

THE DICTIONARY OF BIBLE AND RELIGION

William H. Gentz
General Editor

ABINGDON/NASHVILLE

Project Editor
Carey J. Gifford

Designer:
John R. Robinson

Editorial Assistant for Reference Books:
Joyce A. King

Input Specialists:
Mary Lou Allen, Kathy Harding, and Marcia Ryan

Project Assistants:
Jackie Glancy and Polly Thompson

Copyright © 1986 by Abingdon Press

All rights reserved.

No part of this book may be reproduced or transmitted in any form or by any means, electronic or mechanical, including photocopying and recording, or by any information storage or retrieval system, except as may be expressly permitted by the 1976 Copyright Act or in writing from the publisher. Requests for permission should be addressed in writing to Abingdon Press, 201 Eighth Avenue South, Nashville, TN 37202.

Nashville, Tennessee.

This book is printed on acid-free paper.

Library of Congress Cataloging in Publication Data

THE DICTIONARY OF BIBLE AND RELIGION.

1. Theology—Dictionaries. 2. Bible—Dictionaries. 3. Religion—Dictionaries. 4. Religions—Dictionaries.

I. Gentz, William H., 1918—

BR95.D46 1986 203'.21 85-15011

ISBN 0-687-10757-1

(alk. paper)

Scripture quotations unless otherwise noted (or Scripture quotations noted RSV) are from the Revised Standard Version of the Bible. Copyright 1946, 1952, 1971, © 1973, by the Division of Christian Education of the National Council of Churches in the U. S. A. and are used by permission.

Scripture quotations noted KJV are from the King James Version of the Bible.

Scripture quotations marked NIV are from the Holy Bible, New International Version. Copyright © 1973, 1978, 1984, International Bible Society. Used by permission of Zondervan Bible Publishers.

Verses noted TEV (Today's English Version) are from the Good News Bible—Old Testament: Copyright © American Bible Society 1976; New Testament: Copyright © American Bible Society 1966, 1971, 1976. Used by permission.

Scripture references noted JPS are from the Holy Scriptures, copyright 1917 © 1955, by the Jewish Publication Society of America. Used by permission.

THE DICTIONARY OF BIBLE AND RELIGION

MAPS, TABLES, CHARTS

Maps

Abraham
Achaia
America, Colonial
American Expansion and Religion
American Revivals of Religion
Assyrian Empire
Buddhism in China
Capernaum
Chinese Religions: Confucianism & Taoism
Corinth
Cyprus
Diaspora/Dispersion
Egypt
Exodus
Gibeon
Indian Religions: Hinduism, Buddhism, Jainism, Sikhism
Indian Religions: Places of Pilgrimage
Islam, Spread of Japanese Religions
Jericho Jerusalem
Jordan

Masada
Mesopotamia
Middle Ages, Christianity in the Nazareth
Paul
Reformation, Christianity in the Rome, City of Seven Churches of Asia
Tiberias

Color Maps

Rear of book

Charts and Diagrams

Acrostic
Archaeology, Contemporary Biblical Cuneiform
Greek New Testament Alphabet
Hasmoneans
Herod
Hebrew, Biblical Alphabet Palestine

CONTRIBUTORS

JOHN CHARLES COOPER

Professor of Religion; Chairman, Department of Philosophy and Religion, Susquehanna University, Selingsgrove, Pennsylvania

CHARLES B. COUSAR

Professor of New Testament, Columbia Theological Seminary, Decatur, Georgia

KEITH CRIM

Editorial Director, The Westminster Press, Philadelphia, Pennsylvania

MARTIN CRIM

Free-lance Writer, Durham, North Carolina

IRIS V. CULLY

Alexander Campbell Hopkins Professor of Christian Education, Emeritus, Lexington Theological Seminary, Lexington, Kentucky

ROBERT S. ELLWOOD

Bishop James W. Bashford Professor of Oriental Studies, School of Religion, University of Southern California, Los Angeles

PAUL LESLIE GARBER

Professor of Bible and Religion, Emeritus, Agnes Scott College, Decatur, Georgia

WILLIAM H. GENTZ

Free-lance Editor and Writer; General Editor, Dictionary of Bible and Religion

JUSTO L. GONZALEZ

Associate for International Relief and Development, Presbyterian Church (USA); Visiting Professor of Theology, Interdenominational Theological Center, Atlanta, Georgia

NANCY A. HARDESTY

Church Historian and Author of All We're Meant to Be and Women Called to Witness

JOHN H. HAYES

Professor of Old Testament, Candler School of Theology, Emory University, Atlanta, Georgia

RUSSELL T. HITT

Author and Editor, Emeritus, Eternity Magazine

BARBARA JURGENSEN

Assistant Professor of Ministry and Contextual Education, Trinity Seminary, Columbus, Ohio

HOWARD CLARK KEE

William Goodwin Aurelio Professor of Biblical Studies; Chairman, Graduate Division of Religious Studies, Boston University

T. J. KLEINHANS
Senior Editor, Aid Association for Lutherans; Retired Air Force Chaplain

LIONEL KOPPMAN
Jewish Educator, Temple Isaiah, Forest Hills,
New York; Public Information Director, Jewish Welfare Board, New York, New York

J. KENNETH KUNTZ
Professor, School of Religion, University of Iowa, Iowa City, Iowa

JAMES C. LIVINGSTON
Professor of Religion, The College of William and Mary, Williamsburg, Virginia

JOHN MACQUARRIE
Lady Margaret Professor of Divinity and Canon of Christ Church, University of Oxford, England

CLYDE L. MANSCHRECK
Chavanne Professor of Religious Studies, Rice University, Houston, Texas

RALPH P. MARTIN
Professor of New Testament; Director of Graduate Studies Program, Fuller Theological Seminary, Pasadena, California

CHARLES S. McCOY
Robert Gordon Sproul Professor of Ethics, Pacific

School of Religion/Graduate Theological Union, Berkeley, California

JOHN R. McRAY
Professor of New Testament and Archaeology,
Wheaton College Graduate School, Wheaton,
Illinois

JAMES D. NEWSOME, Jr.
Professor of Old Testament Language, Literature, and Exegesis, Columbia Theological Seminary, Decatur, Georgia

JAMES L. PRICE
Professor of Religion, Duke University, Durham, North Carolina

DAVID M. SCHOLER
Dean of the Seminary; Julius R. Mantey Professor of New Testament, Northern Baptist Theological Seminary, Lombard, Illinois

W. SIBLEY TOWNER
The Reverend Archibald McFadyen Professor of Biblical Interpretation, Union Theological Seminary, Richmond, Virginia

F. BRUCE VAWTER
Professor of Old Testament; Chairman, Religious Studies Department, DePaul University, Chicago, Illinois

EDITOR'S PREFACE

THE DICTIONARY OF BIBLE AND RELIGION (DBR) can best be explained as an expanded Bible dictionary—expanded to include information from four other areas of religious knowledge: the history of Christianity, systematic theology or Christian doctrine, world religions, and contemporary religions. The dictionary is a lay-oriented, alphabetically arranged compendium of religious information. Entries vary in length from less than 50 to more than 3,000 words. A total of over 880,000 words on more than 2,800 subjects contains information on a comprehensive list of subjects that run the gamut of religious knowledge in all fields.

There is an extensive system of cross references contained in the book for those interested in finding information on related subjects. Where duplication of material was unwarranted, the reader is referred to another entry. Also, within entries, words in capital letters indicate that the dictionary also contains separate entries on these subjects. Readers will also find “see” or “compare” references at the close of some entries as well as a For Further Study section of other sources of information in the back of the book.

Although the majority of the 28 writers are teachers or experts in the field in which they write, a concerted effort has been made to avoid complicated or technical terms and to present the material in language that can be readily understood by readers not trained in theological disciplines. Foreign language terms are translated wherever possible.

The dictionary is ecumenically Christian in origin and outlook, though including articles on personal religion in other traditions. Due to its principal origins and authorship in America and a number of practical limitations, its ecumenical thrust is focused on, but not limited to, Protestant and Catholic Christianity. The dictionary also includes articles on Jewish and other non-Christian traditions, thus broadening the ecumenical horizon. It is ecumenical in another, more informal sense, in that it incorporates representative liberal and conservative viewpoints from within the historic churches and denominations. Also, the authors have been selected from several different backgrounds and denominations.

This book is entitled a dictionary, rather than an encyclopedia or handbook, to emphasize the fact that it is intended to provide fast, direct access to information. The alphabetical arrangement of the topics, the inclusion of definitions, and the fact that a fairly large number of topics of short or intermediate length are included, gives the dictionary its practical efficiency and usability.

Articles are intended to strike a balance between objective and inclusive presentations of material, on the one hand, and individual insight, judgment, and opinion, on the other. The articles present current knowledge and practice objectively and bring supportive and corrective effects of research to bear on the topic involved.

Obviously not every religious subject is included here, but the publisher, writers, and editor have attempted to bring to the reader as comprehensive a source of information as is possible within the limits of the space available. Photos, illustrations, maps, and charts have been included to enhance the understanding of the subject by visual as well as verbal means.

We are grateful for the concerted efforts of all of the writers, editors, proofreaders, designers, and others involved in the process of publishing to make the dictionary the best possible vehicle of religious information available.

William H. Gentz
General Editor

Aa

AARON. The elder brother of MOSES (Exod. 7:7) and of MIRIAM, siblings born of Amram and Jochebed (Num. 26:59). He is represented as having been appointed Moses' "prophet," that is, his spokesman, to compensate for Moses' lack of eloquence or persuasiveness in dealing with the Pharaoh of Egypt and securing the release of the Israelites from bondage (Exod. 7:1-4). This note, together with the major role attributed to him and his charismatic powers in the subsequent Exodus chronicle and the character ascribed to him as the first of Israel's priesthood (Exod. 28), argue in favor of the reminiscence of a genuine historical personage within the tradition. The tendency of the tradition was to ascribe to Moses everything that was formative of Israel: its judiciary, its prophecy, its law, its tribal organization, its very salvation from Egypt. That important, even essential, functions in this process should have been attributed to one other than Moses could indicate that history rather than convenient legend had guided the tradition.

Aaron appears in the biblical tradition under various and, in part, conflicting guises. (1) As indicated above, he is Moses' surrogate and, at times, his superior in the process that led to Israel's liberation from Egypt. (2) He also appears, along with his sister Miriam, as Moses' opponent on significant occasions. (3) He appears, finally, as a high priest and image of a priesthood to come, which Moses could not institute but could inaugurate according to divine decree (see Exod. 28ff.; Lev. 8-10).

Repeatedly, from Exodus 5:1 on, it is Moses and Aaron who are credited equally as the human agents through whom God obtained the release of the people from bondage in Egypt. In Exodus 4:2ff. the rod or "magic wand" wielded by Moses is identified as the first instrument in Israel's liberation and is thereafter associated with the two brothers. But ultimately it is "Aaron's rod" and his alone that stands as lasting testimonial to the Exodus (Num. 17:10).

There seems to be no doubt that tradition has smoothed over many inconsistencies in what was remembered of the Exodus. Aaron and Miriam opposed their brother Moses (Num. 12), but according to Numbers 16-19 a revolt took place against all three. This latter story may be the reworking of what was originally recorded as a rebellion against the domination of the clerical caste of the Levites. In any case, the ultimate tradition has worked to exculpate Aaron from any blame: he was a man deceived and misled. (See AARONITE(S).)

B.V.

AARONITE(S). Male descendants of AARON and according to Exodus 28ff. and Leviticus 8-10 the sole legitimate priesthood of Israel. The Aaronites formed one family within the larger class of LEVITES, who in the older tradition (compare the Deuteronomic expression, "Levitical priests," Deut. 18:1) had been the professional priestly class. The centralization of the cult in Jerusalem (II Kings 23) and restriction to its priesthood doubtless lies behind this prerogative of the Aaronites.

B. V.

AB. See HEBREW CALENDAR.

ABBA. An Aramaic word for "father," which is transliterated into Greek in Mark 14:36, Romans 8:15, and Galatians 4:6. The term was the intimate one used by children, as mishnaic and modern usage indicate. This fact makes all the more remarkable Jesus' use of it to address God in the midst of his passion in Gethsemane.

W. S. T.

ABBASSID CALIPHS. (MUSLIM dynasty, A.D. 750-1258.) Remembered for their patronage of the arts, music, and literature. They deposed the Umayyad dynasty with the aid of discontented Muslims, especially non-Arabs, although the Abbassids themselves were Arabic and claimed descent from MUHAMMAD. In the West, the best-known Abbassid is Harun al-Rashid (A.D. 764-809), hero of many of the stories in the Arabian Nights. The dynasty fell when the Mongols sacked Baghdad in 1258.

K./M.C.

ABBE, ABBESS, ABBEY, ABBOT. Terms derived from the French language referring to the clergy and clerical institutions and positions. Abbe is a common title for the secular clergy; in France anyone in clerical garb is called an abbe. An abbess is the superior of the community of nuns in the BENEDICTINE tradition, although the title is also used in other orders, such as the Poor Clares. An abbess is elected by the choir sisters. She wears a ring of office and carries a staff on ceremonial occasions. An abbey is a major community of MONASTICISM within a religious order, male or female, of regular canons, monks, or nuns. An abbot is the superior of a major monastery in the Benedictine tradition. He oversees the temporal and spiritual affairs of the order. Only a monk with ten years profession, above the age of thirty, may be an abbot.

J. C.

ABBOTT, LYMAN (1835-1922). Minister, editor, and author, Abbott was born December 18 in Roxbury, Massachusetts. He graduated from New York University as a lawyer in 1853 and married Abby Frances Hamlin in 1855. Inspired by HENRY WARD BEECHER to become a minister, he served first in Terre Haute, Indiana.

Abbott joined Beecher in 1876 in editorship of the Christian Union, which became The Outlook in 1893. He became Beecher's successor at Plymouth Congregational Church in Brooklyn (1890-99) and retired to devote himself to the editorship of The Outlook.

He wrote forty books including The Theology of an Evolutionist (1897), The Evolution of Christianity (1892), illustrating how the SOCIAL GOSPEL mediated between orthodoxy and science, and The Spirit of Democracy (1910).

N. H.

ABEL. See CAIN AND ABEL.

ABELARD, PETER (1079-1142). One of the main forerunners of SCHOLASTICISM. He studied under the most famous teachers of his time and showed his contempt for them, thus making the first of a long series of enemies. He taught in Paris and attracted such a large number of students that he could be regarded as the founder of the University of Paris. His success and career there were curtailed because of a love affair with Heloise, a niece of Fulbert, canon of Notre Dame, who employed Abelard to supervise her education. The wrath of Fulbert forced Abelard to seek refuge at the monastery of Saint-Denis in 1118. Three years later, the Council of Soissons condemned his doctrine of the Trinity and burned one of his books on the subject. He then infuriated the monks at Saint-Denis by declaring that the monastery could not have been founded by Dionysius the Areopagite, and he had to leave the monastery. By 1136 he was again teaching in Paris. But then Bernard of Clairvaux accused him of heresy, and he was once more condemned by the Council of Sens in 1141. Eventually reconciled to Bernard, Abelard died in 1142.

He left his mark on the Scholastic method through his book Sic et non (Yes and No), in which he showed that biblical and Patristic authorities could be cited in support of seemingly contradictory positions. He was also one of the clearest exponents of what historians call the "subjective" or "moral" theory of ATONEMENT. On the question of UNIVERSALS he took a position between the extremes of realism and nominalism.

J. G.

ABIATHAR ("the father [God] is abundant"). This son of Ahimelech and (as a descendant of Eli) member of the priestly line of Shiloh was one of two leading priests under David. Later Solomon banished him for having supported Adonijah, Solomon's rival to the throne.

Abiathar and David. When Saul ordered the slaughter of the priests of Nob, Abiathar, the sole survivor, took the oracular ephod and fled to David at Adullam (I Sam. 22:20-23; 23:6). David, who received Abiathar warmly, consulted the oracle during his outlaw days, and as religious adviser, Abiathar provided its interpretation (23:9-12; 30:7-8). After David had become king, captured Jerusalem, and moved the ark of the covenant there, Abiathar, along with Zadok, was appointed priest of the new tent shrine in which the ark was kept. The two presumably coexisted as leading priests in David's cabinet (II Sam. 20:25). During Absalom's rebellion, when David was required to return to a fugitive existence, Abiathar rendered the king faithful service (15:24, 29, 35-36; 17:15).

Abiathar and Solomon. When Adonijah, David's oldest living son, competed with Solomon for the throne during David's last days, the priestly and military leadership were split. Zadok and Benaiah supported Solomon, but Abiathar and Joab backed Adonijah (I Kings 1). To steady his position, the ultimately victorious Solomon deposed Abiathar from the Jerusalem priesthood and banished him to Anathoth, his ancestral home. The priestly rule of the house of Eli was thereby regarded as finished (2:27), and the earlier prophecy predicting the fall of Eli's house (I Sam. 2:27-36) was seen as fulfilled. Solomon might have treated Abiathar more harshly were it not for his previous loyalty to David (I Kings 2:26). As one of "the priests who were in Anathoth" (Jer. 1:1), Jeremiah may have descended from Abiathar.

J. K. K.

ABIB. See HEBREW CALENDAR.

ABIGAIL. The beautiful wife of the churlish NABAL of Carmel. According to I Samuel 24, David nearly incurred blood-guilt in his anger at Nabal ("fool") for refusing to repay with food the kindness earlier shown him by David. Only the intervention of Abigail with gifts of food and wine and earnest entreaties to David not to seek vengeance prevented a massacre of Nabal and his men. David blessed Abigail for her discretion in restraining him. After Nabal died about ten days later, David took Abigail to be the second of his many wives. According to I Chronicles 3:1, she bore him a son, Daniel.

First Chronicles 2:15-17 reports that David also had a sister named Abigail, who became the mother of Amasa. Abigail's sister, Zeruiah, was Joab's mother. According to II Samuel 19:13, Amasa temporarily displaced his cousin Joab as David's chief of staff, but in the end he was assassinated by Joab (II Sam. 20:4-10).

W. S. T.

ABIHU. The second of the four sons of AARON (Exod. 6:23) who, with his brother NADAB, suffered a strange fate. As priestly sons of Aaron, they were permitted to eat and drink in Yahweh's presence on Sinai on the occasion of the ratification of his covenant with Israel (Exod. 24:1-11; compare 28:1). However, in the aftermath of the original burnt offering made by their father (Lev. 9:22-24), they permitted themselves to burn incense before the Lord in a way that was not commanded (Lev. 10:1-3). As a punishment for offering this "unholy fire," they were burned with holy fire. This account may reflect a polemic alive at the time in which the Priestly source (see P DOCUMENT) was written regarding the status of various priestly families, or it may even reflect some judgment on the use of incense as an offering. It also preserves the motif of the displacement of the elder brother(s) by the younger, which frequently recurs in OT narratives.

W. S. T.

ABIJAH. As many as nine OT figures bear this name, which means "[My] father is Yahweh." These include: (a) the wicked younger son of Samuel (I Sam. 8:1-9); (b) a descendant of Aaron who was identified with the eighth of the twenty-four priestly divisions that rotated duty in the Temple (I Chr. 24:10); (c) the son of JEROBOAM I, ruler of the northern kingdom of Israel, whose death as retribution for the apostasy of his father was pronounced by the prophet AHIJAH (I Kings 14:1-18).

The Abijah of greatest historical significance, however, was the son of the first ruler of the southern kingdom of Judah, REHOBOAM; Abijah reigned following Rehoboam (II Chr. 13:1-22; see also I Kings 15:1-8 where, probably because of a scribal error, Abijah is called Abijam). The simple report of I Kings that "there was war between Abijam and Jeroboam" (15:7) is expanded by the Chronicler into a lengthy account of a border engagement pitting Ahijah's 400,000 troops against the 800,000 of his opponent! Following a vigorous condemnation of the cultic apostasy of the northern kingdom, Abijah, announcing that "God is with us at our head," turned the tide of battle against the Israelites, slaughtered half a million of them, and captured Bethel and other towns of Ephraim. This highly exaggerated claim, which reflects the Chronicler's own anti-northern bias, is rounded out with the notice that Abijah managed to run a household consisting of fourteen wives, twenty-two sons, and sixteen daughters.

W. S. T.

ABILENE. A district in the central Anti-Lebanon mountains bordering the Barada (ancient Abadna) River, which descends from there into Damascus eighteen miles to the southeast. The chief town, Abila (the legendary site of the tomb of Abel), is today the Syrian village of Suq Wadi Barada. In his Antiquities, Josephus reports that the Roman emperor Caligula gave Abila to the Jewish king Agrippa I in A.D. 37. This donation was confirmed by Claudius on his accession in A.D. 41, thus making Agrippa the ruler of all the lands from Judea to the northern slopes of Mount Hermon. Josephus also confirms the only information about Abilene contained in the Bible (Luke 3:1), namely that the district had been the tetrarchy of one Lysanias in the days of Herod the Great (about 34 B.C.). From A.D. 53 to 100 the territory was ruled by Agrippa II, after which it reverted to the Roman province of Syria.

W. S. T.

ABIMELECH. Other than the probably erroneous reference in the title of Psalm 34, this name, which means "Melech [the name of a Canaanite deity] is father," is attached to two biblical figures.

(1) The first Abimelech was the king of Gerar, a city halfway between Beersheba and Gaza, who, according to the Elohists (see E DOCUMENT), was the victim of a plot by Abraham to pass Sarah off to the king as his sister (Gen. 20). An earlier version of the same story is told in Genesis 26 by the Yahwists, who uses Isaac and Rebekah as the Israelite protagonists. (In Gen. 12:10-20, the entire event takes place in Egypt, and Pharaoh, not Abimelech, is the dupe.) In the more sophisticated of the accounts, Genesis 20, Abimelech is presented as a man of integrity, whom God saved from mortal sin with Sarah, even though he had taken her as a wife. God ordered Abimelech to restore Sarah to Abraham, which he did with generous compensation but not without the complaint that Abraham had deceived him. Abraham's excuse was that because there was "no fear of God at all in this place" (20:11), he felt sure that someone would kill him in order to take his wife. Furthermore, he claimed for the one and only time that Sarah really was his half sister (20:12). Abraham subsequently dwelt in Abimelech's territory, once even settling a dispute over a desert watering place with a peaceable covenant ceremony. The place came to be known as Beersheba, "well of the oath" (Gen. 21:25-34).

(2) The second Abimelech of biblical fame was one of the seventy-two sons of Jerubaal, also known as Gideon. His mother was a concubine in Shechem (Judg. 8:31), whose name is never given. Although his father, Gideon, had firmly refused to be made king over Israel (Judg. 8:23), Abimelech actively promoted his own kingship over Shechem through the good offices of his mother's family. Using "hired knives," he confirmed his election by killing seventy of his brothers. Only his youngest half brother, Jotham, escaped the purge (Judg. 9:1-6). This Jotham stood on the top of Mount Gerizim overlooking Shechem and pronounced the curse preserved in his renowned parable of the trees, saying to the city, in effect, If you have acted in good faith with Gideon's house, rejoice in Abimelech; but if not, let fire come out and devour both the citizens of Shechem and Abimelech (9:7-20). As the tortuous history recounted in the remainder of Judges 9 draws to an end, the curse is effectuated. Abimelech turned on Shechem after he had ruled Israel for three years, and he burned its tower fortress down over the heads of one thousand of its people (9:49). Subsequently God requited Abimelech's crimes against him (9:56) when a woman of Thebez brained him with a millstone while he was besieging that city.

W.S.T.

ABISHAG ("my father has wandered"?). A lovely Shunammite maiden employed as a concubine to warm David and restore his virility in old age (I Kings

1:1-4, 15). That Adonijah requested her for himself following David's death was interpreted by Solomon as evidence that Adonijah still coveted the crown (2:22). This stratagem cost Adonijah his life.

J.K.K.

ABISHAI. The Hebrew term meaning "father exists." A son of David's sister Zeruiah and brother of Joab and Asahel (I Chr. 2:16). He commanded a third of David's army during Absalom's rebellion (II Sam. 18:2) and was head of David's "mighty men" known as the "Thirty" (II Sam. 23:18-19; I Chr. 11:20-21).

In the Wilderness of Ziph. Abishai moved with David into Saul's camp by night. Finding Saul and his men asleep, Abishai sought David's permission to kill the king. David would not condone such violence against "the Lord's anointed" and elected instead to sneak away with Saul's spear and jar of water (I Sam. 26:5-12).

At the Pool of Gibeon. After a military tournament, which found Abner's forces overcome by Joab's, Abner fled and was relentlessly pursued by Asahel. When the latter refused to desist, Abner speared him to death (II Sam. 2:12-23). Joab and Abishai soon killed Abner in cold blood at Hebron, thereby avenging their brother (3:26-30).

In Ammon. Israel waged a retaliatory campaign against the Ammonites for their shameful treatment of David's envoys who had visited their king Hanun. With select troops Joab fought off interfering Syrian mercenaries who came to Ammon's aid, and charged Abishai to oversee the remainder of the army in its movements against the Ammonites. Both brothers tasted victory (II Sam. 10:9-14).

Near Jerusalem. When David was required to flee from Jerusalem due to Absalom's uprising, he was met by Shimei, who cursed him thoroughly. Abishai asked permission to slay this rude Benjaminite. Believing that Shimei was doing Yahweh's bidding, David restrained him (II Sam. 16:5-14). After Absalom's death, when Shimei met David at the Jordan and profusely apologized for his disrespectful conduct, Abishai enthusiastically recommended Shimei's death and was again overruled by David (19:16-23).

Other Exploits. Abishai dauntlessly rescued the weary David from the hands of the Philistine giant, Ishbibenob, whom he killed (II Sam. 21:15-17). With Joab he suppressed the Benjaminite revolt of Sheba against David (20:1-22), and presumably joined Joab and David in leading Israel's successful campaign against the Edomites (II Sam. 8:13-14; I Kings 11:15-16; I Chr. 18:12-13). Although Abishai sometimes made David feel uneasy, his loyalty to the king was unswerving.

J.K.K.

ABLUTIONS. Washing of the hands before MASS, before the canon, and after distributing Communion outside of Mass by a priest of ROMAN CATHOLICISM.

After Communion, the celebrant washes out the CHALICE with wine, and his fingers with wine and water. These ablutions are drunk by the priest.

J.C.

ABNER. A name meaning "father is a lamp." This man was a kinsman of SAUL and commander-in-chief of his army (I Sam. 14:50). He also was the mainstay behind Saul's ineffectual son, Ish-baal, during his two-year reign following his father's death.

Abner and Saul. Abner distinguished himself militarily under Saul's rule. As head of the Israelite army in the Philistine war, Abner introduced David to Saul after the former's triumph over Goliath (I Sam. 17:55-58). Moreover, Abner joined Saul in his frantic pursuit of David. Abner's inattentive watch over the sleeping Saul, however, afforded David opportunity to enter the king's tent and to reprove Abner for negligence in protecting Yahweh's anointed (26:5-16).

Abner and Ish-baal. After Saul's death, Abner led Ish-baal to Mahanaim in trans-Jordan and proclaimed him king. This refugee government secure from Philistine aggression failed to attract the tribe of Judah, which now looked to David (II Sam. 2:8-10). After Abner and his forces lost to Joab and his forces in a war game staged at the Pool of Gibeon, Abner fled and was relentlessly pursued by Joab's brother Asahel. When the latter refused to desist, Abner speared him to death and then returned to Mananaim (2:12-29).

Later Ish-baal berated Abner for having visited Saul's concubine, Rizpah, a sign that Abner himself coveted the throne. The enraged Abner inflicted on Ish-baal an intimidating speech in which he announced his intention to transfer his allegiance to David at Hebron (II Sam. 3:7-11).

Abner and David. Abner's overtures struck David favorably. After winning the Israelite elders to his position that a united monarchy under David would benefit everyone, the triumphant Abner took a diplomatic team to Hebron to lay final plans (II Sam. 3:12-21). Soon the ruthless Joab, unknown to David, murdered Abner in private, thereby avenging Asahel's death and ensuring that he would not be supplanted as commander-in-chief of David's army (3:26-27). The incensed David convinced the people of his own innocence by thoroughly cursing Joab, participating in Abner's funeral, and voicing a moving dirge (3:33-34), which bemoaned Abner's untimely end. He was buried in Hebron. On his deathbed, David challenged Solomon to avenge Joab's crime against this undisputably capable Benjaminite (I Kings 2:5-6).

J.K.K.

ABOLITIONISM. See SLAVERY.

ABOMINATION. Anything considered culturally, ritually, or ethically repugnant or loathsome to God or human beings. A wide range of matters and conditions are called abominations in the OT. Four different Hebrew words are so translated although frequently the same terms are translated as "detestable thing," "abhorrence," or "foul thing." The cultural reference can be seen in the statements for the Egyptians that eating with Hebrews and the presence of shepherds were abominations (Gen. 43:32; 46:34). Most frequently mentioned in the Bible are ritual abominations, including prohibited foods or unclean animals (Lev. 7:21), sacrifices (Deut. 17:1), flesh eaten with blood in it (Isa. 65:4), idols (Deut. 7:25-26), and magic and divination (Deut. 18:10-12). The ethical dimension denotes moral faults (Deut. 25:14-16), reversal of sex roles in clothing (Deut. 22:5), sexual irregularities (Lev. 18:22), and various practices unacceptable to Israelite religion (Lev. 18:27). The idea that certain things and acts are abominations is based on a world view in which sharp distinctions are drawn between the normal and acceptable and the abnormal and unacceptable. The latter are abominations. Because of Israel's specific food restrictions focusing on the difference between CLEAN AND UNCLEAN and special sacrificial laws, numerous conditions could thus be classified as abnormal.

J.H.

ABOMINATION OF DESOLATION. A foreign feature introduced into the Temple of Jerusalem probably during the reign of ANTIOCHUS IV (175-164 B.C.). Four texts in the book of Daniel refer to this feature but the same Hebrew terminology does not appear throughout: 8:13—"the transgression that makes desolate," 9:27—"upon the wing of abominations shall come one who makes desolate," 11:31—"the abomination that makes desolate," and 12:11—"abomination that makes desolate." Presumably all of these refer to the same feature. Because of the cryptic language, uncertainty exists about how the terms should be translated and what the abomination refers to. The Hebrew term translated desolate is sh-m-m, which can mean "be deserted, desolate," "be removed from," "appall, horrify," or "be mad."

In all probability, the author of Daniel was referring to the altar placed in the Temple by the Seleucid king Antiochus IV Epiphanes, the Macedonian ruler over Syria, which during his day included Jerusalem. First Maccabees 1:54-59 reports that the Seleucids erected a "desolating sacrilege upon the altar of burnt offering" in the Jerusalem Temple in 167 B.C. This appears to have been a smaller altar set up on the regular temple altar to be used for sacrifices to a god worshiped by the Seleucids. Thus "abomination of desolation" would be the name given this altar by the Jews. As a nickname or byname, it might be translated "the abomination that makes desolate" (that empties the temple of orthodox Jews), "the abomination of the madman" (Antiochus Epiphanes, who was nicknamed Epimanes, which means "madman"), or "the abomination that horrifies." In all likelihood, however, the Hebrew phrase shiqqus shomem is a play on the name of the Seleucid god ba'al shamem, "Ba'al or Lord of the Heavens," who was identified with the Greek god Zeus Olympios. Thus shiqqus ("abomination") was substituted for ba'al ("Lord") and shomem ("the one making desolate") was a pun on shamem ("heavens"). Thus "abomination of desolation" (or "the one making desolate") refers to the pagan altar and the services associated with it that were introduced into the Jerusalem Temple.

Adapted from The Westminster Historical Atlas to the Bible, revised. Edited by G. Ernest Wright and Floyd V. Filson. Copyright © The Westminster Press.

Similar terminology is found in the NT (Mark 13:14 and parallels in Matt. 24:15; Luke 21:20) where the "desolating sacrilege" seems to refer to the presence of Gentiles (Romans) or their religious emblems in the Temple. These NT texts probably refer to the presence of Roman standards, which were the objects of religious veneration set up in the Temple after its capture in A.D. 70.

J. H.

ABRAHAM. The son of Terah, husband of SARAH, and father of ISAAC, whose noble example as Israel's first patriarch made him the father of the faithful in Judeo-Christian tradition. The name "Abram" and its dialectical variant "Abraham" may both be rendered "the [my] father is exalted" or "exalted father."

Abraham and Archaeology. (a) Textual evidence. Though the epigraphic material unearthed by Near Eastern archaeologists is extensive, we know nothing about Abraham except what the Bible discloses. The EBLA tablets (about 2500 B.C.) and First Dynasty Babylonian texts (about 1830–1530 B.C.) attest the name "Abram." Hurrian legal sanctions disclosed by the fifteenth-century B.C. NUZI texts in the east Tigris vicinity make intelligible Abraham's anxiety that his slave Eliezer might be his heir (Gen. 15:1-4) and Sarah's desire to deliver her maid Hagar to Abraham as a concubine (16:1-4). Abraham's striking mobility meshes well with what eighteenth-century Mari texts convey. While such documents confer some credibility on the patriarchal legends of Genesis, they do not speak directly of Abraham.

(b) Dating proposals. Contemporary biblical scholarship knows no single date for Abraham. Presumed affinities with Eblaite material led D. N. Freedman to posit a mid-third millennium date (early Bronze Age), but C. H. Gordon assigns Abraham to the late Bronze Age (about 1550–1200 B.C.) owing to parallels he deduces in Nuzi and RAS SHAMRA texts (fifteenth and thirteenth centuries B.C. respectively). Certain Genesis nomenclature (for example, Arameans, Philistines) and mention of domesticated camels induce T. L. Thompson and J. Van Seters to shift Abraham to the Iron Age (about 1200–300 B.C.). Most scholars, however, identify these elements as anachronistic. The prevailing view, advanced by R. de Vaux and J. Bright, places Abraham in the middle Bronze II Age (about 2000–1550 B.C.) on the assumption that, as a seminomadic clan chief, Abraham belonged to the sweeping movement of Amorites (Northwest Semites) felt throughout much of the Near East early in the second millennium. Yet, even here, caution is required.

Abraham According to J. (a) The issue. Abraham's story (Gen. 11:27–25:18) derives from several originally independent traditions that have been united into a semblance of biographical wholeness. Apart from Genesis 14, these are attributed to the primary strata of Genesis—J, E, and P. Though all three reflect on Abraham's journey of faith, J dominates. Its author, commonly termed the Yahwist and perhaps a contemporary of Solomon (about 961-922 B.C.), emphasized two motifs. These were Yahweh's persistent promise of progeny and land to God's chosen patriarch and the latter's capacity to believe in its fulfillment. As more recent writers, E and P build on the work of J. Highlights in the J, E, and P portrayals of Abraham invite inspection.

(b) Abraham's call and aftermath (Gen. 12:1-20). In his hometown of Haran (mention of Ur in 11:28 is textually suspect), Abraham was commanded by YAHWEH to abandon his country and kindred and move to a yet unidentified destination. Concomitantly the Deity promised that from Abraham a great nation would emerge that would richly benefit humankind (vv. 2-3). When the obedient Abraham reached Shechem, Yahweh again appeared and pledged, "To your descendants I will give this land" (v. 7). Abraham responded faithfully by erecting an altar. Yet in an emergency sojourn to Egypt (vv. 10-20), he implicitly questioned the promise of divine protection. To guarantee his own security, he fabricated a lie about his wife Sarah (v. 13).

(c) Further affirmation and denial of the promise. When the herdsmen of Abraham and his nephew Lot strove in the Canaanite-inhabited region of Bethel so that Lot's separation from Abraham commended itself, Abraham's faith in Yahweh's promise shone brightly. He gave Lot first choice, who providentially preferred the fertile Jordan Valley to the Land of Promise (13:11). Yahweh's pledge to Abraham was renewed (13:14-18). J portions in Genesis 15 instruct that Abraham "believed the Lord; and he reckoned it to him as righteousness" (v. 6). Indeed, God was voluntarily bound in solemn promise to the patriarch through ancient covenant ritual (vv. 7-12, 17-21).

Then despairing that Yahweh had abandoned the promise of progeny, Abraham and Sarah hastened to actualize its fulfillment through Sarah's maid Hagar (16:2, 4-6). The outcome was abysmal; Sarah became jealous and Hagar was brutally expelled. Yahweh's mysterious visit to Abraham and Sarah at Mamre (Gen. 18) and restatement of the promise evoked doubt only in Sarah (v. 12), and for remaining faithful, God confided to Abraham the intention to destroy Sodom. This permitted the patriarch to assume an intercessory role in behalf of non-Israelites (affirming the promise of 12:2-3). Ultimately Sarah bore Isaac (21:2), and when it was time for this child of promise to marry, Abraham acted faithfully by sending his majordomo to obtain a suitable (non-Canaanite) wife for Isaac among his kinsfolk in Haran, thereby sparing Isaac the necessity of vacating the Land of Promise (Gen. 24).

Abraham According to E. Like the Yahwist, the Elohist (E) narrates God's twofold promise to Abraham (15:5, 13-16), the patriarch's faith-doubt response, and his positive relation to non-Israelites. Again exhausted in faith, Abraham deceived Abimelech about Sarah (20:2); but then Abraham as prophet interceded for this non-Israelite king whose innocence was established (v. 17). Also E tells of Hagar's expulsion (21:8-14), but with two variants. The incident happened after the births of Ishmael and Isaac, and Abraham conceded to Sarah's demand, but only after securing divine approval. Then by his treaty with Abimelech (21:22-34), Abraham faithfully shared his blessing with non-Israelites. Abraham's supreme test of faith involved his having to place Isaac, at God's inscrutable command, on a sacrificial altar (22:2). The laconic prose of this gripping narrative (22:1-19) portrays Abraham in a position of faithful surrender. Willing to yield this child of promise, Abraham won him back and triumphantly qualified as a model of faith.

Abraham According to P. Though the Priestly writer (P) minimized the faith-doubt tension in his rendering of Abraham (but see Gen. 17:17-18), he reaffirmed the earlier motif of promise and fulfillment. The main contribution of P consists of several chronological notices and two extended narratives. The first (chap. 17) centers on the Deity's covenant with Abraham, which culminates in the institution of circumcision. Here the ongoing relationship between the transcendent Deity and the patient, listening patriarch is formalized with a dual interest in divine promise and solemn procedure. The other narrative (chap. 23), anchored in earlier Hebraic tradition, involves Abraham's purchase of the cave of Mechpelah from Ephron the Hittite following Sarah's death. By so claiming this corner of the Land of Promise, Abraham decisively demonstrated his faith in God's promise.

Abraham's Impact on Biblical Thought. Above all, Abraham is remembered as the father of all who are faithful, be they Jew or Gentile. Israel consistently perceived Abraham's unconditional trust in divine promise and guidance as its own appropriate response to divine election. Abraham's struggles were not forgotten, and even as the prototype of believing Israel, he was rightly spared a sainthood status. Nevertheless, this "friend" of God (Isa. 41:8; Jas. 2:23) and colossus of faith showed both the old and new Israel how to live well before God and to embrace the world with a spirit of Universalism.

J. K. K.

ABRAHAM'S BOSOM. A place of special status for the good in the world of the dead. This phrase occurs only once in the Bible, in Jesus' story of Lazarus and the rich man (Luke 16:19-31). In the story, Lazarus, the poor man, dies and is carried by angels to Abraham's bosom (Luke 16:22). Here he is separated by a chasm from the rich man tormented in Hades. Apparently in Jewish thought at the time of Jesus, not all the dead were believed to go to the same place. Sheol seems to have been divided into places where those judged righteous were already at rest and those judged unrighteous were already tormented before the final judgment. Abraham's bosom would have been the place—like Paradise in Luke 23:43—where the righteous found rest. Since "bosom" represents intimacy and Abraham was the ideal patriarch, then to be found in Abraham's bosom was to be granted a special place. In some Jewish texts of the time, the patriarchs Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob were viewed as those who welcomed the elect to the world beyond. Not only the intimate association with the patriarchs was stressed but also the meal enjoyed with them in the world beyond (see Matt. 8:11), although no reference is made to the meal in the Lazarus story.

J.H.

ABSALOM. In I Kings 15:2 called Abishalom (both in Hebrew meaning "[god] the father is peace, perfection"), the third son of DAVID. His mother was Maacah, daughter of Talmai, the king of Geshur (II Sam. 3:3). After his sister Tamar was raped by AMNON, their half brother, Absalom harbored vengeance against him, bided his time, and eventually had him slain by treachery. Thereupon he took refuge with his mother's kinsmen in Geshur (II Sam. 13). The story of Absalom graphically illustrates David's shortcomings as a father. David knew of Amnon's crime but did nothing about it, and subsequently he proved himself to be totally inept in handling Absalom.

The Absalom story likewise reveals, by implication, the precarious state of David's rule over his kingdom, at least in his latter years. After Joab, David's commander and the prop of his throne, brought about a reconciliation between David and Absalom (II Sam. 14), the latter experienced no difficulty in quickly presenting himself as a populist alternative to his father (II Sam. 15:1-6). The subsequent narrative of II Samuel 15:7-17:29, which describes Absalom's successful rebellion and usurpation of the throne, is the chronicle of a bewildered and ineffectual David, prey to the long suppressed hatreds of his enemies and supported now largely only by mercenaries and allies from bygone days. Absalom fails by overextending himself and following advice that appeals to his vanity. David regains his kingdom by force of arms—significantly, Absalom's opposing forces are termed "the men of Israel"—but only as a bystander in a battle waged by his generals. It is Joab who recognized that Absalom must be executed, contrary to David's wishes, and it is Joab who forces David to resume kingly responsibilities and who reconsolidates the kingdom after the revolt (II Sam. 18-19).

Absalom had three sons and a daughter named Tamar according to II Samuel 14:27. According to I Kings 15:2, 10 and II Chronicles 11:20 there was another daughter (or granddaughter) Maacah, the wife and mother of Judahite kings.

B.V.

ABSOLUTE. The word "absolute," used as an adjective, is the opposite of "relative" and means that which is unconditioned and dependent on nothing else. Some philosophers have used the noun "The Absolute" to designate the ultimate Reality. It is a more inclusive term than "God" and accords rather with PANTHEISM or panentheism than with traditional theism.

J.M.

ABSOLUTION. In the Catholic sacrament of PENANCE, it is the forgiveness of sins. The priest announces the pardon of the sinner in the name of Christ while forgiveness is effected by the sacrament itself. Absolution rests on the priest's power to forgive sins and the recipient's repentance, demonstrated in CONTRITION, CONFESSION, and satisfaction.

In early ROMAN CATHOLICISM absolution was given by the bishop when he declared peace to worshipers who did public penance. This was followed by HOLY COMMUNION. Thomas Aquinas stressed that true forgiveness was granted in penance only when the sinner was genuinely contrite (sorry for sin), confessed wrongs done, and attempted to put wrongs right (that is, made satisfaction for sins). Other liturgical churches, such as the Lutheran and the Episcopalian, also include confession, which concludes with absolution or the announcement of forgiveness to the truly contrite, as part of the Holy Communion service or as separate confessional services.

J.C.

ABSTINENCE. The practice of self-control, of restraint, and refraining from certain activities, habits, foods, and drink. Many religions teach abstinence from one or more activities, foods, and beverages. In Judaism, one is enjoined to refrain from foods declared unclean by the Mosaic code (including pork). Islam teaches abstinence from pork, alcohol, and drugs. In the Roman Catholic church, abstinence from sexual relations is required of priests as a clerical obligation (CELIBACY). Among many pietistic Protestants (see PIETISM) abstinence from alcohol is stressed ("teetotalism"). In Hinduism abstinence from meat is taught in many sects, and beef-eating is rejected by all.

J.C.

ABYSS. The word is derived from the Greek abyssos, meaning "bottomless." It was used to describe the lowest part of the underworld in the ancient cosmology and occurs several times in the NT. The legion of demons possessing the Gerasene demoniac beg Jesus not to send them into the abyss (Luke 8:31), and there is also mention of Abaddon (Greek, Apollyon), ruler of the abyss (Rev. 9:11). The word is used in quite a different sense among the mystics. Their most intense experience of God is strangely ambiguous. God is known as that which is real above everything else, yet so wholly different from everything else that in comparison this reality is also nothing, the ineffable. This pure essence of God, indescribable in human language, can also be called darkness or the wilderness. The doctrine of creation out of nothing is interpreted by some mystics to mean the emanation of the world out of the divine abyss.

J.M.

ABYSSINIAN CHURCH. The ancient COPTIC Christian church of Abyssinia (modern Ethiopia). Abyssinia lies in East Africa and is the only historic Christian country in Africa. Before the breakup of European colonialism, Abyssinia was the only independent country in Africa, although it was conquered, briefly, by Fascist Italy.

Abyssinia lies between the Blue Nile and the Red Sea, southeast of the Sudan. It was founded early by missionaries from Egypt and has many affinities to the Coptic church in Egypt. For example, it never affirmed the decisions of Nicea and is monophysite in its Christology.

The Abyssinian church has two sacraments: baptism and the Lord's Supper. There are many feast days in the year, and the Jewish Sabbath as well as the Christian Sunday is observed. There is a complicated angelology in its worship life, with the archangel Michael playing a leading role. The Virgin Mary and the saints are also venerated.

J.C.

ACCAD. An ancient city of Shinar (Babylonia) mentioned once in the OT as part of the kingdom of Nimrod (Gen. 10:10), and the equivalent of Sumerian "Agade" and Semitic "Akkad" in cuneiform texts. When SARGON I, an aspiring politically minded Semite, won mastery over all the land of Sumer (about 2360 B.C.), he moved his residence from Kish to nearby Akkad. From there he, two sons, and a grandson, Naramsin, conducted energetic military campaigns throughout the Near East.

The impressive dynasty Sargon established is often celebrated as the head of history's first true empire. Nevertheless, it sometimes found a worthy competitor in the empire of Ebla. In time the name "Akkad" came to denote an entire region, not just the city. Presumably Akkad met destruction when the Sargon dynasty expired, about 2180 B.C. Though the site of ancient Akkad has never been identified, its name continued to enjoy mention in the phrase "the land of Akkad and Sumer," a common inscriptional designation for Babylonia.

J. K. K.

ACCURSED. See ANATHEMA.

ACHAIA. Originally a district on the north coast of the Peloponnesus, the peninsula which forms the southern part of the Greek mainland. The Achaeans seem to have invaded Greece in prehistoric times, and were the leaders in the formation of a democratic league of Greek cities, the Achaean League, which figured importantly in the struggles for control of GREECE from the third century B.C. through the time of the coming of the Romans in the middle of the second century.

The Romans gave the name Achaia to the whole of central Greece where they established a province in 140 B.C. with its capitol at Corinth. In Acts (18:12, 27) and in the letters of Paul (I Cor. 16:15; II Cor. 1:1), this is the name given to central and southern Greece, as distinct from the northeastern section, Macedonia (Acts 16:9, 10) and the northwestern section, Illyricum (Rom. 15:19). When Paul wants to refer to all the churches in Greece, he uses the term "Achaia and Macedonia" (Rom. 15:26; II Cor. 9:2; 11:9-10; I Thess. 1:7, 8).

H.K.

ACHAN. A Judahite who broke religious taboos during warfare and thus, along with his family and possessions, was put to death. The story of Achan is found in Joshua 7. When the Israelites were trying to capture the city of Ai, Achan had taken some valuables from the enemy—clothing, silver, and gold—which had been devoted to God (7:21), that is, what belonged to the enemy had been promised to Yahweh and was not to be available for personal use. Achan's wrong led to the defeat of the Israelites because of God's anger. When Achan was discovered, probably through the use of sacred lots, he confessed his sin and disclosed the hiding place of the consecrated goods in his tent. His confession was seen as a way to "give glory to the Lord God of Israel, and render praise to him" (7:19). Achan, after his confession, along with his family, livestock, tent, and all his possessions, was stoned and burned, thus illustrating that things devoted to God must not be used for ordinary purposes and that such abuse brings God's judgment. That Achan's family and possessions were destroyed suggests the belief that the presence of the consecrated items contaminated everything connected with the culprit and thus had to be eradicated. That Achan's name (given as Achar in I Chr. 2:7) is also connected with the Valley of Achor ("trouble"), where the event was set, may suggest that the story originated to explain the name.

J.H.

ACHISH. The king of the Philistine city of Gath with whom David had a tenuous relationship during the last years of Saul's reign in Israel. Their first encounter occurred when David sought sanctuary with Achish outside Saul's domain (I Sam. 21:10-15). Achish proved too dangerous to be David's suzerain at that time, evidently because he sensed that David—who had "slain . . . his ten thousands"—was too dangerous to be his vassal. After several close encounters, however, David once again sought asylum among the Philistines (I Sam. 27:1-12). Achish awarded him the city of Ziklag, and there David dwelt for a year and four months. Achish considered David a loyal vassal, and was prepared to consider him an ally in the great campaign against Israel that finally claimed the lives of Saul and his son Jonathan. Achish even appointed David his personal bodyguard (I Sam. 28:1-2). Other Philistine commanders were suspicious of David, however, and finally forced his return to Ziklag (I Sam. 29). That development both saved David from fratricidal conflict against his own people and enabled him to rescue the women, children, and booty of Ziklag from the clutches of marauding Amalekites (I Sam. 30).

W.S.T.

ACHOR. The name of a valley in lower Palestine, not easily identifiable in modern geography, probably on the border of Judah and Benjamin (Josh. 15:7), possibly in the vicinity of JERICHO and QUMRAN. In the later Israelite tradition Achor was the proverbial starting place for the beginning of the Israelite "conquest" of the land of Canaan (Josh. 7:24-26). Hence Hosea 2:15, envisaging a new and eschatological inheritance of the Promised Land by a redeemed Israel, plays on a popular etymology of the name Achor ("trouble, misery") stating that in the latter days it will be instead a gateway of hope to the people (similarly Isa. 65:10).

In Joshua 7 the name of the valley of Achor is fancifully derived from that of Achan, the Judahite leader who withheld booty from the sack of Jericho and became therefore legendarily responsible for Yahweh's anger and Israel's consequent initial defeat at Ai. The legend undoubtedly underlies the popular etymology of the later tradition.

B.V.

ACOLYTE. In both Protestant and Catholic churches, one who serves the altar with the minister. Among Protestants, the acolyte's duties are lighting and extinguishing the candles and handling the offering. Historically, the acolyte was a member of the highest of the MINOR ORDERS of the Roman Catholic Church.

J.C.

ACROPOLIS. The word literally means "the higher part of a city." The Greeks preferred to build cities at a site where a hill with steep sides could be fortified for protection against attacks. The best-known of these was in ATHENS, where the Acropolis was crowned with a temple (the Parthenon) to the patron goddess, Athena, and overlooked the central market area and other shrines and public gathering places on the lower slopes adjoining.

When Paul visited Athens, according to Acts 17, he addressed the intellectual and civic leaders gathered on or near the AREOPAGUS, the Hill of Ares (Mars), below the Acropolis. Paul's comment on how very religious the Athenians were (Acts 17:22) was wholly appropriate at this spot, with shrines of various traditional Greek gods visible all around, and with the magnificent temple of Athena towering above all else on the summit of the Acropolis.

H.K.

A fish (in Greek, ΙΧΘΥΣ)

- I = Ἰησοῦς = Jesus
- X = Χριστός = Christ
- Θ = Θεοῦ = God's
- Υ = Υἱός = Son
- Σ = Σωτήρ = Savior

The Greek acrostic for "fish," which means "Jesus Christ, God's Son, Savior." The inscribed fish, with such a hidden meaning, was frequently found in the catacombs of the early Christians.

ACROSTIC. A literary composition so arranged that the first letter of each of the lines forms a word or meaningful pattern. In the book of Psalms, the Hebrew writer has developed an acrostic in Psalms 25 and 34. Psalm 119 is arranged in brief sections, each of which is headed by all the successive letters of the Hebrew alphabet (see POETRY, HEBREW). Some editions of the Bible indicate this by the heading at the beginning of each of the twenty-two sections of the Psalm. In the Middle Ages, monks and other poets wrote pious poetry in acrostic form.

The best-known acrostic of early Christianity was formed by a grouping of the names and titles of Jesus, here given in a form transliterated from the Greek:

- Iesous - Jesus
- CHRISTOS - Christ
- THEOU - of God
- UIOS - the Son
- Soter - Savior

As noted by the church father Lactantius and by the church's first true historian, Eusebius (A.D. 260-340), the initial letters spell in Greek the word "fish":

I-CH-TH-U-S. This word, which had links with Jesus' call of fishermen to become "fishers of men" (Mark 1:17; Matt. 4:19), as well as his sharing bread and fish with his followers (Mark 6:38-44; John 21:6-11) served as a powerful symbol of his continuing presence with his followers in worship and in mission.

H.K.

ACTS, APOCRYPHAL. Among documents that survive from the early centuries of the church and from the NT APOCRYPHA (that is, books purportedly apostolic and which enjoyed some status of authority before being rejected and excluded from the CANON of sacred writings) is a group of "Acts." There are five outstanding books.

The earliest title, the Acts of John, about A.D. 150, professes to record the miracles and speeches of the apostle John in Asia. It is gnostic and ascetic in outlook, as indeed are most other examples of this genre, and is biographical, suggesting the close union between Jesus and his disciple. The Acts of Paul contains a section dealing with Thecla, a girl in Asia who refused to marry, because of Paul's insistence that she should be celibate, and became a loyal worker in Paul's missionary endeavors. The Acts of Peter, also second century, centers on Peter's encounter with the magician Simon Magus (see Luke's Acts 8). This document contains the Quo Vadis? story, where Peter is fleeing from martyrdom but is rebuked, and returns to be crucified head-down. The Acts of Thomas is famous for the Hymn of the Pearl, a saga of gnostic redemption, where the soul of man is set free from the corruption of matter. The Acts of Andrew is possibly third century, and is biographical and hagiographic in tone and temper.

R.M.

ACTS OF THE APOSTLES, BOOK OF THE. The second volume of a two-part work, Luke-Acts, written by the third evangelist, but now separated from volume I (the Gospel of LUKE) and arranged in the NT order as the fifth book. According to its superscription (Acts 1:1), it forms the sequel to all Jesus did and taught that Luke recorded in the Gospel. As such a sequel, or continuation of the story of the early church, Acts demonstrates the spread of the gospel from Palestine to Rome.

Internal evidence, as well as the similar superscriptions to both Luke and Acts, makes the common authorship of both books a certainty. The traditional belief that Luke-Acts was written by "Luke, the beloved physician," the companion of Paul, is not necessarily proved by the internal evidence of Acts, however. Acts does not present us with a portrait of or a rendition of Paul's teachings that accords well with the Paul of the undoubtedly genuine letters of Paul. Above all, Luke abandons the keen expectation of the imminent end of the age and assumes, in his narrative, that the ongoing work of the church, which is still under way as Acts closes, is proof that God's plan of salvation is working out through the church set in the here and now of human history. The story, then, of God's gracious dealing with humankind stretches from Galilee to Jerusalem (Luke) to the coming of the Holy Spirit at PENTECOST (chaps. 1-2).

Luke's conception of the mission of the church to the whole world begins in the Gospel (Luke 2:29-30), where the coming of the Messiah is said to be a light to enlighten the Gentiles, and continues on through the book of Acts, turning on the Pentecost experience where people from every nation of the Mediterranean area "hear them [the apostles] telling in our own tongues the mighty works of God" (2:11). The theme of expansion of the COVENANT relationship to include the Gentiles is central to Acts, with the story of the Roman soldier CORNELIUS and his conversion standing at the center of the book. From Cornelius' conversion, Luke moves on to show how the gospel is responded to in faith by non-Jews in Asia Minor and in Europe. A strong minor theme is the reasonableness and moral legitimacy of the gospel, for none of the judges and other authorities who hear Paul and other Christians find them guilty of anything wrong.

Courtesy of Edward P. Blair

Excavated area at the harbor city of Miletus, where Paul addressed the elders from Ephesus (Acts 20:17 ff.)

Luke's outline for Acts is given in 1:8: The gospel is preached in Jerusalem, in Judea and Samaria, and to the ends of the earth. The preaching of the apostles and other evangelists, like Philip and Stephen, forms a large part of Luke's record. Scholarship generally agrees that Luke has shaped the early Christian preaching in the manner that other ancient historians shaped speeches by prominent persons to illustrate the meaning of historical events. We cannot, therefore, think of Peter's or Paul's speeches as precisely what Peter or Paul may have said. Indeed, Paul's speeches are not very like the teachings of Paul in his letters, for according to Acts, both PAUL and PETER preached essentially the same thing, while Galatians 1-2 suggests disagreements between the two. Contemporary scholars generally agree that Acts does not accurately reflect either the life or teachings of Paul. They attribute Luke's presentation to an irenic desire, that is, the wish to stress the unity of the church in its exposure to the non-Christian world.

A prominent feature of Acts is the "we" passages (16:10-17; 20:5-21:18; 27:1-28:16), which suggest that the author was a traveling companion of Paul. Some suggest, on the basis of these passages, that the author was "the man of Macedonia" who asked Paul to come over to Europe.

J.C.

ACTUALITY. That which is the case at this moment. The actual does not necessarily coincide with the real, for someone might hold that reality includes past and future as well as the present actuality, or that there is an invisible or eternal reality transcending what is actual.

J.M.

ADAM AND EVE. The first human couple, from whom all humanity descended. Foremost, Adam and Eve is a generic phrase meaning "humankind" (for example, Gen. 1:27).

In GENESIS. According to the Yahwist's tenth-century B.C. narrative (Gen. 2:4b-3:24), Yahweh shapes man from earth's dust, and by breathing into his nostrils the breath of life, he makes him into an animated creature. The man is placed in the primeval Garden of Eden to tend it. On penalty of death, he is commanded not to eat of the tree of knowledge of good and evil. The man shares in the creation of the animals by naming them. To alleviate the man's loneliness, Yahweh forms Eve from his rib. The two live harmoniously. They are innocent of their nakedness, until the woman, with intellect awakened, yields to the serpent's tempting and the man joins her in eating the forbidden fruit. Immediately Yahweh confronts the couple to issue punishments—pain in childbirth and subordinate status for the woman, and a cursed ground aggravating man's existence as laborer. Thereupon the couple is driven from the garden.

According to the Priestly sixth-century B.C. history (Gen. 1:1-2:4a), God creates man along with the animals on the sixth day. Man is created in the divine image as male and female. Blessing accompanies their unique creation as does the mandate to multiply and exercise dominion over the earth.

In Intertestamental Literature. Adam plays a vital role in the Apocrypha and Pseudepigrapha. In Ecclesiasticus 49:16 Adam is honored "above every living being in the creation," and in II Enoch 30:8-9 he is lauded for being made from seven substances. The Testament of Levi (18:10) promises that after opening the gates of paradise, the Messiah will "remove the threatening sword against Adam." In IV Ezra 7:118, Adam is told that the Fall is not only his, "but ours also who are thy descendants" (compare 3:21; 4:30). Second Baruch 54:19, however, counters that man's sin results from his own action, not Adam's.

In the New Testament. As a historical figure, Adam is twice mentioned in genealogical contexts (Luke 3:38, as "the son of God," and Jude 14). Far more crucial are Paul's Adam-Christ typologies, which maintain that all humanity experiences the impact of both Adam and Christ. In Romans 5:12-21, Paul avers that if the world knows death through Adam's sin, it also knows justification and life through Christ's obedience. In I Corinthians 15:21-22, the certainty of the Resurrection is dramatically expressed in Adam-Christ typology. Some verses later (45-49) Paul claims that whereas Christians in their flesh resemble the first Adam "from the earth," in the Resurrection they resemble Christ, the last Adam and "man of heaven."

Eve appears twice in the NT, in I Timothy 2:11-15 within a statement advocating the submissive status of women in the church, and in II Corinthians 11:3 to illustrate how easily one can be led astray.

J.K.K.

ADAMS, SARAH FLOWER (1805-48). The author of the hymn "Nearer, My God, to Thee" (1841) though it is sometimes erroneously attributed to HARRIET BEECHER STOWE. The text is based on Jacob's vision of a ladder between earth and heaven (Gen. 28:10-22). Adams was born on February 22 in Great Harlow, Essex, England, a daughter of writer Benjamin Flower. Her sister Eliza often set her poems to music. Married to William Bridges Adams in 1834, she was a member of a Unitarian congregation in London. She contributed thirteen hymns to

W. J. Fox's Hymns and Anthems (1841). Her other works include the hymn "He Sendeth Sun, He Sendeth Shower," a translation of Fenelon's "Living or Dying, Lord, I Would Be Thine," Vivia Perpetua, a Dramatic Poem (1841), and The Flock at the Fountains, a catechism and hymns for children (1845). She died August 14, 1848.

N.H.

ADAR. See HEBREW CALENDAR.

ADDISON, JOSEPH (1672–1719). English hymn writer, essayist, poet, and statesman. Best known for "The Spacious Firmament on High" and "When All Thy Mercies, O My God," first published in 1712 in The Spectator. He also wrote "How Are Thy Servants Blest, O Lord," "The Lord My Pasture Shall Prepare," and "When Rising from the Bed of Death." Born May 1, 1672, near Amesbury, Wiltshire, England, Addison was the son of Jane Gulston and the clergyman and writer Lancelot Addison, who once served as dean of Lichfield. Educated at Charterhouse and Queen's and Magdalen colleges at Oxford, Addison received the B.A. in 1691, the M.A. in 1693, and served as a fellow from 1697–1711. He read law and devoted himself to politics, performing duties in a number of government posts before becoming chief secretary for Ireland. His essays from The Spectator and The Tatler are often anthologized alongside those of his friend Richard Steele. Addison married the Countess of Warwick in 1716. He died on June 17.

N.H.

ADIAPHORA. A Greek term meaning "things indifferent," or vestments and ceremonies not commanded by the Bible and thus not necessary for salvation. Adiaphora are nonessentials in worship.

J.C.

ADLER, ALFRED (1870–1937). Austrian psychoanalyst who founded individual psychology and is best known for his concepts of "inferiority feeling" and the "will to power." He was born in Penzing, Austria, on February 7, 1870, and was trained as an ophthalmologist at the University of Vienna Medical School in 1895. He became an associate of SIGMUND FREUD in 1902, but by 1908 he began to argue that the aggressive rather than the sexual drive is primary. He chaired the Vienna psychoanalytic circle when he broke with Freud and wrote one of his most popular works, Study of Organ Inferiority and Its Psychological Compensation (1917).

His other important contribution was The Neurotic Constitution (1917), in which he argued that the principal human motivation is a striving for perfection, which can become a neurotic striving for superiority. He was keenly aware of social as well as individual perspectives.

In 1921 he established the first of thirty child guidance clinics in Vienna. In 1927 he was a visiting professor at Columbia University, New York City, and the Long Island School of Medicine in 1932.

N.H.

ADLER, FELIX (1851–1933). Founder and lecturer of the Society for ETHICAL CULTURE. Born in Germany, Adler came to America when he was six. After graduating from Columbia University in 1870 he went to Germany for further study and received his doctorate at the age of twenty-three. In May 1876, he formed the Society for Ethical Culture, which invited people of all faiths to join in a commitment to a moral excellence as the highest duty of the human being. It was to have no prayers, ceremonies, or rituals. Its meetings were to be discourses on moral and ethical living.

The movement spread quickly throughout the United States and Europe. Its advanced educational methods for children were studied by educators from all parts of the world. Adler established the first free kindergarten for poor children.

Expecting to succeed his father as rabbi of New York's Temple Emanu-El, erected in 1929, Adler preached sermons expounding the more radical theories of REFORM JUDAISM. He angered the congregation and was not offered the post. He authored a number of books, including Creed and Deed (1877), An Ethical Philosophy of Life (1918), and The Reconstruction of the Spiritual Ideal (1924).

L.K.

AD MAJORAM DEI GLORIAM (A.M.D.G.). Latin for "to the greater glory of God." A frequent expression in the writings of IGNATIUS OF LOYOLA, founder of the Society of Jesus (JESUITS). This motto is often inscribed on altars, stained-glass windows, and other objects dedicated to God's work through the church.

J.C.

ADONAI. An honorific title of God. The term is based on the general Hebrew word Adon, which means "lord" and was employed when an inferior addressed a superior. Adon was frequently used in addressing gods in the Near East and the Syrians worshiped a dying-rising vegetation god called Adonis. Adonai is a special form of the word Adon actually meaning "my Lord." In later Judaism, the term functioned almost as a name for God being used instead of the earlier name YAHWEH. (See JEHOVAH.)

J.H.

ADONIJAH. A name (Hebrew meaning "Yahweh is Lord") which was probably very common in OT times but which appears in the Bible rarely (Neh. 10:16, as a contemporary of NEHEMIAH; II Chr. 17:8, as a Levite of the time of King Jehoshaphat of Judah) aside from its reference to the fourth son of DAVID, born to him of his wife Haggith (II Sam. 3:4).

The story of Adonijah in I Kings 1-2 offers a fascinating view into the palace politics of the last days of David's senility and of the circumstances that eventually led to the accession of SOLOMON. With David's demise imminent and his senior brothers also deceased, Adonijah apparently assumed, in the absence of contrary indications, that the kingship was his by right of succession. In this assumption he was supported by Joab, the long-time military mainstay of the Davidic throne, and by Abiathar, representative of the official priesthood. Accordingly he had himself proclaimed king at En-rogel, on the border of Judah and Benjamin (I Kings 1:9), probably a symbolic place of the United Kingdom that had emerged from the ancient conflict of Saul and David.

Adonijah reckoned without the influence on David of Nathan the seer/prophet, of Zadok (representing a rival priesthood to Abiathar's), of Benaiah the son of Jehoiada (a rival to Joab in the military role), and of Bathsheba, the mother of Solomon. Whether or not David had ever in an idle moment designated the son of Bathsheba with whom he was besotted to be his successor (I Kings 1:17, 30), he honored the alleged promise. Solomon was anointed king at David's direction with all due solemnity at Gihon, a place peculiarly associated with Jerusalem and the Davidic conquest (II Sam. 5:8) and rode there on David's mule (I Kings 1:33), the vehicle of royalty.

Adonijah survived the attempted coup d'etat and was merely sentenced to house arrest. He was not included in the chilling will of vengeance that David bequeathed to Solomon (I Kings 2:1-9). However, according to I Kings 2:13-25, Adonijah doomed himself by asking for Abishag, the virgin consort of the senile David, to be his wife. This request was judged by Solomon to be a pretense to royalty. The request was made through Bathsheba (with her cynical encouragement?). Adonijah was therefore put to death by Benaiah. But this death was only one by which Solomon consolidated his kingdom (I Kings 2:13-46).

B.V.

ADONIKAM. One of the Jewish exiles whose descendants returned to Jerusalem from Babylon after the edict of restoration issued by Cyrus in 538 B.C. According to Ezra 2:13, the Adonikam clan numbered 666 at their return; Nehemiah 7:18 gives the figure of 667. Nearly a century later, three other Adonikites returned with Ezra (compare Ezra 8:13).

W.S.T.

ADONIS. A Greek god, originally a young man so handsome that he was loved by the goddess APHRODITE. When Adonis was slain by a bear while hunting, Aphrodite reacted with such grief that the gods allowed his remains to be kept on earth most of the year and only a portion of it in HADES. Generally, the term means "a handsome young man."

J.C.

ADONIZEDEK. An Amorite king of Jerusalem in the era of the Israelite conquest. When news of Joshua's victories over Jericho and Ai reached him, he organized a coalition of five Amorite kings of the hill country to meet the Israelite troops at Gibeon, six miles northwest of Jerusalem (Josh. 10:1-5). The Gibeonites, who had capitulated to Joshua only a short time before (9:1-27), appealed for help. Supported by a great hailstorm on the ascent of Beth-horon, Joshua routed the coalition (10:6-11). Indeed, a ballad sings that Joshua made the sun stand still on that day until the slaughter was completed (10:12-14). The five kings were penned in the cave at Makkedah in which they had taken refuge. Only when his victory was complete did Joshua kill Adonizedek and the others (10:16-27) and seal their bodies in the cave with great stones, which "remain to this very day" (10:27).

W.S.T.

ADOPTION. The establishment, whether by legal process or not, of a relationship modeled on one which exists by nature. An adopted child acquires within a family the title, rights, and privileges he or she would otherwise have possessed by birth. Within a larger society or nation an alien can be adopted ("naturalized") and so acquire the prerogatives of a born citizen.

In the OT. There was no provision in the Mosaic law for familial adoption, though the practice was widespread in the ancient Near East. Inheritance and property disposition, which largely motivated laws governing adoption, were handled by other means in the simpler society of Israel. Some of the earlier Israelite traditions (for example, Gen. 15:2) seem to recall adoption as a practice of ancient times. Also, but only from a work of late Hellenistic times (Esth. 2:7), an elder Jewish cousin adopted an orphaned girl as his daughter.

Legalities aside, there is no doubt that the concept of adoption was operative in Israelite religious thought. Israel itself, alternatively figured as a son or a daughter, had been adopted by the Lord (Exod. 4:22; Ezek. 16; Hos. 11:1-2) and had thus become the Lord's particular possession. Also, the mystique of royalty shared with other Near Eastern cultures dictated that the king, as representative and incarnation of the presence of the national Deity, be considered the adopted son of God (Ps. 2:7; II Sam. 7:14).

In the NT. In Greco-Roman law hyiothesia was a technical term for adoption. In Romans 9:4 Paul applies the word "adoption of sons/children," in a religious sense to signify the privilege that Israel had acquired as God's chosen. The same term is applied by him to the new Israel of faith, the Christian community, which had received the Spirit of God by which it knew itself to have been freed from sin and therefore capable of calling upon God as its Father (Rom. 8:15).

The NT concept of the Christian as the adopted child of God is based on the belief that the Christian has been incorporated into Christ, who by his redemptive act has been constituted the firstborn of many brethren (Rom. 8:29). Christ's own sonship in relation to God is construed by the NT in various ways. In any case, faith in him renders the Christian assimilated to him as God's child in a spiritual and adoptive relationship of rebirth (John 1:12-13).

B.V.

ADOPTIONISM. The doctrine, declared heretical by several councils, which claims that Jesus is the Son of God, not by nature, but by adoption. It was held in early times by the EBIONITES, and in the third century by PAUL OF SAMOSATA, who declared that Jesus was a "mere man" whom God adopted as Son. More recently, several liberal theologians (see LIBERALISM) have held similar views.

In the eighth century, there arose in Spain another doctrine, which was also called "adoptionism." This was based on a radical distinction between the humanity and the divinity of Jesus, similar to that proposed earlier by Nestorius (see NESTORIANS). The Spanish "adoptionists," led by bishops Elipandus of Toledo and Felix of Urgel, held that Jesus, "according to His human nature," is the adopted Son of God. The Word of God incarnate in Jesus is the Son of God "by nature," but the man Jesus is such only "by adoption." These views, condemned by a synod gathered at Frankfort in 794, were later revived by other medieval theologians and repeatedly rejected as heretical.

These two forms of "adoptionism" are very different. While one declares that Jesus is a "mere man" whom God adopted, the other affirms that the Word of God that was incarnate in Jesus is indeed the Son of God by nature, but that the same cannot be said of the humanity of Jesus.

J.G.

ADORATION OF THE MAGI. See MAGI.

ADULTERY. In the Bible, the violation of marital sexual rights and commitments. Both lists of the Ten Commandments prohibit adultery (Exod. 20:14; Deut. 5:18) but no texts give a full explanation of what constituted adultery. It was not equated with all sexual intercourse outside the marriage relationship. Apparently a man could commit adultery against another marriage than his own but a woman only against her own. If a woman was married or betrothed, the husband or male had the right to sole sexual possession, which assured that her children were his. When a man had sex with another man's wife, both were subject to the death penalty (Lev. 20:10; Deut. 22:22). Intercourse of a married male with a female slave, even a betrothed one, or with a virgin was not a capital offense and probably was not classified as adultery. In the former case, a sacrifice was required, and in the latter, the man was expected to marry the female or pay a money equivalent (Lev. 19:22; Exod. 22:16-17; Deut. 22:28-29). If a husband suspected his wife of adultery, she could be subjected to an ordeal (Num. 5:5-31).

Outside OT law, adultery was considered a serious offense. In fact, most Near Eastern cultures considered it a heinous sin or the "great sin" (see Gen. 20:9; Job 31:11). Proverbs warns against the adulteress and adultery (Prov. 7:6-23). For the prophets, Israel's disloyalty to Yahweh was viewed as adulterous infidelity (Hos. 4:12-14; Jer. 3:8-9; Ezek. 16; 23).

In the sayings of Jesus in the NT, lustful looks are identified with adultery (Matt. 5:28), and marriage to a divorced woman is called adultery (Matt. 5:32; Mark 10:11-12; Luke 16:18). Nonetheless, Jesus refused to condemn the woman taken in adultery (John 7:53-8:11). As in the OT, adultery is used to speak of religious infidelity (Rev. 2:22).

J.H.

ADVENT. The first or opening season of the church year, usually beginning four Sundays before Christmas. Advent was formally instituted at the end of the fifth century as a preparation for the celebration of the Nativity of our Lord, or Christmas. Advent also refers to the SECOND COMING OF CHRIST and the final judgment that accompanies the coming of the kingdom of God. Historically, Advent is a time of fasting and repentance, yet it has strong overtones of joy as the Christmas season approaches. The liturgical color of the season is violet or purple, symbolizing the coming of the King and his Kingdom.

J.C.

ADVENTISTS. Throughout the history of the church various groups have stressed the doctrine of the SECOND COMING OF CHRIST. Indeed both the OT and the NT constantly reiterate the note of God's program for the future. The old covenant people of Israel were promised a messianic kingdom, and the early church was told that "this Jesus . . . will come in the same way as you saw him go into heaven" (Acts 1:11). In the earlier centuries of the church those sounding the Second Advent theme included such eminent church fathers as Polycarp and Justin Martyr, as well as the Montanists.

Adventism was revived particularly among the eighteenth-century Pietists (see PIETISM) on the Continent and a number of groups in early nineteenth-century Britain, such as the Plymouth Brethren and the Irvingites. Adventist teaching was embraced in America by the MORMONS, JEHOVAH'S WITNESSES, SHAKERS, and the Millerites (see WILLIAM MILLER), forerunners of the Seventh-Day Adventists. British influence on such men as DWIGHT L. MOODY and CYRUS I. SCOFIELD introduced the teaching to a wide span of U.S. Protestantism, which crystallized into the Fundamentalist movement (see FUNDAMENTALISM). There is a close relationship between MILLENARIANISM, which teaches that there will be a future one-thousand-year period when Christ will reign on earth, and Adventism.

Besides Fundamentalism, the largest remnant of nineteenth-century Adventist movement is the SEVENTH-DAY ADVENTISTS, who came into being after William Miller, a Baptist preacher, had predicted Christ would return in 1844. When his prediction proved to be erroneous, Miller gave up on his mission. Others, however, refused to relinquish Advent teaching. Hiram Edson said he experienced a vision of Christ entering the heavenly sanctuary to cleanse it on the date predicted by Miller. The full implementation of the Second Advent would occur at some future date.

Another follower of Miller was Ellen Gould White, whose visions were regarded as true prophecy and established her as the most prominent leader of the new movement. Mrs. White also determined by visions the necessity of keeping the seventh day as the Sabbath.

There are several smaller Adventist groups in the United States, such as the Advent Christian Church, the Church of God General Conference (Oregon, Illinois), and the Primitive Advent Christian Church.

R.H.

AESTHETICS. The study within philosophy pertaining to the understanding of beauty. The term is also used in a less technical sense as referring to the affective qualities of the human being as differentiated from the rational or cognitive. Thus, in theology, one can speak of the aesthetics of worship, or of the manifestation of symbolic form in church architecture.

I.C.

AFFINITY. Affinity denotes the lines between a woman and her husband's blood relations or between a man and his wife's blood relations, as distinguished from the relationships of blood which tie one to others (consanguinity). Canon and civil law in countries where large numbers of the population are Christians frequently prescribe the permissibility of marriage between persons related by affinity as well as between blood relations.

I.C.

AFFLICTION. In the RSV, the terms "afflict" and "affliction" are used to translate several Hebrew and Greek words, although most suggest abnormal hardships, calamities, and suffering, sometimes imposed on one by others, sometimes self-imposed or the consequence of one's actions, and at other times divinely imposed.

Affliction imposed by others appears throughout the Bible, especially with reference to the Hebrew suffering in Egyptian slavery (Exod. 3:7). Bread eaten at Passover celebrating the escape from Egypt could be called the bread of affliction (Deut. 16:3). Paul speaks frequently of his hardships and the afflictions he suffered (II Cor. 1:4, 8). In addition, prayers in the Psalms ask that God remember the people's afflictions (Pss. 25:18; 107:10). Disease was also considered a form of affliction (Lev. 13:9).

Sometimes afflictions were self-imposed. Part of the ritual of the DAY OF ATONEMENT required self-affliction (Lev. 16:29, 31), that is, fasting and a break with normal activity. Afflictions could be seen as the result of one's actions (Job 5:6) or the consequence of one's iniquities (Ps. 107:17).

Some afflictions are traced to divine action. God afflicted Pharaoh with plagues (Gen. 12:17). Hannah's barrenness was an affliction because God had closed her womb (I Sam. 1:5, 11). Affliction could be sent as divine testing (Ps. 66:11). The suffering servant was afflicted by God (Isa. 53:4, 7) as vicarious suffering.

Paul admonishes those afflicted to endure and even to find joy in their afflictions, which are momentary (II Cor. 4:8, 17; 7:4). Those in affliction should be aided (I Tim. 5:10).

J.H.

AFRICAN METHODIST EPISCOPAL CHURCH. See METHODIST CHURCHES.

AFRICAN METHODIST EPISCOPAL CHURCH ZION. See METHODIST CHURCHES.

AFTERLIFE. See IMMORTALITY.

AGABUS. The name of Agabus appears twice in the Acts of the Apostles. On both occasions he is associated with prophecy in the form of foretelling the future (Acts 11:27-28; 21:10-11). From the first text we learn that Agabus was a prophet, a charismatic preacher associated evidently with the Judean church. Agabus arrived at Antioch, where he predicted "a great famine over all the world" in the days of the emperor Claudius (A.D. 41-54). The closest independent evidence gets to this prediction is the statement in Suetonius (Claudius 18) that there were frequent deaths in the emperor's reign.

The second oracle of Agabus was more specific. Set in Caesarea it was accompanied by an acted symbolism, which was typical of the OT prophets (I Kings 11:29ff.; Isa. 20:2ff.; Jer. 13:1ff.; Ezek. 4:1ff.). Agabus warned Paul not to go to Jerusalem, where he would be delivered to the Gentiles. Agabus' oracle was rejected by Paul, who pursued his course and went to Jerusalem.

Later tradition made Agabus one of the Seventy (Luke 10:1) and a Christian martyr.

R.M.

AGAG. A king of the Amalekites, whose name may have been derived from an Amalekite tribe (compare Num. 24:7; Esth. 3:1). In I Samuel 15, Yahweh ordered Saul into holy war against the Amalekites.

That meant death to every living thing. Saul, however, spared King Agag and the choicest of the flocks, only to be confronted by Samuel with a word of judgment from the Lord. The same day Saul was rejected from being king over Israel. Samuel then said to Agag, "As your sword has made women childless, so shall your mother be childless among women" (1 Sam. 15:33). Then Samuel hewed him in pieces before the Lord!

W.S.T.

AGAPE. In contrast to English language usage, which has one word for LOVE, Greek has several terms in addition to agapē. For example, EROS and PHILIA. In classical Greek the verb agapaō is a neutral term, with a generalized meaning, "to be fond of," "to treat with respect," "to express pleasure" in something, or "to welcome." The last named definition seems to be the root sense of the word.

In the Greek OT, agapē, with its verb equivalent (which is more often used) renders a Hebrew verb ahēb, used of human relationships but more importantly of God's love for the special people in choosing Israel and establishing the covenant with them. This idea plays an important role in fixing the NT use of agapē, meaning "divine love" based on self-giving favor shown to undeserving people.

R.M.

AGE OF REASON. See ENLIGHTENMENT, CHRISTIANITY IN THE.

AGGIORNAMENTO. From the Italian Aggiornore, for "updating." The term was used by POPE JOHN XXIII for the modernization of the Roman Catholic Church by the SECOND VATICAN COUNCIL. It signifies new beginnings in ecumenical relations, the defense of the poor and oppressed, and the translation of the Mass into the local language of the people.

J.C.

AGNOSTIC. From the Greek "not know," signifying the unknown or unknowable. The term was coined by THOMAS HENRY HUXLEY in an 1889 essay that said that a person cannot have knowledge of phenomena that are not apprehended by the senses. The agnostic neither affirms nor denies the existence of GOD or the unseen world, but declares that the evidences for belief are inconclusive. The viewpoint is polemical in insisting that the limits of knowledge must affect belief about the nature of God. But agnosticism is not identical to ATHEISM.

I.C.

AGNUS DEI. From the Greek for "Lamb of God" (John 1:29, 36); an ancient liturgical formula in the Communion service. The Second Trullan Council in A.D. 692 declared that it was forbidden to represent Christ as a lamb, and Pope Sergius I reacted by ordering all priests to sing the Agnus Dei at Communion. This expressed the opposition of the Roman Catholic Church to the iconoclasm of the Second Trullan Council. From the eleventh century the priest beat his breast, bowed, and recited the Agnus Dei three times before taking Communion. The formula is widely used in liturgical services today.

J.C.

AGONY IN THE GARDEN. See GETHSEMANE, GARDEN OF.

AGRAPHA. The term agrapha is Greek, meaning "things that are not written." It refers to words, usually "sayings of Jesus" not found in the Bible's four Gospels, which have been preserved in other sources. There are three specimens calling for comment.

There is one example of a "word of Jesus" in the NT outside the Gospels—in Acts 20:35. Less likely I Thessalonians 4:15 falls into this category.

Then there are agrapha that are found in one or more—but not all—textual traditions of the Greek NT. The longest example is in Mark 16:9-20, printed in the KJV but relegated to the footnotes or margins of all modern editions in view of the poor textual attestation of this "longer ending." More problematical is the text of Luke 22:19b-20, which contains a fuller account of Jesus' words at the Last Supper, and is currently given credence as authentic in spite of the double mention of the cup at the meal. Luke 6 illustrates another textual peculiarity. In some manuscripts, verse 5 follows verse 10, and in its place there is the agraphon: "On the same day he saw a man working on the Sabbath and said to him, 'Man, if you know what you are doing, you are blessed; but if you do not know, you are accursed and a transgressor of the law.'"

Finally, papyri documents discovered in the sands of Egypt, at Oxyrhynchus and more recently at NAG HAMMADI, have brought to light a fund of agrapha, whether as isolated sayings or collected to form a document (for example, The Gospel of Thomas, which has 114 "sayings" of Jesus, gnostic in outlook). Among these sayings are such well-known words, attributed to Jesus, as "Raise the stone, and you will find me; cleave the wood, and I am there." (See APOCRYPHA, NT.)

R.M.

AGRIPPA I and II. "HEROD" was a family name of a succession of rulers in Israel in NT times. Herod the Great (40-4 B.C.) had a grandson born to his son Aristobulus, who was executed in 7 B.C.; thereafter this son was brought to Rome and lived as part of the imperial family. He quarreled with the emperor Tiberius and was imprisoned. Later released on Tiberius' death, he was favored by the next Roman emperor Gaius (or Caligula), who gave him the title of "king," a term that is found in Acts 12:1. This is Herod Agrippa I.

Herod's kingdom was gradually enlarged after A.D. 41, when Claudius became emperor, until the domain extended over an area about the same in size as his grandfather's, who was also named Herod. He was moderately popular with the Jews because of his connection with the Hasmonaeans, who in turn had been associated with the patriotic Maccabees in the second century B.C. This favor is seen in his action regarding the early Christians. He killed James and had Peter incarcerated (Acts 12), but a sudden death in A.D. 44 (Acts 12:20-23) is seen by Luke as a divine judgment on his opposition to the church. A parallel account of his horrible death is related by Josephus in his Antiquities.

Herod left one son to succeed him. Herod Agrippa II was born in A.D. 27 and so was a mere youth on his father's death in A.D. 44, a fact which prevented his claiming the title immediately. In A.D. 50 he was acknowledged by Claudius with the title of "king"—a courtesy honor, to be sure, since Rome would tolerate no rival emperors in the provinces such as Judea and Syria. The emperor Nero, who ruled from A.D. 48 to A.D. 66, added more territory in the north of Palestine to his dominion in A.D. 56. At the latter date, Jewish opposition to Roman rule and Herod's client status welled up in armed revolt at the outbreak of the Jewish war (A.D. 66-72). This led to Jerusalem's destruction in A.D. 70, but Herod lived on in loyalty to Rome until A.D. 100.

His character is best studied from Acts 25-26, where he encountered Paul during the latter's Caesarean imprisonment. Especially interesting and revealing is the snatch of dialogue (in Acts 26:26-29), where Agrippa is confronted by Paul's challenge.

R. M.

AHAB. Seventh king of the northern kingdom of Israel, about 869-850 B.C. He was the son of OMRI and husband of JEZEBEL, daughter of the king of Tyre.

Neither the Deuteronomic historian nor his sources have dealt kindly with Ahab. Whereas his father, Omri, undoubtedly one of Israel's most capable kings, is dismissed with only a few lines (I Kings 16:23-28), however, considerable space is given to Ahab. The reason for this is Ahab's considerable involvement in the prophetic stories, principally those about ELIJAH, which were all important source material for this historian. His judgment, always negative with regard to the kings of Israel, is especially severe of Ahab, who is characterized as having provoked the Lord more than all the other kings who preceded him (I Kings 16:29-34).

Nevertheless, the sources contain enough data to inform us about the positive as well as the negative aspects of Ahab's career, some of the former being also indicated by extra-biblical sources. The Deuteronomist states that Ahab built an altar to Baal in Samaria and worshiped him. This may be quite true, but the names of Ahab's children AHAZIAH and ATHALIAH are Yahwistic. There is no doubt that Yahweh was the national god of Israel as well as of Judah and no reason to think that Ahab departed from the national religion, but in preexilic times this was not the theoretical monotheism of the prophets. Ahab's involvement with Baal was bound up with his marriage to Jezebel, and this was part of the Omrides' policy of cementing good relationships with neighboring peoples. The same policy is evidenced in the giving of Ahab's daughter Athaliah in marriage to the king of Judah.

Archaeology has confirmed the great building program conducted by Ahab at Samaria and elsewhere (I Kings 22:39). Internal organization and stabilization were accompanied by the securing of Israel's borders and astute international alignments. Though committed to a policy of accommodation with the Arameans, whose yoke his father Omri had been unable to shake off, when finally provoked beyond endurance he engaged them in combat and humbled them (I Kings 20:1-30a). His benign treatment of the conquered enemy, the act of a shrewd politician, was condemned by an unnamed prophet as betrayal of true belief (I Kings 20:30b-43). In a later campaign to enforce Aramean reparations he was less successful, however, even though he evidently dominated his ally Judah in this venture. A chance arrow shot ended his life at the siege of Ramoth-gilead, where he died bravely, encouraging his forces to the last (I Kings 22:1-36).

The celebrated Stela of Mesha the king of Moab (the MOABITE STONE, between 840-820 B.C.) testifies that Moab was kept in subjugation to Israel during Ahab's reign. Two years before Ahab's death, "Ahab the Israelite" is listed in an inscription of SHALMANESER III of Assyria as one of an alliance of twelve kings who (apparently successfully) resisted his initial probing at the vulnerability of the West. Israel is credited there with having mounted against Assyria the second largest force.

To Ahab's discredit the Bible makes mention principally of the episode of Naboth's vineyard (I Kings 21:1-24), coveted by Ahab, acquired by him by more than questionable means, and made by Elijah a symbol of his doom. If the story is read attentively, it is evident that the biblical author actually attributes to Jezebel the flagrant disregard of traditional Israelite rights, which Ahab would otherwise have respected, however reluctantly. As in so much else, Ahab is an opportunist and a pragmatist, willing to be instructed in non-Israelite ways if they are to his advantage, but not an inherently evil man.

B. V.

AHASUERUS. A legendary king of Persia who is a protagonist of the book of ESTHER. After he had banished his first wife Vashti, Ahasuerus selected from his harem the beautiful Jewish maiden Esther to be his queen. Esther could thus intercede with the king on behalf of her people when a high official of the empire, the wicked Haman, sought to eliminate Esther's stepfather, MORDECAI, and all other Jews. Her intervention was a success, and Haman was hanged on the very gallows on which he had intended to hang Mordecai. The Jews enjoyed the king's favor ever after. The Ahasuerus of the book of Esther is often identified with Xerxes (486-465 B.C.), although Ezra 4:4-6 would make Darius I eligible for consideration as well. Daniel 9:1 knows him as the father of "Darius the Mede," of whose existence history has no other record.

W.S.T.

AHAZ. A shortened form of Jehoahaz (II Chr. 21:17) meaning "Yahweh has taken [my] hand." The shortening is doubtless due to the reluctance of a biblical author to attribute a Yahwistic name to a king who was remembered as an idolater. Ahaz was the twelfth king of Judah after Solomon and reigned about 735-715 B.C.

On his accession to the throne Ahaz was immediately caught up in the power politics of the Near East. A newly aggressive Assyrian empire under TIGLATH-PILESER III was being opposed in the West by a coalition of small Palestinian and Aramean states. The refusal of Ahaz to join the coalition precipitated an invasion of Judah by the forces of Israel and Damascus (II Kings 16:5; Isa. 7:1-9), and possibly Edom and Philistia as well (II Chr. 28:16-18), which sought to substitute for Ahaz a more malleable chief of state who would favor the anti-Assyrian alliance. Ahaz was supported in his refusal by the prophet Isaiah, and he proved in this instance to have adopted a prudent course, since the inevitable sequel to the coalition was the Assyrian subjugation of Damascus and large parts of Israel (II Kings 15:29; 16:9).

The price Ahaz paid for immunity from Assyrian devastation was, however, a high one. He became the vassal of the Assyrian king and paid him tribute (II Kings 16:7-9). Then he proceeded to carry this subservience to its logical conclusion by adopting the religion of his suzerains and introducing the cult of their gods into the Jerusalem temple, the citadel of the national religion (II Kings 16:10-18; II Chr. 28:22-25). This policy was definitely not supported by the prophet Isaiah (compare Isa. 7:10-17) and was obviously regarded by the biblical historian as total apostasy from the traditional religion of Israel (II Kings 16:17-18).

Whether connected or not with the preceding events, Ahaz is singled out as having sacrificed his children in the bloody rites associated with a "king god" (Adramelech and Anammelech in II Kings 17:31) in the notorious valley of Hinnom on the outskirts of Jerusalem (II Chr. 28:3). This site, also called Topheth (II Kings 23:10; Jer. 7:31-32), witnessed human sacrifices all through preexilic times, despite their condemnation in prophetic religion. It is even possible that the "king god" Melek or Molech was, in the popular mind, identified with Yahweh "the king" (I Kings 11:7; Jer. 32:35).

The geography of Isaiah 7:3 may indicate that the prophet met the king on the latter's return from sacrificing in the valley of Hinnom. If so, a special poignancy is added to the succeeding prophecies.

B.V.

AHAZIAH. The same name as Jehoahaz, which means "Yahweh has taken [my] hand."

1. The son of AHAB, king of Israel about 850-849 B.C., eighth in succession and third of the Omride line. Like his father he was not exclusively devoted to the national Yahwistic religion (I Kings 22:51-53), and in II Kings 1:2-16 he is physically hurt and calls in mortal need on "Baal-zebub, the god of Ekron." There is doubtless in this latter text a dissimulation of background history. Baal-zebub ("lord of flies") is a deliberate Hebrew corruption of Baal-zebul ("Baal the prince"), the title of the aboriginal fertility god of Canaan (compare I Kings 22:53) who only incidentally had been adopted as a patronal deity by the hated Philistines of Ekron.

Ahaziah was not a memorable king. He died without royal issue (II Kings 1:17). During his short reign the kingdom of Moab, which had been subject to Israel in the time of Omri and Ahab, successfully regained its independence (II Kings 1:1; the Stela of Mesha). A joint mercantile venture with Judah in which he was involved seems to have had disastrous results (I Kings 22:48-49; II Chr. 20:35-37).

2. The son of Jehoram and ATHALIAH, called Jehoahaz in II Chronicles 20:17, king of Judah about 842 B.C. He is represented as being influenced by his Israelite-Phoenician ancestry (II Kings 8:26-27; II Chr. 22:2-5), and indeed he joined with his uncle JORAM, king of Israel, in an unsuccessful assault against the Arameans at Ramoth-gilead, where Joram was grievously wounded (II Kings 8:28-29). When Joram was recuperating from his wounds at Jezreel and Ahaziah was attending him, both were caught up in the rebellion of Jehu against the house of Omri that had been stirred up by the prophet Elisha (II Kings 9). In the ensuing massacre both Joram and Ahaziah were slain, the latter under circumstances that are variously detailed by II Kings 9:27-28 and II Chronicles 22:7-9.

Ahaziah's youth and untimely demise left the throne of Judah vulnerable to the machinations of the queen mother, Athaliah, who seized power and ruled for six years in the Phoenician manner supporting the cult of the Canaanite Baal. Eventually she was assassinated in a Yahwistic palace rebellion, and Ahaziah's seven-year-old son Jehoash (Joash), who had been hidden from his grandmother's murderous designs, was proclaimed king (II Kings 11; II Chr. 24:1).

B.V.

AHIJAH. This name, which means "Yahweh is a brother" (also spelled Ahiah), is borne by six OT figures, including the father of the third king of Judah, Baasha (I Kings 15:27 ff.), and persons mentioned only in passing (I Chr. 2:25; 11:36; 26:20; and Neh. 10:26). The most significant Ahijah, however, was the prophet of Shiloh, whose work is recounted in I Kings 11; 14 and II Chronicles 9:29; 10:15. This Ahijah arranged to encounter JEROBOAM, the son of Nebat, a young supervisor of Solomon's forced labor gangs, while the latter was walking on a country road. Ahijah took the new garment that he was wearing, tore it into twelve pieces and handed ten to Jeroboam with the charge that he become ruler over the ten northern tribes of Israel. In a speech redolent of Deuteronomic theology, Ahijah justified this insurrection as a divine retribution against Solomon for worshiping foreign deities (I Kings 11:29-39).

Not long afterward, Jeroboam sounded the clarion call, "To your tents, O Israel" (I Kings 12:16), and the division of the kingdom was effected. But his subsequent decision to erect calves of gold, dedicated with the words "Behold your gods, O Israel, who brought you up out of the land of Egypt" (I Kings 12:28), was judged by the prophet to be apostasy. For this sin, Ahijah announced the death not only of ABIJAH, Jeroboam's son (I Kings 14:12), but the utter elimination of the house of Jeroboam. This judging work of God was carried out in due course, though unwittingly, by Baasha, king of Judah (I Kings 15:29-30). W.S.T.

AHIMAAZ. A name translated "brother is counselor." Two persons bear this name in the OT.

(1) Father of Ahinoam, Saul's wife (I Sam. 14:50).

(2) A son of ZADOK, high priest in David's cabinet (II Sam. 15:27). During ABSALOM's rebellion, Ahimaaz and Jonathan, Abiathar's son, maintained communication between the fugitive David and his Jerusalem supporters (15:27-28, 36). When this espionage activity, which kept David informed about Absalom, was discovered, Ahimaaz and Jonathan fled and eluded Absalom's search party by hiding in a well at Bahurim. Thereupon they told David about Ahitophel's anti-Davidic counsel and remained with him (17:17-21).

Later when Ahimaaz eagerly volunteered to carry word about Absalom's defeat to David, he was turned down by Joab, who instead sent a Cushite slave to convey grim tidings of the prince's death. With renewed effort Ahimaaz obtained Joab's permission. By outrunning the Cushite, Ahimaaz was the first to inform David of the victory. Evasive about Absalom, Ahimaaz left it to the Cushite to impart the worst (II Sam. 18:19-32). Subsequently, this Ahimaaz, or another, was Solomon's son-in-law and commissioner in the district of Naphtali (I Kings 4:15).

J.K.K.

AHIMELECH. ("The brother [God] is king.")

(1) Son of Ahitub and chief priest at NOB. In his flight from Saul, David visited Ahimelech and falsely claimed that he was on a royal assignment. Ahimelech gave the famished David "the bread of the Presence" from Yahweh's sanctuary, which, according to law (Lev. 24:5-9), was the sole property of priests. Also he delivered to this unarmed outlaw the sword of Goliath (I Sam. 21:1-9). As witness to these proceedings, Doeg the Edomite informed Saul, who read this as evidence that the eighty-five priests of Nob were treacherously seeking his demise. Summarily he commanded their execution. When Saul's retainers refused to obey this outrageous order, Doeg freely complied. Abiathar, the sole survivor and son of Ahimelech, fled to and obtained asylum with David (22:9-23).

(2) Son of Abiathar, who escaped the slaughter at Nob, and grandson of Ahimelech, son of Ahitub. This assumes the accuracy of I Chronicles 24:3, 31, since the names of Abiathar and Ahimelech are presumably transposed in II Samuel 8:17 and I Chronicles 18:16; 24:6.

(3) A Hittite who served David (I Sam. 26:6).

J.K.K.

AHIMSA. Non-injury, the basis of traditional Indian ethics and the inspiration for the nonviolent resistance of MOHANDAS GANDHI (1869-1948).

In early HINDUISM, ahimsa was understood as emphasizing the unity of life. The animal sacrifices prescribed in the VEDAS were seen as being in accord with ahimsa, because these sacrifices united the people with the gods.

JAINISM rejected this view from the beginning and saw ahimsa on the personal level instead. The Jains expect each individual to practice ahimsa—that is, to avoid injuring any living being. They have always interpreted ahimsa in the strictest possible sense. Therefore Jain monks beg all their food, search it carefully for animal content, sweep the road ahead of them to avoid crushing any insect, and wear a cloth over the mouth to prevent insects from entering.

BUDDHISM has always sought the middle path between indulgence and asceticism. So too, it practices a more relaxed version of ahimsa. Buddhists do not count a death as a breach of ahimsa unless it was intentional. For Buddhists, ahimsa is more positive than negative, more directive than binding.

Most Hindus today place some emphasis on ahimsa. Most practice vegetarianism, in partial adherence to ahimsa. Those who seek purification or enlightenment (MOKSHA) practice a more strict ahimsa. Ahimsa received international attention in this century because of Gandhi. Through passive resistance, civil disobedience, and hunger strikes he led India to independence and weakened many of the CASTE divisions in Indian society. (See KARMA.)

K./M.C.

AHURA MAZDA. In ZOROASTRIANISM the supreme deity, creator, and leader of the forces of good

Courtesy of the Oriental Institute, University of Chicago

Ahura Mazda, the Persians' winged god against those of evil. In Avestan, the language of the Zoroastrian Scriptures, the name means "Wise Lord." Certain schools of Zoroastrian thought have come close to DUALISM, making Ahura Mazda and Angra Mainyu, or Ahriman, the principle of evil, virtually equal, and eternal antagonists. But the most ancient Zoroastrian teachings seem to agree with modern adherents of the faith in viewing Ahura Mazda as a supreme, MONOTHEISTIC god who will in due course triumph utterly over evil, which derives from a lesser source.

R. E.

AI. A Canaanite city, "beside Bethel" (Josh. 12:9), identified with a modern site called et-Tell, about ten miles north of Jerusalem. Joshua 7 recounts an initial abortive raid upon Ai from their base at Jericho by Joshua's forces. The setback and casualties suffered by the Israelites led to the discovery of corruption within their own ranks, for Achan, the son of Carmi, had kept some of the "devoted things" of Jericho, namely, booty that had been reserved by Yahweh for sacred purposes. As soon as Achan and his entire household had been stoned and burned with fire in the valley of Achor, the battle against Ai was resumed. Joshua 8:1-29 recounts Joshua's strategy against the city. He began by sending an ambush of thirty thousand men by night to hide west of Ai. Joshua, with the bulk of the Israelite force, feigned an attack against Ai from the north two days later, then deliberately retreated, drawing the Ai defense force out of the city in pursuit. The ambush was thus able to enter the city and put it to the torch and then join Joshua's men in slaughtering the confused populace of twelve thousand people. The conclusion suggests that the story was told partly in order to explain the existence of a heap of ruins, which remains "to this day" (v. 28), and a great heap of stones (under which the king of Ai was buried), "which stands there to this day" (v. 29).

The likelihood that the account in Joshua is a historically accurate depiction of the demise of Ai is diminished by the fact that archaeology cannot demonstrate that the town existed between about 2500 B.C. and a date somewhat after the Israelite conquest of Palestine. This fact has led some to suggest that the story really recalls the conquest of Bethel, about a mile to the west, which was destroyed by fire in the thirteenth century B.C.—about the time of the Israelite conquest.

W.S.T.

AILLY, PIERRE D' (1350–1420). French cardinal, theologian, and prominent advocate of a council to reform the church and end the Great Schism (1378–1417). Born in Compiègne, France, Pierre d'Ailly was educated at the University of Paris, and in 1389 he became its chancellor. Skilled in nominalist philosophy (see NOMINALISM) and theological debating, he was skeptical about reason finding truth, but accepted church dogma on faith. In this way he influenced Martin Luther's view of reason. For years he worked to resolve the Great Schism, which divided Christendom between rival popes at Avignon and Rome. With the University of Paris and others he tried to persuade both popes to resign, and he eventually joined the cardinals of both in calling the Council of Pisa, 1409. Pisa elected a third pope, Alexander V—succeeded within ten months by Pope John XXIII, but popes Gregory XII and Benedict XIII refused to step down. Pope John XXIII made Pierre a cardinal in 1411 and sent him to Germany as papal legate in 1413. Yet Pierre worked to have the Council of Constance (1414–18) depose all three popes. It did, and elected Martin V. Pierre fought to keep the cardinals from losing their traditional election role and helped to condemn JOHN HUSS.

C.M.

AKBAR THE GREAT (1542–1605). The wisest of the Mogul emperors of India; one of the most celebrated Oriental emperors of modern times. He succeeded to the throne in the Punjab in 1556 but was under a regency until 1560. The first seven years of his reign were occupied with warfare, in which he established his authority in several provinces until he ruled the greater part of India. He is chiefly remembered for his wonderful administrative ability and tolerance of other religious beliefs. He studied all religions and adopted for himself a pure deism, embracing them all. A patron of the arts, Akbar established schools throughout the empire where Muslims, Hindus, and others might study together. Because of his tolerance and sympathy of others he gained for himself the title of "guardian of mankind."

W.G.

AKHENATON ("the splendor of Aton"). The later name of Amenophis IV, an Eighteenth Dynasty Pharaoh (about 1364–1347 B.C.) who temporarily transformed Egyptian culture and religion by rigorously promoting the sun-god Aton at the expense of the established imperial deity Amon.

Brooklyn Museum, Charles Edwin Wilbour Fund

Akhenaton (left) with his wife, Nefertiti (right); sculptor's limestone model found at Akhenaton (Tell el-Amarna)

Domestic Policy. When Amenophis IV succeeded his father, Amenophis III (about 1403–1364), he boldly replaced the cult of Amon with that of Aton. Lacking earthly visible form, this one god was the Solar Disk which, with its life-giving power, was claimed worthy of human veneration. In his fifth year, Amenophis IV broke with the powerful priesthood of Amon by leaving Thebes and establishing a new capital at Akhetaton ("the Horizon of the Solar Disk"), near modern Tell el-Amarna. Contending that he was the one mediator available between the Aton and humankind, Amenophis changed his name to Akhenaton.

Aton was celebrated as the sole deity and creator of all. A near approximation of monotheism was achieved, but its impact on the emerging Israelite faith less than a century before Moses was negligible. Under Akhenaton's direction, Amon's name was systematically removed from Egyptian monuments. Also Egyptian literature and art were channeled to give the new religion compelling expression. Akhenaton was largely motivated by a political desire to curb the influence of the Amon clergy and to unify the empire under a new form of worship. Although this upstart religion produced a superb hymn to the Aton, it fostered no substantive theology or ethic.

Akhenaton's reform was short-lived. He was succeeded by his son-in-law, Tut-ankh-aton (about 1347–1338), who was obliged to make peace with the Amon priesthood. Without delay he reestablished the cult of Amon, changed his name to Tut-ankh-amon, and returned the court to Thebes. Soon all Egypt regarded Akhenaton's religious innovations as heretical.

Foreign Policy. Akhenaton's preoccupation with domestic concerns led to indifference and incompetence in external affairs. Nearly four hundred AMARNA letters excavated at Akhenaton's capital attest that Egypt's influence in Asia deteriorated rapidly at this time. Mainly written by Akhenaton's vassals in Palestine and Phoenicia, this correspondence reveals a chaotic environment wherein city-kings unassisted by Egypt engaged in a life and death struggle to maintain their own positions. Owing to Akhenaton's complacency, the advantage now fell to the Hittites. Only with the emergence of the Nineteenth Dynasty (about 1306-1200) was the trend reversed.

J.K.K.

AKIBA, RABBI (also AKIVA) (A.D. 50–132). Scholar and religious martyr who inspired the revolt against the Romans. Originally an illiterate shepherd, Akiba was encouraged by his wife, Rachel, to study the TORAH. He began his studies when he was forty. He became the most prominent teacher of the MISHNAH and Jewish leader of his time. Akiba personally intervened in Rome in behalf of his suffering people. As the Roman rule stiffened, he urged Bar Kokhba and other Jewish patriots to rebel against their oppressors.

In his interpretation of Jewish law, Akiba advocated democratic procedures, urging that decisions be rendered in accordance with the views of the majority of leading scholars and not on the basis of personal authority. In the last moments of his life, when tortured by his Roman executioner, Akiba calmly recited, without showing any sign of physical pain, the prayer that begins, "Hear, O Israel, the Lord our God, the Lord is One."

L.K.

AKKADIAN. See ASSYRIA AND BABYLONIA.

ALAND, KURT. Born in 1915, Aland completed his theological studies at Berlin. He has held professorial appointments in the fields of NT and church history at Berlin, Halle, and is currently professor at Muenster in West Germany. His major scholarly contributions have been as editor of the world-standard critical edition of the Greek New Testament, Novum Testamentum Graece (25th ed.) and as a member of the international team that prepared the United Bible Societies' Greek New Testament (1966).

H.K.

ALB. A basic clerical VESTMENT, adapted from the ancient Roman tunic. Its name is from the Latin alba, or "white." The alb was—and is today in many churches—worn for Holy Communion. A wide, white linen robe with sleeves, it is covered with the stole and sometimes with the chasuble.

J.C.

ALBAN. The first British martyr, perhaps killed during the persecution of DIOCLETIAN, early in the fourth century. BEDE says that he was a pagan who hid a fugitive Christian priest. The latter converted him, and when the authorities arrived, Alban took the priest's clothes and was killed in his stead.

J.G.

ALBERTUS MAGNUS. Dominican theologian of the thirteenth century, noted for his studies of ARISTOTLE and of natural sciences, and for having been the teacher of THOMAS AQUINAS. He outlived his famous disciple, whom he then defended against charges of heresy.

His main contribution to the field of theology—as well as to his disciple Thomas—was his openness to the philosophy of Aristotle. For centuries, the Platonic tradition had dominated philosophy in Western Europe (see PLATONISM). In Albertus' time, works of Aristotle previously unknown among Latin-speaking Christians were being translated. As a commentary on Aristotle, the works of AVERROES, a Muslim philosopher, were also translated. On the basis of these writings, some philosophers, particularly at the University of Paris, began taking positions that many deemed heretical. These philosophers—the "Latin Averroists"—held, for instance, that reason is independent of faith, and that the world is eternal. Reacting to such views, most theologians held that reason must be guided by faith in all philosophical inquiry, and that the doctrine of the eternity of the world is an example of how reason proceeding by itself errs.

Albertus rejected both extremes by distinguishing between philosophy and theology. Philosophy seeks truth on the basis of reason, apart from revealed truth. Theology is grounded on revealed truth, which reason alone cannot discover. Philosophy then is autonomous as long as it remains within its proper sphere, but errs when it goes beyond the limits of reason. Reason, for instance, can prove neither the eternity of the world nor its creation out of nothing. This is a matter for theology to discuss, since it falls in the realm of revealed truth, and not of autonomous reason.

J.G.

ALBIGENSES. A heretical group that gained many adherents in southern France late in the twelfth and early in the thirteenth centuries. They were named after the town of Albi, where they were particularly numerous. Often also called CATHARS, they held doctrines very similar to those of MANICHAISM, although it is difficult to prove any connection between the two movements. It seems that they derived their teachings from the Bogomils of Bulgaria.

They were extreme dualists, holding that there are two eternal principles—one good and one evil. In the present world, spirits are the creation of the good principle, whereas matter is evil. Therefore, "true believers" must lead a life of extreme asceticism, rejecting the temptations of the body. Although mere "believers" were not expected to do this, the "perfect" sometimes starved themselves to death in a rite called endura. Worship must be purely spiritual, with no material elements such as those used in the sacraments of the church. Since matter is evil, they also denied the physical INCARNATION of God in Jesus and the final RESURRECTION of the body.

In southern France, their doctrines soon became involved in the resistance of Languedoc to be incorporated into France. After several unsuccessful attempts to convert them, INNOCENT III proclaimed a crusade against them. Under the leadership of Simon de Montfort, this was an exceedingly cruel affair, punctuated by massacres. The failure of Catholics to convert the Albigenes contributed to DOMINIC's decision to found a new Order of Preachers, commonly known as Dominicans. By the fifteenth century, the last traces of the Albigenes had disappeared.

J.G.

ALBRIGHT, WILLIAM F. (1891–1971). World-renowned scholar and teacher in Semitic languages (Johns Hopkins University) and biblical archaeology (American School of Oriental Research, Jerusalem). His linguistic skills shed new light on Hebrew language and biblical history, and his archaeological methods made more precise the datings of ancient sites and events. His best-known works include From the Stone Age to Christianity, (1940, 1957) and The Archaeology of Palestine (1949, 1964).

H.K.

ALCHEMY. A prescientific body of practices, which were thought to produce long life and immortality and to transmute base metals into gold. Chinese alchemists conducted experiments with recipes derived from the Taoist sacred writings (see TAOISM) and the system of the I CHING. Yang, the male principle, was the symbol for mercury, and yin, the female principle, for lead; their fusing was supposed to yield gold. By using an elixir made from that gold, the alchemist would attain immortality.

Western alchemy followed a similar theory of using transmuted gold for purification. It began in Alexandria around the time of Christ and used mystical and Aristotelian thought as the basis of its experiments. Because Western alchemists looked forward to immortality after death, they did not seek it in the physical world. However, interest in longevity from elixirs of gold and silver remained strong at least until the sixteenth century. Understood metaphorically, alchemy can symbolize the purification of the practitioner, the death and resurrection of Christ, or, as the psychologist C. G. Jung saw it, the process of becoming an individual.

K./M.C.

ALCUIN (735–804). A native of York, England, and one of the key figures in the Carolingian Renaissance. After serving as head of the cathedral school in York, he moved to the Frankish kingdom, where he became CHARLEMAGNE's personal tutor and adviser in religious matters. He is mostly responsible for the revival of learning during Charlemagne's reign.

J.G.

ALDERSGATE. See WESLEY, JOHN.

ALEXANDER, ARCHIBALD (1772–1851). An American Presbyterian minister. Alexander served as president of Hampden-Sydney College from 1796 to 1804. Moving to a prominent pastorate in Philadelphia, he urged the General Assembly to found a seminary at Princeton. They did so in 1812. As a leader of Old School Presbyterianism, he thus helped found Princeton Theological Seminary and was its first president.

N.H.

ALEXANDER, CECIL FRANCES (1818–95). Author of more than four hundred hymns, including "All Things Bright and Beautiful," "Once in Royal David's City," "Jesus Calls Us O'er the Tumult," and "There Is a Green Hill Far Away." She is also the translator of St. Patrick's hymn, "I Bind unto Myself Today."

Born in Ireland to the mayor of Miltown House, County Tyrone, she was married in 1850 to William Alexander, bishop of Derry (1867–93), archbishop of Armagh, and primate of all Ireland (1893 till death). Alexander published four books: Verses for Holy Seasons (1846), Hymns for Little Children (1848), Narrative Hymns for Village Schools (1853), and Poems on Subjects in the Old Testament (1854, 1857). Other of Alexander's hymns that appear in modern hymnals, are "Saw You Never, in the Twilight," "His Are the Thousand Sparkling Rills," and "He Is Risen, He Is Risen."

N.H.

ALEXANDER, FRANZ GABRIEL (1891–1964). Born in Budapest on January 22. He studied medicine at Göttingen and later taught at the Berlin Psychoanalytic Institute. His 1924–25 lecture series, published as The Psychoanalysis of the Total Personality (1927; Eng. trans. 1930) developed Freud's theory of the SUPEREGO or CONSCIENCE. In 1928 he was invited to the University of Chicago, and in 1929 collaborated at Boston on a study of delinquency, published as The Roots of Crime (1933). Alexander returned to Chicago in 1932 to found the Chicago Institute for Psychoanalysis, which he also directed, serving concurrently in the Department of Psychiatry of the University of Illinois medical school.

Alexander and his students engaged in research on the relationship between emotional disturbances and physical illnesses, advancing the theory that psychosomatic disease is not an attempt to express emotional conflict (Freud), but a physical expression of a constant or recurring state. He has been called the Father of Psychosomatic Medicine. In 1956 he established a research program in psychiatry and psychosomatic medicine at Mount Sinai Hospital, Los Angeles, exploring the effect of the therapist's personality on treatment.

I.C.

ALEXANDER THE GREAT. Alexander III, son of Philip II of Macedonia, is called "the great" because of his vast conquests in Europe, Asia Minor, the Middle East, Egypt, Persia, and Southwest Asia as far as the Indus River in India. He was born in Pella, capital of Macedonia, in 356 B.C. His father was a military genius who made himself master of Greece and the Balkans, laying the foundation for Alexander's greater empire.

Alexander was educated by the philosopher Aristotle, who drilled the concept of Greek superiority into his pupil. Upon the death of Philip II, Alexander invaded Persia—that ancient threat to Greece—with a copy of The Iliad by his side.

First Alexander had to subdue the tribes and city states that revolted against Macedonian rule. This he completed by 334 B.C. and crossed the Hellespont, beginning a series of campaigns from which he would not return.

Alexander first fought the Persians at the Granicus River (May–June 334 B.C.) and defeated them. During the winter western Asia Minor was conquered. At Issus, Alexander routed the Persians and turned south into Syria. At Tyre, it was necessary to lay a long siege, but the city fell in July 332 B.C. In November 332 B.C. Egypt surrendered and greeted him as pharaoh. In July 331 B.C. Alexander was in the Middle East, on the Euphrates River. The war was won when Alexander defeated the Persians on the plain of Gaugamela.

The emperor Darius was killed by traitors in 330 B.C., and Alexander had him buried with honors. He advanced eastward to the Caspian Sea and on into Afghanistan, campaigning until 328 B.C. In the summer of 327 B.C. Alexander moved into India. By spring, 326 B.C., he crossed the Indus River and fought his last battle at the Hydaspes River. When Alexander attempted to go on, his army revolted; Alexander turned back. He left India in September 325 B.C., marching across the Baluchistan Desert back to Persia.

Alexander sought to combine the Greek and Persian nobility into one great ruling force. HELLENISM applies to this marriage of East and West. While camped on the Tigris River, Alexander fell ill after an orgy, dying on June 13, 323 B.C. His empire split into several parts under various generals.

Alexander was a paradox—brave and loyal, intelligent and kind; he could also fall into drunk-eness and cruelty. It must be admitted though that he did change history.

J.C.

ALEXANDRIA. A city in Egypt founded by ALEXANDER THE GREAT in 331 B.C. and subsequently turned into the major intellectual and cultural center of the Hellenistic world by his successors in Egypt, the PTOLEMIES. Constructed on a strip of land between Lake Mareotis and the Mediterranean Sea, the city was provided with excellent harbors and became a major commercial meeting place for Africa, Asia, and Europe.

The Ptolemies made the city into their capital. They referred to it as "Alexandria beside Egypt" to distinguish their Hellenistic (Greek) culture from the local Egyptian. After his early death, Alexander the Great's body was enshrined in the city. Lavish building projects and the city's cultural, educational, and commercial attractions made it second only to Rome in size and splendor.

The city was famous for many of its buildings, including the world-renowned Pharos (lighthouse), one of the seven wonders of the ancient world. Two other structures are worthy of note since they helped make Alexandria the chief intellectual center of the time. (1) The so-called Museum was like a modern university where literature, arts, and sciences were studied and state-supported professors lectured. (2) The library, founded by Ptolemy I (323-285 B.C.), eventually housed over 500,000 manuscripts collected from throughout the Greco-Roman world and even from as far away as India. Major portions of the main structure of the library and its contents appear to have been destroyed during Caesar's Egyptian campaign in 48 B.C. According to some ancient sources, Mark Antony later presented the Royal Library of Pergamum to Cleopatra to help replace the loss. The exact date of the library's final destruction remains uncertain. Scholars attribute its destruction to either Bishop Theophilus (A.D. 391) or the Muslim caliph Omar (A.D. 641). Its great splendor and use had declined years before either of these dates however.

Alexandria had a diverse population estimated at almost a million people at its zenith. Many Jews settled in the city, where they were treated as a rule with tolerance and participated in many facets of the city's life. Tradition traces the first Greek translation of the Hebrew Torah to Alexandria. Numerous outstanding Jewish scholars worked in the city. Here Aristobulus and Philo, the latter a contemporary of Jesus, labored to integrate Greek thought and philosophy with the Hebrew scriptures and Judaism. In the early Christian centuries, a famous catechetical school flourished in the city, numbering among its teachers Clement and Origen.

J.H.

ALEXANDRIAN THEOLOGY. A theological tradition which, although centered in Alexandria,

Egypt, was widely influential throughout the Greek-speaking church, at least until the time of the Arab conquests. It combined elements of the PLATONIC tradition with others from Scripture, as had been done in the first century by the Jewish philosopher PHILO. Its most important early teachers were CLEMENT OF ALEXANDRIA and ORIGEN. But it was in the controversies regarding Christology, beginning in the fourth century, that it came to the foreground as the main rival of ANTIOCHENE THEOLOGY.

Alexandrian theology emphasized the divinity of Jesus and the union between that divinity and his humanity. The Christology of the APOLLINARIANS, condemned at the Council of Constantinople, was typically Alexandrian. At the Council of Ephesus, Cyril of Alexandria won a victory for this type of theology by having the Nestorians condemned. Finally, extreme Alexandrian theology, in the form of MONOPHYSITISM, was condemned by the COUNCIL OF CHALCEDON, and much later, as Monothelism (the theological doctrine of the MONOTHELITES), by the Third Council of Constantinople.

J.G.

ALFORD, HENRY (1810-71). Best known as the author of "Come, Ye Thankful People, Come," Alford also devoted twenty years to producing a five-volume definitive edition of the Greek New Testament. Born on October 7 in London to an Anglican rector and his wife, Alford was educated at Charmouth, Ilminster, and Trinity College, Cambridge, and was ordained deacon at Exeter Cathedral in 1833 and priest at St. Margaret's, Westminster, on November 6, 1834. From 1841 to 1857 he was examiner in logic and moral philosophy at the University of London. He became dean of Canterbury Cathedral in 1857 and served there until his death.

Other Alford hymns in contemporary collections are "Forward! Be Our Watchword," and "Ten Thousand Times Ten Thousand." Alford translated and compiled hymns, and he wrote books on other subjects.

N.H.

ALIENATION. The phenomenon of alienation has received attention from philosophers, sociologists, psychologists, theologians, and many others. In theology, it has been chiefly theologians of existentialist background, such as BULTMANN and TILICH, who have used the notion of alienation or ESTRANGEMENT to explain the concept of sin. In classical theology, SIN was held to be the state of being turned away from God (aversio a Deo). Theologians have seen this as the basic form of alienation and have claimed that it is correlated with other forms—alienation from nature or the sense of not being at home in the world; alienation from other people who, in the absence of God, no longer have a "family relationship"; and even alienation from oneself, for if we are creatures or children of God, then a relation to God is necessary for our well-being.

Many atheistic philosophers would dispute this correlation. In the last century, FEUERBACH argued that it is precisely belief in God that alienates us from our own humanity, because we project all the desirable human qualities upon God and attribute to ourselves only what is weak and base in human nature. MARX followed him in teaching that religion causes us to revolve around a false sun (God) to the neglect of our own human well-being, though he disagreed that religion is the fundamental cause of alienation, seeing it rather as a symptom of alienation in the area of work and production. NIETZSCHE and SARTRE have both taught that belief in a transcendent God is inimical to a true humanity, for if everything in the long run is decided by God, human freedom and transcendence are illusory. All of these atheistic philosophers have considered God to be an oppressive power and have believed that the abolition of God is a necessary step in the liberation of humanity for a more truly human existence.

It can hardly be denied that some theologians have presented God in oppressive terms. On the other hand, atheism as we have known it in the past hundred and fifty years or more is so far from having abolished alienation that it has rather intensified it. Theologians may have been too ready to suggest that alienation from God leads to other forms of alienation, but it is even less plausible to claim that these alienations stem from belief in God.

J.M.

ALI ĪBN ABĪ TĀLĪB. Cousin of MUHAMMAD and husband of Muhammad's daughter Fatima; fourth caliph of the SUNNITES and first imam of the SHĪ'ITES. He embraced ISLAM about the age of ten and is considered the first Muslim after Muhammad's wife Khadīja. The Shi'ites give him a place of pivotal importance alongside God and the Prophet Muhammad. His tomb, near Kufa, Iraq, is an important pilgrimage center.

K./M.C.

ALLAH. The general name for God among Arabic speaking people. Before MUHAMMAD's time, Allah was worshiped in the Arabian peninsula as one among many deities. Most scholars say that he had an important position, perhaps as the god of weather. Muhammad charged that people of MECCA neglected Allah, the One, supreme God, in favor of lesser deities, who they hoped would intercede for them with Allah. Muhammad denied that Allah had any partners or offspring and rejected all mediators, although he apparently accepted the reality of the lesser gods.

Muhammad affirmed Allah as a jealous and personal God and as a just, yet merciful, judge. Allah is the absolute creator, sustainer, ruler, destroyer, and restorer. The QUR'AN, which MUSLIMS believe was written by Allah and revealed verbatim to Muhammad, gives many titles or qualities of God. These and others were collected to form the "ninety-nine beautiful names of God." The set of names can be divided into two groups: those emphasizing God's power and wrath, and those emphasizing God's compassion and providence. Some names show the influence of Greek philosophy: "The Existing" and "The Necessarily Existing."

Since Muhammad's death, the major influence on the understanding of Allah has been the tension between the frequently anthropomorphizing literal view and Greek-based rationalism. That conflict has produced three schools of thought: traditionalism, rationalism, and mysticism. Traditionalism teaches the acceptance of doctrine because the Prophet taught it, but rejects logical inferences from the Qur'an. For example, traditionalists reject the view that God has eyes, while affirming the Qur'an's teaching that God sees. Rationalists also reject such conclusions, but they take the opposite position from the traditionalists. For rationalists, passages in the Qur'an that speak of God as sitting on a throne or seeing are purely metaphorical. Rationalists define God through negatives; God does not have a body, God is not in only one place, God is not bound by anything. Mystics reject both traditionalism and rationalism as irrelevant and teach an intuitional, direct understanding of God. For them, Allah is pure will, not intellect. The theologian AL-GHAZZALI (A.D. 1058-1111) systematized this view, which has enjoyed wide popularity since Islam's early centuries. Ghazzali remains Islam's greatest theologian, comparable in influence to Augustine in Christianity.

K./M.C.

ALLEGORY. Two uses of the term are found in theology.

Literary. As a literary form allegory means "a figurative expression by which something is said other than what the word used normally means" (the Greek allegorōō means "to say something other than" the obvious; see Gal. 4:24). Allegory can be understood as an extended metaphor or a sustained imaginative story in which characters represent virtues and vices (Spenser's Fairie Queene and Bunyan's Pilgrim's Progress are good popular examples). Parts of the OT share this literary form, namely, Judges 9:8-15; II Kings 14:9; Ezekiel 17:3-8; 31:3-14; and Song of Solomon is usually taken in this sense. At least one of Jesus' parables (Mark 12:1-11) has allegorical features in its final edition.

Hermeneutical. Under this head, allegory refers to a method of biblical interpretation. The key to the meaning of words is sought in their symbolic or pedagogical sense. This way of understanding a story or text goes back to pre-Christian times, as the Greek myths of the gods were spiritualized. Applied to the OT narratives by PHILO of Alexandria, it came over into the church through Paul (in a limited way, in Gal. 4:21-31) and the Letter to the Hebrews. AUGUSTINE found his authority for treating texts allegorically in II Corinthians 3:6, and he laid the foundation for the medieval "fourfold" sense of Scripture: the literal teaches what actually occurred; the allegorical what is to be believed; the moral how to behave; and the anagogical the direction to take in life.

The Reformers, especially LUTHER, opposed the allegorical method on the principle, "Do not import a meaning into scripture, but draw it out"; and modern biblical scholarship, Roman Catholic and Protestant, has accepted this caution, though with some qualification as when a "fuller sense" is found in historical detail or typology is recognized.

R. M.

ALLELUIA. See HALLELUJAH.

ALLEN, ETHAN (1738–89). Revolutionary War leader of the Green Mountain Boys, Allen became famous for his controversial religious and philosophical views expressed in Reason the Only Oracle of Man (1784), which defended DEISM and attacked the Bible and "priestcraft." Born in Litchfield, Connecticut, January 10, 1738, he scored a major victory for the American patriots by leading an expedition, joined by a small force led by Benedict Arnold, in the capturing of Fort Ticonderoga on May 10, 1775.

N. H.

ALLEN, ROLAND (1868–1947). Anglican clergyman and missions enthusiast. Allen was sent to China in 1895, but returned for health reasons in 1904 to take over an English parish church. He spent World War I as a chaplain on a hospital ship and in the 1920s became active with others in the stimulation of interest in foreign missions. He traveled widely to mission fields but was best known for his writings on behalf of changes in missionary methods. He urged indigenization of the churches, use of voluntary clergy, and other ideas that were quite revolutionary for his time.

W. G.

ALLPORT, GORDON. (1897–1967). Born on November 11, in Montezuma, Indiana. Allport was appointed a social science instructor at Harvard in 1924, he became professor of psychology in 1930, later holding an office in social ethics. His important introductory work was Personality—A Psychological Interpretation (1937). His basic theory was that while adult motives develop from infantile drives, adults are independent of those drives. He stressed a functional, personal autonomy in motives and structure. Thus he examined a social concern in The Nature of Prejudice (1954) and the religious dimension in The Individual and His Religion: A Psychological Interpretation (1950). He died on October 9 in Cambridge, Massachusetts.

I. C.

ALL SAINTS' DAY. A feast day celebrated on November 1, in memory of all martyrs and, by extension, all deceased Christians. The feast probably originated with the dedication of the oratory in St. Peter's built by Pope Gregory III, in which, according to tradition, the bodies of the apostles and martyrs were buried.

J. C.

ALL SOULS' DAY. A feast day celebrated on November 2, memorializing all people who have died in the Christian faith without suffering martyrdom (see MARTYR). The feast was established by Odilo of Cluny around A.D. 988 for the members of his order. It was later extended to celebrate all those who have departed with the sign of faith.

J. C.

ALMS. A Greek word used only in the NT. Philanthropy, the "haves" sharing with the "have nots," is an almost universal practice, often regarded as a religious duty. In some societies, the beggar, who makes opportunity for almsgiving, is considered a holy person. The strong providing for the weak helps the whole group survive. Pity is another motive for almsgiving.

Among the Hebrews, almsgiving, or care for the needy and hospitality to the STRANGER, was regarded as a virtue from early times. Blameless and upright Job "delivered the poor," "the fatherless," "the widow," "the blind" and "the lame." Conversely, Isaiah 32:6 calls "the fool" one who deprives "the thirsty of drink" and leaves "the craving of the hungry unsatisfied." Giving mutual care came to be characteristic of Hebrew homelife (Prov. 31:20) and kinship (Ruth 2:9, 14-16; Esth. 2:7). The Hebrew traditions of philanthropy may relate to their memories of wanderings in the desert, a hostile physical and social environment where care for one another was essential to survival.

In the OT law, almsgiving as philanthropy is related to SACRIFICES, OFFERINGS, and TITHES. Tithes to Yahweh, regarded somewhat as rent to be paid to the landlord, were collected in products of the land, which were then distributed to the poor (Deut. 14:28-29). In OT thought, there is a distinctive motivation for pity, compassion, and almsgiving. Reported in the Pentateuch, the Prophets, and the Psalms is the injunction to remember that "you were a slave in Egypt" (Exod. 13:8, 14; Lev. 23:43; Deut. 10:19; 16:2, 12). Remembering Yahweh's compassionate "mighty acts" that released the people from bondage was to prompt the Hebrews to be as compassionate to the needy as Yahweh had been to their forefathers.

In later Judaism, with the Temple no longer standing, the duty of almsgiving took the place of the obligations to provide sacrifices. Good deeds to the poor deliver one from death (Prov. 11:4; Tob. 4:10-11), bring happiness (Prov. 14:21), lengthen social tranquility (Dan. 4:27) and individual life (Tob. 12:8-9).

Jesus assumed that his Jewish followers would continue their giving of alms (Matt. 6:2). He was not as concerned with the amount given (Mark 12:41-44; Luke 21:1-4) as with the spirit and manner of the giving (Matt. 6:1-4; Mark 12:41-44; Luke 11:4; 12:35). Recognizing "how hard it is for those who have riches to enter the kingdom of God" (Luke 18:24), Jesus recommended giving as a way to follow him, thus, to escape servitude to mammon (Matt. 6:24; Luke 16:13). Giving, Jesus taught, brings rewards in this life (Luke 6:38) and "a treasure in the heavens" (Luke 12:33; Matt. 25:31-46). In fact "there is more happiness in giving than in receiving" (Acts 20:35 TEV).

Paul urged "cheerful" almsgiving (II Cor. 9:7) to benefit fellow Christians near at hand (Gal. 6:2, 5) and also those far away; such as the "saints at Jerusalem" (Acts 24:17). Barnabas (Acts 4:37), Dorcas (Acts 9:36, 39), and Cornelius are among those commended in the NT for their charity.

In Christian ethics, and also in Christian theology, giving has a special place. The emphasis in John 3:16 falls on the verb "gave" (compare I John 5:11). Paul wrote of Christ as being rich but choosing to become poor "so that by his poverty you might become rich" (II Cor. 8:9; see also Phil. 2:6; Gal. 1:4; 2:20; Eph. 5:2, 25; I Tim. 2:6; Tit. 2:14). In Christian thought, almsgiving is less a duty than a life-style, an emulation of the self-sacrificing way of God in Christ and God's love (I Cor. 13:3).

P.L.G.

Alpha and Omega

ALPHA AND OMEGA. The first and last letters of the Greek alphabet, thus a phrase signifying "the beginning and the end." Revelation 1:8; 21:6; 22:13 present Christ declaring, "I am the Alpha and the Omega, the first and the last, the beginning and the end." This echoes Isaiah 44:6 and 48:12, where God declares, "I am He, I am the first, and I am the last." The phrase asserts the eternal divine nature of Christ.

J.C.

ALTAR. A place or structure for the purpose of making various forms of sacrificial offerings. The Hebrew word for altar, mizbe'ah, derived from the root zbb, meaning "to slaughter," suggests that originally the altar was the place where the slaughter of animals for sacrifice occurred (see Gen. 22:9). In the Bible, however, animals are never slaughtered on the altar, but offerings of things not slaughtered (grain, wine, incense) were made on altars. Altars, like sacrificial offerings, were common features in practically all ancient religions. Many examples have been unearthed in archaeological excavations. Altars were sometimes given names (El-Elohe-Israel—the God of Israel, Gen. 33:20; The LORD is Peace, Judg. 6:24).

Courtesy of American Schools of Oriental Research

A reconstruction of the altar of burnt offering

Construction. Three types of material were utilized for building altars: earth, stone, and metal. The law on altars in Exodus 20:24-25 stipulates three conditions about their construction. (a) They are to be built of earth or stone. (b) If from stone then it must be from unworked not "hewn stones; for if you wield your tool upon it [the stone] you profane it." (c) Altars were also to be built without steps "that your nakedness be not exposed on it." Descriptions of the tabernacle and some narratives have references to bronze altars, but no OT laws mention altars constructed from metal (see the next section).

Although altars of earth are spoken of in the OT, no description of these is given; perhaps they were simply constructed of artificial mounds of earth. When the Syrian general Naaman returned home from Israel, he requested two mule-loads of earth since he had promised that "your servant [Naaman] will not offer burnt offering or sacrifice to any god but the LORD" (II Kings 5:17). This suggests the use of earthen altars. Stone altars could be natural formations (Judg. 13:19-20; I Sam. 6:14; 14:33-35; I Kings 1:9), hastily made artificial heaps (Gen. 31:46-54; Exod. 24:4; Josh. 4:1-8; I Kings 18:31-32), or well-built constructions (II Kings 16:10-16). Although no OT reference notes such construction, earth and stone were utilized to build the Israelite altar excavated at the site of ancient Arad. Horns or upraised corners seem to have been a feature of well-built altars (Exod. 27:2; 29:12; I Kings 2:28). The exact functions of such horns are unknown, though one function was probably to prevent the offering and burning material from rolling off the top.

Descriptions of Specific Altars. Two altars were in the Jerusalem Temple complex. Their counterparts are presented as part of the tabernacle as well. The altar of burnt offering associated with the tabernacle was 5 x 5 x 3 cubits, made of acacia wood, and overlaid with bronze (Exod. 27:1-8; 38:1-7). It was conceived as being hollow and portable, perhaps to be filled with stones and earth when in use. The incense altar, used within the sacred tent, was 1 x 1 x 2 cubits and overlaid with gold (Exod. 30:1-10; 37:25-28).

Reference is made to these two altars in conjunction with Solomon's Temple. The incense altar, located within the Temple, is described (I Kings 6:20-22; 7:48) but, surprisingly, no description is given in I Kings of the bronze sacrificial altar, which stood in front of the Temple (see I Kings 8:64; 9:25; II Kings 16:14-15). It is stated earlier that David built an altar on the site of the future Temple (II Sam. 24:18-25). Second Chronicles 4:1 says this altar was 20 x 20 x 10 cubits in size, which would certainly have required steps or a ramp (see Exod. 20:26; 28:42-43).

In the second half of the eighth century B.C., King Ahaz replaced the bronze altar before the Temple with a new altar, apparently of stone, based on a type he had seen in Damascus (II Kings 16:10-15), which required steps or a ramp (II Kings 16:12). The bronze altar was set aside for the private use of the king (II Kings 16:15).

In the description of the new Temple in Ezekiel, there is a description of the altar in the prophet's vision (Ezek. 43:13-17). The altar, with four graduated tiers, was twelve cubits, or twenty and a half feet tall (here the long cubit of twenty and one-half inches is used [Ezek. 43:13] rather than the normal cubit of eighteen inches). The incense altar, of wood, is also described (Ezek. 41:22).

The altars in the Temple of Herod are described in rabbinic sources (the Mishnah and Talmud). Consisting of four graduated tiers, the sacrificial altar was 32 x 32 cubits at the base and ten cubits high (50 x 50 x 15 according to JOSEPHUS, Wars, v. 225). The top of the altar was reached by a ramp thirty-two cubits long and sixteen cubits wide. The incense or gold altar is said to have stood in the center of the sanctuary.

Uses of Altars. Altars were used for several purposes: for the burning of sacrifices, both animal and grain; for rituals involving animal blood, which was smeared on the horns or thrown on the sides or the base of the altar; and for the burning of incense. Altars were also places of asylum. One could claim "sanctuary" rights by fleeing to the altar or by grasping its horns (Exod. 21:14; I Kings 1:50-51; 2:28-34). An altar could also serve as witness to group relations (Gen. 31:46-54; Josh. 22:21-27) and oaths could be sworn by it (Matt. 23:18-20).

Theological Aspects. Altars possessed a special sanctity and were considered most holy (Exod. 29:37). In the Temple complex in Jerusalem, the altar was part of the center of the universe, according to priestly theology. The sanctity of the altar was exceeded only by the sanctity of the Holy of Holies.

Only priestly personnel could approach the altar although non-priests could view the courtyard altar. It was upon the altar where the purifying and purging sacrifices were made, where life symbolized by blood was given back to God, its origin, and where the presence of the Divine and the affairs of the human met. It was in the rituals of the altar that mediation between the heavenly and the earthly worlds occurred in a concentrated manner.

In some expressions of early Christian thought, the significance of the altar is retained although spiritualized. Revelation 6:9 speaks of the heavenly altar in the heavenly sanctuary where the souls of the martyrs await vindication. Here the angel of God mingles incense with the prayers of the saints to be presented to the Divine (Rev. 8:3-4) and from this altar fire is flung upon earth (Rev. 8:5). Hebrews 13:10-15 claims that the (heavenly?) altar excels that of the old altar and that the fruit of the lips is the sacrifice of praise. After the destruction of the Temple, Judaism also preserved and spiritualized some of the imagery and importance of the altar by seeing one's deeds of charity and lovingkindness as forms of sacrifice, by interpreting the everyday table as the replacement of the altar, and by understanding the Jewish community as a temple. (See SACRIFICES, TEMPLES.)

J.H.

ALTHAUS, PAUL (1886-1966). A Lutheran theologian. He held professorial posts in Germany, notably at Erlangen. While his initial interests were in Gospel studies, he gained fame as a systematic theologian, writing a major book surveying the entire range of Christian doctrine (Die christliche Wahrheit, eighth ed. 1969). In his last years his chief preoccupation was with LUTHER's theology and eschatology.

R.M.

ALVARS. From TAMIL meaning "one who has dived" or "one who is immersed." Twelve poets and saints of South India who lived about A.D. 650-940 celebrated for their utter "immersion" in the love of God in the form of VISHNU. They did much to advance the growing BHAKTI or devotionalist movement, providing passionate and moving poetic vehicles for its fervent love of God modeled on the raptures and vicissitudes of human love.

The Alvar Tirumankai (800-870), for example, sings of the anguish of separation from the divine Lord in the language of a lover parted from the beloved, while Vittucciisan focused on the life of the infant KRISHNA, believed to be an AVATAR or human appearance of Vishnu. His daughter Kotai wrote with deep romantic feeling of the youthful Krishna, sublime lover of the gopis or milkmaids, whose fervent love for the handsome god was in turn the model of the devotee's. The Alvars did much to develop the cultural, literary, and religious self-consciousness of the South Indian. The ranks of these wandering singers included outcasts and both sexes; in this they demonstrated the potential universalism of the Bhakti way.

R.E.

AMALEK/AMALEKITES (meaning "warlike," or "dwellers in the vale"). Amalek is listed in Genesis 36:12, 16, as the son of Eliphaz and the grandson of Esau, whose descendants are the Edomites (Deut. 2:4). The Amalekites, a nomadic tribe, known from the age of the patriarchs (Gen. 14:7), wandered throughout the Transjordan, Negeb, and Sinai deserts (I Sam. 15:5; 27:8). At one time they had a king named Agag (I Sam. 15:8; Num. 24:7) and a "city of Amalek" in the Negeb (I Sam. 15:5).

Moses commanded Israel to establish friendly relations with the Amalekites, "your brethren" (Deut. 2:4-6) but, historically, the Amalekites, along with the EDOMITES, were prominent among the enemies of Israel (Ps. 83:7), beginning with the Exodus' battle of Rephelim (Exod. 17:8-9), a treacherous attack (Deut. 25:17-19; Judg. 10:12; I Sam. 15:2). The abortive attempt by Israel to enter Canaan from the south was repelled by Canaanites supported by the Amalekites (Num. 14:45). The Amalekites were particularly troublesome during the time of the Judges. They defeated Israel and took "the city of palms" (Jericho? Judg. 3:13). Along with the camel-nomads, the Midianites, the Amalekites threatened Israel at the time of Gideon (Judg. 6:3, 33; 7:12). Saul ruthlessly destroyed Agag's people (I Sam. 15:7), and Amalekites wounded him in a battle before he fell upon his own sword (I Sam. 31:3-5; II Sam. 1:8).

David conducted raids against the Amalekites (I Sam. 27:8-10; 30:1-20). Once, in the time of Hezekiah, Judah was victorious over the Amalekites (I Chr. 4:43). Some Amalekites may have been among the Idumeans who, from the Maccabean period to the time of Herod the Great, were pushed out of Edom by the Nabateans into southern Judah.

P.L.G.

AMANA COMMUNITY. A production and marketing cooperative in Iowa, descended from the Amana Society or Community of True Inspiration. Incorporated in 1859, it covered seven villages on 26,000 acres on the Iowa River, southwest of Cedar Rapids. Community members were followers of a pietistic sect from the rural Rhineland of Germany, founded in 1714 by a tailor, Michael Krausent; a carpenter, Christian Metz; and a domestic, Barbara Heinemann. Calling their group the New Community, they rejected the institutional church and based their ideas on the Bible, interpreted by dreams, visions, and revelations. Community of goods or communism was adopted in their first American settlement, called Ebenezer, established by Metz in 1843 near Buffalo, New York. The group of eight hundred migrated to Iowa in 1855 in search of more land. They finally became a secular corporation in 1932, producing kitchen appliances.

N.H.

AMARNA, TELL EL. The modern name of ruins on the east bank of the Nile River, 190 miles south of Cairo, Egypt. The site is that of the city of AKHETATON, built about 1375 B.C. by Ikhnaton (Amenophis IV) as the nation's capital in place of Thebes. He and his lovely queen, Nefertiti, had abandoned the worship of Amon as the national deity and erected a new city, Akhetaton, on virgin soil, which they dedicated to the sole worship of Aton, the sun-god, as the official religion of Egypt.

Archaeologists, beginning in 1891 and following, thoroughly excavated this one-level site, which stretches five miles along the Nile. Its center, a great, open-air temple, nearly one-half mile long by three hundred yards wide, was connected by a ceremonial bridge to the royal palaces. These consisted of rooms around a central court. The walls were decorated with colorfully painted, lively scenes of everyday life. Each had a temple to Aton and a landscaped garden around a pool.

A chance find from the records office yielded about three hundred clay tablets written in cuneiform script, first-hand documents from the Amarna period (1379-1362 B.C.). Included were letters to the pharaoh from vassal princes of the empire, from Syria and Palestine as well as from kings of Assyria, Babylonia, and Mitanni. These have shed much light on those times.

At Ikhnaton's death, his revolutionary religion was repudiated. Akhetaton was abandoned; the capital was returned to Thebes. Some have thought that in Moses' Egyptian education, he may have learned something about Ikhnaton's monolatrous religion.

P.L.G.

AMASA (meaning "burden bearer"). A son of Jether (or Ithra) the Ishmaelite, and Abigail, David's sister (II Sam. 17:25-26; I Chr. 2:17).

(1) Absalom, David's son, appointed his cousin Amasa, David's nephew, head of a rebel army (II Sam. 17:25). David forgave Amasa and, in an apparent effort to appease Absalom's former supporters after the rebellion was quelled, David gave Amasa command of the national army, replacing Joab, another of David's nephews. Amasa was ordered to assemble the army in three days, but he failed to do so (II Sam. 20:4-5). Joab found Amasa, and treacherously and brutally murdered him. David did not forget this. On his death bed, he condemned Joab and charged Solomon that, after David's death, Solomon should condemn (I Kings 2:5) and then execute Joab, which was done (I Kings 2:32).

(2) Son of Hadlai, an Ephraimite chief. In the time of Ahaz, following Pekah's victory over Judah, officers of the Israelite army proposed to take the Judean prisoners to Samaria and make them slaves. Oded, the prophet, rebuked them. Other officers, including Amasa, clothed and outfitted them from the war spoils and reunited them with their families at Jericho (II Chr. 28:8-15).

P.L.G.

AMBROSE OF MILAN. Bishop of Milan, A.D. 374-97, and one of four theologians counted as the great "DOCTORS" of the Western church—the others are Jerome, Augustine, and Gregory the Great. He was a civil official in Milan and not yet baptized, although a believer, when he was unexpectedly elected bishop. A defender of orthodoxy against ARIANISM and of the powerless against the powerful, he clashed with Empress Justina, who defended Arianism, and with Emperor Theodosius, whom he excommunicated for ordering a massacre. Several of the hymns that he composed are still used in Christian worship, as is the ATHANASIAN CREED, which some scholars attribute to him. He was instrumental in the conversion of Augustine, and also in promoting Eastern theology and monasticism in the West, which he probably owed to his knowledge of Greek.

J.G.

AMEN. A Hebrew word meaning "to trust," showing assent to an oath, acceptance of an utterance, or approval of a course of action. Jesus used the word according to the Gospels, and early Christians used it regularly to mean "yes." Its use denotes faithfulness, assurance, assent, certainty, and trust.

J.C.

AMENHOTEP IV. See AKHENATON.

AMERICAN BAPTIST CHURCHES IN THE U.S.A. See BAPTIST CHURCHES.

AMERICAN BIBLE SOCIETY. A non-profit association founded in 1816 to promote the circulation and reading of the Bible. The ABS makes special efforts to make available free copies of the Scriptures to the poor, to members of the armed forces, and to prisoners and others who might not have access to the Holy Scriptures. For almost 170 years, the ABS has faithfully supplied the Scriptures to hundreds of thousands of people in at least one hundred translations and editions, worldwide. Before 1816, there were 128 Bible societies in the United States. The society was incorporated in 1841 although overseas work began in 1836.

J.C.

AMERICAN BOARD OF COMMISSIONERS FOR FOREIGN MISSIONS. The first foreign mission board founded in the United States, organized at Bradford, Massachusetts, by the Massachusetts General Association (Congregational) in response to a petition from four Andover Seminary students. Predominantly Congregational, the board avoided the term in its name and thus served as the foreign missionary agency for the Presbyterian and Dutch Reformed churches until they formed their own missionary boards. Barely able to provide passage, the board sent its first five missionaries to India in 1812. A stirring of interest and support in the churches, however, soon made it possible for the board to send missionaries to several other countries. Committed to an institutional as well as evangelistic approach, the ABCFM rendered outstanding service in the founding of colleges and schools. In 1961 the ABCFM merged into the United Church Board for World Ministries of the recently founded United Church of Christ.

W.G.

AMERICAN COUNCIL OF CHRISTIAN CHURCHES. An organization of ultra-Fundamentalist sects formed in 1941, to oppose what Fundamentalists consider the apostasy of other churches. The ACCC was formed on September 17, 1941, in New York by the Bible Presbyterian Church and the Bible Protestant Church. The guiding spirit in its foundation and throughout its history has been the Reverend Carl McIntyre, an opponent of the National Council of Churches and the World Council of Churches. Essentially polemic, the ACCC has no authority over its members—now grown to fifteen sects—but serves as a voice in affairs where joint witness and united action are felt to be required. In actual practice, the ACCC is mainly preoccupied with making critical pronouncements on the NCC and the WCC. In fact, the ACCC often holds "shadow" conferences in the cities where the NCC and WCC hold their meetings, and at the same time.

J.C.

AMERICAN ETHICAL UNION. The Ethical Culture movement was begun in New York City in 1876 by FELIX ADLER (1851-1933). He considered Judaism and Christianity mistaken in making ethics dependent on religious dogma. Inspired by IMMANUEL KANT, Adler promoted the betterment of human life based on neither theism nor atheism.

Adler's original goals included sexual purity, help for the working classes, and continued intellectual development. Ethical Culture was promoted similarly to a religion through Sunday meetings with music, readings, and an address, plus rituals for marriage and death.

The society was prominent in promoting social reforms and founding workingmen's schools, settlement houses, visiting nurses' programs, legal aid, and model tenements. In 1886 Stanton Coit, who had taken the movement to London, also founded University Settlement on New York's lower East Side. John Lovejoy Elliot founded the Hudson Guild, the Henry Booth House in Chicago, and Southwark Neighborhood House in Philadelphia.

Today the American Ethical Union is the national organization of about thirty societies in the U.S. It trains ministers or Ethical leaders, publishes literature, supports national programs on race relations, ecology, nontheistic conscientious objection, separation of church and state, and the protection of civil liberties.

N.H.

AMERICAN FRIENDS SERVICE COMMITTEE.

An organization, founded by the Society of FRIENDS (QUAKERS) that endeavors to promote programs of social service and public information in the areas of peace, disarmament, environmental issues, social justice, and world hunger. Founded in 1917, by American Quakers, the AFSC aims to relieve human suffering and to find new approaches to world peace and to nonviolent social change.

The AFSC works overseas in refugee relief, rehabilitation, peace education, and development of self-help community programs. At home, the organization offers programs on minority group problems in employment, housing, and civil rights.

In 1947, the AFSC and the British Friends Service Council shared the Nobel Peace Prize for their humanitarian efforts. The AFSC is a major promoter of peace in the world and strongly supports campaigns for a nuclear freeze bill in the United States Congress.

J.C.

AMERICAN SCHOOLS OF ORIENTAL RESEARCH (ASOR).

An association of scholars working in archaeological, historical, and biblical fields, as well as interested laypeople, founded in 1900 to initiate, encourage, and support research on the peoples and cultures of the Near East and to promote public understanding of the area and its peoples. ASOR has a staff of 25 and 2,447 members. Its work consists of offering fellowships, visiting professorships, study and travel grants, and conducting archaeological research into the culture and peoples of the Near East. The association maintains libraries in Amman, Jordan; Nicosia, Cyprus; and Jerusalem. It publishes several journals and newsletters, including its quarterly bulletin, the Biblical Archeologist, the Annual (a monograph series), and The Journal of Cuneiform Studies (semiannually). Many colleges, universities, theological seminaries, libraries, and research institutes maintain membership in the ASOR. The association maintains data bases for research and sponsors student competitions. There is one major ASOR committee on archaeological policy.

J.C.

AMERICAN STANDARD VERSION. The decision of British authorities to revise the KING JAMES VERSION of the Bible in 1870 resulted in the production of the REVISED VERSION (RV) or English Revised Version (ERV) of 1881-85. American scholars, however, preferred to make additional changes, and these were included in the American Standard Version (ASV) of 1901. Both the British and American versions tended to be stilted in style, probably because the translators had been mandated to retain as much of the KJV as possible, and also because they were committed to a literal translation of the Greek and Hebrew texts. Except for a few scholars, most readers spurned both the RV and ASV. This probably can be explained by this statement of the British revisers: "In regard to the language of the Authorized Version, the Revisers have thought it no part of their duty to reduce it to conformity with modern usage, and have therefore left untouched all archaisms, whether of language or construction, which though not in familiar use cause a reader no embarrassment and lead to no misunderstanding." (See also BIBLE TRANSLATIONS, ENGLISH.)

R.H.

AMERICAN TRACT SOCIETY. In 1814 the New England Tract Society was founded in Boston. Nine years later it became the American Tract Society and in 1825 became truly national through a merger with a New York society. It blanketed the growing nation with evangelical tracts, magazines, and books, particularly for children.

N.H.

AMES, EDWARD SCRIBNER (1870-1958). Philosopher and liberal theologian, Ames was born April on April 21 to Lucius Bowles and Adaline Scribner Ames in Eau Claire, Wisconsin. After graduating from Drake University (1889, 1891) and Yale Divinity School (1892), he became, like his father, a Disciple of Christ minister.

The first recipient of a Ph.D. from the University of Chicago philosophy department, he taught there from 1900 to 1935. From 1900 to 1940 he was minister at the Disciples' University Church, and from 1937 to 1945 he was dean of the Disciples' Divinity House. He wrote The Psychology of Religious Experience (1910), Religion (1929), and his autobiography Beyond Theology (1959).

N.H.

AMES, WILLIAM (1576-1633). English Puritan theologian. He received the B.A. and M.A. from Christ's College, Cambridge. A moderate non-Separatist, he emigrated to Holland. He was present for the SYNOD OF DORT. After successful debates with the Arminian Nicolaas Grevinckhoven (see ARMINIANISM) he became professor of theology at the University of Franeker in Friesland, 1622-32.

His Marrow of Sacred Divinity (1642) became the prime theological text for New England PURITANS. Equally important was his Cases of Conscience (1639), a book on moral theology. He was about to leave for America when he died in Rotterdam on November 14.

N.H.

AMICE. A liturgical VESTMENT that covers the head of priests and brothers on the way to and from MASS. It is an oblong linen cloth, placed on the head and fastened about the neck with cords. It originated as a head cover for the priest in the eighth century.

J.C.

AMISH. Followers of Jacob Amman (1644?-1730?), a MENNONITE preacher in Berne, Switzerland, who about 1693 began to urge stricter observance of earlier practices, particularly the shunning of excommunicated members. His teachings also attracted followers from Alsace-Lorraine and the Palatinate. Under persecution they decided to emigrate to America and began arriving in Pennsylvania as early as 1727. Large numbers arrived in the 1740s. They settled first in Berks and Lancaster counties of Pennsylvania, but also spread to Ohio, Indiana, and Ontario, Canada. The most conservative, or Old Order, refuse to use electricity or automobiles, preferring horses and buggies. They total more than 80,000 members in 535 congregations in the U.S. and about 700 members in 14 congregations in Canada. The Beachy Amish, or followers of Moses Beachy, decided in 1927 to allow members to drive cars and to have meetinghouses. Their membership is nearly 5,000 in 77 congregations in the U.S.

The Amish are noted for their conservative manners, dress, and language. Opposed to church buildings or formal organization, the Old Order meets in houses or barns. They have no colleges or denominational structures. Recently they have had difficulties with the government and have been the source of much controversy concerning their desire to educate their own children rather than send them to public schools and their resistance to paying Social Security taxes because they care for their own elderly.

N.H.

AMMON/AMMONITES. A Semitic people occupying central trans-Jordan along the headwaters of the Jabbok, who for seven centuries (about 1250-580 B.C.) enjoyed political autonomy and regularly affected the history of biblical Israel.

Origins. Although hard facts about Ammonite origins are scant, Israelite tradition presents Ammon as a hostile (Amos 1:13-15; Zeph. 2:8-11; Jer. 49:1-5; Ezek. 25:1-7), yet kindred people who descended from Ben-ammi, the second son of Lot, Abraham's nephew (Gen. 19:38). Commonly called the "sons of Ammon" (benê ammôn), they dispossessed the Zamzummim, an unknown prehistoric people (Deut. 2:20). The territory of the Ammonites undoubtedly overlapped that of the Amorites with whom they were closely related (Num. 21:21-24).

Ammon and Early Israel. In the mid-thirteenth century B.C., the Ammonites consisted of small tribal groups clustered around Rabbath-Ammon (modern Amman), their subsequent capital. Thus, in the era of the conquest, Israel bypassed this settlement (Deut.

2:37). Soon the Ammonites expanded into an organized state, first recognized in the story of temporary Benjaminite enslavement under Eglon, king of Moab, who employed Ammonite allies (Judg. 3:12-13).

The Ammonites next tried to penetrate northward into Gilead. Resident Israelites rallied around Jephthah and successfully curbed the aggression (Judg. 11:4-10, 29-33). Ammon still entertained expansionist dreams. In about 1020 B.C. the Ammonites, under King Nahash, besieged Jabesh-gilead and disgraced its citizens with repugnant terms of surrender (I Sam. 11:1-3). The city was magnificently liberated by Saul (11:8-11), who dealt Ammon a stunning defeat.

Ammon and Monarchic Israel. Unlike Saul, David befriended Nahash (II Sam. 10:2). But the odious behavior of Nahash's successor, Hanun, toward Israelite ambassadors made renewed warfare inevitable. Though Aramean allies assisted Ammon, Israelite troops won the first campaign (10:13-14). A non-decisive victory, however, required a second campaign whereupon Israel overtook Rabbah, the Ammonite capital, and reduced the Ammonites to vassalage (12:26-31). Later, when Absalom's rebellion necessitated David's flight to Mahanaim, Hanun's brother, Shobi, aided David, perhaps as a deputy appointed by David to govern Ammon (17:27). During Solomon's reign, friendly relations persisted. Among the king's Ammonite wives was Naamah, the future mother of Rehoboam, who succeeded Solomon (I Kings 14:21). To meet his wives' religious needs, Solomon constructed a sanctuary for Milcom (MOLECH), the chief Ammonite deity (11:7).

Following the collapse of the united Israelite monarchy (922 B.C.), Ammon regained independence. In 853 Ammon joined other western states (including Israel), which in the Battle of Qarqar checked Assyria's westward expansion under Shalmaneser III. Two strong eighth-century Judean monarchs, Uzziah and Jotham, exacted tribute from Ammon (II Chr. 26:8; 27:5-6). When Jehoikim rebelled against Babylon in about 600 B.C. (II Kings 24:2), Nebuchadnezzar unleashed Ammonite guerrillas to harass Judah. Nevertheless, Ammonite representatives soon participated in a Jerusalem meeting of western states to discuss anti-Babylonian strategies (Jer. 27:3).

Ammon and Post-monarchic Israel. Following Jerusalem's destruction (587 B.C.), Baalis, king of Ammon, successfully dispatched Ishmael, a Judean refugee, to assassinate Gedaliah, whom Nebuchadnezzar had appointed as governor of Judah (Jer. 40:14). Presumably Baalis aspired to bring the Judean remnant within the orbit of Ammonite sovereignty. While Ammon soon fell victim to Arab invasions, order again prevailed under Persian rule. In about 440 B.C. Tobiah, leader of a Jewish colony in Ammon, joined Sanballat, the Samaritan governor, in opposing Nehemiah's efforts to rebuild Jerusalem (Neh. 2:19; 4:7-8). But Nehemiah prevailed and soon censured Judean-Ammonite intermarriages (13:23-27), as did Ezra (Ezra 9:1-2). Subsequently, Ammon was overrun by the Nabateans and then claimed by the Egyptian Ptolemies following the conquest of Alexander the Great.

J.K.K.

Courtesy of the Metropolitan Museum of Art. Gift of Edward S. Harkness, 1926

Statuette of the Egyptian god Amon

AMON-RE. Egyptian sun deity esteemed as "king of the gods." Egyptian legend celebrated the sun-god RE as Egypt's first ruler. Thus the pharaoh was regarded as the "son of Re," emanating from his body at birth and returning thereto at death. Re's home, Heliopolis, was a significant religious center in Egypt. During the second millennium B.C., Re was amalgamated with other important deities, one of which was Amon. With his sanctuary at the Egyptian capital of THEBES, the air-god Amon (the "Hidden One") was manifested in both wind and vital breath. Despite their functional fusion as the supreme national god, Amon-Re, they remained separate air and sun deities. The Egyptian urge toward MONOTHEISM was therefore limited.

J.K.K.

AMORITES. From the Akkadian word Amurru meaning "westerner." Ancient Semitic inhabitants of a large, indeterminate territory situated west of Mesopotamia which likely encompassed Syria and portions of Palestine.

Extra-biblical Evidence. Mesopotamian cuneiform texts dating to the latter half of the third millennium B.C. yield the earliest mention of the Amurru as a diverse body of northwest Semitic-speaking stock breeders and the region they occupied. Having originated from the Arabian desert, these Amorites dominated all Mesopotamia after the collapse of the (Sumerian) Third Dynasty of Ur (about 1950 B.C.). Amorite leadership centered in the city-state of Mari (Tel Hariri) on the upper Euphrates, whose monarch Zimri-lim (about 1730-1697) was most effective. Later it moved to Babylon during the rule of Hammurabi (about 1728-1686), the best known of the Amorite kings of the First Dynasty of Babylon. By 1750 the Amorites had so thoroughly disrupted ongoing life in Syro-Palestinian territory and so fully taken over that it had become the main segment of its Canaanite population. This original Amorite stock probably counted among its descendants many of the Hebrews and Arameans of the OT.

Biblical Evidence. Presumably the term "Amorite" was originally applied to Palestinian inhabitants who, prior to the Israelite conquest, occupied the territory east of the River Jordan (Num. 21:13; Deut. 4:46; Josh. 24:8). The term eventually included inhabitants living in mountainous regions west of the Jordan (Deut. 1:7, 19-20), if not the whole of cis-Jordan (Josh. 24:15; Judg. 6:10). Jerusalem was likely an Amorite city in pre-Israelite days (Ezek. 16:3) as were Hebron and Lachish (Josh. 10:5). Two Transjordanian Amorite kingdoms are of particular interest in biblical tradition—Heshbon, ruled by Sihon, and Bashan, ruled by Og (Num. 21:21-35; Josh. 2:10; 9:10; compare Jdt. 5:15). Both fell to the Israelites as they migrated toward the Land of Promise.

Reference to the Gibeonites as "the remnant of the Amorites" (II Sam. 21:2) demonstrates that whereas the pre-Israelite population of Palestine is often designated in the Bible as Canaanite, this is not always so. In Numbers 13:29 the Amorites and Canaanites are distinguished respectively as inhabitants of the highlands and coastal plain (compare Josh. 5:1), and once the Amorites are even located in the plain (Judg. 1:34-35). Owing to their reputed descent from the Rephaim (giants), the Amorites are presented in a few OT passages as a race of extraordinarily tall and strong people (Deut. 3:11; Amos 2:9). This legendary element, however, fails to advance our present-day quest for the Amorites of history.

The Israelite conquest did not rid Palestine of all Amorite elements (Judg. 1:34-36). In Samuel's day they lived peaceably with Israel (I Sam. 7:14), and in Solomon's day they were a useful source of conscripted brawn for royal building projects (I Kings 9:20-21).

J.K.K.

AMOS. The earliest of all the biblical prophets to leave a book in his own name (see AMOS, Book of). The only biographical information about Amos available is that supplied by his book. Its superscription (Amos 1:1) places Amos' ministry during the reigns of JEROBOAM II in Israel (786-746 B.C.) and UZZIAH in Judah (783-742 B.C.). Though he was "among the shepherds of Tekoa," a village that lay about five miles south of Bethlehem in the southern kingdom of Judah, his prophetic ministry carried him to the central royal sanctuary at BETHEL (7:13) in the heart of the northern kingdom of Israel. There he threatened the nation with exile and King Jeroboam with death by the sword (7:11).

In defending his mission to Amaziah, the priest of Bethel, Amos dissociated himself from other prophets: "I am no prophet, nor a prophet's son; but I am a herdsman, and a dresser of sycamore trees" (7:14). This suggests that he belonged to no band of charismatic "prophets" (see I Sam. 10:9-13), prophetic school (II Kings 2:15-18), or association of cult prophets (Mic. 3:5-12), but had unexpectedly received his own fresh summons from God to leave the flock and to undertake his dangerous errand.

W.S.T.

AMOS (Book of). The third of the twelve shorter prophetic writings of the Hebrew Bible, and the earliest in point of time. Although the 146 verses of the book can be read aloud in less than half an hour, the book contains all we know of the life work of the prophet AMOS, who preached at the royal sanctuary at BETHEL (7:13) in the northern kingdom of Israel during the latter years of the reign of JEROBOAM II (786-746 B.C.).

Following a short introduction (1:1-2), the book falls into four parts: 1:3-2:16, oracles against the nations, including Judah and Israel; 3:1-6:14 and 8:4-9:10, oracles of judgment against Israel; 7:1-8:3, visions and biographical information; and 9:11-15, a promise of restoration. As this outline indicates, judgment predominates in the prophet's message. Running like a scarlet thread through all of it is the theme of the day of the Lord. Amos radicalizes this formerly benign notion of a day of Yahweh's victory for the people; now it becomes a threat to Israel (5:20). On that day the wrath of Yahweh will fall upon Israel, above all because of the unjust exploitation of the poor by the rich and powerful (5:11-13; 4:1-3; 6:4-7; 8:4-8). This indictment contrasts sharply with the message of Amos' contemporary prophet, HOSEA, for whom cultic malpractice and the fertility rites of BAAL were the sins that demanded God's judgment upon Israel.

The uniqueness of Amos 9:11-15, the single "promise" oracle in Amos, has led many to challenge its authenticity; however, it provides for Amos the balance between judgment and salvation that is typical of the prophetic canon as a whole.

W.S.T.

ANABAPTISTS. See RADICAL REFORMATION.

ANALECTS OF CONFUCIUS. A collection of short sayings and anecdotes about CONFUCIUS (551-479 B.C.). It was put together by Confucius' followers a century after his death and is our best source of information about him. It is generally agreed that some parts of the Analects are later additions. The book became a standard throughout the Far East for how to live a life of morality and service. (See also CONFUCIANISM.)

K.C.

ANALOGY. A similarity between things otherwise unlike. The use of analogy in theology derives from a fundamental problem central to theistic belief. Theists wishing to speak about God appear faced with two unacceptable choices. One is to apply attributes or predicates to God as we apply them to creatures (univocally). Goodness is the same when applied to God and humans. But to speak of God in human terms (univocally) is to fall into ANTHROPOMORPHISM.

Alternatively, one can apply predicates to the Creator in an entirely different way (equivocally) than we apply them to creatures. Goodness does not have the same meaning when applied to God as it has when applied to humans. What meaning, then, does it have? We can't be sure. Equivocal language about God leads to AGNOSTICISM, the belief that nothing certain can be known about God. Finding neither of these alternatives acceptable, theologians—especially in the Roman Catholic tradition—have resorted to that form of analogy which holds that, while two things may be different, they may also have a relation of likeness, an analogy of being (analogia entis).

Since the time of THOMAS AQUINAS (1225-74), Catholic theology has distinguished between two kinds of analogy. The analogy of proportion or attribution relates things in such a way that one (the prime analogate) possesses the attribute in a "formal," intrinsic sense, while the other analogate possesses the attribute in a secondary or virtual sense. Applied to the analogy between God and man, our actual experience of goodness in humans (the prime analogate) suggests that God, being the creator of humans, possesses goodness in whatever manner is necessary to produce goodness in humans. Goodness, then, exists virtually in God. But this leaves us ignorant of the actual, intrinsic nature of God's goodness. The analogy of attribution appears to fail.

The analogy of proportionality maintains that both analogates hold the attribute in question, for example, goodness, intrinsically but in the mode appropriate to each analogate. This protects God's infinite otherness, but the irreducible disparity between finite and infinite goodness holds. The analogy thus remains uninformative. KARL BARTH denounced the analogia entis and proposed an analogy of faith (analogia fidei) derived from biblical revelation.

J.L.

ANALYTICAL PHILOSOPHY. A dominant philosophical influence especially in the English-speaking countries since the time of World War II. The analyst holds that philosophy has no specific subject-matter of its own (thus rejecting the traditional metaphysical concern with such topics as God, freedom, and immortality) but has for its business the logical examination of the language used in the sciences and other intellectual disciplines. It asks about the signification of terms, the meaning and reference of propositions, the coherence of arguments, and so on. When combined with extreme empiricism, analytical philosophy took the form of LOGICAL POSITIVISM. In this form, it declared theological language to be meaningless.

However, there were too many unexamined assumptions in logical positivism itself, and analytical philosophy has tended to become more neutral in its assessment of the language of religion. Few would now say that the language of religion is meaningless, though the charge of incoherence is still occasionally heard. On the other hand, some theologians have welcomed analytical philosophy as a challenge to clean up and clarify the frequently obscure language of their discipline, and to explain how religious language functions.

J.M.

ANANIAS. Three people in the Apostolic church are known by this name.

First, there is the early Jerusalem member with his wife, Sapphira (Acts 5:1-11). The story of their deceit and its attempted cover-up is told in some detail. At a time when the wealthier Christians were contributing funds for the relief of the poor and as a token of a shared common life (Acts 2:24-27; 4:32-37), this couple offered the price of their property, pretending to have given all when in fact they had retained a part of the proceeds for themselves. This was the essence of their sin, according to the record: they tried to deceive both the apostles and God. A summary judgment fell on Ananias, whose death was quickly followed by that of his wife, who died on the spot after hearing of her husband's swift demise. Luke narrates the story without comment, but it was evidently intended as a warning in the later church and a sign of God's "terrible presence" in the congregation ("church" is first mentioned in the narrative at Acts 5:11).

Then, by contrast, Ananias is a name borne by another Jewish Christian at Damascus, known for his exemplary character (Acts 9:10-19). In a later speech given by Paul, tribute is paid to him as "a devout man according to the law" (Acts 22:12). At his hands Paul received his sight, the gift of the Spirit, and (just as important) a ready welcome into the church fellowship at Damascus at a time when Ananias had to believe that he was a genuine convert and not a spy infiltrating the Christian community, a fear voiced in the dialogue of Acts 9:13-16. Later church tradition made Ananias one of the Seventy (Luke 10:1), a bishop in Damascus, and a Christian martyr.

Third, there is a Jewish Sadducean high priest called by this name (Acts 22:30-23:5). This Ananias was in office from A.D. 47 to 58 and was the presiding officer of the Sanhedrin, the Jewish Council, when Paul was summoned to appear before it. He was ill-reputed on account of his greed and was hated for his pro-Roman sympathies. Not surprisingly, he was assassinated by the nationalist Zealots at the outbreak of the Jewish war in A.D. 66.

R.M.

ANATHEMA. From the Greek meaning something "devoted" or "given over to destruction." The term appears in the NT in Romans 9:3; I Corinthians 16:22 KJV; and Galatians 1:8, 9, where it means "devoted to" or "given over to destruction." It thus means "damned" and corresponds to the Hebrew term herem or "ban" as in Leviticus 27:28, 29 and Joshua 6:17; 7:1. Romans 9:3 uses anathema in the sense of "accursed," as does I Corinthians 12:3 and Galatians 1:8, 9. This is in reference to anyone who would change the gospel of Christ, that is, it is the Christian's response to HERESY.

The anathema developed in the history of Christianity was a formal declaration that some person, doctrine, or activity was theologically and morally wrong. For example, in A.D. 1054, the Roman Catholic Church excommunicated (or anathematized) the Eastern Orthodox Church, when the Byzantine emperor closed Latin churches in Constantinople (see EXCOMMUNICATION).

Again, POPE LEO X, in 1520, wrote a BULL (or papal declaration) of condemnation against the reforming work of Martin Luther. The anathema is therefore synonymous with excommunication or separation from the reception of Holy Communion and fellowship with the church.

Paul, in I Corinthians 16:22 uses the form "anathema, maranatha," interpreted as "let him be accursed. Our Lord, come!" in reference to persons who do not love the Lord, and who are destined to condemnation at the SECOND COMING of Christ, when he will judge the earth and separate believers from nonbelievers.

J.C.

ANATTA. In BUDDHISM, Anatta (Pali) or Anatman (Sanskrit) refers to the doctrine of "No Self." Anatta contains the notion that a human being, like the universe itself and all its parts, does not possess a permanent, unchanging essence—a "soul" or separate selfhood—but is a composite and transitory creature in a universe of flux. The concept is related to the Buddhist emphasis on desire or attachment as the root of suffering. From this bondage, the Buddha's teaching offers liberation.

R.E.

ANCESTOR VENERATION. The ritual worship or honoring of the spirits of the dead by their descendants. The ancestors are seen as benefiting from the offerings and ritual and as protecting the family in return. In some societies, the ancestors are thought to watch over and judge the behavior of the descendants. Accidents are thought to be punishment for bad behavior. In many societies, spirits not honored by sacrifice can cause mischief or calamity in the house of the descendant. In other societies, forgotten spirits only weaken and die. Ancestor veneration is never found as the sole religion in any area; rather it exists alongside religions almost everywhere. In the modern world, only those religions with Judaic influence—JUDAISM, Christianity, ISLAM, and SIKHISM—lack strong ancestor cults. Even there, however, saints and great leaders—who are sometimes also ancestors—are venerated.

Ancestor veneration serves other purposes besides protection from mishap. It unites a group through shared ritual and kinship. It assures the old of continuing respect and existence after death. It establishes the leader of the family—the one who performs the ritual. The funeral ritual and continuing veneration mark the end of the life cycle and also preserve the continuity of the lineage.

In most societies, ritual centers around some material symbol of the deceased: engraved tablets in China, carved sticks or stools in Africa, statues of the dead in ancient Rome, the ancestor's skull in the Manus tribe in the Pacific. Some societies believe that the ancestor is in some way present in the symbol. Food and drink are ritually offered to these symbols, and petitions are made for protection from evil spirits or natural calamities, and perhaps for ill fortune to befall an enemy.

K./M.C.

ANCHORITE. A person living in solitary contemplation and asceticism. Originally most common in the East, during the Middle Ages anchoritism took its characteristic form in the West, where the term was applied specifically to those who were willingly enclosed for life, often with their own casket.

J.G.

ANCIENT OF DAYS. An Aramaic expression portraying God as judge of the world (Dan. 7:9, 13, 22). Equivalent with "advanced in years" in contemporary English idiom, this title highlights God's sovereignty, wisdom, and especially God's eternity within the eschatological scene unfolding in Daniel's first vision (chap. 7). Confident belief in God's changeless nature (compare Ps. 90:1-2) thereby counterbalances a turbulent human existence that is thoroughly outlined by the book of Daniel.

J.K.K.

ANDREW. This man whose name in Greek means "manly" has the distinction of being the first one to be called as a member of the twelve disciples (John 1:40). Initially he is described as a follower of John the Baptist and lived in his hometown of Bethsaida in Galilee (John 1:44). SIMON PETER was his brother, and his father's name is given as John (John 1:42; 21:15-17). Jesus met Andrew and his brother Simon Peter by the Sea of Galilee where they were engaged in the fishing industry (Matt. 4:18), gaining a certain affluence.

The initial summons to discipleship, given in the Fourth Gospel, led to a call to full-time allegiance (Matt. 4:18-20; Mark 1:16-18). In this way Andrew became one of the twelve APOSTLES (Matt. 10:1-2; Mark 3:13-18; Luke 6:12-14). Andrew stands out in the gospel tradition as a person of some resourcefulness. He directed attention to the presence of the lad with his lunch basket (John 6:8-9) as a prelude to the feeding of the five thousand. In John 12:21-22 Philip turned to Andrew for advice in response to the Hellenes who came to interview Jesus. He is mentioned again as one of the four who questioned Jesus (Mark 13:3-4) on the Mount of Olives—traditionally understood as the place of final revelation according to Zechariah 14. This questioning was the incentive for Jesus' apocalyptic speech on the fate of Jerusalem. Acts 1:13 also notes that Andrew was in the company of the other apostles.

The Apocryphal Acts (see APOCRYPHA: OT and NT) contain the Acts of Andrew, which relate how Andrew died by crucifixion in Achaia (southern Greece). This is a second-century source, referred to by Eusebius (Church History 111.25.6). In the Gospel of Mary (part of the recently found and edited library from Nag Hammadi) Andrew and Peter play the role of champions of orthodoxy who oppose and accuse Mary of gnostic teaching.

The relics of Andrew were found in Constantinople in the time of the emperor Justinian, and part of the cross on which he was crucified is held in veneration at the Vatican. His memory was cherished in Scotland, where he has become the patron saint.

R.M.

ANDROGYNY. From the Greek roots for male/female, the word denotes a uniting of the physical characteristics and the natures of both sexes. Earlier the term was used in a derogatory sense, suggesting a hermaphroditic being and denoting sexual ambivalence. Today the term has positive significance in suggesting that men and women need the freedom to develop as full human beings. Studies concerning the two hemispheres of the brain indicate that the development of the intuitive and rational aspects of personality could be influenced by societal patterns. And, if encouraged to do so, men could develop the intuitive, emotional characteristics more fully and women those of the logical and rational.

Textual biblical studies indicate that adham (Hebrew) includes male and female, and that our being "made" in the image of God . . . male and female" (Gen. 1:27) suggests the androgynous character of God. The Bible portrays God in traditionally male roles (king, God of battles) and in female roles (pitying, feeding). Jesus assumed authority in male roles (commanding, pronouncing), and also, in a female allusion, gathered the people "as a hen gathers her chickens." Paul writes that in Christ there is neither male nor female. This also suggests that verbs may describe God more suitably than do nouns, and images that are not sex-specific may better describe the activity of God.

In this perspective people should be encouraged to develop a new kind of wholeness, exhibiting a variety of characteristics. This requires a restructuring of values in a society so that the traditional male/female competition disappears, hierarchical structures are reshaped, and patriarchalism is renounced. In theory this might lead to a "unisex," in which a recombining of male/female traits leads to the disappearance of sexual differences. Or it could indicate a transcending of sex-specific characteristics for the fuller self-actualization of each person. It has been pointed out that some of the classical saints fit this description: TERESA OF AVILA was an able administrator who reached the heights of mystical unity with God, and FRANCIS OF ASSISI, who founded an order, was renowned for gentleness and self-effacement.

I.C.

ANGELS. In biblical and most ancient nonbiblical Jewish and Christian texts, angels are spiritual or divine beings superior to humans in power and knowledge. Angels in the OT are generally viewed as in the service of God, but in later literature some angels are depicted as opponents of God.

Terminology. The Hebrew word mal'ak and the Greek word angelos are the biblical terms commonly translated as "angel." Both of these words basically mean "messenger," and the terms themselves provide no clue as to whether a divine or human messenger is intended. Only in Latin (angelus) and subsequent Western languages is the word "angel," in its biblical usage, taken for granted as referring to divine beings. Sometimes in the biblical text uncertainty exists about whether a figure is human or superhuman (compare Gen. 32:24-25 with 32:30; see Josh. 5:13-14) and about whether God or a messenger is involved (compare Gen. 16:7 with 16:13; Exod. 3:2 with 3:4). The OT speaks of the "angel of Yahweh" (Gen. 16:7 and frequently elsewhere) although this phrase could be used of humans also (Hag. 1:13; Mal. 2:7). Divine beings subordinate to God are also called "sons of God" (Gen. 6:2; Job 1:6) or "holy ones" (Ps. 89:7; Job 5:1). Seraphim and cherubim also appear (Isa. 6:1-6; Gen. 3:24; Ezek. 10), but they presumably were considered, unlike angels, as nonhuman in form.

Functions of Angels. The general impression one is inclined to receive about angels from the Bible is that as a king would be surrounded by attendants and subordinates who praise, serve, and carry out orders, so God is surrounded by such a body of heavenly beings, the sons of God, the divine council, or angels who perform these functions for God. In the earlier portions of the OT, the appearance of angels is reasonably sporadic. Here they function primarily in the following ways: (a) as divine messengers, (b) as protectors and guides for the people (see Ps. 91:11), and (c) as troublemakers of the people's enemies in battle (see Ps. 35:5-6). Angels are shown preventing Abraham from offering his son Isaac as a sacrifice (Gen. 22:11-12), reassuring Jacob (31:11), encountering Moses in the burning bush (Exod. 3:2), announcing the births of Ishmael and Samson (Gen. 16:11; Judg. 13:3-5), leading the Hebrews in the wilderness and into the Promised Land (Exod. 14:19; 23:20-23; 33:2), directing the actions of Balaam (Num. 22:22-35), feeding Elijah in the wilderness (I Kings 19:5), and creating disaster for the Assyrians attacking Jerusalem (II Kings 19:35; Isa. 37:36).

In the later OT, noticeable shifts appear, not only in the nature and roles of angels, but also in the frequency and importance of their appearance. In Ezekiel (see 40:3), Zechariah, and Daniel (see chaps. 7-12), angels reveal secrets about the future, interpret dreams and visions, and aid in interpreting scripture. Unlike the role and power he possessed in the presentation in Job, SATAN, a "son of God," becomes more of an anti-God power (see Zech. 3:1-2; I Chr. 21:1). In Daniel, angels have proper names, such as Gabriel and Michael (8:16; 9:21; 10:13, 21; 12:1).

Between the OT and NT, the following developments reflected in the Pseudepigrapha and Dead Sea Scrolls can be seen in Jewish angelology: (a) angels become associated with various phenomena such as stars, the seasons, and so forth, and are involved in the governance of the world; (b) names for many angels appear; (c) evil angelic powers hostile to God appear and are named; (d) angels are often pictured in a hierarchy, thus giving rise to the concept of archangels; (e) angelic armies, both good and bad, are mentioned; (f) angels function as intercessors and carry humans' prayers to the Divine; (g) different angels are associated with different nations (already reflected in Daniel); (h) angels are present in worship (see I Cor. 11:10); (i) the guardian role of angels becomes more important (see Acts 12:15); (j) stories are told in which angels play special roles (see the book of TOBIT); and (k) angels are considered to have been the mediators of the Law at Mount Sinai (see Acts 7:53; Gal. 3:19).

The NT reflects the angelology of the world of its day. Angels as messengers announce the births of John the Baptist and Jesus (Luke 1:11-20; Matt. 1:18-25) and herald Jesus' birth (Luke 2:8-15). They offer assurance and protection (Matt. 1:18-25; 2:13; Acts 12:6-9). Angels serve Jesus in the wilderness and in the ordeal before the Crucifixion (Matt. 4:11; Mark 1:12; Luke 22:43). Angels appear at the tomb (Matt. 28:1-7; Mark 16:5-7; Luke 24:4). Angels are said to surround the throne of God, and in the book of Revelation, where the primary actions are set in heaven, angels play dominant roles in world history and the events of the end of days. Jude 6 alludes to the primeval rebellion of angelic powers. Angels are assigned roles in the world (Rom. 8:38; Acts 5:19; Gal. 4:3; Col. 2:8; Eph. 3:10) but are considered inferior to Jesus the Son (Heb. 1:4-13). While angels are said to appear at the final judgment (Matt. 13:39-43; 24:29-31; Mark 13:24-27), Paul declares that Christians shall judge the angels (I Cor. 6:3).

J.H.

ANGELUS. A Catholic prayer recited three times a day, at 6:00 A.M., noon, and 6:00 P.M. It is a series of three versicles and responses, each of which is followed by a HAIL MARY and a prayer. The Angelus began in the sixteenth century.

J.C.

ANGLICAN CHURCHES. The worldwide association of churches in communion with the Church of England (see CANTERBURY), including the Episcopal Church in the U.S.A. To be in official relationship with the Anglican Communion, churches must "uphold and propagate the catholic and apostolic faith and order as they are generally set forth in the BOOK OF COMMON PRAYER . . . they are particular or national churches, and, as such, promote within each of their territories a national expression of Christian faith, life and worship"; and "are bound together not by a central legislative and executive authority, but by mutual loyalty sustained through the common council of bishops."

This was the statement issued by the 1930 LAMBETH CONFERENCE. Since 1867 these conferences have been the rallying point of Anglicanism and are convened every ten years at Lambeth Palace, the London residence of the archbishop of Canterbury. He serves as the chairman of these consultative and non-legislative meetings. Currently some 365 dioceses are represented at the conferences by their respective bishops.

Recent revisions of the Book of Common Prayer in several national churches since the 1930 Lambeth Conference have not materially changed the basis for membership in the Anglican Communion. Actually one of the recognized characteristics of Anglicanism is the freedom member churches possess in determining theology and liturgical practice.

Anglicanism is an outgrowth of the Church of England into various parts of the world through colonization and missionary endeavor, beginning with the Society for the Propagation of the Gospel in 1701 and later through church-related missionary societies.

It is not known when Christianity first came to Great Britain, but British bishops were present at the Council of Arles in 314. Rome sent St. Augustine on a mission to Britain in 597. This gave impetus to the ongoing growth of the church. In 1529 KING HENRY VIII, quarreling with the Vatican, initiated the break from the Roman Catholic Church. But it was QUEEN ELIZABETH who really organized the Church of England and gave it the character it has maintained to the present day. Anglicans have always insisted that they did not form a new church but implemented reforms in the ecclesiastical body that had existed for at least a thousand years.

Anglicanism has always adhered to an episcopal system of church government, that is, rule by the bishops, who along with priests (presbyters) and deacons serve as the ministers. The historic episcopate embodies the concept that bishops are consecrated by the laying on of hands of other bishops in a continuing succession since the first bishops were ordained by the apostles (see APOSTOLIC SUCCESSION).

The doctrinal basis of the church includes the simple statement that Holy Scriptures contain all things necessary to salvation and are the supreme authority for the faith and life of the church. Three historic creeds—APOSTLES', NICENE, and ATHANASIAN—are held as proper expositions of scriptural doctrine. Anglicans also attest to the teaching of four COUNCILS of the early church: Nicaea, Ephesus, Constantinople, and Chalcedon (see each council). The THIRTY-NINE ARTICLES (1563) reflect the mediating position the church took between Rome and the ultra-Protestant position in the sixteenth century, but they are not authoritative today.

Since its origin Anglicans have been involved in the ECUMENICAL MOVEMENT, which emphasizes the unity of the universal church. Yet they often display ambivalence in relationships with non-Anglican communions. The High Church party in recent years has favored reconciliation with the Roman Catholic Church, and the evangelical wing has favored merger with the free churches of Protestantism. All provinces are members of the World Council of Churches, and four Anglican dioceses have become an integral part of the Church of South India.

R.H.

ANGLO-CATHOLIC (ANGLICANS). The most traditionalist segment of the HIGH CHURCH party of the Church of England. The term Anglo-Catholic has been used since the Oxford movement to describe two trends in Anglicanism: a revival of Roman Catholic sacramental theology and the development of more complex, traditional liturgies.

J.C.

ANGST. See ANXIETY.

ANIMISM. The belief that animals, plants, places, and people have similar souls or spirits. This soul is physical, not metaphysical. It is often equated with the breath, blood, name, or shadow of the object or creature. The term "animism" was coined by the nineteenth-century anthropologist Edward Tylor to denote the first stage of the evolution of religion. Culturally, animism was linked to what Tylor called "savagery"—that is, hunter-gatherer societies. Tylor claimed that as a culture rose to "barbarism" (chiefdoms) and then "civilization," its religions leaned toward polytheism and then to monotheism.

Tylor saw the origin of animism as an attempt to account for fainting, dreams, and death. He proposed that early humans rationally explained these conditions as products of the activity of the "soul" and that early humans extended this "soul" to animals, plants, and other objects (see TOTEM). Later anthropologists have rejected the validity of his concept as a generalization and an evolutionary scheme. They admit, however, that many primitive cultures share certain common beliefs: the soul animates the body; it can be attacked or protected by MAGIC (witchcraft); it is strengthened by passages through the proper LIFE CYCLE RITES; if the rituals are performed correctly, the souls of nature and the dead will protect the living; if the rituals are neglected, the spirits will do harm (see ANCESTOR VENERATION). Some societies believe that the soul comes back to the lineage in a new body (see REINCARNATION).

K./M.C.

ANNAS. A high priest and titular head of the priestly party in Jerusalem in the time of Jesus. He was appointed in A.D. 6 and deposed in A.D. 15. Yet he is described as high priest after his deposition and the succession of his son-in-law Caiaphas (John 18:13). The Jews, however, seem to have regarded the office, at least in its title, as one for life, and Luke (3:2) may be using a source that paid tribute to Annas' continuing influence ex officio. We know Annas did have powerful prestige, which carried over to the succeeding holder of the office of high priest.

At the trial of Jesus, Annas played a role by conducting a preliminary inquiry, according to John 18:13-24. Jesus had opposed the priestly (Sadducean) aristocracy, especially in his cleansing the Temple, whose forecourt was a profitable money exchange and emporium for the sale of sacrificial animals. This fact may well have had repercussions in leading Annas bitterly to resist Jesus and condemn him in the Jewish court. In Acts 4:5-12 Annas appears in a hostile role, opposing the followers of Jesus in apostolic times.

R.M.

ANNUAL CONFERENCE. The yearly meeting of all United Methodist parishes within a conference, held under the direction of the bishop. All ministers (elders and deacons) must attend, and representatives from each congregation attend. Ministers are assigned to congregations for the coming year (or other set period) at the conference.

J.C.

ANNUNCIATION. The announcement by an angel, GABRIEL, to MARY that she is going to have a son as reported in Luke 1:26-35. Since she was a virgin she was puzzled and fearful. Joseph, to whom she was engaged, was of the lineage of David, so his sons would be possible heirs to the Davidic throne of Israel. Mary was astonished at the angelic report, but was assured that her pregnancy was a sign of divine favor, and that her child—though not the physical offspring of Joseph—would indeed obtain the throne of David. Furthermore, he would reign forever, just as God had promised David, according to II Samuel 7:13.

The angel also told Mary that the child is to have the title of "Son of the Most High" or "Holy, Son of God," in keeping with the divine acclaim of Israel's ruler in Psalm 2:7. His name will be Jesus, which in Hebrew means "Yahweh saves (his people)." Mary is promised that this miraculous birth will take place, not by human means, but by God's spirit and power.

H.K.

ANOINTED. The English equivalent of the Hebrew word mesiah (messiah) and Greek christos (Christ). The anointed in ancient Israel was the designation of the king. David, for example, refused to injure or kill King Saul because he was "the Lord's anointed" (I Sam. 24:6). In later times, "the anointed" also became a designation of the high priest when rituals and functions of the king were assumed by the holder of this office.

The Hebrews used two different words for anoint. One (suk) related to the normal rubbing of the body with oil. The other (mashab) was employed primarily with reference to the act by which a person or thing was consecrated by the pouring or smearing of sacred oil. The latter type of anointing was a special religious act setting aside the anointed for divine service. Thus sacred pillars (Gen. 31:13), the altar (Exod. 29:36), the tabernacle and its furnishings (Lev. 8:10; Num. 7:1), special bread (Exod. 29:2), and other things were anointed.

The ritual of anointment was especially associated with the king (I Sam. 10:1; II Sam. 2:4; 5:3; I Kings 1:39) and thus his title "the anointed." Similar royal inauguration rituals were practiced in Canaan before the time of Israel so the ritual is not unique to the Bible. A single biblical text refers to the anointment of a prophet (I Kings 19:16). Anointment not only set aside and consecrated the object but was also believed to transfer to the recipient something of the holiness and strength of the deity.

In post-biblical times, the anointed (Messiah) was one of the designations given to the expected redeemer figure. "Christ," the Greek translation of Messiah, tended to become as much a name (Jesus Christ) as a title since special anointing was not part of royal rituals in the Greco-Roman world. The use of the word Christ in the sense of Messiah or "the anointed one" can be seen in such NT passages as Mark 8:29.

J.H.

ANSELM. Archbishop of Canterbury from 1093 to 1109, famous for his ONTOLOGICAL ARGUMENT for the existence of God and for his theory of substitutionary ATONEMENT.

A native of Italy who had become abbot of a monastery in Normandy, he was called to England by the Norman King William II. But the question of investitures, as well as other issues of church and state, led to conflicts between the archbishop and the throne (see INVESTITURE CONTROVERSY). Due to these conflicts with William II, and later with Henry I, Anselm spent many years in exile from England. He finally reconciled with Henry I through compromise in 1107, but died three years after having been restored to his see.

His argument for the existence of God, which is developed in the Proslogion, can be stated quite briefly: God is "that-than-which-no-greater-can-be-thought," and this idea includes in itself the notion of existence. A nonexistent being cannot be declared to be "that-than-which-no-greater-can-be-thought," for in that case an existing being would be greater than it. This would contradict the very notion of "that-than-which-no-greater-can-be-thought." Therefore, this greatest of beings, God, can only be thought of as existing. This argument, which can be stated so succinctly, is usually called the ontological argument and has given rise to numerous diverging interpretations. To this day philosophers and logicians debate its meaning and significance.

Anselm developed his theory of substitutionary atonement in his treatise Cur Deus Homo?—Why God-man. There he argued that, since sin is an offense against the infinite God, its penalty must be infinite. But, since sin is a human offense, its penalty must be paid by humankind. Hence there would be the need for God made human, Jesus Christ, who pays in our stead. This theory gained such acceptance that to this day many regard it as the only correct understanding of atonement.

Anselm's theological method consisted of seeking to understand by reason what he already knew by faith—the existence of God, the saving work of Christ, and so on. By the use of this method, he became one of the founders of medieval SCHOLASTICISM.

J.G.

ANTE-NICENE FATHERS. The collective name given to Christian authors who wrote before the Council of NICEA in 325, excluding, on the one hand, the books of the NT and, on the other, those which were declared heretical from a very early date.

The earliest of these writings are grouped under the title APOSTOLIC FATHERS. Then came the APOLOGISTS, who were mostly second-century authors who wrote in defense of Christianity during times of persecution. IRENAEUS, late in the second century, wrote a voluminous work against Gnosticism, and a shorter one expounding the basics of Christianity for the benefit of recent converts. In Alexandria, CLEMENT and ORIGEN sought to build bridges between Christian theology and pagan philosophy. Since Greek was the common language of the eastern Mediterranean basin, all the aforementioned authors wrote in Greek.

The first Christians to write extensively in Latin were the apologist Minucius Felix and the North African TERTULLIAN, who was so influential that he has been called the Father of Latin Theology. In the third century, the most significant Latin theologian was CYPRIAN, also from North Africa.

J.G.

ANTHEM. A sacred vocal (solo or choral) composition, accompanied by instruments, sung by a choir in the language of the people. The anthem originated in the early Anglican church. It is generally a composition for two or more voices. The text may be biblical but usually is not drawn from the liturgy.

J.C.

Courtesy of the Metropolitan Museum of Art, Rogers Fund, 1920

Saint Anthony Tormented by Demons, by Martin Schongauer

ANTHONY OF EGYPT. One of the earliest Christian hermits, reputed by some to be the founder of Egyptian MONASTICISM. After many years of total solitude, in which he is said to have fought with constant temptations, he found peace in the assurance that God was always with him. Later, others joined him in the desert, where he founded a closely knit community of hermits. After CONSTANTINE's conversion, as the powerful gained an increasing voice in the church, many flocked to the desert in protest, and Anthony became their model. When ARIANISM came to the foreground, Anthony intervened in the controversy, supporting ATHANASIUS and his followers. The Life of Anthony, which Athanasius wrote after the hermit's death, was very influential in the spread of monasticism.

J.G.

ANTHONY OF PADUA. One of the early Franciscans, renowned for his preaching. He was born in Lisbon to a noble family in 1195 and soon joined the Augustinian Canons. He spent most of his early years in study, but then he decided to join the Franciscans in order to go as a missionary to North Africa. When he was forced to return to Europe for reasons of health, the Franciscans suddenly discovered his wisdom and eloquence and named him to a series of teaching posts. But he was particularly famous for his preaching, which achieved the conversion of many ALBIGENSES. One of his main themes was the rights of the poor and the sins of greed and usury. He died in 1231, and was canonized a year later.

J.G.

ANTHROPOCENTRIC. Defines the tendency to measure all things by human standards and to regard the human situation as one of AUTONOMY. This is in contrast to allowing God to be central (the theocentric view). Yet theologians stress that only a true understanding of the value of human personality can permit humankind to know the reality of God as creator and savior. Anthropocentric and theocentric, therefore, are not strictly terms in opposition.

I.C.

ANTHROPOMORPHISM. Derived from the Greek words anthropos (human being) and morphe (form). It refers to the process whereby God's nature is expressed in terms of human attributes or abilities. In the OT, although no one ever sees God with eyes, God is portrayed as having form and substance, so that God feels, acts, and even breathes and smells like us. The INCARNATION, too, in a sense is a form of anthropomorphism, for God is conceived as having been fully present in the human Jesus.

I.C.

ANTICHRIST. Biblical. "Who is the liar but he who denies that Jesus is the Christ? This is the antichrist, he who denies the Father and the Son" (I John 2:22).

The term "antichrist" is heard often in the late-twentieth century. Some evangelists identify the social, moral, and international ills of the times with the dark days foreseen by the writer of II Thessalonians 2:3-4. Here, Paul speaks of the coming again of the Lord, and Christians are warned: "that day will not come, unless the rebellion comes first, and the man of lawlessness is revealed, the son of perdition, who opposes and exalts himself against every so-called god or object of worship, so that he takes his seat in the temple of God, proclaiming himself to be God."

The "son of perdition" is generally taken to equal the Antichrist of John's Epistles. Antichrist occurs in the Bible only in the Johannine Epistles (in I John 2:18, 22; 4:3; II John 7). The "son of perdition/man of lawlessness" phrase occurs only in II Thessalonians 2. Nevertheless, the concept of the Antichrist has excited Christian imaginations since the earliest days of the church.

Just as darkness is meaningless without light, the Antichrist is meaningless apart from Christ. First, there is the faith of the church that Christ will return to earth, to overthrow evil and establish his Kingdom. Dependent upon this is the idea of the writer of II Thessalonians, that the Lord will not return until the Antichrist is revealed and the forces of evil have done their worst to destroy humanity. Second Thessalonians 2 implies that Christ's return is not yet ready to occur because this "man of lawlessness" has not appeared. Historical forces, evidently directed by God, restrain the "mystery of lawlessness," but that will not be forever. The lawless man will reveal himself and be destroyed by the appearance of Christ (II Thess. 2:8).

The "little apocalypse" of Mark 13, given as a discourse of Jesus, generally is believed to refer to the Antichrist, also. This material is duplicated in Matthew 24 and Luke 21. Interestingly, the phrase used in the Synoptic Gospels is "false Christs" and "false prophets" (Mark 13:22; cf. Matt. 7:15; Luke 6:26). In this case, also, the appearance of the "desolating sacrilege set up where it ought not to be" (Mark 13:14; cf. Daniel 9:27; 11:31; 12:11) is connected to the return of Christ to gather his elect into the Kingdom (Mark 13:27).

Ezekiel 38-39 speaks of GOG AND MAGOG, who will fight terrible battles, and Zechariah 14:2ff. speaks of the destruction of Jerusalem before God saves the people. Daniel 7:21-27; 9:24-27; and chap. 11 seem to visualize the fourth beast in the SON OF MAN vision as an ultimate demonstration of the powers of evil, similar to the "man of lawlessness" of II Thessalonians 2.

The Revelation to John also contains poetic material that Christian tradition has assimilated to the Antichrist motif. The twelfth chapter of Revelation speaks of the "great red dragon, with seven heads and ten horns, and seven diadems upon his heads" (v. 3) that persecutes the woman and her child, which is evidently a reference to the Virgin Mary and the Christ child (Rev. 12:4-6). Revelation 13:2-9 presents the beast who wars on the saints, and Revelation 13:11-18 shows another beast who forces humans to worship the first beast. Revelation 19:11-16 proclaims the SECOND COMING OF CHRIST—the warrior from heaven on a white horse who fights the evil beasts and their earthly followers, overcoming them and imprisoning SATAN for one thousand years. Revelation 20:4, 7 show the freeing of Satan, who seeks to destroy the earth; but Christ destroys evil, and the DAY OF JUDGMENT dawns. The similarity of this mystical account to the “man of lawlessness” scenario of II Thessalonians 2 is quite close.

Historical. There are three schools of interpretation of the Antichrist throughout Christian history. The past interpretation depicts the Antichrist as a personage who has already lived (as, for example, NERO). The present interpretation looks for the “man of lawlessness” who pretends to be God among contemporary figures (as, for example, LUTHER’s identification of the PAPACY as the Antichrist, or some twentieth-century Christians’ identification of Hitler as the “man of lawlessness”). The future interpretation presents a vigil for signs of the coming of the Antichrist in the near future (as, e.g., some contemporary FUNDAMENTALISTS’ proclamations of Communist leaders as possible candidates for the Antichrist).

The past interpretation is often given by Bible scholars who point out that the Revelation (as well as II Thess.) was written in a time of persecution. Roman emperors, like Nero, who claimed to be divine and tried to destroy the church were good candidates to be identified (in a disguised way) as the arch foes of Christ.

The present interpretation has always enjoyed currency among some Christians. Sectarious persecuted by the Roman Church, such as the WALDENSES, the HUSSITES, the WYCLIFFITES, and the LOLLARDS readily identified the Pope as the Antichrist in their times. When Martin Luther found himself condemned and a deaf ear turned to his call for a council to reform the church, he, too, denounced the office of the Pope as the Antichrist in harsh words. Some Protestants still make this identification, even in this time of Christian acceptance across confessional lines.

The future interpretation of the Antichrist has had the largest following. Since most Christians have considered Christ’s return to be in the far future, the arising of the Antichrist is seen as a future event.

Contemporary. The last half of the twentieth century has witnessed a revival of interest in the Revelation to John, the Son of man visions of Daniel, and other apocalyptic portions of Scripture. The emphasis of popular evangelists—not least those preachers with access to radio and television—on the imminence of the Second Coming has also stirred interest in the identification of the Antichrist either in the present or the near future. Generally, the Antichrist is identified as a political leader of the Communist or Arab worlds.

J.C.

ANTI-DEFAMATION LEAGUE. An organization that seeks “to stop the defamation of the Jewish people,” and “to secure justice and fair treatment for all citizens alike.” An arm of the service organization B’NAI B’RITH, the ADL was founded in 1913 as a reaction to the trial by prejudice of Leo Frank, accused of rape and murder in Atlanta, Georgia, and subsequently lynched.

L.K.

ANTILEGOMENA. See CANON; PSEUDEPIGRAPHA.

ANTINOMIAN. A term describing those in the early church who claimed that after the gospel’s promulgation, obedience to the Law became abrogated. The belief led to some excesses in behavior condemned by Paul (compare I Cor. 5:6; 9:21). The church repudiated the antinomian view by insisting that free justification did not erase the moral principles inherent in the Law.

I.C.

ANTIOCHENE THEOLOGY. A type of theology that was influential in Syria and Asia Minor at least until the time of the Arab conquests. Its main rival was ALEXANDRIAN THEOLOGY and, although there were many differences between the two, the main point of conflict was CHRISTOLOGY. Alexandrian theology emphasized the divinity of Jesus and the close union between that divinity and the humanity of the Savior. It is therefore called a “unitive” Christology. Antiochene theology feared that this would lead to a denial of the full humanity of Jesus, which would be obscured by the divinity. Therefore, it tended to stress the distinction between the “two natures” of the Savior—the divine and the human. For this reason it has often been described as holding to a “disjunctive” Christology.

Antiochene theologians were instrumental in the condemnation of the APOLLINARIANS in A.D. 381, at the Council of Constantinople. But fifty years later the Antiochene Nestorius (see NESTORIANS), who was patriarch of Constantinople, was condemned at the COUNCIL OF EPHESUS for declaring that Mary was “bearer of Christ”—CHRISTOKOS—and not “bearer of God”—THEOTOKOS. Nestorius meant that the distinction between the divinity and the humanity of Christ does not allow one to speak as if the divinity had been borne by Mary. In 451, at the COUNCIL OF CHALCEDON, Antiochene theology, with the support of Pope Leo, gained a victory in the condemnation of MONOPHYSITISM, an extreme form of Alexandrian theology. But the conflict continued, and in A.D. 553, at the Second Council of Constantinople, three of the great figures of Antiochene theology were condemned.

J.G.

ANTIOCH ON THE ORONTES; ANTIOCH OF PISIDIA. Seleucus I (312–281 B.C.), founder of the Seleucid dynasties in Syria, Asia Minor, and Mesopotamia following the death of Alexander the Great, named sixteen cities in honor of his father, Antiochus; two of these Antiochs are mentioned in the NT. Antioch in Syria lies near the northeast corner of the Mediterranean, just upstream from where the Orontes empties into the sea. It was the capital of Syria in Hellenistic and Roman times, the site having been chosen where Alexander had erected an altar to Zeus, near a fine spring. Major trade routes pass the site; archaeological evidence goes back to Neolithic times.

The city was laid out in gridiron fashion, with the main street colonnaded in Roman times. Daphne, a fine suburb to the south, was filled with groves and springs. A stadium and a theater were provided by Roman rulers, beginning with Augustus. The population of the city was about a half million, including a large Jewish community, in addition to Syrians, Greeks, and Romans. The Antiochians' interest in religion was proverbial, so that Juvenal, a Roman satirist (A.D. 60–140) wrote that the Orontes had overflowed and flooded the Tiber, that is, with superstition (Satire 111.62). The city regarded itself, however, as the intellectual rival of Athens and Alexandria.

In Acts 11:2-26 Antioch is said to be the first place where Jesus' followers were called Christians; it was at this Antioch that the gospel was first preached to Gentiles who lacked any connections with Judaism. There Christian prophets chose Barnabas and Saul to launch the Gentile mission (Acts 13:1-3), and Paul returned there more than once in the course of his missionary career (Acts 14:27; 18:22).

From this Antioch, Paul's missionary journey penetrated Asia Minor as far north as Antioch in Pisidia (Acts 13:13-52), high on the Anatolian plateau. There Paul preached first in a synagogue, but then Jewish hostility led him to turn to direct evangelization of Gentiles.

H. K.

ANTIOCHUS III-VII. In 200 B.C. Antiochus III, Seleucid king, defeated Ptolemy V, and Palestine became dominated by Seleucids. By this time, the Seleucids had to accommodate to the rising power in the West, Rome. Out of the power struggle, Antiochus IV came to the throne, announcing himself as the manifestation of Olympian Zeus and taking the title Epiphanes. In order to unify the kingdom behind him, he insisted that all subject peoples honor him alone as divine. The Jews were forbidden to practice circumcision or to offer the sacrifices required by their law, but were to pay him divine honors at an altar he ordered erected in the Temple at Jerusalem. This was viewed by Jews as the "abomination of desolation" mentioned in Daniel. When royal officers were brought in to enforce the decree of Antiochus, a priest by the name of Mattathias led the Jews in revolt, organizing a surprisingly successful guerrilla army. Leadership in the Jewish independence movement passed to Judah (Judas) the Maccabee, whose schemes and exploits are told in I and II Maccabees.

From Atlas of the Bible (Thomas Nelson & Sons Limited)

Antiochus III

The Temple was cleansed in 164 B.C., as celebrated in the Feast of Hanukkah. At the death of Antiochus IV, leadership passed to Lysias, who was regent for Antiochus V and who, after narrowly failing to recapture Jerusalem, signed a treaty with the Jews. The struggle of the brothers of Judas to extend and confirm their control of Palestine was complicated by the rise of several men fighting for the Seleucid throne. Among these competing claimants was Antiochus VI, whose chief supporter was Trypho, skilled in military and diplomatic contests. The third and last of the sons of Mattathias to assume leadership over the Jewish independence movement was Simon, who was officially acknowledged by the Seleucids as high priest and governor. Antiochus VII, also called Antiochus Sidetes, sought to remove Simon from power, since he had cooperated with a pretender to the throne, Demetrius II. But Simon's troops defeated Sidetes' army in a crucial battle. Although Simon was betrayed and murdered, his son John Hyrcanus succeeded him in his joint role as military, political, and priestly leader of the Jews. Antiochus VII placed Jerusalem under siege, but was ordered by Rome (with which the Maccabees had a treaty, I Macc. 12:1-23) to withdraw the troops and reach an accommodation with John Hyrcanus. In 128 B.C., when Demetrius II defeated and killed Antiochus VII, John Hyrcanus was able to gain control of more cities, including some in Samaria and east of the Jordan. From this point on, the Seleucids never again exercised effective control over Palestine.

H.K.

ANTIPAS, HEROD. See HEROD.

ANTI-SEMITISM. The expressed hatred and persecution of Jews. In the Bible, Haman tells the king: "There is a certain people scattered abroad and dispersed among the peoples in all the provinces of your kingdom; their laws are different from those of every other people, and they do not keep the king's laws, so that it is not for the king's profit to tolerate them" (Esth. 3:8).

This is a classical expression of animosity toward the Jews. It contains the traditional aspects of anti-Semitism: (1) dispersion and homelessness of the Jews; (2) suspicions aroused by their different laws and customs which give rise to "the dislike of the like for the unlike"; and (3) the accusation that they are potentially harmful to the state.

Much of the early hatred was based on the rejection by Jews of the many gods of the pagans. The Jewish refusal to worship images led to a series of clashes with the Hellenistic and Roman authorities. The first serious manifestation of anti-Semitism in history was the concentrated attack on the Jewish religion in the days of ANTIOCHUS IV (175-164 B.C.). He was also called Antiochus Epiphanes.

In the Christian world anti-Semitism assumed tragic proportions. The Jews were persecuted both because of the alleged crime of deicide and the nonacceptance of the divinity of Jesus. Jews were gradually forced out of every sphere of political influence and deprived of civil and political rights. The church's attempts to erect barriers between Jews and non-Jews were translated into legislation affecting all aspects of Jewish life. Conversion to Judaism was punishable by death. A movement for the destruction of synagogues and forced conversion of Jews was intense from the fifth century on. Religious anti-Semitism reached its first climax in the period of the CRUSADES. The Fourth Lateran Council (1215) passed a series of anti-Jewish measures. The blood libel and The Protocols of the Elders of Zion, a proven forgery, generated vicious attacks against Jews. Anti-Semitism reached its height with the rise of Hitler and the Nazi HOLOCAUST.

Responsible contemporary church leaders, realizing the dangers of anti-Semitism as well as the common ground of people of all faiths, have condemned anti-Semitism and are making efforts to promote tolerance and understanding.

L.K.

ANXIETY. (German, Angst) A phenomenon that has been the subject of much study by existentialist philosophers (see EXISTENTIALISM). Many of their reflections have been taken over by theologians. The importance of anxiety is that it is an ontological emotion, that is to say, a feeling or state of mind which reveals in a fundamental way the being of the person who experiences it (see ONTOLOGY).

A classic discussion of anxiety is found in KIERKEGAARD's Concept of Anxiety, which discusses the origin of sin. What makes sin possible, or how does a human being pass from innocence to sin? Kierkegaard answers this question by pointing to anxiety. He does not mean the concrete anxieties that we experience from day to day but a profound malaise or feeling of uneasiness, already present in innocence. He gives as an illustration the awakening of sexuality and sensuality in the individual. There is an uneasiness that finally issues in the sensual act, and so in the loss of innocence one experiences a changed quality of existence.

We are aware too of anxiety in the exercise of freedom. It is like a dizziness as we look into the abyss of possibilities opening before us. Kierkegaard also speaks of anxiety in connection with the task of becoming a person—what he calls the synthesis of body and soul. In all these cases, we are aware both of the finiteness of our human constitution and of the tremendous responsibilities laid upon us. However, Kierkegaard also sees anxiety as a preparation for faith. To experience anxiety is to know the reality of the human condition and so to acknowledge the need for grace.

Later existentialists acknowledge their debt to Kierkegaard, but develop their understanding of anxiety in a different manner. HEIDEGGER claims that anxiety gives us "one of the most far-reaching and primordial possibilities of disclosure." It brings humans face to face with themselves. We have a tendency to veil from ourselves the human condition, so we lose ourselves in mass existence or we let ourselves become absorbed in the day-to-day business of getting and spending. The mood of anxiety summons us back to ourselves. Again, this mood is nothing concrete—it is not like the fears we experience, which are fears of some identifiable object or eventuality. Anxiety is indefinite and arises from the human condition as a whole.

Heidegger also describes anxiety as a mood in which all the things that concern us in the world seem to sink into a kind of grayness, and we are thrown back on ourselves as beings constituted by both freedom and finitude. We try to repress anxiety, but from time to time it breaks in. Likewise we try not to think about death, the final threat to existence.

Though he does not speak of faith, Heidegger, like Kierkegaard, thinks that anxiety makes us free for an authentic existence, in which we are delivered from illusions and take upon ourselves the burden of our freedom. According to SARTRE, Kierkegaard sees anxiety in the face of freedom, while Heidegger sees it as the apprehension of nothingness. In a sense, both of these aspects belong to anxiety in the face of the conjunction in the human person of the polarities of freedom and finitude. Sartre too believes that anxiety—and, indeed, all emotional moods—has ontological significance and has to be faced and endured. We are tempted to escape from anxiety by submerging ourselves in the conventional patterns of society, but that is “bad faith” and a betrayal of our authentic humanity.

Something comparable to the phenomenon of anxiety is found in the philosophy of JASPERS, who makes much of “limit-situations”—junctions of life where individuals come to the end of their resources, confronted perhaps by guilt or death. Such situations have a revelatory quality, lighting up not only the individual's own situation but also what Jaspers calls “Transcendence,” the enviroing reality. Many theologians of the twentieth century have made use of such ideas. Bultmann's interpretation of the NT—especially the theology of Paul, which is expounded as an anthropology in which we trace the course from sin to the new life in Christ—has many parallels to the philosophical views discussed above. Paul Tillich has much to say about anxiety and finitude, the shock of possible nonbeing, the need to overcome the polarities and ambiguities of the human situation. His whole METHOD OF CORRELATION takes its rise from the anxiety-producing human predicament. We may note, however, that there has been a strong reaction in theology against the major role given to anxiety by Tillich and others.

BONHOEFFER began this reaction by questioning whether the Christian theologian should approach humanity at the point of its weakness rather than of its strength. Since his time, Roman Catholic theology, as represented by RAHNER and others, has developed a different anthropological approach, stressing human transcendence rather than anxiety, while among Protestants MOLTMANN has developed a theology of hope. It may be worth recalling that although Heidegger made much of the themes of anxiety and death introductory to the question of the meaning of being, he also says that this question can be raised by joy. RICOEUR goes further and suggests that the only ontological emotion is joy. But no doubt joy and anxiety belong together and indicate the ambiguities and oscillations of human destiny (see DESPAIR).

J.M.

APHRODITE. A Greek goddess, in Homer's pantheon, who combined in her person many traits as a patron of love, beauty, and fertility. Her name, connected with the Greek word for “foam,” gave rise to the myth that she rose from the sea as a daughter of Zeus. Her maritime connections made her popular among sailors, though her cult was widespread throughout the ancient world.

Her primary role was as a deity of generation and the sexual instinct. Prostitutes claimed her as their patroness, especially at Corinth where sacred prostitution flourished, and according to the geographer Strabo, at her temple on Acrocorinthus, overlooking the city. Strabo speaks of Corinthian sexual laxity, with Aphrodite's temple served by a thousand female slaves and prostitutes. Corinth was a seaport, standing at the isthmus of the two stretches of water—the Gulf of Corinth and the Saronic Gulf—and this was an added reason for Aphrodite's popular appeal in that city, when elsewhere in the Greek world she was known for her austere demeanor. In Latin literature she is called Venus.

R.M.

APOCALYPSE. See REVELATION, BOOK OF.

APOCALYPSES (Apocryphal). Not all apocryphal literature is apocalyptic, but most apocalypses are apocryphal.

Jewish apocalyptic literature includes the book of Enoch, the Assumption of Moses, IV Ezra (II Esdras), Testaments of the Twelve Patriarchs (partly with Christian supplementation), the Sibylline Oracles (pagan in origin, imitated and amplified by Jews and later by Christians), II and III Baruch (the latter reworked by Christians), the book of Jubilees, and various apocalypses of Abraham, Elijah, and others. Some of these works are known only by reference made to them by later authors, and those preserved have usually been so only in translation and fragmentarily. The Jewish sectaries of QUMRAN evidence an acquaintance with some of the works above and also, as an apocalyptic group, have handed on others of their own, which until the twentieth century were still unknown, such as the War Scroll.

Besides the amplifications of Jewish apocalypses just mentioned, early Christianity created some of its own, such as the Ascension of Isaiah, developed from a non-apocalyptic Jewish apocryphon. Most Christian apocalypses, some of which have been fairly well preserved, were developed in imitation of the Revelation of John: for instance, the apocalypses of Peter, Paul, Thomas, Stephen, Mary, and others. (See APOCALYPTICISM, PSEUDEPIGRAPHIA, and APOCRYPHA.)

B.V.

APOCALYPTICISM. Apocalyptic literature is characterized by most or all of the following traits. (1) Its perspective is of a definitive end time, the transition from this historical age into a world to come. (2) It adopts the literary forms of prophecy as a guise, pretending that the present and imminent end time with which it is concerned was predicted long ago. This trait frequently entails pseudonymity or attribution of the pretended prophecy to some famous figure of the past. (3) Its vehicle of communication is an imitation of prophetic vision which, however, tends to be highly complex and allegorical, frequently requiring an involved "interpretation," whereas authentic prophetic vision was generally concerned with the spiritual significance of very routine natural events. (4) Part and parcel of the apocalyptic "vision," which is the burden of its message (apokalyptein, meaning "reveal [what is to come]"), is a proliferation of symbolism and deliberately esoteric imagery. The symbolism is sometimes apparently sought for its own sake, but more normally could be explained as what would be expected of a consolation literature, which was also the resistance literature of a persecuted people who would be keyed into the nationalistic meaning of what might appear innocuous maunderings to the uninitiated. The time of the apocalyptic literature is roughly from the beginning of the second century B.C. to the end of the second century A.D. (5) This literature more than any other was, somewhat paradoxically, willing to incorporate into itself ideas and motifs (angelology, ethical or physical dualism, etc.), which derive not from native Israelite tradition but from foreign influences, particularly Persian and Hellenistic.

In the OT the only full-fledged apocalyptic work is the book of DANIEL. At least Daniel 7–12 has the traits of pseudonymity, pseudo-prophecy, lush imagery, and allegorical vision. This passage also encompasses an evident relation to the circumstances of its composition—the Seleucid oppression in Palestine shortly prior to the MACCABEAN REVOLT. The earlier chapters of Daniel are more closely related to works like Esther, Ruth, Judith, and Tobit, which are not apocalyptic in form but serve one of apocalyptic's purposes which was to reassure the faithful in their beliefs. The furthering of this purpose was one of the functions of Israelite WISDOM, which is also one of the possible sources of apocalypticism.

Other OT passages that can with greater or less probability be called apocalyptic are Isaiah 24–27 ("the apocalypse of Isaiah"), a very late addition to the Isaianic collection; Ezekiel 38–39, whether or not the work of the prophet Ezekiel, depicting a final victory over eschatological enemies by God's people; and parts of Joel and Zechariah, partly pseudonymous and partly allegorical, more imitative of than natural to prophecy.

The NT church was formed during the dominance of the apocalyptic mentality, and therefore it would be expected that we should find in the NT more apocalyptic literature than in the OT. (Most of the Jewish apocalyptic literature appears in the intertestamental apocryphal APOCALYPSES.) However, most of the NT writings, of which the Pauline letters are the earliest, date from a time when apocalyptic fervor had cooled and former apocalyptic thoughts were being recast in terms of a recognition that the church was destined to live in a world of continuing history. Apocalyptic utterances are to be found in I Thessalonians 4:13–5:11; II Thessalonians 2:1–12; and Mark 13 with Synoptic parallels. The only pure form of apocalyptic to be found in a NT book is the last work: REVELATION.

B.V.

APOCRYPHA. A term, deriving from the common Greek word apokryphos, meaning "hidden," which has come to be used especially by Protestants to refer to a particular collection of writings, many of which are accepted as canonical Scripture by Roman Catholics and other Christians.

Usage of the Term. Originally, when applied to writings, the term denoted that their content was either not to be made available to the general public or else was obscure and difficult to understand. The term "apocrypha" subsequently came to be used in various ways in the church. In its early usage, it was apparently a rather neutral term. II ESDRAS 14:44–46 speaks of ninety-four books whose content was reproduced by Ezra. Twenty-four of these (the Hebrew CANON) were to be made available for all, but seventy were to be given only "to the wise among your people." Although the term "apocrypha" is not used in this text, the seventy books were to be "hidden" or "kept secret" from the general public. No list is given of these seventy esoteric books for the wise.

Later the Christian scholar ORIGEN referred to "apocryphal" books as a group over against the books to be read in public worship. The term subsequently came to be used in a negative sense since non-orthodox groups often utilized "secret" or "hidden" writings. JEROME used the word to refer to those writings accepted as authoritative by Christians but not found in the Hebrew canon. This usage corresponds to its neutral modern usage meaning "noncanonical." Since there are wide differences among the Christian canons—ranging from the sixty-six books in the Protestant Bible to the eighty-one in that of the COPTIC (Egyptian) church—exactly what the term "Apocrypha" refers to is often uncertain.

Old Testament Apocrypha. When Protestants speak of the Apocrypha, they generally refer to the books of I and II ESDRAS, TOBIT, JUDITH, the ADDITIONS TO THE BOOK OF ESTHER, the WISDOM OF SOLOMON, ECCLESIASTICUS (or the Wisdom of Jesus the Son of Sirach), BARUCH, the LETTER OF JEREMIAH, the PRAYER OF AZARIAH and the SONG OF THE THREE YOUNG MEN, SUSANNA, BEL AND THE DRAGON, the PRAYER OF MANASSEH, and I and II MACCABEES. Some of these writings are actually additions to existing books (Esther and Daniel) rather than separate works. None of these was ever a part of the Hebrew canon. The early church, in the councils of Hippo (393) and Carthage (397, 419), accepted as canonical a larger OT than the Hebrew canon. At the Reformation, the Protestants reverted to a shorter OT canon, which included, but in a slightly different order, only those works in the Hebrew Bible. At the Council of Trent (1546), Catholics affirmed an OT canon that included all the above works except I and II Esdras and the Prayer of Manasseh. In Catholicism, these seven works (Tobit, Judith, Wisdom of Solomon, Ecclesiasticus, Baruch [with the Letter of Jeremiah], I and II Maccabees) as well as the longer forms of Esther and Daniel (the latter including the Prayer of Azariah and the Song of the Three Young Men, Susanna, and Bel and the Dragon) are frequently referred to as Deuterocanonical Books since their canonicity has not been undisputed. As a consequence, when Catholics speak of the OT Apocrypha, they are frequently referring to what Protestants call the OT PSEUDEPIGRAPHA. The Eastern Orthodox Church, at the Synod of Jerusalem in 1672, declared Wisdom of Solomon, Tobit, Judith, I and II Maccabees, and Ecclesiasticus to be canonical. For this confession, therefore, "Apocrypha" generally denotes the remainder of the books noted above plus III and IV Maccabees and Psalm 151. This expanded Apocrypha appears in the 1977 edition of the RSV.

The attitude of Protestants toward the OT Apocrypha has varied over the centuries. In Luther's 1534 translation of the Bible, they are placed between the Testaments with the heading: "Apocrypha: these are books which are not held equal to the Sacred Scriptures and yet are useful and good for reading." Most early English translations, although not that of WYCLIFF (1382), included the Apocrypha, generally between the Testaments. After much controversy, the British and Foreign Bible Society in 1827 decided to suspend "circulation of those books or parts of books which are usually termed Apocryphal." Only in recent years have these writings been included in editions of the Bible and a less polemical attitude been taken toward the Apocrypha by Protestants.

New Testament Apocrypha. There also exists what, on the analogy of the OT, has come to be called the NT Apocrypha. These are works produced by early Christians, which are similar both in content and form to NT writings. Among these are gospels, epistles, apocalypses, and "acts" of the various apostles. Although some of these were used by certain groups in the early church, there is no evidence that they were widely circulated or ever given authority outside of very limited circles and thus never enjoyed canonical status.

J. H.

APOLLINARIANS/APOLLINARIUS. A fourth-century bishop and theologian, and the followers of his views on CHRISTOLOGY. Apollinarius was a leader of the opposition to ARIANISM who, in his attempts to defend the Nicene faith, proposed a view that was soon rejected by the church at large. What he suggested was that in Jesus the eternal Word took the place of the human spirit. In Jesus there was a human body and "soul"—that which makes the body live—but no human spirit or "rational soul." Simply stated, in his physical life Jesus was a man; but in his mental and spiritual life he was God.

This view, which to Apollinarius seemed quite reasonable, was soon rejected. A synod in Rome in 374 condemned it, and several others concurred, until their actions were definitively upheld by the COUNCIL OF CONSTANTINOPLE in 381. By then, the Apollinarians had left the communion of the church and established their own worship services. On the basis of the council's action, such services were forbidden by the empire, and Apollinarianism eventually died out.

Those who condemned the doctrines of Apollinarius were convinced that his theories undercut the very purpose of the Incarnation. God assumed humanity, they argued, so that humanity could be saved. Therefore, "that which is not assumed, is not saved." In Apollinarius' scheme, God assumed a human body, and thus saved human bodies; but, in not assuming a human "rational soul," God left our rational souls in subjection to sin. J.G.

Herbert G. May

Ruins of the temple of Apollo at Corinth; seven of the thirty-eight monolithic Doric columns, about twenty-four feet high, still stand

APOLLO. An ancient Greek god who had both a terrifying side and a gentle side. He could make people feel their guilt, and even the other gods feared him. But he was also the god of music, poetry, and dance. He was believed to speak through his oracle at DELPHI. K.C.

APOLLOS. A Jew from ALEXANDRIA (Acts 18:24) who played a prominent part in the early Christian movement. He is described as having knowledge of the story of Jesus (from disciples of John the Baptist?) before he came to Ephesus in A.D. 52. There he was brought into touch with the Christian couple AQUILA

AND PRISCILLA, who instructed him in the complete Christian message (Acts 18:26). As a result Apollos added a new dimension to his natural eloquence and scriptural learning—an experiential knowledge of the Holy Spirit. His fresh understanding and experience of the messianic faith showed itself in his enthusiasm in a mission to the Jews in southern Greece (Acts 18:27-28).

His coming to Corinth, however, led to some unforeseen consequences. A group sprang up in the church there, whether with his consent or not, claiming him as a patron and mentor (I Cor. 1:12; 3:4). The basis of this claim was evidently Apollos' eloquence as a rhetorician and exponent of the OT in the tradition of PHILO, that is, adopting an allegorizing technique. Paul, however, saw the danger of a reliance on human wisdom (I Cor. 1:18-2:10). He went out of his way to stress the unity of purpose between himself and Apollos (I Cor. 3:5-23), and so denied the reason for this party spirit and rivalry (I Cor. 4:6). Apollos took the hint and never returned to Corinth, where his presence could have made matters worse (I Cor. 16:12). He did engage in some (later?) travels, according to Titus 3:13.

R.M.

APOLOGETICS. Apologetics traditionally has signified that branch of theology concerned with a reasoned defense of the Christian religion. Recently it has also referred to the general defense of a religious or theistic world view, including arguments for the existence of God, theodicies, and the refutation of atheist or materialist views. In this latter sense, apologetics is akin to NATURAL THEOLOGY. Christian apologetics is more specifically concerned with the rational defense of biblical revelation. In countering objections brought against Christian belief, apologetics does not itself determine the doctrines requiring defense. These are imposed by the criticisms, either explicit or implicit, advanced by the unbeliever or critic. Therefore, because of fresh challenges brought by rival religions or by changes in secular knowledge, the apologetic task must be undertaken anew in every age.

Christianity's claim to absoluteness and universality and the biblical demand that believers be prepared always to give an accounting to those who ask to know the grounds of Christian hope (I Pet. 3:15) have made the apologetic task imperative. The early Christian church, challenged by pagan religions and Hellenistic philosophy, produced the great apologies of Paul and JUSTIN MARTYR, ORIGEN's Contra Celsum, and AUGUSTINE's several works against the Manichaean religion (see MANICHAISM). In the Middle Ages, THOMAS AQUINAS defended Christianity in his Summa Contra Gentiles against a resurgent Islam. The most important modern apologetic works include Bishop JOSEPH BUTLER's Analogy of Religion (1736) against the DEISTS; SCHLEIERMACHER's Speeches on Religion (1799), addressed to the "cultured despisers" of Christianity; and REINHOLD NIEBUHR's Nature and Destiny of Man (1940), a profound critique of modern naturalism, idealism, and Marxism and defense of the biblical doctrine of man and history.

Since LUTHER, Protestant theology has occasionally rejected the apologetic task on the grounds that it is the Christian's task, not to argue about or to attempt to prove Christianity but, rather, simply to confront persons with the gospel of God's judgment and mercy. Some NEO-ORTHODOX theologians took this position between 1920 and 1960. The view that there is no "point of contact" between Christian revelation and human reason and experience nevertheless runs against the main current of Christian thought since apostolic times.

J.L.

APOLOGIA PRO VITA SUA. See NEWMAN, JOHN HENRY CARDINAL.

APOLOGISTS (Greek). The collective name given to those early Christian writers, mostly in the second century, who wrote in defense of the faith. The earliest was Quadratus, who wrote in Asia Minor around A.D. 124. His work is probably lost, although some scholars think it may be the one known to us as the EPISTLE TO DIOGNETUS. Others are Aristides, JUSTIN MARTYR, his disciple TATIAN, ATHENAGORAS, and Theophilus of Antioch. Most of them showed great respect for Greco-Roman culture, although a few, such as Tatian, mocked the customs and beliefs of the Greeks and praised the wisdom of the Hebrew "barbarians."

The main task of the Apologists was to refute the accusations, both popular and cultured, leveled against Christians. Among the populace, it was widely believed that Christians ate children, practiced incest, and worshiped an ass. Such notions the Apologists usually rejected with a flat denial. Among the more cultured, it was felt that Christians were an ignorant lot, and that their faith was good only for the ignorant. Against such views, the Apologists sought to show the accord between Christianity and the best of pagan culture—particularly Greek philosophy. In so doing, they were the first to seek to cast the Christian message in a philosophical mold, and therefore some have dubbed them—rather inaccurately—the first systematic theologians of the church.

J.G.

APOSTATE. A person who by choice separates from a body to which he or she belongs, whether that be a national or a church community. This means the repudiation of those tenets one has previously professed in the light of new or radically different commitments, or sometimes without adopting any substitute allegiance. In Roman Catholic Canon law one can become an apostate from the faith, from holy orders, or from the monastic state.

I.C.

A POSTERIORI. Literally "from that which comes after." It is a term referring to that aspect of thinking or reasoning that moves from effects to causes, from observable results to prior principles, from experience to formative factors. It is the opposite of A PRIORI, which begins with causes. "Inductive" is a possible synonym.

I.C.

APOSTLE. Our word comes from the Greek apostolos, which means a person to whom responsibility has been assigned or delegated. The apostle carries the authority of the one who did the sending and is commissioned to carry out a transaction or task. The closest followers of Jesus are called apostles in the Gospel tradition (Matt. 10:2; Luke 9:10; Mark 6:30) when he commissioned them to preach and to perform healings and exorcisms. Mark uses the noun "apostle" (6:30), but he prefers the related verb apostello, "to send or commission." An essential qualification for being apostles was that they had "been with Jesus" (Mark 3:14).

Paul, on the other hand, identifies himself as an apostle at the opening of several of his letters (Rom. 1:1; I Cor. 1:1; II Cor. 1:1; Gal. 1:1), and that tradition is continued in the later writings attributed to Paul (Col. 1:1; I Tim. 1:1; II Tim. 1:1; Tit. 1:1). Paul offers what amounts to a definition of the role of apostle in I Corinthians 15:7-9, where having seen the Risen Christ and having been commissioned by him are what constitute apostleship. Not every one of the "more than five hundred" to whom the resurrected Lord appeared were numbered among the apostles, but all the apostles had seen him, as Paul implies by his questions in I Corinthians 9:1. What seems to be sharply different between Paul and the Gospels, however, is that at least two of the apostles had not been followers of the earthly Jesus: Paul and James, the brother of Jesus (I Cor. 15:7, 9). One way to reconcile this apparently contradictory evidence is to assume that those who were originally commissioned by Jesus at the outset of his ministry formed the core of those designated by him in his post-resurrection appearances to carry forward his work. It was this larger, more inclusive group commissioned by him to whom this designation of apostle was given. And since it became a familiar title, it was understandably read back into the record of Jesus' initial dealings with his disciples.

Since there had been an original group of twelve (Mark 3:14-16; Matt. 10:2; Luke 6:13) chosen as the inner circle of his followers, and since this number recalled that of the sacred tribes of Israel (Matt. 19:28; Luke 22:30), the central group of apostles after the Resurrection was also twelve in number. It was essential to preserve the Twelve, so that Matthias is reported as chosen to replace Judas, now disgraced and dead (Acts 1:15-26). Not surprisingly, it is also in Acts that the Twelve gather to render formal judgments, as in the case of (1) the assignment of new responsibilities for administration of welfare in the church (6:2), (2) the approval of the work of Paul among Greek-speaking people (9:26-30), and (3) the recognition of Gentiles as Christians, even though they do not observe Jewish purity laws (chap. 15). In sharp contrast to this authoritative view of the apostles, Paul merely consulted with them and agreed to offer them financial support from the Gentile churches (Gal. 1:15-2:10). He is quite explicit that he neither sought nor gained official approval from "those who were apostles before me" (Gal. 1:17). At the same time, Paul does exercise authority in the churches under his control, as in the incident of apostolic expulsion of the incestuous member of the Corinthian church (I Cor. 5). Yet he does not appeal in that incident to his own apostolic office.

In the later Pauline literature, however, the authority of the apostolic office is made explicit: the apostles are the foundation of the church (Eph. 2:20); they are holy men (Eph. 3:5), and are the guarantors of true doctrine and proper moral behavior (II Pet. 3:2). Clearly the process is under way that led to the designation in the second and third centuries of the apostles and their successors as the basic ecclesiastical authority in all matters of faith and practice.

H.K.

APOSTLES' CREED. The most commonly used creed in Western churches, both Protestant and Catholic, although unknown in Eastern churches. In its full form, it reads as follows:

I believe in God the Father Almighty, maker of heaven and earth;

And in Jesus Christ his only Son our Lord: who was conceived by the Holy Spirit, born of the Virgin Mary, suffered under Pontius Pilate, was crucified, dead, and buried; he descended into hell; the third day he rose from the dead; he ascended into heaven, and sitteth at the right hand of God the Father Almighty; from thence he shall come to judge the quick and the dead.

I believe in the Holy Spirit, the holy catholic Church, the communion of saints, the forgiveness of sins, the resurrection of the body, and the life everlasting.

The legend that has this creed as the joint composition of the apostles as they prepared to leave Jerusalem has no basis in fact. Actually, the core of the Apostles' Creed seems to have appeared in Rome in the middle of the second century and to have been directed specifically against the teachings of Marcion. Marcion held that matter was evil, that Jesus was not born, and that the gospel includes no word of judgment, but only grace. He also held that the Creator was not the same as the Father of Jesus Christ. A careful reading of the Apostles' Creed will show that such views are rejected by it.

To the core, which was prepared against Marcion, other elements were added through the years. These are particularly the DESCENT INTO HELL, which some churches today do not include in the creed, and most of the final clauses of the creed. Several clauses were added in the course of later controversies, in order to exclude various heresies.

This creed became dominant in the West as a result of the FILIOQUE controversy, which centered on an interpolation in the NICENE CREED. The East rejected that interpolation, and the Franks insisted on it. In order to avoid the issue, the popes began using the so-called Apostles' Creed instead of the Nicene.

J.G.

APOSTOLIC COUNCIL. The meeting of early church leaders in Jerusalem according to Acts 15. The immediate occasion was evidently the success attending Paul's mission to the Gentiles, in which many non-Jews had been won over to the faith without having received the Jewish initiatory rite of CIRCUMCISION. News of this event had reached the Jerusalem church, where alarm was felt.

The discussion (Acts 15:2) centered on the conditions to be imposed on Gentile converts. The strict Jewish Christians were insisting on circumcision (15:1, 5), whereas Paul and Barnabas stood for a liberal attitude. The issue was not the admission of the Gentiles, but the terms on which they were to be admitted. The danger of a split in the early church with two centers, one in Jerusalem, the other in Antioch—which was the headquarters of Paul's missionary endeavors—was present.

The chief speakers were Peter, who rehearsed God's dealings with him leading to the conversion of Cornelius (Acts 10–11), who received the Spirit without mention of circumcision, and James, the leader in Jerusalem who contributed the point that the reception of Gentiles was already promised in the OT, based on Amos 9:11 (and following) in the Greek Bible. The verdict passed went in favor of Paul's mission (Acts 15:19). Yet James wished to safeguard the Jewish position by imposing a "decree" (Acts 15:20; 21:24–25) that regulated table fellowship between the two wings of the church and insisted on Gentile believers restricting their diet to kosher foods. Whether Paul actually accepted this ruling is uncertain since he never quotes the decree in his correspondence with the church when he might have done so (1 Cor. 8, 10).

R. M.

APOSTOLIC FATHERS. The collective name of the earliest Christian writings apart from those in the NT. These usually include: (1) The Epistle to the Corinthians of CLEMENT OF ROME, dealing mostly with the need for unity among Christians; (2) the DIDACHE or Doctrine of the Twelve Apostles, dealing with issues of worship and church order; (3) the seven letters which IGNATIUS OF ANTIOCH wrote on his way to martyrdom; (4) a letter which POLYCARP of Smyrna wrote to the Philippians asking for news of Ignatius; (5) the remaining fragments of the Exposition of the Sayings of the Lord by PAPIAS OF HIERAPOLIS; (6) the EPISTLE OF BARNABAS, which is really a sermon by an unknown author, dealing with the relationship between Christianity and Judaism; (7) the Shepherd of HERMAS, who was concerned with the forgiveness of post-baptismal sins; (8) the EPISTLE TO DIOGNETUS, which in truth should be counted among the APOLOGISTS. To these are often added other related writings, such as the Martyrdom of Polycarp and the Second Epistle of Clement, which is not his. The Apostolic Fathers are very valuable as our main source for the life of the church after NT times. Some were included in the NT before the CANON was fixed.

J.G.

APOSTOLIC SEE. The administrative center of the Roman Catholic Church, including the POPE and the ROMAN CURIA (see ROMAN CATHOLICISM). "See" is derived from the Latin term sedes, a chair, and refers to the seat or residence of a bishop. The office of bishop is symbolized by the seat or chair occupied by the bishop during worship and rituals.

J.C.

APOSTOLIC SUCCESSION. A term denoting an authentic, unbroken ministry from the apostles to the present, guaranteed by the bishop's laying on of hands at ordination. In the early church it symbolized true teaching as well as valid leadership. Plagued by second-century teachers like Valentinus (see VALENTINIAN Gnosticism) and Marcion, and believing that disunity threatened the church's survival, the early church argued that only those bishops with a direct line to Christ and his teachings through the apostles were authentic bearers of Christianity. Only such bishops were endowed by the Holy Spirit to ordain and to teach. Rome, Jerusalem, Ephesus, Antioch, and others supported this view. Rome boasted a double descent through Peter and Paul, and assumed a place of primacy as early as Clement I in A.D. 96. However, ordination became the focal point in apostolic succession.

The Roman Catholic and Greek Orthodox churches accept each other's orders, despite disputes. The Greeks accept Anglican orders, but Rome does not. Rome disputed Archbishop Parker's descent and consecration, and in 1896 Pope Leo XIII declared Anglican orders null and void. The fact of continuous descent is often questioned. Protestants generally do not acknowledge the necessity of apostolic succession, and today it is a primary barrier to ecumenicity.

C.M.

APOTHEOSIS. From the Greek word apotheou, meaning "to deify" or "to create a god", from the ancient Greek polytheistic idea in which there are many gods of various ranks, with divine men or heroes representing human beings who become divine. At times even living men, like Alexander's father, Philip II of Macedon, and, later, Alexander the Great, were worshiped as gods.

J.C.

A PRIORI. Literally "from what is before," referring to such concepts as God, freedom, and immortality.

Such are considered to be innate in human perception, rather than the result of human experience. Friederich Schleiermacher preferred "to be conscious of oneself as being in relation to God." In contrast, this phrase has been used by philosophers such as KANT to refer to objective reality not dependent on our experience. (See A POSTERIORI.)

I.C.

APSE. An arc, a semicircular enclosure, in which the aisles and choir of cathedrals and churches end. Within the apse lie the altar and the bishop's throne, as well as benches or pews for the clergy, arranged on both sides. This style was not used until after the fifth century A.D.

J.C.

AQUILA AND PRISCILLA. Two people, husband and wife (her name is shortened to Prisca in some texts, chiefly in Paul's letters), who met Paul in Corinth (Acts 18:1-3), and were drawn to him because they shared his occupation as tentmaker (or worker in leather). Their home was in Pontus in northeast Asia Minor. They had been in Rome but were expelled by CLAUDIUS' edict driving out all Jews in A.D. 49. They visited Ephesus when Paul left for that city (Acts 18:18-28), and a church was formed in their home there (I Cor. 16:19). After Claudius' expulsion order lapsed, they returned to Rome (Rom. 16:3, if this chapter is an integral part of the Letter to the Romans, and not an appendix added onto a copy of the letter Paul sent to Ephesus, as some scholars believe). Their stay in Ephesus is attested in II Timothy 4:19—if that letter is genuinely addressed to Timothy in Ephesus.

The picture we glean from these itinerary references is that of a Christian couple who jointly exercised a teaching office (Acts 18:24-26), and moved around the churches with a considerable degree of mobility. Their home was a gathering place for believers. The fact that Priscilla's name often appears first in sequence has led to the speculation that she was an influential woman, and even a writer of one of our NT books (Harnack's theory), namely, the Letter to the Hebrews. On surer ground we may certainly applaud the courage of this couple and their fidelity to Paul, whose commendation of them is eloquent (Rom. 16:3).

R.M.

AQUINAS, THOMAS. Dominican theologian of the thirteenth century, whose work marks the high point of SCHOLASTICISM. He was born in Italy near the outskirts of Naples, probably in 1224. His family was aristocratic, and his brothers and sisters eventually became persons of eminence in Italian social circles. Thomas, the youngest, had been destined by his parents to an ecclesiastical career. Consequently he was placed in the monastery of Montecassino when he was five years old. At fourteen, he went to the University of Naples, where he first came in contact with the Aristotelian philosophy, which was being reintroduced into western Europe. With such training and the support of his family, a brilliant career was open to him.

But in 1244 young Thomas decided to join a recently founded organization—the DOMINICAN Order of Preachers. Many viewed with contempt the Dominicans' practice of living on alms. Fearing that Thomas would ruin his career, his family kidnapped him and kept him a prisoner for over a year. During this time they tried to dissuade him from joining the Dominicans.

He escaped, became a Dominican, and was sent to study at Cologne, where ALBERTUS MAGNUS was teaching. His genius was not apparent to his classmates, who called him "the dumb ox" because of his size and paucity of speech. But soon Albertus and others recognized his ability and directed him toward an academic career. He spent most of that career at the University of Paris.

Like all university professors at that time, he commented on various books of Scripture as well as on the Sentences of PETER LOMBARD. These commentaries, along with his Summa contra gentiles and his Summa theologia (or Summa theologica), are his most important theological works. He also wrote about philosophy, especially commentaries on ARISTOTLE. He died in 1274, and his former teacher Albertus Magnus became the champion of his work, which many considered heretical.

The great challenge to theology in Thomas' time was the philosophy of Aristotle, which was being brought into western Europe by means of new Latin translations. Many philosophers, particularly at the University of Paris, claimed that on the basis of the newly translated works, philosophy must come to a number of conclusions that contradicted generally accepted doctrine—conclusions such as that matter has always existed, and that all souls ("active intellects") are one. In reaction, many church leaders declared that the traditional Platonic and Augustinian philosophy (see PLATONISM and AUGUSTINIANISM) was the only true one, and banned the study and discussion of certain elements of Aristotelian philosophy.

Thomas took up the challenge, and set out to show that Christian faith is compatible with Aristotelian philosophy, as long as one understands the proper field and methodology of both theology and philosophy. His commentaries on Aristotle often sought to prove that the opinions attributed to the Philosopher were not his own, but rather the result of mistaken interpretations. But it was the Summa theologia, more so than any of his previous works, that showed that it was possible to interpret the Christian faith in a perfectly orthodox way while making use of Aristotelian philosophy.

THOMISM—the name given to Thomas' system—came under attack from both extreme Aristotelians and traditional theologians. There were repeated charges against the innovations of Thomas. In 1277, three years after the death of Thomas, the bishop of Paris issued a condemnation of 219 Aristotelian propositions, several of which had been held by Thomas. Similar steps were taken at Oxford. But slowly, with the staunch defense of many Dominicans, Thomism gained acceptance. In 1323 John XXII canonized Thomas, and in 1567 Pius V declared him a "Universal Doctor of the Church."

J.G.

ARABIA/ARABIANS. The world's largest peninsula, located in southwest Asia, whose inhabitants, consisting of various groups of Semitic peoples, receive the general label "Arabians." Ordinarily the OT designates the Arabians by such group names as Ishmaelites, Midianites, and Sabaeans.

Geography. This basically rectangular peninsula encompasses almost one million square miles of predominantly desert terrain (roughly one-third the size of the continental United States). It is bounded on the north by modern Jordan, Syria, and Iraq; on the east by the Persian Gulf; on the south by the Indian Ocean; and on the west by the Red Sea. Following Ptolemy, the second-century A.D. geographer of Alexandria, classical geographers assigned Arabia a three-part division: Arabia Petrea in the northwest, including Sinai, Edom, Moab, and east trans-Jordan; Arabia Deserta, comprising the Syrian Desert; and Arabia Felix, the southern section. (Today most of the peninsula is claimed by Saudi Arabia.) Sporadic rainfall doomed the land to limited fertility, and a coastline with few harbors discouraged the emergence of sizable settlements. Understandably, a nomadic life-style was the norm for Arabia's inhabitants.

Arabians in Biblical Tradition. Among the earliest Arabians mentioned are the Ishmaelites (Gen. 37:25) and Midianites (37:28) of the second millennium B.C. who actively engaged in wide-ranging caravan trade. In the twelfth century B.C. the Midianites, Amalekites, and Bene Qedem (people of the East), advantaged by the domesticated camel, terrorized Gideon's tribe of Manasseh (Judg. 6-7). In the ninth century the Arabs carried away the family and property of Jehoram, king of Judah (II Chr. 21:16-17, though II Kings contains no parallel), and four centuries later Nabatean Arabs frustrated Nehemiah's efforts to rebuild Jerusalem (Neh. 2:19; 4:7-8; 6:1-6). Moreover, the list of traditional enemies offered by Psalm 83 includes the Ishmaelites (v. 6).

Other texts, however, show Israel prospering from Arabian contacts. In the tenth century Solomon engaged in successful caravan trade with the Sabaeans (presumably stimulating the queen of Sheba's visitation, I Kings 10:1-10). A century later the Arabians awarded Jehoshaphat, king of Judah, tribute of livestock (II Chr. 17:11, again without parallel in II Kings). Arabian resources of frankincense, gold, livestock, and textiles regularly arrived in Israel by camel caravan (Jer. 6:20; II Chr. 9:14; Isa. 60:6-7; Ezek. 27:20-21). Luke reports that Arabians were among those assembled in Jerusalem at Pentecost (Acts 2:11), and Paul, in reflecting on his apostolic commission, mentions his Arabian sojourn in Nabatean territory southeast of Damascus (Gal. 1:17).

J.K.K.

ARAD. (1) A Canaanite city in the NEGEB, whose king took some Israelites captive as they headed toward Mount Hor near the end of the wilderness era (Num. 21:1-3). Under Joshua that king or his successor, along with his city, was overtaken by Israel (Josh. 12:14). Nomadic Kenites reoccupied the site (Judg. 1:16). Excavations at Tell Arad, sixteen miles south of Hebron, have uncovered an impressive Israelite sanctuary constructed in the tenth century B.C. and vacated in the seventh, when the centralization of Israelite worship at Jerusalem intensified.

(2) Son of Beriah, a Benjaminite (I Chr. 8:15).

J.K.K.

ARAM. (1) Son of Shem and grandson of Noah in the Table of Nations (Gen. 10:22; compare I Chr. 1:17).

(2) Son of Kemuel and grandson of Nahor, Abraham's brother (Gen. 22:21). These names point to the vicinity of Haran and reflect the keen sense of kinship that the Israelite patriarchs had to the Arameans.

(3) Son of Shemer in the Asher genealogy (I Chr. 7:34).

(4) Primarily a collective designation for the ARAMEANS who dwelt in scattered settlements in a plain stretching from the Lebanon Mountains to beyond the Euphrates. When "Aram" is compounded with another noun, a more precise location is achieved. Thus Aram-naharaim ("Aram of the rivers") refers to a region between the Tigris and Euphrates in which Paddan-aram was located (Gen. 28:5), the ancestral home of the patriarchs. During the era of the monarchy, the concentration of Aramean power in Damascus sometimes proved troublesome for Israel (for example, I Kings 22:1-38). Damascus succumbed to Assyrian aggression in 732 B.C., a mere decade before Israel's own fall.

J.K.K.

ARAMAIC. A general term used to refer to a group of closely related Semitic dialects. In the OT, Ezra 4:8-6:18; 7:12-26; Daniel 2:4b-7:28, and a single verse in Jeremiah (10:11) are written in Aramaic. The NT contains several Aramaic expressions: Taliha cumi (Mark 5:41), Ephphatha (Mark 7:34), Elo-i, Elo-i, lama sabach-thani (Mark 15:34), and Maranatha (I Cor. 16:22 KJV).

Aramaic derives its name from its earliest users, the ARAMEANS, who are first noted in an inscription of the Assyrian king Tiglath-Pileser I (about 1115-1077 B.C.). Scholars speak of four phases in the use of the Aramaic language. The first, Old Aramaic (about 925-700 B.C.), is represented by several inscriptions, including international treaties, as well as a text about the figure Balaam discovered at the site of Tell Deir Alla in Transjordan. In the second phase, Official or Imperial Aramaic (about 700-200 B.C.) became an international language in the Near East. This widespread use of Aramaic developed during Assyrian domination (see ASSYRIA). The negotiations between King HEZEKIAH and the officials of the Assyrian king SENNACHERIB (in 701 B.C.) illustrate the diplomatic use of Aramaic (see II Kings 18:26-27). In later periods, and especially under the Persians, Aramaic became the international language in a vast region from Egypt and Asia Minor in the south and west, to India in the east. The Aramaic in Ezra and Daniel belongs to this Imperial Aramaic.

During the third phase, Middle Aramaic (200 B.C.-A.D. 200), Aramaic was replaced by Greek as the international language. But Aramaic continued as the everyday language in many regions. This Aramaic was the common language in Palestine at the time of Jesus and the early church. From this period also come some of the early Aramaic translations (the TARGUMS) of portions of the OT, as well as numerous inscriptions and other texts. Various dialects of Aramaic, such as Palestinian, Nabatean, Palmyrene, and early Syriac, existed during this period. Mark 15:70 and Matthew 26:73 may suggest that different dialects of Aramaic were spoken in Galilee and Judah.

Finally, Late Aramaic (from A.D. 200 on), with its various dialects, is reflected in the Jewish Targums and TALMUDS, the Syriac translation of the Bible (the PESHITTA), Samaritan texts, and other documents. Even today, various forms of Aramaic are spoken by Jews and Christians in several areas of the Near East.

J.H.

ARAMEAN. A term designating an ARAMAIC speaker and/or a native of Aram. The term "Aramean(s)" or "Aram" occurs frequently in the Hebrew OT but is generally translated, following early Greek practice, as "Syrians(s)" or "Syria" (see, for example, II Sam. 8:5-6).

The territory of Aram is rather ill-defined in both biblical and nonbiblical texts but generally denotes the region of the upper Tigris-Euphrates (Mesopotamian) valley and Syria (see MESOPOTAMIA). The biblical texts locate Arameans both east and west of the Euphrates River.

Old Testament texts closely associate the ancestors of Israel with the Arameans. Deuteronomy 26:5 describes one of the Israelite patriarchs (probably Jacob) as "a wandering Aramean." The wife of Isaac and the wives of Jacob (Gen. 24:1-61; 28:1-30:13) came from the region of Aram in northern Mesopotamia, and their fathers-in-law, Bethuel and Laban, are referred to as Aramean (Gen. 25:20; 28:5; 31:20, 24).

J.H.

ARARAT. The biblical equivalent of Urartu, an ancient non-Semitic kingdom roughly identifiable with the classical Armenia north of Mesopotamia, now politically divided between Turkey and the Soviet Union. It is mentioned in II Kings 19:37 and Isaiah 37:38 as the place where the Assyrian king SENNACHERIB's assassins took refuge. In Jeremiah 51:27 it is referred to as simply a kingdom.

In Genesis 8:4 the ark of Noah is said to have come to rest "upon the mountains of Ararat." Not one mountain is singled out in the biblical narrative (in distinction to the Mesopotamian Flood Epic of GILGAMESH, which identified the site as Mount Nisir in the vicinity of Lake Van). Nevertheless, through the centuries there has been a persistent desire, born of a pious quest of "holy places," to pinpoint the location of Mount Ararat. The present contender for the title, which it has won through a variety of considerations, including the political and the relative facility of access by explorers, is the mountain known in Turkish as Ağrı Dağı, which stands 16,950 feet (about 5166 meters) high. The tradition identifying this as the "Mount" hardly dates from before the eleventh century A.D.

B.V.

ARCHAEOLOGY. Archaeology is the systematic description and analysis of the material remains of ancient cultures, both written and "silent." Biblical archaeology, in contrast to such regionally specialized fields as Egyptian, Mesopotamian, and even Syro-Palestinian archaeology, continues to pursue the original quest of all Near Eastern archaeology to reconstruct a cultural and historical matrix in which to place the literature of the Bible.

History and Scope. At its beginning, archaeology was basically a treasure hunt. However, by the turn of the nineteenth century, the collection and study of antiquities was moving onto a scientific basis. A major step was taken when the young French scholar Champollion broke the code of the hieroglyphics by using the ROSETTA STONE found in 1799 in Egypt. Soon there followed Botta's excavations of the Assyrian city at Khorsabad, Layard's work at Nineveh, and Schliemann's dramatic find of the buried treasure of Troy. Archaeological work in the Holy Land proper did not begin until Sir Flinders Petrie excavated Tell el-Hesi in 1890.

Since then, biblical archaeology has given us great gifts, chief of which is a significantly clearer picture of the religious, linguistic, and historical contexts out of which our Bible came. It has made clear that the full story of biblical faith is not to be found exclusively in Israel and the early church. It has made possible an assessment of the relative maturity of biblical thought by recovering theological literature from other cultures with which to compare it. In many instances,

BIBLICAL ARCHAEOLOGY TIME-LINE

(Entries in bold are discussed in article)

PALESTINE	DATES	SYRIA, MESOPOTAMIA, EGYPT	AGE
Great tower at Jericho Pottery	8,000 B.C. 4,500 B.C.		NEOLITHIC (Late Stone)
Copper tools Writing & art	3,150 B.C.		CHALCOLITHIC ("Copper/Stone")
Canaanite Sanctuaries—Ai	←Amurru→ 2,200 B.C.	Sumerian & Akkadian city-states  Ebla	EARLY BRONZE
The Patriarchs? Canaan	← 1,550 B.C.		MIDDLE BRONZE
	1,200 B.C.	Uggarit Akh-en-Aton Tell el-Amarna Ramses II	LATE BRONZE
Israel & Moses Sea Peoples Hazor destroyed Conquest (Joshua)	← 1,000 B.C.		IRON I
David and Solomon Solomonic Architecture Samaria Siloam tunnel Jeremiah Lachish ostraca	586 B.C.	Assyria  Babylon	IRON II
Exile Temple rebuilt	332 B.C.	Cyrus, King of Persia Alexander the Great	IRON III (Persian Period)
	37 B.C.		HELLENISTIC
Herod the Great Temple reconstructed Caesarea Jesus Masada Paul Dead Sea Scrolls	A.D.70		ROMAN I (Herodian)

language family of which Hebrew is a later descendant.

The transition from early to middle Bronze Age was marked by disruptions all over the Middle East and Egypt, evidently due to the incursion of the Amurru (Amorites), a nomadic group that spoke a west Semitic language. Archaeologists and historians usually associate the movement of the patriarchs (Gen. 12:50) with these Amurru.

During the late Bronze Age, Canaanite culture flourished. Archaeology has produced a rich store of Canaanite texts from the ancient site of UGARIT (Ras Shamra) on the Mediterranean coast of Syria. These fourteenth-century B.C. texts, first deciphered in 1930, make it clear that the religion of Israel was profoundly indebted to the religion of Canaan. The poetry of Ugarit has affinities to our Psalter, and the language itself is quite similar to Hebrew. On the other hand, the religion was of the polytheistic fertility variety; the cult of its god Baal existed everywhere Canaanite culture was found, including in Israel. The late Bronze Age was also a period of Egyptian domination of Palestine. At Tell el-'AMARNA, the desert capital of the pharaoh Akhenaton (Amenophis IV), were found letters from Egyptian vassals in Palestine and elsewhere complaining of raids by brigands and outlaws called "Apiru." The connection of this term with Hebrew, while obvious, is not fully understood.

With the Iron Age also arrived two new peoples in Palestine: the Sea Peoples (some of whom later became known as the Philistines) from the west, and the Israelites from the south and east. Archaeology has not, however, been able either to confirm or to deny the account of Israel's conquest of Palestine contained in the book of Joshua. For example, almost none of late Bronze-early Iron Age Jericho is extant, and what little does remain suggests a destruction at the beginning of the thirteenth century B.C. at the latest. If the exodus from Egypt took place, as most scholars think it did, around 1250 B.C., during the reign of Rameses II, Jericho simply would not have been around to destroy twenty to forty years later. On the other hand, Hazor was indeed destroyed in a violent conflagration not too long after 1300 B.C. (Josh. 11:10-13).

In terms of linkages to the biblical text, the most important period of Palestinian archaeology quite understandably is Iron II, the period of the Israelite monarchy. Although no trace of the Temple of Solomon remains in Jerusalem, very substantial Solomonic structures have come to light at Hazor, Gezer, Megiddo, and elsewhere. These are all characterized by such architectural details as casemate city walls and three-roomed gates. The affinity of many buildings with Phoenician architecture fits well with the biblical record that Solomon received assistance in his construction projects from Hiram, king of Tyre (I Kings 5:5-6). Some time after the separation of the kingdom of Israel from Judah, Omri the historical records uncovered by archaeology have provided independent, secular verification of the historical data of the biblical text—even though it will always be the case that the religious truth claims of the biblical text can neither be validated nor invalidated by archaeological discovery.

The Emerging Archaeological Picture of the World of the Bible. The earliest archaeological era to have direct bearing on the biblical text is the early Bronze Age (see the time line). In that millennium, the Canaanite inhabitants of Palestine began to erect fortified cities. In a number of these, substantial high places and sanctuaries have been identified, including one at Ai, which displays the same three-part floor plan used in Solomon's temple fifteen hundred years later. The recent discovery of EBLA at Tell Mardikh in the Syrian desert promises to expand our knowledge of the end of the early Bronze Age. It is already clear that the fourteen thousand or more tablets found there are written in an early form of the same northwest Semitic built a new capital at Samaria (I Kings 16:24). Excavations at the site confirm that the town was begun in the Iron II period. In addition to well-built structures, Samaria has also yielded ostraca—potsherds upon which messages and records are written in ink. These are among the earliest Hebrew inscriptions anywhere.

Carved ivory furniture ornamentation has also been found, confirming the allusions to the wealth of that community in I Kings 22:39 and in Amos 6:4-7. Elaborate water systems also typify Iron II; they are found at Megiddo, Hazor, and the very significant Siloam tunnel in Jerusalem itself (II Kings 20:20; II Chr. 32:30).

Iron II ends with the conquest of the southern kingdom of Judah by the Neo-Babylonian king Nebuchadnezzar in 587 B.C. It was his total destruction of Jerusalem that forever erased the original city of David and nearly all evidences of the Davidic dynasty there. Nevertheless, a poignant reminder of that conquest survives in the twenty-one LACHISH OSTRACA. These are messages from the defenders of that fortified city southwest of Jerusalem, some of which report that they can no longer see the signals of other outposts, presumably because they have been taken by the Babylonians.

In the Roman I period, nearly three centuries later, archaeology throws striking light on the pluralism of Judaism in the time of Jesus. Above all, of course, mention should be made of the massive platform wall of the Temple of Herod the Great, which remains today on the west side of the sacred enclosure in Jerusalem upon which stands the Islamic shrine, the Dome of the Rock. This is the Wailing Wall, or "Western Wall," of such great significance in Jewish life. Nothing of Herod's Temple as such remains; but other Herodian monuments in Jerusalem, Samaria, Masada, and especially Caesarea on the Mediterranean coast, pay tribute to the thoroughly Roman architectural taste, if not the moral caliber, of the man.

Finally, from this same period emerged one of the most extraordinary archaeological finds of all time—the DEAD SEA SCROLLS—from the ancient communal settlement at QUMRAN on the west shore of the Dead Sea. This monastic community was founded in the first century B.C. and survived earthquakes and the rigors of desert life for nearly two centuries. Although the buildings were destroyed in A.D. 68 by the tenth Roman legion under Titus, who was in Palestine to suppress the first Jewish revolt, those scrolls that had been deposited by the sectarians in caves around the site survived for nearly two millennia. It was not an archaeologist but a Bedouin shepherd boy who had the privilege of discovering them there in 1947.

W.S.T.

ARCHANGEL. See MICHAEL, THE ARCHANGEL.

ARCHDEACON. A diocesan office in existence since the third century, although the title dates from the fourth century. An archdeacon is a priest who supervises a fixed territory, assisting the bishop in liturgical and administrative functions. In ancient times, the archdeacon had the right of succession to the SEE.

J.C.

ARCHDIOCESE. A territorial division of the Roman Catholic church ruled by a bishop in his own right. It is called an eparchy in the Orthodox church. An archdiocese is usually the same area as a civil political division. It is usually named after the city in which the bishop lives.

J.C.

AREOPAGUS. The place-name (found only in Acts 17:22) derives from Areios pagos in Greek, meaning "the hill of Ares," the god of war whom the Romans called Mars. Hence "Mars' Hill" in the KJV of the above text.

Topographically it refers to a small hill northwest of the ACROPOLIS in ATHENS. The term "Areopagus" also is used to denote the Council of the Areopagus, a judicial body, which used to meet in later times not on Mars' Hill but in the market-place at Athens, in the "Royal Portico" (stoa basileios).

There are two views as to the precise location of Paul's meeting with philosophers in Athens, according to the narrative in Acts 17:16-34. One interpretation is that Paul was called to an official investigation to defend his teaching, and the court met either on the hill or in the stoa basileios. The other view thinks more of an informal gathering of philosophers on the Areopagus hill. The weight of opinion is on the side of the second reconstruction since there is little suggestion in the text that Paul was called to a legal arraignment. The reference to Dionysius the Areopagite (Acts 17:34) may suggest that the council did meet in front of, and it has been cogently argued that the group met in or in front of a colonnade of the market-place.

Paul's speech exploited his interest in both groups—Stoics and Epicureans—in his audience, as he valiantly made an appeal to their cherished beliefs. But in vain; when he touched on distinctively Christian matters, they dismissed him, with the sole exception of one of the council members, Dionysius.

R.M.

ARIANISM/ARIUS. The doctrine that the Word or Son of God is not eternal, but is rather the first of all creatures. This view was proposed by Arius, a presbyter of Alexandria, Egypt, early in the fourth century. The slogan, "there was a time when he [the Word] was not" expressed Arius' position in a nutshell. To this, his opponents countered that the Word is divine and therefore eternal. Arius and his teachings were condemned at the COUNCIL OF NICEA in A.D. 325. But then, through a series of political circumstances, Arianism enjoyed a revival, until the COUNCIL OF CONSTANTINOPLE, in A.D. 381, reaffirmed and expanded the decisions of Nicea. These debates were the occasion for the formulation of the doctrine of the TRINITY. The controversy was also important for CHRISTOLOGY, for it was the Council of Nicea that categorically affirmed the divinity of the Son. The key word affirming this in the Creed of Nicea was HOMOOUSION, "of the same substance," meaning that the Father and the Son are both equally divine.

Arius himself died shortly after the Council of Nicea. His more extreme followers, however, continued insisting on the radical difference between God and the Son or Word. For this reason they were called anomoceans, from a Greek word meaning "different." Others straddled the fence by declaring that the Son was "similar" to the Father, and not clarifying the matter any further. These were called homoeans, from a word meaning "similar." Many who sought to safeguard the divinity of the Son, but who feared that the term homoousios was capable of an interpretation that erased all distinction between the Father and the Son, preferred to use the term homoiousion—of a similar substance. The great opponents of Arianism, particularly ATHANASIUS and the CAPPADOCIAN FATHERS, managed to allay the fears of the homoiousians and thus prepared the way for the final condemnation of Arianism in A.D. 381.

By that time, however, several of the tribes north of the Danube, particularly the Goths and the Vandals, had been converted to Christianity in its Arian form. These tribes later invaded the West, and Arianism had a brief revival in areas such as Italy, Spain, and North Africa. J.G.

ARIMATHEA. A city and district northwest of Jerusalem, which was added to Judah during the Hasmonaean period (mid-first century B.C.). Control of this territory, located about twenty miles due east of Joppa (present-day Tel Aviv), helped assure Jewish access to the sea. Joseph, who arranged for Jesus to be buried in his private tomb (Mark 15:43; Matt. 27:57; Luke 23:51; John 19:38) was from Arimathea. H.K.

ARISTOTLE. Aristotle (384-322 B.C.) was not only one of the greatest Greek philosophers but one of the very greatest ever produced by any nation. His legacy is discernible in virtually every branch of Western learning. This is partly because of his own encyclopedic investigations in numerous fields—biology, physics, psychology, metaphysics, ethics, politics, literature, and others. Equally important was his pioneering work in logic and EPISTEMOLOGY, so that he set up patterns of thought and argument, and categories of understanding which were destined to hold their place in the West for generations, and even now have not been left behind.

Not the least has his influence been felt in Christian theology, for although in the patristic and early medieval periods PLATONISM and NEOPLATONISM were the strongest influences in theology, the rediscovery of Aristotle in the thirteenth century brought his ideas into the theological mainstream, through the work of AQUINAS and others. It could indeed be claimed that among philosophical conceptions of God, it is the Aristotelian one that best corresponds to the transcendent God of the Bible. Though he began as a disciple of Platonism, Aristotle became a realist (see REALISM) in opposition to the IDEALISM of Plato; that is to say, he rejected Plato's belief that reality belongs to the timeless invisible forms or ideas, and held that these forms do not exist independently but only as manifested in the concrete individual things that make up the world. These things are the real beings or substances. Each of them is composed of matter and form. Matter is mere potentiality that is dependent upon form to have actuality. However, there is a hierarchy of forms, each of which may be the matter for a higher form. But there is not an infinite regress of forms. One comes eventually to a pure form (something like Plato's idea of the good), which cannot itself be matter for any higher form. This pure form Aristotle calls the "Unmoved Mover." He seems to conceive its relation to the world in terms of final rather than efficient causation. The Unmoved Mover draws the finite beings of the world after itself. But although Aristotle's conception of God is monotheistic and transcendent, it appears also to be purely intellectual and impersonal. God's activity is pure thinking of God's own thought.

The form/matter schema is also applied to the human being. The soul is the form of the body. Here too there is a hierarchy of forms. There is a vegetative soul, concerned with merely biological functions; an animal soul, which rises to sentience; and at the head of this hierarchy is the rational soul, which gives to human beings their distinctive status ("the rational animal"), and this rational element in the soul is the immortal part of a human being. The Aristotelian ethic is derived from these fundamental conceptions. The good for humanity is happiness, but this is not just good fortune, but rather the development of character according to reason. In his detailed treatment of the individual virtues, Aristotle seeks to show that these are the rational means between extremes—courage, for instance, is the mean between rashness and cowardice. Although his views, both on metaphysics and ethics, may seem distant from Christianity at many points, THOMISM has shown the possibility of synthesis. J.M.

ARK, NOAH'S. See NOAH.

ARK OF THE COVENANT. A box made of acacia wood overlaid with gold and crowned with two golden cherubim bending over the cover or "mercy seat," which ancient Israel believed to have been God's throne or footstool. It is said to have contained only the two tablets of the Law that Moses brought down from HOREB. In the earliest tradition the ark preceded Israel in its journey through the wilderness and was carried into battle with the cry, "Arise, O Lord, and let thy enemies be scattered" (Num. 10:33-36). During the conquest, it was the ark, carried by the Levitical priests, that opened the Jordan River to allow Israel to pass through (Josh. 3) and that brought down the walls of Jericho (Josh. 6).

Holand-Garber model of Solomon's Temple, Agnes Scott College, Decatur, Georgia

A model of the Ark of the Covenant

The function of the ark as a locus of oracles is evident in Judges 20:27 and becomes more dramatic after the ark is installed at the central Israelite sanctuary at SHILOH. There before the ark Samuel received his prophetic call (I Sam. 3). When the Philistines captured the ark, Israel believed that the luminous presence ("glory") of God had departed from Israel (I Sam. 4:19-22). However, the Philistines found it too hard to cope with because they were afflicted with boils and their god DAGON fell flat on his face in ASHDOD. So they returned it to Israel by oxcart. After a brief stay in Beth-shemesh (I Sam. 6), the ark ultimately reached the town of Kiriath-jearim, where it remained until David brought it up to Jerusalem (II Sam. 6). There Solomon built his Temple in order to provide a permanent home for it (I Kings 8).

The most elaborate descriptions of the ark and its rich golden ornamentation were actually written after the ark was lost in the destruction of Jerusalem by Nebuchadnezzar in 587 B.C. They were written by the Priestly writers who worked during and after the Babylonian exile and are found in Exodus 25:10-22; 37:1-9; and chapter 40.

Apart from a dramatic passage in Psalm 132:6-10, which seems to provide us a liturgical reenactment of the bringing of the ark to Jerusalem, the rest of the Bible pays remarkably little attention to it. Jeremiah even dismisses it as unnecessary for the coming age of restoration (Jer. 3:16).

W.S.T.

ARMAGEDDON. This geographic place name (in Hebrew) apparently means "mountain of Megiddo" (har-megiddon; har-magedon in Greek), though there is no certainty that this is what is intended in the sole biblical reference to Armageddon (Rev. 16:16). In that verse the place is the meeting point of the kings of the world who gather for apocalyptic judgment dispensed by God Almighty. Perhaps the seer of REVELATION intended the name to be symbolic. If so, we should inquire what Megiddo came to represent in OT history.

At MEGIDDO Israel defeated Sisera the Canaanite (Judg. 5:19), and here, too, Josiah was brought to his end by Pharaoh Neco (II Kings 23:29-30; II Chr. 35:22). The place name is therefore appropriate for the final engagement between good and evil—an idea already implied in Ezekiel 39:1-4.

R.M.

ARMENIAN CHURCH. Two branches of the ancient Armenian Apostolic Church have been established in the United States. They trace their roots to the See of Etchmiadzin, which was organized about A.D. 301 by St. Gregory, the Illuminator, in what is now a part of Soviet Armenia, not far from Mount Ararat.

The North American branch was founded by Armenian immigrants in Worcester, Massachusetts, in 1889. In 1933 a division occurred within the American diocese over the condition of the church in Soviet Armenia. One group, now officially known as the Diocese of the Armenian Church in America, maintained its ties with Etchmiadzin. The other, which calls itself the Armenian Apostolic Church of America—colloquially known as the Prelacy—remained independent until 1957 when it came under the jurisdiction of the See of Celicia, which has its headquarters in the suburbs of Beirut, Lebanon. Despite the existence of two dioceses in North America, they have functioned as one church in dogma and liturgy.

Starting in the fourteenth century, a portion of the Armenian church united with the Roman Catholic church, joining with others of the UNIAT rite who have retained their own liturgies and rites. Churches of this connection have been established in the United States and Canada. An even smaller segment of the ancient church turned to Protestantism in 1846, when the Armenian Evangelical church was formed in Istanbul. Congregations of the Evangelical church may be found in various parts of the United States and in other countries where there are Armenian communities.

R.H.

ARMINIANISM. Arminianism stands for a variety of liberal religious views. The term developed out of the struggle with strict CALVINISM of Jacobus Arminius (1560-1609), a Dutch theologian. Arminius studied Calvinism at Geneva and Basel under BEZA and Grynaeus, but years later found he could not accept the belief that before all time God chose who should be saved and who should be damned. Appointed professor at the University of Leiden in 1603, he clashed with Franciscus Gomarus, an ardent Calvinist, on unconditional election and irresistible grace. After Arminius' death, his followers expanded his views in their "Remonstrances" of 1610. They asserted five points: (1) all who believe in Christ and persevere shall be saved, (2) Christ's atonement is universal, and so all can be saved, (3) without God's grace one cannot be saved, (4) God's grace is not irresistible, and (5) whether grace once received can be lost needs further study. Fierce controversy ensued; churches divided. The SYNOD OF DORT, 1618-19, reasserted ultra-Calvinism. Over two hundred Remonstrant preachers lost their pulpits, and many were banished.

English Calvinistic PURITANS accepted the Synod of Dort, labeled their opponents "Arminian," and officially condemned them in the House of Commons, 1641. However, Arminianism was characteristic of Anglicanism in the second half of the 1600s. In the following century JOHN WESLEY separated himself from the strict Calvinism of GEORGE WHITEFIELD and insisted that Christ died for all. In 1778 Wesley founded a journal and deliberately named it The Arminian Magazine.

Arminianism now connotes free response to God, rationalism, and a repudiation of ultra-Calvinism. It has leavened much theology (see PELAGIANISM).

C.M.

ARMSTRONG, HERBERT W. AND GARNER, TED. See WORLDWIDE CHURCH OF GOD.

ARNDT, JOHANN (1555-1621). German Lutheran theologian and mystic. In the conflict among Lutherans he sided with the Calvinists, who taught that Christ was present in the Lord's Supper in power but not spatially. His best-known writings are four books about True Christianity and Little Paradise-Garden of All the Christian Virtues.

H.K.

ARNDT, WILLIAM F. Born in 1880, Arndt was professor of NT at Concordia Seminary in St. Louis until his death in 1957. His earlier writings addressed problems of faith and biblical authority. His major work was the translation (with F. W. Gingrich) of Walter Bauer's great lexicon of the NT, Griechisch-Deutsches Wörterbuch zu den Schriften des Neuen Testaments . . ., which was first published in 1957 under the title, A Greek-English Lexicon of the New Testament and Other Early Christian Literature.

H.K.

ARNOLD, GOTTFRIED (1666-1714). A German Lutheran church historian, mystic, and hymnist. He influenced church history by insisting that heretics and Separatists be examined anew rather than summarily rejected (see SEPARATISM). During his theological studies at Wittenberg he independently read early church history. Recommended by PHILIPP SPENER, in 1689 he tutored at Dresden and later at Quedlinburg. At this time he studied mysticism and wrote Die erste Liebe (Superior Love), praising the early church's simple virtues. In 1697 he became professor of history at Giessen, but annoyed by routine duties he quit the following year and returned to Quedlinburg. His large, four-volume Unparteiische Kirchen- und Ketzer-Histoire ("Unbiased History of Church and Heresy") 1699-1700, drew directly on sectarian and heretical sources. Controversy erupted, causing him to retreat to mysticism and hymnwriting. As a pastor and church inspector during his last ten years he became reconciled to Lutheran orthodoxy.

C.M.

ARNOLD, MATTHEW (1822-88). An English Victorian poet second only to Tennyson and Browning, cultural critic, educator, and observer of religion. He was among the first to apply literary criticism to the Bible. Schooled primarily under his father, Thomas Arnold, at Rugby, he entered Oxford in 1840, and became professor of poetry there, 1857-67. To earn money he worked as a government school inspector, 1851-86. His unusual annual reports attracted wide attention and led to reforms.

Arnold had no contemporary equal in criticism. He believed literary and cultural criticism should promote perfection by promoting the best the world has known. He stressed personal conduct as primary for Christians, emphasized natural truth over dogma, and praised the Bible as literature. His best books on religion include Culture and Anarchy, 1869; St. Paul and Protestantism, 1870; Literature and Dogma, 1873; and God and the Bible, 1875. Virtually all aspects of culture were touched by this man's critical essays.

C.M.

ARTHINGTON, ROBERT (1823-1900). Wealthy British Quaker whose life and fortune were spent in the support and propagation of missionary efforts. He became interested in foreign missions in 1850, and although extremely wealthy he lived like the poor. Even though he had given generously to several Christian causes, his wealth continued to multiply far beyond his knowledge. He had a prejudice against the institutionalization of missionary work. He considered the primary task evangelization. When he died, his fortune of nearly one million pounds was designated for the aid of foreign missionary societies. Those responsible for the distribution of the money bore in mind his wishes and principles. No endowments were created, but some money went to the support of hospitals and schools. The major share continued to be used for pioneer work on the frontiers of Christian mission. The trust was brought to an end in 1936, but for twenty-five years the Protestant missionary enterprise felt the stimulus of "Arthington's million."

W.G.

ART, HISTORY OF CHRISTIAN. When one speaks of Christian art, one speaks of content rather than form. One may be describing the finished work of art and/or the artist's personal piety. Christian art then is that which has been used to convey the Christian message and to express and nourish Christian spirituality.

Jewish and Islamic artists have been generally suspicious of pictorial images and decorated their places of worship with abstract design and color. The early Christians drew on OT and NT stories, plus the legacy of Greek art. Thus, catacomb art has references to Noah, Abraham, and Moses. Because Christianity was also not yet socially acceptable, Christians represented their faith in symbols—the vine, dove, wind, water, fire, shepherd and sheep, boat. The fish became a universal Christian symbol in part because the letters of the ACROSTIC ichthys in Greek are the initial letters of the words for "Jesus Christ, Son of God, Savior."

After Constantine adopted Christianity, the grandeur of Byzantine art was at its disposal. The great churches such as HAGIA SOPHIA in Constantinople and the churches of Ravenna, Italy, were decorated with luminous mosaics depicting the majesty of Christ, the PANTOCRATOR. Ivory carvings, metal book covers decorated with enamel and pearls, as well as the mosaics, celebrated OT stories, the life of Christ, and the martyrs. The Iconoclast Edict in 730 prohibited the images of divine and holy personages, which resulted in the destruction of many works of art. But after about a hundred years Byzantine art flourished again. The Basilica of St. Mark in Venice is a twelfth-century example.

In northern Europe the Christian faith was illustrated by carvers and book illuminators steeped in Celtic design. The massive crosses of Ireland were carved in the manner of runic stones. The Book of Kells and the Lindisfarne Gospels of the eighth century express faith and artistic vision. Other artists worked in enamel (Limoges) and precious stones to cover the books. Most were anonymous, except for Gislebertus, who carved his name into the scene of the Last Judgment at Autun in the twelfth century.

Romanesque architecture gave way to GOTHIC, and art and architecture became one piece in the incredible CATHEDRALS of the thirteenth and fourteenth centuries—Notre Dame, Reims, CHARTRES. The soaring vaults framed brilliant scenes in stained glass. Architecture was miniaturized in jeweled reliquaries. The enthroned Christ gave way to the suffering savior, writhing on the cross. Central to the vision was the Blessed Virgin. Despite the vision of pain and suffering, playful animals and fantastic gargoyles also decorated the cathedrals.

The sixteenth century brought the Renaissance and the Reformation. The term "Renaissance" meant "a renewal of Greek realism and an emphasis on the human as well as the divine." Illustrating the discovery of the individual, artists began to be known by their names.

Giotto's frescoes in the Arena Chapel at Padua, at the beginning of the fourteenth century, show real people in human situations, even though the scenes depict biblical stories. Whereas Gothic spirituality had been visionary and symbolic, the new art visualized a more realistic spirituality.

The high point of the Renaissance and the history of Christian art can be seen in the work of two men. Leonardo da Vinci combined both the natural and the supernatural, the scientific and the spiritual, sculpture and painting. MICHELANGELO concentrated entirely on the human figure. The results are sculptures such as the Pieta in St. Peter's Cathedral and the scenes on the ceiling of the SISTINE CHAPEL. In the Creation of Adam one sees a balance between the new humanism and the old faith.

Until this point, most artistic work, indeed all Christian art, had been done under patronage, often by or for the church. With the Renaissance came both secular patronage and independent artists. Thus artistic themes became more secular—revival of Greek literary themes and a celebration of the everyday. Secularization began to influence art. Tintoretto, in the sixteenth century, could still make Christian themes profound in his Crucifixion and Temptation of Christ at San Rocco and yet paint tributes to physical beauty for the Ducal Palace.

Just as the Reformation degenerated into scholastic orthodoxy, Christian art in the last three-quarters of the sixteenth century devolved into mannerism and baroque. Skill and charm remained, but the inner message was lost to some extent. Protestantism was suspicious of, if not hostile to, art. Indeed, many works of medieval art were destroyed. Thus, in Protestant countries artists tended to develop the secular genres of landscape, portraiture, and still life. The church was no longer the patron of the arts it once was.

However, Rubens, having visited Rome and Venice, poured the energy and heroic opulence of his style into the Deposition for Antwerp Cathedral 1611-14. Rembrandt was one of the last artists with the gift for taking ordinary people and making them parties of eternal mystery. His Deposition is not a study in diagonals, as is Ruben's, but the compelling image of a grief-stricken crowd. He portrayed the facts of the biblical record, not the symbolic content.

In contrast the Council of Trent in 1563 reasserted for Roman Catholics the didactic value of art, and Ignatius of Loyola restated the spiritual value of images. From this fertile soil grew the lavishness of baroque art.

In the modern period, which has produced much great art, fewer artists have chosen religious themes. During the Romantic period, WILLIAM BLAKE's mystical drawings offered a heavenly vision. G. F. Watts painted Eve Tempted, and among the Pre-Raphaelites, Rossetti illustrated the Annunciation, using his sister Christina as a model for the Virgin. In the twentieth century, British painter Stanley Spencer offered his personal interpretation of Christian themes using the people of Cookham-on-Thames. For the rebuilding of Coventry Cathedral, Graham Sutherland created a tapestry of Christ in Glory in the Tetramorph, giving modern expression to a vision reminiscent of the Byzantine mosaics. Henri Matisse designed all elements of a chapel at Venice. Perhaps most forceful are the paintings of Rouault in his Miserere series of 1922–27. Marc Chagall has painted both Jewish and Christian scenes. Their work provides a glorious heritage of religious art.

N.H.

ARTICLES OF FAITH. Concise statements of Christian belief or confessions considered basic to theology. Thomas Aquinas and other scholastic theologians said the APOSTLES' CREED expressed revealed truths organic to Christian teaching. Various Reformation Articles of Faith expressed truths organic to the development of confessional theologies, for example, the AUGSBURG CONFESSION (Lutheranism) and the THIRTY-NINE ARTICLES (Anglicanism).

C.M.

ARTICLES OF RELIGION. Refers to the Thirty-nine Articles of Religion of the ANGLICAN CHURCH (1563) and to the Twenty-five Articles of Religion (1784) JOHN WESLEY drew from them for Methodists in America (see METHODIST CHURCHES). They were preceded by the Thirteen Articles (1538) when Henry VIII attempted an alliance with the Lutherans and by the strongly Calvinistic Forty-two Articles (1553) by CRANMER, KNOX, and others (see LUTHERAN CHURCHES; CALVINISM).

The Thirty-nine Articles rejected papal authority and sought to join Lutheran and REFORMED doctrines. Wide interpretations resulted. Wesley modified some Calvinistic aspects for American Methodists. Today neither set of articles strictly binds either church.

C.M.

ASA. The Hebrew term meaning "physician" or a contraction for "Yahweh has healed." King of Judah about 913–873 B.C. and ABIJAH's son and successor.

Asa's Religious Reform. Asa halted the syncretism that had been in vogue during the reign of his immediate predecessors—AHIJAH, REHOBOAM, and SOLOMON. In particular, he "put away the male cult prostitutes out of the land, and removed all the idols that his fathers had made" (I Kings 15:12). Also Asa deposed Maacah (his mother) as queen mother because she sponsored an image for Asherah, the Canaanite goddess of fertility. Though Asa destroyed that image (15:13) and upended various Judean altars (II Chr. 14:5), his people did not completely desist from sacrificing to Yahweh on high places (I Kings 15:14). Despite exaggerated elements in the Chronicler's account (II Chr. 15:1–15), which elevate Asa's reform to the level of those of Hezekiah and Josiah, Asa's efforts did reduce the appeal that the pagan cults had for the Judean populace.

Asa's Military Strategy. (a) Confrontation with Zerah. When Zerah the "Ethiopian" and his mercenaries invaded Judah from the south, they were defeated by Asa's forces near the frontier fortress of Mareshah. Judah's army chased the aggressor to Gerar and plundered its environs (II Chr. 14:9–15). Though the size of Zerah's army is exaggerated (one million soldiers), this encounter is undoubtedly historical, reflective of Egypt's desire to maintain influence in Palestine.

(b) Confrontation with Baasha. As Asa's contemporary, this strong Israelite king moved his army far south into Benjamin. Seizing and fortifying Ramah, Baasha successfully blockaded northern approaches into Jerusalem. Thereupon Asa successfully bribed Ben-hadad, king of Syria, to transfer his allegiance from Israel to Judah. Ben-hadad dispatched an army to ravage northern Galilee, which necessitated Baasha's withdrawal. Immediately Asa used Baasha's building material to fortify Geba and Mizpah, thereby extending his territory northward and ensuring Jerusalem's safety (I Kings 15:16–22). The Chronicler adds that Asa was reproved by the seer Hanani for preferring Ben-hadad's support to Yahweh and Asa responded by consigning Hanani to prison (II Chr. 16:7–10). Asa's stubborn opposition was thus offered as justification for the foot disease he suffered in old age (16:12).

The OT attests another Asa, a Levite, son of Elkanah, who resided in a village of the Netophathites (I Chr. 9:16).

J.K.K.

Francis Asbury

ASBURY, FRANCIS (1745–1816). A METHODIST bishop, Francis Asbury was born near Birmingham, England, to Joseph and Elizabeth Rogers Asbury. At age fourteen he was converted and began attending Methodist meetings. Soon designated as a lay preacher, he went to London at age twenty-one and was admitted to the Wesleyan Conference.

Sent to America by JOHN WESLEY in 1771, he was the only one of Wesley's English preachers who stayed during the Revolution. A citizen of Delaware, he became a leader of northern Methodists at the Baltimore Conference of 1782. In 1784 Wesley appointed him and THOMAS COKE joint superintendents of the American work. Sensing the American spirit, Asbury instead received his appointment from the Christmas Conference in Baltimore in 1784. On successive days he was ordained deacon, elder, and superintendent (he called himself bishop despite Wesley's expressed disapproval).

Coke's frequent absences left Asbury in charge of the American church, which he ruled with skill. He traveled on horseback more than three hundred thousand miles, encouraging Methodism to become America's fastest-growing denomination. He died March 31, 1816. His Journals rival Wesley's in importance for American Methodists.

N.H.

ASCENSION. At the climax of Jesus' earthly ministry, in Luke's account, he was "received up" to God's presence (Mark 16:19 KJV; Luke 9:51) in a dramatic episode (Luke 24:51, according to one textual reading; Acts 1:4-11). Luke places this event at the close of a forty-day period after Easter, though Luke 24:50-53 apparently locates ASCENSION DAY on Easter Day (compare Barnabas 15:9 for a similar telescoping of events).

The consequences of the Ascension, if not the actual description of Jesus' "going up," are woven into the fabric of early Christian teaching, as is clear from the following references: John 6:62; 16:5-11; Acts 2:33-34; 3:21; Rom. 8:34; 10:6-7; I Thess. 1:10; Phil. 2:9-11; Eph. 1:20; 4:8-10; Heb. 4:14; 8:1, 9:24; I Pet. 3:21-22; Rev. 3:21. In sum total these diverse allusions agree on several points. (1) The close of Jesus' work was marked by an act of installation as world-ruler and enthronement (based possibly on a Near Eastern kingly acclamation, as the monarch is acknowledged as all-powerful; see Matt. 28:18-20; I Tim. 3:16; Heb. 1:1-3); (2) Jesus' visible presence was withdrawn to another sphere of existence called God's presence or glory. Glimpses of that heavenly order are found, however, for example in Stephen's vision of the ascended SON OF MAN in Acts 7:54-60; and (3) Christian apologetics needed the Ascension to give a response to the question, Where is the body of Jesus, claimed to be raised to life after death? The answer was that the body was taken up into the divine presence, where Jesus acts as exalted intercessor (Heb. 7:25) and from which he was expected to come again (Heb. 9:28).

R.M.

ASCENSION DAY. A feast day celebrated on the fortieth day after EASTER, observed on the Thursday of the sixth week after Easter. Ascension day is, thus, the end of the Easter season. The festival dates from the fourth-century Jerusalem church. It is a holy day of obligation in the Roman Catholic Church.

J.C.

ASCETICISM. See MONASTICISM.

ASHDOD. Best known as the chief of the five cities of the Philistine pentapolis (after the twelfth century B.C.), though it had enjoyed a former thousand-year-old history as a prosperous port and trading center in Egyptian-dominated Canaan.

Despite Joshua 15:46-47, it does not appear that Ashdod ever formed a part of the early Israelite domination of Palestine. It figures largely in the story of the Philistine wars (I Sam. 5-6) and was a proverbial enemy power on Israel's borders in the eighth century B.C. (compare Amos 1:6-8). For the most part it maintained a precarious and relative autonomy throughout Israelite history by subjecting itself to the successive Assyrian and Chaldean hegemonies in the Near East.

For postexilic Judaism, Ashdod remained a center of alien culture and language (Neh. 13:23-24). During the Maccabean war it was repeatedly sacked by the Jews (I Macc. 5:68; 10:84; 11:4), but in 63 B.C. it was reconstituted as a free city by Pompey as part of the pax romana imposed on Palestine. It formed part of the kingdom of Herod the Great established by the Roman Senate and was inherited by his successors.

In the NT Ashdod (Azotus) was evangelized by the Hellenist Philip (Acts 8:40). The name has been preserved in the modern Isdud, half-way between Jaffa and Gaza on the Palestinian coast. The port of Ashdod was at the nearby Tell el-Kheidar.

B.V.

ASHER. Jacob's eighth son, for whom one of the twelve tribes was named. Born of Leah's maid Zilpah (Gen. 30:12-13), Asher was Gad's younger brother and is consistently listed after him (Gen. 35:26; 46:16-17; Exod. 1:4; I Chr. 2:2).

Geographical Setting of the Tribe. Stretching about sixty miles northward from Carmel, Asher's territory was bounded on the west by the Mediterranean and on the east by the holdings of Zebulun and Naphtali (Josh. 19:24-31). A maritime tribe, Asher took advantage of its proximity to northern Phoenician mercantilism centered at Tyre. The blessing of Jacob attests the fertility of Asher's territorial allotment ("Asher's food shall be rich, and he shall yield royal dainties," Gen. 49:20; compare Deut. 33:24). This region boasted of substantial olive harvests—and still does.

Involvement in Israelite History. The Song of Deborah (Judg. 5:17) questions Asher's motives when a lucrative business with foreign clients rendered her unwilling to respond to inner Israelite need. Residing on the fringe of that region most endangered by Canaanite threat, Asher ignored Deborah's battle cry against Sisera and his coalition. Even so, Asher assisted Gideon in ousting the Midianites from the Esdraelon Plain (6:35; 7:23). Following Saul's death, Asher immediately acknowledged the refugee monarchy of Ish-baal (Ish-bosheth) in Gilead (II Sam. 2:9, reading "Ashurites"). Though Asher is listed as a district in Solomon's reorganization of the land (I Kings 4:16), the Chronicler's failure to mention Asher in his account of David's military and civic administration likely denotes Asher's political unimportance (I Chr. 27:16-22).

Asher in the New Testament. Twice mentioned, Asher is home for Anna, the prophetess (Luke 2:36), and Asher follows Gad in a listing of those favored by divine protection (Rev. 7:6).

J.K.K.

ASHERAH. A Semitic goddess venerated throughout the ancient Near East and the cult object symbolizing her.

Known as Ashratum in early Babylonian texts and Ashirta in the Amarna letters of Egypt, this mother-goddess is best described in fourteenth-century B.C. Canaanite epic literature from RAS SHAMRA, where her name is Athirat. There she functions as El's consort, the mother of seventy deities, including Baal, the most visible member of the Canaanite pantheon. The designation "holiness" (qdš) predicated to Athirat may imply identity with Qudšu, a nude Egyptian goddess.

Though the goddess and her cult object are not always distinguished, the goddess is regularly linked with Baal in localized Canaanite fertility worship, which ensnared various Israelites (Judg. 3:7). Asherah's pole symbol, constructed of wood, stood upright beside the altar of Baal (6:28). In Elijah's day, Ahab, king of Israel, tolerated Jezebel's support of four hundred Asherah prophets (I Kings 18:19), and Manasseh, king of Judah, introduced an Asherah image into the Jerusalem Temple (II Kings 21:7). Two other Judean kings, Asa and Josiah, are fondly remembered for their determination to annihilate this alien element from Yahweh worship (I Kings 15:13; II Kings 23:4, 7).

J.K.K.

ASHKELON. One of the five leading Philistine cities (Pentapolis) on the Mediterranean seacoast about twelve miles north of Gaza.

In Old Testament Times. The Execration Texts (about 1850 B.C.), reporting Ashkelon's rebellion against Egypt constitute its earliest literary mention. Though the Amarna letters (about 1375-1350 B.C.) attest Egyptian loyalty, Rameses II and Marniptah curbed rebellion there in the thirteenth century B.C. Soon the Philistines overtook Ashkelon and adjacent territory, which had eluded Joshua (Josh. 13:3). Ashkelon is unmistakably a Philistine city of Israelite traditions, focusing on Samson (Judg. 14:19) and the ark of the covenant (I Sam. 6:11, 17) and in David's lament over Saul and Jonathan (II Sam. 1:17-20). Woe oracles in Jeremiah 47:5, 7; Amos 1:8; Zephaniah 2:4, 7; and Zechariah 9:5 also mention Ashkelon.

From Atlas of the Bible (Thomas Nelson & Sons Limited)

Palestinian coast near ruins of ancient Ashkelon

Assyria under Tiglath-pileser III claimed Ashkelon in 733 B.C., and Sennacherib quelled rebellion there in 701 B.C. The Babylonians destroyed Ashkelon in 604 B.C. for its resistance against Nebuchadnezzar. Subsequently, the city welcomed the Hellenistic advances of Alexander the Great; yet relations with Maccabean Jews were friendly (I Macc. 10:86; 11:60).

In Later Times. Ashkelon is said to be the birthplace of Herod the Great, who embellished it with baths and colonnades, and his sister Salome lived there. In their war against Rome (A.D. 66), the Jews partially destroyed Ashkelon, but in a second phase of battle they sustained heavy losses. Crusaders captured Ashkelon in 1153, and Muslims reclaimed it in 1187.

J.K.K.

ASHKENAZIM. From the Hebrew Ashkenazi, meaning "Germany," a term given to Jews who formed an early community along the Rhine River, now applied to their descendants, about 80 percent of the world's Jews. Their counterpart, the SEPHARDIM—Jews from Spain, differ in ritual, speech, culture, writing, and outlook. YIDDISH, a mixture of German, Slavic, and Hebrew, became a mark of the Ashkenazim.

Persecution and trade prompted heavy migration of Ashkenazim to Slavic countries (Poland, Hungary, Russia) during the Middle Ages and especially in the fifteenth and sixteenth centuries. However, massacres in east Europe, particularly in Poland in 1648, dispersed the Ashkenazim throughout Europe, the United States, Canada, South Africa, and Australia. The Nazi Holocaust sharply reduced their numbers in World War II. The state of Israel originally was heavily Ashkenazim, but the Sephardim increased by birth and immigration and currently outnumber them. Rabbis of the "two models" in Judaism share equally in Israel's chief rabbinate.

Historically, the Ashkenazim absorbed aspects of their surrounding cultures, and tended to produce Conservative and Reform congregations, although they are not without their Orthodox. Rigid biblical and Talmudic studies, liturgy, mystical piety, poetry, contemplation, and martyrdom form parts of their tradition.

C.M.

ASHTAROTH. Plural form of Ashtoreth, the Hebrew designation of the Canaanite fertility goddess Astarte, and name of a city in north trans-Jordan, about twenty miles east of the Sea of Galilee.

Canaanite Divinity. Ashtaroth presumably encompasses diverse local embodiments of Astarte in the same way that "Baalim" (or "Baals") embraces varied manifestations of the fertility god Baal. In Judges 2:13 Israelite defection from her ancestral faith in God is portrayed in general terms as a cultic affirmation of the Baalim and Ashtaroth (compare Judg. 10:6; I Sam. 12:10). Samuel admonishes the people to resist such idolatry just prior to Saul's election as Israel's first king at Mizpah (I Sam. 7:3).

The City (Tell Ashtarath). Originally claimed by Og, king of Bashan, as his capital (Deut. 1:4; Josh. 9:10; 12:4), Ashtaroth was subsequently captured by the Israelites, assigned to "the people of Machir the son of Manasseh" (Josh. 13:31), and designated as one of the Israelite cities of refuge (I Chr. 6:71; compare Josh. 21:27). As Ashteroth-karnaim, the city is mentioned in Genesis 14:5 as inhabited by the Rephaim (prehistoric Canaanite settlers), who fell victim to Chedorlaomer's punitive campaign against Transjordan. As Karnaim, the city, along with its Astarte sanctuary, was destroyed by Judas during his second-century B.C. liberation of the Jews (I Macc. 5:43-44).

J.K.K.

ASHTEROTH KARNAIM. A locale about twenty miles east of the Sea of Galilee occupied by the Rephaim (prehistoric Canaanite inhabitants), which fell to Chedorlaomer during his punitive campaign against Transjordan (Gen. 14:5). Ashteroth Karnaim is assuredly Ashtaroth (Tell Ashtarath), capital of Bashan (Deut. 1:4), which has been equated with nearby Karnaim (Sheikh Saad) first mentioned in Amos 6:13. Judas Maccabeus destroyed Karnaim during his second-century B.C. liberation of the Jews (I Macc. 5:43-44; II Macc. 12:26).

J.K.K.

ASHTORETH. The intentional Hebrew misvocalization of the name of the Canaanite fertility goddess, Astarte. Following the analogy of Ish-bosheth (II Sam. 2:8) for Ish-baal or Esh-baal (I Chr. 8:33), the name is vocalized with the vowels of the noun bōsheth ("shame"). As a singular form, Ashtoreth is found merely three times in the OT (I Kings 11:5, 33; II Kings 23:13), though the context in I Samuel 31:10 also invites it. The plural "Ashtaroth" is more frequently met within comprehensive allusions to Israelite idolatry.

If in the tenth century B.C. the cult of Ashtoreth won the support of the religiously pluralistic Solomon (I Kings 11:5, 33), three centuries later it evoked the wrath of the zealous Josiah in his forthright promotion of the ancestral covenant faith (II Kings 23:13). In both instances, Ashtoreth is linked with the Sidonians of Phoenicia. Also in both, the veneration of Ashtoreth is associated with that of the Ammonite deity, Milcom, and in the latter text, the Moabite deity, Chemosh, is likewise mentioned. If Milcom and Chemosh were local manifestations of the Venus star, Athtar (Babylonian Ishtar), Ashtoreth may have been Athtar's female consort.

Rather than advertising Ashtoreth's astral function, extant Canaanite texts and figurines present her as a fertility goddess. Canaanite epic literature from Ras Shamra shows Baal's sister, Anath, overtaking Ashtoreth in that capacity, yet further south (in southern Syria and Palestine) Ashtoreth mainly remained intact.

J.K.K.

ASHURBANIPAL. The son and successor of the Assyrian monarch ESARHADDON and the last important ruler of the Assyrian Empire. His reign began in 668 B.C., but the date of the end of his rule is uncertain, probably 627 or 626 B.C. During his rule, Judah was under Assyrian domination. There is no certain reference to Ashurbanipal in the Bible, although he is generally identified with the Osnapper mentioned in Ezra 4:10 as having settled foreigners in the cities of Samaria.

Ashurbanipal pursued the vigorous policies of his father and succeeded in establishing dominance over Egypt and capturing Thebes (Nah. 3:8). The inscriptions of both Esarhaddon and Ashurbanipal note the submission of the Judean king Manasseh to their authority and his support in their campaigns.

His father had established arrangements for Ashurbanipal to serve as primary Assyrian king and for his brother Shamash-shum-ukin to reign as king in Babylon. Eventually warfare broke out between the two, lasting for four years (652-648 B.C.) and greatly weakening Assyrian authority.

Ashurbanipal prided himself on his literacy and spent time assembling and copying various and sundry ancient documents and inscriptions. His library in Nineveh was partly excavated by the British and provides one of the richest sources of ancient Near Eastern texts.

J.H.

ASH WEDNESDAY. The first day of LENT, the forty-day season of preparation and repentance before EASTER. The name derives from the custom of burning the palm branches from the previous PALM SUNDAY. These ashes are dabbed on the foreheads of believers, in the sign of the cross, by the minister or priest. In the Roman Catholic Church they are burned before MASS, with a prayer of blessing. The ashes are sprinkled on the altar three times, then priests apply them to their own foreheads before marking the communicants. The ashes signify the sorrow of believers as they meditate on the sacrifice of Christ.

J.C.

ASIA. A geographical term of uncertain origin whose usage among some ancient geographers was inclusive of the continent of Asia or major portions thereof. The term does not occur in the OT, but in the Apocrypha it still denotes a large eastern territory generally considered equivalent to the kingdom of the Seleucids. In Roman and NT times, the term was primarily applied to the Roman province of Asia located in what later was called Asia Minor.

The broader usage of the term with reference to a large portion of the Asian continent appears in II Esdras 15:46; 16:1, one of the later books of the Apocrypha. The books of Maccabees describe the Seleucid monarch as "king of Asia," probably drawing on an earlier Persian designation and speak of pretenders seeking to acquire the throne of Asia (I Macc. 8:6; 11:13; 12:39; 13:32; II Macc. 3:3). Since the Seleucids ruled territory extending from Egypt to the Iranian Plateau and most of Asia Minor, such references must be seen in fairly broad terms.

In the NT, Asia is used in a much more restricted sense denoting primarily the Roman province of Asia, located in western Asia Minor, with its capital first in Pergamum and then Ephesus. This province was created some years after the Attalid king of Pergamum willed his kingdom to the Romans at his death in 133 B.C. This narrower reference for the term Asia is found throughout Acts (for example, 2:9; 6:9; 16:6), and in Paul's letters he speaks of the first convert in Asia (Rom. 16:5) and of the churches in Asia (I Cor. 16:19; see also II Cor. 1:8; II Tim. 1:15; I Pet. 1:1). The book of Revelation shows a special interest in seven churches in Asia, all of which were located in the western region of the Roman province (Rev. 1:4). The author highlights three of the major cities of this region: Ephesus, Smyrna, and Pergamum (Rev. 1:11).

J.H.

ASIARCHS. The only reference to these people is in Acts 19:31. They were the administrators of a confederation of cities in the Roman province of Asia (modern Turkey) and were centered in Ephesus where the scene of Acts 19 is laid. Their religious functions concerned the protection of the cult of dea Roma (involving "Rome and the emperor"), and this cult was located at Pergamum, also in Asia. The Asiarchs were elected annually from among the leading and wealthiest citizens of the province.

The interest in the story of Acts 19 is that these high-placed aristocrats called Paul a friend, came to his aid in a crisis, and gave him advice not to venture into the amphitheater of Ephesus, dedicated to the goddess Artemis. The one text that mentions Asiarchs is a window through which we see at least a glimpse of Paul's social contacts and the appeal of his message to the upper strata of Greco-Roman society.

R.M.

ASOKA. Emperor of the Mauryan dynasty who ruled over north India and Afghanistan around 269–232 B.C. Asoka ranks as one of the great humanitarian rulers of world history, and was as well a sovereign whose support of BUDDHISM did much to set that faith on the path to becoming a major world religion.

Asoka spent the first eight years of his reign expanding his domains through the usual sanguinary military means. But the suffering his warlike policies entailed moved him to great remorse. Renouncing conquest, he turned to the study of Buddhism and devoted himself to promulgating its gentle ethical principles and the alleviation of suffering throughout his realm. This he saw as the following of DHARMA, righteousness, which embraced such virtues as truthfulness, nonviolence, compassion, and non-acquisitiveness. Asoka sent envoys to kings near and far to convey to them the dharma message, and in his own realm bespoke it in inscriptions on pillars—the "pillar edicts"—and rock walls and caves. By his command hospitals and way stations were built, roadside trees planted, wells dug, and the quantity of animals killed for meat greatly reduced. The emperor and his leading ministers actively traveled throughout the land dispensing justice, especially to women and the powerless.

Asoka patronized the Buddhist sangha, or order, built Buddhist places of worship, and according to tradition sent out missionaries, including those who converted Ceylon (Sri Lanka). But while his preference for Buddhism is not in doubt, he also endowed Vedic rites, and above all inculcated tolerance and respect for all faith through his example. His edicts treat only matters of ethics, not doctrine, and nowhere enjoin upon his subjects the religious practice of Buddhism. But Buddhism's strength and influence grew rapidly under his benevolent rule.

R.E.

ASSEMBLIES OF GOD. See PENTECOSTAL CHURCHES.

ASSUMPTION OF MARY. A festival of Roman Catholicism honoring the bodily assumption of the BLESSED VIRGIN MARY into heaven after her death; a parallel to the Ascension of Christ (Acts 1:9). Around A.D. 600, the emperor Maurice set the feast on August 15, but Pope Gregory the Great set it on January 18. The term "assumption" was once applied to receptions of martyrs directly into heaven. It is now used only to refer to the Virgin Mary. The Assumption of Mary was declared an article of faith by the First VATICAN COUNCIL in 1870. It is based on tradition since no mention is made of it in the NT.

J.C.

ASSURANCE. The sense of confidence and trust that the believer and the faithful have toward the promises, fidelity, and pledges of God. Although the actual term "assurance" is rare in the RSV, the concept is frequent, especially in the NT and the Letter to the Hebrews. The concept is closely allied to what is implied in the concept of FAITH and denotes the subjective attitude of trust, which the believer possesses.

Something of what assurance means can be seen in negative form in Deuteronomy 28:58-67, which describes the distressful situation that accompanies lack of obedience and trust in God. Deuteronomy 28:66 describes the situation where there is no assurance as "your life shall hang in doubt before you; night and day you shall be in dread, and have no assurance of your life." Lack of assurance produced uncertainty, anxiety, and discontent with life.

The presence of assurance produces the opposite attitude, namely confidence and certainty. Acts 17:31 points to the objective basis of Christian assurance, namely the sign that produces the believer's confidence: "he has given assurance to all men by raising him from the dead." Assurance is a special theme of Hebrews. In Hebrews 11:1, the author describes faith as "the assurance of things hoped for." The Greek term employed here (hypothasis) describes the subjective confidence of the believer who, like the faithful ancients of old (Heb. 11:4-31), can act on the certainty that what God has promised about the future can be trusted. The same term occurs in Hebrews 3:14 (RSV, "first confidence"), where it refers to the initial assurance that the believer had. Hebrews 3:14 also, however, seems to imply that assurance can be lost just as it suggests that the believer can become an unbeliever, and the saved become unsaved (6:1-8). The book, on the other hand, has as one of its purposes the encouragement of that inner placing of confidence in salvation that has been wrought and will be fully realized in the future (19:25). Assurance is thus a disposition that is not a once-for-all given state but an attitude to be constantly renewed in living out of and by faith.

J.H.

ASSYRIA AND BABYLONIA. Designation of the two Mesopotamian civilizations that flourished between the mid-third and late first millennia B.C. Their names derive from Asshur and Babylon, their capital cities.

Land and People (a) The land. Basically, Babylonia encompassed the alluvial territory between the Euphrates and Tigris rivers, from Baghdad south to the Persian Gulf. Occasionally flatlands extending east of the Tigris toward the Zagros Mountains and territory upstream on the Euphrates likewise belonged to Babylonia. Assyria's original holdings were almost entirely limited to land east of the middle Tigris, but much land to the north and west was ultimately taken.

As Mesopotamia's most outstanding geographical feature, the Tigris and Euphrates directly affected agricultural pursuits with their annual flooding. Autumn rains and melting winter snow in the Armenian Mountains produced spring floods useful to adjacent fields so long as dikes had been established to control the amount of water spill. The inevitable silting up of canal systems, however, necessitated frequent relocation of agricultural pursuits.

(b) The people. The Babylonians and Assyrians, who may be collectively designated as the Akkadians after the seat of their first empire (Akkad), were Semitic peoples. They originated in the movements of nomadic tribes that left the Arabian Desert for better conditions in the Tigris-Euphrates plain. By the mid-third millennium they were arriving with increasing force. Speaking the Semitic language of Akkadian, these newcomers appropriated the cuneiform, syllabic script of the Sumerians whom they invaded. Also they adopted the Sumerian pantheon while adding gods of their own. For many decades the mingling of intruding Semite and settled Sumerian was peaceful. The Sumerians organized no monolithic empire since their relatively small city-states flourished independently. Sumerian continued as a literary and sacred language, while Akkadian, involving two dominant dialects, Babylonian and Assyrian, increasingly became the spoken language of Mesopotamia's residents. Eventually the Semites actively sought political dominance over Mesopotamia. This was realized under Sargon, who in about 2360 B.C. founded Akkad, history's first great empire.

Babylonian History. Various king lists, date lists, court chronicles, and royal inscriptions offer scholars source material, which permits the writing of Mesopotamian history.

(a) Early ascendancy and downfall (about 2360-1950 B.C.). With Sargon's triumph over Sumerian opponents in about 2360, the empire at Akkad (near the later Babylon) was founded. This energetic imperialist gave to Mesopotamia a unification hitherto unknown. He was succeeded by two sons and his grandson, Naramsin, who likewise achieved military brilliance. The rulers of Akkad controlled vast territories, but they met a worthy opponent in the Ebla Empire of northern Syria. Ebla's triumph over Akkad following Sargon's death, however, was temporary, for Naramsin brought Ebla to its knees.

Akkad's sway over the Near East quickly deteriorated after Naramsin's death. In about 2180 B.C., the Semitic Empire succumbed to northeastern Guti invasions. But these barbarians were incapable of firm rule. Consequently, under the Third Dynasty of UR (about 2060-1950), Sumerian culture underwent a renaissance, especially in jurisprudence and art.

Nevertheless, the Sumerians in their self-contained city-states were enjoying their last years of independence.

Once Elam overtook Ur (about 1950), numerous Amorite peoples, all speaking dialects of northwest Semitic, systematically dominated lower Mesopotamia. Although the Amorite-controlled city-states of Isin and Larsa first emerged as significant political rivals, the First Dynasty of Babylon (about 1830–1530, also Amorite) eventually won command.

(b) Old Babylonian period (about 1830–1530 B.C.). In Hammurabi (about 1728–1686), the First Dynasty boasted its most effective monarch. The surrounding kingdoms of Larsa, Eshnunna, and Mari were all the worse for having to face his political and military strategies. Having led Babylon to a far more secure position in international affairs, HAMMURABI moved his city toward new cultural heights. This was a busy era of pseudoscience (for example, magic and astrology), literary productivity, and a well-articulated religion that promoted Marduk, Babylon's patron god, to the pinnacle of the Mesopotamian pantheon. Best known of Hammurabi's achievements was the promulgation of his law code, which masterfully subjected previously existing legal traditions to needful national order.

Following Hammurabi's death, Babylon soon lost significant ground, though the dynasty persisted for another 150 years. Weakened by invading Kassites, who arrived from the Iranian Mountains, it ultimately succumbed to intrusive Hittite forces entering from the west. Yet these visitors from distant Anatolia (Asia Minor) failed to consolidate their military gains. Consequently, a Kassite dynasty took control of Babylon for the next four centuries.

Courtesy of the Trustees of the British Museum

Cylinder seal depicting animals and heroes

(c) Middle Babylonian period (about 1530–1150 B.C.). Though knowledge about the Kassite rulers is scant, they apparently weathered border warfare with Assyria and had some dealings with Egypt. Inter-marriages involving the Kassite royal family with those of Assyria, Hatti, and Egypt improved Babylon's international position. The Kassite dynasty, which kept Babylonian culture basically intact, ruled less authoritatively during its last decades when land grants to various officials became commonplace. Finally it succumbed to Elamite invaders in the mid-twelfth century.

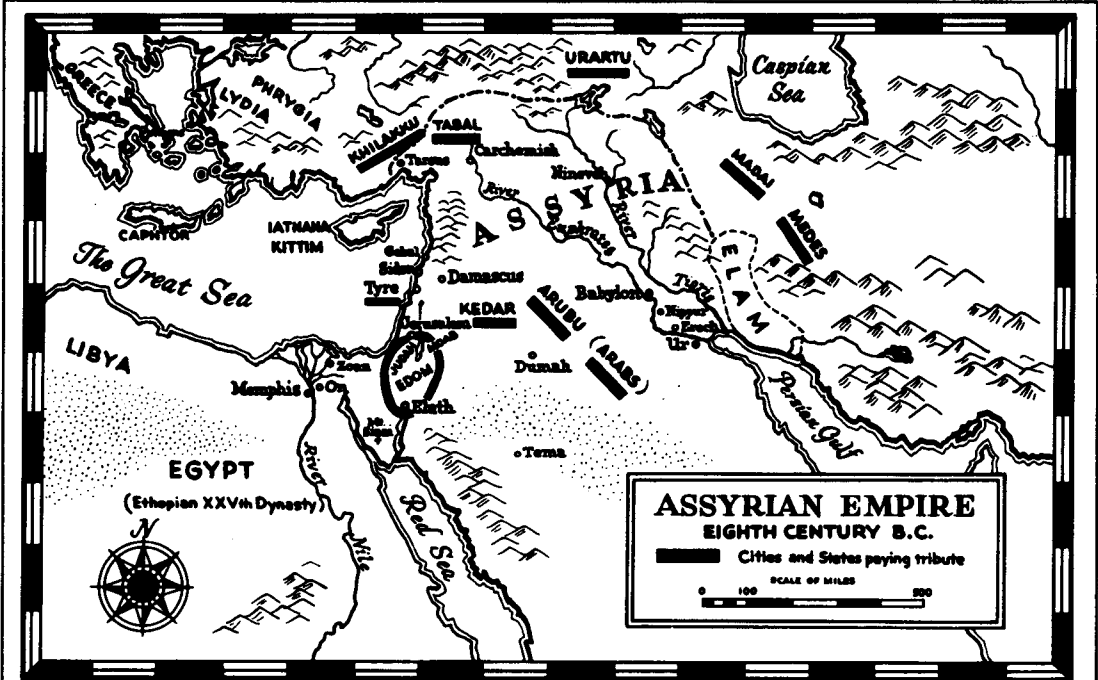

Courtesy of the Museum of Fine Arts, Boston

Glazed brick relief of a lion from the royal processional, Babylon (sixth century B.C.)

(d) Neo-Babylonian period (626–539 B.C.). Babylonian recovery was painfully slow in the ensuing years when Assyria regularly dominated the Mesopotamian landscape. Nevertheless, Babylonia benefited from extensive long-distance trade contact with northern Assyria. The brief meteoric Neo-Babylonian or Chaldean period opened with the rule of NABOPOLASSAR (626–605), who, as an ally of the Medes, conquered Nineveh (612), thereby terminating the Assyrian Empire. This Babylonian success was buttressed by the westward campaigns of NEBUCHADNEZZAR (605–562), who dealt the Egyptians a stunning defeat at Carchemish in northeast Syria in 605 and subsequently devastated Jerusalem in 587 (II Kings 25:1-21). As Babylon's last monarch, NABONIDUS (556–539) foolishly tried to supplant Marduk with the moon-god Sin of whom he was a devotee. The citizenry of Babylon loathed his religious policies, and the infuriated Marduk priesthood even helped Cyrus the Persian to conquer Babylon (539). With the transformation of the city into a Persian administrative center, Babylonian sovereignty expired.

Assyrian History. (a) Old Assyrian period (about 1900–1600 B.C.). Following the collapse of the Third Dynasty of Ur, Asshur asserted its political independence and became a busy commercial center. The Cappadocian Texts (nineteenth century B.C.) disclose that sophisticated trade relations with Anatolia enabled Asshur to obtain tin for the production of bronze. Commercial expansion, not military conquest, was Assyria's goal, and it was realized by astute Assyrian merchants. But some crisis halted this venture shortly after 1800 B.C. Under the Amorite, Shamshi-adad I (about 1750–1718), Assyria briefly dominated upper Mesopotamia. Shamshi-adad resumed trade with Anatolia and claimed the Amorite city-state of Mari. His kingdom, however, rapidly disintegrated after his death, permitting MARI to reach its zenith under Zimri-lim (about 1730–1697). Thrown into confusion by many peoples on the move in upper Mesopotamia during the seventeenth century, Assyria eventually experienced western annexation by the Hurrian kingdom of Mitanni.

(b) Middle Assyrian period (about 1350–1075 B.C.). When Mitanni fell prey to the Hittites in the mid-fourteenth century, Assyria recovered under Asshur-uballit I (about 1356–1321). During the tenure of three strong thirteenth-century kings—Adad-nirari I (about 1297–1266), Shalmaneser I (about 1265–1235), and Tukulti-Ninurta I (about 1234–1197)—Assyria pushed westward to wrest Mittani from Hittite control, and under Tukulti-Ninurta she momentarily conquered Babylon. Conversely, Assyria sustained a cultural invasion from Babylonia at this time. Subsequent Aramean pressure ushered Assyria into more than two centuries of weakness. This was only temporarily alleviated by the military accomplishments of Tiglath-pileser I (about 1116–1078), who bequeathed to Assyria more territory than she was able to consolidate.

(c) Neo-Assyrian period (930–612 B.C.). Beginning with Asshur-dan II (935–913), the first of the Neo-Assyrian monarchs, Assyria steadily arose to political prominence. Under Ashurnasirpal III (884–860), Shalmaneser III (859–825), and Adad-nirari III (811–784), Assyria waged numerous campaigns west of the Euphrates to search out prized timber, minerals, and new commercial opportunities. Although the western states, including Israel, successfully checkmated Shalmaneser at the Syrian site of Qarqar (853) and benefited from a four-decade interval of Assyrian weakness (about 785–745), Tiglath-pileser III (745–727) emerged to initiate a century of imperial rule. Under the name of Pul (II Kings 15:19), he assumed governorship of Babylonia. To ensure that his westward conquests would be permanent, he engaged in the wholesale relocation of conquered people, a policy that his successor, SHALMANESER V (726–722), reaffirmed when he conquered the Israelite capital of Samaria (722; II Kings 17:1–6). While SARGON II (721–705) spent much of his reign addressing the anti-Assyrian rebellion, which erupted following Shalmaneser's death, he did conquer numerous Syro-Palestinian cities and seize the Babylonian throne. Similarly, SENNACHERIB (704–681) was required to crush rebellion before pursuing a militaristic agenda leading to the near sack of Jerusalem (II Kings 18:13–19:37) and destruction of Babylon.

Assyrian expansion achieved its climax under ESARHADDON (680–669), who took possession of Egypt in 671. For a brief interval, the entire Fertile Crescent was united in one empire. ASHURBANIPAL (668–627) was Assyria's last great king. His triumph over numerous foes, including Egypt and Babylon, allowed him to undertake peaceful pursuits, including the gathering of an extensive library of ancient Babylonian myths and epics. But Ashurbanipal's death sealed Assyria's fate. In the nation's last two decades no leader was capable of holding the massive empire together. When the Medes joined the Babylonians in upending Nineveh in 612, Assyria met certain death.

Religion. (a) Prominent deities. The three cosmic Sumerian deities—Heaven, Atmosphere, and Earth—reappear with the same names in the Babylonian and Assyrian pantheon: Anu, Enlil, and Ea (Enki). The Sumerian astral trinity—the moon, the sun, and Venus—is likewise affirmed but with different names: Sin, Shamash, and Ishtar. Clearly, the superior, though politically weaker, culture provided useful models for the Akkadian newcomers. In Marduk and Asshur, Babylonia and Assyria respectively identified its national deity. Though Marduk was one of the younger deities, the enviable political stature of his city, Babylon, elevated him to the head of the pantheon, where he was glorified as the creator and organizer of the cosmos early in the second millennium. Asshur bore the same name as Assyria's capital. His pronounced warlike character reflected the basic tenor of his people. During those periods when Assyria's imperial strength was most evident, Asshur was honored as father of the gods and creator of the universe.

Courtesy of the Metropolitan Museum of Art

Lamassu (guardian spirits of the gate); palace of Ashurnasirpal II at Nimrud, one of the Assyrian royal capitals

To some degree, the gods could be differentiated according to age. The most regal of the gods, Anu (Heaven), was the oldest deity, whose realm was the remote celestial sphere. As one of the older gods, Enlil (Atmosphere) shared some of Anu's royalty and remoteness. Though lord of the earth, Enlil's attitude toward humankind was ambivalent. He was responsible for sending the great flood. As the wise patron god of exorcism and other human crafts, Ea claimed the water surrounding the earth as his abode. Among the astral deities, Ishtar was noted for both militant and fertility capacities. Shamash was affirmed as judge of heaven and earth who supported the poor and oppressed.

Courtesy of the Trustees of the British Museum

The sun-god; dynasty of Akkad

(b) Divine-human encounter. The Akkadian deities were experienced as awesome beings whose radiance terrified the beholder. This feature was also attributed to numerous Assyrian kings who overwhelmed their opponents on the battlefield. Day-to-day contact with the gods was realized through the temple cult. On analogy with the king who inhabited his palace, the god for whom an Akkadian temple had been built was understood to occupy the sanctuary. The image in which the deity was regarded present was placed in the temple's main room. Just as servants awakened, washed, clothed, and fed the king, specific temple priests similarly ministered to the divine image. Only ritually pure food was passed on platters and in jars before the image, which was thought to devour it by looking at it through eyes of precious stone. Solely of human shape, these images were ordinarily constructed of valuable wood, plated with gold, and covered with magnificent garments suiting the ritualistic occasion.

The gods moved with their images. Accordingly, the average layperson, who was not admitted into the temple, could relate with the gods on such a solemn occasion as the New Year festival, when the images were carried in procession beyond the temple. This fusion of god and image also fostered in the Akkadians a belief that if the enemy stole the image, the god in question must have grown angry with his city and voluntarily departed. Undoubtedly, non-priestly individuals mainly interacted with divinity through abundantly available Akkadian mythology.

(c) Divination. Akkadian religion put humanity in touch with natural phenomena in the hope that believers might partially control a hostile universe. As they pursued an admittedly precarious existence, the Akkadians regularly wed religion with magic. Many ills were attributed to demons, which originated from souls of the dead who had received improper burial. If one's sinful deeds might evoke demonic intervention, upright deeds would not necessarily protect one against malevolent forces.

Thus it was vital that priests inflict exorcism formulas upon the demons. With the support of priestly divination, individuals and groups might influence future events. The scrutiny of animal livers was a popular method of divination. Archaeologists have uncovered many clay models of livers. These have been meticulously marked out according to their parts and their significance annotated. Some divination helped astronomy to develop, since the location of the stars was thought to affect the future of the newborn. Moreover, divination was practiced when the king consulted the oracle before departing for battle.

The apprehensive Akkadians were singularly intent on trying to influence fate's dreary course. Their grim religious perspective on life colored their view of the hereafter. Beneath the earth was the dark abode of the dead, which offered its inhabitants a miserable existence. Only offerings made by the living, when they remembered, would alleviate the customary diet of dust and dirty water.

Literature. (a) Akkadian poetry. The Tigris-Euphrates region witnessed the production of brief religious lyrics of high literary merit as well as longer epics that engage the imagination. In the former category are hymns glorifying specific deities (for example, "Hymn to Shamash," "Hymn to Ishtar") and penitential prayers linked with sacrificial ritual. The two most celebrated epics are Enuma elish, named after its opening phrase, which presents Marduk's ordering of the cosmos, and the EPIC OF GILGAMESH, which narrates the longings and adventures of the previously known Sumerian hero.

Courtesy of the Trustees of the British Museum

Cylinder seal showing Shamash enthroned

At the center of Enuma elish lies the conflict between primordial chaos, personified by the monster-goddess Tiamat, and cosmic order, manifested in the god Marduk. The poem tells how the body of Tiamat is split by the triumphant Marduk to form the earth below and the firmament above. Marduk's task involves not the production of chaotic matter but its structuring into cosmic order. His efforts continue with the setting up of astral constellations and the creation of humanity, which is charged with serving the gods and their temples. Finally, the assembled deities in their newly formed heaven acknowledge Marduk's supremacy by reciting his fifty honorific names.

Through rich description and vivid dialogue, the Epic of Gilgamesh presents its hero in numerous situations. The whole poem turns, however, on the issue of human mortality. Despite his magnificent physical strength and political clout as king of Erech, Gilgamesh is haunted by the fear that death will conquer him as it does all mortals. After an adventurous but futile search for immortality, he returns home resigned with the knowledge that only the gods do not die. Similarly, the Akkadian Adapa myth portrays its priest-hero as one who enjoys wisdom but not immortality, which lies just beyond his grasp.

Courtesy of the Oriental Institute, University of Chicago

Painting showing the city of Babylon and the Tower of Babel

Poetic wisdom literature includes the Akkadian Counsels of Wisdom, which dispatch advice on such practical issues as cultivating disciplined speech and avoiding bad company. More elaborate Babylonian wisdom texts project a rigorous pessimism. Though "I Will Praise the Lord of Wisdom" (often called The Babylonian Job) offers hymnic thanksgiving to Marduk for personal deliverance from mortal danger, it swarms with skepticism about divine justice and one's ability to know what the gods really want. In "The Babylonian Theodicy" the sufferer raises many questions about the meaning of life. These questions, however, are poorly answered by an orthodox friend.

(b) Akkadian prose. This classification includes detailed royal annals, inscriptions on commemorative stelae, administrative documents recording palace transactions, letters imparting the king's decision about overland commercial activities, diverse linguistic texts, scientific writings on mathematics and astronomy, and legal documents governing private transactions and public policy. The best-known prose text is the CODE OF HAMMURABI, with its piecemeal legislation about such matters as false testimony, marriage, adoption, loans, property rights, and slavery.

Artistic Dimensions. (a) Architecture. Temples were often constructed of lengthy brick walls with recurring recesses and buttresses to break the monotony. Attention was also paid to level. The temple was erected on an elevated terrace, and its cella, housing the divine image, was set at a still higher elevation. Emerging well above the temple complex was the tower or ZIGGURAT, an Akkadian word meaning "pinnacle." Designed to facilitate human contact with the gods who resided on the mountains, these towers were built both beyond the temple compounds (Babylonia) and within (Assyria).

(b) Art media. Palace murals, animal statuary, relief carvings, ivories, and enameled brick all invited Akkadian artists to display their talents. In Assyria the rooms of the great palaces hosted colorful mural decorations, which mainly extolled the king's military and hunting achievements. Scenes involving the slaughter of the defeated and the presentation of tribute were vividly executed. Though humans were depicted stiffly, animal figures were naturally presented. Here the hunting scenes in Ashurbanipal's palace are superb.

Animal statuary maintained realistic levels, and in Assyria a variant form, the orthostat, manifesting dual characteristics of statuary and relief carving, was popular. At the entrance gate of the palace, an animal statue was inserted into the wall to perform a guardian function. In addition to lions and bulls there were fantastic winged bulls with human heads.

Akkadian artists excelled in relief carvings. Commemorative stelae appearing with some regularity conferred a sense of movement on their human figures, something unattested in Sumerian art. The four-sided obelisk was a variation of the stela. Truly impressive is the black obelisk of Shalmaneser III, exhibiting carved reliefs and inscriptions that celebrate the monarch's military achievements.

At Nimrud was found a superb collection of carved and engraved ivories, which excelled in its realistic depiction of the female figure and various animals. Moreover, in the Neo-Babylonian Era, enameled brick was used in gates and along streets as a pleasing exterior decoration. At regular intervals stood the repeated figure of a lion, bull, or awesome dragon. This was set against a blue brick background and framed by geometric designs. The famed Babylonian Ishtar gateway is an outstanding example.

J.K.K.

ASTARTE. See ASHTORETH.

ASTROLOGY. The art and pseudo-science of divination through the study of the stars and other celestial phenomena. It is to be distinguished from astronomy, the science which deals with the physical universe.

Astrology has enjoyed a long history, and in every age it has been modified by the prevailing world view.

It has been a part of science and religion in many places and was not distinguished from astronomy until the rise of modern science in the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries. The three branches of ancient astrology were: (1) the reading of celestial omens; (2) the charting of a person's destiny, based on the positions of the stars and planets at the time of birth; and (3) the study of the influence of the stars on human affairs. Horoscopes (charts developed by the second branch) are always spoken of as being "cast," a term that brings to mind other forms of divination, such as casting dice, lots, or sticks. Additional forms of divination popular in ancient times were the reading of animals' entrails, the interpretation of the flight of swallows, and the consulting of oracles. Astrology was often seen as the most refined method for divination.

Early History. The earliest known astrology was developed in Mesopotamia. The casting of horoscopes did not begin until the fifth century B.C., by which time branches 1 and 3 were already old. In the late fifth century B.C. astronomers divided the ecliptic (the apparent orbit of the sun around the earth) into twelve "houses," and they calculated tables of the movement of the moon and planets. The stars were seen by astrologers as messages from the gods. Each of the seven "planets" (Saturn, Jupiter, Mars, the Sun, Venus, Mercury, and the Moon) was considered both a deity and a personified number. Each ruled over a day of the week.

The Greeks and Ptolemaic Egyptians developed both astrology and astronomy well above the level of the Babylonians. The Greeks included astrology in their larger scheme of sciences and pseudo-sciences, such as alchemy, botany, medicine, minerology, zoology, and so forth. The zodiac was interpreted in terms of these fields, and vice versa. The Greeks associated the planets and signs with colors, metals, animals, stones, plants, and parts of the body, a practice which continues today.

Astrology and Religion. In the second century A.D. mathematical and scientific astronomy declined in favor of astrology, as mystery cults, Gnosticism, and other anti-rational forces gained momentum. Astrology found a respectable ally in Stoicism, which shared its essentially fatalistic outlook. Their alliance proved important in the revival of astrology in the Renaissance.

Astrology spread east with the Greek conquest of India, and made its way from there to China, Japan, and Korea with the spread of Buddhism. Hinduism and Jainism also adopted Greek astrological ideas and combined them with fresh speculations about the universe.

The rise of Christianity put an end to astrology for a time, but Islam, in many ways the heir to Greek thought, reestablished it. Muslim astrologers also drew on Persian (Zoroastrian) and Indian texts. Whereas Christianity often acknowledged the reality of astrological prediction, but rejected it as trafficking with demons, Islam accepted it as dealings with djinn. Arabic astrologers cast three types of horoscopes: (1) an answer to a specific question; (2) determination of the right time for an undertaking; and (3) determination of an individual's fate through examination of the constellations supposed to be visible at the time of birth or conception.

"Astrology," by which was meant astronomy, was part of the general medieval education in Europe wherever and whenever Latin was taught. In the Renaissance, as Greek and Arabic texts became known throughout Europe, astrology, magic, and other forbidden activities were revived. The church, in turn, revived its opposition to these matters, using arguments from the theologians of the early church. This time, however, astrology became firmly established among the learned.

Astrology in the Modern World. With the increasing acceptance of the modern world view, astrology began to lose popularity among the educated. Copernicus (1473-1543) advanced the idea that the earth was a planet that revolved around the sun. This attacked the foundations of astrology, first by removing the sun and the moon from the category of planets, and second by reducing the significance of the earth. Galileo (1563-1642) used the telescope to show that the moon, far from being an unblemished creation (as medieval cosmology had said), was scarred. He also showed that other heavenly bodies were imperfect: Jupiter had satellites, Saturn a ring, and Venus went through phases like the moon. Kepler (1571-1630) and Newton (1642-1727) proposed laws of motion and gravity that removed the hand of God from its previous direct involvement in the heavens and also removed the significance of the planets. It was hard for anyone to believe that a body moving around the sun in an elliptical path had any influence on a person's life.

In the twentieth century, astrology has been most popular with the uneducated, but, unlike UFOs and psychic healing, it has not formed any significant part of the study of the paranormal. On the other hand, like biorhythms, it has provided some basis for the investigation of self-fulfilling prophecies and the effects of wishful thinking. Although it has long been lacking a supporting cosmology, astrology continues today. It continues to assume, now on faith alone, that the constellations in the sky at the time of birth are of some importance to an individual's life, and that the astrological month of birth affects (or even determines) the individual's personality.

In our age, astrology has remained a pretender to the status of a science, because careful, unbiased studies have yet to turn up any significant evidence to support it. No uniform correlation has been reliably shown between an astrological sign and a personality trait. Yet astrologers have continued to make and publish studies that claim to show, for example, that great leaders, or movie stars, or astronauts are mostly of one or another sign. The most common fault with these findings is that in any small group there is bound to be some random grouping of birthdates. Astrologists examine birthdates and then explain why so many of the group are of one sign. A scientific astrologer would first predict that group  $x$  is of sign  $y$ , and then examine the data. However, this would prove unfruitful, since astrological predictions, like psychic predictions, mostly fail. Predictors point to their few vaguely worded successes, but hide the percentage of their predictions that fail.

Astrologers' popularity is not unlike that of the one-arm bandit, whose occasional payoff justifies the gambler's loss over the long haul. One favorite rationale for failure is to say that there must have been some unknown (and unknowable) feature that threw the prediction off. The argument is strikingly similar to the shaman's excuse, when a spell fails, that counter-witchcraft must be working against the spell.

K./M.C.

ASURA. From the Sanskrit word for "titan" or "demon." In the earliest VEDIC literature, the term is applied to such gods as Varuna and INDRA, but later comes to be applied to beings associated with the underworld, darkness, and death, who are eternal antagonists of the DEVAS, or great gods of sky, light, and life. The chief asura is Vrtra, the dragon who was defeated by Indra, hero of the devas.

The famous myth of the churning of the milk ocean gives an explanation of the antipathy between devas and asuras. It tells us that the two classes of beings cooperated to churn the ocean and produce amrit, the nectar of immortality. But afterward they quarreled, and the devas cheated the asuras out of most of the precious drink, thus growing in power while their rivals diminished.

The trickery to which the devas resorted suggests that, while their function may be to fight on the side of light and life, they are not necessarily superior morally to their dark opponents. However, in the later mythology of the great saving gods who transcend the devas, asuras become more distinctly evil demons defeated by such AVATARS of VISHNU as Rama and KRISHNA.

R.E.

ATHALIAH. The name of the only queen ever to rule Judah in her own right. A granddaughter of Omri, king of Israel, and his Tyrian wife Jezebel, Athaliah had been given in marriage to Jehoram, king of Judah (II Kings 8:18, 25-26). After the deaths of her husband Jehoram (842 B.C.) and their son Ahaziah, who ruled Judah for less than one year, Athaliah herself assumed the throne (842-837 B.C.). To do so, she was obliged to murder all other members of the royal family (II Kings 11:1); however, a son of Ahaziah, Joash (11:2), also called Jehoash (11:21), was secretly saved by opponents of the queen. After six years, Jehoiaada, the priest, gathered the captains of the guard and introduced the seven-year-old prince to them (11:21). He then crowned the boy, and the guard cried, "Long live the king!" (11:12). Athaliah cried, "Treason!" when she heard and saw what had happened, but it was too late. She was executed, and the trappings and practices of Baalism, which she had introduced, were rooted out (11:13-20).

A nearly identical account is given in II Chronicles 22:10-23:21. I Chronicles 8:26 mentions in passing another Athaliah, a son of Jeroham a Benjaminite. Also a third person by the same name is listed among the returned exiles in Ezra 8:7.

W.S.T.

ATHANASIAN CREED. A doctrinal statement traditionally attributed to ATHANASIUS and sometimes called Quicumque Vult, after its first two words—"whoever wishes." It was not used in the Eastern churches until fairly recent times and was originally written in Latin rather than Greek. These and other reasons have led scholars to doubt that it was indeed written by Athanasius and to suggest such possible authors as AMBROSE OF MILAN, Vincent of Lerins, and others. The first half of the creed deals with the TRINITY and is addressed against ARIANISM. The latter part deals with CHRISTOLOGY, and its chief target is the views of the APOLLINARIANS.

J.G.

ATHANASIUS. Bishop of Alexandria from 328 to 373 and the chief opponent of ARIANISM. As a deacon and secretary to Bishop Alexander of Alexandria, he was present at the Council of Nicea, although not a member of the assembly. Even before the outbreak of the controversy, he had written a treatise On the Incarnation, which showed that his faith was grounded on the divinity of the one who became incarnate in Jesus, and that therefore he would find the views of Arius and his followers repugnant.

Probably of Coptic stock, he was so short and dark that his enemies called him the Black Dwarf. His contacts with the monks of the Egyptian desert, which may have begun at an early age, were extensive and repeatedly served him well, for there was a time when he hid among the monks from the authorities that sought to arrest him. He in turn contributed to the spread of the monastic idea with his Life of Anthony (see ANTHONY OF EGYPT).

His staunch defense of the Nicene faith and his refusal to buckle before civil authorities caused him to be exiled by CONSTANTINE, twice by Constantius, and then again by Julian and Valens. But he was not an inflexible man, and through careful theological negotiation and clarification he was eventually able to allay the fears of many who rejected the decisions of Nicea because they feared an extreme interpretation of the term HOMOIOUSION. Against Macedonius of Constantinople, who denied the divinity of the Spirit, Athanasius held the divinity of all three persons of the TRINITY. And, by rejecting the views of Apollin-arius, he played an important role in the early controversies regarding CHRISTOLOGY.

J.G.

ATHEISM. The denial that any reality is designated by what the religions call "God." More generally, one might say that atheism denies that the ultimate reality is personal, intelligent, purposive, or endowed with any of the attributes that have been traditionally ascribed to God or the gods.

Atheism had already emerged in ancient Greece, where Leucippus and Democritus taught that the final reality is "atoms and the void." However, it is in modern times that atheism has become a major force. It forms part of the official philosophy of Marxist countries and is also widespread in Western countries. Just as there have been many ideas of God, so there have been many forms of atheism, depending on what particular God is denied. This has led to some ambiguities. Both SOCRATES and some of the early Christians were charged with atheism because they were judged to have called in question the gods of classical religion, but they had their own belief in God and were certainly not "godless."

There are in fact intermediate positions between a thoroughgoing atheism and a fully developed belief in God. There is even the possibility of a religious atheism, a view which denies any personal God or spiritual Absolute, but which retains a feeling of reverence for the universe (Haeckel is a good exemplar of this point of view, though it would seem to be leaning toward PANTHEISM). The rise of modern atheism parallels the rise of science from the Renaissance onward. Modern science incorporates what has sometimes been called a methodological atheism; that is to say, it seeks to explain events within the world in terms of other events within the world, without appeal to any supernatural agency, such as God. Among the early scientists, a few inexplicable phenomena were still ascribed to divine intervention, but increasingly it was seen that the ideal of science must be to treat the world of nature as a self-regulating system to be explained on immanentist principles. This point of view is now virtually universal among educated people, and it is agreed that if there is a function for God, it cannot be that of a deus ex machina called in to explain some recondite phenomena of nature. In any case, this would be a very undignified role for God.

But atheism has gone beyond a methodological assumption, and throughout the nineteenth century the atheistic critique was extended to all forms of theistic religion. God might be explained as a projection of human ideals or even of the human father (FEUERBACH and FREUD). Or religion might be accounted for as a by-product of social and economic conditions (MARX and his followers). Or the idea of a transcendent God was held to be an obstacle to human freedom and transcendence, and it was pointed out that the human condition had been improved by science and human effort rather than by reliance on God (NIETZSCHE and SARTRE). These intellectual arguments for atheism combined with certain emotional feelings of rebellion against God. For some, the sheer evil and injustice of much that goes on in the world seemed a disproof of God's existence and called for "metaphysical rebellion" (CAMUS). It cannot be denied that many points in the atheistic critique have in fact touched on weaknesses and distortions in the ways people have thought about God and call for a radical rethinking of the concept of God, just as did the Hebrew prophets in their day.

Yet atheism is far from having established its case. It seems highly improbable that our universe owes its origin to a "chance collocation of atoms." The crude materialism on which nineteenth-century atheism was based has long since been discredited. As has been argued from PLOTINUS to WHITEHEAD, out of that kind of beginning no structured world could ever evolve.

J.M.

ATHENAGORAS. One of the Christian APOLOGISTS of the second century (about 177). Two of his works are extant, A Plea for the Christians and On the Resurrection of the Dead. Although he was not as profound as JUSTIN MARTYR, his Greek style is the best of all Christian writers of the second century.

J.G.

Courtesy of the American School of Classical Studies, Athens

The Parthenon at Athens

ATHENS. An important city in classical times located in southern Greece, and the cultural center of Greek philosophical thought and life from the time of SOCRATES, PLATO, and ARISTOTLE (fifth through fourth centuries B.C.). With the Roman conquest of Greece, Athens maintained its independence and had special treaty relations within the empire, retaining the judicial authority to decide its own affairs. Its status as a university city was acknowledged throughout the empire, though its intellectual life was on the decline at the time of the birth of Christianity. Nonetheless, it lived on its past heritage and its architectural glories, seen in the vast array of temples, statues, and monuments, which made it a good place to visit.

Courtesy of the American School of Classical Studies, Athens

General air view of Athens; the Agora is in the foreground, and the Acropolis is in the background.

Courtesy of the American School of Classical Studies, Athens

The Erechtheion on the Acropolis at Athens

Courtesy of the American School of Classical Studies, Athens

The Acropolis at Athens, viewed from the west, with the Areopagus (Mars' Hill) in the foreground

Courtesy of the American School of Classical Studies, Athens

Temple of the Greek god Hephaestus at Athens

Pausanias' Description of Greece, written in the second century A.D., still contains a lot of important information as to what the ancient city looked like in his day and served as a traveler's guidebook. In particular, Pausanias' descriptions of the agora (market place), the odeion (place for musical performances), and the stoa (or covered walkway) of Attalus II, where Peripatetic philosophers met and conversed, have all been confirmed by recent archaeological discoveries.

The attention of NT readers is drawn to the account of Acts 17:15-34, which describes Paul's visit to

Courtesy of the American School of Classical Studies, Athens

Athens from the southwest, showing the ruins of the Agora, with the restored Stoa of Attalus

Athens. The two sites specifically mentioned are the agora (17:17) and the AREOPAGUS (17:19), known from the KJV as Mars' Hill. There Paul met and spoke to an audience of popular philosophers. Recent discovery has made it more probable that this encounter took place at the scene of the northwest corner of the agora, near the Painted Colonnade (stoa poikile) from which the philosopher Zeno and his friends derived their name, the Stoics.

Paul's speech directed to Epicurean and Stoic philosophers is given in such a way as to show the appeal of the Christian message to Hellenistic thought. That God does not lack anything and has no need of human service is exactly what the Epicureans held. The Stoics would have applauded the teaching that the Divine is the source of all life. Paul is said even to have cited the poet Aratus for the axiom that men are the "offspring of God" (17:28) and that idolatry is to be rejected. But to no avail. The offensive claim (to Greek ears) was the resurrection of Jesus, which sounded no different to his hearers from a credulous belief in the resuscitation of a dead corpse. The irony is that on that very site in Athens, Apollo had been made to say (in Aeschylus' play cycle): "But when the earth has drunk up a man's blood / Once he is dead, there is no resurrection." Paul moved on to Corinth, leaving behind a few converts but no settled congregation.

R.M.

ATHOS, MOUNT. A community of twenty monasteries inhabited by GREEK ORTHODOX monks. It is located on a promontory, which juts out from the

Courtesy of Religious News Service

Mount Athos

Macedonian mainland into the Aegean Sea. Many art treasures and ancient and medieval manuscripts are preserved there. The first monastery was founded in A.D. 963. No women or female animals are allowed into the monasteries.

K.C.

ATMAN. A fundamental Hindu philosophical term referring to the most profound substratum or constituent of personality, the pure essence of consciousness and being prior to mental content or activity of KARMA. In VEDANTA thought the atman is said to be one with BRAHMAN, the universal consciousness and absolute. Though rejected by some, this idea has had very great influence.

R.E.

ATONEMENT. A central doctrine in both biblical theology and the formulation of the Christian message. In its essence the Anglo-Saxon work (at-one-ment, that is, making "at one") refers to the restoration of harmonious relations between God and humankind, fractured by reason of human disobedience and alienation. The term is akin to RECONCILIATION (the restoring of mutual friendship), but with the extra dimension that atonement also suggests the procedures by which God and humankind are reunited.

Atonement in the Old Testament. The main Hebrew idea is contained in the verb "to cover" (kpr), which is usually translated "atone" (for example, Lev. 16:11, 20). The offending matter, which must be covered, is human transgression of the divine ordinance. Sometimes such ordinances are cultic and ceremonial, but the best OT insights go deeper and search out the basic flaw in human nature. This is discovered in humanity's disobedience to God's moral commands, which are designed for humankind's well-being both individually and in society. Above all, sin for the prophets of Israel in particular is that which displeases God (Jer. 44:4), and so transgression takes on a more personal aspect of what humans are and do as wayward children and rebellious sons or daughters (Hosea's prophecy is full of such echoes; see also Isa. 1:2-3).

Atonement, therefore, is needed because of humanity's persistent and incorrigible desire to go their own way (Isa. 53:6). What is needed specifically is for sin to be covered from God's righteous and holy eyes (Hab. 1:13), and the provider of such a covering is none other than God, as the important wording of Leviticus 17:11 makes plain. These summary statements may be said to epitomize the essential teachings of the OT writers, with the exception that in the postexilic period Israel's consciousness of national guilt and failure increased, and there was a tendency to spell out that failure in terms of cultic infraction rather than personal relationship with Israel's God.

Atonement in the New Testament. As background to the NT teaching, we should observe the contribution of intertestamental writers who influenced the thinking of the Jewish rabbis in the first century A.D. Jewish scholars promised that Atonement could be achieved by four methods: repentance, sacrifice, suffering, and death. All these words became part of the NT vocabulary as its writers sought to explain what had happened in the divine purpose at the cross of Jesus where Atonement for Christians is without exception located.

REPENTANCE is made the prerequisite to Atonement and is a token of a person's sincerity and desire to turn from sin and start on a new way of life. John the Baptist emphasized the seriousness of the nation's wrongs and the need to start over again (Matt. 3:7-12). Jesus picked up on this theme in his call, though with more stress on the good news that accompanied the call, namely that since God is gracious and willing to save, men and women should want to turn to him ("turning to God" is the essence of repentance for later NT writers; see Acts 2:38; 3:19; 11:18; 20:21; 26:20; II Tim. 2:25; 26; II Pet. 3:9).

Sacrifice is the key idea in Christian Atonement theology, and the cultic-ceremonial flavor is seen notably in Paul's allusions (I Cor. 5:7-8; I Pet. 2:4-10). But the chief writer to explore the Christianized teaching on sacrifice is the author of Hebrews. For this author Christ's one offering on the altar of the cross has brought an end to all Levitical sacrifices offered to restore humanity to God's favor (see Heb. 9:11-28). The Hebrew idea of "covering" is replaced by sin's final removal, already foreshadowed in Jeremiah 31:31-34 (cited in Heb. 8). Yet a person's gratitude and desire to live for God are matching responses, and it is possible that eucharistic ideas are part of what Hebrews 13:10, 15 teaches as human acceptance of Christ's sacrifice. Certainly in the later centuries "sacrifice" became a regular understanding of what the Eucharist celebrates.

Suffering and death are the focuses of Atonement for all the NT writers, with reference to Christ's death on the cross. The early credal statement (I Cor. 15:3-5) is but one answer to the question: Why did Jesus die? It responds, "He died for our sins," whether in the sense of the suffering servant of Isaiah 53, who vicariously bore the sins of the many, or of martyrs who gave their lives in a representative way for the nation's good (an idea from 4 Maccabees, sometimes believed to be in view at Mark 10:45). All the NT literature, with diverse emphases, agrees that Christ's passion (a theme in I Pet. that says often, "Christ suffered," as an exhortation to a suffering church) and death are the ground of human forgiveness and divine reconciliation, whereby the past record of failure and coming short of divine standards is put away. The death of Christ is the ground on which God is both righteous and the one who sets sinners in right relationship with themselves (Rom. 3:24-26). And with a single voice the various writers state exultantly that this Atonement derives from God's heart of love (Rom. 5:1-10; I John 4:712), and it must evoke an answering response of love and faith (Gal. 5:6), leading to new life (Rom. 6:1-23).

R.M.

ATONEMENT, DAY OF. See DAY OF ATONEMENT.

ATONEMENT, THEORIES OF. The doctrine of atonement gives expression to the belief that the saving work of Christ, especially his passion and death, has overcome the ALIENATION between God and the human race. Thus this doctrine implies that Christ's saving work has obtained FORGIVENESS of sins and effected RECONCILIATION.

The doctrine has always had a central place in Christian theology, but it has been expressed in a variety of ways. For a thousand years, the classic or dramatic theology of atonement prevailed. On this view, the cross was the climax of Christ's struggle against the demonic forces which, since the FALL, had held the world in subjection. Christ's cross and resurrection broke the power of the demons and liberated the human race from sin and death. This is the teaching found in IRENAEUS and other patristic writers. GREGORY OF NYSS elaborated the theory into the idea that the death of Christ was a ransom paid to the devil as the price of human liberation.

These ancient views were challenged by ANSELM in the eleventh century. He introduced a new theology of atonement, based on legal concepts and strictly argued. The honor of God had been infringed by human sin. Even if humans repented and turned away from sin, this would not effect reconciliation, for the past affront to God would remain. In no way could this be put right from the human side, for it would require a "satisfaction" which humans could not give. This legal term "satisfaction" is at the center of Anselm's view, and it means an extra payment or compensation. God alone could provide this satisfaction, but since it was owed by humans, Anselm argued to the necessity of a God-human. It was his belief that only such a one would have the power to offer satisfaction and at the same time belong to the human race, which owed satisfaction. Christ, being sinless, had no need to die, so his death is that extra payment to God, satisfying God for the sins of the world.

Ansatid cross

Latin cross

Papal cross

Patriarchal cross

Chi-Rho monogram

Russian cross

St. Anthony's cross

Crusaders' cross

*Jesus Christ the Conqueror
Monogram*

Greek cross

St. Andrew's cross

*Orb
and Cross*

*Jesus
Monogram*

Various Historic Crosses

A new shift in the doctrine took place at the time of the Reformation. The concepts were still legal, but the death of Christ was now seen as a punishment that he took upon himself in place of sinful humankind. This is the view known as "penal substitution." CALVIN expressed it by writing that Christ "bore the weight of God's vengeance." The sins of humanity were imputed to him, while his righteousness was imputed to us. Not long after the time of Anselm, an alternative view of atonement was expressed by ABELARD in a commentary on Romans; but this alternative was left unheeded until modern times when it attracted the attention of liberal theologians. In Abelard's view, the death of Jesus is to be understood as a supreme manifestation of love, designed to kindle love in human hearts, consequently bringing them to God. Among modern exponents of this so-called "moral influence" theory may be mentioned Hastings Rashdall.

A distinctive understanding of atonement was developed in the nineteenth century by John McLeod Campbell, some of his ideas being later taken up by R. C. Moberly. Campbell was dissatisfied with the legalism and harshness of the Calvinist teaching, and tried to find personal categories instead. He shifted attention from the physical death of Christ on Calvary to his mental agony in Gethsemane, which he interpreted as a perfect act of contrition and penitence for the sins of the world. Campbell also stressed what he called the "prospective aspect" of atonement as a present ongoing reality, in opposition to the view that it was a "once-for-all" event of the past. This enabled him to move away from the idea of Christ as a substitute to the more fruitful thought that he is a representative or pioneer who opens up a way of penitence and reconciliation which human beings can then follow themselves.

This in turn points toward existential views of atonement (see EXISTENTIALISM) as found in such twentieth-century writers as BULTMANN, who speaks of "making Christ's cross one's own." Though these different theologies of atonement have been regarded in the past as rival theories, they are more likely today to be considered as alternative forms of imagery, though one may still argue about which imagery is the most adequate.

J.M.

ATTRITION. In Catholic theology a preparation for the grace of love that brings forth CONTRITION, or genuine sorrow for sin. Attrition is a state of unease over one's sinful conduct, motivated by fear of God's punishment. Attrition is not a deep enough sorrow for the wrongs done to prompt amendment of life.

J.C.

AUGSBURG CONFESSION. The first confessional writing produced during the age of the REFORMATION of the sixteenth century. Written by PHILIP MELANCHTHON as a summary, in irenic form, of the teachings of MARTIN LUTHER, the Augustana represents the common belief of those who accepted Luther's theology. It was prepared in 1530 for presentation at the Diet of Augsburg, on June 25, a diet that Luther could not attend because he was under the ban of the Holy Roman Empire. The subject of much debate and some misunderstandings among early PROTESTANTS, the Augustana is the fundamental confessional platform of world Lutheranism (see LUTHERAN CHURCHES).

In January 1530, the emperor CHARLES V invited the German Diet to assemble at Augsburg to begin discussions that might end the religious struggles in the empire. Luther had been declared a heretic by the DIET OF WORMS in 1521; but Duke Frederick of Saxony, and later Duke John, protected Luther. Charles wanted to compose the differences outstanding in a peaceful way because the Turks were threatening his empire.

When the diet was called, the Protestants felt that they should clearly state their beliefs and the grounds of their dispute with the Roman church. Duke John ordered Melanchthon and other theologians to draw up a statement. Later, Melanchthon drafted a preface to the "Torgau articles" (dealing with abuses) and the "Schwabach articles" (written by Luther), which confessed the Protestant faith. This became the Augsburg Confession, after revisions were made to include all the Protestant territories that embraced Luther's teaching. They requested the right to sign the Augsburg Confession also. The text faithfully reflects the teaching of Martin Luther and other Lutheran theologians and not simply Melanchthon's alone.

The Augsburg Confession is in two parts. The first deals with the traditional Catholic doctrines confessed by the Lutherans (Articles I-XXI), and the second discusses the abuses in Roman church practice that Protestants believed should be corrected (Articles XXII-XXVIII). Throughout the Confession there is a conciliatory spirit that holds open the hope that Rome and Wittenberg may join in reforming the whole church to the glory of God and the benefit of all parties.

J.C.

AUGUSTINE/AUGUSTINIANISM. One of the most influential theologians in the entire history of Western Christianity, and the theology and philosophy patterned after his thought.

He was born in A.D. 354 in the small town of Tagaste, in North Africa. His mother, MONICA, was a Christian who prayed constantly for the conversion of her son. After some studies at nearby Madaura, he went to Carthage, which was then the intellectual and economic center of North Africa. There he continued his studies and took a concubine, who gave him a son and with whom he continued a relationship until Monica practically forced him to leave her many years later. In Carthage he was attracted to MANICHAEISM, whose doctrines seemed more rational than those of Christianity, but he never went beyond the level of a "hearer" in the Manichaean community. Eventually, he decided that Manichaeism did not really solve his innermost quest and left it. His career as a teacher of rhetoric then took him to Rome and later to Milan. During this period he became interested in NEOPLATONISM, which solved his doubts regarding the origin of evil and the nature of God and the soul.

The Pierpont Morgan Library (Manuscript No. 399, Folio No. 299 v)

Augustine of Hippo

In Milan, the preaching of AMBROSE dissolved his last doubts. He was then ready to become a Christian but found that he did not have the strength of will to follow the Christian life. It was then that, in a garden in Milan, he heard the voice of a child crying, "take up and read." Reading a text from Romans, he felt that he now had the strength to give up his former life and become a Christian. After having been baptized by Ambrose, he returned to North Africa with his son and some close friends. His mother died as they were preparing to leave Italy. In North Africa, Augustine and his friends lived in a monastic community, devoted to meditation and contemplation. Then, against his will, he was made a presbyter in the town of Hippo Regius and later a bishop. He died in A.D. 430, as the Vandals were besieging the city.

Augustine's theology is a combination of the earlier teachings of the church with Neoplatonism. In its concrete content, it was deeply influenced by his polemics against Manichaeism, PELAGIANISM, and Donatism. Also, the fall of Rome in 410 led him to write The City of God, in which he sought to refute the claim of some pagans that Rome had fallen because it had become Christian.

From Neoplatonism Augustine derived his doctrine of God, whom he conceived in terms of the Neoplatonic "ineffable One," as well as his theory of the incorporeity of the soul. This latter view, which later became commonplace among Christians, was at first rejected by many as an unbiblical innovation. Also from the Neoplatonists, he derived his view of evil as not a substance but rather a deprivation of good. Every creature is in itself good, for it is made by God. But the corruption of the goodness of a creature is what we call evil.

Against the Pelagians, Augustine developed his doctrine of GRACE and PREDESTINATION. He felt that their view of human capabilities was too positive. Although before the "Fall" humans were free both to sin and not to sin, in our fallen condition we are free only to sin. It is the grace of Jesus Christ that restores in us the freedom not to sin, which will be the only freedom we shall have in the Kingdom. This means that fallen humans cannot of themselves decide to do good, to believe in God, or to receive grace. In our fallen state, God's grace must operate in us the will to accept it. And, once we do, it must cooperate with our will so that our works may be good. Since this grace does not depend on our will, Augustine concludes that it is irresistible, and this in turn leads him to the doctrine of predestination. This, however, does not mean that he holds to predeterminism, nor that he denies the existence of free will. On the contrary, he rejected Manichaean DETERMINISM and insisted that within its limits in each of our various stages as human beings, our will is free to determine itself. As he would put it, "the will is its own cause."

Against the DONATISTS, Augustine developed his understanding of the church and of the validity of the sacraments, quite apart from the worthiness of the person who administers them. Also, against the more extreme Circumcellion, he developed the theory of the just war, which would be very influential in later discussions on issues of war and peace.

The meaning of the term "Augustinianism" varies according to its context. It can be applied first of all to those who defended Augustine's teachings immediately after his death, when his views on the incorporeity of the soul were rejected by many and when the Semi-Pelagians questioned his doctrines of grace and predestination. At a later time, particularly after the reintroduction of Aristotle into western Europe in the thirteenth century, it was applied to those who held to the more traditional views, particularly on issues of epistemology. Finally, in Protestant circles, and particularly among Calvinists, it means those who affirm irresistible grace, unconditional predestination, and human depravity. It has also been used in a similar manner by those within Roman Catholicism who have held similar views, particularly the Jansenists. The truth of the matter is that neither Catholics nor Protestants have ever held to the entirety of Augustine's teachings on salvation, for while Catholics have rejected his views on irresistible grace and its consequences, Protestants have rejected his understanding that we are saved by doing good works with the cooperation of grace.

J.G.

AUGUSTINE OF CANTERBURY. Missionary sent to England in A.D. 596 by Pope Gregory the Great. Although Christianity had existed in Britain during Roman times and continued to exist, it had lost most of its contact with the Continent. Thus, although Augustine won the conversion of King Ethelbert of Kent and this became the base of operations for missions to other kingdoms, the significance of the work of Augustine and his successors lies mostly in his having brought British Christianity into conformity with the rest of the Western church. Augustine was made archbishop of CANTERBURY in Kent, which consequently became the main episcopal see in England.

J.G.

AUGUSTUS (63 B.C.—A.D. 14). The surname conferred by the Roman senate upon Caius Julius Caesar Octavianus, on January 17, A.D. 27, for his eminent services in restoring the Roman republic. The great-uncle of Octavian was Julius Caesar (102–44 B.C.), a connection that cleared the way for his rapid advancement. After Caesar's assassination Octavian learned that the dictator had made him his heir and adopted him, whereby he acquired the title Gaius Julius Caesar Octavianus.

Courtesy of the American Numismatic Society

Coin with head of Augustus

In the struggle to fulfill his destiny, Octavian made skillful use of competitors for power, while assisting none. After Mark Anthony's dalliance with Cleopatra, the decisive battle was fought at Actium in 31 B.C., which made Octavian "the master of all." In the East, Herod's support of Anthony made his position precarious, but Octavian recognized Herod's abilities, appointed him rex socius (an allied king), and extended Herod's territories to the limits held by David and Solomon a thousand years earlier. It was Augustus who divided Herod's kingdom among his sons and denied Archelaus the title king, ordering his deportation in A.D. 6.

The political contexts of Paul's missions were established by Augustus in his reorganization of the Roman provinces. Luke reports that the apostle worked at the Colonia Augusta Iulia Philippensis, was arraigned before its chief magistrates (praetors), and beaten by its police (lictors) (Acts 16:12, 22, 35).

J.P.

AULÉN, GUSTAF (1879–1977). With ANDERS NYGREN the foremost leader of the influential Swedish LUNDENSIAN THEOLOGY. Aulén served as professor of theology at Uppsala (1907–13), at Lund (1913–33), and as bishop of Strängnäs (1933–52). His two most influential works are The Faith of the Christian Church (U.S. ed. 1948) and Christus Victor, a classic study of the Atonement.

J.L.

AURICULAR CONFESSION. Oral confession, made to a priest in the Roman Catholic Church. It was ordered by Pope Leo the Great in place of public confession. The Fourth Lateran Council made it obligatory for all Catholics every year. To neglect it is to court excommunication and loss of Christian burial.

J.C.

AUROBINDO (1872–1950; full name Sri Aurobindo Ghose). Scholar, political activist, and spiritual philosopher. In all stages of Aurobindo's life the dominant issue was response to the overwhelming reality confronting one of his time and place, the meeting of East and West. He responded to the presence of the West in his native India as an assiduous student of its lore, as a revolutionary resister, and finally as a philosophical synthesizer.

Born in Calcutta, Aurobindo enjoyed a brilliant academic career both in India and England, culminating in a professorship at Baroda College. Beginning around 1902, he embarked on a campaign of agitation against British rule, which led to his imprisonment for sedition in 1908. While in jail, Aurobindo pursued the study of YOGA. Upon his release, he retired to the French enclave of Pondicherry in south India, where he established an ashram, or spiritual community, and devoted himself entirely to yoga and philosophy.

Aurobindo's prolific writings, of which the Life Divine is the most important, present a complex philosophy of spiritual evolution. Souls of divine essence have evolved through the worlds of matter, life, and mind to become humans on their long trek back to God. Now, with the help of yoga and divine enlightenment from above, we must evolve on to the planes of super mind and pure spirit. Both individuals and humanity as a whole are making this toilsome but all-important journey. Aurobindo's thought, which has been compared to that of HEGEL and TELHARD DE CHARDIN, represents a significant meeting of Western evolutionism and Eastern spirituality.

R.E.

AUTHORITY, RELIGIOUS. In any community of faith, there must be some recognized authority that has the power to pronounce about matters of belief and practice and to settle disputes about such matters. Most religions claim to go back to some original REVELATION by God that would be authoritative for the religion in its subsequent history. But since such revelations were given in the more or less remote past, they have to be mediated in one way or another. Christianity claims to be founded in the revelation of God in Christ and acknowledges Christ as the head of the church. God's word would therefore be authoritative, but that word has to be mediated through some secondary authority.

The authority of the BIBLE comes in at this point, since it testifies to Christ and to the whole Judeo-Christian experience of God. So if the Bible reports that Jesus forbade divorce, that is taken by many as authoritative. But the Bible is ambiguous on many points (including Christ's teaching on divorce) so it is in fact supplemented by tradition. Though in the Protestant churches the Bible has sometimes had sole authority, in Catholicism TRADITION ranks alongside the Bible. Since Vatican II, however, tradition is not regarded as a separate mediation of the revelation, but is rather considered as the church's own elucidation of the same revelation as is found in the Bible.

In the Roman Catholic church the magisterium of the church, that is to say, its present teaching, especially the teaching of the POPE, has a high degree of authority unparalleled in Protestant churches. Reliance on external authority has been breaking down in every field of human activity since the ENLIGHTENMENT, and the new attitude found expression in matters of religion through the work of SCHLEIERMACHER. He made experience the final court of appeal. If we accept a doctrine or practice, it is because the experience of the believing community has demonstrated its salvific value, not because it is prescribed by the Bible or the tradition. It is important to note that Schleiermacher's appeal is to corporate experience and is quite different from the individualistic experience of the enthusiast who claims some inward spiritual illumination that overrides all other authorities. Perhaps we could not ascribe any authority or even meaning to the Bible and the tradition were there not something in our own experience that confirms their teaching. Perhaps too we could not accept their teaching if it went against the deliverances of our own reason and conscience.

Yet this is not to say that the traditional sources of authority are superseded. It does however suggest that in religious matters, as already in secular matters, authority should be composite and diffused, rather than monolithic. Neither the Bible nor the pope nor reason nor the opinions of scholars can be decisive separately. These different sources of authority have to be allowed to check one another if we are to arrive at a balanced decision on doubtful questions.

J.M.

AUTHORIZED VERSION (AV). See KING JAMES VERSION.

AUTOCEPHALIC. A self-governing Orthodox church with the right to name its bishops and the head of the church. The Canon demands that the church originate in a previously independent church, be located in a country independent from the mother church, and have a hierarchy of three duly appointed bishops.

J.C.

AUTONOMY (autos "self" + nomos "law"). Having or making one's own laws, independence, and self-governance. In religion, autonomy is associated with the revolt, in the eighteenth-century ENLIGHTENMENT, against the authority of the established churches. IMMANUEL KANT called for "man's release from his self-incurred tutelage," meaning "man's inability to make use of his understanding without direction from another." The duty of autonomy meant refusing to entertain any belief that was not warranted by rational evidence and personal experience. Opposed to autonomy is HETERONOMY (heteros = "other") or the imposition of authority or sanctions upon oneself from another—for example, the Bible or the church—which one would not impose if one were truly free and rational. More recently PAUL TILlich has used autonomy and heteronomy in his theological analysis of culture. He contrasts them to theonomy or autonomous reason, which is realized in obedience to the very law and ground of its being or God. THEONOMY is, then, the quest for revelation.

J.L.

AV. See HEBREW CALENDAR.

AVALOKITESVARA. A BODHISATTVA who is especially loved and worshiped in Tibet, China, Korea, and Japan. This Sanskrit name means "Lord who looks down [to hear and answer prayer]," and it was translated into Chinese as Kwan Yin.

Since a bodhisattva is a being who has lived many lifetimes and has moved beyond the distinction between self and others, Avalokitesvara's mind can move freely through all things without being distracted. Avalokitesvara is especially known for great compassion, and worshipers can call him to their aid by reciting a MANTRA. In PURE LAND BUDDHISM the Avalokitesvara assists Amida Buddha in welcoming souls into the Pure Land, or Western Paradise.

By the twelfth century A.D. Chinese Buddhists had come to think of Avalokitesvara as a feminine figure, and from that time on paintings and statues usually show her as radiant, gracious, and serene. She has often been called the Goddess of Mercy, and throughout the Far East women give her special attention. They call on her in times of trouble and ask her for protection in childbirth and for other blessings.

Many statues show the bodhisattva wearing royal garments and holding a lotus blossom in one hand. Others show the figure with six or more arms, symbolizing the power to save, or with multiple heads and eyes, symbolizing the power to see all and to know all. Statues may be in a standing or seated position.

K.C.

AVARICE. One of the seven cardinal or "deadly" sins, consisting of an excessive love of wealth or possessions. Like the other CARDINAL SINS, avarice, or greed, is a distorted form of love. It is opposed to the virtue of liberality. The NT often speaks of the dangers of inordinate concern for wealth and possessions. Jesus taught that "a man's life does not consist in the abundance of his possessions" (Luke 12:15) and warned that "it is easier for a camel to go through the eye of a needle than for a rich man to enter the kingdom of God" (Matt. 19:24). One cannot serve God and mammon (Matt. 6:24). Avarice calls to mind the image of the rich but insecure and reclusive miser, fingering his gold. It is not a coincidence that the Latin miser, meaning a greedy, stingy person, comes from the same root as "miserable." A miser is a miserable, wretched person—a Scrooge.

Avarice is making an idol of wealth and possessions and is sinful because such excessive possessiveness, by subordinating all else to its achievement, corrupts the moral life. It is the sin that the avaricious confessed to Dante: "Our eyes would never seek the height, / Being bent on earthly matters"; so that "love of all true good was quenched in us / By avarice, and our works were left undone." The inordinate love of possessions may not, however, be an end in itself. It may be a means to secure fame, power, popularity, or pleasure. Thomas Aquinas believed avarice to be a sin of the practical man rather than of the philosopher or the theoretically inclined person.

However, in our highly commercial, acquisitive society few would seem to be free of its temptations. Psychologists tell us that unbridled economic competition, with its attendant insecurity and fear of failure, leads to an intensified quest for possessions. One of the evils of being "possessed by the love of possessions" is a self-absorption that closes a person off from one's neighbor in real need. The fruit of avarice is "hardness of heart" toward the widow, the orphan, and the poor. The needy are forgotten and unnecessary poverty and suffering are allowed to persist. The sins of avarice often are the sins of omission. Like the other deadly sins, avarice is self-love in one of its most dangerous forms.

J.L.

AVATARS. From the Sanskrit word for "descent." In HINDUISM, the appearances of gods in the world in animal or human form to instruct, to awaken devotion, and, typically, to defeat some particular demonic evil that is present. The concept first appears in the BHAGAVAD GITA, where KRISHNA declares that "whenever DHARMA declines," he takes a body to enter the world and rectify matters. Avatars are most commonly associated with VISHNU. Vaishnava (Vishnuite) mythological literature presents a widely accepted list of ten avatars, including several animal and semi-human forms. This list culminates in Rama, Krishna, the BUDDHA (here seen however as a strange sort of avatar whose business was to lead the weak into a false religion, thus maintaining the purity of Hinduism), and the coming avatar, Kalki, who will appear as a triumphant king at the end of our age.

Hindu thought tends to hold that the bodies of avatars are made of a pure, transcendent substance, or are even illusory projections, and so they cannot be deemed incarnations in a strict sense. On the other hand, many modern Hindus are prepared to broaden the concept to include any great person through whom God has been revealed to the world, and speak freely of such men as JESUS, GANDHI, or RAMAKRISHNA as avatars.

R.E.

AVE MARIA. Latin for "Hail, Mary." The Ave Maria is based on the salutation of the angel to Mary in Luke 1:28, when she is told she is to become the mother of Christ. The Hail Mary is a prayer to the Virgin MOTHER OF GOD, often repeated in the Roman Catholic Church. The prayer developed between the sixth and the sixteenth centuries, becoming a standard prayer in the eleventh century. It was not until the thirteenth century, however, that the prayer was generally adopted throughout Western Christendom.

The usual words of the prayer are: "Hail, Mary, full of grace, the Lord is with you. Blessed are you among women, and blessed is the fruit of your womb, Jesus. Holy Mary, Mother of God, pray for us sinners now and at the hour of our death. Amen." Although sometimes sung as an anthem in Protestant churches, this prayer is not usually used by Protestants.

J.C.

AVERROES (Ibn-Rushd). The foremost Muslim philosopher of the Middle Ages, whose views conflicted both with orthodox Islam and with orthodox Christianity. Born in Cordoba, Spain, in 1126, late in his life he was banished because of his unorthodox views. A devoted student and follower of ARISTOTLE, he wrote commentaries on the works of the great philosopher, and later generations knew him as the Commentator.

His views conflicted with Muslim and Christian orthodoxy on three main points. First, he insisted on the autonomy of reason to pursue philosophical inquiry, apart from any guidance by faith. Second, he declared the world to be eternal and thus contradicted the doctrine of creation out of nothing. Finally, by affirming the "unity of the active intellect"—that is, of all rational beings—he contradicted the doctrine of individual life after death. His views, introduced from Spain to Christian Europe, created quite a stir, particularly at the University of Paris, where theologians such as BONAVENTURE and THOMAS AQUINAS sought to refute the views of the Latin Averroists. He died in Morocco in 1198, having been reconciled with the authorities, and was buried in Cordoba.

J.G.

AVESTA. The principal sacred book of the Zoroastrians. It is a collection of hymns, prayers, invocations, and instructions for ritual and moral practice.

Hymns called Gathas are probably the oldest portion of the Avesta. They have been accepted as the most reliable record we have of the beliefs and practices of the prophet Zoroaster, who lived around 600 B.C. (see ZOROASTRIANISM). They present a demand for righteousness (although that is not clearly defined) and tell of the reward for righteousness at the end of the age. They also tell us about the god AHURA MAZDA.

The text of the Avesta has gone through a long process of transmission. It probably took its present form between the third and seventh centuries A.D. Tradition indicates that there was a fuller version in ancient times, but it was lost when Alexander the Great conquered Persia in 331 B.C.

K.C.

AVICENNA. A Persian philosopher and physician (980-1037) whose works, translated into Latin in the twelfth and thirteenth centuries, were influential in late medieval philosophy and theology. In his philosophy he combined elements taken from ARISTOTLE with others derived from NEOPLATONISM. He distinguished between the necessary being, whose existence belongs to its essence, and contingent beings, whose existence is an accident. But then, arguing that creation is an act of the necessary being, and that nothing in that being is contingent, he came to the conclusion that created beings, although contingent in themselves, are necessary results of the necessary being, and therefore he affirmed eternal creation. His arguments were used by the Latin Averroists of Paris in the thirteenth century. J.G.

AVIDYA. From the Sanskrit word for "not seeing." In philosophical HINDUISM and BUDDHISM, ignorance in the sense of not rightly perceiving the true nature of Reality. This ignorance is the root impediment to salvation or liberation. Its opposite, VIDYA ("seeing") or jnana ("knowledge" or "wisdom") is not simply correct factual information, but profoundly experienced spiritual insight that discriminates aright between illusion and Reality.

In the earlier VEDAS, avidya refers merely to ignorance of the correct performance of rites. In the UPANISHADS, the philosophical meaning begins to appear; among other references, we are told that those lost in avidya are like dreamers. In the classic Advaita Vedanta (non-dualist) philosophy of Shankara, any supposed knowledge based upon distinctions (for example, between subject and object, God and the world) is declared to be avidya, not conducive to realization that BRAHMAN (God) is the sole Reality and the ground of all being. In Buddhism, avidya is the first of the twelve stages in the chain of causation by which one falls into egocentricity, birth, desire, and suffering. It is thus their ultimate cause.

R.E.

AVIGNON. A city in southern France that belonged to the popes, and where the PAPACY resided from 1305-78. When the papacy returned to Rome, rival popes were set up at Avignon, and thus began the GREAT SCHISM. The last of the popes of Avignon, Benedict XIII, died in exile in 1423.

J.G.

AXIOLOGY. From the Greek axios, "value or worth," the term is used in modern philosophy to designate the theory or study of value. Axiology has been used in a confusing variety of ways, from a study of goodness or value in general, to a discussion of various realms of value, to a more narrow application to specific types of ethical analysis. In the eighteenth century the term "value" was principally associated with political economy, for example in Adam Smith's use of exchange value. In the late nineteenth century the term value began to be used more widely, but also more variously, by philosophers like Hermann Lotze and F. NIETZSCHE. A. RITSCHL made value judgments the key to his theology, distinguishing them from scientific judgments of fact. According to Ritschl, causal or scientific judgments and value judgments proceed simultaneously, and both are indispensable to knowledge.

W. M. Urban popularized value theory in America, his Valuation, Its Nature and Laws (1909) being the first treatise on the subject in English. Another important early work on the subject was Ralph Barton Perry's General Theory of Value (1926). The analysis of value or the good has produced numerous distinctions, for example, between extrinsic or instrumental value (as a means) and intrinsic value, or value as an end in itself; between hedonistic and non-hedonistic value; between subjective (because it is valued) and objective value (because it has value independent of human interest); or between the cognitive or factual and noncognitive status of value judgments. Noncognitivists, such as A. J. Ayer and Bertrand Russell, regard value judgments as expressions of emotion or desire, while other noncognitivists, such as R. M. Hare, hold that value judgments are essentially prescriptions or recommendations.

Philosophers have given a variety of answers to the question of what is ultimately or intrinsically good. A hedonist, such as Epicurus or J. S. Mill would say it is pleasure; Kant, a good will; Augustine and Aquinas, the vision of God; Nietzsche, power; while a pragmatist would locate it in growth or adjustment itself. Many philosophers, from Plato to G. E. Moore, are "pluralists" in that they regard many things to be valuable or good in themselves, including knowledge, beauty, freedom, friendship, and virtue.

J.L.

AXIOM. That which is self-evident, unnecessary to belabor a point to prove, and commending itself to reason. An axiom is a principle universally accepted, hence a statement of a truth. In logic it refers to any proposition, regardless of whether it be true. In mathematics, as well as in some philosophy, it is a proposition that does not have to be proved but is immediately accepted as valid or true.

I.C.

AYATOLLAH. In SHIITE ISLAM a scholar of religious law who on his own authority issues rulings on religious belief and practice. The broader term for such a scholar is "mujtahid." A mujtahid who attracts a large following can take the title of ayatollah (literally "sign of God"). His followers regard him as the most learned person of his age, an example of righteousness and piety. His authority rests on that of the infallible Shi'ite IMAM, or supreme leader. The imam is not usually accessible. He may have withdrawn from this world entirely, or he may be living concealed in the present world because of the hostility of God's enemies.

In the Iranian revolution of the late 1970s several ayatollahs were prominent. The most important of them was Ayatollah Khomeini. His followers often addressed him as Imam. K.C.

AZARIAH, VEDANAIKAM SAMUEL (1875-1945). A native leader of the Christian movement in India. Azariah was born the son of a village pastor and a mother who greatly influenced his faith. He was affected in his public life by Sherwood Eddy, a United States Christian leader. After years of work with the YMCA, he accepted Anglican ordination and in 1912 became the first Indian bishop of the Anglican church. The church grew under his leadership, and he represented younger churches at many ecumenical and international gatherings. His book, Christian Giving, originally written in Tamil, has been translated into fifty languages. W.G.

Bb

BAAL (meaning "master," "lord," "husband," and signifying ownership).

The term "Baal" often appears in the OT in combination with the names of places, such as Baal-peor (Num. 25:3, 5; Deut. 4:3) and Baal-hermon (Judg. 3:3). Baal is sometimes coupled with characteristic functions, such as Baal-berith, "lord of the covenant" (Judg. 8:33; 9:4) and Baal-zebub, "lord of the flies" (II Kings 1:2; compare Matt.

10:25). Some Baals were given individual names, such as Dagon (Judg. 16:23; I Sam. 5:2), Hadad, and Melqart of Tyre, probably the Baal whom Jezebel worshiped (I Kings 16:31).

In the Ugaritic tablets, the youthful Baal has the name Hadad, god of winter rains, most prominent in the fertility cults. He bears the title "rider of the clouds" (compare Ps. 104:3). His chief enemy is Mot (death), god of the rainless season and the nether world. El, the senior god, was supreme in social and moral matters, according to the Ugaritic mythology.

From Atlas of the Bible (Thomas Nelson & Sons Limited)

View of the Great Court of the Altar or Parthenon of the Acropolis at Baalbek

In Canaan, Baal was associated with ASHERAH (plural, Asheroth; Greek, Astarte), wife of El and mother of the gods. At Ras Shamrah, Baal-Hadad's sister-consort was Anath (or Anat), the cruel goddess of sex and war. Mount Cassius, north of Ugarit, was the Canaanite Olympus, home of the gods.

The sensuous Baal fertility cult, with its lasciviousness, was uniformly condemned by all the prophets from Elijah to the exile (Hos. 2:17; Jer. 19:5). The influence of Baal worship appears to have been strong in the period of the Judges, the times of Ahab and Jezebel (I Kings 18), and in the eighth century (Hos. 2). Hezekiah and Josiah suppressed the practices, but mention of Baalism continues into the early days of the exile (as Tammuz, Ezek. 8:14) and in the Persian period (Zech. 12:11).

The statues of Baal from Ugarit and Phoenicia represent him as a young man posed almost in the posture of Zeus at Olympia. His helmet bears horns; the bull is his special animal. He wears a short kilt and carries in his left hand a stylized lightning bolt for a spear and in his right hand a mace or club, the thunderstick (compare "thy rod and thy staff," Ps. 23:4). On his pedestal, there are wavy lines representing mountains (compare Yahweh "treads on the heights of the earth," Amos 4:13; Mic. 1:3). HIGH PLACES were sacred worship places for both Canaanites and Israelites. Or, the wavy lines may represent waters, either the sea or the rains Baal was thought to bring, so necessary to abundant crops in Syria-Palestine.

At some point, Baal's pagan connotations led to changes in personal names, such as Esh-baal (I Chr. 8:33) to Ish-bosheth (II Sam. 2:8), and, Merib-baal (I Chr. 8:34) to Mephibosheth (II Sam. 4:4), "bosheth" meaning shame or shameful thing. (Compare also BEL.)

P.L.G.

BAALZEBUB. The BAALS were the local deities of Canaanite towns, thought to be responsible for the growth of crops and the fertility of flocks and human beings. Baalzebub (also spelled BEELZEBUB) is the god of Ekron in the OT. In Hebrew it means "Lord of the Flies" or "Lord of Dung" but in the original Canaanite probably meant "Lord of rulers."

J.C.

BAASHA. The name of the third king of Israel (900-877 B.C.), son of Ahijah, of the tribe of Issachar. Baasha became king by murdering his predecessor, Nadab, son of Jeroboam. Soon thereafter, Baasha killed every surviving member of the house of Jeroboam (I Kings 15:27 ff.).

Baasha made war on ASA, king of Judah, "all their days" (I Kings 15:16, 32). He attempted to fortify Ramah in order to stop all traffic between Israel and Judah (II Chr. 16:1). As a defense against Baasha's possible attacks, Asa dug a large cistern in Jerusalem (Jer. 41:9). With funds taken from the Temple and palaces, Asa bribed Ben-hadad, king of Syria, to attack northern Israel. This forced Baasha to stop the work at Ramah to meet the challenge (II Chr. 16:2-5).

Jehu had prophesied the destruction of the house of Baasha just as he had destroyed Jeroboam's (I Kings 16:1-4). Baasha seems to have died a natural death (I Kings 16:6). His son Elah tried to succeed him (877-876 B.C.) but was assassinated by one of his officers, Zimri, who, during his seven days as king, killed all the house of Baasha and "his friends" (I Kings 16:11). Jehu's prophecy was that retribution would come upon Baasha for destroying the house of Jeroboam and for "all the evil that he did" (I Kings 16:7).

P.L.G.

BABCOCK, MALTBIE DAVENPORT (1858-1901). Author of the hymn "This Is My Father's World," Babcock was born August 3 in Syracuse, New York, to James and Emily Maria Maltbie.

He was graduated from Syracuse University in 1879 and from Auburn Theological Seminary in 1882. Ordained July 13, 1882, he was called to serve First Presbyterian Church of Lockport, New York. On October 4, 1882, he married Katherine Eliot Tallman. From Lockport they moved to Brown Memorial Church in Baltimore, Maryland, and in 1899 Babcock succeeded Henry van Dyke at Brick Presbyterian Church in New York City.

An active sportsman, Babcock was a proficient vocal and instrumental musician and an excellent preacher with a magnetic personality. In Lockport he had suffered a bout of depression, which returned in 1901 when, on a tour of the Middle East, he contracted Mediterranean fever. While confined to a hospital in Naples, he committed suicide. N.H.

BABEL (meaning "gate of God"). The Hebrew name of an ancient city in the land of Shinar (that is, Babylonia or Chaldea), a city in the kingdom of Nimrod, the mighty hunter (Gen. 10:10). According to the account in Genesis 11:4, this city's people, wanting to "make a name for ourselves," and to keep from being "scattered abroad upon the face of the whole earth," determined to build a city "of brick" as a lasting memorial and "a tower with its top in the heavens." Assyrian and Babylonian kings prided themselves on the size of buildings and temple towers or ZIGGURATS they erected. To desert Semites, any of a number of the Shinar cities could have fit the Genesis description of Babel. BABYLON was such a walled city and had a ziggurat, probably as high as a four- or five-story modern building, built of sun-dried bricks held together with "mud" (bitumen). At its top, there was a sacred shrine, used on special occasions. It was called "bab-il," gate of God. Thus, by a play on words, it was simple to relate Babel, from the Hebrew verb "to confuse," with the name Babylon, locale of the captivity. The association characterized Babylon's prehistoric ancestors as people made objectionably proud and self-sufficient through their new-found technology of brickmaking. Also, here was a theological explanation of why people who descended from one couple speak in different (confused) languages.

Courtesy of the Oriental Institute, University of Chicago

Model of the ziggurat of Babylon (Tower of Babel)

P.L.G.

BABYLON. The name of the ancient city and nation of Mesopotamia that was the most influential outside source on Hebrew life and thought. Babylon was also a tyrannical military empire that threatened the destruction of Israel and Judah on several occasions, a threat that the Neo-Babylonian Empire carried out in 586 B.C. Thereupon, the upper classes of Judah were taken into exile in Babylon, until their release by Cyrus the Great in 539 B.C. This historical background caused the apocalyptic writers of the NT era to use the name "Babylon" to refer to tyranny and opposition to God in their own times. The REVELATION to John (the Apocalypse) in particular uses "Babylon" as a symbol for a world power hostile to the true God, which put itself forward as an anti-God, destroying the saints by persecution and demanding that believers worship "the beast" (Satan) instead. For the author of the Revelation, that power was Rome.

There are a number of sound reasons for identifying Rome as the real enemy symbolized by "Babylon." The first is the occasion of the writing. Under the emperor DOMITIAN (A.D. 81-96), Christians in Asia Minor (the area where Revelation was written) were threatened by an imminent persecution because their faith forbade them to offer divine honors to the emperor. The Revelation was written to encourage the church to be faithful unto death.

Another reason is the fact that the notorious "number of the beast," 666, is a numerical code for "Neron Caesar" (Rev. 13:18), under whose unjust administration even more terrible persecutions had been inflicted on the church. "Babylon," in Revelation, is called the great whore and mother of harlots and is said to be drunk with the blood of the saints. Harlotry is readily understood as idolatry, in the same way that the prophets spoke of idolatrous Israelites "playing the harlot." The use of this symbol for Rome shows that the strand of early Christianity represented by John the Elder saw the Roman Empire as evil, the enemy of God.

J.C.

BABYLONIAN CAPTIVITY, OLD TESTAMENT. See EXILE.

BABYLON, OLD TESTAMENT. See ASSYRIA AND BABYLONIA.

BACH, JOHANN SEBASTIAN (1685-1750). The German composer and organist was born March 21 in Eisenach, Thuringia, the youngest child of Johann Ambrosius and Elizabeth Lämmerhirt Bach, a very musical family. By 1695 both his parents were dead. He was reared by his elder brother Johann Christoph (1671-1721), an organist who taught him the keyboard.

In 1700 his voice secured him a place in a choir of poor boys in Lüneburg, which furthered his musical education. At age eighteen he was appointed organist for a new organ at the Neukirche in Arnstadt, where he stayed until 1707, synthesizing northern and southern German styles of music. He once walked a great distance to study with Dietrich Buxtehude. He married his cousin Maria Barbara Bach on October 17, 1707.

At Mühlhausen (1707-1708) Bach wrote several cantatas including "God Is My King." From 1708 to

Courtesy of the Bettmann Archive

Johann Sebastian Bach

1717 he was court organist and orchestra concertmaster at Weimar, writing a cantata a month. Here he became very interested in the music of Italian composers, especially that of Antonio Vivaldi.

Bach moved to Köthen, where he was musical director to Prince Leopold (1717–23). Here he wrote the Brandenburg Concertos. His first wife died July 7, 1720, and he married Anna Magdalena Wilcken on December 3, 1721. Of his twenty children, ten survived; four sons also became musicians and composers.

The first version of Bach's Magnificat was written in Leipzig soon after his arrival in 1723 as director of church music for the city's parishes. In 1724 he published the St. John Passion and in 1723 the Sanctus for the Mass in B Minor, which was finished in 1733. The Goldberg Variations were completed in 1742, and the St. Matthew Passion also dates from this period.

Incredibly prolific, Bach is probably best known to churchgoers for his harmonizations of a number of familiar hymn tunes for such standards as "O Sacred Head, Now Wounded," "Jesus, Priceless Treasure," "Come, Holy Spirit, God and Lord," "Deck Thyself, My Soul, with Gladness," "God of the Living, in Whose Eyes," "Lord of All Majesty and Might," "O God, Our Faithful God," "Wake, Awake, for Night Is Flying," "Break Forth, O Beauteous Heavenly Light," and "The Day Is Past and Over."

N.H.

BAECK, LEO (1873–1956). One of the foremost Jewish theologians of the twentieth century. He was born and grew up in Imperial Germany and received his doctorate from the University of Berlin. At that time, Harnack was the most famous member of the faculty of theology in the university. Harnack's lectures on the essence of Christianity (Eng. trans. What Is Christianity?), given in 1899, had stressed the originality of Jesus' teaching and minimized the connection with Judaism, a fashion that had begun in German religious thought at least as early as Kant's Religion Within the Limits of Reason Alone. Baeck responded with The Essence of Judaism (1948), asserting the debt of Christianity to Judaism, a view upheld by subsequent scholarship. Baeck found room in his thinking for both the religious and the ethical aspects of Judaism. He claimed there is no conflict between transcendence and immanence. He survived imprisonment in a concentration camp and spent his last years in England.

J.M.

BAHA'I. An eclectic faith that declares that God is one and that all religions are true and agree in essentials. Baha'i developed from Babism, which was begun in Shiraz, Iran (Persia), in 1844 by Mirza Ali Muhammad (1819–50). The "Bab," as he was known, wrote one hundred books expounding his teachings. Baha'i has a liberal, progressive outlook. Mirza called upon world rulers to peacefully form a world government, before the middle of the nineteenth century. Baha'i establishes its beliefs on the doctrine of God's continuing and progressive revelation.

Among Baha'i's teachings are the oneness of the human race, the need for a world without borders and a truly open society, peace through universal disarmament, and the evolution of humanity to a higher stage of personal and cultural development. The equality of the sexes, the desire for equality of opportunity, and the need to freely search for truth are high Baha'i ideals. True worship is work that serves these ideals and improves the harmony and happiness of the human race.

The chief center of Baha'i in the United States is a beautiful temple in Evanston, Illinois. Since the Iranian Revolution, Baha'ists have been mercilessly persecuted by the MUSLIM fundamentalists who support the Ayatollah Khomeini. Thousands of believers have been killed, their villages and homes destroyed; their places of worship and even their cemeteries have been broken up and desecrated. Protests from international organizations have not stopped this savage attack on a peaceful, idealistic people.

J.C.

BALAAAM. The son of Boer and a SEER summoned by Balak king of Moab to invoke a curse upon Israel's tribes as they entered Canaan. Instead, Balaam pronounced a blessing and predicated Israel's future preeminence (Num. 25:5–24:25; Deut. 23:4–5; Josh. 13:22; 24:9–10). Balaam's story is a unique tale of a non-Israelite Mesopotamian who was attentive to the commands of the God of Israel. The story of Balaam's talking ass and the story of the talking serpent in Genesis 3, are the only two stories of talking animals in the OT. Balaam's story also depicts the universal scope of the power of Israel's God and the power that the OT attributed to the spoken word. New Testament references to Balaam (II Pet. 2:15; Jude 11; Rev. 2:14) are not flattering.

W.G.

BALM. A gum or resin associated with Gilead, as "balm in Gilead" (Jer. 8:22). No specific botanical identification of the tree or shrub that produced balm has been made yet. Balm was prized for medicine (Jer. 8:22; 46:11; 51:8), cosmetics, and embalming. It was, apparently, a staple in caravan trade (Gen. 43:11; Ezek. 27:17), named along with gum and myrrh (Gen. 37:25).

P.L.G.

BALSAM. Only found in the RSV and always associated with trees; in the KJV, balsam is referred to as mulberry trees (II Sam. 5:23–24; I Chr. 14:14–15; I Macc. 6:34). Botanically the balsam trees could be the black or red mulberry trees, Morus nigra L, which grow abundantly in Palestine. From the "sound of marching" in the tops of the balsam trees (I Chr. 14:15), the trees could be a type of aspen or poplar (Hos. 4:13), through whose leaves a blowing wind makes a particular kind of sound (compare BALM)

P.L.G.

BALTIMORE CATECHISM. The doctrinal standard used for generations for Roman Catholic parochial school children. Written in 1885 in standard question-and-answer format, it contained 421 questions divided into thirty-seven chapters covering the creed, the sacraments, prayer, the commandments, and last things. Revised in 1941 by the Confraternity of Christian Doctrine, it remains a summary of traditional pre-Vatican II American Roman Catholic theology.

N.H.

BALTIMORE, COUNCILS OF. From 1789 to 1808 all American Roman Catholics were part of the Diocese of Baltimore. The city became the preeminent see. Three early "general chapters of the clergy" were held near there (1783-84, 1786, 1789). JOHN CARROLL held his only general synod there in 1791. The term "Councils of Baltimore" more properly refers to the first seven provincial councils (1829, 1833, 1837, 1840, 1843, 1846, 1849) and the three plenary councils (1852, 1866, 1884). All ten of these were held there.

N.H.

BAPTISM.

Antecedents. The use of water in religious purifications and cleansings is an age-old custom. Christianity has followed suit and has incorporated a water rite into its visible expression from the beginning. Baptism has been an integral part of Christianity from the first, but the church's understanding of baptism has been diversified and its practice threatened in several ways. As early as Paul's writing of I Corinthians we can see evidence of division over baptism (I Cor. 1:13-17) and of misunderstanding of the apostolic practice (I Cor. 10:1-13). There have been strange incrustations that have gathered around baptismal procedures (I Cor. 15:29). Hence the appeal to baptism as a focal point among Christians (I Cor. 12:12-13), which was needed at Corinth to set matters right in Paul's eyes. In later centuries the place of controversy in baptism centered on the role of faith, exercised by the subject to be baptized, and the mode of administration, whether it was to be immersion or sprinkling (see Didache 7:1-4 for this diversity).

The origins of Christian baptism are unclear. We can, however, be certain that early Christian proclamation dated the commencement of the KERYGMA, or announced good news, from the activity of Jesus' cousin, known invariably as John "the baptizer." The title suggests that there was something distinctive about John's practice of baptizing men and women in the Jordan River. If John's practice was based on proselyte baptism practiced by Gentile converts to Judaism, the novelty lay in the fact that John insisted on a radical change, or repentance, on the part of fellow Jews in preparation for the coming of God's rule which he heralded (see Luke 7:29-30). If John was doing what the ESSENES at QUMRAN did, according to the DEAD SEA SCROLLS, then he was offering a new beginning of cleansing in anticipation of a divine visitation or judgment on the ungodly in Israel. At all events John came to make ready for Jesus (Luke 16:16) and to point forward to him who would in turn "baptize with the Holy Spirit" (Mark 1:8; cf. John 1:33; Acts 19:4).

Jesus received baptism at the hands of his cousin (Matt. 3:13-17), which raises some unresolved questions as to why a sinless Jesus needed to be baptized. Presumably Jesus regarded baptism as the start of his public ministry and an identification with the people. What Jesus meant by baptism has to be gleaned from his occasional use of the term in his reported teaching (Mark 10:38-39; Luke 12:49ff.). John seems to have looked forward to a Messiah who would judge and condemn sinners. Jesus reinterpreted baptism as a picture of his suffering endured vicariously for others with whom he was closely identified in both his death and new life beyond the cross. He would save them by associating with them in their sins, and would emerge to a risen life, bringing his people with him. If this is the correct view of Jesus' own baptism, it leads us to the threshold of Paul's baptismal theology in Romans 6:1-11.

Apostolic Practice. The first Christian sermon (in Acts 2) closed, we are told, with a call to "repent and be baptized." These terms, or their equivalents, recur repeatedly in the stories of conversion in the Acts of the Apostles (2:38, 41; 8:12f.; 16:14f., 33f.; 18:8; 19:2-5; 22:16), thus making baptism a decisive step that publicly associated the new convert with his or her fellow believers as an open profession. "In the name of Jesus" as a formula suggests a passing under the lordship of Jesus Christ, whose "name" (or authority) was invoked in the rite. At a later time the baptism was administered in the name of the Trinity (Matt. 28:19-20, Didache 7:1, 3) as baptismal practice took on a more confessional coloration and became part of the church's creedal position over against the non-Christian world.

As far back as we are able to trace Christian origins, becoming and being a Christian has always been understood as receiving the gift of the Holy Spirit (Rom. 8:9). But how was the Spirit received? No clear answer is possible from the documents of the apostolic church; yet it does seem evident that the act of baptism was in some way connected with the receiving of the Spirit (Acts 2:38; 8:14-17; 9:17-18; 10:44-48; 19:5, 6. No one set pattern was known to Luke).

Paul's contribution to baptismal teaching was built on what he inherited as part of the tradition he took over (Rom. 6:1-14, which clearly reflects his use of pre-Pauline material). The key to Paul's distinctives is in his describing baptism as a new creation rather than as a washing from sin's stain. His emphasis falls on dying and rising with Christ as the gateway to a new existence set within the fellowship of Christ and his church. That new life is likened to putting off the old ways as a suit of clothes and putting on a new life-style, a figure appropriate to what occurred literally in baptism (Gal. 3:27). Baptism marked the entry to a corporate life (I Cor. 12:12-13) and is predicated on a faith-response (Col. 2:11-13) as befits the missionary and first-generation character of Paul's own situation as evangelist, apostle, and church builder. The same close connection of preaching/believing/receiving baptism and so entering on a new life in the Christian community is shared by all the writers after Paul (in the Pastorals, I Peter, and the Johannine church).

Post-apostolic Developments. From the mid-second century onward the rite of initiation took on fresh meaning as it became the kernel around which many formulas and ceremonies with preparatory and explicatory significance gathered. Beginning with postbaptismal anointing, the laying on of hands, and "signing" with the cross preparatory to admitting to first communion—a sequence found in Tertullian and the Apostolic Tradition of Hippolytus—other rites and customs followed. The chief of these were fasting and exorcism with a renouncing of Satan, on the negative side, and the use of symbols (candle, white robe, kiss of peace, partaking of milk and honey as a sign of entry to the Promised Land), on the positive. It is important to note that the ceremonies referred to can only be applied after a lengthy period of teaching and training; and this procedure may well have continued in the Western church, had it not been for one decisive new development, namely the popularity of infant baptism.

Infant baptism owes much of its influence as a church practice to Augustine's reversal of a trend found in Tertullian. The latter argues that little children are innocent and do not need baptismal cleansing. Augustine contended for exactly the opposite viewpoint on the strength of his doctrine of original guilt according to which children inherit Adam's sin and enter upon life handicapped by the guilt of Adam's disobedience and share in his fallen nature. It is imperative that the stain of birth-sin should be cleansed at the earliest opportunity and baptism should not be delayed. Thus the practice of infant baptism, already in vogue in Cyprian's time, was given a theological rationale; and it became part and parcel of medieval Catholicism.

The Reformers. Two quite different solutions to what the Reformers regarded as an unsatisfactory state of affairs appeared in the sixteenth century. The Reformers were anxious to retain the idea of baptismal instruction as children were admitted to the school of Christ, and they were equally adamant in retaining the belief that Christian families are sharers in the covenant of God stretching back to Abraham. Only the left-wing Reformers, beginning with Swiss reformer Grebel in A.D. 1525, reverted to what they believed was NT precedent. They withdrew infants from baptism and practiced only the "baptism of believers," even if it involved a "second baptism" (hence the name ANABAPTISTS) subsequent to infant baptism.

Yet the Reformers' heavy emphasis on faith posed a problem. Obviously newborn infants could not respond openly to the call of the gospel. So "faith" was given several different nuances. Luther believed that infants do believe, based on the sacrament's power to evoke faith. Calvin stressed the covenantal relationship of children in a Christian household, and argued for vicarious faith transferred to infants' account and later to be exercised, as circumcision was applied to the children of Jewish households. The Anglican Reformers left the question in abeyance, but the 1662 Prayer Book used the promise of the child's godparents or sponsors as proleptic or anticipatory "until he come of age to take it upon himself." The net effect was to accentuate the importance of CONFIRMATION as a "rite of completion" when the initiation was fully carried through. The Anabaptist protest, however, was picked up by English and then American Baptists who insisted that faith by definition is personal and incorporates a consciously made decision; hence they refused to baptize any but professed believers.

Modern Proposals. Concern over indiscriminate infant baptisms that never get "completed" in confirmation in a post-Christian society and an alarm over the superstition that can gather around infant baptism have led to some serious questioning of infant baptismal practice. It is being asked whether it would be more honest and adequate to admit infants to a catechumenate in the hope of their future baptism at such a time as they can voluntarily ask for it. On the other side, those who practice infant baptism are reluctant to give up their cherished belief in the church as composed of believers and their children seen as "children of promise" and "heirs of the covenant." This is really the sticking point in the baptismal debate; and little real progress has been made to get through the impasse, except the notable experiment of the North India scheme, 1970, of including both types of baptism, with conversion-confirmation acting as a necessary hinge linking them.

R.M.

BAPTISMAL FONT. A pedestal or base, usually of marble or other stone, supporting a large basin that contains the water used in baptism. Generally, the basin, or font, is about three feet high. The baptismal font, historically, was located at the entrance or west end of the church building. This symbolized the entering of the church by way of baptism. Later, in Protestant churches, the font was often located at the front or chancel end of the church to show the equality of the sacrament of baptism to the sacrament of the Lord's Supper. It may also stand at the south end of the chancel. The font is usually protected by a close-fitting cover made of the same material as the font itself.

J.C.

BAPTISM FOR THE DEAD. One of the most baffling passages in the Bible is I Corinthians 15:29, where Paul refers to a custom in which early Christians, apparently, received baptism on behalf of the dead. Actually, this is not presented as a direct statement, or a recommendation of the practice, but occurs as two rhetorical questions designed to underscore the reality of the Resurrection. Many questions have been raised throughout Christian history about this practice, for if such rituals did take place they would reflect a superstitious understanding of the gospel unworthy of the faith. Much of this questioning centered on why Paul would have passed over this subject without condemning it. However, a strict reading of the reference does not reveal an approval of the practice by Paul. His questions simply recognize that some such practice was observed, along with taking advantage of the practice as a further proof that the church did, indeed, believe firmly in the physical resurrection of Christ, and the coming physical resurrection of all believers.

The church fathers (Tertullian and Chrysostom) tried to explain Paul's reference as referring to the baptism of our bodies, which are dying, so that baptism gives eternal life to our mortal bodies. The reformers also sought to put an orthodox construction on the passage. Luther interpreted the passage to refer to an early Christian practice of administering baptism at the tombs of the martyrs. Calvin said it referred to the administering of "deathbed baptism," that is, to baptism of the dying.

J.C.

BAPTISM OF THE SPIRIT. In Pentecostalism and the HOLINESS MOVEMENT, the doctrine of the "second blessing" or subsequent reception of the Holy Spirit distinct from conversion or justification. This reception is generally marked by "signs of the Spirit," usually speaking in tongues (GLOSSALALIA). In Holiness doctrine this experience signifies entire sanctification.

J.C.

BAPTIST CHURCHES. One of the largest groups of evangelical Christians. Their name is derived from their emphasis on baptizing only those who have made a conscious personal commitment to Jesus Christ as Lord and Savior.

The Baptist World Alliance, which includes most of the autonomous conventions and unions of Baptists from all parts of the world, estimates that there are more than 33 million Baptists. However, since many congregations are unregistered in Communist lands or are unrelated to denominational bodies in Western countries, the Baptist population of the world is probably much larger than the Baptist World Alliance figure. Baptist membership in the United States in 1981 totaled 27 million. Southern Baptists alone listed 13.6 million.

Although some historians seek to trace Baptist origins to apostolic times, the movement came into being in the wake of the Protestant REFORMATION. John Smyth (about 1554-1612), an English Puritan preacher who first served an Anglican church at Lincoln, then a Separatist congregation at Gainsborough, became the first Baptist. Because of persecution in his homeland, Smyth and a group of followers fled to Amsterdam. There he came under the influence of Mennonites, descendants of the ANABAPTISTS. Imbued with their distinctive teaching that only believers should be baptized, Smyth reorganized his Separatist congregation and it became the first English Baptist congregation in 1609. Smyth baptized himself first, then the others of his exile church, which became the first of those later to be known as General Baptists. They subscribed to the ARMINIANISM's belief that the atonement of Christ was not limited to the elect but was general, open to all. In 1611 or 1612 some of the members of the Amsterdam congregation, under the leadership of Thomas Helwys, returned to London and established a Baptist church there.

Meanwhile another band of Separatists—Puritans who separated themselves from the Church of England—founded the first Particular Baptist congregation in Southwark in 1633. They held to the Calvinistic concept that only the elect were to be baptized. In 1644 a group of seven Particular Baptist congregations developed a creedal statement that included the requirement not only of believers' baptism but that the mode was to be by immersion.

The late Ernest F. Kevan, a British scholar, pointed out that it is a mistake to think that the chief concern of Baptists is the administration of baptism. They are primarily concerned with the spiritual nature of the church, and believers' baptism becomes a corollary of that teaching. Baptists, from their beginnings, repudiated the Anglican sacramental and the Presbyterian covenantal view of infant baptism. Baptists stress the idea of the "gathered church," members of which are joined by God into a communion of life and service under the lordship of Christ.

The local church of believers looms large in Baptist thinking. Each congregation is autonomous. Baptists repudiate the connectional concepts of other ecclesiastical bodies. Therefore, it is wrong to speak of the Southern Baptist "Church" or the American Baptist "Church." Yet since their earliest days Baptists have voluntarily joined themselves in unions, associations, and conventions. None of these bodies possesses the ecclesiastical authority uniquely attributed to the local congregation.

Baptists are not reticent about voicing their distinctive claims. In the 1936 issue of the United States Census, Religious Bodies, their spokesman declared: "It is a distinct principle with Baptists that they acknowledge no human founder, recognize no human authority, and subscribe to no human creed. For all these things Baptists of every name and order go back to the New Testament."

Despite a strong and persistent adherence to an anti-creedal position on the part of many Baptists, they have, nonetheless, developed a number of creeds. Besides the creedal affirmation of the Particular Baptists in 1644, there have been several subsequent confessions of faith. Probably the best known of these in America is the New Hampshire Confession of 1833. This statement is silent on the doctrine of the universal church and is therefore heartily espoused by those who emphasize the authority and independence of the local congregation. The Southern Baptist Theological Seminary of Louisville, Kentucky, adopted the Abstract of Principles in 1859, portions of which reflect the Second London Confession of 1677 and the Philadelphia Confession of 1742. Some regard the latter as a Baptist interpretation of the Westminster Confession (1646). The Southern Baptist Convention issued a statement of the Baptist Faith and Message in 1925.

Repudiating the concept of an established church, Baptists have always emphasized the principle of church-state separation. When Baptists moved from the atmosphere of Puritan England to the American colonies and the emerging nation, they tended to emphasize the principle even more.

While Baptists have made a continuing impact on Britain, it was in the New World that the movement exploded and eventually became the largest segment of American Protestantism. The English Baptist ROGER WILLIAMS came to Massachusetts in 1632, but it was not long before the Puritans, soon to become the religious establishment of New England, forced him to flee to Rhode Island, where in 1639 he formed the first Baptist church in America.

The Baptists did not make great headway in the new land until the Revolution. Presbyterians and Congregationalists, stirred by the Great Awakening, undoubtedly influenced the Baptists. They were soon moving, first southward, then westward, and, along with the Methodists, took over the revivalistic task of frontier evangelism.

The Baptists of Britain, starting with WILLIAM CAREY in 1792, were deeply involved in the modern missionary movement. England and Scotland also gave the world Baptist preachers such as CHARLES HADDON SPURGEON and Alexander Maclaren, and Wales produced Christmas Evans. In the New World, Adoniram Judson, a Congregationalist turned Baptist, became a pioneer missionary, first to India and later to Burma.

Because of the outreach of both British and American missionaries, the Baptist faith was carried to Europe and Russia, and today perhaps the largest force of Baptists after those of the United States is found in the Soviet Union. There is a large Baptist testimony in Brazil, as well as in other countries of Latin America, Africa, and Asia.

Except for the Baptist Union of Great Britain and Ireland and the American Baptist Churches in the United States, most Baptist bodies have been unallied with the ecumenical movement. In a rare exception, Baptists in India have joined with non-Baptists to form the Church of North India.

These listings may be helpful in identifying the wide variety of Baptist groups in the United States. Note the following definitions:

Regular Baptists claim to hold to the position of the original English Baptists before the distinction between Particular and General Baptists.

Particular Baptists are those who believe in a particular atonement in which Christ died only for his elect people. The greater percentage of Baptists are found in this category.

General Baptists are Arminian in theology, believing in a universal atonement and free will.

American Baptist Association, not to be confused with the American Baptist Churches in the U.S.A., is a fellowship of regular and independent missionary Baptist churches whose greatest strength is in the South. Known sometimes as "equality" Baptists, they stress that only local congregations have the authority to conduct missionary work. Separatists, they claim a unique type of Baptist "apostolic succession" called LANDMARKISM. They believe that since the days of the early church, immersed believers have maintained the true Baptist succession to the present day.

American Baptist Churches in the U.S.A. From 1907 to 1950 they were known as the Northern Baptist Convention and from 1950 to 1972 as the American Baptist Convention. For about two hundred years the Baptists of the northern states did not grow as did their counterparts in the South. Yet they did found the American Baptist Foreign Mission Society in 1814, their publication society in 1824, and the Home Mission Society in 1832. Theological diversity developed in the northern and (later) western Baptist churches now associated in the ABC. Indeed polarization of its liberal and conservative wings forced Northern Baptists into the Modernist-Fundamentalist controversies of the 1920s, causing the secession of groups that became the General Association of Regular Baptists and the Conservative Baptist Association. The ABC, though not participating in the CONSULTATION ON CHURCH UNION, has been the most ecumenical of all United States Baptist groups.

Baptist General Conference. Beginning as an ethnic communion in the mid-nineteenth century, this collection of churches, first known as the Swedish Baptists, organized as a conference in 1879. Now a virile movement, it has extended its ministry to individuals and families beyond its racial roots, and supports both Bethel College and Bethel Theological Seminary, St. Paul, Minnesota.

Baptist Missionary Association. This is a group of Regular Baptist churches organized in 1950 as the North American Baptist Association, which had no relationship to the North American Baptist Conference, or German Baptists. The present name was adopted in 1969. In theology these churches are evangelical, missionary-oriented, and premillennial in eschatology.

Conservative Baptist Association of America. This is an association of churches that broke away from the Northern Baptist Convention (now known as American Baptist Churches), and was organized in 1947. They recognize the OT and the NT as the divinely inspired Word of God. Each local church is independent and autonomous. They support the Conservative Baptist Theological Seminary of Denver, and Western Conservative Baptist Seminary, of Portland, Oregon.

Duck River (and Kindred) Association of Baptists. This is a group of Baptist associations located in Tennessee, Alabama, Georgia, Kentucky, and Mississippi. They practice foot washing, the Lord's Supper, and baptism by immersion. Their doctrinal position is similar to that of the Separate Baptists.

Free Will Baptists. This group originated in two lines of Arminian Baptists. The southern branch was first organized in North Carolina in 1727. A similar movement was organized in 1780 in New Hampshire. A remnant of the northern group joined with the southern in 1935 to form the National Association of Free Will Baptists.

General Association of General Baptists. This is an Arminian group of Baptists that first arrived in the New World in 1714. The movement was revived by Benoni Stinson in 1823 in Indiana.

General Association of Regular Baptists. This group was founded in 1932 in Chicago by a group that had withdrawn from the Northern Baptist Convention. They subscribe essentially to the New Hampshire Confession of Faith.

General Six Principle Baptists. This group was organized in Rhode Island in 1653, drawing its name from Hebrews 6:1-2 KJV.

National Baptist Convention of America. This is known as the "unincorporated" body of black Baptists, which withdrew from the parent body in 1915 following a dispute over the adoption of a charter and the ownership of a publishing house.

National Baptist Convention, U.S.A., Inc. In colonial days black slaves attended the churches of their white masters. However, the first black Baptist church in America was organized at Silver Bluff, South Carolina, in 1773. But the disruption of two main groups of black Baptists occurred in 1915. This group, known as the "incorporated" convention, traces its beginning to the Foreign Mission Baptist Convention of 1880, as does the National Baptist Convention of America. Baptists make up the largest segment of black Christians.

National Primitive Baptist Convention of the USA. This group of black congregations hold basically to the same doctrinal position as the white Primitive Baptists. Both are opposed to all forms of church organization; yet the black Primitive Baptists have local associations and a national convention. Since the beginning of the twentieth century they have established aid societies, conventions, and Sunday schools.

North American Baptist Conference. Congregations of German immigrants formed this conference, which in some communities still conduct bilingual services. The churches of this conference have a firm belief in CALVINISM.

Primitive Baptists. This is a grouping of Baptist congregations, chiefly in the South, who have never organized as a denomination. They are opposed to any ecclesiastical organization including Sunday schools and missionary societies because they are not specifically mentioned in Scripture. Known sometimes as "Hard Shells," this group of Baptists are strongly Calvinistic. Some congregations practice foot washing and some eschew the use of musical instruments in worship.

Progressive National Baptist Association, Inc. This is a group of black Baptist congregations that organized in 1961 after breaking away from the two older black Baptist denominations, principally the National Baptist Convention, U.S.A., Inc.

Reformed Baptists. This is a small communion of strongly Calvinistic Baptists who have banded together without a formal central ecclesiastical structure. Active since 1955 these churches reflect the doctrinal position of the London Confession (1689) and the Philadelphia Confession (1742).

Separate Baptists in Christ. This group, found in Indiana, Ohio, Kentucky, Tennessee, Illinois, and North Carolina, traces its origins to the Separatist movement of the English Reformation (see SEPARATISM). The first association was formed in 1758 in North Carolina.

Seventh Day Baptist General Conference. Originating in England in 1617, the Seventh Day Baptists organized their first church in the colonies in 1672 at Newport, Rhode Island. Their doctrines are similar to those of all Calvinistic Baptists except that Saturday, not Sunday, must be observed as the Sabbath. William Miller, spiritual forebear of the Seventh-Day Adventists, originally belonged to this group.

Southern Baptist Convention. More than half of all Baptists in the United States belong to this denomination, which broke with northern brethren over the slavery question, and formed its own convention in 1845. Although it is still a regional group, churches have been formed in every one of the fifty states. Southern Baptists are generally conservative in doctrine, committed to evangelistic work at home and missionary endeavors abroad. They have resisted efforts to draw them into the ECUMENICAL MOVEMENT.

United Free Will Baptists. This is a group of black Baptists whose theology is similar to that of the white Free Will Baptists. Both groups teach the doctrines of free grace, free salvation, and free will.

There are many independent Baptist churches, unrelated to any organization. They are generally separatistic and fundamentalistic in doctrine.

R.H.

BAPTISTRY. A special structure, generally separate, but sometimes part of the church, used for baptisms in ancient times and still in use in some areas today. As baptism was celebrated en masse at certain holy seasons like Lent, large chapels were needed for the ceremony. Immersion, practiced in the fourth-century church, also required a large baptismal pool. Baptisteries were generally circular or polygonal in shape. The baptismal pool was surrounded by pillars and topped with a dome. As the baptism of adults passed out of practice, after the pagans in the Roman Empire were converted in the fourth century, and was replaced by the baptism of the children of Christians, baptisteries were replaced by BAPTISMAL FONTS in rooms built into church buildings.

J.C.

BAR- An Aramaic prefix to the father's name meaning "son of _____." The Hebrew equivalent is "Ben-." Bar- is used more in the NT, for instance, Bar-nabas, Bar-sabbas, Bar-jona, and Bar-jesus.

P.L.G.

BARABBAS. The criminal chosen by the crowd (Matt. 27:15-26; John 18:38-40) to be released at Passover instead of Jesus. According to some Greek manuscripts, Barabbas was his surname; his first name was Judas or Jesus. Barabbas is said to be a robber (John 18:40) in most translations, but the term probably means a bandit or revolutionary. Mark 15:7 and Luke 23:19 declare that Barabbas was a revolutionary fighter against the occupying Romans. He was involved in a riot in which a murder occurred and was in prison for that crime when Jesus was arrested. Pilate apparently considered Barabbas so clearly guilty of murder that he felt the crowd (even if it were disturbed by Jesus) would have no difficulty rejecting Barabbas and freeing Jesus. Since the crowd chose Barabbas, the suggestions of some commentators that the crowd was composed mainly of supporters of Barabbas, is given some weight.

J.C.

BARBARIAN. The Greek word barbaros, from which our English term is taken, is an onomatopoeic expression, that is, the sound of the word betrays its significance. To Greek ears, all those who did not speak their language sounded as if they were uttering nonsense syllables that came over as "bar-bar." But this was not a verdict on the civilization or culture of the speaker in the original context of the word. Luke reverts to the original, neutral sense of "barbaros" in Acts 28:2-4, which pays tribute to the kindness of the Maltese, who spoke a Phoenician dialect.

The idea of "barbarian" as uncouth and lacking Greek civilization is seen in Colossians 3:11, where the term is a partner to "Scythian," a wild race that bordered the Black Sea. The problem of communication from one language to another lies behind I Corinthians 14:11 (the English versions have "foreigner" for Paul's barbaros); and in Romans 1:14 the term is coupled with "Greek" to take in the totality of humankind as the audience for Paul's universal gospel message (Rom. 1:16). R.M.

BARCLAY, WILLIAM (1907-78). Scottish minister, theologian, professor of biblical criticism, and prolific, popular author on biblical topics. Born in Wick, Caithness, Scotland, Barclay died in Glasgow, Scotland, on January 24. He was known as "the common man's theologian" as he appealed to great numbers of people in the United Kingdom through his books and radio and television talks. He was famed as an extraordinary communicator. Not as conservative as some of his colleagues, he was, nonetheless, more successful in reaching the masses than any other Christian thinker of his day. An ordained minister of the Church of Scotland, Barclay served Trinity Church, Renfrew, 1933-46; and as lecturer in NT language and literature, 1946-63, and professor of divinity and biblical criticism, 1963-74, at the University of Glasgow. He was a member of the joint committee for the New English Bible, authored the NT section of the Daily Study Bible, and was made a commander of the Order of the British Empire.

Courtesy of The Westminster Press

William Barclay

J.C.

BARING-GOULD, SABINE (1834-1924). The author of the hymns "Onward, Christian Soldiers" and "Now the Day Is Over" was born January 28 in Devon, England. Educated at Clare College, Cambridge, he received a B.A. in 1857 and an M.A. in 1860. He was ordained in the Church of England in 1864.

In his day he was best known for his books. His fifteen-volume Lives of the Saints was published from 1872-77. He also wrote Curious Myths of the Middle Ages, two series, 1866-68, and a two-volume work on The Origin and Development of Religious Belief (1869-80).

Other of Baring-Gould's hymns found in contemporary hymnals are "Daily, Daily, Sing the Praises" and "On the Resurrection Morning." Baring-Gould translated "Through the Night of Doubt and Sorrow," by Bernard Severin Ingemann, and is credited with the familiar tune "Eudoxia."

N.H.

BARMEN DECLARATION. A German Protestant manifesto of 1934 presented by Christians who formed the confessing church in opposition to the Nazi-controlled Office of Church Affairs and the German Christians movement that supported Hitler's racial and imperialistic policies. The German Christians were given control of the religious offices of the nation when Hitler came to power in 1933. They elected Ludwig Müller as chief bishop of the newly united German Evangelical Church. The German Christians used the church structure to advance Nazi political aims. Young people in church organizations were recruited for the Hitler youth; faithful pastors were intimidated by Nazis. A pastors' union to oppose this was formed by a hero of World War I, Martin Niemöller.

The Swiss theologian KARL BARTH, who was teaching in Germany, took the lead in writing the courageous manifesto. It went beyond any previous church platform in stressing the independence of the church from state control. As it states, there is one Word of God which all are to hear, trust, and obey, and that is Jesus Christ. There is no other source of revelation. In life or death, Christians must cling to Christ alone and obey him rather than human authorities.

J.C.

Courtesy of the American Jewish Archives of the Hebrew Union College—Jewish Institute of Religion

A bar mitzvah celebrant reads the Torah as his father and the rabbi look on

BAR MITZVAH. Term applied to a Jewish boy on his thirteenth birthday, considered the age of religious responsibility when he is duty bound to follow God's laws. Bar Mitzvah means "Son of the Commandment." The Bar Mitzvah has certain prerogatives, such as the right to be called up to the reading of the Torah and to be counted in the minyan, the quorum of ten mature males required for public prayers. He is held to account for his own sins and is commanded to fast on the Day of Atonement. One reason given for the age of thirteen as the age of religious responsibility is that Abraham is said to have rejected the idolatry of his father when he was thirteen.

The Bar Mitzvah ceremony, usually held in the synagogue on the Sabbath following the Bar Mitzvah's thirteenth birthday, consists of three parts: (1) the blessing by the Bar Mitzvah's father, the calling up of the Bar Mitzvah to the reading of the Torah and his reading a portion from the Prophets; (2) the address to the congregation by the initiate; and (3) the festive meal. The Bar Mitzvah ceremony serves to motivate a period of training, which leads to an individual's intelligent acceptance of responsibility as a member of the Jewish people. (Compare also BAT MITZVAH.) L.K.

BARNABAS. An early Christian leader in both the Jerusalem church and Paul's missionary party. This man, otherwise called Joseph (Acts 4:36), was given the descriptive name Barnabas, literally "son of encouragement," possibly in view of his speaking ability, though the exact derivation of Barnabas is uncertain. We find Barnabas exercising a type of exhortative ministry in Acts 11:23.

He was a Levite, deriving from a Jewish-Cypriot priestly family. His other family link was with a cousin—John MARK (Col. 4:10). Both men had homes in Jerusalem, since Acts 12:12 tells us Mark's mother lived there; and Acts 4:36-37 informs us of Barnabas selling a property to contribute to the common fund for the relief of the poor.

As to his character Luke is unstinting in his praise of Barnabas, commencing with the designation "a good man, full of the Holy Spirit and of faith" (Acts 11:24). Thereafter his sterling worth is seen in four episodes in which he played a significant role.

(1) He befriended the newly converted Saul and spoke for him to the leaders of the Jerusalem mother church in witness to Saul's integrity (Acts 9:27).

(2) The mission of his compatriots from Cyprus led to the founding of a church in Syrian Antioch. Barnabas was delegated to investigate this piece of mission preaching directed to Gentiles as the Jerusalem leaders were evidently suspicious or at least cautious in giving it their blessing (Acts 11:19-24). This task Barnabas performed well; and he sought out Saul to consolidate the gains (Acts 11:25-26). But he was not as fully convinced concerning Gentile freedom as Paul was, and the latter does not shrink from pointing to Barnabas' immaturity under pressure (Gal. 2:9, 13).

(3) However, Paul's confidence in him did not prevent his including Barnabas in the first mission to Asia in accord with the Spirit's prompting (Acts 13:1-3). At this juncture he began to take second place to Paul, who henceforth is named first in the duo (see Acts 13:13) and became the evident leader.

(4) At the Council of Jerusalem (about A.D. 50) Paul enlisted Barnabas' support (Acts 15:2) and received the approval of the council's edict for a modus vivendi (working agreement) between Jewish Christians and converted Gentiles (Acts 15:25-26). There was increasing tension, however, between Barnabas, whose sympathies may well have lain with his home church, and Paul, who saw his life's mission to carry the message to the pagan world of Greco-Roman society. The split described in Acts 15:36-41 sealed the differences of opinion, leaving Barnabas free to enlist John Mark's help and return to Cyprus as a Christian leader.

At a later time he visited Corinth, where he was known (I Cor. 9:6). Luther and Calvin saw Barnabas referred to anonymously in II Corinthians 8:18 (NIV) as the "brother who is praised by all the churches." Tertullian gave him an even more important role as the author of the Letter to the Hebrews. The so-termed Epistle of Barnabas is one of the apostolic Fathers and has no identifiable connection with the man of the Acts. His martyrdom in Cyprus is part of later tradition.

R. M.

BARNABAS, EPISTLE OF. A document, probably written around A.D. 135 in or near Alexandria,

Egypt, and usually included among the APOSTOLIC FATHERS. It enjoyed great prestige in Alexandria, where Clement of Alexandria ascribed it to Barnabas, and Origen quoted it as Scripture. Its twenty-one chapters can be divided into two distinct sections, for the first seventeen are doctrinal in nature, whereas chapters eighteen through twenty-one contain moral teachings. This last section is so similar to parts of the Didache that scholars suppose that both authors must have used a common source, which they call the Document of the Two Ways.

The doctrinal section deals mostly with the interpretation of the OT as pointing to Christianity. This is done both through allegorical and through typological interpretations. Pseudo-Barnabas carries allegory to the point of claiming that many commandments of the OT, such as those referring to circumcision, were never intended literally, and that it was an evil angel that led Jews to take literally what was intended to refer to the circumcision of the heart and ears. Such allegorical interpretation, so highly valued by ALEXANDRIAN THEOLOGY, may be one of the reasons why Clement and Origen ascribed great authority to this document.

J.G.

BARTH, KARL (1886–1968). Barth must be reckoned as possibly the major Protestant theologian since SCHLEIERMACHER. Born at Basel, he received his education in Switzerland and Germany, and for twelve years served as pastor in two Swiss industrial parishes. It was at this time that he developed his radical political views and also became dissatisfied with the current liberal theology. In 1919 he published his famous commentary on Romans, inaugurating a new era in theology. In place of the liberal attempt to bridge the distance between God and humanity, Barth emphasized the otherness of God whose word comes as judgment upon all human institutions and strivings. Between 1921 and 1935, Barth taught successively in the German universities of Göttingen, Münster, and Bonn. During these years he and some like-minded theologians vigorously pursued the attack on liberal theology and developed in its place a theology of the Word. A highlight of this period was his controversy with HARNACK, the most distinguished of the old liberals.

Courtesy of Wm. B. Eerdmans Publishing Company

Karl Barth

In 1933 Hitler had come to power in Germany, and Barth identified himself with the Confessing Church, which sought to resist Nazi encroachments. He was the main influence behind the BARMEN DECLARATION of 1934. He believed that his own dogmatic theology of transcendence was the only appropriate answer to the dogmatism of Nazi ideology, and, in retrospect, REINHOLD NIEBUHR was probably unjust in accusing Barth of "transcendental irrelevance." In 1935 Barth was forced to give up his chair at Bonn. He returned to Switzerland and became a professor at Basel. He had already begun The Church Dogmatics, and it continued to occupy him for more than thirty years and was still unfinished at his death. The first volume treats of "the Word of God." There is no way from the human side to the divine, so there can be no natural theology. Theology is made possible only because God has spoken a word, and that word is the starting point behind which we cannot go. Theology is an autonomous science based on the word and has no need to harmonize its findings with secular inquiries.

Among the many topics that Barth treats as he moves through his gigantic work may be noted the following: the critique of religion as the illegitimate human attempts to grasp at God, an attempt which can end only in idolatry; revelation (and this means exclusively "the biblical revelation") as the opposite of religion, for this is God's movement toward humans; the critique of analogy as the attempt to confine God within finite categories; the radical restatement of the doctrine of predestination, which Barth interprets as meaning that the whole human race has been elected from eternity in Jesus Christ; the sensitive treatment of the reconciling work of Jesus Christ, where Barth seems to recognize a real condescension on the part of God, difficult to reconcile with the stark otherness and transcendence ascribed to God in the early writings, but undoubtedly truer to a Christian concept of God.

Barth began to speak too of the "humanity" of God, and although this relieves the problems occasioned by his insistence on God's otherness, it was not meant to be the slightest concession to natural theology or "religion" in Barth's sense of the term. In the course of expounding his own theology, Barth carries out a critical commentary on most of the important theological movements, both ancient and modern, so that to read his Dogmatics is like a complete education in Christian theology, though admittedly from a very definite point of view. His influence has been enormous and is likely to be felt for a long time to come.

J.M.

BARTHOLOMEW. One of the original twelve disciples of Jesus, known as the APOSTLES. Under the name Bartholomew nothing is recorded of his ministry in the NT. Nonetheless, it is possible that Bartholomew is the same man as Nathanael, who is mentioned in John 1:45-51. Nathanael is listed with Peter, Thomas, James, and John in John 21:2. In the Synoptic Gospels, Bartholomew is mentioned in association with Philip, and the Fourth Gospel nowhere mentions an apostle named Bartholomew. To clinch this reasoning, the Synoptic Gospels never mention Nathanael. Bartholomew is a family name meaning "the son of Tolmia," and so he could have had a first name. If this identification is correct, then we know a good deal more about this otherwise unknown Apostle.

According to early church tradition, recorded in Eusebius and Jerome, Bartholomew preached in India. Other legends associate him with evangelistic work in Armenia, where he is supposed to have been flayed alive and crucified upside down. The martyr's body was then supposed to be miraculously transported to Benevento. The feast day of Bartholomew is traditionally August 24, but at Rome it is celebrated on August 25. There is an Apocryphal "Gospel of Bartholomew," which is included in the Apocryphal NT.

J.C.

BARUCH. The most important OT personage to bear the name Baruch ("blessed") is the prophet Jeremiah's secretary. This Baruch, son of Neriah, is first introduced when JEREMIAH placed into his safekeeping the deeds to the field that he had purchased in Anathoth (Jer. 32:12-16). He is the principal actor in Jeremiah 36, where, at the prophet's dictation, he writes on a scroll all the words of the Lord spoken through Jeremiah. He then reads this scroll publicly, first to the people of Jerusalem and Judah at the Temple entrance (Jer. 36:10) and then to princes of Judah in the king's own house (vv. 11-19). Ultimately the scroll is read to King Jehoiakim, who burns two or three columns at a time. This dramatic scene is enlarged upon, and lyrical words of comfort to Jerusalem are appended to it in the apocryphal book of BARUCH, generally dated sometime between 160 and 60 B.C. A Jewish pseudepigraphical Apocalypse of Baruch (known as II Baruch) also claims descent from Jeremiah's scribe.

W.S.T.

BARUCH (Apocrypha). Son of Neriah, brother of Seraiah (Jer. 51:59 ff.), grandson of Mahseiah (Jer. 32:12), member of a prominent Judean family. Baruch (meaning "blessed") was secretary, close friend, and strong supporter of JEREMIAH.

Baruch witnessed Jeremiah's purchase of a field in Anathoth (Jer. 32:12-16). From Jeremiah's dictation, Baruch transcribed the "oracles of destruction" (Jer. 36:4) and then read them publicly in several different places (Jer. 36:10). This was the scroll that King Jehoiakim had read to him and immediately burned (Jer. 36:23). Along with Jeremiah, Baruch was taken by force from Jerusalem to Egypt (Jer. 43:6). Jeremiah 45 discloses Baruch's agony over the fall of Jerusalem.

The name of noble and faithful Baruch is attached to late Jewish writings: (1) Apocalypse of Baruch, part of the OT pseudepigrapha, written in Hebrew, but preserved in Greek and dated about A.D. 70-100. (2) The Book of Baruch, part of the OT APOCRYPHA, claims to have been written in Babylon during the exile and sent to Jerusalem as a confession of sin to be read on feast days "and at appointed feasts" (1:14). In its preserved form, the book, written in Hebrew but soon thereafter translated into Greek, is dated between 160 and 150 B.C.

P.L.G.

BASEL, COUNCIL OF. One of the councils called at the high point of CONCILIARISM in order to reform the church. It began its sessions in 1431, and among its leaders were such distinguished theologians as NICHOLAS OF CUSA and Aeneas Sylvius Piccolomini, later to become PIUS II. It clashed with Pope Eugenius IV and seemed assured of victory until the emperor and the patriarch of Constantinople, fearing the Turks, offered to unite with Rome. To accommodate them, the pope ordered the council to move to Ferrara. Since some obeyed and some did not, there were now two rival councils. The success of the Council of Ferrara-Florence in obtaining a nominal union with the Byzantines spelled the defeat of the Council of Basel, which became increasingly radical as its most moderate leaders left it. After moving to Lausanne, the last remnant of the Council of Basel was dissolved in 1449. This marked the end of conciliarism as a rival to the authority of the popes.

J.G.

BASHAN (meaning "fruitful plain" or "without stones"). Bashan is the name given to the northernmost district of the region east of the Jordan, generally considered to lie south of Mount Hermon, north of the Yarmuk, east of the Sea of Galilee, and west of Jebel Druze. The territory is part of that traditionally allotted to the tribe of Manasseh.

A fertile, tableland highlands (1600-2300 ft. above sea level), Bashan was famous for wheat, cattle (Ps. 22:12; Amos 4:1), grapes (Deut. 32:14), and groves of oak trees (Isa. 2:13; Ezek. 27:6). Its preconquest king was Og of Ashtaroth, whose huge "bedstead of iron" (Deut. 3:11) was exhibited long after his time in Rabbah of the Ammonites (Deut. 3:11; II Sam. 12:26; 17:27; Jer. 49:2; Ezek. 21:20).

P.L.G.

BASIL THE GREAT. One of the CAPPADOCIAN FATHERS, bishop of Caesarea in Cappadocia from 370 until his death in 379, and a staunch opponent of ARIANISM. He received an excellent education in Caesarea, Constantinople, and Athens. Among his fellow students were Gregory Nazianzus, with whom he established a lasting friendship, and Prince Julian, later known as the Apostate. On his return to Caesarea, he boasted of his education and rhetorical ability, until the death of one of his brothers and the entreaties of his sister Macrina led him to abandon the pomps of the world for the monastic life.

The community that he founded and the instructions he gave it were so influential that he has been called the father of Eastern MONASTICISM. In 370 he became bishop of Caesarea. As such, he clashed with the Arian emperor Valens. His work on the subject of the TRINITY centered on clarifying the meaning of "ousia" and "hypostasis," and on convincing the Homoiousians that they should not fear the formula HOMOIOUSION, which had become the trademark of the decisions of the Council of Nicea. His efforts were crowned at the COUNCIL OF CONSTANTINOPLE, shortly after his death. He was also noted for his defense of the poor against the encroachments of the rich and for his care for the sick, the strangers, and others in need.

J.G.

BATES, KATHERINE LEE (1859-1929). The author of "America the Beautiful" was born August 12 in Falmouth, Massachusetts, to the Reverend William and Cornelia Frances Lee Bates, the youngest of their five children. Her father, a Congregational minister, died within a month of her birth.

She received her B.A. in 1880 from Wellesley College, where she soon returned to teach English until her retirement in 1925. After a year's study at Oxford University in England in 1891, she was awarded an M.A. by Wellesley. She published eight volumes of poetry as well as travel, children's, and text books.

"America the Beautiful" was written in Colorado in the summer of 1893, inspired by the view from the summit of Pike's Peak. It was originally published July 4, 1895, in the Congregationalist. A revised version appeared in 1904 in the Boston Evening Telegraph, and it was revised slightly again several years later. Bates died on March 28.

N.H.

BATHSHEBA. A Hebrew name meaning "daughter of abundance." The daughter of Eliam, the wife of Uriah the Hittite, and later, David's wife. Captivated by Bathsheba's beauty, DAVID seduced her, and, with Joab's help, orchestrated Uriah's death so that he might claim her as his wife (II Sam. 11). Later, Bathsheba bore SOLOMON (12:24).

When David was in his dotage, Bathsheba and the prophet Nathan successfully obtained from the king his assurance that Solomon, rather than Adonijah, would succeed him as king (I Kings 1:11-31). Soon after Solomon's enthronement, Bathsheba conveyed to Solomon Adonijah's rash petition that Abishag, David's concubine, be given to him to be his wife. This incident cost Adonijah his life (2:13-25).

J.K.K.

BAT MITZVAH. A Jewish girl who has reached the age of religious responsibility (according to Jewish law, twelve years and a day) and who is therefore obligated to perform God's commandments. Unlike the BAR MITZVAH ceremony, the Bat Mitzvah rite is an American innovation. It is observed in Conservative, Reform, and Reconstructionist synagogues.

L.K.

BAUER, WALTER (1904-60). This Göttingen (West Germany) NT scholar has two claims to fame. Among his many contributions to early Christian history is a commentary on the Gospel of John in which he sought to establish connections between John and the sect of the Mandaens, a Syrian Gnostic group whose texts had been published by R. Bultmann about the time Bauer's commentary appeared. Of far greater and lasting value was Bauer's work as a lexicographer of NT Greek, whose language he systematically and scientifically studied over several decades. The result is his definitive A Greek-English Lexicon of the New Testament and Other Early Christian Literature, whose fourth edition (1952) was translated by W. F. Arndt and F. W. Gingrich in 1957, with a revised and augmented translation, edited by Gingrich and F. W. Danker in 1979. Bauer died in 1960, two years after his fifth edition of the Lexicon.

R.M.

BAUR, FERDINAND C. (1762-1860). His name is inseparably linked with the University of Tübingen, West Germany, where his teaching and influence were centered. The "Tübingen School" looks to him as its founder.

His chief contribution lay in a historical reconstruction of early Christianity according to the principle that each NT document and piece of early Christian writing was motivated by a desire to represent a distinctive point of view. The upshot was seen in his configuration of the early church, which was set by two opposing groups—a Jewish party led by Peter and a Gentile movement under Paul's inspiration. Luke's Acts came later as an attempt to effect a synthesis and led to the rise of the early Catholic church of the second century. Baur thus anticipated many of the more recent trends in NT study, notably in tracing a move away from early apostolic enthusiasm to institutionalized Christianity in the later NT documents.

R.M.

BAXTER, RICHARD (1615-91). The founding father of English nonconformity was born November 12 in Rowton, Shropshire. Largely self-educated, he was ordained in 1638 by the Presbyterian party.

A "peacemaker at the center of all disputes in a contentious time," he served as chaplain to OLIVER CROMWELL and yet worked to restore King Charles. Along with a thousand other PURITANS, he was ousted on St. Bartholomew's Day in 1662, from his parish. He had served at Kidderminster since 1641. Persecuted over the next twenty years, he was imprisoned in 1685 for eighteen months.

In the midst of turmoil and despite ill health, he managed to write about two hundred works. The Reformed Pastor is a textbook for parish ministry, stressing the importance of personal counseling as well as preaching. While slowed down because of illness in 1647 and anticipating death, he wrote the devotional classic The Saints' Everlasting Rest. Also widely reprinted is A Call to the Unconverted. His celebrated autobiography, Mr. Richard Baxter's Narrative of the Most Memorable Passages of His Life and Times, was published in 1696. He once said he preached as "a dying man to dying men."

He died in London on December 8.

N.H.

BAY PSALM BOOK. Titled The Whole Booke of Psalmes, it was the first book published in British North America. This metric version of the Psalms was prepared by the PURITAN leaders of the Massachusetts Bay Colony and printed by Stephen Day in Cambridge, Massachusetts, in 1640.

N.H.

BEAST. Though the precise meaning of "beast" is not always evident, the biblical reference might be to any mammal, a wild animal or a domesticated animal. Undifferentiated animals appear in such texts as Job 35:11 (comparing the wisdom of "beasts of the earth" with that of "birds of the air"), Ecclesiastes 3:18-21 (declaring that "the sons of men" and "beasts" meet the same fate), and Psalm 50:10 (affirming that God owns "every beast of the forest").

Nevertheless, wild beasts and domesticated animals are often distinguished. Jacob assumes that a "wild beast" has devoured his favorite son, Joseph (Gen. 37:33). Goliath taunts David by saying, "I will give your flesh . . . to the beasts of the field" (I Sam. 17:44). And Jesus dwells among "wild beasts" during his temptation experience (Mark 1:13). Domesticated animals are obviously referred to in the prohibition against sodomy (Lev. 20:15-16), the narrative reporting that the Israelites smote Benjaminite "men and beasts" (Judg. 20:48), and the aphorism that a righteous man treats "his beast" considerately (Prov. 12:10).

Beasts appear symbolically in the apocalyptic books of Daniel and Revelation (see APOCALYPTICISM) to denote worldly kingdoms that oppose God and God's people. In Daniel's first vision, four beasts emerge from the watery chaos (Dan. 7:2-7). An angel instructs Daniel that the lion, bear, leopard, and ten-horned monster respectively symbolize the Babylonian, Median, Persian, and Seleucid kingdoms. All four transient powers must yield to the establishment of God's eternal, universal kingdom.

These four beasts have been combined into one composite monster in Revelation 13:1-10 to symbolize goddess worldly power, now culminating in the Roman Empire. Emerging from the sea, this beast is incited to persecute God's saints. A second beast in Revelation, bearing lamb's horns, emerges from the earth. As it engages in false priestly and prophetic functions, God's sovereignty is challenged and Roman emperor worship advanced (13:11-18).

J.K.K.

BEATIFICATION. A process in the Roman Catholic Church which ends with a papal decree that allows a diocese, nation, or religious order to honor as blessed (that is, as certainly being in heaven), a deceased person who had a reputation for holiness. A public declaration may later be made, after investigation, that the blessed person practiced heroic virtues or was martyred, and after death was instrumental in interceding with God so as to work miracles. Strong evidence of at least two miracles is required generally for beatification to be conferred, although this may be waived for a martyr.

J.C.

BEATIFIC VISION. Seeing God directly, in God's own essence; a theophany or manifestation of the Divine. Such a vision is attainable only by the deeply pious, aided by divine grace. There is said to be no mediation or image in this final experience of human happiness, the blessed Holy Trinity.

J.C.

BEATITUDES. The series of statements of Jesus reported in Matthew 5:3-12 and Luke 6:20-23, in which he pronounces the benefits bestowed by God on the faithful, are commonly known as the Beatitudes. In each case these appear in the context of an address by Jesus: in Matthew, the SERMON ON THE MOUNT; in Luke the address to his followers spoken on a plain (Luke 6:17). The basic Jesus tradition drawn upon by both evangelists derives from the Q SOURCE, but has been modified and adapted in each case.

The term "blessed" or "happy" is a familiar one from the Psalms and wisdom literature, for example, Psalms 1:1; 32:1; 41:1; 84:5; 119:1; Proverbs 8:34. The basic meaning of the Hebrew root is "straight," or "in the right direction," so that the word implies that one is in right relationship to God and to God's will for humanity. What distinguishes the Beatitudes of Jesus from those in the Jewish wisdom tradition are (1) the assurance to those who are presently deprived that God has not abandoned them, and (2) the promise of vindication by God at the end of the present age.

The older form of the tradition is found in Luke, who reports the Beatitudes as addressed by Jesus directly to his hearer: "Blessed are you. . . ." By contrast, Matthew reports Jesus as making more general statements in the third person: "Blessed are the poor. . . ." Furthermore, Luke's version of the saying is addressed to those in immediate, practical need: "You poor" (6:20), "You that hunger" (6:21a), "You that weep" (6:21b). But in Matthew these difficulties are represented as in the spiritual or strictly religious realm: "the poor in spirit" (5:3); "those who hunger and thirst for righteousness" (5:6). Further, the Lukan form of these sayings makes a sharp contrast between present deprivation and future divine vindication, while Matthew places more emphasis on the present. The now/then contrast is explicit in Luke 6:21 (twice) and in 6:25. The hatred experienced by Jesus' hearers is the consequence of their fidelity to the Son of man (6:22), whose triumphant return and exaltation is awaited "in the day" (6:23). The reward awaiting the faithful—according to both Matthew's and Luke's versions—is already stored up in heaven awaiting its bestowal by God in the day of future judgment.

Luke has provided a set of "Woes" to match the Beatitudes (6:24-26). These warnings of judgment are addressed to those who possess precisely what the "blessed" lack: wealth, abundance of food, laughter, good popular reputations. Thus Luke highlights the practical concerns that permeate his Gospel and Acts. For him the gospel is preeminently for "the poor" (Luke 4:18; as is for Isaiah, 61:1).

Matthew's version of the Beatitudes has generalized and spiritualized them. The "poor in spirit" are those aware of their spiritual needs, just as those who "hunger and thirst for righteousness" are those who long for their lives to be fully consonant with the will of God. Their mourning, their meekness, their role as peacemakers give evidence of their dependence upon God, of their refusal to take the initiative in their own defense, and of their eagerness to share in the work of reconciling to God their fellow creatures (5:4, 5, 9). Having assumed this stance toward God and the world, they are warned to expect hatred, suffering, and persecution for the sake of the righteous life in obedience to God to which they are committed (5:11). In proclaiming their understanding of God's purpose by their words and deeds of reconciliation they are inviting upon themselves the hatred and denunciation that the prophets of ancient Israel experienced. Indeed, they have now taken over the prophetic role, as is implied in their being differentiated from "the prophets who were before you" (5:12).

In both versions of the Beatitudes, Jesus is represented as summoning his followers to a new mode of life, with values and objectives so different from those of their religious contemporaries that the latter reject them and their message. The hope of the faithful rests not in popular acclaim, however, but in the assurance of ultimate vindication by God.

H.K.

BECKET, THOMAS (about 1118–70). English chancellor, archbishop, and martyr was born in Cheapside, London. Educated at Merton priory and in Paris, he began his career as a city clerk and accountant.

Archbishop Theobald sent him to study civil and canon law in Bologna and Auxerre. In 1154 Theobald appointed him archdeacon of Canterbury and within three months also recommended him as chancellor to Henry II. Fifteen years older than the king, he served as a paternal friend and devoted administrator.

However, after Theobald's death in 1161, Henry insisted on naming Thomas archbishop of CANTERBURY. Thomas transferred his allegiance to the church, becoming devout, austere, and completely embracing the Gregorian reforms, which included free election of clergy, inviolability of church property, freedom of appeal to Rome, and clerical immunity from secular courts.

He resigned the chancellorship, opposed Henry's tax proposals, and excommunicated a leading baron. The crisis came in January 1164 when Henry demanded blanket assent to the Constitutions of Clarendon, which gave the king the right to punish lesser clerics and forbade appeals to Rome. Thomas resisted and was tried at the Council of Northampton, October 6-13, 1164. He lived in exile in France from November 2, 1164, to December 2, 1170.

When Henry had the archbishop of York crown his son co-king, Thomas and the pope excommunicated all participants. Fearing interdict, Henry allowed Thomas to return to Canterbury and restored Thomas' confiscated possessions. However, four knights murdered Thomas in the cathedral on December 29, 1170.

His tomb immediately became a place of pilgrimage, and in order to pacify his people and his conscience, Henry did penance there in 1174. Henry VIII despoiled the shrine, burned his bones, and erased his name from the service books, making him a symbol for Catholics.

N.H.

BECOMING. A philosophical term meaning "to enter into existence, to emerge." The term conveys a sense of process and the possibility of fulfillment or completion. To become involves growth, through which the essence or nature of being is made known. Becoming can also mean to develop significance.

Becoming is contrasted with ESSENCE, which suggests a state of being that is static. Classical philosophies referred to essence as the ultimate reality. Existentialist thinkers, like process thinkers, prefer dealing with a dynamic situation. They would say that the reality of personhood lies not in mere "essence," which is basic to all, but in becoming or existence, which is the quality of living in time and space, confronting a world that may be unfriendly, indifferent, or inimical—a situation that confronts one with choices and decisions. I.C.

BEDE, THE VENERABLE. English monk, scholar, and historian, best known for his Ecclesiastical History of the English Nation, although he also wrote a number of works of biblical exposition, as well as treatises on scientific subjects. He was probably born after 672, and died sometime around 735. The reason he was known as the Venerable from an early time—perhaps less than a century after his death—is not altogether clear. Although at present he is known mostly for his historical works, as one of the main sources for our knowledge of early English history, in earlier times he was most admired for his sanctity and for his expositions of Scripture. J.G.

Courtesy of the Scribner Art File

Three Beechers: Lyman, with his daughter Harriett and son Henry Ward

BEECHER, HENRY WARD (1813–87). The pastor of Plymouth Congregational Church, Brooklyn, was born to Lyman and Roxanna Foote Beecher, at Litchfield, Connecticut. He attended Mt. Pleasant Classical Institute of Amherst, Amherst College, and Lane Seminary. In 1837 he was licensed by the Cincinnati Presbytery and called to Lawrenceburg, Indiana. That same year he married Eunice White Bullard. Ordained November 9, 1838, he served eight years in Indianapolis, where he wrote his famous Seven Lectures to Young Men (1844).

On October 10, 1847, he was called to Plymouth Church in Brooklyn. From 1870 to 1881 he served as editor of the Christian Union. His career was marred in the 1870s, however, by scandal. He was accused of adultery, though both ecclesiastical and civil courts acquitted him. His writings include Life of Jesus the Christ (1871), Norwood, or Village Life in New England (1867), Yale Lectures on Preaching (1872-74), and Evolution and Religion (1885). He died on March 8.

N.H.

BEECHER, LYMAN (1775-1863). The Presbyterian revivalist and seminary president was born in New Haven, Connecticut, to David and Esther Lyman Beecher. At Yale he was strongly influenced by TIMOTHY DWIGHT. In 1799 he was ordained to the Presbyterian Church of East Hampton, Long Island. On September 19, 1799, he married Roxanna Foote, and they had nine children including Catherine, Harriet, and Henry Ward. He married Harriet Porter in 1817, and after her death, Lydia Beals Jackson.

In 1810 he moved to Litchfield, Connecticut, and gained fame as a revivalist, temperance advocate, leader in the Home Missionary, American Bible, and American Colonization societies. In 1826 he was called to Hanover Street Church, Boston, to battle Unitarianism. In 1831 his anti-Roman Catholic sermons resulted in the sacking of the Ursuline Convent in Charlestown, Massachusetts. In 1832 he became president and professor of theology at Lane Theological Seminary and pastor of Second Presbyterian Church in Cincinnati. He retired in 1850 and died on January 10.

N.H.

BEEZEBUL/BEEZEBUB. The name given "the prince of demons" in the NT, used interchangeably with SATAN (compare Matt. 12:24 with Matt. 12:27). Beelzebub is the form of the name used in the RSV, although ancient Latin and Syriac versions used the form "Beelzebub." The foes of Jesus declared that he worked miracles because he was possessed by Beelzebub, or was actually Beelzebub himself. Jesus made fun of the idea that the devil would give him power to cast out demons, demolishing that charge (Matt. 12:22-29). From Jesus' response to the Pharisees, it appears that the name was used for Satan. The Hebrew background of the term Satan means "adversary, accuser, slanderer." Beelzebub (or, properly Beelzebub, in the original) may carry the same meaning, but probably means "the lord of the flies" or "the lord of dung," sarcastic Hebrew references to false gods or idols. Jesus' enemies may have used this old-fashioned term in order to express their horror and contempt of Jesus' person and works.

J.C.

BEER-SHEBA. The meaning of the word is undetermined, but it may mean "well of the seven" (Gen. 21:25-31), "of the oath" (Gen. 21:31; 26:32-33), perhaps "well of (the city of) Sheba" (Josh. 19:2; Job 6:19; Ps. 72:10, 15; Isa. 60:6; Jer. 6:20; Ezek. 27:22; 38:13). For topographical reasons, Beer-sheba was and is the unique crossroads and center of population of the Negeb. It was a sacred place (Gen. 21:33; 46:1-5; Amos 8:14) and the traditional southernmost limit of Judah, as in "from Dan to Beer-sheba" (Judg. 20:1; I Sam. 3:20).

Tel Beer-sheba, about four miles east of the modern city, has been excavated by Y. Aharoni and others, beginning in 1969. A well-planned, walled city from the time of David and Solomon was uncovered, having a complex of storehouses, a large, disassembled stone altar, the foundations of a temple(?), and, in front of the city gate, a well, excavated to a depth of sixty-five feet, possibly the well of the patriarchs.

P.L.G.

BEHAVIORISM. The term first referred to the work of a Russian psychologist, I. P. Pavlov, who published the results of his experiments (1927) in what is now referred to as "classical" conditioning. His objective was to demonstrate the relationship between a stimulus and the response. He wondered if another stimulus could be substituted that would bring the same response. Pavlov concluded that there are physiological connections within the brain that call forth specific responses to particular stimuli. (You smell a fragrance from the oven and begin to feel hungry; the smell signals "dinner.") Such conditioning can be used to establish emotional reactions in one person to another person or situation.

The present emphasis of the term is on operant or instrumental conditioning. This refers to the fact that the objective of conditioning is to form habits or teach skills, thereby changing behavior. All learning proceeds gradually through successive steps. Specific learning will take place when a particular stimulus evokes a desired response. But practice alone will not cause a person to remember. The key to learning is reinforcement.

There are two forms of reinforcement. The most effective one is a positive reinforcement, reward. A teacher demonstrates to a pupil the first step in learning a new skill. The learner repeats this step in imitation of the teacher. If the learner has succeeded, the teacher says "well done" and may give a tangible reward, indicating approval. After this step has been repeated a number of times, the habit pattern will usually have become established. Repetition at longer intervals helps retention. Highly motivated people may seem to wait a long time for positive reinforcement, but in fact they may be receiving this through the sense of satisfaction that comes from believing that they are on the right track, or because of their determination to succeed.

Negative reinforcement, punishment, has another effect. The person whose incorrect answer or incomplete performance is received with disparaging words or a sharply worded "that's wrong" will become anxious or angry. These emotions inhibit learning. The learner's attention has shifted from the task to the personal discomfort. There are some situations in which potential danger makes it necessary to use punishment (or "aversive" conditioning)—if, for example, a person might be hurt or do damage.

Reward needs to follow immediately upon the giving of the correct answer, otherwise the pupil makes no direct connection between the answer and the affirmation. Reinforcement theory is connected with the name of Harvard psychologist B. F. Skinner. He has applied these principles to all forms of learning.

A child talks because adults encourage this. Children respond in love because someone evidences love to them. Creativity is encouraged when a person wins approval by thinking in novel ways. If, however, a person is ridiculed for trying the unusual, that person learns to conform to such expectations. In the religious sector, attitudes toward doctrine, Scripture, authority, or life-styles are influenced by what the religious group deems acceptable behavior. The responses to a worship service, whatever the form, become habitual.

Conditioned learning has had various applications. Programmed learning is a method by which an objective is analyzed into specific steps. The learner is reinforced at the completion of each step until the whole procedure is learned. Conditioning has also been used as a method for behavior therapy, a departure from classical techniques because it ignores the patient's past and concentrates on the immediate problem. It has been used to help brain-damaged children learn motor skills.

Through conditioning psychologists hope to develop tools for predicting and controlling behavior. It is admitted that there are so many variables involved in the responses people make that such prediction is difficult, although computers have been used in the process. It is also recognized that conditioning can be abused. People can be trained to do evil as well as to do good.

Philosophically, behaviorism raises the question of DETERMINISM versus FREE WILL. Behavioristic psychology has tended to be deterministic. If specific conditions encourage people to make particular responses, can there be a freely willed response? B. F. Skinner has addressed the question in more than one book and seems to answer that good conditioning is freedom.

I.C.

BEHEMOTH (a plural noun meaning "dumb beasts"). Behemoth is a poetic noun referring, presumably, to one of the "great sea monsters," probably the hippopotamus or a similar river-marsh dwelling mammoth, created on the fifth day of creation (Gen. 1:21).

Job 40:15-24 gives a lengthy description of the beast, "the first of the works of God," its frightening appearance, and its remarkable behavior. The "cattle (behemoth) on a thousand hills" (Ps. 50:10) probably should be thought of as "dumb beasts." In Jewish lore, Behemoth became a female sea BEAST, whose male counterpart, LEVIATHAN (Job 41:1-11), is a land beast (Apoc. of Baruch 29:4). In the Revelation, reference is made to a "beast rising out of the sea" (13:1) "with seven heads and ten horns" (17:7), and to a second "beast which rose out of the earth" (13:11). (Compare Dan. 7:3, "four great beasts came up out of the sea.")

P.L.G.

BEING AND NONBEING. These terms have been discussed by philosophers from the beginning. That which has being is real. For PLATO, reality belongs to eternal essences—ideas, values, mathematical entities, etc. The sensible world of becoming lies between being and nonbeing. For ARISTOTLE, on the contrary, the reality consists of individual existent entities. A third view is found in PLOTINUS—the ultimate reality is not itself something that is (a being) but the mysterious ground and begetter of beings, so that paradoxically it can be called a "nonbeing." It should be noted that the Greeks distinguished two meanings of nonbeing: ouk on is sheer nothingness, me on is potentiality.

Theologians connected these speculations with the name of God in Exodus: I am that I am. So Aquinas held that the most appropriate name for God is Qui est, "He who is." What is not clearly resolved in Aquinas is the problem of whether God is a being, albeit of a different order from created beings. Mystical theologians in the tradition of NEOPLATONISM were clear that God is not a being and could even call God nothing. This view was also held by the German Dominican theologian, mystic, and preacher, Meister Eckhart. These questions have been revived in recent times. HEIDEGGER speaks of the ontological difference between being and beings, while TILlich holds that while God is being itself, God does not exist as a being.

J.M.

BEL (meaning "one who rules," that is, Lord; an Akkadian title similar to the Hebrew title BAAL, Bel is used in the Bible only by Isaiah (46:1) and Jeremiah (50:2; 51:44) as a designation for the chief god of Babylon and Babylonia—MARDUK. From before Hammurabi (about 1800 B.C.), Marduk was worshiped. In Babylonian thought, the gods chose him to be supreme after his victory over Tiamat, goddess of chaos. Thereafter Marduk made humans and gave them civilization.

P.L.G.

BEL AND THE DRAGON. An addition to the book of Daniel contained in the APOCRYPHA. It offers two entertaining stories dating to about 130 B.C., which polemicize against idols by subjecting them to ridicule. The first story portrays Daniel's success in convincing King Cyrus that the great statue of Bel (Bel-Marduk), Babylon's patron deity, is merely inanimate and his priests fraudulent. The second story reports that a monstrous Babylonian dragon is slain by the peculiar diet (pitch, fat, and hair) Daniel feeds it. In both, Daniel, who resolutely trusts in "the living God" (vv. 5, 25), survives life-threatening circumstances.

J. K. K.

BELIAL. A noun of obscure mythological origin denoting that which threatens cosmic, social, and cultic order. Its etymology has been variously explained. If the noun derives from the Hebrew root bāla ("to swallow"), it would signify a devouring abyss (Sheol) or personify an enemy (mythological). But if Belial is a Hebrew neologism consisting of the particle beli ("not") plus a verb of positive expression, two meanings are plausible. First, beli may combine with 'ālah ("to ascend") to denote that which does not ascend ("what is unsuccessful?") or the underworld from which ascent is impossible. Second, beli may combine with yā'al ("to profit, benefit") to denote what is worthless, base, or destructive.

The poetic Hebrew text of Psalm 18:4 ("the torrents of perdition") and Psalm 41:8 ("a deadly thing") demonstrates the capacity of Belial to symbolize mythological powers of chaos that bring sickness or death. A threatened social order is attested in the noun's use in Deuteronomy 15:9 to indicate "a base thought" inducing mistreatment of the poor, and in Proverbs 19:28 to portray "a worthless witness" mocking justice. Mention of "base fellows" advocating the worship of foreign gods (Deut. 13:13) and "worthless men" (Eli's priestly sons) who hold ritualistic requirements in contempt (I Sam. 2:12) illustrates the use of Belial to convey a threatened cultic order.

The Dead Sea Scrolls personify Belial as the leader of the children of darkness against the children of light, and in the Pseudepigrapha, Belial (frequently miswritten "Beliar") is mainly the tempter enticing humanity to sin. The NT attests Belial but once, in a personification synonymus with SATAN (II Cor. 6:15).

J. K. K.

BELIEF. See FAITH.

BELLARMINI, ROBERT (1542–1621). A cardinal and JESUIT theologian, Bellarmine was a leader of the COUNTER-REFORMATION. Born on October 4 in Montepulciano, Tuscany, Italy, he entered the Society of Jesus in 1560. He studied in Rome, Mondovi, Padua, and finally Louvain, where he was ordained in 1570 and then taught theology. While teaching in Rome, he was named a cardinal in 1599 by Clement VIII. He became archbishop of Capua in 1602.

Bellarmino was the first to critique the writings of GALILEI. His own writings included a series of lectures against heresies (1568–93), the Clementine edition of the Vulgate (1591–92), an influential catechism (1597), a book on the pope's power (1610), and an autobiography (1675). Bellarmine died September 17, 1621, was canonized in 1930, and named a doctor of the church in 1931.

N. H.

BELOVED DISCIPLE. The designation "the disciple, whom Jesus loved" occurs five times in the Fourth Gospel, and nowhere else in the NT. Moreover, he appears only in the latter part of that Gospel, from chapter 13 to 21 (13:23; 19:26; 20:2; 21:7, 20). Various suggestions have been made as to his identity: John, Mark, Lazarus, an "ideal disciple" and—traditionally—John the apostle. Of these options the last-named has the strongest claim to credibility, though distinguishing him from the author or final editor of the Gospel. Rather he is one of the sources embodying the Johannine tradition that is built into this multi-layered Gospel.

R. M.

BELSHAZZAR. An Akkadian name, meaning "O Bel, guard the king," which was given to the last king of Babylon (556–539 B.C.; Dan. 7:1; 8:1), the crown prince, son, and regent of Nabonidus. In Assyriological sources, the death of Belshazzar is not mentioned. In the Bible, Belshazzar is remembered for his great "feast" (Dan. 5). This festal occasion Belshazzar arranged in Babylon. In the midst of the revelry, a hand appeared and wrote on the plastered wall of the king's palace words that Daniel interpreted as forecasting the king's death. "That very night Belshazzar, the Chaldean king, was slain" (Dan. 5:30), and Babylon fell into the hands of the Medes (Dan. 5:31).

P. L. G.

BEN- The Hebrew equivalent of the Aramaic BAR-. A prefix to a father's name meaning "son of _____," regularly so translated in English versions. Ben- also appears in combination with a word related to the circumstances of birth, such as, Ben-jamin, son of fortune, and Ben-oni, son of my sorrow (Gen. 35:18).

P. L. G.

BENEDICT/BENEDICTINES/RULE OF ST. BENEDICT. Benedict of Nursia (about 480–543) founded the Benedictines, and through his Rule influenced virtually all subsequent MONASTICISM. Born in Nursia and educated in Rome, he sought at an early age to escape the gross immoralities of his day by retreating to the Abruzzi mountains. Many visitors sought his advice, and some nobles sent children to him for instruction. Nearby monks made him their abbot, and then rejected him for imposing strict discipline. Eventually he established twelve monasteries with twelve monks each around Rome, and served as their abbot. Contentions forced him to leave. About 520, he and some followers founded the monastery at Monte Cassino. There he wrote his Rule. Our scant biographical data comes from The Dialogues of GREGORY I (590–604).

The Benedictines are monks, nuns, other clergy, and laity in Roman Catholicism who follow St. Benedict's Rule. Their monasteries and houses are relatively autonomous, being only loosely joined regionally and nationally. When the Lombards overran Monte Cassino, 580-90, Benedict's followers found refuge in Rome and thrived under Gregory I, the first of fifty Benedictine popes. In 596 Gregory sent AUGUSTINE OF CANTERBURY and a group of monks to Britain. The Rule was later carried back to the mainland by Benedictines from England, particularly Boniface, who in 751 crowned Pepin king of the Franks. By 1100 there were over three thousand Benedictine monasteries in Europe. During the Middle Ages their self-contained establishments became centers of learning, liturgy, art, and hospitality. Their numbers steadily increased in the Middle Ages but declined sharply during the Renaissance-Reformation. In France and Germany during the seventeenth century they contributed substantially to scholarly research. Now worldwide, the Benedictines have regained much of their former strength.

The Rule of St. Benedict was written to govern monastic living at Monte Cassino. It organized the monks' lives around the Divine Office (Opus Dei), dividing each day into worship, work, study, and sleep. The Rule reflected Benedict's experience but drew on the rules of BASIL THE GREAT and PACHOMIUS. By not disdaining material things or encouraging ascetic poverty, the Rule had wide appeal and provided a base for works of mercy. Meriting heaven through good deeds was primary. An abbot chosen by the group guided and disciplined the community. To him each monk swore loyalty and obedience, but the abbot was considerate of needs and sought counsel from others.

The Benedictines owned everything in common. Personal articles were gifts for use and were returned when others were issued. Their clothing was cheap and simple, only what the weather required. Seven times each day they formally praised God. During their two daily meals a brother read aloud, thus affording an education. Food per day was a pound of bread, a pint of wine, two cooked vegetables, and fruit in season. Only the sick received meat. Silence was enjoined at all times. Guests were treated well whether rich or poor. Disobedient monks could be severely disciplined and expelled. Readmission was possible only after repentance, but not more than three times. Monasteries were self-contained, and the Rule was read frequently. C.M.

BENEDICT XIV, POPE. Born Prospero Lambertini, in Bologna, Italy, 1675. He was one of the most accommodating, respected, and intelligent popes of the eighteenth century (1740–58). Highly educated, a scholar all his life, he rose in ecclesiastical ranks to become cardinal, 1728; archbishop of Bologna, 1731; and pope in 1740 after 254 ballots.

Admired for his administration, he settled mixed marriage disputes, regulated Indian and Chinese rites, restrained the INDEX OF PROHIBITED BOOKS, fostered science, and wrote numerous letters. Voltaire was among his correspondents. In the papal states he lowered taxes, promoted commerce, and improved agriculture. His concessions to secular powers aroused criticism. He relinquished patronage, rights of nominations to vacant sees, and some jurisdiction. However, he was highly regarded and heightened the papacy's moral image. His writings include On Sacrifice in the Mass, On the Beatification and Canonization of Saints, On Mixed Marriages, and On Canon Law, plus numerous bulls and encyclicals. He died in Rome in 1758.

C.M.

BENEDICTION. A blessing, in Protestant churches, a parting prayer or invocation of the Lord at the end of a worship service. In the Roman Catholic Church, it communicates divine powers by purifying or blotting out sins of omission and the temporal punishment for sins. Supernatural powers are believed to be communicated by the benediction.

J.C.

BENEDICTUS. A poem or canticle spoken as a prophecy by Zechariah, father of John the Baptizer, at John's circumcision (Luke 1:68-79). It is called the Benedictus from the first word of the poem in Latin, "Praise be (to the God of Israel)." This poem closely resembles the MAGNIFICAT of Mary, recorded in Luke 1:46-55, for Zechariah, like Mary, thanks and praises God for divine grace. God's liberation of the oppressed is also stressed (vv. 73ff.), as it is in the Magnificat (vv. 50-53). The language and the poetic parallelism of the Benedictus point to a Hebrew original, which was either translated by Luke or quoted from an existing Greek translation. The poem is strongly oriented to a Messianic expectation and makes many references to the salvation history recorded in the OT. The last part of the poem specifies that John will be the prophet of God and the forerunner of God's Messiah (vv. 76-77).

J.C.

BEN-HADAD. A Hebrew name meaning "son of (the god) Hadad"; the name of three kings of Aram-Damascus.

Courtesy of the National Museum in Aleppo

Stele of Ben-hadad, son of Tabrimmon, king of Damascus, from Aleppo, bearing Aramaic dedicatory inscription of the god Baal Melqart

(1) Ben-hadad I was the son of Tabrimmon, who was the son of Hezion, king of Syria (I Kings 15:18). He reigned as king about 885–870 B.C. When BAASHA, king of Israel (900–877), and ASA, king of Judah (913–873), disputed their common boundary across the hill country, Ben-hadad was persuaded to intervene for Judah's benefit. Baasha sought to strengthen Israel's position by blockading Judah's capital on its northern side (I Kings 15:16–22). His forces penetrated southward into Benjamin, where they overtook and began to fortify Ramah, a city only five miles north of Jerusalem. Striving to defend his endangered capital, Asa bribed Ben-hadad to annul his already existing alliance with Baasha and support Judah. Ben-hadad's forces ravaged territories north of the Sea of Galilee, whereupon Baasha abandoned Ramah and terminated his Jerusalem blockade. Moreover, by his display of strength in northern Israel, Ben-hadad protected a vital Galilean caravan route, linking Damascus with the Mediterranean coast.

(2) Ben-hadad II, whose personal name presumably was Hadadezer, reigned about 870–842 B.C. Increasingly, biblical scholarship suspects that the reign of Ben-hadad I was briefer than once supposed, and that the Israelite kings, AHAB (869–850) and Jehoram (849–842), interacted with a different Damascus ruler than did Baasha. At issue is the interpretation of a five-line inscription displayed on a basalt stele discovered near Aleppo and dating to about 850 B.C. Dedicated to the Phoenician deity Melqart (Melcarth), it appears to celebrate Syria's victory over the Assyrian monarch, Shalmaneser III (859–825), which was secured by a ruler other than the one presented in the preceding paragraph.

Though Israel felt uneasy about the northern presence of Aram-Damascus, the relationship that developed between Ahab and Ben-hadad II was bittersweet. Probably early in Ahab's reign, Ben-hadad II sought to thwart Israelite resurgence. Besieging Samaria, he demanded Israel's full-scale submission (I Kings 20:3, 5–6). With the general support of his people (20:8) and endorsement from Yahweh's prophets (20:13–14, 22), Ahab prepared for battle. Twice Damascus met defeat at Ahab's hand, and Ben-hadad II was captured (20:16–21, 26–33). Ahab magnanimously released his opponent on the conditions that the border cities Aram had taken from Omri be restored to Israel and that Israel be allowed a trading street in Damascus (20:34).

Assyria's goal of westward expansion under Shalmaneser III stimulated Ben-hadad II and Ahab to become serious allies. According to his annals, Shalmaneser tangled with an anti-Assyrian coalition at Qarqar in 853 B.C. Among the dozen western kings listed were Hadadezer of Damascus and Ahab of Israel. Since Shalmaneser opposed the same coalition in 849, 848, and 845, Israel and Aram must have maintained their friendship. At some juncture, however, Ahab sought to wrest Ramoth-gilead from Ben-hadad II. Damascus triumphed, and Ahab was slain (I Kings 22:29–37). Subsequently, Ben-hadad was murdered by his officer, Hazael, upon being told by Elisha that he would succeed the ailing king (II Kings 8:7–15).

(3) Ben-hadad III, Hazael's son and successor (about 806–? B.C.; II Kings 13:24). Ruling over a kingdom weakened by Assyrian invasions, Ben-hadad III was defeated three times by Jehoash, king of Israel (802–786; II Kings 13:14–19, 25). This allowed Israel to recover territories previously lost to Ben-hadad's father, Hazael (about 842–806; II Kings 10:32–33). Moreover, Ben-hadad III was devastated by the heavy tribute that the Assyrian monarch Adad-nirari (811–784) imposed on him.

J.K.K.

BENJAMIN/BENJAMINITES. A Hebrew name meaning, strictly, "son of the south, southerner," but in folk etymology, "son of the right hand [fortune]".

(1) Son of JACOB and Rachel (Gen. 35:18) and the eponymous ancestor of one of the twelve tribes. At his birth, his dying mother despairingly called him

Ben-oni ("son of my sorrow"), but Jacob named him Benjamin. He was the one full brother of Joseph and the only son of Jacob born in Palestine (near Bethlehem). Being the son of Jacob's autumn years and the offspring of Rachel, his favorite wife, Benjamin was greatly loved by his father, who only reluctantly permitted his departure to Egypt with his brothers in search of food (Gen. 43:1-15). Joseph's affection for Benjamin was likewise strong (43:29-34). Moreover, the Blessing of Moses (tenth century B.C.?) portrays Benjamin as a special recipient of God's love and protection (Deut. 33:12). Eventually, through Benjamin's offspring, his tribe came into existence (Gen. 46:21; Num. 26:38-41; I Chr. 7:6-12; 8:1-40).

(2) The tribe of Benjamin and its territory. Biblical scholars searching for the origins of this Israelite tribe are fascinated with mention of the Banû-yamîna ("sons of the south") in eighteenth-century B.C. cuneiform inscriptions discovered at Mari on the Middle Euphrates near Haran (Abraham's point of departure; Gen. 12:4). Their association with the Banû-sîmal ("sons of the north") has removed any misgivings about the meaning of their name. Most significant of all the peoples attested in these inscriptions, the Banû-yamîna are portrayed as a fierce, non-sedentary group that regularly assaulted territories over which Mari's king, Zimri-lim, ruled (about 1730-1697 B.C.). Their turbulent manner readily accords with the depiction of Benjamin as "a ravenous wolf" in the tenth-century B.C. (?) Blessing of Jacob (Gen. 49:27) and with the tribe's violent behavior in Judges 19-21. Nevertheless, the resemblance between the "southerners" of Mari and Israel may involve little more than their shared name.

"Southerner" Benjamin settled in the fertile hill country south of Ephraim, the tribe it accompanied across the Jordan River when penetrating central Palestine. Basically, Benjamin's modest territorial holding (presumably appropriate for the descendants of Jacob's youngest son) was circumscribed by these boundaries: a line from Bethel to Jericho on the north, the river Jordan on the east, a line from the Dead Sea to Beth-horon on the south, and a line from Kirjath-yearim to Beth-horon on the west. This territory, extending about twenty-eight miles in an east-west direction and twelve miles in a north-south direction, hosted such important towns as Jerusalem, Jericho, Bethel, Gibeon, and Mizpah (Josh. 18:11-28). Benjamin's smallness may account for the tribe's eighteen-year enslavement under Eglon, the king of Moab, until Ehud delivered his tribespeople (Judg. 3:12-30). And for protecting bestial men of Gibeah who had raped the Levite's concubine, the tribe was almost obliterated in the intertribal warfare that ensued (Judg. 20-21).

Israel's first king, Saul, chosen by prophetic designation and popular acclamation (I Sam. 10:1-2; 11:14-15), was a Benjaminite who governed the people from Gibeah, his hometown. Intense Benjaminite loyalties to Saul's house sometimes proved troublesome to David, who followed Saul on the throne (II Sam. 16:5-8; 20:1-2). Even so, when the ten northern tribes withdrew from Judah under Jeroboam's lead, Benjamin remained true to the Davidic house (I Kings 12:21). In fact, "Judah and Benjamin" are typically treated as one unit by later authors (for example, II Chr. 11:1; 15:2; 34:9; Ezra 4:1). Among the better known Benjaminites mentioned in the Bible are Jeremiah (Jer. 1:1), Mordecai (Esth. 2:5), and Paul (Rom. 11:1; Phil. 3:5).

(3) Jacob's great-grandson, through Benjamin, Jediel, and Bilhan (I Chr. 7:10).

(4) A son of Harim, who followed Ezra's mandate and divorced his Gentile wife (Ezra 10:31-32).

(5) A priestly contemporary of Nehemiah (Neh. 12:34), presumably identical with the Benjamin who helped repair Jerusalem's walls (3:23). J.K.K.

(3) Jacob's great-grandson, through Benjamin, Jediel, and Bilhan (I Chr. 7:10).

(4) A son of Harim, who followed Ezra's mandate and divorced his Gentile wife (Ezra 10:31-32).

(5) A priestly contemporary of Nehemiah (Neh. 12:34), presumably identical with the Benjamin who helped repair Jerusalem's walls (3:23). J.K.K.

BENTHAM, JEREMY (1748-1832). UTILITARIAN philosopher, Bentham was born in London on February 15. Educated at Westminster School, he received the B.A. from Queen's College, Oxford, in 1763. He then studied law at Lincoln's Inn.

His 1789 book, An Introduction to the Principles of Morals and Legislation, declared that the object of all legislation should be to provide for the "greatest happiness of the greatest number." His ethical HEDONISM recognized two basic human motives: pain or evil and pleasure or good. To help make ethical decisions, he developed a "hedonistic calculus" to measure an action's potential pain or pleasure.

A critic of judicial and political institutions, he fostered a number of reforms, such as a circular panopticon model for prisons in which a guard can see all the prisoners from a central position. His 1817 Catechism of Parliamentary Reform advocated annual elections, equal electoral districts, wider suffrage, and the secret ballot. In 1823 he helped found the Westminster Review. He died in London on June 6.

N.H.

BERDYAYEV, NIKOLAI (1874-1948). Widely regarded as one of the most profound and important spiritual philosophers of this century. He is appropriately spoken of as an advocate of Christian EXISTENTIALISM, although his thought was influenced by many sources and is not easily categorized. Berdyayev was born into a noble Russian family in Kiev, where he attended the university. In 1894 he embraced Marxism and for a time participated in revolutionary activities. He was arrested in 1898, spent two years in prison and three more years in exile in Vologda province. Upon his return to Kiev he met SERGIUS BULGAKOV, who was instrumental in his transition from Marxism to Christianity. The writings of DOSTOEVSKY played an even greater role in Berdyayev's conversion, and his study of the Russian novelist is among the best interpretations of Dostoevsky's religious views.

In 1922 Berdyaev was banished from Russia and settled in Paris, where he lived until his death. He organized meetings of Orthodox, Catholics, and Protestants and became a leading critic of communism and spokesman for the Russian emigrés.

For a quarter century Berdyaev published a score of works touching on various aspects of his philosophy of "spiritual Christianity." His criticism of the institutional church and his unorthodox religious views caused him to be denounced by some Russian Orthodox churchmen. Nevertheless, works such as Freedom and the Spirit (Eng. trans. 1935), The Destiny of Man (Eng. trans. 1937), Solitude and Society (Eng. trans. 1938), and Spirit and Reality (Eng. trans. 1939) were published in several European languages and established Berdyaev as not only an influential Christian thinker but a preeminent twentieth-century philosopher of human freedom and the life of the spirit.

J.L.

BERENGER OF TOURS. An eleventh-century theologian and professor at Tours who opposed the growing tendency toward the doctrine of TRANSUBSTANTIATION. He objected to Lanfranc's assertion that the body of Christ descends from heaven and is physically present at COMMUNION. His views, mostly derived from a treatise by Ratramnus of Corbie, which he attributed to JOHN SCOTUS ERIGENA, are not as clear as is his criticism of Lanfranc. The general direction of his argument, based on the theory of UNIVERSALS, is that the body of Christ, which is in heaven, does not descend to earth, but rather is present at Communion in a manner similar to that in which universals are present in particulars, that is, "ideally." His use of this term has led some to interpret him as holding to a symbolic presence of Christ in Communion. But this is probably a misrepresentation. Repeatedly condemned by ecclesiastical authorities, Berenger died a lonely and broken man in 1088.

J.G.

BERGSON, HENRI (1859–1941). A French philosopher considered one of the most original thinkers of this century. He is associated especially with the doctrines of vitalism and creative evolution. Bergson studied at the École Normale Supérieure, where, in 1889, he submitted his provocative essay Time and Free Will for the doctorate. He held the chair of the history of philosophy at the Collège de France from 1900 to 1924; was elected to the French Academy in 1914; and honored with the Nobel Prize in 1927.

In Time and Free Will (Eng. trans. 1910), Bergson sought to show the self-evidence of human freedom, and in Matter and Memory (Eng. trans. 1911) he demonstrated that consciousness is not identical with the physical activity of the brain. In Creative Evolution (Eng. trans. 1911), Bergson portrayed the evolutionary process as the work of a creative, spiritual life-force (élan vital) whose movement is novel and unpredictable. The Two Sources of Morality and Religion (Eng. trans. 1935) distinguished between closed and open moralities and religions, the former being static, the latter progressive and creative—the work of the great prophets and mystics.

Bergson's ideas have attracted many religious thinkers, including the Roman Catholic Modernist Eduard LeRoy and GEORGE TYRRELL, PIERRE TEILHARD DE CHARDIN, and several theologians associated with PROCESS THEOLOGY. J.L.

BERKELEY, GEORGE (1685–1753). Bishop and idealist philosopher, Berkeley was born March 12 in County Kilkenny, Ireland. Educated at Kilkenny College and Trinity College, Dublin, he received the B.A. in 1704. Ordained in 1710, he left Ireland in 1713 for London.

In 1724 he was named dean of Derry, and in 1728 he married Anne Forster. After living in Newport, Rhode Island, 1728–31, he became bishop of Cloyne in Dublin in 1734. He was a benefactor to both Harvard and Yale.

Influenced by the empiricism of JOHN LOCKE, Berkeley argued that "to be is to be perceived." One cannot conceive, much less prove, an independent world of matter. To do so would also set up such a world co-eternal with God and thus limit the deity.

Among Berkeley's most significant works are An Essay Towards a New Theory of Vision (1709), and A Treatise Concerning the Principles of Human Knowledge (1710). Berkeley died in Oxford on January 14.

N.H.

BERKHOF, LOUIS (1873–1957). Dutch-American Calvinistic theologian, minister of the Christian Reformed Church, professor of dogmatics, and president of Calvin Theological Seminary, Grand Rapids, Michigan. Born in Holland, Berkhof was brought to America as a child. He graduated from Calvin Theological Seminary, studied at Princeton, was a pastor for a short while, and then taught for thirty years at Calvin Theological Seminary. Berkhof's speciality was SYSTEMATIC THEOLOGY. He produced a three-volume Reformed Dogmatics in 1932 and a Manual of Reformed Doctrine in 1933. His Systematic Theology (1941) is still studied by orthodox Reformed pastors. His last book was The Second Coming of Christ (1953). Berkhof stood in the line of the Free University of Amsterdam's orthodox Reformed theologians, Kuyper and Bavinck, and the Americans CHARLES HODGE and B. B. WARFIELD. His writings are still popular among American evangelicals. Berkhof rejected the hyper-Calvinism popular among some American Dutch Reformed pastors in the 1920s. J.C.

BERKOUWER, GERRIT CORNELIUS (1903–). Professor of theology at the Free University of Amsterdam and Dutch Reformed theologian of the dissenting Gereformeerde Kerken, a nineteenth-century schism from the established Hervormde Kerk. A gymnasium teacher's son, Berkouwer was educated at the Christian Gymnasium and the Free University of Amsterdam, receiving the doctorate in theology, cum laude, in 1934. He served as a parish pastor, first in Friesland, then in Amsterdam, from 1927 to 1945. In the latter year, Berkouwer was elected to the chair of dogmatics at the Free University. He began a steady but unsystematic series of monographs, publishing one every other year. He also wrote a number of other books, including the widely read The Triumph of Grace in the Theology of Karl Barth (1956). Berkouwer contributed articles almost every week to the Gereformeerde Weekblad and the newspaper Trouw. In 1961 he was invited to be an official observer at the Second Vatican Council.

Berkouwer is well known in neo-Fundamentalist and Fundamentalist circles in the United States. Despite his rejection of theological speculation and his gradual movement toward the positions of Karl Barth, he is fundamentally a scholastic theologian dealing in the debates of the seventeenth century concerning predestination and election. Berkouwer's teachings on ELECTION begin with his dissatisfaction with the orthodox (SYNOD OF DORT) belief in the comprehensive decree of God to save some and to condemn others from before the foundation of the earth. He covered these issues in Divine Election (1955), Man, the Image of God (1957), and Een Halve Eeuw Theologie Motieven Stromigen Van 1920 tot Heden (1974). Berkouwer emphasizes the practical implications of the doctrine of election, which he stresses as a comfort and consolation to the believer, not as a threat. He downgrades the idea of synergism—human cooperation with God—since synergism is not the attitude of the believer according to the Bible. He also seeks to show that election does not mean God is arbitrary. It is his belief that Christians can receive certainty of election only as they respond to Christ. This certainty is made stronger as the believer grows in grace. In his most liberal development, Berkouwer denies the double predestination of the Synod of Dort. He does not believe in reprobation, God's "negative election" of some to be condemned to show the glory of God.

J.C.

BERNADETTE OF LOURDES (1844–79). The woman whose mystical visions led to the founding of the shrine at LOURDES, France, was the eldest child of the poverty-stricken Frances and Louise Soubirous.

In frail health after a bout of cholera in 1854 and with chronic asthma, at age fourteen she had a series of eighteen visions of the VIRGIN MARY between February 11 and July 16, 1858. Appearing to her in a cave above the Gave de Pau River outside Lourdes, the Virgin told her, "I am the Immaculate Conception." The Lady also told her to drink from a spring, which miraculously appeared, and to build a chapel in the place.

Courtesy of Religious News Service

Bernadette of Lourdes

To escape increasing public attention, Bernadette became a resident at a local school run by the Sisters of Charity of Nevers. In 1866 she became a novitiate at the mother house, where she lived out her life in increasing sickness and pain. She died April 16, 1879, and is buried in St. Gildard convent chapel in Nevers. Miracles of healing began almost immediately at the spring and shrine. Bernadette was canonized by Pope Pius XI in 1933, and Lourdes remains a center of healing.

N.H.

BERNARD OF CLAIRVAUX (1091–1153). Most renowned of the CISTERCIAN monks, greatest churchman of his time, mystic, preacher, and moralist. Born a noble near Fontaine-les-Dijon, France, he became disgusted with easy living at twenty-two and experienced a conversion. In 1113, with thirty companions, he joined the reform Cistercian monastery at Citeaux, France, a strict Benedictine order. His exemplary discipline and excessive austerity warranted his being chosen in 1115 to found and be abbot of a branch monastery at Clairvaux. His ascetic practices, integrity, mystical contemplation, preaching, and outspokenness against injustice won him acclaim as Europe's conscience. The Cistercians grew phenomenally. Nobility, popes, and commoners sought his advice.

In the struggle for the papal throne (1130–38), Bernard's moral status shifted the balance from Anacletus II to Innocent II. Bernard strove to express his mystical relationship to God in practical piety and love. The greatest stage of love was not quietism but love of self for God's sake, to do God's work in the world. He zealously guarded the faith. He opposed PETER ABELARD's dialectical rationalism, and influenced the Council of Sens to condemn Abelard for heresy in 1140. In 1146 he protected Germany's Jews from church persecutors. He persuaded Pope Eugenius III and King Louis VII of France to undertake the unsuccessful Second Crusade (1147–49), which he preached against the Turks. He wrote a book of ascetic counsels for Pope Eugenius II, De Consideratione (Some Considerations). He was canonized saint, 1173, and made a Doctor of the Church, 1830.

C.M.

BERNARD OF CLUNY (ca. 1100–56). A Benedictine monk and poet who satirized medieval immoralities. At CLUNY during the time of Peter the Venerable, he attacked monastic corruptions in the Latin poem De Contemptu Mundi (On Contempt of the World), approximately 1140. Though little known, his writings include over three thousand verses, many sermons, and hymns. "Jerusalem the Golden," "The World Is Very Evil," and "For Thee, O Dear, Dear Country" are hymns translated from his Latin poems by John Mason Neale.

C.M.

BETHANY. The name of a village two miles east of Jerusalem, on the eastern side of the Mount of Olives and on the road to Jericho. It was the home of the family of Lazarus with his sisters Mary and Martha according to John 11:1. The village also figures in the Synoptic Gospels as the place to which Jesus retired when he came to Jerusalem on Palm Sunday (Mark 11:11 and parallels) and where he was anointed by an unnamed woman (Mark 14:3-9 and parallels).

At John 1:28 there is a well-attested reading of "Bethany," a place where John was baptizing. Origen preferred Bethabara (KJV) to this reading because he was unable to locate a Bethany by the Jordan River. But the reading "Bethany" should be accepted as original, though we have no knowledge of its exact whereabouts.

R.M.

BETHEL. An ancient city, identified with present-day Beitin, located ten miles north of Jerusalem on the Benjamin-Ephraim border. Bethel hosted a near continuous occupation from about 2000 B.C. until the Christian Era, and apart from Jerusalem is the most frequently mentioned city in the OT (seventy-two times).

Archaeological Background. Ceramic evidence indicates that occupation began soon after the demise of neighboring Ai. Hyksos occupation (about 1750–1550 B.C.) produced a superb defense system, and prior to Israel's takeover the house masonry was first-rate. Israel's conquest of Bethel is summarily reported in Judges 1:22-26 and at greater length in Joshua 8, assuming, as many scholars do, that Bethel, not Ai, was the city originally mentioned. Bethel's extensive thirteenth-century B.C. destruction is ordinarily attributed to Israel since a complete break is attested and a much poorer culture followed. Repeated twelfth- and eleventh-century B.C. destructions invite the thesis that Bethel was temporarily held by Benjamin (Josh. 18:22), reclaimed by the Canaanites, and later taken by Ephraim (I Chr. 7:28 lists Bethel as Ephraimite property). Formerly named Luz (Gen. 28:19), the city boasted a Canaanite sanctuary dedicated to El who headed the Canaanite pantheon.

Bethel in Premonarchic Israel. The city is first linked with Abraham, who erected an altar there (Gen. 12:8). At Bethel, Yahweh extended the dual promise of land and progeny to Jacob, who responded with a pledge of loyalty (Gen. 28:10-22). Deborah's judgeship had its locus near Bethel (Judg. 4:5), and the city was included in Samuel's itinerary of towns he visited as an Israelite judge (I Sam. 7:16).

Bethel in Monarchic Israel. Saul recruited a detachment of soldiers who were with him near Bethel (I Sam. 13:2), and David dispatched there a portion of war booty (30:27). As monarch of the northern kingdom, Jeroboam I made Bethel a royal sanctuary to rival the Jerusalem Temple (I Kings 12:26-33). Here the Deuteronomist denounced as idolatrous his choice of fertility-oriented golden calves as pedestals upon which Yahweh was invisibly enthroned. Amaziah, the priest of Bethel, scolded Amos for his harsh criticism of king (Jeroboam II) and cult (Amos 7:10-17). Where Jehu failed, Josiah succeeded in destroying Bethel's sanctuary (II Kings 10:29; 23:15). Razed in the interim between Babylonian and Persian rule, Bethel was resettled by a small group returning from Babylonian exile (Ezra 2:28). In the Hellenistic and early Roman periods, Bethel was more prosperous though it is never mentioned in the NT.

J.K.K.

BETHESDA. An alternative name is Bethzatha, according to different textual traditions in John 5:2 and accepted by the RSV, J. B. Phillips, and Good News Bible. The NEB and NIV prefer the standard reading, but there is no certainty. Also the name stands for either the Sheep-Pool itself (RSV) or a building near the Sheep-Pool (NEB, a location many recent commentators accept, ever since the archaeological work carried on at the site in the northeast corner of the Temple area, near the present St. Stephen's Gate in Jerusalem).

If Bethesda is the correct name—and the latest evidence from the Dead Sea Scrolls may suggest that this is so—the meaning is “house of two springs” rather than “house of mercy.” Two pools near the Temple area were known to Eusebius in the fourth century and to the Bordeaux pilgrim on his visit. The existence of such a twin pool, separated by several cisterns that held water for sheep washing, was confirmed in an archaeological discovery. These reservoirs, divided into two sections, were bounded by colonnades (John 5:2, “five porticoes”) on four sides and along the central partition. The supply of water came from underground springs, a feature that may explain the movement of the water in John 5:7.

R. M.

BETH-HORON. This place-name refers to two sites in biblical times, one located about ten miles northwest of Jerusalem, the other about twelve miles in the same direction. Today there are two villages to mark these spots, called in the OT Upper Beth-horon and Lower Beth-horon. A distance of seven hundred feet in elevation separates these adjacent villages.

In OT history both towns played an important role, being on the main trade route between Gibeon and the Valley of Aijalon on the east and the coast plain to the west. Both were border towns marking off the tribal boundaries of Benjamin and Ephraim (Josh. 16:3-5; 18:13ff.).

Beth-horon was one of the Levitical “cities of refuge” (Josh. 21:22; I Chron. 6:68). Solomon rebuilt both sites after Pharaoh's destruction (II Chron. 8:5). Here too was the scene of the famous OT battle (Josh. 10:6-15), when Joshua and five Canaanite kings engaged in conflict. In the intertestamental period, the story of how Holofernes attacked Beth-horon is told (Judith 4:4), and in the Maccabean revolt Judas was twice successful in battle at Beth-horon (I Macc. 7:15-26, 39-43).

R. M.

BETHLEHEM. Two Israelite towns carry this name. The one of lesser importance is located in the tribal region of Zebulun, seven miles northwest of Nazareth (Josh. 19:15). It has little significance in biblical history.

The more important Bethlehem (whose name means “house of bread,” corresponding to the Arabic name of the village on the site, Bayt Lahm) is situated six miles southwest of Jerusalem, near the main trade route joining Hebron and the South with the capital city of DAVID. In fact, Bethlehem came into prominence with David, though the locale has a long history stretching back to the fourteenth century, since it is referred to in the Amarna letters. It was also known then as Ephrath (Gen. 35:19), the traditional place of Rachel's tomb until the present day. It is

From Atlas of the Bible (Thomas Nelson & Sons Limited)

Bethlehem as viewed from the south

From Atlas of the Bible (Thomas Nelson & Sons Limited)

Bethlehem. Between the bell towers in the center is the site of the basilica built by Constantine about A.D. 325 (but no longer there).

mentioned in the book of Judges (Judg. 19). But it is in connection with David's influence that Bethlehem took on special importance. Through David Bethlehem gained an aura as the birthplace of the future Messiah of Israel (Mic. 5:2; Matt. 2:1-12). The story of the massacre of the children in Bethlehem is Matthew's way of appealing to OT prophecy (Matt. 2:16-18).

The Davidic link begins with the tradition underlying the book of Ruth. Naomi's return to Bethlehem from Moab with the book's heroine, and the latter's subsequent marriage to Boaz, point forward to the future king of Israel (Ruth 4:11). David is so identified as "the son of an Ephrathite of Bethlehem in Judah, named Jesse" (I Sam. 17:12).

Because of this cluster of associations, both in Jewish expectation and Christian thought and piety, Bethlehem has long been venerated. The emperor Constantine's mother, Helena, built a church here in A.D. 325; this edifice was enlarged by the emperor Justinian in the sixth century. This is the site of the church of the Nativity, which tourists visit today.

R.M.

BETHPHAGE. The name of a village not far from Bethany on or near the road from Jerusalem to Jericho. The name means "house of unripe figs" (Matt. 21:18-19; Mark 11:12-14, 20-24). Bethphage is mentioned only in the account of Jesus' "triumphal entry" into Jerusalem (Matt. 21:1; Mark 11:1; Luke 19:29). In this vicinity, the disciples procured a young donkey, upon which Jesus made his way into the city. The route took him one-half mile up the ascent of the Mount of Olives where, in full view of the old city of Jerusalem, according to popular belief, the Messiah would appear. Origen, in the third century, refers to Bethphage as "the house of triumph," "of the meeting," and "of the mounting of the ass." The Talmud states that "Beth Page" marked the city limits of Jerusalem. It was here that the city of JERUSALEM began (Isa. 62:11; Zech. 9:9).

P.L.G.

BETH-SAIDA (meaning "house of the fishers"). The name of a Galilean city (Luke 9:10; John 1:44) or village (Mark 8:26). Two sites are associated with Beth-saida. (1) et-Tell, or Bethsaida-Julias, is situated on the Jordan River, two miles from where the river empties into the Sea of Galilee. About 2 B.C., this crossroads of the region was made a city by Herod Philip, named Julias in honor of Julia, the daughter of Augustus. (2) el-Araj is the name of a natural harbor on the sea just east of the mouth of the Jordan. This place has the remains of a town wall, an ancient mosaic, and a strong spring nearby. This may have been the fishermen's settlement of Bethsaida-Julias. Traces of a Roman road and aqueduct have been found, which join the two places.

Beth-saida was the natal city of the apostles Philip, Andrew, and Peter, all Greek names. Jesus' ministry in Beth-saida was disappointing (Mark 8:22-26; Matt. 11:21; Luke 10:13). The healing of a blind man (Mark 8:22-26) took place at Beth-saida. Jesus and his disciples must have gone near or through Beth-saida en route to Caesarea Philippi, where, it is thought, Peter's confession and the Transfiguration took place (Mark 8:27 ff. and parallels).

P.L.G.

BETH-SHAN. An ancient city located where the Jezreel and Jordan valleys intersect. It is sometimes called Beth-shean and Scythopolis. According to the biblical references (Judg. 1:27; Josh. 17:16; I Sam. 31:10) and the Egyptian records, the city was in the valley of JEZREEL, near Mt. Gilboa. In the excavations of Tell el-Husan, one of the largest tells in Palestine, two fifteenth-century B.C. hieroglyphic texts have been found that include the name Beth-shan.

The site lies at the junction of trade routes from Egypt to Damascus and the East. It has a subtropical climate, five hundred feet below sea level, with abundant water and cultivatable soil. From excavation the site is known to have been occupied since 3000 B.C., perhaps earlier. The early settlement, without walls, followed the arts of pottery, basketry, and weaving. Dates and grapes were the principal crops.

The Egyptian influence began after Thutmose III's victory at Megiddo (1468 B.C.). For three centuries, Egypt maintained control in order to protect its trade with the North and East. In this period, city walls and a number of temples were built. It was on the city walls (I Sam. 31:10) that the Philistines, then in charge, hanged the bodies of Jonathan and Saul after the battle on Mount Gilboa. They put Saul's armor in the temple of Ashtaroth (I Sam. 31:10). David probably took Beth-shan, for the name appears in the list of Solomon's fifth administrative district (I Kings 4:12).

In NT times, Beth-shan was called Sythopolis. It was captured in 107 B.C. by John Hyrcannus, who dealt generously with its mixed population of Jews and Gentiles (I Macc. 12:29). Until the Arab conquest (A.D. 636), Beth-shan was a member—Josephus claimed it was one of the largest—of the Decapolis League.

P.L.G.

BETH-SHEMESH. Meaning "house of the sun," the name of an old settlement, sometimes a walled city, in northeast Shephelah (the Valley of Sorek, Judg. 16:4), over 12½ miles west of Jerusalem. The ancient site is identified with Tel er-Rumeilah, just west of an Arab village, 'Ain Shems, a name that recalls the ancient name. Located on a ridge, 825 feet above sea level, between two valleys, Beth-shemesh experienced several destructions, notably the invasions of Shishak (about 925 B.C.), Sennacherib (about 701 B.C.), and Nebuchadnezzar (588–587 B.C.).

Excavations have disclosed two periods of the city's prosperity: (1) The end of the fifteenth century through early fourteenth century, when industry flourished and numerous plastered cisterns were dug that provided for a sizable population. Oil and wine production was the chief industry, together with metalworking and the growing of wheat (I Sam. 6:13). Late in the thirteenth century, its destruction took place, presumably by the Israelites. (2) After their victory over Israel at Ebenezer (about 1050 B.C., I Sam. 4:1-11; 5:1), the Philistines politically and culturally dominated Beth-shemesh's considerable Israelite population. It was during this time that Joash of Israel captured Amaziah of Judah at Beth-shemesh (about 790 B.C., II Chr. 25:22). The Philistines appear to have sacked the city around 735 B.C.

P.L.G.

BEULAH (meaning "married"). A "new" name for redeemed Zion found in Isaiah 62:4 (KJV; RSV marg.; compare Isa. 54:1), signifying Yahweh's wife. Such an expression, though rare in the OT, appears in Hosea 2:16, 19; Jeremiah 2:2; and Ezekiel 16:32. In the NT Christ's bride is the church (Eph. 5:23-27) and the New Jerusalem (Rev. 21:2, 9 ff.).

P.L.G.

BEZA, THEODORE (1519–1605). French Reformed theologian who succeeded CALVIN at Geneva. Born into Burgundian nobility, he was educated in law and humanism; his humanist mentor was Melchoir Wolmar. Licensed in law, 1539, he practiced in Paris and studied classics, a lifelong interest, before undergoing a physical-spiritual crisis and renouncing Catholicism in 1548. He journeyed to Geneva, where Calvin publicly performed his marriage to Claudine Denosse. At Lausanne, he taught Greek and wrote extensively for ten years. Beza defended the burning of Servetus in The Punishment of Heretics by the Civil Magistrate, 1554, and issued an annotated Latin translation of the NT, 1556.

Calvin invited him to Geneva in 1558 to teach Greek. He became rector of the Genevan Academy, 1559. Skilled in negotiations, he represented French Protestants at numerous gatherings and served as chaplain to Huguenots Condé and Coligny. He succeeded Calvin in 1564 and belligerently defended Calvin's doctrines. Besides completing Marot's translations of the Psalms, he did biblical textual work, presided over the Huguenot synod at LaRochelle, 1571, and argued the right of lesser magistrates to revolt in On Rights of Magistrates, 1572.

C.M.

BHAGAVAD GITA. From the Sanskrit word for "Song of the Lord." A book of seven hundred verses, probably composed about A.D. 100, which has had immense influence on the subsequent thought and life of HINDUISM. The Bhagavad Gita is actually a section of the great epic, the MAHABHARATA, which deals with the rivalry of two branches of a royal house for the throne. As the Gita opens, Arjuna, the king whose claim is presented as just, is riding his chariot into battle at the head of his army against the forces of his kinsmen. His charioteer is KRISHNA—God come into the world in human form as an AVATAR. As Arjuna is about to join with the foe, he suddenly holds back, overcome with doubt and remorse at what he is about to do.

Arjuna tells Krishna that, even though the adversaries are evil, to fight them would bring greater evil, the disruption of family and social order. He throws down his bow and refuses to proceed. Most of the remainder of the book consists of Krishna's answers to the king, telling him how he can and must do the duty that his station has laid upon him, in the process offering passages of exceptional power on the classic Hindu view of humanity, God, and their relationship. While it may seem surprising that a spiritual masterpiece should take the form of an injunction to war, the Gita's insights go far beyond the occasion, and it can be interpreted on several levels. For one as committed to nonviolence as MOHANDAS K. GANDHI it was a peerless inspiration. He read Arjuna's war as an allegory of the eternal struggle of righteousness against evil, a battle in which bloodless weapons are best, but in which none can rightly be noncombatant.

Krishna's first response is to point out that one should not truly grieve the dead in battle, for the real self, the spirit, neither slays nor is slain, but changes from one body to another as one casts aside a worn-out garment and takes a new one. But while the spirit is eternal, it must play its part in the drama of the world. Krishna reminds Arjuna that, as a member of the Kshatriya caste, the caste of rulers and warriors, it is his duty to lead his army into battle.

Moreover, one can find liberation in the midst of such activity. Spiritual liberation is freedom from the shackles of egocentric desire, and if one works for good, without personal attachment to the fruits of the labor, one can be as free in the midst of work as in meditation. This is karma-yoga, a major aspect of Krishna's message in the Gita.

The climax of the book is Krishna's stupendous self-revelation of himself as infinite God embracing the multitudinous forms of the universe. With it are associated exhortations to BHAKTI, devotional worship of God as personal, a way to liberation through faith, love, and divine grace. There is a darker side, however. God seen as personal is also God as Time, the destroyer. Arjuna as warrior would be only doing his work.

The Bhagavad Gita has been an immensely important source for modern Hindu thinkers and spiritual leaders. While its traditional interpretation has often been conservative, seeing it as a bulwark of the caste system, many moderns have viewed it as a rallying-point in the struggle for justice through social change and even revolution. Others have made it basic to new meditation and bhakti movements.

R.E.

BHAKTI. In HINDUISM, bhakti is the path of devotionism, of the loving worship of the great gods and goddesses. Ordinarily, a bhakta, or follower of this way, will be a special devotee of only one such deity, his or her "chosen ideal." Bhakti teaches that if the devotee worships the deity with true fervor and selflessness, love will melt away all sin and bad KARMA; god and worshiper will become mystically united; and the latter will enjoy a rapturous eternity in a paradise reserved for true lovers of the divine.

The origins of bhakti are obscure, but undoubtedly lie in folk religion. By the time of the BHAGAVAD GITA (about A.D. 100), however, it was capable of forceful intellectual expression. Devotional theism, in which intention and love count for much, was made preferable to sacrifice or yogic techniques. In the early centuries A.D. bhaktic movements grew apace, aided by the patronage of rulers such as those of the Gupta dynasty, and countenanced by the BRAHMINS, who saw in it an antidote to such heresies as BUDDHISM and a means of Hinduizing tribal groups. The works of the bhaktic sage Narada, the PURANAS (books presenting myths of the gods), and the passionately devotional verse of such poets as the ALVARS in the early Middle Ages all gave voice to the movement. Many great Hindu temples, associated with bhakti and its gods, were built in this period as well.

Bhakti properly makes much of its way as a spiritual path equally accessible to all, high or low, learned or illiterate, of any caste, whether proficient in such techniques as yoga or not. It demands nothing but the simple service of a loving heart. Nonetheless bhakti is much more than folk religion or uncouth religious enthusiasm. Its exposition has attracted some of India's best theological minds. Ramanuja (twelfth century A.D.), for example, a Vaisnava (devotee of Vishnu), powerfully countered Advaita (non-dualism or monism) with arguments for a personal god not wholly identified with creation or with the human soul—prerequisites for the bhakti relation of love, rather than simple oneness between God and humans.

The major bhaktic gods include VISHNU, his main AVATARS Rama and KRISHNA, their consorts, SHIVA, and his consort who goes under many names, from Parvati to Durga and KALI. Bhaktas are usually Vaisnavas, worshipers of a deity in the Vishnu lineage, or Saivas, devotees of Shiva or his mate. The great majority of Hindus are practitioners of some forms of bhakti, though not necessarily in an exclusive or highly committed sense.

Bhakti worship includes puja, presentation of simple offerings at a home or temple shrine, and kirtanas or bhajans, singing of fervent hymns sometimes accompanied by ecstatic dancing and other gestures of intense feeling. Bhakti worship characteristically puts more emphasis on feeling than form and gives all devotees ample opportunity for participation.

R.E.

BIBLE. The Holy Scriptures include the writings, regarded as the inspired record of divine REVELATION, both to Israel, the ancient people of God, and to Christians, the people of the New Covenant.

The Christian church accepts both the books of the OT and NT as authoritative and divinely inspired, while the Jewish Bible consists of the record of the covenant or "testament" God made with the people and revealed to Moses on Mt. Sinai and to the prophets and other "holy men" of subsequent times. Essentially, the OT is the record of Israel's prophets, while the NT contains the books written by the apostles and other disciples of Jesus Christ.

The word "Bible" comes from the Greek word (neuter plural) meaning "books." As the collection of Holy Scriptures increasingly was regarded as a unity, the transliterated Biblia came to be understood as a feminine singular word—"Bible," in English.

The Jews divided their holy Scriptures into three groups: (1) the Law (TORAH) consisting of the PENTATEUCH or first five books of Moses; (2) the PROPHETS, which were subdivided into two groups—the Former Prophets (Joshua, Judges, I and II Samuel and I and II Kings) and the Latter Prophets, including Isaiah, Jeremiah, Ezekiel, and the twelve so-called Minor Prophets; and (3) the Writings, comprised of all the other books of the OT.

In Christ's day these writings were universally regarded by the Jews as divinely inspired and authoritative. Certainly Christ treated the OT as the record of God's self-revelation, even though human beings were employed in its authorship (Luke 24:44-47; Matt. 19:4; 22:29).

While virtually all NT references to the "scriptures" meant the OT books, at least one (II Pet. 3:16) places Paul's writings on the same level of inspiration and authority as "the other scriptures."

Both the OT and the NT were written over a period of many centuries, but in time those recognized as sacred scriptures became known as the CANON of Scripture. The canon of Jewish scripture was not established until action was taken by a council of rabbis at Jamnia (JABNEEL), a town on the northern border of Judah, in A.D. 90.

About two hundred years earlier, Greek-speaking Jews had made a Greek translation of the Hebrew religious books that became known as the SEPTUAGINT (from the Latin word for "seventy.") Some seventy-two Jewish translators produced this translation for Ptolemy II for his library at Alexandria.

Roman Catholic and Eastern Orthodox OTs contain thirteen books known as the APOCRYPHA. These are books that were a part of the Septuagint but were not regarded as canonical by the learned Jewish elders at Jamnia. The first Latin Bibles, including Jerome's VULGATE, were translated from the Greek Septuagint rather than from the Hebrew text. In 1548 the Council of Trent recognized the Apocrypha, except for I and II Edras and the Prayer of Manasses, as being canonical. However, the Reformers repudiated the Apocrypha. As a result, Protestants generally follow in that tradition. Anglicans place some value on the Apocrypha but not for establishing doctrine.

The NT, better translated "new covenant" since the term is based on the prophecy of Jeremiah 31:31-34, which declares that God would make a new covenant with people, does not have the canonical problems of the OT. The apostolic church believed God had made the new covenant in Christ. As the church grew, the apostles and those associated with them wrote the twenty-seven books now accepted as the NT. Toward the end of the second century all NT books except Hebrews, James, II Peter, II and III John, Jude, and Revelation were widely accepted by the church. The canon, as universally received by all of the church today, was first announced in Athanasius' Easter letter in A.D. 367.

Shortly after the end of the fourth century, Jerome had produced the Latin Vulgate, which soon became the most widely used version in the West. And so it continued to be popular for centuries. The first book printed in Europe, the famed Gutenberg Bible of 1456, was an edition of the Vulgate.

The Reformation sparked the need for vernacular publications in the principal languages of Europe. One of the greatest was Luther's translation, which brought the Bible to life in German.

(See BIBLE TRANSLATIONS (English); BIBLICAL CRITICISM; BIBLE, TEXT OF.)

R. H.

BIBLE, TEXT OF. With few exceptions, the oldest copies of any parts of the Bible in the original languages (Hebrew, Aramaic, and Greek) date from long after the original writing. The oldest known manuscript containing a portion of the Bible is a fragment of the book of Exodus found in the Dead Sea caves and dating from the third century B.C. The oldest copy of any part of the NT, however, is from the early second century A.D.; it contains John 18:31-33. This fragmentary manuscript of John was written within thirty to fifty years of the time of the composition of that Gospel. Copies of parts of the later OT books found at QUMRAN—Daniel, Ecclesiastes, and the Wisdom of Sirach—date from within a hundred years of their literary origin.

In spite of the time gap, and in spite of the thousands of differences in details among the biblical manuscripts, the text of the Bible as a whole is better attested and more carefully preserved than that of any other literature from antiquity. The copies of the Bible from Qumran vary so widely in the style of writing, age, and even in details of content that it has been conjectured that they were brought to Qumran by incoming members of the community, who pooled them as part of the resources of the entire group. Until the discovery of the DEAD SEA SCROLLS, which included more than one hundred copies of smaller and larger portions of what we know as the OT, copies of the Hebrew Bible were known almost solely from medieval manuscripts, preserved in ancient synagogues and libraries. One exception was a document containing brief selections from the OT, including the Ten Commandments and some verses from Deuteronomy. Dating from about 150 B.C. it is known as the Nash Papyrus. Papyrus is a fragile writing material made from reeds that grow in Egypt.

It was exported widely, including huge quantities shipped to Syria. Although it may have been used in Palestine in ancient Israel, by the time of Jeremiah (seventh/sixth centuries B.C.) writing was usually done on leather scrolls, with the subject matter arranged in columns, as Jeremiah 36 attests.

Hebrew was originally written only in consonants, with the reader supplying the vowels in the course of reading aloud. By the ninth century, and perhaps even earlier, copyists began to include vowel markings and punctuation to aid the reader with what was, even then, an archaic language. The oldest dated copy of a text with the vowels supplied is from an ancient synagogue in Cairo and is dated to the equivalent of A.D. 895. These aids to pronunciation of the Hebrew Bible, which are found in the medieval manuscripts, vary considerably. By the tenth century the dominant method was one developed by Ben Asher and his family at Tiberias in Palestine, which had for centuries been a center for rabbinic and scriptural studies.

In the late nineteenth century, other ancient copies of the Hebrew Scriptures, including the Wisdom of Sirach (or Ecclesiasticus), were found in the storeroom of a synagogue also in Cairo. Following the excavations of Qumran, other caves and ancient sites near the Dead Sea were excavated, which resulted in the discovery of portions of the Psalms and the Torah at the fortress of Masada, as well as another copy of Sirach in Hebrew. At other nearby sites copies of the OT in both Hebrew and in Greek translations were found. These documents, dating from the early second century A.D., show that by that time the consonantal text of the Hebrew Bible was fixed—a practice that probably dates from A.D. 70 or shortly thereafter, when the Pharisees, with Roman encouragement, sought to move Judaism away from nationalistic revolt toward religious unity and structure. The premedieval copies of the Hebrew Bible were all in scroll form, rather than codices (a codex is written on separate sheets, bound at the edge, as in our modern books). Some of the earliest fragments of the Greek NT were written as a codex, however, and all the complete ancient copies of the NT (from the fourth century A.D. forward) are codices.

Style of Writing. Until a century or so before the birth of Jesus, Hebrew scribes copied the biblical text in one of two types of script: (1) an ancient alphabet, borrowed from the Canaanites, the Semitic tribes whose lands the invading Israelites began occupying in the thirteenth century B.C.; (2) the squarish letters used for writing Aramaic, a Semitic language long and widely used throughout the Near East in antiquity. ARAMAIC and GREEK had largely replaced HEBREW as the common language of Jews in the Hellenistic and Roman periods (see LANGUAGES OF THE ANCIENT NEAR EAST, AND OF THE BIBLE). Some of the Qumran manuscripts are written in the Aramaic script, except that the sacred, unpronounceable name of God, YHWH, was written in the archaic script. The ancient script was originally pictographic; that is, the letter Beth (which means "house") was shaped like a house, and the letter Mem (or Mayim, meaning "water") was represented by wavy lines.

There were also different ways of writing Greek. One, resembling our printed capital letters, is called uncials or majuscules; the other, which is similar to modern connected script, is called curative or minuscule. The great Greek uncial codices of the NT, which derived from the fourth and fifth centuries and which remain the chief base for the critical reconstruction of the text, were written on PARCHMENT. Their testimony to the ancient text of the NT was importantly supplemented in the late nineteenth and twentieth centuries by the discovery in Egypt of portions of the NT written on PAPYRUS. These documents, which date from the second and third centuries, contribute to the analysis of the Greek text, just as the Hebrew discoveries at the Dead Sea have done more recently for an analysis of the OT text.

Recovery of the Original Hebrew Text. The most important witnesses to the Hebrew text of the Bible are contained in these early medieval manuscripts, which seem to have originated through the Tiberias School or one of its rivals. Among them is the Cairo manuscript (dated A.D. 895), mentioned above, which included some of the historical books (Joshua, Judges, Samuel, Kings) and all the prophetic books. A somewhat later document that was taken to Aleppo in Syria by the Crusaders, is now in Jerusalem. A still later copy in the tradition of Tiberias is in Leningrad. These and related manuscripts are largely in agreement on the consonantal text, but it is in the vowels supplied in the so-called "Pointed text" that they differ. The pointing was done in order to assure that the reader would understand the consonantal text in the same way that the scribe (or his tradition) did.

Although rival systems of pronunciations, and hence of interpretation, were produced and have survived, it was with the invention of printing that the Hebrew text became fixed permanently. Unfortunately, the earlier forms of the printed text were based on manuscripts of mixed quality. An edition printed in Venice in 1524, edited by Jacob ben Chayyim, though based on textually unreliable manuscripts, became the standard Hebrew text up to modern times. It was only in the present century that editors of the Hebrew biblical text turned from their basic copy back to the Tiberian tradition of the ninth and tenth centuries. The major breakthrough on this critical matter was made by Gerhard Kittel in the third edition of his Biblia Hebraica (in 1937), which he based on an eleventh-century manuscript preserved in Leningrad and to which he in subsequent editions brought the insights and alternate readings of the Dead Sea manuscript finds. An elaborate critical edition is presently in process of preparation at the Hebrew University in Jerusalem, based on the recently acquired Aleppo manuscript mentioned earlier. This edition will take into account a comprehensive range of textual evidence from various traditions, including ancient translations of the Hebrew Bible into various languages.

The Evidence from Ancient Translations. Of importance for the reconstruction of the Hebrew text are the translations and paraphrases of Scripture that have survived to the present, but which may be traced back to older archetypes of the Bible than those preserved in the medieval manuscripts on which most recent work on the Hebrew text is so heavily dependent. Among these ancient versions are the Samaritan, the Syriac, the TARGUMS (paraphrases in Aramaic), and the Greek (usually identified as the Septuagint). Comparative studies of the OT text go back at least as far as ORIGEN of Alexandria (third century A.D.), who in an effort to make responsible choices among the various translations of the OT into Greek available in his day aligned the versions in parallel columns together with the Hebrew text and a Greek transliteration of the Hebrew. In developing this six-column work (known as the HEXAPLA) he seems to have used different Hebrew editions available to him, so that his work shows in detail how varied the forms were in which the Hebrew was preserved, both in the original language and in the translations used by Origen.

The Samaritan edition of the Hebrew Pentateuch (which was all of the Bible that the Samaritans regarded as authoritative), is presumably based on a form of the text that is four hundred years older than the Jewish standard text. In thousands of instances, the Samaritan edition is closer to the one that underlies the Greek translations than it is to the Jewish authoritative text. At the same time that the standard Jewish text was being shaped and given authority by the traditionalist scribes (known as MASORETES), the centuries-long custom of having a paraphrase in Aramaic in the synagogues immediately following the reading of the Hebrew original began to be codified in the Targums. Different editions of the Targums appeared in Palestine and in Babylonia, where large numbers of Jews had remained even after many returned to Judea from the exile at the end of the sixth century B.C. The two best-known Targums are those linked with Onkelos and Jonathan, both of which are now known in forms edited in Babylonia in the fifth century A.D. Also important is the Targum of the Pentateuch, usually known as Pseudo-Jonathan. The oldest Targums extant are those found in fragmentary form at Qumran, including one on Job and another on Genesis, usually called the Genesis Apocryphon. Although all these are free paraphrases in most passages, they do point to a Hebrew text, which on occasion is significantly different from the Masoretic standard.

The Syriac-speaking Christians by the middle of the second century A.D. had made a translation, not only of the Greek NT, but also of the Hebrew Bible.

Since Syriac is a language closely akin to Aramaic, the Syriac version shows the influence of the Targums, as well as of the Greek version so widely used by the early Christians. Indeed, different sources seem to have been used for different books of the OT. Later on, other Syriac versions were prepared by different sects of the Syriac church.

The Primary Translation for the Christians: The Greek Old Testament. The versions of the OT most significant for both Jews and Christians are those in Greek, some of which date back to the third century B.C. Long before the time of Origen, the Hebrew text of the Bible was being transliterated into Greek for Jews whose basic language was Greek, but who wanted to hear the Bible as nearly as possible in the sound of the original Hebrew. Later legend (in the Letter of Aristeas) reported that Ptolemy II of Egypt (285-246 B.C.) had responded to mounting interest in the Jewish Bible among his subjects by arranging for a team of seventy-two translators to come from Palestine (six from each of the twelve tribes) to prepare a definitive translation of their Bible into Greek. The number was later rounded off at seventy, which in its Latin form, SEPTUAGINTA (LXX), became the common designation of the dominant Greek version of the Bible. Historically it is more likely that different books were translated at different times and only later assembled in the complete LXX.

Copies of the Bible in Greek have been found that go back as early as the second century B.C. Copies from the second century A.D. and later have been found in both Egypt and Palestine, so that a base is provided for a broad and detailed analysis of what became the standard Greek version of the OT. Significant variations from the LXX appear, however, as in a fragment from Qumran Cave 4, in which the name of God is transliterated from the Hebrew as IAO, rather than being replaced by the title Kyrios ("Lord"), which is standard in the LXX. Some scholars assess this new evidence as proving that there was indeed an original Greek translation, as the Septuagint legend implies, but that it was later modified and paraphrased in subsequent usage. Others think that there was a free range of translations into Greek available in the centuries before and after the birth of Jesus. According to this second theory, it was only in the hands of the Christians—who adopted the Greek version as their official OT—that it developed into the standard form we now know as the LXX. One could point to the various Christian translations (by Aquila, Symmachus, and Theodotion in the second century A.D.) and Origen's effort to sort through this evidence as supporting the second theory. But the Hexapla of Origen could as well be interpreted to be Origen's attempt to recover the original of the LXX.

Similar problems arise in relation to the various Old Latin translations, which were carried out in dependence on the LXX. They were widely used prior to Jerome's production in the late fourth century A.D.

of the Common Version, known as the VULGATE, which he based directly on the Hebrew.

Recovering the Original Greek Text of the New Testament. The evidence for the reconstructing of the Greek NT overlaps in some degree that for the Hebrew Bible, but it is far more extensive. W. G. Kümmel, in his Introduction to the New Testament (1975) gives the following statistics on NT manuscripts: 85 papyri; 268 majuscules; 2,792 minuscules. In addition to the latter group, in which the text is written in unbroken sequence as in our modern translations, there are 2,193 manuscripts in lectionary form, broken up into smaller units for public reading in the context of worship. The division of the NT into the chapters that we now use was done about A.D. 1200. Three hundred years later a Parisian edition marked off the present system of verses.

In addition to the John Rylands Library fragment of John mentioned earlier there are papyrus manuscripts of two of the Gospels, Matthew and Luke, which date from around A.D. 200. From the second and third centuries is a series of papyri, including the Gospels and Acts; all the letters of Paul, plus Hebrews; and part of Revelation. Other papyri from the third century include copies of John, the letters of Peter and Jude, Luke and John, all of which give general and detailed support to the type of Greek text found in the early majuscules (or uncials), to which we now turn.

The Greek New Testament of Erasmus (1516). The opening verses of Matthew are shown.

As the church became more affluent and more solidly grounded culturally, handsome manuscript copies of the entire NT on parchment were produced. Written in elegant calligraphy, probably in Egypt, they have been carefully preserved—at first in churches or monasteries and now in museums. Before evaluating the textual testimony of these imposing documents, however, it is essential to consider the system of classification of the types of text of the NT preserved in this array of manuscript witnesses. It was only in the nineteenth and twentieth centuries that this sorting out of text types was carried out on a broad basis. What had happened with the Hebrew and Greek OT—the drive to overcome the difficulties presented by the diverse forms of the biblical text through the shaping of a single, standardized, “Received Text”—is apparent in the transmission of the text of the NT as well. By far the majority of the manuscripts that have survived to the present do embody a text that includes expansions and modifications of the Greek text, which are absent in the demonstrably older manuscripts.

There was, therefore, a RECEIVED TEXT, without it being so designated. In the sixteenth century, however, under the impact of the Protestant movement, with its emphasis on the Bible and its accessibility to all believers, it was determined to prepare a standard printed version of the Greek Text. This was undertaken by ERASMUS, a scholar engaged by a printer in Basel, Switzerland. Unfortunately, he used as his base late flawed manuscripts, which included passages that are clearly later additions (such as Mark 16:9-20). They also lacked some verses from Revelation, but Erasmus took care of that by making his own (clumsy) translation from the Latin back into Greek. Not only was this the edition used by Luther in his monumental German translation and by the translators of the King James Version of the Bible into English, but it became the standard Greek Text of the NT well into the nineteenth century.

There was, however, no single alternative Greek Text that was generally recognized as preferable to the Received Text. Beginning with Karl Lachmann in 1831, however, scholars began to compare and assess the textual evidence, not only from the oldest available manuscripts, but also from the testimony to be derived from the ancient translations of the NT and from the quotations of it in the writings of the fathers of the church. Konstantin von Tischendorf, who had managed to bring back to Europe the monks' most prized NT manuscript, from St. Katherine's Monastery on Mount Sinai, proceeded to use the Codex SINAITICUS as the base for his reconstruction of the Greek Text. In Britain, B. F. Westcott and F. J. A. Hort had used Codex Vaticanus as their primary textual standard, and referred to their results as “the Neutral Text,” by which they meant that it was free from the errors that had crept into other manuscripts. Both Vaticanus and Sinaiticus, which date from the fourth century, differ from the later majuscules and most of the later minuscules, which represent the inclusive version that corresponds to the Received Text and are accordingly of little value in the effort to recover the original form of the text.

Although some of the translations of the Greek NT into other languages (such as Syriac and Latin) are older than many of the Greek manuscripts, they are only occasionally helpful in recovering the purer form of the text, since they are not literal translations and since they tend to be based on the eclectic Received Text.

Although Westcott and Hort's classification scheme for the manuscripts has not found universal support, it has dominated the discussion in a useful way. They distinguished the following text types: (1) the Syrian Text, which is basically the Received Text and is represented by many of the majuscules and nearly all the minuscules; (2) the Western Text, for which the chief representatives are Codex Bezae (comprising two bilingual manuscripts, in Latin and Greek) and the type of text used by several Western church fathers (for example, Justin, Irenaeus, Tertullian); (3) the Neutral Text, represented by Vaticanus and less accurately by Sinaiticus, though both seem to have escaped extensive alteration from the supposedly original form; (4) the Alexandrine Text, used by Origen and the Coptic (Egyptian) versions, and similar to the Neutral Text.

After this scheme was proposed, however, it was perceived that the so-called Western Text had actually been used by writers in the Eastern churches as well, and further, that the “Western” text types vary so widely from manuscript to manuscript as to call into question the designation of a Western text type at all. This group of manuscripts may evidence nothing more than a free-wheeling text tradition that developed concurrently with the more conservative Egyptian type best represented by Vaticanus and Sinaiticus. Yet in individual cases, the textual evidence from the Western type manuscripts must be taken into account in the effort to reconstruct the original text.

Still useful is the critical rule drawn up in the nineteenth century: “The preferred reading is the difficult one; the shorter reading is the more significant.” While it is important that sifting of textual evidence continues, it is useful to remember that the proportion of the Greek NT about which there is critical agreement is astonishingly large, while the number of seriously disputed passages is surprisingly few.

H. K.

BIBLE TRANSLATIONS (English). While no complete Bible version was translated into Anglo-Saxon, some portions of Scripture in that tongue have been discovered. There were also versions of certain books produced in English during the thirteenth century.

Some historians have credited JOHN WYCLIFFE, of the fourteenth century, with being the first translator of the Bible in English, but later research does not seem to confirm this. Possibly Wycliffe may have contributed to one of two "Wycliffe" versions, but they undoubtedly were the work of two of his followers. The first translation from the Latin VULGATE by Nicholas of Hereford was published at the end of the fourteenth century. The second version, said to be in more idiomatic English, was the work of John Purvey, Wycliffe's secretary. Shortly after their appearance, the two versions were proscribed by the church, and orders went out prohibiting translations made "without diocesan or synodical" permission.

A number of factors paved the way for the publication of the milestone version of WILLIAM TYNDALE: (1) the invention of printing, which resulted in the production of the GUTENBERG (Vulgate) Bible in 1456; (2) the spread of Greek learning and the publication of Erasmus' Greek NT (1516); (3) the Latin translation of the Hebrew Bible by Santes Pagninus, an Italian Dominican scholar (1528); and (4) the spread of the Protestant Reformation and particularly the publication of Luther's German vernacular NT in 1522 and complete Bible in 1534.

Tyndale, who had studied Greek at Cambridge, had heard of Erasmus' call for Bibles in the vernacular. Knowing that the church forbade unauthorized translations, Tyndale decided to conduct his work on the Continent. After a start at Cologne, Tyndale moved to Worms, where the first printed edition of the English NT was completed in 1526. There is evidence that he was greatly influenced by Luther's rendering of the German NT.

Tyndale began work on the OT, completing the Pentateuch in 1530 and Jonah in 1531. George Joye, another Englishman, joined Tyndale on the Continent and worked with him for a while, but he ultimately betrayed Tyndale by running off with a pirated edition of the NT. Undaunted, Tyndale produced a second NT version (1534), which had a strong influence on the phrasing of the KING JAMES VERSION. Tyndale was arrested near Brussels in 1535, and was strangled and burned at the stake in 1536. He had not completed a translation of the entire Bible.

Meanwhile the situation had been changing in England. The church had broken with Rome, creating a better climate for Bible translations. In 1534 the Canterbury Convocation asked permission of Henry VIII to translate the entire Bible into English. MILES COVERDALE, a British scholar who had worked with Tyndale in Germany and Antwerp, was chosen for the task. Depending heavily on Tyndale's labors, Coverdale's Bible was published in 1535 with royal approval.

In 1537 another English translation appeared, which purported to be the work of Thomas Matthew. This undoubtedly was the work of John Rogers, a former assistant of Tyndale. Actually the so-called Matthew's Bible was essentially a compilation of Tyndale's work including portions that had not reached print. It also contained some of the work of Coverdale and others. It is ironic that this approved translation, largely the work of Tyndale, appeared in print a year after his death.

These versions of Scripture were followed by the Great Bible of 1539, in reality Coverdale's revision of Matthew's Bible. The Great Bible had the advantage of royal approval, and orders were given that copies of it be provided to parish churches throughout the land. Because this version contained a preface by the archbishop of Canterbury, Thomas Cranmer, it came to be called Cranmer's Bible.

The Geneva Bible (1560) was produced by William Whittingham, an Oxford graduate, and other Protestant exiles in Geneva. This is the first English translation to divide the text into verses or numbered paragraphs. Since the Geneva Bible was dedicated to Elizabeth, it was circulated without difficulty. It soon became the Bible of Protestant homes.

Courtesy of the American Bible Society

The Geneva Bible of 1560

Churchmen who objected to the Reformed slant of the Geneva Bible ordered the publication of a version known as the Bishops' Bible, published in 1568. But it never had the impact of the Geneva Bible, which was the Bible of Shakespeare and the pilgrim fathers. Excerpts from it were employed in Cromwell's soldier's pocket Bible.

During Elizabeth's reign Roman Catholic exiles developed their version of Scripture. The chief translator (from the Vulgate) was Gregory Martin, who lived in exile in Flanders. This came to be known as the DOUAY-RHEIMS BIBLE.

But probably the greatest Bible in English was the King James Version, published in 1611 and still popular today after more than three centuries. At the Hampton Court Conference convened by James I in 1604 "for the hearing, and for the determining of things pretended to be amiss in the Church," John Reynolds, president of Corpus Christi College, Oxford, and a Puritan, made the motion that a new translation of Scriptures be made. The king seized upon the suggestion and the project was approved immediately. Consequently six companies of scholars were appointed, ostensibly to revise the Bishops' Bible. However, the translators turned to the Hebrew and Greek original texts in making a faithful translation. The majestic cadences of this great version have never been surpassed. Although Tyndale had set a standard for beautiful language, which continued in this version, the KJV has had unparalleled influence on English literature. Although it is known as the Authorized Version in Britain, the evidence that it was ever authorized by order in council cannot be proved. However, it gained acceptance by its essential character.

With the growth of biblical scholarship in the succeeding centuries and the discovery of a number of ancient manuscripts that were not known to the KJV translators, scholars began to see the need for a major revision.

In 1870 a proposal for such a version was made at the Centerbury Convocation. Certain principles were to be followed, such as adherence as much as possible to the language of the KJV. When changes were made, they were to be noted in the margins of the revised text.

The REVISED VERSION of the NT was published simultaneously in London and New York in 1881. The OT segment followed in 1885. Appendices indicated instances where British and American translators disagreed. The AMERICAN STANDARD VERSION, which was an independent work of the American revisers, was published in 1901.

Toward the end of the nineteenth century and throughout the twentieth century a spate of translations have been produced.

J. N. DARBY, an Irish clergyman who became the prominent leader of the Plymouth Brethren, translated the Bible into both French and German before rendering it into English. His New Translation was one of several attempts at literal translation that sought to be faithful to the Greek and Hebrew text but were lacking in English style.

The Twentieth Century NT (1901) was produced by a group of anonymous translators, none of whom had wide acceptance as scholars, it was later revealed.

The noted British classical scholar, Arthur S. Way, translated a portion of the NT, calling it Letters of St. Paul to Seven Churches and Three Friends (1901). Another classicist, Richard F. Weymouth, produced the NT in Modern Speech, which was published in the year of his death (1903). JAMES MOFFAT's New Translation of the NT appeared in 1913 and the complete Bible in 1928 and 1935. In the same period came The NT: An American Translation by EDGAR J. GOODSPEED (1923). Goodspeed started work on the OT translation but delegated its completion to J. M. P. Smith for publication in 1935.

Helen Barrett Montgomery, an American Greek scholar, produced The New Testament in Modern Speech, which was published in 1924 to celebrate the centenary of the American Baptist Publication Society of Philadelphia.

A leader of the Jehovah's Witnesses, A. E. Knoch, with several colleagues prepared The Concordant Bible (1921 and 1926). Since Knoch was self-taught in Greek, his translation has not had great acceptance beyond the bounds of his special constituency.

J. B. Phillips, an Anglican clergyman, issued his Letters to Young Churches in 1947. This was followed by The Gospels in 1952, The Young Church in Action in 1955, and The Book of Revelation in 1957. The NT IN MODERN ENGLISH, and appealing paraphrase, was published in 1958.

Under the sponsorship of the International Council of Religious Education, which later became a part of the National Council of the Churches of Christ in the U.S.A., a committee of American and Canadian scholars set to work on an official revision of the American Standard Version. Because of its sponsorship by the NCC, this REVISED STANDARD VERSION was spurned by many American ultraconservatives even though the new version was promoted vigorously by the major United States denominations as a sort of official translation. But its superior scholarship won it acclaim in Great Britain and other countries of the English-speaking world. Roman Catholics also found it to be a worthy translation. The NT was published in 1946, the entire Bible in 1952, and the Apocrypha in 1957. It can properly claim to be a legitimate descendant of both Tyndale's Bible and the King James Version.

British scholars, not to be outdone by their American counterparts, decided it was time that a Bible that would render the original languages into "timeless English" needed to be produced. A Joint Committee on the New Translation of the Bible was formed, and its general director was the learned biblical scholar Charles Harold Dodd. Oxford University Press and Cambridge University Press became the joint publishers. On the 350th anniversary of the publication of the King James Version (1961), the NT of the NEW ENGLISH BIBLE appeared. The complete Bible, with the Apocrypha, was published in 1970.

Roman Catholics, besides publishing a Catholic translation of the RSV in 1966, were concerned about translations that were not bound by the limitations of the Latin Vulgate. In 1941 the Confraternity of Christian Doctrine published a NT translation, a revision of the Challoner Douay-Rheims Version (1750). THE NEW AMERICAN BIBLE "translated from the original languages" appeared in 1970.

Both Protestants and Catholics have embraced THE JERUSALEM BIBLE published in English in 1966. It was based upon the labors of French scholars who had worked at the Dominican Biblical School in Jerusalem. Under the general editorship of Père Roland de Vaux, La Bible de Jerusalem had first appeared in French in 1961.

Jewish scholars have also been concerned about producing readable translations of their scriptures. The first rendering in English was accomplished by Isaac Leeser in 1853. The Jewish Publication Society (JPS) of America produced its first translation in 1917. In 1962 the JPS published the Torah, a new translation of "the Holy Scriptures according to the Masoretic Text." Volumes on the Prophets and Writings have followed.

Even so with so many substantial translations available to them, the urge to publish new versions of the Bible in contemporary English seems to have no end. The Berkeley Version in Modern English, under the editorship of Gerrit Verkuyl, was published in 1945 (NT) and 1959 (entire Bible). In England, E. V. Rieu's Four Gospels and C. H. Rieu's the Acts of the Apostles appeared in 1952 and 1957. The Basic English Bible, which confined itself to one thousand commonly employed words, was published in 1940 (NT) and 1949 (entire Bible). C. R. Williams followed with the Plain English Version.

Earlier in the United States, another Williams (Charles B.), an American scholar, had produced The New Testament: A Translation in the Language of the People (1937). William F. Beck, a Lutheran, was the scholar responsible for The Holy Bible in the Language of Today. The NT appeared in 1963 and the full Bible in 1976. William Barclay, the noted Scottish biblical scholar and commentator, produced The New Testament: A New Translation in 1968 and 1969. The Lockman Foundation of LaHabra, California, sponsored the anonymous translation, The Amplified Bible (1954-64). The same Lockman organization also sponsored the NEW AMERICAN STANDARD VERSION of the Scriptures (1960-75), which, like the Revised Standard Version, is considered in the same family as the KJV and the ASV. This Bible (NASV) has appealed to conservative evangelicals who have felt that the NCC-sponsored volume reflects liberal scholarship. Its competitors in the marketplace are The Living Bible and the New International Version.

THE LIVING BIBLE was the project of Kenneth Taylor, who began it as a means of making the Scriptures comprehensible to his children. Because his work did not find acceptance with publishers who felt the modern idiom Bible market was surfeited, Taylor launched his own publishing concern in Wheaton, Illinois. After a slow start The Living Bible soon saw sales soar to the multiple millions. The Living Bible set records in a market that experts felt was saturated. Honestly labeled as a paraphrase, Taylor's unique venture of rendering the Bible in colloquial American speech has had unparalleled acceptance. Adoptions have been produced in many languages around the world.

THE NEW INTERNATIONAL VERSION of the Bible was translated by more than one hundred evangelical scholars. The project had its beginning in 1965, after several years of exploratory study by committees from the Christian Reformed Church and the National Association of Evangelicals. In 1967 the New York Bible Society, later renamed the International Bible Society, provided the financing. Starting out with the Gospel of John in 1970, other books of the Bible were translated until the NT made its appearance in 1973 and the complete Bible in 1978. From the start the NIV has met with success, and already millions of the new version have been sold.

THE GOOD NEWS BIBLE (Today's English Version) was a translation project of the American Bible Society. Under the guideline of using "common English," this work of Robert E. Bratcher, former missionary to South America, produced The New Testament in Today's English Version, which was first published in 1966. Known widely as the TEV, the entire Bible was released in 1976 as The Good News Bible—The Bible in Today's English Version. From the start this popular contemporary version of the Scriptures met with wide acceptance. Today, similar Bibles, based on the same philosophy of translation, have appeared in a number of modern languages.

The Anchor Bible, which is more a commentary than a translation, began to appear in 1964 and will continue until its thirty-eight volumes are completed. The publishers of Reader's Digest sponsored a condensation of the Revised Standard Version in 1982. It was designed to encourage the reading of the entire Bible from cover to cover. The publishers insist it is a condensation, not an abridgment.

R.H.

BIBLE VERSIONS (Non-English). Western Christians generally think of the church moving out from its birthplace in Palestine into what was then called Asia, now a part of Turkey. From thence the missionary journeys of Paul and his companions are properly credited with introducing the gospel to Europe.

However, the gospel evidently also moved out in other directions, to the Parthian Empire east of the Euphrates and ultimately as far east as India and China. Other emissaries of the risen Lord moved south into Africa and to the land around the Mediterranean. The faithful itinerant witnesses universally carried with them the scriptures of the OT—if not scrolls, certainly in their minds and hearts.

As we know, there were "Parthians and Medes and Elamites, and the dwellers in Mesopotamia" included among the throngs who gathered for that first Christian Pentecost in Jerusalem. The records that verify this eastward movement after Pentecost have not yet been found. But we have evidence that before the end of the first century, Christianity had reached the Arbela district to the east of the Tigris and east of Nineveh. Actually many in those parts, most of whom spoke Aramaic, were first converted to Judaism. Before long Christianity was established in Upper Mesopotamia, and the city of Edessa became the chief center for disseminating the gospel in those parts as well as on into the Far East. The Syriac church became the major conduit of the redemptive message. Syria was the name given to Christian Aramaic.

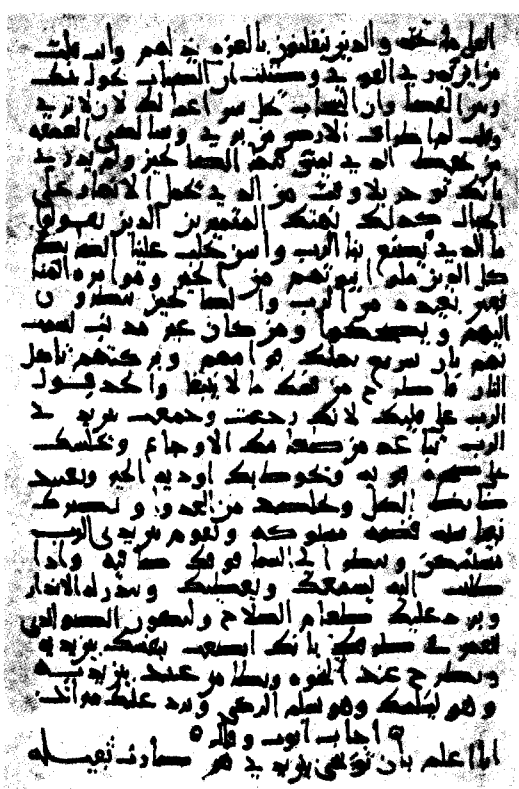

Probably the first Bible translated from the original Hebrew of the OT was the Syriac OT. Theodore of Mopsuestia wrote in A.D. 400 that "the Bible had been translated into the tongue of the Syrians," but he did not know who undertook that linguistic task or when it occurred. But it was well before his time apparently.

The PESHITTA, or simple version of the Syriac OT, may have been a Jewish or Christian translation. In any case this Peshitta was in use among Christians by the beginning of the third century. The Peshitta NT was completed sometime in the fifth century, but the DIATESSARON, a harmony of the Four Gospels, was compiled by Tatian about A.D. 170.

Meanwhile, the Western world was influenced by the translation of the Bible into Latin. Jerome's VULGATE, "common" or "popular" version, became the Bible of western Europe, and even today it is a most revered translation of the Roman Catholic Church. For centuries it was the one and only official version of the Roman church.

There had been a bewildering variety of Latin texts before Jerome under the bidding of Pope Damasus, bishop of Rome, worked from A.D. 386 to 404 to complete this landmark translation of the Scriptures. By that time Latin had superseded Greek as the official language of the civilized world. It was Jerome's Vulgate that formed the text of the GUTENBERG Bible in 1456—the first Bible printed in Europe. WYCLIFFE and his disciples first translated the Bible into English from Jerome's Vulgate.

In the early centuries of the Christian Era the Bible was translated into Armenian, Georgian, Sogdianese, an Indo-Iranian language, Coptic, Ethiopic, Arabic, and even Gothic. The Goths who sacked Rome in 410 had already been Christianized. Their bishop Ulfilas, the "Apostle of the Goths," translated their Bible in the part of Europe now known as Bulgaria. By the ninth century the Slavonic peoples had their own Scriptures.

Courtesy of the British Library

Arabic manuscript of the book of Job, written in the first half of the ninth century A.D. (British Museum add. 26116), showing Job 22:12 ff.

There are three epochs in the work of Bible translation: (1) the period between A.D. 150 and 450; (2) the Reformation age, which gave us Luther's German Bible (1522-34), the French versions of Lefevre and Olivetan (1534, 1535), the Spanish and Czech translations of 1602, Diodati's Italian translation of 1607, and most important to us the English translations of TYNDALE and his successors; (3) the missionary revival period beginning early in the nineteenth century.

The Reformation's emphasis on biblical rather than ecclesiastical authority inevitably promoted vernacular translations of Holy Scripture. The invention of the printing press aided the movement that made Bibles available to the general Christian public. When Luther, under the ban of the church and the empire, retreated to Wartburg Castle, he devoted himself to translating Erasmus' Greek NT into German. It was a significant milestone of the Reformation, and it set a standard soon duplicated in other countries, including England.

When the Protestant missionary movement sent heralds of the gospel to hitherto unreached countries of the world in the eighteenth century, these sturdy evangelists also became linguists. For example, WILLIAM CAREY arrived in India in 1794 and rapidly mastered the language. Soon he was translating the Scriptures into Bengali. Thereafter he learned Sanskrit and Marathi, and in his lifetime supervised and edited translations of the Bible into thirty-six languages.

The Pietists in Germany were pioneers in founding the Van Canstein Bible Society in 1710. The wave of missionary fervor inspired the founding of the British and Foreign Bible Society in 1804, and the AMERICAN BIBLE SOCIETY in 1816. Both societies aggressively pursued the translation and distribution of the Scriptures in many foreign tongues. Because of a duplication of efforts, it became apparent that a worldwide coordinating agency needed to be formed. This occurred after World War II when the UNITED BIBLE SOCIETIES was established. Today, all of the major languages of the world—Mandarin, English, Hindi, Spanish, Russian, German, Japanese, Malay, Bengali, French, Portuguese, and Italian—possess Bibles.

Missionaries working in obscure tribes recognized that there were many smaller language groups without their own translations of Scripture. Two American missionaries to Latin America, L. L. Legters and W. Cameron Townsend, realized the enormity of the task of reaching the many tribal peoples of the world. In 1934 they conducted a summer school in descriptive linguistics for pioneer missionaries at "Camp Wycliffe" in Arkansas. Soon this fledgling operation began to work in the Indian tribes of Mexico. In 1942 they organized two parallel organizations—Wycliffe Bible Translators and the Summer Institute of Linguistics, SIL representing the scientific, linguistic, and cultural fields as a non-sectarian entity. These organizations took on the tasks of making contacts with foreign governments and conducting summer training programs in several contributing countries. WBT was assigned the work of enlisting Christian linguists and seeking financial support from churches. Today the Wycliffe organization has become the largest force of Bible translators in the world.

The United Bible Societies published in 1975 its first listing of the languages in which at least some portion of the Scriptures has been translated. By 1974 the list included 1,549 languages. Since then the numbers have escalated. To bring vernacular translations to all the peoples of the world is a formidable task even though the science of linguistics has leaped forward. In 1960 Wycliffe workers published the book Two Thousand Tongues to Go.

Through the efforts of the Bible societies and other organizations, contemporary translations of Scripture have been rendered in most of the major languages. The American Bible Society has been promoting equivalent foreign versions of the Good News Bible, and Living Bibles International is rendering colloquial translations comparable to the popular American paraphrase, the Living Bible. (Compare BIBLE TRANSLATIONS.)

R. H.

BIBLICAL CRITICISM. Under the influence of the Renaissance commitment to the freedom of the human mind from ecclesiastical dogma and the surge of interest in the reappropriation of human intellectual and cultural achievements in past ages, theological scholarship began in the mid-seventeenth century to raise critical questions about the Bible. These lines of inquiry were stimulated by the philosophical movements of the eighteenth century in England and Germany (Deism and the Enlightenment), which shifted attention from the remote God to the immanent activity of the human mind. Biblical criticism, as it came to be called, asked the same questions about the Bible and its origins that classical scholars were asking about the ancient documents with which they were concerned: How and why were these books written? What was the original text? What were the sources used by the writer? What historical factors can be discerned from work behind and within the documents? What were the special aims of the writer and the special interests of his intended audience? What social and cultural factors—acknowledged or unacknowledged—helped to shape the material as we now have it?

Textual Criticism. The Jewish scholars gathered at the so-called Council of JAMNIA at the end of the first century A.D. not only formulated the official list of Hebrew scriptures called the CANON, but also sought to determine the definitive Hebrew TEXT of the Bible. In the sixteenth century an official rabbinic edition of the Bible was published in Venice, the Biblia Rabbinica, which became the norm, and is in use down to the present day. It included not only the consonants in which Hebrew is written, but also the stylized diacritical marks, which indicate the vowels to be read with the consonants. In 1678, however, a Roman Catholic priest named Richard Simon published his Critical History of the Old Testament, in which he sought to show that behind the written documents can be discerned earlier, oral sources, and that Moses did not write the first five books of the Bible, which had been traditionally attributed to him.

Although Simon's work was rejected by the church initially, it elicited interest in England and Germany, where work was undertaken in analysis of the OT to determine what its original text was, drawing on not only the Hebrew evidence but using the ancient Greek version, the Septuagint, as well. Furthermore, other Semitic languages were studied with the aim of determining more precisely the meanings of biblical words and place names, for which the lexicon of WILLIAM GESENIUS (1786–1842) became an enduring standard reference.

The preparation in Basel of a printed text of the Greek NT, which set the standard for the so-called Textus Receptus, was marred by the fact that Erasmus used inferior manuscript resources in preparing this edition, and at some points translated from the standard Latin text what he thought the Greek ought to have said. The efforts by German scholars to determine rules by which one might decide among differences within the manuscript evidence (especially J. J. Griesbach, 1745–1812) and the discovery of new ancient manuscript copies of the NT (the most notable being that found by C. von Tischendorf at Mount Sinai and published by him in 1862) combined to prepare for the publication of carefully edited critical editions of the Greek NT. Of these the dominant editions were, in Britain, that of B. F. Westcott and F. J. A. Hort (1881–82) and the German tradition linked with the names of B. Weiss, E. Nestle, and KURT ALAND (1894 to the present). Some scholars think, however, that these widely used editions do not reflect adequately the evidence from other ancient sources: the early translations of the NT into Syriac, Armenian, and Georgian, for example.

The process of textual reconstruction for the OT has been greatly aided by the discovery of the DEAD SEA SCROLLS, copies of many parts of the Hebrew scriptures in the first-century library at QUMRAN. The result of this research and these discoveries is that the textual criticism, and, therefore, textual reconstruction of the Bible, rests on the broadest basis and the most fully examined principles of any literary document from the ancient world. Nearly all the modern translations of the Bible not only take into account the manuscript discoveries and the careful textual analyses that have been carried out, but they also frequently indicate the variations in meaning derived from this evidence through variants that are given in notes with which the translations are interspersed.

Historical Criticism. The discovery of abundant literary and archaeological evidence contemporary with the events reported in the Bible and with the writing of these books sacred to Jews and Christians raises two basic questions: How accurate as historical documents are the biblical narratives? What credence is to be given to the extraordinary events reported in the Bible, including accounts of direct divine action in human affairs and the performance of miracles by human beings? An overarching question would be, Of what historical worth is the Bible? Two of the leading figures who led off the development of historical criticism were J. D. Michaelis (1717–91), whose work in Semitic languages and archaeology enabled him to explain and interpret the Bible in light of historical setting, and J. S. Semler (1721–92), who insisted that the importance of a biblical writing lay in the insight that it provided human beings rather than in any divinely imposed authority, as was implied by the concept of canon.

The historical method developed on down into the eighteenth century in two distinct ways: one group of scholars emphasized the aesthetic and humane values that are present in the biblical writings, especially in the poetic passages (as in J. G. Herder, 1744–1803), while J. G. Eichhorn (1752–1827) sought to combine the historical and contextual features of Semler's work with the romantic appeal of Herder. It was the latter interest that was developed and made more precise by W. M. L. de Wette (1780–1849), who worked to reconstruct the circumstances of the writing of the biblical books, including both the historical setting and the literary styles and methods employed. This method of illuminating the meaning of Scripture by comparing and contrasting it with what other cultures were doing, thinking and saying in the ancient world contemporary with the Bible has proved to be an enormously helpful and illuminating enterprise. It makes possible sensitive understanding of what human aspirations and anxieties were, how people felt oppressed or threatened by the political and social forces that shaped their lives, and how the divine promise gave them hope of release and renewal.

Ironically, the freeing of scriptural interpretation from the dogmatic authority of the church was soon matched by the scholars adopting certain hypotheses about the movement of history and arranging the historical picture to conform to those assumptions. In nineteenth-century Germany, where the intellectual life was dominated by the theory of G. W. F. HEGEL (1770–1831) and his notion that the course of history is determined by the forces and counterforces of history out of which a new third possibility emerges inevitably (thesis—antithesis—synthesis), the history of the NT period was forced into the following pattern: first there was Paul's system of a law-free gospel; then came a type of Christianity in the name of the disciples of Jesus which sought to make Christians subject to Jewish law; from this emerged the universal Christianity of the post-apostolic period. A comparable system has been imposed on the NT evidence in the present century through the writings of RUDOLF BULTMANN (1884–1976). Building on the work of his predecessors in the so-called History-of-Religions School of thought, R. Reitzenstein (1861–1931) and W. Bousset (1865–1920), Bultmann represented the first century in NT times as a period in which Paul and the leaders of the Gentile churches used an allegedly widespread myth of a heavenly redeemer figure who comes to earth to achieve human redemption, and thereby they created a Hellenistic mystery cult centered upon Jesus. The second phase came in a reaction to this construct on the part of Jewish Christians, who sought to depict Jesus along more Jewish lines, especially drawing on apocalyptic imagery. This conflict of theological viewpoints brought the third stage: the church became institutionalized, and its freedom in thought and action was transformed into a dogmatic, authoritative system. In variant forms, this construction of NT history continues to have its adherents down to the later twentieth century, even though the Gnostic myth cannot be demonstrated before the second century A.D., and the evidence must be coerced in order to fit the pattern.

Major contributions to the providing of material with which the people of the Bible could be compared and contrasted were made by W. F. ALBRIGHT and A. DEISSMANN. Albright's encyclopedic works included the exploration of archaeological evidence and the study of literary and inscriptional materials from all over the Middle East, with the result that there was available a vast array of comparative evidence for the historical analysis of life in Bible times. Deissmann's study of the language and the contents of a great mass of letters and other documents from Egypt, in the centuries before and after the birth of Jesus, shed light on the common Greek language of the period, as well as on patterns of social and economic life at that time. The latter study has been carried further through the lexical work of W. BAUER and G. KITTEL—projects that have been translated and adapted in English. The discoveries at QUMRAN and in the Gnostic library at NAG HAMMADI have greatly enhanced our historical knowledge of this period from the first down into the second and third centuries.

Literary Criticism. The need for identifying the sources behind the biblical writings was noted by the earliest historical critics, but the results of that undertaking became evident and useful only in the nineteenth century. Building on the work of his teachers, J. WELLHAUSEN (1844–1918) propounded what is referred to as the DOCUMENTARY HYPOTHESIS, the theory that there are four literary strands that underlie the first five books of the Bible: J (in which the God of Israel is called "Yahweh," or in common usage, Jehovah); E (in which God is called Elohim); D, which is the reworking of older material from the point of view represented in Deuteronomy; P, which represents another editing from the point of view of the priests.

On the NT side, questions raised as to which Gospel was written first and whether the original language was Greek or Aramaic continue to be debated, but the following consensus has emerged: that there was a period of oral transmission of the tradition now included in the Gospels that continued after the Gospels were written; that the First Gospel was Mark, which was used as a basic source by Matthew and Luke; that the latter two Gospels also drew upon a source called Q (from the German word for source, Quelle), which consisted chiefly of sayings of Jesus; that the Gospel writers were not bound by the tradition, but adapted it to serve the needs of the particular community of Christians that was addressed in each Gospel. John is the example of the freest modification of the tradition and of the inclusion of a structure and a style that has no counterpart in the other three Gospels. As an important part of the detailed analysis of the Gospels, scholars have noted the ways in which the writers also adapted, for their own purposes, the literary styles and patterns (or genres) in use in their time, such as letters, biography, narrative style, romances, apocalypses, and liturgical forms.

Form-criticism. This analytical method (which literally translated from its German origins would be form-history) seeks to identify and to analyze the small patterns of speech and narrative that lie behind the written documents of the Bible, which share certain cultural features with other writings of biblical times and which can be shown to have fulfilled certain specific functions for the writer and his community. In the OT, these forms would include patterns of prophetic speech, narrative, and psalms (H. GUNKEL, 1862–1932). Scandinavian scholars responded to this method by emphasizing the sociological (J. Pedersen) and cultic (S. Mowinckel) functions of this formal material.

In NT studies, form-criticism emerged as an important method through the work of K. L. Schmidt (1891–1956), whose study of Mark showed the importance of the connecting passages in the Gospel, which linked what was likely unorganized, free-floating material in the oral tradition, and did so to serve the needs of instruction and worship within the life of the Markan community. M. DIBELIUS (1883–1947) and R. Bultmann developed their studies of the Gospel tradition along similar lines. Each gave attention to the life-situation (SITZ-IM-LEBEN) of Jesus, of the church that preserved the tradition, and of the evangelist who incorporated it into his account. Dibelius was more interested in literary classification of material, while Bultmann used the method to demonstrate the expansion and adaptation of it to serve the changing needs of the church. Their categories were simplistic, however, so that they were content to classify the tradition as suited for worship or instruction, as arising in the Jewish or the Greek-speaking church—as though most Jews of this epoch did not in fact speak Greek and were not powerfully influenced by Hellenistic culture, as Martin Hengel's study of Judaism and Hellenism has shown was indeed the case.

Another serious flaw in the form-critical approach is that it fails to take adequate account of the way that a tradition undergoes basic change when it shifts from the freely adaptive oral stage to the fixed form of a written document. W. Kelber and E. Güttgemans have correctly drawn attention to this fault in form-criticism.

Redaction-criticism. One of the chief contributions of form-criticism, however, is that it enables the interpreter of a composite document like a Gospel to discern how the author has adapted and modified the material he is drawing upon to serve his own specific aims. The Gospel writers are seen, therefore, not as inept editors (as Dibelius depicted them) but as creative thinkers who draw on tradition to address the situation in their own community. The focus, therefore, is not on the components, but on the work as a whole. Thus Mark seems to be addressing a community that is living in a situation of urgency and threat of persecution, which he speaks to by pointing to the model of Jesus' vindication by God in consequence of his obedience. Luke develops the tradition to portray the ministry of Jesus as already inclusive of the Gentiles and other religious outsiders. Matthew lays emphasis on the authority of Jesus, which has been transmitted to the disciples/apostles who carry on in his absence. John may be seen to build on such models as the personified Jewish wisdom and the saving acts of Hellenistic deities, such as Isis and Asclepius, in his effort to portray Jesus as the agent of God in establishing a community that is open to all who are in need and come seeking divine help.

Canon-criticism. Another type of critical study, which likewise seeks to understand the books of the Bible, canon-criticism considers each writing in relation to its role as a part of the collection of writings acknowledged by church or synagogue as authoritative.

Sociological and Structuralist Criticism. Under the influence of C. Lévi-Strauss and other cultural anthropologists, some biblical scholars seek to abstract from the diversity of material in the Bible to certain underlying structures of human life and thought, which they regard as universal. Although this approach can be illuminating, one must bear in mind that the attempt to discern universal patterns must always be balanced by acknowledgment of the unique specific features of any historical situation. Following the lead of MAX WEBER, a more responsible undertaking than a rigid system of classifying data is the identification of certain "ideal types" which sociologists note in human societies, and which can be used as norms for discovering what is shared by a historical phenomenon with other cultures in the biblical period, and what is distinctive about it as well. This sociological approach to biblical life and thought gives promise of providing new insights for the kind of analysis and interpretation of the Bible that has been sought after since the rise of critical methods in the post-Renaissance period.

H.K.

BIBLICAL REALISM. The social and ethical outlook of REINHOLD NIEBUHR and other Neo-Orthodox social commentators. Rather than the unabashed optimism of pre-World War I LIBERALISM or the social inactivity based on pessimism about the world of FUNDAMENTALISM, Niebuhr and other biblical realists stressed the tragic dimension of history occasioned by original sin, and the call of the covenant God for people to act responsibly to limit evil and promote human good.

J.C.

BIBLICAL THEOLOGY. The term does not refer simply to a theology based on the Bible. It refers rather to a method of study, that of approaching theology from a biblical rather than a philosophical point of view. As currently used, the term "biblical theology" refers to the discipline of studying theology from the perspective of contemporaneity with biblical authors, seeking an understanding of the text consistent with what it might have meant or should have meant to its first readers. In comparison, SYSTEMATIC THEOLOGY is not simply the effort to systematize biblical thought, but in modern times has come to mean the study of biblical thought from the perspective of contemporaneity with modern exegetes and along the lines of philosophical rather than historical methodology.

At issue is the relation of the biblical writings to modern society. Are documents written so long ago applicable today (or in any time subsequent to their composition), and if so in what way? Thus the issue of both HEREMENEUTICS and canonical history are involved, and the primary problem becomes the "distance between the centuries," or the "conversation" between past and present.

Until the Reformation the biblical sources were primarily appealed to on the basis of reason, either literally or allegorically, and the resultant exegesis reflected a hermeneutic consisting fundamentally of logic. Such was the basis, for example, of Augustine's Enchiridion, Calvin's Institutes of the Christian Religion, and Thomas Aquinas' Summa Theologica. Texts were chosen and exegeted to undergird dogmatic positions. Therefore, neither the historical positions of the original authors, conditioned by time and place, nor any overall system of "biblical theology" was reflected in the writings of these exegetes. Not until late in the eighteenth century were real efforts made at writing biblical theology, and those that were done were more philosophical than theological in their presuppositions and methodologies. The nineteenth century saw the ultimate extension of this orientation in the rise of a liberal theology that placed its emphasis on the modern end of this "distance between the centuries," insisting that an existential value of the sources made the question of historical meaning irrelevant. Over against this arose, largely as the product of a new trend in LITERARY CRITICISM in Germany, a history of religions school of thought, led by the university of Tübingen, which replaced the theological interest with a historical and biblical one. The relation of Israel to her neighbors was viewed from the perspective of the assumed evolutionary development of Israelite religion, and the progress of the early Christian church was charted on the framework of Hegelian dialectic. Theology had given way to history of religion. The present was ignored if not forgotten. The sources were relevant for a study of historical backgrounds and cultural interrelationships but of little or no importance for the perception of revelation through faith.

The limited appeal of such a purely historical study of the Bible and the development of the science of archaeology eroded the impact of the historical school by the twentieth century, reviving an interest in the question once more of how the twentieth century could be meaningfully related to the ancient sources. Even if the Bible were to be considered a repository of theological truth rather than a mere source of ancient history and cultural anthropology, the question of how that theology was to be extracted became the focus of attention and remains so. The focus on the historical ramifications of placing the books of the Bible in their proper cultural setting naturally leads to an interest in descriptive theology, that is, answering the question as to what the Bible meant to those who first received its books and read them. Biblical theology is, after all, interwoven in the history of Israel and the story of Jesus Christ. But, as we have learned, unless that theology has direct and significant bearing on modern people, they are going to find little more than historical interest in pursuing its study. Thus the appeal of systematic theology is based primarily on a philosophical approach to people's needs and seeking to find in the ancient sources only those truths that speak universally and timelessly to the human heart. Philosophy may pose the questions, and theology may provide the answers, but how? Systematic theology says by seeking answers, not to the question, What did the text mean to those who first heard it, but to the question, What does it mean to those who hear it now?

Such was the approach of KARL BARTH, who felt that Paul spoke in the first century and modern people hear. Thus the "distance between the centuries" is bridged immediately because the subject matter Paul deals with is common to people of all time and in every place. It is, therefore, always relevant. Another approach that takes seriously the source materials, though not for their historical value, is that of RUDOLPH BULTMANN. The "distance bridge" is spanned for Bultmann by the fact that issues of EXISTENTIALISM, those that force people to investigate themselves and that lead to faith, are raised in the Bible and become relevant wherever and whenever people confront them. Modern people are scientifically oriented, however, and recognize that the Bible, being an ancient and prescientific collection of books, is written in mythological and cosmological terms that are incomprehensible to them today. Therefore such ideas as the virgin birth, resurrection, miracles, and so forth must be removed (DEMYTHOLOGIZATION) from the text and do not constitute historical reality. It is not historical reality, anyway, but existential confrontation that is ultimately important. A third position is represented by OSCAR CULLMANN, who approaches theology as descriptive rather than systematic. He sees theology as a religious philosophy of history, quite unlike the nonhistorical existential philosophy of Bultmann. Time and history are important for Cullman. That which the NT states about Christ is set forth in the reality of time and history. While these must be taken seriously, they are to be studied not merely for historical interest but for theological content as well. How this content is relevant to modern people is not as clear in Cullman, however, as it is in the other two systems.

Perhaps it would be well to remind ourselves at this point that the tendency to extremes is better avoided. Preoccupation with history belongs to the historian, while the evaluation of people's ongoing psychological and philosophical responses to their environment belongs to the psychologist and philosopher. But not entirely. Common sense dictates that any historical document should be studied with an appreciation for the historical circumstances in which it was produced, and that any responses contemporary people make to such documents must be based on those eternal and universal truths that transcend any particular period of history. Such is the task of the theologian. While one may argue from common sense in realizing the nature of the task, it is not equally clear what methodology most appropriately, and therefore, most successfully fulfills that task.

Biblical theology will not have fulfilled its task if it merely describes and categorizes the various topics on which the several biblical authors touch. Thus, it cannot adequately do without proper regard for the historical, cultural, and linguistic milieu in which the biblical books were produced. Nor will it be sufficient for the biblical theologian to ignore the pressing concerns of human nature as they relate to the implications inherent in the concept that the Bible is Holy Scripture. The question of the application of historical documents to modern people is inherent in the philosophical presuppositions of any historically based religion. The myth that the biblical theologian deals with historical materials but the systematic theologian relates to contemporary people is just that, a myth. All systematic theology presupposes an understanding of biblical theology, just as biblical theology finds its justification as foundation for systematic thought. (Compare BIBLICAL CRITICISM.)

J.M.

BICKERSTETH, EDWARD HENRY (1825–1906). Best known for his hymns "Peace, Perfect Peace," "Till He Comes," and "Come Ye Yourselves Apart," Bickersteth was the son of hymn writer Edward Bickersteth and nephew of hymn writer John Bickersteth. Educated at Walton and Trinity College, Cambridge, he received a B.A. with high honor in 1847 and the M.A. in 1850. Ordained in 1848, he served a number of smaller parishes before being named dean of Gloucester in 1885. That same year he became bishop of Exeter. The author of numerous poems, hymns, and books, his most lasting contribution was editing The Hymnal Companion to the Book of Common Prayer (1870). He authored nearly thirty books.

N.H.

BIGAMY. See MARRIAGE.

BILDAD (meaning "the Lord has loved" [?]). Bildad is mentioned in Job (2:11; 8:1; 18:1, 25:1; 42:9) as "the Shuhite," and is regularly the second speaker of Job's friends. Bildad is thought to be younger than Eliphaz and older than Zophar. His thinking is traditional and conventional. Through Job's intercession, his "folly" is forgiven. P.L.G.

BILHAH (meaning "unconcerned" [?]). LABAN'S maid, given to RACHEL when she married Jacob (Gen. 29:29). Following custom, and thinking she herself was barren, Rachel gave Bilhah to Jacob as a concubine. Through this, Rachel thought to become legally a mother (Gen. 30:3). Bilhah bore Dan and Naphtali. Reuben, son of Leah, had intercourse with Bilhah (Gen. 35:22), for which the dying Jacob publicly rebuked him (Gen. 49:4; see Deut. 27:20). P.L.G.

BINDING AND LOOSING. These terms denote actions either forbidden ("bound") or permitted ("loosed"), according to the determination of the Jewish teachers, the scribes. Several areas are covered by such decisions, chiefly to do with Jewish theology, but also relating to moral questions. In these matters the twin terms came to be associated with the disciplinary procedures of the synagogue in its function as a "house of judgment" (Hebrew beth din), that is, a law court. This is the way in which "binding" and "loosing" became synonymous with both expulsion from the synagogue and a receiving back of penitent Jews.

In a third way the terms became used in connection with magical practices. A person was said to be "bound" by coming under the power of a demon or god, while his release from such power by exorcism was his being "loosed." This last-named collocation of terms is found in the Synoptic Gospels (for example, Luke 13:10-17), and is part of the overall teaching on the kingdom of God present in Jesus' earthly ministry (Luke 11:20). He came to set the prisoners free (Luke 4:18) and to release men and women from bondage to legalistic religion (Matt. 11:28-30).

Matthew's Gospel, however, reflects a dual strain of teaching. While it celebrates God's free favor to all people in the coming of Jesus, it evidently is cautious in not allowing liberty to degenerate into license and disregard of moral sanctions. In this light we should understand Matthew 16:19, with its Jewish Christian exaltation of Peter as apostolic leader to whom was entrusted the "power of the keys," that is, the authority to decide what Christians in those times should regard as indispensable for faith and practice. The tension underlying this passage is seen in Galatians 2:11-21. R.M.

BIOETHICS. A field of applied ETHICS developed over the past quarter century that deals with the capability to keep terminally ill (or injured) patients alive with elaborate life support systems and to transplant vital organs, and the knowledge that makes these activities possible. Since medical science now has this knowledge and capacity, and more, questions naturally arise about the ethical nature of such activities. Ought we to keep the brain-dead patient alive by respirators? Should we implant the hearts of baboons in infants with malformed hearts? Ought we to tamper with the sex of human embryos? Are we moral if we produce "test tube babies"? These and similar kinds of questions are the domain of bioethics. Such issues involve basic human VALUES, and the decisions made, even by, or especially by, "experts" affect the quality of life of everyone in society.

Bioethics seeks, above all, to be rational, to avoid causing unnecessary evil (prevention of evil), and to apply the same standards to everyone, everywhere, all the time (universality). It generally does not speak of the promotion of good, since the good of one person may conflict with or contradict another's conception of one's own good. Rather, it seeks the avoidance of evils, such as pain, death, disability, and discrimination.

Bioethics includes medical ethics, but is a larger field of concern, that is, in relation to questions about manipulation of the DNA chain or the possibility of producing genetic "clones" of people. Medical ethics, as an applied ethical area that sooner or later touches everyone's life, is of great importance and interest to the general public. For example, does cutting off a respirator when a patient is "brain dead" constitute killing? Is refusal to start "heroic" medical measures to keep the heart of an old, exhausted, "terminal" patient beating an act of manslaughter? Such issues and questions appear in the press daily, and several classic court cases have involved precisely these elements.

Bioethics may, therefore, be seen as the standard or everyday morality of ordinary, decent people, applied to the critical, and often tragic, situations that can and do arise in hospitals and in experimental laboratories. A frequently asked question is, "We can do this (for example, put an animal's organ into a human), but ought we to do so?" The realm or area of concern sometimes called the bio-realm of bioethics is far wider than medical ethics, and much more complex than our usual day-to-day ethical problems involving honesty and respect of other's rights, but it is directly related to ordinary ethical values.

With reference to the far-reaching possibilities of medical science, that is, to correct defects in the unborn child, we encounter the ethical problem of lack of informed consent. While it seems morally unobjectionable to tamper with the fetus so as to prevent it being born crippled, is it as clear that the scientist has the right to alter the sex or personality of the fetus? Is not such a tactic the manipulation of a human being by the standard of a "good" he or she has not fully understood and freely consented to?

Another area of bioethics involves the rights (if any) of animals. Many people have sympathized with the helplessness of animals before the technology of science, but in recent years the issue has grown larger. Of course, the various physical and medical sciences would not be capable of making their discoveries without the use of experimental subjects, chiefly rats, dogs, and monkeys, but also sheep, horses, pigs, and a wide array of other animals. The concern to protect the environment, the forests, oceans, streams, lakes, and even the sky ("acid rain") is also an area in contemporary bioethics.

J.C.

BIRETTA. A stiff, square hat with three or four ridges pointing upward and a tassel in its center, worn by cardinals, bishops, or priests. As priests in the Middle Ages were tonsured, that is, had the top of their heads shaved, a hat was needed for protection from the elements. Birettas are found in the colors red, purple, or black to correspond to the rank of the church officials.

J.C.

BISHOP. From the Greek episkopos or "overseer"; the spiritual leader of a church or churches in the NT and in various traditions of Christianity up to the present day. In the NT, the term appears five times, once clearly applied to Christ as the head of the church (I Pet. 2:25 KJV) and the rest designating church officials (Acts 20:28; Phil. 1:1; I Tim. 3:2; and Titus 1:7). Possibly the office of bishop may have been the same office designated by the term "ELDER." Acts 20:17 and Titus 1:5-7 seem to make that identification.

By the time of Ignatius in the second century A.D., the bishop was recognized as the supreme church officer. The Roman Catholic church, holding to a polity derived from the "early Catholic" period of church development, sees the bishop as supreme in the hierarchical government of the church. Bishops do not constitute a separate order of ministry, but rather, alone, possess the full powers of the Christian priesthood, including the power to confirm and to ordain. Catholic bishops are thus the chief pastors of their dioceses.

The Anglican and Episcopal churches practice a similar polity. Other Protestant churches also have bishops, notably the Lutheran and Methodist communions. The powers of bishops in these churches is considerably less than those of Catholic or Anglican bishops, however. Other, less traditionally ordered Protestant bodies assign the bishop's classic functions of spiritual oversight to assemblies of pastors and lay representatives, as in the case of the presbytery in Presbyterian and Reformed churches.

J.C.

BLACK FRIARS. See DOMINIC/DOMINICANS.

BLACK LETTER DAYS. An expression traditional in the Anglican communion for a lesser Sunday or festival in the church year. The term derives from the use of red letters to mark major church festivals on announcement boards. Thus black letter days are less significant than red letter days.

J.C.

BLACK MONKS. See BENEDICT/BENEDICTINES.

BLACK MUSLIMS. A religious movement among American blacks first begun in 1930 by W. D. Fard, who proclaimed that Christianity was a slave religion foisted on black people by white people, and that ISLAM was the proper religion for self-respecting blacks.

Fard's movement gained followers who responded to his message, which stressed economic and political power for blacks, promoted Afro-American culture, and called for black unity. Fard took the name Farrad Muhammad and was an unusual man, who eventually disappeared. Before that time, he became known as the Prophet. The movement came under the leadership of Elijah Poole, who took the name ELIJAH MUHAMMAD. Elijah brought growth and an unorthodox understanding of Islam, which declared the white race to be devils. He stressed black power in a radical way, earning the fear of many police officials. He moved the headquarters from Detroit to Chicago and began to recruit members among the large black prison population. Elijah taught a strict Islamic morality, which was the salvation of many alcohol and drug-abusing black urban men. His theology was a reverse racism that exalted the black race and declared the white race to have been created by an evil scientist (or devil). This teaching seemed to offer some consolation to the depressed poor of black urban slums.

In the 1950s, a prisoner named Malcolm Little was converted to Elijah's doctrine and took the name Malcolm X. This X was adopted by all black Muslims who rejected their European "slave names." At first radical, Malcolm in time became more moderate. He urged more normal Muslim beliefs, including the brotherhood of man, even with white people. Malcolm and Elijah became estranged over this, and Malcolm was assassinated by Black Muslims in 1965.

Upon Elijah's death, his son, Walter D. Muhammad, assumed control. He is bringing the group's theology more into line with Orthodox Islam. Black Muslims, since the time of Malcolm X, have become progressively more positive as a force in the inner city and in prisons. Their emphasis on personal morality, sobriety, and family unity is a force for good among urban blacks today.

J.C.

BLACKS, CHRISTIANITY AND. See PLURALISM.

BLACK THEOLOGY. A contemporary theological movement of diverse viewpoints that arose among black religious leaders in the United States during the 1960s. Of course, black theology had a history, stretching back into the nineteenth-century struggle against slavery and including the many religious experiments of the black community, from rural revivalism to the urban origins of the BLACK MUSLIMS in Detroit and elsewhere. The most immediate causes of the rise of black theology, which declared the struggle of American blacks for justice and equality against racism to be equivalent to Moses calling Israel out of Egyptian slavery or Jesus' liberation of sinners from the bondage of sin, were MARTIN LUTHER KING, JR's leadership of the civil rights movement during the fifties and early sixties; a book, Black Religion, written by Joseph Washington in 1964; the black nationalistic movement sparked by Malcolm X; and the Black Power movement. More remote, but influential, were the early thinkers, Henry McNeal Turner, who declared "God is a Negro" in 1894, and Marcus Garvey (1887–1940), who spoke of a black Jesus.

The major proponents of black theology include James Forman, who made the demand for reparations from white churches and synagogues at Riverside Church in May 1969; James Cone, who declared "Christ is Black, baby"; Joseph Washington, another militant of the 1960s; Deotis Roberts, a more moderate spokesman; Albert Cleage, who affirms a black Messiah; and Major Jones, who found elements of Jurgen Moltmann's theology of hope helpful for blacks.

Black theology expresses a radical but profound belief that God is on the side of the oppressed, whom black theologians identify with the black poor in America. Some thinkers claim that blacks are God's chosen people, and that because of their experiences of slavery and contemporary racism, blacks are the only people qualified to understand Christianity. Other thinkers believe the African background of blacks enables them to better embody the original life-style and attitudes of Christianity. There is much creative disagreement among black theologians. William Jones has criticized black thinkers for not taking the problem of sin and evil seriously. More moderate blacks have attacked the reverse racism of radical claims that whites are not Christians—or even are evil in essence. Major Jones and others have stressed the universalism of Christianity—that it is for all, regardless of race. Warner Traynham, as early as 1973, pointed out that black theology must learn from and make common cause with other LIBERATION theologies, especially the thought and practice developed in Latin America and among FEMINIST theologians. More recently, meetings between Latin Americans, feminists, and black theologians have taken place.

Black theology has been opposed by many conservative churchmen in America, the same ones who oppose feminist and Latin American liberation theologies. Without doubt, many radical statements have been made by some proponents of black theology, nonetheless, the reasons for even extreme claims are humanly understandable. The parallels between Israel in Egyptian bondage and blacks in American slavery forms the heritage of blacks in America for three hundred years. The parallel between Moses and Martin Luther King, Jr., a leader recognized as one in the true prophetic mold by people of all races, is more than symbolic. The claim that God is on the side of the oppressed cannot be disputed by anyone who reads the NT closely. The Magnificat, which proclaims that God puts down the mighty from their thrones and exalts those of low degree in the Incarnation; the Pauline hymn of Christ's kenosis, his humbling of himself to become fully human (Phil. 2:5–11); and the story of Jesus' lowly birth and humble life are far more radical than any contemporary theological statements.

J.C.

BLACKWOOD, ANDREW WATTERSON (1882–1966). A minister and educator, Blackwood was born on August 5 in Clay Center, Kansas, to Thomas and Bella Watterson. He graduated from Franklin College (1902), Harvard (1905), and Xenia Theological Seminary (1908).

Ordained in the United Presbyterian Church in 1908, he pastored three churches before becoming a professor at Presbyterian Theological Seminary, Louisville, Kentucky, in 1925. From 1930 to 1950 he taught homiletics at Princeton, and at Temple University School of Theology until 1958. He authored twenty-two books on religion, preaching, and pastoral care.

N.H.

BLAKE, WILLIAM (1757–1827). Engraver, poet, painter, and perhaps the most imaginative Christian visionary of the nineteenth century. Sent to drawing school in London at age ten, he began a seven-year apprenticeship as an engraver at fourteen. At twenty-one he exhibited water colors at the Royal Academy. Later he painted biblical illustrations as well as powerful symbolic drawings, which he engraved for his own works. From 1790 on, Blake published a series of illuminated visionary, apocalyptic works including The Marriage of Heaven and Hell, depicting a revolutionary Christian humanism; The Book of Urizen (1794); and Jerusalem (1818–20), in which the union of God and humans leads to God's annihilation and resurrection as the Great Humanity Divine.

Blake saw himself as a Christian, but his unique spirituality was radically personal and heterodox, influenced by the Bible, SWEDENBORG, J. BOEHME, and Jewish cabbalistic writings. Blake's influence is evident in the writings of some "death of God" theologians.

J.L.

Courtesy of the Library of Congress

The Ancient of Days, an etching by William Blake

BLASPHEMY. From the Greek noun meaning “to speak evil of God,” and the Hebrew word “to curse the name of the Lord” (Lev. 24:16). It is synonymous in Hebrew with “reviling” (Ezek. 35:2) and “cursing” (Lev. 24:11); in Greek “to utter blasphemy” (Rev. 13:1 ff.; 17:3). The penalty among the Hebrews for willful SIN (Num. 15:30, “with a high hand”) was stoning to death (Lev. 24:16). Blasphemy could be in deed, as in Ezekiel 20:27 (“dealing treacherously”), and practicing IDOLATRY (Isa. 65:7).

Jesus was charged with blasphemy because he claimed authority to forgive sins (Matt. 9:3; Luke 5:21) and to be the Christ, the Son of God (Matt. 26:63-65; Mark 14:61-64; John 10:29, 36). Stephen spoke “blasphemous words against Moses and God” (Acts 6:11) and was stoned to death. The NT considers it blasphemous to revile Christ (Matt. 27:39; Mark 15:29; Luke 22:65; 23:39), to oppose the gospel (Acts 26:11; I Tim. 1:13), and to discredit Christianity (Rom. 2:24; I Tim. 6:1; Tit. 2:5; Jas. 2:7; II Pet. 2:2).

In a somewhat less serious form, it is blasphemy to mock, revile, or slander spiritual authorities, since they represent Christ (Acts 13:45; 18:6; II Pet. 2:10-12; Jude 8-10). Blasphemy against the Holy Spirit is called the unforgivable or “eternal sin” (Matt. 12:31-32; Mark 3:28-30; Luke 12:10). This represents willful rejection of God and refusal of God’s redemptive work to the extent of giving credit for God’s “mighty acts” not to God but to another.

P.L.G.

BLESS/BLESSING. A double sense is given to these terms in biblical literature. When used of God, “to bless” is to acknowledge the divine person and worth, usually in the light of what God has done or has given to people. Less often, material objects are said to be “blessed,” as when Jesus took bread in the Upper Room and BLESSED it, according to Mark 14:22 and parallels. But clearly for Jewish readers this would imply not that the object was blessed, rather God was being thanked as the giver.

The same understanding is to be seen in Paul (I Cor. 10:16) and later NT writers (see I Tim. 4:3-5). The other sense of “bless” is found in those instances where humans are the recipients of blessing, that is, from God, or just occasionally from one another (Gen. 27:41; Lev. 25:21; James 3:9, 10). Such bestowals are both material goods and property (Deut. 11:26; Prov. 10:22; 28:20) and spiritual enrichments. The Psalms are particularly rich in the latter category, even when adversity comes (Ps. 94:12), a theme expounded in the NT (Rom. 5:3-5; II Cor. 1:3-7; James 1:2).

The NT picks up the spiritual dimension, centering chiefly on the theme of God’s blessing on people through Christ and the gospel. Doxologies and liturgical expressions (for example, Eph. 1:3-10; I Pet. 1:3-9; Rev. 5:1-10) suggest that such ways of praising God arose in scenes of the church at worship when hymns and confessions chanted Christian praise. The Eucharist took its rightful place as the focal point of thanksgiving to God for divine blessings (I Cor. 10:16, based on Jesus’ actions recorded in 11:24), though as a counterblast to Gnostic depreciation in the material world Christians saw God’s hand in the common mercies of life (I Tim. 4:3-5; Heb. 13:4). The offering for the Jerusalem poor is described under terms of “blessing” (II Cor. 9:8) suggesting that the NT knows that we praise God, not in word only but by practical assistance to the needy (I John 3:1, 18; compare James 2:14-26).

R.M.

BLESSED. This term is most frequently found in both OT and NT with God as the implied object. “Blessed be God!” is a typical liturgical expression in the Psalter and in synagogue worship. Family worship in Judaism celebrates God as the giver of food and drink by the use of such formulas.

When applied to human beings, “blessed” refers to their state of happiness and well-being (Hebrew shalom) under divine favor, for example Psalm 1:1. BEATITUDE is the state of bliss enjoyed now in a Christian context and reaching out to the vision of God, which consummates that blessedness. Matthew 5:3-11 (parallel Luke 6:20-26) summarizes the qualities of such life in the kingdom of God, present and future.

R.M.

BLESSED VIRGIN MARY (BVM). MARY, THE MOTHER OF JESUS Christ, called the MOTHER OF GOD (Theotokos) by the ancient church. In Roman Catholic theology, the greatest of the saints. Mary, by virtue of her IMMACULATE CONCEPTION and her motherhood through the agency of the Holy Spirit, is elevated above all other human beings and is second only to her son, Jesus, in holiness. In the Catholic practice, Mary is specially venerated with a devotion greater than the honors paid to the saints, but less than the reverence given to the Holy Trinity alone.

By the Immaculate Conception, Catholic theology means Mary was "conceived without sin," as a preparation for her divine motherhood. This freedom from sin was not merited but was given as a special gift of God—an exception to the universal incidence of sin among humankind.

Catholic theology, following Augustine, declares that Mary, as the Blessed Virgin, lacked personal sin. Her perpetual virginity is understood as including the conception of Jesus without concupiscence and without the agency of a human male, the delivering of Jesus without damage to her physical virginity, and a lifelong preservation of her virginity. Because of these beliefs, the Fifth Council of Constantinople declared Mary to be perpetually virgin, following Augustine's phrase: "A virgin conceived, a virgin gave birth, a virgin remained."

Later theology held that Mary was infused by the Holy Spirit and filled with all the theological and moral virtues. These virtues give the Blessed Virgin the power to work miracles, such as healing. All such supernatural deeds are said to be in accord with the inspiration of the Holy Spirit.

The ancient church also believed that the Blessed Virgin, at death, was bodily assumed into heaven (the ASSUMPTION) on the order of the miracle attached to Elijah in the OT. After the Assumption, Mary participates in the vision of God—although she does not share the omniscience of the godhead. Her knowledge remains less than that possessed by the human nature of Christ.

Mary's role in Christian theology, both Protestant and Catholic, is an important one. Paul's declaration that Christ was "born of a woman" in Galatians, and the confession "born of the virgin Mary" in the ancient creeds stand as refutations of Gnostic speculation that Christ was pure spirit and was not a real human being at all. By his birth from Mary, Jesus is shown to be fully human as well as fully divine (the doctrine of two natures in one person). As Athanasius observes, "Whatever was not assumed (by Christ) was not redeemed," therefore it was necessary that the Christ be like all other humans are, yet without sin.

Since the efficacy of the atonement depends on the birth of Jesus from Mary, the Blessed Virgin has been highly venerated since the sub-Apostolic Age. Above all other considerations, Mary is revered as the Mother of the Redeemer. Although Jesus had no human father, his true humanity is established by Mary's humble acceptance of the divine commission at the visitation (Luke 2). Just as the analogy of Paul in Romans (5:12-21) states that the first Adam brought sin and death into the world (Gen. 3), so the second Adam (Christ) brought forgiveness and eternal life. Mary is sometimes called the new (or second) Eve. God's plan for the world was confounded by the Fall, instigated by Eve, and now Mary introduces the agent of redemption into the world in whom God's plan is restored and completed.

In the Catholic liturgical year, there are many feast days dedicated to Mary, including the Feast of the Annunciation, and the Purification of the Virgin.

J.C.

BLISS, PHILIP P. (1838–76). The well-known gospel songwriter was born on July 9 in Clearfield County, Pennsylvania. In 1864 he went to Chicago to work with musician and educator George F. Root. Originally a Methodist, about 1871 Bliss became choirmaster at First Congregational Church, Chicago, and superintendent of its Sunday school. In 1874 he joined Major D. W. Whittle in evangelistic work.

Inspired by news items, ministers' anecdotes, and overheard conversations, he composed a large number of hymns, both words and music. His Gospel Songs (1874) was a bestseller. Among his many familiar songs (known by titles or the first line of their choruses rather than the first line of the verse) are "Almost Persuaded," "Dare to Be a Daniel," "Hallelujah, He Is Risen," "Hallelujah, 'tis Done!" "Hallelujah, What a Savior," "I Know He Is Mine," "I Know Not the Hour," "I Will Sing of My Redeemer," "Jesus Loves Even Me," "Look and Live," "The Light of the World Is Jesus," "Once for All," "Whosoever Heareth," "Brightly Beams Our Father's Mercy," and "Sing Them Over Again to Me."

Bliss died in a tragic railroad accident on December 30 near Ashtabula, Ohio. On a monument erected to his memory in Rome, Pennsylvania, is the title of his most popular song during his lifetime, "Hold the Fort."

N.H.

BLOOD. The viewpoint of the OT writers on blood is essentially based on observation and experience. Hence a person's life-force (Hebrew nephesh) is seen to depend on the blood within the person's body (Lev. 17:11); and when the blood flows out onto the ground, one's life goes with it, and one dies (Gen. 4:10). The same is true for animals (Gen. 9:4; 37:31; etc.), and it is natural therefore to associate the taking or shedding of human blood with the crime of murder (Gen. 9:6; Hab. 2:12; Matt. 27:24; Luke 13:1). So far the witness of both the OT and the NT is clear, and at a surface level it might explain the phrase "blood of Christ" to mean simply his death, that is, when his life left him, as in John 19:34 where, however, a symbolic meaning is certainly intended by the evangelist.

The use of blood in a series of manipulative acts in the Levitical sacrificial system and the exposition of the cross of Jesus by using this sacrificial idiom further complicates the picture. Two theories are debated. On the one side, it is maintained that "blood" represents the release of the life-force of both animals and humans so that such an offering may be then presented to God as an act of dedicated service. Something similar to this line of reasoning lies behind the Epistle to the Hebrews, it is said, where Jesus offered his "blood" (that is, sacrificed life) in death, and thereafter that offering was found acceptable to God as part of Christ's high priestly ministry (see Heb. 9:11-28; 10:19 for a clearer view). This understanding is usually tied in with his Eucharistic sacrifice as an offering made both historically and representatively in his heavenly work, whose "sign" is seen at the Communion altar.

On the other side, it seems statistically more plausible to argue that "blood" (found 362 times in the OT, with the preponderance of references to do with violent death) is a metonymy not for the release and re-offering of life, but for the life itself laid down or taken away in death. In sacrificial cultus it speaks of the animals' role as bearing the sin of the people in atonement. This conclusion has important relevance for on the NT teaching regarding ATONEMENT wrought by the cross.

Atonement enters the theological lexicon of the church as a distinctively Anglo-Saxon loanword from the sixteenth century. In Shakespeare it describes reconciliation as two estranged parties who are brought together in amity and friendship with their hostility ended. The NT teaching has this situation in view as it describes how God and humankind are alienated by reason of human sin (see Rom. 5:1-11; KJV retains "atonement" in verse 11, where the Greek is "reconciliation," as in the RSV). God has taken effective steps to remedy this estrangement and has done so at great cost. Hence the text, usually set in a liturgical and cultic context, speaks of Christ's blood as the means by which sin is forgiven and the sinner is returned to harmony with the Creator and Redeemer (see representative illustrations in Mark 14:24 reverting to the scene of Exodus 24; Rom. 3:25; 5:9; Col. 1:20; Eph. 1:7; Acts 20:28; I Pet. 1:2; Rev. 5:9; I John 1:7). In all these cases, in spite of diverse backgrounds, what is the common thread seems apparent; the cost of human redemption is expressed by relating it to the violent and sacrificial death of Jesus as God's Son, whose self-offering made an end of sin as an estranging barrier between the holy God and sinful humanity. Thus he effected atonement (literally, at-one-ment, that is, he brought God and the world together in a cosmic, social, and personal reconciliation, as in Eph. 2:13-18, a hymnic celebration of this multifaceted act).

Elsewhere "blood" carries several other shades of meaning, of which we may single out for special mention those places where it refers to Christ's incarnation. He became human by taking our human nature and becoming one with us as a sharer in "flesh and blood" (Heb. 2:14).

R. M.

B'NAI B'RITH. Oldest and largest Jewish fraternal service organization. Founded in 1843 in New York as a purely fraternal organization that provided health insurance and sick benefits for its members, B'nai B'rith today is international. B'nai B'rith means "sons of the Covenant." It has established orphans' homes, homes for the aged, and hospitals. Under its wing are the ANTI-DEFAMATION LEAGUE, which fights ANTI-SEMITISM and promotes better relations between Jews and non-Jews; Hillel Foundations, which conduct cultural, religious, and social programs for Jewish college students at major universities; B'nai B'rith Youth Organization (incorporating Aleph Zadik Aleph and B'nai B'rith Girls) for Jewish teen-agers; B'nai B'rith Women; and Career and Counseling Services. B'nai B'rith programs include communal service, social action, and public affairs with emphasis on preserving Judaism through projects in and for Israel, for Soviet Jewry, and adult Jewish education.

L. K.

BOANERGES. According to Mark 3:17, which is the only NT text to report this name, the title was given as a surname to two of the disciples of Jesus, James and John. Its meaning is unclear, but it seems to be derived from a Hebrew expression meaning "sons of thunder" (bene reghesh). The designation is thought to betoken the violent nature of the disciples, for which there is some evidence (Luke 9:54-56).

R. M.

BOAZ (meaning "strength" or "might").

(1) The prosperous and righteous Bethlehem farmer, kinsman of Elimelek and Naomi, who married RUTH, the Moabitess, a widowed daughter-in-law of Naomi (Ruth 2:1; 4:13). He became the great-grandfather of David (Ruth 4:22; I Chr. 2:12-15) and an ancestor of Jesus (Matt. 1:5; Luke 3:32.) The book of Ruth emphasizes Boaz's sense of family responsibilities, his resourcefulness and care in obeying laws and customs, and his generosity to his workers, especially to gleaners and to a non-Israelite proselyte.

(2) The term is used of one of the twin, free-standing columns that stood on either side of the doorway to Solomon's Temple. R. B. Y. Scott suggests that the name Boaz, like JACHIN, may have had a dynastic reference as "In thy strength the king rejoices" (Ps. 21:1), and "Strength and beauty [Jachin] are in his sanctuary" (Ps. 96:6b).

P. L. G.

BODE, JOHN ERNEST (1816–74). Author of "O Jesus, I Have Promised," Bode was educated at Eton, Charterhouse, and Christ Church College, Oxford, obtaining his B.A. in 1837 and an M.A. in 1840. From 1841 to 1847 he was a tutor in the college. Ordained deacon in 1841 and priest in 1843, he held several parish posts. His Hymns from the Gospel of the Day (1860) also included "God of Heaven, Enthroned in Light" and "Spirit of Truth, Indwelling Light."
N.H.

BODHI. "Enlightenment," the perfect clarity of mind achieved by Gautama BUDDHA through meditation. In this meditation he first remembered each of his past lives. Then he grasped the meaning of SAMSARA, the cycle of birth and death. Finally he perceived the FOUR NOBLE TRUTHS.

When he became enlightened, Gautama was sitting under a bo tree, or bodhi tree, the figus religiosa. Like the Banyan tree, it branches indefinitely and has thick prop roots that support the branches. (See BUDDHISM.)

K.C.

BODHISATTVA. A being who sets out on the quest for enlightenment (BODHI). In early BUDDHISM the term is used of earlier Buddhas before their enlightenment and also of the Buddha who is yet to come, Maitreya (see below). Gautama Buddha had been a bodhisattva in earlier lifetimes. In Mahayana the bodhisattva is so close to full enlightenment as to be able to enter NIRVANA but stays behind to help others on their quest.

Three Ways of Buddhahood. There have been three traditional ways of achieving Buddhahood: the bodhisattva, the pratyeka Buddha, and the arhant. The pratyeka Buddha attained enlightenment on their own without forming a group of followers. The arhants, beginning with the disciples of Gautama himself, achieved salvation through following the career of a disciple. In Mahayana the arhants (known in Chinese as lohans) were regarded as selfish because they sought only their own salvation and not that of others. Far Eastern art portrays them as strange figures, even grotesque, and sometimes comic. The LOTUS SUTRA is probably the most influential Buddhist scripture in the Far East. It says that there is only one real way of salvation, that of the bodhisattva.

Becoming a Bodhisattva. The person who sets out to become a bodhisattva must show the proper disposition—a desire for enlightenment without a desire for gain for oneself. There is a traditional bodhisattva vow that shows the sense of compassion of a true seeker: (a) Living beings are countless, and I vow to save them all. (b) Passions cannot be extinguished, but I vow to extinguish them. (c) The truths of the faith (DHARMA) cannot be measured, but I vow to master them all. (d) The way of Buddhahood cannot be excelled, and I vow to attain it. This vow can be made in the presence of someone believed to be a "living Buddha," or in the presence of another person who has taken the vow. It can also be made in the awareness of the presence of all Buddhas and bodhisattvas.

Much has been written in detail about the career of a bodhisattva. One must go through various stages and show personal discipline in a way that agrees with the ideal.

The Great Bodhisattvas. For art and popular piety there are a number of important and widely known bodhisattvas. AVALOKITESVARA (known in Chinese as Kwan Yin) is sometimes called the Goddess of Mercy, and is generally, though not always, pictured as female.

Maitreya has been known from the time of earliest Buddhism. Having successfully completed many previous lives, he now waits in the Tushita heaven, an intermediate realm. When the end is near, he will be born on earth as a sort of Messianic figure. He is important in Theravada (Buddhism), but in Mahayana other figures have become more popular.

MANJUSRI is the bodhisattva who personifies wisdom. Pictures and statues show him holding a book of wisdom in one hand, and in the other a sword with which he slays ignorance. According to one tradition the name of Manchuria is derived from his name.

KSHITIGARBA is known as one who has vowed to save all beings living between the time of the Buddha and the coming of Maitreya. This led to the belief that he has power over the Buddhist hells. In Japan he is especially popular and is known as Jizo, the Japanese translation of his name. He is usually portrayed as a monk, holding in his right hand a staff with six rings. The rings are symbols of the six realms into which a being can be reborn (the realm of the gods, of humans, of hungry ghosts, of animals, of demons, and of hell). In addition to helping the dead, he is a guide to the living and protects travelers.

In MANDALAS, diagrams of the way to enlightenment, a specific bodhisattva is usually paired with a Buddha. For example, Avalokitesvara and Amita Buddha are usually thought of together and worshipped together.

K.C.

BODY. Basically a noun denoting physical objects that can be seen and touched, though it can be used in a metaphorical capacity to represent crucial theological concepts.

Body in the Old Testament. Since the ancient Hebrews usually referred to individual parts of the body, their need for a noun denoting the body in its entirety was slight. The nearest comprehensive term is bāsar ("FLESH"). Accordingly, the visible part of the body is at issue in legislation on the consecration of Levites requiring that a razor go over "all their body" (Num. 8:7) and on the diagnosis of leprosy, which distinguishes between the skin and hair of the body (Lev. 13:2-4). When the psalmist states, "My bones cleave to my flesh" (Ps. 102:5), he is complaining that he has disintegrated into "skin and bone." The entire body is of concern in Proverbs 4:20-22, with its portrayal of wisdom as a person's medication that induces "healing to all his flesh." The disclosure in Psalm 119:120, "My flesh trembles for fear of thee," demonstrates the Hebrew affirmation of human existence in the body. Clearly, bodily and psychic life are perceived in organic oneness.

Body in the Gospels. Although the Greek noun sarx ("flesh") is often used in the NT in ways resembling the Hebrew word bāsar, as a metaphor it acquired theological meaning. This is likewise the case with sōma, the NT Greek noun for "body." When Jesus broke bread and distributed it to his disciples at that eschatological farewell meal known as the Last Supper, he said, ". . . this is my body" (Matt. 26:26; Mark 14:22; Luke 22:19). This image deftly denotes Jesus' sacrificial giving of himself for his disciples. He was declaring, "This bread represents me." As Jesus' followers henceforth ate bread together, they would remain in fellowship with him.

Body in Paul's Letters. Paul's mention of "body" (sōma) is imaginatively diverse. At the same time he speaks of the body as being sinful and redeemed. If it is a sinful "body of death" (Rom. 7:24), it is likewise redeemed in Christ (6:11), especially through baptism (Gal. 3:27), enabling the believer's body and Christ's to experience spatial union. Paul affirms the body's immortality. Against his opponents, Paul insists that Christ's bodily resurrection ensures the bodily resurrection of believers united to him through baptism into everlasting heavenly fellowship (I Cor. 15:42-54). Here the "lowly" human body will be spiritually transformed into Christ's "glorious body" (Phil. 3:21). Moreover, Paul perceives the Christian community (the church) as the multi-membered body of Christ (Rom. 12:5), with Christ exercising sovereignty as its head (Col. 1:18).

J. K. K.

BODY OF CHRIST. The starting point for NT thought concerning the body of Christ is the INCARNATION—whether John's "the Word became flesh" (1:14), the Synoptics' birth narratives (Matt. 1:18-25; Luke 2:1-20), or Paul's "(He) being born in the likeness of men" (Phil. 2:7). The physical body of Christ was important to the early church. "Every spirit which confesses that Jesus Christ has come in the flesh is of God" (I John 4:2). The physical body of the incarnate Jesus had every characteristic of human, physical bodies, for example, it was subject to birth and death, and could act, be acted upon, be anointed (Matt. 26:12; Mark 14:8), and be laid in a tomb (Luke 23:53; 24:3; John 19:38, 40; 20:11-12).

What was done in salvation through the crucified body of Christ made the body a symbol of Christ's atoning work: "We have been sanctified through the offering of the body of Jesus Christ once for all" (Heb. 10:10), "you have died to the law through the body of Christ" (Rom. 7:4), "he himself bore our sins in his body on the tree, . . ." (I Pet. 2:24).

Compare the familiar Eucharistic language in the Pauline account (I Cor. 11:23-25) with the Gospel records (Matt. 26:26-29; Mark 14:22-25; Luke 22:17-19; John 13:21-30). Jesus identified the Passover bread as "my body," broken for the benefit of his followers, and to be eaten by them as a body together.

Paul told members of the Corinthian church, taken as a whole, "Now you are the body of Christ" (I Cor. 12:27). This semimystical concept appears exclusively in the writings of Paul and constitutes a major theme in his thought (Rom. 12:4, 5; I Cor. 6:15, 19; 10:16, 17; 12:13, 27; Eph. 1:23; 2:16; 4:12, 16; 5:23, 30; Col. 1:18, 29; 2:19; 3:15).

There is no exact OT parallel to this idea, yet it may be reflected in Israel's self-awareness as God's "chosen" people, tribe, or family: "Once you were no people but now you are God's people; . . ." (I Pet. 2:10). "There is one body and one Spirit" (Eph. 4:4). "Christ is head of the church" (Eph. 5:23), who enlivens the Christian community as its Spirit.

The resurrected and ascended body of Christ is referred to in Philippians 3:21 as having been made "glorious" by God the Father.

P. L. G.

BOEHME, JAKOB (1575–1624). Protestant, Lutheran mystic, and one of Germany's greatest thinkers. Born near Görlitz, he received little education but studied Scripture. A vision of future greatness brought loss of his cobbler's apprenticeship, and he wandered for a year, greatly disturbed by quarrelsome Protestant sects. In 1599 he married and lived quietly in Görlitz. After two visions revealing the harmony of everything, he hurriedly wrote Aurora, or Morning Redness (1612). It was printed without his consent, and he was forbidden to write further. But by 1619 he was writing again, eventually producing thirty-one books.

His works combine mystical insight into reality with traditional Christian beliefs and practices: primordial Being (God) undergirds all being, embraces all opposites, and is the source of all energy; existing things are signatures of God—the divine will and love manifested. Boehme felt that all would be harmonious except that single elements attempt to be God, thus introducing sin, disharmony, and evil. In Christ, God restores and regenerates all things to their proper harmony. His best works include The Signature of All Things, 1621, and Mysterium Magnum, or An Exposition of Genesis, 1623. Boehme's followers in England are called Behmenists. His influence extends to Schelling, Hegel, Schopenhauer, and Tillich.

C. M.

BOETHIUS. One of the greatest scholars and philosophers of the early Middle Ages, whose works were widely used until modern times. He lived in Italy, and under the Ostrogothic King Theodoric he held a high civil post. But Theodoric and the Ostrogoths were followers of ARIANISM and therefore suspected that the population over which they ruled, which held to the doctrines of Nicea, would conspire with the Byzantines against them. For these reasons Boethius, who was orthodox and part of the earlier Italian population, came under suspicion, and Theodoric had him arrested. In prison, he wrote his most famous work, Consolation of Philosophy, in which he spoke of the soul's ascent to the vision of God. Although Boethius was a Christian and had written several works on theology, this particular treatise is mostly philosophical. He was executed, by order of Theodoric, about the year 524, and was soon regarded as a martyr.

J.G.

BOHEMIAN BRETHREN. See MORAVIANS.

BOISEN, ANTON (1876–1965). A pioneer in CLINICAL PASTORAL EDUCATION. He graduated from the University of Indiana, completed studies at Union Theological Seminary (NY) in 1908, and was pastor at several small churches. Months spent at the Boston Psychiatric Hospital after a personal breakdown brought a realization of the need for a ministry to people in mental hospitals. He then became chaplain at Worcester State Hospital. In 1930 he founded the Council for the Clinical Training of Theological Students. He also established a training center at Elgin State Hospital (IL) in 1932 and taught at Chicago Theological Seminary from 1937 until retirement in 1942.

I.C.

BONAR, HORATIUS (1808–89). The noted author of poems, hymns, and devotional books was born on December 19 in Edinburgh, Scotland, heir to a long line of Church of Scotland clergy. Educated at the University of Edinburgh, he was ordained in 1837 as minister of North Parish Church in Kelso.

He left during the "Disruption" of 1843 but remained a minister of the Free Church of Scotland, serving in 1883 as its moderator. From 1866 to the end of his life he was pastor of Chalmers Memorial Church in Edinburgh. He died July 31, 1889.

Bonar's hymns include "Blessing and Honor and Glory and Power," "Fill Thou My Life," "Go, Labor on; Spend, and Be Spent," "Here, O My Lord, I See Thee Face to Face," "I Heard the Voice of Jesus Say," "Not What I Am, O Lord," "O Love That Casts Out Fear," and "This Is the Hour of Banquet and of Song." He also translated many from Greek and Latin. His series of three Hymns of Faith and Hope (1857–66) were popular. His prose works include God's Way of Holiness, Prophetic Landmarks, and several missionary biographies.

N.H.

BONAVENTURE (1221–74). The most important figure in the history of the Franciscans after the death of FRANCIS OF ASSISI, both for his administrative leadership and for his theological work. A Franciscan from an early age, he studied at Paris under Alexander of Hales and in 1248 began teaching at the university. He was one of the main targets of those in the university who opposed the MENDICANT FRIARS and in response wrote in defense of poverty. On the question of the proper place of Aristotle in theology, he accepted some Aristotelian tenets but remained basically a believer in the philosophy of AUGUSTINE, thus differing from both Thomas Aquinas and the Latin Averroists. In 1257 he was elected Minister General of the Franciscans. As such he took firm action against the Spirituals and against the views of Joachim of Fiore. He was made a cardinal in 1273 and died a year later. In later times, his mysticism, as seen in his Itinerarium Mentis in Deum, would be more influential than his systematic theology.

J.G.

Dietrich Bonhoeffer

BONHOEFFER, DIETRICH (1906–45). German theologian and Christian martyr. The writings he produced while in a Nazi concentration camp introduced to a wide public the concept of a nonreligious form of Christianity. Bonhoeffer was born in Breslau, Germany, into a culturally upper-class, but religiously indifferent, Lutheran family. His father was a prominent psychiatrist and professor at the University of Berlin. Bonhoeffer began his study of theology at Tübingen (1923) but settled in at the University of Berlin the following year. In 1927 he defended his dissertation on "The Communion of Saints: A Dogmatic Inquiry into the Sociology of the Church." The following year Bonhoeffer served as an assistant pastor of a German-speaking church in Barcelona. Upon his return to Berlin he became an assistant to a professor of theology and in 1930 defended a thesis entitled "Act and Being," which qualified him for university teaching. A year's leave was spent at Union Theological Seminary in New York. The experiences in Spain and in New York gave Bonhoeffer valuable perspective on the German church and nation as well as on his own rather privileged bourgeois life.

In August 1931, Bonhoeffer began teaching in the theological faculty at Berlin, and the same year he accepted the ecumenical post of Youth Secretary for the World Alliance for Promoting International Friendship Through the Churches. In November 1931, he was ordained. As Bonhoeffer was beginning to immerse himself in his professorial duties, Germany was turning from the Weimar Republic to the totalitarianism of national socialism. In 1933, the year Hitler became chancellor of the Third Reich, Bonhoeffer joined with Martin Niemöller in the Pastor's Emergency League, which sought to resist Nazi influence over the German churches. In July 1933, Bonhoeffer accepted a call to be pastor of a German parish in London where he remained until April 1935. He used this opportunity to make known to ecumenical gatherings the Nazi heresy of the "German Christians" and the opposition of the newly formed Confessing Church. On his return to Germany, Bonhoeffer took charge of a seminary of the Confessing Church at Finkenwalde. It was closed by the Gestapo in October 1937, a month before Bonhoeffer published his most widely read book, The Cost of Discipleship.

By early 1939 Bonhoeffer was in close contact with leaders of the Resistance movement. On April 5, 1943, he was arrested by the Gestapo and sent to Tegel prison. After the attempt on Hitler's life in July 1944, the Gestapo discovered the extent of Bonhoeffer's activity as a counteragent for the Resistance. He was sent to the concentration camp at Buchenwald in February 1945, and then to the camp at Flossenbürg, where he was hanged on April 9 on special orders from Himmler.

There are many accounts of his courage, serenity, and helpfulness during his imprisonment. It was during this time that he wrote the letters that made up the posthumous Letters and Papers from Prison (1953; 1977), in which he calls for a "religionless Christianity." Bonhoeffer believed that the world had "come of age" and that the time of "religion" was over. By religion Bonhoeffer meant a purely inward, individualistic piety, which abandons the world or a special province of life, such as churchgoing. Religion conceives of God as a deus ex machina, brought in only when our human powers give out or to provide solutions to our problems. Bonhoeffer, on the contrary, speaks of God as a this-worldly transcendence, discovered in concrete living for others—hence in the life of the Crucified. The only difference between Christians and nonbelievers is that Christians combine a true worldliness with a secret spiritual discipline by means of which they participate in the sufferings of God at the hands of a godless world. The church's task is, then, "to exist for others." Discipleship is always modest but costly and must be kept worldly to avoid all forms of religious escapism. Critics, such as K. Barth, find Bonhoeffer's fragmentary ideas only mystifying. Others believe that these revolutionary thoughts point to Christianity's authentic message for this modern, secular age.

J.L.

BONIFACE VIII, POPE. Pope from 1294 to 1303. His reign was marked by high claims of authority over secular rulers. But these claims coincided with the decline of the PAPACY, which would eventually lead to its control by France and its move to AVIGNON. Celestine V, whom Boniface succeeded, was a Franciscan of great humility, and therefore Boniface's haughtiness was all the more noticeable. Soon after his election, stories began circulating that he had forced Celestine to abdicate and that his election had been irregular. In spite of this, he enjoyed great prestige during the early years of his reign.

His bull Clericis laicos of 1296 barred ecclesiastics from paying taxes to the state and was resented and resisted by several sovereigns. But through it and other means he managed to force peace between Edward I of England and Philip IV, "the Fair," of France. Scotland became a fief of the popes. The "jubilee" of 1300 brought pilgrims, wealth, and prestige to Rome. The bull Unam Sanctam of 1302 declared that the Pope could stand in judgment over secular sovereigns, but that only God could judge the pope. In 1303, however, agents of Philip IV, whom Boniface threatened with excommunication, captured the pope at Anagni, struck him, and humiliated him publicly, while the populace sacked his palace and the palaces of his relatives. Although freed by his supporters, Boniface never recovered and died shortly thereafter. This marked the beginning of French hegemony over the papacy.

J.G.

BOOK AND FORMULA OF CONCORD. The Book of Concord is the chief confessional symbol of the Lutheran Church throughout the world, made up of about seventy million Christians. The Formula of Concord (written in 1577, thirty-one years after LUTHER's death), ended the various disputes among theologians over the correct understanding of Luther's teaching. The Book of Concord, made up of six confessional books—the unaltered AUGSBURG CONFESSION, the Apology for the Augsburg Confession, the Smaldkald Articles, Luther's Small Catechism and Luther's Large Catechism, and the Formula of Concord (with the three ecumenical creeds)—was published on the fiftieth anniversary of the Augsburg Confession (1580).

The Book of Concord ensured the doctrinal loyalty and unity of the various state Lutheran churches and brought peace ("concord") in the theological dimension of German Protestant life. The acceptance of the Book of Concord enabled the Lutheran churches to maintain their independence from Calvinism and actually expressed the consensus on doctrine that existed among followers of Luther at that time. It also marked the political system (or polity) of Lutheranism for centuries to come. The various state or territorial churches were dominated by princes and ultimately by the Prussian kaiser, until recent times.

The central teachings of the Book of Concord include justification by faith in Jesus Christ, Luther's distinction between law and gospel, emphasis on Scripture as authoritative in the church, and on the real presence of Christ in Holy Communion. These basic tenets of the REFORMATION were interpreted differently by other Protestants or were disputed by the Catholics.

J.C.

BOOK OF COMMON PRAYER. The authorized liturgical service book of the Church of England used also by all churches in the worldwide ANGLICAN communion. The Book of Common Prayer has had a long history of revision, since it, rather than theological confessions, forms the essential core of the unity of Anglicanism. It contains the morning and evening prayers, Holy Communion services, the Psalms, and rituals for the administration of the sacraments and other prayers. It also contains the ORDINAL for conferring holy orders. Family prayers and the Thirty-Nine Articles of religion, along with various special orders, are found in appendices.

THOMAS CRANMER, the great English reformer, derived the materials for the Book of Common Prayer from the earlier Roman BREVIARY and MISSAL books. Changing emphases in doctrine, as the Reformation advanced or waned in England, caused the several revisions of the book. The 1549 version of Edward VI removed the concept of the Mass as a sacrifice. The 1552 version moved the church closer to the Reformed tradition of the Continent by removing reference to the real presence of Christ in the Eucharist, rejecting TRANSUBSTANTIATION. Suppressed by Queen Mary in 1553, the book was restored by Elizabeth I in 1559. Only the British Parliament can decree a modification or change in the Book of Common Prayer in the Church of England, as Anglicanism is the state church of England, with the queen as its temporal head.

There are modern revisions of the book, most notably in the Episcopal Church in the United States. This move toward contemporary English usage (and away from the Elizabethan language shared by the Book of Common Prayer and the Authorized Version or King James Bible) has stirred up much controversy in Episcopal circles and even led to the withdrawal of some bishops, priests, and congregations from the denomination. These contemporary struggles over the venerated prayer book are only recent outcroppings of tensions and dissension that have marked the book's history since 1549. When the act of uniformity and mandatory use of the Book of Common Prayer was enforced by Elizabeth I and her successors, the Puritans (later Presbyterians, Congregationalists, and sectarians) rebelled against the "Catholic" nature of the prayer book's rituals. The Parliament of Westminster abolished use of the prayer book (and the order of bishop) in 1645. However, at the restoration of the monarchy in 1662, Charles II also reinstated the Book of Common Prayer.

The prayer book was revised and the new form proposed to Parliament in 1928, but Parliament rejected the revision in 1929. Other Anglican churches, such as those in the United States and Canada, nevertheless adopted revised versions. The current, new revision of the Book of Common Prayer, used in the Episcopal Church in the United States, is a further modernization of the revised prayer book of 1928. The newest edition shares much with the contemporary Roman Catholic missal in English and the Lutheran Book of Worship developed in the United States and Canada.

J.C.

BOOK OF MORMON. A book published by JOSEPH SMITH, founder of the CHURCH OF JESUS CHRIST OF LATTER-DAY SAINTS (LDS), or Mormons, in 1830, and accepted as divinely inspired by that group. The origin of the book is surrounded by controversy, and several theories disputing Smith's authorship are now current. In 1823, Smith claimed a vision of the angel Moroni (hence the name "Mormon") appeared to him and showed him where some golden plates were buried on a hill he called Mount Cumorah, near Palmyra, New York. Moroni said he buried the plates there about one thousand years earlier, at the close of a disastrous war between groups descended from the ten lost tribes of Israel. A set of spectacles, called Urim and Thummim, were discovered with the plates, and by wearing these, Smith was able to translate the "Reformed Egyptian" characters on the plates. Smith proceeded to do this translation, dictating to a secretary, while he sat behind a screen. The book purports to be a history of peoples who inhabited ancient America from 600 B.C. to A.D. 400. Moroni declared that the ascended Jesus appeared to one of these people, the Nephites, and founded his church in the new world. Smith established the Latter-day Saints as a restoration of the church Jesus established, according to Moroni's history.

Along with other writings of Joseph Smith, the Book of Mormon is looked upon as sacred scripture by the Latter-day Saints. Critics believe that anachronisms in the text show that it could not be from the fifth century A.D. They also point out that there is no archaeological or historical support for the belief that ancient Israelites came to the New World. Certain scholars believe Smith may have used a fictional biblical novel circulating in the early nineteenth century as the basis for his text. J.C.

BOOK OF THE DEAD. A text in Tibetan BUDDHISM and Egyptian religion that is concerned with the time between a person's death and the time the person enters another incarnation. This intermediate state is known in Tibetan Buddhism as the bardo state, and the Book of the Dead is known as the Bardo Thodol ("liberation by hearing while in the bardo state"). The book instructs those who attend the dying person about the bardo state and the ways for seeking liberation from the cycle of birth and death.

The Book of the Dead is used in rituals at the time of death and for as long as forty-nine days after death. A monk sits near the head of the dying person and reads the instructions for obtaining liberation. The corpse is usually present for the first four days, and after that the book is read before a picture or an effigy of the dead person.

Courtesy of the Oriental Institute, University of Chicago

Egyptian papyrus of the Book of the Dead, showing the weighing of the heart of the deceased

The forty-nine days are divided into three parts. The first lasts up to four days, and the dead person, if assisted properly, may obtain immediate liberation. Only a few are so fortunate.

The next period lasts fourteen days. During this time the person meets the peaceful deities and the wrathful deities. These are not beings on a higher plane, but are projections of the forces of KARMA that bind the person. If one recognizes that they are projections, it is possible to give up all desire and fear.

In the third stage the chance for liberation is slight. The person has visions of the six realms of rebirth and is drawn into a womb to start life over again. CARL G. JUNG and others have interpreted this book psychologically. They say that it identifies what it is that we fear—the self when it confronts itself, and that the book provides a way of overcoming this fear. In Tibet, however, its main use has been as a ritual text.

K.C.

BOOTH, WILLIAM AND CATHERINE. See SALVATION ARMY.

BOOTHS, FEAST OF. See SUKKOTH.

BORN AGAIN. A popular phrase for the experience of CONVERSION, of a turning away from SIN and a drawing closer to God through Christ. The phrase is based on Jesus' word to Nicodemus that he must be "born again" or (in the Greek) "born from above" (John 3). The notion of rebirth, of a dying to one's old life and the beginning of a new life, is common to all religion, from shamanism and the ancient Greek and Middle Eastern mysteries to modern "Televangelism." In ancient religions (and in surviving forms of shamanism), rebirth is accomplished through ordeals, trials, tests, journeys, and quests, but especially through visions and dreams. Perhaps it is not surprising, then, that contemporary emphases on being "born again" are generally emotional, and the experience is usually one that occurs in large crowds stirred by music and long sieges of prayer and preaching. Interestingly, in John, Jesus connects the "birth from above" with the action of the Holy Spirit, which brings the experience about at his own good pleasure ("the wind blows where it will"), thus making a premeditated attempt to induce the new birth unnecessary. In traditional churches, the new birth is associated with baptism, either of the infant or the adult.

J.C.

BORNKAMM, GÜNTHER (1905– ). A living NT scholar whose literary output and influence continue to the present. His early interest was in Gnosticism, which led to his academic career under Julius Schniewind at Königsberg. Prior to World War II, he was identified with the theological school at Bethel until it was closed by the Nazis in 1939. He served as a pastor at Münster and Dortmund until 1943, when he became a soldier in the German army. At the cessation of hostilities he taught at Göttingen, and since 1949 he has been linked with the University of Heidelberg, West Germany.

Bornkamm's claim to attention, on the theological scene, came with the publication of an essay on "End-Expectation and Church in Matthew," which is credited with signaling the advent of redaction criticism as a NT method of interpretation. The method, which sees the Gospel writers not simply as handers-on of the tradition to do with Jesus' ministry but the first theological commentators on that tradition, found expression in his well-known book, Tradition and Interpretation in Matthew (Eng. trans. 1963), in which he was joined by his pupils, G. Barth and H. J. Held. His most popular book, however, was Jesus of Nazareth, 1956 (Eng. trans. 1960), which had an unprecedented sale for a religious publication in Germany. This title marks a new phase in the "quest of the historical Jesus," and Bornkamm was more positive in his evaluation of the historical data of the Synoptic Gospels than Bultmann, his teacher, had been. Other books, on Paul (1971) and Early Christian Experience (1970) have followed, serving to establish his reputation as a lucid thinker and writer.

R.M.

BOSSUET, JACQUES (1627–1704). French bishop of Meaux and one of the great pulpit orators in the history of the church. He was prepared for ordination (1652) by St. Vincent de Paul (1576–1660), whose influence was decisive. Bossuet's oratorical gifts, intellectual acuteness, and moral power were recognized early. He was a frequent preacher before the French court and was tutor to the Dauphin for eleven years. During this time he published some of his most important books, including the Discourse on Universal History. Many of his publications were directed against Protestantism, including History of the Variations in the Protestant Churches.

Bossuet's piety and moral fervor attracted him to JANSENISM. In his late years he became a bitter opponent of Madame Guyon and QUIETISM. A leader of moderate GALLICANISM, he authored the famous Gallican Articles of 1682, which were rejected by Pope Innocent IX. Bossuet's Meditations on the Gospel is a devotional classic, as are his Funeral Orations classics of pulpit oratory. Bossuet was truly the voice of France in the age of Louis XIV.

J.L.

BOWELS. Both in Hebrew and Greek the words refer to the intestines, thought of as the seat of the human emotions, whether of compassion or affection (Jer. 31:20; Phil. 1:8; Col. 3:12; 1 John 3:17; all from the KJV) or more generally of a deeply felt emotional response (Ps. 22:14; Jer. 4:19; both KJV). It is a description that can be used also of God's attitude of mercy to creatures (Isa. 63:15 KJV) as well as of a human feeling. The Revised Standard Version usually renders by "heart," interpreting the psychosomatic term by this more elegant translation. One reference is to be understood literally, namely to the manner of Judas' demise (Acts 1:18, where RSV retains "bowels").

R.M.

BOWRING, SIR JOHN (1792–1872). Author of "In the Cross of Christ I Glory," "Watchman, Tell Us of the Night," and "God Is Love; His Mercy Brightens," Bowring was born in Exeter, England, on October 17. In 1825 he became editor of the Westminster Review. He served two terms in Parliament (1835–37, 1841–49) and was noted for his efforts to repeal the Corn Laws, reform the penal system, and abolish flogging in the army.

His diplomatic career began in 1849 when he became British consul to Canton, serving as superintendent of all trade to China and as plenipotentiary from 1853 to 1857. In 1854 he also became governor of Hong Kong. In 1855 he visited Siam to negotiate a commercial treaty, and in 1861 he was sent as a commissioner to Italy. He was knighted for his work in 1854.

A brilliant linguist, he wrote books on the poets of Russia, Spain, Holland, Poland, Bohemia, and Hungary. A Unitarian, he was also friend and literary executor of Jeremy Bentham, publishing his eleven-volume Life and Works (1838–43). His own two-volume Autobiographical Recollections were published posthumously by his son in 1877.

N.H.

BRADBURY, WILLIAM B. (1816–68). Sometimes called the father of popular Sunday school music, Bradbury was born on October 6 in York, Maine, to David and Sophia Chase Bradbury, both skilled musicians. At seventeen he went to Boston to study with Sumner Hill and Lowell Mason. In 1841 he became organist at First Baptist Church, New York City. Following Mason's practice of free singing classes, he conducted festivals with as many as a thousand children participating. He encouraged the introduction of music into the public schools. Altogether he published fifty books for young church choirs and a number of popular cantatas. In 1854 he helped found the Bradbury Piano Company, which eventually merged with Knabe Piano Company.

Bradbury is best known for his tunes to such favorite gospel songs as "Just As I Am," "Savior, Like a Shepherd Lead Us," "He Leadeth Me, O Blessed Thought," "My Hope Is Built," "Sweet Hour of Prayer," and "'Tis Midnight; and on Olive's Brow."

N.H.

BRAHMA. From a Sanskrit root meaning "to swell, grow." A Hindu god regarded as creator, and also as the source of wisdom, guardian of the VEDAS, and special patron of the priestly BRAHMIN caste, Brahma first comes into prominence in the Vedic scriptures called the BRAHMANAS. He was thus closely connected with the sacrifice, and indeed in one place in those scriptures is said to have been born of the priestly sacrifice, and then "though mortal, he created the immortals." He is elsewhere said to arise first in each new cycle of the universe, and then to create the gods and the three worlds (heavens, middle, and lower). Each cycle is a kalpa or day of Brahma, though 4,320 million years to us. At the end of that "day" the god sleeps, and the universe reverts to darkness and chaos, to be created anew when he awakes.

In the later mythology of the PURANAS, Brahma is associated with VISHNU. Here, we are told, that deity reclines between universes, and when it is time for a new one to come into being, a lotus grows from his navel, and Brahma appears—self-created, though drawing power from Vishnu—in its heart, and sets about the job of creation.

Brahma dwells in the highest heaven, and his consort is Sarasvati, the popular goddess of culture and learning. He is portrayed with four (or five) heads, seated on a lotus or riding a goose or swan. But though formally a member of the Hindu Trimurti or "trinity" of Brahma, Visnu, and SHIVA, he has enjoyed few shrines and little devotional worship since the rise of BHAKTI, unlike the other two gods. In Vedantic thought Brahma has been regarded as a personification of BRAHMAN, the impersonal Absolute. R.E.

BRAHMAN. From a Sanskrit root meaning "to swell, grow." A neuter form of the same expression is found in BRAHMA, the creator god of HINDUISM, and BRAHMIN, the Hindu priestly caste. Brahman meant (1) in Vedic times, the holy power generated by sacrifice, and (2) in the UPANISHADS and VEDANTA philosophy, the universal Spirit, ultimate Reality, or Absolute.

In the earlier Vedas, Brahman is a life-force, ill-defined but of great potency, which exists throughout nature but is especially invoked or created by the sacrifices of the Brahmin priests. It is said to have been produced by Prajapati, the creator, just after he made sacrifice. It is the force that gives the gods immortality and enables them to defeat demons. It is the sacred words of the ritual and the magical spell they spread to sustain the universe or accomplish the ends for which the sacrifice is done. It also has, like MANA, the quality of making objects and places taboo and should not be approached by the unprepared.

Later, the observation becomes more and more pronounced, that Brahman is greater than the gods, giving them their power, and underlies the universe itself. In the Upanishads, Brahman becomes the One, the sole Reality, of which all seemingly separate entities are but manifestations, like one flame taking many different shapes. Brahman emanated the world like a spider producing its web out of itself. He (or better, it) permeates that world like the invisible but all-pervasive salt in salt water. Finally, the great message of the Upanishads is "Thou art That," as the Chandogya Upanishad has it. The ATMAN, the inner life or "soul" of every human being, is none other than Brahman, the universal life and soul. By turning through meditation away from outer things, from desires and superficial feelings, one can know the Atman, and know it as Brahman, the Infinite. In the Chandogya we again read, "Only in the Infinite is there joy." Brahman is not known through reason or learning, for it is not an object of thought but the ground of consciousness. The Upanishads tell us that knowledge of Brahman comes through spiritual realization resulting from renunciation and meditation, under the guidance of a teacher who has attained that knowledge. R.E.

BRAHMANAS. A portion of the Vedic scriptures of HINDUISM, the Brahmanas were produced approximately 900-700 B.C., and consist of prose commentaries on the earlier RIG VEDA and other of the largely poetic Samhita, or first stratum of Vedic literature. Focusing on the sacrifice, the Brahmanas offer detailed directions for their performance, but also present valuable speculative and mythological material. Emphasis is placed on the sacrifice in all its various implements and ritual gestures as having correspondence with the aspects of the cosmos. The rite is thus a "miniaturization" of the universe by which it can be regulated and controlled. The priest is the powerful "knower" at the center of both worlds, the large and the small. The Brahmanas represent a stage in development from the "primal naïveté" of the Rig Veda to the philosophical "interiorization" of sacrifice, and BRAHMAN or divine power and presence, of the Upanishads. R.E.

BRAHMANISM. See VEDIC RELIGION.

BRAHMIN. Conventional anglicized spelling of the Sanskrit Brahmana and Brabman referring to the priestly caste of HINDUISM. Of ancient Indo-European background, the Brahmins have traditionally been the custodians of Hinduism's most sacred learning, especially the VEDAS, and the officiants of its oldest and holiest rites, particularly the Vedic fire sacrifices and other rituals involving recitation of Vedic texts. R.E.

BRAZEN SERPENT. See BRONZE SERPENT.

BREAD OF THE PRESENCE. See SHOWBREAD.

BREVIARY. The service book of the Roman Catholic church containing the DIVINE OFFICE or services for the CANONICAL HOURS. The breviary is to be prayerfully used in times of quiet and meditation by the priest so that the apostolic command, "to pray without ceasing" may be realized.

The breviary is arranged as a collection of prayers with brief passages of Scripture interspersed, along with passages from the CHURCH FATHERS and the texts of classic Christian hymns. The canonical hours are prime (6:00 A.M.); terce (9:00 A.M.); sext (noon); none (3:00 P.M.) and vespers (6:00 P.M.). There is also a MATINS service, divided into three parts, and LAUDS. Most of the hourly material is from the Psalms. Collects or prayers, additional prayers, responses, and versicles complete the collection.

The breviary is divided into four parts, modeled on the four seasons. The festivals of the church and the commemorations of the saints are also included. The book concludes with the office for the dead, GRADUALS and PENITENTIAL PSALMS, prayers for the dying, prayers for travelers, and graces for before and after meals. It is a beautiful and useful collection of devotional material designed to enrich the lives of all those who use it.

J.C.

BRIDGES, MATTHEW (1800–1894). The author of "Crown Him with Many Crowns" and "Behold the Lamb" was born in Essex on July 14, 1800. Reared in the Church of England, he later became Roman Catholic. The last years of his life were spent in Quebec, Canada.

His other hymns include "My God, Accept My Heart This Day," "There Is an Everlasting Home," "Rise, Glorious Conqueror, Rise," and "Soil Not Thy Plumage, Gentle Dove." He also wrote Hymns of the Heart (1848).

N.H.

BRIDGET OF SWEDEN (about 1303–73). Various called Brigid, Birgitta, Birgit, she is the patron saint of Sweden, a mystic, and founder of the Brigittine Order. The daughter of Birger Persson, governor of Uppland, she had visions from childhood. In 1316 she married Ulf Gudmarsson, later governor of Nescicia, to whom she bore eight children, including Catherine. At her husband's death in 1344, she retired to Alvastra on Lake Vetter.

In one of the Revelations she was commanded to found an order, for which she received papal permission in 1370. She had gone to Rome in 1350 with Catherine, and spent the remainder of her life there, serving the poor and working to return the pope from Avignon. She died July 23, 1373, and was canonized by Pope Boniface IX on October 7, 1391.

N.H.

BRIGGS, CHARLES A. (1841–1913). Controversial Presbyterian Old Testament scholar born on January 15 in New York City, to Alanson and Sarah Mead Berrian Briggs. He married Julia Valentine Dobbs in 1865.

Having studied at the University of Virginia and Union Theological Seminary in New York, he spent four years in Berlin, where he embraced HIGHER CRITICISM. After pastoring a Presbyterian church in New York, he was appointed in 1874 as professor of Hebrew and cognate languages at Union. In 1890 he became the Edward Robinson professor.

He was tried for heresy in 1892 by the presbytery of New York. There he was acquitted, but on appeal to the General Assembly, he was condemned and suspended from the ministry. He later took Episcopal orders.

Thoroughly conservative theologically, except for his higher critical views of Scripture, he was founder and for ten years editor of the Presbyterian Review. His two hundred titles include the Hebrew Lexicon and a two-volume commentary on the Psalms (1906–1907). He also edited two influential series, the International Critical Commentary and the International Theological Library.

N.H.

BRIGHTMAN, EDGAR (1884–1953). American philosopher and leading exponent of PERSONALISM. He studied at Boston University under Borden Parker Bowne, the foremost early advocate in America of a theistic personalism. Brightman taught at Nebraska Wesleyan University (1912–15), Wesleyan University (1915–19), and Boston University from 1919 until his death.

Brightman's METAPHYSICS is best described as pluralistic IDEALISM. It is idealist in that it holds that "everything that exists is in, of, or for a mind on some level." Being is personal. Furthermore, reality is a society of persons: God the ultimate, uncreated Person and humans finite, created persons. Brightman's most distinctive thought was his revision of the idea of God. God, if genuinely personal, cannot be timeless. Neither, Brightman taught, can God's goodness square with omnipotence. The power of God is limited by nonrational conditions (the Given) within God, which the Divine neither created nor approves—hence suffering, evil, and loss are real. Through his long teaching career, Brightman had great influence on the liberalizing of Methodist theology. His form of personalism is now, however, in eclipse. The development of Brightman's position is best known through the writings of Peter Bertocci, his successor at Boston University. Brightman's works include The Problem of God (1930); Personality and Religion (1940); and Person and Reality (ed. by P. Bertocci, 1958).

J.L.

BRITISH COUNCIL OF CHURCHES. A union of British denominational groups formed in 1942–43, from churches that had carried on interdenominational work since the conferences at Oxford and Edinburgh in 1937. The BCC is similar to the WORLD COUNCIL OF CHURCHES in its theological platform, that is, as a "fellowship of churches which accept Jesus Christ as God and Saviour" but qualify this by saying, "any body which has hitherto been represented on the commission shall continue in membership of the council, if so willing, even though it does not itself accept this basis."

The BCC has 118 members who represent the Church of England, Scotland, Wales and Northern Ireland, the Salvation Army, the Society of Friends (Quakers), the Unitarian Church, the various Free churches, five interdenominational agencies, and some twenty other religious groups. The BCC exists to promote four purposes embraced by all the participating churches and agencies: to facilitate concerted action in evangelism and to promote the sense of social responsibility, to facilitate common action, to promote cooperation in the studies of the World Council of Churches, and to nourish the growth of ecumenicity.

J.C.

BRITISH MORALISTS. The term applied to that distinguished tradition of British moral and political philosophy that includes RICHARD HOOKER (1554– 1600), Thomas Hobbes (1588–1679), JOHN LOCKE (1632–1704), Shaftesbury (1671–1713), Bernard Mandeville (1670–1733), Francis Hutcheson (1694–1746), JOSEPH BUTLER (1692–1752), and DAVID HUME (1711–76). Recently the term has been broadened to include social critics and moralists from Thomas Carlyle and Matthew Arnold to F. R. Leavis in this century.

J.L.

BROAD CHURCH. Originally a designation of the liberal or inclusive wing of the Church of England in the nineteenth century. It interpreted the THIRTY-NINE ARTICLES so as to include people of many different religious outlooks in the church. The Broad Church movement deemphasized episcopal polity and ancient ritual.

J.C.

BRONZE SERPENT. In Numbers 21:4-9, the people of Israel grumbled over the hardships of the Exodus through the wilderness. The people had craved meat (Num. 11); Miriam and Aaron had spoken out foolishly (Num. 12); the people were defeated at Hormah (Num. 14); and Moses had sinned by striking a rock to get water. Now the people complained that they would starve and die of thirst. The Lord then sent fiery serpents who bit the people and many died. This brought about fear and repentance (Num. 21:7), and Moses prayed for their deliverance. The Lord told Moses to make a serpent of bronze and mount it on a pole. People bitten by a serpent needed only to look at the bronze serpent and they would live (Num. 21:9).

According to II Kings 18:4, this bronze (or brassen in the KJV) serpent was preserved and kept in the temple, where people burned incense before it. It was named Nehushtan and obviously was a relic of superstition, or even of idolatry. Hezekiah, who sought to return to the covenant relationship with Yahweh and to cleanse Jewish worship of pagan practices, cut down the fertility pillars of Baal and Asherah and broke the bronze serpent in pieces (II Kings 18:1-6).

In the NT, Jesus "lifted up" on the cross at Calvary is likened to the bronze serpent that Moses "lifted up" (John 3:14). The healing that came when the Israelites looked at the bronze serpent in faith is said also to be true of Jesus, for "so must the Son of man be lifted up, that whoever believes in him may have eternal life" (John 3:14-15). Thus the brazen serpent in the OT can be seen as a "type" or image of Christ, who redeemed the world by being lifted, but who is effective only in the lives of those who look to him in faith.

J.C.

BROOKS, PHILLIPS (1835–93). The well-known Episcopal bishop and author of "O Little Town of Bethlehem," was born December 13 to William Gray and Mary Ann Phillips Brooks. On his mother's side he was heir to a long line of Massachusetts ministers, and the founders of Phillips Exeter and Phillips Andover academies and Andover Theological Seminary. He was the second of six sons, four of whom became ministers.

Courtesy of Religious News Service

Phillips Brooks

Baptized at First Church (Unitarian), Boston, he was four when the family joined St. Paul's Episcopal Church. He studied at Harvard, taught at his alma mater Boston Latin School, and entered seminary in Alexandria, Virginia. There he was ordained deacon July 1, 1859. In August he went to the Church of the Advent in Philadelphia, and in January 1863 became rector of Holy Trinity Church. His famous carol was written for that church's Sunday school and first sung on Christmas 1868.

On October 31, 1869, he began his ministry at Trinity Church, Boston. When fire destroyed the church in 1872, the congregation rebuilt on Copley Square.

Brooks was a masterful speaker. His prayer at an 1865 Harvard memorial service for those who had died in the Civil War overshadowed the speaker. His Yale Lectures on Preaching (1877) were widely read. He preached at Westminster Abbey in 1880 and was the first American to preach for Queen Victoria. In 1879 he gave the Bohlen Lectures on The Influence of Jesus. In 1891 he was elected bishop of Massachusetts but served only two years before he died January 23, 1893.

N.H.

BROTHERHOOD, BROTHERLY LOVE. One of the first descriptions Christians used of one another was "brother." There is precedent for this in the OT, where "brother" often means fellow Israelite or Jewish neighbor (Lev. 19:17, 18). Jesus' teaching widened the scope of the term "neighbor" as in the parable of the kind Samaritan (Luke 10:25-37), and in a similar way the parable of Matthew 25:31-46 lifts the meaning of "these my brethren" to include all who suffer and are in need as believers. See also Matthew 12:46-50 for what is clearly revolutionary teaching that universalizes the scope of "brother" to include all who "do the will of God," irrespective of ethnic origins.

"Brotherhood" also received a new dimension from the role of Christ as "elder brother" in the family of God (Rom. 8:29; Heb. 2:11, 17; see John 20:17). It was therefore a natural consequence for the early Christians to call themselves by this title (Acts 1:15, 16; I Cor. 1:11; James 2:1, 5, 14); and indeed to use the term, in a nonsexist way, to mean all the members of the church (I Thess. 5:25-27). The implication is that all Christians belong to the same divine family under one Father, who is both Father of Jesus his firstborn (Col. 1:15; compare Luke 2:7) and of believers (Rom. 8:14-16).

In that family circle the hallmark is a life of love. Hence the call to "love as brothers" (I Thess. 4:9; I Pet. 3:8). "Brotherly love" (Greek philadelphia) is a fairly frequent term in the NT (Rom. 12:10 KJV; Heb. 13:1; I Thess. 4:9 KJV), and it describes the ethos of those who belong to the Christian "brotherhood" (I Pet. 2:17; 5:9) as that way of life appropriate to a fellowship in Christ. Its marks are unity (Rom. 12:16; 15:5) and practical concern to help those in need (I John 3:17).

R. M.

BROTHERS OF THE COMMON LIFE. Monastic groups founded in the Netherlands by Gerhard Groote (1340-84) and Florentius Radewin (1350-1400). They stressed devotio moderna—simple, sincere, religious living, without permanent vows. Their Deventer house became famous for teaching. THOMAS À KEMPIS was a noted member, and they influenced ERASMUS and LUTHER.

C. M.

BROWNE, ROBERT (1550-1633). Controversial PURITAN Separatist and early advocate of congregational polity. Born in Tolethorpe, Rutland (England), and educated at Corpus Christi, Cambridge, Browne urged further reform in Anglicanism. With Robert Harrison he started an independent church in Norwich, 1581, and was imprisoned briefly. He then emigrated to Holland, where in 1582 he published Reformation Without Tarrying for Any, and A Booke Which Sheweth the Life and Manners of All True Christians.

He denounced Puritans who were waiting for Queen Elizabeth I to reform the church. He said rulers should neither compel nor control in religious matters. Rather, the only true church is an autonomous, voluntary covenant body of believers united to Christ and directed by his laws. Ministers have a special task but are subject to the congregation. Browne returned to England and Anglicanism, 1585, and spent his final years conforming outwardly to the Anglican ministry.

C. M.

BRUNNER, EMIL (1889-1966). Swiss theologian and influential leader of the movement variously known as NEO-ORTHODOXY, DIALECTICAL THEOLOGY, or the Theology of Crisis, in the years between the two world wars. Drawing on a fresh reading of the Bible, the Reformers Luther and Calvin, and Kierkegaard, Brunner—with K. Barth, F. Gogarten, and E. THURNEISEN—attacked the prevailing nineteenth-century tradition of Protestant liberal theology from Schleiermacher to Harnack. In The Theology of Crisis (1929), Brunner faulted the emphasis in liberal theology on the immanence of God and stressed, instead, God's mystery and otherness, the crisis of belief, and the radically paradoxical nature of Christian faith.

Brunner was born and educated in Switzerland, attending the University of Zurich. Early influences included the south German pastor Christoph Blumhardt (1842-1919), Herman Kutter (1863-1931), a disciple of Blumhardt, and Leonhard Ragaz (1868-1945), Brunner's teacher at Zurich. From 1916 to 1922 Brunner was pastor in the mountain village of Obstdalen. In 1922 he was made Privatdozent in theology at the University of Zurich and, two years later, he was appointed professor of systematic and practical theology, a post he held until 1953. Brunner did not have a great influence on German theology, although he wrote in that tongue. This was due, in part, to the fact that his books were banned by the Nazis.

His influence on Anglo-American theology, however, was considerable. Brunner traveled and lectured extensively in Britain and the United States in the twenties and thirties. In 1938-39 he was professor of systematic theology at Princeton Seminary. His many books, translated into English, were widely known in the United States in the thirties and forties. During this period Brunner also was active in the Faith and Order and Life and Work movements, which led to the ecumenical World Council of Churches. Later he became a theological advisor to the worldwide YMCA. In that post he traveled extensively through Asia in 1949. In 1953 he became professor of Christian ethics and philosophy at the International Christian University, Tokyo, Japan. In 1955 Brunner returned to Zurich as preacher at the Fraumünster Church, where for many years he had preached to overflowing congregations.

Courtesy of The Westminster Press

Emil Brunner

Brunner's first major work in Christian doctrine was The Mediator (1927), a study in Christology. The book rejected the liberal view of Jesus of Nazareth as a religious genius. Comparisons between Jesus and other religious visionaries is impossible. "We are confronted," Brunner asserts, "with an absolutely incomparable new fact . . . a new category which transcends history"—the incarnate Word of God. While upholding the ancient creedal definitions of God and Christ, Brunner nevertheless continually warned against overly intellectual approaches to theological knowledge. For Brunner, God is known only in personal encounter. This is the theme of The Divine-Human Encounter (1937), a work that reflects the profound influence of M. Buber's I and Thou.

Brunner maintained throughout his writings that God is revealed, though imperfectly, in and through the natural world and the events of history. That is, despite the FALL there remains a "point of contact" between God and natural humanity, an ongoing divine revelation in the Creation. However, Brunner also asserted that genuine saving knowledge of God is found only in Christian revelation. This position satisfied neither those in favor of natural theology nor K. Barth, who, in a pamphlet entitled Nein!, charged Brunner with being tainted by Catholic natural theology and denying the exclusive revelation of God in Christ. This dispute led to a tragic personal break between the two theologians, but it also sparked a lively theological debate on the nature of divine revelation.

Brunner wrote important works on the Christian doctrine of human existence, Man in Revolt (1937), and on Christian ethics, The Divine Imperative (1947). His other works include the Gifford Lectures, published as Christianity and Civilization (1948), Revelation and Reason (1947), Eternal Hope (1954), and the three volumes of his Dogmatics: The Christian Doctrine of God I (1950), The Christian Doctrine of Creation and Redemption II (1952), and The Christian Doctrine of the Church, Faith, and the Consummation III (1960).

J.L.

BUBER, MARTIN (1878–1965). One of the greatest Jewish thinkers of this century. Born in Vienna, Buber grew up in Lemberg in Galicia in the home of his grandfather Solomon Buber, a brilliant rabbinic scholar. Here young Buber imbibed both genuine piety and sound learning. At eighteen Buber entered the philosophy faculty at the University of Vienna. In the next few years he also studied in Leipzig, Berlin, and Zurich. One of his earliest publications was on the mystical writers of the Renaissance and Reformation periods. In Leipzig Buber founded a local Zionist group, and in 1901 he became editor of the Zionist journal Die Welt in Vienna. He soon left, however, because of differences with THEODOR HERZL, leader of the movement. With friends he founded the Jewish publishing firm Judische Verlag in 1902, which helped create a Jewish national movement in central Europe. In 1904 Buber received his doctoral degree from Vienna.

Soon, however, he withdrew from his Zionist and editorial activities and for five years, from 1904 to 1909, devoted himself to a study of the traditions and writings of the Hasidic movement of Jewish mystical piety. HASIDISM was the most formative influence on Buber's life and work. The fruit of these years of study was a series of books on the Hasidic legends. In 1913 Buber resumed interest in Zionism and, from 1916 to 1924, edited Der Jude, an effort to further the spiritual and cultural dimensions of the Zionist movement. In the 1920s Buber joined with Franz Rosenzweig in a number of cultural and educational activities, including work on a German translation of the Hebrew Bible and the establishment of the Free Jewish Academy in Frankfurt am Main. This educational work left an important mark on German Jewry.

In 1923 Buber was appointed professor of Jewish history of religion and ethics at Frankfurt University. That same year he published I and Thou, his best-known and most influential work. In 1933 Buber was deprived of his teaching post by the Nazis, and in 1938 he left Germany for Israel. There he served as professor of sociology at the Hebrew

Courtesy of Religious News Service

Martin Buber

University of Jerusalem until his retirement in 1951. His many writings include Tales of the Hasidim, The Legends of the Baal-Shem, Daniel, Between Man and Man, Two Types of Faith, Israel and the World, and Eclipse of God.

Buber's greatest contribution to thought is his "philosophy of dialogue," developed in I and Thou but implicit in much of his other work, including the studies of Hasidism. "In the beginning," writes Buber, "is relation." All real life is meeting. The self of each person comes into being in one of two primary relations: the I-It or the I-Thou. The usual way of relating to other persons is to treat them as an It: by experiencing and using them. It is an objective and instrumental mode of relation, exemplified in the experimental or scientific method. It is a form of relation that is indispensable to the ordering and maintaining of human life.

However, it is not the primary relationship, for it lacks genuine mutuality; that is found in the relationship of I-Thou. According to Buber, real knowledge of another requires openness, participation, empathy—genuine encounter and mutuality. Thus real knowledge of another can come only as a free gift, and such knowledge always remains finally ineffable. Because I-Thou relations cannot be coerced or sustained, they are rare, intense, fleeting revelations of new depths of meaning. It follows that human beings cannot live continuously in the world of I and Thou. However, Buber insists, one who lives in the world of I-It relations alone is not fully human. What has happened in the modern world is an abdication before the world of the It, which has made impossible a genuine spiritual life. Our lives are divided between the worlds of external institutions and private feelings. Both worlds deny real meeting and community.

Just as we cannot really know another person in terms of I-It, neither can we know God objectively. Only in openness, risk, and surrender is God or the Eternal Thou revealed. For Buber, meeting the Eternal Thou occurs in the hallowing of the everyday activities of life. The "filled present," which comes through such encounters with the Eternal Thou, is what Buber calls revelation. Revelation is not a "content" or a "solution" but, rather, a confirmation of meaning and a call to action. "Meet the world in the fullness of your being and you shall meet Him."

Buber's criticism of traditional Jewish religious practice has reduced his influence within orthodox Judaism, and many Zionists consider him utopian and unrealistic. Buber's historical interpretation of Hasidism also has been severely criticized by Jewish scholars. Nevertheless, his philosophy of dialogue has had wide influence not only on JUDAISM but also on the work of Christian theologians such as F. GOGARTEN, K. Heim, E. BRUNNER, and P. TILICH.

J.L.

BUCER, MARTIN (1491–1551). Protestant reformer of Strasburg and leading Reformed Church theologian after ZWINGLI. At fourteen he joined the Dominicans and later studied both ERASMUS' and LUTHER's writings at Heidelberg. In 1521 he gained release from his monastic vows, married, and in 1523 was excommunicated for preaching Lutheranism. Bucer's Lutheran ideas were modified by his strong Erasmanian humanism, nonviolence, and hope for religious unity. Throughout his life he sought to ease Protestant differences and heal Catholic-Protestant hatreds with ambiguous words. He sided with Zwingli at Marburg, 1529, yet signed the Wittenberg Concord, 1536, with Luther affirming the REAL PRESENCE of Christ in the Eucharist. Under him Strasburg became Protestant and was a haven for religious refugees, but Anabaptists were still persecuted. In 1548 he opposed the Augsburg Interim and fled to England, welcomed there by King Edward VI and Thomas Cranmer. He taught briefly at Cambridge and wrote De Regno Christi (On the Kingdom of Christ), his greatest work, a model for making all of life conform to God's will. He did not speak English but influenced Anglicanism through his students. He was buried at Cambridge. When Mary became queen, he was declared a heretic, and his body exhumed and burned, 1557.

C.M.

BUCHMAN, FRANK. See OXFORD GROUP.

Courtesy of the Japan National Tourist Organization

The Great Buddha of Kamakura, Japan

BUDDHA, GAUTAMA. The person known as the Buddha and honored as the founder of BUDDHISM. He was born in what is now Nepal about 560 B.C. and died somewhere around eighty years later. These dates are based on modern historical research. Many Buddhist sects (including the Nichiren sects) follow a tradition that the Buddha died in 949 B.C. In the Far East his birthday is observed on April 8.

The earliest texts that give information about his life were written in Sri Lanka (Ceylon) as late as 89–77 B.C. The first biography was the Buddhacarita, written by Ashvaghosha in Sanskrit late in the first century A.D. It contains much legendary material, but is widely accepted as giving valid information about the historical Buddha.

Birth and Early Years. His family name was Gautama (Gotama, in the Pali language in which the earliest scriptures were written), and his given name was Siddhartha. He was born to King Suddhodana of the Shakya clan, and his consort, Maya. Buddha is thus widely known as Shakyamuni—the Sage of the Shakyas. It is by this title that he is most frequently adored and venerated in the Far East.

Legend tells that in a dream Maya saw a white elephant entering her womb and impregnating her. Her son was born in a pleasant grove, with fountains, flowers, and fruit trees. He at once spoke a prophecy that he would become enlightened, and that this was his last birth in the cycle of birth and death.

Various signs were found on his body, indicating his future destiny. Three signs that are easily seen in images of the Buddha are a bulge on the top of his skull, a sign of supernatural mental powers; a hair in the middle of his forehead, represented in images by a jewel; and elongated ear lobes.

When his parents heard prophecies that he would leave his heritage of wealth and power to lead a religious life, they were frightened and tried to shield him from the world. He married a beautiful princess named Yashodhara, and she bore him a son. They named him Rahula, meaning "hindrance." Rahula later became one of his father's disciples and is honored as one of the most important arhants.

Beginnings of His Religious Life. The gods were displeased with Siddhartha's sheltered life and arranged for him to see four disturbing sights. On three successive trips outside the palace, accompanied by his charioteer, he saw a man overcome with old age, a man afflicted by disease, and a corpse. He was greatly troubled to learn that this is the common destiny of humans, and that the world is unconcerned.

Gautama then began to meditate on what he had observed. When he was able to become passionless and detached, the fourth sight, a man dressed as a begging monk approached him. A brief conversation convinced Gautama that he too should become a wandering monk. His parents vigorously opposed this decision and tried to distract him with worldly pleasures, including dancing girls. But he saw them only as impure and loathsome. In the silence of the night, he slipped away from home and family.

After many wanderings during which he almost starved himself to death, he concluded that tormenting the body achieved nothing. He accepted some food from a girl who was passing by. Then he determined to sit in meditation until he achieved a knowledge of the truth.

Enlightenment. Gautama sat cross-legged under the BODHI tree, resisting furious temptations from Mara the Tempter. He recalled all his previous lives, seeing that ignorance leads to old age and death, and death leads to rebirth and repetition of the cycle. He realized he could break the chain of causation if he once destroyed attachment to persons and things and the craving to possess them. Thus he became enlightened. For seven days he sat there contemplating the truth he had found.

Not content to find liberation only for himself, the now Enlightened One, the Buddha, set out for the city of Varanasi (Benares). There he met five wandering monks whom he had known during his period of near starvation. They were prepared to treat him with contempt, because he had given up the life of self-torment, but his person was now so powerful that they knelt before him. There in a place known as the Deer Park, he preached his first sermon and made the five monks his first disciples.

Teachings. Gautama's first sermon consisted of the FOUR NOBLE TRUTHS and the EIGHTFOLD PATH OF BUDDHA—the basic insights he had gained in his enlightenment. Ever since then they have constituted the central core of Buddhist beliefs and the basic guide to Buddhist practice. Essentially the Buddha taught a middle path between the one extreme of the indulgence of our desires and the other extreme of total asceticism. As the Enlightened One he had the freedom to teach or not teach; that is, he could remain detached from the sufferings of others. But because he could see with the eyes of a Buddha, he felt great compassion for all those whose minds are confused by false views, greed, and hatred. Since their problem is an inward or mental one, changing their outward conditions is in itself no help. Only by teaching and preaching can a real change be brought about.

The teachings are known as DHARMA, or the cosmic law of righteousness. The goal is, first, wisdom, and then, as the result of enlightenment, NIRVANA, where the cycle of birth and death ceases, and all individual identity is lost.

Since beings can be reborn not only as humans, but as animals, ghosts, gods, and dwellers in heaven or hell, compassion must be extended to them all. Killing animals, eating meat, using leather or silk are thus all wrong. Heaven and hell are temporary stages, and the gods are also subject to birth and death. The most favorable realm for achieving enlightenment is the human realm.

Until the age of eighty, Gautama traveled about India teaching and preaching. Then, surrounded by followers, he lay down on his right side and died. This was his Parinirvana—great entry into Nirvana.

K.C.

BUDDHISM. The religion of "enlightenment" (BODHI), that is, understanding that the world we experience is unreal and impermanent. Enlightenment leads one to escape from this world of suffering and illusion into NIRVANA. There passions and ignorance are extinguished and individual human existence is ended.

Buddhism had its origin in northern India. The founder, Siddhartha Gautama (about 560-480 B.C.), came to be the BUDDHA, or "Enlightened One." From its start Buddhism was a protest against HINDUISM and especially the Hindu ideas of CASTE, ASCETICISM, and an immortal soul that is in reality part of the world soul.

Over the following centuries Buddhism spread to Sri Lanka, Burma, Thailand, Laos, and Cambodia in a form known as Theravada ("Tradition of the Elders," see below). It also spread north into central Asia, China, Korea, and Japan, where a new form, Mahayana ("Greater Vehicle"), became dominant. Beginning in the eighth century A.D., another form arose in Tibet (see below). Some of the most important developments took place in China and Japan. There is so much variety among the various schools and sects that at times Buddhism seems more like a family of religions than a single religion.

The earliest sacred writings are in Pali, a language that had developed from Sanskrit. When Buddhism expanded into new areas, Sanskrit came to be used, since it was a more widely understood language. The first missionaries to China (first century A.D.?) used Sanskrit and translated their teachings from it into Chinese. It was necessary to find or invent Chinese vocabulary to do this, and the choice of terms deeply influenced the meaning of many of the teachings. The Buddhist scriptures in Chinese have been used in neighboring lands where Chinese culture is influential: Korea, Japan, and Vietnam.

General Concepts. Buddhism is rich in profound concepts, and the following are those which are most important to understand.

(a) The four noble truths. When Gautama became enlightened he perceived four truths about human existence. The first of these is the truth of suffering. Human existence is unsatisfactory. We suffer physically through sickness, old age, etc., and mentally by being with those we dislike or separated from those we love. In medical terms, this is the symptom of our problem. The second truth is that our suffering is caused by craving, lust, and greed. This is the diagnosis of our problem. Third, it is possible to put an end to this craving that brings suffering—the prognosis. And fourth, there is an eightfold path that makes it possible to put an end to suffering—the prescription.

(b) The eightfold path. The eight parts of this path are not successive steps, but are to be practiced at the same time, even though some parts can be achieved before others. The first two parts, right understanding and right thoughts, involve wisdom. The next three, right speech, right action, and right means of earning a living, involve morality. The last three, right effort, right mindfulness, and right concentration, lead to singleness of mind, and finally to Nirvana.

(c) Dukkha. This is the term for the suffering that we learn about in the first of the Four Noble Truths. It may be mental or physical suffering that we experience consciously, or it may be suffering that results from our psychological makeup, which is constantly changing. It may also be connected with the next two items in this list, anicca and anatta. In that case it is the suffering that is involved in all things that are pleasant, because they cannot last, but change and disappear.

(d) Anicca ("impermanence"). The fact of change is obvious to every observer. Plants, animals, and human beings are born, live a while, and die, and the earth on which they live is changing, surely though sometimes slowly. Buddhists hold that we are only a procession of changes, always in flux, never ceasing. Even a giant tree or a human being cannot be said to "exist." We are at most a changing proportion of the elements that make us up. It would be foolish to attach ourselves to these changing objects or persons.

(e) Anatta ("no-self"). In a reaction against the doctrine of an undying self (ATMAN) in Hinduism, early Buddhism taught that there is no permanent self. We are a temporary collection of "heaps" or separate parts; form, sensation, perception, predispositions, and consciousness. A wagon can be divided into its separate parts, and instead of a wagon we have only a pile of those parts. Just so, death ends the connection of our separate "heaps" with each other, and what we thought was a self is gone forever. Wanting to cling to the illusion of a "self" is a mistake. It leads to sorrow and suffering.

(f) Karma (the results of our thoughts and acts). Even though there is no permanent self, the results of what we do and think are carried over to a new life. This teaching is hard to explain, if there is no self that continues. The passing of good or bad karma to the next life has been compared to the passing of energy from a lighted candle to an unlighted one. Or it is said to be like a teaching process in which pupils memorize the truths the teacher gives them.

(g) Samsara (the repeated process of birth and death). We are destined to be born and die over and over again, and both birth and death bring sorrow and suffering. By following the Four Noble Truths and the Eightfold Path a person can eventually escape. In the meantime, however, a being may live many lifetimes and pass through various realms of existence, such as human life, animal life, hell, the realm of the gods, the realm of hungry ghosts, and the realm of demons.

(h) Sunyata ("emptiness"). Everything and any independent being in this world are empty of lasting value. Therefore nothing here is worthy of our ultimate commitment. To realize that this is true, the believer must meditate. Finally, with full realization, one is free from entanglements.

Ways to Enlightenment. (a) Buddhabood. It is the goal of every believer to become a Buddha, even though this may require many lifetimes. Soon after Gautama's death the belief arose that there had been other Buddhas before him. There also came to be a distinction between different kinds of Buddhas. Some, like Gautama, had entered Nirvana and could not be reached by prayers. Others, like Amida, had become enlightened, not on earth, but in a heavenly realm, and so could be reached by prayer.

(b) Bodhisattva ("Buddha to be"). This is the last stage before the final birth and death, when one enters Nirvana. Gautama had been a BODHISATTVA before becoming a Buddha. Because of compassion for those who suffer, a person can take a vow to help all beings to salvation. This means that he or she will stop at the bodhisattva stage and not enter Nirvana until everyone else can be saved too. Thus a bodhisattva can hear and answer prayer. The most popular bodhisattva in the Far East is AVALOKITESVARA (called Kwan Yin in Chinese). Kwan Yin is usually thought of as feminine and often called the Goddess of Mercy. She can help people with everyday problems or help them get to the Western Paradise, a "Pure Land" of beauty and delight ruled over by Amida Buddha.

(c) Arhat or loban ("learner, disciple"). Most early arhats were disciples or close followers of Gautama Buddha. In Mahayana (see below) the Chinese equivalent of the term "arhat" is loban. Lohans are considered selfish, because they do not try to save others. Statues and pictures of bodhisattvas are beautiful and tranquil, while lohans are often given a grotesque form, at times even comic. Some of them are in an inferior Nirvana, and some remain behind in the world in order to protect the DHARMA, the true teaching.

(d) The triple body. This is a Mahayana teaching that says the Buddha has three distinct modes of existing. The first is the dharmakaya, or body of dharma, which is absolutely unlimited in nature. Many sects believe everyone is a manifestation of the dharmakaya, and therefore everyone is worthy of life and will eventually be saved. The second is the Buddha body on the worldly plane, and the third is the Buddha body in a heavenly form. A worshiper can move from the contemplation of the earthly Buddha body to the heavenly, and finally to the dharmakaya.

Monasticism. From earliest times the followers of the Buddha were organized in a monastic order, or sangha. Special organizations for nuns soon developed. A monk or nun pledges to take refuge in the Buddha, in the dharma, or teaching, and in the sangha. These three are known as the "three jewels." The monastic life is regarded as closer to the ideal life, and therefore it is easier for a monk or nun to be reborn in a favorable realm in the next life than it is for a lay person.

Monasteries developed into self-sufficient communities, often with large holdings of land or other property. At times their wealth brought persecution from envious governments. In China there was fierce persecution in A.D. 845, after which Buddhism went into a slow decline. Monasteries were destroyed, gold and silver images were melted down, and monks and nuns were forced back into secular life. Throughout Buddhist lands monasteries have buildings of great beauty and preserve priceless art treasures. They continue to be centers of devotion and have enormous impact on culture and society, especially in Japan.

Scriptures. The earliest collection of Buddhist scriptures is called the Tripitaka, literally "three baskets," after its three major divisions. The first "basket" contains writings governing the conduct of monastic life. The second contains discourses on the basic ideals and teachings of the Buddha. One of these discourses is the DHAMMAPADA, which is especially popular with lay persons. It sums up the teachings in a clear and simple way, and it is easy to memorize. The third basket deals with theological controversies and is only of academic interest.

Many other scriptures, usually known as "sutras," took shape over the centuries, especially in Mahayana. They set forth distinctive Mahayana teachings.

Because they often do not agree with one another, great scholars tried to develop ways of including them all in one system of thought. The Tendai school (see below) was especially successful in this.

Aids to Meditation and Worship. (a) Mantra. A word or phrase that is recited over and over as an aid to meditation or to call on a supernatural being for help. In Tibet the syllable om is especially used. The name of a specific Buddha or bodhisattva often forms the core of a mantra, for example, "Namu Amida Butsu" (Japanese), meaning, "I adore Amida Buddha."

(b) Mandala. A diagram with symmetrically arranged circles within larger concentric circles. It is arranged around a central Buddha figure, surrounded by other Buddhas and bodhisattvas. Basically it is regarded as a diagram of the universe, and thus as a sort of map of the way to salvation. Some mandalas are very elaborate and colorful.

(c) Mudra. A ritual gesture, in which the hands are placed in specific positions. Each mudra has a separate meaning, and many are associated with a specific Buddha or bodhisattva.

(d) Paintings and images. In earliest times no images of the Buddha were made. A tree or other symbol represented his presence. Later a great variety of figures and symbols came to be used to portray Buddhas, bodhisattvas, lohans, and saints. Paintings range from the simple and austere to the elaborate and colorful. Statues range from small household images to giant images several stories high.

(e) Stupa. A commemorative monument that may contain relics of a holy being. A pilgrim may bring offerings to the stupa, chant scriptures there, and walk around it repeatedly. In China the stupa took the form of a multi-storied wooden watchtower, often called a pagoda. Throughout the Far East stupas of wood or stone range in size from a meter or two to tens of meters in height.

Theravada. "Tradition of the Elder" is the form of Buddhism found in Sri Lanka, Burma, Thailand, and other countries in Southeast Asia. It is the closest to the earliest forms of Buddhism. Emphasis is on the practices that individuals perform to achieve salvation for themselves. Merit acquired in this way cannot be transferred to others. The ideal is to become an arhat (see above), and only a monk can do so. Critics of Theravada call it "Hinayana," or "Lesser Vehicle (for salvation)."

Tibetan Buddhism. Buddhism reached Tibet comparatively late. In A.D. 747 Padma-Sambhava introduced into Tibet a form of Buddhism known as Tantric or esoteric, that is, containing secret practices and doctrines. Some of these involve sexual practices designed to bring home the point that there is no duality, but everything is basically one. Art, scriptures, and worship developed to a high level of sophistication.

To aid a dying person to come back in a favorable realm in his or her next rebirth, Tibetan Buddhists developed a guidebook to the period of time between death and rebirth. It is popularly known as the BOOK OF THE DEAD.

Mahayana. The "Greater Vehicle (to salvation)," so called because of its emphasis on helping others to salvation in contrast to "Hinayana" (Theravada; see above).

(a) Origins and emphases. The basic idea of Mahayana is that every being possesses the Buddha nature and is therefore capable of becoming a Buddha. Since the path to Buddhahood is now open to everyone, there must be simpler means of traveling it. This can be done by faith and devotion to the Buddha and by love and compassion for all living beings. Faith in Amida Buddha and calling on his name even once may be enough to assure one of salvation. A great variety of sects and schools developed, but many of them are now only of historical interest. Among the many scriptures, the Lotus Sutra is the most influential.

(b) Tendai (in Japanese), T'ien T'ai (in Chinese). This school arose in China in the sixth century A.D. on T'ien T'ai Mountain in eastern Chekiang Province. In the preceding centuries scholars had translated large numbers of scriptures into Chinese. They represented conflicting teachings, so it was hard to accept them all as the literal sermons of the Buddha while he was on earth. The solution was to divide the Buddha's life into five periods. During these periods he moved from simple teachings to higher teachings suitable to those mature enough to understand them. The LOTUS SUTRA was the highest teaching of all. Tendai also developed a complex philosophy that continues to have great influence today, especially in PURE LAND and NICHIREN Buddhism.

Reprinted with permission of Macmillan Publishing Company, from Historical Atlas of the Religions of the World, edited by Isma'il Ragi al Faruqi and David E. Sopher. Copyright © 1974 by Macmillan Publishing Company

(c) Pure land buddhism. A number of sects, especially in Japan, take their name from the "Pure Land," or "Western Paradise," of Amida Buddha. They stress faith in Amida, recitation of his name, and the goal of being reborn in paradise as of more immediate importance than entering Nirvana. The Pure Land is rich in pleasures and delights, and the scriptures give glowing accounts of it.

Pure Land Buddhism has accepted and followed many of the teachings of Tendai. Today Pure Land sects have more followers than any other Buddhist group in Japan. Its practices have spread to other sects as well.

(d) Nichiren buddhism. Unlike other sects, which have their roots in India or China, this branch of Buddhism began with the dramatic career of the monk Nichiren in thirteenth-century Japan. He drew on the Tendai teachings and stressed the importance of the Lotus Sutra. Nichiren taught that we are living in the final age of Buddhism (Mappo, literally "end of the Dharma"), and that in this age people can achieve salvation only through him. He rejected as false all forms of Buddhism except his own. Those who worship Amida are "Hell," and Zen (see below) is "a devil." This attitude has been continued in the present century by Nichiren Shoshu, a sect that has grown phenomenally since 1945 and has spread to America. Here some of its extreme demands have been modified. Nichiren Shoshu has had its largest growth, not through the activities of monks, but under lay leadership in a parallel organization called Soka Gakkai. From a handful of believers in 1945 it has grown to perhaps fifteen to twenty million in the 1980s. It also has a political party, the Komeito, a strong middle-of-the-road force in Japanese politics.

A less aggressive form of lay Buddhism in the Nichiren tradition is known as RISSHO KOSEIKAI, with about five million members. Its leader, Kikkyo Niwano, is active in international, interfaith movements. Their distinctive practice is called boza ("circle of harmony"), a circle of twelve persons who gather to share mutual concerns for their spiritual and physical welfare.

(e) Zen (literally "meditation"). The best known and most popular form of Buddhism in the West. Its aim is enlightenment (satori in Japanese), which requires great discipline. Satori can be achieved more than once, with varying degrees of intensity. Zen's origins are traced to the semilegendary figure of Bodhidharma in fifth-century China. He taught that there is a special transmission of truth outside of scripture. There should be no dependence on words or writings or on images, but instead a direct pointing to the human soul. As a result one will be able to see into his or her own nature and attain Buddhahood.

Zen was shaped by the Chinese practical approach to life. Unlike monks in other Buddhist schools, Zen monks did physical labor and as a result were widely respected. In China the movement borrowed practices from other schools, but developed its own distinctive methods. Anecdotes about teachers formed the basis of later koan—sayings used to force students to give up traditional ways of thinking. Teachers also use shouts, slaps, questions, and symbolic actions to trigger the experience of satori. Sitting in meditation (zazen) is a basic practice.

After a long history in Japan, Zen experienced a decline until it was revived by Hakuin Ekaku, who died in 1768. He reorganized the discipline and training, and made new and creative use of the koan. He also left a rich heritage in art.

Zen has always emphasized the arts. In addition to ink painting and calligraphy, the masters have practiced and taught martial arts, the tea ceremony, flower arrangement, the temple rock garden, and the Haiku form in poetry.

Since World War II, Zen has enjoyed great popularity outside Japan. The writings of D. T. SUZUKI have had a major influence in this development. Most Americans seem to appreciate the aesthetic elements of Zen, but avoid the monastic discipline.

K.C.

BULGAKOV, SERGIUS (1871–1944). One of the foremost Russian theologians and spiritual philosophers of this century. After studying law at the University of Moscow he became, in 1901, professor of political economy at the Polytechnic Institute at Kiev and, in 1906, lecturer at the University of Moscow. A Marxist in his youth, in Capitalism and Agriculture (1900) he seriously questioned Marxist theory. The influence of KANT and the break with MARX are reflected in From Marxism to Idealism (1904). There followed a move away from IDEALISM. Bulgakov's return to the ORTHODOX CHURCH was influenced by Vladimir Soloviev's and Pavel Florensky's doctrine of SOPHIA or Divine Wisdom. The concept of Sophia, or "Sophiology," became henceforth the all-embracing center of Bulgakov's theological writing.

In 1918 Bulgakov was ordained an Orthodox priest. His conversion was related in his last purely philosophical writing, The Unfading Light (1917). Banished from Russia by the Soviet government in 1922, he fled first to Prague. In 1925 Bulgakov settled in Paris and took part in the founding there of the Orthodox Theological Institute of St. Sergius. He remained at the Institute as dean and professor of dogmatic theology until his death. Bulgakov's theological works are difficult and speculative, and his "Sophiology" was condemned by the Moscow patriarchate. He submitted, however, to the Metropolitan Eulogius of Paris and declared his belief in Orthodox dogma.

J.L.

BULLINGER, HEINRICH (1504–75). Swiss reformer and ZWINGLI's successor. Son of a priest, he was born at Bremgarten and was educated by Brothers of the Common Life and at Cologne University. He studied the Reformers and was especially drawn to Zwingli. He taught several years in the Cistercian monastery at Kappel, and in 1529, the year of his marriage, he followed his father as pastor at Bremgarten. He turned the congregation to Protestantism.

Often called the second founder of the German Reformed Church, he assisted Zwingli in several disputations and succeeded him as pastor at Zurich in 1531. He helped write the First HELVETIC CONFESSION, 1536, hoping in vain to achieve unity with the Lutherans on the Eucharist. He and CALVIN achieved harmony with the Consensus Tigurinus, 1549, and in 1566 he authored the Second Helvetic Confession to unify other scattered Reformed churches. He corresponded with royalty of England, France, Denmark, and Germany, and heightened his influence in England by aiding exiles during Queen Mary's reign. He condoned Servetus' execution in Geneva. His biblical expositions and sermons won him wide acclaim. A chronicled History of the Reformation stands as one of his most significant works.

C.M.

BULL, PAPAL. A decree by the pope, declaring a doctrinal decision binding on all Catholics. The Bull follows a set pattern, naming the Pope and the date according to the Roman and Christian calendars and the year of the Pope's reign. "Bull" is from the Latin bulia or seal.

J.C.

BULTMANN, RUDOLPH (1884–1966). One of the most influential NT scholars of the twentieth century. Both his development of critical methods for the study of the Gospels and his own reconstruction of NT theology profoundly affected study in his field, and had an enduring impact on biblical scholarship.

Biographical Information. Born in a village in the grand duchy of Oldenburg (now in East Germany), Bultmann was the son of an Evangelical-Lutheran pastor and grandson of a missionary to Africa. After completing his preparatory schooling in his native district, he entered Tübingen University in 1903. In the German fashion, he spent some semesters of study at the universities in Marburg and Berlin, as well. Among the professors who influenced him most were the historian ADOLF VON HARNACK, the systematic theologian WILHELM HERMANN, and the NT scholar Johannes Weiss. From Harnack, Bultmann seems to have derived his ability to reduce complex detail to a simple formula; from Hermann, he gained his sense of theology as concerned with experience rather than merely concepts. And from Weiss he learned rigorous historical, critical method. After completing his doctorate under Weiss, he taught briefly at Marburg, and then in Breslau, where he completed his monumental analysis of the components and stages of development of the Gospels, The History of the Synoptic Tradition (first published in 1920; Eng. trans. in 1963). In 1921 he returned to Marburg University, where he remained until his retirement in 1951 and his death in 1966.

Courtesy of Religious News Service

Rudolf Bultmann

Major Writings. Although Bultmann's dissertation was a study of the influence of the Cynic-Stoic rhetorical style on Paul's preaching, most of his writings concentrated on the Gospels. In addition to his basic study mentioned above, a more popular work, Form Criticism (Eng. trans. 1934), contributed to what was then a new method of studying the Gospels. On the assumption that what was reported about Jesus' teaching and activities was originally transmitted orally, Bultmann sought to discern behind the written Gospels the brief patterns (forms) of instruction and narrative as they must have existed at the oral stage. By distinguishing between older material and the editorial framework in which the Gospel writers had placed it, Bultmann believed it was possible to trace, as his title implies, the history of the Synoptic tradition. In addition, he thought he could identify the original setting in the life of the church, either in Palestinian Christianity or the Gentile world, of each of these forms—preaching, instruction, or worship.

His Theology of the New Testament (Eng. trans. 1955) and his Gospel of John (Eng. trans. 1971) employ critical methods, but are chiefly concerned with setting forth the basic theological insights of the major NT writings. Significantly, however, the Theology makes no place for the first three Gospels. Rather the focus is on Paul and John. Both these writers are interpreted as setting forth the essence of the message of Jesus, which Bultmann had earlier distilled from the Jesus of the Gospel tradition in a small book known in its English version as Jesus and the Word (Eng. trans. 1934).

Theological Position. A powerful influence on Bultmann at Marburg had been the existentialist philosopher MARTIN HEIDEGGER, who had viewed life as consisting of a sequence of situations in which people are called to make decisions that open the way either to what he called "authentic existence" or to meaninglessness. Bultmann was convinced that that was the essence of the message of Jesus, of Paul, and of John. All three of them used language whose imagery was burdened by mythological symbols and pre-scientific assumptions. But when the myth was stripped away by the interpreter, the call to authentic existence could be discerned behind the archaic language. That interpretive thesis was set forth by Bultmann in Jesus Christ and Mythology (1958).

This demythologizing enterprise is reminiscent in method to the reductionist scheme of Harnack, who saw the essence of Christianity in "the fatherhood of God, the Kingdom of God, and the infinite worth of the human soul." By means of this method of DEMYTHOLOGIZATION Bultmann was able to display his profound learning in the analysis of the NT material against its ancient background and concurrently extract from it a religious essence, which for him was unaffected and uncontaminated by the mythological language and world view in which it was expressed. H.K.

BUNYAN, JOHN (1628–88). The great Puritan minister and writer was born in Elstow, Bedfordshire. His father, Thomas, was a tinker, and John followed the trade. He was converted one Sunday at age fourteen when he heard a voice while playing ball.

For Bunyan the year 1644 was eventful. His mother died in June, his younger sister Margaret in July, and in August his father remarried. In November Bunyan became a soldier in CROMWELL's Parliamentary army and served until July 1647. Sometime between 1647 and 1649 he married. The Bunyans had four children. Although daughter Elizabeth was baptized in 1654 in the Church of

Courtesy of the American Antiquarian Society

John Bunyan

England, her father had already been immersed as a member of a Bedford INDEPENDENT congregation.

His adult awakening was a gradual process from 1650 to 1655. He regularly attended the established church and gradually gave up what he considered sinful recreations. For several years he wrestled with temptation and spiritual despair, until he felt all was lost. Yet from that state of spiritual darkness, he emerged into an integrated faith and selfhood. He united with the church in 1655 and became a lay preacher by 1657.

In 1660, however, RESTORATION brought an end to the Separatists' twenty years of freedom. On November 12 Bunyan was charged with Nonconformity and in January 1661 imprisoned at Bedford. Though his second wife, Elizabeth, whom he wed in 1659, tried to get him released, he spent the next twelve years there. In 1666 he wrote Grace Abounding to the Chief of Sinners, an autobiographical account of his inner life. He probably also wrote much of Pilgrim's Progress, published in February 1678, following a second six-month imprisonment in 1677. His classic allegory of Christian's pilgrimage to the Celestial City gave a map to PURITAN spirituality.

While pastoring churches, he continued to write: The Life and Death of Mr. Badman (1680); The Holy War (1682), a second allegory of conversion and backsliding, fall and redemption; The Pilgrim's Progress . . . Second Part (1684), the story of Christian's wife, Christiana, and their children. Bunyan's last ten years were devoted to a number of doctrinal and controversial works plus poems for adults and children. He died August 31, 1688, in London, and is buried in Bunhill Fields. N.H.

BURNING BUSH. A flaming, thorny (?) bush of unknown species through which Yahweh's mysterious presence was imparted to Moses during the inaugural theophany at Mount Horeb (Exod. 3:2-4). Older interpreters understood the bush as a symbol of profane Israel, and the fire that did not consume it as the holy Deity, who dwelt among the Israelites without destroying them. The text itself simply states that on the occasion of Moses' call, Yahweh chose to be manifest through this striking visual element. Indeed, fire typically denotes God's actual presence in OT discourse (for example, Exod. 13:21; Deut. 4:12; I Kings 18:24; Ezek. 1:27). Multiple mention of the noun "bush" (sene) may symbolically anticipate the great theophany of MOUNT SINAI (Exod. 19).

J.K.K.

BUSHIDO. From the Japanese word for "way of the warrior." A code of values and behavior developed for the samurai or military class in medieval and early modern Japan. The ideals of Bushido had immense impact on Japanese education and militarism at least until the end of the Pacific War in 1945. Bushido drew from the Taoist-related martial arts, SHINTO nationalism, and the ZEN virtues of concentration and fearlessness in the face of punishment and death. But its heart was the CONFUCIANISM which, in Japan, stressed above all integrity and loyalty to one's house and feudal lord. Bushido thus inculcated bravery, honesty, simplicity of life, indifference to suffering and death, eternal preparedness, and supreme loyalty to one's lord and one's obligations. Failure in one's duty could be redeemed only by seppuku (hari-kiri) or ritual suicide, which in such circumstances was a noble deed.

While originating in the Kamakura period (1185-1333) with its many samurai wars, Bushido was not fully systematized until the more peaceful Tokugawa Era (1600-1867), when the samurai actually had little fighting to do. Its leading exponent was Yamaga Sokō (1622-85), whose writings summarize and explicate Bushido precepts.

R.E.

BUSHNELL, HORACE (1802-76). The Father of American Religious Liberalism, best known for Christian Nurture (1847), was born on April 14, the son of Ensign and Dortha Bishop Bushnell, in Bantam, Connecticut. He "owned the covenant" at age nineteen in the New Preston Church.

He received the B.A. from Yale University in 1827 and studied law before an 1831 revival motivated him to study theology at Yale with NATHANIEL W. TAYLOR. He was ordained a Congregationalist May 22, 1833, in North Church, Hartford, which he served until his retirement in 1861. He married Mary Apthorp on September 13, 1833.

Conservative on matters of science, women's rights (Women's Suffrage; The Reform Against Nature, 1869), slavery, and immigration, he was deeply influenced by the ROMANTICISM of COLERIDGE and SCHLEIERMACHER in theology. In Christian Nurture, the foundation of modern Christian education, he stressed the organic view of family, church, and nation. Revivals and sudden conversion are unnecessary where nurture has steadily evoked the child's natural goodness.

His own "clear knowledge of God," experienced in a mystical way in February 1849, became the basis for God in Christ. Christ in Theology (1851) was followed by Nature and the Supernatural (1858), which defined the supernatural as all that has life beyond mechanical causality. In The Vicarious Sacrifice (1866), Bushnell favored ABELARD's moral influence theory of the Atonement. He died on February 17. N.H.

BUTLER, JOSEPH (1692-1752). Among the greatest English theologians and moralists of the modern period. Raised a Presbyterian, he entered the Church of England before going up to Oriel College, Oxford, in 1714. Ordained in 1718, Butler served as preacher at the Rolls Chapel, London (1718-26). The product of this assignment was Fifteen Sermons (1726), which made his reputation and established him as one of the preeminent BRITISH MORALISTS. Butler was successively rector of Houghton and of Stanhope ("not dead but buried"); clerk of the closet to Queen Caroline; bishop of Bristol; dean of St. Paul's Cathedral, London; clerk of the royal closet to George II; and bishop of Durham.

Butler is best known as the author of The Analogy of Religion (1736). Little discussed in his own time, the book was widely studied in the nineteenth century and had a profound influence on such figures as JOHN HENRY NEWMAN and Prime Minister W. E. Gladstone. The Analogy is addressed to those DEISTS who, conceding the existence of God as a moral governor, were skeptical of the particular claims of Christianity. Their chronic complaint was that if God's will had been revealed in the Bible God would not have allowed for such contradictions and moral ambiguities. Butler attempts to show that the Deist belief in God—the author and moral governor of nature, when viewed in the light of nature's puzzling confusion and seeming misery—faces difficulties comparable to those found in Christian revelation.

Butler, nevertheless, argues that in the case of both natural and revealed religion one can discern inferences and analogies that support reasonable belief. On the basis of his analogical arguments, Butler defends the immortality of the soul, future rewards and punishments, miracles, and God's moral governance of the world. For Butler neither nature nor the Bible offers unquestionable proof of the claims of theism. For our finite minds, "probability is the very guide of life." Butler was, in Leslie Stephen's words, "honest enough to admit the existence of doubts, and brave enough not to be paralyzed by them."

J.L.

BUTTRICK, GEORGE ARTHUR (1892–1980). Presbyterian preacher and scholar, born in Seaham Harbour, Northumberland, England, on March 23. Buttrick was a spellbinding sermonizer and an exponent of liberalism against fundamentalism. He began his ministry as a Congregationalist, and was a graduate of Victoria University and the Lancaster Independent Theological Seminary. He emigrated to the United States and served parishes in Quincy, Illinois; Rutland, Vermont; and Buffalo, New York; until he was called at age thirty-four as pastor of the Madison Avenue Presbyterian Church in New York City. He remained pastor there until 1954.

Buttrick was president of the Federal Council of Churches, 1939–41. From 1954 to 1960, he was preacher and professor at Harvard and later at Union Seminary, Garrett Seminary, Presbyterian Seminary, and Southern Baptist Seminary in Louisville. He was editor for The Interpreter's Bible and the Interpreter's Dictionary of the Bible; and author of The Parables of Jesus; The Christian Fact and Modern Doubt; Christ and Man's Dilemma; Faith and Education; Jesus Came Preaching; God, Pain, and Evil; and The Power of Prayer Today.

J.C.

BYZANTINE RITE. Historically, the worship form or rite of the Byzantine Empire, derived from early Christian practice in Jerusalem and Antioch. One of five major rites used by Eastern Catholics (in communion with Rome) and the Eastern Orthodox Church. It is a beautiful, elaborate mass often concelebrated by several priests.

J.C.

Cc

CABBALA. See KABBALA.

CAESAR, GAIUS JULIUS. Illustrious Roman soldier, dictator, historian. Born of a patrician family about 102 B.C., who traced its ancestry to Venus and Anchises, Caesar's early manhood was effected by the rise and fall of a political party with which he identified his interests, the popularis. As praetor in 61 B.C., Caesar supported proposals in Pompey's favor, which aroused violent opposition in the Senate, but upon this great general's return from the East, Caesar was recognized as his ally. While campaigning in Syria, Pompey had "arbitrated" a dispute between the Hasmonean brothers, and claimed Roman hegemony over Judea. Julius Caesar was to confer upon Antipater, father of Herod the Great, the title procurator of Judea. With Pompey and Crassus, Caesar formed the first triumvirate. For all practical purposes constitutional government ceased to exist.

While Caesar fought the Gallic wars (58-51 B.C.), his prestige in the Senate was eclipsed by Pompey's. Civil war ensued and Caesar followed Pompey to Alexandria, where it was learned that Pompey had been murdered (Pss. of Sol. 17:8-15). In the year 29 B.C., Caesar received the dictatorship for a period of ten years, a title renewed in 48 B.C. and again in 46 B.C. This position granted him the sole right of making war and peace and disposing of the finances of the state. On March 15, 44 B.C., Caesar was murdered in the Senate house at the foot of Pompey's statue.

The first emperors of Rome belonged to the Julian house: AUGUSTUS, TIBERIUS, Gaius (CALIGULA), CLAUDIUS, and NERO. The Flavian dynasty was founded by VESPASIAN. J.L.P.

CAESAREA. A major seaport and Roman political capital of NT Palestine. It lay on the "Way of the Sea" highway, about twenty-two miles south of Mount Carmel, and twenty-eight miles north of JOPPA, where a highway led through the Megiddo Pass. Near ancient ruins called Strato's Tower, Herod the Great began a grandiose Greco-Roman city in 21 B.C., which he completed twelve years later and named to honor Caesar Augustus.

The geometrically planned, semicircular shaped city was walled. The beach side was a mile long. The city had many noteworthy features: a well-protected harbor, larger than that at Piraeus, decorated with lofty towers and colossal statues; a temple of Augustus, visible far out at sea, with great statues of Rome and the emperor; a drainage system flushed by the tides; aqueducts, one that was eight miles long; a hippodrome; an amphitheater seating twenty thousand; a theater where the name Pontius Pilate was found recently; and other magnificent structures. Three thousand Roman soldiers were assigned there.

Among the significant NT events that took place in Caesarea are: the baptism of Cornelius (Acts 10), repeated visits by Paul to the Caesarean Christian community, Paul's trial and two years' imprisonment (Acts 23), followed by his journey under guard to Rome (Acts 23).

P.L.G.

CAESAREA PHILIPPI. A regional center and resort city on the southwest flank of Mount Hermon, occupying a terrace over eleven hundred feet above sea level, wooded and with luxurious mountain vegetation, and having a wide view of the Jordan Valley. The city's pilgrimage center was a grotto from which a perennial stream emerged, the most abundant source of the Jordan River. In ancient times, some nature-god (Baal-Hermon), was, perhaps, venerated here. The Romans called it Paneas for the god Pan (Banias).

In 20 B.C. Augustus gave the place to Herod the Great, who built a white marble temple and dedicated it to the emperor. Herod's son, Philip, inherited the city in 4 B.C. He enlarged and beautified it and named it for Tiberius Caesar and for himself.

Matthew 16:13 and Mark 8:27 locate Peter's confession in the area of Caesarea Philippi (compare Luke 9:18 ff.). The place of Jesus' transfiguration is not named (Matt. 17:1-8; Mark 9:2-8; Luke 9:28-36), but since this account follows that of Peter's confession, it is thought the TRANSFIGURATION took place near Caesarea Philippi. Others hold that this event occurred on Mount Tabor.

P.L.G.

CAESAROPAPISM. The control of the church by secular rulers. This system of church-state relations was characteristic of the Byzantine Empire and led to repeated clashes with the West, which objected particularly to the attempts by the emperors to intervene in doctrinal matters.

J.G.

CAIAPHAS. A high priest for about eighteen years from roughly A.D. 18 to A.D. 36. The Gospels and Acts mention Caiaphas as high priest in the trial of Jesus (Matt. 26:57-27:2; Mark 14:53-15:1; Luke 22:54-23:1) and the trial of the apostles (Acts 5:12-42). The text relates Caiaphas to Annas, high priest from about A.D. 6 to A.D. 15. Precisely what that relation was cannot now be determined. John 18:13 states that Annas was the father-in-law of Caiaphas and that, after Jesus' arrest, he was taken first to Annas before Caiaphas had an opportunity to examine Jesus (vv. 13, 19). Annas had been deposed by the Romans in A.D. 15, but may have continued to exercise powerful influence. Caiaphas, his five sons, and one grandson of Annas, were in the succession of high priests. Thus, when, as in Acts 4:6, Annas is called "the high priest," it may be a recognition of his de facto political power, an honorary rather than a legal title (Luke 3:2; John 18:19).

When Saul was sent to Damascus to persecute the Christians, he went with letters to the synagogues there from "the high priest" in Jerusalem (Acts 9:2; 22:5; 26:12). The high priest then in office was Caiaphas, who was unaware of the role he played in the conversion of Saul. Nothing further is known concerning Caiaphas except that in some Christian circles a legend arose that he became a Christian.

P.L.G.

CAIN AND ABEL. Abel, possibly meaning "breath," but more probably "human kind." Cain, meaning "smith" or "metal worker," related in name only to the Kenites. Cain and Abel were sons of ADAM AND EVE, brothers, but not necessarily twins; the firstborn of the human race (Gen. 4:1-16).

Abel became "a keeper of sheep," whose offerings to Yahweh of "the firstlings of his flock and of their fat" was acceptable to the Lord (Gen. 4:4). The account does not say why. Perhaps, this is because meat sacrifices were prominent later at the tabernacle and temple (Heb. 11:4 attributes Abel's acceptance to faith). "Innocent" (RSV) and "righteous" (KJV) Abel was murdered by Cain, his brother (Matt. 23:35), a significant event that is memorialized in the phrase "the blood of Abel" (Luke 11:51).

Cain followed Adam's occupation as "a tiller of the ground" (Gen. 3:23; 4:2). His offering to Yahweh was "the fruit of the ground" (Gen. 4:3). "For Cain and his offering, he [Yahweh] had no regard" (Gen. 4:5). This made Cain "very angry, and his countenance fell," and he killed Abel. Why was Cain's sacrifice not regarded? Perhaps it had to do with the later secondary rank of bloodless sacrifices, but also, as shown by what follows, it had to do with Cain's temper and his lack of concern for his brother, "Am I my brother's keeper?" (Gen. 4:9). There is no connection between the descendants of Cain and their fate and the Canaanites who descended from Ham, the son of Noah (Gen. 10:6, 15-19).

Courtesy of the Fogg Art Museum, Harvard University

Sacrifice of Cain and Abel. A twelfth-century Romanesque pilaster capital from Moutier-Saint-Jean

P.L.G.

CALEB (meaning "dog"). (1) Caleb (Num. 13:6; I Chr. 4:15), the son of Jephunneh, represented Judah among the men who spied out Kadesh (Num. 13:1-14:10). Only JOSHUA and he returned with encouraging reports, and he alone of the twelve lived to enter Canaan (Num. 14:38). In contrast to the ten, Caleb is said to have had "a different spirit" and to have followed Yahweh "wholly" or "fully" (Num. 14:24; Deut. 1:36).

In the division of the land, Yahweh, through Joshua, gave Caleb the town of Hebron, from which he had to drive out "the three sons of Anak" (Josh. 15:13 ff.). Othniel, Caleb's nephew, captured neighboring Debir (Tell Beit Mirsim), and thereby won as wife Achsah, Caleb's daughter (Josh. 15:18). Associated with the name Caleb is a territory south of Judah called the Negeb of Caleb (I Sam. 30:14). The Chronicler, in recording Caleb's genealogy, attempted to give him a place in the tribe of Judah, but his father is known to be a Kenizite (Num. 32:12). However, Caleb is remembered for contributing numerous progeny to the people and for having been a man of fearless courage and of strong faith in Yahweh's promises of a land for Israel.

(2) Caleb, son of Hezron, a member of the tribe of Judah (I Chr. 2:18, 24). The name Ephrathah (Bethlehem, see Mic. 5:2) is given to Caleb's step-mother, whom he married, after his father's death.

These two Calebs may be the same person. The OT accounts do not make this clear.

P.L.G.

CALENDAR, LITURGICAL. See CHRISTIAN YEAR.

CALF, GOLDEN. A gold-plated or molded figure of a young bull (I Kings 12:28; II Kings 10:29), first used in Israelite worship at Mt. Sinai, and, later, at Dan and Bethel. Because of its impressive physical strength and sexual virility, the bull was associated closely, as a representation or throne-pedestal, with the gods throughout the ancient Near East from Egypt, Syria-Palestine, Asia Minor to Crete.

After the SINAI, solemn blood-ceremony in which the people of Israel had covenanted to do "all that the Lord has spoken" (Exod. 24:1-8), Moses left them for forty days and nights (Exod. 24:9-18; Deut. 9:13-21). The people concluded that Moses was not coming back. They demanded that Aaron "make us gods" to guide them out of the wilderness. Aaron collected their gold earrings, melted them, and formed a calf-like figure, which the people acclaimed to be the god who had brought them out of Egypt (Exod. 32:4-35; Deut. 9:16, 21; Neh. 9:13). The next morning, sacrifices were made to the calf figure, "a feast to the Lord," (Exod. 32:5) with eating, drinking, and sexual relations ("play" Exod. 32:6). (See Baal-peor, Num. 25:1-9 KJV.) The entire episode was regarded as a serious breach of the covenant and as idolatry: "having other gods before [or besides] me" (Exod. 20:3, 4). The punishment was the execution of three thousand men (Exod. 32:28, 35).

When the kingdom was divided, JEROBOAM, first king of Israel, made Shechem his residence and capital (I Kings 12:25)—but what could be his "Mount Moriah" (II Chr. 3:1)? He selected two ancient pilgrimage places, southern Bethel and northern Dan (I Kings 12:29, 32). Unable to duplicate the Ark of the Covenant, he made a calf of gold for each sanctuary (I Kings 12:28). His original intention may have been that these would be, like the ark, empty thrones or pedestals for Yahweh. This practice was not unknown in the ancient Near East (see BAAL). Jeroboam appointed priests for the shrines and instituted a calendar of festivals and feasts.

The biblical historians, who wrote from a Judean perspective, used the expression "the sins of Jeroboam, the son of Nebat" (II Kings 10:29, 31; 15:24, 28) to refer to Jeroboam's religious practices, thus linking these to the making of the golden calf at Sinai. It would appear, however, that Jeroboam attempted to be a Yahwist. He named his son Ahijah, meaning "my father is Yahweh."

Twelve bull-calves formed the base of the brazen sea at Solomon's Temple. These were not idols, but may have been understood as Yahweh symbols. The I Kings account of the shrines in Israel lacks elements of Canaanite worship. It may be that, in some sense, the bulls at Dan and Bethel were intended originally to be representative of or connected with Yahweh, despite how they may have come to be regarded in later history (Hos. 8:5-6; 13:2; II Kings 10:29; 17:16; II Chr. 11:15; 13:18).

A serious matter for NT Christians was, "Has God rejected his people," the Jews? Paul's answer was, "By no means!" (Rom. 11:1). Stephen concluded his address at a Jerusalem synagogue, "You stiff-necked people, . . . you always resist the Holy Spirit" (Acts 7:51). He cited as evidence the Exodus' making and worshiping of the calf. He compared that apostasy to the Crucifixion, the rejection, and the murder of Jesus (Acts 7:52).

P.L.G.

CALIGULA (A.D. 12-41). Roman Emperor from A.D. 37 to 40; successor to his granduncle, Tiberius. During childhood Gaius inherited the popularity of his late father, Germanicus, and became a darling of the military establishment, nicknamed by the soldiers caligula ("Little Boots"). The first half-year of his reign augured well for the future, but a serious illness caused a change of personality. Josephus writes that "with the passage of time he no longer thought of himself as an ordinary man, but was driven by the greatness of his power to deify himself."

Gaius cruelly persecuted Jews of Alexandria who refused him divine honors and, after offenses by Jews at Jamnia, he ordered the installation of his statue in Jerusalem's Temple. This dreadful sacrilege was prevented by the intervention of his life-long friend, Herod Agrippa. Gaius was assassinated by military tribunes of the Praetorian Guard.

J.L.P.

CALLING. The divine summons to an individual or group to enter into a meaningful fellowship with God and participate in the divine plan for human salvation. God consistently takes the initiative in summoning those who are chosen. Realizing that they are claimed as God's own possession, they understand that a specific historical destiny awaits them.

Calling in the Old Testament. The separation of individuals from presumably mediocre existence to direct involvement in God's own saving purpose begins with Abraham (Gen. 12:1-3). Suddenly Abraham is invited to embark on a pilgrimage that ushers him from the known security of his settled existence into the unknown. Abraham's call is confirmed in a promise of offspring and land that is frequently repeated in the OT. He will father a great people who will eventually claim the land of his present sojourning. (Though Gen. 12 lacks the verb "to call," it is present in Isa. 51:2 and Heb. 11:8, which refer to this event.)

A series of call-narratives is introduced by Exodus 3:1-4:17, with its portrayal of God's summons to Moses. "Called" from the burning bush (3:4), Moses is drawn into a dramatic encounter with the Holy involving visual and auditory perception. Moses is charged with the mission of delivering the Israelites from Egyptian bondage. Though he tries to resist the call by raising four objections (3:11, 13; 4:1, 10), God's sovereignty prevails. Thereupon the divinely empowered Moses labors to assist in his people's rescue. Subsequently, Moses is divinely "called" to Sinai's summit (Exod. 19:20) to receive the Law that will appreciably define Israel's existence and its relation with the Deity. Once the Israelites have tenuously settled into Canaan, their drive for liberation from oppressive forces (hostile neighbors) continues under the charismatic leadership of various judges who are divinely summoned and favored with God's spirit (for example, Othniel, Judg. 3:9-10; Gideon, 6:11-24, 34; Jephthah, 11:29). The leadership of Saul, Israel's first king, is similarly perceived (1 Sam. 11:5-7).

Reports about the visions of Amos (7:1-9; 8:1-3; 9:1-4), Isaiah (6:1-13), Jeremiah (1:4-19), and Ezekiel (1:4-28) attest to the divine summons of prophets into public vocations of far-reaching significance. Amos' sudden discovery of divine presence resembles Abraham's, and Jeremiah's resistance to God's initiative resembles Moses'. The prophets are called not to promote national deliverance but to speak messages of stern judgment so that God's rebellious people might return with renewed faith and obedience.

That God's calling reaches beyond isolated individuals to encompass the entire nation is clear from Hosea's interpretation of the Exodus as the people's vocational summons: "Out of Egypt I called my son" (11:1). Moreover, Second Isaiah affirms that Israel is called by God in such manner that even the welfare of other nations is addressed (41:9; 42:6; 48:15; 49:1; 54:6).

Calling in the New Testament. The Gospels affirm that certain people were called to a special vocation of following Jesus during his earthly ministry. Thus Matthew explains how Peter, Andrew, James, and John accepted the invitation to discipleship (4:18-22). Paul's first-person account of his call (Gal. 1:13-17) is paralleled by Luke's third-person narrative of Saul's conversion (Acts 9:1-22). Jesus' disclosure that he "came not to call the righteous, but sinners" (Mark 2:17) shaped earliest Christianity's approach to potential converts (Acts 2:38-39). In his letters Paul emphasizes that the Christian "upward call" (Phil. 3:14) into God's "kingdom and glory" (1 Thess. 2:12) is based on freely offered divine grace (Gal. 1:6, 15). The hope this offers struggling humanity is best expressed in Paul's statement that "in everything God works for good with those who love him, who are called according to his purpose" (Rom. 8:28). (Compare ELECTION.)

J.K.K.

CALVARY. See GOLGOTHA.

CALVIN, JOHN/CALVINISM. John Calvin, in French Jean Chauvin or Caulvin (1509-64), one of Protestantism's greatest theologians, author of the Institutes of the Christian Religion, PROTESTANTISM's most influential systematic theology.

Born in Noyon, France, Calvin studied at colleges de la Marche and de Montaigu in Paris. He was given Roman Catholic benefices at ages twelve and eighteen and seemed headed for a church career. However, his father sent him to the University of Orléans in 1528 to study law. About the same time, Calvin encountered evangelical ideas through his cousin Robert Olivetan, Melchior Wolman, Theodore Beza, and Lutheran books. When his father died in 1531, Calvin returned to Paris to pursue Greek, Hebrew, and Reformation ideas. His first book, On Mercy, 1532, reflected religion only obliquely.

In 1533 he received his Doctor of Law degree, experienced a "sudden conversion," and for helping Nicholas Cop spread evangelical ideas at the

Courtesy of the Presbyterian Historical Society

John Calvin

University of Paris had to flee the city. He resigned his benefices, became a wandering scholar, 1534–36, and in 1536 at Basel published his Institutes, a vigorous religious statement to inform Francis I of France that his Protestant subjects were truly following the gospel of Jesus Christ and that his persecution was in defiance of God's will. When Calvin visited Geneva that same year, Guillaume Farel urged him to stay. There he promoted the Protestant cause, 1536–38, until he and Farel were forced by political opponents to leave the city. Calvin lived as an exile in Strasburg, pastored a French refugee congregation, married Idelotte de Bure, became a friend of MARTIN BUCER, and represented Strasburg at conferences in Worms and Ratisbon.

Called back in 1541 to quell Geneva's political-religious disorders, Calvin insisted on more authority for the church, a theocratic form of government, and an externally pure church. He dominated the city until his death, though not without opposition from Roman Catholic sympathizers, the Libertines, and individuals with different religious views. Between 1542 and 1546 Calvin's stern disciplinary demands brought banishment to seventy-six people and death to fifty-eight. Geneva's Ecclesiastical Ordinances and Little Treatise on the Lord's Supper, 1541, second Catechism of the Church of Geneva, 1542, Treatise on Free Will and Necessity for Reforming the Church, 1545, new editions of the Institutes, and numerous commentaries on biblical books rapidly increased his fame and set the tone of Geneva's theocracy. The Second Catechism, the last edition of the Institutes, 1559, and the Gallican Confession, 1559, became standard doctrine for most of Europe's Reformed (as distinguished from Lutheran) churches. Calvin's most famed controversy was with MICHAEL SERVETUS, a Spanish theologian, primarily over the nature of the Trinity. Servetus could not accept the divinity of the Son on either rational or biblical grounds. Servetus' execution in Geneva, 1553, climaxed a long feud between Calvin and Servetus and tested and clinched Calvin's control of the city.

Although Calvin departed from LUTHER on the Lord's Supper, stressing a spiritual rather than physical presence of Christ, Calvin's basic theology derived heavily from Luther. But Calvin organized and systematized his views with different emphases. The SOVEREIGNTY OF GOD and ELECTION anchored Calvin's theology. Luther stressed justification by faith and forgiveness of sins. Calvin's aim was not salvation; God had already determined that in election. Rather it was to glorify God. God controls everything, is all-knowing, all-powerful, and present everywhere. God is pure, merciful, and just. Human beings are sinful, depraved by original and actual sin. They deserve condemnation, but God in mercy chooses some for election and leaves others to the damnation they deserve. No one knows the elect for sure, but faith, upright living, and participation in the sacraments are signs of election for Calvin. Scripture, unfolded through the Holy Spirit, is the source of divine truth. Faith is an act of God assuring humans of forgiveness and new life. Strict discipline and good works are means of glorifying God. Consequently Calvin sought to control Geneva in accordance with God's will in the entire Bible. The state is ordained by God to order society and to protect the church, but Calvin thought of both ministers and magistrates as servants of God and of the entire community in Geneva as the church. He wanted the godly to control governmental functions (see THEOCRACY), but insisted that church discipline belongs to the church. He eventually won the right to excommunicate through the consistory.

With church and state equated as the holy community, nonbelievers were invited to leave Geneva. Refugees devoted to Calvin replaced them, increasing the population by 50 percent to about nineteen thousand—a bastion of strength for Calvin. Lutheranism developed into territorialism with the state dictating in religion and education; Calvinism became an international model; God was to be glorified everywhere. Calvinism also provided a basis for resistance to ungodly regimes, exemplified in leaders like Admiral Coligny, William the Silent, and Oliver Cromwell. Calvin was not ordained. His only child died shortly after birth, 1542; his wife died seven years later. In 1559 Calvin established the Geneva Academy, which became the University of Geneva, a center for training thousands of clergy for the Reformed churches.

Calvinism refers to the religious influence of Calvin. His views inspired the HUGUENOTS in France; the PRESBYTERIANS in Scotland; the PURITANS in England and America; the BAPTISTS; and REFORMED CHURCHES in the Netherlands, Poland, Hungary, and parts of Germany. THEODORE BEZA continued Calvin's work in Geneva and JOHN KNOX promoted his doctrines in Scotland. The Church of England felt the influence of Calvin, particularly in the Puritan attempt to rid Anglicanism of Catholic vestiges, but reaction developed along opposite lines. Disputes over election resulted in ARMINIANISM in both Anglicanism and Methodism. Calvin's Institutes provided the doctrinal base for Calvin's influence; and the WESTMINSTER CATECHISMS and Confession of Faith, 1647-48, provided the most widely accepted formal statements of Calvinism.

C.M.

CAMBRIDGE PLATFORM. This document, the foundation of American Congregationalism, was written by the Cambridge Synod, which met a few times between 1646 and 1648, and included most of the PURITAN churches of the Massachusetts Bay Colony. Theologically it committed the churches to the WESTMINSTER CONFESSION.

It defined church polity as "the communion of churches with one another" in contrast to those strains of Puritanism that preferred Presbyterian or Baptist forms. Councils and synods were given advisory and admonitory powers but no coercive legal authority.

N.H.

CAMBRIDGE PLATONISTS. A small group of philosophical divines who played a mediating role in the turbulent religious life of seventeenth-century England. The group flourished at Cambridge University between 1633 and 1688. All but one had some association with Emmanuel College, Cambridge, a center of Puritanism. Although from PURITAN backgrounds, the Cambridge Platonists rejected dogmatic Calvinism. They represented a position between the Puritans and the High Church Anglicanism associated with Archbishop Laud (1573-1645). They were liberal and LATITUDINARIAN in that they rejected fanatical ENTHUSIASM as well as theological dogmatism and believed in liberty of conscience, toleration, and charity.

Unlike the Puritans, the Cambridge Platonists did not stress the utter "fallenness" of humanity. God created humans in the divine image, endowed with reason. Benjamin Whichcote delighted in saying that "the spirit of man is the candle of the Lord," and they sought to keep the lights of faith and reason in balance. They believed that the test of Christian belief is in the exercise of virtues such as modesty, humility, obedience to God, and charity to one's neighbor. The Cambridge Platonists included, in addition to Whichcote (1609-83), Nathanael Culverwel (1618-51), John Smith (1616-52), Ralph Cudworth (1617-88), and Henry More (1614-87).

J.L.

Courtesy of Bethany College

Alexander Campbell

CAMPBELL, ALEXANDER (1788-1866). Founder of the Christian Church (Disciples of Christ) and the Churches of Christ. Campbell was born in County Antrim, Ireland, on September 12 to Thomas and Jane Corneigle Campbell. His father was a Scotch Irish schoolmaster, his mother a French Huguenot.

In 1809, after a year of study at the University of Glasgow, Campbell arrived in America. He began preaching in 1810, and after organizing a church at Brush Run, Pennsylvania, he was licensed to preach. In 1811 he married Presbyterian Margaret Brown, but with the birth of their first child, they decided against infant baptism. They were immersed by local Baptists, and the Brush Run church affiliated with the Redstone Baptist Association.

Campbell came to believe that baptism was necessary for the remission of sins and began publishing the Christian Baptist in 1823. The Baptists excluded him in 1826, so he became independent. In 1827 he published a new translation of Scripture and in 1828 a hymnal. In 1830 he began publishing the Millennial Harbinger. Eventually he allied with James O'Kelley's Republican Methodists, Abner Jones' group of Baptists, and Barton Stone's Presbyterian followers to form the "Christian Connection." His chief work was The Christian System (1839).

N.H.

CAMP MEETING. A prominent feature of the Second GREAT AWAKENING, particularly in the South, camp meetings were religious gatherings in the woods for several days or a week. From the sacramental seasons at Gasper River (1800) and CANE RIDGE, Kentucky (1801), they became occasions for REVIVALS. Camp meetings were characteristic of the Holiness Movement. The National Camp Meeting Association for the Promotion of Christian Holiness was formed in 1866. Today they continue at various summer campgrounds around the country.

N.H.

CAMUS, ALBERT (1913–60). French writer and philosopher of EXISTENTIALISM, born in Algeria while it was a French département. He came to believe that human life has to be lived in an alien universe, so that it is essentially absurd, frustrating, and self-stultifying. But he combined with this pessimistic view a passionate belief in human dignity and moral values, however inconsistent that combination may have been. This led him to the doctrine of “metaphysical rebellion,” a form of protest atheism. His views are expressed in the philosophical essays, The Myth of Sisyphus (Eng. trans. 1955) and The Rebel (Eng. trans. 1954), and in such novels as The Plague (Eng. trans. 1948).

J.M.

CANA. A village in Galilee mentioned only in John's Gospel (2:1, 11; 4:46; 21:2). The name means “place of reeds.” Cana in Galilee was the location of two “signs” or miracles: (1) The changing of water into wine at a wedding (2:1-12). (Jesus' mother seems familiar with the family; perhaps the town was near Nazareth.) (2) The healing of a basilikos son (4:46-54). (The word basilikos means a “relative of the royal [Herodian] family” or a royal, military, or tax gathering official.) The father's exemplary faith in Jesus points to Jesus' universal saviorhood.

Cana has several possible sites. (1) Joshua 19:28 mentions Kanah, a town with a brook (Josh. 16:8) in northern Palestine. This may be the Kanah Josephus mentions as being near Tyre. (2) The Arabic Qana-el-Jelil (Cana of/in Galilee) refers to ruins five miles north of Sefphoris, overlooking a marshy plain where reeds grow abundantly. (3) Although the etymology of Kefr Kenna fails to support the claim, that modern village, four miles beyond Nazareth on the road to Capernaum and Bethsaida, is widely accepted as Cana. The location was convenient for pilgrims. This may account for its popularity as Cana in Galilee.

P.L.G.

CANAAN/CANAANITES. Canaan was the ancient name of the eastern Mediterranean coastal region from the northern borders of present-day Lebanon to the end of the arable land south of Gaza. Most ancient texts construe it as reaching no further inland than the Great Rift Valley.

Canaan in the Ancient Near Eastern Context. Linguistically and culturally, Canaan belonged to the world of greater SYRIA. Its language was a dialect of northwest Semitic and was closely akin to the languages of UGARIT on the Syrian coast, the inland city of Ebla, Phoenicia, Moab, and Israel itself. Similarly, its culture did not differ materially from that of Ugarit to the north. The Ugaritic texts from the fourteenth century B.C. have given us a rich insight into the religion of Phoenicia and Canaan. Centering on worship of the dying and rising god BAAL, it was a fertility religion suitable for an agricultural people settled in arable lowland areas. Phoenician texts coming from a much later time but from the same region refer to a hero named Canaan as the first Phoenician. The original name of Beirut was, according to a second-century B.C. Phoenician text, “Laodicea in Canaan.”

The Tell el-Amarna texts of Egypt (about 1375–1345 B.C.) make clear that Canaan of the late Bronze Age was a collection of small principalities, each centered around a city, governed by indigenous kings under Egyptian overlordship. The Canaanites had to contend always with nomads who filtered in through the network of city-states and at times clashed with them. In the Amarna texts, some of these nomads are known as hapiru, a word that many scholars link with the term “Hebrew.” Toward the end of the late Bronze Age, Egyptian texts begin to mention larger national entities that had evolved out of the earlier, more fragmentary city-state environment. Moab is mentioned during the time of Ramses II (about 1285 B.C.), Edom and Israel are mentioned by the pharaoh Mer-ne-Ptah (about 1224–1211 B.C.), and the Philistines appear in Egyptian records during the reign of Ramses III, who claims to have defeated them about 1175 B.C. All of this suggests that Canaan had begun to be absorbed into larger political units, each of which had its own dynastic rulership, and one of which was Israel. Except as a general geographical designation, Canaan ceased to exist around the turn of the first millennium B.C.

Canaan from the Point of View of Israel. Canaan is first mentioned in the Hebrew Bible not as a country but as a person. In Genesis 9:18 he is a grandson of Noah and the son of Ham; later in that chapter Canaan is cursed by Noah to be a slave to Shem and Japheth (vss. 25-27).

Although Abram went forth to the land of Canaan (Gen. 12:5) and successfully took up residence there among the native peoples of the place, the patriarchal narratives as a whole seem to have relatively vague notions of exactly who occupied the land. A more concrete early memory of Canaan is that found in Judges 5:19, in the so-called Song of Deborah (often dated as early as the twelfth century B.C.). It is a hostile memory—the very stars supported Deborah and Barak in their fight against a coalition of the kings of Canaan led by Sisera, the general of the army of Jabin, king of Canaan, who reigned in Hazor (Judg. 4:2). Although they worked in the seventh century B.C., the Deuteronomic historians drew upon older sources to recount the victories of Joshua over Jericho, Ai, and the whole of Canaan (Joshua 1–12). To them the Canaanites represented a profound threat to the integrity of Israel as a people of Yahweh, and in the name of the survival of Israel and of Yahwism they idealized the story of the acquisition of the land of Canaan by the people of Israel into a holy war (compare Deut. 7:1-2). More realistic accounts, however, such as Judges 1:1-2:5, make clear that Israel did not conquer all of Canaan at the time of Joshua's victories, and in fact, for good or for ill, lived alongside the Canaanites for centuries.

The Israelite Conquest of Canaan. That Israel came into possession of the land of Canaan is a manifest fact, but the process by which that occurred has been the subject of much recent scholarly debate.

(a) Conquest. Archaeologists such as W. F. Albright, G. E. Wright, and Paul Lapp argue that Israel conquered the whole of Palestine with a swift military sweep much like that described in Joshua. These scholars point to evidences of massive destruction and subsequent reoccupation by a different people at sites such as Bethel (Judg. 1:22-26), Hazor (Josh. 11:1-15), and Lachish (Josh. 10:31-32). The problem with this position lies in the fact that at some of the key sites supposedly conquered by Joshua, such as Jericho, Ai, Arad, and Heshbon, neither an occupation nor a destruction layer exists at the end of the late Bronze Age. Furthermore, even at those sites that do show destruction layers, it is not possible to say for certain that Israel inflicted the destruction.

(b) Gradual occupation. German scholarship, particularly centering around the work of A. Alt and M. Noth, has generally taken the view that the Israelite occupation of Palestine was a gradual process of infiltration and settlement in the thinly populated hill country, with the gradual assimilation of the local Canaanite communities. Though occasional military conquests might have occurred, such as at Bethel, on the whole Israel moved only slowly toward a unified national identity. The account of Judges 1:1-2:5 conforms much more closely to this model, for it records local tribal conquests and by no means reflects a unified all-Israel outlook.

A Hapiru Uprising. The most recent theory regarding the conquest of Canaan is associated with the name of the American scholar George Mendenhall, and is favored by John Bright as well. According to this model, the nomads that were troubling the Canaanite city-states in the Tell el-Amarna texts were really dispossessed bands of indigenous people living on the margins of the Canaanite city-state system. When a new band of hapiru arrived from across the Jordan with an account of the Exodus and of a covenant with a sovereign God, Yahweh, the marginals were galvanized into action. In cases such as Hazor and Lachish, they overcame Canaanite cities, and in other cases they simply absorbed their populaces. Both of the latter two theories about the Israelite triumph over Canaan have in their favor the high likelihood that an all-Israel perspective emerged only after what had once been weak and scattered tribes had coalesced into a unified nation.

W.S.T.

CANE RIDGE REVIVAL. "Sacramental season" in Bourbon County, Kentucky, in August 1801, noted for its unusual emotional and physical manifestations. Presbyterian BARTON W. STONE, converted under James McGready and an observer at the July 1800 revival at his Gasper River Church, adopted McGready's methods and called the meeting at Cane Ridge. Presbyterian, Methodist, and Baptist ministers preached to twenty-five thousand people for a week. It became both a symbol and an impetus for the Second GREAT AWAKENING.

N.H.

CANON. A priest on the staff of a cathedral or collegiate church. Secular canons are clergymen who live together under a rule or discipline and provide the worship leadership for the cathedral. Regular canons live together near the church in a monastic life-style. All Anglican canons are secular.

J.C.

CANON. Old Testament Canon and Authority. The term "canon" transliterates a Greek term meaning rule, originally a carpenter's measuring stick. An older Hebrew term with virtually the same spelling designated a measuring reed about nine feet long. Since the fourth century the term has come to be used in reference to that collection of books recognized by the church as its authority but most often designated simply as the BIBLE, that is, the Book. Every book in the canon was considered authoritative but not every authoritative book was in the canon. In the history of Judaism the Law has always held the place of preeminent authority, followed by the Prophets and then the Writings. Christians recognized the entire OT as their Bible from the earliest of times. Modern Christianity is divided in its attitude toward the canon as authority. Catholic Christianity sees the canon as an important source of authority along with the TRADITION of the church, while Protestant and evangelical Christianity tends to view the canon as the sole authority.

Old Testament Canon. The formation of the Jewish canon was hundreds of years in process. The oldest portions of the Pentateuch are regarded by some as having been written in the ninth century B.C. and by others as early as the fourteenth. Some regard the latest portions to be the postexilic prophets written in the fifth century B.C., while others consider Daniel to be as late as the second century B.C. The book of Psalms seems to reflect this extremely long process of canonization spanning a thousand years from the Psalm attributed to Moses (90) to that written during the Babylonian exile (137). It is significant that the people later called Israel do not claim to have produced any writings from the time of Abraham to that of Moses, although we now know that writing existed in highly sophisticated form since before the time of Abraham (as the recently discovered Ebla tablets have shown).

Nothing is known of the process of canonization itself except that the PENTATEUCH was considered uniquely authoritative from the beginning, and other books were collected through the centuries as they were produced and determined to be inspired and useful. A number of books are mentioned in the OT that are not preserved in the canon, such as the Book of Jasher (Josh. 10:13) and the book of the acts of Solomon (I Kings 11:41; see also Num. 21:14 and I Chr. 29:29). About fifteen such books are mentioned throughout the OT. The oldest list of OT books accepted in the Jewish canon comes from Melito, a bishop of Sardis in A.D. 170. His list omits Esther, Lamentations, and Nehemiah, although Lamentations may have been regarded as a part of Jeremiah, and Nehemiah as a part of Ezra. His order of books also differs from that found in modern English Bibles.

Differences exist today in the order and content of the OT, not only among Catholics and Protestants, but also in the Hebrew, Greek, and Latin texts from which the translations are made. The modern English Protestant Bible follows the order of the Latin VULGATE and the content of the Hebrew Bible. The Catholic Bible follows the Vulgate in both content and order of books, thus including the APOCRYPHA. The following chart shows the differences that exist in the content and order of the original texts:

Hebrew

Law—Genesis—Deuteronomy

Prophets—Former: Joshua—II Kings Latter: Major—Isaiah, Jeremiah, Ezekiel
 Minor—Hosea—Malachi

Writings—Poetry and Wisdom: Psalms, Job, Proverbs
 Rolls: Ruth, Song of Solomon, Ecclesiastes, Lamentations, Esther History: Daniel, Ezra, Nehemiah, I and II Chronicles

Greek Septuagint (includes the Apocrypha)

Taken from Codex Vaticanus (fourth century)

Law—Genesis—Deuteronomy
 History—Joshua—II Chronicles
 Poetry and Wisdom—Psalms, Proverbs, Ecclesiastes, Song of Solomon, Job
 Additional—Esther
 Minor Prophets—Hosea—Malachi
 Major Prophets—Isaiah, Jeremiah, Lamentations, Ezekiel, Daniel

Taken from Codex Alexandrinus (fifth century)

Law—Genesis—Deuteronomy
 History—Joshua—II Chronicles
 Minor Prophets—Hosea—Malachi
 Major Prophets—Isaiah, Jeremiah, Ezekiel, Daniel
 Additional—Esther
 Poetical and Wisdom—Psalms, Job, Proverbs, Ecclesiastes, Song of Solomon

Taken from Codex Sinaiticus (fourth century)
 The OT listing is mutilated.

Latin Vulgate

Has the same order as modern English Bibles.
 Includes the Apocrypha interspersed throughout.

It will be evident from a reading of this chart that there is no uniformity of order in the Greek OT, either in terms of individual books or of categories of books. The Hebrew does not contain the Apocrypha, while both the Greek and the Latin do. It has been argued that the OT canon's third division, the Writings, was not closed until the Pharisaic gathering of rabbis at Jamnia in A.D. 90, thus remaining open while most of the NT was being written. However, the meeting at Jamnia did not discuss the canon as such and, at any rate, had no decision-making authority. Jewish authorities have always considered the canon to have been closed with the last of the prophets in the days of Malachi. Thus, they have never accepted the Apocrypha.

New Testament Canon and Authority. The various books and letters that make up the NT canon, although considered authoritative at the time of their composition, were not appealed to as sources of authority by early church writers until late in the second century. The question of their canonicity was not discussed until this time, and extant lists were not compiled of NT canonical books until the fourth century (assuming the Muratorian Canon is not second century in date). Authority and canonicity were two independent issues in the early history of Christianity. By the fourth century everything canonical was considered authoritative, but in earlier centuries the question of authority was closely connected to living apostolic tradition. The earliest writers, the APOSTOLIC FATHERS, who lived in the latter part of the first century and the beginning of the second, write in the generation of living apostles or men who had known them, and these Fathers consider themselves to be also authoritative. They make no appeal to NT books for the purpose of establishing authority for their message. They write from the perspective of co-authorities. The early APOLOGISTS, who wrote their defenses of Christianity in the early and mid-second century, make no appeal to NT books for sources of authority either. The reason is that they are arguing from a philosophical point of view to a non-Christian audience that would not acknowledge the authority of the NT books if they were appealed to. It is only in the later Apologists, toward the close of the second century, that NT books begin to be employed as sources of authority, and it is only at this time that questions of canonicity begin to arise. The primary reason is the emergence of Gnosticism as a literary force that challenges mainline Christianity on its interpretation of Scripture, and both make their appeal to the authority of the text. Naturally questions of canon arise at this time. The Gnostics began to produce their own books of Scripture, giving greater impetus to the mainline church to determine which books are to be regarded as Scripture.

New Testament Canon. More books are mentioned in the NT than appear in the canon itself. Paul mentions a prior letter to the Corinthians in I Corinthians 5:9, and a letter to the Laodiceans is referred to in Colossians 4:16. Christian history has never claimed documents from more than three of the original twelve apostles (Peter, John, and Matthew). It is not unreasonable to assume that the others wrote some material that never became a part of the canon. Such a belief formed the basis of third-century apocryphal NT books. As with the OT, the process of the formation of the NT canon is hidden in obscurity. No lists of the canon have yet been found from the third century, but a number appear in the fourth. The earliest list of only our twenty-seven books was produced in A.D. 367 by Athanasius of Alexandria, but, unlike ours, it places Hebrews after II Thessalonians. The first list to correspond exactly to our NT in both order and content comes from Amphilochius of Iconium in A.D. 380. He introduces the list by saying, "I shall tell you each of the inspired books," and after listing the twenty-seven mentions that some say Hebrews and the Revelation of John are spurious. Distinctions among accepted, unaccepted, and doubtful books become prominent in the fourth century and are clearly evidenced in the writings of Eusebius of Caesarea.

It is clear from extant NT manuscripts and the writings of the early church authors that each locality had its own collection of books. Alexandria, for example, as seen in Codex Alexandrinus, used I and II Clement in addition to the twenty-seven. When viewed together these differing local canons had a number of books in common. This group of commonly held books eventually became, by definition, a general canon, that is, one acknowledged by all. Local canons continued to differ for centuries, because local texts continued to differ, but the general canon tended to become uniform with the passing of time. Some of this may have had to do with the standardization of the Byzantine text of Lucian in the fourth century. The activity of the Holy Spirit in this process has been maintained by Christian churches throughout its history.

There was no uniform order of books in the early church. The four Gospels, however, appear in the order Matthew, Mark, Luke, and John in most of the ancient sources. More than twenty different arrangements of the Pauline corpus have been found in Greek, Latin, and Coptic manuscripts, and more than 284 different sequences of scriptural books appear in Latin manuscripts alone. Until recently, most modern editions of the Greek NT placed the Pauline corpus after the General Epistles.

J. R. M.

CANON CRITICISM. See BIBLICAL CRITICISM.

CANONICAL HOURS. Set hours of the day devoted to prayer and meditation, ordained by the church on the basis of apostolic tradition. The early church probably followed the Jewish custom of prayer three times a day, at the third, sixth, and ninth hours. The canonical hours generally are observed by readings from the Psalms, the use of other scriptural selections, and collects and prayers.

J. C.

CANONIZATION. The process of declaring a deceased Christian believer to be a "saint," that is, certainly saved and now in heaven with the Lord. The cult or veneration of the saints developed in both the Roman Catholic and Eastern Orthodox churches, although Vatican II severely reduced the "calendar" of saints.

J. C.

CANON LAW. In the polity of the Roman Catholic church, a body of legal regulations that are no longer exercised by the ecclesiastic hierarchy. These laws are, in the modern world, exercised by the state and secular courts. The provisions of canon law are inoperative, although the church still claims these laws to be valid. Canon law deals with relations of church and state, the legal rights of heretics, the church's jurisdiction over its priests and their exclusion from secular legal sanctions, and other matters over which the church has lost control since the sixteenth century.

J. C.

CANTERBURY. County and cathedral city in Kent, England, archiepiscopal SEE of the PRIMATE of the Church of England. On the Stour River, fifty-four miles east-southeast of London, it is one of England's oldest cities; called Cantwaraburh, "town of the Kentish people," in the sixth century. AUGUSTINE OF CANTERBURY, a missionary sent with forty companions to Britain by Pope Gregory I, made Canterbury his residence in A.D. 597. He became archbishop in 601, and on the site of an ancient Roman Basilica, presented to him by King Ethelbert, Augustine consecrated the primitive edifice of England's later magnificent Canterbury Cathedral.

England's archbishops traditionally have been crowned on Augustine's chair in Corona Chapel, on the east end of the cathedral. Lanfranc, the first Norman archbishop, built a grander church in the eleventh century—enlarged by his successor Anselm and then destroyed by fire in 1174. Over the next three centuries, William of Sens, and other architects restructured and restored the cathedral, though damaged repeatedly by fire and military action. In 1942 it suffered damage in a German air raid. The various stages of the present 522-foot-long cathedral, with a nave measuring 178 by 71 feet, can still be traced. In 1170 Archbishop THOMAS Á BECKET was murdered in the cathedral. His tomb became a mecca for thousands of pilgrims, vividly described in Geoffrey Chaucer's fourteenth-century Canterbury Tales. Henry VIII ravaged Becket's shrine in Trinity Chapel in 1538, confiscated its treasured relics, and burned his bones. C.M.

Courtesy of Religious News Service

Canterbury Cathedral

CANTICLE OF THE SUN. See FRANCIS OF ASSISI.

CANTICLES. Hymns or songs used liturgically that are derived from Scripture other than the Psalms.

They are usually similar to the Psalms, for example, the BENEDICTUS (of Zechariah), the MAGNIFICAT (of Mary), and the NUNC DIMITTIS (of Simeon). Portions of the OT are also used as canticles in Roman Catholic services. J.C.

CANTICLES. See SONG OF SOLOMON.

CANTOR. A choir member who intones the psalms and other chants in a liturgical service in Roman Catholic, Episcopal (Anglican), and Lutheran services. Before the fourth century, this was done by the clergy, but the rise of complex liturgies led to specialization. A cantor performs similar services in Jewish liturgies.

J.C.

CAPERNAUM. A lakeside Galilean city where, according to the Synoptic Gospels, so much of Jesus' ministry took place that Matthew (9:1) called it "his own city." (Compare Mark 2:1, "at home.")

Capernaum has one of the best-preserved synagogues, a two-story building, sixty-five feet long, carefully studied and partly restored in the 1920s. The third-century A.D. structure was built of limestone brought from some distance and erected on a foundation of basalt, the local, black, volcanic rock. The foundation may be that of the synagogue in which Jesus taught. The decorations are elaborate and varied—geometric, floral, and vegetative. The rabbis held that Capernaum was the seat of the "Minim" sectaries. Recently an octagonal building, probably a fourth-century A.D. church, has been uncovered and is said to enclose Peter's house, where Jesus often stayed. An inscription was found on a pillar reading: "Alpheus, son of Zebedee, son of John, made this column. On him be blessing."

Capernaum was an important regional city, a home port for a commercial fishing fleet, and a distribution point for surrounding, rich, agricultural lands. It lay on a major highway going east three miles, to the mouth of the Jordan River and Bethsaida and on to Damascus. Westward, the road mounted the hills of Galilee, through Cana and Nazareth and the Esraelon, to Ptolemais-Accho, the Mediterranean port (modern Acre).

It is understandable that in Capernaum there would have been Roman centurions (Matt. 8:5; Luke 7:1-2) and Roman "tax offices," where Matthew (Levi) worked and where there were "sinners" of many sorts (Matt. 9:9-10). Andrew, Peter, James, and John lived in Capernaum (Mark 1:6-20). The people of Capernaum witnessed many of Jesus' healing miracles, even raisings from the dead. The Sermon on the Mount was delivered nearby; also Jesus' day-long teaching and the feeding of thousands. Even so, Jesus commented on the failure of Capernaum to repent. He said, "It shall be more tolerable on the day of judgment for the land of Sodom than for you" (Matt. 11:24; compare Luke 10:13-15).

P.L.G.

CAPITAL SINS/CAPITAL VIRTUES. See CARDINAL SINS/CARDINAL VIRTUES.

CAPPADOCIAN FATHERS. The joint name usually given to BASIL THE GREAT, his brother GREGORY OF NYSSA, and their friend GREGORY NAZIANZUS. They were among the dominant theological figures of the fourth century and played important roles in the controversies regarding the Trinity (in which they refuted ARIANISM) and Christology (in which they opposed the views of the APOLLINARIANS). Often forgotten is Basil's older sister, Macrina, who was the force behind his decision to follow the monastic life and whom Gregory of Nyssa called the Teacher.

J.G.

CAPTIVITY. See EXILE.

CAPUCHINS. One of several orders born in attempts to reform the Franciscans, returning to the original practices of St. Francis. The Capuchin movement began within the Observant Franciscans in the sixteenth century and was constituted as an independent order in 1619.

J.G.

CARDINAL. Ecclesiastical official ranking just below the pope in the Roman Catholic hierarchy. The COLLEGE OF CARDINALS elects a new pope upon a vacancy in that office. Cardinals are created by the pope and selected by standards similar to those for selecting bishops, although no one of illegitimate birth may be made a cardinal. The candidate for cardinal must also have held ORDERS (even if minor orders) in the church for at least one year and have no children or grandchildren, even by a former, lawful marriage. He must not be closely related to any other cardinal. Cardinals serve for life, although since Vatican II those of advanced age are not permitted to take part in papal elections. Cardinals are divided into three orders: cardinal deacons, cardinal priests, and cardinal bishops. The ranking cardinal bishop is dean of the Sacred College. When the papacy is vacant, the cardinals administer the church.

J.C.

CARDINAL SINS/CARDINAL VIRTUES. Cardinal sins are the capital sins, which show a strong inclination to selfishness, debauchery, sensualism, hedonism, and lasciviousness. The seven cardinal virtues concern virtuous living, and by a negative parallelism the seven cardinal sins concern actions that lead to indecent, gross, and shameless living.

Cardinal or capital sins are vices that lead a person on to other sins. The term "capital" applied to these sins is understood by Thomas Aquinas to come from the Latin caput or source. Such vices are, therefore, the source of many other sins.

Traditionally, the cardinal sins are called the seven deadly sins. They are usually enumerated as pride, covetousness (or avarice), lust, anger, gluttony, envy, and acedia (or sloth). These seven sins were much more emphasized before the Reformation than they have been since. Cardinal sins endanger a person's virtue and are the fountainhead of a life-style that leads to a multitude of sins.

Cardinal virtues are the chief moral virtues: prudence, justice, fortitude, and temperance. Prudence enables the Christian to form correct judgments about what we must do or not do. Justice disposes the believer to give to all what is due to them. Fortitude helps the Christian to do what is right in spite of all difficulties. Temperance guides the believer to control desires and prevents the abuse of lawful pleasures. To these four cardinal virtues are sometimes added the three theological virtues of faith, hope, and love. The three theological virtues are said in Catholic theology to be infused into the soul in baptism. Taken together, the theological and cardinal virtues are seven great virtues. J.C.

CAREY, WILLIAM (1761–1834). A Baptist missionary to India. Born on August 17 in Paulerspury, Northamptonshire. Baptized as an infant in the Church of England, he became a Baptist about 1783 and served as pastor in Moulton, along with teaching school and making shoes. In 1789 he transferred to the Baptist church in Leicester and in 1792 wrote An Enquiry into the Obligations of Christians to Use Means for the Conversion of the Heathens, which led to the founding of the Baptist Missionary Society.

He and Dr. John Thomas were its first missionaries, arriving in Calcutta in 1793. The next year Carey became self-supporting as superintendent of an indigo plant. In 1800 he and his family moved to the Danish territory of Frederiksnagar. In 1801 he was appointed to teach Bengali, Sanskrit, and Marathi at Fort William College.

An incredible linguist, he translated the Bible into six languages, parts of it into twenty-nine more, wrote seven grammars, and compiled three dictionaries. He also fought infanticide and suttee. He died on June 9.

N.H.

CARLSTADT, ANDREAS (1480?–1541). Senior colleague and volatile friend-foe of LUTHER at Wittenberg. He studied at Erfurt, Cologne, and Wittenberg, where he became professor of philosophy. Influenced by Luther, he rejected Thomistic thought and attacked the papacy. He helped Luther at Leipzig, 1519, and was condemned in the bull against Luther in 1520. While Luther was at the Wartburg, 1521–22, Carlstadt married, celebrated mass in peasant's garb, urged the laity to help themselves to bread and wine, criticized education, lived as a peasant, and upheld personal revelation as superior to written Scripture. Luther disapproved.

Carlstadt adopted a memorial view of the Lord's Supper and was forced twice to leave Wittenberg. He ended his career teaching at Basel.

C.M.

CARMELITES. A religious order founded on Mount Carmel early in the thirteenth century. At first they were strictly eremitical (of, relating to, or befitting a hermit), following the example of Elijah, whom they later claimed as their founder. When conditions in Palestine became unsafe, they moved to western Europe, where they eventually followed the example of the Franciscans (see FRANCIS OF ASSISI) and DOMINICANS, and thus joined the ranks of the Mendicants. In 1452, a feminine branch was added to the order. By the sixteenth century, much of the original fervor and rigor had been lost, and a reform movement began under the leadership of St. TERESA OF AVILA. She recruited the help of St. JOHN OF THE CROSS to reform the masculine branch of the order. The result was the separate order of the Discalced Carmelites—so called because they wore sandals instead of shoes. This became a formal order in 1593. Fifty years later, the movement of the Strict Observance reformed the older order. They are now one of the main Roman Catholic monastic orders, particularly among women, and are involved in extensive missionary work.

J.G.

CARMEL, MOUNT. An impressive wooded elevation referred to in ancient Egyptian, Assyrian, and Israelite texts. Jutting northwest into the Mediterranean Sea, it splits the Palestinian coastland into two sections—the northward Plain of Acco and the southward plains of Sharon and Philistia.

Mount Carmel heads a thirteen-mile mountain range on which it has conferred its name. Consisting of hard porous limestone, it attains a maximum elevation of 1,742 feet at its southeastern extremity and falls to an elevation of 470 feet at its northwestern promontory. Its base comes within 600 feet of the Mediterranean. Thus, commercial and military traffic ordinarily traversed the Carmel range on inland passes rather than risk using the shore road to become the easy target of hostile forces commanding Carmel's slopes. Contained within Asher's southern territorial limit (Josh. 19:26), Mount Carmel was sparsely inhabited in historical times. Caves in its lower western slope at Wadi el-Mugharah, however, have yielded Stone Age skeletons.

Since the lists of three Egyptian pharaohs (Thutmosis III, Ramses II, and Ramses III) mention Mount Carmel under the name Rosh Qidshu ("holy cape"), its character as an ancient sanctuary is implied. The designation of Mount Carmel as Ba'li-ra'si ("Baal of the promontory") in the Assyrian annals of Shalmaneser III certifies its sacral significance. While he camped there in 841 B.C., he received tribute from Israel's king Jehu. Recognized by Shalmaneser as the border between Israel and Tyre, this holy terrain hosted Elijah's triumphant contest against the prophets of Baal that established Yahweh's sovereignty at Baal's expense (I Kings 18:19-40). Elisha is also linked with Carmel (II Kings 2:25; 4:25).

Mount Carmel is famous for beautiful orchards cultivated on its slopes, and its fertility is celebrated in the imagery of Song of Solomon 7:5; Isaiah 35:2; and Jeremiah 50:19. Yet three prophetic texts portending judgment (Isa. 33:9; Amos 1:2; Nah. 1:4) figuratively speak of Carmel's vegetation as being victimized by drought.

J.K.K.

CARMICHAEL, AMY (1867-1951). The famed poet and missionary to India was born on December 16, the eldest of seven children of David and Catherine Jane Filson Carmichael. She was baptized a Presbyterian in Millisle, County Down, Northern Ireland, on January 19, 1868.

Influenced by the Keswick Movement, she arrived in India on November 9, 1895, under the Church of England Zenana Missionary Society and the Keswick Missionary Committee. She served without furlough until her death on January 18.

In 1901 she began her work rescuing girls who had been "married to the gods" by their parents. In 1918 she began accepting boys also. Eventually in 1926 her work became an independent faith mission known as Dohnavur Fellowship. She wrote a total of thirty-five books, thirteen of them after a fall in 1931 rendered her an invalid. Most are poetry.

N.H.

CARROLL, JOHN (1735-1815). The first American Roman Catholic bishop was from a distinguished Maryland family. The fourth of seven children of Daniel and Eleanor Darnall Carroll, he was educated by his mother and at Bohemia Manor on the Pennsylvania border.

He entered St. Omer's, a school for English Catholics, in France in 1748. Beginning in 1753 he spent two years as a JESUIT novice in Watten, France, and then studied in Liège for three years, before returning to teach at St. Omer's in 1758. He was ordained at Liège about 1767. Wishing to see his mother and realizing that the Americans were about to declare their independence, he returned to Maryland in 1774 after Pope Clement XIV had suppressed the Jesuits on August 16, 1773.

Carroll's Address to the Roman Catholics of the United States of America (1784) was well received, and he was named prefect-apostolic and superior of the American Jesuit Mission on June 9, 1784, by Pope Pius VI. He was elected bishop on November 14, 1789, and consecrated August 15, 1790. In 1791 he presided over the first American synod. In 1808 he became archbishop. Firm in his attachment to Rome and orthodoxy, yet progressive in practical matters, he advocated a vernacular liturgy and an Americanized church. In 1791 he established Georgetown University to educate American men.

Courtesy of Georgetown University

John Carroll

N.H.

CARTER, JIMMY (1924- ). James Earl Carter, Jr., the thirty-ninth president of the United States (1977-81) was born in Plains, Georgia, on October 1. A former governor of Georgia, Carter was little known nationally before being chosen the Democratic candidate in 1976. He was, while in office, and remains, a modest but sincere and attractive Protestant Evangelical with a strong social conscience. In 1976, he attracted a large vote from the rising political Evangelical wing, but proved too moderate for the increasingly vocal and right-wing leadership of the Moral Majority and similar religious movements who voted for Ronald Reagan over Carter in the 1980 election.

Carter graduated from the U.S. Naval Academy and after service in nuclear submarines resigned his commission in 1953. He became a successful peanut farmer before entering politics. Carter's service as a Georgia state senator and governor established a record of financial conservatism and social liberalism. He was a strong supporter of racial justice and a leader in creating the "new South," in which blacks were integrated into state government. Carter married Rosalyn Smith on July 7, 1946, and they have four children, John, James, Jeffrey, and Amy. A member of the Baptist church, Carter remains active in church programs.

J.C.

CARTESIAN. See DESCARTES, RENÉ.

CARTHUSIANS. One of the strictest of Roman Catholic monastic orders, founded by St. Bruno, who in 1084 began a small monastic community in the valley of Chartreuse, near Grenoble, France. The name of the order is derived from "Chartreuse," and to this day its main house is La Grande Chartreuse, whose prior, elected by the monks of that particular house, is the general of the entire order. There is also a general chapter, with representatives from all the houses, which meets annually. English Carthusian monasteries are also called Charterhouses, after the Grande Chartreuse. There is a feminine branch, although it is much smaller than its male counterpart.

The Carthusians are vowed to silence, except in common worship and on great feast days, when there are set periods of conversation. They spend most of their time in their cells, where they study, pray, sleep, and eat in private. Their food, prepared by lay brothers whose rule is not as strict, is usually served through a window in their cells. On feast days there are common meals, but never any meat. In general, their life has changed very little from the time of their founding.

J.G.

CARTWRIGHT, PETER (1785–1872). The famed Methodist circuit rider was born on September 1 in Virginia to Justinian and Mrs. Wilcox Cartwright. In 1793 they settled in Kentucky, where at sixteen Peter was converted. He was given an exhorter's license in 1802 and became an itinerant in 1803.

He was ordained deacon (1806) and elder (1808) by FRANCIS ASBURY. In 1808 he married Frances Gaines. He was presiding elder in Illinois. He wrote his Autobiography (1857) and Fifty Years as a Presiding Elder (1871).

N.H.

CARY, ALICE (1820–71). With her sister Phoebe Cary (1824–71), she became known as a writer of hymns and novels. Alice was born on April 26 and Phoebe on September 4 near Cincinnati, Ohio. They were two of nine children of Robert and Elizabeth Jessup Cary.

The Poems of Alice and Phoebe Carey (sic) were published in 1849. Shortly thereafter the sisters moved to New York City, where their Sunday evening receptions became popular. Alice published five volumes of poetry, plus short stories and sketches of life in Ohio (Clovernook, 1852; The Clovernook Children, 1855; and Pictures of Country Life, 1859) and novels (Hagar, 1852; Married, Not Mated, 1856; and

The Bishop's Son, 1867). Both were active in abolition and "woman's" rights.

Alice's best-known works are the "Dying Hymn," and "Earth with Its Dark and Dreadful Ills." Phoebe's hymn "One Sweetly Solemn Thought" is most often reprinted. Alice died on February 12 and Phoebe on July 31, of the same year.

N.H.

CASSOCK. A long, narrow robe with long sleeves, buttoned down the front and generally black, worn by clergy under a surplice when conducting worship. In the Catholic church, the pope wears a white cassock, and cardinals wear scarlet ones. Bishops wear purple cassocks, and choir members, robes of various colors.

J.C.

CASTE. The social system of South Asia, rooted in HINDUISM. Caste is actually two things: (1) varna (color)—the broad division of society into categories of descending purity; they are Brahmin (priest), Kshatriya (warrior), Vaishya (merchant), Shudra (laborer), and Outcaste (traditionally known as "untouchable," but now often called "Harijan," meaning literally "children of God"); and (2) jāti, or birth group. Every varna contains many jāti. Each jāti has a set of occupations, rituals, customs, and dietary laws that set it apart. Subcastes, or groups of jāti, are ideologically and economically related to one another, but do not intermarry.

The ideology of caste is rooted in the Hindu belief in KARMA (psychic product of action) and REINCAR-NATION. Everyone has already lived many lives and will live many more. How well one follows the DHARMA, or law of one's present existence, determines one's karma. Good actions generate good karma and assure rebirth in a better caste; bad actions produce bad karma and rebirth lower in the caste system, in hell, or as an animal or ghost. The dharma of a Brahmin is to be a priest, the dharma of a Kshatriya is to fight and rule, and so on. Myth relates that the castes were made from parts of a giant's body; the first Brahmin from the mouth, the first Kshatriya from the arms, the first Vaishya from the thighs, and the first Shudra from the feet. The actual heritage of the castes comes from India's early history. In the latter part of the second millennium B.C., Aryan invaders speaking Sanskrit conquered India and its Dravidian peoples, who had built the Indus Valley civilization. Recent research has uncovered great Dravidian contributions to the subsequent civilization of India. Dravidian culture influenced much of the religious system, including Sanskrit, the sacred language. The invaders' name for themselves, ārya, lost some of its racial connotations as Dravidians were assimilated into all parts of the caste system. Still, modern high-caste Indians identify themselves and their light skin with the Aryan invaders.

Subsequent history affected the caste system, but did not displace it. BUDDHISM arose as a reform of Hinduism and rejected caste, but the new religion died out in India. Later converts to ISLAM, SIKHISM, Christianity, and Buddhism formed separate groups, which Hindus regard as castes.

Today ideas and attitudes toward caste are changing. Jāti related by dietary or religious customs have discussed intermarriage, and many younger Indians have some say in choosing a mate. Younger Indians especially are experiencing conflict between the dictates of their caste and their loyalties to class or nation. The old ideology of caste purity is giving way to notions of race, and members of higher castes believe themselves to be genetically superior.

K./M.C.

CASTOR AND POLLUX. Also called the Dioscuri, meaning "the Twin Brothers" (RSV). The word is used once in the Bible (Acts 28:11) as the "sign" (KJV) or "figurehead" (RSV) of a ship from Alexandria, probably a grain carrier. Paul was a passenger on it from Malta to Puteoli en route to Rome. To Romans, the Dioscuri were twin sons of Jupiter by Leda. Sailors claimed Castor and Pollux as their own particular deities, holding that they could be seen in heavenly transformation as the constellation of Gemini or the twins. Phosphoric lights playing on masts and sails were regarded as appearances of the twins. Sacrifices were made to them to obtain fair winds and rescue in case of shipwreck.

P.L.G.

CASUISTRY. In theology casuistry refers to the bearing of general moral principles upon specific and unique cases—for example, killing or lying. The obligatory practice of confession of sin in the late Middle Ages made the study of casuistry especially imperative in the training of priests. The sixteenth and seventeenth centuries saw the appearance of highly technical manuals for dealing with particular cases of conscience. They often were logically brilliant but highly abstract and had little relationship to real life. Moral reflection too often was reduced to logical hairsplitting and casuistry received a bad name ("finding good reasons for approving bad actions"). Among the most important systems of casuistry is that known as PROBABILISM, advocated by St. Alphonsus Liguori in the eighteenth century. Defenders of situation ethics reject moral casuistry as too rigorous and legalistic. However, when its proper limitations are recognized, most moral theologians, Catholic and Protestant, consider casuistry to be indispensable to moral reflection and guidance.

J.L.

CATACOMBS. A word of unknown origin applied to early subterranean cemeteries, particularly those built by Christians in the outskirts of ROME. The custom of burial in niches carved in the rock of underground galleries was probably already practiced in Rome by Jews, and therefore the Christian catacombs were patterned after the earlier Jewish ones. At first, these burial places were fairly small; but as the Christian community grew, galleries were extended, and sometimes others were dug at different levels, so that there are catacombs with up to four different stories.

The common notion that the catacombs were essentially places where Christians hid for worship is erroneous. Christians did celebrate Communion at the tombs of MARTYRS on the anniversary of their death, and therefore such services did take place in the catacombs. But the existence of the catacombs was known to Roman authorities, and in any case their narrow corridors would make it very difficult to celebrate large services in them. On occasion, some Christians did hide in the complex galleries of the catacombs, but this was not the general practice. Abandoned in the early Middle Ages, the catacombs were unknown until 1578, when the first of them was uncovered. Today, they are particularly valuable because their frescoes are the oldest existing early Christian art.

J.G.

CATECHISMS. Catechisms are writings used to teach the basic content of the Christian faith. The earliest materials in existence are the Catechetical lectures of CYRIL OF JERUSALEM. Designed for use during LENT for those preparing for baptism, the lectures embrace three basic components: the APOSTLES' CREED, which each will affirm at the baptismal liturgy; the TEN COMMANDMENTS as a rule for Christian living; and the LORD'S PRAYER, the prayer of the church by which Christians are taught how to pray.

Centuries later, when western Europe had become Christian and infant baptism was the custom, there was less demand for catechetical instruction. The form took on new importance after the Reformation. The Protestant traditions wanted to enunciate their understandings, and the Roman Catholic church wanted to reaffirm its interpretation of the faith. LUTHER'S Shorter Catechism took the form of the earlier lectures. Like Cyril, he affirmed the creed to be a statement that we believe in (a confession of faith) rather than what we believe about (a statement of belief). Other catechisms were couched in question-and-answer form: the WESTMINSTER (Presbyterian), the HEIDELBERG (Reformed), and the Anglican Articles of Instruction. American Roman Catholics learned about the faith through the BALTIMORE CATECHISM. Frequently viewed as a recitation of doctrine to be memorized, the catechism was meant to be a simple statement through which people could learn the reasons for faith, thereby making it easier to affirm these reasons in the life of faith.

I.C.

CATECHUMEN. A person being instructed by the church in preparation for baptism. In the early church, catechumens were allowed to be present during the early part of the service, which consisted mostly of the reading and exposition of Scripture. But they were dismissed before the service of Communion proper was begun. For this reason, the earlier part of the service came to be called "mass of the catechumens." At first, the period between conversion and baptism was very brief. But as the number of Gentile converts increased, the church found it necessary to allow more time to instruct them in matters that the earlier Jewish converts already knew. By the time of Constantine, it had become customary to delay baptism in some cases until the moment before death. Thus arose the distinction between the masses of catechumens and those who were actually preparing to receive baptism. Later, as infant baptism became the norm, the catechumenate declined and eventually disappeared, to be revived in modern times, particularly in missionary lands.

J.G.

CATEGORICAL IMPERATIVE. KANT took the view that an action has worth only if it is done from a sense of duty, that is to say, in obedience to the moral law. An action cannot be justified by appeal to an external authority (HETERONOMY) or to desirable consequences that may flow from it (utilitarianism) (see UTILITARIANS). Its rightness is perceived by the autonomous rational agent, and this rightness is intrinsic to itself.

It is this sense of unconditional, moral obligation that finds expression in the categorical imperative. It is formulated thus: "I ought never to act except in such a way that I can also will that my maxim should become a universal law." This principle of morality, he believed, rests entirely on the rational nature of the moral agent. It may seem a very austere and even legalistic view of morality, but it can be expressed in another way that introduces concepts of a more personal kind. "Act so as to treat humanity never only as a means but always also as an end." Kant is not saying that we should never treat another human being as a means, for obviously we all do this, but a human being can never be regarded as merely a means—human beings possess in their rationality an inherent dignity, which makes them also an end. Kant also introduces the concept of respect, though he claims that respect is primarily for the law and only derivatively for persons. Many people have the opinion that the defect of Kant's teaching is his lack of an adequate concept of a human person. (Compare GOLDEN RULE.)

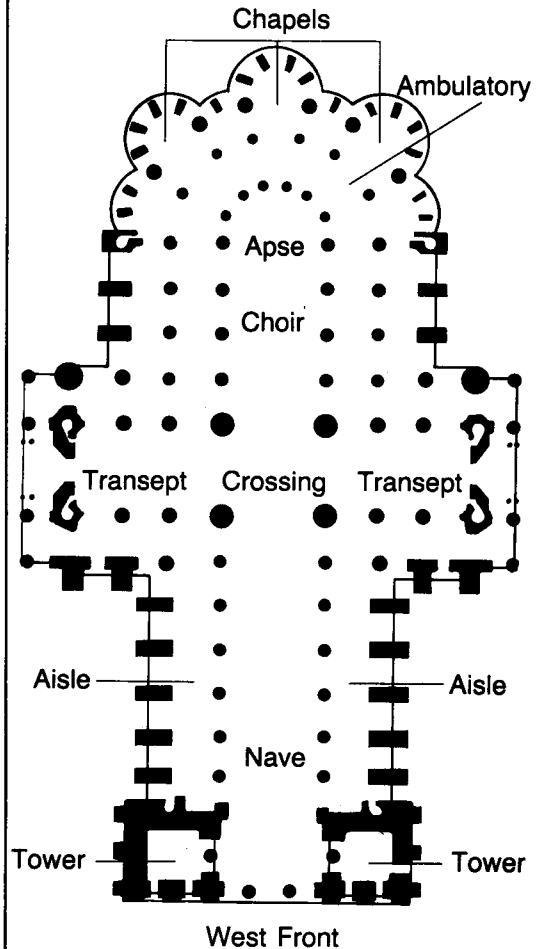

J.M.

CATHARS/CATHARI. A term derived from a Greek word meaning "pure," and applied at various times to different heresies. In the twelfth century, it was used in Germany for those known in France as ALBIGENSES, and that is still its common usage.

J.G.

CATHEDRALS. Large churches, the principal places of worship of Catholic or Anglican DIOCESES, which contain the bishop's cathedra or "chair." It is the bishop's seat, where he exercises his preaching and teaching ministry. In the basilicas built by Constantine, the chair or throne was put at the rear of the apse, centered behind the altar. Later, the chair was placed on the north side of the chancel. From his chair the bishop presides at Holy Communion and preaches. Due to the honor paid to the bishop's teaching and governing function, the cathedral came to be the mother-church of the whole diocese.

The chair generally is placed atop three steps and is covered by a canopy, showing the dignity of the bishop's office. Originally, the cathedral was in or near the bishop's palace and he and his assistants served it. Later, administrative duties prevented his leading worship very often, so a "chapter" of clergy was founded to serve the cathedral. This chapter had the right to elect a new bishop when the bishop died or was "translated" elsewhere.

Typical floor plan of a medieval cathedral

Cathedrals, especially in the Middle Ages, came to be fine examples of the architecture of the period in which they were built. They contained the bishop's throne, a choir, a nave, a baptistery (sometimes in a separate building), the bishop's palace, a bell tower, and a monastery for the chapter clergy serving the church. As only a bishop in residence in his diocese can establish a cathedral, there is generally only one church designated by the term in a diocese. The location of a cathedral can be changed. There are examples of co-cathedrals, where the bishop maintains a chair in two churches. A procathedral is a church used by a bishop until a finer church is built.

The building of cathedrals is governed by canon law, which holds that a cathedral is to be dedicated in a solemn service of consecration. Ordinations and the synod meeting of the diocese are held there. Canon law permits a bishop to be buried in his cathedral.

J.C.

CATHERINE OF ALEXANDRIA. A legendary MARTYR supposed to have died during the persecution of Maxentius, after confounding her persecutors with her learning. Her symbol is a wheel, for she is said to have been tied to a wheel and tortured before being beheaded. According to an even later legend, her body was carried by angels to the monastery of St. Catherine on the Sinai.

J.G.

CATHERINE OF SIENA. A mystic who was influential in the return of the papacy from Avignon to Rome, and one of only two women on whom the Roman Catholic church has bestowed the title of DOCTOR OF THE CHURCH. Born in Siena in 1347, she joined the Third Order of Dominicans when still in her teens and shortly thereafter had the experience of a "mystical marriage" with Jesus. Around her gathered a group of followers, several of them learned theologians, who came to learn of the life of devotion and MYSTICISM. She was also known for her service to the poor and the sick. In 1376, spurred by a vision, she went to Avignon and persuaded Gregory XI to return to Rome. When the GREAT SCHISM followed, she devoted her remaining years to the cause of the Roman papacy. She died in 1380, was declared a saint in 1461, and a Doctor of the Church in 1970.

J.G.

CATHOLIC. A transliteration of the Greek word, katholikos, meaning "universal" or "general." Throughout Christian history the word has expressed various nuances of meaning. During the early patristic period it conveyed the idea of "universal," as in the expression by Ignatius, "Wherever Jesus Christ is, there is the catholic church." Here the universal church is contrasted with the local congregation.

It is also applied to the faith of the entire church. Thus in the "holy catholic church" of the Apostles' Creed, it expresses the sense of universality and unity.

The Catholic Epistles of the NT were so designated to indicate they were intended for the whole church.

"Catholic" came to mean "orthodox." Vincent of Lerins, in his Commonitorium says, "What all men have at all times and everywhere believed must be regarded as true." Thus the concepts of universality and orthodoxy are joined.

After the schism of the Eastern and Western churches in 1054, the Western church was referred to as "catholic" and the Eastern church as "orthodox."

In the Reformation period the churches that adhered to the papacy rather than the Protestant cause were known as "catholic." The Anglican Church insisted on the right to use the term "catholic" in describing the continuum between it and the apostolic church. Rome claimed the appellation uniquely on the ground of its organizational continuity.

Often Anglicans and Old Catholics employ the term to include themselves, the ROMAN CATHOLIC CHURCH, and Eastern ORTHODOX churches as those communions related to the undivided pre-Reformation church.

Today, the term is used to describe Christians who claim to be in the historical and continuous tradition of faith and practice, as opposed to PROTESTANTISM, which centers its faith on an authoritative Bible.

R.H.

CATHOLIC EPISTLES. Refers to seven NT letters, James, I and II Peter, I, II, and III John, and Jude, as "general" in the sense: (1) they are not addressed to any single church, in contrast to most other NT letters, and (2) they are addressed not only to a wider audience but also they are concerned with matters of more general or ecumenical nature. The term does not appear in the NT but seems to have developed within the first four Christian centuries. Origen (about A.D. 250) states that in his time, I Peter and I John were universally accepted as canonical scripture, but that there was strong opposition by many, but not by him, to the other five.

P.L.G.

CATHOLIC REFORMATION. A move toward renewal within Roman Catholicism dominated by reactions to sixteenth-century Protestantism. During the BABYLONIAN CAPTIVITY (1309-77) with the papacy at Avignon, and the GREAT SCHISM (1378-1417) with two and then three popes vying for supremacy, calls for reform "in head and members" resounded in Roman Catholicism. The COUNCIL OF CONSTANCE (1414-18) achieved some reform only to have Pope Pius II in 1460 condemn even an appeal to a council. Nepotism, worldliness, immorality, and abuses mounted alarmingly within the papal hierarchy. These conditions prompted the basis for the founding of numerous new orders dedicated to living genuine Christianity—Oratory of Divine Love, Theatines, Barnabites, Sommaschi, Capuchins, Brothers of Mercy, Ursulines, Angelicals, Daughters of Mary, Brothers of the Good Death, and others. Hospitals, orphanages, the sick, prayer, preaching, mass, fasting, and asceticism all received their attention. Humanists like ERASMUS and Contarini criticized the church's hypocrisy and ignorance. Cardinal XIMENES began a religious revival in Spain, and IGNATIUS LOYOLA founded the SOCIETY OF JESUS (Jesuits), 1534.

When the Protestant Reformation erupted and attracted converts, Roman Catholicism sought to recover members and territories by redefining its doctrines. This was done in the COUNCIL OF TRENT, 1545-63. It reaffirmed every dogma questioned by the Protestants. Trent made scripture and tradition equal sources for faith and morals, sanctioned the APOCRYPHA, adopted JEROME's VULGATE Latin Bible as official, defined justification to include meritorious good works, reaffirmed TRANSUBSTANTIATION and the seven sacraments, withheld the cup from the laity, extolled celibacy as more excellent than marriage, said souls could be helped in PURGATORY, and upheld relics and INDULGENCES. In 1564 Pope Pius IV issued a Tridentine creed for Catholics to sign as a personal confession. Four subsequent popes implemented Trent and pushed moral reform: Pius V, Gregory XIII, Sixtus V, and Paul V. Trent provided basic guidelines for Catholicism until VATICAN COUNCIL II (1962-65). St. Teresa of Avila established thirty CARMELITE branches. The Jesuits promoted education and missions. PALESTRINA reformed church music. ROBERT BELLARMINI and Peter Canisius defended Catholic doctrines and practices.

To stop heresy and untruth the Catholic Reformation also resorted to force—against individuals with a renewed INQUISITION (1542), and with military might against the Lutherans in Germany, Calvinists in Holland, HUGUENOTS in France, and the Anglicans in England. By the seventeenth century a reformed Roman Catholicism had curbed Protestantism and recovered much of its lost prestige. (See REFORMATION and PROTESTANTISM.)

C.M.

CELEBRANT. The priest or minister who actually presides at the consecration of the bread and wine at Holy Communion or the Mass, in either Catholic or Protestant worship services. When several clergy take part in a service, it is the presiding minister who is in actual charge of the celebration of the Eucharist.

J.C.

CELIBACY. The permanently unmarried state and restraint from any sexual activity demanded of the clergy (major ORDERS) and of both men and women in religious (monastic) orders in the Roman Catholic Church. Recipients of such orders vow to remain permanently unmarried, and chaste in thought and act. Luther and the other Reformers protested against the church's rules of celibacy for the priesthood and began the marriage of pastors in Protestant churches. The Council of Trent, however, confirmed the church's teaching on celibacy for priests and the religious. Indeed, the rules of celibacy hold that once a person takes major orders or a monastic vow as brother or nun, any future marriage he or she may enter is null and void. Perpetual deacons, or "lay" deacons, may be married men since Vatican II, but not if they live with a second wife.

J.C.

CELSUS. A pagan philosopher of the second half of the second century who wrote a treatise, The True Word, against Christians and their teachings. His work is lost, but a vast portion of it has been preserved in extensive quotations in Origen's Against Celsus. This is the earliest detailed exposition of the objections of learned pagans to Christianity, to which many of the APOLOGISTS responded. Celsus himself was a follower of PLATONISM and a defender of the ancient religion and institutions of the Greco-Roman world. Thus his objections to Christianity have to do mostly with its logical inconsistency and with its negative consequences for civilization.

He had studied the Bible and Christian teaching and argued that the miracles and prophecies are either unbelievable or unclear, that the Christian God is a meddler whose constant interventions in the minutiae of human life are unworthy of the Supreme Being, and that Christian pacifism and lack of participation in civil ceremonies, if practiced by many, would render the empire vulnerable to the barbarians and would result in the end of civilization. Although his arguments were impressive, he does not seem to have made a great impact, for even the learned ORIGEN did not know of his work until asked by another Christian to refute it.

J.G.

CENCHREAE. The eastern naval station and harbor of Corinth located on the east side of the Isthmus (Acts 18:18; Rom. 16:1). Cenchreae provided sea communications to the Aegean Sea and the Orient. The seven-mile paved road (Cenchreae to Corinth) led to Corinth's east or Cenchreae gate. Paul passed through Cenchreae on his "painful" visit (II Cor. 2:10). Later, "at Cenchreae he cut his hair, for he had a vow" (Acts 18:18; see Num. 6:1-5). It is thought that Romans 16 is a letter from Paul to the church at Ephesus, and that Phoebe of the Cenchreae church (v. 1) was its bearer. At some earlier time and in some unspecified way, she had been a "helper" to Paul (v. 2).

P.L.G.

CENNICK, JOHN (1718-55). Author of the hymns "Children of the Heavenly King" and "Be Present at Our Table, Lord," Cennick was born on December 12 into a QUAKER family, although he was reared in the Church of England.

In 1739 he met JOHN WESLEY and soon became a lay preacher and a teacher at Kingswood School. Having parted with the Wesleys, Cennick joined the MORAVIANS in 1745 and was ordained by them.

N.H.

CENSER. A vessel used for burning incense during worship services in the Catholic, Orthodox, and Anglican churches. A censer is a bowl in which live coals are placed, covered with a rounded perforated top. Chains are attached to the bowl so it may be carried or suspended in the chancel.

J.C.

CENTURION. A non-commissioned Roman army officer, commander of "a century," or one hundred, foot-soldiers. The centurion was a key professional officer in war and peace. After twenty-five years of service, he could be rewarded with Roman citizenship, gifts, and other benefits (his pay was five times that of an ordinary soldier). The centurions in the NT are wealthy; they have slaves, large houses, and make lavish gifts. The centurion at the cross readily acclaimed Jesus "Son of God" (Matt. 27:54; Mark 15:39). Cornelius was also a centurion (Acts 10).

P.L.G.

CEPHAS. See PETER, APOSTLE.

CERINTHUS. One of the many teachers of GnosticisM, probably a Jew by birth, who taught in Asia Minor around the year A.D. 100. According to IRENAEUS, it was against Cerinthus that the Gospel of John was written. He taught that Creation was the work not of the Supreme God, but of a lesser being, and that Christ was the divine presence, which came to the human Jesus at baptism and left him before the passion.

J.G.

CHALCEDON, Council of; Definition of; Faith of. A council that gathered in A.D. 451 and condemned the teachings of Eutyches on CHRISTOLOGY, as well as the previously condemned views of the APOLLINARIANS and NESTORIANS. Two years earlier, at what Pope Leo called a Robbers' Synod, extreme ALEXANDRIAN THEOLOGY had been affirmed, and even the more moderate forms of Antiochene theology had been rejected. Leo's Tome, which reaffirmed the ancient Western Christology of "two natures in one person," had not even been read. At Chalcedon those actions were reversed, and the bishops rejected the extreme expressions of both Alexandrians and Antiochenes.

Since the COUNCIL OF EPHEBUS in 431 had taken action against the proliferation of creeds, what was then decided was not to offer a new creed, but rather to compose a "Definition of Faith," which would clarify the christological implications of the faith affirmed at the councils of NICEA and CONSTANTINOPLE. This "definition," rather than explaining how the union of divinity and humanity takes place in the Savior, sets limits for future theological work by stating that it takes place: "without confusion, without change, without division, without separation."

Not all Christians agreed with the decisions of Chalcedon. Those who for various reasons rejected them were called Monophysites by the rest (see MONOPHYSITISM). Such was the stance of the Armenian church, the Jacobites of Syria, the Coptic church of Egypt, and the Ethiopian church. This resulted the first permanent break in Christian history.

J.G.

CHALDEA. A swampy, low-country region of South Mesopotamia that was inhabited by a fiercely independent people of a primitive culture, from the end of the second millennium B.C. Aramean tribes of like characteristics lived on higher ground between the Tigris and the Euphrates. The "language of the Chaldeans" (Dan. 1:4) is now understood as Aramaic. Nabopolassar (626–605 B.C.) founded the Chaldean dynasty, which under his son Nebuchadrezzar II extended its rule over former Assyrian territory and also Syria-Palestine. (The dynasty declined rapidly after Nebuchadrezzar's death in 562 B.C.) Such was the Chaldean's short-lived influence as a world power that, in OT passages, "Chaldean" generally designates any people from the entire country of Babylonia. "Ur of the Chaldeans" (Gen. 11:28, 31; 15:7; Neh. 9:7) explains the ancient city's location to the contemporary Bible reader. Chaldean magicians, astrologers, and diviners of all sorts migrated to and were immensely popular in Egypt, Greece, and Rome and were called magi.

P.L.G.

CHALICE. The cup used in celebration of Holy Communion. The chalice or cup is the only sacramental vessel directly referred to in the NT. All other sacramental vessels have developed out of church usage.

In the Catholic church, a chalice must be consecrated by a bishop. Most churches have several chalices, and priests generally have a chalice for their personal use. Chalices are generally made of gold or silver but may be of any metal if gold-plated on the inside of the cup. Some contemporary chalices are of earthenware or glass, while historically, chalices have been encrusted with jewels.

J.C.

CHALMERS, THOMAS (1780–1847). Scottish preacher, theologian, social reformer, and founder of the Free Church of Scotland. Born in Anstruther, educated at St. Andrews University, he rose from parish pastor, 1803, to professor at St. Andrews, 1823, and Edinburgh University, 1828, where he was acclaimed for his preaching, social work, and promoting education. He resisted the "moderate" trend to make Christianity largely ethical and established over two hundred new churches. In 1843 he led 470 Scottish ministers to form the Free Church of Scotland, which sought more freedom from civil domination. His works include Political Economy, 1832, and Institutes of Theology, 1843-47.

C.M.

Courtesy of the Metropolitan Museum of Art, The Cloisters Collection, 1950

The Chalice of Antioch

CHANNING, WILLIAM ELLERY (1780-1842). Known as the Father of Unitarianism (see UNITARIAN UNIVERSALIST ASSOCIATION), Channing was born April 7, 1780, to William and Lucy Ellery Channing of Newport, Rhode Island. After graduating from Harvard in 1798 and serving as a tutor there, he was ordained and installed June 1, 1803, as pastor of Federal Street Church, Boston, which he served until his death.

His 1819 ordination sermon for Jared Sparks in Baltimore titled "Unitarian Christianity" served as a manifesto for the growing movement among Boston CONGREGATIONALISTS. In 1820 he organized the Berry Street Conference for like-minded ministers and in 1821 began the Christian Register. His objections were directed more toward orthodox views of humankind than of God. In "The Moral Argument against Calvinism," he inveighed against depravity.

He greatly influenced many New England writers with his sermons and essays. His 1830 Remarks on American Literature called for American style, not English imitation. He died on October 2.

N.H.

CH'AN SCHOOL. See BUDDHISM.

CHARACTER, INDELIBLE. The inner seal, on the personality and spirit, communicated to a priest upon his ordination in the Roman Catholic church. According to church doctrine this character, or blend of moral and personal traits, cannot be removed. It sets a priest apart as always a priest.

J.C.

CHARDIN, PIERRE TEILHARD DE. See TEILHARD DE CHARDIN, PIERRE.

CHARGE. A pastoral responsibility, consisting of one or more congregations or preaching points, in The United Methodist church. The charge is equivalent to a PARISH in the Lutheran or Presbyterian churches. A charge is entrusted to an ordained minister by the superintendent of the district or the bishop of the conference.

J.C.

CHARISMATICS. This is a term referring to Christians who profess to have received the baptism or fullness of the HOLY SPIRIT. It usually is accompanied or followed by a conferring on the believer one of the gifts (charismata) of the Spirit described in the Pauline Epistles. This phenomenon, experienced in wide ranges of the church, is more precisely defined as the Charismatic Movement, the charismatic renewal, or neo-Pentecostalism.

The charismatic renewal has its roots in historic Pentecostalism, which embraces several denominations and had its inception at a three-day revival meeting held in 1906 in Los Angeles (see PENTECOSTAL CHURCHES). Most church historians date the rise of the Charismatic Movement to 1960, when the distinctive teaching on the baptism of the Holy Spirit and emphasis on the gifts of the Spirit began to be accepted in traditional denominations. Up to that time non-Pentecostals showed little regard for those they sometimes called Holy Rollers. One of the earliest proponents of the movement was the Reverend Dennis Bennett, rector of an Episcopal parish in Van Nuys, California. From Episcopal churches the renewal spread to most of the major denominational groups—Lutherans, Baptists, Presbyterians, Methodists, and others. In its beginnings the renewal was regarded with deep suspicion, not only by those who retained their opposition to the older Pentecostalism, but by the historic Pentecostals themselves.

The Catholic pentecostal movement, or charismatic renewal, as many prefer to describe it, first emerged in prayer meetings convened at Duquesne University, Pittsburgh, in 1967. The original impetus came from Catholic lay people who had been in contact with old-line Protestant Pentecostals. From there the Catholic movement has spread rapidly around the world.

The word "charismatic" is derived from the Greek word charisma, which in NT usage means "a gift, freely and graciously given." The gifts of the Spirit are listed and described in Romans 12:6-8 and I Corinthians 12:8-10. (Ephesians 4:7-12 provides an additional listing.) The gifts, directly transmitted to individuals by the sovereign working of the Holy Spirit, always purpose the edification of believers in the Body of Christ. The gifts include those of healing, prophetic utterance, speaking in tongues (GLOSSOLALIA) and the interpretation of tongues, as well as less spectacular charismata such as "helps," "governments," or the lesser known but impressive "word of wisdom" and "word of knowledge."

Historic Pentecostals usually have taught that those who experience the baptism of (or in) the Spirit will speak in tongues as an outward evidence of the inward experience. Charismatics, whose theology has not yet been codified, generally are not as insistent that speaking in tongues is a universal experience of those who have received the baptism. Both charismatics and the older Pentecostals teach that the gifts of the Spirit persist in the church today.

R. H.

CHARLEMAGNE. King of the Franks and, after his coronation by Pope Leo III in A.D. 800, emperor of the HOLY ROMAN EMPIRE. He was both a military leader and an able organizer. Through a series of military campaigns, he forced the conversion of the Saxons. Against the Moslems in Spain, he undertook the unsuccessful campaign which resulted in the death of Roland, and in the ensuing legends about it. But later his armies succeeded in conquering a wide strip of land across the Pyrenees, and this became one of the starting points for the Spanish Reconquista. In Italy, he conquered the Lombards and took their crown. This was one of many steps that gained him the favor of the popes.

As an administrator, Charlemagne was responsible for the revival of learning that is often called the Carolingian Renaissance, and in which Alcuin of York played an important role. When ADOPTIONISM broke out in Spain, he took measures against it and encouraged his theologians to refute it. His coronation as emperor of the West, resented as it was in Byzantium, marked one more step in the growing breach between East and West.

J. G.

CHARLES V. King of Spain (as Charles I) from 1516 to 1555, and Holy Roman Emperor from 1519 to 1556. From his father, Philip of Burgundy, and his maternal grandparents, Ferdinand and Isabella, he inherited vast domains, which included Spain, Burgundy, the Netherlands, and southern Italy, as well as the Spanish territories in the New World. The very vastness of his domains forced him to deal with many enemies and rivals. These included Francis I of France, as well as the Turks, the Papacy, and the Protestant princes of Germany. He hoped for a reformation like that proposed by ERASMUS, and was convinced that LUTHER and his followers were heretics. At the DIET OF WORMS he put Luther under the ban of the empire. But political circumstances prevented him from crushing Protestantism, and after the Diet of Augsburg he had to tolerate it. This was one of the reasons for his abdication in 1556. He died in the monastery of St. Yuste, in Spain, two years later.

J. G.

CHARTRES. City in northern France, famous for its GOTHIC cathedral, completed in the thirteenth century. In the Middle Ages it was also noted for its school. The cathedral is one of the most beautiful examples of Gothic architecture, and its stained glass windows are without equal.

Courtesy of Religious News Service

Chartres Cathedral

J.G.

CHASIDISM. See HASIDISM.

CHAUNCY, CHARLES (1705–87). The leader of PURITAN rationalists was born in Boston on January 1 to Charles and Sarah Walley Chauncy. After attending Boston Latin School and Harvard University (B.A. 1721, M.A. 1724), he was ordained in First Church, Boston, on October 25, 1727, and served there for sixty years. He married Elizabeth Hirst on February 14, 1727; Elizabeth Townsend on January 8, 1738; and Mary Stoddard on January 15, 1760.

He was involved in three controversies—revivalism (see REVIVALS), the episcopacy, and God's benevolence. A person of intellect, he distrusted the emotions of revivals and replied to JONATHAN EDWARDS' Religious Affections with Seasonable Thoughts on the State of Religion in New England (1743) and two Letters to Whitefield (1744, 1745). His nine-year quarrel over the episcopacy stretched from the Dudleian Lectures (1762) to his Complete View of Episcopacy (1771). Wrestling with The Benevolence of the Deity, he published his universalist views anonymously in London in 1784. In 1785 he published Five Dissertations on the Fall and Its Consequences. He died on February 10.

N.H.

CHEMNITZ, MARTIN (1522–86). German Lutheran theologian, ranked next to LUTHER and MELANCHTHON. Chemnitz was a unifier of Lutherans under the Formula of Concord, 1577, which he helped write. Born in Brandenburg, he studied at Frankfurt-on-the-Oder and Wittenberg, and later at Königsberg and Rostock, where he received a doctorate in theology in 1568. An early disciple of Melanchthon, in 1553 he lectured at Wittenberg on Melanchthon's Loci Communes and began developing his own Loci Theologici to draw Luther and Melanchthon together (published posthumously, 1591). As a pastor and superintendent of churches in Brunswick, Chemnitz sought to unite Lutheran factions by reconciling Luther-Melanchthon differences. He defended Luther's view of Christ's real presence in the Lord's Supper, 1561, produced a four-volume standard Lutheran study of the Council of Trent, 1564–73, published extensive data on the divine-human nature of Christ, 1570, and fostered Lutheran orthodoxy in the Formula of Concord, adopted in 1580.

C.M.

CHERUB/CHERUBIM. Both the singular and plural are the Hebrew terms for the mythological figures common in Mesopotamian and Egyptian art and architecture—winged bulls or lions, usually with human faces, representing the spirit guardians at the portals of palaces, temples, tombs, and holy sites. In its numerous references to cherubim, the Bible has adopted a Near Eastern cultural motif with obvious religious connotations, though for the most part it is likely that it had now become little more than a symbol, literary or artistic.

The original mythological concept of the cherub is present in Genesis 3:24, where it is said to have been set to guard the entrance to the garden of Eden. Similarly in Ezekiel 28:13–14, which employs the same myth of "the garden of God." On the other hand, the cherub of Psalm 18:11 (Hebrew; RSV, v. 10), though it appears in a passage obviously modeled on the mythology of the Canaanite storm-god Baal, can hardly be more than a poetic figure of speech (paralleled with "the wings of the wind"). Ezekiel's vision of the strange "living creatures" surrounding or supporting the throne of God (Ezek. 1), who are identified with "the cherubim" in Ezekiel 8–10, is a prophetic interpretation of the significance of the embellishments of the Ark of the Covenant as it was the featured holy object in the preexilic Temple of Jerusalem. According to the Priestly source of the Pentateuch and the Deuteronomic history of Samuel and Kings, cherubim were omnipresent in the Mosaic tabernacle (Exod. 25:18–20), and in the Temple of Solomon, about the Ark of the Covenant, and in other decoration (I Kings 6:23–32). Ezekiel's vision of the temple of the future (Ezek. 41:18–20) shows a persistence in the recognition of the propriety of this sacred symbol. These cherubim were variously carved in wood, cast or overlaid in precious metal, or embroidered. In later Jewish and early Christian thought the cherubim—divorced from their earlier pictorial representation—were remythologized as real creatures and assigned to a place among "the angels." A further fusion with Roman mythology led to the Renaissance portrayal of a "cherub" as a winged infant hovering about heavenly scenes.

B.V.

CHESHVAN. See HEBREW CALENDAR.

CHESTERTON, GILBERT KEITH (1874–1936). An English writer, journalist, Christian apologist and illustrator, who converted to the Roman Catholic Church at age forty-eight. Chesterton was educated at St. Paul's School, the London Slade School of Art, and University College, London. Taking a love of English literature from their father, Edward, both Gilbert and his brother, Cecil (1879–1918), early became involved in writing and criticism. By 1900 Gilbert was well known and began a series of several thousand essays in the Daily News and the Illustrated London News, and later, G. K. C.'s Weekly. He also began writing his many books of poetry, literary criticism, social comment, and the defense of the Christian, and later, specifically, the Catholic faith. After 1922 he seriously began commending Catholicism to the English as an antidote to the secularism, agnosticism, and materialism that were eroding traditional values. Chesterton's books Heretics (1905) and Orthodoxy (1908) are considered classics, which influenced C. S. LEWIS and Ronald Knox.

J.C.

CHILDREN OF GOD. In the OT Prophets, the concept of the sacred marriage between Yahweh, the husband, and Israel, the bride, was used, despite its analogy to Baalism, where the Lord Baal fertilized the land. Hosea especially made use of this, using the analogy of his own marriage to Gomer, who, like Israel, proved unfaithful. However, in the NT, only the CHURCH is spoken of in this way, that is, as the bride of Christ. Rather, the unique NT expression for the relationship of the believer to the Godhead is Paul's expression, "children of God," and its parallel, "heirs with Christ" (Rom. 8:16 ff.). This expression, then, is derived from Christology and soteriology, not from the doctrine of creation; it does not refer only to the fact that God created everything and everyone. To be a "child of God" is to be connected to Christ, saved by the grace of God given the sinner who is imbued with faith, and who has died and risen again with Christ in the waters of baptism. It is important to keep the christological meaning of the phrase in mind, since the expression "children of God" occurs in the Bible with various other meanings also.

In Job 1:6; 2:1; 38:7, it refers to angels or messengers of God. In Luke 3:38, it refers to human beings who have God for their Father whether they recognize God or not. In Exodus 4:22, the expression refers to all Israel. It can refer to specific Hebrews (Hos. 1:10) and even to the Gentiles (Isa. 19:25). Jesus is also spoken of as the Son of God (Matt. 3:17; 17:5; Luke 1:35). Finally, the redeemed are called the children of God in John 1:12.

The NT contains a great deal relating to the "sonship" of the redeemed Christian, especially under the metaphor of ADOPTION. Paul uses several key metaphors to discuss the meaning of the believer's salvation in Christ: redemption (bought with a price, that is, purchased from slavery to Satan by Christ's death); reconciliation (an enemy turned into a friend by the intercession of Christ); salvation (that is, cured from sickness); resurrection (raised up from death in the grave by baptism with the ever-living Lord); and adoption (turned from an outsider into a son by the Father's choice and legal action).

This last metaphor, adoption, is the basis for Paul's assertion that Christians are the children of God (Rom. 8 and throughout Romans). He was directly referring to Christ's adoption of those who have faith in him as his brothers and sisters—an adoption made possible by his defeat of Satan and his payment on the cross for humanity's sins. Christ has become our elder brother and sacrifices his own inheritance as the Father's "only begotten son" to share his relationship to the Father and the joy of the Father's kingdom with all who have faith in Christ's death and resurrection. The faithful are, therefore, fellow heirs with Christ. God is now the Christian's patrimony. This is the unsearchable goodness and the unspeakable blessing that is the believer's in Christ.

J.C.

CHILDREN OF GOD. One of the most bizarre new religions or "CULTS" to arise in the late 1960s in the United States. It was founded by David Brandt Berg, a former Christian Missionary and Alliance minister, one-time Baptist minister, and the son of a woman radio evangelist. The group grew out of the "hippies" converted by itinerant ministers in southern California during the JESUS PEOPLE movement. Berg, who early changed to a cult name, Moses David, was successful in pulling together the newly converted, fundamentalistic young people into a communal movement. Ultimately, he drew almost all the "Jesus People" into his "revolutionary army for Jesus," which he at first named the Children of God and later, under the impact of Ted Patrick's deprogramming assault and adverse publicity, renamed "the Family of Love."

Berg built the Children of God on fundamentalistic lines and was befriended by an evangelist who allowed the group to stay at the "Texas soul winning ranch." Eventually, Berg's fanaticism caused the Children of God to be expelled and split up to establish communes in the United States and Europe. Berg wrote encyclicals to his followers called "Mo Letters." These letters have degenerated from their earlier sectarianism to later ones ordering female followers to become "flirty fish," that is, to use sex to attract followers. Later, Berg ordered male followers to use sex to raise money. Most active in Europe, the Children of God quickly became one of the Continent's largest organized vice rings. Such immorality brought public opposition and caused many members to defect.

J.C.

CHINA INLAND MISSION. A missionary organization founded by JAMES HUDSON TAYLOR in 1865, after he had been a missionary in China for more than ten years. This was an interdenominational and international body whose purpose was to make certain that the gospel was preached throughout China. Since missionaries to a particular area tended to come from a particular denomination in the sending countries, churches appeared in China that were very similar to those represented by the missionaries. Eventually, the China Inland Mission reached every province in China. During the Boxer rebellion it suffered heavy losses, but Taylor refused to accept indemnification, for fear that this would create even greater resentment among the Chinese. By the time of Taylor's death, in 1905, the work of the China Inland Mission was firmly established throughout China.

J.G.

CHLOE. A woman known and respected by Paul and the Corinthian church (I Cor. 1:11) whose "people," relatives or perhaps slaves, reported to Paul in Ephesus about the "quarreling" among Corinthian Christians.

P.L.G.

CHRISM. A mixture of oil and other substances used for anointing in various rites in the Roman Catholic and Orthodox churches. Chrism is consecrated by the bishop and administered to the dying or ill, at baptism, confirmation, ordination, and the consecration of altars and churches.

J.C.

CHRIST. See JESUS CHRIST.

CHRIST, BODY OF. See BODY OF CHRIST.

CHRISTENDOM. The name usually given to the area ruled by Christians or where Christianity has held cultural and social sway. Traditionally, this has meant Europe, the Russian territories in Asia, and the New World. Given the twentieth-century circumstances, it is doubtful whether one can still speak of "Christendom."

J.G.

CHRISTIAN. The term is found only three times in the NT (Acts 11:26; 26:28; I Pet. 4:16), and interestingly it is there placed on the lips of persons outside the church as though to suggest that this particular title was given to Christ's followers rather than one they chose for themselves. But in the second century it became a current term preferred by those in the church, especially the Apologists (the anonymous author of To Diognetus, Justin, Athenagoras).

The origin of "Christian" is not certain. If its ancestry is in the Latin language, the ending -ianus suggests a member of a group owing allegiance to a historical personage (for example, Caesar, Herod). Then Christianus meant "one committed to Christ's cause" as his devotee or slave. If Acts 11:26 is correct in tracing the origin of the term to the people of Antioch in Syria, it may be that the Roman emperor's followers in that city (the Augustiani) coined the name to identify a rival group who professed allegiance to another emperor, Jesus. But there are dating problems with this suggestion. So it has been proposed that the counterpart is Herodianoi, that is, followers of Herod Agrippa I, who, according to Acts 12:1, was a persecutor of Jesus' followers in Palestine. The later Herod Agrippa II (in Acts 26:28) used the term ironically in response to Paul's fervent plea: "In a moment you will be persuading me to play the part of a Christianus"; this seems to be the cryptic meaning of Herod's reply.

The use of "Christian" in I Peter 4:16 depends on the dating of I Peter. If the letter was composed just prior to the persecution of the church at Rome by Nero (A.D. 65), the call to suffering matches the (later) description given by Tacitus. Of Nero, Tacitus wrote: he brought a charge against a sect "whom the common people were calling Christians." If, however, I Peter comes out of a subsequent decade, no firm link with Nero's pogrom is established, and the term "Christian" is regarded as an identity badge of believers in the Roman world generally (see I Pet. 5:9).

In later persecutions the standard question in the magistrates' interrogation was: "Are you a Christian?" This fact indicates that the title that seems to have begun as a nickname is now being accepted, by both the church and the Roman state authorities, as a well-known identification of the followers of Christ. The mention of Christos (Christ) as a title was turned to good effect by the Apologists who linked it with a similar sounding chrestus, "good, kind"; and some confusion over pronunciation (as in Suetonius' famous citation: "Claudius expelled the Jews at Rome because of a constant squabbling over Chrestus") was exploited by second-century Christian writers.

R.M.

CHRISTIAN CHURCH (DISCIPLES OF CHRIST). A Protestant Christian denomination that arose in the United States in the first quarter of the nineteenth century as a result of revivalism. The origins of the "Christians" or "Disciples" lie in several areas of the United States as evangelists called for a simple, primitive Christianity that would not demand adherence to creeds. On the basis of the Bible alone, these preachers proclaimed, Christians of every denomination should unite to promote the teachings of the apostles.

Thomas Campbell, a Presbyterian pastor in Washington County, Pennsylvania, founded the Christian Association of Washington in August, 1809. Almost immediately he published his "Declaration and Address," which sorrowed over the sharp party spirit among Christians. Campbell attributed this spirit of disunity to the stress on creeds, which he called human interpretations of the Word of God, among the various denominations. He called for Christian unity. An organization of those who agreed with him was formed in Brush Run, Pennsylvania, on May 4, 1811. The Christians were often called Campbellites because of the influence of Thomas and ALEXANDER CAMPBELL.

Christians are mainstream in most doctrinal positions, agreeing with the evangelical wing of Protestantism in belief while leaning toward the liberal position on social issues. The writings of the Christians stress the divine inspiration of the Bible, which is seen as God's revelation and a rule for the believer's faith and life; the Holy Trinity; the divine sonship of Jesus Christ; the alienation of humankind in sin from God and one another; the need of faith, repentance, and obedience for salvation; the final judgment, with rewards for the righteous and punishment for the unrepentant.

Christians and Disciples also have a very distinctive platform among Protestants, stressing the "restoration" of Christianity in the rejection of creeds; in a great emphasis on the divine sonship of Jesus; in insistence on NT names for the church and for Christians; special emphasis on the Holy Spirit's work in conversion; and their teachings on the Lord's Supper. The Lord's Supper, in the Christian's view, is to be celebrated every Lord's Day (Sunday); yet it is seen as a memorial feast and not as a sacrament. Christians also stress the Lord's Day as being not a Sabbath, but a unique NT institution.

J.C.

CHRISTIAN AND MISSIONARY ALLIANCE.

A missionary alliance formed in 1897 from two preexisting bodies, the Christian Alliance and the Evangelical Missionary Alliance. Over the years, this alliance has become, in effect, a denomination of the Protestant conservative, holiness type. In 1985, the membership of the CMA was 215,857 in the United States and Canada, gathered in 1,532 congregations. The CMA is made up of some 2,094 pastors, evangelists, and licensed preachers in North America, and 900 foreign missionaries. The CMA is evangelical in the revivalist, holiness tradition and fundamentalist in doctrine. It stresses the four-square gospel; the need for conversion; the baptism of the Holy Spirit (speaking in tongues); an imminent Second Coming; and divine healing. In polity, each congregation is practically autonomous, yet confesses the faith of the CMA. The group has three Bible colleges in the United States and one in Canada, specializing in preparation for missions.

J.C.

CHRISTIAN METHODIST EPISCOPAL CHURCH. See METHODIST CHURCHES.

CHRISTIAN REFORMED CHURCH IN NORTH AMERICA. See REFORMED CHURCHES.

CHRISTIAN SCIENCE. See CHURCH OF CHRIST, SCIENTIST.

CHRISTIAN YEAR. The cycle of festivals, observances, and seasons celebrated liturgically by the Christian church. The Christian Year begins on the first Sunday of ADVENT and ends on the Saturday before Advent begins. Festivals or feast days (in Catholic terminology) are designated holy days with the purpose of focusing people on Christ. These festivals commemorate historical events in the life of Christ or in the experience of the early church. There are a few festivals dedicated to Christian doctrines such as Holy Trinity, Christ the King, and also in the Catholic calendar, the Sacred Heart, the Precious Blood, and the Holy Name of Jesus. Also included in the church's celebrations are memorials of apostles, saints, and martyrs. Saints' days have been completely revised in the Catholic church since Vatican II. The new liturgical calendar of the Lutheran church in America includes commemorations of such modern martyrs as Dietrich Bonhoeffer and modern humanitarians as Albert Schweitzer and Dag Hammarskjold.

The Christian Year moves around the person and work of Jesus Christ. Advent celebrates the coming of Christ in the Nativity and also points to the SECOND COMING. The Christmas season rejoices over the birth of Christ. EPIPHANY remembers the showing forth of God's glory in Christ. LENT leads people to consider their need of salvation and the sacrifice of Christ for human sin. EASTER celebrates Jesus' victory over death. PENTECOST and its lengthy season recalls the coming of the Holy Spirit and goes on to impart the activities of the early church and the teachings and actions of Jesus in the Gospels.

The Christian Year is highly symbolic and is marked by special colors for each season as well as for saints' days, martyrs' days, and festivals. The lectionary, or book of appointed scriptural readings, the Psalter, and the COLLECTS (prayers) used in liturgical churches and in many free churches, are guided by the festivals and seasons commemorated by the Christian Year. These "variables" change from Sunday to Sunday, as do offertories and other musical responses. The Christian Year holds the believer's attention on Christ and helps ministers present a balanced account of the faith.

J.C.

CHRISTMAS. The Christian church's celebration of the birth of Christ, the festival of the Nativity. In the Western churches (Roman Catholic and Protestant) this celebration occurs on December 25. In the Eastern churches, Christmas occurs on January 6. The actual date of Christ's birth is unknown but was probably in the spring.

The name Christmas is derived from "Christes-messe," Old English for the mass of Christ. In the Christian Year, observance of Christmas begins with the first Sunday in ADVENT (beginning the liturgical year) and runs through EPIPHANY (in the Protestant churches) and Candlemas (in the Roman Catholic church).

Celebration of Christmas on December 25 dates from A.D. 336, when the pagan festival of natalis solis invicti (the birthday of the invincible sun) established by the emperor Aurelian in the third century A.D. was converted to a Christian holy day, referring to "the Sun of Righteousness," Christ. The Eastern churches were already celebrating the birth of Jesus and his baptism on January 6 at that time.

J.C.

CHRISTOLOGY. The branch of theology that deals with the person and acts of Jesus Christ.

Methods. Any approach to Christology (that is, the teaching of Christ's person as both a figure of history and the object of Christian worship) must face the issue of methodology. Specifically, this means that a choice has to be made whether the interpreter will begin with credal formulations that announce JESUS CHRIST as "true God" and "true man" and then work backward to the way this teaching arose as a beginning premise (Christology "from above"). The other approach is to begin with the empirical data of the historical and theological records (in the NT) and trace the way the church's understanding developed until the creeds were formulated (Christology "from below"). Another way to settling this issue before us is to ask whether NT Christology is ontological (that is, concerned with Christ's transcendent role in relation to God, the world, and the church) or primarily functional, (that is, relating God's person to divine achievement as savior and Lord and set in the context of Christ's earthly ministry). To put the matter in sharp focus, the two methods proceed from different starting points. The first asks, "Who is Christ and how is he related to God?" The second proposes the questions, "What did Jesus do in his human life, and how did it come about that the church accorded him titles of divinity because he did what only God could do?" At a practical level this choice is more than academic as we see when we pose the issue yet one more way. Is Jesus rightly called Son of God because he saves?—as functional Christology asserts? Or is it that Jesus saves because he is the Son of God—as ontological Christology states? Perhaps, however, the two approaches reach the same goal in the end; but as methods they are different, and a decision has to be reached. In what follows the "Christology from below" will be regarded as the better and more plausible model that can be described and deduced from NT and early Christian teaching, while not denying that there are ontological overtones, more implicit than explicit.

The Course of New Testament Christology. On our chosen approach it becomes possible to plot the path the NT writers took as we apply the tradition-historical method to their documents. This means that Christology developed in response to situational needs among the first congregations.

The early believers in Jerusalem were Jews who had come to faith in Jesus as MESSIAH and risen LORD. Their appreciation of who Jesus was took its point of departure from the conviction that, with his RESURRECTION and exaltation, the New Age of messianic triumph, described in the OT and intertestamental writings, had indeed dawned, and the OT scriptures had been fulfilled. But the cross had also to be explained, since Jesus' death at the hands of the Roman political powers stood in contradiction to all that pious Jews believed about the Messiah, God's expected deliverer of the chosen people (Deut. 21:23; cited in Gal. 3:13). A rationale was found in two ways: by asserting (1) that Jesus' rejection was already foreseen in OT scripture, notably Isaiah 53 and Psalm 118:22, and that his implicit claims to be the messenger and embodiment of God's kingdom showed only human unbelief; and (2) that at the Resurrection God had reversed this verdict, vindicated Christ, and installed him in the place of honor and power. The first christological statement therefore was based on two stages in Jesus' existence; he was son of David in his human descent, and since the Resurrection he is SON OF GOD (Rom. 1:3-4). The implicit messianic claims of his earthly life were made overt since his exaltation. The proof of the New Age he inaugurated is seen in the coming of the Holy Spirit (Acts 2:16-21 quoting Joel 2:28).

At a practical level this way of seeing Jesus' life and resurrection gave these believers a personal relationship with Jesus as a present reality and not simply a figure of the past, however recent. Hence the first prayer of which we have record is "marantha" ("our Lord, come") addressed to the risen Lord and placing him on a level with Yahweh, Israel's covenant to God (I Cor. 16:22; Rom. 10:9-13) as worthy of worship. This is the startling novelty of what the resurrection and elevation of Jesus meant.

Further meditation on OT scripture evidently gave a clue to Jesus' secret identity and explained his use of the mysterious title "Son of man." Drawn from Daniel 7:13-18, the SON OF MAN title is one of authority and dignity, two ideas that the resurrection of Jesus confirmed. The church preserved this teaching on the Son of man from Jesus' lips, and set it in the framework of his earthly life in order to accomplish several purposes: (1) to show how Jesus was misunderstood and rejected as messianic pretender, since "Son of man" spoke of God's kingdom and made him a sharer of the divine throne; (2) to show how Jesus brought in a New Age, wherein God's revelation was not tied to the Torah, Moses' law, but was universalized for all people. The "Son of man" in Daniel 7:22, 27 is the head of a supranational, worldwide kingdom; and (3) to find a missionary impulse, which led these believers, notably under the leadership of Stephen and his followers, to reach out to pagans (Acts 7:55-56; 11:19-21).

Such a mission brought the church into the world of Hellenistic religion in the setting of Greco-Roman society. The most relevant title in this religious milieu was "Lord," used of the gods and goddesses of the mystery cults, and in the prevailing EMPEROR WORSHIP directed, however obliquely, to the Roman Caesar. Both areas proved fertile ground for the application of the commonest christological title in the NT. "Lord" was already in use as the name of Yahweh applied to the exalted Christ; now it became useful in promoting the cultus of Jesus to those who were familiar with the deities of the Greco-Roman world (I Cor. 8:5-6), as later it was Christ's sole lordship that became the dividing line between Christian allegiance and the homage required to be paid to the deified state (the setting of the book of Revelation in the A.D. 90s, when Domitian proclaimed himself as "lord and god"; compare Rev. 17:14).

The final step in NT Christology was taken in the church of the Letter to the Hebrews and of the fourth evangelist. The author of Hebrews sets out to prove the finality of Christ's revelation as Son (1:1-4) and High Priest (5:5; 7:1-9:28). John's writings are clearest in their ascription to Jesus of the name Logos (Word) and (only) God. (See John 1:1, 14, 18; 20:28.) John's indebtedness is evidently to the OT and intertestamental wisdom tradition where "wisdom" and "word" (often linked with the Mosaic law) are rated as mediators in creation (Proverbs 8) and the preexistent revelation of God (in the Wisdom of Solomon). John boldly claims both roles for Jesus of Nazareth (John 1:3; 18; 14:6, 9). He sets the earthly life of Jesus against the background of his eternal being as "one with the Father" and the visible glory of the unseen God, thus superseding the Torah of Moses (John 1:17) and the claims of the Roman emperor (John 20:28, "my Lord and my God").

Yet even those most explicit statements of Christ's divine nature (Phil. 2:6; Col. 1:15; Heb. 1:1-4; Tit. 2:13; and less certainly Rom. 9:5) never compromised the unity of God as a cardinal element in OT MONOTHEISM (belief in one God in a world of POLYTHEISM), nor did they lend countenance to the view that Jesus was a rival deity to the Father (see Phil. 2:9-11; I Cor. 11:3; John 14:28). God the Father is always regarded as the fount of deity; Jesus is God's Son in a unique sense but never confounded with him. Yet this uneasy correlation bequeathed a legacy that formed the substance of the christological debates leading to the COUNCIL OF CHALCEDON in A.D. 451.

A Sketch of Later Christology. The first aberration came as early as the problem the Johannine community had to face, namely a denial of Jesus' genuine and full humanity. Thus docetism (a denial of Jesus' true human existence) is roundly condemned in I John and by Ignatius. At the opposite extreme Jewish Christianity produced an Ebionite Christology, which thought of Jesus as one good man adopted to be God's son. "ADoptionISM" continued into the second century, matched strangely by the opposite extreme of modalism, which asserted that the one God was shown in three successive modes or "masks." This was condemned by church fathers such as Tertullian and Origen.

The fourth century presented the conflict over our Lord's divine "nature"; was it "like" God (Arius)? or "identical with" God (Athanasius)? Apollinarius pressed Christ's deity to the exclusion of his human experience and left the church with a demigod. Nestorius exaggerated the two separate natures (human and divine), and so divided the unity of God's person. Eutyches went to the opposite extreme, and asserted only one nature in Christ (called monophysitism).

A turning point came at the Council of Chalcedon, where the teaching on two natures united in one person prevailed (the hypostatic union). This has remained the centralist position of the church ever since. Challenges have come in a theory of KENOSIS or self-emptying, whereby the divine Christ emptied himself of his deity at his birth and resumed it at the Resurrection, and in some speculation on Christ's assuming a representative human nature or in a teaching of an eternal modalism (Karl Barth). But in recent days Chalcedon has been ably defended, mainly by Eastern Orthodox theologians, and "Christology from above" passionately rehabilitated.

R.M.

CHRISTOPHER. A legendary figure, supposed to have lived in the third century, whose name means "he who bore Christ." The legend is that he helped travelers across a river, and that on one occasion he unknowingly carried the Christ child. For that reason he is the patron saint of travelers. The Roman Catholic church has deleted his name from the list of the saints.

J.G.

CHRISTOTOKOS. "Bearer of Christ," a title applied to Mary, particularly by the NESTORIANS, who rejected the use of THEOTOKOS or "bearer of God." The issue was one of CHRISTOLOGY rather than MARIOLOGY, for Nestorius' point was that the divinity and humanity in Christ ought not to be confused. He was condemned by the COUNCIL OF EPHEBUS in A.D. 431.

J.G.

I and II CHRONICLES. In the present-day English Bibles two historical books of the OT, which were originally one book in the Hebrew canon, just as were I and II Samuel and I and II Kings. The original Hebrew title was probably "Events of the Past Times." In the Douay Version, these books are called paralipomenon (deutero-canonical). The name Chronicles derives from Jerome, who explained the books as a chronicle of the sacred history of the Jews. The material in I Chronicles is similar to II SAMUEL, and that in II Chronicles parallels I and II KINGS. Additionally, there is material derived from the Hebrew books of Genesis to I and II Kings, with the exception of Judges, plus non-canonical material excerpted from some twenty-one books mentioned in several places in I and II Chronicles (for example, I Chr. 29:29; II Chr. 9:29).

The two books of Chronicles were written by the same author as the OT books known as EZRA and NEHEMIAH. However, in the Hebrew text, Ezra and Nehemiah are presented first, and the Chronicles are placed at the end of the OT text. The author is unknown, although W. F. Albright thought Ezra might be the writer. Most other scholars would put the time of the Chronicles between 350 and 250 B.C., long after Ezra's time. The postexilic, strong law-centeredness of later Judaism is clear in the Chronicles, as is the writer's Priestly orientation and devotion to the Davidic royal line. David and Solomon are the Chronicles' heroes, and the kings of northern Israel are his villains. Devotion to the Temple and opposition to the Samaritans who continued the Israelite worship on Mount Gerizim is a strong theme in his work. Indeed, the aim of the book(s) seems to be to give a history not of Judah as a nation but of the Jewish "church" centered in Jerusalem.

A major theme of the Chronicles is similar to a sentiment expressed by Ezekiel, that people who eat sour grapes will have their teeth set on edge, that is, people get what they deserve. In the historical material the Chronicler has taken from I and II Samuel and I and II Kings, the author shows that good kings have long and successful reigns and those with short, unhappy reigns are sinners. Examples given include the sickness that afflicted Asa and Jehoram and the leprosy that Uzziah suffered. Manasseh's long rule, despite his wickedness, is explained by his repentance and reform (II Chr. 33). The good Josiah, who died at Megiddo, is explained by a failure to obey God (II Chr. 35) at the end of his life. The moralism of the Chronicler, like all moralism, was possible only by leaving out a good deal of history. This is especially true of his portraits of David and Solomon. These kings are presented as all good by the simple expedient of omitting the records of their many sins, which stand in II Samuel and I Kings. Solomon's building of the Temple is stressed; his many foreign wives and his idolatry are passed over in silence. The Chronicler seems to love large numbers, especially in giving the size of foreign and Jewish armies. Most historians dismiss these numbers as exaggerations. A strong hostility to the northern kingdom of Israel also skews the Chronicler's historical reports.

The Chronicler's major purpose in collecting new material and reworking the older material of the Hebrew Bible (the result of the Priestly editors' work during and after the Exile) is to show how the present reign of God (the theocracy) in Jerusalem came into being, by way of God's actions in history as well as by the good offices of the Persian Empire. All seems now for the best, since the faithful freely worship Yahweh in God's holy Temple.

J.C.

CHRYSOSTOM, JOHN. Patriarch of Constantinople from A.D. 397 whose eloquent preaching gained him the title of Chrysostom, the "golden-mouthed." A native of Antioch, he was already a famous lawyer and orator when he decided to leave the city and become a monk. Since his mother objected to his leaving her, he turned their house into a monastery, and after her death he withdrew to the nearby mountains in order to live in solitude. A few years of monastic retreat convinced him that such was not his vocation, and he returned to Antioch, where he was ordained a deacon and then a presbyter. He then began preaching, and soon his fame was such that when the patriarchate of Constantinople fell vacant the emperor had him abducted from Antioch and made patriarch.

Chrysostom's preaching, although elegant and eloquent, was not well received by those who held power in Constantinople. He felt that excessive wealth and pomp were an affront to God, particularly in a city where many were living in squalor. In his sermons in the great cathedral of St. SOPHIA, he attacked those who "take over lands and houses, thus increasing poverty and hunger." Soon there was a conspiracy against the meddlesome preacher, which included both the empress and the patriarch of Alexandria. The result was that, after several other measures failed, Chrysostom was banished from the capital. While in exile, his pen continued to shame the powerful, and he was ordered to a more remote village. He never reached his new home, for he died on his way, in A.D. 407.

J.G.

CHUANG TZU. From the Chinese words for "Master Chuang." The second most important text in TAOISM, after the Tao te ching of Lao Tzu, and the name of its supposed author. Little apart from what is revealed in the book itself is known about Chuang Tzu, although his traditional dates, 369-286 B.C., are probably approximately correct. But significant portions of the book attributed to him are believed to be later. The commentary on the Chuang Tzu by Kuo Hsiang, in the fourth century A.D., is a Taoist classic in its own right.

Chuang Tzu comes through in the book as a charming eccentric who cares little for status, appearance, or convention. Upon the death of his wife, instead of mourning he sang and beat a drum, not, he said, out of callousness, but because he realized that her passing into nonexistence was as natural as her coming into existence, so nothing to lament. In another celebrated passage, after dreaming he was a butterfly, he asked himself whether he was Chuang Tzu dreaming he was a butterfly or a butterfly dreaming he was Chuang Tzu.

Indeed, the book opens with a series of brilliant illustrations to show that all our ideas, large and small, high and low, are but conventions, meaning nothing to infinite reality—the Great Tao—itself. Neither the human perspective nor any other is the absolute. Therefore the way to live in accordance with the Tao is not through conventional custom or morality but out of an inner "mindlessness" or "purposelessness," which is mystically attuned to the Tao and which is manifested in joyous spontaneity. In an image that may have roots in Shamanism, the freedom of this state is frequently compared with the flight of birds or gods through the sky. The Tao itself is a unity in all things, including, the philosopher pointedly and characteristically insisted, ants, weeds, rubble, excrement, and urine.

The book contains a valuable discussion, and repudiation, of rival schools. It was seminal for the Neo-Taoism of the period of Kuo Hsiang, with its emphasis on immediacy and living by impulsive spontaneity. Chuang Tzu was also important for the emergence of Ch'an (ZEN) BUDDHISM in China, which essentially synthesized the Indic religion with Taoism of the Chuang Tzu style.

R.E.

CHU HSI (1130–1200). Chinese philosopher; the most important thinker of the movement known as Neo-Confucianism, Chu Hsi exercised an immense influence not only in China but also in Korea and Japan, until the demise of traditional Confucian education. His interpretation of the tradition dominated both intellectual life and, as the reigning metaphysic, supplied the theoretical supports of state and society.

Chu Hsi viewed human and natural reality in terms of a dualism of li (principle) and ch'i (energy/matter); both derive from T'ai Chi (the Great Ultimate). In his view philosophy means "investigating the li that underlie both natural phenomena and human conduct"; thus, a good society would be one in which proper morality and right human relationships, as understood by Confucianism, had unhindered expression.

R.E.

CHURCH. The English word "church," like its counterparts in other modern languages (Scots kirke, German kirche, Dutch kerk) derives from the Greek kuriakon, meaning "belonging to the Lord" (kurios). As to what it is that belongs to the Lord (that is, God, or more likely the risen Jesus Christ) there is no certainty. Perhaps it is his people, the body of believers. In this case the term points us to the essential meaning of "church" in the biblical writings. The church is the people of God, created and called (the Greek ekklesia is from a verb "to call") by God, to be God's worshipers and witnesses, both in this world and in eternity. Less likely the term kuriakon could refer to God's day (the Lord's day, our Sunday—as in Rev. 1:10, when the first Christians met to worship the exalted Christ), or God's building dedicated for the corporate worship of God. The last reference is not appropriate for the NT period, since the early believers had no special church buildings, but met in their homes, as in Acts 2:46; 5:42; Colossians 4:15; and Philemon 2. Church buildings are not found before the third century.

Old Testament Background. The actual term "church" does not appear in the standard translations of the OT, but two Hebrew terms are prominent, which suggest the idea of the congregation of Israel: these are the words edah and qahal. The English renderings vary between "assembly" and "congregation." Edah comes from a word meaning "to appoint," and the obvious sense of the noun as applied to Israel is that of a company that has come together by appointment, either at an appointed time for a festival (Exod. 9:5; I Sam. 13:8, 11) or more probably by divine appointment, notably as a result of God's deliverance at the Exodus (Exod. 12:3; note 12:6, "the assembled community of Israel" in NEB trans.). So Israel is viewed as God's assembled congregation, bound to God by covenant ties and obedient to the Lord's law (Num. 35:12, 24).

The other word qahal is closely linked with edah, with the overtone of "called by God" from a verb "to summon by voice" (qol). The best rendering is "mustering." It is interesting that the Greek OT renders ekklesia about one hundred times but never in translation of edah and only infrequently of qahal; instead the favorite Greek translation equivalent is synagoge, a gathering of the community in response to the divine summons and called to celebrate God's mercies both in the present and in the coming messianic age (Isa. 56:8; Ezek. 37:10). It is from the Greek OT term synagoge that the Jewish institution of the SYNAGOGUE took its name. And it may be that the first Christians sought a term to distinguish them from the Jews of their day (Jas. 2:2 is the one instance where their synagoge may mean a Christian assembly).

A third term was available for the NT writers to seize on; it is based on kenishta, "a gathering," in Aramaic paraphrases of the OT known as the Targums. The likelihood is that this word was a bridge from early Judaism to the NT use of ekklesia for the church as the gathered people of God under the terms of the new covenant in the eschatological era of messianic blessedness, which Jesus brought by his coming.

New Testament Teaching. The precise word ekklesia is found in the Gospels only at Matthew 16:18; 18:17, and both references have a specific allusion to the Jewish-Christian community, though it is possible that "I will build my church" is a promise of the new people of God, which Jesus' mission intended to create. So there are parallel terms such as "little flock" (Luke 12:32; see Matt. 26:31; Mark 14:27, 28), "my sheep" (John 10:26, 27), and "my brothers and sisters" (Mark 3:35) that may well support the idea of the church, at least in embryo. Certainly, at the Last Supper, there are covenant ideas linking Jesus and his disciples, especially in Luke's version (22:28-30) of the meal.

The record of Acts shows how the Christians who entered the realm of Messiah's salvation banded together as a body (Acts 5:11; 8:1, 3). These men and women had received the apostles' message as saving truth (Acts 2:36-37) and had acted upon it in professed repentance, faith, and (outwardly) in baptism (Acts 2:38-41). The result was that they remained in FELLOWSHIP (koinónia) and maintained a corporate life (Acts 2:42-47). This is what the author of Acts means by the church, namely, the eschatological community of Messiah's New Age that has received the OT promises and is living under Messiah's rule. Gradually Christians, under the impetus of Stephen and his followers (Acts 6:8-7:60; 11:19-21) came to see that the church had a wider meaning than a revamped Judaism or even a fulfilled Judaism, but that it took on a transnational, worldwide character. So while we find references to local churches at Jerusalem (Acts 5:11; 8:1), at Antioch (11:26; 13:1; 14:27; 15:3), Caesarea (18:22), and Ephesus (20:17), there are hints that a universal church is in view, especially at Acts 20:28. K. L. Schmidt is usually credited with the discovery that ekklesia means, in this extended context, the one people of God existing in several local communities which, in turn, form outcroppings of the great church.

Paul's contributions lay in his understanding of the church, of which his mission churches in Thessalonica (I Thess. 1:1), Asia (I Cor. 16:19; Philem. 2), and especially in Greece, both in Macedonia province (Phil. 4:15) and in southern Achaia (I Cor. 1:2; II Cor. 1:1), are local manifestations. So in his pastoral correspondence he can appeal to "all the churches" (I Cor. 7:17; 11:16; 14:33), and to the churches of his missionary work that have joined to send a collection for the Jerusalem church (II Cor. 8:18, 19, 23). But this is to speak the language of phenomena, that is, churches that were planted by his preaching and example. At a theological level Paul's teaching is more emphatic that there is only "one church," the church of God (Phil. 3:6), in which Christ or God has set offices and ministries (I Cor. 12:28) as gifts to the body of Christ (see too Eph. 4:7-11). The logical extension of this line of teaching comes in Colossians and Ephesians where "church" is indeed Christ's body because he is the sole head (Col. 1:18, 24); and the headship of Christ lends a transcendental flavor to the body (Eph. 1:22; 5:23). Other images of the church found in the Pauline literature are the building of God (I Cor. 3:10-17), and the bride of Christ (II Cor. 11:2; Eph. 5:23-32).

The remaining books of the NT add little to this appreciation of the church as God's chosen people, though other images fill out the picture. Hebrews is unusual in that it has one designation of the church "triumphant in heaven" (12:23) that is unique in the NT; otherwise Hebrews stays with the description of the church as a pilgrim people on the march to its eternal homeland (Heb. 4:1-10; 11:39, 40) a picture that runs through I Peter (2:4-11), which also stresses the church's social identity as a group of "exiles" and "strangers" (1:1) called to endure suffering (5:9-11). In the Pastoral Letters (I, II Timothy, Titus) we get a glimpse of the way the church is being organized with regular offices of ministry and formal structures.

Later Developments. The growth and broader understanding of what gives the Christian church its character was determined by several factors. We may single out the following as especially important. (a) The rise of the office of a single presiding minister (later called a BISHOP) led to a change in the church's nature. Coupled with the idea that one member of the clergy had supreme importance was an increased value given to the sacraments and to Christian worship in general. Hence, in Ignatius the bishop is the key figure, and this was developed at great length by Cyprian. (b) The onset of PERSECUTION in the second to the fourth centuries gradually gave way to the church's making peace with the empire under Constantine and his successors. It became fashionable and profitable to be a church member, and masses of people crowded into the visible church for social enhancement. (c) The rise of the PAPACY led also to a diminution of spiritual life among the laity, while conserving the infrastructure of the church and giving it cohesion and unity at a time when movements such as Islam tended to fragment the Christian cause. (d) At the REFORMATION a new lease on life made the appeal of the church to the proletarian elements of society, with emphasis on individual freedom and moral accountability, thus paving the way for democratic movements in the Western world. (e) In the nineteenth and twentieth centuries the image of the church has undergone some remaking with more flexibility and adaptation to modern ideas. In particular the boundaries of the church and the world are less rigidly drawn as the church has seen its mission as the permeation of all life with its saving mission.

R.M.

CHURCH AND STATE. See SEPARATION OF CHURCH AND STATE.

CHURCHES OF CHRIST. A Protestant denomination made up of autonomous local congregations that originated in the Restoration movement (the Christians, Disciples, or Campbellites) in the early nineteenth century. In 1974, the Churches of Christ had a membership of about 2,400,000 in the United States. The Churches of Christ are especially numerous in the South, particularly in Texas and Tennessee.

The early history of the Churches of Christ is the same as that of the CHRISTIAN CHURCHES or Disciples of Christ. A split between conservatives and liberals in the Disciples movement led to the founding of the (conservative) Churches of Christ. This body remained anti-creedal; congregational in polity; and kept the celebration of the Lord's Supper every Sunday, along with the baptism of adults by immersion.

The distinctive mark of the Churches of Christ is their prohibition of the use of instruments (organs, pianos, etc.) in worship. Later, some churches accepted musical instruments and styled themselves Churches of Christ (Instrumental).

The conservatives who founded the Churches of Christ objected to the Disciples' plan to establish a missionary society, the use of musical instruments in church, pastoral activities by some "preachers," and the practice of open communion. The conservatives said these activities had no basis in the NT, and accused the Disciples of innovations, whereas their churches remained true to the Restoration movement.

The Churches of Christ are fundamentalist in their approach to Christianity and orthodox in basic doctrines but opposed to any formal creed. The Bible alone is taken as the church's theological basis. Interestingly, the Churches of Christ stress the universality of sin but hold that it affects only those above the age of accountability.

The Churches of Christ do not belong to the National Council of Churches or the World Council of Churches, unlike the Disciples of Christ. They hold that ecumenicity is a departure from the principles of the Restoration movement, which stressed unity through return to the faith and practices of the NT Church. They refuse to be known as a denomination among other denominations, claiming this means the acceptance of post-NT ecclesiastical developments. The local congregations in the group maintain elementary and secondary schools, twenty-one colleges, and twenty homes for the elderly. J.C.

CHURCHES OF GOD. A name taken from the NT by revivalists in America during the period 1823–1906 to designate their belief that the church is gathered and established by the direct work of God and to disclaim any continuity with the churches of the Protestant Reformation or the Roman Catholic Church. Essentially a sectarian label, the term has been used many times to cover splits within this tradition brought on by successive waves of revivalism, the influence of charismatic leaders, the holiness movement, adventist speculations about and announcements of the Second Coming of Christ, and even to claim that adherents were the true biblical Jews. The Church of God, with various qualifiers, including place names of sect headquarters, is now used to designate more than two hundred independent religious groups in America, most very small in numbers, as well as by other groups overseas.

Most Church of God groups stress that the church is an assembly of the regenerate, gathered from every nation by the Holy Spirit, including a gathering out of all other existing denominations. Members are added by revivalistic means, through the inducing of experiences of conversion, which leads to repentance, acceptance of Jesus Christ, and only then, to baptism by immersion. Interestingly, some of the original Church of God groups (the Winebrennerians) do not feel that baptism is necessary at all, laying all stress on conversion experiences.

Such views point up the basic importance of the revival service and the evangelist for the Church of God groups. These views also indicate why these groups are subject to disruption and splits by every wave of millennial speculation and conservative political reaction. A literal belief in the Bible as the only rule of faith is common to all the Churches of God groups, but each sect differs from the others in emphasizing particular biblical texts. Like the larger Restoration movement (the Campbellites), the Church of God groups stress that the NT contains all that is necessary to practice Christianity and reject supposed post-NT ecclesiastical developments. It is surprising, given this factor, to find various sects called the Church of God governed by bishops, others by Presbyterian-style polity, and others congregational, while most seem "connectional" in the Methodist sense.

Most, but not all, Churches of God practice the foot washing of the saints, especially in the Lenten season and in times of conferences or revival. Such foot washing is always connected to the observance of the Lord's Supper. The Eucharist is not considered a sacrament and is rarely observed otherwise. Baptism by immersion is generally, but not invariably, practiced at some time after a person is converted.

Some Churches of God stress several orders of ministers: apostles, bishops, deacons, evangelists, teachers, and exhorters. A large number of the groups emphasize glossolalia (speaking in tongues) that follows baptism by the Holy Spirit (as distinct from sacramental baptism). All these groups teach that salvation is freely given to those who accept it, and consequently they reject Calvinism and the Arminian strictures on double predestination. Most Church of God revivalistic rhetoric is synergistic, making people partners with God, who is indeed the deciding partner in salvation. In order for the saved person to join the church, signs of true conversion are required. These signs may be interpreted from group to group as speaking in tongues or as the claims to full holiness. This emphasis makes the entire movement generally legalistic, and, with a few exceptions, keeps these groups out of ecumenical cooperation with other churches. In all the sects, a converted ministry is valued above an educated one, so that majority of ministers are not well-educated despite the efforts of more progressive groups like the Church of God (Anderson, Indiana).

The Church of God bodies arose in three periods of time over more than eighty years. The first wave came in the Methodist revival among German-speaking Reformed Christians in Pennsylvania during the 1820s. While not the only leader, John Winebrenner, a German Reformed pastor at Harrisburg, Pennsylvania, became a figurehead in the separatistic struggles of 1823–25. Locked out of his church by the consistory, Winebrenner founded what he called the Churches of God (General Eldership). By 1830, Winebrenner's movement was organized as the Churches of God in North America. This group, now the smallest of the Church of God sects, still exists under the name Churches of God (General Conference).

The second wave arose among German Brethren in Pennsylvania, led by P. J. Kaufman in 1886. This revival resulted in the Church of God as organized by Christ. The third wave of influence was the HOLINESS MOVEMENT, or the emphasis on the "second blessing," which was supposed to be a needed second work of grace by which the Holy Spirit cleansed the believer of sin. The Holiness movement largely took over the Winebrennerian group, when Daniel S. Warner caused the majority of congregations and ministers to separate from the General Eldership in 1881. This group became the Church of God (Anderson, Indiana). Richard J. Spurling, Sr. formed the Church of God, Cleveland, Tennessee, a holiness group, in 1906. This sect split into the Church of God of Prophecy, the Church of God (Queens Village, New York), and the original (Cleveland, Tennessee) Church of God. All these groups and most others called Church of God are part of the PENTECOSTAL movement.

Other bodies of this name include the Church of God and Saints in Christ, also called the black Jews, who claim to be the true Jews, whom, they claim, were originally black. The Adventist Church of God is a split, in 1866, from the Seventh-Day Adventist movement. There is also an Adventist Church of God in Christ (1851), and the Church of God in Christ (Mennonite), begun in 1859 by the revivalism of Elder John Holdeman.

All Churches of God share common characteristics, although all are not pentecostal. They are separatistic, Wesleyan in the revivalist and personal holiness sense, fundamentalist, legalistic in their stress on external conformity, and tend toward millenarian upheavals that lead to the creation of ever new small sects.

J.C.

CHURCH EXPECTANT/MILITANT/TRIUMPHANT. Three terms used to refer to the body of Christians in different classes. Although not always used in the same sense, usually the term "church expectant" refers to those who are to believe, but have not yet believed. The "church militant" includes those who are currently living as Christians in this life. The "church triumphant" refers to those who have already completed their earthly course.

J.G.

CHURCH FATHERS. The collective name for all early Christian writers, both male and female—excluding those who were clearly heterodox, such as the Gnostics. The discipline that studies their lives, works, and theology is PATRISTICS—which however also includes the study of early heresies, without which the teachings of the "fathers" would often be incomprehensible. Although not all scholars agree as to the limits of the patristic period, the general consensus is that the last of the Latin fathers was ISIDORE OF SEVILLE, who died in 636, and that the last Greek father was JOHN OF DAMASCUS, who died in 749.

The writings included under this category are extensive, amounting to hundreds of volumes. The earliest were all originally written in Greek. But Latin Christian literature began by A.D. 180, and soon rivaled its Greek counterpart. There are also a number of the fathers who wrote in other languages, particularly Syriac.

J.G.

CHURCH GROWTH. The question of how and why churches grow and flourish in varying numbers has always been of interest to Christians, especially those concerned with the planting of new churches and mission. The subject has been treated in books; in the early years of the twentieth century by ROLAND ALLEN and in recent times by D. A. McGavran in his two books, Bridges of God and How Churches Grow. An institute for the study of church growth exists in Pasadena, California, in association with Fuller Theological Seminary.

Some of the principles accepted by most experts on the subject of church growth and mission developers have been listed as follows: (1) converts should live among their own people; (2) from the moment of baptism every convert should be a witness for Christ; (3) instruction should continue for a long period after baptism; (4) witness should follow the lines of kinship—tribe, family, clan, community; (5) ordinary people can be eloquent witnesses; (6) isolated converts should be regularly visited; (7) evangelism is the responsibility of every Christian but experts may be needed for some special purposes; (8) the habit of intercession for non-Christian friends and family should be encouraged; and (9) the most important witness is the life of the redeemed community.

W.G.

CHURCH HISTORY. See HISTORY OF CHRISTIAN DOCTRINE.

CHURCH MISSIONARY SOCIETY. The principal overseas missionary agency of the Church of England. Founded in 1799, the society initiated Christian witness in Africa, Iran, and other countries of the Middle East, India, Pakistan, Sri Lanka, China, Japan, and also to the Indians of Canada's northwest territories and the Maoris of New Zealand. At the peak of its operations, C.M.S. sponsored more than nine hundred missionaries. There are affiliated, but autonomous, societies operating from Australia, New Zealand, and South Africa.

R.H.

CHURCH OF CHRIST, SCIENTIST. A religious organization or church, founded in the late nineteenth century, in Boston, based on the philosophy of Mary Baker Eddy. Mrs. Eddy said she discovered "Christ Science" in 1866, and called it Christian Science in her book, Science and Health, with Key to the Scriptures (1875). The intellectual background of the movement includes New England TRANSCENDENTALISM, the works of EMANUEL SWENDENBORG, spiritualism, and mesmerism, as well as the faith healing and new thought of Phineas Quimby. Mrs. Eddy said Quimby healed her in 1862. She also believed she had rediscovered some lost emphases of early Christianity, especially Jesus' healing method. Healing through correct thinking or faith remains central to the Christian Science movement. Many people who receive such healing become church members.

Courtesy of Religious News Service

Mary Baker Eddy

In 1882, Mrs. Eddy institutionalized her teachings by founding the First Church of Christ, Scientist, of Boston. This is known as the Mother Church, and all other Christian Science churches and reading rooms throughout the world are regarded as branches. Mrs. Eddy wrote the constitution and bylaws of the First Church herself. At first opposed, Christian Science spread all over the world. The movement is centralized, directed by a self-perpetuating board of five directors, originally named by Mrs. Eddy. This board oversees the publication and distribution of literature, from Mrs. Eddy's writings to the Christian Science Monitor; healing through Christian Science practitioners; lectures; religious education; and the orthodoxy of teaching throughout the movement.

Philosophically, Christian Science is a form of pure IDEALISM and is monistic in its denial of the reality of the material world. Their "all is mind" approach also denies the reality of evil and of sickness. Christian Science has won a great deal of respect in the twentieth century because of the purity of its members' life-styles, the serenity its disciplines encourage, and the objectivity of the Christian Science Monitor. The Bible, interpreted through Mrs. Eddy's teachings, plays a large role in Christian Science.

J.C.

CHURCH OF ENGLAND. See ANGLICAN CHURCHES.

CHURCH OF JESUS CHRIST OF LATTER-DAY SAINTS (MORMONS). A new religion, founded in the United States on April 6, 1830, by JOSEPH SMITH, a farmer in upstate New York, who reported receiving divine revelations through the angel Moroni. The popular and derogatory term "Mormons" was derived from Smith's published account of his claimed revelations.

Smith published the Book of Mormon in 1830. He claimed to have translated it from golden plates hidden in the area that were delivered to him by Moroni. This book alleges to be a record of God's activities among the ancestors of the native Americans, the Indians. The book declares that the ancestors of the Indians were actually the ten lost tribes of the Hebrews, who migrated to America in three waves.

From the beginning the Latter-day Saints had a stormy history, not unlike the experiences of the new religions in the 1970s and 1980s. A Mormon community was gathered and moved to Kirtland, Ohio, in 1831. Smith's area in New York state was one where considerable revivalistic religious frenzy had stirred up the population. In fact, it became known as "the burnt over district." In Kirtland, a community embodying Mormon ideals was begun, but it suffered a financial crisis. Smith moved on to Independence, Missouri, and later to Nauvoo, Illinois. Relative success there brought strong opposition, resulting in violence. The Mormons were driven away in the "Mormon War," which cost the church forty lives and $2 million. During the same period, Smith was killed and BRIGHAM YOUNG assumed leadership. Young organized the remnants of the community and led them on an amazing march to the far west on April 7, 1847. A group of 147 Mormons set out for Utah, settling finally by the Great Salt Lake. Thirty years later, at Young's death, there were 357 Mormon communities in Utah and the West.

The Mormon settlement of Utah made it a prime candidate for statehood, but the Latter-day Saint practice of plural marriage, polygamy, kept it out of the Union. In 1890, then church president Wilford

Woodruff declared polygamy no longer a church teaching. In 1896 Utah became a state. In the 1970s, popular resentment of Mormon teachings about the lower spiritual level of blacks also resulted in a pronouncement by the church president that black men could be admitted to the full order of Mormon priesthood. The strand of gradual accommodation to popular and political pressures toward social respectability seems characteristic of the Mormon movement.

There is a very simple but strong organization in the church, from the local ward, to the stake, up to the council of the seventy, to the twelve apostles, to the president of the church and his two counselors. The president is the supreme authority in the church. There are also patriarchs, high priests, elders, bishops, priests, teachers, and deacons.

Mormon theology is quite complex and eclectic. Formerly, they taught that polygamy was biblical, but do so no longer. They believe the Trinity is made up of three separate gods, that people do not inherit Adam's sin but earn their own punishments or rewards, that Christ atoned for original sin, that people are saved by faith, repentance, baptism by immersion, which gives remission of sins, and by the laying on of hands to receive the Holy Spirit. They believe in speaking in tongues, prophecy, revelations and visions, and divine healing. They also believe in continuing revelation; that God continues to reveal new truths and so believe the Book of Mormon is the Word of God as well as the Bible.

The Mormons are very evangelistic and are presently one of the fastest growing religious groups in the United States. A new Mormon temple was opened in Washington, D.C. in the 1970s.

J.C.

CHURCH OF SCOTLAND. See PRESBYTERIAN CHURCHES.

CHURCH OF THE BRETHREN. The German Baptists, originating in 1708 at Schwarzenau, Germany, as a pietistic, ANABAPTIST protest against the Lutheran and Reformed established churches. The Brethren are also known as Taufer, Tunkels, Dompe-laars, and Dunkards—all German terms referring to baptism. They were most popularly known historically as Tunkels (Baptists); the term derives from the German tunken, meaning "to dip or immerse." The Brethren's mode of baptism is unique. The candidate for baptism kneels and is pushed forward into the water three times.

As pietists, the Brethren seek less formal worship, less emphasis upon dogma, and more warmth in daily religious living. Historically, the Brethren are a "peace church," opposing participation in war, as well as the taking of oaths and membership in secret societies.

Doctrinally, the Brethren follow a common free church theology but officially reject all creeds and follow only the NT. Some portions of the OT are rejected because they are believed to uphold slavery, divorce, war, and revenge. The Brethren recognize four ordinances: baptism, the Lord's Supper, the anointing of the sick, and the laying on of hands.

In polity, voting delegates from each congregation meet for the annual conference. This conference elects twenty-five members to the General Brotherhood Board, which manages the daily life of the church. The Church of the Brethren belongs to both the National Council of Churches and the World Council of Churches.

J.C.

CHURCH OF THE NAZARENE. A denomination that arose from the "second work of grace" or complete SANCTIFICATION movement; a development of the HOLINESS and PENTECOSTAL movements in American FUNDAMENTALISM around the end of the nineteenth century.

The Church of the Nazarene was formed from a union of several associations of congregations that held strong beliefs about the doctrine of entire sanctification as a work of the Holy Spirit distinct from and following after justification. The Nazarene movement began on both coasts of the United States. In Los Angeles, an organization calling itself the Church of the Nazarene began in 1895. Meanwhile, a number of independent Holiness churches in New England formed the Association of Pentecostal Churches of America in 1897. Delegates from the eastern group attended the meetings of the California group in 1906 and proposed a union. This proposal was accepted and the union effected in Chicago in October 1907. In 1908, another union, with the Holiness Church of Christ, centered in the South and Southwest, took place. A manual of discipline was adopted by the church.

The manual details nine fundamental doctrines; belief in these is a basic requirement for church membership. They are: the Holy Trinity; the divine inspiration of the Bible; the fall of humanity; the eternal damnation of the ultimately impenitent; the atonement of Christ; the entire sanctification of believers by faith, subsequent to justification; the witness of the Holy Spirit to justification and sanctification; the return of Christ (Second Coming); and the resurrection of the dead and final judgment. Additionally, rules of conduct for members, like those in the early Wesleyan tradition, are set down in the manual. The use of alcohol and tobacco, and membership in secret societies are totally banned for members.

In polity, the Church of the Nazarene has district assemblies and a general assembly. The General Assembly elects general superintendents who hold executive authority between sessions of the assembly. These general superintendents preside at the general assembly and the district assemblies, ordain elders, appoint evangelists, and generally direct the work of the church. Licensed preachers can be elevated to elders (full ministerial) orders by the various district assemblies. The local church boards contact pastors directly to fill vacant pulpits.

J.C.

CHURCH: VISIBLE AND INVISIBLE. The church is the Lord's body; the term derived from the Greek Kuriakou. In the NT, the term ekklēsia is used to mean the assembly of those called by God.

The distinction between the church visible and the church invisible goes back to Augustine. Luther used the distinction, and the concept plays a much Lutheran and other Protestant theology. There is only one church—the one, holy, Catholic, and Apostolic church, which is visible in the world wherever the word is rightly preached and the sacraments rightly administered. The invisible church is made up of those truly "saved."

J.C.

CHURCH WORLD SERVICE. The relief, rehabilitation, and resettlement agency of American Protestant and Orthodox churches, founded in 1946 by several national and international church groups. CWS became a department of the National Council of Churches when it was formed in 1950, and in 1965 was joined with the council's Division of Foreign Missions to form the Division of Overseas Ministries. Since its founding, CWS has shipped billions of pounds of clothing, food, medicines, and resettled more than 200,000 refugees in the U.S.A. CWS also helped to organize the Christian Rural Overseas Program (CROP) as a food collection agency of American farmers and maintains clothing centers in various parts of the country for the gathering and processing of clothing.

W.G.

CILICIA. A Roman province in Southeast Asia Minor. The name comes from bilakku, an Assyrian name for its population. The western part, Cilicia Trachea, is made up of the Taurus Mountains, along with the Cilician Gates and TARSUS. The eastern part, Cilicia Pedias, is a fertile, well-watered, subtropical, coastal plain.

The only OT references to Cilicia are I Kings 10:28 and II Chronicles 1:16, where Kue, from which Solomon's traders bought horses, is known to be east Cilicia. Cilician Jews shared the Synagogue of the Freedmen in Jerusalem (Acts 6:9). References to Cilicia in Acts and Galatians 1:21 relate to Paul's connections with Tarsus and his travels through the province.

P.L.G.

CIRCUMCISION. Requiring the removal of the foreskin, a ceremony performed on eight-day-old males symbolizing their participation as sons of the COVENANT binding Yahweh and Israel (Gen. 17:9-14). Circumcision was ordinarily implemented by fathers (21:4) who initially used flint knives (Josh. 5:2-3).

Near Eastern Context. The extent to which circumcision was practiced by Israel's neighbors is debated. Although the practice was attested in third-millennium B.C. Egyptian bas-reliefs, uncircumcised mummies are known. If Jeremiah 9:25-26 mentions circumcised Egyptians, Edomites, Ammonites, Moabites, and Arabians, Ezekiel 32:21-30 anticipates that the Egyptians will join the Assyrians, Elamites, Edomites, Phoenicians, and Syrians in an underworld region reserved for the uncircumcised. Circumcision was presumably widespread among Canaanite inhabitants, but a non-Semitic enclave at Shechem had to be circumcised before marrying eligible Israelite maidens (Gen. 34:13-24). For not embracing this practice, the Philistines were contemptuously called "the uncircumcised" (I Sam. 14:6; 31:4).

Generally circumcision was performed before marriage to facilitate sexual readiness. Narratives about the circumcision of the Shechemites (Gen. 34:13-24) and Moses ("a bridegroom of blood," Exod. 4:24-26) suggest that the Israelites behaved similarly. Indeed, the Arabic verb hatan ("to circumcise") spawned three Hebrew nouns—"bridegroom," "son-in-law," "father-in-law." Figurative uses, including uncircumcised hearts and lips to symbolize failure in perception and speaking (Jer. 9:26; Exod. 6:12), also hint that circumcision denoted readiness for adulthood.

Israelite Significance. The Bible reports that circumcision was first observed by the patriarchs, maintained during Egyptian captivity, ignored in the wilderness, and resumed after entry into Canaan (Gen. 34:13-24; Josh. 5:4-9). Circumcision was mandated of Israelite slaves and any resident aliens observing the Passover (Exod. 12:43-49). Prior to the early fifth century B.C., circumcision was made an infancy rite (Gen. 17:12; Lev. 12:3). With circumcision declining among Israel's neighbors, it superbly served as a distinguishing mark of covenantal communion with Yahweh. Israelite males joined Abraham's son, Isaac, in being circumcised on the eighth day (Gen. 21:4). Many Jews resisted Antiochus Epiphanes' second-century B.C. campaign to prohibit this Greek-scorned practice (I Macc. 1:60-61).

Jesus and Paul were circumcised (Luke 2:21; Phil. 3:5). Though some Jewish Christians demanded circumcision of Gentile converts, the Jerusalem Council (Acts 15) upheld the Gentile view that it was not binding on Christians. Here Paul was influential. He believed that "real circumcision is a matter of the heart" (Rom. 2:29).

J.K.K.

CISTERCIANS. One of the many orders resulting from movements of reformation within Benedictine MONASTICISM. The Cistercians, also known as "white monks," take this name from their mother house at Citeaux, founded in 1098 by Robert of Molesme. But what gave the order its great impetus was the fame and influence of BERNARD OF CLAIRVAUX, who joined it in 1112 and is called its second founder. Since Bernard was one of the most famous preachers of the twelfth century, as well as one of the most influential leaders of the church, many followed his example. A hundred years after the founding of the first Cistercian house, there were more than five hundred Cistercian abbeys scattered throughout western Europe.

The Cistercians deplored the manner in which the rule of St. BENEDICT had been relaxed, particularly in that which had to do with manual labor and simplicity of life. For that reason they usually settled in barren lands, which they made fruitful through their efforts, and they thus contributed to the economic development of Europe. Eventually, however, the tilling of the land was left in the hands of lay brothers, and many felt the need for a new reformation of the order. The most notable outcome of these movements of reform among the Cistercians produced the TRAPPISTS, founded in the seventeenth century.

J.G.

CITY OF REFUGE. Six Levitical centers designed as asylum-towns to shelter those accidentally committing homicide (Num. 35:9-15).

Replacing the earlier custom of seeking refuge at the local sanctuary with its inviolable altar (Exod. 21:13-14), this procedure was probably established during the tenth century B.C. as a way of normalizing judicial practices within the burgeoning united monarchy. Thus personal vengeance was appreciably restrained and the land in which Yahweh "dwelt" was less often polluted by wanton bloodshed (Num. 35:34).

According to Numbers 35:13-14, three Levitical cities on each side of the Jordan were to be designated as asylums. Deuteronomy 4:41-43 discloses that Moses set apart Bezer in Reuben, Ramoth-gilead in Gad, and Golan in Bashan in the half-tribe of Manasseh as suitable Transjordanian locations. Joshua 20:7 reports that after the takeover of Canaan, Joshua and the tribal chiefs appointed Kadesh in Naphtali, Shechem in Ephraim, and Hebron in Judah to serve as asylum-towns to the west of the Jordan. Since all six are mentioned anew as Levitical cities in Joshua 21 (vv. 13, 21, 27, 32, 36, 38), each may have hosted an important sanctuary (Shechem and Hebron were known for such).

Although Deuteronomy 19:5 offers a legislative illustration involving an accidentally flung ax head, no biblical text poses as a historical illustration of how this institution actually functioned. The person guilty of accidental homicide presumably hastened to the nearest asylum-town. If not slain en route by the deceased's next-of-kin avenger, the guilty one was tried there by its elders (Josh. 20:4; surely an entire "congregation" was not involved as Num. 35:12 reports). The slayer was delivered to death if judged guilty of deliberate murder, or granted asylum if declared innocent. Such asylum necessitated residence in that city until the death of its high priest. Premature departure was risky because the roving avenger could kill the slayer with impunity. If the slayer accepted enforced detention until the high priest's death, the slayer was then permitted safe journey homeward (Josh. 20:6). Though murderers were expected to expiate the deed by their own deaths at the hands of the next of kin, in instances of unpremeditated homicide the high priest's death was deemed a worthy substitute.

J.K.K.

CIVIL RELIGION. A term denoting the melding of national and religious goals. Civil religion emerged in America with the Puritans, who thought of themselves as chosen by God to establish a New Israel where magistrate and minister would work hand in hand. William Bradford's History of Plymouth Plantation portrayed the Pilgrims as saints commissioned by God. Edward Johnson's Wonder-Working Providence of Sions Saviour in New England (1654) told of God's active assistance in colonial America.

Robert Bellah in "Civil Religion in America" (Daedalus, 1967) found strong civil religion in the inaugural speeches of United States presidents. As the nation expanded, chosenness developed into a national myth. American success represented God's blessings (Deut. 28). Liberal Christianity spoke of a kingdom of God being realized through social progress, and Fundamentalist Christianity stressed chosenness, individual piety, and a national mission to export Christian democracy. Sidney E. Mead in The Lively Experiment (1963) said the identification of American churches with nationalism was as complete as had ever been known in Christendom. However, the comfortable church-state consensus of religiosity and patriotism was denounced theologically in the Neo-orthodoxy of Karl Barth and Reinhold Niebuhr and was shaken by the defeat of the United States in Vietnam. Peter Berger's Noise of Solemn Assemblies (1961) called for the rejection of civil religion's reduction of religion to a corollary of national success.

Civil religion reaches back to ancient times when countries and even cities often had their own gods. Israel regarded itself as covenantally bound to God. Christian civil religion emerged when Constantine's Edict of Milan (313) established a partnership between church and state. Throughout the Middle Ages heresy and treason were virtually interchangeable capital crimes. Under Hitler the church in Germany became a governmental bureau to justify Nazism, and in the U.S.S.R. the Russian Orthodox Church is directed by the state. Degrees of acculturation vary greatly, but if religion is confined to other worldly matters, religion is doomed to irrelevance. If religion is immersed in worldly affairs, compromise of religion looms. On the one hand, relevant Christian activity in the world is at stake, and, on the other, a compromising of divine sovereignty.

One of the first Christian writers to oppose civil religion was Tertullian (about 145–220). In On Idolatry, he called for Christians to break with the world, saying even ordinary activities of merchants compromise loyalty to God by contributing to idolatrous emperor worship. Augustine's City of God posited an earthly city based on love of self in its many forms and a heavenly city based on love of God to the relative exclusion of self-love. Only love of God can bring fulfillment, but in this world the two cities are commingled, human beings participate in both, and relative goods are to be found in both. Augustine knew that creation and the Incarnation bolster worldly involvement and that divine sovereignty and the cross negate human arrangements. Christians see the need to participate in politics; they also see the need to maintain divine sovereignty. Civil religion stands as a compromise of both.

C.M.

CLASSIS. A geographical ecclesiastical governing body in the REFORMED tradition; the same as a presbytery in the Prebyterian churches. The classis is made up of all the clergy and elected representative lay elders in the territory. It oversees congregations and the work of the clergy, and ordains and disciplines pastors.

J.C.

CLAUDIUS (10 B.C.–A.D. 54). Roman Emperor from A.D. 41 to 54, successor to his nephew Gaius (CALIGULA). According to Acts 18:2, Claudius "commanded all the Jews to leave Rome." Just as Paul came to Corinth (about A.D. 50), he met Aquila and Priscilla, who "lately" had come from Italy. Since neither Paul (Rom. 16:3) nor the author of Acts report that this couple were converts of the apostle, it is probable that they were already Christians when he met them. It is also probable that Christians in Rome were partly responsible for the action of Claudius.

Courtesy of the American Numismatic Society

Claudius

According to the Roman historian Suetonius, the emperor's edict was caused by Jews who were constantly rioting "at the instigation of a certain Chrestus" (impulsore Chresto quodam). Of course Christ (Christus/ Chrestus) was not in Rome in the time of Claudius, but Suetonius may have thought so. It is an almost certain inference that the rioting in Rome twenty years earlier was due to the introduction of Christianity into Rome's Jewish colony, and because of disputations among Christian and non-Christian Jews both were expelled. There is no evidence that the Edict of Claudius was formally rescinded to permit the return of Jews and Jewish-Christians to Rome. Just as a similar edict of Tiberias was nullified by this emperor's demise, so with Claudius' death the ban lapsed. With NERO's persecution a new chapter opened in the relations of church and empire.

J.L.P.

CLEAN AND UNCLEAN. Cleanness is the absence of physical, ceremonial, and ethical impurities that produce uncleanness.

Introduction. As a nation that took seriously the divine imperative, "You shall be holy; for I the Lord your God am holy" (Lev. 19:2), Israel developed elaborate legislation that addressed diverse situations marred by uncleanness. Detailed laws were mainly codified by priests active during the monarchy and early postexilic era. Theirs was the task "to distinguish between the holy and the common, and between the unclean and the clean" (Lev. 10:10; Ezek. 22:26). Issues involving ethical cleanness are often reflected in prophetic, wisdom, and psalm texts, but not at the expense of treating ceremonial cleanness with indifference. Above all, cleanness is perceived in the NT as an inner disposition. It receives apt expression in Jesus' teaching that "the things which come out of a man are what defile him" (Mark 7:15).

Varieties of Uncleanness. Because the spirits of the deceased might lurk nearby, human corpses defiled those touching them (Num. 19:11). With their disfigured skin, lepers were diagnosed as unclean (Lev. 13); once healed, they submitted to elaborate purifications (Lev. 14). Such bodily discharges as the menstrual flow (Lev. 15:19-24), semen (Lev. 15:18), and excretions accompanying childbirth (Lev. 12:2-5) induced uncleanness. Food could not be eaten from such unclean animals as those dying of natural causes (Deut. 14:21), those that failed both to divide the hoof and chew the cud (Lev. 11:3-7; Deut. 14:7-8), and flesh-eating birds (Lev. 11:13-19). Sometimes places sanctified by God's presence were declared unclean due to intrusive human pollution. Thus violence, sin, and idolatry respectively defiled the Israelite soil (Ezek. 22:24-29), Jerusalem (Lam. 1:8), and its Temple (II Chr. 29:12-19). Uncleanness was typically overcome by purification rituals involving a waiting period (Lev. 15:28), a cleansing element such as fire (Num. 31:23) or water (Ezek. 36:25), and sacrificial offering (Lev. 12:6).

Moral Cleanness. That concern for ethical purity resident in the prophetic admonition to be clean by ceasing to do evil (Isa. 1:16), and in the Psalms' references to clean hands (Ps. 18:20) and heart (Ps. 51:10), intensifies in the NT, where cleanness entails an affirmation of spiritual holiness (I Thess. 4:7). Paul and other Gentiles claiming that "nothing is unclean in itself" (Rom. 14:14) could ignore Jewish dietary regulations in the spirit of Jesus (Mark 7:15) without jeopardizing their quest for moral cleanness.

J.K.K.

CLEMENT XI, POPE. Giovanni Francesco Albani was made a cardinal in 1690 and was pope from 1700 to 1721. A scholar and a lover of the arts, when elected pope he was thrust in the midst of difficult political circumstances. The dominant event of his reign was the War of Spanish Succession, in which Clement at first supported the French. But when Austrian troops invaded Italy, the pope was forced to abandon his French ally. The result was that when the treaties of Utrecht and Rastatt put an end to the conflict the Papacy lost many of its territories.

Clement also had to deal with the continued controversy over JANSENISM, which he condemned in the bull "Vineam Domine Sabaoth." In China, and to a lesser degree in India, he intervened in the dispute between Jesuits and Dominicans over the question of accommodation. His decision against the Jesuits, who had gained great favor in China, dealt a severe blow to the church in that country.

J.G.

CLEMENT XIV, POPE. Pope from 1769 to 1774. The most notable event of his reign, which overshadowed his many accomplishments, was the suppression of the JESUITS. For several reasons, that order had won the enmity of the House of Bourbon, and in 1769 the courts of Spain, France, and Naples requested that they be suppressed. The pope's initial resistance was overcome, and the bull "Dominus ac Redemptor," of August 16, 1773, formally dissolved the order. The rulers of Russia and Prussia, who had reason to fear Bourbon power, refused to obey, and thus the Jesuits continued existing as a legal order in portions of Germany and Russia. Jesuit historians have depicted Clement as a weak pope who buckled under political pressure, while others have praised his courage in suppressing an order that was becoming too powerful. The truth probably lies between these extreme judgments.

J.G.

CLEMENT OF ALEXANDRIA. One of the greatest theologians of the second century. A native of Athens, after his conversion to Christianity he traveled in search of "true wisdom," which he found in the Alexandrian teacher Pantaenus. He then settled in ALEXANDRIA, where he eventually succeeded Pantaenus as head of the catechetical school. In A.D. 202, the persecution of Septimius Severus forced him to leave Alexandria, and after that time little is known of his life. He probably died about A.D. 215. In Alexandria, he was succeeded by his disciple ORIGEN, who developed his theology along the lines set by Clement.

Five works of Clement are extant: Exhortation to the Greeks, The Instructor, The Stromata, Who Is the Rich to Be Saved? and Excerpts from Theodotus. The first three are the most important and form a trilogy: the first is an apologetic work, addressed to the pagans; the second seeks to instruct the believer in matters of the faith; and the third appears to be a series of notes for a more systematic work.

Clement was convinced that philosophy had been given to the Gentiles to lead them to Christ, just as the Law had been given to the Jews for the same purpose. Therefore, a great deal of his theology is in truth an interpretation of Christianity from the perspective of middle PLATONISM. This he did by means of allegorical interpretations of Scripture and on the basis of the doctrine of the LOGOS, which inspired both Scripture and philosophy, and which was incarnate in Jesus. Although his works were not widely read after his death, he was influential in the later course of theology through his disciple Origen and may be said to be the first great teacher of the Alexandrian school.

J.G.

CLEMENT OF ROME. Bishop of Rome toward the end of the first century, and author of an "Epistle to the Corinthians." His main concern there is the unity of Christians and the need for harmony. Most other information about him is of doubtful authority. Among other things, his place in the list of the early bishops of ROME varies, and for that reason some have suggested that in early times there was a "collegiate" episcopacy in that city. There is also a possibility that he may be the same as "Flavius Clemens," martyred in Rome during the reign of DOMITIAN. The "Second Epistle of Clement to the Corinthians" is not his, but is rather a second-century homily calling believers to repentance. Later, a number of adventures were ascribed to Clement in the Pseudo-Clementine literature, some of which seems to have originated in Gnostic circles.

J.G.

CLEOPAS. One of two disciples going to Emmaus on the first Easter when Jesus appeared to them (Luke 24:18). The name is Greek and is not to be confused with Clopas (John 19:25), a Semitic name.

P.L.G.

CLEPHANE, ELIZABETH CECILIA DOUGLAS (1830-69). Born June 18 in Edinburgh, Scotland, Elizabeth Clephane first published "The Ninety and Nine" as a poem in The Children's Hour in 1868. Also well known is her hymn "Beneath the Cross of Jesus." She also wrote "Dim Eyes Forever Closed," "Into His Summer Garden," "The Day Is Drawing Nearly Done," and "Who Climbeth Up Too High." Her charitable work earned her the nickname Sunbeam among the poor and suffering of Melrose, where she lived.

In 1874, during D. L. MOODY's revivals in the British Isles, his music director IRA D. SANKEY picked up a paper to read on the train, noticed the above-mentioned poem, and clipped it. The next night in Edinburgh, Moody preached a sermon on "The Good Shepherd," and asked Sankey for a closing hymn. Suddenly Sankey remembered the poem and felt compelled by the Spirit to use it even though he had given no previous thought to music for it. He simply struck a chord in A flat and began. The music, which came note by note, remained unchanged from its now familiar tune. She died on February 19.

N.H.

CLINICAL PASTORAL EDUCATION. The system of education that began with the goal of bringing a professional dimension to pastoral ministry by placing theological students in supervised fieldwork settings. The need was early observed by Richard C. Cabot, M.D., of Harvard, who worked with a group of newly developing pastoral counselors to incorporate the Council for the Clinical Training of Theological Students in 1930. ANTON T. BOISEN, one of the founding group, disagreed with the insistence of some that general hospital settings were the most acceptable. He established programs in mental hospitals, first at Worcester, Massachusetts, and later at Elgin, Illinois. Eventually there were two organizations: the Institute of Pastoral Care and the Council for Clinical Training. A merger occurred in 1967 with the establishment of the Association for Clinical Pastoral Education.

The association is characterized by careful attention to the accreditation of hospital programs and of chaplain supervisors. The professionalism of the institutional setting encourages theological students to see their work professionally. Working with people in crisis situations challenges them to bring the resources of faith to meet such needs.

The term "education" rather than "training" suggests the added dimension of reflection on the experience. Students are required to become engaged in self-understanding. Working in small supervised groups enables students to have responses to and from patients, hospital personnel, and other students. A typical clinical pastoral education program requires a concentrated period of work/study—up to forty hours a week for several months. Seminaries look upon CPE as a valuable tool for professional ministerial preparation. They help develop programs, encourage use, and give academic credit for completion.

I.C.

CLOUD OF UNKNOWING, THE. An anonymous English mystical treatise, probably dating from the fourteenth century. It has been attributed to several English mystics, Richard Rolle among them. But the nature of its MYSTICISM is such that it probably should not be ascribed to any of the known English mystics. It is deeply influenced by the Platonism of DIONYSIUS the Areopagite, and its author was probably the equally anonymous translator of Dionysius' Mystical Theology, published under the English title of Hid Divinite. Its mysticism follows the "negative" way of the false Dionysius, based on the assumption that the intellect is incapable of knowing God. Contemplation is therefore an act not of the intellect, but rather of the affective faculty of the mind (see CONTEMPLATIVE LIFE). The ultimate is always hidden, even from the highest form of contemplative prayer, by a "cloud of unknowing"—hence the title of the work.

J.G.

CLUNY. A monastic house founded in 909 under the direction of Berno, which became the source for a vast reformation of MONASTICISM. Berno ruled at Cluny until 926, and then a series of able and long-lived abbots continued his work: Odo (926–44), Aymard (944–65), Mayeul (965–94), Odilo (994–1049), and Hugh (1049–1109). Thus, over a period of two centuries Cluny was ruled by six abbots. Although the seventh abbot was not of the caliber of his predecessors, the eighth, Peter the Venerable, regained much of what had been lost.

The influence of Cluny was far-reaching. Soon hundreds of "second Clunys" were founded and placed under the direction of the mother house. Although they did not form an order in the strict sense, their connection through their common abbot was such that it is customary to speak of the "order of Cluny." There were also Cluniac houses for women, of which the first was Marcigny.

The main occupation of the Cluniacs was the DIVINE OFFICE, to which they devoted so much time that at the apex of the movement 138 psalms were said every day. This led to the abandonment of manual labor, which was one of the pillars of Benedictine monasticism, and therefore other movements of monastic reformation arose. The ideals of Cluny made such an impact on the church at large that the reformation of GREGORY VII was largely patterned after them.

J.G.

COCCEIUS, JOHANNES (1603–69). The greatest representative of covenant or FEDERAL THEOLOGY was born in Bremen, Germany, and taught in Franeker and Leyden, where he died. As a biblical theologian and interpreter, Cocceius, through his hermeneutics, influenced the rise of the critical study of Scripture. His view of humanity as created in process toward consummation in God offers an alternative to Augustinian views of creation, history, and Jesus Christ. This view has been important in modern theology and social thought.

C.M.

CODEx. There were two principal types of books in ancient times, the roll (or scroll) and the codex. The term codex means "leaf-book" and refers to books made from either parchment or papyrus leaves sewn together in the center, making the type of book with which we are familiar today. The roll, which was the older form, was made by simply sewing sheets together end to end up to a maximum average length of about thirty-five feet and then winding each end of the long sheet around a stick. It appears that the church adopted the more economical and convenient format of the codex for the production of its biblical books around the second century, while the Jewish synagogue continued to use the roll form as it does today for its most valuable copies of the Torah. As of 1976 the total number of NT manuscripts catalogued was 5,366, with 88 of these being papyri and 274 being uncial parchment.

The following are a few of the more important codices of the Bible. (1) Codex Alexandrinus—a fifth-century manuscript containing the OT, which is partly mutilated, and most of the NT. All of Matthew up to chapter 25 is lost, as well as the leaves that contained John 6:50–8:52 and II Corinthians 4:13–12:6. It was given to King Charles of England in 1627 by the Patriarch of Constantinople and now resides in the British Museum. (2) Codex Bezae—a fifth- or sixth-century manuscript written in Greek and Latin and containing most of the text of the four Gospels and Acts with a small fragment of III John. It was given to the library at Cambridge University in 1581 by Theodore Bezae. (3) Codex Ephraemi—a fifth-century manuscript that was erased during the twelfth century and much of it rewritten with a Greek translation of the sermons of St. Ephraem, a Syrian church leader of a century earlier. Scientific methods were used to bring out the underlying text containing portions of every book in the NT except II Thessalonians and II John. Only a small part of the OT remains. (4) Codex SINAITICUS—a fourth-century codex discovered by Constantine von Tischendorf in St. Catherine's Convent at the foot of Mt. Sinai in 1844. All of the NT was found intact and a considerable portion of the OT. In 1975 at least eight and perhaps as many as fourteen additional folios of this manuscript were found when workmen were repairing one of the walls of the convent. The codex was given to the Czar of Russia by the monastery, and in 1933, after the Russian revolution, it was sold to the British Museum, where it now resides. (5) Codex Vaticanus—one of the earliest and most valuable manuscripts of the Bible in Greek dates to the middle of the fourth century. It is missing almost forty-six chapters of Genesis, about thirty Psalms, and everything from Hebrews 9:14 onward. It resides in the Vatican Library in Rome and is thus called Codex Vaticanus. (See also WRITING AND WRITING MATERIALS.)

J.R.M.

CODEx JURIS CANONICI. The universal, systematic, ecclesiastical law of the Roman Catholic church, which deals with the constitution of the church, the relations between it and other bodies, and internal matters such as discipline, canonization, and beatification.

J.R.M.

COGHILL, ANNIE LOUISA WALKER (1836–1907). Author of the hymn "Work, for the Night Is Coming," Coghill was born near Staffordshire, England, the youngest of three daughters of Robert Walker, a civil engineer.

About 1857 the sisters moved to Canada, where they opened a private girls' school. During this period Anna wrote her hymn. In 1863 she returned to England, working as a governess and book reviewer. She married Harry Coghill, a wealthy merchant, in 1883.

N.H.

COGITO ERGO SUM. See DESCARTES, RENE.

COKE, THOMAS. An early companion of JOHN WESLEY, who, together with Wesley and a third Anglican priest, ordained the first two Methodist ministers and commissioned them to go to America. The next day, Coke was made a superintendent by Wesley and sent with the other two to the New World. The Christmas Conference of 1784 made him, jointly with FRANCIS ASBURY, one of the two superintendents or "bishops" of the newly founded Methodist Episcopal church.

J.G.

Thomas Coke

COLERIDGE, SAMUEL TAYLOR (1772–1834). Poet, philosopher, literary critic, and theologian, who was largely responsible for the rebirth of a vital English theology in the early decades of the nineteenth century. Coleridge represents the protest of English ROMANTICISM against the RATIONALISM and the decrepit orthodoxy of the eighteenth century. His writings had an important influence on J. H. NEWMAN, on F. D. MAURICE, and on many Broad Church and liberal Anglican theologians.

Coleridge's spiritual philosophy owed much to the poet WILLIAM WORDSWORTH and to his reading of KANT. Together they introduced Coleridge to the imaginative and active character of the mind, to what he called the power of reason, by which intellect, the senses, and the will together intuitively grasp spiritual truth. Coleridge contrasted reason with understanding, the empirical faculty which judges only according to the senses and which he saw as the source of materialism, atheism, and utilitarianism.

Coleridge abhorred the "proofs" of Christianity offered by NATURAL THEOLOGY and called for a moral and experiential test of religion. In Aids to Reflection he wrote "Evidences of Christianity! I am weary of the word. Make a man feel the want of it; rouse him to the self-knowledge of his need of it; and you may safely trust it to its own evidence." In his Confessions of an Inquiring Spirit, posthumously published (1840), Coleridge attacked "Bibliolatry," the belief in the literal inerrancy of Scripture, as well as the "negative dogmatism" of the skeptical rationalists. He insisted that the Bible's authority lies in its spiritual "fitness to our nature and our needs." Coleridge's Constitution of Church and State (1830) influenced Thomas Arnold (1795–1842) and others.

J.L.

COLLECT. A short prayer of gathering or "collection" that concludes the entrance ritual at Catholic mass, and the Confession, Kyrie, and the Gloria in Excelsis in the Lutheran, Anglican, and Methodist services. It gathers up the individual prayers of the worshipping community. It is called the opening prayer in the revised Roman missal.

J.C.

COLLEGE OF CARDINALS. The whole body of cardinals of the Roman Catholic church, which together make up the advisory body of the pope. CARDINALS are officers ranking just below the pope, and on the death of a pope they elect a new one. During the vacancy, the cardinals administer the Catholic church.

The sacred college is divided into three orders: cardinal bishops, cardinal priests, and cardinal deacons. The ranking cardinal bishop serves as the dean of the College of Cardinals.

The cardinals play a major role in the governance of the church, both by virtue of their advisory role to the pope and by their offices as heads of various bureaus and congregations. The principle of collegiality affirms that the pope shares power as primus inter partes with the whole body of bishops of the Roman Catholic church. This was defined by Vatican II under John XXIII and Paul VI.

J.C.

COLOSSAE. A great, ancient Phrygian city in Southwest Asia Minor, in the valley of the Lycus River near its joining with the Meander. Laodicea and Hieropolis developed as rival cities in Roman times. Colossae remained an active center of wool trade. Indications in the letters to the Colossians and Philemon suggest what life in Colossae was like in NT times. There was a house church in Colossae (Col. 1:2) that, despite its problems, survived under the name Saint Michael's through Byzantine times.

P.L.G.

COLOSSIANS. A letter of Paul to the church at Colossae.

Background and Destination. The city of Colossae lay in the valley of the Lycus River, in the southern part of ancient Phrygia, which would now be located in the west of modern Turkey.

When Paul wrote to the Christians living at Colossae, the city's population consisted of indigenous Phrygian and Greek settlers. Colossae was thus a cosmopolitan city in which diverse cultural and religious elements met and mingled—a fact which is important to remember when the origins of the Colossian "philosophy" (2:8) are sought.

The Christian gospel was introduced to Colossae during Paul's Ephesian ministry (Acts 19:10). The most likely person to have carried the message of Christ to Colossae was Epaphras, who was a native of the city (4:12).

Occasion and Purpose. During one of Paul's imprisonments (see below), news came to him of a threat to the Colossian church. The occasion of this letter may be traced to this impending danger and the need to rebut the error which lay at the heart of a strange doctrine.

Nowhere in the letter does Paul give a formal definition of the teaching, and its thrust only can be inferred. Yet it seems to have been a fusion of pagan and Judaic speculation, which resulted in a syncretism. The features of the religious amalgam were forms of ascetic practice and discipline, the cult of angelic worship (2:18), and a pride in superior wisdom and knowledge (Greek, gnōsis, or "knowledge").

Paul brands these notions as "self-abasement" (2:23) and as a species of human wisdom (2:8), essentially human devised just as the claim to "visions" (2:18) is a piece of self-deception. Positively he declares that all the fullness dwells in Christ, not in the angels (1:19; 2:9). Against the false claim to wisdom and knowledge, Paul protests that there is no higher mystery than Christ (2:2-3) who may be known not to a spiritual elite but to all people (1:26-28). The conclusion Paul enforces is irresistible: you died with Christ (at conversion-baptism) from the control of the elemental spirits (2:12, 20).

Another tenet of the Colossian errorists was DUALISM in which the high God was thought of as remote from matter, which, in turn, was considered to be alien to him. To attain to God one must be delivered from the evil influences of material things. This "liberation" was achieved along two quite diverse routes. One path to Gnostic salvation was ASCETICISM, which summoned the devotee to a life of abstinence and self-punishment (2:21, 23).

The other direction arising from GnosticisM was libertinism. If matter has no relation to God (the argument ran), then the material body has no relation to religion. Therefore one can indulge the body without restraint or conscience.

Place of Origin. Paul writes the letter as a prisoner (4:3, 10, 18). Acts tells of several places where Paul was detained for some length of time. The captivity at Jerusalem is hardly a viable possibility for the origin of this letter, as Paul had no opportunity for writing. The choice seems then to be a straightforward alternative: Caesarea or Rome. A third place name, however, is that of Ephesus or somewhere near the capital city of proconsular Asia, where according to Acts 19 and 20 Paul underwent a series of trials. Incidental allusions to this hypothetical Ephesian captivity are discovered in I Corinthians 15:32 and a graphic description in II Corinthians 1:8-10.

The traditional placing of the letter (a view which goes back to Chrysostom) during the time of Paul's custody at Rome (Acts 28) has many points to commend it. But the present writer argues for an Ephesian origin of Colossians.

Authorship and Date. The authorship of this letter is disputed in recent study. Those who deny the letter to Paul's hand do so on the ground of the letter's developed teaching on Christ's person, traces of a more formal attitude to Paul's apostleship, as well as a distinctive word usage that seems to put Colossians in a class apart from the undisputed Pauline letters. None of these points seems compelling, though E. Schweizer's proposal that a contemporary disciple of Paul used Paul's materials to edit the letter, thus explaining the unusual terms and phraseology, has tried to account for the marked features of Colossians.

The letter comes either from Paul's Ephesian (A.D. 55) or Roman (A.D. 60-62) imprisonment, or was published by his disciples after his death in A.D. 65.

Theology. The one section of the Epistle, which may be treated as non-Pauline in the sense that Paul has taken it over and embodied it in the letter, is the rich christological passage, 1:15-20. This hymn contains an unusual vocabulary and a number of unique stylistic traits. Its purpose is both polemical (in opposing the false teaching, see above) and positive (in setting forth the true doctrine of the person and place of the cosmic Christ who is both Lord of creation and author of reconciliation). This is the important message of Colossians: "Christ is all, and in all" (3:11). CHRISTOLOGY for Paul is linked with Christian ethics, and the bridge is the call of 2:20 and 3:1-3. It is the ethical appeal of death to the old world of sin and self and resurrection to a new life in Christ. The ramifications of this new life are seen in the practical relationships of the home and family (3:19-21), masters and slaves (3:22-4:1), and the believers' conduct in the world (4:5, 6).

R.M.

COMFORTER. See HOLY SPIRIT.

COMMANDMENTS. See TEN COMMANDMENTS.

COMMISSION, THE GREAT. An expression uniquely associated with Matthew 28:16-20 but also related to Luke 24:36-49; John 20:19-23; Acts 1:6-11, and, for some to Mark 16:14-20 (the longer ending). The expression as such does not appear in the biblical text. It was, and is, widely popular with the relatively modern, evangelical Protestant world missionary movement. Creed-like, it affirms the multifaceted relationship between Jesus and the church. The Matthew passage, standing at the very end of the book and possessing such an awe-inspiring atmosphere, has impressed some students of literature as a kind of farewell address.

The main verb in Matthew 28:19 is not "Go," as the English translation suggests, but "make disciples" or literally "disciple." The Greek verb matheteúsbai is Matthew's special term for becoming a follower of Christ (compare 13:22 and 27:57). The word's literal meaning is to "deepen the temporary and mainly intellectual relation of teacher-to-pupil." Following somewhat the relation between a Jewish rabbi and a DISCIPLE, the verb underscores the life-commitment of the disciple to be a loving and obedient emulator of one who is accepted not only as instructor, but, more importantly, as Lord and God (John 20:28). Jesus uttered other commands that could be and have been regarded as commissions. None historically has inspired a more wide-spread response in those who have gone to all nations, bearing the message of salvation through Christ. Matthew 28:18-20 still gives the vision of a worldwide church that motivates world missions and ecumenicity.

P.L.G.

COMMUNION. Old Testament. In the standard English translations of the OT the term "communion" is not found. The word "FELLOWSHIP" is there only twice in the KJV, but the Hebrew root hbr is frequent, and it is this Hebrew word-group that enters the Greek OT as koinon, an important NT idea, as we shall see.

The OT word carries the basic meaning "to bind together," sometimes in a physical way (Exod. 26:6), sometimes used of nations entering into agreement (Gen. 14:3), sometimes of persons who share a common trade (fishermen in Job 41:6) or a common task (II Chr. 20:35-36; Song of S. 1:7; 8:13) or a common bond, that is, marriage (Mal. 2:14). In the religious sense there are worshipers who are united (Ps. 119:63), or in the bad sense the word is used of those in evil complicity (Isa. 1:23; Prov. 28:24). Evildoers are said to have no "fellowship" with Yahweh, Israel's God (Ps. 94:20), just as idols have no part in Israel's religious life (Ps. 96:4, 5).

One interesting fact emerges from a lexical study of hbr.: it is never employed of a human relationship with God. The probable explanation is that the Jewish mind could hardly conceive of such intimacy with the Divine, unlike the world of other contemporary religions that thought of humanity as sharing in the life of the Deity. The OT preserves a distinction between Israel and God, who is always sovereign Lord.

New Testament. In the NT the basic term, translated variously as "communion," "fellowship," "communicate," "partake," "contribution," and "common" (in the sense of "in common"), stems from the Greek root koin-. There are two adjectives, koinōnos (found ten times) and synkoinōnos (found four times), which are used as nouns also; and two verbs koinōneō (eight times) and synkoinōneō (three times); and the noun koinōnia (twenty times). The results of the recent linguistic research of scholars is: "the important thing is that these words (belonging to the koin family) refer primarily, though not invariably, to participation in something rather than to associations with others; and there is often a genitive to indicate that in which one participates or shares" (A. R. George). From this ground-plan of the word, the NT passages may be divided into three classes, according to whether the predominant idea is (a) having a share; (b) giving a share; or (c) sharing.

(a) "Having a share." Under this heading we may classify, first of all, the adjectives that are used to describe partners in some common enterprise, for example, Christian work (II Cor. 8:23), or secular business (Luke 5:10); also those who share in a common experience (for example, persecutions, Heb. 10:33; Rev. 1:9; suffering, II Cor. 1:7; worship, I Cor. 10:18; murder, Matt. 23:30; the compact with demons in pagan cult worship, I Cor. 10:20). The most important references are: I Corinthians 10:16; Philippians 2:1; and II Corinthians 13:14, because they describe the church's relationship to God.

(b) "Giving a share." The main text that supports the interpretation of koinōnia as "giving a share" is II Corinthians 9:13, "the generosity of your contribution for them and for all others." "Your contribution" represents the Greek tēs koinōnias, that is, in this context, "generosity." This same rendering may be suggested also for Philippians 1:5, in which case the object of Paul's gratitude to God is the generosity of the Philippian Christians in their support of the apostolic ministry for the progress of the gospel. Similarly, the same translation clarifies Philemon 6.

Another reference under this heading is Romans 15:26, which indicates that koinōnia can take on a concrete form as a generosity that clothes itself in practical action and is so applied to the collection for the saints of the Jerusalem church in their poverty-stricken condition (compare II Cor. 8:4). In this light we may consider, finally, Acts 2:42, meaning possibly "generosity."

(c) "Sharing." Under this heading there are only three possible occurrences where koinōnia is used absolutely or with the preposition meta (with). These are Acts 2:42; Galatians 2:9, and I John 1:3 ff.

R.M.

COMMUNION, HOLY. See LORD'S SUPPER.

COMMUNITY CHURCHES, NATIONAL COUNCIL OF. A fellowship of autonomous, ecumenically inclined, non-creedal churches of congregational polity. In 1950 two councils of Community churches merged. One was the Biennial Council of Community Churches, a black group, and the other, a white group named the National Council of Community Churches. The National Council meets for an annual conference. There are twenty state groups and three hundred local groups. It exists to promote the fellowship of community-type churches throughout the country and to provide an instrument through which community-minded and freedom-loving churches can cooperate in making a contribution toward a united church. It maintains a placement office for ministers, has commissions on church relations, clergy relations, ecumenical relations, faith and order, information services, laity relations, and social concerns. It publishes a community yearbook a pastor's journal, and the monthly Christian Community News. J.C.

COMPARATIVE RELIGION. See WORLD RELIGIONS.

COMPLINES. See CANONICAL HOURS.

COMTE, AUGUSTE (1798-1857). French philosopher and founder of positivism, who has been called the father of sociology. Comte attended the École Polytechnique in Paris from 1814 to 1816. In 1818 he came under the influence of Saint-Simon, the most prominent French socialist of the time. Comte's Positive Philosophy appeared in six volumes between 1830 and 1842. During 1851-54 he published the four-volume System of Positive Polity and, in 1852, his Positive Catechism.

Comte meant by positivism "the knowledge derived from science and its extension to society," which he believed must be organized on a scientific basis. Comte viewed the human mind as evolving from a theological stage through a metaphysical stage—in which personal deities are transformed into metaphysical abstractions—to a third, scientific or positive, stage. In the positive stage, humanity takes the place of God as the object of devotion. Comte's religion included its secular saints, ritual, creed, and holidays. T. H. Huxley called it "Catholicism without Christianity." Positivist churches were established both in France and England. Comte had an important influence on the sociologist EMILE DURKHEIM (1858–1917) and on Frederic Harrison (1831–1923), the most prominent leader of English positivism.

J.L.

CONCILIARISM. A theory in Roman Catholicism that a council representing the entire church has supreme authority, even above the pope.

Pope Boniface VIII's claim to universal authority in 1302 suffered severely during the Babylonian Captivity (1305–77) when the papacy moved to Avignon and became a tool of France. The GREAT SCHISM (1378–1415) followed; rival popes in Rome and Avignon anathematized each other. The Council of Pisa (1409) then elected a third pope.

Calls for conciliar reform mounted. William Occam, an English scholastic philosopher, believed the church's will was a summary of the wills of individuals. He called for a council representative of the entire church. Marsilius of Padua (1275?–1342) argued that the emperor was superior to the pope, but said both were subject to the will of the people they represent; a council of the people can remove both. JOHN WYCLIFFE (1328–84) called for removal of bad stewards in church and state. Conrad of Gelnhausen, Heinrich of Langenstein, Pierre d'Ailly, John Gerson, and others agitated for a reforming council.

Emperor Sigismund and Pisan Pope John XXIII called the COUNCIL OF CONSTANCE (1414–18). It proclaimed all three popes deposed and issued its decree Sacrosancta, April 6, 1415, declaring it represented the people, derived power directly from Christ, and that everyone, even the pope, must obey its decrees. The pope was to be the church's executive. After Constance, conciliarism waned drastically. VATICAN COUNCIL II (1962–65) expressed a vestige of conciliarism in collegiality, stating all bishops as successors of the apostles share in the authority of the pope.

C.M.

CONCLAVE. A term both for the place where cardinals elect a pope and for the meeting itself. On the death of a pope, a conclave is called in fifteen days in a private place. Rules for the conclave were laid down by popes Pius XII, John XXIII, and Paul VI.

J.C.

CONCORDANCE. An alphabetically arranged index showing where in the text of a book or books each principal word is used. It is said that the format was devised by Bible students to demonstrate that the Bible's several parts are consistent with one another. Concordances have since been made for other writings, such as for Shakespeare's works.

P.L.G.

CONCORD, BOOK AND FORMULA OF. See BOOK AND FORMULA OF CONCORD.

CONCUBINE. The term means "one (female) who cohabits with another (male)," with the pejorative connotation that the cohabitation is irregular; that the relationship is one of man and mistress rather than husband and wife. It is, therefore, a term that presupposes as normative a society based on a monogamous family household. Obviously, it has no meaning—or at least no pejorative meaning—in a society that recognizes polygamy or polyandry; that otherwise departs from the one-man-one-woman nuclear family concept; or that has more than a single concept of what it is "to be married," for which there are different kinds of marriages that impose different kinds of obligations.

As far as the last mentioned is concerned, we have instances from the Bible to indicate that MARRIAGE concepts existed for which there are hardly any parallels to what we understand the institution to imply today. Samson was "married" to a Philistine woman whom he only visited on occasion and who eventually became the wife of someone else (Judg. 14). Was the woman his wife or concubine? In a polygamous society a fine distinction could hardly have been drawn. When Abraham's wife Sarah, who was sterile, gave her husband the handmaid Hagar, that she might bear children by surrogate, it was as "wife" not as "concubine" (Gen. 16:1-4). So also with Rachel and Leah, the two wives of Jacob: their maids Bilhah and Zilpah were also his "wives."

What, then, was the pilegesh, the concubine as distinguished from the wife or wives, even as the much-married Solomon is said to have had seven hundred wives—"princesses"—and three hundred concubines (I Kings 11:3)? If we can judge from Genesis 35:22 (where Bilhah is called a concubine), Genesis 22–24, Judges 19, II Samuel 5:13, and similar passages, the distinction had to do simply with fiscal legalities. The "wife" was—or her family was—the social equal of her husband. Not only would a dowry be provided on her part, there would also be a corresponding bridal gift (mohar, "purchase price") paid by the groom, which in some instances might entail an international alliance if not simply the alliance of two important families.

A "concubine," on the other hand, was simply one more wife in a polygamous marriage. She may, indeed, have been, among others, favored by her husband in a love-match that he did not reserve for his "official" wives. We have no information on the subject, and biblical law has nothing to say about the matter. We can only surmise what the situation must have been, on the presupposition that human nature has not radically changed over the past few centuries.

B.V.

CONCUPISCENCE. A traditional theological term to designate the desire for forbidden things. In popular language it is often equated with sexual LUST. Concupiscence itself is not sin, for it is a force, an impulse rooted in human nature as we know it ("fallen" humankind; what Paul calls "the flesh"). But it is closely related to sinfulness, for the desires of the flesh lead to the works of the flesh, which are sin (Rom. 5:16-24; James 1:14-15).

B.V.

CONFESSION. This term has many meanings in biblical and Judeo-Christian tradition. Etymologically it differs little from the idea of profess, that is, admit, acknowledge, own up to. Thus the summations of key doctrines professed by various churches have been termed "confessions" (the Westminster Confession, the Confession of Augsburg, etc.). The revelation or publication of personal experiences testifying to some spiritual development whether of faith or doubt often bear the title "confessions" (the Confessions of Augustine, the "confessions" of Jeremiah: the passages in which the prophet is seen quarreling with God, etc.). Thus the title "confessor" was accorded those who in popular estimation or by formal canonization were regarded as having witnessed by their lives to the truth of their religious convictions (Edward the Confessor, et al.). In this sense the Latin "confessor" is used in distinction to the Greek "martyr"—the two words mean essentially the same thing—since "martyr" came to be employed of one who had confessed his faith even to the point of laying down his life.

Here we are concerned with confession in the more restricted meaning that remains the one most familiar today, that is, the acknowledgment of one's sinfulness, a profession of guilt in petition of forgiveness. Confession of sins, whether of an individual or on behalf of the whole nation, was assumed to be the indispensable condition for forgiveness, whether the SIN in question was one of forgetfulness, human frailty, or outright malice (compare Lev. 5:5; Num. 5:7; II Sam. 12:13; etc.). Before there could be reconciliation between God and humans, it was necessary that acknowledgment be made that what separated the two had a moral dimension: then only could the gulf be bridged (compare Isa. 6:5-7). Thus the significance of the expression "knowledge of God," which was common to Hosea and Isaiah (Hos. 4:1; Isa. 1:3; etc.) and other prophets: to know God truly is to recognize this moral division and therefore need to confess it. Confession, together with ritual, was sufficient to purge the sinner(s) of inadvertent sins, but for absolution from graver crimes confession could only be a means of appealing to the mercy of God (compare Ps. 51:15-17).

It is taken for granted also in the NT that there can be no forgiveness of sins unless the sin is frankly acknowledged (I John 1:9, for example). According to Acts 19:18-19 public confession was taken to be a routine measure to rectify a grave disorder in the Christian community. In James 5:16 there even seems to be the attempt to institutionalize confession. While the text says literally nothing more than that Christians should confess their sins to one another and pray for one another, still, the ecclesiastical context ("the elders of the church," "anointing with oil in the name of the lord," "the prayer of faith") indicates the beginning of a discipline.

That discipline was, of course, of much later development in the Christian church. Eventually "the elders of the church" of James 5:16, to whom confession should be made, were identified exclusively with the priesthood of the church. Furthermore, after some disastrous experiences with public confessions, it was thought best, at least in most of the mainline Christian communities, to make confessions auricular ("for the ears only"), that is, secret between the penitent and the minister of absolution, who at the same time bound himself to complete silence about what had been made known to him.

B.V.

CONFESSION OF FAITH. The creed, symbol, or statement of belief confessed by Christians during services. The confession of faith generally used in Roman Catholic and Protestant churches is the APOSTLES' CREED (in noncommunion services), while the NICENE CREED is used when there is Holy Communion. The confession of faith is the credo (meaning "I believe"), while being at the same time the "we believe," since all confess together as well as in harmony with the whole catholic church, scattered across all lands and found throughout Christian history in the communion of (all) the saints. The confession of faith includes belief in the Father, the Creator of heaven of earth and of all life; in the Son, who is the Redeemer, the Savior of all who have faith; and in the Holy Spirit, who calls us into the church and sanctifies us by grace.

J.C.

CONFESSIONS OF AUGUSTINE. AUGUSTINE's work, in thirteen books, written about A.D. 400, which includes his spiritual autobiography. The word "confession" does not refer primarily to a confession of sins, but rather to the confession of God's love and provident care. As a spiritual autobiography, the Confessions created a new genre, for, although precedents could be found in works by Cyprian and Gregory of Nazianzus, Augustine was the first to write in such depth and detail about his own spiritual pilgrimage. But, once again, to read this work as just a spiritual autobiography is incorrect, for the last four books deal with such themes as memory, the notion of time, and creation. What gives unity to such diverse subjects is the confession of the love and glory of God, which is seen in the details of Augustine's life as well as in the profundities of time and creation.

Scholars have debated the historicity of the Confessions, particularly in that which refers to Augustine's conversion. It is in the Confessions that he tells of the episode in the garden of Milan. But this was written many years later, and the books that Augustine wrote shortly after his conversion show that he was still to a great degree a Neoplatonist. It would seem that, while the conversion did take place as Augustine describes it, at that time his understanding of Christianity was very much colored by Neoplatonic influences, many of which he rejected later, when he became a leader of the church.

J.G.

CONFESSOR. A term used to describe a male saint, in the Roman Catholic cult of the saints, who did not die a martyr's death but whose life exemplified the Christian faith. The designation "confessor" is widely used to include monks, bishops, popes, priests, and religious (lay brothers) and lay persons. In the earliest church the only honorific title given deceased Christians considered saints was MARTYR. In the later second century, a new category of confessor was established. Confessors, for the early church, while not martyrs, were those who actually suffered persecution for their faith. Later, this characteristic of persecution was not insisted upon.

J.C.

CONFIRMATION. Part of the Christian rites of initiation. The word "confirmation" means "strengthening." It has two referents. Confirmation has been interpreted as bringing an added grace of the Holy Spirit beyond that received in baptism to strengthen the believer in living the Christian faith. The word may also refer to the fact that the person is confirming the promises made in his or her behalf by sponsors at the time of baptism.

By the fourth century, baptism was followed immediately by the anointing with oil, and the newly baptized then joined the congregation for the celebration of the Lord's Supper. After infant baptism became the custom in the Western church, the affirmation of faith with the anointing became separated as a later rite performed by bishops. It was not considered essential until about the eleventh century. The Orthodox churches continued to celebrate the tripartite rite for infants. Protestant groups emphasized the personal confession of faith more than incorporation into the community. Lutheran and Anglican traditions put more emphasis on the aspect of incorporation, although only the Anglicans continued confirmation as an episcopal function. Anabaptist groups made the confession of faith a prerequisite to baptism. Protestant custom has been for first Communion to follow believer's baptism or confirmation. A recent trend is to follow the twentieth-century Roman Catholic custom of admitting baptized children to the Lord's Supper.

Current theological discussion tends to view baptism as the basic rite. The Book of Common Prayer (1979) contains one form that includes both rites. The Roman Catholic church is encouraging study of its Rite of Christian Initiation for Adults. Thus contemporary theological and liturgical studies try to find a balance between the Radical Reformation's emphasis on the personal response to the call of Christ and the traditional Catholic emphasis on incorporation into the community of faith.

Anthropological approaches to liturgy raise the question as to whether confirmation should be viewed as a rite of passage—thus asking questions about timing at the beginning of adolescence or of adulthood; or whether it is a rite of community to strengthen members for their roles. Psychological inquiries ask the type of commitment appropriate and possible at various ages.

I.C.

CONFUCIANISM. The system of social and personal morality that has been dominant in China and neighboring countries for almost twenty-five centuries. The term "Confucianism" is taken from its greatest teacher and example, CONFUCIUS (551–479 B.C.), but in the Far East it is known as the "Teaching of the Scholars (or Literati)."

Confucius stressed the importance of learning from the past, especially from the legendary emperors Yao and Shun, and his personal model, the Duke of Chou (eleventh century B.C.). Morality, he taught, is based on the will of heaven, and there are unchanging principles that must be followed in the family and in public life. He denied that he was an originator, insisting that he was only passing on the wisdom of the past.

Confucius chose "Five Classics" as expressing the beliefs he was teaching: The Book of History, a collection of documents from ancient times, some are authentic and some apocryphal; The Book of Odes, 305 poems collected around 600 B.C., though some are much older; The Spring and Autumn Annals, a record of events in Confucius' home state of Lu (now Shantung) from 722 to 481 B.C.; The Book of Rites, a collection of philosophical, narrative, and ritual writings; and The Book of Changes (I CHING), used largely for divination.

Over the next few centuries the teachings of Confucius (preserved in the ANALECTS) exerted greater and greater influence. Other ways of life competed for popular acceptance, but with the rise of the Han Dynasty (206 B.C. to A.D. 220) Confucianism became the ruling philosophy. With some ups and downs it maintained this position into the present century. The pressure to modernize Chinese life and the rise of Marxism have represented the most serious challenges to Confucianism. Today, however, even inside the People's Republic of China, Confucian ideals have remained alive.

Classic Confucianism. The movement arose in a time of great social disorder. From the eighth to the third centuries B.C. life was made bitter for many because of almost constant warfare among the small states of China. Old families fell on hard times and new ones rose to positions of influence. Confucius sought to train a select group of young men in the practical art of being moral and still being successful. After his death they continued to follow his teachings and handed them on to others.

At the heart of the moral life are the five basic relationships of mutual responsibility: father and son, husband and wife, ruler and subject, elder and younger brother or sister, and friend and friend. Everyone is capable of living up to the standard, but only a few have the love of learning that is necessary to become a teacher and a ruler. Noble birth is not significant, but ability and ambition are essential. The Confucian scholar must be involved in public life if at all possible, putting his learning to work for the good of all. It is a disgrace not to be part of a good government, or to be part of a corrupt one.

(a) Mencius. MENCIOUS (371–289 B.C.) was Confucius' first great successor. Like Confucius he tried to influence governments for good. He believed that all humans are good by birth. Anyone seeing a child about to fall into a well will rescue the child as a matter of course. This sense of pity is one of Mencius' "Four Beginnings" of mature goodness. Properly developed, they become the basis of a truly good life. If they are neglected a person will become evil. Thus moral education and training are vital.

(b) Hsün Tzu. HSÜN TZU (298–238 B.C.), in direct opposition to Mencius, taught that everyone is by nature evil and must be controlled by laws and rules of proper conduct. Left to themselves, people become quarrelsome, lustful, violent, and greedy. They must be disciplined, just as blunt metal must be ground and whetted to make it sharp.

Hsün Tzu was also a rationalist. He believed that nature goes on its way regardless of whether people are good or evil. Rain falls whether or not people pray for rain. He felt that we should study the world of nature in order to use it wisely.

(c) Other schools. During this period there were several rival ways of understanding life, but only one, TAOISM, has endured. The Taoists criticized Confucians for being busybodies, for being too highly organized, and for forcing their concepts on others. Taoist writings teach a sense of wonder and excitement, an outlook that is willing to live and let live.

Han Dynasty Confucianism. Ancient China's period of turmoil was ended by Emperor Ch'in's ruthless unification of the country in 221 B.C. Violently anti-intellectual, he burned the Confucian classics and other "useless" books. After a brief period of splendor, his dynasty fell and was succeeded by the Han.

Under the Han emperors, Confucianism became the official state doctrine. It supported the imperial system by stressing that the people needed a king to rule them. At the same time, it emphasized the ancient concept of the Mandate of Heaven. Heaven, sometimes thought of as a personal being, sometimes as an impersonal force, withdraws its mandate from a wicked ruler and gives it to a righteous ruler who then becomes the new ruler. Would-be emperors appealed to this doctrine throughout China's history.

In this period Confucianism was supreme, but it was constantly in danger of degenerating into superstition. Wang Ch'ung (A.D. 27–97) fought that tendency and prepared the way for a rational attitude toward nature that continued long past the fall of the Han dynasty.

The Rise of Neo-Confucianism. During the Han dynasty BUDDHISM entered China, and it grew in power and influence until the ninth century A.D. After that it slowly declined but continued to be a major force. The confrontation with Buddhism forced Confucians to broaden their way of thinking. They began to take the entire universe as the background for their ideas. Buddhists taught that the world is an illusion. Confucians reaffirmed its reality and the importance of studying it. In opposition to Buddhist monasticism Confucians stressed the importance of family life and of involvement in government at every level.

This new stage of development, commonly known as Neo-Confucianism, began in the Sung Dynasty (A.D. 960–1279) and was dominant until the twentieth century. From 1313 to 1905 Confucian thought was the basis for national examinations for entry into government service. The greatest Neo-Confucian was CHU HSI (1130–1200), who declared Mencius was orthodox and Hsün Tzu was not. He established four books as the highest Confucian authority: The Analects, the writings of Mencius, and two shorter ancient texts, THE DOCTRINE OF THE MEAN and The Great Learning. From the last of these he took the statement, "The extension of knowledge consists in the investigation of things" and made it a major principle of his philosophy. He taught that we should investigate the ancient writings, the world of nature, and current affairs, and that we should do so while being involved in the day-to-day decisions of society.

Confucianism as a Way of Life. The highest virtues are family loyalty and social responsibility. Confucianism has coexisted with Buddhism and other religions under a division of responsibility by which Confucianism provided for successful living in this world, and the religions provided ways of dealing with the realm of supernatural beings.

Chinese Religions: Confucianism and Taoism

○ Capitals of China (from the fourth century b.c.) and contemporary centers of state (Confucian) religion

PA Regions associated with the early development and spread of Taoism (third century b.c. to third century A.D.)

▲ Mountains having a strong, ancient Taoist presence

Reprinted with permission of Macmillan Publishing Company, from Historical Atlas of the Religions of the World, edited by Isma'il Ragi al-Faruqi and David E. Sopher. Copyright © 1974 by Macmillan Publishing Company

The two realms are most closely related in the veneration of ancestors. The eldest son in each family bears responsibility for preserving the wooden tablets that represent the ancestors, he conducts the worship that provides for the needs of the ancestors in the afterlife, and he secures their aid for their living descendants. Ancestral tablets are of wood, about a foot long, two or three inches wide, and half an inch thick. Each tablet is set in a low wooden base, and on the front the name of the ancestor is inscribed.

From the twelfth century to the twentieth, Confucian thought and practice were kept alive in academies located in major cities throughout China. Teaching stressed not only the elegant literary style required by the government examinations, but went beyond externals to emphasize building the character of each student. The goal was sagehood, or true wisdom. Students were to bring their minds under the control of good thoughts and to will only what was right. Only by doing so could they hope to attain wisdom. Even when they were alone their thoughts and actions were to be as upright as when others could observe them. Many Confucian scholars were exiled or persecuted for opposing public policies that they regarded as evil.

It was customary to provide tutors for the emperor in order to guide him in governing the people. The government itself was to be regulated at each level in a way proper to that level. Local affairs were guided by a Rural Contract that stressed mutual responsibility. Village elders were responsible for providing education that would induce people to do good, to aid one another in emergencies, and to avoid lawsuits.

In the twentieth century, Confucianism has slowly adapted to changing times, and many young people regard it as a barrier to progress. In 1931 Pa Chin wrote The Family, a novel depicting the tyrannical control exercised by many in the older generation. The book helped hasten the fall of the old order.

Religious Aspects of Confucianism. The veneration of Confucius was similar to that offered to ancestors. Although the educated elite resisted efforts to deify Confucius, temples were erected in his honor, and sacrifices were offered to him in midspring and midautumn. A rich variety of food was offered to the sage and to his closest followers. To the accompaniment of ceremonial music the worshipers would fall to their hands and knees and bend forward until their foreheads touched the ground. Other rites were observed in the temple compound to honor various folk deities and spirits. Such worship continues today at the great Confucian temple in Seoul, Korea, even though the ancient splendor was lost after the national examinations were abolished there in 1895. The seventy-seventh lineal descendant of Confucius is living in Taiwan, and there much of Confucian tradition remains vigorous.

Confucianism and the People's Republic of China. After the fall of the last imperial dynasty in 1911, many voices were raised against the Confucian tradition. The most thorough critics were the Communists. Mao Tse-tung was not entirely consistent in his attacks on Confucius, but the effect of it all was to confine Confucianism to the status of a dead system of thought. It became little more than a relic in a museum. Confucius was an important part of China's feudal past, but he has no role to play in the nation's present or future. His temples are no longer places of worship, and his teachings no longer serve to guide official policy.

Confucianism and Christianity. Jesuit missionaries to China in the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries discovered the writings of Confucius and his followers and became enthusiastic over the possibility of using them as a bridge to winning China to Christianity. They dressed like Confucian scholars and succeeded in convincing the papal office that Confucian rites were not pagan but could be practiced by Christians. In the eighteenth century the church reversed its ruling, and Christianity fell into disfavor.

Protestant attitudes have varied. James Legge (1815–97), a missionary who became the first professor of Chinese at Oxford, translated and commented on the Confucian classics. He held them in high esteem, but felt Confucianism was inferior to Christianity. Some Protestants have claimed that it is impossible to be a Confucian and a Christian at the same time. The Chinese scholar Lin Yutang (1895– ) has replied that this is like saying it is impossible to be a gentleman and a Christian at the same time. K.C.

CONFUCIUS. Latinized name of K'ung Fu-tzu (literally "Great Master K'ung"), about 551–479 B.C. China's most revered teacher and philosopher. Though Confucius denied that he was an innovator, he reinterpreted the moral and social principles of China's ancient sage kings in order to make them applicable to the problems of his own age. He did this so successfully that subsequent generations have looked to him for norms and standards.

Confucius was born at Ch'ü-fou in the ancient Chinese state of Lu, now the province of Shantung. With the exception of about ten years of wandering (493–484 B.C.), Confucius spent all his life in Lu, in search of a ruler who would make him head of government. He won recognition for his scholarly ability, but never attained a responsible post that would enable him to put into practice his ideas for reforming society and putting an end to the wars that were devastating China. By the time of the first biography of Confucius in the second century B.C. he had come to be glorified as both a statesman and a sage.

The only reliable sources of our knowledge of Confucius are writings prior to the Han dynasty (206 B.C.–A.D. 220), especially the ANALECTS, a collection of sayings, many of which are attributed to Confucius, while others are ascribed to his disciples. The collection was probably compiled shortly after the great teacher's death, but other material seems to have been added later, some of which has a distinctly non-Confucian tone.

The Confucius we encounter in the Analects is an ambitious scholar, eager to reinterpret the lessons of the past and use them to solve the problems of the present. He believed that there is a morality inherent in the universe, and that those who flout it will be punished by the impersonal power he called "heaven" (T'ien). The family should be regulated by a clearly defined, mutual relationship of love and responsibility between father and son, husband and wife, and older and younger siblings. Government should be administered for the good of all the people by officials of high personal integrity, well trained in the wisdom of the past and loyal to their ruler.

Courtesy of the Philadelphia Museum of Art: Given by Horace H. F. Jayne

Portrait of Confucius

To achieve his goal he gathered about him ambitious young men—some nobly born, some from the lower classes. The only qualifications demanded were ability and a willingness to learn. They were attracted to him by his magnetic personality, his love of scholarship, and the prospect of a political career. Confucius challenged them to become examples of manhood at its best, possessing wisdom and the supreme moral quality of jen, variously translated as “human-heartedness,” “Goodness,” or “benevolent love.” Of the twenty-two disciples mentioned by name in the Analects, nine are known to have held important positions. Later tradition increased the number of known names and the importance of their achievements.

Confucius himself was not an eloquent speaker and does not seem to have been cut out for a career in politics. He would praise a person behind his back but criticize him to his face. The Analects show him telling an occasional untruth and giving way to temper and tender grief. He saw music as an important subject for study and taught that some music builds up morality while other music leads to depravity. Creel has called him a “zealot with a sense of humor.”

In his late sixties, after several years of wandering, Confucius returned to Lu. In the next few years death took from his circle his only son and his two favorite disciples. Shortly before his own death Confucius wrote, “To remain unsoured even though one’s merits are unrecognized, is that not what after all is expected of a Gentleman?” (Analects I, 1) and “At seventy, I could follow the dictates of my own heart, for what I desired no longer overstepped the boundaries of right” (II, 4).

K.C.

CONGREGATION. People assembled, especially for religious purposes, as in worship. Six Hebrew words, translated as congregation, (for example, Ps. 1:5) are used both for religious and for political assemblies (for example, “the mount of assembly in the far north,” Isa. 14:13), a Ugaritic phrase for a plenary session of the gods.). In the Septuagint and NT, ecclesia (church) and synagogé (synagogue) are used interchangeably. Amid tensions of the NT period, Jews favored the term synagogue and Christians the term church (see Rev. 3:9 “synagogue of Satan”).

P.L.G.

CONGREGATIONAL CHURCHES. A historic, free church tradition in Protestantism, once an American denomination; now merged with the Evangelical and Reformed Church to form the UNITED CHURCH OF CHRIST.

Congregationalism, as a preference in church polity, is sometimes traced to the early church, or to the sectarian movements of the high Middle Ages, or to JOHN WYCLIFFE and the Lollard movement in sixteenth-century England. What is certain is that Congregationalism developed after the rise of the Protestant Reformation in the British Isles.

Congregationalists are defined as Christians who hold that Jesus Christ is the only head of the church; that the Bible is the all-sufficient rule of faith and practice; that Christian character is the standard for church membership; and that sovereignty in church government lies in the local congregation, made up of God’s people, covenanted together to walk in the ways of the Lord.

The English Separatists (called the Pilgrims) brought Congregationalism to America on the Mayflower in 1620. The Mayflower Compact, signed at Plymouth, Massachusetts, established a government for the colony based on the will of the majority. This played a signal role in the development of religion and politics in the colony, and in the nation later established.

The Pilgrims, or PURITANS, desired an educated ministry, and founded Harvard College in 1636 for that purpose. In 1701, the Congregationalists in Connecticut founded Yale and later Dartmouth, Williams, Bowdoin, Middlebury, and Amherst.

The Congregationalists did not believe in the separation of church and state, and so in the states where they were strong they founded a union of both to form a Christian commonwealth. This union was not broken until the nineteenth century. After this disestablishment, the denomination expanded across the continent, especially in the states of the Old Northwest.

Congregationalism is non-creedal, so it has little fixed dogma. In England, the church held to the Savoy Declaration. In America their theology was fluid and changing. In response to eighteenth-century RATIONALISM and in reaction to CALVINISM, the Congregationalists divided into Unitarians and Trinitarians. In the nineteenth century, Liberalism captured most Congregational Churches and this outlook continued into the twentieth century. At the same time, some congregations remained evangelical and conservative. In the twentieth century Congregationalists have embraced ecumenism and the search for church unity. Thus the Congregational church (or most of its congregations) entered the merger that resulted in the United Church of Christ in 1957.

J.C.

CONSCIENCE. In biblical writing "conscience" occurs only once in the OT and twenty-eight times in the NT. The Greek word is syneidesis, meaning that aspect of the human psyche that "knows with itself," as an agent or faculty within the moral life that observes the self and witnesses to what it sees, whether approvingly (a good conscience) or not (a bad conscience).

There is a long history of the term in Greek thought, which usually understands the word as an accusing conscience. The most famous example is Orestes (in the play-cycle of Aeschylus), who killed his mother and looked on his conscience as his enemy that eventually destroyed him. The Stoic philosophers gave to conscience the role of a watchman who maintained a vigilant guard of an individual's inner life and encouraged the person to live "according to nature" or in response to the logos or reason that informed one as to moral decision making. This is clearly an important background to the NT picture of conscience, since it gave rise to the notion of a moral arbiter implanted within the human psyche (see Rom. 2:14-15).

The OT evidence is sparse, and the literature has no distinct word for conscience. The precise term occurs (in the RSV) in I Samuel 25:31, where it translates the Hebrew word for "heart" (see also I Sam. 24:5; II Sam. 24:10; David's heart "smote" him to remind him of his guilty actions). The Greek syneidesis is found only in three late or intertestamental passages (Eccl. 10:20; Wisd. Sol. 17:11; Ecclus. 42:18). These verses reflect Greek ideas, especially Wisdom 17:11, where conscience plays the part of a court prosecutor. The Hebrew contribution to the development of conscience is thus limited, emphasizing the inwardness of moral decisions and human accountability before God.

The NT data are unusually distributed; the term is entirely absent from the Gospels (John 8:9 is a secondary text, printed only in the RSV margin). The bulk of the evidence comes from Paul, especially in his Corinthian correspondence. This fact has given rise to the suggestion that it was the freewheeling Corinthian Christians who appealed to conscience to justify their lax morality. They professed to be able to eat idol meats with a clear conscience, and so (they contended) their actions were permissible. Paul took up their word and argued against them by insisting that conscience alone is not a clear guide. A person cannot rely on such subjective responses (see I Cor. 4:4: "I have nothing on my conscience,"—an ironical statement, if it represents the Corinthians' position. Paul goes on immediately to qualify and correct it: "but that does not mean I stand acquitted" NEB).

Conscience needs to be educated and informed by some outside norm. It is interesting to see what Paul proposed as to these guidelines for human behavior. Weak Christians who are disturbed at the prospect of eating food offered to idols are afflicted with a bad conscience (v. 8:7, 10, 12). They need to learn how their consciences can be instructed, since "an idol has no real existence" (I Cor. 8:4). But equally the strong or enlightened Corinthians who claimed that freedom and ate with impunity have a responsibility not to wound the conscience of the sensitive brother (8:12); so love for one's fellow believer is a norm to keep conscience in place and subordinate it to higher imperatives (I Cor. 10:23-33). To appeal simply to conscience may be disastrous since, for Paul, it individualizes human action by being forgetful of one's social concerns. We need to respect not only our moral convictions but those of others.

In the later Pauline church, conscience became a debated topic. The Pastoral Letters echo this dispute with the sad reminder that some believers have so missed their way that they despise a good conscience (I Tim. 1:5, 6, 19), and have their conscience "seared" (that is, rendered insensitive) as with a hot iron (4:2). Deacons should aim to keep a clear conscience (3:9), but it is obvious that this is not an easy or an automatic process. Hence the call for allegiance to the apostolic "deposit" of the faith sounded in these Pastoral Letters.

The remaining NT documents emphasize the power of Christ to "cleanse the conscience" (Heb. 9:14; 10:22; compare 9:9, 10; 10:2; I Pet. 3:12; the verses are mostly drawn from OT ideas of forgiveness and moral renewal). Here conscience functions negatively in convicting people of their sins, and so it needs appeasing by the assurance of divine pardon. But as a guide to moral actions, conscience serves only with a limited scope. It needs to be measured against an objective norm, usually the will of God as revealed in Scripture, experience, and a concern for our lives in society.

R.M.

CONSCIENTIOUS OBJECTOR. See PACIFICISM.

CONSECRATE. To bless or set apart for God's service, as in the consecration of the elements at Holy Communion or the consecration of a missionary. To consecrate means to invoke or call down upon a person, place, activities, or things, the power of God through the Holy Spirit. It also means to set apart certain believers for special offices or functions, as in the consecration of a bishop or a pope. Buildings and material objects are often consecrated, as in the consecration or blessing of a cathedral, a church or an altar, a cross or communion vessels. So seriously is this act of blessing taken that church buildings that are abandoned or sold are solemnly removed from God's service by use of a special service. The practice of consecration is as old as biblical religion. The Hebrews were set apart by CIRCUMCISION; Christians are set apart by BAPTISM.

J.C.

CONSERVATIVE JUDAISM. See JUDAISM, HISTORY OF.

CONSISTORY. A gathering of cardinals and sometimes of bishops, convened in the Roman Catholic church to transact business. Secret consistories are called to create cardinals and appoint bishops to vacant dioceses. In the Reformed church, it is the lowest court, made up of minister and elders in a congregation.

J.C.

CONSTANCE, COUNCIL OF. A general council of the church that met from 1414 to 1418 and marked the high point of CONCILIARISM. It was called by John XXIII, Pisan pope, at the insistence of Emperor Sigismund, mostly in order to put an end to the GREAT SCHISM. John XXIII hoped that the council would support his claims over those of Gregory XII and the Avignon Pope Benedict XIII, especially since he represented the line of the popes resulting from the earlier Council of Pisa. But the assembly, under the leadership of PIERRE D'AILLY, thought otherwise, and John deemed it best to flee and seek to have the council dissolved. Captured and returned to Constance as a prisoner, he was deposed by the assembly. Gregory XII resigned, as he had promised to do. Benedict continued calling himself Pope for the rest of his life, but his followers diminished constantly. Therefore, the Council of Constance effectively put an end to the Great Schism. After having promised to continue the work of reforming the church, Martin V was elected pope.

The council also dealt with the teachings of JOHN WYCLIFFE and JOHN HUSS. The former, who had died earlier, was declared a heretic, and his remains were ordered disinterred from consecrated ground. Huss, who had gone to the council under Sigismund's safe conduct, was declared a heretic and burned at the stake. This caused a revolt in Bohemia.

The hope that the council would reform the church proved unfounded. Although decrees were passed against simony, pluralism, and other abuses, these were generally ignored once the council was dissolved. Finally, the council ordered that other such assemblies would be convened periodically, thus hoping to continue the work of reformation.

J.G.

Courtesy of the Metropolitan Museum of Art. Bequest of Mrs. F. F. Thompson, 1926

Marble head of Constantine I

CONSTANTINE, EMPEROR. Emperor from 306 to 337, who put an end to persecution and declared himself a Christian. He was the son of Constantius Chlorus, who ruled in Britain as one of four emperors who shared the empire under the leadership of DIOCLETIAN. On the death of Constantius Chlorus, Constantine was proclaimed his heir by the legions in Britain. After consolidating his power, he invaded the territories of Maxentius, who ruled in Italy, and defeated him in the battle of the Milvian Bridge. It was on the eve of that battle that he ordered his soldiers to fight under the labarum, which included a symbol that could be interpreted as a Christian Chi Rho-✠. He later told Eusebius of Caesarea and Lactantius slightly different stories as to how God had directed him to do this. Meanwhile, after defeating his brother-in-law Licinius, he became sole emperor.

During an earlier stay at the court of Diocletian, Constantine had become imbued with Eastern notions of the absolute power of monarchs. These clashed with the earlier Roman traditions, and particularly with the Roman Senate, which resisted such innovations. For this reason and others, Constantine decided to found a "new Rome," which was built at the site of the ancient city of Byzantium, and named Constantinople, that is, "City of Constantine." This gave him greater freedom from the Roman Senate (he created a new senate for the new Rome), and allowed him to grant ever-increasing favors to the church.

The Donatist controversy in North Africa forced Constantine to intervene in the life of the church. In agreement with a number of synods, he decided that the Donatists were at fault. When they refused to abide by his verdict, he had recourse to arms, with the blessing of most orthodox Christian leaders.

The Arian controversy proved even more difficult to solve. After the failure of his advisor in ecclesiastical matters, Hosius of Cordova, to settle the dispute, Constantine decided to convene a great council of bishops, which gathered at NICEA in 325. Although he was not even baptized, he presided at the sessions, thus giving an indication of the CAESAROPAPISM, which would become characteristic of Byzantine Christianity. The council condemned Arius, and to this Constantine added his sentence of banishment for Arius as well as for his main supporters. Three years later, however, he began to reverse his policies, partly through the influence of Arian bishop Eusebius of Nicomedia. It was then that he ordered Athanasius and other Nicene leaders into exile.

Constantine's support for Christianity, continued and increased by most of his successors, gave rise to the Constantinian Era, that is, to a period of over sixteen centuries in which Christianity could usually count on the support of the state. In the Eastern church, he is often called the thirteenth apostle and is counted among the saints.

J.G.

CONSTANTINOPLE, COUNCILS AND CREED OF. Three councils gathered at Constantinople are generally considered ecumenical by both Eastern and Western Christians: the First Council of Constantinople (Third Ecumenical), the Second Council of Constantinople (Fifth Ecumenical), and the Third Council of Constantinople (Sixth Ecumenical). Their respective dates are 381, 553, and 680.

The First Council of Constantinople was convened by Emperor Theodosius I in order to settle the ARIANISM dispute. Although Arianism had been condemned by the Council of NICEA in 325, it had gained new strength due to the vacillating policies of Emperor CONSTANTINE and to the outright support of many of his successors, particularly Constantius II. Theodosius, the most powerful emperor after Constantine, was a supporter of the Nicene faith and hoped that the council would put an end to the matter. In general, this was the case, although Arianism later reappeared within the borders of the empire as the result of the invasion of the empire by Goths and others who had become Arians when that was the faith of the emperors.

The so-called Creed of Constantinople, or Niceno-Constantinopolitan Creed, was probably not issued by this council, as has traditionally been held. Essentially, it is the creed that is currently recited in most churches as the Nicene Creed.

The Second Council of Constantinople (Fifth Ecumenical Council) dealt with the controversy of the Three Chapters. Ever since the Council of Chalcedon, Byzantine emperors had sought ways to reconcile their disaffected subjects, particularly in Egypt and Syria, who rejected the decisions of Chalcedon and who therefore were called MONOPHYSITES. Justinian sought to appease them by condemning, not the decisions of Chalcedon, but rather the work of three theologians of the Antiochene school whose views stood behind the condemnation of Eutyches, and whom the Monophysites suspected of Nestorianism. These three theologians were Theodore of Mopsuestia, Theodoret of Cyrhus, and Ibas of Edessa. Justinian's policy was opposed by many who feared that it would lead to a wholesale condemnation of Antiochene positions, as well as by others, particularly Pope Vigilius, who felt that the emperor had no authority to intervene in matters of doctrine. But Justinian prevailed, and eventually Vigilius and the others had to agree to the condemnation of the "three chapters."

The Third Council of Constantinople (Sixth Ecumenical) was convened by Emperor Constantine IV in order to settle the MONOTHELITE controversy. Monothelitism, proposed at first by Patriarch Sergius of Constantinople, sought to appease the opponents of the "two natures" in Christ—the Monophysites—by declaring that, while there are two natures in Christ, there is only one will. For a time this had the support of Pope Honorius. But the Arab conquests had severed from the empire those areas where Monophysitism was strongest, and therefore the emperors were no longer interested in finding a theological compromise with those who rejected the Council of Chalcedon. Having lost its political value, Monothelitism was abandoned by the authorities and was therefore condemned by the Third Council of Constantinople. Throughout the Middle Ages, the Byzantine Church held several other councils at Constantinople. But these were generally of lesser importance.

J.G.

CONSUBSTANTIATION. A Eucharistic doctrine that holds that the substance of Christ's body and blood is conjoined with the substance of the bread and wine in the EUCHARIST. The doctrine dates to John Wycliffe, who affirmed the identity of Christ's body and blood with the total sacramental use of bread and wine in the Mass. Perhaps because of their knowledge of Wycliffe and the British tradition, many British and American Protestants (Presbyterian, Methodist, and Baptist) have mistakenly identified the Lutheran doctrine of the REAL PRESENCE of Christ in the Eucharist with consubstantiation. Lutherans have never accepted the term or the description of consubstantiation. The chief reason for this is that consubstantiation is (like TRANSUBSTANTIATION) a philosophical explanation of what is a mystery of faith, which should be received in faith. Lutherans understand that Christ is really present in, with, and under the bread and the wine, while the bread and wine remain natural objects. They do not teach a union of Christ's body and blood with the bread and wine that would continue beyond the actual sacramental use of that bread and wine in the Eucharist. There is, therefore, no reservation or adoration of the host in Lutheran churches.

J.C.

CONSULTATION ON CHURCH UNION (COCU). Continuing formal conversations between several American Protestant denominations, held almost annually since 1960. COCU was proposed by Eugene Carson Blake of the United Presbyterian Church in the U.S.A. in a sermon at Grace Cathedral in San Francisco, in 1960. The plan became known as the Blake-Pike proposal. Enthusiasm was great for this ECUMENICAL venture in the 1960s, but waned in the 1970s. The 1980s have seen a return to interest in COCU since the merger of the northern and southern Presbyterian churches. Principles of church union were worked out, and in 1968 a plan of union was presented with the suggestion that it be considered by participating churches by 1970. The plan of union was not adopted because of the movement toward conservatism in America and the loss of interest in ecumenicity. The principles of church union declared: The church of Jesus Christ is one and that oneness ought to become visible; renewal is needed in the churches and an emphasis on mission and servanthood should be central to union; the laity should be fully involved in the ministry of the church; new forms of the church are needed in our complex society; and a church to be reconciling must first be reconciled.

J.C.

CONTEMPLATIVE LIFE. The name given to a life devoted mostly to prayer and devotional exercises—particularly the DIVINE OFFICE, meditation, silence, and fasting. Although every form of MONASTICISM, and indeed, all religious life, involves a measure of contemplation, certain orders, such as the Carthusians, Cistercians, and the Carmelite nuns, are known as the contemplative orders.

J.G.

CONTRITION. A theological term meaning "change of heart, inner sorrow, and regret for sin." Contrition is said to be imperfect if motivated by fear; perfect if motivated by the sincere love of God. Imperfect contrition is known as attrition. Perfect contrition brings the remission of one's sins. (Compare also PENANCE.)

J.C.

CONVERSION. To be changed inwardly, to turn to God, to be reborn; a shift from SIN to REPENTANCE and faith. Lutherans and Calvinists teach that such an experience of conversion is entirely the work of God through the Holy Spirit. Roman Catholics and Arminians (many Methodists, Baptists, and sectarians) declare that the person cooperates with God. The place, if any, of human cooperation (contrition; piety) in conversion has been hotly debated for centuries, and the controversy remains active among theologians, although it no longer is a barrier to cooperation between denominations. In the Bible, the word for conversion in Hebrew is shub, "to turn" or "to return," and in Greek, metanoia, "to turn around." To be converted means to have the direction of one's life shifted, so that it no longer points toward self, but points toward God. For example, Yahweh declares to the weary and complaining Jeremiah: "Therefore thus says the Lord: 'If you return, I will restore you, and you shall stand before me'" (Jer. 15:19).

This conditional "if" is in line with the basic theology of the Mosaic covenant, "if you do my will, then I will establish you." However, other references to turning to God, even in the same prophetic book, are less inclined toward the divine action and human response motif than they are to the predestinarian call of the sovereign God: "Before I formed you in the womb, I knew you, and before you were born I consecrated you; I appointed you a prophet to the nations" (Jer. 1:5).

Of course, the outlines of Jeremiah's call are in the mind of Paul, when he describes his own call in Galatians 1:13-17. Paul's call came into his consciousness only after a dramatic conversion experience (Acts 9:3-19; 22:4-16; 26:9-18; Gal. 1:13-17). Indeed, Paul's declaration in Galatians 1:15: "But when he who had set me apart before I was born, and had called me through his grace . . ." is clearly the same sentiment as Jeremiah expressed in Jeremiah 1:5. We may summarize by observing that God, in grace, always "converts" or "turns" the person, but there is also the opportunity for the person undergoing conversion to respond, even if it is only with a question like Paul's in Acts 9: "Who are you, Lord?"

Both Jeremiah's and Paul's experiences point out another aspect of conversion not usually understood in popular religion, and that is the possibility of several conversions (that is, Jeremiah's original call and his later need to convert or turn again; and Paul's belief that he was called from birth but became converted only on the road to Damascus). Conversions are not necessarily once for all. It seems human beings may be unaware of the depth of their dependence on God, or grow cold in their faith, or even fall away, and subsequently experience conversion again. This is what happened to Peter (Matt. 26:75; Mark 14:72; Luke 22:32—"when you have turned again"; Luke 22:62), although the Letter to the Hebrews declares such a second conversion is impossible. (Interestingly, the early Catholic church refused to accept this view in its struggle with the Montanists, over the readmission to fellowship of those who renounced Christ under persecution.) Conversion, as a turning to a more lively relationship with God through Christ, may be seen as any time of increased awareness of God's presence in one's life and of recommitment to God's service.

The term conversion is still used, although inappropriately, to mean a change of membership from one denomination to another. Before Vatican II, the Roman Catholic church followed this practice. Today, the Decree on Ecumenism speaks only of "becoming reconciled" with the Catholic church. Properly used, "conversion," in the sense of joining a church, should be used only for those coming to faith from atheism or from non-Christian religions. (See also BORN AGAIN.)

J.C.

CONVOCAATION. From the Latin word convocatio, for "calling together." An ecclesiastical group called together to discuss church affairs. In the Roman Catholic tradition, convocations are usually of bishops only, but the Church of England uses the term in a special way. The provinces or dioceses of Canterbury and of York describe their diocesan conventions or assemblies as "convocations" and have done so for centuries. These convocations includes both the upper house of bishops and the lower house of ordinary priests. A convocation is prorogued or summoned by the archbishop. In York, this summons is given to each diocesan bishop; in Canterbury, to the bishop of London, who is dean of the province. Those attending the convocations, which traditionally are governed by the crown, are exempt from arrest while in session, in the same manner as members of Parliament. Convocations may pass acts of convocation, but they have no standing in British law.

J.C.

COPTIC CHURCH. The largest Christian church in Egypt, called Coptic because that is its liturgical language. After the COUNCIL OF CHALCEDON, most of the Egyptian population felt that Dioscorus had been wronged and that the council's decisions were heretical. This was coupled with resentment against the Greek-speaking authorities in Constantinople and against their representatives in Alexandria. In spite of many efforts to prevent the schism, eventually most Egyptian Christians left the communion of the imperial church. Since they rejected the doctrine of "two natures" of Chalcedon, they were dubbed MONOPHYSITES by the Orthodox, whom they in turn called Melchites—that is, imperial Christians.

After the Arab conquests, most Egyptian Christians left the Melchite communion and joined the dissident Monophysites. Since Coptic (a language derived from ancient Egyptian with many Greek accretions) was the language of this church, it came to be known as the Coptic church. In the eighteenth century a few thousand Copts joined the Roman Catholic communion, and to this day there is a small Coptic UNIATE body.

J.G.

CORBAN. An Aramaic word meaning "something set apart for or as a gift to God." According to the Mishnah, anything set apart as corban, even rashly, could not thereafter be used for any other purpose. Jesus' teaching in Mark 7:11-13 reflects the strictness with which this rule was then practiced.

P.L.G.

CORINTH. Located just south of the isthmus that joins the Peloponnesus to the mainland of Greece, Corinth served as a transshipping center for two ports: Cenchreae on the east, through which flowed trade to and from Egypt, Asia Minor, and Syria; Lechaemum on the west, with access to Italy, Rome, and the west. The southern end of the Peloponnesus was a notoriously dangerous place for ships because of storms and currents. Accordingly, shippers and sailors preferred the minor inconvenience of transporting their cargoes across the isthmus at Corinth in order to sail in the safety of the protected gulfs that led to the city in both directions. The city benefited enormously from the stream of commerce moving through it.

Corinth was almost completely destroyed in 146 B.C., following a war with the Romans, who were then a rising power in the West. Only vivid memory and ruins remained in the first century of the notorious Temple of Aphrodite, the goddess of love, whose shrine once had stood on the ridge of the massive rock, nearly two thousand feet high, which overlooks the site of the ancient city of Corinth.

The central marketplace, or Agora, was the location of the public rostrum (bēma) at which Paul's hearing before the Roman proconsul, Gallio, is described as taking place in Acts 18. An inscription from the time of Gallio's term in office was found in Delphi, a short distance north of Corinth, which enables us to determine the date of his consulship over the province of Achaia (which included Athens and Corinth). Its date is the equivalent of A.D. 52. Also surviving from the ruins of Corinth in this period are the remains of the Temple of Apollo and of a theater. These serve as vivid reminders of the vitality of Greek religion and culture in this city, which was famous for its wealth and its immorality.

Leading west from the Agora was the Lechaemum road, which was lined with shops and residences. Among these would have been the house of Titius Justus, where Paul launched his work in Corinth (Acts 18:7). It adjoined a place where Jews met for study of the Scriptures. An inscription in a stone lintel that presumably read "Synagogue of the Hebrews" was found in this vicinity, but it likely dates from the second century A.D. These modest ruins represent well the informal settings in which both Jews and early Christians met for worship and instruction in this period. Beneath these buildings there ran a system of channels and wells, which provided not only water but also cooled the produce on sale and food for purchase. An inscription from the time of Augustus refers to a meat shop, using the same term as Paul does in I Corinthians 10:25 in warning against Christians eating meat that had been offered to idols.

From the personal references in Paul's letters to the leaders of the church in Corinth, one can infer that the officials there included women (Rom. 16:1), and that they were as prominent as the treasurer of the city (Rom. 16:23). Paul's initial contacts in Corinth were with a business couple, Priscilla and Aquila, who had come from Rome (Acts 18:2) and who later returned there (Rom. 16:3). In Corinth, one of the church groups met in their house (I Cor. 16:19). Thus Paul's work in Corinth demonstrates vividly the new kinds of human relationships that developed in response to the gospel.

H. K.

I and II CORINTHIANS. These two letters are nearly as long as all the other authentic letters of Paul combined. They provide us with unmatched insight into the role of Paul in relation to Gentile churches and into the nature of the problems that arose in Christian communities where former pagans greatly outnumbered former Jews. The first letter takes up the issues point by point, which provides the modern reader with a primer on church problems. The second letter is not as organized, so that the argument is harder to follow. Indeed, some scholars have proposed that these letters as we know them are composites of fragments of several letters. But the practice of dictating letters that Paul followed (Rom. 16:22; I Cor. 16:21) probably accounts for the awkward transitions in these letters.

Other Letters Between Paul and the Corinthians. In I Corinthians 5:9 Paul refers to an earlier letter he had sent to Corinth, and he is responding to specific questions that they had asked in a letter to him (I Cor. 7:1). In II Corinthians 2:2 and 7:8 he mentions what is probably yet another letter of his in which he had sharply rebuked the Corinthians for their behavior and their attitude toward him. There is no doubt that the conditions within the churches at CORINTH and the vicinity were very much on Paul's mind and heart when he was at work in other churches in Macedonia and Asia Minor.

Basic Issues. Two broad questions that Paul addresses in the opening part of what we call I Corinthians are wisdom and apostolic authority. Some Corinthians were scornful of Paul because he did not use the style and substance of "wisdom"—that is, of intellectual speculation about how knowledge of God is granted to human beings. If Acts 18:24-28 gives us an accurate picture of Apollos, then the followers of Apollos in the internal struggle at Corinth (I Cor. 1:12; 3:5) may have admired his intellectual and rhetorical skills, comparing them with Paul's simple and more direct style to Paul's discredit. Paul's response was that the message of salvation through Jesus Christ was not expressed in the proud words of human wisdom, but was disclosed in what is—humanly speaking—foolishness and weakness: the cross. The Spirit of God communicates the message of true power to those who are attuned to hear. The upbuilding of the church requires people with a range of skills. Each must follow responsibly the assigned role, avoiding the prideful notion that one task is more important than another. To set up these false values within the church is to destroy it as the place where God dwells among human beings (I Cor. 3:16-17). All the leaders in the church are no more than administrators of power, which is derived solely from God. Paul has willingly accepted his life of obedience, even though it leads to persecution and humiliation rather than to prideful achievement in human eyes (I Cor. 4:1-13). Nevertheless, he has been commissioned by Christ and will exercise authority in Christ's name for settling disputes if the Corinthians have not straightened matters out by the time of his arrival (I Cor. 4:14-21).

At this point in the letter, Paul turns to a series of specific issues that were plaguing the churches at Corinth and presumably Gentile churches elsewhere as well. The first of these was incest (I Cor. 5), which was considered a gross immorality by the Greeks (as in the story of Oedipus, who married his mother without knowing who she was) as well as by the Jews (Lev. 18). The Christians had condoned a man's marrying his stepmother (I Cor. 5:1), and Paul ordered his expulsion from the community. Rather than settling disputes from within the group, some were turning to the civil courts (I Cor. 6:1-6). The dominant factor in their common life was to share the mutual responsibility that they bore as a body (I Cor. 6:9-20). Corinth had a reputation in the ancient world for loose sexual behavior, and the Christians were living on a par with those low moral standards (I Cor. 7). In view of the imminent end of the age and the urgent need for evangelism, as Paul believed, it was better to be single than married. But he had no notion that to have sexual relationships was inherently evil. Some Christians were buying meat in the marketplace which had initially been presented to an idol. This was a common practice at the time, but some Christians who had converted from pagan religions felt that by eating such meat they were participating in idol worship. Paul declares against the practice (8:13) and then resumes discussion of the issue in I Corinthians 10.

Most of the other subjects Paul treats in I Corinthians concern the internal life of the church: the role of women, to whom he assigns a secondary place (I Cor. 11); the varieties of spiritual—literally, charismatic—gifts which are essential for the life of the church (I Cor. 12-14). In the midst of these discussions he inserts (1) instructions about the central rite by which the church celebrates its origins in the death and exaltation of Christ; the Lord's Supper (I Cor. 11:17-34); and (2) the beautiful words describing Christian love (I Cor. 13). The remaining subjects he covers are the resurrection of the faithful (I Cor. 15) and the financial contribution from the Gentile churches (like that at Corinth) to the Jerusalem Christians (I Cor. 16:1-4).

The final issue is related to one already discussed by Paul in I Corinthians 9—Paul's refusal to accept financial support from the Corinthians. This is in sharp contrast to the policy of those apostles and other leaders who follow the pattern set by Jesus for his followers—that they live from contributions provided by those among whom they minister (I Cor. 9:1-18; compare Mark 6:7-11). Paul knew he could claim such support, but refused to do so, and his refusal led his critics to question that he really was an APOSTLE.

It is this question of Paul's qualification to be an apostle that is the central concern in II Corinthians. The major criticisms of Paul on this score are that he is indecisive (II Cor. 1:15-22), that he lacks formal letters of recommendation from other Christian communities (3:1-3), and that he is not really qualified to be a minister of the New Covenant since he was never associated with Jesus during the time of Jesus' earthly life. The letter of recommendation was a message sent by one congregation to another that was to be visited by the apostle. The sender seems to have paid for the apostle's transportation and expenses to reach the next place on his itinerary, as stated in Mark 6. The only money and food available was what the community provided. Paul had a fundamentally different view of financial responsibility. He made his own living at a trade and took up collections only for others: the Jerusalem church. He considered his having seen the Risen Lord (I Cor. 9:1; 15:8) and his subsequent visions of Christ (II Cor. 3:18; 4:6; 12:1-4) as of equal value with the original disciples' associations with Jesus. He makes the point directly that he is no longer concerned about Christ "from a human point of view" (II Cor. 5:16). That is, what is important for him and for all Christians is the living Lord, not the earthly Jesus, since in the living Lord everyone shares in the new creation. It is the encounter with the Risen Jesus that resulted in his being commissioned as an agent of God in the reconciliation of the world (II Cor. 5:17-20).

Paul addresses head on the issue of his apostleship by showing how he can match his opponents point for point. They are proud of their Jewish heritage, their descent from Abraham, their role as servants of Christ, their sufferings and revelations (II Cor. 10-12). On all of these Paul can match their qualifications. Where he diverges from them is his refusal to live by their donations. He insists that his financial independence gives him complete freedom in fulfilling his apostolic role (II Cor. 12:13-18). If his detractors want to observe his apostolic authority—in action, not merely in theory—they can wait until his much delayed return to Corinth.

Thus the two preserved letters bear testimony to a basic division among the apostles, in spite of their claim to mutual recognition. For most, their authorization derived from ongoing associations with Jesus during his public career. For Paul, it was the Risen Lord, whose continuing presence with him was confirmed by visions and by the power of the Spirit, who called and qualified Paul to be an apostle.

H.K.

CORNELIUS. A Roman centurion in Caesarea whose conversion (Acts 10:1-48) has been called the Gentile Christian Pentecost in parallel with the Jewish Christian Pentecost of Acts 2. The centurion may have been a descendant slave of Cornelius Sulla, who, about 80 B.C., at considerable expense, liberated many slaves. Numbers of these freedmen took the name Cornelius.

Cornelius was "a devout man who feared God with all his household" (Acts 10:2), which means that he followed some Jewish practices, but was not legally a Jewish proselyte. Acts 10:1-13:3 centers on the conversion of GENTILES. At the beginning, Peter is hesitant even to proclaim the gospel to god-fearing, devout Gentiles. But he is persuaded later by the conversion of Cornelius and his household, and by the gift of the Holy Spirit "even on Gentiles" (10:45). Peter had to defend his new insight before the Jerusalem church (11:1-18). The story ends with the gospel being preached to Gentiles who have no connection with Judaism (11:20), the conversion of "a great number," and is climaxed by the sending out of Barnabus and Saul by the Antioch church—the first Christian missionaries to Gentile lands.

P.L.G.

CORPUS CHRISTI, FEAST OF. A Roman Catholic feast and procession, which dates from the mid-thirteenth century, honoring the REAL PRESENCE of Christ in the Eucharist. This is a doctrinal festival, which aims to encourage frequent communion and the instruction of the faithful in the teachings of the church about Christ's real presence (that is, transubstantiation) in the Mass and to encourage devotion to it.

From the eleventh century to the thirteenth, reception of Communion declined, and several controversies over the belief that Christ was present in the Eucharist erupted. The Berengarian controversy in the mid-eleventh century and the practice of simply gazing on the consecrated host rather than personally communing were elements in this theological confusion. In the midst of this, Juliana of Liege (in A.D. 1209) reported a vision that called for a Eucharistic feast. This was not immediately accepted, but interest in such a new festival grew, and Corpus Christi (the Body of Christ) was celebrated for the first time in A.D. 1247. The practice was extended by the pope, Urban IV, to the universal church in A.D. 1264. The procession became the major part of the feast in the fourteenth century. This procession takes place after Mass, and the host displayed is one consecrated at the Mass celebrated earlier that day.

J.C.

CORRELATION. This theological method is especially associated with PAUL TILLICH, though a similar method has been used by many theologians both before and since his time. The method uses an anthropological approach, that is to say, it begins with an analysis of the present human and cultural situation and then tries to present the material of the Christian revelation as answers to the questions arising out of the culture. Such a method in theology certainly avoids the danger of irrelevance, which might affect a theology that simply expounds the KERYGMA without attention to the cultural context. Moreover, if the method is applied conscientiously, Tillich believes that it will genuinely evoke answers from the revelation, and not just spin them out of the questions themselves. But the objection is raised by kerygmatic theologians that by allowing the culture to specify the questions, one has already determined the kind of answers that the revelation is permitted to give, and that one has also to consider the critical questions that the revelation raises for the culture.

J.M.

CORRUPT TEXT. A term used in the textual study (lower criticism) of the Bible to refer to a passage that has been modified in the transmission of the text to express a theological viewpoint or to harmonize it with a parallel passage. An example is I John 5:7 in the Authorized (King James) Version.

J.C.

COSMOLOGICAL ARGUMENT. See GOD'S EXISTENCE, ARGUMENTS FOR.

COTTON, JOHN (1584–1652). This Massachusetts Bay pastor was born in Derby, England, on December 4. Educated at Trinity College, Cambridge (A.B. 1603; A.M. 1606), he taught six years at Emmanuel College, a PURITAN stronghold. Ordained deacon and priest in 1610 at Lincoln, in 1612 he went to St. Botolph's at Boston in Lincolnshire, where he began to alter the liturgy to Puritan tastes. The bishop was tolerant, but Cotton resigned May 7, 1633. On July 3, 1613, he married Elizabeth Harrocks. After her death in 1630 he married Sarah Hawkridge Story on April 25, 1632.

Already interested in New England, and a friend of JOHN WINTHROP, he arrived in Boston, Massachusetts, on September 4, 1633. Serving as teacher to the Boston church until his death December 23, 1652, he became embroiled in controversies against ROGER WILLIAMS and ANNE HUTCHINSON.

Cotton published a number of books including The Keyes of the Kingdom of Heaven (1644), The Way of the Churches of Christ in New England (1645), and Milk for Babes (1646). He stressed the unconditional nature of ELECTION and the inner experience of the Spirit in regeneration.

N.H.

COUNCILS OF CHURCHES. See the place-names.

COUNSELOR. See HOLY SPIRIT.

COUNSELS OF PERFECTION. Stringent ethical commandments and ideals believed to be superior to and more suited to a life of perfection than the ordinary precepts required of all Christians to attain eternal life. They are based on certain NT passages: the Sermon on the Mount (Matt. 5–7) calls for love of enemies, Matthew 19:21 demands absolute poverty, I Corinthians 7 poses virginity as superior to marriage. Such commands seemed not for all but only for those voluntarily seeking perfection.

A higher-lower way of Christian living developed, mentioned by the Shepherd of Hermas, Tertullian, Cyprian, Ambrose, Pelagius, and Augustine. The traditional monastic vows of voluntary poverty, chastity, and obedience in Roman Catholicism came to symbolize the counsels of perfection. As a result salvation could be merited more quickly than in ordinary Christian living, and those honoring the counsels could even earn extra merits for others. Thomas Aquinas further developed the counsels of perfection as exalted expressions of love. However, the reformers led by Martin Luther rejected the notion of a higher-lower way as leading to false pride and devaluing ordinary Christian living. Luther declared we are justified by faith alone; the commandments convict us of sin; they do not establish less and more meritorious ways of life.

C.M.

COUNTER REFORMATION. See CATHOLIC REFORMATION.

COVENANT. Definition. The term "covenant" translates a Hebrew word in the OT whose primary meaning is "a binding pact" or "a compact." It is used of alliances between people, for example, Abraham and the Amorites (Gen. 14:13), Joshua and the Gibeonites (Josh. 9:6 ff), Israel and the Canaanites (Exod. 23:32), Solomon and Hiram (I Kings 5:2-6). But most often it refers to the agreement between God and humans, for example, Noah (Gen. 9:9-17), Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob (Gen. 15:18; 17:2-21, etc.), Israel at Sinai (Exod. 19:5; 24:7), Joshua and Israel (Josh. 24:25), and the prophetic covenant (Jer. 31:31). All such covenants are conditional, being predicated on stipulated terms at the time of ratification. In the cases of covenants between God and humans, the stipulations are made by God, and people have the choice of accepting or rejecting but not of offering alternative conditions. If people accept the conditions they will be blessed according to the terms of the agreement as long as they keep it or cursed if they violate it. The Israelites were promised the land of Canaan if they would keep the covenant; if not, the land would "vomit them out" (Lev. 18:24-30). The idea is clearly expressed in the Greek translations of the word, where the term diatheke, meaning "unilateral agreement," is chosen rather than the term suntheke, meaning "bilateral agreement." The latter term would suggest a treaty rather than a unilateral covenant in which all terms were dictated by God.

Old and New Covenants. Jesus spoke of the wine at the institution of the Lord's Supper as being a (new) covenant in his blood, which is poured out for the forgiveness of sins (Matt. 26:28). He was apparently thinking of the covenant spoken of by Jeremiah, which was to be a future blessing to Israel, associated in the minds of most with the coming of the Messiah (31:31 ff). The author of Hebrews quotes this passage in his eighth chapter and speaks of the "first covenant" (that is, the Mosaic) as one that is "becoming obsolete and growing old and is ready to vanish away" (8:13). He calls the Second Covenant (8:7) a "new covenant" (8:13), which is necessitated by the imperfections of the old one. Since he speaks of the tabernacle ritual as a part of the first covenant (9:1-11), which clearly refers to the Mosaic covenant received on Sinai (Exod. 25-31), it is clear that his intention is to contrast the Mosaic covenant with the new one spoken of by Jeremiah (Heb. 8:8-9). However, the covenant that Moses received on Sinai was an addition to the original one God gave to Abraham (Gen. 12:1 ff; 15:1 ff.) according to the argument of Paul in Galatians, where he seems to divide the covenant into LAW and PROMISE. The Law given to Moses came 430 years after the promise made to Abraham and in no way disannulled it (Gal. 3:19). Both the promise and the Law are called covenants, as the above quotations show. The argument in both Galatians and Hebrews is that God through Christ fulfilled the promise God made to Abraham (that is, God would bless all nations through Abraham's seed) and thereby made the Law obsolete because it was given to only one nation, Israel. The old covenant was national and therefore limited; the new one is international and therefore unlimited. Such is the inherent implication of the establishment of true monotheism (Rom. 3:29) by the death and resurrection of Christ (Rom. 3:21-26).

Covenant and Testament. The question of the relation between covenant and TESTAMENT arises by the fact that the new covenant is commonly called the New Testament, and thus designates the Christian part of the Bible in most translations, the Jewish part being called the Old Testament. The same Greek and Hebrew words lie behind the differing translations. Testament derives from the Latin term testamentum, which means "a will" and requires the death of the testator for the will to become effective.

This clearly creates a problem in Hebrews 9:15-18, because the one who made the first testament was God and God by definition cannot die. Thus the author argues that animal sacrifices provided the required death by substitutionary atonement. The Jerusalem Bible translates verse 18 as follows: "that explains why even the earlier covenant needed something to be killed in order to take effect." The handling of these difficult verses, in which the same Greek word occurs throughout, is not uniform in the modern translations. While the KJV renders the term consistently "testament," in verses 15, 16, and 18, the Living Bible and Phillips render it "agreement, will, testament." The NIV, TEV, RSV, and Jerusalem Bible translate it "covenant, will, covenant," while the NEB reads "covenant, or testament" in verse 15, "testament" in 16, and "covenant" in 18. Perhaps the meaning in the broadest context is that Christ put both covenants into effect by his death. When the author of Hebrews quotes Jeremiah, which has the same term throughout the passage in both Hebrew and Greek, he replaces the OT term meaning "put the covenant into effect" (8:9) with one meaning simply "make a covenant," when referring to the old covenant, but allows the term "put into effect" to stand in reference to the new covenant (8:8, 10). He seems to be arguing that God never actually ratified the old covenant but rather only temporarily made it, using the blood of animals to substitute for the required death until Christ came, who gave both covenants validity simultaneously but also at the same time replacing the former with the latter.

J. R. M.

COVENANT THEOLOGY. See FEDERAL THEOLOGY.

COVERDALE, MILES (1488–1569). A translator of the Bible and devotional works, a preacher, and bishop of Exeter. Born in Yorkshire, he studied theology at Cambridge, was ordained a priest (1514), and joined the Augustinian monastery. Influenced by Lutheran ideas, he left the monastery and preached against Roman Catholicism. He fled to the Continent in 1528 and in 1535 completed the first English Bible translation. Based on TYNDALE's NT and various German and Latin texts, it was printed in Geneva and dedicated to Henry VIII. Later English translations drew freely from it. In 1538 Thomas Cromwell commissioned Coverdale to make an official Bible translation for the Anglican Church. The Great Bible, 1539, for which he was a principal collaborator, was consigned to be placed in all English parishes. When Henry executed Cromwell, Coverdale left England for eight years, returning in 1548 to serve Edward VI. He became bishop of Exeter, 1551, but was jailed for two years by Queen Mary and later refused to honor Elizabeth's Act of Uniformity.

C. M.

COWL. A long, flowing robe with wide sleeves and a hood typically worn by monks. The cowl is presented to the monk upon his vows of profession. Most Benedictine cowls are black, and Cistercian and some Benedictine orders wear white. Sometimes the cowl is thought to be only the hood.

J. C.

COWPER, WILLIAM (1731–1800). Cowper wrote such hymns as "O! For a Closer Walk with God," "God Moves in a Mysterious Way," and "There Is a Fountain Filled with Blood."

Cowper was born on November 15 to a Church of England minister in Berkhamstead, whose wife died when William was six. Cowper was educated at Westminster and called to the bar in 1754. For nine years he practiced law and wrote satire and ballads for the press. Then, anxious over possible appointment as a clerk to the House of Lords, he attempted suicide three times. Fear that he was forever condemned by God haunted him for the remainder of his life.

To recover he spent two years at Huntingdon with his friend Mary Unwin, and the rest of his life at Olney under the influence of the equally despondent JOHN NEWTON. After another suicide attempt,

Unwin suggested he write poetry as a therapy. His first volume was published in 1782. He wrote productively until her death in 1796 plunged him again into a "fixed despair."

His famous Olney Hymns also include "Sometimes a Light Surprises," "Hark, My Soul! It Is the Lord," and "Jesus, Where'er Thy People Meet."

N. H.

COX, HARVEY. One of contemporary theology's most perceptive analysts of recent cultural and political currents as they bear upon religion and the church. An ordained Baptist minister, Cox was educated at the University of Pennsylvania (B.A., 1951), Yale Divinity School (B.D., 1955), and Harvard (Ph.D., 1963). Since 1965, he has been professor of church and society at Harvard Divinity School.

Cox is best known for his widely discussed book, The Secular City (1965). Building on themes found in F. Gogarten's analysis of the Bible's radical historicization of human life and D. Bonhoeffer's reflections on a "religionless" Christianity, Cox finds the life-style of the modern secular city to be consistent with biblical theology. The Israelite story of the Creation, Exodus, and the Covenant prohibition against idolatry all point to the desacralization of nature and the relativity of all political and cultural values. Cox sees the Bible as liberating humans to harness nature and to adopt entirely provisional and pragmatic attitudes toward politics and culture.

Four years later, in an apparent reversal of secular theology, Cox extolled the latest vogue: festivity, ritual, fantasy, and utopian thinking, in Feast of Fools (1969). Cox is also author of Seduction of the Spirit (1974) and Turning East (1979).

J. L.

CRANMER, THOMAS (1489–1556). English religious reformer, archbishop of Canterbury, chief author of the Forty-two Articles, which became the THIRTY-NINE ARTICLES of the Anglican church, liturgist, and Protestant martyr.

Educated at Cambridge University, he was ordained about 1520 and later achieved a doctorate in theology. In 1529 he suggested that HENRY VIII not wait for Rome to annul his marriage to Catherine but let the universities of Europe pass judgment. Henry rewarded Cranmer by making him royal chaplain, archdeacon of Taunton, and a diplomatic envoy. Having married in 1532, Cranmer hesitated to accept Henry's invitation to be archbishop of Canterbury, but Rome confirmed the nomination. Consecrated in 1533, less than two months later he declared Henry's marriage to Catherine invalid, and five days later he legalized Henry's earlier secret marriage to Anne Boleyn.

Cranmer promoted royal supremacy and along with Parliament pronounced Henry head of the Church of England. He encouraged Bible translations into English, tried to unite Lutherans and Anglicans under Henry's liberalized Ten Articles of 1536, and was ready to go further than Henry with REFORMATION practices. As religious adviser to EDWARD VI he started reforms that changed Anglicanism. He approved clerical marriages and the abolition of numerous papal ceremonies. He wrote the first two BOOKS OF COMMON PRAYER, 1549 and 1552, and authored the Forty-two Articles. Catholic Queen Mary imprisoned and tortured Cranmer in 1553. He made multiple recantations, then died at the stake, first burning the right hand that signed the recantations.

C.M.

CREATION. The divine action that calls the universe into existence and ensures its continuity.

Angle of Vision. The God biblical Israel worshiped was foremost the Lord of history who had powerfully rescued the covenant people from Egyptian slavery and facilitated their settlement in Canaan (Deut. 26:5-10). As Israel's savior, God was no less the creator of all. Israel perceived creation as the starting point of that continuing historical drama within which God's will became reality. Like its Near Eastern neighbors, Israel regarded the universe as a three-storied structure incorporating heaven, earth, and the underworld (Exod. 20:4). With them it entertained no direct notion of creatio ex nihilo (creation out of nothing, first explicit in II Macc. 7:28), but assumed the presence of preexistent matter. Also Israel understood that creation stories were more adept at answering the question, "What is the meaning of present creaturely existence?" than the question, "What really happened back then?" Unlike its neighbors, Israel denied that the created order owed its existence to a battle between divine beings that resulted in the destruction of chaos-monsters.

Genesis Creation Accounts. Perhaps dating to Solomon's reign, the earth-centered narrative of Genesis 2:4b-25 limits its creation concern to human origins. Using vivid verbs drawn from human handicraft and gardening, its author refers to Yahweh's creation of living space (the garden), the means of sustenance (fruit trees), work (garden cultivation), and communal existence (man and woman). Unlike the Babylonian Atrahasis epic, where the gods merely value humanity as the supplier of physical wants, the Yahwist's story abounds with God's concern for humanity. The opportunity to name the animals attests human authority over them (Gen. 2:19). Nevertheless, the garden is Yahweh's, and human acknowledgment of God's sovereignty is expected.

Ultimately achieving fixed written form in the sixth century B. C., the sophisticated Priestly narrative (Gen. 1:1-2:4a) depicts Israel's God as the transcendent cosmic organizer who creates through an efficacious word. Numerous categories are presented within a six-day span: time (1:3-5), space (1:6-10), the creation of vegetation (1:11-13), celestial bodies (1:14-19), animals (1:20-25), and humanity (1:26-31). Thereupon the seventh day is portrayed as creation's goal, whereby the Creator rests from labor, and Sabbath observance is universalized in a cosmic framework (2:1-3). With its pronounced use of the verb "to create" (bārā'), which throughout the OT solely has God as its subject, this Priestly version celebrates an undeniably sovereign deity who stands over against creatures. Yet the earth putting forth vegetation (1:11-12), the celestial bodies controlling the calendar (1:18), and humanity exercising dominion over its environment (1:28) are accorded partial sovereignty. Made in God's "image" and "likeness" (respectively denoting concrete and abstract similarity, 1:26), blessed humanity is invited into a special relationship with God.

Other Biblical Reflections. Creation is also celebrated in the Psalms and in wisdom and prophetic texts. Creation via divine speech, so central in the Priestly account, is reaffirmed in Psalm 33:9 ("He spoke, and it came to be; he commanded, and it stood forth"). The idea of humanity's sovereignty within God's own sovereignty asserted in Genesis 1:26-28 finds superlative expression in Psalm 8. Resembling Pharaoh Akhenaton's "Hymn to the Sun," Psalm 104 extols the sheer wonder of creation ("O Lord, how manifold are thy works!" v. 24). God's sovereignty over chaos attested at the head of Genesis 1 achieves much sharper restatement in Psalm 74:13-15, which personifies the restless waters as a chaos-monster.

Wisdom literature also reveres the Creator. The articulation of Proverbs 3:19, "The Lord by wisdom founded the earth; by understanding he established the heavens," is elaborately reinforced in the Deity's many questions to Job and "lecture" on the hippopotamus and crocodile (Job 38:4-39:30; 40:8-41:34). Then the mystery of creation is daringly highlighted in Proverbs 8:22-31 with its personification of wisdom as Yahweh's firstborn creature. Moreover, living in the late exilic era, Second Isaiah perceives creation as an all-encompassing category. More than being a cosmological event at the beginning of time, creation involves Israel's historical origins as well as its present, which gravitates toward a promising future. Israel's "Lord, who made all things" is identified as Israel's "Redeemer" (Isa. 44:24; 45:8). In a glorious new act of creation, Yahweh will secure Israel's rescue from Babylonian captivity.

Second Isaiah's new creation theme reappears within the NT message that in Christ, God's kingdom is already inaugurated. For Paul, "all things" exist through Christ (I Cor. 8:6). He declares, "If any one is in Christ, he is a new creation; the old has passed away" (II Cor. 5:17). Presently, a new humanity is emerging; ultimately, a new heaven and earth will be created (Rev. 21:1-4). In sum, early Christianity claimed that creation finds its unity and purpose in Christ (Eph. 1:9-10), and through him the sovereign design of the Creator-Redeemer Deity is fully realized.

J.K.K.

CREDO UT INTELLIGAM. A phrase used by ANSELM meaning, "I believe in order to understand." Once firmly established in FAITH, Anselm taught that one can understand by pure reason what one believes—for example, the necessity of the Incarnation. Augustine also taught that one must first believe in order to understand, but he placed greater emphasis on the essential role of the will in KNOWLEDGE.

J.L.

CREEDS/CREDO. A brief statement of faith, usually worded to be easily memorized. Though creeds are sometimes used as tests of orthodoxy, they are more typically liturgical in function. In the Christian church, the recital of creeds constitutes the "daily education and public self-definition of the community" (Jenson).

The most universal of the Christian creeds is the NICENE. It is used at the Eucharist in both Eastern and Western churches. It falls into three parts, the first affirming the Father as Creator, the second affirming the Son and reciting his saving works, the third affirming the Holy Spirit and the church as the community of the Spirit. This creed had its origin at the ecumenical Council of NICEA (325) but did not achieve its final form until the Council of CONSTANTINOPLE (381), so it is sometimes designated more correctly as the Niceno-Constantinopolitan Creed. In its original form, the creed spoke of the Holy Spirit as "proceeding from the Father," but from about the sixth century the words "and from the Son" (FILIOQUE) began to be added in Spain. By the eleventh century this addition was accepted in Rome, and it has remained a matter of contention between East and West—the Eastern churches affirming a single procession from the Father, the West claiming a double procession from the Father and the Son.

Both views can be defended theologically, but the Eastern churches are correct in maintaining that their version is the original one and has never been altered by an ecumenical council.

The APOSTLES' CREED is briefer than the Nicene but has the same threefold form. It is used only in the West, where it originated as a baptismal confession of faith. A legend relates that each of its several clauses was composed by one of the original apostles before they dispersed from Jerusalem on their missionary journeys. In fact, the creed did not reach its present form until the eighth century, but it may justly be called "apostolic" since its roots are much earlier than its final formulation, and it expresses the gist of the early apostolic teaching. In its recital of the events in the career of Christ, it includes the descent into hell, not mentioned in the Nicene Creed.

A third Christian creed is the Athanasian, also known as Quicumque vult from the opening words of the Latin version. In spite of the name, the creed has nothing to do with Athanasius and is a Western production. It does not share the threefold structure of the Apostles' and Nicene creeds, but expounds the doctrines of the Trinity and the Incarnation. Compared with the other creeds, it is lengthy, technical, and not easily memorized, and it is not much used in churches today. There have been many modern attempts to update creeds, but none of them have met with success. The ancient creeds, especially the Nicene, continue to be prized, for they give a sense of solidarity in faith with the whole church as extended in both space and time.

J.M.

CRISIS THEOLOGY. See BARTH, KARL.

CRITICAL APPARATUS. The lengthy series of footnotes, citations of other passages of scriptures, and references to ancient manuscripts and to early versions and editions of the NT that appear in scholarly editions of the Greek NT. By use of the critical apparatus, the student is able to discover the many variants in spelling and words of NT texts that occur in ancient witnesses.

J.C.

CRITICISM. See BIBLICAL CRITICISM.

CRITIQUE OF PURE REASON. See KANT, IMMANUEL.

CROLY, GEORGE (1780–1860). The hymn "Spirit of God, Descend upon My Heart" is attributed to him. Born August 17, 1780, in Dublin, Ireland, he received a B.A. in 1800 from Dublin University and an M.A. in 1804.

Ordained in Ireland by the Church of England, he moved to London in 1810, initially devoting himself to a literary career as the drama critic for New Times. From 1832 to 1835, however, he served the parish of Romford in Essex, and from 1835 until his death, November 24, 1860, he was rector of St. Benet Sherehog with St. Stephen's, Walbrook, in London. His hymns first appeared in Psalms and Hymns for Public Worship (1854).

N.H.

CROMWELL, OLIVER (1599–1658). English soldier, Lord Protector of England, and PURITAN leader. Born at Huntingdon, he received a strongly oriented Puritan education at the free school in Huntingdon and at Cambridge University. In 1628 he was elected to Parliament to represent Huntingdon and in 1640 to represent Cambridge County. He contended vigorously against opponents of Puritanism, attacked Charles I's handling of religious affairs, and openly called for abolition of bishops. He regarded Parliament's struggle against Charles I as basically religious, and in the First Civil War (1642–46) sided with Parliament. He commanded a cavalry troop at Edgehill in 1642, and his military prowess showed quickly. He later organized and superbly trained his Ironsides "men of religion" cavalry, many of whom were INDEPENDENTS. He won decisive victories for Parliament at Marston Moor (1644) and Naseby (1645), and empowered by Parliament he developed a disciplined New Model Army of religious men.

Courtesy of the American Antiquarian Society

Oliver Cromwell

Cromwell felt called of God and considered the army his church. He disliked tyranny. When Scottish Presbyterians sought to disband the army, Cromwell occupied London. Charles, previously captured, escaped to Ireland. During the Second Civil War (1648–52) he crushed Royalist uprisings in Wales and defeated Scottish Presbyterians who had sided with King Charles at Preston (1648). He sat with the High Court of Justice that convicted Charles of treason and was the fourth signer of the death warrant (1649). Parliament then used Cromwell to quell insurrection. He ruthlessly crushed Irish opposition to Parliament in 1649 and defeated insurgent Presbyterian-Royalist Scots at Dunbar (1650) and Worcester (1651), ending armed resistance to Parliament.

In 1653 Cromwell ousted a troublesome Parliament, leaving himself and the army in control. A reassembled Barebones Parliament failed to create a satisfactory government, and on December 16, 1653, the army adopted an "Instrument of Government" and named Cromwell Lord Protector. He ruled with limited help from Parliament, favored religious tolerance generally, and refused the title of king. Puritanism decisively influenced his decisions. He was buried at Westminster Abbey. After the monarchy's restoration (1660), his body was hung at Tyburn, but in 1899 Parliament placed his statue in Westminster.

C.M.

CROSBY, FRANCES JANE (FANNY) (1820–1915). An incredibly prolific hymnwriter, Frances Jane Crosby was born on March 24 in southeast Putnam County, New York, the only child of John and Mercy Crosby Crosby. At six weeks old she permanently lost her sight due to improper treatment of an eye infection. Her father died shortly thereafter.

Her mother remarried and the family moved from North Salem, New York, to Ridgefield, Connecticut. With three younger siblings, Fanny had a happy childhood. Her early education consisted of listening to her mother reading and of memorizing long Bible passages. About 1835 she entered the New York Institution for the Blind in New York City. Convinced of the advantages of education, she was a diligent student and eventually a teacher of English grammar, rhetoric, and ancient history there from 1847 to 1858.

After visiting Scottish phrenologist George Combe pronounced her a poet, she became one of the school's star pupils, appearing before joint sessions of Congress in 1844 and 1847. In 1850 she departed her Calvinist Presbyterian upbringing to become a Methodist. In 1858 she married Alexander Van Alstyne, also a blind musician who taught at the school and served as a church organist. They made their home in Brooklyn and had one child who died in infancy.

Fanny Crosby, as she was always known, had her first poem published in 1841—a eulogy to President William Henry Harrison. She eventually published four volumes: The Blind Girl and Other Poems (1844), Monterey, and Other Poems (1851), A Wreath of Columbia's Flowers (1858), and Bells at Evening and Other Poems (1897). She first collaborated musically with George F. Root, who taught music at the institute. Together they wrote a popular cantata "The Flower Queen," and fifty to sixty songs such as "There's Music in the Air" and "Rosalie, the Prairie Flower."

She began writing hymns and gospel songs about 1864, allegedly at the urging of WILLIAM BRADBURY. Among her twenty other collaborators, undoubtedly the most famous was IRA D. SANKEY. In all she wrote probably between 5,500 and 9,000 hymns, using as many as 200 pseudonyms out of modesty. Although none of her hymns appears in current Presbyterian, Lutheran, or Episcopal hymnals, she is well represented in Methodist, Baptist, and more evangelical books.

Popular titles include "All the Way My Savior Leads Me," "Blessed Assurance," "The Bright Forever," "He Hideth My Soul," "I Am Thine, O Lord," "Jesus Is Tenderly Calling," "Jesus, Keep Me Near the Cross," "Jesus the Water of Life Will Give," "O the Friends That Now Are Waiting," "Pass Me Not, O Gentle Savior," "Redeemed, How I Love to Proclaim It," "Rescue the Perishing," "Revive Thy Work, O Lord," "Safe in the Arms of Jesus," "Savior, More Than Life to Me," "Some Day the Silver Cord Will Break," "To God Be the Glory," and "Thou My Everlasting Portion."

In 1900 she moved to Bridgeport, Connecticut, to live with her widowed sister. Her husband died in 1902. Yet she remained active, composing a two-volume autobiography: Fanny Crosby's Life-Story (1903) and Memories of Eighty Years (1906).

N.H.

CROSS. See ATONEMENT, THEORIES OF.

CRUCIFIXION. A form of execution by fastening the condemned to two crossed beams. Ezra 6:11 suggests that crucifixion was a practice of the Persians; the Greeks did not use it. Roman law ordered it for slaves, malefactors, religious and political agitators, murderers, pirates, and others who had no civil rights. Jesus, as a seditionist, might be crucified, but Paul, a Roman citizen, could not.

Crucifixion was intended to reduce crime by the public display of the shame and horror attached to the cross. Crucifixion was abolished in Europe when Constantine became a Christian (about A.D. 314). The Romans most often used a T or X-shaped cross. Christian tradition favors the Latin cross as the form of Jesus' cross.

Crucifixion, Roman style, as the gospels illustrate, began with a scourging of the prisoner followed by his carrying (at least the shorter part of) the cross to where he was to die. A public place was chosen, often where two or more heavily traveled streets or roads crossed and with a cemetery conveniently nearby. The upright piece was firmly fastened in the ground. The condemned man was then stripped of his clothing and either tied or nailed to the crossbeam, which was then hoisted in place by ropes until the feet were off the ground. Sometimes a ledge-like support projected from the upright piece. The feet were tied or nailed. A military guard took charge and remained until death came by exhaustion or heart failure. No vital organs were harmed. The victim was rigidly held in one position unable to deal with heat, cold, muscle cramps, natural body functions, hunger, or thirst. Often the crucified died in agony only after a number of days on the cross. After the body was removed, the cross was burned. Nails from crucifixion crosses were used by both Jews and Romans as means of healing. Pliny mentions this specifically in the treatment of epilepsy in his Natural History. During Jesus' youth, a massive Jewish riot, protesting the king's policies, heavily damaged Sepphoris, Herod Antipas' capitol, four miles from Nazareth. In the king's wrathful retaliation, thousands of Jews were crucified along roadways leading to the ruined city.

P.L.G.

CRUSADES. A series of military expeditions, beginning in 1096 and lasting several centuries, whereby Christians sought to retake the Holy Land from Moslem hands. After that time, the name has been used for other military campaigns under ecclesiastical leadership, or even more generally for any enterprise requiring extraordinary zeal, usually against a real or fictitious enemy.

The First Crusade (1096-99) was the only successful one, if one measures the crusades by their stated goals. In 1096, Pope Urban II called for a military enterprise to "free" the Holy Sepulcher from the Turks, who had taken it from the Arabs and whose growing power was threatening the Byzantine Empire. He promised plenary INDULGENCE to all who lost their lives in the campaign. Thus, the ideal of the crusades combined earlier notions of just war, the value of PILGRIMAGES to holy places, and the need to do PENANCE for sins.

The first wave of crusaders—who received this name because of the cross that they wore on their clothing—was a disorganized mob under the leadership of Peter the Hermit. On their way to Constantinople they massacred Jews, ravaged the land, and eventually had to fight with Christians, who defended their lands and crops. Their ragged remnant joined at Constantinople with the better organized military units under the leadership of a papal legate. Then the army crossed the Bosphorus, took Nicea, and, after many hardships, conquered Antioch. By then the leadership was sharply divided, since the papal legate was dead. A contingent under Baldwin's leadership had abandoned the enterprise and accepted the Armenians' invitation to set up an independent county in Edessa. Finally, after much bickering, the crusaders marched on Jerusalem, which they took and put to the sword, after a long siege in 1099. Godfrey of Bouillon was then named Protector of the Holy Sepulcher. A year later, at his death, he was succeeded by his brother Baldwin, who took the title of king of Jerusalem. Under this kingdom, in imitation of the feudalism, which then prevailed in western Europe, several nobles were granted lands.

The Second Crusade was organized in response to the capture of Edessa by the Sultan of Aleppo, in 1144. Its great promoter was BERNARD OF CLAIRVAUX. Its leaders were Emperor Conrad III of Germany and King Louis VII of France. Their army of almost 200,000 men accomplished nothing, and after a half-hearted siege of Damascus the crusade was dissolved.

In 1187 Sultan Saladin took Jerusalem, and the news shook Christendom. The result was the Third Crusade, under the divided leadership of Emperor Frederick Barbarossa, Philip II Augustus of France, and Richard "the Lion-Hearted." Although this crusade has been the theme of much fiction, it too accomplished nothing but the conquests of Cyprus and Acre. It also obtained from Saladin the promise that Christian pilgrims would be respected and protected.

The Fourth Crusade, whose supposed purpose was to attack Egypt, was maneuvered into taking and sacking Constantinople, where the crusaders set up a Latin Empire of Constantinople. Pope Innocent III, who presided over the crusade, at first was dismayed, but eventually accepted the events as God's way of reuniting the Eastern and Western branches of the church.

The Fifth Crusade, under the leadership of the titular king of Jerusalem, attacked Egypt with little success. The Sixth Crusade was led by Emperor Frederick II, who had been excommunicated by Pope Gregory IX. Through negotiations, Frederick obtained Jerusalem, Bethlehem, and Nazareth, and safe-conduct for pilgrims to those cities, in exchange for a promise to halt further military campaigns from the West. The Seventh and Eighth crusades, led by Louis IX of France (St. Louis), were total disasters.

The crusading ideal was employed repeatedly in other contexts. Innocent III, for instance, called a crusade against the Albigensians of southern France. In Spain, the later stages of the Reconquista were seen as a vast crusade. And crusading principles were also employed in the conquest and colonization of the New World.

J.G.

CUIUS REGIO, EIUS RELIGIO. "Whose region, his religion," used during the REFORMATION to summarize the Peace of Augsburg, 1555. Lutherans and Roman Catholics agreed that the ruler's religion would be the territory's religion. Dissenters could emigrate, and free cities were to safeguard both faiths. It ended conflicts following Luther's death and lasted until 1648.

C.M.

CULLMANN, OSCAR (1902-). An active force to be reckoned with on the current theological scene. He has the distinction of being in the forefront, in his day, of an influential movement associated with the recovery of BIBLICAL THEOLOGY as a scholarly discipline. He was trained in liberal theology, which, in the 1920s, was in its heyday, and fell under its spell. He was appointed to Strassburg and later to Basel, while latterly combining with his Swiss professorship a post at the Sorbonne, Paris. His influence lives on in many British and American students who came to do research under him.

Cullman's name is linked with an interpretation of the Bible's chief theme called "salvation history." By this term he claims to be able to plot the course of divine revelation from creation to final redemption, with the cross and resurrection of Jesus holding the central place and forming the turning point. His most influential book is titled The Center of Time (Eng. trans. Christ and Time, 1950). He subsequently defended his notion of an ever-widening time line to allow for reversals and modulations in Salvation in History (1967). His interest in Christology and the sacraments has also been an enduring legacy. Many critics who find fault with salvation history as a key to the NT gladly pay tribute to his other works.

R.M.

CULTS. From the Latin word cultus, meaning "worship," cults may designate either forms of worship, such as the cult of Mary or one of the saints in the Roman Catholic and Eastern Orthodox churches, or a small, deviant religious group centered around a charismatic leader. A cult denotes an intensity of devotion and unusual life-style in its members. Such groups have arisen throughout history and have occasionally matured into SECTS with an ongoing historical existence, although the prominence of the dynamic personal leader often causes the cult to disappear after his or her death. This generally means the cult will not become a church or denomination.

While cults have always been part of the religious scene, they have come to public attention—or notoriety—since the mid-1960s in North America and western Europe. At first ignored, groups like the UNIFICATION CHURCH (originally the Unified Family, popularly called "the Moonies"); the INTERNATIONAL SOCIETY FOR KRISHNA CONSCIOUSNESS (ISKON, called the Hare Krishnas); the CHILDREN OF GOD (COG, now renamed the Family of Love); the Way International; and the Church of SCIENTOLOGY came to be feared by many Christian clergy, parents, and conservative Christians, as well as by rabbis and Jewish organizations. Beginning in the early 1970s parents, led by a Californian, Ted Patrick, author of the book Let Our Children Go! became upset over the estrangement of their children from them after their young people joined the Unification Church and the Children of God. Patrick, and other anti-cult leaders, declared that these young people were brainwashed, that is, mind-controlled by heavy psychological conditioning. Now organized as the Citizens' Freedom Foundation, these opponents of cults pointed to the isolation, continuous lecturing, lack of sleep, and poor diet of young people in cultic camps and communes, as well as the centrality of the religious leader, as evidences of brainwashing. Patrick and others therefore advocate forced extraction of their children from such cults and involuntary subjection to DEPROGRAMMING, a form of psycho-social confrontation designed to break the purported mind-control exercised by cult leaders.

Various marks of cults have been advanced by different students of this modern phenomenon. These marks or characteristics are of two types: one, theological; the other, phenomenological or behavioral. Theologically, conservative opponents point out that modern cults usually are heretical in their teachings on Jesus Christ, the Holy Trinity, salvation (most are works-righteous), and in their interpretation of Scripture. Behaviorally, cults (1) preach a literal apocalypticism—announcing the end of the age and great tribulations; (2) attack the churches and synagogues for false teachings or for not practicing what they preach; (3) are relentless in their proselytizing of new members, usually by the positive strokes of compliments rather than by fear of the apocalypse; (4) make a demand for a full and absolute commitment, including full-time service and donation of all personal possessions to the group; (5) an absolute leader whose word is law and gospel and who often claims to be a prophet and sometimes the Messiah or even God; (6) a continuous system of "mind-bending" or mind-control through lectures, prayers, chants, speaking in tongues, and meditation; (7) exploitation of the member's labor and—in truly destructive cults—even of prostituting young women; and (8) by a system of esotericism or secrecy, whereby the member does not know the real aims of the group, and in some groups members are led to deceive outsiders about the group in order to solicit funds.

Of course, any group that meets all these behavioral characteristics is a destructive cult. Certain groups, such as the Children of God (Family of Love), the Reverend Jim Jones' Peoples Temple, and the Manson family are obviously destructive cults. Many charges have been lodged against the Unification church, the Way International, and the Church of Scientology, and many of its leaders have been imprisoned for federal crimes.

Sociologists have estimated the number of modern cults in America from the hundreds to the thousands. There are undoubtedly many hundreds of these deviant religious groups, most of which have arisen since the 1960s, which come into and pass out of existence continuously. While the public is fascinated or frightened by the more exotic groups, like the Krishnas, the fact is that most contemporary cult groups are Western or Bible cults. These are splinters of the fundamentalist movement, which has expanded in the past two decades. Such cults include the Way International, the Church of Bible Understanding (COBU), the Walk, COG (Family of Love), Love Israel, the Glory Barn, and many other, purely local groups. Since the strong shepherd or dominant pastor is a key element in FUNDAMENTALISM, the ultra-conservative, independent congregation is subject to deformation if the strong leader becomes renegade.

The experience of Peoples Temple under the Reverend Jim Jones was precisely one of the subjections of a congregation to the ego-inflation of a dictatorial, messianic leader.

The Eastern-oriented cults, while quite visible, are not numerous nor are their memberships large. These groups range from the orthodox Hinduism of the Krishnas to the hippie-style celebration of sensuality and self-discovery of the Bhagwan Shree Rajneesh and his commune, until recently located in Antelope, Oregon. Some groups with Eastern elements in their makeup are actually eclectic, as is the Unification church, founded on Confucian and Christian teachings, or metaphysical ("mind-science") cults, such as Eckankar and Scientology. These mind-science groups mix positive thinking, the gnosticism of classical "religious science" (as in Mary Baker Eddy's Christian Science), and the Hindu doctrine of karma and reincarnation. A key feature of such groups is the graded nature of their teachings. Members are continually urged to pay fees to study for higher and higher rank, that is, for more and more illumination to escape the bonds of bad karma, to learn to astrally project or have out-of-the-body experiences and escape the limitations of finite existence. Techniques of meditation, autosuggestion, a form of counseling called "auditing" (in Scientology), and study of esoteric Eastern writings are used in this process.

Outside the ISKON group, where regular, elaborate temple services are held, group worship does not play a great part in the life of the modern cults. While the Unificationists hold worship services in their church in Washington, D.C., and at their headquarters in New York City, these are mainly for non-members. Beyond the huge public weddings that symbolize their theology, "Moonies" have only one regular service, the pledge (to the Reverend Moon) service held at 5:00 on Sunday mornings. Private study, small Bible study groups, and individual vows, prayers, and meditation are the norm in all cult groups, Eastern, Bible (or Western), and metaphysical (mind-science). Even the fundamentalistic groups, such as The Way International, hold yearly "Rock of Ages" (gospel singing concerts) and depend upon "twig" meetings (Bible study circles) rather than public worship services familiar to Christians and Jews.

While some cults have come to terrible ends, most groups have continued despite adverse publicity, court cases, civil suits, and the imprisonment of some leaders. Some high-ranking Krishnas have been arrested for drug smuggling, and charges have been made that Krishnas have stockpiled arms. However, the number of people involved in these groups has remained fairly constant over the past decade. There seems to be some thirty thousand core members of the Unification Church and about ten thousand Krishnas. One of the larger groups is Scientology. The Way International, despite defections, appears to be growing. Indeed, students of the new religious groups point out that it is precisely the Bible cults that will grow, and from whom continuing dangers (like the Peoples Temple tragedy) are likely to come.

Efforts have been made to identify the type of personality likely to be attracted to cults. Most of these studies, when scientifically done, tend to show little if any difference between those who join cults and those who do not. In general, young people, eighteen to twenty-five years old, who have not yet solidified a sense of personal identity, who are in transition from home to college, and who have recently lost a loved one by death, or the breakup of a romantic relationship or a divorce, seem most susceptible to cult recruitment. Cult recruiters frequent places where youth gather and look for the backpack that identifies the person "in transition." Yet not everyone who fits this category is recruited. Despite the stories of brainwashing and the counter-claims of the new religionists that they seek "conversions," the facts point to the exercise of free will by people who are highly idealistic, searching for meaning and purpose in their lives, and are alienated from home and cultural values, as reasons for cult membership. It is the adventurous who wish to throw off the usual and try something new, who not only join cults, but remain in them.

J.C.

CUMBERLAND PRESBYTERIAN CHURCH.

See PRESBYTERIAN CHURCHES.

CUNEIFORM. From the Latin word cuneus, meaning "wedge." A writing system invented by the Sumerians employing wedgelike signs indented into clay. In about 3500 B.C., the Sumerians started drawing conventionalized pictograms (akin to Egyptian hieroglyphics) to denote specific physical objects (sun, donkey, orchard). Within three centuries, professional Sumerian scribes invented ideograms capable of expressing concepts (day, holy, kingship) and phonograms to represent syllabic phonetic values. Later the scribes eased their writing task by rotating the signs ninety degrees. Simplification and stylization greatly obscured the relation of the signs to their original pictographic values.

As Sumerian civilization spread, so did its writing system. Between 3000 and 2500 B.C. the Semitic Akkadians and their eastern Elamite neighbors adopted it. During the second millennium, the Hurrians of northern Mesopotamia and the Hittites of Anatolia appropriated cuneiform from the Akkadians. Alphabetic Ugaritic, reflecting fourteenth-century B.C. Syrian culture, and Old Persian (sixth-fourth centuries B.C.) are independent regional efforts whose only resemblance to Mesopotamian cuneiform consists in their wedgelike signs. Since Akkadian employed more than 450 signs and Ugaritic merely thirty, the latter was decidedly the easier writing system to master. (See also WRITING AND WRITING MATERIALS.)

J.K.K.

Courtesy of The University Museum, University of Pennsylvania

A Sumerian "medical" tablet from Nippur (late third millennium B.C.)

CUR DEUS HOMO. See ANSELM.

CURE OF SOULS. The church's ministry whereby it seeks to heal, comfort, and direct the wounded souls of its members. It is also called the "care" of souls. In early times, this was done mostly through the LITURGY, in which there was opportunity for a public confession of sin and an announcement of forgiveness. This gave the entire community of faith a therapeutic function. In the early Middle Ages, probably at first in Ireland, the custom of private confession appeared, and this soon placed the main responsibility for the cure of souls on those who heard confession. To help priests perform this function, many PENITENTIAL BOOKS were written, analyzing the human soul and the motives for its actions.

The Reformation, while no longer counting PENANCE as a sacrament, encouraged pastors to continue hearing the confessions of their parishioners. Calvin, for instance, felt that the words of absolution were the private preaching of the gospel, and that for this reason it was those entrusted with preaching who should also hear the confessions of the faithful. The erosion of ministerial authority in much of later Protestantism also eroded the pastor's authority and responsibility for the cure of souls. In more recent times, the development of psychology as a science has given rise to the discipline of pastoral counseling, which performs some of the functions of the care of souls. In the late twentieth century, the therapeutic character of the church as a community, and particularly of its liturgy, is being rediscovered.

J.G.

CURIA. The Curia Romana or Court of Rome; the bureaus and agencies by which the pope administers the Roman Catholic church. The pope has several offices, each of which must be carried out through assistants. He is the bishop of Rome, the metropolitan of a province, and the primate of Western Catholic Christendom. The pope is also, in Catholic doctrine, the VICAR OF CHRIST, the successor to St. Peter, and thus exercises governing power over the universal Christian Church. The Curia's offices are in the VATICAN and in other church-owned properties scattered throughout Rome. These buildings enjoy extraterritorial status.

J.C.

CUSH. A Benjaminitic personal name in the superscription to Psalm 7; otherwise a geographical reference to Nubian, Kassite, and Midianite territories. Ordinarily denoting the southern Nile valley, Hebrew kûsh is translated "Ethiopia" (Isa. 18:1; Ezek. 29:10; Esth. 1:1). The land and eponymous ancestor of the Kassites, who overran sixteenth-century B.C. Babylon, are also labeled "Cush" (Gen. 2:13; 10:8). Since Cushan's "tents" and Midian's "curtains" form a parallelism in Habakkuk 3:7, and Moses' wife, Zipporah, is called a "Cushite" woman in Numbers 12:1, a Midianite district south of Edom may also have been so named.

J.K.K.

CYNICS. A minor school of Greek ethics founded by Antisthenes (about 444 B.C.—after 371 B.C.), a pupil of Socrates and teacher of Diogenes of Sinope (400–325 B.C.). The good man, Cynics said, brings desires under control by strict rule of reason, and thus achieves independence from externals, such as family and wealth. The movement was known for efforts to provide schooling for children of mixed blood and for advocating universal abolition of slavery.

Later Cynics (after about 250 B.C.) were characterized by coarse protests against social customs, conventions, and laws. They earned a bad reputation by seeking to reduce possessions to bare necessities and avoid all social entanglements (family and wealth), so as to gain personal independence and serenity. Some thought extreme Cynics lived no better than dogs, hence the name Cynics—derived from the Greek word for dog or unclean scavenger. Others, especially the educated, appreciated the Cynics' ideals of freedom and humanitarianism. STOICISM, as taught by Epictetus (about A.D. 50–120), has been considered a less severe and more social outgrowth of Cynicism.

P.L.G.

CYPRIAN OF CARTHAGE. Bishop of Carthage from 248 to 258, and one of the most influential Christian writers of the third century. He had been converted to Christianity shortly before his election as a bishop, and until that point had followed a career in rhetoric. He then devoted himself to the study of Scripture and theology, particularly the writings of TERTULLIAN, whom he called the Master.

The persecution of Decius broke out before Cyprian had completed his first year as a bishop. He decided that his duty was to flee and hide and to continue shepherding his flock from exile through correspondence. Since many remained and suffered for their faith, he was accused of cowardice, and at the end of persecution his authority was challenged, particularly on the question of the restoration of the lapsed (see LAPSI). Some confessors, that is, people who had suffered for their faith but had survived until the end of persecution, took upon themselves the authority to restore the lapsed to the communion of the church. Cyprian insisted that this could only be done by the proper authorities, the bishops.

Two synods upheld his view, and established the need for a period of penance before restoration could take place. The schism of the Novatians (see NOVATIANISM) then caused him to clash with Bishop Stephen of Rome, who held that the baptism of schismatics and heretics was valid. Cyprian's view, that baptism could only be administered by those in communion with the church, was eventually rejected. When plague broke out in North Africa, and some pagans declared that this was a punishment of the gods for the unpiety of Christians, Cyprian wrote a refutation, which later influenced AUGUSTINE's City of God. Finally, when persecution broke out again, he proved his detractors wrong by offering up his life as a martyr.

J.G.

CYPRUS. The third largest Mediterranean island. It is located forty miles south of Asia Minor, sixty-five miles west of Syria, and is 140 miles long and sixty miles at its greatest width.

From about 1800 B.C. onward, Cyprus has been closely related by trade with Syria and Palestine, as well as to Mycenae and Ugarit. Its earliest name was Alashia, used as Elishah (Gen. 10:4; I Chr. 1:7; Ezek. 27:7). Later Kittim is used (Gen. 10:4; Num. 24:24; I Chr. 1:7; Dan. 11:30) for the whole island. This was when Kition (Larnaca) was the major city. Cyprus was famous throughout the ancient world for copper, which some thought originated in Cyprus. Copper and timber were exported from Cyprus and cumin, wine, and dried figs were imported.

Cyprus was Greek first in the fifth century B.C. After a period of Phoenician colonization, it again became Greek under Alexander and his successors. There were Jews on Cyprus from the second century B.C. Herod the Great managed and profited from some of the copper mines. By the first century A.D., Cyprus had a large Jewish community. From it, Barnabas came as a student to Jerusalem, where he may have met Saul of Tarsus.

About A.D. 44, Barnabas and Saul, accompanied by John Mark, were sent by the Antioch church as Christian missionaries to Cyprus on what became the first Christian missionary journey outside Syria-Palestine. The routing followed the length of the island from Salamis to Paphos. During the preaching mission, the group encountered the magician Bar-Jesus and the proconsul Sergius Paulus. The proconsul's conversion (Acts 13:6-12) seems to have caused Saul to stop using his Jewish name in favor of his Roman name Paul (Acts 13:9). Barnabas later returned to Cyprus with Mark (Acts 15:39).

The Cyprus church had difficulties, but it flourished. At the Council of Nicea, A.D. 325, there were three bishops from Cyprus.

P.L.G.

CYRENE. A coastal city in North Africa, south of Crete, and the capital (ancient and modern) of Cyrenaica (Libya). A Greek colony from about 630 B.C., it became a Roman province in 74 B.C. The area was fertile and well watered. Silphium (resembling prickly lettuce), the major crop, was in great demand for medicine and for use in Greek cooking. When Cyrene's production failed, the city declined.

Jews lived in Cyrene from the fourth century B.C. Cyrenians are mentioned several times in the NT. Pilgrims to Jerusalem from Cyrene shared in the synagogue of the Freedmen (Acts 6:9). Soldiers compelled Simon of Cyrene to carry Jesus' cross (Matt. 27:32; Mark 15:21; Luke 23:26). Cyrenians were also at Pentecost (Acts 2:10), disputed with Stephen (Acts 6:9), and evangelized Antioch (Acts 11:20).

P.L.G.

CYRENIUS. See QUIRINIUS.

CYRIL OF ALEXANDRIA. Patriarch of Alexandria, 414-444, and the champion of ALEXANDRIAN THEOLOGY, which was against the NESTORIANS. He combined theological ability with a pugnacious temperament, which soon manifested itself against pagans, Jews, and heretics. His zeal, if not his intention, was responsible for the lynching of the pagan philosopher Hypatia, as well as for several mob actions against Jews. It was in the Nestorian controversy, however, that he shone as a brilliant polemicist and an able politician. Cyril secured the condemnation of Nestorius by synods in Rome and Alexandria and wrote a dogmatic letter and twelve anathemas against Nestorius. He also presided at the COUNCIL OF EPHESUS, which condemned Nestorius.

At first he sought the outright condemnation of the Christology characteristic of ANTIOCHENE THEOLOGY; but in 433 he was forced to sign with John of Antioch a "Formula of Reunion," which condemned Nestorius but left room for more moderate forms of Antiochene CHRISTOLOGY. His own Christology was typically Alexandrine, and he may well have been the first to use the phrase HYPOSTATIC UNION, which became the hallmark of orthodoxy. What he held was that the humanity of Christ had no hypostasis, no subsistence of its own, but rather subsisted in his divinity. Since sometimes he used the term "nature"—physis—as equivalent to "hypostasis," later Monophysites claimed his authority in support of their views (see MONOPHYSITISM). Therefore, although variously interpreted, his writings still hold great authority both in Orthodox and in Monophysite churches.

J.G.

CYRIL OF JERUSALEM. Bishop of Jerusalem from A.D. 350 to 386, and a leader in the opposition to ARIANISM. Like many other opponents of Arianism, he was banished from his see for some time, but was eventually restored to it. On the other hand, he was not satisfied with the decisions of Nicea, for he objected to the HOMOIOUSION clause as unbiblical and capable of erroneous interpretation. A discussion with GREGORY OF NYSSA in 379 may have helped to allay his fears, for when the Council of CONSTANTINOPLE met two years later, he was ready to affirm the faith of Nicea. His main surviving work is a series of twenty-four lectures for the instruction of CATECHUMENS before their baptism on Easter Eve. These are valuable for their information on the liturgy of the time and on the process through which catechumens went before receiving baptism.

J.G.

CYRUS. Persian king (550–530 B.C.) who established the Achaemenian dynasty and the Persian Empire.

Cyrus' Ascendancy. As the vassal monarch of Anshan, a region northeast of Elam, Cyrus headed a successful revolt against his overlord, Astyages, king of Media (585–550 B.C.). Cyrus forthrightly stormed Media's capital, Ecbatana, ousted Astyages, and appropriated the far-ranging Median Empire. Thereupon he overtook Sardis, the capital of Lydia, and most of Asia Minor. Though his eastern territorial conquests are not precisely known, presumably by 539 Cyrus' huge empire spanned the Oxus River in the east and the Aegean Sea in the west.

Among those Jewish exiles in Babylon whose hopes were stirred by history's rapid change was the prophet-poet Second Isaiah (author of Isa. 40–55). While he does not mention the Persian takeover of Babylon as accomplished fact, he observes Cyrus' rapid ascent and anticipates Babylon's defeat. Indeed, he presents Cyrus as Yahweh's unknowing political instrument who would facilitate the Jewish return to Zion (Isa. 44:24–45:7). Cyrus is even referred to as Yahweh's "anointed" (45:1).

Cyrus' Babylonian Takeover. By summer 539 B.C., PERSIA's army reached the Babylonian frontier. Its king, Nabonidus (556–539), with whom much of the Babylonian citizenry had become dissatisfied, faced imminent defeat. It mattered little that he extended last-minute peacemaking overtures toward the worshipers of MARDUK, Babylon's patron god, whom he had offended, and mustered divine images from outlying sanctuaries into the capital to bolster Babylon's spiritual defense. At Opis on the Tigris River, Persian forces severely defeated the Babylonian army. Led by Gobryas, a Babylonian general who had deserted Nabonidus, the Persians infiltrated Babylon in October 539. Nabonidus fled but was promptly captured.

The Cyrus Cylinder, a clay barrel cuneiform inscription undoubtedly authored by Babylon's priestly establishment, reveals that as Marduk's chosen agent, Cyrus soon made his own peaceful, triumphant entry into Babylon. Many citizens, discontent with Nabonidus' government, greeted the Persian king as their liberator. Babylon and outlying cities were left intact. The divine images were returned to their sanctuaries. The public worship of Marduk resumed and evoked the participation of Cyrus, whose sensitivity for the religious preferences of his subjects was habit. The entire Babylonian Empire belonged to Cyrus.

Cyrus' Decree of Restoration. In 538 B.C. Cyrus issued an edict permitting the Jewish return to Palestine and rebuilding of the Jerusalem Temple. Lacking an extrabiblical counterpart, the decree appears twice in the Bible—in Hebrew (Ezra 1:2–4) and Aramaic (6:3–5). At base, both versions are historically accurate, though the Hebrew claim that Cyrus was Yahweh's devotee is dubious. The Aramaic version provides for temple construction at Persia's expense and the return of temple vessels formerly plundered by Nebuchadnezzar. The Hebrew version emphasizes that venturesome Jews may move homeward with the financial backing of comrades who prefer to maintain Babylonian residence. Cyrus' decree reflects an enlightened Persian rule unthreatened by religious pluralism. And since the empire did not incorporate Egypt, Cyrus would benefit from having loyal subjects along his southwestern frontier. When Cyrus was killed in a distant eastern campaign in 530, his son Cambyses (530–522) succeeded him.

J.K.K.

Courtesy of the Oriental Institute, University of Chicago

Tomb of Cyrus the Great

Dd

D DOCUMENT. The name given to the OT book of DEUTERONOMY and to certain other passages in the PENTATEUCH that share the language and outlook of Deuteronomy. D seems to have been composed in something approaching its canonical form about the time of the fall of Samaria (722 B.C.) in circles native to the northern kingdom. (Compare also DOCUMENTARY HYPOTHESIS.)

J.N.

DAGON. The god of the Philistines (Judg. 16:23; I Sam. 5:1-5), adopted by them after their invasion of the coastland of Canaan. He was originally a Mesopotamian weather god, appearing in the cuneiform literature with the spelling Dagan, who was introduced into Canaan as a vegetation deity (Hebrew dagan means "grain"). Several Canaanite sites have names that proclaim them to have been sanctuaries of Dagon (Josh. 15:41; 19:27). There was a sanctuary of Dagon at Ugarit, and in the Ugaritic myths Baal is called the son of Dagon. This originally minor Semitic deity apparently became the chief god of the PHILISTINES, who built for him a temple in their city of ASHDOD. This temple was destroyed by the Jews during the Maccabean wars (see I Macc. 10:84, where "Azotus" is the Hellenized form of "Ashdod").

B.V.

DAILY OFFICE. The daily worship service in liturgical churches that publicly praises God, prays for God's blessing, and hallows the day. The daily office includes prayers and liturgies and meditation. All religious, monks and nuns, and priests in Roman Catholicism are required to celebrate the daily office. The laity are encouraged to observe the daily office, also.

The daily office consists of CANONICAL HOURS: matins, lauds, vespers, prayers for the day, and compline, or prayers for the night. These services are held regularly in monasteries and convents. The secular or parish clergy read the daily office silently during free time during the day and evening.

J.C.

DALAI LAMA. From the Mongolian and Tibetan words meaning in effect "Monk (or incarnate BODHISATVA) of Oceanic Wisdom." It is the title of the head of the Gelugpa order of Tibetan monks who, until the occupation of Tibet by the Chinese in 1959, was both the spiritual and political ruler of the nation.

The Gelugpa order, socially and intellectually the most prestigious of Tibet's four main orders of monks, was established as a reform movement by Tsong-kha-pa (1357-1419). A successor of his, dGe-Dun-Grub-Pa, founded a major monastery in 1438 and is considered the first Dalai Lama. But the term was not used until the time of the third Dalai

Lama, who received it in the sixteenth century from the Mongol Altan Khan when he and his people were converted to the Tibetan (VAJRAYANA) form of BUDDHISM. It was the great fifth Dalai Lama, Ngag-dBang bLo-bZang rGya-mTsho (1617-82), who extended the sovereignty of his office over all Tibet and established the imposing Potala palace in Lhasa as his seat. It was also from the time of this reign that the Dalai Lama was considered to be an earthly incarnation of the great bodhisattva of active compassion AVALOKITESVARA.

After the death of a Dalai Lama, his successor—the next incarnation—is selected by elaborate oracular means. The present Dalai Lama (b. 1935, consecrated 1940) has resided in Dharmasala, India, in exile since 1959. He is widely regarded as an effective leader of his people, especially in the Tibetan Diaspora. A living symbol of his nation and its unique spiritual and cultural heritage, he is an eloquent spokesman for Buddhism.

R. E.

DAMASCUS, Capital of the modern Republic of SYRIA; one of those cities that can lay claim to being the oldest continuously inhabited site in the world. The fact of its continuous habitation, in fact, has made it impossible to determine just how ancient Damascus is, since it has obliterated or rendered inaccessible the evidence obtainable through archaeological exploration.

Damascus is mentioned in Egyptian documents as early as the nineteenth century B.C., as a subject city of the Egyptian Empire. It enters into known historiography, however, only in the tenth century, in both Assyrian and biblical annals, which partly coincide and are partly complementary. Valued for its strategic location at the intersection of important trade routes, Damascus was conquered by David and incorporated into his little empire (II Sam. 8:3-8). In Solomon's time, however, it regained its independence (I Kings 11:23-25). Thereafter there was continual strife between the Aramean state headed by Damascus and Israel, with countless border wars and shifting boundaries, though at times they could be allies against the common threat of Assyrian expansionism. In the annals of Shalmaneser III, for example, a devastating victory is claimed to have taken place over Ben-hadad of Damascus and Aram and Ahab of Israel at the battle of Karkar (853 B.C., not mentioned in the Bible).

Damascus eventually fell prey to the Assyrians, even as the northern kingdom of Israel and the southern kingdom of Judah did in their separate ways. With the passing of the Assyrians in 612 B.C., it became subject to the Assyrians' successors: first to the short-lived new Babylonian Empire, shortly after to the Persians, and finally, after the victory of Alexander the Great in 333 B.C., to the Hellenistic and Seleucid empires.

In NT times Damascus was subject to the Nabatean kingdom: the Nabateans were a formerly nomadic Arabic people who had inherited this portion of the disintegrated Seleucid Empire. Rome had also entered to claim Syria as within its sphere of influence, but it had not yet taken Damascus under its direct rule. The city was prosperous and a center of international exchange and commerce. Though part of the nominally pagan Decapolis, it possessed a large Jewish colony with several synagogues, into which Jewish Christianity had already penetrated. Thus we understand the background to Paul's journey to Damascus and his sojourn there as described in Acts 9:1-25; 22:5-16; 26:12-20; Galatians 1:17; and II Corinthians 11:32. Damascus and Syria were early cradles of Christianity until the Muslim conquests began in the sixth century A.D. B. V.

DAMNATION. The traditional Christian doctrine generally, although not universally, accepted by Christians from the first to the nineteenth centuries, which holds that SATAN, his fellow fallen angels, and those who persist in sin and refuse to repent will be eternally punished by God. HELL is the locus of this eternal punishment, although the literalistic language of the NT about a hell of fire has generally been understood as the pangs of guilt and a bad conscience compounded by the overwhelming sense of loss in being cut off from the divine fellowship. Damnation is, then, separation from the presence of God.

The King James Version uses the term "damnation" for three different Koine Greek words—krisis, krima, and apoleia. These words are more accurately rendered as (negative) "judgment," "condemnation," or even "destruction."

In the nineteenth century, theological liberals opposed the doctrine of damnation eternally as unfit for the character of a loving God. John F. D. Maurice lost his chair of theology at King's College, London, because of such a rejection (1853). Various cultic groups today such as the Jehovah's Witnesses reject the idea of hell and damnation as do liberal groups, such as the Unitarian-Universalists. J. C.

DAN (city). Proverbially the northernmost reach of the land of ISRAEL ("from Dan to Beer-sheba"). Dan was, at the beginning of Israelite history, a satellite city of Sidon called Laish, which was conquered and resettled by Danite tribesmen (Judg. 18). Recent archaeology suggests that already in the time of David (tenth century B.C.) this frontier city had been strongly fortified as a bastion of the empire. That, together with other Israelite associations, which can only be surmised, doubtless accounts for the fact that after the separation of the two kingdoms of Israel and Judah on the death of Solomon, Dan and its sanctuary were declared a privileged royal shrine by Jeroboam I (I Kings 13:28-30), along with Bethel, probably the most venerated of all the holy places of early Israel. B. V.

DAN (man). According to Genesis 30:4-6; 35:25; Exodus 1:4; and I Chronicles 2:2, Dan was the son of the patriarch JACOB (Israel) by Bilhah, the maid of his wife Rachel. No personality is assigned to Dan in the biblical narrative; he is simply a genealogical statistic.

Dan is the putative ancestor of the Israelite tribe of Dan, which is variously represented as very warlike (Gen. 49:16-17; Deut. 33:22) and as being slack in their enthusiasm for combat in favor of the Israelite federation (Judg. 5:17)—if we are to credit these poetic passages as evocative of the authentic Israelite past. Dan was, in any case, probably a minor component of what went to make up the eventual Israelite nation.

The Danites seem to have been originally a southern tribe like the Benjaminites and Judahites, with whom they were neighbors. In Judges 13-16 their folk hero Samson, a valiant champion against the Philistines, is pictured as active in this region. Hemmed in by hostile Amorites (Judg. 1:34) and the newly invading Philistines (the Samson stories), they were eventually forced to migrate northward. Judges 18 tells a story of this migration, first as an exploratory operation, then as a movement of the tribe in force, which ended in the conquest of the Sidonian city of Laish, which was renamed Dan, at the extreme north of Palestine. The story, despite its editing in favor of later interests, also appears to be the cult legend of the founding of the sanctuary of the city of Dan. Aside from geographical references, Dan has made no further or lasting imprint on Israelite history.

B.V.

DANCING. As in most societies ancient and modern, except where it has been artificially repressed, the dance was accepted and welcomed in biblical times as a natural and instinctive expression of feeling and enthusiasm, whether secular or religious. In those times, of course, the distinction between the secular and the religious was by no means as definable as it is today. The absence of dancing was equated with mourning and desolation in life (Lam. 5:15).

The earliest reference to dancing occurs in Exodus 15:20-21, when after the Israelites' successful passage through the Red Sea and the subsequent destruction of their Egyptian pursuers, Miriam and the other women of Israel danced to the sound of timbrels and sang "the song of the sea." A similar dance celebrating victory is recorded in Judges 11:34 (Jephthah's daughter) and in I Samuel 18:6-7 (the women of Israel greeting Saul and David). It is not clear what was the occasion of the dancing of the women of Shiloh mentioned in Judges 21:21; probably it was a festival celebrating and in thanksgiving for the grape harvest.

Dancing was far from being the prerogative of women. David, along with "all the house of Israel," danced, sang, and made merry before the Ark of the Covenant as it was brought by stages into Jerusalem (II Sam. 6:5, 14-16; this dance seems to have been conducted with some abandon). Dancing, probably more male than female, given the customs of the time, was the regular accompaniment of pilgrimages and liturgy (Pss. 87:7; 149:3; 150:4). It was also taken for granted as characteristic of Israel's restoration after exile (Jer. 31:13).

In the NT there are few references to dancing. Both in reaction to the often sybaritic dancing associated with some of the Gentile religions and cults, and because of the formalism that increasingly characterized Jewish Temple liturgy and synagogue instruction subsequent to the Exile, there was little scope for the spontaneity that had made the dance a natural religious expression. The little we know of the early Christian liturgy is that it emphasized credal hymns, baptismal and Eucharistic rites eschatologically oriented, and proclamation. There is no mention of dance, even though there could be ample room for spontaneity (compare I Cor. 14:26-36). Jesus is quoted once as citing a proverb about the piping and dancing of children (Matt. 11:17; Luke 7:32). The other reference to dancing is that of Salome, the daughter of Herodias, who so pleased Herod Antipas that the head of John the Baptist became forfeit (Matt. 14:6; Mark 6:22). This kind of sensual dance would have been highly repugnant to both Jews and Christians.

B.V.

DANIEL (book). A book that appears in Christian Bibles as the fourth book of the Prophets following Ezekiel but in Hebrew Bibles as the ninth book of the third division, the Writings, following Esther and preceding Ezra.

Contents. The book of Daniel falls rather naturally into two divisions of roughly equal length. The first part, Daniel 1-6, contains six stories about Daniel and his three companions at the royal court in Babylonia. These narratives, which speak of Daniel in the third person, depict him as a pious and loyal believer who possesses the power to interpret dreams. In the second part, chapters 7-12, Daniel has dreams, visions, and revelations, which are interpreted to him by angelic figures.

Part one contains the following six stories: (a) Daniel and his companions successfully avoid breaking their food restrictions and prove to be healthier and wiser than the other youths in training and also wiser than all the magicians and enchanters in the realm (1:1-21); (b) after all others fail, Daniel interprets King NEBUCHADNEZZAR's dream of a composite statue as foretelling a series of monarchical empires (2:1-49); (c) Daniel's companions remain faithful to the worship of their God and are rescued from the ordeal of the fiery furnace (3:1-4:3); (d) Nebuchadnezzar dreams of a great tree that is cut down, which Daniel interprets as foretelling the temporary madness of the monarch (4:4-37); (e) Daniel interprets the writing on the wall of Balshazzar's palace as a prediction of the fall of the CHALDEAN (Babylonian) empire to the Medes and Persians (5:1-31); and (f) Daniel is saved from the lion's den (6:1-28).

Part two contains four accounts of Daniel's dreams, visions, and revelations interpreted to him by angelic figures: (a) the dream of four great beasts is interpreted as about four kings who will arise with a horn of the fourth beast warring against "the saints of the Most High" until a final kingdom is established to be ruled over by "the people of the saints of the Most High" (7:1-28); (b) Daniel's vision of the ram and he-goat is interpreted by the angel GABRIEL as foretelling the struggle between Media-Persia and Greece, to be followed by the rule of a horn of the he-goat (8:1-27); (c) the angel Gabriel interprets the seventy years mentioned by the prophet Jeremiah (Jer. 25:11-12; 29:10) as the final seventy weeks of years (490 years), which will end with the destruction of Jerusalem's "desolator" (9:1-27); and (d) Daniel receives a "word," interpreted by an angel, concerning the future course of world history from the Persian period until the time when the "contemptible person," who will desecrate Jerusalem and the Temple, shall be destroyed and the resurrection will occur (10:1-12:13).

History of Interpretation. Throughout much of Jewish and Christian history, the book of Daniel has been understood as a work written by a historical person, Daniel, during the final years of Babylonian and the early years of Persian rule in the sixth century B.C. In this book, the future course of events before the end of time was believed to be predicted. In the ancient world, this view was challenged by some pagans such as the neoplatonist philosopher Porphyry (third century A.D.), who wrote: "[The book] was composed by someone who lived in Judea in the reign of ANTIOCHUS who was surnamed Epiphanes [175-164 B.C.], and he did not predict coming events but narrated past ones. Consequently, what he relates down to Antiochus embodies true history; but if he added any surmises about the future, he just invented them, for he did not know the future."

After many controversies and disputes, most scholars have adopted a view of the book similar to that of Porphyry. The book is now generally assumed to have been written during the MACCABEAN struggles with Antiochus Epiphanes after the king suppressed the practice of Jewish religion and halted Jewish sacrifices in the Temple. Some of the stories in Daniel 1-6 and even parts of Daniel 7-12 are sometimes thought to be older than this struggle since they depict the rulers in a reasonably favorable light or do not presuppose overt persecution of the Jews or the desecration of the Temple. The final form of the book is related to the Maccabean struggles before the death, in 164 B.C., of Antiochus Epiphanes, who did not die as predicted in Daniel 11:40-45, the point at which true predictions begin in the book.

Daniel and Apocalyptic. Daniel is the only book of apocalyptic literature in the OT (see APOCALYPTICISM). It has many of the characteristics of apocalypticism: written in narrative form, containing revelations of the future mediated by otherworldly beings and through symbolic representations, exhorting and consoling a community in crisis and claiming divine authority.

The Languages of the Book. Daniel 1:1-2:4a and 8:1-12:13 are written in Hebrew. Daniel 2:4b-7:28 are written in Aramaic. In spite of various proposals, no satisfactory solution to the problem of this bilingual form is available.

The Greek Version. The Greek version of the book is much longer than the Hebrew-Aramaic text. This longer version, followed by the Vulgate and Catholic Bibles, contains the PRAYER OF AZARIAH and the SONG OF THE THREE YOUNG MEN (sixty-eight verses incorporated between 3:23 and 3:24) as well as the story of SUSANNA (sixty-four verses appearing as Dan. 13) and BEL AND THE DRAGON (forty-two verses appearing as Dan. 14).

The Message of the Book. Written to a community in crisis, the book of Daniel exhorted its readers to remain loyal to Jewish faith and practices in a time of trouble. While offering assurance of divine care and protection in a troubled present, it also encouraged its readers to understand the signs of the times and to look forward in hope to the soon-to-appear new age that would be ushered in by God's action, when they would see the establishment of God's final kingdom. For those who had died and to those who faced death and martyrdom, the author held out a hope of resurrection beyond death.

J.H.

DANIEL (man). The name Daniel, meaning "God (El) has judged" or perhaps "God (El) is my judge," appears in the Bible as the name of David's second son (1 Chr. 3:1), a priest of postexilic times (Ezra 8:2; Neh. 10:6), and the hero of the book of Daniel.

According to the book of DANIEL, he was taken as a young lad into the Babylonian EXILE in the third year of the reign of King Jehoiakim (about 606-605 B.C.; Dan. 1:1). He continued to be active until after the capture of BABYLON by the Persians in 539 B.C. (Dan. 6:28). In exile, Daniel and his friends remained loyal to Jewish faith and practices and were persecuted; but they were always redeemed and vindicated. Daniel was not only an interpreter of dreams (Dan. 1-6) but also a visionary whose dreams were interpreted for him (Dan. 7-12). He is presented as a suffering and loyal martyr and as a man of great wisdom with the power to understand dreams.

Questions have been raised about whether Daniel was a historical person. Arguments for understanding him as a nonhistorical or purely legendary figure are fourfold. (1) The OT, outside the book of Daniel, speaks of a legendary figure, Daniel or Danel (Ezek. 14:14, 20; 28:3). (2) Nonbiblical texts mention a legendary Daniel. The fourteenth-century B.C. Ugaritic texts (see UGARIT) speak of a Daniel noted for his wisdom and judgment. In the book of Jubilees (in the PSEUDEPIGRAPHA), a Daniel is the great-great-grandfather of Noah. In some of the Aramaic QUMRAN or DEAD SEA SCROLLS a Daniel appears who offers summaries of world history. (3) The Greek version of Daniel has preserved additional legends about the man not found in the Hebrew text. (4) The nature of the book of Daniel suggests that he was a legendary figure of wisdom and piety rather than an actual historical person.

J.H.

DANTE ALIGHIERI (1265–1321). Italian poet, philosopher, and statesman, acclaimed for his Divine Comedy and Concerning Monarchy. Born in Florence, he grew up in middle-class surroundings, losing his parents at an early age, but little is known of his boyhood. Philosopher Brunetto Latini directed Dante's education toward philosophy and languages. He first met Beatrice (probably Beatrice Portinari) about 1274, but she married someone else and died at the age of twenty-four in 1290. Dante expressed his affection and pathos in New Life. Idealized, Beatrice inspired numerous works, especially the Divine Comedy. Dante married Gemma Donati of prominent Guelph lineage and fathered two sons and one daughter. His early works included a series of allegorical odes on Lady Philosophy, Liberality, Nobility, etc. After 1289 he became active in politics. For opposing Pope Boniface VIII, Florence exiled him, confiscated his property, and sentenced him to death in absentia. He wandered from town to town, finally dying in Ravenna, where he was buried.

His two greatest works were written in exile. Impressed by Emperor Henry VII, Dante wrote Concerning Monarchy, probably between 1311 and 1318. He believed humanity's temporal happiness could best be promoted by a universal earthly ruler independent of the papacy and equally empowered by God. Dante, an orthodox Catholic, drew heavily on Aquinas, but he marshaled historical-biblical data against papal supremacy and demanded that the church relinquish all temporal possessions and concentrate on spiritual matters. His strong anti-clericalism points to the future, and yet his thoughts reflect medieval tradition. Concerning Monarchy was declared heretical in 1329.

His greatest work, Divine Comedy, completed during his last years, pictures an imaginary trip through hell, purgatory, and paradise. Virgil, symbolizing reason, guides him through hell; Beatrice and St. Bernard, symbolizing faith, guide him to heaven, where he finds only one pope. Dante vividly portrays many contemporaries. A recurring theme insists that good works without faith will not merit salvation. At the end, Dante stands before God in an ecstasy of mystic love. The Divine Comedy places him among the greatest poets of all time.

C.M.

DARBY, JOHN NELSON (1800–82). Founder of DISPENSATIONALISM and the PLYMOUTH BRETHREN, he was educated at Westminster and received a B.A. in law from Trinity College, Dublin, in 1819. Ordained in the Church of Ireland, he served a parish in County Wicklow before resigning in 1827.

Dispensationalism grew out of conferences hosted in the 1830s at the Wicklow estate of Theodosia Wingfield, Viscountess Powerscourt. In discussions of prophecy, Darby formulated a futurist interpretation of Revelation and invented the secret, any-moment RAPTURE. He saw the "church age" as a parenthesis between the sixty-ninth and seventieth weeks of Daniel. His Collected Works run thirty-four volumes.

He began to draw together small groups of dissatisfied believers, which eventually formed the Plymouth Brethren. After a schism at Plymouth (1845) and Bristol (1847), Darby led the stricter group known as Darbyites. He visited the United States and Canada seven times between 1862 and 1877. He also spent considerable time on the Continent and in Australia.

N.H.

DARIUS. The Greek (and Latin) spelling of the name under which three of the kings of ancient Persia (Iran) have entered into biblical and later Western literature.

Darius I Hystaspis (522–486 B.C.). Also called Darius the Great, he was the king of Persia who honored the decree of his predecessor CYRUS THE GREAT, to the extent that the liberated Jews of Babylon should not only be allowed to restore a homeland in Palestine but also be assisted in rebuilding there a temple to their God (Ezra 4:5; 5:3-17; 6:1-15). Darius was separated from the great Cyrus by Cyrus' son Cambyses, who had in 525 B.C. added Egypt to the Persian Empire. He was only distantly related to Cyrus, nevertheless he fulfilled perfectly the image of Achaemenid tolerance and ecumenicity that is drawn in the OT. The doctrinaire Zionists from Babylon, having repulsed offers of assistance from Yahwists indigenous to Judah and the surrounding areas whom they rejected as unfit to contribute to the new Israel, whose contours had been revealed in Babylon, were understandably opposed by their slighted suitors in their attempt to establish a new and exclusive Jewish polity in a land they called their own. Furthermore, these indigenous peoples were well established, part and parcel of the Persian bureaucracy Abar Nahara, "across the River (Euphrates)." It is significant, therefore, that Darius, having carefully ascertained the facts and searched out the relevant documents, found against the claims of his Palestinian agents and in favor of the privileges that Cyrus had decreed for the Babylonian exiles.

Courtesy of the Oriental Institute, University of Chicago

King Darius I seated on his throne with his son Xerxes standing behind him

Darius I seems to have been a capable administrator and something of an idealist as a ruler. Having successfully quashed a rebellion that had accompanied the last days of Cambyses and restored order, he sought to codify a common law of justice and equity throughout the empire, due consideration being given to local cultures and traditions. He completed the political organization of the empire begun by his predecessors. He also instituted a system of roads and communications which was the envy and admiration of the contemporary world. Unfortunately, his last years were accompanied by failures, with the defeat of his armies in Greece and insurrection in Egypt.

Darius II Nothus (423–405 B.C.). Darius I was succeeded by his son Xerxes I (the Ahasuerus of the book of Esther). After the decisive defeat of the Persians by the Greeks, Xerxes was assassinated and was eventually succeeded by his son Artaxerxes I. After Artaxerxes's death there was a struggle for the throne from which, after much bloodshed, Darius II eventually emerged the victor. He was one of Artaxerxes's sons, by a secondary wife, by no means the first in line of succession. His rocky road to kingship led to equally perilous paths at home and abroad which he was forced to negotiate in order to maintain control in the face of domestic intrigues and foreign rebellions. In a measure he succeeded, but partly only by buying time against disasters that would follow him.

Darius II is mentioned only once in the OT (Neh. 12:22), as a temporal designation in connection with a census list. However, even this reference may apply to Darius III since some sources state that Jaddua was high priest when Palestine was taken by Alexander the Great. Far more important is the role assigned to Darius II in the history and circumstances of the Jewish colonists at Elephantine in Egypt. From the Aramaic correspondence preserved from this period it is evident that not only did Darius II protect and vindicate the religious rights of the Jews against the fanaticism of the indigenous population (always disposed to resist the Persians and their protégés), but the authority of the king was also involved to legalize, with some specificity, the details of the ritual and liturgy to be observed. This last mentioned is in confirmation of the Achaemenid policy represented in Ezra 7.

Darius III Codomannus (336–330 B.C.). The successor of Artaxerxes III and the last King of Persia. He presided over the demise of the Persian Empire and its conquest by Alexander the Great, who was to build from it an even greater empire.

B. V.

DARIUS THE MEDE. According to biblical narrative, this Darius seems to be a composite created by the author of the book of Daniel. He is said to have "received" the kingdom of Babylon from the Chaldeans at the age of sixty-two and to have divided the kingdom into 120 satrapies (Dan. 5:31–6:1). In point of fact, CYRUS THE GREAT, the Persian king who actually wrested Babylon from the Chaldeans in a bloodless coup in 539 B.C., was about sixty-two years old at the time, and it was one of his later successors, DARIUS I of Persia, who perfected the satrap system throughout the empire. Darius the Mede is said to have been the son of Ahasuerus, that is, XERXES (Dan. 9:1). In point of fact, Xerxes was the son of Darius I, but Darius II was the grandson of Xerxes. Other recollections have doubtless entered into the composite. "Darius the Mede" can fairly be compared with "Nebuchadnezzar, who ruled over the Assyrians" who appears in the book of Judith.

Attempts to identify Darius the Mede as the disguise of a true historical character have failed to convince and are in all likelihood misguided. The book of Daniel deals not in history but in apocalyptic reinterpretation of prophecy. It was the Persian, not the Median, kingdom that succeeded the Chaldean: Cyrus had put an end to the Medes years before he turned his attention to Babylon. But texts like Isaiah 13:17; 21:2; and Jeremiah 51:11 had looked forward to a Median conquest of Babylon, and Daniel felt itself duty-bound to honor this prophecy as "fulfilled."

B. V.

DARK NIGHT OF THE SOUL. A phrase, made common in treatises on the CONTEMPLATIVE LIFE by St. JOHN OF THE CROSS. It refers to the common experience of mystics, that before attaining the blessings of a higher and more fulfilling form of prayer, they had to go through a long period of near despair, when they continued in their devotions without much reward. St. Teresa spoke of the same experience as the "drought" in the life of contemplation.

J. G.

DARSANA. From the Sanskrit word for "seeing." In HINDUISM, it refers to two concepts. One is the concept of seeing as a religious act. It is widely believed that simply to see a sacred object, such as the image of a deity in a temple or borne in procession, imparts a blessing in itself. Similarly, to see and thereby receive the grace of a holy or sublime person, a GURU or king, was and is a much-coveted privilege for which such persons would grant audience, quite apart from the exalted one's deeds or discourse.

The second concept is seeing as a "point of view," that is, a school, in Hindu philosophy. Traditionally, six philosophical systems have been considered orthodox. These are SAMKHYA, with its dualism of prakriti or matter/nature and purusha or spirit; YOGA, an ancient philosophical system but with the addition of a putative deity, Ishvara; the two schools of logical analysis, Nyaya and Vaisheshika; and two schools emphasizing Vedic interpretation and tending toward non-dualism centered around the identification of BRAHMAN and ATMAN (though also producing modified non-dualist and even dualistic theism, Purva-mimamsa and VEDANTA).

However, it is widely agreed by historians of Indian philosophy that this classification is a poor guide to the actual contours of Indian thought. Not only does it overlook the distinctiveness of important systems associated with Saivism and Vaisnavism, it also omits the powerful and influential philosophical systems of the Buddhists and Jains. However, the Darsana approach, with its willingness to accept a diversity of philosophical systems within the same spiritual tradition, brings home an important feature of the Hindu world.

R.E.

DARWIN, CHARLES/DARWINISM. Charles Darwin (1809–1882) is one of the great revolutionary figures in modern thought and the scientist most closely identified with the theory of organic EVOLUTION. Darwinism is the theory of evolution advanced by Darwin with natural selection as the key to the mechanism of evolutionary change. Natural selection holds that organisms tend to vary, even if slightly; that these variations tend to be inherited; that since organisms multiply faster than nature's capacity to sustain them, there is a struggle for existence and the extinction of the less-adaptive organisms and the survival of the successfully adaptive or "fittest"—basically their ability to reproduce—in each generation of a species population. This variation leads to speciation, that is, the formation of new species. The extent and direction of adaptive change, speciation, and evolution depend on innumerable contingent variables operating in the interaction between organisms and their environment. Thus the slight variation of one species can have important consequences through the entire system. Darwin believed that species today are modifications of very different organisms living in the past, hence the possible common ancestry of all living things. Darwin's works, especially The Origin of Species (1859) and The Descent of Man (1871) threatened certain theological beliefs and provoked a struggle between Darwinian theory and theology which, on certain points, continues to this day.

Darwin was born in Shrewsbury, England, the son of a doctor and grandson of the distinguished evolutionist Erasmus Darwin. His mother was a daughter of Josiah Wedgwood, founder of the famous pottery. Darwin attended Edinburgh University as a medical student but abandoned medicine and entered Cambridge University with the intention of becoming an Anglican clergyman. At Cambridge he became seriously engaged in scientific studies under the tutelage of J. S. Henslow. Henslow was also instrumental in Darwin's appointment, at the age of twenty-two, as a naturalist on the voyage of HMS Beagle. The Beagle's circumnavigation of the world lasted five years (1831–36) and brought Darwin in contact with some of the earth's most remote, primitive, and exotic environments. It further trained Darwin's powers of observation and habits of scientific investigation and determined his career as a naturalist. His work on coral reefs, carried out during the voyage, established Darwin as a promising geologist and his friendship with the great geologist Charles Lyell, whose Principles of Geology profoundly influenced him. During 1837 to 1839, Darwin produced, gradually in a series of notebooks, the main ideas of his evolutionary theory. The theory was then sketched out in a thirty-five-page essay in 1842 and in a 230-page monograph in 1844, neither intended for publication.

In 1839 Darwin married his cousin Emma Wedgwood and they resided in London. Shortly thereafter his health began to decline, and the family moved to Down House in Kent, where he lived in virtual isolation for the rest of his life. He suffered from insomnia, intestinal ailments, and nausea, which allowed him to work only a few hours a day. The cause of Darwin's long illness has been much discussed but has not been clearly established.

By 1854 Darwin was prepared to make public the case for evolution and began to organize his vast collection of data in support of his theory. However, in 1858 he received an essay from Alfred Russell Wallace outlining the essentials of his own theory. Darwin's friends Lyell and Joseph Hooker urged him to allow some of his own work, with Wallace's essay, to be read before the Linnean Society. Darwin followed this with an "abstract" of his work, published in 1859 as The Origin of Species by Means of Natural Selection. The book produced an extraordinary response, both in the scientific community and among the general public. The most famous confrontation came in the exchange between Darwin's articulate defender T. H. Huxley and Bishop Samuel Wilberforce at Oxford in 1860. Darwin wrote a number of important works after 1860, including The Descent of Man. He died on April 19, 1882, and was buried in Westminster Abbey.

Darwin's theory disturbed his contemporaries, scientists as well as churchmen, because it appeared to challenge the foundations of Christian belief, especially the current interpretations of the biblical accounts of the Creation, the Fall, and redemption. Darwin's view of man as the chance result of natural selection over a long evolutionary process was at odds with the traditional interpretation of the biblical view of humanity's special CREATION in the image of God. In Darwin's view humans had risen from brute nature rather than fallen from a state of angelic perfection. Furthermore, evolution by natural selection, while not denying God, made God's creative and providential role ambiguous and seemingly unnecessary. What could be God's role and purpose in an evolutionary process of such endless duration, exhibiting such apparently fortuitous and chaotic development? These were the kinds of questions which inaugurated the controversy between Darwinism and theology.

Recent scholarship has demonstrated, however, that the idea of a "conflict" or "warfare" between Darwinian science and theology between 1860 and 1900 is too simplistic. There was no polarization between science on the one hand and theology on the other. Many eminent scientists were opposed to Darwin's theory, and there were orthodox theologians, such as Aubrey Moore in England and G. F. Wright in the United States, who accepted Darwin and can be called Christian Darwinists. The evolutionists of the period were, in the majority of cases, concerned to reconcile nature, man, and God. What confuses the history of the relation between Darwinism and theology is that many liberal theologians such as Frederick Temple, the archbishop of Canterbury, and Lyman Abbott, the popular American theologian, accommodated Christianity to a romantic, Hegelian vision of evolutionary development and progress, which did not touch the real implications of Darwin's theory of natural selection. Acceptance of various notions of evolution were often, mistakenly, equated with acceptance of Darwinism.

Darwin's own religious views developed, fluctuated, and remained ambiguous to the end of his life. He appears to have retained his orthodox beliefs during the Beagle voyage but to have given them up while remaining a theist or evolutionary Deist until the time of the publication of the Origin and beyond. The idea that Darwin became a materialist and atheist as early as 1839 has been refuted. It appears that Darwin's religious beliefs shifted constantly, and, while in later life he called himself an agnostic, he remained suspended between certain beliefs belonging to the older tradition of natural theology and the new scientific positivism. To the end, he found it difficult to view the universe as the product of blind chance and thus he sought forms of theistic accommodation from time to time. However, he would retreat from theistic expression whenever he felt the doctrine of special creation threatened to undermine the theory of natural selection. As Darwin himself remarked, whether a person is a theist depends on the definition of the term.

Darwin's nagging uncertainty about teleology or the idea of intelligent design in the world has continued to occupy the discussion of evolution to the present day. While strict Darwinians and Neo-Darwinians have rejected both vitalist and theological speculation, other scientific evolutionists have been responsive to a reconciliation between theology and evolution. This is due in large part to the influence of PROCESS PHILOSOPHY, the most enduring religious form of evolutionary thought in this century. However, the evolutionary metaphysics of BERGSON, WHITEHEAD, and TEILHARD DE CHARDIN are denounced by contemporary Neo-Darwinians as unscientific. Thus, while the "conflict" between Darwinism and theology needs to be qualified in important ways, it would be wrong to think that real differences do not continue to exist between Darwinian naturalism and Christian theism. To think otherwise would involve a failure to accept the full implications of evolution by natural selection or of the claims of Christian theism. For Darwin's influence on social theory, see SOCIAL DARWINISM.

J.L.

DASEIN. A term coined by the German philosopher MARTIN HEIDEGGER to describe the actual human situation. Literally meaning (in German) "being there," it refers to human life as we really find ourselves, in a world into which we are "thrown" and "abandoned for death," to use Heidegger's words. Knowing for sure that we are there in a world in which we shall sometime no longer exist, we are faced with the necessity for decisions.

I.C.

DAVENPORT, JAMES (1716–57). The eccentric revivalist of the GREAT AWAKENING was born in Stamford, Connecticut, to John and Elizabeth Morris Maltby Davenport. A graduate of Yale College in 1732, he studied theology there, and was licensed to preach October 8, 1735. He was ordained in 1738 to the Southold, Long Island, Congregational Church, which he served until ousted in 1743.

Under the influence of GEORGE WHITEFIELD and GILBERT TENNENT, he became an itinerant, holding REVIVALS in New York and New Jersey as well as Connecticut. Some of his meetings lasted twenty-four hours.

In response to such ENTHUSIASM, the Connecticut assembly in 1742 passed an "Act for Regulating Abuses and Correcting Disorders in Ecclesiastical Affairs." Davenport was judged mentally disturbed and deported back to Long Island. Now a martyr, he traveled to Boston and was similarly expelled. In March 1743 he led New London followers to burn their wigs, fine clothes, and books. After counseling by fellow pastors, he published his Confessions and Retractions (1744). In 1748 he took a pastorate among the Presbyterians of New Jersey, where he served until his death.

N.H.

DAVID. Son of JESSE and second king of Israel (about 1000–961 B.C.).

Introduction. The OT portrait of David is multifaceted. David stands at the center of a compelling royal theology that developed in monarchical Israel, one emphasizing Yahweh's choice of the Davidic house and his desire to reside permanently in Zion. This gave rise to royal Psalms celebrating Yahweh's affirmation of the Davidic monarchy (Pss. 18:50; 132:10-12, 17). Moreover, David is a key figure in exilic and postexilic Jewish messianism. The Chronicler offers a selective, idealized sketch of David (I Chr. 11-20). Significant omissions include David's days as an outlaw, affair with Bathsheba, orchestration of Uriah's death, and stormy latter years. Rather, David is cherished as chief patron of the Jerusalem Temple, who, nearing death, intently transmits plans for the cultus to SOLOMON, his son and successor (I Chr. 28). Thus I Samuel 16–I Kings 2 contains our main sources about David, including the superbly written succession narrative (II Sam. 9-20; I Kings 1–2), which presents public events in the guise of historical novel.

Early Narratives. Reared as the youngest of Jesse's sons in Bethlehem of Judah, David initially surfaces in the biblical narrative when the divinely dispatched Samuel visits Jesse's family to find Saul's successor. As David was anointed by Samuel, "the Spirit of Yahweh came mightily upon David" (I Sam. 16:13). Immediate word that SAUL was plagued by a divinely sent "evil spirit" (16:14) makes transparent the narrator's understanding that Saul's steady downfall and David's dramatic ascent harmonize with Yahweh's purpose. David entered Saul's court as an accomplished musician capable of calming the troubled king (16:15-23). Another tradition, however, claims that the initial meeting of Saul and David occurred when the courageous youth slew Goliath, the Philistine giant, with a skillfully discharged pebble. Second Samuel 21:19 attributes this deed to Elhanan, perhaps David's name before he mounted the throne. If not, the feat of a lesser warrior enhances David's reputation. By introducing another Philistine victim, I Chronicles 20:5 provides a lame harmonization.

Handsome (I Sam. 16:12), discerning in speech, blessed by divine presence (16:18), and befriended by Saul's son, Jonathan (18:1), young David was most favored. After the singing women demonstrated more enthusiasm for David's victories than Saul's (18:7), the anxious king made David a military commander to remove him from the court proper (18:13). Threatened by David's growing popularity, Saul thought he could dispense with David by requiring from him a hundred PHILISTINE foreskins as a dowry for his daughter Michal. David returned unharmed with twice that number to become the son-in-law of a further troubled Saul (18:20-29).

Fugitive Status. Saul's repeated attempts on David's life (I Sam. 19:9-17) forced him to flee. Presently David pursued the precarious existence of an outlaw and resourcefully interacted with the Philistines. After stopovers at Ramah (19:18) and Nob (21:1), David headed southwest for Gath. Feeling insecure before its suspicious Philistine king, Achish, David feigned madness and was permitted to depart (21:10-15). Arriving at Adullam in his native Judah, David attracted four hundred distressed, indebted, and discontented men to his side (22:1-2). As captain of this motley fighting force, which soon grew to six hundred (23:13), David rescued the nearby town of Keilah from Philistine raiders (23:5). The need to escape from Saul's clutches found David in the Ziph and Maon wilderness (23:14, 24), and at En-gedi on the western edge of the Dead Sea (23:29). In that vicinity, David forfeited a chance to kill Saul, whom he regarded as Yahweh's anointed (24:6). Further adventure took David to Carmel, some twenty miles west of En-gedi, which made possible his marriages to Abigail and to Ahinoam, from nearby Jezreel (25:40-43).

Weary of evading Saul, David sought asylum with Achish. Accepting David's signs of loyalty as genuine, the Philistine king gave him the frontier town of Ziklag, where David dwelt for sixteen months (27:1-7). From there David busily consolidated his position in southern Judah, concomitantly deceiving Achish into thinking that he had Philistia's well-being in mind (27:12). Since wary Philistine lords persuaded Achish to forbid David's participation in their battle against Saul's troops at Mount Gilboa, David was spared a potentially embarrassing moment (29:1-11). He returned to Ziklag, waged war against troublesome Amalekite villages, and thereby rebuilt his "kingdom" (30:1-31). Meanwhile, Israel suffered a stunning defeat at Gilboa that took the lives of Saul and three of his sons (31:1-7).

King of Judah. Informed of Saul's and Jonathan's deaths, the diplomatic David went into mourning and voiced a moving lament over Israel's tragic loss. Undoubtedly, this superb Hebrew lyric (II Sam. 1:19-27) influenced the tradition that made David the dominant author of the Psalter. David established himself at Hebron, where "men of Judah" declared him king (2:4). A seasoned politician, David sent a message of appreciation to the men of Jabesh-gilead who had, at considerable personal risk, given the bodies of Saul and his sons proper burial (2:5-6; see I Sam. 31:11-13). To this he appended a subtle, self-serving recommendation that they accept Judah's support of him as their model.

Meanwhile, with substantial help from his father's general, Abner, Ishbaal (Ish-bosheth) ruled Israel from Mahanaim in Transjordan, well beyond Philistine reach. Civil war raged between Ishbaal's supporters and David's. After two years, however, it ended with the assassination of both Abner (II Sam. 3:30) and Ishbaal (4:5-8), deeds in which David played no direct role. Given David's prudent responses to the deaths of Saul, Jonathan, Abner, and Ishbaal, and the fact that Jonathan's lame son, Mephibosheth, was Saul's sole legitimate successor, Israelite elders followed the one sensible course available. Arriving at Hebron, they complimented David for past charismatic leadership and acclaimed him ruler over all Israel (5:1-3).

King of All Israel. Aware that a reunited Israel would count for little so long as the Philistines proved troublesome, David made triumph over these opponents his first goal (probably the two events of II Sam. 5 appear in reverse chronological order). Severely beaten by David in the Valley of Rephaim southwest of Jerusalem, the Philistines retreated twenty miles westward to Gezer (II Sam. 5:17-25). This and subsequent Davidic triumphs (21:15-22) ensured that the Philistines would no longer menace Israel.

After a 7½-year residence at Hebron, David seized the Jebusite city of JERUSALEM and moved his government there for the remainder of his thirty-seven years of rule (II Sam. 5:5). Jerusalem's central location, a strategically chosen area in the hills, and neutrality vis-à-vis Judean and Israelite religious history, made it an enviable choice. Assisted by personal troops (5:6), David took the city, though he refrained from slaughtering its Jebusite inhabitants.

Seeking to unite religious and political forces to his advantage, David transferred the Ark of the Covenant from Kiriath-jearim to Jerusalem (6:1-23). Though this involved both disaster and celebration, it was a masterful move. Yahweh's invisible presence in "the city of David" (6:12) was assured. Despite its later midrashic overtones, II Samuel 7, with its mention of Yahweh's eternal choice of the Jerusalem-based Davidic dynasty, further witnesses to the coalescence of religion and politics in Davidic government.

During his early Jerusalem years, David so thoroughly triumphed over the Moabites, Arameans, Ammonites, Edomites, and Amalekites that his kingdom reached the spacious perimeters assumed in Yahweh's ancient promise to Abraham (II Sam. 8:2-13; 10:6-19; 12:26-31; Gen. 15:18-21). The forthright succession narrative (II Sam. 9:20; I Kings 1-2), however, reveals that in personal and domestic affairs, David often came up short. David's affair with Bathsheba (II Sam. 11:2-5), his implementation of the death of her Hittite husband, Uriah (11:14-17), and Nathan's confrontive judgment, "You are the man" (12:7) attest David's abuse of regal power. That the penitent David was forgiven (12:13) did not exempt him from having to witness the disintegration of his household. His son AMNON raped his half-sister Tamar (13:1-20), and his son ABSALOM engineered the murder of Amnon (13:23-29). Absalom's rebellious lust for the throne returned David to precarious fugitive existence after his forced evacuation of Jerusalem (15:13-16). David reentered Jerusalem (20:3), but only after experiencing profound grief over Absalom's death at the hand of his assertive military commander, Joab (18:9-33). The succession narrative's final portrait of David is that of a weakened old man whose indecision concerning whether Adonijah or Solomon should follow him on the throne spawned extensive palace intrigue. Yielding to Nathan and Bathsheba, he decided in favor of Solomon (I Kings 1:30).

Assessment. The indulgent David was no model patriarch. He was not always the master of his emotions. Domestic sorrow even undercut his typically judicious rule over his people (II Sam. 19:5-7). On balance, however, David's accomplishments were impressive. The confidence he often engendered in his followers, his rigorous suppression of Philistine power, and his establishment of Jerusalem as the new capital speak well in his behalf. He is to be no less celebrated for his capacity to organize his Jerusalem court, cultivation of sound political relations with foreign powers, and respect for the ancient religious traditions of his people even as he sought new ways to address the future.

J.K.K.

DAVID, CITY OF. The city of JERUSALEM, from ancient to modern times, has had to acknowledge uncertain geographical boundaries and equally uncertain political and religious loyalties. Although Judges 1:8 might indicate that Jerusalem had been conquered by Judahites in the early days of the "conquest"—and may very well indeed point to an older tribal assault on the city—Joshua 15:63 confesses that Jerusalem remained Canaanite into the period of the monarchy. This accords with II Samuel 5:6-9, which recounts the conquest of the stronghold of ZION, the city of the Jebusites, to become the city of DAVID, his capital. It was not so much to distance himself from tribal loyalties that David chose a site for his capital that had no prior tribal history; the tribal system, as David, and Solomon after him recognized, was already an anachronism passing into history. What David did was to choose a neutral site to which neither North nor South could object—a site with no prior Israelite history—that could, therefore, serve for the new thing that had come into being, the United Kingdom of ISRAEL and JUDAH. Here he could establish the new nation with its own polity (partly traditional, partly adapted), bureaucracy (largely borrowed from Egypt), ritual (mostly taken over from the indigenous liturgy and priesthood), and so forth.

The original City of David, at the extreme east of the Tyropean valley that runs through Jerusalem, has left no vestiges of its Judahite conquest. There is a trace, however, of a wall that is claimed to be Jebusite. It was Solomon who first enlarged the site to the north, creating the city area that would later house the Temple. From then on, except in the east protected by the Kidron Valley, Jerusalem has otherwise extended itself in every direction and has become popularly known in its entirety as "Zion" or "City of David."

B.V.

DAY OF ATONEMENT. The holiest day in the Jewish calendar. In Hebrew it is called Yom Kippur. It is the climax of a forty-day period of self-examination and spiritual stocktaking, which includes the month of Elul, the two days of ROSH HASHANAH (the Jewish New Year), and the ten days of penitence.

Yom Kippur is marked by a total fast from sundown to sundown and by prayer and reflection. The commandment to observe it is in the Bible: "Howbeit on the tenth day of this seventh month is the day of atonement; there shall be a holy convocation unto you, and ye shall afflict your souls; and ye shall bring an offering . . ." (Lev. 23:27 JPS).

Rabbinic legend has it that, apart from the fact that the day is prescribed in the Bible as a day for atonement and forgiveness, on this very day Moses descended from Mount Sinai with the second tablets of the Ten Commandments and brought the good news to the Jewish people that they had been forgiven their sin of having worshiped the golden calf.

The keynote of Yom Kippur is repentance—self-scrutiny, confession of wrongdoing, pleas for divine forgiveness, and a determination for self-improvement. The evening service initiating Yom Kippur begins with the Kol Nidre prayer to wipe clean one's personal slate so that he or she may enter upon the Great Day with a clean conscience. Judaism teaches that Yom Kippur may atone only for the wrongs committed against God. The wrongs perpetrated against one's fellow human beings may be atoned for only by making amends and by securing the personal forgiveness of the injured person.

The confession of sins on Yom Kippur is expressed in the plural: "For the sins which we have committed. . . ." This reminds the worshiper that he or she is part of a community and also responsible for society's evils. The fasting and praying must result in a higher ethical standard. As the prophet Isaiah said, "Is such the fast that I have chosen? The day for a man to afflict his soul? Is it to bow down his head as a bulrush, And to spread sackcloth and ashes under him? Wilt thou call this a fast, And an acceptable day to the Lord? Is not this the fast that I have chosen? To loose the fetters of wickedness, To undo the bands of the yoke, And to let the oppressed go free, And that ye break every yoke? Is it not to deal thy bread to the hungry, And that thou bring the poor that are cast out to thy house? When thou seest the naked, that thou cover him, And that thou hide not thyself from thine own flesh? Then shall thy light break forth as the morning, And thy healing shall spring forth speedily; And thy righteousness shall go before thee, The glory of the Lord shall be thy reward. Then shalt thou call, and the Lord will answer; Thou shalt cry, and He will say: 'Here I am' " (Isa. 58:5-9 JPS).

L.K.

DAY OF THE LORD/DAY OF JUDGMENT. The "day of the Lord" was originally a promise of salvation-prophecy, an assurance that the Lord would eventually award God's client-people with victory over their enemies. In that day the Lord would settle accounts, obviously in favor of God's people. Amos 1:3-2:3 and the book of Nahum are typical of this kind of prophecy, which was in turn a legacy from the oracle of victory given by a court prophet to the king embarking upon a "holy war" (see I Kings 22). However, already with Amos it is evident that the "day of the Lord" was being demythologized in favor of moral issues. While Amos 5:18-20 refers to it as a well-known and accepted idea, the prophet hastens to disillusion the Israelites in their belief that it will be an unconditional intervention in their favor. Rather, he says, it will be for them a day of darkness and not of light. Since Israel by its conduct has shown itself to be the enemy of its moral God rather than God's faithful covenant partner, the day when the Lord intervenes to crush rebellion and destroy unrighteousness will signal Israel's downfall and exile, the loss of its distinctive national and religious institutions (compare Amos 7:1-8:3).

In Isaiah 2:12-19 the notion of the day of the Lord appears in a universalistic context, no longer restricted to Israel either as a time of vindication or of punishment. The theme is now that of a universal triumph of the Lord "against all that is proud and lofty," when "the pride of men shall be brought low; and the Lord alone will be exalted in that day."

With the Exile and postexilic prophets generally, this universalistic note continues and additional modifications also appear. First, with recognition of individual responsibility (Ezek. 18, for example) and the consequent distinction between good and bad persons even within the one people of God, the coming day of the Lord, which will affect all the nations (Joel 3:9 ff; Zeph. 2:8 ff.), is seen properly as a day of judgment. JUDGMENT in the OT, which corresponds with "justice," ultimately means to make prevail what is right. What is right is that Israel no less than the nations be punished for their sins, but the righteous, whether of Israel or of the nations, shall be saved (compare Isa. 66:15-21).

Second, the Day of Judgment becomes eschatological. That is to say, what was originally conceived as the Lord's settling of accounts in the foreseeable future toward which history was leading, now is seen as a once-for-all verdict to be passed on the wicked and the righteous at the end of time (compare Dan. 11:40-12:3).

The NT inherited the "day of the Lord" (Acts 2:20; etc.) from the OT in its eschatological interpretation: it is the final Day of Judgment (II Pet. 3:7) of the imminent coming of which the church lived in expectation (compare I Thess. 5:1-11). Christian adaptation includes the terms "day of our Lord Jesus Christ" (I Cor. 1:8) and "day of the Son of man" (Luke 17:24). The Day of the Lord or Final Judgment tended to be identified with the PAROUSIA or Second Coming of Christ to usher in the definitive establishment of the messianic kingdom of God. In Matthew 25:31-46, the conclusion of Jesus' eschatological discourse, the Parousia is clearly identified with a final judgment pronounced by Christ himself over those whose worthiness of eternal punishment or eternal life will have been proved by their attention to the works of charity.

B. V.

DEACON, DEACONESS. Church officers involved in ministry to the congregation in the NT. The male officer, or deacon, (derived from the Greek diakonos, meaning "servant"), was probably an assistant to the elder (or pastor) in the congregation (Acts 6:3-4; I Tim. 3:8; Phil. 1:1), although he, too, had pastoral functions. It is not clear whether the seven men appointed by the apostles (Acts 6:3-4) were deacons or had some other assisting office. The text does not refer to them as deacons, and it appears from the preaching and stoning of Stephen (who is said to have worked miracles) recorded in Acts 6:8-7:60, that at least Stephen was primarily an evangelist. It is clear, however, from Acts 6:3-4 that the officers appointed there were to oversee the temporal administration of funds and charity, which are duties traditionally, since the era of Ignatius in the second century A.D., assigned to deacons.

The deaconess in the NT era was a female officer of the local congregation involved in pastoral and liturgical functions. Phoebe, of the congregation in Cenchreae, is called a deaconess, or female servant, by Paul in Romans 16:1. (The Greek term for "servant" is diakonissa.) The "widows" referred to by the author of I Timothy 5:3-10 were apparently also recognized officers of the congregation and may have been equal to deaconesses. These widows are said to have a special status and are enrolled at age sixty (I Tim. 5:9). They were actually widowed women who felt a call to serve the congregation. Widows of younger age were prohibited from enrollment since they were likely to want to marry again (I Tim. 5:11-15). The author of the Pastoral Epistle implies that the older widow, so enrolled, is symbolically married (or betrothed) to Christ (vv. 11-12). Widows, therefore, were expected to be celibate during their service. It is speculative to identify this order of enrolled widows with deaconesses, of course. Verse 13 mentions that widows go around "from house to house," so that visiting the homes of church members was one of the duties of widows. Pastoral visitation may, then, have been a function of female ministers in the period of the Pastoral Epistles.

The text in I Timothy 3:11 is unclear. The reference may be to the wives of deacons (so translated by the New English Bible) or may be to deaconesses, as a separate order. The RSV translates the term as "the women," yet goes on to translate verse 12 as saying, "Let deacons be the husband of one wife. . . ." This ambiguous reference probably is to a female order of ministry parallel to the male diaconate.

First Timothy is interesting in that it is the earliest Christian document to give evidence of the formal leadership of the early church. The offices mentioned are ELDER or BISHOP (translated "leader" or "bishop" by the NEB and "bishop" by the RSV; I Tim. 3:1-2) and deacon (I Tim. 3:8-13) and probably deaconesses ("wives," in the NEB; "women," in the RSV; I Tim. 3:11). This reference to deaconesses or widows is interesting, considering the admonitions of the author in I Timothy 2:9-15, which declare: "Let a woman learn in silence with all submissiveness. I permit no woman to teach or to have authority over men; she is to keep silent" (vv. 11-12 RSV). Note the Pauline basis for this advice (I Cor. 11:2-16; 7:1-16).

By the second century, the Christian ministry evolved into a threefold, hierarchical office of bishop, priest (or presbyter, elder), and deacon. The deacon served under the bishop, according to Hippolytus' Apostolic Tradition, from the third century. Deacons cared for financial and charitable matters. The Synod of Arles, A.D. 314, made it clear that deacons were under the authority of priests (elders) as well as bishops. Among the Greek (later Orthodox) churches, a man was ordained deacon for life, an office he held while holding a secular vocation as well. In the Latin churches of the West, the office of the deacon gradually became merely a hierarchical stage to the full priesthood.

After the Reformation the functions of the deacon in the Mass or public worship were largely discarded except in the Anglican Communion. In the various Lutheran churches the title of deacon was transferred to lay officers of the congregation in some instances (that is, in the Lutheran church—Missouri Synod) and abandoned altogether in others (that is, in the Lutheran Church in America), although the functions were carried out by "church council" men and women. Pastoral care, in the sense of home visitation, assistance at Holy Communion, and witnessing are Lutheran concepts of the diaconate.

The Lutheran churches of Europe and America have enjoyed a ministry of the deaconess since the modern deaconess movement was begun by Pastor Fliedner of Kaiserswerth, Germany, in 1836. By the end of the nineteenth century, the Lutheran practice was adopted by the Anglican Communion, the Methodist churches, and the Church of Scotland. Protestant deaconesses are generally single women (never married or widowed), who engage in pastoral care of congregational members. This type of service is close to the ministry of deaconesses between the fourth and eleventh centuries A.D. The Apostolic Constitutions of the late fourth century A.D., describe deaconesses as ministering to the women members of the church. The Catholic church of the Middle Ages feared the possible competition of deaconesses for priestly power and allowed the office to die before the eleventh century A.D.

Since the Vatican Council II begun by Pope John XXIII, the office of the deacon has undergone great study and considerable development in the Catholic church. The office of "permanent deacon" is now widely recognized and is used in more and more churchly activities by Catholic dioceses. This office, similar to the practice of the Eastern Orthodox church and the permanent deacon office of the Anglican and Episcopal churches, attracts many well-equipped laity. The deacon, today, does much to make up for the decline in vocations to the priesthood in the American Catholic church.

J.C.

DEAD, ABODE OF THE. The OT Israelites were practically alone in their contemporary society as evincing, for all practical purposes, virtually no interest in life beyond the present one. This lack of interest contrasts, particularly, with the Egyptian preoccupation with DEATH and the life beyond, which accounts for the great pyramids, the Valley of the Kings, and the mummification process that so enthralled ancient Israelite authors (Gen. 50:2-3, 26), among other phenomena. It is not that the OT was reluctant to accept ideas from without: Egypt, Edom, etc., were always recognized as sources of wisdom, and implicitly at least Canaanite and Mesopotamian sources were acknowledged as having provided models for prophecy, law, some theology, a great deal of liturgy, and the ritual of sacrifice.

As for the dead, however, Israel seems to have resisted all foreign suggestions in making up its own mind. This is rather strange in itself, for nothing had prepared Israel to be an innovative culture. Yet it remained an island of the here-and-now in a world much given over to what-will-be.

So the Hebrew SHEOL, also sometimes called Abaddon or "the pit," designations for the final destiny awaiting human existence, is often no more than a figure of speech for death itself, that is, extinction (I Kings 2:6). Usually, however, the terms do envisage a place, however vaguely, somewhere in the bowels of the earth ("the nether world," Ezek. 26:20), guarded by the waters that were thought to flow beneath the inhabited land (compare II Sam. 22:5-6). The assignment of an abode for the dead implied, however, no speculation about an afterlife nor any belief in a real survival of death, nor even in the popular religion reflected in the story of I Samuel 28:8-19. Quite to the contrary, the dead ("the shades") have no meaningful existence in Sheol: theirs is the negation of life, where there is no communication between them and God (Ps. 88:10-12), where they neither remember nor are remembered (Eccl. 9:5), where they have really ceased to be (Ps. 39:13).

In later Judaism, perhaps anticipated by such passages as Ezekiel 32, and certainly in the NT, Sheol (the Greek hadēs, "hell"), now equated with "Gehenna," more and more tends to be conceived as a place of perdition and punishment of the wicked dead, while "life" or ETERNAL LIFE in some other dimension will be the gift of God as the lot of the just.

The variations on these themes were considerable and were much exploited by later theology.

B.V.

DEAD, PRAYERS FOR THE. A common practice throughout the religious world is intercession on behalf of the departed, particularly loved ones but also patrons and rulers, that they might receive repose and blessing in the next life. Yet such prayers often have had an ambivalent place in the great religions. Typically, a strict construction of doctrine precludes them as superfluous or presumptuous, since one's postmortem state ought to be determined solely by divine judgment, or KARMA, on the basis of one's piety and merit in a life now closed. Yet so natural is the impulse to plead special indulgence of the divine for the deceased of one's household, that prayer for the dead has a way of slipping into funeral and memorial services and indeed into public and private devotions generally. Rulers find that rites for dynastic ancestors help establish legitimacy. Examples of prayers for the dead include Hindu SRADDHA offerings; Buddhist practices to generate PUNNA on their behalf; and the prayers and requiem masses of Roman Catholic, Eastern Orthodox, and some Anglican Christians. Protestantism generally rejects the practice. Prayers for the dead should not be confused with ANCESTOR VENERATION or worship of departed forebears.

R.E.

DEAD SEA. This is a post-biblical designation of what the Bible variously calls the "Salt Sea," the "Sea of the Arabah," or the "Eastern Sea" (as far as the tiny geography of the OT was concerned, the Mediterranean was the "Western Sea"). It is the landlocked lake formed by the emptying of the JORDAN RIVER and its tributaries, over twelve hundred feet below sea level. It is roughly forty-five miles in length and ranges in depth from about twelve hundred feet in the north to thirty feet or less in the south. On both east and west it is bounded by high cliffs, affording it little shoreline. The extremely high saline content of the water, caused by evaporation, which is its only outlet, renders it incapable of supporting any marine life, while the oppressive heat of the region and the salt-laden soil of its surroundings combine to produce a wasteland bereft of vegetation. Both in ancient and modern times, however, it has been exploited for its mineral content: principally salt, bitumen (in Hellenistic times the Dead Sea was called "Lake Asphaltitis"), and potash. Though the blue water of the sea looks deceptively inviting when seen from an elevated distance afar, proximity reveals it for what it is, a desolation.

Exceptions to this rule are provided by the oases of the Dead Sea region supplied by independent water sources. The most famous of these is Jericho ("the city of the palms"), the oldest occupied site of the Near East and possibly of the entire world. Also En-gedi on the western shore was in biblical times fabled as a place of lushness and beauty. Recent archaeology has likewise turned up evidence of a network of cities of some consequence that once dotted the southern shore. This fact is more readily explicable in view of the probability that the southernmost part of the Dead Sea was once dry land, that part south of el-Lisan ("the tongue"), the point of land that juts out from the eastern shore and narrows the width of the sea to only a couple of miles. As late as the mid-nineteenth century, there is attestation that here the sea was fordable from shore to shore. On the southwest shore Jebel Usdum, a salt mountain with grotesque formations, preserves reminiscences of the Sodom legend associated with this region (Gen. 19). By the Arabs the Dead Sea is known as the "Sea of Lot," as part of the same legend.

Courtesy of the Israel Government Tourist Office, Houston, Texas

The Dead Sea, with the Negeb mountains in the foreground

In Ezekiel's great eschatological vision (Ezek. 47:8-12; compare also Zech. 14:8), the Dead Sea is seen as becoming fresh water, supporting all kinds of fish life, its shores rife with vegetation (though, practically, provision will still be made for salt).

B. V

DEAD SEA SCROLLS (DSS). Beginning in 1947 with the chance find of some scrolls in a cave overlooking the Dead Sea, there have come to light portions of about six hundred manuscripts in addition to a few complete documents. They date from the end of the second century B.C. to the mid-first century A.D. Further exploration disclosed the sites of a residential settlement and some small industrial sites belonging to the group that produced the scrolls. The name QUMRAN, which is the local Arab name for the dry creek bed that drains the winters' rains from Jerusalem (about fifteen miles to the northwest), has become the popular designation for the site and the scrolls.

The herdsmen who found the first scrolls in clay jars brought their finds to an antiquities dealer in Bethlehem, who in turn took them to a religious leader and then to the American School of Oriental Research in Jerusalem. Initial publication of the scrolls began under Miller Burrows at the school, but the outbreak of the Arab-Israeli War in 1948 hindered the process. In the mid-1950s R. de Vaux and G. L. Harding excavated other caves in the area (of which eleven produced scroll finds), as well as the occupation sites nearby. One of these was the community center; the other was an installation where the agricultural and supply needs of the community were met. An international team of scholars began preparing the manuscripts for publication. Since the 1967 occupation of East Jerusalem by the Israelis and the purchase of several of the most important scrolls by Israel, Israeli scholarship has dominated the publication process. Searches in other caves along the western shore of the Dead Sea produced other scrolls at Murabaát and MASADA, including important copies of biblical texts—some of them known in modern times only in Greek translation. Many of the manuscripts from the caves south of Qumran, however, come from the later time and were related to the Jewish Revolt of the early second century.

Courtesy of Otto Betz

View of a Qumran cave where many of the Dead Sea Scrolls were found

The community center, which was built on the site of a fortress from the late eighth century B.C., included a large dining room—a meeting room with a kitchen and service area adjoining, a tower (for protection?), and storerooms. Equipment found in the ruins included benches and inkwells, which were part of the community's SCRIPTORIUM, where the scrolls were produced and copied. An elaborate system of conduits and pools provided the water supply, which seems to have included ceremonial baths. On the basis of coins and comparison of the pottery with other sites, it was determined that the site was in use in two periods from 135 to 31 B.C. and from A.D. 1 to 68. An earthquake, followed by a fire, seems to have caused the interruption of the occupation of the center. Three caves (1, 4, and 11) produced the most significant manuscript finds. At some distance from the center were the community burial sites, which included a special section where the remains of a relatively few bodies of women and children were found.

Courtesy of Religious News Service

Qumran as seen from a Dead Sea cave

The manuscripts may be grouped under five categories: (1) biblical texts; (2) biblical commentaries; (3) foundation documents of the Dead Sea sect; (4) revelatory texts; and (5) liturgical texts.

Portions of more than one hundred copies of the Hebrew scriptures were found in a single cave (cave 4), though they survived in thousands of fragments. The writing styles of the manuscripts from all the caves indicate that some scrolls are as old as 250 B.C., whereas others date from the time of the destruction of the site. It has been suggested that adherents of the community brought copies of the scriptures with them on admission to membership. Both the alphabet used (whether the older style based on the Canaanite script, or the newer squarish letter derived from Aramaic) and the actual text copied vary widely. There are translations into Greek (the LXX, or SEPTUAGINT type) as well as paraphrases in Aramaic (the TARGUMS). Some manuscripts omit the so-called weak consonants (the rough equivalents of English w, h, y, and the glottal stop), while others include them. Difficult passages are occasionally provided with clarification by the insertion of a phrase from another scriptural text.

Courtesy of John C. Trever

The complete Dead Sea Scroll commentary on Habakkuk found in a cave near Qumran

Some manuscripts follow closely the traditional Masoretic Hebrew text (see BIBLE, TEXT OF), while others include distinctive features found in the LXX and apparently present in the original Hebrew text from which the Greek translation was made. In addition to copies of all the books of the Hebrew CANON (except Esther), complete or fragmentary copies of nearly all the so-called Apocrypha are represented. The exceptions are the Wisdom of Solomon, I and II Maccabees, Judith, and Baruch (except for a Greek version of an addition of that book). These were omitted because they were intellectually or ideologically incompatible with the outlook of the Qumran community. Especially important among the findings are portions of Sirach, which had otherwise been known only from the Greek translation until the discovery in the late nineteenth century in Cairo of some extensive fragments of the work in Hebrew.

Judging by sheer numbers of copies, the most treasured biblical writings at Qumran, apart from Deuteronomy, must have been Isaiah and the Psalms. For neither of these books, however, do the manuscripts provide what appears to be a more reliable or ancient edition of the Hebrew text than had previously been known. The Psalms scrolls include

Copyright © John C. Trever, 1970

Scroll of Isaiah found at Qumran, opened to column 49 with Isaiah 59:17–61:4 showing. According to Luke 4:16–19 Jesus read Isaiah 61:1–3 in the synagogue of Nazareth. This scroll was copied with carbon ink about 100 B.C. and is the oldest complete biblical manuscript known to exist.

materials, not found in the traditional Hebrew text, which have been given the designation of Psalms 151–155. The many copies of Deuteronomy, and Genesis and Exodus (with fewer of Leviticus and Numbers) underscore how the Qumran group saw itself as the climax of sacred history, as the faithful remnant to whom God had revealed, through the True Prophet (Deut. 18:18), the proper and final interpretation of the Law. Several of the biblical books are preserved in a form shorter than that found in the later standard Hebrew text—for example, Jeremiah and Job—which may mean that the briefer form is older. Above all it is clear that the Qumran community was more interested in transmitting a text of the scripture that was relevant to its purposes than it was in faithfully reproducing a traditional text.

Besides copies of the Hebrew scripture, the community produced paraphrases of the biblical writings in Aramaic (Targums), including one of Job, and interpretive expansions on biblical passages, such as one that recounts stories of characters in Genesis: Lamech, Noah, and Abraham, or the Prayer of Nabonidus which reads like an expansion of Daniel. Equally important are the extensive commentaries (called the PESHER) on biblical books (Habakkuk, Micah, Isaiah, Nahum, etc.), which are concerned to disclose the hidden meaning of the text for the community in the time of the commentators, not for the historical meaning in the time of the prophet. It was the Righteous Teacher who was given the keys to understand the scripture in the light of God's purpose for the new covenant, as the Habakkuk commentary states and as is confirmed in one of the Damascus documents. Other writings offer exposition of the Psalms and of historical reports of promise about the Davidic kingdom.

Most informative about the nature of the Qumran sect are the foundation documents discovered there in various editions. Foremost of these is the Rule of the Community, which probably goes back to 150 B.C. It depicts the sect as the true people of the new covenant foretold in Jeremiah 31–33 and gives detailed instructions how they are to live in the last days. Strongly dualistic in outlook, the Rule sees the world and its inhabitants as subject to Belial, the embodiment of evil, and humanity divided into children of darkness and children of light. The mode of entering the covenant community, instructions for those within, the structure of leadership within, the mode of expulsion of the unfit, the necessity to safeguard the truth within the community, and the pattern of communal worship are all specified. An appendix offers additional instruction and culminates in the depiction of a sacred meal of bread and wine at which the Messiah of Israel (a royal figure) yields priority to the Messiah of Aaron (a priestly figure).

The historical origins of the sect are sketched in the Damascus Document (CD), which has survived in multiple fragmentary copies at Qumran, as well as in a late (tenth century A.D.) copy found in 1896 in Cairo. The chief characters in CD are the Righteous Teacher and the Man of Lies. The latter is almost certainly Jonathan, son of Mattathias and brother of Judas the Maccabee. He is referred to in the Peshet on Habakkuk as the Wicked Priest, since it was he who replaced a high priest with the proper heritage (a descendant of Zadok) by one who lacked it. The Righteous Teacher led his followers out to their place of refuge in Damascus (Qumran) to maintain their purity there and to await God's deliverance.

The expectations of divine vindication are described in detail in other Qumran documents: The War of the Children of Light and the Children of Darkness describes the final battle; The Temple Scroll details how the sacrifices and other functions in the Temple are to be handled rightly in accord with God's expressed rules; The Copper Scroll tells where treasure lies hidden that is to be recovered. These revelatory writings are matched by liturgical documents, which help the community prepare for the end of the age, especially the Hymns of Thanksgiving (the Hodayoth and fragments from cave 4). The Hodayoth consist of a network of quotations, mostly the biblical Psalms and Isaiah. These hymns convey vividly the deep concerns and aspiration for the apparent triumph of evil, the need for courage in the face of persecution, and confidence in the future triumph of God over evil. All this is set forth with a profound sense of gratitude for divine grace, which has enlightened and will sustain God's chosen few.

Courtesy of the Israel Department of Antiquities and Museums

First-century jar from Qumran inscribed with the name "John"

It is possible from this rich and diverse set of documents to infer something about the history of the sect for and by whom this material was produced. The dating of the origin of the movement at 390 years after Jerusalem fell to Nebuchadnezzar brings one down into the second century B.C. The other time span mentioned in the Nahum Commentary begins with Antiochus (175-163) and comes down to the coming of the "Kittim"—a reference to the Roman takeover of Jerusalem in 63 B.C. This marks the limits of the sect down to the time of the writer of the Nahum Pesher. The Righteous Teacher had apparently supported the Maccabees until Jonathan appointed an illegitimate priest, whereupon the withdrawal to the Qumran took place. The site by the Wadi Qumran may have been chosen in anticipation of the transformation of the river that is to flow from the Temple to the Dead Sea, as promised in Ezekiel 47. An earthquake apparently ruined the settlement in 31 B.C., but a rebuilding took place about the time of the birth of Jesus. The documents from this later period depict the Romans as allied with the children of darkness, and it was Roman troops that destroyed the settlement in A.D. 68. Some seem to have escaped southward to Masada, only to die in A.D. 73 in the futile last stages of the revolt of the Jews against Rome.

H. K.

DEAN. Ecclesiastical title, from the Latin decanus, or "ten." Originally a monk who supervised ten novices. Later, the superior of a cathedral who oversaw the clergy, their services, and the building. In the Anglican Church (and among some American Lutherans) deans assist the bishop in supervising clerical activities.

J. C.

DEATH OF GOD THEOLOGY. A movement that flourished in the United States between 1960 and 1970. The Death of God was the title of a book by Gabriel Vahanian drawing attention to the cultural fact that many people in the twentieth century get along very well without the "God hypothesis" and that all educated people today do not invoke God as an explanation of events once ascribed to God's agency (sickness and health, good harvests, natural disasters, etc.). The Death of God theology was an attempt to adjust to this cultural fact by restating Christian theology without a doctrine of God.

It was never a unified movement, and one can distinguish several varieties. Paul van Buren dispensed with God because he believed that theistic belief has been shown to be incoherent and incredible by modern philosophy. T. J. J. Altizer developed a Hegelian METAPHYSICS in which God is said to be completely finitized in the world of creatures. Both Altizer and W. Hamilton believed further that the dignity and progress of humanity demand the abolition of God. Along with these Christian writers may be associated Richard Rubenstein, a Jewish rabbi who believed that the sufferings of his people had rendered incredible the God of the covenant. He also contrasted his own pessimistic atheism with what he considered to be the unjustified optimism of the Christian Death of God writers. The whole movement illustrates the crisis of theism, but to many it seemed that a theology founded on atheism is a contradiction. In S. Ogden's words, however absurd belief in God might be, it could hardly be as absurd as Christianity without God.

J. M.

DEATH, THEOLOGY OF. In the OT and NT, the end of physical life on earth, the separation of the SOUL from the BODY. Early Hebrew religion gave little thought to death, accepting it as a part of life, and it gave scant attention to life after death. Gradually, belief developed that the departed soul went to SHEOL or HADES (Ps. 88:12; 86:13; Prov. 15:24) where the soul barely existed as a shade or shadow. Death was considered the result of sin, as shown in Genesis 3:19, 22. Not until very late in Hebrew history (that is, the time of the writing of Daniel, about 350 B.C.) did belief in the resurrection of the dead, to be judged on their works, arise. Before Ezekiel and Daniel, there was little, if any, belief in personal IMMORTALITY. Rather, the nation, the people of Israel, was seen as immortal, as it continued from generation to generation. Many scholars believe such passages as Hosea 6:1-3, which sound personal, probably refer to the whole people of Israel. Such a reading rests on appreciation of the Hebrew belief that human beings are animated bodies, not incarnate souls, as in Greek thought.

In the NT, death is closely identified with sin (Rom. 5:12). Death, like sin, law, and the devil, is a hostile power; the very demonic powers that Christ struggles to overcome in his proclamation of the Kingdom and triumphs over in his death and resurrection. Paul puts it clearly: for those with faith in Jesus Christ, death no longer has any power to terrify or destroy (Rom. 6-9; I Cor. 15). People die physically; but spiritually believers have eternal life, so that alive or dead they cannot fall out of the hand of God.

J. C.

DEBIR. A royal Canaanite city-state in the hill country of Judah that figures prominently in the narrative of the Israelite conquest of the land of Palestine. In the oldest tradition (Judg. 1:12-15) this conquest was ascribed to Calebites and Kenizzites. Since these were later assimilated to the tribe of Judah, Debir eventually became a Judahite conquest (Judg. 1:10-11). And finally, in the Deuteronomic history with its picture of a single Israelite conquest under the leadership of Joshua, Debir becomes the prize of "all Israel," along with Lachish, Eglon, Hebron, and Libnah (Josh. 10:38). These sites, violently destroyed about 1200 B.C., remain for many an argument confirmatory of the historicity of the Israelite conquest.

Debir has long been identified with Tell Beit Mirsim, one of the most thoroughly explored sites of Palestinian archaeology, though the latter is not, strictly speaking, in the hill country. The identification was never undisputed, and recently the rival claims of the nearby Khirbet Rabud have commended themselves to scholars of the Near East. Khirbet Rabud displays the remains of several cities of the Late Bronze and Early Iron ages.

B. V.

DEBORAH. (1) Rebekah's nurse, who first appears anonymously (Gen. 24:59), is given this name in Genesis 35:8, where it is said that she was buried under an oak below Bethel. It is quite likely that this is a secondary accounting for the fact that there was a traditional "tree of Deborah" (Judg. 4:5; here, however, a palm rather than an oak) "between Ramah and Bethel in the hill country of Ephraim."

(2) The famous Deborah of the Bible is the heroine of Judges 4-5, who is variously termed a prophetess and a judge (Judg. 4:4), a mother in Israel (Judg. 5:7), and a songstress (Judg. 5:12). "Prophetess," in the sense of the nationalistic charismatics who handed down oracles promising victory over the people's enemies in the name of the covenant Deity (I Sam. 23:1-5; I Kings 20:13-15; etc.), seems to be the most applicable title as far as the prose story of Judges 4 is concerned. Perhaps the same is true of the poetry of Judges 5, though some have thought to find a closer parallel in a feature of Near Eastern nomadic tribal society verified only in later times: the "battle maiden" who with song and dance stimulated and goaded on the fighting men. In any case, "prophetess" is probably a flexible enough term to include this function as well. It should be noted, whatever the determination of Deborah's character and despite the attribution of Judges 5 to her as "the song of Deborah," it is Jael rather than Deborah whom the author of Judges regards as the "most blessed of women" in this episode (Judg. 5:24).

It has generally been assumed that the prose of Judges 4 is a more recent retelling of the story of the poetry of Judges 5, the latter being frequently described as one of the most ancient compositions preserved in the OT. This consensus has been challenged, however. While the prose envisages Deborah, the wife of Lappidoth, an Ephraimite, enlisting the services of a Naphtalite chieftain, Barak, to lead a coalition of Ephraimites, Naphtalites, and Zebulunites against Jabin of Hazor and his general Sisera—a limited engagement which, in any case, is finally resolved only by the action of the woman Jael—the poetry celebrates a much more heroic exploit involving many more tribes, many more details, and much more drama, typical of later elaboration. There is, at all events, agreement enough between the two sources, once each is read without editorial embellishments, to conclude that together they testify to a crucial victory of Israelites over indigenous Canaanites in the time of the conquest/settlement of the Promised Land. A victory in the strategic Valley of Jezreel "at Taanach, by the waters of Megiddo" (Judg. 5:19) would have obliterated a Canaanite barrier to the union of northern and central Israelite tribal units and contributed measurably to the eventual Israelite domination.

B. V.

DECALOGUE. See TEN COMMANDMENTS.

DECAPOLIS. The name given in the Gospels (Matt. 4:25; Mark 5:20; 7:31) to a region, mostly east of the Jordan River in Palestine, consisting originally of ten Greek cities, which formed a league for defense and fostering trade. The earliest list of these cities is contained in Pliny's Natural History, written in the late first century A.D. It includes the following: Hippo, Gadara, Pella, Philadelphia, Galasa (Gerasa), Dion, Canatha, Damascus, Raphana, and Scythopolis, which Josephus calls the largest of the Decapolis. The cities were founded shortly after Alexander the Great's conquest and reflected the culture of Greece in the construction of temples, theaters, amphitheaters, hippodromes, aqueducts, fora, colonnaded streets, and baths. The presence of swine there so near to Jewish territory is understandable in such a Hellenistic environment. Ptolemy, a geographer of the second century A.D., includes eighteen cities in the Decapolis.

J. R. M.

DECLENSION. Second-generation New England PURITANS experienced a decline in piety, "experimental" religion, or experiential faith, which led to difficult questions of church order because only those members who had "owned the covenant," or had a full conversion experience, were qualified for full church membership and the right to have their children baptized. Pastors preached jeremiads against this declension, but eventually solved the baptism problem in 1662 with the HALF-WAY COVENANT.

N. H.

DEDICATION, FEAST OF. See HANUKKAH.

DEDUCTION. A reasoning process defined from mathematical theory, arising in Pythagoras and finding its basic formulation in Euclid. Beginning with a fundamental concept, postulates are proposed and a theory deduced. The person is thus led step by step to accept the completed formulation as true. Philosophically this is deductive logic, and it reached a high form under the Scholastics of the Middle Ages with the use of the syllogism and the formal disputation. Thomas AQUINAS, in the Summa theologiae, sets forth a proposition, deduces a number of objections, follows this with replies to each objection, then briefly states the conclusion.

HEGEL's dialectic, with its movement from thesis to antithesis to synthesis, is a form of deductive reasoning. This method of thinking goes from the general to the particular, in contrast with inductive reasoning, the method of scientific inquiry, which goes from the particular (the experimental) to the general, the principle being stated after the presentation of experimental proof. Deductive reasoning is also used in language theory. I.C.

DEEP, THE. A semi-poetic term, used largely in the OT, with several applications, all connoting wet, unstable, unpleasant, even dangerous conditions, the positive contrast being the earth. The OT concept of the cosmos or world derives from its wider cultural environment. The Hebrews made use of their neighbors' mythology only in poetic ways. Otherwise they shared an overall, water-dominated picture of the world: (1) waters above the firmament; (2) heaven as the source of rain; (3) springs, rivers, lakes, and seas upon the earth; (4) the "fountain of the deep," that is, an ocean surrounding the earth; (5) waters under the earth; and (6) rivers of the underworld or Sheol.

Essential in any description of Hebrew thought of the deep is Genesis 1:2, where the chaotic matter God worked upon in creation was "the deep," "the waters." In Mesopotamian and Ugaritic thought, the sea, personified as Tiamat and Yam or Prince Sea, was rebellious to law and order, often hostile, even destructive. Hence the conclusion that human existence has been involved always in a cosmic struggle between order and chaos. In that struggle, terrifying watery things (the Deep, the Dragon) are hazardous and to be treated with awe and respect. P.L.G.

DEFENDER OF THE FAITH. A title bestowed on King Henry VIII of England by Pope Leo X in 1521 for Henry's Assertion of the Seven Sacraments against Luther's Babylonian Captivity (1520) attacking the Roman views. Parliament confirmed the title in 1544, making it traditional for England's rulers. C.M.

DE FIDE. In the Roman Catholic tradition a word that refers to the deposit of faith. Some truth is available to reason, for example, a knowledge that God exists. Other truth, such as the understanding of God as Trinity, is known only by faith. This comes from special revelation as a gift of God's grace. It is preserved and handed on through the teaching office of the church, the magisterium. I.C.

DEFROCK. Literally, to "unfrock," to remove the frock or outer gown that monks and friars wear. Used more extensively to refer to the act of involuntarily depriving any minister of his or her authority and functions, usually for reasons of unethical behavior or theological deviation. J.G.

DEISM. From the Latin word deus ("god"), the term is used both for a distinct belief about God and for a movement of the late seventeenth and the eighteenth centuries reflecting the religious views of the ENLIGHTENMENT. Deism teaches that God created the world but does not providentially guide or supernaturally intervene in nature or in human affairs. It is a belief of Deism that the world's intelligible order is demonstrable proof of an intelligent Creator and that reason alone is sufficient to deduce all that is necessary to know about God's nature and purpose. Deism rejects both ecclesiastical authority and special revelation. Worn out by the seventeenth-century Wars of Religion, European thinkers searched for a common religious foundation on which all rational people could agree. Since reasonable people could not agree on the interpretation of biblical revelation, the Deists sought to bring the truths of the Bible wholly within the sphere of natural reason. The "Father of Deism," Edward Herbert, the first baron of Cherbury (1583-1648), taught that everyone possesses five innate truths imprinted by God: (1) that God exists; (2) that God should be worshiped; (3) that the practice of virtue is the chief part of the worship of God; (4) that people have always abhorred evil and are under the obligation to repent of their sins; and (5) that there will be rewards and punishments after death.

Among the important Deist writers were JOHN TOLAND (1670-1722) and MATTHEW TINDAL (1655-1733) in England, VOLTAIRE (1694-1778) in France, H. S. REIMARUS (1694-1768) and G. E. LESSING (1729-81) in Germany, and Thomas PAINE (1737-1809) in America. In Christianity Not Mysteriorous (1696) Toland taught that, while religious truths may be made known to us by the testimony of others (revelation), they can never be mysterious or incomprehensible to reason once known. In Christianity as Old as Creation (1730), Tindal insisted that since God is perfect and all-wise, God's perfect religion cannot be altered or increased. It must then dispense its truth equally to everyone at all times. Some Deists, for example, Voltaire, Reimarus, and Paine, attacked orthodox Christianity, denouncing popular superstition, priestly intolerance, and biblical error. Deism in turn was criticized by DAVID HUME, JOSEPH BUTLER, and IMMANUEL KANT, but its legacy of reason, autonomy, toleration, and ethical seriousness lives on. J.L.

DEISSMANN, ADOLPH (1866-1937). A German scholar who demonstrated, on the basis of the discovery of Greek papyri in Egypt, that the language of the NT was the common Greek of the marketplace. J.R.M.

DELILAH. A Sorek Valley woman with a name meaning "flirt"—not a harlot (compare Judg. 16:1)—whom Samson loved. She enticed him and discovered "wherein his great strength lies," which was in his hair—it had never been cut. The Philistines seized and imprisoned Samson and paid Delilah with 5500 pieces of silver (about $1,200, Judg. 16:4-22).

P.L.G.

DELPHI, ORACLE OF. The most famous common sanctuary in ancient Greece, located on the slopes of Mount Parnassus. In classical times the Oracle of Delphi was a shrine to Apollo. This god was believed to give advice through an entranced priestess, the Pythia. The oracle had no small influence in political matters, although the ambiguity of many of its sayings was proverbial.

R.E.

DELUGE. See FLOOD.

DEMAS. A co-worker of Paul, mentioned only three times in the NT, unless the name be regarded as a shortened form of Demetrius and identified with the one in III John 12. An alternate spelling is Damas, a name worn by a bishop of Magnesia. He is mentioned favorably in Philemon 24 and Colossians 4:14 but later forsook Paul because of his love for worldly things (II Tim. 4:10).

J.R.M.

DEMETRIUS. (1) A silversmith of Ephesus. He was a maker of shrines of Artemis (Acts 19:24), the chief deity of the city, whose temple was considered one of the seven wonders of the ancient world. Paul's preaching against idolatry threatened Demetrius' business, so he led a protest against Paul in the theater. This theater still stands in a relatively good state of preservation.

(2) A man mentioned in III John 12. Perhaps he was a bearer of the letter to Gaius (v. 1), whom the author declares is one whose Christian life is witnessed to by all who knew him and by the truth itself. This is the only place he is mentioned in the NT, and there is no certain knowledge of him in early church history.

(3) Demetrius I Soter. He was the grandson of Antiochus the Great, and was king of Syria from 162 to 150 B.C. He was killed in battle by the forces of the Jewish Maccabean leader Jonathan in 150 B.C. The main sources of information for him are I Maccabees, Josephus, and some fragments of Polybius.

(4) Demetrius II Nicator. He was the elder son of Demetrius I and ruled Syria twice, from 145 to 139 B.C. and from 129 to 125 B.C. His exploits are recounted in I Maccabees and Josephus, including his conflicts with the Maccabees Jonathan and Simon and his assassination while trying to escape after a defeat in battle.

J.R.M.

DEMON. Demons or evil spirits play a major role in the NT, especially in the Synoptic Gospels. In parallelism to the later Jewish belief (after the Babylonian exile) that God has a host of angels, or good spirits, to work the divine will, the belief arose that Satan, the accuser and tempter of humankind, also had his malignant (demonic) angels to pursue his assaults on people. That these demons were connected to the occurrence of disease, such as deafness, dumbness, blindness, and epilepsy, is shown in Jesus' healing of these conditions by way of exorcism of demons in Mark 9:25; Luke 11:14-16; Matthew 12:22; Luke 9:39; and Mark 1:26. Both demonology and angelology seem to be ultimately based on ANIMISM, a primitive belief that nature and humankind are inhabited by many spirits, both good and evil.

Without doubt, the Synoptic Gospel account of Jesus' ministry is cast in the form of a confrontation between Jesus and the power of the kingdom of God, on one side, and SATAN and the kingdom of this world (the demons) on the other. The fact that the gospel is gospel, that is, good news, arises from Jesus' victory over Satan. This struggle and victory is illustrated by Jesus' parable about binding the strong man (Mark 3:27). Jesus pointed out to those who accused him of having supernatural powers because he was in league with Satan that Satan was not likely to give someone the power to overthrow his position of power in the world. Changing the metaphor, Jesus declared that no one could invade a strong man's house and despoil it unless he had first defeated and bound the strong man. Even so, since Jesus cast out demons and healed diseases, this activity proved that Jesus had defeated Satan. In Luke 10, upon the return of the seventy disciples from their preaching mission, the faithful rejoice because, "In your name, Lord . . . even the devils submit to us" (Luke 10:17 NEB). Jesus then tells them, "I watched how Satan fell, like lightning, out of the sky" (Luke 10:18 NEB). The very meaning of the gospel is that Jesus triumphed over Satan and the demons.

Cardinal Leon-Joseph Suenens recently addressed the question of demons and the presence of evil in the world in Renewal and the Powers of Darkness (Malines Document IV), speaking to a contemporary rise in belief in the devil and the resort to rites of exorcism among some charismatic groups. While Cardinal Suenens speaks to a Catholic context, his observations are applicable to Protestantism as well. He reflects:

If the Catholic Church clearly affirms the existence and influence of the Powers of Evil, her systematic theology nonetheless remains very guarded on this subject. If ever there was a domain that must be approached very soberly, as St. Paul advises, this is surely the one. We cannot even begin to describe the Devil except indirectly, by metaphors and the like. His strength lies in the very disguises he assumes; he is an illusionist by nature and the father of lies. Intrinsically and by definition, he is obscure. No one has ever seen the actual countenance of the Evil One, for he is a spiritual being, outside our reach, and known only as such through Revelation. . . . Therefore, it is all the more important to refrain from all exaggerations which could lead to obsessive psychosis. This would be the very negation of our Christian religion, which is Good News and the saving-grace of Christ's victory. (Ann Arbor; Servant Books, 1983 p. 77)

This is excellent advice for anyone interested in demons.

While the Hebrew conception of Satan developed rather late and is not fully developed in the canonical books of the OT, it does receive elaboration in the OT apocryphal books, especially the book of Enoch. Some of the apocryphal books suggested that the oppression of the Jews showed that the world was under the power of Satan. However, the kingdom of Satan will perish with the coming of the Messiah, who will inaugurate a new age of justice and peace. This development in late Judaism was limited to the apocalyptic writers; most respected rabbis paid little attention to demons or Satan. The apocalyptic writings were taken over, in the main, by the early Christians; hence demonology had far less development in Judaism than it did in Christianity.

In the book of Enoch, very influential on later Christian thought, Enoch is taken on a journey of inspection of the earth and Sheol (hell). Enoch sees the fallen state of people and concludes that evil was let loose in the world by the lust of the angels (sons of God) for the daughters of men (Gen. 6:4). Enoch makes it clear (which was not stated in Gen. 6:4), that these "sons of God" (in Hebrew, bene ha-elohim) are evil angels, or demons. Apocalyptic Judaism then went on to develop the hierarchy and names of the demonic hosts. At first, there were many different names for the devil: Belial, Mastema, Azazel, Satanail, Sammael, Semyaza, and Satan. Gradually all these names coalesced into one, Satan, the opposer, the accuser, or the obstructor. This was translated into the Greek, used in much apocalyptic literature, by the Greek word diabolos, or "adversary," and later into the Latin diabolus and the English DEVIL. Other apocalyptic books, such as the Book of Jubilees, the Testament of Reuben, and the Book of the Secrets of Enoch, develop the idea of evil angels or demons. The Secrets of Enoch specifically says the evil angels rebelled on account of pride.

The apocalyptic (non-canonical) development of demonology stands behind the generally accepted belief in demons of Jesus' day. All abnormalities and illnesses were credited to demonic influence. Mary Magdalene was said to have "seven demons" (Luke 8:2), and the poor wretch known as the Gadarene demoniac was reported to be infested with a legion (ten thousand) of demons (Luke 8:30). Jesus' powerful presence, stern words, and use of prayer (and sometimes fasting and a material element, as when he touched a man with his saliva) were effective in driving out the hold that belief in demons had upon the minds and bodies of the sufferers who came to him for help. The gospel was victorious over demons in his day and is still victorious over evil when men and women believe.

J.C.

DEMYTHOLOGIZATION. Demythologizing (German, Entmythologisierung) is a method of NT interpretation first expounded by RUDOLF BULTMANN in his essay "New Testament and Mythology" in 1941, and then developed in many subsequent writings. The presence of MYTH in the NT had, of course, long been recognized and was something of an embarrassment to liberal theology. Liberal theologians tended to ignore myth. Bultmann accuses HARNACK of reducing the NT proclamation to a few basic principles of religion and ethics. But the mythology, for example, the expectation of a speedy end to the age, enters so deeply into the NT that it cannot be simply ignored without serious mutilation.

On the other hand, Bultmann thinks that we live in a post-mythical age when talk of voices from heaven or an end of the world or an ascension into heaven have become meaningless in any literal way. Only by a kind of schizophrenia is it possible to believe reports of such happenings and yet at the same time make use of electric light, modern medicine, and all the other paraphernalia of scientific and technological society. So what is to be done? Bultmann's choice of the word "demythologizing" may have been unfortunate, for he is not proposing the elimination of myth, as the term might suggest. Rather, he is concerned to interpret it into a more meaningful language, for it is part of the proclamation. The first point then is to determine the true subject matter of myth. Because of its objectifying language and its narrative form, myth appears to be describing events that have happened or will happen "out there."

Bultmann believes that the primary function of mythology is to express a self-understanding. Myth comes from a period when abstract terms were little developed and human beings could reflect on their nature and destiny only by telling stories. A creation myth, for instance, is held by Bultmann to be an expression of human finitude and dependence. To interpret the mythology of the NT, it is necessary first to ask the right question—not "What happened?" but "With what possibility of existence does this present me?" or "Into what self-understanding does it bring me?"

In order that this question may be asked intelligently, it is necessary for the one who asks it to have some understanding of the structure of human existence and a language for discussing that structure. This is where EXISTENTIALISM comes in, especially the analysis of human existence given by MARTIN HEIDEGGER in Being and Time. Bultmann does not hesitate to call this the "right" philosophy for employment by the NT interpreter, but he acknowledges that there may be other descriptions of human existence that could serve the purpose as well as Heidegger's. To give an example of Bultmann's method, he sees the NT teaching that life is to be lived in the face of the end of the age as a mythological equivalent of Heidegger's insistence that our human existence is a being toward death, that is to say, an eschatological existence.

Bultmann denied that this would mean the reduction of the Christian proclamation to a philosophy of existence, for he believed that Christianity brings the offer of a grace that is not found in any philosophy and that God has spoken a decisive word in Jesus Christ.

He gave fresh relevance to some obscure teachings of the NT but left many questions unanswered. While some felt that his demythologizing had gone too far in a reductionist direction, others wanted to carry it much further, even to the elimination of God.

J.M.

DENARIUS. A Roman silver coin with an impression of Tiberius Caesar's head, the most frequently used coin in the first century A.D., and the most frequently mentioned in the NT, equivalent to the Greek DRACHMA. The coin was used to pay soldiers, was the daily wage of a laborer (Matt. 20:9-10, 13), and was used to pay Roman taxes (Matt. 22:19; Mark 12:15; Luke 20:24). It took two denarii to make the half shekel of the Jewish head tax (Matt. 17:27). Twenty-five silver denarii was equal to one gold denarius in the Roman Empire.

P.L.G.

DENOMINATIONALISM. A largely American system in which Protestant Christianity has been divided into competing groups. The term applies to a religious situation in which there are many religious groups, none with privileged legal status and each receiving equal treatment before the law.

Historically Christendom was considered a unity with Eastern and Western expressions. Western Christianity was unified around the Roman pontiff until the Reformation. Thereafter churches tended to be geographic: the Church of England, the Church of Scotland (Presbyterian), the Russian Orthodox church. A corollary is the parish system, whereby all who live in a geographic area are considered members of one central church and are taxed by the state to support that church. Whereas many countries have religious unity and political diversity, the United States has religious PLURALISM and a rather homogeneous two-party political system.

In colonial America Congregationalism was established in Massachusetts Bay and Anglicanism in Virginia and South Carolina, until the first and second Great Awakenings witnessed the beginning of the disestablishment of American Protestantism. In early American history American denominations were often American expressions of European divisions. Many denominations reflected the cultural and language distinctives of their native roots. Denominationalism has encouraged Christians to resolve conflicts by division rather than political compromise. In this century many divisions created by ethnic or language groupings and by the Civil War have been healed, only to have new divisions created by such issues as the "inerrancy of the original documents" of Scripture and the question of women's ordination.

The mobility of American society tends to make denominations competitive yet interchangeable. Theology in mainline Protestant churches has become homogenized. Even in smaller Evangelical churches, often founded in sharp theological disputes, lay people, and even pastors, ignore or downplay theological distinctions.

H. Richard Niebuhr called denominationalism "an unacknowledged hypocrisy" in the church, a compromise between Christianity and the world, an accommodation to "the caste system of human society." Certainly many American denominations today still represent such distinctions as class, race, and sexual orientation. Denominationalism has even been exported to many Third World countries by competing missionary efforts. (See also VOLUNTARISM.)

N.H.

DEPRAVITY. See ORIGINAL SIN.

DE PROFUNDIS. One of the seven penitential Psalms, named for its opening words in Latin, "Out of the depths" (Ps. 130:1). The Psalm probably dates from the Exile, and expresses the hopes of the exiled Jews to go up to Jerusalem. It is therefore called a GRADUAL or "going up" Psalm.

J.C.

DEPROGRAMMING. A process said to reverse the effects of "brainwashing" or mind control encountered in certain of the new religious CULTS. The theoretical basis of the process and its effect, if any, is controversial.

Deprogramming stems from a California layman, Ted Patrick, a state employee whose teenagers joined one of the new religions in the 1960s. Upset by this, Patrick determined to break the control he felt cult leaders exercised over his children. Pretending to join a group, Patrick's experience convinced him that rather than bringing about religious conversions, groups like the Unification Church actually "brainwashed" their recruits. Here Patrick pointed to the thought reform or brainwashing practiced on American prisoners of war during the Korean War by the Chinese Communists.

Assuming that cult members were brainwashed, Patrick set up a process of confrontation and challenge of the cultist's ideas, beliefs, and practices. He believed it was necessary to ask questions until the person ran out of "programmed ideas." Once that stage was reached, the mind would start thinking independently again; the cultist would see the contradictions inherent in cult belief and be psychologically free again.

Eventually, Patrick and others recommended to parents of cultists that they should kidnap (if necessary) their children and subject them to "deprogramming." The new religions, civil libertarians, and some clergy and professors of psychology, religion, and sociology, disputed the actuality of brainwashing and consequently the reality of deprogramming itself. This dispute continues. It appears that brainwashing and deprogramming are simplistic concepts that are said to work magically. But both processes may point to a reality in human experience, psychological conditioning. Camps in remote places, intensive study groups, and close personal attention—elements both of cult and church experience—do tend to condition (that is, to redirect consciousness) people into the likeness of the leaders doing the conditioning. Such a state decays over time unless it is reinforced. The discipline of cults and churches reinforces the original conditioning. It may also be possible to hasten the decay of conditioning and to recondition the person, directing the person to new ideas and values. Deprogramming may then be seen as reconditioning.

J.C.

DEPTH PSYCHOLOGY. See PSYCHOANALYSIS.

DERVISH. Persian term for a member of a Sufi (mystical) brotherhood; equivalent to the Arabic "fakir" (see SUFISM). In the early history of ISLAM, mysticism was limited to ascetic mendicants and small schools that had dispersed after their teachers died. Since the founding of the first permanent brotherhood in 1166, the number of brotherhoods has multiplied. Each claims that its secret teachings represent a special revelation, transmitted through a line of saints and teachers, so that its ritual is as orthodox as the ritual prayer (ṣalāt) that is one of the Five Pillars of Islam.

Dervish theology teaches that a person can have direct union or communion with God. Many brotherhoods have monasteries for study and retreat. Others, like the Kalanderis, wander constantly. Some Dervishes teach the concept, perhaps borrowed from Hinduism, that only God exists—that all is God.

The famous "whirling" of Dervishes is characteristic of the Mawlawi order, and is only one example of the use of ecstatic dance to cross the gulf between God and humans. A parallel could be drawn to Christian revival meetings, in which participants fall into trances or speak in tongues after hours of singing hymns and emotional tension.

K./M.C.

DESCARTES, RENÉ (1596–1650). French philosopher, mathematician, and scientist, often called the father of modern philosophy. Born into lesser nobility, at age eight he entered the Jesuits' La Flèche school in Anjou and later pursued law at Poitiers and higher studies at Paris. Descartes traveled widely and decided on a philosophical career in 1619. In 1629 he settled in Holland, soon achieving recognition for his mathematical prowess. He systematized and applied algebraic formulas to geometric figures and solids, thus founding analytic geometry. He believed all knowledge must have the certainty of mathematics and all less certain concepts must be strenuously doubted. This stance threatened accepted views of the church and state. In 1637 he published Philosophical Essays, containing his famous Discourse on Method and treatises on the principles of analytic geometry and the first statement of the laws of light refraction. Meditations on First Philosophy, 1641, and Principles of Philosophy, 1644, followed.

Descartes resolved to accept only demonstrably clear and distinct ideas as true. He began with Cogito, ergo sum, "I think, therefore I am." He could doubt everything, except the fact of his own thinking. From this he deduced his existence, and the existence of God and the physical universe as clearly necessary to a coherent whole. Descartes actually used variations of Anselm's and Aquinas' arguments for GOD'S EXISTENCE. God exists and is the cause of our idea of God. Mind and matter have their origin and unity in God. God gave matter its extension and motion. Descartes developed these ideas as clear and distinct truths. He depicted a mechanistic universe, started by God. The human mind, akin to God's, can then discover the laws that govern all substances by logically searching out everything step by step. The deepest mysteries of the universe can thus be unlocked. Humans live in an intelligible, mechanistic universe; God stands outside.

Descartes' philosophical method challenged scholasticism's methodology. His own self-consciousness—Cogito, ergo sum—heralded the primacy of consciousness and subjectivity in later philosophy. Leibniz, Locke, Berkeley, Hume, and Kant all felt his influence. Queen Christina invited him to Sweden in 1649, where he died in 1650.

C.M.

DESCENT INTO HELL. A number of early Christian authors taught that Jesus descended into hell (or perhaps only Hades) after his death and taught those who were imprisoned there. The purpose was to proclaim the gospel to them. Irenaeus, Justin Martyr, and Tertullian in the second century asserted that nothing happened in consequence. On the other hand, Clement of Alexandria, Origen, Athanasius, and Cyril of Jerusalem in the second to the fourth centuries argued that Jesus delivered some souls from this abode of the dead. Support for this was found in Matthew 27:52; Ephesians 4:9, and Acts 2:31 primarily, as well as in Ignatius' letter to the Magnesians (9:2). The earliest use of I Peter 4:6 and 3:18 (and following) in this connection seems to be in Cyprian's Testimonia in the mid-third century. The teaching is not in the earliest Western creeds preserved in Hippolytus' (about 215) and Marcellus' letters to Julius I (340) but appears for the first time about A.D. 400 in Rufinus' commentary on the Apostles' Creed used in Aquileia. He did not know the origin of the phrase himself, which suggests that it may have been introduced long before his time, perhaps the end of the second or beginning of the third century. The words were probably introduced to combat a Docetic heresy of the period that denied real humanity to Jesus. His descent into the abode of the dead would prove that he was human—possessing both a body and a soul. The phrase is not included in Eastern creeds or in many modern Reformed creeds such as the Westminster Confession of Faith.

J.R.M.

DESERT FATHERS. The collective name given to the founders of Egyptian MONASTICISM. In his Life of Anthony, Athanasius claims that ANTHONY was the first Egyptian monk; in a similar work Jerome claims that honor for Paul the Hermit. In truth, however, it is impossible to know who was the first of the thousands who left the cities in order to live in solitude and meditation in the Egyptian Desert. At first, these monks and nuns lived alone—in fact, the word “monk” means “solitary.” Soon, however, they began gathering in loosely bound communities. Eventually this gave birth to “cenobitic” communities, meaning “life in common” monasticism. The great figure in this development was PACHOMIUS, who set the pattern of cenobitic monastic life for centuries.

The sayings, acts, and legends of the Desert Fathers were gathered in a number of collections, and these in turn were used both for the training of new monks and for the edification of other Christians. The common themes of such collections are humility, chastity, asceticism, and trust in God.

J.G.

DESPAIR. The absence of hope. Since it may be doubted whether any human being can go on living without some minimum of hope, it is questionable whether complete despair is ever found. Everything that we do is aimed at some future goal and therefore carries with it the expectation that, even if we are most likely to fail, there is at least a bare chance of achievement. Thomas Aquinas gave a very low-key description of hope when he wrote, “Hope’s object is a good that lies in the future and that is difficult but possible to attain.” Marcel has drawn attention to the universal prevalence of “low-order” hopes and takes it to be evidence of a virtually universal implicit faith in the worthwhileness of human existence. If this vague but widespread hopefulness were entirely lacking, then it is hard to see how anyone could be motivated to engage in any course of action whatever. An utter black despair would mean the end of the road and, perhaps, suicide.

One has therefore to be critical in reading the rhetoric of despair, especially philosophies that despair about the human condition. Bertrand Russell wrote that “only on the firm foundation of unyielding despair can the soul’s habitation be safely built.” This is romantic and self-contradictory. No positive achievement is possible on the basis of a genuine despair, and Russell could only write this because he hoped that in spite of the “alien and inhuman world,” people can still achieve certain values. There is a similar romanticism in CAMUS, who counsels “metaphysical rebellion” against the scheme of things. Such rebellion is possible only if there is the hope of achieving something worthwhile. Russell was more realistic than Camus, for he advised against “impotent rebellion” and spoke rather of resignation. Perhaps the true wisdom here is to know what things cannot be changed and to accept them with resignation, and to know what can be changed and to approach these things with hope.

Perhaps SARTRE, in his early writings, is the philosopher who has most realistically grasped the consequence of a genuine despair. That consequence is indifference, so that, as he put it, it does not matter whether one leads the nations or gets drunk by oneself in a bar. But we find Sartre belying his own philosophy by engaging in political activity. He talks about the other side of despair, and this suggests that despair is never complete, but that we have to despair of some things in order to discover a reliable ground of hope. (See also ANXIETY.)

J.M.

DETERMINISM. The view that all human actions are the effects of earlier events that “caused” them, just as events in nature are causally linked together. In the case of human actions, many such causes may be at work, such as heredity, environment, psychological factors, or the chemistry of the body. Such a theory seems to contradict common sense, since most people believe that they have freely chosen their courses of action, perhaps after prolonged deliberation over alternatives. On the other hand, common sense also makes us look for causal connections in the world around us, so why should there be an exception in the case of human actions?

Arguments to prove the reality of either FREE WILL or determinism have always been inconclusive. Reflection on the human condition leads to the conclusion that there are in fact many factors in any human being that shape one’s actions one way or another. These include genetic makeup, the level of intelligence, predispositions of emotion and desire; then all that arises from environment and upbringing, relations to parents, the values and pressures of the society in which one lives; then there are the many physical constraints arising from the body. There may in fact be very little scope left for free choice, and the extreme determinist would declare it to be an illusion.

However, the fact that universally people are praised or blamed, rewarded or punished, for their actions, indicates that in fact the great majority believe that there is an element of free choice in human behavior. As Kant showed, although there is no theoretical argument that could establish the freedom of the will, it is a postulate or presupposition of all morality. It would be senseless to say that one ought to do anything or that society ought to promote certain values if all human actions are determined by factors outside of our control. It should be noted that similar considerations hold for the exercise of thought. All scientific inquiry depends on our power to make rational judgments, and these are assumed to be based on the discrimination of truth and falsity, not on the operation of heredity, chemistry, etc. Without the freedom of rational judgment, argument becomes impossible. The determinist's own view is not something one has chosen to believe on rational grounds, but the effect of various hidden causes. Like many other forms of skepticism, it is finally self-destroying.

Like many other philosophical disputes, that between the rival views of free will and determinism has some truth on both sides. From the moment of birth or before, every human life is already largely determined by factors that the person in question has not chosen, which will predispose that person in one way or another. Yet, if we are talking about people, not just puppets or highly complex machines, we must also suppose that there is room for a measure of self-determination, in which the people concerned have a share in shaping the raw material of their personalities and of deciding between the alternatives open to them.

J.M.

DEUS EX MACHINA. Literally "God from a machine." The phrase is derived from classical dramas. When a difficult situation emerged, stage machinery brought in a god or goddess to resolve the problem. By implication the term is used whenever any falsely contrived apparatus of thinking or acting is introduced to resolve an argument or clarify a situation. It suggests a deliberate manipulation of the situation.

I.C.

DEUTERO- A Greek prefix meaning "second," for example, "Deuteronomy," the second law (the Law given on Mount Sinai regarded as the first). Scholars use the title Deutero-Isaiah to designate chapters 40-66 of Isaiah.

P.L.G.

DEUTEROCANONICAL BOOKS. See APOCRYPHA.

DEUTERO-ISAIAH. See ISAIAH.

DEUTERONOMY. A name derived from the Septuagint, the Greek translation of the OT, where the Hebrew phrase "a copy of this law" (Deut. 17:18) was mistranslated "second law" (deuteronomion). This fifth book of the Bible, known in Hebrew as 'elleh haddebarim ("these are the words") after its opening phrase, offers the farewell testament of Moses to the Israelites encamped in western Moab prior to his death and their crossing the Jordan River to claim the Land of Promise. With its sustained exhortation geared to engender in the Israelite faithful a fervent love for the Deity and strict adherence to covenant law, Deuteronomy issues a word of specific guidance for Israel's daily existence in the land that will imminently be its possession.

Organization and Basic Content. (a) Moses' first address (1:6-4:40). Deuteronomy actually contains three addresses by Moses. The first reviews main events between Israel's departure from Mount Horeb (the Deuteronomic name for SINAI) and its arrival in MOAB. Special mention is made of the spies' reconnaissance of the land, Israel's failure to overtake Canaan from the south, and its successful occupation of Transjordan. A shift from historical recapitulation to exhortation is evident in 4:1 as Moses urges the people to obey the benevolent Deity who is sovereign over history.

(b) Moses' second address (chaps. 5-28). This lengthy section opens with the TEN COMMANDMENTS (5:6-21, at some variance with Exod. 20:2-17) and continues with a meditation on the meaning of the First Commandment as fundamental to the rest. In chapters 12-26 specific ordinances are expounded in a less than orderly manner. Still, 12:1-16:17 deals mainly with correct worship and 16:18-18:22 with Israelite officials (judges, kings, priests, prophets). Issues dominating the legislation in chapters 19-26 include criminal law, the waging of holy war, and general humanitarian concerns. Chapter 27 is intrusive with its directives for a covenant ceremony at Shechem on the twin peaks of Mount Gerizim and Mount Ebal (implemented in Josh. 8:30-35). An emphatic termination is reached in chapter 28, with its ample listing of blessings for obedience and curses for disobedience.

(c) Moses' third address (29:2-30:20). Here Moses summons Israel to renew its covenant with Yahweh and admonishes that disobedience will thrust it into exile (29:22-29), though after repentance Yahweh will restore Israel (30:1-10). A climax is achieved in 30:15-20, where Israel's acceptance or rejection of the covenant is presented as a life or death matter.

(d) Appendixes (chaps. 31-34). Deuteronomy concludes with diverse material including Moses' final charge to the people and to Joshua (31:1-8), Moses' deliverance of the written law to the Levitical priests (31:9-13), Joshua's commissioning (31:14-23), the Song of Moses (32:1-43) contrasting Israel's infidelity with Yahweh's fidelity, the blessing of Moses pronounced on the Israelite tribes (33:2-29), and the narrative about Moses' death (chap. 34).

Composition. As now edited, Deuteronomy presents Moses' polished oratory to an attentive laity. Ordinance and persuasive argumentation intermingle as the law is "explained" (1:5) to listeners who hopefully will be moved to obedience. The nucleus of Deuteronomy lies in the ancient laws contained in the Deuteronomistic Code (chaps. 12-26; 28), many of which are identifiable in the earlier Covenant Code of the Elohist (Exod. 20:22-23:19). Affinities with Hosea's oracles and the Elohist sections of the Pentateuch, along with Shechem's prominence (11:26-32; 27:1-26), speak for a northern origin of this legislation. Long active in the town and country regions of northern Israel, the Levites are ordinarily regarded as the primary authors of Deuteronomy. These teachers were the custodians of wide-ranging legal, political, and cultic traditions originating within premonarchic Israel. With the Assyrian takeover of the northern kingdom in 722 B.C., the dispossessed Levites presumably brought the traditions to Judah, where they were modified.

Deuteronomy's multi-faceted legislation was undoubtedly gathered up on several occasions, with Hezekiah's reform program near 700 B.C. (II Kings 18:1-6) being perhaps the most crucial. Since Josiah's reform was significantly informed by the discovery in 622 B.C. of "the book of the law" (II Kings 22-23) a document roughly equivalent with the Deuteronomistic Code, the legislation likely achieved its present shape not long before.

The full story about Deuteronomy's composition is necessarily complex. The manifestly late law prohibiting sacrificial worship except at one central sanctuary, which prominently heads the Deuteronomistic Code (12:5-7), emanates from Judean circles. Deuteronomistic affinities with biblical and extra-biblical wisdom literature reflect the impact of Judean court sages and scribes. Thus Deuteronomy's emphasis on the fear of Yahweh (synonymous with wisdom) and pervasive humanitarianism readily betray wisdom influence. Moreover, the two liturgical poems in chapters 32-33 enjoyed a long independent existence prior to their incorporation into the Deuteronomistic corpus. As prologue material, 1:1-4:43 and 4:44-11:32 may function differently, with the latter introducing the Deuteronomistic law itself, and the former prefacing the comprehensive, unified Deuteronomistic history, which unfolds in Joshua, Judges, Samuel, and Kings. Finally, Deuteronomy manifests some post-Josian expansion and revision.

Religious Message. (a) The God who favors Israel. Deuteronomy celebrates a Deity who in incomparable majesty lovingly chose Israel for a special covenant purpose. Yahweh's uniqueness is best stated in the SHEMA, "Hear, O Israel: the Lord our God is one Lord" (6:4). Accordingly, idolatry is particularly odious, since "the Lord is God in heaven above and on the earth beneath; there is no other" (4:39). In an act of unlimited love, Yahweh delivered Israel from Egyptian bondage, claimed it as Yahweh's own in the law-giving moment at Horeb, and intends to give it the land of Canaan. The unmerited character of that love is persistently acknowledged, for when it comes to size (7:7), self-sufficiency (8:17), and righteous instincts (9:4-6), Israel has no advantage. Notwithstanding Israel's backsliding tendencies, Yahweh is determined to fulfill the earlier promise to the fathers (7:8; 10:15). Defying human comprehension (4:32), that election love is sufficient to meet the people's every need as they penetrate Canaan. Through the institution of holy war (20:1-4), which finds Yahweh leading the Israelite host, the land will slowly but steadily be conquered (7:22), thus permitting God's elect to pursue in Canaan that life to which they have been exclusively called.

(b) Israel's response. As a superb revision of the Mosaic faith into the idiom of the seventh century B.C., Deuteronomy lucidly expresses Yahweh's expectation of the elect. The results of past apostasy are readily apparent—a ruptured monarchy, the demise of northern Israel, and southern Judah given to compromise when the international climate threatens. Accordingly, Israel is challenged anew to turn fully to Yahweh with heart, soul, and might (6:5) and to take seriously the will of Yahweh, who has graciously caused the divine name to dwell among Israel (12:5). By resolutely resisting all enticements toward apostasy, ever favoring the needy (notably, the sojourner, fatherless, and widow) with compassion (24:19-21), and remembering the divine mandate that Israel actively pursue "justice, and only justice" (16:20), Israel will even yet realize its own uniqueness, which is anchored in the God who has chosen it.

J.K.K.

DEVA. From the Sanskrit word for "a shining being," that is, a god (compare Latin Deus). In Vedic HINDUISM particularly, this term refers collectively to the bright celestial gods to whom prayer and sacrifice are offered, and who are engaged in battle with the ASURAS. In later Hinduism, the term, taken to indicate a class of finite nature and weather deities, is contrasted with the saving or Ishvara gods of BHAKTI.

R.E.

DEVIL. The personal power of evil in the world, SATAN, or the accuser, the obstructor, or the tempter (from the Hebrew, Satan, and the Greek diabolos and daimonion). In a more general sense, a devil or DEMON, an evil spirit, believed, in Jesus' time, to fill the world, causing illness, physical and mental.

A devil is a parallel to an ANGEL. The belief that the world was full of helpers sent by God (angels) and enemies sent by Satan (devils) grew out of Israel's exposure first to Canaanite culture, and later to the experience of the exiles in the Babylonian captivity. It was easy for the Hebrews to understand the pagan gods (Baalim) as demons, as idolatry became tempting to many. Much later, in the sixth century B.C., upper-class Hebrews, including priests and prophets like Ezekiel, were exposed to the Persian religion that saw the universe as a battleground between a good God and an evil god (Ahura Mazda and Ahiriman). The divine power of EVIL, Ahiriman, may be the model for the later Jewish concept of Satan, whom Jesus refers to as "the prince of the power of the air."

The devil, or Satan, is found in the OT in Job 1-2 and Zechariah 3:1. In the NT, the devil is shown as always in opposition to God, and the prince of this world (John 12:31; 14:30; 16:11), who heads a demonic kingdom, which the kingdom of God defeats through the ministry and sacrifice of Jesus Christ, and which will be finally destroyed at the Last Judgment.

J.C.

DEVOTIO MODERNA. The Latin words for "Modern Devotion," a fourteenth-century spiritual revival in the Netherlands, southwestern Germany, Switzerland, France, and Italy. It stressed individual devotion, mystical meditation, and acts of charity. The revival developed during the century of the Babylonian Captivity (the removal of the papacy to Avignon, France) and the Great Schism (rival popes in Rome and Avignon vying for control of Christendom). Many ordinary people felt the need for reform and more dedicated living, and expressed this in the Modern Devotion. It fostered direct contact with God and often passed beyond righteous deeds to ecstatic visions and union with God. It had little to do with church sacraments and rituals. Gerhard Groot and Florentius Radewyn of the BROTHERS OF THE COMMON LIFE are linked with its beginnings. Others associated with the movement include John Tauler, Friends of God, Henry Suso, John Ruysbroeck, and Thomas à Kempis. Kempis' IMITATION OF CHRIST is acclaimed by some to be one of the most influential works of early Christian literature. His writings well represent the Modern Devotion movement of the fourteenth century. Loosely organized and having a practical, mystical turn, it drew strength from its wide acceptance among the common people and the secular clergy. Without intending to do so, the Modern Devotion spread a negative view of the institutional church.

C.M.

DEVOTION. See SPIRITUALITY.

DEVOUT LIFE, INTRODUCTION TO THE. One of the world's most popular books on religious devotion. Written by Bishop FRANCIS OF SALES (1567-1622), it figured prominently in the Catholic revival after the Council of Trent. Produced in 1609 as a small spiritual guide for Madame de Charmoisy, it received definitive form in 1619, went through hundreds of editions, and was translated into most of Europe's languages. Designed for people in every vocation and status in life, it contends that devotion (a true love of God) can be practiced amid worldly distractions, but not without ordered discipline. It starts with humanity, full of defects, but created in God's image, and calls for repentance, prayer, and trust in God's grace, for divine mercy will respond to our efforts. It also gives practical guidance for purging away evil inclinations and letting love reign supreme. Calvinists barred Francis from his Genevan bishopric, but his writings won thousands to Catholicism.

C.M.

DEWEY, JOHN (1859-1952). Philosopher, psychologist, and educator born in Burlington, Vermont, and graduated from the University of Vermont. He received the Ph.D. from Johns Hopkins University and taught at the universities of Minnesota (1888-89), Michigan (1889-94), Chicago (1894-1904), and at Columbia University (after 1904). At the University of Chicago, he was a professor of philosophy and psychology. There he established an experimental school and wrote School and Society (1899), developing his pragmatic approach, known in educational circles as instrumentalism.

His important philosophical works were written during the years at Columbia. His output was enormous. A few well-known titles are Democracy and Education, 1916; How We Think, 1909, and A Common Faith, 1934. He affirmed that theory and practice are interrelated, and that moral and social beliefs and actions can be changed for the better. The idea of "learning by doing," attributed to him, inspired a new flexibility in education and more space for individual student inquiry. Later this theory brought criticism from those who protested that he neglected "basics" and "discipline."

He was active in such social causes as the movement to outlaw war that eventuated in the Kellogg-Briand Pact; founder and first president of the American Association of University Professors; a charter member of the first teacher's union in New York City; held offices in the American Civil Liberties Union and the League for Industrial Democracy. He also frequently wrote and was a well-known spokesman for "progressive" education. He is recognized as one of the giants in American education and philosophy.

I.C.

DHAMMAPADA. From the Pali word for "Path of True Doctrine." A popular collection of sayings attributed to the BUDDHA. Being a part of the Pali canon of Buddhist scriptures, the Tripitika, assembled by the first century B.C., the Dhammapada is an anonymous collection of favorite aphorisms garnered from other parts of the scripture and popular Buddhist wisdom. Somewhat differing versions exist in Sanskrit, Chinese, and other languages.

The Dhammapada owes its great popularity to its presentation of BUDDHISM in cheerful and simple (though not shallow) lines, which make its profoundest insights accessible to laypeople and monks alike. It emphasizes that suffering is the result of a polluted mind, and the Buddhist path as a way of restraint of mind that leads to great happiness and an ethic of nonviolence, which conquers evil with love. "Hatred is never appeased by hatred in this world; by love alone is it appeased" (v. 5).

Buddhism, especially as presented in the Pali scriptures, can sometimes appear a rather austere path, but the Dhammapada makes it clear that on the other side of the great renunciations it inculcates lies great joy, the joy of all who have been able to learn the secret of having nothing yet possessing all things. "Let us live happily, hating none in the midst of men who hate. Let us live happily, free from disease. Let us live happily, free from care. Let us live happily, we who possess nothing. Let us dwell feeding on joy like the Radiant Gods" (vv. 197-200).

The Dhammapada has been immensely influential in the Buddhist world over more than twenty centuries. Monks and laypeople alike have memorized all or parts of it in great numbers, and it has often been used as a basic educational text. Its perusal is indispensable to understanding the attitudes and appeal of Buddhism as it really is.

R.E.

DHARMA. Dharma is among the most complex and significant of all concepts in the Indian intellectual vocabulary. Its patterns of meaning within Hindu, Buddhist, and Jain thought provide invaluable insights into fundamental connections made by the Indian world view.

The core meaning of dharma, [from the root dhr, "support, bear," and related to the English word form] is "structure or form." But that denotation is always closely aligned to another basic Sanskrit concept, satya or truth. Dharma always means the true structure or form of anything: the form which most truly reveals the underlying reality, the form as seen by one who sees truly, the forms of thought or behavior that best articulate truth or help one to be in rapport with it.

As far back as the RIG VEDA, dharma most commonly refers to that which upholds rita, the cosmic order. Rituals were believed to directly maintain dharma and express its nature. Codes of conduct were made to comply with its principles, and as a result the individual was brought into oneness with true reality. As Indian thought developed, dharma expanded in meaning to embrace cosmic, social, and moral principles in the broadest senses. It means "natural law," the patterns by which the universe operates. It means "social law," including the division of human society into its basic classes or castes with their distinctive duties and rites, since to the Indian mind society was viewed as organic and continuous with nature. And it means "righteousness," personal ritual, and moral behavior, that is, the following of one's svadharma or individual dharma, which best accords with the social and cosmic dharma.

The classical literature of HINDUISM often refers to categorized ends or putative goals of human life. In earlier texts these are threefold, kama or pleasure, artha or gain, and dharma. Dharma, living righteously in harmony with ultimate reality through fulfilling one's social and ritual obligations, is the superior, indeed supreme, goal of life, giving an ultimate satisfaction pleasure and gain cannot. Here dharma means something very close to "religion." Later texts, however, add a fourth goal, MOKSHA, "liberation." In this context, dharma comes to mean the structures of this world that are good and the righteousness, with its spiritual fulfillment available to the householder, also good. But now both goods in the realm of dharma are to be contrasted to the supreme liberation, which the renunciant finds beyond all structures and forms whatsoever.

In BUDDHISM, dharma has three distinct meanings. First, it refers to the basic teachings of the religion, including morality, the Buddha's "gospel." Second, it indicates the Ultimate Reality of the universe beyond all known forms altogether, as in the MAHAYANA term dharmakaya, the most transcendent of the trikaya, the three "bodies" or forms of expression of the universal Buddha nature. Dharmakaya as ineffable cosmic Absolute is virtually equivalent to NIRVANA or the VOID. Third, dharma refers to the basic constituents of the universe—the irreducible, indefinable elements that arise to give it form.

These three meanings, however diverse, have something in common. They each point to a true, undistorted perception: the true teaching, the true inexpressible universe, the true elements of reality. To put it another way, a dharma is how any level of reality would be seen by a Buddha, a fully enlightened being.

In JAINISM, dharma refers, as elsewhere, to true teaching. But it also indicates the principle of activity that keeps the universe and the souls within it moving. It is contrasted, in that context, with adharma, the principle of rest to which souls strive and achieve upon liberation.

R.E.

DIALECTICAL THEOLOGY. Although this expression has been used chiefly of the theology of KARL BARTH and others who participated in the theological renaissance of the 1920s, the theological employment of dialectic goes back to a much earlier time. Truth is rarely simple or one-sided, and dialectic consists in giving weight to opposing aspects of truth and attempting to reconcile them in a higher, more inclusive truth. Around the year A.D. 500, the mystical theologian Dionysius the Areopagite already was teaching that every assertion about God must be both affirmed and denied. For instance, if one says, "God exists," one must also say, "God does not exist," for his existence is of quite a different order from that of any finite entity. Dionysius then went on to assert that "God superexists," where "superexistence" denotes the incomprehensible mode of being that belongs to God and transcends the difference between existence and non-existence.

One finds similar teaching in later theologians in the mystical tradition, such as Nicholas of Cusa (fifteenth century), who taught that God is the "coincidence of opposites" (coincidentis oppositorum) and that this is not a destructive contradiction because the logic of the infinite is different from the logic of the finite, a point that he illustrated from mathematics. HEGEL's whole philosophy was built on a dialectical basis, and this is reflected in KIERKEGAARD, who, though he rejected Hegel's attempted reconciliation of opposites, continued to teach the clash of opposites, which he called "PARADOX" rather than dialectic. Kierkegaard was one of the influences at work on Barth in the new dialectical theology, which found perhaps its most powerful expression in his commentary on Romans. Nineteenth-century theology, Barth believed, had humanized and rationalized Christian faith. But the Word of God comes breaking in from outside our human culture. It cannot be reconciled with human ideas, but has a logic of its own in which God speaks both a yes and a no. Along with Barth may be mentioned Thurneysen, Brunner, Bultmann, Gogarten, and Tillich as theologians who, for at least part of their careers, were adherents of dialectical theology.

J.M.

DIANA OF THE EPHESIANS. The Latin name, not in the NT, of the Roman goddess identified with the Greek Artemis (Acts 19:27). Her temple in Ephesus was one of the seven wonders of the ancient world; her statues were found in excavations having multiple breasts (or dates), suggesting fertility.

J.R.M.

DIASPORA. The scattered members of a religious community separated from the main body of fellow believers either in the same country or in another country. The concept of a diaspora arose after 722 B.C., when Israel fell to Assyria, and 586 B.C., when Judah was conquered by Babylonia and many Jews were carried away into EXILE. Even with the restoration of Jerusalem to the Jews under Ezra and Nehemiah after 539 B.C., by edict of Cyrus the Great, a diaspora community continued. Not all of the Jews in Babylon returned to Judah, and even at the time of Christ many Jews remained in Mesopotamia, Egypt, Asia Minor, Syria, and had spread into Europe to

Courtesy of the Jewish Publication Society of America

Map showing the dispersion of Jews in the first century of the Christian Era

Rome. The great Greek city of Alexandria alone had one million Jewish residents.

The Roman-Jewish War of A.D. 66–70 ended in the destruction of the Jerusalem Temple and the Jewish state, and a new wave of Jews joined the diaspora community. Some Jews remained in Judah, now part of the Roman province of Syria, and, under the messianic preaching of BarKochba, these Jews revolted against Rome. At this time the Romans decimated the Jews, sowed the site of Jerusalem with salt, and built a Roman city on Mount Zion. From this point, until the creation of Israel in 1947, Judaism existed only as a diaspora.

While Judaism is the classic example and model for a diaspora, it is by no means the only diaspora in history. Various sects of Christianity, Islam, Hinduism, Buddhism, and Shintoism are now scattered over the face of the earth. While diaspora is a specifically religious concept, it is often concretely realized in historical, ethnic groups. The Scotch-Irish, for example, are a diaspora of Protestantism, settled in a Celtic, Roman Catholic land. The settlement of the New World in the sixteenth and following centuries made the Americas the location of many diasporas. In time, New York City came to have the world's greatest density of Jews.

The consciousness of being a diaspora is deep in many religious traditions at various times. The early Christians, as they spread from Jerusalem and Antioch to Asia Minor and Greece and on to Rome, saw themselves in terms of a scattered family of God dwelling in countries that were not really their homes. Paul spoke of Christians as living colonies of heaven. For him, the home country was the kingdom of God. During the period A.D. 33–312, while Christianity was spreading through the Roman Empire, this diaspora awareness was strong. After Constantine removed the legal disabilities Christianity suffered, the church gradually became established, and the diaspora feeling faded away. It was still present in Augustine, however, who contrasted the city of God (the catholic church) with the city of man (the empire) in his famous philosophy of history, The City of God.

A key notion included in the concept of diaspora is that the scattered believers remain in contact with the official leaders of the religious body. During the time after the return of the Jews to Jerusalem and the rebuilding of the second Temple under the preaching and leadership of Ezra and Nehemiah, the Jews in other countries came to Jerusalem at Passover and regularly paid a Temple tax. This custom is seen in the life of Paul as recounted in Acts. Of course, for Paul, as for Augustine, Christians remained in touch with their true King, Jesus Christ, through prayer and the sacraments, especially the Eucharist.

Almost every religion or sect exists as a minority in many lands, although it may form a majority in one country or other geographical region. While there are millions of Hindus in India, they form small minorities in North and South America, and larger minorities in many African countries. The same is true of Buddhists and Confucianists, especially among the millions of ethnic Chinese scattered all over Southeast Asia, Indonesia, the Philippines, Hawaii, Canada, and the United States. More recently, Koreans and Vietnamese have joined this diaspora.

After the outbreak of hostilities between Catholics and Protestants following the Reformation, the concept of diaspora was used for Catholic minorities living in Protestant territories and for Protestant minorities living in Catholic lands. Gradually, most German states and cities became predominantly Catholic or Protestant, and Dissenters were encouraged or forced to move away.

Although Christianity, as a whole, is no longer conscious of being a diaspora faith, and despite the era of warm ecumenical cooperation, Christianity, worldwide, is becoming more and more a minority. It would be realistic, as well as biblically sound, for the church to reclaim the Pauline insight that the followers of Christ form colonies of heaven. Those who follow Jesus are pilgrims and strangers on earth, a diaspora wherever they may reside.

J.C.

DIATESSARON. The first attempt to harmonize the four Gospels, composed by TATIAN in the second century. Although the original was probably in Greek, it was translated into Syriac at an early date and became the standard Gospel for the Syriac-speaking church. It held this position until the fifth century, when the Syrian church began using the four Gospels, which by then were used by the rest of the church. Although the actual text of the Diatessaron has been lost, it is possible to reconstruct it from a number of fragmentary sources, commentaries, and partial translations. The fact that Tatian chose precisely the four canonical Gospels as the basis for his Diatessaron indirectly testifies to the widespread acceptance of those four Gospels over any of their rivals that were beginning to circulate in Tatian's time. Thus, the Diatessaron itself provides an important link in the history of the CANON of the NT.

J.G.

DIBELIUS, MARTIN (1883–1947). The German biblical scholar was born in Dresden and studied at Neuchatel, Leipzig, Berlin, and Tübingen. He taught at Berlin (1910–15) and Heidelberg (1915–47). Building on the work of HARNACK and GUNKEL, he coined the term formgeschichte and developed NT FORM CRITICISM, though more conservatively than his followers. His writings include From Tradition to Gospel (Eng. ed. 1934) and Gospel Criticism and Christology (1935).

N.H.

DIDACHE. A document of uncertain date usually included among the APOSTOLIC FATHERS. Its fuller title is Teaching (or Didache) of the Twelve Apostles. It was discovered in Istanbul in 1875, and was probably written in Syria late in the first century or early in the second, although scholars are not in complete agreement on these matters. Its sixteen chapters can be divided into three sections. The first is similar to material found in the EPISTLE OF BARNABAS, and scholars usually refer to it as the "Document of the Two Ways." It is an admonition to follow the "way of life" rather than the "way of death."

The second section deals with worship and includes some of the earliest extant instructions for the celebration of baptism and Holy Communion. Baptism is to be done "in living water"—that is, running water. But if water is scarce, it can also be done by pouring water over the head three times in the name of the Father, the Son, and the Holy Spirit. The chapters on Communion are subject to various interpretations, for it is not clear whether the celebration is part of a "love feast" or not. There is also a reference to Communion as a "sacrifice," although this probably means that the act itself is a sacrifice that the believers present to God.

The last part of the Didache is a manual of Discipline, dealing with several practical issues in the life of the church. Foremost in the author's mind is the problem of distinguishing between true and false prophets. The moralism of this last section has led some critics to declare that the Didache falls far below the level of the NT or even some of the other Apostolic Fathers.

J.G.

DIET OF WORMS. From January 28 to May 26, 1521, an imperial German Diet summoned by Emperor Charles V. On April 18 LUTHER gave his "Here I Stand" speech, taking Scripture and right reason as his authorities and refusing to retract any writings. The Edict of Worms, May 26, placed Luther under the imperial ban (see REFORMATION).

C.M.

DILTHEY, WILHELM (1833–1911). The German philosopher of history and culture studied at Heidelberg and Berlin and taught at Basel (1866–68), Kiel (1868–71), Breslau (1871–82), and Berlin (1882–1911). The virtual creator of the philosophy of history, he saw all historical phenomena as expressions of human experience, inwardly understood before being scientifically analyzed. He stressed the differences in method between the physical sciences and the "human sciences" used to study culture, art, and religion. He opposed determinism and emphasized human creativity and dynamism. He was influenced by Schleiermacher, and in turn he influenced religion primarily through Troeltsch.

N.H.

DING-AN-SICH. A phrase from IMMANUEL KANT's philosophy. Literally, the "thing-in-itself" is the inner reality, the interior core of truth, which is recognized as real but incapable of being appropriated by the beholder. Thus in Kantian metaphysical philosophy we can "never transcend the limits of possible experience," yet all metaphysical thought seeks to reach the thing-in-itself.

I.C.

DIOCESE. A territorial division of the Roman Catholic, Episcopal (Anglican), and Old Catholic churches, presided over by a bishop ruling in his own right. It is called an eparchy in the Eastern Orthodox Church. It is "that portion of God's people entrusted to a bishop," according to Vatican II.

J.C.

DIOCLETIAN (245–313). A Dalmatian of humble origin, probably of slave parentage, he became Roman Emperor in A.D. 284 after a distinguished career in the army. He was made emperor by his fellow soldiers after the murder of the preceding emperor Numerian. He was an efficient civil administrator and effected a financial and administrative reorganization of the empire. In order to stop the frequent depositions of emperors by the military, he emphasized the divine sanctity of emperors and appointed three co-emperors to serve with him: Maximian, Galerius, and Constantius I Chlorus. They effectively divided the empire among them, Diocletian ruling Illyricum (his home country of Dalmatia), Egypt, and the east from his residence in the city of Nicomedia. Although he generally followed the example of his predecessor in granting religious toleration, he was swayed by the wishes of Galerius, a thoroughgoing pagan, and inaugurated an extremely severe persecution against Christians near the end of his reign. His first general edict was issued on February 23, 303, demanding that all copies of the Scriptures be surrendered and burned, churches closed, Christian meetings discontinued, and clergy imprisoned. In A.D. 304 a fourth edict required everyone to sacrifice to the Roman gods under pain of torture. This persecution ceased in the West after the forced abdication of Maximian in 305, due to the retirement of Diocletian on May 1 of that year. It continued in the East intermittently until the probable year of the death of Diocletian and the year in which CONSTANTINE, the new emperor, gave Christianity full legality.

J.R.M.

DIOGNETUS, EPISTLE TO. A document usually counted among the APOSTOLIC FATHERS, although in its nature and purpose it should be classified among the APOLOGISTS. Although some scholars disagree, it probably dates from the second century. Diognetus, to whom this writing is addressed, is completely unknown. The style is elegant, and the writer shows deep appreciation for Hellenistic culture and civilization. The central argument is that Christians surpass pagans in the quality of their behavior. "They obey the prescribed laws, and at the same time surpass the laws by their lives. They love all, and by all are persecuted." In conclusion, says our unknown author, Christians are to the world what the soul is to the body.

J.G.

DIONYSIUS THE GREAT. Bishop of Alexandria in the mid-third century. He was particularly noted for his theology, which he derived from his teacher ORIGEN. After fourteen years as head of the catechetical school of ALEXANDRIA, he became bishop of that city in A.D. 247. Although his writings have not been preserved, he was frequently quoted by other authors, particularly in connection with the Arian controversy. In those quotations, he appears as one of those "left-wing Origenists" who so stressed the distinction between Father and Son as to lay them open to the charge of ARIANISM. He was dead by the time this controversy broke out, and among those who supported the faith of Nicaea, there were those who felt that he was a proto-Arian. Athanasius, by then bishop of Alexandria, defended Dionysius against such charges.

J.G.

DIONYSIUS THE PSEUDO-AREOPAGITE. The unknown author of a series of mystical works, probably dating from late in the fourth century or early in the fifth. Since these writings were attributed to the Dionysius who heard Paul's preaching at the Areopagus (Acts 17), they were considered to have an authority almost equal to that of the apostles. Translated into Latin by JOHN SCOTUS ERIGENA, they made a significant impact on Western theology during the latter half of the Middle Ages. The mystical theology of Pseudo-Dionysius is an example of NEOPLATONISM in its inspiration, and therefore these writings were one of the main avenues of Neoplatonic influence on medieval theology. During the Reformation, most Protestants and some Catholics began to question their authenticity, pointing out the vast difference between them and the writings of Paul. Eventually all scholars came to the conclusion that they are indeed spurious.

J.G.

DISCIPLE. The word derives from a Greek term meaning "learner, pupil." In modern usage it has come to mean simply "a follower," without any connotation of schooling. In the Septuagint it is used only twice (Jer. 13:21; 20:11) but it becomes a common term in the NT referring to those who were taught by John the Baptist (Matt. 9:14), the Pharisees (Matt. 22:16), and Jesus (Matt. 20:17). Even after the death of Jesus, those who followed his teaching were called disciples of the Lord (Acts 9:1) just as the Pharisees were called disciples of Moses (John 9:28). The twelve apostles, who were uniquely chosen by Jesus and assigned a special role in his preaching ministry, are referred to at times as the twelve disciples.

The two expressions are used interchangeably in places (Matt. 10:1-2; Luke 6:13). The word "apostle" is necessarily more restrictive than the term "disciple." An APOSTLE is "one who is sent with a commission"; apostles are disciples, but disciples are apostles only if appointed (Luke 6:13). In Acts the term is used almost exclusively to refer to members of the newly established church. It is virtually synonymous with "Christian" (6:1; 9:19), a term that was given to disciples in Antioch (Acts 11:26) and which appears only three times in the NT (I Pet. 4:16; Acts 11:26; 26:28).

J.R.M.

DISCIPLES OF CHRIST. See CHRISTIAN CHURCH.

DISCIPLINE. Discipline is not a biblical term, but the concept is derived from the Hebrew law as found in the Decalogue, the Covenant Code (Exod. 20-23), and the Holiness Code in Leviticus, as well as from the practical or moral sections of Paul's epistles and the Pastoral Epistles in the NT. The Sermon on the Mount of Matthew and the sermon on the plain of Luke also contribute to the concept of a Christian discipline, in the sense of a rigorously pure life-style for believers. While all Christian communions teach and encourage growth in grace, or sanctification, the ideals of a strict Christian discipline are found in certain communions more than in others. The chief of these are (1) the disciplines of monastic orders in the Roman Catholic and Eastern Orthodox churches; (2) the disciplines of the priesthood in Roman Catholic and Eastern Orthodox churches (with parallels for the ministry in Protestant churches); (3) the various disciplines and ascetic practices of Protestant sectarians of the Holiness type (sometimes called Wesleyan); and, historically, the discipline laid on Geneva by the reformer John Calvin, with its parallels in early Scottish Presbyterianism. Until the contemporary period, the Reformed churches and the Methodist churches stressed discipline among their members more than the other Protestant communions.

Discipline may connote only the life-style prescribed by a church for either its ministers or its laypeople. Usually, as in the Roman Catholic Church, the discipline imposed on priests is stricter than that on the laity, and the ascetic practices of monks and nuns are more rigorous still. Indeed, "discipline" sometimes refers to the scourge or whip used in monastic acts of mortification.

J.C.

DISESTABLISHMENT. A state in which one religion is no longer established by law as the faith of the realm, and no specific church receives official status and favor.

In 1776 various churches were established in nine of thirteen American states. Because no church was large enough to claim national allegiance, the majority of Americans were Protestant, and most were indifferent to religion entirely, disestablishment came easily. The Church of England was disestablished in Virginia in 1785. Congregationalism was disestablished in Connecticut in 1818, New Hampshire in 1819, and finally in Massachusetts in 1831. N.H.

DISPENSATIONALISM. A form of biblical interpretation derived from the teachings of JOHN NELSON DARBY (1800-82) of Dublin, Ireland, a leader of the Plymouth Brethren, and popularized by C. I. SCOFIELD (1843-1921) in his Scofield Reference Bible (1902-1909 and revised in 1917). This system is based on the belief that God deals with the human race in different ways at different times. Scofield said that there are seven dispensations, or epochs of time, and interpreted a dispensation (from the Greek oikonomia) as "a period of time during which man is tested in respect of obedience to some specific revelation of the will of God." The Darbyite term "dispensation" is taken from the Authorized Version (King James) translation of oikonomia as "dispensation." Darby, Scofield, and other Dispensationalists use this system to interpret the OT and NT.

While various Dispensationalists offer differing details, they generally accept C. I. Scofield's sevenfold series of dispensations. These are: (1) Innocence (Gen. 1:28) to the loss of Eden; (2) Conscience or moral responsibility (Gen. 3:7) up to the Great Flood; (3) Human government (Gen. 8:15) up to the call of Abraham; (4) Promise, the test of Israel's response to God (Gen. 12:1) down to the covenant at Sinai; (5) Law, to the death of Christ (Exod. 19:1); (6) the church, the dispensation of the Holy Spirit (Acts 2:1) to Christ's return (Second Coming); and (7) the millennial kingdom to eternity (Rev. 20:4).

Scofield held that while there is but one dispensation or overall plan of God in both the OT and NT, that is, redemption in Christ, nevertheless God progressively deals with humanity through the sevenfold series of dispensations. Specifically, Scofield thought that each of these epochs was a time of testing, in which God sets the human race to a particular test. He said "No particular portion of Scripture is to be intelligently comprehended apart from some concept of its place in the whole." Many scholars believe that this is an imposition or eisegesis since, according to them, there is no evidence of any dispensational thinking in the Scriptures, although the Greek term oikonomia (which means "economy" or "administration") does occur in I Corinthians 9:17; Ephesians 1:20; 3:2; and Colossians 1:25.

Dispensationalism is above all a system of biblical interpretation for the religious education of lay people. For the Bible reader, the Sunday school class, and for students in Bible schools who lacked knowledge of the ancient languages and ancient history, some simple, overall plan seemed needed so as to interpret the Bible as a whole. This need is both the reason for Darby's and Scofield's system and the cause of its early and continuing popularity. Although there are schools devoted to dispensationalism among fundamentalists in the U.S.A. and Britain, most of the system's influence flows from the steady popularity of Scofield's Reference Bible, which was revised again as recently as 1966.

J.C.

DISPERSION. See DIASPORA.

DISSENTERS. The word was first used of the five "Dissenting Brethren" at the WESTMINSTER ASSEMBLY of Divines, 1643-47. They were called NONCONFORMISTS in the penal acts following the RESTORATION (1660) and the Act of Uniformity (1662).

These terms generally apply to all English Protestants including Baptists, Congregationalists, Presbyterians, Methodists, Unitarians, Quakers, Plymouth Brethren, Moravians, Churches of Christ, the Salvation Army, and sects.

N.H.

DISTRICT SUPERINTENDENT. An elder in the Methodist churches who supervises ministers in the districts of a conference. Usually several district superintendents aid the bishop in charge of a conference. In the Christmas Conference of 1784, "district elder" denoted a district superintendent, and in 1797 the title was changed to "presiding elder." District superintendent now prevails.

C.M.

DITTOGRAPHY. A double writing in paleography. A scribe sometimes mistakenly copied twice what should only have been written once. It was a mechanical or unconscious repetition of a series of letters or words and is the opposite of haplography. For example, "Great is Artemis . . ." (Acts 19:34) is given twice in Codex Vaticanus.

J.R.M.

DIVES. From the Latin word for "rich." A name given in the Middle Ages to the rich man in the parable of Lazarus (Luke 16:19-31), arising from the mistaken notion that the Latin Vulgate translation of the phrase "there was a certain rich man" was naming the person rather than simply stating that the man was rich.

J.R.M.

DIVINATION. Magical practices by which men and women in ancient times sought to obtain information about the future. Such practices are now generally considered superstitious, but some (for example, astrology; dream interpretation) are practiced in Europe and America today. Although the covenant code condemns WITCHCRAFT, and the later prophets assailed reliance on ASTROLOGY and the dreams of false prophets, many acts of divination are recorded in the Bible, from the visit of Saul to the witch of Endor (1 Sam. 28:3-25) to the casting of lots by the apostles to select a successor for Judas Iscariot (Acts 1:26).

Among the specific practices of the Hebrews (and presumably the early Christians) designed to disclose the future, we read of ORACLES (as at the terebinth of Moreh, Gen. 12:6); looking into a cup of water or wine (Gen. 44:5, 15); consultation of a witch or wizard, or woman or man with a "familiar spirit" or associated demon; necromancy, or communicating with the dead (generally by use of a witch); shaking arrows and casting them on the ground (similar to the I Ching today); dream interpretation (as in the case of Joseph in Egypt); and the casting of LOTS (probably stones of different sizes or colors).

Two of the most familiar characters in the OT were men of occult powers, respected for their ability in divination. They were Joseph in Egypt (Gen. 37:5 ff.; 40:8 ff.; 41:1-32) and Daniel in Babylon (Dan. 1:20; 2:2; 5:11). Joseph's rise to power, from prison to prime minister, is due to his occult power, by which he interprets future events disclosed in the dreams of the butler, the baker, and then of Pharaoh himself. Daniel is said to be given the power by God to discern the meaning of future events in Belshazzar's dreams. He supplants all the magicians and wise men in the Babylonian court and is made head of the magicians' guild (Dan. 5:11 ff.). Even though MAGIC was rejected early in Hebrew history, it kept coming back into popular religion and plays a major role all through the OT. A familiar spirit was thought to be the spirit of a dead person who had had a special relation with a witch, wizard, or medium. The witch could learn hidden secrets or future events by consulting such a spirit (1 Sam. 28:7-25).

J.C.

DIVINE COMEDY. See DANTE. ALIGHIERI

DIVINE, FATHER (1875-1965). Leader of an interracial religious movement in the United States that began in 1919. Its greatest influence and size were attained between 1935 and 1945. Father Divine was born George Baker on Hutchinson's Island, Georgia, near Savannah, around 1875. He lived there for the first part of his life, moving to East Baltimore around the turn of the century. Baker also used the name Major M. J. Divine. In 1907 he became a follower of Sam Morris, who called himself Father Jehovia. In 1909 he moved to the "Lift Ever, Die Never" movement of John Hickerson. In 1914 he began his own movement in Valdosta, Georgia. About 1915 he moved to Brooklyn and to Sayville, Long Island, where he founded his Peace Mission Movement and adopted the name Father Divine. He began a very popular—among urban blacks—ministry that involved housing and feeding his followers. He gave long meals at which he preached. This disturbed the residents of Sayville. Baker then moved to Harlem and named his meeting places "heavens," which then attracted blacks and whites in large numbers. Soon Father Divine's missions, hostels ("heavens"), restaurants, and stores spread across the nation.

Throughout the 1930s and 1940s, Baker's movement grew rapidly. A weekly magazine, New Day, spread Baker's message of personal morality, no alcohol, no tobacco, no gambling, no life insurance, and strict honesty. Interestingly, Baker taught that members should be celibate, even if married and living together. Those who lived in this manner were invited to live in one of those "heavens." The deep economic depression of the 1930s made this possibility very appealing.

Father Divine called for civil rights legislation at home and world peace abroad. However, he began to lose followers after 1946, when he married a white woman. Despite the beliefs of his followers that he was God, Father Divine died. The Peace Mission still exists, directed by Baker's widow.

J.C.

DIVINE OFFICE. The public prayers of the Roman Catholic church, including psalms, hymns, scriptural readings, prayers, and other readings. It is composed of various services for the hours of the day. The most recent revision of the office was issued under Pope Paul VI in 1970. This contains all the decisions of Vatican II. It contains the propers for the seasons, the ordinary text of the office, the psalter, the proper for the saints, and the office of the dead. The purpose of the office is to promote the worship of God and to increase the devotion of the faithful.

J.C.

DIVINE RIGHT. A theory asserting that authority comes directly from God, rendering one accountable only to God. Divine right was claimed by some ancient kings, popes, and especially seventeenth-century English and French rulers. For kings, the doctrine faded in England with William and Mary, 1689, and in France with the French Revolution, 1789-99.

C.M.

DIVORCE. In both the OT and the NT MARRIAGE is considered sacred, guaranteeing the stability of the family, the strength of the people (tribe or nation or church), and the creation of happiness for all concerned. However, from earliest times, the Hebrew law recognized that some situations could break a marriage, and provision was made for divorce, the dissolution of marital bonds (Deut. 24:1-4).

Hebrew marriage began with the engagement ceremony, hence even engagement could be broken only by a divorce (Hos. 2:19 ff.). This is the significance of Matthew 1:18-25, the desire of Joseph to break off his engagement to Mary privately, to spare her family embarrassment, once he discovered she was pregnant. Only a revelation in a dream (Matt. 1:20-25) convinced Joseph to go forward with the marriage.

While women, generally, did not have the same rights as men, the rabbinical law was just and extended the right of divorce to women as well as to men. Marriage was considered a contract, in which the man promised to provide food, clothing, shelter, and sexual relations. If any of these elements of marriage were withheld, then the wife could seek a divorce. The law of Moses (Lev. 21:14) forbade priests to marry divorced women, yet the divorced daughter of a priest could return to her father for protection (Lev. 22:13).

Adultery, on the part of the wife, was the only grounds for divorce (Exod. 20:14; Deut. 5:18), but there are echoes of other conditions that were apparently recognized as grounds for divorce. The prophets, in their criticisms of Israel and Judah, implied that men divorced their wives for small problems, flouting the sacredness of marriage. Adultery, too, was directed toward the woman, although when a married woman was caught in the act, the man with her (married or not) was also subject to death by stoning. However, the burden of this fell on women, as a wife could be stoned to death if it were later discovered that she had engaged in illicit sex before her marriage (Deut. 22:13-31). Divorce was formal, by the handing over of a written bill of divorcement.

J.C.

DOANE, WILLIAM CROSWELL (1832-1913). The first bishop of the Protestant Episcopal diocese of Albany who also wrote the hymn "Ancient of Days." He was born in Boston, Massachusetts, on March 2, to the rector of Trinity Church, George Washington Doane, later bishop of New Jersey, and Eliza Greene Callahan Perkins. An 1850 graduate of Burlington College, Doane was ordained deacon (1853), priest (1856), and consecrated bishop (1869), after serving parishes in Burlington, New Jersey; Hartford, Connecticut; and Albany, New York. He made All Saints' Cathedral into a model of social activity with the St. Agnes School, the Child's Hospital, St. Margaret's Home, and the Sisterhood of the Holy Child. Doane represented the American church at two Lambeth conferences. He was an activist for social and moral betterment and opposed any liberalization in divorce law.

N.H.

DOCETISTS. Those who held that Jesus did not have a real body, but simply appeared to have one.

The term "Docetist" derives from a Greek word meaning "to appear." Docetism was an important challenge to orthodoxy particularly during the second century, when Gnosticism was at the height of its popularity, for Docetism was especially appealing to those who, as most Gnostics, considered matter evil. Since matter is evil, the Savior—or, in some Gnostic systems, the Messenger from beyond—must not have taken a material body. MARCION was also accused of having Docetic tendencies, for he denied the birth of Jesus, claiming that he came into the world as a grown man during the reign of Tiberius. It was against such doctrines that the Apostles' Creed underscored the birth, suffering, and death of Jesus. In later times, all who in any way have denied the full humanity of Jesus have also been called Docetists.

J.G.

DOCTORS OF THE CHURCH. The great theologians whose authority is considered paramount. Traditionally, there have been four great doctors from the Latin-speaking West, and four from the Greek-speaking East. The great Latin doctors are AMBROSE, JEROME, AUGUSTINE, and GREGORY THE GREAT. Their Greek counterparts are ATHANASIUS, BASIL, GREGORY NAZIANZUS, and JOHN CHRYSOSTOM. Since the thirteenth century, the popes have occasionally added other names to the list of doctors. At present they number thirty-two. The last to receive such an honor are saints TERESA and CATHERINE OF SIENA, whom Paul VI declared doctors of the church in 1970. They are the only two women in the list, which also includes such prominent saints and theologians as THOMAS AQUINAS, BONAVENTURE, ANSELM, BERNARD OF CLAIRVAUX, and ALBERTUS MAGNUS. In total, the list includes two popes, three cardinals, fifteen bishops, nine priests, one deacon, and two nuns.

J.G.

DOCTRINE. See DOGMA/DOCTRINE.

DOCTRINE OF THE MEAN (Chung Yung). A basic Confucian text, traditionally ascribed to Confucius' grandson but now put as late as the second century B.C. by some scholars. The Chung Yung (literally, "Central and Normal") provides a brief yet profound summation of basic Confucian teachings. It instructs that to live genuinely one must cultivate one's own true nature, allowing it to manifest itself in outward behavior. Human nature requires right relations with others, in accordance with the five relationships, whether sovereign and subject, parent and child, husband and wife, older and younger brother, friend and friend. The ideal is a life that does not go to extremes, but which like an unwavering pivot holds to the center.

R.E.

DOCUMENTARY HYPOTHESIS. A theory developed in the eighteenth and nineteenth centuries that divided the material in the PENTATEUCH into four major blocks and sought to relate these to one another and to the course of Israelite history. The theory assumes that Moses did not compose the Pentateuch but that it was the product of various periods in Israelite history.

This horizontal division of the Pentateuch into sources involved three steps. (1) The material was divided among various sources according to what have been called the Five Pillars of documentary analysis: (a) the use of different names for God, (b) differences in language and style, (c) contradictions and divergencies among various texts, (d) duplication and repetition of material, and (e) the evidence of literary seams suggesting the combination of different sources. The results of such analysis suggested the existence of four sources in the Pentateuch: (a) a source with strong priestly interests and vocabulary (P or Priestly); (b) a source that throughout used the name YAHWEH (spelled Jahweh in German) for God (J or Yahwistic); (c) a source that, like P, used ELOHIM until the time of Moses (E or Elohist); and (d) a source whose style and vocabulary are best seen in DEUTERONOMY (D or Deuteronomistic).

(2) The second step in the documentary hypothesis involved the establishment of a relative chronology for the sources. Scholars sought to establish such a relationship by analyzing the nature and development of various religious practices and institutions as these are reflected in the sources. Among the factors analyzed to establish the relationship of the documents were (a) the number and nature of sanctuaries, (b) the character and nature of various sacrifices, (c) the number and character of religious festivals, (d) the priesthood, and (e) the nature and regulation of priestly and clergy income. This analysis suggested that the relative chronological order of the documents was J, E, D, P.

(3) The last stage consisted of associating these sources with particular epochs in Israelite history as this could be constructed from the historical books (Judges—II Kings, I—II Chronicles, Ezra—Nehemiah). Scholars working with the documentary hypothesis associated J and E with the early monarchical period, D with the reform of Josiah, and P with postexilic Judaism.

Although many scholars contributed to the development of the documentary hypothesis, it is especially associated with the German scholars Karl Heinrich Graf and JULIUS WELLHAUSEN and the Dutch scholar Abraham Kuenen.

J.H.

DODD, CHARLES H. (1884–1973). British NT scholar and a leading influence in the field between 1920 and 1960. He is especially noted for his advocacy of “realized eschatology” in the teaching of Jesus, for his work on the Fourth Gospel, and for several popular and influential books on the study and interpretation of the Bible. Dodd took his B.A.

degree in classical studies at University College, Oxford, did research at the University of Berlin, and read divinity at Mansfield College, Oxford. Ordained in 1912, he served the Congregational church at Warwick (1912–15, 1918–19). He returned to Mansfield College as Yates Lecturer in NT before assuming the Rylands professorship at Manchester (1930–35) and the Norris-Hulse professorship at Cambridge (1935–49). He held many distinguished lectureships in Britain, Europe, and North America, and served as general director of the translation of the New English Bible (1950–65). Dodd was an honorary Fellow of Jesus College, Cambridge, and University College, Oxford, and a Fellow of the British Academy.

J.L.

DODDRIDGE, PHILIP (1702–51). The noted hymnwriter who refused university training rather than compromise his nonconformist principles. He attended instead the liberal theological academy at Kibworth, Leicestershire, and in 1723 became pastor there. He served several parishes before moving to Castle Hill Meeting, Northampton, in 1729, where he became principal of an academy and pastor to an independent congregation. In all he wrote nearly four hundred hymns, all published posthumously, including “O Happy Day, That Fixed My Choice,” “Awake, My Soul, Stretch Every Nerve,” “Great God, We Sing That Mighty Hand,” “Triumphant Zion, Lift Thy Head,” “How Gentle God’s Commands,” “O God of Bethel, by Whose Hand,” “Hark, the Glad Sound!” and “Let Zion’s Watchmen All Awake.” In 1751 he sailed for Lisbon, Portugal, where he died on October 26, shortly after his arrival.

N.H.

DOGEN (1200–53). An important Japanese Buddhist priest and philosopher, Dogen was the founder in Japan of the Soto school of ZEN BUDDHISM. Born of an aristocratic family, Dogen lost both his parents in childhood and entered a Tendai monastery. During study in China, however, he became engrossed in the study and practice of Zen. After his return to Japan in 1227, he established Japan’s first separate Zen temple and monastery. In both his leadership of it and in his writings, he stressed a life of simplicity, labor, and the Soto practice of “quiet sitting” as the path to enlightenment. In his highly regarded philosophical treatises, Dogen pointed to the Buddha-nature as the essence of all things, the unity of the Absolute and the phenomenal world, and made observations on the relationship of time and existence, which have been compared to modern relativity theory.

R.E.

DOGMA/DOCTRINE. All religions involve their adherents in certain beliefs and these are called “doctrines,” from the Latin doctrina, meaning “teaching.” These beliefs may be more or less precisely formulated and systematized. Where attempts are made at precise formulation, it is almost inevitable that differences of opinion will arise, and sometimes religious communities are sharply divided even to the point of SCHISM over doctrinal differences. The word "dogma," from the Greek verb dokein, "to seem good," is a doctrine which has been given authoritative status by the church. Dogmas have usually been formulated after periods of doctrinal controversy, for example, the definition of the person of Christ by the COUNCIL OF CHALCEDON (451) came at the end of a long period of Christological debate and was meant to settle the issues in dispute. But it is now generally recognized that all dogmatic formulations are infected by historical relativism and may stand in need of revision.

J.M.

DOME OF THE ROCK. Located in Jerusalem on the rise that is the traditional site of Solomon's Temple, this mosque and pilgrimage center is the third most venerated shrine in Islam, after Mecca and Medina, and an important example of early Muslim architecture. It commemorates the place where the Prophet MUHAMMAD commenced his mystical ascent into heaven, an event of immense importance to Islamic devotion. Begun in A.D. 688, the Dome of the Rock has linked Islam with the Holy City of Jews and Christians for about thirteen centuries.

R.E.

Courtesy of the Israel Government Tourist Office, Houston, Texas

The Dome of the Rock

DOMINIC/DOMINICANS. Dominic of Guzman (1170–1221), better known as St. Dominic, was the founder of the Order of Preachers, commonly called Dominicans. He was born into an aristocratic Spanish family and was a canon of the cathedral of Palencia when he and his bishop traveled to southern France. There he was profoundly disturbed by the popularity of the ALBIGENSES and by the inability of the orthodox leadership to refute them convincingly. He became convinced that such refutation had to be based on both sound scholarship and austerity of life. The result was the Order of Preachers, who made vows of poverty and devoted their lives to study and preaching. In contrast to the FRANCISCANS, whose vows of poverty they emulated, from the start the Dominicans wished to establish themselves in universities and other centers of learning. Also, since poverty for them was a means to a mission, and not the core of their self-understanding, they did not undergo the divisions and controversies regarding absolute poverty that rocked the Franciscan order after the death of St. Francis. Also, they soon amplified their mission and began dealing with not only the Albigensian threat, but with all the various intellectual challenges that resulted from the reintroduction of Aristotle into the West. In this regard, the most noteworthy Dominican theologians were ALBERTUS MAGNUS and his disciple THOMAS AQUINAS.

The Dominicans also did remarkable missionary work. Their most famous preacher among Jews in Spain was Vincent Ferrer, and, among Muslims in the Levant, William of Tripoli. Soon they had missionaries as far as India and China. With the discovery of the New World, their field of action was greatly increased. In the Spanish and Portuguese colonies, they often took the side of the Indians against the Spanish who oppressed them. Most famous for such action and for strong advocacy for the Indians before Spanish authorities was Bartolomé de Las Casas.

J.G.

DOMITIAN (A.D. 51–96). Roman Emperor from A.D. 81 to 96; successor of TITUS, his brother. According to Tertullian, a Latin Christian theologian, he was a persecutor of the church. Evidence for this notoriety is slight. Clement of Rome, writing in the A.D. 90s, refers to the "sudden and repeated misfortunes and calamities" that had hindered him in dealing with the strife in the Corinthian churches, but it is not certain that Clement was referring to state-instigated persecutions.

Some scholars associate two or three NT writings with Domitian's reign: the Revelation to John, the Letter to the Hebrews, and I Peter. Suetonius wrote that Domitian desired that his subjects profess him as "our Lord and God." The discovery of first-century Roman coins in the province of Asia bearing symbols of Domitian's deification has been taken as evidence that the crisis facing the seven churches in this province, described by John, occasioned the writing of Revelation. Less certain is the assignment of Hebrews and I Peter to Domitian's reign. J.P.

Courtesy of the American Numismatic Society

Roman coin showing head of Domitian

DONATION OF CONSTANTINE. A spurious document, probably dating from the eighth or ninth century, by which CONSTANTINE supposedly granted Pope Sylvester I authority over the entire church and the right to rule over the "Western lands." Believed to be authentic throughout the late Middle Ages, it was used to support both the primacy of the popes and their right to temporal rule. Scholars in the Renaissance, notably Lorenzo Valla, proved the "Donation" to be a forgery.

J.G.

DONATISTS. A schismatic group that appeared in North Africa in the fourth century, named for one of its leaders, Donatus of Casae Nigrae. With the advent of Constantine, persecution of the church had ceased. But the question still remained of what to do with those who had weakened during the persecution. A particularly difficult question was the status of those who had turned over the Scriptures to the authorities to be destroyed—the "traditores." If they were ordained, were their orders still valid?

The issue came to a head when a new bishop was elected and consecrated for Carthage, the most important city in North Africa. Some of his enemies declared that one of those who had consecrated him was a "traitor," and that therefore his consecration was not valid. Eventually the entire church in North Africa split over the issue of whether sacraments and ordinations performed by the unworthy were valid or not. In truth, the schism had ethnic and social overtones, for in general the Donatists were stronger in rural areas and among the lower classes and those of ancient Berber and Punic stock, while their opponents were particularly strong in Carthage itself, and among the Latin-speaking middle and upper classes. Both sides appealed to the rest of the church and to Constantine, and the decision went against the Donatists. Rejected both by other Christians and by the empire, some of the more extreme Donatists (the "Circumcellions") then formed an armed band that ravaged the country. Although the empire took stern action against both the Circumcellions and the more moderate Donatists, the schism persisted until the Arab invasions in the seventh century.

J.G.

DONNE, JOHN (1573–1631). English preacher, poet, prose writer, and eminent dean of St. Paul's Cathedral. Donne was born a Catholic in London. He received no degree but attended Oxford and Cambridge for six years, traveled, read law, and accompanied Essex and Raleigh against Spain, 1596–97. After careful reflection, he accepted Anglicanism. In 1598 he became private secretary to Sir Thomas Egerton (Lord Ellesmere), keeper of the Great Seal, but lost his position and was briefly imprisoned for secretly marrying Anne Moore (Egerton's niece) in 1601. For ten years he struggled in poverty and wrote Biathanatos, in defense of suicide (published 1744). His Pseudo-Martyr (1610), opposing Catholicism, pleased King James I, who later urged Anglican ordination (1615), made him royal chaplain, and in 1621 appointed him dean of St. Paul's Cathedral. Donne poured his genius into sermons, frequently dealing with death and God's mercy to sinners. Devotions upon Emergent Occasions (1624) masterfully probes illness, others, and God: "No man is an island . . . any man's death diminishes me . . . because I am involved in Mankind . . ." He preached "Death's Duel" just before his death. Most of his satire, love lyrics, and collections of sermons appeared posthumously. He directly influenced George Herbert, Henry Vaughan, William Yeats, T. S. Eliot, and W. H. Auden. There has been a revival of interest in Donne in the twentieth century.

C.M.

DORCAS. The Greek form of the Hebrew name Tabitha (Gazelle), which was worn by a woman in the NT who was well known in the city of Joppa (Tel Aviv) for her charity (Acts 9:36–42). When she died Simon Peter was summoned and raised her from the dead.

J.R.M.

DORT, SYNOD OF. From November 13, 1618, to May 9, 1619, a synod of the Reformed Dutch church to settle differences between Arminians (see ARMINIANISM) and strict Calvinists (see CALVIN, JOHN). Led by Johan van Oldenbarneveldt and Hugo Grotius, the Remonstrants in 1610 issued a statement rejecting absolute predestination, atonement of Christ only for the elect, irresistible grace, and the impossibility of losing grace. Dort reaffirmed rigid Calvinist doctrines: divine unconditional predestination, atonement for the elect only, human sinfulness, irresistible grace, and the perseverance of the saints. Disagreeing Arminians were banished. Oldenbarneveldt was beheaded on May 13, 1619, and Grotius was given life imprisonment but escaped in 1621.

C.M.

DOSTOYEVSKY, FEODOR (1821–81). Russian novelist, renowned for religious insights. Born in Moscow, Dostoyevsky attended the Military Engineers School in St. Petersburg (1838–43), was commissioned, and served until he resigned in 1844 to write. Poor Folk (1845) won acclaim, but he was arrested with other socialist thinkers in 1849 and sentenced to death. The sentence was later commuted, but not before he faced a firing squad. This tragic experience influenced his entire life. After four years of imprisonment in Siberia, he did compulsory army service, married unhappily in 1857, but could not return to St. Petersburg until 1859.

He was more religious than revolutionary, yet fared poorly. With his brother Mikhail, Dostoyevsky founded Time, a monthly journal, for which he wrote until its suppression in 1863, the year his wife and brother died. A second marriage (1867) brought happiness and financial improvement through his wife's management of his publications. However, Dostoyevsky was plagued by compulsive gambling, heavy debts, and epilepsy. He hastily produced masterful works embodying his prison experiences, religious probings, and profound character insights. His characters are complex, emotional, bound together by sin, and unable of themselves to find God. Committed to Russian nationalism and Christianity, Dostoyevsky agonized over suffering, revolution, crime, poverty, and faith. His world-renowned writings include The Double (1846), The House of the Dead (1862), and Letters from the Underworld (1864), studies of insanity and imprisonment; Crime and Punishment (1866), a psychology of murder; The Idiot (1869), reflections on Christlike perfection; The Possessed (1871), an attack on radicalism; and The Brothers Karamazov (1880), a search for God.

C.M.

DOUAY-RHEIMS BIBLE. Even older than the King James Version is this Roman Catholic Bible, which for more than three centuries has been the principal English-language, officially approved, Catholic Bible.

It was translated from the VULGATE by a band of British Roman Catholic exiles at the English College at Douay in northern France. The work was begun in 1578 at the prompting of the English cardinal, William Allen. The actual work of translation was conducted under the direction of Gregory Martin, who, like William Allen, had been trained and also taught at Oxford University.

The motive for this version was not so much to promote Bible reading but rather to counteract the "heresy" in Protestant versions of Scripture. When the English College was moved from Douay to Rheims in 1578, the translating team moved, too, thus giving this text the hyphenated name it has borne. The NT was published in 1582, but the OT, ready at that time, did not appear until 1609–10 because of a lack of funds. Martin did check with the extant Greek manuscripts and the Protestant version, especially Coverdale's Diglott version of 1538.

Ironically, not only did Coverdale's Protestant text influence the Douay-Rheims Bible, but this Catholic version, in turn, had impact on the KJV's rendition. Actually the KJV scholars using the Bishops' Bible as the principal base for their new translation also were instructed to consult all earlier English versions, including the Douay-Rheims NT and the Geneva Bible.

Throughout the centuries the Douay-Rheims Bible has been revised at least twice. Bishop Richard Challoner developed what came to be known as the Challoner-Rheims Version of 1749–50. This version was again revised by Catholic scholars in 1941 under the patronage of the Episcopal Committee of the Confraternity of Christian Doctrine. The publication of the New American Bible probably means the overshadowing of this hoary version.

R.H.

DOUBLE PROCESSION OF THE HOLY SPIRIT. The doctrine, common in the West, that the Holy Spirit proceeds from both the Father and the Son. Against this view, the Eastern churches hold that the Spirit proceeds from the Father, through the Son. The main source for the Western tradition is Augustine, for whom the Spirit is the bond of love between Father and Son, and thus proceeds from both. Eastern theologians, on the other hand, argue that there can be only one fountainhead of divinity, and this is the Father. Although these divergent views stem from different understandings of the TRINITY, they did not become a subject of heated controversy until the issue of the FILIOQUE came to the forefront in the ninth century.

J.G.

DOVE. A term denoting several smaller species of pigeons that were typically the subject of biblical metaphor. The dove symbolizes the gentle, affectionate attitude of the beloved (Song of S. 5:2) and human innocence amid hostile surroundings (Matt. 10:16).

The OT mentions the dove's moaning (Isa. 38:14), colors (Ps. 68:13), eyes (Song of S. 1:15), presence in valleys (Ezek. 7:16), nesting in rocks (Jer. 48:28), capacity for flight (Ps. 55:6), and even lack of sense (Hos. 7:11-12). After the Flood, Noah dispatched a dove from the ark to determine conditions outside (Gen. 8:8). As a victimized people, Israel is superbly symbolized as a dove within one communal lament (Ps. 74:19). All four Gospels portray the heavenly descent of God's Spirit as a dove alighting on Jesus at baptism (Matt. 3:16; Mark 1:10; Luke 3:22; John 1:32). Perhaps this reflects the hovering aspect of the Spirit at the world's creation (Gen. 1:2).

J.K.K.

DOXOLOGY. A litany or liturgical response of praise said or sung at various points in divine worship, both Protestant and Catholic. The doxology that begins "Glory be to the Father, and to the Son and to the Holy Ghost" originated in Antioch, where it was derived from the primitive Christian baptism formula. It is clearly trinitarian and expresses the conviction of Latin or Western Christianity that God is triune and that there is complete equality among the three persons in the Godhead. The doxology holds that the Father is glorified by the Spirit through the Son.

The longer litany, the GLORIA IN EXCELSIS ("Glory to God in the highest") is called the greater doxology. It consists of the angels' song at Christ's birth, praise of the Father, and the praise of Christ and the Holy Spirit.

A simpler doxology, or short hymn of praise, has been used by Christians since apostolic times to conclude prayers. It declares glory to the Father and the Son and the Holy Ghost, world without end, Amen (or "glory throughout the ages"). A doxology is used after the recitation of a psalm in the Catholic and Lutheran liturgies.

J.C.

DRACHMA. A Greek silver coin equal to a Roman DENARIUS. Drachma appears in the NT only in Luke 15:8, 9, as the "lost coin." It took four drachmas to make one shekel. The "half-shekel" tax Jesus paid was a didrachma or two-drachma coin (Matt. 17:24). The "silver pieces" Judas received were probably tetradrachmas or "shekels" (Matt. 26:15; Mark 14:11; Luke 22:5).

P.L.G.

DRUID. A term applied to a caste of learned priests controlling religion among the Celts in Gaul, Ireland, and Britain as early as 200 B.C. Records of Julius Caesar (d. 44 B.C.) and Pliny's Natural History, A.D. 77, give our earliest written data on Druids. Well-organized, respected, feared, exempt from military service and taxation, the Druids controlled all religious functions, education, and justice. A supremely powerful Druid ruled over their bards, prophets, and priests. They believed in their descent from a Supreme Being, divinations, astrology, charms, magic, human sacrifice (probably criminals), and the immortality of the soul. Druids believed that at death the soul passed to a newborn child. They revered some plants and animals, particularly mistletoe growing on oak trees, and held their meetings in oak forests. They fiercely resisted Roman conquest, but Rome subdued them in Gaul, Wales, and England, and Christianity overcame the remnants. Some elements of the Druids, however, survive in the belief in local woodland fairies.

C.M.

DRUZE (OR DRUZES). An offshoot of the Ismailiyya sect of the SHI'ITE branch of Islam

(Shi'ism). The movement began around A.D. 1000, during the reign of al-Hakin, caliph of the Fatimid dynasty in Egypt (A.D. 996–1021). The Ismaili sect considers al-Hakin as an infallible imam—almost as an incarnation of divinity. Al-Hakin's unusual claims caused much confusion, and a Persian, Hamza ibn Ali, founded the Druze movement in A.D. 1017. To the Druzes, al-Hakin is the incarnation of the Ultimate, the One, the Creator. The Druze worship al-Hakin and call themselves muwabbidun or "unitarians." They believe al-Hakin will return, and they teach the reincarnation of souls.

J.C.

DUALISM. The doctrine that there are two ultimate principles irreducible to a unity. A classic example is ancient Persian religion in its later phase, when Ahura Mazda, the spirit of light and goodness, had as his counterpart Ahriman, the spirit of darkness and evil. The still later MANICHAISM (third century A.D.) combined Persian, Gnostic, Christian, and Jewish elements in its teaching, according to which the world is a mixture of light and darkness, or spirit and matter, and salvation consists in separating spirit from its entanglement with matter. Although traditional Christianity supposed that over against GOD there is a realm of demonic powers headed by SATAN or the devil, this was not a dualism, for Satan and his hosts were never considered to be of equal status with God but were fallen angels and therefore creaturely and destined for eventual defeat. In modern times, Descartes and his followers taught a dualism of mind and matter, but nowadays the tendency is to see the human being as a psychosomatic unity. (See also MONOTHEISM.)

J.M.

DUFFIELD, GEORGE, JR. (1818–88). The author of "Stand Up, Stand Up for Jesus" was the son and grandson of Presbyterian ministers named George Duffield. George Duffield, Jr., was the great grandson of Isabella Graham and grandson of Joanna and Divie Bethune. Born September 12 in Carlisle, Pennsylvania, he was educated at Yale College and Union Seminary in New York City. Ordained to the Presbyterian ministry, he served churches in Brooklyn (1840–47), Bloomfield, New Jersey (1847–52), Philadelphia (1852–61), Adrian, Michigan (1861–65), Galesburg, Illinois (1865–69), and Ann Arbor and Lansing, Michigan (1869–88). His famous hymn was inspired by the dying words of Dudley Atkins Tyng, rector of Epiphany Church, Philadelphia, who said, "Tell them to stand up for Jesus: now let us sing a hymn." It was first published in a Sunday school handbill in 1858.

N.H.

DUKKHA. From the Pali word for "unpleasant." (The Sanskrit rendering is "Duhkha.") In BUDDHISM it is the suffering, both mental and physical, which afflicts all conditioned existence, including human lives as they are ordinarily lived. The first of the Buddha's FOUR NOBLE TRUTHS is often translated, "All life is suffering (dukkha)." This may be taken to mean that, although every moment may not be filled with excruciating pain, we are seldom free of underlying currents of anxiety and frustration due to the conditions of existence itself. According to Buddhism, dukkha is a product of these features of life: it is unsatisfying (that is, it is full of pain and its hopes and desires are never wholly met), it is transitory, and it is an aggregate (that is, we are made of the several skandhas or psycho-physical elements, such as the senses, perceptions, and responses, which often miscue one another and with which we falsely identify). Desire or attachment on all levels is the basic cause of suffering. The Buddha's path, culminating in right meditation, is the way out of it.

R. E.

DUNKARDS. See CHURCH OF THE BRETHERN.

DUNS SCOTUS, JOHN (1265–1308). One of the foremost Franciscan theologians, known also as the Subtle Doctor and as the Doctor of the Immaculate Conception. Scotus marks one of the stages of the movement of late medieval theology away from the confidence in reason that had marked its high point at the time of BONAVENTURE and THOMAS AQUINAS. With Duns Scotus, the list of those items that reason cannot prove, but are known only by faith, grew much longer. He still believed in the harmony between reason and revelation, but disagreed with Thomas on the ability of reason to prove such things as the immortality of the soul. Furthermore, God is not subject to our human rationality and therefore may act in manners that to us seem capricious. Eventually, such views would undercut the basic assumptions of scholastic theology—although in Duns Scotus himself this is not the case. Duns Scotus is also known for his defense of the IMMACULATE CONCEPTION of Mary. This was a view that had been proposed earlier and rejected by many theologians—Thomas Aquinas among them. But through the influence of Duns Scotus and other Franciscan theologians it gained recognition and was finally declared to be official doctrine of the Roman Catholic Church in the nineteenth century.

J. G.

DUNSTAN (925?–88). English prelate, archbishop of Canterbury, monastic reformer, statesman, and educator. Legend surrounds much of his life, but he brought renewal to the church in his time, especially to MONASTICISM. Born into nobility near Glastonbury, he received an education in the abbey of Glastonbury, served in the court of King Athelstan, and at an early age became a monk at Glastonbury. He devoted himself to biblical and early church studies, lived ascetically, and undertook painting, music, and metal working, in which he excelled. He is said to have become an abbot at age twenty-one and to have made Glastonbury famous as an educational center. King Edgar appointed him bishop of Worcester (957), London (959), and archbishop of Canterbury (960). He advised Edgar on state affairs; and as abbot, bishop, and archbishop, he strove to restore monasticism, which had declined drastically. He is credited with establishing numerous new BENEDICTINE foundations.

C. M.

DURA-EUROPOS. An ancient city on the east bank of the Euphrates near the north edge of the Syrian Desert, 275 miles north of Baghdad, 160 miles east of Palmyra. Developed by the Seleucids (about 300 B.C.) as a military colony, river port, and trading center on the main east-west land route, the city was ruled by Seleucids until 140 B.C., and then by the Parthians (140 B.C.–A.D. 165), and the Romans (A.D. 165–256). Its destruction in A.D. 256 by the Persian Sasānians left the city in ruins until the twentieth century. Fortunately, the Roman defenders buried much of the city while buttressing the city walls.

Excavation of Dura-Europos began (1922–23) under Franz Cumont of Belgium and continued with French and American archaeologists (1928–1937). About a fourth of the city has been now excavated, enough to give an unusually detailed picture of a Roman fortress town guarding the empire's eastern border. The cultural climate shows international influences: the Seleucids used Greek city planning, the Roman soldiers were provided with a Mithraeum, and a major temple housed a colossal statue of the Babylonian god Bel/Baal-Marduk.

The Jewish community of Dura-Europos had built a house-synagogue with remarkable wall paintings, now exhibited at the national museum in Damascus. The Christian house-church had a baptistery and murals (now in the Yale University Art Museum) comparable, but in a different style, to those in the catacombs of Rome. A Greek papyrus of Tatian's Diatesseron found at Dura-Europos, suggests that Greek was the preferred church language for Christians in that city.

P. L. G.

DURKHEIM, EMILE (1858–1917). One of the founders of modern sociological theory. He was born in Epinal, France, and educated at the Ecole Normal Supérieure, Paris, with an interest in political and social philosophy. He then became the first professor of sociology and education at Bordeaux, a post he held until 1902, when he was honored by an appointment to the Sorbonne.

Durkheim was interested in the application of sociology to education. He studied how societies were structured in order to satisfy the wants of people and the interrelationships between individual strivings and social cohesiveness. He also investigated the extent to which individualism and social order could co-exist. In The Elementary Forms of the Religious Life (1912), based on a study of "primitive" societies, he posited the theory that religion is the matrix out of which culture develops. Deeply affected by the violence and upheaval of World War I, he died in 1917.

Courtesy of the Yale University Art Gallery, Dura-Europos Collection

Fresco from Dura-Europos showing the consecration of the tabernacle

I. C.

DWIGHT, TIMOTHY (1752–1817). The Congregational minister and president of Yale (1795–1817) born May 14, 1752, in Northampton, Massachusetts, to Timothy Dwight and Mary Edwards, daughter of JONATHAN EDWARDS.

He entered Yale at thirteen, graduated in 1769, and received a master's degree in 1772. On March 3, 1777, he married Mary Woolsey. Licensed to preach the same year, he served as chaplain to the Continental Army. In 1783 he was called to the Congregational church at Greenfield Hill, where he was ordained November 5, and served for twelve years. His earnest preaching at Yale encouraged revivals there in 1801 and 1807–8.

Founder of New Haven Theology, he is the author of the five-volume Theology, Explained and Defended (1818-19); The Conquest of Canaan (1785), the first epic poem published in America; and the hymn "I Love Thy Kingdom, Lord." He helped to found Andover Theological Seminary, the Missionary Society of Connecticut, and the American Board of Commissioners for Foreign Missions. He died on January 11.

N.H.

Ee

E DOCUMENT. One of the literary sources of the PENTATEUCH. The modern name for E derives from the repeated use of the Hebrew divine name Elohim. It is likely that E was composed in the northern kingdom (Samaria) during the ninth century B.C. (Compare also DOCUMENTARY HYPOTHESIS.)

J.N.

EARLY CHURCH, HISTORY OF CHRISTIANITY IN THE. The history of the early church covers the period from the end of the NT to the year A.D. 430. This date marks the death of AUGUSTINE of Hippo, usually considered the last of the ancient FATHERS OF THE CHURCH. Also, at that time the Vandals were besieging Hippo, thus marking the end of the Western Roman Empire.

The early centuries of the history of Christianity are divided into two very different periods by the momentous event of the conversion of CONSTANTINE. The period prior to that event was marked by PERSECUTION, and not many powerful or socially prestigious people were found in the ranks of the church. At the same time, the early church was clarifying the nature of its message and beliefs, partly in response to the challenge of what eventually were condemned as forms of heresy.

This double concern—persecution and heresy—can be seen in the earliest extant Christian writings outside the NT, the APOSTOLIC FATHERS. For instance, the seven letters of IGNATIUS OF ANTIOCH, written on his way to martyrdom in Rome, show that he was a victim of persecution in Antioch, that he was eager to prove worthy of the crown of martyrdom, and that he was greatly concerned over the deviant doctrines that were appearing both in Antioch and elsewhere.

The reasons for persecution varied through the years, as the nature of persecution itself also changed. In most of the NT the Roman Empire appears as the protector of Christians against attempts by some Jews to persecute them. But other sources make it clear that already in A.D. 64, during the reign of Nero, imperial authorities began persecuting Christians as such, at least in the city of Rome. At that time, they were accused of arson, being blamed for the great fire that destroyed a vast area of the city. This persecution, probably the most famous because it was the first, and because both Peter and Paul are said to have died under it, was far, however, from the worse, for it seems to have been limited to the city of Rome, and in any case abated after Nero's death.

Later in the century, Emperor Domitian unleashed another persecution that was particularly violent in Asia Minor. The book of Revelation in the NT reflects conditions at that time. The reasons for this persecution are not clear. It seems that Domitian resented the unwillingness of both Jews and Christians to grant him divine honors or at least to send to Rome the yearly contributions that Jews had usually sent to Jerusalem, which had been destroyed by Roman legions.

By the early second century, the empire was beginning to define its policy toward Christians, whose numbers now required such definition. Pliny, governor of Bithynia under Trajan, complained that the pagan temples were almost deserted due to the spread of Christianity. The policy that Trajan outlined in response was that Christians ought not to be sought, but that if accused and brought before the authorities they must worship the gods or be punished. But no anonymous accusations should be heeded. The net result of this policy was that Christians depended on the good will of their neighbors, who at any time could destroy them by a simple accusation. This in turn gave greater importance to the work of the APOLOGISTS, who sought to show that the various rumors about Christian practices were untrue, and that Christianity was more reasonable than its critics claimed. Foremost of these Apologists was JUSTIN MARTYR, who argued, on the basis of the doctrine of the LOGOS, that Christians could claim all the knowledge and virtue of the ancients.

By the time of Emperor Decius (A.D. 249–51), persecution took a new turn. The decline of Rome was evident, and Decius and many others were convinced that Rome was losing the favor of the gods because her subjects were abandoning their worship. Therefore he commanded that all must worship the gods, and have a certificate attesting that they had done so. Those who refused were not killed outright but rather tortured and promised release if they would only worship the gods. Those who stood firm through such trials, but did not become martyrs, the church called confessors, for they had confessed the faith in the most difficult circumstances. After the end of this persecution, the question of the restoration of the lapsed became a burning issue, particularly in North Africa, where Bishop CYPRIAN opposed the claim of some confessors that it was they who had the right to grant pardon to those who had fallen. For similar reasons, the church in Rome was also divided, for the followers of NOVATIAN insisted on greater rigor than Bishop Cornelius was willing to apply.

The greatest persecution, however, broke out early in the fourth century, under Emperor DIOCLETIAN (A.D. 284–305) and his associate GALERIUS (A.D. 293–311). At this point Christians were required to turn in their copies of Scripture. Those who did so were dubbed "traditores" by other Christians. Eventually the persecutors showed great cruelty, torturing and killing Christians in every conceivable way. Finally, in A.D. 311, Galerius put an end to persecution, which he had decided was futile. By that time, Constantine had begun his rise in the West. In 312, he defeated Maxentius in the battle at Milvian Bridge, in the outskirts of Rome. In that battle, his soldiers fought under a sign that could be interpreted as a monogram containing the Greek letters chi (X) and rho (P), the first two letters of the name of Christ. The following year, in what is usually called the Edict of Milan, Constantine and Emperor Licinius put an end to persecution.

During all this time, the church also had to face the challenge of what it called "heresies." Drawing its converts from varied backgrounds, the church soon found itself flooded with divergent interpretations of its message, some of which seemed to threaten the very core of the gospel. The most important of these was Gnosticism, the name given to several schools of thought that held that salvation was attained through a secret knowledge ("gnosis"). Most Gnostics believed that matter was evil, and therefore denied the doctrine of the creation of the world by the Supreme God. For similar reasons, they held that the body was evil, and that therefore there would be no resurrection of the dead, for only the spiritual is worthy of continued existence. Also, most of them denied that Jesus had true human flesh—a doctrine called Docetism, from a Greek word meaning "to appear." MARCION, the son of a Christian bishop, was not a Gnostic, but he also denied creation by the Supreme God. According to him, the God of the OT is not the loving Father of Jesus, but a vindictive inferior being who made this world either out of folly or out of spite. Jesus was not born as a human being, but simply appeared as a grown man during the reign of Tiberius. For these reasons, Marcion rejected the OT and offered in its place a list of Christian books, consisting of the Gospel of Luke and the epistles of Paul, all cleansed from what he claimed were Judaizing interpolations.

Against these and other similar doctrines, the church responded by developing its own CANON of the NT, insisting on the apostolic succession and authority of its bishops, and composing creeds or "symbols" that could be used as tests of orthodoxy. The most important of these early creeds was the Old Roman Symbol, out of which our present APOSTLES' CREED developed. Its purpose was clearly to reject the docetic and dualist views of Marcion and others. Likewise, the insistence on several gospels (sometimes three, and eventually four), which did not agree on all their details, was a way of showing that the universal apostolic authority was on the side of the church, and against those heretics who claimed to derive their doctrines from the secret teachings of a single apostle or a single gospel—such as the Gospel of Thomas. At the same time, the church was challenged by the Montanists, who believed that in themselves a new "age of the Spirit" had begun. Against such a view, the church insisted both on the finality of Christ as the dawn of the last age and on the authority of bishops.

Christian theology during these early centuries centered mostly in ALEXANDRIA, Carthage, ANTIQCH, and ASIA MINOR. In these various areas different theological types developed. In Alexandria, Christianity was seen as the "true philosophy," in basic continuity with classical philosophy. In Carthage—and eventually in most of the West—it was understood basically in moral and legal terms, as a way of life leading to forgiveness and salvation. In Antioch and Asia Minor, it was seen as the keystone of history, the culmination of God's great creating and liberating acts, leading humankind to freedom and communion with the Divine. Eventually, these various views would cause conflicts among those who held them.

The worship of these first centuries was simple. For the most part, it took place in private homes or in burial places, such as the catacombs, although by the third century there were some buildings, or at least rooms, set aside for Christian worship. The center of such worship was Communion, which at first involved a full meal. By the second century, however, it consisted of bread and wine, and the meal was either separated from it or dropped altogether. Baptism, usually by descending into water and having it poured over one's head, was the act of Christian initiation. Scholars do not agree as to whether or not the early church baptized infants. But by the beginning of the third century, such was a clearly established practice. By then, baptism was usually administered on Easter—and sometimes on other great feast days—after a long period of preparation. The last few weeks of such preparation, in which the entire church made ready to renew its own baptismal vows, gave rise to the season of Lent.

Constantine's conversion, and the support he and his successors gave the church, brought about great changes. Of these the most obvious was the cessation of persecution. Eventually, it was paganism that was put at a disadvantage, although it lingered in rural areas at least until the sixth century. But there were also other significant changes. Church architecture developed into great basilicas, in imitation of the great buildings of the Roman Empire. In them, the liturgy became more elaborate, with the introduction of incense, choirs, processions, vestments, and so forth. People flocked into the church, and among the newly converted were many of the most prestigious and powerful families of the empire. In the field of theology, doctrinal questions often became entangled with political issues, and there were those who sought to best their opponents, not by the force of their arguments, but by the force of imperial decree.

Probably, most Christians were delighted with these developments. After centuries under the constant threat of persecution, the new imperial favor seemed a boon from heaven. EUSEBIUS OF CAESAREA, the great church historian, was probably speaking for the majority of Christians when he sought to present the entire history of the church as culminating in the conversion of Constantine, and the persecutions of earlier times as the result of a grave misunderstanding on the part of the empire as to the true nature of Christianity.

Others, however, were not so thrilled by the events of their time. Many felt that Christianity must be akin to the hard struggle of an athlete, and that now Constantine and his successors were making it too easy. Thousands therefore took up MONASTICISM, which had earlier roots, but gained momentum after Constantine. By the late fourth century, some travelers commented, with slight exaggeration, that the Egyptian desert was as populated as some cities. Eventually, monasticism would develop into one of Christianity's main missionary instruments. But in its origins it was mostly preoccupied with one's salvation, particularly at a time when the outward success of the church made it so difficult to be a true Christian.

Others reacted even more strongly. In North Africa, DONATISM and its radical branch, the Circumcellions, broke away from the rest of the church, presumably over the question of the validity of rites performed by ministers who had lapsed during the persecution, but also over ethnic and socioeconomic issues. This division continued weakening the church in the area until Christianity was wiped out by the Muslim invasions in the seventh century.

But many of the greatest leaders of the church responded with neither total complaisance nor outright rejection. Most of the great leaders of the church during the fourth century—ATHANASIAS, BASIL THE GREAT, AMBROSE, JOHN CHRYSOSTOM, and others—clashed on occasion with the emperors or their officers. All of them rejected the worldly pomp that tempted so many of their contemporaries. In a way, all of them took up many of the monastic ideals. But instead of withdrawing to the desert they took up the task of leading the church as it sought its new place in society, and as it was rent by political and theological divisions.

In the field of theology, the great controversy immediately following the conversion of Constantine revolved around ARIANISM and the question of the divinity of the Son. Arius and his followers declared that the Son, although the first of all creatures, was nevertheless created. His opponents insisted that the Son was fully divine, and therefore eternal. In the Council of NICEA in A.D. 325, the bishops gathered at Constantine's invitation to settle this and other questions. There they decided that the Son was "of one substance" with the Father—homousion—and therefore not a creature. But this did not end the controversy. Athanasius became the champion of the Nicene cause for over fifty years, and after his death his task was continued by the CAPPADOCIAN FATHERS. Finally, at the Council of CONSTANTINOPLE in A.D. 381, Arianism was condemned once again. By then, the debate had been enlarged to include also the divinity of the Holy Spirit, and therefore this council actually promulgated the doctrine of the TRINITY. Arianism continued to exist, particularly among the Germanic tribes north of the Danube, and would become an issue once again after the invasion of western Europe and North Africa by those tribes.

The end of the fourth century and the beginning of the fifth was the time of JEROME (A.D. 348–420) and his younger contemporary AUGUSTINE of Hippo (A.D. 354–430). Jerome's greatest work was a direct translation of the Bible into Latin from its original languages. This translation, known as the VULGATE or popular Bible, became the standard text of Scripture for the Latin-speaking West throughout the Middle Ages, and for the Roman Catholic Church until recent times. Augustine was a native of North Africa, where he spent most of his life. After a long spiritual pilgrimage that took him to Manichaeism, Skepticism, and Neoplatonism, he finally returned to the faith of his mother, Monica. For a time he hoped to spend the rest of his life in monastic contemplation. But he was forced to become a priest and then a bishop, and as such he was involved in many of the controversies of his time. In his opposition to PELAGIANISM, he developed views on grace and predestination that would long influence and haunt the church. Against the Donatists, he argued for the validity of sacraments in spite of the possible unworthiness of the celebrant. His understanding of the nature of evil and of knowledge, which he drew mostly from Neoplatonic sources, would become standard for Western Christianity at least until the thirteenth century. For all these reasons, Augustine was the great teacher from whom the Middle Ages learned theology, and therefore all medieval theology bears his mark.

Augustine died in 430, when the Vandals were at the walls of Hippo. Twenty years earlier, Rome itself had fallen to the Goths. It was the end of an age, and the beginning of another in which the church would be called upon to play a substantially different role. (Compare MIDDLE AGES, HISTORY OF CHRISTIANITY IN THE.)

J.G.

EASTER. The festival celebrating the resurrection of Jesus Christ from the dead, the central focus of the Christian church's worship year.

While Easter, a spring festival, is paired in the average Christian's mind with Christmas, the winter festival of Christ's birth, the celebration of Easter with its message of Christ's victory over sin, death, and the devil is actually the foundation of the faith and the point around which the church's life turns. As Paul says in I Corinthians 15:17, "If Christ has not been raised, your faith is futile and you are still in your sins."

The early church worshipped on the first day of the week (Sunday) because it was "The Lord's Day," that is, the Day of Resurrection. Thus every Sunday is a celebration of Jesus' RESURRECTION. However, in the sub-Apostolic age, at the end of the first century, an annual commemoration of the Resurrection was established. It was simply called Pascha; the Greek translation of the Hebrew festival of PASSOVER, the season at which Christ's death and resurrection took place. (The similarity of Pascha to Paschein, the Greek verb meaning "to suffer," caused many Christians at the time erroneously to think the festival meant "suffering." Similarly, it was formerly thought that the English term "Easter" was derived from the German "Ostern," both words ultimately being based on the old Anglo-Saxon name Eastre or Ostara, for the goddess of spring. More recent studies seem to indicate that Easter may be derived from the Latin phrase hebdomada alba, the old term for Easter week based upon the wearing of white robes by the newly baptized. The octave of Easter, the following week, was known as post albas, the time when the white robes were put away.)

Easter may thus mean "white" and be named from early Christian baptismal practices. If this is the case, it is very appropriate, since Easter early became the favorite season for the instruction of converts, followed by their baptism, confirmation, and first Communion. Indeed, the period of preparation or catechesis of the new converts became the basis of the Lenten season, which was ultimately extended over a forty-day period, modeled on Jesus' forty-day fast in the wilderness after his baptism by John the Baptist.

After the Christian Sunday (beginning on the very first Easter itself), the festival of Easter is the oldest festival (or holy day) celebrated by the Christian church. Because of the "every Sunday is Easter" feelings of the sub-Apostolic church, the annual celebration was early called "the Great Easter" (as it still is in the Orthodox churches). It is instructive that this festival is called Pascha, as Paul declares "Christ our passover is sacrificed for us" in I Corinthians 5:7 KJV. The earliest observance of Pascha was precisely the anniversary of the original event, the 14th of Nisan (March-April) as it is dated by the Synoptic Gospels, who hold that Jesus died the day after Passover (that is, the Last Supper, Mark 14; Luke 22; Matt. 16) was celebrated. This, of course, conflicts with the Fourth Gospel's account, which holds that Jesus died on the 15th of Nisan, the day before Passover was celebrated. Obviously, if the anniversary of the Resurrection is observed precisely on the 14th of Nisan every year, then the festival will usually not fall on a Sunday. This early led some churches to celebrate Easter on the Sunday nearest the 14th of Nisan. Already in the NT Paul speaks of the Christian worship day as "the first day of the week" (I Cor. 16:2), and the sub-Apostolic Ignatius simply speaks of "The Lord's Day" in his writings, because every Sunday is the Day of Resurrection.

Among the problems that arose was that Pascha on the 14th of Nisan was observed as a fast day, but this conflicted with the weekly observance of the Resurrection on Sunday. Those who insisted that the anniversary be kept as the chief observance were called QUARTODECIMANS, from the Latin for "fourteen." Polycarp of Asia Minor divided with Anicetus of Rome over this issue, and the church in Asia Minor became quattuordeciman. Rome considered Sunday as carrying more weight than the annual anniversary, so Sunday was always celebrated as Easter there. The conflict was resolved eventually by the Council of Nicaea in A.D. 325. The resolution of the proper day of celebration was quite complex. Nicaea held that Easter would be held on Sunday, the Sunday immediately following the fourteenth day of the Passover moon, that is, the moon that appears on or immediately after the vernal equinox (or March 21, in our modern calendars). Easter, therefore, must take place between March 22 and April 25, since, for the earliest date, the fourteenth day of the Passover moon would have to be the vernal equinox and for the latest date, the fifteenth day of the Passover moon would have to be on March 21, so that a full lunar month would have to pass before the fourteenth day of the moon after the vernal equinox could occur again. Because the fourteenth day could (and sometimes does) fall on a Sunday, Easter Day wouldn't be celebrated for another week—which is April 25.

This complicated decision was reaffirmed by the Council of Antioch in A.D. 341. However, changes in the calendar, especially the Gregorian reform in the sixteenth century and adjustments of the nineteen-year lunar cycle in the West, have caused a divergence between the date of Easter in the Latin West and the Orthodox East. Easter, only occasionally now, falls on the same date for these major wings of the Christian church.

From the beginning Easter has been observed with fasting, vigils, and the celebration of the Eucharist. The earliest observance was to keep the 14th of Nisan as a fast day. Early this vigil of fasting was instituted over Saturday night to Sunday (when Sunday was set as Easter). Baptism was sometimes performed during this night watch, which was ended with Holy Communion at dawn. Fasting was extended to Friday and later to Thursday. Gradually, the whole observance of HOLY WEEK was established, and, over a period of time, the forty days of LENT. After Easter arrived, it was celebrated with joy (no kneeling or fasting) for fifty days until Pentecost.

Easter is strongly bound up with the celebration of the Eucharist. According to the Lateran Council in Rome, A.D. 1215, those who were lax in church attendance were urged to commune on Easter, if at no other time, under pain of excommunication and refusal of Christian burial. Recent liturgical developments have strengthened the traditional, historical roots of Christian worship in the Western churches. Easter is now celebrated as the "Great Sunday" in the Roman Catholic Church and is more elaborately celebrated by all denominations of Protestants. Of course, Easter observance is opposed by certain world-denying sects, such as the Worldwide Church of God and other Sabbatarian groups. Controversies over the proper observance of Easter are quite traditional, as noted above. In part the growth of different observances and practices arose because of the conflicting accounts of the dates of Jesus' death and resurrection in the Gospels themselves. According to the Synoptic Gospels, Jesus rose on the 14th of Nisan, but according to John, it was the 15th of Nisan. Various scholars have held that either the Synoptics are correct (the majority) or that John is correct. Some have suggested that John was simply using powerful symbolism to show Jesus dying at the same time as the Passover lambs. One interesting harmonization holds that both traditions are correct. In John we have the reflection of the Sadducees' practice of Passover and in the Synoptics we have the Pharisees' practice, who celebrated the Passover early whenever it might fall on a Sabbath.

Easter is unusual, too, in that it is actually celebrated fifty-two times a year, every Sunday. Therefore, choosing one Sunday out of these fifty-two for a special celebration is a bit odd. Running against the whole concept of Christian holy days is the early Christian feeling that Paul expresses negatively concerning Jewish "new moons" and "fasts." We do not know how widespread the keeping of traditional Jewish practices and holy days was among the early Christians, but we do know that the Jewish Christians of Jerusalem continued to worship in the Temple until the Christians fled from the city during the Roman-Jewish war of A.D. 66-73. Certainly, Paul, despite his opposition to "new moons," kept the Jewish customs, for he was arrested at the Temple, where he had gone to fulfill a Jewish vow. (Contrast Gal. 3:1-5 with Acts 21:26ff. and 22:17.) Nonetheless, Paul stresses the observance of the first day of the week (I Cor. 16:2).

Justin Martyr mentions the celebration of the Resurrection annually. Tertullian's works reflect a controversy between Hebrew-Christians and Gentile-Christians about the nature of Easter observance. Tertullian implies that the Pascha was more like our Lent than our Easter, a time of sorrow for sin rather than joy in the Resurrection. It may be that the observance of the Father's day was actually like our GOOD FRIDAY, a recollection of the Lord's death, rather than of his victory over death. Then the following Sunday would have been celebrated as the day of resurrection, just as every Sunday was, but not necessarily in a special, annual way.

These controversies do nothing to diminish the sacredness and significance of Easter. Indeed, they demonstrate the overwhelming importance of the event that every Sunday—and every Easter—celebrates and commemorates. Christianity is the faith of those who participate in the resurrection faith of the apostles, martyrs, confessors, and simple believers of every land, in every time.

J.C.

EASTERN ORTHODOX CHURCH. See ORTHODOX CHURCHES.

EBED-MELECH ("servant of the king"). An Ethiopian eunuch who obtained King Zedekiah's permission to rescue Jeremiah from a miry cistern. The prophet was spared death by hunger when Ebed-melech, along with three assistants, lifted him out with ropes (Jer. 38:7-13). This deed was rewarded by Yahweh's promise that Ebed-melech would survive Jerusalem's imminent destruction (39:15-18).
J.K.K.

EBENEZER ("stone of help"). The scene near Aphek (possibly Majdel Yaba, northeast of Jaffa), where the Israelites were decisively defeated by the Philistines, who captured the ark (I Sam. 4:1-11; 5:1). Also the name that Samuel assigned a stone he erected near Mizpah to commemorate an Israelite triumph over the Philistines (7:10-12).
J.K.K.

EBIONITES. The name is derived from the Hebrew word for "poor." It refers to a sect of Jews, perhaps previously Essenes, who after the fall of Jerusalem in A.D. 70 turned to Jesus Christ as the greatest of the prophets but rejected him as the Son of God—a position resembling that of Muslims today. They can be considered as Christian only in the sense that they accepted Jesus as the Jewish Messiah. Epiphanius, our primary source of information about them, reveals that their theology included a denial of the virgin birth of Christ, a rejection of any implication of salvation in the religion of Jesus, an acceptance of Jesus as a prophet who came to lead Judaism back to its true purity, a continued observance of the Law including circumcision and the Sabbath, and a rejection of Temple worship and animal sacrifice. They are mentioned by Irenaeus in the second century, Origen in the third, and Epiphanius in the fourth. We have no certain information on them in the first century. What we do know is gleaned from these later authors. They are important because they testify to the various streams of heterodox Jewish Christian thought prevalent in the early Christian centuries.
J.R.M.

EBLA. A city known in antiquity, but only since 1964 has its true importance been revealed as a result of excavations carried out by the Italian Archaeological Mission of the University of Rome. The site of the excavations has been definitely identified with Tell Mardikh, a mound covering 138 acres about thirty-four miles southwest of Aleppo in Syria. The excavations have revealed in great detail the history, language, and culture of a powerful people who flourished in the third millennium B.C. and who influenced the history of that era in ways that had never been imagined prior to the discoveries that began in 1964.

History. The oldest known map in the world, a clay tablet found at the site of ancient NUZI in 1930, probably indicates Ebla at the far west of the world in the Mesopotamian perspective. It was a post on the trade route leading to UGARIT on the coast, and accordingly it was occasionally mentioned by Near Eastern historians as a city of some minor importance, one of what must have been many way stations in a land populated by a largely nomadic or semi-nomadic society.

This reasonable conjecture was completely shattered by the archaeological facts for which no tradition had prepared. Through archaeology Ebla has been revealed to have been not a nomadic caravan resting place but the chief city of a true empire, one that carried on trade on equal terms with the great Sargon of Akkad (2360–2310 B.C.) in Mesopotamia and which, as the occasion afforded, made war on Sargon's successors and subjected them to tribute. The kings of the Eblaite dynasty were Igrish-Halam, Ar-Ennum, Ebrum (probably equal to the biblical Eber of Gen. 10:21), Ibhi-Sipish, Dubuhu-Ada, and Irkab-Damu. They were termed mālik (Hebrew melek, meaning "king"). Under Ebrum, Ebla seems to have achieved its greatest height, including the subjugation of Akkad. In his reign there were also relations with the Hittites to the north and the Palestinians to the south, and eastward as far as Elam. The capital city of Ebla at this time may have had a population of a quarter million or so.

The recent restitution of understanding about the significance of Ebla in the ancient Near East is almost, but not entirely, unprecedented in the historical reconstruction of antiquity. Almost, because (classical) Greece and Rome continue to be the "antiquity" of many Europeans and Americans, despite the fact that a two-century-old Egyptian and Mesopotamian archaeology should have separated them by several millennia from the age of Aeschylus and Horace. Ebla provides much opportunity for acquiring knowledge about a hardly known past and a cautionary example of what little we know about anything.

Language. This is one of the most controversial areas in Ebla research. On the one hand, what we have been able to say above about the history of Ebla derives first of all from the wealth of epigraphic material—about fifteen thousand clay tablets in cuneiform script—found in its ruins, most of them in a marvelous state of preservation. The tablets represent, for the most part, royal archives and commercial documents, which only indirectly bear on history, geography, politics, or culture. To the extent that they do have such a bearing, it is obviously in a quite neutral fashion. Most of the Ebla tablets are written in Sumerian—the lingua franca of the third millennium B.C., just as Akkadian would become the lingua franca of the second millennium, and Aramaic would be that of the first. The Sumerian syllabary (pending the invention of the alphabet a few centuries later) proved to be a serviceable, though imperfect, device for reproducing by sounds and ideograms the words and thoughts of other languages. The evidence shows that this syllabary was put to use to reproduce, rather clumsily, the native language of Ebla.

What precisely that language was continues to be the subject of some dispute. For some scholars it was a Proto-Hebrew, cognate with biblical Hebrew, down to some rather exact details. For others it was, indeed, a western Semitic language like Hebrew, but a different dialect entirely, simply another of the doubtless many languages that were used locally at that time in Syria/Canaan. The exact relation of the Eblaite to the Hebrew language, without doubt, has some connection with the historical relation of Ebla to the Bible, but at the present time the relation is more to be investigated than presumed. The ambiguity of the Sumerian ideograms continues to prevail in quite divergent conclusions and interpretations.

Culture. Have the Ebla discoveries cast any light on the Bible? Directly, probably not; but indirectly, probably so. (a) An Eblaite kingdom that flourished about 2300 B.C. can hardly have had any direct influence on Hebrew origins, which by even the earliest estimate of the "patriarchal age" could have occurred only centuries later. Names like the one we have noted above, Ebrum equals Eber, as well as many others verified or alleged to have been verified at Ebla (for example, Abraham, Israel, Ishmael, Michael, and others), are all common western Semitic, and no one would suggest that they imply a direct connection between Ebla and the Bible. Earlier thoughts that the five "cities of the plain" (Genesis 14) or the connection implied in Genesis 11:31 between Ur and Haran had been corroborated by the Ebla materials but now seem to have been abandoned as premature judgments.

(b) What Ebla has revealed is that there was in northern Syria prior to the "patriarchal age" a great center of civilization that could easily have served as one of the matrices of Hebrew origins, even as the Bible claims. The language of Ebla deserves, as it surely will get, the further examination that will determine its relation to biblical Hebrew and also, perhaps, the relation of the Eblaite to the biblical Hebrews. One of the common Hebrew and Eblaite cultural traits that seems to have been turned up is the prevalence of case law. Case law is one of the commonplaces of Semitic jurisprudence, first brought into conjunction with biblical law with the discovery in the past century of the law code of Hammurabi of Babylon (1728-1686 B.C.). The Ebla evidence advances the parallels by more than a half millennium.

The divine names inscribed in the Ebla tablets correspond strikingly with those that the Bible ascribes to its Near Eastern scene, though there are some significant differences. Thus Dagan, the god of grain and the fields, is the same at Ebla and in the Bible; the Eblaite Rasap (the god of disaster) is equal to the Hebrew Rešep; the sun-god(dess) Sipiš at Ebla is the Hebrew God Šemeš; the Eblaite Aštar, a masculine deity, is the Hebrew goddess Astarte; the Babylonian Ishtar, patroness of fertility; and no one will have difficulty in recognizing in the Eblaite Kamiš the biblical Chemosh, the god of the Moabites.

Especially to be mentioned in this connection is the putative existence in the Eblaite pantheon of the god Ya. He was in any case certainly not the chief or even a chief deity in this pantheon (which numbered in its membership a minimum of five hundred gods). His very existence depends on the interpretation of Sumerian ideograms. If he did exist at Ebla, the fact could be significant in view of what happened with a later western Semitic people for whom the god Yahw(eh) became the primary and eventually the only God.

B.V.

ECCE HOMO. Latin words meaning "behold the man," derived from Luke 23:14, where Pilate turns Jesus over to the chief priests and rulers of the people. Traditionally, they have become the title for paintings depicting the sufferings of Jesus. In 1865, this phrase was used by John Seeley as the title for a book in which he offered a typically liberal portrayal of Jesus as a teacher of high moral values.

J.G.

ECCLESIA. See CHURCH.

ECCLESIASTES. An OT wisdom book whose title comes from the Greek Septuagint by way of Jerome's Latin Vulgate. The Greek translator chose the noun ekklesiastes to render the author's pen name, Qobeleth, a Hebrew participle denoting one who addresses an assembly. Since the time of Luther that name has often been translated "the Preacher," a misleading designation because the rambling, skeptical thoughts on the meaning of human existence here offered little resemble a sermon. No friend of Hebrew orthodoxy, this book won its way into the OT CANON, and as one of the five MEGILLOTH (festival scrolls) is read in the synagogue on the Feast of Tabernacles.

Authorship and Date. That Hebrew tradition that viewed Ecclesiastes as Solomon's handiwork is understandable from the book's superscription (1:1) where it is ascribed to "the Preacher, the son of David, king in Jerusalem." But whoever framed the superscription failed to perceive that when the author referred to himself as "king over Israel in Jerusalem" (1:12), he was engaging in a literary fiction intended to enhance the weight of his argument. That is similarly the case when he mentions "all who were over Jerusalem before me" (1:16), for Solomon was only the second Israelite monarch to rule from that city. Actually, fictitious royal authorship has no impact on content beyond chapter 2. Criticism leveled against the law court or Temple in 3:16, reference to unrelieved suffering of the oppressed in 4:1, and flaws of monarchy implied in 4:13 and 10:5 distill the sentiments of one who does not wield political authority. Moreover, the book's numerous Aramaisms (Aramaic being a late form of Hebrew anticipating that of the Mishnah), and general familiarity with Greek thought speak for an era that markedly postdates Solomon. Unfortunately, Ecclesiastes never mentions known historical events. The book could not be later than 200 B.C., since it influenced ben Sira (around 180 B.C.) and was found amid the manuscripts at Qumran. A third-century B.C. date therefore makes good sense.

Presumably the author was an older man of considerable experience (12:1) and perhaps also a person of means, for his renunciation of pleasure as the fruit of great wealth lacks the ring of a high-minded ascetic (2:1-11). While trained in conventional, pragmatic wisdom, this Hebrew existentialist advocated an unconventional, skeptical wisdom as he taught gatherings of students and disciples (12:9). His pursuit of wisdom, involving weighing, studying, and arranging the proverbs he gathered, was more than a private endeavor. Alexandria, Phoenicia, and Jerusalem have all been suggested as his home. The fiction of 1:12 with its mention of Jerusalem is not compelling, though Qoheleth's casual regard for religious observance (5:1-7) implies a Jerusalem residence in proximity to the Temple, whose existence he took for granted. Apart from the superscription (1:11), a composite epilogue (12:9-14), and a few interpolations programmed to salvage the traditional notion of retribution (for example, 3:17; 8:12-13; 11:9b), the entire book bears Qoheleth's own stamp as he sought to give his uncommon wisdom visibility.

Literary Dimensions. (a) Style and form. Qoheleth manifests a synthetic and cumulative style, which finds its inner unity in a uniformity of language. With the author's proclivity for repetition, a preferred vocabulary readily emerges including such favored expressions as "under the sun," "this also is vanity," "one fate," and "toil." The book's autobiographical form resembles the Egyptian genre of "royal testament" wherein the pharaohs or their viziers reflect about life for the benefit of young aspiring monarchs. Among the significant small units Qoheleth employs are the one-line sentence proverb (1:18), comparative saying (A is better than B, 4:13), and the negative exhortation (10:20). Some proverbs are cited for refutation purposes. Thus Qoheleth's approval of "a handful of quietness" (4:6) rebuts the traditional proverb, "the fool folds his hands, and eats his own flesh" (4:5). Moreover, the book contains many rhetorical questions ordinarily anticipating a negative answer (1:3; 2:22; 6:12). On occasion, large speech units derive from the fusion of various elements (1:12-2:26).

(b) Structure. Most contemporary scholarship denies that Qoheleth is merely a loose assemblage of independent aphoristic units lacking unified order or thought sequence. A basic structuring may underlie the polarities of Qoheleth's thinking (for example, talk vs. silence, toil vs. joy). Helpful recent studies emphasizing patterns of verbal repetition in the text produce these observations: A prologue containing a poem on toil that is presumably Qoheleth's (1:2-11) and an epilogue that is not (12:9-14) frame the body of the book, which yields two large units (1:12-6:9; 6:10-11:6) and a concluding instruction about youth and old age (11:7-12:8). The phrase "(vanity and) a striving after wind" (1:17; 2:11, 17, 26; 4:6, 16; 6:9) serves as a structural divider terminating seven sections within the first unit. Ten sections within the second unit, concluding at 6:12; 7:14, 24, 29; 8:17; 9:6, 10, 12; 10:15; and 11:6, employ such phrases as "not find out," "who can find out," "no knowledge," "does not know." Clearly, the recognition of a structure based on the repetition of key phrases makes the author's driving concerns more accessible.

Qoheleth's Message. (a) Life's vanity. Ever pressing his famous phrase, "vanity of vanities" (1:2; 12:8), Qoheleth protests that life is absolutely empty (2:17, 22-23). Using the Hebrew noun hebel (normally rendered "vanity"), he underscores the tenuous aspect of mortal life. Human events pursue a wearisome and monotonous course (1:9). Knowledge (1:13-18), wealth (5:10-17), and pleasure (2:1-11) are illusory. History's ephemeral events are quickly forgotten (1:10-11). Justice is mocked in the real world where the wicked outlive the good (7:15). And if wisdom is better than folly (2:13), death, which ultimately overtakes humans and beasts (3:19), cancels any gain that wisdom might secure.

(b) God's inscrutability. Not at all agnostic, Qoheleth observes that God "has made everything beautiful in its time; also he has put eternity into man's mind, yet so that he cannot find out what God has done from the beginning to the end" (3:11). Though he recognizes God's transcendence and sovereignty, he complains that in God's action, God leaves insufficient traces for the divine presence to be recognized (11:5). Qoheleth cannot fathom the divine purpose, nor does he directly address God through prayer or lament. Indeed, any relation with this unknowable, all-powerful Deity had best be informed by prudence.

(c) Life's compensations. Qoheleth is not a nihilist given to recommending suicide. Rather, he soberly challenges humanity to embrace the God-given present as it is. He believes that individuals can derive satisfaction from daily work (3:22); experience restrained pleasure in social relationships (2:24; 3:12-13; 5:18; 9:7); and find joy in discreet worship (5:1-2), warm friendships (4:9-12), and marriage (9:9).

(d) Conclusion. Qoheleth's fondness for empiricism convinced him that the data of revealed religion should not be blindly affirmed. The glib solutions of orthodoxy that hovered about the doctrine of retribution irritated him. He chose to confront life's uncertainties with full honesty. Though the promise of his practical counsel bears a low profile, this existentialist insists that life should be lived fully (Compare EXISTENTIALISM).

J.K.K.

ECCLESIASTICUS. While the designation Ecclesiasticus first appeared in third-century A.D. Latin translations, as is evident from its alternative title, "The Wisdom of Jesus the Son of Sirach," here is a noteworthy example of Jewish WISDOM literature. The only book in the APOCRYPHA whose author is known by name (50:27), it contains a rich poetic collection of mainly practical precepts addressing quite diverse human activity.

The Author. Presumably residing in Jerusalem, Jesus ben ("son of") Sira published his distilled wisdom teaching between 190 and 180 B.C. This date assumes that the recently deceased high priest Simon, eulogized in 50:1-21, is Simon II mentioned in Josephus' Antiquities, who held office about 219-196. Several of ben Sira's professional activities are hinted in the text. Putting his leisure to good use (38:24), he diligently studied "the law of the Most High," yet examined non-Israelite wisdom traditions as well (39:1). A seasoned sage who traveled abroad and counseled rulers (39:4), he shared his empirical thinking with well-to-do young men who attended his academy (51:23). The prologue states that ben Sira's grandson translated the Hebrew text into Greek after he joined the Jewish Diaspora in Egypt in 132 B.C., during "the thirty-eighth year of the reign of Euergetes" (Ptolemy VII).

Literary Aspects. The book divides into two main sections (chaps. 1-23; 24-50), each beginning with a long poem celebrating wisdom (1:1-20; 24:1-31). An appendix yields a thanksgiving psalm for deliverance (51:1-12) and, in imitation of Proverbs 31:10-31, a concluding alphabetic acrostic (51:13-30) telling how ben Sira acquired and dispensed wisdom. He primarily drew his literary inspiration from Proverbs and Psalms. His book is full of short two-line proverbs normally gathered into larger topical units. Thus 2:1-18 contains exhortations to endure affliction patiently; 3:1-16 admonitions to obey parents; and 6:1-17 advice on cultivating friendships. Ben Sira likewise composed devotional lyrics taking the form of hymns (42:15-43:33), communal prayer for national deliverance (36:1-17), and thanksgiving (51:1-12). His well-known hymn praising God for Israel's past history and honoring the piety of its greatest heroes (44:1-50:24) assumes epic proportions.

Message. Ben Sira offers social advice and theological insight. The former covers such topics as family life, self-control, business partnerships, banquet behavior, giving alms, and the usefulness of physicians. Yet as a theologian, he deftly handles such matters as the coexistence of good and evil in the divine ordering of Creation (33:7-15); the reality of divine providence (16:24-17:24); the coalescence of wisdom and law, whereby personified, semi-divine wisdom makes her dwelling in Israel (chap. 24); and the significance of Israel's Deity as a God of history who positively has much influence on its concrete existence (44:1-50:24, replete with phrases echoing the biblical narrative).

J.K.K.

ECCLESIOLOGY. That section of theology that deals systematically with the biblical and traditional teachings concerning the CHURCH. Ecclesiology developed from Paul's view of the BODY OF CHRIST to the medieval definition of the church as an institution to the Protestant view of an invisible fellowship with Christ the Head.

J.C.

ECKHART, MEISTER JOHANNES (1260-1327). German mystic, preacher, and theologian. Born in Hochheim, he joined the Dominicans and studied at Cologne and Paris, later teaching at both. Famed for preaching, he held numerous offices including Provincial of Saxony, vicar-general of Bohemia and Strasbourg, and regent-master at Cologne. His extensive, controversial writings—theses, sermons, commentaries, and treatises—aroused opposition. Accusations of heresy embittered his final years. Tried at Cologne for teaching heresy, he appealed but died before receiving a decision. Early in 1327 he publicly professed his faith at Cologne, revoking anything said or written not conforming to orthodoxy. Eckhart admitted rashness, not unorthodoxy, but Pope John XXII in 1329 condemned twenty-eight of his statements as heretical.

Eckhart believed in Neoplatonic MYSTICISM: God is beyond being and non-being, yet present in the world and the soul. Seeing God's spark within as our only reality, Eckhart strove for identification with God and a loss of self-identity. Preparation was accomplished by renouncing one's self and imitating Christ's good works and spontaneous love. Church rituals were secondary. Ecstatic, divine union came by God's grace, lifting one beyond consciousness of "I." Eckhart heavily influenced John Tauler, Henry Suso, and Thomas a Kempis.

C.M.

ECSTASY. See RELIGIOUS EXPERIENCE.

ECUMENICAL COUNCILS. Assemblies of bishops representing the entire church, usually convened in order to deal with pressing theological or practical issues. The Eastern churches, as well as several non-Roman Western churches, accept only the first seven such councils. These early councils were normally called by the emperor. At later times, particularly during the height of CONCILIARISM, there have been debates over who has the right to convene an ecumenical council. According to Roman Catholic canon law, that right belongs to the pope, and therefore all the more recent councils have been called by popes. The first seven ecumenical councils are as follows: (1) NICAEA (A.D. 325) rejected ARIANISM and issued a creed from which the modern NICENE CREED has evolved.

(2) CONSTANTINOPLE (381) confirmed the decisions of Nicaea and proclaimed the divinity of the Holy Spirit. Together, these two councils defined the doctrine of the TRINITY.

(3) EPHESUS (431) rejected the CHRISTOLOGY of the NESTORIANS, and declared that MARY is the "bearer of God."

(4) CHALCEDON (451) issued a Definition of Faith, which became the standard for christological orthodoxy. This spoke of "two natures" in the "one person" of Christ. Those who rejected the "two natures" were eventually dubbed Monophysites.

(5) II Constantinople (553) condemned the so-called "Three Chapters," which were the works of three theologians that supposedly supported Nestorianism.

(6) III Constantinople (680) condemned monotheism—that is, the doctrine that there is only "one will" in Christ.

(7) II Nicaea (787) defined the veneration due images, rejecting the views of the iconoclasts.

The later councils, accepted only by the Roman Catholic Church, are: (8) IV Constantinople (869), which ended the schism of PHOTIUS; (9) LATERAN I (1123) confirmed the Concordat of Worms, thus ending the conflicts between papacy and empire over investitures; (10) Lateran II (1139); (11) Lateran III (1179); (12) Lateran IV (1215), which promulgated doctrine of transubstantiation and ordered yearly confession for all believers; (13) Lyons I (1245); (14) Lyons II (1274); (15) Vienne (1311–12); (16) CONSTANCE (1414–18), put an end to the GREAT SCHISM; (17) Basel and Ferrara-Florence (1431, 1438); (18) LATERAN V (1512–19); (19) TRENT (1545–63) responded to the Protestant Reformation both by rejecting its doctrines and by issuing decrees for the reformation of Roman Catholicism; (20) VATICAN I (1869–70) promulgated the infallibility of the POPE; (21) VATICAN II (1962–65), which sought to bridge the gap between the church and the modern world.

J.G.

ECUMENICAL MOVEMENT. The movement toward the goal of greater visible unity and ecumenical cooperation among all Christian churches. The ecumenical movement is almost coextensive with the twentieth century, growing out of the great missionary outreach of the various churches in the nineteenth century. More recently, the movement has sought to foster understanding and cooperation between the Christian churches and the other great religions of the world.

The contemporary ecumenical movement began at the 1910 Edinburgh World Missionary Conference. Even the turmoil of World Wars I and II did not shatter the desire of ecumenical leaders to transcend national divisions. Indeed, the WORLD COUNCIL OF CHURCHES was founded in Amsterdam shortly after the end of World War II, in 1947. The need for a worldwide missionary concern was stressed.

Symbol of the ship with the Greek word for ecumenical (oikoumene), meaning "the whole inhabited world." The ecumenical church is the whole church throughout the world.

Other vital ecumenical growth factors included the interdenominational dimension of biblical and theological scholarship and the widespread Christian youth movements. The close cooperation of Christians of all communions in the struggle against Nazi brutality and to overcome the suffering of war victims and refugees also promoted the desire for more church unity.

The complex problems of the modern world made witnessing in home countries and on mission fields more difficult. A desire to inwardly renew all the churches and to learn from the "younger churches" of the mission fields, as well as a growing insight into the many beliefs and activities that already united the various churches, fueled the drive of the ecumenical spirit. The ecumenical movement still progresses, moving toward more unity with the Lord on the part of individual churches, which will one day result in more visible unity of the churches in the world. (Compare CONSULTATION ON CHURCH UNION.)

J.C.

EDDY, MARY BAKER. See CHURCH OF CHRIST, SCIENTIST.

EDEN, GARDEN OF. The word Eden seems to have been derived from the Sumerian/Akkadian word edin(u) meaning "prairie, plain." As it figures in Israelite mythology, it is the name of no precise geographical determination (vaguely "in the east," Gen. 2:8), a land of a time before time with no connection with the real world of history.

The garden of Eden (Gen. 2:8 actually speaks of a garden in Eden), also called the garden of God (Ezek. 31:9), was the Israelite equivalent of the Greek Mount Olympus or the Canaanite "sources of the rivers and the two oceans," that is, the abode of God. Here were lush foliage and great trees, abundant water, and all the accompaniments of divinity: fiery and precious stones and metals, the mythical cherub, a locale in which primordial man could live idyllically without pain or trouble (compare Ezek. 28:12-14).

It is easy to see how elements of this mythology have been adapted to the Yahwist's story of the FALL in Genesis 2:46-3:24. Neither Genesis nor the other biblical sources add up to a single myth, but all testify to the components of one. In Genesis the myth provides the framework for an etiological story of origins, retaining, among other themes, the notion of rejection from a previous ideal state. However, the details (for example, the functions of the cherub, the trees, many other particulars) vary so much in the sources, it may be there was no one myth on which they all depended, but rather they may have made use of what they would of a common fund of unrelated motifs.

B. V.

EDICT OF MILAN. The name usually given to the joint decision by CONSTANTINE and Licinius to put an end to persecution—although in truth it was not an edict, nor was it issued from Milan. The text announcing the emperors' decision is quoted, with significant variations, by Eusebius of Caesarea and Lactantius.

J. G.

EDICT OF NANTES. A proclamation issued by French King Henry IV, April 1598, guaranteeing freedom of conscience, places of worship, and full civil rights to French Protestants (HUGUENOTS). King Henry (Henry of Navarre) had been a Huguenot but turned Roman Catholic to clinch his kingship. The edict was revoked in 1685.

C. M.

EDIFICATION. The word is used figuratively to translate a Greek term whose literal meaning is "building." The derived meaning is, therefore, "to be built up spiritually or strengthened in faith." It is the privilege as well as obligation of mature Christians to "build one another up" (I Thess. 5:11), and this is done not through acquiring knowledge alone but through love (I Cor. 8:1). The early church used the full assemblies of its members especially for this purpose, during which they were to be especially careful to exercise their gifts in a way that would edify everyone because, according to I Corinthians, "he who speaks in a tongue edifies himself, but he who prophesies edifies the church" (14:4). They should "strive to excel in building up the church" (14:12). The rule, Paul asserted, was "let all things be done for edification" (14:26). When one edifies a neighbor one is following the example of Christ (Rom. 15:2-3). Paul insists that he received authority from Christ for the purpose of edifying, not tearing down, the Corinthians (II Cor. 10:8; 13:10). The spiritual gifts were, therefore, entrusted to all church leaders for the purpose of building up the Body of Christ (Eph. 4:12).

J. R. M.

EDITOR. See DOCUMENTARY HYPOTHESIS.

EDOM/EDOMITES. With this land and this people the Israelites maintained a love-hate relationship throughout the entirety of their historical existence. The relationship was fostered by a tradition that was dependent both on ethnological and historical fact and on mythical speculation.

Some of the western Semitic tribes who eventually made up the people of Israel were Edomite in origin. According to Deuteronomy 2:12-22 the Edomites were dispossessing the aborigines ("Horites" in this context) of the land of Seir about the same time the Israelites were invading the land further to the north of Palestine and dispossessing the Canaanites/Amorites. Furthermore, such elements of the Israelites (Judahites, in this case) as the Kenizzites, for example, or Calebites are clearly identified time and again as of Edomite ancestry (compare Gen. 36:11-15).

These data simply indicate that the Israelites retained the memory of an ethnic kinship with their Arab brothers to the south, even as they acknowledged kinship with various other Arab peoples. In the case of Edom, the kinship was memorialized in the legend of Jacob and Esau, twin brothers born of the patriarch Isaac, according to which Esau (continually in the story associated with Seir—by popular etymology, "hairy"—or Edom—by popular etymology, "red [land]") was presented as the foil to his more cultivated brother Jacob (Israel) who outmatched and outthought him at every juncture. Also, in Numbers 20:14-21, Israel is represented as having requested free passage through Edom in the name of brotherhood at the time of the conquest and, having been rebuffed, as having bypassed their territory. Amos 1:11-12 likewise obviously regards the Edomites as natural brothers of the Israelites.

The very origin of one of the most formative traditions of Israel, namely that of Sinai, may well have been Edomite. The location of Sinai/Horeb is notoriously impossible to pinpoint in any scientific way. According to Judges 5:4-5 (see also Deut. 33:2), in the most logical reading of the text, Mount Sinai is identical with Mount Seir-Edom. The biblical indications are ambiguous as to whether Mount Seir should be located on the east or the west of the Arabah gorge. The Edomites inhabited territory on both sides, in the Negeb of Palestine and south of the Dead Sea.

Edom was celebrated in Israelite tradition as one of the primary sources of "wisdom" (compare Jer. 49:7; Obad. 8). This tradition becomes very apparent, especially in the book of Job.

The Edomites organized a centralized monarchy long before the Israelites (compare Gen. 36:31-39). Under David they were subjected to Israel (II Sam. 8:13-14), and the Edomite port of EZION-GEBER provided Solomon with one of the sources of his fabulous wealth (I Kings 9:26). The mines of the Arabah and control of crucial trade routes rendered Edom an imperialist prize. After the division of the kingdoms of Israel and Judah, Edom remained for a time subject to Judah, but it regained its independence definitively at least by the time of AHAZ (compare II Kings 16:6).

During the heyday of Assyrian domination the Edomites were faithful vassals of the great kings of the East: the annals of Adad-nirari III, Tiglath-pileser III, Sargon, Sennacherib, Esarhaddon, and Ashurbanipal provide us with the names of contemporary Edomite kings and also tell us the little we know about Edomite religion (the chief god was evidently named Qosh). Edom is not mentioned in the annals of the short-lived Chaldean empire, but there is no doubt it was included in the universal conquest of Nebuchadnezzar (compare Jer. 27:2-7). In fact, the Edomites seem to have joined with the Chaldeans in despoiling Judah (compare Ezek. 36:5; Ps. 137:7)—a fact which explains the bitterness of some of the anti-Edomite material in the OT.

Under John Hyrcanus (134–104 B.C.), founder of the Hasmonean dynasty, an Arabized, Persianized, and Hellenized Edom (Idumea) was conquered by the Jews and forcibly converted to Judaism. Providence repaid them a century later by producing the Idumean tyrant Herod the Great, king of the Jews.

B. V.

EDWARD VI. King of England, 1547–53. The son of HENRY VIII by Jane Seymour, Edward VI promoted Protestantism and introduced the BOOK OF COMMON PRAYER. Tutored by Richard Cox, John Cheke, and Roger Ascham, Edward became king at the age of ten and even then leaned toward Protestantism. Henry had named a council to guide Edward, half favoring the old religion, half the new. However, Edward's uncle, Edward Seymour (Duke of Somerset, Earl of Hertford) was named Protector, and with Thomas Cranmer, Archbishop of Canterbury, dominated the council. The council repealed Henry's Six Articles: legalized both elements in the Communion, permitted clergy to marry, dissolved endowed Masses for the dead, reformed rules for fasting, promoted English in services, and affirmed justification by faith. During Edward's reign foreign reformers came to Cambridge and Oxford—Martin Bucer, Peter Martyr, Bernard Ochino. Edward's Prayer Book, 1549, the first Book of Common Prayer, changed little and was ambiguous on Holy Communion. The Second Prayer Book, 1552, was more Protestant and more popular.

Seymour's failure to secure the betrothal of Edward and Mary, later Queen of Scots, occasioned a short war, which saw the Scots suffering defeat at Pinkie in 1547. Seymour's agrarian policy backfired, and John Dudley (Earl of Warwick, Duke of Northumberland) displaced Seymour as Protector. Seymour was executed in 1552. Dudley then persuaded Edward to deprive Mary and Elizabeth, his half sisters, of succession rights, and to name Lady Jane Grey (Dudley's son's wife) successor. On Edward's death a show of force by Mary brought her the throne and death to Dudley and Lady Jane.

C. M.

EDWARDS, JONATHAN (1703–58). America's first theologian was born on October 5 in East Windsor, Connecticut, the fifth child and only son among ten daughters of Esther Stoddard and Timothy Edwards, a Harvard graduate and minister. Edwards entered Yale in 1716 and after his graduation in 1720, spent two years studying theology. Licensed to preach in 1722, he pastored a Presbyterian church in New York for two years before returning to Yale in May 1724 as a tutor for two years.

In 1727 he was ordained as a colleague to his grandfather SOLOMON STODDARD in Northampton, Massachusetts. When Stoddard died in 1729, Edwards inherited the parish. In July 1727 he married Sarah Pierpont of New Haven. During Stoddard's sixty-year ministry, the church experienced five revivals, and another came in 1734–35 as Edwards preached a series of sermons on justification by faith. He fanned the fire in 1737 with publication of A Faithful Narrative of the Surprising Work of God, and it blazed into the GREAT AWAKENING with the arrival of GEORGE WHITEFIELD in 1740. In 1741 Edwards followed up with a Yale commencement address "The Distinguishing Marks of a Work of the Spirit of God" and in 1742 with "Some Thoughts Concerning the Present Revival of Religion in New England." Edwards' monumental Treatise on Religious Affections was published in 1746. This defense of revivalism and classic in the psychology of religion is foundational to NEW ENGLAND THEOLOGY.

Edwards was dismissed from Northampton in 1750 in a controversy over the standards for admission to Holy Communion. On August 8, 1751, he began a very productive ministry in Stockbridge, an Indian mission. The body of his theology was outlined in Freedom of Will (1754); Original Sin Defended, his 1758 reply to John Taylor; The Nature of True Virtue (1765); and History of the Work of Redemption (1737). He also edited David Brainerd's diary.

Courtesy of the Yale University Art Gallery. Bequest of Eugene Phelps Edwards

Jonathan Edwards (1703-58)

In 1757 Edwards was named president of Princeton. He died March 22, 1758, from an unsuccessful smallpox vaccination. Although he is most widely known for the frequently anthologized sermon "Sinners in the Hands of an Angry God" and his journal's scientific observations of spiders, he is the first original American theologian.

N.H.

EGLON. (1) A Moabite king who asserted his supremacy over western Jordan territory near Jericho for eighteen years. He was treacherously murdered in the outhouse by Ehud of Benjamin (Judg. 3:12-30). (2) A city situated southwest of Lachish that joined an Amorite coalition against Gibeon (Josh. 10:3-5) before succumbing to Joshua's troops (10:34-35). It is provisionally equated with Tell el-Hesi, which attests a late thirteenth-century B.C. destruction.

J.K.K.

EGO. See FREUD, SIGMUND.

EGYPT. An ancient home of civilization lying along the Nile River and occupying the northeastern corner of Africa plus the Sinai Peninsula, the extreme western edge of Asia. Egypt, from remotest times, has been bounded on the north by the Mediterranean, on the northeast by present-day Israel (ancient Canaan), on the east by the Red Sea and the Gulf of Aqaba, on the south by the Sudan, and on the west by Libya. Of Egypt's land area of 386,100 square miles, only 3.6 percent is usually inhabited. All the rest is desert. "Egypt is," as Herodotus remarked, "the gift of the Nile." Without the annual flooding of the Nile, bringing rich top soils from the interior of Africa, there would be no agriculture in the Nile Valley, and agriculture is the foundation of civilization.

An overview is given of Egypt's history in those periods in which its position and power exerted strong influence on Canaan, the Hebrew people, and the Hebrew states of Israel and Judah. Then, its own history and religion is examined. Egypt in ancient times always profoundly affected life in the Canaanite area, including Lebanon, since only the Wadi El Arish (or the river of Egypt) separated Egypt from its northeastern neighbors. Egypt also sailed its navy and trading ships to the Canaanite ports of Biblos (or Gebal) and Ras Shamrah (Ugarit). Egypt often invaded the Canaanite area in an attempt to maintain a forward base against Syria, Assyria, Babylonia, or whatever enemy threatened from the north. For example, Pharaoh Thutmose III recorded seventeen Adapted from James B. Pritchard, The Ancient Near East in Pictures Relating to the Old Testament (second edition with supplement). Copyright 1954, © 1969 by Princeton University Press. Map (p. 243) reprinted with permission of Princeton University Press.

Egypt

separate campaigns in Canaan and Syria, carrying off huge quantities of booty.

For all its wealth and military power, Egypt exerted little cultural influence on the lands of the Bible. Even with the period of 430 years said to be spent in Egypt by the Hebrew tribes, only a few Hebrews had Egyptian names. Moses was one and Aaron's grandson, Phineas, was another. Dress and architecture in Israel were modeled more on Mesopotamia and Asia Minor than on the powerful land to the southwest.

One development in religion among the Egyptians may have influenced the Hebrews, although the evidence is slim. This was the single-handed move toward monotheism of Pharaoh Ikhnaton (1370-1353

B.C.), who is sometimes called the first individual in history. A fanatically devoted worshiper of Aton, the sun-god Re-Horus, he worshipped at Heliopolis ("the house of the sun"). Ikhnaton (whose wife was Nefertiti) stopped the worship of AMON and the other old gods, infuriating the priesthood. He also built a new capital at Akhetaton (Tell el-Amarna) and abandoned THEBES, the traditional seat of power. All this reforming work caused Ikhnaton to neglect the political and military needs of his empire, and Egypt's Syrian holdings fell to the Hittites.

Throughout Hebrew history, the Israelites looked to Egypt as a source of food, and sometimes, generally mistakenly, for protection from Syria or the great Assyrian and Babylonian empires. Egypt saw Canaan only as a source of spoils and a buffer against Mesopotamia. But the smaller cities, nations, and especially the wandering tribes of the whole Middle East, looked to Egypt as a place of protection against the frequent droughts that brought famine to people and beasts.

On this basis, the Hebrews first came in contact with Egypt when Abraham journeyed there (Gen. 41:41-45). Later, Jacob's sons went into Egypt looking for food and found, to their terrified surprise, that the brother they sought to kill and sold into slavery, JOSEPH, was there before them. Joseph, now prime minister of Egypt with a special charge to provide supplies against famine, forgave his brothers and welcomed their clans into the sanctuary of the Nile Delta. Archaeology confirms that the construction work on the great store cities went on for the 430 years that the Bible says the Hebrews remained in Egypt. The date of around 1700 B.C. has been suggested by some scholars as Joseph's entry into Egypt, and the sojourn of the Hebrews placed during the fifteenth to seventeenth dynasties. This would make the pharaoh who trusted Joseph a HYKSOS, that is, a foreigner, probably a Semite like the Hebrews. These warlike horsemen conquered Egypt, during a weak period, almost without a battle and ruled about 1720-1550 B.C. They would feel sympathy for fellow Semites, so it is believable that Hyksos would permit the Hebrews to settle near their capital at Tanis (called Zoan in Ps. 78) in the delta. However, when the Hyksos were overthrown by the resurgent Egyptians, conditions changed drastically for the now large Hebrew community. The pharaohs that "knew not Joseph" (Acts 7:18 KJV) made life hard for the Hebrews, and one became the pharaoh of the oppression, forcing them into servitude to build the great store cities of Pithom and Rameses (or Tanis), mentioned in Exodus 1:11. According to most chronologies, the pharaoh of the Exodus was Ramses II (about 1290-1224 B.C.). The famous struggle between Moses, who was raised as an Egyptian and bore an Egyptian name, took place, with the Exodus occurring around 1290 B.C.

Later, Israel under Solomon enjoyed good relations with Egypt, as Solomon married one of Pharaoh's daughters. After the breakup of the kingdom, both northern Israel and southern Judah called upon Egypt for help from time to time. Egypt rarely was helpful, and several prophets, including Isaiah (Isa. 30, 31, 36), Jeremiah (Jer. 42, 43), and Hosea (Hos. 7:11), warned that Egypt was a broken reed that would pierce the hand that leaned on it.

After Jerusalem's fall in 586 B.C., many survivors fled to Egypt, even forcing Jeremiah to go with them (Jer. 42; 43:6). These Jews settled at Elephantine, where they even built a temple. But most Jews settled in ALEXANDRIA, where, by the time of the great Jewish philosopher, Philo (about 20 B.C.-A.D. 50), there may have been one million Jews. In this fruitful blending of Hebrew and Hellenistic cultural elements, Jewish scholars made the Septuagint translation of the Hebrew scriptures into Greek. In the NT period, the Gospel of Matthew tells us that Joseph and Mary fled into Egypt with the infant Jesus (Matt. 2:13-19). In Acts 2:10, we are told that Egyptians were present at Pentecost in Jerusalem, and Paul was taken for an Egyptian revolutionary in Acts 21:38. Of course, the sojourn in Egypt and the Exodus and wilderness wanderings are alluded to several times in the NT (Acts 7, and throughout the book of Hebrews). Early Christianity took deep root in Egypt, and many great church fathers were Egyptian, including Origen and Athanasius. The foundations of Christianity were so deep in Egypt that the church (called the Coptic church) survived the Muslim conquest of the seventh century A.D., and even today, some 25 percent of the Egyptian population is Christian.

History. Egypt is really two lands. Upper Egypt is almost all desert, with only a few miles of river valley in width and hundreds of miles in length. Lower Egypt, less hot and dry, has more flood plain and widens out into the rich delta. The traditional founder of the First Dynasty, Mena, is believed to have united Upper and Lower Egypt into one nation and to have founded Memphis as the capital. Lower Egypt comprised the delta; Upper Egypt the Nile Valley. The delta had twelve branches of the Nile in ancient times, and the land between them was divided into districts called nomes, centered on a city. These now lost cities (many under Nile water) included Heliopolis, Sais, Buto, Pelusium, Tanis, Mendes, Sebennytos, and Bubastis. The pharaohs after Mena remained "the lords of the two lands," wearing a double crown; white for Upper Egypt and red for Lower Egypt.

Egypt's history is incredibly long, dating from 4500 B.C. and stretching through thirty-one dynasties down to the coming of Alexander the Great in 332 B.C. A brief outline of ancient Egypt's dynasties begins with the earliest civilization some 4,500 years before Christ, in the New Stone Age when the first farming villages were founded. This was followed by a time of kings in Upper and Lower Egypt, some monuments of which still survive at Hierakonpolis.

The First Dynasty began with Mena and included eight or nine kings between 3100 and 2890 B.C. In this period, Upper and Lower Egypt were united and stone buildings constructed. Hieroglyphic writing began.

The Second Dynasty included ten kings, and saw rivalry between the priests of Horus and Set, from 2890 to 2686 B.C.

The Third Dynasty consisted of five kings between 2686 and 2613 B.C.

The "old kingdom" began with the Fourth Dynasty and ran through the Sixth Dynasty. Many pyramids were built during this period, including Zoser's Step Pyramid and those at Saqqarah.

The Fourth Dynasty (2613–2494 B.C.) was the age of the great pyramid builders and included eight kings, Cheops and Chephren (both of whom left pyramids), Sueferu, Dedefre, Baufre, Mycerinus, Shepseskof, and Dedefstah. Egypt spread out to Byblos and to Nubia, and the Giza Pyramids (near Cairo) were constructed.

Courtesy of Hirmer Verlag, Munich

The Great Sphinx (about 2500 B.C.), Gizeh

Courtesy of the Arab Information Center, New York

The Sphinx and the pyramid of Khaf-Re at Gizeh, near Cairo

Courtesy of Trans World Airlines

Aerial view of the pyramids of Khufu, Khaf-Re, and Men-kau-Re at Gizeh

Courtesy of Hirmer Verlag, Munich

The pyramids of Mycerinus (about 2470 B.C.), Chephren (about 2500 B.C.), and Cheops (about 2530 B.C.), Gizeh

The Fifth Dynasty (2494–2345 B.C.) consisted of nine kings, who battled the Libyans, sent expeditions to Punt and Nubia, and sponsored the rise of the worship of the sun god, Re, at Heliopolis.

The Sixth Dynasty (2345–2181 B.C.) included seven kings and a queen, Nitocris. The kings or pharaohs are not all known, but some were Teti, Userkare, Pep I, Meryre, Mereure, and Pepi II Neferkare. Pepi II was pharaoh for over ninety years, the longest reign of any king or state leader in history.

The Seventh, Eighth, Ninth, and Tenth dynasties form an intermediate period, 2181–2040 B.C., when there were weak kings. Upper Egypt went its own way, and Libyans and Asians took over the delta.

The "middle kingdom" represents the return of strong pharaohs and runs from the Eleventh to the Fourteenth dynasties (2133–1603 B.C.)

The Eleventh Dynasty had nine pharaohs. Mentuhotep II reunified Upper and Lower Egypt in 2040 B.C., and pushed the Asians out of the delta. He began to reconquer Nubia (2133–1991 B.C.)

The Twelfth Dynasty was of eight kings (1991–1786 B.C.) and included Queen Sobekneferu. This period represents the high point of ancient Egyptian art and craftsmanship. The capital was moved from Thebes to Al Fayyum. Nubia was conquered, and much trade was carried on with Canaan and Syria.

The "middle kingdom" ended with the Thirteenth and Fourteenth dynasties (1786–1603 B.C.), which had many kings. They were followed by a second intermediate period, made up of the Fifteenth to the Seventeenth dynasties (1720–1567 B.C.). During this period the Hyksos conquered Lower Egypt, and the Hebrews may have entered Egypt. Joseph's date is sometimes given as 1700 B.C.

The Fifteenth and Sixteenth dynasties (1720–1570 B.C.) consisted of some fourteen Hyksos pharaohs, who ruled from Avaris. The Seventeenth Dynasty (1645–1567 B.C.) had seventeen kings, including Seqeneure and Kamose. It was Kamose who drove out the Hyksos and reestablished Egyptian pharaohs.

"The new empire" included the Eighteenth to the Twentieth dynasties (1567–1085 B.C.). The Eighteenth Dynasty (1567–1320 B.C.) saw the final defeat of the Hyksos and the recovery of Nubia: the worship of Amon at Karnak. There were fourteen pharaohs, including Ahmose, Amenhotep I, II, and III; Thutmose I and II; Queen Hatshepsut; Thutmose III and IV; Ikhnaton (or Amenhotep IV, who became a monotheist, worshipping Aton, the sun-god); Smenkhkare; Tutankhamen (the famous King Tut); Ay; and Horemheb. During this period Canaan and Syria were conquered, the Tel el-Amarna correspondence was written, and Egypt became very wealthy. Tutankhamen restored the worship of Amon and dethroned Aton, who had been made the only god by Ikhnaton.

Courtesy of Hirmer Verlag, Munich

Funerary temple of Hatshepsut, Deir-el-Bahari, Eighteenth Dynasty, about 1480 B.C.

Courtesy of Hirmer Verlag, Munich

Court and pylon of Ramses II (about 1260 B.C.) and the colonnade and court of Amenhotep III (about 1390 B.C.). Temple of Amun-Mut-Khonsu, Luxor

Courtesy of the Metropolitan Museum of Art, Rogers Fund, 1915

An Egyptian wall painting, from the tomb of Nakht at Thebes (fifteenth century B.C.). Upper section shows harvest scenes; middle section shows man chopping down tree and a laborer breaking soil; lower section shows a laborer plowing and a person watching laborers from a booth.

The Nineteenth Dynasty included eight pharaohs (1320–1200 B.C.), among them Ramses I, Seti I, Ramses II, Merneptah, and Queen Tawosret. During this period Ramses II (1304–1237 B.C.) defeated the Hittites at Kadesh Barnea, thus ending their power in Canaan and their threat to Egypt.

The Twentieth Dynasty (1200–1085 B.C.) saw ten kings, Setnakht and Ramses III to XI. While the first two pharaohs stabilized Egypt, the Libyans and “sea peoples” (possibly from Crete) invaded it. Egypt declined, splitting into Upper and Lower Egypt.

The Twenty-first Dynasty (1085–945 B.C.) had seven kings, who ruled from Tanis.

The Twenty-second and Twenty-third dynasties (945–730 B.C.) were plagued with confusions in which rival kings, many with Libyan names, disputed rulership. There were capitals at Tanis, Bubastis, and (after 820 B.C.) at Thebes.

The Twenty-fourth Dynasty (730–715 B.C.) had its capital at Sais in the delta and consisted of two kings, Tefnakhte and Bocchoris.

The Twenty-fifth Dynasty (to 656 B.C.) was made up of kings from Cush and included five kings. Egypt prospered under them, but Egypt's operations in Canaan caused Assyria to attack and conquer Egypt. Necho was made pharaoh.

The Twenty-sixth Dynasty (664–525 B.C.) included seven kings, who drove out the Assyrians, with the help of Greek mercenaries. Necho invaded Canaan but was defeated by Babylonia.

The Persian Empire controlled Egypt during the final five dynasties, the Twenty-seventh through the Thirty-first (525–335 B.C.). The Twenty-seventh Dynasty was made up of Persian rulers, including Cambyses II and Darius the Great. These kings built a canal from the Nile River to the Red Sea (525–404 B.C.).

The Twenty-eighth Dynasty saw the liberation of Egypt, with the help of the Greeks. One king, Amyrtaeus, ruled (404–399 B.C.).

The Twenty-ninth and Thirtieth dynasties (399–343 B.C.) consisted of seven kings.

The Thirty-first Dynasty (recorded only by the church historian Eusebius) was one of a second Persian domination, 343–335 B.C. It included three rulers—Antaxerxes III, Arses, and Darius III.

ALEXANDER THE GREAT marched into Alexandria in 332 B.C. and was hailed as a god. His successor, PTOLEMY I, was crowned as Pharaoh in 304 B.C. Under the Ptolemies, many Syrians, Jews, and Greeks settled in Egypt, but the Hellenistic rulers respected the Egyptian religion. The Romans conquered Egypt as part of the general struggle for power after the assassination of Julius Caesar. Augustus defeated Anthony and Cleopatra, whereupon Cleopatra committed suicide. Augustus exercised absolute control over Egypt, which became the bread basket of the Roman Empire. With some ups and downs in the third and seventh centuries, Rome controlled Egypt from 30 B.C. to A.D. 642, when the Arab general Amr ibn al-As conquered Alexandria for the new faith, Islam. The Egyptians, by now known as Copts, were Christian. The armistice of Babylon called for the Copts to pay a tribute that would exempt them from military service and allow them to practice Christianity and to administer their own community affairs. From A.D. 642 to 968, Egypt was ruled by governors sent by the Muslim caliph. There were 111 governors in these three centuries. By A.D. 706, Arabic was made the official language of the nation, and efforts were begun to convert the country to Islam.

In A.D. 969, an Egyptian caliphate was established, the Fatimids. They built Al Qahirah (or Cairo) as their capital and soon controlled all North Africa and Arabia itself. The Fatimids declined about the time of the Crusades. At first confused and weak, the Fatimids finally recaptured Jerusalem from the Franks. The Fatimids were followed by the Mameluke sultans, rulers drawn from the bodyguard of former rulers. In the early 1500s the Ottoman Turks occupied Egypt and ruled it for three centuries.

In the modern period, Napoleon Bonaparte invaded Egypt in July 1798, but the French were defeated by the Turks and the British in October 1801. A period of anarchy followed until Mohammed Ali took the throne, 1805–48. Later, Egypt went bankrupt, and in 1876 a joint Anglo-French condominium was established to administer the country. This dual control ended in 1883. Egypt entered the twentieth century under British control, and in 1914 was declared a British protectorate.

By the treaty of 1936, Egypt began to regain its independence and in May 1937, Egypt was elected to the League of Nations. During World War II, Egypt was a theater of war but did not declare war on Germany and Japan until February 24, 1945. In 1946 the British announced their withdrawal from Egypt. Many problems arose with the further withdrawal of the British from their Palestine mandate on May 14, 1948. Thereupon the Zionist settlers declared the establishment of Israel, and Egypt, along with several Arab states, invaded Palestine. Egypt fought two more wars with Israel before recovering the territories in the Sinai lost to the Israeli armies. In a surprising move, the hero of Egypt's last successful war with Israel signed a peace treaty with Israel at Camp David, Maryland, under the sponsorship of President Jimmy Carter. Despite the assassination of President Sadat, that peace treaty still holds, and Egypt has been able to reestablish diplomatic relations with the Kingdom of Jordan.

Egyptian Religion. Egyptian religion was complex, fascinating, and of great antiquity. This is but a brief overview of its ancient pantheon. The primitive religion in Egypt was animistic nature worship, with each village having its own sacred tree, plant, or animal, in which dwelt its protective spirit.

The major gods were all represented as animals. Thoth was portrayed as having an ibis head. His sacred animal was the baboon. He was god of science, learning, and scribes.

Anubis was a god represented as a jackal, and was part of the cult of the dead, especially associated with mummification.

Photography by the Egyptian Exploration Society, Metropolitan Museum of Art

The god Anubis as a jackal, lying on a funerary chest; from the tomb of Tut-ankh-Amon at Thebes

Sebek was a crocodile god; Taweret was a hippopotamus god. Heqet was a frog goddess, who presided over birth. Bastet, the cat goddess, was the goddess of love. Sekhmet was a lion goddess. Buto was a cobra goddess, and sovereign over Lower Egypt. Nekhbet, the vulture goddess, was sovereign over Upper Egypt. Ernutet was another cobra goddess. Re

Courtesy of The University Museum, University of Pennsylvania

An Egyptian painted wooden mummy case, used for burial

(or Ra), the sun-god was represented as having the head of a hawk. Horus, the sky god, was also shown as a hawk. Re and Horus were often combined into one hawk and called Re-Horakhte, or the "Re-Horus of the horizon." Mentu, the war god, also was depicted as a hawk.

Mathor, a sky god, was shown as a cow goddess. Apis was shown as a bull and associated with Ptah, an older god. Khnum was a ram god. Amon and Min were two gods never shown as animals, but the ram was an emblem of Amon.

J.C.

EGYPTIANS, GOSPEL ACCORDING TO THE.

An apocryphal gospel, known only in fragments, that apparently arose in Gnostic circles. This "gospel" may have been used by the author of II Clement. This pseudo-Clementine work is a sermon that emphasizes a high Christology and the need to preserve the purity of the flesh.

J.C.

EHUD. According to Judges 3:15–4:1, Ehud was a judge of Israel in the early days of the Hebrew conquest of Canaan. He was a Benjaminite and left-handed (and therefore a difficult swordsman to fight). Ehud killed Eglon, king of Moab, and, it is claimed, ten thousand other Moabites.

J.C.

EICHRODT, WALTHER (1890–1978). German biblical scholar who taught at the universities of Erlangen and Basel. His far-ranging publications include a dissertation on the Priestly stratum in Genesis (1915), commentaries on Ezekiel (1959–66; Eng. trans. 1970), Isaiah (1960–67), and studies in eschatology (1920), anthropology (1943), and the history of Israelite religion (1953). Of greatest significance is his three-volume Theology of the Old Testament, appearing in 1933, 1935, and 1939 (two-volume Eng. trans. 1961, 1967). It is an impressive though controversial integration of historically diverse biblical ideas about God, humanity, and the world under the quasi-comprehensive category of the covenant relationship binding Yahweh and Israel.

J.K.K.

EIGHTFOLD PATH. In BUDDHISM, an outline of a disciplined way of life, leading to liberation from suffering, to NIRVANA. The Eightfold Path is the last of the FOUR NOBLE TRUTHS delivered by the BUDDHA in his first sermon after his enlightenment. After telling his hearers that life entails suffering, that suffering is caused by desire, and that there can be an end to desire, the Eightfold Path is the "How To Do It" clause that shows how a life can be made free from craving and hence from suffering.

While they are to be practiced simultaneously rather than as a series of steps, the eight aspects of the path do have an internal logic in their arrangement, culminating in right concentration or meditation, which is the true way to liberation, and fall into certain categories.

The first category embraces the first two parts of the eight, right understanding and right thought. Right understanding, or right views, refers to comprehending and accepting basic Buddhist insights as starting points for practice, especially the Four Noble Truths, and the meaning of KARMA in one's own life. Right thought means accordingly "to purify one's thought from desire, ill-will, and cruelty, directing it instead to kindness and compassion."

From this will follow a life-style centering on the next three of the Eightfold Path—right speech, right action, and right livelihood. Closely related, these prohibit any behavior that would harm others, whether human or animal; lying, stealing, killing, sexual misconduct, taking intoxicants, and the like. These are forbidden, as is any means of making a living that condones or depends on them.

The sixth part of the path, right effort, is transitional. It points back to the effort needed to sustain the foregoing; it points forward to the higher purification of the mind that follows. More technically, it refers to the generation of good karma to uphold one in the path and the avoidance of bad.

The last two of the Eightfold Path are right mindfulness and right SAMĀDHI, that is, right concentration or meditation. Mindfulness means that "inner-directed alertness" that makes one experientially aware of egolessness (ANATTA) and how the mind works. Right concentration means "unifying and stilling the mind, liberating it from attachment." It helps in following the other aspects of the path, just as they prepare one for the freedom of meditation.

R. E.

EISENHOWER, DWIGHT (1890–1969). Thirty-fourth president of the United States (1952–60), supreme commander of the Allied invasion forces in Western Europe against Hitler's Nazi Germany. Born in Denison, Texas, he grew up in Abilene, Kansas, and was educated at West Point. His paternal roots were Bavarian and Mennonite; his maternal roots, Swiss; both families came to America before 1750. He pursued an army career with resounding success. As president, he made Health, Education, and Welfare a cabinet department; desegregated Washington, D.C., schools; and used federal troops to integrate Central High School, Little Rock, Arkansas. Pietistic and patriotic, he ignored Senator Joseph McCarthy's accusations of communism in government.

C. M.

EISSFELDT, OTTO (1887–1973). German biblical scholar who taught at the universities of Berlin (1913–22) and Halle (1922–57). As J. WELLHAUSEN's student, Eissfeldt subjected biblical sources to rigorous critical analysis. In his Pentateuchal research, he posited a ninth-century B.C. "Lay Source" (L) reflecting a primitive nomadic ideal. As H. GUNKEL's student, he appreciated diverse OT literary forms and the role oral tradition played in their emergence. Assessing OT theology as a nonhistorical, subjective discipline reflecting the theologian's own faith, he preferred to investigate Israelite religion, which he regarded as a historical, objective enterprise. Often honoring comparative religions issues, his many essays are preserved in Kleine Schriften (6 vols.). Eissfeldt is best known for The Old Testament: An Introduction, Including the Apocrypha and Pseudepigrapha, an English translation (1965) of the third German edition (1964). Here he masterfully surveys the entire formation of the OT from oral inception to final crystallization as an authoritative literary canon.

J. K. K.

EKRON. Identified as Khirbet el-Muqanna', Ekron was the northernmost of five major Philistine cities (Josh. 13:3). Though claimed by the tribe of Judah (Judg. 1:18), Ekron was a Philistine holding when Israel's ark was transported there (I Sam. 5:10-12). Elijah condemned King Ahaziah for conferring with Ekron's deity, Baal-zebub (II Kings 1:2-16). Also Amos (1:8), Zephaniah (2:4), and Zechariah (9:5, 7) denounced Ekron. Assyria's dominance over Ekron is attested in the eighth- through seventh-century B.C. annals of Sennacherib, Esarhaddon, and Ashurbanipal. Rewarding past loyalty, Syria's king, Alexander Balas (150-145 B.C.), gave Ekron to Jonathan Maccabeus (I Macc. 10:89).

J. K. K.

EL. The common Semitic designation for "God" or "a god," sharing the same ambiguity of other languages, ancient and modern, to refer indifferently to a deity real or alleged or to the recognized Deity of national or personal veneration.

In the Ugaritic literature that testifies to a Canaanite religion of a time prior to the formation of the Israelite traditions, El is the supreme and still active deity in the pantheon, though there are some indications of its senescence. This picture lends truth probability to the Israelite patriarchal legends in Genesis that envisage pre-Israelite Canaan and in which the local deities are invariably designated by the name El, never by that of Baal. On the contrary, traditions relating to the Israelite conquest, the period of the Judges, and the subsequent mutualism of Israelite and Canaanite societies in Palestine, universally refer to the native Canaanite deity as BAAL. This, too, corresponds with history: Baal, the son (or nephew?) of El, later supplanted the latter as the "active" deity for Canaanites, Arameans, and others of the Near East, even as in Greek mythology Zeus supplanted his father Chronos. As a designation for "G(g)od," however, as distinct from that of a god separate from others, El remained in all the Semitic languages as a most used element of proper names.

In the patriarchal stories of Genesis, El of Canaan is freely identified with the God of Israel's ancestors, sometimes (as in Gen. 14:22 Jerusalem Bible) under the explicit Israelite name of YAHWEH. Usually El appears as part of a compound: El-Roi (Gen. 16:13), El-Shaddai (Gen. 17:1), etc. The second parts of these compounds were originally names of distinct deities in their own right (compare the syncretisms that would combine Amun-Re, Zeus-Ammon, Baal-Hadad, etc.). We are left to speculate whether the thought was that one El was venerated under various titles at various shrines, or that the El of one place was really a different deity from that of another—if, indeed, such questions were ever raised at the time.

El, along with the longer form Elohim (which can be singular or plural) and another variant Eloah, performed numerous roles in the theological vocabulary of the OT. It provided an "ecumenical" means of referring to Israel's God when there was some need to avoid the name Yahweh. It served, as an inherited mythological term, to describe the otherwise undefinable: the "sons of God" of Genesis 6:2 and Job 1:6; "sons of gods" in Psalm 29:1; the "god," which was Samuel's wraith in I Samuel 28:13; and even to designate an otherwise indescribable superlative (a "prince of god" equals "a mighty prince," in Gen. 23:10 and "a panic of god" equals "a very great panic" in I Sam. 14:15, etc.).

B. V.

ELAM. (1) A country to the east of Babylonia in southwest Iran whose non-Semitic inhabitants were often at war with Mesopotamian neighbors.

Early cuneiform texts attest interaction between Elam and western states. Thus Eannatum, the Sumerian king of Lagash (twenty-fifth century B.C.), and Sargon the Semitic founder of the Akkad Empire (twenty-fourth century B.C.), claimed triumph over Elam. Moreover, Sumerian resurgence under the Third Dynasty of Ur (about 2060–1950 B.C.) ended when Elam destroyed Ur and took captive its king, Ibbi-sin. Until Babylon's rise under Hammurabi (about 1728–1686 B.C.), Elam generally enjoyed mastery over the old Sumero-Akkadian Empire. Accordingly, within the Abraham narrative, mention of Chedorlaomer, king of Elam, as head of a coalition of Mesopotamian kings advancing westward (Gen. 14:1, 4-5), makes sense, though that episode is enigmatic.

The rising Assyrian Empire checkmated Elam. During the eighth and seventh centuries B.C., four Assyrian kings—Sargon II, Sennacherib, Esarhadon, and Ashurbanipal—led successful campaigns against Elam. Indeed, Ashurbanipal's conquest of Elam and ravaging of Susa, its capital (about 640), decisively terminated Elam's lengthy conflict with Assyria. Around 625, a weakened Assyria allowed Elam to regain independence and participate in Persia's overthrow of Babylon in 539. Persia incorporated Elamite territory into its own vast empire, and Darius I located his palace at Susa.

Oracles by Jeremiah (49:35-39) and Ezekiel (32:24-25) refer to Elam's terrorism and demise. The NT mentions the Elamites only once, when they are listed among those present in Jerusalem at Pentecost (Acts 2:9).

(2) Shem's son, and the eponymous ancestor of the Elamites (Gen. 10:22; I Chr. 1:17).

(3) A Korahite who served as temple gatekeeper in David's time (I Chr. 26:3).

(4) A priest participating in the dedication of Jerusalem's walls in Nehemiah's time (Neh. 12:42).

(5) A descendant of Benjamin (I Chr. 8:24).

(6) The head of a family returning to Judah after Babylonian exile (presumably Ezra 2:7, 31; Neh. 7:12, 34 refer to the same family).

J. K. K.

ELDAD. One of seventy elders chosen by Moses to help in the administration of the wilderness camp. He failed to appear with them before the Tent of Meeting to receive some of Yahweh's spirit that had empowered Moses. Nevertheless he prophesied, and a nameless busybody informed Moses. Joshua's disdain of that irregularity is countered by Moses' desire that "all the Lord's people were prophets" (Num. 11:24-29).

J. K. K.

ELDER. From the Greek presbuteros, or "overseer"; the spiritual leader of a church in the NT, and a term retained by several branches of Protestants to this day.

According to Acts 20:28 and Titus 1:5-7, elder and BISHOP may have been the same. However, by the early second century, the bishop emerged as supreme. "Elder" is a term derived from Christianity's Jewish background. As in the synagogue, the early church in Jerusalem was ruled by elders (Acts 21:18). With the apostles, these early elders ruled over the entire Christian church.

"Elder" obviously refers to age, and elders were generally mature men respected for their sanctity and wisdom. In I Timothy 5:1-2, "elder" clearly refers to aged men (KJV). But the same letter (5:17-22) and other citations (Jas. 5:14; Acts 20:17) use the term to refer to a distinct office, regardless of the officeholder's age.

Both in the NT and in the post NT periods, the elder (as distinct from the bishop) seemed to function as the chief PASTOR of a local congregation. The PRESBYTER or elder, therefore, performed functions similar to those performed later by the priest or pastor. These presbyters directed worship, gave pastoral care, and helped to govern the congregation.

The title "elder" is still used in The United Methodist church, which recognizes two levels of ministry, the deacon and the elder. Only elders share the full pastoral power of the clergy. Among other Protestants, elders are lay people set aside for spiritual work, as in the Presbyterian and Disciples of Christ traditions.

J. C.

ELEAZAR (In Hebrew "God has helped"). A prominent name in the OT, that of eleven men. The most outstanding Eleazar is mentioned in Exodus 6:23 and Numbers 3:2; the third son of Aaron and father of Phinehas (Exod. 6:25). Chief of the Levites, overseer of the tent of the presence, he was Aaron's successor as high priest (Num. 20:25 ff.; Deut. 10:6), and served in that capacity for the rest of Moses' life and also under Joshua. Eleazar was instrumental in dividing up the territory in Canaan among the twelve tribes of Israel (Josh. 14:1). Another Eleazar was an ancestor of Joseph (Matt. 1:15).

J.C.

ELECTION. The belief that God chooses people and groups to be the special agents of God's saving purposes. Election (also called PREDESTINATION, in Christian theology, following Paul's doctrine in Rom. 8:29-30) is central to the OT, with its emphasis on Israel as the chosen people, and is basic to NT attempts to understand the unmerited grace of God, which freely saves us in Christ.

The election of one people to be God's own possession is the basis of Israel's faith in the OT. Abraham is called by God to come out of Ur and follow Yahweh as a wanderer until Yahweh gives Canaan to Abraham's descendants for a possession. Yet Israel's election is not because of any special worth on Israel's part but rather Abraham and his descendants are to be "a light to the Gentiles," an instrument of salvation for all other peoples (Isa. 49:3, 6 KJV). Israel, then, is chosen for a purpose, which is also the case in the NT, where faith is given to people as a gift of God, so that they accept Jesus Christ and become witnesses to others.

The NT basis for the doctrine of election is specifically the teaching of Paul, especially in Romans 8:29: "Those whom he foreknew he also predestined to be conformed to the image of his Son." Paul refers to "God's elect" in Romans 8, and the salutations of certain epistles speak of the elect who are in such and such a city. One of the epistles of John is addressed to "the elect lady." A first step in explaining the meaning of election (and the elect) in Paul is to bear in mind the early Christian claim that the CHURCH is the new Israel, that is, the newly elect people of God, the chosen people. Israel was chosen for a purpose and the church, the community of the elect, is the assembly of those called out of the world to faith in Christ.

There have been many controversies in the history of Christianity over the doctrine of election, called predestination since the time of Augustine's doctrinal disputes with Pelagius (a British monk living in Rome who taught "holiness" doctrines or perfectionism, and insisted that human beings, by their natural moral powers, and aided by God's grace, could avoid sin, do good, and so merit God's salvation). AUGUSTINE, following Paul and the logic of the whole salvation history of both OT and NT, stressed that believers realize that they depend on the free GRACE of God for salvation. As Luther so often pointed out, if we depend on our own efforts, even the efforts of a supposed FREE WILL, to respond to the good (as the semi-Pelagians and probably Pelagius himself held—a position later attributed, probably incorrectly, to Arminius in the seventeenth century), then, if we are honest about our inner state of egocentricity and self-concern, we must fall into despair. So Augustine held, against Pelagius (and semi-Pelagianism), that human MERIT (in the sense of response to the good) is in no sense the ground of the believer's election, but that ground is purely the unmerited grace of God. As Luther later clearly stated, our faith by which we are alone justified, is the gift of God. Any goodness that may be in the Christian is the result of God's election, the result of the believer's incorporation into the Body of Christ, the church, done as in baptism, and is not the ground of election.

In Augustine's formulation, predestination (election) involves two elements: God's FOREKNOWLEDGE (God knows without doubt those who will be saved) and God's act of will in electing those who will be saved (the eternal decrees). This strong statement of election was ratified by the councils held at Carthage between A.D. 416 and 419, and was upheld by several later synods. Thus Augustinianism became the basic teaching and doctrinal position of the Catholic church. Despite this decision, the Catholic church has generally espoused a semi-Pelagian position—or one similar to it—and the full-blown Augustinian doctrine has been stressed chiefly in the Protestant churches (especially the Reformed churches) following Martin Luther, who taught the full Augustinian doctrine in his opposition to the humanist Erasmus of Rotterdam in his work, De Servio Arbitrio (On the Bound Will).

Despite protests against the dogmatic hardening of Pauline predestination into double predestination by Augustine and John Calvin (in The Institutes of the Christian Religion), protests that have some real justification, an objective reading of the Bible shows God's election to be central to both OT and NT. The basic issue is assurance of salvation, especially the assurance of God's forgiveness ("justification") of those who are seriously honest with themselves. Anyone who plumbs the depth of one's self-centeredness (persons egocentricity or selfishness) is aware of the poisoned wells of human motivation—of the fact that sin is spiritual, it springs from the inner person. No amount of external good works can give the honest believer comfort. Martin Luther's struggles with his own sense of personal sin—not to mention original sin—provide a classic example of the believer's quest to "get me a merciful God." Interestingly, Jesus traced sin to the heart, saying in the Sermon on the Mount (Matt. 5:21-30) that anyone who is angry or lustful has already broken the commandments against murder and adultery. And it was deeply religious people, aware of their sin, such as Augustine (Confessions) and Luther (On the Bound Will), who found peace only in God's gracious initiative, God's election, not in the many outstanding religious things they both did in life.

Augustine and Luther were interpreters of human life, in the individual sense and in the world historical sense. They took their clues to God's plan of salvation from their common teacher, Paul, another believer who deeply felt his sin (he was a persecutor of the church of God, see Acts 26:9-18) and who came to see that God had predestined (elected) him to be a missionary to the Gentiles before he was born. All three, Paul, Augustine, and Luther, ultimately drew materials for their doctrine of election from the OT, which, throughout, asserts that the Lord chose Israel as an elect people out of pure, sovereign grace. Israel's election was not based on it's merits but was done in spite of it's shortcomings. And, although Israel sinned many times, and even suffered destruction as a nation, God's election and covenant was never taken away, only passed on to the believing remnant. For Paul, it might be said that the faithful remnant, "seven thousand men who have not bowed the knee to Baal," in Elijah's day (Rom. 11:4), was narrowed down to one: Jesus the Christ. And now, through incorporation into the Body of Christ, believers become the New Israel, because they are elect in Christ. This election to faith, regardless of merit, is seen in the very ministry of Jesus, in that he chose his apostles and called disciples to him without establishing qualifications. There were no special merits in Peter, James, or John. Both Peter (I Pet. 2:9) and Paul speak of the church as called (or chosen). In I Corinthians 1:27 and following, Paul says God purposefully chooses the humble so that no one would have a right to boast of being a church member. One of Paul's disciples, in Ephesians 1:4, speaks of the Christian's calling (or election) as being "in Christ," from before the foundation of the universe.

What is important to note in all this is Paul's stress on the humble attitude that should characterize believers and the prophet's insistence that God chose Israel in spite of it's flaw. Election in Christ is not a reward for good character or for good works either already done or that God foresees that one will do. We are not predestined to a status of privilege but chosen as instruments of God's will. Israel was to be a light to the nations. Christians are called to bear witness to the world and to love one another. Although believers may indeed "enjoy the testimony of a good conscience" and be aware of God's providential ordering of their lives, confident in God's love and the ever-present offer of forgiveness, most Christians who accept the doctrine of election have not pushed it to its logical limits, as John Calvin did in The Institutes, to "double predestination." Like Luther, most theologians and ordinary believers have seen election for what it is—a sign of God's love and grace—and not felt that God by a sovereign act of will, before the earth was made, condemned certain persons to hell. It is not that God does not have the power to do whatever God wishes; all believers recognize that God has that power. Rather, most believers recognize that God's essentially loving nature is predisposed to grace and forgiveness. As Ezekiel says, God takes no pleasure in the death of anyone (Ezek. 18:21-32). Election, finally, is God's plan of salvation, working its way out in human history, bringing people into conformity with God's loving will.

J.C.

ELECT NATION. PURITANS viewed the American colonies as a unique experiment established in the providence of God as a beacon on a hill, a lighthouse to the nations, a paradigm of Christian order. This Anglo-Protestant amalgam of land, people, and nation formed a mystical union for the world's salvation. Preacher Samuel Danforth saw America's mission as an "errand into the wilderness." Cotton Mather, an American Congregational clergyman, once said: "I write the Wonders of the Christian religion, flying from the Depravations of Europe, to the American Strand."

Such thinking is still reflected in our national hymns: "America," "The Battle Hymn of the Republic," "America the Beautiful," and often appears in political rhetoric, particularly that of the religious right. (Compare CIVIL RELIGION.)

N.H.

ELEPHANTINE PAPYRI. In Upper Egypt, below the Aswan Dam, three groups of papyri were found at Elephantine Island (Aswan) dating to the fifth century B.C. They were published by A. H. Sayce and A. E. Cowley in 1906, Edward Sachau in 1911, and E. G. Kraeling in 1953. The documents were written in Aramaic and consisted primarily of legal texts and letters, which reveal that a colony of Jews, perhaps mercenary soldiers, lived on the island in a fortress called Yeb during the period of Persian rule. A temple

Courtesy of the Brooklyn Museum. Gift of Theodora Wilbour from the estate of her father, Charles Edwin Wilbour existed there, built before Cambyses' conquest of Egypt in 525 B.C., which was known as the Yau temple (Yahweh or Jehovah of the OT). It was destroyed by Egyptian priests but was rebuilt by permission of Persian authorities, who nevertheless refused to permit animal sacrifices. An order was issued by Darius II, the Persian king, in 419 B.C. instructing the Jews at Elephantine to observe the Feast of Unleavened Bread.

Papyrus from Elephantine, containing a marriage contract in Aramaic, tied, rolled, and sealed

J.R.M.

ELEUSINIAN MYSTERIES. At Eleusis in Attica, the southern part of mainland Greece, rites and festivals of the holiest and most venerable of the ancient MYSTERY RELIGIONS were conducted since about the eighth century B.C. Their origin is unknown because of strict secrecy for over a thousand years of annual observance; it is still not known what went on in the festivals. The mysteries were ancient avenues to divine knowledge through participation with the gods in various rites, perhaps psychic trances, which seem to have been designed to enable the initiate to pass safely through the gates of death and enter the home of the soul without fear. The mysteries may have been introduced during the time when Attica was becoming a structured society based on the benefits of agriculture. The deity most closely associated with the origins of the mystery by ancient writers is Demeter, the goddess of agriculture.

J.R.M.

ELI. The priest in charge of the shrine at Shiloh in the latter period of the Judges, in the time when the Israelite confederation was in the greatest peril of extinction by the Philistines, immediately prior to the coming of monarchy and the beginning of Israelite nationhood. First Samuel 2:27-36 ascribes the origin of his priestly line to Mosaic times; so also I Chronicles 24:3, I Samuel 14:3, and I Kings 2:27 connect him with the Aaronic succession. In fact, as Israel emerged from its tribal status there were doubtless numerous unrelated priesthoods, of which Eli's was one, identified by no common Israelite tradition but rather by the separate sanctuaries that Israel had inherited, of which Shiloh was one.

The first chapters of I Samuel set forth some of the circumstances that led to the demise of Eli's priestly descent, due chiefly to the degeneracy of his immediate successors Hophni and Phinehas, and also, at least implicitly, the disappearance of the shrine of Shiloh, which certainly was proverbially destroyed (compare Jer. 7:12; Ps. 78:60ff., etc.), probably during the Philistine wars with which these chapters are concerned. The "temple of Yahweh" at Shiloh may have been nothing very elaborate (no evidence of anything elaborate has been turned up in the archaeology of Seilun, which is identified with Shiloh). Shiloh was simply the residence of the Ark of the Covenant and, naturally, a place of resort for consulting the Lord, as it is presented in I Samuel 1.

Eli is of interest to the biblical author chiefly as he introduces Samuel, with whom a new era begins, the era of Israel's nationhood, inaugurated by a new institution, or a renewed institution, which is of prophecy. In this acceptance, whatever his real historical significance, Eli has far greater meaning biblically as a "judge" than as a "priest."

B.V.

ELIEZER. In Hebrew the meaning is "my God is helper" or "God is my helper," Eliezer is the name of many men in the OT, beginning with the chief servant (or slave) of Abraham (Gen. 15:2), to whom Abraham at first thought he would have to leave his estate since he had no son. The youngest son of Moses was named Eliezer, as was one of the priests who escorted the ark of the covenant to Jerusalem (I Chr. 15:24). The prophet Eliezer declared that the ships of Jehoshaphat would be destroyed (II Chr. 20:37). One of Jesus' ancestors (Luke 3:29) was named Eliezer. The name also occurs in Ezra 10.

J.C.

ELIJAH. ("Yahweh is [my] God"). The most important of the preliterary prophets who flourished in Israel during the reigns of Ahab and Ahaziah (869-849 B.C.). He is first introduced to us, somewhat abruptly, in I Kings 17:1 as a native of Tishbe, in Transjordan Gilead, who was prophesying in his homeland about a drought and famine that would strike the kingdom of Israel. The Deuteronomist author of Kings thus begins a series of prophetic stories into which some believe that a biography of Elijah has been incorporated. If not a biography, at least it seems that the Deuteronomist was able to draw upon a cycle or cycles of biographical episodes concerning Elijah, and also ELISHA and others. These biographical episodes may very well have been composed by those who retained a living memory of the prophets in question.

The biographers of the Elijah and Elisha stories were much interested in their subjects as they were reputed to be workers of wonders; hence the sequel of Elijah's prophecy to Ahab of the drought is interrupted in I Kings 17:8-24 by narratives involving the widow of Zarephath (the first narrative tenuously connected with the main story). Even when the original narrative is resumed, much is made of Elijah's miraculous powers in the dialogue with Obadiah (I Kings 18:1-16). At the same time, the scene is prepared for the next episode, as the rivalry is revealed of the prophets of Yahweh, persecuted by Ahab's consort Jezebel, and the prophets of Baal, protected by her.

In I Kings 18:17-19:40 occurs the famous scene on Mount Carmel where Elijah destroys the 450 dervish prophets of Baal and 400 prophets of Asherah by his command of the power of Yahweh. As a consequence the drought is broken, but the slaughter of the Baalites has so enraged Jezebel that Elijah must flee for his life (I Kings 18:41-19:3). In turn, this development introduces what is probably intended by the biblical author to be his most significant affirmation about Elijah.

Elijah on Horeb (I Kings 19:4-18) is a story obviously modeled on that of Moses on Sinai and is intended to single out Elijah as the inaugurator of a new infusion of the spirit of Yahweh (the "still small voice") into the history of Israel: the kind of social prophecy that would later characterize the classical prophecy of Amos and his successors and which is anticipated by Elijah in the episode of Ahab and Naboth's vineyard (I Kings 21).

The rest of the Elijah story, nevertheless, portrays him quite consistently in the more primitive guise of one who preceded rather than participated in the great succession of Israel's prophets. Even the Horeb story involves Elijah in political meddling and nationalistic partisanship of a kind that would have been abhorrent to the classical prophets (compare I Kings 19:15-18). The story of Elijah's choice of Elisha as his disciple (I Kings 19:19-21) prepares for II Kings 9:1-13, the fulfillment of Elijah's commission to anoint Jehu to be king of Israel, just as the story of the anonymous prophets in I Kings 20 validates the other part of the commission, the substitution of Hazael for Ben-hadad as king of Aram.

The remainder of the story of Elijah, placed during the brief reign of Ahaziah (II Kings 1:1-2:12a), stresses the marvelous in his life, even sometimes grotesquely, and lays the foundation for the later legends that grew up about his figure. His miraculous translation into heaven naturally led to the popular belief that he would return, just as miraculously, to become part of the final accomplishment of all things. His precise role in this situation was variously interpreted (compare Mal. 3:23; Sir. 48:10; Matt. 1:14, etc.). By some he was thought to be the necessary forerunner of the Messiah, if not the Messiah himself. In the NT he is represented along with Moses at Jesus' transfiguration (Mark 9:4 and parallels). Consistent with this development is the fact that both Jewish and early Christian apocryphal literature include works ascribed to Elijah.

B.V.

ELIOT, JOHN (1604-90). Famed missionary to the Massachusetts Indians. Eliot first preached to the Indians at Dorchester Mills in 1646. His work was supported by The Society for the Propagation of the Gospel in New England. He published the NT and OT (1661, 1663) in the Massachusetts' language, the first Bible printed in North America; A Primer or Catechism (1654); and The Indian Primer (1669). In 1651 he organized Natick as a town for Christianized Indians. By 1674 fourteen such communities held eleven hundred people. The work was curtailed by King Philip's War (1675-76).

N.H.

ELIPHAZ. (1) The firstborn of Esau and his Hittite wife Adah from whom several Edomite clan leaders descended (Gen. 36:10, 15).

(2) As presumably the eldest and wisest of Job's three friends, Eliphaz staunchly defended God's just retribution for human behavior. Designated "the Temanite" (Job 2:11), he may have descended from Eliphaz (1), who had a son named Teman (Gen. 36:11).

J.K.K.

ELISHA. The disciple and successor of the prophet ELIJAH. He was evidently the son of the prominent farmer Shaphat of Abel-meholah, a town south of Beth-shean on the west bank of the Jordan, whom Elijah was instructed to anoint to the prophetic office (I Kings 19:16, 19-23). It may be worthy of note that only here in the OT do we read of the "anointing" of a prophet. The explanation of this fact doubtless lies in the attraction of context: Elisha is mentioned in the same breath with Hazael and Jehu, who were to be anointed kings respectively of Aram and Israel. Also it was to be Elisha, rather than Elijah to whom the commissions had been given in I Kings 19:15-16, who actually presided over these royal "anointings."

These associations point to the close connection of the cycle of Elisha stories (II Kings 2:19-8:15; possibly 9:1-3 and 13:14-21) with those concerning Elijah. In fact, it may plausibly be argued that the same circles were responsible for the preservation of both cycles of stories, namely the "sons of the prophets" who are mentioned not at all in the Elijah stories but frequently in the Elisha stories, and who appear prominently in the account of the transmission of the prophetic office from Elijah to Elisha (II Kings 2:1-18). Some of these "sons of the prophets" were undoubtedly prophets in their own right, but more importantly in this connection they are disciples of prominent prophets who formed their entourage and preserved the record of their words and deeds for posterity (compare the similar situation in Isa. 8:16).

The Elisha stories, like those about Elijah, are vignettes rather than a whole biography, and even more than the Elijah stories they reveal an interest in the prophet as a worker of marvelous deeds. Some of these, like the episode of the boys and the bears at Bethel (II Kings 2:23-25), may even repel the modern reader. But one may be sure that the contemporary Israelite for whom the story was told would have recognized in it a vindication of the prophetic dignity that was sometimes ridiculed as much as it was respected. Compare the characterization "mad fellow" used by Jehu's followers of the young prophet in II Kings 9:4-13, whose word they nevertheless follow, regardless of the prophet's often odd antics and habits. In any case, however, while several of the miracle stories concerning Elisha seem to have been inspired by a delight in the marvelous for its own sake, there is always some element in them of a divinely bestowed power working for the good of others and not simply vulgar display. This is true even of the famous episode of the floating axe head in II Kings 6:5-7. Also, the story told in II Kings 5:20-27 of Gehazi—who served his master hardly in the way that Elisha had served Elijah—brings out well the disinterestedness of Elisha's use of his powers.

Much more than Elijah, Elisha appears as a nationalistic prophet involved in both the internal and external politics of Israel of the ninth century B.C. Indeed, it may be that some of Elisha's political interventions, like those involving Hazeel and Jehu, were credited only secondarily to Elijah in the mingling of the two prophetic legends, just as some of the other stories about Elisha seem to have been modeled on precedents original in the life of Elijah. Elisha, according to II Kings 6:8-7:20 especially (and also 13:14-19), was a prophet firmly on the side of Israel in its border wars and skirmishes with the Arameans. Contrary to the usual experience of prophets and certainly that of Elijah, he seems to have generally enjoyed the confidence of the kings of Israel and even of Judah as well, as is reflected in the story of II Kings 3 recording the joint venture of Jehoram and Jehoshaphat against Mesha of Moab, which Elisha prophesied would prevail.

All things considered, it is hard to avoid the impression that Elisha was remembered, first of all, largely because of his earlier association with Elijah. Afterward, for some questionable reasons, he became prominent because of his identification with the house of Jehu (compare the words of Joash in II Kings 13:14). Again in contrast with Elijah (Mal. 4:5-6, for example), Elisha made little imprint on the later tradition. In his "praise of the fathers" Ben Sira does, indeed, celebrate Elisha's wondrous deeds (though Sir. 48:13 is not certainly a reference to II Kings 13:21); but he is mentioned in the NT only in Luke 4:27 (compared to about thirty mentions of Elijah).

B. V.

ELIZABETH. The mother of JOHN THE BAPTIST was given this name, the same one worn by the wife of Aaron (Exod. 6:23), the priest from whose family Elizabeth descended (Luke 1:5). The name was erroneously transliterated in the Septuagint. Her husband ZECHARIAH was also of priestly descent (Luke 1:5). She is said to be a kinswoman of Mary, the mother of Jesus (Luke 1:36), but the exact relationship indicated by this Greek word is not clear. The original term refers only to one who is related to another. In the NT it refers to those who are simply members of the same nation (Rom. 9:3; 16:7, 11, 21). If the relationship is meant to be tribal then Elizabeth may have been related to Mary through Elizabeth's mother, who was not necessarily from the tribe of Levi, or through Mary's mother who was not necessarily from the tribe of Judah as was her husband Joseph (the lineage of David, Luke 2:4). Elizabeth, though barren, conceived John the Baptist by the power of God six months prior to Mary's divine conception of Jesus (Luke 1:24-26, 36). When Mary visited her, she acknowledged Mary as the "mother of my Lord" and said that her own baby leaped for joy in her womb at Mary's greeting (Luke 1:43-44).

J. R. M.

ELIZABETHAN SETTLEMENT. The via media (middle way) accommodation instituted by England's Queen Elizabeth I (1558-1603). Elizabeth sought to favor neither extreme papalists nor extreme Protestants. A majority of her subjects were Roman Catholic, but Calvinism was rapidly advancing, and she aptly sensed a broadly based nationalism and desire for moderation. Against both religious parties she zealously guarded her royal prerogatives to make final decisions. She disliked the Calvinists' objections to bishops and the Catholics' objections to her legitimacy. The Act of Supremacy (1559), making her "supreme governor" of the Anglican Church, caused the resignation of all Catholic bishops, except one.

Courtesy of the National Portrait Gallery

Queen Elizabeth I

This action forced Elizabeth to turn to Protestant PURITANS to fill church vacancies. Marian exiles, mostly Calvinists, began returning to England. Elizabeth selected Matthew Parker as archbishop of Canterbury. His earlier marriage during Edward VI's reign had made Queen Mary remove him from office. Yet four bishops who held sees under Edward consecrated Parker. Catholics hotly rejected his legitimacy. (Because of this Pope Leo XIII in 1896 declared Anglican Orders invalid.) The controversy caused Elizabeth to appear more Protestant. In 1563 the Calvinistic Forty-two Articles (1553) were adopted as the Thirty-nine Articles of the Church of England. The Test Act (1563) condemned anyone upholding papal jurisdiction and barred Catholics from the House of Commons. Insurrection flared briefly in the north (1569), and persecution of Catholics mounted. Pope Pius V excommunicated Elizabeth (1570) as a heretic, causing fear that a zealous Catholic might assassinate her. Catholic plots to dethrone Elizabeth and enthrone Mary, Queen of Scots, multiplied. Mary had fled to England and was imprisoned by Elizabeth in 1568 and reluctantly executed in 1587.

In 1588 Spain's Philip II and Pope Sixtus V then sent the "invincible" Armada against England. Its defeat left England champion of Protestantism and the most powerful nation in Europe. In her last decades Elizabeth firmly maintained the via media against rebellious Puritans. Separatists Barrow, Greenwood, and Penry were executed, and many others imprisoned. Nationalism increased, economics improved, literature flourished (Shakespeare, Spenser, and Marlowe wrote under Elizabeth). Cecil and Walsingham gave her excellent counsel. Elizabeth ranks as one of England's greatest rulers.

C.M.

ELLERTON, JOHN (1826–93). Hymnwriter and English divine, Ellerton was born December 16 in London, England, and was educated at Trinity College, Cambridge, where he received the B.A. in 1849 and an M.A. in 1854. After being ordained, he served at Eastbourne in Sussex, Brighton, Crewe Green, Hinstock, Barnes, and White Roding. He wrote such hymns as "The Day Thou Gavest, Lord, Is Ended," "Savior, Again to Thy Dear Name We Raise," "God the Omnipotent! King, Who Ordainest," "God of the Living," "We Sing the Glorious Conquest," "Hail to the Lord Who Comes," and "Throned Upon the Awful Tree." He also translated ten Latin hymns, including "Welcome, Happy Morning." He edited Hymns for Schools and Bible Classes (1859) and Church Hymns (1871).

N.H.

ELLIOTT, CHARLOTTE (1789–1871). The author of "Just as I Am, Without One Plea," the daughter of Charles Elliott and granddaughter of Henry Venn of Huddersfield, was born March 18 in London, England. In 1823 the family moved to Brighton. Though in ill health most of her life, Elliott wrote about 150 hymns, characterized by deep devotion and perfect rhythm. They include "My God, My Father, While I Stray," "Jesus, My Saviour, Look on Me," and "O Holy Savior, Friend Unseen." For twenty-five years she edited the Christian Remembrance Pocket-Book. Her Poems were published with a Memoir by her sister in 1873.

N.H.

ELLUL, JACQUES (1912– ). A professor at Bordeaux, Ellul is a jurist and student of human society and its institutions, and also a prominent lay theologian of the French Reformed Church. He is the author of many books dealing with the borderland between theology on the one side and ethics, politics, and sociology on the other. His views are often controversial, and he has been a sharp critic of the pronouncements on economics and politics of ecclesiastical bodies, such as the World Council of Churches. He does not deny that the churches must concern themselves with socio-political questions, but he claims that their views are usually simplistic and bring no specifically Christian wisdom to bear on the issues, but simply conform to the trends of the moment.

He has also been critical of the role of technology in modern society. We have become technology dependent and cannot survive without it, but technology has developed a life of its own and has become the fate of the human race, rather than its servant. It is naïve to think that technology is neutral and can be turned to good or evil according to our choice. Technology is motivated by the love of power and becomes a corrosive force in human life. Ellul is also strongly critical of those Christians who flirt with violence as a means to social justice. "Violence imprisons its practitioners in a circle which cannot be broken . . . it can never realize a noble aim, can never create liberty or justice." Among his books available in English are Violence (1970) and The Ethics of Freedom (1976).

J.M.

ELOHIM. See EL.

ELUL. See HEBREW CALENDAR.

EMBALMING. A method for preserving dead bodies from decay practiced by the Egyptians from the late third millennium B.C. until about A.D. 700. Since embalming is unattested in the archaeological discovery of thousands of Palestinian burials, it was not an Israelite custom.

Explicit biblical reference to embalming is limited to Genesis 50. In order that Jacob's body might be returned to Canaan for burial (50:13), his son, Joseph, ordered physician servants to embalm him (50:2). Joseph was likewise embalmed (50:26); yet only his bones are mentioned as transported by Moses (Exod. 13:19) so that they might be interred at Shechem (Josh. 24:32).

In pursuing their craft, Egyptian embalmers removed the internal organs, flushed out the body cavity with palm wine, and filled it with spices. Also the brain was replaced with spices after being removed with an iron hook through the nose. Once the corpse had soaked in natron for seventy days, it was rolled in linen bandages and placed in an anthropoidal mummy case. Made of wood or cartonage (stucco-coated linen or papyrus glued together in many thicknesses), these cases were carved and painted to portray the person inside. Prayers and incantations also constituted a part of this manifestly religious undertaking, which sought to ensure the deceased a permanent residence where life might continue indefinitely.

J. K. K.

EMBER DAYS. The Wednesday, Friday, and Saturday of the weeks that mark four major seasons of the church year—Advent, Lent, Pentecost, and the week after the Triumph of the Cross. During Ember weeks, the church thanks the Lord and prays publicly for human needs. The Ember days have been favored for centuries as times for ordinations.

J. C.

EMERSON, RALPH WALDO (1803–82). A Boston Unitarian minister, Emerson is best known as a poet, essayist, and philosopher of TRANSCENDENTALISM.

He was born on May 25 to William and Ruth Haskins Emerson in Boston, where William pastored First Church until his death in 1811. In 1813 Ralph entered Boston Latin School, and in 1821 he graduated from Harvard. After teaching he returned to Harvard in 1825 to study theology. Licensed to preach on October 10, 1826, he married Ellen Louisa Tucker on September 30, 1829. She died February 8, 1831. In 1829 he became minister of Old North Church, Boston, but left the ministry in 1832 because of doctrinal conflicts.

In 1833 he toured Europe, meeting such notables as Coleridge, Wordsworth, Mill, and Carlyle. In 1835 he began his career as a lecturer. In September he married Lydia (Lidian) Jackson. The life of their son Waldo (1836–41) is celebrated in "Threnody." In 1836 he published Nature, the first expression of transcendentalism. In the same year he formed the Transcendental Club, including George Ripley, Bronson Alcott, Orestes Brownson, Margaret Fuller, and Nathaniel Hawthorne.

On August 31, 1837, he delivered his famous Phi Beta Kappa oration, "The American Scholar," which enunciated a declaration of intellectual independence from Europe. His address to Harvard Divinity School July 15, 1838, declared his own religious independence. His Essays were first published in 1841, followed by a second volume in 1844. His Poems appeared in 1846 and Society and Solitude in 1870.

Courtesy of the Library of Congress

Ralph Waldo Emerson

N. H.

EMMANUEL. See IMMANUEL.

EMMAUS. A village mentioned only in Luke 24:13. Some manuscripts place it 60 stadia and some 160 stadia from Jerusalem (seven or eighteen miles). The most likely candidates for the site are El Qubeibeh, seven miles northwest of Jerusalem; Amwas (Imwas), twenty miles west northwest; and Abu Gosh, nine miles west.

J. R. M.

EMPEROR WORSHIP. As an issue in the political and religious background of the NT, the cult of the Roman emperor is not easily defined. In Egypt the ruling pharaoh had been worshiped since time immemorial, and Alexander the Great had set a precedent to his Roman successors as world rulers in accepting divine honors, both in Egypt and Asia Minor.

Temples were erected to AUGUSTUS (27 B.C.—A.D. 14) in Asia; at Smyrna there was a double devotion, to the emperor and to Rome (dea Roma). Augustus, however, was more interested in the political gains of receiving divine worth, and he permitted temples in his name mainly as a way of unifying the state, since in the eastern provinces emperor worship and king worship were traditional. Games honored the emperor, and the army took a religious oath of obedience to him as divine. So Augustus encouraged and developed a movement that began in JULIUS CAESAR's time of regarding the emperor as divine only after his death.

TIBERIUS (A.D. 14–37) allowed honors to be paid to his stepfather but restrained other acts of homage given to himself. NERO (A.D. 54–68) was alarmed at a proposal to erect a temple in his name, and he regarded the plan as an omen of his death.

DOMITIAN, who succeeded Titus in A.D. 81, made a bid to receive personal worship, with temples erected to him in Ephesus and Pergamum. According to Irenaeus, this claim to divinity provoked the crisis of faith that underlies the NT book of Revelation (2:13; 3:18; 17:7-14), and brought the church into direct conflict with the Roman state. Nero's persecution in A.D. 65 was a local affair confined to Rome. In Domitian's time the hostility was widespread, since the Christians could not accept the newly devised imperial claim to being dominus et deus ("lord and god") as Domitian professed. For them, only Jesus Christ was the rightful bearer of those titles (John 20:28).

R. M.

EMPIRICAL THEOLOGY (empiricism). An American development, arising out of an emphasis on experience. This comes partly from the expansiveness of the American scene and the pluralism that influences the acceptance of diversity. Validity is defined in terms of performance.

Empirical theology developed during the rise of the scientific method as a way of testing conclusions. Empiricism accepts the idea that religious statements should be verifiable. Basically, it is a method for dealing with experience. Individual experiences are not accepted as such (as in PIETISM) but are validated in relation to their being tested within the group experience.

Empirical theology asks questions and tests ideas. It remains open, even when stating conclusions. It expects tentative judgments and limited statements. Place is left for novelty, hence an emphasis on the relative rather than the absolute.

The roots of empirical theology are in PRAGMATISM, one of whose founding thinkers is ALFRED NORTH WHITEHEAD of Harvard. A basic book is Theology As an Empirical Science, written in 1919 by Douglas C. MacIntosh of Yale University. Empiricism became most deeply rooted at the University of Chicago, 1900–1940, with HENRY NELSON WIE-

MAN as its leading exponent. Empiricists have an operational concept of God in terms of how God is seen to work in the world. Hence there is a continuous process of redefining or describing God.

I. C.

ENCHIRIDION SYMBOLORUM. A handbook or manual detailing the doctrinal statements of the Roman Catholic magisterium. It particularly refers to Henry Denzinger's Enchiridion Symbolorum, first published in 1854, which appeared in a thirty-second edition in 1963. This manual is in general use by Roman Catholic priests and teachers.

J. C.

ENCYCLICAL. A literary form consisting of a very formal letter used by Roman Catholic popes to address the bishops and believing Catholics, or more recently, by popes John XXIII and Paul VI, all people of good will. It is named for the first few words of its text, as in Humanae Vitae.

J. C.

ENDOR. A town tentatively identified with modern Endor situated four miles south of Mount Tabor. Though initially unsuccessful in dislodging its inhabitants (Josh. 17:11), the tribe of Manasseh eventually acquired the town. Prior to the fateful battle of Gilboa, King Saul visited a medium there to consult with the dead Samuel (I Sam. 28:7-25). Endor's mention in Psalm 83:10 establishes in general terms the locus of Israel's victory over Sisera (see Judg. 4:1–5:31).

J. K. K.

END TIME. See ESCHATOLOGY.

ENGLISH REVISED VERSION. This version of the Scriptures, published in 1885, was the first revision of the KING JAMES VERSION (1611). Two companies of translators, including a few American scholars, were appointed—one for the OT and one for the NT. The original publication was known only as the Revised Version but because the American team of translators differed from their British colleagues on some minor issues, the Americans published the AMERICAN REVISED VERSION in 1901. To distinguish it from the ARV, the original Revised Version of 1885 is now often referred to as the English Revised Version (ERV).

R. H.

ENLIGHTENMENT. See NIRVANA; SAMADHI; SATORI.

ENLIGHTENMENT, CHRISTIANITY IN THE. The term used by historians for a cultural era, roughly the eighteenth century in Western history. Frequently Enlightenment and Age of Reason are used interchangeably, although the latter usually is meant to encompass a longer period of intellectual history, from Francis Bacon's Novum Organum (1620) to IMMANUEL KANT's Critique of Pure Reason (1781). The Enlightenment brought together the humanistic and optimistic spirit of the RENAISSANCE and the results of the scientific revolution from Copernicus to Isaac Newton, which together wrought a change in world view of the most profound significance.

The Enlightenment represents a sharp break with the medieval world and ushered in what we call the modern epoch. From the perspective of the history of religion, the Enlightenment hastened secularization, or the emancipation of Western society from theological dogma and ecclesiastical control. Since the Enlightenment the theories and sanctions of modern social and political life no longer are derived essentially from biblical revelation or church authority but are independently deduced from natural reason and social experience. For the improvement of human life, appeal to a world beyond this earth was no longer felt necessary, nor were the invoking of theological interventions or explanations required. The cure of disease, crime, and social disorder was to be looked for through the application of science and common sense. "Enlightenment," wrote Kant, "is man's release from his self-incurred tutelage. Tutelage is man's inability to make use of his understanding without direction from another. . . . Sapere aude! (Dare to know!). Have courage to use your own reason!—that is the motto of the enlightenment."

Reason, for the "enlightened" philosophers, or philosophes as they were called, was not the abstract speculative reason of the philosophers LEIBNITZ and DESCARTES. The model of reason was, rather, the empirical, experimental reason of JOHN LOCKE. That is, reason was not a set of innate ideas held in the mind. Rather, it was, like science, an experimental method by which fact was separated from opinion, truth from superstition. The philosophes saw orthodox Christianity, in its several forms, as the chief obstacle to enlightenment. The church was considered superstitious, corrupt, and intolerant. Voltaire's call, Écrasez l'infâme ("crush the infamous thing"), meaning orthodox religion, was widely shared. In the French Encyclopédie it was written: "Reason is to the philosophe what grace is to the Christian."

The philosophes believed that what was reasonable was also natural. This meant, first of all, that there was nothing supernatural, in the sense of contrary to nature (miracle) or beyond natural reason. While the "unnatural" exists, it represents what is artificial, parochial, and unreasonable. Like Newton's laws of nature, what is reasonable is what is common and universal—not what is imposed arbitrarily by authority, be it the throne or priest or Bible. Worn out and wary of the schisms brought on by the seventeenth-century Wars of Religion, the Enlightenment sought a common religious foundation that all rational persons could stand upon. All Christians could agree on the authority of the Bible, but they could not agree on its interpretation. It was necessary to bring the revealed truths of Scripture wholly within the sphere of reason itself. This effort was begun by John Locke in Book IV of An Essay Concerning Human Understanding (1690) and in The Reasonableness of Christianity (1695), but it was carried out more thoroughly and radically by the Deists. The Englishman John Toland (1670–1722) wrote: "I assert that what is once revealed we must as well understand as any other matter in the world, Revelation being only of use to inform us while the evidence of its subject persuades us."

Revelation is never mysterious or incomprehensible once it is known. Matthew Tindal, in Christianity as Old as the Creation (1730), argued that while the word "Christianity" may be of more recent origin, the essentials of the Christian religion must have existed from the beginning, human beings possessing the natural reason required to know divine truths. These truths were thought to be few: belief that God exists and ought to be worshiped, that the practice of virtue is the chief part of worship, and that there will be rewards and punishments after death. Christianity is reduced essentially to a recognition of our moral duty as the divine commands of a Supreme Being, a conception Kant adopts in his Religion Within the Limits of Reason Alone (1793).

In seeking a common, rational foundation of religion, the philosophes attacked, often with a brutal relish, the incongruities, contradictions, and primitive morals they found in the Bible. Examples of this kind of polemic against the Bible and orthodox Christianity are found in VOLTAIRE's Sermon of the Fifty (1755) and in H. S. Reimarus' Wolfenbüttel Fragments (1774–78), and most popularly in Thomas Paine's Age of Reason (1794–95). It is important to note, however, that while most modern forms of secular faith have their origin in the Enlightenment, the eighteenth century was certainly not irreligious. Voltaire, ROUSSEAU, and Paine all believed in God. And were not JOHN WESLEY and the American theologian JONATHAN EDWARDS "enlightened" men? The term "Enlightenment," some historians now insist, must not be equated simply with what is infidel and unchristian. Room must be made for the likes of Jonathan Swift and Edwards and for the leaders of eighteenth-century dissent.

The Enlightenment often has been criticized for its faith in reason alone, its optimistic view of human nature, and its belief in historical progress. Despite its limitations, the Enlightenment bequeathed a rich legacy to modern religion: devotion to critical scholarship, skepticism regarding speculative dogma, and the insistence that religion be practical and fulfilled in a virtuous life. These remain central to liberal religion today. Perhaps the greatest religious contribution of the Enlightenment was its defense of religious TOLERATION. A series of treatises from Locke's Letters on Toleration (1689) to THOMAS JEFFERSON's Bill for Establishing Religious Freedom (1786) helped to establish and secure modern religious toleration as we know it. As Locke argued, if you concede the right of government to enforce religious uniformity, you concede the right to all governments, but since various nations and states hold different religions to be the true one, it follows that you have conceded the right of forced uniformity to false religions as well as the true one. Religious toleration has proven to be a cornerstone of democratic society.

J.L.

ENMITY. A persistent feeling of hostility to another or others or hatred leading to a desire to injure or harm. In the Bible the relationship can be: person to person, as "Esau hated Jacob" (Gen. 27:41; Deut. 19:4, 6; Luke 23:12; I John 3:15); people to people (Esth. 9:1; Ezek. 25:15; 35:5); God at enmity with iniquity (Ps. 5:5; Prov. 12:22); the wicked at enmity with the righteous and God (Ps. 55:3; Amos 5:10; Luke 6:22; Rom. 8:7); or the world at enmity with the saints (John 15:19).

Basic in biblical ethics is the enmity SIN has toward the godly. For example, enmity is between the serpent and Eve (Gen. 3:1-15). "Sin is crouching [as a hungry, wild beast] at the door; its desire is for you, but you must master it" (Gen. 4:7). "The devil prowls around like a roaring lion, seeking some one to devour" (I Pet. 5:8).

P.L.G.

ENOCH. (1) Son of Cain, and father of Irad (Gen. 4:17a, 18a).

(2) The city Cain built and named after his son Enoch (4:17b).

(3) Son of Jared, and father of Methuselah (Gen. 5:18, 21). Owing to Enoch's close fellowship with the Deity, "he was not, for God took him" (5:24). Extensive legend developed around Enoch's translation (ascent to heaven without death). That Enoch "pleased God" is emphasized in Hebrews 11:5, and his prophecy about God's judgment of the ungodly is reported in Jude 14-15. Jewish intertestamental texts highlight Enoch's righteousness amid a wicked environment (Wisd. Sol. 4:10) and God's desire to favor him with esoteric revelation after his departure from earth (Book of Enoch).

J.K.K.

ENOCH, BOOK OF. A collection of originally independent writings composed during the third to first centuries B.C. under the names of Enoch and Noah. Most elaborate of the apocalypses within the PSEUDEPIGRAPHA, Enoch is fully extant only in an Ethiopic rendering of a Greek translation of the Aramaic original.

Contents. The book opens with Enoch's introductory discourse (chaps. 1-5) announcing God's imminent judgment of the world. Drawing on the mythology of Genesis 6:1-4, the Book of the Watchers (chaps. 6-36) reflects on the origin and judgment of sin; also Enoch's ascent to heaven and journey to the ends of the earth are depicted. In the Similitudes of Enoch (chaps. 37-71), several heavenly scenes portray the approaching judgment. Perceived as a unique figure elected to defend the righteous, the Son of man enjoys prominence here (see Daniel 7). In the Book of Heavenly Luminaries (chaps. 72-82), Enoch receives instruction concerning the heavenly bodies whose movements establish a 364-day calendar. The Dream Visions (chaps. 83-90) focus on the Flood and the history of humanity from Adam to the advent of messianic rule. A book of exhortations and woes (chaps. 91-105) encourages the righteous poor to remain faithful amid presently hostile circumstances. The conclusion of Enoch (chaps. 106-108) narrates Noah's miraculous birth as a foreshadowing of salvation and reiterates that reward and punishment respectively await the righteous and the wicked.

Significance. The Enoch corpus is noted for its diverse literary format, projection of both mythical and historical panoramas, preoccupation with eschatological and cosmological mysteries, stern morality motivated by sectarian concerns, and resolute belief in God's final judgment that will decisively overcome human and angelic rebellion and inaugurate a new and final age. Accordingly, it superbly testifies to the complex adventure involving mind and spirit in which intertestamental Judaism was engaged.

J.K.K.

ENS. See BEING AND NONBEING.

ENTHUSIASM. The word originally meant "being possessed by a god." In the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries it became a pejorative term for extravagant religious devotion. It is a charge frequently leveled against revivalists and CHARISMATICS.

The phenomena can be traced from the early Montanists, Donatists, and Circumcellions, through such medieval sects as the Albigenses, Waldenses, Cathars, Beghards, and Lollards, to the Anabaptists, Quakers, Pietists, Moravians, Camisards, French Prophets, Shakers, Methodists, Jansenists, and quietists. The term might also be applied to contemporary charismatics and Pentecostals.

Enthusiasm can be distinguished between mystical and evangelical (revivalist) strands. The former focuses on God, the Incarnation, the inner light, while the latter emphasizes the Fall, the Atonement, and the Bible.

Enthusiasts are often denounced as innovators, while they claim to be preserving or restoring the fervor and discipline of the primitive church. Their heightened spirituality is often manifested in prophecy, tongues-speaking (see GLOSSOLALIA), miracles (including HEALING), and other forms of ecstasy. They claim personal access to Deity apart from intellect or liturgy, appealing to inner light, conversion or mystical experiences, or the witness of the Holy Spirit. They often preach the simple life and tend toward perfectionism, sometimes falling into antinomianism (see ANTINOMIAN). Institutional churches have usually viewed their excesses as disorder and heresy, a critique of and threat to established order.

Because of their emphasis on experience and religious emotion, an avenue open to all, the history of enthusiasm can be viewed largely as a history of female emancipation. Indeed enthusiastic sects have frequently been denounced as heretical on the basis of the prominence and freedom given to women.

N.H.

EPHESIANS, LETTER TO THE. An epistle in the NT canon, written in the name of the apostle Paul. The destination of the letter is highly uncertain since a number of the better Greek manuscripts omit in the salutation the phrase "who are at Ephesus" (Eph. 1:1) and leave the document with an undesignated Christian audience (compare the RSV marginal reading).

Authorship. The letter claims to be written by Paul (1:1; 3:1) and was so accepted in the tradition of the church from the second century until the development of modern historical criticism. Within the last two centuries, however, an increasing number of interpreters have questioned Pauline authorship on a variety of grounds, cumulative in their force: literary style (excessively long and complex sentences, with a heavy use of synonyms to the point of redundancy); linguistic considerations (a fairly high number of otherwise non-Pauline words); structure (a letter form unlike the other Pauline letters in that half of the book is composed of liturgical patterns, 1:3-3:21); and contents (Pauline subjects such as the church, its organization, Jew-Gentile relations, and eschatology are dealt with somewhat differently from other Pauline letters, and many characteristic Pauline topics do not appear). Furthermore, according to Acts 20:31 Paul lived in Ephesus nearly three years, longer than any other place on his missionary travels. It would be surprising if he had written to the church there such a general and impersonal letter and had assumed that they had only "heard" of his ministry from others (3:2).

Since Ephesians closely resembles COLOSSIANS (which also has a disputed authorship), the argument is made that the author of Ephesians, a follower of Paul, was familiar with a collection of Paul's letters and had a copy of Colossians at hand at the time of writing to the Ephesians. For this argument the book is a mosaic constructed from the other letters of Paul reflecting both similarities and differences. The solution to the question of authorship continues to be debated in contemporary biblical scholarship and will not likely be settled for some time to come.

Occasion and Date of the Letter. If Paul in fact wrote the letter, then it was composed during a time of imprisonment (3:1; 4:1; 6:20) and was carried to its destination by Tychicus, who was to report on Paul's current situation (6:21-22). This traditional position usually assumed that Paul was also the author of Colossians and that Tychicus carried it as well. Onesimus, the runaway slave who was the subject of Paul's letter to Philemon, would have been a member of the travel entourage (compare Col. 4:7-9).

Since Ephesians is general in scope, not addressing specific pastoral problems, and since the readership is not designated in the salutation, some have suggested that the letter was a circular one intended for several Christian communities in Asia Minor. Marcion referred to it as the letter "to the Laodiceans" (compare Col. 4:16), not an unlikely judgment since Ephesus, Laodicea, and Colossae were in the same vicinity. The imprisonment from which Paul wrote would have been Rome and the date of Ephesians about A.D. 61-62.

If, however, Ephesians was composed by a follower of Paul, the date would be later and more difficult to pinpoint. One group of interpreters proposes that it was written as a covering letter for the collection of Paul's letters. The date then suggested is A.D. 90-95, to coincide with a renewed interest in Paul created by the appearance of the Acts of the Apostles. A more plausible setting is the period following A.D. 70, when the increasingly Gentile church was tempted to cut off its connections with the OT people of faith and disown its roots in Israel. The author, then following the lead of Paul, reminded the Christian community that it is built on the foundation of the prophets as well as the apostles and that it grows into "a holy temple in the Lord" (2:20-21).

Structure and Contents of the Letter. The epistle is cleanly divided into two major sections by a doxology that ends one section (3:20-21) and a change of tone that begins the other (4:1). The first half, just after the familiar epistolary introduction (1:1-2), is highly liturgical in form. An initial song of praise (1:3-14) is followed by a prayer of thanksgiving and intercession (1:15-2:10). A "reminder" intrudes momentarily (2:11-22) until the prayer is resumed (3:1, 14) and concluded with a doxology (3:20-21).

Throughout the first section the writer affirms the eternal purpose of God for people and for creation "to unite all things in Christ" (1:10). This purpose has its focus in the resurrection of Christ (2:5-7) with the result that God out of the old Jew-Gentile entities has created one new humanity where Gentiles can be "fellow citizens" and "members of the household of God" (2:11-22). Paul has a special place as the one to whom this mystery of unity has been revealed (3:1-6) and the one who expounds the church's mission to reveal God's wisdom even to "the principalities and powers in the heavenly places" (3:10).

The second half of the letter (4:1-6:20) becomes an exhortation to the readers to be faithful to God's call to unity and to a mutually supportive and growing church (4:1-16). Christians are urged to renounce their pagan ways (4:17-5:20), to demonstrate mutual submission within the structure of the household (5:21-6:9), and to be courageous in the warfare against the cosmic forces (6:10-20). A statement of purpose and double benediction conclude the letter (6:21-24).

C.B.C.

EPHESUS. A seaport city of Lydia on the Aegean Sea at the mouth of the Cayster River; the most prominent city of the Roman province of Asia, about equal distance from Smyrna on the north and Miletus on the south. Extensive excavations since the mid-nineteenth century have uncovered the ruins of a flourishing city with a large theater and baths, the library of Celsus, colonnade-lined streets, and the famous temple to Artemis.

In the NT the city is associated with the apostle Paul, who, according to Acts 18:19-21, spoke in the synagogue there and later returned for a two- to three-year visit (Acts 19:10; 20:31). His stay was marked both by success (Acts 19:20) and by conflict (Acts 19:23). From Ephesus he wrote some of his Corinthian correspondence (I Cor. 16:8-9). On his final journey to Jerusalem, Acts records Paul's farewell speech to the Ephesian leaders who gathered to meet him at Miletus (20:17-38).

The canonical Letter to the EPHESIANS may have been addressed to the church in Ephesus, though there is a textual problem in the salutation that makes this questionable (Eph. 1:1). The RSV is probably correct in relegating to the margin the phrase "who are at Ephesus," leaving the letter with an undesignated Christian audience.

Apollos of Alexandria also preached at Ephesus and was instructed there by Paul's companions Priscilla and Aquila (Acts 18:24-26). The book of Revelation lists Ephesus as first among the seven churches of Asia to whom letters were written. The Christians there were commended for their patient endurance, but chastised for having abandoned their initial love (Rev. 2:1-7). The church remained in Ephesus long past the NT era and was the host for the Third Ecumenical Council in A.D. 431.

C.B.C.

EPHESUS, COUNCIL OF. The third of the ECUMENICAL COUNCILS, gathered in A.D. 431, in order to deal with the debate caused by the teachings of the NESTORIANS. Nestorius, patriarch of Constantinople, declared that Mary should not be called "bearer of God" or THEOTOKOS, but rather "bearer of Christ." His concern, typical of Antiochian theology, was to preserve the full humanity of Jesus by distinguishing between it and his divinity. At the Council of Ephesus, those who supported ALEXANDRIAN THEOLOGY won the day. Nestorius was condemned, Mary was declared to be theotokos, and the

Herbert G. May

The theater at Ephesus capable of seating about 24,000 spectators; it was here that silversmiths stirred up a riot against the disciples of Paul.

typically Alexandrian doctrine of the communicatio idiomatum, that in Christ divinity and humanity are so joined that the attributes of one also belongs to the other, was affirmed.

J.G.

EPHOD. An OT noun ordinarily denoting a priestly vestment (I Sam. 2:18), though occasionally understood as an idolatrous cultic object (Judg. 8:27). As a garment reference, Hebrew 'ephod is corroborated by Ugaritic 'ipd and Akkadian ēpattu, which respectively mean "robe" (worn by goddess Anath) and "costly vestment."

As priestly attire, the ephod, made of linen, girded eighty-five priests at Nob (I Sam. 22:18). David wore one while dancing before the ark (II Sam. 6:14). Probably it resembled a brief loincloth worn by minimally clad Egyptian priests—assuredly it poorly covered David (6:20)! Eventually, this simple loincloth evolved into the luxurious vestment of the high priest. Worn over his tunic and cloak (Lev. 8:7), it was a colorful, gold-threaded outer garment, with each of its two shoulder straps carrying an onyx stone bearing the engraved names of six tribes (Exod. 28:6-12). Fastened to it was a pouched "breastpiece of judgment" containing the sacred lots, URIM AND THUMMIM, used for obtaining oracles (28:15-30).

Some OT texts portray the ephod as a portable cultic image, possibly serving oracular purposes. Gideon fashioned one from gold seized from the Midianites. It "became a snare" in his hometown (Judg. 8:27). In Micah's domestic chapel stood an ephod presumably used as oracular consulting equipment (17:5). Perhaps the ephod was once a vestment adorning a divine image used in divination, with the noun later transferred to the image itself. Within imageless Yahweh worship, the vestment persisted as priestly attire. Absence of hard evidence invites such conjecture.

J.K.K.

EPHRAIM. As a geographical designation this name means "the fruitful land." It refers primarily to the central part of the hill country of Palestine, bordered on the north by the cis-Jordanian region of MANASSEH (inhabited by a related tribe, which it later absorbed) and the valley of Jezreel, and on the south by the territory of BENJAMIN. Sometimes it designates the whole of the northern kingdom of Israel during the period of the divided monarchy (see Isa. 7:2, 8), either because of its dominance among the northern tribes or (as in Hos. 5:9ff.), after the Assyrian expansion to the west under Tiglath-pileser III, it was the only surviving remnant of that kingdom before its total dissolution in 721 B.C. Earlier, after the establishment of SAMARIA as the final capital of the kingdom of Israel, Ephraim was frequently called by that name, which proved to be the most enduring, both for the NT and subsequent times.

As a proper name, Ephraim is the eponymous ancestor of the Ephraimites, the more important of the "Joseph" tribes (compare Gen. 49:22-26; Deut. 33:13-17). According to Genesis 41:50-51; 48:1-20, Manasseh and Ephraim were born to Joseph in Egypt of an Egyptian wife as his first and second sons respectively. When his father, Jacob, on his deathbed adopted them as his own and blessed them prophetically, however, he accorded the precedence to Ephraim rather than Manasseh. This story both acknowledges the mixed ethnic origin of some of the Israelite tribes (though not necessarily the "right" ones) and also doubtless testifies to some otherwise unknown inner-tribal history and rivalry in consequence of which the Ephraimites were destined to prevail over their Manassehite cousins. The story also seeks to explain why there was no "Joseph" among the tribal names that emerged in Israelite Palestine. In fact, it appears from the Israelite traditions of the "conquest" in the book of Joshua as well as from various parts of the book of Judges that Ephraim probably represented one of the most powerful and decisive elements within the Israelite confederation(s) of the formative period of this people, an element whose leadership was virtually unchallenged.

There is an Ephraim mentioned in the NT associated with Jesus (John 11:54). It is generally identified with a site called et-Taiyebeh near BETHEL, but there are rival claimants in the lands traditionally called by the names of Ephraim and Manasseh.

B.V.

EPICLESIS. From the Greek word meaning "to call upon," "to invoke," meaning "to call upon the Holy Spirit," especially in the Roman Mass or the Greek Eucharistic liturgy. Any invocation of the Divine in an act of consecration is an epiclesis, but the term is usually reserved for the invocation at the act of consecrating the bread and wine of the EUCHARIST. At this point in the liturgy of the Mass, the priest prays, with the whole church, that the gifts of bread and wine may be set apart and consecrated so that they truly become the Body and Blood of Christ.

J.C.

EPICLETUS. A Greek Stoic philosopher of the first century A.D., who left nothing in writing but whose religious and ethical thoughts were transmitted by a pupil of his. He argued that apart from the human will there is nothing good or bad, and that one must not try to direct the course of life.

J.R.M.

EPICUREANS. The name was derived from the founder of the philosophy, Epicurus, who died in 270 B.C. He sought to find true happiness in life through freedom of the individual to do whatever brings ultimate contentment. This might take the form of unrestrained indulgence or of abject self-denial. It was not necessarily a mere sensual reaction to religion.

Although Epicureans denied a life after death, they nevertheless paved the way for Christianity in Greece by maintaining that the body was as essential a part of human nature as the soul. They argued against STOICISM'S idea of absolute fate controlling the destiny of people. True happiness can be found, Epicurus argued, only by rejecting superstition and the fear of death. When Paul came to Athens he immediately preached at Mars' Hill near the marketplace, addressing both Epicurean and Stoic philosophers. These two approaches to life had largely captivated Greek minds by the time of Paul's visit to the country. Their reaction to this Jew from Palestine was predictable in Acts 17: "What would this babbling say?" (v. 18). Paul's sermon to them seems to be directed against several Epicurean teachings, including the doctrines of creation (v. 24), providence (v. 26), inspiration (v. 28), and resurrection and judgment (v. 31).

J. R. M.

EPIPHANY. The feast celebrated on January 6, or on the Sunday between January 2 and 8. The Eastern church commemorates the baptism of Jesus at this festival, and the Western church celebrates the coming of the MAGI to adore Jesus. Of course, the baptism of Jesus is also remembered in the Western church, but the theme of the manifestation of the Christ, his "showing forth," which is the meaning of the Greek Epiphanos, is taken to mean Christ's manifestation to the Gentiles. Epiphany may have been introduced by the church in Egypt to replace an Egyptian celebration of the birth of light at the winter solstice.

In the popular imagination, Epiphany is part of CHRISTMAS, hence so many Christmas cards with pictures of the Magi on them. Of course, the coming of the Magi is connected to the nativity, but if such a visit is historical it would have been long after the birth of Jesus. When the Magi came to Herod, his response to the news of the Messiah's birth was to order the slaughter of all male children two years old and under, showing the time that passed from the appearance of the star and the arrival of the Magi.

J. C.

EPISCOPAL CHURCH. See ANGLICAN CHURCHES.

EPISTEMOLOGY. Combining the Greek episteme (knowledge) and logos (discourse), epistemology refers to human thought dealing with the theory of knowing. It explores the methods of knowing, the presuppositions and grounds of what is affirmed as knowledge, and its reliability and limits.

PLATO (427–347 B.C.) originated epistemology in response to the Sophists' SKEPTICISM about uncritical pre-Socratic views that KNOWLEDGE was possible. He provides in his Dialogues one of its most comprehensive treatments, exploring the limits of sense experience for knowing, the relation of language and knowledge, a theory of forms to explain the possibility and limitation of knowing, and a critical method for deriving what may be provisionally affirmed as knowledge by means of rigorous dialectical process within a community of interpretation.

The epistemology of ARISTOTLE (384–322 B.C.), far different from and less subtly conceived than Plato's, posits UNIVERSALS that inhere in and shape matter, impress themselves on the human soul or mind through sense experience, and become knowledge through the intellectual activities of imagination and judgment. This view led to the continuing problems of the relation of universals to matter, to particulars, to the mind, and the status of universals with reference to reality and God, illustrated in Neoplatonic thought, in the medieval debates over REALISM and NOMINALISM, and in the opposition between RATIONALISM and EMPIRICISM in early modern thought.

In the critical epistemology of KANT (1724–1804), knowledge is limited to the phenomenal realm, where sensation shaped by categories of understanding becomes experience. Judgments about the noumenal reality underlying the phenomenal are based on practical or teleological considerations and cannot be regarded as objectively valid knowledge.

The idealist epistemology stimulated by Kant led to a reaction of uncritical common sense represented by G. E. MOORE (1873–1958), who held up his hands, saying, "Here is one hand, and here is another," as proving external reality. Logical atomism and LOGICAL POSITIVISM represent a similar lack of critical epistemology. Linguistic analysis and ordinary language thought limit their focus and avoid the uncritical naïveté of predecessor movements.

The most promising epistemological directions today, built upon the history of human thought and reaching toward a post-critical perspective, are represented by C. S. PEIRCE (1839–1914), who related knowing to human purposes within communities of interpretation; A. N. WHITEHEAD (1861–1947), with a relational epistemology akin to Plato's; Michael Polanyi (1891–1976), who showed the cultural and personal dimensions inherent in the entire range of human knowing, from scientific to historical; and by H. RICHARD NIEBUHR (1894–1962), whose epistemology integrates theology and ontology, history, and society, into what is affirmed as knowing and knowledge in human communities.

C. Mc.

EPISTLE. This term is a transliteration of the Greek word meaning "letter" (II Cor. 7:8; II Thess. 3:17; etc.). Efforts by ADOLPH DEISSMANN at the turn of the century to make a clear distinction between a letter written for private reading and an epistle written for public reading have not been entirely successful. He felt that the difference in the meaning one gives to the terms lies in the intent of the author.

He would write more formally if the document were to be read in public. Thus a letter would not be considered literature but an epistle would be. At issue is the question of whether the author of a "epistle" wrote with the consciousness that he was writing literature that would become Scripture. More recent study has shown that NT letters, both public and private, were written in the basic style of Greek letter writing in the early Christian centuries, consisting of a salutation, thanksgiving, body, paraenesis, and closing items. It is of interest that Paul's letters are known by their destinations (the churches and individuals to which they are addressed), whereas the General epistles are known by their authors (James, Peter, John, and Jude). This may be because there are so many more by Paul.

J. R. M.

EPISTLES (Apocryphal). Letters written in the third century A.D. and later, modeled after those in the NT. They were not widely used and did not become a part of the NT CANON. Best known are the Epistles of Christ and Abgar, the Epistles of Paul and Seneca, the Epistle to the Laodiceans, and the Epistle of the Apostles.

J. R. M.

ERASMUS, DESIDERIUS (1467–1536). Erasmus of Rotterdam, renowned Dutch humanist, scholar, and critic. Born illegitimate, Erasmus was educated at Gouda and the Deventer school of the BROTHERS OF THE COMMON LIFE. Poverty-stricken, he joined the Augustinians at Steyn (1486) and avidly read classics and the church fathers. Ordained in 1492, he became secretary to the bishop of Cambrai and in 1495 went to Paris for further study. By agreement he left his monastery, and in 1517 got all monastic duties waived. In Paris he tutored William Blount, later his patron, who invited him to England in 1499, where friendships began with humanists John Colet, Thomas More, and Thomas Linacre. He traveled repeatedly to Italy, France, England, and Switzerland. Writings, gifts, and teaching provided his support. He caustically satirized hypocrisy, ignorance, and corruption. The Adages (1500), collected ancient sayings with commentary, proved learned and witty. His Handbook of a Christian Knight (1503) advised soldiers to use weapons of knowledge and prayer—Erasmus' "Philosophy of Christ." In Praise of Folly (1511) poked fun at forms of self-love. Julius Excluded from Heaven (1513) highlighted papal crimes. On the Education of a Christian Prince (1516), for future Emperor Charles V, praised biblical-classical studies for encouraging peace. His Colloquies (1518) promoted good grammar and conduct while satirizing society's ills. Erasmus' Greek NT (1516), directly influencing Luther, corrected six hundred errors in Jerome's Vulgate Bible.

Erasmus believed purer knowledge could improve society and religion. In the same spirit he edited numerous church fathers and classical authors.

Erasmus' On Free Will (1524) attacked Luther's impotence of the will, saying ethical responsibility necessitates free will. Luther's On the Bound Will (1525) depicted the will enslaved to sin, rendering humans incapable of acting without sin. Erasmus retorted abusively in Hyperaspites (1526) but Luther did not reply. Erasmus was an interpreter, an intellectual. He died in Basel, a lonely man. Pope Paul IV (1558) and Sixtus V (1590) prohibited his writings, which were placed on the Index.

C. M.

ERASTIAN. A term denoting state control of the church, associated with Thomas Erastus (1524–93), a German-Swiss Zwinglian theologian, physician, and philosopher. He was a professor of medicine at Heidelberg and medicine and ethics at Basel. With Elector Frederick III's favor, Caspar Olevianus began introducing Calvinistic discipline in the Palatinate. Erastus liked Zurich's system of leaving discipline to the magistrate. He attacked Olevianus by saying that all coercive jurisdiction belongs to the magistrate (including excommunication carrying civil penalties), not to church elders. A restricted Presbyterian system was finally introduced in 1570. Erastus' theses on excommunication were published posthumously in London in 1589. He argued that the magistrate has the duty and authority in excommunication to punish sinners. Erastian thus came to signify the dominance of the church by the state. Thomas Hobbes developed a secular Erastianism in his Leviathan (1651). Hugo Grotius promoted Erastian notions in Holland's Arminian controversy. In Roman Catholic countries, GALLICANISM connotes national control of the church.

C. M.

ERIGENA, JOHN SCOTUS (about 810–880). A medieval philosopher and the translator of the writings of Dionysius the Aeropagite into Latin. (Charles the Bald called him to the palace school at Paris to do the translation.) His name connotes Irish origins. He opposed Gottschalk in On Predestination (about 851) and systematized his own views in his greatest work On the Divisions of Nature (about 870). Unwilling for Pope Nicholas I to censure his writing, he remained at court.

On Predestination, condemned by the Councils of Valence, (855) and Langres (859), held that people have some part in their salvation. All reality comes from and returns to God, and for God evil is nonexistent. Sin with its punishment is self-contained; there is no damnation. On the Divisions of Nature was clearly Neoplatonic and pantheistic. From God, the One All-encompassing Reality, everything emanates. First come universal ideas. From universal ideas unfold particular things. Everything returns to God in reverse—God being the nature that neither is created nor creates, motionless unity at rest. This logical reasoning, he said, needs no further authority.

On Charles' death (877) Erigena faded from history. Possibly, he went to England. Pope Honorius III condemned his works in 1225, yet his ideas greatly influenced SCHOLASTICISM and MYSTICISM.

C. M.

ERIKSON, ERIK H. (1902– ). Psychiatrist and author. Erikson was born in Frankfurt, Germany, in 1902, and after graduation from gymnasium studied art and traveled throughout Europe. In 1920, through the invitation of Anna Freud, he began teaching at a private day school in Vienna and was concurrently in analysis with her. He later studied psychoanalysis and began therapy with children.

He came to the faculty of the Harvard Medical School in 1933, one of the first specialists in child psychiatry, and began the study of how the ego functions in a healthy individual. He joined the Institute of Human Relations at Yale in 1936, and two years later began the study of Sioux children at the Pine Ridge, South Dakota, reservation. His objective was to study Sioux children to find the correlation of personality growth with parental and community values.

He entered private practice at San Francisco in 1939 and three years later became professor of psychiatry at the University of California, Berkeley. He began writing the essays later edited by his wife Joan Serson Erikson under the title Childhood and Society (1950). When the University of California began to require a loyalty oath in the 1950s, he resigned and went to the Austin Riggs Center at Stockbridge, Massachusetts, to do clinical work. From 1960 to 1970 he was lecturer in psychiatry and professor of human development at Harvard. He is known for his delineation of the psycho-social stages of human development from infancy through old age. He also developed the genre of psycho-biography through his writings on the lives of Luther and Ghandi.

I. C.

EROS. One of the primordial gods, a son of Chaos, in ancient Greek religion. Later tradition made him the son of APHRODITE, goddess of sexual love and beauty, by ZEUS. In later poetry he was portrayed as a mischievous child; in art as a beautiful, winged youth.

In philosophy eros is identified with the element of desire and love in humans and the universe. FREUD adopted the concept with psychological meaning, designating eros as the libido, the creative energies flowing from love.

The term has been taken into twentieth-century Protestant theology in a view made popular by the Swedish theologian ANDERS NYRGREN, in Agape and Eros (Eng. trans. 1953). He made a distinction between divine LOVE (agape) and human love (eros), which even at its best is not equivalent to agape. Eros, however, transformed by agape, is capable of self-giving that makes possible Christian love among people and a self-giving that enhances all lives.

I. C.

ESARHADDON. King of Assyria (680–669 B.C.), Sennacherib's favorite son, and father of Ashurbanipal.

After Adrammelech and Sharezer had murdered their father, SENNACHERIB (II Kings 19:36-37), Esarhaddon moved swiftly to claim Assyria's throne. Though rebellious Babylon had suffered devastation under Sennacherib, the pro-Babylonian Esarhaddon sponsored the repair of the city and its Marduk temple and won the loyalty of Babylon's leaders. Esarhaddon's pillage of Sidon, colonizing of Samaria (Ezra 4:2), and demands for building material imposed on numerous monarchs in western Asia—including Manasseh of Judah—attest his vigorous kingship.

Aware of Egypt's habit of inciting Syro-Palestinian uprisings against Assyria, Esarhaddon made the suppression of Egypt his chief military goal. In 674 B.C., his army suffered initial defeat in Egypt, but by 671 it routed Pharaoh Tirhakah and conquered

Courtesy of the Trustees of the British Museum

Baked clay prism containing the annals of Esarhaddon

Memphis. Esarhaddon tried to govern Egypt through native princes made accountable to Assyrian governors. Mounting Egyptian revolt induced Esarhaddon to return in 669 on another campaign. He became ill and died en route, but his son and successor, ASHURBANIPAL, succeeded in further anti-Egyptian tactics.

J.K.K.

ESAU. According to Genesis 25:22-26, the twin brother of JACOB and a son of ISAAC and REBEKAH. The Bible stresses the opposition between the two brothers, even in their mother's womb (Gen. 25:19-26), extending through their youth when the clever Jacob deprives his dull-witted brother of his birthright (Gen. 25:27-34). Alternatively, with the connivance of his mother Rebekah, Jacob deceives his senile father Isaac into conferring upon him, in place of Esau, the blessings of the firstborn and heir (Gen. 27:1-45). The rivalry is implicit in the story of Genesis 27:48-28:9 and surfaces again and finally in Genesis 32:4-22 and 33:1-17, when Esau unaccountably becomes a mighty chieftain of the trans-Jordan and threatens to become the benign but certain suzerain of his younger brother were it not for the astute temporizing performed by Jacob.

What lies behind this story is the political and historical relationship of Jacob (ISRAEL) and Esau (EDOM, compare Gen. 25:30, etc.). Whatever may be the age of the Genesis traditions, the enmity between Israel and Edom was immemorial in Israelite thought, even though it was certainly enhanced in the aftermath of the Chaldean conquest of Judah in 587 B.C. when Edom played a jackal-like role to the Babylonian conquerors (compare Ps. 137:7), and despite the historical fact that many "certified" Israelites were in reality Edomite in origin, that is, Arabs of the Canaanite south (I Chr. 2, for example).

In keeping with the popular disposition of the Genesis history, Esau is represented as a boor, a lackwit, and as being easily cajoled by his clever brother, even when in a position of power. Nationalist prejudice has dictated the details of a well-told story.

B.V.

ESCHATOLOGY. That branch of theology that deals with the "last things"—death, judgment, heaven, hell, the final destinies of individuals and of the cosmos. Generally speaking, in archaic religions the worshipers looked to the past. In their myths and rituals, they recalled certain primeval happenings, which they took to be paradigms and which they repeated or imitated in their own experience. This type of religion induced a sense of timelessness as the cycle of events was repeated again and again.

At some point in time and in some places, there took place a shift in the focus of attention from the past to the future. This happened in Israel (as well as in some other cultures) and the change of perspective obviously brought important consequences. As soon as people began to look forward to an end as well as back to an origin, they were expelled from the timeless realm of archetypes and thrust into time and history. Life came to be understood as not just the unending repetition of the past but the passage to the new. No doubt some writers have exaggerated the contrast between cyclical and linear conceptions of history, and even in Israel something of the cyclical element remained in the observance of annual festivals, including the Passover. Nevertheless, a fundamental shift had taken place, affecting even the consciousness of time.

There is much evidence to show that both in cultures and in individuals the early stages are relatively timeless. But as awareness of the future develops, consciousness of the passage of time increases and time seems to pass more quickly. The sense of urgency and of the shortness of the remaining time among the early Christians (I Cor. 7:29) who had a very acute eschatological awareness, is a good illustration.

Eschatology in the Old Testament. Looking back to the origins of their people, the writers of the OT believed that God had already promised to Abraham a land, a nation descended from him, and a great destiny (Gen. 12:1-3). Though these writers were reading their own beliefs into the past, it seems clear that from very early times the people of Israel had a future orientation, and this orientation remained throughout their history. Their expectations might seem to have been fulfilled when David established his kingdom, but this achievement turned out to be shortlived. Nevertheless, the eschatological expectation remained and took new forms. The prophet Amos (eighth century) speaks of a DAY OF THE LORD, and most commentators think that this was an idea not invented by the prophet but already current among the people. In popular expectation, there was coming a day when God, who had delivered Israel in the past, would decisively intervene to bring victory, peace, and prosperity. Amos, however, warns that because of the sins of the people, the day of the Lord will be a day of doom and judgment, rather than a happy festival (Amos 5:18 ff.).

In the following centuries, successive prophets kept alive the expectation of a decisive, divine intervention and alternated between promises and threats, depending on the faithfulness or lack of faithfulness of the people. Chief among these prophets was Isaiah, who was at work in Judah not long after the ministry of Amos in the north. In Isaiah we meet the idea of a coming wise and able ruler of the house of David, under whom the nation will prosper (Isa. 9:2-7; 11:1-9). Sometimes there is a mythological element, the promise of a "golden age" when wild animals will lie down with tame ones (Isa. 11:6-7) and the desert will blossom abundantly (35:1-2). But for the most part, Isaiah's expectation was this-worldly and realistic. The time of the ideal ruler would be one of justice, good government, freedom from oppression, plentiful harvests, and peace. But in Isaiah too this happy outcome depends on the faithfulness of the people. "He connects the happy assurance of Yahweh's intervention on behalf of his people inseparably with the profoundly serious reality of the judgment which must threaten the people so favored" (Eichrodt). The day on which the messianic kingdom would be established would be the same day on which all unrighteousness would be judged. "The Lord of hosts has a day against all that is proud and lofty, against all that is lifted up and high" (Isa. 2:12).

At a later time Jeremiah, though believing that the nation was doomed because it had broken the covenant, held out the prospect of a new covenant (Jer. 31:3-4). In all these preexilic prophets, the coming age is within history and continuous with what has gone before. Though this teaching looks for a decisive moment in the future, it is eschatological only in a very broad sense of the term. But in any case, the destruction of the Hebrew kingdoms and of the Temple itself put an end to such hopes.

Postexilic Developments. After the Exile, the immediate form of the eschatological expectation was that of a return to the Holy Land and a revived nation centered on a rebuilt Temple. When these hopes came to nothing, the eschatological expectation became increasingly otherworldly and supernaturalistic. We come to a new form of eschatology, called "apocalyptic," which appears in the OT in the late book of Daniel, and then in much of the intertestamental writings. In its lurid symbolism and its grandiose expectations APOCALYPTICISM is so far removed from the relatively sober eschatology of earlier times that one can hardly refrain from the suspicion that it represents an escapism from the harsh realities that had befallen the Jewish people. Of course, it might be replied to this that it is evidence for a continuing faith in the sovereignty and good purposes of God. What the apocalypticist looked for was not an ideal age or a restoration in the life of Israel, but a transformation of the entire cosmos and a new age of a different order from what had gone before. Such an age would be inaugurated not by a king naturally descended from David but by a preexistent supernatural figure from heaven who would judge the earth and set up the final rule of God. Another important development that belonged to the intertestamental period was the emergence of a definite belief in a life beyond death. This is generally supposed to have happened in connection with the Maccabean wars. Many young men were dying for the sake of the faith of Israel, and it seemed unjust that their early deaths should be the end of the story. If there is a just God, surely God would raise them from the dead and take them to a divine home.

Eschatology in the New Testament. Both the apocalyptic expectations and a belief in the RESURRECTION of the dead seem to have been widespread among many Jews at the time of Jesus, and he presumably shared them and was looking for the imminent inbreaking of the KINGDOM OF GOD. It is very unlikely that he identified himself with the apocalyptic figure of the Son of man, but the identification was made by his disciples, probably after his resurrection, and in the earliest days, we find them expecting his speedy return to judge the world and establish the New Age. It seems clear that Paul, in the early stages of his apostleship, believed that the end would come very soon, probably in his own lifetime. The end, of course, did not come, and this must have been a serious challenge to those who had been expecting it. Paul seems to take the view that it had been postponed until Israel too had been gathered into the Christian fold (Rom. 11:25-26). Nevertheless, the discomfort and even mild rebelliousness felt by Christians who were disappointed by the nonoccurrence of the SECOND COMING of Jesus is reflected in the complaint recorded in a late book of the NT: "Where is the promise of his coming? For ever since the fathers fell asleep, all things have continued as they were from the beginning of creation" (II Pet. 3:4). John's Gospel (end of first century) says virtually nothing about the Second Coming of Jesus or a future eschatological moment. Perhaps the coming of the Holy Spirit is considered to be the return of Christ, while it is also taught that the judgment of the world is going on now, and that the believer has already entered into eternal life (John 12:31; 5:24; 14:16).

Eschatology in Christian Theology. The general tendency in the history of Christian theology has been to postpone the last things to an indefinite and remote future. This, however, is to deprive them of that urgency which was the reason for their importance in the early days of the church. Only on rare occasions, in some enthusiastic individual or sect, has the expectation of an immediate end flared up. Joachim of Fiore is an example, also Thomas Münzer and the radical reformers. The situation has been constantly muddled because the Platonist idea of the IMMORTALITY of the soul has been inconsistently combined with the biblical expectation of a RESURRECTION OF THE DEAD, and the belief in an interim judgment of each individual at death has been brought in to supplement the expectation of a final judgment in the remote future.

During the present century, new attempts have been made by theologians to come to grips with the problems of eschatology. These attempts began with the findings of J. Weiss and A. Schweitzer, that the mentality and teaching of both Jesus and his immediate disciples were thoroughly saturated in eschatological and even apocalyptic expectations. The idea of the kingdom of God, as an ethical commonwealth gradually to be developed among human beings here on earth, was denounced by Weiss as a relic of the Enlightenment Christianity of Kant. The new emphasis on the all pervasiveness of eschatology in the NT was perhaps as much of a shock to modern liberal theologians as the failure of the Parousia had been to the first generation of Christians. For how can the twentieth-century mind come to terms with the manifestly mythological ideas of first-century eschatology?

One move, to be seen in different forms in R. Bultmann and C. H. Dodd, was to interpret these ideas as "realized eschatology," the last things have already happened. Christ has come and inaugurated the Kingdom; judgment, heaven, and hell are present realities. Basically, this is the solution that John's Gospel already offered in the first century. It may be felt, however, that it is a very reduced interpretation of the grandiose promise of a new heaven and a new earth. Thus, in conscious opposition to such rationalized and demythologized interpretations of the last things, another group of contemporary theologians, including J. Moltmann and W. Pannenberg, have insisted on a futuristic interpretation. They believe that it is of the essence of Christianity to look for a coming "resurrection of the dead," a radical transformation of human society. The problem about such teaching is that it seems to plunge us back into mythology, and neither Moltmann nor Pannenberg has been able to give a convincing refutation of this charge. Furthermore, by laying such overwhelming stress on the eschatological elements in Christianity, they are in serious danger of distorting the structure of theology as a whole.

Contemporary theologians who feel themselves unable to go back to a literal or mythological understanding of eschatology but who may not be content with the much reduced and, above all, highly individualistic interpretation offered by Bultmann and his allies, may find themselves somewhat perplexed. Perhaps the first point for them to notice is that it is unnecessary to give a detailed systematic exposition of such a speculative area of doctrine. Eschatology is not an independent theological inquiry, but simply a consequence of Christian teaching as a whole. If the world and the human race are the creations of a loving God, then this God must have a good purpose for them. It is, however, no more necessary to believe that this will come as a definite end to the whole movement of history than to believe that creation took place in a definite moment of beginning. God's creating and consummating (or bringing to perfection) are constantly going on. In this history, a sifting or judgment goes on, in the sense that there are certain constraints so that there are ways forward by which the human being fulfills potentialities for individual and communal development, and ways back by which humanity is diminished and brought nearer to dissolution. To the extent that human beings fulfill their potentiality as children of God, they enter into a relation with God that may be called ETERNAL LIFE and that by its very nature shares in the permanence and stability of God. This intimate sense of communion with God is the bliss called HEAVEN. On the other hand, HELL is separation and exclusion from God. But whereas the older theologians thought of hell as the final and eternal destiny of some, perhaps most, human beings, few contemporary theologians would be willing to accept this.

The exclusion of some human beings from a saving relation to God would seem to be the defeat of God's loving purpose for creation and to be a permanent hindrance to "heaven" for any human beings at all. Thus there is a general tendency to accept a "universalist" solution to the problem of human destiny, that is to say, the belief that in the end, all will come to accept the proffered salvation of God. Such an interpretation of the eschatological images does not attempt to be too ambitious and confines itself to what may be reasonably expected if there is indeed a good and loving God. Even many Protestant theologians nowadays are attracted to the Roman Catholic belief in PURGATORY, and see this as an alternative to belief in eternal punishment in hell.

J.M.

ESDRAS, BOOKS OF. The first two books of the APOCRYPHA designated by the Greek form of the Hebrew name "Ezra."

I Esdras. This Greek translation of a Hebrew-Aramaic original, probably dating to 150-100 B.C., reproduces the substance of II Chronicles 35-36, the book of Ezra, and that portion of Nehemiah depicting Ezra's accomplishments (7:73-8:12). Manifesting considerable interest in Josiah, Zerubbabel, and Ezra, no other Apocryphal book is more closely linked with the OT. Yet some of the material is rearranged as well as revised, and the engaging story of the three guardsmen at Darius' court (3:1-5:6) lacks an OT counterpart. The product of an author who put Jewish piety ahead of historical accuracy, I Esdras richly extols Ezra, the Law, and proper temple worship.

II Esdras. Though known only from Latin and other translations, the core of II Esdras (chaps. 3-14) is an apocalypse written in Hebrew or Aramaic in about A.D. 100. Its four sections emphasize that the God who predetermines history will soon terminate Israel's oppression. The Salathiel Apocalypse (3:1-10:59) features four visions devoted to the problem of suffering and its alleviation in the life to come. The Eagle Vision (11:1-12:39) depicts the Roman Empire and its overthrow by the Messiah. The Vision of the Man from the Sea (13:1-58) further defines the Messiah's function, and a concluding vision-legend (14:1-48) portrays Ezra's rewriting of Israel's sacred literature. A Greek preface (chaps. 1-2), written by a Jewish Christian in about A.D. 150, argues that the church has displaced Israel in God's economy. A Greek appendix (chaps. 15-16), dating about A.D. 250, offers encouraging prophecies to Christians suffering persecution.

J.K.K.

ESSENCE/EXISTENCE. Two different ways of conceiving the being of anything. To speak of its essence is to consider what it is; to affirm its existence is to say that it is. Essences are abstract and universal; existences are concrete and particular. Essences remain identical in innumerable instantiations; each existent, on the contrary, is distinct and unique.

Some philosophies have been primarily those of essence. An obvious example is Platonism. To PLATO it seemed that the actual world of particular existents is a world of flux and impermanence, somewhere between BEING AND NONBEING. He contrasted it with the unchanging forms, or universal essences, and considered that a superior degree of reality belongs to them. ARISTOTLE, on the other hand, believed that reality belongs to the particular existing things and that the forms subsist only in thought. At a much later time, we find a similar contrast between HEGEL's exaltation of pure thought and KIERKEGAARD's insistence that thought is always the thought of an existent thinker, located among the actualities of the world. Any adequate philosophy, however, must account for both essence and existence and for the relation between them. WHITEHEAD is an example of a philosopher who tries to do this.

Another task is to distinguish different kinds of existence and the relation between essence and existence in each case. When we say that finite things exist, we mean that they can actually be found in the world of space and time. They "lie about," so to speak, so that their existence is passive. Such existent things have fixed, given essences. A piece of gold, for instance, exists if it occupies space and persists through time in some part of the world. Its essence is the sum of properties that distinguish gold from all other substances, and which are found universally in all golden objects. A human being, on the other hand, exists in an active way, as indeed EXISTENTIALISM has emphasized by reserving the term "existence" specifically to human existence. The human being, unlike the piece of gold, is a center of freedom and creativity, and has no fixed essence. As SARTRE has expressed it, existence in the human case precedes essence. The human essence is not given, but is formed by the human existent through deeds and choices.

The existence of God would be of a different order still, for God's existence is certainly not passive like that of a thing—this is why TILICH had doubts about the propriety of even saying "God exists"—and it has a fullness of creativity far exceeding even the existence of a human being. It has been claimed by THOMAS AQUINAS and others that God's essence is God's existence. Thus, as AUGUSTINE had already pointed out, to say that God is is already to say that he is good, is just, and so on. But although God, human beings, and things all exist in different ways, most theologians have held that there is an ANALOGY of being, which allows us to use the language of finite existence in a nonliteral way about divine existence.

J.M.

ESSENES. A Jewish sect that flourished from the second century B.C. until the later first century A.D., famed for its strict observance of the Law and its expectation of divine deliverance. Descriptions of the Essenes are preserved not only in Jewish writers (Josephus and Philo of Alexandria) but in the Roman historian Pliny's Natural History. Almost certainly, the Dead Sea sect, whose library and community center were found at QUMRAN overlooking the Dead Sea, was part of the Essene movement.

The name of the group probably comes from an Aramaic term, Hasen, which is the equivalent of Hasidim, the group that supported Mattathias and the Maccabees according to I Maccabees 2:42. Josephus, in his Antiquities, represents them as a philosophical school, distinguished by their unconditional belief in fate, but he was more interested in putting Judaism in a favorable light for Gentile readers than in accurate description of its teachings.

In his Jewish War, JOSEPHUS describes in detail the strong sense of community that characterized the Essenes, including the sharing of possessions and providing support for the needy. Except for a small group that permitted its members to marry, the Essenes were ascetic, and even those who married could have intercourse only for purpose of procreation. He details their prayers before sunrise, their ritual baths, their communal meals, their silence and freedom from conflict or dispute, their charity, their refusal to take oaths. The probationary period and stages of acceptance into membership are described. The solemn vow required of those admitted included commitment to practice piety toward God, justice toward other human beings, fidelity toward members of the community, and unrelenting resistance of evil. There was to be no opposition toward rulers, however, since they attain power by the will of God. Nothing was to be concealed from members of the group, and none of its secrets were to be revealed, even under torture. The sacred books and heavenly secrets of the community were to be disclosed to no outsiders. Any violation of the rules resulted in expulsion, which would likely lead to the death of the excluded member, whose convictions prohibited the eating of unclean food.

Josephus asserts that "after God they hold most in awe the name of their lawgiver," which probably refers to Moses, but could as well refer to their special interpreter of the Law, the Righteous Teacher, who was the central figure in their own literature. They were especially strict about abstinence from work on the Sabbath and were prohibited even from defecating on that day. A special mattock was given the novices to bury excretion. The members were ranked according to four grades, so strictly observed that for a member of a lower order to touch a member of a higher was to pollute him. Finally, Josephus notes their enormous courage in the face of persecution and their belief in the immortality of the soul, as well as in future rewards and punishments. Among their members were some who used the holy books (presumably their own, not merely the scriptures) to predict the future. Elsewhere (Antiquities) Josephus offers a loose comparison of the Essenes with the Greek philosophical school of the Pythagoreans, but he shifts to the ability of the Essene prophets to foretell the future.

In his treatise "Every Good Man Is Free," PHILO OF ALEXANDRIA describes how many different groups have found freedom through commitment to justice and goodness. One of his examples is the Essenes, whose name he derives from the Greek word for piety. He describes them as residing in villages, avoiding the acquisition of large holdings of land or money, living in frugality and contentment. They avoid weapons and strife. They have no slaves, but live in friendship and mutuality. Central to their life is the Sabbath and the public reading and exposition of their sacred writings when they gather in solemn assembly. Houses, wealth, and food are shared by the group and with visitors to their communities. Philo includes the Essenes among "the athletes of virtue."

When in 1947 the first of the scrolls of the Dead Sea community were found, to be followed by the discovery of the community center as well as other caves containing their writings, the connection was obvious with Pliny's account of Essenes living by the Dead Sea (see DEAD SEA SCROLLS). The discovery recalled the mention by Origen of Alexandria (A.D. 254) of the recovery of Greek and Hebrew manuscripts from a jar near Jericho. A similar report is preserved from the eighth century. Since Philo describes the Essenes as living in villages, rather than in a single place, and since Josephus reports that they lived in isolated groups within cities, it seems that the Dead Sea group was one distinctive branch of a larger Essene movement. Similarly, there were other baptizing sects in Judaism of this period, which did withdraw from society. John the Baptist would be an example of this type of prophetic summoner to repentance, announcing the end of the age. Furthermore, there is evidence that the Pharisees as we see them in the first century A.D. had developed out of the Hasidim. In the phrase of Jacob Neusner, the Pharisees shifted "from politics to piety"; that is, they moved away from direct support of the Maccabees to the fostering of ritual purity of their members as the covenant people. The Essenes shared this later goal, but believed it could be achieved only in isolation from secularized city life.

The Hasidim had been able to persuade Judas Maccabeus to appoint as high priest one Alcimus, who at least had the essential qualification of being descended from Aaron (I Macc. 7:9-16). For a time the group supported the Maccabees, though they later referred to that period as "twenty years of groping." In a commentary on the prophetic book of Nahum two crucial dates in the sect's history are pointed up: the reign of Antiochus (Epiphanes, 175-163 B.C.); the coming of the Kittim (Romans, under Pompey, 63 B.C.). The person who provided them direction after the disillusionment with the increasingly secularized Maccabees was one whom the Dead Sea documents refer to as the Righteous Teacher, or to paraphrase, "the One who teaches rightly." His title derives from a parabolic pun on a Hebrew word in Joel 2:23, which can mean either "rain" or "teacher." In the organizational books of this sect (Covenanters of Damascus, Scroll of the Ruler), in their prophetic documents (Wars of the Children of Light and the Children of Darkness, The Temple Scroll), as well as in their commentaries, their prophetic books, their pious paraphrases of scripture, and their collections of specially important texts, the Qumran library shows this Essene community in detail. The members lived withdrawn, viewing both the political and the priestly leadership of their land as hopelessly corrupt. There in the desert they maintained their purity, living in literal fulfillment of the words of Psalm 1 about meditating on the Law day and night. Above all they awaited the appearance of two messiahs: an anointed priest and an anointed king. Under these divinely appointed leaders, and with the aid of angelic armies, their enemies would be defeated, and they would then be vindicated and established in Jerusalem as the true people of the Second Covenant.

H.K.

ESTABLISHED CHURCH. The name given to the official church of a nation, usually supported by the state and given preferential treatment by the government. The term is often used in contrast with the FREE CHURCHES, meaning those that have no official relation with the state, and are supported by the voluntary gifts of their members.

J.G.

ESTHER. This OT book focuses on Esther and her cousin and former guardian, Mordecai, who braved a hostile environment to advance Judaism's cause. As one of the five MEGILLOTH (festival scrolls), it tells of dramatic Jewish deliverance under the Persians and accounts for the institution of PURIM, a popular festival not legislated by Mosaic law. Once designated by her Hebrew name Hadassah, meaning "myrtle" (2:7), the heroine is otherwise called Esther, presumably a Persian name derived from a noun meaning "star" (compare ISHTAR, the Babylonian star goddess).

Organization and Basic Content. Though the absorbing narrative involves more than a dozen successive scenes, a three-part division emerges—preliminary narrative setting (1:1-2:23); main action (3:1-9:19); conclusion (9:20-10:3). In the story that unfolds, the very lovely Jewish maiden, Esther, is chosen by King Ahasuerus to replace Queen Vashti, who has lost favor with the monarch and every other Persian "male chauvinist" for refusing to display her beauty during the lavish royal banquet.

Meanwhile, Haman "the Agagite," a descendant of the Amalekite king whom Saul conquered (I Sam. 15:7-9), is elevated to prime minister. As a Benjaminite and descendant of Saul, Mordecai finds loathsome the royal command that he should bow down to an Agagite. Before the king, Haman interprets Mordecai's unwillingness to comply as a symbol of Jewish refusal to assimilate. Haman thereby obtains royal support in sponsoring a pogrom (an organized massacre) of all Jews throughout the Persian empire, which by lot (pur) is scheduled for the thirteenth day of Adar. Pressed into action by Mordecai, Esther at great personal risk successfully entreats the king to reverse his decision and allow the Jews to mount a counterpogrom against their opponents on the very day that Haman had selected for Judaism's extinction. Ultimately Haman is suspended on the gallows he had prepared for Mordecai, the Jews slaughter their enemies, Mordecai is made prime minister, and the annual festival of Purim is officially instituted by Mordecai and Esther to commemorate the recent military victory.

History or Fiction? The book's many dates, enumerations of palace details, and the large cast of named characters parade as worthy historiography. A kernel of historical fact may undergird the narrative, but it cannot now be identified. Indeed, historical ineptitude abounds. The name AHASUERUS is the Hebrew counterpart for XERXES, king of Persia (486-465 B.C.), but the ages of Mordecai and Esther cannot be easily reconciled with his reign since Mordecai was exiled in 597 (2:6). It is unlikely that Xerxes had a Jewish queen and downright absurd that he would have allowed the Jews to annihilate seventy-five thousand of his subjects (9:16). The appointment of non-Persians to the crucial position of prime minister (3:1; 8:2; 10:3) taxes the imagination. Moreover, approximately seventy-five-foot high gallows sound implausible (7:9), as does the royal edict that "every man be lord in his own house" (1:22).

The book is cast in the fiction style by a master craftsman. He makes much of antitheses. Not only are Mordecai and Haman at odds, but the pogrom of the Jews becomes a massacre of their opponents. Concealment is central to the story. When Haman approaches Ahasuerus to arrange Mordecai's hanging (chap. 6), he is unaware that the king seeks to honor Mordecai. Nor is Ahasuerus cognizant of Haman's strategy. Also the author deliberately varies the tempo. Esther's postponement of the crucial dinner party involving the king and Haman (5:3-8) is an artful delay tactic designed to heighten suspense. Yet in chapters 6-7, which portray Haman's demise, the narrative proceeds swiftly. As fiction, the book was meant to be enjoyed, as indeed it was during its public reading at the Purim festival where, according to the Talmud, wine flowed in such abundance that the difference between "Blessed be Mordecai" and "Cursed be Haman" became blurred.

The exact antecedents of the Esther narrative elude us. If the individual stories of Vashti, Haman and Mordecai, and Esther claim a prehistory, they are merely distinct threads of plot in the present narrative. Babylonian and Elamite mythological influences have been suspected since the names Esther and Mordecai correspond with the Babylonian deities Ishtar and MARDUK, and the names Haman and Vashti with the Elamite deities Human and Mashti. Nevertheless, the Esther narrative confines itself to the doings of humans. Finally, we lack hard data about the origins of the Purim festival and the date of its introduction into Judaism. Such perplexity, however, cannot eclipse the compositional talents of Esther's unknown author.

Date. Although scholarly judgment is not unanimous, the book is often dated toward the end of the Persian period (539-332 B.C.). The following considerations are relevant: the narrative may reflect an actual mid-fourth-century B.C. threat to Jews of the Dispersion; the book contains Persian, but no Greek, vocabulary; Esther's Hebrew clearly predates second-century B.C. Hebrew texts from Qumran; and the Gentile king receives a sympathetic treatment before Jewish attitudes have hardened in the second-century B.C. Seleucid-sponsored Jewish persecutions. The omission of Esther and Mordecai in ben Sira's list of heroes (Ecclus. 44-50, around 180 B.C.) and the apparent absence of Esther in the Qumran library may encourage a second-century B.C. date, but are merely arguments from silence. Still, the text may have received minor Hellenistic revision.

Religious Dimension. The book of Esther is secular, militant, and narrowly patriotic. No allusion is made to the religious practices of Judaism, and God's name is never mentioned. Nevertheless, Mordecai's reference to Jewish deliverance "from another quarter" (4:14) betrays a belief in divine providence that is reaffirmed in 6:13. And the insidious threat against Jewish existence expressed in Haman's speech to Ahasuerus manifests an undeniably religious element: "There is a certain people scattered . . . in your kingdom; their laws are different from those of every other people, and they do not keep the king's laws, so that it is not for the king's profit to tolerate them" (3:8). This book realistically urges the covenant people to maintain guard against villain outsiders who would harm them. Later generations undergoing intense suffering would derive encouragement from Esther and Mordecai's stalwart example and be thankful that Esther had found a home in the OT Canon.

J. K. K.

ESTHER, ADDITIONS TO THE BOOK OF. Six extended passages lacking in the Hebrew text of Esther but found interspersed through its Greek (Septuagint) version. Questioning their canonical status, Jerome, the translator of the Latin Vulgate, appended them to his translation of the Hebrew. Appearing in the APOCRYPHA as a separate book, these supplementary units confer an explicitly religious aspect on the canonical text, augment its dramatic impact and appearance of authenticity, and intensify its anti-Gentile stance.

Basic Content. These additions, long designated by scholars as A, B, C, D, E, and F, present diverse material. Framing the book are Additions A (11:2–12:6) and F (10:4–11:1), which describe and interpret Mordecai's dream with mention of two dragons in combat (Mordecai and Haman) and the tiny spring that becomes a river of deliverance (Esther). Addition B (13:1–7) is a "copy" of Artaxerxes' decree mandating the annihilation of Jews who disturb the Persian peace. Addition C (13:8–14:19) yields two prayers, one by Mordecai with its pious explanation for his refusal to bow to Haman, the other by ESTHER wherein she expresses disdain for her Jewish-Gentile marriage and petitions the Deity to use her speech as a means of salvation. Addition D (15:1–16) portrays Esther's emotional audience with the king. Addition E (16:1–24) contains Artaxerxes' decree invalidating the original one against the Jews and providing for their self-defense. The additions link with the canonical text as follows: A, preceding 1:1; B, after 3:13; C and D, after 4:17; E, after 8:12; and F, after 10:3.

Connection with Canonical Esther. These additions subject the canonical text to a substantial theological transfusion. Unlike canonical Esther, God's name now surfaces (often!) and God is portrayed in traditional Jewish terms as omnipotent (13:9), righteous (14:7), the God of Abraham (14:18), and Israel's redeemer in the Exodus (13:16). The prayers in C are unmistakably rich expressions of Jewish piety. Occasionally the Greek text contradicts the Hebrew—Haman is labeled a Macedonian (16:10; compare Esth. 3:1), and the Jewish pogrom is scheduled for the fourteenth rather than thirteenth of Adar (13:6; compare Esth. 3:13). Above all, Jewish-Gentile hostility previously centering around Mordecai and Haman now escalates to cosmic proportions (10:10). This enlarged edition is likely the product of an Egyptian Jew dating near 100 B.C.

J.K.K.

ESTRANGEMENT. A term used by PAUL TILlich to indicate the human state of sin due to the FALL, as portrayed in the symbolic story of Adam and Eve in Genesis. Tillich believes the word "estrangement" better conveys today, in the language of EXISTENTIALISM, the meaning of sin. The human situation, due to the Fall, is one of sin or estrangement, the fact that "man as he exists is not what he essentially is and ought to be." The word "sin" cannot, however, be abandoned since it protects the fact that estrangement is personal and the result of human freedom and responsibility. Thus Tillich says that "man's predicament is estrangement, but his estrangement is sin." The word "estrangement" is preferable to sin in conveying the universal and inescapable fallen state of existence, since popular belief conceives of sin, not as a power that rules the human will, but as "sins," or mere deviations from particular moral law or conventions.

Tillich describes estrangement as "unbelief," as hubris, and as "concupiscence." Unbelief is the total turning away from God and toward the self. This disruption of human relations with God results in the turning in upon the self, or what the Greeks called hubris. It leads to the self-elevation of persons beyond their finite limits. They make themselves existentially the center of the world. The human unlimited desire to draw the whole of experience and the world into or around the self is concupiscence. This insatiable desire and acquisitiveness can be seen in all aspects of human life, for example, in the self's desire for wealth, power, sexual fulfillment, and knowledge. For Tillich the term ORIGINAL SIN points to the universal fact or destiny of human estrangement. Individual sin is simply the actualization of the universal act of estrangement. The destined or inevitable character of estrangement does not, however, nullify sin as a matter of personal freedom and responsibility.

J.L.

ETERNAL LIFE. See IMMORTALITY.

ETHICAL CULTURE SOCIETY. See AMERICAN ETHICAL UNION.

ETHICS. Ethics may be understood most comprehensively as reflection on the moral significance of human action. Ethics also includes the results of such reflection in rules of conduct or ways of life. The terms "ethics" and "morals" are derived from Greek and Latin words meaning "customs, conduct, and character." Ethics has come to mean "reflection on values and morality," and may also be called moral philosophy or moral theology. Morals has remained closer to the original denotations relating to the customary behavior of people and communities.

An understanding of the nature and scope of ethics can be derived from (1) major sectors of ethical reflection; (2) its history; (3) important types of ethics; and (4) contemporary tendencies.

Major Sectors of Ethical Reflection. (a) Religious or theological ethics is ethical reflection and formulation within the context of religious traditions. Jewish and Christian ethics are the dominant forms of religious ethics in the Western tradition. Hindu, Buddhist, Confucian, and Islamic ethics provide examples originating in other cultures. If one or another form of Western ethics is taken as the defining norm of all ethics, then the question may be raised whether there is any Hindu or Buddhist ethics. If, however, ethics is understood as reflection on the moral significance of action in all the varied forms this reflection appears, then ethics is clearly a part of non-Western traditions.

(b) Philosophical ethics is reflection on the moral significance of action in rational, philosophical perspective. A major pattern of ethics in ancient Greek and Roman cultures and in the Western tradition, philosophical ethics is often erroneously described by philosophers as the only form of ethics. Religious and philosophical ethics are frequently in close interaction with one another and may be combined in a single thinker.

(c) Social ethics is reflection on the moral significance of human action in communities and societies. The focus of social ethics may be on the overall social system, on particular sectors or issues in society, on organizations, or on individual action within social collectivities. Social ethics draws upon the resources of the social and natural sciences as well as upon theological and philosophical ethics.

(d) Comparative ethics is study and reflection on the moral significance of action in diverse cultures and social contexts. Comparative perspectives in ethics may be provided by different cultures, different historical periods, or different academic disciplines. Some methodological formulations in comparative ethics are too narrowly Western and rational to be useful for cross-cultural purposes. Cross-disciplinary approaches hold promise of more widely applicable methods.

History of Ethics. Reflection on the moral significance of action appears with the dawn of human history and pervades the religious literature of all cultures.

(a) Hinduism is the inclusive term designating the variety of religious and moral traditions indigenous to India. Within a monistic reality that is polytheistic, Hinduism teaches that humans are subject to KARMA, the moral law of sowing and reaping. People are bound to a round of rebirth in a social order of higher and lower castes until by goodness of life they enter a higher level of existence called MOKSHA.

(b) Judaism emerged among the Hebrew tribes of the Middle East around the twelfth century B.C. under the leadership of Moses. It teaches MONOTHEISM or belief in one God and is based on God's commands as given in the Hebrew Bible and interpreted in the Talmud. The TEN COMMANDMENTS and the proclamation of God's justice and love in the prophets provide the ethical core of the Jewish tradition.

(c) Buddhism was founded in India by Siddhartha Gautama (about 563–483 B.C.), the BUDDHA or Enlightened One, and has been a major cultural force in southern and eastern Asia. The DHARMA, as Buddhist theological and ethical teaching is called, holds that human existence is a continuing cycle of death and rebirth. People are born into higher or lower levels of life depending on their deeds in previous lives. Through moral discipline, people can rid themselves of all desire and escape life's pain and suffering into a condition of peace and happiness called NIRVANA.

(d) Confucianism derives from the teachings of CONFUCIUS (about 551–479 B.C.) and until recently was the strongest cultural force in China. Though not theistic, Confucianism affirms that the cosmos is a moral and social order to which persons and communities must conform to attain well-being. This order is learned through reason and developed by moral discipline that results in good character, respectful relations, and social harmony.

(e) Greco-Roman culture is the context within which ethics as reasoned discourse emerged. SOCRATES (469–399 B.C.), as depicted in the Dialogues of Plato, teaches that the unexamined life is not worth living. Ethical reflection, for Socrates, discloses that all the virtues are interdependent, require knowledge to understand and carry out, and are comprehensible only in terms of the Good. PLATO (427–347 B.C.), continuing the thought of Socrates, affirms that moral action requires insight into oneself, human nature, and the world around. Virtue means knowing the Good and also knowing how to accomplish what is good. The form of the Good comprehends what is true, represents the highest goal of human action, and provides the basis of happiness and fulfillment for humanity.

ARISTOTLE (384–322 B.C.) also teaches an ethics of human realization, with happiness resulting from life governed by reason and moderation. Intellectual virtue comes from learning. Moral virtue comes from practice and habit. Both Plato and Aristotle see humans as social beings and justice as the virtue informing political life. Their ethics is known as eudaemonism. STOICISM, another prominent form of ethics in the Greco-Roman world, teaches that the good is represented in a life of duty and of indifference to pain. Virtue alone brings happiness and results from living according to the law of nature and the divine will, which becomes known through human reason.

(f) Christianity emerged from Judaism in the first century A.D. based upon faith in Jesus of Nazareth as Messiah or Christ. Christian ethics derives from Hebrew/Christian Scriptures and deals with principles of human response to God's action in creation, revelation, and redemption. The emphasis is on the covenant of God as providing the context of nature and history into which law, justice, and love are woven as command of God and as condition of human liberation. Christian theology and ethics as they develop integrate elements from Greek and Roman thought into biblical faith.

AUGUSTINE (354–430) relies especially on NEO-PLATONISM. The thought of THOMAS AQUINAS (1225–1274) shows the influence of Aristotle and the Stoic teaching of natural law. MARTIN LUTHER (1483–1546) emphasizes the NT theme of justification by faith as the basis of ethics. In the Reformed tradition, the covenant becomes the foundation for federal theology and ethics that shapes the social and political life of Switzerland, Germany, the Netherlands, Britain, and the United States.

(g) Islam was founded by the Prophet MUHAMMAD in A.D. 622 and is based upon the KORAN as the revelation of Allah, the one God, through Muhammad. It exercises great cultural power in the Middle East, across southern Asia and Indonesia, and in Africa. Islam has both Judaism and Christianity as background and shares many traditions with them. The Koran contains stories from the OT and the NT, and the overall pattern of Islamic theology and ethics is similar. The one God, creator of the universe, is just and merciful and requires that humans repent of their wrongdoing and purify themselves in order to reach Paradise after they die. The morals taught in the Koran resemble those of the OT, including the virtues of faith in God, honesty, faithfulness, industry, courage, and generosity. All Muslims have the duty to pray, to give alms, to fast, and to go on pilgrimage to Mecca.

(h) Modern philosophical ethics contains diverse movements. Intuitionists like Cudworth, Shaftesbury, and Hutcheson maintain that there is an inborn moral sense in humans that leads them to act on values beyond immediate self-interest. Empiricists like LOCKE and Hobbes reject the notion of moral sense as inborn and view ethics as based upon the evaluation of experience. KANT, one of the most influential modern philosophers, is an idealist who bases ethics on ultimate principles derived rationally. Utilitarians like BENTHAM, James Mill, and John Stuart Mill ground ethics on the notion of the greatest good for the greatest number. An instrumentalist like JOHN DEWEY relates ethics to human capabilities for choosing among alternative courses of action by evaluating the results to be achieved. Contemporary philosophical ethics usually divides the field into descriptive ethics, normative ethics, and metaethics. The first is concerned with describing moral action; the second propounds moral norms to guide action; the third, metaethics, focuses on the analysis of moral concepts or language.

Types of Ethics. For purposes of classification, it may be helpful to delineate the most important types of ethical theory.

(a) Teleological ethics deals with purposes to be achieved, values to be fulfilled, and results to be attained. By this means, action is evaluated and directed. Teleological ethics is consequentialist in that it looks to the consequences of action as the primary basis of evaluation. Aristotle and Thomas Aquinas illustrate teleological ethics; both view action as having some good as its end and to be evaluated in terms of its goals. Hedonists in pursuing pleasure and utilitarians seeking the greatest good for the greatest number are also teleological or consequentialist in ethics, though they differ from each other and from Aristotelians in purposes, values, and criteria.

(b) Deontological ethics focuses on laws and rules to be obeyed, duties to be followed, and moral obligations to be fulfilled. Deontological ethics is concerned not with results but with obedience. Kant represents this type. "Let justice be done," he said, "though the heavens fall." The rational will acts according to duty and obeys moral law without consideration of the consequences.

(c) Ontological ethics is based not on ends or laws but on the reality of the world to which human action responds. Confucian ethics, based upon a cosmic moral order guiding human behavior, illustrates this type. Buddhist ethics also begins with the moral reality of humans bound to a cycle of rebirth and the response required to achieve liberation. Stoic ethics starts with the moral law built into the natural order and into human nature and develops through rational perception of natural law and action in accord with it.

(d) Kathekontological ethics seeks the appropriate action as that which fits in with the actions that precede and follow. It is not goals or rules or cosmic reality but the context of action that controls ethical reflection. John Dewey's instrumentalism and Joseph Fletcher's SITUATION ETHICS illustrate this type, though it is H. RICHARD NIEBUHR who provides the most comprehensive account of it and puts it forward as a supplement to teleological and deontological forms of ethics.

(e) Federal ethics, building on Niebuhr's suggestion, combines the four types above rather than choosing one and rejecting the others. Purposes and consequences, principles and law, cosmic order, and the context into which actions fit are of equal importance for ethical reflection and responsible action. Though ethical traditions and individual thinkers seldom fit neatly into one type, most emphasize one of the first four types. In Greco-Roman culture, Plato illustrates best the comprehensive form of ethics. All the types appear in biblical ethics and may be viewed as integrally related in the covenant of God. Among contemporary moral thinkers, H. Richard Niebuhr combines the alternative methods most effectively into a federal pattern, though publication of his total vision was not accomplished before his death.

Contemporary Trends. Sweeping changes are occurring today within all traditions, primarily because of the global expansion and interpenetration of diverse cultures. These changes place ethical reflection in a wider, pluralistic context. Emerging configurations appear to be the following.

(a) Attention to wholeness increasingly characterizes ethical reflection. Dealing with experience by means of academic specialties is being questioned, and cross-disciplinary attempts to recover wholeness of perspective are becoming ordinary in ethics as well as in other areas. The preoccupation with theory and rational method in ethics is fading, and experience derived from practice in specific contexts is being integrated into ethical reflection.

Empirical and historical approaches are being combined in the search for comprehensive understanding of problems, contexts, and relations. Tendencies to reduce ethics to dilemmas, choices, and moral reasoning is less frequent, while the use of cases is on the increase. The recovery of tradition, faith, story, and character as central for ethical reflection is well under way. Indeed, ethics is participating in the general seeking for wholeness of vision that is moving beyond academic specialization and methodological dichotomies characteristic of the critical tradition and is leading toward a post-critical period in human thought.

(b) Convergence and comparison of ethical traditions is a second trend in contemporary ethical reflection. Cross-cultural contacts, intended and unintended; the meeting of religious traditions, in the ecumenical movement and elsewhere; and the coming together of diverse social groups are having impact in all sectors of society, especially in ethics and in areas concerned with values. These contacts are producing not ethical relativism, as some fear, so much as convergence and comparison of ethical traditions. The cooperation of Christian and Jewish leaders on scriptural, historical, doctrinal, and ethical concerns is leading toward reinterpretation of traditional positions.

Disagreement on basic ethical issues, such as natural law between Roman Catholics and Protestants, no longer appears impossible to resolve, though conflict over such actions as abortion remains intense. Convergence may be seen also in the "creative borrowing" among Eastern and Western traditions, and there are fewer attempts to put forward simplistic dichotomies as ethical answers, for example, East or West, Christianity or Communism, Aristotle or Nietzsche. Significant work is also developing in comparative ethics, and, though issues of method are stubbornly difficult, efforts bringing together different disciplinary, historical, and cultural perspectives are promising.

(c) Greater consideration of the social context and the natural environment is a third trend in ethics today. Focus on individual ethics and ethical theory has, over the past century, tended to isolate ethics from the developing natural and social sciences. The rise of social ethics in recent decades has done much to bring ethical reflection into closer relations with other disciplines. Social context and environment are receiving increased attention, in terms of relations with appropriate disciplines and also by including perspectives of people operating in particular social sectors, a trend illustrated in bioethics, in environmental ethics, and in organizational ethics. Drawing on wider resources in this manner contributes substantially to ethics, especially by affecting profoundly its scope and methods.

(d) Recognition of the importance of liberation is a fourth trend in ethics. Developments in every area of the globe emphasize ethical concerns as permeating all aspects of human life. Attempts to evade issues of value with a facade of academic objectivity or to escape the demands of justice by such theoretical distinctions as "descriptive" and "metaethical" have become increasingly difficult. LIBERATION looms as an unavoidable element of ethics and a challenge to greater, rather than less, excellence of effort. Ethnic, Third World, and feminist perspectives have brought liberation to the forefront of attention. But liberation is perceived more and more as equally important for policy ethics, environmental concerns, issues of the political economy, ethics in the health fields, and the ethics of organizations. Liberation, in its varied dimension, has been a constant concern in the religious traditions of East and West and has become a major way that issues of justice are posed today.

These tendencies point to the changes taking place in ethics as it emerges from academic isolation and from its preoccupation with theory and rational method into fruitful relationships with other disciplines and with areas of social dynamism. As a consequence of these changes, ethics gives promise of recovering the breadth it had in earlier times and of making significant contributions to all sectors of society. C.Mc.

ETHIOPIA. The country south of Egypt and west of the Red Sea known in the biblical era as CUSH (Gen. 2:13; 10:6-8) or Nubia. Cush became independent of Egypt around 1000 B.C. and established its capital at Napata on the Nile River. In the eighth century B.C. the rulers of Napata conquered Egypt and exercised control over it during the Twenty-fifth Dynasty. Later, an Ethiopian army fought King Asa of Judah, but was defeated (II Chr. 14:9-15). One of the Nubian rulers, Tirhakah (Taharka) (690-664 B.C.), is mentioned in Isaiah 37:9 and II Kings 19:9 as one of Hezekiah's allies in his rebellion against Sennacherib.

Candace was the family name of a line of Ethiopian queens mentioned in conjunction with the ETHIOPIAN EUNUCH. The subsequent religious history of Ethiopia is represented by the ABYSSINIAN CHURCH. W.G.

ETHIOPIAN EUNUCH. The single allusion to this person is found in Acts 8:26-40. Philip, one of the seven (evangelists? deacons?; see Acts 6:3; 21:8), is directed to a rendezvous on a desert road with the man described thus: "an Ethiopian, a EUNUCH, a minister of the Candace, queen of the Ethiopians, in charge of all her treasure."

The man in question was evidently an attendant in the royal harem, who had risen to a position of some responsibility. Eunuchs were literally "castrated" men. The Greek term eunouchos is, however, ambiguous. The origin of the term is from eunēn echō, "to keep the bed"; hence the sexual connotation. But the Hebrew sāvis may derive from a cognate Assyrian term, "he who is head," that is, in favor with the king and so a trusted official at court.

His place of origin is given as Ethiopia, the ancient kingdom of Nubia extending from Aswan in Egypt to the junction of the Nile River near the city of Khartoum. The Candace ruled this land centered in northern Nubia (modern Sudan) rather than present-day Abyssinia (Ethiopia). It was evidently part of the Jewish Dispersion; the eunuch was reading Isaiah 53 in the Greek Bible. His physical defect placed him outside the life of Judaism (Deut. 23:1), but he may have been a "god-fearer," that is, one interested in and attracted to the Jewish faith but not a proselyte or convert.

His conversion to the Christian faith and baptism are described in some detail as he made a confession of Jesus as "Son of God" (Acts 8:37 KJV). Perhaps Luke saw in this story a fulfillment of Psalm 68:31: "let Ethiopia hasten to stretch out her hands to God."

R.M.

EUCHARIST. The chief sacrament of the Christian church, derived from the LAST SUPPER, which was either a Passover meal (the Synoptic Gospels) or a blessing meal (John), celebrated by Jesus the evening before his crucifixion. Believers are to eat the bread and drink of the cup in remembrance of him. (See also HOLY COMMUNION.)

J.C.

EUCHARISTIC VESTMENTS. The priestly garments worn at the celebration of the Eucharist, Mass, or Holy Communion. These ordinarily include the alb, chasuble, and stole, or the cassock, surplice, and stole, over which the chasuble is placed just before the consecration of the elements.

J.C.

EUGENICS. From the Greek eugenes, meaning "well-born," eugenics is the application of scientific knowledge and techniques to improve the hereditary qualities of a nation or other group of people. It has long been known that selective breeding of plants and animals can lead to the development of stronger and better strains, but whenever one considers the extension of such techniques to human beings, grave moral problems arise. When the Nazis advocated such selective breeding, there were howls of indignation from the free nations, on the grounds that sex and marriage were being reduced to the level of plant and animal breeding. Furthermore, the Nazi plan included the extermination of what were considered undesirable types and had strong racist overtones. Now, however, even countries with very different ideologies from the Nazi one have to face problems of population control. How would one decide on the types of human beings at whom to aim—strong, healthy bodies, acute minds, gentle dispositions, or what? What methods would be acceptable? The possibilities today are far wider than in Hitler's time, when the only solution would have been restriction of procreation to well-matched "superior" couples. Do we indiscriminately accept artificial insemination, sperm banks, womb renting, test tube conceptions, and whatever developments may come along in genetic engineering? Or, on the negative side, sterilization of those deemed unfit to be parents and abortion of substandard children? Not only are the moral questions and the opportunities for abuse horrendous, this whole way of looking at human procreation threatens Christian and personal conceptions of sex, marriage, and family. (Compare BIOETHICS.)

J.M.

EUNUCH. From the Greek word eunouchos, meaning "guardian of the bed" or "chamberlain," which in turn is a translation of the Hebrew word sārīs, possibly meaning "the one in charge." The earliest sense of the term, therefore, obviously involves only a bureaucratic or official function, saying nothing about the physical character or quality of the person concerned.

In the sense of "castrated male," however, eunuch has a very ancient history. Castration was practiced not only in later times for obvious reasons with regard to the custodians of royal or noble harems, but also for less obvious reasons: docility, dedication, heightened professional concern among them. There were, of course, still other reasons that did not necessarily obtain in ancient time, such as bel canto.

As far as we know, officials were not castrated in Egypt, therefore the sārīsīm (ones in charge) of Genesis 37:36; 39:1; 40:2, 7, may have been simply servitors. On the other hand, the biblical writer may have thought of these in terms of the Mesopotamian eunuchs with which he was more familiar. Castration was practiced by the Assyrians, Babylonians, and Persians; and doubtless eunuch, in the physical as well as political sense, is understood in such passages as Esther 2:14; II Kings 20:18; 9:32 (Jezebel's court). Possibly also Jeremiah 38:7 (Ebedmelech the Ethiopian). However, the numerous references to eunuchs in the OT and NT (such as Acts 8:27-39, the minister of the queen of Ethiopia) are ambiguous regarding the etymological or derived sense of "eunuch." References like I Kings 22:9; II Kings 8:6; etc.; referring to Israelite officials, almost certainly do not envisage eunuchs in the physical sense. The law of Deuteronomy 23:1-2 explicitly excludes eunuchs from the community of Israel. The later prophetic text Isaiah 56:3 nullifies this law in view of the eschatological future.

In Matthew 19:12 the "eunuchs for the sake of the kingdom of heaven" have been traditionally taken to be those who have forgone the state of marriage for the sake of a higher good.

B.V.

EUPHRATES. Known to us by its Greek name and to the OT writers by the Hebrew name Prat (Jer. 51:63) or as "The Great River" (Gen. 15:18; Josh. 1:4), this is the largest river of western Asia. From its sources in the district of Ararat in Armenia (now eastern Turkey), the Euphrates flows southwestward to a point less than one hundred miles east of the

Courtesy of William Sanford La Sor

The Euphrates River near its source in the Armenian highlands

Mediterranean coast of Syria. Near this point is the site of Carchemish, where Nebuchadnezzar achieved his decisive victory over Pharaoh Neco II in 605 B.C. (compare Jer. 46:2). A few miles further south the course of the river turns to the southeast, and it continues on its way to the Persian Gulf. Its entire length is about seventeen hundred miles, approximately three-fourths that of the Mississippi River. Along its banks were situated many of the great centers of ancient culture: Dura-Europas and the Amorite city of Mari in the middle of its course, Babylon and the Sumerian cities of Erech and Ur in the south.

As it enters its swampy delta area, the Euphrates joins the TIGRIS River and flows from thence into the sea through the often-disputed waterway known as the Shatt-el-Arab. The great alluvial flood plain that lies between the two great rivers (MESOPOTAMIA) supported three of the greatest civilizations of antiquity—the Sumerian, the Akkadian, and the Babylonian.

W. S. T.

EUSEBIUS OF CAESAREA (260–340). The great church historian of the fourth century, who to this day remains our most important source for the knowledge of Christian antiquity. Born about A.D. 260, he knew both the times of persecution and the period after Constantine. He was an admirer of Origen, to whose library in Caesarea he had access. With the help of that library, and of other books he gathered, he set out to narrate the history of Christianity up to his time. His view of that history was such that CONSTANTINE and his acceptance of Christianity appeared as the culmination of God's plans. Indeed, God had provided both the Roman Empire and the Christian faith, and in Constantine the two had finally come together. For this reason he portrayed the earlier persecutions as essentially a gross misunderstanding on the part of Roman authorities and was rather uncritical of Constantine himself. As a result of these views, and also of his Origenism, he tended to spiritualize Christian eschatology and to disparage those earlier writers who had spoken in apocalyptic and chiliastic terms of a time when God would rule over the earth. Some modern historians, aware of the bases on which Eusebius selected and evaluated his sources, feel the need to correct some of his views on the early history of Christianity. Still, he remains the main source for the knowledge of that early history.

J.G.

EUTHANASIA. Euthanasia is an act through which, by request, a person in painful terminal illness may be eased into death. It is often referred to as "mercy killing." The meaning of the word, in Greek "an easy death," has been extended to encompass the action of accomplishing it. Medical opinion disagrees on a definition of clinical death and on whether there is irreversibility in the process of death.

The Judaic-Christian ethic rejects a utilitarian view of taking some lives in order to preserve others, affirming that life is the gift of the creator, God, who alone can release a person to death. The Christian tradition affirms some value in suffering, when it can be endured with grace and courage, but this is no reason for prolonging suffering. Steps may be taken to reduce suffering, even though this shortens life. Whether such steps extend to "benign neglect" is a controversial issue. Several situations brought about by modern medicine raise the question, such as the comatose patient who, as far as is presently known, will never recover, and the conscious patient kept alive by extraordinary means. Christian moral theory today tends to be situational more than legalistic, but subjective factors may obscure the issue for individual decision making. If death is a process, many factors bring about its completion. If it is an event, then the signs need to be clearly definable. (Compare BIOETHICS)

I.C.

EUTYCHUS. A young man of Troas, who fell asleep during a late night sermon by Paul, fell out of a third-story window, and was "taken up dead" (Acts 20:9). Paul declared him still alive. Whether he actually died is debated; Luke apparently thought so. Appropriately his name means "lucky."

J.R.M.

EVANGELICAL ALLIANCE. An international, interdenominational association founded in London in 1846 "to associate and concentrate the strength of an enlightened PROTESTANTISM against the encroachments of Popery and Puseyism, and to promote the interests of Scriptural Christianity." Essentially it was an organizational embodiment and extension of the EVANGELICAL UNITED FRONT.

In the United States the organization was an expression of anti-Roman Catholic nativism on the one hand and a demonstration of Protestant unity on the other. Full American participation was dampened, however, by a clause barring slaveholders from membership and by disintegration of the Congregational-Presbyterian Plan of Union. Leaders included Robert Baird, Edward Norris Kirk, LYMAN BEECHER, Abel Stevens, Samuel S. Schumucker, PHILIP SCHAFF, and JOSIAH STRONG (general secretary 1886-98).

The organization declined in the twentieth century and became more conservative, eventually being transformed into the World Evangelical Fellowship at a 1951 joint meeting of the British Evangelical Alliance and the American NATIONAL ASSOCIATION OF EVANGELICALS.

N.H.

EVANGELICAL ALLIANCE OF GREAT BRITAIN. A British alliance of generally conservative, free churches, founded in London in 1846, and still very active in evangelism and missionary work. Originally formed to combat Catholicism and movements in the Church of England that evangelicals thought unscriptural, the alliance promoted spiritual unity, helped persecuted Protestants, did prison evangelism, and overseas service. Although a British organization, fifty denominations represented by clergymen and laymen from different parts of the world were part of its founding, and the alliance is associated with the NATIONAL ASSOCIATION OF EVANGELICALS in the United States and similar groups in European countries and in Asian nations.

The doctrinal basis of the alliance include the divine inspiration and authority of the Bible; the right of private interpretation of the Scriptures; the doctrine of the Holy Trinity; the utter depravity of human nature (original sin); the Incarnation; Christ's atonement for sin; justification by faith alone; sanctification through the Holy Spirit; the immortality of the soul; the resurrection of the body; the final judgment by Jesus Christ; and the divine institution of the ministry. The universal week of prayer was begun by the alliance in 1846, observed during the first week of January. The week of prayer for Christian unity is now observed around the world.

J.C.

EVANGELICAL AND REFORMED CHURCH.
See UNITED CHURCH OF CHRIST.

EVANGELICAL COUNSELS. In Roman Catholic tradition, superior guidelines in addition to the usual Ten Commandments for a more perfect way of life. Derived from Matthew 19:16-22, I Corinthians 7, and other NT passages, evangelical COUNSELS came to mean keeping vows of poverty, chastity, and obedience, usually taken by Roman Catholic clergy, monks, and nuns. The practice of these additional virtues was regarded as a means of earning greater spiritual perfection and merit on the way to salvation.

Hermas, Tertullian, Cyprian, Ambrose, Pelagius, Augustine, Aquinas, and other early and medieval church theologians wrote of higher and lower levels of Christian living. Luther, in the sixteenth century, interpreted these biblical commandments not as opportunities for earning merit but as divine instruments to convict human beings of sinfulness. Thus, Luther rejected any division of divine commands into higher and lower. Human sinfulness, according to Luther, thus undercuts all efforts to win merit. In The Freedom of the Christian Man (1520), Luther maintained we are justified by faith, and that we are to keep the law not to elevate ourselves but to express love and gratitude toward God and others for what God has already done in justifying us.

C.M.

EVANGELICALISM. An ancient Christian term, derived from the Greek of the NT, euangelion, the good news, meaning the "gospel," or God's good news of the promise of salvation to all who have faith in Christ.

Evangelicalism is a broad term, based on the concept of the proclamation of the gospel, as recounted in the NT. Since the sixteenth-century Reformation, the term has generally been applied exclusively to Protestants, but since Vatican II and the rise of the Roman Catholic charismatic movement, there are those called Catholic Evangelicals as well.

From the time of Martin Luther (1483-1546), Evangelicalism has been a term used of Protestants, especially for those who adhere to the Augsburg Confession or the Heidelberg Catechism (Lutheran or Reformed or the Union churches). The reformers always called themselves Evangelical Christians, and the Lutheran churches (at least at the congregational level) refer to themselves as Evangelical Lutherans to this day. The term used in this way means adherence to Christ and the Bible as the only rule of faith and practice in the church.

Other than the Lutherans who settled in America, however, the term Evangelical has generally been used in a much different way. Evangelicalism became the name for the revivalism that characterized American Reformed and free-church Protestantism (especially Baptists and sectarians) from the time of Jonathan Edwards (eighteenth century) to Billy Sunday and Billy Graham in the twentieth century (see FREE CHURCHES). This movement differed widely from Lutheran and Reformed Christianity in that it stressed religious experience and demanded a conscious, decisive, individual conversion. American Evangelicalism, therefore, tended to de-emphasize confessions of faith, church order, liturgy, sacramental theology, systematic theology and biblical scholarship, and, after the last half of the nineteenth century, turned away from the application of Christian principles to social and political issues. This was not the case earlier in the century when many evangelicals had spoken out on slavery, temperance, and other social issues.

Sometimes the term Evangelicalism is used to contrast Protestant conservatives with Protestant liberals, called modernists in the 1920s and 1930s. Since the middle of the twentieth century some Protestant conservatives ("rational fundamentalists" as opposed to "cultic fundamentalists") have called for a reform of FUNDAMENTALISM. Men like CARL F. H. HENRY (of Christianity Today) have rightly criticized the lack of social concern, the absence of scholarship, and the lack of serious interest in systematic theology among Fundamentalists or "Evangelicals," as they are called in America. These critics became known by the 1970s as the New (or Neo-) Evangelicals. The New Evangelicals are not unified in outlook, ranging from moderate Fundamentalists to the more socially active Pietists of Sojourners magazine. Most Neo-Evangelicals stress the authority of the Bible although they disagree over the inerrancy of the Bible (a recent development, called the "Battle for the Bible" by Harold Linsell); stress evangelism; the need for personal conversion; and the need for more biblical and theological scholarship (although some Evangelicals do not accept much of the evidence of modern biblical and theological scholarship).

Evangelicalism has been characterized by a multitude of denominations in America (outside of the Southern Baptist Convention). Evangelicals have made many efforts, throughout the nineteenth and twentieth centuries, at interdenominational cooperation on the foundation of shared religious experience and doctrine. American Protestants joined together to found the AMERICAN BOARD OF COMMISSIONERS FOR FOREIGN MISSIONS in 1812, the AMERICAN BIBLE SOCIETY in 1815, and the EVANGELICAL UNITED FRONT. Although the Lutheran tradition was called Evangelical in contrast to the Calvinist churches, which were called Reformed, the books and speeches of Samuel Simon Schmucker of Gettysburg, Pennsylvania, and of Philip Schaff of Mercersburg, Pennsylvania (the "Mercersburg theology"), stressed the common heritage of Evangelical (that is, Reformation) Protestantism. After the deaths of Schmucker and Schaff, the new stress on the SOCIAL GOSPEL (following Walter Rauschenbusch) led to the founding of the Federal Council of Churches and later to the National Council of Churches. To many conservative Protestants, the councils were too liberal in theology, and they moved into the quietistic, uninvolved world of American Fundamentalism. Although characterized by anti-intellectualism, ethnocentrism, nationalistic isolationism, biblical literalism, and revivalism, some of the major leaders of the Fundamentalist movement were scholars. Men like BENJAMIN WARFIELD and John Gresham Machen were learned but recoiled from the conclusions of modern biblical and theological scholarship. Ultimately, these theologians provided a transition to Carl F. H. Henry and others who developed the New Evangelicalism.

In 1941, several small Protestant churches that felt uncomfortable with the lack of social conscience among Fundamentalists formed the NATIONAL ASSOCIATION OF EVANGELICALS. In 1943, at Chicago, the N.A.E. adopted a statement of faith. This confession underscored the inspiration and authority of the Bible, the doctrine of the Holy Trinity, the Virgin Birth, divinity and bodily resurrection of Jesus Christ, and his atonement through his death for our salvation. The members of the N.A.E. do appreciate the need for Christian unity but generally have kept out of the ecumenical movement (including the National Council of Churches and the World Council of Churches) believing that ecumenicity means a downplaying of Christian doctrine for the sake of organizational cooperation. The N.A.E. members stand in the middle, between the liberalism and Neo-orthodoxy of the mainstream churches (and today, the liberation theology and social activism of the larger churches) and the Fundamentalists. The Neo-Evangelicals are thus in large measure drawn from the members of the N.A.E.

The Evangelicals are the heirs of continental PIETISM, transplanted to America through Lutheran, Reformed, Mennonite, and Moravian Christians from Germany and Switzerland, and by the Methodist REVIVALS of the eighteenth and nineteenth centuries. The Methodist movement itself was an outgrowth of Pietism. Evangelicals, like Pietists, have differed from the major churches—Anglican, Lutheran, Reformed, Roman Catholic, and Orthodox—in their insistence on a personal conversion experience, the interpretation of the gospel of salvation by faith in the atoning death of Christ alone, and in the de-emphasis on the need for or saving efficacy of the sacraments.

This emphasis on the sacraments as symbols rather than as a means of grace grows out of the stress put on personal religious experience. This stress divides Evangelicals from both the Catholic and Reformation churches and is also susceptible to a sectarian impulse. The Neo-Evangelical movement, particularly in its most liberal and open expressions, is a sign that this strand of American PROTESTANTISM may be making the transition from sect to church, described by H. Richard Niebuhr in The Social Sources of Denominationalism.
J.C.

EVANGELICAL UNITED FRONT. The 1801 Congregational-Presbyterian Plan of Union and the Second GREAT AWAKENING created the climate for the Evangelical United Front, which swept antebellum America with a millennial crusade for missions, moral renewal, and humanitarian reform. Leaders included revivalists LYMAN BEECHER and CHARLES FINNEY, reformers Theodore Weld and the Grimké sisters, missionary organizers such as Sarah Platt Doremus, and financiers Arthur and Lewis Tappan.

The Front was apparent in such ecumenical efforts as the AMERICAN BOARD OF COMMISSIONERS FOR FOREIGN MISSIONS (1810), which spawned the myriad denominational mission societies; the AMERICAN BIBLE SOCIETY (1816); AMERICAN TRACT SOCIETY (1823); American Sunday School Union (1824); American Home Missionary Society (1826); American Society for the Promotion of Temperance (1826), which became the American Temperance Union in 1836; the American Colonization Society (1827), which gave way to the American Anti-Slavery Society (1833). Most of these organizations held annual meetings each May in New York City.

They represent only the most visible of the cooperative efforts to revive the church and reform the world. Local efforts reached out to the poor, prostitutes, the blind, the deaf, and the insane. Protestants hoped to create a model Christian society in anticipation of Christ's coming.

N.H.

EVANGELIST. A person who brings or announces good news, and specifically "the gospel" of God or Jesus Christ. The etymology of the word relates it to "evangel," the good news, or in Greek euangelion.

There are only three occurrences of "evangelist" in the NT: Acts 21:8, used of Philip who still retained the title when he lived in Caesarea with his family, following his earlier work as a missionary preacher in Samaria and beyond (Acts 8:4-40); II Timothy 4:5 and Ephesians 4:11.

Second Timothy 4:5 can be easily interpreted since it appears to be a descriptive term applied to Timothy by the author. Timothy is exhorted to "do the work of an evangelist" in executing his duties as a MINISTER (I Tim. 4:6) in the congregation at Ephesus.

In Ephesians 4:11, in addition to "apostles" and "prophets" (drawn from I Cor. 12:28; Rom. 12:5 ff.) the writer includes "evangelists" along with "pastors" and "teachers" as the exercise of ministerial functions in the church. On the other hand, the context in Ephesians may be taken to denote the setting up of a distinctive office of evangelist alongside "apostle" and "prophet," terms that enjoy an exalted status in that letter (Eph. 2:20; 3:5) and in the Didache, an early Church Order.

Later, "apostle" and "evangelist" became analogous according to Eusebius' Church History: "there were even yet many evangelists of the word eager to use their divinely inspired zeal, after the example of the apostles." In the Church Fathers the term has another meaning, namely the Gospel writers, for example, Tertullian in de Praescr. and de Corona calls Luke both an apostle and an evangelist.

R.M.

EVE. See ADAM AND EVE.

EVENSONG. A traditional English name for VESPERS, the Anglican term for the office of evening prayer. The Book of Common Prayer of 1549 used the term evensong, but the 1552 edition used evening prayer. The 1662 edition once more used evensong for a service formed out of vespers and compline.

J.C.

EVIDENCES OF CHRISTIANITY. See APOLOGETICS.

EVIL. The Philosophical Problem of Evil. In principle, the concept of evil and its close relation, creaturely suffering, would not be problematical were there no concept of the good. However, since most philosophical systems posit a beneficent prime mover or ultimate being, the very existence of evil poses a severe challenge to the most fundamental premise. If God is both good and powerful, why would God permit evil and human suffering to spoil the beauty of the divine creation? One traditional approach, that of monism, denies the ultimate reality of evil in the name of a finally all-encompassing divine reality. Everything participates in the Godhead, and since God is good, evil is only illusory. Another traditional solution to the problem of evil is radical DUALISM, which pits goodness and the good God in a timeless struggle against evil and the anti-God, Satan. The predominant approach in Western thought has been to affirm the absolute sovereignty and transcendent goodness of God on the one hand, while acknowledging God's radical separateness from the creaturely world on the other. A world that is wholly other than God is both imperfect and free, capable of doing evil but also of seeking liberation from the grip of evil. This traditional outlook has been described as theologically monistic and anthropologically dualistic.

The philosophical and religious enterprise of reconciling the perfect goodness of God with the presence of evil in the world is called theodicy. Theodicy has traditionally dealt with evil under at least four headings, each of which requires its own precisely expressed explanation: sin or moral evil, suffering, bad luck or natural evil, and imperfection or finitude. Philosophers have addressed the problem of theodicy under one or more of these headings at least since Epicurus (about 341-270 B.C.), who taught "Is [God] willing to prevent evil, but not able? Then he is impotent. Is he able, but not willing? Then he is malevolent. Is he both able and willing? Whence then is evil?" Since that early time, other notable philosophers have addressed the problem of evil, particularly PLATO, John Stuart Mill, G. W. LEIBNITZ, and IMMANUEL KANT.

Evil as a Theological Problem. All of the world's great religions have found it necessary to address the problem of evil in their most fundamental writings. Hinduism, for example, treats all reality monistically. Evil only looks evil, but it participates in the good cosmic reality of the divine. Zoroastrianism, on the other hand, prefers the dualistic solution, and pits the good god Ahura Mazda in cosmic and eternal struggle against the evil god Ahriman. After the biblical writers themselves, one of the first theologians of the Judeo-Christian tradition to address the problem in a major way was AUGUSTINE (A.D. 354–430). Building upon the Neoplatonic philosopher PLOTINUS, Augustine taught that evil can be understood as privation, the corruption of originally good but changeable beings. In their freedom, humans chose to turn away from God and from their best nature. Out of that absurd but self-grounded choice has flowed all evil, even natural evil, such as death and disease. A second description of evil, also derived from Plotinus and fundamental to Augustine, is the aesthetic notion that from the point of view of God—who has, after all, the entire picture—there is no such thing as evil. Cockroaches and mosquitoes, earthquakes and tornadoes, all have their special purposes within the great chain of being. Even in our deaths we can and do glorify God by participating in the perfect rhythm of the created order. The Augustinian theodicy has dominated the thought of the Western religious tradition. It was accepted and reformulated by the thirteenth-century scholastic, Thomas Aquinas; the sixteenth-century reformers Luther and Calvin; and even the great eighteenth-century Jewish philosopher Leibnitz.

In his work Theodicy (1710), Leibnitz offered an updated version of the Augustinian position in his contention that this is the best of all possible worlds, not because it is free of evil, but because any other world imaginable would contain even more evil. No more dramatic expression of this aesthetic view ever emerged out of our Western tradition than that of the English poet Alexander Pope (1688–1744):

All nature is but art unknown to thee;
All chance, direction which thou canst not see;
All discord, harmony not understood;
All partial evil, universal good;
And spite of pride, in erring reason's spite,
One truth is clear. Whatever is, is right.

Criticism of this traditional theodicy has centered on two issues, the freedom of the human will and the ultimate outcome of the struggle between good and evil. In regard to the former, questions such as these have been raised: Why would an originally good and perfect human being ever have chosen to do evil? Does that not suggest an imperfection in the creature after all? However, FREE WILL must not be regarded as an imperfection, but as a jewel in the crown of God's beloved creature. As to the ultimate outcome, Augustine and, following him, Calvin, held that God finally overcomes all evil, and at the Judgment Day God demonstrates both goodness by redeeming sinners and justice by condemning evildoers. These choices are not dictated by human behavior, but by God in an eternal decree. Such a view, of course, suggests that God is less than perfectly good, because a perfectly good God would not sentence any beloved creature to eternal damnation.

At least since Irenaeus (about A.D. 120–202), Eastern Christianity has operated with a different type of theodicy. In this tradition, the effect of the FALL is reduced by the denial that humankind was ever perfect. In the garden, Adam was childlike in relation to God. A declaration of independence, expressed as rebellion, was a necessary step in the maturation of the race, just as it remains so in the maturation of individuals from childhood to adulthood. Only truly independent, self-sufficient beings can enter into full relationships with one another and with God. Moral evil is thus almost inevitable, but humanity can, with the help of God, exhibited and assured in the Christ-event, move toward perfection, since humanity has always been perfectable.

The Biblical Address to the Problem of Evil and Suffering. From the foregoing discussion, it is clear that the biblical motif of the Fall of humankind, identified above all with the story of Adam, Eve, and the serpent in Genesis 3, but transformed by Paul in Romans 5:12–21 and I Corinthians 15:21–23, 45–49 into the negative image of the Christ-event, has been a theme of utmost significance for all subsequent discussion of the matter. With the rise of historical criticism, it has come to be recognized that the account of the Fall, far from being a historical record, is actually an early narrative theological rendition of the basic notion that a willful human act of sin destroyed the right relationship between God and human beings and set in motion an age-long quest to recover the lost state of innocence. It follows, then, that the Bible never really purports to answer in any historical sense the questions: Where did evil come from? and How could a good God allow it? Discussion of the biblical treatment of the problem of evil has therefore shifted toward empirical and prescriptive addresses to the problem.

In the biblical response to the practical question, What can we do about evil? four components can be identified. (a) The world in which we live is a world of divinely established orders. Within this world of orders, human beings are given a sphere of competency within which they are charged by God to "be fruitful and multiply, and fill the earth and subdue it; and have dominion . . ." (Gen. 1:28). But that competency has to be exercised in relation to the divinely ordained orders. Laws of cause and effect operate in connection with events in this world. Indeed, human initiatives may be described as "destiny-producing deeds," for they unleash their own consequences for weal or woe. This outlook is especially deeply rooted in the wisdom tradition of the Bible. The writers of the Proverbs know that even though human preparations intersect with the divinely established orders ("the horse is made ready for the day of battle, but the victory belongs to the Lord," Prov. 21:31), at the same time, nothing is going to happen in the struggle against evil if people do not shoulder their responsibility and plan to act effectively within the elaborate network of cause and effect ("By wise guidance you can wage your war, and in abundance of counselors there is victory," Prov. 24:6). God established the world and the orders within it, and yet human beings can authentically exercise their free will within that world.

(b) God, however, does not withdraw from the human community as it goes about its exercise of responsibility. The book of Job is a primary witness to the continuing role of God within the sphere of human competence. Job suffers absurd evil, which to his friends has the outward appearance of punishment for sin. But Job rejects all connection between his suffering and punishment (and thus, well in advance, rejects the Augustinian principle that evil in the world consists of only two types, sin or the punishment for sin). In the end, Job's position is vindicated. The Lord speaks with him out of the whirlwind, acknowledging culpability neither on his part nor on Job's, but demonstrating that he who is the Creator of all the spheres is also Emmanuel, the one who is "present with us." This means that those who suffer the effects of evil in the world do so not alone, but in the company of God.

(c) Occasions of suffering become occasions to glorify God. This is not to say that moments of suffering are—as the Augustinian aesthetic understanding of evil would have it—simply tributes to the magnificent moral order of the universe, when they are seen in the context of God's big picture. On the contrary, it is to say that when confronted with evil and suffering, the human being has the opportunity to respond with good qualities such as realism, courage, trust, and jauntiness, which are inspired by the helping presence of God. The story of the man born blind in John 9 is a classic illustration of this third component of the biblical response to evil. When asked whether the man's blindness was a result of his own sin or that of his parents, Jesus denied both causalities, and taught that it simply provided an occasion in which "the works of God might be made manifest in him" (v. 3).

(d) Jesus' own life, death, and resurrection are an extended illustration of this principle. In his very crucifixion, Jesus sets forth an example of how evil can become an occasion for the glorification of God. He does so by accepting the cup given him to drink of, by remaining steadfast in his pain, and by praying for those who persecuted him. God vindicates his faithfulness in the Resurrection.

This analysis of the biblical address to the problem of evil makes most intelligible the famous Pauline teaching: "We know that in everything God works for good with those who love him . . ." (Rom. 8:28). This text is to be understood not as a denial of the reality of evil in some monistic sense, but rather as an expression of the deep conviction that in the rich interaction between free, responsible, and suffering humanity on the one hand and the good and trustworthy God on the other, victory over very real and powerful evil can, in fact, be obtained. W.S.T.

EVOLUTION. The word means "unfolding," and it is usually understood that such an unfolding is both continuous and has a certain direction. Evolution can be considered as proceeding at several levels, and it is useful to distinguish at least three different levels. (1) Most commonly, evolution is taken to mean biological evolution. This is a scientific theory, based on empirical evidence and accepted by virtually all serious biologists. (2) Sometimes the term is used for a cosmological theory. In this case, the idea is extended to the whole universe, so that not only living things but planetary systems, stars, galaxies, and the wealth of chemical substances have their origins explained in terms of an evolutionary process that has gone on for billions of years. This too is, in the broad sense, a scientific theory, but the evidence is not so clear-cut as in the case of the biological theory, and some cosmologists uphold the theory of a "steady state" universe rather than an evolving one. (3) It is only a step to go on to a metaphysical theory of evolution, a speculative rather than a scientific theory, which seeks to account for the whole scheme of things, from subatomic particles to the human mind and even to God in terms of a unitary evolutionary process. We shall consider each of these levels in turn.

The idea of biological evolution may have occurred to some of the Greek philosophers, such as Anaximander, who held that living things originated in moisture and that the first humans were like fish in the beginning. Evolutionary ideas were again circulating in the eighteenth century, and early in the nineteenth century Lamarck constructed a full theory of evolution. These ideas, however, were still speculative, and it was only in 1859 that Charles DARWIN, in his famous book The Origin of Species, put the theory on a firm foundation, both supplying a vast amount of evidence and suggesting an explanation of the mechanism of evolution. Naturally, the theory has developed in many ways since his time, but the broad principles remain.

The Theory of Biological Evolution Today. There are millions of species of plants and animals on this earth. For a long time, it was believed that each species had been created just as we know it, by God in the beginning. If the theory of evolution is correct, there were only a few basic forms of life to begin with, and the multitude of species that we see today are all descended from these prototypal forms. This, of course, is true also of the human being.

Evidences. Perhaps the basic evidence is the fossil record of the rocks. The earth's crust gives testimony of the living things that have populated it over many millions of years. The human race itself reaches only a little way (comparatively speaking) into the past, and for most of the time the drama of life has been played without humans. Other familiar forms of life also disappear as we go back into time. On the other hand, we meet forms, such as the great reptiles, which once flourished but have for long been extinct. In the earliest layers, there are only animals that live in the waters—fish and still more primitive forms. So this record does suggest a continuous unfolding of life, with humans appearing only near the end. Another piece of evidence lies in the basic similarities of large numbers of living things. A human being, an elephant, a whale, an owl, a crocodile, and a frog all look very different at first glance. But in their basic structures, they are very similar—the same bones and other organs and tissues recur, though developed in different ways. Not only are the structures alike, so are the physiological processes. So we get the impression that they all constitute a family. This impression is reinforced by the further evidence of embryology. Although nowadays it is not considered so obvious as it was once supposed, that the life history of the individual organism recapitulates the evolution of the species, nevertheless the broad evidence remains. The embryo begins its life in a fluid environment, and in the early stages it may be impossible to determine to what species it belongs. Further evidence comes from the geographical distribution of species, which points to their interrelatedness. These matters all become intelligible on a theory of evolution.

Darwin accounted for the process by natural selection. All the individuals in a species are slightly different from one another. Some of these differences confer an advantage in coping with the hazards of life, and so the variations that enjoy such advantages will survive, while the weaker forms will die out.

Consequences for Theology. Bitter controversies arose between the exponents of biological evolution and church leaders who took the Genesis accounts of CREATION literally, and these controversies still go on. But clearly there is no genuine opposition between the scientific theory of evolution and the doctrine of creation. From the beginning of the controversy, enlightened Christians have seen that an evolutionary mode of working is entirely compatible with God's creative activity.

Cosmic Evolution. The astronomer's exploration of the universe takes us not only out into space but also far back in time. The evidence seems to show that at one time (perhaps fifteen billion years ago) the matter of the universe was packed tightly together. There was a vast primeval explosion, and since then the universe has been expanding, forming galaxies, stars, and solar systems. Some of these, in turn, go through the stages that we may suppose have happened on earth—the formation of heavy molecules, the emergence of the simplest living things, the advance from unicellular to multicellular plants and animals, then the whole panorama of biological evolution. It is an impressive and even awesome picture of the cosmos that is now presented to us, and this idea of a universe in evolution is, like the theory of biological evolution, entirely compatible with belief in a creator God—indeed, it might even seem to demand a theistic interpretation.

Evolutionary Philosophies. It was said at the beginning of this article that the term "evolution" suggests both continuity and direction. Something more can now be said about these points. While evolution does indeed proceed continuously, there would appear also to be "leaps" or "emergences" in the process, such as the appearance of living things out of the nonliving matrix, or of the rational human being out of merely animal ancestry. The direction of the process is (with some exceptions) from the simpler to the more complex and from the merely physical to the mental and autonomous. These general features of evolution have led several thinkers to put forward evolutionary metaphysics.

An excellent example is the rigorously argued philosophy of Samuel Alexander (1859–1938) in his work Space, Time, and Deity. He thinks of space-time as the original matrix out of which matter evolves. Out of that evolves life, which in turn gives birth to mind. By a process of extrapolation, Alexander looks forward to a further emergence, which he calls Deity. Here the idea of evolution has been extended to include God, who comes at the end rather than the beginning. Rather similar to Alexander's philosophy is that of Alfred North WHITEHEAD (1861–1947) as expounded in Process and Reality and other works. Whitehead avoids the difficult notion of an evolving God by supposing that God is dipolar. God has a primordial nature, which is ideal and eternal, but also a consequent nature through which God is immanent in the creative advance of the cosmos. The Jesuit Pierre TEILHARD DE CHARDIN (1881–1955) tried to combine evolutionary theory and Christian theology in The Phenomenon of Man. Although philosophically this book lacks the rigor of Alexander and Whitehead, its imaginative grasp of the potentialities of the cosmos has won for its author a wide following. He thinks of the whole evolutionary process as seeking to realize the purposes of God, as they found expression in Jesus Christ. Perhaps he does not sufficiently pay attention to the apparently tentative course of evolution or to versions of evolutionary theory that play down the notion of purpose. One may contrast with Teilhard's optimistic account of evolution the views expressed in Chance and Necessity by Jacques Monod (1910–76). As the title of this book suggests, Monod holds that evolution, so far from supporting theism, points to a view of the universe in which it is indifferent or even hostile to the spiritual aspirations of humanity.

J.M.

EX CATHEDRA. From the Latin phrase meaning "from the chair," for the chair of Peter. The term is used for any pronouncement by the Roman Catholic POPE in his capacity as the supreme teacher in matters of faith and morals. Such pronouncements are rare and, since Vatican Council I, are considered INFALLIBLE.

J.C.

EXCOMMUNICATION. An act, by officially recognized authority in the church, barring a believer from participation in most services of worship, particularly Communion. It was practiced in the early church in cases where Christians had committed apostasy, adultery, or homicide. Such persons were usually allowed to participate in the early part of the worship service, but were dismissed when Communion was about to take place. At times, particularly during the third century in North Africa, there were disagreements as to who had the authority to impose excommunication and to lift it. While the bishops insisted that such authority belonged to their office, there were many among the "confessors"—those who had suffered for confessing the faith during a time of persecution—who argued that, since they had withstood and overcome temptations similar to those of the persons who were being judged, the power of excommunication and restoration ought to reside with them.

During the Middle Ages, the church used the power of excommunication to force believers, and rulers in particular, to conform to its moral teachings. But there were also many times when such power was used to force rulers to bend to the wishes of popes and archbishops. For that reason, as the Middle Ages advanced, excommunication lost its moral authority, and eventually many who were excommunicated paid little attention to such a decree.

Traditionally, there have been two levels of excommunication, and these have been continued until the twentieth century, although with some slight variation. The "greater excommunication" bans the believer from administering or receiving Communion or participating in any other rite of the church, except the last rites. Also, those under such excommunication are to be shunned by other believers. The "lesser excommunication," on the other hand, applies only to Communion itself. Usually, a decree of "greater excommunication" refers to the person by name, while that of "lesser excommunication" is applied more generally to any who disobey a particular directive from ecclesiastical authority.

Many Protestant churches include in their polity the possibility of excommunication. Among Anabaptists, excommunication takes the form of SHUNNING. But in most Protestant churches excommunication has become rare. (Compare DISCIPLINE.)

J.G.

EXEGESIS. From the Greek, exegesis is the word used for interpretation of a document or statement, the reporting or explaining of an incident, or the description of an event. The term was used especially for the revealing of divine secrets or the disclosure of meaning of sacred pronouncements. The Greek verb related to the noun exegesis is found in the NT where John asserts that Jesus, as the divine Word, makes God known to human beings (John 1:18), and when the disciples who had met the risen Jesus on the road to Emmaus report their experience to the others in Jerusalem (Luke 24:35).

Modern Use of the Term. Among biblical scholars, exegesis is used in a specific way to refer to the INTERPRETATION of ancient texts, and especially of biblical texts. In both Judaism and early Christianity, the text of Scripture was central in the self-understanding of the religious community. Its leaders and teachers, therefore, saw themselves as not only obligated to explain the meaning of Scripture for their adherents, but also as privileged through divine revelation to understand Scripture and thereby to interpret it to their followers.

Ancient Exegesis. Among the Jews of the centuries just before and just after the birth of Jesus, the interpretive task had several specific aims: to enable hearers to understand these ancient stories and laws and prophecies; to show how they were relevant for members of the Jewish community in spite of changed times and culture; to provide instruction and guidelines for the ongoing life of that community. In some cases, exegesis was little more than a paraphrase of the Scripture; in other cases, it sought to make a direct connection between the Scripture and the present situation of the interpreter and his reader, as the Dead Sea community did in applying the ancient prophecies to their own group.

In more sophisticated circles, such as in Alexandria, the Bible was interpreted allegorically. Building on Platonic philosophy and Stoic ethics, PHILO OF ALEXANDRIA sought to show that scriptural narratives and laws were symbolic statements of the same truths about God and the Creation that ancient philosophers had discerned. Early Christian interpreters of Scripture adopted these methods, especially that of applying prophetic oracles to their own time, as the common phrase in the NT shows, "This happened to fulfill what was spoken by the prophets. . . ." In the third century ORIGEN of Alexandria was allegorizing the NT, just as Philo had done to the OT three centuries earlier. Allegorical exegesis flourished through the Middle Ages.

Modern Exegesis. Under the combined influence of growing skepticism about the biblical account of the Creation and the rise of critical historical methods in the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries, scriptural scholarship began to concern itself with careful study of biblical language (philology), with the effort to reconstruct the original text of Scripture on the basis of differing manuscript tradition (TEXTUAL CRITICISM), and with reasoned analysis of the historical content of the writings (HISTORICAL CRITICISM).

In many cases philosophical concepts dominated exegetical work on the Bible, as did the theory of G. W. F. HEGEL (1770–1831)—that the course of history was shaped by force and counterforce (thesis and antithesis). Exegetes tried to explain differences within the NT by describing Paul's law-free gospel (thesis) in conflict with Jewish Christianity (antithesis), which produced catholic Christianity as a compromise (synthesis). Other philosophical systems have influenced exegesis in later years, such as ethical IDEALISM and EXISTENTIALISM. Yet exegesis continues to demand careful analytical work along textual, philological, and historical-critical lines down to the present day. Only when these tools are employed to try to determine what a text meant to its first readers can the interpreter move to the contemporary question of what it may mean today. (Compare HERMENEUTICS.) H.K.

EXHORTATION. One of the primary purposes of the early Christian assemblies was to provide the atmosphere, teaching, and sharing of faith that would result in the strengthening of disciples. Words like EDIFICATION, consolation, and exhortation (I Cor. 14:3) are used to describe the purpose and end result of such experiences. It seems that some individuals were especially endowed with gifts to provide the exhortation needed in the early church (Rom. 12:8). The author of Hebrews considers his entire epistle to be a "word of exhortation" (13:22), and throughout he uses the hortatory subjunctive "let us" in his exhortations (for example 4:1, 11; 6:1; 10:22-24; 12:1) or its equivalent (2:1; 3:1; 10:32; 13:1). Barnabas was probably given his name, which means "son of exhortation," because he was well known for this type of ministry (Acts 4:36). The Holy Spirit is referred to by a cognate term in Greek that means both exhortation and consolation. It is usually translated "counselor" in John 14:16, 26; 15:26; 16:7 but would probably be better understood as helper. It is used of Jesus in I John 2:1 with the sense of intercessor, a title that is also implied in John 14:16 when he spoke of the Holy Spirit as "another" intercessor. One of the primary duties of an EVANGELIST like Timothy was to provide exhortation by public reading of Scripture, preaching, and teaching (I Tim. 4:13). J.R.M.

EXILE, THE. That period between the years 597 and 538 B.C. in which a significant number of the citizens of Jerusalem and Judea were forced to live in BABYLON. The primary biblical sources for information about the beginning of the Exile are II Kings 24:18-25:30 and Jeremiah 52:1-34 (see also II Chr. 36). In 605 B.C., the triumphant Neo-Babylonians, under the leadership of NEBUCHADNEZZAR, defeated a coalition of Assyrians and Egyptians at the battle of Carchemish, an event alluded to in II Kings 24:7 and Jeremiah 46:2. JEHOIAKIM, king of Judah, became a vassal of Nebuchadnezzar by virtue of this victory. Second Kings 24 tells us that Jekoiakim revolted after three years, but died before Nebuchadnezzar could reassert his authority. His son, JEHOIACHIN, inherited the kingship and the rebellion, and, after a mere three months, was obliged to surrender Jerusalem to Nebuchadnezzar. Second Kings 24:12-17 tells us that the royal house and the treasures of the house of the Lord were carried into Babylonian captivity. The year 597 B.C. is confirmed in Babylonian records as the year of this first deportation.

More trauma was yet to come, however. Nebuchadnezzar replaced Jehoiachin with his uncle Zedekiah. After much political intrigue, this puppet king rebelled against the king of Babylon. The inevitable reconquest in 587 B.C. brought punitive action. This time Nebuchadnezzar burned down the Temple and the city of Jerusalem, broke down its walls, and carried the rest of the leading citizens into Babylonian captivity. This was the second deportation. A third may have taken place in 582 B.C. Jeremiah 52:28-30 places the total number of persons exiled at forty-six hundred.

Concerning the end of the Exile forty-nine years later, the information that we have is largely indirect. The tale of Belshazzar's feast found in Daniel 5 recounts the events of the last day of the Neo-Babylonian empire before Babylon was conquered by Darius the Mede. Although the story is legendary in its present form, it is well established from extra-biblical sources that one Bel-shar-usar was regent during the reign of Nabonidus, the last king of Babylon, and that he may even have been in the city when it was taken by the army of CYRUS, king of Persia, on the night of October 11, 539 B.C. There is even a persistent legend in ancient sources that the people of Babylon were drinking copiously at a great feast when the Persian armies entered the gates!

The "Edict of Cyrus" preserved in Ezra 1:2-4 is more direct as historical evidence. Consistent with what we know from secular sources about his policy, Cyrus proclaims throughout his kingdom that the exiled Jews are free to go to Jerusalem and to rebuild the house of the Lord (Ezra 1:3). Ezra 2 then goes on to report that the rather extraordinary number of 42,360 Judeans, plus 7,337 servants and 200 male and female singers, together with numerous horses, mules, camels, and asses, and much wealth in gold and silver, were brought back from Babylon to Judea under the leadership of Sheshbazzar, prince of Judah. The priority of these returning exiles was the rebuilding of the Temple, and, although the work went slowly and required encouragement by the prophets Haggai and Zechariah, that task was completed in 515 B.C. The priestly group, which returned from Exile, consolidated the leadership position they had probably held in the Exile itself and ruled the Judean community as a theocratic state until the reappearance of a king in the second century B.C.

With these records of the beginning and end of the Exile, it becomes possible to evaluate what happened in the intervening years. Clearly the experience had a profound impact upon the life, literature, and religion of the Jews, none of which would ever be the same again. Some viewed it as an unmitigated disaster (LAMENTATIONS, OBADIAH); a psalmist cried, "By the waters of Babylon, there we sat down and wept, when we remembered Zion" (Ps. 137:1). But others took more positive views. The prophet JEREMIAH encouraged the first wave of exiles to settle down, marry, and acquire property with the promise that, "when seventy years are completed for Babylon, I will visit you, and I will fulfil to you my promise and bring you back to this place" (Jer. 29:10).

From secular sources we have evidence that the Babylonian Diaspora did exactly that, some individuals even becoming wealthy traders and artisans. The narratives of Daniel 1-6, though probably written long after the fact, picture Jews receiving great respect and high political rank in the Babylonian court. The prophet EZEKIEL receives his inaugural vision while dwelling by the banks of the river Chebar, among the exiles in Babylon (Ezek. 1:1). The fact that he saw the glory of God there, seated on the ark-throne, suggests that the exilic experience convinced the Jewish community that God's sovereignty extended also to Babylon, and that God could be manifested there as well as in Jerusalem.

Among the literary products of the exilic community, many include the so-called Priestly document (P), which provides a narrative framework for the entire Pentateuch and contains great blocks of cultic and ethical legislation such as the Holiness Code (Lev. 17-26). The P source reinforces the impression that the experience of exile awakened a high sense of their own identity in the Jews and led them to emphasize their distinctive practices of Sabbath, circumcision, and worship. The synagogue may have originated in this period as an alternative to the ruined Temple; however, Priestly groups also planned carefully for the restoration of Temple worship and the renewal of the holy commonwealth (compare Ezek. 40-48).

Finally, the greatest of all the literary figures of the Exile was the anonymous poet who composed Isaiah 40-55. Convinced that the Lord had anointed Cyrus to be the deliverer of Israel (45:1), this writer perceives the end of the Exile as a new exodus. The restored community, which lies beyond the Exile, is to be the fulfillment of all the prophetic hopes for a new age of peace and freedom.

During the exilic period, life also continued in Jerusalem and Judea. Although II Kings 25:12 reports that only "some of the poorest of the land" were left behind by Nebuchadnezzar, modern scholarship has suggested that the Former Prophets, Joshua-II Kings, may have been brought into their present shape as a single continuous document in Judea during the exilic period. Done by writers influenced by prophetic preaching and especially by DEUTERONOMY, this "deuteronomistic history" reflects the negative judgment on their royal house of a people who had experienced and lost a monarchy. However, by closing with the last king, Jehoiachin, still alive and seated at the table of the king of Babylon (II Kings 25:27-30), the implication is left open that further chapters in the story of the Davidic dynasty might yet be written. Obviously, one of the roots of messianic expectation is to be found just here.

W.S.T.

EXISTENCE. See ESSENCE.

EXISTENTIALISM. A style of philosophizing that has been influential in the twentieth century, though its roots go back to NIETZSCHE, KIERKEGAARD, PASCAL and even earlier. Philosophers who can be loosely included under the existentialist label are JASPERS, HEIDEGGER, SARTRE, MARCEL, and Unamuno.

The thinkers mentioned are so varied that it becomes clear at once that existentialism is not a body of doctrines. It is rather a way of doing philosophy that may lead to very different results. Its starting point is the questioning of human existence itself, understood as an open possibility to which individuals have to give shape and substance by their own decisions. This is what is meant by saying that existence precedes ESSENCE. The existentialists are agreed in making a more or less sharp distinction between humans and nature. In Sartre, this distinction is so sharp that it becomes virtually a dualism. But among all the existentialists, it is agreed that with the human phenomenon, something new has appeared on this planet, something which is not amenable to the methods of study employed in the investigation of nature.

There is further agreement that the most important characteristic of a human being is freedom. Some existentialists give the impression that it does not matter very much what one becomes so long as it is the result of one's free choice. To conform to patterns imposed by some external authority is to revert to the status of a thing or a manufactured object. Freedom thus becomes a value in itself. The free person is the authentic human being, while those who compromise their freedom are living inauthentically or in bad faith.

Another common characteristic of the existentialists is their stress on finitude. Human existence is free, but freedom is always limited by the factual conditions of existence. Thus there is a tragic element in existence. Some existentialists go so far as to suggest that there is a fundamental absurdity in the existence of a being who is both free and finite. It is at this point that we can see why some existentialists are atheists, others religious. The former see no sense in human existence and in any case believe that the existence of God would be incompatible with the full exercise of human freedom. The latter believe that only God (or transcendence in some form) can bring sense into the human situation, and they would see God as encouraging human freedom.

The existentialists are not, as is sometimes said, irrationalists, but they think that to define humans as rational animals is too narrow a view, and that we have to consider the whole person, including the will and emotions. It is perhaps not surprising that existentialism has made a strong appeal to theologians, for it allows more scope to the spiritual and creative aspects of human existence than does its chief philosophical rival in the contemporary world, empiricism. Among theologians who have been most influential are TILlich, BULTMANN, and RAHNER.

J.M.

EXODUS, BOOK OF. A name derived from the Septuagint, the Greek translation of the OT, meaning "a going out." This second book of the Bible, known in Hebrew as weelleh shemoth ("and these are the names") after its two opening words, narrates the dramatic departure of the ancient Hebrews from Egyptian captivity and their journey to Mount Sinai, where they enter into a covenant relation with the Deity who favors them with divine presence.

Organization and Basic Content. A study of the oral transmission of ancient Israelite traditions suggests that Exodus contains three large blocks of material. The first, located in chapters 1–15, focuses on four major events—the summons of Moses, numerous plagues inflicted against Egypt, the celebration of PASSOVER, and the deliverance from the pursuing Egyptians at the Sea of Reeds (Red Sea). The second block spanning chapters 16–18 highlights harsh moments in Israel's wilderness journey when lack of food and water and pressure from hostile tribes severely tested its trust in Yahweh's providential care. The third block found in chapters 19–40 on Yahweh's theophany to Israel at SINAI when it formally became Yahweh's covenant people by receiving laws, including elaborate instructions ensuring an ongoing worshiping fellowship with the Deity.

Composition and Historicity. Like Genesis, Yahwistic (J), Elohist (E), and Priestly (P) strata are all discernible in Exodus (see DOCUMENTARY HYPOTHESIS). The editors of the Deuteronomistic school have also made their mark felt (minimally in 12:24–27; 13:3–16; 15:25b–26). The not always readily distinguishable JE strata dominate the first half of the book, whereas P prevails in the second half. Though the Ten Commandments (20:2–17) and Covenant Code (20:22–23:19) are ordinarily attributed to E and the so-called Ritual Decalogue (34:10–26) to J, this legal material may have been only secondarily linked with the literary strata. This is likewise true of such ancient poems as the Song of the Sea (15:1–18) and the Song of Miriam (15:21). In its final edited form, Exodus is a loosely unified composition of diverse elements, which have undergone a lengthy history of development.

The Exodus text should be understood from critically as confessional legend created and reshaped by the worshiping Israelite community. Exodus 1–15 is likely a cultic legend intimately associated with Israel's Passover festival. Also many cultic elements surface within the Sinai traditions in chapters 19–24;

32–34. Exodus is thus a sustained liturgical meditation on those moments in Israel's past that singularly equipped a band of enslaved Hebrews to become Yahweh's special people. Recurring occasions of Israelite worship provided for the effective reenactment of those remote historical events about which the text speaks. Israelite generations across the centuries could share the burden of Egyptian oppression and the joy of divine rescue.

The question of what really happened is not readily answered. Though the deliverance of the Hebrews from Egyptian servitude and their covenanting with Yahweh at Sinai may be anchored in historical fact, much is uncertain. The hasty exit of Hebrew slaves is nowhere mentioned in extant Egyptian literature. Nor can we confidently determine the actual role that Moses played. Reference to store-cities of Pithom (Tell er-Retabeh) and Raamses (Avaris) in Exodus 1:11, however, argue for a thirteenth-century B.C. date for the EXODUS. The Nineteenth Dynasty pharaohs, Seti I (around 1305–1290) and Ramses II (around 1290–1224), sponsored ambitious building programs at these sites as they moved Egypt to new levels of political and economic expansion. Presumably Seti I was the pharaoh of the oppression (whose death is reported in 2:23) and Ramses II, the pharaoh of the Exodus. Moreover, the actual locus of Israel's dramatic rescue is unknown, for the Hebrew in 15:4 merely attests "sea of reeds" (yam suph). A southern extension of Lake Menzaleh in the eastern Nile Delta with its papyrus marshes is often proposed. Nor is the exact location of Mount Sinai a settled issue. Notwithstanding the paucity of brute historical and geographical facts, the Exodus and Sinai events markedly affected Israel's subsequent religious history.

Religious Message. (a) Yahweh, the God of Israel. Above all, the Deity resolves to intervene in Israel's behalf. To Moses, God declared, "I have seen the affliction of my people who are in Egypt, and have heard their cry . . . I know their sufferings, and I have come down to deliver them" (3:7–8). Placing the mantle of leadership on Moses, he imparted the special name "Yahweh" (3:14 {E}, compare 6:2 {P}); yet God came as "the god of the fathers" (6:3) who pledged a constant presence. In the plague narrative, Pharaoh's chief opponent was not Moses but Yahweh, who sought to liberate the Hebrews and thereby be manifested as history's true sovereign. Through the human instruments, Moses and Aaron, Yahweh inflicted awful scourges on the Egyptians. As Lord over nature, Yahweh sent the pillars of cloud and fire to direct the people's way (13:21) and "drove the sea back by a strong east wind" (14:21) to ensure their escape. In the wilderness Yahweh benevolently provided for the people by sending manna and quail to satisfy their hunger, making desert springs available to assuage their thirst, and managing their triumph over hostile Amalekites (17:8–15).

Inviting the people into covenant fellowship at Sinai, Yahweh convincingly manifested a gracious and demanding nature. By instructing Moses to tell the people, "You have seen what I did to the Egyptians, and how I bore you on eagles' wings and brought you to myself" (19:4). Yahweh emphasized their miraculous deliverance as God's gift. By making God's law an intrinsic component in the covenant proceedings, however, Yahweh conveyed high expectations. If the people were to enter into a permanent association with this Deity, whose name was "Jealous" (34:14), they must know that Yahweh would lay upon them specific religious and ethical claims. Still, they will be magnificently supported by God's continuing presence—the glory of Yahweh that had settled on Sinai (24:16) transferred itself to the tabernacle (40:34) that would accompany Israel through the wilderness trek.

(b) Israel, the people of Yahweh. Exodus portrays Yahweh's chosen as those who profoundly understand that transformation is an essential dimension of religious pilgrimage. When the formerly benign Egyptian environment turned against them (1:8-16), they had no alternative but to cry for help. Though they accepted Moses as leader, they freely expressed their anger and fear when the situation worsened (5:21; 14:12; 17:3). In the threatening wilderness their posture was often rebellious. Even at Sinai, after they had learned firsthand Yahweh's saving deliverance and covenant purpose, they flaunted their infidelity by worshiping a golden calf that brought them and their leader to grief (chap. 32). Nevertheless, through those formative moments of exodus and covenant making, Israel recognized that it had been transformed from a "mixed multitude" of slaves (12:35) to a people chosen for Yahweh's own purpose, and that while God's grace was not cheap, God would not abandon Israel. Moreover, through regular moments of historical recollection that the festivals of Passover and unleavened bread would offer (12:1-28) through such tangible objects as the Ark of the Covenant (25:10-22) and the tent tabernacle (26:1-37) symbolizing Yahweh's real presence, and through the institution of priestly leadership (29:1-46), Israel found ample direction to aspire to become the people Yahweh intended them to be.

J. K. K.

EXODUS, THE ("a way out," from the Greek word exodos). The departure of the Israelites from the eastern Egyptian Delta, after they had been divinely emancipated from shameful servitude to Pharaoh.

Religious Significance. Tenaciously articulated by ancient biblical poetry (Exod. 15:1-18) and the prose of early Israelite cultic credos (Deut. 6:20-24; 26:5-9; Josh. 24:2-13), this formative moment became the cornerstone of Israel's faith. Perceiving that through the Exodus they had been marvelously borne "on eagles' wings" (Exod. 19:4), the Israelites recognized

Herbert G. May

Rose granite statue of Ramses II, pharaoh of the oppression and the Exodus. Found at Memphis, the statue weighs seventy tons and stands about thirty-two feet high.

that they had been uniquely summoned as Yahweh's people.

Historically, the Exodus was not experienced by all the ancestors of later Israel. Theologically, it did involve all of them as participants in a constitutive event that significantly defined Israelite existence. As cultic legend, the Exodus narrative (Exod. 1-15) was intimately linked with Israel's Passover festival. Consequently, subsequent Israelite generations could feel the pain of Egyptian oppression and exult in God's unlimited sovereignty that made deliverance possible.

Historical Context. Though biblical testimony to the Exodus is striking, it is nowhere attested in extant Egyptian literature. Pharaohs tended not to record defeat. Moreover, in Egyptian eyes, this was surely dismissed as a minor clash involving the border escape of a few foreign slaves. The role of MOSES is doubtlessly exaggerated in the book of Exodus, and no Egyptian pharaoh is ever named.

Dating evidence for the Exodus is tenuous. Mention in I Kings 6:1 that 480 years had passed between the Exodus and Solomon's fourth regnal year (about 958 B.C.) places the Israelite escape in the fifteenth century B.C., a date often discounted as too early. While archaeological data have not evoked uniform interpretation, arguments for a pre-thirteenth-century Exodus appear strained. Tentative correlation of the biblical account of the conquest with numerous city destructions marking Canaan's transition from the Late Bronze to the Iron Age (near 1200 B.C.) suggests that Ramses II (about 1290–1224 B.C.) was the pharaoh of the Exodus. His father, Seti I (about 1305–1290), is understood as the pharaoh whose emergence is reported in Exodus 1:8 and death in Exodus 2:23.

Mention of Israelite labor at the Egyptian store-cities, Pithom (Tell er-Retabeh) and Raamses (Avaris), in Exodus 1:11 coordinates with extrabiblical evidence that these strong Nineteenth Dynasty pharaohs sponsored rigorous building programs there. Formerly the Hyksos capital, Avaris, was reoccupied by the Egyptian court and redesignated the "House of Ramses." Many Semites were living in the vicinity. If the Israel that Pharaoh Merneptah (about 1224–1211 B.C.) claims to have conquered, in a stela commemorating his Palestinian campaign, was part of the "mixed multitude" (Exod. 12:38) that had fled under Moses, Ramses' identity as pharaoh of the Exodus would be compelling. But Merneptah might have battled another tribe by that name that had never left Canaan. Hence, the exit of a few thousand Semitic slaves well into the reign of Ramses II presents itself as reasonable conjecture, not dogma.

The Exodus Route. Since the biblical sites mentioned usually defy confident identification, the specific geography of Israel's Egyptian departure and wilderness wandering remains mostly unknown. That Israel's rescue from water lying ahead and advancing Egyptians behind did not transpire at the RED SEA is clear from the Hebrew text (Exod. 15:4), which reads yam-sûph ("sea of reeds"). The body of water at issue was presumably a southern extension of Lake Menzaleh in the eastern Nile Delta with its papyrus marshes (near modern El-Qantara on the Suez Canal). Having escaped by Yahweh's overpowering of the sea (14:21), the Israelites journeyed southeastward by way of Succoth to MOUNT SINAI (Jebel Mûsa) near the southern apex of the Sinai peninsula. Though other locations for this mountain (also called Horeb) have been proposed, this traditional locus accords with the notation (Deut. 1:2) that Sinai was an eleven-day journey from Kadesh-barnea, an impressive oasis some fifty miles south of Beer-sheba.

Leaving Mount Sinai (Num. 10:11-12), they advanced northward into the Wilderness of Paran and thence to the Kadesh oasis for a lengthy encampment. Failing to penetrate Canaan from the south (13:1–14:45), the Israelites departed from Kadesh (20:22) to experience a trying detour through Transjordan. Ultimately poised in the Moab plain, they were ready to infiltrate the Land of Promise from an easterly direction (36:13).

J.K.K.

EX OPERE OPERATO/EX OPERE OPERANTIS. These expressions are used to describe ways of understanding how SACRAMENTS are efficacious. The first expression may be translated "in virtue of the action performed." On this view, the efficacy of a sacrament is quite objective and does not depend on the attitude of either the person who administers it or the person who receives it. For instance, Augustine maintained that baptism is valid even if administered by a schismatic (Donatist) priest, while Roman Catholics have held that the Eucharist does not require (as Protestants had claimed) faith on the part of the recipient. The second expression means "in virtue of the performer of the action." In many churches, it is held that only a properly ordained minister can rightly perform a sacramental act.

J.M.

EXORCISM. The term comes from the Greek verb exorkizein, "to charge solemnly," "to command," and the object is an evil or demonic spirit which, it was believed, had taken possession of an individual.

The origins of this practice are traced to ancient Persian religion which, with a dualistic world view, made much of evil powers and offered ways to overcome them. There is only one instance of exorcism in the OT literature, namely I Samuel 16:14-23, where David is able to pacify the troubled Saul.

In early Judaism, however, perhaps under Persian influence, interest in the demonic world became morbidly excessive. There is some evidence of Jewish exorcists in Luke 11:19; Mark 9:38ff. (equivalent to Luke 9:49); as well as Acts 19:13. The later Greco-Roman world produced its exorcists, sometimes using oriental or Semitic loanwords. This suggests that exorcism entered Greco-Roman popular religion from the East, perhaps not until the second or third century A.D.

The Synoptic Gospels (but not the Fourth Gospel, which is strangely silent about DEMONS) record Jesus as performing such exorcisms. Jesus evidently attached an importance to this side of his ministry as a demonstration of the nearness of God's rule (Luke 11:20) and in fulfillment of OT prophetic expectation (Matt. 11:4-6; Mark 7:31-37). Jewish witness to Jesus' practice of "sorcery," a reference to his reputation as an exorcist, is reported in the Talmud.

The early church, according to the Acts, emphasized miracle-working powers, with exorcism as part of the same demonstration of divine power (Acts 5:16; 8:7; 19:12) at work over Jewish and pagan MAGIC. One other case of Paul expelling an evil spirit is on record (Acts 16:18), but the motive there seems more one of compassion in the face of human need.

R.M.

EXPIATION. Of the several meanings of the OT Hebrew verb kpr one is "expiate," which tends to make minute variations according to its context. It is normally associated with a ritual action for the removal of SIN.

Expiation as covering is one meaning of kpr. There was evidently an apotropaic or prophylactic power in the Hebrew use of ritual, that is, the priestly acts warded off evil and its consequences or protected the sinner from divine wrath.

Sometimes the agent of expiation is concentrated in an animal, such as the goat of Leviticus 16, with the intent of diverting divine reaction away from the community. The animal serves as a "ransom" (see Exod. 21:30), a term that brings us the NT data.

The NT evidence centers on two much disputed words: RANSOM (Mark 10:45; I Tim. 2:6) and "expiation" (KJV, "propitiation") in Romans 3:25; I John 2:2; 4:10. Various backgrounds to these texts have been proposed: the servant of Isaiah 53:10 whose soul is made a sin offering; the DAY OF ATONEMENT ritual (Lev. 16), which is clearly in mind in the letter to the Hebrews but remarkably absent from Paul aside from a possible allusion in Romans 3:24-26; the Maccabean martyrs who gave their lives as a "ransom" for Israel. The debate turns on the issue of the effect of Christ's death expressed in sacrificial terms: whether that sacrifice simply removed sin's stain by purging (Heb. 9:14) or cleansing (I John 1:7) or averted God's wrath (as implied in "propitiation") by bearing divine judgment as a proxy for sinners (II Cor. 5:18-21 is often cited, but Paul stops short of saying that Christ bore divine wrath against sin, as some Reformers insisted). The points of general agreement are (1) in Christ God dealt with human sin by removing its penal consequences; and (2) sin is "expiated" as Christ identified himself with our lot as sinners and died as our representative and as sin's victim. (See also FORGIVENESS.)

R.M.

EXTRASENSORY PERCEPTION (ESP). Sometimes called PARAPSYCHOLOGY, ESP began developing as an area of research from the time that a group of Cambridge scholars established the Society for Psychical Research in London in 1882. Subsequent groups were started elsewhere in Europe and in the United States. A milestone was reached when a research center was established at Duke University by J. B. Rhine and William McDougall in 1927.

Parapsychology includes a number of areas. Telepathy is a knowledge of the thoughts of another person. Clairvoyance is a supernormal awareness of objects or events not known to others. Precognition is the knowledge of future events, or of events not yet reported. Psychokinesis is the ability to will the movement of an object without touching it. Intimations of survival after death come through communication with people who have died.

These perceptions are seemingly experienced independently of the five senses, hence the term extrasensory. As validity is tested, the possibility arises that there may be forces not yet explored within the social and physical sciences. Critical and constructive work is being carried on today. Such research may point to human potential that has yet been little explored. This knowledge is being collected in two ways. One is through reports made by people of their experiences. Such narratives, subjective as they may be, are tested by carefully developed questions through which the elements of chance, coincidence, and personal memory are filtered. Another method of research is through controlled laboratory work. Tests are so arranged as to remove the element of coincidence when people seem to know hidden information. It has been found that subjects respond more accurately when they are relaxed and when the relationship with the researcher is good.

Recently dreams have been considered subjects for extrasensory perception, but not with the psychoanalytic goal of therapy. Research in this area is an inquiry into the possibility that people and events from the past or future may enter the dream life of some people. Faith healing is another parapsychological phenomenon, involving an interaction between seeker and healer by touch or voice, present to each other or absent.

Religious people have become interested in extrasensory perception because the Bible describes so many events in these categories: dreams, healings, moving from place to place, reports from those who have died, knowledge by one person of another's past, and premonitions of the future. There is an effort to recover these as religious phenomena for today.

I.C.

EXTREME UNCTION. See UNCTION OF THE SICK.

EZEKIEL. The name of one of the three Major Prophets and a book of the Hebrew OT. Both the prophet and the book are uniquely connected.

The Prophet. According to the canonical book, which is our only historical source for Ezekiel, he was one of those deported from Judah to Babylon in 597 B.C., part of the golah or Exile consequent on the conquest of Jerusalem by the Chaldean king Nebuchadnezzar II. Such a deportation would have involved only the more important citizens of the country, among whom Ezekiel, the son of Buzi, of a prominent priestly family, undoubtedly was to be numbered. The fifth year after the beginning of the EXILE, on July 31, 593, he received his call to prophecy (1:2-3), an office he fulfilled throughout more than the next twenty years. His last dated prophecy is of April 26, 571 (29:17).

Such precise dates, typical of the book of Ezekiel and calculated according to what would have been the reigning years of the exiled king Jehoiachin, point up one of the intimate connections between the prophet and the literary work that bears his name. At one time it was possible for scholars to postulate for not only Ezekiel but also EZRA and NEHEMIAH and other parts of the biblical chronicle of the Exile a literary fiction created to account for a sequence of events otherwise hardly attested in history. Subsequent archaeological and epigraphical discoveries, especially of the Babylonian records of Jehoiachin's exilic household, have supplied this attestation at least in part, so that today no serious scholar would question Ezekiel's real existence on this score alone. The golah, which is the scene of the book, existed as described.

Difficulties remain in accepting the picture of Ezekiel exactly as he is portrayed. While he is said to have been a resident in Babylonia, where he received his call to prophecy (1:3; 3:15, 24), more than once (11:13, for example) he seems to have had firsthand knowledge of events that were transpiring in Jerusalem, toward which many of his prophecies were addressed. This fact has led many to posit a dual prophetic activity of Ezekiel, in Judea and also in Babylonia, a view which is hardly consonant with the book as we have it. Whatever is to be said in this regard, it must be borne in mind that the book, our only source for Ezekiel's life, is a work of intense revision and amplification, to the extent that it is often hard to determine what is original and what has been later added from knowledge of the events.

While Ezekiel, according to the record, obviously stood in the line of the classical prophets beginning with Amos, there is also much that makes him an exception to all the rules. One of the most obvious differences between Ezekiel and his predecessors is the attention he pays to purely ritual, alongside moral, concerns, putting them on an equal plane, with a concentration on individual devotion and morality. Ezekiel's prophetic discourses frequently sound very much like priestly catecheses (compare chap. 18). Ezekiel loves involved allegories, which are often expressed in rather turgid prose.

Ezekiel's often strange conduct—his dumbness (3:22-27), some of his symbolic acts (chap. 4, for example), his frequent transportation to "the plain" by the "hand" or "Spirit" of the Lord (3:22-23; 37:1-2), which has suggested to some a reference to ecstatic seizure, etc.—connect him in a certain fashion to earlier preclassical prophecy. On the other hand, the apocalyptic character of many of his visions (1:1-3:15, for example), betrays his kinship to postexilic prophecy and the apocalypists. As already mentioned, he often sounds more like a priest than a prophet. The great vision of the Temple and the new Israel, beginning with chapter 40, not only manifests an uncharacteristically prophetic interest in the cult, it also gives it an uncritical emphasis that would be considered inordinate even in postexilic Judaism.

All in all, however, Ezekiel differs from his predecessors more in degree than in kind. This is true also of him in his character as "watchman" (3:16-21; 33), his commission to warn the people of coming disaster and to assume responsibility for them. This is only to develop the character of the prophet as mediator, a character that is as old as Amos.

The Book. The book of Ezekiel falls into four identifiable parts: (1) Chapters 1–7—Ezekiel's call and annexed events: 1:1–3:15 the call; 3:16–21 the watchman; 3:22–27 Ezekiel's dumbness and restraint; 4–5 symbolic acts against Jerusalem; 6–7 oracles against Israel. (b) Chapters 8–14—the Temple vision and its consequences: 8–11 the Temple vision; 12:1–20 symbolic acts of the Exile; 12:21–28 reflections on the above; 13:1–14:11 false prophets and others; 14:12–23 the irrevocability of judgment. (c) Chapters 15–24—mostly allegories: 15–19 the great allegory with commentaries; 20 prophecies of judgment; 21 the sword of the Lord; 22 the bloody city; 23 Oholah and Oholibah; 24 finale on Jerusalem. (d) Chapters 25–48—the salvation of Israel: 25–32 oracles against the nations; 33 the prophet as watchman; 34–37 salvation and vindication; 38–39 Gog and Magog; 40–48 the new Israel.

Built into the book is also a series of some fourteen precise dates, not in any perfect chronological order. The whole of this ordered material indicates that in the book of Ezekiel we have a work of redaction (revision, translation), which is the end result not of the prophet's efforts alone but principally of many disciples, who not only gathered together its various elements but are also responsible for the many amplifications and developments that make the book what it now is.

All of the prophetic books of the Bible are works of redaction. Ezekiel, however, is especially such. No other prophetic work has been submitted to such a logical and didactic structure. No other book of the prophets contains so many essays, extended sermons, discourses, treatises, along with involved allegorical developments, extended biographical details, etc., and wordy repetitions that hardly harmonize with the spontaneity generally associated with prophetic oracles. The conclusion must be drawn that in this work, as no other of the prophetic collections, we have a work of "scripture" (of canonical authors other than the prophet himself), which by the very nature of the case precludes what is authentically Ezekiel's from being distinguished as an entity separable from Ezekiel 1–48. As was said at the outset, the two—the prophet and the book—are uniquely connected.

The same may be said with regard to the language as well as the content of the book. Poetry was the rule, rather than the exception, in earlier prophetic works, since prophecy had its inception in gnomic, even cryptic, pronouncements characterized by brevity and devices of alliteration, assonance or the like, to make the message suitably impressive to the recipient. Ezekiel is largely prose. It is literature, but it cannot be called exciting literature. Efforts to discern a "primitive poetic core" behind Ezekiel's convoluted prose have generally proved futile. Ezekiel is, in its final form, what an earlier criticism thought was true of classical prophecy in general, a prime example of "literary prophecy." B. V.

EZION-GEBER. A port city on the north shore of the Gulf of Aqaba (the eastern arm of the Red Sea) frequently mentioned in the OT. It was closely associated and sometimes identified with nearby Elath or Eloth (probably the biblical El-paran, the modern Aqabah), but the two seem to have been distinct (compare I Kings 9:26). Ezion-geber, the site now known as Tell el-Khalifa, has been thoroughly excavated archaeologically.

Ezion-geber is mentioned as one of the camping sites of the Israelites on their way to the conquest of the Promised Land (Num. 33:35; Deut. 2:8). However, it is generally thought that such an early reference is an anachronism, reflecting the geography of a later chronicler seeking to reconstruct the route of the book of Exodus as well as the event.

Ezion-geber was established by Solomon as the base for a commercial fleet manned by Phoenicians with which he carried on extensive trade with Arabia (I Kings 9:26–10:22). Archaeology has confirmed the importance of the base in Solomon's time. There was a very strong fort with large storerooms to serve commercial caravans and the maritime trade. By an earlier interpretation of the evidence, the excavations were thought to have uncovered the remains of smelters that had processed the copper ore of the mines of the Arabah. The interpretation has now been abandoned, though there can be no doubt that the mines played an important part in the trade that brought Solomon such vast wealth.

Solomonic Ezion-geber was destroyed by fire, probably in the time of Rehoboam as part of the invasion of Pharaoh Shishak. However, Judah resumed its domination of Edom, and under King Jehoshaphat (873–849 B.C.) an attempt was made to revive Solomon's fleet (I Kings 22:47–48). The fleet was wrecked and the site was again destroyed by fire. There was still a further rebuilding under Uzziah of Judah (783–742 B.C.). A seal has been found there with an inscription pertaining to Jotham, possibly Uzziah's son Jotham who ruled as regent during his father's illness (II Kings 15:5). Like the preceding level of the site, this one succumbed to a conflagration. We do not know the extent to which Judah was able to exploit the potential offered by the seaport during this period of its control.

In the time of Ahaz of Judah, Edom regained its independence (II Kings 16:6) and correspondingly Ezion-geber became Edomite once more. A seal bearing a name compounded with the element Qosh, the name of the chief Edomite deity, was found in the fourth and final habitation level. This phase of occupation extended down to Hellenistic times. During the period of Persian domination, especially at Ezion-geber, there seems to have been a bustling center of trade between the East and the West.

B. V.

EZRA AND NEHEMIAH. The protagonists who more than any others epitomize the "restoration" of Judea after the BABYLONIAN CAPTIVITY of 597-535 B.C. These names are also attached to two biblical works that chronicle the events of this postexilic period.

Ezra. He was a priest (Ezra 7:11) but more importantly a "scribe" (7:6), that is, a teacher of the Law. Later, he would have been termed a rabbi. This teaching function makes Ezra typical of the new leadership that distinguishes postexilic Judaism from preexilic Israel: the postexilic experience being a doctrinaire monotheism, which had found its unity in a codified tradition, orthopraxis, and emphasis on identifying externals inculcated through the development of Jewish life that would be typified by the synagogue. The proclamation and interpretation of the Law, as described in Nehemiah 8-9, is a foreshadowing of the kind of synagogue service that would thereafter characterize Judaism.

Ezra was born in Babylonia, descendant of a priestly family that had been deported along with King Jehoiachin in 597 B.C., by the Chaldean Nebuchadnezzar II (II Kings 24:8-17). In all probability he was nurtured on prophetic assurances like those of Jeremiah 24, which assured these exiles that in them and them alone was the hope of a future renewed and Israel purified. Doubtless romantically attracted to a "homeland" he had never seen, Ezra headed one of the several migrations of Babylonian Zionists designed to reestablish a Judean state or sphere of influence in Palestine, in a territory now shrunk to a tiny vestige of what had once been and which now possessed only a shaky autonomy as a subprovince in the Persian Empire.

Ezra was far from being the earliest of the leaders of the Jewish return, which had been authorized by the Persian Cyrus II in 538 B.C., following his conquest of Babylonia (compare II Chr. 36:22-23; Ezra 1:1-4). In fact, we do not know precisely where to place Ezra in this chronology or how to relate him to Nehemiah, the other important figure in the common chronicle that concerns the two. One thing seems certain, that he was in a peculiar way an emissary of the Persian king, sent specifically in a religious capacity to serve in Judea as a kind of "minister for Jewish affairs" (Ezra 7). According to this account, the mission took place in the seventh year of the reign of King Artaxerxes. If Artaxerxes I is meant, we are in the year 458 B.C., therefore before the time of Nehemiah, who came to Palestine in the twentieth year of Artaxerxes I, or 445 B.C. There are considerable difficulties involved, however, in ascribing to Ezra a mission earlier by a dozen years than Nehemiah's, not the least of which is that Ezra's work as described would hardly have been conceivable without the reorganization and stability that Nehemiah was able to bring about in the community. But on the other hand, to think of Artaxerxes II in connection with Ezra (whose seventh year would have been 398 B.C.) is to suppose too great a span of time between two Jewish leaders whom our sources obviously understood to have worked in close proximity. Though not accepted by all, the most plausible hypothesis is that in the manuscript tradition of Ezra 7:7-8, the numerical notation has been imperfectly preserved, that the text may have originally envisaged the thirty-seventh year of Artaxerxes I. This hypothesis would put Ezra in Jerusalem in 428 B.C. In this hypothesis it would be easy to understand, for example, how the priest Meremoth, a distinguished official at the time of Ezra's arrival (Ezra 8:33), could have worked as a young man fifteen or more years earlier on the rebuilding of Jerusalem's walls (Neh. 3:4-21).

Ezra has been frequently regarded as the effective promulgator of the PENTATEUCH, the Law of Moses, substantially as we know it today. However this may be, there is no doubt that he represented to a marked degree much that is typical of the Law as understood by postexilic Judaism: an emphasis on bloodlines as the touchstone of Jewish authenticity (note the genealogies of Chronicles for which these become an all-important factor), an intransigence in the face of the "foreign" Yahwism of "the people of the land" who had not become part of the Babylonian captivity (an attitude, however, manifested by the very first Zionist returnees and consistently thereafter), a total rejection of mixed marriages and assimilation with or of other related peoples (Ezra 9)—an attitude shared by Nehemiah and in conflict with other exilic and postexilic biblical witness, prophetic and other. Ezra may well have brought with him from Babylon the Law in virtually its finished form; but his (and Nehemiah's) interpretation of it as normative was doubtless of much later acceptance.

Nehemiah. As already noted, the chronological relation of Nehemiah to Ezra is to some extent uncertain. Much more certain is the differentiation in the function of the two men in the reconstitution of the Jewish state in Palestine and in their separate contributions to the eventual religion of Judaism.

Nehemiah, the son of Hacaliah, was also an ethnic Jew born in Babylon of a family which, like many others, had become assimilated to the local society, so that he had been in a position to rise high in the civil service of his adopted (and, for that matter, native) country. (Contrary to the Assyrian practice, the Chaldeans, and after them the Persians, encouraged their transplanted subject peoples to join with them in the common governmental enterprise.) Having heard of the less than ideal state of affairs in his Palestinian "homeland," however, Nehemiah, who had maintained close relations with relatives in Judea, took advantage of his favored position at the Persian court to get himself appointed governor of Judea as the emissary of the Persian king (Neh. 1:1-2:8). The Aramaic papyrus texts from Elephantine, a Jewish military colony established in Egypt during Persian times, contain numerous historical references that coincide with some of those of the book of Nehemiah and enable us to be sure that the twentieth year of King Artaxerxes (Neh. 2:1) refers to the reign of Artaxerxes I, therefore to the year 445 B.C. Thus we have, as we do not have for Ezra, a firmly fixed date for at least part of the period of Nehemiah.

Nehemiah's work and function, as already indicated, were more political than religious, though of course the distinction between the two areas was far less clearly defined than it would be today. Furthermore, there is no indication that he would have tempered in any way the hard-line policies insisted upon by Ezra. Nehemiah's chief glory was his rebuilding of the walls of Jerusalem, reconstituting the Holy City as an autonomous city-state in the classic pattern of Canaan (Neh. 2:11-3:32; 6:15-7:3). He was instrumental in re-peopling Jerusalem and other crucial cities of the province (Neh. 11), possibly to lay the foundations, in virtue of an official position which he used pragmatically, of a Jewish state that would outlive the Persian Empire, and the Hellenistic Empire that would succeed it. His memoirs are eloquent testimony to the tightrope that he had to walk in conflict with rival Persian appointees in surrounding provinces, where the limits of authority were poorly defined and bluff and bravado frequently had to take the place of a royal decree. He was in constant danger of his life by legal and illegal means, and his eventual success (to the extent that we know it) is an example of the triumph of will and statesmanship.

He was opposed as well by the religious leadership of the Jewish establishment. Though we know some of these details, we do not know to what extent his interests coincided with those of Ezra. The Chronicler has them working in tandem, but this may be a simplification of the case. Apparently in 432 B.C., Nehemiah was forced to return to Persia for renewed authority (Neh. 13:6). About the date of his resumption of jurisdiction in Palestine and its circumstances, and about much of which occurred thereafter, we have no knowledge. It is interesting, to say the least, that when the later Ben Sira decided to "praise famous men," the glories of his people, out of this epoch he celebrated Nehemiah (Ecclus. 49:13) but never mentioned Ezra.

The Book of Ezra-Nehemiah. (a) The sources. It is generally thought that Ezra-Nehemiah (originally one continuous work) is a work of REDACTION by the Chronicler, a continuation of the compilation of I, II Chronicles (in turn originally a continuous work), simply the completion of a theological reinterpretation of Israelite historiography. The sources for Ezra-Nehemiah seem to have been:

(1) Ezra 1:1-4:5, substantially a history of the early Jewish restoration compiled from contemporary records. The Chronicler took this over and inserted into it 2:1-70, which he extracted from the Memoirs of Nehemiah (see below and compare Neh. 7:4-72a).

(2) Ezra 4:6-6:18, another such little history (written in Aramaic), probably from Temple archives, detailing the problems that had been incident to the rebuilding of the postexilic Temple.

(3) The Memoirs of Ezra (Ezra 7:27-9:15 and Neh. 7:72B-9:37), a report sent back to Babylon by Ezra.

(4) The Memoirs of Nehemiah (Neh. 1:1-7:72a; 12:27-43; 13:4-31): these look like Nehemiah's diaries.

(5) A few incidental sources and some redactional touches.

(b) Composition. The Chronicler did not try to organize these sources into a chronological history of the period; he rather systematized them into a theology. It took this form, divided into two parts, which have nothing to do with the later Jewish division of the material into the two books of Ezra and Nehemiah.

(1) The first part: the return from exile and the reorganization of the Temple worship. This includes Ezra 1:1-4:5, the Hebrew source that told of the return under Cyrus and the restoration of sacrifice. Then the Aramaic source Ezra 4:6-6:18, leading up through various vicissitudes to the final rebuilding of the Temple under Darius I in 515 B.C. The link between these two sections is ideological: Ezra 4:1-5 on the one hand and 4:6-23 on the other are both concerned with Samaritan (or what would later be construed as Samaritan) interference with the restoring work of the people of God, from the very beginning down to the time of Artaxerxes I, the age of Ezra and Nehemiah. Ezra 6:19-22 concludes this first part with a note on the celebration of the feast of Passover (in the year 515, as it happens), simply because what has been described immediately before is the dedication of the new Temple, which made the celebration possible.

(2) The second part describes, thematically, the reorganization of the postexilic Jewish community under Ezra and Nehemiah, again without undue concern for any relative chronology. The themes are, briefly: (1) Ezra's mission and the issue of mixed marriages (Ezra 7-10). (2) Nehemiah's mission and the rebuilding of Jerusalem's walls (Neh. 1-7). (3) The promulgation of the Law (Neh. 8-9). (4) The people's assent to the Law (Neh. 10). (5) The reorganization of the state (Neh. 11:1-12:43). And finally, (6) what might be called a summation of the ethos of the postexilic community (Neh. 12:44-13:31).

It is obvious that these divisions, which could easily be rarefied, respect source material only incidentally and chronological history not at all.

B. V.

Ff

FABER, FREDERICK W. (1814–63). The author of "Faith of Our Fathers" and "There's a Wideness in God's Mercy" also founded the Wilfridians religious order. Educated at Balliol College, Oxford, (B.A. 1836), he served as a Fellow at University College. Taking holy orders in 1837, he was appointed rector at Elton, Huntingdonshire. But in 1846 he became a disciple of John Henry Newman and became a Roman Catholic. He founded the Wilfridians at Birmingham soon after, and in 1849 he moved to London to preside over the branch there, sometimes called Oratorians.

Emulating the Olney Hymns and those of the Wesleys, Faber wrote about 150 songs published in Oratory Hymns (1854) and Hymns (1862). They include "Hark! Hark, My Soul," "My God, How Wonderful Thou Art," "O Saviour, Bless Us Ere We Go" and "Jesus, Gentlest Saviour." "Faith of Our Fathers," a Protestant favorite, was written as a tribute to Roman Catholic martyrs during the English Reformation.

N.H.

FAITH. A basic concept of theology and religion, used to designate the attitude of the believer toward God. The word "attitude" is used here to mean an orientation of the whole person. Faith is not merely belief or intellectual assent; it includes also the will and the feelings.

Faith in the Old Testament. The Hebrew word emuna, usually translated "faith," is expressive of the idea of firmness or constancy and would be better translated "faithfulness." The famous text, "The just shall live by his faith" (Hab. 2:4 KJV), is used by Paul and many later Christian theologians in defense of the doctrine of justification by faith, but it is virtually certain that the verse does not mean this in its original context. In some modern English translations it appears as "The upright shall live by faithfulness," or something equivalent. But although there is no word in the OT exactly corresponding to what Christians were to call "faith," one might argue that the phenomenon of faith can be seen in the OT. Abraham has often been called the first man of faith. Although the word for faith is not used, the story of how Abraham, at the command of God, left his settled home and went out into the wilderness has been understood as an archetypal act of faith (compare Heb. 11:8). Again, at the command of God, he is willing to offer up his son Isaac, and although no word for "faith" is used in the OT account of the incident, the obedience and trust that Abraham showed came to be understood as a notable response of faith (compare Heb. 11:17). The whole story of the covenant relationship between God on the one side and his people Israel on the other can readily be interpreted as one in which the faithfulness of God awakens (or sometimes fails to awaken) a faithful response from the people.

Faith in the New Testament. In the Synoptic Gospels, faith is often mentioned in connection with those who are the beneficiaries of Jesus' healing miracles. Such faith is not, of course, an achievement on their part, but is their openness to receive the power of God into their lives. In Paul's epistles, faith is contrasted with works. Human beings are not saved through their good works, for no one is entirely obedient to the law of God, and no one can satisfy God's demands. But those who have faith in God are accepted and saved by God, their faith being counted in God's sight as righteousness. The Johannine teaching is similar, though instead of the noun pistis, "faith," John uses some form of the verb pistein, "to believe." The Epistle to the Hebrews gives a somewhat different view of faith. Here the contrast is not so much between faith and works as between faith and sighr. "Now faith is the assurance of things hoped for, the conviction of things not seen" (Heb. 11:1). In the catalog of the heroes of faith given in the chapter from which this verse is taken, the general picture is that of men and women committing themselves to God in situations of suffering and uncertainty and finding that their faith in the unseen enables them to triumph over their adversities. The unseen reality, which is the object of faith, can be understood both as the ever-present reality of God and as the future realization of God's promises. In the latter case, faith is scarcely to be distinguished from HOPE.

Faith as Understood in Theology. As indicated above, faith is an attitude of the whole person and, on analysis, it is found to be a complex attitude, involving several factors. Perhaps the word "commitment" comes closest to expressing the full reality of faith. When one is committed to a person or a group of persons or a cause, one has attached oneself with passion, loyalty, and conviction; one holds certain beliefs about the object of one's faith; and one is prepared to let one's actions be guided by the person or cause in which one has faith. These three points call for further discussion.

(1) Faith is trust in or loyalty to the object of faith, and this trust is passionate, involving the whole person. Here we are thinking of the subjective element in faith, the faith that constitutes the state of mind of the person who has it, the fides qua creditur (faith by which one believes), in the traditional phrase. Some theologians, especially those of an existentialist outlook, have stressed this subjective side of faith and have claimed that the finite human being, because of finitude, needs to have faith in a larger reality. Bultmann, for instance, defines faith as a "new self-understanding." But while one can see that the attitude of faith brings with it a unifying and energizing focus for the self, critics of this view of faith argue that it is impossible to ignore the content of faith, the fides qua creditur, for otherwise faith may degenerate into mere fanaticism.

(2) That brings us then to faith as belief. Although faith cannot be simply equated with belief or exhausted by belief, it is bound to imply some beliefs. For instance, to have faith in God is certainly to imply that God exists. There have been periods in the history of the church when great stress has been laid on the content of faith and when the presence of faith in a person has been virtually identified with orthodoxy or right belief. One thinks, for instance, of the patristic, medieval, and Reformation periods as times when there were violent controversies over points of doctrine and sometimes harsh treatment for those whose faith did not conform to the accepted norms. Today, the broader concept of faith as an existential attitude of trust and commitment has tended to overshadow the importance once attached to orthodoxy. Yet it should not be forgotten that belief is an essential element in faith, and that wrong beliefs have their repercussions on the practical manifestations of faith. Nevertheless, as was already pointed out in NT times by the writer of the Epistle of James, a faith that is merely intellectual assent falls far short of Christian faith in its fullness.

(3) Faith is also obedience, the placing of the will at the service of the person or cause in whom one has reposed faith. To separate faith and works is a false disjunction. Faith indeed originates from God, no WORKS of our own can ultimately satisfy God, and faith itself is not another work. Yet if someone holds a faith with both passion and understanding, that person cannot help acting in accordance with it. In the words of one Reformation document, good works "do spring out necessarily of a true and lively faith; insomuch that by them a lively faith may be as evidently known as a tree discerned by the fruit." While, as has just been said, faith is not a work but a gift originating from God, this cannot mean that the recipient of faith is entirely passive. There is no compulsion in faith, but rather the reverse, because faith always lies beyond that which can be proved or manipulated. It requires a LEAP OF FAITH (Kierkegaard) or a decision (Bultmann). This does not turn faith into a human work, but it does mean that the gift of faith must be responsibly appropriated by those to whom it is offered.

J.M.

FAITH AND KNOWLEDGE. The relations of faith and knowledge constitute a long-standing problem for theology. The problem can be considered in both a narrower and a broader sense. In the narrower sense, the question is whether God is accessible to us only in FAITH, as the response to God's revelation in Jesus Christ and the whole history of salvation, or whether there is also a knowledge of God that is based on REASON and common human experience—the knowledge that is claimed by "NATURAL THEOLOGY." In the patristic and medieval periods, faith and knowledge went for the most part hand in hand. Theologians appealed to Scripture and to Christian tradition, but they also employed philosophical arguments for the reality of God and believed that these gave support to the truths of Christian faith. At the Reformation, the alliance between faith and knowledge was badly shaken, mainly on the grounds that human sinfulness had impaired the use of reason so that the human mind could not rise to the knowledge of God. At the Enlightenment, the gulf between faith and knowledge was widened. Kant held that our knowledge is confined to the phenomena of space and time, and he severely criticized the old natural theology. But he claimed that he was not promoting atheism, but abolishing an illusory knowledge in order to make room for faith.

The disjunction between faith and knowledge came to possibly its most extreme expression in KIERKEGAARD. Faith, in his teaching, is not an imperfect form of knowledge but belongs to a different sphere altogether, and the LEAP OF FAITH does not depend on probabilities derived from reason or empirical evidences. In recent times, the primacy and independence of faith has been maintained by Karl Barth. Nevertheless, natural theology in one form or another has continued, and every criticism of it has been met by new formulations designed to counter the criticisms. It continues to appeal to those who believe that human rationality cannot be satisfied by an unsupported faith, and that the mind must seek reasons that would at least lend probability to the claims of faith.

In a broader sense, there is a constant interaction between human knowledge and the content of Christian faith. As knowledge has increased, it has been found that at many points new knowledge has impinged upon various items of faith. Only obscurantists would try to keep secular knowledge and religious faith in separate compartments. Reasonable people feel the need to bring them into harmony. As examples, one may mention the rise of biblical criticism over the past two hundred years, or the theory of evolution in the nineteenth century. The former has given us a vast body of fairly well-assured knowledge about the dating, authorship, intellectual background, and so on of the Bible, and this has inevitably had its impact on doctrines of inspiration and revelation. The latter seemed to challenge the traditional understanding of creation. In both cases, however, Christian theology has found ways of adjusting to the new knowledge, and in the course of time it has become clear that this has resulted in gain rather than loss. In the two cases cited, there has come about a deeper and more intelligent grasp of biblical teaching, and a more impressive, even awe-inspiring, vision of the creative activity of God. The continuing expansion of secular knowledge is one of the major factors in what is called the "development of doctrine," that is to say, the continuous unfolding of the resources of Christian truth in new historical and cultural situations.

J.M.

FAITH AND ORDER MOVEMENT. This phrase commonly used for over three hundred years to characterize the doctrine, organization, polity, and character of the church was adopted as the name of a worldwide movement that began in 1910 at the WORLD MISSIONARY CONFERENCE at Edinburgh. The first world conference of the movement was held at Lausanne in 1927. Early leaders of the movement were Charles H. Brent of the Episcopal church in the U.S.A., bishops V. S. Azariah and E. J. Palmer of India, and three English churchmen: Archbishop WILLIAM TEMPLE, Professor A. E. Garvie, and Canon Leonard Hodgson. A second world conference was held in Edinburgh in 1937.

Faith and Order became an official part of the WORLD COUNCIL OF CHURCHES structure in 1948 as its chief instrument for exploring and promoting church unity. Ecumenical study projects on the nature of worship, the church, and intercommunion preceded the third world conference in Sweden in 1952. Staff secretaries were appointed by the WCC to head Faith and Order beginning in 1953. A fourth world conference was held in Montreal in 1963, and Roman Catholic members were appointed to the Commission on Faith and Order in 1968.

Through its history, Faith and Order has become recognized for its expanded range of studies on the church's unity, nature, and task and its influence on the negotiations for union between churches in many countries.

W.G.

FAITH HEALING. Throughout the history of the church the practice of HEALING physical and emotional illness through nonmedical means has been well attested. The OT records the healing miracles of ELIJAH and ELISHA. Miraculous healings of physical and mental disease and the casting out of demons characterized much of the earthly ministry of our Lord. He empowered his disciples to heal "all manner of sickness and all manner of disease" and to cast out demons. The apostles, too, demonstrated similar powers after the Ascension and Pentecost.

Paul describes the special gift (charisma) of healing (I Cor. 12:9, 28, 30), which enables certain Christians empowered by the Holy Spirit to exercise this ministry in and for the benefit of the Body of Christ. Another means of healing is presented by James (5:14, 15), who describes the process by which the sick person calls for the elders of the church to "pray over him, anointing him with oil in the name of the Lord." In this instance it is declared that "the prayer of faith will save the sick man, and the Lord will raise him up." In the same context Christians are enjoined to confess their sins to one another and "pray for one another, that you may be healed" (James 5:16).

Some have viewed the use of oil by the elders and the good Samaritan's pouring of oil and wine into the wounds of the injured man as justification for the employment of medical treatment along with prayer. The Roman Catholic sacrament of EXTREME UNCTION is said to have developed from the earlier practice of anointing an individual for recovery but not for death.

Just as different expressions such as "spiritual healing," "divine healing," and "Christian healing" are employed as synonyms of "faith healing," there have been different emphases on the means of healing. Thus, sacramental uses of oil, the laying on of hands, and the celebration of the Eucharist were often involved in the healing ministry of the church in earlier centuries. During the Middle Ages the veneration of relics reportedly achieved dramatic results. The Reformation brought accounts of healing by prayer and the laying on of hands. This was common among Quakers, Baptists, and others.

The PENTECOSTAL movement and such associations as the CHRISTIAN AND MISSIONARY ALLIANCE, especially in the United States, have emphasized the importance of divine healing. This has been a central feature of the ministry of many evangelists of the electronic church, such as ORAL ROBERTS, Jim Bakker, Pat Robertson, Rex Humbard, Jimmy Swaggart, and the late KATHRYN KUHLMAN. Usually these television personalities declare that God has bestowed the gift of healing on them.

In recent years healing services have been held with greater frequency in the older churches, often communions that have not been historically associated with healing or miraculous phenomena. Episcopalians, Lutherans, and other major denominations have sponsored healing services conducted by those in the Order of St. Luke the Physician. Some of this activity has also been associated with the emergence of the CHARISMATIC MOVEMENT in both Protestant and Roman Catholic churches.

In addition to miracles of healings in orthodox churches, healings have been claimed by members of CHRISTIAN SCIENCE and by Spiritualists, MORMONS, and other nontraditional groups.

R. H.

FALL. See ORIGINAL SIN.

FALSE (Apostles, Christs, Prophets, Witnesses). The concept of duplicity or hypocrisy in speaking God's word or the truth is the subject of continual warning throughout both the OT and the NT. "You shall not bear false witness . . ." one of the Ten Commandments, is interpreted to forbid lying and deceit in all human relations and especially in oaths taken in a court of law. Perjury and the slanderous destruction of another's reputation is expressly forbidden.

In a larger sense, the prohibition covers deceit in religious matters. The genuine prophets of the OT were often confronted with other "prophets" who gave different "messages" from God. Amos denied being a prophet in the professional sense to dissociate himself from those who believed God would not punish Israel. Jeremiah declared that false prophets spoke words of comfort the people wanted to hear, while the genuine prophet spoke hard words from God.

In the NT, Paul makes reference to false apostles, referring to those who mingled the gospel with either Jewish legalism or Hellenistic speculation (II Cor. 11:13). False Christs are warned against by Jesus and are identified with the Antichrist and the end of the age in Revelation. Many false witnesses were willing to come forward and testify against Jesus that he might be put to death, according to Matthew 26:60.

J. C.

FAMILIAR SPIRIT. See DIVINATION.

FAMILY. The fundamental social unit in Bible times, a clan or household, claiming descent from one ancestor. The family (or clan) is absolutely basic to Hebrew social life and revealed religion. Adam and Eve constituted a family; and the second progenitor of the human race, after the great Flood, Noah, headed a family. The Hebrews began as a separate people with Abraham's family. The genealogies that fill the OT books (and which the Gospels give for Jesus) show the intense sense of family, clan, and tribe among the Hebrews. Marriage, children, and the sanctity of the home were sacred to OT peoples, and much of the Mosaic law consists in regulations to protect the family against actions that might threaten it: children were to honor their parents (Exod. 20:12); the safeguarding of inheritances (Deut. 18:8; 21:15-17); spiritual discipline; child welfare; and even protection of the unborn (Exod. 21:22).

The OT family was patriarchal, dominated by the FATHER, in the fullest sense. The father, in the earliest, "patriarchal" days, was priest as well as chief of the clan, leader in war (Abraham led his clan in battle), judge and jury, and the owner of all goods. The "patriarchal" families were actually nomadic clans or tribes, so the close relations of the contemporary nuclear family were not usual. The father was more like a political leader or an employer than a parent in many cases, although some fathers loved a son (as Jacob loved Joseph, and later Benjamin) in ways similar to contemporary expectations. Some scholars think Jesus and Paul were critical of the overly domineering father ("Provoke not your children to anger") in Luke 2:48-50 and Colossians 3:21. Nonetheless, the wife and MOTHER were deeply respected (especially the paramount or favorite wife in "patriarchal" days). The love of the father for his wife is well displayed in the case of Sarah, Rebekah, and Rachel. The wives of some kings became powers in their own right (I Kings 15:10 ff.; II Kings 11:1); Deborah became a judge (Judg. 4:5) and others prophetesses (II Kings 22). In the NT, the family received the greatest support and respect by Jesus, Paul, and the author of the Pastoral Epistles.

J.C.

FAQIR. From the Arabic word meaning literally "poor." Properly used of Islamic ascetics and mystics, the term is popularly used of Hindu "holy men" in India as well. The Islamic faqirs are usually followers of a Sufi path and associated, whether tightly or loosely, with a Sufi order and sheikh or spiritual master.

R.E.

FASTING. Pious, ceremonial, or penitential abstinence from food and drink, complete or partial to a greater or lesser degree. Fasting is a practice observed by believers in both OT and NT, as well as throughout the history of the Christian church up to today. Fasting generally is for a set span of time, often just before an important holy day or season like Lent, Good Friday, or Holy Communion.

In the OT, fasting is commanded or recommended in Judges 20:26; I Samuel 14:24; 31:13; II Samuel 1:12; 12:16-23; I Kings 21:27; and II Chronicles 20:3. The Day of Atonement was the occasion for a fast by the whole people, and many other special or penitential fasts were observed by the Jews.

Fasting is prominent in the NT. Both John the Baptist and Jesus fasted. Notably, Jesus fasted and was tempted by Satan for a long time following his baptism by John. Jesus encouraged fasting that was deeply expressive of true inner devotion rather than to give the appearance of piety in Matthew 6:16ff. and spoke of it approvingly in Matthew 9:14ff. The book of Acts mentions that the early Christians fasted in 13:2ff. and 14:23. With the rise of MONASTICISM, fasting was made even more popular in the early Catholic church.

Fasting is of ancient origin, based on the belief that purifying the body of internal digestive and excretory functions would also purify the soul. It is similar in this "sympathetic magic" basis to celibacy. Both practices are based on a general belief in a dualism, of the body (matter) and the spirit, often conceived in ancient times as a very refined form of matter.

Fasting also expresses the sense of sin, or alienation from God, as in the Hebrew fast on YOM KIPPUR. In the Catholic church, the forty days of LENT are days of penance during which fasting is appropriate as one contemplates the death of Christ, who paid the penalty for human sin. Although the restrictions on eating meat on Fridays have been reduced for Catholics by Vatican II, restraint from eating certain foods still is recognized as good spiritual DISCIPLINE.

While the contemporary Catholic church has relaxed much of its teachings on fasting, the practice has grown somewhat among Protestants in recent years. Luther retained a sense of the value of fasting. Fasting during Lent and before Holy Communion was recommended by Luther and has been practiced in Lutheran churches continuously since the sixteenth century. A similar approach to fasting has been observed in the Anglican communion. Nonetheless, fasting was not widely practiced in Reformed churches or among the Anabaptists. In the twentieth century, however, fasting as a sign of identification with the poor and hungry has become a common (though occasional) practice in Quaker and other liberal, and mainline, Protestant churches.

The other contemporary growth of fasting among Protestants has been among the neo-charismatics, many of whom have been influenced by Catholic charismatics (often priests and nuns), on the one side, and by old-line Pentecostals and "holiness" (perfectionistic) sectarian Protestants, on the other. Neo-charismatics, emphasizing the many "gifts of the spirit," often engage in faith healing and glossalalia. They also hold extended prayer services, some of which encourage fasting. The "New Religions," which have achieved prominence in the past several decades, such as the Unification church and the International Society for Krishna Consciousness (the Hare Krishnas), also stress fasting. During the civil rights movement and the widespread protests against the Vietnam War many days of fasting were observed both by religious and secular participants.

J.C.

FATE. The word is derived from the Latin word fatum, meaning "that which has been spoken." To believe in fate is to believe that important events in one's life, perhaps even all events, have been determined in advance, and they will happen no matter what one does. In classical mythology the Fates were three goddesses, daughters of Zeus, who spun human destinies. These figures symbolized an ultimate impersonal force, which controlled the destinies of the gods as well as of human beings. The Greek language was richly supplied with words for this supposed power of fate—moira, tyche, anangke, heimarmene.

Presumably the origins of the idea of fate lay in the experience most people have at one time or another of being swept along by powerful forces beyond one's control. So many things in human life are not chosen. They simply happen to the people concerned, and when they do happen, there is a sense of inevitability about them, so that these events seem to have been foreordained. The idea plays a major role in Greek tragedy, in which the heroes, however they may struggle against it, are irresistibly drawn by their fate to destruction. Although the idea of fate as an all-controlling impersonal power belongs to paganism, something very close to it may emerge in some forms of monotheistic religion, including Christianity. Where there is great stress on the absolute SOVEREIGNTY OF GOD, perhaps coupled with a belief in PREDESTINATION and explicit providential control of everything that happens, there may be a virtual fatalism. Extreme Calvinism came close to this, and there are parallels in Islam that likewise stress the sovereignty of God and have a doctrine of predestination. This kind of fatalism is often associated with the moment of death. It is supposed that for each individual there has been appointed a time to die. We still hear it said, "His time had come!" In a few cases, those who hold such views refuse medical assistance, believing that recovery or death has already been irrevocably fixed by the decree of fate. In time of war, a shallow fatalism tends to be widespread. Some people inexplicably survive, others just as inexplicably perish, so it is supposed that this is due to the working of some hidden agency. No doubt there are some things in life against which it is useless to strive and which one can only accept with resignation. But where fatalistic acceptance becomes a basic attitude, there is a weakening of human initiative and human responsibility and thus a diminution of the distinctively human quality of life. (Compare also ELECTION.)

J.M.

FATHER. The word is used in the Bible in essentially three ways: for a human parent; for the model or prototype of a group; as a designation for GOD.

For a Human Parent. In ancient Israel the father occupied the authoritative position, particularly in matters of property and inheritance, and together with the mother was to be honored and respected within the FAMILY (Exod. 20:12; Deut. 5:16; Prov. 19:26). The father in turn was to communicate to his children the story of God's grace to Israel (Exod. 10:2; 12:26; 13:8; Deut. 32:7, 46) and together with the mother to provide a general education (Prov. 1:8; 6:20). Likewise, in the households of the early church children were to obey their parents. Fathers were to avoid provoking their children and were to bring them up "in the discipline and instruction of the Lord" (Eph. 6:1-4; Col. 3:20-21).

For the Model or Prototype of a Group. Abraham, "the father of the circumcised," is described by Paul as "the father of all who believe" (Rom. 4:11-12, 16-17). The term is also used as a title of respect for honored persons.

As a Designation for God. Israel did not frequently address God as "Father," but when the phenomenon does appear in the OT it is clear that the relation of Father and child is the result of grace and not biological generation. It was because God chose Israel to be a special possession that Israelites had the right and privilege to call God "Father" and to acknowledge themselves as God's children (Exod. 4:22-23; Deut. 14:1-2; 32:6; Isa. 64:8). Hosea movingly describes the warm compassion of God—the caring parent who agonizes over disobedient and wayward Israel (11:1-7).

Undoubtedly because of his unique filial relationship Jesus brings a new dimension to the Father-child connection. In Mark 14:36 he uses the Aramaic "ABBA," an unprecedented address for God, indicating both a deepened intimacy and a total obedience. In any event, it was taken over by the early church and became an indication of the Spirit's presence in worship (Gal. 4:6; Rom. 8:15-16). The Gospel of John more than any other NT writing works out the close relation of Jesus as son to God as Father (5:17-29; 10:14-15; 14:28; 15:10; 17:11, 21).

It is important to note that the language of God as Father in the Bible is metaphorical. God in fact transcends gender and is neither male nor female. There are a number of images in the Bible that relate God's action and nature to a mother.

C.B.C.

FATHERS OF THE CHURCH. See CHURCH FATHERS.

FATIMA, OUR LADY OF. The Virgin Mary of Fatima, Portugal. She appeared to three children on May 13, 1917, telling them to return the thirteenth day of each month, and on October 13 she would reveal her message. Seventy thousand people came for the sixth and last appearance. The Virgin enjoined praying with the rosary and doing penance. Miracle cures were reported, and hospitals, retreat houses, and a shrine were built. Pope Pius IX in 1930 authorized devotion to Our Lady of Fatima. On May 13, 1967, a million people gathered to hear Pope Paul VI say mass at her shrine.

C.M.

FAUST. See GOETHE, JOHANN WOLFGANG VON.

FAWCETT, JOHN (1740–1817). The author of "Blest Be the Tie That Binds" was born January 6 near Bradford, Yorkshire. Converted when he was 16, under the preaching of George Whitefield, Fawcett became first a Methodist and then a Baptist three years later. He began to preach and was ordained by the Baptists in 1765. In 1772 he was called to Carter's Lane in London, but after he had preached his farewell sermon, his congregation in Bradford convinced him to stay. They built a new chapel in 1777 at Hebden Bridge, and Fawcett opened a school in his home, Brearley Hall. He also wrote "Lord, Dismiss Us with Thy Blessing."

N.H.

FEAR. Old Testament. The Hebrew language is especially rich in verbs that have to do with a person's emotional attitude or sensibility that is subsumed under the general English term "fear." Human emotions of terror or dismay were occasioned by a variety of causes such as adversity or threats from an enemy. But the OT use of "fear" that makes it significant lies in another dimension.

In the phenomenology of Hebrew religion "fear" of God came to be used of the numinous dread (see NUMEN) felt by a human being in the presence of deity. Examples of this creaturely sense of finiteness and frailty, which R. Otto dubbed "numinous" (The Idea of the Holy, 1923), are seen in Jacob at Bethel (Gen. 28) and in the THEOPHANY on Horeb in the lives of Moses (Exod. 3) and Elijah (I Kings 19). Probably the often repeated "fear not" is associated with this reaction to the divine holy presence, though the use of the term in the Prophets (esp. Isa. 40-66) is matched more with Israel's sense of shame and bewilderment at the time of the Babylonian exile (see Isa. 41:10, 14; 43:1; 44:2; etc.).

New Testament. The limited usage of the term "fear" in the NT carries forward OT ideas, as Christians are exhorted to "fear God" (I Pet. 2:17; compare Luke 18:2, 4, for the opposite attitude, which is blameworthy). Yet Paul in particular uses "fear" as a religious term in a polemical way, by setting it in antithesis to "the spirit of sonship," which drives out fear (Rom. 8:15, 16; Gal. 4:6) caused by legalism in one's religious relationship to God. The same idea recurs in I John 4:17ff. Fear, in the apostolic exhortations, is also a Christian disposition in the sense of respect shown to one's fellow believers (II Cor. 7:15) and the Roman state authorities (Rom. 13:1-7).

R. M.

FEASTS. The OT terms for "feast" or "feast for Yahweh" (Lev. 23:2, 4; Num. 15:3; Deut. 16:16) denote a time of national celebration and rejoicing. Those tied into the agricultural year functioned as seasons of thanksgiving for the ingathering of the harvest ("Booths," mentioned in Lev. 23:34-36; Deut. 16:13-15) at the fall of the year, just as the Feast of WEEKS commemorated the "day of the first fruits" (Exod. 23:16, 34:22; Num. 28:26), at the beginning of harvest season. The name "weeks" derives from the dating, namely by counting forward from Passover a week of weeks (forty-nine days plus one for inclusive reckoning; Exod. 34:22). Hence, weeks became known as Pentecost by reason of the fifty (the translation of "Pentecost" in Greek) days that separated the two festivals.

PASSOVER (otherwise called the Feast of Unleavened Bread, Exod. 23:15) came to occupy a central role. Originally an agricultural event in the spring equinox, it was given historical dimension by its link in the Hebrew tradition with the Exodus from Egypt, which it commemorated, just as later Weeks served to remind Israel of the giving of the law on Sinai.

These three events were spread over several days. "Unleavened bread" lasted for a full week, and later became marked by a call to Israel's distinctive destiny as a holy people (see I Cor. 5:7, 8 for a Christianized version of this). "BOOTHS" (or in later parlance "Tabernacles") also lasted seven days, and symbolically was an enactment of the wilderness wanderings, as the people lived in coverings made of leafy branches (Lev. 23:39-43).

The remaining festivals are of a particular character related to historical events. Pride of place goes to the weekly SABBATH, memorializing the day of creation (Exod. 20:8-11; Deut. 5:12-15), but also a day of joy (Isa. 58:13), linked with the Exodus deliverance. It became a distinctive badge of postexilic Judaism, especially in days of persecution (the Maccabean revolt). The DAY OF ATONEMENT (Lev. 16), technically a fast not a festival, was a time of national stocktaking and religious confession, followed by forgiveness. The Day of the Blowing of Trumpets (Num. 29:1; Lev. 23:24) was a special version of Sabbath, and PURIM ("lots") recalled the deliverance of Israel as recorded in Esther. Again feasting and rejoicing marked the occasion.

Jesus (Luke 2:41; Mark 14:1, 12) and the apostles (according to Acts 20:16) observed these feasts, but there is an implied critique (Col. 2:16) of their externality. The Feast of Dedication in John 10:22 commemorated the Maccabean victory.

R. M.

FEDERAL THEOLOGY. The name derived from the Latin foedus, meaning "COVENANT." As a distinctive theology with God's covenant as its focal metaphor, federal theology originated with Heinrich Bullinger's De testamento seu foedere Dei unico et aeterno (1534). It was expanded by such Reformed thinkers as Ursinus and Olevianus, authors of the Heidelberg Catechism, and reached its greatest expression in the biblical theology of JOHANNES COCCEIUS. Emerging from the federal political context of Switzerland, federal theology influenced the development of federal political theory and practice in Germany, the Netherlands, Britain, and the United States.

Federal theology teaches that the inmost nature of God, the Faithful One, is a covenant among the Creator, Christ, and Holy Spirit; that God's covenant with the natural and historical order and with all humanity is a covenant both of nature and grace; that humanity is created incomplete and in process toward a consummation hidden in God; that human fallenness is resistance to this created hunger of the heart for completion; that God unfolds a faithful will through phases in the OT and decisively in the life, death, and resurrection of Jesus Christ. Federalism holds that humanity is symbiotically social by nature, that human social and political order rests upon God's covenant and the covenants humans make with one another before God, and that the world and human society are in process under the sovereignty of God toward increasing liberation and unfolding levels of justice and love.

C. M.

FELIX, ANTONIUS. The full name of this person is known from the references to him in works by the Roman historian Tacitus. He was appointed PROCURATOR of Judea in A.D. 52, and it should be noted that a recently discovered inscription, which records the name of a procurator in Judea named Claudius, looks as if it refers to this man, in which case his full name was Claudius Felix, as Josephus states in Antiquities. This nomenclature would make him a freedman of the emperor CLAUDIUS, who befriended Felix's brother Pallas. It was due to the good offices of Pallas that Felix received his procuratorial appointment.

His tenure of that office coincided with great social unrest in the province, and in turn was marked by fierce countermeasures. He was a "brutal and licentious" man, records Tacitus, "exercising the powers of a tyrant but showing the mentality of a slave." He ruthlessly quelled an outbreak of revolt led by an Egyptian messianic pretender, but the leader escaped according to Josephus' Jewish War. This may explain the mistaken reference to this man in Acts 21:38, where the tribune Claudius Lysias thought Paul might be that person.

Paul's arrest in Jerusalem led to his transfer to Caesarea, where he was brought before Felix. The two character traits mentioned by Tacitus were brought out: Felix's disregard of justice and his love of money, though Luke gives a kinder estimate (Acts 24:22, 23). Paul was detained for two years while Felix hoped for a bribe as ransom money to set Paul free (Acts 24:26). So Paul's case was passed over to please the Jews (24:27) or to gratify Felix's wife, Drusilla, according to one textual tradition. Felix was recalled by Nero in A.D. 59, and though he was saved from accusations brought by the Jews, he faded into oblivion.

R.M.

FELLOWSHIP. A term referring to the expression of Christian love among believers, expressed in worship, the reception of the sacraments (especially the Lord's Supper), and in simple social activities, such as meals taken together and recreation or physical work done for the church or for the larger community. Such fellowship or COMMUNION is called koinonia in the NT and is considered to be more than friendship or the morale of a close-knit group. Christian fellowship is based on the believer's primary relationship to Jesus Christ, the crucified and Risen Lord, who is spiritually present in the church, which is declared to be his body and all believers to be limbs of that body. Fellowship is then a sharing of the faithfuls' communion with Christ and with one another and, therefore, is a common participation spiritually that leads to close social interaction and mutual service. This spiritual participation is sometimes called life in the Spirit, life in Christ, life in love, sharing in God's grace, and participation in the Body and Blood of Christ. Contemporary Protestant theology and post-Vatican II Catholic theology emphasize the importance of Christian fellowship and speak of the church as a divine-human community.

J.C.

FEMININE DIMENSIONS OF THE SACRED.

An ancient tradition, known more through icons than writings, depicts the transcendent in female form, and, much later, with female characteristics. Magna Mater, the Great Mother in Mediterranean cultures, was queen over heaven and earth, under such names as ISHTAR, Asherah, or Demeter. She was the Primal Figure.

As agricultural societies developed, Ishtar's role became more identified with that of assuring the fertility of the soil. In myth, she produces a daughter, Persephone (Kore, Gaia), who represents earth. Persephone's abduction by the lord of the underworld brings about a recurring annual season of dormancy, infertility, and death. Daughters may also signify powerful deities: Artemis (Diana) presides over everything concerning the act of hunting; Athene, born not of woman but from the head of Jove, personifies wisdom; Artemis (Venus) is the deity of love. In another mythological strand, the mother produces a son, who becomes her lover and consort (ISIS and OSIRIS). There is a struggle for power, resulting in the death and resurrection of the son and the subsequent demotion of the mother.

Agricultural societies were settled ones, and the mother deity, such as Demeter, presided over an orderly cycle that assured life and continuity through both food and human fertility. She became part of a heavenly/earthly societal pattern in which the father deity became the ruler over heaven, earth, and the regions under the earth. Thunder and earthquake were symbols of an almighty power that subjugated all living creatures and all lesser deities. The queen became merely the consort of Jove/Jupiter, a less powerful figure, frequently characterized by jealousy and acts of petty vengeance. No longer was the mother a beneficent deity. Female deities had their votaries, festivals, and honors prescribed for them according to their position in the sacred pantheon.

The Hebrew people came into a land whose people looked to Ishtar as the queen, mother, earth/goddess figure because they were an agricultural rather than a nomadic community. Through all the centuries that the Hebrews struggled for and settled the land, Ishtar had her place in the life of the area and thus infiltrated the life of the Hebrews more than a cursory reading of the Scriptures might suggest. Almost every historical book from I Samuel through II Chronicles records the rulers who were faithless to YAHWEH. Almost every prophet exhorts the people to put away their sacred figures, alternately ridiculing and threatening the practice of idolatry. This seems to indicate that Yahweh was never worshiped as absolutely as had been commanded by the Law (Exod. 20:1-3) and promised in covenant.

On the surface, Yahweh would seem to have been the epitome of masculinity, patriarchy, and kingship. But a careful reading of the Scripture discloses the figure also to be one of compassion, mercy, pity, forgiveness, and yearning—traditionally feminine traits. Yahweh fed the people, led them with cords as a parent teaches a child to walk, desired them to show justice and love, which were also divine characteristics. The loyalty and faithfulness of Yahweh transcend the faithlessness of Israel. Using a feminine figure of speech, Numbers 11:12 implies that Yahweh conceived and brought forth Israel.

In Christian theology Jesus is the image of God as a human being. One expects to see earlier characteristics appear in the gospel writings. Jesus weeps at the tomb of Lazarus; he yearns over Jerusalem, "as a hen would gather her chickens together." He loves, feeds, and heals—descriptions of a person who nurtures, sustains, and keeps alive. Moreover, in the supreme moment of his passion, he is silent, accepting humiliation and injustice, bowing before the power of others over his life. Modern interpretations of Jesus in picture, song, and popular verse are frequently sentimentalizations of these images. The feminine aspect of God is one not of weakness but of strength. Only the strong can tolerate injustice, endure suffering, and continue to love when love is unrequited. Endurance has been characteristic of women.

As the figure of Jesus Christ became, in later Christian theology, that of lord and judge, "seated at the right hand of the Father," the feminine aspects of the divine, no longer to be perceived in either figure, were transferred to MARY, the mother of Jesus (in Orthodox language, THEOTOKOS, MOTHER OF GOD). Although not to be identified with Magna Mater of ancient Mediterranean and Canaanite religion, Mary has been the personification of gentleness, strength, faithfulness, and compassion. She intercedes for humans with the Father and the Son. She has been called QUEEN OF HEAVEN, symbolizing a transcendent dimension to the feminine for time and eternity. More particularly, the term VIRGIN gives her a special status.

In ancient Mediterranean religions, virgin figures such as Artemis (Diana) and Hestia (Vesta), protector of hearth and home, were characterized by their autonomy. They were not pubescent girls, awaiting a husband while still under the guardianship of fathers, nor were they wives under the rule of husbands. The virgin had an independent existence. As mother, she was related not only to her child but to all people to whom she was mother. She could act autonomously on behalf of her children without having to submit to the wishes of a husband. Only in the context of marriage law that made women dependent can one fully appreciate the authority of the virgin. In this also, she manifested characteristics of the transcendent, for she could act beneficently without fear or favor.

Feminine dimensions of the transcendent may be found also in other religions. Taoism provides the image of YIN/YANG, the masculine and feminine, which together make for wholeness. Tantric Hinduism portrays SHIVA/Shakti, male and female working together. In Mahayana Buddhism Buddha has a wife/consort.

Early Christian thought indicated SOPHIA (a feminine word) as holy wisdom, whose most famous monument is the great church that Justinian built in Constantinople. SHEKINAH, the old Hebrew term for the presence of God, is also feminine. Although spiritus (spirit) is masculine in Latin, its Greek equivalent, pneuma (used for Holy Spirit in the NT), is feminine. The Gnostics, considered heretical in their time and whose writings were unknown until the recent discovery of the Nag Hammadi texts, gave a higher place to the feminine aspect of God than did orthodox Christianity. There are also biblical images of Israel as the consort of Yahweh, and the church as the bride of Christ. In such allusions the feminine was divinized by association.

In medieval Christianity, the mystics were aware of the feminine aspects of God. Dame JULIAN OF NORWICH addressed God as Mother. In the eighteenth century, Mother Ann and the people called SHAKERS, whom she founded, addressed God as Mother. MARY BAKER EDDY founded Christian Science in the nineteenth century, establishing the usage of Father-Mother God in Science and Health with Key to the Scriptures. Present-day interest in the feminine dimensions of the sacred is a continuation of a religious impulse that has been an aspect of religious understanding for millennia.

I.C.

FEMINIST THEOLOGY. Whether developed by women or men, a feminist theology is one rooted in the experience of women and seeks to promote equality and mutuality between the sexes, indeed among all people. It begins with the realization that sexism, the historic domination of men over women, is a fundamental expression of human sinfulness.

While women have long been aware of the distortions of the Bible used to support sexism (see Hardesty, Women Called to Witness, 1984), the contemporary movement began with a critique of patriarchy, the male domination and emphasis on hierarchy evident in church history (see Mary Daly, The Church and the Second Sex, 1968). Daly's next effort was a scathing critique of classical Christian doctrines in Beyond God the Father (1973). She rejected andromorphic symbols for God and argued that the traditional identification of women with the Suffering Servant was self-destructive, while male identification with Jesus as Lord was a continuing rationalization of illegitimate power. Other early feminist theologians included Sheila Collins' A Different Heaven and Earth (1974) and Letty Russell's Human Liberation in a Feminist Perspective (1974).

The leading contemporary feminist theologian, Rosemary Radford Ruether, forged her theology in a series of articles, collected in New Woman, New Earth (1975), before attempting a more systematic treatment in Sexism and God-Talk: Toward a Feminist Theology (1983). This work should be taken in conjunction with the biblical reinterpretation done by Letha Scanzoni and Nancy Hardesty in All We're Meant to Be (1974, 1986), Paul Jewett in Man as Male and Female (1975), Letty Russell, ed., in The Liberating Word (1976), Phyllis Trible in God and the Rhetoric of Sexuality (1978), and more recently Elisabeth Schüssler Fiorenza in In Memory of Her: A Feminist Theological Reconstruction of Christian Origins (1983), and Bread Not Stone (1984).

Feminist theology is more than a recovery of a usable past and a revision of some theological themes. Its implications touch every area of theology. As Elisabeth Schüssler Fiorenza notes, it begins with a "hermeneutics of suspicion" because of the androcentric bias of all sources—biblical, historical, psychological, even linguistic. Rosemary Radford Ruether particularly draws on prophetic and kingdom themes in Scripture, plus various strands of church history, some of which were labeled heretical by the builders of the patriarchal institutional church.

Discussions of hierarchy, inclusive language, and the meaning of symbols has led to a rethinking of the nature of God, the Trinity, and Jesus as God Incarnate. The insight that sexism is a root sin leads to a rethinking of all forms of domination and oppression—racism, nationalism, militarism, heterosexism. Indeed one of the goals of feminist theology is inclusivity; it rejects all forms of dualism. It has included also a recovery of a sense of oneness with the earth and stewardship for it.

In concrete social terms it has promoted a fresh look at Scripture's meaning for its original hearers and for today's culture, inclusive language in Scripture translation and worship, the full ordination of WOMEN, mutuality in marital relationships, an end to abuse in all forms between the sexes, and a rethinking of ethical issues originally rooted in sexism such as abortion and homosexuality. (Compare also FEMININE DIMENSIONS OF THE SACRED.) N.H.

FERTILITY CULTS AND RITES. Fertility, the power by which life reproduces itself, has ever been a passionate concern of religion. For most premoderns, failure of the hunt or the harvest meant nothing less than starvation. The survival of the social unit, family, or tribe, was an imperative felt with virtually equal force. Small wonder, then, that when all power is believed ultimately to be of divine origin, and when sacred rites and symbols are thought to be able to petition or channel it, the fertility of plants, animals, and humans should become a major religious theme. In archaic and traditional religions especially, the enhancement of fertility is the primary object of a diversity of seasonal and quasi-magical practices and is intimately bound up with such other major themes as sacrifice and sacred kingship. Motifs common to fertility cults and rites include the principle of death for life, sympathetic magic, and seasonal augmentation.

Death for Life. Just as the seed that seems to be dead, when buried, shoots forth new life, so the sacrifice of a life, whether vegetable, animal, or human, is often believed to generate fertility. Frequently the objective is reinforced by scattering the blood or dismembered body over the fields or exhibiting the skulls in those places believed to hold sacred power. The Jivaro of South America, for example, danced the shrunken heads they took through the fields in which they grew their crops to imbue them with the victims' life-force.

Sympathetic Magic. Though now somewhat old-fashioned, this term is as good as any to refer to those practices that endeavor to produce a given result through the making and manipulation of parallel acts and symbols. The sacred marriage of a divine king, and above all its consummation, may enhance the fertility of an entire kingdom. Figures such as the lingam or pillar that represent the Hindu god SHIVA undoubtedly had their origin in fertility religion.

Seasonal Augmentation. Religion very often seeks to "augment" and complement what nature is doing in the seasonal round. Spring, the time of planting and the birthing of animals, is therefore a critical time for fertility rites; remnants can be seen in the symbolism of Easter and the Maypole. The presentation of "firstfruits," characteristic of harvest festivals, also has fertility overtones; these offerings are like "seeds" to be returned by the gods many times over in the crops of next year.

Although fertility is less overtly a part of modern than of archaic religion, symbols, festivals, and language stemming ultimately from it, though sometimes with changed meaning, remain embedded in the world's faiths.

R.E.

FESTIVALS. See FEASTS.

FESTUS, PORCIUS. Festus succeeded to the office of Roman PROCURATOR in Caesarea, following FELIX, around A.D. 58. Virtually nothing is known about him except what Luke in Acts, and Josephus in Antiquities and the Jewish War, tell us about him.

Arnold Ehrhardt (The Acts of the Apostles, 1969) calls him "the one honourable governor Rome ever sent to Judaea," but Luke's assessment of his character is more negative (Acts 24:27-26:32). What comes through the narrative in Acts is Festus' decision to have Paul's case reach a conclusion, especially as Festus seems to have been convinced of his innocence (26:31).

In face of the possibility of a retrial in Jerusalem, Paul played a trump card and uttered words—"I appeal to Caesar"—which were his privilege as a Roman citizen (25:11). This statement at once nullified all local proceedings and automatically transferred his case to the imperial court at Rome (25:12). In the interview of Paul with Herod Agrippa II, Festus was evidently out of his depth, though he saw the essence of the charge brought against the Apostle (25:19), even if he could not understand its implication (26:24). Festus was later involved in a dispute with Jewish leaders, and he died in office about A.D. 60.

R.M.

FEUERBACH, LUDWIG (1804–72). German philosopher, assailant of Christianity, and a predecessor of Marxism's rejection of God. Born at Landshut, Bavaria, he studied theology at Heidelberg and Berlin and in 1828 received a doctorate in philosophy at Erlangen. However, his teaching at Erlangen and Heidelberg brought little success, and from 1837 to 1860 he resided at Bruckberg, writing and managing his wife's interest in a declining porcelain factory. He moved to Nuremberg in 1860 and died in poverty.

HEGEL's IDEALISM heavily influenced Feuerbach's early years, but he rejected Hegelianism in two publications: Toward the Critique of the Hegelian Philosophy (1839) and Principles of the Philosophy of the Future (1843). He believed that reality resides not in abstract spirit but in nature, in the world of the senses, in "sense realism"; only sensuous being is true and real. Feuerbach's famous Essence of Christianity (1841) and Lectures on the Essence of Religion (1851) explained Christianity as a projection and false deification of human hopes. Feuerbach expounds transcendent theology as immanent anthropology—humanity in its fullness. His writings convey his belief that one should let human devotion be directed not to an unreal God and immortality, but to the realization of human aspirations now. Transcendent deity is illusion, only a knowledge of humanity is relevant, according to Feuerbach.

C.M.

FICHTE, JOHANN GOTTLIEB (1762–1814). German philosopher who helped found the University of Berlin. Born at Rammenau, Fichte studied at the "Prince's School" in Pforta and the universities of Jena and Leipzig. After tutoring privately (1784–87), he went to Zurich and settled at Leipzig in 1790. Drawn to Kantianism, he visited KANT and anonymously published Critique of All Revelation (1792). Kant praised the work, and the disclosure of Fichte's authorship brought immediate acclaim. Between 1793 and 1799 Fichte taught philosophy at Jena, but left for Berlin, accused of atheism.

In his philosophy he seemed to make the moral order absolute, leaving no place for God. Although interrupted by the Napoleonic wars, Fichte helped establish the University of Berlin, serving as its first rector and professor of philosophy (1810–14). Gradually Fichte modified his philosophy and departed from Kant. Fichte's Vocation of Man (1800) pictures humanity as related to the sensuous realm, where following one's conscience leads to harmonious human unity. This book also related to the spiritual realm of eternal will, whose voice is conscience. Universal rational will, which finite beings apprehend incompletely, bonds everything, and heeding one's conscience brings immortality now. His other translated works include The Science of Knowledge and The Science of Ethics.

C.M.

FIDEISM. The doctrine that humanity is saved by faith alone. This is God's freely willed gift through the Atonement in Jesus Christ.

The doctrine took concrete form in the writings of AUGUSTINE, who insisted that the knowledge of God came only through the response of faith and that reason could not even assist in the process. It was not anti-intellectual, but it gave faith precedence over reason. LUTHER raised the doctrine as a rallying cry of the Reformation. The twentieth-century theologian of faith was KARL BARTH.

Others have disagreed, stating that the intellect is God-given and can be used to understand God. In reverse order, knowing about God could lead to faith in God. Fideism then becomes a disparaging word signifying viewpoints of those who are unwilling or unable to use reason for faith.

I.C.

FILIAL PIETY. The term commonly used to translate the Confucian virtue of hsiao (Chinese), refers to the obligation of children to serve their parents and to transmit their honor and lineage. Extended beyond the grave, it underlies the ancestrism of China and other lands, such as Korea and Japan, where the Confucian value system has spread.

R.E.

FILIOQUE. The Latin word meaning "and from the Son." Its addition in the West to the NICENE CREED caused friction with the East, which accused the West of both tampering with the creed and of heterodox views on the TRINITY. This interpolation, which probably originated in Spain, was in common usage in the Frankish kingdom by the ninth century, when the Eastern church discovered it, and bitter controversy ensued. What was at stake was the DOUBLE PROCESSION OF THE HOLY SPIRIT, a doctrine that the West affirmed and the East rejected. As the debate continued, each side accused the other of heresy, and therefore the Filioque became one of the stumbling blocks that eventually led to schism. A significant by-product of this controversy was the resurgence of the APOSTLES' CREED as the one most commonly used in the West. In order to avoid alienating either the Franks or the Byzantines, the popes began using that ancient Roman creed, which they attributed to the apostles. Eventually, that shorter creed gained widespread acceptance in the West, and the Nicene Creed fell into relative disuse.

J.G.

Courtesy of Oberlin College

Charles G. Finney

FINNEY, CHARLES GRANDISON (1792–1875). Revivalist and educator. Finney was born on August 29, in Warren, Connecticut, to Sylvester and Rebecca Rice Finney. In 1794 the family moved to Oneida County, New York. Educated in local schools and then for two years at Hamilton Oneida Academy in Clinton, Finney began the study of law in 1818 in Adams, New York. After a conversion experience on October 10, 1821, Finney studied for the ministry. Licensed to preach March 17, 1824, and ordained July 1, Finney married Lydia Andrews (1794–1847) of Whitestown that same year.

His ministry was soon marked by enthusiastic revivals, subsequently called the Second GREAT AWAKENING. His New Measures—angry meetings, praying for people by name, protracted meetings, colloquial preaching, and, most controversial, women praying and testifying in public—provoked fellow revivalists Asahel Nettleton and Lyman Beecher to confront him in July 1827 at New Lebanon, New York.

The Second Free Presbyterian Church in New York City, meeting in the rented Chatham Street Theatre, became a home for Finney in 1832 and for the national conventions of the Benevolent Empire. Here in 1835 Finney gave his famed Lectures on Revivals of Religion.

In 1835 Finney became professor of theology at Oberlin Collegiate Institute in Ohio, serving as president from 1851 to 1866. In 1836 he withdrew from the Presbyterian Church and became pastor of New York's Broadway Tabernacle, a Congregational church, until 1837. He also pastored Oberlin's First Congregational Church, 1835–72.

Finney's New School theology was marked by an emphasis on human ability to repent and on the possibility of moral perfection. He was also noted for his encouragement of Christian participation in reform, particularly abolition, temperance, and woman's rights.

Finney also authored Sermons on Important Subjects (1836), Lectures to Professing Christians (1837), and two volumes of Lectures on Systematic Theology (1846–47). He served editorially with the "Oberlin Evangelist" and the "Oberlin Quarterly Review." He died in Oberlin on August 16.

N.H.

FIQH. From the Arabic word for "knowledge, understanding." In Islamic jurisprudence, fiqh refers to the application of the sources of law—the Qur'an, the Hadith or traditions of what the Prophet (Muhammad) said and did, and legal precedent—to specific cases. In its wider sense, then, fiqh refers to the entire body of Muslim law, which as a legal corpus is called the Shari'ah. In Islamic theory, orthodox law is derived from (1) the Qur'an, (2) tradition, (3) consensus of the faithful, and (4) analogical reasoning based on the foregoing. The law is held to be divine in origin; human reason or experience in themselves are not sufficient to create any part of it. In principle, this law is unchanging and covers every detail of human life. For this reason, however, some parts of it do not entail public or criminal retribution, but enjoin upon the offender such personal atonement as fasting or acts of charity. The application of fiqh or Islamic practical law to modern conditions is a matter of much concern in the Muslim world today.

R.E.

FIRE. Regarded as indispensable for human existence (Ecclus. 39:26), fire met diverse secular needs of ancient humanity and played a vital role in the Israelite cult. It was also perceived as a crucial element in divine appearance and action.

Fire and Secular Life. Though insatiable fire adversely affected human well-being (Prov. 30:16), a controlled fire served several well-defined human needs. Fire was used in cooking (Isa. 44:15; John 21:9), heating (Jer. 36:22; Acts 28:2), burning refuse (Lev. 8:17), as well as in refining metals and using them in manufacture (Exod. 32:24; Isa. 44:12). Moreover, during warfare, captured enemy cities were often destroyed by fire (Josh. 6:24 [Jericho]; 11:11 [Hazor]; 1 Kings 9:16 [Gezer]).

Fire and Worship. Fire was used to ignite sacrifices in the Israelite cult. Burnt offerings, involving victims "from the herd," were entirely burnt on the altar as sacrificial gifts to God (Lev. 1:1-17). The consumption of such gifts out of the worshiper's substance was interpreted as indicative of divine acceptance (I Kings 18:38). Since animal holocausts were a daily affair, the altar fire was ever-burning (Lev. 6:12-13). This also aptly symbolized God's presence in Israelite worship. Since they involved the sacrificing of humans to pagan gods, child holocausts were outlawed in Israel (Deut. 12:31; 18:10). Nevertheless, in the late monarchical period, that prohibition was sometimes violated (II Kings 16:3; 17:17; 21:6) and correspondingly evoked prophetic censure (Jer. 7:31; 19:5). Cultic fire was also used as a means for maintaining ritual cleanliness (Lev. 13:52; Num. 31:23; Isa. 6:6-7).

Fire and Divine Appearance. Fire imagery is conspicuous in many biblical depictions of God's self-revelation. In a ceremony establishing Yahweh's covenant with Abraham, mysterious divine presence is symbolized by fire passing between the pieces of the patriarch's offering (Gen. 15:17). Yahweh's initial theophany to Moses involves a BURNING BUSH (Exod. 3:2; Acts 7:30). A nocturnal pillar of fire denotes divine presence and leadership during Israel's wilderness wandering (Exod. 13:21-22; Num. 14:14; Deut. 1:33; Ps. 78:14). At Mount Sinai, the site of God's theophany par excellence, elements of fire and storm mediate compelling divine presence (Exod. 19:18; 24:17; Deut. 4:11-12, 33). Moreover, fire is central in poetic theophanies attesting divine intervention. In Psalm 18, a royal thanksgiving, Yahweh's arrival to rescue the elect is signaled by imagery involving devouring fire, glowing coals, and lightnings (vv. 8, 12, 14). And Psalm 50, a liturgy portraying Yahweh's dynamic appearance to summon the people to covenant accountability, declares, "Before him is a devouring fire, round about him a mighty tempest" (v. 3). Visions meditating on God's future self-revelation also depict divine arrival in fire (Isa. 66:15; Mal. 3:2). In sum, fire imagery deftly captures the terrifying aspect of God's nearness and resourcefully defends God's unapproachable holiness.

Fire and Divine Action. A God capable of dispatching lightning (heavenly fire) as arrows (Pss. 18:14; 144:6) sometimes subjects evildoers to fatal fiery punishment (Gen. 19:24 [Sodom and Gomorrah]; Lev. 10:2 [Nadab and Abihu]; Num. 16:35 [Korah and his Levitical colleagues]). Reports of actual judgment by fire are less common than figurative references to divine wrath that incorporate fire imagery. Amos admonishes his listeners to return to Yahweh lest he angrily "break out like fire in the house of Joseph" (5:6). The king asks Yahweh, "How long will thy wrath burn like fire?" (Ps. 89:46). Sinful Judah is threatened with exile since in Yahweh's anger "a fire is kindled" (Jer. 15:14). Indeed, jealous Yahweh's proscription of Israelite idolatry is buttressed by the stern observation that God is "a devouring fire" (Deut. 4:24). In later OT writings and in the NT, fire dominates visions of inevitable eschatological judgment (Ezek. 39:6; Isa. 66:24; Dan. 7:11; Matt. 13:40-42; Mark 9:43-48; II Pet. 3:7; Rev. 14:9-10). Thus the Holy Deity, whose anger is kindled against human sinfulness, is destined to have the last word.

J.K.K.

FIRSTBORN. In its legal and cultic sense, the term refers to the eldest male child in a family; applied to animals it means the "eldest male offspring" ("firstling") of a beast. From beginning to end, the OT is clear that the firstborn was the preeminent offspring, eligible to receive a double share of the inheritance (Deut. 21:15-17) and blessed with extra emotional significance as well (compare Zech. 12:10). It is this sense of preeminence, and not the connection with atoning sacrifice, that is stressed in the only really significant NT use of the term (Col. 1:15-20). Here Christ is called both "the first-born of all creation" and "the first-born from the dead."

Moses tells Pharaoh that Israel is Yahweh's firstborn son, and that refusal to let this favored "son" go will result in punishment of Egypt's own firstborn (Exod. 4:22-23). Because Pharaoh persists in his refusal, when the angel of death passes over the houses of Israel, it is the firstborn of Egypt, even the firstborn of Pharaoh's own house, who pay with their lives (Exod. 12:29). Yahweh's mighty act of vengeance against the firstborn of Egypt is a theme repeatedly returned to in the Psalms (compare Pss. 78:51; 105:36; 135:8; 136:10).

At the end of the account of the Passover slaying of the firstborn in Egypt, "the Lord said to Moses, 'Consecrate to me all the first-born; whatever is the first to open the womb among the people of Israel, both of man and of beast, is mine'" (Exod. 13:1-2; compare Exod. 22:29-30; Lev. 27:26). On the face of it, this early legal injunction might be construed to suggest a practice of human sacrifice. Other texts hint at the possibility that this kind of sacrifice was actually made on occasion. I Kings 16:34 reports that "Hiel of Bethel built Jericho; he laid its foundation at the cost of Abiram his first-born" (compare Josh. 6:26). This obscure reference has been clarified by the discovery of human skeletons in foundation deposits, suggesting that a builder would sacrifice a human in order to guarantee good fortune for the structure. Even the prophet Micah protests against the possibility that a person might sacrifice the family's most precious possession in the hope of placating God: "Shall I give my first-born for my transgression, the fruit of my body for the sin of my soul?" (Mic. 6:7).

It is no surprise, then, to discover extensive legal provision for the "redemption" of the firstborn of the human family and of animals. After first announcing Yahweh's claim on "all that opens the womb," the Priestly text Exodus 34:19-20 continues, "The firstling of an ass you shall redeem with a lamb. . . . All the first-born of your sons you shall redeem." The meaning of this redemption is spelled out more precisely in Numbers 3:11-13, 40-51, which states that for every firstborn male in Israel, a male Levite is to be dedicated to the Lord, and any remainder of firstborn males is to be covered by redemption money to be paid to the Aaronic priests. According to Numbers 18:14-19, the firstborn of unclean animals and humankind shall be redeemed at the fixed price of five silver shekels, but the firstling of a cow or a sheep or a goat shall not be redeemed but sacrificed, its blood sprinkled on the altar, its fat burned in the fire, and its flesh given over to the Levites who attend the sacrifice to be their means of sustenance.

Although the firstborn son enjoys a privileged status, it is noteworthy that with minor exception here and there (compare I Chr. 26:10), primogeniture is not perceived as the essential guarantee to political or priestly succession. The special place of the firstborn begins with the preemptive claim of Yahweh upon that individual, and that claim is resolved through the cult.

W.S.T.

FIRSTFRUITS. In the OT, the FIRSTBORN son of a family, the firstborn lamb, calf, or kid of all the flocks and herds, and, in later times, the first cutting of the harvest and shearing of wool, which were offered to the Lord, in sacrificial worship. While the Canaanites sacrificed their own firstborn sons to gain the favor of their Baals and gods, the Hebrews ransomed their sons by offering animals instead (Exod. 22:29; 34:19 ff.). According to the Law of Moses, the firstborn of the flocks belonged to Yahweh (Exod. 13:2; 34:19, Lev. 27:26). Animals considered clean were sacrificed, and unclean ones were destroyed.

Human sacrifice was widely practiced in the ancient Near East, and the Hebrew faith early protested against it. Since this so often involved the firstborn son, such protests against rejection of human sacrifice plays a role in the continuing theology of the firstfruits throughout Hebrew history. The Hebrews gave special honor to the eldest son, giving him the father's place of honor as head of the family, plus a double portion of the father's estate (Gen. 43:33; Deut. 21:17). Some scholars have suggested that the story of Abraham and Isaac, which almost ended in tragedy (Gen. 22), may have been such a protest against sacrificing the firstborn son. Regardless of this, the law of Moses clearly recognized Yahweh's rightful claim on the firstborn (Exod. 13:2; 22:29; Gen. 4:4).

In the NT, Christ is viewed as the preeminent Firstfruits, the only begotten Son, whose death on the cross once for all put an end to the whole Hebrew sacrificial system. His death completely ended the need for blood sacrifices and burnt offerings. The book of Hebrews is essentially a long treatise on Christ as the one, perfect, and final SACRIFICE.

Indeed, the sacrifices of the firstfruits and all other rituals in the OT period were but shadows, foretellings, of the only real sacrifice, acceptable to God. In Christ, all of the Law, the Prophets, and the sacrifices, both ritual and ethical, have been fulfilled and forever rendered obsolete.

J.C.

FISH. See ACROSTIC.

FISH. The species figures prominently in the biblical literature since the Mediterranean Sea provided Israel with her coastline and the Sea of Galilee was rich in fish, providing a main trade for the Galilean population (Mark 1:16-20; Luke 5:6; John 21:3-11).

The Old Testament. Foreign nations such as Egypt and coastal towns such as Tyre were noted for their fish (Num. 11:5; Neh. 13:16). The Egyptians worshiped the fish, and a law in Deuteronomy 4:18 prohibits the making of fish images for this purpose. Fish were caught and used as part of Jewish diet in the maritime ports along the Mediterranean coast and especially in the Lake Gennesaret in Galilee. It is estimated that there are some twenty-four different types of fish found in this lake.

Sometimes fish are mentioned, in a symbolic way, in reference to Israel's captivity when she was "swallowed up" by a foreign power, likened to a sea monster (Jer. 51:34, 44; Ezek. 32:2, 3; Jonah 1:17). Tobias is described as in danger of being swallowed by a large fish in the Tigris (Tob. 6:2).

The New Testament. The chief concentration of references is in the Gospel accounts of Jesus' call to the fishermen who plied their trade on the coastline of the Sea of Galilee, notably at Capernaum and Bethsaida, "the house of fish." To them the call was addressed: "Follow me and I will make you become fishers of men" (Mark 1:17 and parallels; compare Jer. 16:16; see W. A. Wuellner, Meaning of Fishers of Men, 1967). It is not surprising that Jesus used the examples of fish and fishing in his parables (for example, Matt. 13:47-50) when he spoke to a Galilean audience (Mark 4:1; Luke 5:1), and the mode of operation—dragging the nets ashore to pick out the good fish from the bad—suggests the use of a large seine net to catch fish (John 21:8). Matthew records one incident (Matt. 17:27) of a coin found in a fish's mouth, implying a large fish now called chromis simonis after the episode involving Simon Peter. More likely the fish in question was the catfish, clarias lazera, a predator fish, and scaleless, therefore unclean and not sought by Galilean fishermen.

The fish in Lake Galilee were evidently best caught at night (Luke 5:5; John 21:3), and in the incident of John 21 were eaten at breakfast (John 21:12-13). From the latter story fish were given a eucharistic significance in the subsequent history of the church, and Christ is actually prayed to under the image of the fish in the Pectorius inscription (third century): "Divine offspring of the heavenly Fish . . . eat it with hunger, holding the Fish in thy hands. Fill me with the Fish, I pray thee, Lord Saviour."

R.M.

FISKE, JOHN (1842–1901). The famed apologist for CHARLES DARWIN and Herbert Spencer was born on March 30 to Edmund Brewster and Mary Fisk Bound Green of Hartford, Connecticut.

Fiske entered Harvard as a sophomore in 1860. There he discovered Spencer and began to openly advocate evolution. After obtaining his B.A. in 1863, he passed the bar exam in July 1864 but seldom practiced law, preferring to write and lecture on science, history, and philosophy. He married Abby Morgan Brooks of Petersham, Massachusetts, on September 6, 1864. They had six children.

Fluent in nearly twenty languages, Fiske authored more than thirty books including The Origin of Evil (1899), The Destiny of Man (1884), and his two-volume Outlines of Cosmic Philosophy (1874). He died July 4, 1901.

N.H.

FLAGELLATION. The practice of scourging oneself in order to expiate for sin, or to control the body and its passions. Several teachers of Christian asceticism have recommended it, and it has been practiced to various degrees throughout most of the history of MONASTICISM. In the late Middle Ages, however, flagellation became widespread and popular, giving rise to the movement of the Flagellants. These first appeared in 1260, but became most numerous in the fourteenth century. Such Flagellants joined the movement for thirty-three days, during which they followed a strict ritual of public self-flagellation twice daily, and again in private at night. At first, the leaders of the church did not disapprove. But when the Flagellants began speaking of their practices as a form of PENANCE and as a "second baptism," they were accused of usurping the "power of the keys," and their practices were banned. Still, the movement continued a clandestine existence for several generations. Similar practices have appeared at other times in places as far removed from each other as the Philippines and New Mexico.

J.G.

FLESH. Old Testament. Hebrew anthropology is based on a phenomenological approach, that is, people as members of the human family as distinct from the animal kingdom are seen as they appear to the eye of the observer. This is clearly borne out when we look at the term "flesh," which stands over against its opposite SPIRIT (nephesh, used of people as living persons, and ruah, applied to people in relation to God). Nephesh is used of the totality of those elements that constitute a human person ("souls" meaning people: Gen. 46:26, 27, KJV, compare RSV). So in Psalm 124:7 "our souls" means "we ourselves." Yet nephesh does not exist in its own right. The OT knows next to nothing of a person as a disembodied "soul," a ghostly apparition. Every nephesh needs a BODY, for which the Hebrew term is "flesh" (basar), as completing one's total personhood and so making a human body different from the angels or God, who have no body (Isa. 31:3). In this sense "flesh" in the OT is a neutral term to denote the physical component of a person. It is the lifeless stuff of a person, the raw material out of which the real person emerges once ruah, "spirit," is breathed into it (Gen. 2:7) to make it a "living being" (Ps. 104:29). So the result is nephesh, which is what is produced once the flesh is animated by "spirit," usually thought of as a gift of God.

So OT anthropology is wonderfully self-consistent, and is the product of Hebrew observation: when a person stops breathing (there is no "spirit" left), the nephesh departs, and the "flesh" stops moving, and in due time starts to decompose. This is death. So "flesh" takes on the sense of dust, that is, that material from which a person emerged and to which one returns in death (Gen. 3:19; 6:3; Isa. 40:6; Jer. 17:5).

Yet, once animated by spirit, human flesh can have aspirations for God (Ps. 84:2), can rejoice in God (Ps. 16:9), or can reverence God (Ps. 119:120). But it is equally the seat of biological functions, for example, strength (II Chr. 32:8) and sex (Eccl. 11:10; Ezra 23:20). Yet the canonical OT does not link "flesh" with sin, as though to be human per se made a person a sinner. The flesh is weak, but not evil; it is other than God, but not alien to God since God made it (Gen. 2:7; Ps. 8:5; 139:13–15). Only in Hellenistic Judaism (for example, Wisd. Sol.) does flesh take on a negative connotation; and this is carried forward to one strand of NT teaching.

New Testament. The term for "flesh" is sarx, found ninety-one times in Paul, whose teaching is clearly the most emphatic in the NT. There are two distinct categories of meaning in Pauline thought: (1) There is a neutral sense where sarx carries the sense of "bodily existence" (Gal. 2:20; Phil. 1:22, 24) with a reminder that human beings are corporeal and weak (I Cor. 1:29; 15:50; Rom. 3:20; Gal. 1:16; Rom. 1:3). In this regard to live "in the flesh" means simply to exist as a person, and in one place (I Cor. 15:39) a person's life as homo sapiens is distinguished from life in other spheres (animal, reptile) because a person's "flesh" is different. (2) The second range of meanings is more characteristic of Paul. Some interpreters associate Paul's negative attitude to "flesh" with his Hellenistic world view, especially as it is seen in the later developments of Gnosticism.

According to this view, Paul thought of people as essentially evil because their "flesh" was part of material creation, utterly alien to God. But it is more likely that Paul took his cue from the OT tradition in which he was raised. For Paul as a former Pharisee, the meaning of "flesh" has a specific sense. It is derived from his Jewish-rabbinic background, where the Hebrew equivalent of "flesh" meant the "evil influence" that goads people into sin. Sarx relates to a person's existence as a sinner in the eyes of the Creator. It seems that for Paul, this condition does not come about because a person has attachment to material things or a person has carnal desires ("sins of the flesh" in the popular phrase, though one passage may appear to point to this: Gal 5:16-24). Rather, for the NT generally, sarx is a person's weakness as a moral being that has been exploited and attacked by sin, which is often personified as a demonic force. People are frail in the ethical dimension of living, and fall easy prey to such an inroad (see Rom. 7:14-25). "Flesh" denotes a person's proclivity to selfishness (living for self; in fact "the self life" would be a good translation of sarx) and pride. The latter term is connected with boasting (I Cor. 1:29-31; Phil. 3:3, 4), which is the essence of a person's proud claim to be independent of God and to be self-confident on the ground of religious merit. In this respect "flesh" stands for a person's resistance to God's grace. And "flesh" with its downward pull can only be overcome by the HOLY SPIRIT, who, in Paul, is the power that leads men and women to God.

R.M.

FLOOD. In the poetry of the OT, a synonym for the ocean or sea. The term is also used for rivers, like the Euphrates or the Nile (Exod. 15:8; Ps. 93:3; Jonah 2:3; Amos 8:8), but is chiefly used for the Great Flood, which God sent upon the earth in the days of Noah (Gen. 6:5-8:22).

The story of the Flood is the longest of the prehistorical stories of the beginnings of humanity in the Hebrew Bible. One copy of a flood story is said by scholars to be a copy made in the seventeenth century B.C. from one written as much as two thousand years before. In Genesis there are two different legendary accounts of the Flood, one from the Yahwist (or J) and the other from the Priestly strand (or P). Scholars generally conclude that J dates from around 1000 B.C. and originated in southern Judah, while P originated among the Priestly class at the time of the Judean exile to Babylonia (586-539 B.C.). In the main outlines of the story the two traditions agree, but there are significant differences, due to the theological outlooks of the writers, which stand side by side in apparent contradiction in the text. At some later date than the return from exile, perhaps 450-400 B.C., a redactor (editor) joined the J and P stories together and gave the Jews and the world the Flood story as we now know it.

The study of ancient history, comparative literature, and archaeology adds immeasurably to our appreciation of the Flood story. The Flood story (at least in its Mesopotamian expression) originated in Babylonia, a country often ravaged by huge floods. Flood deposits of clay five feet deep and others eight feet deep, overlying wreckage twenty-five feet deep, have been found in Ur and Uhairmir. As Genesis 8:4

says, the Great Flood struck the valley of the Tigris and Euphrates rivers. Just because the Mesopotamian area suffered unusually severe floods some six thousand years ago does not mean that the entire globe was covered with water. Nor does the occurrence of flood stories in the myths and legends of peoples from all over the world prove that there was a universal flood. It is the case that flood stories are found among almost all peoples, even among the American Indians, one of whose myths says the first man rode to safety on the back of a huge turtle. Interestingly, ancient Egypt, which depended on the yearly flooding of the Nile, had no story of a punishing flood.

The Flood story, in texts from Mari, name NOAH as a god. Texts from Nineveh, the GILGAMESH EPIC, call the hero of the Flood Ut-Naphishtun, who built a boat to exact specifications, put his family and the needs of all life aboard and escaped the Flood, which destroyed humankind. Ut-Naphishtun sent out birds—a dove, a swallow, and a raven—to check the water's depth. The gods (plural) in this story are not dignified but quarrel, fear, and swarm like flies around Ut-Naphishtun's sacrifice. A flood text from Nippur calls the hero Ziusudra and declares him a very religious person.

The Genesis story is religiously elevated over all the more ancient accounts. God sends the Flood only after long-suffering with human sin. Because God does not want to destroy the human race, God instructs Noah to build an ark (or houseboat) and stock it with provisions, load his family (including his sons and daughters-in-law of child-producing years) and (the J and P accounts differ) one pair (or seven pairs, Gen. 7:2, 9) of every kind of animal, including reptiles and birds, that exists on the earth. Noah remains faithful to God despite the mockery of his neighbors, becoming a model of obedient faith. Like Abraham later, Noah obeys and trusts God, believing in the things not seen (as the writer of Hebrews puts it). By the Flood, God punishes sin and saves the faithful remnant that is righteous. Thus the Petrine letters later refer to Noah and the Flood as exemplars of salvation, the power of baptism to save (I Pet. 3:20), and of God's ultimate righteousness (II Pet. 2:5). The early Christians were the heirs of this thousand-year-old tradition. Peter, Matthew (24:36-41), and Luke (17:26 ff.) naturally used Noah as a symbol of the judgment of God to come and of the urgency to win people for Christ's kingdom before Judgment Day.

Of course, the NT refers to Noah as a hero of faith and never questions whether it is a true story or not. The NT writers were not comparative religion scholars or textual critics. The story of Noah became part of Hebrew religion with its adoption by the Yahwist (J) one thousand years before Christ. According to the Yahwist, Noah was the first man to offer Yahweh sacrifices (although God did not reveal the sacred name until the time of Moses and the burning bush). Five hundred years later, the Priestly writer (P) tells us Noah was given a covenant by God, with the rainbow as the sign of God's promise to providentially preserve the world. Throughout the centuries, the story of the Flood illustrated the ethical character and just but loving nature of God.

The story of the "Great Flood" (or "Deluge") is the product of the religious imagination of the early Hebrews who borrowed it from their pagan neighbors and recast it (perhaps three thousand years after it was first written on clay tablets) in the terms of their developing monotheistic, ethical faith.

J.C.

FLORENCE, COUNCIL OF. A church council noted for achieving union with the Greek Orthodox Church. It was actually part of the conciliar struggle with the papacy for power in the aftermath of the COUNCIL OF CONSTANCE. A council to guide the church in keeping with the Frequens decree of Constance was long delayed. It finally met at Basel (1431-37). Sharp rivalries between pope and council created a split. Pope Eugene IV translated a minority to Ferrara, 1437-38; to Florence, 1439-42; and then to Rome, 1442-48. Meanwhile Basel elected a rival pope, Felix V (1439). Basel lost international interest and support, and Felix stepped down in 1449. The papacy had won over conciliar reform. Excitement soared at Ferrara. Seven hundred Greeks arrived, and the emperor and the patriarch of Constantinople met. The Greeks needed help against the Turks. Reluctantly, the Greeks acknowledged FILIOQUE (the Spirit proceeds from the Father and the Son) but refused to make it their symbol, and they insisted on keeping their own rites and the marriage of priests. Papal primacy remained ambiguous, each side interpreting "primacy" in its own way. One hundred and fifteen Latins and thirty-three Greeks signed the union document. The reunion was triumphantly celebrated in Florence on July 6, 1439. Union was also achieved with the Armenians in 1439 and the Jacobites in 1442. However, several Greek leaders retained objections, including Greek Bishop Mark of Ephesus. A real union was not actually achieved. Constantinople fell in 1453, and a synod in Constantinople (1472) revoked action at Florence.

C.M.

FONT. A basin, of stone or metal, generally resting on a pedestal, in which baptismal water is kept. The minister holds the child above the font and sprinkles or pours water on the child's head. Adults kneel for baptism. Although developed for infant baptisms, some early fonts could hold an adult.

J.C.

FOOTWASHING. A pious ritual, practiced since ancient times in the Eastern Orthodox and Roman Catholic churches, of washing the feet of worshippers at the Holy Communion service on Maundy Thursday. In recent years the pope has revived the custom of personally washing the feet of communicants at Maundy Thursday Mass, and the practice has been adopted by many Lutheran and other Protestant congregations.

The ritual is based on Jesus' washing the disciples' feet before the Last Supper, recorded in John 13:4-20, and referred to in I Timothy 5:10. The early Lutheran church rejected the ritual as a Roman Catholic attempt at righteousness by ceremonial works. It was elected as a preferred practice by Protestant sectarians after the Reformation, especially by Anabaptists and Mennonites, who saw in it a sign of brotherhood and humility. Among these groups, footwashing became a rite equal in sacredness to the Lord's Supper. The Anabaptists felt that the ritual was part of their desired return to the practices of the primitive church. They also felt that Jesus' command that the disciples ought to wash one another's feet should make the act obligatory for all Christians. Because of their understanding of the Lord's Supper as only a symbol of Christian fellowship, and not a sacrament, the acted parable of brotherly love seen in washing one another's feet seemed to have the same value as the communion itself. Later sectarians, "The Footwashing Baptists" and the Winebrennarians in the Church of God (after A.D. 1825), also adopted the practice.

J.C.

FORBEARANCE. In the RSV the noun "forbearance" and the verb "forbear" are used to translate a variety of Hebrew and Greek words. In several instances the word designates simply the act of refraining from a particular type of conduct (for example, I Kings 22:6, 15; II Chr. 18:5, 14; Job 16:6; Eph. 6:9). More often, however, it describes the tolerance and restraint demonstrated in the face of provocation and becomes nearly synonymous with PATIENCE and long-sufferance. God shows restraint toward persistently sinful humanity in hopes that such forbearance will lead to repentance (Rom. 2:4; II Pet. 3:9, 15; Jer. 15:15). God suspends judgment for a time and does not immediately respond with punishment (Rom. 3:25). The same quality of patience is expected of Christians in their relationships. They are to forbear "one another in love" (Eph. 4:2; Col. 3:13; II Cor. 6:6; Phil. 4:5; II Tim. 2:24).

C.B.C.

FORBIDDEN BOOKS. See INDEX OF PROHIBITED BOOKS.

FOREIGNER. To the ancient Hebrews, a Gentile, someone of another nation, ethnic group, or race. In the OT, this meant a worshiper of a false god or gods; an idolator (Exod. 20:10; in contrast to Israel, who is God's people, holy, "set apart," Deut. 14:2). All foreigners were seen as a threat, religiously and politically. The ancient Hebrews were called upon to be exclusivistic during the era of the conquest of Canaan (or at least the later historians claimed this, including the ban or war of extermination against the Canaanites), and much later, after the return of the Jews from Babylonian exile in 539 B.C. There were strict rules against mixed or foreign marriages (Exod. 34:15 and especially Ezra) and the worship of other, false, gods.

The occasional foreigner or stranger who settled among the Hebrews was to be treated fairly and justly, however. Such a settler was called a stranger or SOJOURNER (Exod. 20:10). Such strangers had definite rights according to the Law of Moses (Exod. 22:21; 12:19). They were to be treated respectfully, with kindness (Lev. 19:33 ff.; Deut. 10:18 ff.). The word "foreigner" occurs only in four places in the Bible: Exodus 12:45; Deuteronomy 15:3; Obadiah 11; and in the NT in Ephesians 2:19 KJV.

J.C.

FOREKNOWLEDGE. A person who has foreknowledge knows in advance what is going to happen, even while the events are still in the future. Usually, too, it is implied that this is a quite specific and detailed knowledge of what will happen, not just a general hunch. Obviously human beings do not possess foreknowledge; it is part of the finite human condition that the future is unknown, though indeed people can make intelligent guesses. But theologians and philosophers have commonly ascribed foreknowledge to God, and have believed that the future lies open to God. Sometimes this is part of the wider teaching that past, present, and future are all equally present to God.

The difficulty in such a view is that it seems to entail a strict DETERMINISM. If God already knows that A will murder B on such and such a date in such and such a year, then is not that event irrevocably fixed, and presumably all the intervening events that will lead up to it? What then becomes of human responsibility and FREE WILL? Where foreknowledge is identified with foreordaining (as in Calvin's theology), it does seem to be the case that one has opted for a rigid determinism and that the human experience of freely choosing one course of action rather than another is only an illusion.

There is a different interpretation of foreknowledge that avoids such unacceptable conclusions. Leibniz taught that God indeed foresees the entire future course of events, but that God's foreknowledge includes not only what will in fact happen but every other possible course of events. Thus, at any given moment, God has foreknowledge of all possible future events. Exactly what possibilities will be realized, even God does not know, but God's PROVIDENCE is able to cope with whatever is actualized within the total range of possibilities. On this view, room is left for the exercise of human freedom, and there is a measure of plasticity and openness in the cosmic process. It acknowledges the reality of divine foreknowledge but interprets the concept in a way that is compatible with the world we know in everyday experience.

A further question is raised by the foreknowledge ascribed to Jesus in the Gospels. In particular, he foretold to his disciples the coming events of his passion, death, and resurrection (Mark 9:31; etc.). It seems clear that what he foretold was a fairly specific account of the events, not just a premonition that Jerusalem would remain constant to its reputation for killing the prophets. Perhaps there was a time when this foreknowledge might have been taken as proper to the divinity of Christ and even as evidence for it, but it creates serious problems for modern scholarship. It suggests a kind of Docetism, as if Jesus only appeared to be a man and was really a divine figure in disguise. If there was indeed a true incarnation, then we cannot ascribe to the earthly Jesus the kind of foreknowledge that belongs only to God. As was said above, the finite human condition has no detailed knowledge of future events. So if Jesus was truly human, he too would have no detailed knowledge of the future, even if he could make intelligent guesses about the future course of events. So the tendency among scholars at present is to believe that the predictions of his death, put into the mouth of Jesus by the evangelists, were not actually spoken by him but reflect the evangelists' understanding of events as they recalled them many years after they had happened. It is claimed that this way of looking at the matter not only guards against Docetism, but increases our admiration for Jesus as one who had to face the future as we do, without any foreknowledge that things would turn out in one way rather than another. (Compare ELECTION, PREDESTINATION.)

J.M.

FOREORDINATION. See ELECTION.

FORESKIN. See CIRCUMCISION.

FORGIVENESS. There are three OT terms that enshrine its teaching on forgiveness, defined by the verbs kpr, "to expiate sin"; ns', "to lift, bear" the weight of guilt from the conscience; slb, a verb whose root meaning is unclear but which is normally rendered "to forgive," "to remit" sin's penalty.

The consistent teaching is that God alone may grant pardon to sinners (Ps. 130:3-4; compare Ps. 49:7-8) since SIN is, at its deepest level, thought of as directed against God (Ps. 51:4). God's nature is expressed in that God forgives sinners (Neh. 9:17; Dan. 9:9) as in the eloquent confession of Exodus 34:6-7. So forgiveness is an expression of God's GRACE. The sacrificial ritual that came to be thought of as a precondition of God's forgiveness in the postexilic period was itself a gift of God's (Lev. 17:11).

Graphic word pictures describe the divine action in forgiveness: God removes human guilt from one end of the world to the other (Ps. 103:12). God casts our sins behind his back (Isa. 38:17), and drowns them in the depths of the sea (Mic. 7:19). God remembers human transgressions no longer (Jer. 31:34) and blots them out forever (Isa. 43:25).

The NT writers stand in the Hebraic tradition in regarding God as the author of forgiveness, a prerogative that Jesus claimed in his ministry (Mark 2:1-12). God's grace is displayed in setting captives free (where sin is likened to a bond or chain; John 8:34; Rev. 1:5), and in cleansing the springs of human inner life—the conscience, the affections, the disposition—in an act that removes the polluting influence and thereby purifies (I Cor. 6:9-11; I John 1:7; Heb. 9:14; compare Jesus' teaching in Mark 7:14-23).

This teaching on God's gracious pardon is often set in contrast to the OT counterpart (in Heb., chaps. 8-10) where sin's forgiveness is described as limited and temporary, needing a repeated application. For the writer to the Hebrews, the new covenant offered a final and lasting relationship with God based on Christ's once-for-all SACRIFICE.

Forgiveness is tied in with Jesus' death and resurrection (Matt. 26:28) in apostolic preaching (Luke 24:47; Acts 5:31; 13:38) and instruction (Eph. 1:7-9), and is conditional on the exercise of faith (Acts 10:43) as a response of gratitude and obedience to the offer of divine grace.

Forgiveness too is a human attitude to be shown to those who do us wrong (as in the Lord's Prayer, Matt. 6:12; Luke 11:4; and Jesus' parables, such as Matt. 18:23-35). Paul's teaching picks up this requirement (Col. 3:12-13).

R. M.

FORM CRITICISM. See BIBLICAL CRITICISM.

FORNICATION. See ADULTERY.

FORSYTH, PETER TAYLOR (1848-1921). The Congregational minister whose writings anticipated the theology of Barth was born in Aberdeen, Scotland. After studying at the University of Aberdeen and at Göttingen, where he was deeply influenced by Albrecht Ritschl, he served Congregational churches in England, including Emmanuel Church, Cambridge, before becoming principal of Hackney Theological College, London. His works include The Person and Place of Jesus Christ (1909); Christ on Parnassus (1911), The Justification of God (1916), and Lectures on the Church and the Sacraments (1917).

N. H.

FOSDICK, HARRY EMERSON (1878-1969). The liberal minister, author, and teacher was born in Buffalo, New York, on May 24. Ordained a Baptist in 1903, he served in Montclair, New Jersey (1904-15), and then became associate at First Presbyterian

Courtesy of Union Theological Seminary Library Archives, New York City

Harry Emerson Fosdick

Church, New York City. There he drew crowds and the ire of Fundamentalists. His sermon "Shall the Fundamentalists Win?" on May 21, 1922, led eventually to his resignation (1925).

Called to Park Avenue Baptist Church, he requested construction of a larger, nondenominational church, so John D. Rockefeller, Jr., built Riverside Church, which Fosdick pastored from 1926 to 1946. He also preached on the nationwide radio show "National Vespers" (1926-46) and taught at Union Theological Seminary (1908-46). Fosdick authored The Manhood of the Master (1913), The Secret of Victorious Living (1934), On Being a Real Person (1943), A Faith for Tough Times (1952), and The Living of These Days, an Autobiography (1956). He also wrote the hymn "God of Grace and God of Glory."

N. H.

FOUR NOBLE TRUTHS. In BUDDHISM, these are a succinct summary of the basic message of the religion, attributed to the Buddha in his first sermon after his Enlightenment. They are presented in a form that has often been compared to a physician's assessment of a patient: symptom, diagnosis of the cause, prognosis, and lastly, a prescription designed to cure the ailment. This comparison not only affords a convenient outline of the Four Noble Truths, but also points to the essential nature of the Buddha's teaching as he saw it: not an overall metaphysical world view that would answer all possible questions, but a focused treatment designed to cure human suffering, more akin to modern psychotherapy than philosophy.

First is the truth of suffering (DUKKHA), often rendered "All life is suffering." This does not mean that all of human life is excruciating pain, which would be manifestly untrue, but that in all life as it is ordinarily lived there lie causes of suffering, whether in birth, aging, sickness, or death, or in that which seems to be good but brings suffering because it is transitory.

The second truth is that the cause of suffering is craving or attachment (tanha). This refers to craving for and attachment to specific objects of desire in this world of transitory phenomena. Attachment need not be toward gross sensual pleasures; the subtlest, most deeply rooted attachments are for such goals as fame, knowledge, immortality, and being itself—or for nonbeing, the "death wish." Most fundamentally, attachment is toward the ego, toward being a separate individual self, which according to Buddhism is a delusion contrary to the truth of anatman, "no self," and hence a snare leading to suffering. Because attachment is toward partial and passing-away objects, it can only result in pain.

The third truth, the "prognosis," is that there can be an end to craving or attachment. Craving arises through the senses, which the Enlightened One compared to a fire, burning on the fuel of objects perceived and imaged by them. The solution, then, is to cut the fuel supply and extinguish the fire; in other words, to give craving nothing on which to subsist, so that it will cease, and with it suffering.

The way to do this is through the fourth truth, the EIGHTFOLD PATH, which reorients life away from egocentric reaction to sensory stimuli, toward detached but compassionate freedom and finally NIRVANA. Significantly, the path culminates in right concentration or meditation, which in Buddhism is the sovereign practice for freeing oneself from bondage to suffering and desire because it cuts off sensory input and stills the restless mind.

R. E.

FOURSQUARE GOSPEL. The fundamentalist, charismatic summary of the Christian faith, taught by Holiness and PENTECOSTAL churches and sometimes espoused by neo-charismatics in recent years. According to Pentecostalism, the complete gospel message has four themes: justification by faith (upon an adult conversion experience, generally in a revivalistic setting); the experience of entire sanctification (complete holiness) through the baptism of the Holy Spirit (the "second blessing," which involves speaking in tongues); divine healing (faith healing); and premillenarianism (Jesus will return in the Second Coming before the one thousand-year reign of the saints). In the Pentecostal view Jesus is Savior, Sanctifier, Healer, and coming Lord.

The evangelist AIMEE SEMPLE MCPHERSON became famous as pastor of the Church of the Four Square Gospel in Los Angeles. Her flamboyant style brought her fame and fortune, although she flirted with scandal at one point in her career. After her death, the movement she headed continued in a pentecostal, fundamentalist denomination called The Church of the Four Square Gospel. The rise of the contemporary neo-Pentecostal movement has contributed to its growth. It has also benefited from the turn toward fundamentalism symbolized by the Moral Majority.

J. C.

FOX, GEORGE (1624–91). The founder of the QUAKERS was born in July 1624, the son of a weaver in Leicestershire. Apparently of Puritan background, Fox left home at eighteen and began preaching in the Midlands and the northern counties among the SEEKERS. He was most successful in the Lake District, gathering followers and fellow preachers, male and female, called Publishers of Truth. The loose groups gathered between 1649 and 1680 were called the

Courtesy of Religious News Service

George Fox

Society of Friends. Fox's radical reliance on the inner light and his denunciation of all creeds and ecclesiastical customs, as well as political and economic conventions, resulted in eight imprisonments between 1650 and 1674.

Upon his return from a missionary visit to Ireland in 1669, Fox married Margaret Fell, of Ulverston, Lancashire. Though they were a devoted and well-matched couple, they spent much time apart due to his missionary trips to the Caribbean and North America, 1671-73 and 1677, and to Holland and northern Europe in 1684.

About 1675 Fox began dictating a running summary of his life, which was published posthumously as his Journal. During his lifetime he published a number of tracts on social and theological matters. His Works were published in eight volumes in 1831. He died January 13, 1691, and was buried in the Quaker cemetery near Bunhill Fields, London.

N.H.

FOX, MARGARET (1833-93). With her younger sister Kate, she alleged communication with spirits through table rappings. Born on October 7 to John D. and Margaret Fox in Hydesville, New York, Margaret and Kate, promoted by an elder sister Leah Fox Fish, first appeared publicly in 1849.

Their "communications" sparked great interest in SPIRITUALISM. On October 21, 1888, Margaret exposed their work as a hoax in a speech at the New York Academy of Music, but she later recanted. She died on March 8 in Brooklyn.

N.H.

FOX, MARGARET FELL (1614-1702). The Quaker leader and wife of GEORGE FOX was born to John Askew of Lancashire. Tradition says she was the great-granddaughter of martyr Anne Askew. At seventeen she married Judge Thomas Fell and bore him eight children before his death in 1658. She met Fox in 1652 and became his ardent follower, suffering imprisonment three times. They married in 1669. She became leader of the Quaker women—preaching, teaching, writing, organizing. Margaret died on April 23 and was buried on her estate at Swarthmore Hall, Lancashire.

N.H.

FOX, JOHN (1516-87). The author of Book of Martyrs, Foxe was born in Boston, Lincolnshire, and studied at Oxford, where he held a fellowship for seven years. Ordained deacon in 1547, and priest in 1560, Foxe refused all church offices though he preached frequently.

Queen Mary's rise to power in 1553 forced him to flee to Strasbourg, France, where he completed and published the first draft of his book in 1554 in Latin. He visited Protestant leaders in Frankfurt and Basel. Returning to England at the beginning of Elizabeth I's reign in 1559, he published a full account of Protestant suffering from the fourteenth century to the present under the English title Actes and Monuments of These Latter and Perilous Dayes (1563). Subsequent editions were published in 1570, 1576, and 1583. It became a PURITAN classic and shaped British views of Roman Catholicism for at least a century. Foxe died April 18, 1587.

N.H.

FRACTION. The breaking of the host in the eucharistic liturgy. "The breaking of the bread" was synonymous with the Lord's Supper in the early church. In the Eastern Orthodox liturgy, the host is broken into four parts and arranged in the shape of a cross, then put in the chalice.

J.C.

FRANCIS OF ASSISI/FRANCISCANS. Giovanni di Bernardone (1182-1226), founder of the Franciscan Order. Son of a rich merchant of Assisi, he was a carefree, indulgent youth. Captured in a war with Perugia, he spent a year in prison, seriously ill. Returning to Assisi in 1202, he vowed to follow a life of poverty—begging, restoring churches, and helping lepers. Following a trip to Rome, a voice told him to repair God's house, but undue liberality with his father's goods landed him in jail. In court he stripped naked to symbolize a complete family break. Unstintingly he repaired chapels and attended lepers—the first to call him saint. On hearing Matthew 10:7-10, he began preaching the nearness of the Kingdom. Others joined him, particularly Bernard of Quintavalle, a rich merchant, and Peter Catani, a lawyer. In the freedom of renunciation they distributed their goods to the poor. Having dreamed a beggar was upholding the church, Pope Innocent III in 1210 reluctantly granted Francis' group informal approval. Using a few biblical injunctions for guidance, they continued helping others and denying themselves.

Returning in 1220 from an unsuccessful trip to Egypt to convert Muslims, Francis found discord about owning property. He feared ownership would lead to attachment to things; he feared rules would prompt pride in keeping them. Francis wanted neither, but the Franciscans' growing numbers necessitated both. An unhappy Francis consented to the Rule of 1221 enjoining poverty, chastity, obedience, standards of prayer, habits for novitiates, and general regulations. Spontaneity waned. The Third Rule, 1223, confirmed by Pope Honorius III, officially sanctioned the Franciscan Order and established papal supervision through appointment of a cardinal as corrector and protector. Learning was not encouraged, but by 1234 the Franciscans had a flourishing seminary at St. German des Pres. In 1212 St. Clare organized the Poor Clares for women. Francis organized the Tertiaries in 1221, for those still living normally in society. In 1224 while on Mount Alverno, Francis received the stigmata—the wounds of Christ. After forty days of fasting, he wrote the Hymn of the Sun, an Italian hymn of joy and praise for everything in God's world. Pope Gregory IX canonized Francis in 1228.

Most High Omnipotent, good Lord, to Thee
The praises and the honor and the glory be!
All blessings, O most High, befit Thee only,
And no man is worthy to speak of Thee!
Be praised, O My Lord, by all Thy creatures!
And chiefly by Monsignor Brother Sun,
Whom in the day Thou lightenest for us;
For fair is he and radiant with resplendence;
And of Thee, Most High, beareth he the semblance.

Be praised by Sister Moon and Stars of Night:
In Heaven Thou hast made them, precious, fair and bright.

Be praised, O My Lord, by Brother Wind,
By Air and Cloud and Sky and every Clime,
By whom Thou givest sustenance unto all kind!

By Sister Water, O My Lord, be praised!
Useful is she and lowly, precious and chaste.

Be praised, O My Lord, by Brother Fire,
By whom Thou lightenest our steps at night,
And fair is he and merry, masterful and of might!

Be praised, O My Lord, by our Mother, Sister Earth,
Who governeth and sustaineth us and giveth birth
To divers fruits and colored flowers and to herbs!

O bless and praise my Lord and thankful be
And serve My Lord with great humility!

Francis of Assisi's Hymn of the Sun

The Franciscans' insistence on total poverty silently criticized much church life and proved unworkable. The SPIRITUALS wanted to live strictly like Francis; the majority wanted accommodations. After prolonged disputes Pope John XXII in 1318 decided against the Spirituals and permitted ownership by the order. Many Spirituals became schismatics, known as Fraticelli, and suffered persecution. The order declined. Eventually reform-minded Observants challenged the lax group called Conventualists and gained recognition and a separate vicar-general in 1443. By 1517 the Observants were declared the true Order of St. Francis. Matteo da Bascio's reform in the sixteenth century led to formation of the Capuchins. Political upheavals in the eighteenth and nineteenth centuries spawned other reform groups. The order was finally reunited and revitalized by Pope Leo XIII in 1897. Bonaventure, Duns Scotus, and William of Occam are among its greatest scholars. Mission and social service have marked its history. C.M.

FRANCIS OF SALES (1567–1622). French Roman Catholic prelate, preacher, writer, and leader in the CATHOLIC REFORMATION. Born a noble in Savoy, he pursued studies in philosophy, classics, law, and theology at Paris and Padua, and despite family objections became a priest in 1593. Sent to win Chablais back to Roman Catholicism, he tried persuasion, then resorted to conversion by force. Pope Clement VIII in 1597 directed him to recover Geneva. Officially, he was bishop of Geneva, which he viewed as a den of heretics by 1602, but Beza, the aged successor of Calvin, kept him from functioning there. In 1610 he helped found the Visitation of Our Lady for handicapped people barred from other orders. Famed for An Introduction to the Devout Life (1608) and Treatise on the Love of God (1616), he converted thousands to Catholicism. Canonized in 1665 and made a doctor in 1877, he ranks as one of Catholicism's greatest leaders.

C.M.

FRANCIS XAVIER (1506–52). Early Spanish Jesuit missionary to the Orient. An aristocrat by birth, he was born in Pamplona, and studied for a religious career at the University of Paris. He practiced IGNATIUS OF LOYOLA's spiritual exercises and was one of six chosen by him to form the SOCIETY OF JESUS. They took vows in the church of St. Mary on Montmartre in 1534, and received papal approval in 1540. Ordained a priest in 1537, Xavier began his missionary activities in 1541 when he left Lisbon and traveled to India. Skilled in languages, he preached and established missions around Goa, extending his work into South India and Ceylon. In 1545 he reached Malacca and traveled the Malay Archipelago for two years. After returning to Goa, he sailed for Japan, landing at Kagoshima in 1549. During two years in Japan, he spent one year studying the language and one year preaching. By 1551 he had established several Christian missions. He died on the island of Sancion trying to get into China. His baptisms were hasty, without much instruction, and he depended heavily on children memorizing prayers, songs, and ceremonies. But he sowed the seeds of Catholicism and was canonized in 1622.

C.M.

FRANCKE, AUGUST H. (1663–1727). Renowned German Pietist, educator, and pastor. Born at Lübeck, he studied philosophy at Erfurt and Kiel and in 1685 became a lecturer at Leipzig University. Influenced by PHILIP J. SPENER, Francke started devotional biblical studies at Leipzig, and his interest in PIETISM deepened. By 1689 his lectures were attracting crowds. However, opponents forced him to leave Leipzig (1690) and Erfurt (1692). He then joined the new Halle University and preached at nearby Glaucha. In 1698 he became a full member of Halle's theological faculty, making it a pietistic center that strongly influenced Lutheranism. His many enterprises won wide acclaim: a pauper's school, an orphanage, Bible institute, Latin school, dispensary, publishing plant, and related facilities—all, he claimed, in answer to prayer for relieving human need. His Marvellous Footsteps of Divine Providence (London, 1707) prompted many foreigners to support his work. Francke's most valuable accomplishment was the founding of Francke Institutes at Halle, which is still active.

C.M.

FRANKINCENSE. The aromatic gum resin of trees grown in Africa and Arabia of the genus boswellia. Since it gives off a fragrant odor when burned, frankincense was widely used as a part of the cult, especially in the OFFERING of SACRIFICES (for example, Lev. 2:1-2, 15-16). Levitical rules declared that it be used only for sacred purposes (Exod. 30:37-38). Together with gold and myrrh, frankincense was one of the expensive gifts brought by the magi in Matthew's account of the infant Jesus (2:11).

C.B.C.

FRANKL, VICTORE. (1905– ). Psychiatrist and author. Born in Vienna in 1905, Frankl received an M.D. from the University of Vienna in 1930 and a Ph.D. in 1949. He founded and was head of a youth advocacy center in Vienna (1928–38) and was on the staff of the Neuro-psychiatric Clinic (1930–38). He headed the Neurological Poliklinik Institute at Vienna (1946–70) and was a professor at the University of Vienna during the 1950s and 1960s.

The break in his professional life came from 1942 to 1945, when he was imprisoned in a concentration camp. This experience greatly influenced him. According to Frankl, only those who have an indestructible sense of the personal self can survive such brutal attempts to erase selfhood. His aim since then has been to build self-affirmation in people. He founded the school of logotherapy, or existential analysis, and has been professor of logotherapy at the United States International University, San Diego, since 1970. He also chairs the board of the Logotherapy Institute.

Frankl does not believe that uncovering the past, as in classical PSYCHOANALYSIS, can be helpful in therapy. Rather, he focuses on the future. His basic book, Man's Search for Meaning—An Introduction to Logotherapy (1963), interprets logos as "meaning" and is designed to instill in people a sense of meaning for their lives. One of his more recent interests has been in personal journal keeping as a way of developing the self.

I.C.

FRAZER, SIR JAMES GEORGE (1854–1941). Scottish-born anthropologist and folklorist. He spent most of his career at Cambridge, and through his immense work of collecting and synthesizing data, largely on archaic religion from around the world, he did much to shape modern comparative religious studies. His multi-volumed major work, The Golden Bough: A Study in Magic and Religion, was first published in 1890. While Frazer's belief that magic preceded religion is no longer accepted, his basic definition of magic as the attempt to manipulate supernatural entities and forces, and religion as the supplication of them, remains influential. His work also served to isolate important areas of religious typology and define problems for future study; in particular this was the case with the sacred king. At the same time, Frazer was perhaps the last of the great armchair anthropologists. He traveled little, depending on the reports of missionaries, explorers, and colonial officials, as well as wide reading, for the material that went into his encyclopedic project.

R.E.

FREE CHURCHES. Free churches are churches free of government or external ecclesiastical control and are self-supporting. The term is usually applied to such churches as the Baptists in Scotland, the Presbyterians in England, the Waldensians in Italy, and the Mission Covenant Church in Sweden. Two-fifths of the churches represented at the 1948 meeting of the World Council of Churches in Amsterdam were free churches.

The term was first appropriated by the four nonepiscopal evangelical communions in England that convened the Free Church Congress in 1892 and in 1896 formed the National Council of the Evangelical Free Churches. They were the Baptists, Congregationalists, Methodists, and Presbyterians. Known as PURITANS before 1662, then NONCONFORMISTS, then DISSENTERS, such denominations came to prefer the term "free churches" in the late nineteenth century.

The "free church tradition" stems from the ANABAPTISTS of the left-wing Protestant Reformation, with their emphasis on NT church order, believer's baptism, the leading of the Holy Spirit rather than human authority, Communion as a memorial, the priesthood of all believers, and the separation of church and state. The tradition is opposed to the parochial patterns of medieval Christianity and the territorial churches of the magisterial Reformation. They insisted on the fellowship of visible, regenerate saints and tend toward local church autonomy.

In worship they favor free or spontaneous prayers, hymns and gospel songs, and an emphasis on preaching over liturgy. Their pietistic fervor led to the missionary movement. Some argue that their emphasis on the local church fostered grass roots democracy. They denied the state the right to compel belief, and some refused to take civil oaths or to bear arms. They also attempted to mold public life around the imperatives of the gospel.

N.H.

FREEDOM. A key NT term that is one of the benefits accruing to Christians from the redemption wrought by Christ. But there is a clear OT anticipation which, on balance, is the more likely source of the NT terminology than other parallels (for example, drawn from the setting free of slaves by act of manumission in Greco-Roman society).

The OT consistently harks back to the Exodus as a time recalled in Israel's national consciousness when Yahweh intervened to set free the tribes from Egyptian overlordship (for example, Deut. 26:5-11). The purpose of God's deliverance was to constitute those tribes, under Moses and Joshua, as covenant people and install them in Canaan, the Land of Promise. Their continued freedom would be contingent on their remaining in the covenant relationship, an obedience that was the pledge of life (Deut. 30:15-20).

The NT exploits this background, specifically by calling the death and resurrection of Jesus a new Exodus (Luke 9:31) with covenant overtones (Luke 22:28-30; I Cor. 5:7, 8; I Pet. 1:18, 19) and regarding the church's freedom as one of being set free from bondage to sin (Gal. 4:4-6; Rom. 8:15-25); and summoned to a life of freedom in worship as the new Israel of God (Rom. 12:1, 2; I Pet. 2:4-10). The call is one of obedience (Rom. 6:17; I Pet. 1:14) to new standards of ethical endeavor, both personal (Rom. 6:5-23; Gal. 5:1, 13, 15) and in society (Rom. 12:4-21; I Cor. 7:17-24), that are grounded in freedom from all manner of evil bondage. R.M.

FREE MASONRY. The teachings and practices of the secret fraternal order of Free and Accepted Masons, one of the largest worldwide secret societies. Though begun in England, 4 million out of an estimated 5.9 million members live in the United States. Originally evolving from guilds of stonemasons and cathedral builders of the Middle Ages, they began to accept honorary members. In the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries they adopted rites and trappings of more ancient religious orders and chivalric brotherhoods and thus developed free-masonry's modern symbolic or speculative aspects. The first Grand Lodge, an association of lodges, was formed in England in 1717.

The Masons are not a religious institution though they are sometimes mistaken for one. They have been opposed by organized religion, particularly Roman Catholicism, and are banned in Communist countries. In turn Masons have been charged with bigotry against Jews, Catholics, and nonwhites. The group has basically three levels—apprentice, fellow of the craft, master mason—but numerous "degrees," which vary from country to country. Female relatives of master masons can join the Order of Eastern Star. Youth organizations include the Order of De Molay and the Order of Builders for boys and the Order of Job's Daughters and the Order of Rainbow for girls.

N.H.

FREE WILL. The concept of human freedom to choose between good and evil; the opposite of DETERMINISM. Human responsibility for actions is implicit in most biblical writings, and the majority of Christian thinkers have assumed human free will in moral matters. The concept of CONSCIENCE, so basic to later Greek thought and to Paul's arguments for universal sinfulness in Romans 1, also assumes moral free will. The problems that have plagued theology in the questions about human free will have had to do not with human guilt and responsibility, but with the reconciliation of the assumed human capacity to choose, and with the confusion of moral free will with a supposed ability (granted by God) on people's part to accept or reject God's salvation. This brought human free will into conflict with God's SOVEREIGNTY, omnipotence, and omniscience. In another area, Christian theologians have had to defend human free will against materialistic determinisms, like the atomism of Democritus, dialectical materialism (classical Marxism), and logical positivism; the last entailing the denial of all inner states of mind, including both determinism and freedom of the will.

The usual outlines of the debates over human free will versus God's determinism (that is, PREDESTINATION, PROVIDENCE, FOREKNOWLEDGE, foreordination) would include the struggle of Augustine (who died in A.D. 430) in De libero arbitrio, and Pelagius (a British monk living in Rome in the late fifth century A.D.) over the absolute necessity of God's grace to be operational in a person before his or her will could be so moved as to choose the genuine good. It would also include the work of Beothius on God's foreknowledge (he declared that God does know all that will happen, but God's knowledge is outside of time, in eternity, so that God's previous knowledge of what people will choose does not cause them to choose as they do). Another example is the conflict documented in Luther's De Servo Arbitrio (On the Bound Will) between Erasmus of Rotterdam, the humanist, and Martin Luther (1491-1546), the Protestant reformer, whose theology was based on Paul and Augustine, both of whom were predestinarians. And, finally, the later (second generation of the Reformation) work of John Calvin, who opted for strict predestination, indeed, for so-called "double predestination," in which people are elected by God for heaven or hell from before the foundation of the earth. Other reformed theologians, following Calvin, like Jonathan Edwards (eighteenth century) denied human free will altogether. More liberal theologians resisted this "hard shell" position and, like John Wesley, sought to find a place for human free will without denying God's grace. Most such theologians, like Wesley, followed the lead of JACOB ARMINIUS of the Lowlands, who denied the double predestination and limited Atonement (Christ died only for the elect) doctrines of the Synod of Dort.

Much later, Immanuel Kant sought to make a place for human moral freedom in his Critique of the Practical (that is, moral) Reason. Kant said we are free because we feel free. We are not conscious of being determined in our choices. He argued that a moral code demands freedom, indeed, establishes the fact of human freedom, since ought implies can. Kant, by recourse to his famous dichotomy of the universe into phenomena (that is, the outer, material world) and noumena (the inner, mental world), resolved this by saying that people are determined phenomenally but free noumenally (that is, our thoughts are free).

In a general sense Protestantism has emphasized a person's lack of, or severe defects in, freedom of the will. This is the case despite the decisions of the councils held at Carthage from 416 to 419, which made Augustine's teaching on predestination the official position of the Catholic Church.

J.C.

FREE WILL BAPTIST CHURCH. See BAPTIST CHURCHES.

FREUD, SIGMUND (1856–1939). Austrian physician and neurologist and founder of psychoanalysis. Freud was born in Freiberg, Moravia (now Czechoslovakia), moved with his family to Leipzig three years later, and then to Vienna, where he lived until a year before his death.

Educated at the University of Vienna in the field of medicine, he began work on the staff of a psychiatric clinic, engaged in research, and was appointed a lecturer at the university in neuropsychology.

Freud's first work with Josef Breuer (with some attention to Charcot's work at Paris) convinced him that symptoms with no physiological basis could be alleviated by hypnosis and therefore had a psychogenic basis. In 1895 he published, with Breuer, Studies in Hysteria. Their conclusions were not well accepted by the medical profession, but the book probably marked the beginning of the PSYCHOANALYSIS movement.

In 1897, Freud began a self-analysis, something which most psychiatrists would not attempt, but which gave him new insights for his theories, including that of childhood sexuality and the "oedipal complex." Freud viewed sexuality as one of the bases for adult behavior. During 1895–99 he did the research that resulted in Interpretation of Dreams, one of his most important works.

The Vienna Psychoanalytical Circle began at Freud's house in 1902, where a distinguished gathering grew but was later torn apart by differences. In 1909 he was pleased by the invitation to lecture in the United States under the auspices of E. Stanley Hall, president of Clark University. In 1912, he developed his theory of the unconscious in a lecture to the London Society for Psychical Research. The Ego and the Id, written in 1923, developed his tripartite understanding of the person as Id-Ego-Superego. The Future of an Illusion (1927) and Moses and Monotheism (1939) are two of his philosophical discussions of religion. Freud, who was Jewish, stayed in Vienna until the Nazi soldiers came to his door. Only then was he persuaded to move to London, where he died a year later. Freud was an original thinker whose ideas changed human thinking. He ignored the socioeconomic factors in psychological development and minimized the nature-nurture elements. He opened the understanding of the depths of the person as no one before him had.

I.C.

FRIAR. A title first used by MENDICANT orders in the Middle Ages, signifying "brother." It stresses the brotherhood of humility and Christian witness. Friars wandered throughout the cities and countryside begging, preaching, and aiding the poor and sick. The title is widely used in the reformed orders since Vatican II.

J.C.

FRIENDS OF GOD. A loosely organized mystical group, laity and clergy, in southwestern Germany and Switzerland in the fourteenth century. They wrote letters and distributed books signed "a Friend of God." They stressed personal piety and oneness with God over ordinary church life. Luther published their German Theology twice.

C.M.

FRIENDS, SOCIETY OF (Quakers). A mystical reform movement in English Protestantism that grew out of the "Inner Light" experiences and preaching of GEORGE FOX and other itinerant preachers in the mid-seventeenth century. Persecuted from their origins around 1650, the Quakers spread their unique message throughout Britain, Ireland, North Europe, the British colonies in America, and the West Indies within a few years. These early missionaries were called "First Publishers of Truth."

The first half century of Quaker activity was stormy, since their principles made them offensive to most classes of society. Strong disapproval by the public was punctuated by occasional mob violence. By the end of the seventeenth century, restrictive legislation was passed against the Friends. Against all this persecution, the Quakers responded with public non-resistance, refusing to go "underground" and meet in secret.

The Quaker tenets that raised such opposition were: rejection of compulsory church attendance; rejection of military service; disregard of social conventions, such as the use of "my Lord" and other such titles for the aristocracy; rejection of judicial oaths; a strong anti-papal outlook; anti-clericalism; and rejection of formality in worship and belief in creeds.

The Quakers claimed that only beliefs and practices recorded in the NT should be permitted. They pointed out that there is no use of the term "saint" for persons or churches (as in St. John's) in the NT, and no precedence for observing Christmas and other Christian holidays. There was also no basis for tithes, or for weddings in churches, by a priest with a ring, which they condemned as relics of medieval superstition. The Quakers even rejected the Bible as the basis for church authority; for although they studied it, they did not accept it as the only rule of faith and practice. The Quakers preferred a divine, immediate revelation within to the authority of church, creed, or Bible. Because of their lack of a creed, the Quakers permitted a wide variety of beliefs to develop, and this condition exists to this day.

Because of their opposition to ritual in worship, even to the informal services of the Protestant sects, the Quakers adopted the practice of spontaneous, unprogrammed, cooperative group worship. They had no formal leadership or ordained ministry. They did not consecrate buildings or altars, had no music, readings, or liturgy. They did not even recognize the sacraments of baptism in water or the Lord's Supper in bread and wine. Early proponents of equality of the sexes, both men and women spoke and prayed whenever they felt the Spirit move them. The most striking feature of Quaker worship was—and is—silence.

A polity evolved consisting of a union called the local meeting, which was formed into ever larger units called monthly, quarterly, and yearly meetings. On an international level, Quakers unite in fellowship in the World Committee on Consultation. Within the society, leadership is recognized as existing without human appointment. No distinction is made between laity and clergy or men and women.

The Society in America has participated in all the social, political, and theological movements that gave rise to so many revivals, sects, and social reforms. The Quakers have been affected, experiencing schism in 1827 and after. A sensitivity to social needs, especially to the suffering of black slavery and the injustices done to the native Americans, characterizes American Quakerism. Throughout their history, to the present day, Quakers have worked for prison reform, better treatment for the mentally ill, opposition to war, and for international relief for refugees and others. This social leadership won for the Quakers the Nobel Peace Prize in 1947, and makes them influential beyond their actual numbers.

J.C.

FROMM, ERICH (1900–80). Psychoanalyst and social philosopher born in Frankfurt, Germany. He believed that many emotional problems arise from the stresses of modern society and that only by building a society responsive to human needs can there be harmonious social interactions that promote mental health. He envisioned an improved human nature developed through love and based on ethical living.

Fromm graduated from the University of Munich in 1924, and the Psychoanalytic Institute in Berlin (1925), where he was educated in Freudian principles, which he applied to social, economic, and cultural questions, an unorthodox approach. He left Germany in 1934, and lectured at Columbia University until 1941. His book Escape from Freedom (1941) was an influential intellectual and political philosophy, which posited that some people prefer not to be free. He taught at Bennington College (Vermont), 1941–50, and wrote Man for Himself in 1947. It is his thesis in this book that individuals must take personal responsibility for their decisions and actions. From 1957 to 1961, Fromm taught at Michigan State University and became professor of psychiatry at New York University in 1962.

Although he used insights from FREUD and JUNG, he affirmed that psychiatric therapy tended to encourage people toward conformity (adjustment) rather than autonomy. He wrote several books in the area of religion, such as, The Dogma of Christ and Other Essays on Religion, Psychology, and Culture (1963). His views were, understandably, unorthodox.

I.C.

FUJI, MOUNT. Virtually the trademark of Japan, Mount Fuji, also known as Fujiyama, is a dormant volcano some seventy-five miles southwest of Tokyo. Of exceptional beauty, it is a place of pilgrimage now visited by more than 100,000 people every summer. Fuji is given scattered notice in early poetry and other literature and was a haunt of yamabushi, mountain ascetics whose esoteric Buddhist practice owed much to shamanism, at least since the early Middle Ages. But it was not until around the beginning of the Tokugawa period in 1600, when the relatively nearby city of Edo (modern Tokyo) became the capital and metropolis of Japan, that its cultus took on exceptional popularity. Takematsu Hasegawa (known as Kakugyo, sixteenth century) taught that the mountain was the earthly abode of the supreme god. From his doctrine came two Fuji-centered Shinto sects, Jikkō-kyō and Fusō-kyō, still active. But for most pilgrims the mountain's spiritual importance is no doubt conceptualized more vaguely, yet related to a general deep-seated Japanese belief that mountains are places for inner transformation and access to the Other World of gods and Buddhas.

R.E.

FULL GOSPEL BUSINESSMEN'S FELLOWSHIP INTERNATIONAL. A Pentecostal layman's association founded in Los Angeles in 1951 by Demos Chakarian, a businessman, and Oral Roberts, the evangelistic faith healer. The association exists for fellowship of charismatics and to promote the spread of the experience of baptism by the Holy Spirit. Membership has grown steadily, and witnessing by members has contributed to the interest in the reception of the Holy Spirit and speaking in tongues, as well as in divine healing, which helped bring about the neo-Pentecostal movement in mainstream Protestant churches and among Roman Catholics. The movement has spread to many countries, especially to other English-speaking nations and throughout Latin America. Its theology is fundamentalistic, in its PENTECOSTAL form, and members are actively evangelistic in spreading the message of the need to receive the Holy Spirit and speak in tongues.

Mount Fuji, Japanese silk hanging scroll

J.C.

FULLNESS OF TIME. The sole occurrence of this phrase is found in Galatians 4:4 KJV; the text runs in RSV, "But when the time had fully come, God sent forth his Son, born of woman. . . ." The point of the Pauline phrase is to assert, in the context of his discussion with his readers, that the appointed time of their emancipation from servitude to alien powers had come (4:3). The time phrase relates back to verse 2 where, in Roman law, the heir attained legal and civic rights when he became of age (at fourteen years).

In theology the phrase has taken on a different meaning. It refers to the outworking of divine providence in the course of history, leading up to the coming of Christ. Irenaeus and Augustine saw that God's age-old plan culminated when "the time" was ready, politically and culturally, and above all in the desire humankind had for a new beginning to world history. The most noble anticipation lies in Virgil's Fourth Eclogue, where the poet yearns for the arrival of "the last age" (ultima aetas), which will be "the golden age" of world peace, following the birth of a boy who will lead a "new breed of men sent down from heaven." John Milton borrowed these ideas in his poem "Ode on the Morning of Christ's Nativity" and set them in a Christian context, finding in Virgil a prophet of Christmas and a true praeparatio evangelica, or anticipation, of what God would do "in the fullness of time."

R.M.

FUNDAMENTALISM. A term derived from a series of twelve booklets on conservative Protestant Christian theology published and mailed to three million people over the years 1910-15 by two wealthy Los Angeles laymen, Lyman and Milton Stewart. These booklets attacked naturalism, which conservatives believed to be the basis of contemporary liberal theology in various American Protestant denominations. Entitled simply The Fundamentals, these works expounded "the five fundamentals" adopted by the General Assembly of the Presbyterian Church in the U.S.A. in 1910, and ratified again in 1916 and 1923.

These included: the INERRANCY of the Scriptures in the original documents, the deity of Jesus Christ and his VIRGIN BIRTH, the substitutionary theory of the ATONEMENT, the physical resurrection of Christ, and Christ's miracles. To these original "five fundamentals," conservatives also added ORIGINAL SIN (human natural depravity), justification by faith, the personal, physical return of Jesus Christ (the Second Coming), and a literal heaven and hell. Many Fundamentalists are also premillennialists, who believe in the physical return of Christ at the end of the "age," whereupon he and his saints will literally reign on earth for one thousand years. (PREMILLENNIALISM declares Christ's Second Coming will be just before the millennium, and holds that human history will degenerate more and more until Christ's return.)

As a movement within conservative Protestantism, Fundamentalism exists in most English-speaking countries but especially in the United States, Canada, and Great Britain. The major characteristics of those generally identified as Fundamentalists include a strong emphasis on the total inerrancy of the Bible, which is believed to be free of any error, even in matters of science, chronology, and geography; a strong dislike of modern theology and particularly of modern biblical criticism; and a belief that people who don't share Fundamentalist beliefs are not Christian.

Fundamentalism, in its struggle with LIBERALISM—or today more generally with more moderate conservative Protestants—split several denominations and caused loss of membership. No major denominations became Fundamentalist, but a number of smaller ones in the United States did. In Great Britain, no denomination became Fundamentalist, although wings of various communions became dominated by conservative believers.

Fundamentalism began and continues as an ecumenical or interdenominational phenomenon. People from various backgrounds—Presbyterian, Methodist, Baptist, and Disciples—joined together in prophetic conferences, revivals, Bible conferences, Bible schools, federations, ministers' groups, and through religious literature and later radio and, more recently, television programs, to promote their conservative beliefs.

For most Fundamentalists the legitimate translation of the Bible is the Authorized Version, the King James Version. However, Fundamentalists often prefer to use the Scofield Reference Bible, an Authorized Version text to which the Reverend CYRUS I. SCOFIELD added his own interpretive notes and annotations. Scofield, a Congregational minister, interpreted the Bible's salvation history in dispensational and premillennial terms, publishing his work in 1909. A new edition was issued in 1919 and another as recently as 1966.

The number of Fundamentalists in America has never been determined. John Warwick Montgomery, conservative Lutheran Church—Missouri Synod clergyman, estimates their number at seventeen million. The difficulty of distinguishing Fundamentalism from EVANGELICALISM makes an exact census impossible, especially so since some Fundamentalists call themselves Evangelicals.

Fundamentalism, like the revivalism out of which it grew, has had a colorful history. BILLY SUNDAY, the famous evangelist, was identified with Fundamentalism, as was William Jennings Bryan, politician, temperance advocate, populist leader, and attorney at the famous SCOPES MONKEY TRIAL in Tennessee. John Gresham Machen, a Presbyterian seminary professor who split the theological faculty at Princeton and founded a Fundamentalist seminary of his own, became the scholarly authority for the movement. The Presbyterian Church in the U.S.A. expelled Machen from its ministry in 1935, and he thereupon founded the Presbyterian Church of America (1936). The name was changed in 1939 to the Orthodox Presbyterian church. Out of this group the very conservative Carl McIntyre of Collinswood, New Jersey, led a small band who founded the Bible Presbyterian Synod in 1937. McIntyre became a strong anti-Communist and a promoter of Taiwan, South Korea, South Africa, and other repressive governments during the McCarthy Era and continued in this activity through the Vietnam War.

Fundamentalist leaders tend to be authoritarian, single leader personalities, who often fail to develop lay leadership and are unwilling to cooperate with non-Fundamentalist leaders. Historically, Fundamentalism remains a diverse, uncentered movement, an expression of the divisive, sectarian spirit.

In the 1970s, Fundamentalism had a strong resurgence, due to the social turmoil of the Vietnam War, the accumulated culture shock of new scientific and social developments, and the growing strength of Communism in the world. Today the MORAL MAJORITY, under leaders like the Reverend Jerry Falwell, who clearly states himself to be a separatistic Fundamentalist, continues the attacks on Liberals in the churches, on evolution, on contemporary lifestyles (especially sexual mores), and on the threat of Communism that have marked Fundamentalist rhetoric since World War I. The National Council of Churches is a target of contemporary Fundamentalists, just as its predecessor, the Federal Council of Churches, was attacked by earlier Fundamentalists like J. Frank Norris, John Roach Straton, and William Bell Riley.

J.C.

FUNDAMENTAL THEOLOGY. In Catholic theology, the basic teaching that God is revealed and that this revelation is totally presented in Jesus Christ, who founded the Christian church on St. Peter, and that the church continues to bear witness to that revelation throughout human history. Fundamental theology has been presented in various ways throughout Catholic history, in historical, philosophical, and theological ways. Today it is chiefly presented in a theological manner, as (in Anselm's words) faith seeking understanding.

This faith, the innate desire of people to know God, is directed toward the Word of God—Scripture—preserved, explained, and transmitted through the people of God—the universal church. Fundamental theology thus combines both faith and reason, theology and philosophy, revealed truth and human intellectual development. Basically, Catholic theologians have proceeded on an ontological basis, seeing humankind as open to the revelation of God, which shines through all being. The most basic elements of fundamental theology are, then, the fact of God's revelation and the certain preservation and transmission of this supernatural knowledge through the Catholic church. Among modern Catholic theologians, KARL RAHNER has distinguished himself by dealing extensively with questions of fundamental theology.

J.C.

FUTURE LIFE. Compare IMMORTALITY.

Gg

GABRIEL. A messenger of God sent to interpret visions and to announce good news. In Hebrew the word means "warrior of God" or "God has shown himself mighty." Gabriel appears to Daniel to explain to him his dreams and to give him wisdom and understanding (Dan. 8:15-27; 9:21-27). In the NT he is the one who announces to Zechariah as he prays in the Temple that his wife Elizabeth will have a son to be named John (Luke 1:8-20) and announces to Mary that she will bear a son to be named Jesus (Luke 1:26-35). In the pseudepigraphal books of I and II Enoch, Gabriel's functions are more precisely defined.

C.B.C.

GAD. The name of one of the twelve tribes of ancient Israel, named for the oldest son of Jacob, by his wife Zilpah (Gen. 30:10 ff.; 35:26). The territory allotted to Gad in the Promised Land was northeast of the Dead Sea between the Jordan River on the west and ancient Ammon on the east and ran north to approximately the valley of the Jabbok River. Gad is referred to as the land of GILEAD in the book of Judges (chap. 11). Fierce, continual warfare between the tribe of Gad and the Ammonites called forth the judge, Jephthah, who delivered Gad from its foes (Judg. 11). The tribe of Gad supported David in the struggle with Saul, but at the death of Solomon revolted along with Jeroboam, helping to create the northern kingdom of Israel. At the fall of Samaria to Assyria, the tribe was taken into captivity by Tiglath-pileser III (733 B.C.).

Another Gad was a prophet in the days of David (I Chr. 21:9 ff.). He condemned the counting of the people of Israel, served in the worship of Yahweh, and left a history of David's administration (I Sam. 22:5; II Sam. 24:11 ff.; I Chr. 29:29; II Chr. 29:25).

After the Exile, a spirit or god of good luck named Gad had a cult following in Judah (Isa. 65:11).

J.C.

GAIUS. There seems to be four different people in the NT who bear the name Gaius.

(1) A believer at Corinth, baptized by Paul and recognized for his hospitality (I Cor. 1:14; Rom. 16:23).

(2) A traveling companion of Paul from Macedonia, involved in the riot at Ephesus (Acts 19:29).

(3) A person from Derbe who is listed among those accompanying Paul on his last trip to Asia (Acts 20:4). He could possibly be the same person mentioned in Acts 19:29.

(4) An influential Christian to whom III John (v. 1) is written. (See CALIGULA.)

C.B.C.

GALATIA. The name Galatia (given in Gal. 1:2) covers a wide region of Asia Minor, modern Turkey. The Greek term for these inhabitants was Celts, and strictly in the context of Paul's Letter to the Galatians it refers to those who lived in the area around Ancyra (modern Ankara) who left Gaul (France) in the fourth century B.C. and settled there soon after 280 B.C. In the first century B.C., the Roman Emperor Augustus reorganized the kingdom as a province of the empire under a legate. In Luke's (Acts 16:6; 18:23) and Paul's day, Galatia reached from the northern region of Pontus around the Black Sea (see I Pet. 1:1) to the Mediterranean. Debate has continued on the thorny issue: Did the recipients of Paul's letter live in the northern part of the region (Provincia Galatia) or in the south, around the Phrygian and Lycaonian cities of Pisidian Antioch and others (Acts 13, 14)? Currently the weight of research is on the side of the former view, but that Paul wrote to churches on the south side of the Anatolian plateau is still defensible.

R.M.

GALATIANS, LETTER TO THE. A letter from Paul addressed to Christian congregations scattered throughout an extensive area of GALATIA, a province in Asia Minor (modern Turkey).

Identity. The name "Galatia" (Gal. 1:2, see 3:1 for the inhabitants) covered a wide region in Paul's day reaching from the northern district of Pontus around the Black Sea (see I Pet. 1:1) to the Mediterranean. The precise location of the churches to which this letter was sent is debated. One view sees the recipients as living in Provincia Galatia in the north of the region (the references in Acts 16:6 and 18:23 are apparently to this district). The alternate theory views the letter as sent to churches established on Paul's so-called first missionary journey, that is, churches in south Galatia with centers in Antioch, Iconium, Lystra, and Derbe (Acts 13, 14). This position has been advocated on the basis of detailed historical and geographical research based on nineteenth-century travelers' personal survey of the terrain in Asia Minor and its archaeological significance coupled with a study of epigraphy and classical literature. If we take the evidence of Paul's travels in Acts at face value as historically accurate and detailed, the latter view has much to commend it.

Interpreters who argue for a sending of the letter to south Galatian congregations tend generally to link this view with a dating prior to the Jerusalem Council of A.D. 50, thus making the letter the earliest Pauline document to survive. On the other hand, a placing of the recipients in the north of the Roman province means that they cannot have been evangelized before the time of Acts 16 (after the council—Acts 15), and thus the letter belongs to Paul's later ministry, while he was at Ephesus (A.D. 54–55).

The Nature of the Trouble. The question relates to the situation in Galatia referred to in 1:6–9 and 5:10, 12, where Paul remarked that a grave crisis had broken out in the churches in Galatia. False teachers had appeared on the scene, and their aim was evidently to unsettle Paul's converts. We have to ask what precisely this new teaching was.

The traditional view is that these men were Judaizing Christians aiming to promote the necessity of CIRCUMCISION as needful to Gentile Christians who would be assured of complete salvation and full membership of the new Israel, the church (5:2; 6:12 ff.).

But if they were Jewish teachers, akin to those in Acts 15:1, it is difficult to explain pagan elements in the message that threatened the Galatians (4:3, 8, 9: "elemental spirits" are almost certainly star gods, as in current astrological religion). It is also unclear how Paul can regard their teaching as a threat to morality since the Galatians were guilty of gross sins (5:13–26) and a selfish attitude (6:1–10). These items have led to the conclusion that it was a type of gnostic Christianity that had invaded the congregation. Paul had to defend his gospel on two fronts: on the one side, against a Pharisaic legalism, which had been infected, on pagan territory, by GNOSTICISM; and on the other, against antinomian tendencies that led to ethical laxity in the church.

A third option has most to commend it. In 5:11 Paul regarded himself as being persecuted for his preaching of a message that dismissed the need for circumcision, a point he returns to in 6:11–17. The occasion of this controversy is found in renewed Zealot activity in Judea at the time of the letter, subjecting Jewish Christians to pressure to declare themselves loyal Jews at a time of nationalistic upsurge. One way they could do this was to insist on circumcision, and they carried this argument to its logical extreme in requiring baptized pagans to receive the rite as a token of belonging to the Israel of the Abrahamic covenant (Gen. 17:9–14). The Galatian Gentiles listened to this promise of membership in a new community and interpreted it as giving them license to live as they pleased. Hence they slid into a lax morality.

Paul's Response. Paul repelled the Jewish Christian arguments by appealing to Genesis 12 and 15, where the promise to Abraham said nothing about circumcision when it offered a worldwide family, but rather made acceptance with God conditional on the sole requirement of faith (Gal. 3:10–14). Yet "faith" for Paul has ethical implications, chiefly the act of love (5:6) and the call to act out a person's new relationship to God in socially responsible ways (5:13–6:10).

R.M.

GALILEE (GALILEAN). A region as part of northern Israel in biblical and modern times. Allusion to Galilee occurs in the OT a few times (Josh. 20:7, identifying Kedesh in Galilee; I Kings 9:11, twenty cities in Galilee ceded to Hiram of Tyre; and in particular Isa. 9:1, "Galilee of the nations," that is, the forested regions of Galilee). The Isaiah 9 reference probably points to Galilee's exposure to non-Jewish influence, and this made Galilee isolated from the mainstream of Jewish life and open to paganizing pressures, especially in upper Galilee.

The NT references to the region are to lower Galilee, about one thousand feet lower in elevation than the northern part of Galilee and falling dramatically to more than six hundred feet below sea level at the SEA OF GALILEE. The lower Galilee area, less wooded, was marked by greater fertility on account of several streams, and it drew to itself a large, mixed population engaged in raising olives and cereal crops and in fishing in Lake Galilee.

The region passed under the political jurisdiction of Herod Antipas at the death of his father Herod the Great in 4 B.C. In the area Antipas built a large city on the banks of the Lake Tiberias, named after the reigning emperor, in A.D. 22. Herod Agrippa succeeded to the rulership of Galilee in NT times.

The separation of Galilee from Judea in the south by the intervening land of Samaria is the reason for Galilee's isolation, culturally and religiously, from rabbinic influence centered in Jerusalem. Hence there was a distrust of the Galileans, bordering on a demeaning attitude (John 7:52).

In lower Galilee Jesus' boyhood was spent; and here was the locale of his ministry before his journey south to Judea for his passion, according to Mark's account. Roman roads passed through Galilee, and Roman influence was felt in the northern province. A cosmopolitan aura was present in Galilee, though it is remarkable that the Gospels do not mention the leading large cities, such as Sepphoris, which Jesus apparently never visited. The accent of the people was the Galilean dialect of Aramaic, the spoken language, and Peter was detected as a Galilean in Jerusalem by his speech (Matt. 26:73).

R. M.

GALILEE, SEA OF. A lake set in the region of GALILEE, a province in northern Israel in biblical and modern times. There are various spellings such as "Chinnereth" (Num. 34:11) or "Chinneroth" (Josh. 12:3) or, in NT references, "Gennesaret" (Luke 5:1) or the "Sea of Tiberias" (John 21:1), an allusion to a large town built on its water's edge.

The Jordan Valley, a geological rift that runs down the land of Israel north to south, places a considerable area under sea level, and the Lake of Galilee is six hundred to seven hundred feet below sea level. The configuration of the lake is pear-shaped—thirteen miles in length by seven miles broad at its widest extremity.

The mountain region that encompasses the sea means that the lake lies in a basin. It is therefore subject to storms caused by a shift in atmospheric pressure which, in turn, is created by the neighboring mountains. There are sudden squalls, which make treacherous the crossing of the lake in open boats such as Galilean fishermen used because of their shallow draft. This feature is seen in the story of Mark 4:35-41 and parallels.

The fishing industry was prosperous in NT times since the water is sweet, and there are considerable

Courtesy of the Israel Government Tourist Office, Houston, Texas

The Sea of Galilee, with modern Tiberias in the foreground

Courtesy of the Israel Government Tourist Office, Houston, Texas

Hills surrounding the Sea of Galilee numbers of fish in their different species to be found there. On the banks of the lake several towns grew up, such as Capernaum, Bethsaida, and Tiberias.

R. M.

GALILEI, GALILEO (1564–1642). Famed Italian scientist and mathematician. Son of a Pisan merchant and musicologist, he studied medicine and mathematics in Pisa at Vallombrosa monastery and the university. Keen observation and experimentation yielded him numerous discoveries: the isochronic law of pendulums, a measure for specific gravity of solids, parabolic paths of projectiles, rate of falling bodies, and so on. His treatise on gravity (1588) won him a university post at Pisa, 1589–91. From 1592 to 1610 he was professor of mathematics at anticlerical Padua, lecturing to large crowds. Improving on the telescope in 1609, he discovered moon configurations, Jupiter's satellites, and sunspots. In 1610 he went to Florence to teach. His support of "heretical" Copernican views brought warnings from Rome.

Then in 1632 Galileo's Dialogue on the Two Chief Systems of the World boldly defended Copernicus' views, even suggesting some scientific truth was equal to scriptural truth. The Inquisition in 1633 forced Galileo to say that the sun moves around the earth—a major setback for Italian science. Galileo's Dialogues on the New Science (1638) forcefully restated his earlier discoveries. Besides influencing Newton and Torricelli, he contributed greatly to the rise of science. His writings were removed from the Index in 1835.

C.M.

GALL (BITTER HERB). The term "gall" refers to a digestive fluid secreted by the liver also known as bile. Because of its extreme bitterness, "gale" is either literally or figuratively used for anything extremely bitter. In the Bible, gall is the name for any bitter substance, such as a poison (Job 20:14; Acts 8:23); hemlock (Hosea 10:4 KJV); or the herb "wormwood" (Jer. 9:15). The phrase "wormwood and gall" refers to anything too bitter to bear and hence means extreme suffering, like the trials of Job or the passion of Christ.

Gall is used loosely in the English translation for a number of actual herbs, as well as metaphorically for extreme suffering. Jesus was offered vinegar and gall while he suffered on the cross (Matt. 27:34 KJV). This must have been a pain-killer provided for the crucified (see also Ps. 69:21 KJV). Jesus refused the opiate, choosing to face his death with a clear mind.

J.C.

GALLICANISM. A theory that denotes the nationalistically fueled struggle of the French church and state against absolute papal power. Rooted in Gaul's ancient tribalism, where prince prevailed over priest, Gallicanism has continually manifested itself in French life, sometimes as episcopal attempts to gain independence or equality with the pope, sometimes as political struggles for temporal autonomy. Often the struggles coalesced. Gallicanism can be seen in Charlemagne's theocratic rule, and in King Philip IV's struggle against Pope Boniface VIII, a conflict precipitating the Babylonian Captivity (1307–77) and removal of the papacy to Avignon. The Council of Constance, 1414–18, elevated councils above popes. The Pragmatic Sanctions of Bourges (1438) placed ultimate authority in bishops in council with the pope. In 1682 King Louis XIV forced clerical acceptance of Gallicanism's four principles, prepared by Bishop Bossuet. They asserted the king's independence of the pope in temporal matters and the superiority of councils. They demanded respect for French church customs, mores, and political laws, and denied papal infallible authority without episcopal consent. These were ordered taught in all French higher schools. The French Revolution secularized religion, but at Vatican I (1870) French bishops repudiated Gallicanism. Church and state formally separated in France in 1905, yet resistance to the papacy continues.

C.M.

GAMALIEL. According to Acts 5:34 the first apostles were saved from their fate by the intervention of Rabbi Gamaliel I in the Jewish council. He represented the liberal tradition of the school of HILLEL, and was highly regarded as a venerable "teacher of the law" (Luke's term—nomodidaskalos—in Acts 5:34).

His speech argued that the Jewish hierarchy should take no decisive action regarding the Christian leaders, but should leave the issue to divine providence, a typically Pharisaic sentiment. Appeal is made to historical precedents: first, Theudas, a Jewish magician, according to Josephus in Antiquities, who raised a revolt against Rome and was crushed; then, Judas of Galilee, also referred to in Antiquities, who led a Zealot uprising that was similarly put down in A.D. 6, the time of the census. There is a confusion here, since Theudas' rebellion occurred later than that of Judas and at a time subsequent to Gamaliel's speech. It may be that Luke's report was not intended to be chronologically exact.

At all events, Gamaliel's advice was forthright: "Do not molest Christians," since God will bring the movement to nothing, if it is spurious. His counsels prevailed (Acts 5:40), and the apostles were dismissed with a cautionary beating.

R.M.

GANDHI, MOHANDAS K. (1869–1948). Leader of the Indian independence movement, advocate of nonviolence on both the practical and philosophical planes, exemplar of the use of "soul-force" to achieve righteous this-worldly ends. Gandhi demonstrated, as have few others in world history, the thorough combination of the spiritual and the political in one person.

Born in west India and educated for a legal career in England, Gandhi lived in South Africa (1893–1914), where he fought vigorously against the racial discrimination under which Indians there suffered and perfected his nonviolent techniques of demonstrations, selective civil disobedience, strikes, and fasting. After his return to India in 1915, he began using these methods in the struggle against British rule and on behalf of the underclasses of Indian society.

Gandhi firmly believed in the unique power of nonviolent resistance to attain righteous political ends. It can be wielded equally by strong and weak, rich and poor, and it ultimately can turn the foe through its moral power. But to be effective it must be based in a life of utter nonattachment, spiritual purity, and dedication, and must exemplify a courage at least as great as that of the soldier. Gandhi also excoriated the West for its materialism and urban industrialism. He urged India, not entirely successfully, to embrace a simple economy based on the village and handicrafts.

Courtesy of the Israel Government Tourist Office, Houston, Texas

Mahatma Gandhi

After independence and the division of the British Raj into India and Pakistan in 1947, Gandhi was saddened by the bloody communal riots between Hindus and Muslims and worked mightily for reconciliation. But he was shot by a Hindu extremist while on his way to a prayer meeting in 1948.

R.E.

GANESHA (Ganesa). From the Sanskrit word literally meaning "lord of a group (of Shiva's attendants)." An elephant-headed god of HINDUISM who is the son of SHIVA and Parvati, Ganesha is widely worshiped as a "remover of obstacles" and a bestower of prosperity.

Ganesha came into prominence in the PURANAS with the rise of BHAKTI. According to myth, he acquired his elephant head in this way: Shiva was gone, and his consort, Parvati, desired to have a son. So she fashioned and brought to life one made from material scrubbed from the surface of her body. When Shiva returned, he was angered at seeing the strange youth in the house and cut off his head. Then Parvati, in tears, explained to her lord that he had killed her own son. Shiva vowed to provide him with the first available head, which turned out to be that of an elephant.

Images of Ganesha are frequently found at the entryways of temples and in places of business, and his festival, Ganesha Caturthi, is popular in north India. As an auxiliary remover-of-obstacles god, he is worshiped by Hindus of all schools. One small sect, the Ganapatyas, make him central, regarding him as the manifested form of BRAHMAN. The largeness of the elephant head in relation to the body is said to represent the greatness of Brahman in relation to the world. The mouse, the vehicle or animal associated with the god, shows the relative smallness of the human, unless the oneness of its ATMAN with Brahman is realized. The curved trunk tells us that the path to enlightenment is difficult, but the way of access is present.

The worship of Ganesha has flourished in modern India. This is partly because the militant nationalist B. G. Tilak used his festival as an occasion for fervent affirmation for Hindu tradition and protesting British rule, and partly because in a time of rapid social and economic change his role of removing obstacles has seemed of special significance.

R.E.

GANGES RIVER. Major river flowing out of the Himalayas across most of north India. In HINDUISM this river, personified as the lovely goddess Ganga, is very sacred and a magnet for pilgrimage. Two of the "Seven Sacred Cities" of India—Hardwar to the north, and above all Varanasi (Benares), holiest of all—are on its banks. To bathe in its waters cleanses one spiritually. The devout also come to die near its shores. Bodies of the deceased are brought from far and near to the edge of the holy river to be burned and the ashes thrown into its waters.

R.E.

GARRISON, WILLIAM LLOYD (1805–79). The militant abolitionist was born on December 10 to Abijah and Frances Maria Lloyd Garrison. He served as editor of the National Philanthropist, a Baptist temperance journal, and then helped Quaker abolitionist Benjamin Lundy edit The Genius of Universal Emancipation. The first issue of Garrison's own Liberator appeared January 1, 1831. A militant pacifist, radically anticlerical, Garrison formed the New England Anti-Slavery Society in 1832, and helped to found the American Anti-Slavery Society in 1833, serving twenty-two years as its president. The organization split in 1840, however, over Garrison's repudiation of political action and his support for women's rights.

N.H.

GATH. Of the five cities of the Philistines on Israel's coastal strip, Gath is the furthest from the Mediterranean Sea. The corresponding adjective is Gittite (for example, II Sam. 15:18; 21:19, 20). Gath played a prominent part in the Philistine campaign to subdue the Israelite tribes. After the ark had been taken in battle, it was removed to Gath (I Sam. 5:6-10; 6:17). Goliath the giant is named as living there (I Sam. 17:4). Achish, king of Gath, was David's enemy who later enlisted him in service (I Sam. 21:10-15; 27:2-12). Eventually the city was ceded to David, and Rehoboam fortified it (II Chr. 11:5-8). But in Amos's time (mid-eighth century), it was retaken as a Philistine city (Amos 6:2). Its present site is uncertain. R.M.

GATHA. See AVESTA.

GAZA. One of the five main Philistine cities, Gaza stood on the coast; in fact it has given its name to the Gaza Strip, the coastal area of Israel's mainland, though classified as the "west bank" by Palestinians. Its original settlers evidently emigrated from Crete (Deut. 2:23). But they were dispossessed by Joshua (Josh. 10:41). Yet this occupation was only temporary, and we read (Josh. 13:3) of the king of Gaza as a thorn in Israel's side. The tribe of Judah retook it (Judg. 1:18), but it was lost later, since the captured Samson was taken there by his enemy (Judg. 16:21-31). As it stood on the main caravan route, Assyria in her campaigns against Egypt frequently laid it waste. In Jeremiah's day it was Egyptian territory (Jer. 47:1), finally to be besieged by Alexander the Great in the fourth century. Its role in the NT is seen in Acts 8:26-40. R.M.

GEBAL. An ancient Canaanite and Phoenician seaport known to the Greeks as Byblos or "book," since papyrus used for books was shipped from there. Gebal simply means "mountain" and was located in Lebanon twenty-five miles north of Beirut. Men of Gebal served as stonecutters in the construction of Solomon's Temple. J.C.

GEDALIAH. The name of five men in the OT, among them the grandson of Hezekiah and grandfather of the prophet Zephaniah (Zeph. 1:1); the Jewish governor appointed in Judah after the destruction of Jerusalem in 587 B.C. (Jer. 40:11, II Kings 25:24-25; Jer. 40, 41); and a musician consecrated to service in the Temple (I Chr. 25:3). J.C.

GEHAZI. The companion (either servant of, or associate of) the prophet ELISHA. Elisha did not give the status to Gehazi that Elijah gave to him when he was Elijah's associate (II Kings 4:12; 8:4). Gehazi proved less than trustworthy, as he was unable to help the Shunanmite woman who requested Elisha's aid, and even lost his temper (II Kings 4:8 ff.; 4:27). Later he misrepresented Elisha to Naaman, the Syrian army commander who sought, successfully, for a cure of his leprosy at Elisha's hands. Gehazi sought to extort a talent of silver and new clothes from Naaman, as a price for the miraculous cure. Because of this, Gehazi was struck with leprosy himself (II Kings 5:20-27). J.C.

GEHENNA. The word is composite, meaning "the valley of Hinnom," and it has two distinct usages. As a geographical place-name it forms the west-south boundary of Jerusalem, known as the gorge of Hinnom or of the sons of Hinnom (from Josh. 15:8; see II Kings 23:10). The Greek Bible renders the name in Joshua 18:16 as Gaienna, and this gave the later name "Gehenna" in NT times. The association of the valley of Hinnom with pagan cult practices, especially the fearful rite of child sacrifice (Jer. 7:30-33), gave it an unsavory reputation. The apostate kings Ahaz and Manasseh offered human sacrifices here (II Chr. 28:3; 33:6). From the way the land became desecrated it was a convenient place for Jerusalem's garbage to be disposed of by burning. These two elements gave Gehenna a meaning synonymous with destruction by FIRE.

The religious significance of Gehenna may be traced to the second century B.C., when this valley was thought of as the place of the final destruction of the enemies of God and God's people (perhaps based on Isa. 66:24). In rabbinic eschatology (that is, the final separation of the righteous and sinners), Gehenna is referred to as a place of torment, though no longer confined to Jerusalem's site. The NT data are confined to the Synoptic Gospels and James 3:6. The language of Jesus, obviously metaphorical but nonetheless serious, warns of a penalty for flagrant disobedience to the moral claims of God (Matt. 5:21, 22, 29, 30, RSV marg.) and injury to other people who are defenseless (Mark 9:42-47; Matt. 18:9) in terms of "being thrown into the hell of fire." One verse (Matt. 10:28; see Luke 12:5) attributes such judgment to God; and "child of Gehenna" (Matt. 23:15) means—in the figurative idiom—one deserving of severest condemnation. Note that such judgment, in Jesus' reported teaching, is reserved for professed followers and religious leaders, not incorrigible sinners. R.M.

GEIST. The German word for spirit, mind, intellect, or wit has even wider meaning through usage. Der Heilige Geist is "Holy Ghost" in English. In Hegelian philosophy Geist means "mind," but in an ontological, historical sense Geist has come to mean culture in such usages as der Geist der Zeit (the spirit of the time) and Geisteswissenschaften (human or cultural studies). C.Mc.

GEMARA. A Jewish term, of Aramaic origin, to denote commentary material added—the word means "completion"—to the MISHNAH, itself an explication of the books of Moses in the Hebrew Bible. The Mishnah was assembled in literary form in the third century A.D. and attracted the rabbis' comments. When these rabbinic interpretations were appended to the Mishnah the result was the TALMUD, the final repository of Jewish authoritative teaching. R.M.

GEMARIAH. The name of two men in the book of Jeremiah. One was the son of Hilkiah, sent as a messenger to Nebuchadnezzar by King Zedekiah. He also carried Jeremiah's letter to the Babylonian exiles.

The other was the son of Shaphan who asked the king not to harm Jeremiah's scroll (Jer. 36). J.C.

GENEALOGY. This subject may be said to be of much greater importance in the OT than in the NT. The term "genealogy" is defined as a roll call of names that trace the ancestry of descendants of an individual, tribe, or nation. There is an obvious social and anthropological significance in this list; but the biblical interest is not merely antiquarian, rather it is religious. The purpose is to trace the providential ordering of family and group life in such a way that God's overruling purpose may be detected. Hence the lists are far from complete as ancestral records. In key instances (notably Matt. 1:1-17; Luke 3:23-38) the choice is highly selective and theologically motivated. Specifically, the evangelists or their sources have endeavored to pick out those ancestors (women, in Matthew's case) or names (Abraham, David) who presaged the coming of Messiah, or else by a use of numerical values to demonstrate how the Messiah as great David's greater son was already foreshadowed in David's lineage.

The word "genealogy" occurs in the OT according to the RSV only at Nehemiah 7:5, referring to returning exiles under Sheshbazzar. But this is untypical, for the reason given above. The longer lists are seen in Genesis 5; I Chronicles 1:1-42, cast in the form of A lived X number of years and gave birth to B; thereafter lived Y number of years, and all A's years were Z, and he died. Genealogies begin with Adam, but other patriarchal figures are listed with their descendants (Cain, Noah, Shem to Abraham, Gen. 11:10-26; Ishmael, Esau, and with special importance given in Gen. 46, to Jacob and his sons, whom the nation regarded as founders of the later twelve tribes). Of special interest in postexilic Israel was the assemblage of Levite names (I Chr. 6:1-53). By direct contrast Jesus' ancestry is traced back (in Heb. 7:6-14) to Melchizedek, whose priestly office was non-Levite.

A peculiar use of genealogies is reported in I Timothy 1:4; Titus 3:9, where the Christian writer opposes a Jewish interest in family connections, or a tracing of pairs of "eons" or emanations from Deity, cherished by Gnostic systems to explain the universe.

R.M.

GENERAL ASSEMBLY. The highest governing body in churches with a PRESBYTERIAN form of government. Its members are ministers and elders elected by lower governing bodies, usually presbyteries. Most Presbyterian denominations hold an annual General Assembly. J.G.

GENERAL ASSOCIATION OF REGULAR BAPTIST CHURCHES. See BAPTIST CHURCHES.

GENERAL CONFERENCE. The highest legislative body in most Methodist bodies. In The United Methodist Church, the General Conference meets every four years. It is made up of elected representatives, clergy and laity in equal numbers, from the ANNUAL CONFERENCES. It has the power to revise the Book of Discipline. J.C.

GENESIS. A name derived from the Septuagint, the Greek translation of the OT, meaning "origin," "beginning," or "creation." This first book of the Bible, known in Hebrew as bereshith ("in the beginning") after its opening word, constitutes the prologue to Israel's unique faith history. It distills the belief of the Israelite community in a God whose deeds of creation, blessing, judgment, and redemption operate foremost for Israel's welfare, but also for the welfare of the world.

Organization and Basic Content. Numerous early Israelite traditions have been woven into a continuous narrative spanning from the Creation of the universe to Joseph's death in Egypt. Genesis readily falls into two parts, with chapter 12 being the pivotal element that confers new meaning on chapters 1-11 and advances the theme of Israel's election, which integrates the different components in chapters 12-50. The activities of Hebrew history from Adam to Abraham are presented in chapters 1-11. Of primary concern are the CREATION of the universe, the origin of evil, the emergence of civilization, the great Flood, and the Dispersion of humanity. In chapters 12-50 the history of the patriarchs is organized in such a manner that chapters 12-25 focus on Abraham; 26-36 on Isaac and his sons, Jacob and Esau; and 37-50 on Joseph.

Composition. (a) Genesis 1-11. Most biblical scholars maintain that two separate strata, the Yahwistic (J) and Priestly (P), are represented within this so-called primeval history. In turn, J and P are respectively regarded as the tenth and sixth-century B.C. authors, who recast what they inherited in the way of independent and largely oral traditions. Though J establishes the narrative framework here, P provides a subsequent chronological backbone as well as two substantial narrative segments—the Creation (1:1-2:4a) and the Flood (portions of chaps. 6-9).

Since its major intention is not to account for specific happenings in remote antiquity, but to meditate on present reality, Genesis 1-11 is often classified as MYTH. Accordingly, the traditions are valued for their timeless appeal and capacity to engage the reader personally. Thus in 1:1-2:4a, the Priestly writer was less absorbed by the question, How did the universe actually come into being? than he was by the question, What does it mean for one to belong to creation and to exist as God's creature among the other creatures? As the mythology of chapters 1-11 was written and edited into its present shape, answers were sought for a variety of questions, some of which probed the meaning of life itself. Thus in his account of the couple's eviction from the garden (chap. 3), the Yahwist wrestles with a query that has haunted every age—why are people mortal? Truth, not entertainment, is the fundamental agenda item in these chapters whose universalism celebrates not so much what was, as what is.

(b) Genesis 12–50. Several differences set these chapters apart from the preceding. First, the Yahwistic (J) and Priestly (P) strata are joined by still another, the Elohist (E), the creation of a ninth/eighth-century B.C. Israelite. Preserved in the now edited patriarchal history in a shortened format, and first detected in chapter 15, E mainly presents itself as the supplement of J. Second, the narratives in chapters 12–50 exhibit a more sustained quality than do those in chapters 1–11. Entire cycles of stories develop around such figures as Abraham and Jacob. Third, the engaging mythology of chapters 1–11 now yields to the colorful legend of chapters 12–50. This latter literary classification is not to be confused with solid historiographic writing, which Israel was also capable of producing. The patriarchal legends center on a small number of people who experience only fleeting contact with outsiders. Segments of remote time are portrayed in quite general terms. Typically the doings of the Israelite fathers are telescoped, refracted, and chronologically rearranged. Nevertheless, the Genesis legends relate the patriarchs to such specific geographical settings as Shechem, Hebron, and Beer-sheba, and impart both the feelings and actions of real individuals. They are not wanting in historical significance.

The stories that clustered around Abraham, Jacob and Esau, and Joseph are diverse in format and theme. The Abraham cycle (chaps. 12–25) consists of many independent stories that highlight the heartfelt concern of parents for offspring and Yahweh's determination to come near in the promise. Within the Jacob and Esau cycle (chaps. 26–36), larger groups of narratives reflect on the relationship of two brothers and the power of coveted patriarchal blessing. The uniqueness of the Joseph story (chaps. 37–50) resides in the fact that it is a single narrative that opens with family conflict and, thanks to divine providence, ends with reconciliation.

Religious Message. (a) God as creator. Though Genesis manifests a multiplicity of sources and literary forms, a well-integrated religious message is projected. The two different creation accounts (1:1–3:24) jointly acknowledge the Deity as the author of the cosmos, life, and humankind. Rather than offering a scientific explanation of the world's origins, these chapters celebrate the God whom biblical Israel knew to be the universal sovereign. Yet the God who organizes the cosmos lavishes a special interest in humanity. In both accounts, the creative process is climaxed by the making of man and woman. According to P, the couple is given dominion over nature (1:28). Created in God's "image," man and woman are equipped to rule over the animals. Yet made in God's "likeness," denoting abstract similarity, humans and God are assuredly distinct (1:26). Moreover, in J, man (adam) derives from dust (adamah), not from some divine component as is evident in earlier Babylonian cosmogony (2:7). Still, Genesis 1–3 affirms that God and humanity are linked in a unique relationship that sets man and woman apart from the plant and animal kingdom.

(b) Humanity as rebels. With its talent for meditating on historical actuality, Genesis 1–11 regularly underscores human rebellion. In the garden, the couple shuns its servant status and quests for divine omniscience (3:5–6). God discovers that "every imagination of the thoughts" of the human heart is "only evil continually" (6:5). Human presumption reaches its zenith in the Tower of Babel incident when humanity would "make a name" for itself by storming the very heavens (11:4). A psychological realism admits to humanity's innate drive toward autonomy. Above all, Genesis 1–11 testifies that this rebellion of creature against Creator is inveterate within the human family and that a gain in self-awareness is outdistanced by a strong sense of alienation from God. In the stories of the garden (chap. 3), the brothers (chap. 4), the Flood (chaps. 6–9), and the tower (chap. 11), the sinful condition of humankind is deftly portrayed. No less impressive is the depiction of divine judgment that steadfastly refuses to tolerate such rebellion.

(c) God as Savior. From beginning to end, Genesis highlights God's determination to deliver humanity from its sinful, lost condition to a new relationship with the Deity. According to J, the God who renders judgment also says, "Nevertheless!" By clothing the couple with animal skins prior to their expulsion from the garden (3:21), placing a protective mark on Cain before sending him away (4:15), and promising Noah that the pattern of "seedtime and harvest" will persist so long as "the earth remains" (8:22), Yahweh laces judgment with mercy. By contrast, after dispersing the peoples and confusing their languages in the Babel incident (11:9), no divine "Nevertheless" is spoken.

Yet when all seems hopeless, Yahweh discloses in the next narrative episode (12:1–9) the intention to deliver humankind through the divinely chosen human instrument—the people of Israel. Humanity's prospects for salvation are rekindled through Yahweh's gratuitous choice of Abraham and his seed. Wherever issued in the Genesis patriarchal stories (12:2–3; 17:5–8; 18:18; 28:13–14; 35:11–12), God's promise never depends on patriarchal virtue or accomplishment. Indeed, the Israelite fathers are realistically sketched as men of faith and flesh (see 12:10–20; 28:20–21). Such honesty, however, does not detract from the tenacious position of the patriarchal narratives that through God's saving design, "all families of the earth shall bless themselves" (12:3).
J.K.K.

GENTILE. Anyone who is not of the Jewish faith or who is of a non-Jewish nation. The biblical text presents a complicated problem in translation since the various Hebrew words and the primary Greek word for "Gentile" can also be rendered (in the plural) as "nations," sometimes including the Jews (for example, Matt. 24:9; Mark 11:17), and sometimes excluding the Jews (for example, Gen. 27:29; Lam. 1:3). The immediate context is the determinative factor.

In the OT, Israel, God's chosen people, had a mission to non-Jewish nations. Five times in Genesis the promise to Abraham is repeated that "by you all the families of the earth shall bless themselves" (12:3; 18:18; 22:18; 26:4; 28:14). Though at times Israel anticipated crushing her enemies and ruling over other nations (for example, Gen. 27:29; Ps. 18:43), she knew that God's sovereignty was universal and the king was to be an agent to fulfill God's purpose among the nations (for example, Ps. 72).

The early Christian community saw in Jesus the fulfillment of the Abrahamic promise (Gal. 3:6-14). Though Matthew's Gospel reserves the mission to the Gentiles until after Jesus' resurrection (Matt. 10:5; 28:20), Luke from the beginning depicts Jesus (in the words of Isaiah) as "a light for revelation to the Gentiles and a glory to thy people Israel" (Luke 2:32; compare Isa. 42:6; 49:6). Jesus' initial sermon at Nazareth documents God's concern for two non-Jewish figures in the OT narrative (Luke 4:26-27), and the disciples are commissioned by the risen Christ to preach "to all nations" (Luke 24:47; Acts 1:8).

Paul, himself a Jew, was called to declare the gospel specifically to the Gentiles (Gal. 1:16; Acts 9:15; 26:16-17) in hope that as Jews had been the occasion for the inclusion of Gentiles, so would the Gentiles' response lead to the final salvation of Israel (Rom. 11:13-15, 25-26). A meeting between Paul and the Jewish Christian leaders at Jerusalem confirmed that Gentile believers would be accepted into the church without the rite of CIRCUMCISION (Gal. 2:1-10; Acts 15:1-21), though social relations between Jews and Gentiles remained unsettled for some time (Gal. 2:11-14). C.B.C.

GERAR. A town of the Middle Bronze Age, the period of the patriarchs, located on the border of Israel and Egypt, southeast of Gaza. According to Genesis 20:1 and following and 26:1 and following, both Abraham and Isaac had adventures revolving around their wives and the king of Gerar, Abimelech. King Asa defeated the Ethiopians near Gerar (II Chr. 14). J.C.

GERASA. The location of Jesus' healing of the Gadarene demoniac (Mark 5:1; Matt. 8:28; Luke 8:26). While the exact location of Gerasa is disputed, it was probably on the eastern side of the Sea of Galilee opposite Magdala. There was a city of considerable size and population, still under construction by the Romans in Jesus' day, named Gerasa by Greek speakers and called Jerash by the Jews. Unfortunately, this city was across the Jordan, forty miles southeast of the Sea of Galilee. The details in Mark 5 make it unlikely that Jesus crossed the lake and walked forty miles before meeting the demon-possessed sufferer. J.C.

GERHARD, JOHANN (1582-1637). German Lutheran theologian and churchman, author of Lutheranism's classic exposition of strict orthodoxy, Loci Theologici (1622). Born at Quedlinburg, on becoming seriously ill at fifteen, he vowed to become a minister. Two years later he began studying theology, philosophy, and medicine at Wittenberg University. At Jena University he studied Bible, receiving the M.A. in 1603. He studied further at Marburg but returned to Jena to avoid living under a Reformed Church regime. At twenty-four he was granted a doctorate and made superintendent of Heidelberg and later at Coburg. In 1616 he became professor at Jena. An earnest churchman and author of numerous works, he influenced Lutheranism toward strict orthodoxy, causing many Melanchthonians to turn to Calvinism. His systematically arranged Loci, a detailed explanation of Lutheran doctrine, stressed the infallibility of Scripture and literal biblical inspiration, including Hebrew vowel points.

Herbert G. May

General view of Gerasa (Jerash), the street of the columns leading to the forum, and Hadrian's arch, the temple of Zeus, and the theater beyond

C.M.

GERIZIM, MOUNT. A mountain, located in Samaria, near Shechem and adjacent to Mount Ebal. Its nearest inhabited dwelling today is Nablus. Its biblical history centers first in the story of Moses' calling the tribes to possess the land (Deut. 27:11-14). Gerizim stands over against Ebal as good is opposed to evil. Joshua is said to have read the Law to the assembly here (Josh. 8:30-35), and later to have recalled the people to the covenant promises under the shadow of Gerizim (Josh. 24:26). Thus Gerizim became a sacred shrine, and these stories offer the reason for Israel's holy regard for it. The sympathy of the writer of I Kings is tilted against Jeroboam, who established a breakaway kingdom in Shechem "in the hill country of Ephraim" (I Kings 12:25). Assyria's invasion and conquest of the northern kingdom is held to be suitable punishment for this. Into the vacuum created by Israel's exile, the Samaritans came to center their cult of feasts, especially Passover, on Mount Gerizim, a tradition in evidence in John 4:20-23. This in turn is based on the fact that a Samaritan temple was built in the fourth century B.C., only to be taken and destroyed by John Hyrcanus when he took Shechem in 128 B.C.

R.M.

GERSHON. The oldest son of LEVI, whose family camped west of the tabernacle during the wandering of the Hebrews under Moses (Num. 3:23). This family had sacred tasks to perform for the tent of the presence of God. Even after the return from exile, Gershon's descendants were prominent in the service of the second Temple.

J.C.

GERSON, JEAN DE (1363-1429). French theologian, nominalist, mystic, and conciliarist, a leader at the COUNCIL OF CONSTANCE in ending the GREAT SCHISM. At fourteen he went to Paris and studied under Pierre d'Ailly. Upon becoming a doctor of theology in 1394, he succeeded d'Ailly as chancellor of Notre Dame and the University of Paris. With controversies raging over the Great Schism (1378-1417), Gerson worked for reform and renewal. He left Paris to become a pastor in Bruges in 1397. There he wrote On the Manner of Conducting Oneself in Time of Schism, counseling charity and recognition of the validity of the doctrine and use of the sacraments under both popes. He approved the Council of Pisa's efforts in 1409 to heal the schism, and actively participated in the Council of Constance (1414-18), called by Emperor Sigismund and the cardinals of both popes. He asserted conciliar superiority over the pope and argued for doctors of theology, cardinals, and bishops to participate in any future general council. He spent the last years of his life in seclusion at Lyons writing The Consolation of Theology. Among his mystical writings, the Mountain of Contemplation (1397) stands out as an example of his influence on the Brothers of the Common Life and Ignatius Loyola.

C.M.

GESENIUS, WILHELM (1786-1842). German Semitic scholar and biblical critic who from 1810 until his death taught at the University of Halle. Resolutely separating Hebrew linguistics from dogmatic theology, this popular lecturer and exacting investigator approached biblical Hebrew in a solely rational, comparative manner that took serious account of cognate Semitic languages. As his major lexicographical effort, his Hebrew and Chaldean Dictionary first appeared in 1810-12, underwent numerous revisions, and laid the groundwork for the Hebrew Lexicon (1906) of Francis Brown, Samuel R. Driver, and Charles A. Briggs. Subsequently, the first edition of his definitive Hebrew Grammar was published in 1813 and his only exegetical study, an Isaiah commentary, in 1820-21.

J.K.K.

GESHEM. Arab leader who harassed the Jews as they were rebuilding the walls of Jerusalem under Nehemiah's direction (Neh. 2:19; 6:1 ff.). Geshem spread rumors that Nehemiah was arming the city with a view to revolting against the Persian Empire in order to become king of the Jews.

J.C.

GESTALT PSYCHOLOGY. A twentieth-century form of psychology. In contrast to atomism, or connectionism, which concentrated on parts or affirmed that the whole is a linkage of parts, Gestalt stressed a basic unity of the whole. The term "gestalt" means "form" or "structure," and it is with whole structures that these psychologists did their research. Max Wertheimer, Wolfgang Köhler, and Kurt Koffka worked in Germany in the 1920s, but a decade later were forced by events to leave. The attempt to transfer their research into a different culture may have limited its development. Undoubtedly it has opened areas still to be fully explored.

One basic emphasis of gestalt psychology is on perception. For example, it is known that motion is not a series of sensations following one on another. The technology of motion pictures is based on a running together of images. The sensation of motion is a whole. There is a grouping within a visual field. The principle of pragnanz states that grouping tends toward simplicity and balance, which makes "good form." Gestalt principles of perception may be seen on a practical level in camouflage, during which an object may be hidden and only with difficulty be perceived within the whole. In a deliberately planned illusion (trompe l'oeil) something may seem to be what it is not; that is, figures drawn on a plane may seem to be three-dimensional.

Köhler carried the explanation of this principle into physiology, theorizing that specific brain functions enabled parts to be perceived as wholes. Memory and experience are related. Memory is not a connected chain of events but part of a total structure reaching backward from present experience. Memory can be developed because it forms a gestalt.

Thinking is a process that also fits the gestalt. Insight does not result as the end product of a chain of ideas. Insight comes as ideas draw together into a whole. It is not an evolutionary process so much as a new pattern, a sudden awareness, resulting from a restructuring of relationships among previously known facts. Hence thinking is more than recall because it is the result of reconstruction into new configurations of previously known facts and insights.

Gestalt psychology has had an effect on social psychology particularly through the work of Kurt Lewin, who also came from Germany to the United States in the 1930s. The movement known as group dynamics theory and its methods arose from his studies of how groups function with relation to members and authority figures. I.C.

GETHSEMANE, GARDEN OF. The place to which Jesus led the disciples, following the Last Supper (Mark 14:32; Matt. 26:36). John reports that they withdrew to a garden, without naming the site (John 18:1). Since Jesus and his followers left Jerusalem for the MOUNT OF OLIVES and crossed the brook Kidron, which lies just to the east of the temple mount, the traditional location on the western slope of that mountain is probably correct. Gethsemane is probably from the Hebrew gat shemanim, which means "oil press," although it could derive from ge shemanim ("valley of drunkards," as in Isa. 28:1) and thus refer to a wine press. On the side of the hill is a large cave that may have been the site of a press among the olive trees, which then and now cover parts of the slopes.

From the fourth century on, various spots in the area were identified as the location of Gethsemane, and especially of the place where Jesus struggled in prayer in the face of his impending death (Mark 14:34-36). Remains of earlier churches, dating back to the fourth century and commemorating these events, have been covered over by more recent structures: the Russian Orthodox Church of Mary Magdalene and the modern Franciscan Church of Gethsemane. H.K.

GEZER. An ancient city in Canaan, settled as early as 3300 B.C. Located eighteen miles northwest of Jerusalem on the road to the port of Jaffa, in recent times the ruins have been identified as the Tell-ej-Jazar, usually called the Tell Gezer. Gezer was often controlled by the Egyptians, especially during the fourteenth and thirteenth centuries B.C. The city had a large water tunnel running through solid rock, probably cut by the Egyptians.

During the Hebrew conquest, Gezer's king was slain by Joshua but the city was never occupied by the tribe of Ephraim, which settled that part of Canaan (Josh. 10:33; 12:12; 16:10; Judg. 1:29). It was probably occupied by David (I Chr. 6:67). Captured by Egypt once more, the destroyed city was given by the pharaoh back to Solomon, who rebuilt it, as part of the dowry when Solomon married a princess of Egypt.

An inscribed tablet, called the Gezer Calendar, dating from the late tenth century B.C., has been discovered in the ongoing excavations of this site. Earlier excavations in 1902-1909 were badly carried out, and the records of discoveries are practically useless. Since 1964, scientific excavations under the direction of Hebrew Union College's Biblical and Archaeological School have discovered many things, including a casement wall and a buttressed gate. During the war for Judah's independence, Simon Maccabeus captured Gezer (142 B.C.) and fortified it. J.C.

AL-GHAZZĀLĪ, ABŪ HĀMĪD (1058-1111). Muslim scholar and mystic whose erudition, acute intellect, and prodigious literary output did much to synthesize ISLAM's diverse legal, doctrinal, philosophical, and mystical aspects. Born in Persia, he crowned his academic career as a professor in Baghdad, but in 1096 caused much comment by resigning to adopt the life of a SUFI contemplative.

Widely learned but orthodox, al-Ghazzali rejected the views of those extreme fundamentalists who said that faith should have nothing to do with rational philosophy; he studied Greek thought and viewed its logic as a preparation for theology. Yet he insisted that the divine revelation itself is beyond human rational comprehension; it can only be received in faith and trust. Such attitudes were only enhanced after his mystical "conversion," when he fervently affirmed that direct experience of God is far greater than any other kind of knowledge. Nonetheless, just as he countered the claims of fanatic fundamentalists and rationalists, so did his teaching also check the antinomian tendency of some mystics. Al-Ghazzali's contention that inward mysticism must deepen but not supplant normative Muslim religious and moral practice helped keep Sufism within the circle of orthodox Islam. R.E.

GIBBON, EDWARD (1737-94). English historian, renowned for his History of the Decline and Fall of the Roman Empire. Born at Putney, he went to Magdalene College, Oxford, was expelled for joining Roman Catholicism, and returned a short time later to Anglicanism. As part of an intellectual ENLIGHTENMENT set, he corresponded with international scholars, traveled widely on the Continent, and served in Parliament from 1774 to 1783. Poor in health, he lived off of scanty earnings and an inherited annuity. He never married.

Started in 1772, the first volume of his monumental history appeared in 1776, the fifth and last in 1788. Detailed and precise in research, it covered thirteen centuries and demonstrated the unity of Western civilization. Gibbon's work was antichristianity and anti-revelation. He assumed the self-sufficient rational order of all human knowledge, and selectively excluded religious faith and other non-supportive data. Chapters fifteen and sixteen treated Christianity, whose spread in the Roman Empire Gibbon felt was due to Christianity's non-supernatural zeal derived from Judaism, its views on immortality, reputed miracles, rigid morality, and good organization. Christian claims per se were ignored or denigrated. Gibbon's exclusion of divine elements in early Christianity prompted criticism which Gibbon responded to in A Vindication, 1779. Miscellaneous writings, including his Memoirs, were published posthumously. The Decline and Fall, scientific in method and critical of traditional truths, ranks as a great historical work, marking for some the beginning of modern historical literature. C.M.

Courtesy of the Library of Congress

James Cardinal Gibbons

GIBBONS, JAMES (1834–1921). Roman Catholic archbishop of Baltimore for forty-three years, Gibbons advocated the church's accommodation to and full participation in American society.

Born on July 23 in Baltimore to Thomas and Bridget Walsh Gibbons, he traveled to Ireland with his family in 1837. He and his widowed mother settled in New Orleans in 1852. He entered Baltimore's St. Charles College in 1855 to study for the priesthood. He was ordained June 30, 1861, in the Baltimore Cathedral.

In 1865 Gibbons became secretary to Archbishop John L. Spalding. He was assistant chancellor at the Second Plenary Council in 1866 at Baltimore. At thirty-two he was named to head the Vicariate Apostolic of North Carolina and on August 16, 1868, became the youngest of America's twelve hundred bishops.

In 1872 Gibbons became bishop of Richmond, and in May 1877 he became bishop co-adjutor of Baltimore, succeeding James R. Bayley upon his death in October. Gibbons organized and presided as Apostolic Delegate over the Third Plenary Council in Baltimore in 1884. Its decrees have guided the church ever since. It also established Catholic University, Washington, D.C.

While accepting a cardinal's biretta from his friend Leo XIII in Rome, June 30, 1886, he lobbied for acceptance of the Knights of Labor and an understanding of American democracy. Gibbons' publications included The Faith of Our Fathers (1876), and Our Christian Heritage (1889). He died on March 24.

N.H.

GIBEON. The name means "hill." Scholars believe Gibeon was situated six miles north of Jerusalem. A tell (an ancient hill or mound) called El-Jib, is all that remains.

The Gibeonites, the inhabitants of the Horite (or Hivite) city of Gibeon, were assimilated into the tribes of Israel and played a leading role in OT events. Joshua (chap. 9) was tricked into establishing a covenantal relationship with the Gibeonites. This brought on a war between Jerusalem and Joshua's forces. Joshua defeated five kings of the Amorites, and Gibeon was made part of Benjamin's territory (Josh.

Courtesy of The University Museum, University of Pennsylvania

The pool at Gibeon, showing part of the seventy-nine rock-cut steps

10 and 18). Later, the city was handed over to the Levites (Josh. 21). The general Abner was conquered at Gibeon by David's forces. Joab slew Amasa in the same place (II Sam. 2 and 20). A shrine to Yahweh was established there under Solomon (I Kings 3; II Chr. 1). Jeremiah 28 says Hananiah the prophet was a Gibeonite. After the Babylonian captivity, Gibeonites returned to Jerusalem (Neh. 7; Ezra 2).

Archaeology has established that Gibeon was not occupied during Joshua's conquest but was rebuilt only in 1200 B.C. Nonetheless, the importance to Hebrew history of Gibeonites is underscored by the place name given it by the ancient historians.

J.C.

GIDEON. The fifth of the twelve "judges" listed in the book of JUDGES, and along with Samson, one of the most significant. All that can be said about him is based on Judges 6-9, there being no other reference to him in all of Scripture except for a passing mention, under his other name, Jerubbaal, in I Samuel 12:11.

The period of the judges is usually dated around 1200-1000 B.C., that is, between the conquest under Joshua and the emergence of Saul as the first anointed king of Israel. It is a time variously pictured as an age of primitive democracy, as a mutual defense league of twelve tribes, or as a howling anarchy. The book of Judges itself seems to lean toward the latter understanding, for it describes the era rather unfavorably as a time when "there was no king in Israel; every man did what was right in his own eyes" (21:25). Such leadership as there was consisted of charismatically endowed military leaders who arose in response to threats from common foes.

Gideon was one such figure. The account of his call to deliver Israel from the hand of Midian, the common oppressor, is contained in Judges 6:11-24. The call is in standard form, consisting of a salutation by an angel, two objections by Gideon coupled with two assurances from Yahweh, and finally a "sign" that the call is authentic (compare 6:19-24). The pattern is the same as that found in the call to Moses in Exodus 3, and is strikingly similar to the Annunciation to Mary in Luke 1:26-38. (One can hear an echo of the angel's salutation to Gideon—"The Lord is with you, you mighty man of valor"—in Gabriel's salutation to Mary—"Hail, O favored one, the Lord is with you"!)

One of Gideon's initial tasks is to break down an altar and an asherah of Baal in his hometown (6:25-32). His success in this bold attack on the popular religion of his day gives him his adopted name, Jerubbaal, which the people interpret to mean "Let Baal contend against him." However, Gideon's primary function is to free Israel from the oppressive hand of Midian. This he accomplishes in the well-known manner described in Judges 7. First, he reduces the number of men in his army from thirty-two thousand to a mere three hundred. After receiving assurance through the medium of a dream report, which he overhears while spying out the Midianite camp, that the Lord would deliver the enemy into his hand, he then has his men ring the camp in the dark. At the appointed signal, each man smashes the jug that concealed his flaming torch, blows on a trumpet, and shrieks, "The sword of the Lord and of Gideon!" The strategy has its desired effect; Midian flees from Israel.

In the aftermath of this victory chapter 8 pictures a punitive Gideon, who requites fellow Israelites who had refused to take part in the campaigns against Midian. But the story also tells of a wise Gideon who, when the men of Israel seek to make him king, says, "I will not rule over you, and my son will not rule over you; the Lord will rule over you" (8:23). Eventually Israel tended to agree with Gideon's rejection of monarchy in favor of direct rule by God, although, of course, Israel knew no polity but monarchy through much of OT history. Although Gideon makes a golden ephod (some kind of statuette?) with which Israel "played the harlot . . . and it became a snare to Gideon and to his family" (8:27), on the whole the tradition treats him kindly. He gave the land rest forty years, and he had seventy sons. His seventy first, by a Canaanite concubine, Abimelech, attempted to succeed Gideon as a king and was destroyed in the process. In spite of his flaws of initial timidity and ultimate idolatry, the tradition judges Gideon to be one to whom thanks were due "for all the good that he had done to Israel" (8:35).

W.S.T.

GIDEONS. An organization of Christian laymen committed to evangelism through the medium of Bible distribution. Originally, the group was called the Christian Commercial Men's Association of America. It was founded by two commercial travelers who met each other in a hotel in Janesville, Wisconsin, in 1898. These men organized the association in 1899 and began placing Bibles in hotel rooms, hospital rooms, prisons, and schools. The present headquarters is in Chicago.

The name "Gideons" is taken from the book of Judges in the OT (chaps. 6-8). Gideon was a judge or leader of ancient Israel. Each year, Gideons request the opportunity of addressing Protestant congregations. They describe their work and seek help in their ministry. Gideon Bibles are found in almost every hotel and motel room in the United States and Canada. Many travelers with personal and spiritual problems have found help in the Scriptures because of the Gideons' work.

J.C.

GIFFORD LECTURES. A lecture series founded by Lord Adam Gifford and given at four Scottish universities since 1888. These lectures were established to promote, advance, teach, and diffuse the study of natural theology, that is, the knowledge of God. These lectures are some of the most respected in the world.

J.C.

GIFT OF TONGUES. See GLOSSOLALIA.

GIFTS, SPIRITUAL. Two Greek words refer to the topic of "spiritual gifts." In introducing the theme, which evidently was much discussed at Corinth and about which the Corinthians had apparently consulted Paul, he writes: "Concerning spiritual gifts . . . I do not want you to be uninformed" (I Cor. 12:1). The reference could be to persons but more likely it is to gifts of Spirit, as in 14:1 and 14:12. The point of I Corinthians 12 is that Paul takes up the Corinthians' questions about pneumatika (what is spiritual), which relate to the gifts exercised in public worship and sets them within a larger framework of God's charismata, a broader term referring to all manifestations of God's favor, finding particular and concrete expression in service of whatever kind (I Cor. 7:7). Both are traced to the HOLY SPIRIT's activity, but a distinction seems clear to most modern scholars.

"Spiritual gifts" in the wider application relates to the service of the church and is inherent in people who are thus endowed. In I Corinthians 12:4-6 Paul states this clearly, and in 12:7-11 he lists nine such gifts relevant to the Corinthian church. Paul elaborates this list in I Corinthians 14, with great stress placed on (a) the need for love (agapē) to accompany whatever gift is exercised; (b) the concern for all gifts to lead to the unbuilding of the entire church (I Cor. 14:12, 26); (c) the requirement that no gift, especially GLOSSOLALIA, should lead to disorder or excess (I Cor. 14:32-33, 39-40).

The list in Romans 12:6-8 is associated more with service to the church in a practical way and relates to the social function of the charismata. Other lists are in I Corinthians 12:28-30, as well as in the deutero-Pauline (Eph. 4:7-13) and Petrine (I Pet. 4:10-11) Epistles. These are confined to gifts of ministry.

A controversial issue is whether spiritual gifts of the more exotic and spectacular kind (glossolalia, healings, miracle working, EXORCISMS) were intended for the Apostolic Age only as a means of accrediting the message, or to have a permanent and universal place in the church in every age, especially our own. All are agreed, however, that the NT lists are specimens, and the contemporary Spirit fashions new gifts for the church in our present situation.

R.M.

GIHON. "The virgin's spring" (in Arabic, "Mary's spring"), which formed the main water supply of ancient Jerusalem, along with the Enrogel Spring, located somewhat to the south. Both springs are located in the Kidron Valley close to the walls of the ancient Jebusite city that became Jerusalem (after 2000 B.C.). These ancient people cut a forty-foot-deep well through the rock, the shaft of which ended in a cave that served as a reservoir. This shaft, now called Warren's Cave, was inclined so that women could walk down to the spring and back up again into the walled area of the city. It is likely that David's men, under Joab, stole undetected into Jerusalem through this shaft, leading to its capture (II Sam. 5:8; I Chr. 11:6). Later, Hezekiah walled up an "upper spring" and dug a tunnel, 1,777 feet long, through the rock in order to bring Gihon's water safely inside the city (II Kings 20:20). This created the pool of SILOAM and made the city better prepared to resist the invasion of Sennacherib in 701 B.C.

J.C.

GILEAD. A mountainous area in ancient Palestine, east of the Jordan River. The name can refer also to a person, the great grandson of Jacob's son Joseph. It sometimes refers to a tribe or to the territory the tribe lived in, or possibly to a city in that region.

In the song of Deborah (Judg. 5:17), Gilead seems to be a tribe, along with Reuben and Dan. The name seems to be used occasionally for the tribe of Gad. Gilead is called a "city of evildoers" in Hosea 6:8. But the writer may have meant the city of Jabesh-gilead or of Ramoth-gilead. Biblical writers sometimes shortened names for the sake of rhythm.

Gilead is mostly a highland region. It rises from the valley of the Jordan, at least 700 feet below sea level, and ascends to heights of more than 3,300 feet. The hills and valleys were well forested and grew grapes and olives in biblical times. It was also known for the "balm of Gilead," an aromatic resin used in medicine.

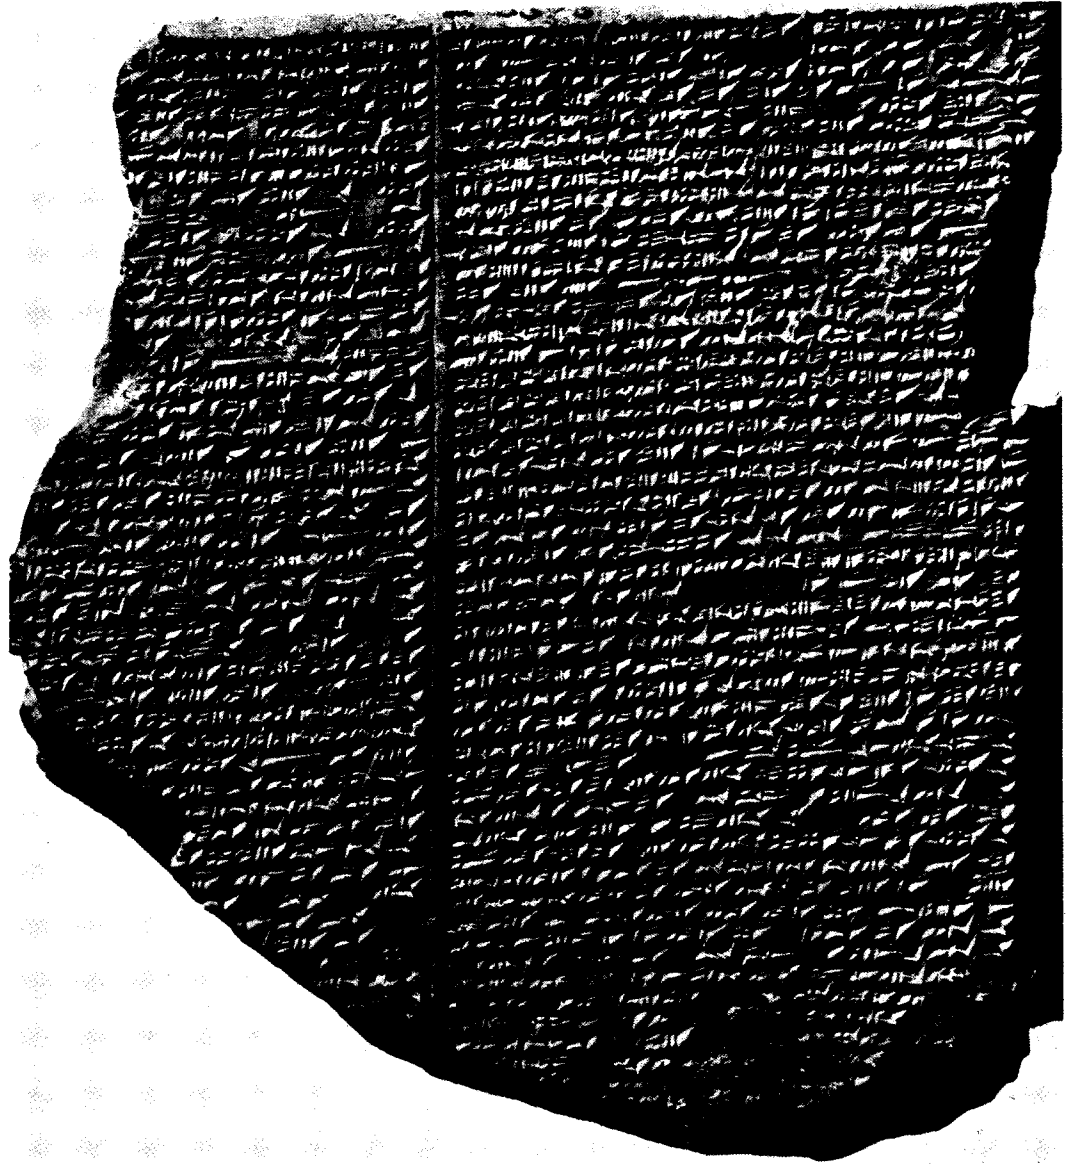

Gilead was contested property in OT times, belonging at various times to the Amorites, Moabites, Israelites, Midianites, Amalekites, Ammonites, Syrians, and Assyrians.

B.J.

GILGAL. The name of a number of towns and cities mentioned in the OT, especially during the early Hebrew conquest under Joshua. The name probably means "circle of stones," referring to religious monuments, similar to the Druid Stonehenge. Each town so named most likely had such a stone circle.

There was a Gilgal to the southeast of Jericho, by the Jordan. Here twelve symbolic stones were set up to symbolize the twelve tribes of Israel. Joshua made camp in this place upon reaching the west bank of the Jordan River (Josh. 4:1-9, 20; 5:10). Later, at Gilgal, the kingship of Saul was confirmed by the people (I Sam. 11:15). Still later, because he ran afoul of Samuel, Saul lost the throne at the same place. Hosea, Amos, and Micah all denounced corrupt religious practices at Gilgal, although it was originally a shrine to Yahweh (Hos. 4:15; 9:15; 12:11; Amos 4:4; 5:5; Mic. 6:5).

J.C.

Courtesy of the Trustees of the British Museum

Fragment of the Babylonian account of the Flood, from Nineveh. Tablet XI of the Gilgamesh Epic.

GILGAMESH EPIC. This epic, like Homer's Odyssey, is one of the principal heroic stories of ancient times, dating to at least 2000 B.C. It exists in a number of ancient editions including Babylonian, Sumerian, and Assyrian. Gilgamesh, according to the Sumerian King List, was the fifth king of the First Dynasty, which reigned in Uruk after the FLOOD (see also CREATION). The epic, which tells the story of his dangerous journey seeking the immortality of the gods, was found written on twelve clay tablets, in the middle of the last century by archaeologists working in the ruins of seventh-century B.C. Nineveh. Other portions of it were found in Boghazkoi, Nippur, Kish, Asshur, Sippar, and Ur. The twelfth tablet contained the Babylonian account of the Flood and is remarkably parallel to the later Hebrew account recorded in Genesis 6–9. The hero is Utnapishtim, corresponding to the biblical NOAH. The ark is called both a boat and a great house, built as an exact cube about two hundred feet in dimension. It had seven stories and was divided into nine sections, having a total of sixty-three compartments. It had a door and at least one window. Utnapishtim put on board “the seed of all living creatures,” but it appears from the account that these only included herbivorous animals. The Flood lasted seven days, and then a dove, a swallow, and a raven were successively sent out to look for dry land. Utnapishtim, like Noah, was finally blessed by the gods after he offered a sacrifice.

J. R. M.

GILMORE, JOSEPH HENRY (1843–1918). Author of the hymn "He Leadeth Me, O Blessed Thought," Gilmore was born April 29 in Boston, to Joseph Albree and Ann Whipple Gilmore. The family moved to New Hampshire, where his father served as a state senator and then governor (1863–65). Joseph Gilmore graduated from Phillips Andover Academy (1854), Brown University (1858), and Newton Theological Institute (1861), where he taught Hebrew. After serving as a Baptist minister in Fisherville, New Hampshire, and Rochester, New York, he became professor of rhetoric, logic, and English literature at the University of Rochester from 1868 to 1908. He authored a number of college texts. His famous hymn was written during a course of lectures he gave at First Baptist Church in Philadelphia in 1862. It came out of the depression he was experiencing over the Civil War. N.H.

GILSON, ETIENNE (1884–1978). Noted French philosopher and teacher of medieval Christian philosophy. Born and educated in Paris, Gilson received a doctorate from the Sorbonne (1906) and held philosophy professorships in Paris, Lisle, Strasbourg, Toronto, and Cambridge. An expert on Thomas Aquinas, he enabled many to understand THOMISM. He labored to relate reason and faith meaningfully, believing that both are necessary for science, philosophy, and Christianity. Among his principal works are The Philosophy of Descartes (1912), Studies in Medieval Philosophy (1922), The Philosophy of St. Bonaventura (1924), The Unity of Philosophical Experience (1937), God and Philosophy (1941), and The Philosophy of the Middle Ages (1955). C.M.

GIVING. See TITHE.

GLADDEN, WASHINGTON (1836–1918). Congregational minister, crusading journalist, advocate of the SOCIAL GOSPEL, Gladden grew up on a farm in Pennsylvania and worked for a small-town newspaper. After graduating from Williams College in Williamstown, Massachusetts, he became religion editor of the New York Independent (1871–75), and helped to expose the Tweed Ring. He held pastorates in Springfield, Massachusetts (1875–82) and Columbus, Ohio (1882–1918). He opposed both socialism and classical economic theories. He applied "Christian law" to social problems. A charter member of the American Economics Association, he was one of the first clergy to support labor unions. He also served for two years on the Columbus City Council. He wrote forty books, including Applied Christianity

Courtesy of the Library of Congress

Washington Gladden

(1887), Social Salvation (1902), and Recollections, an autobiography (1909). Perhaps more familiar, however, is his hymn "O Master, Let Me Walk with Thee." N.H.

GLADSTONE, WILLIAM EWART (1809–98). Leader of the Liberal Party and four-time prime minister of Great Britain. Gladstone was born on December 29, in Liverpool to Anne and John Gladstone. His father, a prosperous merchant prince of the slaving port, served in Parliament, 1818–27.

Educated at Eton and Christ Church College, Oxford, Gladstone graduated in 1831. Originally planning to take Anglican orders, Gladstone was persuaded by his father to enter politics. He began as a Tory, elected in December 1832. In 1838 he published the narrowly Anglican State in Relation to the Church. In July 1839 he married Catherine Glynne, who bore him eight children. Though having an evangelical mother and strongly influenced by friends in the OXFORD MOVEMENT, Gladstone remained High Anglican, noted for his moral stands on issues and his concerns for prostitutes and prisoners.

After years in Parliament and service in several cabinet posts, Gladstone served as prime minister 1868–74, 1880–85, 1886, and 1892–94. He was noted for his sound economic policies, his conciliatory foreign policy, and his advocacy of Irish Home Rule. His writings included A Chapter of Autobiography (1868), and a two-volume edition of the Works of Joseph Butler (1896). He died on May 19.

N.H.

GLORIA IN EXCELSIS. From the Latin wording of Luke 2:14, "Glory (to God) in the highest," and used in Christian liturgy as an acclamation of praise in celebration of God's gift of Christ.

The setting of the Lukan canticle—one of several Jewish-Christian hymnlike passages the evangelist has incorporated into his birth stories—has been much discussed. The most likely view is stated by R. E. Brown (The Birth of the Messiah, 1977, pp. 346-55) to the effect that these tributes of praise, such as the MAGNIFICAT and including the Gloria, emanated from a section of Jewish Christianity and had been turned into Greek before Luke came upon them and placed them in his Gospel.

At Luke 2:13-14 the angelic host breaks out into praise at the announcement of the Messiah's birth (2:10-12). There are some textual issues at stake in the song, but the better evidence reads "of good will" (genitive), and the sense of the passage supports this reading.

Modern editors and translators are virtually unanimous in connecting "good will" with God, not humankind, and interpreting the term as God's "good pleasure." The witness of a parallel phrase in the Dead Sea Scrolls makes the sense of divine election and grace even stronger: peace is given to those "on whom God's favor now rests" (compare RSV: "among men with whom he is pleased," as in Luke 2:14). Incidentally, the same verse in the Living Bible perpetuates an inferior reading and is in serious error with its translation: "peace on earth for all those pleasing him," which suggests that the Incarnation is good news only for an elite).

The final question is whether the text falls into three lines or is a couplet. The latter arrangement is strongly suggested by the newer translations:

Glory in the highest to God,
And on earth peace among those favored (by him).

R. M.

GLORIA PATRI. The ascription of praise to the Holy TRINITY used in Christian worship as a conclusion to recital or chanting of the Psalms. The "Gloria" is also known as the lesser doxology. It consists of the phrases "Glory be to the Father, and to the Son, and to the Holy Spirit [Ghost]." The Gloria Patri serves as a constant reminder of the doctrine of the equality of the divine persons in the Holy Trinity. The Gloria is also recited after each decade of the rosary in that Catholic devotion. It is probably one of the most frequently used forms of Christian devotion in history. Many Christian congregations, of whatever background or theological outlook, make use of the Gloria Patri in their worship. J.C.

GLORIFY. In many instances in the Bible the verb "glorify" can mean simply "to extol, worship, bestow praise and honor" upon another. Both humans and God can be the objects of such glorification (for example, Matt. 5:16; 6:2; I Cor. 12:26). More characteristic, however, are those occasions when the verb draws its significance from the distinctive history of the noun "glory" and means "to have or give a share in the divine glory, the lofty majesty of God." Paul says that those whom God justified "he also glorified" (Rom. 8:30; compare 8:17). The Gospel of John develops this dimension more extensively than any other book in the Bible in describing the entire life of Jesus as a Glorifying of the Son by the Father (for example, 8:54; 17:1, 5) and a glorifying of the Father by the Son (for example, 13:31-32; 14:13). The divine glory in which both share is also given to the believing community (17:22). C.B.C.

GLORY. As a theological term used of God, glory is best defined as the outward shining of God's inner being. But there is a long history behind the word.

The Hebrew word had originally the idea of weight or heaviness (compare II Cor. 4:17 for a play on this). The usage in classical Greek was neutral, that is, meaning opinion, reputation. But to the Hebrew mind when something has weight it also has importance and value. Hence a rich person is taken to be successful (Gen. 45:13; I Kings 3:13), and so to have "glory."

The majority of the OT references refer to God whose revelation to Israel is in terms of a making known of God's "glory." Natural phenomena (storm, wind, earthquake, volcano) are associated with God's glory. Yahweh is often pictured as a storm god, especially at the Sinai theophany (Exod. 19:16-20; 24:15-18) when God's fire and lightning were vehicles of the divine presence (see too Pss. 29; 68:8; 17; 97:3-6). This is the OT way of ascribing worthiness or uniqueness to Israel's God, whose glory calls out human awe and worship. It is a reminder—deepened by the prophets (Ezek. 1:4-28; Isa. 6:1-7; 42:8)—of the mystery surrounding Yahweh's person and the sense of numinous fear, combining both dread and fascination, that it evoked. Yet God's glory was communicable (Exod. 33:17-23) and localized in the Temple (I Kings 8:10, 11). In postexilic times the divine glory, which made God unapproachable, was centered in the cult, notably the Priestly service and festivals, and as the historical books were edited this feature was read back to the wilderness (Exod. 40:34) and monarchy (Ps. 24:7-10) periods.

Building on an OT foundation, the NT writers see the glory of God in the person of Jesus Christ (II Cor. 4:6; Phil. 2:6; Col. 1:15; John 1:14) in whom the new era of God's dealings with humankind is actualized. The church is called to share that new age by its worship of God in Christ and so recover the "glory" of the new Adam as the ravages of sin are reversed (Rom. 3:23; II Cor. 3:18). The hope has cosmic dimensions (Rom. 8:17-30) in fulfillment of the prophetic yearning that the whole earth will one day reflect the divine presence (Hab. 2:14). Paul connects this hope with the "resurrection of the body," patterned in Christ's body of glory (I Cor. 15:43, 49; Phil. 3:21), but John sees the glory already realized in the presence of Christ by the Holy Spirit (John 16:14). R.M.

GLOSS, TEXTUAL. The term is used in the discipline of textual criticism. It takes note of the few instances where the scribal copyist or final editor of the text has inserted a word or phrase into the text either from the margin (where a previous copyist had added it, for clarity's sake) or by his own hand, with the same purpose, namely to elucidate a puzzling verse or make a theological point. Examples are Genesis 10:14, where the mention of Philistines has been added, and John 5:4 (KJV; compare RSV marg.). R.M.

GLOSSA ORDINARIA. The work of Accursius (1182–1260), in which he compiled all the glosses or commentaries that earlier scholars had made on ancient Roman law—specifically, on the code of Justinian. This became the main text for the study of law for generations and had a profound influence on the development of CANON LAW. J.G.

GLOSSOLALIA. The word "glossolalia," though not found in the Bible, refers to the phenomenon of speaking in other tongues, or languages, under the influence of the Holy Spirit. It is a nineteenth-century word, made up of the Greek noun glossa ("tongue") and the verb laleo ("to speak").

No examples of tongues-speaking are found in the OT. The first NT reference occurs in the passage dealing with the events at PENTECOST. The disciples "were all filled with the Holy Spirit and began to speak in other tongues, as the Spirit gave them utterance" (Acts 2:4). From the context it can be deduced that "other tongues" in this instance means "foreign languages," not ecstatic religious utterances, as some have conjectured. The Aramaic-speaking disciples are described as miraculously uttering languages they had not previously known or been taught. The Jews of the Dispersion who were present in Jerusalem at the time heard the message of Pentecost in their own languages and dialects. These included most of the languages of the known world of that day. Some theologians have argued that the unifying experience of Pentecost symbolized in a dramatic way a reversal of the events of BABEL when the tongues of people were confused. Alienated from God and one another, the impious men of Shinar were scattered abroad.

In two subsequent portions of the book of Acts there are additional accounts of tongues-speaking—both dealing with Gentile converts (Acts 10:46; 19:6). The reception of the Holy Spirit, accompanied by speaking in tongues, may be designed to reveal that the blessings of salvation are no longer possessed by a single covenant nation but extend to all who acknowledge the lordship of Jesus Christ.

PENTECOSTALS and most charismatic believers today interpret the references in Acts as a basis for teaching that the Pentecostal baptism with (or in) the Holy Spirit is not just a historic event but should be the normative experience of all believers. This is the teaching that separates Pentecostals from non-Pentecostals.

The second biblical portion dealing with glossolalia is found in three chapters of I Corinthians (12–14). Commentators are quite divided in their interpretation of these passages. While there is general agreement that actual languages were uttered by the disciples at Pentecost, there are various explanations of the tongues of I Corinthians 12–14. Were they ecstatic utterances incomprehensible to those voicing them and to others in the assembled church unless they were explained by those having the gift of interpretation? All this is treated by the Apostle Paul in I Corinthians 14.

Pentecostals testify to instances of both those who speak heavenly or unknown tongues (see I Cor. 13:1) and of the instantaneous ability of Christians to speak recognizable specific foreign languages. Stephen B. Clark, Roman Catholic lay theologian of the Word of God Community in Ann Arbor, Michigan, describes a man speaking Hebrew without any previous training in the language.

Contemporary linguists have analyzed taped examples of glossolalia. They report that the portions they have examined are vocal utterances that lack the full characteristics of any type of known, human language. Proponents of tongues-speaking, however, feel that whether the utterances fit the specifications of human speech patterns or not, the divine message may be heard.

The gifts of the Spirit, including that of speaking in tongues, are imparted to individual believers for the edification of the church. Yet I Corinthians 14:4 declares: "He who speaks in a tongue edifies himself." On the basis of this verse many Christians today feel they have authority for speaking in tongues in their private devotions. In this same chapter in Corinthians the Apostle Paul takes considerable pains to emphasize the superiority of prophesying over tongues-speaking. The Apostle stresses the importance of proper order in public worship; while he expressly prohibits a ban on tongues-speaking, he diplomatically sets down regulations for the use of the gift in public services.

Some schools of Christian thought argue that the gifts of the Spirit were temporary, limited to the Apostolic Era. With the completion of the NT canon, it is said that Christians today have a means of obtaining the revelation God has given in the Scriptures. Some base their teaching on I Corinthians 13:8, which expressly declares "as for tongues, they will cease." Those who believe the gifts are a part of a continuing manifestation point out that the charismata are needed in the church until Christ ushers in the perfect age of the Kingdom.

Tongues-speaking today is no longer confined to those in the historic Pentecostal denominations. CHARISMATIC believers in the major Protestant communions and sects and Roman Catholics are involved in the same practice. R.H.

GNOSTICISM. A modern designation for a religious and philosophical view of the world that understands knowledge (gnosis) of reality to be attainable only by divine disclosure and which sees the goal of human existence as the liberation of the soul from its present captive state in the material world. This understanding of reality and of human destiny reached a climax of popularity in the second to the fourth centuries, when it came to be regarded as a threat to Christianity. The violent reaction of the church to Gnosticism during that period has been known chiefly through the writings of leading Christian thinkers of the early church who attacked the Gnostics. Fortunately, the discovery in 1945 of a Gnostic library in Egypt at a place called NAG HAMMADI has provided direct information and scores of texts preserved by devotees of the movement.

These Gnostic writings, as well as others found in ancient manuscripts or preserved in ancient writers, are of several types: (1) collections of proverbial wisdom sayings, lacking any distinctively Christian feature but akin to Jewish wisdom; (2) accounts of the creation of the universe, which describe the struggle between the Ultimate God and the intermediary divine forces, which seek to thwart the purpose of the high God, or to seize power for themselves; (3) descriptions of a redeemer figure who willingly comes down into the material world from the highest realm of being, and who reveals the secret knowledge by which imprisoned human souls may escape and return to the highest heaven; (4) gospels and revelations that report the teachings of Jesus and his disclosures to his followers, but that lack any narratives of his birth or activities, his death, or his resurrection. Running through all four types of Gnostic material is the theme of WISDOM as the means of restoration of the human soul to God.

Scholars have debated whether (1) Gnosticism was a widespread scheme that flourished before the birth of Christ and influenced Christianity from the outset, or (2) whether it was a movement that developed concurrently with Christianity and came to affect it significantly only in the second and subsequent centuries, or (3) it was a basic alteration of Christianity that arose after the disappointment of the earliest Christians' expectation of the end of the age. The discovery of the Gnostic library does not give a clear-cut answer to the question of the origins of Gnosticism, but it does offer some important clues.

The two most common themes in this literature as a whole are the creation of the world as a perversion of the divine plan, and the role of wisdom and/or Jesus as the bearer of the divine message of deliverance from the world of matter. Not all documents contain these features, and some offer only one or the other. A plausible hypothesis for the development of Gnosticism at the stage at which it can be documented—in the second to fourth centuries—is that it began in Jewish speculation about the role of wisdom in creation, under the influence of Platonic philosophy.

In Proverbs 8 and Sirach 24, wisdom is portrayed as God's consort and aide in the creation of the world. In the Wisdom of Solomon 7, "she" is pictured as the light that radiates from the Divine, and in technical Platonic terminology as the visible counterpart of the invisible God (Wisd. Sol. 7:24-26). During the time of Israel's exile in Babylon, the nation had come under the influence of Persian dualism, which pictured God and an adversary, Satan, as in eternal conflict, with the world divided into a realm of darkness and a realm of light. Under this influence, actions which had earlier been attributed to God were assigned to Satan. Thus David's sin in conducting a census after the Exile (II Sam. 24:1) is said to have been the work of Satan (I Chr. 21:1). Thus the idea developed within Judaism that sorrow and evil in the world are the result of actions by arrogant superhuman powers, rather than being the work of God. In the Hellenistic period, Greek philosophy profoundly affected Jewish thinking, so that ultimate reality was regarded by many Jews as in the realm of the spirit, while the physical universe was only a passing shadow of reality.

This outlook is fully documented in the writings of the Jewish philosopher and interpreter of scripture, PHILO OF ALEXANDRIA (27 B.C.—A.D. 45). For example, he understood Exodus 25:40 to mean that what was shown to Moses on Mount Sinai were the eternal patterns of reality, as described in the philosophy of Plato. Moses was instructed to build the earthly counterparts of these heavenly forms. Aiding this effort to escape from involvement in the material world were the Jewish failures to achieve political independence in the days of the Maccabean revolt against the Hellenistic rulers and twice against the Romans (A.D. 66-70 and 130-35). The destruction of the Temple in Jerusalem in A.D. 70 led the Pharisees to decide that true worship could be carried on in the home or in private, since God met the people there.

The resulting disillusionments gave rise to the idea that the material world was merely transitory and basically evil. The Creation, therefore, was not to be attributed to the God of Israel, but to wicked usurpers of power. Yet, it was believed, the ultimate God did make provision for the elect to come to knowledge by which they could escape the world and return to the heavenly place of their origin.

These interests and themes are evident in the documents from the Gnostic library. Details of the process by which the material world was formed are offered in the Hypostasis of the Archons and in On the Origin of the World. Descriptions of the agents of revealed wisdom are presented in Zostrianos and in Thunder, the Perfect Mind. OT figures serve this revelatory role in the Apocalypse of Adam, the Paraphrase of Shem, and the Second Treatise of the Great Seth. Many of the Gnostic writings picture the Risen Christ as the instrument of revelation, either directly or through one of his disciples: Dialogue of the Savior, Gospel of Philip, Gospel of Mary, Sophia of Jesus Christ.

Other revelations come through one of the apostles: Apocalypse of Paul, Apocalypse of James, Apocryphon of James, Apocalypse of Peter, Apocryphon of John. In the Gospel of Truth, knowledge of the true self is the key to salvation. In the Gospel of Thomas, the sayings of Jesus have been altered and supplemented to show that salvation involves loss of sexual differentiation of male and female that took place in biblical creation (Gen. 1:27; 2:21-25).

In the NT, the expectation is that on earth Jesus will accomplish God's purpose for the Creation (Matt. 6:10; I Cor. 15:24-28; Rev. 21:10). But in the Gnostic writings, the Creation is fundamentally evil and beyond remedy. Salvation lies in escape. And that is possible only for those who attain the knowledge that enables them to recognize the incurable evil of the material world and to ascend to the god who is above and beyond the Creation. The systematized forms of Gnosticism known from ancient sources, which differed from each other in detail, are linked with the names of Simon Magus, Valentinus, and the mythological figure Hermes Trismegistus in Egypt, and with Mani in Iran. As can be inferred from these and from the newfound sources, these Gnostic ideas were regarded as wholly incompatible with the biblical doctrine of God as the one who both creates and redeems and with Jesus' message of the renewal of God's creation. Accordingly, the mainstream of the church forcefully rejected Gnosticism. H.K.

GOBIND SINGH (1666–1708). The tenth and last of the gurus or spiritual and social leaders of SIKHISM, Gobind Singh succeeded his father to that post at the age of nine. He is chiefly noted for strengthening the Sikh military tradition, and above all for his founding of the Khalsa, the Sikh military order, in 1699. He loved the soldierly life, and power at arms was also seen as important for Sikh survival as conditions deteriorated in India with the decline of the Mogul empire and the rule of the fanatically Muslim emperor Aurangzib (1618–1707).

Gobind Singh founded the Khalsa at a Sikh festival. Holding up his sword, he called for Sikhs who would willingly give their lives for the faith. Eventually five men came forward. The guru took them into a tent, the thud of a falling blade was heard—then he brought them out, unharmed. They, the "five beloved ones," were the first of the Khalsa, devoted to the cause to death, wearers of five emblems—sword, uncut hair under turban, comb, steel bracelet, and shorts—and takers of the name Singh ("lion"). Gobind Singh wrote poetry, much of it extolling martial virtues and celebrating the sword as a "sacrament of steel." He proclaimed that after him there would be no personal guru, only the authority of the Adi Granth, the Sikh scripture.

R.E.

GOD. Introduction. God is the object of religious worship for most of the earth's population and is taken to be the supreme reality on which all else depends. In modern secular society, where many of the happenings once attributed to divine activity are now given natural explanations, and where the reference of the word "God" has become questionable, serious talk of God has become difficult for many people. But it should be remembered that even devout believers in God have always had difficulty in talking about God. The important mystical tradition in all religions has declared God to be ineffable. MYSTICISM has been associated with negative theology, according to which we can only say what God is not. Since God is so utterly different from all finite beings, it is hard to see how we could say anything significant about God at all. Yet if God were WHOLLY OTHER, we could have no idea of or relation to God or a name for God.

The religious have always believed that there is some kinship between God and what is deepest in human nature itself—perhaps spirit, or even personality. The difference between a religious believer and an atheist is precisely that the former believes that there is some affinity, however remote, between our human being and the being of that ultimate reality that sustains the world, while the latter denies this. So if the otherness of God (TRANSCENDENCE) makes us reticent about God and points toward negative theology or even silence, the sense of an affinity to God allows the believer to talk of God by way of analogies, while realizing that all such talk falls short of the transcendent reality and can only point toward it.

The opposition between the otherness and the affinity of God is only one of many, and the consequence is that all talk of God must be dialectical or even paradoxical, that is to say, whatever we affirm about God has to be corrected by a counter-affirmation of apparently opposite tendency. If we say that God is distant, we have also to say that God is near; if we say that God is unknown, we have also to say that God is known. God has been called the "coincidence of opposites" (Nicholas of Cusa). Such language would be illogical if we were talking about finite entities within the world, but language about that unique and infinite reality that we call "God" is bound to have a logic of its own.

God in the Old Testament. It is an interesting fact that the common Hebrew word for "God," elohim, is a plural form, though grammatically it is treated as a singular and used with singular verbs and adjectives. The plural form may point back to a time when the Hebrews believed in many gods, but their retention of the plural form may imply, whether consciously or unconsciously, that all the gods are included in the God of the Hebrews, that all deity is comprehended in this God. Certainly MONOTHEISM, belief in one God, is a distinctive mark of the OT. "Hear, O Israel: The Lord our God is one Lord" (Deut. 6:4). This was a central tenet of OT religion, and, indeed, as soon as a people emerge from POLYTHEISM, it is apparent that logically there can be only one God. God is one both in the sense that God is unique and in the sense that God is a unity—"faithful," in the language of the OT, that is to say, consistent in actions, not capricious. All through the Hebrew scriptures, the one God of Israel is contrasted with the many gods of the pagans. Israel's God alone acts, the idols are only pretended gods, unreal and ineffective. The OT makes no attempt to prove the existence of God. The reality of God is presupposed.

At the beginning of Genesis, God is represented as creating, that is to say, God is not so much one who exists as one who confers existence, not so much "He who is" as later theologians were to call God, as "He who lets be," which implies that God is a reality of a different order from all existing things. God is not an existent, but the presupposition of all existence. God transcends the world and may not be included among the beings that make up the world.

As creator in the sense just mentioned, God remains mysterious. God is the transcendent reality, sharply contrasted with human beings and with the things of the world. One of the prophets represents God as saying: "My thoughts are not your thoughts, neither are your ways my ways . . . For as the heavens are higher than the earth, so are my ways higher than your ways and my thoughts than your thoughts" (Isa. 55:8-9). God is the "Holy One" of Israel, a numinous reality inspiring awe. (The Hebrew word for "holy" had the meaning of "separate.") OT writers can speak too of the "hiddenness" of God. This God had a name, YAHWEH, which God had made known to the people. Whatever its origin may have been, it sounded like the Hebrew "I am," though it was only in much later times that it gave rise to ontological speculation. This name was regarded as so holy that the faithful would not pronounce it, but used instead the expression, "The Lord." All these points then kept in view the transcendence, mystery, and otherness of the God of the Hebrews.

But the other side of the dialectic also finds expression in the OT. A whole series of attributes are ascribed to God, and these are attributes derived from personal human existence, so that there is assumed an analogy between God's mode of being and the human mode. God is above all righteous, but God is also merciful, gracious, patient, and it is even said that God shares in the afflictions of God's (chosen) people. God's personal being is expressed sometimes in almost cruelly anthropomorphic ways. God speaks to patriarchs and prophets and very occasionally is even seen. God makes covenants and utters both promises and threats. God experiences emotions and is frequently angered or displeased. In spite of what was said above about God's faithfulness, God's mind is sometimes repentant or changed. Though transcendent over the Creation, God is very much involved in its affairs and exercises control over the history of Israel and its neighbors. God is represented by various metaphors and images. Most of these are taken from human society, again stressing the affinity between God and the personal being of humanity. God is represented as king, judge, shepherd, warrior, father. Sometimes material objects are used as metaphors—God is a rock or a tower, for instance.

It is a noble picture of God that inspires the OT, though there are occasional lapses. God is a God of justice and mercy, exercising moral governance over the world and demanding righteousness from people. The moral character of God is closely bound up with the belief that there is only one God. It is true that the oneness or unicity of God seems to be occasionally qualified—for instance, in some of the early stories the "angel of the Lord" seems hardly distinguishable from the Lord, and likewise one meets the Spirit of the Lord and, in the wisdom literature, the divine Wisdom, described in the Apocrypha as a "pure emanation of the glory of the Almighty" (Wisd. Sol. 7:25). But the language is probably metaphorical and does not imply actual divine hypostases. It is mentioned here, however, because it helps us understand how it came about that Christian theology, beginning from the God of OT monotheism, was able to move to the conception of a triune God.

God in the New Testament. Obviously there is a sense in which the God of the NT is the same as the God of the OT. Jesus was a Jew; the Christian movement began within Judaism, and its members were to begin with Jewish monotheists. Yet, as the new movement gained self-consciousness and began to define itself more closely, questions were bound to arise about the precise nature of its agreements and disagreements with mainstream Judaism. How far did the differences and innovations go? Did they perhaps touch even on the doctrine of God? After all, if Jesus had brought a new revelation of God, if he was, as Christians soon came to believe, the promised Messiah, then perhaps even the doctrine of God needed to be rethought in the light of the new revelation.

The word "God" and its equivalent in other languages is not a specifically Christian word. Did the Christian understanding of God conform in all respects to the Jewish understanding? And what about the many GODS or so-called gods of the pagan world? As early as the letters of Paul we see the first stirrings of such questions. Around A.D. 55 we find him writing: "Although there may be so-called gods in heaven or on earth—as indeed there are many 'gods' and many 'lords'—yet for us there is one God, the Father, from whom are all things and for whom we exist, and one Lord, Jesus Christ, through whom are all things and through whom we exist" (I Cor. 8:5-6). This is one of the earliest attempts to specify and distinguish the Christian God from the many "gods" and "lords" worshiped in other cults, and even to distinguish the Christian God from the God of the Jews. The Christian God is distinguished from the latter because God is brought into the closest relation with Jesus Christ, the Lord who stands alongside God the Father. Christians no longer speak of God without reference to Christ, nor do they speak of Christ without reference to God. Nothing is yet said about the Holy Spirit, who was destined to become the third person of the TRINITY. But soon afterward, in a further letter to the Corinthians, we find the familiar threefold formula: "The grace of the Lord Jesus Christ and the love of God and the fellowship of the Holy Spirit be with you all" (II Cor. 13:14; see also I Cor. 12:4-6). Of course, all this is still far from the doctrine of the triune God as developed in later Christian theology, but it is the beginning of a move away from the strict monotheism of the OT to a more differentiated conception of God, reflecting the specific Christian belief that God was "in Christ" (II Cor. 5:19).

From then on, the doctrine of the triune God develops in parallel with Christology. As Christians came to believe that Jesus Christ is divine as well as human, living from God, for God, and in God, then the need to recognize distinguishable "persons," as they came to be called within the Godhead, became pressing. One gets the impression, however, that it was only slowly and reluctantly that the church came to apply God-language to Jesus. Christians were unwilling to infringe the Jewish monotheism that they had inherited. The NT writers are very reticent about the divinity of Christ (there are only two or three instances where he is definitely called "God") and the later trinitarian theology tried hard to reconcile trinity with unity in God.

God in Philosophy. This article began by noting that God is the object of religious worship, but can also be described in more philosophical terms as the supreme reality on which all else depends. This second, philosophical significance of the word "God" cannot be ignored, though so far we have concentrated attention on the religious usage, as found in the Bible. A philosophical interest in God had developed in Greece, and it eventually made its influence felt in both Jewish and Christian thinking about God. The Jewish scholar Philo of Alexandria led the way in developing a new philosophical theism, and the task was continued by early Christian writers. The God who had been represented by such naïve images as "king" or "shepherd" became conceptualized as the principle of being—"He who is" or "The Being," which was justified by an appeal to the "I am" of the OT (Exod. 3:14). In course of time, names even more distant from the biblical tradition were used, for example "necessary being." This meant that God was thought of in terms much less personal than we find in the Bible. Philo introduced the idea of the LOGOS (or hypostatized Word) as an intermediary between the distant metaphysical God and the creatures. So, for instance, it was not God as ultimate Being but the Logos that had spoken to Moses at the bush. Anthropomorphisms were removed or explained away by allegorical interpretation of the Bible. Again, whereas the Bible begins with the living creative God, the new philosophical theism began to look for arguments that would prove GOD'S EXISTENCE.

There has always been some tension between the biblical teaching about God and philosophical speculation. Tertullian in the early centuries and, in more recent times, such acute thinkers as Calvin, Pascal, Kierkegaard, and Barth, have regarded philosophical theism with profound suspicion. The philosophical concept of God, whether we call him "Unmoved Mover" or "Ground of Being" or "Supreme Intelligence" or something else seems, as Pascal held, a pale unreal abstraction alongside the God of Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob, or the Father of Jesus Christ. Attempts to prove the divine existence, as Kierkegaard believed, are as likely to sow new doubts as to provide assurance. The whole enterprise of philosophical theology may seem to be a theoretical matter, divorced from the actual life of religion.

Yet at this point too we have to recognize the dialectical claim of the other side. There are minds that cannot rest until they have inquired into the very foundations of religious belief—and if there were no such critical minds, religious belief might soon become a luxuriant jungle of superstition. Philosophical reflection on God is needed for the criticism and elucidation of the Christian doctrine of God. A philosophical concept of God is no substitute for the concrete reality who encounters us in biblical faith, but the God of faith must include everything that philosophical reflection shows to be necessary to a viable concept of God.

God in Christian Theology. The trinitarian concept of God, of which the beginnings are already visible in the NT, continued to develop through many controversies in the patristic period, though it was not until the fourth century that something like a satisfactory formula was achieved. God is said to be of one "substance" or "being" in three "persons" or "hypostases." The danger of such a formula is that the three persons are so sharply distinguished that they become three gods (tritheism) or so weakly distinguished that they disappear in the undifferentiated essence of Godhood. Probably the greatest statement of the Christian belief in God is that of Thomas Aquinas in the opening sections of his Summa Theologiae (thirteenth century). This has been called "classical theism" and represents the orthodox Christian teaching about God. Its foundations are biblical, but philosophical ideas have been skillfully incorporated and subordinated to the biblical emphases.

In modern times, however, many Christian theologians have expressed uneasiness about some features of the classical theism they have inherited. It is felt by some that God has been represented in the Christian tradition in terms that are too starkly transcendent, perhaps because of a tendency to revert to the strictly monotheistic and therefore "monarchical" concept of God. Does God, for instance, share in the suffering of the world? It would be hard for a Christian to deny that God does, if God is indeed love and is made known in the crucified Lord. Yet the formulations of classical theism seem to make God so transcendent that God is placed beyond suffering. Others have problems over the question of God's action in the world. Can God intervene in the world's affairs? If we say yes, we seem to be contradicting a basic assumption of modern science. But if we say no, we seem to be denying a fundamental power of the biblical God.

In the face of such problems, theologians have again turned to current philosophies in search of answers. Some have found WHITEHEAD's concept of the dipolar God, at once transcendent yet deeply engaged in the affairs of the Creation, a possible way of overcoming the weaknesses of classical theism. Others, such as Tillich, have revived the mystics' idea of a "God beyond God," a reality of a different order from any being and of whom one cannot even say that it exists—not because it lacks existence, but because, as we noted in connection with the biblical story of the Creation, this reality is prior to existence or "superexistent," as some mystics have expressed it. It would seem that we are still seeking a concept of God that will be loyal to the biblical tradition and yet coherent and tenable in the contemporary world.

J. M.

GODDESS. Deities or personifications of the divine of female gender, goddesses have had an ambiguous role in religion. Widespread in archaic, classical, and some Eastern religions, goddesses have received from the great monotheistic and monistic faiths attitudes ranging from vehement hostility to condescending acceptance in a subordinate role.

Perhaps the most basic goddess roles are those connected with FERTILITY CULTS AND RITES, in which she is the earth-mother, giver of harvest, and the "corn-maiden," like Persephone or Ishtar, whose descent to the Underworld has been seen as an allegory of the life cycle of plants, but which may also acquire soteriological overtones. This was particularly the case when the goddess was associated with a dying and rising son or lover, as Isis and Osiris, or Ishtar and Tammuz.

Goddesses appear in other guises as well. Like Athena or the Japanese goddess Amaterasu, they may possess a warlike aspect and personify sovereignty. Like the Hindu Kali, they may depict the "terrible mother," embodying the destructive nature of the temporal world. Or the goddess may be simply the merciful mother, like the Blessed Virgin Mary, who virtually approaches goddess status in much popular Catholic piety. It is also not uncommon for Wisdom, Sophia, to take personification as a goddess, like the Mahayana Buddhist Prajnaparamita, "Wisdom Gone Beyond," known religiously as the goddess Tara.

R. E.

GODHEAD. See TRINITY.

GODLINESS. The quality of reverence and piety evidenced by devout adherents of the religion of Israel and of early Christianity. In the Psalms the common Hebrew term is translated "pious worshippers, godly persons, saints." In the NT the quality of godliness is urged predominantly in those books with an orientation toward Hellenism: I and II Timothy, Titus, and II Peter. Christians are to strive for godliness "as it holds promise for the present life and also for the life to come" (I Tim. 4:8). Together with "holiness" it marks the lives of those who wait for the coming of the day of God (II Pet. 3:11-12). It is contrasted with the love of money, which is "the root of all evil" (I Tim. 6:6-10). C. B. C.

GODS. A translation of the Hebrew word 'elim less frequent of two renderings of 'elohim. Both Hebrew nouns bear witness to biblical Israel's predominantly polytheistic environment. Ordinarily translated in the singular to refer to Israel's deity, Yahweh, 'elohim in many cases means "gods."

Divine Pluralism: An Overview. Truly awed by nature's manifold powers that directly impinged upon day-to-day existence, Israel's neighbors understandably believed in many gods. The nature religions of the great Near Eastern powers affirmed that the high gods commanded cosmic domain, though lesser gods had significant functions to fulfill as well. On occasion, the Bible collectively refers to the gods according to their nationality: thus "the gods of Egypt" (Exod. 12:12; Jer. 43:12), or "the gods of Syria" (Judg. 10:6). Since the gods were typically represented by manufactured idols, their composition is also noted: "gods of gold" (Exod. 20:23); "wood and stone" (Deut. 4:28); or "silver, bronze, iron" (Dan. 5:4). Among the nature deities specifically named are the Philistine Dagon (I Sam. 5:2), Moabite Chemosh and Ammonite Milcom (I Kings 11:33), Canaanite Baal (II Kings 10:21), and Sumerian Tammuz (Ezek. 8:14).

Since biblical faith tenaciously held that Israel shall worship only Yahweh, a deity sovereign over history rather than locked in by nature, a polemic against foreign gods readily developed. Yet the existence of other deities sometimes receives matter-of-fact mention. Thus Jotham's fable claims that wine "cheers gods and men" (Judg. 9:13). Naomi reminds Ruth that her sister-in-law, Orpah, has returned "to her people and to her gods" (Ruth 1:15). And the Philistine giant, Goliath, "cursed David by his gods" (I Sam. 17:43; see I Kings 19:2; 20:10). Israel could not help recognizing the POLYTHEISM of its neighbors as fact.

A Snare to Israelite Faith. The first commandment, "You shall have no other gods before me" (Exod. 20:3; Deut. 5:7), evoked Israel's uncompromising obedience to Yahweh, the one God who had graciously rescued her from Egyptian servitude. A "jealous" God (Exod. 20:5; Deut. 5:9; 6:15), Yahweh demanded Israel's total allegiance. Lacking pantheon and consort (Hebrew has no noun for "goddess"), this incomparable deity (Exod. 15:11) regularly warned the covenant people that to "go after other gods and serve them" would spell their undoing (Deut. 8:19; see 11:16). As Yahweh's vassal, Israel would have but one overlord. In his farewell address, Joshua interprets the worship of other gods as blatant covenant transgression (Josh. 23:16; see Jer. 22:9). Though Israel was not expected to assume that other gods did not exist among its neighbors, for it there was but one God (eloquently reaffirmed by Paul in I Cor. 8:5-6). Not given to abstraction, Israel entertained a practical MONOTHEISM that often struggled for its life. In settling into Canaan, Israel "played the harlot after other gods and bowed down to them" (Judg. 2:17). In his autumn years, Solomon's foreign wives "turned away his heart after other gods" (I Kings 11:4). When Jeroboam provided northern Israelites with two golden calves at the inception of the divided monarchy he said, "Behold your gods, O Israel, who brought you up out of the land of Egypt" (I Kings 12:28; see Exod. 32:4). That the service of other gods became a "snare" for Israel, as the Covenant Code predicted it would (Exod. 23:33), was painfully clear when Samaria fell to the Assyrian army. Israel's "fear" of other gods was viewed as directly responsible for the catastrophe (II Kings 17:7). Strange gods appeared capable of undermining Israel's covenant loyalty toward Yahweh, and when it "stirred him to jealousy with strange gods" (Deut. 32:16), judgment was unavoidable.

The Gods as Nothing. The Shema—"Hear, O Israel: The Lord our God is one Lord" (Deut. 6:4)—Judaism's famous confession, likely dating to Josiah's reform (about 622 B.C.), conveys an intensification of monotheistic perspective that finds deft expression in Jeremiah and Second Isaiah. Speaking just prior to the Babylonian takeover of Jerusalem (587 B.C.), Jeremiah emphasizes the impotence of gods that are mere idols. "The instruction of idols is but wood!" he says sarcastically (Jer. 10:8). "False gods" cannot bring rain (14:22). As the product of human craft, these gods "who did not make the heavens and the earth shall perish" (10:11). Jerusalem's destruction cannot be averted by "the gods to whom they burn incense" (11:12). Such gods, whom the people "have not known" (7:9; 19:4), are unreal (16:20). Their nothingness is further asserted by Second Isaiah speaking on the eve of the exiles' release from Babylonian captivity (538 B.C.). As mere fragments of wood and metal (Isa. 40:19-20; 46:6-7), these pagan deities are no match whatever for Yahweh, the Creator and Sovereign of the universe, who is "the first" and "the last" (44:6). Capable of denouncing idolatry with biting satire (44:9-20), Second Isaiah would surely endorse these words of the psalmist, "There is none like thee among the gods, O Lord" (Ps. 86:8), as would Paul, who was reported to have said, "gods made with hands are not gods" (Acts 19:26).

J.K.K.

GOD'S EXISTENCE, ARGUMENTS FOR. There are several basic types of arguments: (1) common consent, (2) ontological, (3) cosmological, (4) moral, (5) teleological, and (6) psychological. It is important to emphasize that these are arguments, the validity and persuasiveness of which are open to wide-ranging disagreement, rather than proofs.

Arguments based on common consent hold that belief in Deity is universal among human groups and that this universality demonstrates God's existence. The Roman Stoic philosopher Seneca writes: "That there are gods we infer from the sentiment engrained in the human mind; nor has any nation ever been found so far beyond the pale of law and civilization as to deny their existence" (Moral Letters). A variation appearing in Augustine (A.D. 354-430) affirms that humans yearn for God whether or not this emerges into overt belief. Though the argument can be found from ancient times to the present, it is difficult, if not impossible, to demonstrate that humans and human societies in all times and places believe in or yearn for God. Even so, universal belief or yearning would prove no more than that humans agree, not that God exists.

The ontological argument, so named by Kant, holds that the nature of human thought requires affirmation of the existence of Deity. Though the gist of the argument appears in the thought of Plato (427-347 B.C.) and Augustine, the earliest extensive formulation appears in the Proslogion of Anselm of Canterbury (1033-1109). Like Augustine, Anselm holds that FAITH precedes and provides the context for reasoning. Thus, Anselm writes in the form of a prayer asking for a rational demonstration of the existence of God, in whom Anselm already believes. The argument he receives begins with the concept of God as "that, than which nothing greater can be conceived." The notion of God as existing is greater than the same notion minus existence. Therefore, Anselm affirms, God cannot be conceived not to exist. Gaunilo, a contemporary of Anselm, responds that this argument could be applied, for example, to the idea of the Islands of the Blessed, as islands of which none more excellent can be conceived. Anselm replies that his argument would not apply to ideas of particular things; only of the most comprehensive concept, of God alone, of that than which nothing greater can be conceived, can it be said that conceiving its nonexistence is impossible.

Thomas Aquinas (1225-74) rejects Anselm's argument in favor of the cosmological arguments (see below). Descartes (1596-1650) reaffirms Anselm's view, reiterating the point that the inclusion of existence in the essence of the idea of God applies only to this highest being, as also do Spinoza (1632-77) and Leibniz (1646-1716). Kant (1724-1804), calling an ontological proof of God's existence impossible, argues that our consciousness of existence belongs exclusively to experience (Critique of Pure Reason, trans. by N. K. Smith). He agrees with Anselm,

