7-12). According to Exodus 13:17 the route of the Exodus was not by way of the seacoast, which was fortified by Egyptian garrisons, but circuitously to the south. From then on, however, the biblical chronology and geography become confused and confusing. The "traditional" route of the Exodus (at its most complete in Num. 33) most certainly depends on the very latest stage of development of the composite history. On the one hand, it is quite easy to credit the stories that ascribe to this or that faction various challenges to Moses' leadership, various crises of survival, and the like. Similarly, abortive attempts to escape the desert and invade the settled land like that described in Numbers 13–14 are not hard to believe of a wandering, land-hungry people. But the stories are multiple, reduplicative, and conflicting.

The narrative of Numbers 13–14, for example, when analyzed closely, involves the Calebites, a Judahite clan that probably pertains to a quite different tradition from that of Exodus. So also, the great story of Sinai, the enactment of the covenant, and the delivery of the Law (Exod. 19 ff.), may, like the tradition of Kadesh of which the story of the Calebite incursion is a part, originally have been the property of some other component of what was eventually to become the people Israel. This is not to deny, as we shall see, the assured place that Moses has in Israelite tradition as standing at the beginning of its legal tradition.

The Moses tradition of the Exodus, which in the biblical history has been joined with that of the promise of the land to the patriarchs, leaves off before the story of the conquest, which is ascribed to Joshua, leader of the tribe of Ephraim. A connection has been made by the device of constituting Joshua as Moses' lieutenant and successor. However, it is acknowledged that Moses never had any part in Palestine but rather died before the conquest and was buried in Moab where "no man knows the place of his burial to this day" (Deut. 34:6).

As is evident, the Bible has provided less a life of Moses than it has the impression of a profound influence. Moses is credited with a typically fabulous age of 120 years (Deut. 34:7), artificially compartmentalized into three forty-year spans: in Egypt, in Midian, and in the Exodus wilderness. Little effort has been made to ascribe to him any defined personal traits. Even the note in Exodus 4:10–17, which marks him slow of speech and in need of an interpreter in the person of his brother Aaron, is not followed up. Moses acts in his own right in all that follows, and we are left to imagine that this note is an isolated Aaronite strand in the tradition.

The Figure of Moses. Like other figures of history known to us only by the legends they have inspired and the imprint they have left upon consequent events and movements, Moses is of less interest to us as a person than as the personality that lies behind and is presupposed by enduring institutions that hardly could be conceived in its absence. The existence of Israel and later of Judaism is testimony to the historicity of Moses, since neither the one nor the other has ever been ascribed to any other author, and had there been no Moses it would be impossible to account for either. In Israelite and Jewish tradition Moses has been celebrated primarily as founder, lawgiver, prophet, and priest—in a word, as giving these living entities their essential identity as people, religion, and elected community with a transcendent vision and vocation.

Though the Exodus experience was doubtless proper to only some elements that made up the incipient Israel and was appropriated by others, there is no doubt that it, together with its identification as the saving act of the God Yahweh, formed the single most essential constitutive of this people, to which every other was explicative or supplementary. The subsequent history of Israel gives almost unanimous voice to this fact. There is no rival to Moses in the subsequent tradition to whom the responsibility for the fact was ever ascribed.

That the whole of Israel's legal tradition, encompassing the codes and collections now found principally in the books of Exodus through Deuteronomy, should be described simply as the Law of Moses, speaks to the recognition of his dominance in the formation of this tradition. Much of Israelite law, it is true, can be closely paralleled in the legislation of the rest of the ancient Near East of which Israel was a part, due allowances made for the disparities between the specific societies to which the laws were tailored. But while a comparative study of Israel's law over against the parallels can yield both pluses and minuses, there is little doubt that it yields also the impression of a distinct and exclusive inspiration that guided the application of common legal principles. Also, though it is not entirely true that Israel was in sole possession of apodictic law in ancient times (the imperative "thou shalt" and the "shalt not" of laws such as those of the Decalogue), still, quantitatively, it is overwhelmingly true, a fact pointing once more to a distinct and magisterial influence standing at the origin of Israel's legislation. Again, biblical tradition allows no claimant other than Moses to have exercised such influence. Typical of the global attribution of Israel's legal tradition to Moses is Numbers 18:13–27, according to which even the organization of court procedure was of his devising—at the instigation of his Kenite/Midianite father-in-law.

The prophecy that Moses is credited with having begun in Israel is that of the ecstatic type (Num. 11:24–30), which is characteristic certainly of Israel's early days (I Sam. 10:10–13; 19:20–21; etc.), and not only of its early days, but also of most other religions, contemporary and afterward, ancient and modern. This affirmation surely must be put down to the tendency of the later tradition to make Moses the author of literally everything Israelite. Nowhere is it suggested (as it is suggested, for example, of lesser figures such as Samuel or Elijah) that Moses stood at the head of the really distinctively Israelite classical prophecy represented in the prophetic literature of the OT. On the other hand, Israelite tradition represented in the OT habitually makes no distinction between one kind of PROPHET and another. Furthermore, as Deuteronomy 34:10–12 points out, Moses was remembered not so much as being one, even the chief one, of the prophetic succession as he was the one superior to all prophets, as having had an immediacy to the mind of God that was not possessed by a mere prophet.

The priestly character of Moses is similarly ambiguous in the tradition in view of conflicting concerns. In the final form of the tradition, Moses is given instructions from the Lord for the ordination of his brother AARON and his descendants to be the sole priesthood of Israel (throughout the book of Leviticus). This represents some successive developments. For one thing, it reflects an Aaronite tendency in some of the traditions at the expense of Moses (similarly in Exod. 4:10-17 Aaron is appointed spokesman for an "inarticulate" Moses—a theme that is followed up not at all in the rest of the succeeding narrative). Also involved was the legitimation of the Zadokite priesthood, which David found in Jerusalem and which was given an Israelite genealogy through Aaron (I Chr. 6:35-38). The phrase "Levitical priests," customary in the Deuteronomic literature, reflects an older, less restrictive concept of the hereditary priesthood according to which all LEVITES pertained to the priestly order. In turn, this represents only one stage in a complicated development, but there is no doubt that at one time the priestly character in Israel was calculated on the criterion of descent from Moses (see Judg. 18:30).

Moses and Judaism. The late tendency of Israelite tradition to maximize the figure of Moses could only result in the even later Judaism that so exalted the Law of Moses as the essence of the religion derived from the OT into a concept of Moses that quite surpassed the historical and made of him a mythical personage. Both in Hellenistic Judaism (Philo of Alexandria) and in that of Palestine, Moses becomes a figure of legend, the subject and also the putative author of various Apocryphal works, the source of revealed knowledge that has enlightened humankind and not Jews only, and even a messianic figure (based on a reading of Deut. 18:15-18): a "prophet like Moses" would return (from Egypt? compare Acts 21:38) to restore Israel—a theme that some NT scholars have found lying at the background of John's Gospel. This latter idea, indeed, might have found a home in the speculation of northern Palestine (Galilee and Samaria), where the Pentateuch reveals that Moses tended to be regarded as the whole of the revelation God had given through Israel, in distinction to the Pharisaical Judaism of Judea, which featured the Prophets (in an apocalyptic and Midrashic interpretation). Never, however, in Judaism did Moses ever assume the centrality of attention that the NT has accorded to Jesus. Moses is always a mediator between God and humanity, never a divine person. It is conceivable that Jewish tradition could, if necessary, dispense with Moses in a way that Christianity could never dispense with Jesus.

Moses and the New Testament. In the NT Moses is, predictably, the most predominant of all OT figures. He is perceived as mediator of a revelation of God of whom Jesus is the fulfillment, a predecessor of Jesus typologically, who, along with the rest of the OT, foreshadowed Jesus both symbolically and by defect: the beginning of which Jesus is to be the end. To this extent, aside from the christological orientation, the NT appreciation of Moses hardly differs from that of Judaism.

There is also, however, a depreciation of Moses made inevitable by the early separation of church and synagogue, to which the NT also bears witness. For Paul, Moses represents the Law, which can come into conflict with the gospel (Rom. 10:5-17). John notes that while the Law was given by Moses, grace and truth (heavenly life) came only through Jesus Christ, and no one (in the OT) ever saw God as God has been revealed in Christ (John 1:17-18). Throughout the Fourth Gospel, there is a systematic denigration of the deeds of Moses (and others of the OT) in favor of those of Christ. But again, these are only alternate ways, more negative ways perhaps, of exploiting the typology of Moses.

B.V.

MOSES, ASSUMPTION OF. See PSEUDEPIGRAPHA.

MOSES BEN MAIMON. See MAIMONIDES.

MOSLEM. See MUSLIM.

MOSQUE. The house of prayer in ISLAM. In MUHAMMAD's time, it was only an open courtyard for the performance, five times daily, of the ritual prayer (ṣalā). With the passage of time, it acquired additional features and functions.

Muhammad built the first mosque in MEDINA. The kibla, or direction of prayer, was to the north, the direction of JERUSALEM. A roof was built over that end, and it remained there when the kibla was shifted to the south, toward the KA'BA in MECCA. The Medinan community also met in the mosque for sermons on Friday and for important discussions.

Since the beginning of Islam, the call to prayer (adhan) has been delivered by a designated worshiper known as a muezzin. Originally, the call was made from the roof of the house or mosque; later it was delivered from a MINARET. As worshipers enter the mosque, they remove their shoes and perform ritual ablutions. The prayer is led by an IMAM, who stands in the pulpit (minbar), just to the right of the mibrab (a decorated niche in the kibla wall).

Each city has one main mosque, where the sovereign or his representative sits in an enclosed booth (maqsura) beside the mibrab. However, most cities and towns have other mosques—some built for universities (madrasas), some for individual tribal groups, and some for individual sects. Sometimes the building of a mosque is an act of piety.

Many mosques were originally churches, synagogues, or ZOROASTRIAN fire temples. Those constructed for Muslim worship usually have low roofs supported by pillars, a style that allows expansion simply by adding more roof. Although architectural styles vary, one popular configuration has naves running parallel to the kibla wall, with one large central nave running perpendicular to it. Mosques as far apart as Damascus, Syria, and Cordoba, Spain, use this form. Many mosques, including the one around the Ka'ba in Mecca, retain the open courtyard of Muhammad's time. The special lamps and rugs used in the mosque, as well as the walls and pillars, are often decorated. Because images of animals and people are forbidden, decoration is limited to calligraphy and geometric designs.

Courtesy of G. E. Kidder Smith

Mosque of Ahmed I, Istanbul

K./M.C.

MOST HIGH. The conventional translation of the Hebrew divine appellation Elyon. Elyon was originally a distinct deity, known from Aramaic and Phoenician documents, among others (see Deut. 32:8). In pre-Israelite Canaan, Elyon had been identified with the Canaanite high god El, under the form of El Elyon (Gen. 14:18). The Israelites eventually applied both of these names to their God, Yahweh (Gen. 14:22).

B.V.

MOST HOLY PLACE. Also called Holy of Holies, this is the name given the innermost recess (on the western side), first of the sacred TABERNACLE in the wilderness (Exod. 36; 40) and later of the successive temples of Solomon, Zerubbabel, and Herod. The pattern of these sacred structures in the Bible seems to have been more or less the same tripartite one that was conventional for the sanctuaries of other contemporary Near Eastern religions. The Most Holy Place would have corresponded, then, with the inner shrine where the statue of the god of a pagan sanctuary was displayed. Since the Israelite religion forbade pictorial representation of the deity, the Most Holy Place contained instead of a statue the ARK OF THE COVENANT, which was conceived as the throne or footstool of the invisible presence of God. In postexilic times, when the Ark was no more, the Most Holy Place was simply empty except for this invisible presence. It was entered by no one except, once a year, the high priest on the solemn Day of Atonement, to make expiation for the sins of the people. B.V.

MOTHER. A woman who has successfully born a child. Among early artistic representations of human figures are those of mothers with children or of a pregnant woman. Typical is a terra cotta figurine from Muhata, Syria, dated about 4500 B.C. It was with awe and wonder that throughout history people observed the birth of a child. Eve, after bearing Cain, exclaimed, "I have gotten a man with the help of the Lord" (Gen. 4:1). Adam called her Eve ("living"), "because she was the mother of all living" (3:20).

It has been thought that, in early societies, matriarchy preceded patriarchy. Mothers knew their own offspring! "Can a woman forget her sucking child?" (Isa. 49:15). FATHERS, on the other hand, were unknown or considered not responsible. Thus, mothers came to direct the affairs of the tribe or clan as well as of the family.

Since mothers multiplied the family, motherhood came to be thought of in connection with growing things and with fertility in general. In many languages, the land is called "mother earth." From this, the transition was easy to represent by a mother figure a goddess of fertility who was considered responsible both for child-bearing and for success in multiplying crops and domesticated animals. An example would be the nude, female, Astarte figurines used by Canaanites. Mother-goddesses appear in nearly every polytheistic religious system. The term "mother" also has been used figuratively, by Plato of matter as "mother of all things," by Philo of wisdom, mother of the world, and, similarly, by the Gnostics. In the pictorial script developed by the Chinese (about 1500 B.C.), the symbol for "good" is the symbol for "woman" plus the symbol for "child."

In Hebrew there is a distinctively different word for mother from that for woman, wife, or female. Motherhood, especially being the mother of a son, put a woman in a highly honored social position. Conversely, the barren wife was frowned upon; Rachel cried to Jacob, "Give me children, or I shall die" (Gen. 30:1; compare Isa. 54:1).

In the Ten Commandments, a wife may be spoken of as a possession, but a mother is to be "honored" equally with the father (Exod. 20:12, 17; Deut. 5:16, 21). Proverbs 31:10-31 is an acrostic, praise for a good wife, but, as verse 28 indicates, the author assumed that the good wife was also a good mother, praised and blessed by her children. Deborah, "a mother in Israel" (Judg. 5:7), was a figure of strength and wisdom in her tribe. The commander of the army would not go into battle without her (Judg. 4:9).

A mother's womb was freely mentioned in the OT (Pss. 22:9 with "breasts"; 71:6; 139:13). Motherhood out of wedlock (Judg. 11:2) was a disgrace. Motherhood through adultery "displeased the Lord" and is "what is evil in his sight" (II Sam. 11:27; 12:9). Jezebel was a negative example of a mother's powerful example and precept. She influenced her son, Ahaziah, and her daughter, Athaliah, to become ardent supporters of Baal Melcarth (I Kings 22:52, 53). Mother is also used metaphorically for the Hebrew people (Isa. 50:1-2; 49:1-4; Hos. 4:5; Mic. 4:9-10; 5:3).

In the NT, respect for one's mother is enjoined (Matt. 19:19; Mark 10:19; Luke 18:20; II Tim. 1:5). Among Arabs today, the mother of a son is given the honorific title "mother of _____," so addressed instead of by her maiden name or her husband's name. This Oriental custom is observed in the Gospels. In the Synoptic Gospels we hear, without any other name, of "the mother of the sons of Zebedee" (Matt. 20:20; 27:56) and "the mother of James the younger and of Joseph" (Mark 15:40). In the Gospel of John, Mary is often mentioned as "the mother of Jesus" (2:1; 3; 19:25, 26, 27), never with her given name.

Figuratively, mother is used in the NT of Paul himself as mother (Gal. 4:19), of "the Jerusalem above" (Gal. 4:25, 26) and of "Babylon the great," who is "mother of harlots and of earth's abominations" (Rev. 17:5, 7).

When Mary visited Elizabeth before either gave birth, Elizabeth addressed her as "the mother of my Lord," whereupon Mary sang, "Henceforth all generations will call me blessed" (Luke 1:48). Although a special veneration for Mary began only after the NT (Acts 1:14), for NT Christians and others scarcely any higher honor could be given mothers than that "God sent forth his Son, born of woman . . . to redeem" (Gal. 4:5). P.L.G.

MOTHER OF GOD. From the Greek term Theotokos, a title of reverence for MARY, MOTHER OF JESUS, adopted by the Council of Ephesus in A.D. 431. The growth of Christology, reflecting the worship of the God-man, also caused increased veneration of his mother. Mary was seen as the vehicle by which the Incarnation was made possible. J.C.

MOTIF RESEARCH. See BIBLICAL CRITICISM.

MOTT, JOHN RALEIGH (1865-1955). Missionary statesman, YMCA official, and pioneer ecumenist. Mott was born in Livingston Manor, New York, and converted through the ministry of J. E. K. Studd while a student at Cornell University. Upon graduation in 1888, he joined the YMCA organization and became successively student secretary, foreign secretary, and general secretary of the American international committee (1915-31). Mott attended a Bible conference called by Dwight L. Moody in 1886 at Mount Hermon, Massachusetts. Before the conference ended, one hundred students had offered themselves for missionary service. In 1888 the movement was formally organized as the STUDENT VOLUNTEER MOVEMENT with Mott, one of the one hundred, as chairman, a post that he held for thirty years. While Mott was traveling about the world promoting the cause of missions, he developed a sense of the need for church unity. He was involved in convening the 1910 Edinburgh Missionary Conference. Out of this gathering an interdenominational committee was formed. This is now regarded as the beginning of the ecumenical movement.

Mott became chairman of the new INTERNATIONAL MISSIONARY COUNCIL, which was formed in 1921, later to become an integral part of the World Council of Churches. He was chairman of the second Life and Work Conference at Oxford in 1937 and vice-chairman of the provisional committee of the World Council of Churches in 1938. In 1948 he was made a co-president of the newly formed council. In 1946 Mott was a co-winner of the Nobel Peace Prize for years of service in missionary and ecumenical endeavors. He was also the author of many books and articles.

R. H.

MOUNT. See the individual name.

MOWINCKEL, SIGMUND (1884–1965). This Norwegian scholar was one of the most distinguished of a distinguished line of Scandinavians who dominated OT studies, particularly in the 1920s and 1930s. Mowinckel is best remembered for his Psalmstudien II (1922; The Psalms in Israel's Worship, 1962), in which he elaborated from his analysis of the Psalms the theory of an annual feast of covenant renewal modeled on the Babylonian New Year's festival. Features of this celebration would have included the symbolic enthronement of Yahweh as King and processions with the Ark of the Covenant as his throne. While few have accepted this reconstruction in its entirety, it has been generally agreed that Mowinckel's cultic interpretation of the Psalms was both basically sound and a seminal contribution to OT critical study. Mowinckel is also well known for a thorough reexamination of OT messianic doctrine, whose title in English is He That Cometh.

B. V.

MOWRER, O. HOBART (1907–82). Mowrer, an educational psychologist who has significantly influenced pastoral psychology, was born on January 23 to John Andrew and Sallie Ann Todd Mowrer. He graduated from the University of Missouri in 1929. During his doctoral work at Johns Hopkins University (Ph.D. 1932), he married child psychologist Willie Mae Cook in 1931. They have two daughters. After teaching at Harvard University (1940–48), Mowrer taught at the University of Illinois, Champaign-Urbana. In 1975 he was named professor emeritus. His books include Learning Theory and Personality Dynamics (1950), Psychotherapy: Theory and Research (1953), Learning Theory and Behavior (1960), The New Group Therapy (1964), and Psychology of Language and Learning (1980). Particularly of interest to theologians are his Crisis in Psychiatry and Religion (1961), Morality and Mental Health (1967), and Conscience, Contract and Social Reality (1972). An autobiography, Leaves from Many Seasons, was published in 1983. He died June 20, 1982.

N. H.

MUFTI. A professional jurist who interprets SHARIA, the Muslim law, in SUNNI Islam. Judges base their decisions on his formal opinions, and individuals may follow his opinions in their private lives. The grand mufti is similar in authority to the supreme AYATOLLAH of the SHI'ITES.

K./M.C.

MUHAMMAD (A.D. 570?–632). Founder of ISLAM. He is regarded by Islam as the "seal of the prophets," that is, the last and greatest of the line of prophets from Adam through Abraham, the prophets of the OT, John the Baptist, and Jesus, to Muhammad himself. Most of our information about him comes from the QUR'AN and the HADITH (traditions).

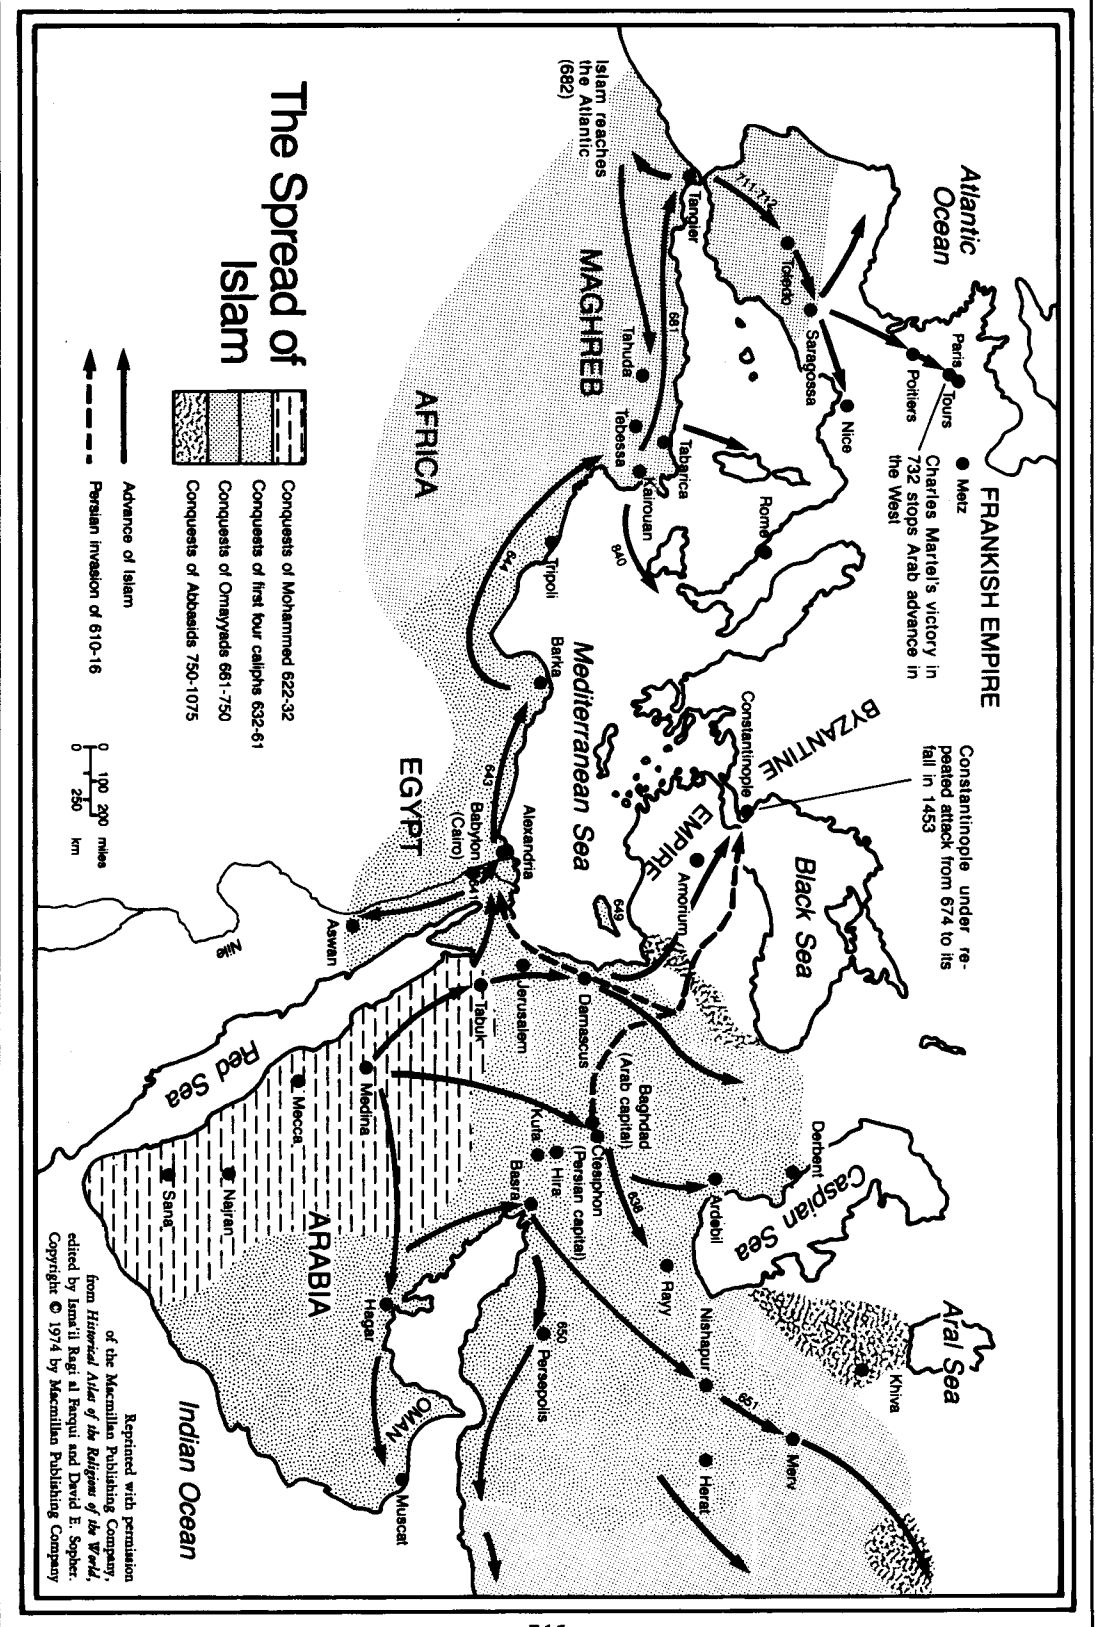

He was born in the city of MECCA in west-central Arabia at a time when Mecca was a prosperous center of the caravan trade from South Arabia to the Mediterranean. Orphaned at an early age, he was raised by his uncle Abu Talib. Although Muhammad was a member of the Quraish tribe that ruled the city, his clan, the Hashimite, was weak. As a result, he had trouble establishing himself in business. At the age of about twenty-five he married a wealthy widow, Khadijah, who owned a flourishing business. She was about fifteen years older than he was. She bore him two sons, who died in infancy, and four daughters, only one of whom outlived him, FATIMA.

The Call to Be a Prophet. Until about the age of forty Muhammad led the normal life of a businessman of that time. Then he had a series of experiences that terrified him. A giant being, whom he later identified as the angel Gabriel, appeared to him and commanded him to "recite" the messages he would receive. Uncertain whether the messenger was good or evil, he hesitated. With his wife's encouragement he came to believe that his visions were sent by God. The messages he received were in rhythmic, beautifully phrased language, suitable for reciting and memorizing. They came to constitute the earliest portions of the Qur'an.

The doctrine of God (Allah in Arabic) was at the center of Muhammad's religious experience. God is one, with no partners and no equals. God is powerful and good, and has set a time when he will judge the world. Muhammad was to warn the people to give up their evil ways, especially their "presumption," or insolent pride, and their reliance on material wealth. They should show gratitude to God for his goodness, should worship him, and should be generous to the poor and needy.

Early Responses to His Message. From about A.D. 610 to 622 Muhammad met with little success. The Meccans ridiculed him, and he won only a few converts. Still he remained faithful to the revelations that continued to come to him. Most of them were aural rather than visual. At one point he sent his followers across the Red Sea to the Christian nation of Ethiopia to escape persecution, but they soon returned to Mecca.

His uncle and protector, Abu Talib, died about this time and so did his wife Khadijah. These were severe blows. Together with his nephew and son-in-law ALI, and his close friend Abu Bakr, Muhammad began to make plans to leave Mecca. In 622, pilgrims from the city of Medina persuaded him to make their city his headquarters. Some of the hostile Quraish had plotted to kill him, but he escaped in time. Accompanied by Abu Bakr, he hid out not far from Mecca until his enemies were thrown off his trail. Then they headed for Medina on camel back. This was the HEGIRA, the migration that marked the great turning point in his career, and is the occasion from which the Islamic calendar is dated.

The Years at Medina. Revelations continued to come to Muhammad, but now they were less poetic and more concerned with the details of administering a political community. Islam had become more than a group of adherents to a new set of beliefs. He married the ten-year-old daughter of Abu Bakr, 'A'isha, who played a significant role after the Prophet's death. To challenge the power of Mecca, he sent his followers out to raid Meccan caravans. The clashes grew in seriousness until the Battle of Badr in 624, when he inflicted a serious defeat on a large Meccan force. Over the next few years the military advantage lay first with one side and then with the other. Gradually, however, various tribes in western Arabia converted to Islam, and Muhammad's strength grew.

During these years the Jewish clans in Medina became hostile to Muhammad's claim to be the Prophet of God. These clans were wealthy and militarily strong, but Muhammad exiled some of them and defeated others. The Jews who remained in Medina and did not convert to Islam lost all power and political influence.

The Years of Triumph. In March 628, Muhammad set out for Mecca with a force of fourteen hundred to seven hundred men. The Meccans threatened to resist by force any Muslim attempt to perform the pilgrimage (HAJJ). A treaty was drawn up, under which Muhammad agreed to withdraw that year, and the Meccans agreed to evacuate the city for three days the following year so the Muslims could carry out the various pilgrimage rites. The power of the Meccans had declined to the point that they had to treat Muhammad as an equal.

In January 630, a large Muslim force invaded Mecca, meeting with only slight resistance. Muhammad remained in the city fifteen or twenty days. He destroyed shrines to pagan goddesses and cleansed the KA'BA and all private homes of idols. His tact, diplomacy, and skill as an administrator won over both the leaders and the common people. During the remaining two years of his life the movement grew in strength, and the groundwork was laid for it to expand beyond the borders of Arabia.

Abu Bakr made the pilgrimage in 631, and in 632 Muhammad led the pilgrimage in person. When he returned to Medina toward the end of March it was clear that he was in poor health. He stayed in 'A'isha's living quarters, and there on June 8, 632, with his head in 'A'isha's lap, he died.

Abu Bakr had been commissioned to lead the prayers, but no other arrangements had been made for the succession. To the confused and sorrowing community Abu Bakr proclaimed, "O ye people, if anyone worship Muhammad, Muhammad is dead, but if anyone worships God, He is alive and dies not."

Many stories were handed down by those who had known the Prophet during his lifetime. One of these tells of a journey he made from Mecca to Jerusalem just before the hegira. From the site in Jerusalem where the Dome of the Rock now stands, Muhammad soared up into the seventh heaven on the back of the steed Burak. He was admitted to the presence of God and then returned to earth.

No claims were made that Muhammad was divine. He remained man, for Muslims the greatest man of all.

K.C.

MUHAMMAD, ELIJAH (1897–1975). Born Elijah Poole on October 7, on a farm near Sanderville, Georgia, this son of parents who had been slaves became the charismatic founding leader of the BLACK MUSLIMS. Poole, after working at various jobs, moved to Detroit, where he worked on an auto assembly line. In 1931 Poole met Wali Farad, the former Wallace D. Fard, who had established what he called the Temple of Islam the previous year. When Farad disappeared mysteriously in 1934, Poole changed his name to Elijah Muhammad and assumed the leadership of Farad's followers, claiming he was a "messenger of Allah." He taught that the only salvation for blacks in the United States was to withdraw and form an autonomous state. Difficulties arose that forced Muhammad to move his headquarters to Chicago, where he proclaimed himself the divinely appointed head of the Nation of Islam, the formal name of the first Black Muslim movement. The work grew, and at one point his followers could be numbered in the tens of thousands. He headed a network of business enterprises, schools, and other institutions that were valued at millions of dollars. His most notable convert was Muhammad Ali, the noted heavyweight boxer. He died on February 25.

R.H.

MUHLENBERG, HENRY MELCHIOR (1711–87). The founder of the German Lutheran Church in the United States, Muhlenberg was born September 6, 1711, in Einbeck, Hanover, to Nicolaus Melchior and Anna Maria Kleinschmid Muhlenberg. Educated at the University of Göttingen, he was ordained August 24, 1739.

Answering the call of congregations in Philadelphia, New Providence, and New Hanover, Pennsylvania, Muhlenberg arrived in November of 1742. He built churches in Tulpehocken (1743), Providence (1745), Germantown (1746), New Hanover (1747), and Philadelphia (1748). On April 22, 1745, he married Anna Maria Weiser.

Muhlenberg organized the Evangelical Lutheran Ministerium in 1748 with six Swedish and German pastors and twenty-four lay delegates. It outlined synodical organization and prepared a book of common worship. Serving as "overseer," Muhlenberg helped write its constitution in 1762. Speaking pure German and graceful Latin, he learned to preach ably in English and Dutch. His three-volume Journal reveals a dedicated pastor and gifted administrator with broad knowledge of medicine and law as well.

N.H.

MUHLBERG, WILLIAM AUGUSTUS (1796–1877). The leader of the Anglican Memorial movement was born September 16, 1796, to William Henry and Mary Sheaff Muhlenberg. The great-grandson of HENRY MELCHOIR MUHLBERG, William was baptized a Lutheran and confirmed and reared Episcopalian. After his ordination in 1820, he served churches in Philadelphia and Lancaster, Pennsylvania, and Flushing, Long Island. In 1828 he became headmaster of the Flushing Institute, a preparatory school for boys, which he ran for eighteen years.

In 1846 he became rector of the Church of the Holy Communion, New York City, the first Episcopal church to eliminate rented pews. During his tenure (1846–58) he introduced weekly Eucharist, daily morning and evening prayers, antiphonal chanting, and lighted candles. In 1853 he wrote a "Memorial" to the House of Bishops suggesting reforms of the liturgy along the lines of the Oxford movement, and asking for extension of Episcopal ordination to clergy of other churches.

Muhlenberg founded the Sisterhood of the Holy Communion, St. Luke's Hospital, and the community of St. Johnsland. He also authored such hymns as "Shout the Glad Tidings, Exultingly Sing," "I Would Not Live Away," and "Savior, Who Thy Flock Art Feeding."

N.H.

MUKYOKAI. From the Japanese words for "no church." A Japanese Christian movement founded by Kanzo Uchimura (1861–1930), which endeavors to present Christianity independent of ecclesiastical institutionalism. Uchimura first came in contact with Christianity at Sapporo Agricultural College in the 1870s. From then on he devoted himself to establishing independent, "non-church" prayer groups and Bible study groups. The movement has tended to draw Japanese of liberal and humanitarian disposition, among them prominent writers, educators, and statesmen; it has thus, despite its lack of institutional structure, had substantial influence on modern Japan. Many members shared Uchimura's strong opposition to growing authoritarianism and militarism in the Japan of his day.

R.E.

MULLA. A scholar of religious law (SHARIA) in SHITE Islam. He performs such minor tasks as leading prayer in small mosques, reciting the stories of the IMAMS, and teaching the QUR'AN.

K./M.C.

MÜLLER, GEORGE (1805–98). Eminent Plymouth Brethren leader who relied on faith and prayer to sustain his orphanages near Bristol, England. German-born Müller was led to devote himself to religious work by Pietists at Halle. He journeyed to London in 1829, worked with the Society for Promoting Christianity among the Jews, and left London in 1830 to join the Plymouth Brethren founded that year by JOHN NELSON DARBY, a former Anglican clergyman, near Plymouth. Darby rejected creeds, insisted all Christians are priests, and relied on the Holy Spirit for guidance. Müller became a devoted leader in this expanding group. He refused a salary, depended on contributions for support, and about 1832 began concentrating on caring for orphans at Bristol. When he published his Narrative of the Lord's Dealings with George Müller (1837, 1841), funds increased enough to provide for over two thousand children. He died in Bristol after a seventeen-year worldwide preaching tour.

C.M.

MÜNZER, THOMAS (about 1489–1525). Radical German Reformer, leader in the Peasants' Revolt (1525), an early Anabaptist, and Marxist precursor. Born in Stolberg in the Harz Mountains, Münzer studied at Leipzig and Frankfurt and became a priest. In 1519 he allied himself with Martin Luther, but soon felt Luther's justification by faith alone and political conservatism did not sufficiently promote reform and justice for the poor. Münzer instituted radical liturgical changes during his stormy pastorate at Zwickau (1520–23), but his reliance on direct inspiration from the Holy Spirit over Scripture brought him into dispute with Luther. Expelled from Zwickau, Münzer went to Allstedt, where he preached open rebellion. Luther helped drive him from Allstedt in 1524. He then went to Mühlhausen, was again expelled, but returned to inspire and lead a peasant army against the princes. Philip of Hesse overwhelmingly defeated the peasants at Frankenhäusen, May 25, 1525. Münzer and other leaders were beheaded.

C.M.

MURATORIAN CANON. Probably the oldest extant listing of NT writings, reflecting a canon of twenty-two books to be read in worship services and accepted as authoritative in doctrinal disputes. Lodovico A. Muratori (1672–1750), an Italian antiquary and historian who collected and published old Italian scriptural writings and chronicles from the fifth to the sixteenth century, discovered the listing in an eighth-century manuscript. The listing, which mentions Pope Pius I, Hermas, Basilides, Marcion, and Montanus, dates from the late second century. The fragment of eighty-five lines, which Muratori discovered in 1740, has missing narrative portions at the beginning and end, but contains references to the Four Gospels, Acts, the Pauline letters, Apocalypse of John, Epistles of John and Jude, and the Apocalypse of Peter and Wisdom of Solomon, which are no longer included. Hebrews, James, and I-II Peter are not mentioned. It specifically rejects the Shepherd of Hermas, Paul's letters to Laodicea and Alexandria, and several Gnostic and Montanist works. The original writer of the fragment is believed to be Hippolytus. C.M.

MUSLIM. Also spelled "Moslem"; a believer in ISLAM. Islam means "submission," and a Muslim is therefore one who submits in obedience to God. A Muslim acknowledges the oneness of God, accepts Muhammad as God's prophet, and lives his or her life in accordance with the norms of the religion. K.C.

MUSLIMS (U.S.A.). ISLAM, the youngest of the world's three monotheistic faiths, had its origins in Arabia, but today its faithful disciples may be found all over the world. The Islamic Center in Washington, D.C., estimates that there are a billion Muslims in the world, but other authorities reduce that figure by one half. The Center states that there are three hundred mosques in North America and possibly six million Muslims—half of whom are native born in the United States or Canada and another half made up of arrivals from other lands. There are two groups of BLACK MUSLIMS—the Nation of Islam led by Louis Farrakhan, formerly Eugene Walcott, and the American Muslim Mission (formerly called the World Community of Al-Islam in the West), which is headed by Warith (Wallace) Muhammad, Elijah's son. Both groups are based in Chicago, with followers in other parts of the country. Muslims from other backgrounds accept the Black Muslims as true followers of the Prophet. R.H.

MU'TAZILA. The "standing aloof" school of early Islamic theology (KALĀM), so called because they took a neutral position concerning the status of a Muslim who commits a grave sin. It flourished under the ABBASSID CALIPHS between the ninth and tenth centuries A.D., and used much of Greek rationalism. Orthodox SUNNI Islam condemned it, but the SHIT'ITES still follow it. K./M.C.

MYSTERIUM TREMENDUM. A term referring to the unique feeling associated with experience of the holy or divine, made current by the theologian Rudolf Otto in The Idea of the Holy (1923). For Otto, the elementary datum of religion is the non-rational, non-moral experience of the holy or numinous, which cannot strictly be defined. This unique religious feeling includes a sense of the uncanny, a sense of creature-feeling or total dependence and impotence, as well as feelings of awe, rapture, and exaltation. Otto analyzed the holy in terms of three distinctive qualities: the mysterium tremendum et fascinans. The mysterium is the experience of the HOLY as "wholly other," as unfathomable mystery. The tremendum evokes the emotion of fear or demonic dread. However, the holy is also fascinans, the fascinating, begetting the emotions of love, bliss, and beatitude. Otto's analysis of the holy has had wide influence on both the comparative study of religion and on theology. J.L.

MYSTERY RELIGIONS. In the Greek and Roman periods of history, the mystery religions offered adherents hope of sharing in the life of immortals in the present and of life beyond the grave. Although evidence for these religions is as early as the fifth century B.C., they seem to have been particularly popular in the second and third centuries A.D. Their myth and ritual connected with the mysteries concentrated on symbols of fertility and of the renewal of life. The mythical characters included male and female, heavenly and human figures.

The fact that many of the myths are concerned with crops or fertility suggests that the religions may have originated as a means of assisting or guaranteeing the annual cycle of agricultural produce. In the OSIRIS and ISIS myth, for example, Osiris is the symbol of the Nile, the annual flooding of which (and the resultant irrigation of the crops) made possible the growth of food and the sustaining of life in the otherwise arid central valley of Egypt. In the myth, he is put to death by his enemies, but Isis enables him to be restored to life. In Greek mythology, the loss by Demeter of her daughter, Kore, and the latter's stay in the underworld, are linked with the sowing of grain, just as the recovery of the daughter represents its growth and harvest. The death of Dionysus, the god of wine and ecstasy, and his recovery, are symbolic of the crushing and fermentation of the grapes in order to produce the wine. In the cult on the Greek island of Samothrace, the slaughter of the sacred bull and his return to life is clearly a symbolic cycle of fertility. A major symbol in the mysteries (especially of Dionysus) was the human phallus.

By the Roman period, the major interest in the mysteries had become personal renewal and participation in the life of the gods. Characteristic are the roles of Hermes and Orpheus, both of whom were seen in their respective mythical traditions as messengers of the gods, who brought divine secrets of life to the initiates. Under various names (Cybele, Artemis, Isis) the figure of the divine mother was enormously popular. Seeking a lost child or spouse, she wandered about in sorrow until with joy her mission was achieved. Her followers saw their own sorrows and exaltation mirrored in her experience. Similarly, the figures of dying and rising heroes or gods—whether Kore, Dionysus, or Osiris—offered hope of the escape from darkness and death and the attainment of eternal life.

The mysteries had wide appeal geographically and socially. Those initiated into the mysteries ranged from the simplest Roman subjects to the emperors.

Shrines of the mystery cults have been found from eastern Syria to the British midlands. The remains of the cults include crude inscriptions on graves as well as sophisticated murals painted on the walls of a villa in Pompei. Public reaction to the mysteries was often hostile, as in the official Roman prohibition of the worship of Dionysus (Bacchus, in Latin) in the early second century B.C. The Greek dramatist Euripides (fifth century B.C.), by his vivid portrayal of the gruesome features of the Dionysiac cult—including dismembering and devouring human beings—brought the religion into popular disrepute. Yet in the second century A.D. as sophisticated a writer as Plutarch was representing the Isis cult as an allegory of participation in eternal life, and Lucius Apuleius (also second century A.D.) attracted a wide popular interest in the Isis myth by portraying her devotees as those who found renewal of life, meaning, and purpose in a world filled with strife and frustration.

H. K.

MYSTICISM. A form of religious experience that emphasizes immediate awareness of God. It is an expression of the innate tendency of human beings toward complete harmony with God.

Definition. The goal of mysticism is communion or “mystical union” with the Divine. While the ultimate attainment of this is a gift of grace, mysticism implies commitment to a life process ordered in that direction. It is not intellectual speculation, a theological system, or a philosophy.

Mystical elements are found in all religions. Although it is stronger in Hinduism and Buddhism, it exists as a major element even in the historical religions: Judaism, Christianity, and Islam. As Saint Martin observed: “All mystics speak the same language and come from the same country.”

Mysticism is often loosely applied to any personal religious experience, especially to higher degrees of PIETY. However, CONVERSION or CHARISMATIC phenomena are not properly termed “mystical.” Mysticism does not apply to the occult, to peak experiences, or to moments of transcendent clarity induced by drugs, sexual orgasm, or one’s car going into a skid. While some mystics have exhibited parapsychological gifts, such as visions and voices (JULIAN OF NORWICH), trances (CATHERINE OF SIENA), automatic writing, clairvoyance, and telepathy (MADAME GUYON), these are merely infrequent incidents given by God to encourage the soul, not to be sought or treasured in themselves. Mysticism is not simply a catch-all term for “close encounters” or “warm fuzzies” in the spiritual realm.

Practically all religious people might well adopt a more disciplined life-style, but in the lives of true mystics prayer, devotion, and centering in the Divine also become ordering principles. While most people can take piano lessons and learn to play a few songs for their own enjoyment, mystics are akin to the musical geniuses who take lessons, practice, and have the gift of interpreting the very soul of the music in their performance.

Mysticism is sometimes called the interior life, and the mystical way does involve withdrawal from and renunciation of the world and its attachments. However, those who achieve mystical union are usually directed back into a life of intense and productive service. Catherine of Siena mediated between city-states and brought the pope back to Rome. Catherine of Genoa built hospitals. TERESA OF AVILA reformed the Carmelites.

The Mystical Way. Mysticism is usually outlined in three stages—purgation, illumination, union. EVELYN UNDERHILL in her classic treatment, Mysticism, lists five.

a) Awakening. This experience is similar to conversion in its most intense form, more comparable perhaps to sanctification in the Wesleyan tradition. Preceded by restlessness and uncertainty, this commitment to seeking the unitive life, to loving God with one’s whole being, is marked by joy and exaltation.

b) Purgation. Purification of the self may run concurrently with later stages. It may contain several phases: contrition and repentance; detachment, including the EVANGELICAL COUNSELS of poverty, chastity, and obedience; and mortification, or dying to one’s self. While this period may include various ascetic practices, the mystics are not to be confused or identified with monastics, for whom such practices are the end (see ASCETICISM and MONASTICISM). For mystics they are only means and cease after a definite period.

c) Illumination. This refers to those pleasurable and exalted states in which the mystic glimpses the goal and has fleeting moments of contact with God’s essence, even though “selfhood” remains. This is the stage in which some people may have psychic experiences. Symbolically it is often referred to as “betrothal” in contrast to the “marriage” of union. It includes a joyous apprehension of the Absolute, a heightened perception of the world, and sometimes automatic activity such as special smells, tastes, sounds, and so on.

d) Dark night of the soul. Here all “consolations” of illumination are withdrawn. One loses a sense of God’s presence; has an acute sense of imperfection; and experiences aridity, a loss of intellectual power, and assaults of evil. This may have been Jesus’ temptation in the wilderness. A state of psychic fatigue, a final purification, it is often referred to as the “desert.” The soul, through sheer commitment of will, must blindly continue to seek God.

e) Union. The soul is “one’d to God” says THE CLOUD OF UNKNOWING. Union comes to those who persevere, those to whom it is given. Teresa says this unity is “two distinct things becoming one.” While some Christians, like Georgia Harkness, insist on the term “communion” to avoid a more Eastern sense of the negation and annihilation of the self, Christian mystics have made clear distinctions within the mystery. NICHOLAS OF CUSA called it a union of opposites. JAN VAN RUYSBROECK spoke of union but insisted, "Each of these keeps its own nature." It is the consciousness of one's "selfhood" that is subsumed in the experience of oneness with the HOLY ONE.

History. The OT contains little evidence of mysticism, though the SONG OF SOLOMON, interpreted as an allegory of the soul's love for God, is a favorite of mystics. In the NT the Gospel and Epistles of John speak mystically. In church history three periods—the third, fourteenth, and seventeenth centuries—stand out as eras of much mysticism.

Major authors includes PLOTINUS, AUGUSTINE, and DIONYSIUS THE AREOPAGITE in the early period; MEISTER ECKHART, Jan van Ruysbroeck, THOMAS À KEMPIS, Catherine of Seina, and Julian of Norwich in the middle and most glorious period; FRANCIS OF SALES, Brother Lawrence, and Madame Guyon in the last period.

In our day a resurgence of interest can be seen in the work of WILLIAM JAMES, Evelyn Underhill, Georgia Harkness, THOMAS MERTON, and Henri Nouwen, as well as the interest in Eastern religion and the emphasis on such spiritual disciplines as fasting, prayer, and meditation.

N.H.

Nn

NAAMAN. The proper name of two people in the Bible. (1) In Numbers 26:40, there is a Naaman listed as the putative ancestor of the Naamites, an obscure clan of the tribe of Benjamin.

(2) The far more important occurrence of the name is a feature of the lengthy story of II Kings 5. Here Naaman is identified as commander of the army of the king of Syria who was cured of LEPROSY by intercession of the prophet Elisha. The story is part of the cycle concerning Elijah and Elisha, a highly popular series of narratives that glorify the two prophets primarily as miracle workers. Naaman's affliction, since it obviously did not interfere with his daily activities and freedom of movement, could hardly have been the degenerative disease of leprosy as known to medical science. What was meant, as so often when the Bible speaks of leprosy, was some kind of skin disease, probably only cosmetically disturbing.

The story has other historical values besides its literary qualities. It testifies to the border raiding that went on between the Israelites and the Arameans (Syria), as well as Israel's subservience, at least temporarily, to Syria. Interesting, too, is Naaman's resolve to worship only Yahweh, even though he must accompany his master the king to the temple of the Syrian god Rimmon, a progressive idea that he nevertheless joins to the ancient belief that every deity is bound to one particular land. The end of the story, Elisha's rebuke of the venal Gehazi with its talk of orchards, vineyards, sheep and oxen, servants, and so forth, is probably intended as commentary on the abuses committed by contemporary professional prophets. B.V.

NABAL. A wealthy sheep owner in the story of I Samuel 25. His name, which means "fool," is deemed appropriate by his wife ABIGAIL. (Probably the name has been tailored to the story, however, since it is hard to imagine parents giving a son such an unlucky name.) His foolishness consisted in refusing to pay tribute out of his considerable wealth to the followers of David, who at that time was little better than the head of a band of outlaws who preyed on the countryside exacting "protection money" from the landowners. Not only did Nabal refuse, he did it in such insulting terms that David was roused to come against him in force and destroy him. Abigail's intercession dissuaded David from these measures, but when Nabal, in drunken condition, heard of this he suffered a stroke and died soon after. David took Nabal's widow as one of his wives. B.V.

NABATEANS. These were an Arab people who made their first certain appearance in history about 312 B.C., when the Seleucid king Antigonos, one of the successors to the empire of Alexander the Great, made two unsuccessful attempts to subjugate them and dislodge them from their capital city of Petra. It would appear that at this time they had only recently become a sedentary people, having occupied a part of Edom and Moab, which had previously been the resort of nomadic tribes, of which, presumably, the Nabateans were then one. (The Nabateans may be the Nebaioth mentioned along with the nomadic Kedarites by Isa. 60:7, a text that dates from Persian times.) At the height of their expansion the Nabateans held sway over a kingdom that extended southward halfway down the Arabian peninsula and, off and on, as far north as Damascus.

Herbert G. May

Herbert G. May

Scenes at the ruins of Petra, famous capital of the Nabateans. At the top is a tomb facade in a cliff; below is the Roman period forum area.

By Maccabean times the Nabateans had adopted kingship (in II Macc. 5:8 Aretas I is called tyrannos, a royal title). They seem to have made a great success of it, administering their extensive territory excellently well, capitalizing on their strategic location at the juncture of profitable trade routes and respecting and conserving the scanty natural resources available to them. As a result they supported a more numerous and more prosperous population than any that has subsequently inhabited the region. They attained a high cultural level, including the arts. The magnificence of "the red rose city" of Petra, whose massive structures (largely Hellenistic in inspiration) were carved from the living stone, is proverbial, constituting it one of the wonders of the world. The Nabateans preserved their economy and their independence for four centuries: not until A.D. 106 were they absorbed into the Roman Empire as the Province of Arabia.

Though they originally spoke a north Arabic dialect and eventually developed their own script, in most of the many inscriptions and records that they left behind they employed Imperial Aramaic, the standard language of the region since Persian times. Their religion was polytheistic and eclectic, with an extensive pantheon of deities drawn from both Arabic and local traditions. In cultic practice they shared the procedures and institutions that were basically common to the Semitic Near East. B.V.

NABI. In the Semitic languages in general, the word "nabi" refers to a PROPHET, in the sense of one through whom God (or a god or spirit) speaks a message. In ancient Mesopotamia, and also among the earlier Hebrews, nabis were little more than mediumistic soothsayers who, often accompanied by ecstatic phenomena, would go into trances and utter divination. But among the later Hebrew prophets, especially the great writing prophets, deliverances ascribed to the Lord became a powerful literary and religious vehicle.

In Islam, nabis or prophets play a crucial role. They are people specially chosen by God in diverse times and places to deliver a message from God. The message is always essentially that of calling humankind back to pure monotheism, the worship of the one God instead of idols. Among those cited in the Qur'an as the greatest are Abraham, Noah, Moses, and Jesus. A few prophets are in addition rasul, often translated "apostle"; more than "ordinary" prophets, they also deliver a divine Law and Book to a community of people. In Islamic eyes, the greatest and last of the prophets and apostles is "the seal of the prophets," the deliverer of the consummate final message, MUHAMMAD. R.E.

NABONIDUS. The last emperor, along with his son and co-regent BELSHAZZAR, of the Neo-Babylonian Empire. He fell from power when Cyrus the Great conquered Babylon in 539 B.C. Nabonidus was a cultured man, interested in Babylonia's ancient past and its traditional worship of Sin, the moon god. He rebuilt the great ziggurat (or "tower of Babel") in Ur and appointed his daughter, Belshaltinannar, as priestess in the temple of Sin. He practiced archaeology, supported scholars, and even had a museum. Unfortunately, in pursuing these interests, Nabonidus absented himself from Babylon and neglected the needs of its citizens. He also neglected, the Babylonians believed, Merodoch (or Marduk or Bel), the chief god of the Babylonian pantheon. CYRUS of Persia capitalized on this belief and declared, on the Cyrus cylinder, that Marduk had appointed him to rule the world as a righteous prince. The people of the city believed Cyrus and surrendered the city without a struggle. Nabonidus and Belshazzar both were out of touch, not only with their people's needs but with the realities of political and military events. Living many miles from the capital, indulging their intellectual interests, they forfeited the respect of their people. J.C.

NABOPOLASSAR. A Chaldaean or Babylonian adventurer who established the Neo-Babylonian Empire and rebelled against Assyrian overlordship in 616 B.C. He was victorious and completely rebuilt BABYLON. Nabopolassar's revolt enabled Josiah to reconquer the lost territories of Israel and reform Jewish worship. He captured Nineveh in 612 B.C. J.C.

NABOTH. A landowner of Jezreel, an agricultural center on the plain of Jezreel during the kingship of AHAB of Israel (I Kings 21; II Kings 9). Naboth owned a vineyard (part of his ancestral inheritance) that lay beside fields owned by King Ahab. A terrible drought afflicted Israel for years but apparently Naboth's vineyard survived it well. Ahab coveted the property and offered to buy it for silver, or to exchange a larger vineyard for it (I Kings 21:2). Naboth refused, however, as it was not proper to dispose of family property (I Kings 21:3). Queen Jezebel thereupon trumped up charges of blasphemy and treason against Naboth and had him stoned to death (I Kings 21:7-14). Ahab took possession of the property, but Elijah met Ahab at the field and pronounced doom on his whole family for this crime. Ahab repented, however, and the Lord delayed punishment for a generation (I Kings 21:17-29). J.C.

NADAB. The name of four men in the OT, meaning "generous" in Hebrew.

(1) Aaron's oldest son (Exod. 6:23; Num. 3:2; 26:60). He went up to Mount Sinai with Moses and his father, but later died (Exod. 28; Num. 3: I Chr. 24) because he profaned the sacrificial fire.

(2) A descendant of Caleb (I Chr. 2).

(3) A son of Gibeon, of Benjamin's tribe (I Chr. 8).

(4) A king of Israel, son of Jeroboam (I Kings 14).

He ruled only one year (about 901-900 B.C.); he was killed by Baasha, who took over the throne.

J.C.

NAGA. Serpentine semidivine beings popular in Hindu and Buddhist mythology and folk religion. The Nagas may appear either as half human and half cobra, or as entirely snake. They are sometimes represented as living in an underground paradise. The Nagas, whose cult has very deep roots in India, are regarded as dangerous and in need of propitiation, yet also capable of great blessings. Their ambivalent race ranges from Kaliya, a demon defeated by Krishna, to the numerous serpents of modest shrines, near temples or under trees, to whom women pray for health or fertility. The queen of the Nagas, Manasa, is widely worshiped in Bengal.

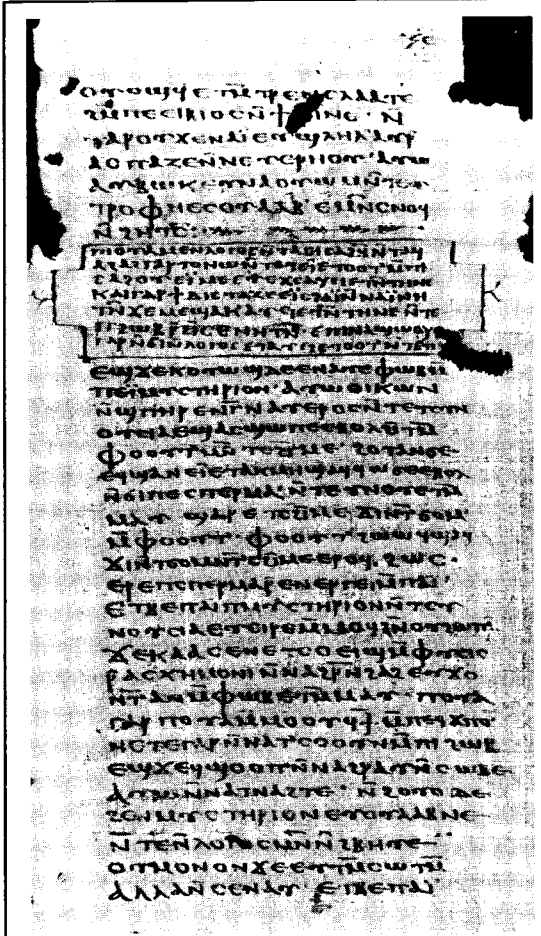

R.E.

NAGARJUNA. Foundational philosopher of MAHAYANA BUDDHISM who flourished in India about A.D. 200. He taught that all separate existing things are "empty," that is, have no being of their own; one should therefore have no attachments to them. All SAMSARA, existence, is really NIRVANA, unconditioned reality, and all beings are really Buddhas.

R.E.

NAG HAMMADI. In December of 1945 a cache of thirteen ancient books (codices) was discovered by two peasants in a cemetery just across the Nile east of Nag Hammadi, Egypt, about sixty miles south of Luxor. The books are a collection of fifty-two tractates translated from Greek into Coptic, the language of early Egyptian Christians. The authors of the documents were Christians; so were those who collected and translated them. However, the kind of Christianity they practiced, which we know now as GnosticisM, was ardently attacked by some of the best-known, early mainline Christians such as Irenaeus, who wrote in the second century. Some of these documents were probably composed at that time, though the copies found in the Nag Hammadi "library" were made in the fourth century (in the opinion of James Robinson, who published the first full translation of the documents in any language, English). There is evidence that the collection derives from at least three smaller collections, since some books like the Apocryphon of John and the Gospel of the Egyptians appear more than once and in variant texts. No one book is copied by the same scribe twice. The hands of several scribes have been noted in the thirteen documents, but exact dates have not yet been determined for them.

The story of the documents subsequent to their discovery is high drama and is filled with all the elements of a mystery novel, including murder, blood revenge, deception, and intrigue. Eventually twelve of the books were brought back to the Coptic Museum in Cairo, although part of the library had been burned

Courtesy of the Institute of Antiquity and Christianity, Claremont Graduate School

Nag Hammadi Codex VI, page 65

before getting into responsible hands. Codex I (the thirteenth) was taken out of the country by a Belgian antiquities dealer in Cairo and was eventually purchased by the Jung Institute in Zurich (1952) and named the Jung Codex. It is now back with the other twelve in Cairo.

These documents reveal a great deal of information about an aberrant form of early Christianity that became a formidable rival to the orthodox faith for many centuries, primarily because of its denial of the reality of Christ's humanity. J.R.M.

NAHASH. A name meaning "serpent," borne by two people in I and II Samuel. The first was a king of Ammon (I Sam. 11; II Sam. 10) who oppressed Jabesh-Gilead and caused Saul to rescue them. The second was an obscure relative of David, mentioned in II Samuel 17:25. J.C.

NAHUM. The seventh book of the Minor Prophets of the Hebrew Bible, ascribed according to the title of the opening verse to an otherwise unknown prophet from an otherwise unknown Elkosh.

The book consists of several related poems of high dramatic quality and probably the work of a single author. They contain some of the most eloquent words of the OT uttered in the name of the God of Israel against the pretensions of human arrogance, in this case the mighty Assyrian Empire, which had long tyrannized the other countries of the ancient Near East and whose demise the poet contemplated with the utmost satisfaction.

Nahum is unique among the prophetic works of the OT, however, in that it has no reproaches to offer Israel or Judah for their crimes against their God that had brought about the Assyrian oppression as the instrument of God's punishment. This failure to reflect what is otherwise a commonplace of prophetic religion and proclamation has prompted some authors to regard Nahum as the work of one of those wholly nationalistic prophets with which various OT passages have made us familiar (see I Kings 22:5-28; Jer. 23:16-17; etc.), who stood in contradiction to everything that constituted the classical prophetic tradition of Israel, one of the chief glories of OT religion. However, the three chapters of the book of Nahum, while they are certainly nationalistic, do not necessarily tell us all there is to know about their author. The prophet Isaiah was also capable of nationalistic prophecy (see II Kings 19:20-34; Isa. 7:1-9; etc.), but we have enough of his other work to make no mistake about his right to the title of one of Israel's truly great prophets.

The poetry of Nahum is fairly easy to date. The most natural interpretation of the numerous references to Nineveh, the Assyrian capital (3:1, "the bloody city"), is that it was on the brink of destruction, not yet destroyed. It was in 612 B.C. that Nineveh was overrun and sacked by the Medes and the Neo-Babylonians, preparatory to the definitive fall of ASSYRIA around 609 B.C. At the same time, 3:8 rather mockingly speaks of the sack of Thebes in Egypt by the Assyrians, which had taken place in 663 B.C. Thus we are within the enviable position of reading a biblical text that is virtually contemporaneous with what it describes.

Chapter 1 of Nahum (1:1-2:1) is a poem of Yahweh's vengeance against enemies. The condemnation is generic, which has allowed the question that this chapter may have been adventitiously added to the Nahum text as a kind of standard introduction. The poem is an acrostic—each successive line beginning with a-b-c, etc.—and an incomplete one, an added factor that suggests the possibility of subsequent redactional activity.

About chapters 2-3 there can be hardly any question. Chapter 2 in loving detail pictures the siege of "the bloody city," so soon to be brought down into degradation. Chapter 3, nevertheless, contains theological reflections on the destruction of Nineveh, not simply a taunt sung over the defeat of an enemy. The final word is: "Upon whom has not come your unceasing evil?" B.V.

NAIN. A village in southwest Galilee mentioned in the NT only in the story of Jesus' raising of a widow's son (Luke 7:11-17). The location of Nain is almost certain, for the name survives in the Arab village of Nein, about five miles southeast of Nazareth, and about twenty-five miles from Capernaum. An unlikely alternative is the place called Nain near the region of Idumea. According to Luke it was near Nain that Jesus met a procession of mourners bearing the body of the only son of a widow. Luke notes Jesus' compassion in several instances in which he restored the lives of children of parents with no other children (Luke 8:42; 9:38). J.L.P.

NANAK. The founder of SIKHISM, Nanak (1469-1539) sought to reconcile the rival religions of ISLAM and HINDUISM through the name of the true God above them both. He was born in the Punjab, a region where both faiths meet, of an official family. His own background was Hindu, but he had a Muslim teacher who taught him something of his faith, and as a youth he enjoyed conversing with holy men of both Hindu and SUFI persuasion. He married, had two children, and worked in a granary. However, as a gifted poet and musician, Nanak was drawn to hymnody and religion as well.

At the age of thirty, according to tradition, he experienced a mystical vision. He disappeared for three days, then at length appeared to his distraught friends to say he was beside himself in the Satnam, the divine name, which God had called him to teach to humankind, and that "There is no Hindu, there is no Muslim."

Tradition has it that he then undertook four long pilgrimage journeys about India and neighboring lands, venturing as far as Mecca. Scholars question many of these accounts, however. In any case, it appears that by 1520 Nanak was settled at Kartarpur in the Punjab, where he spent his remaining years as GURU of his burgeoning faith.

Nanak taught the existence of one supreme personal God and salvation from rebirth through inward devotional meditation upon him. He rejected all external aids to worship, such as images, temples, mosques, or places of pilgrimage, and held that God may be honored by any name so long as the worshiper does not make it exclusive. His many hymns and religious poems are of a rare coherence and beauty. R.E.

NAOMI. The mother-in-law of RUTH. The book of Ruth tells the story of Elimelech and Naomi of Bethlehem and their two sons moving to Moab during a famine. There the sons married, and later Elimelech and both sons died. Naomi encouraged her daughters-in-law to return to their family homes. One, Orpah, did, but Ruth chose to go back to Bethlehem with Naomi. Naomi urged Ruth to contact Boaz and ask his protection as next of kin. Boaz married Ruth, and their child Obed became the father of Jesse, the father of David, the ancestor of Jesus. B.J.

NAPHTALI. The name of a region in northern Palestine at the time of the Israelite settlement there, also of the tribal element that inhabited this region, and finally the name of one of the sons of Jacob (Israel), from which this tribe was thought to have descended.

(1) Probably Naphtali, like the other northern tribal names, was originally geographical (Deut. 34:2). The extent of the territory is described in Joshua 19:32-39 and Deuteronomy 33:23.

(2) That Naphtali and DAN are listed as full brothers in Jacob's polygamous household (Gen. 30:4-8) indicates some special historical relationship between the two. That their territories were contiguous only after Dan's migration northward could mean that Naphtali, too, was remembered as having inhabited its present area only after resettlement. (Gen. 49:21 seems to ascribe a restless character to Naphtali.) Also, that Naphtali and Dan were children by a concubine probably points to their mixed ancestry (like Ephraim and Manasseh), perhaps that they were indigenous to Canaan.

(3) Naphtali played an important role in the early years of the Israelite federation, but it is seldom heard of later. Barak, leader in the crucial battle at Taanach, was a man of Naphtali (Judg. 4:6), and Naphtali acquitted itself bravely in this war of liberation (Judg. 5:18). Naphtali became the eighth of the twelve administrative districts in which Solomon organized his kingdom (I Kings 4:15). Because of its strategic position and its rich land, Naphtali was subject to frequent border incursions (I Kings 15:20). It was also among the first of Israel's cities and territories to be subjugated by the Assyrians and see its people go into exile. B.V.

NARA BUDDHISM. In Japan, the Nara period (710-784) was a time of great importance for the development of Buddhism. Nara, Japan's first permanent capital, was a center of Buddhist art and architecture lavishly patronized by the state; it has left an undying cultural legacy. For the imperial house and the government, the imported religion was a vehicle for displaying its wealth and taste, centralizing spiritual and temporal authority and gaining quasi-magical protection. These ends were only furthered by an ongoing process of combining Buddhism and SHINTO. Official Buddhism in Nara comprised six schools. Three of them survive; though small, they have exercised considerable influence and hold important temples, such as Kegon's Tōdaiji, the temple of the "Great Buddha" of Nara. At the same time, popular Buddhism in the countryside, often in tacit opposition to the elite, moved in shamanistic directions. R.E.

NARRATIVE THEOLOGY. The concept of theology as "story" is a prominent and fruitful one in the contemporary church. The idea of the church as the people of God, living out the story of God's love and salvation, stretching from the Creation, throughout the history of Israel and the Incarnation of Christ, and on through the Christian centuries, is a strong one today. Certain theologians have developed the idea that evangelization is simply to tell the story of God's dealings with humanity. John Gregory Dunn of Notre Dame University has deepened and broadened the area of story or narrative theology to include the examination of one's inner life and one's psychological reactions to the experiences of one's own life. Just as Augustine saw the working of God's gracious providence in his own life experiences (recorded in The Confessions), even so every Christian can see God's loving care in his or her own life if one's memory is examined in faith (J. G. Dunn, A Search for God in Time and Memory, 1977).

Narrative theology seeks to learn from the insights into human nature found in all classical literature, from the Bible to the writings of other religions to the great literature of the world, including the modern novel. It seeks to point out these insights and to give guidelines for deciding if these insights are true or false. This approach sees the biblical narrative as a story, as "history like," and is not caught up in efforts to prove the Bible historical. The Scripture is seen as awakening the response of the reader to a deepened appreciation of what it means to be human. This approach is also used on secular literature and the writings of other faiths.

Narrative theology seeks to understand myths, symbols, rites, and images that, as David Tracy observes, disclose a reality we must recognize as true.

Narrative theology is exciting but controversial. It is exciting, for it brings a wealth of new material into theological discussion. It can be the question asked by the secular world to which the Christian tradition gives the answer of faith (based on the Bible), as Paul Tillich believed modern philosophy could be the source of such questions (the method of correlation). On the other hand, narrative theology can be a massive use of the materials of culture as the content of theology, and thus so relativize theology that it is no longer the historic Christian faith. J.C.

NATARAJA. From the Sanskrit words for "lord of the dance," Nataraja is the Hindu god SHIVA, represented as a dancer. This form is popular as a work of art and as an object of devotion in temples, particularly in South India. The deity is characteristically shown with four arms, holding a drum, hair flowing outward, his symbols of a skull and crescent moon over his head, and trampling on the demon of ignorance and delusion. He is surrounded by a circle of flames signifying the cosmos. Originally a portrayal of Shiva's wild and destructive aspect, the nataraja is now commonly said to show his creative "dancing out the universe," his place as source of animation within the cosmos and the human heart, and his triumph over falsity. R.E.

NATHAN. The name of several men in the OT, the chief of whom were the son of David and the prophet who condemned David for his sin with Bathsheba.

(1) David's son (II Sam. 5:14) was born in Jerusalem.

(2) Nathan, the prophet, served as an adviser to both David and Solomon. His famous parable of the poor man's ewe lamb made David condemn himself for stealing Bathsheba from Uriah. David repented, and Nathan named Solomon "the Beloved of Yahweh" (II Sam. 12:25). However, Nathan felt moved to deny David's wish to build a temple to Yahweh, because of David's sin. Nathan and the priest Zadok anointed Solomon king (I Kings 1). Nathan helped save the throne by uncovering the plot of Adonijah (I Kings 1). The Chronicles author tells us that Nathan wrote a book, "The Book of Nathan the Prophet," which recorded the events of the reigns of David and Solomon (II Chr. 9). He was the father of Zabud and of Azariah, who were both prominent in royal service (I Kings 4). J.C.

NATHANAEL. In Hebrew, a man's name meaning "God has given." The name of one of the disciples called by Jesus in John 1:45. This name does not appear in the Synoptic Gospels, and commentators for centuries have attempted to equate Nathanael with BARTHOLOMEW, who is included in all four lists of the twelve apostles (Matt. 10:3; Mark 3:18; Luke 6:14; Acts 1:13). It is true that Bartholomew is always connected with Philip, who was the disciple who brought Nathanael to Jesus.

In John's Gospel, Nathanael plays a large role, being shown as a thoughtful, meditative man, skeptical but open, who immediately confessed faith in Jesus upon meeting him. He declared that Jesus was Rabbi, King of Israel, the Son of God. He was one of those visited by Jesus after the Resurrection, when Peter and the apostles were fishing in the Sea of Galilee (John 21:1-14). J.C.

NATIONAL ASSOCIATION OF EVANGELICALS. Thwarted by the liberal trends in the major Protestant denominations and excluded from any real voice in the existing ecumenical movement, a group of evangelical leaders met at Moody Bible Institute, Chicago, in 1941 to discuss the advisability of forming a creedally guaranteed Christian organization. The following year the NAE was officially formed in St. Louis, Missouri. Unlike the Federal (later the National) Council of Churches, the NAE did not limit membership to denominations. It was possible for individual Christians, individual congregations, segments of small and large denominations to become members of the new association. Many observers regard the EVANGELICAL ALLIANCE, formed in London in 1846, as the NAE's progenitor. The alliance stated it was formed to "associate and concentrate against the encroachments of Popery and Puseyism and to promote the interests of a Scriptural Christianity." Perhaps the reason for the existence of the NAE could be traced more directly to the deep divisions in United States Protestantism as aftermath of the Fundamentalist-Modernist controversy of the 1920s.

While the NAE from its beginning welcomed evangelicals belonging to mainline denominations, in the years that followed its principal adherents were drawn from smaller Pentecostal and Holiness denominations as well as such groups as the Evangelical Free Church, the Baptist General Conference, and Conservative Baptists. Large evangelical communions such as Southern Baptists and Missouri Synod Lutherans never were attracted to the main body of the NAE.

However, much of the association's impact has been effected through its commissions, some of which are larger than the parent body. The National Religious Broadcasters, affiliated with the NAE, have welded together most of the conservative religious radio and television broadcasters, as well as religious television and radio station managers. The Evangelical Foreign Missions Association, an NAE-sponsored effort, has banded together a sizeable segment of evangelical independent and denominational foreign missionary societies. The World Relief Corporation (formerly the World Relief Commission), an arm of NAE, is an interdenominational service agency engaged in relief, rehabilitation, refugee resettlement, and self-help development. For some years the National Sunday School Association was an active force in evangelical Christian education.

One of the significant contributions of the NAE is the work of its Washington office, which serves evangelical interests in various church-state situations. The office now serves as a watchdog on legislation affecting EVANGELICALISM and as an aid to evangelicals dealing with various agencies of the federal government.

R.H.

NATIONAL CONFERENCE OF CATHOLIC BISHOPS. The episcopal conference of Roman Catholic bishops in the U.S.A. It was established in 1966 in response to Vatican II's decree on the bishop's pastoral office. The NCCB is made up of local bishops and associate bishops and is active in the campaign for human development; pro-life movements; the promotion of human rights in Latin America; and issues concerning nuclear weapons, war, and peace. The conference is active in promoting the liturgical reforms of Vatican II, upgrading religious education and the education of priests. The United States Catholic Conference is closely associated with the NCCB.

J.C.

NATIONAL CONFERENCE OF CHRISTIANS AND JEWS. A non-profit human relations organization that aims to create greater understanding between Christians and Jews and to eliminate intergroup prejudice. Its headquarters in New York City is called the Building for Brotherhood. The NCCJ sponsors Brotherhood Week, programs in interreligious relations and education, youth programming, police-community relations, and other community-oriented programs. The NCCJ was founded in 1928 as the reaction to the virulent anti-Catholic campaign against the presidential aspirations of Alfred E. Smith, a Catholic. The NCCJ has conducted national institutes of human relations, college workshops for teachers, youth conferences, seminars, labor-management activities, institutes on police and community relations, interracial colloquies, intercultural seminar tours on Christian-Jewish-Muslim relations in the Holy Land, an annual scholars' conference on the church struggle and the Holocaust, and other goodwill-building activities. It publishes a variety of materials to aid intergroup education.

L.K.

NATIONAL COUNCIL OF THE CHURCHES OF CHRIST IN THE UNITED STATES OF AMERICA. This cooperative federation of thirty Protestant and Eastern Orthodox denominations is the main representative of the ECUMENICAL MOVEMENT in the United States. Its present membership includes most of the major Protestant communions, except the Southern Baptist Convention, the American Lutheran Church, and the Lutheran Church—Missouri Synod. Other denominations share in some of the other programs of the NCC. The NCC describes itself as "a cooperative agency of Christian communions seeking to fulfill the unity and mission to which God calls them. The member communions, responding to the gospel revealed in the Scriptures, confess Jesus, the incarnate Son of God, as Savior and Lord. Relying on the transforming power of the Holy Spirit, the council works to bring churches into a life-giving fellowship and into common witness, study, and action to the glory of God and in service to all creation."

Some of the specific areas in which the council has been involved are those of civil rights, racial conflict, and world peace. It has also been active in facilitating the work of its member denominations in both home and overseas mission, Christian education, family life, broadcasting, and films. Through the Church World Service, the council has contributed to a worldwide program of relief for famines and other disasters.

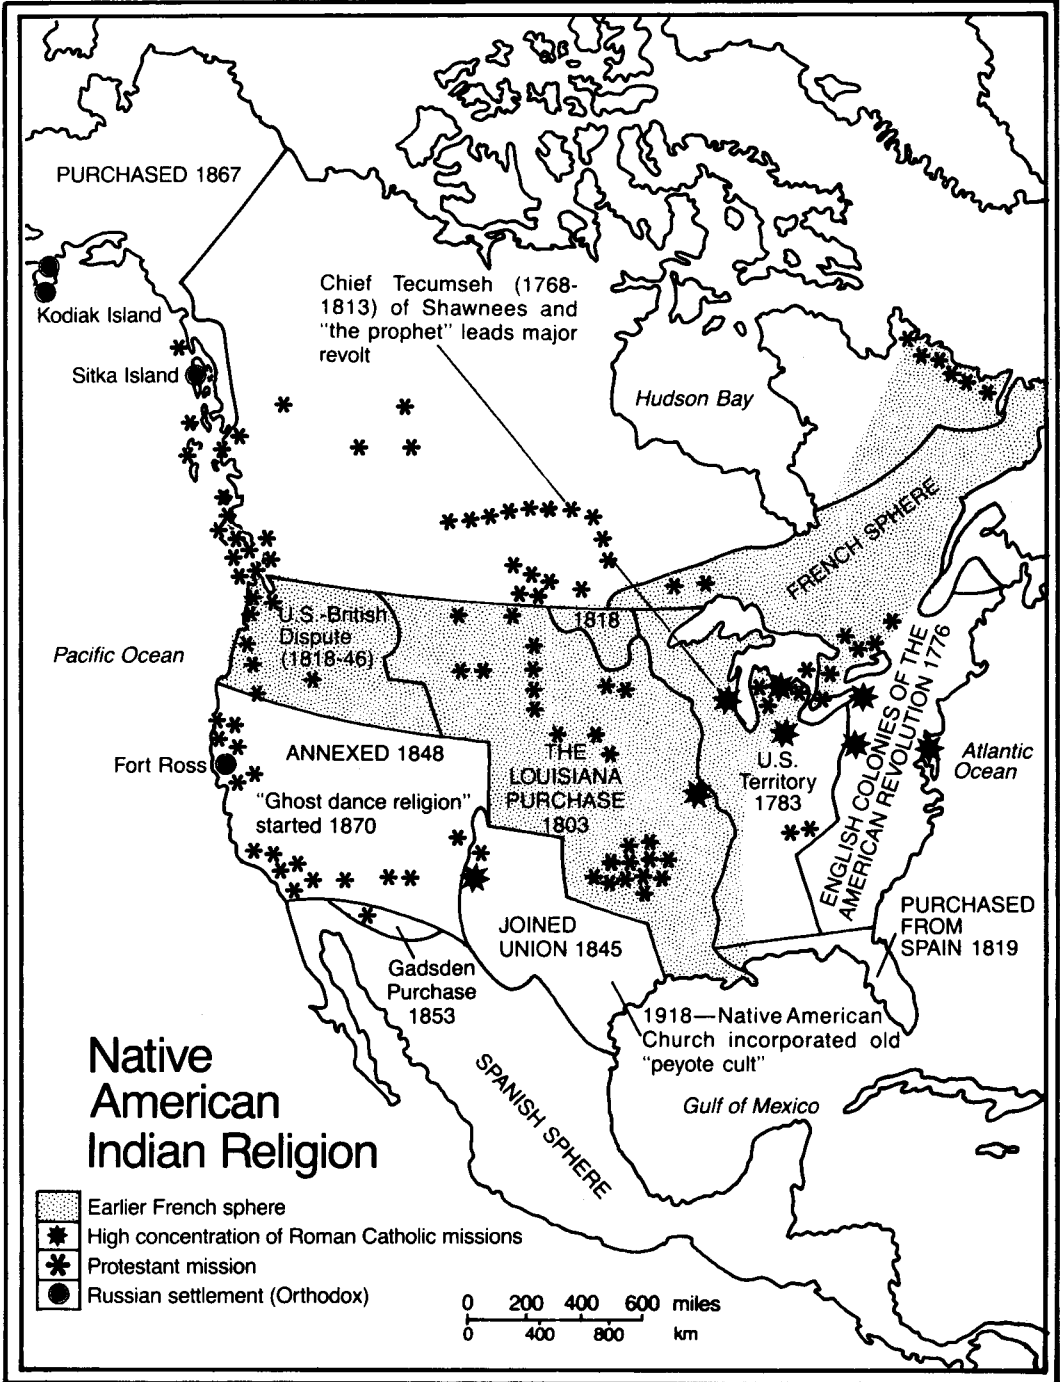

The NCC was organized in 1950, combining its predecessor, the Federal Council of the Churches of Christ in America, with the Foreign Missions Conference and the International Council of Religious Education. The FCC was formed in 1908 as an official recognition of the need of the churches to implement the SOCIAL GOSPEL. After years of struggle, the FCC became a prominent force in the American scene. The NCC has continued to provide an effective framework for cooperative Protestant social action.

As sponsor and copyright owner, the council has been active in promoting the distribution of the Revised Standard Version of the Bible. The detailed operations of the NCC are conducted through its constituted divisions and departments, with a specialized staff functioning under a general secretariat. It is governed by a General Assembly that meets biennially and a General Board that meets bimonthly.

Reprinted with permission of the Macmillan Publishing Company, from Macmillan Atlas: History of Christianity by Franklin H. Littell. Copyright © 1976 by Carra Ltd.

In recent years the council has been under attack especially by conservative elements of the churches and by some of the major media. The N.C.C. is financed by its member churches and has its headquarters in New York City. R.H.

NATIVE AMERICAN RELIGION. The religion of the native inhabitants of North America, including Mesoamerica (Central America and Mexico) and that of the Eskimos in Alaska and northern Canada. Since the time of Columbus' colossal mistake in thinking he had discovered India, and his consequent naming of the inhabitants of the Bahamas and Caribbean Islands "Indians," Europeans (including Americans of European descent) have spoken of "Indian religion." With wild swings of repulsion or attraction, Americans, who virtually destroyed the Indians of the East Coast, the Middle West, the South, and California, have considered Native American religion "heathen superstition" or have venerated the vanquished Indian as far more spiritual and wise than other people. Neither assessment is true.

Native Americans were not one people but consisted of hundreds of different groups speaking very different languages. Their lifestyles and even religious outlooks also varied. Nonetheless, certain common themes and practices run through the religions of these widely dispersed and culturally diverse peoples. There was, and is, in the continuing traditional religions of the pueblo dwellers, the Navajo, the Hopi, and the Zuni, and the recovered religious rites and beliefs of the Oglala, Lakota (Sioux), the Iroquois, and other northern peoples, a belief in a single, overarching deity, the Great Spirit or Wakan-Tanka (to use the Lakota term). This is the creator of the world and the preserver of nature; the one who guides the destiny of all living things. Humanity is seen not as separate from nature, but as part of nature, so that people are related to the animals on which they are dependent for their livelihood. All life is sacred, human and non-human. The earth and its creatures are to be used, preserved, and respected. Many different cult practices are followed, from the sacrifice of self in the sun dance to the prayers for crops in the corn dance. The use of the sacred pipe (the Indians discovered tobacco), and the experience of sacred dreams and visions was—and is—widespread. J.C.

NATURAL LAW. An idea that originated among the Greeks. Heraclitus seems to have been the first to talk of a cosmic law that is normative also for human beings. The idea was further developed by Aristotle and is recognized by Paul when he says that Gentiles have a law in their hearts corresponding to the Law of Moses (Rom. 2:14-15). The idea passed into Catholic moral theology, though many Protestant writers have criticized it. The advantage of a concept of natural law is that it recognizes that all human beings have a moral sense and that there is therefore a large area of morality that is shared by Christians and non-Christians alike. This probably outweighs the disadvantage, that if natural law is given too much prominence, it tends to overshadow distinctively Christian contributions to the moral life.

Obviously, natural law can be expressed only in the most general terms, otherwise it becomes positive law and shares in all the relativity and specificity of the latter. That good should be done and evil avoided is a general principle of natural law, but is so vacuous as to have little value. One might add recommendations that are more concrete and that derive from human nature, for example, that cooperation is better than competition, or that one should reverence life. But natural law is more a criterion for judging positive laws than a law in itself. Originally conceived as unchanging, natural law has more recently been considered to be developing and dynamic, in accord with more dynamic ideas of human nature. J.M.

NATURAL RELIGION AND THEOLOGY. Natural religion flourished among intellectuals in the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries. Contrasted with revealed or positive religions, with their specific doctrines, ceremonies, scriptures, etc., natural religion distills the essence of these, which it vindicates by reason and the evidences of nature. It was already criticized as abstract by Schleiermacher.

Natural religion is the intellectual basis for natural religion and also has been used as both a defense and an introduction for revealed religion. The claim of natural theology is that by the powers of reason and observation, the human mind can rise to an elementary knowledge of God, of the freedom and immortality of the human soul, and of the basic demands of morality. The mind can reach these truths, it is claimed, unaided by revelation. This last phrase is ambiguous. It may mean "unaided by a specific or historical revelation," such as Christianity. But this would not exclude the possibility of a general revelation in nature, and some advocates of natural theology would certainly wish to posit such a general revelation as a genuine self-communication of God, who could scarcely be known in any religious sense simply through observation and speculation.

It is sometimes held that Paul recognized the possibility of natural theology (Rom. 1:19-20), and it has regularly formed part of Catholic theology. Aquinas' "five ways" of proving the existence of God provide a classic example, and Vatican I reaffirmed the capacity to know God without a specific revelation. Protestant theologians have been much more skeptical about natural theology. While Calvin acknowledged that God is manifested in divine works, he held that the human mind as well as the human will has been impaired by sin, so that we are unable to discern God through divine works and instead set up idols—the products of our own minds. More recently, Karl Barth has waged a polemic against natural theology, holding that there is no way from our finite human minds to God, and that God can be known only through specific revelation in Jesus Christ. Natural theology is the theme of the many series of Gifford Lectures, given at the Scottish universities since 1888. J.M.

NATURE AND GRACE. The classic discussion of this theme is found in AUGUSTINE's controversy with the Pelagians. Long before that controversy arose, Augustine had already been stressing the sinfulness of human beings and their impotence in the face of the demands of God. Salvation can come only from God. The initiative must be God's and must come to us even in our sinfulness—the doctrine of PREVENIENT GRACE. Even the faith with which we respond to God must be itself a gift of God, for our nature is so infected by sin that of ourselves we cannot even receive the divine gift.

Augustine believed that such teachings are compatible with the acknowledgment of a measure of free will in humanity, but as time went on and he got into controversy, his teaching became more extreme. The doctrine of the divine initiative in salvation was developed into a full-blown theory of PREDESTINATION and any human part in the process seemed to be eliminated. Freedom of the human will and the significance of the church's preaching and its sacramental system are abolished if everything depends finally on the inscrutable decrees of God.

PELAGIUS, on the other side, thought that the stress upon grace weakened the human sense of responsibility and led to an antinomian attitude to the moral life. Was it not an encouragement to sin, that grace might abound? Humans had been created with the capacity for doing the good, and whether in fact they do the good depends on their own free will. But if Augustine had exaggerated the impotence of the human will, Pelagius went to the opposite extreme of error and did not adequately allow for the disabling effects of sin in human life.

In the subsequent stages of the dispute between Augustinians and Pelagians, something like a compromise was eventually reached. The Council of Orange (529) gave general support to the Augustinian position, but did not sanction its extreme view of predestination. The controversy is not yet over. It was revived at the Reformation, and persists today in the rival claims of Christian and secular humanism. But the general tendency in Christian theology has been to move toward some form of synergism or co-working of God and humans, with the emphasis on the priority of the divine grace. Nature and grace are not opposed, for human nature is itself the creation of God and was originally disposed toward the good. In Aquinas' words, grace does not abolish nature but perfects it.

J.M.

NAUVOO. A city in Illinois founded by the Latter-day Saints or Mormons, followers of JOSEPH SMITH, in the first half of the nineteenth century. The Mormons moved there from Kirtland, Ohio. Next they went to Missouri, where they had been forced to leave, and then on to Illinois. Severe opposition to their beliefs arose, Joseph Smith was killed, and most of the Mormons went to Utah, following BRIGHAM YOUNG. J.C.

NAZARENE. The English word translates two different Greek words (one of which may be Semitic [Aramaic] in origin) having no discernible difference in meaning. The distinctly Greek term occurs in Matthew (2:23), Mark (14:67), and Acts (24:5). Matthew (26:71), John (18:5, 7; 19:19), and especially Luke (18:37; Acts 2:22; 3:6; 4:10; 6:14; 22:8; 26:9) use the Semitic form.

It is clear that the NT writers considered Jesus to be a Nazarene because he was from Nazareth (Matt. 21:11; John 1:45; Acts 10:38). However, Matthew adds the additional note that the title was given in fulfillment of the word of the prophets, "he shall be called a Nazarene" (2:23). But this statement does not occur in the OT, and Matthew may have been referring to the general teaching of the prophets or perhaps he understood the Semitic form of the term to derive from a Hebrew form meaning NAZIRITE, which appears in the Former Prophets (Judg. 13:7), referring to Samson: "the boy shall be a Nazirite to God." J.R.M.

NAZARENE, CHURCH OF THE. See CHURCH OF THE NAZARENE.

NAZARETH. A modern city, which was an ancient village, lying on the northern ridge of the Jezreel

From Atlas of the Bible (Thomas Nelson & Sons Limited)

A street in Nazareth

Valley in Lower Galilee. Jesus Christ lived here during his early life. The major trade routes ran through the Jezreel Valley to the south and the Beit Netofa Valley to the north, leaving Nazareth largely isolated. It is not mentioned in the OT, the Talmud, or Josephus. No prophet, priest, or king ever came from the city, thus provoking the astonished Nathanael's response: "Can anything good come out of Nazareth?" (John 1:46). The village is identified as the home of Joseph and Mary before Jesus was born, and his birth was announced there (Luke 1:26). He left Nazareth after his rejection in the synagogue and the attempt upon his life (Luke 4:29).

There is no reliable evidence of the first-century village in the few archaeological remains extant in Nazareth, but a first-century inscription from Caesarea Martima names it among towns where the twenty-four priestly courses were located. A lengthy inscription attributed to Claudius, or perhaps

Courtesy of the Israel Government Tourist Office, Houston, Texas

Nazareth set within the hills of Galilee

Tiberius, was brought to Paris purportedly from Nazareth in 1878, which prescribes capital punishment for disturbance of graves. This may be an imperial response to the resurrection of Christ, which occasioned a tumult in Rome resulting in Claudius' expulsion of Jews in A.D. 49 (Acts 18:2). J.R.M.

NAZIRITE. The term refers to those who have been dedicated or consecrated to religious service. They refuse to eat unclean food, cut their hair, drink intoxicating beverages, and they avoid contact with the dead. Laws governing Nazirites are laid out in Numbers 6. Samson was a typical example of such a person who, in spite of his moral lapses, remained a Nazirite until his death (Judg. 13-16). Whether John the Baptist was a Nazirite is not clear, though he was consecrated from his birth (Luke 1:15), as was Samuel (1 Sam. 1:11), who did not become a Nazirite. Paul's vow, taken in the Temple in Jerusalem, may have been a temporary Nazirite vow (Acts 21:23-26), which some think may have begun at Cenchrea, where he shaved his head (Acts 18:18). This latter point is unlikely, however, since the Nazirite vow forbade the cutting of one's hair. It seems rather that Paul had been under a vow while in Corinth and brought it to an end in Cenchrea by cutting his hair, as prescribed in Numbers 6:18. By Paul's time, accommodation had to be made for the Jews in the Diaspora who could not comply with the requirement of ending the vow at the tent of meeting (or the tabernacle/temple). Details of Nazirite vows in the NT period are set out in the Mishnah, tractate "Nazir," where special rules apply to those who complete a vow and then go to the Holy Land (chap. 6). J.R.M.

NEALE, JOHN MASON (1818-66). Anglican priest, scholar, and noted translator of Greek and Latin hymns. Born on January 24 in London, England, Neale was educated at Trinity College, Cambridge. Although he came from a family of Evangelicals, Neale espoused the High Church emphasis of the Oxford Movement. An able scholar, Neale dug deeply into the trove of ancient Greek hymns of the Orthodox liturgy and Latin hymns of the medieval church, rendering them into English. One of these was the great Advent hymn, "O Come, O Come, Emmanuel," which had been a part of the twelfth-century Latin liturgy. Another great number was "The Day of Resurrection," adapted from an original eighth-century Greek hymn by John of Damascus. Other similar translations that have become popular English hymns are "All Glory, Laud, and Honor," "Of the Father's Love Begotten," "Good King Wenceslas," and "O Happy Band of Pilgrims." Although Neale was weak in body most of his life, he was a prodigious and scholarly author. He died at East Grinstead, England, where he served as warden of Sackville College.

R. H.

NEANDER, JOACHIM (1650–80). German hymn writer, school teacher, and pastor. Neander was born in Bremen, on May 3, and is regarded as the greatest hymn writer of the German Reformed Church. The author of sixty hymns and composer of many tunes, while an assistant pastor and teacher in a church-sponsored school at Dusseldorf, Neander wrote "Praise Ye (to) the Lord, the Almighty." He also wrote "Praise to the Earth, and Sea, and Air," based on the Nineteenth Psalm. In a dispute with the elders of the church at Dusseldorf, he was forced to flee to a cave. While there he wrote a number of hymns, all marked by a note of triumphant praise. Neander died in Bremen, the city of his birth.

R. H.

NEBO, MOUNT. The mountain in the land of MOAB from which MOSES was permitted to view the Promised Land, which he was destined never to enter (Deut. 32:49; 34:1-5). It is with all probability to be identified with Jebel Neba, an elevation from which on a clear day most of Palestine from Galilee to the Negeb and from the Dead Sea to the Mediterranean can be seen. Here are the remains of a Byzantine church and monastery that once commemorated the biblical events. According to Numbers 33:47, Mount Nebo is part of the Abarim chain, and according to Deuteronomy 34:1 it is a peak of the Pisgah, a term taken to mean the mountain slope, on another of whose heights Balaam offered sacrifice and prophesied over Israel (Num. 23:14-24). It was in a cave on Mount Nebo, according to II Maccabees 2:4-5, that the prophet Jeremiah hid the tent, the ark, and the altar of incense after the destruction of the Temple by the Babylonians.

B. V.

NEBUCHADNEZZAR. More exactly Nebuchadrezzar. The name of several Babylonian kings, the most famous of whom is Nebuchadnezzar II (605–562 B.C.); also the most famous of the kings of the Neo-Babylonian Empire, who figures prominently in the final history of the kingdom of JUDAH. Nebuchadnezzar was the son of Nabopolassar, founder of the Chaldean or Neo-Babylonian Empire, formerly a governor under the Assyrians in the days of their declining empire. In 625 B.C. he formed an alliance with the Medes, and in a series of campaigns he succeeded in completely demolishing ASSYRIA; destroying Nineveh, their capital, in 612; obliterating their last redoubt at Haran in 609; and ending their final hope for survival by defeating the Egyptians under Pharaoh Neco at the battle of Carchemish in 605. Neco, who had gone to the aid of the Assyrians in the face of the Chaldean threat, had been delayed en route at Megiddo by Josiah of Judah (II Kings 23:29). Though Josiah was slain in the encounter, his intervention may also have contributed to the downfall of the hated Assyrians.

Copyright © John C. Trever

The Ishtar Gate (reconstructed) in the walls of Babylon at the time of King Nebuchadnezzar (sixth century B.C.)

Between 607 and 605 B.C., Nebuchadnezzar served with his father in the western campaigns and was, in fact, the commanding general in the battle of Carchemish. In that same year, however, he was recalled to Babylon to assume the throne on Nabopolassar's death. During the next several years he was back in the west, consolidating this part of his empire and expanding on it. The Egyptians, who had briefly dominated Palestine after Josiah's death, deposing and deporting his successor Jehoahaz and placing Jehoiakim on the throne in his place (II Kings 23:30-35), were in turn expelled from the land and driven back to Egypt. Jehoiakim became Nebuchadnezzar's vassal.

In 601 Jehoiakim attempted to throw off the Babylonian yoke (II Kings 24:1), doubtless emboldened by Nebuchadnezzar's having been bogged down temporarily in an unsuccessful attempt to invade Egypt. The result was the beginning of the end for Judah. Second Chronicles 36:6-7 and Daniel 1:1-2 testify to a tradition that already in Jehoiakim's reign Nebuchadnezzar successfully besieged and pillaged Jerusalem. What is certain is that in 597 B.C. the "Babylonian captivity" began. Jehoiakim, under whatever circumstances, was succeeded briefly by Jehoiachin, who with the removal of Egyptian protection became the prey to Babylonian conquest and was carried off captive to the east, along with all the influential leadership of the Judean state, leaving behind only those who were regarded as inconsequential by the Babylonians (II Kings 24:7-16). Jehoiachin never returned from this exile, though he and his fellow Judeans eventually, after initial deprivations, settled down in their involuntary new homeland and frequently prospered there as an earlier Jewish Diaspora (II Kings 25:27-30).

Courtesy of The University Museum, University of Pennsylvania

Cylinder of Nebuchadnezzar inscribed with three columns of text about 586 B.C., found buried in the foundation of a temple in Babylon

Nebuchadnezzar had set up in place of Jehoiachin his uncle Mattaniah as a Babylonian puppet king, to whom the name Zedekiah was given (II Kings 24:17). Zedekiah was counseled by the prophets Jeremiah, who had remained in Judah, and Ezekiel, who was among the exiles in Babylonia, to submit to Babylonian rule as an inevitability, and to wait on the pleasure of the Lord for a restoration of Israel. However, Zedekiah was finally persuaded by his nationalist advisers to rebel, with totally disastrous results. In 586 Jerusalem was devastated by Nebuchadnezzar's army, the king and his family were taken into ignominious EXILE, and Judah disappeared as an independent political entity (II Kings 24:20-25:21).

Because Nebuchadnezzar had become, in Jewish tradition and folklore, the legendary enemy par excellence of the people of God (just as Nineveh or Sodom, later on Babylon or Rome, would figure as "the sinful city" par excellence), he appears in such works as Daniel 1-4 and Judith 1:1, 7 etc. (where he is called "king of the Assyrians!") simply as a symbol of malevolence. This is a mythical Nebuchadnezzar redivivus, a character of fiction. B.V.

NEBUZARADAN. The captain of the guard in King Nebuchadnezzar's household (II Kings 25:8). He was given power to destroy the Temple, palaces, and walls at Jerusalem after its capture in 587 B.C. He looted the Temple and carried the chief priests and other officials to exile at Riblah in Syria. He showed favor to Jeremiah (Jer. 39). J.C.

NEGEB. The desert region south of Judah, running down to the Gulf of Aqabah and into the Sinai Peninsula and Edom (modern Jordan). Negeb means "the dry" in Hebrew, as there is little rain and little water there.

The natural barriers of the ridges and ravines that go across this area, from east to west, made it an effective defense for Judah and Israel. Very few attempts were made to attack Israel through the Negeb. Indeed, the Israelites under Moses at the time of the Exodus tried to enter Canaan this way and gave up the attempt (Deut. 1).

When David was forced to flee Saul's wrath he went into hiding in the Negeb (I Sam. 27). For most of its history the Negeb was the home of wandering nomads who grazed their flocks in the ravines that sprouted grass after the winter rain. The Amalekites lived here and also the Edomites. Edom became a primary enemy of Israel. After the rise of monasticism (third century A.D.), many Christian monks lived in the Negeb and the many monastic communities irrigated and farmed land there. This enterprise was destroyed by the Islamic invasion in the seventh century A.D. J.C.

NEHEMIAH. See EZRA AND NEHEMIAH.

NEO-CONFUCIANISM. See CONFUCIANISM.

NEO-ORTHODOXY. A movement in Protestant theology that began in Switzerland after the outbreak of the First World War and spread rapidly through Europe and North America. It was the most influential and, in some respects, the most creative theological movement of the first half of this century. Neo-orthodoxy is also referred to as "dialectical theology," "the theology of crisis," or the "theology of the Word of God." It was in large part a protest against nineteenth-century liberal theology, which appeared wedded to a bourgeois, optimistic culture unable to respond to the crisis of Western civilization occasioned by the war and the loss of confidence in liberal programs for "Christianizing the social order."

The movement of prophetic protest was initiated by KARL BARTH with his commentary on the Epistle to the Romans (1919) and his discovery of what he called "the strange new world within the Bible." The book sought to direct attention to the infinite qualitative difference between the holy and transcendent God and finite, sinful persons; to the fact of human helplessness and the crisis of faith; and to the stark revelation of the righteousness of God and the fact that the gulf between God and humanity can be bridged by grace alone through faith. A number of younger pastors and theologians rallied around Barth, including EMIL BRUNNER, EDUARD THURNEISEN, Georg Merz, FRIEDRICH GOGARTEN, and RUDOLF BULTMANN. The movement voiced its concerns in the journal Zwischen den Zeiten (Between the Times), published between 1922 and 1933. While members of the group soon found that they disagreed and controversy divided them, they all concurred in protesting against theological liberalism.

In the writings of PAUL the Apostle, AUGUSTINE, LUTHER, CALVIN, and in the recently discovered works of KIERKEGAARD and DOSTOEVSKY, the Neo-orthodox theologians rediscovered the power of doubt, evil, and human sin, but also the boundless grace and mercy of God's love. Above all, Neo-orthodoxy grew out of a passionate engagement with the Bible itself in the expectation that the Word of God, free of a culture in crisis, would disclose itself in new and unexpected ways.

With Kierkegaard, Neo-orthodox theologians recognized that divine truth is never direct and transparent but always indirect and dialectical, that is, always found in a tension between one truth and another. This tension is never fully resolved because revelation is a union of eternity and time, which can only be expressed paradoxically, as in the claim that Jesus Christ is both human and God. For Barth, God is "Wholly Other"; the finite cannot contain or even mirror the infinite. There is no natural theology—no analogy between humans and God. God is known only through the divine self-revelation in the Bible. But even here the revealed God is also the hidden God, the Deus absconditus. God's unveiling is also a veiling. For seeing God in Christ requires the eyes of faith, which is a gift of grace.

Neo-orthodoxy does not represent a return to the Protestant ORTHODOXY of an earlier time. The Neo-orthodox theologians accept the results of modern science and apply the most radical historicocritical methods to the study of the Bible and the Christian tradition. The Neo-orthodox theologians often interpret doctrines symbolically rather than literally, pointing to the religious meaning of biblical events. This approach to the Bible has remained one of the most disputed and unresolved aspects of Neo-orthodoxy. J.L.

NEOPLATONISM. The philosophy originating in Alexandria, developed by Plotinus (205–270), and continued by such figures as ORIGEN (about 182–251), a Christian theologian; Porphyry (233–304), an anti-Christian thinker; and Proclus (about 409–487), an Athenian associated with the later stages of Plato's Academy. Drawing on Pythagorean, Aristotelian, and Stoic sources more than on Plato, Neoplatonism formed a significant school of thought until the conquest of Egypt by the Muslims in 629 and continued as a major influence in Western thought mainly through its impact on AUGUSTINE (354–430) and through him on subsequent Christian theology and philosophy.

In Neoplatonic thought, being emanates from the One or the Good. From the One comes the realms of Nous, of Soul, and then of Matter, which represents a falling away toward nonbeing or nothingness. Some souls remain unembodied and are not contaminated by incarnation; human souls exist as embodied and are called to turn away from Matter as evil and ascend toward knowledge of and ecstatic union with the One. C.Mc.

NEO-THOMISM. A movement of the late nineteenth to the mid-twentieth century associated with the rebirth of a vital Roman Catholic theology based on a renewal of the theological synthesis of THOMAS AQUINAS. Neo-Thomism received impetus from Pope Leo XIII's encyclical Aeterni patris (1879). The pope called upon the church "to restore the golden wisdom of Thomas and to spread it far and wide for the defense and beauty of the Catholic faith." Special institutes were established for the study of Thomism, a critical text of Thomas' writings was prepared, and St. Thomas was made the patron of all Roman Catholic colleges and schools.

Neo-Thomism attempts to demonstrate that the teachings of Thomas Aquinas are perennial and capable of adaptation to the problems of modernity. Neo-Thomists are Aristotelian, they insist on an empirical or sensory basis of knowledge and thus begin with an analysis of the natural world and its contingency. From this inquiry they move to the question of that Being which is its own existence, whose essence is to exist, that is, God. Neo-Thomists remain almost unique in this century in their efforts to restore Aquinas' traditional proofs for the existence of God, especially by attempting to show that KANT's critique of those proofs is not decisive, and that the proofs are compatible with developments in contemporary science. Among the most important Neo-Thomists are ETIENNE GILSON, JACQUES MARITAIN, and the Anglican theologian E. L. Mascall. Since Pope John XXIII (1958), the rigid adherence to Neo-Thomism was relaxed, and a new openness to other philosophical approaches is possible in Roman Catholicism. J.L.

NEPHILIM. Giants or semidivine beings produced by intercourse between human females ("the daughters of men") and divine or angelic beings ("the sons of God"), according to ancient Canaanite mythology.

The Nephilim resemble, in concept, the mythical heroes, half-man, half-God, found in ancient Greek mythology. Such mythical figures appear in the OT, but only briefly. Genesis 6:4 speaks of the giants in the earth, or Nephilim, and refers to their mixed parentage. Later, in Numbers 13:33, the Israelite spies sent into Canaan reported the strength of the Canaanites by saying they looked like the Nephilim or giants.

There is no way to reconcile the concept of Nephilim, and of intercourse between angels and human beings, with the beliefs about God in the rest of Genesis. Genesis 6:4 must represent a fragment of a longer account of an ancient myth that escaped removal from the text by the Priestly redactors (or editors) at the time of the Exile and after (586 B.C.). The concept of heavenly beings engaging human beings sexually belongs to ancient non-Hebrew mythology and, throughout history, to the occult, that is, the incubi (demons), who, superstition holds, visit men and women by night. J.C.

NERO. Successor of CLAUDIUS as Roman Emperor (A.D. 54–68). Nero's mother, Agrippina, was largely responsible for Nero's rise to power, persuading Claudius, who later became her husband, to adopt Nero as guardian of his son and heir (by a previous wife), Britannicus. She was also instrumental in obtaining the senate's confirmation of Nero as emperor upon the death of Claudius. The following year Britannicus was murdered, and in A.D. 59 Nero had his mother put to death. Another woman, Nero's mistress, Poppea, became a power behind the throne.

Profligate and a spendthrift, Nero confiscated large estates and devalued the currency to support his fun and games and the cost of his military adventures. In July A.D. 64, a third of the city of Rome was destroyed by fire. The Roman historian Tacitus records in his Annals that in order to escape suspicion of having started the fires to further his rebuilding projects, Nero found scapegoats among a people "hated for their crimes," the mob called "Christians." The first to be arrested confessed, under duress, to arson or Christianity, and accused others. Nero exposed his victims to savage attacks by wild dogs, and others were crucified or immolated in Nero's gardens. According to Clement of Rome, Peter and Paul were put to death during Nero's reign of terror. Subsequently, in A.D. 68, revolts erupted in Gaul, Spain, and Africa, and the emperor committed suicide.

A rumor spread abroad that Nero had not died but that he would return from a hiding place in the East to reclaim his throne and wreak vengeance upon the opposition. Several pretenders attempted to give credence to this myth, but they were caught and put to death. Dio Chrysostom, a second-century historian, wrote that "most men believe that Nero is still alive." Some interpreters of the Christian apocalypse, the book of Revelation to John, see a reference to this myth in 13:3, 12, 14. It is uncertain whether or not Nero's persecution of Christians spread beyond the capital, or became a legal basis for later persecutions.

Courtesy of the Trustees of the British Museum

Bust of Nero

A combination of Nero's persecutions and of the flight of others from Jerusalem, before its destruction in A.D. 70, may have led to a consolidation of the movement: to the composition of some writings (later canonized), notably the Gospel of Mark, and, possibly, I Peter; to a rethinking of the apocalyptic eschatology of the early church; and to a provision for the church's order and offices of ministry, which were principal concerns in the last third of the first century.

J.L.P.

NESTORIANS. Followers of Nestorius, a fifth-century monk from Antioch, patriarch of Constantinople (428–431), father of the Nestorian churches. Nestorius objected to calling Mary the MOTHER OF GOD, which he felt did not do justice to the human Christ. Mary bore the human Jesus, not the divine. Nestorius claimed Christ's two natures were conjoined and acted as one but were not a unified, single person. CYRIL, patriarch of rival Alexandria (412-444), opposed Nestorius by emphasizing the divine in a unified Being. Ambiguous terms confused the issue. Cyril secured Nestorius' condemnation at a Roman synod (430) and again at the Council of Ephesus (431), which exiled Nestorius and his followers and denounced Nestorian beliefs. Pope Leo I's Tome settled the question temporarily when the Council of CHALCEDON (451) recognized in Christ two natures without confusion, change, division, or separation in one person and subsistence. Further attempts to reconcile variant views caused prolonged dissensions. The Council of Constantinople (681) reaffirmed Chalcedon and finally closed the controversy. Exiled Nestorians dispersed into Persia, where Barsumas led a strong group at Edessa, India, China, and Mongolia, and have continued with diminishing strength until current times. In 1625 a monument was excavated in Changan, China, showing Nestorians were there in 781. C.M.

NETHINIM. The term, which is Aramaized Hebrew, means "those dedicated" or "those given." It is found only in the books of Ezra-Nehemiah and I Chronicles, where it is usually translated "temple servants" and designates an inferior class of ministers apparently charged with the menial works associated with the care of the Temple and its paraphernalia. Sometimes, as in Ezra 8:17, the Nethinim seem to be part of the Levitical class, and in Numbers 3:9 the proper Hebrew word for "dedicated," "given," is used of the Levites. However, the Nethinim are usually, as in Ezra 8:20, categorized apart from the Levites and said to be in attendance on them. In Ezra 2:58 they are associated with yet another group called "the sons of Solomon's servants." In view of the genealogies provided the Nethinim, there can be no doubt that they were regarded as Israelites in the time of Ezra-Nehemiah. Some of their names appear to be foreign, however, which leads to the suspicion that they, like various others of the postexilic community, were Israelites by virtue of "naturalization." They probably replaced a category of state slaves, who were usually prisoners of war otherwise subject to death, who had performed the servile functions in the preexilic Temple. In Ezekiel 44:7-9 Israel is rebuked for having introduced foreigners into the Temple to assist in its sacred functions. B.V.

NEVIN, JOHN WILLIAMSON (1803-86). The Mercersburg theologian was a graduate of Union College (1821) and Princeton Seminary (1826). He became professor of biblical literature at Western Theological Seminary near Pittsburgh in 1828. Called to Mercersburg Seminary in 1840, he changed from Presbyterianism to the Reformed Church. His writings include The Anxious Bench (1843), opposing revivalism; The Mystical Presence (1846); and The History and Genius of the Heidelberg Catechism (1847). From 1841 to 1853 he was president of Marshall College and from 1866 to 1876 president of Franklin and Marshall. N.H.

NEW AMERICAN BIBLE. (NAB). The biblical movement within the Roman Catholic church, given greater impetus by the Second Vatican Council, was responsible for this new version of Scripture. It has become the official approved version of the Roman Catholic church in the United States and is recommended for use in the liturgy. The NAB was produced in 1970 by members of the Catholic Biblical Association of America under the patronage of the Bishops' Committee of the Confraternity of Christian Doctrine. In its foreword by Pope Paul VI, the decree (Dei Verbum) is quoted in part, prescribing that "up-to-date and appropriate translations be made in the various languages, by preference from the original texts of the sacred books." R.H.

NEW AMERICAN STANDARD VERSION (NASV). A group of unidentified evangelical scholars, working under the direction of the Lockman Foundation of LaHabra, California, were the translators of the New American Standard Bible. As the name implies, this is another revision of the AMERICAN STANDARD VERSION of 1901. Like the Revised Standard Version, it is another continuation of the Bible in the tradition of Tyndale's King James Version. The translators attempted to follow faithful rendering of the original text into contemporary English, seeking a version acceptable for pulpit reading and memorization. Despite competition from the LIVING BIBLE and the NEW INTERNATIONAL VERSION, the NASV has gained a wide and enthusiastic number of users, particularly among conservative Christian groups. R.H.

NEW BEING. A term used especially by PAUL TILlich to refer both to Jesus as the Christ and to those who, in faith, are in union with Christ. Tillich regards the term as both authentic to the Pauline witness that "if any one is in Christ, he is a new creation" (II Cor. 5:17) and relevant to modern humanity's existential quest for the healing of estrangement and the regaining of essential personhood, or a new being. In the West this spiritual quest is expressed in the expectation of a messiah who will actualize what each person is essentially meant to be under the conditions of existential estrangement and who will overcome the forces that threaten existence. Christianity is founded on the claim that Christ is the medium of this final revelation, or the New Being. J.L.

NEW BIRTH. The concept of the Christian as a new creature is taught in II Corinthians 5:17, where CONVERSION is regarded as a death to the unregenerate way of life and a rebirth into a new and better way. This is typified in the act of baptism, in which one is symbolically buried with Christ in the likeness of his death and raised in the likeness of his resurrection to walk in "newness of life" (Rom. 6:1-14). This death is considered to be a putting off of the old nature and the putting on of a new nature (Col. 2:20-3:17). This transformation of nature is made possible by the same miraculous power that raised Christ from the dead (Col. 2:12).

J.R.M.

NEW COVENANT. The author of Hebrews (8:6-13) affirms that a new (that is, fresh) COVENANT has replaced the former one. The author states in 9:15-17 that a new covenant necessitates the death of the one who made it, thus becoming a "will" or "testament." The reference is to the words of Christ at the Last Supper (Matt. 26:28; Mark 14:24; Luke 22:20).
J.R.M.

NEW EARTH/NEW HEAVEN. The whole creation has been awaiting its rebirth in new creation, Paul writes (Rom. 8:18-25). The book of Revelation climaxes in a vision of "a new heaven and a new earth" replacing the former ones (Rev. 21:1; compare II Pet. 3:13). Similar teaching may be found in pre-Christian centuries (I Enoch 45:4-5) and in the OT (Isa. 65:17; 66:22).
J.R.M.

NEW ENGLAND THEOLOGY. Originally rooted in Puritanism, the Westminster Confession, William Ames' Marrow of Sacred Theology, and Petrus Ramus' logic, the New England theology culminated in the work of America's first, and some would say greatest, theologian, JONATHAN EDWARDS. In his train followed the New Divinity men: Joseph Bellamy, SAMUEL HOPKINS, Jonathan Edwards, Jr., Nathanael Emmons, and TIMOTHY DWIGHT. When Harvard drifted toward Unitarianism, Yale became their citadel. Based on "experimental" or experiential religion (as Edwards said, "True religion, in great part, consists in holy affections"), the New England divines wrestled with the questions of God's sovereignty, the nature and extent of original sin, and the nature of the Atonement.
N.H.

NEW ENGLISH BIBLE (NEB). A Joint Committee of the non-Roman Catholic churches of the British Isles was formed to sponsor a new translation of the Scriptures in contemporary English. A prestigious group of scholars working under the direction of Charles H. Dodd, noted theologian, produced the New English Bible. The NT appeared in 1961 on the 350th anniversary of the publication of the King James Version. The complete Bible, including the Apocrypha, was published in 1970. The Oxford University Press and Cambridge University Press served as joint publishers.

Even though its sponsors declared the New English Bible was to be rendered in "timeless English," it has met with limited general acceptance even in Great Britain, where the Revised Standard Version and later translations in current idiom are preferred.
R.H.

NEW INTERNATIONAL VERSION (NIV). The concept of a contemporary language version of the Scriptures that is both scholarly and free of liberal bias had its beginnings in 1965, after several years of exploratory study by committees from the Christian Reformed Church and the National Association of Evangelicals. In 1967 the New York Bible Society, later renamed the International Bible Society, provided the initial funding of the project. Starting out with the Gospel of John in 1970, other books of the Bible were translated until the NT made its appearance in 1973 and the complete Bible in 1978. From the start the NIV met with success, and already millions of the new version have been sold.
R.H.

NEW JERUSALEM. Jerusalem was the holy city, the center of God's direction of Israel and the focal point of the return of the MESSIAH, according to Jewish theology. Periodically, Jerusalem was destroyed and its future glory anticipated. Isaiah spoke of it (54; 60) as did Ezekiel (40; 48). It was a common theme in the period between the OT and the NT (II Esd. 10:27; II Bar. 4:3; Test. Dan. 5:12) and is discussed in various NT passages (Gal. 4:26; Heb. 12:22), the most vivid of which is Revelation 21:2, in the context of John's revelation of the new creation. The New Jerusalem is the bride, the wife of the Lamb, that is, the church (Rev. 21:2, 10; compare Eph. 5:25 ff.).
J.R.M.

NEW JERUSALEM, CHURCH OF THE. See SWEDENBORG, EMMANUEL.

NEW JEWISH VERSION. Jews, like Protestants and Roman Catholics, have sought to keep abreast of changing language patterns and to render their versions of the Bible into contemporary English. The Jewish Publication Society of America issued the first volume of the Scriptures, the Torah, in contemporary English in 1962. The overall name of the new Bible is The Holy Scriptures According to the Massoretic Text. Dr. Harry M. Orlinsky, professor of Bible at Hebrew Union College, Jewish Institute of Religion, served as editor in chief. Two eminent Jewish scholars were his fellow editors: Dr. H. L. Ginsberg, professor of Bible at the Jewish Theological Seminary, and Dr. Ephraim A. Speiser, head of the Department of Semitic and Oriental Languages at the University of Pennsylvania.

The Hebrew Scriptures are divided into three sections—the Torah (the five books of Moses), the Prophets (historical and prophetic books), and the Writings (consisting of the Psalms and other books). The Torah appeared first, and those scriptures containing the Prophets and the Writings appeared later in separate volumes. The translators declare that this work is not a revision but is a new translation. R.H.

NEW LIGHTS. The pro-revivalist party among Congregationalists and Presbyterians that emerged from the First GREAT AWAKENING. In opposition to the Old Lights, the New Lights lauded the effects of the REVIVALS, accepting emotional preaching, a renewed emphasis on conversion as the basis for church membership, a tolerance for "excitement" in services, and more of an openness to lay participation. Theologically they were Edwardsean or New Divinity. They tended to be postmillennial, optimistic, progressive, individualistic, and believers in the special destiny of America. N.H.

NEW MAN. The Letter to the Colossians speaks of putting off the old man and putting on the new man (3:9-10) using neon anthropos and thus referring to a totally new kind of nature, a Christian one embracing a new attitude toward life. This new life is the same for a Jew or a Greek, circumcized or uncircumcized, barbarian, Sythian, slave or free (Col. 3:11). In Ephesians (2:15) these divergent aspects of society are described as formerly being separate entities but now through Christ have become one new man (kainon anthropon). The old man (nature) belongs to their former manner of life and is characterized by deceitful lusts whereas the new man is created after the righteousness and holiness of God (Eph. 4:22-24). Envisioned here is the church, the body of Christ, which has broken down the walls of division between its diverse elements (Eph. 2:14-15) and maintaining a unity of the spirit (Eph. 4:1-6) proclaims the mysterious plan of God in bringing about this oneness to the principalities and powers in the heavenly places (Eph. 3:10). (Compare NEW BIRTH.) J.R.M.

NEWMAN, JOHN HENRY CARDINAL (1801-90). British Anglican church leader of the OXFORD MOVEMENT, who converted to Roman Catholicism and became a cardinal. Born in London and educated at Oxford, Newman received the Oriel College fellowship at Oxford in 1822, and was ordained an Anglican deacon in 1824. He tutored at Oriel, and in 1828 became vicar at St. Mary's, Oxford, where his learned sermons attracted wide attention. While touring Europe (1832-33), he composed his famous hymn "Lead, Kindly Light." On returning he heard John Keble's controversial sermon at St. Mary's on national apostasy accusing England of straying from true apostolic Christianity. Deeply impressed, Newman joined the new Oxford movement and was soon its acknowledged leader. His sermons at St. Mary's, Parochial and Plain Sermons (1834-42), drew national attention and affected England's religious outlook.

He contributed twenty-four or more pieces to Tracts for the Times (1833-41), writings that gave a Catholic interpretation to Anglicanism, Newman authored the highly controversial Tract 90 (1841), arguing that Anglicanism's Thirty-nine Articles were Roman Catholic in substance. Newman, more and more doubting Anglicanism's via media between Protestantism and Catholicism, left Oxford to live at Littlemore (a chapelry at St. Mary's) in seclusion with a few friends. In 1843 he resigned his post at St. Mary's and in 1845 joined the Roman Catholic church. His Essay on the Development of Christian Doctrine (1845) clearly showed his turn toward Catholicism. In 1846 he was ordained a priest in Rome.

Returning to England, Newman joined the Congregation of the Oratory, priests living in community without monastic vows, and from 1854 to 1858 he administered the Catholic University in Dublin, Ireland. This experience led to The Idea of a University Defined (1873) in which he emphasized mental cultivation over practical information in education. Apologia pro vita sua, a classic account of his spiritual development, appeared in 1864. A Grammar of Assent (1870) carefully analyzed how human beings arrive at religious certitude. In 1877 he was elected an honorary Fellow of Trinity College, Oxford, and two years later Pope Leo XIII made him a cardinal. A man of integrity and a superb writer, Newman led thousands back to Catholicism. C.M.

NEW MOON. The religious calendar of ancient Israel was based on lunar calculations. The new month corresponded to the new moon. Trumpets were blown to herald the new moon while sacrifices were being offered (Num. 10:10). It appears that no work was done on the day of the new moon (Amos 8:5). Detailed instructions for additional offerings on that day are given in Numbers 28:11-15, with special musical services indicated in Psalm 81:3. The holiest day of the year, the Day of Atonement, occurred in the seventh month, whose new moon (first day) seems to have been regarded as especially important (Lev. 23:24ff.). Many of Ezekiel's visions were received on the first day of the month (26:1; 29:17; 31:1; 32:1; see Hag. 1:1). On the first day of the month in which Atonement occurred, Ezra read the Law to the assembly of Israel from early morning till midday (Neh. 8:2). Eventually the practice of observing every new moon in order to determine the date of the new month gave way to calendars, which set the months and gave them predictability. A Jewish type of heresy confronting the early church in Asia Minor prompted the warning in Colossians against the imposition of the observance of new moons, Sabbaths, and certain festivals upon Christians (2:16-17; compare Gal. 4:10-11).

J.R.M.

NEW MORALITY. See SITUATION ETHICS.

NEW ROME. A designation Emperor Constantine I gave Constantinople, according to Sozomen's Ecclesiastical History. Constantine enlarged Byzantium and renamed it Constantinople in 330. The Council of Constantinople (381), called by Theodosius I, who declared Christianity alone legal in the empire, proclaimed Constantinople's bishop second only to the bishop of Rome. C.M.

NEW TESTAMENT. The name commonly given to the portion of the Bible considered by Christians to contain the NEW COVENANT, which Christ made with his disciples. Comprising twenty-seven documents of several literary types (Gospels, historical theology, letters, and apocalypse), the NT conceives itself to be a continuing chapter in the history of God's dealing with Israel. It tells of the work of Jesus Christ, the teaching, and future anticipations. The books were written in Greek, though some may have been written in Aramaic and translated into Greek. They are generally acknowledged to have been written largely in the first century. The name derives from the Latin word testamentum and refers to a "will" that Christ bequeathed to his church at his death (Matt. 26:26; Heb. 9:15-17). The terms COVENANT, "testament," and "will" are all used to translate the same Greek word (diatheke). J.R.M.

NEW TESTAMENT IN MODERN ENGLISH.

J. B. Phillips, an Anglican clergyman seeking to make the Bible comprehensible to the young people in his London parish, issued Letters to Young Churches in 1947. This name for the Epistles of the NT had been supplied by C. S. Lewis, who also wrote a foreword to the slim little book and launched Phillips into fame. This volume was followed by The Gospels in 1952, The Young Church in Action in 1955, and The Book of Revelation in 1957. His complete NT translation, an appealing paraphrase, was published in 1959.

R.H.

NEW THOUGHT. Similar to CHRISTIAN SCIENCE, New Thought took shape in the 1880s among those opposed to or alienated from Mary Baker Eddy. A periodical of that name appeared after 1890, the Metaphysical Club of Boston was founded in 1895, the International Metaphysical League in 1899, and the International New Thought Alliance in 1915. Their ideas were publicized by Warren Felt Evans, a New Church minister healed by Phineas P. Quimby in 1863. He championed Emmanuel Swedenborg in The New Age and Its Messenger (1864), The Mental Cure (1869), and Mental Medicine (1872).

Leaders of the movement included Quimby; Charles Poyen, the French mesmerist; Andrew Jackson Davis, seer and healer; Augusta Stetson; Annie C. Bill, founder of the Church of the Universal Design; Emma Curtiss Hopkins, of the Christian Science Theological Institute in Chicago; Nona

Brooks, of Divine Science in Denver; Ernest Holmes, of the Religious Science Movement in Los Angeles; and Charles and Myrtle Fillmore, founders of Unity School of Christianity in Kansas City. A form of mind cure, New Thought offered "to teach the infinitude of the Supreme One; the Divinity of Man and his Infinite possibilities through the creative power and constructive thinking in obedience to the voice of the Indwelling Presence, which is our source in Inspiration, Power, Health and Prosperity." N.H.

NEWTON, JOHN (1727-1807). Evangelical Anglican clergyman and hymn writer. John Newton was born July 24 in London, to a devout mother who sought to rear her son in the Christian faith. But when he was seven, she died; and when he was eleven, he went to sea with his father, a sailor. In a few years young Newton drifted into a profligate life, and he was arrested by the Royal Navy and flogged publicly for desertion. Newton returned to the sea and became involved with the slave trade. For a time he lived on one of the islands off West Africa and sank even deeper into degradation.

While aboard a ship caught in a violent storm, Newton cried out to God for mercy. Saved from the fury of the storm, he began to read Thomas à Kempis' Imitation of Christ, which turned his heart back to the memories of his childhood. He took a step of faith but did not immediately give up his discreditable livelihood. For a time he was commander of his own slave ship. He was married to Mary Catlett when he was twenty-three and at twenty-seven left the slave trade and took a shore job in Liverpool.

Newton met John and Charles Wesley and George Whitefield, and they encouraged him to prepare for the Christian ministry. After years of hard study, he was ordained when he was thirty-nine and was appointed curate of the Anglican church in Olney, not far from Cambridge. The Evangelical Revival was in progress, and John Newton was swept along by it to become one of the movement's most effective leaders. The poet WILLIAM COWPER, a member of his congregation, collaborated with Newton to compose a number of hymns, which had great impact on the hymnody of the revival. Included in Olney Hymns were many numbers that are still sung in the church. After serving the Olney parish for sixteen years, Newton was called to serve as rector of St. Mary Woolnoth in London. There he came in contact with William Wilberforce and others involved in the abolition of the slave trade. Newton died on December 21, the same year the British Parliament outlawed slavery. Some of Newton's most famous hymns were "Amazing Grace," "How Sweet the Name of Jesus Sounds," and "Glorious Things of Thee Are Spoken."

R.H.

NICENE CREED/COUNCIL OF NICAIA. The Nicene Creed is the confession or doctrinal formulation adopted by the first Council of Nicaea (Nicaea), which met in A.D. 325 at Nicaea, the modern city of Iznik, Turkey, near Constantinople or New Rome.

The Council was convened by the emperor Constantine to deal with the theological dispute over ARIANISM, which was troubling the Eastern churches. Some three hundred bishops attended, of whom all but five were Christians from the East, although Hosius of Cordova, a Western bishop and adviser to the emperor, presided. No minutes of the discussion, which took place between June 19 and July 25, were preserved, but Eusebius of Caesarea and Athanasius of Alexandria (the great defender of orthodoxy against Arius) report the general movement of the debate.

The Creed adopted decisively rejects Arianism, which held that the Son of God was created, and that there was a time (therefore) when he was not. To affirm the essential unity of the Father and the Son, the Council used a non-biblical term in a creed for the first time, the compound word Homoousion, meaning, in Greek, that the Son is "of the same substance" with the Father. This creed was held out to be a touchstone of orthodoxy, which it eventually became and continues to be to this day. It concluded with a list of anathemas, or condemnations, of Arianism.

The Council may have used a baptismal formula from the church of Eusebius of Caesarea as the basis for the Nicene Creed, but it more likely that the creeds of Syrian and Palestinian Christianity (Antioch and Jerusalem) were used. Nicaea also settled the dispute over the date of Easter, made provisions for the readmission to the church of lapsed believers, and established canons for the ordination and practices of clergymen.

The text of the Creed is divided into three parts, dealing with the Father as Creator; the Son as consubstantial deity, the Savior of the world; and the Holy Spirit, who leads the church into all truth.

The Nicene Creed reads thus:

I believe in one God the Father Almighty, Maker of heaven and earth, And of all things visible and invisible:

And in one Lord Jesus Christ, the only-begotten Son of God; Begotten of his Father before all worlds, God of God, Light of Light, Very God of very God; Begotten, not made; Being of one substance with the Father; By whom all things were made: Who for us men and for our salvation came down from heaven, And was incarnate by the Holy Ghost of the Virgin Mary, And was made man: And was crucified also for us under Pontius Pilate; He suffered and was buried: And the third day he rose again according to the Scriptures: And ascended into heaven. And sitteth on the right hand of the Father: And he shall come again, with glory, to judge both the quick and the dead; Whose kingdom shall have no end.

And I believe in the Holy Ghost, The Lord, and Giver of Life, Who proceedeth from the Father and the Son; Who with the Father and the Son together is worshipped and glorified; Who spake by the Prophets: And I believe one Catholic and Apostolic Church: I acknowledge one Baptism for the remission of sins: And I look for the Resurrection of the dead: And the Life of the world to come. Amen. (Book of Common Prayer, 1928)

J.C.

NICHIREN. The Japanese Buddhist prophet Nichiren (1222–82) remains among the most important and controversial religious figures of his country. He was founder of the Nichiren group of Buddhist denominations. They have generally seen Nichiren's own ministry as the commencement of a new Buddhist age, in which a simple but militant faith in the LOTUS SUTRA alone was to be the norm.

Nichiren was the son of a simple fisherman. He began his monastic career at the age of eleven, studying in several temples and monasteries, both Tendai and Shingon. It was a time when the samurai class with its plain soldierly values had recently come to power, when war and calamity had circulated widespread belief that a new and degenerate age had arrived, and movements like PURE LAND BUDDHISM were popularizing radically simplified Buddhism of salvation by faith. In this context Nichiren came to affirm, and then to proclaim fearlessly, that everyone could be enlightened by a simple act of faith in the truth of the Lotus Sutra, expressed by chanting Nam Myōhō Renge Kyō ("Hail the marvellous teaching of the Lotus Sutra"). If the entire nation were to adopt the Lotus faith, banishing all other sects, Nichiren said with typical assurance and intolerance, then Japan's troubles would cease and the country would eventually become a spiritual light to the world. Nichiren suffered persecution, but his movement took hold. It has experienced a twentieth-century revival to become Japan's largest single form of Buddhism. R.E.

NICHOLAS OF CUSA (1401–64). A German cardinal, mystic, and philosopher of religion who stood in the Neoplatonist tradition. His most famous writing was his Docta Ignorantia ("Learned Ignorance"), a version of negative theology in which the highest wisdom is to recognize the incomprehensibility of God. Whatever we may say about God, we have also to say the opposite. If we say, "God exists," we have also to say, "God does not exist," and so with all God's attributes. In a way beyond our comprehension, God is the "coincidence of opposites" (coincidentia oppositorum). But this does not mean that the idea of God is nonsensical. Nicholas calls to his aid the logic of infinite quantities as developed in mathematics, and claims that it affords an analogy to the logic of God. His book contains many illustrations of the way in which propositions about infinite lines or surfaces have a logic of their own and make sense, though they break the laws of the logic that applies to finite entities. This austere negative theology is somewhat mitigated by Nicholas in his spiritual writings, such as Visio Dei (The Vision of God) in which he seeks to express the concreteness and the universality of the divine being. J.M.

NICODEMUS. A Pharisaic teacher who came to Jesus secretly to inquire about his teaching (John 3:1 ff.) and was so impressed that he later argued that Jesus should not be judged until he had been heard (John 7:45-52). He was a "ruler of the Jews" (John 3:1; 7:50; probably a member of the Sanhedrin) and very wealthy (John 19:39). It is possible that he is the same person as the Nicodemus ben Gorion (or Bunai) mentioned in the Babylonian Talmud (Taanith 19b, 20a) as one of the wealthiest Jews in Jerusalem before its fall to Rome in A.D. 70. And this may be the same Bunai whom the Talmud names as one of five disciples of Jesus (Sanhedrin 43a). The family of Nicodemus ben Gorion became poverty stricken, and it is not difficult to conceive of this unfortunate change in welfare as a result of conversion to Christianity (or was it just the consequence of the Roman War?). Nicodemus' secret meeting with Jesus (John 3), subsequent defense of him (John 7), and eventual lavish open expenditure on his burial (John 19) suggest his likely conversion. He shared Jesus' burial expenses with another wealthy, secret disciple, JOSEPH OF ARIMATHEA (John 19:38-42). Stories about Nicodemus circulated into the fourth century, the probable date of the compilation of the Gospel of Nicodemus, an apocryphal book that gained great popularity in the Middle Ages under the title Acts of Pilate.

J.R.M.

NICOLAITANS. The letters to the SEVEN CHURCHES that begin the REVELATION of John castigate the immoral teachings of the Nicolaitans, whose influence was being felt both at Ephesus (2:6) and Pergamum (2:12, 15), and possibly at Thyatira (2:20-23). Although nothing is known for certain about this heresy from contemporary records, it is a reasonable guess that it is the same group referred to by Irenaeus, who was a student of Polycarp, who studied with John, according to early tradition. Irenaeus derives the group from heretical followers of Nicolaus, one of the seven Hellenistic evangelists mentioned in Acts (6:5) in the Jerusalem turmoil following the establishment of the church there (Acts 2:1 ff.). An apostasy from apostolic teaching is assumed, but it is not clear whether it was by Nicolaus or his followers. Clement of Alexandria lays it upon the latter. Hippolytus suggested that Nicolaus had become heretical himself. Eusebius supports Clement's view that the immoral sect was a later, short-lived heresy whose name came to be a designation for heretics.

J.R.M.

NICOPOLIS. A city referred to by Paul in his letter to TITUS exhorting him to join Paul there (3:12). The name in Greek means "city of victory" and was given to many cities built after a battle was fought and won in the vicinity. Pompey built one by this name in Lesser Armenia, as did Augustus in northern Egypt, and Trajan in northern Macedonia. Paul planned to spend the winter in Nicopolis and would not likely choose the one in Bithynia or the one in Cilicia, since either Tarsus or Antioch would be nearby and preferable. More likely Paul was referring to Nicopolis in Epirus, on the west coast of modern Greece, built by Augustus (Octavian) near Actium, where he defeated Mark Antony in 31 B.C. Herod the Great built many of the public buildings there, and philosopher Epictetus lived there after A.D. 89.

J.R.M.

NIEBUHR, HELMUT RICHARD (1894-1962). Influential twentieth-century Protestant theologian, born in Wright City, Missouri, the younger brother of Reinhold Niebuhr. Niebuhr graduated from Elmhurst College (1912), Eden Theological Seminary (1915), Washington University (1917), Yale Divinity School (1923), and received a Ph.D. from Yale (1924) with a dissertation on Ernst Troeltsch. Niebuhr was ordained a minister of the Evangelical and Reformed Church in 1916 and served as a pastor in St. Louis, 1916-18. He was professor at Eden Seminary (1919-22, 1927-31) and served as president of Elmhurst College (1924-27). In 1931 he joined the faculty of Yale Divinity School, where he served, at the time of his death, as Sterling Professor of Theology and Christian Ethics.

Like many dialectical theologians, Niebuhr sought to remain true to the best insights of both liberal theology and the classical Christian tradition. This is reflected in the fact that the two greatest influences on his theology were Troeltsch and Karl Barth. The former influence is reflected in Niebuhr's interest in the sociology of religion and his appreciation of the conditionedness or relativity of all historical religions. This is evident in such books as The Social Sources of Denominationalism (1929), Christ and Culture (1951), and his major theological work, The Meaning of Revelation (1941). The influence of Barth is seen in Niebuhr's emphasis on the sovereignty of God and on the primacy of revelation.

Courtesy of Yale Divinity School Library, Memorabilia Record Group 53

H. Richard Niebuhr

Since our knowledge always is conditioned by the point of view that we occupy, Niebuhr insists that Christian faith begins with revelation, which is mediated through a historical community, the church. Revelation is that inner history of events that gives meaning and shape to outer, or impersonal, history. Niebuhr contends that Christian revelation enables people to avoid a narrow tribal perspective on events as well as the impersonalism of much modern scientific positivism, since it offers a personalistic vision that is at the same time universal and stands in judgment on all egocentric interpretations of experience. For Niebuhr sin is both disloyalty, the failure to worship the true God, and idolatry, the giving of one's ultimate loyalty to something less than God. Since every person trusts in something and has some object of commitment, Niebuhr insists that to have such a faith is to have a god. However, a true faith is trust in that reality (God) which is the absolute and eternal ground of Being, that which abides when all else passes. Such a faith frees people from ultimate reliance on merely finite values and hopes. Faith, or our apprehension and response to Being, always begins, however, with revelation, with the way Being reveals itself to us. Such a revelation lies, finally, beyond scientific proof and therefore calls for personal, existential decision, trust, and loyalty.

Niebuhr is often spoken of as "a theologian's theologian." This does not imply that his work is remote and esoteric. Rather, it refers to the fact that all of Niebuhr's writings deal with the most sophisticated and fundamental issues facing theology and the church, and to the fact of his profound influence on an entire generation of younger theologians and clergy.

J.L.

NIEBUHR, REINHOLD (1892–1971). The foremost American-born Protestant theologian and ethicist of this century. Niebuhr was born in Wright City, Missouri, on June 21, the son of a minister of the Evangelical Synod of the Lutheran Church. He attended Elmhurst College (1910), Eden Theological Seminary (1913), and Yale University (B.D., 1914; M.A. 1915). Ordained in 1915, Niebuhr served as pastor of the Bethel Evangelical Church in industrial Detroit until 1928. He then joined the faculty of Union Theological Seminary in New York City, where he taught until his retirement in 1960. During the 1930s and 1940s, Niebuhr was involved in an extraordinary variety of activities in addition to his teaching. These included a leading role in founding the Liberal Party and Americans for Democratic Action; establishing publications such as Radical Religion, The World Tomorrow, and Christianity and Crisis, serving as editor of the later. Niebuhr also served on the editorial board of several journals and wrote hundreds of editorials and articles. In 1939 he gave the prestigious Gifford Lectures at Edinburgh, published as The Nature and Destiny of Man (2 vols.; 1941–43), his major work. During these decades, Niebuhr was one of America's most influential social critics and the leading Christian apologist in the English-speaking world.

Courtesy of Union Theological Seminary Library Archives, New York City

Reinhold Niebuhr

Early in his career Niebuhr espoused the religious liberalism and social idealism that was then current. His turn to a more realistic diagnosis of man and society is reflected in Moral Man and Immoral Society (1932). This book, and a dozen subsequent ones, reveal the special influence of Augustine, the Protestant Reformers Luther and Calvin, Kierkegaard and other existentialist writers, as well as Barth and Brunner. Certain themes run like threads through all of Niebuhr's writings, although they are applied to a vast range of intellectual questions and social issues.

These themes include the unique self-transcendence and freedom of the human person; the paradoxes and ambiguities of finite, creaturely existence; the anxiety and sinful egoism that leads to prideful efforts to secure power, as well as to guarantee one's moral virtue and intellectual certainty. Human sin, for Niebuhr, is original in that no person can claim to be free of the taint of destructive egoism. We are, therefore, saved only by God's free grace through faith. The fruit of grace is repentance, humility, or absence of pretension, and love. According to Niebuhr, the Christian norm of perfect, heedless love is revealed in the cross of Christ, which stands in judgment on all human moral effort. Nevertheless, for the Christian, perfect love is often expressed through justice, the relative embodiment of love in a sinful world. Since Christian love must often be expressed through justice and therefore through the coercive use of power, the Christian's action is always tainted. Therefore, one must be saved by faith and by forgiveness.

Niebuhr's Christian realism had wide influence between 1930 and 1960, not only within the church but also among secular intellectuals, politicians, and pundits. J.L.

NIETZSCHE, FRIEDRICH (1844–1900). One of the most influential philosophers of modern times. By combining the Dionysian (will and emotion) with the Apollonian (intellect) he diverted philosophy from strict RATIONALISM and may be seen along with KIERKEGAARD as one of the pioneers of EXISTENTIALISM. He stood opposed to all ready-made conventional values in morals, religion, and art.

Nietzsche's philosophy takes its departure from the death of God. According to Nietzsche, we must recognize the universe to be a collection of purely contingent facts. There is no providence, no goal, no center, no fixed values. It is as if the earth has been set adrift and wanders through endless space. Given sufficient time, everything will return to where it began and repeat the process. This is the doctrine of eternal recurrence. These teachings earned Nietzsche the reputation of being an advocate of NIHILISM.

But against this was his affirmation of life. Only the death of God and the abolition of the divine rule can liberate us for our true destiny. Nietzsche's hatred of Christianity arose from his belief that it glorifies weakness and inhibits the stronger virtues. Humanity itself is only a transitional phase, between animality and the superman (Übermensch) of the future. The superman will create new values and, taking over control from the defunct God, will build a new world. In 1889 this passionate thinker suffered a mental breakdown, which ended his writing. His greatest work is Thus Spake Zarathustra, esteemed for its literary as well as its philosophical merits.

J.M.

NIHILISM. Nihilism is the doctrine of negation, or the assertion that there are no rational grounds for belief in moral or religious truth or traditional values. Nihilism is often accompanied by radical, even anarchistic or absurd, expressions of personal freedom.

The origins of modern Nihilism are associated with Russian political and literary movements of the latter decades of the nineteenth century. Bazarov, the chief character in Ivan Turgenev's novel Fathers and Sons (1861), is a Nihilist, a man "who does not bow down before any authority, who does not take any principle on faith." The prototypical Nihilist is Ivan in DOSTOEVSKI's novel The Brothers Karamazov (1880). Ivan declares: "If God does not exist, everything is permitted."

In this century Nihilism is characterized by two rather distinct images. The first is found in the philosopher NIETZSCHE's depiction of the Übermensch, or superior man. It is he who recognizes the "death of God," that is, the death of the ultimate ground and support of all traditional values and is thrown back upon himself where "there is no one to command, no one to obey, no one to transgress." The Übermensch accepts the fact of cultural nihilism and yet heroically transcends it through the affirmation of radical freedom. Another image of nihilism is portrayed in the novels of FRANZ KAFKA and ALBERT CAMUS, whose heroes express the nihilism of impotence and indifference, the mood of despair and emptiness that attends a sense of life's triviality and meaninglessness. Nihilism is prominent in atheist EXISTENTIALISM from Nietzsche to SARTRE's Being and Nothingness (1943). J.L.

NIHIL OBSTAT. The Latin term for "nothing hinders," meaning that the book or article on which it is printed contains nothing objectionable to the faithful. Also called the IMPRIMATUR, it is authorized by the official censor of the Roman Catholic church. The phrase appears on the title page along with the name of the censor. J.C.

NILE RIVER. The second longest river in the world (after the Amazon), running more than four thousand miles from the great freshwater lakes of central Africa and the mountains of East Africa (Ethiopia). The Nile is the physical reason for the existence of EGYPT as a country, inhabited as early as one million years ago.

The name "The Nile" is Greek. In Latin, it is Nilus; in Arabic En-Nil. In Coptic (or Egyptian), it is El-Bahr or simply "the sea." The ancient Egyptians called it Hapi. Throughout history, and in the OT scriptures, the Nile is regularly referred to as "the river." Herodotus, the Greek historian, quoted an earlier scholar, who said, "Egypt is the gift of the Nile." This observation is true. Without the annual flooding of the Nile, which both waters and fertilizes the arid soil of the valley of Egypt, no civilization would be possible there.

Herbert G. May

Nile River at flood tide

The Nile has two branches, the White Nile and the Blue Nile; the White running down from equatorial Africa with its great Victoria Lake and the Blue running down from the East African high mountains. In the south (near the Sudan), one-thousand-foot-high cliffs border the river. For much of its length the desert extends to the banks of the river. Four thousand miles from its sources, the Nile divides into several mouths, which flow into the Mediterranean Sea. In the OT period, there were seven mouths, of which the Pelusiac and the Canopic were the most important for commerce.

The stories of the OT patriarchs involve the Nile River many times, from Abraham's sojourn in Egypt to Jacob's family seeking shelter in Goshen (the northeast portion of the Nile Delta nearest to Canaan) to escape famine. The epic story of Joseph, who rose from slavery to the prime ministry of Egypt, probably reflects the period when the Hyksos, or "shepherd kings," fellow Semites with the Hebrews, ruled Egypt.

The Nile played a major role in the story of Moses, who caused plagues of frogs and insects, followed by turning the river's water the color of blood in his struggle with Pharaoh. Of course, rivers have frogs and insects, and the Nile's waters can be darkened by the red mud washed down from central Africa.

The Nile as symbol occurs in all the myths and religions of the eastern Mediterranean. It was worshiped by the ancient Egyptians as a god. The Romans identified the Nile as the origin of "Rome's grainery," the rich fields of the delta area. The Nile stood for plenty in a world where drought and famine often plagued one region or another every year. It is no wonder that the expanding Roman Empire was drawn to Egypt in the same way the nomadic Hebrews were centuries earlier. Today, the Nile River still supports a huge population in a quarter of the world covered with desert and near-desert. It is also dotted, along its length, with majestic monuments from many periods of the past.

NIMROD. According to Genesis 10, a hunter. There are many sites in Mesopotamia that bear his name, leading scholars to consider "nimrod" the Babylonian god Merodach or the hero, Gilgamesh. Nimrod was the great-grandson of Noah, grandson of Ham, and son of Cush, according to Genesis 10:8-12.

J.C.

NINETY-FIVE THESES. See LUTHER, MARTIN.

NINEVEH. The final and greatest capital of the ASSYRIAN Empire, founded as early as 5500 B.C. It was located on the banks of the Tigris River and now exists only as two tells (or mounds of rubble), named Kuyunjik and Nebiyunus. These tells, along with smaller mounds, are encircled with the ruins of a brick wall more than seven miles in circumference. Nebiyunus is the site of a contemporary village, and according to Islamic legend, it is the place of Jonah's tomb.

Genesis 10:11 and following says Nineveh was founded by Nimrod. It is one of the oldest cities in the world and was rebuilt many times, especially by the famous Tiglath-pileser I (1115-1077 B.C.). The book of Jonah tells us Nineveh was very large, around 120,000 in population. Sennacherib (704-681 B.C.) made Nineveh the center of his empire. Sennacherib besieged Jerusalem, and King Hezekiah sent tribute to him at Nineveh, whereupon the siege was lifted (II Kings 18-19; Isa. 37).

Nineveh was beautified by Ashurbanipal (668-633 B.C.). The library of his palace has been uncovered and many famous texts recovered, including the story of

Courtesy of Scala

Bronze head from Nineveh, about 2415-2290 B.C.

J.C.

Adapa (called the Mesopotamian Adam), the epic of Gilgamesh, and the Creation Epic, which has parallels to Genesis. J.C.

NIPPUR. A Sumerian city, the ruins of which lie south of Babylon on a now abandoned channel of the Euphrates River. It also lies close to ancient UR. Nippur was an important religious site, for Enlil, the most widely worshiped of the Sumerian deities, was the earth god, and his consort was Ninlil, the goddess of war. Because of Enlil's national significance, the priests of Nippur exerted great political power in Sumer. The temple of Enlil was called Ekur, and it was so sacred that the Sumerians attributed the fall of an imperial dynasty (that of Agade) to some affront to the temple by the king.

Courtesy of The University Museum, University of Pennsylvania

Clay-tablet map of Nippur, showing plan for temple, walls, canals, and gates

The universities of Pennsylvania and Chicago have intensively excavated Nippur. Fifteen hundred years of Sumerian history, literature, economy, and law have been discovered in the forty thousand tablets or clay bricks unearthed by the American archaeologists. Variations of the Flood myth, stories of paradise, and epics of Gilgamesh are among these numerous ancient writings. Many tales of the goddess Inauna, as well as a temple built for her 5,400 years ago, have been found. A temple devoted to Enlil's consort, Ninlil, also adorned this sacred city. J.C.

NIRVANA. From the Sanskrit word meaning literally "blowing out." The Pali equivalent is nibbana. Though the term is occasionally used in HINDUISM and JAINISM, it is most characteristic of BUDDHISM. There it refers to the ultimate, unconditioned reality whose inward realization is the supreme goal of the Buddhist spiritual quest.

Nirvana is not to be confused with an afterlife or a heaven (of which Buddhism has many), for they still presuppose the separate and individual, though blissful, existence of the "self." Nirvana, on the other hand, is absolute unconditioned reality, unlimited by time, space, psychological moods or traits, or the sense of selfhood, which stems (in Buddhist theory) from the attachments of the mind based on input from the senses. The "blowing out" of Nirvana is not annihilation, but the extinction of attachments and desires and of the separate individual selfhood, which is constructed by them. Buddhist literature also speaks of it as the cessation of DUKKHA, suffering; this is a closely related insight, for according to the FOUR NOBLE TRUTHS suffering is caused by the desire of which Nirvana is the absence. Nirvana may be realized in this life and is by an arhat; it is then Nirvana with the supports of phenomenal existence. After death a person who realizes Nirvana does not reincarnate in the usual manner, and, the Nirvana, though not qualitatively different than before, is without such supports or even the remnants of a separate existence.

The language of Nirvana is necessarily negative, for language itself is a product of life in separated, conditioned reality. From the vantage point of those in conditioned reality, Nirvana can only be thought of as its opposite—the opposite of the wheel of samsaric existence with all its transitoriness, suffering, and unreality. But it is, in words attributed to the Buddha, "an unborn, a not-become, a not-made, a not-compounded . . . where there is no wavering . . . no coming and going, . . . no falling from one state to another, no 'here,' no 'beyond,' no 'here-and-yonder.' That is the end of woe. The ceasing of becoming is Nirvana."

Later Buddhists, less restrained than their master, have been willing to use such mild metaphors as "light" and "calm" in describing the nirvanic state—a state clearly rooted in meditational experience. But for the most part, despite the florid descriptions Buddhism gives its heavenly realms, Nirvana remains indescribable, beyond all words and concepts. Yet the appeal of a state so utterly opposite to all we can know and think in ordinary existence has been a potent force within Buddhism for about twenty-five centuries. R.E.

NISAN. See HEBREW CALENDAR.

NOAH. OT patriarch, to whom is attributed the construction of the ark, in which the survivors of the primal FLOOD rode to safety, as well as the origins of vinegrowing. "Noah" means "rest," referring to the ark he built as a place where the survivors of mankind "rested" while the world was scoured by floods and destruction.

Noah, according to the Genesis chronology, was of the tenth generation after Adam (Gen. 5:3 ff.). The story of his faithfulness to the divine command to build the ark (Gen. 6:5-9:17) seems to be set in the midst of another story about Noah as the first cultivator of the grape (Gen. 5:29; 9:18-27), which ends with a rather disgraceful drunken bout on Noah's part.

Noah, however, is best known in Judaism, Islam, and Christianity as the faithful one at the time of great wickedness that caused God to lose patience and send the Flood. God, wishing to preserve the future of humankind and the beasts, told Noah to build an ark and move his wife, his three sons, Shem, Ham, and Japheth, along with their wives, and a pair of every kind of creature, into it. This Noah did, to the great merriment of his neighbors. The rains came and all the rest of earth's inhabitants drowned. As the waters subsided, the ark grounded on top of Mount Ararat. Noah set free a raven, which returned, and doves, some of which did not return, showing that the earth was uncovered in spots. Noah's family disembarked, set up an altar, and offered sacrifices of thanksgiving to God. God responded with the rainbow sign, marking the covenant that promised God would never destroy the world by water again.

The story of Noah in Genesis is similar to the Babylonian flood account recorded in the GILGAMESH EPIC. The Babylonian hero is like Noah, and there are similar details about the building of the ark, the cargo, the use of birds, and the sacrifice. However, the Hebrew story is rewritten from a monotheistic viewpoint. In the Babylonian account, there are many gods; in the Hebrew, only one. J.C.

NOB. A town, or possibly several towns with the same name, mentioned in I Samuel 21; 22; Nehemiah 11:32 and Isaiah 10:32. Nob (I Sam. 21; 22) was "the city of the priests" or the place where Yahweh's priests resided during the dark period when the ark was captured and held by the Philistines. Later, Saul massacred the people of Nob because Ahimelech, who ruled the town, aided David. Ahimelech fed David's soldiers and gave him the sword of Goliath.

Isaiah predicted that the Syrians would advance to Nob and threaten Jerusalem. Nehemiah speaks of Nob as one of the towns reoccupied by the tribe of Benjamin after the Exile. Nob, in these two cases, certainly was located north of Jerusalem. Some scholars believe Nob was on Mount Scopus, near Bethphage. J.C.

NOBILI, ROBERT DE (1577-1656). Born in Italy, Nobili spent his life as a Jesuit missionary in India. He has been called one of the ablest and most original missionaries of his time. After a short period of missionary work among the Indian peoples of the coastlands, Nobili discovered that few converts were being made because the Indians thought of Christianity as a Portuguese religion. He changed his methods and approach, studying Indian philosophy and religious literature and dressing in Indian style. He devoted much of his time to finding points of agreement between Christianity and Hinduism, for which he was criticized by many as diluting Christianity. He was an active writer and was successful in winning many high-caste Indians to Christianity. W.G.

NOMADISM. A term, originally Latin, meaning "to graze," applied to a life-style that goes back many thousands of years before Christ. The OT patriarchs Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob were nomads, as was Moses, who lived with his shepherd father-in-law, Jethro, who was also a priest. Nomads still exist, although in small numbers, throughout the Middle East and North Africa. The life-style of moving herds of sheep and goats from one oasis to another across the desert is the same in 3500 B.C. or the 1980s.

Four great waves of nomads spread from the Arabian peninsula into what is now Israel, in 3500 B.C., 2500 B.C., 1500 B.C. and 500 B.C. Most of the great empires of the Middle East were founded by nomads who "settled down"—the Akkadians, the Hittites, and the Hyksos of Egypt in the eighteenth century B.C. (when Joseph may have risen to power). Moses, in the Exodus, gave the motley collection of former slaves in Egypt the Decalogue, which was a reflection of the stern morality of the nomad and of the high spirituality of deeply religious people. Gradually, other tribes who had not been in Egypt became part of Israel. J.C.

NOMINALISM. A medieval philosophy that evolved from ARISTOTLE, which held that UNIVERSALS (Plato's forms) are not existing entities; only individuals exist, universals are simply names (nomina). Individual men exist, not Man. This undermined the ecclesiastical claims of reality for the Trinity, God, Goodness, and so forth. Roscellinus, sometimes called the father of nominalism, maintained the Aristotelian position that universals are derived from our observation of individuals; many cows give rise to the concept Cow, which does not exist. Because he held that God is a concept while the three trinitarian persons are the divine reality, he was accused of tritheism and condemned for heresy at Soissons in 1092.

REALISM, the opposite of nominalism, held, in the tradition of PLATO, that universals (or forms) exist prior to and are independent of individual objects. Universals are real, not individual things. William of Champeaux maintained this Platonic position, saying universals come before individuals, that individuals have reality by participating in the universal. Humanity precedes individual men; God precedes the Father, Son, and Holy Spirit who share in God.

In the fourteenth century WILLIAM OF OCCAM denied universals, saying they could not be found in objective reality, only in the mind. We experience individuals, and then draw universals from them. The controversy greatly weakened medieval SCHOLASTICISM. C.M.

NOMMENSEN, LUDWIG INGWER (1834–1918). One of the pioneer missionaries to Indonesia, known as the Apostle of the Bataks. He was born in Schleswig, at that time under the Danish crown. He went out to do missionary work under the sponsorship of the Rhenish missionary society. He did pioneer work among the Batak people and wrote a worship order that was used long after his death. He lived and worked in several areas of Sumatra, commissioning and instructing elders who could carry on the indigenous work of the church in the villages of the country. The Batak church flourished under his influence, and his name lives on in Nommensen University, established in 1954. W.G.

NONBEING. See BEING AND NONBEING.

NONCONFORMIST. An individual who does not conform to an ESTABLISHED CHURCH, or its doctrine, discipline, or polity. It was first used to describe two thousand clergymen in England who refused to submit to the Act of Uniformity (1662), which restored the Anglican establishment. The term does not apply in England to Roman Catholics but is used of such Protestant groups as Methodists, Congregationalists, Baptists, Presbyterians, and Quakers. R.H.

NORTH, FRANK MASON (1850–1935). Methodist minister, hymn writer, and religious organization executive. Frank North was born in New York City on December 3. After a private school education, he received a bachelor of arts degree from Wesleyan University. Thereafter he returned to take further work at the university and was ordained to the Methodist ministry. He served pastorates in Florida, New York, and Connecticut, then was appointed corresponding secretary of the New York Church Extension and Missionary Society and corresponding secretary of the Methodist Episcopal Church. In 1916 he was elected president of the Federal Council of Churches of Christ in America, an organization he had been active in forming. He was the author of several hymns, best known of which is "Where Cross the Crowded Ways of Life." R.H.

NOTH, MARTIN (1902–68). Noth's influence on twentieth-century OT research has been profound and in the best tradition of German scholarship. The range of his interests was broad, and in every area that engaged his attention he both furthered the state of research and left the way open for further developments that would otherwise hardly have taken place. He is perhaps best remembered for his pioneering work on the tradition criticism of the Pentateuch and more particularly the Deuteronomical tradition history. After Noth, the earlier attempt to extend the four Pentateuchal sources or "documents" into a Hexateuch or Heptateuch, and so forth, was definitively abandoned, and the Deuteronomical history (the books of Joshua through Kings) was recognized as the continuation of a Tetrateuch. Noth's historical reconstruction of the pre-monarchical Israel as a cultic amphictyony in the fashion of early Greek society, once widely accepted, has now been challenged by subsequent research, but elements of the theory continue to be considered valid. B.V.

NOVALIS. Latin for "fallow land," a pseudonym of Baron Fredrich von Hardenberg (1772–1801), a German poet and novelist who helped found the German Romantic movement, known especially for the mystical, religious quality of his works. Born in Prussian Saxony, of Moravian parents, he studied at Jena, Leipzig, and Wittenberg. Hymnen an die Nacht (1800), his best-known writing, expresses in poetic prose a deep sense of grief on the early death of Sophie von Kühn, his fiancée. Other works include Heinrich von Ofterdingen, a spiritual allegory, and Die Lehrlinge zu Sais, a prose romance, both left unfinished. C.M.

NOVATIANISM. A term designating the rigorist stance of Novatian and his followers, who denied restoration to Christians who faltered during PERSECUTION. Novatian was a Roman presbyter and prominent theologian in Rome in 250. He expected to succeed Roman Bishop Fabian, martyred in 250 during the persecution of Decius (249–251), but the majority chose the not well-known Cornelius, who took a lenient stance toward the lapsed (LAPSI). Disputes ensued, leading to a schism in 251, headed by Novatian, often called the first anti-pope. Known later as Donatism (see DONATISTS), Novatianism lasted until the Muslim conquests of North Africa in the seventh century. A Roman synod (251) and a synod in Carthage (252) undercut Novatianism by allowing the lapsed to be restored after severe penance. This was a view rooted in Bishop Cyprian of Carthage. It finally prevailed, despite the rise of Donatism following Diocletian's persecution (303–305). Novatian died a martyr under Valerian's persecution (257–258). C.M.

NOVITIATE. The period of time when a person serves as a novice, or period of probation, to test a person's fitness for profession in a religious order. Before entering a novitiate, the person serves as a postulant. After the novitiate, the novice professes temporary vows. "Novitiate" also refers to the quarters appointed for the housing of novices. These living quarters are required to be entirely separate from those of the professed religious. During the novitiate, a female must undergo special episcopal examination about her free choice of profession before she is allowed to profess. J.C.

NOYES, JOHN HUMPHREY (1811–86). Social reformer, perfectionist, and founder of the ONEIDA COMMUNITY, Noyes was born September 3, in Brattleboro, Vermont, to John and Polly Hayes Noyes. A graduate of Dartmouth (1830), Noyes studied law for a year. In 1831 he experienced a conversion and so enrolled in Andover Theological Seminary. After a year he transferred to Yale. There his abolitionist fervor and his February 1834 announcement that he had attained sinless perfection led to his expulsion and the revocation of his preaching license.

Despite his affirmation of free love in his 1837 "Battleaxe Letter" proposing to her, Harriet A. Holton married Noyes in 1838. He then drew around himself a community of family and friends in Putney, Vermont, which began in 1846 to practice "complex marriage." When uproar followed, the community moved to Oneida, western New York, in 1848. Noyes published his views in The Perfectionist (1834–36), Bible Communism (1848), Male Continence (1848), History of American Socialism (1870), and Scientific Propagation (1873). He guided his community to self-sufficiency until its reorganization as a silver-plated flatware company in 1881. N.H.

NUMBERS. The name of the fourth book of the Bible, informed by the titles Arithmoi and Numeri, which respectively appear in its Greek (Septuagint) and Latin (Vulgate) versions. Such nomenclature is inspired by two censuses of the Israelites reported in chapters 1–4 and 26. The Hebrew name bemidbar ("in the desert"), lifted from a phrase in Numbers 1:1, however, more accurately denotes the main theme of Numbers. The beginning and end of Israel's forty-year wilderness sojourn receive chronological emphasis, while the themes of divine leadership and human rebellion evoke the greatest theological attention.

Organization and Basic Content. Linking the epic of Israel's liberation from Egypt with the epic of its conquest of the Land of Promise, Numbers yields to a three-part division.

(a) Numbers 1:1–10:10. This opening unit is concerned with necessary preparations for Israel's departure from Mount Sinai. These include the census and assignment of camp location of each tribe, along with special directives for the Levites (chaps. 1–4); Mosaic instructions concerning the treatment of lepers and of wives charged with adultery, the Nazirite vow, and Aaronic benediction (chaps. 5–6); an enumeration of gifts for the service of the tabernacle (chap. 7); guidelines for the consecration of the Levites (chap. 8); and supplementary Passover legislation (chap. 9).

(b) Numbers 10:11–22:1. The focus falls on specific happenings in Israel's desert trek, though cultic legislation in chapters 15, 18–19 interrupts the narrative flow. The people head northward into "the wilderness of Paran" (10:12) and thence to the Kadesh oasis (13:26), their primary site of encampment. Themes prominent in Exodus 15–18 resurface in the several episodes anchored here—new murmuring and rebellion by the "rabble" (11:4); Moses' regular intercession in their behalf; and Yahweh's providential care in providing manna, quail, and water. The narrative excels in its portrayal of tension-filled moments involving Miriam's leprosy (chap. 12), Israel's abortive attempt to penetrate Canaan from the south (chaps. 13–14), the uprising of Korah against Moses' authority (chap. 16), and the faithlessness of Moses and Aaron at Meribah, evoking the divine prohibition that they will never set foot in Canaan (20:2–13). Leaving Kadesh (20:22), the Israelites move into Transjordan and triumph over Sihon, the Amorite king of Heshbon, and Og, the king of Bashan (21:21–35).

(c) Numbers 22:2–36:13. This section portrays the Israelites encamped in the Moab plain and poised to attack Canaan from the east. Most engaging within its narrative segments are those episodes involving Balaam, a Babylonian diviner who must yield to Yahweh's will rather than to Balak's who hired him (chaps. 22–24), and Israel's defection to the Moabite gods (chap. 25). Diverse legislation in this section covers such matters as the rights of women to inherit property (27:1–11); the sacrificial calendar (chaps. 28–29); the laws concerning women's vows (chap. 30); and the establishment of Levitical cities and cities of refuge (chap. 35).

Composition. Source-critical analysis has uncovered a dominant postexilic priestly (P) stratum and an earlier, thoroughly edited JE stratum, which defies further differentiation (see DOCUMENTARY HYPOTHESIS). Form-critical studies have pointed to the probable origins of the separate Numbers traditions. Various narrative episodes may have originated at local cult centers at Kadesh and in Transjordan. Stories about the outpouring of Yahweh's spirit upon the seventy elders (11:16–30), the challenge of Moses' authority by Miriam and Aaron (chap. 12), and Korah's rebellion (chap. 16) likely betray the presence of rival claimants in the later Israelite priesthood. Ancient poetic fragments (10:35–36; 21:14–15, 17–18, 27–30) along with the somewhat later (tenth century B.C.?) Balaam oracles (23:7–10, 18–24; 24:3–9, 15–24) are well integrated into the narrative and confer a note of authenticity. Though all of the Numbers legislation is mediated through Moses, little of it seems to predate significantly the book's final editing.

Religious Message. If Israel's wilderness existence receives an incomplete recounting in Numbers, it does attract lucid theological interpretation under the heading of divine testing and guidance. A wandering mob given to fear, petulance, and faithlessness, along with its manifestly human leaders, is deemed worthy of God's concern. Within a harsh environment, Yahweh trains the people for the challenge ahead when they will conquer Canaan. Rebellion and apostasy cannot induce Yahweh to renounce the promise to the fathers. The population that perishes in the desert is replaced by one of like size (1:46; 26:51), and Eleazar is divinely appointed to replace the deceased Aaron (20:26). Indeed, through the "curse" of a foreign diviner (24:17), the ascendancy of David is legitimated! Numbers celebrates a God whose sovereign purpose, which assuredly involves a developing people, cannot be thwarted. J.K.K.

NUMBERS, RELIGIOUS SIGNIFICANCE OF.

Numbers, for example, one, three, seven, etc., play a role in the OT and NT, just as they do in many ancient and modern religions. There is an ancient, still practiced, form of divination called numerology. Various numbers are assigned to different letters, or else certain numbers stand for concepts or doctrines, for example, "three in one" for the trinitarian Godhead.

The fourth book of the OT is called "Numbers," and it begins with the counting of the Hebrew tribes. However, the religious significance of numbers is wider than that in the Bible. The number four generally stands for the earth, as in the four corners of the earth. The number three usually represents heaven. SEVEN, the sum of four and three, represents completion, fullness, the infinite. Multiples of seven occur, as in Jesus' words "seventy times seven."

Numbers in the Bible are chiefly found in the book of Revelation. The book is organized around a series of enumerations: the SEVEN CHURCHES, seven lampstands, seven stars, seven plagues, seven angels, one thousand years and, above all, the number of the beast, 666 (Rev. 13:18). The hidden meaning of 666 appears to be that it refers to Nero Caesar, which in Hebrew letters (which double as numbers) equals 666.

The concept of the spiritual power of numbers is very old, arising along with astrology. The philosopher-mystic Pythagoras believed that all things were made of numbers. He discovered the mathematical sequence of the musical scale and assigned numbers to the planets and stars. Numerology is part of the occult rather than of religion. Superstition, which thrives even today, sees certain numbers as lucky and others as unlucky. The number thirteen has been considered unlucky for centuries.

The doctrine of the Holy Trinity, with its emphasis on the reality of the three persons (hypostases or personae or "faces") of God in the oneness of the Godhead, made the numbers one and three religiously significant. The parallel development of the doctrine of two natures (the human and divine) in the one person of Christ added to this significance.

J.C.

NUMEN. The Latin word for authority, divine will, or deity, taken over into English to mean the "mysterious power" within reality calling forth religious faith and awe.

"Numen" and the "numinous" are associated especially with the thought of the German theologian RUDOLF OTTO (1869-1937) as set forth in his book Das Heilige (1917), translated into English as The Idea of the Holy (1923). In contrast to Schleiermacher, who viewed religion as based on the feeling of absolute dependence, Otto understood religion as rooted in a reality objective and external to the self, known in the encounter with the HOLY. The object of numinous awareness is the "mysterium tremendum et fascinans." The distinctive experience of the holy gives rise to the concept of the numen, so that Otto's numinous is the a priori of the religious parallel to Kant's a priori of the theoretic reason.

Experience of the numen is characterized by awe and majesty, by a sense of being in the presence of great power and urgency. There is also awareness of a wholly otherness that evokes a feeling of uncaniness and dread, yet is tremendously attractive and fascinating. The numinous involves reverence and wonder that make one feel unworthy and at the same time are uplifting and entrancing. The numinous transcends and envelops reason, provides the basis of religious and moral knowledge, and points to the origins of religion in the mysterious depth of the spirit: The result of Otto's thought is the affirmation of the numen as the reality at the core of all logic, ethics, and religion, a reality beyond sense experience and feeling. (see also RELIGIOUS EXPERIENCE.)

C.Mc.

NUN. A woman in professed religious orders. In the Roman Catholic church, the term nun is reserved to a female religious professed in vows, temporary or perpetual, in a convent. A nun's life is one of contemplation and mortification. Distinctions are made between choir sisters and lay sisters. Choir sisters are sworn to sing the divine office every day, as well as to private recitation of the office. In a general way the term nun is used for all women in the religious life, including sisters who serve in teaching or nursing orders. The term is also used for sisters in the Anglican Communion and in the Eastern Orthodox churches. There has been a severe decrease in the number of professions among Catholic women in recent years. This has caused a need for many lay teachers in Catholic parochial schools. J.C.

NUNC DIMITTIS. The song of Simeon sung at the presentation of Jesus in the Temple, recorded in Luke 2:29-32. This hymn of praise is entitled "Now Let Us Depart," from the first verse of the hymn in Latin, which says: "Lord, now let your servant depart in peace." Simeon was moved by the Holy Spirit to see in the infant Jesus the Messiah, long expected by the pious in Israel. In this Jesus, God's salvation is fully realized for all people, Jews and Gentiles. The Nunc Dimittis is regularly used in liturgical worship in the Roman Catholic, Lutheran, Anglican, and Episcopal churches. It is used at Compline, the prayer for the night of the Catholic church. It is used in the vesper service of the Lutheran church. The words, "Let your servant depart in peace, for my eyes have seen your salvation," are appropriate as one lies down to sleep.

J.C.

NUNCIO, PAPAL. A representative of the pope who, according to the order of precedence of the Congress of Vienna, is ranked as an ambassador. This rank is operable only when a government accepts a nuncio in the diplomatic sense. A nuncio is a heirarchical authority to the church he visits.

J.C.

Courtesy of the American Schools of Oriental Research

Cuneiform tablets found at Nuzi

NUZI. Ancient city in northern Mesopotamia, east of Ashur, near the site of modern Kirkuk in Iraq. Excavations begun by the University of Pennsylvania in 1925 found the site to be inhabited from 4000 B.C. Many clay tablets written in old Babylonian cuneiform, dating from the fifteenth century B.C., were found.

J.C.

NYGREN, ANDERS (1890–1978). Lutheran minister, theologian, bishop, and ecumenical leader. Nygren was born at Göteborg, Sweden. Educated at the University of Lund, he served as a minister of the Lutheran church from 1912 to 1920, was appointed professor of systematic theology at Lund in 1924, and became bishop of Lund in 1949. He served as president of the Lutheran World Federation (1947–52) and participated in ecumenical conferences at Lausanne (1927), Oxford (1937), Edinburgh (1937), Amsterdam (1948), Lund (1952), and Evanston (1954). He was a leader in the founding of the World Council of Churches and served as a member of its Central Committee. His books in English include: Agape and Eros (vol. I, 1932; vol. II, 1938), Commentary on Romans (1949), The Gospel of God (1951), Christ and His Church (1956), and Meaning and Method (1972).

A representative of the LUNDENSIAN school of theology, Nygren's irenic Christian faith contributed much to ecumenicity among Protestants and between Protestants and Catholics. In Agape and Eros, Nygren contrasts the self-giving love (agape) of God with the self-serving love (eros) that characterizes humanity. God loves because it is God's nature to love. Nygren, following Luther, views humans as completely just and completely sinners. They are sinners insofar as their righteousness depends upon their own works. But in Christ, they receive through faith complete righteousness, as God forgives sin and receives humanity into divine community. Peace and blessedness come into human life as God's love supplies them, providing assurance of God's grace and enabling humans to serve one another in love.

C.Mc.

OATES, WAYNE E. (1917- ). Educated at Wake Forest College, he received the Ph.M. and Th.D. degrees from Southern Baptist Theological Seminary, Louisville, Kentucky. He is married and has two children. Oates was professor of psychology and pastoral care at Southern Baptist Seminary. He was later a chaplain at the Kentucky State Hospital and a theological consultant at the Norton Psychiatric Clinic. He is now professor of psychiatry and behavioral sciences at the Louisville University School of Medicine, and director of the program in ethics and pastoral counseling at the Louisville General Hospital. His books include Religious Dimensions of Personality (1957), Pastoral Counseling (1974), New Dimensions in Pastoral Counseling (1970), and The Christian Pastor (3rd ed. 1981). I.C.

OATH. The Hebrew word is used in regard to both God and Israelite society. In both cases it refers to a solemn statement of intention or PROMISE that is held to be binding and irrevocable. The natural association is in the various ceremonies of covenant-making, beginning with God's pledge to Abraham (Gen. 24:8). This is evidently a landmark case, since God's oath to the patriarch is picked up in Luke 1:13-20 and Hebrews 6:13-20. The Mosaic covenant too is confirmed by a divine oath (Deut. 29:12, 14; compare Deut. 7:8). This practice of confirming a treaty by an oath is well attested in Near Eastern texts that describe covenant-making among ancient tribes and nations.

Paul draws out the significance of God's oath, ascribing to Jesus Christ the power to ratify such divine promises (II Cor. 1:19-20; Rom. 15:8). The reliability of God in covenant faithfulness lies at the heart of such picturesque descriptions of God whose "oath" is an assurance to believers that God will not break or alter a declared intention to bless the people (Heb. 6:13-20; Ps. 110:4; Num. 23:19; Rom. 11:29; Luke 1:73).

On the level of human relationships, oaths and VOWS go together. People would invoke the divine name as a witness to their own credibility or resolution to make good a promise (I Sam. 14:39, 44; 20:23). The negative side of this is a CURSE formula (I Sam. 14:24), by which a judgment is invoked on an unnamed person who offends. Such a curse enforces a command. Perjury was held to be a serious offence in Israel (Zech. 5:3ff.; Num. 5:21ff.), and one was punished by death (Ezek. 17:15ff.), even if the oath was taken in ignorance (Josh. 9; II Sam. 21:1ff.). But oaths could be taken lightly; hence the warnings of Matthew 5:33-37 and James 5:12 against easygoing oath-taking. See too Matthew 12:36-37 on the high value placed by Jesus on human words used in pledges. Paul often uses a mild form of oath-taking (II Cor. 1:23; 11:11, 31; Phil. 1:8; Gal. 1:20) as if to guarantee that what he says can stand scrutiny by God that it is truthful or well-intentioned. R.M.

OATMAN, JOHNSON, JR. (1856–1922). Business executive and hymn writer. Oatman was born on April 21, near Medford, New Jersey. He joined the Methodist church when he was nineteen and later was licensed as a local preacher. Although he was active in a merchantile organization most of his life and an executive of a New Jersey insurance company, Oatman found time to write five thousand hymns, including the popular "Count Your Blessings." Music for this hymn, which was as accepted in Great Britain as America, was the work of composer-publisher Edwin O. Excell. R.H.

OBADIAH. The prophetic work that bears the name of Obadiah, "the servant of Yahweh," is, at twenty-one verses, the shortest book in the OT and the third shortest in the Bible. It is entirely given over to a diatribe against Judah's southern neighbor, EDOM. The book divides naturally into three parts: (a) verses 1-4, a threat of divine destruction against proud Edom living in its impregnable fastness "in the clefts of the rock" (often taken to be a reference to Petra, the rock-hewn city whose remains in the southwestern part of the Hashemite Kingdom of Jordan are still accessible only through a long, narrow defile between high cliffs); (b) verses 5-14, an insistence that the present and future pillaging of Edom are divine retribution for its refusal to come to the aid of its beleaguered neighbor state of Judah; (c) verses 15-21, a futuristic oracle that juxtaposes the extermination of Edom on the coming DAY OF THE LORD with the return of the house of Jacob to its own inheritance. This section can be compared with Isaiah 63:1-6, in which the eschatological holy warrior begins his retributive work in Edom. The book culminates with a vision of the universal rule of God within which Israel totally displaces Edom in order to play its own central role: "Saviors shall go up to Mount Zion to rule Mount Esau; and the kingdom shall be the Lord's" (Obad. 21).

Although the close verbal correspondence of Obadiah 1-9 with the preexilic oracle of Jeremiah 49:7-22 suggests that the writer of Obadiah drew upon some older tradition, the book as it stands appears to be a unity, and to have been addressed to a specific generation in Judah. The tones of nationalistic pride and vengeance that pervade the work suggest that that generation must have been one in which Israelites felt keen personal disappointment at the perfidy of Edom. Such a setting is not hard to find in the events following the conquest of Jerusalem by the Babylonians in 587 B.C. Other OT texts tell us that Edom rejoiced in Judah's pitiable plight (Lam. 4:21), took part in razing the Temple to the ground (Ps. 137:7), and occupied part of the country (Ezek. 35:10). The ancient enmity felt by Israel toward Edom, which is enshrined in the early memories of tension between the twin brothers Jacob and Esau (who were the founding fathers of the two peoples respectively—see Gen. 25:23; 27:39-40) and which is reiterated in such prophetic threats as Amos 1:11-12 and Isaiah 34:5-17, must have reached its zenith in the years immediately following 587. It is reasonable, therefore, to assume that the book emanates from this period.

If, however, verse 7 is specifically referring to the expulsion of the Edomites from their ancestral home, we might assume a slightly later date. Malachi 1:3-4, thought to be mid-fifth century, also knows of this expulsion, and secular records show Arab names at Ezion-geber, on the southern coast of Edom, by the fifth century B.C. When driven from their homeland, it appears that the Edomites moved west into the Negeb, which came to be known in post-OT literature as Idumea. Their descendants were forcibly converted to Judaism after 120 B.C., and one of them, Herod the Great, founded the last dynasty of native rulers in Judea in 37 B.C. That the last great king of Judah should have been of Edomite extraction and should have built his fame upon magnificent public works and horrific despotic rule provides an ironic counterpoint to the triumphal expectation of divine vengeance against Edom preserved in the strange little prophetic book of Obadiah.

W.S.T.

OBEDIENCE. The biblical term rendered "obedience" covers a wide-ranging field of human response to the divine will. By their etymology both the Hebrew and Greek words suggest a listening to the voice of another person, specially as that person, whether a fellow human being or God, claims our attention and responsiveness. Israel is condemned for failing to hear God's commands and so living for itself (Jer. 7:24; Ps. 81:12-14), and disobedience is judged to be a cardinal sin in the NT (Eph. 2:2; 5:6, disobedience to God; compare Rom. 1:30, disobedience to one's parents).

In Jewish and Christian theology humanity's Fall is traced back to Adam's disobedience (Gen. 3:17, Adam listened to another voice and doubted God's goodness). But it is only in Paul that there is worked out an elaborate scheme of Christ's obedience reversing the Fall and restoring humanity's original state (see Rom. 5:12-21). Jesus Christ is the preeminently obedient one (John 6:38), even to the point of death (Phil. 2:8; Heb. 5:8). Such a signal obedience is the ground on which God clears sinners from their disobedience and views them as "in Christ." Not surprisingly, therefore, Paul can describe faith as obedience (Rom. 1:5), that is, our response to God's offer of grace in Christ. The Christian life, in the NT, is consistently one of living in obedience to God (I Pet. 1:14) and by extension, to political (Rom. 13:1-7) and ecclesial (Heb. 13:7) authorities.

R.M.

OBLATION. An OFFERING to God, especially in the sense of the offering of a sacrificial victim to God in the OT and of the offering of the sacrifice of the Mass in Roman Catholic theology. SACRIFICES, and consequently oblations, play a major role in the OT. The concept of the sacrifice (oblation) of Christ on the cross and the concomitant ending of the need for temple sacrifices form a large part of the NT, especially in the epistles of Paul and the Epistle to the Hebrews.

In the OT, the sacrifice of animals, especially lambs, calves, goats, and pigeons, is early shown to have displaced the older, pagan practice of human oblations. The story of Abraham and Isaac on Mount Moriah symbolizes this. A great concern for the purity of the oblation (sacrificial victim) is seen in Leviticus. Proposed victims must be free of any deformity and in perfect health. The precise way in which the victim was to be dispatched and its blood splashed on the altar is spelled out.

Oblations may also be prayers or offerings of gifts in kind (bread, wine, the produce of the fields) to God. J.C.

OCCAM, WILLIAM OF. See WILLIAM OF OCCAM.

OFFERING. See SACRIFICIAL OFFERINGS.

OFFERTORY. A sentence, or, in free Protestant churches (and others today), a choral work, sung at the collection of the offering in Christian worship. The custom of singing a psalm at this time is of ancient origin. It is known to go back to Augustine's time.

The sentences, psalms, or musical works vary with the liturgical season of the church year. Such responses are chosen to reflect praise and prayer, especially the sentiment that the congregation's offerings will be acceptable to God. In some services the sentence is said by the presiding minister or priest. In the Mass, the oblation over the bread and wine given by the priest is known as the offertory.

The offertory symbolizes the total surrender of human beings to God. In the presentation of material gifts, the faithful acknowledge that all life is a gift from God. Worshipers only give back to God a small portion of the bounty given them, so that God can bless and use these offerings to advance the kingdom. These gifts include both the sacramental elements, the bread and wine, and the offerings of money to be used to support the church's work and to assist the needy. J.C.

OG. According to Numbers 21:31-35, Og was the king of Bashan in northern Transjordan Palestine who was defeated by the Israelites on their way to the Promised Land. He was a character of folklore, thought to be a remnant of an ancient race of giants (Rephaim, Josh. 12:4), probably because of an "iron bedstead" (a basalt dolmen?) of enormous size that was popularly regarded as his tomb at Rabbath Ammon (Deut. 3:11). This legendary character also accounts for Og's defeat becoming proverbial of the way the Lord gives victory to people despite all odds (Deut. 31:4). B.V.

OIL, HOLY. Oil, which invariably was olive oil, was used extensively for sacred purposes in the OT liturgy and ritual anointings. It fueled the lamps that burned in the sanctuary of the Lord (Num. 4:9); it was, along with blood, credited with a purificatory function in various ceremonies (Lev. 14:10-20); it was used in the preparation and execution of cereal offerings (Lev. 2:1-10); and it was the medium for the consecration of sacred objects (Exod. 30:25-29), of kings (I Sam. 10:1; 16:13, and others), and of priests (Exod. 3:30). Oil for these ritual uses had to be "pure" (Exod. 27:20; Lev. 24:2).

There is no instance of a sacred anointing in the NT, unless it occurs in the visitation of the sick as described by James 5:14. Here the technical term for anointing (chriō) is not used, but rather a purely secular word. Oil was credited with having medicinal qualities (Mark 6:13; Luke 10:34). It is true, this anointing is done "in the name of the Lord"; still it is "the prayer of faith" that saves the sick person.

Holy oils are featured in the liturgies of various Eastern and Latin churches. In the Roman liturgy three oils are used for distinct purposes: chrism, a mixture of olive oil and balsam; and the oil of the sick and the oil of catechumens, both of which are pure olive oil. B.V.

OLD TESTAMENT. A term of Christian provenance used to designate the Scriptures inherited by the church from Judaism. For most Protestants this OT means only the books of the Hebrew Bible. For Eastern and Latin Christians it is these books together with a number of others that were habitually included in the Greek version of the Bible used by the Jews of the Diaspora. The term rises out of the ambiguity of the word diatheke as used in the Greek Bible. The word did mean "last will and testament," but as simply expressing God's will it had been used to translate the Hebrew berith, "covenant." The Lucan-Pauline version of the Last Supper (Luke 22:20, I Cor. 11:25) has Jesus speak of the new diatheke in his blood. The Epistle to the Hebrews picks up this terminology and refers to Judaism as the first or old diatheke. In Hebrews 9:15-22 diatheke appears as covenant, as will, and as written record of the covenant/will. It is in this final sense that we speak of the OT. B.V.

OLIVER, HENRY KEMBLE (1800-85). Musician, hymn composer, teacher, and public official. Henry Kemble Oliver was born on November 24 in Beverly, Massachusetts. He learned many religious tunes from his musical mother and at ten years old was a boy soprano in Boston's Park Street Church, where he later served as organist. After training at Boston Latin

Courtesy of the Israel Government Tourist Office, Houston, Texas

The Church of All Nations in the Garden of Gethsemane. Behind it is the Mount of Olives and the Russian Church of St. Mary Magdalene

School and Phillips Andover, Oliver attended Harvard College for two years and completed his work at Dartmouth. He taught school for many years in Salem and on Sundays played the organ at St. Peter's Church and later at North Church. He was superintendent of the Atlantic Cotton Mills in Lawrence (Mass.), and served as organist at the Unitarian church. As a public servant, he was adjutant general of Massachusetts, and subsequently director of the commonwealth's Bureau of Statistics of Labor. During the Civil War he served as state treasurer. Returning to Salem, he became mayor of that historic city for four years. He died in Salem on August 12. Oliver composed many hymn tunes, including those for hymn texts by William Cullen Bryant and Oliver Wendell Holmes. R.H.

OLIVES, MOUNT OF. A mile-long ridge of raised ground, nearly three thousand feet in elevation, that overlooks Jerusalem on its east side. It is thus the most conspicuous marker on the Jerusalem landscape, especially as the terrain drops to the Kidron Valley (II Sam. 15:14, 23, 30). An accurate description is the "mountain which is on the east side of the city" (Ezek. 11:23), and it was reached by covering a walking distance on a Sabbath (which equals 960 yards, according to Acts 1:12). This hillside was covered with olive trees in NT times. Hence the name Mount of Olives was applied.

The most prominent references to this locale in the OT are in connection with David's escape from Jerusalem during Absalom's revolt (II Sam. 15:30), Ezekiel's vision of a theophany on its summit (Ezek. 11:23), and Zechariah's apocalyptic scenario (14:4), which entailed an earthquake whose epicenter at Olivet would produce a new valley.

In the Gospels, Jesus, John reports (7:53-8:1), used the Mount of Olives as a retreat. On entering the city on Palm Sunday (Luke 19:29, 37, 41-44), he grieved over it and foretold its destruction. In Gethsemane on one of the lower slopes he prayed (Luke 22:39), and here he was arrested. In Luke's artistry the same location is made the scene of the Ascension (Acts 1:9, 12), a tradition marked today by the Russian Orthodox Church of the Ascension and an Islamic mosque. Both buildings are intended to mark the scene of the Ascension.

By historical irony the strategic elevation of the Mount of Olives was capitalized by the Roman general Titus at the time of the Jewish war (A.D. 66-70), and from the commanding position of this area the Roman army was poised to lay siege to Jerusalem. R.M.

OM (AUM). From the Sanskrit word meaning literally "yes" or "so be it." A syllable used in HINDUISM especially as a mantra or sacred sound to evoke the realization of BRAHMAN itself. It is treated as, and occasionally virtually used as, a name for Brahman, since as early as the UPANISHADS. R.E.

OMEN. Part of the apparatus of DIVINATION and ASTROLOGY in antiquity was the widespread practice of seeking and giving portents of the future called omens. The most popular forms of divining the future were the inspection of the entrails of animals, especially their liver (considered the seat of life), and the observation of migratory habits of birds (see Jer. 8:7). Other well-attested means were the predicting of natural phenomena such as earthquakes (for example, Amos 1:1; Mark 13:8), and cosmic irregularities like eclipses (Amos 8:9; Joel 2:30-31), and the appearance of stars and comets (Matt. 2:1-10 is the best-known example). In Hellenistic religion there is a deep strain of belief in superstition, and omens were a way to avert one's fate. Theophrastus' entertaining description, "The Superstitious Man" in his Characters (written in 319 B.C.) is one of the best known. This account describes how a nervous man will act when, as a believer in the power of omens, he will run to the diviner and soothsayer to inquire what god to pray to, will constantly purify his house with water, and will avoid animals, like the cat or weasel, which were thought to bring a bad spell. To see an epileptic or mentally disturbed person is an omen, and he must shudder and spit into his chest to avert the danger. R.M.

OMNIPOTENCE. From the Latin word meaning "all-powerful," and in classical Christian theology is applied to God. Power can be demonic or beneficent. Because humans are limited by their own perceptions, they necessarily apply to God their own definitions and feelings about power. The Bible describes a God who is good and who loves all creation. It is unthinkable that such a God would use power arbitrarily to create or destroy. The God of the Bible is also a moral Being, insisting on righteousness. A corollary of this is that evil will be punished, hence the power of God will be used in judgment. However, one who has power is not required to use it, and God can be merciful and forgiving, thus mitigating the effects of justice. The Bible says that those who repent and return will be saved.

The idea of God's omnipotence raises the question of EVIL. Some answer this question by denying that God is all-powerful. Others say that God's power has been self-limited by giving free will to human beings. Only at the final judgment will justice ultimately be done. I.C.

OMNIPRESENCE. An attribute of God in classical Christian theology, omnipresence comes from the Latin word meaning "present everywhere." If this is so, God must know all that is going on in the world. God's presence is the creative force that maintains life. This presence, however, does not guarantee God's action, although it could imply that God is concerned with what happens. God's intervention is a corollary not so much of presence as of power.

To say that God is everywhere does not mean that God is in everything, the position of PANTHEISM. It denotes that God is the Other and therefore able to be present. If God is omnipresent, there is no way to hide from God. This could evoke fear (of judgment and punishment) or confidence (that God loves).

The omnipresence of God raises the question as to why God is in the world. If God is good, why is there evil? If God is indifferent, why be present? Recently philosophers have speculated on the "absence" of God, not in the sense that God has withdrawn, but that humans are unable to perceive God's presence. The omnipresence of God implies a Being of a different order from humans, yet related to the world. I.C.

OMNISCIENCE. A description of an attribute of God, coming from the Latin word meaning "all-knowing." In Christian theology this was a statement about the cognitive qualities of God. However, in biblical terms, to "know" means to be closely related to, to have an inner knowledge of. The omniscience of God would have both subjective and objective elements.

To think about God as all-knowing could bring fear, because nothing is hidden, or comfort, because God could act wisely on this knowledge for the benefit of creation. It assumes that God is good and implies that evil cannot be hidden from God who can punish evildoers. The purpose of setting up a descriptive category called omniscience is a human effort to say that God is qualitatively different in ways that human beings can neither imitate nor fully comprehend.

Omniscience also suggests foreknowledge, but not necessarily foreordination. As a parent knows that the toddler learning to walk will fall (but the toddler does not know), so God knows when human beings will fail. Omniscience raises the question as to why EVIL exists without intervention from God. The equation of omniscience and goodness were profoundly called into question by the HOLOCAUST. I.C.

OMRI. King of Israel (876–869 B.C.), who succeeded to the throne as the army's choice after the murder of his predecessor, Elah. He restored order, overcame rival claimants, and stabilized the kingdom for years to come. Though the single-minded author of I Kings 16:21-28 pays scant attention to Omri, the archaeology of Samaria, where he established his capital, Assyrian records, and a few scriptural details have convinced historians that he was one of the most effective and far-seeing of Israel's kings. He negotiated advantageous military and commercial alliances and subjugated enemy states such as Moab (attested by the Moabite Stone). Long after his dynasty had disappeared, Israel was still called "the land of Omri" by the Assyrians. B.V.

ONAN. Son of Judah by a Canaanite woman (Gen. 38:4-10), who serves chiefly as a detail in the scene setting of the story of Judah and Tamar. He is reprobated by the biblical author for having failed in this familial obligation under the Levirate law by the practice of coitus interruptus. Hence he has the distinction of having the vice of onanism named after him.

B.V.

ONEIDA COMMUNITY. A religious communitarian experiment in western New York state founded in 1848 by JOHN HUMPHREY NOYES, after his experiments in "complex marriage" had offended the community's neighbors in Putney, Vermont. By 1851 it had 205 members. In 1854 Oneida began to manufacture steel traps in addition to its profitable farming and logging operations. An allied community at Wallingford, Connecticut, manufactured sewing silk and silver-plated flatware. One of the few such experiments to survive, Oneida depended more on industry than farming and was a model of efficiency. Noyes eventually proposed it forsake "complex marriage" and become a joint stock company in 1881. The community was controversial because as an outgrowth of PERFECTIONISM, Noyes discouraged "special love" between couples and instead regulated sexual activity and procreation according to his theories of male continence, and "stirpiculture" or eugenics. N.H.

ONESIMUS. A Christian slave residing at Colossae, who on his flight from servitude went to Paul (Col. 4:9). The conversion and subsequent service of Onesimus are to be inferred from that text. In the letter addressed to Philemon, Paul uses the slave's name (Onesimus means "useful") as part of his appeal for the man's pardon by his Christian master as the former is sent back (Philem. 11-12). Paul regards Onesimus' conversion to new life as genuine (v. 10). Onesimus had evidently done wrong by stealing or more simply by running away (v. 18); in the latter case a runaway slave was liable, under contemporary law, for the loss of work incurred by his absence. Paul therefore is promising to make good the loss incurred (vv. 18-19) with a promissory note. An unresolved question is whether Paul is in fact asking for Onesimus' discharge from slavery and his being set free (see v. 16).

Onesimus is the name also of a second-century bishop of Ephesus, according to Ignatius, and this reference with the same example of punning on the man's name has led to the theory that the slave became a later church leader. But this is uncertain, since the name was by no means uncommon, and a later bishop might well have adopted it simply because of its appropriate meaning, that is, "useful" in Christian service. R.M.

ONESIPHORUS. Greetings are sent (II Tim. 4:19) to the "household of Onesiphorus," and the writer prays that divine mercy rest upon it and that Onesiphorus find favor from God in the Day of Judgment. The man is commended for his courage and kindness in seeking out Paul in prison and assisting him. He evidently lived up to his name, meaning "profit-bringing." The question whether Onesiphorus was deceased when II Timothy 1:18 was written has played a significant part in the larger issue of "prayers for the dead." No decision on the basis of this verse is possible. R.M.

ONIAS (II & III). The family name of Onias goes back to Onias I, a Jewish high priest who held office from 320 to 290 B.C., mentioned in I Maccabees 12:7, 19, 20. His grandson Onias II held the post in the time of Ptolemy III, Euergetes (246-221 B.C.). A much more significant character is Onias III, a grandson of Onias II, since he represented the conservative wing of Judaism. He was absent from Jerusalem at a time when Hellenizing practices were introduced, a turn of events that led to the Maccabean revolt in 168 B.C. When Onias III protested these Greek customs, such as sports and dress, he was summarily assassinated by Menelaus (Dan. 9:25-27 is taken to refer to this event). R.M.

ONLY BEGOTTEN. This is the traditional way of rendering the Greek word monogenés in John 1:18 (KJV). The composite word unpacks its meaning as "of a single [mono] kind [genos]," but modern scholars are suspicious of connecting genos with the verb gennaó, "to beget," a procedure that yields "only begotten." The translation "only begotten" gained importance when Jerome tried to answer the claims of Arius that Jesus was not begotten but a creature made by God like the angels. So Jerome puts the Greek into the Latin unigenitus at John 1:18; 3:16, 18, with the result that the Vulgate influenced the makers of the KJV. But of itself monogenés cannot mean uniqueness (see Heb. 11:17, where Isaac is monogenés); rather the idea is that of "precious," based on Genesis 22:2, 12, 16.

The text of John 1:18 (see RSV and margin) is difficult, with the manuscripts varying between the "only begotten Son" and "the only begotten God." The latter reading, monogenes theos, has a stronger claim, but "only begotten Son" is found elsewhere in John's Gospel and in I John 4:9. The rule of the "more difficult reading" preferred to explain a simpler one applies, and recent scholars prefer the RSV marginal be read as a series of nouns in apposition: "No one has ever seen God; the only begotten God, the one in the bosom of the Father, that one has explained him" (Paul R. McReynolds' translation). R.M.

ONTOLOGICAL ARGUMENT. See GOD'S EXISTENCE, ARGUMENTS FOR.

ONTOLOGY. Literally, the study of BEING. Although it is a perennial subject within philosophy, the word was coined in the seventeenth century. "Being" is of the essence of personhood, but it is also attributed to God. Being is not acquired, one has it.

Being is grasped as an intellectual idea. The various attributes of humanness are grafted upon it. No one can "prove" being inductively. One of those deductive truths discussed by philosophers, "being" as such is not in the realm of the psychological.

Ontology has been put into new focus through the twentieth-century philosophy called EXISTENTIALISM. HEIDEGGER and JASPERS discuss both being and existence but give priority to the latter. Being is a state, inert and inactive. One accepts being and has no responsibility toward it.

Existence is what a person makes of being. There is a personal responsibility for existence implied in the act of living itself. Being can be an abstraction made up by philosophers. Nevertheless, being points to life, and ontology is a study of both the divine being and the human being. I.C.

OPHIR. A region probably on the southwest coast of the Arabian peninsula, possibly on the opposite eastern coast of Africa across the Red Sea, at any rate reached by ship from Ezion-geber (I Kings 9:28). It was proverbial as a source of gold (compare Isa. 13:12). Solomon joined the Phoenician king Hiram to equip a fleet berthed at Ezion-geber to bring out the gold of Ophir. B.V.

OPUS OPERATUM. See EX OPERE OPERATO.

ORACLE. A term used to denote a divine revelation conveyed in various ways and then recorded for posterity. Among the media of revelation used in Israel we note: by dreams (I Sam. 28:6), by a method of casting lots (Lev. 16:8), and by prophetic utterance (see the various prefaces to the eighth- and seventh-century prophetic books in the OT as well as the prophecies uttered against foreign powers in Isaiah 13-19 and Jeremiah 46-51). In the NT the term stands for the OT as written down (Rom. 3:2) as well as distinctively Christian compositions, whether oral (I Pet. 4:11) or written (Heb. 5:12).

Oracles were commonplace in the ancient world, being associated with shrines of the Hellenistic deities, notably Apollo at Delphi. Hence the Delphic oracle to which people came with puzzling questions and were given an answer via the priestess. Similarly at Cumae, near Naples, the famous oracle of Sibyl was consulted. At Corinth and Pergamum oracles were communicated along an underground tunnel—thus heightening the sense of expectation—and the sick were healed by autosuggestive means. R.M.

ORAL TRADITION. By its definition the term speaks of the transmission of stories, teachings, and illustrations of the Bible that were passed on in the community by word of mouth before becoming fixed in written form. It is natural to assume that these traditions were adapted and changed across the generations before their written shape led to their fixation. Yet it is only from the final written text that we may infer the existence of oral tradition and try to trace the stages of its passage with the reasons for its adaptation.

The theory behind oral TRADITION rests on the cultural setting of the biblical material, for we know that Israel, as a primitive Semitic people of the ancient Near East, cherished the accounts of its early history more in the context of tribal storytelling than in producing documents. It is the same with early Norse and Greek sagas, which had their birth in community recitation and cultic drama. Added to this milieu are the amazingly retentive memory of the Jewish people and the stress that the later rabbis placed on learning by memorization with a consequent distrust of book lore. The setting down of the early traditions of Israel's origins in the patriarchal period, the Egyptian hardship and the nation's deliverance under Moses and Joshua, and the settlement of the tribes in Canaan, was not codified until centuries later, though we may recall two safeguards to ensure the integrity of the oral tradition. One is that the Hebrews attached a great deal of significance to a rehearsal of their origins in the liturgy of the sanctuaries at Shechem and Gilgal and later at the Temple in Jerusalem. They believed that these liturgical dramatizations not only reviewed the past but recalled it from memory into living experience in the present. Second, a focal point of such re-presentation was the annual Passover, when Israel relived its humble origins in slavery. No nation would have tolerated this picture and kept it alive unless it was founded on substantial fact in history.

The apostolic church similarly, stemming from its Jewish origins, cherished the life and teachings of Jesus for several decades before having them written down in the canonical Gospels. Preachers, catechists like John Mark (Acts 13:5), researchers like Luke (Luke 1:1-4), and then evangelists (for example, John 20:30; 21:25) were all active in the oral period prior to the composition of our Four Gospels. This type of understanding has led, especially among Scandinavian scholars, to the view that the "oral tradition" represents a first edition of the Gospel later expanded into our canonical four. The oral tradition in time died out, but it left a dubious legacy in the Gnostic notion that Jesus, between his resurrection and ascension, had entrusted "a secret gospel" to selected leaders whom the Gnostics appealed to in their writings. Sundry verses, such as Luke 24:44, 45, John 16:12, were claimed to be part of that oral tradition on which the Gnostics based their religion as an improvement on the catholic, orthodox faith in the second and third centuries. R.M.

ORATIONS. Prayers, from the Latin word orationes. In the Latin Mass, the priest addresses the congregation with Orate Fratres, "Let us pray, brothers." This emphasizes the unity of the priest, people, and church in offering the sacrifice of the Mass. An oratio is a short liturgical prayer or COLLECT. An oratio imperata or "ordered prayer" is a collect added to the Mass for a specific purpose by order of a bishop or the pope. The oratio super oblata is the prayer said over the oblation or offering in the Mass. The oratio super populum is the prayer over the people, which occurs post-Communion.

Orations or prayers are of various kinds. There are prayers of praise for God's greatness and goodness; prayers of thanksgiving for divine favors received; prayers of confession, in which sorrow for sin is expressed; and prayers of intercession, in which believers ask God to bless others, for example, the fellowship of believers, the nation, specific people in need, or for all sorts and conditions of people. In orations, believers reach out from their hearts to God. J.C.

ORATORY. From the Latin word orare, meaning "to pray." The precise designation in Catholic canon law of a church; that is, a building set apart for divine services, consecrated for the use of a monastic community, religious school, or private family. Mortuary chapels in cemeteries are private oratories. There is no general right for the public to use such churches or chapels, although they may do so in semi-public oratories, such as hospital or prison chapels. Public oratories are open to all the faithful during such times as mass is celebrated. There are two Catholic orders referred to as oratories: the congregation of the oratory of St. Philip Neri, instituted to save souls through the pastoral activities of priests supported by private finances, and the French oratory, founded in 1611 and reinstated in 1852 under the name of the Oratory of Jesus and Mary. J.C.

ORDER OF PREACHERS. See DOMINIC/DOMINICANS.

ORDERS AND ORDINATION. "Orders," in Roman Catholic theology, implies ordination, or the state of being consecrated and set apart for the Christian ministry. There are several different orders, divided into major and minor orders in the Roman Catholic church, but the phrase "to be in orders" or "holy orders" is generally reserved for the ranks of DEACON, PRIEST (PRESBYTER), and BISHOP. These major orders may be conferred only by a bishop, although, in theory, the pope could delegate any priest to confer the minor orders and the diaconate.

"Ordination" refers to the SACRAMENT (in Roman Catholic theology) of conferring such holy orders, and, in Protestantism generally, to the ritual by which persons are set apart for the ministry of word and sacrament (or ordinances, in the Free churches). The Protestant conception of ordination differs widely from the Catholic view, except among a few groups such as the Anglo-Catholics or High Church party of the Church of England, which may consider ordination as a sacrament also. Generally, Protestants do not consider the rite of ordination as a sacrament, nor do they accept the traditional Catholic teaching that such a rite, with the laying on of the bishop's hands, confers an indelible character as a priest. No special status, aside from commissioning for an office, a function, in the church is ascribed to ordination by most Protestants. Catholics do not (even before Vatican II) deny the priesthood of all believers, for they teach that the sacraments of baptism and confirmation confer on every Christian a real participation in the priesthood exercised eternally by Jesus Christ. Nevertheless, the holy order of the priesthood is different precisely because of the INDELIBLE CHARACTER imparted, which gives the priest the power to administer divine grace both by the sacraments and the proclamation of the gospel.

In Protestantism ordination is generally to one rank of ministry, that is, to the office of presbyter or PASTOR, sometimes called ELDER. For example, in the Lutheran churches, ministers are all of one rank, although some may be elected to the office of bishop in certain churches. In the Reformed and Presbyterian churches, the clergy are all ministers or teaching elders (presbyters). However, in the Anglican and Episcopal churches the clergy are ordained, in ascending order, to the rank of deacon, priest, and bishop. In the Roman Catholic church there are seven degrees of holy orders. These include the minor orders of doorkeeper or porter, lector or reader, exorcist, and acolyte. The major or sacred orders are subdeacon, deacon, and priest. Bishops are priests who have all the priestly powers and rule over other priests. ARCHBISHOPS, PATRIARCHS, and the POPE are degrees within the episcopate. CARDINALS do not form an order but fill an office. The same is true of abbots, canons, and other prelates. The Council of Trent declared that once a man has been made a priest he cannot again become a layman. This is not accepted by Protestants.

The rite of ordination for the minor orders of the Catholic church is accomplished by handing the symbols of office to the man, with the appropriate ritual and words. Ordination to the ranks of deacons, priests, and bishops is done by the laying on of hands of the bishop and all priests who are present. The deacons, being made priests, have their hands anointed with oil and are given a chalice and paten with these words: "Receive the power to offer sacrifice to God and to celebrate Mass both for the living and the dead, in the name of the Lord." After communing with both bread and wine, the bishop lays his hands on the new priests and says, "Receive the Holy Spirit, whose sins you forgive on earth shall be forgiven in heaven." Then after a promise of obedience, the bishop blesses the new priests together.

Protestant ordination services are not quite so elaborate, but involve many of the same elements. The candidates for ordination are set apart by the laying on of hands of the bishop or presiding minister and all the other ordained persons present. The right to administer the Lord's Supper and baptism is conferred on the new ministers, and vows and blessings are mutually exchanged. J.C.

ORDINAL. The service of ordination in the Roman Catholic Church, consisting of prayers, vows, and blessings. Holy ORDERS, which set a man apart as a presbyter or priest, convey, according to Catholic theology, an INDELIBLE CHARACTER. This stamp of priesthood cannot be lost. It gives the priest the ability to consecrate the host and to reenact the sacrifice of Calvary in the sacrament of the Mass. The ordination of a deacon does not confer this ability. The ordinal can be done only by a bishop. J.C.

ORDINARY. A Roman Catholic clergyman with ordinary jurisdiction over a specific territory. The pope is ordinary universally, bishops are ordinaries over their dioceses, abbots over their orders. "The ordinary" means the "regular bishop of a diocese." The Ordinary of the Mass is the unchangeable part of the liturgy of the Mass. J.C.

ORDINATION. See ORDERS AND ORDINATION.

ORDO SALUTIS. "The order of salvation" or the stages through which a person passes as one moves from the state of SIN to SALVATION. In Roman Catholic thought, the order begins with grace, leading to baptism and, through the sacramental system, the infusion of habitual grace and the development of the virtues. The end is the vision of God. The Protestant dogmatists of the seventeenth century divided over the order of salvation. Lutherans saw the pattern as God's call, illumination, conversion, assurance of justification, regeneration, mystical union with Christ, the new obedience (sanctification), and finally, glorification. Reformed theologians disagreed and placed predestination at the head of the list. J.C.

ORIGEN (about A.D. 185–254). Outstanding theologian, biblical exegete, writer, and teacher in the early Christian church. Controversial in his own lifetime, at NICAEA in 325 he voiced views that fed both sides of the debate about Christ's nature. The Council of CONSTANTINOPLE in 553 condemned him as a heretic; yet his influence on the history of Christianity has been monumental.

Origen was born of Christian parents in Alexandria, Egypt. His father, Leonides, was beheaded during the persecution under Roman emperor Lucius Septimus Severus (193–211) when Origen was about twelve. The gifted young Origen studied under Clement of Alexandria, who was headmaster of the Christian catechetical school at Alexandria. Clement fled during the persecutions of 202, and Origen at about eighteen was appointed to fill his place, thus beginning a brilliant teaching career. He attracted Christians and non-Christians to his classes. Dedicated, disciplined, and extremely ascetic, Origen produced some six thousand works of which only a few have survived. An admiring patron provided him with funds for copyists. Recognized as a profound Christian thinker, Origen occasionally visited Antioch, Palestine, Greece, and Italy. Invited by the bishops of Caesarea and Jerusalem to Palestine, Origen preached in the area in 216, while still a layman. This angered his bishop, Demetrius of Alexandria, who was struggling to consolidate his power in Egypt. He recalled Origen from Palestine. About 230 these same bishops, without consulting Demetrius, ordained Origen to the office of presbyter. Demetrius then influenced an Alexandrian synod to rescind Origen's teaching privileges, and a subsequent synod with the compliance of the bishop of Rome deposed Origen from the priesthood and sent him into exile. Origen's statement just after his ordination, that even the devil could be saved, counted heavily against him. Origen then established a school at Caesarea in Palestine, about 232, where he continued his prodigious writings while teaching philosophy, theology, literature, and Bible. About 250, during the persecution under Roman Emperor Decius (249–251), Origen was imprisoned and tortured. When Decius died in 251, Origen was released, but the ordeal had weakened him physically and he died shortly thereafter.

To interpret Scripture and answer Jewish and Gnostic attacks on Christianity, Origen published his famous Hexapla, composed of six texts of the OT: the Hebrew, a transliteration of the Hebrew into Greek, followed by four current Greek versions—the Septuagint, Theodotion, Aquila, and Symmachus translations. Drawing on these texts, Origen wrote extensive commentaries explaining biblical passages in three senses—the literal, moral, and allegorical. The literal sense and the historical context interested him only secondarily. He primarily emphasized the inner meaning or soul of a passage and gave a moral-mystical tone to his interpretations.

Origen's principal work, De Principiis (On Principles), systematized his views on God, humanity, and the world. On Prayer examined prayer as a communion of the soul with God, and Exhortation to Martyrdom portrayed ascetic austerity and the benefits of dying a martyr. His Commentary on Romans was badly translated into Latin and altered in his own day. Contra Celsus (Against Celsus) quoted extensively from Celsus' writings and helped preserve the work of Celsus, an early critic of Christianity.

Origen presupposed that nothing unworthy should be said about God, and allegory enabled him to explain scriptural incongruities and maintain biblical unity. He believed that God was Perfect Being, a perfect balance of all virtues, and that God is expressed in three coequal hypostases known as Father, Son, and Holy Spirit. In explaining this Trinity Origen tended to make the Son subordinate to the Father, and the Holy Spirit subordinate to the Son, through whom the Holy Spirit came into being. At other times he made Father and Son equal. Origen pictured the Holy Spirit as active only in the souls of saints, whose superior gnosis enabled them to contact the Spirit. To the Father, Origen assigned existence, to the Son rationality, and to the Spirit sanctity.

According to Origen, God first created a realm of intelligences with ethereal bodies endowed with reason and free will. Some of these intelligences fell away from God by allowing their love to lapse. A hierarchical order of celestial realms resulted. Some intelligences fell further than others and became demons or souls imprisoned in human bodies. God created this world as a place where through temporal trial, judgment, and pain souls might be redirected back toward God. Virtuous living would enable one to begin ascending to God at death. Immoral living would cause further descent. This ascent and descent could last a long time, but Origen believed God would not finally be defeated. Suffering and pain are part of God's redemptive plan to retrieve fallen souls through education and training. So also are order and beauty. They help point fallen souls back to the higher realms from which they originally came. Origen thus pictured evil as distance from God, privation of good, brought about by misuse of free will. He maintained that in the end all moral creatures would be rescued, even the devil, but that the whole process could begin anew through misuse of free will.

In Jesus, Origen said, human flesh and divine Logos were united in one person. However, the humanity in Jesus suffered on the cross, not the divinity. Following the Ascension, the humanity was absorbed into the divinity. Christ was a physician to sinners and a teacher to those made pure. Christ broke the hold of Satan who would drag souls further from God, and the Holy Spirit helps believers achieve sanctity. True knowledge brings salvation and expresses itself in good works, making virtuous works essential to salvation. In the reascent to God the body is left behind.

Origen's philosophical assumptions about the preexistence of souls, eternity of worlds, spiritual resurrection, universalism, and recurrence of the Fall caused extensive controversies that have not been resolved fully to this day. Origen's "errors" were declared heretical at Constantinople in 543 and 553. C.M.

ORIGINAL RIGHTEOUSNESS. An important idea in Christian anthropology as a counterbalance to the idea of ORIGINAL SIN. Where this latter idea is stressed in a one-sided way, it leads to an exaggeratedly pessimistic view of human nature, and it is important to remember that original righteousness is more original than original sin. But what is original righteousness? Only if one understood the Genesis myth of the FALL in a crudely literal way could one suppose that the first human beings were morally perfect or completely righteous. Such a literal understanding seems to be held by those who maintain that through the Fall, original righteousness has been totally lost. A more plausible interpretation of the doctrine holds that this original righteousness was given to the human race as a potentiality toward which it was directed. If that is the case, then the Fall was not a falling away from an actual righteousness but a falling short of a potential righteousness that actually has never been realized. On this second view, original righteousness remains as the goal of human life. SIN hinders its attainment but has not obliterated it, though GRACE is needed to overcome the counter influence of sin. J.M.

ORIGINAL SIN. The doctrine that throughout the history of the human race, human nature has been flawed and disordered in every human group and every human individual. The flaw has several dimensions, and we most naturally think of it as a moral flaw. But in calling it sin, we are recognizing that fundamentally it is a separation from God, the Creator and Sustainer of life. The gravity of original sin lies in the fact that it means that human life is cut off at the very roots, and that all the particular sins and wrongdoings of the race arise from this deep disablement.

The adjective "original" can be understood in more than one way. When the Genesis story of the disobedience of the first human couple was taken literally as describing an event that took place in the dawn of human history, then original sin might be taken to mean this supposed first sin that took place in the beginning. But it could also be taken to mean the whole history of sin that had flowed from it, and nowadays when it is more common to think of the Genesis story as myth rather than as history, this second meaning of "original" remains. The doctrine of original sin has become the doctrine of the universality of sin, and perhaps the word "original" is not very apposite.

Even if one believed in a historical fall at the beginning of human history, one might still think that the expression "original sin" is unfortunate, for sin was not the original state of the first couple. However "early" sin may be in human history, there was a still earlier righteousness. If one talks about "original sin," one has to acknowledge that sin was never as original as righteousness. Any Christian theologian who develops a doctrine of original sin ought to devote at least as much attention to the meaning of original righteousness. Theologians have often failed to maintain this balance, with the result that their teaching about sin has become distorted, and they have presented overly gloomy and pessimistic views of the human condition. The notion of original righteousness does not cease to be meaningful for those who reject a literal historical interpretation of the Fall. For them, "original" is not understood in a temporal sense. They do not believe that there was a Golden Age when human beings were without a flaw and that they subsequently fell away into sin. By the "original" condition of humanity, they would understand an ideal or archetypal humanity, or a "true" humanity, as we often say. Human beings were created with the potentiality for achieving such an authentic humanity, but they have from the beginning consistently fallen short of it. On this view, the Fall is a falling short of the full human potentiality, not a falling away from a righteousness that was once actually enjoyed.

The principal biblical basis for the doctrine of original sin is the story of Creation and the Fall in the early chapters of Genesis, but not all the ramifications of the doctrine can be clearly established from Genesis. Thus, while death and other grievous consequences of the sin of Adam and Eve will pass to the whole human race, it is not stated that sin itself will be passed on. Indeed, in some later Hebrew writers, the tendency was to consider sin a matter of individual responsibility, each generation making a fresh start (Ezek. 18). On the other hand, Paul taught something like a solidarity in sin when he claimed that "sin came into the world through one man" (Adam) and contrasts the case of the righteousness that came "through the one man Jesus Christ" (Rom. 5:12-21).

Even if we read the biblical teaching to mean that sin is transmitted from generation to generation, it is still a question about how the sin is transmitted. The sin of the first parents could hardly be simply imputed to their descendants, for this would seem to rule out any conception of individual responsibility and would be difficult to reconcile with the doctrine of a just and righteous God. Is the transmission of sin then hereditary—passed along in the genes, so to speak, like the color of one's eyes? Something like this has been the view of many theologians. It would seem, however, to be a very fatalistic view, quite subversive again of any belief in individual responsibility. If it is correct that original righteousness is more original than original sin, sin is not of the essence of human nature but is a secondary deterioration and therefore not part of the original human inheritance.

It was AUGUSTINE who firmly established the doctrine of a hereditary original sin. He associated its transmission with the sexual act that is necessary for the conception of each new individual. This act involves concupiscence, understood as excessive and sinful desire. Augustine could find support for his teaching in some isolated biblical passages, for example, "in sin did my mother conceive me" (Ps. 51:5). While in the centuries before Augustine the doctrine of original sin was not too closely defined and was not part of the nucleus of faith as defined in the creeds, the hereditary interpretation gained strength from Augustine onward.

The British monk PELAGIUS opposed the teaching of Augustine, holding that God has endowed human beings with the capacity for choosing good, and that each one is responsible for either choosing the good or failing to do so. The church authorities sided with Augustinianism in this controversy, though not without some modifications. Eventually, however, a hereditary view of original sin prevailed as official Catholic teaching. The Council of Trent stated that it is by propagation, not imitation, that the sin of Adam is transfused into all his descendants, in such a way that it becomes each one's own.

The contrast here between "propagation" and "imitation" suggests still another way in which the transmission of sin could be visualized. "Imitation" is not perhaps the best word, but the idea is of a more external relation of the generations than is suggested by inheritance. The sinful influence of each generation corrupts the one that comes after it. Though orthodox theologians have tended to be critical of such an understanding of original sin, it is such a view that is most likely to be found among modern liberal theologians, provided they are willing to countenance a doctrine of original sin at all. This way of looking at the matter has been given more plausibility by increasing recognition that no individual exists in isolation, and that the corporate nature of human life calls for a conception of corporate sin. In the social, political, and economic structures of human life, there are endemic "sins" that persist from generation to generation, which inevitably distort individual lives.

Schleiermacher, for instance, spoke of original sin as a "sinfulness which is prior to all action" and described it as "not something that pertains severally to each individual and exists in relation to him by himself, but in each the work of all, and in all the work of each." Such a view would seem to allow for whatever truth there is in a doctrine of original sin, while getting rid of the objectionable ideas associated with the notion of "hereditary" sin.

There would seem to be still another possibility, perhaps more individualistic than those so far considered. This is the view that the fall into sin is repeated in the existence of every human individual. The story of Adam and Eve represents an experience repeated in the history of every human being. KIERKEGAARD is the best-known exemplar of this view. In his thought, sin is closely associated with the paradoxical condition of humanity as beings who are at once finite and free. From the beginning, such beings experience a kind of instability—this is what Kierkegaard calls ANXIETY (Angst). It is a kind of malaise or premonition that already disturbs the tranquillity of innocence. Kierkegaard associates anxiety also with freedom. In the face of freedom and the openness of possibilities that it sets before us, we feel anxiety. It would be going too far to say that anxiety is a predisposition to sin, but it does, so to speak, show us the individual teetering on the brink, so that the fall into sin is virtually inevitable. Kierkegaard uses the illustration of the passage from innocence to the sensuality of sexual experience, but one may not conclude from this that the sins of sensuality are primary.

A different view of original sin is found in the writings of William Temple, but it may be set alongside Kierkegaard's because the finitude of the individual existence is seen as the condition of the fall into sin. It is the simple fact that people look out on the world from their own unique point of view that Temple equates with original sin. This fact means that each one begins with an egoistic tendency, and this has to be overcome if a truly human existence is to be attained.

The biblical story of the Fall does not make it quite clear what the nature is of the sin called "original." Certainly, one could say that the sin is disobedience, though the mere taking of a forbidden fruit might seem to be in itself a trivial matter. There are undoubtedly sexual overtones in the story, and these were probably more pronounced in pre-biblical versions. But the emphasis seems to have moved from the sins of sense to those of the spirit, from sensuality to pride. The basic temptation is "to be as God." It is the same sin that recurs a little later in Genesis in the story of the Tower of Babel. Many theologians have in fact seen PRIDE as the fundamental sin, especially the pride that drives people to usurp the place of God. This is important, because it sharply differentiates the Christian and Jewish understandings of sin from those found in Gnosticism, Manichaeism, and various Eastern religions, where sin is associated with the material and the "original sin" was the mixing of the spiritual and the material. In the biblical tradition, spirit is not immune from sin; indeed, the sins of the spirit are the worst of all.

Neither does the biblical tradition make clear the extent of the fall into sin. Certainly, it is taken to be universal; in Paul's words, "all have sinned and fall short of the glory of God" (Rom. 3:23). But what is not clear is the extent to which sin has gained its hold on human nature, and this has been a matter for controversy among theologians. THOMAS AQUINAS believed that human reason is exempt from the effects of sin and can attain to a natural knowledge of God and of the good, and that people have a natural tendency to seek the good. The great Reformers, on the other hand, believed that sin had been much more disabling than the medieval theologians had allowed. CALVIN taught a doctrine of "total depravity." The ravages of sin had affected the human intellect as much as the will. So he denied the possibility of natural theology, not because there are no evidences of God in the Creation, but because the human mind is too depraved to read them aright. For both Calvin and Luther, the human will was corrupt and in bondage to sin. It could achieve no good by its unaided efforts, only by the grace of God.

The subsequent centuries saw great changes in the status of the doctrine of original sin. The age of the ENLIGHTENMENT came to believe in the perfectibility of humanity. People are by nature inclined to the good. Only inadequate and unjust social structures pervert them from the way toward goodness. LESSING is a good example of a thinker from that period who fervently believed that with the spread of knowledge and of enlightened principles of government, people would attain to a kind of heaven on earth. This whole tendency received a new boost in the nineteenth century with the rise of evolutionary theories. It now came to be widely believed that the doctrine of original sin was a precise reversal of the facts of the case. The human race had not fallen into sin; on the contrary, one should speak of the rise or ascent of humanity, from animality to ever higher levels of culture and civilization. Sin was taken to be the surviving impulses of animality and irrationality in humanity, or, in some cases, artificial taboos restricting free human activity. Not only secular thinkers but many theologians turned away from any doctrine of original sin. It looked as if Pelagianism had finally triumphed, in a form going far beyond anything Pelagius himself had maintained.

However, not all philosophers and theologians were swept away by the fashionable new optimism. The greatest philosopher of the eighteenth century, IMMANUEL KANT, began his book Religion Within the Limits of Reason Alone with a lengthy discussion of the "radical evil" in human nature. He rejected the common belief in progress (at least, progress in moral matters), as hopelessly contradicted by the evidence of history. Of course, Kant's belief in a radical principle of EVIL is not the same as a doctrine of original sin. Nevertheless, the persistence of evil in spite of all human progress in knowledge does raise a problem, and the doctrine of original sin would be one possible answer to that problem. Kant was swimming against the stream in the eighteenth and nineteenth centuries, but the view that there is a radical principle of evil in human nature has to be taken much more seriously in the twentieth century. Two world wars and a great many lesser wars have brought unprecedented death and destruction; oppressive regimes in many parts of the world engage daily in plunder, murder, and torture; crime, unemployment, poverty, and inflation show no signs of being eliminated. We are told that in the case of some of these evils the techniques are available for overcoming them, but the will is lacking. The acknowledgment that there is a question of will here brings us right back to such questions as the bondage or impotence of the will, to original sin, radical evil, and more or less equivalent ideas. Thus the twentieth century has witnessed a revival of interest in these topics, and this has received an impetus of urgency from the almost apocalyptic anxieties roused by fears of nuclear war and environmental deterioration.

The twentieth-century revival of the concept of original sin found its ablest advocate, ironically enough, in the supposedly optimistic and Pelagian United States. This was REINHOLD NIEBUHR. He criticized as "Pelagian" the writings on sin of such liberal predecessors as F. R. Tennant. His own major work, The Nature and Destiny of Man (vol. I, 1941; vol. II, 1943), contains a detailed and brilliant critique of that whole optimistic view of humanity that had developed since the Enlightenment. For Niebuhr, the root sin is pride. "The human ego assumes its self-sufficiency and self-mastery and imagines itself secure against all vicissitudes. It does not recognize the contingent and dependent character of its life and believes itself to be the author of its own existence, the judge of its own values, and the master of its own destiny." The Tower of Babel was a favorite image used by Niebuhr to symbolize this fallen state of the human race. We have to remember, of course, that he was writing against the background of the power politics and absolute dictatorships of the early twentieth century. This proud and egoistical self-assertiveness, so evident in the dictators but present in some degree in every human being, constitutes a predisposition toward sin. But Niebuhr rejected any doctrine of total depravity that might turn sin into a fate or deprive the human will of its freedom. So he maintained paradoxically that sin is inevitable but not necessary.

The heavy emphasis on sin was characteristic of other theologians of Niebuhr's generation. BARTH came near to a doctrine of total depravity, and, like Calvin, he rejected natural theology and even "religion" (as he understood the word) as attempts by fallen humanity to grasp God. Such attempts could only end in the construction of distorted idols. Niebuhr flatly rejected such teaching as exaggerated and dangerous. He claimed that it really blamed human beings for being human and not divine.

Some of these theologians found allies among existentialist philosophers, who had likewise revolted against the optimistic anthropology of previous generations. They too were claiming that human nature is flawed. HEIDEGGER, for instance, was talking about the "falling" or "deterioration" of the human existent, who resigns freedom and responsibility to become an unthinking unit in mass existence; or who, in preoccupation with the world of things, becomes just another item in that world. The Russian existentialist BERDYAEV made a similar claim, though in a different language. He held that the original sin is objectification. Human beings have put the objectifying relation to things before intersubjective relations, and in doing so have gone far to becoming manipulable objects themselves.

Writers both theological and philosophical have been less obviously concerned with original sin in the later decades of the twentieth century. Why this should be so is not obvious, since the conditions that provoked Niebuhr and the others have not gone away. Perhaps this simply means that original sin continues to be a fact of human life. J.M.

ORTHODOX CHURCHES. The worldwide communion of a number of self-governing or autocephalous (independent of external, especially patriarchal, authority) churches, situated originally in eastern Europe and the Middle East. The term "Orthodox" means "right doctrine."

The churches of Eastern Orthodoxy are generally independent of one another, but they share the same faith, are in communion with one another, and acknowledge the primacy of the patriarch of Constantinople. There are four highly honored ancient patriarchates: Constantinople, Alexandria, Antioch, and Jerusalem. Then come the more recent patriarchates of Russia, Serbia, Romania, Bulgaria, and Georgia, as well as the Orthodox churches of Cyprus, Greece, Czechoslovakia, Poland, and Albania. There are independent churches also in Finland, China, and Japan, as well as three administrations among Russians living outside the Soviet Union.

The family of Eastern Orthodoxy claims to be a segment of the continuing Christian church established by Christ and the apostles. The first fracture in the church of Christ occurred in the fifth and sixth centuries, when the Nestorian church of Persia and the five Monophysite churches of Armenia, Syria, Egypt, Ethiopia, and India broke away. But the GREAT SCHISM between the Eastern and Western branches of Christendom occurred in 1054, resulting in the Roman Catholic church of the West and the Orthodox church of the East. The Orthodox church often describes itself as the Church of the Seven Councils (held between 325 and 787): Nicaea (325), Constantinople (381), Ephesus (431), Chalcedon (451), Constantinople (680-81), and Nicaea (787).

Orthodoxy recognizes the pope of Rome as the chief bishop in Christendom but he is looked upon merely as "the first among equals" and is not granted the universal supremacy he holds over ROMAN CATHOLICISM. The Eastern church respects the place of the episcopate and priestly office, but gives a much larger place to the laity, who sometimes become theologians and preachers.

Orthodoxy recognizes the seven sacraments, or mysteries, as they call them. Baptism is performed by immersion. Chrismation (confirmation) is administered by the priest immediately after baptism, and from infancy onward children are permitted to participate in Communion. The bread and wine in the Eucharist are considered to be the true Body and Blood of Christ. Communion is taken four or five times each year after confession.

The veneration of icons (pictures of saints and sacred scenes) is a standard feature of Orthodox worship, private and public. The liturgy often includes prayers to the Mother of God and saints. However, the Eastern churches do not accept the Roman Catholic doctrines of purgatory or the Assumption of Mary. Monasticism has always been a part of the religious life in Eastern Orthodoxy. Actually bishops are normally chosen from the ranks of the celibate monastic clergy, whereas parish priests are permitted to marry.

Long separate from the churches of western Europe and North America, the adherents of Eastern Orthodoxy have difficulty in accepting the ways of both Protestants and Roman Catholics. Since 85 percent of the Orthodox believers live in Communist countries, their isolation from Christians in the West has been accentuated. Best known to Western Christians are members of the Greek and Russian Orthodox churches because of large-scale emigration. There are more than three million Orthodox believers in the United States, belonging largely to the Greek Orthodox church and the Orthodox Church in America. R.H.

ORTHODOX JUDAISM. See JUDAISM, HISTORY OF.

ORTHODOXY. From the Greek words orthos (correct) and doxa (opinion) and meaning the holding or practice of right belief, in contrast to heresy or heterodoxy, or the departing from correct or established belief or doctrine. Orthodoxy can refer to the normative teachings of any group but is usually associated with the holding of correct religious belief.

In the history of Christianity, the term "orthodoxy" has been used in at least three distinct ways: (1) Originally the term denoted those parties or churches that conformed to Christian belief as taught in the established canonical books of Scripture as interpreted and formulated in the early confessions and creeds, such as that issued by the Council of NICAEA. (2) Eastern Orthodoxy is the term applied to those churches that include the ancient Byzantine patriarchates (highest ranking bishops) of Constantinople, Alexandria, Antioch, Jerusalem, and the later national Orthodox churches of Greece, Russia, Bulgaria, Romania, and others. These churches are autocephalous, that is, are independent, national, or territorial churches with their own hierarchy of bishops, priests, and deacons. They do not recognize the primacy and authority of the Roman pontiff. While they afford the patriarch of Constantinople a primacy of honor, the highest authority in the Eastern Orthodox Church is vested in the episcopacy. It is of interest that, while these churches are called "Orthodox," they have not been required to define belief by means of finely drawn dogmatic statements. Rather, Eastern Orthodoxy stands for the passing on of a sacred tradition, which includes the Scriptures as interpreted by the church, the doctrinal teachings of the earliest ecumenical councils, the testimony of the Church Fathers and, most importantly, the Byzantine tradition of liturgical worship. (3) Protestant orthodoxy is a movement of the late sixteenth through the early eighteenth centuries within the Lutheran and Reformed churches. The theological insights of Luther and Calvin were systematized into precise, logical propositions in a manner reminiscent of the medieval Schoolmen. Religious certainty was equated with intellectual assent to these propositions. The Bible was viewed as a verbally inspired and inerrant deposit of objective information, historical and scientific as well as religious and moral. This contributed to the conflict between science and theology in the eighteenth and nineteenth centuries. (See RATIONALISM.)

J.L.

OSIRIS. See ISIS AND OSIRIS.

OTHNIEL. In Joshua 15:16-17 a Kenizzite chieftain who wrested the city of Kiriath-sepher (Debir) from the Canaanites, for which he was rewarded by receiving from the clan leader Caleb the hand of his daughter Achsah in marriage. The same story is told in Judges 1:12-13. Then in Judges 3:9-11 he is listed as the first of the Judges, credited with the defeat of Cushan-rishathaim, king of Aram Naharaim (translated "Mesopotamia" by the RSV). Probably Aram is a misreading of Edom (in Hebrew spelling the two words are easily confused): Cushan is an Edomite name (compare Hab. 3:7), and the Kenizzites were originally a Midianite (Edomite) tribe, later assimilated into Judah. What is described is internecine Edomite warfare, which the author of Judges has made conformable to the pattern he set for his narrative in 2:11-19.

B.V.

OTTO, RUDOLF (1869-1937). German theologian and philosopher of religion, best known for his influential study The Idea of the Holy (1917; Eng. trans. 1923). Educated at Erlangen and Göttingen, he taught at the latter university, at Breslau, and at Marburg. He began as a disciple of Ritschl but turned to a broader study of the religious consciousness and to inquiry into the religious a priori, or what distinguishes religion from other human forms of experience, for example, morality or reason.

The uniquely religious, for Otto, is found in the category of "the holy." The HOLY, or what he calls the numinous (see NUMEN), is the suprarational, mysterious, inconceivable core of religion. While inconceivable, the holy can, nevertheless, be grasped in certain feelings that comprise the numinous experience. In the presence of the holy, one is, first of all, acutely conscious of what Otto calls creature-feeling—a profound sense of one's own finitude and nothingness. The object of the creature-feeling is experienced as the mysterium tremendum et fascinans. The mysterium is apprehended as a transcendent "Wholly Other," a reality felt but beyond conceptual expression. The tremendum indicates the quality of awe, majesty, and dread in the presence of the holy, while the fascinans points to the simultaneous experience of religious rapture, joy, beatitude, or grace. According to Otto, religion inevitably develops ethical and conceptual dimensions, but the sensus numinis is the unique, a priori essence of religion. Otto has had a profound influence on the historical and phenomenological study of religion in this century.

J.L.

OUR FATHER. See LORD'S PRAYER.

OUR LADY. The English equivalent of the Italian term "Madonna" and the Latin "Domina," meaning the BLESSED VIRGIN MARY. This title is the most popular one given the Virgin in common Catholic piety. Its use in English dates back to the eighth century.

J.C.

OUSIA. A Greek term meaning "that which makes a thing what it is," often translated into English, with varying connotations, as "substance, essence, and character." It figured prominently in the early theological controversies over the divine-human nature of Christ, frequently because when translated into Latin, subtle differences in meaning resulted.

C.M.

OXENHAM, JOHN (1852-1941). Wholesale grocer, novelist, poet, and hymn writer. John Oxenham was the pseudonym used by William Arthur Dunkerley, who was born on November 12 in Manchester, England. Dunkerley was the proprietor of a large wholesale grocery business that operated in England, France, and the United States. A devout Congregationalist layman, he wrote sixty-two books, including more than forty novels and twenty volumes of verse and prose. In 1908 his nephew, the Reverend Dugald Macfadyen, was in charge of a huge missionary exhibition held in London called The Orient in London. Macfadyen prevailed upon his noted uncle to help with the scenario of the pageant. Included in it was the hymn "In Christ There Is No East or West."

R.H.

OXFORD GROUP. The name given to a religious movement initiated by Frank N. D. Buchman, an American Lutheran minister. Later it became known as MORAL REARMAMENT. Buchman stressed four spiritual principles: confession, surrender, guidance, and sharing. These were aimed toward four "absolute" goals: absolute purity, absolute unselfishness, absolute honesty, and absolute love.

Buchman concentrated his efforts on reaching university students who met at house parties where there was an emphasis on meditation, public confessions, quiet times, and recreation. In 1928 Buchman conducted a team of Rhodes scholars to South Africa. The group was referred to then as "the Oxford group," and the name stuck until 1938, when the movement, which now had become international, was designated as Moral Rearmament.

It spread from Great Britain and the United States to Switzerland, Germany, and parts of Africa. In addition, Buchman emphasized that the principles of the movement could transform societies as well as individuals. He was highly praised and received honors and decorations from France, Germany, Greece, Japan, China, the Philippines, Thailand, New Zealand, and Iran.

Buchman employed drama, films, and musicals to promote his cause. Training centers were established at Caux, Switzerland, and Odawara, Japan. After Buchman's death in 1961, Moral Rearmament continued to function with a central office in New York City. R.H.

OXFORD MOVEMENT. An effort within the Church of England that sought to restore HIGH CHURCH standards and practices. Also known as Tractarianism it was so named because a number of Tracts for the Times were issued by its proponents, a group of clergymen at Oxford.

There were several elements that contributed to the thinking behind the movement—the decline in church life, theological liberalism, growing nonconformity, and the fear that the Catholic Emancipation Act (1829) might lead Anglicans into the Roman Catholic church. The proponents of Tractarianism promoted the Church of England as a divine institution. This included emphasis on apostolic succession and the Book of Common Prayer as a rule of faith. A return to pre-Reformation beliefs and practices was urged. This emphasis resulted in the movement's advocates being called Anglo-Catholics.

Leaders in the original movement were the poet and hymn writer JOHN KEBLE, R. Hurrell Froude, EDWARD BOUVERIE PUSEY (whence the name Puseyites), Charles Marriott, Richard William Church, Robert Isaac Wilberforce, Isaac Williams, and JOHN HENRY NEWMAN. Newman, like most of his colleagues in the movement, was a learned man. It was Newman's tracts that developed the thesis of the via media, the teaching that the Church of England held an intermediary position between Roman Catholicism and Protestantism. In time, however, he moved more to the Roman Catholic position and in 1845 was received into that church. Ultimately he was made a cardinal by Pope Leo XIII. Newman, Pusey, and others in the movement wielded immense influence on the High Church trend within worldwide Anglicanism. R.H.

OXYRHYNCHUS SAYINGS OF JESUS. A corpus of sayings attributed to Jesus written in Greek on papyrus in four small fragments and discovered in the late nineteenth century at Oxyrhynchus, about 120 miles south of Cairo, Egypt.

There were many literary finds unearthed at this site when it was explored. The documents were published by B. P. Grenfell and A. S. Hunt and are available today in translation (1898–1977 in forty-five volumes). The sayings of Jesus were recorded on separate fragments. These fragments in part reproduce the material in the Gnostic Gospel of Thomas. This material is found in Papyrus 1, a sheet that contains seven "words of Jesus." The best-known is "Raise the stone and you shall find me; split the wood and I am there." But at least one saying ("Jesus says, I stood in the center of the world . . . and I found all men drunk, but I found none thirsty among them") has a Gnostic flavor, with its pessimistic outlook on fallen humanity from which the Gnostic believer was delivered.

Courtesy of the Committee of the Egypt Exploration Society

Oxyrhynchus papyrus with new "sayings of Jesus," belonging to the third century A.D.

Other caches of papyrus writing contain sayings of Jesus that are similar to the canonical Gospels (for example, Matt. 7:7, 10:26; Luke 17:20, 21). Yet another document (Papyrus 655) has a freely worded rendering of Matthew 6:25-30, about the lilies of the field. A fourth fragment (Papyrus 840), found in 1905, has provoked some discussion. It records a discussion between Jesus and a Pharisee.

The date of the papyri is the middle of the third century A.D., but Papyrus 840 is considerably earlier (about A.D. 150). Estimates as to whether any of the sayings are authentic or derive from a deviant form of early Christianity vary.

R.M.

Pp

P DOCUMENT. One of the literary components of the PENTATEUCH, P is also referred to as the Priestly History. It was written (likely in Babylon) during the period of the Exile (597–538 B.C.), but utilized much older literary material, both legal and non-legal in nature. P surveys the history of Israel from the creation, and, at a time near the end of or just subsequent to the Exile, the document was used to form the framework of the Pentateuch. (See also DOCUMENTARY HYPOTHESIS.)

J.N.

PACHOMIUS. A founder of communal or cenobitic MONASTICISM in Egyptian Christianity in the fourth century A.D. After conversion during army service, Pachomius founded a monastic community at Tabennisi in A.D. 320. Before his death in A.D. 346, eleven monasteries, including two for women, encompassing thousands of monks and nuns, followed his supervision.

J.C.

PACIFISM. A view that may mean (1) opposition to WAR and armed violence as ways to settle disputes and conflicts between nations; (2) convictions, usually based on religious faith, opposing all use of force and violence in human relations, even in self-defense; or (3) the pragmatic belief that nonviolent resistance and action are more effective than violence for accomplishing social goals such as greater justice, freedom, and equality.

Though the term has emerged into general usage over the past century, the hope for peace and the rejection of violence have ancient origins. The teachings of Taoism include the idea of wu-wei (non-action) as a way to inner balance and peace. Jainism, which emerged from Hinduism in the fifth century B.C., emphasizes ahimsa (nonviolence toward living creatures), a doctrine stressed also in Buddhism and some sectors of Hinduism. Among the ancient Greeks, exhaustion from war produced ideas of benevolence and escape from violence. In the Hellenistic period, the practice of amnesty and the notion of universal humanity emerged.

The teachings of Jesus in the NT, with his emphasis on turning the other cheek and loving even one's enemies, provide a firm basis for nonviolence and pacifism in the Christian tradition, though many Christians were soldiers even in the early church. In the Middle Ages, nonviolence was taught by certain groups, for example, the Franciscans. The Protestant Reformation included movements that rejected violence on the basis of the NT and produced denominations known today as "peace churches," with pacifism as a central conviction, for example, the Friends or Quakers, Mennonites, and Church of the Brethren. Most contemporary Christian churches affirm pacifism as one valid Christian view and provide moral support for individual members who, on religious grounds, take a pacifist position and become conscientious objectors to participation in war.

In the twentieth century, the development of highly destructive weaponry and the rising pressure for human liberation have resulted in the growth of peace movements and the refinement of techniques of nonviolent action. Since the slaughter of World War I and the advent of atomic weapons at the end of World War II, there has been a rising tide of efforts aimed at disarmament, the limitation of types and numbers of armaments, and international organization designed to decrease war and violence by means of negotiation, treaty, and law. In a related development, pacifism has been articulated in methods of civil disobedience and nonviolent protest and linked closely to action for human liberation from oppression and injustice.

The establishment of the League of Nations after World War I, the series of disarmament conferences and pacts between the wars, and the attempts to limit the buildup of arms by the major powers represent efforts for peace related to the pacifist movement, though by no means identical with it. The formation of the United Nations after World War II, the extensive negotiations over strategic arms limitation and nuclear testing, and the protests against nuclear weapons illustrate similar endeavors in recent decades. The danger of global destruction by nuclear missiles has led to the emergence of "nuclear pacifism," a movement of those opposed to the production and use of nuclear weapons but not necessarily opposed to all forms of violence or war.

Equally important for an understanding of pacifism today is its relation to nonviolent action and liberation. HENRY THOREAU (1817-62) formulated and practiced the notion of "civil disobedience" and taught that people ought to refuse to obey laws they believe unjust. Developed further by the women's suffrage movement, the most significant strides in nonviolent techniques were made by MOHANDAS K. GANDHI (1869-1948) and MARTIN LUTHER KING, JR. (1929-68).

Gandhi, called Mahatma (Great Soul), shaped a method of direct action founded on the notion of ahimsa (avoidance of injury to living creatures), on the belief in satyagraha (the power of truth), and on the example and teachings of Jesus. In South Africa, from 1893 to 1915, he worked for the rights of oppressed Indians and developed the techniques of nonviolent resistance. In 1915, he returned to India, became leader of the Indian nationalist movement, and, in a brilliant and sustained campaign of protests, fasts, and social programs, compelled Britain to grant India independence in 1947. His last great act was a personal fast in January 1948 that brought an end to the fighting between Hindus and Muslims. But twelve days after this success, he was assassinated by a conservative Hindu opposed to Gandhi's teaching of religious toleration.

Martin Luther King, Jr., Baptist minister, combined the example and teaching of Jesus with the methods and beliefs of Gandhi to guide and empower the movement for civil rights for blacks in the United States. Building on the experience of groups like the Fellowship of Reconciliation and the Fellowship of Southern Churchmen, King forged a strong movement, first, in Montgomery, Alabama, to protest segregation on city buses, and then across the South and the nation to win equal rights for blacks. The method of nonviolent protest, King stressed, is mandated by religious faith and is the most effective form of social action because in the end it wins a double victory: it overcomes oppression and injustice and also changes the opponent. For his civil rights leadership, King was awarded the Nobel Prize for Peace in 1964. He was assassinated in April, 1968, while in Memphis to lead a protest movement.

The beliefs, commitments, and methods of pacifism have been given decisive shape as the movement has broadened and deepened over the past century. Peace has been linked indissolubly to justice and liberation. The techniques of nonviolent action have been tested and refined. The most significant developments now under way are: (1) the recognition that peace is more than the absence of conflict and needs careful research to discover the varied elements uniting humans in covenants of peace (for example, the emergence of peace studies programs); and (2) the insight that it is of crucial importance to train people in conflict resolution by nonviolent methods and to work in specific situations of tension to develop a world of peace with justice (for example, programs like the National Peace Academy, the Peace Brigades International, and Peaceworkers).

C.Mc.

PADMA-SAMBHAVA. Buddhist teacher of the eighth century who was invited in 747 by the king of Tibet to visit his land on behalf of BUDDHISM. According to traditional accounts, which are packed with legendary material, he bettered the shamans of the indigenous Bon religion in both argumentation and magic, and defeated and then converted to Buddhism the native gods and demons of Tibet. Padma-Sambhava is credited with establishing TANTRIC or VAJRAYANA Buddhism in Tibet and with founding the Nyingmapa tradition of TIBETAN BUDDHISM, by which he is highly venerated.

R.E.

PAGODA. A multi-storied tower frequently associated with Buddhist temples, the pagoda derives from the ancient Indian stupa or shrine containing relics, as of the Buddha. The pagoda is usually seen as having symbolic meaning, though interpretations vary. If threefold, it may represent the three worlds or the three forms of expression of the Buddha-nature; if multiple, it may represent the many heavens layered

From Michael Sullivan, The Art of China (University of California Press)

Types of pagodas

above earth or the stages of the bodhisattva path. In China, pagodas in a landscape are considered auspicious for reasons largely connected with feng-shui or geomancy. R. E.

PALESTINE. One of the names, found four times in the OT, to denote the land of Israel (Exod. 15:14; Isa. 14:29, 31; Joel 3:4). These texts, however, more properly speak of Philistia, which reflects the name of the land as the original home of the Philistine people in the coastal region from Gaza in the south to Joppa in the north. The title "land of Israel" (I Sam. 13:19) came on the scene with the invasion of the Israelite tribes who eventually, in the reign of David and the later Hasmonean kingdom, took as possession the land from Dan in the north to the Negeb, with Beersheba as the principal town in the south. Palestine is now an archaic name for Israel, but is still adhered to by non-Israeli dwellers, for example, Palestinian inhabitants in Judea-Samaria.

Topography and Trade Routes. Palestine occupies a strategic position on the map of the Syrian Levant or Fertile Crescent, which spans the two great ancient civilizations of EGYPT and MESOPOTAMIA. The coastal corridor was a much traversed region, affording commerce and armies an easy passage in both directions. The coastal road, traditionally known as via maris, ran "by the way of the sea," the Mediterranean or Great Sea. The route ran from Egypt across the coastal plain to the west side of the SEA OF GALILEE, thence to Damascus in Syria and on to Mesopotamia. Other routes of lesser importance follow the rim of the Transjordan plateau from the Gulf of Aqabah in the south, and go north to Damascus. The occupation of this area can be observed from the towns listed in Numbers 21:27-30. The third route offers the shortest distance between Sinai and the land of Israel, connecting towns such as Kadesh-barnea and Beersheba in the south via Hebron, Jerusalem or Shechem in Samaria, and linking the important meeting place of Megiddo at the point where several other caravan routes converge. We observe, with geographers and the flow of OT historical narrative, that all these routes follow a north-south axis, with mountainous regions forbidding much easy passage along an east-west alignment.

Regions. Palestine is divided into several distinct areas, each with its own geology, climate, agriculture, and distinctive contact with other cultures. (a) The Central Highlands, called in the OT the "hill country," rises to about three thousand feet, with a gentle slope to the west toward the Mediterranean Sea and a more abrupt descent to the Jordan Valley. The upland areas, largely infertile, are seen around JERUSALEM (see Pss. 121:1; 122:4; 125:2 for allusions to "going up" to the hills surrounding the city), and the mountainous region around Samaria that extends to the Carmel Range (about two thousand feet but dips to the Plain of Esdraelon). (b) The Plain of Esdraelon lies in the path of the elevated backbone of the Palestinian geological ridge that runs north-south. Its alluvial soil made it a prized agricultural center and much sought after in Israel's history, especially as the main trade routes passed through this basin around Megiddo. (c) GALILEE denotes a hilly area to the east, with two sections, upper and lower. The rainfall and the condition of the soil made Galilee a thriving agricultural locale, with other trades, such as fishing and commerce in the Sea of Galilee adding to prosperity and attracting a large population. The northern aspect of Galilee made it more open to outside influence, culturally and religiously, than the more sheltered south. (d) The Coastal Plain, as its name implies, denotes the cities bordering the Mediterranean, originally Philistia, extending from Gaza to the Plain of Sharon in the north. The Kishon Valley links this northerly region with the Plain of Esdraelon. (e) The Shephelah, literally "valley," describes an undulating belt of land connecting the coastal area to the mountains of Judea. It is the setting of much of the history in the time of the Judges and the early monarchy (I Sam.), and at one end of the Shephelah lies the Valley of Aijalon, another main route for conquering armies to pass. (f) The Jordan Rift Valley is set on the east of the backbone of the chain of mountains that run north-south. This depression in the earth's crust forms not so much a valley as a hole in the surface of Palestine's terrain. The Jordan River follows its course through a geological fault, and there are levels that are among the lowest anywhere in the world. There is a dense jungle of wild animal life and vegetation (see Jer. 49:19; 50:44: "the jungle of the Jordan"), until the river empties itself into the Dead Sea, with a network of caves and mountainous areas containing the citadel of Masada on the western shore. (g) Transjordan, as the name betokens, denotes the region on the east bank of the river settled by the two and a half tribes (Num. 31:1-27) after the wilderness wanderings. The region is fertile—a factor in the tribes' choice to remain on the east of the Jordan and bordering on Moab, which was noted for its sheep-rearing (II Kings 3:4).

Structural block diagram of Palestine

Settlement. Place-names have posed a problem since Josephus' writings were critically examined, with their plentiful references to Jewish historical geography, and Eusebius produced his Onomasticon in the fourth century. Edward Robinson in 1838 took a major step forward in identifying 177 place-names, which expeditions by the early twentieth century have increased to 434. It has been estimated that there are 622 places mentioned by name in the area west of the Jordan in the Bible. Some discoveries have attracted worldwide attention, notably at Jericho and the various sections in Jerusalem, both in the Old City and more recently the ancient city of David at Ophel, thanks to both Israeli and Christian archaeological work. Ancient Canaanite cities, that is, predating the Israelite occupation, have been unearthed at Gezer, Megiddo, Hazor, and Bethel. In Transjordan ancient fortress towns such as Petra and Bozrah have been revealed. Tells at Lachish and Shechem have indicated how civilizations existed long before the Israelites came on the scene. But some identifications remain uncertain because several sites (for example, Emmaus in Luke 24:13) had the same or similar names, and names did change even in the framework of the biblical narrative, for example, Luz became known as Bethel (Gen. 28:19; 35:6). But Joshua 16:2 makes a distinction between the two towns; compare Judges 1:23-26, which shows how the ancient Canaanite nomenclature persisted, in spite of Joshua 18:13, which makes the names synonymous. R.M.

PALESTRINA, GIOVANNI (about 1525–94). Sixteenth-century Italian composer, famous for his works during the Catholic Reformation. Giovanni Pierluigi da Palestrina was born in Palestrina and went to Rome as a boy, returning home to serve as an organist. He later returned to Rome and held prominent positions in church music. He lost his first wife and several older sons in an epidemic, but later remarried. Palestrina's church compositions became the ideal for Roman Catholic church music, as he wrote some 250 motets, many based on the Song of Solomon. He personally wrote the music for over one hundred masses. His Missa Brevis (short mass) and Missa Papae Marcelli are well known. Palestrina is considered to be the musical master of the Roman Catholic Reformation. J.C.

PALEY, WILLIAM (1743–1805). Anglican archdeacon of Carlisle from 1780 until his death. He authored a number of influential books used as texts at Cambridge and elsewhere during the eighteenth and nineteenth centuries. Paley's Natural Theology (1802), Evidences of Christianity (1794), and Principles of Moral and Political Philosophy (1785) were said by him to form a system reflecting the elements of British eighteenth-century theology, not in sophisticated fashion, but in plain arguments. Paley especially founded his apologetic approach on the argument for God's existence from design, that is, that the logical working of the universe, from the movements of the planets to the form and function of the human eye, proves the reality of a divine creator. Natural Theology goes on to show that the God who exists is good. Evidences of Christianity is an attempt to show that Christianity is the one genuine religion based on God's revelation. J.C.

PALI CANON. Buddhist scriptures written in the Pali language, an ancient Indian tongue closely related to Vedic SANSKRIT. The Buddha is said to have favored transmission of his teachings in this vernacular language rather than in the sacred Sanskrit associated with the VEDAS and the BRAHMIN priestly caste, whose authority he opposed. The Pali scriptures, known as the Tripitaka or "Three Baskets," alone are accepted as canonical by THERAVADA BUDDHISM; MAHAYANA Buddhists acknowledge both the Tripitaka (of which they know several variants) and the Sanskrit SUTRAS.

The Pali Canon as now received by Theravadins was, according to traditional accounts of which some aspects are questioned by scholars, standardized as oral tradition by monks in a series of three councils held during the two centuries following the Buddha's death in 483 B.C. It appears to have been first put down in writing in Sri Lanka in the first century B.C. While the Tripitaka is largely teachings put into the mouth of the Buddha, it is impossible to say, after this canonization process, what part of it may be in his exact words. However, it is generally believed that it is true to the style and essential content of the Enlightened One's discourse.

The three "baskets" into which the Tripitaka is divided are these. The Vinaya Pitaka is a book of monastic discipline, presenting detailed rules governing the lives of monks and nuns. The Sutta Pitaka is composed largely of discourses of varying length by the Buddha presenting his basic teachings. The Abhidhamma Pitaka, clearly later than the Sutta Pitaka, presents treatments in technical philosophical language of basic themes of the latter. R.E.

PALMER, RAY (1808–87). Congregational minister and hymn writer. Palmer was born on November 12, in Little Compton, Rhode Island. After receiving training at Phillips Academy in Andover (Mass.), he attended Yale University, graduating in 1830 with a bachelor of arts degree. He was ordained as a Congregational minister and served churches in Bath (Maine) and Albany (N.Y.). He was chosen as secretary of the American Congregational Union, serving in that office in New York City for many years. One of the best-known hymn writers of his day, Palmer is probably best known for "My Faith Looks Up to Thee." Besides his many original hymn texts, Palmer rendered a number of early Latin hymns into English. He died on March 29 in Newark, New Jersey. R.H.

PALM SUNDAY. The Sunday before EASTER, celebrating the entry of Jesus into Jerusalem before his arrest, trial, and CRUCIFIXION. Palm branches were waved and placed on the road before his donkey by the cheering crowd. This event gives the Sunday its name. In liturgical and many free churches today, there is a service outside the church—or even in another place—in which the palms to be used in the day's service are consecrated, then carried in a procession to the church, where Holy Communion is celebrated.

The palms symbolize victory—the final victory over death by Jesus' sacrifice and RESURRECTION. The mood of the day is a mixture of triumphant joy in the procession, followed by a growing realization that the crowds that cheered on Sunday would shout "crucify him" on Friday. Palm Sunday sets the tone of HOLY WEEK with its emphasis on the redeeming death of Christ. J.C.

PAMPHYLIA. A term to describe the coastal area of Asia Minor in its southern area. It is the region referred to in Acts 13:13; 14:24; 15:38 as territory covered by Paul in his first mission. When he sailed from Cyprus, he evidently landed at the port of Atalía, a town founded by Attalus II of Pergamum in the second century B.C. His next stopping place was Perga, an inland town; thence he moved to Pisidian Antioch and left the region of Pamphylia. But his return trip brought him again to these centers, according to Acts 14:24, 25. Evidently the earlier decision to venture beyond the Taurus Mountains into Pisidia occasioned the defection of John Mark, who, it is said (Acts 15:38), "had withdrawn from them in Pamphylia, and had not gone with them to the work" of Paul's missionary outreach. R.M.

PANENTHEISM. A form of THEISM or belief in the existence (or being) of God held by the philosophical theologian PAUL TILlich and the philosophers and theologians of the Whiteheadian or process school. Tillich seems to have developed (independent of Whitehead) his conception of panentheism, which means that everything exists in God, yet God is not the unity of the all, since God transcends even the totality of the world. Tillich's notion of God as Being Itself may be contrasted with the theism of Whitehead's theological follower CHARLES HARTSHORNE. Hartshorne calls his position "di-polar theism," and claims it fully recognizes the perfection of God more than traditional theism, which he calls "mono-polar theism." Di-polar theism recognizes that God includes the world, and thus God is affected by, changed by, the experiences God has with the world. God is, at least on one pole, involved in time and dependent upon the events of the world. However, in essence, God remains (as traditional theism holds) immutable, absolute, eternal, and independent of the world. Hartshorne calls these two poles the primordial and the consequent natures of God. Tillich spoke of the deity as the Ground of All Being, as Being Itself, but he did not identify God with the world. Rather, the structures of Being are grounded in God, while God transcends them in divine depths or abyssal nature. J.C.

PANNENBERG, WOLFHART (1928– ). A distinguished German theologian of the generation following the era dominated by Barth, Bultmann, and Tillich. Pannenberg's theology represents, in part, a response to and a corrective of NEO-ORTHO-DOXY and EXISTENTIALISM. He studied under the philosopher Nicolai Hartmann at Göttingen and Karl Barth and Karl Jaspers at Basel. His most important years as a student were spent at Heidelberg, where he worked with, among others, Gerhard von Rad, Hans von Campanhausen, Edmund Schlink, and the philosopher Karl Löwith.

At Heidelberg he joined with other graduate students in what is called the Pannenberg group, to work on problems left unresolved by theologians such as Barth and Bultmann. The critical issue was the relation of REVELATION and theology to critical history. Both Barth and Bultmann saw the latter as a problem for theology. They sought to make revelation, understood as God's self-disclosure in history, immune to the results of historical-critical research. Barth spoke of events such as the Resurrection as "primordial history" (Urgeschichte), and Bultmann sundered Geschichte, history understood in terms of its existential significance, from

Courtesy of The Westminster Press

Wolfhart Pannenberg

Historie, or scientific history. In both cases the historic Christ of faith was freed from the judgments of critical history regarding the events of Jesus' life and activity. Pannenberg and his circle reject this dualism. Revelation is historical event, and the two cannot be disjoined. This key to Pannenberg's theology is the theme of the book Revelation as History (1961; Eng. ed. 1968), which he published with members of the group.

Pannenberg served as lecturer in theology at Heidelberg upon completion of his dissertation on Dun Scotus' doctrine of predestination in 1954. Subsequently, he has served as professor of theology at Wuppertal (1958-61) and has held the chair of systematic theology at Mainz (1961-68) and Munich (1968- ). He has lectured extensively throughout Europe and North America. Pannenberg has taken a positive view not only of critical historical research but also of philosophy and the natural sciences. In What Is Man? (1962; Eng. ed. 1970), he develops the question of God out of a searching philosophical analysis of anthropology. It is through an "openness to the world," a sense of limitlessness and restlessness, that humankind is drawn to the question of God. And it is radical historicity, not nature, that distinguishes the human from other forms of life. According to Pannenberg, it is in the history of Israel that history in this true sense is first experienced. Historical life entails the search for the meaning of the temporal process and thus raises the question of God.

For Pannenberg revelation is not esoteric knowledge conveyed from on high. It is the self-disclosure of God in history. Revelation is historical event interpreted as "act of God." Since all history is interpreted history, the biblical interpretation of the revelatory meaning of history is not distinct from any other history in this respect. Revelatory history, too, must be open to the judgment of critical history. Christianity must defend its historical claims on historical grounds. Reversing a trend in modern Protestant theology, Pannenberg defends the resurrection of Jesus Christ as an objective historical event. Historiography must not rule out any possibility a priori, and Pannenberg argues that the evidence of the appearances of Christ and the empty tomb give sufficient reason to accept the Resurrection as the most probable explanation of the facts.

Pannenberg sees the Resurrection as the fulfillment of the apocalyptic expectation of Israel and the vindication of Jesus' claim that the fate of individuals in the coming eschatological judgment and kingdom would be determined by their relation to him and his message. The Resurrection, then, is a "foretaste" of the end of history and focal point of God's self-revelation. God's final disclosure of glory, justice, and constancy are already anticipated in Jesus Christ. The Resurrection also is a sign of the openness of history and the future of God. God's eternity does not imply a timelessness and impassability. One can conceive of a genuine openness and futurity in God's relation to the world, as in Hegel, without sacrificing God's constancy and sovereignty. Pannenberg's theology is radically future-oriented and eschatological. For Pannenberg, however, the credibility of Christianity is predicated finally on what we know about Jesus. Therefore he advocates a "Christology from below," one arising from the historical Jesus, his message and fate, to a recognition of his divinity, seen in his perfect communion with and openness toward God the Father and vindicated in the Resurrection.

Pannenberg's principal contribution is his re-engagement of theology with critical history, philosophy, natural science, and culture generally. While his prolific writings have moved theological discussion ahead on many fronts, his work leaves questions requiring further elucidation. His objective historical claims for revelation and his claims regarding Jesus' message and life provoke dissent from some theologians and NT scholars, as does his ambiguity regarding the status of theological discourse. Some consider the epistemological and metaphysical grounding of his theology as needing a greater systematic elaboration. Among Pannenberg's other writings, available in English, are Jesus: God and Man (1968), Basic Questions in Theology, vols. I-III (1970-73), Theology and the Kingdom of God (1969), The Idea of God and Human Freedom (1973), Theology and the Philosophy of Science (1976), Faith and Reality (1977), Ethics (1981), and Anthropology in Theological Perspective (1985).

J.L.

PANTHEISM. Religious, philosophical doctrine that identifies the world with God and God with the world. As a result the IMMANENCE of God is stressed and the idea of TRANSCENDENCE negated.

Platonic thought, with its emphasis on the idea as the real, has a tendency toward pantheism. It is a monistic system within which evil becomes no more than the other face of good or is viewed as illusory. Spinoza enunciated this philosophy in the West in the eighteenth century, affirming that God is not only the cause of the world but is also to be identified with the world. Idealistic thought has affinities with pantheism, as has transcendentalism, the New England nineteenth-century form of German idealism. Although "immanentism" is not strictly pantheistic (it could allow for the transcendence of God), the stress is on the subjective existence of God in the world. Pantheism takes away the distinctiveness of God, the "otherness" that has been characteristic of the understanding of God in Western religions. Bergson's idea of creative evolution is not completely pantheistic. Teilhard de Chardin coined the word PANENTHEISM to indicate his understanding that although God has objective reality, God is also completely existent within the created world.

I.C.

PANTOKRATOR. A Greek term meaning "The Almighty," applied to Jesus Christ in Byzantine times. Many paintings show Jesus as lifted up high above the earth, moon, and stars as Lord of all. The term shows Christ as universal ruler and source of the authority of the church and the state.

J.C.

PAPACY. See POPE.

PAPIAS (about A.D. 60-130). Bishop of Hierapolis in Asia Minor, whose chief literary credit is his Exposition of the Lord's Oracles in five books, but only fragments remain, mainly in Eusebius' Church History. His testimony to the apostolic authorship of the Gospels is the subject of much dispute, and his worth as a historical source has been in contention since Eusebius' day. The latter had a low view of Papias' intelligence on account of his millenarian beliefs, which Eusebius discredited. More recently Papias is believed to be reacting to MARCION, a teacher who championed the Gospel of Luke. Papias evidently wanted to assert the authority of the other three Gospels as emanating from the apostles or their close followers.

R.M.

PAPYRUS. A species of reed, grown particularly in the Nile Delta marshes but also in parts of Palestine.

Courtesy of the Department of Rare Books and Special Collections, The University of Michigan Library

Papyrus leaves of the Pauline Epistles dating from about A.D. 300. On the left is Hebrews 9:10-16, and on the right is Hebrews 9:18-26.

As a plant it grows ten to fifteen feet high. When cut the stem is divided into sections and two layers are formed running crosswise to form a surface that is polished smooth. The sheets are stuck together to make a roll or scroll. The two sides are usable for writing purposes; the smoother side called recto, the obverse side verso.

Papyrus became the original writing material for Christian purposes, though it lacked convenience and made quick reference to selected passages a difficulty, since one had to unwind the scroll to find a chosen place. It was, however, relatively inexpensive, as we see from wide margins left and large unwritten areas of surviving documents. The ink used for writing lacked an acid base, and so the script could be erased by a sponge and a papyrus used afresh. Indentations made by the stylus, itself formed from a papyrus reed sharpened to a point, remained. In that case, the papyrus was discarded, or if there was urgent need, reused. Thus we have extant specimens of a palimpsest (writing material on which the earlier writing, now erased, is just visible, underneath a second set of letters).

From the Hellenistic period thousands of papyri have survived in the sands of Egypt, and have been collected, edited, and published in translation, notably by G. Milligan. (See WRITING AND WRITING MATERIALS.) R.M.

PARABLE. A variety of types of literature are designated mashal in the Hebrew Bible. Proverbs or aphorisms translate meshalim (Ezek. 12:21-23; riddles or dark sayings, Ps. 78:2); bywords (terms of derision or contempt, Jer. 24:9); taunt songs (Mic. 2:4; Isa. 14:3-6). Job's complaint is referred to as a mashal: the English rendering "discourse" shows how far removed is the common view concerning the identification of "a parable" (Job 27:1; 29:1).

Biblical Hebrew lacked the linguistic nuances available to the Greek OT translators so that parabolē could distinguish with greater precision a particular literary type. The English language provides the same advantage. However, the writers of the Synoptic Gospels do not adhere to such niceties of speech. Twenty-two sayings of Jesus are called parables. Four of these are in words attributed to Jesus—Mark 4:11; 4:30; 13:28; Luke 4:23. Of these four parables, two are not of the same type: Mark 13:28, "lesson"; Luke 4:23, "proverb."

Modern scholars distinguish the typical parable from (a) a metaphor, (b) a simile, (c) a parabolic saying or similitude, and (d) an example story. For a greater appreciation of the parable as a teaching instrument, particularly as used by Jesus, one may focus on the parables in the narrower sense, but in order to perceive the characteristic manner of Jesus' thought, the full range of Jesus' figurative speech needs to be examined. An example of a simple metaphor found in the Gospels is Luke 13:32, where Jesus said "go tell that fox" (Herod Antipas); also Mark 11:17, Jesus likens the Temple to "a den of robbers." An example of a simile is found in Luke 22:31. Jesus warns Peter that Satan would have him to sift him like wheat. A few of the many parabolic sayings or similitudes in the Gospels may be cited: Luke 4:23, "physician, heal yourself"; Matthew 5:14, "a city set on a hill"; Matthew 7:17-19, "a tree and its fruits." Features of the "example story" come closest to those of the parable (in the narrow sense), but the former lack the indirect reference typical of the parable type. For example, in the story of the Pharisee and the publican in Luke 18:9-14, the attitudes of the two men are directly portrayed, one is not led by the story to imagine a situation analogous to, but outside of, its world of thought.

With these distinctions in mind, we may define a parable as an extended metaphor (drawn from nature; common, human experience; or the Scriptures) that may or may not be a free invention, but that in any case describes a situation analogous to "real life" (it might have happened). The story line of the parable arrests the hearer with the aptness or strangeness of the analogy, and leaves the mind in sufficient doubt as to its application, thus actively directing the person or group addressed to the storyteller's intended meaning. The Synoptic Gospels contain many parables of Jesus that evidence his masterful use of this form of teaching.

From earliest times the aptness of Jesus' parables was perceived by his followers, and they were appropriated to meet the needs of particular Christian communities. These developments are evidenced in the forms and settings of the parables in Mark, Matthew, and Luke. (The Gospel of John does not contain "parables" so defined.) In some of the synoptic parables, three levels of meaning may be discerned. There is, first of all, the parables' original setting-in-life, reporting the situation occasioning the parable as spoken by Jesus to specific groups: his disciples, opponents, or a crowd of listeners. Second, the texts of some of Jesus' parables may reflect their application to various situations facing his followers after Easter and before the composition of the Gospels. And, finally, one may locate in some of the parables the particular concerns of each of the evangelists by observing their selection, placement, and interpretation of the parables of Jesus. Thus one may speak of the parables of the Gospels as "thrice-told tales."

Brief notice may be taken of certain modifications of Jesus' parables during the period of their oral transmission and/or when they were given their canonical shape by the evangelists. A change of audience may be seen to alter the meaning of a parable (compare Matt. 18:12-14 and Luke 15:1-7). Allegorical interpretations of a whole or detail may be secondary (compare Mark 4:13-20 and parallels; Matt. 13:36-43; also Matt. 22:1-14. [note 22:7, a post A.D. 70 gloss?]; see Luke 14:16-24 [v. 21-23, the second invitation, a Lukan addition?]). While it is a doubtful principle to attribute every evidence of allegory to early Christian exegesis, the eschatological parables of Jesus were especially susceptible to reinterpretation: some having a reference to the crisis precipitated by his ministry were applied to the imminent crisis of his return in glory (Matt. 28:14-30; compare Luke 19:12-27).

While signs of the transformation of the parabolic tradition of the Gospels are demonstrable, it may be concluded that the main "parables," as defined above, are distinctive, and as creations of Jesus are revelatory of his mind and message. They are of incomparable importance for knowledge of the historical Jesus.

Perhaps one may say that the parables of the Gospels, both for Jesus and his followers, are intended to clarify the nature of the coming Kingdom of God, to impress upon all who reflect upon them the original thoughts of Jesus concerning this kingdom, and to stir them to make the appropriate resolves and responses.

J.L.P.

PARACLETE. The Greek word parakletos belongs to the world of the law court, and is variously rendered as "counsel for the defense, advocate, intercessor." It belongs primarily to the vocabulary of the Fourth Gospel (John 14:16, 26; 15:26; 16:7), with the only remaining reference being found in I John 2:1. There are two specific uses of the term. (1) In I John 2:1 Jesus Christ is given this title as the one who represents the church in the heavenly court as its advocate, a theme elaborated in the intercessory prayer of John 17. The same title is known by inference in John 14:16, where Jesus is clearly both claiming to be the disciples' helper and promising to give them "another Counselor" (NIV), the HOLY SPIRIT. (2) The balance of the NT texts that use the term parakletos refer to the ministry of the Spirit, who fulfills a manifold function as Christ's agent in the church and the world. Specifically the Spirit leads into truth, exposing human folly and need, and the Spirit strengthens believers in time of testing. More centrally to Johannine thought, the paraclete acts as Christ's alter ego, making up for the absence of the exalted Lord by becoming to the church after the Ascension all that the historical Jesus had been to the disciples while he was on earth.

R.M.

PARADISE. Literally implying a park, the Persian loanword "paradise" is linked in both Jewish and Christian thought with the seat of God's presence, where there is bliss and untroubled serenity such as the ancients conceived in a garden (EDEN) of delight (see Gen. 2:8-17 for the classic description, as well as Song of S. 4:13 and Ezek. 31:1-9, 16-18; Ezek. 28:11-14 is sometimes related to this scene).

The parkland thus takes on the meaning of the home of the blessed dead in Jewish apocalyptic writings in contrast to GEHENNA, a place of torment for the evildoer, based on a refuse area in the Hinnom Valley in Jerusalem.

"Paradise" occurs three times in the NT. (1) Luke 23:43, which is Jesus' promise to the penitent thief on the cross: "Today you will be with me in Paradise." Jewish cosmology divided the heavenly world into two sections: the lower region of paradise was a temporary resting place prior to the Resurrection; the upper part was to be peopled after the Resurrection as an eternal home. So Jesus' promise relates to the lower compartment. (2) In II Corinthians 12:3, "caught up into Paradise" refers to Paul's out-of-the-body rapture, when in ecstasy he visited the heavenly regions. The background here is the Jewish mystical tradition that thought of Israel's great people as ascending to God's presence. (3) Revelation 2:7 contains descriptions modeled on Genesis 2, since the "tree of life" is evidently the same in both cases (see Rev. 22:2). In Christian expectation and hymnody the yearning for paradise is tantamount to the soul's desire to be at rest in the city of God. This is likened to paradise restored, as Revelation 21-22 are full of echoes in Jewish apocalyptic for a blissful existence in the divine presence.

R.M.

PARADOX. That state of affairs in which mutually contradictory predicates are ascribed to the same subject, yet it is felt that in spite of the contradiction, both predicates must be so ascribed. Paradox is therefore often defined as an apparent contradiction. Paradoxes occur in many fields, and philosophers have long been aware of them. The logical enigmas known as the paradoxes of Zeno were much discussed in ancient times, and only in recent decades have they been solved (if indeed they have been solved). Another paradox often mentioned is the fact that in modern physics light can be considered as wave-motion or as a stream of particles. Here, however, we are concerned with paradox in theology and philosophy of religion. God is said to be transcendent and immanent, the most distant and the nearest, and so on. Jesus Christ is claimed to be truly and fully God, and truly and fully human. Can such paradoxes be justified, or do they point to a fundamental contradiction and incoherence in the whole enterprise of God-talk?

The notion of paradox is associated especially with KIERKEGAARD. He developed it in opposition to the panlogism of HEGEL. Hegel was as much aware as Kierkegaard of the dialectical clash of opposites in human experience, but he believed that reason has the capacity for reconciling such opposites in a higher synthesis. This conviction underlies the triadic structure of the whole Hegelian system. Kierkegaard did not share this confidence in the omniscience of reason. There are situations where, as he expresses it, reason "makes a collision," that is to say, it strikes against something that it cannot penetrate or analyze. When that happens, there are two possibilities. Either one takes offense, and turns away from the irrational absurd; or one takes the LEAP OF FAITH, leaping ahead of reason to embrace the irresolvable paradox. The "absolute paradox" for Kierkegaard was the doctrine of the God-man, Christ. There is no way reason can explain it. So either there is offense, or faith is a paradox. Many critics have thought that Kierkegaard's advocacy of paradox is too arbitrary and his attitude too much one of "take it or leave it!"

Long before Kierkegaard, Nicholas of Cusa had taught that God is the coincidence of opposites (coincidentia oppositorum), but he had defended this teaching by elaborate arguments that appealed to the logic of infinity in mathematics. In his treatment of infinite quantities, the mathematician employs a logic that contradicts the logic of everyday discourse. May it not be that a similar contradiction must arise when one speaks of the infinite being of God?

More recently, Donald Baillie has given an interesting defense of paradox. He points out that there is no way in which the curved surface of the earth can be projected upon a flat piece of paper without distortion—in other words, there can be no map that accurately shows the earth's surface, just as, presumably, there is no language that accurately describes God. Some map projections distort areas, while preserving shapes; others distort shapes, but correctly represent relative areas. It is impossible to combine these maps in one; they can only lie side by side, but then each can correct the other and lead to a better understanding than a merely one-sided representation. J.M.

PARAN. The name given to the region surrounding Kadesh (Num. 13:26), frequently called the Wilderness of Paran, encompassing the land of the southern Negeb of Palestine and the northern reaches of the Sinaitic peninsula. Kadesh (Kadesh-barnea in Deuteronomy), a cult center for some elements of the later Israelite tribal federation, has been worked into the standardized history of the Exodus as a way station (of forty years' duration, see Deut. 1:1-3) of all Israel in its journey from Egypt to Canaan. Paran, in this outline, was the scene of a nomadic existence after the events that had taken place at Mount Sinai, and from it the land of Canaan was spied out (Num. 13:1-3). The El-paran of Genesis 14:6 is probably Elath, on the border of Paran; this same verse indicates that Mount Seir of Edom is included in the area of Paran. In Deuteronomy 33:2 Sinai, Seir, and Mount Paran appear as three names for the same place, probably reflecting the tradition of a more northern location of Mount Sinai. B.V.

PARAPSYCHOLOGY. See EXTRASENSORY PERCEPTION.

PARCHMENT. The name is taken from the Latin pergamena, itself derived from the city of Pergamum, where, tradition has it, the WRITING material was invented by King Eumenes II (197–158 B.C.). The material used is that of animal skin, which is shaved, tanned, and scraped to make a smooth surface. The two sides are available for use, with the hair side preferred by the rabbis who copied the sacred books of Judaism onto this substance. It is the chief material on which the Dead Sea Scrolls were recorded.

R.M.

PARDON. See FORGIVENESS.

PARISH. A definite territorial district served by a Roman Catholic church, the pastor of which is in charge of all spiritual work with the faithful. In Protestant usage it refers to the people within a territory who attend a specific church. Most people belong to parishes near their homes. J.C.

PARK, JOHN EDGAR (1879–1956). Pastor, hymn writer, educator. John Edgar Park was born on March 7 in Belfast, Ireland. He was educated at New College, Edinburgh, the Royal University of Dublin, and later in the United States at Princeton Theological Seminary. He pastored churches in New York and Massachusetts and in 1926 was made president of Wheaton College, Norton, Massachusetts. He wrote the text of the hymns "We Would See Jesus" and "Lo, His Star Is Shining." Park died in Chicago, Illinois, on March 4. R.H.

PARKER, THEODORE (1810–60). Unitarian theologian and leader of TRANSCENDENTALISM. He was born on August 24 in Lexington, Massachusetts, the son of John and Hannah Stearns Parker. Largely self-educated, he entered Harvard Divinity School and graduated in 1836. On April 20, 1837, he married Lydia Cabot and on June 21, was ordained to the West Roxbury Congregational Church, which he served until 1845.

His May 19, 1841, ordination sermon, "The Transient and Permanent in Christianity," reflecting acceptance of German critical studies, scandalized Christians of every stripe, including conservative Unitarians. Parker asserted that Christianity did not depend on the actual existence of Christ at all. His beliefs were further elaborated in a series of lectures (1841–42) published as A Discourse of Matters Pertaining to Religion. Parker was a regular member of the Transcendental Club. In 1845 Parker became pastor of the new Twenty-eighth Congregational Society of Boston, where he could freely expound his views on abolition, war, divorce, temperance, prisons, and human rights. N.H.

PAROUSIA. The Greek term parousia, literally "presence" or "arrival," used in first-century literature of the visit of an important dignitary to a city or land, and is usually translated as "coming." A religious meaning in Greco-Roman religion has to be noted, as when parousia speaks of an occasion when a god was revealed in glory or a blaze of light to devotees. The NT usage combines these two nuances with descriptions of the future event at which Jesus Christ will come from the Father's presence to set up God's kingdom, judge the world in righteousness, and show himself in glory (see Matt. 24:3, 27; I Cor. 15:23-25).

The exact time of this "coming of Christ"—Hebrews 9:28 is the only place to mention a "second" coming—is not known (Matt. 24:36), and NT Christians are warned to be ready for it whenever it may occur (Matt. 24:36-44) and to wait with vigilance (Mark 13:35-37) and patience (James 5:7-8) for its arrival. Evidently many Christians in NT times looked for Christ's Parousia in their lifetime (I Thess. 5:1-11; compare II Thess. 2:1-12, which corrects this impression), but in later experience Paul reckons with the possibility of having to die before the Parousia (II Cor. 5:1-10; Phil. 1:21-23). The "delay of the parousia"—in that Christ did not return in glory before the death of the Christians in the first and second generations—posed a threat to Christian hope, and the later NT documents show how the church sought to reply to denials that Jesus would ever return (II Pet. 3:3-5): The Johannine literature offers a more thought-out response in the teaching that the Paraclete, the Holy Spirit, has already come to make Jesus' presence real to believers. The hope of a glorious Parousia was still retained and found a place in the early creeds, for example, "from thence he shall come to judge the living and the dead" (the Apostles' Creed, dated about A.D. 150). (See also ESCHATOLOGY.)

R. M.

PARSIS. Members of the ZOROASTRIAN community in India, also commonly written Parsees, literally "Persians." This community, centered in Bombay, numbers no more than 100,000 but has had considerable influence in modern India, owing to the comparative wealth, high educational standards, and public activity of its constituents.

R. E.

PARTHENOS. A Greek noun rendered "maiden" or "virgin," according to context. The original sense of parthenos seems to be a young woman of marriageable age, and as virginity was celebrated in the Greek pantheon it is only to be expected that Artemis (also called Diana by the Romans) should be known as Parthenos, a virgin goddess.

The OT background of the word is found in bethulah, meaning a maiden, often unmarried, and also applied figuratively to Israel (Amos 5:2; Jer. 18:13; 31:4, 21) or Jerusalem (Lam. 1:15; 2:13). The other Hebrew term, almah, also meaning "a young woman" before her marriage and childbearing, is rendered by parthenos in two key places (Gen. 24:13; Isa. 7:14). Here the word enters the NT vocabulary in reference to Mary, a virgin at the time Jesus was conceived, according to Matthew 1:20-24. Other NT references are in I Corinthians 7, used of wives who retained a celibate relationship to their spouses; and in

II Corinthians 11:2 and Revelation 14:4 "virgin" is used of the church. (See also VIRGIN BIRTH.)

R. M.

PARTHIAN. The sole reference to the inhabitants of Parthia is in Acts 2:9, but there are possible allusions in Revelation 6:2; 9:14ff.; and 16:12, because of the cultural and geographical significance of these verses. The Parthians were an Iranian tribe dwelling in a region southeast of the Caspian Sea, corresponding to the modern province of Khorasan in Iran. The tribes revolted against the Persians in 521 B.C., but fell under the sway of Alexander the Great and his Seleucid successors. Under the energetic ruler Arsaces I (250-248 B.C.), they achieved some independence, and with a later ruler, Mithridates I (171-138 B.C.), a Parthian empire came into existence, extending from the Caspian Sea to the Persian Gulf, with its western boundary the river Euphrates. Hence the allusions in Revelation given above.

Strife with the Romans followed in their history, and in 40-37 B.C. the Parthians overran Asia Minor and Syria and took Jerusalem, installing Antigonos, the last of the Hasmonean rulers, on the throne. The Parthian tribes were a continual thorn in the side of the Romans, and Nero's rumored suicide gave rise to the belief that he was not in fact dead but had escaped to Parthia, from where he would return at the head of Parthian armies.

R. M.

PARTITION, MIDDLE WALL OF. According to Josephus in both Antiquities (5) and The Jewish War (5) a barrier separated the Court of Women from the Court of the Gentiles in the first-century Jerusalem Temple. An inscription, unearthed in 1871 by M. Clermont-Ganneau, was posted on this balustrade. It read: "No man of another race [other than Jewish] is to enter within the fence and enclosure around the Temple. Whoever is caught will have only himself to thank for the death which follows." This fence is called by a term that shows the seriousness of any contemplated trespass, a fear illustrated by Acts 21:27-29. The precise phrase "middle wall of partition" is taken from Ephesians 2:14 (KJV), which is taken by some scholars to refer to this Temple fence. The text in Ephesians will then be using the fall of Jerusalem in A.D. 70 and the ruin of the Temple as a sign, whether anticipated or fulfilled, of the end of Jewish restrictions on access to God and the opening of the door to the Gentiles, who may now gain entrée into the divine presence (Eph. 2:11-13).

R. M.

PASCAL, BLAISE (1623-62). French mathematician, physicist, and philosopher of religion, with associations with JANSENISM. His religious philosophy is contained mainly in the collection of fragments known as the Pensées, put together at the time of his death. He upheld the autonomy of faith and the importance of the will and the emotions in religion, in opposition to the strict intellectualism of DESCARTES. His position can be summarized in the famous fragment that he carried around close to his heart: "God of Abraham, God of Isaac, God of Jacob, not the God of the philosophers and wise men." The philosopher might indeed prove the existence of God, but this brought no relation to the reality of God. Indeed, such proofs might even weaken faith, for even if they were persuasive at one moment, an hour later one might begin to doubt whether one had been deceived. Faith is altogether a more inward and passionate matter than believing an intellectual demonstration. In an often quoted passage, he compares it to a wager. He advises his readers to wager that God exists—if they win, they win everything, and if they lose, they lose nothing.

It would be wrong, however, to think that a man with Pascal's interest in logic and science became anti-intellectual when he discussed religion. Rather, he was pleading for a broader epistemology than was offered by a narrow RATIONALISM: We should be guided not just by logic but by spiritual intuition. We know the truth not only by the reason but also by the heart. The heart has its reasons, which are unknown to reason. This religious faith, which turned away from the abstract and the rational, found its concrete center in an immediate apprehension of Jesus Christ. He becomes the clue to all truth. "Jesus Christ is the object of all and the center to which everything tends. Whoever knows him knows the reason for everything." This is not just empty rhetoric, but depends on a view of humanity as placed midway between nothing and infinity, and so able to grasp both intuitively. Though an important philosopher of religion in his own right, Pascal can also be seen as a forerunner of KIERKEGAARD and Christian EXISTENTIALISM. J.M.

PASCHAL. Pertaining to the Festival of the Resurrection—EASTER. The term is derived from Pesakh, the Hebrew for the feast of Passover. In the Roman church, Paschal time extends for fifty-six days, from Holy Saturday to the Sunday after Whitsunday. It is the period of rejoicing with the risen Christ. J.C.

PASCHASIUS RADBERTUS (about 790–865). Abbot of the French Benedictine monastery at Corbie, who gave the earliest known formulation of TRANSUBSTANTIATION. Although he was chosen abbot in 843, he preferred to study and soon resigned. In 831 he published De corpore et sanguine Domini (The Body and Blood of the Lord), maintaining that when the priest celebrates mass and consecrates the bread and wine, they are changed into the Body and Blood of Christ—for believers. He regarded this as a creative act of God through the priest. While the change was invisible (because the bread and wine retained their appearances), substantially and metaphysically change took place. Although the term "transubstantiation" was not used, Radbertus wrote about the bread changing into a lamb and spoke of the REAL PRESENCE as the flesh born of Mary.

Long theological controversies followed. Rabanus Maurus, abbot at Fulda, supported Radbertus' view but said there was no absolute identity between the sacramental and historical Christ. A fellow monk at Corbie, Ratramnus, opposed Radbertus, saying no real change occurs in the elements, as the sacraments are symbols and occasions for God to act spiritually in believers. The controversies were not settled until the Fourth Lateran Council (1215) dogmatized transubstantiation. C.M.

PASSION. See CRUCIFIXION.

PASSIONISTS. Name given the congregation of Barefoot Clerks of the Most Holy Cross and Passion of Our Lord Jesus Christ, an order founded in 1720 by St. Paul of the Cross. It aims to keep the memory of Christ's sufferings and death on the cross alive in human memory. J.C.

PASSION SUNDAY. Traditionally the Sunday in LENT before Palm Sunday, marking the beginning of the two-week season of Passiontide. In the Lutheran Book of Worship (1978), Palm Sunday is called the Sunday of the Passion. The theme of Passion Sunday is the suffering of Christ on our behalf. J.C.

PASSIONTIDE. The last two weeks of LENT. The Sunday before Palm Sunday traditionally is called Passion Sunday. Passiontide would include Passion Sunday and the week following, plus Palm Sunday and Holy Week, with the observance of Maundy Thursday, Good Friday, and Holy Saturday, and ending at dawn on Easter Sunday. J.C.

PASSION WEEK. The final week of LENT, from Palm Sunday through Holy Saturday. The Holy Communion on Palm Sunday begins the reading of the Passion of Christ. Throughout Holy Week the Passion narratives are read, and thoughts are turned to the sufferings of Christ, who died for the sins of the world. J.C.

PASSOVER. In the Old Testament. The spring festival of freedom, celebrated by Jews in Israel and Reform Jews for seven days and by Orthodox and Reform Jews outside Israel for eight days. It commemorates the Exodus of the Israelites from Egypt. The first and last days are considered a full festival on which work is prohibited, while on the intermediate days work is permitted.

One biblical name of the holy day is "the feast of the passover" (Exod. 34:25). God said, ". . . I will pass over you, and no plague shall fall upon you to destroy you, while I smite the land of Egypt" (Exod. 12:13). Another name is "the feast of unleavened bread" (Exod. 23:15; Lev. 23:6; Deut. 16:16). Pesakh, the Hebrew name of the festival, refers to the paschal lamb, offered as a sacrifice on the eve of the feast (the 14th day of the Hebrew month of Nisan) in Temple times. It was eaten in family groups after having been roasted whole (Exod. 12:1-28, 43-49; Deut. 16:1-8). (Samaritan families to this day roast and eat lambs on Mount Gerizim.)

The Passover rites were divinely ordained as a permanent reminder of God's deliverance of the people from Egyptian slavery. The deliverance from Egypt, however, is more than physical freedom for the Jewish people; more important, it is spiritual freedom. God's act was designed to free the Jews from all heathen influences and to consecrate them to the service of God. That is why seven weeks after Passover, the holy day that commemorates the receiving of the Ten Commandments is celebrated (Shavuot).

Numerous biblical passages set out the observance and laws of Passover. It is described as a festival to be observed "throughout your generations" (Exod. 12:14). All leaven—a substance that causes food to ferment—is prohibited, and only unleavened bread is eaten during the entire festival, in accordance with God's command in the Bible; "Seven days shall ye eat unleavened bread; . . . the first day ye shall put away leaven out of your houses" (Exod. 12:15 KJV). The prohibition against leaven applies to the fermented products of wheat, barley, oats, and rye, and to the use of any foods containing these or which are likely to become fermented. Some scholars say that leaven is the symbol of corruption, passion, and sin. Current practice among ASHKENAZIM Jews is to prohibit the eating of rice, peas, and all kinds of beans; SEPHARDIM Jews permit these. The duty to eat matzah (the unleavened bread) is binding on the first night of Passover, although the partaking of leaven is forbidden throughout the festival.

As a reminder that the Lord passed over the houses of the children of Israel (Exod. 12:27) and spared their eldest sons on the eve of Passover, when the firstborn of the Egyptians were slain, the fourteenth day of Nisan is observed as a fast day for the firstborn sons of Jewish families.

The SEDER, an elaborate ritual feast, takes place on the first two nights of Passover (the first night, for Reform Jews). Its purpose is to awaken hope for the final redemption. The ceremony is based on the injunction in the Bible to parents to inform their children of the deliverance from Egypt: "And thou shalt tell thy children in that day, saying, It is because of that which the Lord did for me when I came forth out of Egypt" (Exod. 13:8).

The Seder dramatizes the only event in recorded history in which the Lord freed an entire people. Through rituals, questions, prayers, discussions, special foods, wine, and song, the Exodus is reenacted and its meaning probed. On the table a platter includes: (1) a roasted egg, symbolizing the festival offering; (2) a roasted bone, commemorating the paschal lamb; (3) bitter herbs, as a reminder of the suffering of the slaves in Egypt; (4) a green vegetable, symbolizing renewal; (5) a mixture of nuts, wine, cinnamon, and the like, as a reminder of the bricks and mortar the slaves were compelled to make; and (6) salt water, signifying tears. Three matzoth (unleavened bread) are on another dish. Those around the table sit in a reclining position, as a sign of freedom.

The HAGGADAH is the script that sets forth the order and narrative of the Seder service. The youngest child asks four questions, and the story unfolds through the answers and the dramatization. Four cups of wine are drunk, corresponding to the four expressions of redemption in the book of Exodus. Elijah, the herald of the Messiah, is welcomed with his cup of wine (Mal. 3:23, the Hebrew Bible).

All Jews in every generation are commanded to regard themselves as having been personally freed from Egypt. They count as the first of the Ten Commandments, "I am the Lord thy God who brought thee out of the land of Egypt, out of the house of bondage." Passover is also a harvest festival and one of the three pilgrimage festivals, the other two being SHAVUOT (Feast of Weeks) and SUKKOT (Feast of Booths).
L.K.

In the New Testament. In the first Christian century, during the life of Jesus and the period of the apostolic church in Jerusalem (to the period A.D. 66-70), so many pilgrims from the Jewish DIASPORA came to Jerusalem that only the ritual slaughter of lambs took place in the Temple courts. Then blood was sprinkled on the altar, and the meal was celebrated in each devout Jew's home or hired lodging. Jesus observed three Passovers in Jerusalem according to John's Gospel, but only one (the occasion of his passion and death) according to Matthew, Mark, and Luke, the Synoptic Gospels. Much messianic speculation surrounded Passover at the time, and many believed the Messiah would come during Passover night. Those who became Christians shared in this eschatological hope and saw the celebration of the Last Supper, Jesus' death on the cross, and the Resurrection as God's promised deliverance—a new exodus producing a new Israel. As the angel of death "passed over" the Israelites marked by the blood of the lamb, even so Christians, the new Israel, are freed from sin, death, and hell by the blood of Jesus Christ, the Lamb of God.

Passover language, ritual, and tradition surround the passion story in the Gospels. The Synoptic Gospels clearly state that the LAST SUPPER was a Passover (Mark 14:1 ff; Matt. 26:2 ff. Luke 22:1 ff.), while the Fourth Gospel portrays Jesus' death on the cross as taking place while the Passover lambs were being slaughtered (John 13:1; 19:31), so the Last Supper could not have been a Passover according to John. Rather, Jesus' death on "the day of preparation," in John, implies that in that year, the Passover fell on a Sabbath (John 19:31). Nonetheless, all the Gospel accounts strongly suggest that the Lord's Supper is a reinterpretation of the Passover meal and tradition. As the original Hebrew meal is a celebration of liberation from physical and spiritual bondage, so too, the Christian Lord's Supper is a celebration of the freedom—and a reception of the grace that gives that freedom—that Christ died to make available to everyone who has faith. J.C.

PASTOR. The English term is borrowed directly from the Latin, where it denotes "shepherd," and it comes over into Christian usage chiefly to describe one of the traditional roles performed by a minister or the clergy. The OT has a limited number of references to pastor(s), confined to the book of Jeremiah and used mainly of the rulers of Israel who are charged with shepherding God's people (Jer. 23).

The word is found only once in the NT (Eph. 4:11), where it is used in conjunction with Christian leaders in their capacity as teachers of the congregation. The same role, however, is implied in the verb "to feed" sheep (as in John 21:15) and to act as a shepherd (I Pet. 5:2). Both verses look back to the model of Christ as the Good Shepherd (John 10:1-18) and pastor of his church, a motif that found its way into early Christian literature and epigraphy. No image in Christian art is more appealing than the depiction of Christ as one who tends his flock, a role that the early Christians found to be anticipated in the OT (Isa. 40:11). R.M.

PASTORAL EPISTLES. This name designates the letters attributed to PAUL and addressed to TIMOTHY and TITUS. The term was first used by P. Anton of Halle, Germany, in 1726 on the supposition that they appeared to him to be written by a pastor for fellow pastors. This assessment is too narrow, however, since there is much in these three letters applicable to congregational life, polity, and worship. The body of letters under this title may be rightly claimed as "pastoral" in another, more satisfactory, way. They provide the reader with insight into Paul's role—whether direct or as understood by his followers—as a pastor to pastors, a leader who provided for continuing leadership in the churches. It is this feature that makes these short letters of special value.

Authorship and Setting. These two matters are interwoven. On face value the letters are addressed to Paul's faithful travel-companions Timothy and Titus, according to the Acts of the Apostles, who have been allotted special spheres of labor: Timothy in the Macedonian churches and Titus in the church at Corinth. It is not surprising that both men received, according to these letters, positions of pastoral leadership in the Pauline churches, at Ephesus and Crete respectively, and that Paul would wish to write to them in a way that fitted their needs as church "officials," offering directives for the congregations on such matters as controlling, guiding, and instructing new members. False ideas had entered on the scene and are menacing, so the two pastors are called to be alert and active in repelling them.

Though these letters speak of Pauline themes such as justification, baptism, the Holy Spirit, and the call to newness of living, and they contain a number of personal names known to us from Acts and other Pauline letters (LUKE, MARK, AQUILA, PRISCILLA), doubts have been raised about two matters. One is the setting of these letters, traditionally placed at the close of Paul's ministry in Acts during his time in Rome. The other relates to whether Paul actually wrote these letters or whether a later writer employed Paul's name to give credibility and authority to what he put down by ascribing it to Paul, presumably believing that he was representing the apostle's mind for a later generation. An intermediate position, much ventilated in recent decades, is that a member of Paul's school used Paul's fragmentary materials, especially to do with travel plans and personalia (II Tim. 3:10-11; 4:9-18), around which he wove these letters to relate Paul's teaching as he understood it, to a fresh set of circumstances that arose after Paul's martyrdom in A.D. 65.

The reasons offered to deny these letters to Paul himself may now be given. (a) There is the presence of language, both in style and content, that stands at odds with what we find in the accepted letters of Paul. The Pastoral Epistles have about 360 words not found in the other Pauline letters. Some of these terms are well-known words, yet in these letters they carry a special meaning: "sober," "religious," "appearing." On the other side, key terms in letters such as I and II Corinthians and Galatians, such as "covenant," "righteousness by faith," "boast," are singularly missing. But this argument must not be overpressed, since the genre of these Pastorals, matching a special clientele and addressed to a particular situation, may explain the unusual vocabulary. Nonetheless it is a strange word list, and there are links with Jewish-Hellenistic moral philosophy.

The assessment of style is more problematic. Grammatical connectives (like the ever-present "and" {kai}), are used in a remarkable way in these letters, and there is a flatness to the writing when contrasted to Paul's earlier letters, which came out of the intense pastoral confrontations at Galatia, Philippi, or Corinth. And those local scenes may well explain the distinctiveness of the type of composition. On the other side, we still have to account for the heavy style, the insertion of hymnic and confessional passages (for example, I Tim. 3:16; II Tim. 2:11-13), and the recital of ethical lists of virtues and vices (I Tim. 1:9-10; 3:2-3; 6:11; Tit. 1:7-8) along with the lengthy regulations given to control the selection and appointment of church leaders.

Conscious of these objections, some scholars have submitted that the differences in style and content, including the variations of titles ascribed to Christ and the heavy emphasis on ethical seriousness, can all be put down to the use of a secretary whom Paul employed. Paul dictated the main themes to be inserted, but left it to his amanuensis-secretary to fill out the letter in the way he saw fit; hence the exceptional style and addition of non-Pauline language.

(b) The type of ministry outlined in these letters, notably at I Timothy 3, has been seen as pointing to a development of the Pauline model in a later decade. The role of presbyter-bishops, deacons, deaconesses, and others, along with teaching on ordination and credentials (I Tim. 4:14; II Tim. 1:6), and disciplinary measures taken against wayward elders (I Tim. 5:19), suggests a time when the church is moving to the rule of a single leader (moniscopacy). On the other side, it has been argued that the model of ministry in these letters is based on the OT-Judaic pattern rather than the situation of an institutionalized church, which we see in I Clement (A.D. 95) and Ignatius (about A.D. 110).

(c) The false teaching opposed by the writer has similarly been interpreted in different ways. Some think of a Jewish Gnosticism that showed interest in myths and genealogies (I Tim. 1:4; compare 4:7; Tit. 3:9; II Tim. 4:4). Others recall how the Greek Corinthians denied the future resurrection (I Cor. 15:12) and find a parallel in II Timothy 2:18 as in the asceticism advocated in I Timothy 4:1-4 and suggest this points to Hellenistic influence. The Tübingen school confidently appealed to I Timothy 6:20 as a sign that the Pastorals were written to counteract the influence of MARCION (about A.D. 140), a teacher deemed heretical and who wrote a book titled Antitheses—"Contradictions"—the very term used in this text (I Tim. 6:20).

But it is extremely unlikely that the Pastorals are so late, since the false ideas are not those of the second century and share a more Jewish character. Decisively the persecutions envisioned in these letters predate the imperial policy of hostility that came on the scene first with the emperor DOMITIAN (about A.D. 90).

Message. The uncertainty of being able to locate these short letters in any given period makes interpretation hazardous. But certain broad conclusions are possible. These letters reflect the beginnings of the "institutional church," with a growing organizational fixity and accommodation to this world's life. Hence the ethical admonitions are slanted, and orders of ministry, with rudimentary creeds and confessions, are part of the church's essence. The writer sends a clear signal via Timothy and Titus to the churches to remain faithful to the Pauline gospel in the face of gnosticizing threats, and this call is one of holding fast to the "deposit" of apostolic teaching. Yet there is also a sensed danger of formalism and a dead orthodoxy. So the writer recalls Paul's teaching and warns against mere creedalism (II Tim. 3:5).

R.M.

PASTORAL THEOLOGY. One of the classical divisions of theology, the others being biblical, historical, systematic, and ethical. It is the study of the practical work of the clergy and is frequently called practical theology, practice of ministry, or pastoral care, although there are distinctions among these terms. In small, traditional denominational or diocesan seminaries, one professor would instruct students in the various aspects of the ministerial role, such as counseling, catechetics, administration, liturgy, and preaching.

Advice about the pastoral office can be found in the writings of the rabbis, the apostle Paul, and such early Christian writers as Clement. The French term curé refers to the pastor as the one devoted to the cure or healing of souls. Pastoral concern in the first Christian generations was to help people prepare for the apocalypse. Later it was to enable them to face persecution and then to live in a Christian culture. During the Middle Ages the sacramental system functioned for pastoral care. The Renaissance and Reformation brought an emphasis on the individual in contrast to earlier generations who knew their identity through identification with a family or community. This perspective brought new emphases in pastoral care. With the eighteenth century came a dependence on rational approaches to meeting life questions, and in the twentieth century, being a Christian has become, almost everywhere, a voluntary commitment.

As the term suggests, pastoral care is based on theological understandings. The basic proclamation of the gospel comes to believers through the liturgy. Here they find themselves strengthened for the perplexities of life through the affirmations that God creates, redeems, and judges. Without this foundation, pastoral care would simply be personal comfort. An understanding of the connections among sin, repentance, forgiveness, and reconciliation, as the process of redemption, is the basis for the Christian effort to help people deal with guilt and broken relationships. The passion and resurrection of Christ form the basis for answering questions about suffering and death. Scripture and preaching, as well as hymnody that accurately reflects Scripture, are avenues for pastoral care. The sacraments of baptism and the Lord's Supper strengthen people with the assurance of the continuing presence of Christ. The minister presiding at these liturgies is functioning in pastoral care. The pastoral offices are opportunities for helping people bring Christian understandings to life situations, such as preparing for marriage and facing bereavement.

From here it is a short step to the counseling process itself. The minister is called upon to help people deal with sin and guilt, understanding these terms in psychological, sociological, and theological perspective. Whatever the techniques of counseling, there is need for people to feel the relief of confession before God, the assurance of forgiveness, and a beginning of the process of reconciliation. In some Christian groups this is a community action, as among the Society of the Brethren. The Roman Catholic Church frequently uses an office of reconciliation to deal positively with confession and penance. People need to feel assured that the pastor speaks a word from God that cleanses and restores. Healing of mind and body are interrelated.

The preparation for these liturgical actions is a teaching function. In reflecting on the marriage service with the pastor, the people become aware of the biblical references and the theological intentions. Talking with families about scriptural materials and hymns for a funeral helps them understand the biblical meanings of eternal life. Reconciliation requires reflection on the meaning of redemption. Healing is reflected in Gospel stories. Those who are being prepared for baptism (or parents and sponsors of infants) and those being prepared for confirmation, the adult confession of faith, will be reflecting on the renunciations to be made, the promises to be accepted, and the confession of faith to which they will give themselves. As pastor and confirmands talk together, a whole dimension of pastoral care is established. New relationships are formed with families, young people, and adults entering upon church membership. The biblical and theological understandings of baptism and confession of faith in Christ are the foundation on which such catechetical pastoral care takes place.

Pastor means "shepherd," and if the pastor is leader of all the people, then the nature of Christian community is an element in pastoral theology. Church administration is different from business administration. It is a stewardship process through which people live their commitment. At its best, it leads them to know that the church is called to witness to the gospel. It involves interrelationships among people on boards and committees. Evangelism and service are aspects of pastoral theology, involving lay and clerical members.

For this reason, pastoral theology must address the meaning of laity in the church as well as the meaning of clergy. The functions described here have seemed to be clerical. It is also clear that they could not be accomplished without cooperation from laity who also function pastorally. Pastoral theology is also concerned with the role of lay ministers, whether or not they have been "set apart" by ordination.

In the past theology rested on philosophical bases regarding the nature of human beings. Today it also includes insights from psychology, sociology, history, and the natural sciences. Important as these are in giving basic theory and useful methods, they must be evaluated in terms of the basic Christian understandings about God and human beings on which pastoral theology is based. Pastoral psychology is a tool for pastoral care, which is an expression of pastoral theology.

I.C.

PATER NOSTER. The LORD'S PRAYER, taken from the first two words in Latin ("Our Father"). The Latin term was once used to refer to a rosary or other aid to prayer, whether the prayer was the Lord's Prayer or some other prayer.

J.C.

PATICCASAMUPPADA. From the Pali words meaning "chain of causation," or, more literally, "dependent origination." In the philosophy of Buddhism, an important concept that interprets the continual arising (samudaya) and passing-away (nirodha) of all phenomena of the world, including separate human existence. The chain of causation is a never-ending process within "conditioned reality," for every cause has itself a prior cause. Paticcasamuppada was first applied in Buddhist texts to the understanding of human existence through a series of "links" in the chain of causation, which perceived the deep interrelationship of mental and physical existence. In the most common versions these nidanas or links are twelve in number, beginning with ignorance. Ignorance begets volition, volition consciousness, consciousness dependence on the physical sense, which leads to birth in this world and the production of further KARMA, which after the end of the chain in old age and death starts it all over again. In Mahayana philosophy "dependent origination" has developed further cosmic and metaphysical meaning.

R.E.

PATIMOKKHA. From the Pali language, meaning literally "that which binds." A part of the VINAYA PITAKA, the Buddhist book of monastic discipline, which give some 227 rules by which monks are expected to abide. These range from the citation of serious offences, such as theft and murder, for which a monk would be expelled from the order, to rules of etiquette and methods for handling disputes. These rules are formally read to monks at services held every new and full moon.

R.E.

PATMOS. An island in the present-day Sporades chain in the Greek Archipelago of the Mediterranean Sea, southwest off the coast of Turkey, west of Miletus. It is ten miles long by six miles wide, and notable for its rocky terrain. Here, according to Revelation 1:9, John, the author of the Apocalypse, was exiled for his faith. According to tradition he saw the visions of the book of REVELATION in a cave at Patmos, and the present monastery of St. John was built over the site in A.D. 1088. Originally a temple dedicated to the Greek goddess Artemis, the location of the St. John monastery became a center of learning and the home of an important library. Patmos became an island bastion of the Greek Orthodox faith. In the sixteenth century it passed to Turkish rule but enjoyed a measure of self-determination. In 1947 it was made part of the Greek Dodecanese (see photo on next page).

R.M.

Herbert G. May

View of the island of Patmos showing the harbor. The island was one of several in the Aegean Sea used by the Romans to banish political prisoners.

PATON, JOHN GIBSON (1824–1907). A missionary from Scotland to the New Hebrides, Paton left school early to devote his spare time to studying. While working as a city missionary in Glasgow he studied theology and medicine at the university there and volunteered for the Presbyterian missionary work in the New Hebrides, where he was sent in 1859. His early work met with little success and he was forced to flee in 1862. He traveled widely in Australia and Scotland in the following years raising funds for the New Hebrides mission. He later returned to mission work there from 1866 to 1881, when he worked on the island of Aniwa. In later years he personally raised funds for the mission, and when his biography, written by his brother, was published, a John G. Paton mission fund was established.

W.G.

PATRIARCH. A bishop who holds the highest rank in the Roman Catholic Church, after the pope. There are several patriarchates, other than Roman Catholic: the Coptic Patriarch of Alexandria, the Melkite, Syrian and Maronite Patriarchs of Antioch, the Armenian Patriarch of Cilicia, and the Chaldean Patriarch of Babylon.

J.C.

PATRIARCHS. Derived from the Greek pater, "father," and archos, "ruler," the term "patriarch" refers to the male head of a tribe or a religious community, or even simply a venerable elder. In looking back upon Israel of old, the NT writers used the term of David (Acts 2:29), the twelve progenitors of the tribes of Israel (Acts 7:8-9), and specifically of Abraham (Heb. 7:4). The term is sometimes applied generally to the progenitors of the various human races and tribes mentioned in the primeval history (Gen. 1–11). In the tradition of modern biblical interpretation, however, the term has come to refer above all to the three great figures who stand at the beginning of Israel's history, ABRAHAM, ISAAC, and JACOB, whose saga is recounted in Genesis 11:26–35:29; 49:28–33.

Many scholars assume that the stories of the three patriarchs (and the matriarchs as well) were told in Canaan long before Israel ever stepped out onto the stage of history. Abraham was the founder and hero buried at Hebron, and his story was preserved at the sanctuary there. Isaac belonged to Beersheba, Jacob to Bethel. But as local traditions coalesced around the fundamental traditions of the Israelite group after its appearance from across the Jordan, the patriarchal legends coalesced as well. In time they became a single family saga through which was woven the scarlet thread of Yahweh's continuing covenant promise of land, progeny, and blessing. W.S.T.

PATRICK (about 389–461). Early British missionary and bishop in Ireland, called the patron saint of Ireland. Many legends but few facts are known about Patrick. He was born in Britain, but exactly where is uncertain. His father was connected with the church, possibly a deacon, and owned property, but whether Patrick received Christian training is conjecture. Captured by Irish pirates at sixteen, Patrick was a slave herdsman for six years, probably near Antrim or in Connaught. Turning to religion, he received a vision to escape and made his way to South Ireland, where some sailors agreed to transport him. He landed either in Gaul or Britain, and some pigs appeared when he prayed for his starving companions. Ordained fourteen years later, Patrick resolved to return to Ireland. The extent of his education remains vague, but he thoroughly studied the Latin Bible and some religious rules, perhaps in Britain, perhaps at St. Lerins. Known contact with Rome is uncertain.

His work probably centered at Armagh. The withdrawal of Roman legions from England isolated Ireland, but that Patrick successfully converted Ireland is attested by its many monasteries and missionaries who in the next century evangelized Great Britain, Burgundy, Switzerland, and northern Italy. C.M.

PATRIPASSIANISM. See MONARCHIANISM.

PATRISTICS. Pertaining to the study of the writings of the early Christian Fathers, proceedings of councils, ecclesiastical pronouncements, and related matters to about A.D. 600. A few of the patristic authors of the EARLY CHURCH, who wrote on virtually every significant topic in early Christendom, were Irenaeus, Tertullian, Basil, Origen, Athanasius, Gregory of Nazianzus, Augustine, and Pope Gregory I. C.M.

PATRON SAINT. In the Roman Catholic church, a saint venerated as a special protector of a specific city, profession, group, or nation, and even of individuals. An individual patron saint is one for whom a person is named at baptism, or whose name is taken by a religious person at one's profession. J.C.

PAUL, ACTS OF. An Apocryphal work, probably from the later second century (about A.D. 160), said by the church father Tertullian to have been written in honor of the apostle Paul by a presbyter (priest) in Asia Minor. The original work was about 3,600 lines long, of which about 1,800 lines remain, in Coptic, Armenian, Latin, and Greek manuscripts. Professor Carl Schmidt reconstructed the text now generally used, which appears in The Apocryphal New Testament, translated by M. R. James (Oxford: The Clarendon Press, 1955).

The most interesting aspects of the legendary romance, constructed from some details of Paul's life, include a supposed romantic relationship between Paul and a woman called Thecla, and a highly imaginative account of Paul's martyrdom outside Rome. There is also a charming description of Paul's personal appearance. The unknown author says Paul was "a man little of stature, thin-haired upon his head, crooked in the legs, a good state of body, with eyebrows joining, and nose somewhat hooked, full of grace; for sometimes he appeared like a man, and sometimes he had the face of an angel" (James, p. 273). Paul is said, at one point, to have been condemned to slavery in the mines. He was reported to be miraculously spared by lions in the arena at Ephesus and to have confronted Caesar Nero as a spirit after his execution. J.C.

PAUL, APOCALYPSE OF. A Gnostic work probably by the Cainites sect, mentioned by Epiphanius and Augustine. Augustine viewed the work as mockery, saying it was full of fables. It was said to have been found in Paul's house in Tarsus of Cilicia—a story denied by the priests of Tarsus. The book was disapproved of by all church officials and condemned by the Gelasian Decree. Nonetheless, the book was widely popular among Western Christians. There are many versions, in Latin, Syriac, Coptic, and Ethiopic, as well as in almost every European language. The outline of the book includes the discovery of the book by way of a revelation, an appeal of the Creation against man, a report of the angels against men, a vision of paradise, and a vision of hell. The vision of hell is terrible, and Paul is said to have interceded and obtained a Sunday of rest for the damned. J.C.

PAUL, APOSTLE. Sources. Our knowledge of the historical Paul is determined by what we read in his authentic letters (that is, those letters traditionally ascribed to him minus the Pastoral Letters which may, however, contain some fragments of Paul's personal notes, and Ephesians, which is best understood as the work of a disciple of Paul who published a refurbished collection of his master's teachings after his death; some scholars also doubt that II Thessalonians and Colossians are genuine). To a lesser extent we may draw on the data in Acts that give an outline of the Apostle's travels, but are self-confessedly incomplete and enunciate Paul's teaching in the style of its author. The Apocryphal ACTS are fanciful, with their description of Paul as short in physical build, bald, and bow-legged, and they are replete with romantic elements, for instance, the case of the "baptized lion" at Ephesus which, preached to by Paul, did not attack him in the arena.

Background. Paul was born and raised as a Jew, with his birth name Saul (he is so called in Acts until the first mission to Asia Minor in chap. 13). He belonged to the PHARISEE party (Phil. 3:5), and was evidently trained in a rabbinic school (Acts 22:3; Gal. 1:13-14). This heritage gave him an inestimable advantage, which may be summarized thus: he was brought up to accept the OT books as a source of divine revelation, and he inherited his father's faith in one God of Israel (Deut. 6:4) whose will was made known in the law, the Torah which was God's chief gift to Israel, the chosen people. Paul never lost the sense of Israel's privilege and destiny (Rom. 9:1-5; 10:1), no matter how much he came to dissociate himself from his compatriots' obstinacy and "blindness" in failing to respond to his preaching of the Messiah (Rom. 9:31-32; 10:2-3, 21; 11:25, 28; compare I Thess. 2:14-16).

Then Paul's career as a Christian missionary brought him into direct touch with the contemporary world of Greco-Roman civilization. He was no stranger to that society. Even if we grant that his formative years were spent as a youth in Jerusalem (Acts 22:3; 26:5), it is still true that Judaism was then no protective cocoon shielding Jews from outside influences. Moreover he had family connections with TARSUS, a Greek university city in Cilicia (Acts 21:39; 22:3), which gave him exposure to the Greek language (Acts 21:37) and culture. So he spoke to the wide audience of the civilized world around him. Recent social studies on Paul's milieu and that of his chief converts have shown that they belonged to an upper- or middle-class bourgeois stratum of Hellenistic society. In particular, Paul's Roman citizenship gave him entré to many situations that were otherwise closed (Acts 13:7; 25:10-14; compare Acts 16:37-39; 19:31; 28:7; Phil. 4:22; Rom. 13:1-7).

The most powerful influence of Paul's life, however, came as a result of his "conversion" in the Damascus road encounter. If conversion is defined as an exchange of one religion for another, there is a sense in which it is a misnomer in Paul's case, for he never ceased being a Jew. What occurred, however, was a change in the "center" of his life's motivation and purpose as a direct consequence of his seeing the risen Christ, hearing a call to his service, and responding with a life-changing obedience (see Gal. 1:15-16; I Cor. 9:1, 16; 15:8; Phil. 3:12; and Gal. 2:20: these verses are the vital autobiographical descriptions he provided later in life, even if he did not refer explicitly to the Damascus meeting). The turning point is not to be understood psychologically as release from past guilt and frustration (Phil. 3:5 denies that; Rom. 7:7-25 does not refer to Paul's life before he became a Christian). Rather, Paul came to see that Christ's resurrection from the dead was the apocalyptic inauguration of a new era in world history (II Cor. 5:17), and that he was privileged to live in that new age of the Messiah's exaltation (II Cor. 3:18) in which Torah religion was effectively displaced by Christ's authority as "Lord" (Rom. 10:4; 14:7-9), his favorite title for Jesus as the head of the church and of the universe (II Cor. 4:5; Col. 1:15-20; Phil. 2:6-11). Being a Christian was being "in Christ" for Paul (a phrase found 164 times in Paul's corpus of writings), and that meant being "inserted" into a new age of God's dealings with humankind, with a fresh allegiance to Christ the Lord and a transforming motive for living, namely to please God with a worthy ambition (see Rom. 12:2; I Thess. 4:1; II Cor. 5:9; Col. 1:10; Eph. 5:10).

Life. Paul's conversion may be dated around A.D. 35. For the next decade, until A.D. 45 when he came to Antioch for what proved to be a second turning point in his career, namely a call to missionary service in Asia Minor (Acts 13:1-3), we are left with only sporadic details. In this time period may be placed his trip to Arabia (Gal. 1:17), his return to Damascus and his subsequent escape, a visit to Jerusalem and a stay in Tarsus (Acts 9:23-25; II Cor. 11:32-33). Possibly also to be included are such events as his experience of II Corinthians 12:1-12 as well as exposure to the many dangers referred to in II Corinthians 11:23-29. His time at Tarsus (Acts 9:30; Gal. 1:21) brought him into touch again with Barnabas (Acts 11:25), who came to seek him and to escort him to the busy seaport of Antioch.

The first mission was launched from Antioch and took the apostolic band to cities in Roman Asia. The success that attended their preaching labors provoked discussion on a topic of central significance: Was the Jewish rite of CIRCUMCISION necessary for male Gentile converts when they sought to be members of Messiah's people? This was a question destined to haunt Paul's mission where, after a disagreement, he broke free from Barnabas (representing Jewish Christianity) and teamed up with Silas, a Gentile, to launch a full-scale assault on the urbanized provincial centers of Philippi, Thessalonica, Berea—with an abortive witness at Athens—and notably Corinth (Acts 16-18).

Paul's church-planting at Corinth was fraught with great consequences (Acts 18:1-17). It gave Paul a base of operations in southern Greece and provided him with a settled ministry for some time (Acts 18:18). As events turned out the Corinthian church became a major pastoral problem, requiring Paul's continuing attention especially during his lengthy stay at Ephesus (A.D. 52-54, Acts 19:10). His work in the Roman provinces seems to have driven him further from the support of the church at Antioch and given him a new independence as a Gentile-oriented missionary in his own right. He sensed the danger of alienation and the prospect of there developing two distinct wings of the Christian movement, one centered in Jerusalem, the other in the Greco-Roman world. This led to his plan to raise a fund to relieve the material needs of "the poor" (that is, Jewish Christians) in the holy city as a way of cementing relations between Jewish Christians and Gentile believers. It was his concern with this fund raising (detailed in Rom. 15; II Cor. 8-9), which brought him on his visit to Jerusalem in A.D. 57-58 where he was arrested in the Temple area; and as far as our certain knowledge extends he was never again a free man (Acts 21:27-33).

After two years in Caesarea as a detainee, Paul uttered the fateful words, "I appeal to Caesar" (Acts 25:11). The effect of this privilege exercised as a Roman citizen was the right to go to Rome to be tried in the emperor's court. Following a hair-raising sea voyage he eventually came to Rome, where in due time he was either set free (so Eusebius the church historian) or exiled and returned later to Rome or—many consider likely—executed in Nero's outburst.

Teaching. It is not easy to reduce Paul's teaching to a system, since he was a missionary pastor and teacher, not a theologian. His teaching was given on a situational basis, as the need arose. He also built on the tradition he had received from his predecessors, so elements of novelty are not easily discerned.

We take our starting point from (a) what he learned from those "in Christ" before him (Rom. 16:7; I Cor. 15:3-5), mainly confessional or hymnic materials he quotes, and (b) the change that came following his encounter with the risen Lord in whom Paul saw the dawning of a new age in God's dealings with humankind, setting divine-human relations on a new basis, that is, not of nomistic obedience but freely motivated love and gratitude (see Gal. 5:6 for a typical Pauline sentiment).

A third component shaping his thought was the kinds of pastoral and theological problems that engaged his converts. In the main these issues were three: (1) A Judaizing faction made much of the continuity between the old Israel and the new. Their platform may be read in Galatians 2:14, and the test case was circumcision as the required badge of belonging to the Messiah's people. Paul sternly opposed this imposition on Gentile believers on the ground that, with the new age of the Messiah's coming, God's covenant with Abraham was opened to embrace all nations (Gal. 3:28-29; Rom. 4:16). So religious restrictions are a denial of what Christ's cross has achieved, namely a freedom to share in God's family as God's children, open to all. (2) At the other end of the spectrum, Paul's preaching of this message—that God's free love is available to all in Christ—was misunderstood. Gentile Christians turned liberty into license (Rom. 6:1, 15; Gal. 5:13) and needed to be reminded forcefully that freedom from legalistic religion did not spell antinomian self-indulgence but called them to a new lordship under Christ's authority, which believers gladly accept and live under (Rom. 6:6-8:39) by the power of the Holy Spirit (Gal. 5:13-26), who is the token of living in the new age. (3) At Corinth and Colossae Paul, or his disciples, met head on an attempt to reduce his message about Christ to a system of philosophy (Col. 2:8) and to turn the church into a Gnostic assembly of the elite. Paul resisted this tendency to indulgence in esoteric wisdom and to split the Christian community into groups (I Cor. 12:12-13; Col. 1:27-28).

From the single premise that in Christ a new chapter in world history has opened, Paul can deduce several other corollaries as diverse as social equality (Gal. 3:28, 29; Col. 3:11); the joy and intimacy of living under the fatherly care of God (Rom. 8:15-17; Gal. 4:1-7); the sense of corporate identity in the church as Christ's body, where each person is valued and the well-being of the whole is of paramount concern (I Cor. 12:12-27); and above all, the primacy of love (I Cor. 13) as the hallmark of Christian existence, in this life and the world to come (I Cor. 15:35-58). R.M.

PAUL VI (1897-1978). Giovanni Battista Montini, pontiff of the Roman Catholic church, 1963-78, born at Brescia, Italy. His father was editor of Il Cittadino di Brescia (1881-1912). Suffering from poor health in his youth, he was ordained in 1920. Later he studied at the Gregorian University and the University of Rome and entered Vatican service in 1924, joining the secretariat of state. He later served as university chaplain and as head of the Catholic University Federation of Italy.

He joined the staff of Cardinal Pacelli, the future Pope Pius XII, in 1937. Upon becoming pope in 1964, Pius XII gave Montini the duties of the secretary of state. He refused a cardinal's hat in 1952 and in 1954 became archbishop of Milan. In Milan, Montini sided with labor, arguing for social justice in his book, The Christian in the Material World. The reforming Pope JOHN XXIII made Montini a cardinal in 1958. The winds of change and accommodation to the modern world brought on by John XXIII's VATICAN COUNCIL II were not resisted by Cardinal Montini, but his outlook was more moderate than John XXIII's. Upon the death of the much loved John XXIII, a curia that wished to accommodate some of the protests from conservatives and give time to assimilate the council's changes elected Montini pope (June 30, 1963). While more oriented toward the hierarchy and tradition than John XXIII, Pope Paul VI nonetheless was faithful to the widespread call for further reform and reconvened Vatican II on September 29, 1963. His plea was for both renewal and unity. In the same way that the more conservative Lyndon Johnson actually put more of the liberal John F. Kennedy's programs into legislative effect than Kennedy did, Paul VI put many of John XXIII's dreams into practice. He produced the Constitution on the Liturgy, the Constitution on the Church, and the Decree on Ecumenism, and reorganized and modernized the curia.

Courtesy of Religious News Service

Pope Paul VI

Pope Paul VI was active in liturgical reforms, approving three new canons and eight prefaces to the Mass. Regulations concerning church music, rites, and the Eucharist were adopted under his direction. This was the most extensive liturgical reform in Catholic history. The Decree on Ecumenism literally changed the relationships between Catholics and Protestants, and Catholics and Eastern Orthodox, from one of passive coexistence to one of active interfaith dialogue and actions. Relations with non-Christians were improved by the establishment of the Secretariat for Non-Christians in 1964.

Paul VI produced many significant encyclicals or official papers on Catholic teachings. These included Ecclesiam Suam (Aug. 6, 1964), on the aims of Vatican II; Mense Maio (Apr. 29, 1965), promoting prayer through the Virgin Mary for Vatican II; Mysterium Fidei (Sept. 3, 1965), restating traditional positions on the Eucharist; Christi Matri Rosarii (Sept. 15, 1966), urging prayers for peace through the rosary; "The Development of Peoples" (Mar. 26, 1967), directed to the Third World and applying the council's "Pastoral Constitution on the Church in the Modern World"; "Priestly Celibacy" (June 24, 1967) restated the traditional view of the church; "Of Human Life" (July 25, 1968) reaffirmed traditional Catholic opposition to birth control and caused much public criticism of Paul VI as pope. Paul VI was open to dialogue with Communism but adamant that Christians not compromise Christian beliefs and social positions. He stood for world peace and especially for bans on nuclear bomb testing. Above all, Paul VI carried the papacy beyond the confines of Italy, visiting Jerusalem; Bombay, India; the World Council of Churches in Geneva, and the Orthodox Patriarch at Istanbul. J.C.

PAUL AND SENECA, EPISTLES OF. See APOCRYPHA.

PAUL AND THECLA, ACTS OF. See APOCRYPHA.

PAULICIANS. An obscure Gnostic-Manichaean Christian sect, which held PAUL OF SAMOSATA and Paul the Apostle in high regard, founded by Constantine of Mananalis about 650. Believing matter was evil and spirit good, they maintained Christ was docetic, an angel sent by God, not a physical person. Only Christ's teachings were important. Like Marcion, they exalted Paul's letters and Luke's Gospel and ordained women. They rejected the OT, the cross, relics, images, the sacraments, and Roman Catholicism. They grew strong in Armenia, but were repeatedly persecuted by other Christians and eventually gave military aid to the Saracens. They are vaguely linked with Bulgaria's Bogomiles and the Albigenses in France. C.M.

PAULIST FATHERS. The Missionary Society of St. Paul the Apostle, which was founded by Father I. HECKER in 1858 in New York, to work for the conversion of non-Catholics. The Paulist Fathers do not take monastic vows but give a "solemn undertaking." The regulations of the society are based on the Redemptorist Fathers, to which order the founder belonged. In their work of conversion, the Paulists send missionaries, write books, and hold seminars and retreats. Most of the Paulists' work is in the United States. A house of studies is maintained in Rome, and the mother house is in New York.

J.C.

PAUL OF SAMOSATA. A third-century heretical bishop of Antioch. A wealthy native of Samosata, Paul was appointed bishop of Antioch in about 260. His doctrine of the person of Christ was condemned by at least two synods of Antioch, which resulted in his being deposed in 268. He taught a trinitarian MONARCHIANISM of Father, Wisdom, and Word. His Christology held that in the Incarnation, the Word rested upon Jesus as one person upon another, making the Incarnate Christ different only in degree from the prophets. His followers were called PAULICIANS. W.G.

PAX. The Latin term for "peace." In Catholic, Lutheran, and Episcopal (Anglican) services, the versicle "Peace be with you" and the response, "And also with you," occurs before the collect or prayer for the day. The term is drawn from the Roman goddess of peace, Pax. In the Roman Catholic Church, a plate engraved with scenes from the Scriptures is kissed by the priest during the Agnus Dei of the Mass, then passed by the acolyte to each concelebrating priest. Each celebrant kisses the plate in turn saying, "Pax tecum" or "Peace be with you."

In contemporary services, both Lutheran and Catholic, there is the ritual of "passing the peace," derived from the kiss of peace observed in ancient liturgies and still observed in Eastern Orthodox Communion liturgies. This consists, in modern Western services, of a handshake and the words, "Peace be with you." J.C.

PEABODY, G. FRANCIS (1847–1936). Clergyman, author, and Unitarian professor of theology and social ethics at Harvard University (1880–1913). Peabody was a founder of the study of Christian social ethics in America, developing a systematic course on that topic in the 1880s that was a favorite of both the divinity school and undergraduate Harvard students for many years.

Peabody was born in Boston, Massachusetts, the son of a Unitarian minister. He attended Harvard (A.B. 1869), Harvard Divinity School (S.T.B. and A.M., 1872), and studied in Germany at the University of Halle in 1872–73, where he was strongly impressed by the work of Otto Pfeiderer. Thereafter, a strong strain of historical study and theology derived from religious experience ran through his work. Peabody's works include: The Approach to the Social Question (1909); Jesus Christ and the Social Question (1900); The Apostle Paul and the Modern World (1923); The Church of the Spirit (1925); Jesus Christ and the Christian Character (1905); and The Christian Life in the Modern World (1914). J.C.

PEACE. One of the key words of biblical theology. The essential meaning of peace is "harmony, wholeness, integrity," with an emphasis on completeness (Hebrew shalom) and order rather than a negative connotation of the absence of strife or hostility.

In the OT the stress falls on peace as a divine gift (Num. 6:26) and a sign of God's favor to people (Gen. 41:16 uses "favorable" to connote "peace"). The basis of such an offer is the reestablishing of the COVENANT (Isa. 54:10; Ezek. 34:25; 37:26), which has been broken by Israel's sin or infidelity. Political harmony or the absence of war is associated with Israel's destiny as living within the covenant relationship. Solomon is the archetype of a "man of peace" (II Sam. 7:11–16; I Kings 2:1–46), whose reign was marked by making Jerusalem "a place of peace," "a quiet habitation" (Isa. 33:20). Disillusion with the later monarchy led to several important developments. For the eighth- and seventh-century prophets of Israel peace was linked with righteousness as a precondition (Amos 5:24; Isa. 32:17), and so there was opposition to the false prophets who proclaimed "peace" on easygoing terms (Jer. 6:14; 8:11, 15; Ezek. 13:10; Mic. 3:5). The failure and collapse of the Hebrew monarchy gave impetus to the prospect of a new king, called "prince of peace" (Isa. 9:6), whose age of justice and integrity is often celebrated in the prophetic literature (Isa. 2:2–4; Mic. 4:1–3; Isa. 11:1–9; 32:15–20; Jer.

Courtesy of Abby Aldrich Rockefeller Folk Art Center, Williamsburg, Virginia

The Peaceable Kingdom by Edward Hicks (1830-40)

23:5-6). The signs of the new age of peace are given as the peace of Jerusalem, whose name means "city of peace," the reconciliation of the two factious kingdoms of Judah and Israel, and the submission of all nations to Israel and Israel's God (Isa. 49:8-12; 60:17, 18; Zech. 9:9, 10; Mic. 5:4). Several psalms look forward to a similar hope being realized (Pss. 2; 72; 110).

According to the NT, the fulfillment of the expectation of peace is found in the coming and kingdom of Jesus, Israel's Messiah and the Lord of the world. But the immediate effect of Jesus' mission is division and conflict, not peace (Luke 12:51; Matt. 10:34). To be sure, in later reflection, Jesus is credited with announcing the offer of peace (John 12:27; 16:33), but that assurance can only be meaningful in the light of his destiny to die and rise again. His work is that of peacemaking, even if it is costly. So he is the author of "peace," between humankind and God (Rom. 5:1; Col. 1:20) as between the contentious elements in first-century society, typified by the animosity between Jews and Gentiles (Col. 3:11, 14; Eph. 2:14-17: see PARTITION, MIDDLE WALL OF). The effect of God's reconciling work in Christ is that we have "peace with God," leading to an awareness of God's peace in our experience when life's trials surround us (Phil. 4:7, 9; Col. 3:15; II Thess. 3:16).

The future hope of the NT authors is for a reign of peace, linked with Christ's role as universal Lord (I Cor. 15:24-28). Whether this is to be interpreted as a millennial kingdom of global peace (based on Rev. 20) or as a symbolic pledge of a new age of world harmony between races is much debated; but both sides of the discussion agree that Christians should act now as "peacemakers" (Matt. 5:9), relieving domestic, national, and worldwide tensions. R.M.

PEALE, NORMAN VINCENT (1898— ). Protestant clergyman and popular author, internationally known as the preacher of POSITIVE THINKING. Peale was born in Bowersville, Ohio, on May 31, the oldest son of a physician who was also a Methodist minister. Peale's brother Robert became a physician and his brother Leonard a minister. He attended Ohio Wesleyan University, graduating in liberal arts in 1920. After college, he became a newspaper reporter in Findlay, Ohio, and later, Detroit. After a year, he entered Boston University to study for the Methodist ministry. He was ordained in 1922 and in 1924 received both the S.T.B. and A.M. degree from Boston University. Over the years, he was awarded thirteen honorary doctoral degrees from such schools as Duke, Syracuse, Brigham Young, and Iowa Wesleyan.

Peale married Ruth Stafford on June 20, 1930, and they have three children, Margaret, John, and Elizabeth. He served pastorates in Berkeley, Rhode Island (1922-24); Kings Highway Church, Brooklyn (1924-27); University Church, Syracuse, New York, (1927-32); and Marble Collegiate Church, New York City, (1932-84). Peale has been featured on a nationwide weekly Sunday radio program, a ninety-second daily program called "American Character," and served as co-publisher and editor of Guideposts, an inspirational magazine (the fourteenth largest of all magazines published in the United States).

Peale has served on many distinguished commissions, including the Mid-century White House Conference on Children and Youth, and the President's Commission for Observance of the Twenty-fifth Anniversary of the United Nations. The recipient of numerous awards, he received several Freedom Foundation Awards, the Horatio Alger Award in 1952, the Presidential Medal of Freedom Award from President Reagan in 1984, and others. He is a Rotarian and a Shriner.

A prolific author, generally on the upbeat and inspirational theme of repressing negative feelings and thinking optimistically ("positively"), Peale has written many books: The Art of Living, You Can Win, A Guide to Confident Living, The Power of Positive

Thinking, Stay Alive All Your Life, The Healing of Sorrow, Enthusiasm Makes the Difference, You Can If You Think You Can, The Positive Principle Today, The Positive Power of Jesus Christ, Treasury of Joy and Enthusiasm, Dynamic Imaging and The True Joy of Positive Living, an autobiography. J.C.

PEARL OF GREAT PRICE. See CHURCH OF JESUS CHRIST OF LATTER-DAY SAINTS.

PEIRCE, CHARLES SANDERS (1839-1914). American philosopher, physicist, and mathematician, best known as the founder of PRAGMATISM. Born in Cambridge, Massachusetts, and educated at Harvard, Peirce spent his early career as an astronomer and physicist. He worked privately as a philosopher, publishing papers from 1867 on. He never achieved a permanent university position but served as a lecturer at Johns Hopkins University (1879-84). Peirce's papers cover a broad range of philosophical topics, including epistemology, philosophy of science, metaphysics, ontology, and mathematics, but his outstanding contribution was in the field of logic. He wrote less extensively on ethics and religion. After 1887 Peirce lived in relative isolation and poverty until his death. He published many papers, but no books, during his lifetime. Much of his best work remained unpublished until the appearance of the eight-volume Collected Papers of C. S. Peirce (1931-58).

Peirce had little influence on philosophy during his life, although his contemporaries, WILLIAM JAMES and JOSIAH ROYCE, drew upon aspects of his work. Peirce propounded a pragmatic theory of meaning by which the meaning (not the truth) of a concept is associated with its experiential or practical results or effects. Peirce accepted the existence of a personal, omnipotent God as a philosophical hypothesis and offered several arguments in favor of such a reality. He believed that the evolutionary process supports theism, as does our instinctive inclination to natural piety, awe, and prayer. J.L.

PEKAH. A king of the northern kingdom of Israel, Pekah came to the throne by the assassination of his predecessor, whom he had served as leader of the army (II Kings 15:25). Pekah is said to have reigned for twenty years, but II Kings 15:29-31 describes an ignominious end to his reign in the invasion and conquest of the northern part of the kingdom by the Assyrian king Tiglath-pileser III and Pekah's consequent deposition and execution. Isaiah 7:1-8 and II Kings 16 provide considerable background to this story. Pekah and REZIN, the kings of Syria and northern Israel, had formed an alliance to invade Judah with the purpose of deposing the king and replacing him with a puppet of their own, a venture that resulted only in driving Ahaz into the arms of Assyria and bringing down the Assyrian wrath. But for the complete picture we have to look to

Courtesy of the Foundation for Christian Living

Norman Vincent Peale

Tiglath-pileser's own annals. From these combined sources it becomes evident that Pekah's seizure of power was part of an anti-Assyrian movement to which not only Israel and Aram were committed but also Phoenicia, Philistia, and other of the small neighboring states. The invasion of Judah took place in the vain effort to force it to join this coalition. During the period between 734 and 732 Tiglath-pileser crushed the members of the coalition one by one, ending by absorbing Galilee and the Transjordan into his empire, subjecting the rest of Israel (and Judah) to vassalage, and replacing Pekah on the throne of Israel with its last king, Hoshea. B.V.

PELAGIUS/PELAGIANISM. Pelagius was a fourth-century British ascetic and theologian who claimed that humans have the natural capacity to take the first step toward salvation. The controversy regarding his teaching lasted several centuries, and therefore not all the tenets that were eventually called Pelagianism were held by Pelagius himself.

Pelagius attacked the Manichaean notion that some are by nature evil and some are good (see MANICHAEISM). He claimed that all have the power to turn to God, and that this is part of human nature. This doctrine became popular among the aristocracy in Italy, and later in North Africa and even the Eastern Mediterranean, for Pelagius and his disciples traveled to all these areas.

Two elements in Pelagianism drew opposition. First, it seemed to deny the need of divine grace for salvation. If humans have by nature the ability to take the first step, and then to continue on the right road, does this not imply that we are able to save ourselves? Second, as the controversy developed, many accused Pelagius and his followers of ignoring the consequences of Adam's sin. Pelagius was not particularly interested in this point. But some of his followers declared that the sin of Adam was not transmitted to his descendants, and thus the Pelagian controversy turned increasingly toward the question of ORIGINAL SIN and its transmission.

It seems that Pelagius himself was overwhelmed by the controversies his teachings provoked and therefore withdrew from the debate. But some of his disciples were more belligerent, and thus the controversy dragged on.

The chief opponent of Pelagianism was AUGUSTINE, bishop of Hippo in North Africa. Although he agreed with Pelagius on the need to affirm FREE WILL against the Manichaeans, he felt that this should not be done in such a way as to deny the initiative of grace in salvation. According to Augustine, before salvation, grace "operates" in us the will to turn to God, and then "cooperates" with our will to serve God. This led him to the doctrines of irresistible GRACE and of PREDESTINATION. Also as a result of this controversy, original sin came to be understood in the West almost exclusively in terms of inheritance—this had not been the case in earlier theology.

Pelagianism was condemned by the Third Ecumenical Council, which gathered at Ephesus in 431, and repeatedly by other ecclesiastical bodies (see EPHESUS, COUNCIL OF). But the extreme views of Augustine also aroused the opposition of some theologians, inexactly called SEMI-PELAGIANS. For another century the controversy continued, until it was settled by a synod gathered in Orange in 529. What this assembly did was to proclaim itself in favor of Augustine's views, but at the same time to interpret them in such a way that they approached semi-Pelagianism. Thus the Middle Ages interpreted Augustine in a very mitigated form, particularly on the issues of predestination and irresistible grace.

For this reason LUTHER declared that almost all medieval theologians were Pelagians. Both he and CALVIN sought to return to Augustine's views on grace and predestination and argued that the Roman doctrine of salvation was Pelagian. Since that time, particularly among Protestant theologians of the Reformed tradition, the term "Pelagian" has been applied to any doctrine that seems to exaggerate human participation in salvation. Within Roman Catholicism, the controversy over JANSENISM resurfaced some of the issues debated by Augustine and the Pelagians. (See also ARMINIANISM.) J.G.

PELLA. A city in Transjordan on the east bank of the river at or close to Khirbet Fahil. Its ancient place-name was Pahel, which is found in the Amarna Letters and the letter of the Pharaohs Thutmose III and Seti I. The Greek name Pella derives from Macedonian colonists who came there after Alexander the Great had invaded Syria. It was colonized by Romans after Pompey restored it following its ruin by Alexander Jannaeus. To this city Christians fled from Jerusalem at the outbreak of the Jewish war in A.D. 66, according to early tradition, sometimes thought to stem from Mark 13:14. R.M.

PENANCE. From the Latin word poenitentia, meaning "to regret"; implying REPENTANCE for sins. Penance may be understood as personal, public, and, in the Roman Catholic church, as canonical and sacramental.

Personal penance is the movement of sinners' hearts so that they hate their own sin so much that they resolve to abandon it. Such rejection of sin is necessary before one can be forgiven.

Public penance was practiced in the ancient church but was abandoned by A.D. 1000. Extreme sinners, such as murderers and idolators, were required to repent publicly, before the congregation. Sometimes penance, as an activity of continually showing sorrow for sin, was laid on such people for life. Today, some Protestant sects may require a form of public penance and censure.

Canonical penance involves prayers, pilgrimages, good WORKS, retreats, or any other activity imposed on a sinner in the Catholic church by a priest or bishop. Such penances are required to reconcile a heretic to the church.

Sacramental penance involves the imposition of a good work or the saying of a number of prayers on the sinner by the confessor (priest) before absolution is given. Most penances involve praying aloud with the aid of the rosary or some other symbolic gesture. The penance usually bears little relation to the gravity of the sin committed. (See also FORGIVENESS.)

J.C.

PENITENTIAL BOOKS. Books of rules and directions for dealing with penances to be laid on communicants during confession in the early Roman Catholic Church. These rules were collected together as penitential canons from the many decisions of bishops and councils. The kind of penance and its duration along with modifying factors are discussed in these books.

J.C.

PENITENTIAL PSALMS. The seven psalms that express deep repentance of sin and desire for divine pardon (6, 31, 37, 50, 101, 124, and 142). They are widely used in both Catholic and Protestant services to express the sense of sin and need of forgiveness. They are appropriate for LENT.

J.C.

PENN, WILLIAM (1644–1718). The QUAKER founder of Pennsylvania was born on October 14, the son of Margaret Jasper Penn and Admiral Sir William Penn, the conqueror of Jamaica. Reared an Anglican, he was expelled after two years at Christ Church College, Oxford, for nonconformist views. He studied law at Lincoln's Inn.

Converted to Quaker ideas, he was imprisoned in

Courtesy of the American Antiquarian Society

William Penn

1669 for publishing The Sandy Foundation Shaken. While in the Tower he drafted the devotional classic No Cross, No Crown. His first interest in America was as a trustee of land in west New Jersey. With the colonists who settled there in 1677, he sent Concessions and Agreements guaranteeing the right of petition, trial by jury, protection from arbitrary imprisonment, religious freedom, and an elected assembly.

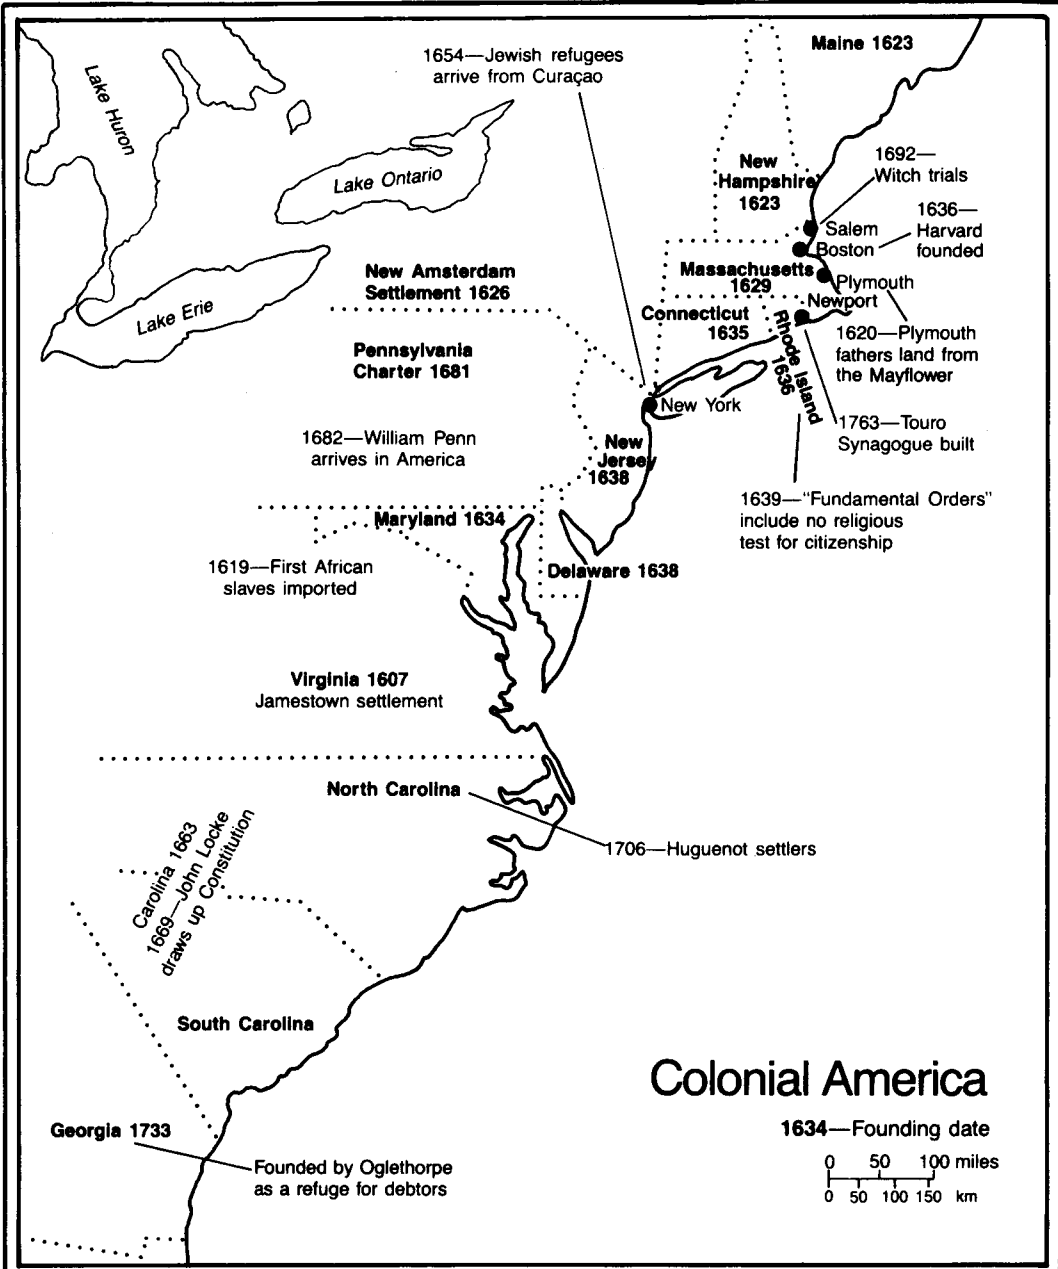

Charles II granted Penn land north of Maryland in 1681, with more land in Delaware in 1683 (see map on next page). Penn visited there in 1682–83 and 1699–1701. It became a haven for many religious groups and a model of relations with the Indians. A friend of kings and philosophers, Penn was a complex figure, both practical and spiritual.

N.H.

PENTATEUCH. Derived from the Greek words pente, "five," and teuchos, "book, tool," this term refers to the first five books of the OT, the so-called "five books of Moses." Known in Judaism simply as TORAH, this earliest stratum of the Israelite tradition, which is preserved in the HEBREW BIBLE, achieved the status of scripture (if not of immutably fixed canon) long before many other parts of the OT did. The reference to "the book of the law of Moses," which Ezra the scribe read before the assembly of the people on the first day of the seventh month in about 458 B.C. (Neh. 8:1-2), is thought by some to be the first intra-biblical allusion to the entire Pentateuch as such, even though the citations from "the book" that follow in Nehemiah 8:14-15 (as well as in Ezra 9:11-12) are not actually found in our Pentateuch. Certainly by the middle of the third century B.C. the translation of the book of the law of Moses into Greek (allegedly at the command of the Egyptian king and inveterate collector of sacred books, Ptolemy II Philadelphus) gives us a firm date by which the Pentateuch must have been regarded as sacred scripture by all Jews in and out of Palestine. After the definitive schism between the Samaritans and the Jews in the second century B.C., a separate Pentateuchal textual tradition began to emerge in the Samaritan community. That community recognized as authoritative scripture only the five books of Moses.

Authorship. The Mosaic authorship of the Pentateuch implied in Nehemiah 8:1-2 continued to be affirmed in both Jewish and Christian communities down to modern times. As recently as 1893, the denial of this traditional notion on historical-critical grounds by Professor Charles A. Briggs of Union Theological Seminary in New York was one of the charges that led to his suspension from the ministry of the Presbyterian church. Today, however, most interpreters in the mainline regard the attribution of the Pentateuch to the hand of Moses as a tradition of later Jewish piety and so no longer feel constrained to account for such technical difficulties confronting the theory as the fact that Moses would have had to report his own death in the last verses of the Pentateuch

Reprinted with permission of the Macmillan Publishing Company, from Macmillan Atlas History of Christianity by Franklin H. Littell. Copyright © 1976 by Carta Ltd.

(Deut. 34:5-8). It is in fact quite possible to discover in the Pentateuch evidences of compositeness and growth over many generations of devout reflection upon the received tradition.

Structure and Content. The Pentateuch opens with an account of world origins (Gen. 1-9). Beginning with a single pair of persons and following their offspring through a history of human tragedy and divine grace, the primeval history culminates in the rescue of the human race from the deluge. After an interlude that traces the descent of tribes known to ancient Israel from the survivors of the Flood (Gen. 10), and an account of the dispersion of humanity into alienated and warring factions spread over the face of the earth in the story of the Tower of Babel (Gen. 11:1-9), the Pentateuchal account focuses in upon a single man, Abram, to whom it is promised, "by you all the families of the earth shall bless themselves" (Gen.

12:3). In GENESIS 12–50, the great saga of Abram's family, the patriarchs and matriarchs of Israel, is spun out in a way that begins to show how the accursed and alienated human community will one day be able to find that promised blessing in the descendants of this Abram and his wife Sarai. Woven into the story of the movement from that promise to its fulfillment are the lives of Isaac and Rebekah, Jacob and Rachel, and the twelve sons of Jacob, who, through the instrumentality of Joseph, emigrate to Egypt and grow there to be a mighty people.

EXODUS 1–15 is the account of the oppression of the Israelites in Egypt and the subsequent "root" experience with the liberator God who acts through the towering figure of the Pentateuchal story, Moses. This Moses, who learned to know the name of God, YHWH, at the burning bush on the mountain of God (Exod. 3:1-15), has to contend with murmuring and backsliding on the part of the Israelites, free but frightened in the wilderness after their wonderful escape from Egypt. But with the arrival of the Israelites at Sinai, the second decisive "root" experience takes place. Exodus 19 is the account of the theophany in which the entire community of Israel personally encounter the single God whom they are to worship; in 20:1-17 the Ten Commandments set forth in most basic terms the stipulations of the covenant, which will henceforth link the two.

